FUND FOR 1845-6.

The sub-committee appointed to carry out the resolution of the Committee, "that it is necessary in order to sustain the efficiency of the Society, and to continue the labours of its Missionaries in the metropolis and other parts, that a Fund of £2000. be raised by donations," have pleasure in reporting the following contributions which are given on condition that at least £700. are subscribed.

Joseph Eaton . . . £50	J. D. Bassett . . . £50
Edward Thomas . . . 50	Edward Smith . . . 50
James Charleton . . . 50	A. S. . . . 50

Christopher Bowly . . . 50	J. J. Gurney . . . 50
Lawrence Heyworth . . . 50	Thomas Smith . . . 50
Hannah Grant . . . 50

It is understood that this sum is to be for the years 1845-6, and that two-thirds are to be devoted to the Temperance Mission, and one-third applied to the general purposes of the Society.

From the above list it will be seen that but one other Subscription of £50 is required to complete the £700, and enable the Committee to commence applying the amount already received; and as the Mission Fund is now nearly exhausted, it is earnestly hoped that one or more of the friends of Temperance will promptly make up the deficiency.

ADVERTISEMENT FUND.

Believing that the Temperance movement would be greatly extended, and its principles brought under the notice of tens of thousands of intelligent and respectable persons by the insertion of articles in the form of Advertisements in the most widely circulated periodicals of the day, which should explain and defend Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, it is the intention of the Committee to commence as soon as possible a systematic plan of advertising.

In the meantime they have pleasure in reporting the following donations, which are promised on condition that the project is efficiently supported by the friends of temperance.

John Cassell . . . £5 5	Joseph Eaton . . . £5 5
William Cash . . . 5 5

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

[The following article written by an eminent Barrister appeared as a leader in the Pictorial Times for the 24th of May.]

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON, in reference to some application made to him, desiring the reduction in severity of the punishments administered in the British army, replied that no punishment would be frequently inflicted if the soldiers would abstain from the vice of drunkenness. If this stigma exists no longer in the intensity ascribed to it, mainly, we believe, is it owing to the successful exertions of those most admirable institutions—the Temperance Societies—institutions which bid fair to revolutionise the whole aspect of society in England, and to restore to us at least a faint shade of those days of virtue and happiness, when this Great England of ours was, in word and in truth Merry England.

We can well remember the time—and no doubt many others can do the same—when it was next to impossible to pass through the streets of the metropolis without meeting, and not infrequently being insulted by numerous wretched individuals who had “put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains.” The outskirts of London, particularly in the neighbourhood of the docks, swarmed with poor creatures indulging in the extremes of intemperance, thus sacrificing health and peace in the first instance, and eventually suffering misery and death. In the present day few such instances present themselves to notice. It is true the evil-besetting sin of drunkenness is not wholly eradicated; but every one at all acquainted with the usages of society must be sensible that, though the monster has not yet been wholly killed, yet it has been severely scotched by the exertions of the Temperance Societies. Our seamen, whose improvidence and love of liquor were proverbial, are greatly changed; they abstain from intoxicating draughts, and place their money in savings-banks to accumulate for a stormy day; and it has become a rare thing to see a drunken sailor. The mechanic no longer wastes his substance at the dram-shop or ale-house, and consequently his family are better clothed and fed, and he enjoys the pleasure of a comfortable home. Industry is more developed; social habits are produced by rational principles; the leisure hours are devoted to the cultivation of the mind; man rises in the scale of intellectual improvement; his morality and religion become based on a pure and stable foundation; and the tranquillity and happiness which the Creator designed for the work of his hands is far more widely diffused. Nor is it in England alone that these results have ensued. The good is spreading to every part of the habitable globe, even amongst those who have long been looked upon as mere barbarians.

Hand in hand with Temperance Societies we shall find the savings-banks; and it is a fact worthy of record, that the subscriptions to the latter have greatly increased since the establishment of the former; men will not spend their wages in pursuit of degradation, disgrace, and disease, when their reason becomes satisfied of the baneful tendencies of excess, and their judgment convinced that habitual intoxication is actually progressive suicide. He is a coward and fool who in the hour of difficulty, danger, or sorrow, would fly to the bottle and drown his senses in temporary forgetfulness; the day of reckoning must and will come, and soul-harrowing will be the remorse of the wretched creature who, with impaired faculties and destitute of a solitary hope, quits a world whose comforts he has so egregiously abused.

But better scenes are opening to us; mankind are becoming more enlightened. Temperance societies are everywhere extending the best of influences, and the heart of all true lovers of their species and country must not only rejoice when contemplating the vast benefits of the future, but the hand will promptly use its most powerful exertions to aid a cause that promises good-will and peace on earth.

INTEMPERANCE IN HIGH LIFE.

The vice of drunkenness is very generally supposed to be confined to the poor. That the rich are not exempt from its miseries, facts too painfully prove. Many families of the first respectability, are at this hour lamenting the fate of some degraded member, the victim of intemperance. Youthful gaiety has been indulged; habits of dissipation have gradually strengthened, and the propensities which at first found gratification at the tables of fashion, and at public dinners, have, at last, sought their wonted indulgence in the haunts of immorality and in private debauch.

The following affecting statements appeared in the Times newspaper within the short space of a few days.

DEATH OF A LADY OF RANK.

On Tuesday afternoon a lengthened inquiry took place before Mr. Baker, at the Middleton Arms, Queen's-road, Dalston, on view of the body of Lady Ann Playters, aged 60 years, the widow of the late Sir William John Playters, who died at her residence in Cornwall-terrace, Middleton-road, under the following extraordinary circumstances:—The investigation created some interest in the neighbourhood, in consequence of some family differences which had existed between two gentlemen, named Squire and Watson, the former of whom married a widowed daughter of deceased, and the latter, her granddaughter, the result of which was an appearance about a twelvemonth since, at the Worship-street Police-court, when mutual recognizances were entered into to keep the peace towards each other. Miss Rosa Moore, granddaughter of deceased, deposed that deceased had for some time past been suffering from gout in her feet, complaining occasionally of her head. She was addicted to drinking both wine and brandy, and would oftentimes indulge to excess. She was generally accustomed to do so alone, but also at times when her friends and relations visited her. Witness's mother had been married a second time to a Mr. Squire. Her sister was the wife of Mr. Watson. During the last week, deceased had been indulging in these excesses. On Friday night last, she was taken up to bed in an almost insensible state, from a similar cause. On Saturday afternoon witness left the deceased in bed, and went to take a walk with her sister; and on her return about five o'clock, she found her sitting in a chair, apparently dead. Mr. Rayner was promptly in attendance, and pronounced life to be quite extinct. Witness had no doubt her death had been accelerated by her habits of excessive drinking. Sarah Hewes, servant to the deceased, corroborated the last witness as to the propensities of the deceased. Mr. Watson, her grandson-in-law, who was a surgeon, used to attend her. She was very fond of him, and he used to send her medicine, but she would seldom take any of it, but generally throw it away. On Saturday afternoon, during her granddaughter's absence, witness went into her bed-room, when she found her drinking cold water from a glass at the washhand stand. She left the room for a minute, and on her return the deceased was extended on the floor. Witness placed her in a chair, and ran for assistance, but life was gone. Mr. Rayner, surgeon, deposed that about half-past five o'clock on Saturday afternoon he was called to the deceased. He found her quite dead, but he thought if he had seen her about two minutes before he could have saved her. He attributed death to apoplexy, consequent upon excessive drinking. The jury without hesitation, returned a verdict of—"Natural death, from apoplexy."—Times.

INSANITY.—Mr. John Quincy Harris, late M.P. for Newcastle-under-Line, was on Saturday placed at the bar before Mr Twyford, charged with forcibly entering the dwelling-house of Mr. George Roberts, a solicitor of Carey-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and violently assaulting his servants.

The complainant assured the magistrate that several attacks had been made on him by Mr. Harris, in consequence of which he was in fear of receiving some injury; and from the defendant's conduct he had no doubt that he was not accountable for his own actions, as he was evidently of unsound mind.

Mr. Twyford said, he was induced, from the statement of the defendant, to believe that the opinion of a medical man would be necessary before he could allow him to go at large.

Mr. Harris contended, that nothing had been proved against him to warrant such a proceeding, and if the complainant was in fear of any violence from him, he was perfectly willing to pledge himself to remove fifty miles from town, to be out of the way, but he would still deny that he had ever attempted any forcible entry into Mr. Roberts's house.

Mr. Twyford said that he fully believed that Mr. Roberts was in personal danger from the defendant.

Mr. Roberts observed, that the defendant had been long labouring under very extraordinary delusions, and in October last, he had to prefer a similar charge to the present against him before Mr. Traill, in consequence of which he had been ordered to find bail to keep the peace for a limited period, which had just expired. Witness could if necessary, produce on a future day a certificate from Mr. Wakefield, the surgeon at Clerkenwell Gaol (where Mr. Harris was confined for a time), to prove that he was of unsound mind.

The defendant in a very excited manner said, that if there was any doubt as to his state of mind, his friends had better take out a commission of lunacy to inquire into it; and he would then be able to prove that the present prosecution was got up in consequence of his attachment to his Bible.

The defendant was subsequently removed in the van to Coldbath-fields.

At the adjourned examination Mr. Roberts stated that since the confinement of his brother-in-law, his unsound state of mind had become still more manifest both to the medical and other officers of the prison. After placing a certificate to this effect in the hands of the magistrate, Mr. Roberts stated, that the defendant's mother, who resided in his house, and was not at all aware of the intended visit of her son on Friday evening, had authorized him to procure the advice of Dr. Warburton, preparatory to some further steps which it was their intention to take, in order that he might receive every requisite attention.

Two housekeepers presented themselves to offer the required bail, but one of them declined, on the ground that Mr. Harris had been much worse during his confinement. The other party remarked that the defendant's insanity was attributable exclusively to excessive indulgence in intoxicating liquors.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Twyford made no order for the liberation of Mr. Harris, who still remains in the infirmary of the New Prison, Clerkenwell.—Times.

DEATH OF A GENTLEMAN THROUGH EXCESSIVE DRINKING.

Yesterday Mr. Baker resumed and concluded an inquiry, at the Three Colts, Old Ford, Bow, Middlesex, touching the death of Mr. George James Morrell, aged thirty-two years, who died under the following circumstances:—Sarah Clements, of Ford-street, Old Ford West, stated that deceased resided with his mother and stepfather, about four doors from witness. He was very much addicted to drinking ardent spirits, of which he would swallow half-a-pint at a sitting. Witness had often seen him attacked violently with delirium tremens. Eliza Pope deposed that she had known deceased, in addition to a considerable quantity of spirits, drink ten quarts of ale per day. He would have it when he could get it. Mr. Garman, surgeon, stated that he had occasionally attended deceased. He had continually cautioned him against the excessive use of ardent spirits. Had since made a post mortem examination of the body of deceased, and from the appearances, he attributed death to excessive drinking. Verdict—Natural death, accelerated by intemperate habits.—Morning Chronicle.

DRUNKENNESS AT FIRES.

The Demon DRUNK delights in destruction. We lately saw him demolishing the Portland Vase at the British Museum,—now, (thanks to modern science) restored. We have seen him as the fell destroyer of life, of health, of morals, of religion, yea, of the very souls of men. We have witnessed his work in the chapter of "Accidents and Offences," as the devil's decoy, the murderer's monitor, the criminal's companion; the friend and supporter of idleness, ignorance, discontent, crime, pauperism and misery. And often, very often, he plays the Fire-Fiend, and revels in the ruins which conceal him. Could the secret origin of all the awful conflagrations which destroy human life and property, whether caused by the deliberate villany of ignorant incendiaries, or by what are called accidents,—we feel convinced that a very large proportion of them would be found to arise from the love of liquor. At the recent fatal fire at Raggett's Hotel, where many unfortunate sufferers were burnt to death, it appeared on evidence before the Coroner's jury, that, "Had the fire-escape been there in proper time, and THE CONDUCTOR NOT BEEN DRUNK, it would have been properly placed, and no doubt EVERY SOUL MIGHT HAVE BEEN SAVED."

TESTIMONY OF AN AGED MINISTER.

Woburn, April 27th, 1845.

SIR,—I have to acknowledge your circular of the "National Temperance Society," and would most cheerfully comply with the request of its Committee by affording you all the assistance in my power, but am prevented by previous engagements.

My heart and soul are with you, and trust by word and deed, we shall see the great cause of total abstinence prevail, for it must come to this, ere it blesses the world with all the good it contains. Never, at seventy-seven nearly, did man enjoy so good health and spirits as at that age, I do at this moment, and all this I attribute to aqua pura, and to aqua pura alone. Thank God, from my youth up, I have been a temperance man, but thought, as thousands do, ale and wine were necessary for labour and toil, and so took them. Then when

I arose on the Monday, weariness, &c. &c., was my companion with restless nights. Now, after three services on the Lord's day, I rest well, rise refreshed, and am cheerful all the day. Sadly, sadly mistaken have we all been, on the necessity of stimulating drinks. How singular it is, man is the only animal which seeks them, and hence man, by them, lives not out half his days, and, that half, by their use, rendered miserable. Sincerely wishing you great success in so good a work, I am, sir, your obliged and faithful servant,

MICHAEL CASTLEDEN.

To Theodore Compton, Esq.

METROPOLITAN MISSIONS.

SOUTH LAMBETH.—DISTRICT No. I.

From April 1st, to May 1st, 1845.

A SINCERE INQUIRER.

A visitor of the "Box of Linen" cases, in connexion with L— Chapel, inquired of the missionary respecting the real principles of teetotalism. The missionary explained these to her satisfaction, when she immediately signed.

THE MISSIONARY EXPECTED.

A. M., Cottage Place, through the visits of the missionary, has for the last three months practised teetotalism; she had now resolved to sign the pledge, and had been anxiously expecting the usual call of the missionary, not having any time to attend the temperance meetings; she then signed. Her husband drank considerably less, and she expressed her conviction that he would soon follow her example.

J. S. WARREN.

BETHNAL GREEN.—DISTRICT No. II.

TEETOTALISM GOOD FOR THE TAILORS.

Called upon D. B. in G— Street, who for fifteen or sixteen years had led an intemperate life. Once, when drunk, he was robbed and thrown into the canal, when with difficulty he swam out. He said, frequently when in a public-house have I lost my pocket handkerchief, and sometimes my hat also. As you have called upon me, I will sign the pledge and become a better man; then taking from his pocket three shillings, he said, "there mother, take that, I did not intend to give you any money this week; but now I am a teetotaler." The poor woman appeared overcome with joy. The man has repeatedly been visited, and found firm to his pledge. He has ordered a suit of clothes, and when he gets them intends to attend a place of worship. He is likely to be useful among his fellow-workmen; they have not drunk so much beer since he became a teetotaler. The neighbours, too, are wondering and rejoicing to behold the change, and say that if such a man as D. B. can be a teetotaler, any person might.

THE WISE AND PRUDENT DAUGHTER.

M. S., P. Street, had been many years a drunkard, and had lost five hundred pounds, and five freehold houses, yet he could not be induced to sign. His age, he said, had taught him to do better. His daughter, twenty-two years of age, said, "Father, the property you have squandered away through intemperance should now have made us comfortable; I can earn fifteen shillings a week, I will become a teetotaler and take care of my money." She then signed, and has subscribed for a bible.

WORSHIP-STREET POLICE COURT.

Out of eleven cases brought before the magistrate, eight were charges of drunkenness, (several were females,) one was an elderly man, father of eight children; the magistrate gave him a suitable warning and discharged him, saying, "you will repent in sackcloth and ashes, and God will withhold from you his blessing."

Four others were all of one family, three of whom, viz., father, mother, and daughter, were charged by a publican with being drunk in his house, breaking a pane of glass, and using insolent language. One of them was fined five shillings, which another publican paid.

Another case was that of a young man who required three policemen to take him to the station-house, a distance of one mile, and occupied them four hours.

Two boys, charged with gambling, were questioned by the magistrate as to their education (their father being present). They had never been taught to read, to pray, or to go to a place of worship. The magistrate appeared much affected, and gave the father a suitable reprimand.

THE ADVANTAGE OF A RE-VISIT.

G. M., K— Street, had been many years at sea, and has lain drunk upon the deck for many days together. The missionary besought him to abandon his old habits and to become a teetotaler. After repeated visits, and being taken to temperance meetings, he at length signed the pledge. His son, sixteen years of age, has also signed.

FROM THE FATHER TO THE SON.

C. S., of K— Street, residing in an old shattered building, which is unfit as a residence for any human being, said that his father, through intoxication, threw into Chancery fifty thousand pounds, that no one might touch it, and there it remains. He had also become a drunkard,* therefore he had good reason to be a teetotaler. He then signed.

UNION OF EFFORT.

The city missionary in the district, informed the temperance missionary of a poor drunkard residing in C— C—t, O—C— Street. He had lately been out on a drunken course, and had suffered much; and knowing there was no safety for him but in total abstinence, he desired to take the pledge. When the temperance missionary appeared he expressed gratitude at his arrival, and forthwith signed. His wife and son followed the example.

TEETOTALISM THE DOOR TO BETTER THINGS.

In F— Street, resides T—U—k, who has been for many years a notorious drunkard, he said that he had left his family and home for fifteen months at a time, and that his family had suffered more than imagination could picture through strong drink. He thought he was cast off from all the good and merciful, and dare not venture to seek better things. He signed the pledge, and his wife likewise.

Another, C—J—m, of W—r Street, was unwilling to listen to the advice of the missionary upon his first visit; but after repeated visitations signed the pledge, and has since attended temperance meetings. He said, I have been one of the worst of drunkards, I have sold my clothes and furniture for drink, have wandered about the country, and have led a wicked life. I never thought I could abstain from strong drink, until God in his providence directed you to me. It is now a fortnight since I tasted any intoxicating liquor, and I assure you I have no desire for any, I intend to lead a different life. His wife also gave her signature, saying, I shall soon see a difference. They both expressed much gratitude, and became subscribers for a bible.

* Query—Whether, in some sense, drunkenness, is not hereditary.—SUPERINTENDENT.

A RE-SIGNATURE.

W. J., of C— R—w, once signed the pledge, and kept it for nine weeks, but had again partaken of the intoxicating cup, and found to his own and his family's sorrow, that he was in the way to ruin. He had frequently been solicited to re-sign, and had at length determined to do so. His wife also signed.

THE INSIDE.

Looking through a public-house window, saw two men fighting in a desperate manner, while the inmates were looking on with apparent pleasure. One of the men was dreadfully bruised and covered with blood. The missionary went for a constable, but on his arrival in company with a policeman, all was quiet.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

SEVEN DIALS.—DISTRICT No. III.

AND ALL FOR PRESENT PLEASURE

C. E—, P. street, said "Drink has been the ruin of myself and husband, he has lost his regular work, and we are both shortening our lives, and all for a present pleasure." She signed the pledge. The husband was not at home.

A WIDOW'S METHOD TO DROWN SORROW.

M. C— said, "I have no regular home; myself and child are wanderers since the death of my husband. I took to drinking to drown sorrow." On inquiry, the missionary ascertained that drink was the cause of the premature death of the husband. The widow and her child both signed.

THE PLEDGE, A RECONCILER.

W. J—, the landlady of a house in A— street, sent for the missionary and informed him that her house had been kept in continued uproar for two days, in consequence of two drunken women, lodgers, having quarrelled and fought. The missionary saw, and reasoned with them on their sin and folly, and after explaining the principle and advantages of total abstinence, one of the women signed, and the husband of the other followed her example; by which means a reconciliation was effected.

THE DRUNKEN BROTHER A BETTER JUDGE OF COMFORT THAN THE MODERATE DRINKING MOTHER AND SISTER.

On visiting W. D—, of S— gardens, the missionary found him in bed drunk; and on the presentation of a tract, he said, "I know your principles are good, and if I could keep to them I should do well." He was urged to try; but the moderate drinking mother and sister endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose, saying that, by "joining the teetotalers he would give up all his comforts." He looked round his confused and dirty room, and said, "What comforts?" he immediately signed the pledge. His son and a woman lodging in the house also signed.

I WILL TRY IF I CAN BECOME A SOBER WOMAN.

C. D—, A— street, said, "You have just come in time, I was thinking of the fool I have been to myself and my family, through drink. It has cost me money, happiness and health. My husband is a sober man, and I will try if I can become a sober woman." She signed the pledge and her son also.

THE DRUNKARD'S FAMILY AND THE POOR RATES.

T. B— was found by the missionary apparently in starving circumstances, he said he was a native of Glosson, Derbyshire, and that drink was the cause of his distress. "I lost my work through drink, and have come on tramp here. My family are now in the Poor-house of my native town." He signed the pledge, and was presented with some books (explanatory of the principles) to sell, to help him back to his native place.

CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM.—DISTRICT No. IV.

PRECEPT WITHOUT EXAMPLE.

Upon the missionary's calling in L— place, Mrs. F— said, my husband thinks there can be no necessity for my being a teetotaler, but I am determined all the children shall; three of the family being present signed.

A RE-SIGNATURE.

At the close of a prayer-meeting in Nelson-street school-room, Mr. P— came in, and said, I was once a teetotaler and a happy man, but I was induced to go back, by the persuasion of a friend, (enemy), and am now a miserable man, will you again receive me. The pledge was read, when he subscribed his name. The missionary commending him to God, in prayer; subsequent visits have found him firm.

A POLICEMAN'S TESTIMONY TO THE MISSION.

On speaking to a policeman relative to the conduct of some two or three disorderly individuals, he said, "I know them, and the neighbourhood well, and if you can effect any reformation there, you are entitled to the thanks of the community. Yours is a good work,—none have a better opportunity of observing the evils arising from drunkenness than policemen, nor of judging of the beneficial results of the work in which the society is engaged. I am satisfied that you have done a vast amount of good."

LONG ROOMS.

Mr. K— invited the missionary to accompany him, to visit some of the long rooms which are attached to many of the public-houses and gin-palaces, in Ratcliffe Highway and its vicinity. With the permission of the master or mistress of several of those houses we entered, and distributed tracts to the parties frequenting these places. We ascertained that in four of these rooms only, no less than 800 of both sexes on an average congregate there every evening. While Mr. K— was engaged in distributing tracts, the missionary engaged the conversation of a tall good-looking young man, a sailor from America, who was called "Yankee Jack." He said he had a praying mother, and an only brother who was a member of a Christian church. May their prayers be heard. We obtained no pledges, but distributed about 500 tracts, which were well received.

PROVIDENTIAL INTERPOSITION.

A sailor, greatly intoxicated, was engaged in a desperate rencontre with a waterman, when the missionary, with considerable difficulty, separated them. Having taken the sailor to a coffee-house, he informed the missionary, that yesterday he had £5 in his pocket, but had now only one shilling. On reflecting upon what had taken place, he became greatly excited, and pulling out a knife, ran out of the house, saying "he would be the death of the waterman."

* Let the moderate drinking husband sign the pledge and sustain her. And may He who hath "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," (Ezekiel xxxiii.) sustain her, and then we are sure she will "become a sober woman."

The missionary following, succeeded in pacifying him,—and at his own request went with him to the Tower Stairs, when he signed the pledge,—and expressed himself much obliged for the trouble that had been taken with him. He then left to go to his friends at Chatham.

A SISTER'S THANKFULNESS.

A respectable female called upon the missionary to visit her brother, who was living very irregularly, and wasting his substance. The missionary went and obtained an interview. He confessed he was given to drinking and gambling, being out two or three nights and days at a time; and when short of money has pawned the ring from his finger. He had often been robbed, and once lost a valuable watch and chain. Being convinced that nothing short of total abstinence would be of service to him, he signed the pledge. His sister then coming in, he exclaimed, "I have done it at last." She was very thankful, and promised to sign the pledge herself.*

SHIPPING.

The Captain of the "E—s," lying in the West India Docks, wishing the missionary to try to induce the mate of the ship (who was a very intemperate man) to sign the pledge, he went on board immediately and succeeded. The mate said it was quite necessary, as he had spent a vast sum in intoxicating liquors. On signing the pledge, he gave the missionary two shillings to be applied to the support of the mission, and requested to be supplied with some temperance publications.

STREET LABOURS.—A WEDDING IN DANGER OF DELAY.

A woman who had been out all night drinking, was inquiring of a policeman if he had seen a white satin waistcoat-piece which she had to make up for a gentleman who was about to get married. This, with a half-sovereign, she had lost. The missionary gave her the tract, "Keep away from the public-house." She then signed, as a pledge that she intended to do so for the future.

A SABBATH MORNING IN ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD.

Has any one ever doubted the possibility of the love of drink becoming the ruling passion of the mind? If so, the following anecdote will probably lead to the recognition of its power, as in this case we shall see that it can overcome the delicacy of female propriety, and the restraints of religion, and risk the loss of character, station, and all that should be dear to the heart.

"One Sabbath morning, in St. Paul's Church-yard, a lady, handsomely dressed, was seen by the missionary to drop a bottle of gin. She hurried away, apparently ashamed. The fumes of the liquor, however, soon attracted a group of persons to the spot, when the desecration of the hallowed employments of the Sabbath, and the proximity of the sacred edifice, were in some degree atoned for, by the opportunity thus offered to the missionary to turn this disgraceful occurrence to good account. He did so, and taking the scene before them for a text, gave the assembled group a teetotal sermon."

Amongst his hearers, were several cabmen, to whom he presented the tract, "The cost of Intemperance." Upon which one of the cabmen stepped forward and said, "I have often thought of it, I will now sign." He accordingly took the pledge.

A RE-SIGNATURE.

Gave tracts to two intoxicated men, one of whom remarked, that he had been a teetotaler, but was sorry to say he had broken his pledge. It had cost him many pounds for drink. His wages are about £2 per week. He never thought of taking home more than 18s. to his wife and family. The missionary urged him to sign, and make better use of his money. He said, "Well, I will try again." He then signed, and showing the missionary £1. 9s. 6d., being the sum he had left out of his week's wages, promised he would give it all to his wife, which as the wife afterwards informed the missionary, he faithfully performed. He continues firm. His wife also has signed the pledge.

NORTH-EAST WESTMINSTER.—DISTRICT No. VI.

STREET LABOURS.—THE PUBLICAN'S MODE OF CHARITY.

Addressing a group at a public-house door, one of the number, pointing to a man who was lying under the window asleep, said, he had been drinking the last three days:—his money being all spent he had that morning taken off his trousers and pawned them for four shillings, the landlord giving him an old pair while he stayed to spend the money, and then turned him out. The missionary put a tract in his bosom, and gave one to the landlord who was at the door.

One of the group to whom a tract was given, whose squalid appearance gave evident tokens he was growing old in drunkenness, looking at it, observed, young as I am, (and I am not nineteen), I have spent pounds in drink, besides wasting my health and my time: I might have had a good business, and appeared as respectable as any tradesman with a £100 in my pocket, instead of being ragged and forsaken as I now am. Having spent all my money, the landlord has just refused to give me credit for a pint of ale. Being advised to sign the pledge, he asked, where shall I go to sign? He was told he could sign there: the pledge-book was produced and he signed.

A LODGING HOUSE—THE SOBER HUSBAND'S METHOD OF RECLAIMING HIS DRUNKEN WIFE.

At a lodging-house in O— street, among others was a family, comprising father, mother, and daughter, the father and the daughter were sober, but the mother was so intoxicated that she could not sit on the form, and finally fell on the floor. The husband was very violent and full of invective against his wife. The missionary at length succeeded in appeasing him, but he declined signing the pledge. The daughter a young woman of eighteen, ashamed and grieved for her poor mother, asked if she must pay anything to become a teetotaler. No, nothing, was the reply. She then signed the pledge.

A GENTLEMAN'S SERVANT FLOGGED—TEETOTALISM OR RUIN.

J—, a young man said, he had been in gentleman's service for several years past, till two months ago he lost his situation through drink; since then he had been committed to prison a month, and flogged for being drunk and disorderly; he had left the prison a fortnight, but was still suffering from the effects of the flogging; he was urged to sign the pledge; he replied "there is no other alternative for me, teetotalism or ruin." He then signed, and was followed by five others who were present.

BUT I WAS ASHAMED.

M. S—, in O— street said, she had suffered much from drinking for many years. She had been to prison, and narrowly escaped transportation, and was now destitute of food, clothing and money. She was entreated to sign the pledge. I certainly will she replied, and I should have gone to the meeting and signed, but I was ashamed. She signed the pledge.

THE PAWN-SHOP A HINDRANCE TO TOTAL
ABSTINENCE.

Then said M. S—, pointing to a female companion, she is liable to be sent to prison, for she has pawned the blankets and sheets belonging to her landlady's bed, and spent the money in drink. She also signed.*

STRONG DRINK MAKES WIDOWS.

E. L—, a respectable female, living in P— street, stated she had been a widow five months, her husband died from a disease in the lungs, super-induced by drinking. She had never been a drunkard herself, but had seen and suffered enough to know that strong drink was an enemy to health of body, peace of mind, and to life itself. She signed the pledge.

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE—GREATLY IMPROVED IN THEIR SOCIAL CONDITION.

M. D—, P— street, wife to a gas-stoker, with six children, stated they were in great distress. For want of clothes, could not send the children to school, and had no bible; she was obliged to pawn the bed clothes to procure food. Her husband had constant work, but preferred the beer-shop to his own house. She was urged to sign the pledge as an example for her husband. She then signed. After several re-visits, the husband and two of the children signed. Subsequent visits have found them faithful to the pledge, greatly improved in their social condition, and the children better clad and sent to school.

PYE STREET SCHOOL-ROOM.

Attended the festival of the Pye-street Association, Westminster, when a noble lord occupied the chair, and a noble friend of his lordship sat on his right hand. The meeting was addressed by his lordship, who was followed by four members of the society, (who were once drunkards), a corporal in Her Majesty's service, five city missionaries, (all teetotalers), Mr. Underwood, and the missionary.

* Two more cases shewing the necessity of a female committee. See April number, page 351, note to "Drunkenness not confined to sex or station."—SUPERINTENDENT.

‡ See the Power of Example.—Ibid.

His lordship on vacating the chair said, "what he had heard and seen had afforded him great pleasure and satisfaction, and though he had occupied the chair for three hours, but for the clock which told the fact, so happily had the time passed away, he could not suppose it had been half so long, and as far as his influence could go, he would support and promote the cause."

Lady T— was present, and inquired if any of the reformed were the fruits of this movement, and being informed in the affirmative, expressed great satisfaction.* The meeting was of a most animating and encouraging character. At the close several signed the pledge.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

Whit-Monday attended the Festival at Allon, one hundred and eighty partook of good plum-cake and tea, in a large room which was built and occupied as a Hopping Factory, by W. Holmes, Esq., who, after becoming a teetotaler, relinquished the business, and converted the factory into a Temperance Hall. At half-past six o'clock the meeting commenced. Mr. Stewart a British schoolmaster was called to the chair. The speakers were, the Rev. J. Tucker, Wesleyan minister, Mr. Holmes, and the Missionary. Great attention was paid, a good impression made, and ten signed the pledge.

STREET LABOURS.—PUBLIC-HOUSE DOOR.

Seeing a man and woman come out of a public-house, the missionary gave them each a tract, and conversed with them upon the necessity of temperance, in order to happiness. The woman said I am a widow, and my husband died through drink, I am sure I ought to sign, and will do so if my friend will. "Not I," said the man, "it's a very little that I take, and I will never give it up for any body." The missionary then inquired the residence of the female, and calling to see her, she signed the pledge.

GROUP—TESTIMONY—GENTLEMEN'S SERVANTS.

While speaking to a number of labouring men upon the importance and advantages of sober habits, a gentleman's servant drew near, and observed—"I never was a drunkard, but I have been a teetotaler more than ten months, and have found my health and comforts improved. I now go to church and feel happier. My debts are all paid, and I intend to join the Temperance Provident Institution!"

Another of the group—I will take the pledge, said a respectable looking female, and try to be sober, and will endeavour to make my home more comfortable—she signed.

TEETOTALISM AND PEACE.

She is firm to her pledge, said a poor woman to the missionary, and would be glad to see you.

The missionary went and found the party busily engaged at her work. She expressed her thankfulness for the interest taken in her case. Her husband signed.

When the missionary first visited this woman, she had left her husband, having pawned all his clothes for drink—she was absent five days. Peace

A RE-VISIT—TESTIMONY.

I have kept the pledge, said a labouring man, ever since I signed your book, now more than six months since, I am better in health, and my circumstances are improved. When the missionary first met with him, he was a drunkard, and was destitute of everything, his clothes were tied on with a cord, and all his friends had abandoned him. After he had signed, the missionary waited upon his friends, and made reconciliation, and obtained some help for him. He is now respectable—is in constant employment, and attends a place of worship.

A RE-SIGNATURE—THE WIFE NOW SIGNS.

"I was a teetotaler two years," said an Irish labourer.

"So you was, Patrick," said his wife, "and then we were comfortable."

"And you may be so again if you will take the pledge," replied the missionary.

"I will, then, your honour, and hope to keep it this time; and my wife she will sign."

"So I will," says the woman, and signed.

"That man ought to join too," says a by-stander, pointing to an aged Irishman. "I have done so already," replied the man, "and am now sober and happy."

A SIMPLE LESSON TO LABOURING MEN.

C—, a carman, and his wife, observed they should never wish to drink beer were it not for their business. Immediately on receiving the tract, Simple Lesson to Labouring Men. The wife sat down on the step of the door and read it. "Dear me," she exclaimed, referring to a calculation contained in the tract, "This is just about the quantity we drink, and £7. 7s. 4d. per year, is, at this rate, what it must cost us, dear me, who would have thought it!" The missionary left them, and after calling at a few houses, was beckoned by the wife, who, on his returning to her, expressed a wish to sign, which she did, saying she hoped her husband would soon follow.

THE COAL PORTER, OR I WILL GO AND CALL HIM.

A coal porter, sitting alone on some steps in front of a wharf, was asked if he would sign:—"No," he said, "but one of my mates has been talking about signing, perhaps he will; I will go and call him, stop a minute." He set off, and soon returned, followed by a great number; they were supplied with tracts and addressed. Two of them signed, and a tall, robust man, said he would try it a week, and if he found he could do his work as well on tea, coffee, or cocoa, as on beer, he would sign. This man is a noted pugilist.

A RELAPSE.

The husband of M. A. H., a hatter (with a wife and five children) formerly had a good trade, and employed several men. Drinking has reduced him to a journeyman, and the greater part of his wages he spends in drink. All their clothes and furniture are either sold or in pledge. The husband was once an abstainer for three months, and in that time saved £25, but he broke out, and in three weeks it was all gone. The wife signed the pledge.

A LODGING-HOUSE.

Addressed a number of persons in the kitchen of a lodging-house. Two women signed the pledge.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

Monday evening, April 14th, attended and addressed a meeting in Austin Street, Shoreditch.

J. S. WARREN.

SOMERS' TOWN.—DISTRICT, No. XI.

HAD REGAINED THE CONFIDENCE OF HIS EMPLOYER.

W. C., a stonemason, with his wife and son, who signed the pledge only on the 26th of February last, have all adhered to the principle; the altered appearance of the room bespoke it; everything was neat and in order. His wife stated, that since he signed the pledge, he had regained his work and the confidence of his employer.

NEITHER SUPERIOR TALENTS NOR EDUCATION
ANY SECURITY AGAINST STRONG DRINKS.

G. V., with a wife and seven children, a man of superior talents and address, and who had received a good education, is now in a state of decrepitude; in appearance fifty, though, in reality, only thirty years of age; his circumstances were once good, but he was now in utter destitution. He had been a drunkard for more than ten years. After many excuses he signed, and was followed by one of his sons.*

SELF-RESPECT GONE.

On entering a house in S—s Court, two females, once respectable, victims of the drinking-system, were lodging in a garret; one of them was lying down, covering herself, from necessity, with a few filthy rags, having actually pledged her own clothes for drink.—Self-respect appeared to be gone. They both signed the pledge, but one only has kept it.

THE CAB PROPRIETOR—A RE-SIGNATURE.

J. W., a cab proprietor, a drunkard of many years standing, signed the pledge, and kept it three years, during which time he saved three hundred pounds. Last summer he broke the pledge, spent the whole of the money, and reduced himself to a complete wreck; he was filled with remorse, predicting, that in a very short time the cabs and horses he had left would all be gone, and himself and family reduced to beggary. He re-signed—have paid him several re-visits and find him firm.

A FOURTH OF HER LIFE A DRUNKARD.

J. L., aged sixty-three, with her husband, aged seventy-four, found them in a sad condition, owing to the wife's having been for more than fifteen years habitually given to drink. They were destitute of every comfort, no bed, no table, no chair, no kettle, or utensil of any kind. They were ignorant of God and the way of salvation. The missionary prayed with them, and both signed the pledge.

THE ARDENT SPIRIT PLEDGE FAST BECOMING OBSOLETE.

H. M. 25th Regimental Society has, we rejoice to state, abolished their two pledges, one allowing spirits in moderation, and the other ales, &c., and cleave only to the true temperance pledge, that of abstinence from every intoxicating drink. The arrangement made however allows the members (only 2 or 3) on those pledges to remain. Present strength of the Society, 392, including 23 garrison members. 5th April, 1845.

900 MILES MARCH IN INDIA WITHOUT INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

Canteen converted into a Coffee Room.

H. M. 10TH REGIMENT.

MY DEAR SIRS,—After marching about 900 miles, I would offer a few remarks on the effects of total abstinence during that period; trusting that (as trial is said to be the best criterion) it may have the effect of doing away with the impression, that ardent spirits are necessary, or in any way useful on the march.

When we started from Fort William, that opinion was very prevalent in our corps, so much so, that a great many who had long been teetotalers fell away. The consequence was fatal in some instances. On our third day's march a fine young man was drowned in a state of inebriety. But, they soon found by their own experience, as well as that of the few who were steadfast, that ardent liquor was of no assistance to them; on the contrary, its deleterious effects were quite obvious, and acknowledged by all. THEY WERE CAPABLE OF MORE EXERTION, MORE ENERGY, AND OF ENDURING MORE MODILY FATIGUE WITHOUT THE AID OF ANY STIMULATING DRUG. Our canteen was converted into a coffee-shop, and drunkenness was of rare occurrence.

We marched into Meerut with THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY PRACTICAL TEETOTALERS. We had out of 900 men only 23 in the hospital, and with less than half the compliment of doolies allowed for the regiment.

We have not yet been able to open a coffee-room, in consequence of so many troops being in the station. But the cause of total abstinence has gained greatly in the regiment. In fact, all our members of the via media system are ready to rally round the standard of TEETOTALISM, as soon as the Lord opens a place for us to unfurl our banners.

Shortly before we left the Fort, we received from our friends of the 84th a parcel of interesting tracts, the distribution of which is likely to effect great good, together with a letter from their worthy Secretary, which we beg most gratefully to acknowledge. I have the honour, &c.,

TESTIMONY OF A MISSIONARY.

The Rev. Thomas Brotherton, B. A., Missionary S. P. G. F. P. in the Tanjore district, under date 24th March, 1845, speaks of his happy experience in the practice of total abstinence: "I am happy," says he, "to be able still to bear my testimony to the blessings of abstinence. My duty as a Missionary calls me continually at the villages, scattered over a space of country more than 80 miles by 60, and I am obliged to change the quality of the water I drink perhaps every day, and yet I have not found the smallest inconvenience from this course. One day I have well, another tank, another river water. I can safely affirm that, since I have been a teetotaler, I have not known what it is to be sick; before, I had constant head-ache, giddiness, fulness of habit, and rushing of blood to the head. When I travel I have no occasion to burthen myself with a load of bottles, as before; now every well, every stream, supplies me and them that are with me, with a wholesome and cooling beverage. I have had so little to do these last two years with my own countrymen, that I have been out of the way of advocating the cause of temperance. I live in the midst of natives, 15 miles away from the nearest European station. Still I do bless God that ever I became a teetotaler, and look upon that day as a great and important crisis in my life. Convinced as I am that God is everything and man nothing, yet I am sure, that under his blessing, I owe my prolonged existence to the principles of abstinence I have been so happily led to adopt."

THE FIRST JAMAICA RAILWAY.

The following very valuable statement is taken from the CITY ARTICLE of the Morning Herald newspaper of the 7th of May, and contains a triumphant reply to the objection, "Hard bodily labour cannot be performed without the aid of alcoholic stimulants."

"The first Jamaica Railway is progressing rapidly towards completion; and it is satisfactory to learn, that the fifty men sent out from England to carry out the undertaking, have all continued in excellent health, although exposed daily to the sun's rays, and working the line through a marshy district, where miasma must necessarily prevail. The men have RIGIDLY ABSTAINED FROM DRINKING RUM, and the general good health they have enjoyed is attributed chiefly to their TEMPERATE HABITS. THIS IS A MATTER OF GREAT IMPORTANCE, for as it is now clear that the railway-system must extend with rapidity throughout our colonies, and that they will be most materially expedited by experienced labourers from the mother country, the example in question will go far to remove all apprehension about their health by ADOPTING THE SAME PRECAUTION."

SYDNEY.

To the Secretary of the National Temperance Society,
Sydney, 26th December, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—In replying to your favour of 19th July last, and acknowledging the receipt of the case sent by the Parrock Hall, containing a supply of tracts and other valuable Temperance publications, I beg, on behalf of the Australian Total Abstinence Society, to return our very best thanks for this truly valuable gift, which you will be kind enough to present to the Board of your excellent Institution. After receiving them, we took steps for presenting copies of them to such parties as from their influence in society in general, we have long wished to gain to our cause. Of these, I may mention the Governor, the Colonial Secretary, the judges, the bishop, the clergy, and other influential members of this community. From several of them we have received, I am happy to say, replies acknowledging in grateful terms, their acceptance of the works. From the Bishop of Australia we have received the most lengthy epistle, of which I beg to give you a verbatim copy, as it will serve to make you acquainted with the kind of opposition we meet with in general from the branch of that church, of which he is the head in this colony. It is as follows:—

“Darlinghurst, 23rd November, 1844.”

“GENTLEMEN,—I beg leave to express to you my thanks and acknowledgments for the Report and Address of the National Temperance Society, and the Enquirer, No. 3, Vol. I., which you have forwarded to me on behalf of your Committee. The object proposed by that Society (the extermination of drunkenness,) is so commendable, and the motives of its supporters are in all appearance so good, that I have felt it my duty to make myself acquainted with the contents of these publications previously to sending you any reply. The object and the motive I express a favourable opinion of; but with equal candour am under the necessity of saying, that the principle of the Society does not afford me equal satisfaction.

“Every Christian is from his baptism placed under the most solemn pledge to renounce whatever he cannot partake of without violating the laws of God; and whether it be strong drink, or whether it be any other object of human desire, if he cannot use it moderately, he is bound as a Christian totally to abstain from it, that he may not violate the covenant of baptism. Were there a Society which went professedly upon this principle, in seeking to reform the drunkard, and to secure the sober, that is to say, by recalling to their remembrance their duty as children of God, and encouraging them to walk worthy of their calling; and which Society would therefore come directly in aid of the exertions of the Church of Christ, I should not see the objection to it, which now occasions my standing aloof from your Association. The true cause of the increase of intemperance, I am persuaded, is the decay of the restraining influence of Christianity, that is, the want of a due sense among those who are baptized, of the duty and necessity of observing the solemn engagement which they are under, to be temperate in all things. I acknowledge my distrust of the permanent efficacy of any scheme of reformation which excludes reference to the highest motives—obedience to the Divine will, and a sense of religious obligation; and my apprehension is, that men will thus be familiarized to reform their outward conduct alone, without rising to a comprehension of what Christianity really requires, that their hearts be made clean within them.

“This deters me from supporting the Society, in favour of which you have sought to interest me. Nevertheless, I thank you for your attention in sending me those publications; and, wherein any of us may be in error, very sincerely praying that we may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life, I am, Gentlemen, your most obedient servant,”

“W. G. AUSTRALIA.”

“To the Australian Total Abstinence Society.”

To the above I sent the following reply:—

“Sydney, 26th November, 1844.”

“REVEREND AND RESPECTED SIR,—Your interesting letter of the 23rd instant, kindly acknowledging the receipt of sundry Temperance publications, which we had the pleasure of sending to you, was read to the Committee of the Australian Total Abstinence Society, at its usual meeting last evening, and I was instructed to express to your lordship the high gratification which your communication has afforded to the Committee. For, though you are kind enough to express your dissatisfaction with the principle of the Society, for the reasons which you specify—and thus leave us in no doubt as to this point—yet we still fondly cling to a hope that, on further inquiry into the subject, you will perceive good evidence for coming to the conclusion, that these reasons originate in mistake. We beg to assure your lordship, that neither by adopting the principle of the Society, nor in the advocacy of it, do we feel ourselves precluded from a ‘reference to the highest motives—obedience to the Divine will, and a sense of religious obligation.’ In place of this, after a careful investigation of the word of God in all its references to the subject, we feel persuaded that we are amply supported by it in many of its express declarations, cautions, and injunctions; such as are contained in Prov. xx. 1; xxxiii. 20, 21, 29, 35; xxxi. 4, 5; 1 Peter ii. 11; 1 Thess. v. 22. The declaration of the Apostle Paul too, in Rom. xiv. 21, we regard as perfectly safe to follow in this matter; and when we consider the wide extent to which intemperance prevails in the community, and the many most distressing evils which flow from it, both to the unhappy individuals who are under its influence, and to the community at large—evils too which affect the soul as well as the body, and that in eternity as well as in time—we feel that no remedy, short of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors can meet the case. Of all the instrumentalities made in aid of the ministry of the word of God, which, during late years, have been brought to bear on mankind, no one seems to have been more extensively or decidedly blessed by God to the reformation and conversion of sinners, than the total abstinence movement. In proof of which, permit me to beg your lordship’s particular attention to some statements which you will find marked in the Sixth Report of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, and also to the tracts which accompany this.

“Uniting with you most sincerely in prayer to the gracious Source of all unerring illumination, ‘that we may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace and in righteousness of life,’ I am, your lordship’s most obedient servant.

“M. T. ADAM,

“President of the Australian Total Abstinence Society.”

It was hoped that this would have brought a reply, which might have led to further discussion; but as no one has been sent, I suppose we are to infer that the Bishop does not intend to pursue the subject any farther.

As to the present state of our cause, I am sorry to say, it is far from prospering. Intemperance and all its attendant evils are fearfully prevalent in the community. Those in the upper circles of society generally keep aloof from it, and our funds are so low, that it is with difficulty we can carry on our operations, limited though they be. Should you be able to send us another supply of your publications, they will be most thankfully received, and distributed in every way in which they are likely to be useful.

With best wishes for the great usefulness of your Society, I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

M. T. ADAM.

P.S.—Should you have occasion to write me, please address me, Rev. M. T. Adam, Seaman's Chaplain, Sydney, New South Wales.

AGENTS' REPORTS.

ROBERT GAMBLE.—BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.

During the winter months my labours were confined principally to visiting from house to house, and am pleased to find that my out-door meetings are better attended in consequence; many pleasing cases of reformation have resulted from visiting and conversational meetings; one or two I will briefly mention. A poor man who had for some time been labouring under a disease brought on by intemperance, had given himself up for death, but on giving up strong drink he gradually got better, and has again commenced work, and his family are now enjoying the fruits of his earnings, which before his affliction were spent in drink. I have assisted in holding meetings at Chesham, which society is reorganized and doing well. During the Whitsun-week, I spent some days in the vicinity of Brill. On Wednesday, May 14th, gave a lecture in the Baptist Chapel at Chalton, which was well attended, several farmers were present, and the greatest attention paid throughout; I must say that my fellow-labourer, George Best, is going on well in this locality, several young men connected with his church and congregation have joined the society; and several cases of reclamation from gross habits of intemperance are to be met with in the villages around. The next day, (Thursday) the Brill Festival was held in large premises lent for the occasion. It commenced at two o'clock, and was attended by at least 600 persons; 160 took tea at Mr. Tims', at the Manor House, at four o'clock; and it was gratifying to see the altered conduct of the inhabitants towards the temperance cause; many highly respectable persons attended; others sent to offer their tea-service, &c., who could not conveniently be there. The evening meeting was also full. The Rev. James Howell presided; the advocates, Messrs. Verney of Thame, Smith of Oxford, some labouring men, and myself, were listened to with the profoundest attention, and it was certainly a triumph in Brill, formerly one of the most remarkable towns for intemperance in the county. During a great part of the month of May, the frequency of wet weather prevented my holding meetings; but I recommenced at Aylesbury on June 2nd,—should have spoken in the Market-place but for its coming on wet, therefore obtained the British School-room; several workmen from the New Gaol, which is erecting, attended and signed the pledge. The next evening (Tuesday) held a meeting in the open air at Eaton Bray, in this village there formerly existed much opposition, but all was quiet, and the meeting very respectably attended. On Thursday visited Langley, Hempsted, &c. I held some meetings in the former place last year, but was severely threatened if the same thing were attempted this year; but what was my surprise to receive a letter from a respectable farmer at Langley, offering the use of his barn, and stating also that he had spoken to the police to protect the meeting. Friday evening was spent in visiting; also Monday, the 9th instant. Tuesday the 10th, held a meeting for the first time in the Independent Chapel at Wingrave, kindly lent by the Rev. Mr. Aston. It was attended by several very respectable persons, and a request from the minister and some of the people for another meeting; I purpose holding two or three more meetings during the summer months, as many as my other engagements will admit of. Thursday, spoke in the Infant School-room at Tring. Friday, attended a meeting on Hampden Green, near Great Missenden, one of the most beautiful spots in the county; my audience was numerous, and that opposition which the members of temperance societies formerly met with, has nearly disappeared. Mr. Bedding, Baptist preacher, of Speen met me there. My calls for help are very numerous,—am engaged for the next month in holding meetings. J. Dashwood, Esq., M.P. has again opened his beautiful park for a rural fête, under the direction of the Wycombe Society. Dr. Lee has offered Hartwell-park to the Aylesbury Society, thus giving sanction to our principles. I have this day conversed with several farmers at Aylesbury market, and find much alteration in their views respecting temperance principles—that great barrier is now removing out of the way of the labouring man, that his employer would not give him work,—numbers of farmers have given their labourers the choice of money or beer for the coming hay and corn-harvest.

G. W. HERITAGE.—HAMPSHIRE.

My report of proceedings for the past month will commence with the annual meeting of the Andover Society, May 20th, I am happy to state, that there was a large and respectable assembly; twenty-four signed the pledge.

21st. I walked to a large village about twelve miles from Winchester, called Broughton, visiting and leaving tracts, and was pleased to find a few teetotalers. The Rev. Mr. Russell kindly entertained me for the night. On my way to this place I called at Houghton, the village referred to in my last, and was very much gratified to learn that a few very intemperate characters had joined the Infant Society we established there last month.

22nd. Attended the anniversary of the Newton-tony Society. The few spirited teetotalers here had a good meeting; but it appears a pity that so much time and money should be expended in bands, banners, and flags, while in many instances the spread of our principle seems to be quite a secondary matter. The last remark will not, however, apply to the Newtontoney Society. The meeting in the evening was in the open air, and was addressed by several friends from Andover, Salisbury, and Winchester, with your agent; nine signatures.

A second meeting has been held at Houghton, and this newly-formed society appears likely to be useful. Mr. Naylor, the indefatigable secretary of the Winchester Society, attended this meeting, and also presided at the Andover festival. In addition to the above public meetings, several smaller ones have been held by your agent during the past month, and upon the whole the prospect appears more cheering than during previous months. Forty-three signatures have been taken, five of whom had been very intemperate persons.

Since writing last, I have paid a second visit to the New Forest, with some pleasing prospects of success. When there, my attention was directed to Hythe, a small place near to Southampton, where I spent part of one day, and left several tracts; several watermen appeared inclined to listen; others seemed disposed to ridicule.

On Wednesday June 18th, we had a meeting in Winchester, and I am happy to say, that the Baptist Church kindly consented to allow the use of their chapel for a monthly meeting. It would be impossible to describe the scenes of dissipation we have witnessed in this city during the last week, in consequence of the prize-money being awarded to the 55th Regiment for their services in China. It was distressing to see men throwing away their money, their health, and character by drunkenness and debauchery. Several of the military, I am informed, have broken either a leg or an arm. On Monday evening, the 9th, the shopkeepers were so alarmed for the safety of their windows, that many put up their shutters soon after six o'clock; drinking, swearing, and fighting, being visible in almost every part of the town. One party was engaged in a pugilistic encounter, directly opposite the Baptist Chapel during the time of public service, rendering the performance of public-worship, with closed doors, absolutely necessary. Believe me, the dissipation and profligacy beggars description. I have spoken to many of the military, and put about 300 tracts in circulation during the past week. I should think no philanthropist who witnessed the above scenes could fail to discover the desirableness of spreading temperance and peace principles.

GEORGE BEST.—OXON

During Whitsun-week we have had three glorious meetings in the neighbourhood of Charlton, which have done much for our good cause; and from which we hope much more good will arise. One was held in our large commodious chapel, which was full. Mr. Gamble of Berkhamsted delivered a very clear and convincing address which lasted nearly two hours. The Rev. J. Howell and Mr. G. Smith from Oxford also ably addressed the meeting. Several persons have since signed. Previous to this meeting we held the first teetotal tea we have had in this town, at which the above gentlemen attended: The other two meetings were held at Brill, at which R. Gamble, Rev. J. Howell of Brill, Mr. Smith, myself and others attended; several hundreds of all classes were present. Much good was done at this meeting; last week a respectable tradesman in one of the villages was brought home quite drunk, and died next day from the effects of intoxication. In most of these villages drunkenness and fighting and other vices have abounded, a fact which calls aloud for renewed efforts on the part of the friends of temperance; may the good Lord assist us in this work of faith and labour of love.

W.H. BUCHANAN—NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

I am happy to have it in my power to inform you that the temperance cause in this town is steadily progressing. The efforts put forth by the Ladies' Association, continue to receive weekly many instances of encouragement, in carrying out the moral and social renovation of the inhabitants, visiting with the general distribution of tracts. Meetings within doors and in the open air afford the public an opportunity of hearing for themselves, whilst the tracts refresh their memories at home, and no doubt appeal more eloquently to their better judgment and feeling than the most powerful orator can possibly do; I may just allude to the effect produced by the perusal of the tract entitled The Drunkard's Wife, producing not only a desire to sign the pledge, but a request to be permitted to keep by them the instrument of their conversion to the principles of temperance. Among the various encouraging circumstances is one which I cannot forbear naming: five families in one neighbourhood are subscribing for copies of the Scriptures, others have intimated their intention of doing so too; another circumstance of vast importance has deeply engaged the deep and heartfelt gratitude of your agent: a young man, twenty-four years of age, has within a few days died, after a short but severe illness, of pulmonary consumption, leaving behind him a widowed mother; but that mother is happy because her son evidenced a sincere repentance towards God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ to the last moment of his life. How different would have been his end, had he died when your agent first met him, drunk and incapable he was taken to his home, and from that day until Sunday, the 1st of June, visited by the temperance agent, who never lost sight of him after the first acquaintance, until he closed his eyes in death. Surely, here was a display of the hand of Divine providence! To carry the temperance tract—to sound the word abstain—to comply with the dictates of a self-denying and Christian benevolence, reading to the blind and aged, the Word of Life, attempting to soothe the bereaved, afflicted and distressed, and lure the young into the paths of temperance and future happiness; I say this is a work, the magnitude and the glory of which will yield us a solace in the hour when all our labours may be consummated by the animating announcement,—not deserved by us, yet promised,—“Well done good and faithful servant.”

M. W. CRAWFORD.—ESSEX UNION.

I have just completed my fifth week in this Union. I have been kindly and acceptably received by my brethren, but I have never spent five weeks in our mighty cause with so few signatures; malt and money are the ruling powers here, fat farmers, their fat wives, fat bullocks and bullied, ignorant, half-starved labourers, are the prominent divisions of Essex society; our legislators thinking that a fat bullock might be a more useful animal than a fat farmer, or his fat wife, purposed letting the bullock have his malt duty free; this it is said alarmed the bipeds, especially the ladies, who fearing their darling fermented suds would be dealt out with a more sparing hand, or that they would be obliged to give up a turn either at breakfast, lunch, dinner, tea, or supper, or any of the intermediate swigs, raised such an outcry, that the bullock-party were compelled to relinquish the measure for the present. Every town and village I believe in the county, at least every one I have yet seen has its temple or temples, and its Demetrius's, who are hoarding up money by this craft, and ever ready to cry out, “Great is Diana of the malt-kiln.” The young female whose whimsical stomach would reject a cup of tea in which a fly had dipped his feelers, is to be seen here almost every hour in the day, guzzling down this filthy, bloating, pimple-making, beauty-effacing compound; and the labourer, the poor, neglected, trodden under foot drudge, must drink it, whether he will or no, because his owner chooses to grow barley. Were half the encouragement given to schools reading-rooms, and savings banks, as there is to malt-kilns, public-houses and beer-shops in this county, how soon we should have that mutual confidence between master and man which can never exist, while the former considers the latter as his working machine instead of his brother. But I am happy to say our principles are progressing and spreading, and taking deep root here; we have many noble independent spirits amongst us, but there has but one minister of the gospel appeared at any of our meetings since I came into the union; if I remain here, I will try to ascertain the reason of this, as I know not what ministers and malt-kilns have to do with each other.

W. G. PEACE.—WEST CORNWALL.

Since my last report, I have been labouring among the various Societies, comprising the West Cornwall Association, with marked and signal success. The good cause is steadily progressing in this county, and good and attentive meetings with numerous signatures are taking place. During the past fortnight I have held several open air meetings in the various towns visited, at which hundreds have assembled and listened to the addresses given. On Whit-Monday, May 12th, I attended the Annual Festival of the Redruth Society, and delivered an open air address to about 1000 persons, after which a procession of members perambulated the town, the sight of which must have struck all those engaged in the traffic with dismay. A public tea and meeting in the evening terminated the proceedings, in which several ministers of the gospel, your agent, and other friends took a part. Twenty-two signed the pledge at the close. Whit-Tuesday, the 13th, attended the St. Ives' annual festival; such a demonstration of teetotalism was never before witnessed in this county; a large procession, preceded by two excellent bands of music, and a car decorated with flowers and shrubs, in which sat the various speakers, who in different parts of the town addressed the assembled multitude; not less than 4000 to 5000 persons being present. Eight open air meetings were held during the day; a large number sat down to partake of the cheering but uninebriating cup; after which one of the most densely crowded, cheering and enthusiastic meetings I ever attended was convened. The speakers were Mr. Harvey of Hayle, Mr. Thomas of Penzance, Messrs. Metcalf, Withington, Victor, Dueton, Matthews, and your agent. May 14th, lectured at Penzance, on the Idolatry of Christian Britain, to a large audience, who listened with the greatest attention, whilst I pleaded the claims of the heathen at home. Sympathy was manifested toward their drink-going countrymen, by several persons present signing the pledge for their sakes.

TEETOTAL FETE AT CHELMSFORD.

An interesting Fête was held on the 16th ult. at Broomfield near Chelmsford, in the grounds of James Christy, Esq. Nearly a thousand Teetotalers from the metropolis, we understand, were present. Among the other varied amusements of the day, were ploughing, angling, &c., &c.

A large and crowded meeting was held in the evening, in the Mechanics' Institution, S. C. Hall, Esq., in the chair.

We regret that great press of matter prevents us giving a more extended notice.

LIBRARIES.

(To the Editor of the Temperance Chronicle.)

SIR,—As many temperance societies feel the increasing importance of Libraries and Reading Rooms, which under proper regulations cannot but be productive of great advantages, I would beg leave through the columns of your valuable periodical, to call the attention of those by whom such Libraries are conducted, to the valuable publications of Chambers, especially their last and more recent publication, entitled Chambers' Miscellany of useful and Entertaining Tracts, in the third vol. of which, is an admirable tract entitled the Temperance Movement, which is full of information. This work, price 1s. bound, comes out every two months, and will of itself soon form an interesting library. I would advise every one who is engaged in forming a public library, to order Lumley's Catalogue, from which interesting books may be selected not unfrequently at one-fourth of their original cost.

CLERICUS.

Three years ago, there were 469 inmates of the poor-house in Worcester, Massachusetts. Last year the number was reduced to ELEVEN! In consideration of this great reduction of their pauper tax, the town voted 500 dollars to be paid annually to the Washington Society, together with the use of a large Hall, and oil and fuel to warm and light it.

THE DRUNKARD'S BOY.

(FROM THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.)

Come hither, boy,—and let me dwell
Upon thy cloudless brow,
Ere sorrow breaks the golden spell
Which hangs around thee now.

I would not quench within thy breast,
The joys that sparkle there;
Nor yet disturb thy infant rest
With tale of gathering care.

But pity cannot check the sigh,
To think that coming years,
With darkening clouds will dim thy sky,
And strew thy path with tears.

And that, when other boys may share
Perhaps their father's fame,
Thy manly brow will blush to bear
A drunken father's shame.

There, now, with thy companions, go—
I will not check thy joy:
Too soon the world will let thee know
Thou art a Drunkard's Boy.

SAFETY OF

THE SYSTEM OF HYGEISTS OVER THAT OF DOCTORS.

Who that contemplates the deadly poisons made use of by Doctors as medicines (in order to make a trade of medical advice,) but must come to the conclusion, that theirs is a system fraught with the greatest danger.—What curative experience have they in such poisons? None whatever; every month, aye every day, brings forth some new chemical preparation which the confiding public are told has been obtained by great research, &c. Immediately that public are experimented upon with these deadly preparations by Doctors, some in one way some in another. Can it therefore be a matter of surprise that thousands are hurried into the next world by such anti-medical preparations? Let the reader well reflect upon the following:—If a Doctor with his diploma in his pocket kills people with such poisons, the public are told that it is NATURAL DEATH! If they are administered by persons not having a diploma, it is called MURDER, as instanced in the late cases of poisoning by Tawell, &c., &c., &c. We confess that we are perfectly overwhelmed when we consider the irresponsibility which a medical diploma confers, and we hereby call upon all true and great physicians to join us in exposing and bringing to light what may be done by needy or evil disposed persons possessing one of them. Let us now consider the other side of the question.

Hygeists know nothing of poisons—they do not pretend to know anything about them—they look upon them as at irreconcilable war with the health and life of man, and therefore they discard them altogether: they are in short, anti-medical, and can never cure or tend to cure any disease or malady.

So far as the Hygeian medicines are concerned, the public have the experience of twenty years, during which time, the Vegetable Universal Medicines have been used with the happiest results by thousands and thousands throughout the world, in all sorts of cases, by all sorts of persons, and in all kinds of doses, varying from 2, 5, to 20, and even 50 pills, thus shewing at once that they cannot be possibly more poisonous than bread: it is in short, because they are so completely medicinal and different from Doctors medicines (i. e. poisons) that they are Universal! every body can use them with the greatest safety, without the advice of any one, because their action (aperient and cleansing) is strictly in accordance with the great laws of nature. Their action upon the human body is precisely what drainage is to the land: they purify the whole system by at once striking at the root of all diseases and thus restore to health. This is called the Hygeian system, into the truth of which Doctors have been repeatedly invited to enter, by an examination of the cures daily effected throughout the country, but principally at the Exeter Hygeian Dispensary, where the cases of poor persons can be gone into. They however refuse to go into such an inquiry, well knowing we presume that the issue would be against them and thus prevent them from making a trade of their "MEDICAL ADVICE," for the public should bear in mind, that that is the reason that Doctors oppose Hygeists. The Hygeian system does away with what is called Medical advice, and teaches every man to be his own physician. The world would never have heard a word against "Morison's pills," if it had not been for the system which is identified with that medicine. Hygeists have done all in their power to arrive at the truth. In the year 1838, Sir Benjamin Hall, M.P., presented to Parliament the Hygeian petition signed by upwards of 10,000 persons praying for an inquiry into the merits of that system; but Doctors have not deemed it their duty, as they surely ought, to enter into such inquiry. The reasons are however obvious, and therefore the public must be left to draw their own conclusions. The total defeat of Doctors this year before Parliament must tend to open the eyes of the multitude. The lower grade of doctors, that is those who wished to make a trade of "Medical advice," required Sir James Graham and the parliament to put an end to free trade in medicine, in other words, to put down the sale of medicines except by those who possessed diplomas. Sir James, to his honour be it said, met this demand by a decided negative; therefore Doctors are all up in arms against him. In conclusion, we will only ask this question: If Doctors are right in giving such poisons as prussic-acid, arsenic, opium, mercury, alcoholic liquors, &c., &c., how comes it that the sale of Morison's pills, should be so great, notwithstanding all the manoeuvres which are adopted by Doctors in order to prejudice a confiding people against them? and how comes it again, if they are right, that Doctors should be obliged to go before Parliament for extraordinary and most infamous enactments to put down the medical liberty of the subject, and to force the public to employ them whether they like or no? For if medicine as Doctors falsely allege is an art, they ought not to be afraid of the opposition of those they term mere pretenders to that art. Hygeists assert, as the fact is, that medicine is a simple science, founded upon certain and unerring principles, which can and should be understood by all persons.

DOCTORS WAGING WAR AGAINST THE CAUSE OF TEMPERANCE AND THEREFORE AGAINST TRUTH.

Sir,—The following article taken from the Medical Times of the 31st of May, 1845, proves that doctors are endeavouring to create a prejudice against the use of water, as they did some years ago against Morison's Vegetable Universal Medicine, solely because that medicine cured the people too fast of their diseases. Nothing can be more conducive to health than temperance, which is identified with hygeism. I am, sir, yours, &c.

A HYGEIST.

ARTICLE FROM THE MEDICAL TIMES.

"Effects of drinking cold water.—Dimness of sight, syncope, spasms of the chest and stomach, staggering, imperceptible pulse, and laborious respiration. Sudden death, says Thomson, has often been observed to be produced by drinking large draughts of cold water. Indeed, this effect of cold upon those who have suffered much previous heat, thirst, and fatigue, has long been known. Quintus Curtius, in particular, gives a very interesting account of the fatal effects which the army of Alexander the Great experienced on reaching the banks of the river Oxus, after a fatiguing march through the sterile and burning sands of the desert. Those who indulged in drinking freely of the stream died immediately; and Alexander, the historian remarks, lost more men by this means than he ever lost in battle. Numerous well authenticated instances of sudden death from the same cause are to be found in the records of medicine."

P. S. One thing I will venture to say, that cold water has not killed so many persons as the poisons of doctors administered "medicinally" as they have it.

OLD CUSTOMS.

When persons support their opinions and practices by the example of antiquity, they should take care they go back far enough. We often hear a certain religious system defended as "the Faith of our Ancestors," when it turns out to be of comparatively modern origin. In like manner, the drinking-customs of society are often openly, and perhaps always tacitly, supported as the good old ways of our forefathers. Now, if our fathers and grandfathers, and great grand-fathers indulged themselves in drinking, there is no very obvious reason why we should follow their example, if experience proves it to be a bad one. How far back are we to go, in order to obtain a valid sanction from antiquity? Adam drank water—Noah got drunk. Peacham, writing about two hundred years ago, speaks of drinking as the plague of the English gentry, but observes:—

"Within these fifty years, it was a rare thing with us in England, to see a drunken man, our nation carrying the name of the most sober and temperate of any other in the world. But since we had to do in the quarrel in the Netherlands, the custom of drinking and pledging healths was brought over to England, wherein let the Dutch be their own judges, if we equal them not, yea, I think, rather excel them."

And, again, he adds:—

"If you tell them how in former ages, their forefathers drank water, they swear water is the frog's drink, and ordained only for the driving of mills, and carrying of boats."

The old soldier and pamphleteer Barnaby Rich, who wrote in the reign of James I., speaks in his pamphlet, entitled The Irish Hubbub, of the drinking of healths, and observes:—

"In former ages, they had no conceits whereby to draw on drunkenness; their best was, 'I drink to you,' and 'I pledge you,' till at length some shallow-witted drunkard found out the carouse, which shortly afterwards was turned into a hearty draught."

Thomas Heywood, in his Philocothonia, (A. D. 1635,) says:—"To title a drunkard by, we (being loath to give him so gross and harsh a name) strive to character him in a more mining and modest phrase, as thus:—'He is a good fellow—a boon companion—a mad Greek—a true Trojan—a stiff blade—a Low-Country soldier—one that will drink deep, though it be a mile to the bottom,'" &c.

But whether we prefer being guided by the example of the seventeenth century, or by that of the sixteenth, when England was as celebrated for temperance as it is now for the reverse—if we really believe in the perfection of antiquity, let us go back to the only period when mankind were in a perfect state, and then assuredly we should drink only Adam's Pale Ale.

TEMPERANCE AND MENTAL ELEVATION.

The influence which temperance will exert upon the people physically, economically, politically, socially, morally, and religiously, has been repeatedly depicted, in the most glowing colours which language can command; but the effect which the adoption of true sobriety would produce upon the mental elevation of our nation, has been but too seldom and too feebly portrayed.

Temperance will sever one of the strongest chains which bind the mind to the earth, and render it earthly and carnal; it will add immeasurably to the thirst for knowledge which universally exists; and it will give an impetus to the growing intelligence of the age. Science builds up temperance, and temperance aids science. Science demonstrates that temperance is in strict accordance with the laws of man's physiological constitution; and temperance will increase the number of those who are to fathom the yet unpenetrated depths of science, and by thus adding to our knowledge of those laws which govern the universe, confer inestimable blessings upon mankind.

Temperance sees the man who was created in the image of God, a debased and degraded drunkard:—the crown of intellectual glory has fallen from his brow, and his mind is occupied with nought but vile emotions. It elevates him—it cools his fevered brain—it restores clearness to his judgment—and again imparts to him the use of man's great prerogative, REASON! He becomes in truth, a man; he breathes, but it is in a new state of existence. He soon is painfully conscious of the emptiness of his mind, and he seeks for something to fill up the now insufferable vacuity. He tastes of the pleasures which literature, and art, and science can confer: his soul expands—where before he was distinguished for the sensual, he is now distinguished for the intellectual—where before his emotions were grovelling, they are now elevated, dignified, and directed heaven-ward!

There is then, between temperance and mental elevation, a close and intimate connexion; and it gives us great satisfaction and delight, to witness the spectacle of this connexion being duly appreciated, by the union of Temperance Societies, and Mechanics' and Literary Institutions.

These observations have been elicited by a statement in the Norfolk News, that it is purposed to establish a Mechanics' Institution in Beccles, in connexion with the temperance society of that town. We earnestly hope that this laudable example will have many imitations.

"Some such institution," says the Correspondent of the Norfolk News, "has been for a long time wanted in Beccles. Its connexion with the temperance society is something new, but to this there can be no objection; such an alliance, on the contrary, seems highly desirable. It is well known, that this society has effected an extensive and remarkable reformation in the habits of the working classes, and it has been by no means idle in our town. Now, nothing has occasioned more regret, than the want of some resource to which its converts may turn for the profitable employment of their leisure time, formerly so sadly mis-spent at the bar of the tavern. This want will be well supplied by the projected Mechanics' Institute."

TEMPERANCE MISSION IN FRANCE.

A small Temperance Society has existed for about two years among the English residents in Rouen, near Havre. Application was made a short time since by Mr. Mack, (one of the most active members of that Society) for an agent to labour for three months, principally among the English workmen employed upon the Paris and Rouen Railway.

The Committee after due deliberation and correspondence with Mr. Mack, came to the determination of sending Mr. James Balfour and another missionary for six weeks each, to extend the principles of Temperance among our countrymen in Rouen and Havre, and if possible, to form the nucleus of a Temperance Mission in France.

A detailed account of Mr. Balfour's operations will appear in next month's Chronicle.

Compendium of Facts.

PETITIONS.—According to the 36th Report of the Select Committee on Public Petitions, there are now before the House of Commons, 867 temperance petitions signed by 191,925 persons.

PERIODICALS.—There are in England alone, two weekly and fifteen monthly publications, devoted specifically to the advocacy of true temperance.

EXCISE.—There is a decrease in the receipts of the excise department of the revenue, for the quarter ending July 5th, 1845, over that of 1844, amounting to £149,908.

GIN—STARTLING IF TRUE!—The following statement is said to be grounded on official documents. "There is an increase in the consumption of gin, during the last twelve months, of 500,000 gallons. The total quantity of proof-spirit distilled in the whole of the United Kingdom, amounts to nearly a gallon a-head to each individual, comprehending men, women, and children."

BREWERS, BEER-SELLERS, &c.—From a parliamentary return moved for by Mr. Alderman Humphery, it appears that the number of persons licensed as brewers in the United Kingdom amounts 2695; the number licensed as victuallers to 86,234; the number of persons licensed to sell beer to be drunk on the premises to 31,729; the number licensed to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises to 4,022; the number of victuallers who brew their own beer to 26,715; the number of persons licensed to sell beer to be drunk on the premises, who brew their own beer to 12,603; and the number of those licensed to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises, and who brew their own beer to 1,925.

COFFEE AND TEA.—The consumption of coffee from April 1843 to April 1844, was . 7,979,386 lbs.
From April 1844 to April 1845, . . . 9,578,825 "

Increase . . . 1,599,439 lbs.

In 1843 the duty on tea amounted to £4,407,642
In 1844 it reached 4,524,193

Increase in the duty . . . £116,551

THE PICTORIAL TIMES gave an engraving of the Chelmsford temperance fete, and a leading article, setting forth the advantages of rational, sober enjoyment.

THE SOCIETY at Cockermonth, with a population of about 5000 persons, numbers 1550 members, 150 of whom are reclaimed drunkards. Since its formation (nine years ago), 1 inn, 1 brewery, and 13 beer-shops have been closed.

THE COMMITTEE of the Newcastle-on-Tyne temperance society are about to attempt a re-organization of the leading societies in Northumberland and Durham, and have engaged for that purpose, Mr. Isaac Phelps as their agent.

DR. GRINDROD'S lectures have induced, it is reported, upwards of 30,000 persons to sign the pledge.

MERTHYR TYDVIL.—The teetotalers of Merthyr Tydvil, South Wales, have lately had four monster meetings, each of about 3000 persons, in the levathan dissenting chapels of Merthyr.

THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE have engaged Mr. Vincent, for a term, commencing July 1st.

IRISH PLEDGE-BREAKING.—James Breene, a rich farmer of Ballinacally in Clare county, Ireland, a short time ago broke the pledge, got drunk, and murdered his wife.

THE MORNING HERALD stated, that not a single drunken person was seen in Dublin, amidst the excitement attendant on Mr. O'Connell's levee.

THE EARL OF KENMARE has contributed £100 to the building of the temperance hall in Killarney.

HOLLAND.—The Amsterdam correspondent of the Morning Herald, (July 9th) observes, "At Schiedam, Rotterdam and Delfshaven, the corn distilleries during 1844, were either slack or doing business at a loss, particularly in the brandy department. Out of 167 distilleries in the first-named town, five remained idle during the entire year, and two failed."

AMERICAN SEAMEN.—Eight hundred sailors have signed the temperance pledge at the Home for Seamen, No. 320, Pearl Street, New York, during the last year. About three thousand dollars have been deposited in the Seamen's Savings Bank, and more than double the amount has been taken to friends and relatives.

EDITORIAL CONVENTION.—It is purposed to hold a convention of temperance editors at New Haven, Connecticut (U.S.), sometime in next October.

LICENSE LAW IN NEW YORK STATE.—A bill has passed the house of representatives and the senate of the state of New York, and has been signed by the governor, the first section of which enacts, that:—"On Tuesday next preceding the first Monday in the month of May next, the electors of the several towns and cities in this state, [New York city excepted,] shall determine by ballot, whether the board of excise, in their respective towns and cities, shall or shall not grant licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors." And according to Sec. 3:—"If at such meetings or elections, a majority of such electors, in such town or city, shall cast their votes for 'no license,' it shall not at any time thereafter be lawful for the board of excise of said town or city, to grant to any person whatever, any license to sell intoxicating or spirituous liquors or wines, in such town or city, until such determination shall have been reversed by vote, as hereinafter provided."

MORE THAN 1800 names have been added to the Washington Society, in Hartford county, state of Connecticut, since June last, making the present number 4,000.

THE LAWYERS.—In Judge Williams's district in Iowa, all the lawyers, amounting to upwards of fifty, are pledged teetotalers.

GOVERNOR WRIGHT of New York, recently gave a party, at which were many distinguished men, including an ex-president, ex-governors, &c., where no wine or other intoxicating drinks were offered to the guests.

CRIME.—There are 130 convicts in the Western Penitentiary, Pennsylvania. Of these, 110 were intemperate.

THE AMERICAN Temperance Journal states, that a portable tavern is kept on the line which divides two towns in Franklin county, so that when the keeper is beset by the temperance men in one town, by the aid of a strong team hitched to his drunkey, it is twitched across the road into the other town, and so vice versa!

THE ST. JOHN TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY (Newfoundland), numbers about 3000 members.

ELECTION IN TEXAS.—At a recent election held at Brazoria, there was no visiting of grog-shops. The candidates were temperance men, and treating was entirely out of the question.

IN HOBART TOWN, New South Wales, there are 1500 pledged teetotalers, two-thirds of whom are reformed drunkards.

Districts Nos. 1 and 8 are visited one week in each month by the Missionaries of Nos. 7 and 10.

SUPERINTENDENT.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

SOUTH LAMBETH.—DISTRICT No. I.

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

SWEET LABOURS—PAYING WAGES AT THE PUBLIC HOUSE, AND BREAKING THE PLEDGE.

On going down K. Lane, met a man intoxicated: a temperance meeting being held close by, he was invited to attend, the missionary proceeding in the direction of the place, the man following; on entering, finding the meeting had not commenced, the conversation was continued, in the course of which, it appeared he had signed before and broken his pledge, and attributed his falling to his being paid his wages at the public-house, and he was afraid he should not be able, if left alone, to withstand continued opposition: the missionary promised to sit him; he then signed.

DRUNKARDS CANNOT LIVE TO THEMSELVES.

The missionary called upon a long tried teetotaler in Street, who said, pointing to an elderly female in the room, "There is some work for you to do, so that your sit will not be in vain; she has not been a drunkard herself," continued the teetotaler, "but has suffered early in her family through her drunkenness; and her ample may influence others:" her friend then signed and continues consistent.

J. S. WARREN.

BETHNAL GREEN.—DISTRICT No. II.

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

A RE-SIGNATURE.

T. W. said he had had enough of drinking, and that intemperate habits if not forsaken would speedily reduce his family to ruin. He had been a teetotaler; nevertheless, in an evil hour had broken his pledge, he would try and do better in future. He then re-signed, and has several times been visited and is acting consistently.

STEPNEY FAIR—THE SOLDIER.

The missionary visiting Stepney Fair fell in with a soldier of the Scotch Fusilier Guards. The missionary drew him into conversation, when he said he was a child of pious parents, but had gone astray and enlisted for a soldier; that he had been an officer's servant, but had lost a valuable situation through drunkenness: he signed the pledge. The missionary gave him some temperance publications which he promised to read, he also promised to attend the temperance meetings; and has since accompanied the missionary to a place of worship, and appears grateful.

RESTORED TO THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

J. H. of N—G— Street, once belonged to a Christian church, but had fallen through strong drink. The missionary besought him to abstain entirely from his getting sin, by signing the teetotal pledge and keeping which he at length did, and is again connected with the people of God. His wife also gave her signature.

NO SAFETY BUT IN ENTIRE ABSTINENCE.

P. D., a professor of medicine, had ruined his reputation and wasted his substance through strong drink. Having there was no safety but in entire abstinence, readily signed the pledge.

THE CONFESSION OF A LANDLORD.

Had an interview with a respectable landlord, who confessed that teetotalism was doing much good, and that was not far from it.

STREET LABOURS—SIGNED ON THE SPOT.

While addressing a group close to a gin-palace, a woman said, "I want some food, I have just had three weeks of confinement in the house of correction for getting drunk and breaking a pane of glass." After some further conversation, the woman and her husband promised to attend a temperance meeting the following evening and sign the pledge.

Two other persons (a man and his wife) signed on the spot, on whom the missionary afterwards called, and found them firm and grateful.

SPITALFIELDS MARKET—OPPOSITE OPINIONS OF THE SYSTEM.

While addressing a number of gardeners, porters and others in the above market, some ridiculed teetotalism, saying, "what next, I suppose you will wish us to abstain from food as well as drink;" while others remarked, "the gentleman is right:" one signed.

CAB STANDS—A CABMAN'S CHARACTER OF CABMEN.

One said, "I know that cabmen have been proverbial for intemperance, and that we are looked upon by many as a drunken race, and, perhaps, there is too much truth in this, but I think it might be otherwise. We may if we please become teetotalers as well as others, I am resolved for one to try:" he then signed.

SPITALFIELDS MARKET—TESTIMONY.

While conversing with a group in the above market, a man who was a teetotaler said, that total abstinence was one of the best of systems. It would have been a good thing for me (continued the man) if I had been a teetotaler the whole of my life. The other day, through drinking beer and gin, I stabbed my wife; nevertheless, I bless God, that soon after committing the act I went and signed the pledge, and have kept it ever since. The missionary congratulated him that he had not murdered his wife, and that he had signed the pledge once more; and hoped he would look up for divine grace to enable him to keep it.

NOT TO TAKE A REFUSAL.

J. C. the father of a family had lived an intemperate life for a number of years, and was not sober when the missionary met with him. At first he was much opposed, and said he never would sign! But after farther conversation he signed.*

A SHOPKEEPER'S HABIT.

R. M. of A— Street, late a midshipman, had been to several parts of the world, and drank intemperately for many years. He is now in a prosperous business, and in the habit of treating his customers with beer; receiving into his shop to the extent of ten or twelve pots of beer a day, nevertheless he signed the pledge, as also did his wife, and after frequent visitations are found firm.†

WORSHIP-STREET, POLICE-COURT.

Out of ten cases brought before the magistrate, nine were connected with drunkenness; one was a respectable looking female of middle age charged with being drunk and disorderly. Another case was that of a young man who earned good wages but spent nearly all in drink, and had (according to his master's statement) done so for more than ten years. Another was that of a married man who was found drunk and disorderly within ten hours of the death of his mother. He was sent to the house of correction for three weeks. The whole of these cases occurred early on Sunday morning, or late on Sunday evening. The magistrate said, that he could in no wise look over Sunday drunkenness, they ought to have been at church and to have done better.‡

missionary reasoned with him for a considerable time, as did also two of his neighbours, (who feel deeply for the poor woman and her children), but could not induce him to abandon his evil ways.*

WANT OF MORAL COURAGE A HINDERANCE.

While addressing a group, one man said, I was once in possession of five hundred pounds in the funds, and seven hundred pounds besides, I also employed thirty men; but it is all gone in intemperance, and yet I have not resolution to become a teetotaler, nevertheless I am obliged for your good counsel. Upon this, another addressing himself to the missionary said, do you not remember giving good advice to a company of men in Bishopgate-street, about three months since; one man was much impressed with what you said, and although he would not yield at that time, yet a few days afterwards he went and signed the pledge, and has kept it ever since.†

THE RULING PASSION.

Mrs. B— of No. in Street, a few days ago, while employed in taking away some rubbish from a yard found a corked bottle full of liquor, as she supposed, but which turned out to be poison. She drank a portion of it, as did also three other women and a boy. Discovering their mistake, they immediately proceeded to the London Hospital, when the usual means being resorted to, they all ultimately recovered.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

ST. GILES'S.—DISTRICT No. III.

(From May 1st to June 1st).

IGNORANCE A HINDERANCE TO TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

C. B. of C— Street, in answer to the inquiries of the missionary as to how she came by the black eye that disfigured her, said "I do not know; I suppose I must have fought with some other female while in a state of intoxication. Two years ago," she remarked, "she had a well furnished house, and kept a servant, but through the intemperance of her husband and herself, they were now reduced to one miserable room;" she was urged to sign the pledge. She said "my friends think it would kill me, but if you will call on them and explain it, I will sign." The missionary did so, when she signed.

KNOWLEDGE FACILITATES TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

N. S. one of a group said, "I know your system is good, and the drinking bad, and I would sign if I had a penny to pay for the card. The fact is this," he continued, "that during the last two days, I have spent and pledged all for drink; I think it is quite time to make a change." He was informed that wanting money to purchase a card of membership was no impediment: he then signed; his companion following his example.

THE WIDOWER'S RESOLUTION; OR, EXPERIENCE MAKING WISE.

"I sign (said D. J. of B. H.) for the sake of my six motherless children." Strong drink was the cause of the death of his wife. He felt therefore a desire to set his children a better example than they had had. He then signed the pledge.

THE PLEDGE A MENDER OF WAYS.

The missionary observing a woman thrust out of a gin-palace in a state of intoxication, and without a gown or cap, spoke to her; she owned she had been drinking for four days, had sold her clothes off her back for money to spend in drink, and was now penniless; she was advised to sign the pledge. "It is time I did something to mend my ways," was her answer; the missionary offered to accompany her home, but she said that while it was light she could not go, for she did not wish her neighbours to see her in her present state; she subsequently signed the pledge. She has since been visited and continues firm, already exhibiting an improved appearance: she is a single woman, and obtains a living by selling toys

May 6th and 7th, visited Ipswich, in company with Mrs. Carlisle, spoke at two meetings; delivered tracts on quay and on board ship.

JAMES BALFOUR.

CAMBERWELL & PECKHAM.—DISTRICT No. IV

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

THE LONG CONSIDERATION.

A gentleman said I have long considered the subject and for some time practised total abstinence; being satisfied of its excellence, and anxious more effectually to influence others, (especially fathers of families,) I will sign the pledge: he then signed.

A RE-SIGNATURE—THE OLD CURE FOR TROUBLE.

On the missionary calling at E. in P— Street, his wife said, "my husband has broke his pledge, business has gone very much against him, and pondering over his disappointments and troubles, he went into a public-house and got some drink, and came home intoxicated with only one penny in his pocket; he was then just ruminating over his folly." He re-signed, the missionary commending him to God by prayer.

MARLBOROUGH CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOL,—

TEACHERS SHOULD SIGN THE PLEDGE FOR THEIR OWN SAFETY.

On Whit-Tuesday the missionary met the children of Marlborough Chapel Sunday School, at their annual feast, and afterwards addressed them and the friend present, at the close of which, inviting all to give their names to the pledge. On a subsequent Sabbath afternoon the missionary again addressed the children, from "Ye doth he (God) devise means that his banished ones be not expelled from him,"—2 Samuel xiv. 14; shewing that abstinence was one of the means used by a kind and gracious providence to prevent his banished being forever expelled from him. The superintendent then spoke a few words, bringing forward in illustration of the preceding, an affecting case of a young man who was once a teacher in the School, whom they all knew, and who might have been with them that afternoon had he not become a drunkard. Four signatures were obtained

THE DOCTOR; OR, COULD NOT GET WELL

WITHOUT PORTER.

On calling upon L—e he expressed great regret that by the advice of his medical attendant he had been induced to take some porter, who told him that he could not get well unless he did. He said he was miserable until he had again signed; he signed accordingly, and thanked God that a great burden was now off his mind and he hoped never again to be induced to break his pledge. He became a subscriber for the Chronicle.

DRINK AND INSANITY,

The missionary was called up one morning at five o'clock, by a female who wished him to come to her husband who was out of his mind through drink, (some one having been with him all night,) I found him wandering in his mind, asserting with many other strange things, that he was upwards of one hundred miles from town; ultimately he was conveyed to a lunatic asylum. He has been notorious as a drunkard for years.

(From June 1st to July 1st.)

TWO FEMALES WHO KNEW WHEN THEY HAD HAD ENOUGH.

Calling at No. — in J—s Street, met with tw females who both signed, saying that they had had quite enough; the appearance of the place confirming their statement. Subsequent visits have found them firm.

DRUNKENNESS AND THE POOR RATES—A RE-SIGNATURE.

H. S. broke her pledge, and had since been in the workhouse for five months through drunkenness, was let out to receive part of an annuity, (arising from a situation her late husband held in a fire company,) became intoxicated; she went to her brothers who are respectable, but who declined doing anything for her; under these circumstances she met with the missionary, whom she recognised, and again signed the pledge.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS—HILL STREET.

Attended a meeting on the 4th, at Hill Street, Peckham, when Mr. Freemantle took the Chair, and William Cash, Esq., Mrs. Carlisle, and Mr. Balfour, addressed the audience, a good impression was made, and several signatures were obtained.

RICHARD HODGSON.

EAST SMITHFIELD.—DISTRICT No. V.

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

A RE-SIGNATURE.

Passing G. Lane on Saturday evening, saw a drunken man making towards a public-house, whilst his wife and little boy were earnestly endeavouring to dissuade him from his purpose; he entered the house notwithstanding. On being beckoned to by the missionary he came out, when he was advised to return home. In his hand he had ten shillings, which he obtained by pawning a suit of clothes, all of which his wife said would be spent that night, unless he could be persuaded to return home. Having succeeded in getting him home, he then promised to remain with his wife and child until he was visited the next day. The missionary according to promise called on them the following morning, and was received with much kindness. The husband said that he was indebted to the missionary for the means of purchasing food for his family. I was once a teetotaler, he continued, but I became linked again with my old companions, and broke my pledge. He was then entreated to "try again," and was referred particularly to those words of the pledge, "by Divine assistance," upon which he re-signed; the wife then took the pledge for the first time. The husband has since obtained his clothes from the pawnbrokers*, and both of them appeared decently attired at the Annual Meeting in Exeter Hall.* On a re-visit, the husband said, we have kept our pledge, and have saved more than a sovereign out of my last week's earnings, and I think of entering a Building Society. Their little boy also signed.

STREET LABOURS—THE PROLIFIC GROUP.

On Sunday morning, saw four men standing at the corner of a Court, and addressed them on the subject of total abstinence. When at length one of the men exclaimed, I have heard a great deal for and against teetotalism, and have tried one side of the question long enough, I think I shall now try the other. Do not let him sign, said one of his companions, he will never keep it, for he is a regular soaker, and has drunk butts of beer in his time. I will sign it, he replied, and mean to keep it too; he then signed. Well, said another of the group, if you can keep it I am sure I can, and immediately added his signature. It is the safest and the best side, said a third, I will sign too. He having done so, the missionary then endeavoured to persuade the remaining one to follow the example of his companions, and at length succeeded. During the conversation, a number of others collected around, who appeared to enjoy the scene; the missionary took the opportunity of addressing them upon the benefits of total abstinence. A respectably dressed man then stepped forward and said, you are doing good, and I will assist you by my example; accordingly he signed the pledge. He was followed by a seafaring man, who stated that he had seen enough of the evils of the use of intoxicating drinks. Among many other circumstances, he could mention when he was at the Cape, himself and twenty-seven of his mates went on shore, and drank so much spirits that seven of the number killed themselves, and were found dead on the ground the next morning. A female present now addressed the missionary, and said, pointing to her companion, there is a woman who ought to sign, for she was a teetotaler for five years, but has been drinking for about a twelvemonth. The woman left, and entered into a chandler's shop, the missionary following, and there succeeded in obtaining her signature. She then joined with the missionary in urging two other females to sign; and having succeeded, the missionary again entered the crowd, which had followed him to the door, when he obtained the signatures of two more men. After having given tracts to those who refused to sign, retired. Having occasion to take one of the females her card, another female present, who was noted for drunkenness, gave her name to the pledge; making together, twelve individuals originating with this group.

FORTY-FIVE YEARS' REHEARSAL.

J. D. was met by the missionary intoxicated, being the fifth week in succession; he admitted that teetotalism was good, but knew he should not be able to keep it; he was assured he might with safety leave off all his drinking habits; he then offered to sign the pledge, but insisted on first spending the last three-half-pence he had. He then went into a public-house, and calling for a pint of stout, held it up, and addressing the publican, said, "Look here, this is the last pint I shall ever have, for I am now going to sign the teetotal pledge." He then came outside, and went with the missionary to a coffee-house, when he gave the following outline of his history:—He had been a drunkard he said for forty-five years, being first induced to drink at nine years of age, by his master, who laid a wager with a drunkard that he should drink a quartern of rum through a tobacco pipe before another lad, which wager the boy won, his master pocketing the money.* He performed a similar feat immediately afterwards with a half quartern of brandy. Not long since he returned home intoxicated, and fell from the top of the stairs to the bottom, and lay to all appearance dead. This so alarmed the landlord, that on his recovery, he told him he would forgive him a considerable amount of rent if he would find other lodgings; he embraced the offer and left. At another time, when crossing a field in a state of drunkenness, he fell into a pond ten feet in depth, and would have been drowned had it not been for a rail across the pond, by which he with some difficulty extricated himself. On one occasion, he came to his home in a state of intoxication, and nothing would do but he must force his head under a grate, in which was a large fire; he did so several times, and was severely burnt. On another occasion, he was laid up for nine weeks, when the doctor told him that if he did not leave off drinking, it would soon be his death. After signing the pledge, and on taking him home, his wife expressed her thankfulness, and in confirmation of its sincerity, gave her signature, as also did his little boy.

INTERCESSION, AND THE BENEVOLENT MASTER.

A man who had been drinking for the last five weeks, and has been a drunkard for these twelve years, was found by the missionary in a most ragged and filthy condition; had been in the union house, but recently had slept at the nightly refuge; according to his own statement, he had offended his master, lost his character, and had no home. After his signing the pledge, the missionary then took him to a house where he provided for his immediate wants, and supplied him with means for a night's lodging. The missionary then went to his master, who at his intercession, again agreed to take him into his employment.

THE DRUNKARD, THE POLICEMAN, AND THE MISSIONARY.

On observing a number of persons in B— Street, the missionary went to ascertain the cause, when he saw a tall powerful man very drunk, in the act of striking a policeman. The missionary went up to the man and offered to conduct him home, to which the policeman acceded. When on the way he said, *what means this? you are very kind; why, I should have been locked up if it had not been for you. On reaching a miserable looking house, we arrived at the top story, an apartment of the most wretched appearance; the floor looked as if it had not been cleaned for months; a table, two old chairs, an old stump bedstead, (but no bed) with an old ragged dirty cloth for a covering, comprised the whole of the furniture. The man was a hawker by trade, and supplied families with various articles, which occasionally brought him in £4. and £5. a week, but he spent all in drink. I have been a drunkard and a vagabond, he said, nearly all my life. The missionary urged him to sign the pledge, as the only remedy; he said he knew nothing else would do, and he would try it; he then signed. He has since been visited several times since, and has kept his pledge. On the fifth visit, on entering the room, the wife (who before had looked very coolly) now gave the missionary a hearty welcome, and was very grateful for the pains that had been taken to reform her husband; and on being asked to sign the pledge herself; yes, she replied, that I will most willingly, and signed. The room now looks clean, and everything more comfortable.

THE DOOR WIDE OPEN; OR, A HUNDRED AND FIFTY FLATS AND ONE SHARP.

Addressed a drunken brickmaker, who replied, by patting himself in an attitude for fighting; the missionary however declined the compliment, but still urged him to sign the pledge. No teetotalism for me, he answered, and made towards the door of a noted gin-shop. The missionary however placed his foot across the threshold, and prevented him from entering, and throwing the door wide open, exposed to his view a large number of persons around the bar, and said to him, can you reckon these up? No; let me hear you, replied the brickmaker. Well, said the missionary, (counting) there are about a hundred and fifty flats and one sharp, (the latter, referring to the one who was taking the hard earned money of the former.) The man was struck with the remark, and after a pause, said, you are quite right, for flats they are; and immediately turned away with the missionary, and signed the pledge.

A GROUP OF SOLDIERS—IMPRISONMENT NO CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.

Addressed a group of soldiers on the subject of temperance, when one of them said, that he had been a great drunkard, and had been confined more than a hundred times for drunkenness. He then addressed his comrades, proposing to sign if they would; they all with one consent declined; then, replied the soldier, I will sign without you.

THE CHILD A PATTERN FOR THE FATHER.

Saw a man with his wife and four children standing outside a public-house; the man was intoxicated, and the wife and children were begging of him to come home. He was in a most dirty and ragged condition. The missionary gave him the tract, Don't go to the gin-shop;

he looked at the title, and said, ah, I was a teetotaler once, and I wish I had never tasted the drink again. I signed the pledge for six months and kept it faithfully, and then I thought I must go and treat resolution; it is a month since I broke it, and I have never been perfectly sober since. "You see," said the man, "what the drink does; I have not even washed myself for above a week." The missionary advised him for the sake of himself and family to try again; he said he would, and endeavour to act more wisely in future. The wife stated that her eldest boy, who is nine years of age, was a staunch teetotaler, and was a pattern for the father. The other day he saw his younger brother draining the beer pots that were hanging outside the railings, and he ran to him and said, "don't father drink enough without you?" The boy (who had been listening to the statement) replied, "yes, I used to go to the Sunday-school, but since father broke his pledge, I have had no clothes to go in, and I don't like to go in these." The wife said, "we were all comfortably clothed when my husband was a teetotaler, but since he broke his pledge we have been wretched and miserable, and are now in want of food; neither I nor my children have tasted a morsel of anything to-day." The husband appeared to listen to this recital with considerable uneasiness, and at length, as if he could endure it no longer, said to the missionary, give me the book; he then signed the pledge, the wife willingly following. In the evening the missionary visited them at their own abode, and found them taking their first meal that day, which consisted of only one pennyworth of bread between them. They have been frequently visited, and continue firm, and the husband has got employment.

THE "GOLDEN RULE" BRIG—ALL AB-STAINERS.

Went on board the Golden Rule brig, and inquired if there were any teetotalers among the crew; when the captain replied, we are all teetotalers here, although a part of our freight is brandy; we allow no intoxicating drinks whatever among the men; some of them have not signed the pledge, but you are welcome to see if you can induce them to do so; after having some conversation with them, succeeded in adding another signature to the number.

CAB-STAND—A DIALOGUE.

On reaching a cab-stand in B— Street, spoke to one of the cabmen on the subject of teetotalism, when a number of them surrounded the missionary, and appeared to listen with much interest. The missionary took from his pocket the tract, entitled The Great Delusion, and at the request of one (who acknowledged himself to be the greatest drunkard on the stand) read it. Many questions were proposed and answered, when the drunkard alluded to, signed the pledge. Another stated to the missionary that he had nearly killed himself three or four times through drink, and showed the scars of several wounds on his head, occasioned by his falling from his box; on asking him to sign, he said he must consider the subject.* A third said, he knew his constitution was injured by the drink, and from what he had heard, he also felt induced to try teetotalism, and should at once sign.

* The drunkenness of these cabmen (who have the care of our persons and property) is proverbial; but a question arises, how do they get so much money to spend? The answer is obvious, by cheating the public. A friend of ours the other day, had to summons one of these cabmen for an overcharge, when the alternative was given him of three weeks' imprisonment or a fine of thirty shillings. The gentleman being surprised at the largeness of the amount, asked if it could not be mitigated. "Yes," replied the magistrate, "it could, but it is so rarely that individuals will take the trouble to bring those men up, (at the same time it is no more than the case demands) that I will not reduce it one penny." The man paid the fine. Where did the money come from? The public! If others would do as did this gentleman, this system of fraud would be greatly checked, and they would prove powerful co-adjutors to the mission.—SUPERINTENDENT.

LOOK WELL TO YOUR OWN INTEREST—IT IS NOT TOO LATE.

On passing a public-house, was attracted by the noise of persons quarrelling, and looking in, saw a drunken man with a cut across the forehead, from which the blood was streaming; his wife (with whom he had been fighting) was standing by in a deplorable condition, with her hair hanging over her shoulders. A policeman was endeavouring to remove the man, but he resolutely refused to go, and resisted every attempt to expel him. The missionary then interfered, and entreated to be allowed to accompany him home, and asked the man why he stopped there to get drunk; the man replied, that he had been drinking in several public-houses that day, and giving a significant look at the landlord, who was near, said, that the publicans all looked well to their own interest. The missionary advised him to follow their example, and look after his; and at length prevailed on him to return home. The missionary when on the way effected a reconciliation between the man and his wife. On arriving at their home, was struck with the miserable appearance of the room; there was neither bed nor bedstead, table or chair, nor anything for use, with the exception of the gin bottle, and a few market sieves. The missionary asked him what he had done with his bed, he said that it was a long day since he had seen such a thing in his place; he had been in possession of four or five, but had sold them all for drink! he had been a drunkard since he was fifteen years of age; consequently, he was a drunkard when he married. On being pressed to sign, he said he would consider. On leaving the room, the missionary heard a voice in a feeble manner, saying, "I will sign;" and on entering the adjoining room, saw a miserable looking old man, who said, I have been listening to what you have said to my neighbour, and have taken it to myself; I have been a drunkard for many years, and have squandered away that which would have made me comfortable in my old age, but it is now too late. The missionary gave him a word of encouragement, telling him it was not too late; he signed the pledge.

PUBLIC-HOUSE CRAFT.

A wager was concocted in a public-house for a sober man to run a race with a drunkard, (a dairyman); they came out as the missionary was passing the door. An individual standing by, who no doubt was in the plot, said to the Dairyman, the one that gets to the public-house first, shall pay for the gallon of ale. The dairyman immediately took off his hat and coat, and the signal being given, he started, and ran a considerable distance, returned, wondering that no one followed. The missionary addressing him, explained to him the trick, saying, it was fortunate that he did not reach the goal, or he would have lost. He was then informed that it was a piece of public-house craft to cheat him out of his money. He was advised to put on his coat and go home with his wife, and abandon for ever a course of life which, if continued in, would ultimately lead to beggary and ruin. He listened attentively, and said you are right; when the wife added, if he does not become a teetotaler, he will very soon have to give up cow-keeping. The missionary then urged him to sign, as it was the only means of saving him and his property from destruction. He replied, you are the best friend I have seen to-day. He then in the presence of a number of persons signed the pledge, and continues firm.

SUNDAY EVENING—A LODGING HOUSE—RE-SIGN-NATURES—FEMALE DECISION—A DRUNKEN BLACKSMITH SIGNS.

Passing a gin-shop, on Sunday evening, observed the landlord turning out a drunken woman, who fell with her head against the stones. The missionary ran to her assistance, and offered to conduct her home, to which she consented. On entering her abode, (a lodging-house) counted ten men and six women, some of whom appeared in a deplorable condition; gave a tract to each, and addressed them on the subject of total abstinence. One man replied, "you could not have come to a worse lot of drunkards." Another said, "both I and my wife were teetotalers for nine months, and I wish we had continued so, for we have never been so well off since. What do you say Jenny, about signing again?" The wife replied, "that she was willing, if he was:" they accordingly both signed the pledge. The drunken woman, who appeared by this time somewhat recovered, offered to sign the pledge, if her husband would, to which he objected, saying, "he was not her husband, neither had he any occasion for it; then, said the woman, I will sign by myself, which she did; and on a re-visit, a blacksmith, who was a great drunkard, signed also.

TEETOTALISM AND PUBLIC WORSHIP—AN ELDERLY MAN SIGNS.

Called at the house of J— H—, who with his wife had previously signed the pledge. They were both out. On inquiring of the persons living below, they said that the man and his wife had kept their pledge, and regularly attended a place of worship, where they were now gone. The missionary asked the parties if they were teetotalers, when they replied in the negative, and after showing them the destructiveness and immoral tendency of strong drink, an elderly man among them signed the pledge.

DRUNKENNESS, SUNDAY WORK, AND RAGGED

CHILDREN—BUT SHE WOULD NOT.

Sunday morning visited J— E— of G— C—, and found him and his wife at work; and their children as might be expected, ragged and filthy. They were advised to devote the Sabbath to the worship of God, both in their family and in public, and to send their children to the Sunday school. The wife replied, "Yes—but her husband gets drunk two and three days in the week, and therefore he is obliged to work to-day; if he did not, he would lose his employment." The missionary recommended total abstinence to them. "I wish he would be a teetotaler," said the wife, "it would be better for us." The missionary invited her to sign, as an example to her husband, but she would not. The husband said "I attach all the sin to myself, I will try and be a teetotaler." He then signed.†

No. VI.

THE NEEDLE AND TEARS, BUT NO SIGNING.

Meeting a coal porter in the street, in a state of intoxication, the missionary put a tract into his hand and asked him to sign the pledge; he paused, sighed, and with a wild look exclaimed, "Oh, it is drink, drink, that has ruined me, I was in good business and doing well, till drinking dispossessed me of my property; though I am now earning good wages, but for my wife's getting a little with the needle, we should not have bread to eat; I have now been drinking, and lost my coat." The missionary proposed accompanying him home, to which he readily consented; on our arrival we found the wife at her needle, the house presenting the picture of a drunkard's home; being urged to sign the pledge, he replied, "I will, I will," evidently much affected; he signed. The wife with many tears thanked the missionary for bringing home her husband, but declined signing.‡

receipt of a pension of £24. per annum, besides his business as a hawker; for these several years he has been living in an obscure lodging in one of the most degraded parts of Westminster. Previous to the day for taking his pension, it was his invariable custom, to draw to the utmost extent of his quarterly money, in beer at the public-house;* when he could go no further in that direction, he would sell the things in the house, even the feathers out of the bed were sold at the rag-shops, by carrying a few at a time in his pockets, till he had taken the whole: and on more than one occasion he has sold his shoes off his feet, going barefoot, and in the most severe weather. When discovered by the missionary, he was in a most pitiable condition: he signed the pledge.

FIRST FEMALE—THE ONLY WAY OF ESCAPE.

Drink has been the cause of all my misfortunes, observed a female, as she listened to some remarks made by the missionary. I should have been, she continued, very comfortable, but for drink, it has many times drove me out of my mind; it is the cause of my being separated from my husband; it tempts me to spend all the money I can get, and then sell and pawn all my clothes. She was entreated to sign the pledge; she replied, oh, that is the only way by which I shall escape the drunkard's grave: she then signed.

SECOND FEMALE—ALL SIX CHILDREN HAVE BECOME DRUNKARDS.

Inviting A. B.—in N—C—Street, to become a teetotaler, she replied, I wish I could, for drinking has almost destroyed me. Before I became a drunkard, I had a room, which was well furnished, but now it is gone, and I am suffering from want. My father was a great drunkard; he had six children all of whom have become drunkards. One sister, who was a miserable drunkard, has signed the pledge, and is now quite another person, and living comfortable; she was urged to follow her sister's example: she then signed.

THIRD FEMALE—HER DAUGHTER WEeping TEARS OF JOY.

M. N—, a widow, fifty years old, can neither read nor write, and never attends a place of worship, has been living a drinking life, and other sins consequent. She would sometimes visit her daughter (who is a teetotaler, and in good business) in a state of intoxication, abuse all in the house, tear the things to pieces, and break the windows. The son-in-law, was obliged to keep a peace warrant in the house, to prevent a repetition of such outrages: she signed, her daughter weeping tears of joy.

FEMALE TESTIMONY.

While addressing a family in P—Street, a female of respectable appearance, came to the door, and observed, "Ah, sir, I can bless the day that I ever saw you." Being asked the cause, she replied; I had, for years, been the victim of intemperance, which, among other things, occasioned a separation between me and my husband, who is a mechanic and a respectable man. I then became the associate of the lowest characters, plunging deeper and deeper into the vortex of crime and misery. That morning, I was induced to sign the pledge, was the morning of a new life to me, which is now five months. I was afraid, when I signed, I should not keep it five days; words cannot express the happiness it has brought me, and I hope, by the blessing of God, it will be the means of leading to the saving of both body and soul. Being informed you were here, I felt I must come and tell you of it.

PYE-STREET SCHOOL.

Visited new Pye-street School, at the master's request, gave an address to the children, who listened with great attention, and gave answers to various questions on the nature and tendencies of intoxicating drinks, with pleasing correctness; seven more of the boys signed the pledge, making a total of 39.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

Attended, by consent of the Superintendent, the first Anniversary of the Carteret-street Temperance Society, Westminster. About 150 took tea, which was served with order and satisfaction. At half-past seven the chair was taken by Dr. Oxley. The Report stated, that upwards of 1200 signatures had been taken during the year; nine hundred of which were taken since New-Year's Day. An adult school had been recently opened, by Mr. Goddard, where attendance was given two evenings in the week, to teach those teetotalers who could not read. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Booth, Curry, Walters, Catton, Tiley, Lee, Goddard, and the Missionary; at the close, several signatures were taken.

VERY STEADY FOR TWENTY-SIX YEARS.

Addressed a group and gave tracts. J. W—, one of the company, asked if the missionary thought teetotalism would do him good. Being answered in the affirmative, he said I have many times thought of being a teetotaler, but instead of which I get deeper and deeper in drunkenness, I kept very steady for twenty-six years, while in the army, was eventually discharged, with thirteen-pence halfpenny a-day pension; after which I married, and from that time, myself and wife have both been drunkards, and now instead of being comfortable with our means we spend every shilling; then sell our furniture, even the bed we lie on. On the missionary urging him to sign the pledge, he gave his address, and wished him to call, promising that himself and wife would then sign the pledge. The missionary called accordingly, when the husband signed, but the wife was too ill (from drinking) even to be spoken to.

On a second visit the wife signed: she fully confirmed the statement of her husband, and added that she had been married only four years, but in that time had bought three marriage rings and sold them for drink. Last week she had sold her feather bed, and two articles for which she had given three guineas and a-half, she sold for twenty-eight shillings, all spent in drink; and she was now working sixteen hours a day, at stay-making, to pay her debts for drink. Another female living in the same house (and intoxicated) said, I am becoming worse and worse, and if I continue, drink will be my ruin: she also signed. A subsequent visit has found them all three firm.

A MODERATE DRINKER FOR FIFTY YEARS.

J. W— residing in a lodging-house, stated that he lived till he was upwards of fifty years of age before he became a drunkard; was twenty-three years in the army, and never received an hour's punishment for drinking, he had all his life drank moderately, and for several years been a professing Christian, but at last had become a drunkard, which had destroyed his peace of mind, and deprived him of a comfortable home. He had sold his furniture which amounted to nearly £20, and spent the money at the public-house, and was now obliged to take refuge in a lodging-house. Being exhorted to sign the pledge, he said, I am now miserable (and so he appeared), and feel I cannot drink moderately without being a drunkard, I will therefore sign, which he did in tears. The missionary urged him to attend a place of worship, and to return to God through Christ without delay.

MODERATION IN INTOXICATING DRINKS

FALLACIOUS—A RE-SIGNATURE.

D. M'C—, living in N— street, said, he was a teetotaler for eleven months, he then thought he would take a little in moderation, but unhappily found he could not stop there; when a teetotaler, he had good clothes, and attended a place of worship, but now he was a drunkard and a backslider, and was ashamed to be seen out of doors on the sabbath, except at a beer-shop. Being entreated to sign again, he said, that he saw there was no way of escape for him, but by total abstinence: he then resigned.

THE MODERATE-DRINKING YOUTH.

At N— street lives J. W.—, who said he could tell a tragic tale of suffering and woe, he was indulged (in moderation) with intoxicating drink at his father's table, when young, creating that appetite which ended in his ruin.—was once in good business, having a number of persons in his employ. His father who died twelve years ago, was in a large way of trade, in Manchester, a leader in the Wesleyan connexion, and accustomed to entertain at his table, the late Dr. Adam Clarke, and other leading ministers and gentlemen in the Wesleyan connexion. He died leaving sixty thousand pounds. In consequence of his (the son's) drinking habits, he was deprived of his share, which was £11,000, and only received £20, and a suit of mourning. He is with a wife and two children now reduced to extreme want, obtaining what little he can for a subsistence by selling lucifers. After some conversation on the evils of the drinking-customs of the country, of which his own case afforded so fearful an illustration; he signed the pledge. His wife (much affected,) and two children also signed. A friend who was present concluded in prayer.*

THE ADVANTAGE OF HAVING A TEETOTAL WIFE.

While addressing a group in O— street, J. F.—, an optician, in a state of intoxication, accompanied by his teetotal wife who was endeavouring to get him home, (and who had been frequently visited,) said he was ashamed to see the missionary. The missionary, notwithstanding, offered to accompany him, to which he readily consented; he said, drink had deprived him of a good situation, and a comfortable home. He sometimes slept in the open air, having the stones for his bed. He was reduced to the utmost destitution, and now obliged to seek his living by selling things in the streets; he was again urged to sign the pledge. I am determined I will, he said, he then signed to the great joy of his wife. Re-visits have found him firm, while a personal and social improvement has been visible.

DECISION AND MORAL COURAGE.

Addressing a company in a lodging-house, M. L.— said, he should like to be a teetotaler, but being afraid he could not keep it, had declined signing; several were pointed out to him who had signed and kept it, and were now reaping the benefits of their self-denial. He replied, I know our way, (his wife being also a drunkard) of going on won't do. A little while ago we were occupying a room furnished, and by ourselves, but drinking has caused us to sell all, and now to be living in this lodging-house. My wife is now at the public-house, where she has been drinking all the morning; I shall feel glad if you will go with me and induce her to sign. The missionary accompanied him to the public-house, he called her to the door, and in the presence of the publican and others they both signed the pledge.

FRIENDS GIVE A DRUNKEN WIDOW MONEY.

L. M.—, a widow in U— court, C— street, left the room on the missionary entering, but soon returned and expressed her wish to sign the pledge. She stated that she had most respectable connexions and friends; and were it not for the drink, she should have had as comfortable a home as could be desired, and been under no necessity to work for her bread. But now she was reduced to one scene of misery, living in a lodging-house, amidst all forms of vice. On Saturday, her friends gave her half a sovereign, which with what she had received for work (shirt-making,) she took to the public-house, and did not leave till she had spent the whole: she signed the pledge.

A PATTERN OF A WIFE.

G. B.— of No. — in C— court, observing the missionary as he approached the door, said, "walk in, Sir, I am now decided for teetotalism, and a change of life. The advice you gave with the tract you left on your last visit, has led me to reflection and a review of my past life. I have tried drinking the last thirty years, several of which I was in the navy, and when discharged, I had £80, all was spent and lost in one week; since which I have had many opportunities for doing well, but drink has prevented, and here I am destitute of a chair for a seat, or a bed to lie on; since your last visit I have drank nothing intoxicating, and I attended a place of worship last Sunday for the first time since I have been in London, I am glad you are come that I may sign the pledge." He then signed, and looking at his wife, significantly said, *I have signed, the wife took the hint, and replied, So will I, and with a smile signed.

EXETER HALL—THE MUTUAL CONGRATULATION.

"It is him," said a respectable-looking female, as the missionary passed during the collection at the public meeting in Exeter Hall, "you are the gentleman who took my husband home the other evening." "I am glad to see you here," said the missionary. "God bless you," she said, thanking the missionary most heartily, in which her husband joined, and declaring his determination to hold fast the pledge. When the missionary first saw the above, he was staggering drunk, striving to go into a public-house, his wife on one side, and his little boy on the other, endeavouring to prevent him.

THE "VIGILANT."

On going on board a vessel, a sailor said, "We are all brewers here—I was brought up a brewer, and will never be a teetotaler." "May I sign the pledge, master," said a boy who was working in the hold. "You may if you like," replied the master, "but remember to-morrow." The boy inquired whether he might have his grog-money, if he signed. "No," said the Master. "What is the name of your vessel?" asked the missionary. "The Vigilant," replied the master. "Do you recollect a passage in the Bible," remarked the missionary, "that says, 'Be sober be vigilant, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour.'† Now one of Satan's most powerful instruments to destroy men, is strong drink." "Well, he may sign," said the master, "and I will give him his grog-money." The lad, the moment he had leave, came up the ladder, and signed. A sailor in another vessel, who had spent £5. in three days, also signed.

STRONG DRINK NOT GOOD FOR PREACHERS.

"I will now sign the pledge," said an individual who was once a Wesleyan preacher, but who fell through strong drink. "I have been miserable," said he, "ever since." Having signed, the missionary entreated him to lose no time in returning to the society from whence he had fallen.

OBTAINED TWO PLEDGES.

A Wesleyan local preacher, who had become a teetotaler, and to whom the missionary had given a Chronicle, stated that he had obtained two pledges, and should for the future, subscribe for the Chronicle.

STREET LABOURS—THE PUBLIC HOUSE AND SHEDDING OF TEARS.

Passing a public house, observed a woman who had been just turned out, shedding tears. Another woman from within, called to the missionary, who desired her to come outside, and he would talk to her. The woman came, followed by nearly all the customers. While the missionary was addressing them, the first woman and afterwards the second, requested to sign the pledge. Both then signed.

(From June 1st to July 1st.)

TESTIMONY FROM THE LAND—WORKING MEN CAN DO WITHOUT BEER.

Speaking to a group of working men, upon the necessity of temperate habits, one of them observed "The gentleman is quite right. I have tried the principle for some time, and am confident a working man can do without beer. I was always better myself without the drink, and will now sign the pledge."

TESTIMONY FROM THE WATER—THE TEETOTAL SHIP.

"We are all teetotallers on board this vessel," said a sailor to the missionary who had just entered the ship; "we belong to the Welch Temperance Society, and are better able to attend to our duties now, than when we were drinkers." The crew of the next ship listened with attention to the conversation, and one of them signed the pledge.

THE MASTER'S TESTIMONY TO HIS MAN—DIS-CHARGING MEN WILL NOT MAKE THEM SOBER.

"I have a man now in my service, who was a drunkard for many years, and I have discharged him several times for drunkenness. He has now been a teetotaler four years, and I have not a better man in my employment. His wife is also a teetotaler, and they are comfortable at home, and are also attentive to their religious duties."

TEETOTALISM AND A DONKEY AND CART.

"I could not do as I now do," said a costermonger; "until I became a teetotaler, I was a miserable drunkard. This donkey and cart are the results of teetotalism. I have been a teetotaler for five years, and am better in health as well as circumstances. My wife has also joined, and we now live comfortable."

BILLINGSGATE AND TOWER.—DISTRICT
No. VIII.

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

STREET LABOURS—A RE-SIGNATURE.

After addressing a group, a man said, "I am glad I have met you, you are the person who spoke to me three months ago. I have been a teetotaler, but the customs of the shop occasioned my breaking the pledge: he then re-signed."

"IT MAY MAKE A MAN OF ME."

Hearing a noise proceeding from a public-house, the missionary went to ascertain the cause, and saw a man with his face cut and bruised turned into the street, followed by his wife, who endeavoured to get him away from the house. The missionary assisted, and after some time and effort, succeeded: he was then urged to sign. So I will, said he, I am doing myself no good as I am going on; and perhaps, if I become a teetotaler, it may make a man of me. Himself and wife then signed.

(From June 1st to July 1st.)

THE TOWER BARRACKS.

Upon entering the barrack-room in the Tower, the missionary inquired if there were any teetotallers in the regiment; yes, replied a soldier, there are seven or eight in our regiment. There is one, said the same individual, pointing to a man who was busily engaged cleaning his regimentals. The missionary entered into conversation with them, when four more (young men) signed the pledge.

On the next visit, the missionary was informed, that a military temperance society had been formed for the Tower, and that the soldiers held weekly meetings. One man, who was a pest to the regiment, is now a teetotaler, and has joined a Christian church, has since been promoted, and is much respected by his superiors. The missionary gave them each a tract.

PORTMAN MARKET.—DISTRICT No. IX.

(From April 1st to May 1st.)

CABSTAND—A CABMAN—DRINK AND DEATH.

Addressing a cabman, who had suffered much from drinking strong drink, but would not abandon its use, a person standing by him remarked, "It has nearly killed him, once." He acknowledged that drink had nearly taken away his life, but said, "I cannot give it up; we must all die."

COATS REVEAL CHARACTER.

Addressing a group of cabmen, one who was intoxicated, was asked by another if he would go and take a glass of gin. He agreed, and they left. It was asked, "are those men both of the same character?" "You may easily know that," was the reply—"only look at their coats."

PAWN-SHOPS FACILITATE DRINKING.

J.—C—, took the pledge from Father Mathew, and kept it two years. He returned to drinking, and was the cause of his wife losing a good situation as wet nurse. He has since suffered much from poverty, being for months together out of employment. His wife shewed the missionary thirty-nine pawn tickets for goods pledged, to the amount of above £6. He was induced to re-sign, but again fell away. His wife has signed, and continues firm.

BARRACKS.

Visited the barracks at St. John's Wood, was received cordially by the soldiers, and distributed many tracts.

SECOND VISIT—SIXTEEN SIGN THE PLEDGE.

On a second visit, several said they had been giving teetotalism a trial. Sixteen signed the pledge.

STREET LABOURS—SUNDAY EVENING.

On Sunday evening spoke to a young man in the street respecting total abstinence. He said he had been thinking about whether he should give it a trial. I have been drinking a little, but if I were to sign the pledge, I would abstain entirely: he then signed.

TESTIMONY—A BRICKLAYER'S LABOURER.

As the missionary was distributing tracts, in Lisson Grove, he gave one to a decently-clad and healthy-looking bricklayer's labourer, who on receiving it, said, "I know what teetotalism is, for I have tried it for four years." "And how does it suit you?" said the missionary. "As well as could be desired," was the reply. "But some men in your employment, say that they cannot work without beer." "I said so, myself, once, but I am happy in having found out my mistake." On parting from him, he remarked, "Yours is a good work, I hope that you will be rewarded."

A WIFE'S PENITENCE.

This was the language of Mrs. —, who has suffered much from an unstable and intemperate husband. A year or two ago, both signed the pledge. Some friends (enemies) said to the wife, they were sure she would be the better for a little beer. She took their advice, and thus became as of old, the tempter of her husband, who thereby, was led to return to drinking. The wife is now a decided abstainer, but cannot forgive herself. In the language of penitence, she said, "I was the cause of his breaking the pledge."

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

GENTLEMEN'S SERVANTS.—INDIRECT TESTIMONY.

Speaking to a number of gentlemen's servants, and giving them tracts, one at first refused a tract, when another induced him to take it, by saying, "Teetotalism is all right."

THE WIFE SIGNING, IS UNSPEAKABLE COMFORT.

N. M.—, a shoemaker, of H— Street, was a drunkard, but has now been a teetotaler several months, and is already reaping the happy fruits of total abstinence. His wife also has been addicted to drinking. The husband said, it would be an unspeakable comfort if she could be prevailed on to sign the pledge. After some conversation, she signed.

WAR, WITH ALL ITS HORRORS, HAS NO POWER TO RECLAIM.

D. D.—, in H— Street, sixty-four years of age, has been a sailor, and is now an out-pensioner. He was on board the Victory, at the battle of Trafalgar, when the Admiral (Lord Nelson) was killed. Has been a drunkard for these many years. He expressed himself thankful for the missionary's visit, and signed the pledge.

A CAB-STAND—CABMEN NEED TEETOTALISM.

At the Great Western Railway Station, spoke to several cabmen, who listened attentively; some confessed that drinking had brought them from independence to their present situation. One said, that he had ruined his constitution, and was always ill; another, that he had drunk deeply, having, for twelve years, been seldom, if ever, thoroughly sober; his appearance corresponded too correctly with what he said, to doubt the truth of his statement.*

THE RECRUITING SYSTEM A HINDERANCE TO TEETOTALISM.

Addressing a recruiting party, they said they were teetotalers at heart; had seen the good effects of the teetotal cause in Scotland and elsewhere. If they were out of the army, they would sign the pledge; but to attempt recruiting without having recourse to strong drink, was impossible, the public-house being the very place where there was any hope of success.

TESTIMONY—TEETOTALISM AND MORE WORK.

"I have more work than I used to have." This was the language of a teetotal labourer to the missionary. He had been told, that when he became a teetotaler, he would not be able to get employment. But he said, "God blesses me in everything, and I have more work than I used to have."

VISITS TO THE BACKSLIDER AGREEABLE.

E—P— of D— Street, was a teetotaler, but broke her pledge; and her family have since suffered much from her intemperate habits. Lately all their furniture was taken from them, for rent. While intoxicated, a few weeks ago, she broke nine panes of glass, in the house from which she was ejected; was taken before a magistrate, and had to pay for the damage. She was pleased with the visit of a temperance missionary, and asked whether any one had sent him. She signed the pledge again, has since been visited, and remains firm.

GIN AT THE FIRST MEETING.

standing by, confirmed the charge, by saying, "We had some gin when we first met."*

A RE-SIGNATURE.

T. F—, living in C— Street, told the missionary that he had been a teetotaler, but had broken his pledge. He was asked why he broke it. He answered, foolishness made him break it.† The missionary prevailed on him to sign again.

DRINK MAKES MOTHERS CARELESS OF THEIR CHILDREN.

M. F—, living in W— Street, has been a drunkard for years, and for the fortnight before the missionary's visit, had been drinking incessantly. She said, that when drinking, she cared nothing for her children,‡ and sold and pawned while she had anything to dispose of. She appeared bitterly to lament her conduct, and said, "I am the greatest fool that ever was born." She signed, has been re-visited, and remains firm.

A DRUNKARD.

J. P.—, has for these eight years, by his intemperate habits, sadly tormented his family. His wife, in consequence, has left him several times. On the day when the missionary called, his goods had been taken for rent, and his wife had gone he knew not where. His wife had often told him that she should be happy if he would become a teetotaler. He said, that before he was spoken to by the missionary, he had thoughts of putting an end to his life: he signed the pledge.§

THE HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

B. C—, a shoemaker, was long a drunkard. A short time ago, he was sent to the house of correction, for a month; but hopes that he has taken a long farewell of all such miserable abodes. He has signed the pledge, and remains firm.

DEALING IN FANCY DOGS, AN OCCASION OF DRINKING.

On a Monday morning, the Superintendent observing two men and a woman at a public-house door, corner of Valentine-place, one of the men who was intoxicated, stated that he had just been fined five shillings by the magistrate for drunkenness, having been previously locked up in the station-house from Saturday night till Monday morning. On the Superintendent getting his address of the wife, (the "woman" mentioned above,) she invited him to come and see them; she was told that one of the missionaries should visit them both without delay. The Superintendent giving the names of these persons to the missionary of District No. 10, he accordingly called upon them. M— has been a desperate drinker,—fond of cock-fighting, and lately has been much drawn into drinking through dealing in fancy dogs. He once had his leg broken in three places, by being thrown when wrestling in a public-house kitchen; at another time he struck his wife with a fire-shovel so violent a blow, that for some time her life was despaired of. The result of the first interview was, that M— promised to give teetotalism a careful consideration. At the fourth visit,|| he said he had drunk no intoxicating liquor for some days, and was determined to sign the pledge; he then turning to his wife, said, "now it is no use my signing unless you do as well;" she replied, "I mean to sign with you." Both then signed. They have been visited several times since and continue firm.

STREET LABOURS, AND SUNDAY MORNING'S VISIT TO A LODGING-HOUSE.

While visiting some cases in M— Alley, a man in a state of intoxication passed the missionary (led by a lad), who spoke to him, obtained his address, gave him a tract, and said he would call upon him presently. In a few minutes, another in the same condition came past, who on being spoken to was induced to take the pledge on the spot; he gave the same address as the former. The missionary went accordingly and found them both at a lodging-house; on entering, the man first met with derided teetotalism, but was also prevailed on to sign. A robust-looking man, who with several others had attentively listened to what had been said, observed, "well, I will sign too, though I am no drunkard." The missionary then invited them to the Annual Meeting at Exeter Hall, and obtained permission to put up in the most conspicuous part of the room, a bill announcing the meeting.

SMOKING AND DRINKING—ANOTHER SUNDAY MORNING'S VISIT.

S. W— was once the keeper of a beer-shop, "and for thirteen weeks of the time was a teetotaler, and saved by his teetotalism £13." He nevertheless, during this time was a great smoker, it frequently cost him four shillings weekly for tobacco, and finally it led him to break his pledge, and he became a confirmed drunkard. A few days before the missionary visited him he had been to Gravesend with some of his old drunken companions, while on the steamer, Mr. C—, a teetotaler, conversed with him, and now accompanied the missionary to his house. He signed the pledge and was followed by his son, a lad of thirteen. He says that even his drinking companions seeing the miserable state he was in strongly advised him to be a teetotaler. His wife refused to sign![†]

TRADES CONNECTED WITH THE TRAFFIC A HINDERANCE.

The Superintendent stopped a group of drunken women in the B— F— Road, and obtained from them their address. The missionary afterwards visited them. One of them C. G—, was in a dreadful state, originating in her own and husband's intemperance, and cruel habits. The following is a catalogue of the husband's doings: He had given her a black eye, her thumb was out of joint, and broken in two places, and her other hand was much swollen from a kick; she was otherwise much beaten and bruised.† She attributed her intemperance chiefly to the influence of female companions who came and enticed her out. The missionary advised her to sign, and when asked to go out, at once to say, she was a teetotaler. She acknowledged this would be the best course, and signed the pledge. She has been visited several times since, and stands firm. The missionary has had an interview with the husband, who is a cooper by trade, and appears to be a most hardened individual, he said it was no use coming to see him, for as long as he could get half-a-pint of beer he was determined to have it, and wished to know what would become of his business if all were to become teetotalers?

J. S. WARREN.

SOMERS TOWN.—DISTRICT No. XI.

(From May 1st to June 1st.)

TWO BROTHERS PROVOKING ONE ANOTHER.†

On visiting Mrs. W— of B— Street, one of whose sons signed the pledge at the British School, Perry Street,

* Go moderate drinking wife, and learn a lesson of your husband's "drinking companions."—SUPERINTENDENT.

† The Superintendent had directed her to proceed to the hospital without delay, and she is now recovering. † Heb. x, 24.

she observed, "I am glad you have called, for my eldest son has been in such a way since his brother brought home his card, and said he had joined the teetotal society; he has been teasing me to go to the school with him, to see if the master had a pledge book in which he could sign. He was sent for, and signed forthwith.

CUSTOM IN EVIL.*

On calling upon Mrs. G—, 34, S— Street, to inquire after her son, who signed the pledge at school, after a little conversation on the subject of temperance, she exclaimed, "Drink has been the ruin of all domestic happiness in our house. I have been married now twenty years, and during nearly the whole of that time, my husband has been a habitual drunkard; has had an excellent trade, that of a French kid glove cutter, in which he can earn high wages, nevertheless, I have been obliged to take in washing and ironing, to maintain the family, and pay rent." She readily signed the pledge. The missionary called on the Sunday following, and was astonished at the spectacle presented in the person of the husband—a complete walking skeleton, labouring hard for breath. On being urged to sign, he said in a tone of despair, "I cannot give it up I cannot live without it." The missionary visited him on the following Sunday, with the same unhappy result.

A CHRISTIAN WOMAN.

J— D—, another drunkard of twenty years, has a wife, an excellent Christian woman, the picture of cleanliness, both in her own person and her room—supporting herself and her infatuated husband by taking in washing. She said, she should be glad to do anything with a good conscience, as a means in reclaiming her poor husband, and then most cheerfully signed the pledge.

PRAYER AND GOOD WORKS.

Sunday, May 25th, by invitation, went to the house of Mr. and Mrs. Y—, members of T— Chapel. Having before spoken to them on the subject of teetotalism, Mr. Y— stated, that after reading and praying over the subject during the past week, they both felt it to be their duty and their privilege to sign the pledge, which they then did, expressing at the same time, their determination to do all in their power to help forward the good cause. Agreeably to this determination, on the following Tuesday, at the Sunday School teachers' meeting, Mr. Y— in a forcible speech, introduced the principle, and pressed its claims upon the church with such good effect, that a resolution was passed to invite the missionary, to ascertain how far they could co-operate with him in carrying out the object of the mission, especially in reference to the sabbath school.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.

Monday, May 12th.—Attended as a substitute for Mr. Buckle, at a festival and public meeting, held in the New Corn Exchange, Tunbridge Wells; speakers, Mr. T. A. Smith, Mr. Harding, and the missionary. A good meeting—the cause progressing, but society in arrears, therefore unable to respond to the appeal made to aid the funds of the mission, but promised to bear it in mind. The Chronicle was not known here—presented two to the secretary, who promised to introduce them amongst the members. Nine signatures.

CRANBROOK.

Tuesday, May 13th.—Attended the anniversary festival and public meetings, in the town of Cranbrook, Kent. There was a procession at two o'clock, preceded by the Stepney brass band. The first public meeting was held in the afternoon, at the Baptist chapel, the Rev. Mr. Munery, Independent minister of Tonbridge, in the chair. Speakers—Rev. Mr. Hall, minister of the chapel, and the missionary. A second meeting, seven o'clock; speakers, Messrs. Inwards, McArthur, and Grigsby;

* Jer. xlii, 29.

both full meetings—gave two Chronicles to the secretary. Twenty-five signatures.

BOROUGH GREEN.

Wednesday, May 14th.—Attended the anniversary festival and public meeting at Borough Green, held in a large room—a full meeting; Speakers, Mr. T. A. Smith, Mr. Busbridge, a reclaimed drunkard, and the missionary. Distributed Chronicles—seven signatures.

Thursday, May 15th.—Walked from Borough Green to Wrotham; took coach at Wrotham for London. Distributed a number of teetotal tracts during the four days, and made several visits in different towns through which I passed.

RAILWAY STATION—DRINK NO RESPECTER OF PERSONS.

On addressing a group at the London and Birmingham Railway Station, a person, of respectable appearance and superior address requested a tract. The missionary drew him into conversation, and learned, that drink had been the occasion of much misery to him. The missionary offered his sympathies, and suggested the pledge. He then remarked, I perceive that your object is to do good. I will sign.

DRINK NO RESPECTER OF RELIGION.

W. C.—, a respectable man, for many years connected with a Christian church, but from a moderate drinker, he proceeded to indulge in intoxicating drinks, by which he at length fell. At the persuasion of the missionary he signed the pledge, about four months since, and adhered to it for three months; during which time, he regained the confidence of his Christian friends; but he gave way to temptation, and fell again into drunkenness, neglected his business, the family altar, his Bible, and his seat in the house of God, and appeared to have become a castaway. His wife informed the missionary, that so great was his distress of mind, for several days, that she feared he would lose his reason. He has again signed the pledge.

KINDNESS OF FRIENDS CANNOT COMPETE WITH STRONG DRINK.

C. R.—, a cab proprietor, married, and five young children. Himself and wife, for several years past, have been addicted to drinking. Seven years ago he was in possession of nine hundred pounds, with good prospects before him; yet, when found by the missionary, was in a state of destitution, his family not having tasted food during the whole day. They occupied a miserable looking room, without an article of furniture, except one broken chair, and a part of a dirty old bed. The wife and children squatted on the floor, and the husband ill; had been respectably brought up, the wife having received a boarding-school education. Her father is, at the present time, in an extensive way of business in Lancashire. Their friends have repeatedly assisted them. The missionary called again the next day, when the husband and wife, and three of the children, signed the pledge. Through the benevolence of a Christian lady, and a visiting society, the missionary met their present necessities; he has re-visited them, several times, and found them firm.

STREET LABOURS—PROVIDENCE.

On presenting a tract to a man lounging against the door-post of a house, another man with a haggard-looking countenance, came to the door, and with a piercing cry, exclaimed, "I am a lost man." The expression being accompanied by a convulsive clenching of his hands, and such a distortion of features that forcibly reminded the missionary of Bunyan's man in the iron cage. On inquiring where he lived, he replied, upstairs; at the same time entering the house, and inviting the missionary to follow. Ascending the stairs, they arrived at a back room, which was strewn with brushes, camel-hair pencils, and other paraphernalia suited to his trade as a herald-painter. Apparently on the verge of despair, he again cried out, "I am a lost man!" The missionary tried to calm his feelings, by telling him there was mercy for the vilest sinner through the blood of Christ. Becoming a little calm, he gave his history. The following is an outline:—"At fifteen years of age," he said, "I became a drunkard, and from that time to the present (being now thirty-three years old), I have continued a drunkard. I have lost my business—I have lost my wife—I have lost my character—I have lost my health—I am lost, both body and soul." Here he burst into tears. The missionary then proposed reading the parable of the prodigal son, and afterwards spent a few minutes in prayer. Then putting the question solemnly—was he prepared to take the pledge, and give up for ever the accursed thing; which by his own confession, had been the cause of his past and present misery? He emphatically replied, "I am." He then signed the pledge, and has hitherto faithfully kept it.

NOTICES.

THE THIRD ANNUAL REPORT

May be had of HOULSTON & STONEMAN, 65, Paternoster Row, and at the Society's Office, 39, Moorgate Street.

The Temperance Weekly Journal, observes, "The present Report of the National Temperance Society, is the best annual digest of the temperance movement that has appeared; clear, forcible, brief, and comprehensive" "well written, carefully selected, and well authenticated."

The Temperance Intelligencer states, "Altogether, this Report is an interesting document, a copy of which ought to be in the hands of, at least, every committee of a Total Abstinence Society."

* * * Country Subscribers to the Society can have a copy forwarded to them, by remitting six postage-stamps to pay the postage.

AN INDEX TO THE CHRONICLE,

From July 1843 to June 1845, inclusive, is ready, Price 1d., and may be obtained at 39, Moorgate-street.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Rev. W. W. Robinson. We have the highest opinion of our friend Mr. R. G. Mason; but we must again decline inserting mere testimonials in the Chronicle, though they are very acceptable to the Committee.

Received the following publications:—"Tobacco injurious to the Constitution, and its use scripturally wrong, by a Surgeon."—"An Appeal in favour of Total Abstinence, &c., by R. Tabraham."—"The Christian Temperance Sabbath School Magazine"—and the "Sunday School Teachers' Magazine," containing an interesting account of several Teetotal Sabbath Schools.

The crowded state of our columns prevents our giving a more extended notice of these pamphlets and periodicals in the present No. of the Chronicle.

SELTERS WATER.

(In England called Seltzer Water.)

DECLARATION OF THE NASSAU GOVERNMENT.

THE GENERAL DIRECTION OF THE DOMAINS OF HIS HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF NASSAU.

DECLARE, by these presents, that being desirous to prevent and put a stop to the numerous falsifications committed in respect to the Waters of Selters, (in England called Seltzer Water) in the Kingdom of Great Britain, its Colonies, and Dependencies which have been made known to them on indisputable evidence, and wishing by every means in their power to secure for the future, to the consumers of the Waters of Selters (Seltzer Water) in the Kingdom of Great Britain, its Colonies, and Dependencies, the enjoyment of the genuine Water of that Spring, as also of the Springs of Fachingen, Schwabach and Weilbach, likewise the property of His Highness the Duke of Nassau, they have resolved, from the 1st of January, 1845, to use the Metallic Capsules, of Mr. John Thomas Betts of London, known under the name of "BETT'S PATENT METALLIC CAPSULE," as a top covering for all the Bottles, both large and small, filled with the said Mineral Waters, for Mr. John Thomas Betts, and intended for the Kingdom of Great Britain, its Colonies and Dependencies.

On these Capsules are to be impressed the arms of Nassau, and under the arms the name of the Water contained in the Bottle, with the words "BETTS IMPORTER," and "BETT'S PATENT," around.

The above named Bottles, capsuled in such a manner, will likewise bear, as heretofore, the usual marks, consisting of a shield, impressed on the Bottle, containing the Arms of Nassau, or a Crown, under which are the initials H. N., and around the name of the Mineral Water contained in the bottle, and also the usual burnt mark on the lower end of the cork.

The General Direction of the Domains further DECLARE by these presents, that they have granted to the said John Thomas Betts, Patentee of the above described Capsules, and to no one else in the Kingdom of Great Britain, its Colonies and Dependencies, the exclusive right to purchase and export, direct from the Springs, the Waters of Selters, Fachingen, Schwabach, and Weilbach.

They DECLARE further, that the bottles, after being filled with the respective Mineral Waters, are to be immediately, and in the presence of their officers, closed with the above named Capsules, which bear the impression of the drawing beneath.

The present Declaration is granted to Mr. John Thomas Betts, with authority to publish the same.

Given at Wiesbaden, this 15th day of December, 1844.

The President of the Direction-
General, of the Ducal Domains of Nassau. } BARON DE BUCH HERMSDORFF.

HENRY HENDRIK, Secretary.

The public will observe, by the above declaration, that these Waters, protected and hermetically closed by the PATENT METALLIC CAPSULES, may now be obtained in the same state of freshness and perfection, irrespective of time or temperature, as at the first moment when taken from the Springs, without the possibility of fraudulent substitution.

These Waters are imported in Hampers containing Four Dozen large, or Five Dozen small Bottles at the rate of 10s. per Dozen, and 5s. the Hamper for the former, and 7s. per Dozen, and 1s. 6d. the Hamper for the latter, Bottles and Hampers not returnable. And, as the sale must inevitably extend to many thousand persons, CASH PAYMENTS WILL BE INDISPENSABLE; on receipt of which, Hampers will be delivered at the Railway Loading Houses; and to any part of the Metropolis, exclusive of the Railway Stations, where carts are liable to detention.

Chairman.—Mr. R. G. Ibbett.

Deputy Chairman.—Mr. W. H. Best.

(For list of Directors and other Officers, see Prospectus.)

The objects of this Association are, to enable its members to purchase their own residences, or other freehold or leasehold property for occupation or investment, and to form a safe and profitable savings' fund for those members who may not wish to purchase house property.

The estimation in which the Temperance Benefit Building Associations are held, may be judged of by the fact, that about Twelve Hundred Pounds are received every month at the subscription-room of the societies—and that UPWARDS OF ONE THOUSAND persons have already become members.

The Temperance Building Association was established in May 1843, and in the first year enrolled 500 members, issued 750 shares, and advanced to shareholders above £3,000, to enable them to purchase property. That Society will not admit any new members.

The Second Association was established on the 9th of September, 1844, and on the 11th of November following, was declared closed, having up to that time registered 621 shares, and awarded £1,500 to its shareholders.

The Third Association was established on the 18th of December, 1844, and on the 10th of February following, was declared closed, having up to that time registered 511 shares, and awarded £1400 to its shareholders.

The Fourth Association was commenced on the 22nd of April, 1845, and on the 24th June had issued 400 shares, and enrolled upwards of 300 members, the entrance-fee is raised to five shillings, and will no doubt be closed at its next meeting.

The First Monthly Subscription will be due on Tuesday the 12th day of August, 1845, when a copy of the certified rules will be presented to every shareholder.

The usual charge of one shilling for "annual postage," will not be made in this Society.

No fees payable to the Association, upon the transfer of shares.

Members may at any time withdraw the whole of their subscriptions paid in, and receive FIVE PER CENT. INTEREST thereon.

Prospectuses and every information may be obtained of the Manager.—Mr. JOSEPH DUTTON, 8, Bath Street, City Road; or of the Secretary.—Mr. JOHN POCKNELL, 37, Cursitor Street, Chancery Lane.

The Manager or Secretary will be in attendance at the subscription room, every Tuesday and Saturday evening, from 7 to 9 o'clock, to enrol the names of persons wishing to become members, and to answer inquiries.

A WARNING VOICE.

"Cease to do evil: Learn to do well."

We have often taken occasion to warn our readers against the error we are all liable to fall into—of abolishing one form of intemperance by the substitution of another. A journal or society, avowedly devoted to the sole object of promoting the disuse of intoxicating liquors, cannot, by its necessary constitution, enter more than incidentally into other subjects. But we feel constrained to repeat the caution again and again, and to entreat each individual to take it home to himself—not to suffer his mind to become absorbed even by a laudable object, to the exclusion of that still more important work, the purification of his own heart.

"Cease to do evil," then "learn to do well."

It has often given us a pleasure we can very inadequately express, to converse with men, who have been rescued from the stream of iniquity by the stepping-stone of total abstinence; and whose humble and thankful spirits bear evident marks of an inward change, corresponding with the change in their outward habits. We look upon such men as "the salt of the earth"—as the really great and good, because imbued with the Spirit of Him who alone is Good. We have partaken of their genuine hospitality, shared their frugal meal, and thought how far sweeter was the humblest fare, received with a thankful heart, than all the varied display of a fashionable table. Many such characters we have now—and they will ever live—in our grateful remembrance. They are the truly temperate, whose mental tempers are chastened, as well as their bodily appetites controlled.

But alas! who can deny that some—and we fear they are not a few—present a picture the very opposite of what we have just faintly traced? Whose temperance, if it be worthy the name, is confined to the single article of intoxicating liquors, while they indulge the very same propensities with other things—who waste their time and money at coffee-shops and in smoking, almost as much as they did when drunkards—and whose characters present a disgusting picture of pride and envy, disguised under the most awful self-deception.

Are there not individuals in almost every temperance society, whose mock philanthropy and hypocritical zeal for truth, display themselves by wrangling, jealousy, back-biting, and detraction—whose readiness to detect the supposed errors of others, is accompanied by no sincere acknowledgment of their own?

That these evils exist, is known to all persons connected with the temperance movement; that they are arguments against that movement, no unprejudiced person will allege. The stopping of one avenue of evil may sometimes be followed by the opening of another, but it does not increase the evil itself; whilst in many—we trust the great majority of instances, it leads to its diminution. No one can pretend that abstaining from drink necessarily makes a man covetous, vain or envious, any more than it can of itself change a man's intemperate heart. But abstaining from the indulgence of any evil, must tend to suppress it; and if fasting be accompanied by prayer, it will inevitably, in the end be crowned with victory, by Him who has "all power in heaven and on earth."

But while we cannot admit that the evils which are found to be mixed up with every reformation, ought to discourage the friends of that reformation, we are more and more convinced by continued observation, that they require the utmost vigilance on the part of every Christian, to repress. If any individual, after an apparent reformation of life; after a display of zeal and benevolence, and a life spent in exhorting others to depart from evil—should himself prove to have been actuated by merely natural inclination, whilst the pride and vanity, the envy, malice, and uncharitableness, the intolerance and intemperance of his own heart, remain untouched—how awful must be his condition!—how unavailing the plea, of wonderful works done in the name of the Lord, against the solemn immutable judgment, "Depart from me, ye that work iniquity!"

DRUNKENNESS AT ELECTIONS.

The scenes of gross intemperance, so prevalent at our parliamentary elections, have been a reproach to the British nation for many generations; and as such, have been deplored by the truly virtuous and patriotic, of all parties in politics.

With the increasing intelligence of the people, increasing purity at elections may be reasonably expected; but the recent contest for the representation of Cambridge, has shown this expectation to be, in some degree at least, fallacious. The Times is our authority.

"Three gigantic ruffians, bearing the colours of —, led the procession. Four followed, carrying a chair, which was supported on their shoulders by means of poles, and in which was seated one of their companions, who was smoking, and had in his lap a large beer-can. Every now and then, he commanded his troop to halt, while he took a copious swig amidst the cheers of his fellows, who by signs and expressions, endeavoured to make the spectators understand that there was some magic connexion between the banners they bore, and the beer they drank."

Truly this was a spectacle most worthy of that venerable seat of learning, and of the mental and moral light of the nineteenth century!

We confess, we know of no degradation greater than that of a free member of a free state, voluntarily consenting, for the sake of a portion of filthy lucre, to be made partially or completely drunk—consenting to throw off the dignity of a man, to become the inferior of the meanest brute, and to exhibit the ferocity of the beast of prey, without possessing its sagacity.

Nations less civilized than our own, have in this respect, set an example, which our senators should not be ashamed to imitate. Our last number contained the interesting fact, that at a late election in Brazoria, in the disturbed, and almost lawless territory of Texas, there was no visiting of grog-shops, and "treating was entirely out of the question!"

Why should it not be so with us? That it is not so, is a disgrace to our national character—and that is worth caring for; a disgrace to the temperance, the morality, the philanthropy, and the piety of the times in which we live—but a disgrace which we fervently trust, will soon, very soon, be numbered among the things that have been!

THE METROPOLITAN TEMPERANCE MISSION.

It is now twelve months, since the attention of the readers of the Chronicle was first directed to the subject of the Metropolitan Temperance Mission. To its establishment, the Committee look back with unfeigned satisfaction; and while it is their desire as far as possible, to aid in the promotion of temperance throughout the empire, they intend to devote their chief energies to the suppression of intemperance in the "great metropolis." The justice of this will appear, when the immense population included within its limits is taken into account;—a population comprising no less than one-fourteenth of the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland.

In London, too, (as in the capitals of nearly all large states,) immorality and crime are more apparent than in thinly populated districts; and when it is considered, that a vast proportion of that crime and immorality which so awfully prevail in London, is traceable directly to intemperance, what place, we would ask, so fit for the putting forth of the most strenuous exertions we can command against the great foe of human happiness and social improvement?

The Committee have increased the number of missionaries to ten; and are ready to add others to the list, so soon as the state of the Mission Fund will warrant the additional outlay.

The metropolis has likewise been carefully divided into forty districts:—each missionary (supposing the number to be ten) to have four districts under his care, and each district to take up one week in its visitation. By this plan, it is probable, that every accessible house in London will be visited by the missionaries of this Society, at least once in the course of the coming year.

The particular attention of our readers is, therefore, most earnestly requested to the cases detailed in the monthly Missionary Chronicle:—cases which, though often affording ground for encouragement and perseverance, cannot but appal, and sometimes disgust, by the pictures they present of the condition of the poorer classes; and which show incontrovertibly, that no means, short of total abstinence, can raise myriads of men and women in this mighty city, from that state of degradation into which they are fallen.

We confess that we entertain very sanguine expectations concerning the future success of the Temperance Mission; and have we not reason for doing so? Have we not had an earnest of the abundant harvest which remains to be gathered in? Has it not had the smile and the approbation of God resting upon it? And if it be conducted with a view to His glory and to man's present and future welfare, have we not cause to hope, that it will be blessed to the good of thousands, and exert a benign influence upon the destinies of many, who are still the wretched victims of drunkenness, and crime?

TEMPERANCE MISSION IN FRANCE.

It may be well to repeat what we stated in our last, as to the origin of the missionary effort which the Committee at present are making in France.

A small Temperance Society has existed for about two years among the English residents in Rouen, near Havre. Application was made by Mr. Mack, (one of the most active members of that Society) for an agent to labour for three months, principally among the English workmen employed upon the Paris and Rouen Railway.

The Committee after due deliberation and correspondence with Mr. Mack, came to the determination of sending Mr. James Balfour and another missionary for six weeks each, to extend the principles of Temperance among our countrymen in Rouen and Havre, and if possible, to form the nucleus of a Temperance Mission in France.

The work is laborious; the extent of the district is sixty miles; the English located are greatly addicted to drinking; several have ended their days, and others are in the hospitals through the same cause. I am grieved also to say that the depraved conduct of the English is making a bad impression upon the French working-men; as the French say that drunkenness is on the increase. The opportunities to drink are great, as the article is cheap, and it is sold at all the shops. There are also temporary places erected on all the works on the rail-road for the vending of strong drink, which females sell in bottles to the workmen at various prices, even as low as 1d.

On my arrival I found about twenty-four good members here that were very active, and whose souls were in the work. There are several preaching places in the town and in the neighbourhood, all of which have been obtained for my use. The working-men on the Railway are very anxious to hear all about our principles. The contractors of the Railway have contributed towards the Mission Fund.

The English and French Protestant ministers are not abstainers, but are favourable to our views. The sober habits of the French combined with the light nature of their wines are much against us.

July 2nd, on my way to Havre, held a Meeting in the Town Hall at Southampton; 4 signed.

July 4th, Meeting at Harfleur, France; 3 signed.

July 7th, Meeting at the English Preaching-house, Eauplét; 13 signed. The first person who signed at this village was the mistress of the English school who said she did it for the sake of example.

July 8th, Meeting at the English Preaching-Room, Sotteville, near Rouen; one signed.

Wednesday, the 9th, spoke to four groups on the Boulevards, at Rouen; visited the Railway-men at their work, and held a meeting in the Preaching-Room of the Rev. Mr. Holloway.

Thursday the 10th, spoke to six groups, and held a meeting at Chartreux; 1 person signed. Visited the horsemarket, and saw much drunkenness among the French. Met two Railway workmen, one Frenchman and one Englishman, both drunk: after expostulating with them on their conduct, they signed the pledge.

Friday, the 11th, spoke to two groups on the Boulevards; one man waited upon me at my lodgings, and signed the pledge.

Saturday, the 12th, spoke to three groups; no signatures.

Sunday, the 13th, started at five o'clock in the morning for Barrington; walked with a friend from thence to Pavilly, and addressed a small congregation: returned to Rouen and spoke to a few persons at a Preaching-Room, in the Rue Traversière.

Monday, the 14th, held a second meeting at Eauplét—attendance good. After the lecture several persons put questions; when a man with his wife came forward and signed the pledge, stating they had great reason to do so; their son, a lad of ten years of age, had a large quantity of brandy administered to him by some drunken men, which caused his death in the course of three hours. On the same day, visited some of the worst parts of Rouen, and found that intemperance prevailed to a great extent among the French portion of the inhabitants.

Tuesday, the 15th, spoke to two groups, delivered tracts, spoke to the workmen on the line; took 3 signatures. One man said, he had been only one month in France, but had suffered severely through strong drink, and would, therefore, sign the pledge. Held a second meeting at Sotteville, attendance good.

Wednesday, the 16th, visited the men who were labouring at the new bridge crossing the Seine, from Eauplet; read one tract and gave away several; found here a few teetotalers. Returned to Rouen and spoke to three groups on Boulevards.

Thursday, 17th, spoke to a number of men on the quay; held a good meeting at Chartreux; 5 signatures.

Friday, the 18th, visited the French Protestant Minister; he received me courteously, and expressed himself as very favourable to the temperance cause. Afterwards, held a good meeting in the Rue Traversière.

I left Rouen on Saturday, 19th instant, to visit some Norman villages, where many of the English reside.

On Sunday, 20th, I was at Havre, visited several of the ships in that port, and obtained the signatures of a Captain and two seamen; after which, I set out to walk to Harfleur. On the road, I saw over a neat building, the words "AMERICAN CHURCH." As it was service-time I entered, and at the conclusion of the worship, obtained an interview with the minister who officiated that day: he received me very kindly, expressed an interest in the work in which I was engaged, and in the absence of the stated pastor, granted me the use of the Bethel Chapel, 16, Quai de l'Île, for a Temperance meeting. Walked on to Harfleur that day, and held a meeting.

On Monday, the 21st, held a second meeting at Harfleur, and took 1 signature: also visited the houses of the English labourers.

On Tuesday, the 22nd, held a third meeting at Harfleur, when 25 signatures were obtained; the most of them those of the greatest drunkards on the line.

On Wednesday, the 23rd, went to Mirville, visited forty families, who are located principally in wooden houses erected by the Railway Company. Intended holding a meeting; but having understood that several of the café keepers had determined to create a disturbance, decided on postponing it.

On Thursday, the 24th, visited 30 families, spoke to four groups, met two men on the road quite drunk; one of them affirmed he could earn 15 francs (12s. 6d.) a-day, and had squandered away 147 francs (about £6.) in two days. Held a good meeting in a carpenter's shop, kindly granted for the occasion by Mr. Swanson, the agent for the contractor of that part of the line. During the two days I spent at Mirville, 10 signatures were taken.

On Friday, the 25th, held a meeting at Pavilly; 1 signature.

Total number of signatures up to the 25th of July 73.

[Mr. Balfour did not arrive from France until the 23rd ult., consequently the remainder of his Journal is deferred until next month. In the meantime, it gives us pleasure to state, that encouraging as were the results of his labours up to the above date, his success from the 1st of August to the 23rd, when he left Havre, was of a still more gratifying nature. Mr. J. H. Donaldson has been appointed to succeed Mr. Balfour.]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

UNITED STATES.

We had prepared an abridged account of the Ninth Anniversary of the American Temperance Union, intending to insert it in our August number.

This we were unable to do from want of space; and it must now therefore suffice us, to give a brief summary of what then took place. The meeting was held on the 9th of May, at New York, in the Broadway Tabernacle, which was early filled. In the absence of the Hon. REUBEN WALWORTH, Chancellor of the State of New York, and President of the Temperance Union, who was detained from the meeting by his courts, the chair was taken by JOHN TAPPAN, Esq., of Boston. The speakers were, Rev. Dr. Edwards, Rev. C. Warren, Rev. Mr. Pohlman of Albany, Rev. Mr. Thompson, Pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Rev. Thomas P. Hunt of Pennsylvania, and Mr. J. P. Coffin. The proceedings were of a highly interesting and encouraging character.

The following is the substance of that part of the Report, then read, which relates to the progress of temperance in the United States:—

Three new state societies have been organized during the year—one in Ohio, one in Indiana, and one in Illinois.

The Congressional society has held no public meeting the past year; and only one legislative society, that of Massachusetts, has been convened; but the people, in their local associations, have actively sustained the interest in the enterprise, and various popular lecturers have been listened to with an interest not surpassed in former periods. If the Washingtonian movement has spent its force, still its results are great and good. Multitudes of reformed men, standing firm to their pledge, are monuments of the goodness of the cause, and also efficient agents in its extension.

The press has everywhere been with us, and temperance journals of an elevated character have been well sustained. No division of the enterprise is more interesting and prosperous, than that of seamen. In the length of our coast, 40,000 seamen have been enrolled in temperance societies, and of these, 8000 have been added the last year. The marine society of this port numbers 17,000; at the port of Charleston, 1000 have been enrolled the present year. The results of temperance are seen in the fact, that in 1842 and 1843, 784 vessels and 1244 lives were lost, while in 1844 only 208 vessels and 105 lives have been lost.

Notwithstanding the continuance of the spirit-ratation, and in spite of all its evil influence on the navy, several of our men-of-war have become temperance ships. Of the crew of the Columbia, the flag-ship in the Mediterranean, of 450 seamen, 445 have renounced their grog.

Of 1200 men of Captain Smith's squadron, who went on shore, not one broke his liberty, and only one got drunk. From many of the officers, and 250 of the ship's company of the Cumberland, a petition has been forwarded to Washington, praying for the abolition of the spirit-ratation. "We are satisfied ourselves," say they, "from a year's experience of the temperance system on board this ship, that grog is not necessary to the performance of our duty, in point of health, comfort or happiness, and we are infinitely better without than with it."

After giving a general view of the progress of the cause, the Report suggested several considerations to the friends of temperance.

1. The importance of looking more closely at the power of the enemy they combat.
2. The duty of prompt, decided, and energetic measures, so far as they may be consistent with the rights of liquor-sellers, to rid the nation and the world of the traffic in intoxicating drinks.
3. An increased activity and devotedness to the cause, is greatly needed from the Christian church.

4. Society demands a more systematic, thorough, and universal temperance training of children and youth.

5. Temperance organizations should be sustained with all the energy and constancy of which they are capable.

6. Temperance among seamen, and the entire abolition of the spirit-ration in the navy, should be pressed with daily increasing energy.

7. The deep foundations of intemperance should be well understood, that we rest not contented with a slight and superficial cure of so wide-spread and fatal a malady.

8. The highest motives for persevering and powerful action are before us.

The Report closed with alluding to the death of two of the greatest ornaments of the cause, Dr. Thomas Sewall of Washington, and the Hon. Roger M. Sherman of Connecticut. In the departure of such men we are admonished, that whatever we do in this work, we must do quickly; and we learn too, that "the memory of the just is blessed."

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The Sandwich Islands have been distinguished for the rapid spread of total abstinence. Two temperance periodicals are published at Honolulu, the Friend of Temperance and Seamen, and the Hawaiian Cascade.

The following letter is one addressed from Mr. J. Hellrung, to the Rev. S. C. Danon, editor of the Friend of Temperance and Seamen :—

"Honolulu, Dec. 26th, 1844.

"Temperance on board a Hamburg brig,—Report of United States' Hospital, Honolulu, 1844.

"REVEREND SIR,—As you are interested in the welfare of seamen and the progress of temperance, allow me to relate to you the following facts, which will show you that there may be found true temperance, if not teetotalism among sailors, whose home is on the coast of the Baltic or North Sea. All hands on board the Hamburg brig Julia, shipped under the condition, that whoever should be seen intoxicated, whether on board or on shore, should lose his wages. No spirit-rations were given out, but instead, coffee twice, and tea once a day. In cold weather, the crew received at night ginger-tea, prepared for every watch twice.

"Captain Penhallow remarked that he never had seen a stronger and healthier crew on board of a vessel of her size. I am, &c."

Temperance has progressed extensively among the vessels employed in the whale-fishery.

The following extract from an article which appeared in the form of a letter, in the Hawaiian Cascade, is evidence of the beneficial results which have flowed from the practice of total abstinence.

"The reform has advanced so far, that not a single writer of any respectability, dares come out and oppose the temperance reform. Writers, so far as they employ their pens, are all engaged upon the side of total abstinence principles. How changed are the views of the public in Honolulu, in regard to the degrading vice of drunkenness. A few years since, it was so common for drunkards to be seen in the streets, that the disgusting sight occasioned no surprise. It is not so now. Lately we heard it reported, that the master of a whaler-ship was seen drunk in the streets. 'Is it possible?' says one, 'Who can it have been?' says another. 'Sailors too, are not so frequently seen reeling through our streets. Says one, 'I saw a sailor drunk to-day, for the first time during this shipping season.' Says another, 'How regular that fellow ——— has been since he signed the pledge.'

The mechanics and labouring class in Honolulu, have risen more than one hundred per cent, during the last eighteen months. They may have been slow in coming to the conclusion that alcohol is not necessary to labouring men, but now they are nobly practising the principle. It does one's soul good to meet these men hale and healthy, cheerful and happy, as they are engaged in their various trades and professions. If a man wants a piece of work done, he is not put off a week or fortnight, until the person he would employ gets sober. It is a long time since we have heard the complaint that, 'I cannot get such a piece of work done, because — is on a spree.'

DOMINICA, WEST INDIES,

(Interesting Letter from REV. J. COX.)

*Dominica, West Indies,
July 25, 1845.*

MY DEAR SIR,—I have the pleasure to acknowledge your donation of tracts and Chronicles, received through our kind friend, Mr. Jones of the Tract Society. I have circulated them widely.

I cannot report to you any remarkable progress in our cause here, since I transmitted to you the report of our public meeting. A few managers and overseers of estates have signed the pledge. The members of the Wesleyan churches have almost universally become abstainers. In religion it is a most powerfully conservative-principle—and we are continually rejoicing in its numerous advantages—with others, we can scarcely have intercourse. The rigidly exclusive principle of Romanism prevents our having access to its votaries, comprising nine-tenths of our small population :—and the movement among them, which I mentioned to you, and hailed with thankfulness, appears to have died away.

Some months ago, I obtained access to the garrison at Morn Bruce, and by lectures and circulation of tracts, we have persuaded about fifty to renounce intoxicating drinks. Several of the artillery have removed to Barbadoes—a few have fallen away—and there are about 29 on the book, besides some who abstain and are not enrolled. One young man was subsequently converted to God, and is among the number of removals.

Two or three weeks ago, a corporal came and presented to me 2s. 6d., which he said was a subscription made among a few of his comrades of the 71st Regiment, for the Temperance Society, as a small token of their gratitude for the benefits they had received from it; that amount I now send you, accompanied by a few other donations. I fully agree with the speakers at your last anniversary, that the exhibition of liberality in support of temperance societies, bears no proportion generally to the pecuniary advantages which accrue from them; and if this appears to condemn my own small subscription, I can only plead in excuse, that for many years I was expending money (disproportioned to my circumstances,) in the purchase of tracts and books for circulation in these islands, in order to establish the blessed principles of abstinence, and that I cannot yet cease adopting that mode of promoting the glory of God. But who can refuse to give something to further such a work as is detailed in the journals of your metropolitan missionaries? The Lord be praised. O! how often have I read these affecting narratives, while I and my hearers have been dissolved in sympathy!

And may we not hope that the "set time to favour," this good cause by the ministers of Jesus Christ generally is now come? I am delighted with Dr. Campbell's testimony, and hope his powerful talents may be ever successfully employed in advancing it. A rich reward will he reap. O! that all my honoured fathers and brethren could enjoy the unspeakable happiness which a Christian-loving advocacy of this benevolent enterprise is sure to secure! As a pioneer of the gospel, what can equal it?

"Did you never hear of this principle in —?" (the island from whence he had recently arrived,) I said to a soldier recently. "No, Sir, never." What a melancholy tale. Now if the beloved ministers of the Lord Jesus there had embraced and propagated this preventive of evil, from how many crimes might those brave men have been preserved! With what gratitude would they have hailed and embraced it. For a soldier who never drinks is almost sure to escape disgrace and punishment, and viva versa;—and this I see every week. I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly,

JAMES COX.

Can you send us a few reports via Mission House, or 14, City Road?

IRELAND.

(From a private letter from the REV. T. MATHEW.)

"I am delighted to be able to assure you of the triumphant progress in Ireland of our sacred cause. It is a remarkable fact, that the disturbed districts in this county are the very parts where the Total Abstinence Pledge has not been administered."

THE MAYOR OF CORK, at the opening of the Temperance Institute of that city, said, "he had just returned from England, and he was proud to say, that the subject of Irish reform, under the name of temperance, had occupied the attention of the British Association for the advancement of Science, the Bishop of Norwich, and other eminent scholars and moralists, made it the subject of eager and anxious inquiry. Their opinion, their hopes, in fact everything relating to temperance was scanned and dwelt on with the deepest interest. At the close of that meeting, he was charged to convey the thanks of the body itself to their venerated and venerable president—(applause). Nay, more, the Bishop of Norwich desired to be remembered to their rev. leader—(loud applause).

SCOTLAND.

The delegated meeting of the societies composing the Western Scottish Temperance Union, was held in the Trades' Hall, Glasgow, 17th July. The Rev. Dr. Ritchie in the chair. Delegates present, 53—societies represented, 43.

Dr. Ritchie, after opening the meeting with prayer, called upon Mr. Nichols, in the absence of Mr. Fulton, to read the report; after which, the Doctor made some apt remarks, variously applicable to the drinking-customs and drunken habits of the people.

Letters from the British Association, from the National Society, and from J. Dunlop, Esq., were read.

The cash account was presented by Mr. Kettle, and showed a balance in hand of £32. 10s. 3d.

The delegates transacted business on Thursday the 17th, from three o'clock to seven P. M.; and on the following day, from ten A. M. to seven P. M., with a short interval.

It is to be hoped that the spirit of zeal and unanimity which pervaded the meeting, will be exhibited by the societies in carrying out the measures recommended to their adoption.

MR. VINCENT's exertions in connexion with the Temperance League have been eminently successful. The Glasgow Examiner states, "Mr. Vincent's lectures in different parts of the country are listened to by respectable and enthusiastic audiences. Ministers and magistrates are lending their influence to the movement, and the happiest results are being completely anticipated."

BRISTOL AND SOMERSET
TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

EIGHTH ANNUAL MEETING.

(Abridged from the Bristol Temperance Herald.)

The annual conference of the above association was held in the Temperance Hall, Taunton, on the 15th of July. Thirteen societies were represented by twenty-one delegates; and a spirit of unanimity prevailed throughout the deliberations. On the discussion of the great value of our principles to the young, some statements of a very pleasing and satisfactory character were named in connexion with several of the juvenile societies. The self-supporting travelling agency again met with the approbation of the conference, both as regards its general working, and the labours of the agents engaged in it during the last year. Another subject of importance, and essential to the universal diffusion of temperance principles, namely that of missionary labours engaged the serious attention of the delegates, who were desirous that our future agents should devote as much of their time, as they could conveniently spare, in visiting from house to house; and also that local visiting committees should be formed in connexion with each society, who should occasionally assist the travelling agents. We were rejoiced to find that several societies had adopted the plan of loan distribution of tracts, and that the results in several instances were of a cheering character, and such as exhibited the excellence of the practice. The next annual conference is to be held at Shaftesbury.

THE TEA AND PUBLIC MEETING.

At the termination of the business, which had engaged the attention of the delegates, they repaired to the tea-meeting which was held at five o'clock, in a commodious shed erected in a field in South-street, and kindly lent for the occasion, by Mr. S. Curry. The attendance from town and country was numerous, and the sociality was fully sustained from the commencement until the conclusion of the proceedings. In an assemblage comprising old and young, grave and gay, dissenter and churchman, is was no easy task, and required a skilful adaptation of oratory to meet the tastes of all, but this was ably and efficiently met by the different speakers who subsequently addressed the meeting. John Young, Esq. occupied the chair. The assembly was ably addressed by R. Charlton, Esq., Mr. Northmore of Bridport; Mr. Russell, a working man; Rev. W. Griffith of Melksham; Mr. T. Hutchings, and Mr. J. Russom.

AGENTS' REPORTS.

GEORGE BEST, OXON.

I beg to forward you the following among other cases of reformation which have taken place in the districts where I labour. Some time since as I was going about trying to do good, I observed a poor miserable man lying on the ground; I went and spoke to him, he informed me he had by his drunkenness ruined himself, disgraced his friends, and now he was abandoned by God and man; and that, as he had no money, nor clothes nor friends, he intended drowning himself. I pointed out to him the awful consequences of such an act, which seemed greatly to affect him. I then preached Christ to him. And O! how eagerly did he listen to the glad-tidings with tears trickling down his face. Having a few shillings in my pocket, I lent them to him, and got him also a few old clothes. He has now got work, attends chapel and is an earnest advocate for teetotalism, and an enemy to that which nearly proved his ruin. He will soon return to his friends, as one who was dead, but is alive again, who was lost but is found.

A young man who is a member of a little church which I superintend at the village of A—, was excluded twice through intoxication. The last time he gave himself up for some time to drunkenness. At last he was prevailed on to sign the pledge. Since then, he has returned as a poor backslider, and a true broken-hearted penitent, to the Christian church from which he had wandered through drunkenness; and now he continues an active, consistent, useful teetotaler attending to religious duties, and trying to extend our good cause among all his former and present companions.

T. G—r of T—p, first obtained a love for strong drink when about 14 years of age. His master, with whom he was then living, would bring him sometimes two, three, or four quarts of strong drink a-day, to make him strong and work well! This gave him a liking for liquor, which of course led him to the ale-house and bad company. From a moderate drinker he became ultimately a confirmed, miserable drunkard. And although, he, after this, held some good situations, yet, through drunkenness, he lost both them and his character; he was a pest to society, a disgrace to his friends and a misery to himself; he was often without a morsel to eat, without a shirt to his back, or shoes to his feet; he cared for neither God nor man; he was a blasphemer, and an infidel; he lived in the most debased manner, and was infamous for vice of the lowest kind. Being very tall and powerful, he was the dread of the neighbourhood, and several robberies were attributed to him, for some of which he has been imprisoned, but always escaped transportation. This depraved kind of life he has lived for FORTY YEARS, not caring what he did for drink. When I have visited him in his wretched home, which was hardly fit to shelter cattle, I have often found him dead drunk, stretched on a filthy bedstead, without even straw upon the muddy sacking; but the Lord helped me to persevere, and it is now, about fourteen weeks since he came to my house of his own accord, walking four miles, on purpose to sign the pledge, which he did with a trembling hand, declaring he would now work for himself, &c. And I am happy to say, he seems quite firm, resisting all importunity to drink. The last time I saw him, he was clothed, clean, and in his right mind; and now my heart's desire and prayer to God for him is, that he may be saved with an everlasting salvation.

M. W. CRAWFORD—ESSEX UNION.

I have just finished my three months' engagement in the above union, and am happy to be enabled to give a favourable report. Our meetings have been respectably attended, and many have joined, of that description of persons, who are likely not only to remain with us, but also to do us credit.

From Dunmow to Chelmsford, and in the immediate neighbourhood, there are nine farmers all teetotalers, holding about 2500 acres. These gentlemen encourage their labourers in habits of sobriety, economy, and cleanliness, and the effects are very visible. Their farms are managed in first-rate style, and their workmen are blessed with a degree of comfort not to be found in many parts of the country.

On Thursday, the 30th of July, a very interesting meeting took place at Boyton Hall, the residence of — Christy, Esq. And although the afternoon turned out wet and gloomy, yet at the appointed time, about one hundred individuals sat down to tea in an out-building tastefully decorated for the occasion. James Christy, Esq., of Bromfield, took the chair at the public meeting, which was afterwards addressed by Mr. Eve of Chelmsford, and by George Pitts, Thomas Lyons, and your agent. Six persons signed at the conclusion.

I have entered into a second engagement, which I commence on the 1st of September, and hope I shall give a good account of my stewardship.

A. W. HERITAGE.—HAMPSHIRE.

Monday, August 4th.—Attended a public tea-meeting, held on the premises of Mr. Jacob of Longwood; about eighty persons sat down to tea, nearly double the number of last year. The chair was occupied by Mr. Naylor, Secretary of the Winchester Society; and Messrs. Jacobs, Wilks, and your agent addressed the meeting, after which, a hard working man assured the audience that he had performed all kinds of field-labour without any kind of intoxicating drinks, for a period of three years.

6th, Members' meeting at Winchester, to balance the Treasurer's accounts; ten shillings were given to the Mission-fund.

8th, and 9th, Visiting and tract-distributing in the New Forest; nothing transpired calling for particular notice.

10th, Addressed the children of the Baptist Sunday School, Winchester, on the evils of drunkenness. Two of the teachers signed the pledge a few days afterwards.

12th, Visited Somborne, a large village, eight miles from Winchester; waited upon forty families, and gave away tracts, but found much ignorance and prejudice prevailing.

15th, Having heard that a few religious persons at Twyford and Crowdhill (two populous villages,) would favour my plans, I paid them a visit, at the former place, found a few teetotalers, to whom I gave some tracts, and lent a few reports, for which they appeared grateful. At Crowdhill, a member of the Wesleyan Society gave me every encouragement, and promised the use of a suitable place for a public-meeting after the harvest; I lent him a Report, and a copy of the National Society's Address, visited and gave away tracts at forty-six houses.

My visits during the past fortnight, have been for the most part preparatory ones. Two members of the Wesleyan Society at Winchester, have united with us since my last, one, an old member and class leader, the other, a local preacher.

POLICE COURTS.

GUILDHALL.—Elizabeth M'ulloch, a woman about 30 years of age was charged with attempting to cause her child, apparently about six months old, to be run over by a waggon.

John Ratcliffe, a city policeman stated that he was on duty on Blackfriars Bridge on Friday night, and his attention was called to the prisoner, who he was told had made two or three doubtful attempts to let her child fall over the parapet of the bridge. He drove her on, and she thrice went into the road for the purpose of forcing her child close before the wheels of waggons in motion. He therefore took her into custody: SHE WAS DRUNK. She was locked up.—Morning Herald, July 7th.

Compendium of Facts.

THE LONDON CITY MISSION'S ANNUAL REPORT for 1845, and the Monthly Magazine for August, contain a number of pleasing instances of reformation by total abstinence from intoxicating liquors.

TEMPERANCE FETES have been held during the past month at Aylesbury, High Wycombe, Stoke Ferry, Hayes, Hanwell and Beaconsfield.

A SOCIETY called the United Military Teetotal Society, has been formed in the metropolis, which numbers already about one hundred members.

AT THE BRITISH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, 53 delegates attended, representing 37 societies.

IN THE TWO TOWNSHIPS of Radcliffe and Pilkington, with a population of 16,184, there are two breweries, 26 public-houses, and 58 beer-shops. There are 750 total abstainers, including 70 reformed characters, 30 of whom have joined Christian churches.

THE SEVENTH Annual Report of the Bath Juvenile Temperance Society, states that 230 have signed the pledge during the past year, making a total number of 2227 members. A Sunday-school has been established for the benefit of those of the members whose education has been neglected, and who do not attend other Sunday schools. An elocution class has also been formed for the improvement of those of the members who are designed for the future advocacy of the cause on the platform.

A DINNER has been lately given by Messrs. Bright of Rochdale to the workmen who were employed in the erection of a large mill. More than 200 persons (including the men's wives) sat down to the repast. Mr. W. Logan, town missionary, delivered an address on moral reform. There was a rich supply of water and different kinds of fruit, but an entire absence of all intoxicating drinks.

THE TEMPERANCE INSTITUTE of Cork was opened on the 7th of July. The mayor presided.

KILLARNEY.—Father Mathew has recently visited "the romantically situated and far-famed town of Killarney," where he was gloriously feted, and administered the pledge to several thousands of persons.

CRIME IN THE COUNTY OF CORK.—The Cork Examiner (July 28th) says, "There was never less crime in our county; never fewer cases, or of a lighter nature. There are but forty cases, including bail cases, in the whole county, with its population of nearly a million. The city is almost devoid of crime."

REV. MR. SELING, the Father Mathew of Germany, is at present actively pursuing his vocation in Hanover. His labours are attended with considerable success.

THE GUIANA Congregational Record states, that at an agricultural meeting in Berbice, one of the speakers mentioned an estate on which the amount of additional labour performed by the people residing on the property, after signing the pledge, was equal to that of 50 new hands.

CAFE OF GOOD HOPE.—The temperance cause is steadily progressing, especially among the aborigines and emancipated slaves. One hundred members have been added to the Port Elizabeth Society during the present year.

REV. DR. BURNS, late of Paisley, and now pastor of the free Presbyterian Congregation of Toronto, and principal of the Theological Institute of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, has signed the total abstinence pledge.

NEW YORK PAUPERISM.—The pauper tax of this state is 600,000 dollars, or £125,000, one quarter of which is the direct intemperance tax.

THE TEMPERANCE HOTEL built by Mr. Delavan, at Albany, is now open. Its cost is said to have been about £29,000, and the expense of the furniture about £7000.

THE NEW YORK Temperance Convention was held at Albany, on the 15th of June. Among the distinguished men present were Chief Justice Savage, Mr. Delavan, Dr. Wilson of New York, President Schenectady, Rev. Drs. Welsh, Wykoff, Schneller, Pohlman, &c. &c.

IN MASSACHUSETTS, only one county out of fourteen now grants licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

PROFESSOR POTTER, a devoted friend of the temperance movement, has been elevated to the bishopric of Pennsylvania.

THE MAYOR of New York has given official notice that the laws forbidding all trade on the Sabbath, except in certain articles within specified hours, and especially the laws prohibiting all traffic in spirituous or malt liquors at all hours, will be rigidly enforced.

OHIO.—The late Court of Common Pleas in Lorraine county, Ohio, refused to grant any licenses to liquor-selling taverns.

IN RHODE ISLAND twenty-one towns, including nearly all the larger towns, have, by a popular vote, decided not to grant licenses. A few years ago, 600 licenses were granted in this little State.

CORONER'S JURY.—At Westchester, a man, while in a state of intoxication, killed his own child. A coroner's inquest was held on the body, and one of the jurors offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:—"Whereas the act was done while in a state of intoxication, therefore Resolved, That we hold the person or persons who sold him liquor equally guilty with the accused."

AT HUNTSVILLE in Alabama, a license cannot be obtained for less than twenty-five hundred dollars! (or £562. 10s.) When this law of the city first came into operation, the keeper of the principal dram-shop, who boasted of having cleared 1500 dollars in six months, trimmed his sign with black crape, and sent to the mayor and aldermen, requesting them to attend his funeral at his late residence.

THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA has lately been the scene of a disgraceful riot, brought on by a "drunken spree" among a number of the students.

THE BRAGORIA Temperance Society in Texas, numbers 100 members, with auxiliaries of 100 each.

Missionary Chronicle.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

SOUTH LAMBETH.—DISTRICT No. I.

(From July 1st to August 1st, 1845.)

THE HALF-PINT BLUNTS THE AFFECTIONS AND DESTROYS MORAL FEELING.

At a pipe-factory, in W—L— court, met with the master and two of his companions, all three drunkards. After a long conversation on the subject of teetotalism, and the evils connected with drinking, the master said he would sign, and took the pledge-book for this purpose; when his wife (who was also present, and had before expressed her disapprobation,) flew between him and the missionary, plucking the book out of his hand, and declared he should not sign. She said, if he signed, he would want her to do so too, and she should never be able to drink her half-pint in peace. She would not sign, she said, nor should he; if he did, she would make him break it. The husband consequently declined to sign. One of his companions said, moreover, that he could not sign, as he was paid at the public-house. D—S—, the other companion said, he had been a great drunkard, and had spent a deal of money in drink, which had always kept himself and family poor; he signed.

SHE TOLD MY FATHER, THEN HE AND ANOTHER MAN SIGNED.

At No. 3, in G— street, left a tract in a room with a little girl, whose parents were out, the missionary going on to the next room; on coming away, the little girl said, "My father is a teetotaler." "How long has he been one?" said the missionary. "Five weeks." "How did he become a teetotaler?" "You called here once before and talked with my mother, and left a tract; she told my father, and then he and another man went to a meeting and signed the pledge."

IMPORTANCE OF RE-VISITS—A RE-SIGNATURE

Mrs. W— who had once been a teetotaler, on a re-visit, informed the missionary that she had taken no intoxicating liquors since he last called; had been miserable since she broke her pledge, and would now try again; she then signed. Her husband (from whom she endured much persecution) was a bricklayer by trade, but gets his living now by playing on the violin at public-houses.

THE ADVANTAGES OF HAVING A TEETOTAL CHRISTIAN YOUNG WOMAN IN A HOUSE.

Called to see a man named S—, a potter, at No. 15, in G— street, but he was not at home; was informed that he had been out a whole week drinking. A Christian young woman living in the same house said, she had read the tracts the missionary had formerly left, and had tried teetotalism, was satisfied she could do without intoxicating drinks, and would now sign the pledge. Calling again a few days after, S— was again from home; but the young woman above referred to, informed the missionary she had talked to him as well as she could, and she thought he would eventually take the pledge; she said, he would be at home in the evening. Went accordingly in the evening, and found him at home, (the young woman being gone to chapel.) After some conversation, he said, he would sign, being convinced from observation that none prospered so well as those who were teetotalers, and attended a place of worship.

IMITATION.

A man and his wife residing in the same house, and who had just entered the room, were asked to sign, the husband replied in the affirmative, and looking round at his wife said, "Now, mistress, you will sign too." "Oh! yes, certainly I will;" when they both signed, the wife remarking, "now we shall have a house full of teetotalers."

J. S. WARREN.

BETHNAL GREEN.—No. II.

DRUNKARDS DO NOT LIKE TO HEAR OF DEATH.

A respectable, but poor widow, residing at ——— said, that she had lost her husband through drink: frequently on the sabbath-day, he spent as much as seven shillings in intoxicating liquor. The day before he died, he would not hear of death, but said that he should go to his labour as usual, when a fit of apoplexy seized him and he expired, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, leaving a widow and five children. The widow signed, and four of her children.

SIGNING THE PLEDGE FOR A TIME.

H— of D— row, who has a wife and family, signed the pledge for twelve months, when he deliberately broke it; and while under the maddening effects of liquor, insulted a female, for which crime he is now in Newgate, under sentence of transportation for life.

SABBATH MORNING LABOURS—THE PLEDGE, RECONCILIATION AND EFFORT FOR OTHERS.

Visited two drunkards, husband and wife, who had lived for years quarrelling and fighting and robbing each other, for the purpose of procuring liquor. When they signed the pledge a reconciliation took place. Have since been visited and found firm, and are endeavouring to reclaim their intemperate neighbours.

PUBLIC-HOUSE, NOT HOME INTEMPERANCE.

A woman informed the missionary that her husband seldom had a pint of beer at home, but spent most of his wages at the public-house.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM.—No. IV.

MEDICAL TESTIMONY.

In conversation with a medical gentleman of large practice in this neighbourhood, he said, "though not a teetotaler, I am glad to find you are progressing in the good work; I have repeated opportunities of witnessing some of the results of the mission; but it is frequently urged upon me, sir, are not these things sent for us to enjoy? to which I answer, they may be, yet, if once the appetite is created for their indulgence, drunkenness follows, and the only effectual cure for such, is total abstinence."

MODERATE DRINKING-MASTERS.

Calling upon B—, who had been a teetotaler of some standing, he confessed that he had broken his pledge, having been to visit an old master, whom he had not seen for some time, and who insisted upon his taking some ale with him; he unfortunately yielded to the temptation, which he now greatly regretted, he then signed again; and on his way home, the missionary obtained another re-signature.

A MAN OF PROPERTY—A YOUNG MAN IN A FIT —AND A YOUNG MAN WITHOUT AN INSIDE.

Three individuals have become the victims of intemperance in this district: one a person of some property. Another, a young man, was in the act of tossing for a pint of porter at the bar of a public-house, when he was seized with a fit, and uttering an oath, fell, and expired in a few hours after. A third, a young man also, whose medical attendant stated, that he had no inside left, the whole being consumed by brandy.

R. HODGSON.

EAST SMITHFIELD.—No. V.

AN ASSISTANT MISSIONARY.

On re-visiting J. H.—, who had become a teetotaler, the missionary asked him if he had kept his pledge; "Yes," he replied, "and we have redeemed our clothes from the pawnbrokers, amounting to £11, and have a sovereign left, after laying in provision for the week." "Yes," too, said the wife, "and I wish we had never seen the drink, it has caused me to shed many a tear, but thank God it is altered; there is a vast difference now, to what it was formerly, when my husband used to come home intoxicated, without hat, coat, shoes, or even a shirt, all of which, he would make away with for drink." They now attend a place of worship, and the husband is endeavouring to spread the principle. The other Sabbath morning, the missionary met him taking a drunkard to a coffee-shop, to induce him to sign the pledge, and he succeeded.

THE CAT'S-MEAT MAN REGAINED.

On passing down Ratcliff-Highway, saw a crowd of women outside a gin-palace; one of whom was upsetting a cat's-meat man's barrow, the owner of which was detained inside the public-house, by another party. The contents of the barrow being deposited in the street, a number of hungry dogs quickly assembled, and each taking a portion, were seen hurrying away in every direction. The man presently made his appearance, quite intoxicated, and attempting to re-place the little that remained of his stock, fell over his barrow, and tumbled about, in such a ludicrous manner, that the whole place rang with the laughter of the by-standers. At length, with some assistance, he gathered up the fragments that lay scattered about, and proceeded towards his home. The missionary followed and obtained his address. The next day the missionary visited him, and took the opportunity of pointing out to him the folly of his present conduct, and the benefits of total abstinence. He replied, "that he had been a teetotaler seven years, but through the influence of a young man, with whom he was acquainted, he had broke his pledge, and had scarcely been a day sober during the last month; and had not put on a clean shirt, nor washed himself, the whole time, and had made away with every thing, and his life was truly miserable." The missionary exhorted him to try again, and to break off the company of those who were leading him to ruin; he then signed. He has been re-visited several times, and remains firm.

SHIPPING—THE "SPRING RISE."

Went on board the Spring Rise, and addressed the mate and crew upon the importance of their becoming total abstainers. After much conversation, the mate and two of the men signed the pledge.

THE "FAME"—I CAN REFUSE NO LONGER.

The missionary then proceeded to the Fame, when the captain said, there were seven men on board, and that six out of the seven, were teetotalers. The missionary then addressed the one who was not, and urged him to imitate the example of his mates; when he replied, "I can refuse no longer," and then signed.

A HISTORY OF THIRTY-FIVE YEARS.

Met with J. H. and his wife, both of whom were intoxicated. The missionary succeeded in obtaining the signature of the latter, and endeavoured to get the husband also to sign; but the wife replied, "that she knew it was of no use, as he was such a terrible drunkard, and that several persons had tried to prevail upon him to sign, but to no purpose." The missionary called again the next morning, and after listening to his history of thirty-five years' intemperance, succeeded in inducing him to sign; they have been visited several times, and both remain firm to their pledge, and constant in their attendance at a place of worship.

A WINE-COOPER SIGNS.

Saw H.B., a wine-cooper, when in a state of intoxication, insulting a respectable female. The missionary interfered and afterwards offered to conduct him home, to which he consented; he signed the pledge. He has been re-visited many times, and continues faithful, regularly attending a place of worship.

THE BAR.

On opening the door of a public-house, observed a number of persons standing at The Bar, most of them in liquor. The missionary observing one (a female, more decent than the rest) amongst them, beckoned, when she came out. On speaking to her on the sin and danger of frequenting such places, said, "that she was the wife of a respectable tradesman, but that he had separated from her, on account of her habits of intoxication." She wept during this recital, and expressed her wish to reform; she signed the pledge. Before leaving the public-house door, several other individuals came out, each of whom were addressed by the missionary, when three of them were induced to sign; one of whom was a brick-layer's labourer, who said, "that drink was nothing but a destroyer, and had robbed him of his last shilling; but he trusted the publican would get no more out of him."

THE KNIFE AND THE TEETH.

J. W., a young man who is employed in distributing handbills, for different tradesmen, said, "that he had read the tract, Keep away from the Public-house, which the missionary had given him, with much interest, and was fully satisfied that nothing short of teetotalism would do for him and his wife. The other day she came home intoxicated, a quarrel arose, when she took up a knife, and seizing him by the shirt front, would have stabbed him, but he fortunately caught her hand, and wrested the knife from her, when she bit his hand, as you may see, (showing the missionary the marks of her teeth;) but I have been a harder drinker, even than my wife. I have had many good situations, but lost them all through drink, and often have wanted bread. I am now glad to distribute handbills for a living;" he then with great earnestness signed the pledge, requesting the missionary to try to get his wife to sign also. The missionary has visited the wife several times, but hitherto to no purpose. The husband, nevertheless, remains firm.

W. STONEMAN.

WESTMINSTER, NORTH-EAST.—No. VI.

THE COMPANY OF OLD COMPANIONS DANGEROUS.

Gave tracts, and addressed a group in B—W—Street. One man, with a broken nose, said, "ah, master, I would give anything to become a teetotaler—my nose would have been whole, but for drink—my home more comfortable—my mind more happy—and my pocket better filled." He was advised immediately to "become a teetotaler;" he signed.

Another of the company, who had been a teetotaler, said, "he broke his pledge by one of his old companions throwing him on the ground, and pouring some gin down his throat, by force; this led to drinking again. When a teetotaler, he said he was happy, and prospered in his business; but since he had gone back, he had lost his business, pawned and sold nearly the whole of his furniture, and was now lame, from a hurt he received when intoxicated; he signed, has been visited, and found firm.

VISIT TO THE POLICE COURT.

Visited the Police-court, and gave tracts to the prisoners and others. J—P—, a young man, aged twenty-six, was there on a charge of drunkenness; he said it was the first time of being brought before a magistrate. Twelve months ago, he lost a situation which he held under government, which brought him in £50 per ann. His father died a few years ago, and left him an estate, which he sold, and spent all the money.* I have still a good situation; nevertheless, I am miserable, the clothes you see on me, shabby as they be, are all I have. It is the custom at the public-house where I lodge, to have, on the Sunday, a quart of beer each, for dinner. On Sunday last, having drank that, myself and another sent for a gallon each, and before we had drank it, I began to quarrel with the landlord, and was going into the street to fight, when the policeman came and took me to the station-house, to settle which, I am here to-day;† he signed the pledge.

THE TEETOTAL STICKS.

J—S—, living in a back attic, furnished, (if it may be so called) at 3s. 6d. per week, said, he was by trade a hairdresser, and had been in good business; but his drinking had made a complete wreck of him, and he had deprived his family of a comfortable home. For the last seven years, he had cared neither for wife nor family, for past, present, or future, but how he could get the pot filled. He was now completely destitute; his pale and haggard countenance giving striking evidence to the truth of his statements,† his wife also confirming it, and adding, that they could not attend a place of worship for want of clothes; it was painful to her to see other people going, as she had been once accustomed to do, but was now prevented; she, however, declined signing, saying, she had no occasion, for she was never a drunkard, but was very glad her husband had signed. In the course of several re-visits, the missionary was gratified to find, that he had purchased a bed, table, chairs, and other household goods, and moved from his ready-furnished lodgings, to an apartment furnished by himself. Pointing to the furniture, he emphatically remarked, these are teetotal sticks, and I hope soon to be in a shop, and resume my own business.‡

A THIRD WOMAN'S REASON FOR NOT SIGNING THE PLEDGE; OR, THE OLD ANTIDOTE TO TROUBLE.

In answer to some remark on the subject of total abstinence, Mrs. M., the wife of ——— observed, that she had two sons at sea, and was frequently troubled on their account; to obtain relief, she was accustomed to take a little gin, therefore should decline signing the pledge; but if the missionary would sit down, her husband, who was a schoolmaster, would soon be in, and she thought he would sign. In a few minutes he arrived, who, on the subject being mentioned, expressed his concurrence and his readiness to sign.§

THE ARMY A POOR REFUGE.

W—G—, a drunken soldier, residing at present in G—P—Street, on being advised to abstain, said, he was afraid if he became a teetotaler it would prove injurious to his health. The missionary replied, that teetotalism was calculated both to improve health and prolong life. He said, he was now twenty-nine years of age, and had followed drinking and fighting ever since he was a lad; five years ago, when in a drunken fit, he entered the army, since which, he had suffered greatly from drinking, but would now reckon he had drank his last pot; he signed the pledge.

SUNDAY EVENING LABOURS—TESTIMONY.

Called on M—W—, in G—P—Street, who

* Why not have taken the landlord too?—SUPERINTENDENT.

† The husband here signed.

‡ Get his self-denying wife to sign; for, if she continues to drink her half-pint, she will soon have her husband filling his pot again.—SUPERINTENDENT.

§ Here are two instances (one following the other) of wives preferring their husbands taking the pledge, rather than themselves. Is it in the sense of Rom. xii. 10?—Ibid.

with his wife, have been teetotalers six years. Previous to that time, the husband was a drunkard, spent all his money, neglected his business, and sold his clothes (including his shoes) for drink. He is now much improved in person and circumstances, has a good business, with several men in his employ, and regularly attends a place of worship. Two youths who were present, the one 17, the other 18, signed the pledge.

TESTIMONY TO THE VALUE OF THE MISSION—AN AGED WIDOW SIGNS.

As the missionary was addressing a family in L—yard, an aged widow sitting at the end of the room, said, I wish I was a teetotaler. Being asked why, she replied, because I should then be comfortable. I have an income of a pound a-week, which, instead of making me happy makes me miserable; for, when I take my money, some of my friends (?) entice me to the public-house, when I become intoxicated, and get robbed of my money.* Being told she could get rid of her nominal friends, and her misery too, by signing the pledge; she replied, "Can I sir? then I will, I have wished many times I knew where to go that I might sign, and now it has pleased the Almighty to send the means to my very house."†

FRANCIS COLLINS.

PICKLE HERRING AND SHAD THAMES.—No. VII.

POLICE COURT—TRADES CONNECTED WITH THE TRAFFIC A HINDERANCE.

The missionary received a note from the superintendent, informing him that a tradesman in — Street had the day previous summoned his wife before the magistrate at the — Police Court, for a violent assault; but the latter conceiving there was no prospect of their living happily together again, recommended they should part. The superintendent had desired that the missionary should lose no time in visiting them, and endeavour to bring about a reconciliation. The missionary called as directed, and saw the husband, (the wife being absent,) to whom he stated the object of his visit. The husband said, that he did not know where his wife was, and that to attempt to obtain her signature to any pledge would be quite a hopeless task. On the missionary expressing a great anxiety to see her, he said, that she would be at the Police Court in —, on Wednesday, at two o'clock. The missionary attended at the office, and heard all the particulars of the sad affair. Another magistrate, now presided, and fortunately for the object of the missionary, took a different view of the case, recommending them to go home and be reconciled to each other, and to this end adjourned the case for a fortnight. The missionary visited them at their own habitation, when the husband said it was of no use:—"yours," says he, "is quite an hopeless case." The wife seeing the missionary, asked him to come into the parlour, and after a friendly conversation, during which they were both urged to put away, for ever, the intoxicating cup, which according to their own confession, was the cause of all their differences. The wife immediately signed the pledge, and wished her husband to do the same, but he declined, in consequence of his business, (for being a tobacconist, most of his customers were publicans.) The husband is a Wesleyan, and the wife a member of the Baptist Church. The missionary has called several times, and they appear perfectly reconciled.*

POLICE OFFICE AGAIN—THE TESTIMONY OF TWO CHELSEA PENSIONERS.

The missionary distributed tracts amongst a number of pensioners who had come to the office to have their affidavits signed. He endeavoured to shew them the advantages of teetotalism, and urged them to sign the pledge. You say right, said one of them, I have proved the principle for six years, and am now, in consequence, possessed of more than £200. I was a drunkard for many years, and then the publican had most of my pension; but now I take care of my own family. I am also a teetotaler, said another, and have also felt its benefits.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

The missionary was addressing a group upon the advantages of teetotalism, when a woman said, you have spoken the truth, for a daughter of mine, who in consequence of the drunkenness of herself and husband used to live in poverty, but now they are teetotalers, they have a prosperous business, and several cows, and have taken my son to live with them. I think now, (observed the missionary) you should join them yourself. I know I should, she replied, and after a little reflection she signed the pledge.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS—BRIGHTON.

Arriving at Brighton, the missionary visited several families, inviting them to a public meeting about to be held on the Stein, where addresses were delivered at two o'clock, &c.—a considerable number, all of whom were very attentive.

A RE-SIGNATURE—GRATITUDE.

The missionary called upon a man, who, though once a drunkard, had become a teetotaler and an advocate, but had broken his pledge. He was grateful to think he was not quite deserted, and that a person from London should take the trouble to call upon him; he signed the pledge, and three of his children. His wife is ill, she promised to sign shortly.*

BILLINGSGATE AND TOWER.—No. VIII.

A RE-SIGNATURE.

On appealing to a number of labouring men upon the necessity of sober habits, a working man observed, that he had been a teetotaler for five years, and was then comfortable and happy; but during a time of excitement he broke his pledge. All his family are still teetotalers. The missionary advised him to retrace his steps, that he might recover his former privileges; he then signed.

MICHAEL AND HIS WIFE; OR, THE CHALLENGE ACCEPTED.

Seeing a sailor (who was then sober) in company with several drunkards, the missionary spoke to him, and requested him to go home and not to keep bad company. An aged man came up and said, that is my son, he has come off a long voyage, and we have been having a drop together. The missionary told them they had better be teetotalers. I was a teetotaler once, replied the old man, but unfortunately I broke my pledge, and have had no luck since. You must sign again, said the missionary. Well, I think so too—what (do you say, mistress, (turning to his wife). I'll join when you do, Michael, replied the wife. Then here goes, and I hope to keep it, I have no more drink after to-day; they both signed the pledge. The son declined.

A COLLEGE EDUCATION NO PROOF AGAINST DRUNKENNESS.

A minister of the gospel from the country called upon the missionary and requested him to inquire into the particulars of a young man who was brought up at College, and was an officer in the army, but who had for some time been a regular drunkard. He stated that his friends had done all they could to make him sober, and were now tired of helping him; but that if he could be persuaded to adopt teetotalism, they might then* be induced to assist him. The missionary called upon him, and after some conversation, he appeared humbled on account of his former conduct, and was thankful for the trouble which was taken to try and restore him to his former position in society; he signed the pledge, and has to the present hour proved faithful. Could not some means be devised to find temporary employment for new converts, until regular situations were found for them?

* Her being ill, we should have thought was the stronger reason for her signing then.—SUPERINTENDENT.

J. H. DONALDSON.

PORTMAN MARKET.—No. IX.

A PROVIDENTIAL VISIT, AND ANOTHER PROOF OF THE IMPORTANCE OF MISSIONARY LABOUR.

G—R—, through drink became reduced and embarrassed in his circumstances; he in consequence made up his mind to dispose of his business, and had determined to do so on the evening of the missionary's visit. After a short conversation, he said, that he was convinced that nothing would preserve him but total abstinence; he then signed the pledge; a sister immediately followed. He has kept his business, remains firm, and a brother who was also a drunkard has followed their example.

ABILITY TO READ AND WRITE NO SECURITY.

P. S. B— of Little G— street, has long earned a good living, but hitherto squandered it on drink; he has deprived himself of all decent clothing, and has often had no other lodging than a damp cellar. He would have been well provided for, if it had not been for his drinking habits. He can read and write well, and acknowledged that his scholarship was an aggravation of his folly; he signed the pledge.

AN APPROPRIATE USE OF TEETOTAL SAVINGS BY A LITTLE GIRL.

A little girl, whose signature the missionary obtained a few weeks ago, was re-visited; she had kept her pledge, and her mother (as an encouragement) has allowed her a penny-a-day (the cost of the beer,) which she has saved, and entered a club, under the management of some friends of the poor in the neighbourhood. At Christmas she will receive the amount deposited, to be laid out on articles of clothing, or in any other way the parents may see most to her advantage.

THE CONTRAST.

When H— of R— Place, was for two years a teetotaler, his wages were beneficially expended, and his family were comfortable; but he broke his pledge, and since then, he brings home very little money, and his wife is compelled to go out to work, to provide something for the family. One of the children, who signed when the father did, remains firm, and another has now signed.†

ANYTHING BUT SIGN.

R— K— has been a drunkard to the misery of her family. When the missionary called, she listened attentively, and then said, she would give abstinence a trial. She accordingly signed; her husband was much pleased at her doing so, and gave a penny for a card, but would not sign himself;‡ because in his trade of hawking he had often to go to public-houses.

TESTIMONY OF A MINISTER.

Conversing with a minister on total abstinence, he remarked, that he sometimes takes wine after preaching, but not invariably, and that experience assures him that, abstinence from that indulgence is decidedly preferable, he being always better when he does not take it.

W. DRUMMOND.

BANKSIDE, SOUTHWARK.—No. X.

DRINK—THE THEATRE, AND RUIN.

G. H., a young man, (a shoe-maker by trade,) was met with on a re-visit to a reformed drunkard. Drink and the theatre has brought him to ruin. He there became acquainted with a young woman, a dancer at low concerts, and of loose morals. At length they were married. They lived unhappily, and she has now left him; he signed the pledge. The missionary then exhorted him to avoid bad company, to flee the theatre, and to follow his trade. He has been visited and remains firm.

DRINKING-CUSTOMS NOT INSUPERABLE.

C., an Irish labourer, was asked by the missionary if there were any teetotalers working where he was employed.

C. Yes; there is one.

M. How does he manage when fines and footings are paid?

C. He gets on very well; he takes no part in them.

M. Then he saves that expense?

C. Yes.

M. Will you sign the pledge and try teetotalism for yourself?

C. I am not prepared for that quite yet; has K. signed?

M. Yes; and so has F., (referring to two young men who that morning had taken the pledge).

C. Indeed! they are both companions of mine. Will you call upon me on Sunday morning, when I shall be better able to tell you about it?

The missionary called accordingly, when C. (with evident pleasure) said, that his two companions had continued firm to their pledge; and as he was satisfied he could do without drink, he would sign too.

The missionary in parting gave him suitable advice and several useful tracts to distribute in the country where he was going the next morning to work.

TEETOTALISM, A DIFFUSIVE AND NOT A SELFISH PRINCIPLE.

A young man, named K. L., came into a house where the missionary was visiting, and on being spoken to on the subject of teetotalism, declared his intention of leaving off his drinking-habits, as he was confident they were doing him no good; he then signed the pledge. Afterwards he begged the missionary would call on a companion of his who had expressed a desire to be a teetotaler. The missionary called and found him at home; and on his being made acquainted with the object of the visit, confessed he was a drunkard, but was tired of the drinking system: he had recently received severe injuries from drunken frays (his face giving evidence of the fact); he then signed, thanking both the missionary and his friend.

THEY LIKE THE TRACTS BUT NOT THE PLEDGE.

A woman, living in P— Place, said that a person living in E— Street, who was visited on Sunday, had brought a tract the missionary had left to show her; when she expressed a desire for it, it was "such a nice one," but the owner would not part with it on any account. She then entreated the missionary to give her one like it, as she wanted it particularly for her son, who is a sailor; not one of the women would sign.

THE DRUNKEN WIFE, OR NO FIRE, NO FOOD, AND NO HOUSE SWEEPED.

Visited a hawker in E— Street, who, contrary to his usual custom, kept the missionary at the door. After some conversation relative to his own drinking-habits, he said his greatest trouble was his wife. Often when he came home he found the door locked, no fire, no food prepared, no house swept, and his wife at the public-house "blind drunk." This often led him to drink; he was quite tired of it, and unless an alteration took place in his wife's habits, he should either leave her, or in his excitement do her some serious mischief. The wife at this moment came in: she was much disfigured from blows and falls received while intoxicated: she had had her nose broken, her two eyes were black, and her cheek was bruised and discoloured. The missionary went in and sat down; her husband apologizing for not asking him in before, saying, he was ashamed on account of his wife having the day before stripped the place of almost everything to pledge for drink. The wife acknowledged her fault, and appeared to feel the evil and the danger of the course she was pursuing; after some further conversation, she signed the pledge.* She has been visited and continues firm.

J. S. WARREN.

SOMERS TOWN.—No. XI.

THE DRUNKEN WIFE—THE STATION-HOUSE, AND THE MISSIONARY.

J. M., a drunkard, the wife of a sober, industrious man, who has been some time a teetotaler, having taken the pledge, especially for his wife's sake, but in vain, she having gone on from bad to worse, neglecting her family, stripping them of everything, to satisfy her unnatural cravings for drink. In her last drunken fit, being very abusive, she was given in charge to the police, taken to the station, and locked up for the night, where the missionary found her on the following morning; after a conversation of some length, she was induced to sign the pledge. The missionary has re-visited her several times, and found her firm.

A GROUP OF WOMEN—ONE WISE.

On addressing a group of women, opposite a gin-shop, (the landlord standing at the door) all, except one, railing at the system, taking the old ground (it is only fit for the drunkard); the missionary finding it impossible to induce them to give the subject a dispassionate hearing, appealed to the one before alluded to, as to her view of the subject; who promptly replied, and confirming the missionary's statement, by saying, that none think of becoming drunkards, when they first commence drinking, but are led into it insensibly, and often against their own resolutions; therefore, I think with you, that it is the safest side not to drink any; she then cheerfully signed the pledge.

BROKEN LIMBS DO NOT CURE DRUNKENNESS.

On introducing teetotalism to a poor destitute looking woman, in nearly an empty garret: she replied, I wish my husband had been a teetotaler months ago, then he would not have had both his legs broken, which occurred in a drunken quarrel, in consequence of which, he was a long time in Middlesex Hospital; while there, he made many resolutions against drinking; but on coming out, his old companions got hold of him, and he again became a drunkard. On the missionary inquiring if she herself was practising total abstinence, she said no; but it was seldom she tasted any. After a little conversation, she signed, wishing the missionary to call on her husband the next Sunday, which he did, and found him at home. He lamented his past conduct, listened attentively to the remarks made by the missionary, and finally signed the pledge.

* Query, whether the husband's chief trouble did not arise from there being "no fire, no food prepared, nor house swept." He will soon have his "wife troubling him" again, if he does not himself sign the pledge. Let him also read the "Testimony of a Hawker," in the May number.—SUPERINTENDENT.

STREET LABOURS—THE CHURCH—DRINK—AND TEETOTALISM—A CHRISTIAN WOMAN.

W. R. was met by the missionary in the street, in a state of intoxication, was once in respectable circumstances, and a member of a Christian Church, but fell, through drink and was consequently expelled: he has now been a drunkard for the last twelve years. In tears, he asked the missionary to call at his house, adding, my wife will be glad to see you, she is a Christian; I wish I was like her. The missionary (after having disposed of another case) called, and found a very intelligent pious woman; after reasoning and praying with her on the subject of teetotalism, was desired to call again. The missionary called, and after an affecting interview with her and her husband, they both signed the pledge, the wife overcome with joy at the thought of her husband giving up the drink.

MODERATE-DRINKING WOMEN, SHOULD NOT GO INTO A GIN-SHOP TO DRINK CIDER.

On the missionary passing a gin-shop, his attention was arrested by a scuffle between three women, one a drunkard, and the other two moderate drinkers. The party who was drunk was attempting to drag one of the other women (who appeared quite respectable) back into the gin-shop, from which they had a few minutes before emerged. After some considerable labour, the missionary was enabled to extricate her from the grasp of the drunken woman, and to persuade her, with the other individual, who was her friend, to leave the place. The friend stated, that they had both come from Kentish Town, and were going to the City, and feeling thirsty, they went into the above gin-shop, and ordered a glass of cider; as soon as they were seated, the drunken woman referred to, sat down by their side, and began to profess great friendship for her new companion; and to show her esteem further, insisted on treating her with some liquor, which had such an immediate effect upon her, that her friend suspected there was something wrong, and persuaded her to go outside, where the missionary found them as described. After a lengthened conversation, the two moderate-drinkers signed the pledge, and expressed themselves thankful.

A GROUP—THE YOUNG—DRINK—DEGRADATION AND MISERY.

Addressing a group, and giving a tract to a respectable young man, amongst them; he remarked, it is quite true, what you have said, young as I am, I have felt the degradation and misery connected with drink, and it has, moreover, made my home wretched; he signed the pledge.

W. CLARIDGE.

MISCELLANEOUS.

IS THE USE OF INTOXICATING DRINKS ALWAYS MORALLY WRONG?—To tell men in all circumstances, that they are doing what is morally wrong, or sinful, in using intoxicating beverages, is felt to be a fallacy, and in many cases excites prejudice to further inquiry, or provokes dissent; it must do harm, but can, I conceive, do no good. Rational men change their conduct, not from blind denunciation, or harsh names being applied to them, by, it may be, earnest and zealous, yet mistaken advocates,—but from conviction. They require that REASONS and PERSUASIVES shall be supplied to their intellectual and moral nature. Let us then, be content with a true but firm and fearless declaration of the duty of inquiry, and the obligations of a corresponding practice—and with showing WHY teetotalism is good, and drinking bad. Then, and not before, shall we have shown the world, not that it is, but why it would become, morally wrong in men to drink. That a practice which is proved to be physically wrong, cannot be morally right, is a proposition which all will admit to be true.—Dr. F. R. Lees.

THE CIRCASSIANS.—A writer in Colburn's Monthly Magazine, (Walter d'Arcy, Esq.,) in describing the manners and customs of these renowned mountaineers, observes—“In their food the Circassians are very temperate, even in their own homes, where they might be expected to indulge themselves a little. Wine is seldom drank, and spirituous liquors almost entirely avoided.”

THE HABIT OF DRINKING.—The habit of drinking is rarely acquired from the mere gratification offered by it to the palate, or the pleasures of intoxication. It is the creature of conventional usages. Working men invited each other to drink at markets and fairs, as the higher classes of England formerly did at their tables, because it was the custom, and a sign of hospitality and good fellowship. The custom is now destroyed; intoxication no longer receives the countenance of opinion—drinking as a vice must henceforth be individual, it cannot be national.—Westminster Review.

WHAT IS A DRUNKARD?—A drunkard is an annoyance of modesty, the trouble of civility, the caterpillar of industry, the tunnel of wealth, the alehouse benefactor, the beggar's companion, the constable's trouble, the woe of his wife, the scoff of his neighbour, his own shame, a walking swill-tub, the picture of a beast, the monster of a man.—Dr. Dodd.

THE WINE GLASS.

Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow!
Who hath contention? Who hath wounds without cause?
Who hath redness of eyes?
They that tarry long at the wine! They that go to seek mixed wine! Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the CUP; when it moveth itself aright;
AT the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.

THE SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.

The National Temperance Advocate for September, contains an able Address to the members of the British Legislature on the subject which heads this article. That Address produces statistical evidence of the good results which followed the passing of the Act commanding the closing of public-houses in London and Liverpool, during part of the Sabbath-day; and then proceeds to reply to one or two objections against the proposed alteration of that law.*

The form of petition, with other information, will be found in another part of the Chronicle.

For ourselves, we cannot conceive of any argument against the entire closing of drinking houses on Sunday, which has not equal weight when urged against the partial system at present adopted.

We are disposed to grant, that some apparently strong objections might be presented against an attempt to interdict the licensing of places to sell intoxicating liquors at all; but we are unable to suppose, that the suggested extension of the "Improvement Act," will be opposed by any individuals who can lay legitimate claim to the characters of Patriots, Philanthropists, or Christians.

That a vast amount of evil still exists, arising from Sunday-drinking, no one can deny; and that good has resulted from the closing of public-houses in London, Liverpool, and Manchester, certain hours on the Sabbath, all must admit: we would, therefore, simply ask—Why should not all mere public-houses and beer-shops, in all the cities, towns, villages, and hamlets of the kingdom, be closed during the whole of the Sabbath? Is an experiment which has succeeded so well among the inhabitants of towns, not worth trying among the inhabitants of villages? Or, are our villages so sober and pure, that such a legislative enactment is uncalled-for?

It is unnecessary to adduce proof to the contrary. Sunday, alas! is regarded by masses of our rural population, only as a day, on which they are at liberty to run to a greater excess of riot than on the other six days of the week. The beer-shop is more frequented than the sanctuary; there, vice and profanity abound; there, the young are taught to sit in the seat of the scornful, and to hear the Sacred Name blasphemed and treated with contempt. Beer-shops are moral pest-houses every day; on the Sabbath they are pre-eminently the receptacles and fomentors of all that is disgraceful and vile. It is our solemn conviction, that legislative interference is as much needed for our rural districts, as for our larger and more populous towns.

This question is not one merely of temperance; it is one of morals, and demands, therefore, the consideration of all the friends of humanity. But though not solely a temperance question, we are nevertheless persuaded, that if anything practical is to be effected, the supporters of the total abstinence cause must do it.

* The Act referred to was passed in the year 1839, and originally included only the metropolis, but was afterwards extended to Liverpool and Manchester.

No small demonstration has been made already. Several hundreds of petitions having the signatures of nearly 200,000 persons were presented to the House of Commons during the past session; but their object was two-fold, and in this consisted their weakness.

Let the present movement be directed to one object. Others will follow in the wake. The subject of Sunday-trafficking in strong drink must precede. Let our aim be undivided, and we doubt not, that it will be successful.

The two hundred thousand signatures, which were the result of previous exertions animate us to renewed activity. The season, too, is opportune; winter (the best part of the year for engaging in this work) is approaching—parliament will not probably assemble till about the beginning of February, so that full three months are allowed us. THE PERIOD FOR ACTION HAS ARRIVED: let us seize the opportunity. Let every Society and every Committee act, and act promptly. Let not the effort be confined to England—let it extend to Scotland and to Ireland. Let the Editors of all temperance publications write vigorously upon the subject;—let temperance advocates speak forcibly upon it;—let Ministers of all sects and denominations urge upon the members of their churches to stay the awful Sabbath desecration;—let the Editors of all newspapers and periodicals—religious, literary, and political, lay the matter impartially before their readers; and let all true lovers of mankind throw the weight of their signatures into the scale.

Let us agitate and agitate the question—and agitate it among all classes in the community; so that when the legislature does again assemble, thousands of petitions, supported by not less than Half-a-Million of signatures may attest the Will of the people. Let the spring of 1846 be a period most illustrious in the annals of temperance.

When the cry of triumph comes, as we earnestly trust and expect it will—that groggeries and rum-stores are legally annihilated in the Empire State of the American Union, (the city of New York excepted);—may a shout be raised in return, which shall roll from John O'Groat's to Land's End, and from Malin's Head to Cape Clear—which shall be wafted over the blue waves of the Atlantic—resound along the shores of the Western Hemisphere—and be heard in the distant wilds of Oregon and Texas; and may that shout be this—THE SUNDAY TRAFFIC in intoxicating liquors has been WHOLLY ABOLISHED in the United Kingdom, by the exertions of the friends of Temperance and Universal Philanthropy!

LEGACIES AND DRINK.

It is a melancholy fact, that habits of dissipation and intemperance prevail so extensively among our working population. Not only are their earnings expended in strong drink, but money unexpectedly acquired, instead of being applied to useful purposes, is very often squandered, wasted, yea, worse than wasted, in the public-house and gin-shop. The bounty of friends in the form of LEGACIES is sometimes foolishly and madly made the means of pandering to a depraved and degrading appetite. The two following recent cases, selected from among numerous others of the same kind, will bear ample witness to the truth of this assertion:—

"A man, named Alfred Sawyer, a coal-porter, residing in Gravel-lane, Southwark, in passing along High-street, Borough, in a state of intoxication, suddenly reeled and fell into the road, when a carrier's cart went over him, and fractured both his legs. Sawyer, within the last few days, has received a legacy of £100, and since that time, himself and wife have been continually intoxicated. After the accident, he would not allow himself to be taken to the hospital, saying he was a gentleman, and could afford to be nursed at home."

"A man, named Thomas Pasfield, a porter, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having cut his own throat in a fit of drunkenness, or rather of madness, the result of drunken habits. The prisoner, it appeared, had been left a legacy of £60 or £70 by a relative a short time ago, and had never been sober down to the time at which he made the attack upon his own life, on the 7th of last July. His female child, a poor half-starved wretched-looking creature, aged about four years, had been dragging out a miserable existence with him in tatters in a garret in the neighbourhood of Tower-street. The prisoner, upon being asked what account he could give of himself, replied that he had been completely unconscious of what had happened; that he had some disagreement with a female relation, which put him out of sorts, and he took drink to get rid of the trouble; but what further took place he really could not say. He was remanded for further examination."

DRUNKENNESS NOT CONFINED TO THE POOR.

We have endeavoured, on several occasions, by extracting cases which have appeared in the public papers, to shew the fallacy of supposing that our national vice is confined to the poorer classes. Our readers will perceive by the following fact, that an Alderman does not always escape, even though he be an Alderman of the second commercial town in the Empire, and a member of the Town Council, and of the EDUCATION COMMITTEE! "On Thursday week," says the Liverpool Mercury, "Mr. Alderman R. S. Crook, a member of the Town Council, and of the Education Committee, was charged with being drunk on Wednesday evening, and assaulting police officer No. 271. He was fined ten shillings and costs."

TEMPERANCE MISSION IN FRANCE.

Friday, August 1st.—Engaged during the day in visiting the English vessels at Rouen; obtained the use of one, in which to hold a meeting on the afternoon of the Sabbath-day; spoke to one group, and at night, held a meeting at Eauplét; one signature.

Saturday, 2nd.—Visited the workmen on the line, also paid a second visit to the shipping, and found the undermentioned vessels sailing on teetotal principles.

The Isabel, of South Shields, Captain Drummond, three years.

The Bethesda, of Sunderland, Captain Jenner, three years.

The Industry, of Wales, Captain Hugh Jones, three years.

The Victoria, of South Shields, Captain Whittles, seven years.

Sunday, 3rd.—Held a meeting on the quarter-deck of the Elizabeth of Whitby, granted by the owner, Mrs. White; three persons signed the pledge, one of whom had been engaged in the sale of strong drink, but who pledged himself to discontinue the traffic. The meeting was well attended, and at the conclusion, a vote of thanks was passed to the owner of the vessel, for its use. In the evening, I met a few friends at Eauplét.

Monday, 4th.—Went by the Seine to Havre, and from thence to Harfleur; visited several families and spoke to several groups; held a meeting at night, which was well attended; 21 signatures were obtained, among them were several drunkards.

Tuesday, 5th.—Engaged in visiting the English families, also several English ships, among which, tracts were distributed, and gratefully received; held a second meeting at night, when six signed.

Wednesday, 6th.—Visited thirty English families, at Mirville, spoke to the workmen on the line, after which, held a meeting in the carpenter's shop; four persons signed the pledge.

Thursday, 7th.—Visited the whole of the British and American ships, 29 in number, at Havre; found several teetotalers on board, and in no case was the information in the tracts received with any other feeling than pleasure. At night, held the first temperance meeting at the Bethel Chapel, which was well attended; at the conclusion, five persons signed, one a lady, aged 73 years.

Friday, 8th.—At Pavilly; visited and spoke to several families and groups; held a meeting at night, in the English preaching-room; six signed the pledge.

Saturday, 9th.—Held a meeting in Wood's Brick Yard, near Barentin, when 18 persons signed the pledge, led on by the Contractor, Mr. Wood, and the whole of his family.

Sunday, 10th. Malaunay.—Visited the whole of the cottages of the British workmen; also held a meeting in the cottage of Mr. Matthews, the result of which, was seven signatures.

Monday, 11th. Rouen.—Spoke to several groups and visited ships; at night, held a meeting at Sotteville; three signed.

Tuesday, 12th.—Spoke to several groups on the railway; at night held a meeting in the English preaching-room, near Traversière; two signatures.

Wednesday, 13th.—Attended a meeting at Chartereux; the attendance good.

Thursday, 14th.—Meeting at Pavilly; four signed.

Friday, 15th.—The friends at Wood's brick-yard, near Barentin, being desirous of displaying their respect to our principles, resolved to have a festival. They accordingly made ample provision for the occasion; the workmen were assembled with their families; a room formerly occupied as a Caffé, was used for the purpose; it was decorated with flowers and evergreens; and after a plentiful supply of the good creatures of God, an excellent meeting was held, which was addressed by Mr. Mack and the missionary; two persons signed the pledge; at the conclusion, a vote of thanks was moved and seconded by two ladies, to the Committee of the National Temperance Society, and another to the Missionary.

Saturday, 16th, Malaunay.—Second meeting; three persons signed.

Sunday, 17th, Rouen.—Held a meeting by the kind permission of T. Brassey, Esq., under one of the railway tunnels; it was well attended by both English and French; two persons signed the pledge. At night, met a few friends at Sotteville.

Monday, 18th, Rouen.—Visited several English ships, held a meeting at Eaplét; one signed.

Tuesday, 19th.—Was on the road to Malaunay and Mirville, to hold a meeting, but was prevented by the dreadful hurricane and tempest, which overthrew the factories, and spread around death in every form of horror.

Wednesday, 20th, Harfleur.—Visited several families, held a meeting at night; four signatures.

Thursday, 21st, Havre.—Visited the English and American ships, and held the last meeting in France, at the Seamen's Chapel, when the Rev. E. E. Adams, of the American Church, signed the pledge, giving as a reason, that he felt bound to set an example to his people. The friends there, considered the signature of this respected gentleman a great acquisition.

ABSTRACT.

Residence in France, seven weeks.
Meetings attended and addresses given....	37
Visits to ships.....	53
Signatures; adults, moderate.....	100
Ditto drunkards.....	57
Ditto children under 13 years.....	11

Families, houses, and groups were visited, in all the eleven towns which formed the district, extending over 60 miles.

In quitting the scene of labour for my native land, I felt deeply thankful for the measure of success granted. Truly nothing could be worse than the moral condition of the English workmen on the French railroad. Receiving ample wages, varying from 4s. to 10s. a-day, according to strength and skill, their means are expended in the purchase of brandy; and the consequence is, that the hospitals and the prisons are full, and the gend'armes are constantly employed on the line, in keeping order among the English workmen. Their morals are worse than those of the French, for they have all the contempt for the Sabbath which belongs to that nation, and all the grossness which habits of intemperance produce.

Nearly all the sub-contractors and many English women are employed in vending spirits, in little shops, which they call Cafés, though coffee is a beverage seldom known in them.

Hopeless as this state of things appears, I am bound to say, that among the very worst people, I was heard with attention, and the tracts received with kindness; and some of the most depraved, signed the pledge.

It is gratifying to state, that there are some honourable exceptions to the general demoralization; a few staunch north-country teetotallers and eminently pious Christians, who are instant in season and out of season, to spread the knowledge of our principles, and to reclaim their wretched country people, who are disgracing our national character among the French.

Some of the Irishmen on the line, were staunch to the pledge they had taken of Father Mathew, and gave a good example to others.

[We hope to give Mr. Donaldson's Journal in our next.]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

INDIA.

A medical gentleman, lately arrived from the East Indies, in conversation with a member of the Executive Committee of the National Temperance Society, stated from his own personal observation, that the mortality in the hospitals of Calcutta was only 2 per cent. among total abstainers, while it was 10 per cent. among those who drank alcoholic liquors! This fact is peculiarly valuable at the present time, when the cholera is raging so extensively in India.

In a letter, we have recently received from Mr. G. Drago, Aqueduct Serjeant, Poona, near Bombay, an encouraging statement is given of the progress of temperance in the Indian army. The society of H. M. 22nd regiment at Poona, numbers 100 members. This is immediately after a harassing campaign of nearly seven months in the southern Mah-ratta country. The following passage affords proof however of the fact, that the effects of strong drink are the same in all quarters of the world.

"A petition to government," says Mr. Drago, "is in course of preparation for signature, beseeching that some energetic measures may be adopted to prevent the awful desecration of the Sabbath, now common on the island (Bombay). Hotels and taverns, where music and inducements of the most vicious kinds to intemperance are kept up through the whole of Sunday, are the chief resorts of 'sailors and soldiers upon leave,' and the most disgusting and demoralizing scenes are frequently enacted, disgraceful to the character of our nation. Many of these taverns are kept by Europeans, and have European musicians, &c.; and it may be readily conceived, how seriously this must injure the fair-fame of our Christian creed in a land of idolatry. Cannot a Brahmin, or a Parsee, who knows not the distinction between a real and nominal Christian, turn upon us and say, 'Would you propagate a faith that produces such results as these?'"

ARCOT.

Left Wing H. M. 57th Regimental Society.—On the march, the thermometer averaged 100° from 6 A. M. to 6 P. M. in tent, yet the teetotallers marched with ease, pitching their tents and performing fatigue-duties in camp with alacrity and cheerfulness.

Major Randolph, the commanding officer, paid the hire of a bandy which went in advance every evening, in order to have coffee and biscuit in readiness on arrival of the wing in the morning. The society has a commodious reading and coffee-room inside the barracks. Strength 80.

The half-yearly inspection took place on the 23rd ultimo, when Sir Major-General, E. K. Williams, K.C.B. and K.C.T. and S., commanding the centre division, visited our coffee-room; he was delighted with its appearance, and was pleased to express his approbation of the constitution, the publications on the reading table, and the object of the Association.

The Roman Catholics in the Wing have formed a branch society, and opened a reading-room, where coffee, &c., are furnished to members. Strength 38.

SIAM.

In an interesting letter, dated Bangkok, from the Rev. J. Caswell to the Rev. J. Marsh, Corres. Secretary of American Temperance Union, the writer gives the following melancholy picture of the effects of strong drink on the Siamese people.

"Ten years since, a drunken man was a rare sight here, except among the Indo-Portuguese. But since then, the enemy has come in like a flood, and now, drunken Siamese are exceedingly common,—so much so, that I much dread meeting a large company, even for the purpose of preaching the gospel to them, being almost sure to find a number in the different stages of intoxication; and I therefore fix my hour for preaching in the bazaar at 9 A. M., although I should be sure of having three or four times as many in the afternoon. There are thirty or more distilleries in the kingdom, all conducted by China-men. The owners of these distilleries pay an immense sum of money to the King for the privilege they enjoy, and it is for their interest to make and sell as much as they can. Thus the evil is rapidly and constantly increasing."

There is, however, some hope. Mr. Caswell remarks—"All the mission families are frequently visited by priests and noblemen who might be easily interested in the subject of temperance, had we but the right means. The priests are forbidden the use of intoxicating drinks, but most of them spend but a short time in the priesthood, say from one to five years. Could they be thoroughly enlightened while in the priesthood, we might hope much for them when they leave it."

PERSIA.

GREAT EFFECTS OF DR. SEWALL'S PLATES.

Oroomiah, Persia.

Letter from Rev. A. H. Wright to the Cor. Soc. of the American Temperance Union.

MY DEAR SIR,—In looking over some recent numbers of the Union, I noticed several communications from various parts of the world in relation to the drawings of the human stomach by Dr. Sewall, illustrating the pathology of Drunkenness. As those drawings, in their mammoth form were sent to us a year or more ago, and have been standing in my room since that time, where they have been exhibited to large numbers of people, both Mussulmans and Christians, I have had a good opportunity to witness their effect upon observers, and would add my testimony to their usefulness.

You may be aware, that this province is one of the richest and most fertile in Persia, and abounds in vineyards, which furnish grapes, raisins, doshap (a syrup like molasses), arak (a kind of strong drink), and last, but by no means least, wine. Wine being abundant, it is of course cheap. Enough can be bought for two or three cents, to make several persons very happy, if not very drunk. It is used almost universally by the Christian population, and very many of the Mussulmans transgress the law of their own prophet, and drink, not only habitually, but to great excess. The Jews also do the same, and more on their sabbath than on another day. As a consequence of this excessive use of wine, sickness, destitution, suffering and death, are common. In this state of things, one part of our missionary work is to set forth the evils of intemperance, and to urge upon the people the adoption of temperance principles, and to act upon them.

The mammoth plates have done, and are doing a good work. They are eloquent preachers of temperance, and in this distant land are useful missionaries. They are so large as to attract the attention of every one that comes into the room, and are so marked and distinct as to excite an interest. Persians from almost all parts of the country have seen them. Sometimes large companies have been called together, and seemed deeply interested in looking at them; and I have often noticed the countenance of some habitual drinker overcast with anxiety, as he observed the gradation of disease, ending in death; and in a multitude of cases they have exclaimed,—"I'll drink no more." How many have acted out their resolution, the Searcher of hearts only knows.

Mussulmans true in their faith and practice, often exclaim in looking at the plates, "You see how wise our Prophet was, to make the use of wine unlawful to his followers. The poor Nestorians especially, at this season of the year, are steeped in wine. They are oppressed by the Mussulmans, but more by intemperance. The friends of temperance have an immense work to do before they can say, 'our work is done.' They need to gird up the loins of their minds and make ready for a long warfare. Most truly yours,

A. H. WRIGHT.

HONG KONG.

"A medical friend has just called, to whom I read my remarks respecting the state of health during this season and last. I am happy to say, he entirely concurs with them, and says the mortality this year (apart from the army) is not above the same rate in Europe; and as he has a large practice none can know better. Among the causes of sickness, he thinks intemperance holds a prominent place, and unfortunately his opinion is but too well-founded. The number of low tipping-houses is large, and spirits are very cheap. Every day people may be seen reeling about under a burning sun, scarce able to stand, and the result is all attributed to the climate. Parties of from 50 to 100, are occasionally allowed to land from the ships in the harbour, with leave of absence for two days, during which they are not an hour sober; and in all probability, the great mortality in the army has some connexion with the same cause."—A letter from Hong Kong, descriptive of that colony, by a Resident.

"It appears from the above letter, that much sickness has prevailed, and indeed still exists in Hong Kong, though not to so great an extent. It also appears, that one of the chief causes of sickness—namely, intemperance, is in some degree removeable, and the effects of this evil are so frightful in so hot a climate, that there can be no doubt strenuous exertions ought to be made to abate it. To this painful subject the attention of all who take an interest in the well-being of our colonial fellow-subjects, and especially of those invaluable societies formed in this country for the promotion of temperance, is most earnestly requested. Surely, some means could be devised by them for the extension of their principles in that part of the world."—Additional particulars respecting Hong Kong.

THE JAMAICA RAILWAY.

"The Jamaica Railway was fully expected to be opened on the 1st of October. Not one of the English labourers had died, which was attributed to their abstaining entirely from drinking rum."—Patriot, September 11th.

GERMANY.

[Extracts from a letter from the REV. D. SELING, (the Father Mathew of Germany) to E. C. Delavan, Esq.]

"I have preached within eighteen months, besides before sundry assemblies in Protestant sections of the country, in sixty-four Catholic churches; in consequence of which, 20,000 men, over 20,000 women, and more than 20,000 scholars took the pledge of total abstinence from distilled ardent drinks, and with the prospect for these sixty-four parishes that there the aim of the societies may soon be entirely obtained. The number of societies in Germany increased within eighteen months, from 450 up to 730, and probably yet more, not including in this estimate, Upper Silesia and Posna. In Upper Silesia, where the evil was not less great than formerly in Ireland, began about one year ago the father Stephen Bezazawski, first timidly, and with a view to try, as he writes to me, to follow my example; and his trial succeeded so well, that already 300,000 men and women have taken the pledge, partly through him, partly through other clergymen. By Upper Silesia has the Grand Dukedom of Posna been so electrized, that there the entire Catholic clergy rose for it, like one man, preaching from all pulpits the abstinence, and already 100,000 have given their pledge. The number of Catholic parishes visited by me has now increased to seventy, and where I have not merely preached, but also taken pledges from the people, and the number of those that took the pledge from me, amount to 70,000. In Hildesheim, grew the already established society from the number of 1000 members to 3100. I received then further invitations from fifteen pastors of sundry townships, and from the cities of Brunswick, Bückeberg and Hameln. From Upper Silesia and Posna, we have most cheering news, as you may see by our April number of the Gazette. We have now 125 separate medical opinions, and a general one signed by 1055 German physicians, which receives still more names. The German Temperance Societies will hold their second General Convention in this year, probably at Berlin. The temperance cause becomes ever more universally and zealously advocated in Germany."

We are indebted to a biographical notice of Mr. Seling, given to Mr. Delavan by Mr. Rolker, a German merchant of New York, for the following interesting particulars respecting the German Temperance Reformer:—

"Mr. Seling is now a man of nearly fifty years of age. He is the son of a farmer in the neighbourhood of Osnabrück, and was sent by his parents—who had not the means to give him an education—when very young, to his uncle in Holland. He received there a good education, and attended the counting-room of his uncle, until Napoleon's invasion, when he was obliged to join the army. He was kept, however, in the expedition-bureau of the general as a secretary, with the title of sergeant. After peace was restored, a place as Lieutenant was offered to him, which he refused, in order to study at a University, and to prepare himself to receive the orders as clergyman. He went to Munster, and studied there under the, afterwards, celebrated Professor Hermes, whose philosophical system in theology he still embraces. After finishing his regular course in theology, he received the orders as clergyman in the Catholic Diocese of Osnabrück, and was engaged as a teacher in the college of the city, where he first introduced the study of the Greek language. He remained as a teacher about five years, when he was promoted to the place of chaplain in St. John's Church, which he still holds. In that capacity he profited of the opportunity to labour for the community at large, and in general. His aim was constantly the amelioration of the condition of the working-classes, and he established most successfully an association for flax-spinning, which gave employment to the poor, and principally to their children; besides that they were instilled with industrious habits. As soon as the temperance flag was raised, he became the zealous advocate of it, first, in the city of Osnabrück. His achievements are the more brilliant, as he lives in a community half Protestant, half Catholic, and he has won by his deportment, the love and esteem of both persuasions; a task, which but few have Christian love enough to solve. His activity, however, keeps pace with his enthusiasm, and his love for mankind is indeed exemplary. In Osnabrück, one has established his birth-day almost as a festival-day for all the citizens, which speaks best how much he is esteemed and loved."

SCOTLAND.

The following particulars are taken from the Sixth Annual Report of the WESTERN SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE UNION, as printed in the Journal of the "Union," for September.—Returns have been received from seventy-four societies, whose localities include a population of 600,000. The number of members is taken at 40,000. Fifty-five societies report the addition of upwards of 10,000 members, since May 1st of last year; and the return of violated pledges, within the same period, amounts to 1815 in forty-seven societies, equal to 1 in 4 of the members added. Forty-one societies have amongst them 933 reclaimed individuals. Of the ministers of religion within the sphere of the societies, 1 in 8 are members; of medical men, but 1 in 40. The number of shops where intoxicating liquors are sold, is as 2 to 3 where they are not sold, as reported by fifty-eight societies, exclusive of Glasgow. Only twenty-three societies state the number of those who have abandoned the traffic, averaging 5 for each society; twenty-five societies report 53 coffee-houses; fifty-nine report 1038 public meetings during the year; forty societies are assisted by 204 of their members in the public advocacy of their principles; upwards of 140,000 tracts have been circulated by fifty-five societies; and fifty-seven societies report an expenditure of £963 during the year now closed. Forty-two societies are stated to be progressing, sixteen stationary, and thirteen declining.

AGENTS' REPORTS.

R. GAMBLE.—BERKHAMSTEAD.

During the last two months, I have lectured twice at Ivinghoe, twice at Langley and Wingrave, also at Redbourn, Two Waters, Eaton Bray, Nash Mills, Downley, and other villages. The cause is progressing; and the temperance festivals have been the best attended, and the most respectable I have ever witnessed. Hartwell Park, West Wycombe Park, and St. Albans, were amongst the number; the latter admitted two thousand persons by ticket. At Nash Mills, the meetings are patronized by E. Longman, Esq., and his lady, who are most anxious for their workmen to join a temperance society. There are several teetotalers in the mills, some of eight or nine years' standing, who fully prove by their conduct, the fallacy of teetotalism lowering wages. Some few weeks since, two of their workmen lost three days' work to attend a fair; when they returned, they were discharged, but the wife of one, and the mother of the other, went to the proprietor to beg them in work again. They were received, but at reduced wages. I have let the working men know this far and wide. Our park-festivals have done much towards decreasing the attendance at village-fairs and feasts; quantities of young people of both sexes attend them; and in my visitations among the cottagers, I have been told that they like our teetotal fairs much the best. My attention has been of late, much directed to the workmen on the Wendover Branch of the Canal, several hundred of whom spend their money in that drink which unfits them for the enjoyments of social life. Tracts have been received by them, and more civility manifested than could be expected from them. I have paid them several visits, and received signatures. A much better feeling exists among farmers and others who employ the labouring poor—numerous instances have come to my knowledge, where money has been given instead of beer, both in the hay and corn-harvest. There are some villages, where my visits are looked for almost as regularly as their travelling tradesmen; and numbers are now acting upon those principles, which some time since they despised. I am now at Banwell, engaged for four weeks in the country—will write you an account thereof.

W. G. PEACE.—CORNWALL.

I have now laboured in this association twelve months, and am re-engaged for another quarter; and during my agency in this county, I have seen sufficient to warrant my reporting, that upon the whole, teetotalism never stood higher in the opinion of the thinking part of the community, or bid more fair to accomplish its important designs. At St. Ives, the cause is in a thriving and healthy state, though we have had to contend with a noisy opposition from those engaged in the traffic. During the last six weeks, one, and often two meetings have been regularly held, at which some two or three thousand persons have attended, and listened to the addresses delivered; as a consequence numerous signatures have been taken, and a fresh impetus to the cause imparted. Hayle Society is still keeping its high position, and infusing its spirit of genuine sobriety into the homes and families of the town. Camborne is steadily progressing, and its committee are actively engaged in agitating the principle. Tuckingmill, Truro, Redruth, and Penzance, are doing well, and good results are expected from the coming winter's campaign. During the past twelvemonth, I have taken at the meetings held, near 2000 signatures, and delivered 330 lectures, to audiences, comprising men of all grades and positions in society; and thus cheered by a retrospect of the past, I am encouraged to go forward, and trust, that the future will be still more successful.

The temperance societies in this county, have received a fresh impetus from the assistance of Mr. J. Passmore Edwards, who has travelled in the north of England, and lectured in most of the large manufacturing towns upon the temperance principles. He has lately returned for a short time, to visit his native county. He has lectured at Truro, Camborne, Redruth, St. Agnes, Hayle, Blackwater, and Penzance, at which places, the greatest interest has been excited, from his being the son of a brewer. His object is to expand the mind and elevate the intellect. In his lectures, he portrays teetotalism as a great moral and intellectual renovator, augmenting the happiness and welfare of the million.

EVAN DAVIES—FLINTSHIRE.

I have received several drawings from Dr. Lees of Leeds, illustrating the dreadful effects of alcohol on the human system. My lectures on the temperance cause are well attended, and many sign the pledge.

Since I last wrote, I have been at Alltmyled, Dyserth, Llandudno, and Colwyn, and expect shortly to lecture in Newmarket.

I may venture to state a few facts—our public-houses in general are great snares and dreadful nuisances. The Sabbath is most awfully profaned; it being the regular market-day of all the mean public-houses. The use of merely persuasive means is out of the question: publicans and drunkards cannot bear any light upon the subject, they will neither read nor attend lectures; nor, indeed can they bear the gospel, even where it is honestly, fully, and faithfully preached.

What is to be done? Can our friends in England give us any advice? Can any new regulations respecting public-houses be prepared before the next meeting of parliament? Can you, Mr. Editor, or any of your correspondents, take this matter into consideration?

WILLIAM EDWARDS—CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

Having been engaged by the Central Association for the last four months, I send you a brief account of my labours during the above period. I gave lectures at about 100 meetings, several of them tea-festivals, many of them were well attended, and the results have been very pleasing; about 493 signatures were taken, amongst whom were some of the most notorious drunkards. From the time I left home until my return, I travelled 1323 miles, visited many families, and gave away a very great number of tracts, with which I was amply supplied by that benevolent gentleman, G. S. Kenrick, Esq.

SURREY AND SUSSEX.

WILLIAM GAWTHORP'S JOURNAL.

Having been appointed by the National Temperance Society, to labour in the great cause of temperance, in the counties of Surrey and Sussex, I beg, through the medium of the Chronicle, to inform the temperance public concerning the success of my mission.

The object of my efforts in this district, is the formation of an organised association, similar to those established in other parts of the country. All the temperance friends in both counties are delighted at the prospect; and not only go, but enter heartily into the business of bringing it about, especially that devoted friend of the cause, Dr. Ferrier of Worthing, who is busily engaged collecting funds for that purpose.

The season of the year has been rather unfavourable for my commencement. The district is pre-eminently agricultural, and the people have been engaged in harvesting; yet, notwithstanding, we have had some meetings of a deeply interesting character. I have given public lectures at the following places, Croydon, Dorking, Kingston, Crawley, Horsham, East Grinstead, Lindfield, Cuckfield, Lewes, and Worthing. I have visited a great number of places in addition to those mentioned, to make arrangements, &c., &c., and am now arranging to give a lecture every evening. It would be very agreeable to give some details of circumstances that have occurred, and particulars of the meetings which have been held, but I prefer deferring doing so for my subsequent reports, and send you this as an introduction.

I would say to the temperance friends in both counties, lend us your unwearied and devoted energies for the next few months, in this glorious work, and we must succeed. It is true, obstacles are great, the enemy is strong, but truth, humanity and the well-being of our country, are on our side ; we are seeking to elevate the mass, to remove England's direst curse, and if we are faithful, we shall accomplish our object.

THE METROPOLIS.

Several meetings of more than ordinary interest have been held in the metropolis, during the past month ; one in the Temperance Hall, Carlisle Street, Marylebone, for the formation of a Temperance Loan Tract Society.

On Sunday the 21st, the Annual Sermon to teetotalers was preached by the Rev. J. Burns, in Enon Chapel, Portman Market. An able and earnest discourse was delivered to a very numerous assembly, from Eph. v. 11. "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." A collection was made in behalf of the Temperance Mission, amounting to £4. 0s. 6d.

A neat commodious chapel in Cole Street, Trinity Square, has, we are glad to learn, been taken for the advocacy of Temperance.

As the connexion between Temperance and Sunday School Tuition, is a subject of vital importance, the following information we are sure, will be read with much pleasure :—

JURSTON STREET SUNDAY SCHOOL.

(ONE OF THE SURREY CHAPEL SCHOOLS.)

Teachers' Meeting, July 29th, 1845.

"This meeting being of opinion, that the great extent to which the practice of indulging the appetite for strong drinks is carried in the vicinity of Jurston-street Sunday-school, tends very much to 'impair,' and in some instances, to 'NEUTRALIZE' the labours of the teachers, feels it therefore its duty to call the attention of the 'elder scholars and their parents,' to the subject of temperance, by holding occasional meetings in the school-room."

Dear Sir,—Having moved the above resolution, which I am happy to say was carried cheerfully and unanimously. I have thought by inserting it in the Chronicle, other persons might be induced to go and do likewise.—T. P. A.

P. S. Our superintendent and several teachers have become teetotalers. My two little boys are also teetotalers.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Extract of the Common Sergeant's charge to the grand jury.)

"The Middlesex list contained no less than twelve cases of cutting and wounding ; an offence which, he regretted to observe, was greatly increasing, not only within the jurisdiction of this court, but in almost every part of the country. It would be found that the majority of these offences resulted from drunkenness."—Times, August 19th, 1845.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

WHITEHAVEN.

DR. GRINDROD'S LECTURES.

(From the Whitehaven Herald.)

R. B. GRINDROD, Esq., LL.D., the esteemed and talented author of the celebrated prize essay, "Bacchus," commenced a series of lectures at the Theatre Royal, in this town, on Monday evening last, on the Physiological effects of alcohol on the human system, which, for soundness of argument, and deep pathological knowledge, have never been surpassed. Upwards of one hundred valuable and beautifully executed Physiological and Pathological drawings decorated the platform. Our attention was powerfully arrested by a clinical representation of a female drunkard in the last stage of dropsy—a gigantic drawing of the venous and arterial systems—an excellent painting of the intestinal canal, the head of a child suffering under hydrocephalus, and a number of drawings of the human stomach—some representing the healthy state, and others diseased by alcoholic stimuli. We also noticed several representations of the abdominal viscera, the brain and other parts of the human frame, which must have been got up by an artist skilful in his profession. The great obstacle to the elucidation of these subjects, to mixed audiences has hitherto been found in the technical phraseology in which the science is shrouded ; but to our surprise and admiration, these lectures were rendered so plain and intelligible by the learned doctor, that the meanest capacity could understand and appreciate them.

We understand that within the last twelve months no less than forty thousand persons have taken the pledge after the delivery of these lectures, including clergymen, ministers of various denominations, gentlemen of the legal faculty, and members of the medical profession. In Macclesfield alone, out of 30,000 inhabitants, not less than 4000 enrolled themselves members of the Teetotal Abstinence Association. The mass of evidence brought forward on these evenings, illustrated as they were by expensive and beautifully executed drawings, produced a deep and thrilling sensation on the minds of his hearers. At the conclusion of every Lecture the Doctor courted inquiry, like a man who would have given himself to purchase their consent to his doctrines. A few questions were put in writing, a mode of interrogating proposed by the doctor himself, to which answers were immediately given, and that with a tact and readiness which evinced much professional skill, and an urbanity of manner that marked the Christian, the gentleman and the scholar. Up to Wednesday evening the number of pledges made in this town by adult and juvenile persons of both sexes amount to about 700.

EAST GRINSTEAD.

We feel much obliged to the National Society, for sending Mr. Gathorp to lecture in this small and drinking town—it was the thing we needed. Mr. G. visited us on the 28th ult., and gave us a lecture in Zion Chapel, The Rev. W. Robinson, minister of the chapel, occupying the chair ; two other neighbouring ministers were also present. This was the first lecture ever delivered in this place of worship, on thorough temperance principles ; and although considerable prejudice existed in the minds of our religious friends against teetotalism, it is highly gratifying to know, that M. Gathorp's lecture gave general satisfaction. Should he pay us another visit, I believe the same place of worship will be at his service ; and I confidently expect a much larger attendance, both from the inhabitants of the town generally, and also from the religious public.

THOMAS CRAMP, Secretary.

SHEERNESS TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

September the 8th, Mr. Thomas Hudson delivered a lecture to a very respectable and attentive meeting of the friends of Temperance, on the evils arising from the use of intoxicating drinks, urging all present to show their love for their fellow-creatures, and sign the pledge.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE.

STATISTICS OF TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES IN ESSEX.

57

(To the Editor of the National Chronicle.)

SIR,—During my stay in the County of Essex, I endeavoured to glean statistics of different kinds, which I had designed, ere this, for insertion in the National Chronicle, but regret to state, that the promised assistance from some quarters has not been rendered; otherwise, a fuller return than the one now made, might have been furnished. The important towns of Cambridge,

Chelmsford, Colchester, Romford, Brentwood, and some others, are for this reason not included in the list now presented. This is the more to be regretted, as such a document was intended to give in a tabular form, a species of information, interesting at least, to the lover of facts. Yours respectfully,

THOMAS HUDSON.

ECCLES WAKES.

[In a communication which accompanied the following interesting information, our correspondent, Mr. Carpenter, states, "We have lately set on foot a Temperance Institute, at Besses-o'-th'-Barn, near Manchester. We rent two large rooms in an unoccupied warehouse. We have day, night, and Sunday-schools; teetotal meetings once a-week; lectures on Natural History, Science, &c., once a-week, with exhibitions of the Magic Lantern, or some amusing reading at the close; a reading-room supplied with books, newspapers, and periodicals, and a religious service on Sunday evenings, supplied by preachers of all denominations.]

In order to supply a counter attraction to the above demoralizing amusements, a Temperance Tea-Party was held, September 1st, in the Patricroft School Room, kindly lent for the purpose, by the Association Methodists. After tea, a public meeting was held in the Chapel, at which Holbrook Gaskell, Esq., presided. After a few introductory remarks, he called on Mr. P. P. Carpenter to give a brief statement of the object and views of the teetotalers.

The Rev. J. MARTINEAU of Liverpool, then addressed the meeting, much as follows:—"Being only a novice in teetotalism, and not a pledged member of the society, I feel that some apology is needed for my addressing you; and that like the catechumens in the early church, I ought rather to be a hearer in the porch, than a speaker on the platform. My excuse must be my sympathy with a movement which is doing so much good, a good, much wanted in our present state of society. Mr. Carpenter has complained of the influential classes keeping aloof from the movement, and the complaint is deserved to some large extent: but the blame is not all on one side. In reading the temperance periodicals, which must be regarded as the organs of the body, I have seen with pain a superstitious abhorrence manifested towards the substance, Alcohol, instead of directing that abhorrence towards the moral vice in the mind of the drinker. You cannot persuade old persons who have used these liquors with moderation all their lives, that there is anything in them so very horrid. I admit, that as a cure for enormous evils, teetotalism is necessary; so that for years I have adopted the practice in my own person and family. But others are driven away by such language. The feeling of superstitious dread of the substance itself, has led to physiological exaggeration respecting its effects. It is dangerous to make such statements, when persons see their neighbours taking it, and living for 70 or 80 years; and yet I believe fully, that its use is mischievous rather than beneficial, and that every one would be better if he totally abstained. Again, there have been exaggerations as to the language of Scripture on this subject, which are greatly to be lamented, because they lead to bad feeling.

"Thus much I have said in the way of friendly hint to the teetotalers, and apology for the sober members of society, who, I believe would come over in numbers, if more temperate language were generally used. Now as to the evils arising from intemperance, no language can overstate or over estimate its horrors. Mr. Carpenter said, truly, that it was not an evil to be grappled with by legislative enactments. The teetotalers are quite right in saying, that it is a canker eating into the moral heart of society, and in erecting a separate and distinct agency to grapple with this one evil. Till you can reach a man's conscience, and make his will incline to better things, coercive means will fail. The teetotalers are right in not despairing of their object; there is nothing chimerical in their expectation of converting multitudes now sunk in vice to a sober course of life. Every man has a secret self-reproach, when he commits an intemperate action; he feels that it is below a man. You can then excite his remorse, and by that principle which God has implanted in the heart of every man, you will have the power to raise him to a better life. I go a step further. The teetotalers are quite right in saying to every man, who is liable to guilty excess, that he must go the whole length of total abstinence. To diminish the quantity inch by inch, is utterly hopeless and ridiculous. They must throw aside whatever sets temptation to work; else, in nine instances out of ten, they must fail. It follows, that the old Temperance [Moderation] Societies, must in the nature of things, fail of their object. I go one step further. I also believe with you, that that is the proper and true course. But you should do so on the true principle. If we say to drunkards, 'you must stop but I won't,' then they will be all banded together, into a drunkard's society; this brands them—at once they stick a bad character on their own back, which is more than we can expect to be done, especially by those who are not yet in a moral state, and are incapable of performing a severe penance. Therefore, I think that those disposed to aid, should aid; and say, 'we, also, in order to help you, will totally abstain.' But it should be done avowedly for this purpose; not on the ground that moderate-drinkers have been previously committing sin. But no moderate-drinker can say, that it is his duty to drink. He is quite at liberty to give it up. He should say, I give this up, in order to help my weak brother. This is a sound principle; and there is no other on which the enforcement of teetotalism on sober men can be based. But this principle does convince me powerfully. I would therefore suggest to our chairman, that he would do well if he could make the sacrifice, and bear the weight of his character and condition, to the respectability of the society. It is a little sacrifice. It is perfectly absurd to stick so much at throwing it aside. Persons would be better in health, clearer in mind, and almost all the functions of life, on which physical enjoyment depends, would go on as well, or better. And even were it otherwise, that man is a poor philanthropist and Christian, who will not even let down a little of health, to raise others to a better condition. Teetotalism, therefore, is right for the sober; and if it were based on right principles, and not propped up with wrong ones, I doubt not that a great number of persons would be brought over; though I, for one, do not like the pledge.—Mr. Carpenter has said what is only true, when he declared that something more than teetotalism must be adopted. We cannot carry on anything on negative principles. It is of the utmost consequence, in drawing men from vicious pleasures, that you should provide that refreshment which man requires. We must combine plans for amusement and instruction. When men drink, it is seldom for that alone; various accompaniments are ingeniously and artificially thrown around; many have not a cottage, with ordinary comforts. The middle classes have a separate kitchen, a room for the children, and a parlour to ask a friend in. But a poor man cannot do this: the children are in the way, the kitchen in disorder, and the fire wanting perhaps for cookery; so that the attraction of a fire, and a few cosy companions at a public-house, are very great. We must provide the same attractions, without the admixture of anything immoral. When these wakes were first established, there were the old manly sports. Why should we not have teetotal cricket-clubs, &c. We must convert men, as Mr. C. observed, to the whole of temperance, the moral administration of the whole life, as well as the particular tendency to drink. Thus far, I heartily sympathize with the temperance movement. I have freely stated my difficulties—it is right that we should understand each other; and since my hints have been given with good temper, I hope they will be received in good part. I am enrolled in the practice of teetotalers, though not in their society, and most heartily do I wish them God speed."

The meeting was also addressed by Messrs. Mason, Seddon, Norcliffe, &c. The chairman in his concluding observations stated, that if turning the key on his wine cellar, were the only sacrifice to make, in order to become a teetotaler, he should not hesitate one instant; but though he had been brought up with habits of abstinence, he did not wish to become implicated in the opinions of any body of men. He belonged as much to the teetotal society, as to any other society, political or religious.

LINCOLNSHIRE.

The Lincoln Mercury states, "The peaceable conduct of the numerous gangs of Irish harvest-men who have passed through Stamford during the last month on their road to the fens, has been remarked with much satisfaction. Although it is computed that nearly 3000 of these strangers have trudged through the town (the majority remaining in the suburbs for at least one night, and many in a penniless condition,) not a single case of serious disturbance had been complained of. We are informed, that most of these Irish labourers are teetotalers, some from necessity; but the greater portion are disciples of Father Mathew, of whom they speak with the utmost reverence."

Compendium of Facts.

MALT.—37,856,131 bushels of malt, charged duty, were made from 5th July, 1844, to 5th July, 1845.

SIR EDWARD LYTTON BULWER has contributed an article to Colburn's New Monthly Magazine, detailing the benefits he has derived from the "Cold Water" treatment.

DR GRINDROD has been lecturing with great success in Doncaster and Whitehaven. About 2000 persons have signed the pledge.

IN LIVERPOOL there are 1309 publicans, and 700 beer-sellers.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN states, that there have been no less than 11 cases of suicide in that town in 13 weeks, and that the greater part of them have arisen from that kind of insanity which is produced by excessive drinking.

STOCKPORT.—Mr. Bradley (of the firm of Fernley & Co., cotton-manufacturers,) presented the Annual Memorial of the Temperance Society to the Mayor at the Police Court. The Memorial had reference to the closing of public-houses on the Sabbath-day.

THE HOLDERNESS Temperance Union is composed of nine societies, which mutually contribute to the support of an agent who combines the travelling agent with the missionary.

THERE ARE, it is stated, in connexion with the Kent Union, not less than thirty societies, embracing about one thousand reformed drunkards.

THE KILMARNOCK Teetotalers had a pleasure trip on the 2nd of August to the Island of Arran, when nearly 600 persons embraced the opportunity of viewing the splendid scenery.

IN TRURO, 300 drunkards have been reclaimed from intemperance; 100 of whom are now members of Christian churches.

PRUSSIA.—The King of Prussia has given orders to allow the soldiers to receive instead of their daily rations of brandy, the value of the same in money. The soldiers have returned thanks.

THE GRAND ARMY.—The number of Temperance Societies in the United States is estimated at ten thousand, with four millions of members.

GOVERNOR M'DOWALL of Virginia, has signed the pledge. His guests, however numerous or exalted, great or fashionable, find on his table no beverage stronger than pure water.

ONE THOUSAND Alumni of Union College, and guests—Governors, Judges, Lawyers, Divines, Physicians, Agriculturists, and princely Merchants—sat down to the great dinner at Schenectady on the 25th ult., without any intoxicating drinks.

THE GRAND JURY of Wyandott county, Ohio, have indicted every tavern keeper, but one in the county, for selling liquor without license. The court over which Judge Bower presides, has agreed to grant licenses to keep taverns, only on condition that spirituous, vinous, and malt-liquors shall not be sold.

IN BAINBRIDGE, Indiana, the people are talking of having a general jubilee, on account of the success of the cause of temperance, and the total annihilation of drunkenness in that place.

A Savings' Bank has been incorporated at Jersey City, having now in deposit more than fourteen thousand dollars, made principally by reformed drunkards.

THE TEMPERANCE PROCESSION at Lowell, Massachusetts, was three-quarters of a mile long, numbering about 20,000 persons.

The Clergy of Hudson, New York, have all recently preached temperance sermons, and taken up collections for the County Society.

In Livingston, New York, where formerly were sold 50 hogsheds of rum and 40 barrels of whiskey, only 50 gallons of rum and 54 gallons of whiskey have been sold the past year. One-fifth of the voters are members of the Temperance Society.

and impressed with the fact exhibited by the metropolitan and other police reports—viz. that drunkenness prevails more on Sundays than on any other day of the week—implore your honourable [if to the Lords, right honourable] house immediately to take this subject into your serious consideration, and to adopt measures calculated to diminish these great evils.

“And your petitioners having ascertained that there has been a decrease of nearly 50 per cent. in the convictions for drunkenness occurring in London on Sundays, since the introduction of the Metropolitan Improvement Act in the year 1839, one clause of which, enforces the closing of public-houses from 12 o'clock on Saturday night until 1 o'clock on Sunday, pray your honourable [or right honourable] house immediately to pass a law for greatly restricting or entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on that day.

N.B.—A copy of the petition, and all necessary instructions, will be sent to nearly every town and village in Great Britain. When this work has been completed, an announcement to that effect will appear in this and other temperance periodicals; and any parties not having received the necessary documents, will be supplied on making application to the Secretary of the British Association, 3, Low Ousegate, York.

DR. CAMPBELL.

A sterling article appeared in the Christian Witness for September, on the Present Prospects of the total abstinence cause, and the means of its advancement.

We cordially recommend that article to the impartial attention of the ministers and members of all Christian denominations. We feel sorry that want of space prevents us giving more than the following short extract:—

“The [temperance] question, we regret to say, is not yet by any means fully before the public mind. Much has been written, most ably written upon it; but the mass, even of the faithful, have not given it a careful and candid perusal. Comparatively few have yet made a serious study of it. Even among the more intelligent classes, the distributors of knowledge, and the guides of opinion, by most it is still viewed as one of the many well-meant vagaries by which the face of society is from time to time diversified or disturbed, and the minds of the multitude amused or misled. All such have yet to learn, that the subject is really second to none within the whole range of the encyclopaedia of human knowledge. It touches society at all points, from the heart to the extremities. From the monarch on the throne to the captive in the dungeon, all are deeply concerned in it. It involves the highest questions of legislation, jurisprudence, political economy, morals, and religion, both at home and in foreign climes—in a word the temporal weal and the eternal destiny of countless millions, living and to be born, of the human race. From experience we can testify that, once fairly embarked in, it is one of the most exciting subjects that can occupy an intelligent creature; the farther the student advances, the more intensely he becomes interested, till at length it absorbs almost every other subject of an uninspired character. We earnestly invite our readers, especially our ministerial readers, to make the experiment.”

"A statement of the sickness amongst the men employed at Bury Farm, Enfield.

"From Michaelmas, 1839, to Michaelmas, 1840, drinking allowed and encouraged, 13 men had 19 weeks' sickness;—From Michaelmas, 1840, to Michaelmas, 1841, drinking discouraged or disallowed, 13 men had 5 weeks' sickness;—being in the proportion of 380 weeks when drinking was allowed and encouraged, to 100 weeks when drinking was discouraged or disallowed.

"The following shows the different proportions of sickness between the beer-drinkers and the teetotalers, from Michaelmas, 1840, to Michaelmas, 1842.

"Nine beer drinkers, and 2 for six months had 10 weeks' sickness;—3 teetotalers had one week's sickness; being in the proportion of 316 weeks amongst the beer drinkers, to 100 weeks amongst the same number of teetotalers.

"The above statement shows that every teetotaler belonging to a sick club along with beer drinkers, and paying 2s. a month, could secure the same benefit to himself, by paying 7½d. a-month! the difference of 1s. 4½d. a-month being required to pay for the greater amount of sickness among the beer drinkers."—M. GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

The whole of the metropolis having been laid out into districts, each under the care of an accredited missionary, the Committee are desirous of extending a similar system to the country at large.

Mr. JOSEPH REED WILSON, well known as a promoter of Sunday-schools, having offered his services as an honorary Agent, the Committee have gladly acceded to the proposition.

Mr. Wilson's great experience in working kindred institutions, renders him peculiarly adapted to enter upon this important undertaking; and the Committee hail his proffered services to promote the cause of temperance, as a providential opening; more especially at the present time, when there appears an increased desire, on the part of the Christian public, for information; and it is to be hoped a corresponding wish to extend the practice of total abstinence. It must be obvious, that the combined and harmonious effort of all Christians is indispensable to the uprooting of the drinking-system, and to the changing of our intemperate nation into a sober one. Has the time for this "effort" arrived? "The time," says an able advocate of our cause, "is fully come, when every man in England, who makes the slightest claim to sense, to piety, or to patriotism, must turn his attention to the subject."

The Committee have now only to invite the prompt and steady co-operation of the committees and members of the various temperance societies, in the places which Mr. Wilson may visit. They confidently expect a cordial reception for their agent, and trust, wherever he may be, that the friends of sobriety will support him by their labours, their counsels, and their prayers.

The grand and simple object of the undertaking, is to supply the entire population of the kingdom with information on the advantages of abstaining from all intoxicating liquors by means of the choicest publications on the subject in way of loan, to each family, and through the agency of teetotalers of consistent and moral conduct.

Several of the provincial Societies have already adopted the proposition to a certain extent, although not precisely in the way at present contemplated.

The limits of the present article do not admit of more than a very brief outline of the organization proposed, the details being left for future development, as the plan may be carried into operation. There is nothing novel in the scheme proposed, it being similar to that adopted, and in successful operation, in connexion with the Missionary, Bible and Tract Societies throughout the kingdom.

It is proposed to divide every town containing 2000 inhabitants into districts of fifty families each. To each of these districts, one or more visitors or tract distributors will be appointed, for the purpose of exchanging the tracts weekly, either by one person taking the whole weekly, or two persons visiting 25 families each. To these 50 families, 60 loan tracts, all different, will be furnished, to supply any that may be lost or destroyed; consequently, each of the families in a district will be supplied with a fresh tract every week for a twelvemonth.

It is proposed that each Society shall raise the necessary funds, over which it shall have the entire control. To meet the incidental expenses, the tract distributors shall endeavour to collect from each pledged teetotaler in his district, who can afford it, one penny per week; and from any other friends who may be disposed, such contributions as they may feel inclined to make—such sums to be paid over to the Treasurer at stated periods.

The funds thus raised, it is conceived, will be fully adequate to the demands of the Society, for the payment of the loan tracts, the books and tickets necessary; and when practicable, for the rent and furnishing of a room, as a place of meeting for the members, and a Temperance Reading Room, and the formation of Libraries of religious, moral, and entertaining publications, as well as of temperance and other periodicals. Any surplus funds, when these local objects have been accomplished, may be transmitted to the County Association, for the support of new Societies. It would be proposed, that the Treasurer and Secretary of each Society be ex officio members of the County Committee for the time being.

In return for such assistance, the Association, when practicable, engages to send a deputation of one or more persons to attend the meetings of each of the Societies in the Union, to address the meetings and encourage the parties in their benevolent exertions. At such meetings, the attendance of all persons within the limits of each Society will be invited by the tract distributors in their weekly visits.

By the adoption of the above plans, it is hoped, that the zeal of all devoted tee-totalers, male and female, will be called forth into active operation—each distributor will become a temperance missionary in his or her district; and will, by the Divine blessing, diffuse information, and employ personal influence, in promoting the cause of temperance in every family in the kingdom.

These Societies, when properly organized, will, it is hoped, also hold quarterly meetings of members for the purposes of friendly intercourse and encouragement; at which the tickets of those who have maintained their pledge, will be certified by the signature of the Secretary on the back—new members will be proposed and received, details of the labours of the distributors will be given, and statistical information afforded.

An annual Report of each Society should be sent to the County Committee, to be embodied in their general Report; and a copy of it, with the most recent statistical information, will be transmitted to the London Society.

With regard to the terms of connexion of the Association and their affiliated Societies with the National Society, they are embodied in the fourth Rule, which states, that "Every county (or larger district Association,) shall be at liberty to elect two corresponding members who shall be duly qualified by the third Rule, viz., an annual subscription of One Guinea, or a donation of Ten Guineas, shall be entitled to attend and vote at the annual meeting of the Parent Society." In addition to the above, the Societies and Associations will be entitled to purchase the publications of the Society, and other requisites, at a reduction of 25 per cent. for ready money.

No charge is intended to be made by the travelling agent for his services or support, when visiting or organizing Societies; but any surplus funds that may accumulate after defraying local expenses, will be thankfully received by the National Society to the furtherance of the cause at home and abroad.

A sub-committee has been appointed to select the most approved tracts and publications of the Society, as well as those of the provincial institutions throughout the kingdom, to be done up into loan sets, with the necessary books and apparatus for the management of Societies and Associations, which will be sold at their Depository on the lowest possible terms.

When these preliminary arrangements have been made, Mr. Wilson intends, with the approbation of the Committee to commence his mission in the north; and to proceed southward as there may be openings, or encouragement given by the Provincial Societies to avail themselves of his services.

Should the plan proposed succeed, and encouragement be given by the Provincial Societies, an increase of agency may be required, for the support of which, it is hoped the requisite means will be afforded by the liberality of the friends of temperance throughout the kingdom.

So gigantic an undertaking will require the resources and energies of all the friends of the cause, and of all professing Christians and Christian ministers.

The Chronicle.

Our readers will perceive, that 8 additional pages have been added to the CHRONICLE, for this month. The Committee have determined upon this step, owing to the great press of important matter, and in order that they might present to the friends of the Temperance cause, throughout the kingdom, a programme of the objects contemplated by the GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

We would embrace this opportunity of urging upon our Subscribers, and the members of the Society, the importance of extending the circulation of the CHRONICLE.

The present position of the Temperance Reformation is one of peculiar interest. Town Missions, following the example set in the Metropolis are starting in many of our largest provincial towns:—an extensive and active agitation on the Sunday traffic in strong drink, is commencing:—the Committee of the National Society have entered upon a plan of advertising in the principal religious periodicals of the day, and are endeavouring to carry into effect a scheme of National Organization, which has only been delayed for want of the necessary means. We appeal therefore, without hesitation, to our friends, for increased support, both to the Society, and to this publication, which is its organ; and as the CHRONICLE is sent monthly, to a large number of distinguished individuals, in various parts of the country, subscriptions will be thankfully received in aid of the gratuitous circulation.*

THE PRESS.

The plan of inserting articles in the form of Advertisements, in the chief religious Periodicals of the day, has been commenced this month.

An article from the pen of the Rev. W. R. Baker, will be found in a prominent position in the Christian Witness for October.

The extent to which this important effort may be carried, must, of course, depend upon the amount of support it receives.

The following Subscriptions have been already announced:—

ALCOHOLIC WINES.

Extracts from a Sermon by the Venerable Archdeacon Jeffreys.

We have generally avoided introducing questions of a physiological and controversial character, from a conviction that the strength of the Temperance movement must rest upon the Scriptural basis of moral expediency, as laid down by the Apostolic text, which has always been our motto. A pamphlet, however, which has just appeared under the above title, with notes, by "W. C. WALTERS, Esq., M.V., Barrister-at-Law, and late Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge," is so interesting, and so fair in its mode of treating the subject, that we cannot avoid recommending it to the serious attention of our readers; simply premising, that whether they rise from its perusal with conviction or not, the main ground of abstaining from intoxicating liquors remains unshaken.

"Before we enter upon our argument," says the Archdeacon in his Sermon, "I would clear the way, by observing, that it is a common notion in England that unfermented wines will not keep, that they will soon ferment and spoil. This is a popular error, grounded on ignorance of the subject, and is the exact reverse of the real truth; for the unfermented wines of the ancients were the only wines that would keep. All the fermented wines of the ancients speedily became sour, and the art of distillation being unknown, they had no distilled spirits to preserve them. It was for this reason that fermented wines were, for the most part, looked upon as spoilt wines, by the ancients; they were of little value because they would not keep; and it became an important object to make unfermented wines, and thus to prevent the vinous fermentation, so that it might almost be said they would keep for ever.

"And first, we shall lay before you what Dr. Ure, one of the most celebrated chemists of the present day, states in his Dictionary of the Arts, respecting fermentation. He states that there are three things essential to fermentation, without which the vinous fermentation, or the formation of intoxicating spirit, cannot possibly take place. The first, he mentions is the presence of gluten, or, as it is called in proper language, yeast or barn. But Dr. Ure states, that gluten being an insoluble substance, may be separated by its subsiding, or still better, by the filter, and that, if it be totally separated, the vinous fermentation is impossible.

"Now, before we proceed to the second thing mentioned by Dr. Ure, as essential to fermentation, let us pause here and attend to what Pliny says respecting the preparation of the most highly valued wines in his day. He says,—'That is the most useful wine, whose strength is utterly broken or destroyed by the filter.' And Plutarch, in his 'Symposium,' has the following words:—'Wine is rendered old or feeble in strength when it is frequently filtered. By this percolation through the filter, the strength of the wine is taken away without any injury to its pleasing flavour, and the spirit being thus excluded, the wine neither inflames the head, nor infects the mind and the passions.'

"This process of filtration would have a two-fold effect upon the ancient wines. Chemistry informs us that the presence of gluten or yeast is absolutely necessary to the vinous fermentation, and that if it be totally separated by the filter, the vinous fermentation is utterly impossible. Hence, all further fermentation would be prevented; and if in any slight degree it had already taken place, then by constantly passing through the filter, drop by drop, 'toties totiesque,' again and again, the last particle of spirit, if there were any, would evaporate into the liquid air.

"But it is time we proceed to the next expedient resorted to by the ancients to preserve their wines; for although the separation of the yeast by the filter would prevent the vinous fermentation and the formation of spirit, it would by no means prevent the acetous fermentation, or the formation of vinegar. To prevent this, according to Plutarch, Pliny, and Columella, they had recourse to another expedient, to explain which, I must now call your attention to the second statement of Dr. Ure on the article of fermentation. He there states, that if the saccharine matter be very thick or concentrated, it will not ferment; that in order to ferment, the sugar requires the presence of the watery particles in the grape.

"Now Plutarch, Pliny, and Columella state, that in making the wines of their day, it was customary to evaporate the watery particles of the grape, by boiling their wines, and thus to concentrate them into a thick syrup. And even if the pure grape-juice, or virgin wine, as it was termed, had, through neglect or mismanagement, been allowed to form the smallest portion of spirit previous to boiling, is it not clear that the process of boiling for hours, in order to evaporate the water, would first evaporate every particle of spirit?—for spirit evaporates at a far lower temperature than water boils. And when once the wine was concentrated into a thick syrup, the formation of any spirit afterwards is contrary to the laws of nature.

"Nor are we to suppose that the art of making the wines mentioned by Plutarch, Pliny, and Columella, is lost in the present day. These unfermented wines, or rich syrups of the grape, are still made in Italy [and France] in large quantities, and the only reason they are not sent to England is, because they do not suit the English taste for strong drinks, and the brandied standard of the English market.

"The third thing mentioned by Dr. Ure, as essential to fermentation, is the free access of the air,—a free vent to allow the escape of carbonic acid gas formed by the process of fermentation. Now Pliny, Varro, and Columella, give very particular directions, to put these boiled wines or syrups immediately into leathern bottles [or into jars] and to seal up the mouth with strong gypsum or cement, to prevent the access of the air. This will totally prevent the fermentation if the wines be previously filtered, and the interior of the leathern bottles perfectly clean. But it is well known that if the fermentation once commences, then if a free vent be not allowed, it will burst, not leathern bottles only, but the strongest casks that can be made of wood and iron.

We have only room for two short extracts from the notes appended to the Archdeacon's Sermon:—

"But, assuming that it could be proved that pure alcoholic wine was lawfully drunk, that would not justify our brandied wines, nor our drugged ales and porter. This is too much overlooked. But the Bible is not a mere book of precepts, but of principles; and not only the voice of revelation, but our reason teaches that man should do nothing to injure his body. Now we have the strong testimony of a great majority of our medical men, that the habitual use of alcoholic beverages is not merely unnecessary, but hurtful to our bodies; and thus we have the injunction of the Bible against them. Again, neither the Old nor the New Testament expressly condemns the system of slavery that was then in use; and this we know was sometimes urged against Wilberforce and his fellow-philanthropists. But what was the conclusive answer? The great principle of Love, the new commandment, that is written as with a sun-beam, in every page of the Gospel revelation, emphatically condemns the horrid system that prevailed in our colonies, and that generated so much cruelty in Africa and on its coasts.

"But I judge no man; only let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind, first, that alcoholic liquors are not hurtful to his body, which God hath commanded him not to destroy, nor a hindrance to his advancement in a spiritual course; and, secondly, that his example is not a snare to many who do not possess the same moderation and self-control as himself. We should remember Luther's definition of drunkenness: 'He that will say or do anything after drinking, that he would not have said or done before, is intoxicated;' and it has been well observed, that the Gospel is not satisfied with periodical austerities, or with abstinence on this day or that, but that the purity and sobriety that it enjoins must be ever maintained."

GENERAL SCRIPTURE READING; or a Plan for the perusal of the entire Scriptures once every year, &c.; intended for private study, family worship, bible and singing classes, temperance, missionary, and other meetings:—By a CLERGYMAN. HOULSTON & STONE-MAN: London.

The Pamphlet which bears the above title, is from the pen of the Rev. P. PENSON, A. M., Vicar of St. Oswald's, Durham, who is well known in the North as a firm and prominent friend of the Temperance cause. It mainly consists of a Tabular Index for the reading of the whole of the Scriptures once a year, and deserves a very extensive circulation. There is a preface of eight pages, containing numerous judicious remarks. Speaking on the subject of reading the Scriptures at Temperance and other public meetings, the author observes—

"It is hoped that the system here proposed will be found useful on such occasions. It will supersede the precariousness of selection. It will promote sympathy of feeling and unity of action among the members of the various associations. Thus it will appear evident to all, the grand movements now going on in favour of temperance and other moral reformations are in perfect unison with the spirit of the bible, and that the friends of those movements are quite willing to have their proceedings tried by the test of Scripture, and placed under the sanction of its hallowed influences. It will be seen that Scriptural knowledge and spiritual improvement are advancing simultaneously with the moral renovations of society."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHILDREN.—A Tract for Sunday-School children on the histories and benefits of the Teetotal system.—(A Prize Essay.)

We have read this Tract with much pleasure, and think it calculated to interest and instruct the children of our Sabbath-schools. Its forcible and yet simple style renders it well adapted for the members of the important class to whom it is addressed. The good which would result from the placing of a tract like the present in the hands of every child in our metropolitan and provincial Sabbath-schools, would be incalculable.

AN AFFECTIONATE APPEAL TO SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS (Prize Essay.) 12 pages, Ipswich New Series, 49.

DR. CAMPBELL in the communication which was read at Exeter Hall, after paying a just tribute of respect to the labours of the 200,000 teachers who are scattered through the land, made the following remark—"These teachers are at a time of life and in a state of mind highly favourable to the entertainment of the question, as a subject of inquiry; and I feel confident, that with the bulk of them, that inquiry wisely prosecuted, would infallibly issue in the adoption of the temperance principle."

The tract before us is designed to lead to this inquiry. The author briefly refers to the nature and extent of the influence exerted by Sunday-school Teachers; then gives several reasons why they should embrace the temperance cause; and closes with an earnest appeal for their co-operation in the great work. From this closing appeal we extract the following paragraph—

"By all the momentous interests involved or affected, we beg you to turn 'with full purpose of heart' towards the great temperance reformation. It has had the help of Him who knoweth all things, it has been furthered by His blessing, it has been irradiated by the sunshine of His smile; why then should you, as the professed servants of the King of kings, hold back from the cause or shrink from advancing its interests? 'Is the servant greater than his Lord?' Your influence is a precious talent; employ it to the benefit of your fellow-beings, and to the praise of your 'Father who is in heaven.' Consider the subject in the privacy of your closet, ponder the question upon your knees. Will you pray that Sunday-schools may be filled? Remember that strong drink keeps thousands from attending. Will you pray that useful teachers may multiply? Remember that strong drink hinders the number from increasing. Will you pray that your instruction may be blessed to the good of your children? Remember that strong drink prevents this in instances at once fearfully and fatally numerous. Then pray for divine guidance, and we will be satisfied with the result, if you will practise by your life and conversation the lessons you have learned."

THE CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE SABBATH-SCHOOL MAGAZINE, &c.—London: J. Evans, 4, Snow Hill. Hayle: J. Williams, Market Square.

An interesting monthly periodical, combining religious and temperance instruction. It deserves a more extensive circulation than we believe it at present enjoys.

AN APPEAL TO THE PIOUS IN FAVOUR OF TOTAL-ABSTINENCE, &c. By R. TABRAHAM. London:—Houlston & Stoneman, 65, Paternoster Row.

This is a very powerful appeal. In a series of propositions the author proves by the clearest evidence, that the "use, gift, sale and manufacture" of intoxicating drink, "is an evil, is contrary to love and should be abandoned." The following is a fair specimen of the effective, but also kind and affectionate manner in which the argument is conducted. Addressing "the ministers of Christ"—

"We admit the exhausting nature of your studies, public duties, ministerial cares and awful responsibilities, the opinions, pursuits and tempers of large masses of men—your accumulated difficulties:—but dear Brethren, look at the world in ruin through strong drink, the tens of thousands saved by abstinence, the simplicity of the plan, the influence of your example and advocacy, the perfect ease with which these might be rendered, the love to man which you profess and the heroism of so many in your holy office, in the earlier days of this noble enterprise. Do you hesitate, your fears arise, your difficulties grow, does your courage fail, and custom urge her claims? What, you shrink from the cross? Ah! see your self-denied Master, witness his death, think of souls, hear the apostle 'it is good not to drink wine;' yea, hear Christ exclaim 'thou shalt love' thy neighbour as thyself.' See that pious, useful, laborious, eloquent minister of Christ, tasting, excited, guilty, fallen, deserted, lost! O abstain! Sign the pledge, advocate the cause, escape from ruin, rise in usefulness, save souls, and praise redeeming love in heaven."

PHILOSOPHY OF THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION; or, the relations of Alcohol and the Human Organism, chemically, aphysiologically and psychologically considered. By RUSSELL T. TRALL, M.D. London:—Britain, Paternoster Row. Worksop: W. White, and sold by all Booksellers.

The present is a remarkably cheap edition of the essay to which the premium of 100 dollars was awarded by the General Temperance Council of New York. Every temperance advocate should make himself conversant with the truths it contains.

CHRISTIAN EXPEDIENCY. An Address delivered by DR. C. H. LOVELL.

We have read this valuable tract with much pleasure. The question is argued upon the immovable basis of truth; and the author has wisely avoided the temptation to depart from the sound but beaten track, for the sake of novelty. He says:—"The object of this address is not to prove the lawfulness or unlawfulness, but the expediency, of abstaining from alcoholic drinks, and here expediency is duty. A Christian should look around him, and when he beholds so great an amount of poverty, crime, debauchery, disease, insanity, infidelity; so great a disregard of all religion, and so many places consecrated to religious worship, comparatively empty, he asks himself, what is the principal cause of all this? and after he has ascertained the cause to be that which I have no hesitation in saying it is, viz., the drinking-customs of this country, 'he should deny himself of things even lawful.' Let me repeat it, expediency here is a positive duty."

In his appeal to Sunday-school teachers, we cordially sympathise, and trust it may be extensively heard and responded to. "To the young men who are now filling the honourable situations of Sunday-school teachers—to the young men belonging to the different Christian associations, and to all who profess the name of Christian, we appeal, to abstain from all alcoholic drinks, and by so doing, be assured you will best advance the interests of science, of literature, and religion. When the people shall become a reading people, a thoughtful and considering people, the greatest barrier to human improvement will be removed, and the way prepared for them to become a religious and devoted people. Above all, it is the influence of your example, that will hasten the arrival of that day when temperance, truth, holiness, and justice, shall be spread over the earth."

THE PRINCIPLES OF TEETOTALISM briefly stated; with an answer to some common objections: by REV. S. MINTON, A.M., Incumbent of Penk-hull, Stafford. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

The noble stand which is being taken in defence of the temperance cause, by an increasing number of clergymen of the Established Church, affords room for great congratulation. May their example soon be followed by many more of their brethren. We have perused the interesting pamphlet before us, and beg to recommend it as containing a brief, but clear and explicit statement of the principles of teetotalism, and a successful refutation of the common objections which are urged against that system.

We wish it a very wide circulation.

A CRITERION OF PROSPERITY.

A man of much travel and observation, and of eminent genius, the celebrated Goldsmith, nearly a century ago, penned the following remarks:—"In the towns and countries I have seen, I never saw a city or village yet, whose miseries were not in proportion to the number of its public-houses. In Rotterdam, you may go through eight or ten streets without finding a public-house. In Antwerp, almost every second house seems an ale-house. In the one city all wears the appearance of happiness and affluence; in the other —." But we need not proceed with the description for our readers have only to look at New York.—New York Organ.

CLERICAL WINE-DRINKING IN ENGLAND.

In Dr. Durbin's Observations in Europe, we find the following:—"I do not recollect ever to have preached a sermon in England, without being offered a glass of wine afterwards in the vestry. Wine was frequently distributed in conference during its active season. The temperance movement has not taken hold of our brethren in England; and they see wine-drinking, not as we do — but as we did twenty years ago."

MALT LIQUORS.

Professor Brande, in an article on malt liquors, describes the manner in which they are adulterated in the beer-shops and public-houses, and some of the breweries, of London. The English are remarkably fond of malt liquor; it serves many of them for meat and drink, and lodging also. It must be a racy, piquant, and nutritive article of diet, if what the professor says is true. He tells us that green vitriol is used to make the beer frothy, treacle to sweeten it, coculus indicus to intoxicate, pepper to sharpen it, grains of paradise to warm it, and salt to prevent its quenching thirst. One of the most common, and at the same time most pernicious narcotic additions, is tobacco, which, being licensed at the publican's, is not, like the other articles, tangible by the officers. This is not, it is said, an exaggerated account of the composition of the trash, which, under various seductive names, is pumped up from under-ground laboratories, and retailed at the bar and tap; and this it is which the labourer, because perchance it is stimulating and stupifying, considers as strengthening and comforting.—From the New York Organ.

QUEEN CHRISTINA.

The famous Christina of Sweden tells us, amongst the recollections of her childhood, that she had an extreme dislike to beer and wine, and that the Queen Dowager, her mother, would not suffer her to drink water. She consequently suffered severely from thirst; and one day being detected in taking some rose-water from her mother's toilette, she was severely whipped, which had the effect of making her a confirmed water-drinker for the rest of her life.—Mrs. Jameson's Female Sovereigns.

THE ONE GREAT OBSTACLE.

"Nor should I omit mentioning the Indian settlements founded by the Rev. Mr. Cockran at the lower extremity of the colony. He has provided school-masters for the native children, and built places of worship where he regularly officiates. He has constructed a windmill for the Indians, assists them in erecting their wooden-houses, and with his own hands sets them the example of industry. At the other extremity of the colony, M. Belcour, one of the Roman Catholic priests, with untiring zeal, conducts a location of Saulteaux Indians on a smaller scale: I wish I could add, that the improvement of the aborigines is commensurate to those beneficent cares. But unhappily the experience of Canada, of the United States, of California, in short, of all parts of North America, where the experiment of ameliorating the character of the Indian tribes by civilization has been tried, is renewed at Red River. Nothing can overcome their insatiable desire for intoxicating liquors; and though they are here excluded from the use of spirits, and the settlers are fined when detected in supplying them with ale, yet, from the great extent of the colony, they too often contrive to gratify that debasing inclination, to which they are ready to sacrifice everything they possess."—Simpson's Narrative of Discoveries in North America from 1836-39.

A PHYSICIAN'S ADVICE.

In an article on Health and Preservation, published in Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper, J. H. YEOMAN, Esq. M.D., says—

"Let him, (the working man) thoroughly ventilate his house, open the windows daily, and allow the pure breath of heaven to drive out all that is noxious:—let him take his children, whenever practicable, to the parks, to the still unclosed land and sweet lanes, which are yet to be found within walking distance of the metropolis:—let those who have the means, avail themselves of the short and cheap trips, which railways and steam-boats now afford; and they will be more invigorated in mind and body; they will become better members of society, than if this outlay of money and time had been wasted in gin, beer, and tobacco."

A FALLING KINGDOM.—The following toast was given at a festival in Massachusetts.—"King Alcohol—He falls when his subjects attempt to support him, and they fall when he attempts to support them."

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

SOUTH LAMBETH.—No. I.

(From August 1st to September 1st.)

THE PLEDGE-BOOK IN THE SHOP.

H. a reclaimed character, who keeps a pledge-book in his shop, said, that a drunkard, a few days previously, had come to the shop and signed the pledge; he requested the missionary to visit him. He was visited accordingly and greatly encouraged by his wife also signing the pledge. They had been members of a temperance society but had broken their pledge. They both mentioned with feelings of gratitude, the repeated visits made to them in years past, by the respected Superintendent of the Mission, and were much gratified at belonging once more to a society with which he was connected. They have been visited and remain firm.

A PRUDENT DRUNKARD.

At a coeprage in H— street, two of the men at work were teetotalers; one of them six years. The latter said, he had kept himself poor all his life time, by his intemperate habits, and had remained a bachelor because he never could keep a shilling in his pocket to provide for a different state; and moreover, that he saw so much of women drinking at the gin-shops, that he was afraid he might have a drinking wife, and so be worse off. He was thankful he ever had signed, and was now worth a hundred pounds.* He and his companion seconded the missionary's efforts to induce others present to sign; and succeeding with a young man, he said, "there, you have now done the best day's work in all your life."

J. S. WARREN.

BETHNAL GREEN.—No. II.

A POT-BOY SIGNS.

A pot-boy (almost a man) acknowledged that he had both seen and felt the evils of intemperance. After a conversation with the missionary, he signed the pledge, and said, that he would leave his situation as soon as he could procure another.

THE HUSBAND AND WIFE DETERMINED TO GO ONE WAY.

Calling upon J. K—, found him afflicted in body, and miserable in his mind, consequent on a life of drunkenness. He had (when the missionary visited him) been drinking for two days; after an explanation of the temperance principle, he said, I am determined to sign the pledge: he then signed, his wife following.

DRUNKENNESS ENTERS THE CHURCH—THREE

DRUNKEN BROTHERS.

Calling upon W. D—, he gave thanks to God that the missionary appeared upon such an errand. I am sure, said he, that God must have sent you; I have fallen from the Church of Christ through drink, and for several years have gone astray. He had been intoxicated for days, and was now suffering from its effects: he signed the pledge, saying, I hope this is the beginning of better days; his wife also signed. Now, said the man, I have two drunken brothers, I wish you would go and try to induce them to sign the pledge—one of whom had, a few weeks ago, through intemperance and cruelty, so frightened his son (a lad about ten years of age) that he drowned himself. The other brother has also led a drunken wicked life, and to-day, was without food. The missionary received the pledges of the three brothers, and two of their wives. They said they should not have had the courage to have gone to a temperance meeting to sign, and considered it a great favour of the missionary's calling upon them.

* The same prudent habit seems to accompany him still. We hope he does not, now he is reclaimed, think too highly of himself.—SUPERINTENDENT.

AN ANXIOUS WIFE'S WAY OF SHEWING HER LOVE.

J. C—, a drunkard, abstained from all intoxicating liquors for eleven weeks, but again fell into his old habits. A short time ago, he took home a piece of work for which he received ten shillings; on his return, he called at a public-house, and spent the whole of the money. On coming out, he turned down the wrong street, and lost his way; seating himself on the step of a door, a policeman desired him to move on, when he became troublesome, which ended in his being locked up all night, to the great anxiety and grief of his wife and family, who were fearful he had committed suicide. Teetotalism, he knew, was the safest ground: he therefore signed the pledge, but the wife declined.*

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM.—No. IV.

TEETOTALISM BENEFICIAL FOR THE LANDLORD AND THE TRADESMAN.

Called upon G—, a piano-forte maker who had signed the pledge some time before. On seeing his wife, she said she would call her husband, who was then at work; on his coming in, he expressed great thankfulness that he had been enabled to keep the pledge, and in order to prove to the missionary its advantages he desired his wife to get him the rent book, and there, says he, (pointing to the different items,) I have paid my rent (which was behind) nine half crowns. I have bought my wife a new bonnet and a new pair of boots, and paid another bill of eight shillings, none of which would have been paid had I not been a teetotaler; seeing the happy results, the wife and son now signed.

A CHRISTIAN WOMAN SIGNS.

On calling at No. —, in F— place, Mrs. G—, a member of a Christian church, said, it would be a good thing if her lodger in the front room could be induced to sign, for he was a terrible drunkard. It was only on Monday night last, that he earned fourteen shillings, paid two out of ten he owed for rent, spending the remainder, and has been intoxicated ever since. On the missionary then proceeding to his room, he was out; his wife was at home, and readily signed the pledge. Mrs. G. also signed.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS—CAMBERWELL.

Attended the opening of the Camberwell Temperance Hall. Mr. Osborn presided; a good meeting, and at the close, six signatures were obtained.

CAMBERWELL FAIR.

Engaged (in company with missionaries Nos. 1, and 6,) in distributing tracts at Camberwell Fair, and received the addresses of two persons, on whom the missionary subsequently called.

CLAPHAM.

On Monday, the 11th, attended a meeting at Lark Hall-lane, Clapham, when William Sims, Esq. presided; a good meeting and two signatures were obtained.

RESCUE.

Not less than nine individuals in the neighbourhood of Wyndham-lane are now suffering various punishments, from one to twelve months' imprisonment, in consequence of being engaged in a rescue, arising from a drunken man making a disturbance on a Sunday afternoon.

RICHARD HODGSON.

EAST SMITHFIELD.—No. V.

THE SOLDIER AND HIS OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

A soldier in the Tower, said, that from the impossibility of his keeping himself sober, he wished he could refrain altogether from intoxicating drinks. To this end he had abstained for nearly two months, when an old acquaintance called to see him, and tempted him to break his resolution, by telling him that a little would never injure him. The missionary advised him to sign the pledge,

* What! not give up that which you expected had occasioned your husband to have committed suicide.—Here is love.—SUPERINTENDENT.

which would tend greatly to strengthen his resolution ; he then signed, remarking that he believed he should now be able to stand firm.

THE SAILOR (A TEETOTALER) AND HIS OLD SHIPMATE.

Having heard of a sailor who went by the name of drunken old tar, the missionary went in pursuit, and after many inquiries found him. He confessed to his having been a drunkard for years, and had many times been miraculously preserved from an untimely grave. Among other hair-breadth escapes, he related the following:—On returning from a voyage, being much the worse for liquor, and having to pass by a wet dock at night, fell in, and would have been drowned, but for the dock-master, who that night dreamed that a man had fallen into the dock ; he awoke in a fright, immediately got up, and found the old tar struggling for his life. With the assistance of a third party his life was saved. He said he had been a teetotaler for a considerable time, but had broke his pledge, having met with an old shipmate, he was tempted to drink, and never ceased till he spent every penny that he had saved when a teetotaler.* He was entreated to try again, to which, after some consideration, he consented : his wife also signed. They have been visited several times and remain firm, and now regularly attend a place of worship.

THE PUMP.

Observed a man taking a drink of water at the pump, and congratulating him upon the refreshing draught, he said that it was poor stuff to subsist on, and asked the missionary for relief. Suspecting the cause of his distress, he was asked if it was not strong drink. The man admitted that drink had to do with it, and that he was discharged from his last situation through drunkenness. After much conversation, he was induced to sign the pledge. On turning round, the missionary saw another individual standing near, who proved to be a companion of the former. The missionary then told him what his friend had done, and desired him to follow his example. The latter, in a dejected state of mind, said that he also had lost his situation through drink, and was reduced to the utmost destitution ; that he had been formerly a person of property, and was personally known in his prosperity to J— T— J—, Esq. of N—h, but had lost all through drink, and has since been working as a labouring man for the brother of the former, at W— H—. The first man said, that only a few minutes before meeting with the missionary, the second man had determined to throw himself over London-bridge. After a word of encouragement, the "second man," also signed.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT DISTRIBUTOR'S METHOD OF TREATING TWO DRUNKARDS.

A female religious tract distributor came to the door of the missionary to leave a tract, when a drunken man and woman stopped, and asked for one, but were refused. The missionary then invited all the party into his house, when he addressed them on the subject of total abstinence. The man acknowledged the truth of the remarks, and very readily signed the pledge. The tract distributor appeared surprised at the conduct of the missionary, in taking his signature, and said, "she was sure the man did not know what he was doing." He, however, soon convinced her to the contrary, by replying, I am sure that I do, for you would not give me a tract when I asked you for it. The woman here signed, stating that she had pawned above £50 worth of goods for drink. The missionary then requested the tract distributor to follow up the work which he had commenced, by visiting them at their houses, which she promised to do.

THE TOWER BARRACKS, EIGHT MORE SOLDIERS SIGNED.

Visited the Spurr-room, Tower, and saw the teetotal soldiers, who, on a former visit, had signed the pledge, all of whom had stood firm. The missionary addressed several others who were assembled, and after showing them the benefits they might obtain by following the example of their comrades, four more joined their ranks.

* Teetotal sailors should avoid old shipmates.—SUPERINTENDENT.

On a subsequent visit, the missionary found several lying down suffering from intoxicating drink. One of them said, that drink had nearly been the death of him, and should be quite willing to give it up entirely ; he signed, three more following his example. The serjeant coming in, expressed his astonishment at one of them (a great drunkard) signing the pledge, when the man replied, "Why, do not you think I need to be a teetotaler?" to which the serjeant assented, and then related an interesting anecdote of a man whom he knew, who after living for many years a life of intemperance and depravity, signed the pledge, and to the astonishment of all who knew him he became quite a changed character, and attained to considerable property.*

CAB-STAND—A WAITER AT A TAVERN ASSISTS THE MISSIONARY—TWO CABMEN SIGN.

Visited a cab-stand, when a number of cabmen surrounded the missionary, among them was a waiter from the opposite tavern, who said, he thought it very little use introducing anything of the kind to them, as it was reckoned the worst stand in London. But if, said he, you can get that man, referring to the one whom the missionary was addressing, to sign the pledge, you will gain a greater victory than ever Nelson did. Yes ; remarked another, he is the greatest drunkard I ever knew. The missionary then asked if it was true what had been said of him, when he replied in the affirmative, and said it was time he made some alteration, as he had lost several situations through drunkenness. To the surprise of every one present, he then asked for the book and signed the pledge, remarking, that in a few months he should be able to purchase a cab of his own with the money saved from the public-house. Another cabman, who had been listening attentively to the conversation, on observing what had been done, quietly took the book and followed his example.

KEEPING THE PLEDGE—TESTIMONY—NEW CLOCK, NEW CHAIRS, AND NEW BIBLE.

Re-visited W. W., who said we have kept our pledge, and are beginning to realise its benefits, shewing the missionary a new clock, a half-dozen new chairs, and a pair of candlesticks. He said he was also subscribing for a new bible, and never was so comfortable, having also plenty of work. The missionary then visited the next room, and on entering, the man said, I have promised you many times that I would adopt your principle ; but if I only keep promising, I shall never do it. I will now sign the pledge, his wife following his example.

A POLICEMAN DANCING THE POLKA.

Saw two policemen, one of whom was amusing himself by dancing. On the missionary coming up, the man said to him, what do you think of my polka. The missionary replied, the best he ever saw was the teetotal polka, and producing his pledge-book offered to teach him the first step. The other policeman remarked, he might do worse than sign the pledge ; his looks will tell you he drinks, see what a sickly appearance he has. The other (in continuation) said, that he knew an individual who was once rich, but through drink became poor. A friend obtained for him a situation as superintendent of police, but from the same cause was dismissed, and was now a miserable outcast.* The polka man signed, has since been visited and stands firm.

W. STONEMAN.

* Why did not the serjeant himself sign?—SUPERINTENDENT.

† The other day a teetotaler overtook a policeman, No. —, in the street, reeling drunk:—The teetotaler advised him forthwith to sign the pledge.—"Ah, (says he) I will go home and go to bed." Wherein do such as these differ from the "Charleys" of old? As a body, we believe, they are sober, many having adopted the principle; and the Commissioners have only to say, they will engage no others in future, and the whole corps would soon become teetotalized.—Ibid.

WESTMINSTER, NORTH-EAST.—No. VI.

STREET LABOURS—THE LIBERAL LANDLADY—THE BAR-MAID SIGNS.

Addressed a group standing by the door of the King's Head public-house, in C— street. A tailor, whose appearance gave strong evidence of his being a drunkard, said, he was now out of employ through drink: he signed the pledge, and was followed by a young man a carpenter.

During the operation, the landlady of the public-house came to the door, listening; on being asked if she would become a teetotaler, she declined; but immediately after, the bar-maid came to the door, and calling to the missionary, asked if she might sign the pledge; certainly, if you wish it. 'It is my wish, for I spend a great deal of money, and though I live in a public-house, my mistress will not hinder my being a teetotaler.' she signed.

A CONCISE HISTORY OF A SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER.

Visited the police-station, in New-way. Upon a tract being given to J. V., a young man 20 years of age, he said, drink is the cause of your seeing me here; eighteen months ago, I left the town of ——— where for several years I was a member of the Wesleyan Society, and a Sunday-school teacher, and came to London, when I fell in with company that enticed me to the public-house, which soon led to my being a drunkard. Three months ago, being at the public-house, and having spent all my money, I then agreed with my companion to go home and take a pair of my master's boots to pawn, which I afterwards sold, and spent the money, and for which I was apprehended, tried at the Old Bailey, and sentenced to three months in Newgate. I came out yesterday morning, and am now come to the police-station to obtain a few things the police took from me when I was apprehended. The missionary advised him at once to sign the pledge. He signed, remarking, that if he had but been a teetotaler, it would have kept him from prison and disgrace, and preserved his peace of mind: he then signed.

THE WELL-EDUCATED FEMALE.

On entering a house in D— lane, a female, with dishevelled hair, and distorted countenance, was seated on the threshold, to whom the missionary gave a tract. Taking it, she said, I will read it; my mother, who is now in heaven, gave me a good education.* She was then asked to sign the pledge; gazing, she exclaimed, I am a lost woman! She then moved away to the foot of the stairs, and again sat down—weeping and wringing her hands, she cried, oh! drink has been my ruin; and I have no friend in the world to speak to me for my good. I have been drinking for the last three weeks, and my heart now feels as though it was on fire. Yesterday, I sold my cap to get more drink—I am now meditating my destruction by cutting my throat, for I am a lost woman! She again wept. The missionary endeavoured to shew her there was yet hope, if she would take the necessary steps for her deliverance; she signed.

A GROUP—THE PUBLIC-HOUSE MODE OF SHAKING HANDS AMONG FEMALES.

Passing along C—P— street, a group of females sitting at a door, called the missionary. One of them, J. C—, who had been visited several times, and urged to become a teetotaler, asked him to allow her to sign the pledge, adding, that she wished she had taken the missionary's advice before, for yesterday, she pawned her shawl and boots, and spent all the money. While at the public-house, one of her friends, professing to shake hands, stole her marriage-ring from her finger: she signed.

THE REVIEW—A REGULAR ENGAGEMENT.

Another of the same group, a mother of three children, having a dreadful bruised face and black eye, said, she yesterday accompanied her husband to the Park, to see the review; thinking they must have a drop of beer to help them on, went to the public-house, and both became intoxicated. On arriving at home, they had a regular engagement, the wife getting the worst of it. She said that her husband had plenty of work, but they spent all they got, including the assistance the pawn-shop rendered them besides: she signed.

LODGING-HOUSE SCENES AND CUSTOMS.

M. M—, a great drunkard, the wife of a blind man. The husband gets his living by begging, and is led through the streets by a little dog. They are both living in one of those lodging-houses in which are herded together young and old, male and female, consisting of beggars, pedlars, scavengers, navigators, street-singers, public-house actors, thieves, bad women, married and unmarried, the ignorant, and those that are better taught; many of the latter would be glad to move to better lodgings if they had the means, and others who choose it as the best place for concealing and prosecuting their various schemes of vice, which is here to be seen in all its forms; drinking, swearing, gambling, lying, and thieving, is the rule; truth, integrity, and sobriety, the exception. It is not uncommon for gin to be brought in by the landlord or landlady of the house, and retailed out to the company, taking care to lay on a good per centage for themselves. In order to elude the vigilance of the exciseman, the spirit is conveyed into the house in the tea-pot. There is no difference made here between Sundays and other days, and the doors are open all night. They sleep three or four in a bed, indiscriminately, the beds scarcely fit for pigs to lie on, and frequently twenty or more in a room. The rooms are exceeding dirty, abounding with vermin, and emitting an effluvia almost unsupportable. The missionary, in some instances, has succeeded in getting the keepers of these houses and some of their lodgers to sign the pledge. In such cases, the houses become greatly improved: the blind beggar man's wife signed the pledge.

THE TEN PRINTERS—FOUR SIGNATURES IN A LODGING-HOUSE.

J. B—, one of a group of ten printers, from Lancashire, professedly seeking employment, living at present in a lodging-house, signed the pledge, and were followed by three others of the same party.*

TESTIMONY—HAD TRIED DRINKING AND FOUND IT TO BE RUINOUS.

T. H—, in C— Court, on being asked to sign the pledge, said, that he was quite willing, for he had tried drinking and found it to be ruinous. He had spent £170 in seventeen months, and had lost a situation where he earned three pounds ten shillings per week. He had been offered £1400 and a good shop of work, to give up drinking, but to no purpose. Had a house well furnished, but all is sold, and his clothes gone to the pawn-shop, and is now without a change of raiment: he signed the pledge.

THE POCKET MONEY.

His wife being present, confirmed the truth of her husband's statement, and said, that the parents of both were religious, and wished to have seen them do better; but she had acquired a love for the drink very early, was accustomed to spend the pocket-money allowed by her parents, in drink, so that she became a drunkard at the age of fourteen, and had continued so till the present time, a period of eighteen years, being now thirty-two. When out drinking, and had spent all her money, she would go home, at one time take the knives and forks, tea-cups and spoons, at another her own clothes, (even to her pocket) her child's clothes, and either sell or pawn them to get more drink: she signed. E. W. a young

BUT YOU CAN GET A SHILLING ON IT.
 Knocking at the door of W. B.—, the missionary's son was arrested by a female voice exclaiming, in a ve manner—"No; I will not take my apron, it is ave to cover me from the world." A man's voice y, said, "but you can get a shilling on it, and I most dead for a half-pint of beer." The female gain replied, "but I will not—I will not take it." e, then," said the man, "take the body of the you have." "No; I will not," replied the woman, I take neither." At this moment the missionary d the room, (which sent forth a most disagreeable which presented the appearance of a dungeon; orjority of the squares in the window being of wood, remainder were broken, against these the shutters closed to keep out the wind. The husband was upon some old rags, as a substitute for a bed, and presented the appearance of a confirmed drunkard. The wife had an infant at the breast and two other n at her side; she looked on the missionary as she ned, "I am miserable, and drink is the cause." ed, that she and her husband had been drinking, ery thing they had was either sold or pawned,* hey were now without bread for themselves and children. The pledge-book was then presented to when the wife signed. The husband declined, by e, he was too ill, having eaten nothing for some and must have a little more beer before he could ything.

SMOKE HERRING AND SHAD THAMES.—
 No. VII.

THE DOUBTFUL RECONCILIATION.
 A tradesman, a teetotaler, called upon the missionary requested him to come and see his drunken wife, (also a teetotaler,) who had threatened to sell the ure, to break up her home and leave him. The onary went, succeeded in preventing a sale of the ure, and reconciled her to her husband. They shook e; she would not again sign, but promised not to e to excess.

A GROUP—TESTIMONY.
 Addressing a group, a man said, it is now two years I took the pledge, and I am now in very comfort-circumstances. My wife has been a teetotaler six e. His wife, who was present, exclaimed, yes; we happy now, Sir.

TESTIMONY—AM ABLE TO DO WITHOUT STRONG DRINK.

I have tried the principle since I last saw you, said an ly man, (who had been a steward and leader in the eyan Society,) and am able to do without strong e. I feel my health improved already. "Well," the missionary, "you have fallen through moderate ing, your only remedy and means of safety is, the ion of the total abstinence principle." I will sign the old man, and rejoin the Society, and hope it will ed both for body and soul; he then signed.

A WIFE'S RESOLUTION.
 Two men, greatly intoxicated, were asked to sign the e; I was once a teetotaler, said one of them, and mpoyer tells me, that if I do not become sober he discharge me and take on inferior hands. I intend n you sometime. Then do so at once, said the mis- ry, you cannot have a better opportunity; he took ook, and after making some observations to a man, (who was witness to the whole,) signed the pledge. The missionary called at his residence, and informed his wife what her husband had done—she said he is now sober, and at his work, and "I am resolved to keep him company."^{*}

THE LOCAL PREACHER RESTORED TO HIS RIGHT MIND.

Conversing with several persons upon the importance of good example, a young man, a local preacher, said—when in the country I was a teetotaler, an advocate also, and zealous for the cause. I have taken many a drunkard to the meeting, and obtained his signature. You must come amongst us again, said the missionary, as a religious man and a local preacher, your example will have much influence; he signed the pledge. Another Wesleyan who had gone back signed again.

PORTMAN MARKET.—No. IX.

DRUNKEN FAMILIES—FIRST FAMILY—NOT ONE GOOD OUT OF FIFTEEN.

Visiting a family in B— place was informed by the mother, that she had fifteen children, and there was not one good among them; the father and several of the children were drunkards. Addressing one of the sons, he said that he had been robbed of twelve shillings (the whole of his week's wages) at a public-house, on the Sunday night previous. He was asked if that did not teach him a lesson? He replied, "No; and that nothing would make him give over drinking."

SECOND FAMILY.

Visiting in P— Place, a wife and a mother, who abstains herself, informed the missionary, that her husband and four sons were drunkards, and that a fifth son died a short time ago, through drunkenness.

THE DRUNKARD DOES NOT LIVE TO HIMSELF.

M. F—, residing in Little C— Street, has suffered so severely in her circumstances, through the intemperance of others, that having lost all her property, she is now dependent on her son for a livelihood; she signed the pledge.

SUNDAY LABOURS—A NEIGHBOUR.

Meeting with a drunkard on Sunday morning, and advising him to sign the pledge, a moderate-drinking neighbour standing by, remarked, that if he did, he was certain he would not keep it. Notwithstanding this announcement, he was not deterred from signing; adding, that he hoped he should keep it.

TESTIMONY—FIRST TESTIMONY.

A shopkeeper observed to the missionary, that he has tried teetotalism for some time, and finds that it has brought him more credit, more money, and more comfort.

SECOND TESTIMONY.

Visiting the wife of a labourer, in C— street, she said, that after she became a teetotaler, she soon saved money enough to buy a pig, and that the one pig has increased to four.†

BANKSIDE, SOUTHWARK.—No. X.

IT MUST be banished from the land.

TESTIMONY—RE-SIGNATURES.

J. H. and his wife were consistent teetotalers for several years, but were tempted to break their pledge. The husband acknowledged they could do well without intoxicating liquors. He had occasionally abstained for weeks, then spending all he could get. They begged the missionary to call the next day, (as they wished a little time to consider the subject). On being visited (as requested) they both signed.

A SUNDAY SCHOLAR.

† We hope that neither the shopkeeper, nor the wife of the labourer, will forget the cause, that has, under God, thus blessed them. But as they have "freely received, they will freely give."—Matt. x. 8.

G— Street, observed one of them (A. S., quite a young woman) much the worse for liquor. She had been brought up in a Sunday School: she was well instructed in the scriptures: she showed the missionary a hymn book, which she had carefully preserved, but now both she and her companions make a mock of its contents. After considerable conversation with the whole party, A. S. expressed a wish to sign the pledge, to which the missionary gladly assented. She then directed him to another person in the house who was also addicted to drinking. The case of this young woman shows the necessity of teetotalism, forming part of a Sunday School education.

THE GOOD (EXPERIMENTAL) ADVICE OF A DRUNKARD—TWO COOPERS SIGN.

The husband of A. B. was a drunkard, and had separated from his wife. He was a cooper by trade; the wife went with the missionary and pointed out the cooperage where her husband worked. There were two men at work, (one of whom was the husband,) and both acknowledged themselves drunkards. A week after the missionary again visited the cooperage, and found only one of the above-mentioned men, (not the husband,) and a stranger, (a young man) at work. The drunkard said, it would be an excellent thing for the "stranger" to sign before he acquired the bad habits of the London workmen. The "young man" said, he believed it would, for he was disgusted with what he had already seen; his fellow-workmen were sending or going out almost every half-hour for something to drink, and were often drunk in the shop. After some further conversation on the subject, both the drunkard and the young man signed the pledge. The absent drunkard was in prison for ill-treating his wife while intoxicated.

DRUNKARDS DO NOT LIVE TO THEMSELVES.

Went into a saddle-tree maker's shop, when J. S., pointing to another man who sat at work, said, "If you could but get him to sign the pledge, it would be little short of a miracle. He has wasted an immense sum in drink, and not only himself, but I and others are suffering through him." The man was spoken to but hesitated, on account of an engagement to form one of a party of pleasure the next Sunday. The missionary endeavoured to divert him from his purpose, and was seconded by J. S., who warmly pressed the subject, and said he would most willingly sign if his companion would. This well-timed proposal decided the case, and both signed. J. S. then expressed a wish that his son (a lad of 17 years) would sign, for while he earned a great deal of money he spent it mostly in beer. The lad was at length induced to follow his father's example.

J. S. WARREN.

SOMERS TOWN.—No. XI.

THE SAILOR—GROG—AND TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

On presenting a tract to a sailor, and speaking to him on the subject of total abstinence, he replied, by saying, I know it is a good thing; if I had been a teetotaler seven years ago, I might have had several hundred pounds in my pocket now; but I am off to China in a few days, and I don't think I can do without a little grog, when out at sea. The missionary told him there were sailors who had abstained, and who had kept their pledge; he said, well, I will try, and then signed.

TESTIMONY—DEMONSTRATION—AND CONVICTION.

C. S.—, who commenced his drunken career at the early age of fourteen, and has continued so up to the present time, a period of twenty years, refused to sign; but another individual, living under the same roof, and who also was a great drunkard, signed. In the course of a fortnight, he became such an altered man as to force conviction on the mind of C. S., that on a re-visit, he acknowledged that Mr. B. was quite a new man since he became a teetotaler; and said, that he was now determined to try the principle for himself; he then signed.

WOMAN'S CURSE.

H. P.—, a woman of superior address, and who had been well educated, said she was ruined by drink, been a drunkard nearly twenty years.* She had through a little estate, (worth three hundred pounds) within the last two years. A short time since, at home, with twenty sovereigns, and remained out spent all; she had now made up her mind to have with it for ever; she then signed.

INTOXICATING DRINK INFATUATING.

Had an affecting interview with Mrs. D., an ex-Christian, who signed the pledge, with a view to her infatuated husband, but who has hitherto gone from bad to worse. The missionary found her in distress, on account of the drunken habits of her husband. The missionary reasoned with him on the inevitable both to body and soul, that must follow his continuing his present course. He replied, (in a bitter tone,) if I feel determined to go to H—ll, what is that to or to any one else! †

A HUSBAND'S TESTIMONY.

M. O., a chair caner, able to earn high wages, but self and wife being both drunkards, they were reduced to great distress. The missionary, several weeks persuaded the husband to try teetotalism, but could not prevail on his wife then to follow his example; length the latter also signed. The missionary has visited them and found both adhering to the pledge. The husband confessed how comfortable he was, and he should never go back.

DRINKING CUSTOMS—CANNOT SELL MY SOOT.

On introducing teetotalism to a chimney-sweeper, it is an excellent system; I was once a tiler, and wish I could have stuck to it, but I was obliged to drink, as I could not sell my soot to the farmers out drinking with them.

CAB-STAND—TESTIMONY—THE TEETOTAL.

J. W., who signed the pledge at the beginning of the year, said to the missionary, look here, (pointing to a new cab,) I bought this splendid cab the other day, which cost me fifty-five pounds. I paid twenty down going to pay ten to-morrow, and hope to pay the remaining twenty-five pounds in a few weeks. I have three cabs and seven horses, if I had kept up the teetotaling system, I should have had neither cab nor horse at this time.

INTOXICATING DRINK HAS NO RESPECT FOR RELIGION.

W. C., a mechanic of good talents and address once a member of a Baptist Church, but had fallen through drink, which stifled his convictions, seared his conscience, and hardened his heart to such an extent, as to lead him to make a mock at sin, and plunge into all kinds of iniquity, he found Satan to be a hard master, and to pay bad wages. For several years he endured horrors indescribable, which brought him to a state of frenzy, almost amounting to madness, shrill out for help, and declaring, in the most solemn manner, there were demons in the room, tearing him in pieces. In this state he would spring out of bed, rush out of room, and run about the house uttering the most frantic cries. For several nights he durst not sit in bed when it began to get dark, nor attempt to go to bed, would go out and walk about the streets all night day-light; after some serious conversation, with the missionary, and a promise of God to sanctify the awful dispensation to the both of body and soul, he signed the pledge, with his wife and son.

WILLIAM CLARKE.

* No doubt moderate-drinking formed part of the training of this individual. The day will come, and we trust soon, when total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, will necessarily be included in a good education.—SUPERINTENDENT.

† We trust that the missionary is equally determined by God's grace, he shall not go to —. There are others we know, who have proceeded further than intimations they would do—they have actually attempted to lay hands upon themselves, yet have become consistent teetotalers and good Christians.—Ibid.

THE MEXICANS.

Their national drink is pulque, which Meyer, in his late work on Mexico, describes as like sour lemonade, improved by the addition of cream of tartar; while Kendall in his Santa Fé Expedition, says, "it had the flavour of stale small beer, mixed with sour milk." The former, however, tasted some sent from Puebla, which was delicious. It is made from the maquey aloe, or Agave Americana. By distillation, a strong liquor is made from pulque, called mescal, the intoxicating influence of which, tends much to the degradation of the lower classes in Mexico.—Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

LAZARETTOS.—"I found nothing remarkable in the prisons of Constantinople, but that they were very still and quiet. I was at a loss to account for this, till I reflected, that the only beverage for the prisoners is water."—Extract from An Account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe, by Howard, the philanthropist.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

WATER.

"Ariston men udor."—PINDAR.
 "Water is indeed the best drink."

Health dwells beside my flowing streams,
 And round me sheds her rosy beams,
 O, drink of me!

Drink deeply of my crystal flood,
 'Twill cleanse and purify thy blood,—
 Then, drink of me.

Alike of heaven and earth the daughter,
 The sons of earth have called me "Water."
 When I descend

From heaven, in kind refreshing showers,
 The grateful, dropping, fragrant flowers
 In homage bend.

Of from beneath this earth's cold breast,
 I rise in sparkling jewels drest,
 To spread around
 A generous, healthful, flowing feast
 For man and each inferior beast,
 And bless the ground.

Where'er my fertile footsteps tread,
 With sparkling green the earth is spread;
 Heaven's lovely bow
 Attends on each luxuriant shower,
 To tell my balmy healing power,
 Where'er I go.

The rivers are my silver bands;
 With wandering and liquid hands
 I mark their course:
 As in the clouds I sit above,
 Soft rising vapours speak their love
 For me their source.

Ocean is mine, my arms embrace
 This world and all the human race;
 I could o'erflow

Mankind in my revengeful clasp,
 And with one fierce tremendous grasp,
 'Whelm them in woe!

But mortals, unto you I've given,
 The simplest, richest boon of heaven—
 Then drink of me!

Gladness and health still make their home
 Where'er my balmy waters come,
 O drink of me!

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT.

THE PRESS.

When we name the Press, we make mention of an instrument, which has proved itself to be more potent than all the dread machinery of war. Among no people has its power been more felt than among our own, and considered as a whole, among no other people has it maintained a more dignified and honourable character. No mind, therefore, of very extraordinary ability, was required to perceive, that it was pre-eminently desirable to enlist the services of this mighty engine in favour of the cause of Temperance. But with us, as with all popular governments, the Press is, to a very great extent, dependent upon the people. Society acts upon the Press, and the Press re-acts upon Society. It is the people who impart to it that power which we behold it exerting, in our day, to such an astonishing extent; and, unfortunately, at the introduction of the Temperance Reform, the people were adverse to the "new-fangled" doctrine. The Press, therefore, was adverse too, and siding with the multitude, it took little pains to hide its hatred and its scorn.

It was in the face of this twofold opposition, that the men of 1834-5 laboured and toiled; they toiled manfully and bravely, and success to some small degree, soon crowned their efforts. A Temperance Press was established—tracts were printed and widely scattered—and publications devoted to the special advocacy of total abstinence sprang up in every direction. An effect was thus produced, but inasmuch as the range of influence was limited, the effect was limited also. The masses were untouched—but the movement progressed; and the cloud, not larger than a man's hand so increased, that it soon enveloped the three kingdoms. Then, public attention was aroused, and public curiosity excited: a portion of the Press—the public-house portion—became angry; the other portion kept silence. Neither silence nor anger could, however, arrest the great Reform: a crisis was evidently approaching—that crisis has come. The Press is awakening—that portion which was mute, is mute no longer; while that portion which scoffed and raged, is becoming more “beautifully less.” The Press feels that it wants light upon the subject, and is willing to receive it. Five weekly newspapers have admitted articles in favour of Temperance into their columns—some of them as leaders—and are ready to do so again; one, has frequently given engravings of great temperance celebrations, and another has lately re-published our last Annual Report.

Neither is the religious Press asleep, although we grieve to say, it has been so too long. Several of the most influential periodicals have resolved not to publish advertisements of intoxicating liquors; and one, (we need not name it)—the most widely circulated among the Dissenting body, has come forward avowedly and unreservedly in defence of that great cause which is intimately connected with the religious regeneration of mankind. An example so noble, will not—cannot, be lost. We know the editors of several others to be teetotalers, and a more numerous class still, are “extremely favourable.” Is the literary press silent? To this interrogation, we gladly reply in the negative. Men of letters are beginning to see that the temperance cause is not one in which the illiterate alone can be engaged with advantage. The false glare which distinguished names have thrown around the wine glass, is swiftly vanishing away. Literary Journals and Magazines are changing condemnation into praise. It will not, we are sure, be deemed invidious to mention, with particular approbation, the services which the Messrs. Chambers of Edinburgh, have rendered the cause of sobriety, through the medium of their numerous valuable publications. The United Service Gazette has often dwelt on the advantages of abstinence in the army and navy. An article by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, appeared in the September number of Colburn's New Monthly Magazine, setting forth in glowing terms the virtues of pure cold water; and still more recently, we were delighted to behold in Tait's Edinburgh Magazine, an Essay “On the Temperance Movement” itself, from the pen of Mr. De Quincy, who is one of the first scholars of the age.

These things augur well—they are bright and cheering omens—we accept them as pledges of more general and cordial support—we hail them as instalments of a debt which the religious, literary, and political press owe to the Total Abstinence Reform. We have said that the action of the people and the press is mutual; the people influence the press, and the press the people; let us then influence BOTH; let us act upon the people by the press, and upon the press by the people. Success will then be no longer uncertain, and if this object engage our warmest exertions, success will be deserved.

The Press of Great Britain has done much for the people: it has defended their rights, often proved a bulwark to their liberties, and elevated them in the scale of mental and moral excellence; but for no act will it deserve better of posterity, and, by no act will it encircle itself with more unfading glory, than by heartily uniting to forward the Temperance Movement, and by thus aiding to annihilate Intemperance, which has been cursing man for four thousand years, rendering him diseased in body, blighted in mind, and polluted in soul—unfitting him to perform his duty as a creature to his God, or as a citizen to his country—making his life miserable, and excluding him from all hope of enjoying a state of bliss hereafter!

TAIT'S MAGAZINE AND TEMPERANCE.

REMARKS ON AN ARTICLE BY MR. DE QUINCY, (THE ENGLISH OPIUM EATER,) IN TAIT'S MAGAZINE FOR OCTOBER.

It is our intention to present our readers with a digest of—and some observations upon—an article which appeared in Tait's Edinburgh Magazine for last month, entitled “The Temperance Movement of Modern Times,” written by Mr. De Quincy, the profound Greek scholar, better known as the “English Opium-Eater.”

The article opens thus—

“The most remarkable instance of a combined movement in society, which history, perhaps, will be summoned to notice, is that which, in our own days, has applied itself to the abatement of intemperance. Naturally, or by any direct process, the machinery set in motion would seem irrelevant to the object: if one hundred men unite to elevate the standard of temperance, they can do this with effect only by improvements in their own separate cases: each individual, for such an effort of self-conquest, can draw upon no resources but his own. One member in a combination of one hundred, when running a race, can hope for no co-operation from his ninety-nine associates. And yet, by a secondary action, such combinations are found eminently successful. Having obtained from every confederate a pledge, in some shape or other, that he will give them his support, thenceforwards they bring the passions of shame and self-esteem to bear upon each member's personal perseverance. Not only they keep alive and continually refresh in his thoughts the general purpose, which else might fade; but they also point the action of public contempt and of self-contempt at any defaulter much more potently, and with more acknowledged right to do so, when they use this influence under a license, volunteered, and signed, and sealed, by the man's own hand. They first conciliate his countenance through his intellectual perceptions of what is right; and next they sustain it through his conscience, (the strongest of his internal forces,) and even through the weakest of his human sensibilities. That revolution, therefore, which no combination of men can further by abating the original impulse of temptations, they often accomplish happily by maturing the secondary energies of resistance.

“Already in their earliest stage, these temperance movements had obtained, both at home and abroad, a national range of grandeur. More than ten years ago, when M. de Tocqueville was resident in the United States, the principal American Society counted two hundred and seventy thousand members: and in one single state (Pennsylvania) the annual diminution in the use of spirits had very soon reached half a million of gallons. Now a machinery must be so far good which accomplishes its end: the means are meritorious for so much as they effect. Even to strengthen a feeble resolution by the aid of other infirmities, such as shame or the very servility and cowardice of deference to public opinion, becomes prudent and laudable in the service of so great a cause. Nay, sometimes to make public profession of self-distrust by assuming the coercion of public pledges, may become an expression of frank courage, or even of noble principle, not fearing the shame of confession when it can aid the powers of victorious resistance. Yet still, so far as it is possible, every man sighs for a still higher victory over himself: a victory not tainted by bribes, and won from no impulses but those inspired by his own higher nature, and his own mysterious force of will; powers that in no man were ever fully developed."

The design of "the pledge" is here hardly fairly stated. There can be no objection to every man's striving to attain this "higher victory;" when his inward resolution shall be as binding to him as a written declaration; but constituted as society is, the pledge acts a quietus upon the well-meant, but mistaken, and oftentimes, troublesome importunity of friends to partake of the flowing bowl. Again, even though a pledge may not be necessary for us, it may be essential to the safety of the reclaimed drunkard, whose confidence is wavering, and who possesses but little strength of mind; and shall we hesitate to subscribe a "pledge," not perhaps for our own sakes, but as an example and an encouragement to our weaker brethren?*

"This being so, it is well that from time to time every man should throw out any hints that have occurred to his experience,—suggesting such as may be new, renewing such as may be old, towards the encouragement or the information of persons engaged in so great a struggle. * * *

"I make no scruple, therefore, of speaking as from a station of high experience and of most watchful attention, which never remitted even under sufferings that were at times absolutely frantic.

"I. The first hint is one that has been often offered, viz. the diminution of the particular liquor used, by the introduction into each glass of some inert substance, ascertained in bulk, and equally increasing in amount from day to day. But this plan has often been intercepted by an accident: shot, or sometimes bullets, were the substances nearest at hand; and an objection arose from too scrupulous a caution of chemistry as to the action upon lead of the vinous acid. Yet all objection of this kind might be removed at once, by using beads in a case where small decrements were wanted, and marbles, if it were thought advisable to use larger. Once for all, however, in cases deeply rooted, no advances ought ever to be made but by small stages: for the effect, which is insensible at first, by the tenth, twelfth, or fifteenth day, generally accumulates unenormably under any bolder deductions."

To these assertions of the learned writer, we offer a respectful, but most energetic opposition. The question at issue is based on a plain matter of fact, and facts have long ago placed it beyond dispute. Thousands and tens of thousands of the victims of intemperance have tried the experiment of at once totally abstaining, and they have succeeded. Their testimony is on record:—we have heard it from the lips, and read it in the written statements of many. Supported as we feel ourselves to be by myriads of living witnesses, who have all passed through the severe and fiery ordeal, we would, with all deference to the author, materially alter the last sentence in the previous quotation, and say, "Once for all, in cases however deeply rooted, no advances ought to be made by small degrees; for the effect which is sensible at first, will gradually abate, and if the abstinence plan is persevered in, will at length totally expire." We feel sorry that Mr. De Quincy has not stopped "to illustrate this point" more at length, particularly as he immediately adds,

"Certain it is, that by an error of this nature at the outset, most natural to human impatience under exquisite suffering, too generally the trial is abruptly brought to an end through the crisis of a passionate relapse."

The writer continues—

"II. Another object, and one to which the gladiator matched in single duel with intemperance, must direct a religious vigilance, is the digestibility of his food: it must be digestible not only by its original qualities, but also by its culinary preparation."

To this subject, which certainly is worthy of the especial attention of all whose constitutions are impaired by the use of alcoholic potations—a considerable space is allotted. Respecting indigestion it is stated—

"If cases so endless even of suicide, in every generation, are virtually traceable to this main root, much more must it be able to shake and undermine the yet palpitating frame of the poor fugitive from intemperance; since indigestion in every mode and variety of its changes irresistibly upholds the temptation to that form of excitement which, though one foremost cause of indigestion, is yet unhappily its sole immediate palliation."

The importance of exercise then passes under consideration, forming matter for the third division, in which the writer's own experience is lengthily and somewhat amusingly detailed.

"IV. I counsel the patient not to make the mistake of supposing that his amendment will necessarily proceed continuously, or by equal increments, because this, which is a common notion, will certainly lead to dangerous disappointments.

"V. I counsel the patient frequently to call back before his thoughts—when suffering sorrowful collapses, that seem unmerited by anything done or neglected—that such, and far worse, perhaps, must have been his experience, and with no reversion of hope behind, had he persisted in his intemperate indulgences: these also suffer their own collapses, and (so far as things not co-present can be compared) by many degrees more shocking to the general instincts.

"VI. I exhort him to believe, that no movement on his own part, not the smallest conceivable, towards the restoration of his healthy state, can by possibility perish."

The VII. caution has reference to the mode by which the patient may test the amount of his advance.

"VIII. Another important caution is, not to confound with the evil of intemperance any other natural effects of debility from advanced years."

The IX. caution has reference to those whose health has become fully re-established, such persons being wisely counselled never to have recourse to stimulants in seasons of depression, or to "drive dull care away."

"As the occasional craving does really arise in most men, it is well to notice it; and chiefly for the purpose of saying, that this dangerous feeling wears off by degrees; and oftentimes for long periods it intermits so entirely as to be even displaced by a profound disgust to all modes of artificial stimulation. At those times I have remarked that the pleasurable condition of health does not seem weakened by its want of centralization. It seems to form a thousand centres. This it is well to know; because there are many who would resist effectually, if they were aware of any natural change going on silently in favour of their own efforts, such as would finally ratify the success. Towards such a result they would gladly contribute by waiting and forbearing; whilst, under dependency as to this result, they might more easily yield to some chance temptation."

* "They here said to the drunkard, we will wean you off by degrees from your intemperate habits; and thus with the best intentions, they here contributed to the drunkard's ruin."—DR. EDGAR.

"He who attempts a gradual or partial eradication of an evil will never succeed."—PROFESSOR DWIGHT.

The following observations furnish material for reflection as presenting a philosophical view of the physical causes which have contributed to the sobriety and intemperance of nations.

"Two great races of men, our own in a two-headed form—British and American, and, secondly, the Russian, are those which, like rising deluges, already reveal their mission to overflow the earth. Both these races, partly through climate, or through derivation of blood, and partly through the contagion of habits inevitable to brothers of the same nation, are tainted carnally with the appetite for brandy, for slings, for juleps.

"But it is remarkable, that the whole ancient system of civilisation, all the miracles of Greece and Rome, Persia and Egypt, moved by the machinery of races that were not tainted with any such popular marasmus. The taste was slightly sowed, as an artificial taste, amongst luxurious individuals, but never ran through the labouring classes, through armies, through cities. The blood and the climate forbade it. In this earliest era of history, all the great races, consequently all the great empires, threw themselves, by accumulation, upon the genial climates of the south,—having, in fact, the magnificent lake of the Mediterranean for their general centre of evolutions. Round this lake, in zone of varying depth, towered the whole grandeur of the Pagan earth. But, in such climates, man is naturally temperate. He is so by physical coercion, and for the necessities of rest and coolness. The Spaniard, the Moor, or the Arab, has no merit in his temperance. The effort for him, would be to form the taste for alcohol. He has a vast fore-ground of disgust to traverse before he can reach a taste so remote and alien. No need for resistance in his will where nature resists on his behalf. Sherbet, shaddocks, grapes, these were innocent applications to thirst. And the great republic of antiquity said to her legionary sons:—'Soldier, if you thirst, there is the river;—Nile, suppose, or Ebro. Better drink there cannot be. Of this you may take at "discretion." Or, if you wait till the impedimenta come up, you may draw your ration of Posca. What was posca? It was, in fact, acidulated water; three parts of superfine water to one part of the very best vinegar. Nothing stronger did Rome, that awful mother, allow to her dearest children, i. e. her legions. Truest of blessings, that veiling itself in seeming sternness, drove away the wicked phantoms that haunt the couches of yet greater nations. 'The blessings of the evil genii, says an Eastern proverb, these are curses.' And the stern refusals of wisely loving mothers,—These are the mightiest of gifts.

"Now, on the other hand, our northern climates have universally the taste, latent if not developed, for powerful liquors. And through their blood, as also through the natural tendency of the imitative principle amongst compatriots, from these high latitudes the greatest of our modern nations propagate the contagion to their brothers, though colonizing warm climates. And it is remarkable that our modern preparations of liquors, even when harmless in their earliest stages, are fitted, like stepping-stones, for making the transition to higher stages that are not harmless. The weakest preparations from malt, lead, by graduated steps, to the strongest; until we arrive at the intoxicating porter of London, which, under its local name (so insidiously delusive) of 'beer,' diffuses the most extensive ravages."

In the concluding paragraph of this striking article, Mr. De Quincy, thus briefly, but powerfully depicts the adaptation of the Temperance Movement to the circumstances of the times.

"Under these marked circumstances of difference between the ruling races of antiquity and of our modern times, it now happens that the greatest era by far of human expansion is opening upon us. Two vast movements are hurrying into action by velocities continually accelerated—the great revolutionary movement from political causes concurring with the great physical movement in locomotion and social intercourse, from the gigantic (though still infant) powers of steam. No such Titan resources for modifying each other were ever before dreamed of by nations: and the next hundred years will have changed the face of the world. At the opening of such a crisis, had no third movement arisen of resistance to intemperate habits, there would have been ground for dependency as to the amelioration of the human race. But, as the case stands, the new principle of resistance nationally to bad habits, has arisen almost concurrently with the new powers of national intercourse; and henceforward by a change equally sudden and unlooked for, that new machinery, which would else most surely have multiplied the ruins of intoxication, has become the strongest agency for hastening its extirpation."

SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

The celebrated novelist, better known by the name of BULWER, observes, in a letter to the secretary, "I agree on the main, in the principles of the Temperance Society, and heartily wish it success, as having already done much good, and being calculated to do much more."

IRELAND.

IMPORTANT LETTER FROM FATHER MATHEW.

The following statement having appeared in several of the public papers, we thought it right to inquire into the matter, and have much pleasure in publishing the subjoined satisfactory explanation. The statement in question was to this effect—

"Irish Temperance appears to be seriously on the decline in Mr. Mathew's own district. Seven hundred and eighty prisoners were committed to Cork Bridewell, during the month of September. Of this number, no fewer than 653 were drunkards. During the corresponding month of the past year, the number of drunkards committed to the same prison was 344; showing an increase of 309."

Mr. Mathew's letter is as follows.

Cork, Oct. 22nd, 1845.

MY DEAR MR. COMPTON,

On my return to Cork this morning, from a great Temperance meeting, near Blessington, in the county of Wicklow, I found your esteemed letter on my table. Before replying to it, allow me to state, that five years have elapsed since my first visit to the scene of last Sunday's labours, and that out of many thousands who at that time joined our Society, not five had violated the pledge. More than three thousand new members were enrolled, which is proof to demonstration, that our glorious movement is triumphantly progressing. It is true that 653 drunkards were committed during last September, but the statement was made with a view to damage our cause. If it had not proceeded from an enemy to Temperance, he would have qualified it by saying, that it was during the Cork Races, these and worse excesses were perpetrated; and that the drunkards weekly taken up by the Police, are generally the same persons, and for the most part, prostitutes and their bullies. We have, at present, in Cork, ten thousand teetotalers more than we had last autumn. There is at present, in Ireland, a great increase of employment, and the shopkeepers, tradesmen, and labourers, who have not taken the pledge, are becoming deep drinkers.

The criterion by which to judge of the success of the movement, is to compare the whiskey and porter consumed in Ireland, in the years 1836-37, and part of 1838, with the consumption of the same articles in 1844 and 1845.

Drunkness, as a national sin, has been for ever banished from Ireland.

Our cause has a host of enemies, and I regret to say, that a great portion of the Press has ceased to support Teetotalism.

As I never depended upon the arm of the flesh, but upon the Lord, I am not discouraged. In the might of the great Jehovah, I proceed; and no matter who is against us, His right hand will complete the work. Pardon this long letter, but I wished to prevent you from being misled by partial prejudiced statements. Grateful for your unvarying goodness,

I am, dear Mr. Compton,
Yours affectionately,
THEOBALD MATHEW.

AGENTS' REPORTS.

R. GAMBLE.—SOMERSET.

Having lately returned from a tour, to advocate our cause, in the county of Somerset, I will now give an account of my labours.

Saturday, August 30th.—Gave an address to working-men in the Merchants' Tailors' Hall, Bristol; the meeting well attended; some signed.

Monday, September 1st.—Attended a festival in the Sydney Gardens, Bath, rather a thin affair, the teetotalers not united, no good can be expected in such cases. In the evening, addressed a large meeting at Bristol, Robert Charlton, Esq., in the chair. A working man spoke admirably; a good feeling seemed to pervade the people.

Tuesday, 2nd.—At Yatton, in the Association Methodist Chapel, assisted by Mr. Bishop, Jun., a farmer and zealous friend to temperance societies. Here the temperance people are active and doing good; the meeting rather small, owing to the harvest not being quite over.

Wednesday, 3rd.—Walked to Axbridge, distributed tracts in the villages on my way, witnessed much poverty among the cottages of the miners, near the Mendip Hills—one poor woman told me, with tears, that her husband earned a pound per week, but her family were almost naked, and her house a wretched hovel. Among these scenes of distress, I now and then found a neat-furnished cottage, with its little garden neatly kept up, and a happy group of rosy children playing in the sunshine, the effects of sobriety. At Axbridge, held a meeting in the British School Room, a few signed. Next day addressed the children of the school, the teacher is a staunch teetotaler.

Thursday.—In the Temperance Hall, at Banwell, the Rev. J. Turner, vicar, in the chair, who opened the meeting with an address of about half an hour: a chemist of the town, and a surgeon from a neighbouring village, both pledged members, were on the platform.

Friday, 5th.—Walked to Wedmore, on my way found several friends of the cause, and distributed tracts in the villages. Wedmore is a large village, and has upwards of 200 working teetotalers; very many of the Wesleyans are amongst them. For some time the Society encountered the most violent opposition, but the Lord has enabled them to overcome it. The origin of this Society is most remarkable; two tradesmen of the village attended a teetotal meeting at Wells, and were convinced that it was right, still they kept on drinking for some months, at length they met one evening in a public-house, and after some conversation, one of them said to the other, "Do you think this will do much longer? Can we maintain our families at this rate? I mean to say those teetotalers at Wells were right, they have opened my eyes; now, if you will agree, we will give up the drinking system now;" the other agreed. They paid their reckoning, left their glasses full amid a house filled with company, went home, drew out a pledge and signed it; both stand firm to this day—one a plumber and glazier, the other a carpenter—both were drunkards and on the point of ruin. Six years has rolled by and both have a thriving trade, and each took me to see a row of houses they had built, as the fruits of sobriety. O! what a noble resolve. Two good meetings were held on Friday and Saturday evenings, (in a room fitted up by Mr. William Russell, the plumber before-mentioned,) which were continued till a late hour each night; several united with society.

Monday, Sept. 11th.—Went to Bridgewater, traversed the back streets and lanes with tracts during the afternoon; spoke to a large company of people on the quay at half-past five o'clock, was listened to with great attention. Adjourned to the public rooms at seven, where a meeting was held, the Rev. C. Carpenter in the chair—on the platform was a person of the most healthy appearance, who had driven a stage-coach for nearly forty years on teetotal principles—the meeting passed off well. Next morning rose early and delivered suitable tracts in sealed envelopes to respectable houses, just as the servants were opening the shutters. Proceeded to Taunton, distributed tracts in the courts and alleys, found many families who had severely suffered by the ravages of intemperance. At four o'clock, a tea meeting was held, at which about 200 sat down—at seven a public meeting commenced, at which Mr. Lovell presided. The town missionary spoke of much distress in the town caused by drink, your agent followed, and was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Fanning, a Catholic Priest, who signed the pledge, amid much applause; but, another cheering scene awaited us, the Rev. Mr. Montgomery, a Unitarian minister, and a man of great influence in the town, arose at the bottom of the room, and asking for a pledge paper signed his name, and gave an address, in which he spoke in high terms of the temperance movement. The meeting closed in the most agreeable manner by many respectable persons taking the pledge. This meeting will be long remembered in Taunton.

Wednesday, 13th.—At Wellington, a meeting in the Town Hall, which was well filled, Silvanus Fox, Esq. in the chair. The cause is in a healthy state, and much good has been done.

Thursday, 14th.—At Milverton, visited many persons with tracts, inviting them to the meeting, accompanied by Henry Steele, Esq. The Friends' meeting house was well filled with a most quiet and attentive audience, who listened to a lengthened address—a good feeling was manifest among the people.

Friday, 15th.—At Ilminster, a small market-town, went to the house of the Rev. J. Weight, Independent minister, who has been for twenty years deprived of his natural sight, and fifteen years an abstainer from strong drink; he entered that town in February last, as pastor of the Independent Church—he found the teetotal society extinct; only few were left who kept to the principle; he sent for some drunkards at different times to his house to talk with them, and commenced giving an address on the Wednesday evening in his chapel, by way of preparing for a more public meeting, and what is more remarkable, this dear servant of God has been instrumental in reclaiming six men from drunkenness in the few months he has resided in the town. The public meeting was a most excellent one, many highly respectable people attended—the lower part of the chapel was quite filled, and the most marked attention paid; at the close a great number of signatures were taken. I passed through the town a few days afterwards, and heard that the meeting had done much good.

Saturday, 16th.—Held another meeting at Taunton, the friends all active; after a lengthened address some respectable persons added their names. I must defer the rest of my Journal to a future time.

SURREY AND SUSSEX.

W. GAWTHORP'S JOURNAL.

1. Since my last report, I have been unusually busy preparing for a Delegates' Meeting to form an Association of those two counties. In a few days I hope to see this accomplished.

2. The tracts have been judiciously circulated, I have every reason to believe, having apportioned them to such places and to the care of individuals, where, in my judgment, they were most required.

3. I have also given public addresses at the following places, Kingston, Chertsey, Guildford, Dorking, and Croydon, in Surrey; and as follows, in Sussex—Crawley, East Grinstead, Arundel, Worthing, Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings. The meeting at Worthing is deserving of notice. A numerous signed requisition was presented to the High Constable, requesting him to call a public meeting in the Town Hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the plans proposed by the National Temperance Society, for the suppression of intemperate drinking; to which request he readily complied, and a deeply interesting meeting was the consequence. After the meeting had been opened by the High Constable, the chair was taken by Thomas Compton, Esq., of Sompting Abbots, and the meeting was addressed by myself and our old friend in this good cause, H. N. Rickman, the well-known commercial traveller.—Let other towns do likewise.

We have recently had a very large and deeply attentive meeting in the Town Hall of Brighton, when I was ably supported by my estimable and talented friend, Mr. Thomas Hudson, the Agent for the Kent Association.

A Society has been formed, and bright prospects of success present themselves in the far-famed malting town of Kingston-upon-Thames. I have every reason for encouragement and hope.

A DELEGATES' MEETING will be held at Brighton, on WEDNESDAY, the 5th of NOVEMBER, at 12 o'clock at noon, for the purpose of forming an Association, to be composed of the various Temperance Societies in the counties of Surrey and Sussex, and for promoting more effectually the Temperance Reformation. A deputation is respectfully solicited from each Town and Society within the precincts of the above counties. Great expense is necessarily increased in forming new Societies and organizing an Association; this is especially the case in reference to Surrey and Sussex.

The following contributions we have great pleasure in announcing, and shall be happy to see the number increased.

Donations can be forwarded to the Office, 39, Moorgate Street, or to J. C. Ferrier, Esq., M.D., Worthing, Sussex.

NORWICH.

GREAT TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL.

The Eighth Anniversary took place in this city on Tuesday 14th, and Wednesday 15th of October. A great improvement in the mode of celebrating this occasion was adopted by the Committee; and instead of a public procession parading the streets as in past years, a Fancy Bazaar was held in the Corn Exchange, which was well sustained by the contributions of the ladies of the district, and afforded strong proof, that the principles of the Society were respected and espoused by a powerful body of friends. The admission was sixpence, returnable to the visitor in payment for his purchases. The hall was tastefully hung with flags and banners, bearing various mottos indicative of the necessity and advantage of Temperance. Some stalls were covered with books and fancy stationery, and all were superintended with great efficiency, which was especially evidenced by the persevering, and we can add, successful endeavours to effect sales.

A TEA PARTY was also announced in St. Andrew's Hall, and this was attended by about 900 persons, the admission being by tickets 1s. 6d. each. The sight was a splendid one, and the feast was not only of "good things" to please the palate, but more particularly "a feast of reason and a flow of soul." In the midst of the tea, the LORD BISHOP of the Diocese entered the hall, accompanied by the Rev. Thomas Clowes, the President, and were enthusiastically received by clapping of hands as they passed along the tables. Tea being over, and the tables cleared, his Lordship addressed the assembly from the upper end of the hall. In the course of his speech, he said, "I could wish that every enemy of Temperance Societies was in the place in which I now stand, and could see what I now behold; because I am persuaded the sight could do no harm, and I am sure this meeting is doing the Temperance Society much good. [Cheers] I am the friend of Temperance Societies. [Cheers.] I have been so for many years, and from all that I have seen, and heard, and read, I have found nothing to stagger the opinion I had formed of them."

Joseph John Gurney, Esq., was prevented from being present, owing to the sudden decease of his sister, Mrs. Fry, but sent a note of apology, enclosing a donation of £10 in aid of the Norfolk Agencies.

Rev. T. Clowes, sen., occupied the chair.

The speakers were Mr. Addleshaw, Dr. Lovell, and the Rev. T. J. Messer.

Extended reports of the speeches, &c., were given in the local papers.

HALSTED.

As our teetotal movements here have received much aid from the distribution of your increasingly interesting and valuable Chronicle, which is now making a bold effort to render its operations nationally beneficial, I embrace the present opportunity of sending a short account of a meeting we had on the 16th inst., when we had the gratification of listening to an impressive and convincing lecture, by Henry Vincent. He lucidly and forcibly proved, beyond contradiction, that true temperance was the most rational, certain, and sufficient means of securing to the millions those comforts, rights, social and political, which every true philanthropist and Christian are earnestly aiming to disseminate amongst them. His eloquent appeals were listened to with the deepest attention and interest, only broken by the bursts of approbation. This meeting was acknowledged by all to be the most respectable, interesting, convincing meeting our teetotal society had ever held.

B. SMITH, Treasurer.

MIDDLETON.

On Saturday, October 11th, the Wesleyan Association preaching-room, Market-place, Middleton, was crowded to excess, when Mr. David Morris, manufacturer of Manchester, delivered a lecture on the principles of abstaining from intoxicating drinks. At the conclusion of his address a collection was made amounting to £58. 4s., towards the expenses of erecting a new temperance hall at Middleton. [The above-named sum has since been made into £63.]

Compendium of Facts.

In GREAT BRITAIN, there are 10,442 persons, and in London, 1,274 persons employed in the manufacture of ale and beer.

In the METROPOLIS, there are 6,061 individuals keeping public-houses and beer-shops.

The FOLLOWING items are taken from the Civil List. Expended during the year ending July, 1845
 For Courts of Justice..... £559,782
 Police and Criminal Prosecutions .. 594,312
 For Houses of Correction..... 703,111

£1,857,205

Question—How much of this outlay of the Public Money, was caused by intemperance?

THERE ARE 2,695 brewers in the United Kingdom, and 86,234 licensed victuallers.

A UNION embracing the counties of Beds, Bucks, and Herts, has been formed. J. D. Bassett, Esq., of Leighton Buzzard, is the Treasurer, and Mr. J. Inwards the Secretary.

LICENSING.—A large number of applications for Licenses in Newcastle, having been made, a deputation from the Temperance Society waited upon the magistrates and presented a memorial against any fresh grants being given. The deputation was received with the utmost courtesy, and the result was, that out of 23 applications only one was granted; and one of the old ones having been refused, there was no increase for the year.

This is a noble example to the Committees of all Temperance Societies, to go and do likewise.

TEMPERANCE MISSIONS on the plan adopted in London, have been established in Newcastle, Rochdale, Hull, and other large provincial towns.

THE AMOUNT of Money expended in Bridgewater for intoxicating liquors, is computed at £26,000 yearly, nearly £500 weekly, or upwards of £70 daily. There are 46 public-houses, and 49 beer-shops. The population is 11,000.

A TOBACCO TEMPERANCE SOCIETY has been established in Spain.

BEER IN CALCUTTA.—“The prices even of the favourite brands, are quoted rather lower, and all are extremely difficult of Sale.”—Times, Oct. 3rd.

THE CHEROKEES.—In the late annual report of P. M. Butler, Esq., Cherokee Agent to the Commissioners of Indian Affairs, the following important information in reference to the progress of temperance in the Cherokee country, is contained. He states that the Cherokee Temperance Society was organized in 1836; that it has been steadily progressing, and that the signatures to the pledge numbered, at the date of his report, two thousand four hundred and seventy-three. He also states, that Lieut. Col. G. Loomis, in addition to doing much for the cause of Temperance in the interior of the Cherokee nation, has established a society among the soldiers, at Fort Gibson, which has produced the most happy and beneficial results.

Advertising Plan.

The plan of inserting articles as Advertisements in the most influential periodicals and magazines, seems to meet with general—we may say—with universal approbation. Some pecuniary support has been afforded; and that, of all support is the most acceptable and useful.

A friend in Caermarthen, had long been wishing to behold such a plan in operation, and on seeing the Advertisement in the Christian Witness, he immediately forwarded a donation of £1.

The following Subscriptions have been already promised:—

The Sub-committee feel encouraged by this practical response to their appeal, and have been enabled thereby to make arrangements for the insertion of several articles in the principal religious periodicals for November; one in particular, bearing upon the failure in the potatoe crop, and the deficiency in the wheat crop, as connected with the worth of the precious grain in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. It may be well to remind our friends, that it is not intended to restrict the plan to religious publications, but to extend it to those of a literary, scientific and miscellaneous character, as soon as sufficient funds have been collected.

AN EXAMPLE.

Willingham, near Lewes, Tenth Month 3rd, 1845.

RESPECTED FRIEND,—I am not a member of the National Temperance Society, but I am very desirous that the Society may be blessed in its endeavours to the very full amount of their most anxious wishes. I am in receipt of the Temperance Chronicle monthly, for which I am obliged; as these and other publications must need pecuniary aid, I beg the Society's acceptance of a donation of ten pounds, which will be paid thee any time after the 6th instant, by thy, or any person for thee, calling at Williams, Deacon, and Co., my bankers. Molineux and Co., Lewes, will give orders for the same.

I am, respectfully,

JOHN RICKMAN.

National Temperance Society.

The majority of our readers are probably aware that a meeting of ministers and laymen was held in Liverpool, at the commencement of October, for the purpose of forming a "Union of the various Evangelical denominations of Christians."

At that meeting it was resolved, that in next June, a conference should assemble in London, at which, Representatives of the various sections of the Christian Church should attend from all parts of the globe.

The Committee of the National Society, having had its attention directed to this fact, a Sub-committee has been appointed to consider and report on the propriety of holding a

about the same time.

It would be useless to dilate on the importance and desirableness of such a Convention being held: it would indeed be in beautiful unison with the strenuous efforts which are in progress, or in contemplation, for the extension of the Temperance cause throughout our land.

The question of expense which would necessarily attend such a step, with other considerations, will come under the notice of the Sub-committee.

For the present, we forbear making any further remarks, but trust we shall be able in our next Number, to state the decision to which the Committee have arrived.

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

Mr. WILSON has been hitherto detained in London in collecting and examining appropriate sets of town tracts, and as soon as the requisite documents have been completed, he will immediately set out on his visit to the North.

THE SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.PETITION MOVEMENT.

We desire to direct the most earnest attention of the friends of temperance and philanthropy in the Metropolis, to the following announcement.

The Committee of the National Society have undertaken on superintending the getting up and distribution of Petitions from the Metropolitan Districts, against the Sunday-traffic in Strong Drink.

Any Temperance Society in London and its vicinity, will be supplied with two petitions—one to the Lords, and the other to the Commons, on application at the Office, 39, Moorgate Street, after the 10th inst.

When those first given are filled up, others can be immediately procured by a similar application.

London, alone, should present petitions, bearing, at the very lowest ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND SIGNATURES.

Let the zeal which was shown on a like previous occasion, be manifested again, only in a much greater degree.

Ministers of religion, who feel interested in this important movement, and who desire their congregations to have an opportunity of expressing their hostility to the disgraceful Sunday Traffic in strong drink, will also be cheerfully supplied with petitions.

FORM OF PETITION.

To the Honourable the Commons, [or to the Right Honourable Lords Spiritual and Temporal] of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, in the of Sheweth,

THE HUMBLE PETITION OF

That your Petitioners having ascertained that there has been a decrease of nearly 50 per cent. in the convictions for drunkenness, occurring in London, since the introduction of the Metropolitan Improvement Act, in the year 1839, one clause of which enforces the closing of Public Houses, from Twelve o'clock on Saturday night, until One o'clock on Sunday, pray your Honourable [or Right Honourable] house, immediately to pass a law for greatly restricting, or entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, on that day.

And your Petitioners further pray, that such law may embrace all public-houses and beer-shops, not only in the metropolis, but also throughout the whole country.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Several Peers and Members of the House of Commons, have been requested to present these Petitions; and we hope to give in our next, a list of those noblemen and gentlemen who have given their consent

In the meanwhile, we have much pleasure in publishing the following courteous reply, received from the Right Honourable Lord Cottenham formerly Lord Chancellor, and one of the greatest lawyers of the age.

Sir,—In answer to your letter of the 21st, I beg to assure you that I take a deep interest in the object of the Temperance Society, and shall be happy to present any Petitions to the House of Lords, in furtherance of the benevolent purpose of the Society.

have the honor to be,

Your obedient Servant,

(Signed)

On a Mission to the Rouen and Havre Railway in France.

The Districts are visited alternately one week in each month.

SUPERINTENDENT.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

From September 1st to October 1st, 1845.

DISTRICT No. I.—A drunken shoemaker admitted that most of the gin and beer was not fit to drink, but thought that Crowley's Alton ale was the best beverage he could take. The missionary recommended water as preferable. On the second visit he promised to try it; and on the third, he signed. Has been re-visited; is firm to his pledge, and his mental powers are evidently improving.

A drunken woman refused to sign herself, but directed the missionary to a drunken companion, a female, who did sign. And such was the beneficial change, that a neighbour not knowing the circumstance, "wondered what was the cause."

DISTRICT No. II.—A wife having a drunken husband, wished the missionary to see him, but not being able to do so on the week-day, called on the following Sunday morning, but did not succeed in obtaining his signature. "Well," said the benevolent moderate-drinking wife, "I will sign, and after awhile he may follow."

Sunday, the instant, a city-missionary and his wife signed. They had tried the principle some time with considerable improvement to their health. The missionary said, that he should in future carry a pledge-book with him, and do all he could to forward the cause in the locality where he laboured.

An old soldier waiting at the workhouse door to take his turn for relief, signed the pledge. When in the West Indies, in a state of drunkenness, he broke his collar-bone. An asthma, which now troubles him he attributed to his drunken habits.

DISTRICT No. III.—A drunken woman signed the pledge, and kept it some months, ("and was never so happy,") when she returned to her drunken habits. One day being thirsty, and aground for the needful, she was proceeding with an article to pawn, when she met an old acquaintance, who directed her where she could pawn it "without the old man seeing her." On reaching the pawn-shop door, she fell, and sprained her ankle. She was carried to the hospital where she remained a fortnight. She still felt the effects of the fall, and believed it was a judgment of God upon her; she signed again.

DISTRICT No. IV.—Mrs. — a teetotaler, a keeper of a lodging-house, acts out her principles among her lodgers, occasionally making a convert. A Scotch widow present said, she liked a drop of whiskey; and at any rate was determined not to sign till she was re-married. One of the lodgers signed.

Mrs. —, a grandmother, seventy-four years of age, for the sake of her grandchildren signed the pledge.

There is a court in A— street, that may be called drunken court, nearly all its inhabitants being drunkards. A mother with her infant by her side was lying in bed in the middle of the day, suffering from the effects of drink the previous evening. She seemed perfectly insensible to her degraded condition. She repeated the oft-told story, of teetotalers dying with ice in their stomachs. There were several other women pointed out, known as drunkards. An old drunken sailor (now a walking cutler) was living in a room, in the same court, not fit for a dog-kennel; he readily signed.

STREET LABOURS.—On returning from the labours of the day, the missionary met with a woman standing in the street, a frightful object. Her two eyes were black and swollen, her face bruised and discoloured, the effects of a thrashing by her husband when drunk. He once broke her nose with the poker. He has been a drunkard for twenty-six years. The wife declined signing then, proposing nevertheless to do it, when in the presence of her husband, hoping to influence him to sign. The missionary took her address and called the following Sunday, in company with missionary No. 5, in whose district they both reside. The husband was not at home, the wife, notwithstanding, re-signed. They had both been teetotalers.

J. S. WARREN.

DISTRICT No. V.—Mrs. — deeply lamented her husband's breaking the pledge, for while he was a teetotaler, said she, our house was a home indeed, kindness was his characteristic when sober, peace and comfort followed. Now he drinks, it is the very opposite. The daughter a young woman about seventeen signed, but the mother would not.*

DISTRICT No. VI.—A wife, (a respectable woman) and family are suffering much through the intemperance of the husband. As he was difficult to be met with, the wife proposed to sign herself in order to induce him to embrace the system. She accordingly signed, her mother and sister following.

On Sunday morning according to promise, called upon J. J.—, who appeared ashamed for the missionary to see his miserable dwelling, and his seven starving children. He had been in better circumstances, but through intemperance had brought himself and family to ruin. Once being intoxicated a man met him in Ratcliff Highway, he professed to come from the same place, and to know him, and then under the pretence of taking it home to his wife, swindled him out of his purse, containing ten pounds. At another time he lost a box of jewellery. He signed the pledge, and his wife rejoicing, signed with him. He said that he would now train up his children in the principles of total abstinence, and when old enough they should sign too.

J. C.— had made several voyages to the East, and saved a little money, which with one hundred and eighty pounds, (being the sum for which he sold a legacy of four hundred pounds,) he had squandered away in trink. He is now without common necessaries, and with his wife and child are dependent upon the charity of his friends. He signed the pledge, to the great joy of a brother who signed about three months since.

C. W.— said, he had tried teetotalism for several months, but had foolishly broke his pledge, and has since been drinking, and losing both his time and money, knowing from experience that total abstinence was the best and safest ground, he resolved to try again; he then re-signed.

DISTRICT No. VII.—J. H.— was with difficulty prevailed upon to sign the pledge, stating that he was strictly moderate, and he thought a little porter necessary for him; but after three months' experience, declared that he was astonished at the difference in the improved state of his health, and that he is enabled to attend to his duties with more pleasure, and moreover from a conviction of its excellence is persuading his neighbours to adopt the system.

DISTRICT No. VIII.—Mrs. C.—, a Christian woman cheerfully signed the pledge with two of her children, she said, that Christian persons would do well to sign, adding, that "ye that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of them that are weak, and not to please ourselves, even as Christ also pleased not himself."

Calling upon J. D.—, he confessed that he had not been sober for the last six months; that he had gone to great lengths in intemperance, and that he was daily destroying his constitution with liquid fire. You see, (continued this young man,) that my face is bruised and mangled, and that I appear mean and emaciated. The missionary told him that the teetotal fire escape was at hand, of the advantage of which he might avail himself, and which under God's blessing might be the means of leading him to take that step by which he might escape everlasting fire. He then signed the pledge, as did also his wife.

* Here is inconsistency, and query whether her moderate drinking was not the occasion of her husband's breaking the pledge.—SUPERINTENDENT.

The missionary had no sooner made his appearance at No. — W — street, when a young man who had suffered severely from intoxicating liquors, on ascertaining the object of the visit, said, total abstinence is a good thing, I once tried it five weeks, and found it beneficial, but unfortunately broke my pledge; upon being urged to try again, he at first felt reluctance, but at length signed. This young man had fought two prize battles for fifty pounds each.

The missionary calling one Sunday morning upon an aged man and his wife, whom he saw a day or two before coming out of a public-house intoxicated, found the man ill in bed through drink, his wife was unwilling that much should be said to them, but at length they both signed the pledge; the missionary praying that through Divine assistance they might be enabled to keep it.

Was informed by the City Missionary of the district, of a notorious drunken woman, with whom a few days previously he saw three other drunken females; upon entering the room the missionaries found the poor creature then in liquor, and raging furiously. After much entreaty she signed the pledge, when the missionaries engaged in prayer.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

DISTRICT No. IX.—STREET LABOURS.—The missionary met a man in the street and gave him the Great Delusion; this brought on a conversation, in the course of which he said, he liked temperance very well, but would never be so weak-minded as to sign the pledge of total abstinence. At length he proceeded to make admissions, and then confessions, acknowledging that he had just spent eighteen-pence (all he had) at the public-house, and had now to go without his dinner. He stated that he could earn from forty shillings to fifty shillings per week, but was not one penny the better, as he spent it all in drink; however, I now see I have been acting the fool's part, and will sign.

On entering a room in R — Lane, found four tailors at work. After some conversation one of them acknowledged that he spent on the average ten shillings per week in drink. The missionary explained to them the principle of total abstinence, and among other things, pointed out the advantage of investing their surplus earnings in provident and building institutions, into the constitution of which societies they made many minute inquiries. All four signed. As the missionary was leaving, a young woman entered, when, by the assistance of his four new converts, she was persuaded to add her name to the list.

DISTRICT No. X.—STREET LABOURS.—The missionary went up to a stall bearing the inscription, "Temperance Castle, ginger and spiced cordials, lemonade," &c.; addressed the owner, (who was no teetotaler) urging him to sign the pledge, and thus let his practice correspond with his trade. He professed to belong to the old Temperance Society, and would not sign at present. While talking with the Temperance Castle man, several others assembled round his stall; among them was a cabman, who said, he had lately lost his situation through drink, and was now standing still for the want of a few shillings to renew his license; he had applied to the publican with whom he had spent the greater part of his earnings, for assistance, but was refused. The missionary advised him to abandon the public-house, and become a teetotaler. He then signed the pledge, on which a gentleman who had been a silent spectator, came forward, and shaking the cabman heartily by the hand, welcomed him as a brother teetotaler, and in a feeling address exhorted him to be faithful to his promise. A few days afterwards, the missionary paid another visit to "Temperance Castle," and after a second attack, (which was met by a feeble resistance) the owner yielded, and thus was added another trophy to the principle of total abstinence.

On re-visiting a saw-yard, the foreman related the following painful circumstance:—A few days since, one of the men was at the public-house; his wife as usual brought his tea and left it at the saw-pit; a fellow-workman who liked a drop of beer, and as an excuse to get to the public-house, said it was a pity his mate's tea should get cold, he would take it to him. On his arrival, the mate who was now drunk challenged the man who brought his tea to wrestle, at the same time laying hold of him, and entwining his leg in the other's, threw him down, breaking one of his legs in two places;* he was immediately removed to the hospital, where the missionary visited him, his wife also being present. It is now five weeks since, and his leg is still very bad. He said, that from what he had seen and endured since he had been in the hospital, he had made up his mind never to enter a public-house again. The missionary replied, by saying, that the only sure preventive was to sign the pledge; he then signed. The wife WOULD NOT SIGN.

DISTRICT No. XI.—Re-visited F. H. and his wife, who were teetotalers of about four months' standing; they had kept their pledge. The husband related many painful things which he had experienced during his long career of drunkenness. The missionary only records the following:—He had been intoxicated every day for two months; his wife could endure it no longer, she left him; no one would give him credit, and every thing but the bedstead had been made away with for drink. For four days he had nothing to eat or to make fire with, and being perishing with cold and hunger, he took the bedstead to pieces and burnt it. In giving expression to the gratitude he felt, he said, it was only "four months" since you took me out of the public-house; and induced me to sign the pledge; since then I have redeemed things from the pawnbrokers to the amount of twenty pounds. He then put his hand in his bosom, and pulling out a bag, said, here is "Tim Doolin's purse,"† containing £7. 5s., saved from the public-house; and now on the Sunday, instead of going there to do honour to Bacchus, we attend God's house, and endeavour to give him the honour due to his name. He then took the missionary to the next door to see a drunkard, wishing the missionary to try and make him a teetotaler. This was a young man, and clever at his business, earning a deal of money, which was spent in drink. On being reasoned with at some length, he signed the pledge, the wife promising to do so too if he remained consistent. On a re-visit he was found firm, and has since got work through keeping the pledge. The wife now signed, as she believed that he had fully made up his mind never to take any strong drink again. He now in company with F. H. frequents the temperance meetings, and is quite an altered man. Another drunkard living in the same place, and the whole of the neighbours have promised to join, if the young man does but keep his pledge.

A female servant called on the missionary, inviting him to come and see if he could make her master a teetotaler, herself first signing by way of example. The missionary went, and was favourably received; he said, that he was formerly a member of a Christian church, but had fallen through drink; he became a teetotaler, but being obliged to transact business at the public-house, he was thus tempted to break his pledge, and had in consequence formed an acquaintance with a set of drunkards like himself; they have been from home for days together, indulging in intemperance. The missionary strongly urged him to try total abstinence once more, as it was the surest means of restoring him to his former standing in society. After visiting him for at least a dozen times, succeeded in obtaining his signature.* His wife had previously taken the pledge, but was now taking gin and water being ordered by her medical attendant. Two more individuals who were in the room also signed.

* What sized book must that be that would contain all the direful consequences of strong drink?

† "Tim Doolin" was an Irish publican, according to one of a selection of Irish songs, published in 1840, by the South London Auxiliary.

DISTRICT No. XII.—STREET LABOURS.—Observing one of the Grenadier Guards belonging to the Tower intoxicated and reeling about, offered to conduct him to his station; drink, he said, had been his ruin; he had now been out with several of his comrades drinking, and had quarrelled with one of them, which ended in a fight, and the locking up of his opponent in the station-house; he signed the pledge. The missionary then visited the Tower barracks, and addressed many of the soldiers. One said, that while abroad, himself and a comrade fell, when in a state of intoxication, from a precipice 700 feet in height; his comrade was killed, while he was not materially injured. Another soldier said that he had seen numbers in the Indies run into the mountains quite mad through spirit-drinking. Three of them signed.

SHIPPING.—THE HEART OF OAK.—Went on board The Heart of Oak, and on inquiring whether there were any teetotalers, the answer was 'no, we are temperate enough; we have a pint when we want it.' The captain's wife said she approved of the principle, but would not sign; she wished, however, that her husband would, as he was very intemperate. I will sign, said the daughter, if my father will. The captain then came up, and on being spoken to, said, if he had abstained seven years since, instead of his having but one vessel, he should have had at least three; but I will not sign without my wife does. The wife refused; consequently, neither the husband nor daughter would sign.† The cabin boy then came up and asked if he might sign; the captain consenting, he signed.

HENDRICK HUDSON.—The missionary then proceeded to the Hendrick Hudson from America, and on addressing the captain, he replied, that himself, the mate, and all hands on board were pledged teetotalers.

W. STONEMAN.

DISTRICT No. XVII.—Mrs. A—D—, aged 54, was thankful that she had signed the pledge, for when she was a drunkard, no one would employ her, now she can get plenty of work.

On calling upon Mrs. R—, a clever needlewoman, (occasionally employing several hands,) but a great drunkard, she was ~~gone~~ out leaving her baby with a little lad, which she was accustomed to do, and frequently for a whole day together. On a deal table in her miserable apartment lay the Weekly Dispatch, and in a corner of the room a quart pot. The missionary seated himself on the frame of a chair (the bottom being gone), and after meditating some time on the scene around him, Mrs. R— entered, and was prevailed upon to sign the pledge, when she soon became a missionary to others. A few evenings after she was seen at a temperance meeting in company with a friend, who, at its conclusion, also signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XVIII.—STREET LABOURS.—Agreeable to the direction of the Superintendent, the missionary called on Mr. T—, whom the Superintendent had met on the steps of London Bridge in a state of intoxication; his mother (who is dotingly fond of him, being her only son) was waiting for him in the street. Rum was his favourite beverage, which he took for a weakness in his back. His father, (a respectable mechanic) and mother are good people, attending the ministry of the Rev. George Clayton; occasionally their son will accompany them, nevertheless returns to his rum again. When intoxicated his language is both profane and obscene, and frequently to his father he is guilty of violence, telling him that "this is for his severity to him when a boy." Wholesome discipline, it appears, was all that was exercised, but as this had to be compared with maternal indulgence it would necessarily be considered severe. He confessed to the missionary that rum frequently overcame him, so he had recently tried Alton ale, but that overcame him too; it was then suggested that he had better abstain from these and all other intoxicating drinks, and as a substitute take water. He signed the pledge, the mother following; the missionary closing this visit by commending them to God in prayer. The father was then absent, but on a revisit he also signed.

On the missionary addressing a group, a female, named A—M—, said, she was not ashamed to sign the pledge in the streets, and signed accordingly. Four persons who had broken their pledge re-signed.

DISTRICT No. XIX.—Mrs. K—, who is not yet thirty years of age, has been married fourteen years; she has for some time been separated from her husband, in consequence of the extreme irritability of his temper. On the missionary's recommending true temperance as well calculated to effect a reconciliation, she said she would try it; she then signed the pledge.

The missionary met with two preachers of the Gospel, a Mr. R— and a gentleman who had been engaged in preaching to the natives of Canada—the latter taking half a pint of beer twice a day, by order of the doctor. After a little information on the nature of alcoholic drinks and its physical effect, the latter signed the pledge, hoping that his friend, Mr. R., would follow his example. Mr. R. declined signing, but has since been acting on the principle.

The missionary has repeatedly called on Mr. —, a respectable though drunken tradesman, but in vain; at length he proposed to sign if his wife would, this she declined, yet acknowledged that total abstinence was the best, if not the only thing, that would effect a cure; in such cases the missionary again visited them, when after a very serious conversation, the wife, with tears in her eyes, signed, the husband following. He now attends the temperance meetings and takes in The Chronicle.

Calling on E—T—, a drunkard, (with a wife who has had fourteen children, and six living,) said he had just been thinking of destroying himself, but another and a happier thought succeeded, viz., "had I not better go to H—, who keeps a coffee-house, and ask him if he thinks teetotalism would do for me?" At this point the missionary entered, when having his question answered in the affirmative, gladly signed the pledge, two of his daughters following. The wife was then absent, but on a subsequent visit, she signed, when the missionary commended them all to God in prayer.

DISTRICT No. XX.—SUNDAY LABOURS.—Accompanied missionary No. 1 to visit several special cases, and obtained one signature. Attended the funeral of a member named Lennox, who was interred in New Bunhill Fields Burial Ground, Old Kent Road, and distributed some tracts. Addressed the children of Sutherland Chapel and Marlborough Chapel Sunday Schools, and gave tracts to teachers and children.*

RICHARD HODGSON.

DISTRICT No. XXI.—Visited a shoemaker's shop in S—G— street, where there were several men at work, a few tracts were given,

* We regret to learn, that on Saturday morning last, the publican keeping the George tavern, Lambeth-road, hanged himself to the tester of his bed; he was quite dead when discovered.—SUPERINTENDENT.

and some remarks made, one of the men said he had been a teetotaler, and for the time was never better, another challenged his neighbour to sign the pledge. The missionary moved that all in the shop should sign, which being seconded, was carried unanimously, when the whole shop consisting of nine persons, signed.

W. G.—a soldier, and a member of a Christian church, living in G—L— street, gave as his excuse for not signing, the inconsistency of some of its members; the wife, she excused herself having to work at the wash-tub. During the conversation, a little girl (their only child) came in, and was asked if she would sign; she replied, I should like to very much. "Why should you like to sign," asked the mother; "because, mother," replied the child, "if I continue to drink I may become a drunkard; you know mother, I always expect to drink a drop when you have any." The parents after this little speech, readily consented that the child should sign.

H. H—, a fancy cabinet-maker, a sad drunkard having six children and a wife, with whom he was constantly quarrelling and fighting. They lived in a back room, most of the furniture of which had been transferred to their landlord for rent. He signed the pledge, his wife and daughter (twelve years old) following.

DISTRICT No. XXII.—J. W—, thirty years of age, a hard working labouring man, at present employed in digging and wheeling clay to a mill, to be ground before moulding. Under the impression that a little beer was necessary to enable him to do his work, he had taken it, in moderation; but perceiving the danger and evils attendant on drinking, for several days he had abstained, and felt none the worse; he signed the pledge. Another, a youth of sixteen, engaged in wheeling bricks, gave similar testimony, and also signed, and was followed by his brother, a lad of eight years of age. The missionary turning to his employer, who was standing by, invited him to sign, and to allow the men their beer-money; he declined the former, but readily agreed to the latter. Mrs. W— was most anxious that her husband, a brick-moulder, should sign the pledge, as it would make a sober man of him, and contribute to their mutual comfort. The missionary advised her to give him the benefit of her example, with which she cheerfully complied. Her sister, a young woman of sixteen, who is employed in the field also signed.

DISTRICT No. XXIII.—M. L—, a widow said, she was almost lost with drinking. For thirty-nine years she drank moderately, but since her husband's death, twelve months ago, to ease her mind, she had drunk very hard, till she was now quite bewildered, and grew worse and worse. She could not keep from the public house: while her child was at home wanting the necessities of life. She signed the pledge. M. P—, a neighbour who was present said she would sign, in order to strengthen the hands of her friend, though she never drank beyond moderation. Visited CHELSEA HOSPITAL, and gave tracts to the pensioners, and addressed them on the advantages of teetotalism; some said total abstinence would be an abridgement of their comforts, others that it had done too much good already for them to speak against it; a nurse, an aged woman, who has been there upwards of twenty years bore her testimony to the excellence of the system, having been a pledged member for these seven years past.

DISTRICT No. XXIV.—SECRET LABOURS.—H. R. a cabman, thankfully received the tract, saying, that teetotalism was just the thing that would suit him. Fifteen months ago he commenced with two cabs, and at the same time a system of drinking which if he did not speedily discontinue would deprive him of them both; he signed the pledge. R. H—, another cabman said, that he had been many years a drunkard, had formerly been a gentleman's coachman, and at times had become so intoxicated, that his master for his own safety had to leave his carriage and hire a hackney-coach to take him home; and now he was a cabman, the waterman was obliged frequently to look after his cab and get it sent home; seeing his ruin was inevitable if he continued to drink, he had abstained the last week; he signed the pledge. Addressing a group, one man (as he received the tract) said, that is what I want, for I know it will do me good, I spend all I can get; I am a mason working at the Parliament Houses, and have been earning thirty-five shillings per week, the last two years, and though I am a single man, I am destitute of clothes, poor in pocket, and miserable in mind; he signed the pledge. On a man leaving the K—A— public house, in G—P— street, the missionary gave him a tract, asking him at the same time to sign the pledge. He acknowledged that it would have been better for him and his family if he had signed it years ago; last Saturday evening (he continued) I went out with the intention of signing; instead of which I went to the public house, and got intoxicated, and spent and lost £2; he signed the pledge. Having now obtained the address, the missionary resolved next to visit the family who lived up a court in a back attic in the same street, the approach to which is by a narrow stair-case, without light; on entering the room the wife was seated on a stool, working at her needle, her four children on the floor, there being no other seat except an old chair. The children were without shoes and stockings, and almost in a state of nudity. The missionary for the present thought it best to keep it a secret, the good news of her husband having signed, proceeded with the usual inquiries, she said her husband was a coach-smith, and in constant work, but spent all his money at the public-house, she had only received two shillings of him for the last fortnight, towards maintaining six persons, she had consequently to work at her needle Sunday and working-day, to get bread for her children. The children were without education, they had no Bible, and not any one in the family ever attended a place of worship; on being asked to sign the pledge, she said she should be glad if her husband would; she was then informed that he had signed. With joy beaming in her countenance, she exclaimed, Is it so? it is so, replied the missionary, showing her the name on the pledge-book. "That's right," she said, "and I will sign too," her gratitude was great, and on the missionary leaving, she struck a light, to light him down the dark stairs.

M. R— called on the missionary with a note from the Superintendent, desiring him to attend to her case, she stated that herself and husband had been drunkards, they signed the pledge and kept it three years. Then they had every convenience, and many comforts, having during that period a carpeted room, feather beds, and good furniture. For these, and many other privileges they were indebted to the laudable and persevering efforts of that Christian lady Mrs. Meredith, and other benevolent friends. Two years ago she broke the pledge, and soon after, her husband broke his also, and both gave themselves up to a course of drinking, which destroyed all teetotalism had procured; she was now destitute, her last gown having gone to the pawn-shop, and the ticket being sold; she was once in the hospital several months on account of her collar-bone being broken by the violence of her husband when they were both intoxicated; she resigned. The missionary then accompanied her to see her old friend Mrs. M., who kindly gave the missionary the money to release her gown from pawn, which being done, she returned home.

INCIDENTALS.—With consent of the Superintendent, attended a youths' meeting at Peckham, Mr. Johnson in the chair, Messrs. Weston, Beal, with others addressed the meeting; several signed the pledge.
FRANCIS COLLINS.

DISTRICT No. XXV.—"Do sign Pat, it will do you good," said Mrs. O'Reilly to her husband, Pat replied, "that he would sign if she would." They both then signed, their son and a lodger following their example.

DISTRICT No. XXVI.—The missionary learning that there had been a riot in a lodging house in R.—Street, Drury Lane, visited the parties, who acknowledged that they had made themselves mad with drink, and then quarrelled and fought with one another. Four (all that were then in the room, including the landlord) signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XXVII.—A—G— was found by the missionary confined to her bed and covered with bruises, which she had received from repeated falls in the street when drunk. The missionary reasoned with her on her course of life; she said, "Ah! I know what the wages of drunkenness is; I'll try if I can become a sober woman." She signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XXVIII.—M—G—, a widow, sixty-one years old, was met by the missionary, who observing her dejected look, spoke to her. She said, "I wish I had been a teetotaler years ago, and also my poor husband, for he died a drunkard, and left me quite destitute. I am often without a morsel of bread. Oh! the drink has been my sorrow." She signed the pledge. JAMES BALFOUR.

DISTRICT No. XXIX.—Visiting a family in N—Street Mews, was informed that they were all teetotalers. The husband had been a drunkard, but two years ago he took the pledge from Father Mathew, the wife and children following. The wife said that, but for teetotalism they should have had no house to live in, nor furniture to furnish one. "God bless Father Mathew—heaven protect him," said the woman. Spoke to others in the house, when a young woman signed. She was told by the woman above referred to, that it was the best day's work she had ever done.

DISTRICT No. XXX.—Spoke to a drunkard living in the same street. He said that he knew it would be good for him to abstain, and he sometimes had a thought of signing the pledge, he then signed, and promised to attend the temperance meetings.

DISTRICT No. XXXI.—Visited St. John's Wood Barracks; went into every room and gave tracts. Met with a few teetotalers, and among them the Secretary of the United Military Teetotal Society, which was formed lately. He said that the society commenced with five members, and now numbers upwards of two hundred. Many of the soldiers confessed having suffered from drinking, and said that the majority of the troubles into which soldiers fall, were occasioned by drink. Five signed the pledge, and many promised to attend the meetings.

DISTRICT No. XXXII.—Visited a factory in B—Place; one workman had been a teetotaler for seven years, and could from his own experience recommend its adoption by others; a second had been a pledged teetotaler for only a few months, but could bear his testimony to its excellence; a third, had been acting on teetotal principles for a few days only, nevertheless had no desire to give it up, but rather to go forward, he signed the pledge.

W. DRUMMOND.

DISTRICT No. XXXIII.—Called at No. 19, Archer Street, Camden Town, when a mother and son signed the pledge; the former related the following affecting case:—She once had a lodger, a drunkard; he would break out for weeks together; at length one night he came home quite intoxicated, and on the door being opened, he fell; after lying there half-an-hour, he rose and went up stairs; on entering his bed-room, he fell again; on the mother and son retiring to rest, observing him lying on the floor, desired him to get into bed, when he replied, "it's all right;" being accustomed to witness these scenes, they left him: on the son coming down in the morning, and hearing he was lying in the same place, went to him—he was dead!

A Christian widow has a son-in-law, a drunkard, an excellent mechanic, having high wages, yet often weeks will pass without his bringing home a shilling to his wife, and it was only this morning, says the mother, I had to send my daughter out to sell an article for food, there being nothing in the house. On a second visit, both mother and daughter signed.

Visited Kentish Town Infant School; the master intelligent and a teetotaler; had frequently allowed the use of the school-room for the advocacy of the principle; but through the intemperate remarks made by some of its advocates, was compelled to stand aloof, and to withdraw his influence.* Left some publications for his perusal.

DISTRICT No. XXXIV.—A gas-man, who has a moderate drinking, industrious wife, is himself a great drunkard. He had become acquainted with a drunken woman; on one occasion, after drinking together, they quarrelled, when the man pushed her out into the street; she went away, but presently returned with a large stick, and observing the gas-man leaning against the door-post with his hat off, smoking his pipe, she came behind him, and with a blow on his head, felled him to the ground. It was thought at first that the man was killed, his head being severely cut, and the blood pouring out copiously; under these circumstances, the missionary arrived; after getting him into the house, and binding up his wound, he urged him to sign the pledge without delay, which he did, his wife following.

DISTRICT No. XXXV.—B. Y., a father, a native of Winslow, a village in Buckinghamshire, once much respected, but through drink had so much lowered himself, as to be compelled to leave the village and the neighbourhood. In this forlorn condition, a kind Providence directed him to his son in town, who received him into his house. In his son he had a bright example both of piety and teetotalism; nevertheless, it produced no beneficial effect upon the father; he continued his drunken course, till at length the patience of his son was nearly exhausted. The missionary knew the latter, and at this critical moment called upon him, when he told the missionary, painful as it was to his feelings, he and his father must separate. The missionary entreated that he would bear with him a little longer, and commit him once more to God in prayer, (Luke xiii. 8, 9.) Not many days after, the son sent for the missionary, desiring him that he would hasten to his house, and bring his pledge book with him. The missionary obeyed, and on his arrival, after a few words in prayer, the father cheerfully signed the pledge. There were also two friends present, who could not refrain from signing on such an interesting occasion.

The matron of the Benevolent Institution, New Road, is an excellent Christian woman, and an indefatigable teetotaler, embracing every opportunity of inculcating the principle on those under her charge, liberally providing them with temperance publications; she invited the missionary to attend at an appointed hour to give an address; he went, and the result was 19 signatures, with an invitation to attend at another time.

* We would recommend our friend the school-master to read an article in the Christian Witness for September, on the "Present Prospects of the Total Abstinence Cause," particularly the following:—"Let no good man henceforth be deterred from the discharge of this great and paramount obligation, by vulgar prejudice, by ignorant clamour, by extravagances of opinion, or indiscretions of expressions, which at any time may have attended the advocacy, or marked the movement of the temperance effort."—SUPERINTENDENT.

DISTRICT No. XXXVI.—T. B.—, who had been in the army and navy many years; said, "Ah! sir, I know it well, (referring to the evils connected with the drinking system,) but no tongue can tell half the misery endured by the drunkard; it is a hell upon earth. I have oftentimes been so miserable, that I have scarcely been able to endure myself." The missionary after some further conversation read the pledge to him; when he exclaimed, Ah! that is it, "By Divine assistance," and I am determined by God's help to try, and signed.

B. D.— an intelligent and neatly dressed woman on being spoken to on the subject of teetotalism, remarked, it is quite true what you say; though young, I have experienced much misery through my poor drinking husband; and am willing to do anything to save him; she then signed the pledge.

J. W.—, a shoemaker, only twenty-three years of age, but through the ravages drink had made upon him looked an old man. Young as I am, he said, I have brought myself and my wife here, into much trouble and misery; but, I have resolved to give it up, and am glad you have called. He then cheerfully signed, and was followed by his moderate-drinking wife.

J. S.—, by trade a tailor, (once in destitute circumstances) blessed God that he had been a teetotaler now four years, and how glad should he have been had he always been one; it would have saved him much sorrow. The missionary inquired if his wife was a teetotaler, he said, no; he had never asked her; but, said he, she only drank it when she got wet, to prevent taking cold! the wife came in at this moment, and on the missionary asking her, she signed.

Ann S.—, the wife of a drunkard who was transported through drink. He left his family in the greatest distress. She at once decided on taking the pledge for her children's sake, she said, as well as her own; the eldest child also signed.

WILLIAM CLARIDGE.

DISTRICT No. XXXVII.—In the attic of a lodging-house were three young men clothed in rags, one of them two years since was a clerk in a merchant's counting-house in the city; but lost it through drink. He refused to sign although urged both by the missionary, and by one of his companions; the latter signed.

DISTRICT No. XXXVIII.—Mrs. —, in Eagle-place, said her husband is a sad drunkard; she had him taken before the magistrate four times for beating her. The last time, she could not leave her room for six weeks; notwithstanding, she refused to sign the pledge. A little orphan girl, who was present signed, saying, "I have no person to advise me, for good, and this pledge will keep me, from one temptation at least."

DISTRICT No. XXXIX.—E. B.— said, that herself and husband had been lying on the floor for these three months, through his intemperance; she signed the pledge, and will make her husband's case a matter of prayer.

DISTRICT No. XL.—D. H.— said he had been a teetotaler for fifteen months, but unfortunately broke his pledge, and has done no good from that time; I have, said he, parted with every thing to buy rum. He re-signed, and hoped to be more faithful in future.

JOHN WILLIAMSON.

PORT WINE DRINKERS BEWARE!

The Vintage in Portugal is a failure. The Pobres remarks:—"Letters from Deuro, where wine-making has commenced, describe the present vintage as the worst which has been for 15 years. One-half of the fruit is unripe, while the other is rotten."

The wine will be watery, and rotten-flavoured." The Coalliao also states—"The Lavadores are gathering the grapes unripe, rather than await a total loss. The fruit is rotten as soon as it is ripe."

How will this "watery and rotten-flavoured" juice of the grape, suit the taste of English Port-wine drinkers! They may depend upon it that there will be large admixtures of sundry substances, (well known to those who are in the trade,) to hide this "rotten flavour," and to impart the characteristics of "Good Port."

We say, therefore, to Port-wine drinkers,—Beware!

SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE REVIEW.

Published under the auspices of the Scottish Temperance League.

GREAT ENLARGEMENT OF SIZE.

THE favour which the October Number of the SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE REVIEW has been received, and the flattering promises of support sent in from all parts of the country, have induced the Conductors of this Periodical greatly to enlarge its size. The Second Number, to be published on the 1st of November, and succeeding numbers, will contain 48 octavo pages, which is exactly double the amount of pages in the first number. There will also be a larger proportion of small type, and the page will both be longer and broader.

Being stamped, and of course transmissible by post to all parts of the country, and its price only 3d. each copy, the REVIEW will, without exception, be the CHEAPEST MONTHLY PERIODICAL IN BRITAIN.

The Contributors to the REVIEW are paid for their services; and on this principle every effort will be made to obtain the literary assistance of the ablest writers on the Temperance Question, both at home and abroad.

The Conductors of the REVIEW confidently trust that the friends of Temperance throughout the United Kingdom will support them in this great effort to establish a powerful and able advocate of the Abstinence Cause. Nothing but an immense circulation can enable them to continue the publication of the REVIEW on the extensive scale which they have in the mean time resolved upon adopting; but let such a circulation be secured for it, by the support of the thousands of Total Abstainers, and its conductors flatter themselves that it will become a periodical worthy of the Cause.

N.B.—The large circulation of the REVIEW makes it an excellent medium for Advertisements.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

We have to announce to our Subscribers, that arrangements have been made for a union between the Chronicle and the Temperance Recorder; to take place with the new year, when the size of this paper will be increased from 16 to 24 pages; the price being raised to 1½d.

The Chronicle will, therefore, henceforth appear under the title of "The National Temperance Chronicle and Temperance Recorder" and will continue to be published by Houlston and Stoneman, 65, Paternoster Row.

Subscribers and Agents to the Recorder, will receive their parcels, as though no change had taken place.

Condensed accounts of Anniversaries and Public Meetings of especial importance will be inserted in the Chronicle and Recorder as far as space will admit.

It will be our aim to render the periodical interesting to all classes: it will embrace original articles on all subjects within the range of the Temperance question:—Foreign and Domestic News, Statistics, and Miscellaneous Information.

We would also press upon our readers the necessity of increasing the sale, which should not be less than 5,000, exclusive of the gratuitous circulation. It is trusted that those who have contributed to the Gratuitous Circulation, Fund of this paper, will continue their subscriptions; and donations from other friends are earnestly solicited.

All communications to be addressed to the Editors of the Chronicle and Recorder, 39, Moorgate Street, London. Its large circulation will render it a valuable medium of advertisements; the rates of which are as follows:—

TEETOTALISM DECLINING.

A certain Sunday newspaper has blazoned forth its opinion that teetotalism is declining.

Our readers will know how to value the opinion of that paper, when we inform them, that about a year ago, it had the effrontery to assert, that all persons who pledged themselves to abstinence from wine, beer, or spirits, were "stark-staring madmen!" Ab uno disce omnes.

It is not our present business to discuss, whether the writer of the foregoing statement, in reference to the decline of teetotalism was, or was not, competent to write about the subject; but as the question has been started, we have thought it worth while to turn it to some practical account; and shall, therefore, in as brief a compass as possible, attempt a reply to the interrogation—

Is the temperance cause in a prosperous or adverse position?

An answer to this query involves the following considerations:—The number of its pledged adherents;—the activity or apathy of its members;—and the standing which it occupies in the public mind, and more particularly in the estimation of men distinguished for their intellectual greatness or moral excellence.

Now, as regards the number of members included is within its limits, the matter stands nearly in this condition. In the spring of 1834, there were seven pledged abstainers from all intoxicating liquors; in the autumn of 1845, there are not fewer than seven millions! Eleven years ago, the temperance movement, as it at present exists, was originated in the town of Preston, and it has now extended to almost every portion of the globe which owns the dominion of man.

The South Sea Islands have been, by its influence, rescued from the torrent of fire-waters, which had well nigh overwhelmed them. In the Sandwich Islands, there are two periodicals devoted to the advocacy of the cause; the King and the majority of the chiefs being practical, and we believe pledged abstainers. New South Wales and New Zealand have felt its power, as is evident by the existence of more than ten thousand teetotalers. In Persia, Siam, and Burmah, the missionaries are teaching and practising abstinence, and are organizing societies. In British India, there are about 5000 European members, the majority of whom are privates and officers in the army; and this calculation totally excludes the millions of native Hindoos, who rarely, if ever, use intoxicating liquors. In Africa, there are large temperance societies, especially among the aborigines; many of the missionary stations, being the head-quarters of teetotalism in their respective districts. In the West Indies—Jamaica, Dominica, St. Vincent's, Trinidad, Antigua, &c.; and in British Guiana on the South American coast, there are thousands of zealous and consistent teetotalers. But it is the United States, next to Ireland, that the greatest triumphs have been achieved. In Massachusetts there are fourteen counties, and only one grants licenses for the sale of strong drink. Moral and legal suasion are being put in active operation throughout the Union; and according to a late computation, there are ten thousand societies, with four millions of members.

In Canada there are at the least 150,000 teetotalers.

The native Indians are arousing to the disastrous effects of intemperance, and flourishing societies exist in the more numerous and civilized of their tribes.

Proceeding to the continent of Europe, we behold a movement springing up, which bears the bud of future promise.

In Germany, Poland, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden, there is a wide-spreading agitation on the temperance question. In the whole of these countries, there cannot be a smaller number than from five to ten hundred thousand enrolled members. It is true, that the pledge is merely one against the use of ardent spirits; but let us ever remember, that the total abstinence cause in our own country was preceded by a similar movement.

On the European continent, the main cause of intemperance among the people, is the use of distilled liquors. We have no doubt, however, that the philanthropists, who are the leaders of the cause, will soon discover that breweries are not preferable to distilleries, or eershops to groggeries; and that a nation can as easily become drunken on one kind of alcoholic liquor as another. And when they have appreciated this truth, we doubt not they will adopt a pledge from all that can intoxicate.

In France, at the towns of Havre and Rouen, there are small teetotal societies, composed of right-hearted men; but their efforts are chiefly directed to the reformation of Englishmen, most of whom are temporary residents, but who have stayed long enough to disgrace our national character.

In Ireland, the movement has lost none of its power; and of eight millions of inhabitants, there are at the present time from four to five millions consistent abstainers. There is no decline. Cases of backsliding are still few and far between. Father Mathew has penned these memorable words concerning that country:—“O! that they were true of every people under heaven!—“ Drunkenness as a national sin, has been for ever banished from Ireland.””

Scotland, too, presents a favourable aspect. Seventy-four societies lately reported 40,000 members in a population of 600,000: so that assuming the entire population to amount to 3,000,000, we have upwards of 160,000 teetotalers.

In England, we believe, the cause was never more generally flourishing and prosperous. The total number of abstainers it would be impossible to state; it cannot be less than from 500,000 to 700,000. Do these facts look as if teetotalism were declining?

The second test to which we propose submitting our cause is—The activity and zeal of its members.

Confining our remarks to England, as we are compelled to do by our limited space, we make the assertion with confidence, that at no prior period in the history of the temperance movement, were there so many important agencies at work. We can only name them—Town missions are either forming or are already existing, in the principal provincial towns of the kingdom—travelling agents are dispersed throughout the country, chiefly employed by county and other associations. Dr. Grindrod continues to lecture to immense audiences, diffusing information on the physiological effects of alcohol; the Petition Movement against the Sunday traffic in strong drink, will show that teetotalers are not blind to the enormous evils of intemperance; the Metropolitan Missionaries, in connexion with the National Society, are carrying the knowledge and blessings of sobriety to myriads of the outcast and forlorn; the Advertising Plan, which is now in efficient operation, will bring the subject of temperance under the notice of hundreds of thousands of the more respectable and wealthy esses of society; and the great Mission Movement, just begun, is seeking to build up the societies which exist, form new ones where there are none; and by a system of loan tract distribution, pervade the masses with teetotalism.

In addition to all this, it has been determined to hold a World's Temperance Convention in the middle of 1846, which will concentrate the world's influence on the temperance question into one tremendous focus, to be launched forth again with irresistible power upon all ranks and conditions of men. If activity then be a sign of prosperity, truly teetotalism rapidly advancing.

Our third test is—The amount of influence it exerts upon public mind; and more particularly the estimation in which it is held by men distinguished for their intellectual fitness or moral excellence. There is here much to animate and cheer us. The state of the press in reference to this question was dilated upon in our last number. Judging from the facts which are constantly passing before us, we may conclude with safety, that the cause has attained an importance and effected a change unparalleled in the history of moral revolutions.

Clarkson and Gurney have united to recommend to the attention of philanthropists and the friends of education: Jay, Turner, Knill, Sherman, Campbell, James, with a large band of theologians, have pressed its claims upon the attention of the religious denominations of our country; a long list of illustrious physicians have given it their sanction as conducive to health; while men of letters, Bulwer, De Quincy, Jerrold, and statesmen, as Lord John Russell, have applauded its objects and aims, as tending to elevate the British people, mentally, politically, and socially. The temperance movement has annihilated the vulgar notions concerning the nutrition to be derived from alcoholic liquors: it has acted with gigantic energy in the usages of society, leading us to conclude, that the drinking-customs are doomed; that their abuses are numbered; and though they may never be totally extirpated, yet the charm is dissolved which they have drawn millions of our race into irretrievable ruin!

Is teetotalism declining?

We will suppose that such is the fact. Is there cause for rejoicing? Consider—temperance declining—drunkenness increasing, with all its attendant miseries and woes! For as certainly as effect is linked to cause, so surely will the day which holds the bright star of temperance grow pale to witness the lurid star of intemperance in theendant, scattering among the nations of the earth, evils more overwhelmingly fearful than any mortal mind can fully estimate. We sincerely feel for the man whose heart could allow him to anticipate such a period, with feelings other than those of unmitigated sorrow and alarm.

Once more—although we think we have satisfactorily disproved the insinuation, that teetotalism is declining; and although we have shown that it is generally progressing, yet we are free to confess, that it is declining in particular localities. It is not, indeed, surprising that a movement so widely spread should decay in some of its branches. Christianity itself furnishes a parallel.

Where then it is a truth that teetotalism is declining, it is the duty of the friends of the cause to see that it declines no longer. Thus let good be brought out of evil, and thus let the malicious expectations and premature predictions of enemies be disappointed. For one, we shall be glad if the sarcasms and taunts of foes prove effective, where the entreaties of friends have proved unavailing. Let apathy and indolence be cast aside, and let us all labour as becometh the greatness of the principles for which we contend.

That this may be the case is our heart's desire—may it be the reader's most determined resolve!

FOOD VERSUS STRONG DRINK.

At the present critical juncture, when owing to the failure and disease in the potato crop, gaunt famine is brooding over the devoted children of Erin, and when a scarcity of the staff of life is threatening the three kingdoms, there is nothing more painful to the mind of the temperance philanthropist than the fact, that more grain is now being wasted in the manufacture of intoxicating fluids than would supply tens of thousands of poor families with wholesome food, during the coming months of severity and cold.

Surely, that is a practice akin to madness, which takes the nation's food and converts it into poison!

We contemplate with much apprehension the condition of our poor countrymen during the approaching winter; and while we sympathize with the sufferers, and while we make our sympathy to be felt, according to our ability, let us—and in the "us," we include all abstainers let us—raise aloud our voices—let us denounce, in terms of warmest indignation, the gross folly, yea, the glaring sin, of manufacturing streams of death from the bounties of Providence: for is it not a sin, both against God and our fellow-men, to change heaven's blessings into curses, and during times of national scarcity, to distil and brew the corn, which should provide sustenance for the people?

We see by the public papers, that a deputation of gentlemen from Cork, brought the propriety of prohibiting distillation before the attention of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. This course of action was repudiated by Mr. O'Connell, on the ground that it would lead to breaches of the laws, and loss of property: and as Lord Heytesbury concurred in this opinion, and intimated that such was the view also taken by the government, it is clear legislative interference cannot be expected.

This will not, however, hinder us from using all moral suasive means.

It is our paramount duty to seize this opportunity of impressing upon the public mind, the enormity of the traffic in alcoholic liquors; and we can do this by the Press, by lectures, public meetings, &c.

Many of the newspapers would doubtless insert articles upon the subject, if forcibly drawn up and plainly written.

We are glad to learn, that our Advertisement on this very question, published in last month's religious magazines, has attracted much attention.

Let all our friends circulate information—circulate!—circulate!

The Balance.

“WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING.”

It is a remarkable fact, that the lapse of ten years has brought to light scarcely any fresh arguments in opposition to the practice of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks;—while during the same period of time, the testimonies in its favour have been constantly accumulating, until they have amounted to a mass of evidence almost unparalleled in the support of any system of truth.

The stale and literally worn-out objections have been so repeatedly answered, that it might seem a work of supererogation, to give them more than a cursory notice. Were they extinct, or even were they dormant, it might be well to leave them undisturbed; but we know well, that they are incessantly quoted at the present time by large masses of our countrymen, many of whom have never heard or read the replies which have been presented. We intend, therefore, once more to weigh carefully and with impartiality, in the BALANCE of calm investigation the arguments, which have been adduced against abstinence from alcoholic fluids.

We give a list of the principal of these objections, and have no doubt that they will be recognized as “old acquaintances,” by those of our friends who have at all extensively laboured in the promotion of the temperance reform.

“Intoxicating liquors are necessary and beneficial; at least, not injurious.” “They are sent for man's use and enjoyment by God, and are, therefore, his good creatures.” “Their use is countenanced by the Scriptures, and sanctioned by the example of the most illustrious men of ancient and modern times.” “Teetotalism is an extreme measure, and extremes are dangerous.” “It is directly opposed to the social feelings of man's nature.” “It is a species of self-denial not required by society, and not demanded by the word of God.” “It elevates itself into the place of the gospel, and assumes the office of religion.” “The Pledge is a needless, self-imposed yoke.”

These are among the chief of the objections we shall weigh, in future numbers of the Chronicle. We repeat it—it shall be our earnest endeavour to weigh them with impartiality and care, feeling the solemnity of those divinely inspired words, “An unjust balance is an abomination to the Lord.”

STRONG DRINK, AND RESPECTABLE YOUNG GENTLEMEN.

“On Thursday, October the 2nd, two persons respectably dressed, were brought before Mr. Maude, (Manchester) charged with wilfully damaging the property of several gentlemen residing in the Stockport Road. On Saturday last, the two prisoners, whose names were given as John Smith Hutton of Bolton, and Henry Lewis of the same place, were at Bolton Races, and having become drunk, they missed their way, and went to Stockport; and finding their mistake, they returned to Manchester, at a very late hour. On their way home, they called at several public-houses, where, after obtaining a supply of drink, they immediately began to break the glasses, furniture, &c., of the landlords. In this way they proceeded to Manchester, making, in their own words, “a jolly good row,” in every house they came to. On reaching Mr. Thomas Hulmes' residence, they commenced an attack on the gates and iron-railings in the front of his house, which they partially demolished. Their next attack was on the residence of Mr. Roscoe, where they did considerable injury. The houses of Miss Appleton, Dr. Wood, and Mr. Thomas Broadbent, facing the road, sustained similar damage. On the whole, they injured property to the amount of £40 or £50.

These facts having been proved, Mr. Maude said that unless some arrangement was come to with the parties whose property had been injured, he should feel it his duty to commit them to the Sessions. The two YOUNG GENTLEMEN (!) after a conversation with the parties, agreed to make good the damage done to the property, and were then discharged.”—Times, October 3rd.

THE RAILROAD ROBBERIES.

It has been repeatedly stated, that there is scarcely a crime or offence ever committed which is not in some manner connected with strong drink.

This assertion is again borne out by the late revelation connected with “the Railroad Robberies.” At the trial of two of the chief actors, Maynard and Garratt, in the Central Criminal Court. The following confession was given in by Garratt, and read by Mr. Straight, the deputy clerk:—

“Prison of Newgate, October 31, 1845.

“I feel it to be useless to make any attempt to defend myself against these cases, and I desire to plead ‘guilt,’ although I did not myself take some of the luggage produced against me, but they came to me afterwards:—instance, Dr. Daniel's, on the Great Western, I did not have for some period after the time he stated they were lost, as I have explained to Mr. Nash. I regret that I was, in a moment of inebriation, tempted to embark so dishonest a traffic; but the first temptation having succeeded, I could only go on, and to habits of drinking do I attribute my first false step, for it was only when elevated with liquor that I was tempted to meddle in these matters; but I beg to appeal to those kind noblemen and gentlemen with whom I for years lived, and some of whom are on the bench and in the courts, as to my general character as a servant. Some of the testimonials are in the possession of Mr. Nash, and I believe, has ascertained that I bore the highest character. Notwithstanding the extent of these matters, I am left without a shilling; my thoughtless and careless habits, my love of dress and drink, have brought me to this, and those who have led me into it from an industrious course of life have the reflection of doing so, and then leaving me without even contributing one shilling to defend one whose purse and liberal treatment (ever foolishness) they always experienced, and I leave them with that reflection on themselves, and on the insincerity of human nature, in the hour of need and peril to which they contributed. * * *

DWARKANAATH TAGORE AND FATHER MATHEW.

The following letter from the Great Hindoo Philanthropist, will be read with much pleasure by the friends of the Irish Temperance Apostle.

"MY DEAR FATHER MATHEW—The bearer of this, Mr. Leahy, is commissioned by me to undertake the painting of your portrait, which you have been so kind as to promise to sit for. Mr. Leahy is, I believe, already known to you, and I feel assured that he will, under the circumstances, fulfil his pleasing task in a manner that will do justice to his subject—I have already endeavoured to express the high honour and gratification I feel in making your personal acquaintance, and I am now doubly anxious that my countrymen should behold adorning the walls of my house, the portrait of the man who has redeemed his country from the national stigma, under which it has held so long.

"Believe me, my dear Father Mathew, with sentiments of the highest esteem, to remain ever your attached friend,

TEMPERANCE MISSION IN FRANCE

J. H. DONALDSONS JOURNAL.

I arrived in France, on Tuesday, September 9th, 1845, and since then I have visited all the places of the line of railway, from Havre to Rouen, and in most happy to be able to state, that with but few exceptions, all who signed the pledge with Mr. Balfour, have maintained their integrity. I have held 22 meetings, visited 57 families, 15 ships, spoke to 18 drunkards, addressed 45 groups; in the whole brought the subject of teetotalism before 1000 persons, and obtained 62 signatures. The friends here intend forming an Auxiliary Society, before I leave France. They are very anxious to carry forward the good work.

The following is an abstract of my journal.

Monday, September 8th.—Went by railway to Southampton, and from thence by steam to Havre de Grace.

Tuesday, 9th.—Arrived at Havre, waited upon the Rev. F. E. Adams, the American minister, who lent me the use of his Chapel to hold a meeting. Visited six vessels in the dock, and addressed our groups, and invited them to attend the meeting in the evening. Held a meeting in the Bethel Chapel; but in consequence of the few persons present, instead of delivering an address, I heard and answered objections.

Wednesday, 10th.—Went to Harfleur, and visited the railway, addressed four groups, and distributed tracts; held a meeting in the English preaching-house, 50 persons present, 14 signed the pledge. One man who signed the pledge with Mr. Balfour, has been promoted by his employer, and in consequence of his example, more than twelve persons under his superintendence have signed the pledge. The railway schoolmaster signed this evening.

Thursday, 11th.—Went to Bolbec, and had an interview with Mr. Mack, the missionary belonging to the British and Foreign Town Mission. He accompanied me to Mirville; visited 24 families, addressed 10 groups, and distributed tracts, held a meeting in a carpenter's shop, 30 persons present, five signed the pledge. One man publicly declared that he had been a teetotaler in England two years, but that owing to the solicitations of his friends, (query, enemies) he had broken his pledge, only on Wednesday last; he signed, resolving to break it no more.

Friday, 12th.—Went to Rouen, and stayed at the inn until the next day, it being late at night.

Saturday, 13th.—Waited upon Mr. Little, Rue Traversiere, and made arrangements for my meetings the following week; held a meeting in the Wesleyan preaching-place, 30 persons present, one signed the pledge. All the members of the Wesleyan Society, belonging to this chapel, are teetotalers, consisting of eight persons, three of whom are local preachers. Had an interview with the Wesleyan French missionary, and gave him a report of our society. He is not yet a teetotaler, but he wishes us all success.

Sunday, 14th.—Visited eight ships, and distributed tracts; four of the crew were teetotalers; held a meeting under the railroad-tunnel, 30 persons present, and delivered an address in the evening, in the Wesleyan Chapel.

Monday, 15th.—Held a meeting at Eauplet, 50 persons present; four signed the pledge.

Tuesday, 16th.—Held a meeting at Sotteville, five persons present.

Wednesday, 17th.—Held a meeting at Chartreux, 50 persons present, three signed the pledge. Visited a manufactory belonging to the railway, containing 300 English and Irish workmen; distributed tracts.

Thursday, 18th.—Visited five vessels and took one pledge; held a meeting at Pavilly, 20 persons present, one signed.

Friday, 19th.—Held a meeting at Pissy Pavilly, 30 persons present; one signed, a Frenchman, who spoke a little English: he observed, on signing, "It is time to do better, strong drink is very expensive."

Saturday, 20th.—Held a meeting at Malaunay, 45 persons present; five signed the pledge. One man who signed with Mr. Balfour, has saved 40 francs, and his home is comfortable. He stated that his health is much improved, and that he is now desirous to lead a better life; he was formerly a Wesleyan.

Sunday, 21st.—Held a meeting at Rouen, under the tunnel, in the afternoon, 50 persons present; nine signed the pledge; the chief agent upon the Rouen line signed to-day. Also held a meeting at Eauplet, 20 persons present.

Monday, 22nd.—Held another meeting at Eauplet, 40 persons present; two signed the pledge.

Tuesday, 23rd.—Held a conversational meeting at Sotteville, six persons present.

Wednesday, 24th.—Held a meeting at Chartreux, 20 persons present, visited 16 English families and distributed tracts; also visited the Fabrik and gave the chief clerk a Chronicle and Report.

Thursday, 25th.—Held a meeting at Rouen, in the Wesleyan Chapel, 20 persons present.

Friday, 26th.—Went to Malaunay, visited 15 families, addressed four groups, and distributed tracts, held a meeting, 40 persons present; one signed the pledge.

Saturday, 27th.—Visited the brick-yard, addressed six groups, distributed tracts; one brick-maker signed the pledge.

Sunday, 28th.—Held a meeting at Rouen, under the tunnel, 50 persons present; among whom were many French people; 11 signed the pledge; gave an address in the Wesleyan Chapel in the evening, 10 persons present; one man signed the pledge.

Monday, 29th.—Met two men, who had been drunk, one had a black eye, and the other marks of blood upon his shirt front; they both acknowledged they were doing wrong, and signed the pledge. Had an interview with the Irish Catholic Priest, who received me very courteously, and wished me success; he is not a teetotaler. Held a meeting in Wood's brick-yard, Pissy Pavilly, 18 persons present; one signed the pledge. One man showed me a gold watch which he had purchased with the money he had saved from strong drink. His nephew, who also signed the pledge, has become a serious man; his wife says they are now happy.

Tuesday, 30th.—While waiting for the Diligence, I saw a number of men assemble in the road, and on going up to them, I heard one say, "I enlist you in the name of our Sovereign lady, the Queen." I observed, "to be a teetotaler." "Then you think teetotalism a good thing," said the man. "I do." I replied, "and should be happy to have you all as members of my society." I then told them who I was, and my object in coming to France. They all listened with attention. The first said—"Sir, I am just going to get my fiddle to try and raise a company of my comrades, and we intend having a regular drink to-day, as we had yesterday." I reasoned with him upon the impropriety of such conduct, gave him a Chronicle and some tracts, and entreated him to go and read them to the men. He took them, and holding them up to the crowd, exclaimed—"Here, lads, I am going to give a lecture upon teetotalism," and instead of getting his fiddle, I had the pleasure of seeing him surrounded by his fellows, while he was reading to them Mr. Balfour's Journal.

Wednesday, October 1st.—Went to Gouffreville, and made arrangements for meetings at Harfleur, Havre and St. Laurents. Held a conversational meeting at Harfleur, 10 persons present, passed some resolutions and entered into a plan for carrying on the work when the missionary had returned to England.

Thursday, 2nd.—Went to Havre, and had a conference with the Rev. A. Adams, American minister. He is fully alive to the subject, and is very anxious to promote the cause of temperance; he very kindly offered me the use of his chapel for a temperance lecture. Visited 8 vessels in the dock, and distributed tracts, delivered a lecture in the Bethel Chapel, 20 persons present, most of whom were teetotalers.

Friday, 3rd.—Went to Gouffreville, addressed three groups and gave notice of the meeting to be held at Harfleur; held a meeting at Harfleur, 40 persons present, one signed the pledge.

Saturday, 4th.—Went to St. Laurent and visited the workmen on the railway, and invited them to attend the meeting in the evening; held a meeting in the French school-room, lent for the occasion by the Mayor of the town, who was present with his wife and son-in-law; 50 persons present, eight signed the pledge.

Sunday, 5th.—Held a meeting in the English preaching-place at Harfleur, 16 persons present, one signed the pledge—also, in a cottage at St. Laurent, 30 persons present, two signed the pledge. I was informed by Mr. Page that since my last visit to this district, a young man who had been drinking and playing at cards or dominoes, in one of the Cafés all night, and who came to his work the next morning half intoxicated, fell from a waggon and was killed upon the spot; the wheels of the waggon passed over his chest. Most of the accidents upon the railway are occasioned through the use of intoxicating drinks. I have seen men staggering drunk while endeavouring to perform their work.

Monday, 6th.—Went to Bolbec and waited upon Mr. Mack, the Protestant missionary belonging to the railway. He was very unwell and not able to accompany me to Mirville. I therefore went to Yvetot, and held a meeting in a carpenter's shop kindly lent by Mr. Earl, the agent for the railway 10 persons present, two signed the pledge.

Wednesday, 8th.—Went to Chartreux and visited the Fabrick. One of the clerks of this establishment has been discharged for drunkenness. He was in the receipt of from seven to ten francs per day. I visited his home, which was the abode of misery—the home of a drunkard. He has a wife and six children. After a short conversation upon the importance of sobriety, he resolved to try an amend; he signed the pledge, and his poor wife very cheerfully followed his example. Passing by a Café, I heard a noise within, and upon my entering, I perceived a Welchman drunk quarrelling with the French woman, and threatening to beat her. I remonstrated with the man, and eventually conveyed him home to his own lodging. He acknowledged he was doing wrong; he stated that he had that day beaten a Frenchman about the head very badly, but that he would give up strong drink altogether; he accordingly came to the meeting in the evening, and signed the pledge.

Thursday, 9th.—Went again to Chartreux, and visited three English families and the Fabrick, and informed the chief clerk that the man who had been discharged, had signed the pledge. He was glad to hear it, and promised to do what he could to obtain employment for him: an English office signed the pledge. Held a meeting at Sotteville in the English preaching-place, 30 persons present three signed the pledge.

Friday, 10th.—Went to Eauplet and delivered a lecture upon Physiology, shewing the evils of strong drinks upon health; 30 persons present, most of them were teetotalers. Miles Day, Esq., the agent for the railway, took the chair.

Saturday, 11th.—Met a few friends and made arrangements for a tea-festival and public meeting to be held at Rouen, on Wednesday, the 15th inst.

Sunday, 12th.—Held a meeting at Rouen, under a shed by the side of the railway, near the Dar nital Road, 60 persons present, including many French persons. During the meeting six soldiers came and stood for some time, and appeared interested; a contractor signed the pledge; went to Sotteville and gave an address in the English preaching-house, 12 persons present; one signed the pledge, the wife of a poor drunkard.

Monday, 13th.—Went to Malaunay, visited six English families. The reclaimed drunkards hold their pledge, and are feeling the benefits. One declared he had paid debts which he contracted through strong drink, to the amount of 200 francs 40 of which were for beer. He formerly kept a beer-shop, but has given it up and opened his house for a preaching-place. His wife wept while telling me the goodness of God to herself and husband. She is a kind-hearted woman, and has taken in two poor children who were abandoned by their parents, and left, in a strange land, entirely destitute. Both herself and husband have resolved to lead a new life, and for that purpose, she is learning to read, that she may be able to peruse the Word of God. Held a meeting at the reformer drunkard's cottage, 40 persons present; 11 signed the pledge. A contractor, who has very great influence among the men, signed at this meeting his signing caused very great excitement.

Tuesday, 14th.—Went to Barrington, and visited Wood's brick-yard. All the reclaimed are firm, and the cause is going on well here. Two teetotalers were discharged by a sub-contractor, because they would not work upon the Lord's day. One has returned to England and the other is working for his uncle, a reclaimed drunkard. The wives of the reclaimed, know not how to express their gratitude to the society for the good they are now possessing. Went to Pavilly, and held a meeting in the English preaching-place, 50 persons present, 12 signed the pledge.

Wednesday, 15th.—Returned to Rouen, and attended the tea-festival held at the Salons Common, Boulevard Beauvoisine, No. 33, near Mr. Brassey's Office; 120 persons sat down to tea and plum cake, provided by the friends, for one franc admission. After tea, a public meeting was held for the purpose of announcing the formation of the "Rouen Temperance Society," as a Branch of the "Normandie Temperance Society," and Auxiliary to the "National Temperance Society" in England—250 persons present—Miles Day, Esq., in the chair. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Little, Richardson, Scott, Pickersgill, Rev. Mr. Mack, and the Missionary.

Resolutions of thanks were passed to the Committee of the National Society, and to the Missionaries for their labours.

Mrs. Wood, the wife of Thomas Wood of Barentin, presented the missionaries with two very handsome china cups and saucers, as a token of her esteem for their services, and of gratitude for the benefits she and her family had derived from their adoption of the pledge.

Subscriptions to the amount of 32 francs and 10 sous, were received.

There were present in the meeting, the Revs. Pommai, French Protestant minister; Leward, French Protestant minister; Pulsford, Wesleyan French missionary; Holloway, English Protestant minister. F. Andrieu, the French interpreter; Rev. L. Pulsford, Wesleyan missionary, and Fortunat Andrieu, French interpreter, signed the pledge.

Thursday, 16th.—Took diligence for Dieppe, and came by steam vessel to Shoreham.

Friday, 17th.—Visited five families at Brighton, and took five signatures. Returned to London in good health, after an absence of six weeks.

In conclusion, the missionary desires to acknowledge the kindnesses he received from the friends of temperance, and the support given to his mission by the agents and sub-contractors on the line of railway. He is happy in knowing that his labours have not been in vain.

Two efficient societies have been formed as branches of the Normandie Temperance Society, and Auxiliary to the National Temperance Society, viz.—"The Rouen Temperance Society," and "The Havre Temperance Society," the committees of which, intend to carry on the temperance reform, by distributing tracts, holding public meetings, and the establishment of a temperance lending library and reading-room. Already a fund is raised for the purpose of promoting the object; and six young men have offered themselves as speakers, most of whom are Wesleyan Local Preachers. There is every cause to bless the Lord and take courage.

CHINA.

(Letter to E. C. DELAVAN, Esq.)

Hong Kong.

MY DEAR SIR,—I take the liberty, through you, to request from the Executive Committee of the New York State Temperance Society a set of Dr. Sewall's colossal drawings of the human stomach (in frames), and also a copy of the bound volume of the same, for the use of the Ningpo Missionary Hospital under my charge.

Dr. Sewall's plates afford not only an accurate representation of the pathology of drunkenness, but some of them may also serve as good illustrations of the pathology of opium smoking. Intoxication by means of Samschoo (rice whisky), though less common, is, nevertheless, the source of much disease among the people of this empire.

The exhibition to the eye, of the impressive argument which the plates afford, could produce no reforming effect on confirmed opium smokers, for their ruin is already sealed, but they would serve to deter many a young Chinaman from indulging in this most fascinating, but no less fatal vice. Like intemperance at home, opium-smoking is destroying its thousands and tens of thousands, though its course has but recently commenced.

There is no Christianity in China, by which a work like the Temperance Reform can be carried on, or even commenced; nor are there among the Chinese any public-spirited philanthropists, willing to devote their time, talents, and fortune for the promotion of such a work, or if there were such men, there is no religious feeling among the people upon which they could operate. The only hope for China is the gospel, but it is to be feared that before it can be extensively proclaimed, her peculiar form of intemperance will have effected her ruin. As the evil is fostered by American, as well as European merchants, it is to be hoped that philanthropists in America will not be slow in sending the Chinese such remedies as have proved efficacious in the Temperance Reform at home.

I presume no apology is necessary in addressing you on a subject which has so long had you for its champion. Fellowship in the great work is doubtless a sufficient introduction to one whose name is everywhere inseparably connected with it. Very sincerely yours,

D. J. MACGOWAN.

JERSEY.

No doubt many of our friends across the Channel will feel some degree of interest in hearing how the cause of total abstinence is progressing in Jersey. I am happy to state it is not retrograding, it still moves on steadily, not a week passing but some are added to the number. During the summer, we were visited by Mr. Thomas Hudson of the "National Society," Rev. B. Parsons (Author of Anti-Bacchus), and lately by Mr. T. Busland of Leeds. Each of these gentlemen delivered courses of lectures on subjects connected with total abstinence, to large and respectable meetings; many signed the pledge, and those who were converts before, have been made firmer in the principles, through the convincing arguments adduced. Still, unfortunately, drunkenness exists to an awful extent, which, in some measure, arises from the cheapness of ardent spirits and wines, the price being but a trifle higher than strong beer in England. Neither is it confined to age, rank or sex. In fact, the females from the ages of 13 and 50 or 60 years—subject to that disgusting vice—far exceeds the males. One young man drowned himself, and no less than three females, in less than many weeks, have died suddenly, whilst under the influence of strong drink, one of whom has left four young children.

The Committee of the Jersey Auxiliary have resolved, by renewed exertions, to adopt measures which no doubt will prove beneficial to the progress of the cause. One is the holding of temperance meetings on the Sabbath afternoons, in the low streets of the town; another, the adoption of the plan recommended by the National Society, in establishing a temperance Loan Tract Society, and I trust at no distant period, a Temperance Library.

National Temperance Chronicle.

BEFORE another number of the Chronicle issues from the press, CHRISTMAS, with all its festivities and joys, will have come and passed away. It will not, therefore, we are sure, be deemed out of place, to give a few words of kindly caution and advice, to those who are leagued with us in the temperance enterprise.

Seasons of national rejoicing and banqueting, are ever seasons of national temptation.

When cessation from business is the order of the day—when the cares and distractions of business are for a time buried in oblivion—when the judgment relaxes from its usual vigilance—then it is that the enemy of all good presents his most dangerous fascinations—fascinations to which alas! the unwary not infrequently fall a prey. Mistake us not. We love to see the domestic circle assemble with glee around the Christmas fire; we think it only fitting that once, at least, in the course of the rolling year, an opportunity should be afforded for the members of the same family to mingle their mutual sympathies and partake of each other's joys. But we reiterate, that this is a time for caution. Let reason preside over the banquet, and then there will be safety. Let there be a flow of soul; but let the flowing bowl be absent.

Let every teetotaler be on his guard against the enticements incident to that period which is at hand: let him not be either goaded or seduced into compliance with foolish, and at best, antiquated customs.

When joining in the cheerfulness of the social party, let him take heed lest he fall; if necessary, let him endure with composure the banter and ridicule of friends; but if pressed to drink of the sparkling glass, let him REFUSE, and do so with firmness, remembering the advice of the wisest of men—"Look not on the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright, for at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

To all our readers we say, let your abstinence from alcoholic liquors be based on love to God and love to man—discountenance the intemperance which prevails around you—partake of all innocent pleasures and enjoyments—forget not Him who is the Giver of every good and perfect gift: and with unfeigned sincerity, we wish that each may spend the coming CHRISTMAS soberly and merrily.

MR. WILSON has returned to the North of England, and is in communication with the Newcastle and Gateshead Societies, both of which enter into his plan of action. The sub-committee on the Great Mission Movement, have prepared the following documents, which are now in the press.

1. A Manual of Rules and Suggestions for the formation and management of Branches, Associations, and District Unions.

2. An address to the readers of the loan sets of tracts to be printed on the cover of the sets.

3. Forms of declaration intended to be printed on a stiff paper in quires, and to be used chiefly for distribution among children and young persons, and to be as cheap as possible.

4. A selection of tracts, including those already published under the sanction of the National Society, with additions from the Bristol and Ipswich series, &c., forming about thirty sets of loan tracts, from 16 to 24 pages each. The whole will be published by Houlston and Stoneman.

We state with feelings of intense pleasure, that the Committee of the National Society have resolved, after mature deliberation, to hold a in the summer of next year; probably at the latter end of June, or the commencement of July.

We have now, therefore, to invite the prompt and earnest assistance of the Editors of all Temperance periodicals in the world, in making this information universally known.

A sub-committee has been appointed, with Richard Potter, Esq., as Chairman, who, with the Secretary, will sign the circulars calling the Convention.

Letters and circulars are in course of being addressed to distinguished friends of the cause at home and abroad, and to the Associations and principal societies of this and other countries.

The following extract from the circular to societies, will explain the nature and objects of the Convention.

"It is suggested, that delegates from each society be appointed without delay, and information of this forwarded to this office, when their names will be enrolled in the Convention list; the exact time and place of meeting will be duly announced; and the necessary cards and programmes handed them on their arrival.

"It is obvious, that in this, as in all similar Conventions, delegates and gentlemen will attend at their own expense, or at that of the Society they represent.

"It is earnestly hoped, that the delegates attending the Convention, will be qualified to supply information, and state the views of their respective Societies in the threefold objects presented below.

"1. To ascertain the state of the temperance question in all parts of the globe.

"2. To receive suggestions as to the most effectual method of extending the Temperance Reformation. And

"3. To attempt the formation of a Temperance Mission throughout the world."

ADDRESS TO THE DIRECTORS OF BRITISH RAILWAYS.

GENTLEMEN—The responsible station which you occupy, as conservators in a great degree of the public safety in travelling, will be accepted we trust as an apology for addressing you on a subject which we feel assured you will deem worthy of your most impartial consideration.

Strict sobriety, in all trades and professions, is a virtue of the highest order; but its relative importance is vastly increased when the lives of large numbers of persons are at stake.

It will not be disputed, that Temperance should form a distinguishing feature in the characters of individuals engaged in avocations of a hazardous nature, requiring clearness of head, firmness of nerve, and presence of mind, and these qualities are unquestionably needed in an especial degree by persons entrusted with the practical management of Railways.

It is well known that drinking habits have led to the most disastrous results. Your acquaintance with the facts renders it unnecessary for us to dwell upon numerous cases, in which life and property have been sacrificed by accidents resulting from the insobriety of guards, engineers, stokers, policemen, and others.

Is it too much to say, that but for Intemperance, one-third of the accidents which have taken place, would never have occurred?

Nor would the practice of Temperance be less beneficial to those who are employed in the construction and repair of the various Railroads of our country. The wages earned by this class of men, although sufficient, if properly applied, to provide them with the comforts of life, are to a fearful extent expended in the purchase of spirituous and fermented liquors, by the use of which the physical strength is not increased; the moral feelings are blunted and debased; and the men are prevented by want of time, inclination and means, from cultivating their mental faculties.

The deeply rooted and long cherished idea, that intoxicating drinks are necessary for the performance of arduous, bodily labor, has been proved by the concurrent testimonies of tens of thousands of working men in every description of employment, to be utterly fallacious; while their disuse has in numberless instances in Ireland in America, and in this country, been followed by an improvement in health, and an increase of social and domestic blessings.

Influenced by these considerations: persuaded that you are anxious to consult the public safety, and the welfare of your servants, and confident that the question must commend itself to your judgments, as one of grave importance, the Committee of the National Temperance Society venture respectfully to recommend the employment of one or more competent individuals, as Missionaries, whose office would be to reclaim the intemperate, and to enforce at suitable times, the advantages of abstinence from intoxicating beverages.

These remarks, gentlemen, are presented for your candid and careful deliberation, and are designed as preparatory to a more direct and practical application, which the Committee will beg leave to submit at an early period.

By Order of the Committee,

THEODORE COMPTON, Secretary.

THE PETITION MOVEMENT AGAINST STRONG DRINK TRAFFIC.

We again desire to make known our last month's announcement, that Temperance Societies in and around London, and Ministers of the Gospel, will be supplied with Petitions against the Sunday traffic in Strong Drink, on application at this office.

The following Prelates and Noblemen have consented to present petitions to the HOUSE OF LORDS.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Bishop of London.

The Bishop of Norwich.

The Bishop of Ripon.

The Bishop of St. Davids.

Right Hon. Earl Fitzwilliam.

Right Hon. Earl Grey.

Right Hon. Lord Cottenham.

Right Hon. Lord Campbell.

TO THE COMMONS.

Viscount Ebrington.

Lord Ashley.

Benjamin Hawes, Esq.

Joseph Brotherton, Esq.

William Aldam, Esq.

John Hardy, Esq.

The subjoined courteous reply was received from Mr. Wakley, Esq., M.P. for Finsbury, and Coroner of Middlesex.

85, Bedford Square, November 6th, 1845.

SIR,—Permit me to apologise for the delay which has taken place in my replying to your communication of the 28th ult. I have now carefully examined the draft of the petition to the House of Commons, which you forwarded to me at that time. No person can entertain a stronger conviction than I, of the dreadful evils which result to society from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. It is in fact proved before me almost daily, that drunkenness is the prolific parent of poverty, and every gradation of vice and crime. Drunkenness is, in truth, the master evil which now afflicts a great portion of the population of this kingdom, in their social stations. But when I am asked if I will attempt to put down the practice by assisting to pass a legislative enactment, framed with that express object, I feel called upon to pause and consider the whole subject most diligently, and inquire, finally, whether the taking of such a step would not, in all probability, defeat the very object of the benevolent authors of the proceeding.

I feel, therefore, bound to state at once, most respectfully to the National Temperance Society, whose exertions I greatly admire and applaud, that not the remotest probability exists of the enactment of a law, by the present Parliament, for, to use the words of your petition "greatly restricting, or entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays." When the restricted clause which has proved so useful was introduced into the Bill of 1839, it was done without any great previous public commotion, and the hostile interests had not been aroused into combined activity. A few petitions such as you propose, and a Bill founded upon them, being placed on the table of the House of Commons, an opposition would be raised which I am convinced would, in a very few weeks, prove irresistible in its influence.

I would, therefore, advise the Society, calmly to consider the whole matter, and determine whether it would not be better to approach the subject in a manner less likely to provoke hostility, than are petitions, in the form of the one which you have sent to me. I shall, at all times, be most willing and happy to aid the exertions of the Society, by my humble efforts, which I may be enabled to make in my place in Parliament, and,

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

THOMAS WAKLEY.

The above letter will be read with pleasure by the friends of Temperance.

We believe that the Sunday traffic in strong drink is a great and crying evil, and that much good would be effected by its abolition. This Mr. Wakley admits; but predicts that the attempt would be met with a storm of opposition.

Whether by the presentation of petitions we, shall or shall not, succeed in attaining our object, at any rate, the subject of Temperance will be brought before the attention of the legislature and the public, and the fact, carried as it will be on the wings of the press to the ends of the earth, that thousands of petitions for this object have been presented to Parliament, cannot fail of exercising a beneficial influence. Still, we do not despair of attaining our desire at the present or some future time. Other efforts Reform—Catholic Emancipation, &c. were once designated as 'impossibilities' Let us then try.

Petitions should be sent to the Houses of Parliament and will go free of postage if the ends are left open.

THE ADVERTISING PLAN

was tried in the November Religious Periodicals on rather an extensive scale.

The Advertisement on the Scarcity of Food, was inserted in the Christian Witness, Baptist Magazine, Continental Echo, and Local Preachers' Magazine; and was gratuitously inserted in the Patriot and Wesleyan newspapers.

The article headed, "No one liveth to himself," was advertised in the Church of England and New Connexion Magazines, and another article on the use of intoxicating liquors, in the Evangelical Magazine.

The united circulation of these periodicals is 102,400, and are probably seen by half a-million of persons. Thus, the principles of temperance are introduced into more than one hundred thousand families—and for what price? For the small sum of £26!

Tract distribution has proved exceedingly useful among the working classes; but the peculiar advantages of this new agency in reaching the middle and higher classes, will be immediately perceived.

Constant pecuniary assistance will be required to render the plan fully effective, and for this support the Committee depend upon those friends who are anxious to see the universal spread of temperance information.

Donations previously announced	£42
Richard Potter, Esq.	2
P. J. Bassett, Esq.	5
Mrs. Grant	3
G. S. Kenrick, Esq.	1 5s.

Subscriptions of any amount in furtherance of this object will be thankfully received at the office of the National Society.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

The Reports for last month are unavoidably postponed for want of space.

The formation of Local Associations, is one of the objects of the Metropolitan Mission.

An Association commenced by one of the Missionaries some time since, is in active operation.

The Rector of Clerkenwell in conjunction with the Sunday School Committee, having granted the use of the School Room in Lamb and Flag court, two meetings were held on the 18th and 25th ult., Mr. Phillips of the Temperance Provident Institution, in the chair.

The Missionary, (No X.) of the district, was assisted by two of his colleagues and other kind friends. A third meeting will be held on the 2nd of the present month, (December.) The Superintendent of the School and the City Missionary were also there, rendering their influential services; through whom, and the aid the Committee feel sure they shall receive from all the local Societies; there is every reason to believe that a permanent Society will be the result. The attendance was good, and several signatures were obtained.

SUPERINTENDENT.

THE METROPOLIS.

On the 29th of September, a Festival and meeting was held in Cole-street Chapel, Trinity-square Southwark, S. C. Hall, Esq., B.L., occupied the chair.

We announced in a former number that the above place of worship had been taken for the advocacy of temperance. We hope great success will attend the efforts put forth for that object.

The Eighth Anniversary of the Walworth and Camberwell Society, was celebrated on the 1st of October.

The meeting was held in the National School Room, Newington Butts. B. Rotch, Esq., B. L., and one of the Justices of Peace for Middlesex, presided. Mr. Beal, the Secretary, read the Report.

Addresses were delivered by Dr. Oxley, T. Mitchell, Esq., and Messrs. Walters and Davis.

Two lectures on the Metropolitan Mission were delivered in the month of October, by Dawson Burns, in the Temperance Hall, Carlisle Street, Marylebone. The attendance on both occasions was numerous and respectable.

The first Anniversary Festival of the Richard Knill, Total Abstinence Society, was held on the 10th of November, in the School Room, under Bishopsgate Street Chapel. Upwards of 200 persons set down to Tea. J. S. Buckingham, Esq., presided at the public meeting, which was addressed by Dr. Oxley, Mr. J. McArthy, Mr. Simmons, a Missionary from India, and other advocates.

The new hall of the "Old Kent Road and New Cross True Temperance Society, and Mechanics Institute, was opened on the 28th of October, when the chair was taken by Dr. Oxley, at which a densely crowded meeting was present, many retiring for want of room. The interest was kept up on the three following evenings, when John Meredith, Esq., John Cassell, Esq., and the Treasurer of the society, (in the absence of J. S. Buckingham, Esq.) severally presided, and excellent addresses were delivered on the occasion,—the only drawback being the unavoidable absence of the much-valued friend of the society, William Cash, Esq.

The foundation of the building had its origin in the zeal of a few individuals in humble circumstances, but the rearing and completion of the superstructure devolved upon others. A teetotal friend observing their difficulties, and seeing the desirableness of having a place of meeting, in the neighbourhood, advanced the money on interest. It is worthy of being remarked that this new cause is the fruit of the Peckham Society, then one of the branches of the South London Auxiliary; the meeting being held in the Lancasterian School Room, which was obtained through the influence of Samuel Cash, Esq., who himself generally presided.

As the library and reading-room are not yet completed, (requiring from £150 to £200) the liberal and enlightened friends of education and of temperance, will confer great and lasting obligations on the committee by affording them the necessary pecuniary assistance to carry out their contemplated plans of usefulness.

The hall will accommodate 400, and is duly invested in Trust.

Donations in money or books will be most thankfully received by the Treasurer, B. Hogsflesh, 18, Bird-in-Bush Road, New Peckham, or by any member of the committee.

SUSSEX AND SURREY.

W. GAWTHORPE'S JOURNAL.

It affords me very great pleasure to announce through the medium of the Chronicle, that we have succeeded in forming another temperance association for the systematic agitation of the principles of the temperance reformation. It forms an epoch in the movement in the counties of Surrey and Sussex. No flourish of trumpets announced the arrival of the delegates at Brighton on the 5th of November, who assembled for the purpose of assisting in organizing the temperance reformers in these counties. The meeting was a quiet, business-like affair, but nevertheless important and interesting. Thomas Compton, Esq. of Sompting-abbotts ably presided over the meeting. Burwood Godlee, Esq. of Lewes, an esteemed member of the Society of Friends was elected treasurer, J. C. Ferrier, Esq., M. D., of Worthing was chosen Secretary, and the following gentlemen from the executive committee for conducting the affairs of the association—Thomas Compton, Esq. of Sompting, Mr. Hills of Arundel, Mr. Cramp of East Grinstead, Mr. Aramfield of Croydon, Mr. R. Marsh of Docking, Rev. William Collings of Kingston. It was resolved to raise the funds necessarily required for carrying on the operations, by getting the societies to pay in advance at the rate of 8s. 6d. per lecture, and in the next place, by appealing to the friends of temperance and moral reform, for donations and subscriptions to aid in this noble undertaking. The thanks of the meeting were voted to the National Temperance Society, and to William Janson, jun., Esq. of Tottenham, for the pecuniary aid afforded, and interest manifested by them on behalf of those districts. Several other resolutions were passed, all tending to the same object; and if the friends, and especially the officers of the association will only put their shoulders to the wheel, this association may very soon be made a powerful means of doing good, and of bringing into disrepute the drinking-system of our country. In my next report I propose to give a rapid sketch of this field of operations, with a journal of proceedings. In concluding this hasty account of the formation of the Surrey and Sussex Temperance Association, I beg to tender my sincere thanks on behalf of the temperance cause to those friends who have so liberally aided by their donations this object, and at the same time would call on those who can help, and who have not yet done so, to forward whatever they may be pleased to give to our esteemed treasurer, Mr. Godlee of Lewes.

M. W. CRAWFORD.—ESSEX UNION.

Having concluded my labours in the above Union, I am truly grateful to be enabled to give a more cheering account of the results. A general spirit of revival was manifest at almost every meeting, during the last two months; and I have the pleasing reflection of leaving the Union, if not in a better, certainly not in a worse working-condition than I found it. My thanks are due, and hereby given, to those excellent friends at every station, whose kindness and valued assistance rendered my arduous labours less laborious.

I commenced on Monday, May the 12th. Suspended our public meetings during the month of August, and concluded my engagement on Friday, 31st October; during that period, I travelled 1,926 miles, addressed 96 public meetings, and received 218 signatures, a small number, but of much importance, when we consider the difficulties that yet remain to be surmounted.

I have engaged with the Suffolk Union, to commence next month, and hope to present a good account when my engagement is fulfilled.

G. W. PEACE.—CORNWALL AND DEVON.

The temperance cause is still progressing in the west of Cornwall, and in the towns which I have visited since my last report; viz., Hayle, St. Ives, Camborne, Redruth, Truro, &c., good meetings have been held. Having obtained leave of absence from my labours in this association for a few days, I have employed that time in visiting a few societies in the east of Cornwall, as also in Devon. On October 8th, I visited St. Austle, where a large and respectable meeting was convened. The attention was excellent, and the lectures evidently produced some good impressions. On the 9th, visited for the first time, Liskeard. The temperance hall was well filled; here the cause cannot but progress, having a number of warm supporters in several influential members of the Society of Friends. The 13th, attended a good meeting in York Lane, Plymouth, and on the 14th, at Devonport. Here the meeting was of the superlative degree, crowded to overflowing, scores being obliged to leave, unable to gain admittance. The society is blessed with some good sterling men, who are at the helm.

On the 15th, the Guildhall in Plymouth, was kindly lent by the Mayor, for a meeting. Every part of the building was crowded, the audience being literally packed together. The chair was ably filled by — Duscombe, Esq., and the result was of the most cheering and flattering description; at the close, 14 signed the pledge. At all of these meetings I have been accompanied by Mr. J. Passmore Edwards, whose assistance and advocacy have tended materially to advance and render the meetings interesting and successful.

GEORGE BEST.—OXON.

I am happy, however, to state, that the good cause is on the advance among us, and that those already reclaimed, remain steadfast. Our teetotal labourers in the fields, have shown that they can work as well, if not better, without strong drink. Some of the publicans in the villages complain they do not now sell one-third the quantity of beer they formerly did.

Since my last report, I paid a short visit to Scotland, and found much drunkenness in Leith, Edinburgh, and other places. I was not inactive, but by speaking, by distributing tracts, and by other means, endeavoured to extend the cause of temperance, and I trust my labours were not altogether in vain.

A poor woman in the village of A, 16 miles from here, told me the other day, with tears of gratitude that, she should always be pleased to see me. For she said, "before you met with my husband we were in the greatest state of misery and poverty, sometimes we and our children were almost ready to starve for the want of food; but now we have plenty. Then we went to no place of worship, now we have clothes to wear, so that we can attend God's house, and our children now go to the Sunday School. Then we were very unhappy, for all went for drink, now we are happy," &c.

Another in the village of B, 8 miles from here, whose husband is a Mason, told me. "Ah, Sir, I am glad to see you, to tell you, that my John has not been to the Public House since you were here, (nearly a month,) and he declares he will drink no more. These last three Sundays we have gone to Church together. Last Thursday night we went to Chapel together, and since he has ceased to drink, he has brought home £2, which he would have spent if you had not met with him."

A. W. HERITAGE.—HAMPSHIRE.

Visited Sparsholt; while distributing tracts an aged female said, "This is a notorious place, I hope you may do good," could not prevail upon her to sign the pledge; gave away 32 tracts.

Went to Week and Worthy, two villages near Winchester, called upon nineteen families; two children signed.

At Whiteparish, a populous village, much prejudice prevails; three persons, however, signed the pledge.

Broughton. Here I met with a group of men going to work, and entering into conversation with them, inquired if they were teetotalers, upon which one replied, "No; except that man with the watch in his pocket." What a lesson for beer-drinkers! I walked two miles with them, urging the importance of temperance, and at length three more took the pledge.

Took the train to Southampton, and spent two hours in tract distribution in the dock-yard; two signatures. After which attended a tea and public meeting in the Primitive Methodist Chapel. Returning home the same night by rail, I travelled with a lady who appeared quite intoxicated; she, however, poured contempt on teetotalism.

Walked to Wherwell, near Andover, and finding most of the people in the harvest-field, I adopted a new course, and went from field to field visiting the labourers and reading to them the tract, called The great delusion.

Paid my first visit to Clatford, and adopted the same plan as at Wherwell. One woman said, if her husband would become a teetotaler, they might be as comfortable as other poor people; he, however, refused to sign, although his wife and another female set the example.

Mitcheldener and neighbourhood visited and distributed forty-two tracts.

At the village of Bourne, when I talked about labourers performing their work without strong drink, the people laughed at me, supposing the thing quite impossible. Two persons possessed of a little more faith than their neighbours, promised to try it for a month; one of them observing, he had tried moderation and drunkenness.

Went to Upper, Lower and Middle Wallop, and found several pious people, both Baptists and Wesleyans, but none disposed to be so foolish as to leave off drinking, what one man singularly enough called "nature's beverage." I distributed sixty tracts; Dick in the Stocks, and the one on Slavery appeared the most acceptable.

At Andover waited upon several teetotalers, and found the society in a very disorganised state, but hope the approaching winter's campaign may revive things here.

Having spent the night at Andover, I walked to a foundry about two miles distant, and spent some time in talking to the workmen and giving them tracts. I hope to hold a meeting here before long; one of the proprietors of the works being a teetotaler.

Travelled from Southampton to Downton, giving away tracts as I went, and was surprised to find in going through the New Forest, a distance of about twelve miles, not one place of religious worship could be seen, although several public-houses and beer-shops presented themselves to my notice.

Spent the next day at Downton, in Wiltshire; here there are a few good men and true, struggling against much opposition; obtained two signatures.

At Bishopstoke went down the line of railway, talking to the workmen, some listened attentively others insulted, and one signed the pledge. I hope to visit this person often, he has been a notorious drunkard. Should he continue firm, this will be ample compensation for a month's labour.

Went to Crowd Hill, hoping to have a meeting; but as no announcement had been made, we could not succeed in holding one. Found a few had adopted our principles, both here and at Twyford.

A social tea-meeting at Winchester, when some preliminary steps were taken towards the establishment of a library in connexion with the Temperance Society.

ASHFORD.

There has been some declension in the cause of temperance in this town; but I am happy to say it seems now to be reviving again.

Two respectable farmers called on me on the 27th of October and signed the pledge.

On the 15th of October, we had an interesting meeting in the British and Foreign School Rooms, when Mr. Hudson gave us an excellent lecture. On the same day we had a public tea.

THOMAS CLARKE.

YORK.

THE YORK NEW LECTURE HALL.

The citizens of York have long felt the want of a building suitable for holding public meetings, and the York Temperance Society, also desirous of having a building worthy of the cause with which they are identified, a project was formed to effect such a purpose—plans, &c., were prepared—the estimated cost was £1500—and the shares at £1 each, were soon nearly all taken. The society, for obvious reasons, have designated the erection, "The York Lecture Hall." Its site is in Good-rangate, towards the west end; it is out of view of the street, and approached by a sufficiently wide passage. The Hall has no external decorations, but is beautifully fitted up internally. Abundance of light is obtained from the roof, which forms a parallelogram-shaped dome, the whole of which is glazed. The platform is erected at the south end, in the middle is a recess—on the north, east, and west sides, a neat gallery is fixed, with seats two deep. At the north end is a good-sized room, which, on public occasions, may be thrown open by removing a partition. Pipes are laid for heating the Hall—there is a kitchen, with apparatus for boiling water, and all the arrangements are complete. The Hall was commenced last March, and has been speedily and satisfactorily finished.

The interesting services connected with the opening of the above splendid building commenced on Wednesday, September 16, by a procession of the York Temperance and Rechabite Societies, who, after perambulating the principal streets, halted in the Thursday Market, where a public open-air meeting was held, and addressed by Messrs. Miatt, Strachan, Higgle, and Bormond. At five o'clock, a tea-meeting was held in the Hall, which was filled by a respectable auditory. After tea, a public temperance meeting was held, commemorative of the establishment of the York Temperance Society nine years since. Amongst the friends present were—Rev. T. J. Messer of Hull, Mr. John Andrew of Scarbro', Edward Thompson, Esq., of Armin, L. Heyworth, Esq., of Liverpool, Mr. Counsellor Carberry of Leeds, J. Wilson, Esq., of Mirfield, Rev. James Caughey of the American Episcopal Methodist Church, R. Higgle, Esq., of Gateshead, Messrs. J. W. Miatt and J. Strachan of South Shields, and others.

D. Lupton, Esq., Mayor of Leeds, occupied the chair.

OTLEY.

On Wednesday evening, October 29th, a public meeting was held in the Methodist School Room, Otley, to promote the cause of temperance. Mr. David Beate, of that place, delivered an impressive address on the occasion. He was able to speak of the evils of intemperance, and also of the blessings which flow from an abandonment of this degrading vice.

HAWORTH.

On Sunday, November 2nd, a sermon was preached in the Hall-green Chapel, to a crowded audience, by Mr. G. E. Lomax, of Manchester, at the close of which, about 44s. was collected for the benefit of the Haworth Temperance Society. Mr. L. also delivered a temperance lecture, in the Hall-green School Room, on Monday evening, and one in the Hawksbridge School Room, on Tuesday evening.

HARVEST-WORK WITHOUT STRONG DRINK.

The principle of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, has recently been put to the test by eight men in the employment of Mr. Caleb Coleby, of Pulham, St. Mary the Virgin, who have performed their harvest-work satisfactorily, without the aid of any intoxicating liquor, the entire company being pledged members of the Pulham Temperance Society. The names of these men are Robert Tillet, Daniel Lee, Robert Nunn, George Everitt, Joseph Oakes, John Frost, Edward Frost, and William Howlett. Four other members of the same society, viz., James Bunn, Edward Childers, Charles Youell, jun., and George Bullock, jun., have also borne their testimony against the common opinion that strong drink is necessary in the harvest-field, by working with separate companies of harvestmen, who have adhered to the usual practice of drinking beer. These men have all performed their work without difficulty, and have suffered no inconvenience from enlisting under the banners of the Coldstream Guards.—Norfolk News.

HARVEST HOME.—INGHAM.

A pleasing scene was witnessed at Ingham Chapel, on Wednesday evening last. About 350 persons, consisting of harvestmen, their wives and children, accompanied by their masters and families, met to celebrate the close of harvest by a social repast. Ample provision was made for this large company, and ample justice done to it. In one of the addresses delivered after tea, it was stated, that the supplies required for the evening's entertainment, were 14 stone of bread, 10 stone of cake, 24 pounds of butter, 2½ lbs. of tea, 24 lbs. of sugar, and 34 pints of milk. No account was given of the quantity of ham consumed at tea, nor of the fruit afterwards, though of both there was an abundant supply. The good feeling which prevailed between the different classes was exemplary; the poor were orderly, respectful, and attentive, yet perfectly free and happy; and those of superior station were courteous and sociable. The Rev. J. Venimore, the minister of the chapel, presided, and addressed the company after tea. Very interesting and useful addresses were likewise delivered by Messrs. R. Cooke, W. Hows, jun., G. S. Barber, and B. Slipper, also by J. Flory, a labouring man, whose speech was instructive, appropriate, and well delivered. Conversation and music filled up the interval. At the close of the meeting, social worship was conducted by the chairman, and the company separated at half-past nine; unanimous in thinking this a vast improvement on the old way of signaling the harvest-home by drunken revelry. A similar meeting was held in this place of worship on the 19th ult., and the attendance at both would have been much larger if room could have been found. At other chapels of various denominations, in this neighbourhood, we understand that gatherings of a similar character have taken place.—Norfolk News.

LANE END.

On the 11th instant a public tea-party took place at Lane End, in the National School-room, when about 250 sat down to that social and cheerful repast. A public meeting was afterwards held in the same room, the Rev. William Ford, M.A., perpetual curate, and president of the North Staffedshire Temperance Association, in the chair. After the opening address of the chairman, very able and suitable speeches were made by the Rev. L. Panting, M.A., vicar of Chelmsay, Mr. Gloer, agent of the Central Association, and Mr. Rithbone of Hanley. The attendance was numerous, and the feeling of the meeting excellent. Eleven or twelve pledges were afterwards taken, on of them being that of a respectable tradesman of the town. The whole was enlivened by the good music of the Stoke teetotal brass band, who kindly gave their services on the occasion. A similar tea-party and public meeting were also held at Stoke-upon-Trent on the following evening, in the National School-room, when about 300 sat down to tea. The meeting was exceedingly and oppressively crowded. The chair was occupied for some time by W. Ridgway, Esq., of Haxley, until the arrival of the Rev. W. Ford, the president of the Association. The report and accounts of the North Staffordshire Association for the past year were read and passed; thanks were publicly given to G. S. Kenrick, Esq., for his valuable services. Very suitable and interesting speeches were delivered by the chairman, A. Astle, Esq., Robert Garner, Esq., Rev. L. Panting, vicar of Chebsey, Rev. H. Hilton, G. S. Kenrick, Esq., Mr. G. Hemmings, and Mr. Glover. The meeting was one of a very enthusiastic character; a striking feature of it was the attendance and support of three medical gentlemen, all pledged members of the Society. The Stoke brass band varied and enlivened the scene, and some new pledges were taken.

Compendium of Facts.

THE NEWSPAPERS state, that the Duke of Wellington has sent out orders to abolish Temperance Societies in the British army.

ON SUNDAY morning last, between six and eight o'clock, no fewer than sixty-eight persons, including nine females, were observed to come out of one public-house, situate not a hundred miles from the North Quay, in this town.—Mon's Herald.

AT THE LATE Windsor election, a company of soldiers who were in a state of intoxication, created a riot in the town.

MR. DAY, the rector of Hawbridge, Bucks, has been subjected to proceedings in the Ecclesiastical court, "for having addicted himself to excessive drinking wine, beer, and spirituous liquors, and for having been repeatedly intoxicated." From the articles and the evidence in support of them, it appeared that he frequented a public-house in the parish called the Rose and Crown, where he associated with labourers, and other low persons in the tap-room, conducting himself whilst intoxicated with violence, offering to fight, and using profane language.

REV. DR. CAMPBELL signed the temperance pledge at our office, on the 1st of November.

DR. GRINDROD has been lecturing with his usual success in Carlisle, Newcastle, and North Shields.

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., has laid the foundation of the Clarence Temperance Hall in Liverpool.

THE ROCHDALE SOCIETY held its tenth anniversary on the 12th of November; Jacob Bright, jun., Esq., presided.

ON THE 6th of November a lecture was delivered by Mr. Cassell, in the Tailors' Hall, Bristol, on the plan of advertising temperance information in religious and other Magazines.

AN OVERWHELMING majority of the voters of Connecticut, have decided against the liquor-license system.

IN THE COUNTIES of Fairfield, Windham, and New London, containing about one-third of the population of Connecticut, not a single town has voted to grant licenses to sell intoxicating liquors.

MURDER PREVENTED BY TEETOTALISM.

On Wednesday evening, at the total abstinence meeting in Bevington-hill, an individual came in considerably the worse for liquor, whilst a Mr. Strick, from Leeds, was speaking and pointing out the awful consequences that had occurred in his own family through the love of strong drink. It wrought so much upon the mind and conscience of the individual alluded to, that he came forward and produced a pistol, which he had purchased that evening for the purpose of shooting his wife, said he felt conscious of the evil of drink, and signed the pledge.—Liverpool Mercury, November 14th.

BRIEF NOTICES.

THE YOUNG WOMAN'S TRACT; Or, the Temperance Question commended to the attention of Females.—Ipswich Tracts, No. 55.

We fully agree with the writer of this pamphlet, in the statement contained in his opening paragraph:—"Amongst the various classes in society, to which the attention of writers on Temperance has been specially directed, it seems somewhat strange that the young women of our country, should appear to have been nearly, if not altogether, overlooked." We rejoice that they have been at length specially addressed in the tract before us, which, like its predecessors to Sunday School Children, and Sunday School Teachers, is written in a most effective manner, and will be productive of good, commensurate with its circulation.

THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE REVIEW, under the Auspices of the Scottish Temperance League. Edinburgh. Q. Dalrymple, 29, South Frederick Street. Nos. 1. & 2.

Another candidate for the favour of the temperance public has recently appeared under the above title. It has our heartiest wishes for its prosperity; we trust it will obtain what it desires—the support of thousands of abstainers; and from the specimens before us, we believe it will rank among the ablest and most powerful advocates of the Temperance cause.

ALBERT BARNES.

The October number of the Christian Witness contained an essay on the subject, by Albert Barnes of America, entitled "General Views and Practical Deductions," which is well deserving the serious perusal of both the friends and the opponents of the total abstinence cause. We cordially and fully concur in the sentiments expressed in the following paragraph—

"There may be difference of opinion on the question whether the use of wine is forbidden in the sacred scriptures,—whether the wines of Palestine were or were not fermented,—whether as a common beverage they were or were not attended with danger,—and whether the wine which the Saviour made at Cana, and that of which he commonly partook, had the common properties of the fermented juice of the grape,—and whether to abstain from the use of wine be a mere matter of expediency, or be a matter of moral obligation. Let these continue to be topics of friendly discussion. Let travellers make further reports. Let the language of the scriptures be further investigated. Let books be written, and speeches made, and sermons preached, and ancient customs be more fully investigated. But in the mean time, assuredly Christians may agree on such points as the following, and such agreement will practically settle the question. I mean—that the use of wine as a beverage, is nowhere enjoined in the scripture, or made a test of discipleship, or a part of the lute of religion; that no injury will occur by total abstinence; that the wines of Palestine, whether fermented or unfermented, were materially unlike the manufactured wines of this country; that these wines are in general a miserable compound of deleterious articles, sustaining no more relation to the vine than any other of the drinks that intoxicate; that they possess the intoxicating quality in a high degree, and that the intoxicating quality is the same as in any other liquor that produces this effect, and is, like that, alcohol; that the use of wine by professing Christians, and by ministers of the gospel, is highly injurious by example, and is that to which men constantly appeal to keep themselves in countenance; that in fact the principal danger among the young men of our cities and towns, and especially among those who claim to be of the higher classes, is from the use of what is called wine—and that, as a consequence of that use, sustained as they are to some extent by the example of professing Christians, multitudes of them are on their way to the grave of the drunkard. Under circumstances like these, and with admitted facts like these, is it well, is it expedient, for the friends of religion to advocate their use, or to patronize it by their example? Let them have their own views about the reasons for abstaining—whether from expediency, or from the conviction of right and of conscience—yet in the thing itself may there not be, and should there not be, harmony of action? and are not those who love the Saviour bound to set their faces against any form of an evil, which, in days that are past, has robbed the church of many who might have lived to bless it by their talents and piety; which, every year, has consigned its tens of thousands to the grave; which has filled our prisons and almshouses with convicts and paupers, and which more than anything else has spread poverty, and woe, and mourning over the land? What should a Christian have to do with customs which, by any possibility, can lead to such results?"

TEMPERANCE AND PEACE.

(From the Herald of Peace.)

Strong drink is one of the recruiting sergeant's chief means of accomplishing his object. To a great extent the army is composed of drunkards; and the uniform testimony of those best acquainted with the ranks, is, that a large proportion of the crime that characterizes the army originates in the habit of drinking. Everything that tends to diminish this practice, tends to prevent the increase of the army; and every improvement effected in this particular, amongst the soldiery, prepares them to form a more rational and consistent opinion of the profession of arms. If recruits be obtained with more difficulty, and soldiers be brought to serious reflection as to the lawfulness of their calling, the cause of universal peace is thereby furthered. It is with great satisfaction, therefore, that we contemplate the progress of the Temperance movement amongst the labouring classes of the people; and especially those of Ireland, from which the chief part of the soldiers are drafted; and with equal satisfaction that we learn, that the cause of temperance is making progress among the soldiers themselves.

It is pleasing to observe how closely all great moral reforms are allied to each other, and how they are all working together to bring about, under the superintendence and blessing of Almighty God, that period of universal light, and purity, and liberty, and love, so long and variously foretold in the pages of Holy Scripture—"Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters."

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

(From the Manchester Argus.)

View the various schemes for social improvement in whatever light we may, whether morally, religiously, or politically, their grand recommendation must be their tendency to excite in the minds of unthinking men the powers of reflection and self-guidance. Regarded in this light, we do not know but that some of these schemes are worthy to take precedence of many others of a political and party nature, though the latter occupy a much larger share of public attention. What calmly-judging mind, with power to look into itself and understand, so far as can be understood, its deep mysteries and independent powers, but knows that the prosperity and happiness of nations and communities depend less, much less, upon forms of government, or the ascendancy of this or that party, than upon the judicious self-moved operations of well-informed minds. As an instrument for aiding to lay this foundation for social greatness, we hold the abstinence cause to have irresistible claims on the public mind. When we think, too, of the wonderful sympathies that bind mind to mind, and the secret influence that, springing in one mind actuates another, we at once see the importance to that cause of individual example and support; and cannot admit the force of opposing arguments, grounded on the plea of too much self-sacrifice, as weighed against the advantage to each individual that would result from a hearty and general co-operation for the reform of the inebriating vices of society.

TEMPERANCE IN AMERICA.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

Our friends from America inform us, that the temperance cause continues rapidly to extend its influence there, with obviously the most beneficial and happy effects on society at large, that indeed, the most sanguine can hardly over estimate its civilizing and humanizing tendencies. Extensive farms are managed without the use of one drop of intoxicating drink, in a climate subject to great extremes of heat and cold. Ships are sailed, and manufactures are conducted on the same plan, and in every case, the work is done more expeditiously and better; the manufacturer especially, reckoning his temperance-labour to be twenty-five per cent. more valuable than drinking-labour.

[As a corroboration of these statements, we may observe, that the Rev. W. Chalmers (who was one of a deputation from the Free Church of Scotland to the United States) remarked, in a lecture given on the Institutions, &c., of America, that though he had travelled 5000 miles, he had never seen a drop of spirits in a private house, and only once at a public dinner; and he had not been offered more than half-a-dozen glasses of wine during his whole stay in that country.]

A CLERGYMAN VERSUS LICENSING.

The Ipswich Express stated, that on an application for a new public-house license in Colchester, the Rev. S. Carr, Vicar of St. Peter's, in which parish the house is situated, deprecated the granting of the license. He dwelt at some length upon the bad effect which the increase of public-houses was calculated to produce upon the morals of the inhabitants, and concluded by entreating the Bench to reject the application. At a future meeting the application was rejected.

JOHN WESLEY

"You see the wine when it sparkles in the cup, and are going to drink of it. I tell you there is poison in it, and therefore beg you to throw it away. You answer, 'the wine is harmless in itself.' I reply, 'perhaps it is so; but still, if it be mixed with what is not harmless, no one in his senses, if he knows it at least, unless he would separate the good from the bad, would once think of drinking it.' If you add, 'it is not poison to me, though it be to others.' Then I say, 'THROW IT AWAY, FOR THY BROTHER'S SAKE, LEST THOU EM-BOLDEN HIM TO DRINK ALSO. WHY SHOULD THY STRENGTH OCCASION THY WEAK BROTHER TO PERISH FOR WHOM CHRIST DIED?'—Sermon on Public Diversion.

POETRY.

SONG OF THE RIVER.

BY C. H. DELEVAN.

(From The Fountain.)

I spring from the rock, from the mountain side,
Sparkling, pure and bright,
And I gather strength as I rapidly glide
From my birth-place into light.

Riches I bear to land and tree,
Beauty to hill and dale;
Beast and bird delight in me,
Drink and are strong and hale.

Fresh are the the flowers that deck my banks,
The sod is greenest there;
And the warbling winged ones sing their thanks,
As they drink of me everywhere.

I am the only drink that was given
To man, when pure and free;
Return then, to the gift of Heaven,
You're safe when drinking me.

"ONE AND ALL."

We take the Cornish motto, "One and all," the heading of our present article; and intend referring some remarks on a subject closely allied to the prosperity of the temperance cause; to which remarks we respectfully solicit the candid attention of all our readers.

It is a saying trite but true, that the fate of nearly every institution, whether sacred or secular, has been to suffer more from its professed friends than from its open enemies.

Often, when there has been no visible opposition, the supporters of a cause have quarrelled among themselves; while, sometimes, but more rarely, internal dissensions have arisen in the midst of attacks from without. It is seldom that any society can survive, when the latter is the case; to do so, it must be endowed with more than ordinary vitality, and must be the depository of principles of the highest moment.

How will these observations apply to the Temperance Reform? Simply thus. No movement has been more furiously assailed from without; none has ever contained so many traitors within.

It has had to stand against the raging fury of the malevolent, and the more dangerous cant of the hypocritical. It has had to endure the silent scorn of the apathetic, and the misguided zeal of well-meaning but mistaken friends. While it has been assailed with unremitting vigour, it has been weakened by controversies among its adherents; and it is to these controversies that we intend in particular to refer.

All acrimonious controversies among the friends of a cause must impair its usefulness; and for this plain reason—that while persons are occupied with one subject, they cannot be devoting their attention to another; and if Temperance advocates are absorbed in discussions among themselves, they cannot be applying all their energies to the fulfilment of the great trust committed to them.

We do not, of course, mean that differences of opinion should not exist, and that they should not be discussed in a friendly spirit: but we do object most strenuously to these controversies being elevated to an undue position.

But this is not the whole of the evil. Controversies are rarely engaged in, without the manifestation of bad temper. The consequence is, that we find some of the professed leaders of the cause, instead of uniting to spread the blessings of sobriety, indulging in insult and invective against one another.

They tell us in one page, that they desire nothing so much as the prosperity of the Temperance cause, and in another page, we see them striving by all the powers of sarcasm and declamation, to blacken the character and injure the reputation of some individual who differs with them on a peculiar dogma of their creed, but who is acknowledged to be as sincere a friend of the cause as themselves.

These are pitiable and melancholy spectacles. Need we wonder that the mass should look on with indifference, or turn away with disgust?

We speak in sorrow, not in anger. We entreat all who have a true and fervent attachment to the principles of total abstinence, to guard with the utmost watchfulness against this evil.

We would ask with all the solemnity of which we are capable, Does the Destroyer stay his march while Temperance advocates are tarnishing each others characters? Is the pestilence arrested? Ah, no! The simoom still sweeps onward in its burning and withering course—the plague still continues its devastations—the grim tyrant still holds his sway—the earth is still drenched with tears and blood—the heavens still resound with the groans of the suffering and the dying—and tens of thousands of unreclaimed drunkards are still entering the invisible state!

Away, then, with our inactivity!—Away with our party and personal disputes!—We are all agreed that the universal spread of temperance will bless mankind and glorify God. Let us keep this object steadily before us, and use those means for its accomplishment which we think will be most effective.

Away with mean and silly jealousies!—We are only the instruments—God is the Great First Cause, and to him must all the honour be ascribed.

When we see cause for reproof, let us reprove with kindness, but let us not be drawn into angry controversies with individuals or parties. Let us bear in mind that the tide of woe and misery continues still to flow, and that every day adds to the strength of the fearful current. Does it not, then, behove us to endeavour with all the power we possess to arrest its further progress?

The new year opens auspiciously— a spirit of Union is kindling in every direction; may it burn brighter and brighter! Let "One and All" be our motto, and with one end in view, may we all strive with one heart and one mind to attain it. And when 1846 is about to close, may it bear this testimony—a testimony far preferable to any which could be borne to our polemic skill—that the only provocation we have offered has been "to LOVE and to GOOD WORKS."

POLICE REPORTS.

The police reports inserted in our pages from time to time, must not lead our readers to suppose that they are extraordinary cases; much less, that they are all, or, indeed, any considerable proportion of those which daily occur in London alone. Even the daily papers report a very small minority of the cases of drunkenness brought before the magistrates at the Mansion-house, Guildhall, and other police courts. It is scarcely possible to be half an hour in any of these courts, on any day in the week, without hearing several charges, occasioned directly or indirectly by the drinking-habits of the community.

A few days ago, the writer had to make a declaration at Guildhall, and while waiting for about a quarter of an hour, four cases were brought on in succession, every one of them connected with drinking and thieving at public-houses. One wretched looking creature, already under recognizances for a former offence, was charged with entering the George Inn, under suspicious circumstances, and taking a pint of sherry without paying for it. Another had stolen a shilling from the counter at a pot-house. Two lads had had some half-and-half at a beer-shop, and had run off without paying for it, the defence being that neither of them had any money. One young man was taken up for being drunk and disorderly in St. Paul's Churchyard. His excuse was that he had met a friend from the country, who had shown his kindness and liberality by making his Cockney friend drunk, and thus providing him with a gratuitous lodging for the night.

The court was crowded with patenbrokers and publicans, who assist each other in demoralizing and impoverishing the country. It is difficult to say which class could be best spared from the executive ministry of Satan.

The following are specimens of the cases reported in the daily papers within the space of a few days, in London alone. They are affecting on many grounds; not only as showing the fearful and complicated evils of the drinking-system, and the inefficiency of the law to keep it in check, but as instances of the painful fact, that the administrators of the law are themselves infected with the evil. Thus, the magistrates admit drunkenness as an excuse for other crimes; the police, who are paid by the public to preserve order, are found amongst the drunken and disorderly; whilst those who ought to set an example to their inferiors, are allowed to indulge their sensual appetites, to the injury of the public, with no other punishment than a paltry fine and the disgrace, which they, perhaps, regard with indifference.

GUILDHALL.—A person "connected with the press," who rejoices in the classic cognomen of Scipio Small-man, was brought before Alderman Wilson, for wilfully smashing a pane of glass valued at £14, the shop window of the grocery firm which advertises itself by the laconic line "Number One, St. Paul's Churchyard."

It appeared that the prisoner, on being taken into custody, had said, "I did it, and I had an object." The object, however, seemed to be merely one of the hallucinations of an alcoholic brain; for the next morning, after a night's total abstinence, the imaginative gentleman discovered that he had no object at all; but had only been drunk.

He was fined £5, and in default of payment imprisoned for two months.

It will be recollected, in the case of the Portland Vase, noticed in our pages some time since, that the above is the maximum amount which the magistrate can levy in such cases.

We submit whether the interests of Number One would not be subserved by subscribing to the Temperance Society!

THAMES.—A DRUNKEN POLICEMAN.—Police-constable James Henry Clarke, 185 H, was placed at the bar before Mr. BRODERIP, charged with assaulting a waterman named George Rivett, in Lower East Smithfield, Wap ping; also with assaulting Inspector John Donegan and Sergeant Sugg, of the H division, while in the execution of their duty.

George Rivett deposed to having been spoken to in a rough manner by the constable Clarke, when leaving Alderman-stairs in his boat; soon after which he heard the cry of "Sculler," "Boat a-boy," which made him pull to the stairs, when the constable caught hold of his boat and took him into custody, saying he should charge him with being disorderly.

Inspector Donegan said he was on duty at Denmark-street station, when Clarke brought the man Rivett in custody to the station, and wished to charge him with being disorderly and causing a disturbance at Alderman-stairs. The inspector at once perceived that the constable was drunk, and the man Rivett quite sober. He desired the man Rivett to attend Superintendent Piers's office in the morning, and he (the inspector) would meet him there. After Rivett left the station, the inspector desired Clarke to sit down; to which Clarke replied that he should not, that he should go home. He then rushed out of the door, and Sergeant Sugg assisted the inspector and two other constables in stopping him, upon which he kicked at the inspector, and struck him on the chest. Whilst the inspector was endeavouring to handcuff him, he kicked Sergeant Sugg, and did all he could to injure all the officers. He was finally handcuffed. The case was reported to the Commissioners of Police, who referred it to that court for a magistrate's decision.

Mr. BRODERIP inquired what Clarke had to say in defence? to which he replied that he had TAKEN A LITTLE DRINK, and did not know what he did.

He was then sentenced to a month at the House of Correction.

Clarke begged the magistrate to fine him instead of imprisoning him.

Mr. BRODERIP said, certainly not; that the sentence he had passed was the maximum according to law, but he was sorry to say it was quite inadequate to the amount of the offence committed; that he was placed in the streets as a protector of the public peace, but had proved himself a disturber of it.

The conduct of the magistrate in this case is highly commendable. We are persuaded that if committals for drunkenness superseded fines, we should not only have fewer drunken policemen, but also fewer gentlemen-drunkards, who figure in our police courts from time to time.

The next instance we shall present is one containing a heart-rending description of maternal depravity.

WORSHIP-STREET.—Two wretched little girls, only 11 and 9 years of age, were charged with having stolen a pair of shoes in High-street, Shoreditch.

William Hurlock, a fish-dealer, stated that he observed the two prisoners suspiciously eyeing a new pair of shoes exposed for sale at the door, and drove them away, but on turning round directly afterwards he found the shoes had disappeared, and saw the prisoners running off as fast as they could down the street; he instantly pursued them, and on overtaking them, found the stolen property in possession of the elder prisoner, and gave them both into custody.

Police-constable Bryant, of the G division, stated that after lodging the prisoners in the station-house, on the road to which, the prisoners bit and scratched him, and struggled to the utmost of their power, he went in search of their mother, whom he at length found at the bar of a neighbouring beer-shop in a state of helpless drunkenness. On apprising her that her children were in custody for felony, she treated the matter with the most unfeeling indifference. The constable added, that he had made inquiries in the neighbourhood where the mother resided, and ascertained that she was a woman of the most abandoned habits, and that she had, in fact, regularly trained up her children to thieving, and chiefly for the gratification of her own depraved and vicious propensities.

The little creatures heard the evidence against them with the greatest indifference, and on being asked if they wished to say anything, carelessly replied in the negative.

The prosecutor requested that the magistrate, in consideration of the extreme youth of the prisoners, would deal summarily with the case, and sentence them to some short term of imprisonment.

Mr. BINGHAM, however, said that this would be altogether misplaced leniency, and he must decline acceding to the suggestion. After what he had heard of the abandoned character of their mother, the most merciful course that he could adopt for the welfare of the prisoners themselves would be at once to commit them for trial, which would most probably be the means of removing them from the contaminating influence of such a parent; for there could be no doubt, that if he imposed upon them only a short imprisonment, they would go back to their mother the instant they were liberated, and be again involved in the same ruinous courses they had before pursued.

The magistrate then ordered the depositions to be taken, and the prisoners were committed for trial—Times.

We must again applaud the decision of the magistrate. The hardening effects of strong drink, as detailed in the above case, cannot but appal every philanthropist who reads it; but, awful as the fact is, let us not forget that it is but one fact out of a thousand others.

Our next case, is that of a young gentleman, a medical student, who amused himself by wrenching off door-knockers, until he was interrupted by the police.

The reason he assigns for his conduct, is a cutting sarcasm upon the "convivial parties" of the day.

SOUTHWARK.—James Lockwood, medical student of Guy's Hospital, was charged with wrenching knockers off the doors of several houses in Church-street, and Suffolk-street. He was seen by a policeman, who took him to the station-house, where his pockets were found filled with the knockers of the doors of other houses, which he had previously wrenched off.

The defendant said that HE HAD BEEN DINING OUT, and HAD DRUNK TO SUCH EXCESS THAT HE SCARCELY KNEW WHAT HE WAS ABOUT. He added, that he was fully sensible of his error—(the error of "dining out, and drinking to excess?")—and was prepared to pay for the damage he had committed.

Mr. TRAIL fined the defendant £1, and adjudged him to pay £1 16s. for the damage.

The defendant was locked up.

We close our short, but already soul-sickening catalogue, by another case, in which the magistrate's conduct is open to censure.

LAMBETH.—A DRUNKEN TAILOR—Henry Bowes, a tailor, was charged with being so drunk in the Kennington-road as to be perfectly incapable of taking care of himself. The prisoner presented a most wretched appearance: his clothes, which had been good, were torn to tatters, and his whole person was covered with mud. When asked what he had to say to the charge, the prisoner expressed a hope, that his worship would take into consideration the extent of his sufferings; for the number of hours he had been locked up, in the state he then appeared, he begged to assure his worship, was more than sufficient punishment for his indiscretion. He lost his hat, his clothes were torn, but he knew not how, and how he came to roll about in the mud, he was quite unable to explain. Mr. HENRY observed, that as the prisoner had suffered considerably by his INDISCRETION (!) he should discharge him.

It might have been expected that the culprit would style his crime an "indiscretion;" but that a magistrate should give his sanction to the term, we could scarcely have believed. But such is the fact. And because this "indiscretion" did not lead to a breach of the peace, the offender is quietly dismissed. We are told in a certain Book, that magistrates should be "a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well;" but we suppose a drunkard is not to be considered an evil-doer, unless he become a terror to the public!

We intend to return to the subject of "Police Reports" at a future opportunity. Our pages might be filled every month with cases similar to the above; and we can only justify the apathy of the professed friends of morality, on a plea of ignorance as to the cause of the evil.

The Balance.

"WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING."

According to our last month's announcement, we proceed to consider the various objections which have been urged against the Temperance principle.

What we write shall be as simple and lucid as we can make it, and we hope that our efforts will prove useful, in assisting abstainers to give a reason for the faith which is in them.

The time has arrived, when men will be influenced in this matter by reason, and not by impulse—they require arguments, not mere assertions—appeals to their judgment as well as to their feelings.

Without further preface, we shall deliberately weigh the first objection, which is as follows;—

"INTOXICATING LIQUORS ARE NECESSARY AND BENEFICIAL; AT LEAST, NOT INJURIOUS."

This objection is composed of three parts, and each part requires to be separately considered.

It is asserted, 1st, that intoxicating liquors are necessary. Necessary for whom? They are not necessary for the millions of abstainers who exist without them. Necessary for what? For the discharge of the physical functions—necessary for health? Multitudes of teetotalers decide in the negative. Necessary for the objector himself? To prove this, he must first show that they are beneficial; for no article of food is necessary which is not at the same time beneficial.

But it is asserted further, 2nd, that intoxicating liquors are beneficial. It is urged that they are conducive to health, and enable men to perform arduous labour, endure extreme fatigue, &c.

Now, it may be proper to inquire here, what is there in the composition of these liquors which can produce such effects? Every substance is physically beneficial according to the amount of nutrition it contains, and what is the amount of nutrition in intoxicating liquors? A gallon of ale is made of 95 ounces of barley, which contain 88 ounces of nourishment; how much of this is found in the gallon of ale? Not ten ounces!

Be it remembered that solids alone can nourish; solids alone can be converted into blood, and from thence into bone, &c; and all fluids are nutritious only, according to the amount of solid matter they contain.

A process of decay is constantly going on in the body, which decay is also being constantly repaired by the conversion of the food we take into the various members of the physical system. To be nutritious, intoxicating liquors must contain solid matter, which is thus converted; but what is the fact? Why, out of 100lbs. of barley, 75lbs. are lost in the processes of malting and brewing—Where then is the nutrition?

The fallacy which the labouring classes have held so long, and for which they have had to pay so dearly, is simply this—

They are told that strong drink is made of barley; after taking it they feel invigorated, and therefore conclude that it is the effect of the barley! Strange infatuation, to suppose that barley can be digested, and applied to the recruiting of the physical energies in the space of a few minutes! Liebig, in his letters on chemistry, p. 57, states, "beer, wine, spirits, &c., furnish no element capable of entering into the composition of blood, muscular fibre, or any part which is the seat of the vital principle."

It is time that this "great delusion" should be forever annihilated, and that every working man should be made acquainted with the truth—that fermented and spirituous liquors contain little or no nutrition, and therefore, that the effect experienced after drinking them must owe its origin to some other cause; that cause is alcohol. And what is alcohol? It is a spirit composed of three gasses, united in the following proportions:—Oxygen, 34½ parts; hydrogen, 13¼ parts; and carbon 52 parts.

Can alcohol nourish? Is it nutritious? By no means: it is totally incapable of being converted into blood, muscular fibre, &c.; but it is a fiery spirit, and it stimulates, and it is this stimulation which is mistaken for strength. There is a healthy stimulation caused by the digestion of food, and its subsequent change into blood; but this is widely different from the artificial stimulation produced by alcohol. How, then, is alcohol beneficial? Some genius more than ordinarily acute may inquire, "Does not Liebig say that alcohol is partly decomposed by oxygen, and is not a warmth thereby elicited?" True, but as has been well remarked, it is heat without strength.

Oxygen, too, is lost, for the oxygen which thus decomposes the alcohol and generates heat without strength, might be otherwise far better employed in decomposing substances which would yield heat and strength, fuel and nutrition together.

Carbon, the main constituent of alcohol, is, we know, necessary to life, but wholesome food yields all that the physical system requires; and as Dr. E. Johnson well remarks, "the difficulty is not how to get carbon, but how to get rid of it."

Thus it appears that though alcohol evolves a great amount of heat, yet it yields no nutrition, but produces considerable physical injury; and we therefore conclude, that it is safest and wisest to abstain from it and use food which yields sufficient heat, possesses nutrition, and produces no injurious effects.

Is alcohol, or are alcoholic liquors beneficial?

That they are not so, is attested by the élite of British physicians. Dr. Hope, Sir B. Brodie, Dr. Chambers, Sir James Clark, Dr. Granville, Dr. C. A. Key, Dr. M. Hall, Dr. D. Davis, with 72 other medical gentlemen of established reputation, signed a document containing the following paragraph:—

"An opinion handed down from rude and ignorant times, and imbibed by Englishmen from their youth, has become very general, that the habitual use of some portion of alcoholic drink, as of wine, beer, or spirits, is beneficial to health, and even necessary for those subjected to habitual labour.

"Anatomy, physiology, and the experience of all ages and countries, when properly examined, must satisfy every mind well informed in medical science, that the above opinion is ALTOGETHER ERRONEOUS."

Are intoxicating liquors beneficial? That they are not so, is, we think, evident from the fact, that those who abstain from them can perform their usual physical labour with equal ease as when they used them.

This is a point of great importance. Practical evidence on a practical subject is not only valuable; it is irresistible.

The question is not so much—can men perform the same labour when they abstain as when they take strong drinks? The question rather is, can they perform such labour as well? And if they can, is it not clear that the intoxicating liquors they formerly drank, did not enable them to execute their work?

But another point arises—do such individuals exist?

There need be no dispute here. It is a FACT, that there are hundreds of thousands of working men, who toil for their bread by the sweat of their brow, and who are engaged in all kinds of labour from the most arduous to the lightest—from the most active to the most sedentary; and these persons are of all ages, of all constitutions, and live in every variety of climate, from the nipping cold of Labrador to the scorching heat of the West Indies; from the genial climate of the islands of the Pacific, to the pestilential atmosphere of British Guiana—a land of marshes and the region of death—and these individuals testify, and they all testify to this one truth—that by abstinence from intoxicating liquors, THEIR PHYSICAL STRENGTH HAS NOT BEEN DIMINISHED; but, on the contrary, has in many cases been increased.

If, then, abstinence from these drinks has been productive of physical good, is it not manifest, that their use could not have been physically beneficial?

We are reluctantly compelled by our limited space, to postpone our remarks on the latter part of the argument under consideration till next month, when we shall also weigh the Second Objection, viz., "Intoxicating liquors are sent for man's use and enjoyment by God, and are therefore, his good creatures."

READING ROOMS AND COFFEE-HOUSES.

We have repeatedly insisted upon the necessity of supplying some useful, or at least innocent substitute for the habits forsaken by those who sign the pledge. The desirableness of establishing reading-rooms, supplied with useful and entertaining works of unexceptionable character, has often been enforced in our pages; and it has also been our lot to speak plainly our sentiments on the general run of Temperance Coffee-houses as at present conducted.

We have now the gratification of stating that a number of friends resident near London, have determined to open a coffee-house and reading-room in their own neighbourhood, from which all intoxicating liquors and tobacco shall be strictly excluded, and which shall be under the control of an independent committee. We ardently hope that this effort will be crowned with success; that it will not only prove a blessing to the neighbourhood, but also serve as a model for similar establishments in other places. The reading-room will be confined to subscribers, of whom a very small quarterly payment will be required. It is not intended to encourage newspaper reading; but the principal temperance papers will be taken in, and the room well supplied with useful and moral works. Several gentlemen have expressed their readiness to attend the reading-room and to give occasional lectures and explanations of different interesting topics in history, science, &c.

A TESTIMONIAL TO THE MISSION.

The following letter will be read with deep interest. The writer was found fifteen months ago in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, by the missionary on the Seven Dials District. She was in a state of destitution caused by depraved habits. She signed the pledge, and expressed great disgust at her way of life. The missionary exerted himself to procure her admission into the Female department of the Refuge for the Destitute, where her conduct has realized the hopes entertained of her reformation, and the following testimony from herself attests her gratitude.

Refuge for the Destitute, Hackney Road.

GENTLEMEN,

I beg to return my most sincere and heartfelt thanks for the great interest you took in gaining admission for me to the Refuge, while so many more deserving objects than myself have been, and still are, wandering houseless and friendless; however, I trust, by the blessing of the Almighty, the instructions I have here received, will prove of lasting good to me, and that I shall yet be a useful and respectable member of that society I had before so disgraced. Begging again to assure you of my deep sense of gratitude,

I remain, &c.,

THE ECCLESIASTICAL LAW AND DRUNKENNESS.

(From the Times newspaper.)

The common vagaries of intoxication, such as are presented daily to the police-courts, have in them often so much of the ludicrous that it is difficult not to lose sight of their real grossness in the grotesque forms which they assume. The culprit's punishment generally is to be locked up all night in a damp cell, where he sleeps as soundly as in his own bed; and on the morrow his sentence will be too frequently that, supposed to be pronounced on a very different occasion,

"Solventur risu tabule, tu missus abibis."

It is fortunate that the class of offenders against the laws of sobriety is such that but little injury can be done to the public by force of their example. A considerable period has elapsed since it was fashionable to swallow half-a-dozen bottles at a sitting, and the spectacle would not now be tolerated of a member of Parliament rolling in the gutter, and cracking jokes at the expense of a brother member, even though the jokes were brilliant with the wit of a Sheridan. The days of brawling noblemen and drunken parsons are at an end, and if an individual from among these classes happens to attain at times an ebrious notoriety, he is sure to meet with contempt at first, and finally with disgrace. Perhaps there is no particular in which modern society has risen so far above the impure standard of bygone times as in the habits of gentlemen. The improvement has often been remarked, especially by foreigners; and we are wont sometimes to bring it forward with no little satisfaction. But the greater satisfaction we feel at the general improvement, the deeper must be our disgust at particular exceptions, and more especially when these are found in the ranks of the clergy.

It has been the unenvied fortune of the parish of Hawridge, in Buckinghamshire, to have remained, for a period of eight years, under the spiritual guidance of a certain Mr. William Day. This reverend gentleman is not, we believe, unknown to the public. His reputation has not been confined within the narrow limits of his rectory. His name, unless our memory deceives us, has more than once been honoured by a notice in our columns, where he has figured both as a fancy butcher of sheep, and also in the more ambitious character of a cutter and maimer of his fellow-creatures. From the penalties of the first offence he barely escaped, as was thought at the time, through the peculiar leaning of a late Chief Baron. For his partial escape from the second charge he was indebted solely to the thickness of the clothing worn by his intended victim. He was, however, convicted of the assault, and suffered six weeks' imprisonment. These crimes attracted the notice of his diocesan, who some time back promoted the office of the judge against him, in pursuance of the provisions of the Church Discipline Act. The charges were for being addicted to continual and excessive drinking, so as frequently to be intoxicated, and for having been convicted of the assault above-mentioned, to the great scandal of the church. The habitual intoxication was proved by numerous instances and the clearest evidence. The spiritual pastor of Hawridge was described by his parishioners as having appeared among them under all the various phases of drunkenness—"tipsy, so that he could hardly get along, but was obliged to hold by a gate to keep himself from falling;"—"pretty well tipsy;"—"very tipsy, so as to run on a deal of nonsense;"—"rather fresh;"—"fresh;"—"very fresh;"—"the worse for liquor;"—"a good deal the worse for liquor." On one occasion, after having indulged to excess in a public inn, his old cutting and slashing propensities broke forth against an unfortunate dog, which he stabbed in the throat with his knife. Again, at the same public-house, after copious libations of brandy and water, and being inspired with that species of courage which is rather unjustly called 'Dutch,' he challenged the biggest man in the room to fight with him, declaring in his indiscriminate valour that "he would fight with any of them; he did not care whom he fought with."

Now, one would think that such conduct in a clergyman needed only to be known and brought before the proper judicial tribunal, to be instantly punished by deprivation; that is, by the severest penalty within the limit of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Such would be the judgment of a plain right-thinking man. Such, however, is not the judgment of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust. And that learned gentleman has a great reputation for judicial sagacity. He admits the charges to be proved, fully and legally. He admits that Mr. Day is liable to ecclesiastical censure. He was urged by counsel at the bar to pronounce the severest censure in his power—deprivation. Yet he hesitated, quoted cases, and could not bring himself to discharge an unpleasant duty. He discovers that there is no precedent of a sentence of deprivation for habitual drunkenness without a previous admonition, at least. He therefore suspends Mr. Day from office and the emoluments of his living for three years. Is it possible to pen this judgment without astonishment? Can any impartial person be found to say that justice has been done? It is not for us to decide where the blame should fall,—whether on the judge for his false judgment, or on the law for its weakness. For the benefit of public example, we would rather not quarrel with the law. But we would point out to Sir Herbert Jenner Fust a common maxim,—"Judex damnatur, cum nocens absolvitur."

THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE'S TESTIMONY.

The Marquis of Lansdowne in a letter to Father Mathew, thus writes:—"I am near the conclusion of a journey through a considerable portion of the south of Ireland; in the course of which I have myself had, everywhere, repeated occasion to observe a most remarkable change for the better in the appearance of the population, and to be assured by others on whom I could rely, of an equally manifest improvement in their character and conduct, produced by the extraordinary success of your unremitting endeavours to introduce amongst them confirmed habits of temperance and self-control."

WINE-DRINKING IN THE ARMY.

A long investigation has recently taken place in reference to Lieut. Kirwan, for stabbing Quarter-Master Tarleton, on Sunday, 28th September.

It is pretty evident that the act was performed in a state of excitement produced by the drinking of wine.

A general order was issued, by command of the Duke of Wellington, on the 20th of November, in which occurs this important paragraph:—

"The Commander-in-Chief has been informed that the practice of smoking, by the use of pipes, cigars, or cheroots, has become prevalent among the officers of the army, which is not only in itself a species of intoxication occasioned by the fumes of tobacco, but undoubtedly occasions drinking and tipping by those who acquire the habit; and he entreats officers commanding regiments, to prevent smoking in the mess-rooms of their several regiments, and in the adjoining apartments, and to discourage the practice among the officers of junior rank in their regiments."

Why not discountenance the use of wine altogether?

PROHIBITION OF DISTILLATION.

FATHER MATHEW'S OPINION.—Oats would supply the want of potatoes. There are Oats enough in Ireland to feed the whole population until the next harvest. If landlords allow their tenants to thrash their oats, and postpone their demand for rent, and let distillation from grain be prohibited, all anxiety and fear lest there should be a famine would vanish. The distillers can manufacture rotten potatoes into brandy, and leave grain, the merciful gift of a good God, to be for the purpose designed by Divine Providence.

UNITED STATES.

It may be news to some of our readers to inform them that the Rev. Thomas Spencer, A.M., of Hinton Charterhouse, near Bath, is at the present time on a tour in the United States. He has attended several large temperance meetings, and has met with a warm reception from our transatlantic friends.

The subjoined quotation from the Fountain, a temperance paper published in CONNECTICUT, gives a most gratifying account of the progress of the temperance cause in that State :—

THE CAUSE IN THIS STATE.

From the best information we can obtain from various sections of this State, it appears that the cause of temperance was never in a more flourishing condition than at present. Never had the friends of temperance greater reason to “thank God and take courage,” in view of the prospect before them, than now. Never, so far as we can learn, were the friends of humanity stronger in their determination to pursue the good work in which they are engaged, than at the present time. Never did the signs of the times hold out more encouraging prospects of success to those engaged in the temperance enterprise, than are now manifested in the state of public sentiment as recently developed. Never was there a time in the history of the temperance reformation, when more prudence and discretion were needed on the part of its advocates, than now. Brethren, let us push on the good work to its final consummation, trusting alone to the strength of Him who is our Rock and our Tower of defence ; and in pursuing our course, let us be “wise as serpents, and as harmless as doves.”

SOUTH AMERICA.

We hear from the Rev. Thomas Henderson of Demerara, that in British Guiana, including Berbice, Demerara, and Essequibo, there are nearly ten thousand consistent total abstiners, the conversion of whom has been the work of only a few years.

Most of the Mission churches have societies connected with them.

WEST INDIES.

ANTIGUA.

Extract of a letter from Antigua, dated October 26, 1845 :—

“We are still endeavouring to promote the temperance cause, and there is fearful need of it still in this land. Many promising youths are daily sinking in that awful vortex of habitual indulgence, and our fears are much excited for the labouring population, as grog-shops are multiplying on every hand. Our legislators complain of the increase of crime, while they seem to forget that they, for the sake of increasing the revenue, are promoting the evil, by granting licenses to those dens of misery ; and it is a matter of doubt with me, if that source of revenue were annihilated, or essentially curtailed, it would not be fully compensated by saving of those heavy expenses of criminal prosecutions, and more especially in the ultimate beneficial result of a moral and industrious labouring population.

“P.S. Should any kind friend feel disposed to send me a few well-selected temperance tracts, not omitting T. Shillitoe’s speech at Exeter Hall, I should be glad.”

[A packet of tracts has been offered by our kind-hearted friend, Richard Dykes Alexander, of Ipswich.—Eds. N. T. C. and T. R.]

GERMANY.

We are enabled by the kindness of a friend, Rev. G. W. Lehmann of Berlin, to present our readers with the translation of an amusing paragraph which appeared last October in the “Die privilegirte Voss’sche Zeitung,” i. e. “The Privileged Gazette of Voss,” published in Berlin ; and also to give an accurate statement of the condition of the temperance cause in Germany.

The paragraph referred to is as follows :—

The Temperance Movement—Teotalism, or Tea-is-all (!)—has come to an end. The excitement created a re-action of which it has died. Even at its commencement, the permission to use wine, but to abstain from brandy, did not give satisfaction. The public said, ‘You are only wanting the poor not the rich to live temperately.’ The former pledge was then altered, and a pledge of abstinence from all spirits was adopted. Earl Stanhope became the president of the new society in London ; and meetings were held in Exeter Hall, by which funds were collected for the formation of Branch Societies. But divisions soon arose. Some temperance advocates declared themselves for a pledge not to offer wine to their guests : this was called the long pledge. Others could not agree to this, but believed that personal abstinence was sufficient ; theirs was called the short pledge. Travelling preachers of all sects seized the offices of the societies, and commenced discussing the most irrelevant subjects. At last, the originator of the main society in London, and the most active apostle of the whole movement was imprisoned on account of debt. Earl Stanhope now caused collections to be made to rescue him, and to secure for him a competency during the remainder of his life ; but then he withdrew. Since that time teotalism has fallen into oblivion. Two periodicals devoted to its propagation and defence, the Temperance Intelligencer, and Temperance Journal, have ceased already during the last year (1845,) for want of subscribers.”

Leaving this medley of fact and fiction not well joined together, we have much pleasure in giving the following account of the PRESENT STATE OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN GERMANY.

(Communicated by the Rev. G. W. Lehmann of Berlin.)

“The cause of temperance in Germany has made in the last few years very considerable progress ; indeed, its late successes have far exceeded the expectations of its warmest friends. It appears from statements made by the various societies, that there are not less than 800 associations, with about one million pledged members. In Hanover and the surrounding provinces, the movement is prospering. The capital of Hanover, the city of Osnabrück, East Friesland, Oldenburg, Bremen, and Hamburg, are head-quarters. Rev. Mr. Böttohen of Insen, in the kingdom of Hanover, has been, and still is, very active by his numerous publications, as well as by his public addresses. The Rev. Mr. Selig of Osnabrück, has not been less zealous and successful. He is commonly called the German Father Mathew, and his simplicity and kindness as well as his benevolence, equally fit him for his great mission.

"He has lately been honoured with a very kind reception by the Duke of Oldenburg.

"In Berlin and adjacent cities the cause is likewise spreading. Berlin may be considered as the cradle of the temperance cause since 1836. About eight or more societies are now formed in this city, and they act harmoniously together. The number of pledged individuals amounts to several thousands. In the month of August, 1845, a congress of German societies was held, when friends from all parts were present, and the meetings and speeches on this occasion were very interesting. Silesia exhibits, however, now one of the most interesting fields of operation. The Catholic clergy especially, have, as it appears, unanimously taken up the subject, and the results have been very pleasing, and similar on a smaller scale to those of Father Mathew in Ireland. Masses of the people have signed the pledge, and the movement is rapidly gaining ground. In Poland, and especially in the provinces of Posen, the results are also very gratifying. Dr. La Roche has there been the instrument of much good. He has lately published a work, in which he has collected the recorded opinions of nearly one thousand physicians in favour of temperance, and a very powerful address has been presented to the King of Prussia pleading for legislative enactments.

"Perhaps at present the least has been done in the South of Germany, but even there numerous societies exist.

"The Temperance Societies of Germany have yet only adopted the principle of total abstinence from distilled spirits; but this has been done unitedly, whereas before, many of them only discountenanced the intemperate use of these liquors. It ought to be considered, that to forbid the use of ardent spirits, is almost equal to preventing intemperance: as there is no other kind of beverage in common use which will intoxicate. Beer, at least, in the North of Germany, is of such a peculiar quality, that it does not intoxicate, and wine is too expensive for the common people. In the South of Germany, it is, indeed, otherwise. Wine is there not only much cheaper, and commonly used, but also the beer brewed there has considerable intoxicating power. It is to be regretted, that the use of this beer is now becoming more common in the North of Germany. It is difficult to say what will be the result, and whether the friends of temperance can stop at discountenancing the use of ardent spirits only."

THE METROPOLIS.

BERMONDSEY.—We are given to understand that a Literary Institution is formed, in connexion with the Bermondsey Temperance Society, composed of 120 members, having a library of 150 volumes; six classes, comprising reading and writing, English grammar, arithmetic, elocution, singing (on Hullah's system), and botany; such classes containing collectively 132 pupils, some of the members belonging to two classes. Books and promises of assistance have been received, and one or two other similar institutions are in contemplation.

Mr. J. W. Brooks, the secretary, who has communicated the above particulars, will be happy to supply individuals or societies with the rules for the management of such an institution. Letters to be addressed for him at 16, Margaret Street, Haggerstone, Hackney.

HACKNEY.—The anniversary meeting was held in the Lecture Room, London Lane, on the 25th of November. A large party took tea, when a public meeting was held, over which J. S. Buckingham, Esq., presided, supported by G. Offer, Esq., one of the magistrates of the Tower Hamlets, and other gentlemen.

WESTMINSTER.—Mr. John Bater, of the City of Westminster Society, has informed us that the spacious Temperance Hall in York Street, formerly a theatre, has recently been purchased by the teetotallers for a term of sixteen years, in 200 shares of £2. 10s. each; 1000 shares have been already taken. Temperance meetings are held on Mondays and Wednesdays, from six to eight o'clock, for females, and from eight to ten for public meetings; also on Sunday evenings, from eight to ten. The society, which twelve months ago numbered about 15 persons now numbers nearly 200, and the meetings are well attended. The first shareholders' meeting was celebrated by a festival and public meeting, when the hall was crowded. The chair was taken by D. French, Esq., barrister-at-law, and the meeting was addressed by Messrs. T. A. Smith, M'Curry, Punch, Walters, and others, and at the close ten persons signed the pledge.

A Mechanics' Institute was established December 3rd, which was opened with the formation of an adult class.

WALWORTH.—A meeting, over which William Sims, Esq., presided, was held on December 2nd, in the School Room, York Street, to memorialize Sir Robert Peel on the waste of wholesome food occasioned by the processes of brewing and distilling. A suitable memorial was agreed upon, and forwarded on the following day.

St. GEORGE'S East London.—A New Station is opened for the advocacy of temperance in this locality. An enterprising teetotaler has taken large premises situated in St. George's Street, St. Katharine's Docks, and has converted a portion of them into a temperance hall, which was opened on the 6th of December by a festival and public meeting. J. S. Buckingham, Esq., occupied the chair at the public meeting, which was addressed by a large number of speakers. The usual nights of meeting are Tuesday and Thursday.

We trust the friends in the district will receive cordial and efficient support.

The ANNUAL SERMON on Teetotalism by Rev. J. Sherman, was delivered in Surrey Chapel, on the 9th of December. The text was taken from Philippians ii, 20, 21.—"For I have no man likeminded who will naturally care for your state; for all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's."

The chapel was filled in every part, and the attention paid to the admirable sermon was deep and serious.

SUFFOLK.

Thomas Whittaker has been most acceptably with us for six weeks, visiting all the parts of the Union. He has stayed just sufficiently long, as to win the esteem of all his audiences, and a desire is left for another of his instructive courses of lectures at an early period. He has been succeeded by M. W. Crawford, who, in his opening address at Ipswich, won the approbation of the meeting, and there is no doubt but that his next lecture will be largely attended.

Of the Suffolk Union generally, we may speak with encouragement during the past quarter; the following account will tell the feeling of an interesting portion of the county—

BECCLES.

The condition of the Suffolk Union having become, through various causes, somewhat depressed, and the tributary societies somewhat disorganised, a plan for the re-establishment of a regular system of advocacy, and a more efficient means of carrying out the objects of the society, was thought of and proposed by some zealous friends. The plan being approved by the executive committee at Ipswich, a meeting of delegates was convened, to be held at Beccles, on Tuesday, the 9th December. The parties being assembled in due course, were favoured with the presence of George Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich, who was called to the chair; a series of resolutions were considered and passed, which we trust will be found to work well, the principal of which, was, that the county should be divided into two districts, and the committee of the Beccles society should become a part of the executive, taking one district of the county under its care and management, and in conjunction with the Ipswich committee, endeavour to place on a firm and permanent basis, the system of periodical advocacy, and by other means carry out as far as possible the principles and objects of the society. Their ability to do this will in a great measure depend upon the individual contributions of the members, the payments of the subordinate societies, and the assistance they may receive from benevolent persons in the shape of donations and regular subscriptions. In connexion with the assembling of the delegates, the society having the advantage of the presence of two well known and popular advocates, Thomas Smeeton and Thomas Whittaker, made arrangements for holding two public meetings on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday; and it was extremely cheering to the warm-hearted friends of the cause, to witness the assemblage which the announcement drew together. Our fine room, the Corn Exchange, presented quite an imposing appearance each evening, regarded by us as a kind of homage to the power and truth of our principles; about 400 or 500 of the working classes were present, and conducted themselves in a way much to their credit. G. Alexander, Esq., said, that it gave him much pleasure to meet a large assembly in so good a cause, quoted some lines from a certain popular poet, written in praise of the wine cup and the bowl, and showed how much he (the poet,) had misapprehended the true fount of inspiration, and the true source whence real pleasure was derived. He then called on Thomas Whittaker, who gave an admirable address, containing very happy points and arguments, and a fair deduction as to the duty and obligation of every one present to join in lending a helping hand towards the extension of our benevolent object. Mr. Smeeton spoke next, and introduced the subject in a physiological point of view, leaving the conclusion of the argument till the next night.

Next evening another grand meeting was held; several influential gentlemen of the town occupying seats on the platform. Mr. Alexander again took the chair. Mr. Smeeton resumed his argument, establishing his positions so completely as he proceeded that it was impossible for opponents to avail or object. Mr. Whittaker again delivered an effective address, embracing a great many views of the subject, but particularly directed to the Christian-professing-portion of the assembly, enforcing his argument by some well chosen texts and declarations of the word of God.

The Rev. George Wright on rising to make a few remarks at the close, adverted to a part of Mr. Whittaker's subject, and stated the kind of process through which his own mind had passed in the examination of the matter. He said that when teetotalism first began to engage his attention, he looked for some positive and express injunction, or precept in the word of God, enjoining total abstinence as a duty, but he could find none, and therefore for some time felt himself exonerated from any such obligation; but on further thought and research, it appeared to him that he had regarded the letter more than the spirit in this case, and that the bible really was full of the spirit and principles on which teetotalism claimed to be based. In the existing state of things, he found clear proof that total abstinence was expedient, and with him expediency soon became a duty—duty became a privilege and a pleasure, and he rejoiced now in having embraced these views, knowing that by being a member of this society, he was assisting in a work that, as God permitted, would confer incalculable, moral and temporal blessings on his fellow-creatures. A few observations were then given by Mr. Alexander, in an excellent and Christian spirit, and a vote of thanks having been passed for his attendance and conduct in the chair, these important and we trust effective meetings concluded. Several persons signed the pledge.

AMICUS.

NORFOLK.

NORWICH.—Extract from the Ninth Annual Report.—"Whilst the awful condition of the Heathen excites our sympathy, and arouses our benevolence, let us remember that in the City of Norwich alone, there are not less than 600 houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks, whose injurious attractions have, to an awful extent, proved detrimental to the moral and spiritual interests of the community.

"In attempting to stay the effect of such frightful fruits of evil, the Norwich Society has distributed several thousand publications, and held upwards of 150 meetings in different parts of the city—on two occasions upon Mousehold Heath. Several devoted friends have also made repeated excursions to many of the towns and villages of East Norfolk, for the purpose of advocating the cause of universal sobriety.

"As the effect of these exertions, we rejoice in being able to state that drunkards have been reclaimed—domestic wretchedness has been supplanted by peace and happiness—and, in many instances, wandering outcasts have been induced to attend the public worship of Him, who is ever ready to listen to the supplications of the returning prodigal; while not a few have, by joining themselves to Christian churches, afforded an evidence that God is honouring the Temperance Society as an instrument in effecting the spiritual benefit of mankind.

"One additional feature in the history of the society during the past year, has been the formation of a ladies' auxiliary, and although but a short time has elapsed since it commenced operations, yet the subscription list of the present year affords a clear indication of the value which ought to be attached to the exertions of those ladies, who have so generously laboured on behalf of a cause, which ought, in an especial degree, to enlist the sympathies of their sex."

Since this report was prepared, the great Festival and Bazaar were held, an account of which will be found in the Chronicle for last November.

SOMERSET.

BATH.—Juvenile Society.—The annual meeting was held in the Juvenile Temperance Hall, on the 3rd of November. A large number of the members and friends of the society were assembled on the occasion; after tea, the chair was taken by Mr. J. Brumby, President of the Society, and the audience addressed by Dr. Sprague, the Rev. Mr. Hopper, minister of the Wesleyan Association in this city, &c. Dr. Sprague, formerly an army surgeon, proved, in a very able address, that intoxicating liquors were not needed under the most trying circumstances; that they were productive of much disease from which teetotalers were exempt; and that even in sickness they were, generally speaking, unnecessary. During the past six months, the Juvenile Society has held 27 public meetings in this city, 26 meetings of members, and 7 meetings in Avon-street, a very degraded and neglected neighbourhood.

BRISTOL.—Juvenile Society.—The 7th anniversary was celebrated on the 3rd ult., at the Lancasterian School Room, Red Cross-street, when between three and four hundred children and others sat down to tea. After tea, Rev. F. Stonehouse, A. B., the chairman, gave a brief address relative to the advantages of teetotalism to youth, and called upon Mr. W. Mathews, one of the secretaries, to read the report for the past year. Subsequently, the meeting was eloquently and ably addressed by Robert Norris and Edward Thomas, Esqrs., Mr. J. Russom, the president, Mr. G. Atkins, a youth, and Mr. John Andrew, agent for the Bristol and Somerset Total Abstinence Association.

BANWELL.—The Total Abstinence Society held a public meeting in their hall, on Wednesday evening, Nov. 5th. At half-past six o'clock, the chair was occupied by the President of the Society, the Vicar, who introduced Mrs. Fryer, of Falmouth, who delivered a powerful Christian address of nearly two hours, to a crowded audience, and notwithstanding the wetness of the evening, many respectable persons attended from a distance. Mrs. F. was followed by Mr. J. Andrew. Eight persons joined the society.

LINCOLNSHIRE.

SETTON-BRIDGE.—On Friday evening, December 4th, a lecture was delivered by Mr. Thomson, agent of the West Norfolk Association. Twenty-one persons signed the pledge.

On the same evening, Mrs. Stamp lectured in the Wesleyan School-room. Seven pledges were taken.

PETERBOROUGH.—A public meeting was held in the theatre, December 1st, which was well attended; the proceeds being greater than on any former occasion. We attribute the increased excitement which was caused by the novel manner in which the meeting was advertized. Mr. Browne of Wisbeach, known as the Boston Poet, went round the town and announced the meeting in rhyme, whereby he attracted a great concourse of people. Mr. Mackile, Primitive Methodist preacher presided. Mr. Browne recited several humorous anecdotes, and then addressed the meeting in rhyme for about half an hour, during which time he was loudly cheered. Mr. Hayles then gave a highly intellectual address, after which Mr. Browne was again called for, and gave another of his popular rhymes. Several signatures were obtained. The committee have decided upon meeting once a fortnight, at the Temperance Coffee-house, and a public meeting is to be held the following week at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, which will be generally addressed by working men.

E. A. SCHOLEY.

HAMPSHIRE.

ROMSEY.—The annual festival was held on the 3rd of December. The tea-meeting took place in the Town-hall; after which, there was a public meeting, presided over by Rev. J. Farrier, president of the society. The meeting was addressed by J. Toone, Esq., surgeon of Salisbury; Rev. R. Hartley, of Southampton; Mr. A. W. Heritage, and Mr.

W. Brewer. It is hoped that the society has received an impulse which will be felt during the coming year.

BRAMSHOTT.—A public meeting was held in the chapel of the Bible Christians, on November 20th, when Mr. D. G. Paine, of Deptford, and some friends from Alton, attended. Previous to the meeting, a party of about thirty assembled to tea, at a farm house. The public meeting was one of considerable interest.

CORNWALL.

TRURO.—Teetotalism is progressing with unabated vigour in Truro. The weekly meetings are attended by very numerous and respectable auditories.

ST. STEPHEN'S COOMBE.—A tea-meeting was held on the 15th of November. The room was ornamented with banners and a variety of tasteful decorations. Although the weather was unpropitious, yet a great number of persons assembled. After the tea, a spirited public meeting was held.

VERYAN.—Several of our farmers have their entire harvest and other work done without a drop of inebriating liquor. They have introduced an excellent system, that of giving the harvest labourers, at eleven o'clock, a luncheon of bread and beef, which answers remarkably well, both pleasing and helping the harvest people.

DEVON.

TORQUAY.—The Torquay society contains about 800 members, but having no suitable place in which our public meetings can be held, the society, after repeated consultations, have considered it necessary to erect a Temperance Hall, and preparations have already been made for that purpose, but as this intention cannot be effected without considerable expense, an appeal is made to the public at large, and it is hoped that a successful response will be made to this application.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

CAMBRIDGE.—Mrs. M. A. Stamp delivered two energetic and impressive lectures to large and respectable audiences, in the British School-room, on November 6th and 7th, 1845. Several persons signed the pledge.

The Cambridge Society, though small, has from its commencement consisted for the most part of devoted and persevering men, but for want of the aid of the more influential Christian part of the inhabitants its energies have been crippled to a great extent. The wealthy and pious residents have done and are still doing much for the Bible, Missionary, Tract, Pastoral Aid, Jewish, and other societies, in addition to very many local institutions, such as the Hospital, the Female Refuge, Alms Houses, the Victoria Asylum, &c. The number of schools, also, under the management of the clergy has been very much increased during the last twenty years. Since the year 1826, four large infant-schools have been established, and are now in active operation, two new national schools for boys, and two for girls, have also been built, and are managed with great care and attention. The Dissenters have not been idle, for, in addition to contributing to most of the Christian and philanthropic societies now established, they have recently built two large British schools, one for boys, the other for girls, and have also two infant-schools, besides several Sunday schools. These, and all other efforts that have been made to promote the benefit of the population, have, however, been greatly neutralized by the drinking-habits of the people. The society here, then, will do its best, until more efficient and able instruments come forward to give their assistance

OXFORD.—A public meeting, which was numerously attended, was held in the Town Hall (by permission of the Mayor), on Thursday, December 4, D. French, Esq., presided.

MIDDLESEX.

FELTHAM.—A Festival and meeting was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, on 20th of November. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Walter, a reclaimed drunkard, and others.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.—The last Annual Report states, "The Committee have very great pleasure in stating that in all their branches the cause appears to be in a very healthy and prosperous condition, and that the number of members has considerably increased; and in some instances more than doubled during the year. The committee rejoice that although the parent institution has not maintained itself in full vigour during the year, that its now numerous and important auxiliaries have most of them enjoyed a season of uninterrupted prosperity."

LEEDS AND THIRSK RAILWAY.—From Herepath's Railway Journal, 12th Eleventh Month, 1845—"The excavators employed on the line are, for the most part, strong powerful men, and their work is very laborious. We found that several of these men abstain from the use of strong liquors, and that the persons who pursue this temperate course go through their work as well, enjoy as good health, and have more the appearance of long life than those who spend a considerable part of their wages in beer and spirits."—Leeds Mercury.

HOWDEN.—On Monday December 1st, the Rev. R. Gray Mason gave an impressive lecture on total abstinence to a crowded and respectable meeting, held in the Public Rooms. The same gentleman has been actively engaged on every Sabbath, for some time past, preaching anniversary, missionary, and Sabbath-school sermons, in this town and neighbourhood, where he has been favoured with large audiences.

KENT.

SHEPHERNESS.—On Wednesday, November 5th, a lecture was delivered by Mr. Hudson, agent of the Kent Temperance Union, on the effects of alcoholic drinks on the human constitution. The attendance was not so good as was expected. The riotous behaviour of the lower order of boys, who perambulate the town on "Guy Fawke's" day, prevented many from being present. A number of our members were also working over-time in the docks.

December 8th, Mr. Thomas Hudson delivered a lecture in the Bethel School Room, Mile Town, on the triumphant spread of temperance principles throughout the world. Mr. Morgan, president of the society, in the chair.

On Tuesday, a meeting was held, at which 120 attended. Rev. C. Spedigue, Bible Christian minister, presided. After some introductory observations from the chairman, Mr. Hudson delivered an able lecture on the physical effects of alcoholic liquors.

SUSSEX.

HASTINGS.—A public lecture was given on Tuesday evening, 28th October, in the British School Room, by Mr. W. Gawthorp, agent of the National Temperance Society. The lecture clearly proving the awful responsibility resting upon the Christian church, evidently produced a good effect upon the assembly.

On Wednesday a grand tea festival was held, at which friends attended from Rye, Battle, Bexhill, &c. The number amounted to 230, who partook of the excellent refreshments provided. The meeting was held in the Lecture Room of the Baptist Chapel. The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. T. Wilmore, Independent minister of Rye. He was followed by Mr. W. Metcalfe, of Battle, Mr. F. Streeter of Hastings; Mr. F. Beck, Secretary to the Society; and by Mr. W. Gawthorp, who in a speech of an hour and a half, forcibly described the advantages which would arise from the general adoption of total abstinence.

The meeting was animated and highly profitable, and at the close, 10 persons signed the pledge.

We have to acknowledge the liberality of some friends, who, though not formally united with us, have given us practical evidence that they wish prosperity to the cause, by liberally contributing to its funds; among whom we may mention the names of Mr. S. Young, and that of J. Troup, Esq. We rejoice that a Surrey and Sussex Association has been formed, by which we shall be favoured at times, with the advocacy of an accredited agent.

Determined to prosecute their labours as far as practicable, our Committee, for some time past, have gratuitously forwarded a copy of the Recorder monthly to each of the ministers of Hastings and St. Leonards, and also to each of the coffee-shops in the town.

F. BECK, Sec.

[This example deserves the imitation of all temperance societies. It is one of the easiest and cheapest ways of spreading information. EDITORS.]

BEDFORDSHIRE.

WOBURN.—We have received more than 200 pledges in Woburn and its vicinity within the last three months.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—The Temperance Hall erected by J. D. Bassett, Esq. and Mrs. Grant, at a cost of £1200, was opened on the 17th ultimo, a number of the principal gentry being present, as well as numerous friends from London, including the Treasurer of the National Temperance Society. We hope to give a detailed account in our next.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE.

CIRENCESTER.—A friend at Cirencester has purchased a deserted brewery, and is about to erect a Temperance Hall upon the site of it. The ground is 90 feet long and 42 broad, and the floor will be principally composed of the casks used in the brewery. The cause ought to stand firm at Cirencester, since the floor will be heart of oak, and thoroughly saturated with strong beer!

LANCASHIRE.

ROCHDALE.—Extract from the Tenth Annual Report.—"A public meeting for the advocacy of abstinence principles, has been held weekly, in the Temperance Hall, and although the attendance has not been so numerous as could be desired, still a number were induced to join the society, and, at the same time, members were confirmed in their principles. A series of Sabbath evening addresses on—"The Moral and Religious aspect of the Temperance movement," have been delivered by Mr. William Logan, missionary, which have been productive of much good. The committee are happy to state that a Total Abstinence Society was established a few months ago, at Field-house Mills, by the work-people of Messrs. John Bright and Brothers. A number have joined the society, and they hold a public meeting every alternate Thursday evening. It also affords the committee much pleasure to state that a juvenile society has been recently formed in connexion with Providence Sunday School, and that almost the whole of the teachers, and a number of the scholars, have already adopted the principle. A society has likewise been established at Bamford, which is likely to be the means of accomplishing a great amount of good.

"Most of the friends are aware that the society has been burdened for several years with upwards of £40 of a debt. The committee felt this to be a great drag upon their labours, and a short time ago, an effort was made to clear it off, and they are happy to state that the object has been accomplished."

WALES.

LLANELLY, Caermarthen.—We have about 600 teetotalers, and hold our meetings weekly; we circulate tracts on the loan-system, and the temperance cause is in a flourishing state. Very many of the most inveterate drunkards have been reclaimed, and the rising generation, generally is under the teetotal banner. We have also a very prosperous Rechabite Tent. D. REES.

MERTHYR TYDVIL.—There are about 2,500 teetotalers here; there are three meetings held every week, two during the week, and one on Sunday, in the Market-Square. I commenced the open-air meeting about two years ago; it has proved to be more beneficial to both teetotalers and temperate persons, than any meetings we have had in either chapels or rooms. In the Market Square there are from 1000 to 2000 persons every Sunday afternoon. The cause is going on very well here; we lately had an excellent meeting at the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel; Rev. Evan Harris was in the chair. Several signatures were received. Within the last two years I have received about 700 signatures in the shop, voluntarily. About twelve weeks ago, myself and two others went to Newbridge to hold an open-air meeting, at which we received 141 signatures. WALTER WATKINS.

Chronicle and Recorder.

JANUARY 1ST, 1846.

THERE is something truly English in the greeting which meets us at the present season—"A merry Christmas and a happy new year;" but unfortunately such greeting is frequently accompanied by that most pernicious of all customs—the drinking of intoxicating liquors.

The Drinking-Usages of our country, though they do not owe their origin to the Feudal System of the middle ages, were cherished by it, and formed a portion of it. And there was nothing incongruous in the union. We are not surprised that the Baron who could hold his fellow-men in slavery, and whose great aim was to indulge his animal propensities, should also hold feasts in his ancestral halls, and with his guests, drink deeply of the "Wassail bowl," while the vaulted roof, rang with coarse and brutal jests. In this there was nothing anomalous; but we do confess ourselves surprised, that men should be found—and Christian men too!—who, in this free age, guard with jealous care a relic of former vassalage.

Feudalism has faded before civilization, and serfdom before liberty; but the drinking-customs, which should have perished with them, have survived; but only survived, we trust, to be branded with infamy by the wise and good.

Much has been, and still continues to be said, about the "glorious days of our forefathers, and the happy times of old;" but seeking to discover them, like the ignis fatuus, they retreat before us, until we fairly lose ourselves in the bogs and quagmires of barbarism.

Our opinion is, that no customs have any claim upon us, which are at variance with high moral principle, and the teachings of the gospel.

The present generation, indeed, are not likely to follow blind-folded the ways of yore. This is the age of mental, scientific, and moral revolutions. Our grandsires probably thought it comfortable to travel in a crazy, clumsy stage, at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles a day; but is that any reason why we should not be carried along with ten times the rapidity? And so, too, although they may have thought fit to debase themselves by drinking, are we not right in thinking it much wiser and much better to be sober?

THE RECENT political changes must not be allowed to hinder us from agitating the abolition of the SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.

We would warmly urge upon all the teetotalers of the kingdom, to put forth their instant and most strenuous exertions in obtaining signatures to the petitions on that question.

A short time only will now elapse, (Jan. 22nd) before Parliament will meet for the dispatch of business; so that what is intended to be done, must be done quickly. To be effective, the petitions should be ready soon after the opening of the session, and then poured in en masse.

If there is any dilatoriness about the matter; if half a dozen petitions are presented one night, and half a dozen another night, no interest will be created, either within or without the walls of St. Stephen's. It would, indeed, be unreasonable to expect our senators to display much zeal, while the people themselves are indifferent and apathetic.

We hope in our next Number to fix upon a week when it will be desirable that, at least, all the Metropolitan Petitions be sent in; and we intend, at the same time, to give the addresses of those bishops, noblemen, and gentlemen, who have consented to present these petitions to Parliament.

Let us for the present, labour with redoubled energy, and show to our legislators that we are really in earnest, in seeking to abolish the facilities for the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath; and if any stimulus to exertion is required, we may, perhaps, supply it, by quoting the memorable words of LORD JOHN RUSSELL, delivered last year in Exeter Hall.

"I am convinced that there is no cause more likely to elevate the people of this country in every respect; whether as regards religion, whether as regards political importance, whether as regards literary and moral cultivation, than this GREAT QUESTION OF TEMPERANCE."

Letters of invitation to the WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION, have been sent to all quarters of the world; and circulars to Societies, Associations, and distinguished friends of the cause in this country, will shortly be issued.

The main objects contemplated by the CONVENTION, are

1. To ascertain the state of the Temperance question in all parts of the globe.
2. To receive suggestions as to the most effectual method of extending the Temperance Reformation. And
3. To attempt the formation of a Temperance Union throughout the world.

It will be remembered that an "ADDRESS TO THE DIRECTORS OF BRITISH RAILWAYS," appeared in the December Chronicle. A number of slips containing that article were struck off and sent to Editors of the various Railway Newspapers, accompanied by a request that they would insert it in their columns.

Two, viz., the Railway Herald, and the Railway Record, have, to our knowledge, courteously acceded to this request, and given the "Address" a conspicuous position in their pages.

We rejoice, therefore, in knowing that the subject of employing Temperance Missionaries on Railroads has been brought before many of the Directors and other officers connected with the railways of the kingdom.

It is intended to follow up this Address by a direct communication with the various Boards:

GRATUITOUS CIRCULATION.

We have said so little of late about the Gratuitous Circulation of our paper, that we are inclined to believe the subject has entirely escaped the memory of our readers.

Our silence has not arisen from the fact, that the same necessity for subscriptions does not now exist; on the contrary, the Gratuitous Circulation Fund requires not only as much, but much more support than at any former period.

During the greater portion of 1845, the Chronicle was regularly sent to about 500 Ministers of the gospel in the metropolis—to the Benchers of the Temple—and to numerous individuals in all parts of the country.

Copies of this month's Chronicle and Recorder, will be forwarded to distinguished friends of temperance and other influential persons—to Christian missionaries throughout the world, and to nearly every civilized country of the globe.

Dr. Campbell, the Editor of the Christian Witness, has attributed his conversion to teetotalism, to being flooded by periodicals, and he earnestly recommends a similar course to be pursued towards others.

This the Committee are willing to do, if they are provided with the means; but the expense is necessarily great, and with the important projects at present in operation, funds cannot be spared for that purpose.

The increased size of the paper will increase this expense one-half.

The opening of the new year appears a favourable opportunity for making a special appeal, and we, therefore, most urgently request all our friends to afford pecuniary assistance.

We have said that the expense is great; though great to the Society, it will be but small if borne by a number. We postpone further remarks till next month, when we hope to present a long list of subscriptions to the Gratuitous Circulation Fund of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER.

TEMPERANCE ADVERTISING.

IS THE PLAN IMPORTANT?

Before the system of advertising was commenced, there were three modes of disseminating the principles of temperance—by Public Meetings and Lectures, by Tract Distribution, and by Domiciliary visitation. Each of these were useful and indispensable, but all of them were circumscribed in their influence. The attendance at public meetings, however numerous, was but limited; and tract distribution and domiciliary visitation could only be fully brought to bear upon the poorer ranks of society. Some other agency was required, which should reach the more educated classes; and we have no hesitation in saying, that the Advertising Plan is just the Agency which was needed.

Tens and hundreds of thousands of respectable individuals exist in this country to whom temperance missionaries can have no access—who will not attend public meetings—and who can scarcely be induced to read publications, whose direct and professed aim is to inculcate total abstinence.

A serious question then arises—Are such individuals to be totally neglected? Are they to be allowed to remain in utter ignorance of the arguments in favour of temperance? The Advertising Plan answers these questions in the negative, and supplies the only efficient means of removing this ignorance and introducing knowledge. The plan is simply this: to insert well-written articles on abstinence from intoxicating drink, as advertisements, in the chief religious, literary, and other periodicals—these advertisements, if possible, to be placed in a conspicuous position, so as easily to attract the attention of the reader.

Vast numbers of persons would thus have the question brought under their immediate notice, and curiosity would often prove a powerful incentive to the perusal of the facts and arguments adduced.

The Advertising Plan is comprehensive. It will include the religious, the literary, and the political world. All Christian sects have their denominational organs—every person with any pretence to a literary taste, reads some magazine or journal—and politicians of every party have newspapers which are their recognized advocates.

The plan of advertising is applicable to all these species of publications, and will be applied by the National Society, if funds are contributed for that purpose.

The cheapness of advertising is another remarkable feature: contrast it with Tract Distribution. At an average of 9d. per 100, 35,000 tracts would cost £13. 2s. 6d., to which must be added the trouble of distribution, and the certainty that a great number would be lost.

Now, the Christian Witness, a monthly religious magazine, possesses a circulation of 35,000, principally among the middle classes, and is probably seen by 100,000 individuals. For the sum of £5. 10s. we can get an article inserted in the Christian Witness, on the page opposite to the introductory essay, rendering it nearly impossible for any one who reads the magazine not to see the temperance advertisement.

There is also an indirect benefit resulting from the Advertising Plan to which we have not alluded, viz., the great probability of Editors of these publications being thereby rendered better acquainted with the real nature of teetotalism, which better acquaintance may lead them to insert original articles on the subject, in the body of their periodicals.

We have felt it binding upon us to say thus much upon this very important undertaking. We trust that our friends will duly appreciate its value, and contribute towards its more extensive practical development.

Subscriptions to any amount will be gratefully received at the Office of the Society, 39, Moorgate-street.

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

J. R. WILSON'S REPORT.

December 15th, 1845.

On the 2nd of December, I met the committee of the Durham Total Abstinence Society, after a special meeting of the Independents held in the school-room attached to their chapel, in which I was permitted to deliver an address to parents on the religious instruction of their children. Their worthy pastor presided at the committee. Although not joined to the society at present, he is an abstainer, and some of his people are active supporters of the temperance cause.

After hearing my statements, they came to a unanimous resolution to bring the subject before their approaching anniversary, at which I was invited to attend; and there is every prospect of the society being reorganized and rendered more extensively useful, not only in the city, but in the populous colliery districts with which it is surrounded. The society had become almost extinct, but the proposed measures appear to have put fresh life into the members, and the friends are determined to rally all their forces in the projected movement. The society has had much to contend with, the majority of the clergy and gentry being opposed to its operation. In the year 1841, the returns for the city and suburbs, containing about 15,000 inhabitants, were as follow:—Number of members, 331; reformed drunkards, 36. The landlord of the Temperance Hotel, at which I stayed all night, was so impressed with what he heard at the meeting, and with the faithful appeals made to him afterwards, that he resigned the pledge, which he had broken; and, in addition, he offered his rooms for any meetings of the society free of any charge.

On the 12th instant, I attended, by invitation, a special meeting of the joint-committee of the Newcastle Temperance Society, when arrangements were made for the approaching festival to be held the first week in the new year, an evening of which is to be specially devoted to the re-organization of their society on the principles recommended by the National Temperance Society, when I shall have an opportunity of laying the subject fully before the members of the society. An article on this subject has been inserted in their monthly periodical, called the Northern Temperance Witness, recommending of the proposed measures, and I am sanguine in the hope that they will be adopted and efficiently carried out. The worthy temperance missionary has been working upon the same system to a limited extent, with the happiest results; and he is prepared to render all the aid in his power in the organization of branches, both in the town and neighbouring colliery villages.

I have written to the friends at North Shields, Sunderland, and Hexham, at which I expect to hold preparatory meetings previously to their anniversaries, where I hope the same reception will be given me as I have experienced at the places above mentioned.

It is very remarkable that all parties appear to be waiting for such a movement. All readily acknowledge the necessity and desirableness of so extensive and efficient an organization, and are disposed to give it a fair trial as far as their influence extends. The lectures of Dr. Grindrod in these northern towns have prepared the way for the organization of societies; and unless they are followed up by a systematic visitation of the families, the good effected will be greatly diminished. I am happy to say, likewise, that the National Temperance Chronicle and Recorder, in its enlarged and improved form, is likely to supersede the local periodicals hitherto circulated in this district. Let us hope that the year 1846 will be memorable in the annals of the Temperance Reformation, for the rousing of the whole body of teetotalers in the two kingdoms, to a united and energetic and a simultaneous attack on the strongholds of intemperance, and let the words of Josphua be the watchword of Israel, "Let us go up at once and possess it, for we are WELL ABLE to overcome it."

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

[As we are compelled more and more to abridge the Reports of the Society's Missionaries, we beg to remind our readers, that the cases recorded in our pages, are only a few specimens of the numerous instances of distress and reformation every day met with by those useful labourers. We entreat our readers not to be weary of the repetition of similar cases, but to read, mark, and inwardly digest, and to endeavour, as much as in them lies, to assist this great and philanthropic effort.—EDITORS.]

DISTRICT No. I.—A teetotaler of five years standing having thought he would try moderation, the following are the results of his experiment. "I have suffered more of the evils of drinks the last few days than ever I did in my life. I am more than ever set against it. I went out, was persuaded to take a little; I soon drank to excess. I cannot drink in moderation." He again signed.

DISTRICT No. III.—A good-looking Irishman said he had been a teetotaler several years. He used to take at his trade (shoe-making) seven pints of beer per day; he feels himself much better since he has taken none, and does his work with more ease and comfort.

DISTRICT No. IV.—A man who had sold or pawned his coat for drink, was standing in his shirt-sleeves under the archway, near a gin-shop. The clothes he had on were all in rags. On being spoken to, he confessed, that if it had not been for drink he should not have taken his coat from his back that morning. He was advised to sign the pledge, when a man looking out of the gin-shop, said, "He will make a good teetotaler, but all the public-houses and gin-shops must be shut up first." The man with his coat off replied and said, "Well, I have a good mind to try, I think I can keep it." He then signed in the presence of a number of persons who had been attracted to the spot.

"I should be very glad," said a wife to the missionary, "were my husband a teetotaler, it would be many a shilling in my pocket." "We, and our four children, have lately visited the union house, where we should not have gone had it not been for intoxicating drink." She signed the pledge.

A man intoxicated was leaning against some iron railings. Finding him unable to take care of himself, the missionary offered to conduct him home. To this he readily assented. He was with difficulty kept from falling, and he repeatedly said, "Well, I am in a pretty mess, I really am nearly drunk, what a fool I am." He occasionally listened very attentively to the observations of the missionary, who after conducting him about three miles, brought him to his own door. The wife, with an infant in her arms, and another by her side, (all most wretchedly clothed,) looked vexed, but not surprised at the situation of her husband. The missionary placed him in his chair, and seated himself by him. After some conversation, both husband and wife signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. V.—A drunkard and his companion went to a butcher's shop to buy some meat, and after higgling about the price and trying to get it a halfpenny per pound cheaper, they went away without making a purchase. Failing to make a bargain with the butcher, the thrifty souls proceeded to the gin-shop, and having purchased two cheap decanters by the way, got one filled with gin and the other with rum. After this economical investment, they adjourned to a public-house, where they ordered a gallon of ale, and sat carousing till morning. They are both now teetotalers.

DISTRICT No. VI.—A mother, whose conduct shows that she values the proverb, example is better than precept, signed the pledge, because she had observed that her son, though a serious young man, had begun to acquire a taste for beer, which at one time he would not touch.

A young sailor stated that his father, who is a publican, had a vessel of his own in which he traded between Whitby and the neighbouring ports, and that he and his Captain had squandered between them the produce of three voyages, amounting to two hundred and fifty pounds. The young sailor signed the pledge, and an old captain coming in at the time, followed his example.

DISTRICT No. VII.—On going into a room, a mother said, "I have a son lying, on that bed in a dying state, he is a cab-man, and is only twenty-eight years of age. The poor man raising himself a little, said, "Oh! I remember you Mr. G—, I wish I had taken your advice when you asked me and my companion to sign the pledge, but we cabmen are so accustomed to vice, and especially to that of drinking, that it is a wonder indeed, if any of us change for the better; but, should God spare my life, I will be a teetotaler, but, I have not much hope; drink has ruined me, and here I am a dying man, may God have mercy upon me." The missionary directed him to the Saviour of sinners, and put the mother in a way of obtaining some assistance, promising to repeat his visit.

DISTRICT No. VIII.—A person who signed the pledge about a month since, is now reaping the benefits; his wife said that he never used to work more than three days a-week, but since he signed the pledge he has worked six. He had spent hundreds in drink. There is a great alteration every way for the better; he now attends the temperance meetings.

DISTRICT No. IX.—Having met a man in the street reeling drunk, without either coat or hat, the missionary accompanied him home. On their arrival, the man being somewhat sobered, begged the missionary not to go up stairs. One of the children coming down, cried out, here comes father with nothing on again, mother! The wife then came down and asked the missionary to help the poor creature up stairs, which he did, and inquired if this was the first time he had pawned his coat. No, replied the wife, not by a hundred times, and I have not a gown to wear but what is all torn to tatters. The husband acknowledged he had been a drunkard for thirty years, but was determined not to sign; however he gradually gave way, confessing that teetotalism was the only thing at all likely to be of service to him; and before the missionary left him, both he and his wife signed the pledge.

A man who had been a drunkard for eight years, and had in consequence lost several good situations, being invited to sign, replied he had been trying the practice for the last three months, and felt much better; he signed the pledge. The missionary had but just left the house when the wife who was a drunkard, came home drunk; she was so abusive that her husband shut her out of the room, she then raved like a maniac; the missionary returned and accompanied her to her mother's where he left her, and upon calling the next morning she signed the pledge.

DISTRICT, No. X.—In visiting the house of a man who had previously signed, the missionary met with a mother and her son; the latter, a drunkard who ill-treated his mother from day to day. He was prevailed on to sign the pledge.

A young man, a drunkard, who was standing by, also signed. A young woman, a drunkard, then came in, and finding what they had done, signed also. Outside the door, the reformed man whom the missionary had been seeking, was conversing with a notorious drunkard, upon the subject of teetotalism. The man said he had been a drunkard nearly forty years, and had spent thousands of pounds in drink, and was now out of employment. His wife, not being able to endure his conduct any longer, had left him with two children. His home was that of a complete drunkard; he signed the pledge.

At the workhouse door, there were numbers waiting for relief. One said he had several times been an inmate of a lunatic asylum, and that drink was the sole cause of his being obliged to apply for relief. Another said I am sure no one can tell me more about drink than I know myself: I may say also that it is through drink that I am here. A third, who had just come out of the hospital, made a similar statement. Two of them signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XI.—The missionary was going up stairs to an attic, to see a sweep who was sixty years of age, when his wife passed him, uttering violent expressions against teetotalers and teetotalism. The missionary proceeding found the husband at home, who said, "he swept the chimneys of several public-houses, which exposed him to great temptation—a glass of rum being generally placed upon the table for him to drink when he had finished." He signed the pledge. He hoped the missionary would excuse the bluntness of his wife, as she was a drunkard.

At the door of a temperance meeting, met a policeman, who had taken no intoxicating liquor since spoken to by the missionary four months since. He now signed, the missionary handed his name to the secretary of the meeting then being held.

DISTRICT No. XII.—A person who had been for a time a teetotaler, but was now quite drunk, being led by another drunkard, was spoken to by the missionary. He said, I have gained my piece of ground by sobriety, alluding to a purchase he had made while a teetotaler. Being told, if he were not careful, he would soon lose it by drunkenness, he signed the pledge. His wife, who had originally signed with him, still remained firm.

DISTRICT No. XIII.—A tradesman's wife, whom the missionary had reconciled to her husband, as reported in the Chronicle for October, has died of delirium tremens. She had insured her life in the Temperance Provident Institution, but in consequence of having returned to drinking, she had forfeited her membership, having previously pawned almost everything she had for drink.

How many teetotalers have you on board? asked the missionary on entering a collier vessel.—Here are seven out of thirteen, answered one of the men, and, we can do our work better now than when we used intoxicating drinks.

"There he is, sir," said an Irish labourer to the missionary.—"He is one of you, he is a teetotaler." On looking down the hold of a potato-vessel, the missionary observed a fine healthy-looking man, hard at work, who had been a teetotaler for two years. Another (a reclaimed drunkard) working with him, had been one, seven years.

Charles Curling, Esq. stated to the missionary that the men who had become teetotalers were much improved, and he instanced two cases, (pointing to the men from his window) who had been reclaimed from habits of intoxication, through the labours of the missionary in conjunction with the meeting that was held at the wharf. Those who signed at the meeting still continue firm, and more are waiting until the next meeting to sign.

There are twelve teetotalers at Fenning's Wharf, and the foreman states that they all do their work better now than when they drank beer. "You had better join us," said the missionary to a warehouseman, who was listening to the conversation. "What premium do you give?" said he, "Why here is a sufficient premium," observed the foreman, shewing him at the same time a purse of money. "This is my own," added he, "and I have besides both health and happiness." The other admitted the force of the argument, but declined at present.

DISTRICT No. XIV.—On visiting a police-station, the missionary met with a policeman who had been a teetotaler five years. Another has promised to try it and sign at a future period. The missionary gave some tracts to the inspector, who promised to distribute them to the men.

DISTRICT No. XV.—"He shall have no money of me to get drunk with," said a wife to her drunken husband, whom the missionary had accompanied home; and in continuation she remarked "I suppose he has lost his place through his drunkenness, and if he has, he shall go to the workhouse, he shall not live with me." The missionary assisted in getting the poor man to bed, endeavoured to reconcile the wife, and promised to call again. At a subsequent visit they appeared somewhat reconciled, and the husband signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XVII.—A MAGISTRATE'S TESTIMONY. A young man was taken up for disturbing a meeting at Peckham, when, on the defendant's attorney endeavouring to throw contempt on "such like societies;" the magistrate (the Hon. C. Norton) said, "I have never attended any of the total abstinence meetings, but I have watched the progress of the Society, and have marked its movements, and am prepared to assert, that it has done a vast amount of good; it has done more to check the vice and wickedness arising from cheap spirit-drinking than any other society in operation, and so long as the meetings are conducted like that at Peckham, they are entitled to, and shall receive the full protection of the law."

DISTRICT No. XVIII.—On calling at a lodging-house, in the down-stairs room, lay on a shutter, the corpse of a young woman not twenty-two years of age. She had been married five years, and died a victim to drunkenness.

DISTRICT No. XIX.—Addressed the children at Sutherland and Marlborough Chapel, and Amicable-row Sunday School, and gave away tracts.

DISTRICT No. XX.—On addressing a number of bricklayers and labourers, a young man came up and said, he should like to try,—he knew if he could only get over the first "bout," he should do very well. He signed. Another said, unless I sign and keep it, a lunatic asylum will soon be my portion: I have run through hundreds of pounds within the last six years; he signed.

DISTRICT No. XXI.—Distributed some tracts among some coal-heavers, and gave them an exhortation, in consequence of which they have attended the temperance meeting in the neighbourhood. The result is, that six out of eight are now teetotalers. The missionary accompanied his informant to the wharf, where he was introduced by the master to his teetotal men, and was immediately recognized as the individual who stopped them in the street; and though they then ridiculed the teetotaler, they now were glad to see him. They all acknowledged themselves to be the better for teetotalism. Instead of going to the public-house every evening to share their money, they now share it on the wharf. Two gentlemen present received the tracts, and promised to give the subject their consideration.

DISTRICT No. XXII.—One of a group, to whom a tract was given, exclaimed, "I bless God I am a teetotaler." Five months ago I was a drunkard and an atheist. I am thankful I ever took a tract from a missionary; it has led me to sign the pledge; since which I have thought on the evil of my ways, and pray the Lord to bring me to repentance.

DISTRICT No. XXIII.—Presenting a tract to a family in C— Court, the missionary was asked who sent him to them; he replied, no one. The husband rejoined, "You must have been sent, for you could not have brought us anything so suitable as total abstinence, for I have been out drinking the last three weeks, and was just now going to the public-house." Being urged to sign the pledge, he said I will; but I must go and have another glass first. The missionary remonstrated on the folly of such a step; when he presently signed the pledge. The wife, who was greatly cheered by the decision of her husband, immediately signed, remarking, "It was very kind of you to come and ask us to sign; no one came to us where we lived before. I hope we shall now see better days." Their four children were then called, and the two eldest signed.

DISTRICT No. XXIV.—A labourer's wife, who cares nothing about drink till she tastes it, then knows no bounds, but pawns every thing in the house. Last week she began on Monday morning, and was not sober all the week, which plunged herself and family in great distress; she signed the pledge. The oldest boy, who is twelve years old, followed, and said, "he was glad his mother had signed, for now he and his little brothers and sisters would be cared for, and his father would not beat his mother."

[We have been compelled to leave out more than half the cases reported; some of which we purpose making use of in separate articles.—EDITORS.]

SURREY AND SUSSEX.

W. GAWTHORPE, AGENT.

We are making considerable progress in this newly-formed Union of Temperance Reformers. It was my intention to have given some particulars in the January number of the Chronicle and Recorder; but as your columns are likely to be crowded with interesting matter from other districts; and as we have been favoured with the insertion of several articles in your previous numbers, and with the expectation of having a rather long article in your next, it would be trespassing too much to write an article under such circumstances. I send you the following list of additional donations towards paying the expenses of forming a self-supporting agency for Surrey and Sussex. I need not add that we shall be glad to have many more such:—

AGENTS' REPORTS.

EVAN DAVIES.—FLINTSHIRE.

I have lately been delivering many lectures on temperance, in large chapels, which were well attended. I am very much encouraged by the Calvinistical Methodists—a denomination of great influence in Wales, deserving much praise for their zeal and perseverance with this great movement.

I delivered a lecture at Rhosmore, near Mold, November 13th; at Newmarket, on the 19th; at Bagilt, December 6th and 7th; and at Rhyl, on the 9th.

Several have signed the pledge in each meeting; but the chief point in view is, to enlighten the public mind, and remove prejudice.

Great satisfaction is evinced by the large drawings, and the description of the injurious physical effects of all alcoholic drinks on the human constitution.

WILLIAM BISCOMBE.—BEDS, BUCKS, AND HERTS UNION.

November 3rd.—A good meeting at St. Albans, in a large cotton-mill; about half a dozen signed.

Luton, 4th.—A numerous and respectable meeting. A few names added to the society. This town is one of the most thriving and improving that I am acquainted with.

6th.—In the Temperance Hall, Apsley Guise, the property of Mr. Arnold, we had a crowded house, great attention, the signature of an unhappy drunkard with several others. This society has done much towards the improvement of the village.

Woburn 7th.—Meeting in the Town Hall, kindly lent for that purpose by his Grace the Duke of Bedford. Here the cause is making great progress amongst the juvenile population. The friends are encouraged by having an aged Independent minister amongst them, who takes a lively interest in their meetings; about six signatures.

10th.—In the public rooms, Bedford, we had a crowded place, and with some slight exceptions great attention. This society had been in abeyance for nearly a year, but is now about resuming its activity. There was a little annoyance from some young men, whose station in life ought to have taught them better manners; six or seven signatures were, however, obtained.

Newport Pagnell, 11th.—An excellent meeting in the public room recently built; very good attention, and about half a dozen signatures; amongst them some very promising young men.

Buckingham, 12th.—In the Baptist Chapel, Mr. Harris in the chair; small meeting, one backsliding teetotaler re-signed the pledge. There is much need of temperance and education in this town and neighbourhood. There are several old and good members in the place.

Stoney Stratford, 13th.—In the British School, a crowded place and several signatures. This small society numbers amongst its members both the Baptist and Independent ministers, one deacon and several of their young people.

North Wall, 14th.—Small village near Leighton Buzzard, short notice and small meeting.

Aylesbury, 17th.—Meeting in the British School Room, good attendance and some signatures.

Thame, 18th.—Meeting in the British School. Mr. Verney in the chair, who opened the meeting with an excellent speech. The friends have some good and intelligent young men amongst them.

Long Wick, 19th.—Meeting in the Baptist Chapel in connexion with the Princes Risborough Society which needs revival.

KEIGHLY SKIPTON, SETTLE, AND COLNE UNION.—Commenced my labours here on Monday the 1st December, we have had some good meetings during the week, but on the last night, a crowded meeting was held in the village of Conaly, near Skipton. The people deeply attentive, and at the close, we obtained the astonishing number of fifty-five signatures, average in their ages from fifteen to forty, and consisting of some of the most sensible and steady, and some of the most dissipated in the village. Much praise for this success is due to the persevering spirit and unwearied diligence of the Keighly reformed men. They have laboured diligently to sow the seed in the open air, and they are cheered with this rich harvest, and I am most happy to be madepartner in their joy.

B. GLOVER.—CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

At the close of December, I shall have completed one year's labours in this association. We have at present three agents employed, and next month, a fourth will enter upon his labours. Our association extends from Macclesfield, in Cheshire, to Banbury, in Oxfordshire. We visit towns and villages in Cheshire, Shropshire, Warwickshire, Worcestershire, Gloucestershire, and Oxfordshire. The Potteries and Shropshire associations have lately joined us, and it is expected that arrangements will be made with the "Midland Counties Association." In March last, our Temperance Gazette made its first appearance (a monthly publication); its circulation has been steadily increasing, and next month its size will be increased from 8 to 16 pages. Thus, our principles are brought before agricultural labourers, who too often spend a portion of their small earnings in drink. Men earning £2 per week and upwards, live in most wretched dwellings, almost destitute of furniture, and their wives and children often in want. Notwithstanding our difficulties are many, it is pleasing to know we have not laboured in vain; many who were wretched are now happy—were fallen down, but have been lifted up—were poor, but now have plenty—were vicious, but have become virtuous. In Redditch, with a population of 4,000, we have 50 reformed drunkards, many of them members of religious churches. In Leek, with a population of 6,000, we have 80 reformed drunkards, 20 of them are females; so that we have cause for thankful-encouragement.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—ISAAC PHELPS.

My labours in Newcastle-on-Tyne have been chiefly in conjunction with Mr. Buchanan. During the summer, we held out-door meetings, Sundays and week days. Thousands heard us, and many hundreds have taken the pledge; and we have thus been enabled to speak to a class of persons who never entered God's house, but many have now found their way there.

Carville, a large out-door meeting, the people seemed much interested, even the publican forgot his customers, left the tap, and assisted the advocate. About three months ago, I held a most delightful meeting at Matten, where I met a number of Wesleyans; twelve took the pledge, one of whom was a publican's son, a fine man, who still retains it, and has ever since attended a place of worship. While speaking at Shotley-bridge, a gentleman, a stranger, gave ten shillings towards the expenses of the meeting.

I gave an address to the children at the High-school, Black-hill, when sixty-eight took the pledge.

I visited, by choice, two days in Sandgate, both sides of the street, up stairs and down, gave away tracts and conversed with the people; the feelings I experienced at the spectacles I witnessed, I shall never forget. After speaking one Sunday at the Quay side, a man from Dunbar came to us with tears in his eyes, and requested leave to take the pledge; "I have been drinking," he said, "and spent forty pounds, and have only ten left."

Berwick-on-Tweed, two small meetings, 16 pledges. Across the water at Spital, I addressed more than 160 children in the New School, they seemed much delighted. Spoke to them on teetotalism, as a safe-guard to their education; afterwards the children took the pledge in large numbers.

December 2nd.—Held a large meeting at Wooler, in the Temperance Hall, 17 took the pledge.

Cambo, December 4th.—Good meeting in this small place, there is an active and vigorous society.

CURE OF INTEMPERANCE.—To cure intemperance, Mirabeau gives the following recipe: "Take one gill of as good water as ever leaked from the sky, add one spoonful of loaf sugar, one sprinkling of nutmeg, one bit of mint, one gill of the best French brandy. Then clap in a red hot poker, and then—throw it anywhere but down your throat. This remedy never fails." Great was the pity that Mirabeau did not use the remedy himself.

COLD WATER CURE.

The cold water cure is known to be an ancient practice with the North American Indians, and some other wild tribes. It appears to be also the custom of the people of Kordofan, the most southern district under the government of the Pacha of Egypt. A recent traveller mentions, that being laid up in a hut, ill of a burning fever, which appeared to be fast hurrying him off, he was lifted out of bed, and with his shirt off, held up, while a whole bucket-full of cold spring water was thrown over him. "I was immediately dried, returned to bed, and covered with empty sacks and sheep-skins. I felt somewhat relieved, and fell asleep—a refreshment I had not enjoyed for a long time. On waking, the women told me that I had perspired but very slightly, and that the douche must be repeated, to put me into a thorough sweat. I allowed this hazardous proceeding to be repeated, because I had no other choice. . . . After this bath, I perspired so freely, that on waking, I believed myself to be in a second bath. This proceeding, however, broke through the chain of morbid symptoms, and I felt so much relieved, that I was able to rise from my bed, and walk about for a short time in the shade of the palm-trees. . . . My convalescence proceeded now very rapidly, and I was, in a short time, able to resume my journey; but I shall never forget the debt of gratitude I owe to these good people, who, from pure and disinterested charity and feeling for the sufferings of a fellow-creature, took so much care of me, whilst in this lamentable condition."—Travels in Kordofan by Ignatius Pallmè; 1844.

VALUABLE TESTIMONY OF THE REV. C. CAMPBELL.

Of the London Missionary Society, for the District of Mysore. (From the South Indian Temperance Journal.)

A considerable time has elapsed since I began to act upon the principle, so long, that my own experience has added to the strength of the conviction produced in my mind by the most irrefragable arguments, that the intoxicating liquors in common use, such as wine and beer, are by no means necessary to any one in the enjoyment of health, whatever be the nature of his constitution, but that they are generally injurious in exact proportion to the extent to which they are used. If there had been a teetotal Society in Mysore or its vicinity, I should have long ere this become a member of it; and various circumstances have up to this time prevented me from originating one. But I feel thankful that now at length one has been established, and that there is every reason to hope that it will prove an auxiliary to the mission cause in this place.

I cannot resist the conviction that I ought to give whatever weight my influence and example may have to the cause of total abstinence. I would do so in spite of all the shallow wit and railery that have been or may yet be employed against it. We have nothing to fear from such weapons. They prove nothing; they refute nothing. I have the pleasure of sending a Tamil and English translation of the pledge, which has as yet been prepared for signature in Canarese only. I have not yet brought it publicly before that part of the community that are unacquainted with Canarese, but hope to do so ere long.

TEETOTALISM IN 1819.

The following extract is from Mr. Rush's Residence at the Court of London. It is the more striking from the memorandum having been made in 1819. Mr. Rush was visiting at Holkham, and says:—"Something else that he (Mr. Coke) said, may deserve a memorandum. It was, that although banking along the sea-side was considered the hardest work done in Norfolk county by labouring men, those who followed it drank nothing but water; they had plenty of animal food, but found their strength fail them, if they drank either beer or spirits."

POETRY.

[For the following original lines, by Mrs. SIGOURNEY, the celebrated American poetess, we are indebted to the kindness of J. D. Ross, Esq., late of Boston, Massachusetts.]

A TEMPERANCE ODE.

From the parents' fond protection,
From his pleasant native glen,
Youth, with reckless spirit hasteth
To the crowded haunts of men.
Hidden snares and tempters meet him,
Follies lead his soul astray,
Kneel and raise him—kneel and raise him,
He hath fallen by the way.

Full of pride and self-reliance,
With a chieftain's laughty eye,
Dauntless to the world's encounter,
Vigorous manhood rusheth by.
Foes in ambush gather round him—
Lo! he shrinketh from the fray;
Kneel and raise him—kneel and raise him,
He hath fallen by the way.

Heavenly Father! thou who knowest
All the weakness of the breast—
All the miseries of the lowest—
All the frailties of the best,
Teach us, for our erring brethren,
With a humbled heart to pray;
Deign to aid them—deign to save them,
They have fallen by the way.

A TEETOTAL RAILWAY INSPECTOR.

"I am now engaged for the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company as an Inspector in the engineering department. My master, the acting engineer, is a very zealous teetotaler, and as there are only him and myself to inspect and give orders to about ninety men, in a distance of thirty-five miles, you may depend upon it, teetotalism is of great service to both, and is never omitted when opportunity serves, of being strongly recommended to those we have under our superintendence."—T. A FACT.

Dr. Gourley of Madely, who is the medical attendant for the Rechabite tents, in the neighbourhood of Danley Green, returned the Iron-bridge members back their yearly subscriptions, because they had given him no trouble.

£2,000 FUND.

Contributions to the amount of £755 for the £2,000 Fund, for 1845-6, have been already announced.

The Committee, desire to draw attention to the fact, that £1250 remain to be made up.

Donations, therefore, of any sums, from £5 and upwards, will be gratefully received, and are most earnestly solicited, that the great benefits which have already attended the Temperance Mission, may be sustained and increased, and the numerous important efforts at present in hand, may be effectually carried out.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications intended for insertion in the February Number of the "Chronicle and Recorder," should be forwarded by the 15th of the present month.

All Advertisements must be accompanied by a Post-office Order for the amount.

It is especially requested that Agents' Reports, Accounts of Festivals, &c., be made as concise as possible; The journals of Messrs. Gamble, Heritage, and Peace are unavoidably postponed for want of room; as is also a highly interesting paper by Mr. Hudson on the navy.

The case of Lieutenant Dunbar will receive an early notice. A short article on "Malting and the Excise," will appear in our next. Mr. Crake's interesting communication will be inserted at the first opportunity.

J. Sibley.—Recipes for making good bread, without resorting to the publican for yeast have appeared many times in the Temperance Journal and nearly all the teetotal publications.

Received.—Total Abstinence from Intoxicating Liquors required by Christian Love. By N. A. Poppley; Bombay Advocate for November; Canada for December, and Indian Journal for September and October.

* * Societies and the Trade will be supplied from the Office, with the Chronicle and Recorder, at 8s. 4d. per 100, or £4. per 1000.

TO TEMPERANCE EDITORS.

We have before hinted that, while we wish all possible publicity to be given to the information contained in the Chronicle, it would be more candid in our brother Editors, if, in copying from our pages, they would acknowledge the same. Not only are whole columns of news extracted, but many pieces of concise information, condensed, with some pains, from valuable works and original resources, are copied from paper to paper, both in England and in America, without one word of acknowledgment. One of the leading American papers has no less than two pages reprinted from the Chronicle! We like to see an honourable rivalry; but we would remind our brethren of the press, that they ought both in fairness and for the good of the cause, to trust to original information, or, at least, to acknowledge the sources from which they borrow.

AN EXPOSURE OF ODD FELLOWSHIP,

Shewing that the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Manchester Unity, is unscriptural in its constitution; unjust in its finance; extravagant in its management; bankrupt in its circumstances; deceitful in its pretensions; dangerous in its tendency; and immoral in its practice. HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT,

STANSTEAD BURY HOUSE,

NEAR WARE, HERTFORDSHIRE

BY DR. JOHNSON,

Author of "Life, Health, and Disease," "Theory and Principles of Hydropathy," &c., &c.

For the cure of indigestion, rheumatism, bilious habits, excessive liability to take cold, nervous debility, spasms, languid circulation, psoriasis, constipation, determination of blood to the head, chronic ulcers of the leg, and all diseases depending on general debility, or suppressed or depraved secretions, torpid liver, stomach diseases, and chronic inflammation of the mucous membranes. This treatment is also exceedingly useful when the main object is to strengthen and harden the delicate constitutions of young persons of a scrofulous or consumptive tendency. In many of those painful and irregular diseases which cannot be ranked in any particular class, and which have defied all ordinary remedies, this treatment has often been found successful.

The projectors of this Society, availing themselves of the experience furnished by the history of Building Societies, have matured a plan which not only embraces all the advantages of those societies, and avoids the inconveniences incident to some of them, but secures peculiar benefits to the shareholders, and opens its doors to parties hitherto altogether overlooked.

The unexampled rapidity with which the shares have been taken up in two societies, patronised by the respected Pastor of Surrey Chapel, and under the same management, furnishes ample presumptive proof, that the principles on which Building Societies are established, are in perfect accordance with the spirit of Christianity—a spirit alike opposed to wasteful prodigality and to covetousness,—but which encourages that prudent economy of our means, by which the springs of liberality are unceasingly supplied.

The objects generally contemplated by Building Societies are—To enable the shareholders to build or purchase household property. To give those shareholders who do not wish to build or purchase, a higher rate of interest for their money than they could obtain in the Public Funds or the Savings Banks. Some Societies also advance money to enable shareholders to redeem mortgaged property.

THE OBJECTS OF THE PRESENT SOCIETY ARE THE FOLLOWING:—

I. To enable persons to build dwelling-houses, or to purchase freehold or leasehold property, on the most advantageous terms. II. To afford assistance to congregations wishing to erect chapels or school-rooms, and to enable parties to extinguish chapel debts, and prevent the possibility of foreclosure in cases where buildings are mortgaged.

III. To give monthly depositors a higher rate of interest than is yielded by the ordinary modes of investment.

IV. To give to persons advancing money by way of loan to this Society interest at the rate of five per cent per annum.

V. To advance money to shareholders upon freehold or leasehold property, and upon reversions or other kinds of real security, subject to the approval of the Directors; and to enable mortgagors to redeem their mortgages.

ADVANTAGES TO THE FIRST CLASS.

The monthly subscription will be 12s. per share, with no redemption fee, instead of 10s., the amount paid in most Societies, with a redemption fee of 4s. payable by borrowers. By this plan, an increased inducement is furnished to shareholders to become borrowers, the funds of the Society will be kept fully employed, and its termination in ten years secured beyond doubt. It will also be found, on examination, to be advantageous to all parties; and as compared with one Society, in which the monthly subscription is 10s., but which Society is computed to last thirteen years, in consequence of the redemption fee being abolished, the money balance in favour of the London and Provincial Building and Investment Society is six pounds on one share, besides an earlier termination of three years.

ADVANTAGES TO THE SECOND CLASS.

The projectors are fully satisfied that, by the means which they propose, the machinery of Building Societies may be made auxiliary to the extensive promotion of the cause of religion, and the education of the rising generation. By the assistance which this Society will be able to furnish, chapel debts may easily be extinguished; and with these debts, all the embarrassments and difficulties which operate so powerfully to impede ministerial usefulness, disturb the peace of churches, and check the progress of the Gospel. To show the practical working of this part of the plan, and the advantages by which it is accompanied, let a case, of not unrequent occurrence, be supposed:—A congregation wished to build a chapel, or school-room, or to extinguish a mortgage debt, £1000 is required for the purpose, but the congregation can only raise among themselves, £500; following the ordinary course of proceedings, the other £500 would be borrowed upon mortgage—say at interest of 5 per cent. Then suppose, that, at the end of ten years, the mortgage is redeemed, the whole of the amount paid will have been, principal, £500, interest for ten years, at 5 per cent., £250, total, £750. If, however, three or four of the members of the congregation became shareholders in this Society, and borrowed the £500 in the way prescribed by the Rules, it would be necessary to take up about nine shares—but say nine shares; allowing a discount of £64 per share, the nine shares would produce £504. For this sum, the parties borrowing it would have to pay a monthly subscription of £5 8s., or £64 16s. per annum. In ten years, therefore, when it is calculated that the Society will close, the whole amount paid will be £648, thus leaving a balance in favour of the borrowing in this Society of £102.

In addition to this advantage, the risk of a foreclosure of the mortgage, and all the uncertainty and inconvenience connected with such species of property are entirely obviated. The monthly payment of £5 8s. might easily be raised by a small regular subscription, or a slight increase of the pew-rents.

ADVANTAGES TO THE THIRD CLASS.

Monthly depositors continuing shareholders to the close of the Society will then receive £120. for the £72. which they will have subscribed. They will, however, be at liberty to withdraw from the Society whenever they choose: if they withdraw before the close of the first year, a deduction, proportioned to the number of shares they may hold, will be made, towards defraying the expenses incurred in establishing the Society; if the withdrawal be made after the first and before the end of the fourth year, they will be allowed simple interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, on the amount they have subscribed; if the withdrawal take place after the fourth year, they will be allowed such bonus, in addition to the above-mentioned rate of interest, as the Directors may determine upon.

ADVANTAGES TO THE FOURTH CLASS.

With a view of meeting the case of individuals who have small sums to invest, for a limited period, it is provided that persons advancing money in sums of not less than £50. to this Society, for a given period to be agreed upon, shall receive interest for the same at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum: such persons, however, not to be entitled to any other of the advantages of the Society.

ADVANTAGE TO THE FIFTH CLASS.

This Society will advance money upon freehold, leasehold, reversionary, and such other kinds of real securities, as may be approved by the Directors. This plan is intended to accommodate parties, who, through the pressure of circumstances, might otherwise be compelled to mortgage, or entirely dispose of their property, perhaps at a great sacrifice. To persons who have mortgaged their property, this Society offers great advantages in the terms on which it will advance money to redeem such mortgages; the money so advanced to be repaid by monthly instalments.

PRACTICAL WORKING OF THE SOCIETY.

The money arising from the monthly subscriptions is advanced to shareholders desirous of purchasing freehold or leasehold property, such shareholders submitting to a discount, the amount of which is determined at the time when the sale of money takes place: the property purchased by the shareholder is mortgaged to the Society, as security for the payment of subscriptions, &c., until the Society terminates. This will occur when each unadvanced share is worth £120. The sale of money is conducted in the following manner:—The Chairman announces that a share of £120. is to be sold, and (if in the first year of the Society's existence) that the lowest discount which will be taken is £04. If there should be only one shareholder who wishes to borrow, he will be at liberty to take as many shares on these terms as can be covered by the whole amount of the money to be disposed of. Should there, however, be several persons present who wish to have their shares advanced, the sale proceeds in the usual manner, and the share is awarded to the party who is willing to allow the highest discount. The purchaser of the share may then take as many more shares as he pleases, subject to the limitation above-mentioned.

Applications for Shares may be made, in the under-mentioned form, to Mr. Hull Terrell, 30, Basinghall Street; Mr. Joseph Bagster, 3, Size Lane, Bucklersbury; Mr. Charles Burls, Jun., 15, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars; and of Mr. William Lawley, 6, Red Lion Street, Borough, from whom also Prospectuses may be obtained.

OUR HOPE.

We are not given to despair. The signs of the times are significant as to the eventual success of the principles we advocate. When, however, we look abroad upon the face of society—when we behold the potency of the drinking-customs and usages; powerful in the drawing-room and in the workshop;—when we see the “sipping” propensities of respectable persons, and the sottishness of large masses of the operative classes, we are compelled not to place Our Hope upon the present generation.

The good which temperance has produced already is enormous; the good it will yet effect, we are persuaded, will be incalculable; and still we give it as our conviction—a conviction founded on much observation, and a conviction similar to that felt by leading and zealous friends of the cause—that there is no hope of thoroughly converting the men and women of this age from habits of indulgence in intoxicating drinks. Where then is Our Hope? We reply, in the children growing up around us. On them rests Our Hope—a hope steadfast as our confidence in the ultimate triumphs of the Cross—that temperance will yet universally prevail.

A good principle thrown into the virgin soil of a young child's heart, will generally take deep root and spring up a strong and sturdy tree, defying the tempest to uproot it.

It was a truth long before Solomon gave it utterance, that if a child is trained up in the way he should go, he will not, as he grows older, depart from it.

It is true wisdom, then, to impart lessons of morality to the young; for if well learnt and practised by them, morality must soon become prevalent.

And how comparatively easy the task!

There is no combatting with habit; no strivings with taste; and no victories to gain over false shame and miscalled sociality.

Children are seldom sophists, but they are often good reasoners; they are seldom orators, but they are very often correct thinkers. They soon see whether a thing be really for their advantage or not, and will be bold to adopt that course which will benefit them through life.

And then, when some thirty or forty years have elapsed, the great majority of the present supporters of the drinking-customs will have passed from the earth; what is now society will then be the past; and the unnoticed children of 1846, will then be the rulers and governors of the land. They will form society, and that society may be expected either to be in favour of temperance or drunkenness, according to the bias given to their minds at the present time.

And let it never be forgotten, that if children do not learn an abstinent, they will learn a drinking education; and how awful if the influence of any parent should lead his children to drink—lead them to love the drink—and lead them to feel all the unutterable horrors resulting therefrom!

Possessed of these views, we feel peculiar interest in that portion of Dr. Grindrod's proceedings which relate to the young.

It is true, that the greater part of his pledges are those of children, and this is sometimes regarded as a drawback. "They are the signatures of only boys and girls," is the expression often ignorantly used; but could we penetrate into the future; could we lift the veil which envelops coming events, we would at once see the folly of such an exclamation.

There is another view which is important. If a man at forty sign the pledge, and if he live to sixty-five, he will exert an influence upon a large number of his fellow-men; but what are they when compared with the hundreds of thousands who will be acted upon by a child of twelve years, and who lives to a green old age?

There is then, as we have seen, much to gladden in the prospect. We repeat it, Our Hope is in the little ones of this generation, who will be the mighty people of the next.

While we rejoice over present successes, and they are great—while we hail with joy the removal of any obstacle, and the overthrow of any opposition—our eye still continues to be fixed upon the unseen: the great contest will there be decided;—decided in the utter downfall of intemperance and the establishment of perfect sobriety.

GENTLEMANLY CONDUCT.

The following sentence of a military court-martial held on Second Lieut. G. L. Dunbar, of the Royal Marine corps, has been approved of by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty:—"The prisoner, Mr. G. T. Dunbar, was tried for having been drunk, and guilty of conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and gentleman, on the 30th of October last. The sentence of the court is, that the charge of being drunk is proved; but the Court acquit Mr. Dunbar of that part charging him with conduct UNBECOMING THE CHARACTER OF AN OFFICER AND GENTLEMAN. The Court therefore admonish Mr. Dunbar to be more careful in the use of spirituous liquors as a medicine in future." Mr. Dunbar has returned to his duty.

The profession of a soldier does not seem to imply any very high degree of human development, either moral or intellectual; but military men would be loth to rank beneath civilians in their estimate of what is "becoming the character of a gentleman." The Court Martial, however, upon Lieutenant Dunbar, has given its judgment, that the fact of "being drunk," does not constitute any impeachment of the character of an officer and a gentleman. And the Lords of the Admiralty concur in the opinion. This is an important fact—a sign of the times. Drunkenness has long since become disreputable in polite society, but the standard of propriety in the military world has sunk below that of the rest of the community. We hail the fact with some comfort. It shows that the society has advanced, and that the army does not hold that high position in polished society that it once did. Let the civil world continue to advance, regardless of military fashion, and the trumpery of scarlet and lace, let the army be left in the rear in the march of morality and refinement, and it will not long survive its gentility.

MALTING AND THE EXCISE.

Perhaps it is not generally known, that persons employed in the offices of Excise, are compelled, during the malting season, to work on the Sabbath day. A correspondent, himself an officer of Excise, thus writes:—

"The weight of business prevented me from attending to your communication, having, during the malting season, to attend to business, both Sundays and week days. Surely ministers of the gospel are not sincere when they preach against the desecration of the Sabbath. They well know that 40,000 working maltsters, and, perhaps, 3000 Excise officers are violating the divine command by following their avocations on the Lord's day; yet none of them will touch the subject with their little finger.

Their reply to me is, "We know nothing about it," "We cannot help it," "It is none of our business," &c. Yet from the pulpit they tell us, that "the Sabbath-breaker cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven." The plain fact is, they love beer and will have it; no matter if we expire with the shovel or gauging rod in our hands; it moveth not them. The priest and the levite unmoved, pass by on the other side."

These strictures are, perhaps, too severe; few persons, we think, were aware of the existence of the evil, but now it is made public, we do earnestly hope that means will be taken to prevent its continuation.

Our correspondent expresses a conviction, that "if any pious minister would use his influence, the Excise Office, at least, might be relieved from desecrating the Sabbath."

SAILORS.

The claims of sailors on the solicitude of the philanthropic are confessedly great; although they go down in ships and do business on the mighty waters, and have constant manifestations of the goodness and power of God, they are, as a class, morally degraded. Nothing has more tended to this degradation, than the vitiated taste for alcoholic liquors, which is cultivated on board ship, from the cabin-boy to the captain.

We were delighted in reading the Twelfth Annual Report of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN SAILORS' SOCIETY, to see this subject alluded to in terms which marked the importance attached to it by the Committee. We cannot refrain from giving an extract or two:—

"One of the worst evils of the infamous crimping-system, is the encouragement it holds forth to the indulgence of the master-passion of the sailor, the love of intoxicating drink. It is by means of the fatal cup, that the crimp first allures his victim, and holds him in his fetters; and, could your committee break up that system, they would be the instruments of saving many a brave tar from one of the most degrading vices. They are happy, however, to report that the cause of temperance is progressing amongst these men. During the winter many meetings were held for the promotion of that object, and considerable numbers signed the pledge, from some of whom your secretary and missionaries have received most delightful testimonies in favour of the advantages derived from entire abstinence from all intoxicating drink. Many who have joined the society have become members of Christian churches, and do honour to the cause they have espoused. Whole ships' companies have adopted the plan, and testify to the benefits derived from the change, and to the adaptation of the system to all climates."

The Balance.

"WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING."

OBJECTION I.

"INTOXICATING LIQUORS ARE NECESSARY AND BENEFICIAL; AT LEAST, NOT INJURIOUS."

Having, we trust, in our last Number shown to the reader's satisfaction, that alcoholic beverages are neither necessary nor beneficial, we shall now examine the assertion, that "at least, they are not injurious." We reply,

1. Alcohol in its pure undiluted state is hurtful to the physical system. The experiments of Drs. Prout and Magendie have demonstrated this beyond the reach of cavil. In the Materia Medica, it is ranked among poisons, and is declared such by the unanimous voice of the medical world. One of its effects when taken into the human body is to arrest the progress of reproduction, and to turn the arterial or red blood into venous or black blood. This can be best explained in LIEBIG'S own words—"By the use of alcohol a limit must rapidly be put to the change of matter in certain parts of the body. The oxygen of the arterial blood, which, in the absence of alcohol, would have combined with the matter of the tissues, or with that formed by the metamorphosis of these tissues, now combines with the elements. The arterial blood becomes venous, without the substance of the muscles having taken any share in the transformation."

2. Alcohol being the product of the vinous fermentation, retains all its injurious properties when associated with other substances. Thus the alcohol contained in beer, ale, porter, wine, and cider, is the same as that found in ardent spirits; and science has proved, that there is nothing in the composition of fermented liquors which can counteract the effects which alcohol legitimately produces.

3. These effects will follow in proportion to the quantity taken. It thus appears, that individuals who use daily portions of alcoholic stimuli, do themselves more physical mischief, than do those persons who indulge in occasional fits of intoxication, which are followed by long intervals of abstinence. In the former case, the system becomes gradually weakened by the constant application of alcohol; while in the latter case, it is generally enabled (unless enfeebled by disease) to resume its healthy action. Nature furnishes analogies. The worm will gnaw its way through the stout timber, which the keenest javelin is unable to penetrate at once; and the stone which would remain unaffected by heavy showers, will, in course of time, waste away under the continual dropping of water. Dr. MACROBERT'S testimony is of great value. He states,—“After having treated more than 3000 cases, in the town hospital of Liverpool, I give it as my decided opinion, that the constant moderate use of stimulating drinks, is more injurious than the now and then excessive indulgence in them." The experiments of Dr. BEAUMONT on St. MARTIN, (the condition of whose stomach could be distinctly seen, owing to an opening in his side) are perfectly conclusive on this point. Dr. BEAUMONT records the fact, that "the free use of ardent spirits, wine, beer, or any intoxicating liquors, when continued for several days, has invariably produced inflammatory and ulcerous patches on the mucous membrane of the stomach."

What then, must be the state of the stomachs of those persons, who have been in the habit for years of taking what they deem moderate portions of strong drink?

In reply to this it may be asked.

1. Why, then, are we not poisoned? How is it that we are still in existence, although we have partaken of these drinks for a long time? We would simply ask, Is not opium poison? How is it then, that the eaters and drinkers of that drug do not die immediately they take it? How is it that some of them live for a series of years? The amount consumed by some persons is perfectly appalling. The well-known "English opium eater," daily consumed a quantity sufficient to kill a number of men! Who would thence infer that opium is not deleterious? Again, do not great masses of the poor live in dwellings unfit for human habitations; badly ventilated, destitute of sewerage, &c.; and is it not an undoubted truth, that the seeds of mortality are thereby scattered thickly and deeply? But do not the poor live! Do they not drag out an existence? And yet is not their mode of life inimical to health and soundness of body? These facts are interesting, as they shew the extraordinary powers of physical endurance; but they are utterly worthless, when used as arguments to prove the non-injuriousness of intoxicating liquors.

It may be urged,

2. That if alcoholic fluids were injurious, the injury would be felt; and because such injury is not always felt, it is concluded they are not injurious. We answer (1) that men are loath to attribute the pains and ills they do experience to their proper source. That they have injured themselves by indulgence in strong drink, is a confession which few have the candour to make. Hence the avidity always displayed to resort to imaginary instead of to real and substantial causes. Medical men will not hesitate to affirm, that our drinking habits, as a people, have had a marvellous effect in the development and extension of disease. We answer,

(2.) The existence of incipient disease, is not always apparent, even to the individual himself. "The case of St. Martin forms an irrefragable proof; for during the period when he was suffering from a diseased stomach, produced by the use of strong drink, it is said, "he complained of no pain, nor showed symptoms of any general indisposition; said, he felt well, and had a good appetite." In annotating upon this passage, Dr. COOMBE, the celebrated physiologist, makes the following forcible observations. "Many persons who are in the habit of indulging in the use of stimulants, although not to what is called excess, defend the practice by affirming, that they experience no bad effects from them, and that if they did them harm, they would not fail to feel it. St. Martin, might with equal truth have said, that these indulgences did him no harm because he felt none; and yet if his stomach, so different from its appearance in its healthy state, had been presented before his eyes, reflected in a mirror, there would have been an end of all argument, for the fact was undeniable."

OBJECTION II.

"INTOXICATING DRINKS ARE SENT BY GOD FOR MAN'S USE AND ENJOYMENT, AND ARE THEREFORE HIS GOOD CREATURES."

This objection, which we have written as it is commonly repeated, begs the entire question. We deny that intoxicating liquors are sent by God, in the sense contemplated by the objector. Alcohol is not a living, natural production. It does not grow like the coffee berry and the tea-leaf, or even as henbane, hemlock, and the upas tree. It is, in fact, the effect of decomposition; and is the first of two other changes, the acetous and the putrefactive. "Both fermentation and putrefaction," says Liebig, "are processes of decomposition of a similar kind, the one of substances destitute of nitrogen, the other of substances containing that element."

As alcohol, then, is produced by fermentation, and as fermentation is a process of decay, it follows that alcohol cannot exist in any living substance, whether vegetable or animal.

This completely refutes the assertion with which we are greeted ad nauseam, that "alcohol is in sugar"—"is in every thing"—"in every thing, indeed, except water," as was sagely remarked by a Baptist minister of our acquaintance, whose knowledge of theology was superior to his acquaintance with chemistry.

It is grievous to hear even generally well-informed persons give credence to such absurdities.

As the sugar fallacy is the one more commonly received, we will give the dictum of the Great Master of Modern Chemistry upon it.—"SUGAR CONTAINS NEITHER ALCOHOL NOR CARBONIC ACID, so that these bodies must be produced by a different arrangement of its atoms, and by their union with the elements of water."—LIEBIG'S Letters on Chemistry, p. 283. And herein is the great source of the prevailing error; because alcohol can be extracted from sugar by a different arrangement of the atoms of the sugar, it is conjectured that alcohol exists in the sugar!

Out of 100 parts, sugar contains 7 of hydrogen, 44 of carbon, and 49 of oxygen; while alcohol contains 14 of hydrogen, 52 carbon, and only 34 of oxygen!

The elements of which alcohol and sugar are composed, are, we see, the same; but the very same elements compose potato-starch and oakwood, olive oil and rosin, &c.; yet who would therefore contend that potato-starch was in oakwood, and olive oil in rosin? It is the proportion in which the elements are combined, that renders a substance innocuous or hurtful; and it is one of the most wonderful displays of the Creator's power and wisdom, that by a slight change in this proportion, the most harmless things would become the most destructive.

But the question might be easily settled by pure reasoning, independent of chemical analysis.

Alcohol, the natural product of the vinous fermentation, has it not the power to intoxicate? If, then, the alcohol in sugar and beef, is the same as that in fermented liquors, it must have the power to intoxicate. But it has not that power; therefore, the alcohol which exists in sugar and beef, is not the same as that which exists in fermented liquors; and if it is not the same, then it is not alcohol, for alcohol is the natural product of the vinous fermentation, and possesses the power to intoxicate.

But if it were true that alcohol was a natural, living substance; and if it grew like the night shade or fox-glove, are we bound to swallow it?

Everything in nature, is doubtless good for something; but not always good to eat or drink. Man is endowed with reason, and that reason enables him to distinguish what is proper for food, and what is not.

The objection, therefore, cannot be sustained; but if it were sustained, it would prove nothing against abstinence from strong drink.

In our next Number we shall weigh the third Objection.

"The use of intoxicating liquors is countenanced by the Scriptures and sanctioned by the example of the most illustrious men of ancient and modern times."

TEETOTALISM AND PARALYSIS.

Letter from T. BEAUMONT, Esq., M. R. C. S.

(To the Editors of the Temperance Chronicle and Recorder.)

SIRS,—Having been requested to signify through the columns of your valuable Journal, whether I believe there is any ground of apprehension, that teetotalism is apt to induce paralysis, I take this opportunity of stating, most distinctly, that nothing is more unlikely! Those who are at all acquainted with the pathology of paralysis, need not be told, that from the very nature of the disease, it is not in the smallest degree probable, that abstinence from alcoholic liquors, can be attended with any one circumstance, which can account for any of the phenomena peculiar to affections of this nature; but on the contrary, that such a course is the surest preventive; whilst of the various causes, which are known to produce paralysis, none is more frequent than the using of intoxicating liquors! At the same time, I am not assuming, that these are the only agents which are apt to occasion complaints of this nature, knowing, as I do, that mental anxiety, cold, and tobacco, are not unfrequently the occasions of every form of nervous disease; and if in any instance a teetotaler becomes the subject of the disease in question, its true cause must be sought in other sources, and will mostly be found in connexion with some of those which I have mentioned.

But never, I repeat it, can paralysis supervene, in consequence of the abandonment of intoxicating liquors.

Believe me yours faithfully,

THOMAS BEAUMONT.

TEMPERANCE AND THE NAVY.

(To the Editors of the Chronicle and Recorder.)

SIRS,—On Tuesday, Dec. 9th, I went on board Her Majesty's ship Trafalgar, (120 guns,) now lying at Sheerness, to dine with one of the officers, who is a pledged abstainer, and active promoter of temperance principles. From the little I had previously known, but more from what was then witnessed, I was led to infer that enough interest has not been felt for a class of men cradled as it were in hardships and dissipation, shut out from those means of improvement that we on the land possess, and almost totally excluded, by virtue of their calling, from the humanizing influences of refined society. This ship's complement is 900 men, but only about 600 took dinner on board. After the men had partaken of the eatables provided, the accustomed quantity of grog was distributed, which consists of a quarter of a pint of rum daily to all rated as men, to which three times the quantity of water is added.* This regulation, if it does not directly produce intemperance on board ship, is sometimes, it is to be feared, attended with evil consequences remotely. The men get occasional leave of absence to go on shore, and before doing so they will probably have had their appetites whetted by grog; additional gratification is sought when they reach the land, and the means for their doing so, unhappily, are afforded on every hand.

* On board the Trafalgar, the quantity of spirits allowed is divided into two parts, morning and evening rations.

The improvement that has taken place since the partial withdrawal of the spirit-rations is matter for gratulation. The Statistical Reports on the Health of the Navy, for the years 1830 to 36, a document strictly official, and put into my hands by a gentleman connected with the Naval Hospital at Chatham, speak most decidedly of the salutary change effected in the Navy since 1825. We are told that, "Previously to 1825, half a pint of spirits, when spirits were issued, was allowed to every person sailing in the fleet, at which time, a salutary and judicious change was introduced by the reduction of the spirits to a quarter of a pint daily, and an allowance of tea and coffee substituted in its stead. The practice formerly was to divide the half-pint of spirits into two equal parts, one of which was issued at dinner-time, the other in the afternoon, now, instead of the afternoon allowance of spirits, tea or coffee is issued, and prove a safe, healthy, and satisfactory article of diet. When the change was introduced, it was apprehended by some that the seamen, if they did not resist, would be greatly dissatisfied with it, their love of grog being considered paramount to all considerations. It was, however, introduced without disturbance or general complaints; in a short time it became liked, and now it is believed that the majority of the men serving, if it were put to them, would prefer the present to the former system. It is certain the change has acted and will act yet more beneficially; for it is unnecessary to state that one of the most active causes of disease and insubordination, with all its mischievous results, has been the intemperate use of spirituous liquors. It is no less certain, though not so evident, (on which account, partly, perhaps, it was so long allowed to remain in force,) that the former practice was a sure method for laying the foundation and fostering habits of intemperance. To give a lad of eighteen half a pint of spirits daily, with the precepts and examples of his seniors, was tantamount to teaching drunkenness: for if he abstained from the allowance of grog, he was ridiculed as a milk-sop, but was praised for his manly and seaman-like qualities if he drank with avidity. The quantity allowed produced unhealthy excitement, if not intoxication, under the influence of which he neglected duty, or committed acts of insubordination which entailed punishment, followed sometimes by repentance and amendment, but oftener by further indulgence, procuring spirits beyond his allowance, by every means in his power, becoming reckless, a confirmed drunkard, and finally a burden and a pest to the service. Many diseases were the direct effect of such conduct: many more were excited and all were aggravated by it; the habit and its numerous bad effects are far from being extinguished, but they are much less than they were, and there is no reason to doubt that they will become progressively less, until pervading temperance aided by other means of improvement, shall give to the Navy a force organic, moral and intellectual, much greater than it has hitherto possessed."

The foregoing is a valuable testimony to the partial adoption of our principles; and it were to be wished that the English Government, in lieu of contracting for 100,000 gallons of rum, would, in reference to British seamen, follow the example of the Prussian authorities, by holding out every inducement to the service for advancing in sobriety and intelligence. The 17,000 who belong to the Marine Society of New York, the additional thousands of seamen in different parts of the world, sailing to every point of the compass, are experiments on a large scale, that there exists no absolute necessity for spirit rations as a part of the provisions of the Navy. A gentleman connected with the Trafalgar, who has been twenty-four years in the Navy, assured me that in Captain Sir J. Ross's Arctic Expedition, the most inveterate lover of grog could not be prevailed on to partake of spirits before going on the ice, and the reason assigned is that the condensation of the breath saturated with the spirit emitted from the lungs, tended to disfigure the countenance to a frightful degree. Spirits, then, were not taken to keep out the intense cold of these northern latitudes, for they were not taken till after the hardships had been experienced. More substantial fuel, in the shape of good food, is what our seamen require, food containing azotised elements for the production of muscular fibre, &c., and also carbonaceous materials, as elements of respiration. Our Navy, by a judicious regulation of this kind, instead of the distribution of spirit-rations, tending to incite to acts of delinquency would be vastly benefited; and the man who shall bring about such a glorious revolution would exceed in heroism a Collingwood or a Nelson.

I am respectfully,

THOMAS HUDSON.

THE STATE OF INTEMPERANCE IN LEEDS.

In Leeds, as in other places, the use of intoxicating liquor produces a large amount of physical suffering and deep depravity, manifesting itself in the horrid oaths, abominable language, and cruel conduct of drunkards to their families. A man who earns from 30s. to £2 per week, allows his wife eight shillings to provide every thing necessary for the family, (sometimes not so much) and spends the remainder in strong drink; and, as his wife informed me, he has not a decent suit of clothes to appear in on a Sunday. Thousands in this neighbourhood are toiling hard, (producing the wealth of the nation,) and then throw away those hard earnings by paying for deranged stomachs, and distracted minds. I am asked what can be done for men that are so resolute in making themselves and others miserable? Some are for punishing drunkards. Some, as for instance, Mr. Wakley, coroner for Middlesex, are for providing them asylums as for other insane persons; but, in common honesty, such asylums ought to be provided by brewers, publicans, gin-spinners, and beer sellers. The only effectual plan is the truly excellent and simple plan of teetotalism. In Leeds, we have hundreds of reclaimed characters, that have continued so for a number of years, and are much more than a recompense for all the labour ever bestowed. Many more thousands have, however, failed in the attempt, owing to the strength of their appetite. Many have acknowledged to me that they are convinced of the goodness of the principle, but cannot resist temptation. Two individuals I have visited frequently, have wished, time after time, that they could continue firm, but are lost for want of resolution. One man, when sober, is all a wife could wish, but his intemperance renders her miserable. One of the strongest reasons why all ought to abstain from intoxicating drink, we think, may be deduced from those facts. It has a warning voice that all may hear, and is an important lesson that all may read. The only security is in never forming the appetites. Indifference, approaching to contempt, is one of the most powerful hindrances to the progress of our principle in Leeds. The impression frequently rests upon my mind, when engaged in my regular visitations, and at feasts, fairs, and on market-days, (Saturday nights more particularly) that if the ministers of the gospel, and others of the excellent of the earth, would go among the people at those times of general dissipation, their souls would be aroused at the sights they would then witness. I believe that thousands of good men know but little of the awful amount of wickedness occasioned by strong drink in the towns in which they live. I have been engaged for more than ten months in Leeds, as Temperance Town Missionary, and employ my time in addressing public meetings, groups of people standing in the streets; and when not engaged in other business of the society, I visit daily from thirty to eighty families—with some I can do nothing, with others nothing more than leave a tract; with those that allow me, I enter into lengthened conversations, and by these means I have seen strong prejudice removed. Not a day passes, but seed is sown, that, by God's blessing, will bring forth fruit. Too much importance cannot possibly be attached to the dissemination of correct information; and this can only be satisfactorily accomplished, by tracts and visitations at the dwellings of the people, inasmuch, as you there come in contact with many that will not attend a temperance meeting. My reception, in many cases, is by no means agreeable, in some instances, I am ordered out of the house; in others, the parties are reluctant to receive information. Much opposition is manifested to signing our pledge. During the summer, I have addressed many large open air meetings, that have been productive of much good. The Parent Committee have two weekly meetings, beside eight other meetings in connexion with the branches, the greatest part of which are well attended. Altogether we are making steady progress. I have distributed many thousands of tracts, and the Parent Committee have presented to each Sabbath school teacher in Leeds (to whom they have had access,) a copy of a Prize Essay, published at Ipswich, addressed to that most useful class of persons.

Foreign Intelligence.

INDIA.

By the December Overland Mail, we received the Indian Temperance periodicals. A publication in the Tamil language is intended to be regularly published; a specimen copy of which was received with the South India Journal and the Bombay Temperance Advocate. The following interesting intelligence we glean from the pages of the Journal.

MYSORE.—A society for the natives had already been established, but it was thought highly desirable to establish one for the Europeans and other residents. Accordingly a meeting for that purpose was convened on Wednesday evening the 13th, and a goodly number of the residents attended.

After prayer and the reading of the Scriptures, the Rev. C. Campbell introduced the business of the evening, and urged on the meeting the propriety of forming a society of the nature contemplated.

A. N. Magrath, Esq. was then requested to favour the meeting with his professional testimony to the propriety and advantage of total abstinence. This Dr. Magrath kindly did, in a most emphatic and satisfactory manner; at the close of the meeting, 15 signatures were immediately obtained; and some others have joined since.

MAULMAIN.—The monthly meeting was held August 21st, 1845. The day following the fifth anniversary was celebrated by a dinner. The school-room was kindly granted on this occasion; a large party assembled, of non-commissioned officers and privates with their wives; the chair was taken by the president, (Colour Sergeant Batts), assisted by the Sergeant-Major; there was a side table arranged also for the children. The room was tastefully done up with evergreens and variegated lamps, and the evening was spent in a most harmonious and pleasant manner.

TRICHONOLRY.—The funds are in a very flourishing state; the account current for August shows a balance in favour of the society of 450 rupees, in the hands of the treasurer. Number of teetotalers 201.

MEERUT.—The monthly meeting was held on the 28th of August. About one hundred and forty sat down to tea. Several officers would have been present but for the threatening aspect of the evening. Some of the members passed away a portion of the evening by delivering short addresses in support of the cause.

The strength of the society at present is one hundred and seventy; and its internal affairs are in a very prosperous condition.

H. M. 22ND REGIMENT OF FOOT.—A general meeting of the above society was held October 4th, 1845, to commemorate their second anniversary. Sergeant W. Harris presided. Present strength 72.

The following letter from the secretary of the Coimbatore Society will be read with much interest. It was addressed to the former Editor of the Recorder, who has kindly handed it over to us for insertion.

Coimbatore, Madras,
East Indies, Nov. 3rd, 1845.

DEAR SIR,—I live in the town of Coimbatore, which is in the Madras Presidency, East Indies, in latitude 10° 52' N., longitude 77° 5' E., containing a population of between thirty and forty thousand. This is a land in which Satan reigns, and we are surrounded with drunkards; and toddy and arrack shops are generally crowded, especially in the evening. About two years ago, reading temperance publications, and hearing of the good teetotalism had done in the world, induced me to sign the pledge, and to endeavour, with God's blessing, to do what I could to rescue my fellow-creatures from the dreadful bane of drunkenness. I accordingly commenced a Teetotal Society, and when I made known its principles, and the benefits derived from them to the Christians here, many came forward and joyfully signed the pledge. Ever since that time (April 9th, 1844,) our society has greatly increased, and its principles have been propagated both far and wide.

My father, as you probably know, is a missionary of the London Missionary Society at this place (Coimbatore), and though not a pledged teetotaler himself, has many years been a practical one, and has done what he could to encourage us in our endeavours, and at our last anniversary (on April 9th, 1845,) preached a sermon on 1 Thess. v. 7, (latter clause) to the members of our society, who walked in procession to the chapel.

There are eight out-stations belonging to this mission, at five of which there are auxiliary temperance societies, many heathen have joined our society, both at this place and in its branches. The following is a brief outline of the number of our society at Coimbatore and its branches at the out-stations, who have signed the teetotal pledge.

At Coimbatore	77
At Errode	7
At Darapooram	1
At Avenashy.....	1
At Pulladam	2
At Pullachy	2
Total	90

I have to observe, that exclusive of the native Christians and heathen who have signed the pledge at Coimbatore, every one of those who have joined us as teetotalers in the out-stations are heathen and Mohammedans.

We are greatly in want of temperance publications, both in English and the native languages. I have lately written some handbills in the Tamil language (vernacular), one is a translation of the first part of that well known English tract, "The Wonderful Advantages of Drunkenness," and which has been through three editions, and has been widely circulated in several parts of southern India.

If you can afford to send us some temperance Recorders, temperance tracts, &c., gratuitously, and will be so kind as to send them to the London Mission House, Blomfield-street, Finsbury, London, with directions for them to be forwarded to me without delay, they will reach me in a few months, and I shall be truly obliged for any such.

If this short account of our temperance society here should prove interesting to you, will you have the goodness to give it insertion in your next temperance Recorder, and send it to me with any other temperance publications you can afford to give me. Be assured that your liberality will be truly valued by us here.

Praying that a gracious God will increasingly bless the endeavours of the advocates of teetotalism, and grant that they may ultimately prove conducive to His glory, and the honour of our dear Redeemer. I remain, dear sir, yours very sincerely,

CHARLES JAMES ADDIS,
Secretary to the Coimbatore Teetotal Society.
[Mr. Alexander of Ipswich, has forwarded a supply of Recorders and tracts.—Eps.]

FRANCE.

We are glad to announce that the effects produced by the labours of the missionaries sent to France by the National Society last year have not subsided. An impetus was given to the societies of Havre, Rouen, and the neighbourhood, which has been continued up to the present time.

Mr. Richardson, the treasurer of the Rouen Society, remarks in a letter to Mr. James Balfour—"Yesterday I was delighted with an Englishman who came and applied to me for work. He asked me if I did not know him. 'I look different,' he said, 'to what I did when you saw me last. I was then in rags and tatters, but now I have on a teetotal suit—he was dressed in a suit of blue pilot cloth—and I have another suit besides this.' This is not a solitary case, there are many like it."

Mr. Little, the secretary, in a letter to ourselves, corroborates this testimony.

"We had a very interesting tea-meeting on Monday evening, December 22nd, at Mr. Wood's brick-yard, when a few friends from Pavilly and Rouen met the Barentin friends, and spent some happy hours together. The meeting was held in Mr. Wood's house, which was very tastefully fitted up for the occasion with evergreens and fruit; and the excellent tea and cake did great credit to Mrs. Wood, whose heart is in the good work. About 40 took tea, after which we held a public meeting, which was presided over by Mr. Eckersby of Pavilly, and was addressed by Messrs. Thomas and Job Wood, Pickersgill and Little, and the Rev. Mr. Mack.

"Friend Pickersgill likewise exhibited the burning fluid contained in Cogniac (brandy), and Creme de Menthe (peppermint). Mr. Thomas Wood said, he knew as much about drinking as any body. He had been brought up with it from his cradle, and never intended to be a teetotaler; he said he used to go to the meetings in England sometimes, partly intoxicated, to oppose the speakers; he used to tell them that no man could do such work as his without his beer (referring to burning bricks), but the night Mr. Balfour came to the brick-yard and delivered his first lecture, his wife, and some others signed the pledge, and then he (Mr. Wood) signed also, and since that time he has acted up to the principle. Mr. Wood then enumerated a few of the benefits arising from his sober habits. He has purchased a gold watch worth £10. with the Havre harbour engraved on the back, and he has clothed his family, which consists of his wife and nine children. When he formerly came home drunk the children used to run up the ladder and get into bed, but now they never run away from him, but are in the habit of meeting him at the door, and are often heard to say while looking him up in the face, 'You don't get drunk now, father.'

This is one of the many good results which have attended the exertions of the missionaries sent out to labour among us; and I feel persuaded that the full extent of good done will not be known till the consummation of all things; and that He who sustains the universe with his arm, may bless the endeavours of the National Temperance Society in the great work in which it is engaged, is the sincere prayer of yours," &c.

PROGRESS OF FATHER MATHEW.

MEETING AT THE CORN MARKET, CORK.

(From the Cork Examiner.)

On Friday, December 26th, a large and respectable meeting of the teetotalers of this city, was held pursuant to notice, at the rear of the Corn Market. Several of the temperance societies, with the bands and streamers were in attendance, and contributed in a great measure to enliven the scene. Shortly after one o'clock, the Very Rev. Mr. Mathew, with whom was the Mayor Elect and Captain Sullivan, arrived and were received with most unbounded applause. On the platform we noticed the mayor, Councillor Walsh, &c.

Mr. Mathew addressed the meeting at some length. He said, "It is with a heart full of gratitude to the Almighty God, and of thankfulness to the teetotalers of Cork, that I now address you. I never experienced such delight as on yesterday, when, from the reports spread as to the fidelity of the teetotalers, I felt it my duty to visit the greater part of the city and its suburbs, and I can assure you that during the entire of the day, I did not meet with a single individual under the influence of ardent spirits. On last night I was out after 9 o'clock, and the streets were as quiet and tranquil as the aisles of a cathedral. Surely, my friends, this is a state of things of which we should be proud—these are facts that should rejoice the heart of every one who loves his God, who loves his fellow-man, and who loves his country. I have been long enough in Cork to have witnessed a different celebration of the holy festival of Christmas, from that which my delighted eyes beheld on yesterday. I never felt more delighted than on yesterday, when, as I was passing down the Mall, I observed before me a labouring man with a little child, barefooted, but clean and comfortable. I had scarcely passed, when the child recognised me, and running up to me, cried 'Father Mathew, Father Mathew, come to our house, and we will give you a nice dinner? What have you got, my dear? said I. 'Oh, we have got some pork and a nice leg of mutton.' I could not accept his invitation, as I was engaged, but I shall never forget that child's gratitude. Oh God, help the child of the drunkard, and there are many such in this city!' Mr. Mathew concluded his speech amid loud and prolonged cheering. The assembly was afterwards addressed by Counsellor Walsh, the Mayor, and J. F. Maguire, Esq., B.L., after which, Father Mathew administered the pledge to several large batches, including an immense number of women and children.

EDINBURGH.

GREAT TEMPERANCE SOIREE.—On new year's night, one of the most brilliant soirées ever held in Edinburgh, took place in the Music Hall. Upwards of 1700 tickets were sold, and the hall was crowded in every part, by a highly respectable audience. Even the orchestra was crammed to the very ceiling, so as scarcely to leave elbow-room to the musicians. The chair was occupied by George Johnson, Esq., who officiated with great ability. On the platform, among the zealous friends of the cause, were John Dunlop, Esq., of Brockloth, Counsellor Blyth; Drs. Burns, Menzies, and Grey; Revs. Messrs. Reid, Townend, Kirk, Shaen and Longmuir; Henry Vincent, Esq., and J. Maclean, Esq., of Glasgow. The assembly was addressed by the chairman, Rev. Messrs. Reid and Townend of Edinburgh, Rev. Mr. Longmuir of Aberdeen, Mr. McLeod, and Mr. Vincent. The speeches produced a telling effect.

The chairman stated, in the course of his admirable address, that, during the last year, 3238 new members had joined the Edinburgh Temperance Society, which consisted now of 7000 enrolled members, and large numbers were acting on the principle who were not members of any society. The proceedings were enlivened by many fine airs by the instrumental band, combined occasionally with the great organ, during the intervals between the speeches; and an appropriate hymn, at the opening and close, was sung by the whole company. This glorious meeting will give a mighty impulse to the cause not only in Edinburgh, but also throughout Scotland.

LONDON.

FITZROY.—A festival was held on December 26th, which was well attended; between 70 and 80 sat down to tea. A public meeting was held afterwards, at which Mr. J. P. Draper, the secretary presided.

MARYLEBONE.—Metropolitan Mission. On Monday, December 29th, a public meeting was held in Enon Chapel, Marylebone, when addresses were delivered by Messrs. Balfour, Collins, Donaldson, Hodgson, Gutteridge, and Williamson. The statements made by the missionaries were listened to with much interest and attention.

WESTMINSTER.—A tea-festival and meeting was held in the temperance hall, Princes Place, opposite the hospital, on Monday, December 29th. A numerous company of devoted members and friends assembled round the festive table, and regaled themselves with the excellent refreshments which were bountifully supplied. The hall was tastefully decorated with festoons of laurel and artificial flowers. Elegant flags, banners, &c., illuminated by brilliant lights, presented a spectacle of a most imposing nature. About half-past seven, our esteemed co-adjutor Mr. W. Beal of Pimlico, took the chair. The speakers were Mr. T. A. Smith, Mr. J. W. Esterbook, and other advocates.

HARP ALLEY.—The Eighth Annual Festival of the Farringdon Branch Society was held in the Harp Alley School Room, on Tuesday evening the 6th.

The large room was crowded in every part with a most cheerful and respectable assembly.

Every part of the walls were decorated with flags and interesting devices.

G. W. Atwood, Esq., referred to the amazing success of teetotalism in the United States, and stated that his pastor (Rev. H. Townley) and most of his family were now teetotalers.

Mr. Thomason of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, then offered a few judicious and suitable remarks.

Mr. H. Rickman was very cordially received, and delivered a very effective address. He especially referred to the longevity of the members of the Society of Friends, and concluded by giving the following statistical table. He stated the deaths in their society had been as under:—

	1842-3	1843-4	1844-5
Under 5 years	53	79	83
5 to 40	88	68	82
40 to 70	95	127	108
75 to 100	120	108	121
	356	342	354

The Rev. J. Burns dwelt on the rapid progress teetotalism had made; on its present position; on its institutions, &c. He also expatiated on some things which were yet desirable, as greater unity, more decided co-operation, and urged the societies of London to arrange for the employment of at least two efficient talented lecturers, in addition to the noble services of gratuitous speakers.

Master Atwood, nephew of the chairman, then recited two poetical pieces, which were well received.

Mr. T. Beggs, Mr. Buckle, and others, then addressed the meeting.—Temperance Journal.

BERMONDSEY.—The second tea-meeting of the members of the Literary Institution, was held on the 26th of December, 1845. Among other particulars, the Report stated that there were upwards of 200 books in the Library and 160 members, although the Institution had only been established four months. J. Brooks, Hon. Sec.

[We sincerely wish that every temperance society in the metropolis at least, had a similar Institution connected with it. Eds.]

CARTERET STREET, WESTMINSTER.—A society supported by working men has existed for some time in the vicinity of the Broadway, Westminster. A tea-festival and meeting was held in the Hall, Carteret Street, on December 26th, 1845, when a gold medal was presented by a number of the reclaimed, to Mr. John Goddard, the founder of the society, as a token of their esteem and regard. About 500 persons sat down to tea, who were divided into three batches, and successively partook of the good things provided. William Sims, Esq., presided over the public meeting, which was addressed by Messrs. Davies, Mr. Curry, Reynolds, Bowler, Catton, Crowe, Hodgson, and G. Burns.

The interest of the meeting remained undiminished, from the beginning to the end; and if all other societies could have beheld the whole of the proceedings, they would have been stimulated "to go and do likewise;" several signed the pledge.

G. BURNS.

PECKHAM.—The Third Anniversary was held in the Lecture Room, Hill Street, January 5th, 1846.

* Rather more than 1-7th. † Rather more than 1-8th.
‡ Rather more than 1-8th.

Ninety persons sat down to tea, after which, the public meeting was held, at which the Rev. Jabez Burns presided. The Hon. Secretary read the Report. The speakers were Messrs. Gawthorpe, Ogborne, (City missionary) Williamson, Breck, Kent, Charlton (from Manchester) and Thomason.

On Wednesday 7th, William Cash, Esq. presided, when the meeting was addressed by Messrs. Smith, Johnson, Peek, and Kembly, gas-stokers, from the London Gas Works, Vauxhall, when it was stated, that in the various departments of that firm, there are now fifty consistent teetotalers. This statement produced a powerful impression upon a crowded audience.

On Wednesday, 14th, gave an address on astronomy, illustrated with diagrams, and Mr. Johnston exhibited the annual treat of the magic lantern, to the great satisfaction of several hundreds of the youth of Peckham who attended.

RICHARD HODGSON, Sen., Sec.

PROCESSION.—At a meeting of the Delegates from various Metropolitan Teetotal Societies, held on the 14th day of January, 1846, at Hart's Temperance Hotel, Aldersgate Street,

"It was unanimously resolved, that a general Teetotal Procession take place in the Metropolis, on Whit-Monday next.

"That this meeting do adjourn until Wednesday Evening, the 28th January, inst., at Eight o'clock precisely.

"That the above resolutions be forwarded to the London Teetotaler, the Temperance Weekly Journal, and the National Temperance Chronicle, with a request to the Editors of each to insert them in their next Numbers."

ROBERT ADKIN, Chairman.

SURREY AND SUSSEX.

W. GAWTHORP, AGENT.

This newly-formed association is now fairly at work. The gentlemen who compose the executive committee are fully alive to the importance of carrying on the business and management of this organization with spirit and energy. My agency in this district will soon cease, and Mr. Thomas Hudson will succeed me. It gives me unmingled satisfaction to have been the means of accomplishing the object for which the National Temperance Society sent me into these counties, and thus another link has been added to the great temperance chain. Croydon is one of the stations. The temperance cause has been in existence here for some time, and has had to move through great opposition; but it is now progressing and triumphing—the result of perseverance. I have given six addresses in this town, and several of the meetings have been very large.

DORKING.—The cause is progressing in this spirited town. This will be evident from the following extracts from the last Annual Report:—

"The operations of the society are annually increasing in power and success. When the Committee sent in their report for 1843, the number of members was 78; in 1844, 93; in this year it has augmented to 130; showing an increase of 36 members in the past year.

"In the same period the Committee have been able to double the number of lectures upon the total abstinence question; and it records with pleasure that a livelier interest to hear the society's principles explained is clearly evinced by a uniformly good attendance upon them. The Committee believe, that in proportion to the advocacy of its principles, will the number of its members be increased: and their conclusion is grounded on the fact—that as in the past year five lectures were given, and the increase eighteen;—this year the number of lectures has been ten, and the increase of members has been thirty-six.

"Among the peculiar features of this society, the Committee refer particularly to the interest which the cause has excited among the young; regarding it as an omen for good, that so many, whose characters are forming, have placed themselves upon the society's books, and so declare themselves to be desirous of avoiding the most fatal snares in the paths of virtue and rectitude.

"The Committee have the satisfaction of stating, that the arrangement alluded to in last year's report, has been fully carried into effect, by the formation of the Surrey and Sussex Temperance Union; by means of which a regular system of advocacy has been established, and the principles will be extensively disseminated throughout the two counties.

"The need of continued and increasing liberality, on the part of the friends of the cause, will be apparent from an examination of the treasurer's report; which at the same time affords an ample apology for the limited number of tracts distributed during the year. A comparatively small annual subscription, from the many well-wishers to the cause, would place the society on a sound permanent basis, and enable it to diffuse much valuable information in connexion with this important subject."

SOMERSET.

ROBERT GAMBLE, MISSIONARY AGENT OF THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

My last journal was made up to September 13th. On Monday, 15th, visited Yeovil, and was very kindly received by the Rev. W. W. Robinson, the worthy curate of that place. The meeting was well attended, many highly respectable persons occupied the platform. Mr. Robinson took the chair, and gave an address, and at the close of my speech some signatures were taken. The temperance society in Yeovil numbers many hundreds. There is a blacksmith's shop where thirteen hands are employed, most of whom were drunkards, but, with one exception, all are now staunch teetotalers.

Tuesday, 16th.—Attended a festival and public-meeting in the town-hall, Wincanton—the hall was well filled with an attentive audience.

Wednesday, 17th.—A tea meeting at Zeals, near Mere, attended by a goodly number from the surrounding villages and the Mere Band; the meeting took place in the Independent Chapel, and was a most excellent one. Mr. Smith (a member of the chapel, and formerly a great opponent to temperance societies) occupied the chair, and most ably set forth the claims of the good cause; your agent followed, and was cheered by receiving at the close the signatures of several members of the chapel. One is a respectable farmer in the village—nearly all the members of the chapel are teetotalers.

I left this interesting village and went to Gillingham, on Thursday 18th. The meeting was held in the temperance hall, a neat stone building, with a gallery. The hall is capable of containing about five hundred persons; there are about 400 pledged members in the village. The meeting was a good one, Edward Neave, Esq., in the chair. After a lengthened address some signatures were taken.

Friday, 18th.—A good meeting in the town hall, Shaftesbury, Mr. G. E. Norton in the chair. The friends are exceedingly active here, meetings are held in different parts of the town, attended by local advocates.

Saturday, 20th.—Returned to Zeals, held a meeting in the chapel.

Monday and Tuesday.—Gave lectures in the Wesleyan school room, Castle Cary—some few joined the society. Although many drunkards have been reclaimed in this town, and each Sabbath school has received accessions from their families; yet the temperance society meets with much opposition from the religious bodies. As a proof, I have only to mention that the Wesleyans appointed meetings for each of the evenings of my lectures, and prevented many attending the temperance meetings.

Wednesday, 24th.—Walked to South Petherton, the only place to be obtained was a cider mill, fitted up by a gentleman very favourable to the cause. Long before the time of meeting the room was crowded by a mixed audience, some of which were highly respectable persons. On the platform was a gentleman residing in the neighbourhood, a member of the temperance society, who kindly presided, and opened the meeting by a well-timed and judicious address; your agent followed in a speech of nearly two hours, at the close of which, Frederick Gale, Esq., gentleman, was the first to sign the pledge—numbers followed. I received the thanks of the audience and retired with Mr. Gale, who kindly took me to his hospitable mansion for the night. Twenty had signed when I left the meeting, and I have since heard that a society is formed and likely to go on well.

The next day, Thursday 25th, Mr. Gale took me in his chaise to Street, near Glastonbury, and was very active in visiting and inviting many persons whom he knew to attend the meeting, which was held in the British school room. Mr. James Clarke in the chair. My address was listened to with marked attention.

Friday, 26th.—On my way to Wells, distributed tracts and visited several houses, conversing with the people; the meeting in the evening was well attended, and such a number of reclaimed drunkards on the platform as I never before witnessed. A good man, (who has been for some years blind) a member of the Wesleyan body took the chair, and pleaded, with much earnestness, the claims of the intemperate. I followed with a lengthened address, in which I took my farewell of the county. I would remark in conclusion, that the cause is in a most healthy state in Somerset—vast numbers of the pious and good are amongst its most active members. The number of reclaimed inebriates is very great; very many are members of churches of various denominations. Many of the temperance coffee-houses are clean and well conducted—and one thing much to be admired, is the union and good feeling among teetotalers themselves; this, in my opinion, has tended much towards the success of the cause in the association.

HAMPSHIRE.

Report of A. W. HERITAGE.—Missionary Agent of the National Temperance Society.

While proceeding to Newtontonney, in Wiltshire, I saw a number of men, near Stockbridge, endeavouring to remove a quantity of timber lying by the road-side, but all of them in such a state of intoxication as to be quite unable to attend to their work; and upon inquiry, I found that their inability to do so arose entirely from the beer allowed by their employers to impair strength. When will masters learn wisdom? With one of the individuals I had a long conversation, gave him a few tracts, and upon our parting he promised to practice abstinence for a month, giving me at the same time his address in order that I might pay him a visit.

After delivering a lecture in a farm-house, at a village about 10 miles from Salisbury, a decent looking man introduced himself to my notice, remarking that he had been induced to become a teetotaler through hearing me on a former occasion; that he was now a reclaimed character, and in order to testify his gratitude and serve the cause, he purchased a small quantity of your tracts for gratuitous circulation. What a pleasing change! Could the benevolent and wealthy but witness these scenes, we should hear no more of temperance societies being inefficiently supported.

While delivering a lecture at Newbury, a market town in Berkshire, two persons, at the close of the meeting, publicly declared their intention to abandon the use of those drinks which had well nigh proved their ruin; one of them remarking that he was in a public-house that evening, and hearing the bellman announce the temperance meeting, he at once determined upon attending. Surely our Newbury friends will see the importance of being instant in season and out of season. The society in this important town has lately been re-organised, and owes much of its present prosperity to the indefatigable labours of its secretary, Mr. Ward.

One pleasing feature of the state of public feeling in the agricultural districts, should be kept in view, viz., the almost general impression that hard work can be performed without intoxicating drinks. As an illustration of the above statement, I may remark that at the close of a public meeting, held at the Baptist Chapel, Winchester, a hard working wheelwright remarked, That although not a teetotaler himself he must admit that he could do more work and with greater ease, without any thing of an intoxicating nature. And this is by no means a solitary case; although with such unsolicited testimonials from practical labourers, a Hampshire paper some time since assured its readers, that it was "absolute nonsense for men to think of performing hard work without malt liquor."

Since my last report I have visited Sambourne, Broughton, Quarley, Ludgershall, Boscomb, Longparish, Bourne, Fareham, Bishopstoke, and Hursley; visiting in the above places, 427 houses, gave away 322 tracts, and obtained 11 signatures.

In addition to the above, being on a visit at the house of a friend, at Kensington, for two or three days, I took part in a public meeting at the Temperance Hall, Broadway, Westminster. And also delivered a lecture at the Temperance Hall, Silver-street, Kensington, the Rev. F. Wills presided, and one intemperate lawyer, whom I had known for many years in the country, attended, and signed the pledge. On Wednesday, December 3, I attended a festival in the Town Hall, Romsey, Hants. The meeting was addressed by J. Toones, Esq. Revs. J. Farmer, Hartley, Brewer, and your agent, three signatures. One very pleasing fact was stated during the evening's proceedings, viz., That in the comparatively small town of Romsey, the society numbered upwards of forty reclaimed drunkards. Let this fact ring in the ears of our opponents. And let the men, labouring by their pens to prove that "teetotalism is unscriptural and injurious," behold this practical refutation of their theory.

Weekly and fortnightly.

On December 29th, 1845, the ANNIVERSARY MEETING was held in the Victoria Hall, a large and commodious place; the company who took tea and attended the meeting was numerous and respectable; one of the long tables was occupied by reformed characters and their wives, whose countenances now beamed with delight, but who formerly belonged to the number who spent their "money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which doth not profit;" but reclaimed from vicious habits by the temperance pledge, they are now ornaments to civil and religious society. Mr. Benson read the financial report, and the missionary the special and statistical report, which appeared to give great satisfaction to the audience and friends. The meeting was subsequently addressed by the Rev. W. Wight, B. A., F. Hopwood, Esq., Rev. D. Browning, and W. H. Buchanan. Thanks were voted to the chairman, C. Walters, Esq., and to the missionary. At the close several of the working classes handed in their names, and promised subscriptions to the Temperance Town Mission for the ensuing year. Whilst wishing at all times to say as little as possible about himself, the missionary cannot avoid, in justice to the excellent ladies, who originated and still maintain this association, his best thanks for their urbanity, and readiness at all times during the past year, to afford every facility for carrying on the "Glorious Temperance Reformation." Perhaps no town, except the metropolis, has been so well supplied with useful information, so far as the London and Ipswich series of tracts and other tracts could afford it. I give also, as is my bounden duty, thanks to the Giver of all good, for his Fatherly care, and for the success which has attended my humble labours through the past year, and anxious whilst I live to promote the glory of God, and the happiness of my fellow-men, I would remember, "that Paul may plant and Apollus may water, but it is God who giveth the increase."

CORNWALL.

I have concluded five consecutive (quarterly) engagements in this association, with pleasure to myself, and I trust satisfaction to the various societies; during my engagements I have been in labours abundant, and I am happy in reporting that my efforts have not been in vain. The meetings I have had the pleasure of attending during the past two months have been among the best, whilst labouring in this association. At St. Just or Land's End, the very extremity of the kingdom, a first-rate festival was held in November. The report stated, that more than 2000 teetotalers existed in the parish, and that out of 2500 members in the Wesleyan Society, in that circuit, nearly 1800 were pledged to total abstinence principles.

Truro.—The meetings are of the most interesting character, whilst Hayle celebrated the parish feast by teetotal doings, that will not easily be forgotten. Saturday evening, Sunday afternoon, and during the day of Monday, the 24th and 25th of November, large meetings were held, and attended with the best of results. Other societies are also progressing. The association is about to be re-organized, and it is the intention of the moral reformers of the county to carry out the principles of the temperance movement with renewed vigour. I may here express my thanks for the many instances of kindness manifested toward me by Cornish friends; and on leaving the association, it is not without a wish that they may be still more successful in their endeavours to spread the principles of temperance. W. G. PEACE.

SUFFOLK TEMPERANCE UNION.

I commenced my labours in this Union, on Tuesday the 9th ult., and have lectured three times at Ipswich, twice at Bury, and Sudbury, and once at each of the following places, viz., Bildestone, Lavenham, Harwich, Walton, Woodbridge, Blakenham, Yoxford, Southwold, Wrentham, Lowestoft, Gorleston, Beccles, Bungay and Debenham.

I am truly glad to state that all these meetings have been of an encouraging character, and some of them particularly so. At our second meeting at Ipswich, R. D. Alexander, Esq. presided, he received a most cordial reception from a large and respectable assembly, which he addressed for a short time, expressing his pleasure at once more meeting them, and his regret that the delicate state of his health prohibited him from doing so as often as he could wish; he publicly denied the truth of a report that he had taken intoxicating liquor as a medicine, and declared his firm and unaltered adherence to the principles of the society.

At Beccles the cause is progressing steadily; at Bury, Sudbury, Bildestone, Southwold, Wrentham and Bungay, the meetings have been of a most cheering description. At Gorleston we had the company of that steady friend of temperance E. F. Church of Yarmouth, who addressed a few friends assembled in the British School, amidst the pelting of a pitiless storm. I am happy to state that the Suffolk Temperance Union is in a good, healthy, working condition, and that I have everywhere met with a most kind hospitable reception from our friends, for which I beg to return my sincere thanks.

M. W. CRAWFORD.

TEMPERANCE IN HONOLULU, SANDWICH ISLES.

"All ships of war visiting this port, will bear witness to the general hospitality that prevails, so far as the means of the inhabitants will allow, and even further. This virtue extends to the missionary families, to whose quiet, orderly tea-parties, all strangers are welcome, who show any desire to cultivate their acquaintance. There are few towns of the same extent, where religious feeling more prevails, and certainly, none where more decency and order are preserved on the Sabbath. Another virtue peculiarly pervades the society of Honolulu, and that is, TEMPERANCE; during eight months that I have been here, I have not seen one native intoxicated, and not one beggar."—Simmonds' Colonial Magazine.

Chronicle and Recorder.

LONDON: FEBRUARY 1ST, 1846.

All communications for the MARCH No. of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER, should be forwarded by the 15th of the present month, addressed to the Editors, 39, Moorgate Street, London; and, if articles of intelligence, must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer.

We perceive, with much pleasure, that a somewhat extensive agitation has commenced in reference to the destruction of grain in the manufacture of strong drink. The subject is one of intense moment to the temporal affairs of the people. No person can impartially sit down and read the startling facts concerning the waste of the precious grain, by its conversion into what are at best unnecessary articles of diet, without coming to the firm conclusion, that such a course of procedure is most heartless towards our suffering fellow-men, and must be displeasing in the eyes of Him, who sendeth his gifts, that the wants of every living thing may be supplied. The attempt at a general petitioning of parliament upon the subject would we think interfere with the Sunday traffic agitation; but we would suggest the following means as the most effective to be pursued.

1st, The holding of public meetings for the express purpose of attracting attention to the question.

2nd, The circulation of tracts and pamphlets exposing the true nature of the case.

3rd, The insertion of articles in the daily and weekly London and provincial newspapers; also in the monthly magazines, religious and secular. Surely no Editor will dare to refuse admission to statements bearing so intimately upon the welfare of millions.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE WORLD'S CONVENTION

are still in progress. A large number of circulars to private gentlemen, and to the principal societies of Great Britain have been issued.

The Temperance Union of the UNITED STATES, the CANADA Temperance Union, the BRITISH ASSOCIATION of England, and the SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE are all warmly interested in the movement, and intend giving it their energetic support.

The committees of Unions and Associations are respectfully desired to superintend the appointment of delegates from their respective branches; and the Committee of each society, to whom a circular has been sent, are also urgently requested to lose no time in acquiring all the information in their power as to the condition of the cause in their several localities. In order to facilitate this object, schedules have been sent to all the post towns of the kingdom, and premiums of 10s. £1 and £2 have been offered for the most complete returns.

Our contemporary, the Scottish Temperance Review, in a valuable article on the WORLD'S CONVENTION, remarks:—

“We hail such a project, as presenting a valuable opportunity for the accomplishment of much good; and we call upon the friends of the temperance cause everywhere, to lose no time in accumulating information, and in devising schemes, so as to render this meeting one of the most successful temperance gatherings ever held. Let our English and Irish associates set seriously about the work of investigation. So far as practicable, let intelligence on this question be obtained from every country of the world. Let the various associations consider well, what schemes of an extensive kind might be introduced to the notice of the Convention. Let them send to London at the appointed time, men who are in earnest, and who know what they are about; let these men meet and speak as the importance of the subject demands, and the gathering cannot fail to be triumphantly successful.”

PARLIAMENT has met one month earlier than usual, and business of the most absorbing interest is now under its consideration.

We would therefore advise, that the parliamentary agitation of the Abolition of the Sunday Traffic in Strong Drink, be deferred till the middle of March, when the Members of the Legislature may be more at liberty to direct their attention to it.

We would also strongly and warmly recommend that no more delay will take place in the general and universal agitation of this question among the people. If teetotalers at all feel the importance of this subject, they will arise as one man, and use their utmost and undivided efforts against this enormous evil

According to an agreement with the BRITISH ASSOCIATION, we have undertaken the getting up of petitions for London, and have, up to this date, distributed to the various societies 80 petitions to the House of Lords, and 80 to the Commons—160 in all.

We again announce that every society, and every Christian Church, in the Metropolis and surrounding districts can have two petitions [gratis], on application at this Office; and we again repeat our hope, that the petitions for London will be sent to Parliament, carrying NOT FEWER THAN 200,000 SIGNATURES. The names and addresses of the Members who have consented to present these petitions, and the time when they had better be forwarded, we propose giving next month.

We are also glad to perceive, that the Committee of the BRITISH ASSOCIATION are preparing a memorial to the Queen, to be signed only by the Women of England, who, we confidently hope will acquit themselves most manfully of their duty.

The following Instructions will be found most useful.

INSTRUCTIONS.

As there will be only one memorial presented to the Queen, which will be prepared at York, it is only necessary for you to procure sheets of foolscap paper, measuring 16 inches in width; attach the printed copy to it, and obtain as many signatures as possible, and when completed, forward them post paid to 3, Low Ousegate, York. The sheets should be ruled in four equal divisions, and as the signatures are obtained, they should be placed across the columns, so that, if not entirely filled up, the blank paper may be cut off. The sheets should be kept clean and forwarded to 3, Low Ousegate, as early as possible, but not later than the end of March.

Name of Town written at the head of the first Sheet.

Jane Simpson. | Mary Jackson.

* The Sheet to be 16 inches wide.

GRATUITOUS CIRCULATION.

Having stated so fully in our last number, the circumstances under which we appealed for donations to the Gratuitous Circulation Fund of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER, we deem it needless to say more at the present time upon the same subject. We shall simply give a list of subscriptions received since our last appeal, in the hope, that the examples thus presented, may excite a magnetic influence upon our readers.

TEMPERANCE ADVERTISING.

In order to impress more forcibly upon the minds of our readers, the importance of the plan of Temperance Advertising, we present a tabular statement of the names and circulation of the religious periodicals in which advertisements were inserted from October to December, 1845, inclusive, together with the expenditure thereby involved.

PERIODICAL.	Circulation.	No. of insertions.	Price.
The Christian Witness.....	35,000	3	£16 12
„ Baptist Magazine	5,000	1	1 15
„ Church of England Mag.	10,000	1	4 10
„ Evangelical Magazine..	16,000	2	9 10
„ Continental Echo	3,000	2	3- 0
„ New Connexion Mag.	2,200	2	2 10
„ Local Preacher's Mag.	700	1	1 0
„ Patriot	2,600	1	0 5
„ Wesleyan	3,000	1	gratis.
	77,500	14	£39 2

By multiplying the circulation of the respective periodicals by the number of insertions, it will be seen that 168,700 copies of temperance articles have thus been distributed among Christians of various denominations, at a cost of only £39 2s.

Independent of postage and trouble of distribution, tracts of all sizes to that amount, at an average of 8d. per 100, would have cost £56; and could not have been introduced into the families where these advertisements have entered.

A tract is generally seen by only one or two persons; while each advertisement was probably read by not less than five persons, which calculation will give the enormous number of EIGHT HUNDRED AND FORTY-THREE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED individuals who have thus had the subject of temperance brought under their immediate attention.

This one fact is surely sufficient to induce all the well-wishers of the temperance cause, to subscribe, according to their ability, to the furtherance of this most important object.

Subscriptions previously announced . . . £58 15s.

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

J. R. WILSON'S REPORT.

On the 17th December, I met the Committee of the North Shields Society, who, after hearing my statements in regard to the re-organization of societies, came to a resolution to bring the subject before a public meeting of the members, at which I was invited to attend. The society has existed since the year 1837, and at present numbers about 1000 members, with 250 juveniles. The population of the borough of Tynemouth, of which North Shields constitutes the chief part, is about 30,000. Dr. Grindrod's late lectures have added to the number of their members.

On the 19th December, I attended a meeting of the committee of the Hexham Temperance Society, very appropriately held at the office of the Savings' Bank, the secretary of the society being the actuary of that institution. A unanimous resolution was come to in regard to the adoption of the proposed organization; and arrangements were made for bringing the subject before the members. The population is above 6000, including the vicinity. The number of members is about 150. There are several villages within ten miles where flourishing societies exist; and the friends are determined to extend to each of these places the system recommended.

An Anti-Tobacco Society has for some time existed in this town, and has many zealous advocates, who conceive that the use of this noxious weed, either in chewing, smoking, or snuffing, is a species of intoxication, and that it leads to drinking, and should therefore be discouraged. I am expecting to visit this town again at their approaching anniversary.

On the 24th December, I addressed a public-meeting of the friends of temperance at Sunderland; at the close of which, a general expression of approbation was elicited, and I have since received an invitation to attend the anniversary of their society, to be held on the 13th January, when I hope to introduce the proposed organization.

On the 30th December, the annual meeting in connexion with the Newcastle teetotal society was held; and the festival occupied four evenings. The report stated that the society had been favoured with the assistance of Drs. Lees and Grindrod; also, that an admirable sermon had been preached by one of the clergy in the town, who likewise attended the anniversary of the Ladies' Branch Society, together with F. Hopwood, Esq. of York.

The Treasurer's account shewed a balance in favour of the society of £26 4s. 7d., the remains of the proceeds of a Bazaar lately held in the town, and which was very productive. I was permitted to address the meeting, and confined myself chiefly to the circumstances which had led to my conversion to the temperance cause, and my subsequent devotion to the work of itinerating on behalf of the National Temperance Society, reserving the subject of the improved organization to a subsequent meeting of the members, expressly called to consider the subject and hear my details. This meeting was held on the 2nd January, when I had an opportunity of developing the entire scheme of organization, and the advantages of its adoption and operation. The strongest expression of entire approbation of the plans proposed was made by the president, a member of the Society of Friends, who, with some of the leading officers of the society, expressed their determination of carrying out the plans in the town and the populous colliery districts in the vicinity. The new manual for the formation of the societies, together with specimens of the series of loan tracts, the collecting and pledge-book, tickets of membership, &c., were exhibited and approved; and an order for a large supply will shortly be forwarded to London. One of the speakers observed, that if no other benefit had resulted from the proposed organization, the arrangement of the National Temperance Society's tracts, with others on the loan form, had conferred a boon on the friends of temperance, which had long been anxiously desired, and for the want of which, the efforts of provincial societies had been greatly cramped.

From the Durham Society I have received an invitation to attend their approaching anniversary; and when I have completed my work in these northern parts, I purpose proceeding southward, as fast as the nature of my mission will admit of.

Hitherto I have met with every encouragement, and a general disposition has been shown to co-operate with the National Society; the truly catholic and disinterested principles of which, recommend themselves to the approval and respect of all parties, who are engaged in promoting the great Temperance Reformation in the land. The TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE, in its improved form, has been introduced into nearly twenty different societies, in these parts, and will probably be regularly taken in by the leading members of these societies, or presented to the devoted loan tract distributors to encourage them in their praiseworthy labours.

On the 13th inst., I attended the anniversary meeting of the Sunderland Temperance Society, held in the Tabernacle, which was crowded. Three of the ministers in the town spoke on the occasion, and a very delightful feeling seemed to pervade the assembly.

On the subsequent evening I met the Committee, when they unanimously agreed to the re-organization of the society, under the designation of an Association to the National Temperance Society; and a highly respectable member of the Society of Friends was appointed as corresponding member, and another, of the same denomination, has accepted the office of President, (Edward Backhouse, jun., Esq.) Immediate steps are to be taken to form Branch Societies in the various parts of this populous borough, the inhabitants of which, with the Wearmouths, exceed 50,000. I was requested to convey the cordial thanks of the society to the National Temperance Society, for the services rendered to them by the late meetings, &c. I hope to report similar results of my labours in other towns in the north, which I am preparing to re-visit.

FLINTSHIRE.

REV. EVAN DAVIES.—Missionary Agent of the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

During the last fortnight, I have had much to do besides my usual ministerial labour. On the first day of the year, we had a crowded meeting of different denominations, at the old Presbyterian Chapel, Newmarket.

On the second day, I delivered a lecture at Salem Chapel, Liverpool, in Welch, which was well attended, and some signed the pledge.

The congregational church Gurtside-street, Manchester, being now without a stated minister, I am engaged to supply their pulpit for January, and am to deliver five lectures on total abstinence in various parts of the town, chiefly among the Welch people.

Three lectures have been already delivered, which I humbly hope have done good, some have signed the pledge, and old friends of temperance were greatly encouraged.

Before the beginning of this great reformation, many of the Welch living in England were awfully degraded and injured by drunkenness, now, through the temperance society in Shrewsbury, Liverpool, Manchester, and London, the Welch are among the most sober and industrious people.

There are eight places of worship for the Welch in Manchester, eighteen or twenty in Liverpool, most of them are large and well attended, as well as respectably supported in general.

Many of the most active and useful members, were once slaves to drink.

A THRIFTY VILLAGE.

The beautiful village of Housatonic, Massachusetts, containing about three hundred inhabitants, and several manufactories, has every appearance of prosperity and thrift. The dwelling houses are nearly all painted white, mostly new, and every thing has an extremely neat appearance, denoting enterprise and comfort. The secret of all this is said to be, that there is no tavern or grog-shop in the place.

The Districts are visited alternately one week in each month.—SUPERINTENDENT.

METROPOLITAN MISSIONS.

From December 1st, 1845, to January 1st, 1846.

DISTRICT No. I.—A teetotaler has a son now only 19, who was formerly employed as a labourer in the Docks at Liverpool, where he had free access to all kinds of spirituous liquors, of which he drank till he went mad, and was confined in a lunatic asylum. Recovering his reason, he came to London; he was now about to return to Liverpool. The missionary strongly advised him to sign before he left; he at length, somewhat reluctantly, consented. The missionary supplied him with tracts to read on his journey, with which he seemed pleased.

DISTRICT No. II.—W. L., a great drunkard, in giving an outline of his history, said, the first time he was intoxicated was on the general fast-day for the cholera, several years since. He and others with him went to a public-house to pass away the time. From that period he had not been sober a week together; has been locked up in the station-house, brought before the magistrates and imprisoned, narrowly escaping severe punishment; he once became a teetotaler, and a regular attendant at a place of worship, but fell again, and at the time of the missionary's visit, he had not a halfpenny in his pocket, and almost everything in pledge. His wife was also a drunkard; they both signed. They have been visited several times and found firm.

DISTRICT No. III.—Visited a lodging-house and obtained six signatures, four young men and two young women, from 17 to 21 years of age.

J. S. WARREN.

DISTRICT No. VI.—On revisiting a reclaimed drunkard, learned that he had joined a Christian Church since he became a teetotaler, which step, under God, he attributed to the visits of the missionary.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

DISTRICT No. X.—Early one morning as the missionary was coming over London Bridge, he observed a soldier deliberately walking down the steps leading to the river till he had reached the last; the missionary ran down, and taking hold of his arm, asked him if he knew where he was going. "Yes," he said, "to the City Road." He said he had been out all night drinking. The missionary conducted him into the right way; and on leaving him, he signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XI.—J. C., a tailor, was dragged by his three brother drunkards out of a public-house by the hair of his head. The missionary providentially passing at the time, extricated him from their grasp. The missionary with much difficulty conducted him home; he signed the pledge, his son, wife, and daughter following. He has been visited since, and remains firm. The last time he was making a coat for himself, with money, he said, saved from the gin-palace.

DISTRICT No. XII.—M. S., a single man, a lodger, was seated by the grate, (containing a handful of fire) and smoking a short black pipe. The room contained articles of broken furniture, and looked neglected and dirty. He said he had been a great drunkard; he took the pledge of Father Mathew, but had broken it. "Since that," he said, "I have cared for nothing but the means of obtaining drink." He signed.

W. STONEMAN.

DISTRICT No. XIII.—On entering the room of a drunkard, he said, "I have been doing very wrong, and am now suffering for my folly; I have pawned or sold all my things, and am truly unhappy."

The missionary advised him to sign the pledge. Both he and his wife signed. They have been visited several times; both stand firm, and are recovering themselves apace.

DISTRICT No. XIV.—"I have been a teetotaler seven years," said a corn porter, "and my wife can testify to the improvement in my health, and in our circumstances." "That I can," she replied, with joy beaming in her countenance; "he gives me," she continued, "18s. out of 19s. he receives for wages, and the 1s. he now lays out in useful things for himself." The man shewed the missionary a New Testament he had purchased. They now both attend a place of worship.

DISTRICT No. XV.—"I think we had all better sign while the pledge-book is here," said a labourer on the coal wharf, "and let us be a teetotal gang." "After Christmas," said another. You had better sign now, and instead of spending your money in beer, have a good plum-pudding at Christmas, replied the missionary. "You are quite right, sir," rejoined the first man, "I will sign, come on." He signed, and four others followed. The foreman said he was trying the principle.

DISTRICT No. XVI.—INCIDENTAL LABOURS.—At the request of the prisoners and by the direction of the superintendent, the missionary gave a lecture on physiology in the Debtors' Prison, White Cross Street. All listened with deep attention, and invited the missionary to come again.

J. H. DONALDSON.

DISTRICT No. XVII.—In a lodging-house lay a man on a flock mattress on the floor, ill, and in want; the man and his wife both signed the pledge. The missionary then read a portion of Scripture and prayed with them, and recommended the case to a benevolent society.

DISTRICT No. XIX.—SUNDAY LABOURS.—Visited Sutherland, Marlborough, and Hanover Chapel Sunday Schools and gave tracts.

A father, and son (thirteen years of age) both signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XX.—INCIDENTAL LABOURS.—Accompanied missionary No. VI to Pye Street Day-school, and gave an address; visited and distributed tracts at the following places:—a gas factory, White Cross Street Prison, and Newgate and Leadenhall markets, by direction of the superintendent, and attended the following meetings:—the first, in the School-room, Kentish Town, the Rev. F. C. Vardy in the chair. It is hoped that a Committee will be soon formed, and a Society established under the sanction of the excellent minister of the adjoining chapel. The second meeting was held at Enon Chapel, Church Street, Portman Market, the Rev. Jabez Burns took the chair, when the meeting was addressed by six of the missionaries.

RICHARD HODGSON.

DISTRICT No. XXI.—J. B., a sailor, aged forty-two, went to sea at the age of ten, became a drunkard at eleven, and so continued till visited by the missionary. He has a pension of £3. 5s. per quarter, which is all spent in drink. He thought to be a teetotaler would kill him. At length he ventured, and signed the pledge. Subsequent visits have found him alive and firm.

DISTRICT No. XXII.—E. H., a costermonger, has been a great drunkard. Having tried teetotalism three months, and finding himself happier in mind, and better in health, he signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XXIII.—M. C., a labourer, a drunkard, spends his time and money at the public-house. The missionary called on the Sunday morning when he signed the pledge, and was followed by his son, nine years old. The wife expressed her thanks to the missionary, but declined signing.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

Addressed a meeting (in company with other missionaries) at Enon Chapel, Paddington.

FRANCIS COLLINS.

DISTRICT No. XXV.—S. B., aged seventeen, an unfortunate female, was recommended to the missionary as a fit object for him to get into an asylum. She said that drink was the thing that enabled her to proceed in her evil course; she signed the pledge.

The missionary is exerting himself to procure her admission into some house of reform.

DISTRICT No. XXVIII.—D. B., a drunken gentleman's servant, received warning to leave. He was advised by a friend to sign the pledge. He did so, and informed his master, who then agreed to continue him in his service.

M. B., a poor woman, accompanied by her daughter, thirteen years of age, came to the missionary in great distress. She said, that her eldest daughter, through her drinking habits, had become a most depraved character; and that having to go out to work to maintain her family, she (the mother) was in constant fear that the elder sister would lead the younger into a similar wicked course of life.

The mother and daughter signed the pledge, and the missionary promised to get the latter into an asylum.

The missionary made the case known at the Female Refuge, where she was admitted; and if she conducts herself with propriety, will remain for two years.

JAMES BALFOUR.

DISTRICT No. XXXIII.—S. B., a widow and a mother, with three children, was in a state of intoxication, seated on a chair, with her head leaning against the mantel-piece. The eldest child, a girl of fourteen, said to the missionary, "I will sign the pledge, to see what influence it will have on my poor mother." She signed.

The mother refused to sign, but the daughter earnestly requested the missionary to call again.

Spoke to three young men at the door of a gin-shop, all more or less intoxicated. One acknowledged that his wife and family were in want, while he was out, begging treats of his old companions. The missionary shewed that these treats were very expensive ones: for every glass given him now, he would have to return three or four when he got into work. He confessed this was true. They all three signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XXXIV.—Visited G. H., a master sweep, who with his wife have signed the pledge, and are become members of a Christian church. Their apprentice also had adopted the principle, and joined a Christian church. He now signed.

DISTRICT No. XXXV.—J. H., a grocer, had a good business; but gradually imbibing a love for liquors, he became a drunkard. His wife followed. Business was neglected, tradesmen refused him credit, and his shop was nearly empty. He was on the brink of ruin, when both became abstainers; and things are fast improving, both in the shop and in the house.

DISTRICT No. XXXVI.—E. H., a woman forty years of age, occupying a back room at 2s. per week, not many years since kept her carriage and a regular establishment of servants; but through drink has been quite impoverished. She signed the pledge.

W. D., with three others, signed the pledge three weeks since; at which time he had no coat, and was nearly starving. The missionary asked, "If it was all right?" "Yes," he said, "and I mean to keep the pledge. I have bought this new coat with my teetotal money." The other three were getting on well, though not able yet to show "new coats."

STREET LABOURS.

N. and E. R., two women, who have kept their pledge faithfully for two months, expressed their thankfulness to the missionary for having persuaded them to give up the drink. "See, sir," said both of them at once, "what we have gained by it already! When you first called, we had not (as you know, sir) an article of clothing worth sixpence; now you see we have these two trunks full of good clothes, and shall soon be able to get some furniture." Their aged father, uniting with them, said, that "he could not be sufficiently thankful to God for the comfort they now enjoyed."

WILLIAM CLARIDGE.

DISTRICT No. XXXVII.—"Drink has been a source of great uneasiness to me," said a cab proprietor, who was himself quite drunkard; "for my man has frequently got into trouble; and, as far as I can recollect, all the accidents which have happened have occurred through drink; and I have had to pay the fines which have been imposed, in order that I might redeem my property. But now he is a teetotaler, I can let my cabs go out, and have no fear but they will return safe." The cab proprietor, notwithstanding, declined becoming a teetotaler himself. Another had become a proprietor through teetotalism, which he had now practised for more than five years.

At the meeting in Lamb and Flag Court, the visiting surgeon for the out-door poor said, that "he rejoiced in the attempt which the National Temperance Society were making to establish a society in this place; and that he would do all he could, both by his presence and his purse, to assist, rather than the meetings should be given up. From the ample means afforded him of ascertaining the fact, he was convinced that intemperance is the cause of far the greatest part of the misery which he witnesses in his visits among the poor."

Thirty Years' Testimony.—Mr. Petch, at the conclusion of the religious services, said, that after thirty years' experience, and of active labour for the moral and spiritual welfare of the poor, he found that they could not be benefited permanently, till they adopted teetotalism. And he would for the future put a mark against the names of those whom he saw intoxicated; and would not relieve such persons till they signed and faithfully kept the pledge.

A Christmas dinner of roast beef and plum pudding was provided for the children (80) in this school. The superintendent made the feast strictly teetotal:—no beer was given to the children.

DISTRICT No. XXXVIII.—The master of George Street School is favourable to the principle, as also are the masters of three private schools. The master of the British School in Perry Street kindly offered to assist in the formation of a society.

JOHN WILLIAMSON.

SOMERSET.

BRISTOL CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL.

(From the Bristol Mercury.)

The above society held a tea-party in celebration of their Christmas festival, on Monday, December 29th, at the Public-rooms, Broadmead. Members and friends, to the number of about 700, partook of "the cup that cheers but not inebriates;" and, in order to demonstrate that teetotalers can do without the brewers' barn, the bread provided for the occasion was unfermented. The room was decorated in a tasteful manner with flags and evergreens.

The tea being over, SAMUEL BOWLY, Esq., of Gloucester, was called to the chair, who opened the business of the evening by calling on ROBERT CHARLTON, Esq., to read the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN, at the conclusion of the report rose, and after some preliminary observations, proceeded to call attention to the magnitude of the temperance movement in comparison with many other great questions which had agitated the public mind; the cause of slavery—the reform bill—the subject of education—and the abolition of the corn laws. Let them look at it in a commercial point of view; a friend of his had ascertained, a few years ago, that in the town of Sheffield £400,000 per annum were diverted from useful channels, and spent on these drinks. Many men there, were earning £4 or £5 per week, and yet their families were starving. Thus high wages, which should prove a blessing, was turned into a curse. He understood they had many valuable charities in this city, the Colston societies amongst others, and that on certain occasions a number of gentlemen met together, whether for the dinner or for the charity it was not for him to say (laughter); they subscribed a few hundreds, but what was this small amount to that which was recklessly wasted in this city on strong drink, the cause of much of the poverty they attempted to relieve. Facts went to prove that nothing short of the measure they recommended would be effectual. The Vicar of Banwell, who had presided in that room at the last festival, had made it a point to inquire of all the clergymen who had visited him, if they were aware of any case of the reformation of a drunkard by their admonitions, but in no instance had such a case come to their knowledge; ministers of other denominations bore the same testimony, yet by means of this society many thousands had been rescued from degradation. The chairman then dwelt upon the evils arising from the numerous beer-shops, stating several facts to show their tendency to demoralise the population, and commented in strong terms on the misdirected efforts to punish crime in the expensive machinery of police, sessions, and prisons, when the gentlemen who had the management in the various counties and towns might by their influence and example do much that was necessary to prevent and remove the great cause of this mischief. Mr. Bowly then adverted to efforts he had made as a chairman and director on railway boards to promote total abstinence amongst the persons employed; he attributed some of the fearful accidents which had occurred mainly to the intemperance of engine-drivers and others, and stated facts in proof thereof. Having urged the general adoption of total abstinence, he concluded his effective statement amidst long continued applause.

The Rev. THOMAS NEWTON of Worle, then addressed the assembly; especially urging the young to abstain; let them not say they were safe, when so many had failed. Mr. Newton concluded his eloquent address by expressing his belief that intemperance would, at no distant day, be driven from this country.

Mr. JOHN ANDREW, county agent, in a very effective manner, narrated several illustrations of the excellence of the total abstinence system, dwelling at some extent on the pecuniary bearings of the subject; he also made some important statements as to the extent to which intemperance prevails in some of the agricultural districts.

Mr. THOMAS SECCOMB then addressed the meeting. He stated that he had been for 19 years connected with extensive iron-works. They had, at one time, been much inconvenienced by the intemperate habits of their workmen, though he was happy to say this was not the case now. For many years it had been their practice to pay their men on Friday, for their convenience in making purchases for their houses, but many of the men immediately they received their wages used to go off to the next market-town, spend a considerable sum in drink, and often did not return to their work on the next day; meanwhile their fires were burning to waste, to the injury of their employers. Mr. S. then mentioned the cases of several men who had ruined their constitutions at an early age by excessive drinking. He frequently met their men leaving the beer-houses on a Sunday, at the time of divine service, unwashed, and in their working clothes; many of them were receiving a large amount of wages. They at length got a gentleman to lecture to the workmen; he showed them there was nothing in the drinks they used that would promote strength, and that due nourishment could only be supplied by a sufficiency of meat and other food. Since that time a great change had taken place, and he had been highly gratified to observe their altered conduct; they now took home their money to their wives, and were surrounded by a variety of comforts. Many of those men, once so immoral and disorderly, may now be seen in decent attire, attending a place of worship on the Sunday. They were able to go through their very laborious occupations of iron-founding, hammering, &c., with perfect ease; and yet those very men had told him at former periods that it was utterly impossible to do so. One of the men of whom he had spoken, who had apparently brought himself to the borders of the grave, so completely recovered upon his adopting this system, that he was able to be constantly at work, and the medical men declared that he appeared to have renewed his constitution. He (Mr. S.) would say, "give the hard-working man meat, give him good food, but not the abominable drink." (cheers). He had told them that some of the men obtained good wages; a gentleman of Sheffield had told him of some who could earn £3 or £4 in about three days; now, he said, let them put their money in the savings' bank, so that by-and-by they may make room for others in the labour market, for, as they were aware, the price of labour was regulated by the supply. The statements of Mr. S. were received with great approbation, and he concluded amidst much applause.

Mr. William Gawthorp, agent of the National Temperance Society, next addressed the meeting, communicating a large amount of information. He called the attention of the meeting to the movement in progress for restricting the sale of strong drinks on the Sabbath, and described the salutary effects of the restrictive system in force in the metropolis on that day, compared with what was formerly the case.

Mr. Thomas Hudson of this city, agent of the National Temperance Society, spoke at much length, and his remarks elicited repeated bursts of applause. He stated that the excavators on the Canterbury and Ashford line of railway spent 12s. per week per man, in the purchase of strong drinks; this he gave on the authority of one of the contractors of that line.

At the close of the proceedings, W. D. Wills, Esq., of this city, moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, accompanied by some appropriate remarks, the vote was carried by acclamation, and the meeting separated.

SHEPTON MALET.—On Friday, Dec. 26th, the members and friends of the Temperance Society, held a social tea meeting, in the Argyle Room, which was very tastefully decorated, when 250 persons partook of the refreshments. So great was the anxiety to obtain admittance, that half-a-crown was offered for tickets the price of which was one shilling. After tea, the chair was taken by J. Wason, Esq., President of the Society. Very interesting addresses were given by the Chairman, Rev. H. Solley, A.M., W. Gale, Esq., Mr. Wills, Mr. Norton, and other friends.

At 9 o'clock, the company were regaled with coffee and sandwiches; and about half past ten the meeting concluded.

It is in contemplation to build a Temperance Hall in the town. JOHN PHILLIS.

YEOVIL.—On old Christmas-day, a farewell tea-party, on occasion of the President leaving the town, was held at the Infant School. It would be difficult to give an adequate account of the proceedings, where all passed off beyond our most sanguine expectations. The room was tastefully decorated with evergreens and flowers, and the appropriate banners of the society. The following scripture motto, in large characters, was suspended across the room, near a beautiful crown.—“The Lord watch between thee and us, when we are absent one from another.” Upwards of three hundred and thirty partook of the refreshments provided, and the public meeting was, it is believed, crowded by the largest and most respectable assembly ever congregated within the building. The meeting was addressed by R. Walters, Esq. of Stoke, Mr. Palmer of Milborne Port, the Rev. Owen Owen of Colhampton, John Perry, (who is a remarkable specimen of the excellence of the cause), Henry Tuson, Esq. of Ilchester, Frederick Gales, Esq., M.R.C.S., Rev. E. N. Henning of Long Sutton, and the President, the Rev. W. W. Robinson, who evidently felt much at the prospect of separation from the society, which he had himself established.

The evening was one which will long be remembered in Yeovil, and we trust will subserve the interests of the cause.

LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER.—Lloyd-street Total Abstinence Society.—This society, which is in a vigorous condition, held a meeting on the 15th December, at which a number of members and friends took tea. Rev. William McKerrow, President of the Society, took the chair. Addresses were delivered by a missionary to Old Calabar, and several others.

WARRINGTON.—The annual tea-party was held on the 15th December; about 180 persons were present. E. Robinson, Esq., presided, who drew attention to the very pleasing fact, of a very large increase in the penny-a-week subscription, amounting this year to upwards of £20, nearly twice as much as the preceding year. The chairman also stated, that the number of teetotallers in the neighbourhood was 1300, of whom 300 were reclaimed drunkards. The meeting afforded general satisfaction.—Manchester Guardian, Dec. 17.

BESSES O' TH' BARN TEMPERANCE INSTITUTION.—At the first anniversary of this institution, the chair was taken by the Rev. F. Howarth of Bury (in the unavoidable absence of H. Gaskell, Esq. of Patricroft). The report was read by the secretary, Mr. J. Dickinson. It appears that the institution is carried on mainly by working men; many of whom, till lately, led disorderly lives, but who are now anxious to improve their own condition, and the condition of their neighbours. Day, night, and Sunday schools have been conducted in the rooms; scientific and literary lectures delivered, followed by exhibitions of dissolving views, readings from popular authors, &c. Temperance meetings have been regularly held, and a reading-room established, which has been, for the most part, gratuitously furnished with papers and periodicals. A religious service has been conducted on the Sunday evenings, in which the simple doctrines of the gospel have been taught by preachers of various religious denominations, without reference to sect or party. The sermons for the benefit of the Sunday school were preached by ministers considerably differing in opinion on doctrinal subjects. The institution has had to contend with great difficulties, arising from religious and political prejudices; from the repugnance entertained by many, even in the wealthy classes, to total abstinence principles; and from the poverty of its members. It is to be hoped, however, that the good it has already done will secure it more encouragement. After the report had been adopted, a lecture was delivered by W. B. Carpenter, Esq. M.D. F.R.S. &c. “On the Vegetable Kingdom.” This was illustrated by illuminated and other drawings, and listened to with great attention. A collection was made towards the expenses of the institution.

ROCHDALE TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

We have been making but little progress here of late, but the subject seems to assume a brighter aspect. We have not only paid off £40 of debt, but increased our annual subscriptions from £26. to upwards of £50! We are about to engage the most talented agents in the field, employ a temperance missionary, if we can meet with an active man, circulate temperance periodicals, tracts, &c. Soirée at Messrs. Bright's works On Monday evening, 12th of January, a tea-party was held at Field-house Mills, Rochdale, under the auspices of the Total Abstinence Society, when upwards of six hundred and fifty were present. Jacob Bright, Jun., Esq. in the chair. Interesting and instructive addresses were delivered by the respected chairman, John Bright, Esq., M. P., and W. Logan, town missionary. In the course of the evening, a number of “temperance melodies” were sung by a music class, in connexion with the works. Several pieces were also recited by the young people, a few of which were amusing, and others gave an exposure of the slave system war question, &c. The meeting separated about ten o'clock, highly gratified.

Sabbath School Total Abstinence Tea-party.—On Tuesday evening, 13th January, upwards of three hundred individuals attended a tea-party, in connexion with Providence Sunday School, Rochdale, above 70 of the teachers and scholars have joined the society. The Rev. John Harrison, and Messrs. Brierley, Ball, Barker, Pagan, W. Logan, and others took part in the interesting meeting.

NORFOLK.

A friend has directed that a copy of Dr. Trall's Philosophy of the Temperance Reformation should be sent by post to every clergyman and magistrate of this county at his expense.

YARMOUTH.—According to annual custom, the society held its anniversary on 26th December. As usual, the mayor granted the use of the Town Hall, which was filled to overflowing; indeed, it became necessary to close the doors at an early hour, and numbers were refused entrance for payment. The hilarity of the evening was heightened by the valuable assistance of Miss and Mr. Clarke and family; and Messrs. White and Harris, of the Norwich Choral Society, assisted by Yarmouth vocalists, who, at intervals, sung several pieces of sacred music. After tea, &c., the secretary called the attention of the company to a communication from S. C. Hall, Esq., of Old Brompton, who had kindly consented to preside on the occasion, but was, in consequence of severe indisposition on his return from Manchester, prohibited by his medical adviser from attending; and another from the Rev. T. Clowes, M.A., of Norwich, who had also promised to attend, but was unavoidably absent. The secretary, called on Captain Long to take the chair, who presided over the meeting, which was addressed by Mr. Champion, of Tunbridge Wells, Messrs. Church, Hetcham, and Burch, of Yarmouth, and Mr. James Larner, of Framlingham, who delivered an interesting address, which was listened to with marked attention.

DEVON.

(From the Western Times.)

EXETER.—The annual Christmas Festival of the Temperance Society, was held on Tuesday evening, at the Royal Subscription Rooms. Tea was announced for five o'clock, and before that hour, the room was filled with well-dressed persons of both sexes, and all ages, a large portion of whom were juveniles. Five tables were laid the whole length of the room, and at the bottom was another laid across the breadth; on these a plentiful supply of cake and other eatables were placed. About four hundred persons in the body of the room and on the platform took tea. It was pleasant to see at the meeting so many decent working men, well clad, with their wives and children nicely dressed around them, their faces beaming with happiness and a placid smile on many a matron's brow, where haggard poverty and brooding care had formerly sat. Some of the men were once notorious drunkards, the very outcasts of society, the opprobrium of their connexions, but were now reclaimed and maintaining themselves and their families in comfort.

On the platform were the Rev. James Ford, (the chairman), Revds. Turner, F. Bishop, Clapson, (Exmouth) and Hellings, and Messrs. A. Lester, Scott, Fox, J. Dymond, H. Sparkes, Charlton, Fryer, &c., &c.

The Rev. JAMES FORD on commencing the proceedings said, that having been for 13 years a member of this society, he was convinced more and more every day of his life, of its necessity and its value—(cheers.) He need not say what great pleasure it was to him to appear among them that evening, and often as he had appeared among them, he never met his temperance brethren under more pleasing and gratifying circumstances than at their Christmas temperance festival. He was particularly gratified at the sight of so many of his young friends in the room, who had enrolled themselves as members of the society, and had taken the teetotal pledge. It had been said, and it was a pretty general opinion, that the temperance movement was on the decline, he would read them an extract which he took yesterday from the Temperance Chronicle, which stated that in 1834, the number of persons pledged to teetotalism was seven, in the autumn of 1845, they were not fewer than seven millions: the little grain had sprung up to a mighty tree, and sheltered multitudes beneath its branches.

Mr. R. W. Fox, in the absence of his son, read the report.

Mr. Fox having concluded the report, expressed his gratification at seeing the numbers present, thanks to the principle which they advocated, there were many in the room now, who at one time would never have been seen there or in any respectable company; they had 200 reformed drunkards among their members. He also thanked the ladies for their exertions; we might make more noise and show, but the ladies were silently, surely, working for their benefit—(cheers.)

THE CHAIRMAN just to show that the society is not declining, would state that the number of teetotalers in Exeter last year was 1,500, now it was 2,000—(cheers.)

Mr. CHARLTON of Bristol, then addressed the meeting in a very able address.

The Rev. Mr. TURNER, vicar of Banwell, next addressed the meeting in a speech of great force and eloquence, which we have not room for, and no abridgment could give an adequate idea of its merits.

At the conclusion of Mr. Turner's speech, the meeting was addressed by a member of the society, who was, not many years since, notorious in the city for his intemperate habits, having been often in the hands of the police, and several times in the Exeter workhouse, owing to this cause. He was, however, reclaimed years ago through the instrumentality of the temperance society, and is now a respectable master tradesman in Exeter, and a consistent and useful member of a christian church. His plain and practical remarks excited deep attention.

Rev. FRANCIS BISHOP next addressed the meeting and dwelt on the moral argument in favour of the society. After applying this principle to the temperance movement, and enforcing its adoption, Mr. Bishop said there was another point which at this season of apprehended scarcity, he was anxious to press on the meeting; 1,093,741 acres of land were cultivated for growing barley for malting, besides 56,000 acres growing hops, making a total of 1,149,741 acres, the produce of which adds nothing to the staple article of man's support. An acre of land will produce on a very moderate calculation, 28 bushels of wheat. Hence, if this large tract of land now devoted to malt and hops were appropriated to the growth of wholesome food, it would produce 4,024,093½ quarters of wheat. A quarter of wheat yields about 350 lbs of flour. From this it would on calculation appear, that taking the census of 1841 as a guide, and allowing to each person a pound of bread daily, the land now appropriated to malt and hops, might be made to produce a sufficiency of bread for the whole of the population of England and Wales, for 118 days in each year. After some further remarks, Mr. Bishop concluded by proposing the thanks of the meeting to Messrs. Charlton and Turner, and to the chairman.

Rev. N. Hellings seconded the proposition, and the chairman in returning thanks expressed himself as having been much gratified by the fulness and respectability of this meeting. He could not but regard it as a happy omen for the future. At the close of the meeting several names of respectable and influential persons were added to the society.

PLYMOUTH.—On Monday evening last the annual Christmas festival of this society took place at the Mechanics' Institute, and had a very respectable appearance. Nearly 200 sat down and partook of the good cheer provided.

ESSEX.

BRAINTREE.—On the 6th of January, the "Ladies' Committee of the Braintree and Barking Temperance Society," made arrangements to give their annual entertainment to the juvenile abstainers of the two localities. At the appointed hour 70 young people collected to partake of the uninebriating cup and the excellent fare provided for them. At the conclusion of tea, the happy young folks united in singing several sacred hymns, whilst several repeated suitable pieces of poetry. It was, indeed, a heart-cheering spectacle, to see so many children collected in the spirit of love and harmony. Their blooming, healthy appearance, operated as a convincing proof that spirituous liquors are totally unnecessary, and that if dispensed with in early life, would never be desired. Great praise is due to the Ladies' Committee for taking such an interest in the welfare of the juveniles, and for their general exertions in our noble cause.

B. JONES, JUN.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

Considerable progress is being made of late at Chatteris, Wimlington, and Doddington. At Cambridgeshire a new means is just devised, in order to arouse their members from a lethargic state. Several of the most influential have proposed that meetings be held in different parts of the town, and that the full benefits of teetotalism shall be explained to the members generally, as well as to the public at large. A commencement was made at Menning's Coffee-rooms, when effective speeches were made by Messrs. Wonfor, Clay, opping, and Moody, and much harmony prevailed. An attack was made on the smoking practices of those who were desirous of recommending teetotalism, but retained the pipe with a tenacity which bespoke inconsistency. At Soham, great meetings have been held, and much good done. At Wisbeach, Ely, and March, things are more in a torpid state than formerly, though numerous lectures have been delivered. There is an apparent indifference in some, and a slavish fear in others, which prevents an extension of the benefits of the principles of the temperance reform.

Whiteseay, Thorney, Benwick, and Manea, have recently been visited by a temperance missionary, who has delivered tracts at public as well as private houses, and otherwise advocated the principles.

T. ROBERTS.

HUNTINGDONSHIRE.

The temperance reform, after many struggles, is now visibly gaining ground in this county. T. B. Thomson of Leeds, now engaged by the West Norfolk Temperance Association, has been lecturing during the last three months with good effect at St. Neots, in the assembly room, to crowded audiences; at Huntingdon, in the Wesleyan school-room; at Godmanchester, in different parts of the town, and lately in the villages of Woodhurst and Houghton. There are gentlemen of influence who are exerting themselves to make known the beneficial effects which they have at length discovered, in the altered condition of some working men, but more particularly that their own health is improved by total abstinence.

T. ROBERTS.

KENT.

DOVER.—A meeting in support of the Kent Temperance Union, was held at the Royal Oak Room, on Monday, December 22nd, at which the Rev. T. Pugh presided. The rev. gentleman, having opened the business of the evening, detailed the rise and onward progress of the temperance movement in the island of Bermuda, in which he himself appeared to have lent the most valuable assistance. Mr. Hudson, who attended on behalf of the union, next addressed the meeting, and in an able and lucid speech successfully laboured to disprove the notion at present afloat in some quarters, that teetotalism is now on the wane.

BERKSHIRE.

BUCKLEBURY.—A public meeting was held in the Independent Chapel, on Friday, December 26th, Mr. S. Savage presided; the meeting was addressed by the Rev. J. Moreton, the minister, Mr. J. Beckett, jun., Mr. G. Awdery, a reclaimed drunkard from Marlborough, and Mr. T. Stowe, a reformed drunkard from Newbury; great attention was paid to the speakers.

WOODHEY.—A public meeting was held in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, on Friday, December 26th, which was well attended; the meeting was addressed by several working men, and at the close eight signatures were obtained.

NEWBURY.—A social tea-meeting was held in the large room, at Mrs. Brind's, Temperance Hotel, on Wednesday, January 7th, after which a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. T. Ward. Mr. T. Hanson, Mr. Farmer, a reformed drunkard from Wantage, Mr. H. Shrimpton, Mr. Hawkins, a reformed drunkard, Mr. Wright, and Mr. J. V. Ward, were the speakers; a good impression was made, and one signature obtained.

DRINKING FOR A WAGER.

A person named Thomas Lister, a shoemaker, living at Barnsley, undertook, for a trifling wager, to drink two quarts of ale, and a pint of rum in ten minutes. That he accomplished, but was so ill afterwards, that a surgeon was obliged to be sent for, and he narrowly escaped his life, by the application of the stomach-pump.—Leeds Intelligencer.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Rev. James Sherman.—We shall be happy to present extracts in our next No. from the letter of Rev. J. Read, sen., of Kat River, South Africa.

J. Raper.—We are sorry his interesting communication came too late for insertion in this month's Chronicle and Recorder. We shall be glad to have him as a regular correspondent.

Thomas Clarke and Thomas Bulmer have our thanks.

A Working Man.—We quite agree with his remarks. The subject has occupied considerable space in former Numbers of the Chronicle. We could not, however, allow our columns to be devoted to the recommendation of particular coffee-houses. Such a procedure would involve us in much annoyance.

W. Spriggs.—Articles of intelligence should be made as concise as possible. Our space will not allow us to insert extended reports of speeches, unless they are very important. Short communications from him as to the progress of temperance in London, will always be acceptable.

Received.—The Canada Temperance Advocate—The Bombay Advocate—South Indian Journal for December—American Union Journal, &c.—Letter from Rev. J. Cox, of Dominica, which we purpose printing in our March Number.

We must claim the indulgence of our friends and correspondents. We have in type sufficient matter to fill a publication half as large as this No. of the Chronicle and Recorder.

* * Societies and the Trade will be supplied from the Office with the Chronicle and Recorder at 8s. 4d. per 100, or £4. per 1000.

HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT,
STANSTEAD BURY HOUSE,

NEAR WARE, HERTFORDSHIRE

BY DR. JOHNSON,

Author of "Life, Health, and Disease," "Theory and Principles of Hydropathy," &c., &c.

For the cure of indigestion, rheumatism, bilious habit, excessive liability to take cold, nervous debility, spasmodic languid circulation, psoriasis, constipation, determination of blood to the head, chronic ulcers of the leg, and all diseases depending on general debility, or suppressed or depraved secretions, torpid liver, stomach diseases, and chronic inflammation of the mucous membranes. This treatment is also exceedingly useful when the main object is to strengthen and harden the delicate constitutions of young persons of a scrofulous or consumptive tendency. In many of those painful and irregular diseases which cannot be ranked in any particular class, and which have defied all ordinary remedies, this treatment has often been found successful.

IMPORTANT TO EVERY TEETOTALER
THROUGHOUT THE UNITED KINGDOM.

On MONDAY, March 2, 1846, will be published, price ONE PENNY, or stamped, 2s. per annum,
No. 1. of

THE TEETOTAL TIMES ;

OR,

MONTHLY TEMPERANCE MESSENGER.

THE issuing of this Periodical is regarded by its projectors as a movement more important than any which has yet been made in this country in connexion with the Temperance Reformation. The principle of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages—though pregnant with rich advantages to the community, though scattering in its course invaluable blessings upon individuals and families, upon the church and the state—has hitherto had no organ at all commensurate with its high claims and intrinsic excellence. The attempts made through the medium of the press, whether to promulgate its principles, or to record its operations, have hitherto been comparatively inefficient. A blow more simultaneous, better directed, and more hearty must, be aimed at the drinking-usages of Britain, before their withering influence will cease to be felt.

The TEETOTAL TIMES is intended to supply this deficiency. The chief talent of the Teetotal corps will be enlisted as far as possible in its service, and a great and united force will thus be brought to bear upon the common foe.

The question of TEETOTALISM—for to that word we declare ourselves warmly attached—will be fully and freely discussed in all its bearings. Attention will be directed, not so much to the drinks of the ancients, as to those which are now used in our own country. It is a prime article in our creed, that the use of these drinks is the curse of Britain, and as such we intend to exhibit those drinks. It is another leading article in our creed, that there is no effectual preventive or remedy for this evil but Teetotalism ; and that principle we shall fully unfold in its history, its nature, its advantages, and its progress.

THE TEETOTAL TIMES is not designed to subservise the opinions and interests of a party, nor to enrich the pockets of an individual. In spirit, as well as in language, it will be independent, though courteous ; candid, though faithful ; determined in exposing abuses, while rejoicing to bestow praise. In a word, it proposes to be at once the advocate, the defender, and the messenger of the Teetotal body.

In addition to Original Articles on these and similar topics, a regular correspondence will be maintained with Societies at home and abroad, which will enable us to present correct and compendious Reports of the real state and progress of the Temperance movement.

The TEETOTAL TIMES, though published at ONE PENNY, will be superior in size and appearance to any Temperance periodical which has yet appeared. It is obvious, therefore, that the expense attendant on its publication can only be met by a very extensive circulation.

FRIENDS OF TEETOTALISM! What say you to our undertaking? Is it not worthy your approbation and support? Will you not assist us in the accomplishment of our object? A limited circulation will not satisfy us,—it should not satisfy you. At least TWENTY THOUSAND copies ought to be issued as a commencement. What are Twenty Thousand copies of a Penny Monthly amongst the Teetotalers of the United Kingdom? Should the sale be increased so as to yield a profit, a stamped copy will be sent to every Editor of a newspaper or magazine throughout the country, as well as to other influential persons. Information as to Teetotalism may thus be spread to an almost indefinite extent.

TEETOTALERS! determine to subscribe for this paper yourselves, and agitate the matter at your public meetings, and in your private circles. Send in your orders without delay. Should the number of copies you require be too small to send direct to London, order them of the nearest bookseller, who will obtain them for you in his monthly parcels. Send in time, that no disappointment may be experienced.

REMEMBER! The first Number of the TEETOTAL TIMES AND MONTHLY TEMPERANCE MESSENGER will be PUBLISHED BY W. BRITAIN, II, PATERNOSTER-ROW,

London, on Monday, March 2, 1846, price ONE PENNY ; and that it will be by far the largest and best Temperance Periodical that has been issued, containing more matter than is in one number of Chamber's Edinburgh Journal, well printed, and on good paper.

DIFFICULTIES AND TRIUMPHS.

The influence of prejudice and appetite have been apparent in every age of the world, and among all races of men. Mankind have ever been ready to oppose any principle which contradicted a dearly cherished dogma, or which forbade the indulgence of their natural inclinations. Christianity was "to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness," because it inculcated the mortification of mere animal propensities.

As a system of self-denial the temperance reformation met with the same antagonistic powers. For hundreds of years the English have been known as a wine, beer, and ale-besotted people—attachment to strong drink has marked every class. The drinking-customs entwining themselves into all the social and business affairs of life, acquired at length a power almost irresistible for evil, contaminating the palace, the senate, the pulpit, the bar, the nobleman's mansion, and the poor man's cottage.

These, in themselves were difficulties of no slight magnitude. But the temperance cause was also ushered in amid the revilings of the thoughtless, the pity of the more intelligent, the insults and vituperations of the press, the bitter hostility of all brewers, distillers, publicans, and jerry lords; and sadder still—amid the apathy or opposition of the Christian Church.

Much has been gained in the last two years' contest. The movement has vindicated its pretensions; numerous obstacles have been levelled to the dust; warm and devoted friends are many; open enemies are few.

But, let us not be mistaken. It is no less true that public opinion, in the aggregate, is secretly against us; the usages and customs of society are far from being in our favour; the makers and sellers of strong drink are no more friendly than they ever were; and with unmingled sorrow we confess, that the Church of God is not yet with us.

Nevertheless our duty is positive and undoubted. It is our duty to aid more vigorously in the propagation of the temperance principle. It is our duty to extol its excellencies, and to labour to add converts to its ranks. It is our duty to recommend it by the manifestation of every Christian virtue; and neglecting to perform this duty, we become guilty of betraying the sacred trust committed to our care.

BRETHREN! Can you betray interests so momentous! Are you willing that the fountain of intemperance should continue to send forth the bitter waters of misery and crime? Are you willing to suspend your exertions for the salvation of the perishing drunkard? Plead not the difficulties in the way. We acknowledge the difficulties are great; but the triumphs are greater and more enduring. The hill may be difficult of ascent, but when the summit is gained, the prospect is all the finer. The evil appears insurmountable; but when surmounted your joy will be the sweeter, and your blessings more abundant. And the evil is surmountable. Drunkenness, like every other sin, must disappear; but only by the means we are employing.

It has been beautifully said—

“Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers;
But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshippers.”

But error will not die of itself, neither will truth flourish if men are idle. God will give the increase, but we must plant and water. Let every abstainer feel that the onus operandi, the burden of working, rests with him individually. Let this conviction rest upon the temperance body collectively, and if any exhortation of ours is needful, we give it in the words of Scripture:—“BE OF GOOD COURAGE, AND LET US PLAY THE MEN FOR OUR PEOPLE AND FOR THE CITIES OF OUR GOD.”

THE FORCE OF HABIT.

It has been often remarked that drunkenness is something more than a sin. It is a habit which becomes a disease, both of mind and body. The drunkard is well described as the victim of drink. One of the most pleasing circumstances our missionaries meet with in labouring amongst their degraded fellow-creatures, is the fact, that in almost all the persons they visit, there are to be found some remains of right feeling; something which responds to the voice of kindness and sympathy. Many of the most deplorable drunkards groan under their bondage, and long to be released; but their resolution fails them. The cravings of a diseased appetite are too powerful for human resistance; the beer shop and the gin palace present their allurements at every turn, and the wretched victim is again ensnared.

None but those blinded by infatuation can suppose that the signing of a pledge, or the legal prohibition of drinking-houses, can remedy the evils which lie in man's heart. But, surely, it is no less a mark of infatuation, to suppose that religion will work without means—to reject a help which has been found efficient, when other plans have failed—to put needless temptations in the way of the weak, because they do not injure the strong—to trust to the preaching of the Gospel, when we do not conform to its precepts! Surely this is little better than crying to Hercules, instead of putting our own shoulder to the wheel.

That the drunkards we seek to reform are often earnest in their wish to be reformed, may appear from the following case reported by one of the missionaries, and omitted, with many others, for want of space. It is by no means a solitary instance.

“A drunkard, who was found by the missionary quarrelling with his sister, invited him in, and said, ‘If you can make me a sober man, you will reform one of the greatest drunkards in London.’ ‘There,’ said he, pointing to an old stump bedstead, ‘you see no bed-clothes there. No. I have carried them all to the pawnbrokers. Every bit of furniture, pots and pans, and my spectacles too, are all gone up the spout. I have had two glasses of gin this morning, and two half-pints of ale, and I should get more if I could.’ He had been in the army twenty-five years, and when in the peninsula, had seen soldiers blow out their brains to avoid punishment for drunkenness. The poor fellow signed the pledge, and poured forth blessings upon the missionary for visiting him.”

The Balance.

“WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING.”

OBJECTION III.

“THE USE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS IS COUNTERVENANCED BY THE SCRIPTURES, AND SANCTIONED BY THE EXAMPLE OF THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS MEN IN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES; AND, THEREFORE, WE ARE JUSTIFIED IN USING THEM.”

It is objected,—

1. That the use of intoxicating liquors is countenanced by the Scriptures, and therefore we are justified in using them.

Now, it devolves upon the objector to prove what he assumes. Mere reference to those numerous texts of Scripture in which wine is mentioned with commendation, will not avail.

It is contended by some men, “learned and godly,” that many of the wines of the nations of antiquity, were unfermented and un-intoxicating; and, in support of this opinion, reference is made to the works of ancient writers.—(See Smith's Greek and Roman Antiquities. Article, Vinum.) It rests, then, with the objector, to prove the contrary, or else his objection is void. We repeat it; as he makes the assertion, so on him lies the onus probandi, or burden of proving, that ALL the wines of the ancients were fermented; or, in other words, that the wine drunk by the “holy men of old,” was ALWAYS intoxicating.

But we will not be too exacting, and instead of requiring our opponents to prove, what we believe they are incapable of doing, we will cut the Gordian knot ourselves, and will admit, for argument sake, all that is asserted.

And how does the matter now stand? Syllogistically, the case is as follows:—

“We are justified in doing what the Scripture commends;

“The Scripture commends the use of wine;
Ergo:—“We are justified in drinking wine.”

We have three remarks to make upon this logic, which will greatly affect the Ergo.

(1.) Allowing all ancient wines to have been intoxicating, it is undeniable, that they differed materially from those of our day. The act of distillation was not discovered till the 12th century, A.D.; and, consequently, the art of brandying liquors was not then known. Admitting, then, a sanction to use weak, pure, fermented wines of the ancients, can it, by any process of reasoning be shown, that such sanction ought to be legitimately extended to wines, whose strength is enormously increased by artificial means?

(2.) The habits and tastes of the ancients, in reference to alcoholic liquors were so dissimilar to those of our day, that although they were permitted to use strong drink, it does not follow that such permission can be applied to us.

Perhaps, the following illustration will explain our meaning:—The dress of the inhabitants of eastern countries is extremely light, but owing to the great heat, is worn without physical injury. This same clothing would, however, be quite unsuitable for our northern and colder climates, and the person who exposed himself in it during the depth of winter would, not improbably be frozen to death.

The application is this:—

The use of wine did not awaken in the ancients resident in the east that craving taste for alcoholic stimulants, which is so powerfully displayed by our own and other modern European nations; and, therefore, a permission to the former to use wine would not involve a similar permission to the latter. Mr. DE QUINCY, whose literary attainments place him high as an authority, observes:—

“The (alcoholic) taste was slightly sowed, as an artificial taste, amongst luxurious individuals, but never ran through the labouring classes, through armies, through cities. The blood and the climate forbade it. . . . In the genial climates of the south, man is naturally temperate. He is so by physical coercion, and for the necessities of rest and coolness. The Spaniard, the Moor, or the Arab, has no merit in his temperance. The effort for him would be to form a taste for alcohol. He has a vast foreground of disgust to traverse, before he can reach a taste so remote and alien. . . . Now, on the other hand, our northern climates have universally the taste, latent if not developed, for powerful liquors.”—Tait's Edinburgh Magazine, Nov. 1845.

This fact then, destroys all parallel between Palestine and Britain; and annihilates the casuistry which would take a permission given to the Jews ages ago, and apply it to the English in the 19th century.

(3.) The Bible was never intended to be a treatise on geography, astronomy, agriculture, or any other science. Its Divine Author never designed that it should be regarded as an authority in matters of dietetics or costume. It is a revelation of what man is, to what he is destined as an immortal being; not a revelation of what man should eat, drink, and wear. Matters relating to the body come within the province of reason, and it is reason's prerogative to decide thereon; and he who would endeavour to set the Word of God in opposition to His Works, shews an utter ignorance of the deference due to both.

“In pure science,” says the British Quarterly Review, “in physics, in psychology, in medicine, in several departments of the social economy, jurisprudence and politics, there are principles and facts for working out the problems with which men, as philosophers, are conversant, and we are content, that in all such matters, man should be left to the functions of analysis, and to the inductions and analogies of practical philosophy.”

But allowing still further, that the use of the intoxicating drinks of modern times is permitted to the Christian, no person will contend that their use is commanded, and therefore binding upon him; while it cannot but be admitted, that under some circumstances it is proper to abstain from them. What are these circumstances? In referring to the 14th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, it will be seen that St. Paul there lays down this principle:—

That if any practice of ours, however right in itself, cause our weak brethren to stumble, it is imperative upon us to abandon that practice. And how did the great Gentile Apostle illustrate his meaning? By uttering that memorable declaration:—“It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.”

This, then, is the immoveable rock on which we stand; and proving that strong drinks have caused myriads of our brethren to stumble, we fearlessly declare that it is “NOT GOOD” for the Christian to use them, but that it is his DUTY as a follower of Jesus to abstain from them; and thus to aid in the extermination of the curse, not only of the world, but also of the Church of the Living God.

It is objected,—

2. That the use of intoxicating liquors is sanctioned by the example of the most illustrious men of ancient and modern times, and therefore we are justified in using them.

Here, again, admitting the premise, we deny the conclusion.

So long as men are fallible, so long will they err; and therefore to do a thing solely because great and good men have done so before us, is as reasonable, as it would be to believe that the world stands still, because great and good men believed so before the days of Copernicus. The folly of depeuding upon illustrious men is apparent, from the fact, that there is no error however gross, no fallacy however glaring, which has not been advocated by men, eminent in literature, art, science, and religion. But there is a legitimate use of great names, to which we shall refer, and which is strikingly in favour of the temperance cause. When distinguished men adopt a given course of action, from a conviction that their mental and physical powers will thereby be benefited, their example becomes not a proof that the course is right, but a strong presumption in its favour. Demosthenes, Euler, Newton, with a galaxy of illustrious men, are well known to have been exceedingly temperate, from a conviction of benefit to the body and mind; and the practice they adopted does therefore receive support from the example they presented. But we wish to impress firmly upon the mind of our readers, the fallaciousness of following the example of great men, who merely adopted the prevailing vices and fashions of their day.

To attempt thus to dazzle the vulgar by appealing to great names, is no better than endeavouring to sacrifice principle and truth at the shrine of human idolatry, and to ask over again the question which fell from the lips of the Jews in regard to our Saviour Jesus Christ:—“Have any of the chief priests and of the rulers believed on him?”

In our next number we shall weigh the Fourth Objection.

“Teetotalism is an extreme measure, and extremes are dangerous.”

A SYDNEY TEETOTALER'S TESTIMONY.—“I have been a total abstainer for nearly six years. I left Sydney very ill on the 22nd May last, and endured the whole voyage to London without tasting a drop of wine, spirits, or malt liquors, and sailed round Cape Horn in the very coldest weather, through large beds of ice; our decks also being sometimes covered with snow, hail, and ice. I arrived in London on the 22nd October last, and remained there till the 21st of December; and I now hope to return to Sydney a perfect teetotaler with my health quite restored.”—G. S.

The amount annually expended by our Country in Strong Drink, with the losses occasioned by Intemperance; and how such money could be otherwise bestowed.

IN our two previous numbers, we have, under the title of the BALANCE, adduced numerous arguments in proof of the injuriousness, or, at least, the utter worthlessness of all intoxicating liquors as beverages.

Having established this great point, we now desire the reader's most candid attention to the subjoined statistics, by which it will be apparent, what an immense amount of wealth is dedicated to the service of Bacchus, and what might be effected were it otherwise consecrated to the service of Religion and Education.

EXPENSE INVOLVED IN THE USE OF STRONG DRINK.

Amount annually expended in the purchase of intoxicating liquors	£52,000,000
Deduct for medicinal and scientific purposes	2,000,000
	<hr/>	£50,000,000
The land now devoted to the growth of barley and hops, for the express purpose of being made into strong drink, would produce wheat, which would sell for not less than	20,000,000
Misapplication of labour and capital, say	15,000,000
	<hr/>	£85,000,000

DIRECT EXPENSE OF INTEMPERANCE.

Loss of time and labour by drinking, estimated by the Parliamentary Committee at £50,000,000, say	£40,000,000
Cost of pauperism, the effect of drunkenness, at least	3,000,000
Cost of police, prosecutions and courts of justice; and expense of board, lodging, and transportations of criminals, committed for offences attributable to intemperance, at the lowest computation	2,000,000
	<hr/>	£45,000,000
	<hr/>	£130,000,000

To this should be added not less than £10,000,000 lost by accidents on sea and land, resulting immediately from drunkenness.

PATRIOT!—Is it so, that the use of strong drink invokes a loss annually, to our country ALONE, of £125,000,000? And while you boast of your patriotism, will you not allow this startling fact to lead you to serious consideration?

PHILANTHROPIST!—Do you really love your race? And can you listlessly behold such a wilful waste of that which would, if properly applied, tend to elevate and bless mankind?

CHRISTIAN!—Do you desire the cause of Christ to flourish? And think you that such can be the case, while men are wantonly abusing the treasures committed to their trust, and of which they must give an account? Know you not, that “the silver and the gold are the Lord's;” and can you consent, that the gold, the silver, the earth, and man's labour, should be devoted to the production of that which excites to evil?

Patriot—Philanthropist—Christian! We entreat you to ask yourselves, whether you are clear in this matter, while you continue to use intoxicating liquors?

HOW THIS AMOUNT OF MONEY MIGHT BE APPLIED.

I. FOR RELIGIOUS PURPOSES.

It would erect 5000 new places of worship and schools	£10,000,000
It would purchase two hundred million Bibles	7,500,000
It would print four thousand millions of tracts in the different languages of the world, at a cost of about	1,600,000
It would employ 20,000 missionaries	4,000,000
It would support 1000 schools for the training of heathen orphans and others	2,000,000
It would employ 2000 home missionaries	300,000
It would subscribe the entire annual revenue of all the Missionary Societies of Great Britain	600,000
		£26,000,000

II. FOR LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC PURPOSES.

It would endow seven large Universities	£10,500,000
It would pay the salaries of 20,000 schoolmasters, and thus educate 200,000 poor children	3,000,000
It would employ 5000 lecturers on literature, &c.	2,500,000
It would build 1500 Mechanics Institutions	3,000,000
It would publish 500,000 cheap books weekly, or 30,000,000 annually, at 1s. per vol., on the plan of Knight's Weekly Volume	1,500,000
It would allow for the encouragement of literary talent	1,500,000
It would fit out 100 expeditions for scientific and other purposes, at a cost of £10,000 each	1,000,000
It would offer as premiums for useful inventions and discoveries	1,000,000
		£24,000,000

III. FOR BENEVOLENT PURPOSES.

It would endow ten hydropathic hospitals with £150,000 each	£1,500,000
It would endow ten surgical hospitals	1,500,000
It would give for the emancipation and instruction of slaves, and for the colonization of Africa	10,000,000
It would endow 100 asylums for the deaf, dumb, and insane, at £50,000 each	5,000,000
It would give to various other philanthropic institutions	2,000,000
		£20,000,000

IV. NATIONAL PURPOSES.

It would construct ten great railways at a cost of £2,500,000 each	£25,000,000
It would give in lieu of Income and other taxes	10,000,000
It would give for relief of the poor	10,000,000
It would give for erection of lighthouses and other similar undertakings	5,000,000
		£50,000,000
		£120,000,000
Balance, to be applied to other great and good purposes		10,000,000

£130,000,000

TEMPERANCE AND RELIGION.

By REV. W. H. TURNER, A.M.,
Vicar of Bunwell, Somerset.

"The children of this world, are in their generation wiser than the children of light." Such was the annunciation eighteen centuries ago, of Him who knew what was in man, and the truth of which, both past and present experience too mournfully confirms. How seldom in the history of the Christian church do we find the wisdom of the serpent combined with the harmlessness of the dove!—how frequently do we still see the infatuation of which the Saviour speaks prevailing over the mind, and influencing the judgment of his most excellent and approved followers. Were it not so, would it be possible to propound, as in any degree a doubtful query, whether the temperance cause is adapted to promote the interests of religion? This, indeed, is a question which every practical teetotaler—all who are acquainted with the development of our principles, and the working of our system, can at once answer in the affirmative. And yet how many are there, whom we believe to be eminently children of light, who are not only lukewarm and indifferent in our cause, but even adverse to it, and who would be far from admitting the fact, to us so plain, that the advance of teetotalism and the progress of religion, will almost invariably go hand in hand. It may not then be considered, perhaps, as presumption on the one hand, or unnecessarily attempting to prove admitted facts upon the other, if a few brief attempts are made in the pages of this Journal to establish the intimate connexion existing between the eradication of the drinking habits of society, and the general extension of Christianity.

And if the temperance society had done nothing else than bring under the more immediate notice of the Christian World the vast evils of intemperance—if she had no trophies of reformed ones to make the boast of her rejoicing—still great and almost incalculable would have been the good effected. For if she had merely pointed out the breach by which the flood of vice and infidelity has so deluged this Christian land, without attempting (as in many cases by the divine blessing, she has successfully done) to stop its progress; it might not unreasonably be hoped that the attention thus awakened, would soon lead to active and zealous exertion; and that the combined efforts of the church of Christ would be united to stop an evil of such enormous magnitude as that which was shown to have resulted from the use of strong drink. We would attempt, then, not to prove what it is believed will be almost universally admitted,—the vice and misery which the love of strong drink causes in our land; but rather to remind our Christian brethren, those more especially who are watchmen in the towers of Zion, how much the removal of this habit of self-indulgence must necessarily promote the interests of religion, and how imperatively they are called upon to lend us all the weight and influence of their example to support a cause, from which such results are calculated to flow;—an example, the importance of which, it would appear almost superfluous to enlarge on for a moment, were it not for the admonition of our dear Redeemer, as to the backwardness of the children of light to adopt a line of conduct, which, under similar circumstances, the children of the world would so immediately do.

And in the attempts made to spread the knowledge of divine truth, none are more striking characteristics of the age in which we live, than the general extension of education and the general erection of churches. The present century has seen more schools and churches built than the whole 300 years which have elapsed since the Reformation. Now we would enter into no argument as to whether religious knowledge has proportionably advanced with the increase of means which has been given: we would merely take for granted what all, perhaps, will at once admit, that these are notorious means by which religion has been attempted to be diffused amongst our population; and we would then put the simple query,—What has most contributed to render those means ineffectual, and make the labours of the schoolmaster and the minister of no effect? And here we appeal to the practical experience and unbiassed judgment of every minister of religion, into whose hands these lines may fall; and we are satisfied that whether in rural districts, or amongst our town population, one uniform answer will be given by truth and candour, that it is Strong Drink. To take the case of education first.—How difficult is it in country parishes, to raise the necessary funds for any thing like an efficient education; how imperfect, even at the best, is the instruction afforded in the great majority of country schools. And although the ordinary weekly payment in such schools rarely exceed one penny a week; the poor we are told cannot afford to pay even a sum like that, for so important an object as the education of their children; and many there are I doubt not in all parishes, who grow up in ignorance, in idleness, and vice, because their parents, cannot or will not pay the small sum required for their weekly schooling. What then are the habits of those parents amongst the working classes, who send their children to school, and of those who do not? The sober, steady, and industrious labourer or mechanic in the one case; the drinking, vicious, and idle in the other. It is not, therefore, so much the inability to afford the means, as disinclination to do so, which impedes the progress of education. The money spent in the excesses of the one class of workmen will bear no comparison with that paid for the education of their children by the other. How large a portion of the working-man's wages finds its way into the pockets of the publican, all who frequent those places of evil resort, all who are acquainted with the statistics on the subject, now so easy to be met with, must know. If the money, therefore, expended by our labouring population upon strong drink, were devoted to the purposes of education, there would be no lack of funds for any of our schools. The poor man would not be dependent upon the precarious charity of the rich for his children's schooling, nor would the ministers of religion have to mourn as they now do, over the inadequacy of their means to supply education to their people, which is so imperatively called for. If there were no drunkards in our parishes, there would be plenty of willing scholars; and if no money were wasted in intoxicating drinks, few, indeed, would be the number of those who could not afford to educate their own children.

Nor does the evil stop here. The great end of education must be to bring our scholars up in the fear of God; not merely to impart to them worldly knowledge, but to give them, under the divine blessing, that truer wisdom, whose "fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold, and whose revenue than choice silver." How awful, then, a stumbling-block does strong drink here present to our la-hours! Not only does it keep back too many from the reach of our efforts altogether; but of those who come to our schools, how many are corrupted by the excesses which they witness at home, and the evil example which the drunkenness they are brought in contact with affords. What chance is there of producing serious impressions upon the minds of those, with whom we labour only for the few brief hours of school time, if home influence for so much longer a period, is entirely directed the other way? What wonder is there, that amongst the many whom our National Schools yearly send into the world, so few should be converted characters, when they are so constantly associated with the profaneess, immorality, and vice, which in various degrees springs from the use of strong drink? In the houses of the rich where the parent is a drunkard, we do not expect to see his offspring religious; and here there are many advantages which wealth affords, that are denied to the poor man. The excess of the wealthy does not entrench upon the means of his children's support, or deny the benefits of education in the one case as in the other. Strong drink is, comparatively speaking, a very trifling item in the expenditure of the rich man, while in the working-man's, it forms not unfrequently, more than half his weekly wages; and the very first source, probably, on any deficiency of his means to supply the craving appetite for strong drink, is found in the weekly schooling of his children. That expenditure, trifling as it may be, is at once reduced. To expect, therefore, that the child of a working-man, who is in the habit of indulging to excess, should grow up a child of God, is to expect a miracle which in the ordinary dealings of Divine Providence, we can seldom, if ever, hope to see.

But is this all we have to fear? Far from it. The boy, who has been taught to honour and respect his parent; to look up with reverence to the minister of religion, under whose especial care his early days were passed, sees them indulge harmlessly (as far as their own destiny is concerned it may be) in the use of that which he knows by his own experience is too generally abused. Against that abuse, then, we will suppose him cautioned by all the pious instruction of school, and the affectionate admonitions of home, and thus he is launched into that world. But however great may have been the pains bestowed upon him,—however faithful the truths instilled into his mind; he goes forth into the world, in all the weakness of youth, without the matured experience of his parent as a guide, or the confirmed principles of his minister as a support. To use, but not abuse, what is called (most falsely though) these good gifts of God, has been his teaching. And what then does experience prove, in almost nine cases out of ten, is the consequence with a youth sent forth, even under circumstances so favourable, as those we have supposed? Of all the temptations by which he is assailed, strong drink is assuredly the most powerful. Brought up as he has been in religious habits, whilst the mind is in its natural state, vice is seen in its true colours, and his disinclination to do any great wickedness and sin against God, will perhaps be difficult to overcome. Under the influence of that excitement, which the most innocent indulgence in the use of intoxicating liquors creates, is it not far otherwise? Then is it that the passions rise in force, and the ability to resist them becomes proportionably weakened; and in that day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, fearfully will it be perceived, that the first step in vice and sin, was almost invariably taken, not so much under the influence of actual intoxication, as under the false excitement which the use, but not the (so called) abuse of strong drink has caused. We cannot, however, enter into all the various temptations by which youth is assailed; our object is rather to induce others to think for themselves, and ponder over in the still and quiet commings of their own chamber, the vast evils which to their own knowledge the use of strong drink has caused, to those over whose tender years they have watched with feelings of anxious solicitude. How many, it may well be asked, of those whom they have counselled to use, but not abuse these gifts, have been able to follow their advice? and how many have altogether made shipwreck of their faith, in consequence of their inability to resist abusing, what their ministers and teachers instructed them it was lawful to make use of!

These are questions which may be blinked in time; they cannot be so in eternity. Our example is a talent entrusted to us by God, and it must be restored to him with usury. It will not suffice to say, that our conduct could never justify a brother in sin;—that the drunkard could not excuse himself in his excess, by pleading our moderate indulgence. It is usury God exacts; and our example, therefore, must lead to virtue, as well as keep from vice. Would the children of the world, then, if their hearts were set upon some peculiar object of earthly attainment, and they were striving to bring up the rising generation so as they also might reach the same prize; if they found that in the great majority of cases, the use of any peculiar thing, however lawful, or however agreeable, invariably defeated their end, and that such use too generally terminated in its abuse; and thus frustrated all their wishes, and destroyed the fruits of all their care:—can we think, I say, that the children of the world would not be wise enough in their generation, to remove entirely so great a stumbling-block, and discontinue altogether the use of that which so generally produced the very opposite results to what they wished! And why, then, do not the children of light copy that wisdom, which even when used for an unrighteous end, we are taught our Lord commended? How different would be the results produced by the education of the young, if the stumbling-block of strong drink were wholly removed! If all our ministers and teachers would make abstinence from these soul-destroying liquors, and not their use, the lesson which they practically instilled into the tender minds of their young charges, how much more plenteous would be the harvest we should reap, and the sheaves we should gather into the heavenly garner! That many would fall, alas! we do not doubt; but that many would be preserved, we are equally assured. This is a world of temptation, and it is not the design of our Heavenly Father, or the prayer of his Son, to take us out of that world. But though we cannot remove temptation, we can weaken its influence; and in no case is this to be more clearly seen than in the immense temptations to which all know the use of strong drink exposes the young. The path of abstinence is the path of safety from many a foul and hateful vice; and if we were wise in our generation, in that path we should seek to lead all, over whom our name and character were likely to have a shadow of influence. That strong drink destroys the labour which we expend in education, no man can for a moment deny, in too many cases. And if education, therefore, be generally admitted as a means by which, through grace, we extend the knowledge of salvation by the Son of God, it follows, that what impedes the effect of education impedes the spread of religious truth; and that the use of intoxicating liquors, as the great obstacle of education, is that which all the followers of Jesus should most sedulously seek to remove. Even granting that their use is lawful, who will not admit that it is dangerous? And why should we encourage others to wield so fearful a weapon? why should we not, on the contrary, lay it aside entirely ourselves, and strive to induce others to follow our example? Why? because the children of light are not wise in their generation as the children of the world.

WHAT DOES LEEDS SPEND IN STRONG DRINK?

IMPORTANT CALCULATION, BY MR. THOMAS BULWER.

On looking over Williams's Directory for 1845, I find that Leeds contains 273 public houses, 180 beer shops, and 54 wine and spirit, and ale and porter merchants, all of which have a direct influence on the population of our town. Now, suppose they each take the following very low sums, viz. :—

273 public houses £7, per week,
their aggregate receipts will be	£1911	0	0
54 liquor merchants, £10.....	540	0	0

We find..... £3081 0 0 spent by those who are ready to complain of hard times and heavy taxation; to this must be added, the time of 1014 men, reckoning two for each establishment, ten hours a day, who, if properly employed, might earn 12s. per week, producing £608 8s.; which, added to the above, would produce £3689 8s. weekly. This sum, if multiplied by 52, the number of weeks in a year, will give the amazing sum of £191,842 16s.; and would purchase—

Men's apparel.....	£35,000
Women's ditto....	37,700
Provisions.....	16,320
Furniture.....	31,500

leaving £71,328 16s., which sum would give to the 11 churches, £100 each; 25 chapels, £100 each; infirmary and other local charities, £5000; for temperance purposes, £6000; 4 public libraries, £1200; librarians' salaries, £200; a museum, £4000; keeper's salary, £80; cheap periodicals, £500; to pensioning 300 aged teetotalers at 9s. per week each, £7020; after which we find a final balance, £41,828 16s. for the purchase of knives, forks, and other necessaries; unless it should be thought expedient to pension off the drunkard makers. In that case we might divide the licensed victuallers into three classes. 1st, Those who saw their deeds were evil, and consequently merited no reward for services rendered. 2nd, Those who might wish to have the pension, but whose pride forbade them to own it. And, 3rd, Those who had nothing else to depend on for a livelihood. In this class, we would include 33 widows who keep public houses, and 21 widows who keep Jerry shops. The Jerry lords might return to their original employment, and as for the merchants, it would be an insult to offer them a pension.

[We shall be glad to receive similar calculations respecting all the large towns of the kingdom.—Ebs.]

Imperial Parliament.

[We design, under the above title, to present our readers during the sitting of Parliament, with a summary of the remarks made on matters relating to Temperance, by the Members of both Houses of Legislature; with observations of our own as occasion may require.—EDITORS.]

THE PROPOSED NEW TARIFF.

On Tuesday, January 27th, SIR ROBERT PEEL submitted his proposed Tariff to the consideration of the House of Commons. The reduction of the duty on imported cider and perry is to be one-half, and on foreign spirits from 22s. to 15s. The newspapers state that this announcement drew forth a burst of cheering from the hon. members.

The Premier stated his belief, that the extensive smuggling and illicit distillation which yearly robs the revenue to a considerable extent, would, by the suggested reduction be greatly diminished. We think it however, a grave question of morals, whether any government—more especially a Christian government—is warranted in deriving its revenue at all, from articles which contribute to the demoralization and misery of the people.

The Morning Chronicle has given its opinion, that "of all articles of consumption, luxuries ought to be taxed the highest, and of all luxuries, stimulants."

At any rate, it will be the duty of the friends of temperance, to use their utmost efforts to prevent the drunkenness and consequent crime, which, we greatly fear, will result from the curse of "cheap spirits."

THE MALT TAX.

SIR ROBERT PEEL has disappointed the expectations of many of the agricultural members in not proposing the repeal of the malt tax.

Mr. Bennett, one of the representatives of South Wilts, expressed himself on the 27th January as exceedingly grieved at this omission. He had come down to the House, he said, fully prepared to hear that the government had resolved to abolish the tax on one of the poor man's necessaries!

We should be led to suppose from this, that the hon. member has never heard of persons who live without these necessaries; or, at least, that no species of such a remarkable class existed in South Wiltshire. It is, in truth, a fact not unfringed with instruction; that in the year 1846, the uncontradicted statement was made before a crowded British House of Commons, that "beer is one of the poor man's NECESSARIES."

We wonder, indeed, that Mr. Wakley who succeeded the honourable gentleman, did not stay to expose this puerile fallacy to the censure which it justly merited.

Foreign Intelligence.

AMERICA.

UNITED STATES.

The temperance cause is moving forward throughout the states of the American Union with astonishing rapidity. Out of 220 towns composing the state of Connecticut, nearly 200 have appointed anti-license commissioners.

The third anniversary of the Yale College Temperance Society was held on the 15th of December. Professor Silliman presided. The report stated that the society consisted of 264 members, or more than three-fifths of all the under-graduates.

In the last week of next April, the new law of New York State will come into operation, by which the voters residing in the several towns and counties of that state will have the power to forbid or allow the licensing of houses to sell alcoholic liquors. Great exertions are being made by the American Temperance Union to secure an overwhelming temperance majority. This object is, we rejoice to say, likely to be achieved.

At a large military review at Hartford, Connecticut, amid booths, tents, and tables for the sale of refreshments and confectionery, no liquors were exhibited at any of them. What would our fathers have thought of this?

The temperance society in Hartford has doubled in a year; having now 4600 members.

A traveller says, in the course of a summer peregrination, I found myself a few days ago in the village of Jamestown, Chatauque county, and was there informed by one of the oldest and most respectable inhabitants, that full nine-tenths of its population (infants excepted) were pledged to total abstinence.

Of 1297 inhabitants of Tolland, 642 are on the temperance list. Of 677 children, between 4 and 16, 642 are on the temperance roll.

PRESIDENT POLK is a friend to temperance. A gentleman visiting Washington, writes, "In an interview with President Polk, he informed me that temperance had and should receive his countenance and example. Such a stand of the chief magistrate of our nation is highly commendable, whether we agree in politics or not. When I entered his audience room, my eyes were greeted with a large pitcher of water, surrounded with tumblers, on the centre table.

Rev. Thomas Spencer, A.M. of Hinton Charter House, near Bath, now on a tour through the United States, has been lecturing to crowded audiences in New York, Hartford, &c. &c. and is likely to return in about two months.

WEST INDIES.

DOMINICA.

(LETTER FROM REV. JAMES COX.)

Dominica, Dec. 24th. 1845.

My dear Sir,—I have received your letter, acknowledging my remittance, and shall be most happy to receive your promised CHRONICLES and Tracts.

During this year, I have had the pleasure of advocating our most humane and blessed principle, in Antigua and Montserrat. In February last, during the sittings of our district meeting in Antigua, I was requested by the Committee of the Total Abstinence Society, to deliver a lecture on the subject. I did so, with great pleasure, in the rooms of the Mico Charity. The Superintendent of that valuable Institution, Mr. Miller, is most zealously engaged in promoting teetotalism in conjunction with his co-adjutor, Mr. Savage. The committee, I was happy to learn, had resolved on the delivery of quarterly lectures; and one of my respected brethren, the Rev. Mr. Pilcher, was to deliver the first. They are also circulating tracts and books. At a subsequent visit in August, I again lectured; and had an opportunity of conversing with some of our Moravian brethren, on the importance of thorough temperance, and its connexion with the interests of our common christianity. One of them, with his wife, is most entirely devoted to the system; they are from America. Another, from Germany, has since given in his adhesion to the cause, and is an intelligent defender of it. In another visit, in September, when invited to plead the cause of the Female Orphan Asylum, I was requested, by some of the ladies of the committee, not to fail to include abstinence in my advocacy. This I could do most naturally, in discoursing on "Train up a child in the way he should go;" for do not children require instruction and careful training on this momentous subject? I am deeply impressed with the conviction that it ought to form a part of the education of every child in every Day and Sabbath School throughout the world. In the same month, I visited Montserrat, to aid our Missionary there in Missionary Sermons and meetings; and at his request, delivered an address in explanation and defence of our principles. The society, which was organised a year or two ago, is resuscitated—and I am happy to hear that twenty or thirty pledges have been received. Many are practising the system who have never signed.

In this island we have just holden our anniversary. It was numerously attended. Captain Harry, from Cornwall, gave us a telling address. My efforts among the military are successful, and about forty are now on the pledge roll. Some of the most refractory and troublesome men, give no further trouble to their officers—and one of them has become a child of God by faith in Christ, and is united to our Church. Many now attend our ministry, and my weekly visit to the barracks is always profitable.

But, my dear sir, can nothing be done towards the abolition of canteens, or their conversion into coffee and provision shops? They are a perfect curse to the army—a perpetual and ever-present stumbling-block to men, who are anxiously flying from the soul-destroying beverage—a reservoir of drink, engendering sickness and weakness, crime and punishment—and attended by not one good result or redeeming feature. O! let your imploring voice be heard by "the hero of a hundred battles;" and if the noble Duke can be the honoured instrument of effecting the annihilation of alcohol-selling canteens throughout the army, a greater glory will encircle his illustrious name than the halo of Waterloo can ever confer. To put a constant temptation to sin in the way of these brave men, and then punish them for sinning—is not this most irrational and cruel? Surely, if the case is properly represented at Head Quarters, this fearful tampering with men's present and everlasting interests will no longer be permitted.

Many blessed proofs of the utility of teetotalism, exist among us. The number is increasing, and encourages us amidst the indifference of many who ought to aid in taking "the stumbling-block out of the way."

AFRICA.

(Extracts from a letter to Rev. James Sherman.)

Kat River, South Africa.

MY DEAR MR. SHERMAN,—Never, never, have I forgotten the pleasure I had in spending a day with you at your house among teetotal friends, and attending two or three meetings at your chapel. You, my dear Sir, are brought again fresh to my mind, by seeing your name in a temperance publication. I was rejoiced to find you still faithful to the cause; it is a blessed cause; God has evidently blessed it, and will bless it. By His blessing it still continues unchanged in this settlement. We have under our charge here, perhaps, about 4000 persons, old and young; but such is the effect of temperate habits, that we are not aware of more than three or four families who take any kind of intoxicating drinks: hundreds of our young people, I may say, are growing up, without seeing, tasting, or smelling any kind of intoxicating liquors. May this state of things remain. To this we ascribe the constant attendance of the means of grace, which we trust has been followed by the outpouring of the Spirit of God from time to time; so that our church members have increased to about 900; and it is a very rare circumstance that we have had to pass censures for even the use of spirits, wine, or beer. Our people are very strict, healthy, industrious, and cheerful. Next to religion, we ascribe the whole to the effects of sobriety. We have, properly speaking, no temperance society. Of course my example, and that of my two sons and the rest of my family, has had a great effect, and that is the principle upon which I have acted, and still hope to act. As to my own health, it could not have been better for the use of any quantity of either spirits, wine, or beer; on the contrary, I believe my health would have been quite different, even with a moderate use of either of the above beverages.

The late Dr. Van Der-Kemp was a teetotaler from his infancy to his death. I was nearly so for upwards of twenty-five years after I came to Africa, and have been a thorough one for now fifteen years. I thank God, and very many others have to thank Him also, that this has been the case.

J. READ, Sen.

SWEDEN.

The Swedish Government, in order to put a stop to the increasing progress of drunkenness in Norway, has appointed a missionary for each of the four provinces of that kingdom, to travel through them, preaching abstinence from strong liquors, and promoting the establishment and extension of temperance societies. Compensation is again offered to all such distillers as shall resign their licenses for making brandy, and entirely relinquish their business.

ENGLAND.

THE METROPOLIS.

SPIALFIELDS BRANCH OF THE LONDON CITY MISSION.—At the second annual meeting of this society, held in Crosby Hall, on the 20th January, Sir E. N. Buxton, Bart. in the chair, the following statement was made by the Rev. R. Munro, Chaplain to the Bridewell Hospital, "Full three-fourths of the prisoners come there through habits of intemperance, which are the curse of the poor, and from the bottom of my heart, I believe teetotalism to be the harbinger of the Gospel, and therefore I wish the promoters of it success." This sentiment was received with cheers. H.N.R.

ISLINGTON.—The Church-lane Society held its anniversary on January 12th. C. Taylor, Esq. presided over the public meeting, which was addressed by Mr. Stock, one of the city missionaries, Mr. Spriggs, Mr. Toomath, and others.

Rev. W. W. ROBINSON, M.A., well known as a very active and zealous teetotaler, has lately been presented by the inhabitants of Yeovil, on his resigning the curacy of that parish, with a handsome silver tea service, value £120. Mr. Robinson is now Incumbent of Christ Church, Chelsea. We hope the teetotalers in that district will take care to avail themselves of his valuable services.

HAMMERSMITH.—On Tuesday, January 13th, a public tea festival was held in the new and commodious hall, when about 100 persons sat down to the refreshments provided. Dr. Oxley occupied the chair at the public meeting, and delivered an admirable address upon the general principles of the temperance society. The speakers were Messrs. Gibbons, Bridge, Mann, Davis, Steele, and Moyes. Six signatures were obtained. W. W. Tuck.

WHITECHAPEL.—On January 27th, and February 2nd, two lectures were delivered by Rev. B. Parsons, author of "Anti-Bacchus," in Zion Chapel, on the accordance of Physiology with Temperance. The audiences on both occasions were computed to consist of from 2000 to 3000 persons.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM.—On Wednesday, Feb. 4, a lecture on Temperance was delivered in the Town Hall, Birmingham, by the Rev. J. Caughey of America. The hall, which will hold from 5000 to 6000 persons, was densely crowded in every part, and the deepest attention was manifested by the audience. The lecture was one of powerful eloquence. Good arrangements were made by the committee for the talking of pledges; but in consequence of the immense attendance, these arrangements were rendered almost ineffectual. Nearly 300 persons, however, signed the pledge. The chair was taken by Dr. Melson, and the vote of thanks was moved by R. T. Cadbury, Esq., and seconded by Joseph Sturge, Esq. The first stone of the Birmingham Temperance Hall is expected to be laid on Easter Monday next.

BOLTON.—For several weeks before and after the last municipal election, our committee had a protest inserted in both the newspapers of the town, in addition to posting and hand operations.

By these means, we not only brought teetotalism in contact with respectable parties, but also had the naked facts lying on the tables of the very "drunkeries" themselves, and read by many of their frequenters. The cost was not £2 10s. for the advertisements.

I may perhaps be allowed to notice a novelty in the history of the movement, viz.—a tea meeting of pledged teetotalers which we had on the 20th of November last; the result of which met our most sanguine expectations, 590 having partaken of the good cheer provided: the object of the meeting was to lay before the members "the claims of the temperance press"—"the duty of supporting the committee in their work by more liberal contributions"—"the necessity of a more efficient organization" (analogous to your temperance mission),—and the "claims of the Bolton Youths' Society." There being no holiday, and hundreds of our members being engaged to a late hour, you will agree with us that this was a pleasing demonstration.

The anniversary of the opening of our large Temperance Hall was celebrated as usual on New-year's day, by a soirée and public meeting.

Notwithstanding the fact of a dozen tea meetings being held in connexion with Sunday schools, at the same hour, and many of them being managed by teetotalers (it being the great festive day of the year in this town), upwards of 400 sat down to table, provided gratuitously by 39 ladies in the most handsome manner. Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., of Liverpool, presided at the meeting, who, with the Rev. J. Shepherd of Preston, and Mr. Hopwood of York, addressed the meeting in an impressive, interesting, and effective manner. J. Rorer.

DORKING.—On Friday, 2nd January, the members and friends of the Dorking Society held their anniversary in the British School Rooms, where upwards of 150 assembled to take tea together, previous to the business of the evening being commenced. The agent of the National Temperance Society, Mr. William Gawthorp, kindly attended on this occasion. The arrangements of the social repast gave the most entire satisfaction.

After tea the company adjourned to the lower room, and its number was greatly increased, so that the accommodation was scarcely sufficient to meet the comfort of the audience. Mr. Isaac Brown, late of Hitchin, now of Popbrook House, Dorking, was unanimously called to the chair, and after some preliminary observations, opened the meeting by calling on the secretary to read the report of the society's operations during the past year. (See CHRONICLE AND RECORDER for February.) After some observations from Job Hawkins, a resident teetotaler, and Mr. G. Penny of Hitchin the late secretary, Mr. W. Gawthorp, spoke at some length on the means which are employed to extend the practice of intemperance: the respected lecturer detailed these in a most convincing manner. The Chairman made some further remarks on individual influence and individual labour, and after the usual acknowledgment to the chair and the lecturer, the company departed about ten o'clock. At the close of, and since the meeting, several individuals have appended their names to the pledge-book.

W. S. CLARKE, Secretary.

MELKSHAM.—In 1836, James Teare of Preston, visited our town, and delivered a lecture on total abstinence, at the close of which a number of persons signed the pledge, some of whom have kept it to the present time, of whom the writer is one, from that time to the present we have continued to hold meetings as often as we could, and have been favoured with the assistance of some of the best and ablest advocates of the cause. Three years and a half ago we formed a Rechabite tent, our present number 17 members. Two years ago we formed what we call a teetotaler's money club, open to all teetotalers who are willing to pay a fine of 2s. 6d. if they break their pledge. They are at liberty to pay just what they please weekly, and the money so collected is placed in the Savings' Bank, and at the end of the year we have a tea party, and each member receives out all that he has paid in. We believe that this keeps many to their pledge; and it is an easy way to get the yearly premiums ready for the Temperance Provident Institution, and last year we had £32 to divide; this year more than £44, and no member has broken his pledge. Five of our members are assured in the Temperance Provident Institution for the sum of £450 in department second. During the past year we distributed 56 Bristol Herald's monthly, two dozen Little Englands, one dozen Rechabite Magazines, and one dozen Chronicles and Recorders. We have now purchased 18 sets of loan tracts and pledge books, and are determined to spread light and knowledge as much as possible; trusting to the Almighty for success. We have some specimens of reformation in our town read and known of all men. The public, houses and breweries show to all observers, that their trade is declining; but we are convinced, that if we could get a few more such men among us as the Rev. W. Griffith and Mr. E. Brooks, we should still more greatly increase. Our present number of members is upwards of 200.

JAMES GERRISH, Sec.

CHELMSFORD.—The ninth anniversary of this society was celebrated on Tuesday last, January 19th, by a public tea-party, in the county-room, at the Shire-hall, when there was a goodly muster of the friends of the teetotal principle in this part of the county, and about 250 sat down to the flowing cup, and a plenteous supply of the other creature comforts which the rules of the society admit. This part of the business was satisfactorily and comfortably disposed of, and tables and trays having vanished, the tea-table chat was exchanged for more regular speeches; a public meeting in aid of the teetotal cause being afterwards held in the same room, Mr. J. Christy was called to the chair, and the meeting, which numbered at least 700 persons, was addressed by Mr. Addleshaw, the agent for Essex, and by Mr. T. A. Smith, chemical lecturer, of London, who entered into a scientific explanation of the effects produced upon the human frame, by the use of strong drinks. Both these gentlemen were loudly cheered in the course of their addresses; and the proceedings of the day had the effect of bringing in twenty recruits to the teetotal ranks.—Ipswich Express.

WISBEACH.—The anniversary was held in the Temperance Hall, on the 16th ult., N. Walker, the respected Secretary, in the chair, who read the report for the past year, which was rather of a discouraging nature. Although several of the bankers, merchants, and respectable tradesmen had contributed liberally towards the erection of a new Temperance Hall, yet insuperable difficulties had subsequently arisen which had retarded the progress of the committee from carrying out their project; these had recently, in some measure been removed, and hopes were now entertained of a more favourable movement. Several resolutions were moved and seconded by Messrs. Lincoln, Rogers, Flint, Taylor, and Wilkinson of Wisbeach; Roberts of March, and Thomson from Leeds, indicating a more determined zeal to carry forward the principles of the society by a renewal of their weekly meetings and other necessary means. A public tea was held previous to this meeting, when upwards of 100 persons partook of the usual provisions. The whole evening's entertainment appeared to be marked with a great degree of unanimity.

T. Roberts.

WINCHESTER.—On Tuesday, the 10th February, the teetotalers of this city celebrated the anniversary of Her Majesty's nuptials, by holding a festival and public meeting for the advocacy of their principles, in the Wesleyan Association Chapel, at which the Rev. C. Edwards, minister of the chapel, presided, who is a teetotaler of more than nine years' standing. After partaking of a most excellent tea, with its accompaniments, the business of the evening commenced, by the chairman giving out a hymn and making a very admirable speech; and then the secretary, Mr. J. Godwin, read an excellent report of the operations of the society during the past year, from which it appears that meetings have been held weekly, about 200 addresses delivered, several meetings held at North Waltham and other villages, and six tea meetings also. At the commencement of the year 36 names were on the book, and during the year 167 were added, making 203, of which number 30 have been transferred and 12 have gone back—cash in hand, 9s. 6d. After the report, Mr. Hatherly addressed the meeting, followed by the Rev. H. Buss, the Rev. Mark Bradney, M. A., from Gosport, Mr. T. H. Burton, and Mr. G. Burton, the president for the present year. Altogether, it was a most encouraging meeting; the speakers seemed bent on their work, and the hearers on gaining information, as a proof of which, 16 took the pledge. Teetotalism never stood better in this city than at the present time; and if every teetotaler would only be up and doing, much more might yet be done. T. V. H.

Chronicle and Recorder.

LONDON: MARCH 1ST, 1846.

WE desire to call the earnest attention of all the Friends of Temperance to the announcement, that the NATIONAL SOCIETY have determined to hold the

WORLD'S CONVENTION

IN AUGUST NEXT.

It has been likewise decided, that the proceedings shall commence on Tuesday, the 4th of that month.

This arrangement has been made to suit the convenience of our American friends, who will have to attend the anniversaries, of the various Religious and Benevolent Institutions of their own country; and cannot, therefore, comfortably leave their homes at an earlier period than that, which will allow them to arrive in London, at the time now fixed.

We trust this announcement will have the effect of awakening a burning zeal among the teetotalers of the United Kingdom; so that the World's Convention of 1846, may be made the instrument of materially hastening the overthrow of that great evil, because of which all the nations of the earth do mourn.

Societies and Associations should lose no time in appointing delegates to represent them in the Convention; and we would again urge the necessity of the delegates thus appointed, coming prepared with important facts relating to the present state of the temperance cause, and with wise and judicious suggestions respecting the means best adapted to promote the interests of this great Reformation.

There is another point of much importance to which we wish to allude, viz.,—The entertainment of the delegates from distant countries. The Committee feel persuaded, that the friends of the cause in London and the neighbourhood, will not think of allowing Foreign Delegates to be at any expense of accommodation while attending the Temperance Convention. The Committee are anxious that arrangements should be made before the arrival of the Delegates, and therefore respectfully request the friends of the cause to forward, as early as convenient, particulars of how many gentlemen they are willing to entertain.

We again urge instant and strenuous effort, upon all who desire the abolition of the SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.

The present political excitement will pass away in a few weeks; and we must then be prepared to express our sentiments to Parliament.

In order to ensure unanimity of action, and to exhibit the full strength of the movement, we have, in connexion with the BRITISH ASSOCIATION, fixed upon the Monday immediately after the Easter recess, as the period for commencing the presentation of petitions.

It will thus be necessary that the metropolitan and country petitions be forwarded to the various members in sufficient time; so that, during the whole of the week, commencing with the Monday evening, they may be presented in one continuous stream.

When this has been done, we promise that some member of the House of Commons will move for a Committee of Enquiry on the subject; and the appointment of such a Committee will be one great step gained towards the attainment of our object.

We trust that this sketch of our future plan of proceedings will have the intended effect, of making our friends throughout the kingdom, more determined to prosecute this measure to a successful termination.

* * Every temperance society and Christian church, in or near the metropolis, can have two petitions gratis (one to the Lords and one to the Commons) on application at this office.

We beg to call the serious attention of our readers to the state of the funds applicable to the support of the Metropolitan Mission. The balance in hand is now reduced to £58 18s. 2½d., to which must be added the sum of £183 6s. 8d. remaining due on account of the Special Fund for 1846. This amount will last only to the end of June; at which date, unless prompt and liberal aid is afforded, the labours of the missionaries must be brought to a close. Our readers are aware that the benevolent friends who have contributed to the fund for 1846, have done so, on the condition that they are not to be called upon for any further contribution till next year. We have, therefore, only to trust to those who have not yet subscribed to that fund; and we most earnestly entreat them to come forward and bear their part in the great work, which has yet to achieve its conquest over intemperance.

We fear the continual repetition of missionary reports has, like well-known truths, in some measure defeated its object; that many who take more or less interest in the cause, have become weary of the similarity of cases recorded, and have either partially or wholly, neglected to peruse them. But let any man of right feeling, any one embued with a desire to alleviate the miseries of his fellow-creatures, refer to the reports published month after month in this journal; and we feel persuaded he will make some little sacrifice, rather than suffer the labours of the missionaries to cease. If, instead of hundreds of wretched beings rescued from misery and crime, we could number but tens or units, surely the soul of a single MAN, is not to be weighed against money and money's worth! We call upon all, both high and low, rich and poor, young and old, to contribute their mite to the treasury of the Lord. If the work be not of God, let us abandon it at once, and for ever. But if it be, let us take heed how we stand idle; how we withhold from the work of the Lord, what is of right His own; how we apply, or misapply, those gifts—be they great or be they little—which are given into our hands for the good of mankind.

MR. WILLIAM GAWTHORP.

This popular advocate, who has just finished his labours in Surrey and Sussex, in connexion with the National Society, has been re-engaged by the Committee; and will be at liberty during the ensuing three months, to lecture in London and the neighbourhood. Societies desiring his services, can make application at the Office, 39, Moorgate Street.

DR. GRINDROD.

It will be perceived from our advertizing columns that a few spirited individuals have engaged Dr.

GRINDROD to deliver a course of lectures in the Literary Institution, Greenwich. We trust this will be an example to the other Metropolitan Societies, to procure the services of the talented author of "Bacchus."

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

J. R. WILSON'S REPORT.

Aware of the sameness which must characterize my details, I shall, as briefly as possible, report my proceedings for the last month. On the 18th January, I paid a visit to my old friend and former patron, R. J. Shafto, Esq. of Bevington Hall, 20 miles north-west of Newcastle, where I met a hearty reception. I addressed the children of his Sunday-school and their parents; and distributed temperance tracts and pledges to the elder children, most of whom will become, if they are not already, teetotalers.

At a meeting, on the following evening, the system of organization was brought before the members and approved; and I have since been informed, that they intend to embrace six villages in the neighbourhood, and a supply of loan tracts and requisites has been sent. Although enfeebled by age, the worthy head of this ancient family is still as zealous as ever in the cause of Sunday-schools and temperance, of both of which he is the liberal patron.

On the 20th January, I met the committee of the Hexham Society, who resolved to bring the subject of the new organization before their approaching anniversary.

On the 22nd, I met a special meeting of the committee of the Newcastle Society, when it was resolved to form branch societies in two different parts of that town; and an order has since been sent off for a supply of loan tracts, and a sub-committee appointed to carry out the arrangements.

On Sunday, 25th January, I addressed 400 children and their teachers, belonging to four Sunday-schools, at Durham; distributed tracts and about 300 pledges to the elder children, with an injunction to read them; and if approved by their parents, to bring the pledges to their teachers on the subsequent Sabbath to be filled up.

On the following evening, I met the committee and members of the society, when an association was organized in connexion with the National Society, and a supply of tracts, &c., ordered. The reception I have met with has been most hearty; and the friends are determined to carry out the organisation as far as practicable. The bishop does not reside at Durham; and, consequently, I could not wait upon him on behalf of the society; but the dean is friendly to the temperance cause, though he does not wholly abstain. I hope, however, that my appeals will not be in vain.

On the 2nd February, the first anniversary of our own little branch was held at the Public Room, Gateshead Fell, when we were favoured by the assistance of Messrs. M'Kenna and Buchanan, whose appeals made a favourable impression on the crowded auditory; and at the conclusion of the meeting, about a score of persons, chiefly juveniles, signed the pledge. I had on the previous Sunday addressed the children of our Sunday-school, and distributed tracts.

The loan system is already in operation, and the society has been re-organised on the improved system, a number of the teetotalers having come forward as distributors. Some pleasing instances have occurred of the firmness of our young converts, one of whom, when offered drink by the owner of a horse, which he found on the road and took home, nobly refused, although urged to take it as a gratuity for his trouble. The practice of paying the colliers at a public house is unfavourable to the temperance cause in this neighbourhood. There are two reading rooms in the village with small libraries attached to each.

I am in conference with the Lamesley Society, where I was converted to the temperance principle. The worthy clergyman of the parish has assured me of his desire that the whole of the families should be supplied with loan tracts, and an association organized in connexion with the National Society. He has likewise given me a donation to the same.

On the 3rd, I accompanied Mr. M'Kenna to South Shields, where I had an opportunity of addressing the public meeting held to receive his communications, and the improved system is to be submitted to a special meeting of the members yet to be held. The population of South Shields and the neighbourhood is above 20,000, and the society numbers about 1200 members. They are contemplating the visitation of the whole, by means of a hired agent, and the circulation of tracts, &c. Several of the ministers in the town are members, and monthly periodicals both for adults and children, are published.

On the 5th, I attended a similar meeting at North Shields, in conjunction with Mr. M'Kenna; and there is every prospect of the society being re-organized and rendered more efficient. The experience of another month's labours, has deepened the conviction on my mind, that the organization recommended, with the loan tract system, the meetings of members, and the formation of reading rooms, are the likeliest means both of converting the people to temperance, and securing them against relapsing into their former habits. The public lecturing in the different towns does not reach the parties for whose benefit it is intended and adapted. If one in ten of the teetotalers can be induced to undertake the distribution of loan tracts, every family in the kingdom may be visited.

In order to ascertain how far the improved organization might be practicable and approved, I took the liberty of enclosing copies of the Manual, and other papers, to the Rev. Theobald Mathew, requesting his opinion or suggestions, and informing him of the mission on which I was entering. In his reply, he says:—

"I highly approve of the plan you have adopted; and it is unnecessary to inform you of my best wishes for the successful accomplishment of your desires. You will be glad to learn, that our glorious cause continues, with the Divine blessing to prosper in Ireland. The rising generation are being trained to habits of total abstinence; and the taste for reading, which you are so anxious to cultivate, is very general in all our temperance reading-rooms, throughout the kingdom. In this city alone we have nearly forty branch societies."

All that is necessary to realize so desirable a consummation in England, is, for each teetotaler to do his share of the work; to take twenty-five or fifty families, and spend an hour in the week in exchanging the tracts, and we should have to report equally delightful results as those which have followed the labours of the Apostle of Temperance.

I beg to acknowledge a liberal grant of tracts, suitable for children and teachers in Sunday-schools, from R. D. Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich, by which I have been enabled to present a copy to the several Sunday-school children I have addressed, and a further supply has been offered; for both of which I feel particularly grateful, as it affords me opportunities of sowing the seeds of temperance in the youthful mind, which will, I trust, produce a plentiful return in the future history of temperance. I intend to make addresses to the young on the Lord's day, assembled from the different Sunday schools, an important feature in my future operation.

YORKSHIRE.

Since my last report, a series of meetings have been held in Skipton, Colne, Settle, Keighly, and the adjoining villages; many of them very interesting and successful. Indeed, the cause of temperance never stood so well in this locality. In some of the places numbers are joining every night. The state of morals is considerably higher in this Union than in most of the Unions it has been my lot to labour in, as the following facts will show. In Skipton, with a population of from five to six thousand, there is not one unfortunate girl on the streets; and there is a village, named Brady, three miles hence, that contains five hundred souls, that has not had either public house or beer shop for the last fifty years, nor have they a known poacher in the town. Keighly, with a larger population than Skipton, has but two unfortunate creatures on the streets, and yet there is much need of information on temperance. We have some few of the ministers of the gospel with us, but not many. I hope the time will soon arrive when they will see and feel the importance of our glorious cause, and unite with us to banish intemperance from every town and village in the land.

W. BISCOMBE, Agent,

THE REWARD OF PERSEVERANCE.

In the Reminiscences of Morayshire Herd-Loon, published in the Forbes Gazette, of January, 1846, there is the following interesting passage; may it encourage many faint hearted teetotalers to persevere:—

"Being the first to espouse the temperance reformation in a town containing a population of seven thousand, I had, for the space of nearly twelve months, to encounter the opposition of my fellow-citizens single-handed. The drunken portion of the community were often outrageous in their opposition to the cause of sobriety; and when the work of agitation commenced in real earnest, I have frequently been surrounded by a furious mob of 300 persons, vowing vengeance against me, if I did not desist. Never once intimidated, although occasionally under the protection of the mayor and his officers, I was enabled to repose an unshaken confidence in the care and guidance of my heavenly Father and Preserver, and pursued the even tenor of my way confident of victory. Things have since altered, and I have now the honour of being the first of a society which numbers between four and five hundred members."

METROPOLITAN MISSIONS.

From December 31st, 1845, to January 31st, 1846.

DISTRICT No. IV.—E. S., a bedstead-maker, 72 years of age, said he felt much the worse for drinking last night; his son, also, was then in bed from the same cause. His wife was in prison for selling spirits contrary to law; and last year he was there himself for the same offence. The father and son both signed.

J. S. WARREN.

DISTRICT No. V.—A few weeks ago, J. M. and his wife signed the pledge, but it was too late as it regards the former. J. M., (the husband,) had been a hard drinker for years, had pawned everything to procure intoxicating liquors, had reduced his family to the extreme of poverty, brought on himself a most painful disease, and died a victim to intemperance.

Saw a child going home with a half-qrarten of gin, and shortly afterwards entering the same door with a half-penny worth of coals.

DISTRICT No. VII.—S. S. stated, that through drink her husband had deserted her and her five children. She had done all she could to induce him to return, but in vain. The wife, her eldest son, father, mother, and brother, five in all, signed the pledge.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

DISTRICT No. XIV.—“I am glad to see you,” said an aged reclaimed drunkard who signed the pledge four months ago. “I was at Lambeth Chapel the first Sunday in the new year attending a special religious service, a thing I have not done for twenty years before. I am resolved henceforth to serve God, and purpose to re-unite myself to the Wesleyans, from whom I had been separated through drink.” The missionary gave him the tract “Temperance auxiliary to Religion,” and exhorted him to seek divine grace that he may be steadfast for the future.

DISTRICT No. XV.—My father keeps his pledge, said a young woman, and, in consequence, has taken a neat cottage instead of the two rooms he formerly occupied. He has also a watch in his pocket, and now attends a place of worship.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

Attended the execution of Mary Browning, aged 22, at Newgate, and distributed tracts; held several conversations. They acknowledged that our principle was the right one. The tracts were all eagerly received.

Attended a meeting of the City Mission, in the School-room, Pie Street, Westminster—Capt. Trotter in the chair. The meetings of the temperance society are also held here. They both work well together, the latter being an excellent pioneer to the former.

Visited White-cross Street Prison, and delivered a lecture on Digestion, showing the evils of intoxicating liquors upon the health. Several prisoners came from the other wards, and one of the turnkeys was present. During the lecture, the publican came with his beer; only one pint was sold.

PORTLAND TOWN.

Attended the Anniversary Festival and Meeting—Dr. Oxley in the chair.

PORTMAN MARKET.

Rev. Jabez Burns in the chair. The missionaries were present, who gave an account of their operations in the several districts of the mission.

Fitzroy Temperance Hall, with two other missionaries, when a further account of the Metropolitan Mission was given.

J. H. DONALDSON.

MADEIRA.—TORY.

Visited the “Madeira,” the captain and mate of which had previously signed the pledge, and both remain firm. While talking with the captain, one of the sailors belonging to the Tory came on board. He gave the missionary his address on shore, requesting he would visit him there. A few days afterwards, the missionary called at his residence, a lodging-house in Ratchiffe Highway. There were three others present belonging to the same ship. One had spent nearly the whole of his pay since he came on shore, and now wished he had signed on his arrival; I can assure you, said he, we have seen and also suffered severely from the effects of drink in our captain, (Johnstone).* Another said, I feel confident that the Captain never would have acted in so barbarous a manner if he had not been given to drink. The missionary entreated them all to take the pledge, as a preventive against so depraved and hardened a state of mind as that produced in their captain through drink. The Tory men, all four, signed; the lodging-house keeper and son also signed, making six together.

W. STONEMAN.

DISTRICT No. XIX.—S. E. broke his pledge; his consequent sufferings, he said, were indescribable. He resigned; and, on visiting, have found him firm.

DISTRICT XX.—INCIDENTAL LABOURS.—With leave of the Superintendent, attended the following meetings:—The County of Surrey Association (in connexion with the National Temperance Society); a crowded meeting. Speakers were Mr. A. Young, (chairman,) Messrs. N. Smyth, Whitaker, T. A. Smith, Gawthorp, and Davis. At an adjourned meeting, the speakers were Mr. Buckle, (chairman,) Mr. Thomason, and the missionary.

On Monday, January 5th, attended at the Old Bailey, and Horsemonger Lane, at the two executions. In the evening, attended the anniversary of the Peckham Society.

Visited Sutherland Chapel, Hanover Chapel, Marlborough Chapel, Jurston Street, and George Street (Lambeth,) Sunday-schools; addressed the children, and gave tracts. Visited Greenwich College, held conversation, and distributed four hundred tracts and other temperance publications amongst the inmates, which were well received.

In the evening, conducted a temperance meeting in Roan Street, when several of the College men were present, and one of the name of Williams a teetotaler, addressed the meeting. There are about twenty teetotalers in the College.

January 23rd, attended the anniversary of the Lark Hall Lane Society, (Clapham,) the missionary opening the meeting by prayer. The speakers were R. Garde, Esq., barrister, (chair,) W. Sims, Esq., and Messrs. Silverside, Lee, and Bradley, (soldiers,) Spriggs, Beggs, Mendenhale, and missionary. Four signatures were obtained.

RICHARD HODGSON.

DISTRICT No. XXI.—M. M., a drunkard, lives in a back attic in H. Alley. To prevent the house from falling, it is supported by an iron bar fixed in the house opposite; the passage leading to the stairs very dirty, and two of the steps gone; the door of the room broken from its hinges, the window had board instead of glass, and the room nearly destitute of furniture; and for want of proper drainage, the smells in and about the house were intolerable. Neither the husband nor wife had eaten anything since yesterday, and no food in the house. The wife was loud in her declamations against the drink, but declined signing, saying she was not a drunkard. The husband signed.

DISTRICT No. XXII.—M. A., a printer's wife, only twenty-two years of age, living with her husband in a lodging-house; she has been a drunkard for several years; she cannot read, and never attends a place of worship. She knew nothing of teetotalism, and was afraid to sign the pledge. Through her influence and bad example, the husband is become a drunkard, and, though earning from 30s. to 40s. per week, they are utterly destitute. The wife, and another woman who was present, signed the pledge. The man declined.

* He has since been tried for the murder of three of the crew, but acquitted on account of insanity brought on by drinking.

DISTRICT No. XXIII.—C. C. is a court occupied entirely by fallen women. The rooms are small, and miserably furnished. In one of these the missionary found W. and H., the former seventeen, the latter eighteen years of age. W. had left her home only six weeks since; the little clothing she had was at the pawnshop. After some conversation, she expressed her willingness to leave her present evil course. H. had left her home six months: her father is poor, but respectable; she has friends in the city in a large way of business. She has suffered greatly, having been under the doctor's care nearly two months out of the six, and sometimes going without food for two days together. She begged the missionary would get her into an asylum, as her father had refused to take her home. The missionary brought them both before the committee of the Southwark Female Mission, through whom W. has been admitted into St. Thomas's Hospital, and H. has been received into the Female Penitentiary, Pentonville. They both signed the pledge.

P., a shoemaker, with a wife and four children, in great distress through the drinking-habits of the husband: he had pawned everything, even to his coat and working-apron, and what was left on him were in tatters. He said he was ashamed to reveal all his misery. He is the son of religious parents, and became in early life a Sunday-school teacher, and a member of the Wesleyans, to which society the whole family belonged. On leaving home for London, his moderate drinking, (through the drinking usages of his shopmates,) broke its prescribed bounds, and he became a confirmed drunkard. His wife, who was present, and in daily expectation of her accouchment, is destitute of all necessaries for such an occasion, and has not even a blanket or sheet. The two youngest children were almost in a state of nudity. The wife signed the pledge. The husband and eldest daughter have since signed. The missionary recommended the case to the Strangers' Friend Society, who have visited and relieved them.

DISTRICT No. XXIV.—M. C., a female, aged 19, is living in a room wholly destitute of furniture. Six months ago, she came to London, and obtained a situation; by going out, without leave, (to please an acquaintance,) she lost it. She had pawned all her clothes, but preserved her character; with tears, she said her mother was dead, and her father is in the East Indies, and she had no friend in town. She signed the pledge. The missionary procured her a temporary asylum, and has since obtained admission for her in the Refuge for the Destitute.

FRANCIS COLLINS.

DISTRICT No. XXV.—J. C., a member of a Christian church, came to the missionary and stated that he had long been opposed to teetotalism; but the drunkenness he had witnessed during the Christmas week had so grieved and disgusted him, that he felt he could stand out no longer, and would now sign the pledge.

M. A. F., a young woman, was intoxicated in the streets. The missionary accompanied her home; and on calling the following day, she said, "I have been trained from my infancy to drunkenness; strong drink has caused me all this misery." She signed the pledge.

On visiting a house in St. A. St. found three families, consisting of nine individuals, living in one room. A straw bed, some broken chairs, and an old table, comprised their stock of furniture. They were all employed at army work. Much of their earnings, they acknowledged, was spent in drink. Two men and their wives signed the pledge. They have since been re-visited, and there is a pleasing change both in the appearance of the room and in its inmates.

DISTRICT No. XXVIII.—J. N., a miserable-looking man, nearly blind, stated that drink not only ruined his circumstances and deprived him of friends, but it had so injured his sight, that he was now living on charity. He signed the pledge.

Visited a lodging-house in K. St. There was a numerous party; all admitted that drink had been an enemy to them, some confessing that they should have been in a very different situation now if they had kept sober. Nine of them signed the pledge. They have all, up to the present time, kept firm, and some have already greatly improved in their circumstances. The fact of so many signing in one lodging-house has been the talk of the neighbourhood.

JAMES BALFOUR.

STREET LABOURS.

Mrs. C., the wife of a bricklayer, said her husband had been a great drunkard, but signed the pledge, (herself signing with him,) and kept it for five years, which were the happiest of her life. Three years ago, he broke his pledge, when all their former misery returned. The missionary inquired if she had remained firm? She replied in the negative, having, for the sake of peace, taken a little. On the Sunday following, the missionary made a re-visit, when both re-signed.

Spoke to two gentlemen, a surveyor and another, who were partly intoxicated. While they declined signing the pledge, both confessed the evils of gross drunkenness.

The missionary accompanied G. F. home in a state of intoxication, and was received with thankfulness by his wife, who said, "I trust it is an interposition of Divine Providence that has led you here to-day. My poor husband has been going on in this way now for many years, scarcely sober a day. I was about going to look for lodgings for myself and children," she said, "as I cannot endure it any longer. He not only strips the room of everything he can take away, but is so abusive, using nothing but oaths and curses." The husband, who was now in a measure sobered, said it was all true, adding it was his determination not to touch the drink again. The missionary now entreated the wife to try him a little longer, to which she consented; and both signed the pledge, their four children following.

D. S., the son of an extensive Birmingham manufacturer, had a few years back a large and lucrative business, but lost the greatest part through drink. There were occasions when he would act like an idiot, at other times, the part of a raving maniac. The missionary's attention was directed to his case in November last, and has often visited him; but so rare have been the periods of perfect sanity, that the occasions have been employed condoling and advising with the wife and family. For the last few weeks, he has abstained: an improvement has taken place, and some favourable impressions have been made upon him. He has confessed his sin, and resolved to give up the drink. He signed the pledge, with his wife and children, and has since called on the missionary, expressing his gratitude for the repeated visits and attentions that had been shown him.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.—KENTISH TOWN.

The missionary obtained the use of the School-room in connexion with the Congregational Chapel, Trafalgar Place, Kentish Town, for the purpose of publicly advocating the cause. A series of meetings have since been held, the first of which took place the 22nd December last—J. Meredith, Esq., (Superintendent of the mission,) and G. Atwood, Esq., were present; subsequently, R. Hicks, Esq. (surgeon,) J. Cassell, Esq., and other gentlemen, have rendered their valuable assistance. The attendance has increased in number and interest. A society is about being formed in connexion with the National Temperance Society. Eighteen signatures have been taken.

WILLIAM CLARIDGE.

SURREY AND SUSSEX:

W. GAWTHORP, AGENT.

In addition to the places previously reported in the Chronicle, where I have lectured during my connexion with Surrey and Sussex, are the following:—

KINGSTON.—Our meetings here have been crowded by attentive hearers in the Literary Institution, and considerable numbers have joined our standard of peaceful warfare.

CHERTSEY.—We have occupied the Literary Institution here, also, and I have no doubt but a great many converts have been made to our principles.

GUILDFORD.—Our meeting have been very small. The indifference manifested to the temperance question is beyond anything I ever witnessed; perhaps this arises from the fact of the breaking-up of a society which once existed in this town. I am more than ever satisfied of the importance of organization, so that all the societies may have periodical visits from the agents.

LEATHERHEAD.—My two visits to Leatherhead were most gratifying. The Independent Chapel was kindly appropriated for my lectures; and the deep, rivetted attention of the audiences, was such as to convince me that the subject was occupying their most serious attention.

At CARSHALTON there are a few devoted friends to our cause. I have paid the society two visits.

At CAPEL, in the Friends' Meeting-house, we held a most interesting meeting a short time ago.

BRIGHTON.—I have paid several visits to Brighton, and although there are a considerable number of teetotalers in this gay town, yet there does not appear to be that united and efficient effort which is required for such a place, and for such a cause. The Cornish motto, "One and all," would do much in this place, if attended to.

LEWES has some noble trophies of the power of abstinence in reforming drunkards. The society is composed of about 200 members.

HASTINGS possesses a hard-working committee and the consequence is, considerable success attends the movement. I wish the members, generally, were more zealous.

At BATTLE we have a small but devoted band of co-workers in this good work. May they increase and abound.

We have had some good meetings at WORTHING (in the Town Hall), ARUNDEL, and CRAWLEY, and I have no hesitation in reporting great progress in public opinion in favour of the "spotless white banner of temperance."

WORTHAM.—I have given two lectures in the Town Hall at Wortham. Our cause is very low in this town, arising, perhaps, from the same cause which I have related of Guildford.

I have lectured once in each of the following places, where we have a few friends:—LINDFIELD, STEYING, DITCHLING, and CUCKFIELD.

At UCKFIELD, LITTLE HAMPTON, and EAST GRINSTEAD, we have some old, long-trying, and devoted teetotalers. I hope my visits to these places have been productive of good.

There is an interesting little cause at FORREST ROW, near East Grinstead.

The cause seems reviving at CHICHESTER and at RYE. The latter place is not in connexion with the Association, because they (the committee) have decided not to have lectures unless they are gratuitous. How the temperance cause is to be carried on according to this plan I cannot understand.

May this Association soon become powerful in promoting temperance, and effective in stemming the foul current of intemperance which has been flowing through this land for ages.

WEST NORFOLK UNION.

On the 28th January, the delegates' meeting representing the Lynn and West Norfolk Temperance Association, was held in the Primitive Methodist chapel, Outwell, James Doyle, Esq., of Crimplesham Hall, in the chair. A considerable number were present on this interesting occasion. The business was unusually important, comprising local movements; the circular from the Committee of the National Society, relating to the World's Convention; the petition to the legislature, restricting the sale of intoxicating drinks to six days in the week, &c. These occupied the close and attentive consideration of the meeting. Afterwards, a large company partook of tea in the chapel, and in the evening a crowded assemblage met in the same place, Joseph Mitchell, a respectable farmer from Wimblington, one of the finest specimens of teetotalism in the county, took the chair. His appearance for the first time in the capacity of chairman at a temperance meeting, afforded no little mirth to the audience, himself partaking of the good feeling that prevailed. It is reported that his weight is about 23 stone of 14lbs., and that in loading corn he can outwork any of his men with ease. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Lyon of Wimblington, Lowe, Giscand, and Keed of Lynn; Lallam and Flatman of Downham Market; Pigott of Stoke Ferry; Batterham of Tydd St. Mary's, and lastly, by J. B. Thomson of Leeds, each of whom contributed to the harmony of the day, which will be long remembered by many of those who witnessed the proceedings.

REVIEWS.

AN EXPOSURE OF ODD FELLOWSHIP. By H. Mudge, Esq., of Bodmin.

It would be unsuitable to our columns to give a lengthened review of a pamphlet bearing only indirectly upon the subject of temperance. Yet we cannot do less than call the attention of the friends of morality, and of the industrious classes, to the exposure of a scheme which, it is to be feared, continues to delude a large number of well-disposed men, and to administer largely to the support of the drinking usages. Mr. Mudge's pamphlet consists of 68 pages of closely and well-printed matter. A short extract would be useless. We therefore beg to recommend the whole subject to the earnest attention of our readers; and we take this opportunity of mentioning the valuable work of Mr. Neison, which is referred to by Mr. Mudge, and which contains facts of a startling character, applicable not only to Odd Fellows, and other schemes for squandering money under pretence of Providence, but to Benefit Clubs of every kind. As many of the friends of temperance have given their countenance to the order of Rechabites, we think it right to call their most serious attention to Mr. Neison's remarks upon the subject.

After stating that the average rates of fifty different benefit societies were (at the age of thirty-five years) £2. 10s. 5d. per year, for certain benefits which (without any allowance for expenses) must require £3. 9s. 8d., the writer thus speaks of the Rechabites:—

"They are, like the Odd Fellows, modelled after the very rudest shape in which benefit clubs were formed fifty years ago; and so far as relates to their contributions and benefits, little further need be stated." [Here follow the terms.] "It will thus be seen, that by the youngest member, at sixteen, there is an ultimate loss of 5s. 4d. annually; and by the member aged forty, there is a loss of £1, 13s. 5d. annually, provided that it were possible to sustain such losses; but it is needless to add, that permanence is not to be expected with societies so constituted. Not only do the Rechabite Societies, in common with Odd Fellows' Societies, perpetrate an injustice on the younger members by the above disparity in the payments, but that injustice is further augmented by levying a uniform tax of 3s. yearly, without distinction of age, for funeral money, the sum of £10. being payable on the death of each member. The discouragement given to drinking usages is deserving of every support, and is well calculated to increase the comforts, and elevate the moral and political condition of the working class; but it is to be regretted that the monetary foundation on which the societies are built should be destined to effect their overthrow at so early a period."

THE BOARD OF HEALTH AND LONGEVITY; or, Hydropathy for the People. By the Rev. W. Horsell, President of the Nature's Beverages Society. Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster Row.

The volume before us is dedicated to a defence of vegetable diet and hydropathy. The physiological and moral argument, in reference to the former subject, is conducted ably and with general success; but the treatment of the scriptural question we do not consider quite so satisfactory; the conjecture that the fish eaten by the Saviour and his disciples was the lotus, or some other plant, appearing to us to border upon the puerile. The observations on hydropathy abound with many valuable hints. The whole book is written in a popular style, and contains, within a short compass, a large collection of interesting information, evidently the result of much labour and research.

We recommend it to the perusal of all who are seeking the preservation or the attainment of health.

HEALTH MADE EASY. By the Author of Education as it Is, as it Ought to be, and as it Might be. Darton and Clark, Holborn Hill.

The dissemination of correct physiological knowledge among the people would do much to promote the health of the community: but this knowledge will be nearly useless to the majority of the people, unless conveyed in terms easily to be understood. The author of 'Health Made Easy' has, in our opinion, done this. His work is a meet companion to 'Hydropathy for the People.'

TOTAL ABSTINENCE FROM INTOXICATING LIQUORS REQUIRED BY CHRISTIAN LOVE. By W. A. Poppley. Maidenhead: J. Robinson.

Well calculated to impress upon the Christian's mind the evils of drunkenness and the blessings of temperance, and the responsibility resting upon him to strive to arrest the one and diffuse the other.

THE YOUTH'S NATIONAL TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE. Nos. 1. & 2. M. Woodley: Aldermanbury Postern.

A newly-started publication for the young. The first Numbers are neatly printed, and contains several interesting articles. We recommend it as well worthy the countenance and support of all juvenile teetotallers, and all youths' temperance societies.

THE FEMALE'S FRIEND.

We have received the first Number of a magazine with the above title, accompanied by a circular from the ASSOCIATE INSTITUTION for Improving and Enforcing the Laws for the Protection of Women, and a draft of a Bill proposed to be presented to Parliament for the suppression of houses of infamous character. The subject could not be suitably taken up in our already crowded pages; but we do most earnestly entreat our readers to procure the Magazine referred to, which contains a full account of the plans of the Society, and to do all that in them lies not only to check the actual commission of crime, but more especially to restrain those evil passions which lead to it.

The Female's Friend is published by Houlston and Co. NATIONAL TEMPERANCE MAGAZINE. Cook, Leicester. Brittain, London.

The Numbers of this periodical for January and February contain a variety of interesting articles on temperance, education in its widest sense, and other important subjects.

We trust Mr. Cook will be generally supported; nothing but a very large circulation of the Magazine can cover the expense.

A stamped edition is published, price 6d.

TIMOTHY; a Sketch for the Sober and the Young. By Rev. J. DUNCAN. Alwicks: W. Davison, Bondgate Street.

This Poem, consisting of 32 pages, evinces considerable powers of versification, and contains a number of valuable moral precepts.

Timothy's "Education," "Faith in Christ," "Office and Companionship," form the subject of separate chapters.

His "Indisposition," and the "Prescription" of St. Paul are then enlarged upon. The unsoundness of the anti-teetotal argument, is exposed at some length. We have only room for one short extract:—

"It may seem simple, yet we really think,
That this prescription in its spirit seen,
Forbids to Christians, as a frequent drink,
The wines whence thoughtless men their gladness glean.
It aims at that, which these but contravene.
It claims that habit shall to health give place;
(And rightly claims, if we but rightly see:)
But fashion now this verdict would efface,
And give those habits sway, that health and beauty chase!"

We commend this Poem to the attention of all our readers; but especially the young. They, particularly, cannot but be benefited by its careful perusal.

AN APPEAL TO THE PIOUS, &c. By R. TABRAHAM. Second Edition. Houlston and Stoneman, London.

We again cheerfully give our approval to Mr. Tabraham's excellent "Appeal;" and rejoice to find it has reached a second edition. In spirit and matter it is unexceptionable.

THE EFFECTS OF TEMPERANCE.

[The Rev. J. Sherman has forwarded us the following letter, addressed to him by a gardener residing at Peckham Rye. It merits a careful perusal of it, especially by the opponents of temperance.—Eds.]

"December 8th, 1845.

"REV. AND RESPECTED SIR,—.... Passing your chapel in 1840, and seeing it very crowded, I was induced to enter it through sheer curiosity. You soon removed the stumbling-block out of my path; and God will repay you. It will be ever out of my power to do so. Before that memorable night I was a drunkard, and visited the drunkards' dens; but ever since I have thought it a duty, or rather a pleasure, to attend the house of God. Little does Dr. Collyer know, that through your instrumentality, and that of true temperance, additions have been made to his congregation: for I have been the humble means of making several of my trade teetotalers, who are now worshippers at his chapel. Two years and a-half since I was enabled to purchase the cottage I now live in, which I bought of the Rev. T. M. Ready, late of Peckham, who sold it to me for half the value, as a reward to temperance and industry.....

"I remain, Sir, your obedient and ever thankful servant,

"AARON MOORE."

PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

(Extract from the Fifth Annual Report.)

"The claims upon the Institution by the deaths of members have continued remarkably light. Six only have occurred during the year, and only twelve since the commencement of the Institution. One of the most successful Institutions, of a similar character, reported, at the close of its fifth year, more than double the number of deaths out of little more than half the number of members! The fifth report of that Institution stated that 810 life assurances had been effected, and that 25 had been terminated by death. The Temperance Institution, in five years, has issued 1596 life assurances, and had but 12 claims on account of death!

"One case occurred recently, which may serve to show the advantage the members of this Institution enjoy over the members of offices which are liable to the heavy losses continually occurring through intemperance. A female had assured her life for £50, and had subsequently fallen into intemperate habits. This being discovered, she was informed that the assurance was void. The policy was surrendered, and her last payment returned. Within a few weeks, she died.

"The recent publication of the returns of local benefit societies and secret orders, which prove, beyond question, the utter insolvency of most, if not all, of those delusive schemes, has again called the Directors' attention to the desirableness of encouraging working men to join well established and properly constituted assurance societies. With this view, it has been resolved that members of benefit societies, and other persons, being teetotalers, shall be admitted in parties of not less than ten persons, free of all charges for stamp and medical examination, on payment of one shilling each, entrance money.

"It is hoped that many, if not all, of the prudent members of temperance societies will avail themselves of these facilities. They will participate in the profits of the Institution, and be entitled to all the privileges enjoyed by members assured for larger amounts.

"The Directors would therefore recommend an early application for membership, on the following grounds:—

"1. Because the sooner an assurance is effected, the sooner will it come in for the annual bonus.

"2. Because every year's delay adds to the premium required.

"3. Because every day incurs the risk of death, or of disqualification, by accident or illness."

FRENCH AND ENGLISH WOMEN.

A French paper, La Siecle, contained in a late number an elaborate article on the proportion of crime in England and France.

Galvani's Messenger, in reviewing that article has the following passage:—"The real cause of the great proportion of crime in the English women of the labouring class, as compared with the same class in France, we have no doubt is mostly owing to the sobriety of the French women."

MADAGASCAR.

In the history of Madagascar, by the Rev. William Ellis, compiled chiefly from original documents, there is the following interesting account given of the beverages used by the natives:—

"The general, and indeed almost universal beverage of the natives, is water. A distilled spirit, under the general name of 'toaka,' is occasionally used, throughout the island, but only as a luxury, not as a common beverage.

"To the parts of the coast visited by Europeans, rum and arrack have been principally imported, and sold to the natives by the bottle or cask. These drugs are also taken in exchange for rice, and have involved many families in want and ruin. The use of ardent spirits is prohibited at the capital: the law, however, is frequently evaded. Considerable quantities are used there, though, for the most part, within the precincts of the palace-yard, whence the laws emanate, and whence any indulgences are obtained, since in a state of society resembling that prevailing in Madagascar legislators do not always feel bound by their own oaths.

"The habits of life among the Masslyga, being in many respects exceedingly simple, exempt them from much disease, and favour the duration of life. It has been observed by those who have resided long in the country, that there are in most sections of the island an unusual number of very aged persons. Many appear, from the number of times at which the festival of Fandroana has occurred exactly at the same time (an event which takes place only once in three and thirty years), and from their recital of events within their recollection, to have numbered on earth nearly one hundred years; while there are others who are supposed to have attained a still greater age, and who, free from any particular disease, seem to be gradually sinking under the accumulated weight of years."

NATIONAL BEVERAGE OF MEXICO.

In a valuable work entitled, Mexico as it was and as it is, by Brantz Mayer, Esq., Secretary to the United States Legation to that country in 1842, there occurs the following notice of the common inebriating beverage used by the Mexicans:—"At St. Augustine, you see extensive plantations of the maguey aloe, or agave Americana, from which the favourite drink of the natives is made, in the vallies of Puebla and Mexico.

"When the plant reaches the age of seven years, it is usually ready to bloom. Upon the appearance of the first symptoms of a bud, the centre stalk is cut out, and a bowl hollowed in the middle of the large leaves; into this, for several days, the juice of the plant exudes plentifully; and as the bowl fills at certain periods during the day, it is sucked into a large gourd by the Indian labourers, who transfer it from this to hog-skins. In these it is taken to the haciendas, slightly fermented in large vats lined with bull's-hides, whence it is again transferred to skins, and so carried to the city or the shops and sold. It is really amusing, thus to behold the skin of a stout porker injected with the heady liquid—his legs sticking out and even the remnant of his tail twisting with his wonted curve! * * * I cannot say that the flavour is pleasant, though it varies greatly in different parts of the country. I have tasted some in Mexico, that has been sent as a present from a hacienda, near Puebla, which was delicious; but the ordinary liquid sold in the shops, seemed to me very like sour lemonade, improved by the addition of cream-of-tartar. It was like the famous wine of one of the vallies that pours its streams into the Rhine, with which the old women of the neighbourhood darn their stockings! One drop it is said, put on any ordinary hole, draws it for ever and securely, like a purse-string."

This pulque may be styled the 'beer of Mexico,' and greatly resembles our national beverage in its deleterious effects. Mr. Mayer in another portion of his work remarks:—"On the canals around the markets and pulque shops, the Indians, and those miserable outcasts (the lepros who are the working population of Mexico) are all day long; feeding on fragments, quarrelling, drinking, stealing, and lying drunk about the pavements, with their children crying with hunger around them.

AMERICAN TEMPERANCE PILOTS.

There are 70 pilots in the pilot service of New York, all middle-aged men, none of which are eligible except total abstinence men. Therefore vessels are never lost owing to drunken pilots; this is impossible. The English here might borrow a leaf out of the American's book. The first thing an English pilot asks for, is a glass of grog; whilst, the New York pilot, who boarded us a hundred miles from the port, was pledged in common with the other 69 of the fraternity, to drink nothing stronger than tea or coffee, or they would be refused a license!"—Rubio's Rambles in the United States.

THE DEPOSITION AND MURDER OF PETER THE THIRD.

It is seldom considered how great an influence intemperance has had upon the fate of empires. The humane Peter the Third of Russia, with a kindly disposition, was much addicted to drink; and it seems probable that this habit was the immediate cause of his losing his empire and his life. Shortly after he ascended the throne a conspiracy was formed against him, by the empress and her friends. Of the result of this conspiracy, Horace Walpole gives the following account:—

"Nariskin, master of the horse, was the sole subject who had fidelity enough to make his escape and inform the emperor of the catastrophe that awaited him. That poor prince was at Oraniebaum, a villa. Thunderstruck with the news, he had not presence of mind to prepare himself to save either his empire or his life. He lost both by losing a day, which he wasted in drinking and vain consultation, after having fruitlessly sent to Peterhoff to secure the empress. Next morning he heard that his wife at the head of fourteen thousand men were marching to seize him. He then attempted to make his escape to Holstein, and embarked for Cronstadt—but it was too late! The garrison had received orders to fire on him. Exhausted with perturbation of mind, with drink and fatigue, he sunk under his misfortunes, surrendered himself, and desired to see his wife, now his sovereign. As incapable of pity as of remorse, she refused to admit him, ordering him to sign a renunciation of his crown, and a most humiliating recapitulation of his errors. Nor did this avail: within very few days he was murdered."

Strong drink set the infamous Catherine on the throne of Russia.

MONSTER BREWERY.

Barclay's celebrated brewery in London, covers an area of fifteen acres. It contains conduits half a mile in length, railroads, hoppers, steam-engines, &c., enough to confuse one. One hundred and eighty-seven horses, each worth three hundred dollars, are constantly employed. One copper boiler will contain 4200 barrels of beer. Thirty tons of coal are consumed daily. The malt bins will contain 1,600,000 bushels, worth 2,500,000 dollars. Fifteen hundred barrels of ale are made every day, and sixty cats are kept to destroy mice. This establishment does vastly more to deprive the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland of food, than "short crops," yet we hear much less complaint about it.—New York Organ.

THE FOLLY OF DRINKING HEALTHS.

(Copied from the Temperance Herald.)

The absurdity of this dangerous practice is exhibited in the writings of the German Prince Puckler, in the following pointed manner:—"It is not usual to take wine (during dinner in England) without drinking to another person. When you raise your glass, you look fixedly at the one with whom you are drinking. bow your head, and then drink with great gravity. Certainly, many of the customs of the South Sea Islanders, which strike us the most, are less ludicrous. It is esteemed a civility to challenge anybody in this way to drink; and a messenger is often sent from one end of the table to the other to announce to B. that A. wishes to take wine with him; whereupon each, and sometimes with considerable trouble, catches the other's eye, and goes through the ceremony of the prescribed nod with great formality, looking at the moment very like a Chinese mandarin. Glass jugs filled with water, happily enable foreigners to temper the brandy, which forms so large a component part of English wines."

Of an English dinner, Professor Raumer thus remarks:—"Though I passed all the strong wines, and drank but few of the healths or toasts, I yet drank too much. This was almost inevitable from the want of any drink for quenching thirst."

In this country, unfortunately, health drinking is in some degree patronised by the female portion of society. Contrast this practice with that of the ladies of Vienna. "Among circles of the highest ton," observes Mrs. Trollope, in her recent work, "a young lady cannot touch wine of any kind, without materially tarnishing the delicacy of her high breeding thereby."

POETRY.

THE DRUNKARD'S CHILD.

(From the Fountain.)

A little child went forth
One evening chill and bleak—
A gentle child, with faded eyes,
And sunken, pallid cheek.
"Oh! give unto me bread,"
She cried in accents wild—
"My mother rests in death her head."
It was the DRUNKARD'S child!
She paced the crowded street,
Where busy feet went by,
But no one to her piteous plaint
Vouchsafed a kind reply,—
Then down she bowed her head,
And in her anguish wild,
"Would I were with my mother dead,"
Said the poor Drunkard's child.
The bitter storm went past—
The night came bleak and chill—
And there the child's unconscious form
Was lying cold and still.
God pitied her distress—
He on the weak one smiled;
And from a world of wretchedness
He called the Drunkard's child.

TO OUR READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications for the APRIL Number of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER, should be forwarded on, or before, the 15th of the present month, addressed to the Editors, 39, Moorgate Street, London; and, if articles of intelligence, must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer.

We have made arrangements to present our readers monthly, with a variety of articles on the most important points of the temperance question, written expressly for this publication, by gentlemen of well-known literary attainments. We publish in our present Number, the first of a series of essays, tracing the connexion between temperance and religion, from the pen of the Rev. W. H. Turner, Vicar of Banwell, Somerset.

Reports from the Rev. E. Davies, Messrs. Gamble, Heritage, Glover, &c., in our next, if possible. Also articles of intelligence from Brighton, &c.

WATER CURE.

GERMAN BATHS,

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, MIDDLESEX.

These BATHS are elegantly fitted up with a great variety of Douches, Couches, Baths, and every comfort, for the express purpose of affording to Invalids an opportunity of undergoing a regular course of "Water Treatment," under the direction of any Medical Adviser they may prefer, no medical man having any proprietary or other interest in these Baths, while the manipulations are performed by regularly taught male and female skilful Bath attendants. The Harrow Baths are strictly a Bathing and not a Boarding Establishment, (the patients occupying private lodgings in the village.) The Baths are only ten minutes' walk from the Harrow Station on the London and Birmingham Railway, and are reached in twenty-five minutes from the London Terminus at Euston Square. Fifteen Trains stop at Harrow daily, and the facility afforded by the half-crown first class day tickets, enables those whose avocations will not admit of their occupying lodgings in the vicinity of the Baths, to come to them for the Water Treatment at the times prescribed, and return to town again for that small sum. For Terms and other particulars, and as to Lodgings, address, Mrs. PRICE, German Baths, Harrow, Middlesex.

HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT,

STANSTEAD BURY HOUSE,

NEAR WARE, HERTFORDSHIRE

BY DR. JOHNSON,

Author of "Life, Health, and Disease," "Theory and Principles of Hydropathy," &c., &c.

For the cure of indigestion, rheumatism, bilious habits, excessive liability to take cold, nervous debility, spasms, languid circulation, psoriasis, constipation, determination of blood to the head, chronic ulcers of the leg, and all diseases depending on general debility, or suppressed or depraved secretions, torpid liver, stomach diseases, and chronic inflammation of the mucous membranes. This treatment is also exceedingly useful when the main object is to strengthen and harden the delicate constitutions of young persons of a serofulous or consumptive tendency. In many of those painful and irregular diseases which cannot be ranked in any particular class, and which have defied all ordinary remedies, this treatment has often been found successful.

THE TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

To pass indiscriminate censure upon any whole class of our fellow-men, must be at all times uncharitable and unjust. Yet it is the duty of a Christian, and especially of a public journalist, at all suitable times, and in all proper ways, faithfully to denounce that which is evil, and unflinchingly to uphold the truth. If, therefore, in our observations, we may ever appear to press hard upon the dealers in intoxicating liquors, let the reader be assured, once for all, that we desire to judge no man. To his own master let him stand or fall.

In passing through the streets of this great and wealthy capital, the eye cannot but be painfully attracted by the numberless splendid "gin palaces," beer-shops, and other houses for the sale of strong liquors, which everywhere abound, but most of all, where vice and destitution are most apparent. Nor can it but occur to the observer, how such numbers of these establishments can be supported by persons complaining of abject poverty, and apparently unable to pay for the common necessaries of life. Yet, when we find these places, kept open on the Sabbath day, and at hours, when all others are closed, one is tempted to conclude, that these poor wretches must be correct in their notions, or at all events, but following the views of their betters, in regarding gin and beer as the prime essentials of human life. "Bread may be the staff of life," said an old drunkard, but "gin is life itself."

Were we to inquire into the origin of these costly edifices, and whence comes the capital with which they are established and decorated, to allure the unwary and lead their victims to ruin, it is possible we might find embarked in these hotbeds of iniquity, and sinks of abomination, the money of the great and the wealthy, ay! and of the far-famed benefactor and philanthropist! Shame upon the hypocrisy which thus profanes the name of benevolence.

We might perhaps excuse the brewer who keeps to his trade of supplying families and inns; nay, we might not condemn him for executing any unsought orders. All this may be done by an honest man, for want of due consideration. But when we find men directly and knowingly living upon the demoralization and misery of their countrymen; when we find them actually establishing places for the express purpose of tempting their victims to continue in sin, to bring their families to want, to squander the resources of their country in vice and abomination; and for no earthly use, but to enable the authors of their woe to live in splendour and in pride, we confess we cannot, with the utmost stretch of charity, suppress our indignation, nor find any valid excuse.

THE STAFFORD ELECTION.

The following statement appeared in the Times of Friday, March 13th.

"The sudden and unexpected retirement of Mr. Lawrence Heyworth, on Tuesday evening, was the occasion of much disappointment not only to his friends but also to a large body of the poorer electors, who considered the present as a legitimate occasion for getting some drink at the expense of somebody. It appears that Mr. L. Heyworth is a teetotaler, and that he urged his objections to intoxicating liquors so strongly to his committee, that it was intimated to him, an election could not be carried in Stafford without treating of some kind.

"Accordingly Mr. Heyworth left Stafford on Tuesday night, and on Thursday morning, a letter was received by his Committee formally announcing that he would not contest the Borough on such principles, and conveying his RESIGNATION."

So the free and independent electors of Stafford have publicly recorded, through their committee, that their votes are to be bought for DRINK! that they have no principle of action, no honesty of purpose, no discrimination of judgment that can stand against their love of tipples! that their "freedom" means freedom of drinking at another man's cost! their "independence"—an independence of all respect for their vaunted privileges of citizenship—of all fear of the contempt of every virtuous man! What signify a candidate's qualifications for parliament, if he will not supply his constituents with drink! What avail his character for patriotism and his commercial standing, if he will not support a system which occasions the waste of fifty millions a-year! Mr. Heyworth's character and abilities are acknowledged on all hands; his fitness for the office proposed is not disputed; his election was all but certain: but he would not supply the freemen of Stafford with beer, and therefore they pronounced him unfit to represent them in parliament!

Oh! wise and virtuous men of Stafford! Oh! free and independent electors! Let your banner henceforth be a pot-house sign, your hustings a beer barrel, and the armorial bearings of your renowned and immaculate borough, a foaming tankard standing upon the cap of liberty!

One word to our friend, Mr. Heyworth. We rejoice that one "free and independent" candidate has entered his public protest against the system of treating and drunkenness, which the Stafford electors are not ashamed to patronise! We rejoice in the conviction, that Mr. Heyworth's resignation will do more to expose this system of tyranny and vice, than his return could have done. And we are afresh assured, that a man who has stood firm to his principles on such an occasion, will be equally firm, and equally efficient, when a more honest, a more "free," and a more "independent" set of men, shall return him as their representative in parliament.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

It might seem almost superfluous to bring forward facts to prove the baneful effects of the traffic in intoxicating liquors upon missionary efforts. They are known to every one who has read a missionary report; they are deplored by every one who desires the extension of Christianity amongst the heathen. Familiar truths, however, require to be often repeated. The heart which glows with just indignation on reading of the atrocities committed by "civilized," "Christian" men upon the helpless savage for the sake of gain, grows cold, and forgetful when the wine goes round; and encourages, by all the force of example, those very drinking habits, which at this moment are sweeping whole races of men from the face of the earth. The remarks of Mr. Catlin, in reference to the American Indians, are, unhappily, applicable to almost all other aboriginal tribes. Strong drink is their curse and destruction; and beings calling themselves men, and disgracing the name of Christianity, knowingly, deliberately, and from the single motive of avarice, spread disease, crime, misery, and death amongst their fellow-creatures, who, however debased they may be, are more worthy the name of humanity than themselves.

What can a few solitary missionaries do to stem the torrent of vice and rapacity, ever following in the track of commerce! "I have visited," says Catlin, "most of the stations, and am acquainted with many of the excellent missionaries, who are labouring to benefit these benighted people; but I have, with thousands of others, to deplore the ill success with which their painful and faithful labours have generally been attended. This failure," he continues, "I attribute not to the want of capacity on the part of the savage, nor for lack of zeal and Christian endeavours of those who have been sent. The misfortune has been, in my opinion, that these efforts have mostly been made in the wrong place; along the frontier, where, though they have stood most in need of Christian advice and example, they have been the least ready to hear it, or to benefit from its introduction; where whiskey has been sold for many years, and every sort of fraud and abuse visited upon them and amongst their families, by ingenious, money-making white men; raising up the most deadly prejudices, which, and which alone, in my opinion, have stood in the way of the introduction of Christianity, agriculture, and every thing which virtuous society has attempted to teach them."

If this be the case, what is the obvious duty of the friends of the aborigines and of missions? Surely, to begin their work of charity at home. To abolish the fatal trade in alcoholic liquors; to influence public opinion against the system of spoliation everywhere carried on; to force the merchants who freight their ships with poison, to desist from their iniquitous traffic—if not for the sake of humanity, for very shame; to make the deriving of wealth from the misery and destruction of the helpless, as disgraceful in the eyes of the world, as it is scandalous to all virtuous men, and sinful in the sight of God.

When the South Seas were first visited by British merchants, a great navigator wrote—"I know of no sufficient punishment that the wretch would merit, who should import a cargo of spirituous liquors into the Sandwich or Society Islands: it would, in every respect, be tantamount to the wilful administration of an equal quantity of poison." The poison has been long since administered; the crime has been committed; the helpless savage has borne the punishment; and men calling themselves Christians have pocketed the spoils.

WARM CLIMATES.

A book has lately issued from the press, entitled Davidson's Trade and Travel in the Far East; a critique on which, appeared in a recent number of the Spectator. The following paragraph—quoted by the Spectator without stricture—attracted our attention:—

"EFFECTS OF TEETOTALISM."

"There seems to be some fatality attaching to the clergymen at Singapore. The last three incumbents, Messrs. Burn, Durrat, and White, all died young, and of the same complaint, viz., diseased liver. My own opinion is, that they were all too strict adherents to teetotalism. In warm climates, a moderate, or rather liberal allowance of wine, I believe to be absolutely necessary."

Concerning the facts of the above case, we can of course know nothing. We take, however, the statement as correct, that the three clergymen "died young; and of the same complaint, diseased liver;" but we dissent very strongly from Mr. Davidson's opinion, that teetotalism had any thing to do with their disease; and we as strongly object to his belief, that "in warm climates, a moderate, or rather liberal allowance of wine, is absolutely necessary." What this "liberal" allowance is, is not stated, and why "wine" alone is mentioned is equally unexplained. But we unhesitatingly deny both Mr. Davidson's "opinion and belief;" and in support of this denial, we shall adduce proof the most incontrovertible.

I. The assertion, that strong drink is "absolutely necessary in warm climates," is CONTRARY TO SCIENCE AND MEDICAL TESTIMONY.

It is well known that alcohol evolves a great quantity of heat; and to say, therefore, that its use is necessary in warm climates, is tantamount to asserting, that in tropical countries, the heat of the sun does not afford sufficient warmth without the aid of alcoholic fire! The fact is, the excessive heat tends to debilitate the system—and to remove this debility, recourse is had to the stimulating properties of alcohol; but as alcohol cannot nourish, it is obvious, that when its stimulating effects have subsided, the body is left in a weaker state than before; and, be it remembered too, in a state less able to resist the attacks of disease.

DR. RUSH, the "American Hippocrates," justly observes—"Spirituous liquors add an internal fire to the external heat of the sun; they dispose the system to fevers and inflammations of the most dangerous kind; and half the diseases which are said to be produced by warm weather, are produced, I am persuaded, by the spirits which are swallowed to lessen its effects upon the system."

"Rum," remarks DR. BELL, "when used moderately, or in excessive quantities in the West Indies, always diminishes the strength of the body."

DR. JAMES JOHNSON, who resided for twenty years in the East Indies says, "common sense alone, would point out the propriety of avoiding heating and stimulating drinks."

DR. MACRATH of Jamaica, declares—"the generality of people would do better by abstaining altogether from spirits, wine, and malt liquors."

The tendency to disease produced by alcoholic liquors is noticed by DR. MADDEX, who attributes the frequency of liver and bilious complaints to the use of stimulating drinks.

WILLIAM BURKE, Esq., inspector-general of the military hospitals in the East and West Indies, asserts, "in these climates, fevers, delirium tremens, apoplexy, &c., are excited by the use of strong drink."

II. The assertion, that strong drink is "absolutely necessary in warm climates," is CONTRARY TO FACT.

The unavoidable brevity of this article, will only allow us to adduce a few testimonies; any one of which is sufficient to overturn Mr. Davidson's "opinion and belief."

We shall commence with the EAST INDIES.

H. MARSHALL, Esq., deputy-inspector of the army hospitals, remarks, "So far from being calculated to assist the human body in enduring fatigue, I have myself marched on foot with troops in actual service, in a tropical climate, whose mean temperature is considerably higher than that of Jamaica, without any other beverage than water, and occasionally a cup of coffee. I have always found that the strongest liquors are the most enervating, and this in whatever quantity they are consumed."

The palanquin bearers from Calcutta to Delhi, who trot at the rate of five or six miles an hour, drink nothing stronger than water.

REV. T. BROTHERTON of Mysore, says—"I am sure, that under God's blessing, I owe my prolonged existence to the principles of abstinence I have been so happily led to adopt."

REV. C. CAMPBELL declares—"My own experience has added to the strength of former convictions, that wine, beer, &c., are by no means necessary to any person in the enjoyment of health, whatever may be the nature of his constitution; but, that they are injurious, in exact proportion to the extent to which they are used."

There are upwards of 300 teetotalers in Her Majesty's 10th regiment of foot; and, after a march of 900 miles, Sergeant WHITTAKER thus writes—"The teetotalers in the regiment were capable of more exertion, and of enduring more bodily fatigue, without the aid of any stimulating drink."

From DR. R. D. THOMSON'S lecture on the "Influence of Alcoholic Fluids," we extract the following table, showing clearly, that the number of liver complaints among the soldiers of the Cameronian regiment, varied with the consumption of spirits:—

Liver complaints.	Consumption of spirits.
1832 111	} 10,000 to 14,000 gallons.
1833 140
1834 135
1837 82	} 2,000 to 3,000 gallons.
1838 50

The rate of mortality among the Bengal troops, also decreased, as the consumption of spirits decreased.

Consumption of spirits.	Mortality.
1832	} 76
1833 } 10,000 to 14,000 gallons
1834 }
1837 } 2,000 to 3,000 gallons	} 26
1838 }

FINALLY.—About 5,000 members of temperance societies in the East Indies, (most of whom are officers and privates in the army,) prove the complete fallacy of the assertion, that strong drink is "ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY in warm climates."

ARABIA, &c.

The Israelites wandered forty years in the desert, and their sole drink was water.

The Saracens, who over-ran Asia, Africa, and part of Europe, were abstainers from intoxicating liquors.

The hardy Bedouin Arabs, drink nothing, says a modern traveller, "but the water of the way."

KEPPEL, in His Travels up the Tigris, observes that though himself and companions drank water only, they retained their health during their long and fatiguing journey.

AFRICA.

Of the natives of Madagascar, REV. W. ELLIS states, "Their general and almost universal beverage is water; and their habits of life being in many respects exceedingly simple, exempt them from much disease, and favour the extension of life."

REV. J. F. SCHÖN, church missionary, at Sierra Leone remarks, "We begin to see that we can live even in Western Africa, without the aid of alcoholic drinks. Since I have abstained, I have felt my health much better than before."

REV. J. READ, Missionary at Kat River, South Africa, writes—"We have under our charge here, perhaps about 4,000 persons, old and young, and we are not aware of more than three or four families who take any kind of intoxicating drinks." What is the result of this great experiment? "Our people are very healthy, industrious and cheerful."

BARROW, in his Travels in Caffreland, asserts, "Their, [i. e. the Caffres,] total ignorance of the use of ardent spirits and fermented liquors, and their general temperance, preserve them from the ravages of many disorders."

When the English army was in Upper Egypt, no ardent spirits were issued. SIR JAMES M'GREGOR says—"Their duties were severe upon them. The heat was excessive. In the soldiers' tents in the middle of the day, the thermometer stood at 114° and 118° Fahrenheit;" and it is added, "at no period was the Indian army in so healthy a state."

REV. DR. PHILIP of Cape of Good Hope, affirms, "I have realized in my own experience, that the use of intoxicating liquors is not only unnecessary but absolutely prejudicial."

SOUTH AMERICA.

British Guiana is one of the most unhealthy climates in the world. A great portion of it is covered with marshes; which, added to the excessive heat, renders it in a peculiar sense, the grave-yard of Europeans.

There are, nevertheless, more than 6,000 resident teetotalers; and REV. E. DAVIES gives the following as their testimony: "In our own persons, we have demonstrated, that the English constitution can stand better in this deadly climate without any intoxicating drinks whatever."

MR. WATERTON, the eminent traveller declares, in his Wanderings in South America—"I never drink wine, spirits, or fermented liquors in any climate; and this abstemiousness has proved my faithful friend."

The Gauchos—the inhabitants of the great Pampas, are noted for their hardihood. They will gallop for days together over their unbounded prairies under a burning sun; and SIR F. HEAD attests—"Their constant food is beef and water."

Lieut. BRAND, R.N., speaking of Chili, observes, "It is impossible to drink strong wine without sensibly feeling its effects; and spirits taken to any excess, may be truly termed 'poison to the soul.' Alas! for the man who takes to drinking spirits in such a climate."

WEST INDIES.

Testimonies almost numberless could be cited, did our space allow, from Jamaica, Dominica, Antigua, Barbadoes, St. Vincent, Trinidad, The Bahamas, &c., to prove that intoxicating liquors are totally unnecessary.

DR. MOSELEY, speaking of the West Indies declares, "I aver, from my own knowledge and custom, as well as from the custom and observation of others, that those who drink nothing but water, are but little affected by the climate, and can undergo the greatest fatigue without inconvenience."

The case of the labourers on the Kingston Railway, (Jamaica,) is one in point. They rigidly abstained from drinking rum; and though working in a marshy district, and under almost a vertical sun, not one of their number died. This extraordinary circumstance was universally attributed to their abstinent habits.

NORTH AMERICA.

The summers in North America are excessively hot, especially towards the south. Here, however, Mr. Davidson's theory fares worse than ever. It is flatly contradicted by four million teetotalers. "Extensive farms are managed without one drop of intoxicating drink, in a climate subject to great extremes of heat and cold."—Morning Chronicle.

Here we must close. A tithe of the evidence has not been presented; but, from the specimen given, we think our readers will not attach much further value to Mr. Davidson's "opinion and belief."

One word in conclusion. However sincere Mr. Davidson may be in his 'belief,' we advise him in future, to give facts and not mere opinions on a subject so important as the one under consideration.

We are sorry that the Spectator should have quoted the paragraph in question with seeming approbation. Public journalists cannot be too careful of giving their sanction to error, however apparently innocent. But this error is not innocent. It requires no extensive stretch of the imagination to suppose, that many young men starting on their Indian career, may be induced by this fallacious statement to use "a moderate, or rather a liberal allowance of wine;" and thus be led into a course of life, ending in their physical, mental, and moral degradation.

We trust that this example will incline the intellectual conductors of that highly respectable paper, to avoid affixing, in future, the stamp of their sanction to currency so utterly base.

We purpose, in our next number, publishing an essay ON TEMPERANCE AND COLD CLIMATES.

The Balance.

"WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING."

OBJECTION IV.

"TEETOTALISM IS AN EXTREME MEASURE, AND EXTREMES ARE DANGEROUS."

This cry of an "extreme measure," has ever afforded a handle to the captious.

The Jew would no doubt have been glad to be released from some of the stricter and severe rites of the Levitical law; but when christianity proposed the abandonment of them all, he exclaimed, "No,—No, I cannot embrace the religion of the Nazarene; it is an extreme measure."

When the traffic in human beings was first denounced, what was the reply of the slaveholder? "It is quite proper that the slaves should be treated with humanity; but entirely to liberate them would really be an extreme measure, and very dangerous withal."

The same cry has been raised against the Temperance Reformation. Drunkenness is admitted by all to be a great evil; but total abstinence is an excess the other way.

Now, allowing, for the sake of argument, that "moderation" is the true standard, and that drunkenness and abstinence are equally extremes;—where is the standard of moderation to be found? In the conscience and judgment of each individual? alas! "when the wine is in, the wit is out;" the ideal standard is ever flying before us; we are running after our own shadows!

But supposing that men can be found whose moderation is so strict, that they never upon any occasion exceed the rule they lay down for themselves, who is to say that their rule is the correct one? One man will limit himself to a single glass, another will indulge in a bottle. Neither will acknowledge himself intemperate; neither will admit that his judgment or his appetite is affected by habit or taste.

After all, the great question remains in full force, will your moderate-drinking encourage another's excess? If you can drink another glass with impunity, can your neighbour? If you indulge in your habit of drinking, will your weaker brother abandon his? Then, why stand quibbling about "extreme measures," when your fellow-men are calling from the extreme of degradation, for a helping hand?

In our next number, we shall weigh the Fifth Objection—"Teetotalism is directly opposed to the social feelings of man's nature."

Temperance and Religion.

Vicar of Banwell, Somerset.

ESSAY II.

We have sought to show the impediments which strong drink opposes to education, and thence draw the inference, that to promote a total abstinence from its use, is the surest way to extend the benefits of our schools; and we have endeavoured beyond this to demonstrate, what we may, perhaps, without presumption, call the folly of the children of light in their educational schemes, in not striving by every effort in their power to remove such an enormous evil, which so palpably thwarts their purposes, and renders nugatory, in so many instances, all their pains and care; a folly of which the children of the world, we maintain, would not be guilty, and this too in the face of positive evidence, that such evil may be, and has been counteracted, not by any new fangled scheme of man's device, but by those legitimate weapons of christian warfare,—the influence of example, founded on the principle of self-denial.

Let us now turn to what forms another striking feature of the age we live in—the vast extension of christian churches. This we would consider also as one of those means of grace, which are adopted by the children of light, for the extension of their Master's kingdom. Let us see then how their efforts to promote the glory of God in the highest, and the knowledge and practice of his peace below, is frustrated in this case as the other, by the very same cause. And to take the case of the metropolis alone; most assuredly, when we contemplate what has been done in some of the most neglected and over-peopled portions of this vast city, the disciple of Jesus has great cause of rejoicing in the many sacred edifices which meet his view—the many fresh opportunities now afforded for hearing God's holy word upon the sabbath, to those who have been long plunged in ignorance and sin. But gladly as we hail the presence of every fresh temple of the Lord, and joy over the increased means of grace afforded to our countrymen—a church is not religion. Nor is it the architectural beauties of the building, however grateful to the eye of taste, which most gladdens the believer's heart; it is those living temples of the Holy Ghost who assemble in its walls—those buildings not made with hands—formed not for time but eternity—in whom our interest should be mainly centred. And the real value, therefore, of every church depends upon the number of souls it may be made the instrument of reclaiming from the bondage of sin, and bringing under the sway of Him, whose yoke is easy, and whose burden is light.

When we look round, then, upon the many churches which in the last few years have been erected in London, we can have no doubt that the means of grace are multiplied, and that the Church of England has enlarged her borders; but it still remains a query, whether those means have been made available to any considerable extent, and the Church of Christ proportionably increased? And the question of total abstinence is one, we conceive, which should peculiarly press itself upon the attention of those who have been active in the cause of church extension. For the evil effects of intemperance, though not confined to any class, are more conspicuous, and more productive of misery and sin, we may perhaps be allowed to say, amongst the labouring population of our land, than any other members of society. And what has principally called forth these extraordinary efforts of the christian church? Was it not the consciousness of the vast multitude of the working classes who were altogether neglected in their spiritual wants—as far as the Establishment at least was concerned—that the vast increase of population necessarily demanded, to make the Church of England in any degree efficient, a proportional increase in her ministers and her churches? But have we, comes the question, met these spiritual wants by merely giving means of access to the ministry of the gospel? Is it reasonable to anticipate a rich harvest of heavenly fruits, whilst the noxious weed of intemperance is still permitted to grow unchecked in all its rank luxuriance? And when we say unchecked, we would not be thought to disparage the ministerial labours of the many excellent and devoted servants of Christ—these, we thankfully admit, and prayerfully acknowledge. But all the testimony of past experience, as well as of our own common sense, proves to us that the preaching of the gospel is inefficient for the reclamation of the drunkard who never hears it, "who refuses to hear the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely;" and that no pastoral admonition, no private counsel, has ever on any extended scale operated for the conversion of such sinners from their ways. What, then, we contend for is, not so much, that ministerial labour is lukewarm or indifferent to the drunkard's fate, or backward in declaring the whole counsel of God upon the point, but that such labour is not directed in the course which is most likely to render it effectual; and whilst in any worldly scheme, the folly would be at once apparent to the children of the world, the children of light are blind to those means by which their spiritual labours would be made of tenfold effect. Custom, habit, and early prejudice have so rooted in their own minds, the drinking-usages of society; and to them it may be, the practice has been so innocent, that they do not look as they ought upon the effects which such usages produce upon the minds of others;—those especially who are not fortified as they are by religious principle, to resist the excesses to which it cannot be denied strong drink invites.

Now, it is for those who are most exposed to the temptations of strong drink, and least able, perhaps, to resist them,—the working-classes of society—we repeat, for whom these churches have been mainly built; and it is to this class, in the present instance, we would confine our observations. Knowing, therefore, as we mournfully do, the habits of our countrymen, and the blot which intemperance has cast upon our country's fair fame, speaking generally as to their spiritual condition, we should say there are two distinct and contending principles—one, in which they are now enslaved—the love of drink; and one which you are desirous to instil—love of God. And in nothing is the declaration of our Lord more palpably verified, as to the impossibility of serving God and Mammon, than in the love of strong drink, as co-existing with the love of God. All experience demonstrates, that they are utterly irreconcilable, and cannot simultaneously exist within the human heart. The frequenters of the beer house and the gin shop, will not be numbered amongst the frequenters of the sanctuary upon the sabbath.

What will it then avail to erect our churches, and invite worshippers thereto, whilst an idolatry, gross as that which fills the gin palaces with victims, so fearfully prevails amongst those we seek to win? We must pull down the altars of Baal, before we erect the ark of the living God. The axe must be laid to the root of the tree, or it is with very remote chance of spiritual benefit to the mass, we are here and there enabled to prune off some vicious excrescence. Would the children of the world, then, with the ordinary sagacity by which they are characterised in worldly affairs, thus labour and toil at much expense, to produce effects, which the existence of a known evil so altogether nullified; and this too, with a remedy so simple and easy in their hands, as that by which we seek to stop the love of drink, by opposing to it the safe and certain cure of total abstinence from its fascinations? We do not say that to extinguish the love of drink within the human heart, is necessary to infuse therein the love of God. No; but in respect to the cure before us, the means of grace afforded in the public services of the sabbath, we do say that we make those means more generally available by destroying that taste, and checking that indulgence, which where they exist, make all your churches, however numerous, and your ministry, however evangelical, if not useless, inefficient.

This, then, is the subject which we wish to press upon the attention of the christian church, and which we would entreat every follower of our common Lord, faithfully and prayerfully to ponder. Let them for a moment consider the vast number of living souls, whose destiny for eternity depends upon their conduct in time—who are daily immolating those souls by the love of strong drink—for whom the sabbath dawns, not to bring them in holy contact with their God, but as a day of rest from weekly toil, which they can more entirely devote to the indulgence of an appetite which places them farther and farther from Him, and more and more hurries them on to the eternal condemnation that awaits them. Let them think, too, of the vast number of wretched females whom our churches invite in vain—who continue in infamy and sin—infamy of which they feel the degradation, and sin which in their souls they now abhor,—only because their consciences are silenced, and their satiated passions still inflamed by the excitement of strong drink; and say whether laying the axe at the root of all this, and far more than we are able to enumerate, would not be a more effectual means of grace, than if you had churches in every street, whilst an evil of such enormous magnitude still remained unassailed by some extraordinary efforts of the children of light?

Let us make a plain and simple inquiry. There are in London, it is calculated, about 5,000 gin palaces. Now, which would effect the most good in a moral and religious point of view, the destruction of these dens of infamy and woe, and the eradication of those drinking habits which their frequenters indulge in, or the erection and endowment of 5,000 churches, whilst they still continued in all their hellish influence, ensnaring and destroying 10,000 victims to every 100 souls whom the preaching and ministry of the gospel reclaimed? Oh! for a little worldly wisdom amongst the children of light. Oh! that the high and dignified of our ministers would devote themselves with the same fidelity to our great and holy cause, that they now do towards furnishing those means of grace, education, and churches; and what different results do we believe would attend their labours. Eradicate the love of drink amongst the working-classes of society, and we should lack no funds either for schools or churches. A sober, and as a consequence of sobriety, industrious population, would find the means to educate their children; and as our experience of total abstinence proves, they would not neglect their God upon the sabbath. But whilst this evil remains comparatively unmet, whilst the encouragement of example is afforded by the children of light to the use, of what in the vast majority of cases invariably terminates in the most fearful abuse, we are rendering the means of grace which we offer in our churches, for the most part ineffectual, and labouring in vain for the salvation of souls, whom we allow to be swept away from our grasp in the overpowering deluge of intemperance.

Admitting then, that education and church-building are means which we are bound to use for the enlargement of our Saviour's kingdom—are duties to which the love and attachment that we bear to Christ should so irresistibly prompt his followers—duties, for the neglect of which we shall be justly held responsible hereafter;—are we less responsible for persisting to uphold a system, which makes all our labours of comparatively no value, which so constantly defeats our most anxious care; renders of no avail the early principles we have instilled at school, thins our churches and closes the hearts of thousands to all the winning invitations of a Saviour's love? To this it is we complain, that the children of light are blind. Would God they were wise in their generation as the children of the world. Then should we have no doubt as to the general adoption of our views by the christian church; and that her main care would be, by all the influence, not merely of her precept, but her example, to send forth into the world, the children that she educated, armed in the principles of total abstinence; thus, under God, more fitted to contend against the many trials to which the drinking-habits of society will inevitably expose their faith—better guarded in the maturer years of life against the lure to sabbath desecration, and the sins which follow in its train, by which strong drink ensnares so many souls to their eternal woe. And so by mercy and grace, should we truly make our schools the nurseries of christian faith, and our churches, indeed, the sanctuaries of the living God.

The Drinking Customs condemned even by those who patronise them.

By PETER MEARNS,
Author of "Tivoli," &c.

"He that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin."—Romans xiv. 23.

It may seem paradoxical that the same party should both patronise and condemn the drinking-usages, which, as now admitted on all hands, are the fruitful source of the intemperance with which our country is cursed. It can scarcely, however, have escaped the observation of any one, at all observant of what is lying on the very surface of society, that this is not more singular than true. We have abundant evidence that the confession made by an ancient poet is characteristic of mankind at large:—

"I know the good, and I approve it too;
I know the wrong, and yet the wrong I do."

By some means or other, public opinion has lately undergone a considerable change in regard to the drinking customs. It was deemed by some a bold and unjustifiable statement, when Dr. Edgar, a few years ago, remarked that, during the earlier discussion of the temperance question in the British empire, the great truth had powerfully laid hold of the public mind, that "the moderate drinkers are the great promoters of drunkenness." Under the exciting influence of first impressions, many statements would be hazarded when the movement was novel, and the instruments of warfare untried, which a larger experience would rectify; but the present is one which experience has served only to confirm. The source of intemperance is the drinking-system, and the conviction of this truth is gradually being extended throughout the community, and the question is forcing itself home on the Christian portion of it.—Are we guiltless in leading our aid to keep up a system which is proving itself to be, to an almost incalculable extent, destructive of the health and morals of the community? The drinking-system is one of those things which cannot bear the light, and discussion will destroy it. It is inseparably associated with those works of darkness and degradation which retire before truth and reason, as the darkness of night before the morning sun.

The extent of influence of the temperance confederation is not to be measured by the amount of membership of which the association can boast. Many begin to feel the pressure of a galling yoke, and to sigh for freedom. They are ill at ease, and yet they delay to get rid of the shackles by which they are bound. We blame their want of moral courage, and yet their condition is an interesting one, and we ought to deal tenderly with them. Their opinions and feelings are, to a very considerable extent, on our side; and the same means by which a change has been induced on their minds in regard to once venerated customs, will, if faithfully applied, render it impossible for them to linger among the ruins of a falling system, and will effect their emancipation. No reasonable doubt can be entertained by any one, that the temperance movement has been the main instrumentality by which public attention has been directed to the evils of intemperance, and the urgent necessity that exists for some special efforts being made to arrest the progress of this most destructive vice. We cannot but regard as highly censurable, and most unjust, the conduct of those who overlook the efforts of abstinence societies, in estimating the character and weight of those influences under which the public mind is evidently undergoing a change, in regard to customs long approved and still followed by the major part of the community. One of the most unfair, and, indeed, absurd statements on this point that has fallen under our notice, is given by the Rev. George Lewis of Dundee, in his recently published Impressions of America. On his visit to the American churches, he had repeated opportunities of witnessing the very extensive and highly beneficial influence of temperance societies on the other side of the Atlantic; and, as might be expected, he repeatedly alludes to this subject in his work. Stating his impression regarding the general temperance of the population of North America, as compared with that of Britain, he pronounces the former to be "transcendently our superior;" and in reference to the latter, he adds, "Whether the same degree of reformation is to be obtained by the same method in this country I have expressed my doubts. Every nation has its own characteristics, both in the coming-in and going-out of national evils. What came in by degrees in social customs, and by one class of society copying the example of another, may go out in the same way; and the example of sobriety now given by the upper ranks of Britain, which is descending into the middle classes, will, I trust, descend into the mass of society, and, aided by their own efforts to throw off this dreadful incubus on their energies, effect, in a few years a decided improvement on the habits of Scottish workmen. Should these hopes turn out fallacious, it may become the duty of all good men to unite in a great effort to break this horrid yoke, and by a general league of abstinence, for a time, from strong drink of every kind, restore our country to temperance and sobriety, and form new habits of self-control in the rising generation." Mr. Lewis seems to affect contempt for the abstinence societies at present existing in Britain, and does not even condescend to mention them; but admits that circumstances may arise, though they do not exist at present, under which it may become the duty of all good men to form "a general league of abstinence, for a time." These observations are not less offensive and unjust, than they are characterised by intolerable folly. They remind one of a remark made by a member of the House of Commons, in the late debate on the measure proposed by Sir Robert Peel, for repeal of the Corn Laws of this realm. The honourable gentleman stated to the House his conviction, that this measure had been forced on the government by the progress of enlightened public opinion, and that the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League ought not to suppose that they had any special share in bringing about the necessity which was now felt for such a measure, since this had arisen rather from a quite different source!

We turn not aside from the main object of this article, to speak of the utter folly in expecting circumstances to arise in the prospective history of our country, which will unite all good men in a general league of abstinence; but merely remark, that while good men are debating about the comparative merits of this and the other scheme, drunkards are going down annually by thousands to a dishonoured grave; and the present degradation and prospective wretchedness of numerous families, is spreading a dark cloud over the destinies of the nation.

The conviction is deepening, that Christians, who patronise the drinking-customs, are not free from the blood of drunkards; and we have yet a few words to say to those who cherish this conviction, and still patronise to some extent, however limited, these customs. We earnestly entreat such individuals to ponder well the apostolic statement at the head of this article. We are aware that when this passage has been used as an argument in favour of abstinence societies, it has been urged in reply, that we take undue advantage of the unjustifiably strong language of the English version, and it has been suggested that we should read condemned instead of damned. We admit that the change proposed is called for, and agree to adopt it, and still the argument retains all the force we could wish. The meaning of the apostle, or rather of the inspiring Spirit, may be thus expressed; "He that discerneth and putteth a difference between meats is condemned, if he eat that which he deems it unlawful to eat, for he does it not with a full conviction that it is right; and whatever is done without a full conviction that it is right, is sin." We are not aware that any commentator takes a view of the passage different from that we have now expressed, and we are sure that this is the view generally taken; but lest any of our readers should hesitate about the concluding clause, we subjoin the explanations respectively given by two critical commentators of acknowledged ability and judiciousness. Professor Hodge says, "Whatever is not of faith is sin; that is, whatever we do which we are not sure is right, is wrong;" and Dr. Bloomfield thus interprets the same clause—"Whatever is done without a full persuasion that it is lawful, is sinful." Those then who doubt the propriety of countenancing the drinking-customs which are degrading the people of this land, and yet countenance these customs, are guilty of sin on account of this; the word of God condemns them, and the blood of souls will be required at their hand. We entreat such persons to free themselves from this guilt, which becomes presumptuous sin, when they are aware of its culpability; and we earnestly urge them to give the temperance movement the benefit of their doubts. There can be no reasonable doubt about the propriety of abstaining from intoxicating drinks, and discountenancing the drinking usages. Barnes has well said, "They who are engaged in the slave-trade; or they who are engaged in the manufacture or sale of ardent spirits; or they who frequent the theatre or ball-room, or who run the round of fashionable amusements, if professing Christians, MUST often be troubled with many doubts about the propriety of their manner of life. But they can have no doubt about the propriety of an opposite course."

We must caution our readers against supposing that the converse of the statement we have been considering is always true. It is wrong to do what we think or even fear to be wrong; but is not always right to do what we think to be right. For instance, the persecutors of Christians supposed, in some instances, that they were doing God service, and yet the word of God condemns them as guilty of enormous crimes. For proof of this, compare John xvi. 2, with Luke xi. 50. It is an obvious inference from this, that those who countenance pernicious customs, and thereby cast a stumbling-block before the weak, are not guiltless, even though they may not be aware they are doing wrong.

Let the promoters of the temperance movement continue to diffuse the light of truth, and an increasingly large number of conscientious men will be brought into a position, in which we can advantageously apply to them the principle of the apostolic statement, and say, he that doubteth is condemned if he countenance the drinking-customs, and they have but to carry out their conscientious convictions, by identifying themselves with our movement.

INTEMPERANCE.

LETTER FROM THE REV. JOHN CLAY, CHAPLAIN OF THE PRESTON HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

House of Correction, Preston.

"GENTLEMEN,—You say very truly that I "greatly desire the promotion of the temperance cause;" and I feel much flattered by your invitation to contribute occasional articles on the influence of drunkenness in producing criminal offences.

This invitation I would very gladly respond to, were it not that my time and thoughts are almost entirely occupied in the more immediate duties of my office here. If, however, I am spared to produce another report, as chaplain to this prison, I will do myself the pleasure of forwarding one to you,—in which you will find more and more proof of the opinion, that drinking is of all others the most fruitful cause of legal criminality.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your Obedient Servant,

The Editors of the National Temperance Chronicle and Recorder. J. CLAY.

EDUCATION AND TEMPERANCE.

LETTER FROM THE AUTHOR OF POLYNESIAN RESEARCHES.

[TO THE LATE EDITOR OF THE RECORDER.]

Hoddesden.

You will I am sure be glad to hear, that under many disadvantages, and the peculiarly unfavourable circumstances of our locality, the temperance cause continues to maintain its ground amongst us. If we cannot boast of large accessions to our numbers, those who have publicly identified themselves with our principles and practice, remain steadily attached to the cause. I have not for a long time heard of any, who have returned again to the drinking habits which they had abandoned; and an increasing number, among all classes, though not pledged members of the teetotal association, are habitual abstainers from intoxicating drinks. The pledge is important and valuable, and there are not wanting instances amongst us, in which preservation in the midst of temptation is to be ascribed to its influence; still it is only a means to an end; and if that, and the discontinuance of the use of all intoxicating drinks by either individuals or families, be accomplished, it affords just cause for the most grateful satisfaction. We consider the temperance cause as intimately connected with the intellectual improvement, the moral elevation, and the social happiness of our population, and rejoice to see the advancement of one subservient to the interests of the other. This has appeared to be remarkably the case amongst us during the present winter. You have already heard that two or three months ago, a Mutual Instruction Society was formed by a number of the tradesmen and working men in Hoddesden. Most of those belonging to our temperance association were among its originators; connected with it is a reading-room, open for the working men every evening, from six o'clock to ten, and a lending library; both of which we have long desired, as a means of preserving our young men from the temptation to spend their evenings at a public-house. Many of the working men, tradesmen and others, not members of the temperance association, have joined our Mutual Instruction Society, although there is a Literary Institution in the town with greater advantages at equal cost, but held in rooms which are part of one of the inns; many have preferred the society which is altogether disconnected with the public-house. I cannot but regard this, as an evidence of the increase of correct views, or to the favourable influence of temperance on mental and social improvement. Hoddesden is not a large place, but there are about 80 members of the Mutual Instruction Society. The comfortable reading-room is well filled every evening, with clean, well-behaved, working men. The lending library contains upwards of 200 volumes, for some of which we are indebted to your liberality; and the young men have a drawing class, consisting of 14 or 16, who meet twice a week, for the purpose of amusing and improving themselves by this agreeable exercise.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF TOTAL
ABSTINENCE.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE AND RECORDER.

DEAR SIRS,—It has, I believe, been asserted by some popular writers, that the best way of overcoming an inveterate habit is to effect the conquest by degrees. To the truth of this assertion, we as teetotalers demur; and although in the thousands of reclaimed drunkards of whom our society can boast, we have, I think, a very powerful proof of the correctness of our opinion, it is notwithstanding gratifying to meet with individuals, admitted on all hands to be possessed of intelligence and learning, and who on perfectly independent grounds have arrived at the same conclusion with ourselves.

It was therefore with much pleasure that a few days ago I heard the Rev. Dr. Hoppus, F.R.S., and Professor of Mental Philosophy and Logic, in University College, London, express his decided conviction, that so far as the philosophy of the mind is concerned, teetotalers are quite right. The Rev. Professor was lecturing to his class on the subject of habit, and was illustrating the connexion of habit with the principle of association. He showed that when a sensation and an emotion, or an idea and an emotion, have frequently co-existed in the mind, there is a strong tendency in the former to call up the latter. He pointed out, therefore, that if we would shun the consequent, we must take care to avoid the antecedent. From this it follows, that when through the frequent co-existence of the taste of intoxicating liquors with the desire for them, an evil habit has been founded, the most philosophical mode of overcoming the habit is by abstaining from the taste—to avoid the desire. On the same principle also, it may be shown that it is the duty of recently-made teetotalers especially, not only to shun the taste, but even the sight of the insidious foe.

Should you consider the mention of this little incident in some corner of your valuable journal, at all calculated to promote the great cause of Temperance, its insertion will oblige

RENUNCIATION OF THE TRAFFIC.

SIRS,—When, from conscientious motives, respectable and religious men abandon any part of the business connected with the trade in strong drink, I think it is right to publish such instances to the world. They are so many testimonies, that we are right in our denunciations of the system of converting the people's food into a liquid, fraught with dreadful consequences to the commonweal. Such an instance of sacrificing an important income, by giving up a trade in malt, has come under my notice, while I have been lecturing in Surrey and Sussex. The gentleman, to whom I allude, resides in the latter county, is a member of the Society of Friends, and is now a pledged and active member of our society. I am not at liberty to mention the name of the gentleman; but I am at liberty to say, that I have inspected his ledger, and can bear witness to the fact of his having relinquished a handsome income, rather than possess that income by keeping up a trade which is at variance with the law of God, the well-being of man, and the best interests of this great nation. I hope to hear of many more such instances; and this will be the case if we do our duty.

I am, as heretofore,

Yours respectfully,

W. GAWTHORP.

DEATHS BY DRINKING.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE.

GENTLEMEN,—Your readers are in the habit of seeing many awful accounts of the effects of drunkenness amongst the poor, and are, perhaps, apt to forget that the miseries of the drinking system are not confined to that class of the community.

A promising young man of my acquaintance died lately in a lunatic asylum, whose prospects in time—and, alas! it may be in eternity—were blighted by the love of drink. He was fond of dinner parties and balls; a "gay" young man; but was seldom drunk. Continual drinking "in moderation" gradually wore out his constitution. He grew absent, stupid, childish, insane; and at the age of thirty, died.

A brother of this unfortunate young man, reputed to be a sober and regular liver, is now away from business, in all probability, never to return to it. He was an extensive merchant, a man of education and polished manners; yet he would sit at his counting-house on foreign post-nights, drinking brandy-and-water, while he wrote his letters. Is it any wonder that letters so written involved him in heavy losses,—that he was a bankrupt?

I mention these cases, not as anything extraordinary, but quite the reverse; because I am sure that almost every large family in this country could refer to similar cases. Q.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

The result of the Corn Law debate is well known. It is not our province, as temperance journalists, to interfere with the principles advocated by the contending parties. Both profess to have the good of the country at heart; and both are no doubt sincere in their convictions. Still, we cannot help expressing our opinion, that an extraordinary omission has characterised the whole debate.

In arguing that this country produces sufficient food for the maintenance of its inhabitants, the Protectionists have never alluded to the fact, that more than a million of acres, now devoted to the growth of malting-barley, could at any time be applied to the growth of wheat. And the Free-Traders, while denouncing as unpatriotic the men who would "prevent the poor man having a loaf as cheap as he could get it," never once allowed their indignation to fall upon those, who devote their best land to the production of malting-barley and hops; and thus by increasing the scarcity of bread-corn, keep up the high price of the "poor man's loaf."

We respectfully commend to the attention of our senators—especially those who delight in discussing questions of political economy—the following sound and practical observations, presented in the Report of the Parliamentary Committee on Drunkenness:—

"This food is destroyed in such a manner, as to injure greatly the agricultural producers themselves; for whose grain, but for this perverted and mistaken use of it, there would be more than twice the demand for the use of the now scantily fed people, who would then have healthy appetites to consume, and improved means to purchase, nutriment for themselves and children in grain, as well as in the other varied productions of the earth."

THE DUTY ON FOREIGN WINES.

(Wednesday, March 11th.)

Dr. BOWRING expressed his regret that foreign wines were not included in the tariff. A low duty on French wines would be of inestimable value to the people of this country. He earnestly recommended the right honourable baronet to apply to this case his own principle; and permit the people to have a cheap and pleasant beverage.

COLONEL SIBTHORP would ask the honourable member if he had ever tasted a glass of Lincoln ale? He would not remind the honourable gentleman of former times—as he might think it unkind;—but he remembered on one occasion the honourable gentleman coming to the house, after a convivial meeting, what he (Col. Sibthorp) would call jovial—(Great laughter.) He might have been so himself also—(Continued laughter.) He could tell the honourable gentleman that Lincoln ale was a cheap and pleasant beverage.

Sir ROBERT PEEL could not at present spare the duty on foreign wines. He thought that it was not the alteration in the duty that had caused the falling off in the consumption, so much as a change of habits.

THE DUTY ON FOREIGN SPIRITS.

(Tuesday, March 17th.)

Upon the item "spirits and strong waters" being read,

Mr. Alderman THOMPSON appealed to the government whether it would not be more conducive to the health, welfare, and happiness of the people, to repeal, or partially repeal, the excise duties on soap, than to sacrifice the great revenue from brandy?

Mr. EWART expressed himself in favour of ANY measure, tending to extend the commerce of this country with France!

MARQUIS OF GRANBY declared himself strongly adverse to the proposed reduction, which he was sure would have a demoralizing effect on the humbler classes of the community. The noble lord quoted copiously from a statistical document, to show that crime had increased in this country in the same proportion with the reduction of the spirit duty.

Mr. CARDWELL, on the part of government, dexterously eluded the foregoing argument; but dilated on the international benefits to be derived from a relaxation of the protective system.

On a division there appeared—

PRISON REPORT.

The following Statistical Table—compiled from the Tenth Report of the Inspectors of Prisons of Great Britain—furnishes melancholy proofs of the increase of drunkenness in Liverpool. The Inspectors attribute the increase, to a great extent, to the influx of strangers. But whatever may be the cause, the lamentable fact should stir up the Liverpool Societies to greater diligence.

DOMINICA.

LETTER FROM REV. JAMES COX.

Ten years have now elapsed since I embraced this mighty auxiliary to health and happiness ; and every year increases my attachment to it. I feel that my whole physical and mental system is re-invigorated ; and, instead of growing more feeble as I grow in years, my youth is renewed like the eagle's. I have been 22 years in the mission field, and never enjoyed such perfect health as during that period. For the last three years I have been a stranger to medicine, though I have travelled thousands of miles, by sea and land, in cold and hot climates ; and in the last two years I have resided in Dominica, which all my honoured brethren know, is one of the most laborious and unhealthy islands in the West Indies ; and where, in 1829, 1830, and 1831, I suffered from severe attacks of inflammatory fever, fever and ague, and rheumatism. And, when I think of similar loss of health, and in many cases, loss of life, occurring among missionaries in tropical climates, (Africa for instance,) which may possibly be prevented, as in my case, by the adoption of our grand though simple remedy—(its very simplicity preventing many from discerning its grandeur.) I am sometimes tempted to publish the details and results of my experience, for the benefit of my beloved fellow-missionaries of all denominations ; and with a trumpet voice, proclaim and demonstrate the physical benefits of cold water, used internally and externally, conjoined with simple diet, and systematic exercise. O ! if my dear suffering brethren on the burning plains of Africa and India, could only receive the truth on this subject, with what joy would they dash from their lips the unnaturally stimulating and disease-engendering beverages, and resort to the pure and wholesome liquid which God, in his wisdom, has provided ! I rejoice that many have already done so. When I reflect on my former feverish and debilitated condition for two or three years, while moderately using wine, and the perfect contrast in the glow of health and vigour I now enjoy, my soul overflows with gratitude to my great Deliverer, and I wish to publish the remedies to the ends of the earth, for the help of my fellow-sufferers. Nor I alone ; for many of every age and temperament can bear similar testimony. O ! that the alcoholic delusion may soon pass away ; and I long for more of such powerful advocates as Dr. Campbell, and James Sherman, and Albert Barnes, whose voices may and must be heard and welcomed with respect and veneration.

When I have had, as at three or four periods during the last few years, a tendency to fever, or an actual attack of it, instead of injuring my constitution by resorting to calomel, &c., as formerly, I only abstained from animal food, put on warmer clothing, pro tempore, drink copiously of water, resort to friction of the extremities, use the cold bath, and other simple remedies, to promote perspiration, and in a few hours my feverishness has fled !

SCOTLAND.

Mr. Vincent (whose exertions have been very successful) has finished his engagement with the Scottish Temperance League, and is succeeded by Mr. Beggs.

GLASGOW.—On the 19th of February, a brilliant soirée, in connexion with the Temperance League was held in the City Hall.

It is described as the most influential meeting, ever held in the Scottish commercial capital, on the temperance subject. Our already over-crowded columns, prohibit us from giving even a sketch of the various powerful addresses delivered in the course of the evening. Rev. Dr. Bates, presided ; and the speakers were Rev. W. Reid, Messrs. Buf-fom, R. Reid, T. Beggs, R. Douglas (a self-liberated American slave), and Mr. Vincent.

A commercial abstinence society has also been formed under very cheering auspices. The Glasgow Examiner says, " If we may judge from the numbers who have already joined, we may conclude that this movement has met the hearty approbation of commercial men generally, and it is hoped that such support and countenance will be given it, as will soon destroy those baneful drinking customs which have so long prevailed in connexion with business transactions, and which have been the means of blighting the usefulness and prospects of so many promising young men."

LONDON: APRIL 1ST, 1846.

THE ANNUAL MEMBERS' MEETING

WILL BE HELD AT THE OFFICE, ON MONDAY, MAY 4TH, AT TWO O'CLOCK, AND THE PUBLIC MEETING WILL BE HELD AT EXETER HALL, ON THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 21ST.

WE trust that former articles in the CHRONICLE will have prepared the friends of temperance throughout the kingdom for a great and united effort to abolish the SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.

We are at the present time in treaty with a Member of Parliament, on the subject of moving for a Committee of Enquiry.

Petitions to the HOUSE OF LORDS may be sent to the following Prelates and Noblemen:—

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury,	Lambeth;
The Lord Bishop of London,	St. James's Square;
„ „ „	Norwich, 38, Lower Brook Street;
„ „ „	Ripon, House of Lords;
„ „ „	St. Davids, 40, St. James's Place;
Rt. Hon. Earl Fitzwilliam,	Halkin St., Grosvenor Pl.;
„ „	Lord Cottenham, Wimbledon Common;
„ „	Lord Campbell, Knightsbridge.

TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Viscount Ebrington, 42, Grosvenor Square;
Benjamin Hawes, Esq., 9, Queen Street, Westminster;
Joseph Brotherton, Esq., 7, Manchester Buildings;
William Aldam, Esq., 3, Plowden Buildings, Temple;
Charles Wood, Esq., 86, Eaton Square.

Friends of Temperance and Morality in Great Britain!—Remember that the week following the Easter recess, is the time for sending up your Petitions to Parliament by thousands; and remember, that all depends—for this year at least—upon the zeal or apathy you manifest during the present month.

. Petitions left open at the ends will go free of postage.

WORLD'S CONVENTION.

The announcement that a World's Convention will be held in London, in the month of August next, under the auspices of the NATIONAL SOCIETY, has been everywhere received with great applause.

The temperance press, with hardly an exception, has referred to the subject in terms of warmest approbation. We can only give a sentence or two from each of the principal publications.

The Journal of the American Temperance Union (which may be taken as a specimen of the spirit pervading the other American papers,) observes:

“One of the most important meetings which has ever been called in relation to the cause of temperance, is now fairly before us. Some may be disposed to ask, what is to be done? What good is to be accomplished? Questions, perhaps, easier asked, than answered. But when “Britain's curse,” and “America's scourge,” are the subject of action, feeble must be the intellects, and cold the hearts, which will effect nothing. A meeting of two such men as Dr. Beecher and Father Mathew, from opposite hemispheres, after striking the deadly blows they have inflicted on a common enemy, would be, to say the least, an object of sublime contemplation.”

The National Temperance Advocate—

“Friends of temperance! be up and doing. Every city and town of importance should send one or more delegates—men extensively acquainted with the progress of that great moral reformation, which it is the object of the forthcoming Convention to promote. Again, we say—

Appoint your Representatives.”

The Scottish Temperance Review—

“We hail such a project as presenting a valuable opportunity for the accomplishment of much good, and we call upon the friends of the temperance cause every where to lose no time in accumulating information, and in devising schemes, so as to render this meeting one of the most successful temperance gatherings ever held.”

The Scottish Temperance Journal—

“This year is pregnant with at least one great event—a World's Temperance Convention. Already has the temperance press of America sounded the tocsin for this great Conference,—and the various States are preparing to send their most talented men to the gathering. How will the World's Conference find us?—united and vigorous, or our ranks broken and dispirited? Are we Scotchmen? and shall we yield to any in patriotism? Scotchmen, and allow ourselves to rank anything but equal to our transatlantic brethren and sisters?"

The Temperance Weekly Journal—

"We trust the total abstainers of Great Britain will hail the announcement with joy."

The British Temperance Herald—

"This is confidently expected to prove the most numerous and imposing assemblage that has ever yet met on this subject, and we hope every effort will be made to promote it."

National Temperance Magazine—

"The objects contemplated by the Convention are of the highest moment, and our only desire and prayer is, that they may be fully realized."

Northern Temperance Witness—

"Our own societies must not remain inactive. Delegates should be forthwith appointed—statistics must be collected and classified. In short, no effort must be spared to render the Convention as permanently beneficial in its results, as it will be interesting in its composition and character."

The committee will feel favoured by the IMMEDIATE appointment of delegates from Societies and Associations; also replies from those gentlemen to whom notes of invitation have been forwarded.

THE CIRCULATION OF THE CHRONICLE.

We believe it more than ever important to spread information on temperance, both among the public generally, and the members of abstinence societies.

Those who are conversant with temperance literature, will not hesitate to acknowledge, that no publication in Britain contains as great an amount of original essays, and home and foreign intelligence as this paper; we believe, therefore, that an extensive circulation of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER, will be a most effectual means of promoting the temperance movement.

There are several ways in which our readers can render great assistance. The first is, by furthering the sale in their own localities, and procuring additional subscribers.

Individuals resident in large towns, such as Liverpool, Manchester, &c., where there are many thousands of teetotalers, have a wide scope for their exertions.

Surely, for instance, in Birmingham, with not less than 7,000 abstainers, from 500 to 1,000 copies of the CHRONICLE might easily be sold monthly.

Another means of assistance, is by subscriptions to the Gratuitous Circulation. We should thereby be enabled to send the CHRONICLE to the influential of all classes in society.

For example—one of our wealthy friends might give a donation sufficient to cover the expense of forwarding a copy monthly to all the Independent Ministers in England; another friend, to all the Wesleyan Ministers; another, to all the Baptist Ministers; another, to all the Clergymen in his own county; another, to all the Mechanics' Institutions; another, to all the Editors of newspapers; another to all the Judges; another, to all the Barristers; another to all the Members of Parliament; and so on, until the list included the whole of the learned and other professions.

By the adoption of this plan, the burden would be borne by a number, and would not rest almost entirely upon this Society.

Our friends, therefore, know now how to assist us; and we have in our mind many who are able, and, we believe, willing to do so.

THE ADVERTISING FUND.

The fund for inserting temperance articles in religious and other periodicals as advertisements, is nearly exhausted; so that a suitable opportunity is presented for those who have expressed their approbation of the plan, to aid in its continuance and extension.

A FRIEND has generously engaged to give a donation of towards this object, IF NINE OTHER PERSONS WILL DO THE SAME. Who will accept the invitation?

MISSION FUND.

A FRIEND offers us £25, in addition to former gifts, provided NINE OTHERS will do the same. We "pause for a reply."

ADDRESS OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY.

A LIBERAL OFFER.

This valuable standard document being again out of print, the Committee are enabled, through the liberality of the same benevolent friend to make a similar offer to that formerly made: namely, To supply every purchaser of 100 copies, with 200 copies, gratis, for distribution! thus obtaining the work at one-third of the price!

No less than 65,000 copies of the National Address, have been circulated; but it is still unknown to hundreds of thousands.

The above offer will be open till the 1st of May, at which date, the requisite number of copies will be immediately printed.

Applications and remittances for not less than 50, nor more than 200 copies, must be sent to the Office, 39, Moorgate Street, on or before the 30th instant.

The price is 10s. per 100, for which sum 300 can be obtained under the above offer, making the net price for 100, only 3s. 4d.

CIRCULAR.

The following document has been just printed for circulation amongst the public at large:—

THE COMMITTEE of the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY beg to call the attention of every benevolent mind to the frightful extent to which crime and wretchedness exist in this country, a great portion of which is produced by the drinking-habits of the people. These habits the Committee have been labouring long and arduously to repress; and they are stimulated to persevere by the knowledge they possess of the great success which has attended their efforts; but these labours cannot be continued, unless more ample funds are placed at their disposal.

The objects for which these funds are required, are—1st, The printing of large quantities of tracts, which, as messengers of good, should find their way into every family and cottage in the kingdom. 2nd, The publishing at a low price, a weekly, if possible, but certainly a monthly paper, containing all the information which can be collected, exhibiting the progress of the Temperance cause in different parts of the world, including reports of the labours of the Missionary Agents. 3rd, The truly important duty of employing the greatest number of Missionary Agents which the state of the funds will allow; at present there are only nine. 4th, The engagement of one Special Agent, qualified to organize Societies in all districts of the kingdom, in connexion and co-operation with the National Society in London. And 5th, The employment of lecturers of high moral character and other qualifications, to go through the length and breadth of the land, enforcing the merits of Total Abstinence, and the beneficial results which must flow from its adoption.

To these expenses must be added, rent, salaries, and other charges. The Committee are happy to afford their own time gratuitously; and much of it, in many instances, is required at their hands. They consider, however, that they should be supported by all who have the ability.

Where is the heart that does not bleed when it recurs to scenes of intemperance which it must have witnessed? No age, no sex, no station in life is exempt from this degrading vice. The rich, the talented, the pious, have often become its victims. The pulpit has in numberless instances, been deprived of its brightest ornaments from the same cause. But it is the poor who are the greatest sufferers. In them all its horrors are frightfully exhibited. Husbands and wives, parents and children, are not only degraded themselves, but in many cases, endure the most dreadful deprivation, arising from the indulgence of drinking propensities.

Numerous are the families who endure the loss of every domestic comfort, and have to bear the pinching cravings of hunger and want of clothing, solely from the drunkenness of those who should be their protectors.

The Committee are aware, that all do not agree with them as to the necessity of totally abstaining from intoxicating liquors, but they believe all must deplore with them the prevalence of intemperance, and be desirous of aiding their efforts to remove the cause of these dreadful sufferings.

The Committee have need of all the pecuniary aid which may be granted to them by a benevolent public: they pledge themselves to economy in its expenditure. Ten thousand a year would be most usefully employed in this noble enterprise; and could that sum be realized, many of the evils which are at present deplored, would immediately be greatly reduced, and social and domestic comfort, to a great extent, would soon follow.

The Committee hope they are not presuming too much in soliciting a subscription, and on their behalf, I remain respectfully,

WILLIAM CASH, CHAIRMAN.

Offices, 39, Moorgate Street, City.

Subscriptions will be received by any Member of the Committee, and at the Office of the Society; or by Mr. Mark Moore, Cash Agent, Queen Street Place, City.

WESLEYAN MAGAZINE.

Having sent to this Magazine an Advertisement, containing the opinions of the Rev. JOHN WESLEY, on the use of intoxicating drinks, we have, just before going to press, received the following reply.

London, 24, City Road,
March 23rd, 1846.

SIR,—I beg to forward to you the accompanying paper, which having been laid before the Committee of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, was respectfully declined to be inserted as an Advertisement on the cover of that periodical. I am Sir, Your most obedient Servant,

JOHN C. FENNELLY.

We shall print the rejected Advertisement, verbatim, in our next number.

TEMPERANCE AND WAR.

Nothing can be more contrary to each other than the benign spirit of temperance, and the cruel genius of war.

The American Temperance Journal makes the following just and forcible remarks upon the subject, and the course of action there recommended, we strongly urge upon all the friends of temperance in every part of the United Kingdom:—

“A war now between the two great Christian nations of the earth, would throw every benevolent movement back half a century. None would suffer more than the cause of temperance. Nearly all we have gained by twenty years of hard labour would be lost. We think it behoves all temperance men in England and America to rouse immediately to the rescue of their and our enterprise, to say nothing of higher and more important interests. Every temperance man should immediately put forth all his energies to suppress this detestable war spirit. We call on every temperance man then, as he loves our cause and desires its extension in the world, to speak out on this subject; to take a bold and decided stand against the war spirit wherever it exists. There are temperance men enough in this nation to control its destinies. And this is one great end of the temperance cause to raise up a mighty generation of sober, reflecting men, who shall not be swayed by passion; not be driven into foolish and wasteful extravagances; recklessly throwing away all the bounties of God's providence. War and drunkenness belong to the brutal nature, out of which we hope ere another generation to raise our country—holding it up a model to the world of self-government, self-control, wisdom, purity, intelligence, piety, and all that constitutes, not a golden, but a Christian age of the world.”

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

J. R. WILSON'S REPORT.

On the 19th Feb. I met the committee of the Gateshead Society, when it was resolved to revive and re-organize the same into an Association Auxiliary to the National Society, and the president was appointed corresponding member, with the required contribution, a large order for loan tracts and requisites was agreed upon; and a public meeting of the members and friends was held on the 26th inst., when the improved system was brought forward and adopted.

On the week following, a branch was formed in the north-eastern division of the town, and a goodly number of the members came forward as tract distributors; and weekly meetings are holding to complete the restoration of the whole branch. The distributors appear quite alive to the importance of the work; and have had their zeal greatly stirred up by their visits to the inhabitants of that district. I have felt it my duty to give this association special attention, as the cause of temperance has languished for some time in Gateshead; but through the late efforts made, it is likely to rival its opulent and active neighbour, on the north side of the Tyne.

There are extensive iron-works in the neighbourhood, the owners of which deplore the drinking habits of their men, and would gladly encourage the temperance cause. It is hoped, therefore, that great benefits will result from the labours of the society.

I have met the visitors of my own little branch, which is a suburb of Gateshead; and am glad to report, that nearly 200 families are weekly visited—the tracts well received, and the good cause progressing.

I learn from Durham, that the society is going on prosperously; and the friends are following out the plans recommended.

From North Shields, I have received a communication, stating that they intend to co-operate with South Shields in the employment of an agent for the visitation of those populous towns—the distribution of tracts, &c.

Having visited most of the adjoining towns, and succeeded, to a great extent, in introducing the improved organization, I purpose commencing my labours at Carlisle, and proceeding southward, having eighteen years ago, at this very period, set out on the Sunday School Mission to the city.

On the 23rd Feb. I met the teachers of the Newcastle Sunday School Union, at a public tea drinking, to receive a deputation from the Parent Union; and availed myself of the opportunity of distributing among them the excellent temperance tracts issued by the Ipswich Society, and kindly supplied through the liberality of the president of that society.

I have, likewise, done what I could to raise contributions for the National Society during the past month; but regret to find, that some who liberally supported me in the Sunday School Mission, are strongly prejudiced against the temperance cause; and those who are favourable, are already contributors to the local societies. Let but the organization, recommended by the National Society, be generally adopted, and there is no doubt, that ample funds will be raised, not only to carry out the system, in the respective localities; but a handsome surplus will be afforded to augment the resources of the Parent Society.

LONDON.

DR. GRINDROD'S VISIT TO GREENWICH.

Dr. Grindrod's first lecture was delivered on Monday evening, March 9th, and consisted of some general descriptions of the nature and properties of alcoholic drinks, including an exposure of some of the popular fallacies respecting them. The second lecture was delivered on Wednesday evening, the 11th, when, after a luminous exposition of the doctrine of stimulants, the process of digestion was minutely explained and illustrated. The third lecture, delivered on Thursday evening, the 12th, was on the influence of alcoholic beverages on the saliva, the gastric juice, the bile, &c. The splendid coloured drawings, superior to any we have before seen, were made to tell frightful tales; and the fact of their being real and faithful representations of injuries, which had been really inflicted upon persons who had really died of those injuries, produced a visible effect upon the audience.

The fourth lecture was delivered on Monday evening. A number of letters containing interesting questions were read, and suitable replies given. This lecture was rendered peculiarly interesting from the vast range of topics which it embraced; and from its including a general description of the whole of his splendid collection of drawings, some of which were very large, the whole amounting in number to more than one hundred; these together with several preparations, busts, &c. &c., make an exhibition, the sight of which is worth far more than the whole sum paid for the course of lectures.

On Wednesday afternoon, March 11th, Dr. Grindrod delivered a lecture to children, when the theatre of the Institution was crowded to excess. It is supposed that nearly 2000 children were present, including 800 from the Royal Hospital, who attended with their officers and teachers. About 100 signatures to the pledge, we understand, have since been sent in.

On Monday afternoon, March 16th, the theatre presented an interesting spectacle, being occupied by about 800 females, including persons of most respectable appearance, and a great number of children. We have only to add our regret that, in consequence of numerous pre-engagements, Dr. Grindrod will not be able to lecture in the metropolis or suburbs for some time to come. He is now lecturing at St. Albans, Herts.—Abridged from the "London Tetratol."

SUFFOLK TEMPERANCE UNION.

DELEGATES' MEETING AT FRAMLINGHAM.

A large meeting of delegates from the societies, composing the above Union, was held at Framlingham, on the 2nd March, at which delegates were appointed to the World's Convention, and the societies were recommended to join in affording the statistics desired to the National Society. In the evening, upwards of 200 persons sat down to tea in the Castle Hall, soon after which, the chair being taken, the meeting was addressed by M. W. Crawford, agent; by Edward Balls, a delegate from Ipswich, and by John Martin, a butcher of Lowestoft, who were followed by J. Matthews, Baptist minister from Aldborough, in an interesting speech on the onward progress of the cause; next came Thomas Smeeton, in an address interspersed with his usual humour; George Wright, Baptist minister of Beccles, then addressed us in a touchingly interesting manner, and adduced his own experience as a proof of the inutility of intoxicating drink as medicine; and was succeeded by Thomas Smith, a delegate from Woodbridge, who had been an abstainer long before the temperance movement began.

The speakers were all attentively listened to; about 400 were present, and at the close, signatures were obtained to petitions to the Peers and Commons; and the memorial to the Queen for shutting up beer shops, &c., on the first day of the week.

The cause may be said to be steadily progressing, under the approved advocacy of your agent, M. W. Crawford.

HITCHIN—The annual festival was held in the Town-hall, on January 30th, when about 400 friends partook of tea, plum cake, &c. After tea, a public meeting was held, Mr. Whiting in the chair. H. Day, a reclaimed drunkard, addressed the meeting, after which, we were highly gratified by an address from Mrs. Balfour. Several friends from Royston addressed the meeting. The room which was tastefully decked out with evergreens, &c., was densely crowded (about 700 persons being present) and so great was the anxiety to hear, that many were unable to gain admittance. It was a heart-cheering sight to see such a large assembly, and witness universal good feeling prevail amongst all. It is hoped the cause is making good progress. The meeting separated highly gratified—a good impression was made, which will, we trust, promote the cause.

BRIGHTON—The association having been established twelve months, the committee report the following proceedings of the society during that period. Six public meetings have been held during the past year, chiefly at the expense of this society, in some of which, the committee had the acceptable personal and pecuniary assistance of R. D. Alexander, and some members of his family, who were then visitors here, and to whom we are indebted for a liberal supply of temperance publications.

Your committee have embraced various ways and means for distributing temperance tracts in Brighton and its neighbourhood; at the barracks, and coast guard stations; to the railway labourers, and in some of the day-schools. They have made grants of tracts to the Wesleyan Tract Society, the Brighton Society for the suppression of intemperance, and to some individual subscribers and others.

During the past four months, a number of temperance monthly periodicals have been distributed, chiefly amongst friends, which means of spreading information, your committee recommend to be continued, as also that a suitable selection of tracts be made for the use of future subscribers.

NEWPORT (Isle of Wight)—The number of teetotalers in this town and neighbourhood is computed at about 500, consisting mostly of poor people. But few of the wealthy, or of the ministers, at present, have come forward to our assistance. On the 22nd January, a general meeting was held at Zion Chapel, Quay-street, to choose a committee of management.

GEORGE GODSEN, Sec.

SHREWSBURY—On Monday, February 23rd, a temperance festival was held in the large room of the Lion inn. The meeting was very respectably attended. Rev. L. Panting, A.M. Vicar of Chebsey, presided, and addresses were given by Mr. Blackwood, Dr. Gourley of Madeley, who treated the physiological effects of alcohol in a masterly manner, and Mr. Humphreys of Wellington. The meeting concluded by a very solemn appeal from the chairman.

DONCASTER—The committee have, during the past year, put into circulation 600 copies of the Third Report of your Society, 3,600 tracts, 250 copies of Dr. Russel Trall's American Prize Essay, and 660 copies of the "Temperance Advocate," making a total, of upwards of 5000 paper messengers, which are in many cases spreading the knowledge of your principles, where it otherwise would not find access.

LEEDS—A temperance love-feast was held on Sunday, February 22nd, in the afternoon, and by adjournment, at 8 o'clock, in the evening. The testimonies borne by many, that they had not only been saved from drunkenness, but from the slavery of sin, were calculated to encourage every christian in this labour of love. I asked the reformed drunkards to give their testimonies, by holding up their hands, when about 100 individuals arose on their feet, and language fails to describe the scene; every countenance beamed with joy. At the reformed drunkard's festival, on Tuesday, 27th took tea. The place of meeting was filled almost to suffocation, so that we were glad to commence another meeting. Both meetings continued with unabated interest, until nearly eleven o'clock. Our reformed characters never spoke with more effect. The smith proved he could do better without strong drink; and all agreed in this, that their formerly ruined homes were repaired, and their families made happy. Of the fourteen that spoke at the meeting, there was not one that had been less than six years a teetotaler. Twenty-seven signatures were taken in the evening, and among them four drunken women; who, should they continue, will prove a great blessing to their families. We are doing well in Leeds. Our weekly meetings are frequently thronged, and many sign our pledge. I am sorry to have to add, that our town is still the scene of gross intemperance. The excavators, of which there are hundreds in the neighbourhood, pour into the town, particularly on the sabbath, and that holy day is awfully profaned; while the apathy of christian men is so great, that we are even found fault with, for attempting to stem the torrent of intemperance. On Wednesday last, a man in Leeds, who, through his intemperance, was discharged from his employment, went into a public house, drank a great quantity of gin, laid himself down in the room and died. It remains to be seen, whether the jury will insult heaven, (as is too frequently done,) by a verdict, "Died by the visitation of God;" or speak the truth, and say—died by the visitation of strong drink.

JERVIS CRAKE, Town Missionary.

SHEERNESS—On Friday, February 13th, Mr. Booth of London, delivered a lecture in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, the subject was The Publican and the Spider; showing the analogy between them in their ways, their victims, &c. The subject was new in this place, and gave great satisfaction. The chapel was very well attended. One person, a working man came forward and signed the pledge.

G. STUBBINGS, Secretary.

BRAINTREE AND BOCKING—A decided, and favourable revival in the good cause of temperance, has at length taken place in these localities. A sub-committee has been appointed, who are proceeding perseveringly and unitedly, in their labours. We are encouraged to persevere in our exertions, from the gratifying knowledge, that we have twelve staunch, consistent teetotalers, who have been rescued from the paths of inebriety and wretchedness; who can all now testify to the blessed effects which result from an adoption of our principles.

B. JONES, jun. Sec.

DARTMOUTH—After repeated trials without success, we have established a society, which has succeeded beyond our most sanguine expectations. We had a very respectable tea and public meeting on New Year's day, at which the Teignmouth tee-total band attended. Mr. Garret and several others were the speakers. At that and our next meeting night, we had an addition of fifty members, and at every meeting since, others have signed; making an increase in our numbers since last October of nearly 200.

J. LANGLANDS.

HALSTEAD.—For some time past our prospects have been somewhat discouraging. Pecuniary embarrassments have contracted our efforts. These difficulties have been surmounted, and we are looking with bright anticipations to the future. It would be unjust were we not to acknowledge the kind assistance given by our esteemed president, E. Horner, Esq., whose benevolence and zeal has done much towards its advancement. On Tuesday, Feb. 3, we held our annual meeting, which was a most interesting and cheering one. A numerous party sat down to tea. After tea, the spacious room was filled. E. Horner, Esq., opened the meeting with an appropriate speech. The report being read, the Rev. W. Clements, the much esteemed Baptist minister of this town, convincingly showed the pernicious effects of intoxicating drinks upon ministers and churches. Afterwards, Mr. Addeshaw, the agent, addressed the audience, with much effect, for a considerable time. Thirty signed.

WILLIAM NEWTON.

HOUGHTON, HUNTS.—A very interesting meeting was held in this village, on Friday, the 27th of February. About 100 friends took tea in the room occupied as a Sunday School. The arrangements were very complete, and the room tastefully decorated. After partaking of an excellent tea, a public meeting was convened, at which the chair was taken by Mr. B. Brown. The testimony of several working men was listened to with great interest; and told forcibly on the prejudices of those who roundly assert, that hard labour cannot be performed without the stimulus of strong drink. Mr. J. L. Ekins, of Woodhurst, Mr. Botterell, of St. Ives, Mr. Goggs, senior, and Mr. Goggs, junior, and Mr. Whitney, of Huntingdon, addressed the assembly, exhorting to sobriety, as a means of elevating the working classes, increasing their comforts, adding to the happiness of their families, and extending the triumphs of religion. The chairman concluded with some very excellent remarks; and after singing a temperance hymn, the large party broke up, highly delighted with what they had heard and seen. Several signatures were obtained at the close of the meeting. Great credit is due to the Rev. J. Harcourt, and the teetotal friends, for the energy and anxiety manifested to promote the good cause.

JOHN HUNTER.

Agents' Reports.

B. GLOVER.—THE POTTERIES.

I am still labouring in this district, and like most other districts, there are matters to discourage and to encourage, though I think, at present our encouragements are the greatest. At Newcastle [under-Lyne] we have lately had 300 signatures, and amongst them, some persons of great influence. We have three medical men abstainers in West Bromwich, who not only give their example, but their active exertions, in visiting, speaking, and in other ways. We have lately taken in Crew into our district, all the dwelling-places in which, a few years ago, consisted of one farm-house and two cottages. It is now a small town; there are 700 men employed by the Railway Company. Eleven beer-shops have been lately opened, they have a good society, and the Railway Directors are very favourable towards them. At Market Drayton the society is in a prosperous state. Rev. J. Lee, the vicar is very actively engaged, and has lately given his valuable assistance towards establishing and conducting an evening school, where arithmetic, drawing, grammar, &c. are taught. The other week we had a meeting at Congleton, called by a requisition to the Mayor, upon which occasion, he presided, and a resolution was passed to petition parliament against Sunday-drinking. In Coalbrook-dale and the neighbourhood, a very favourable movement has lately taken place. The Rev. H. Gwythers, vicar of Yardly, has very zealously laboured in this district; all our meetings in this part are well attended, and many signatures have been taken.

A. W. HERITAGE.—HAMPSHIRE.

Since my last report I have been actively engaged in visiting and tract distribution with some considerable success, having taken twenty-seven signatures, and am pleased in being able to report, that the majority of those who have signed on former visits still adhere to the practice. In addition to the plan of giving away tracts, I have been able to commence the loan system of circulation, and about 150 tracts are regularly exchanged every fortnight in the neighbourhood. I have also been engaged in making a selection of suitable tracts, and enclosing them in envelopes for circulation amongst the more respectable portion of the community (enclosing two in each envelope.) Thus upwards of 700 persons in Winchester and other places have received more than 1400 tracts; the whole expense of envelopes, postage, &c. being defrayed by the Winchester society, and a few private individuals—9 magistrates, 32 clergymen, and 9 dissenting ministers, 17 local preachers, and 53 sabbath-school teachers are included in this list.

I have attended two meetings at Wantage in Berkshire, and am glad to know that the cause is progressing there. At Newton-toney and Allington in Wiltshire, I have also lectured, the societies in these two villages are in a very flourishing condition, having nearly fifty pledged members, out of a population of about 500.

Last week I went to the village of Upham, the birth-place of the poet Young, with the view of soliciting the use of the National School for a meeting, but the clergyman had just returned from the funeral of a daughter, so I could not see him, but intend to write to him shortly.

ISAAC PHELPS, CUMBERLAND.

In January, held eight very important meetings at Aspatria, Oughterside, Allenby, Blenmerbissit, and Hayton. Was kindly introduced by Mr. Jackson, a teetotaler, to Sir Wilford Lawson, who at once consented to the holding of these meetings. The result was good, and about forty new members took the pledge.

January 15th and 16th, two very large meetings in the Temperance Hall, Whitehaven. A good impression was produced. Santon, by Reavenglass, two excellent meetings in the Wesleyan Chapel; twenty-eight pledges.

January 23rd, held a meeting at Bootle, with Mr. Hamlington, independent minister, who is a firm teetotaler. Many present.

February 1st.—Preston, Sunday afternoon—spoke at the corner of Gilbert-street, on the principles of peace. At night walked out to Brownedge. Spoke at the Large School-room. Many present.

Monday night, spoke in Cock Pit, to a number of very fine children.

Tuesday, spoke again there for more than two hours. Many hundred present. The friends said it was the best and largest meeting they had had for these six months. An excellent brass band attended.

After a long walk of 340 miles, I arrived safe among my warm-hearted friends in the Potteries, where I have been speaking nearly every night since.

I have given three lectures at Colbridge. The first was to the members. At the second lecture fifty-six took the pledge; and the next day, from the effects of the same meeting, the number was increased to seventy.

I return my most sincere thanks to John Wood, Esq., for his great kindness towards me, and to the friends generally in the Potteries.

I have given over smoking seventeen years. Have taken no snuff these fifteen years. Have been a teetotaler for nearly nine years. Have been exposed to the rains for many hours, day after day, and yet am free from pain of body or ill-health.

REV. EVAN DAVIES, WALES.

I have lately delivered seven Lectures, last month, in Liverpool and Manchester, which were well attended, and many new members were added, one Baptist minister signed in Manchester. I also delivered a long lecture to a crowded congregation at Zion Chapel, Holywell, and new names were added to the list of total abstinents.

WELSH TRACTS.

It may be useful to our temperance friends in Wales to be informed, that the Religious Tract Society has just published the interesting tract, No. 4, The Fool's Pence, in the Welsh language. Ceiniogau'r Ffylliad.

Mr. Davies, under date, March 14th, gives the following additional particulars,—“Having visited many parts of Caernarvonshire, Anglesea, and Denbighshire, I am happy to inform you, that the cause of true temperance is rapidly progressing. I delivered lengthened lectures at Dwy-gyfylychi, Bangor, Pentraeth, Llanenchymedd, Aylweb, Holyhead, Gwalchmai, Paradrwise, Llangefni, Bethesda Llanrwst, and Conway. The audiences were very numerous, and great attention was everywhere exhibited. Several signed the pledge in all the above places.”

R. GAMBLE.—BERKHAMSTEAD.

In the villages, my social meetings in the cottages (perhaps numbering not more than twenty in some instances) are very favourably thought and spoken of; in one place, where there was not one abstainer two years ago, there are now upwards of twenty adult teetotalers. One man who worked with several others, became an abstainer, and suffered much from his fellow-workmen for some time, but stood firm; his master had been much opposed to the cause, and being aware of this, I called upon him, gave Mr. Spencer's tract Pauperism and Teetotalism; he said nothing to the poor man till mowing time, when he inquired, whether he meant to mow and harvest on teetotalism; having received a reply in the affirmative, nothing more was said till after harvest, when the man was called into his master's house, and presented with a sovereign, in the place of his beer for the summer, and told to keep on, and he should never want a friend; two others, on the same farm, now abstain. In another village, a farmer threatened to discharge one of his workmen, if he suffered me to speak in his house; the man told him, he only wished he would hear for himself. I called upon the master, and after much conversation, he agreed to attend the next meeting; he did so, and is now very friendly to the cause, encouraging his men to keep their pledge. One young man, formerly much addicted to drinking, has, since his becoming a teetotaler, opened a school in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, on Lea Common, a populous, though scattered neighbourhood. I was lately accosted by a female, who asked me, if I did not remember being much abused at an out-door meeting, last summer, in the village? “that was my husband,” she said. “When you said men could do without drink, he called you a liar, but you invited him fairly to try it; he repented of what he had said as soon as he got home; he has tried it, and found you told him the truth. We are well off now,” she added, “but my husband feels ashamed to see you.” I have seen him since that time—he is a good specimen, a hard-working, labouring man, very strong and healthy. A labouring man, working on the Railway, was accosted by a fellow-workmen as follows:—“Why, Charley, that temperance man said, when people were teetotalers they were better off; why I don't believe you are better of than I am, nor got more money.” Charley's reply was, “why, ready money I have but little; when I drank beer, my children were badly clothed, now they are well clad; myself and wife were the same, now the case is altered; we have more food, we have more comfort, are better respected, my children are all of them at school; in fact, to tell the truth, when I drank, myself, wife and family were just in the same state as yours are now.” The conversation was useful; the poor man abstained and is very firm; Charles has made more converts on the work besides this man: thus the leaven works, the seed sown springs up and bears fruit. A farmer met me lately, and thanked me for making two of his drunken workmen teetotalers; he says, the alteration is very great. In a word, in the neighbourhood there is evident improvement in the habits of many of the poor, numbers drink much less, a better attendance at places of worship, increased numbers in sabbath and day-schools, and a greater desire to hear and read on the subject. Public addresses have been given at Tring, Chesham, Berkhamstead, Hempsted, and other places, and I am looking forward to open air meetings in the spring and summer.

APPROVAL OF PUBLICANS TO THE ABOLITION OF THE SUNDAY TRAFFIC.

Charlbury, Oxon.

RESPECTED FRIENDS,—To the following document I most readily obtained the names of all in this small place, who are licensed to sell intoxicating drinks on their premises.

Your friend,

WILLIAM ALBRIGHT.

DECLARATION.

Understanding that a memorial is about to be sent to the Queen, imploring her interference with respect to drinking in public-houses on the sabbath-day, we, the undersigned, being publicans, do hereby express our approbation of the same.

THE GREAT BARRIER.

(From a letter in the People's Journal, by R. Duncan.)

“It appears to me that one of the greatest barriers to social, political, and intellectual improvements, is the drinking-customs of society. Nothing has more securely rivetted the chains of ignorance round the working-man's neck. Nothing has robbed him of so much social enjoyment and domestic happiness. Nothing has placed him in so humiliating a position with his employer. A knowledge of this fact, has led some of the most unprincipled of the employers, to adopt the detestable plan of paying their workmen in the public-house, keeping them waiting from 5 or 6 o'clock till 9 or 10 on the Saturday night, during which time, they consider themselves bound to spend a part of their earnings before they get them, for the good of the house. And these evils must continue to exist, until working-men see it their interest to keep away from the public-house; till they look to some higher source of enjoyment. The monster evil must be grappled with before any good, any permanent or substantial good, can be done."

CAPTAIN COOK'S ACCOUNT OF NEW ZEALAND.

Captain Cook speaks of the remarkable healthiness of the New Zealanders, at the first discovery of the islands. No symptoms of disease or decrepitude were perceptible amongst them. The old people, who were very numerous, though bald and toothless, were active and cheerful. "Water," says the account of the discovery, "is the only liquor used by the New Zealanders. It is greatly to be wished that their happiness, in this respect, may never be destroyed by such a connexion with the European nations, as shall introduce that fondness for spirituous liquors which has been so fatal to the Indians of North America."

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

(From the Evangelical Magazine for March.)

The progress of this cause is a happy omen for our country. We look upon it with eager hope. Its triumph will bring innumerable blessings in its train. Wherever it prevails, the aspects of society are changed. It is the harbinger of all social, moral, and religious renovation. There is no hope of any improvement for the tippler or the drunkard. They are indulging a vice which blunts the perceptions, hardens the heart, and sears the conscience. Public-house habits are the curse of families; and, too often, the drunkard dies as he lives, insensible to all his spiritual relations. The writer of this article has seen ten or twelve heads of families brought to ruin by this degrading propensity. What then is the duty of wise and good men, but to encourage the cause of abstinence, especially where the temptation to indulgence is most powerfully felt? We should like to see all men abstaining from intoxicating beverages who do not require to use them for medicinal purposes.

Upon the labouring classes of the community what blessings would the abstinence cause entail! The money now spent in drink would improve the whole domestic economy. It would provide a better wardrobe; it would supply a larger amount of wholesome food; it would provide a fund for sickness and old age; and it would elevate in every way the condition of the labouring man. Let ministers plead this cause so far as their conscientious scruples will permit. If they have any doubt as to the existing rules of abstinence societies, still let them urge upon their hearers the grave realities of this case. Tens of thousands are perishing—perishing by intemperance. Let them use their utmost endeavours to check the mighty evil.

UNFERMENTED BEER.

The controversy about unfermented wine, has been kept up for some years; but we never hear anything said about unfermented Beer. It was used, however, by Captain Cook, in his second voyage round the world, in 1772. As he proceeded in his voyage from Madeira, "he made three puncheons of beer of the inspissated juice of malt, and the liquor produced was very agreeable. The heat of the weather and the agitation of the ship," adds the great navigator, "had hitherto withstood all the endeavours of our people to prevent this juice from being in a high state of fermentation. If it could be kept from fermenting, it would be a most valuable article at sea."

UNIVERSITY LIFE.

(From the Westminster Review.)

At Oxford, where the morning chapel is compulsory, it is the common practice to come in a night-gown, and run to bed again the moment the service is over. It is not quite so bad as Cambridge, but the greater part of the auditory are always half asleep, and gape sufficiently to satisfy the most orthodox preacher. The appearance of this, however irreverent, is nothing to the scene in the evening. After hall, the usual practice is to retire to some party, large or small, and there use the Englishman's indulgence of lounging over his cake and wine. The last, circulates pretty freely—jests and stories, not remarkable for their moral tendency, fly about on all sides—conviviality is at its height, when all at once the clock strikes—up jump the men in the most violent hurry, throw on their gowns, and dart into the chapel. There the fumes of wine positively taint the air. One man in his haste has brought his cigar in his mouth, and another puts his gown on the wrong way; some rather drunk, by way of showing that they are quite sober and at their ease, put themselves in a straddling position to the full extent of their legs; others, more drunk, get themselves in the form of an S, with their shoulders against the upper forms, by way of keeping their balance. And though the majority may be sober enough, yet the indifferent, drowsy, or perhaps sneering look which plays upon their countenance—the assumed listlessness with which they stand, the eternal yawn, in which, by the way, the dons themselves are in the habit of joining,—all this must create a very edifying impression on the mind of a stranger, who wishes to see how the youth of this country are taught to worship their Creator.

The Cabinet.

OPPRESSION.—No man oppresses thee, O free and independent Franchiser! But does not this stupid porter-pot oppress thee? No son of Adam can bid thee come or go, but this absurd pot of heavy-wet, this can, and does! Thou art the thrall, not of Cedric the Saxon, but of thy own brutal appetites, and this scoured dish of liquor. And thou pratest of thy liberty. Thou entire blockhead!—Thomas Carlyle.

THE ARABS.—The Arabs of the desert are among the most hardy of the human race, enduring the greatest fatigue and exposure under a burning sun, and their drink is water.

MONEY IS ALL.—When the drunkard has money in his pocket, he is "a jolly good-fellow," and is accosted with "what do you want, Sir?" but when all his money is spent, he is "a brute;" and brutish like, is kicked into the gutter. Strange that "free-born Britons" will endure such treatment.

PHILADELPHIA—Since 1836, the number of tavern licenses, in the city of Philadelphia, has decreased from 446 to 187; and in the county, from 835 to 359. A further reduction is recommended by the grand jury.

AMERICAN METHODISM.—The last general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church passed a resolution recommending the restoration of Mr. Wesley's rule on temperance. The Ohio Annual Conference concurred by a vote of 147 ayes and no noes.

JUSTICE AIDING CRIME.—By a return just issued, it appears that in England and Wales, there are as many as 357 petty sessions held at inns and public-houses. The places are generally wretchedly inconvenient for the administration of public justice. For a great many no rent is paid, as the custom brought to the house is considered sufficient. In Wales, however, the magistrates pay a few shillings, or dine on the occasion.

THE NATION'S MONEY WASTED.—The Government contract for 100,000 gallons of rum for the navy, was again taken on Saturday, by Messrs. Lemon, Hart, and Son, of 59, Fenchurch-street, London.—Times, 1st December, 1845

THE WESLEYAN METHODIST MAGAZINE, for 1836, (pp. 905—6,) declared, "It is our settled conviction, that more of our ministers and members have been degraded by the sin of intemperance than by any other. We verily believe that this single vice is destroying more souls than all the ministers in Britain are instrumental in saving. The man who trifles with strong drink may be overcome; whereas, he who abstains cannot. It cannot be unwise to throw the guard of abstinence around our moral character, and our spiritual interest."

WINE.—"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging."—Solomon.

WATER.—"Water is the most suitable drink for man."—Zim�erman. "Water is the best drink."—Pindar. "Whilst I drank nothing stronger than water, I could decidedly go through more fatigue, both bodily and mentally, than on the moderate system."—Rev. S. Ramsay, A. M.

ENGLISHMEN AND DRINK.—De Foo says, "There is nothing more frequent, than for an Englishman to work till he has got his pockets full of money, and then to go and be idle, or perhaps drink till it is all gone. From thence comes poverty, parish charges, and beggary."

"In English ale their dear enjoyment lies,
For which they'll starve themselves and families."

EAST INDIES.—Bombay.—"Beer is still totally without inquiry, even for the superior brands; and quotations are entirely nominal. There is little or no demand either for gin or brandy, and we have heard of no transactions."—Times, March 6.

PRUSSIA.—There are 9,581 breweries, and 10,131 distilleries, in the kingdom of Prussia.

DISTILLATION AND POTATOES.—The government of Hesse Dramstadt has just prohibited the employment of potatoes for distillation.

THE UNIVERSE, an influential weekly newspaper, intends to devote, regularly, a column to the subject of Temperance and Peace, each alternate week.

THE ADVANTAGES OF DRINK.

A man had been sentenced to death at Kingston, Jamaica; but not one of the forty thousand persons in Kingston would consent publicly to break the sixth commandment. At length the authorities hit upon an expedient worthy of the emergency. They bribed a Spanish sailor who happened to be in port; and to screw his courage up to the sticking point, they kept him drunk for ten days!

PRACTICAL TESTIMONY.

In a tract published by the Midland Temperance Association, is the following statement from John Jarman, labourer, of Clipstow, Northamptonshire:—"By the blessing of God I have done the chief part of my work for the past four years without any intoxicating drink, and for the last nineteen months have been a total abstainer. Instead of beer, my master pays me £1 for the harvest month, and for grass mowing one shilling per acre extra. I am thankful to say I never enjoyed better health or did my work with so much ease and comfort."

TO OUR READERS.

We have made arrangements to present our readers Monthly, with a variety of Original Articles on the most important points of the temperance question, by writers of well known literary attainments.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications for the MAY Number of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER, addressed to the Editors, 39, Moorgate Street, London, should be received on or before the 15th of the present month; and, if articles of intelligence, must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer.

To our Unknown Friend, R. W. O., we tender our thanks for his kindness in directing our attention to the Inspector's valuable Report. We shall make ample use of it.

Octogonarian vel Ministerium.—We shall be glad to hear from him, but not in rhyme.

J. L. Newcastle, Ireland.—His favour reached us five days after the appointed time. If he please, it shall appear next month.

James Larner will see that his communication was forwarded by one from the Secretary of the Suffolk Union.

T. E. Rows.—We shall feel obliged if he will forward us from time to time extracts from the Parliamentary Debates, &c. It may often chance that we overlook facts worth recording.

T. A. Smith, of Jersey; John Burt, Poplar; Philip Pizey, Woodbridge, in our next Number.

RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.—"Results of Hydropathy," by Dr. Edward Johnson; "The Wet Sheet," by W. F. Preshaw, Esq.; "The Wesleyan Centenary Hall Spirit Vaults Exposed," by James Buckle.

Also Received, Reports of the Huddersfield, Halsted, and Bolton Societies.

WEST SUSSEX
HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT,
LYMINSTER, NEAR ARUNDEL, SUSSEX.

The above Establishment, under the immediate Superintendence of Mr. and Mrs. HILLS, is in full operation; and Patients are received and treated on the most reasonable terms.

Respectable references can be given to Patients who have been cured at the above Establishment, of Acute and Chronic Diseases, some of the most inveterate character.

This Establishment is One Mile from Arundel; One and a Half from the Arundel and Little Hampton Station, of the Brighton and Chichester Railway; and Three from the Fashionable Watering Place, Little Hampton.

For Terms and other information apply to the Resident Proprietor, Mr. G. HILLS, Surgeon, Hydropathic Baths, near Arundel.

“The most convenient and comfortably fitted-up establishment that I have seen.”—The Hon. Mrs. General Gardin v.

HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT,

STANSTEAD BURY HOUSE,

NEAR WARE, HERTFORDSHIRE

BY DR. JOHNSON,

Author of “Life, Health, and Disease,” “Theory and Principles of Hydropathy,” &c., &c.

For the cure of indigestion, rheumatism, bilious habits, excessive liability to take cold, nervous debility, spasms, languid circulation, psoriasis, constipation, determination of blood to the head, chronic ulcers of the leg, and all diseases depending on general debility, or suppressed or depraved secretions, torpid liver, stomach diseases, and chronic inflammation of the mucous membranes. This treatment is also exceedingly useful when the main object is to strengthen and harden the delicate constitutions of young persons of a scrofulous or consumptive tendency. In many of those painful and irregular diseases which cannot be ranked in any particular class, and which have defied all ordinary remedies, this treatment has often been found successful.

WATER CURE.

GERMAN BATHS,

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, MIDDLESEX.

These BATHS are elegantly fitted up with the GERMAN DOUCHE, in all its varieties, Couches, Baths, a GYMNASIUM FOR INDOOR EXERCISE, and every comfort for the express purpose of affording to invalids an opportunity of undergoing a regular course of “Water treatment,” under the direction of any Medical Adviser they may prefer; no Medical Man having any proprietary or other interest in these Baths, while the manipulations are performed by regularly taught male and female skilful Bath attendants. The Harrow Baths are strictly a Bathing, and not a Boarding Establishment, (the patients occupying private lodgings in the village.) The Baths are only ten minutes’ walk from the Harrow Station, on the London and Birmingham Railway; and are reached in twenty-five minutes from the London Terminus, at Euston Square. Fifteen trains stop at Harrow daily; and the facility afforded by the half-crown first-class day tickets, enables those whose avocations will not admit of their occupying lodgings in the vicinity of the Baths, to come to them for the Water treatment, at the times prescribed, and return to town again for that small sum. For Terms, and other particulars, and as to Lodgings, whether furnished or unfurnished, House or Cottage accommodation, or merely Apartments, address, Mrs. PRICE, German Baths, Harrow, Middlesex.

N. B. Persons occupying a House or Lodgings, at Harrow, have the privilege of educating their children at the great Public School there, at a very trifling expense

Chronicle and Recorder. MAY 1st, 1846.

It is not a little remarkable that Lord Bacon and Sir Matthew Hale, in ancient times, and Mr. Baron Alderson and Mr. Justice Coleridge, in modern times, have all concurred in stating their belief, that four-fifths of the crimes committed in this country, may be traced to originate either directly or indirectly in drunkenness. If this be so, and the judges of the land most certainly can be no mean authority upon such a subject, it follows, of course, that four-fifths of the prisoners confined in our gaols, must have come there, either directly or indirectly, through "STRONG DRINK;" and such being the case, is it not still more remarkable, that so little effort has been especially directed by the chaplains of our prisons, or by County Magistrates, in their character of Visiting Justices to this overwhelming vice, and emphatically denounced Sin?

That "STRONG DRINK is raging," in these days, no man of character will dare to dispute. The gaudy gin-palaces in our towns, and the pestilential beer-shops in our country districts, too truly attest the fact, to the appalled sense of the moralist. That "STRONG DRINK" is worse than useless to the working-man, is equally well attested; first, by the printed testimony of the most eminent and enlightened medical men our country boasts of; and, secondly, by the thousands of hard-working total abstainers from strong drink, who, by their steady la-hours and sober energies, give new life to our manufactures and fresh vigour to our soil, wherever they are employed. That "STRONG DRINK" is the curse of our country, seducing the husband from his family allegiance, sowing discord on his social hearth, ruining alike his fortune and his health, searing his heart against humanity, and rendering him deaf to the blessed voice of religion itself, the experience of every devoutly labouring minister of the Gospel, of every denomination and in every parish, also bears ample testimony.

Under these circumstances, who should we expect to see foremost in the ranks of any movement, having for its object the putting down of "STRONG DRINK"—the bringing back of the husband to his family allegiance (to his wife and little ones)—the bringing back of peace and happiness to the social hearth—the saving from ruin—the opening of the heart to the tenderest feelings of humanity, and above all, the leading to God through the merits of our blessed Redeemer? Do not the old and the young, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, with one accord, exclaim in answer, "THE MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL." But have they assumed this proud position? No! I will not delay now to ask, why not; it may be matter for future inquiry, but will proceed to state what has lately been done by one of our zealous advocates in the great Metropolitan Prison at Cold Bath Fields.

A COUNTY MAGISTRATE.

THE REPEAL OF THE MALT TAX.

On the 30th of March, a public meeting was convened by the "Association for the Repeal of the Malt Tax," at the York Hotel, Blackfriars, which was attended by several members of Parliament, and by a number of farmers from the agricultural counties.

As might be supposed, the conduct of the government did not escape censure. Loud and vehement was the indignation expressed against Her Majesty's Ministers, for repealing the duty on a variety of foreign goods, while the heavy tax on Malt, which is an article of home-produce, was continued without any abatement.

On these questions of party politics, we do not enter; our sole object is to lay before the public a brief, but correct report, of the sapient remarks made by those of the speakers who delivered eulogiums on beer.

Sir C. LAMB, Bart., presided.

Mr. FIFE said, "it was known to every one, that the favourite beverage of the working-man, was beer, and that it was absolutely necessary to his capability for doing hard labour! Yet how was it possible he could have it so long as there was a duty upon it of 100 per cent., as at present? It was a cruel thing for the poor man to reflect, that he could not have a drop of the produce of that barley which his own labour had brought to perfection."

Mr. EBLEY declared, "what a heart-burning thing it was to see a poor man doing heavy labour, and going to the rivulet to slake his thirst (hear.) He trusted the exertions of this society would put an end to so bad a state of things."

We wonder if Mr. Ebley has ever read Milton's Agonistes; and if so, whether he has met with the passage where, speaking of the folly of using strong drinks, the poet exclaims:—

"God with these forbidden made choice to rear,
His mighty champion strong above compare,
Whose drink was only from the limpid brook."

Mr. GOODMAN said, "he would not conceive of any class of persons in the community who would be opposed to a repeal of the Malt Tax; unless, indeed, the teetotalers, and even they, if they possessed all the kindly feeling they professed for their fellow-men, would surely wish them all the comfort, they felt that was necessary in their hours of labour, from day-light to dark."

Mr. FELS stated his conviction that, "beer was absolutely essential to the labouring man, and no one of right feeling could bear to see him without it. It was almost as essential as bread!"

Without troubling ourselves, or annoying our readers, with any elaborate reply to these childish fallacies, we shall point out some serious discrepancies between the speeches of the country gentlemen.

Mr. FIFE—"Beer is absolutely necessary to the working man's capability for hard labour."

Mr. EBLEY.—"There is not a farmer in my parish who can afford to give beer to his workmen."
Mr. WILDER.—"The best paid agriculturist in any part of the country cannot afford himself a drop of beer."

Do agricultural labourers, then, drink beer, or do they not?

If they do, what becomes of Messrs. Ebley and Wilder's assertions? If they do not, what value are we to attach to the assertions of Messrs. Fife and Fells? Allowing, however, both statements to be correct, viz.—that the labourers cannot work without beer, and that beer they cannot get, it reasonably follows, that the land remains uncultivated, and that no corn can be grown for our increasing population. This alarming state of things does, in our opinion, demand immediate attention from government; and rather than the horrible alternative of a famine, let us have a "Repeal of the Malt Tax."

But setting irony aside, the most reasonable speech delivered at the meeting referred to, appears to us, to have been one by a Mr. Bennett, who advocated the "Repeal" cause, on the ground, that the farmers ought to be allowed to fatten their cattle on the produce of their own land, if they thought best.

We leave the feeding of oxen to those whom it more immediately concerns; but we heartily protest against the mockery of attempting to better the poor labourer's condition, by giving him "plenty of beer." Give him wages wherewith he may purchase sufficient solid food, and that will strengthen him; give him the means of procuring education and religious instruction, and we are fully confident that he will be able to dispense with beer, even though it is said to be "absolutely necessary;" and "almost as essential as bread."

OPIUM AND ALCOHOLIC DRINKS.

The Baptist Missionary Society, desirous of possessing correct information on the effects, growth, &c. of Opium, dispatched a number of queries to those of its missionaries in Hindostan, who labour in the districts where Opium is extensively cultivated.

Answers to the queries sent have been received, and were published in the Baptist Magazine for April.

To exhibit the resemblance between opium and alcohol, and also to expose the spurious philanthropy which raves against the use of the poppy-drug among the Orientals, but zealously supports the drinking-customs of its own country; we present, in parallel columns, the effect of opium on the inhabitants of the East, with the effects produced on the nations of Europe, by fermented and distilled liquors.—

OPIMUM.

Extent of Use.

Mr. Phillips of Muttra—"Opium is used in this neighbourhood, and I believe, throughout India, as a stimulus by the young and middle-aged, and as a luxury by the old. The common labourers, also, who earn two annas a day, never deny themselves their daily pill."

Physical Effect.

Mr. Beddy of Patna—"Its physical influence is very detrimental to the constitution, which, at last, sinks under its use."

Mr. Robinson of Dacca—"Opium has at first an exhilarating effect; but as persons become accustomed to it, larger doses are necessary in order to produce its effect. It gradually undermines the constitution."

Mr. Parsons of Monghir—"In every respect, as a stimulus, it is most detrimental. A total unfitness for accustomed exertion is felt, if the dose is omitted for a single day."

Mr. Williamson of Sewry—"It tends to diminish the appetite, and to induce emaciation and general debility."

Mental Effect.

Mr. Phillips of Muttra—"The mental faculties are more vigorous whilst the influence of the opium lasts, as I have been informed by many who employ moonshees and pundits to transcribe and teach, and who are very stupid until the daily dose has been taken."

Mr. Robinson of Dacca—"It depresses the mental faculties."

Mr. Williamson of Sewry—"It relaxes the energies of the mind."

Moral Effect.

Mr. Williamson of Sewry—"It is sometimes used, I am told, as an incentive to vice."

Mr. Leslie of Calcutta—"The eating of opium,

ALCOHOLIC DRINKS.

Extent of Use.

Alcoholic drinks are used throughout Great Britain, as nutriment by the young and middle-aged, and as a stimulus by the old. The common labourers, also, who earn not more than a few shillings a day, never deny themselves of their daily quantity of beer.

Physical Effect.

Alcoholic stimulants have an exhilarating influence, but as persons become accustomed to them, larger doses are necessary in order to produce their effect. A total unfitness for accustomed exertion is felt, if the dose is omitted for a single day. Their use, as the most eminent physicians, surgeons, and chemists certify, and as the personal testimony of myriads declares—is physically injurious, and among other hurtful properties, they tend to diminish the appetite, arrest the reproduction of matter, and produce general debility. Read the Testimonies of Physicians and Surgeons procured by Julius Jeffreys and John Dunlop, Esqrs.; Dr. Beaumont's experiments on St. Martin; Liebig's Chemistry, &c.

Mental Effect.

Although in some cases the use of alcoholic liquors produces an unusual brilliancy of mind, they eventually exact payment with interest, by depressing and injuring the mental faculties. They are unfriendly to that calmness and tranquillity which ever accompany an investigation of the higher and more abstract sciences.

Moral Effect.

Alcoholic liquors, according to the testimony of judges and the records of crime, are the main incentive to vice and immorality.

and the drinking of spirits, are both obstacles to the reception of the truth."

Mr. Parsons of Monghir—"The bad influence which it exerts, is nothing to be compared with the giant evils of drunkenness, from toddy, spirits, and a preparation of the hemp plant."

The Westeyan Magazine of 1836, declared, that drunkenness was destroying more souls every year, than all the ministers of Christ were instrumental in saving.

Read Messrs. Leslie and Parson's confession of the giant evils strong drinks produce in India.

In their moral, social, and religious effects, they exceed, beyond all comparison, the effects of opium.

Reader! while you mourn over the evils attendant on the use of Opium in the East, let your efforts be especially directed in accelerating the overthrow of the Curse of Britain—the Moloch of Christendom!

COLD CLIMATES.

There is unquestionably more apparent ground for assuming alcoholic liquors to be necessary in cold than in warm climates. It may be said, that "as hardly any known substance gives forth so much heat as alcohol, it must prove a very valuable, if not indispensable, article of diet, in regions where the cold is intense." It is true, that alcohol produces warmth, but the warmth is evanescent; alcohol does not nourish and warm at the same time; it does not repair the waste daily and hourly going on in the physical system, and at the same time impart to the system an agreeable warmth. The heat is obtained without the addition of that nourishment which is essential to the sustentation of the strength and vigour of the body.

LIEBIG in his "Letters on Chemistry," sets this question at rest. His words are, "Beer, wine, and spirits furnish no ELEMENT capable of entering into the composition of blood, muscular fibre, or any part which is the seat of the vital principle." Is it not then a greater mark of wisdom to consume articles which produce heat and yield nutrition at the same time, than to drink a liquid which can only warm, but which cannot contribute one particle to the support of the human system?

If, then, persons in cold climates can have food which nourishes and warms—and such food is provided everywhere,—it must be obvious, that alcohol, which only warms, is to say the best, a superfluity and not a necessary."

We have shown cause why alcohol need not be used; we now proceed farther and say,—It ought not.

Before alcohol can evolve heat it must be combined with the oxygen of the blood; but oxygen is necessary to the reproduction of matter; so that while it is combining with the elements of alcohol a stop is put to the repair of the system, and a decided injury is thereby inflicted.

Least this should be considered the language of exaggeration, we again quote LIEBIG as an authority.—"By the use of alcohol, a limit must be rapidly put to the change of matter in certain parts of the body. The oxygen of the arterial blood, which, in the absence of alcohol, would have combined with the matter of the tissues, now combines with the elements of alcohol. The arterial [red] blood becomes venous [black] without the substance of the muscles having taken any part in the transformation."

* Among the articles useful for nutrition, are vegetable fibrine, vegetable albumen, animal flesh, &c. Among those useful for the production of heat, are fat, starch, gum, alcoholic drinks, &c. In polar regions the first-named article (fat) is abundantly provided by nature.

KIRBY O'SULLIVAN, Esq., of Liebig's laboratory, also remarks, "All alcoholic liquors, although they produce heat in an eminent degree, possess also another property, which is infinitely better known of the two, viz., their narcotic action on the brain. This is caused by the spirit preventing the blood, which goes to the brain, from becoming perfectly arterIALIZED, by its vapour diffusing itself through the lungs, and thus preventing access of air, by which means, the functions of the brain are perfectly carried on." We thus perceive that the good resulting from an emulsion, of heat from alcohol, is more than counterbalanced by its arrest of the reproduction of matter, and the consequent change of red into black blood. We add a few facts in proof, that alcoholic drinks are not necessary or beneficial in cold climates.

In CARNE'S "Letters from Switzerland," there is mention made of a noted chamois hunter, who provided himself with a large lump of sugar in lieu of the usual flask of brandy.

Rev. RICHARD KNILL, formerly missionary at St. Petersburg, states, that the Russians have found by experience, that ardent spirits are exceedingly injurious to soldiers, when exposed to severe cold.

VON KOTZEBUE, the celebrated German dramatic writer, relates that, on his way to Siberia, he met with a man 130 years old, "who still continued to go into the woods in quest of bark to make his shoes; and I was much struck to observe that his hands were neither wrinkled nor thin, as is commonly the case with old people; he had never been addicted to the use of strong liquors."

BARRON LARREY mentions, that during Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, those soldiers who indulged in the use of ardent spirits, sunk under the effects of cold, almost in battalions; but their fate was not shared by those of their comrades, who abstained from the use of alcohol.

Dr. J. BARKER, of the United States army, states that when General Jackson was once asked if ardent spirits were required by soldiers, immediately replied, "I have made the observation, that in hard duty and excessive cold, those performed the one and endured the other better, who drank nothing but water."

Rev. Dr. SCORESBY, was for many years a resident in the high northern latitudes. In his examination before a committee of the House of Commons, he said, "There is a very pernicious effect in the reaction, after the use of ardent spirits. Spirits are decidedly injurious in cold climates."

Sir JOHN ROSS, in his Arctic Expedition, observes, "The immediate stimulus gives a temporary courage, and its effect is mistaken for an infusion of new strength; but the slightest attention will show, how exactly the result is the reverse." During a protracted and severe exposure of his men to cold, this eminent navigator continued with advantage in the abandonment of what he denominates "this false and pernicious stimulus." The attempt to winter in arctic regions has not unfrequently been foiled by the presence of alcohol.

In an essay by a MEDICAL PRACTITIONER, of Glasgow, it is said, "In 1619, the crew of a Danish ship of sixty men, well supplied with provision and ardent spirit, attempted to pass the winter at Hudson's Bay, but 58 of them died before the spring; while in the case of an English crew of 22 men, in the same circumstances, but destitute of distilled spirit, only two died."

Other facts of a similar nature, are recorded by a writer, in REES'S ENCYCLOPEDIA and by Drs. MITCHEL and AITKIN. The existence of many thousands of pledged abstainers in Upper Canada, Labrador, Newfoundland, &c., sufficiently attests the ability to live in cold climates without having recourse to "the spirit bottle."

But turning our attention for a moment to the South Pole, we receive corroborative testimony. The cold at the southern extremity of the globe equals, as every one knows, the cold at its northern limits.

Now, it is a well ascertained fact, that there are hundreds of whaling vessels which sail on temperance principles, and although exposed to weather the most severe, the universal declaration the sailors make, is, that abstinence from intoxicating drinks is quite compatible with physical health.

As an example, we adduce the following letter, addressed to the Rev. S. C. DANON, the editor of a temperance periodical at the Sandwich islands:—

"Honolulu,

"Temperance on board a Hamburg brig.

"REV. SIR,—All hands on board the Hamburg brig Julia, shipped under the condition, that who-soever should be seen intoxicated, whether on board or on shore, should lose his wages. No spirit-rations were given out, but instead, coffee twice, and tea once, a day. In cold weather, the crew received at night ginger-tea, prepared for every watch twice.

"Captain Penhallow remarked, that he never had seen a stronger and healthier crew on board of a vessel of her size. I am, &c.

"J. HELLRUNG."

R. DANA (son of the well-known American poet) who sailed in a whaler to the Pacific Ocean, doubling Cape Horn and encountering tempests of hail and continents of ice, remarks, in his Two Years' before the Mast, "I never knew a sailor in my life, who would not prefer a pint of hot coffee or chocolate, on a cold night, to all the rum afloat. They all say it warms them only for a time."

From the foregoing facts—and did opportunity permit, they might be greatly extended—we may safely pronounce in the words of Dr. RUSH, "There cannot be a greater error than to suppose, that spirituous liquors lessen the effects of cold on the body. On the contrary, they always render the body more liable to be affected and injured by cold."

JOHN WESLEY.

"Neither may we gain by hurting our neighbour in his body, therefore we may not sell anything which tends to impair health. Such is eminently all that liquid fire, commonly called drams, or spirituous liquors. It is true, these may have a place in medicine (although there would be rarely any occasion for them, were it not for the unskilfulness of the practitioner); therefore, such as prepare and sell them only for this end, may keep their conscience clear; but who are they who prepare them only for this end? Do you know ten such distillers in England? then excuse these. But all who sell them in the common way, to any that will buy, are poisoners general. They murder His [Her] Majesty's subjects by wholesale, neither does their eye pity or spare. They drive them to hell like sheep: and what is their gain? Is it not the blood of these men? Who then would envy their large estates and sumptuous palaces? a curse is in the midst of them. Blood, blood, is there: the foundation, the floor, the walls, the roof, are stained with blood. And canst thou hope, O thou man of blood! though thou art clothed in scarlet and fine linen, and farest sumptuously every day; canst thou hope to deliver down the fields of blood to the third generation? Not so; for there is a God in heaven; therefore thy name shall be rooted out; like as those whom thou hast destroyed body and soul, thy memorial shall perish with thee.—(Works, vol. vi. p. 129.)

“You see the wine when it sparkles in the cup, and are going to drink of it. I tell you there is poison in it! throw it away, throw it away, for thy brother’s sake, lest thou embolden him to drink also.”—(vol. vii. p. 504.)

“Taste no spirituous liquor, no dram of any kind unless prescribed by a physician.”—vol. viii. p. 273.)

“Have those in band left off snuff and drams? Let no preacher touch either on any account. Strongly dissuade our people from them.”

“Do not sabbath breaking, dram drinking, &c., still prevail in several places? Let us preach expressly on each of these heads. Let the leader closely examine, and exhort every person to put away the accursed thing. Let the preachers warn every society, that none who is guilty herein can remain with us.”—(vol. viii. p. 347, 348.)

“Strong, and more especially, spirituous liquors, are a certain though slow poison. Nothing conduces more to health than abstinence,” &c.—(vol. xiv. p. 327.)

“That liquid fire lays the foundation of numberless diseases. It is amazing that the preparing or selling this poison should be permitted in any civilized state.”—(vol. xi. p. 510.)

“March, 1744, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, expelled from the society two for retailing spirituous liquors.”—(vol. i. p. 416.)

“Have we not reason to believe, that little less than half the corn produced in the kingdom, is every year consumed, not by so harmless a way as throwing it into the sea, but by converting it into deadly poison; poison that naturally destroys not only the strength of life, but also the morals of our countrymen? O! tell it not in Constantinople, that the English raise the royal revenue by selling the flesh and blood of their countrymen.”—Thoughts on Scarcity, by John Wesley, published 1773.

WESLEYAN MAGAZINE for 1836, p. 905, remarks, “We verily believe that the single sin of intemperance is destroying more souls than all the ministers in Britain are instrumental in saving. The man who trifles with strong drink may be overcome; whereas he who abstains cannot. It cannot be unwise to throw the guard of abstinence around our moral character and our spiritual interest.”

In the WESLEYAN MAGAZINE for 1837, p. 498.—“The investment of capital in gin palaces is one of the greatest commercial disgraces of the day; and how men can quietly pocket the profits of such speculations, and compose themselves to sleep at night with the wages of such iniquity in possession, is one of those mysteries which confound the thinking mind.”

[The foregoing article was sent to the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, for insertion as an advertisement. It was, however, considered so objectionable, by the followers of John Wesley, that they refused to publish it in their periodical. A copy of their secretary’s letter was inserted without comment in our last number; the consequence is, that the Missionary Society has refused to send the Chronicle to their missionaries! We shall, therefore, be put to the needless expense of sending the papers by post; and must beg those missionaries, who cease to receive their usual Chronicle, not to ascribe the omission to any diminution of interest on our part.

We cannot believe that the large and respectable body, distinguished by the name of the venerable Wesley, will thank their executive for the respect they have shown for his precepts.]

Port Wine.

[A copy of the following official document having come into our possession, we consider we are only consulting the benefit of our countrymen, by giving it all possible publicity.]

PROCLAMATION.

ALCOHOL, BY THE VITIATED APPETITES AND CUSTOMS OF MANKIND, King of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, Australia, and the Isles of the Ocean,—to all mankind,

GREETING—

We cannot but congratulate our loyal subjects upon the increased extent of our modern authority, compared with that exercised by us in ancient times. For whereas, formerly, men drank only wine and drinks compounded therefrom, there have, in these latter days, been manufactured liquors of a more fiery and seductive nature, as gin, rum, brandy, and whiskey; together with cider, ale, and beer, beverages particularly grateful to our well-beloved and trustworthy supporters—the English people.

Notwithstanding, we have one great cause of disquietude, in the existence of an increasing band of malcontents and rebels against our own royal authority, who are industriously and untiringly striving to alienate from us the affections of our liege subjects: and it is therefore with deep concern, that we view any acts, likely to embolden and add fresh vigour to this dangerous and treasonable rebellion.

Having heard rumours to the effect, that there are extensive adulterations of that goodly beverage, commonly called Port wine, and that in numerous cases, fictitious liquors are sold under its name, containing not a particle of the juice of grapes,—we thought it right for the vindication of our Majesty, to institute inquiries respecting the verity of these rumours; which inquiries have proved the rumours aforesaid to be in no wise exaggerated, but in every part strictly and literally true. And whereas such practices cannot fail to aid and abet the rebellion aforesaid, to throw discredit upon our government, and to bring ourself into disrepute.—

We do hereby Caution our loving subjects, not to drink any more of that wine, commonly called Port, under pain of various and severe bodily distempers.

And we do hereby charge our trust-worthy and long-tried friends, the makers and sellers of Strong Drink, that they exert themselves to the utmost, in publishing and giving due force to this our Sovereign and Gracious Caution, in all places of our Dominion.

Given at our palace of The Old Serpent, on the First Day of the Month of May, in the year of our Reign four thousand one hundred and ninety-three.

[Before adding a few statements in support of His Majesty's solemn and well-timed caution, we desire it to be understood, that our hostility to Port wine does not rest upon the fact of the adulterations described in the foregoing proclamation. We adduce them merely to show that the King has good and true reason for warning his subjects—to whom we have the happiness of not belonging—against the use of that liquor.]

ADULTERATIONS OF PORT WINE.

Dr. Henderson, in his History of Modern Wines, remarks, "According to the custom-house books of Oporto for 1812, 135 pipes and 20 hogsheads of wine were shipped to Guernsey; and in the same year, there were landed in London, from that island, 2,545 pipes and 162 hogsheads reported to be Port wine!" And in 1833, not one pipe was exported from Oporto to the Channel Islands, but no less than 862 pipes were exported from the Channel Islands to London!

Dr. Lee of New York, observes, "In this country the manufacture of Port wine is no longer a secret. A red wine is imported from Marseilles and Bordeaux, at 40 cents a gallon, called French Port, which is made into first-rate Oporto, by adding a little burnt sugar, or a decoction of wood, and a portion of alcohol."

In the Wine Guides, the following among other receipts will be found for making Port wine.—"Take of good cider, 4 gallons; of the juice of red beet, 2 quarts; brandy, 2 quarts; logwood, 4 oz.; rhatany root bruised $\frac{1}{2}$ lb.: first infuse the logwood and rhatany root in brandy and a gallon of cider for one week, then strain off the liquor, and mix the other ingredients; keep it in a cask for a month when it will be fit to bottle."

In the Mechanics' Magazine, the following chemical analysis was given of a bottle of cheap Port wine.—"Spirits of wine, 3 oz.; cider, 14 oz.; sugar, $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz.; alum, 2 scruples; tartaric acid, 1 scruple; strong decoction of logwood, 4 ounces!"

The Agents of the Oporto Company confessed in a letter, that "the wines for the most part had become a mere confusion of mixtures."

Accum, in his Culinary Poisons, remarks, "The preparation of an astringent extract, to produce from spoiled home-made and foreign wines, a genuine old port, by mere admixture, or to impart to weak wine a rough austere taste, a fine colour, and a peculiar flavour, forms one branch of the business of particular wine coopers."

Redding, in his work on wine and spirit adulterations, declares, "in the richest country in the world, it is mortifying to discover, that at every inn or tavern, where enormous prices are demanded for a bottle of wine, nothing is to be met with, from the Land's-end to Caithness, but a coarse brandied product of the Oporto Company, which in any other region but this would be flung into the still."

Redding also gives the subjoined recipe for making 8 pipes of port, or 920 imperial gallons—

- 2 pipes of Beric Carlos.
- 2 " of Figueras.
- 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ " of Red Cape.
- 1 " of Common Port.
- 20 gallons of Mountain.
- 20 " of the washings of brandy casks.
- 3 " of colouring matter, extracted from German bilberries.
- 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. of salt of tartar, to make the mixture crust on the bottle.

And 3 lbs. of gum dragon, to impart a fulness of flavour and consistency of body, and to give the whole a face.

The following case, reported in the papers of the day, will let the uninitiated into the secret of "Port wine" making.—On the 24th of August, 1842, W. H. Bond, wine and spirit dealer, Brierly-hill, summoned Adolphus Blumenthal, wine and spirit merchant of Birmingham, for pretending to sell to him a pipe of Port wine, when, in fact, he sold him a certain deleterious admixture of cider and other ingredients. It appeared from the evidence of Blumenthal's cellarman, that he had taken a cask, having all the appearance of one which had once contained "good old port," and had poured into it 60 gallons of cider, 20 gallons of Spanish red wine, known by the name of Pontac, and 10 gallons of British brandy. The whole was then well shook up and directed to Bond, in pursuance of his order, for a pipe of good old port wine.

But to come down to the present year. It is now pretty generally known that the vintage of last year, in Portugal, was a failure. The Probes stated, "One half of the fruit is unripe, while the other is rotten."

The Coalliso also observed, "The fruit is rotten as soon as it is ripe."

And only a few weeks ago, the Times correspondent declared that the produce of the last year's vintage was not above one-fifth of the quantity usually exported. Now, the question readily suggests itself, what means will be adopted to meet the English demand? If, with a plentiful vintage there is so much adulteration, may we not shudder to think of the horrible drugged compounds which will now be shipped to England, and consumed by the devotees of the bottle? Pure alcoholic wine is bad enough, but what say you, reader, to hogsheads of "good old port," which never saw the shores of Portugal, which never contained one drop of grape-juice, but which are solely composed of destructive, poisonous drugs? One part of His Majesty's warning, refers to "various and severe bodily distempers;" and in support, we produce the testimony of Dr. Orfila on poisons, who remarks, "Sugar of lead is mixed with acid or sharp wines—gives a sweet astringent, metallic taste, and produces constrictions of the throat, pains in the stomach, fetid eructations, coldness of limbs, convulsions, change of features, delirium. Wines adulterated with alum, to render the wines redder and less changeable, produce painful digestion, obstruction of bowels, and piles. Sulphuric and nitric acid, and alkalies, influence the parts with which they are placed in contact. Some produce so great an inflammation that they may be regarded as caustics almost as powerful as the actual cautery; they evidently cause death in the same manner as burns. Nux vomica, cocculus indicus, introduced into the stomach, affect the brain and spinal marrow—give rise to fits from time to time."

The above remarks relate solely to Port wine; we shall probably revert to the adulterations of other kinds of wine in a future number.

Temperance a National Blessing.

By REV. J. LOCKE OF NEWCASTLE, IRELAND.

A paragraph, extracted from the Manchester Argus in the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE of December last,* set me thinking whether it is justifiable, even by a moderate use of fermented liquors, to countenance a habit productive of so much moral evil and social disorganization in the family of man; and after mature reflection, the deliberate resolution was formed to add my humble example to the cloud of witnesses who attest the beneficial effects of teetotalism in the British Empire.

Total abstinence appears to be the only unailing remedy for immoderate indulgence; since the tenacity of habit is strengthened, and the will carried without the charmed circle of temptation, by the strictness of the pledge.

The most casual observer will admit, that the improvement of the Irish peasantry has been concurrent with the progress of temperance, and must be mainly ascribed to its influence. By that self-restraint, which a triumph over our deadliest national foe—"That enemy which man takes into his mouth to steal away his brains"—has created, the physical character is elevated, the intellect developed, the moral sentiments enhanced. In proportion as less grain is destroyed by distillation, more is consumed in bread stuffs; a better description of clothing is used, and the wants of an advancing condition are generally evinced in an increasing demand for the manifold appliances which the markets of modern civilization supply.

Those mechanical agencies, which are daily multiplying and facilitating the interchange of thought in this highly privileged age, are eagerly apprehended and applied. Subscription Libraries—Reading Rooms, and various plans of adult instruction, afford opportunities for mental cultivation in our towns and villages. And the working-man, sober and reflective at his humble fireside, or in the cheerful temperance hall, is not unfrequently as successful in discriminating, as he is earnest in appreciating the truths, which lie con-

* The paragraph alluded to was the following:—"View the various schemes for social improvement, in whatever light we may, whether morally, religiously, or politically, their grand recommendation must be their tendency to excite in the minds of unthinking men, the powers of reflection and self-guidance. Regarded in this light, we do not know but that some of these schemes are worthy to take precedence of many others of a political and party nature, though the latter occupy a much larger share of public attention. What calmly-judging mind, with power to look into itself and understand, so far as can be understood, its deep mysteries and independent powers, but knows that the prosperity and happiness of nations and communities depend less, much less, upon forms of government, or the ascendancy of this or that party, than upon the judicious self-moved operations of well-informed minds. As an instrument for aiding to lay this foundation for social greatness, we hold the abstinence cause to have irresistible claims on the public mind. When we think, too, of the wonderful sympathies that bind mind to mind, and the secret influence that, springing in one mind actuates another, we at once see the importance to that cause of individual example and support; and cannot admit the force of opposing arguments, grounded on the plea of too much self-sacrifice, as weighed against the advantage to each individual that would result from a hearty and general co-operation for the reform of the inebriated vices of society."

fusedly mingled with the trash of a party press, or distorted in the ill-assorted pages of our cheap literature.

It must be stated, too, that Chambers' unrivalled compilations, and other standard industrial classics are to be found in many of the Reading Rooms.—A tolerant spirit also is gradually softening the harsher features of antagonist opinions; for undoubtedly the subjection of any depraved habit, endues the whole man with a certain moral tension, and tends to deliver up the balance of the passions to the steady hand of reason. Too many unhappy exceptions occur; but the general result is undeniable, and inexpressibly important amongst a population in a transition state, excited by discontents, and inflamed with the rapidity of their own progress. Indeed, the temperance movement is the only levelling system, which exalts, by purifying the debased; and linked, as it essentially is, with the sacred cause of civil and international peace, it offers sterling security to society, that, amid national trials and changes, the red hand shall not stain the moral resolve of those, who have learned the art of peaceful victory, by conquering themselves.

This World-association, simple, single, and unswerving, in motive and design, invites all to list under the radiant banner of temperance—urgent, and ever accumulating, it holds an onward course, without arbitrary aids from privilege, wealth, or law; and will, at last, (like the agitation for abolishing the Slave-trade) leaven all ranks and degrees, with its philanthropic purpose, until civilized man shall for ever banish from the table that poison, which has destroyed more souls and bodies, than Ambition, Pestilence, and the Sword.

The Balance.

"WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING."

OBJECTION V.

"TEETOTALISM IS DIRECTLY OPPOSED TO THE SOCIAL FEELINGS OF MAN'S NATURE."

Among a certain class of individuals, no objection is so common as the one at the head of this article.

The condemnation of such persons is high praise; for, on interrogation, it will generally be found, that, in their estimation, "pleasure" means mere animal gratification, and "social feelings," are synonymous with the baser passions of man's nature.

Prove that there is in the intoxicating draught one atom of pure enjoyment—that enjoyment which most resembles the bliss of heaven; prove that alcohol has ever kindled the fire of love in one cold heart—ever civilized one savage,—ever made parents more affectionate, and children more dutiful, philanthropists more benevolent, and Christians more Christ-like; prove these things, and then, but not till then, will the argument avail.

The history of the world mournfully attests the contrary. The records of all ages and nations have unfolded the fact, that strong drink has hardened the heart, dried up the streams of natural affection, rendered parents callous and children in-grates, soured the temper of the most amiable, and by blighting the intellectual faculties and moral feelings, has made men incapable of experiencing the highest and holiest of all earthly pleasures.

Teetotalism opposed to true sociality! Absurd. It has, indeed, purified the mind, and caused many to forsake the haunts of folly and profanity, where they indulged in the PLEASURES OF SIN; but we repudiate the assumption, that it has lessened the sum total of any individual's happiness. Howard's actions were not less philanthropic because he was abstemious in his habits; neither was the kindness and morality of one of Byron's works increased, because it was written under the influence of gin-and-water! We may reasonably pronounce it almost impossible, that the generous emotions of the soul can flow from an intoxicated brain; some few straggling benevolent intentions may, indeed, chance to escape; but, tainted by the insanity of the mind, they resemble more the dreams of the harmless idiot, than the emanations of an immortal spirit!

The error probably arises from the fact, that good-tempered persons are often the most easily led into dissipation, and the good temper exhibited by them, instead of being laid to the credit of their mental constitution, is falsely attributed to their indulgence in strong drink.

In our next number, we shall weigh the sixth objection,—“It is a species of self-denial not required by society, and not demanded by the word of God.”

Hops, Malt, Brewers, and Victuallers.

A Parliamentary return lately issued, gives the following particulars on Hops, Malt, Brewers, and Victuallers.

HOPS.

In 1845, there were, in Great Britain, 48,058, 1-16 acres under cultivation; and the duty paid was £288,526 0s. 7½d.

MALT.

Total quantity of Malt, made in the United Kingdom, in 1845, was 4,687,487 quarters, of which 3,336,065 were used by Brewers and Victuallers, and 413,059 by retail Brewers.

BREWERS.

In England, there are 2,324 Brewers; in Scotland, 198; in Ireland, 115—Total 2,637.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS.

In England, there are 58,055; in Scotland, 15,846; in Ireland, 13,474—Total, 87,375. In England, there are 32,554 persons licensed to sell beer to be drunk on the premises; and 3,769 persons licensed to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises. There are 16,580 Victuallers who brew their own beer, and 13,372 who are beer retailers.

THE WATER CURE.

TO THE EDITORS.

Sirs,—Nothing could have happened more opportunely to assist the medical question, as it is called, connected with the great temperance movement in England, than the late introduction into this country, of the German mode of treating disease, by new but very simple applications to the human body, either internally or externally, of WATER, at various temperatures.

That some persons are born with a constitution and temperament below par, by which I mean below the standard of active good health, is obvious to all; and that such persons are better for the occasional use of some stimulant no reasonable person should deny; but then comes the all-important question—What stimulant is the best to use under such circumstances? I have no hesitation, from a very extensive experience, in answering—WATER; and having obtained your kind permission to occupy a small space monthly in your valuable periodical with this subject, I propose, from time to time, under the signature of AQUA PURA, to show the great mistake our medical advisers make in recommending alcoholic stimulants, to persons circumstanced as before mentioned, instead of the much more natural and effective stimulant WATER; and I shall thus hope to do something towards settling the long impending doubts on the medical question of temperance, which estranges so many good men from our ranks, on the plea that their medical advisers pronounce their constitutions to be such as require to be stimulated by artificial means.

CHEAP PUBLICATIONS.

Sirs,—We cannot but rejoice in the efforts which are making to supply the poor, and especially our Reading Societies, Mechanics' Institutions, Parochial and Sunday School Libraries, and the Libraries and Reading Rooms of our Temperance Halls, with cheap publications, in which amusement and instruction are combined. Allow me to call the public attention to Nelson's British Library, which promises to be one of the most valuable list of publications the press has issued.

The following extract from the Prospectus will give some idea of the principles on which the tracts will be written.

“Strictly religious and party periodicals have long abounded, and strictly literary ones, that studiously avoid all acknowledgment of the fundamental principles of the Christian faith are no less common. But ample room yet remains for one, which, while it acknowledges the religion of the Bible, as the highest embodiment of truth, shall fearlessly range under its guidance, through all the abundant stores of knowledge for the amusement of the people. To supply this want is the object of the proposed series.”

If succeeding numbers should be like the one before me, a Library will be formed of “Tracts for the people,” of INESTIMABLE value.

Yours faithfully,

B. R.

THE UNIVERSITIES.

We have received a letter from a highly-respected correspondent, who is a clergyman and a teetotaler, assuring us, from his own personal knowledge of Oxford and Cambridge, that the remarks we copied into our last number from the Westminster Review, are totally inapplicable to the present state of those Universities. We are happy to learn, from so respectable an authority, that the industry and sobriety, now excited by the public examinations, are such as few persons conceive, who cannot, as our correspondent does, recollect the state of the Universities, when public examinations were unknown, and when the obtaining a degree, was such a mere farce, that it left the time of the young men at their own disposal, whereby habits of indolence were acquired, which alone were sufficient to make them the easy prey of every temptation to sin.

TEMPERANCE IN NORTH WALES.

We have received an interesting letter from Mr. David Williams of Dinorwie, near Carnarvon, North Wales, who styles himself a constant reader of our 'worthy periodical.'

Mr. Williams informs us, that the epistle with which he has favoured us, is the first he has ever written in the English language; and in return for this compliment, we think it only right to give our extract verbatim.

"In this neighborhood called Dinorwie there are a large Quarry slates, and are about 1700 men working every day; and I am glad to tell you, and my tectotalls brethren through the kingdom and the world, that a one-third of them are teetotalers. Every Clarkes and Agents belonging to this great work are a strong, teetotalers. The last night [April 9] I be in a public Temperance meeting at a Calvinistic chapel called Dinorwie, where are a many hundreds of people present. The meeting was carried on by Mr. Evan Thomas of Clwtybout, Rev. Mr. Thomas Edwards, Ebenezer, and the Rev. Ellis Foulkes, Cefn-y-waen. About a ten years ago, in a two village near this work, there was eleven public houses, but now not more than five; and in Carnarvon at the same time about 120 public house, but now not more than 80.

"What great work did the temperance movement mak in this vicinities, where are a scores of families been at once through the effect of a strong drinks not have enough of a daily bread, and her children cary a starving life, but now in a well dressed suite, and in everything comfortable to come to the Sabath schools, and to hear the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ."

RAGGED SCHOOL.

*Ragged School,
Lamb Court, Clerkenwell Green,
5th April, 1846.*

GENTLEMEN,—I shall not occupy many lines of your valuable pages, but feel truly desirous of impressing the minds of your numerous juvenile readers, with the importance of endeavouring to communicate knowledge to others, and although not perhaps, you would say, strictly within your province, yet you will agree with me, that the connexion between the progress of Total Abstinence, and the spread of general knowledge is far from a slight one. If the pot is taken away from the drunkard, a book should be given him instead: in short, he should be taught to read; and thus furnished with a silent companion who will entertain him with pleasant conversation and never beguile him to the public house. We are intending here to form an adult school to teach reading and writing gratuitously on Monday evenings, from 8 to 10, if a supply of teachers can be obtained. Parties of christian sentiment willing to become instructors will be good enough to address a line, pre-paid, to Mr. J. H. Petch, honorary secretary, or Mr. R.

W. Vanderkiste, London city missionary, or Mr. Williamson, temperance missionary, at the school.—I am, Gentlemen, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

R. W. VANDERKISTE.

Old clothing, and boots or shoes of any description, for the use of the poor, will be thankfully received at the school, addressed as above.

Imperial Parliament.

(Wednesday, March 26th.)

The Scotland Turnpike Road's Bill went through committee.

The Hon. Fox MAULE proposed that no toll-bar house should be licensed for the sale of spirits, if within five miles of a house on the turnpike road, regularly licensed for that purpose by the magistrates.

After a long conversation the committee divided, and the numbers were—

For the proposition	19
Against it	17
Majority	2

The question was then put, that the clause do stand part of the bill. The committee divided—

For the clause	17
Against it	19

And so the committee most cavalierly overthrew its former resolution!

Mr. Fox MAULE stated his intention to withdraw the bill. He had done what he could to remove the stigma which attached to making toll-gates public-houses. After this, if any accident occurred in consequence of drunkenness at these places the government would be responsible—(No! No! Order! Order!)

[The following select committee has since been named by Mr. Forbes Mackenzie, to inquire into the subject: The Lord Advocate, Mr. Fox Maule, Mr. H. Drummond, Mr. Cripps, Lord Dalmeny, Mr. Forbes, Mr. Bannerman, Mr. F. Scott, Mr. Duncan, Sir John Hope, Mr. P. Scrope, Mr. Stuart Wortley, Mr. R. Hodgson, Viscount Duncan, and Mr. Forbes Mackenzie.]

BRITISH GUIANA.

[From the Guiana Congregational Record.]

A pretty fair idea of the state of the temperance question in the legislature of British Guiana, (consisting of only ten persons, including the governor and government secretary, the chief justice, attorney-general, and collector of customs,) may be gathered from a recent sitting, as reported in the Royal Gazette as follows:

"A report from the High Sheriff was read. With reference to the petitions of two Portuguese for two Spirit Licenses, one for the village at Hyde Park, the other for the village at La Retraite, the Sheriff did not consider either of those villages sufficiently populous to have a second license. Mr. Cral did not see why this money should be lost to the revenue; it would be 300 dollars lost. Mr. Stuart—three times 300 dollars. Government Secretary—Would you to save such a sum as that, overlook the demoralizing effect of multiplying grog-shops? Mr. Stuart—Do you think that there will be one person less to drink spirits, or that any one person will drink less spirits, if there is only one shop in the place of three?" "It was ordered, by a majority of the court, that the licenses applied for could not be at present issued."

The said majority we observe to have been occasioned by the government section, who, since the colonial secretary's circular for discountenancing inebriety, have usually taken the sober side of the question.

JERSEY.

It is gratifying to state, the new year has commenced favourable to the temperance cause, in this wine and spirit drinking island; three meetings more have been opened, making four per week, with every prospect of others being shortly commenced. The number of signatures to the pledge, since January 1st, has been 147, being nearly double the number obtained in the same period of last year—probably owing, in some measure, to the awful fact, that three murders have been committed in the short space of three months, besides murderous attacks in this island, strong drink being more or less connected with them; beneficial results have followed the distribution of tracts and papers on the principles amongst the soldiers of the depot stationed here, 14 having joined the society in one week. I consider societies cannot do better than circulate freely those silent, but powerful advocates.

Dr. Grindrod is engaged to deliver a course of lectures here in May.

THOMAS A. SMITH, Secretary.

IRELAND.

The annual procession of the CORK Temperance Societies took place on Easter Monday, the 13th ult., and was a very splendid demonstration.

We make a few extracts from the Cork Examiner. "Nobly have the people stood the test this day, and at this peculiar and most inauspicious season; they have proved by their numbers, their enthusiasm, and their consistency, that the holy cause is stronger than ever. Many an ardent prayer had been offered up, that the day might be fine "for Father Mathew." It would seem as if these prayers had been heard. At eleven o'clock, the Cornmarket was densely crowded over, with many thousands of men, women, and children, dressed in their best, and looking radiant with happiness. About half-past eleven o'clock, Father Mathew arrived on the ground, and was hailed by a glorious burst of cheering, from 50,000 to 60,000 people. The effect of the forest of wands, with silk streamers, the bright colours of the dresses of the women, the uniform of some of the bands, and the hundreds of gay flags, was beautiful in the extreme, as the sun shone forth with all the brightness and warmth of Midsummer."

The mayor, in his official robes, was present in the procession. After describing the order and route of the procession, the Examiner continues—"It is needless to tell how Father Mathew was received, as he walked through the city; how the windows were crowded, how the people cheered, how all hats were taken off, as he appeared. The vessels in the river were decorated with their choicest flags; and the tri-colour flag floated from the roof of the house of the French Consul. The whole passed off without an accident."

SCOTLAND.

OPENING OF THE YORK HOTEL, EDINBURGH.

The crowded state of our columns last month, prevented us from giving any account of the circumstances attending the re-opening of the York Hotel, by Mr. Balcarras, on strictly temperance principles. As we are, therefore, a month behind our contemporaries, our notice must be brief. An elegant and substantial entertainment was provided; but all intoxicating liquors were excluded. About 40 gentlemen attended. W. M. Chambers, Esq., ably presided; and was supported on the right by Rev. Dr. Lee, James Simpson, Esq., Bailie Gray, Frederick Hill, Esq., Inspector of Prisons; and on the left, by Bailie Mack, Professor More, Dr. Glover, &c. Archibald Thomson, Esq., acted as croupier, and was supported on the left, by John Dunlop, Esq. of Brockcloth, &c.

Letters of apology were read from Drs. Alison, Gregory, Greville, &c., expressing the warmest approbation of the object of the meeting.

The following sentiments were given:—

"The Queen and the Royal Family;" "The spread of Temperance and success to Mr. Balcarras' Establishment;" "The health of Mr. Simpson and the Sanitary Improvement of the Working Classes;" "Bailie Mack," in connexion with the Reformation of Juvenile Offenders;" "The Press," associated with the name of Mr. Chambers; "The Magistrates and Town Council," associated with the name of Bailie Gray; "More Water and less Whiskey;" "Rowland Hill and the Penny Postage System;" and "Frederick Hill, Esq., the Inspector of Prisons."

The company broke up about ten o'clock, highly gratified with the success of their experiment, and hoping that this first Temperance Dinner, may prove the forerunner of a happy change in the usual mode of conducting public entertainments.

ENGLAND.

EXETER HALL.—A temperance meeting was held in Exeter Hall, on Wednesday, April 22nd. Danl. O'Connell, Esq., M.P. presided. The speakers on the occasion were Messrs. Whittaker, Grosjean, Wrigley, T. A. Smith, and Teare, and Dr. Oxley. This meeting was convened by Dr. Oxley, for the purpose of raising funds to wipe off the remainder of the debt left unpaid by the late Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, and for which Dr. Oxley made himself responsible. We sincerely trust the London teetotalers, and others formerly connected with that society, will see the justice of contributing their share of the amount still unpaid.

THE PARISH OF POPLAR.—Mr. John Burt of Poplar, has sent us the following interesting paper. "In the parish of Poplar, consisting according to the last census, of a population of 22,300 persons, there are 20 butchers, 22 bakers, 101 houses licensed to sell intoxicating drinks, and above 800 drunkards! There are five public-houses together, forming one row. There are more than 5,000 workmen employed at the different yards and factories, the majority of whom are receiving good wages—from 25s. to 45s. per week; and yet the distress apparent in the families of these men is painful to observe.

About seven years ago, I adopted the total abstinence principle; we have now a society of 300 adults, with 30 reclaimed drunkards. We have recently obtained the Primitive Methodist chapel at £4 per annum, and hold our meetings every Tuesday evening. Already we have taken about 35 pledges, and some of them from men of the most depraved habits.

We have not a single minister in the parish favourable to the cause."

SEVEN DIALS.—The anniversary of the Seven Dials Temperance Society was held on Easter Monday in the hall, King-street. A tea festival was held, at which 200 attended; after which there was a public meeting, presided over by John Dunlop, Esq. The speakers were, Mr. Salway, two reformed men, and Mr. James Balfour, the missionary of the district. Several signatures were obtained. The first annual report was read, from which we make the following extract, bearing upon the metropolitan mission: "Your committee have, during the past year, held in this hall more than 100 meetings, which have been remarkably well attended, sometimes to excess. And it is evident, that the labours of the committee and advocates, with the great assistance of the missionary of the district, have not been in vain, from the fact, that upwards of 900 signatures have been obtained to the pledge of total abstinence."

ALDROROUGH.—We held our annual meeting on Friday last, which was well attended. The speakers were, Mr. James Larner, Mr. John Mann, and M. W. Crawford. Great attention was manifested, and the addresses were of a first-rate character, faithful, serious, and plain. I have no doubt that great good was effected.

Our society begins to rise again—we have some of the best of our town's people reading and thinking upon the temperance question. The Ipswich tracts have done good; I have sent parcels of them to some of the most respectable inhabitants, with short notes, requesting them to give their attention to the subject. In one case, I am happy to say, I have been successful in gaining a whole family to the cause, who, I hope, will be of great assistance to us. There is a great movement going on here among the Benefit Societies, the members of which are getting very dissatisfied at the amount of money they are compelled to spend in drink. In some cases they have resolved to spend less, and in others, they are asking each other whether their meetings could not be held away from the public-houses; so that we have not laboured in vain if we have only accomplished this.

Most of our reformed drunkards stand well, and those who are gone back are none the better for it.

JOHN MATTHEWS.

BATH.—Bath Female Juvenile Temperance Society. This society was established in July, 1845, for the purpose of training up Juveniles of the female sex, in the principles and practice of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The society is conducted by a committee of adult females, whose exertions have been greatly blessed.

The society numbers nearly 200 members, and the female Sunday School Teachers of the city, are beginning to take an interest in the matter.

The committee have been actively engaged in procuring signatures to the memorial to the Queen, praying for the abolition of the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Lord's day. Nearly 2500 females of the city have signed the memorial, which has been forwarded to York for presentation.

MARGATE.—We are glad to learn, that the temperance society in this town, has been re-established.

On the 20th of March, a lecture was delivered by the Rev. W. Rogers, before a crowded meeting, at Foot's Bathing Rooms. Rev. W. Morton, late Missionary to India, presided, and ten signatures were obtained.

On the 6th of April, a lecture was delivered by the Rev. W. Morton, in the above rooms; two persons signed the pledge.

WOODBRIDGE.—On Wednesday evening, the 18th of February, the friends of true temperance were highly gratified and interested, by an impressive address, in the Temperance Lecture Room, Quay-lane, by Mr. M. W. Crawford, Agent of the Suffolk Temperance Union; at the close of the lecture, several signatures were obtained. On the 11th of March, Mr. Crawford visited Woodbridge again, but the meeting not having been announced in time, the attendance was less numerous than usual; nevertheless, three signatures to the pledge were obtained at the close. Our meetings are, in general, better attended than formerly, and a spirit of inquiry is excited in the public mind, which augurs well for the future.

PHILIP PIZEY.

St. Ives, Huntingdonshire.—The first meeting of a public social character to advocate the principles of teetotalism, was held on "Good Friday," in the Girls' British School-room, about 80 persons partook of tea and the usual eatables. Several ministers and local preachers were present on this interesting occasion. Some of these, with other respectable townsmen who rarely attend teetotal meetings, were of the number, evincing their desire to countenance an object calculated to improve the condition of their neighbours. A public meeting for further advocating the cause was held after tea, when J. Harcourt, Independent minister of Houghton, was called to the chair, who, after a suitable address, called on B. Brown, and Messrs. Wallington, Collins, Botterell, and Davis, Baptist ministers; the last minister, after several previous trials, declared his firm attachment to the cause, and signed the pledge openly for the first time. The Chairman, in closing the meeting, adverted to this circumstance with delight, and recommended his hearers to follow their minister's example.

IMPORTANT TESTIMONY.

Speaking of his march from Arcot to Poona-mallee, a teetotal soldier says:—

"I was exposed to the heat of the day, having to accompany the commissariat stores, which moved off at two p. m. each day. I had no tent to shelter me from the winds or dews of night, sleeping under a tree, or the verandah of a choultry; yet, I thank God, I was enabled to resist the temptation of the bottle, and arrived here with my family in good health and spirits."—South India Journal.

RAILWAY LABOURERS.

Public attention is at present earnestly directed to the horribly demoralized condition of the labourers employed in the construction of our railroads. The press is daily laying bare scenes, the most appalling, disgraceful to our national morality and religion. It is an established fact, that there exists in the very centre of civilization, and within a short distance from our dwellings, a class of persons, inheriting the name of Britons, who are virtually as far removed from humanizing and christianizing tendencies as the most ignorant and savage subjects of the Russian Czar, and not one whit superior in intelligence and spirituality of mind, to the wild Bushmen of Southern Africa, who are characterized by an eminent missionary writer, as the "most degraded and despised of all the sons of Ham." And, as usual, the degradation of our railway labourers is connected with strong drink! Strong drink is in their case both a cause and an effect. They drink because they are demoralized, and they are more demoralized still, because they drink.

To ameliorate the condition of these men, some recommend legislative interference; and no doubt judicious legislation would do good. But what permanent effect for the better can be produced, so long as the love of strong drink continues to rule? To suppress this craving for alcoholic stimulants, is therefore an indispensable step towards the moral renovation of the class of men referred to; and, impressed with these views, the Committee of the NATIONAL SOCIETY are now in communication with the Directors of some of the most influential Railway Companies, on the subject of employing Temperance Missionaries to labour amongst the men. We cannot but hope, that the fearful revelations which have been made, and are still making, will induce the gentlemen who preside over these national undertakings, to give their warm approbation and support to measures, which cannot fail to elevate and bless many of those whose Herculean strength and iron frames are wasting by dissipation, and from whose breasts, nearly every tender and ennobling feeling has been obliterated by the raging and devouring fires of alcohol.

PARLIAMENT

has again met, after the Easter recess, and, therefore, the time has arrived for sending up, without delay, the petitions against the SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.

The petitions should be forwarded—not, as some have been, to us—but to the following prelates and noblemen who have consented to present them to the House of Lords; and to the following gentlemen who have engaged to lay them before the House of Commons.

TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lambeth.
The Lord Bishop of London, St. James's-square.

" " Norwich, 38, Lower Brook-street.

" " Ripon, House of Lords.

" " St. David's, 40, St. James's-place.

Right Hon. Earl Fitzwilliam, Halkin-street, Grosvenor-place.

" Lord Cottenham, Wimbledon-common.

" Lord Campbell, Knightsbridge.

TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Viscount Ebrington, 42, Grosvenor-square.

ADDRESS OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY.

The friend, whose liberal offer we published in the last No. of the CHRONICLE, has requested us to state, that the time allowed for applications and remittances is extended from the 1st to the 15th of May.

LONDON AGENT.

The Committee have resolved to engage one or more approved Advocates to lecture in London and its vicinity; and are now open to applications with testimonials, from qualified persons.

MR. JABEZ INWARDS has been engaged as a Visiting Agent to this Society, for Bedfordshire. He will also be at liberty to lecture in London on Friday and Saturday evenings. Applications to be made to the Office.

World's Convention.

Communications are received by almost every post, referring to the coming Convention. The friends of the cause, both at home and abroad, are bestirring themselves with increasing vigour, and everything promises a glorious assemblage. The event being now placed beyond doubt, it behoves those entrusted with the arrangements, to take time by the forelock, and to be fully prepared to make the most of the occasion. It is obvious, that the advantages to result from the Convention will depend, in a great measure, upon the extent of its operations, and more especially upon the amount of moral suasion it may bring to bear upon the public mind. Public meetings and the Press will be the two great means by which the Convention must seek to carry its object. Meetings should be held every evening in different parts of London, and reports of meetings and appeals to the public; and, above all, well-arranged and authenticated facts should be published in all the newspapers and magazines in the United Kingdom. Such a comprehensive mode of action could not fail to produce an immense effect upon the public mind. People who have never before thought of the subject will be compelled to think, and to act.

But it is equally plain, that no effort of this kind can be made without the needful pecuniary supplies. The newspapers will not give full reports without some compensation. Thousands of copies would have to be paid for, and sent to as many influential individuals. Hundreds of advertisements should be inserted announcing meetings and proclaiming facts. In short, there need be no fear of raising too much; but it is high time to take steps to prevent having too little. We, therefore, now call upon every society in the United Kingdom, and every individual temperance man, to send up his contribution,—be it a shilling, or a thousand pounds in aid of the WORLD'S CONVENTION.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE IS ENGAGED FOR A GRAND MEETING ON THE 7th AUGUST!

The subjoined letters exhibit the importance attached to the coming Convention by our friends in different parts of the world.

We would direct especial attention to the letter of Archdeacon Jeffreys; it will be read with interest by all the supporters of Christian Missions. May the truths it presents, and the warnings it contains, have their due weight upon the ministers and members of our churches at home!

LETTER FROM THE SOUTH INDIA UNION.

Madras, February, 1846.

SIR,—I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your printed letter, dated 10th November, 1845, and beg to inform you, that we have appointed the Rev. T. D. W. Ward, A.M. (missionary of the American Board returning to America,) a delegate to the World's Convention. He sailed from this port the 1st inst. in the Worcester

I hardly need assure you that we here most heartily approve of the plan and object of holding a Convention, and do hope it will be productive of the greatest good.

The war in the N.W. will, doubtless, divert the attention of the military for some time to come, from our cause.

Our annual meeting, on the 23rd January, was the most important and influential before held. There were thirteen missionaries and three officers present.

The London missionaries are coming to the rescue like men.

I, am, &c.,

R. P. HUNT, Sec.

LETTER FROM THE VEN. ARCHDEACON HENRY JEFFREYS.

Bombay, February 14th, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have received your printed circular, together with your obliging letter, inviting me to attend the Convention, for the purpose of promoting temperance throughout the world, which is to take place next June; and will endeavour, if possible, to arrange my private affairs, so as to leave India by the mail steamer of the 1st of May, which will probably reach Southampton by about the 10th of June.* Whether I shall be able to reach England any sooner by crossing the continent, I cannot say.

I take the most interest in the cause, as 28 years' experience in India, with the regiments and in the hospitals, has convinced me that nothing in the least effectual can be done to arrest intemperance among the British army, or the seamen that frequent this port, or to wipe away the disgrace that is daily brought upon our country and our common Christianity, before the natives of India, except upon this principle.

* It will be seen that the above letter was written prior to the alteration in the time of holding the Convention. Before this is printed, the Archdeacon will have been made aware of the change, and will probably make his arrangements accordingly.

I am persuaded, too, from many years of past experience, that God will not bless the cause of Missions on this side of India with any extensive success, till the Missionaries of the everlasting gospel take up this position.

Even already, from the melancholy instances of the falls of our native converts, solely through drink, that have come to my knowledge, I am certain—and from the very nature of man I can prove—that Hindoos cannot outrage all those principles of “pure temperance,” in which they have been brought up, and wound their “weak conscience” by even TASTING intoxicating drinks, without danger—I should rather say, a certainty—that in a very large proportion of instances, they will become drunkards. And I am certain, that when we have churches of native Christians, there will be found a much larger proportion of drunkards among them, than among an equal number of Hindoos taken indiscriminately from the villages in India; and, consequently, that all the crimes which are the known result of intemperance will abound among them.

On receiving them into the “Christian caste,” if the missionary does not exhort them to continue in the SAME principles of pure temperance in which they have been educated from their youth, and set the same example in his own person; if he once loosens the cord or puts the stumbling-block before their “weak consciences,” by even the SIGHT of intoxicating drinks upon his own table, a flood of intemperance, with all its crimes, will come in upon the infant church, and spread over India; and all our missionary efforts will end (on the whole) in a curse, and not a blessing to this country.

Believe me, dear Sir, yours very sincerely,

HENRY JEFFREYS.
Archdeacon of Bombay.

WEST INDIES.

LETTER FROM THE ST. VINCENT SOCIETY.

St. Vincent, 25th February, 1846.

To the Committee of the National Temperance Society—

We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 10th November, 1845. We warmly coincide with your views of holding a “World’s Temperance Convention,” and we are very sanguine of the advantages which may accrue therefrom. We think it of the highest importance that total abstainers from all parts of the globe should meet, to consult together, and suggest the most effectual method of extending the temperance reformation, and forming a temperance union throughout the world. We expect that the Honourable Hay M’Dowall Grant, the worthy founder of this society, will be in London about the time mentioned for holding the Convention, to represent this society therein, and give every useful information, in connexion with the subject, in this part of the globe. In the meantime, we may mention, that this society has been formed about two years, by the honourable gentleman before mentioned; his preliminary steps were to break down the still upon his own estate, and discontinue the abominable practice prevailing in this country, of giving the labourers quantities of rum in lieu of wages, or to stimulate them to greater exertions. He then announced in Calder Chapel, his earnest wish of forming a total abstinence society, of persons, who, deeply sensible of the evils resulting to their fellow-creatures from indulgence in the use of intoxicating liquors, and desirous, under the divine blessing, of setting them an example of self-denial and temperance, in the hope of inducing them to refrain from habits so injurious to their minds and bodies, would solemnly resolve to abstain totally from the use of all intoxicating liquors, except as a medicine, or when used in religious ordinances; at first, only two or three came forward to subscribe to this pledge; but now through his indefatigable exertions by the blessing of God—we number near two hundred and fifty members. We have general meetings monthly, and local meetings weekly, when we possibly can. We hold the two principal holidays kept here (Sundays excepted), viz., the first day of August, being the anniversary of the abolition of slavery, and Christmas, by a procession and soirée.

We have received a set of beautiful temperance banners and medals from England, the gift of Mr. Grant. We have visitors appointed for each estate, whose duty it is to use their utmost efforts to persuade the people to practise temperance, and to make special investigation when any one is said to have violated his or her pledge, and report the same at the monthly meeting; when, if a violation be fairly proved, they are expelled from the society; but it is customary, when the offenders are penitent, to take their medals and suspend them for a certain period, after which, if they have acted consistently with the rules of the society during that period, their medals are returned and they are continued members.

There is still a great deal of debauchery and immorality in this island; but upon the whole, we think that total abstinence and morality are rapidly advancing hand in hand. One or two other estates have followed the noble example set on the Honourable H. M. Grant’s, and many respectable persons have banished all intoxicating beverages entirely from their dwellings, and are doing their utmost to discountenance and discontinue the pernicious practice abounding in this country, of offering spirits to every one that calls, and drinking in every house they go to. The moral and physical evils resulting from such a practice as this, must be evident to every reflecting mind. Respectable and moral young men come to the West Indies, with a resolution of being always temperate; but alas! with the fallacious notion, that a little spirits is indispensably necessary in a tropical climate; and the very first person they meet, or the very first house they come to, they are sure to be asked and pressed to drink, and, generally with a remark, that ‘a little spirits is necessary in this country.’ A person meets with the same “kindness” (if such a term is compatible with such a practice), and the same pretended motive from almost every person he meets, and in almost every house he goes to; and thus the poor unfortunate individual, imperceptibly, and before he is scarcely aware of it himself, becomes an immoderate drinker, accompanied in most cases by other immoralities, whereby in a short time, he loses his reputation, his situation, and all his prospects of success in this world. Such cases as these are not imaginary, nor are they of rare occurrence. Alas! they are not. We have known many very similar cases occur within the last few years, of young men who mournfully parted from their friends, whom they loved, with a view of securing independence for themselves, and returning to enjoy it with their friends—who have been thus led away, and lost to every principle of virtue and morality—lost to themselves—lost to their friends (who are generally kept ignorant of their case)—lost to the world, and, in many cases, we may not unreasonably infer, lost to all eternity! We are therefore extremely solicitous, that young men coming into this country, be guarded against this perfidious West Indian maxim, that a little spirits is necessary in this hot climate.

We firmly assert to the contrary, fearless of any contradiction; some of us have never tasted spirits since we came here. Since joining this society, none of us have ever felt the want of them—scarcely have any of us required to take spirits as a medicine. We have all of us, without exception, found ourselves in better health, and more able to perform our several duties, however arduous, since becoming total abstainers, than we ever before did.

Ye are at liberty to publish all or any part of this if you think proper.

Signed, on behalf of the committee,

JOHN PARSONS, President.
WM. McTAVISH, Treasurer.
HUGH McDONALD, Secretary.

In our next Number we intend printing a very cheering communication we have received from the Bermuda Temperance Society.

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

J. R. WILSON'S REPORT.

Having completed the visitation of most of the towns on the Tyne and Wear, and seen the adoption of the improved organization in the greater part of them, I resolved to prosecute the temperance mission in the county, through which, eighteen years ago, I commenced and itinerated in the Sunday school cause.

On the 14th of March, I proceeded to Carlisle, and the day following, visited most of the Sunday schools in that city, distributed about 500 temperance tracts, and left about 250 pledges with the superintendents for such children as might wish to take the pledge the following week.

On the 16th, the public meeting was held at the Athenæum, which was numerous and respectably attended; Joseph Ferguson, Esq., an old and valued friend, who formerly assisted me in the Sunday school and Bible cause, presided on the occasion, and avowed himself a convert to the total abstinence principle. After explaining and recommending the improved organization, I was supported by J. D. Carr, an influential member of the Society of Friends, who expressed the grateful sense of the temperance community of the city, for the very opportune visit of the agent, and his conviction that the proposed organization was greatly needed. He is a large biscuit manufacturer, and has nearly one hundred workmen and boys in his employ, every one of whom is a pledged teetotaler. The chairman's thanks for the honour done him in presiding, were conveyed briefly, but very acceptably, in a donation of £5 to the temperance mission!

On the following evening, I met the committee at the Temperance Hotel, when it was resolved to recommend the entire organization to the members of the society, to be convened at the Rechabite Tent, on the evening of the 18th. At the latter meeting, which was numerous attended, the resolutions of the committee would have been carried by a large majority of the most influential and active friends of the cause, who had come prepared to offer their services as tract distributors, but for the opposition of an individual formerly secretary of the society, who has by his extreme views and dogmatical spirit, prejudiced the minds of many who would have come forward in the support of the cause.

At a subsequent meeting of the committee, the organization was fully resolved upon, and a supply of tracts, &c. is to be ordered from the national depot, and a member appointed to correspond with the society. The reception I have met with has been kind in the extreme, and there is but one opinion as to the desirableness and importance of the plans proposed.

The Carlisle Temperance Society has existed since the year 1836, and the numerical register since its commencement reaches nearly 3000, including juveniles; but it is supposed that the present number of all ages does not exceed one thousand. Dr. Grindrod's visit was the means of adding greatly to the members, but chiefly among the young. They have been visited by various itinerant lecturers, on whose advocacy they have chiefly depended for the increase of their members. There are four breweries and 150 houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors; the population at the last census was about 23,000.

PENRITH.

Proceeded thither on the 21st, and the day following addressed the schools on the former part of the day, and the teachers and parents at night, in the Independent chapel, distributing tracts and pledges as usual. The meeting on the 23rd, was numerous and respectable; and at the committee meeting the day following, it was resolved that the society should be reorganized and associated with the National Society; which was confirmed at a subsequent meeting of the society, held in the Friends' meeting house. Here I was happy to meet with an old and tried friend, in the minister of the Independent chapel, whom I met with twelve years ago, at Gainsborough, and who warmly espouses the temperance cause.

The society here has been an active and energetic one; and in the early period of its operations visited the villages in the neighbourhood, the inhabitants of which are nearly all teetotalers. Penrith has been visited with loan tracts, and the penny a week system of contribution has been in operation, by which they have been enabled to employ lecturers and circulate information. There are from 350 to 400 members, including juveniles. There are four breweries and seventy places for the sale of intoxicating liquors! Several of the gentry in the neighbourhood contribute to the funds of the society. The cause was languishing, but a fresh impulse has been given, and the necessary preparations are making to carry out the national organization. Nothing could exceed the kindness of the friends, and many expressions of gratitude were made for the visit of the agent.

In passing through Carlisle, I attended, by invitation, a public meeting held in the Athenæum, for the better observance of the Lord's day, when two rooms were completely filled. I did not fail to say some plain things on the evils resulting from the opening of 150 public houses on the Lord's day.

ASPATRIA.

Passing by railway to Brayton Hall, on the 27th ult., the train came in collision with a ballast train, by which both engines were damaged; no serious injury was sustained. Sir Wilfrid Lawson received me in the kindest manner, and attended with his family at the public meeting held at Aspatria, where, after hearing my address, it was resolved to form an association to embrace nine villages, containing a population of nearly 5000 inhabitants; and a goodly number of persons of both sexes, offered their services as distributors. A large order for tracts, &c., has been procured, and Mr. J. O. Jackson, the president of the temperance society, was appointed corresponding member.

On my leaving, and at my special request, Sir Wilfrid was pleased to allow his name to be added to the vice-presidents of the National Society, and presented me with £5 towards the Mission, in which he feels a lively interest.

COCKERMOUTH.

On Sunday 29th, I addressed the children to the number of 300, at the Wesleyan chapel, and the teachers and parents in the evening, and distributed tracts and pledges; but a large proportion of the children were already joined to the society, the fruits of Dr. Grindrod's labours some time ago. The public meeting held on the 30th, in the British School House, which was crowded; and the society has been revived and reorganized into an association, a corresponding member appointed, and an order for tracts, &c., sent off, a number of respectable persons coming forward as distributors. The society was established in 1837, and its present numbers are nearly 1000, one-third of whom are juveniles; the population about 6000; one extensive brewery, and above 50 places for the sale of intoxicating liquors. My reception was most kind, and my visit very satisfactory.

WORRINGTON.

The children of the Sunday schools, having, at my request, been enjoined to invite their parents to attend the public meeting held on the 2nd ultimo, with the promise of a tract, came at an early hour to the door of the assembly room to claim their reward, and completely filled the seats as soon as the doors were opened. I was obliged, therefore, to give them a short address and dismiss them with the promised reward, to make room for the adults. At this town the cause was languishing, but a fresh impulse, it is hoped, has been given. The society is reorganized into an association in connexion with the National Society, and the necessary steps taken to carry out the organization. At the members' meeting, an old friend to education and other good things, who was formerly in the wine and spirit trade, presided on the occasion, and afterwards gave me a donation to the mission. The population is about 6000; there are two breweries and fifty public houses, and eleven have been closed. Arrangements were made for collecting the requisite means of getting a supply of loan tracts, &c. My reception was kind and satisfactory.

WHITEHAVEN.

On Sunday, 5th April, addressed nearly 1000 children in the Wesleyan chapel, and the like number of teachers and parents in the evening, and distributed tracts, &c., among the former. The Temperance Hall was crowded the day following, and a lively interest manifested. Indeed, the society here has been the most active and successful of the whole county. The system of loan tract distribution is already in operation, and it is to this more than any other cause the progress is to be attributed. There is a numerous Rechabite society, and some of the wealthy and influential inhabitants are zealous supporters of the cause. The population is about 17,000; the number of members including juveniles, is about 2000.

There are two breweries and 140 public houses. The society has affiliated itself to the National Society, and will carry out the whole organization both in the town and the surrounding villages. The reception I have met with has been most kind.

MARYPORT.

Held a meeting at the Baptist chapel, and reorganized the society as an association in connexion with the National Society; and a number of persons of both sexes offered their services as tract distributors; and the following evening, I organized a branch for the town; inhabitants, about 6000. The society, which was formerly active, is in a low state, but it is hoped that the present efforts will be the means of its revival. The reception I met with was kind, and the results are satisfactory.

BRAYTON HALL.

(Good Friday) 10th, attended, by request, the annual meeting of the Rechabite society, at Aspatria, where in the evening the Brayton Association was formed, embracing nine villages, and a branch organized at Aspatria, where the system of tract distribution is to commence, the supply of tracts, &c. having arrived. The minister who preached to the Rechabite society, took part in the business of the evening; the former declaring himself a convert to the temperance principle, by the preparation of his sermon for the occasion. The procession of Rechabites, after walking through the grounds of Brayton Hall, were assembled on the lawn before the house, and were addressed by your agent on the blessings of temperance.

BLANNER HASSET.

Here another branch was formed on Saturday evening the 11th, at which I took part; a sufficient number of persons came forward to distribute the tracts; the village lies about two miles from Brayton Hall. Sir W. Lawson and some of his family attended at all the above meetings, and will give his best support to the society, being most anxious to carry out the organization into the neighbouring villages, and the opening of reading rooms.

On Sunday, 12th, I addressed the children of Aspatria, with their teachers and parents, and distributed tracts, &c., among them. The results of my visits to this quarter have been highly satisfactory, and the cause of temperance has received a fresh impulse, and will, I doubt not, progress and revive, under the fostering care of the devoted family of Brayton Hall, whom I leave with regret, and to whom I shall ever feel much indebted.

WIGTON.

Held a meeting here on the 13th, at the Friends' meeting house, which was well filled. The cause is in a languishing state, but fresh life appears to have been infused, and an association has been formed, and a branch society for the town organized. On the 14th, the members met at the same place, when arrangements were made for obtaining a supply of tracts, &c. The cause of temperance has suffered from the inconsistency of its advocates. The population is about 5000, and the number of places for the sale of intoxicating liquors is thirty, with two breweries.

The young people of the Friends' school in the neighbourhood, attended the meeting, the master being the secretary of the society. Forty have taken the pledge of the society.

The results of the mission have fully equalled my expectations; and I am more than ever impressed with the conviction, that a similar organization is greatly needed in every town and village in the kingdom.

The Districts are visited alternately one week in each month.—SUPERINTENDENT.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

Three important public meetings have recently been held in the metropolis, in connexion with the Temperance Mission. The first, in the Lecture Hall, Milton Street, on Monday, March 30th; the second, on Johnson's Wharf, Abingdon Street, Westminster, on Good Friday; and the third, in the Temperance Hall, Carteret Street.

The following report of the second interesting meeting has been furnished by the missionary of the district.

The SUPERINTENDENT OF THE MISSION presided. He said, that he had addressed temperance meetings, in a variety of places, but never before had the privilege to address one on a coal wharf, and he hoped this was only a beginning, as the adoption of the principle of total abstinence, would tend greatly to benefit both the employer and the employed. For a number of years he (the chairman) had tried to cure the drunkard, but without success, till teetotalism came, and while doing good to others, he had received good. For after nearly ten years' experience, he was now more capable of work, and could endure more fatigue than when he signed the pledge.

MR. MORRIS, a coal porter, believed that such scenes as that before him, showed that teetotalism was beating not only into the hearts of the men, but also into those of the masters. It was objected that he and other advocates were paid. Yes, they were well paid in seeing good resulting from their efforts. Drink was the greatest stumbling-block in the world, to a man's getting on in life. Teetotalism had done him (Mr. Morris) good, and he maintained that good water and good food were the best things for a man to work on. He had substituted nothing for his porter, no ginger beer, and he needed no substitute. There were other men on this waggon* who had reaped benefits also. Men who used to roll on the floor because they had no bed, now rolled on their own carpet. The speaker enumerated the social and national evils caused by intemperance; referred to the emancipation of the coal whippers assisted by the teetotalers, and concluded by saying, that when he was a drunkard, he made no provision for sickness, but that now if he fell sick he should have ample assistance from societies to which he belonged.

MR. CURRY said, that since he had been a teetotaler, God had prospered him, and everything had gone on well; he had risen from being a journeyman to be a master, and employing others.

MR. GAWTHORP, agent of the society, said, if ever he hated strong drink, he did so to-day, (alluding to an interruption caused by two drunken men.) If ever he felt anxious for the welfare of such men it was now. What had drink done for the working classes? It had made slaves and paupers amongst them; had broken wives' hearts, and left their children uneducated. But drink makes criminals as well as paupers. Nine-tenths of crime are caused by drink; by abstinence then, nine-tenths of crime would be prevented. We should endeavour to prevent crime, and therefore should abstain. Howard deserved well for relieving criminals, but teetotalers were doing a more glorious work, by trying to prevent criminals from being made. We seek not only to make men sober, but we seek to elevate their moral character, and to excite a desire for knowledge.

MR. RIPLEY said, he was pleased to see so many assembled on the occasion, the poor drunkard should not be laughed at for he was of the same blood as the teetotaler. What is drink doing? Captain Grove, governor of Millbank Penitentiary had said, that in two years and a half, above 11,000 convicts were sent from that place to the penal settlements; 500 children are committed to the police stations in London, every year, and several thousand prostitutes perambulate the streets of London. Mr. R. concluded by exhibiting some prints illustrating the sad effects of drinking.

MR. HUDSON, agent for the society, would state some reasons for abandoning the use of strong drinks. In adducing these, Mr. H. related some interesting facts, and employed apt and ingenious illustrations. It was no wonder we had been misled on the subject of the nutriment in strong drink; for some of the most learned men, and most eloquent orators, had contributed by the promulgation of these erroneous opinions, but the hardest working men begin to find they do not derive their strength from drink, but from good, wholesome, nourishing food.

MR. MORSE, a Tailor, had been as low as any person present, but teetotalism had raised him; when a drunkard, was without a bed, a sixpence, or anything by which to get one, now he was well clad, and rented a house at £60 per annum. He was most anxious now to do all he could to promote the cause that had done so much for him. Mr. M. concluded, by relating several affecting cases of intemperance and consequent suicide.

A vote of thanks was moved by MR. COLLINS, missionary of the district, and seconded by MR. WARREN, missionary, to MR. JOHNSON, for his kindness in lending the wharf for the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN, in concluding the meeting, said he had been engaged for many years in works of benevolence, but had seen more good result from teetotalism, than from all other societies put together.

BENEFIT FROM THE METROPOLITAN MISSION.

The following extract, interesting from the spirit it evinces, is taken from a letter addressed to Mr. James Balfour, the missionary, who procured the admission of the writer into the Refuge for the Destitute. There are, we learn, 30 teetotalers in that establishment.

"I have been here seventeen months, and there are nearly twenty young women, before it will come to my turn to obtain a situation. I think by this time, I should be able to assist my parents in some way, for their kindness to me since I have been here. I thought, perhaps, you would not think me rude if I were to ask you if you could recommend me to any person as a servant. I should feel grateful to you for the most menial situation, and I would do my utmost endeavours to keep it. I am happy to say that I am a teetotaler. I signed one day when a lady, Miss Sturges came to read to us. I am, &c.,

"ELIZABETH WARNER."

SUFFOLK TEMPERANCE UNION.

The progress of the cause in this county, is still encouraging.

A large meeting was addressed by M. W. Crawford, at Lowestoft, on the 27th ult., attended by a considerable number of the respectable inhabitants, ascribable to the influence of R. D. Alexander and his family, who, during a stay of three weeks, diffused a great number of tracts. One lady obtained 385 signatures to the memorials to the Queen, leaving a tract at every house she visited.

Sheets of signatures to the memorial have been forwarded to York, from Ipswich, containing 1502 signatures, from Woodbridge, 84; from Harwich, 354; and from Lowestoft, 636.

Petitions to both Houses of Parliament are about to be presented from Ipswich, Lowestoft, Harwich, and probably, other places in the Union.

On the 13th inst., an encouraging meeting was held at Needham Market, in the Friends' Meeting House. The steady and unremitting attention of but two or three influential individuals in this place, has kept the cause alive, and it is to be hoped, that their efforts will not be unrewarded by future prosperity.

On the 14th, a tea-party and public meeting was held at Hadleigh, George Alexander of Ipswich, in the chair. The meeting was addressed by M. W. Crawford and a number of friends from Ipswich, and a good feeling appeared to prevail.

Agents' Reports.

W. BISCOMBE.—KEIGHLEY AND SETTLE UNION.

Since my last report, a series of interesting and very successful meetings have been held in the principal towns of the Union, and their auxiliaries or branch societies, many of which are in a flourishing condition. Several new societies have been formed, and are doing well.

I have recently visited Little Ingleton, and Kirby Lonsdale. In the meeting at Ingleton, we had but thirty persons, and ten of them signed the pledge. On Good Friday, the Rechabites Adults and Juveniles, in Settle, had their festival; their number of adults is 65, and about the same number of juveniles. They had a procession and tea-meeting, and an over-flowing meeting in the National School Room, at night; at the close, several signed the pledge. On the same day, the friends in Skipton, held their anniversary meeting, commencing their services by a sermon in the Primitive Methodist Chapel. Tea in the Wesleyan School, at which upwards of 500 attended, and public meeting in the same place in the evening.

The society here is in a flourishing condition. My engagement will close on the 15th of May, and I am rejoiced to think, I shall be able to leave them much better than I found them.

Reviews.

RESULTS OF HYDROPATHY; OR, CONSTIPATION NOT A DISEASE OF THE BOWELS; INDIGESTION NOT A DISEASE OF THE STOMACH, &c., with cases cured at Stanstead Bury House. By E. JOHNSON, M.D. London: Simpkin and Co. Ipswich: J. M. Barton.

Dr. Edward Johnson is well known to the public as an original, a bold, and a clever writer, by his former works—Life, Health and Disease; Philosophic Nuts; Theory and Principles of Hydropathy, &c. No one will doubt his originality or his boldness, after reading his present production.

The first chapter is occupied with observations on Hydropathy in general, and by the narration of 19 cases of cure treated by the author himself; the second chapter has respect to the cause and cure of Constipation and Indigestion; and the third chapter is devoted to an examination of the superiority of the Hydropathic over the drug system with other miscellaneous matter.

The second chapter is, undoubtedly, the most important part of the book; containing a full exposition and defence of the startling proposition, that Constipation is not a disease of the bowels, and Indigestion is not a disease of the stomach, but diseases of the brain. It would ill become us as non-medical writers, to dogmatize on a question with regard to which, there will be among professional men, much diversity of opinion. We should not, however, be doing justice to Dr. Johnson, were we not to express our own strong convictions of the truth of his hypothesis.

The style of the work is clear and vigorous; if anything it is too racy—and at times runs into too colloquial a strain. But these faults, if they are such, will only tend to make the book more popular. An ample apology is rendered in the preface for all defects of composition. "It has been written by snatches, at odd intervals, those cheese parings of time, and in the midst of numerous and very varied calls upon my attention."

We shall finish our brief critique, by giving a few extracts, simply adding, that as we have derived much pleasure and instruction from its perusal ourselves, we earnestly recommend all our readers to purchase it at their earliest opportunity.

WHAT DISEASES HYDROPATHY CAN CURE.

"My own opinion, founded not upon any speculative views, but solely on what I have observed of the effects, and upon a multitude of corroborative little facts which are every now and then disclosing themselves—my own opinion is, I say, that it is capable of curing all that class of diseased conditions (and it is a very large one) in which the one thing needful, is to restore the secretions and give power to the system—all that class of diseases depending on nervous debility and irritability, arising from an over-excited or over-tasked brain—all disorders depending upon an impure condition of the blood—all diseases depending upon congestion of blood—all functional diseases not depending upon disorganization or mechanical local irritation—all local diseases, which are kept up by a want of sufficient power in the general system, to heal or restore the healthy functions of the part."—pp. 108, 109.

THE CAUSE OF INDIGESTION.

"We look into the stomach itself, for the cause of indigestion, and we cannot find it. We look abroad, and we perceive, in the habits of almost all dyspeptics, a vast amount of moral excitement. We observe a number of strong impressions being daily inflicted upon the organ of thought, and perpetually reiterated from childhood upwards—impressions which are fully capable of overstimulating, i. e. unhealthily exciting and irritating the brain. We then look into the brain itself, and there we perceive, arising from this heated, reddened, and throbbing organ, a certain nerve stretching into the stomach, for the purpose of conveying certain impressions, which are to enable that stomach to perform certain functions. And we cannot help perceiving, that the impressions conveyed along this nerve, must partake of the disturbance which agitates the troubled fountain out of which it issues. And we thus at once become acquainted with a set of causes fully sufficient to account for all the disordered sensations and secretions of the stomach and bowels, which go under the general name of indigestion."—pp. 158, 159.

THE CURE OF CONSTIPATION AND INDIGESTION.

"Since in these diseases, the error lies neither in the stomach nor bowels, it is quite clear that it is in vain to hope to cure them by remedies addressed to these organs. Stomachics, cordials, bitter infusions, mineral acids, alkalis, prussic acid, chalybeates—all these may be poured into the stomach by pailful (as they daily are)—one might just as well apply a blister to the little toe for a sore on the little finger, and expect to cure it, as to hope to cure indigestion and constipation, by these drugs. In the case of mercurials and aperient medicines, it is still worse. For these not only do no good, but actually inflict great injury upon organs which were previously (in themselves) perfectly sound and healthy, besides literally increasing the disorders they were meant to remedy. The error lies in the nervous system—in an irritated, morbidly sensible, exhausted, and feverish condition of the nervous system, and nothing can cure these diseases, but a remedy which is capable of soothing, cooling, strengthening, and hardening this system. And I am as convinced and certain, as it is possible to be, concerning any mere hum affairs, that no remedy under the sun, can cure these disorders, except the Hydropathic treatment. And every year I live, and the more I see of this method of treating these diseases, the more assured do I become of its inestimable value."—pp. 180, 181.

THE WET SHEET; OR, A FEW WORDS ON THE WATER CURE. By W. F. PRENSHAW, Esq., Surgeon. Author of Physiology Simplified, and Director of the Hydropathic Institution, Jersey. R. Gossett, 20, Queen Street. An interesting pamphlet of 60 pages, detailing the writer's experience of various parts of the cold water treatment, during his visit to several Hydropathic Establishments.

THE WESLEYAN CENTENARY HALL SPIRIT VAULTS EXPOSED, and the Principles of John Wesley defended, against the practical opposition of the Methodist Conference Missionary and Committee. With an Engraving of the Centenary Hall and Spirit Vaults. By JAMES BUCKLE. W. Brittain, Paternoster Row; J. H. Starie, High Holborn; J. H. Woodley, Aldermanbury Postern.

Most of our readers have, doubtless, heard of the wag who, passing through Bristol, and seeing the cellars of a chapel devoted to the reception of wine and other liquors, wrote these lines on a conspicuous part of the building:—

"There's a spirit above, 'n' a spirit below;
The spirit of love—the spirit of woe:—
The spirit above, is the spirit divine—
The spirit below, is the spirit of wine!"

This jeu d'esprit may not be inappropriately applied to the Wesleyan Centenary Hall; and strange as it may appear, we believe it is a fact, that while the upper portions of that edifice are occupied by the secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, whose business is to promote to the utmost of their power, the diffusion of Christianity, the lower apartments are rented by "a respectable wine-merchant," who makes it his business to sell as much of that liquor as he can, and so throw a great stumbling-block in the way of the Missionary enterprise.

Mr. Buckle's pamphlet exposes, in unmeasured terms, this gross inconsistency; and although its appearance has been far from cheerfully greeted by the members of the Missionary Committee, yet we feel sufficient confidence in the good sense and Christian feeling of many of those gentlemen, to enable us to believe, that at no very distant time, they will confess their error by removing the "cause of offence," and thus tacitly thank Mr. Buckle for his praiseworthy endeavours to draw public attention to their acknowledged dereliction from the principles of Mr. Wesley.

AMY OF THE PEAK; OR, THE TRIUMPH OF PRINCIPLE. A Tale of Derbyshire, London: C. Gilpin, 5, Bishopsgate-street Without. Leeds: Truth-seeker office.

We have been much pleased by the perusal of this little poem; the design and execution of which, do honour to the intellect and heart of the writer. The tale is one of country life. A Young 'Derby mountaineer' pays his court to a fair maiden, Amy, (the heroine of the story) who is possessed of a large—we shall not say, unusual—share of good sense and moral courage. She refuses, in fact, to wed, unless Alan will sign the pledge of abstinence from all strong drinks; and the poem is extensively occupied with reasonings on the subject, pro and con. Alan, at last, fairly vanquished—as he should be—submits, signs the pledge, and the good consequences of this wise act, are pointed out in striking, and sometimes really eloquent verse.

Our extract shall be from the part where Alan objects to pledges, on the ground of the great probability of their being broken. Amy thus acutely replies:—

"But what shall we do then, up there on the hill,
If we darena to pledge, lest we shouldna fulfil?
How many a promise more solemn is signed
In that mansion of vows, with the lightest mind!
And could we not, Alan, point out to thee now,
Full many a man that has broken his vow?
Yet ne'er have we heard it by any one said,
'For shame on the laws that let sinners be wed.'
And who can believe that he will e'er see
One half of them such as they promise to be?
It willna do, Alan, repeat not again—
'That law is of God,—the abstainers' of men.'
The words that man tells him, man ventures to say,
And trifles with danger the rest of the day;
May we, ere we live to so awful a time,
Renounce in good earnest that agent of crime!
Who was it, so lately was pleading with thee,
No bond more secure than his promise could be?
When gold was the object of pledges and claims
Who then was in earnest, and 'stieckled' for names?
Called signless agreement, unsafe as to say
'Why may be I mayna, and may be I may?'
And what are the losses that men so much dread
To the losses that weaken the heart and the head?"

We sincerely recommend the purchase of the poem; it may be peculiarly valuable to a certain class of our readers.

The Cabinet.

BANKRUPTS.—The trade of licensed victuallers figures at the top of the bankruptcies during the past year. Of what is this a sign?

KINGS SHOULD NOT DRINK WINE. "It is not for kings to drink wine, nor for princes strong drink; lest they drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of the afflicted."—Solomon.

ILLUSTRATION.

A poor aggrieved woman came one day to her sovereign, Philip, King of Macedon, and demanded justice from him. Philip being under the influence of wine, heard her case, and decided against her. "I appeal," said the woman. "To whom?" exclaimed the irritated monarch. She replied, "From Philip drunk, to Philip sober!" The caustic repartee dispelled the fumes of wine. Philip heard her case a second time, and then decided in her favour.

CLEAR-SIGHTED STATESMEN.—"I'm unable to see the Speaker," said a Cabinet Minister, once to the leader of the Opposition. "That's curious," answered the leader—"for I see two!" We need not inquire the reason.

PUBLIC-HOUSES THE CURSE OF SYDNEY.—"The greatest drawback upon the prosperity of the working orders in Sydney, arises from the public-houses, of which there are some 300, nearly all filled from morning to night, with men and women, too often spending the last penny they possess in the world."

WHO CAN DESCRIBE MODERATION?—"No person should exceed four or six glasses."—Democritus. "That man is a drunkard who takes more than three glasses; and though he be not drunk, he hath exceeded moderation."—Epictetus. Who is right? Reader!—give your definition.

"I AM neither a judge, nor a priest, nor a censor, nor a lawyer, why should I forbid the use of wine?"—Hafiz. Do our judges, priests, censors (editors) and lawyers, forbid wine? When will they?

ANCIENT AND MODERN WINE-DRINKING.—To drink wine unmix'd with water, was reckoned disreputable, by the ancients. The mixture was, generally, one-half wine, and one-half water, but sometimes two-thirds water, and one-third wine. This was done when the wine was simply fermented, and possessed comparatively little alcoholic power. The moderns increase the strength of their wines, by mixing large quantities of brandy.

Who are the wise men and disciples of moral philosophy?

WINE CASKS.—Germany can boast of constructing four of the largest wine casks ever made. The Tubingen cask was 24 feet in length, and 16 in depth; that of Heidelburgh, 31 feet in length, and 21 in depth; that of Gruningen, 30 feet long, and 18 deep; and, says a German writer, "to complete the disgrace of Germany, in the year 1725, a fourth was made at Konigstein, larger than any of the former."

STRONG DRINK AND BATTERY.—In the tenth Judicial Circuit of Ohio, composed of five counties, no licenses were granted, except in one county, to sell liquor; and the only case of assault and battery in the whole circuit, was in the county which continued to legalize liquor dealing.

SMOLET in his travels through France and Italy, in 1776, observes, "The longer I live, the more convinced I am, that wine, and all fermented liquors, are pernicious to the human constitution; and that, for the preservation of health, and exhilaration of spirits, there is no beverage comparable to simple water."

SELF-DENIAL.

In an admirable article on Emulation, in Chambers' Journal, (No. 107, January, 1846) we observe the following paragraph, strikingly applicable to the temperance cause:—

"We must learn not only to deny improper gratifications to ourselves, but also to decline administering them to others, even at the risk of giving offence; for if we do not, we sacrifice what we believe to be their real advantage, to our own selfish love of praise."

The whole article is full of excellent sense.

GERMAN STUDENTS.

DR. MASSIE in his "Summer Rambles in Belgium, Germany, and Switzerland," gives the following sketch of a party of German Students on board a steamer—

"They had come on board—for what purpose? For nothing else than revelry. They were before they left us, some of them in convulsions with drinking. I saw them repeatedly, as a well understood remedy for the delirium of inebriation, pour water upon their temples to bring them to their senses, which they had lost by drinking wine and brandy. Many of the travellers had brought well stocked flasks on board with them, and others had bought drink on board the vessel. They landed at a place called Linz, attempting a martial array of procession, but falling into a disorderly train of bacchanals. Some of them were not able to walk, but almost insensible, were carried as logs by their companions."

TURKISH FESTIVITIES.

In a "Narrative of a Tour through Armenia, Kurdistan, Persia, and Mesopotamia," by Rev. Horatio Southgate, there is a graphic account of a Turkish festival—the grand procession of the paschal orison:—

"All was quiet. There was no boisterousness, no indecorum, no extravagant merriment, no loud laughter, an absence of those contentions and babblings and sound without cause, which are the invariable accompaniments of our more civilized festivities. The reason of the difference is to be found in the habitual moderation and self-command of the Turks, and in the absence among them of the grand source of the woe which generally follows our own scenes of hilarity. Special care is exercised by the Turkish authorities during Bairam, to keep mussulmans from the grog-shops, which, I am sorry to add, are chiefly tenanted by Christians!"

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

Owing to the extended Report we intend giving of the Exeter Hall Meeting, all communications for the JUNE Number of the CHRONICLE AND RECORDER, addressed to the Editors, 39, Moorgate Street, London, should be received on or before the 10th of the present month; and, if articles of intelligence, must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer.

J. B. of Leeds, is again thanked for his supply of scraps, &c.

Also, W. F., Jun. of Soham.

J. C. of Cranbrook.—His article appeared in the Temperance Weekly Journal, of the 10th of April.

The articles of intelligence from Bedford and Knaresboro', came too late for insertion in our present Number.

The same reason explains the omission of J. H. Donaldson's Report of his labours in Somerset, &c.

STABBS

BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT,
24 & 25, OLD FISH STREET, NEAR DOCTORS' COMMONS, LONDON.

Two minutes walk from St. Paul's.

This Establishment combines with the advantages of a quiet and airy residence, the comforts of home, clean well-aired beds and moderate charges. Every attention will be paid to secure the approval of those, who may favour the proprietor with a visit.

THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

THE success of this Periodical is wholly without parallel in the history of temperance literature: and it is the intention of the proprietor to merit a continuance of such success, by furnishing a series of well written articles upon the most important topics connected with the temperance movement. The editors have the valuable assistance of several well-known writers, among whom are the following:—Rev. B. PARSONS, author of "Anti-Bacchus," "Education, the Birthright of every Human Being," "The Moral and Mental Dignity of Woman, &c. &c." Rev. W. R. BAKER, author of "Intemperance, the Curse of Britain," "The Idolatry of Great Britain, &c. &c."—H. MUDGE, Esq., of Bodmin, surgeon.—T. BRIGGS, Esq., Lecturer on the Sanatory Condition of the Working Classes, Health of Towns, &c.—Mr. T. SMEETON, author of the Prize Essay for Young Men, &c.

The friends of temperance will find this the cheapest and most convenient medium for the diffusion of information respecting the principles and operations of teetotalism, which has ever been offered to the public. By means of the stamped edition, this information can be circulated to a very wide extent.

Societies, or individuals, may obtain the Teetotal Times, by giving orders to the Booksellers in the respective towns, or, for larger quantities, to the publisher, W. BERTAIN, Temperance Depot, 11 Paternoster-row, London. All orders to be accompanied by a remittance, either in postage stamps, or a post-office order.

Price ONE PENNY, or for the stamped edition, 2s. per annum.

WANTED BY A TEETOTALER

A situation as BUTLER or single servant out of livery, in a gentleman's service; the advertiser (who is nearly 30) has been several years in the above capacity, and can be well recommended by his former masters since his first entrance into service. A family, where a little leisure might be had occasionally, for the advocacy of Temperance and Peace principles, would be preferred. Address (post paid) G. B—L, Post-office, Hexham, Northumberland.

WATER CURE.

GERMAN BATHS,

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, MIDDLESEX.

These BATHS are elegantly fitted up with the GERMAN DOUCHE, in all its varieties, Couches, Baths, a GYMNASIUM FOR INDOOR EXERCISE, and every comfort, for the express purpose of affording to invalids an opportunity of undergoing a regular course of "Water treatment," under the direction of any Medical Adviser they may prefer; no Medical Man having any proprietary or other interest in these Baths; while the manipulations are performed by regularly taught male and female skilful Bath attendants. The Harrow Baths are strictly a Bathing, and not a Boarding Establishment, (the patients occupying private lodgings in the village.) The Baths are only ten minutes' walk from the Harrow Station, on the London and Birmingham Railway; and are reached in twenty-five minutes from the London Terminus, at Euston Square. Fifteen trains stop at Harrow daily; and the facility afforded by the half-crown first-class day tickets, enables those whose avocations will not admit of their occupying lodgings in the vicinity of the Baths, to come to them for the Water treatment, at the times prescribed, and return to town again for that small sum For Terms, and other particulars, and as to Lodgings, whether furnished or unfurnished, House or Cottage accommodation, or merely Apartments, address, Mrs. PRICE, German Baths, Harrow, Middlesex.

N. B. Persons occupying a House or Lodgings, at Harrow, have the privilege of educating their children at the great Public School there, at a very trifling expense.

AN ADDITION TO THE TEETOTAL LIBRARY, BEING A COMPANION TO "BACCHUS," AND ANTI-BACCHUS."

To be published, about the end of May, the First Number of—

THE TEETOTALERS COMPANION,
AND SILENT ADVOCATE OF TEMPERANCE.

(A Standard work, dedicated by permission, to the great Philanthropist of the Age, the very Rev. Theobald Mathew.) Being an exposition of the evils that result from the custom of drinking of intoxicating liquors, which will be considered in a personal, domestic, and national point of view, and the custom itself, in its relation to social, moral, religious, physical, commercial and political economy

BY PETER BURNE,

The work will also comprise a comprehensive treatise on the Wine Question, demonstrating the accordance of teetotalism with Scripture, and the inaccordance of the habitual use of alcoholic drinks. The pathology of drunkenness will be illustrated, by Dr. SEWALL'S eight superb and celebrated coloured Engravings, representing the effects of alcohol upon the human stomach, in every stage of intemperance.

The work will consist of about 24 Weekly Numbers, containing 16 pages, large size (Royal Octavo), printed on good paper, in large bold type, and altogether, elegantly got up: Price 2½d. per Number.

N.B.—Secretaries of Temperance Societies, wanted as Agents for its sale, among their own members. Allowance for their Societies, 25 per cent.

Chronicle and Recorder.

JUNE 1st, 1846.

IF examples were wanting to show the good effects of total abstinence from strong drink, and that the sudden resort to this abstinence from every degree of indulgence, however slight, or however depraved, is attended not only with no danger, but invariably with the best results; they are to be found wholesale in the Middlesex House of Correction at Cold Bath Fields. It is well known, that in this single prison, from nine hundred to one thousand prisoners are on an average nightly locked up within its walls, and that from seven thousand to eight thousand persons are annually subjected to its discipline; out of which vast number, according to the statements of the learned judges before alluded to, from five to six thousand must have been addicted to strong drink. Here then we have an experiment upon a large scale. Under the acts of parliament which regulate prison discipline, no prisoner is allowed strong drink during his confinement, except as a medicine in illness, and for which he must have the sanction of the medical officer of the prison. How then stands the practical fact? We know that in that prison are to be found the high, the low, the rich, the poor. Both sexes—male and female; all ages, from the innocent infant at the breast, to the hoary headed sinner with one foot in the grave at three score and ten. Persons from all quarters of the globe, of every hue and every variety of constitution—the black Ethiopian, the tawny Canadian, the sallow Turk, and the fair Saxon. Persons of every shade of habits—from the moderate drinker to the most besotted drunkard. No time is given for preparation—the rich banker is actually taken from his banqueting room, and the pauper sot from the street kennel. Once having passed the threshold of the prison-house, all are at once and effectually debarred from the use of strong drink. Whatever their previous indulgences, from that hour and during their whole period of imprisonment, they become by the law of the land water-drinkers; and not one instance has yet been known of this sudden change to total abstinence producing the slightest ill effect upon the present health or future constitutions of the prisoners; on the contrary, scarcely an individual enters the prison who does not improve in health during the confinement, and this too in spite of the depressed state of feeling, which a sense of shame and degradation naturally creates in many;—the painful change of circumstances, the seclusion from all social intercourse with relatives and friends, the hard labour enjoined as the penalty of their various offences, and worse than all, the horrors of prison association. With such an example as this before us, who shall venture to assert that there is any danger in instantly and totally abstaining from strong drink, when the advantages of such a course are so undeniably manifested under circumstances so peculiarly adverse? And how is it that this fact is not daily and forcibly pressed upon the notice of gaol inmates, as a powerful inducement to them, voluntarily to continue, on leaving the prison, that same total abstinence from strong drink, the compulsory abandonment of which, during their confinement has so much and so manifestly benefited them?

TEETOTALISM AND THE MAY MEETINGS.

By REV. W. J. SHREWSBURY.

As in the natural, so in the moral world, there is a perfect agreement and harmony: truth corresponds to truth, as light, and air, and rain, to the rich and varied productions of the earth. "I will hear, saith the Lord, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth; and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil."—"Comparing," saith an apostle, "spiritual things with spiritual." It is by thus comparing the harmony, agreement, and fitness of things, that men are able "to prove" whatever is presented to their understanding, so as to "hold fast that which is good." By such a process of reason let teetotalism be judged.

May is now become a month of religious festivals. In some respects, London resembles Jerusalem of old at the time of her great religious feasts. The resemblance would be more complete, if for that season the whole nation, instead of a section, a small remnant of the people were heartily interested in those institutions which are the glory of our land. It is however only just to acknowledge, that teetotalism is the friend and ally of them all. It is indeed "the friend of all, the enemy of none." The Bible Society directly honours God. Its constitution is of the noblest and purest kind. Like the sun in the firmament it is a great light for all nations. It aims at universal benevolence; its benefits are lasting as eternity. If there be riches in the grace of God, it is an inexhaustible fountain ceaselessly pouring forth those riches to the ends of the earth. It is a great home society; it is "British," as well as "Foreign." Every year it gives stability to the throne and the church, while it blesses the world. A nation with a Bible Society can never perish. Teetotalism is a handmaid waiting with her willing services on this region of the earth. Drunkards pawn their Bibles; teetotalism prevents this evil, or takes them out of the miserable pawnbroker's hand, while by its efforts thousands are induced to purchase Bibles, who would have otherwise never desired to possess the sacred book. Missionary Societies are not the rivals, but coadjutors to the Bible Society. Were it not for Missionaries the Bible Society would not be furnished with Translators; were it not for the Bible Society Missionaries would not be supplied with Bibles. Here is a striking illustration of the consonance of truth. No good cause stands alone. Each good cause helps every other good cause. Teetotalism comes in for a fair share of this honour. It is a striking fact, though I believe it has never been distinctly pointed out, that since entire abstinence from alcoholic drinks has been adopted by a considerable number of Missionaries of the Wesleyan Society associated with the Rev. James Cox, there have been fewer deaths by fever than in former years in the West Indies. That is worth thinking about, although every body will not be at the pains to bestow a thought upon it. As a matter of economy, not to mention its connexion with morality, it would be wisdom in the managers of all Missionary Societies to encourage our thorough temperance principles in every missionary they send forth. Insurance Societies find out their value in insuring ships; Missionary Societies would find them equally valuable in insuring lives. But "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." This however, only exhibits the value of teetotalism to Missionary Societies in a more striking manner; for it goes beyond many of the friends of Missions themselves in introducing a principle that is most extensively advantageous to those very Missions which they have so much at heart. If all the untold wealth, expended in small and large sums by the poor and by the rich in daily drinkings and in social drinkings, were poured in equal streams into the treasuries of the Bible and Missionary Societies, in five years the whole world might be filled with Bibles and Missionaries. That also is worth thinking about; but who will think about it? Nobody: unless the activities of teetotalism force thought upon the public mind. As matters now move, it may be questioned whether five thousand years would suffice to fill the world with the instrumentality necessary for its salvation. For God will not save the world till the instrumentality is furnished by man. If Peace Societies pass next in review, can any man deny that teetotalism is a universal friend to such Societies? Drunkards are always at war with themselves, their families, their neighbours, their country, and ready to war with all mankind. A Society which aims at convincing all men of the folly, and of the sinfulness too, when the evil is fairly brought before the understanding, of "putting the bottle to" the mouth of himself or "his neighbour;" Hab. ii. 15, must be one of the most extensive Peace Societies in operation. It would be easy to apply this remark to Tract Societies; to Church Building and Pastoral Aid Societies; to Provident Institutions of every kind; and show that teetotalism is so far from being inimical to one single Society that is good, that it naturally, and of necessity, without any scheme for that purpose, allies itself with all, and is promotive of them all. Nor is this less true, because teetotalism sometimes crosses the erratic path in which, through the frailty of man, even religious societies are liable occasionally to move. If these be the palpable inconsistencies of an association of drinks with Philanthropic Societies in the contiguity of buildings, in the homage paid to wealthy manufacturers of drink by courting them as patrons, or placing them as chairmen at public anniversaries, and teetotalism honestly objects to those instances, in which such Societies are not true to their own interest, nor upright in carrying out their own professed objects, who are to blame,—teetotalers, or the managers of those Societies themselves? Certainly not the former, provided there be nothing of an unchristian spirit or temper manifested by them; and assuredly the latter, if they would but have the humility to correct the evil, instead of reprobating teetotalism as a mischief-maker, would have reason in all future time to rejoice that one Society at least existed in the land, which had rendered them more solid service by its rough friendship, than any of their warmest admirers had done by their loud applauses and acclamations. God grant that every teetotaler may be a thorough Christian, and every Christian a thorough teetotaler. Then shall the world be quickly regenerated, the May Meetings become more glorious than ever, and the whole earth be filled with universal peace and love.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF MEMBERS

was held at the office, on the 4th ultimo, when the report and financial statements were read and adopted, and the officers re-elected. The great length of our report of the Exeter Hall meeting, prevents our giving more than the following extract from the report of the Committee:—

"ABSTRACT OF THE SOCIETY'S PROCEEDINGS.

"Consistently with the original constitution of the Society, the Committee have left the local advocacy of the cause very much in the hands of individual societies and county unions; and have principally devoted the resources of the National Society to the diffusion of information, among the middle and upper classes, and to the promotion of temperance in the most destitute and demoralized districts.

Whilst the Metropolitan Missionaries have visited from family to family, in the most degraded parts of London, and have sought out the victims of drunkenness, in the streets and alleys of the Metropolis; other Visiting Agents have been employed in the counties of Bucks, Oxon, Hants and Flintshire, who have both visited families and given lectures in public.

"The Hon. Travelling Agent has been zealously engaged in re-organizing the Northern counties, and the system of visiting and tract-lending has already been extensively established.

"A Mission to France, which commenced in July and terminated at the close of October, was productive of great good.

"Advertisements on the Temperance question have been repeatedly inserted in the principal religious periodicals.

"The counties of Surrey and Sussex have been thoroughly canvassed, and a Temperance Union formed in connexion with this Society.

"The agitation against the Sunday traffic in strong drink has been aided by the Committee, and one hundred and thirty petitions have been supplied gratuitously, to the Temperance Societies in London and its vicinity.

"The Chronicle (to which the Ipswich Recorder was united at the commencement of the present year) has been enlarged from sixteen to twenty-four pages, and the sale considerably increased.

"A correspondence has been opened with the directors of some of the largest railways, respecting the employment of missionaries, particulars of which are given in another part of this Report.

"Large quantities of documents and tracts have been sent to the clergy, judges, members of the bar, magistrates, missionaries in foreign parts, societies in England, West Indies, Australia, and France; and the Chronicle circulates regularly in almost every country in the world."

CONCLUSION.

"In concluding their Report, your Committee have full confidence that their fellow Subscribers will rejoice with them at the amount of good which has been accomplished, by the very limited means placed at the Society's disposal. When it is considered that the total expenditure upon all the various operations detailed in the foregoing pages, including expenses of management, has amounted to little more than £1500, and that the entire charge for management, including Secretaries, Editing the Chronicle and Recorder, Rent, &c. does not exceed £150 per annum, your Committee think they may safely challenge any Society in existence, to show an equal extent of good, effected with similar resources.

"That a vast field of labour remains uncultivated, is but too certain. That intemperance still prevails in spite of all efforts to arrest its progress, is but too painfully evident. Could a revenue of £10,000 be annually raised for the Society, it could be used with equal economy and benefit. Your Committee, therefore, earnestly appeal to you, the Members of the National Temperance Society, as the principal friends of the cause, and to the public generally, to come forward, with renewed energy, and to remember, that although the end in view must be gained by moral and religious influences—those influences can only be brought to bear with practical effect, by means requiring pecuniary resources.

"A World's Convention on the subject of Temperance, will be held in August next. Let that be the commencement of a brighter era; and let every friend of the cause bestir himself in the meanwhile, to prepare for the event, by collecting all the information he can obtain, concerning his own neighbourhood and the society to which he belongs, and by raising contributions amongst his connexions in aid of the funds. Then we may hope to see a Convention worthy of the great object of its assembling, and capable, by the extent of its operations, of exerting a powerful and permanent influence upon the public mind. And we may hope, that in proportion as one great cause of the poverty, wretchedness and crimes of mankind shall cease to exist, the various virtues which follow in the train of temperance, will proportionally increase, and finally diffuse, throughout the world, a desire for each other's welfare, and a heartfelt conviction that we are all members of the same universal family, the children of the same Holy and Beneficent Parent.

"Signed, in and on behalf of the Committee,

"WILLIAM CASH, Chairman.

"London, 4th May, 1846."

EXETER HALL MEETING.

The Anniversary Meeting of the National Temperance Society was held on the 21st ult. The Earl of Arundel and Surrey, M.P., in the chair. The noble chairman was supported on his right, by B. Rotch, Esq., Justice of the Peace; and on the left, by the Hon. Stafford Jerningham. There were on the platform, besides the speakers, Dr. Campbell, Dr. Lovell, Dr. Mastalier, Julius Jeffreys, F.R.S., Messrs Joseph Eaton, Wm. Janson, John Hull, J. D. Bassett, G. W. Alexander, R. Barrett, J. Meredith, R. Warner, and a host of other well-known benefactors and advocates of the cause.

A few minutes after six o'clock, the EARL OF ARUNDEL entered the Hall, accompanied by several members of the Committee and other gentlemen, and immediately occupied the chair. His lordship on rising, was greeted with loud and universal cheering, at the subsiding of which, he said,—Ladies and gentlemen, although fully conscious of my inability to discharge properly the station which I have this day the honour of filling, yet, as a firm friend of the good and righteous cause which has assembled us all here, I could not decline, when requested to take the chair upon this occasion.—(Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, this is the fourth annual meeting of the National Temperance Society; and how many families have been rendered happy, since the first of these meetings, by the promulgation of these principles, which drive strife and wickedness from the home of the working man!—(Hear, hear.) I will not detain you by entering into a hacknied list of the numerous cases of benefit which have been wrought by teetotalism, but I will leave that duty to be performed by those who have taken a much more prominent part in this great cause, than I have been able to do.—(Cheers.)

W. CASH, Esq., read an abstract of the Report, some extracts from which will be found under the proceedings of the Annual Meeting of Members.

REV. W. W. ROBINSON, A.M., Incumbent of Christ's Church, Chelsea, rose to move the first resolution,—“That this meeting records with thankfulness the progress of the temperance cause, and the results of the National Temperance Society's operations; and especially approves of the efforts now making for the re-organization of the provincial societies, and a complete system of loan tract distribution—the opening of reading-rooms—and other means likely to secure the permanent establishment of the temperance cause.”

Christian friends,—I have been by the providence of God, nearly six years, a firm though humble member of this society;—(cheers,) and by the blessing of God I can declare unreservedly and decidedly, that since I became a teetotaler, I have been enabled to go through many more of the various duties connected with my ministry, than I ever did before.—(Loud cheers.) Perhaps it may be inquired, how I became a member of this Society? and in replying to this question, let me say, christian friends, that we should never forget that we are stewards of our tongues as well as of our money. It was through the instrumentality of a lady speaking to me upon the subject, which roused me to consider the propriety of joining this noble alliance. This christian lady asked me this question,—“Where are your drunkards on the Lord's day?” This seemed to be a harrow to my soul,—“Where are your drunkards on the Lord's day? and have you done all in your power for the promotion of true temperance among your large and important flock?”

I replied to that question in the affirmative. I answered that there were thirty ladies in my parish, who were in the habit of distributing religious tracts every week to the people: but this christian lady said, “Do the drunkards read the tracts?—do they come to the house of God? and if they were to come under the sound of the gospel, would they be benefited by your ministrations?” My lord, I felt condemned; and when again asked,—“Have you done all in your power for their welfare?” my conscience replied in the negative; and then the lady said,—“Have you joined the Teetotal Society?”—(Hear, hear.) I again felt condemned; and the lady then called my attention to the fact, that not only my influence would be of vast use in my parish, but that my own health would be benefited by abstaining from all intoxicating liquors. And I rejoice to say, that I have found the lady's prediction more than verified, for not only is my own health improved, but by the divine blessing, I was, in the course of a short time, enabled to establish in the parish of Yeovil, a society numbering 700 members.—(Loud applause.)

The resolution records with thankfulness the progress of the cause; and I am thankful for this progress, because I believe that the Temperance Society is one of the most important of the present day.—(Hear, hear, hear.) I say not this without reflection; for when I view the drunkenness of the land, and when I know that our Bible, our Tract, and our Missionary Societies are languishing for want of funds. I say, if we could, by God's blessing, make our land a sober one, the money now spent in supporting public houses would be given to send the gospel to the heathen. The Bishop of Chester at the meeting of the Church Missionary Society, observed, “that nine millions of gallons of spirits were annually consumed by professing British christians; and taking each gallon to be worth 10s., more than four millions of pounds were at once wasted.” I was rejoiced to hear his lordship speak so,—(cheers,) “wasted, more than wasted, which might be applied to the service of our God and Saviour.”

Ought we not to rejoice in the success of the Temperance Society, when its blessings are so great? We have at Yeovil a man who is a trophy of our cause, but who for many years was a blaspheming, drunken, infidel; but through grace, he has been a teetotaler for nearly five years, in his right mind, sitting at the feet of Jesus:—(cheers,) and I am sure if any one now present were to hear the christian conversation of that once blaspheming drunkard, he would say, “thank God for the Temperance Society, if it had no other trophy than John Perry.”

The resolution, my lord, refers to the system of loan tract distribution. How many are there throughout the kingdom who would not look at a religious tract before our Teetotal Society existed, but who now read these tracts; and who knows but that by reading these tracts they may become wise unto salvation by faith in Christ Jesus? Allow me to relate a fact told by Mr. M'Cree in reference to Ireland.—He was once dining with the late Lord Lieutenant, and in the course of conversation said, “My Lord, may I be allowed to ask a question?” “Certainly.” “May we then be permitted to believe one-half that we hear, in reference to the great reformation in Ireland? If one half be true what a mighty blessing it is!” His lordship jocularly replied, “You are not to believe one-half that you hear.” “I confess I was afraid there was considerable exaggeration in the statements that were circulated.” The answer his lordship gave, was—“You are not to believe half, but you are to believe double.—(Cheers.) You have not been told one half. I have frequently had the Judges come to my dinner-table wearing white gloves, because there was not a single case for trial at the assizes.”—(Cheers.) The case of Daniel and the three Hebrew worthies, as recorded in the first chapter of the book of Daniel, is a complete refutation of the opinion, that teetotalism is injurious to health, for we there find it recorded that Daniel and his compeers who fed upon pulse and water were fairer than all who eat and drank of the king's meat and wine. And I would here also declare my conviction, that had Paul lived in the present day, he would have been a staunch teetotaler. Does he not say, “If meat make my brother to offend I will eat no more meat while the world standeth?” And if Paul spake thus of meat, which never causes a man to go home and beat his wife and children, and which affords nourishment to the human system, how would he not have spoken against drink, the evils of which it would be utterly impossible to bring before this respectable assembly; and which, if I may so speak, are infinite, because they have relation to an infinite duration of time. One remark more, in reference to what teetotalism is. Teetotalism is not the gospel, but it is a pioneer to the gospel.—(hear, hear.) Teetotalism is precisely this,—a physical remedy for a physical disease.—(hear, hear, hear). Were we to preach the gospel, my lord, to any of the inmates of Bedlam, there would be a physical disability to their reception of it; and they could not comprehend its blessed sound, till that physical disability were removed. And I tell the church of Christ, that intemperance is a physical disability, and teetotalism a physical remedy for that disability. Man by nature is spiritually dead, but drunkenness closes the avenues to spiritual life; for it is now a well established fact, that even a moderate quantity of drink injures the brain,—(loud cheers,) and teetotalism unstops these avenues; yet the man remains dead as before until he believes the gospel.

I have sometimes been asked, if there are any works containing in the space of a few pages a correct account of this great movement, and the reasons for individuals becoming teetotalers. I would mention two,—“A Letter to a Clergyman of the Church of England,” which is most beautifully and convincingly written, and “Cox's Christian Advocacy.” I am sure if any one will read these works without prejudice, he cannot very long fail to join our blessed and noble Society.—(cheers.)

HON. H. STAFFORD JERNINGHAM on being announced, was received with great applause. He said it was his firm desire that his exertions should go towards carrying out the object of the resolution he had the honour to second—(hear, hear). He had been a teetotaler for three years—(cheers,) less than the rev. gentleman who had preceded him; but he begged leave in the most emphatic manner, to bear witness to the good effects of temperance in his own person—(hear, and cheers). He had not taken the pledge until after ample consideration,—(hear, hear.)—and, in fact, he was ashamed to say, he took it on the very last occasion on which it was administered by his friend Father Mathew, when in London—(cheers). In the Autumn of 1844, he visited Ireland, and in a four months' tour he had only seen three persons the worse for liquor—(cheers). And though he had felt no hesitation in making the small and insignificant sacrifice, yet when he saw poor Irishmen who could hardly afford a meal of potatoes twice a day, and scarcely any milk (for at that time milk was very dear), keeping the pledge with the greatest firmness, he was ashamed that he had not without a moment's loss taken it when he had the opportunity—(hear, hear). He had occasion several times to ask, in Ireland, whether the taking of the pledge by persons, blessed in some degree with rank and affluence, had any good effect in keeping up to their principles those in poorer circumstances? and the question was universally answered in the affirmative—(hear, hear).

He could say that the example of his noble friend in the chair, taking the pledge—(cheers,) had a considerable influence upon himself—(hear, hear). In one case where he put the question, he heard that the lady of a gentleman of property, who was urged to take the pledge, thought it would throw some sort of taint upon her character—some misprision, until it came to her knowledge that the Marchioness of Wellesley had taken it, and then all sort of difficulty was removed—(cheers).

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., was received with repeated rounds of applause. He said, that having been asked, he supported with great cordiality the resolution which had been moved and seconded. He believed firmly, that all that was wanting to make the great majority of mankind embrace temperance principles, was to put them as nearly as possible in the circumstances in which teetotalers are placed, which is,—that if they could present to the minds of others the facts and reasonings which had swayed them, it was but fair to suppose, that they would, in numerous instances, become equally devoted to the promotion of the abstinence cause.

One of the most potential of these means was to hold meetings like the present, and through the instrumentality of the press, which records whatever is said and done, to speak to millions out of doors, whom no power of voice could reach within those walls. It was very improbable that all in that meeting were pledged teetotalers; and under the impression that some persons were there for the first time, he desired to occupy the time allotted to him, in relating his personal experience in this matter, and then taking a view of the reasons why every one should unite with the friends of temperance.

He would just direct the attention of the meeting to what first powerfully impressed him, in reference to this subject. Twenty-three years since, he returned to England, after residing in India, and travelling very extensively in the Asiatic world. And in the course of that expedition, he had been exceedingly struck with one feature in the character of the Asiatics, viz., their extreme sobriety; and this would be seen, when he observed, that he had travelled 30,000 miles, which had occupied him more than three years' time, during which he could not have come in contact with much less than three millions of persons; and in all that period he did not see three people intoxicated! Mr. Jerningham had only seen three persons intoxicated during his four months' tour in Ireland. The change wrought in that country was truly miraculous. He recollected, that after his return from India he went to Ireland, and in going from Kingston to Dublin, a distance of about six miles, he had seen not much fewer than one hundred drunken people; but recently, in making a tour of four months' length, partly in connection with Father Mathew, he had only met with two persons in any degree intoxicated, and neither of them was an Irishman.—(Cheers.)

They could readily believe then that when he landed at Portsmouth, after an absence of three years, he felt some of that enthusiasm which a man who loves his country does feel when he returns to it after a long absence; but when he saw in Portsmouth, drunken men, women, and children, he said,—“Is it possible that England should have sunk to this degradation? Is it possible that the country which stands at the topmost pinnacle of earthly renown, in arts, arms, and civilization,—is it possible that this blight can have extensively fastened upon her?” He had at that time some satisfaction in believing, that there was something peculiar in the town of Portsmouth; but during another tour through England, Scotland, and Wales, he found that not only in Portsmouth, but over the whole country, drinking seemed the rule, and sobriety the exception; more particularly among the labouring classes. On his return to London, he adopted various plans of reformation; but he was constantly met by the observation, “Don't you drink yourself?” and of course he was obliged to admit that he took a little wine now and then; but when he perceived that it was the opinion of these people that persons could not live without stimulants, he resolved to remove this stumbling-block; and on consulting the members of his own family, he was happy to receive their entire concurrence in making the sacrifice.—(Cheers.) He soon commenced the work of purging his house from every thing of the nature of a stimulant; and since that time, about twenty years ago, not only had no single individual of his household,—himself, his wife, neither of his children, or any of his servants,—tasted intoxicating drinks, but none had ever entered over the threshold of his door.—(Cheers.) And after this trial of the principle, he could testify that the advantages he had gained in regard to health, to strength, calmness of mind, and general capacity for labour, had been incalculable.

A word or two with respect to the general grounds upon which the question rests; and on these he would dwell for a short time, for the benefit of any who might have entered the meeting impelled by curiosity, or by an earnest desire to hear. It is only fair to assume, that all ranks and classes of persons, from the highest to the lowest, are in the pursuit of happiness. They want to be happy; and though there is a great diversity of opinion as to what happiness mainly consists in,—that, depending greatly upon the station of the individual, the nature of his pursuit and his physical temperament—yet there are certain elements of happiness about which all persons agree, and which they are eager to obtain. 1. Health—for without health, what happiness can there be? 2. Intelligence or wisdom; for however healthy a person is, if he has not intelligence he is but an animal. 3. Competence—sufficient to bring up your children, and pass respectably through the world. Another point is, that you are beloved by those among whom you live; and, lastly, that you stand well with your own heart, and possess a good conscience. A man who has these—it hardly matters in what station of life he is—must be a happy man;—health, intelligence, competence—the esteem of his neighbours, and ease in his own heart—what can he wish for more? But intemperance is destructive of all these; it lays the axe at the root of them all.

1. Health.—Besides the individual experience we have had of the deleterious nature of these drinks, we have the testimony of the most eminent medical men in the world; physicians, surgeons, practising in the army and the navy, and in civil life, and who have visited all climates, from the warmest to the coldest; we have the testimony of these gentlemen, that alcoholic stimulants are not necessary for persons in health; that, although in some peculiar cases of disease they may be necessary, yet they can be administered in another form; but that their use as beverages is insensibly but certainly injurious, just as no man is conscious that he is older to-day than he was yesterday; but in three years time he becomes conscious of the change; and so though the evil effects resulting from intoxicating drinks are not at once apparent, it is not the less true that they nevertheless exist.

2. Intelligence.—Intoxication will make a man neglect study. He who is striving to attain mental excellence should be sober. You never heard of any man aiming at the proud station of first wrangler at either of the Universities getting drunk? He might be foolish enough to get drunk after he had been successful, but not before. Drunkenness obstructs the growth of the spiritual man.

3. Competence.—Did any man ever become richer by drinking intoxicating liquors? He (Mr. Buckingham) would defy the world to produce an instance. Thousands have become wealthy by making other people drink.—(Hear, hear.) Brewers, distillers, and spirit-sellers, these men fatten upon the earnings of the poor, while families without number have been beggared by means of drinking.—(Hear, hear.) There is no greater foe to competence than intemperance.

4. The esteem and love of our neighbours.—And can the drunkard possess these? Is he not the object of scorn and contempt? How then can he be happy?

Lastly, peace in our own conscience. And does drunkenness produce these? Is it not succeeded rather by moments of torture? Is it not well known, that one of the most fearful diseases in the catalogue of those ills to which man is heir—delirium tremens—arose from the horror with which an individual is struck with respect to himself? He feels as if demons are tearing his flesh from his bones, as if he is involved in the flames of hell, and as if surrounded by ghastly spirits.

They (the meeting) saw, then, by that catalogue what evils intemperance produces;—it destroys health, sends thousands to a premature grave, ruins the character, blights the most joyous prospects, and peoples hospitals and lunatic asylums. He (Mr. Buckingham) knew no greater evil affecting the community than the direful drinking customs; viewed then in relation to these evils, it seemed to him, that the temperance cause took the precedence of the other great moral movements of the day.—(Cheers.) It would, indeed, be productive of most of the reforms wanted; for instance, political reform was wanted, and if the parliament were elected by a sober community, a different body would represent the people, and if different men were elected, they would enact different laws.—(Hear, hear.)

In conclusion, he (Mr. Buckingham) desired again to express his hearty concurrence in the resolution; and pledging himself to renewed labour and exertions, he trusted others would be induced to follow his example.—(Great applause.)

MR. J. R. WILSON, honorary travelling agent of the National Society, said, he appeared before the meeting as a babe in the temperance cause, of a year and a quarter old.—(laughter.) He had been induced to adopt the principle of the Society, by attending a temperance meeting in the North, at which Captain

Trotter of Dyrham Park spoke, while on a visit to Lord Ravensworth, his father-in-law. He (Mr. Wilson) then signed the pledge; since then he had zealously advocated the cause, and was now travelling through the length and breadth of the land to convert the whole kingdom to teetotalism.—(Laughter and cheers.)

After a few other prefatory remarks, Mr. Wilson continued—The object of the National Temperance Society is “to abolish intemperance by promoting the universal disuse of intoxicating drinks.” Here we have a great physical evil and an efficient physical cure.

I have in my own thoughts on the subject, run a parallel between the corruption of human nature and the remedy provided in the gospel; and the evils of intemperance and the cure effected by total abstinence; the former, a moral evil, for which alone a moral remedy can be applied; the latter, a physical disease, for which a physical remedy only can be efficacious, and both equally simple and equally effective. The former says, “Believe, and be saved;” the latter “Abstain, and be saved.” I have also run a parallel between the means used for propagating the gospel, and those employed in promoting temperance. And what are these means but the propagation of THE TRUTH, either in a written form or by means of oral communication.

In regard to intemperance, the means employed to remove the evil, must be the truth in a printed form, exhibiting the physical and moral evils resulting from the use of these poisons, in the form of essays, the statistical returns of disease, immorality, insanity and crime; and these publications bear an analogy to the Holy Scriptures; and the public lecturing or the private exhortation of the consistent and devoted members of Temperance Societies, are analogous to the preaching of the gospel.

Allow me now to advert to the means which the National Temperance Society and other kindred institutions have been employing to abolish the evils of intemperance. These have been chiefly public lecturing, by means of paid or gratuitous agency, and the gift of temperance publications, and the insertion of articles in the periodical press; all of these are powerful instruments for the dissemination of the principles of the Society, and should be multiplied a thousand fold; but what have been the results of these means now in operation in this country for the last fifteen years?

Has intemperance been generally abolished? or has any great impression been made on the public mind as to the physical and moral evils resulting from the use of intoxicating liquors? We unhesitatingly reply, that all that has been done, or said, has been insignificant when compared with the extent of the evil deplored! No! with sorrow be it spoken, Great Britain still maintains its too-well deserved and unenviable pre-eminence of being the “most intemperate nation upon earth.” For while the United States, the child of Britain, can number its four millions of total abstainers, and the sister country can boast of a like number of members, England, Wales, and Scotland, have scarcely reached one-eighth of the before-mentioned number of abstainers, or in other words, scarcely one million of pledged members.

Then consider the allied forces which are marshalled against the cause of temperance. First and foremost, there is the government of the country deriving one of the largest sources of revenue from the manufacture and sale of strong drinks, and the licensing of places for their sale and use. Then there are the distillers and brewers, and venders of intoxicating liquors, numbering their tens of thousands all marshalled against us. Again, there are the ministers of religion, both in and out of the establishment, with a very few honourable exceptions, either opposed to our principles or at best indifferent to our cause, and sanctioning by their example the drinking habits of the people. With such a phalanx of authority and influence, how inadequate are the means which have been or are at present employed to make head against the monster evil! Truly, we may apply the language of our blessed Lord, and say, "The harvest truly is great; but the labourers are few!"

As I have been requested to explain and recommend the improved organization as laid down in the Manual of the National Temperance Society, I shall proceed to show that the two great instrumentalities before mentioned are these which the Society is anxious should be employed to the extent of the evil to be removed.

The first is, oral communication, in the form of conversation and advice to individuals and families; and by lectures and addresses to public meetings; and second, in the circulation of information on the evils of intemperance by means of the press, in the form of tracts, essays, statistical returns of disease, insanity, pauperism and crime produced by intemperance,—the opinion of eminent medical men on the ruinous effects of alcoholic drinks on the human frame; and the danger of using them medicinally.

In order to bring both these powerful instrumentalities into operation, it is proposed to divide the whole of the United Kingdom into associations, formed in the principal towns, with branches in the surrounding villages and districts;—to divide these branches into districts of fifty families each, and to supply each family with a set of loan tracts weekly, by means of pledged members, male or female;—to furnish such districts with a supply of tracts for a twelvemonth, the Catalogue of the National Society has been greatly enlarged, so as to furnish sixty loan-sets, containing sixteen pages each, done up in a cover, with an address on the back and the principles of the Society. Thus every family in the kingdom will, if these plans be fully carried out, be visited fifty-two times yearly, and will read 800 pages of the choicest arguments in favour of temperance. In addition to the above, it is proposed that the members of each branch society should meet monthly for mutual encouragement and edification, when new members will be enrolled, and when there will be afforded an opportunity of stating the beneficial effects of temperance on themselves and families.

Again, it is contemplated to hold public quarterly meetings in each branch, when addresses and lectures will be delivered by competent persons to the inhabitants of such branch.

It is intended, likewise, to recommend the opening of Temperance Reading Rooms for the amusement and edification of the members in each branch, and for the holding of monthly and other meetings.

To support all this, it is proposed that the tract distributor should solicit from such members as can afford it the weekly contribution of one penny, to be expended in the purchase of the loan tracts, the rent of the reading-rooms, and the supply of books and temperance periodicals, and the occasional employment of lecturers. This small contribution, if generally received, will, it is calculated be amply sufficient to defray all expenses, and even leave a surplus to support the Parent Society in its efforts at home and abroad.

In order to illustrate this subject, let us suppose for a moment, that this great metropolis were divided into associations and branches.

Two millions of inhabitants, divided by five, will make four hundred thousand families; to supply which, for a year, would require the like number of loan tracts, which at 6s. per 100 will amount to £1200; and to supply distributors, each taking fifty families, 8000 pledged teetotalers will be required.

Now imagine for a moment, that this plan is generally adopted through the length and breadth of this vast metropolis. Fifty visits paid by pledged teetotalers to 400,000 families, each family reading 800 pages of temperance matter in the year; and what a mighty revolution in public opinion may be expected. If in a twelvemonth each distributor were the means of converting only ten persons in each district, there would be an annual increase of 80,000 members.

If such results were realized in the metropolis, what might not be expected in the provinces, where five millions of families will be weekly visited by 500,000 teetotalers, at the annual cost of £15,000? and if each district added ten members, five millions would become members in a year. We should soon exceed even America, or our sister Ireland.

The economy of the system, is likewise a great recommendation to it viz. in the loan of tracts, instead of the gift of them. If the 400,000 tracts to supply the metropolis were given instead of being lent weekly, it would cost £60,000 per year, and for the whole kingdom £750,000.

It is likewise a self-supporting system. The great difficulty at present is to raise adequate funds to support the agency of the National Temperance Society in the metropolitan mission; and while we depend upon the precarious support of the rich there will ever be found the same deficiency.

Let the cause of temperance depend upon the voluntary periodical contributions from its members, or the pennies of the poor, and I venture to say that an ample revenue will always be supplied, not only to pay for the mere machinery of the system, but likewise to provide for the support of the Parent Society and its interests.

I am sanguine in the belief, that should the scheme above recommended be universally carried out, the Associations and their affiliated Branches will be able to afford to support one or more permanent agents in each town, who shall devote his whole time to the visitation of the Branches and the operations of such Societies, until the entire population is converted to temperance, and then there no longer needs the means by which this great work has been accomplished. That it is practicable no one will be prepared to deny; and all that is required is, that each member of the Society should do his duty, and employ his time, his talents, and his influence in promoting the cause.

The temperance reformation is like other reforms, whether political or religious, and it is only necessary "that the people should will it" and it is done. Let us not wait for legislative enactments, let us not expect too much from the clerical or medical professions, or the aristocracy or gentry of the country. The influence of these, doubtless, is great, and we hail with joy the noble way in which many of these exalted characters are coming forward in the support of the great cause of religion and benevolence. yet, after all, we must depend, under God, on the omnipotence of truth and the personal exertions and consistent conduct of professing members of the Society, for the diffusion of our principle and the triumph of our cause.

Mr. W. having sent a copy of the Manual to the Rev. Theobald Mathew for his opinion and approval of the organization recommended, the following reply was made:—

"I highly approve of the plan you have adopted, and it is unnecessary to assure you of my best wishes for the successful accomplishment of your desires. You will be glad to learn that our glorious cause continues, with the divine blessing, to prosper in Ireland. The rising generation are being trained to habits of total abstinence, and the taste for reading, which you are so anxious to cultivate, is very general in all our temperance reading-rooms throughout the kingdom. In this city alone, we have nearly forty Branch Societies."

The noble chairman then put the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., Magistrate and Visiting Justice for Middlesex, rose amid prolonged cheering. He said,—My Lord Arundel, my excellent friend Mr. Buckingham seemed to think that new faces would be more welcome to you than old ones, but the kind greeting which he received himself, and that which you have kindly just bestowed upon me, certainly gives a decided negative to his proposition. Having been old in the service, and having seen what we were formerly and what we are now, I may, perhaps, be able to recall to your recollection some pleasing contrasts which, I must confess, have struck me most forcibly upon the present occasion.

Allusion has been made to the glittering row of soldiers on my left.—(Hear, hear.) I recollect the time when it was matter of congratulation at our meetings, that we saw four military men attending them; but now, more than forty are listening to my address.—(cheers.) I must confess I am delighted when I look upon those gallant defenders of their country, and see them there, showing by their example, their adherence to the cause of temperance; but I am still more delighted, when I see mingling in this crowd of individuals, a staff sergeant with his glittering epaulette, with a dear child on the one hand, and his modestly attired wife on the other.—(Great cheering.) These scenes, my lord, go home to the fire-side of every man. It is there that we are seeking to stir up the embers of joy and happiness. Public meetings are necessary only to show the world what we are about; but it is in the bosoms of our own families and in the families of those we love that we find the real return for our exertions.—(Hear hear.) I am an old teetotaler, and I do not forget that my excellent friend near me is also an old teetotaler. He is turning, I see, to get at a fact which I am going to relate, viz., that he is the worthy president of that very military band—(loud applause)—himself the son of a military officer—and a medical man who considers teetotalism one of the greatest blessings any person can enjoy.—(cheers.) But, I am an old teetotaler, and I cannot but refer to a body of men who are seated in this room, wearing a uniform which, if not as brilliant, is to me quite as attractive as that worn by the gallant band before me.—I mean those jolly smock-frocks. [This allusion to a body of coal-heavers who were neatly dressed and sat in the platform gallery, on the right hand of the noble chairman, drew forth tremendous and long continued cheering.] I mean the coal-whippers of the River Thames—(renewed applause) with their nice white frocks, washed by their industrious wives;—(repeated cheers) and who have come here to-day, to bear testimony against that absurd delusion which caused them to pour down their throats, in the shape of strong drink, their hard-gotten earnings: but teetotalism has taught them that intoxicating liquors are not necessary for the performance of their most laborious work; and having proved this to be a fact, they have resolved to come here to-day as a bright example to all, and to shew that teetotalism is as safe as it is virtuous.—(Loud cheers)

I remember, many years ago, that the only coal-heaver we saw at our meeting—and it was a very large one—was a poor fellow in that state, when the beer had stole away his wits. He came to the teetotal meeting; he thought to hear; he thought to be instructed, but he had no ears for what he heard, and no head for instruction—he was a drunkard! On that occasion, some would have turned him out, but the chairman said, “No; if teetotalism does not lead to christian charity it is not christian virtue.”—(Cheers.) He was retained among us, and who knows but that this example of patience and forbearance, may have made him the cause of that phalanx now before us?

The motion which has been put into my hands is this,—

“That while this meeting is most desirous, that every facility should be afforded for the innocent recreation of the people, it cannot too strongly condemn the system of Sunday drinking, and the giving a legal sanction to houses for the sale of liquors, which occasion and perpetuate the moral degradation of the country.” A part of this motion sinks deeply into my heart. I have been—I may say, without presumption—the friend of the working classes from my boyhood,—when, at ten years of age, in a parish in a remote part of Wales, I taught in a Sunday-school, to more mature years, when finding out what the wants of the people were, I have been enabled to advise them much better than when a child. In my official duties in this county, in administering the laws, I have ever endeavoured to consider what were the just rights of the people, and the just liberty which they ought to enjoy.—(Cheers.) And I have often had to listen with pain on those occasions, when magistrates have been called upon to grant licenses, for the use of what have been falsely called “places of public entertainment!”—(A laugh.) I think heaven that magistrates have not the power in this county to refuse innocent recreations to the people.—(cheers.) It is not with us to do that; all that we can do is to foster the corrupt customs of the people, by allowing pernicious drinks to be sold at these places.

Not long ago a bright example was given of how little magistrates do to stop this current of evil. It is so mighty that nothing but a bank of teetotalers can arrest it, and you know, that there are far from being enough teetotal magistrates, to make anything like a bank. Very lately I was called upon by several clergymen who reside in the neighbourhood of Chelsea, giving me most affecting accounts of the dreadful scenes which are nightly perpetrated in the gardens called Cremorne House. I had to sit by, and hear learned counsel instructed by the parties belonging to those gardens, tell me, that if the magistrates did not wish to deprive the unhappy denizens of the city, who never breathed the fresh air but in these gardens when their work was over,—unless they wished to deprive the mechanic and his children of the innocent recreations of gazing at an illuminated baloon, or hearing sweet music, and of walking upon the green grass, while the little children plucked the daisies under their feet,—they would grant the license.—(Laughter.) But was this application made for the ostensible purposes assigned? No; what the counsel asked for was this,—“We have got the gardens; we can shew the balloon; we can give the people amusements; the little children can pluck the daisies if they please; we can sell tea, coffee, and ginger-beer; there is pure water from the fountain to slake the thirst,—but this is not enough. We can do all that without the aid of the magistrates. But that is not what we want. Two or three thousand persons are collected together under the guise of this balloon, and this daisy, and this shrubbery, and when they have walked here long enough, and had their minds excited by these innocent amusements,—when they are a little weary, at that hour when nature seeks repose, and when after the proper excitement of that mind, and the proper fatigue of those limbs, they ought to retire with their families to their homes, and go to bed seeking balmy sleep, “nature’s sweet restorer,”—at that particular time give us the cursed spirit license; we will refresh them and keep them a little longer; and the crowd that came in innocence and joy to these gardens, shall turn out a drunken, a riotous, and an insolent mob, to be a nuisance to the whole neighbourhood!”—(Immense applause.)

While listening to the speech of the counsel, I was grieved at the blindness of my brother magistrates, who were so bewitched about not restricting the liberties of the subject and the happiness of the people, that they entirely forgot that it was a spirit license they were asked for, and so they granted the intolerable nuisance! I grieve for it, but if there are any here who live in that locality, I do beseech them to bestir themselves to disseminate this principle which seems not to be understood,—that the innocent amusements of the people are never interfered with by the magistracy of the country. But why is it that a faithful and good husband will not permit his wife or child to go to the place of (so-called) innocent amusement? Because of the spirit license. He says, "If there were no spirit license for that place I would allow you to go, because I should know that you would be free from evil contamination; but intoxicating drinks are sold there; it is not a place of innocent amusement, and therefore you shall not go."—(Cheers.) And do, my friends, assist me, to teach the lesson to the world, that we ought to have these places of amusement without the accursed appendage of the spirit license!—(Great cheering.)

Another point treated upon in this resolution, is, the great evil of Sunday drinking. And I must confess, there is an inconsistency in the laws of my country upon that subject, which very much distresses me. I have often been called upon in my capacity as a magistrate, by my excellent and worthy pastor, to put down the selling of a pound of beef, or half a pound of mutton, while the beer-shop is sanctioned by law to be open during a part of the Sabbath. I do not find fault with the legislators who made these laws, and who, I believe, want knowledge upon the subject; for I believe that the great mass of the legislators of this country, are wholly and totally ignorant of the real principles of total abstinence. What a subject then for congratulation it is for us all to find in the chair to-day, a pledged teetotaler, a member of the House of Commons.—(Loud cheers.) His lordship has informed me that this is the first time he has visited this hall. I congratulate him that his first visit has been paid on behalf of such a cause; and I do entreat him, that he will carry the remembrance of the assembly before him, to that place where he sits as a legislator, and that if opportunity offers, he will bear in mind, while he is speaking his sentiments as a teetotaler, that he is only speaking the sentiments of this vast multitude.—(Great applause.)

I feel I am taking up too much of the time of the meeting, (No, no—go on—go on.) It is now a matter of history, of painful history in this country, and which I hope will remain a mere matter of history, never to be enacted again, that such was the awful condition of our jails in reference to intoxication, that every jail had its tap within its walls, served by the jailor. At the period to which I allude, there was an assize held at Oxford, known as the "black assize," so called because of a pestilential disease of the jail, occasioned by intoxication, being communicated by the prisoners to the court then sitting, of which pestilential disease, the chief baron who presided, the high sheriff for the county, and 300 other individuals all died; and when my Lord Bacon—than whom, a more learned, more intelligent, and excellent man never lived,—was asked how he escaped, his emphatic words were these—and let them be treasured up by every teetotaler—his answer was, "By temperance and cleanliness!"—(Great applause.)

REV. W. GWYTHYR, Vicar of Yardley, Warwick, was glad to bear his testimony against the Sunday traffic in intoxicating liquors, for he had seen its evil effects. He quite agreed in the sentiment, that our legislators were not aware of the evils occasioned by the sale of intoxicating drinks. He had had the honour of being the vicar of a large parish, in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, for twenty-five years; and during that period, applications had been made to the board of magistrates for licenses for six or eight public-houses; but he was happy to say, that the knowledge and good feeling of the magistrates had induced them to reject all such applications;—(hear, hear,) so that in a large parish, six miles in length and three in breadth, and in the neighbourhood of the large town of Birmingham, not a license had been granted during his residence there.—(cheers.) And he was persuaded, from his knowledge of that bench of magistrates, that had applications come before them for licensing beer-shops, not a beer-shop would have been licensed. But he regretted to say, that in his parish there were more beer-shops than licensed public-houses, and the dreadful evils perpetrated there were distressing to the feelings of the moralist and the religious man. He wished to address a few words to any clergyman or minister of the gospel who might be present, and to Sunday-school teachers.—(Hear, hear.) Where were drunkards found on the Lord's day?—(Hear, hear.) At the public-house; and if they, (ministers and teachers,) would do them good, and show them the way of salvation, they must go to the public-house after them; but every one saw the absurdity of this. What then can be proposed? Moderation had been recommended to them. He (Mr. Gwyther) had recommended moderation to drunkards for the last fifteen years before he became a teetotaler;—(Hear, hear,) but he had no recollection of one drunkard being convinced of his sin and folly, and being reformed by such advice!—(Hear, hear.)

He had depicted the evils of drunkenness in as strong terms as he could find language to express; he had entreated them by all the arguments of which he could think; but to the best of his recollection he had never succeeded, either from the pulpit or in private, in reforming one drunkard.—(Hear, hear.) Most of the children educated in his Sunday-schools had turned out drunkards.—(Hear, hear.) And with regard to the Sunday-schools in the town from which his friend Mr. Sturge came, it had been ascertained by diligent inquirers, that far more than half of the young men educated in the best conducted Sunday-schools of Birmingham had turned out drunkards.—(Hear, hear, hear.) Ministers and teachers then! we recommend you to adopt total abstinence for yourselves, and total abstinence as your doctrine. But the question arises—shall we succeed if we adopt that principle? He would give them in a few words, the result of his own observation and experience. Since the commencement of the present year, six drunkards in his parish, who had been drunkards from their youth, and some of them from their childhood, had become teetotalers.—(Hear, hear.) All his previous efforts to improve them had been without effect; but now that they had adopted the temperance principle, they had become sober, and were brought to the house of God.—(cheers.) He lamented the absence of his friend, George Kenrick, Esq., of West Bromwich, President of the Central Association; and as no reference had been made to the progress of temperance in those counties, viz., part of Oxfordshire, Warwickshire, Staffordshire and Shropshire, he might state that that Association employs six agents, who are regularly employed, from day to day, in holding public meetings, and in delivering lectures. More than one hundred lectures are delivered by these agents every month; and what is their success? Last month, not less than 1500 pledges were taken in those counties.—(cheers.) In the town of Newcastle-on-Tyne, he had the pleasure of holding a meeting, when a man of wealth, a resident in the neighbourhood, came, in order to oppose the temperance cause. At a pre-vicious meeting his wife had taken the pledge, which annoyed him very much, and he determined, therefore, to go to the meeting and oppose what was said, to convince his wife that she had acted wrong; but happy for him and for his wife, he heard such arguments at that meeting, that he not only signed the pledge, but he is to be a delegate to the World's Convention in August next, to represent the teetotal cause in that county—(cheers).

Some year and a-quarter ago, he (Mr. Gwyther) called upon the rector of a parish in Shropshire, the Rev. Orlando Forrester, requesting permission to hold a temperance meeting in his parish. He very kindly said, "Do as you please; I cannot, myself, join the society, but do what you like to lessen the influence of drunkenness among my people." More than a year and a-half was allowed to pass over, and at the last meeting held in his (Mr. Forrester's) parish, he consented to allow the use of the town hall for that purpose; and during the meeting, a gentleman came forward and said, he had been deputed, by the Hon. and Rev. Orlando Forrester, rector of Brossely, to attach his name to the temperance pledge, for at least two years. Great was the applause with which this announcement was received. The teetotalers of that district know the mighty influence of that man for consistency, goodness and mercy—an influence which extends, not only to his own parish, but also through the whole county. And more than this, Mr. Forrester has influenced one most dear to him, viz. his wife. A friend who called upon him and his lady, a few days ago, said, he found Mrs. Forrester a zealous advocate for the principles of teetotalism. And he (Mr. Gwyther) was happy to say, that he had become acquainted, within the last six or eight months, with a number of clergymen's wives who had taken the pledge, and were now striving to promote it by every means in their power.

Yesterday, as his friend Dr. Gourley, and himself, were waiting for the train, they saw a soldier also waiting, and they put to him this question—and he (Mr. Gwyther) would like to put the same question to each of the soldiers before him.—Has the use of intoxicating drinks ever done you any harm? The soldier replied, they had not, for if they had, he would not have been promoted three times in his regiment. A teetotal policeman, who happened to be near, and who had been a soldier himself, said—"Three times promoted! then you have been twice degraded," for he was only a corporal yet!—(Laughter and cheers). But the soldier knew better than that intoxicating drinks had not injured him. He (Mr. Gwyther) saw the father of that soldier, take his son upon his knee in the public-house, and say—"My son! I will teach thee to drink; it never did me any harm, and it will never do thee any."

But that man had reduced himself to poverty, and was obliged to live upon 16s. a week, furnished by his relatives, for the support of himself and family, and the greater portion of that 16s. is expended in drink, every time he receives it, thereby reducing his wife and children to extreme misery and want. That family had suffered beyond description, by drunkenness, and yet the father and the son could declare before their minister, that intoxicating drinks had done them no harm!

On Easter Sunday evening, the wife of a poor drunkard residing close to my vicarage, went into the village to bring home her husband. The bar-room was filled with people, and there were six men covered with blood, from the wounds they had received, while fighting with each other; and her husband was one of them. During the week, he went again to the public-house, and asked to be trusted with some ale. The landlady said, he should not be, until he had paid the 2s. he owed her. The man was offended, and went home. He found his wife was there too, and sat down by her side, disconsolate. When she asked him what was the matter? he told her of the refusal of the landlady, and said, that if she would lend or borrow him 2s., he would go and pay his debt, and then sign the pledge—(Cheers). The poor woman said, "Where can I get 2s. from, for such a purpose; but I have been working all last night, and all day, and earned 2s., and that 2s. you shall have if you will go and pay your debt at the public-house, and sign the pledge." She watched him round the corner of the street, in which the secretary of the temperance society lives—went and paid the 2s., and by the time she returned, her husband was a teetotaler—(cheers)—and he remains a teetotaler;—(hear)—and last night, at the Rechabite tent, he was proposed for admission at the next meeting—(hear, hear.)

Another man was taken before the magistrates for quarrelling and fighting on Sunday evening. The magistrates reprimanded him very severely, but said, as it was the first offence, they would forgive him. On the very next Sunday evening, he was with the six men previously referred to, and received in the fight, such a black eye, that it was questionable whether he would ever recover his sight perfectly again. That man was waited upon by the secretary of the temperance society, and was persuaded to sign the pledge.

These cases showed the evil effects of Sunday-drinking, and that if the government would not prohibit the selling and buying of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath, teetotalism would. (Cheers).

In conclusion, he again pledged himself to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, and to do all he could, by his precept and example, to prevent intemperance in others. And to ministers and Sunday-school teachers, he said, take Father Mathew's pledge, and may God's blessing attend you. (Loud cheers.)

Rev. HOWARD HINTON, A.M., said he came to bear his testimony on behalf of the temperance society. He had long regarded intemperance, not only as a single spring of evil, the most copious and the most bitter of all the springs of evil which supply the deluge of mischief, by which human nature suffers, but as the parent of disease and vice, immorality and misery, and of domestic and social, temporal and eternal woe. If this mischief which had been wrought by intemperance, had been wrought by a rational, intelligent being, if indeed we can conceive of any intelligent being capable of producing such an amount of mischief—should we not attribute a degree of malignity to such a being, greater than that possessed by any being, except the chief of the lost spirits himself? There are, as every one knows, persons who do perpetrate mischief in the world, but no being upon this earth,—let his heart be ever so full of wickedness—could perform a thousandth part of the mischief perpetrated by intemperance, evils not the less because they are created and brought into existence, but by a set of habits, and course of proceedings, rather than by a person. If these enormities were committed by a person, would not efforts be put forth to arrest them? and should the mischiefs of intemperance not be treated as though wrought by a person or being; and should not the utmost exertions be used to prevent them?—(Cheers). So great had been the mischiefs occasioned by intemperance, that its name should be nothing short of Moloch.—(Cheers).

Regarding the temperance society as a great instrument for the advancement of the success of the gospel, he (Mr. Hinton) did look continually, and had looked for years upon its progress with the deepest interest.

He was comparatively a stranger to the meeting, in consequence of other occupations and engagements; he had given up one that evening on purpose to be there, and though he had no intention of making any address, yet if his testimony as a dissenting minister were of any importance, he was extremely happy in having an opportunity of giving it.—(Cheers.) He was grieved that the dissenting ministers as a body, did not give their influence to the temperance cause. He did not think, however, that the reproach which had been cast upon them, would conduce to their improvement in this respect; if they were not drawn, they would not be driven. Their assistance could only be obtained in connexion with their conviction of the truth of temperance principles; but he, (Mr. Hinton) did most sincerely regret that a power, capable of so wide and extensive an application, should be so slow in coming to the rescue.—(Cheers.) However, it was for them (the teetotalers) to work, and in a cause so intimately identified with humanity and religion, it was not for them to think that they could ultimately work in vain.—(Great cheering.)

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., on presenting himself to the meeting was received with three successive bursts of tremendous applause, and "one cheer more." He said,—ladies and gentlemen, I am quite sure, that if each individual here present, would take an earnest part in disseminating the principles of teetotalism, they could not fail very soon to make converts of a number of their neighbours, and the same spirit of zeal being infused into these, it is quite evident, by a very ready calculation, that our principles would soon be embraced by the whole of the population of this great and mighty empire. I believe that often as the cause of temperance has been discussed by us, and often as the evils of intemperance have been placed before us, we have not yet arrived at proper calculation and estimate of the great potency and magnitude of the evil of intemperance, for if we had, we should all have been more active and earnest in our endeavours to exterminate it. I believe there is still a lingering prejudice in favour of intoxicating beverages; and I do not think that all have arrived at the conclusion to which I have most firmly arrived—that every kind of intoxicating beverages is poisonous to the human constitution. If all had arrived at this conclusion, what could prevent us from taking the most energetic measures to remove the evil to which I have directed your attention. What does this intemperance beget? If we appeal to the judges of the land, they tell us that nine-tenths of all the criminals brought before them, are brought before them in consequence of the use of intoxicating beverages;—(hear, hear,) and if we appeal to our worthy friend, (Mr. Rotch,) and ask him what his experience is as a magistrate, he will tell us the same thing.

And as regards health,—has it not been remarked, with respect to the large prisons in the Metropolis, that though prisoners are brought there from every class of the community, who are addicted to habitual drinking, yet no bad effects have followed the change of diet, and the substitution of pure water for intoxicating liquors?—(Hear, hear.) If this be the case, are we not bound to conclude, that the use of these drinks is not at all events injurious?—(Hear, hear.) And I think we can prove from other sources, that the drinking of them is injurious. I have a farm on which I employ a great number of labourers in the hay season and at mowing time.

About fourteen years ago, I used to give these mowers and haymakers, what is called an allowance of intoxicating drinks; and I noticed that after they had performed their labour, they manifested great lassitude and weariness, and incapable of doing anything either with their minds or bodies.

Since I have joined the Temperance Society, I have given them no intoxicating beverages, and the consequence is, that the mowers after having been at work from four o'clock in the morning to eight o'clock at night—sixteen hours of hard labour—find that their strength is nearly as great when they have finished their day's work, as when they began.—(Hear, hear.) As a proof of this, I may observe, that last summer, after the haymakers and mowers had their suppers, I proposed that they should run a race round the plantation in my park. The proposition was received with great delight, and about a dozen of them joined in the race. I never saw fletcher running in my life: the man who won was a mower; though an Irishman vowed that he would have won the race if it had not been that he had eaten too hearty a supper.—(Laughter.) These are strong convincing proofs—stubborn facts which no one can deny. I could point to those coal-heavers as bearing testimony to the same effect, that intoxicating beverages do not give strength, but diminish strength. They not only diminish the power of the body, but they also diminish the power of the mind. Every drop of them is pernicious and injurious. How then can we believe that taking these poisons can make men perform their labour—make them more diligent and happy? We all know that intoxicating drinks have not done this; they have done just the contrary; while abstaining from them has been productive of nearly every good. It is said by many from the pulpit, that to be good and moral in this world is no security for happiness hereafter; but I never heard it affirmed by any clergyman or minister of the gospel, that being good and virtuous would exclude men from heaven.

Ladies and gentlemen, if persons abstain from intoxicating liquors, and if abstinence leads to morality, though they may not attain heaven hereafter, they are sure to have a heaven below; for there is a heaven on earth as well as a hell. The drunkard's cup leads to hell; the avoidance of it leads to heaven; and even if present advantages alone be gained by abstinence, is it not worth our while to put forth all our energies for the promotion of temperance? Be assured of this, my friends, that we have all the means for doing good to our fellow-creatures, and if these means are exerted, God's blessing will give success.

I remember hearing my friend, Mr. Rotch, relate on one occasion, a most pathetic story of a little child, who once used these simple infantile words,—“Father you w'nt go again to the public-house;” and the father said, “I will not;” and he did not go, but became a teetotaler. Here is an instance of what might be done if we were all earnest in the cause. Our nation is great and mighty; it stands conspicuous on the face of the earth; it is a city set upon a hill. We have, therefore, great power of doing good, not only to ourselves, but to all the inhabitants of the world. Let us then exert ourselves in this great cause—in this moral reformation, to which all other moral reformations belong. Let us avail ourselves of this great means of doing good, not only to ourselves individually and to our country, but also to all who dwell in the north and south, in the west and the east; and when the whole globe shall become perfectly sober, then I am sure that the blessing of God will crown us with a degree of happiness, which man has never yet contemplated.—(great applause.)

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The increasing business of the Provident Institution, as well as your own extended operations, rendering it impossible for me any longer to conduct the two institutions with satisfaction to myself, I have tendered my resignation as Secretary to the National Society, and now beg to acquaint you that my connexion with you will cease on the 25th June.

In resigning the appointment you have so recently renewed, I beg to thank you for the confidence reposed in me, and to express my earnest desire that the Society may continue in the independent, unambitious course which it has always been my wish it should maintain.

I am respectfully,

London, 28th May.

THEODORE COMPTON.

ANNIVERSARY MEETING.

The temperance cause certainly never witnessed a more satisfactory assemblage than that at Exeter Hall, on the 21st ultimo. The vast hall was thronged with people of all ranks and occupations. A considerable number of soldiers enlivened the view with their scarlet uniforms, whilst a regiment of coal-porters, in clean white smocks, attracted still more attention. The platform was crowded with the old friends of the cause, amongst whom were clergymen, ministers, medical men, bankers, merchants, lawyers, &c., &c.; whilst the chair was worthily filled by the son and heir-apparent of His Grace the Earl Marshal of England, supported on one side by a baron's brother, and on the other, by a county magistrate.

The assembly was the most orderly, the most unanimous, and the most attentive we ever witnessed. We particularly call attention to the brilliant speech of Mr. Rotch, to the important testimony of Dr. Gourley, a physician of standing and respectability, and to the explanations of Mr. Wilson, as to the plan of organization now pursuing by the society.

As this is the only paper containing a full report of the Exeter Hall meeting, and the speeches are of unusual interest, we recommend our readers to procure a few copies for distribution.

SUNDAY DRINKING.

It is very probable, that the observations made in the House of Lords, by various distinguished prelates, will have the effect of directing the attention of Her Majesty's government to the lamentable and extensive evil of the Sunday Traffic in strong drink.

To render deeper the impression already produced, should be the object of all the friends of Christian morality and temperance; and this can only be effected by the presentation of numerous petitions from every part of the kingdom.

We are enabled, by the courtesy of Mr. Hopwood, the Secretary of the British Association to present our readers with a copy of the letter he has received from the Bishop of Durham. It will, we are sure, be read with much satisfaction and delight.

4, Upper Portland Place, May 6th, 1846.

SIR,—You will see, by the Minutes of Parliamentary proceedings, which I forward by this post, that I have not failed to present the Petitions entrusted to me. I did more, for although no notice appears to have been taken by the reporters, I endeavoured to press the vast importance of the subject upon the consideration of the House; and I shewed, from the tables with which you furnished me, how much the partial, upon drinking on the Sunday, had tended to diminish the frequency and mischief of intemperance. I also expressed my readiness to assist in bringing in a bill to make that restriction extend throughout the kingdom, if I was assured I should have the support of Government, or if some Peer of weight and experience accustomed to draw bills.

I have since talked the matter over with some brother Bishops, who fear that nothing can be done effectually without the concurrence of government.

If, however, I see any opening, by which so desirable a measure can be carried into effect, you may be assured I will not neglect any favourable opportunity that may offer.

(Signed)

E. DURHAM.

WORLD'S CONVENTION.

THE ENTERTAINMENT OF FOREIGN DELEGATES is a subject which, though referred to in a former number, we feel bound to press upon the earnest attention of our friends, who reside in or near this metropolis.

Many of the delegates will come 3000 or 4000 miles to attend the Convention. The expenses of their voyage, &c., must therefore be considerable, even with the strictest economy:—is it reasonable that these expenses should be increased by their being compelled to board at hotels and lodging houses? We therefore put this question to each friend of the cause in London—"How many foreign delegates are you willing to board and find beds for?" It is very desirable that replies should be forwarded at an EARLY period, addressed to the office, 39, Moorgate-street.

To prevent any misunderstanding, all parties will consider, that this engagement is only undertaken for the time, dating from the arrival of the delegates to the close of the sittings of the Temperance Convention.

ALL SOCIETIES IN GREAT BRITAIN, will, we doubt not, be ready to contribute to the necessary expenses attending the Convention. These will embrace, the hiring of a place suitable for the dispatch of business—the holding of large public meetings in various parts of London—the insertion of the proceedings of the Convention in all the newspapers and magazines in the empire, together with various plans of great importance; to execute which effectually, will demand an outlay of money to be met only by the liberal contributions of the Societies of this kingdom.

Up to the present period every thing augurs well:—circulars have been dispatched to all parts of the globe, and responded to with delight; the preliminary arrangements have been made; before another Chronicle is published the American delegates will be on their way to our shores. To retrograde is impossible; and is it not equally impossible, that the teetotalers of Great Britain will allow the enterprise even partially to fail for want of that support which they can so easily afford! The following subscriptions have been already received:—Mr. Bull £1; Dr. Mastalier £1; Alton Society £4; York Society £5.

THE BUSINESS MEETINGS of the Convention will be held in the Theatre of the city of London Literary and Scientific Institution, Aldersgate-street, near the General Post-office.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE, as announced in our last number, has been engaged for a great meeting on Friday Evening, August 7th. Tickets of admission will be ready by the 1st of July, and may be procured at the office, 39, Moorgate-street, on and after that date, at the following prices:—Dress Boxes 2s., Second Tier 1s. 6d., Third Tier 1s. 6d., Pit 1s., Stage 1s., Lower Gallery, 6d., Upper Gallery 3d.

P. S. Foreign delegates on their arrival in London, will please to report themselves at 39, Moorgate-street, near the Bank of England.

The Balance.

"WEIGHED IN THE BALANCES AND FOUND WANTING."

OBJECTION VI.

"ABSTINENCE FROM INTOXICATING LIQUORS IS A SPECIES OF SELF-DENIAL NOT REQUIRED BY SOCIETY, AND NOT DEMANDED BY THE WORD OF GOD."

The usual meaning attached to "self-denial," is a renunciation of something good in itself for the attainment of some greater good; and this greater good may have respect either to a particular individual, or to society in general. The man who subjects himself to numberless austerities, rejecting many of the bounties of Providence, and subsisting on coarse and scanty food, in order to obtain an entrance into heaven, practises self-denial for himself; and so he, who abstains from any good in order to benefit mankind, practises self-denial for others, and proves himself a true philanthropist, or lover of his race. Every one will admit that self-denial is justifiable; but may not circumstances arise in which it becomes a positive duty?

Were a pestilence raging through the land, and were it in the power of one individual to arrest its progress by an act of self-denial—by the abandonment of something not essential, but yet really good in itself—would not society require, and the Christian religion demand, that he should make the sacrifice, and that speedily? Would not the duty of the one individual in the case supposed be the duty of the multitude in similar circumstances? There can scarcely be a difference of opinion upon the subject.

Applying these remarks to diet, the following principle is deducible—that,

IF AN ARTICLE OF DIET BE NOT STRICTLY NECESSARY, AND IF THE INJURIES RESULTING TO SOCIETY FROM ITS ABUSE EXCEED THE AMOUNT OF BENEFIT DERIVED FROM ITS USE, IT BECOMES THE DUTY OF EACH MEMBER OF SOCIETY TO ABANDON ITS USE ALTOGETHER.

This principle is clearly in accordance with that laid down by Paul, where he declares, that it is "NOT GOOD" to eat or drink anything by which our brethren stumble, or are offended, or are made weak. And acting upon this rule, the same apostle declared, that if eating flesh meat (a good thing in itself,) caused his brother to offend, he would not eat any more flesh meat so long as the world stood!

How then are these observations applicable to intoxicating liquors?

Avoiding entirely the question as to the injurious properties of alcoholic drinks, who will contend that their use is absolutely necessary?

And if not necessary, we ask then—Are the physical benefits derivable from their use, at all to be compared with the mental, moral, and religious evils connected with their abuse?

Is a glass of “stimulation” or even a “mess of pottage” to be preferred before the eternal interests of millions of those who are “bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh?”

To the Christian, and to the Christian minister, this subject speaks in language the most solemn. On the one hand there is appetite, and on the other hand duty;—duty which arises from his social, civil, and religious relations—and duty which is inextricably connected with his enormous and ever increasing responsibilities.

We would entreat the earnest attention of the reader to the admonitions of the HON. and REV. BAPTIST NOEL:—

“There is no zeal, no faithfulness, no pity, if we can see the wicked die, and refuse to save them. If a man were placed among a spirit-drinking population, where he saw thousands hurried down to death by that vice, it would be his plain, undeniable duty to abstain. And if he lived among a population where it was not spirits, nor wine, but beer which was hurrying people to misery in time and eternity, it would clearly be his duty, according to the apostolic example, totally to abstain from beer. If we, as the disciples of Christ, are really anxious to convey blessings to the degraded, we must, we are absolutely bound to set them an example in this matter.”

We shall weigh in our next No. the Seventh Objection—“Temperance degrades itself into the place of the Gospel, and assumes the office of religion.”

Reviews.

THE CONTRAST.

A well-executed engraving has recently been published at Newcastle-on-Tyne, containing views of The Home of the Temperate, and the Home of the Intemperate. The plate is by W. B. Scott, and is inscribed to the Newcastle Temperance Society, “the profits to be applied to charitable purposes.” We rejoice to see the fine arts enlisted in the ranks of temperance. What attracts the eye, according to the Latin poet, has more effect than what is only heard of. In the picture before us, the Home of the Temperate, is a scene of domestic felicity, which appeals to the heart; the home of the drunkard is painful to look upon. Both views are free from exaggeration and vulgarity, which must greatly add to their effect. As a criticism would be incomplete without finding fault, we will pick one or two holes in the picture:—the hour-hand of the clock points to eight, the man has just come home from work, and is dandling the baby. Ought not the baby to be in bed, and the papa rocking the cradle? The ham, which is hanging over the mantle-piece, is too lean, either for a Northumberland pig, or a teetotaler’s cottage. The man is about to sup off——is it a cheese or a sirloin of beef? And the can at his feet—what does it contain? If these are the only faults we can find, the artist may be well satisfied, and the public too. We are glad to see the temperate man a reader. He has a bound book lying on his knee, while he amuses the children. He is also a walker,—for his wife is darning some formidable holes in his stockings. The fire burns brightly, and the kitten is at play. God speed the temperance man, and give him health, peace and competence!

Orders (we understand) may be forwarded to Charles Gilpin, 5, Bishopsgate Street, London, or to Thomas P. Barkas, Grainger Street, Newcastle.

YOUTHS’ NATIONAL TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE.—We have already noticed this little publication, and do so again with pleasure. It is unassuming, and written in a good spirit. We cordially recommend it to our young friends.

LIVESEY’S MALT LECTURE.—We are delighted to see this admirable lecture republished in a popular form; and for the price of 1d. We know of no other pamphlet on the temperance question more calculated,—and in many particulars none so calculated—to carry conviction into the minds of the middle and working classes.

We hope to see many large editions printed and circulated in a short space of time.

THE WATER CURE.

It must be obvious to every one that a stimulant which can, if necessary, be applied over the whole surface of the body at once, must be more powerful in its general effect on the constitution, than one which from its nature admits only of a circumscribed local application, and thus walking in a pure country air, and bathing in pure temperate water, must have a more wholesome stimulating effect on the system, than little drops of alcohol retailed to the stomach, in whatever disguise they may be administered, whether as ardent spirits, wine or beer. If persons who feel low and nervous from no particular ailment, but merely from having a constitution naturally below par, would only accustom themselves to a tepid shower bath once a-day, and would walk out in the country air for an hour every morning, one-half of their depressed feelings would be gone in a month; and this leads me to a very important point in the use of the shower bath, an application of water, which is frequently recommended by medical men, without any real philosophical knowledge of its modus operandi. In the first place, there are very few cases in which it is desirable that the head of the patient should be under the shower, a point which is scarcely ever considered even when the shower bath is prescribed. The descent of the water from above, carries down the air inclosed within the curtains, and leaves a vacuum, or at any rate a space nearly exhausted of air, in which the head remains without air to breathe, and thus the patient is nearly stifled, gasps for breath, and blames the water as the cause of the misery, instead of the doctor, who did not specially order the head to be kept out of the bath during the operation.

EXETER HALL MEETING.

Dr. GOURLEY of Madeley, said, I never drank a glass of wine or spirits in my life; I never drank a pint of ale at one sitting; I have never been one hour ill, and I have a constitution capable of bearing as much fatigue as any man. The human body is the most complicated piece of machinery of any animal on the face of the earth. It requires nourishment when exhausted, and rest when fatigued. Give it these, and you give it fair play; reverse this order of nature, and you do not give it fair play.

What kind of nutriment should be given to the human body? Chemists have analysed the tissues and have found that they contain a larger amount of nitrogen than of any other element; therefore nitrogen must be contained in substances that nourish.

Another element is carbon, and this is required for the production of animal heat. Ordinary food contains a sufficient quantity of these elementary principles; but intoxicating drinks contain very little of the first principle, viz., that of nitrogen. The injurious properties of intoxicating liquors are of several kinds. The first is that of stimulation. Alcoholic drinks stimulate the system, and so make the powers of life go faster than they otherwise would do; and upon this simple principle, they bring old age and death. The faster the clock goes the sooner it runs down; and upon the same principle stimulation shortens life—(loud cheers). The effect of this stimulation may be easily calculated. The pulse of a child when born, beats 140 in a minute, and if a person lives to four-score, the pulse lessens to perhaps about 40 a minute. Over stimulation will increase the number of pulsations, and thus the system will soon be worn out; sooner than would follow in the course of nature. But there is another consideration;—supposing there is a latent disease in the constitution, this extraordinary stimulus, this unusual unnatural stimulus will find out, and work it out, and in that way destroy the system—(cheers).

Mr. John Abernethy once said, that he never saw a healthy man in London; they "swilled so much beer and other intoxicating drinks." When God constructed the human body, he made it consisting of about 248 bones, and 200 joints, and supplied it with blood of a pure kind, and intended that this blood should be sent through the system at a proper rate; but intoxicating drinks stimulate the blood and send it through the system at an improper rate, creating thereby, numerous disorders. This is not however the only injurious influence which alcohol exerts upon the physical system. When it is taken it is mixed with the food in the process of mastication, and then descends into the stomach, when its first action upon the delicate coats of that organ, is that of local inflammation; and however limited, or however extensive, inflammation is a disease. This inflammation extends to the brain. You need not therefore wonder when you see a man reeling too and fro under the effects of alcohol. The poor fellow has got a quantity of blood charged with charcoal sent to his brain with unnatural rapidity. Need we wonder then at his staggering gait? His nervous system is affected; the brain, the organ of the mind, is diseased.

Alcohol then let it be remembered, cannot nourish, it cannot assimilate with the body, it over stimulates the blood, destroying the balance of the physical system; it aids and assists latent disease—it inflames the stomach and the brain, and when taken to excess, dethrones even reason itself. I most readily support the resolution—(great applause).

SAMUEL BOWLY, Esq., said it was his lot that night to be reduced to the state of a public beggar, for he rose for the purpose of saying a word or two on behalf of the institution whose anniversary that meeting commemorated. Its funds were nearly exhausted, and its usefulness must be materially curtailed, unless the friends of the temperance cause came liberally forward in its aid. He thought, however, that the best advocate that could have been chosen, was not a man in broad cloth, but a poor disconsolate heart-broken drunkard's wife and his miserable children—(hear, hear, and cheers). It was not on the ground of benevolence, merely that people should give towards the National Society; they might do it on the ground of mere selfishness. He would illustrate by a fact or two how he would apply that principle. It was his lot to live very near a man of the name of Chamberlain, who had been in very respectable circumstances, but every thing had gone in intoxicating drinks, and the result was, that his family were running about his (Mr. Bowly's) door without shoes, using the very worst language, and never going to school or receiving any sort of education. Very frequently he (Mr. Bowly) had stated, he verily believed, that such children as these would become occupants of jails, give employment to magistrates and judges, and become a most serious tax upon the community. Very lately he had been drawing up a memorial to Sir James Graham, on behalf of three children in Gloucester jail, who were condemned by the recorder to various periods of imprisonment, and one to be three times, another twice, and another once whipped. And he (Mr. Bowly) found on inquiry, that the instrument with which these children were to be whipped—one only 11 years of age—was a common cat-o'-nine-tails, applied upon their bare bodies. The memorial was unsuccessful; one whipping that child 11 years of age had received already, and two more yet remained to be administered, and that was the very boy whom he had often predicted would occupy that place, and whom he once found in the streets of Gloucester with a broken head, caused by the ill-treatment of his own father.

He appealed to the meeting, and he trusted always to impress the community with the importance of preventing juvenile crime, instead of punishing it—(Cheers.) What, he would ask, was to be expected from the application of the cat-o'-nine-tails to a poor unfortunate youth who had been as regularly trained to vice by a drunken father, as his children had been trained to virtue? By drawing the blood from his little back, did they draw out of him the vicious principles which that parent's instruction had instilled into him? Why, the man (Chamberlain) when he was in his (Mr. Bowly's) employ, was a teetotaler, and for that short time, he became improved in his condition, better in his health, less violent in his language; he became a better father; and if he had only kept the pledge, his children instead of running about the street, would have been sent to school.

He (Mr. Bowly) would say that in his humble opinion, Sir James Graham would be doing far more to fulfil the highly responsible duties of Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he brought in a bill for the prevention of crime, instead of making long speeches in his place in Parliament, for the enactment of laws to punish it when it had been committed.—(Immense cheering.)

Some people seemed to imagine that because they do not come in contact with drunkenness, they have no influence in preventing intemperance;—no such thing. The highest and the lowest have their sphere of usefulness. Would not Sir Robert Peel, who had pleaded so ably for cheap food, be doing immense service, if he advocated as eloquently against dear and unwholesome drink?—(cheers) We have all our sphere of influence. The minister of state and the lowest among us has a sphere of influence, which it is very important for him to exercise.

Allusion had been made to the soldiers who were there to-night. They (the soldiers) knew from the shape of his coat, as he did from the colour of theirs, that their opinions did not coincide.—(Loud cheers.) He abominated war;—(renewed cheers) but there was no reason that he knew of, why something good should not subsist in a bad system. He would put the question—whether they all had done their duty? Every man had a duty to perform in the army; every man had a duty to perform in society; what would the great generals who are in India have thought, if some men were to say, "Very well, you go to fight and we will stay by the baggage." Yet, such was the conduct of the moderate drinker, as if he said, "It is all right for you to advocate the temperance cause, but I like a little drop myself." A great deal had been said about intemperance. In his opinion, the key stone of the evil was moderate drinking.—(great cheering)—respectable drinking!—(Repeated cheers.) Teetotalism is either right or it is wrong. If right, why not support it? If wrong, why not come and tell them so? A man, perhaps, would give a sovereign to the Temperance Society, and might wish it God speed; but he did far more than a sovereign's worth of harm when he drank half a glass of wine.—(Hear, hear.) It is such practices, and not drunkenness, which keep up the system of drinking. What is required, is to put down the custom; and he (Mr. Bowly) believed that the reason why people did not come to their meetings, was because they were afraid to be convicted;—they had not moral courage to come out. He might mention another circumstance to show the connexion between the depravity and degradation of the country and intoxicating drinks. As chairman of a gas company in the city in which he lived, he happened to be seeing the other day about the pulling down of a large pile of buildings, occupied as lodging-houses by the most degraded class of persons. They (the meeting) could judge of the sort of furniture in the rooms, when he told them, that the beds sold for 3s. 6d. a-piece, and really he thought the live stock would not have gone for much more.—(Loud laughter.) All the respectable neighbours rejoiced at the pulling down of these houses. Not so the landlords. They were the exception; one of them confessed that they were his best customers; he could not tell how many bottles of spirits he had sold to them on Sunday morning. This shows the existence between immorality and intoxicating drinks. But he was going too far into the field, his object was to plead for funds of the National Temperance Society; and if only on the ground of people's own safety, they should contribute towards that institution.

A policeman of Gloucester met him lately, and knowing him to be the chairman of the Birmingham and Gloster Railway, laid before him the case of an engine driver, who was found entirely incapacitated for his duties, reeling almost drunk. He, however, went to guide a train in the middle of a dark night, when no one could detect his condition; he was just able to stand upright, and in that state of intoxication, took charge of several scores of immortal souls. If persons wanted to travel in safety, they must have teetotal drivers;—(cheers) but if they had teetotal drivers, they must have teetotal policemen; if teetotal policemen, then teetotal clerks; if teetotal clerks, then teetotal secretaries; and if teetotal secretaries, then teetotal directors.

He must confess that he was surprised at the number of professing christians, and benevolent people in this country, forming an influential class of society, who seeing the immense good this society accomplished, did not come forward to assist by their example and influence. He trusted, at any rate, that they (the teetotalers) who were so fully convinced upon this subject, would come forward that night to show their zeal, particularly by giving their money to the cause.—(Loud cheers.)

The third resolution was put from the chair, and unanimously adopted—"That the labours of the Metropolitan Temperance Missionaries have more than confirmed previous accounts of the moral degradation existing in the Metropolis; and that, whilst this meeting learns with great satisfaction, the amount of good already effected, it earnestly desires the increased support of this important branch of the Society's operations." The collection was then made, amounting to £35. 2s. 6d.

Rev. B. PARSONS, author of 'Anti-Bacchus,' said, The resolution I hold in my hands is the following:—"That this meeting cordially approves of the determination of the National Society, to hold a World's Convention in August next; and in the conviction that the celebration of such an event will tend to the advance of temperance throughout the world, calls upon every friend of sobriety, to assist in giving full effect to this important enterprise." My lord, I look on the Convention that is about to be held, as one of the most important assemblies which has ever been held in this world of ours; and I think it would be very easy to prove it, if we only consider that for want of a Temperance Convention, almost every other Convention that has been held, has been thought to have failed to a great extent.

We read of old, of councils of the church, but although at these councils, men assembled from all parts of the world, many of them doubtless drawn together from the most benevolent motives; yet among all these councils and convocations, there had never been a Total Abstinence Convention. And whatever laws or resolutions, or determinations, these councils and convocations have entered into, they have generally failed in their practical effect, and why? because they have been counteracted by the influence of strong drink. I might also say, that I look upon this Convention which is about to be held, as more important than the meetings of those august assemblies, in one of which your lordship has a seat; and for this very reason, that while our legislators have worked hard, sometimes so hard, my lord, that in passing short-hour bills for others, I have thought you had forgotten yourselves; while the houses of lords and commons have worked hard in different ages, first in making laws, and then in unmaking them;—yet I believe that though our legislators were angels, if they legislated for a drunken people, their laws, even if the best which could possibly be enacted, would be found to fail in their influence upon society.—(Cheers.)

I would say further, that I came from my own town, for the purpose of being present at your May meetings; and I have been delighted with many of these meetings, though I am afraid that there is not so much spirit in them this year as there was some years ago. I am really afraid that we have not so many great spirits in the country as we had some years past. And the reason of this has been afforded by Dr. Gourley, who stated that the drinking of intoxicating liquors by whipping up the system leads to greater depression. Now the spirits of the country have been so whipped up, that they are beginning universally to flag. I do think, that if we had a country of teetotalers, we should have an age of great spirits, who would throw the spirits of other ages entirely into the shade.—(Cheers.) I will tell you why I say so. I found formerly when I drank intoxicating liquors, that though they whipped me up for a little, yet I afterwards became so depressed, that sometimes I could not do anything but weep; and I have cried for two hours together, without having anything to cry about.—(Laughter.) But now, I thank God every Sabbath evening, for total abstinence.—(hear,) and why? because, when I was a moderate drinker, I was almost dead when the Sabbath evening came; but now, when the Sabbath evening comes, although I do much more work than formerly, I am not more tired, and sometimes not so much as when I commenced my work in the morning.—(Cheers.)

Well, I was just saying, that I look upon the Convention about to be held, as one of the most important of all our meetings; and why? because a great number of those societies which hold their anniversaries in May, are constituted to counteract the influence of intemperance; and therefore if all the people were sober, they would be unnecessary.

There are others which are necessary and these would be benefited by the promotion of temperance. We should never hear any complaint from these societies of want of men or means, were not the means of support destroyed by intoxicating drinks.—(Cheers.) When an emigrant goes to America, or to some of the uncultivated parts of Australia, he may take with him the best cattle this country can produce, and the finest seed he can procure; but he has before him a forest, and what would you think of him if he were to sow his seed in the forest, and then expect to have a harvest? He must first plough up the ground, then cast in the seed, and a glorious harvest will follow. We have the ministers of religion, and they sow in the country and in London, but they are sowing in a forest—a forest of gin-palaces and ale-houses—(great applause,) these must first be cleared, and then if the seed is sown there will be a harvest.—(Cheers.)

If then we could get the whole nation to sign the teetotal pledge, all the places for the selling or making of intoxicating liquors would be shut up directly. We do not accuse all those engaged in the traffic, with being influenced by malevolent motives. We admit there are benevolent men among them,—(cheers), but I do believe, though they were the most benevolent persons that ever lived, that if they found people would not buy beer and spirits, they would cease to brew and cease to distil.—(Cheers.) Consequently, the nation has only to sign the pledge, and gin-palaces and ale-houses can be turned into mechanics and literary institutions, and breweries and distilleries into churches and chapels.—(Cheers.) With then, this impression on my mind, that the Convention will be one of the most important meetings ever held in this country, and is calculated to benefit every good and important society that exists, I beg most cordially to move this resolution.

I have employed my pen in the cause of teetotalism—(cheers), and I intend more than ever to employ my pen in that cause—(loud cheers), and therefore it is not necessary that I should show my face on this platform to prove that I am a friend to temperance. I have lectured, by the permission of the managers, in Zion Chapel, Whitechapel, one of the largest Chapels in London, seating from three to four thousand persons; and should the Convention wish to hold a meeting in the east as well as in the west—and why should it not travel from west to east?—I have no doubt but that by applying to the managers it may be obtained—(great applause)

JOSEPH STURGE, ESQ., said he could bear his testimony to the good effects of temperance. He had been a teetotaler for 19 years, and had tried the principle under every variety of climates, and under various circumstances, and could therefore witness to its beneficial influence upon his health. He had felt a little diffidence in seconding the resolution in his hand, not knowing whether slave-holders from America would be admitted to sit at the Convention. If Americans were received, who while knocking off the chains of intemperance were rivetting the chains of slavery on 3,000,000 of human beings,—he must say with all respect, that he could not belong to the Convention, and the £50 he intended giving to that object, he would apply to other purposes connected with temperance.

Mr. FREDERICK DOUGLAS (formerly a slave in Maryland, from which state he escaped to that of Massachusetts) was received with immense applause. He spoke as follows:—Ladies and gentlemen, I experience great pleasure in having an opportunity of bearing my testimony in favour of the great object which we have gathered this evening to promote. I feel it a pleasure and a privilege to stand on this platform, from causes of which you are probably not aware. I have only been a short time from the United States of America, and in that country, although there is much liberty in some things, there is very little towards persons of my colour; so that although I have been a teetotaler for she last eight years, I have seldom had the privilege of standing before any white audience to bear my testimony in favour of that glorious cause; not in consequence of my want of devotion to the great principle of temperance—not in consequence of any blot which existed upon my moral, or religious, or even intellectual character, but merely on the score of God's having given me a complexion a little darker than their own—(cries of shame). I rejoice in now having that privilege—(hear, hear); and I think that if my presence here will do no other good, it will have the effect—borne, as it will be on the wings of the press, of rebuking the prejudices of the American slaveholders—(tremendous cheering). In the United States, although they have opportunities sufficient, of witnessing in the coloured people all these peculiarities which are common to the human family, they seem not yet to have learned the fact so well as you have learned it, that a negro is a man—(immense and universal cheering). I am a teetotaler, and I am so because I would elevate my race from the degradation into which they have been cast by slavery and other circumstances.

I am pledged against the use of ardent spirits, because they have the same effect upon a black man that they produce upon a white man.—(laughter and cheers.) And I would tell my American brethren from Exeter Hall, London, that if I had no other evidence of my perfect identity with the human family, than the fact, that these liquors make a black man drunk in common with a white man, it would be sufficient to perpetuate all the pretensions I have ever had to my equal humanity.—(loud applause.)

I have been for the last seven years warmly engaged in advocating, in the United States of America, the emancipation from physical fetters, of 3,000,000 of my brethren, who there lie crushed beneath the heel of the oppressor. I have been engaged in doing this, and one great obstacle I have met with, has been the fact, that some of the coloured people who have been redeemed from their chains, they have not made a good use of their freedom. I found, therefore, that in seeking to attain the object of my heart—the emancipation of my race from slavery—that I must also labour for the mental, moral, and religious elevation of those who had gained their freedom.—(hear, hear.)

Many of the coloured people of the United States saw this; many of them set about the work; and although they were excluded from all respectable places and halls where temperance men were assembled, and although they were disheartened and discouraged by the coldness manifested towards them, yet they saw a life, they saw a power in the principle which was being advocated by the total abstinence men, which, if adopted on their part, would raise them to a moral and virtuous eminence, from which they would be enabled to look down upon those who were binding them with chains and fetters!—(Great cheering.) In Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Baltimore, and other large cities, towns, and villages all over the country, they organised Total Abstinence Societies among themselves, giving lectures in their own feeble way; and by these means a deep impression was made upon their northern brethren, particularly in Philadelphia. But they had not only the indifference and the coldness of their white brethren to contend with; not only had they popular prejudice to encounter, but even direct opposition and persecution. [Mr. Douglas here gave at length a relation of the Philadelphia riots in 1842; when a temperance procession of coloured people, on the 1st of August, was broken up and dispersed by a violent and brutal mob, their chapels and temperance halls burnt, and hundreds of men, women, and children driven out of the city where they had to remain without shelter.] These are some of the difficulties (continued the speaker) with which the temperance movement among the coloured people had to contend in the United States; many more might be instanced; but I place these facts before you to make the American people feel ashamed of this kind of conduct.—(Loud applause.)

But I must inform you, that these obstacles are about to be taken out of the way of the coloured people of the Northern States; especially are they beginning to be somewhat interested in their education and sobriety. For this I wish to give credit to whom credit is due. There is a large and growing band of determined and inflexible abolitionists in the United States,—(cheers) who are determined that justice shall be given to the down-trodden bondmen. But more strictly as regards temperance, I consider sometimes that I have a right to speak on this question, for I was once fond of a little drop occasionally,—(laughter) and when I have been indulging in this way, I have also felt myself to be some very great man—something like a governor or a president. However, I did not continue long in these practices; and I have been able, by the blessing of God, for the last seven years, to steer entirely clear of them. But, allow me to say, that ever since I came to this country, I have been subject to great temptations;—(hear, hear,) and from quarters from which I ought not to have been thus subjected.—(Hear, hear.) If in going through the streets of London, I saw a man drunk, so far as his example went it would only serve to disgust me; but when I go into the society of the respectable, of influential, of intellectual and pious men, and see them raise the intoxicating bowl to their lips, then it is that my strength is tested. Not long since when in Scotland, I was invited to dine with six distinguished ministers of religion. I sat near the side of a venerable gentleman; the conversation was of the most refined and religious character; when at length, as is the custom in Scotland, the whiskey glass was brought on the table. I then found it hard for me to bear my testimony.—(hear, hear.) Well, the decanters were passed to me: I did not attempt to touch them.—(Cheers.) When they came in front of me they stopped, although a lady at my side expected to see them passed on. All eyes were fixed upon me. The ministering brethren seemed to feel some confusion at my refusing to touch the wine, and said, "Why, are you a teetotaler?" I replied, "I am,"—(Great cheering) and added, that at night I had to give a temperance lecture in that town. I don't wish to name the town, for the good reason that there are so very few ministers there, that every one would know to whom I refer, and I do not wish to abuse the hospitality which was extended to me by those excellent men.—(Loud applause.)

I went to lecture at the meeting that evening, and in reflecting upon the example which had been set me by those learned and wise and reverend gentlemen, I thought I could not do better than call attention to the responsibilities of ministers. I went to the meeting, and I took the ground that all will admit to be a safe and correct one, that he who has it in his power to prevent the commission of crime, and does not exert that power, is to a considerable extent responsible for the existence of that crime.—(Cheers.) I took the ground which I believe is perfectly tenable, that the pulpit of Scotland and the pulpit of England, (hear, hear,) is to a considerable extent responsible for the existence of the drinking customs of society.—(Immense cheering.) I would not say that they are the drunkard makers, as some hot-headed persons have said; I would not say that one particular class of men are entirely responsible for the existence of intemperance in this country or in any country. But I am here to say, that all drunkenness is traceable to the drinking system of society, and it is against that system that we wage war. We find that Scotland and England are to a considerable extent identified with this system, and as we look upon the ministers of religion, as the embodiment of virtue and piety, and of the loftiest morality, to whom should we apply but to them, for assistance in the temperance cause?—(Loud cheering.)

We never made any progress in the United States until we got the ministers interested. In the state of Massachusetts they are particularly interested, and so great is the demand for temperance on the part of the people, that no minister would be allowed to preach who used intoxicating drinks—(great applause). In many of the western counties of that state, a man, even if he had all the riches of England could not buy enough alcohol to make him drunk—(cheers). They don't sell it in three or four of the western counties. In the town of —, in the year 1838, you might have seen a drunken man at almost every corner, and now there is not one. In 1844, the jail was entirely filled, and the work-house was entirely filled, and the alms-house was entirely filled; whereas the last reports tell that all these places are almost entirely empty. This is in consequence of the glorious temperance movement—(great applause).

The third resolution was then unanimously carried.

W. CASH, Esq., said he would not detain the meeting longer than by moving this resolution:—"That the candid thanks of this meeting be presented to the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, M. P. for his courtesy in becoming a Vice-president of the National Temperance Society, and for his kindness in taking the chair upon this occasion."

RICHARD POTTER, Esq., expressed his entire concurrence in the resolution. He was much pleased with the aspect of the meeting. They had the legislator and the slave, clergymen and dissenting ministers, the man of letters and the man of physical toil, all attending to give their countenance to the temperance cause—(hear, hear).

The resolution was then carried with long continued acclamation.

The EARL OF ARUNDEL in returning thanks, said he thought some of the speakers had borne rather hard upon the legislature. It was no easy thing to legislate for this great Empire; and however right their views as the friends of temperance were, they could hardly expect that the government should make laws to suit the opinions of a minority in the state. However important the subject of temperance might be, he would remind them of something that was of still greater importance, and that was charity. "With this sentiment," said the noble lord, "I wish you good night."

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

ABSTRACT.

(From the Annual Report.)

From April 1st, 1845, to April 1st, 1846.

The number of drunkards spoken to in the streets, and accompanied home, is	3167
Gentlemen's Servants addressed, 1661;
Drovers, 637; Cabmen, 1142	3,440
Groups found congregated in the streets, and addressed	7,239
Drunkards visited at home	1500
Families visited	19,229
Re-visits to persons and families	11,895

The number of drunkards who have signed the pledge is, 922; drunkards who have renewed the pledge, 288—total, 1210; other persons who have signed, 2025; renewed, 277—total, 2,302	3,512
The number of tracts distributed, due care being taken to use discrimination	46,707
The families visited have been 19,229; of these, there are without Bibles	3,702
Assuming the number of persons present at each visit to have been 5, the total number visited will be	96,145
Of these, the number of persons above 5 years of age, who cannot read, is	12,772
And the number not attending any place of worship	10,018
The number of persons who are known to have attended temperance meetings, through the persuasion of the missionaries, is	1,635
Members transferred to the various Societies in the Metropolis	1,487

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

[The incidental benefits resulting from the Mission have been of a highly pleasing description. The following letter addressed to the superintendent, affords a striking example.]

HONOURED SIR,—I beg to express through you my hearty thanks to the Committee of the National Temperance Society, whose missionary has been the means of conferring upon me invaluable blessings. Last August, I left the service of a nobleman's family in Suffolk, and came to London. Being a stranger, and having no friends, I unhappily fell into the hands of a female, (a drunkard) who induced me to accompany her home, and contrived, by false pretences, to obtain all my money and clothes, till I had just sufficient left to cover me.

In this state I was found by your missionary. There was nothing in the room but a little straw on which I lay at night, and I was without fire or food: the landlord of the room threatening to force me out into the streets.

But, while sinking under hunger and cold, the missionary kindly relieved me,—procured me some clothes, and obtained for me an admission into the Refuge for the Destitute, where I received the greatest kindness, and by whose recommendation, I am now in a comfortable situation. I was never more happy in my life. Not a night passes, but I bless God for the hour I first saw your missionary, for whom I have the greatest respect, and but for whom, I might now have been in the grave.

Please, therefore, to accept my heartfelt thanks, which are due to all who support your glorious institution.

Your humble servant,
MARY COOK.

BEERSHOPS.

(Thursday, April 30th.)

MR. M. PHILLIPS referred to a petition from certain beer-sellers, and inquired what were the intentions of the government?

Sir J. GRAHAM admitted the receipt of a memorial on the subject. The house was aware, that for the convenience of travellers, licensed victuallers were allowed to keep their houses open all night. The keepers of beer-shops asked for the same privilege; and it was obvious that if it were granted, the consequences would be the drinking of beer without restraint.

He could not hold out the smallest expectation that he would be any party to such an alteration of the law.—(cheers.)

RAILWAY LABOURERS.

(Same Day.)

HON. E. P. BOUVERIE moved for a select committee to inquire into the condition of the labourers employed in the construction of railways and other public works; and into the remedies which may be calculated to lessen the particular evils (if any) of that condition.

Mr. EWART seconded the motion.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM concurred in the motion. He agreed that the men should be protected from any injurious effects of the truck system.

Mr. WAKELY opposed the motion.

Mr. AGLIONBY, Mr. MANGLES, Sir G. GREY, Dr. BOWRING, and other members supported the motion, which was agreed to. We sincerely trust that the payment of wages at public-houses, and the numerous inducements held out to intemperance among the railway-labourers, will receive the earnest attention of the committee, and that such remedies may be suggested as will strike at the very root of the evil.

SUNDAY DRINKING.

The BISHOP OF RIXON presented petitions from Huddersfield and other places, praying for restrictions on the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday.

The BISHOP OF ST. DAVIDS in presenting petitions to the same effect said, he had hoped that ere this the house would have heard that the Government were prepared to bring in a bill in conformity with the numerous petitions which had been pouring in for a number of years.

LORD KINNAIRD said he was willing to assist in putting a stop to the sale of spirituous liquors on Sunday, but he thought that it would be a most difficult thing to accomplish.

The BISHOP OF ST. DAVIDS did not think the task would be so difficult as the noble lord seemed to imagine. The conversation then dropped.

Intelligence.

LONDON.

MARYLEBONE WORKHOUSE.—The report of this establishment states, that the cost of table beer alone, for the last six months, was £367 8s. 0d., or £1 2s. per puncheon, making a weekly consumption of about 900 gallons. For porter during the same time, £146 6s. was expended, and for ale, £41, making a total expenditure of £554 14s. for intoxicating liquors, found, of course, by the tax-payers of Marylebone.

[For the above facts, we are indebted to the secretary of the Sheerness Society, who extracted them from the Times.]

Short pieces from the public prints, bearing upon the temperance subject, will always be acceptable.]

THE UNITED MILITARY TEETOTAL SOCIETY.—Fourteen of the brigade of Guards, formed the above society on the 3rd of June, 1845; since which period, we have received upwards of 400 signatures. We have, in the mean time, sixty payable members. We have great cause for congratulation, as regards our labour among several of the teetotal societies in the metropolis; our advocacy never having been in vain.

N. T. BAKER, Sec.

SOUTH WALES.

MERTHYR TYDVIL.—This town is situated in an extensive mineral and colliery district, where drunkenness prevails to an awful extent.

The cause of teetotalism here, has been in a low and declining state, for some time past, although it is calculated to have above one thousand members in its society. The only reason we can assign for this backwardness in its members, is the want of that zeal and unity which was manifested a few years ago; yet we do not despair, for there is a prospect of a revival, under the influence of the committee and its agents, and a determination on their part to engage that indefatigable and zealous worker, Doctor Grindrod, and a Welsh advocate to deliver lectures.

The anniversary of this society was celebrated on Easter Monday, when two well-attended meetings were held; the first, at the Welch Wesleyan Chapel, at three o'clock in the afternoon; after singing and prayer, our esteemed and respected friend, Mr. Walter Watkins was called to preside over the meeting, who opened the proceedings with a warm and appropriate address, and was ably followed by the Revs. Morris and Davis, Independents, and Messrs. Rhys and Harris. At six o'clock in the evening, the second meeting was held at Zoar Welch Independent Chapel, where Mr. Watkins again presided. Addresses were delivered in Welch, by the Rev. Mr. Davies, and Messrs. R. Lewis, and Mr. Edwards, and in English, by Messrs. Harding and Edwards; at the close of the meeting, a few signatures were obtained. Both meetings were highly interesting.

B. HOWELLS.

WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

Exeter, May 10th, 1846.

Having completed a six months engagement with the Western Temperance Association, I have pleasure in stating that the good cause is advancing. I have added upwards of 300 names to the pledge books of the different societies, (besides others taken by the secretaries after meetings,) some of which were amongst the worst members of society. I have distributed many hundred temperance tracts, furnished me by the Ladies' Committee of the Exeter Society. We have been delighted on many occasions when visiting the houses of our reclaimed friends, to observe the happy circumstances in which they are now placed, consequent upon the adoption of teetotalism. I have been particularly struck with the firmness of our juvenile members.

JAMES UPRIGHT.

CORNWALL.—This county, which has long been famed for its teetotalism, has recently been visited by Mr. Passmore Edwards from London, whose lectures on teetotalism, and the general improvement of the people, have been successful in contributing a new element of action to the energies and strength of the good cause, in this part of the county.

During Mr. E.'s visit to the county, he addressed large and attentive audiences at Hayle, St. Ives, St. Day, Marazion, St. Just, Penzance, Eavyn, Falmouth, Redruth, Tuckingmill, Camborne, Truro, and other places. In each of these localities, a salubrious feeling has been produced in favour of teetotalism, and this cause has only to be kept constantly in view before the people, and presented to them in its varied aspects in connexion with their moral elevation and sanitary improvement, to secure their warmest sympathies and most cordial co-operation.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The temperance Town Mission of this place, continues to hold on its way. The periodical exchange of tracts, supersedes, to a considerable extent, the necessity of public speaking; and not unfrequently we are told, that the parties who return the tract, are desirous to sign the pledge. Our Sabbath afternoon meeting continues popular, and is well attended, and affords a gratifying proof of habits changed for the better; our weekly central meeting in general, has been well attended, and during the delivery of a course of lectures, embracing a rich variety of intellectual instruction, much good has been done.

Writing, on the tenth anniversary, since I pledged to abstain from alcohol, I am happy, in being able to say, I never regret having signed the pledge, or having buckled on the harness of the advocacy; since, by that means, I have been made the instrument of good to others. I am cheered daily, in this town, by the reformed lives of those who have joined, since I entered upon my duties here, and in common with the Committee of the National Temperance Society and its accredited advocates, I rejoice at the progress of our noble enterprise.

W. H. BUCHANAN.

KNARESBOROUGH.—The petitions for prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath-day, have received six hundred and twenty-one signatures in this town, and among them are the names of the respected vicar, all the clergymen and dissenting ministers, the churchwardens, the constables, and most of the principal inhabitants of the place.

The petition to the House of Lords was forwarded for presentation to the Bishop of Ripon, and that to the House of Commons, to Andrew Lawson, Esq., one of the members for the Borough.

The memorial to the Queen was signed by no fewer than five hundred and fifty-eight females. Surely, the temperance cause must stand high in Knareborough, when so many of the fair sex smile upon it.

BEDFORD.—The cause of temperance has received most effective aid from the delivering of two lectures in this town, by Mr. H. Vincent, on the 6th and 7th of April. The large and beautiful assembly-room, capable of holding about 700 persons, was engaged for the occasion, and crowded audiences were obtained, especially on the second night, when the largest and most respectable number of persons that ever met to hear a temperance lecture, listened for more than two hours to the statements and appeals of Mr. Vincent. Much and lasting good must result from these meetings. Mr. Vincent received a unanimous vote of thanks.

MELKSHAM.—On Easter Monday the yearly festival was held; G. W. Anstie, Esq., of Devizes, presided at the public meeting. Rev. W. Cullep, Independent minister; Rev. W. Griffith, Wesleyan minister, and several members of the Society of Friends, attended; besides many other influential persons of the town. Rev. W. H. Turner, A.M. of Banwell, delivered a most excellent address. To show the interest excited by the meeting, it may be observed, that a gentleman who employs a large number of hands, kindly allowed a number of his workmen to attend the tea-party, although a part of his works had to be stopped for the purpose. At the close of the meeting, more than 3000 pages of temperance tracts were distributed gratuitously. On Friday, 1st of May, Mr. J. H. Donaldson gave a lecture, when Rev. W. Griffith kindly presided.

18 signatures were obtained. We visit more than 500 families every fortnight with tracts on the loan system; a plan which has been effective of much good.

JAMES GERRISH, Secretary.

HALSTED.—We have recently had the pleasure of listening to a powerful and convincing lecture, by our much esteemed country agent, T. B. Thompson, of Leeds. Encouraging, however, as were his arguments, they were rendered doubly so by the observations of our highly esteemed and efficient president, Edward Hornor, Esq. We shall shortly forward our petition to parliament for the suppression of the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sabbath; and several additions to swell the memorial to our gracious Sovereign for the same object, signed by our female population of different towns.

B. SMITH, Treasurer.

EAST NORFOLK TEMPERANCE UNION.—This union has now been in operation for three years, during which time an agent has been employed delivering lectures, five evenings in each week, frequently to large and attentive audiences; by which means much information relative to the temperance question has been communicated. The financial statement shows a balance due to the treasurer of £29. 12s. 10d.

PRESTON.—The 14th annual festival of the Preston Society, was held in the Temperance Hall on Tuesday evening, the 5th of May, and each succeeding evening in the week. On Tuesday, the annual meeting was held, when Mr. Henry Bradley, in the absence of Dr. Stevens, presided. The secretary read the report, which stated that, during the past year, the weekly meeting in the Temperance Hall had been very well attended, and that upwards of 1000 persons had signed the pledge. In addition to the weekly meeting, more than 70 open air meetings had been held in various parts of the town, and at the following places: viz. Hoghton, Moon's Mill, Walton, Bamber-bridge, Brownedge, Leyland, Panington, Cleyton-green, Whittle, Kirkham, and Longton, which meetings had been addressed by the Preston advocates, to whom the people listened with great attention, when upwards of 6000 tracts had been distributed. Mr. T. Swindlehurst moved that the report be adopted and printed, which was carried. Mr. E. P. Hood then addressed the meeting for about an hour, and concluded by moving a vote of thanks to the mayor and corporation for the use of the Corn Exchange Rooms on several occasions; to the officers and committee for their services during the past year, and proposed the officers and committee for the ensuing year, which was seconded by Mr. Howarth and carried, and after a vote of thanks being given to the chairman, the meeting separated. On Wednesday evening, the Rev. J. B. Sheppard, Wesleyan Association Minister, a teetotaler of 16 years standing, took the chair and shortly addressed the meeting; after which, Mr. E. P. Hood delivered a lecture on the "Education of a Teetotaler," which was well received and much applauded. A vote of thanks being given to Mr. Hood and the chairman, the meeting broke up. On Thursday evening, the meeting was occupied by the Youths' Society; Mr. G. Cartwright, treasurer of the Parent Society, in the chair, who related the benefits he had received through having become an abstainer. Mr. Martin, secretary to the Youths' Society, stated, that since the establishment of that Society in August last, above 200 members, varying from 10 to 20 years of age had been enrolled, a great majority of whom, had kept their pledge. Several amusing, yet instructive recitations were delivered by youths, which elicited much applause. On Friday evening,

Mr. Catterall, a zealous local advocate, took the chair, and after a few observations, called upon Mr. G. E. Lomax, the agent of the Manchester and Salford Temperance Association. Mr. Lomax, for about two hours addressed the meeting on the evils of intemperance, and the benefits which would result from the adoption of teetotal principles. On Saturday, Mr. T. Swindlehurst took the chair, and the meeting was addressed by several reclaimed drunkards, whose simple unvarnished addresses were listened to with great attention by the audience; the meeting was also addressed by Mr. John Bowes of Manchester, who happened to be on a visit in Preston. A vote of thanks being given to the chairman, the Festival terminated.

SHEERNESS.—On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, May 4th, 5th, and 6th, Mr. James Teare of Preston, delivered a course of lectures on the occasions and remedy of intemperance. The Rev. C. Spittigue presided. The meetings were well attended. A tea meeting was held on Wednesday evening, at which 100 persons attended. Great good has been done by these lectures in dispelling prejudice and spreading truth; 15 persons signed the pledge.

G. STUBBINGS, Secretary.

HASTINGS.—Being in connexion with the Surrey and Sussex Association, we were favoured with a visit from Mr. T. Hudson, the agent, who on the 1st and 2nd of April, delivered two most eloquent addresses in the Town Hall, to large and respectable audiences. On Wednesday, April the 22nd, the annual members' meeting was held, at which the general business of the Society was transacted; officers and committee chosen for the year ensuing, and the report read; from which it appears that during the past year 14 public meetings have been held, 42 addresses delivered, 48 signatures to the pledge obtained, and a net increase of 20 members to the Society received; making a total number of 146, some of whom are reformed drunkards. On Wednesday, 6th of May, we held a grand Tea Festival, at which 160 persons sat down. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. T. Wilmore, of Rye, Mr. W. Metcalf, Mr. F. Beck, secretary, and lastly, by the talented and eloquent agent, Mr. T. Hudson, who demonstrated the peculiar adaptation of teetotal principles to the wants of the times. At the close of the meeting five persons signed the pledge. We distribute in this locality 40 of the Chronicle monthly, and hope still to increase the number.

F. BECK, Secretary.

RAILWAY LABOURERS.

The Manchester Statistical Society have just published, in a pamphlet form, three papers read before the society, by its president, Mr. Robertson, by Mr. Edwin Chadwick, and Mr. Robert Rawlinson, engineer to the Bridgewater Trust. "A serious proportion of the accidents (writes Mr. Robertson) was owing to the men going to work more or less in a state of INTOXICATION." They were without religious instruction or the means of public worship; their wages paid once in nine weeks; as many as fourteen or fifteen men were lodged in the same rude hut; their money wages, though high, were diminished in value by the prevalence of the truck system; the men were exceedingly drunken and dissolute; and generally the people, men and women, were thoroughly depraved, degraded, and reckless. One woman stated that she had laid out the corpses of twenty-nine men on these hills, only one of whom, the last of twenty-nine, had died a natural death; all the others being killed!—Railway Standard.

THE CHRISTIAN'S DUTY.

We are chiefly concerned with the great christian principle of renouncing what is manifestly so ruinous and ensnaring to others, even though we ourselves were perfectly assured of using it safely and lawfully, if this our use of it plainly helps to excuse, and encourage, and enable others to use it to their own hurt and to sin against God. Whatever any such thing may be in itself, it has become pernicious through men's perversity; and as a corrupted part of the body, it must be rooted out for the sake of the general health. It then comes clearly within the spirit of our Lord's precept "to cut off even a right hand, or to pluck out a right eye, rather than that the whole body should perish." And even what is thus good and useful must be renounced, when it becomes a source of perilous temptation—a lure to ourselves or others to eternal perdition,—much more may we be required to part with that, which, if not actually pernicious, is clearly superfluous; if not a sinful excess, is at least a mere luxurious indulgence. If christian love requires us "to lay down even our lives for the brethren," for their spiritual and everlasting good; can it be questioned, for a moment, that it binds us to relinquish, for the same object, any mere passing gratification of the very lowest of our bodily senses? Call it, however, if you please, a severe act of self-denial; and the question is, whether we are not required to exercise it, as the followers of Christ? Call it, if you please, a serious sacrifice of interest or enjoyment; and the question is, whether there is not a serious evil,—both a bodily and a spiritual evil,—requiring that sacrifice to be made? Call it, if you please, a very desperate remedy; the question is, whether we are not labouring under a very desperate malady, requiring, at all hazards, some such instant and efficient remedy? —From a discourse on the evils of drunkenness and the principles of Temperance Societies, by REV. DR. BREWSTER, preached in the year 1832.

[Our readers will be gratified to learn that Dr. Brewster has not shrunk, like Dr. Edgar of Belfast, and William Collins of Glasgow, from applying the above reasoning to fermented as well as to distilled liquors. Dr. Brewster is a vice-president of the National Society, and has intimated his intention of contributing to the pages of the Chronicle.]

NOTICES.

We regret the delay which has arisen in the publication of the ADDRESS; when ready, it shall be immediately forwarded to the parties who have sent in their names and subscriptions.

The Fourth ANNUAL REPORT will be ready in a few days; published by Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster-row.

THE BRITISH
HONG-KONG TEA COMPANY'S ESTABLISHMENT,
 12 & 13, NICHOLAS-LANE, & 13, KING WILLIAM-STREET, CITY, LONDON.

THIS Establishment is now one of the most extensive in the Metropolis for the sale of genuine Teas and Coffees. Owing to the increase of their business, in its various departments, they have been compelled to take additional premises, namely, No. 13, King William-street, Mansion House, adjoining their present extensive Establishment, Nos. 12 and 13, Nicholas-lane. These new premises they have opened chiefly for the sale of Coffees.

Independently of their London trade, the Company have now more than SIX HUNDRED Country Agents, who are appointed to supply the choicest growths of Tea and Coffee the world produces.

The BRITISH HONG-KONG TEA ESTABLISHMENT offers peculiar facilities to Hotel and Boarding-house keepers, and all large consumers, for purchasing the finest descriptions of Teas and Coffees on the same terms which elsewhere they would have to pay for very inferior qualities. By conducting their business upon a solid basis, and by allowing to the public every advantage which can possibly be derived from having Teas imported direct from China, selected with judgment from the choicest growths, they have secured for themselves a high standing, which it will be their constant study to maintain.

The Company particularly recommend their Black Teas at 3s. 8d., 4s., 4s. 8d., 5s., and 5s. 6d. Roasted Coffees, at 1s., 1s. 2d., 1s. 4d., 1s. 6d., and 2s.

The Company's highly esteemed CATTY TEAS and COFFEES are all packed in lead, so as effectually to preserve their strength and aroma. The Teas in packets containing two ounces, and quarter, half, and one pound; and the Coffees in quarters, halves, and pounds.

BLACK TEAS.

Strong Rough Congou	4	0
Superior Pekoe flavour	4	6
Black wiry leaf, rich and strong Pekoe Sou- chong flavour	5	0
Imperial Pekin	5	6

This is a mixture of the finest and scarcest Teas cultivated, and nothing superior to it can be imported.

MIXED TEAS.

	s.	d.
Hong-Kong mixture	5	4

Those who prefer Mixed Teas (Green and Black) will find this unequalled for strength and flavour by any other combination that can be offered at the price.

The Company's arrangements for supplying families with the smallest quantity of Tea or Coffee are as complete as possible; and by means of their Vans, orders are delivered daily in all parts of the Metropolis and Suburbs.

AGENTS WANTED.

Respectable Tradesmen wishing to make a valuable addition to their business without incurring any risk, will find the Agency for the British Hong-Kong Company's Teas, not only a direct source of profit, but a means of exerting a beneficial influence on their general business. For terms, &c., address British Hong-Kong Tea Company, 12 and 13, Nicholas-lane.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEMPERANCE.

The Proprietor of the "TEETOTAL TIMES" is anxious to elicit the talent of teetotal writers, and to develop more fully, than has hitherto been done, the principles of Teetotalism, in their bearings upon the health and happiness of various classes of the community. He therefore offers the sum of FIFTY POUNDS, which he proposes to distribute in premiums of TEN POUNDS each, for the most approved Essays on the following subjects:

- I.—The importance of the Temperance Reformation, as a means of elevating the working-classes, physically, socially, morally, and religiously.
- II.—The importance of the Temperance Reformation, in relation to the Trade and Commerce of Great Britain.
- III.—The importance of the Temperance Reformation, in its influence upon the Females of England, in the several relations of domestic life.
- IV.—The importance of the Temperance Reformation, in connexion with the maintenance and spread of Christianity. This Essay to demonstrate that the use of strong drink has ever been antagonistic to the Gospel.
- V.—The Discussion of the Question:—Is it right or wrong, for persons in health, but more especially the followers of Christ, to use, or to countenance the use of alcoholic beverages?

The Essays must be argumentative, practical, and compendious, including as many facts and statistics as possible. Each Essay to be comprised within six pages of the Teetotal Times, printed in Bourgeois, in the manner of the leading articles.

For each Essay, the Proprietor will nominate three ADJUDICATORS, who will be announced in the Times, one month previous to the last day appointed for receiving the Essays.

Essays, intended for competition on the first subject, must be sent in, on or before August 1st; for the Second, September 1st; for the Third, October 1st; for the Fourth, November 1st; and for the Fifth, December 1st. The Candidates to forward their Manuscripts, signed with some peculiar initial, to Mr. J. CASSELL, 12 and 13, Nicholas Lane, London, with a sealed note, containing the real name and address; such note not to be opened till the determination of the Adjudicators is known.

The Essays are to be published in successive Supplementary Numbers of the TEETOTAL TIMES. The days of their appearance will be duly announced.

* * * THE TEETOTAL TIMES has circulated to an extent unparalleled in the history of Temperance Literature; and the praise bestowed upon its contents, by coadjutors and friends, encourages the Editors to believe, that they are occupying an important and useful station in the Temperance field. In addition to original articles, by some of the most popular Temperance writers, it contains a digest of the operations of the principal Teetotal Societies throughout the world. It is published, regularly, on the first day of every month, price ONE PENNY, or for the stamped edition, 2s. per annum.

WATER CURE.

GERMAN BATHS,

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, MIDDLESEX.

These BATHS are elegantly fitted up with the GERMAN DOUCHE, in all its varieties, Couches, Baths, a GYMNASIUM FOR INDOOR EXERCISE, and every comfort, for the express purpose of affording to invalids an opportunity of undergoing a regular course of "Water treatment," under the direction of any Medical Adviser they may prefer; no Medical Man having any proprietary or other interest in these Baths; while the manipulations are performed by regularly taught male and female skilful Bath attendants. The Harrow Baths are strictly a Bathing, and not a Boarding Establishment, (the patients occupying private lodgings in the village.) The Baths are only ten minutes' walk from the Harrow Station, on the London and Birmingham Railway; and are reached in twenty-five minutes from the London Terminus, at Euston Square. Fifteen trains stop at Harrow daily; and the facility afforded by the half-crown first-class day tickets, enables those whose avocations will not admit of their occupying lodgings in the vicinity of the Baths, to come to them for the Water treatment, at the times prescribed, and return to town again for that small sum. For Terms, and other particulars, and as to Lodgings, whether furnished or unfurnished, House or Cottage accommodation, or merely Apartments, address, Mrs. PRICE, German Baths, Harrow, Middlesex.

N. B. Persons occupying a House or Lodgings, at Harrow, have the privilege of educating their children at the great Public School there, at a very trifling expense.

Chronicle and Recorder.

JULY 1st, 1846.

I rejoice to know that lately a decided movement has taken place, at the House of Correction, at Cold Bath Fields, on this subject. The two very amiable and worthy chaplains of the prison, have been impressed with the importance of taking some special step in this direction, and a sum of £5 was lately voted, by the Committee of Visiting Justices, for the purchase of Temperance Tracts, to be distributed among the prisoners, while one of our warmest advocates of the cause of Total Abstinence, (a member of the Church of England Total Abstinence Society) has been, for some time past, daily addressing the prisoners on that subject, and with a success that is the more encouraging, as it was wholly unexpected. The prisoners being classed, according to the nature of their crimes, in what are called yards, the governor of the prison was applied to, to name the yard which he considered to contain the worst criminals and the most depraved characters; and having pointed out the second yard as answering to this description, the addresses were commenced there, the officers of the prison generally, holding out no hope, whatever, of any beneficial result accruing from the labour of the teetotal advocate; but at the end of a fortnight after these addresses commenced, it was intimated to him, that some of the prisoners had expressed a wish to sign the pledge, and a day was named when they would be offered the opportunity of so doing. Several magistrates and officers of the prison were assembled on the occasion, and various were the surmises as to whether any, and if so, what number would be found willing to sign the pledge. The prisoners were 75 in number, seated in rows in one of the day-rooms, after dinner; and on those who wished to sign the pledge, being called upon to rise, 71 of the number instantly stood up. And here, let us pause for a moment, to reflect upon the extraordinary, instructive, and most interesting scene, thus, and in an instant, as it were, presented to our view. Before us stood 71 men, youths, and boys, not even of doubtful character, but known thieves, robbers, burglars, gamblers, coiners or forgers, and nearly the whole of them acknowledged hard-drinkers, or known drunkards, congregated together in a prison where constant silence is the prevailing discipline. Unable, therefore, to interchange an opinion on the subject, which had now been for a fortnight brought forcibly and almost daily, under their consideration, no one could know what was the intention of the other on the subject; and yet, all rose at the same instant, and thus evinced, that by whatever roads to conviction their minds had travelled, they had all arrived at the same conclusion, namely, that it would be to their future advantage to become teetotalers. Can anything proclaim more forcibly the eloquence of our great and noble cause? Can anything more clearly demonstrate how much may be done for true Temperance, by perseveringly advocating its adoption, even under the most unpromising circumstances? Can any thing point out, more forcibly, the importance of a Prison Mission, for the benefit of those who have been brought to crime through strong drink?

Such a Mission will, I hope, ere long, be added to the Trophies of Teetotalism: but I must return to the poor prisoners.

A COUNTY MAGISTRATE.

LETTER TO THE LORD BISHOP OF LONDON.

"They must elevate the poor man from extreme destitution—they must take off from him the urgent pressure of misery before they could assail him, as a moral agent, with any chance of success. Without a change of this nature he was convinced it was not possible to effect any important amelioration in the condition of the working man."—Speech of the Bishop of London, June 8th, 1846, on presenting Petitions for Baths and Washhouses for the Poor.

Such my lord is your reported declaration in the House of Lords, on Monday, June 8th. Cordially agreeing with the sentiments thus expressed, I would take the liberty of asking your lordship, whether something even more important to the welfare of the poor, than the establishment of baths and washhouses (all needed as they are) should not be done to carry out the moral improvement of which you speak?

What, my lord, is the great cause of all in producing this extreme destitution from which it is necessary in the first instance to relieve the poor? Your lordship cannot, or at least as a christian bishop, should not be ignorant, that it is the drinking habits of the working classes. This is what causes that urgent pressure of misery upon them, which your lordship in common with teetotalers believe we must first remove, before we can effect any important amelioration in their condition. That destitution has been in countless instances relieved, that misery removed by the mere adoption of total abstinence principles—principles which must be enforced by the example of those whose moral conduct is unimpeachable, and who for a brother's good deny themselves their christian liberty in that which, however lawful, is palpably not expedient.

Now, my lord, how powerful would be the influence of your example in this matter on the clergy, and through them upon the poor. The good your lordship would thus effect in carrying out, what we doubt not must be, the ardent desire of your heart, the elevation of the poor man from misery and destitution, would be incalculable. Why will not a christian bishop then set himself up in such a cause above the prejudices and opinions of a world to which he should not belong? Why will he not hear the counsel of an apostle, who has succeeded to the labours of an apostle, and follow out in so clear a case as this, St. Paul's advice, "That it is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak."

I have the honour to be, my lord,
With every feeling of respect and regard,
Your lordship's faithful, humble servant,
A CLERGYMAN OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

PRISON DIET AND HEALTH.

It has often been urged as an objection to temperance, that the sudden abandonment of stimulating drinks is dangerous to health. In the case of the intemperate, some have recommended the gradual diminution of the quantity as safer, than sudden and total abstinence. But, unfortunately for the soundness of this theory, tens of thousands of drunkards have abandoned the use of strong drink at once, and have soon reaped—not disease, but health. But if more evidence be required, we refer to the case of criminals, who, as soon as they enter the prison door, are declared—forcibly debarred, from any indulgence in the intoxicating cup.

These criminals, let it be remembered, are in many cases intemperate persons, the very offscouring of society, and lead a life of continual excitement. To be plunged into solitude, and obliged to submit to prison discipline, must in itself be to them most irksome and depressing; and they, of all class of drinkers, most require the aid of alcoholic stimulants. But they are restricted from using them; and what is the effect of this restriction on their health? The theorist would pronounce it most pernicious; facts, if we mistake not, pronounce it most beneficial. This was most convincingly shewn by "A COUNTY MAGISTRATE," in regard to the Cold Bath Fields Prison. And in the "Tenth Report of the Inspector of the Prisons of the Northern and Eastern District of England," there is a report from each prison visited, as to the health of the prisoners, and a short extract from every one of these reports, we subjoin—

Derby County Gaol and House of Correction.—The surgeon states, "The health of the prisoners has been generally good. There has been neither epidemical disease nor a case of death for a considerable period. I think the new diet does very well."

York County Gaol.—The surgeon states "There has been no epidemical disease of any description in the prison. Colds and influenzas are the only diseases which are incidental to the prison."

York House of Correction.—The inspector reports, "The condition of the establishment as to health has been quite satisfactory. There have been no deaths, and there was not a prisoner under medical treatment on the day of inspection."

Wakefield House of Correction.—The surgeon observes, "The state of health in the prison during the last year has been most satisfactory. There was not a single death."

Lancaster County Gaol.—The surgeon states, "The gaol has been most healthy, and the diet is sufficient."

Preston House of Correction.—The surgeon states, "There has been no epidemical disease. The diet seems to answer; I think it is sufficient."

Kirkdale Gaol and House of Correction.—The surgeon declares, "I consider the diet to be fully sufficient to maintain the prisoners in most excellent health."

Liverpool Borough Gaol and House of Correction.—The surgeon remarks, "The health of the prisoners has been very satisfactory."

Salford New Bailey and House of Correction.—The surgeon states, "The health of the prisoners has been most satisfactory. I consider the diet to be quite sufficient."

Chester County Gaol.—The surgeon observes, "The food is quite sufficient and agrees well with the prisoners. The health of the prisoners has been very satisfactory."

Chester City Gaol.—The governor declares "the health of the prisoners to be most excellent."

Knutsford House of Correction.—The surgeon affirms, "The health of the prisoners has been most satisfactory."

Nottingham County Gaol.—The surgeon states, "The diet is quite sufficient and agrees well with the prisoners. Their health has been most satisfactory."

Nottingham House of Correction.—The surgeon remarks, "The health of the prisoners has been most satisfactory; there has not been a case of epidemical disease."

Southwell House of Correction.—The surgeon declares, "The health of the prisoners has been very satisfactory; indeed, I think, I never knew it so good."

Lincoln City Gaol.—The surgeon observes, "The health of the prisoners has been most satisfactory."

Norwich County Gaol.—The surgeon says, "The diet answers admirably."

Norwich City Gaol.—The surgeon states, "The health of the prisoners has been most satisfactory."

Wymondham County House of Correction.—The surgeon affirms, "There has been no disease of any moment in the prison. The diet is ample."

We leave the above facts to produce their natural effect; one thing they prove, that the sudden and total abandonment of strong drink is not dangerous in any degree.

THE RECORDS OF RIME.

Who can doubt, were the records of crime impartially unfolded—every deed of violence and wrong exposed to the scrutiny of the world—and the causes of these crimes detailed with unswerving fidelity—that the revelation would be made,—that strong drink has in nearly every case been either directly or indirectly the fomenting cause? Directly as it promotes disease and premature death; as it nerves the assassin's arm; as it inflames the breast with every vile and unhalloved passion, leading to the commission of enormities the most revolting. Indirectly, as it produces misery, poverty, and despair, inducing desperation, suicide, or murder!

One day we are appalled by an account of some depraved being who has, under the influence of alcohol, sent a fellow-creature into the world of spirits; and on the next day tidings reach us of some poor afflicted creature, who tempted by the threats of her brutal and drunken husband commits infanticide—drowns two of her children, and is only prevented from destroying her own life and that of another child, by the interposition of passers by. We have sometimes been urged to give a monthly report of such cases in the pages of the CHRONICLE. To give the whole, would sometimes occupy half of our entire Journal, while their number would prevent their perusal by the majority of our readers.

Still, we cannot but think, that an occasional selection may be productive of good, and we shall therefore commence our melancholy task by recording six cases as samples of the influence exercised by DRINK on the inhabitants of this favoured land in the 19th century of the Christian Era:—

DEATH.—An inquest was held at the King's Arms Inn, Meanwood-road, upon the body of John Smith, of New-town, who was in the employ of Mr. Snell, as a press-setter. It appears that the deceased who had been drinking on Tuesday, commenced again on Wednesday morning at the above house, and having imbibed a quantity of gin in a neat state, laid himself down on the seat and appeared to go to sleep. In two or three hours, one of the company who had been drinking with him, endeavoured to rouse the unfortunate man, but in vain. Mr. Clayton, surgeon, North-street, was immediately sent for, but his services were of no avail, for the man had been dead some time. The Jury returned a verdict of Died from Natural Causes!—Leeds Times.

ANOTHER DEATH.—An inquest was last week held over an upholsterer at an inn, in Portland-street, London, who had died suddenly. Elizabeth Keating, the daughter of the deceased, stated that her father had not been sober since Christmas, nor had he attended to his business during all that while. The witness then went on to state, that on Sunday morning she went to ask her father what he would have for dinner, and she found that his hands were quite cold; and a surgeon pronounced him dead, most likely from apoplexy, brought on by his intemperate course of life. Verdict, Natural Death!! [Intoxication is natural! To whom?]

A THIRD DEATH.—On Thursday last, an inquest was held at the Woodman Inn, Holbeck, before John Blackburn, Esq., coroner, on view of the body of Joseph Serjeantson, or Sargeson, aged 35 years, a pavior. The deceased who resided in Wheeler-street, Bank, was much addicted to excessive drinking, and from such indulgences he became affected with delirium tremens, under which he was labouring last Wednesday morning, when he went to his brother's, in Dewsbury-road, Hunslet. On arriving there, he went up stairs, and was shortly afterwards discovered to be strangled. He was quite dead, in a sitting position, and must have used a strong effort to produce strangulation. The jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

[The cause of this insanity?]

MURDER.—On Sunday morning last, about three o'clock, in the parish of St. Luke, London, a man charged a woman in a "private gin shop," with stealing a shilling from his pocket. They had previously been drinking together. The woman denied the charge, and the man, whose name was Martin Jennings, struck her violently in the face. She still persisted, however, that she had not robbed him, and the man, furious with drink, struck her again. The woman staggered to the door, and tried to escape. Jennings followed her and again struck her on the temples, when she fell insensible to the ground. Alarm was given. The man fled, and the woman was conveyed to the police office, where she shortly afterwards expired. Her name was Mary Murray, a widow, and she has left three children. Jennings was arrested before nine o'clock the same morning, and stands charged with wilful murder.

ATTEMPT TO MURDER.—On Monday last, at the Borough Court, an excavator, named Joseph Ashton, was brought up for attempting to stab a woman, named Caroline Johns. They both lodged at a house in Churchgate, and on Sunday night, about twelve o'clock, the prisoner came in literally mad drunk, and attempted to stab the woman with his knife. He hit her on the neck, but having a double flannel round her throat, the flannel only was cut, and she escaped unhurt. He was fined 20s. and costs; and in default of payment, was committed to the New Bailey for one month.—Manchester Guardian.

SUICIDE.—William Ridgewell a labourer of Great Totham, between 50 and 60 years of age, was found drowned in the river under Sauls-bridge, in Witham, about nine o'clock on Wednesday morning. Deceased left Witham on Sunday last, to go home, about nine o'clock in the evening, much intoxicated, and it is supposed that in his way along the meadows leading from Witham-bridge to Sauls-bridge and thence to Totham, he lost his path, and accidentally fell into the river. An inquest was held the same day before W. Codd, Esq., when the jury, under the direction of the coroner, returned a verdict—"Found dead."—Essex Paper.

MANSLAUGHTER.—On Monday last, two men were felling timber near Redditch, and having during the day partaken too freely of intoxicating drinks, they quarrelled on their way home, when one of them, Roberts, taking up his axe aimed a blow at his companion Thomas, which missed his head but entered the fleshy part of the thigh. Roberts immediately aimed another blow at Thomas, which cut off the flesh from the front of the forehead in a slanting direction down to the left ear, and Thomas has lost such a quantity of blood, that it is doubtful whether he will recover.—Lincolnshire Times.

INTEMPERANCE AND LUNACY.

Dr. CHARLESWORTH, Visiting Physician of the Lincoln Lunatic Asylum, has kindly forwarded us a small pamphlet, containing the proceedings of the Directors of that Institution, "relative to classification, inspection, and other matters bearing upon the subject of restraint."

It is now rather more than twelve years since the use of intoxicating liquors was discontinued in the Lincoln Lunatic Asylum, and the following minutes shew the cause and effect of the change.

PHYSICIAN'S REPORT.

"1834, Jan. 31.—I will beg to call the attention of the Board, to the propriety of considering whether the use of fermented liquors under the general diet table, should not be discontinued, and the matter left for medical order in special cases. It is very questionable, whether the temporary tone, procured by any kind of stimulus, is not, in many cases, mischievous; and whether the curative process should not be made to depend upon a permanent increase of tone, indirectly procured by nutrition, air, and exercise.

(Signed) E. P. CHARLESWORTH, Attending Physician."

"February 5.—Resolved, that the Physician's Report relating to the Beer, be referred to the Physicians of this Institution.

February 10.—In pursuance of a resolution at the last weekly Board, that the opinion of the Physicians of this Institution, (Dr. Charlesworth, Dr. W. Cookson, and Dr. Elmhorst,) should be taken on the subject of discontinuing the use of fermented liquors for the patients, except under special medical order, and the Physicians having unanimously recommended its discontinuance.

Ordered, That the use of fermented Liquor, for the patients of this institution be discontinued for the future, except under special medical order."

[Extract from the Tenth Report.]

"By a recent regulation, the use of fermented liquor as part of the regular diet, has been discontinued, except under medical order; while the diet table has, in other respects, been enlarged. It may be questionable whether the temporary tone procured by this stimulus, may not, in many cases, be mischievous. It is a safer practice to attempt the curative process, through a permanent increase of a healthy tone, indirectly procured by nutrition, air, and exercise; and it is especially important to establish, both as a principle and a habit, abstinence, in a point, where excess has been found to be so eminently injurious to the insane, as well as to those pre-disposed to become so, and to be such a frequent cause of relapse.

(Signed) THOS. BRAILSFORD, Chairman."

"1835, February 16.—Ordered, That an advance in money be made to the Household in lieu of Beer, at the rate of five pounds a year to Males, and two pounds ten shillings a year to the Females."

[Extract from the House Visitor's Report.]

"1835, March 23.—I am glad to find that it has been determined to make an allowance in money to the household, instead of giving them beer.

(Signed) R. PRETYMAN, Visitor."

[Extract from the Eleventh Annual Report.]

"1835, April.—The best effects have been found to follow the discontinuance of fermented drink by the patients; and the disturbances formerly not uncommon after dinner, have now disappeared. By a resolution of the Board, a lengthened period of detention, where insanity is connected, as cause or effect, with intoxication, has been recommended, so as to allow of the entire subsidence of that morbid craving for stimulus, rendered by habitual indulgence incurable, except under compulsory abstinence. Such patients are invariably (at first) most urgent for their own discharge, and their rational demeanor, while under the regimen of the Asylum, pleads strongly in their behalf. It may, however, be broadly laid down, that no habit can be corrected without time for the establishment of a counter habit. Frequent experience of early and repeated returns, after a hasty removal in these cases, and the serious inconvenience suffered by society, families, and friends, in the interval, have shown that such compliance must be injurious to the character of the Institution. To give additional motives for sobriety (a deviation from which is never overlooked by the Board) a pecuniary allowance has been made to all members of the establishment in lieu of malt liquor."

[Extract from the Thirteenth Annual Report.]

"1838.—A decidedly improved health has been found to follow the total disuse of fermented liquor, and the more generous diet which has been substituted."

The disuse of intoxicating liquors has been continued, to the present time, with advantage, to the health and comfort of the patients.

The Balance.

OBJECTION VII.

"TETOTALISM ELEVATES ITSELF INTO THE PLACE OF THE GOSPEL AND ASSUMES THE OFFICE OF RELIGION."

No objection has ever been advanced against the temperance cause which has done more real injury, and yet none is more thoroughly fallacious than that which it is our present duty to consider. It has been analysed and criticised, times without number, but even now is heralded forth with pomp on every practical occasion, as an argument which it is impossible to overturn. We shall present the subject in the form of a two-fold question—Is teetotalism theoretically;—and is it practically,—opposed to the gospel?

I. THEORETICALLY. It is argued, that by making itself a remedy for drunkenness independent of the gospel, it virtually declares that the gospel is not of itself sufficient to cleanse away all sin, and heal all man's moral maladies! In reply, we would ask,—Is teetotalism, or abstinence from intoxicating liquors a sure and efficacious cure for drunkenness? However prejudiced, the objector must answer, yes. Is drunkenness an evil? Yes. How then can the cause of the cure be bad, when the cure itself is good? Is teetotalism bad? If it is, can Satan cast out Satan? How then can his kingdom stand? Can a corrupt fountain send forth pure water? Can thorns yield grapes? Is teetotalism good? How then can it be opposed to the gospel? Can two things which are good contradict each other? Is light opposed to light—truth to truth—holiness to holiness?

It appears indeed to us, that teetotalism is THE GOSPEL REMEDY FOR DRUNKENNESS. We behold the drunkard suffering under the physical and moral disease of intemperance. The gospel warns him to forsake his evil habits; but can he do so while he continues to taste the inebriating fluid, every drop of which is liquid fire to his blood, exciting a craving thirst for more?

To him the gospel cries,—“AVOID THE VERY APPEARANCE OF EVIL”—“If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.” The gospel guards against exposure to temptation; it warns not only against evil, but also against the avenues which lead thereto; and who is there so bold as to assert, that to the reformed man there is not temptation, not danger in the intoxicating draught? Will not a physical stimulant affect a pious man equally with an infidel? Can a christian violate the laws of nature with impunity? Alcohol inflames the blood and the brain of all men, and men of former intemperate habits, however sincerely pious now, run a fearful risk of relapsing into their former state, if they but even sip in fancied moderation.

To say the least, such conduct would shew a wanton and unjustifiable exposure to temptation, not countenanced, but condemned by the gospel of Christ.

II. PRACTICALLY. We have nothing to do with the extreme and fanatical views which some entertain on the virtues of teetotalism. The fault rests on the man, not on the system. Teetotalism is simply abstinence from alcoholic beverages; and is this practice of abstinence opposed or favourable to religion? We could here a glowing tale unfold, of thousands entering the sanctuary who never entered there before they abstained; of thousands who then began to pray who never prayed before; and who have become members of the Saviour's Church. But we desire not to produce the testimonies of any who are professedly teetotalers; many volumes would not contain their statements. For our proof, we shall refer to the Eleventh Report of the London City Mission, presented in Exeter Hall, on the 7th of May.

“Almost every case of a reformed drunkard, is a case in which the body and the estate are benefited as well as the soul. And such cases during the year have been very numerous. In the Magazine for August last, 22 such cases were given in detail, as having occurred to one missionary during the year, on one district in Westminster. [In all these cases, the instrumentality employed was teetotalism.] And it may be here stated, that all these individuals have since preserved their reformed habits; many of them have since become truly religious; 24 other similar cases have occurred on the same district during the year just ended; and 65 copies of the Scriptures have, during the year been subscribed for on the district by reformed drunkards.” Then follows an additional case,—“A missionary on another district visited a man who had not a shoe to his feet,—scarcely an article of clothing to cover him from the cold, no firing, and no bed on which to lie. A love of strong drink had thus impoverished him. He had once been in a very different situation, and had then married a respectable female. But he had plunged her also into temporal misery, and had left her and his children to provide for themselves. . . . He has now given up drink; his mind is religiously impressed; he has obtained another situation; and the home of misery to the man alone, is now the cheerful home of comfort to the whole family.”

And such instances are abundant in every city, town, and even village, where teetotalism has been successful.

Nothing can shew more clearly than facts like these, the absurdity of the cry that teetotalism is opposed to the gospel! The drunkard who wishes to become religious must enter through the strait gate of self-denial; he must abandon the intoxicating cup; he must, in other words,—crucify those fleshly lusts, which war against the soul!

We now bring this series of articles to a close. We had intended referring to the subject of the pledge; but this intention, circumstances prevent us carrying into effect. We are not aware that in the course of these controversial papers we have resorted to false reasoning in defence of temperance principles. While firmly expressing our own views, we know not that we have used bitterness of speech, or displayed a want of that charity which “hopeth all things.” THE BALANCE has been as impartial as we could make it; the objections have been, we trust, fairly weighed; and it remains with the reader to decide whether they have not been found wanting?

Imperial Parliament.

PETITIONS AGAINST SUNDAY DRINKING.

We rejoice to say that a very great number of petitions have been already presented to both Houses of Parliament, against the Sunday traffic in intoxicating liquors. On Thursday, June 4th, the Bishop of Norwich presented 76 petitions with a prayer to that effect, signed by 17,000 persons.

Let all our friends be up and doing. Vigorous efforts now made, even if they do not result in present, will doubtless lead to ultimate, success.

On Thursday evening, June 18th, Lord MONT-EAGLE presented a petition from the parochial authorities of the parish of St. Luke's, complaining of Sunday trading, and praying for a remedy. The noble lord stated, that while he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had got a clause introduced into the Metropolitan Police Bill, prohibiting the sale of spirituous and other liquors, from 12 o'clock on Saturday night, to Sunday at 1 o'clock. This regulation had been found productive of great benefit, and with that experience before him, he had now to state, that if he received encouragement, he would bring a bill to extend that law to the country.

The BISHOP OF LONDON referred to the immense advantages that had followed the adoption of the measure adverted to by the noble lord. In Liverpool, where the regulation was also enforced, the same good effects had resulted.

On Friday night, June 19th, the Bishop of Norwich presented 20 petitions against the Sunday strong drink traffic, one signed by 17000 persons.

CANADA.

(Letter to the Corresponding Secretary of the American Temperance Union.)

OAKLAND.

DEAR SIR,—When I inform you that we have upwards of one hundred and fifty thousand pledged teetotalers in Canada, you will not suppose that the coldness of our climate conveys its chilling influence to the hearts of our inhabitants, or that we look upon temperance principles as contraband, or dutiable articles that ought not to be permitted to cross the line. In several districts, the local societies have combined, and concentrated their influence, exertions and funds in district unions. In Niagara, which is the banner district, a lecturer is constantly employed to deliver addresses, obtain signatures to the pledge, and organize other auxiliaries to the Union. We contemplate the formation of a provincial association, which will give permanency and efficiency to our plans of operation. We have no legislative enactments as in your country, to assist us in suppressing the march of intemperance; but we expect to send rods of petitions to Parliament at its next session, and we entertain the hope, that our petition will meet, if not with a welcome, at least with a polite reception. Two members of the Upper, and five members of the Lower House, have endorsed the pledge. The Hon. R. B. Sullivan, the most eloquent, and one of the most distinguished among statesmen and lawyers in British North America, is the president of the Toronto Temperance Society, which embraces more than twenty-five hundred members. John Dougall, Esq., of Montreal, is the Delavan of Canada; his labours of love have been crowned with triumphant success, and he is still untiringly endeavouring to preserve the cause. To his unfaltering zeal, indomitable perseverance, generous contributions, and skilful management of the cause, we are indebted for much of the good accomplished by the temperance enterprise in Canada. In the Talbot district, we have a reformed drunkard, who has obtained more than four thousand names to the pledge, and managed his small farm at the same time, without hiring any assistance. Dr. Burns, the able and liberal leader of the Free Scotch Church, signed the pledge; and I heard him say at the opening of the Oakville Temperance Hall (a building sixty feet long), that he had performed more mental and physical labours, during that time, than he had performed in the same time, in any former period of his life, and yet never enjoyed better health.

Letter from the Editor of the "Temperance Telegraph."

St. John's, N. B., March 28th, 1846.

GENTLEMEN,—I regret that it will not be in my power to visit the fatherland this summer: nothing, let me assure you, would afford me greater satisfaction than to do so, with the prospect before me of meeting so many friends of the great cause, in whose advocacy I have the honour to be engaged, assembled, as will probably be, from many parts of the christian world, and numbering among them many of the justly honoured of the earth. You have, however, my most heartfelt wishes for the success of your great project. May its influence be co-extensive with the design, and may it exert a saving influence over the characters and destinies of the millions every where. Though precluded from attending your Convention, I have yet considered that it may not be amiss to say something about the state of the cause, which, although it may add nothing to the information already at your command, or which may be adduced by the delegates, may nevertheless be of some importance, as confirmatory of their statements, opinions, and on the leading objects contemplated by the projectors of the Convention. As I have no doubt you will be furnished by our society, with an accurate account of the state of the cause in this province, I shall avoid statistics. I may, however, be permitted to say, that we have accomplished almost as much as our own unassisted labours have been calculated to perform. We have effectually, I think, awakened what are termed the industrial classes to a sense of the great importance and expediency of our principles; and although we have not succeeded in obtaining the signatures of all, or of even the major portion of them to the pledge, yet there can be little doubt that these principles are well known, and generally properly appreciated by them all—at least in the city of St. Johns. But there are nevertheless, thousands whose attention it is more difficult to arrest. These are to be found among the upper classes. They, generally speaking, will not condescend to attend our meetings, and they almost invariably refuse to take our Journal. Even among the clergy there are some to be found—some who rejected it when sent to them gratis, during the interval of a few months in the year 1844-5. It would be a great object to gain the eye and the ear of such as these. They necessarily exert a great deal of influence upon society, and could they be induced to concur in the great scheme of abstinence, the rout of the enemy would be next to complete. From my own experience, and from what I have learned from others, I am led to believe, that the clergy who ought in all things to be exemplars to the rich and influential, are not unfrequently their disciples, or consult their inclinations, judgments, or tastes, in matters of what may be termed secondary importance, so that it may often happen, that while the sheep is waiting reverently for the shepherd, the shepherd is abiding the time of the sheep, his charge, and so night overtakes them both,—whereas if the question were put by either,—are you prepared to move, a disposition to adopt a new position, or embrace a new project, might be discovered not very far from the surface of each other's inclinations. This, I imagine, is particularly the case in the matter of temperance. I do not wish it to be understood that I intend this as a charge of misconduct to any; it may proceed from want of judgment, mistaken zeal for a particular interest or other supposed worthy motive. So that the difficulty, the distribution of temperance tracts, and the labours of a superior lecturer, I esteem among the best means hitherto adopted, though I am not without great confidence in the circulation of temperance matter by means of the general newspapers.—Yours, with great respect,

W. R. M. BRUTIS.

JAMAICA.

The eleventh anniversary of the HAMPDEN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY was held in the church, which was respectably filled, both in the lower area of the building and in the galleries.

The report stated that the number of pledged total abstainers now amounts to 774, including an association of youths from the age of 7 to 12 or 14 years, which numbers 224, making an increase during the last twelve months of 84. These are all connected with the Hampden congregation, except one, who is a member of a neighbouring Baptist Church. All the office bearers of Hampden Church are now total abstainers, with one exception, but only half of the congregation are yet pledged to total abstinence. Many who never have used intoxicating drinks, nor intend to do so, are however acting upon the principle, although they have not yet signed the pledge. Some of them, it is believed, supposing erroneously, that having been always total abstainers, they are not called upon to take any part in the present temperance movement. The congregation is using its influence to keep grog shops at a distance, and hopes to succeed in suppressing one or two which have been opened in its outskirts.

The report dwelt principally on the duty of ministers and other office bearers of the Christian church, practising and promoting abstinence, as a cause closely connected with religion, and calculated to remove many of the obstacles which obstruct their labours. It also attributed much of the success which had attended the Society, to the influence which the office bearers of the church had exerted in its favour.

The meeting was addressed with great effect by the Rev. J. Pennington, who had preached on the previous Sabbath, and made a collection of £21 in aid of the benevolent object for which he is now soliciting contributions. The Rev. P. Anderson of Bellevue, and several members of the committee, also addressed the meeting which broke up a little past 10 o'clock. An abstract of the report of speeches will probably be published and circulated in the Island.—From the Baptist (Jamaica) Herald.

BERMUDA.

LETTER FROM THE BERMUDA TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Hamilton, Bermuda, 18th March, 1846.

To the Committee of the "National Temperance Society," 39, Moorgate Street, London.

GENTLEMEN—We feel pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your printed circular of November 10th, 1845; and in expressing our sense of the paramount importance of the object contemplated. We regret, however, that it is not practicable to send a delegate to represent our society at the approaching "World's Temperance Convention," to be held at London, in June next; but respecting the origin, progress, and present position of the "Bermuda Total Abstinence Society," we beg to offer you the following concise statement of facts.

This society was organized in July, 1841, by the Rev. Theophilus Pugh, Wesleyan minister, whose distinguished zeal, and extraordinary efforts to promote the cause, have secured him a permanent and honourable place in the esteem of all the true friends of temperance. Our excellent Governor, Lieutenant-Colonel William Reid, C.B.F.R.S., who has furnished practical demonstration of his forwardness to promote every good work, immediately patronised this society, has, in several instances, liberally contributed to its funds; and expressed his conviction of the salutary influence exerted by the friends of temperance, and the increasingly happy effects of their efforts on the various ramifications of civil and religious society.

Monthly Meetings have been held in the Town Hall of Hamilton, which; in many instances, have been numerously attended. On these occasions, addresses have been delivered, interesting and important temperance facts have been read; and, with a view to dissipate the fatal delusion on this subject, under which, by far the greater part of the inhabitants has laboured for so many years, various publications on the nature, use and effects of alcoholic drinks, have been freely circulated. Several meetings have been held also in the other parishes of the island, with encouraging results.

Since the formation of this society, several merchants, who were lucratively engaged in the spirit trade, have abandoned it. The shipping generally sail on temperance principles (which is an important fact, when we consider, that this is principally a commercial island). Many retailers no longer sell or keep this deleterious article in their shops. The number of places licensed to retail spirituous liquors, has diminished, and the opinion is now becoming prevalent, that the business is disreputable; and great numbers in the community are now acting upon the only safe principle of "total abstinence from all that can intoxicate."

At present there are upwards of 1000 pledged members. There are many subscribers to the National Temperance Advocate, and the American Journal of Temperance, and the demand for these publications is increasing. Those invaluable works Bacchus and Anti-Bacchus, have been generally perused, and several thousand pages of tracts have been circulated.

A society, on the principle of total abstinence, was organized on the 24th December, 1844, in Warwick parish, by the Rev. James Morrison of the Free Church of Scotland. The deep and lively interest which the Rev. gentleman feels in this cause, and his indefatigable efforts to check the progress of intemperance, have already produced satisfactory results. Quarterly and monthly meetings of this society have been held, addresses delivered, and numerous publications have been distributed. Number of pledged members 187.

Praying that the contemplated meeting may be attended with the most happy effects.

We have the honour to be,

Your obedient servants,
ALFRED T. DEANE, President.
THOMAS S. TUZO, Secretary.

INDIA.

BOMBAY TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

(Abridged from the Bombay Temperance Advocate.)

The seventh annual meeting was held in the officers' mess-room of the town-barracks; the assembly was highly respectable for number and character. The venerable Archdeacon Jeffreys presided, and opened the meeting with prayer. The report of the committee was read by Mr. A. Dunlop, one of the secretaries. A full account is given of the operations of the past year. The effect of these operations is thus described:—

This Society has been the means under the divine blessing of reclaiming some individuals from habits of inveterate drunkenness to a life of sobriety and of exemplary piety. It has induced many who were moderate drinkers, to abstain from a course, which they now believe would ere this have resulted in a state of frequent, if not incorrigible intemperance. And it has induced many to place themselves beyond the reach of the insidious influence of habitually, or even of ever occasionally using intoxicating liquors, by a resolution and promise not to use them at all.

The committee were glad to observe the testimony to the usefulness of this Society, in the lately published Charge of the Bishop of Bombay. His Lordship's sentiments are thus expressed:—

"In referring to different societies, I feel that I should be greatly on neglect, if I omitted to say a few words respecting one, not quite so popular as it is useful; I mean the 'Temperance Society, and under the general designation, I include the branch which requires abstinence from all intoxicating drinks; that it has been, and is very useful in reclaiming many from habits of intemperance, as well as in checking others in a progress towards such habits, can be supported by too many instances in this diocese to admit of dispute. I look upon its efforts as auxiliary to the promotion of real christianity, in as much as those efforts tend to make men sober, and to keep them in a state in which the truths and precepts of the gospel can be brought before them. In referring to this cause, I must be allowed to acknowledge with thankfulness the zealous and persevering exertions of my highly valued and beloved friend, our Archdeacon, who has steadily promoted the cause of temperance through evil report and good report, seeking out the victims of intemperance in the haunts of poverty, misery, and vice, with a view to reclaim them from their degraded and vicious habits."

The principle of this Society is one of incalculable importance to the native christian population of this country. Intemperance is the besetting sin of this class of people, as the history of native churches everywhere shows. The committee are glad to hear that missionaries in different parts of India are becoming more sensible of this fact, and also of the only means of preserving their churches from the disgrace and ruinous effects of intemperance.

E. H. TOWNSEND, Esq., moved the adoption of the report in a forcible speech, in which allusion was made to the effect of intemperance on the native population.

Rev. O. FRENCH observed:—"Until the introduction of foreign influence the use of intoxicating drinks was scarcely known here. It is contrary to the religion of both Hindoos and Mahomedans. Whence then came this exotic? From Portugal and Great Britain, enlightened, civilized Christian nations. The Portuguese of this country are proverbial for their habits of intemperance—more so than any other class of the community, excepting perhaps our own countrymen. Their example fortunately found few imitators among the natives. But when the English obtained supremacy in the land, their evil habits were more readily adopted, and they are likely to have the honour or rather the dishonour of spreading among this people one of the worst evils that can befall any nation."

Why does Government license the sale of intoxicating liquors and drugs? Is it for the good of the people? Is it to regulate and limit the traffic? But does the licensing system accomplish this end? I fear you will find, that instead of limiting, it increases the traffic, inasmuch as it gives a legal sanction to the business, which renders it honourable in the eyes of the natives. If you urge the vendor to give up a business so ruinous to his fellow-men, he promptly replies, "I am the servant of government, and by its hookum I act. Government derives important revenue from this business, and cannot get along without it. If there is sin in this matter it does not attach to me, but to government." Thus the license system gives the traffic respectability, and of course increases rather than checks the evil.

Rev. R. W. HUME remarked:—"The evil is one that is fast increasing. A respectable native of Calcutta, in a paper, read not long since, before the British India Society, says that drunkenness is 'an intolerable nuisance, daily increasing with frightful and unexampled rapidity.' And he adds that it is extending to the remote villages, 'where fortunately for the inhabitants, there are no English to set them the example.' Mark this language of a Hindoo,—'where fortunately for the inhabitants, there are no English to set them the example.'"

The resolution speaks of this subject as one deeply affecting the Native Churches, and to this point I had intended chiefly to confine my remarks. Reference has already been made to the Roman Catholic Christians. Their drunkenness is proverbial. Intemperance is perhaps their blackest stain and their greatest curse. But this evil is not confined to the Roman Catholics. It is one from which Protestant Missions too have grievously suffered. Intemperance, if I mistake not, is the besetting sin of the Native Churches. And more of the converts, gathered by Protestant Missionaries, have fallen through this than through any other cause.

Mr. HUME adduced several cases in proof of this assertion.

Should any of you endeavour to warn the Natives around you against intemperance, you will soon learn that you are beating the air, unless you can hold up your own example. To tell them to drink in moderation is madness; but if you would advise them to abstain, you yourselves must first set them the example. Tell them that you do not use intoxicating drinks, and you can then command their attention. Their judgments and their consciences are with you, and you may speak to them as a friend; you may speak with authority, and to some purpose.

MR. TAYLOR presented the meeting with some interesting statistical details.

The quantity of liquor imported last year far exceeds that of any former year—at least so far as I have been able to retrace the commercial reports. But, on the other hand, the quantity sold falls so far short of former years.

The following list of persons brought before the magistrates of Bombay within the last four years for the crime of drunkenness, will tend—in some slight degree—to show the progress of our cause.

In 1842.—2076.
 „ 1843.—1893.
 „ 1844.—1597.
 „ 1845.—1232.

Thus, it is evident, that the traffic and crime are both on the decline in Bombay: but who thinks the dealer for that? The whole quantity of liquor imported produces the whole of the misery inflicted. The wealthy merchant who sends forth his hundreds of hhds. or thousands of gallons in a year, rolls in his coach and is a respectable member of society, whilst poor old Sorabyee, who measures out his solitary drams in some disreputable locality, is known only as a despicable grog seller.

NORTHERN EUROPE.

The temperance cause is making rapid progress in the northern kingdoms of Europe, where it was greatly needed. There are now in Sweden 323 Societies, placed under a central direction, composed of the Count de Hartmannsdorf, the Baron de Berzelius, and Professor Retzius. The members are 88,687 in number, being a twenty-eighth of the whole population. Of the Stockholm Society, the King and the Prince Royal are members, and it has obtained the King's authority to convoke, in the capital, for the 15th of June next, a congress of all the temperance associations throughout Sweden, to which those of foreign countries are to be invited to send deputations. It is stated that upwards of 500 distilleries have been shut up in Sweden in the course of the last two years. In Norway, the first Society of the kind was established so lately as the end of 1844, and there are already 92, counting 11,000 members.—Athenæum.

THE NORTH WALES TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The friends of temperance in North Wales, held their Annual Assembly, at Denbigh, on the 3rd and 4th of June, 1846. Delegates from different counties met about two o'clock, at the Baptist Chapel, on the first day, for a long conference.

Their report, respecting the present state of the temperance cause, was certainly rather more unfavourable than in former years; still, it was evident, that those who live in the fear of God, and adorn the Gospel of Christ, are quite firm and faithful in their various localities, holding meetings and advocating the cause.

It was powerfully observed, that degeneracy of temperance and religion are closely connected; and that the increase of drinking, everywhere, is accompanied with the increase of other awful crimes, such as profanation of the Lord's-day, fightings, idleness, dishonesty, &c.

There were great complaints of the "navies," working on the Chester and Holyhead Railway: it seems, the foremen, contractors, or under-stewards, are a most dreadful class of men!

New public-houses are opened, everywhere, by the line, and the poor are urged and tempted to do every trifle of business in such low houses!

RESOLUTIONS were passed:—

1. That more tracts were wanted,—encouragement was given to publish a small tract, as several friends having promised to take hundreds to distribute gratuitously among the working classes.
2. That the friends of temperance be respectfully reminded of the excellent monthly periodical lately started at Llangollen, chiefly for advocating the total abstinence cause.
3. That the editors of different periodicals be modestly requested to take up the subject of temperance with more energy.
4. That the ministers who were present should be so kind as to introduce the temperance cause before the ensuing assemblies and different meetings.
5. That all the Temperance Societies be prepared to send petitions to Parliament, for preventing public-houses to be opened on the Lord's day.

Two powerful sermons were preached, the first evening, in the Independent Chapel; and, the following day, excellent speeches were delivered, at ten o'clock, in the Wesleyan Chapel; and, at two and six, in the Calvinistical Methodists large Chapel,—all well attended.

The chief speakers were the Rev. Hugh Gwalchmai, Calvinistical Methodist; Rev. J. Pritchard of Llangollen, Baptist; Rev. E. Davies of Newmarket, Independent; D. Jones, Esq. of Llansantffraid, ditto; Rev. John Roberts of Llanbrynmair, ditto.

The next temperance assembly is to be held in Caernarvon, in May, 1847.

LONDON.

SHAKESPEAR'S WALK, SHADWELL.—On Tuesday evening, May 19th, 1846, the Rev. B. Parsons of Ebley, delivered a lecture on total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, to 800 of the working class, in the Boys' British Union School Room. The chief object was to enforce temperance upon the coal-whippers, who are so numerous in the neighbourhood. The commodious room was granted for the occasion, by J. Fletcher, Esq. of Limehouse. M. R. Gamman took the labour of getting up the meeting; and W. Cash, Esq., one of the Commissioners of the Coal-Whippers Office presided. A great number of coal-whippers and their wives were present, and the lecturer kept up the attention of the multitude for two hours, illustrating the lecture by transparent diagrams, exhibiting the deadly effects of intoxicating drinks upon the liver and digestive organs. Rev. T. Moore, Minister of Shakespear's Walk Chapel, proposed, and Mr. Briscoe, minister, late of Boston, Lincolnshire, seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Parsons, for his excellent lecture, which was carried unanimously.

LEEDS.—The Whitsuntide Festivities at the Zoological and Botanical Gardens.—The great theatre of attraction on Tuesday last, for the holiday-keeping folks at Leeds, was the above named Gardens. Never were they in better order—the flowers more lovely and brilliant, the trees and shrubs more rich in foliage, and the whole of the grounds in neater keeping—at Whitsuntide, than they were this year; and never were they visited by so large a concourse of people in one day as they were on Tuesday. At a moderate calculation, there could not be fewer—men, women, and children—than from thirty to forty thousand present during the day. Never, surely, was such an assembly seen in this neighbourhood. All happy, all gay, all brimful of joy, 30,000 persons—in toiling, hard working England—assembled in the open air, on a bright cloudless day, in one of the loveliest suburban retreats that could be found in a “day’s march;”—why, the sight presented was enough to warm the heart of an anchorite, and fill with inexpressible delight the philanthropist and the friend to humanity. All these thousands of persons assembled under the auspices of the Leeds Temperance Society, whose annual festival or gala is held on Whit-Tuesday; and a debt of gratitude is due to the committee under whose management the entertainment was got up. We saw nothing to create the slightest disappointment, unless it was a want of water. From the excessive heat of the day, the demand for draughts at the spring, or well, in one corner of the Gardens, was much larger than the supply. Indeed, water was quite at a premium, and heavy and continuous was the crush to obtain it; and many persons, indeed, submitted to pay for that which was obtained from the lakes, which, as may be imagined was not of the purest kind. We would suggest that the proprietors of the Gardens should have them supplied with water from the Leeds Water-works Company. The expense would be but trifling, especially if the water was only used on gala days. Moreover, a series of beautiful fountains might easily be erected and put into play, if the water from these works was brought to the Gardens. The receipts for admission to the Gardens on Tuesday, amounted to the large sum of £421. 6s., of which the proprietors receive £203. 5s.

The annual meeting of the Society was held in the Music-hall, Leeds, on Thursday evening last. The attendance was not quite so numerous as on former occasions. The chair was taken by the Rev. J. Tunnicliffe, Baptist Minister, who explained that he was not disappointed with the strength of the meeting, as the friends of the cause had already spent two or three days of the week in rational gaieties, and it was only likely that they should at a more advanced period of the week be confining themselves to their domestic and business duties. The other principal speakers were the Rev. R. G. Mason, the Father Mathew of Scotland, and Mr. Joseph Bormond, agent of the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance. The meeting was a very enthusiastic one, and elicited many able arguments in support of temperance principles.

The treasurer, Mr. James Hotham, read a statement of his account with the Leeds Temperance Society, which showed that the receipts for the past year, including a balance of £80. 13s. 6½d. in hand at the last annual meeting were £467. 10s. 4d., and the expenses £319. 6s. 8d., leaving a balance in hand of £148. 3s.

[The above interesting account of the Leeds Temperance Festival which we have abridged from the Leeds Intelligencer, shows very clearly that physical recreation and relaxation are in no degree necessarily connected with the use of alcoholic drinks. We trust this fact will make a deep impression upon those who are making great exertions to revive “old English sports.”]

Ipswich Ladies' Temperance Committee. The first annual report states—“Twelve months having elapsed since the formation of the above Committee, at the instance of A. J. Carlile, we now present the following brief summary of the exertions of our members by means of the circulation of loan tracts.

“Commencing with thirteen, we have now the pleasure of seeing our numbers increased to thirty-one.

“With the exception of four districts in other parts of the town, allotted to those ladies who preferred them, it appeared desirable to concentrate our efforts upon the parish of Clement’s, and it has therefore been divided into thirty-one districts, containing about thirty houses each. Twenty-one of these are visited every month; six of them have only been in occupation since the beginning of this year, and the remaining fifteen were not visited until the 7th month (July) of 1845; we may therefore compute (allowing for unoccupied houses) that not less than 4350 visits have been paid to the poor inhabitants of this parish, and about 1000 in other parts of the town, making a total of 5350;—with a very few exceptions, the tracts have been and continue to be willingly received.

“Our present subscriptions will rather more than suffice to maintain our exertions at their present standard; but if we avail ourselves of the opportunities which will probably occur for the gratuitous distribution of tracts, and are successful in enlisting additional distributors, a considerable increase in our pecuniary resources will be indispensable both for the expense of new bags and tracts, and the more permanent one of keeping them in repair.

“We feel that after making these statements, we shall be called upon to show the result of our efforts, and it is with much pleasure we state, that twenty-four persons have, mainly we believe through the agency of the distributors, subscribed the pledge, and with two exceptions, have remained firm to it so far as we know. But whilst this number is not so large as we could have hoped for, we must not allow ourselves to be discouraged by it, as we conceive it cannot fairly be taken to represent the whole amount of good effected, for there may be ideas implanted and sentiments engrafted here and there, which being called into action may one day forward our cause, and prove that a blessing has rested on our efforts. Remembering therefore that we must cast our bread upon the waters in faith, let us press onward, encouraged by the success that has already attended us, and the persuasion that our object is a good one, and that whilst we devote a part of our time and talents to the promotion of this great cause, we are directly or indirectly forwarding other philanthropic and benevolent objects which share our exertions and earnest wishes; in the hope too that by the blessing of the great Lord of the harvest the fruit may be found after many days.”

The amount received is £9. 12s. 6d.; the expenditure, £9. 6s. 7d.; leaving a balance in hand of 5s. 11d.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

MARGT. SIMS MAY, Secretary.

BRADFORD.—The annual festival took place on Monday and Tuesday last, in Manningham Park, where it was held on two previous years. This year, about 15,000 persons were, during the two days, on the ground. There has nothing like it been seen in Bradford. The admission to the grounds was 3d. each. There were two bands of music in attendance, one from Leeds. There was a great deal of dancing, and the whole pastimes reminded us of the ancient sports of the 1st of May. On the two previous years, the days were remarkably wet, and marred all pleasure. We are glad to say that the long-pledged Society will reap considerable benefit from this grand rural fête. The receipts at the gate the first day were £92.; on the second, £83. Refreshments to the amount of £66., and the total expenses £91.; leaving a nett balance of £150. to the funds of the Society. We are glad of their success, for such amusements raise the moral character of the people and improve their health.—Leeds Mercury.

PORTSEA.—On the 11th of May, Mr. Langmaid, formerly of Cornwall, but now a resident in this place, delivered an interesting lecture on the Physiological and the Pathological influence of alcohol. By the aid of a powerful microscope, he clearly pointed out the different organs of the body, and illustrated the effects of alcohol on the stomach, brain, nerves, and circulation of the blood, thereby silencing our numerous opponents.

The Committee of the Portsea Society, feel confidence in recommending Mr. Langmaid to any district desirous of engaging an Agent capable of greatly serving the interests of the temperance cause.

JOHN SPARKS, Secretary.

HUNTINGDON.—A most interesting series of three lectures, on the social, moral, and intellectual elevation of the people, were delivered in the rooms of the Literary and Scientific Institution, on the 18th ult., and two following evenings, by Henry Vincent. The increasing attention paid to the subjects contained in the lectures, by a respectable auditory, each successive evening, was sufficient evidence that the people in this town are in a state of preparation, for a more full development of sound principles on education, than heretofore. Edward Martin Mason, Esq., Mayor of Godmanchester, J. L. Elkins, a respectable farmer of Woodhurst, and Rev. J. K. Holland of St. Ives, Dissenting minister, severally occupied the chair. On the 19th, a tea-meeting was held by the members of the Huntingdon and Godmanchester Total Abstinence Society, in one of the above rooms, to celebrate their anniversary, which was attended by about 130 persons; though the lectures varied from the common course of teetotal advocates, yet, in their tendency, the principles were fully maintained, and as fully appreciated by the hearers as any yet delivered in this town.

EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS by the Sub-Committee of the Essex Union.—“The Essex Temperance Union was formed in the autumn of 1842, and has since then, with very little intermission, employed an agent to advocate the principle of total abstinence from all spirituous and fermented liquors. The following places have been regularly visited, viz., Chelmsford, Colchester, Maldon, Dunmow, Saffron Walden, Great Chesterford, Debden, Braintree, Coggeshall, Brightlingsea, Witham, and Brontwood; and various meetings have been held at Aveley, Stratford, Plaistow, Walthamstow, Bishop Stortford, Bardfield, Stebbing, Halstead, Earl's Colne, Kelvedon, Woodham Walter, Roxwell, Tillingham, Southminster, Burnham, Prittlewell, Roehford, and Romford. The expenses have amounted to about eighty-five pounds per annum, and have been, with difficulty, met by subscriptions from the societies and private individuals. Delegates have assembled quarterly from the temperance societies comprised in the Union, to regulate its affairs, and it has been their anxious endeavour to secure agents of good moral character and respectable ability.

“But all efforts of this kind are attended with expense, and our desire is to awaken in your minds a willingness to contribute pecuniary aid; if this object be obtained, the Essex Temperance Union will be enabled to increase the efficiency of its operations, and extend the sphere of its agent's labours to an extent now unapproachable for want of funds.”

BATH Juvenile Temperance Society.

The eighth anniversary was celebrated on Whit-Tuesday, June 2nd. At 10 o'clock, A.M., a large number of the members of both male and female juvenile temperance societies, assembled at the Juvenile Temperance Hall, and accompanied by a band, banners, &c., went in procession to Walcot Church, where an admirable discourse was delivered by the Rev. W. H.

Turner, Vicar of Banwell, from 1 Corinthians x. 23, 24, “All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient,” &c. After the sermon, the procession paraded the principal streets of the city, accompanied by an immense concourse of spectators, and returned to the Temperance Hall, where, after the children had been addressed by Mr. Wilson, Honorary Agent of the National Temperance Society, and by the president, the national anthem was sung, and each child was presented with a plum cake, and a small book, the former being the gift of the committee, the latter the gift of Mr. Wilson. A larger number of the members attended than at any previous anniversary, and their clean and respectable appearance elicited general approbation. In the evening, at half past 6 o'clock, the annual public meeting was held in the Guildhall, which was numerously attended. Mr. J. Brumby, president of the society, was called to the chair, who, after prayer had been offered by the Rev. W. H. Turner, opened the proceedings of the evening, by a short address on the advantages of Youths' Temperance Societies, and then called on the secretary to read the annual report. This document stated, that during the past year, nearly 300 youths had signed the pledge, making the total number 2500. In the same period, 95 meetings had been held in the city and neighbourhood, and a large number of tracts distributed. The committee had been labouring to interest the Sunday School teachers of the city in favour of the temperance reformation. A copy of the Prize Essay on Temperance had been given to each teacher, and meetings had been held to show the importance of introducing our principles into Sabbath Schools. A Sunday School Temperance Union had been formed, having this object in view. About 50 teachers had joined the union. A female juvenile temperance society had been formed, superintended by a committee of adult females; about 150 girls had joined the society. The committee had taken their part in the agitation for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath. Petitions to both houses of parliament had been forwarded with this prayer. A memorial to the queen, signed by 2500 female inhabitants of the city had also been presented, praying her majesty to use her prerogative and influence for the suppression of the Sunday trade in strong drinks. The committee rejoiced in being able to state that with one or two exceptions, the practice of giving intoxicating liquors to the children at the annual entertainments had been abandoned. In those cases where the custom was still continued, the committee had presented memorials to the managers of the schools on the subject, and they hoped shortly to prove successful in their endeavours. The report closed with a fervent appeal to the friends of temperance to aid the committee in their exertions. The meeting was subsequently addressed by the Rev. W. H. Turner, Rev. T. Spencer of Hinton, (who gave some interesting details of the progress of the cause in the United States) Mr. Mauchip, and Mr. Donaldson, agent of the National Temperance Society. The proceedings terminated by singing the doxology.

TEETOTALISM.—A REFORMER AT THE ANTIPODES.—At a weekly meeting of Father Mathew's Port Phillip Branch of the Total Abstinence Society, one speaker, a mechanic, stated, that at one period of his life-time in Melbourne, he was an inveterate drunkard, and in one year he had, at different periods, been fined no less than £40 for drunkenness. But, since he became a teetotaler, he had saved sufficient from his wages to purchase an allotment, on which he had built a brick house. Such a statement of affluence, coming from a reformed drunkard, speaks more than volumes that could be written in favour of so laudable a cause.—Adelaide Observer, January 17th.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

MESSRS. THEODORE COMPTON and DAWSON BURNS having resigned, and MR. THOMAS BEGGS having been appointed sole Secretary, all communications on the business of the Society, or for insertion in the TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE, are in future to be addressed to him.

Our friends throughout the kingdom will please to observe, that the Society's Office is Removed from 39, Moorgate Street, to 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

At a Meeting of the Committee, held on the 22nd of June, the following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—"That the acknowledgments of the Committee be respectfully tendered to their late Secretary, Mr. Compton, for the attention and fidelity he has ever exhibited in the management of the Society's affairs; and that this resolution be recorded on the minutes of the Society's proceedings, and be published in the CHRONICLE."

World's Convention

We announce with pleasure, that the preliminary arrangements for this important gathering have been made. A Programme, embodying the Constitution, Principle, Objects, and Rules of the Convention, with a sketch of the first day's proceedings has been carefully compiled; and together with an appeal for subscriptions, has been forwarded to all those societies to which circulars were originally sent.

ASSOCIATIONS AND SOCIETIES

which have not appointed delegates, should do so without any further delay. Much confusion will be prevented by attention to this request.

Delegates arriving in town will please to report themselves at the Society's Office, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, near the Bank of England, where, on presenting their credentials, they will receive their cards of admission to the Convention.

RECEPTION OF FOREIGN DELEGATES.

The Committee have issued the following circular:—

SIR,—The Committee of the National Temperance Society have engaged to find residences for any of the foreign delegates who may be coming to the World's Temperance Convention, which begins on the 4th of August, and will terminate about the 12th of that month.

Most of the delegates will probably arrive before the 1st of August, and if you or any of your friends are willing to board and lodge one or more gentlemen, during that time, the Committee will be glad to receive a note to that effect, in order that they may avail themselves of your kindness.

Signed on behalf of the Committee, by

RICHARD POTTER, Chairman.

CONSTITUTION OF THE CONVENTION.

The Convention to consist of—

1. Committee and Officers of the National Temperance Society.
2. All Delegates duly appointed by Total Abstinence Societies in Great Britain, Ireland, or elsewhere.
3. All persons delegated by Religious Bodies, and by Philanthropic, Literary, or Scientific Societies, provided such persons are pledged abstainers from intoxicating liquors.
4. All persons specially nominated by the Committee of the National Temperance Society as likely to be of important service in promoting the objects of the Convention.
5. That five Secretaries be appointed, who shall also act as a Committee to arrange the business of each sitting.
6. That all original papers and resolutions be submitted in writing to the Secretaries the day before it is proposed to introduce them; and that all amendments and propositions arising out of the business under discussion be submitted to the Chairman, in writing, at the time.
7. That the Secretaries report, at the close of each sitting, to the Chairman, the business for the next sitting.

and that such business shall be regularly disposed of before any other matter is introduced.

8. That, as occasions may arise, Committees shall be appointed to draft addresses, prepare resolutions, &c., &c., to be passed through the hands of the Secretaries, to the Chairman.

9. That no member of the Convention be allowed to speak twice on the same subject, except in explanation; or the opener in conclusion; and that the Chairman keep the speakers to the point in question.

10. That all documents issued by the Convention be signed by the Chairman.

11. That all letters and documents addressed to the Convention, or to the Chairman, be referred to the Secretaries.

12. That no new business be introduced, at the morning sitting, after half-past twelve o'clock, nor in the afternoon after five o'clock.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

Public meetings will be held in various parts of the metropolis, on the evenings of each day, during the sittings of the Convention, of which due notice will be given.

On Friday Evening August 7th, a GREAT DEMONSTRATION will take place in COVENT GARDEN THEATRE, which has been specially engaged for the occasion.

Tickets may be had at the Society's Office, at the following prices, viz.,— Dress Boxes, 2s.; Upper Boxes, 1s. 6d.; Pit, 1s.; Lower Gallery, 6d.; Upper Gallery, 3d.

Delegates will be admitted at the Stage Door, on presenting their tickets.

APPEAL FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

It is now well known, that after long and patient consideration, the Committee of the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY have concluded upon holding a Convention of the friends of temperance, on the fourth of August next.

The announcement of such an event, has everywhere been received with the greatest satisfaction. Many of the earliest and most distinguished friends of the Temperance Reformation in this country, America, India, and other parts, are fully expected to attend; and the result of their deliberations cannot but prove of essential service in promoting the abolition of the drinking-customs of society.

Such an assemblage cannot, however, be held, its business carried on, and its proceedings published, without the aid of considerable pecuniary resources; and those resources must be drawn entirely from the Temperance Societies and friends of the cause in Great Britain. The success of the Convention, therefore, rests upon the British teetotalers, and to them the Committee appeal for prompt and liberal aid.

Wishing to avoid placing any unnecessary difficulties in the way, the Committee have decided not to insist upon any pecuniary qualification for delegates; but, considering the heavy expenses which must necessarily be incurred in holding the Convention, it is expected that all societies sending a delegate, will contribute to the funds, not less than one guinea.

The York and Alton Societies have at once spontaneously contributed, and the immediate assistance of all temperance societies throughout the kingdom, whether sending delegates or not, is earnestly requested.

Subscriptions are received at the Office of the National Temperance Society, by any of the Committee, and by the Treasurer, G. W. Alexander, Esq., 40, Lombard Street.

Signed on behalf of the Convention Committee,

RICHARD POTTER, Chairman.

PROVIDENCE AND CHARITY.

One of the advantages of Provident Societies is, to keep people from becoming dependent upon charity; another is, to enable people to assist their fellow-creatures, who have unavoidably fallen into poverty. Life-assurance is found to have a remarkable bearing upon benevolence. Persons who have made a certain provision, by means of assurance, do not feel the same necessity to hoard up all they can, for fear of leaving their families in want. They know, come what may, that they have made a certain provision, independent of the number of years they may have to live; and they feel, therefore, at liberty, after setting apart the annual premium required, to devote their surplus income to charitable purposes. Another advantage of Life-assurance is, that it enables even poor persons, for a very trifling expense, to leave LEGACIES to the temperance, or other benevolent societies.—Suffolk Temperance Review.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

From April 1st to May 1st, 1846.

DISTRICT No. I.—C. D., a costermonger, acknowledged himself a drunkard. He usually came home every night between eleven and one, intoxicated. He was frequently fined for drunkenness, and during the time he was in prison, it was at least £5 lost. His wife observed that while he was in prison, not one of his drinking companions came near her, or the six children, to know if they wanted a loaf of bread. But when he was at liberty and had a few shillings to spend, they were liberal enough to almost "smother" him with drink. C. D. said, he certainly should like to sign, but there was so much temptation that he was doubtful if he could keep the pledge if he took it; for instance, on going out this morning, perhaps in five minutes one would ask him to go and take a pint of ale, presently another would bring him a glass of ale or spirits. However, he would try, and hoped he should be enabled to withstand every temptation. The missionary encouraged him in this determination, and he and his wife both signed the pledge. They have since been visited, and found firm.

DISTRICT No. II.—On going into a house met with the landlord, who was after his rent. He said, he was one of the most extensive house-holders in the parish, and he was excessively troubled with drinking tenants. Teetotalism was much needed, and he wished those who were engaged in it all success. He was a very moderate drinker, but would read with attention the tracts given him.

When the landlord was gone, the tenant said, "We," meaning himself and wife, "have just had a row; there are some of the broken articles lying about, and if you look on the dust heap you may see plenty more. It all arises from drink. I am quite conscious of that." The wife as well as the missionary wanted him to take the pledge; he refused, but promised if the missionary would call in the evening, he would go with him to a temperance meeting and sign. His wife signed. The missionary called in the evening. The husband said they had been having more rows, and more things had been broken. The man acknowledged he had scarcely been sober since Christmas, (now more than three months,) and had been continually drunk the last three or four weeks. From Tuesday morning last, to Thursday evening, he did not taste food: nothing but drink! drink! He obtained it of whom and where he could, anything to satisfy the unnatural craving. Every bone in his body, he said, ached from excitement, and his whole nervous system was so shaken, that he could not steadily hold a cup. He said he went to sleep in the interval, between the first and second visit of the missionary, and on awaking, he felt cold, chilled, and depressed. His wife had tea ready, but instead of partaking of it, he got up from his chair like a fury, and without a word of provocation, commenced breaking everything he could lay his hands on. He then went up stairs with a full determination to tear down the bed furniture, and to break up the bedstead. He began, but before he had proceeded far, his eye caught a drawer at the foot of the bed, in which was his mother's snuff-box. He took it up and began to reflect. The thought of his mother subdued him, he could do no more, and he went down stairs. He was now offended because his wife, to preserve them, had removed several things to a neighbour's house and would not bring them back. She said, she was quite willing to do so, if he would but sign the pledge, which she should regard as a guarantee for their safety. The missionary endeavoured to effect a reconciliation, and pointed out that it would be to their peace of mind, health of body, and domestic comfort, for him to become an abstainer. He again said that drink was certainly the root from which all their unhappiness sprung, and he doubted not, that if he had been a steady man instead of a drunkard, he might now have been worth several hundred pounds, for he had every opportunity of getting on well. At length, a reconciliation was happily effected between them; the man signed the pledge, and the woman set about restoring the articles of furniture. They both warmly expressed their gratitude, and the wife with a smile on her countenance, observed, that if her husband did but keep the pledge, the cards of membership would have been cheap if they had cost a sovereign each. The missionary called the next morning and found them comfortably at breakfast. He has also called since, and found them happy and thankful.

DISTRICT No. III.—STREET LABOURS.—J. E. was ragged and disreputable in his appearance, which bespoke the drunkard. The missionary advised him to adopt teetotalism. He said he felt very much obliged to the missionary for stopping him and introducing the subject of total abstinence. He had often thought he should like to sign, but no one had ever asked him to do so. He then signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. IV.—STREET LABOURS.—Two men (wheelwrights) with springs on their shoulders, and both nearly intoxicated, were each furnished with a tract. One of them said, he worked with T. A. Smith before he was a teetotaler. T. A. had certainly done well by becoming so. At first, the man seemed disposed to treat the idea of Mr. Smith's teetotalism with ridicule; but the missionary succeeded in showing that the course he had taken was the wisest. "Well," said the man, "we certainly never thought Smith would have kept to the pledge. I'll sign too, and try it at any rate. I am well aware a man is never better than when he is sober and regular at his work. He can then go to his employment with pleasure, singing and whistling, but when he has been drinking he is heavy and dull, and does not care whether he goes to work or no. I'll try." He signed. The other said he would go to a meeting in the evening and sign there.

J. S. WARREN.

DISTRICT No. VII.—J. M. readily signed the pledge. He stated that strong drink had been the means of his falling from a religious profession, and of forsaking his family ever since. He had been truly miserable. He esteemed it very providential that the missionary had been directed to call upon him.

J. R. GUTTERIDGE.

DISTRICT No. IX.—STREET LABOURS.—A policeman who took the pledge some six months since, was met when on duty by the missionary, who inquired if he was still a teetotaler? He replied, "Yes. I like it more and more myself, and every day I live, see the necessity of its principles being spread. I have induced several others to sign."

In Rosemary Lane, lives Mrs. — a teetotaler, who keeps a large egg shop. She informed the missionary that some few years ago, on Easter Monday and Tuesday, she dared not take her shutters down, lest the windows should be broken by the crowd of drunkards frequenting that part of London. This Easter, she could not only take down the shutters, but expose her eggs as at other times. This pleasing change she attributed to teetotalism. Seeing a man standing by the shop window, the missionary spoke to him: he proved to be a moderate drinker, in fact, he only took a little as medicine. He was invited and signed the pledge.

At this instant, two respectable looking women passing were accosted by the mistress of the shop, and invited in. One of them was intoxicated. She had been a teetotaler for three years, she was then happy, but since she had broken her pledge, it had caused much unhappiness between her and her husband. She signed the pledge.

Her companion, and a moderate drinker was now urged to sign, in order that she might strengthen the hands of her sister. She at first hesitated, but at length said, she would give up her half pint and sign too.

DISTRICT No. XI.—STREET LABOURS.—The missionary was called by a young woman sitting at a door, who asked for a tract. After conversing a while with her, she and another young woman who was present signed the pledge. A drunken woman came up and wished to sign, to this the missionary acceded. Several other intoxicated women came up followed by others, till the missionary was surrounded by a large group of men, women and children.

An elderly, tall, Scotch woman, a known drunkard said, she would sign, three others following.

W. STONEMAN.

DISTRICT No. XVII.—A young man who with his wife had signed the pledge some months ago, and who had been great drinkers, became very ill, his medical attendant told him that had he not been a teetotaler, he would now in all probability have been in a lunatic asylum. But now said his wife, instead of having to beg for little comforts for him, and food for the children, we fall back on a benefit club, of which my husband is a member, and from which we obtain twelve shillings per week, and for this we are indebted to teetotalism. Their eldest daughter then signed the pledge.

DISTRICT No. XIX.—The superintendent having witnessed a woman in a state of intoxication, borne by two other females into a public house, obtained her address, and directed the missionary to call upon her, who when visited, signed with three of her children.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Addressed the children and distributed tracts at Marlborough Chapel, Sutherland Chapel, Crawford Road, Amicable Row, Palace Yard, (Lambeth), Juston Street, Suffolk Street, and the Old Kent Road British Schools.

DISTRICT No. XX.—Revisited the British school in George Street, Lambeth, and addressed the children, when twenty more signatures were obtained, making in two visits, fifty-four signatures.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

With leave of superintendent, attended the following meetings, viz.:—Johnston's Wharf, and Carteret Street Hall, Westminster, Trafalgar Place, Kentish Town, Cole Street, Dover Road, Suffolk Street, Southwark, Hill Street, Peckham, and a festival and meeting at Croydon.

RICHARD HODGSON.

DISTRICT No. XXVIII.—The grandson of the late A—m B. said, that though he was now the inmate of a lodging house, he was formerly the master of both house and servants, and that drink was the cause of his present degraded situation. He signed the pledge, and is now removed to a respectable lodging house, and going on well.

J. H., a blacksmith, said, "all you say respecting strong drink is quite true, it is my ruin, and has cost me health, house, and friends." His wife also was living in a female lodging house, they having lost their home through their drinking habits. The man was advised to sign the pledge, he said that would be useless unless his wife did so. The missionary saw the wife, and eventually both signed.

JAMES BALFOUR.

DISTRICT No. XXIX.—The husband of J. L. has been a drunkard nineteen years, could earn high wages as a stone Sawyer, but often out of employ through drink, left his wife and family six months since, who had consequently to be taken to the poor house where they remained some time, and were then sent out without any money to pay for a lodging, or buy their food. In this state they wandered about the streets by day, and at night slept in one of the nightly houses of shelter. The husband is now in the hospital. She signed, as also her eldest child, a boy of ten years of age. On speaking to a stone mason in Q. Street, he replied, I was a teetotaler till a few weeks back, and was much better in every respect, and would willingly have kept to it if I could, but it was impossible to do so, unless I had resolved that my wife and children should starve. I had been out of work several weeks, and in consequence had been reduced very low, was at length told of a job at Wormwood Scrubs, I went immediately, the foreman desired me to wait till he could speak to me, whilst standing beside the men, one of them who knew me said (pointing to me) he is a Toat (a bye word for a teetotaler) which at once called forth their bad feelings, the foreman uniting with them, and the result was that I lost the job, another being put on in my stead." The poor man stated positively to the missionary that the foreman would not employ him because he was a teetotaler.

INCIDENTAL LABOURS.

Monday, April 6, 1846, with leave of the superintendent, took a journey into the lower part of Oxfordshire, on account of the illness of a dear relation. Had the charge of a noisy drunkard, nearly to Oxford, it was the occasion of advocating the principle, especially at the public houses, as he announced the missionary in a most unequivocal manner, pointing him out to the landlords as one of those fellows called teetotalers. At Banbury, waited on the secretary of the society, to inquire if it would be convenient to convene a meeting for the next evening, Tuesday. On the following morning of Tuesday, walked to Blexham, my native village, about three miles distant, and spent the former part of the day in visiting and conversing with the friends of my youth upon teetotalism; left again in the afternoon, and returned to Banbury, waited on J. Head, Esq., the president of the society, who has done much in the cause of teetotalism in Banbury and the villages around. Recommended the Metropolitan Mission to his notice, and that of other influential persons; gave away some Chronicles, and pressed the subject of an extended circulation in the borough and neighbourhood. Delivered an address in the evening in the lecture-room, but the night being very wet had only a small attendance. Wednesday, spent most of the day in visiting in Blexham, and amongst others, the Rev. D. Nunwick, the Baptist minister, preached a temperance sermon in his chapel in the evening to a full congregation. If the Banbury friends could give this village their attention, I doubt not but ere long a flourishing society might be formed, the minister being very favourable. Thursday, April 9th, left Blexham, and walked to Deddington, four miles distant, was grieved to find the cause had declined in this place, in consequence of the most zealous labourer in the field having left and gone to America. Walked on two miles farther to North Aston, here are a few staunch teetotalers, but no place for meeting, gathered a few together in a friend's house, and gave them an address. Friday, April 10, left North Aston and arrived in town between six and seven o'clock in the evening.

DISTRICT No. XXXIII.—J. F. said, he had been a teetotaler for some time, a few years ago, but through the drunkenness of his late wife, he having no peace at home, had resorted to the public house and broke his pledge. Last Christmas twelve months, his wife came out of a gin-shop drunk, uttering oaths at some person who had offended her, went home, and while in a state of drunkenness, set her clothes on fire. On the neighbours rushing in, they found her lying upon the floor drunk, whilst she was wrapped in flames. She was carried to the hospital and soon expired. "If I have not suffered through drink," continued the man, "no one has; I hope now that I shall be able to keep the pledge." He then signed.

JOHN WILLIAMSON.

DISTRICT XXXIV.—On a visit to B., a new convert D. M—, a confirmed drunkard, and one of B.'s old pot companions was present. The missionary exhorted him to follow B.'s example and sign the pledge; he at first refused, but at length was induced to say, "Well, I'll sign," he signed; on inquiring if his wife was a teetotaler, replied no, though he never knew her to be intoxicated, but added, I have a boy, eleven years old, who has been a teetotaler two years, his reason for signing was, that on a certain day being sent to the K. H. public-house for half a pint of beer, on coming to the house he saw the landlord throw a drunken man out of doors, his head coming against the stones, caused a quantity of blood to escape, having brought the beer home, he was asked by his father to take a little, to which he replied, "No, father, I'll never drink a drop more while I live." After ascertaining that the wife was not a teetotaler, the missionary proposed to accompany him home, and obtain her signature, he consented—we therefore departed. On arriving there, we found her engaged in cleaning the room. On seeing the missionary, she placed a chair and courteously asked him to sit down. Some conversation ensued on the merits of teetotalism, during which she applauded the boy's conduct as a teetotaler, expressed her wish that her husband was one also; being informed that he had signed, she remarked, "then, take my name, Sir, if you please." She signed. The boy was then called, who is in appearance an interesting lad, but in consequence of his father's intemperance has received no education, therefore cannot read. A subsequent visit has found them firm, the missionary presented the boy with a spelling-book which he gratefully received. The father engaged to give his attention to his boy's reading evenings, indeed, the work of reformation is already visible in the altered disposition of the man.

FRANCIS COLLINS.

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

THE HONORARY TRAVELLING AGENT'S REPORT.

Having completed the tour of Cumberland, and spent a week or more with my family, in the north, I proceeded to London, in the early part of May, to be present at the anniversaries of the religious and benevolent societies held in that month. During my stay, I received an invitation from my friends at Lambeth, to address the Sunday-schools in that vicinity, which I did in the afternoon of Sunday, 10th of May, at the Wesleyan Chapel, when there were, at least, 1500 children, and 300 teachers and adults present. I distributed, at the close, a like number of addresses to Sunday-scholars, and left sheets of temperance pledges for such children as might feel disposed to enrol their names, with the several Superintendents; and I have been informed that great numbers have since taken the pledge.

The following Sunday, I addressed 2000 children, &c., at the Borough Road Baptist Chapel, and distributed temperance and other publications. After attending the annual meeting of the National Temperance Society, in the proceedings of which, I was permitted to take part, and conferring with the committee as to my next route, it was determined that I should visit the western counties, during the ensuing two months, until the period of the World's Convention, in August.

BATH.—On the 30th of May, I proceeded to Bath, and the day following, (Sunday) I addressed the children of the Wesleyan schools, at Walcot Chapel, and distributed tracts, &c. On the 2nd inst. I joined a procession of the Juvenile Temperance Society, which proceeded from the Temperance Hall, to Walcot Church.

The annual meeting of the said society, was held in the Town Hall, the same evening, when I addressed the children after coming from church, and distributed tracts, &c., among them.

On the 4th inst., I attended a large meeting of the members and friends of the temperance cause, at their Hall, and explained, and recommended the national organization, when it was resolved to adopt it; and steps were taken to carry the object out in the formation of a branch society. The cause, for some time, has been languishing, and the society needs reviving. A number of persons offered their services as loan tract distributors; and some gave donations to obtain the necessary supply of loan tracts. I addressed the weekly meeting of juveniles, the night following, at the Hall.

BRISTOL.—I proceeded to Bristol on the 6th of June, and the day following, (Sunday) addressed 1200 children of various schools, and about 300 teachers in the largest Wesleyan Chapel, and the teachers and parents, at an Independent Chapel in the evening.

On the 8th inst., I laid before the weekly meeting, held at the Temperance Hall, the nature and objects of my mission, and on the following evening, before a crowded meeting of the members and friends of the cause, at the Lancasterian school-room, detailed the benefits likely to result from the national organization for the city and its suburbs. The subject was taken up with great spirit, and a resolution was unanimously passed, to form a branch in the most intemperate part of the city, and a great number of persons, of both sexes, offered their services as tract distributors.

Edward Thomas, Esq., presided at the above meeting, who, with Joseph Eaton, and Robert Charlton, Esqrs., of the Society of Friends, are the patrons and liberal supporters of the society.

The Bristol and Somerset Union has been the parent institution of most of the societies in the western counties, and is one of the most active, zealous, and successful associations in the kingdom. It has, for some years, employed a permanent agent, to itinerate and lecture. It keeps a printing establishment for the publication of Tracts, and a Monthly Temperance Periodical, which has an extensive circulation, both in its own neighbourhood, and throughout the kingdom. I held two public meetings, weekly, at the temperance hall, and it has supplied the adjoining counties with its tracts. The society enjoys very munificent patronage; and the results of its long and persevering efforts, have been very delightful and encouraging. There are upon the books, since its commencement, alone, 25,000 pledged abstainers, although the present numbers, both of adult and juvenile members, is not supposed to exceed 10,000. A juvenile society has existed since the year 1837; which, during the past year, has merged into the Bristol Juvenile Total Abstinence Union, embracing 50 Sunday Schools. The population of the city and suburbs, are supposed to be about 140,000.

Pleasing and encouraging, as the above statements may appear, there is yet great need of increasing exertions, to stem the torrent of intemperance. Not a tythe of the inhabitants of the city has been brought under the influence of temperance; and it will be seen, by the subjoined statistical returns, which have been lately taken, that the establishments for the manufacture and sale of strong drink, are fearfully numerous. In Bristol, there are, 1 distillery, on a very large scale, 20 breweries, 15 agents of brewers, 82 spirit and wine-merchants, 56 inns and hotels, 200 beer-houses, 350 taverns, making in all, 724. Whereas, there are, bakers, 120; butchers, 150; provision dealers, 64; grocers, &c., 250, making only, 584; and being 140 fewer than places for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The reception I have met with, has been kind and encouraging; and from the public spirit evinced at the meetings I have attended, I have strong grounds for hope, that this great Western Association, will become still more efficient, and successful in carrying out the proposed organization.

On the 10th ult., I had a pleasant conference with the committee, when a supply of tracts and other requisites were ordered from the National Society's depot, and arrangements made to carry out the resolutions of the public meeting, in regard to the formation of a Branch Society, on the national system of organization. Delegates were also appointed to attend the approaching Temperance World's Convention; the holding of which, appears to excite a lively interest throughout the provinces. On the day following, I addressed the members of the Working-Men's Branch Society, and recommended the usual organization, and there is a fair prospect of its being carried out in this district of the city, with much spirit. I proceed, next week, to Weston-Super-Mare, and Banwell, to which places, I have been recommended by the Bristol Society.

VISITING AGENT.—JABEZ INWARDS, BEDFORDSHIRE.

Since my engagement as a Visiting Agent of the National Temperance Society, I have held meetings in the following places:—

GREAT BRICKHILL, in the Baptist Chapel, here the cause is making steady progress; the minister's son is truly a zealous teetotaler.

RIDGEMONT.—A very interesting meeting in the open air; the people heard the word gladly; many were convinced, and I have since heard that many have signed the pledge. This meeting was held on the Sabbath-day, at such a time as not to prevent any persons from attending a place of worship.

ASLEY GUISE.—A very good meeting in a large room belonging to our hearty friend, Mr. G. J. Arnold. At this meeting several labouring men bore their testimony to the fact, that they could work better without strong drink. Several signatures were obtained.

LEDBURN, in the Baptist Chapel; in this little place the people manifest a desire to hear and read about the matter.

LUTON.—The meeting was small; said to be so in consequence of its being the busiest time with the manufacturers.

WHITCHURCH.—In this place I have held several meetings; many have signed the pledge; a society has just been formed, consisting of such as feel the importance of the work in which they have engaged.

BOROUGH GREEN.—Attended the second anniversary of the Society. The success of the cause in this place, is partly owing to the zeal and activity of our young friend, Mr. George Busbridge, nearly a hundred sat down to tea, and in the evening a very excellent meeting was held, when a friend from Town Malling, took the chair. Mr. Crampton of Sevenoaks said a few words, after which I delivered a lecture. At the close, 12 signed the pledge.

FOLKSTONE.—Here I found a little, but I think a good Society. A small party of friends drank tea together in the Wesleyan School Room. In the evening, a public meeting was held in the Independent Chapel, when the respected minister, who is a teetotaler, took the chair; I was pleased to see quite a party of warm-hearted friends from Dover. Generally speaking, the cause is making progress; there is a wide field for labour. In the rural districts, I find the people in almost a state of profound ignorance upon the temperance question, thousands are devoted to strong drink, and many drink it to their own destruction. We are continually hearing of persons who have been deprived of their lives by intemperance.

Other points which require great care in the administration of Shower Baths are, First, Of what temperature is the shower to be. Second, How much water is the bath to contain. Third, How large the perforated holes are to be, through which the drops or fine streams, as the case may be, are to descend. Fourth, From what height these drops or streams are to fall on the body of the patient. Fifth, On what part or portion of the body are they to fall. Sixth, What time the bath is to last. Seventh, What time of the day or night is it to be given, with reference to the temperature of the atmosphere on the one hand, and with reference to the period at which meals are taken on the other; and the last, not least in importance, the situation of the bath itself.

I am on terms of intimacy with a gentleman whose youthful daughter was in an alarmingly delicate state of health, her spirits gone, her countenance dejected,—a shower bath was daily prescribed, which she persevered in, during a cold spring for several months, without any benefit whatever, and on being told that she had tried the water cure, in the form of a shower bath, without deriving any advantage from it, I made some inquiry, and found that the young lady slept in a room on the second floor, that the bath was in a cold back kitchen, under ground of course, being in a London house, though in one of our best squares. This poor delicate girl had to come from her warm bed, down two pair of stairs, to this cold back kitchen, and by the time she reached it was, of course, thoroughly chilled through, her every feeling revolted at the very idea of what was going to happen,—the water was cold—her head was in the vacuum before alluded to—her chest, naturally too delicate, was most painfully distressed—no rule was given for the quantity of water to be used beyond filling the cistern of the bath, nor any as to the duration of the bath, beyond the length of time it was emptying itself—she left the bath in a miserable state of feeling, and the only wonder was that it did not do her serious injury. Afterwards, the whole plan was changed, by a physician of eminence who had made the medical use of baths his particular study. The bath was taken up to her comfortable bed-room on the second floor, a fire was lighted in the room an hour before she rose, and at the same time, an additional pair of blankets was thrown over her, to give her additional warmth before the bath—the water in the bath was tempered to 75 degrees of Fahrenheit—only five gallons of water were used—the head was left outside of the bath curtains—the bath was set close to the bed-side, and the instant she rose, warm from under the blankets, she placed herself in the bath and received the shower on her body only. In a very few days her health improved, and in a few weeks she was pronounced to be perfectly restored to health, while her lively spirits and animated countenance told the pleasing tale to all her friends.

Here, then, is a striking example of the different effect produced by the same remedy, when administered by skilful and unskilful hands; and it ought to teach us to be careful how we under-value any particular kind of medical treatment, in consequence of ill effects having been produced in individual cases, until we have carefully ascertained, whether or not the treatment was administered in those cases by competent persons.

Reviews.

SOBRIETY CONTRASTED WITH INTEMPERANCE IN A SERIES OF ADDRESSES, by GEORGE E. McCULLOCH, Stirling. With a Preface, by Rev. G. WIGHT of Doune. Edinburgh, C. Zeigler; Glasgow, G. Gallie; Stirling, Observer office.

This interesting work is divided into two parts: the first entitled Recollections from the Life of a reclaimed Drunkard, in which is affectingly portrayed the history of the writer, from the time of his initiation into the drinking-customs of Scotland, to the period when, after enduring all those miseries which only the victim of intemperance can experience, he resolved to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, and became the possessor of the blessings which follow a release from the slavery of strong drink.

The Addresses display a mind well stored with the most cogent arguments in favour of temperance. The style in general is clear and unaffected. It would not, indeed, be difficult to detect some imperfections and inelegancies of expression; but these are dust in the balance when compared with the sound sense pervading every page of the work, and which combined with the deep feeling of earnestness evident throughout, show the author to be a scribe well instructed in the things of which he writes, and fully conscious of their real importance. We need not add, that we give the work our cordial recommendation. We believe its circulation will be especially useful among that numerous class who wish well to our cause; but are yet only conjugating the potential mood of the temperance question.

A DRINKING EDUCATION ILLUSTRATED; or the Progress of intemperance. London, W. Brittain, 11, Paternoster-row; Rochester, Wheeler and Son.

This tract, or rather, pamphlet, consists of six well-executed wood-cuts tracing the progress of intemperance in five "lessons;" the first of which is learned in the "nursery;" the second in the "parlour;" the third in the "dining-room;" the fourth in the "workshop;" and the fifth in the "club-room." There is one other wood-cut which teaches the reader a powerful lesson, representing the victim of intemperance under an attack of that most dreadful of maladies, delirium tremens. All the illustrations are accompanied by a number of very excellent observations, well adapted to impress the mind with the value of abstaining from every kind of intoxicating liquor.

The Cabinet.

"ALMOST A NECESSARY!"—A portion of the Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the burdens on land, have produced a report in which they speak of beer as "almost a necessary to the great mass of the population."—Not long ago it was quite a necessary!

A RENEGADE TEETOTALER.—At the Chorley petty sessions, John Rhodes was charged with drunkenness, at "Botany Bay," near Chorley. On being called upon to plead, John said he had been twelve months a teetotaler "end and side," but being a "codd morning," he took a glass to warm him, and then took another to keep the first company. Having had a "sareus hort in his hed, a varra littul tuk howd on him," which was the reason he was found in a state of intoxication. Fined 5s. and costs 4s. 6d.—Leeds Times.

BEER v. BISCUIT.—"One biscuit will afford a working-man more support than the beer which he will drink from sunrise to sunset."—Dr. J. C. Warren.

"MALT LIQUORS," says Dr. Cheyne, "make excellent bird-lime, and when simmered some time over a gentle fire, make the most sticking and the best plaster for old strains that can be contrived."

DR. CHARLES A. LEE states, "As a general rule, I hesitate not to aver, as my settled conviction, that malt liquors are more deleterious in their effect on the system than ardent spirits."

EFFECT OF DRUNKENNESS.—"No interest is taken in the concerns of others—no love, no sympathy remain; even natural affection to nearest relatives is gradually extinguished, and the moral sense obliterated."—Dr. Wilson.

"IN VINO VERITAS."—Boswell on one occasion attempting to defend convivial indulgences in wine, adduced this maxim in proof of the opinion, that when men were overcome by wine they would often reveal their true character, which, when sober, they would carefully conceal. Dr. Johnson replied, "That may be an argument for drinking, if you suppose men in general to be liars. But, Sir, I would not keep company with a fellow who lies so long as he is sober, and whom you must make drunk before you can get a word of truth out of him."

WINE.—"My whole experience assures me, that wine is no friend to vigour or activity of mind. In a survey of my whole acquaintances and friends, I find that water drinkers possess the most equal temper and cheerful dispositions."

A KING v. A SPONGE.—Æschines commending Philip King of Macedon, as a jovial man that would drink freely, Demosthenes answered, that this was a good quality in a sponge, but not in a king.

FRUITS OF TEETOTALISM.

BY A WORKING MAN.

(Extract from a Tract with the above title.)

Early in the year 1842, I attended a temperance meeting; and was so convinced on that occasion, of the evils resulting from intoxicating liquors, that I resolved, after leaving the room, to follow the example of some of my pot companions, who had already abstained. When I first signed the pledge, I was surrounded by a great number of public-house associates; but with a determined hand

I broke the Tyrant's chain,
When down I dashed the bowl accurst
Determined to abstain.

In a short time after I had signed, my next door neighbour, a zealous teetotaler, began to hold temperance meetings in his house. Encouraged by this, the friends of temperance took a room, on the 1st of May; and on the 1st of November, could boast of nearly one hundred members, in a village consisting of only 140 dwellings. Often does my heart rejoice when I think of the time I first began to assist my good friends, for at that period, my house was like many are at the present time—a scene of drunkenness and confusion. On many occasions has my fireside been surrounded by my jovial, but drunken companions, with their jugs and glasses—their oaths and curses—and foul-mouthed blasphemy and falsehood. But oh! what a change, what a lovely change, has taken place! the jug and glass have fled—all their attendant evils have vanished, I believe for ever. The hearth of my cottage has been in many instances occupied with lessons in reading, writing, and other useful studies. And one more cause of rejoicing, and that not the least, is, that I have sat by the side of a girl thirteen years of age, taking lessons in arithmetic, which would never have been the case but for the instrumentality of total abstinence. I well remember letting slip the golden opportunity of Sunday School education; but what was the cause of this early and lamentable neglect? At that time I was led to the crofters' pay table, where we were compelled to wait three, four and five hours for our wages, which has been the cause of thousands of our countrymen falling into intemperate habits. For in a short time, the love I once bore for the Sunday, was transferred to the tap-room, where morals are corrupted, hopes blighted, characters ruined, constitutions broken down, and souls driven into eternal perdition. While I am writing these lines, and my thoughts recur to the school in which I was so kindly treated, I cannot look upon the drinking-customs without strong feelings of disgust; and if but one poor drunkard is reclaimed by the following illustrations from real life, of scholars who stood side by side with me in the school of my early days, I shall be amply rewarded for my trouble:—

T. S. & W. J.—Were transported for the term of their natural lives for crime committed in a drinking spree.

T. A.—Emigrated to America, and there continued his drinking career till death put an end to his vices and his misery, while under the influence of strong drink.

W. O.—Went home one night inflamed with liquor; beat his wife, turned his children into the street, and the next morning that poor woman had to go to her daily toil dreadfully bruised by the hand of her brutal husband, with her clothes sprinkled with her own blood. And he again inflamed himself with liquor, descended into the bowels of the earth to his daily labour, and before the toils of the day were completed he was buried beneath the surface of the earth, and in the twinkling of an eye received the summons of death. Who can say let me die the death of that man, and let my last end be like his?

R. S.—Died under the afflictions brought on by intemperate habits.

J. E.—Enlisted in the army, which has long been a cause of sobs and sighs to a troubled mother.

J. H.—Went to America, and when last heard of, was a great drunkard.

C. H.—Has beyond all doubt been saved by total abstinence.

J. H.—Attributes his present existence to the practice of entire abstinence from intoxicating drinks.

J. B.—Can truly say he has been snatched from utter ruin, by the temperance society, and is now the conductor of a Sunday School.

G. C.—Would not perhaps have been saved from the jaws of the monster, had it not been for entire abstinence.

I am sometimes at a loss what to think of our village operatives, who are nightly wasting their strength at the expense of social and domestic happiness. If they would but open their eyes to the beneficial changes which have resulted from the adoption of this principle, and draw the contrast between present and past scenes, they would, I am convinced, be led immediately to change their course. We could point them to the time when we had five beer-houses, and now have but one. When we compare the present with the past condition of the village, we are glad and rejoiced; for it is a fact, that it was almost impossible for the weary labourer to sleep on a Saturday night: and on the Sunday, during the services in the church, the cottages were filled with the sweepings of the tap-room, from whom the young learnt to imitate this soul and body destroying practice. But a change for the better has taken place. I should like to take a walk round our village with some of our opposing ministers, on a Sabbath day morning. I could point them to many children bending their steps to a Sabbath school, that never did so before the temperance society was established. I could shew that emaciated starving wife and mother, fast changed to a human countenance beaming with smiles, that was known to cry for joy at being able to put on a change of raiment, to which she had been a stranger from the day of her marriage. But I must come to a close, or I could give you an account of seventeen families in this small village, that are now enjoying the fruits of their own labour; who never did so before the sound of teetotalism was heard amongst them.

GEORGE CRANSHAW.

Poetry.

Y^e THREE VOYCES.

(From Douglas Jerrold's Magazine.)

Y^e glasse was at my lippe,
Clear spyrit sparkling was
I was about to sippe,
When a voyce came from y^e glasse—
“And would'st thou have a rosie nose?
A blotched face and vacant eye?
A shaky frame that feebly goes?
A form and feature alle awry?
A body racked with rheumy paine?
A burnt-up stomach, fever'd braine?
A muddle mind that cannot thinke?
Then drinke—drinke—drinke!”

Thus spoke ye voyce and fledde,
Nor any more did say;
But I thought on what it saide,
And threw ye glasse awaye.

Y^e pipe was in my mouthe,
Y^e first cloude o'er me broke;
I was to blow another
When a voyce came from y^e smoke!
Come, this must be a hoaxe;—
Then I'll snuffe if I may not smoke;
But a voyce came from y^e boxe,
And thus these voyces spoke:—

“And would'st thou have a swimmie hedde,
A smokie breath and blacken'd toothe?
And would'st thou have thy freshness fade,
And wrinkle up thy leafe of youthe?
Would'st thou have thy voyce to lose its tone,
Thy heavenly note, a bagpipe's drone?
If thou would'st thy health's channels choke,
Then smoke—smoke—smoke!
The pipes of thy sweet musick stufte,
Then snuffe—snuffe—snuffe!”

Thus spoke and fled they both,
Glasse pipe, boxe, in a daye,
To lose them was I loath
Yet I threw them alle awaye.

O, would we be alle health, all lightnesse,
Alle youth, alle sweetness, freshnesse, brightnesse,
Seeing through everything
With mindes like y^e crystal splinge!
O, would we be just right enough!
Not drinke—not smoke—not snuffe;
Then would our forward course
To y^e right be as naturall
As it is withouten force,
For stoves downward to falle.

The following poignant satire on the custom of drinking, is extracted from a recent No. of PUNCH.

A BACCHANALIAN SONG.

(Dedicated to Father Mathew.)

Toss your tippie off, roystering, jolly boys,
Fill the tumbler, and empty the go ;
Ne'er the consequence heed of your folly, boys,
Beggary, ruin, disease, and woe,—
Delirium tremens, and gout, and dyspepsia,
Febris and Icterus, Phthisis, decline,
Marasmas and megrims, confirmed epylepsia—
But pass round the bottle and drink up your wine.

Krysipelas, elephantiasis,
Don't regard my good fellows a fig.
Impetigo, lichen, psoriasis,
Tho' they lurk in each draught that you swig.
Eczema, lepra, and all the variety
Of acne that Willan's nosology shows,
Shall never make us, lads, avoid inebriety—
Why, what if I do spoil the look of my nose ?

Hæmatemesis, hydrops, Tetanus,
Tho' we shall probably have them some day,
Ne'er let us mind whilst as yet they but threaten us,
Let us be merry and drink whilst we may.
Come, apoplexia, mania, and paralysis ;
Of these and all other complaints we'll make light :
And happy and jovial as kings in their palaces,
Tho' we suffer to-morrow, get tipsy to-night.

ANCIENT DRINKING.

From the Notes to a new Edition of Cowper's Homer's Odyssey.

Ben-hadad was drinking with his vassal kings, when the reply came from the king of Israel, setting his power at defiance : he gives his order for battle and goes on drinking ; the Israelites come out, and finding him and his thirty-two kings drunk, defeat his army, and he is glad to escape with his life.—1 Kings xx.

Elah, King of Israel was at Tirzah, "drinking himself drunk" in the house of his steward Arza, when Zimri went in and slew him, and reigned in his stead.—1 Kings xiv. 9, 10.

Holofernes was lying along upon the bed, filled with wine, when Judith took his own sword and beheading him with it, made her escape.

The prophet Jeremiah says, of Babylon, "I will make drunk her princes and her wise men, her captains, her rulers, and her mighty men : and (in which state being slain) they shall sleep a perpetual sleep and not wake, saith the King whose name is the Lord of Hosts."—Jer. li. 57. Comp. Dan. v., and see the cautions in Matt. xxiv., xlix., &c.

TO FARMERS.

As it is a prevailing custom to give agricultural labourers beer during the hay and corn harvest, notwithstanding all the evils of which it is the occasion : we would, at this season of the year, call the attention of our readers to the tract in the Ipswich series, No. 51, Money Better than Beer ; also, No. 65, Experience of a Farm-servant. We hope that the friends of temperance, and indeed all who are well-wishers of the poor, and are anxious to ameliorate their condition, will circulate these tracts very extensively, especially the former. We do not think that the public attention has been as yet sufficiently directed to the importance of giving money to our labourers instead of beer.

DR. JOHNSON.

Boswell says, that when he asked Johnson why he persevered in his abstinence from wine, the great moralist replied, "Sir, I have no objection to a man's drinking wine, if he can do it in moderation. I found myself apt to go to excess in it, and therefore, after having been for some time without it, on account of illness, I thought it better not to return to it." If every scholar and gentleman, who finds himself "apt to go to excess," would follow Johnson's example, abstinence would be more common, and less vulgar.

ADULTERATION OF BEER.—Mr. Dearden, a brewer in Manchester, was convicted on Tuesday last, in the Borough Court, of using Grains of Paradise, for the adulteration of beer. The Excise Officers proved that they had found, at least, a pound of those grains on the premises, but intimated, that in this case, they would only press for the mitigated penalty of £50, the lowest amount under the act 5 Geo. III., c. 58.

Mr. Maule said, he thought the Excise had dealt very leniently indeed, with the delinquent, in not pressing for more than the lowest penalty. He strongly censured the use of grains of Paradise, which he characterized as poisonous stuff, calculated injuriously to affect the health of those who use ale.—Daily News, May 29.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

James Alfred Temple. Our friend is misinformed.

The sittings of the Temperance Convention will not be held in Covent Garden Theatre, but in the City of London Literary Institution, Aldersgate Street. It is proposed to hold a great Public Meeting in Covent Garden Theatre, on Friday Evening, the 7th of August ; and to this proceeding, the Committee do not see any formidable objection.

The reference to the "Quakers," &c., is not in point. All religious persons would, unquestionably, refuse to visit a Theatre for the purpose of witnessing dramatic performances ; but we do not see any ground for refusing to enter a building, when for the time being, it is devoted to the promotion of a purely benevolent object.

Many members of the Society of Friends attended the League Bazaar, in the May of last year ; and several times did Protestants of all creeds, Churchmen, and Dissenters crowd the stage, boxes, and other parts of the same Theatre, to record their opposition to the passing of the Maynooth College Bill of 1845.

Giving, therefore, our correspondent full credit for sincerity of his convictions, we do not think he will find many even "strict" Dissenters and "strict" Churchmen, who will sympathize with his views.

NEW WORK.

THE PEOPLE'S TEMPERANCE LIBRARY.

In Royal 32mo, vols One Shilling each, handsomely printed, and bound in cloth, and for cheapness and literary character, equal to any work of the day.

This work is not intended to rival any existing publications, but to occupy a position peculiarly its own. It will contain a selection of the choice articles, which have appeared, or may appear, from time to time, on the Temperance question, and will consist of original and selected Essays—Lectures—Tales—Poetry—Statistics—Anecdotes—Scientific Information, &c. &c. &c. The first volume will be ready for delivery with the Magazines in August next.

The volumes will appear at such intervals as shall be suitable to the circumstances of the multitude, and so place it within the power of all classes to possess "The People's Temperance Library."

London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co. (of whom Prospectuses may be had); Ipswich, J. M. Burton, and may be had of all Booksellers.

WANTED.

A Middle-Aged MAN and his WIFE, to take charge of a Temperance Coffee House and Reading Room in the neighbourhood of London, under the superintendence of a Committee. They must be thoroughly active competent persons, and Total Abstinents. Unexceptionable references will be required.

Application to be made by letter, stating age and qualifications, to Charles Tylor, Stamford-hill, near London, not later than the 8th of the Seventh Month, (July).

22nd of Sixth Month, 1846.

WIDOWS' AND FUNERAL FUND.

TEMPERANCE PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, 39, MOORGATE STREET, LONDON.

TRUSTEES.

W. JANSON, JUN., ESQ. ROBERT WARNER, ESQ.
EDWARD WEBB, ESQ.

SECRETARY.

THEODORE COMPTON.

NOTICE.

On the first of August, it is intended to commence a New Department for assuring Funeral Money and by easy instalments, payable during life. The scale and particulars will be sent post-free to any address given; and it is requested that secretaries of Rechabite Tents and other Benefit Societies, who may be disposed to join the new department, will make early application, as it will not be opened till a sufficient number of names are sent in.

Upwards of 2100 policies have now been issued, and the number of deaths in five and a-half years, has been only FOURTEEN—less than half the usual average!

TOTALERS are reminded that this is the only office where they can secure the full benefits of their payments, free from losses by intemperance, and by the premature decay brought on by the use of stimulants.

EXAMPLES.

Every man or woman at the age of 30, can secure the immediate power of leaving by will, the sum of £100, by a payment of 11s. 10d. per quarter, or £2 5s. 11d. per year, less than one shilling per week. (Department 1.)

Every person aged 30, by paying 12s. 4d. per quarter, or £2 6s. 6d. per year, can secure £50 as above; but with the additional benefit of having the £50 paid to himself on his attaining the age of 50 years. (Department 2.)

A person aged 31, can secure an income of £20 a-year, by paying 2s. per week till he is 60. (Department 5.)

A person aged 24, can secure £500 at the age of 50, by paying £10 a-year, till he arrives at that age. (Department 3.)

Full Tables, Rules, &c., may be had gratis at No. 39, Moorgate Street.

* * As no one can be admitted to Departments 1 and 2, who is not in good health, all persons are advised to enter at once. Lose not a day.

HART'S COMMERCIAL HOTEL

AND

TEMPERANCE COFFEE HOUSE,

159, ALDERSGATE STREET, CITY.

ESTABLISHED 1836.

M. B. HART returns thanks to his numerous friends who have patronised his Establishment during the last ten years, and begs to acquaint those Ladies and Gentlemen who intend visiting the Metropolis at the Meeting of the World's Convention, that he has made arrangement for the purpose of accommodating those who may favour him with their commands, securing them every comfort at moderate charges.

Persons wishing to secure comfortable rooms, will do well to send a letter before the time of their arrival, stating the number they require, which will be strictly attended to.

This Establishment is centrally situated either for business or pleasure, being within a few minutes' walk of St. Paul's, the Post-Office, all the Railway Booking Offices, and only four doors from the Literary Institution, where the meetings are to be held.

All information in reference to the meetings, &c., may be obtained by application.

WORLD'S

TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION, to be held in London the beginning of August next, is confidently expected to be the most interesting and important movement ever made, in connexion with the Temperance reformation. Distinguished friends and advocates of teetotalism from various parts of the world will be present, and, in addition to a large mass of valuable information as to the progress of the cause, principles of the highest moment will be discussed, and practical rules laid down for the more rapid and permanent establishment of Teetotalism in every quarter of the globe. Besides the daily sittings of the Convention, Public Meetings will be held in Covent Garden Theatre, Exeter Hall, and other large places.

The Proprietor of the TEETOTAL TIMES being anxious that proceedings of such importance should be duly recorded and extensively circulated, has determined upon publishing correct reports in a DOUBLE NUMBER, containing thirty-two closely printed folio columns, price TWO-PENCE, or threepence for a stamped copy, which can be sent post-free to any part of the kingdom, or to the British Colonies.

The Number will bear date Saturday, August 15th, but it will be ready to send to all parts of the country in the weekly parcels of that date. Societies or individuals wishing for a number of copies, or for the stamped edition, must send their orders by August 8th, as but a limited number will be printed.

The TEETOTAL TIMES is published regularly on the first day of every month, price ONE PENNY, or for the stamped edition, 2s. per annum.

WILLIAM BRITAIN, TEMPERANCE DEPOT, 11, PATERNOSTER ROW.

* * * The NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE and TEMPERANCE RECORDER is published on the first day of each month, at HOULSTON & STONEMAN, the Depot of the National Temperance Society, 65, Paternoster-row, and will be sent post-free for one year on receipt of 2s. 6d. postage labels. Annual Subscriptions received at the Society's office, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London, and subscriptions and donations for the general purposes of the Society, by the Treasurer, G. W. ALEXANDER, 40, Lombard Street; by any Member of the Committee; and at the office as above.

London: Printed by RICHARD BARRETT of 8, Regent-terrace City-road, in the Parish of St. Lukes, in the County of Middlesex, Printer; at his Printing Office, No. 13, Mark-lane, in the Parish of Allhallows Staining, in the City of London; and published by JOHN STONEMAN, of 24, Brooksbury Street, in the Parish of Islington, in the County of Middlesex, at HOULSTON and STONEMAN'S, No. 65, Paternoster-row, in the Parish of St. Michael-le-Querne, in the City of London, Publishers.—Wednesday, July 1st, 1846.

Chronicle and Recorder.
 AUGUST 1st, 1846.

Though all standing and prepared to sign the pledge at once if offered to them, it was thought more prudent to give a little further time for calm reflection. It is true that one of the magistrates present, previous to the question being put, had addressed the prisoners, and clearly explained to them that they would gain no favour while in the prison by signing the pledge—that no relaxation of the prison discipline would ensue in consequence, and, in fact, their signing the pledge must only be considered with reference to benefits which might arise to them after the term of their imprisonment had ended. Nevertheless, all were firm in their wish to become pledged teetotalers; to prevent the possibility, therefore, of any one being taken by surprise, small cards which had been prepared for the occasion, and on one side of which was printed the pledge in legible characters, were distributed, one to each of the seventy-one prisoners, who were requested to peruse it carefully, consider it well, and, at the end of three days, those who remained of the same mind were to give in their names to the chief warden, and should have the opportunity of a separate interview with the magistrate, when, if he could give a good and sufficient reason for wishing to sign the pledge, he should be allowed to do so. This careful proceeding only reduced the list by one single individual, whose very peculiar case will be referred to hereafter; seventy still adhered to their determination of taking the pledge, if permitted to do so. At the end of a week the separate visits began; the visiting magistrate attended at the prison from half-past six in the morning till half-past eight, which was the prisoners breakfast hour, and occupied himself during that period in noting down the minute details of each individual case,—the name, age, birth, parentage, education, and occupation of the prisoner,—what first seduced him into the secret paths of vice, and by what steps he gained the public high road of crime. I need not tell those who have taken the pains, either from curiosity or a better motive, to examine into the statistics of intemperance, that the result of this investigation has been to more than fully bear out the assertions made by the excellent and learned judges alluded to, in the early part of these papers, namely, Lord Bacon, Sir Matthew Hale, Mr. Baron Alderson, and Mr. Justice Coleridge, that four-fifths of all crimes committed in England, are traceable directly or indirectly to drunkenness. At the end of the investigation of each case, the prisoner was asked if he still wished to sign the pledge, and answering in the affirmative, was required to state some good and sufficient reason for so doing, and applicable to his own peculiar case, if it admitted of it. These reasons were so striking, and evinced so clearly, and to such a gratifying extent, the deep hold which teetotalism has obtained of a large portion of that class of society, for whose benefit it is mainly important and was first promoted, that a few of the reasons given by the prisoners cannot fail to be interesting here.

A COUNTY MAGISTRATE.

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION.

We give in another part of this number an article from the last number of our able cotemporary, the Scottish Temperance Review. It contains suggestions especially worthy of attention at this time, and we are glad to find that such views are becoming common amongst temperance reformers. From personal knowledge we can say, that the leading members of the temperance league are well qualified to offer acceptable recommendations. The discretion and unanimity of their proceedings entitle them to confidence, and the success of their efforts prove their wisdom and practicability. On the eve of a gathering that has been attended through all its stages with great anxiety, it is well to compare opinions, in order that we may improve an occasion that will soon engage all our sympathies, and to which the temperance world will look with lively, perhaps, with exaggerated expectation.

The state of opinion generally is favourable to the reception of our principles, as inquiry is directed on all hands to the origin of our social maladies. This is seen in our literature. Authors are drawing attention to the festering sores that rankle in the very midst of our increasing wealth and knowledge, and existing in spite of our advancing civilization. Volume after volume opens up the state of our population, groveling in physical and moral debasement, and shut out from the amenities and charities of life; not only enduring in their own persons the suffering attendant upon vice and destitution, but giving the sad inheritance to generations yet unborn. Legislators are compelled to condescend to its consideration. The first minister of the Crown, in his address to his constituents, stated, "that great social improvements are required"—"that public education is lamentably defective"—"that the treatment of criminals is a problem yet to be decided"—and "that the sanitary condition of our towns has been grossly neglected." This declaration from such a quarter, is only an acquiescence in a general sentiment that is taking deep hold of the national heart. Time and circumstances combining, shew that it is a question, which cannot be postponed or trifled with, and that this is felt in high quarters. Then, if we look around us on all hands, and observe the number of efforts making to relieve the wretchedness of our land, we see another indication of the spirit of the times. Many of them are mere palliatives it is true, but they shew that an awakening sense of duty and responsibility is abroad. That an appalling amount of crime, poverty, and disease exists, no one doubts; that it arises from removable causes, almost all are ready to admit; but on the subject of the causes themselves, although there has been much ingenious speculation, and much industry displayed in the research, there is a wide difference of opinion. In the investigation, we believe, there has been a tendency, we fear, a willingness to overlook one great evil, with which the others are invariably associated—the drinking system. And whilst men have been engaged in looking at the mere proximate causes, they have in a great measure neglected the less obtrusive, but real ones. We are not bold enough to say that intemperance is the sole cause, because we know there are others, but when we see it invariably associated with the direst evils that afflict us, we lay it down as the main cause and fearlessly appeal to the evidence, unfortunately so abundant, furnished in the statistics of crime, pauperism, disease, and mortality. There is many a gulf of misery that has never yet been fathomed. It is to be hoped that temperance reformers will imbibe new life from this general activity, take yet higher ground, and press home upon the public intelligence, the necessity of more searching and more impartial inquiry, until they can place their movement, the first in position, as it is unquestionably the first in importance. When we find a system prevailing, that besides pressing on the industry of the country, and taxing the community, in the burdens imposed for the maintenance of police courts, poor houses, and hospitals; is warring against every principle of humanity, and every dispensation of providence, it is time that we spoke out in a language that cannot be misunderstood.

There is a most lamentable ignorance amongst all classes on the nature and properties of intoxicating drinks. The progress of new truths are slow, and prejudices handed down to us for ages, are obstinate in their resistance. Again and again have they to be assailed, and when they can no longer oppose, they settle down into dogged indifference. A powerful confederation just broken up on the attainment of its object, shews an example how the public mind is to be cultivated. Its leaders organised a machinery to collect statistics and facts, to carry them into the homes of the millions, the workshops of the country, into the public halls of densely populated towns, and amongst the rude and ignorant population of our thinly peopled districts. They depended upon no sect or party, but upon the people; and although their triumph may be attributed to one agency or another, it is owing entirely to that which must accomplish every beneficial act of legislation, the public intelligence. The temperance reformation has an object which, without any wish to disparage others, stands second to none. No law, however wisely laid, however beneficently managed in its administration, could possibly do for the people of this country what they could do for themselves, by the abolition of the drinking system. We speak thus, advisedly, and are anxious to see our means increased, of collecting and diffusing information; some consistent, steady, permanent machinery put in motion, to spread a knowledge of our principles, some means that would command attention from the press, and would appeal to the highest who give the tone to fashion, to the christian church, whose supineness creates amazement in the minds of all who trace the intimate connexion betwixt intemperance and irreligion, and also to the tenant of the hovel made wretched by this monster vice. Like every sin of ignorance, it must be removed by knowledge, and it is a most appropriate time when all reformers are laying bare our social ills, to send abroad our messengers, and instruct the people in the philosophy of the temperance question.

Our drinking usages should be carefully examined. They are the strongholds of the drinking system. At births, at weddings, and at funerals, on solemn and festive occasions—amongst the debaucheries of the crowd, and the social enjoyment of the domestic circle—in the workshop of the artizan, and at the anniversary of the benevolent institution—nay, even associated with the grave deliberations of an assembly met to advance the cause of religion, the bottle is thought an appropriate entertainment. By it the trader tempts his customer, and the candidate for legislative honours lures the elector. The libertine uses it to ruin his victim, while that victim uses it to enable her to follow her horrid trade to entrap others. All the customs which encourage drinking should be dissected and laid bare, their folly and danger exposed, and those who countenance and sustain them, whose example in this particular is evil in proportion to their private goodness and acknowledged worth, must be awakened to a sense of their duty in this respect.

As yet we are in the infancy of the temperance movement. It must be made to take more comprehensive ground, and apply itself with greater diligence to attack and expose the great evil it is designed to eradicate. As yet our statistics are very imperfect. Whilst there can be no doubt that many of the statements passing current amongst us, are greatly below the truth, from the deficiency of data, and the want of precision in the conclusions drawn, there is no doubt that many are greatly exaggerated, exposing us to misapprehension and often to misrepresentation. We have scarcely any statistics that would stand a scientific inquiry. There are great facilities now for obtaining corrected facts and figures, and a statistical committee appointed for such a purpose would be of immense value. By the active exertions of such a body, in a very short time a volume might be prepared that would tell more upon the utilitarian spirit of the age, than all the rhetoric, if a hundred times multiplied of our platforms.

The Convention will have to discharge a solemn responsibility. They may, by the temper of their debates, and the practical character of their resolutions, animate the temperance body to renewed zeal and exertion. There is an immense sphere of labour before us, and we approve of the suggestion of making specific appeals to certain classes. We have thousands of young growing up, whose ductile minds are open to receive good as well as evil impressions, many of whom will fall as their exemplars have done before them into vice and misery through this one evil, and whom a friendly counsel might arrest; we have numbers of females in all ranks of life who, in discharging their maternal duties, create a morbid appetite in their offspring, by using themselves, or accustoming their children to the taste of strong drink—we have ministers of religion giving respectability and sanction to its use. In addition to all these, we have our poor neglected population, perishing in a land of plenty, for the bread of life. Our success encourages us to hope the greatest things from more concentrated effort. It is not our province to offer advice or suggest schemes for future operations: we content ourselves with expressing a hope, that the sittings of the Convention will be animated by the feeling that pervades all the communications yet received on the subject, and that the minor differences which of necessity arise wherever numbers of men of various shades of opinion assemble, will be merged in the one great interest that brings them together. We look with great anxiety to the result, but cannot doubt that every consideration will give way to the important question, how is the temperance cause to be advanced, and what means can be employed to accomplish the destruction of the drinking-system?

THE MORAL CONDITION OF THE SOLDIER.

In the Times of July 2nd and July 7th, there are two articles bearing the above title, written with much good feeling, and discussing with temper and discretion some questions affecting the condition of the soldier—not omitting the intemperance and its causes which, unhappily, is not only a vice of the army, but of civilians also. We regard the soldier as an object of sympathy. He has no home; and is excluded by the necessities of his profession from the privileges of our domestic institutions, at all times a most important element in our social polity. No employment is given him but mechanical discipline; and he is effectually shut out from any companionship but that of the pot-house. Unfortunately, scarcely any effort has been made to cultivate higher qualities than strict obedience to his superiors, courage in danger, and manual dexterity and endurance. They are like vast masses of our population, morally and spiritually in a neglected condition. The following remarks, extracted from the Times, and giving a quotation from Notes of a Professional Life, by the late W. Ferguson, will be read with interest. We need not remind our readers, that the very highest authority on this subject, has stated most emphatically, that the great cause of delinquency and crime in the army, was drunkenness:—

“The great offence of the soldier, as every one acknowledges, is drunkenness—the parent of many crimes, and the child, perhaps, of a few. The most curious chapter of Dr. Ferguson’s book is that which treats of the encouragement of drunkenness, on the part of those whose positive duty it is, by every means, to keep it down.

“‘Alcohol,’ says the Doctor, ‘in every sense has ever been the nepenthe—the summa bonam of the army. Does the soldier perform an act of meritorious service? His reward is a ration of spirits. Is he sent upon service, and subjected to the inconvenience of a sea-voyage, he has, or used to have, double allowance, which was called full man-of-war’s ration. Place him under a burning sun, in a crowded barrack, where heat and thirst implore for the solace of water, let him have rum, for the water of the fountain and the brook could never have been meant for British soldiers.’

“Now under a system of rewards and punishments, in which the latter were inflicted by the lash, we think it reasonable enough that all the former should be represented by rum. But to-day when we feel somewhat ashamed of the cat-o-nine-tails, we may be pardoned for declining to have any further faith in alcohol. All honour to the great and good men who looked to rum as the national bulwark in the enlightened times that are past. Show due respect, by all means, for the wisdom of the ancient transport board, who decreed ‘that every soldier, from the moment he embarked for service, should have a daily allowance of half a pint of rum, with full man-of-war rations, and the women one-half, and the children including even the new-born babe, one-fourth of the quantities!’ but in these degenerate days, let us at least think for ourselves. It is no longer an accomplishment to reel in beastly intoxication from the dining-room to the drawing-room: nay, drunkenness, under the crusade of Father Mathew, has ceased to be virtuous at Donybrook. Why should we embalm military virtue in rum simply because our fathers did? Teach the soldier to be fond of spirits, reward him continually with liquid fire, create a passion in him for the poison, and there is no crime he will not commit, no abomination he will not practise for its gratification. ‘Punishment,’ so says Dr. Ferguson, ‘when put in competition, has then no terrors, and the fear of death is set at naught. He will drink, although the king of terrors stares him in the face; and rather than go without it, he will take that drink from the most disgusting vessels human imagination can conceive. The story told in a jest book, of the sailor, who, on a homeward voyage, broached the Admiral, that is to say, drank the spirits in which a dead body was immersed—has actually been verified in our military hospitals, where anatomical preparations have been robbed of their spirits, and the coarsest surgical medicaments and nauseous drugs, if prepared with alcohol, have been stolen to produce intoxication.’

“One good and very sufficient reason for abolishing reward by rum is, that there are many other modes of rewarding deserving men, much more gratifying to the recipients of your bounty.”

In every department of life, strong drink is the agent of mischief—producing many evils, and aggravating every other—and the poor soldier, whose lot is of the hardest, has to suffer from the prevailing habits of our country, and becomes the victim of our fatal prejudices in favour of this deleterious drink. Whilst we wish that barrack-libraries and other means of giving instruction and information should be adopted, and that a good, moral, and religious education should be given to the men, we would earnestly urge upon all who have influence, the importance of superseding the canteen, by some place of resort where mind and morals might be cultivated; and where the appetite for strong drink might be lost in the taste for higher pursuits, and, above all, that he should be taught the importance of the abstinence principle.

TEMPERANCE CONVENTION IN STOCKHOLM.

The Universe contains a letter from a correspondent, giving an account of the Temperance Convention, held in Stockholm, from which we make the following extracts. We regret that the writer has not furnished us with the resolutions adopted on this occasion. It commenced its sessions on Monday morning, the 15th instant, and terminated them last night. They may be said to have lasted three days and nights.

There were 230 delegates from the various parts of Sweden, eight from Norway, two from Germany, and four from America. I am sorry that neither England nor Denmark was represented. Why, I cannot say.

I have seen many Temperance Conventions, but have never seen one that was conducted with more decorum.

The principal part of the business consisted in the discussion of important principles which ought to control the conduct of temperance societies, and those great measures which the state of the cause in Sweden demands. Great good will result, I doubt not. At the outset, a long and able report was read, giving a history of temperance societies in Sweden and Norway. At the commencement of the second day, important information was given by the delegates from Germany and America. Some of these statistics may interest your readers.

It appears, that there are now 332 temperance societies in Sweden, embracing more than 90,000 members. The number of distilleries in 1834, was 161,000; in 1844, it was 72,000. But it is supposed that the quantity of brandy (whiskey made of potatoes and rye) made in the kingdom has not greatly diminished, owing to the fact, that whilst many small distilleries have ceased, the larger ones make an increased quantity. What that quantity is, no one can tell—some estimating it as high as 60,000,000 gallons; others at no more than 32,000,000. The latter estimation is, in my opinion, nearer the truth than the former.

In Norway, where temperance societies have but recently commenced their career, there are 128 societies, and 14,812 members.

In Germany there are 1,426 associations, and 1,019,693 members.

The writer then gives, at length, the speech of Dr. Baird of America, who was present, and to whom, it appears, the cause in Sweden and other Scandinavian countries is much indebted. It contains some very valuable and important statements. After speaking of the progress of temperance principles in his own country, and giving a detail of the agencies employed, to diffuse information, he states:—"Almost all our 1,500 common newspapers, and our monthly and other periodical publications, lend their aid to promote this good work.

"But, perhaps, the most important of all, with us, is the aid which this cause receives from the pulpit. There are not fewer than 30,000 preachers of all sects, orthodox and non-orthodox, in the United States, who preach every Sabbath, from one to three times, and often during the week; and though, I am sorry to say that all of them are not friends and advocates of temperance societies, yet, I think I may say, that far more than three-fourths are—perhaps as many as seven-eighths. Here is the strength of the temperance cause, under God, among us. And I am bold to say, that I do not think that the temperance cause will ever prevail in any country in which they who minister at God's altars do not take the lead in urging it upon their people from the pulpit, as well as by their own example.

"A great deal has been done of late years among us to enlist the children of our Sunday-schools, and the youth in our academies and colleges, in the temperance cause; so that the nation may, from this time forth, grow up in the principles of temperance as well as righteousness.

"I am happy to say, that a great deal is doing among our seamen in behalf of this cause. It is supposed that there are now 60,000 of our sailors and rivermen who are members of temperance societies.

"It is not easy to give such statistics as will approach very near to the exact truth on this subject. I will, however, state a few. As we take the census of the whole country only once in ten years, and as 1840 was the last of these epochs, I must refer to it, as the only one which will give us anything like a definite idea of the progress of the temperance cause.

"In that year there were consumed in the United States—

43,060,884 gallons of distilled spirits,
4,748,364 gallons of wine,
23,310,833 gallons of beer.

71,120,081 gallons, valued at 22,791,376 dollars.

"In 1840, the population of the United States was 17,000,000.

"In 1830, it is estimated that the number of gallons of distilled liquors alone, exclusive of wine and beer, was 72,000,000, valued at 48,000,000 dollars. But the population of the United States in 1830, was less than 14,000,000.

"It is believed, that the number of distilleries in 1810, was nearly 40,000; in 1840, it was 10,306.

"Although we cannot speak with certainty, we think it would not be much out of the way to say, that the consumption of distilled liquors in the United States will not, this year, exceed 35,000 gallons, and yet the population is now fully 20,000,000."

The first day, Count Hartmansdorff, a distinguished nobleman, presided; the second day, Count Hamilton, Lord of the Bedchamber; and the third day, the Rev. Dr. Peterson, Pastor Primarius of Stockholm. Among the persons who spoke most frequently were Counts Hartmansdorff and Hamilton, Bishop Agardh, General Lefrén, Colonel Hazelius, and Pastors Wiczelgren, Lindgren, Sepström, Sundt, Brunn, and Candidate Andréson. The last-named three gentlemen were from Norway. There were present several interesting peasants from the north—fine specimens of that class of Sweden's population—one of whom, Erik Erikson, was one of the most truly eloquent of all who spoke. Dr. Baird addressed the Convention several times, and was heard with great attention.

The audience was large, even to the closing scenes, which did not occur till ten o'clock last night. And I am most happy to say, that his Majesty King Oscar attended every day, and the Queen too; and both were attentive and deeply interested auditors and spectators. What think you of that fact? Does it not augur well for the temperance cause in Sweden? But I must close.

Yours truly,

Stockholm, June 18th.

ALPHA.

DIMINUTION OF CRIME.

We cut the following important article from the Columbia Washingtonian. It presents facts demanding the attention of the men throughout the country who make light of the temperance reformation and oppose its progress. We were much struck with the facts stated a few weeks since, that there never before were so few prisoners in the Boston jails—facts which we have found it difficult to reconcile with Deacon Grant's complaint of the increase of intemperance in that city. We hope this subject will receive greater attention. We have no doubt the same conclusion will appear in the poor-house, if we leave out of the calculation the foreign paupers.

ECONOMY OF THE REFORMATION.—We have frequently dilated on the saving which has been effected through the prevalence of Washingtonian principles, through the columns of the Washingtonian, as our readers will bear witness, yet we have hitherto forbore to present the grounds on which our assertions were founded, knowing that statistical tables are seldom read in the columns of a newspaper. But inasmuch as every day's experience satisfied us that these facts are ill understood, and that a clear understanding of them is necessary in order to produce efficient action, we will endeavour to present a brief view of some statistics in our possession, which may be perused without weariness, and which will establish the economy of the reform on an impregnable basis.

We have the returns before us from twenty county prisons, showing the number of persons confined for crime during each year, from the commencement of the temperance movement to the close of the year 1844. In nineteen of these prisons, the number of prisoners confined, is smaller in each successive year than in the preceding year; in one only has there been an increase of prisoners, and in that the increase has not been in equal ratio with the increase of population. It appears, then, that in these prisons, while the population has increased in a rapid ratio, the number of crimes has largely diminished.

We subjoin a few extracts from the reports of the keepers. In Maine, the keeper of the prison in Oxford county, E. C. Shaw, in answer to the question, "What has been the effect of the temperance reform on crime?" under date April 24, 1844, says, "crime has greatly diminished."

The keeper of the prison in Sullivan county, N. H., D. Harris, under date April 24, 1844, says, "crime diminishes," and assigns as a cause "the temperance reformation."

The keeper of the prison, J. D. Pease, in Dukess county, Massachusetts, under date of May 2, 1844, says, "crime diminishes," assigns as a reason, "temperance prevails." "The effect of the temperance cause has been very great there, no prisoners now in jail."

We have returns from twelve state prisons, covering the same time as that mentioned for county jails, which give the following results:—

MAINE STATE PRISON.—The number of prisoners in this prison in 1837 was 77, in 1840, 68, in 1843, 63. The average number of prisoners for thirteen years, prior to 1837, was 80.

The number of commitments to this prison in 1842, was 31, in 1843, it was 27. The average number committed in thirteen years, previous to 1837, was 44, showing a decrease of one-third in number of commitments, while the population has increased nearly 35 per cent.

VERMONT STATE PRISON.—The number of prisoners in 1837, was 92, which was the smallest number in twenty-five years, the average number during that time being 100, and the highest 138. In 1842, the number was 73, and in 1843, it was reduced to 65, showing a diminution of more than one-third from the average for a long series of years, while the population had advanced at least one-third.

The number of persons committed to the state prison in Vermont, indicates also a diminution of crime. In 1837, 30 were committed; in 1843, only 23 were committed; while the average number of commitments for twenty years preceding 1837, was 36; the number of commitments diminished, therefore, one-third.

In Sing Sing state prison the number of prisoners in 1843, was 763, the average number for six years previous to 1837, was 814.

We dare not multiply these statistics, lest we deter our readers by their prolixity from reading them. It may be sufficient to state, that in all of them there is a diminution of crime, and the diminution is usually attributed to the temperance reform.

From the close of the revolutionary war until the temperance reform acquired strength and vigour, there was a regular increase of crime in a greater ratio than the increase of population. Since that reformation has commenced, there has been a rapid diminution of crime, as evinced by the decrease of commitments, although our population has been increasing in a greater ratio than ever before. These facts are worth a thousand theories; and in view of them, let us ask, if it has done so much in the face of grog-shops and their keepers, whether it may not reasonably be expected to do much more if this pregnant source of evil shall be removed by the votes of freemen.—
Col. Watah.

THE DRUNKARD'S FAMILY BIBLE.

"Mr. President," said a short stout man, with a good-humoured countenance, and a florid complexion, rising as the last speaker took his seat, "I have been a tavern-keeper."

At this announcement there was a movement through the whole room, and an expression of increased interest.

"Yes, Mr. President," he went on, "I have been a tavern-keeper, and many a glass have I sold to you and to the Secretary there, and to dozens of others that I see here"—glancing around upon the company.

"That's a fact," said the president,— "many a glass of gin, toddy, and brandy, and punch, have I taken at your bar. But times are now changed, and we have begun to carry the war into the enemy's camp. And our war has not been unsuccessful, for we have taken prisoner one of the rum-seller's bravest generals! But go on, friend W—, let us have your experience."

"As to my experience, Mr. President," the ex-tavern-keeper resumed, "in rum-selling and rum-drinking—for I have done a great deal of both in my day—that would be rather too long a story to tell to-night, and one that I had much rather forget than relate. It makes me tremble and sick at heart, whenever I look back on the evil I have done. I therefore usually look a-head, with the hope of doing some good to my fellow-men.

"But there is one incident that I will relate. For the last five years, a hard-working mechanic, with a wife and several small children, came regularly, almost every night, to my tavern, and spent the evening in the bar room. He came to drink of course, and many a hard dollar of his earnings went into my till. At last he became a perfect sot—working scarcely one-fourth of the time and spending all he earned in liquor. His poor wife had to take in washing to support herself and children, while he spent his time and the little he could earn, at my bar. But his appetite for liquor was so strong, that his week's earnings were usually all gone by Tuesday or Wednesday, and then I had to chalk up a score against him, to be paid off when Saturday night came. The score gradually increased, until it amounted to three or four dollars over his regular Saturday night's pay, when I refused to sell him any more liquor until it was settled. On the day after I refused to sell him, he came in with a neat mourning breast-pin, enclosing some hair—no doubt, I thought, of a deceased relative. This he offered in payment of what he owed. I accepted it, for the pin I saw at once was worth double the amount of my bill. I did not think, or indeed care about the question, whether he was the owner or not; I wanted my own, and in my selfish eagerness to get my own, I hesitated not to take a little more than my own.

"I laid the breast-pin away, and all things went on smoothly for a while. But he gradually got behind again, and again I cut off the supply of liquor. This time he brought me a pair of brass and irons, and a pair of brass candlesticks. I took them, and wiped off the score against him. At last he brought me a large family Bible, and I took that, too, thinking no doubt I could sell it for something.

"On the Sunday afterwards, having nothing to do—for I used to shut up my bar on Sunday, thinking it was not respectable to sell liquor on that day; I opened this poor drunkard's Family Bible, scarcely thinking of what I was doing. The first place that I turned to was the family record. There it was stated that on a certain day he had been married to Emily—. I had known Emily when I was a young man, very well, and had once thought seriously of offering myself to her in marriage. I remembered her happy young face, and suddenly seemed to hear the tone of her merry laughter.

"Poor creature!" I sighed involuntarily, as a thought of her present condition crossed my mind—and then with no pleasant feelings I turned over the next leaf. There was the record of the birth of four children, the last had been made recently, and was in the mother's hand.

"I never had such a strange feeling as now came over me. I felt that I had no business with this book. But I tried to stifle my feelings, and turned over several leaves quickly. I suffered my eyes to rest upon an open page, and these words arrested my attention.

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whose is deceived thereby is not wise."

"This was just the subject that, under the feeling I then had, I wished to avoid, and so I referred to another place. There I read—

"Who hath woes? Who hath sorrow? Who hath wounds? Who hath babbling? Who hath redness of eyes? They who tarry long at the wine. At last it biteth like a serpent, it stingeth like an adder."

"I felt like throwing the book from me. But once more I turned the leaves, and my eye rested upon these words:—

"Woe unto him who giveth his neighbour drink, that putteth the bottle to his lips and maketh him drunken."

"I closed the book suddenly and then threw it down. And then, for half-an-hour, I walked the room backwards and forwards in a state of mind such as I never before experienced. I had become painfully conscious of the direful evils resulting from intemperance, and still more painfully conscious that I had been a willing instrument in the spread of these evils.

I cannot tell how I suffered during that day and night, nor describe the fearful conflict that took place in my mind between the selfish love of the gains of my calling, and the plain dictates of truth and humanity. It was about nine o'clock, I think, on that evening, that I opened the drunkard's Bible again, with a kind of despairing hope that I might find something to direct me. I opened at the Psalms and read two or three chapters. As I read on, without finding anything that seemed to apply directly to my case, I felt an increased desire to abandon my calling, because it was injurious to my fellow-men. After I had read the Bible, I retired to my bed, but could not sleep. I am sure that, during that night, I thought of every drunken man to whom I had sold liquor, and all their beggared families. In the brief sleep that I obtained, I dreamed that I saw long rows of tottering drunkards, with their wives and children in rags. And a loud voice said, 'Who hath done this?'

"The answer, in a louder voice, directed, I felt to me, smote upon my ear like a peal of thunder—

"'Thou art the man!'

"From this troubled slumber I awoke to sleep no more that night. In the morning, the last and most powerful conflict came. The question to be decided was—

"'Shall I open my tavern, or at once abandon the dreadful traffic in liquid poison?'

"Happily, I decided never to put to any man's lips the cup of confusion. My next step was to turn the spigot of every keg, of every barrel of spirits, wine, beer or cider, and let the contents escape on the floor. My bottles and decanters were likewise emptied. Then I came and signed your Total Abstinence pledge, and what is better, never rested until I had persuaded the man whose Bible had been of so much use to me, to sign the pledge likewise. And now, Mr. President, I am keeping at my old stand, a temperance grocery,—and am making restitution as fast as possible. There are at least half-a-dozen families that my tavern helped to make poor and wretched, to whom I furnish a small quantity of groceries every week, in many cases equal to the amount that used to be spent at my bar for liquor. Four of my oldest and best customers have already signed the pledge, by my persuasion, and I am not going to rest until every man that I helped to ruin, is restored to himself, his family, and society."

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION.

(From the Scottish Temperance Review.)

The friend of education, as well as the teacher of christianity, finds the intemperance of the people a great impediment to success. They begin to feel the force of the facts which have been accumulated, and they are now willing to examine what they were previously indisposed to hear. Then how are we to improve the circumstances in favour of our principle, and lead it on to the accomplishment of our great work—the destruction of the drinking system?

There cannot be a doubt that good will result from a meeting which it may reasonably be supposed will convene a large amount of the virtue and intelligence of the cause, and in order that it may do all the benefit of which such an assemblage may be capable, men ought to be selected in every place for their enlarged and comprehensive views, and their business habits. They should be prepared with carefully collected statistics, facts showing the present state of the cause, and well considered suggestions as to future operations. We want to know what progress has been made, and what are the main obstacles in our way. From comparing these facts and opinions all will be improved. We shall be cheered by the success of others, instructed by their experience, and warned by the blunders committed. Men who meet for a great benevolent and patriotic purpose, having sympathies in common, cannot but catch some of the zeal and enthusiasm of those with whom they mingle, and every one will go back with a mind refreshed to his former scene of labour, stimulated and encouraged to renewed exertion, while the volume of facts and carefully collated opinions thus collected will be of great and permanent value. Our progress has not to be measured by the number of signatures we obtain to a pledge, but by the amount of public opinion created in our favour, by the discontinuance of certain drinking-customs, and by the testimonies afforded in the improved habits and tastes of various classes in the community.

The Convention may employ its moral influence, by embodying the facts and arguments gathered through the course of the temperance movement, in spirited addresses to particular classes who have an influence upon public sentiment, and whose co-operation and example it would be desirable to obtain. Ministers of the gospel, deacons and elders of christian churches, magistrates, employers, &c., might be specially appealed to. We are quite convinced that many who occupy positions of usefulness and influence are well disposed to the temperance movement, and willing to aid it. Well digested and temperately written addresses, exhibiting to them what power for good or evil their example exerts, containing such facts, arguments, and statistics as would be most particularly applicable to their peculiar circumstances, or such as would be the most likely to recommend the subject to their serious consideration, could not fail to produce on their minds a good effect. In addition to this, it might be well to approach the throne, and both branches of the legislature, pointing to the national evils flowing from the drinking habits of the people—adding the proofs from the records of insanity, poverty, disease, and crime. We must now take high ground, and show law-makers that their example is far more weighty than any penal statute against drunkenness. It is the educated and religious classes of our countrymen who give respectability to the system. We may preach for ever, and exhaust our energies in warring against drunkenness, and still it will remain to curse us, unless we can remove the causes which are raising up fresh generations of drunkards. The moderate drinking of our land, flowing from innumerable springs, keeps up the mighty flood on which are wrecked so many glorious hopes. It is not the inebriate who lures the youth to ruin, and tempts him to embark on the perilous sea, where so many have gone down. Alas! it is the good, the intelligent, the pious, and the wise who take the glass and give their sanction to its use. The youth imitates those whom he has been taught to honour; nor can he conceive it wrong to follow their example. But dazzled by this false lustre, he goes on and falls its victim. They who give the sanction of their high character and moral standing to the support of the drinking customs, must be specially addressed and affectionately warned,—if need be, firmly remonstrated with, as to the danger of their example, for they it is who maintain the drinking system.

Other agencies are required to operate upon the public mind, and it will be desirable to consult the present exigencies of the movement, and suggest suitable instrumentalities. We cannot enter into detail, but a different class of agencies are needed, now that the cause has advanced so far. The first in importance and influence is the press, and it has never yet been worked to any extent worthy of the greatness and universality of our object. Much has been done, but much remains yet to do in this department. The temperance cause is yet in its infancy, and it was only natural that, beginning amongst the humblest ranks, and having to struggle through many difficulties and much contempt, with prejudice, interest, and appetite to oppose it, it should have only feeble and inefficient agencies to employ. Truth, however, is powerful, and proclaimed by men who felt its importance, it found its way to the hearts of the people. While the rich and talented coolly looked on, the principle enunciated by poor and often illiterate men made its way. It has been gradually advancing upward, and now we have men of wealth, rank, talent, and station in our ranks, and things that could not have been included in our most sanguine expectations years ago, become now matters of modest and reasonable expectation. We probably want new instrumentalities, but our success only affords another motive for effort. A consideration most worthy of that Convention will be the best means of employing the talent we have in the temperance cause. It is now diffused, but if concentrated and applied in any systematic manner, would tell most emphatically on the public. There is every ability to bring out a commanding literature. Although many questions occur to us of detail, we have only time to refer to the general importance of great effort in connexion with the press.

The attention of that Convention should be directed to the advocacy. In addition to that class of advocates who have done so much among the poor and lowly of the land, we want men of education and talent, who can plead the cause before the refined and intellectual. Our work is with the mind, the reason of mankind; and our advocacy must be increased, improved, and elevated. We must address ourselves to the feelings of men only as a medium to their intellect. Argument must supersede declamation, persuasion take the place of denunciation. Converts to new principles are not driven but led. The habits of a people can only be changed by degrees; and the steps are slow and gradual by which mankind advances. Appeals to the passions may produce a present excitement; to produce lasting impressions, you must reach the reason. The duty of the temperance advocate is an impressive one—one of great responsibility. His duty is to show the evils of the drinking system, and the fallacies by which it is supported. He may derive aid, as others do, from imagination and wit; but he degrades his character as a messenger of truth when he descends to revile, or sinks the solemnity of his mission in the extravagance of the buffoon. The sternest advocacy of truth is compatible with courtesy of language and deportment. We have had much to deplore in this particular; but we hope that the proceedings of the Convention, and the meetings held in connexion with it, will give a tone to our minds that will improve and elevate us, and make our public advocacy of this question more dignified and useful. We are anxious that the mischief which has been done by injudicious and unguarded men should be removed, and our experience fully proves that where men of talent and character appear on our platforms, they can command large meetings, and the attendance and respectful attention of all classes.

THE FREE CHURCH AND TEMPERANCE.

From the General Assembly's Report on the State of Religion.

Special means for arresting gross and prevailing abuses which stand in the way of Religious Improvement, whether among Religious Professors, or such as make no Profession.

There is one other hindrance of religious improvement which was specially urged on the attention of your Committee by the Assembly. They refer to prevailing habits of intemperance.

No proper exposition of principle or detail of evidence can be gone into in a document of this kind. But there are some general facts which nearly all will admit, and which go far to establish all that is necessary. It will be admitted, for example, by all who have informed themselves on the subject, that this country, nevertheless of all its boasted privileges and attainments, stands pre-eminent among the nations of Europe for intemperance. As many as are accustomed to read particularly American publications on this subject, must have observed that a large proportion of their aggravated cases are said to have occurred in this country; and, apart from all foreign testimony, we have evidence staring us in the face, turn to what quarter we may. If we inquire into the quantity of spirituous liquors used in Scotland, the amount is almost beyond belief. If we examine the records of police courts, intemperance is found to be at the bottom of a large proportion of cases. And if we only look around us, and examine any considerable number of wretched families, we will seldom fail to find that intemperance is either an originating or aggravating cause; and in almost every congregation, instances are frequently occurring of persons, otherwise exemplary, falling into this sin. It is impossible, then, to regard it otherwise than as a prevailing and most infectious evil.

On inquiring into the causes, some of these appear to be very deeply-seated in the existing state of society, whether received physically, morally, or religiously. Causes of this kind cannot be removed by any special effort. To reach such, the state of society will require to be changed. But there are also special and aggravating causes, and these may and ought to be dealt with as opportunity serves.

One of these is to be found in the licensing of so many public houses. As these increase in any particular locality, means must be used to increase the number of customers; and, to secure this, agents are often employed among their fellow-workmen with mischievous effect.

Then houses of this kind are very generally kept open during unseasonable hours, more especially on Saturday night and on the Lord's day; and the rest of the Sabbath is thus turned into an opportunity of more enlarged intemperance.

This evil also is aggravated by the practice of licensing grocers to sell spirituous liquors. In consequence of this, females who would be ashamed to visit public houses, obtain spirits when purchasing household necessaries. And it is believed that in this way intemperate habits are often fostered, if not originated. But as spirit shops are understood to be open on the Lord's day, common groceries are also applied for on Sabbath morning, instead of Saturday evening. And thus, as the sale of household necessaries proves a cover to dram-drinking, the sale of spirits on the Lord's day facilitates the sale of whatever else may be wanted.

As regards these and other specialities, it would be well if presbyteries and other local courts were to bring the matters complained of before county and burgh magistrates. There is much to encourage them in doing so; and even where this is not the case the duty is theirs and the issue God's.

But as regards the question of intemperance at large, something more characteristic of a church movement seems to be urgently required. Be the cause what it may, this is very generally expected. The Free Church is eminently the church of the people, and her own people are anxiously waiting to see in what direction she is to move; and other parties interested in the temperance cause look wistfully on, or urge upon her to take some decided step.

As a church, she cannot with propriety take any step except on moral and scriptural grounds. She may frankly admit, as was done in a former report, that much good has been done by temperance societies; and in so far as she can approve their proceedings, she may with perfect good feeling bid them God speed. But her own movement must throughout be only such as would admit of her prefixing to each injunction, "Thus saith the Lord." And proceeding in this spirit, your committee trust that the Assembly will not be unwilling,—

First, unhesitatingly and unequivocally to declare her sense of the evil of intemperance, and her resolution to do everything in her power, consistent with the Word of God, to arrest its progress.

Secondly, to enjoin ministers faithfully to expose prevailing abuses, and earnestly and affectionately to warn against their ensnaring influence; and, the better to secure this, to appoint that the attention of congregations be directed to this subject on the first Sabbath of December, or failing this, on the earliest convenient day thereafter.

Thirdly, to instruct Kirk-sessions not to overlook offences falling under this head, in the exercise of discipline, but, seeing they are of frequent occurrence to be on that very account the more watchful, painstaking, and faithful, in the administration of that divine ordinance.

And, lastly, to require of Presbyteries to be observant of the causes leading to intemperance, and particularly of drinking usages, and to make returns thereon. It has been sufficiently ascertained that intemperate habits are mainly dependent on drinking usages. These are often associated with friendly feelings, and, in some cases, with the most solemn of religious services. But these usages are in many cases local, and cannot be well understood by strangers, and ought therefore to be reported that something may be done for their discontinuance. Were the Assembly to approve of this, and to order such returns to be made to any committee that may be appointed, a report might be prepared on this subject alone, full of interest. Usages leading to intemperance are interwoven with every part, particularly of Scottish society, and with not a few of our religious observances. Then various methods to lessen particular abuses have already been successfully introduced in different localities, and might by some such means be more generally adopted over the country. And there is, moreover, a much deeper interest felt in the subject than many are aware of, or than your committee would have been aware of, had it not been the many letters and pamphlets which they have received on the subject.

SPIRIT LICENSES.

The following extracts are taken from a speech, made by Bailie Duncan, in the Town Council of Edinburgh, upon the subject of granting spirit-licenses. After giving an account of the number of spirit shops in various parts of Edinburgh, he says:—*In this summary there is one thing which cannot fail to strike every one—that is, the large number of public-houses in the poorer parts of the city. The fact is, that the localities where the number of public-houses is largest, are the very localities where most misery abounds. In a communication from a gentleman, who has had great opportunities for observation, he gives it as his opinion, that, “where numbers of low drinking houses exist, as they do in the old town of Edinburgh, they are invariably surrounded by hundreds of wretched families, who are neither half-fed nor half-dressed; and who, with shattered and enfeebled constitutions, live amidst filth and misery of all kinds.” I believe there are various causes for the evils in question. I believe that the subject to which Mr. Murray has, more than once, incidentally directed our attention, that of “vee pavens,” is one of the most fertile; and I am assured he would confer a public benefit were he to make a thorough exposure of the demoralizing and injurious character of that system. But, at the same time, I am satisfied that, directly and indirectly, we owe much of the vice, wretchedness, and crime in the city, to the abuse of the privileges associated with the licenses. How great, for example, are the evils connected with public-houses being opened on Sundays. Many cases, painful and humiliating in the extreme, are constantly making their appearance in the Police Court, connected with Sunday drinking. But let any man take a walk through some of our streets on a Sunday morning and evening, and look at some of these houses, and observe the numbers of those who frequent them, and who they are that do so; and I feel convinced nothing else will be needed to make him alarmed for the consequences. Many a man, many a woman, now amongst the outcasts of society, turn back their thoughts on the past, and, in the bitterness of their soul, fix on the first Sunday night that found them in the public-house, as the beginning of that career, which now seems almost to have shut them out from the fellowship of man. But bearing in mind what I have said as to other causes, look at the evils of drunkenness in its appalling magnitude. At my request, Captain Haining caused the police books for the years 1841, 1842, 1843, and 1844 to be searched, and a tabular statement to be prepared, showing the numbers of drunk and disorderly persons taken into custody by the police during these years. That table, which gives the monthly as well as the annual numbers, is as follows:—*

	1841.	1842.	1843.	1844.
January,	340	318	308	398
February,	275	243	289	305
March,	381	257	401	378
April,	340	290	451	382
May,	329	406	515	446
June,	401	348	372	486
July,	278	383	523	500
August,	504	444	498	382
September,	372	339	479	474
October,	369	394	505	456
November,	217	400	491	334
December,	428	403	567	354
Total,	4234	4225	5400	4895

These numbers are perfectly frightful. The average of the four years is 4690. Now, were we to take the population of Edinburgh, exclusive of Leith, at 140,000—which is a little more than the number in the census of 1841,—and to assume the persons included in the table to be different persons, we would have here the evidence of a most painful and appalling fact,—namely, that nearly one-thirtieth part of the whole population is annually lodged in the Police Office through drunkenness. As, however, many persons included in the table were taken into custody several times in the course of a year, the total number cannot be looked upon as representing these numbers of separate persons; but, on the other hand, there is to be set against that observation, the fact, that there may be at least 40,000 children in the total population. So that suppose we were to hold the true average number of separate persons annually taken into custody to be 3000, and the true number of the adult part of the population to be 100,000, we would still find that a number equal to about every thirty-third individual in the adult population is brought to the police bar, on the charge of being drunk and disorderly. The table does not disclose the painful nature of many cases which it embraces,—such as that of a father being drunk and maltreating his children,—a husband being drunk and striking and kicking his wife,—or a son being drunk and lifting his hand against his father; neither will I enter on the revolting details; it is enough that I have lifted the veil. But the large numbers in the table suggest an important consideration of another kind. Of late we have had a great deal of remark, both here and in the newspapers, as to the frequency of thefts, robberies, and housebreakings in Edinburgh. Now, I will not pretend to explain the cause of all these; but I am persuaded that the measure of protection, which the property of the citizens receives from the police, is seriously diminished by their time and attention being occupied with drunk and disorderly persons. The interests of the community are also affected in another way. In reply to an inquiry, Captain Haining has written me,—“It is impossible for me to give you a note of the expense incurred to the establishment, connected with the apprehension of drunkards; but the time of the officers employed in these cases is very considerable, as each case employs upon an average at least three men, and occupies their time about half an hour; and as the average number of drunken cases for the last four years is 4690, occupying the time of the officers to an extent of 781 days, or the whole time of two officers for the year, there must of course be occasioned an expense of at least £90 per annum; and, upon a moderate calculation, the number of officers attending in these cases at the Police Court, will average twenty men per diem, and occupy not less than two hours each man, making forty hours per diem, or the whole time of three men for the year; but this being necessary duty, no expense is incurred.” And, in reply to another inquiry, he writes:—“The annual cost to the police for the maintenance of drunkards at the main office will average about £40, being nearly the half of the expense of maintaining the whole number of prisoners.” In addition, therefore, to all the other evils connected with drunkenness, we have it increasing our police assessment, though certainly not to the great extent to which, as I will immediately show, it affects the prison tax. The tabular statement suggests one other observation. According to a return furnished me, the total numbers of cases brought before the Police Court, during the last four years, are as follows:—

1841—9990. 1842—10,347. 1843—11,045.
1844—11,150.

Now, the total numbers of drunken cases for these years being—1841—4234. 1842—4225. 1843—5400

1844—4895, we have it proved that the drunken and disorderly cases amount to nearly the one-half of the whole police cases. But the matter does not end at the Police Office. Of the larger number of persons who appear there annually, many are dismissed with an admonition to conduct themselves with sobriety and peaceableness in time to come, many are punished with fines, but many, also, owing to the outrageous nature of their conduct, or the hardened nature of their character, are sentenced to imprisonment. From a tabular statement, prepared by Mr. Smith, the governor of the prison of Edinburgh, and now before me, it appears that the number of separate prisoners committed, for being drunk and disorderly, to that prison, during the year ending June, 1844, was no less than 1816. This is a large number, and the facts connected with it are very distressing. The statement gives the respective ages of 332 males 582 females, of the number; and I have endeavoured to classify the ages of these individuals. The following is the result:—

Age.	Males.	Females.
At and under 20 years,	73	155

THE LICENSE LAWS OF AMERICA.

The American temperance papers are filled with accounts of the late movement on the License question. The result indicates a powerful public opinion in favour of temperance principles, as out of 731 towns reported, 603 have decided against granting licenses, that is, they have determined that no licenses for retailing intoxicating or spirituous liquors or wines should be granted, until their determination should be reversed according to law. The common council of these towns have no power to grant such licenses, and consequently, the sale of these liquors in less quantities than five gallons, is illegal, and punishable by imprisonment, not exceeding one year, or by fine, not exceeding 250 dollars.

The following very lucid exposition of the nature and correctness of the Excise laws of the state of New York, is from the pen of Vice-chancellor Whittlesey of Rochester, and will be read with interest at the present time. It is extracted from the American Temperance Journal.

The Excise laws of the state prohibit the sale of ardent spirits in quantities less than five gallons.

Such prohibition is absolute and universal.

It is relaxed in case of taverns and groceries to be licensed by the Boards of Excise.

Taverns are licensed for the accommodation of travellers, and groceries for the accommodation of house-keepers—and neither are licensed to become drinking places for the neighbourhood.

In point of fact, a very large proportion of the taverns and groceries licensed, have, contrary to the spirit of the law, become mere drinking houses.

The law intended to prevent the existence of drinking or tippling houses, under severe penalties.

The boards of excise have power to grant or refuse licenses, without being liable to have their decision controlled by any other tribunal.

Boards of Excise, in granting or refusing licenses, should act in obedience to the will of the majority.

Because of their inability to ascertain popular opinion, the law of 1845 has made provision to ascertain such public opinion in a manner which cannot be questioned, and to enforce it in a mode which cannot be evaded.

Such law empowers the people in their respective towns to legislate for themselves upon this subject of license, and to do by their own act and vote, what the Board of Excise could do before.

Such law is a wise and democratic measure, and imposes upon the people themselves the duty of guarding against the evils of intemperance.

If a majority is found in favour of license, it will almost necessarily follow, that as licenses are then to be without charge, the number of licenses will be greatly increased—the tide of intemperance swelled, and its evils multiplied.

This law of 1845, merely places the people of the towns in the place of the Board of Excise of the town, and as the latter could grant or refuse licenses, without being controlled or questioned by any other tribunal, the people themselves may be safely allowed as much power as was before given to their agents, the Boards of Excise.

The objections made, really go beyond the law of 1845, and impeach the propriety and wisdom of the excise laws of the state, as they have existed for many years.

Excise laws prohibiting the sale of ardent spirits in quantities less than five gallons generally, and authorising the special license of taverns and groceries, have been in existence as long as the state has had an existence, without any complaint that they were tyrannous or oppressive. The law of 1845 only substitutes the people for the Boards of Excise as the instrument of granting or refusing licenses, and this certainly cannot give an oppressive character to the law. Under the laws but few have sold, because but few have been licensed to sell, and they have made profit by selling. If the citizen has an inalienable right to buy and sell, this right is infringed as much as to ninety-nine, when one in a hundred is licensed, as it is as to the whole hundred when none are licensed. Hitherto the great mass of the people have been forbidden to sell, without any complaint being made of the infringement of inalienable rights; from which we infer that this clamour is raised by the licensed few, who fear for the loss of their gains, to deceive the drinker whose appetite demands gratification.

The majority of a community have a right to control and direct as to the business of individuals, when such business, exercised in a particular way, is injurious to the whole—but such control must be exercised by a general rule or law, equally operative upon all. We direct how people shall build in cities and compact towns, as to the keeping of gunpowder, and other combustibles therein—as to the vending of poisons, and various other things; and this because the public safety requires it. Gaming-houses, and dealing in lotteries, are prohibited by law representing the majority, because the tendency of these is injurious to the public. Experience has shown that there is a fascination about games of chance played for money which men cannot resist, and hence laws are passed to protect them and society from the evil consequences of gaming and lotteries. It is found that intemperance is injurious to community—that the existence of taverns and groceries leads to intemperance—that there is a fascination in the appetite for drink, stronger than the passion for gaming, and productive of more evil consequences to the public, and hence the majority have a moral and legal right to control by law the sale of intoxicating drinks, and to refuse license to taverns and groceries for the same reason that we would refuse licenses to gaming houses and lotteries.

Legislating in regard to license to sell strong drink, is not legislating upon questions of morals merely. It is in one important aspect of the case a question of political economy, inasmuch as the consumption of strong drink increases crime, pauperism, and insanity—impairs the aggregate industry of the country—swells taxation, and causes waste of time and money—and being thus a matter of political economy, is in this aspect at least a fit subject for legislation.—America.

WE MUST HAVE WHISKEY IN THE HARVEST FIELD.

(From the Olive Branch.)

Mr. Editor.—Permit me to occupy a few lines in the Olive Branch to talk a little with the honest, hard-handed farmers who use the expression with which this article is headed. And here let me premise, that though at present a denizen of the city, the best portion of my life has been spent in TILLING THE SOIL; that I understand the art and mystery of turning a good furrow in the green sward; can swing the scythe, handle the pitching fork, and in fact do the work of a MAN in any branch of husbandry. What then I preach to others, I have thoroughly tested in my own experience.

And now, friends, WHY MUST whiskey be used in the harvest field?

Many believe that a dram affords NOURISHMENT! The limits of a single article will not permit me to say more on this head, than that the testimony of the best chemists in the world has long since settled this point, namely, that by NO CONCEIVABLE PROCESS CAN THE LEAST PARTICLE OF NOURISHMENT BE EXTRACTED FROM ALCOHOL! Will you not believe the testimony of science? Our most eminent physicians tell the same story as the chemists. But to all this you will answer that you know from your own experience that you are stronger and more vigorous after a drink than before. This is in some measure true, alcohol is a diffusible STIMULANT, and soon finds its way through the circulation of the blood, to every portion of the system, and especially excites the NERVOUS ENERGIES. The pulse is quickened, and a general RALLY of the powers take place, to THROW OFF THE INTRUDER. Under such excitement, there is for a few moments an unnatural strength, but it is an excitement which WEARS OUT the powers of the body without contributing anything to their support. Accustom yourself to this stimulant, and the natural powers will sink so low that they will not rally without it. Is there any nourishment in your WHIP. Yet its application will revive the flagging energies of your horses. You are too wise, however, to make it a substitute for grain. When your faithful animals are weary and faint, you do not think of applying the lash for an hour or two, unless you would make them dull and lifeless. Yet you do the same thing by YOURSELVES! When weary, you DRINK WHISKEY which runs riot through your blood, lashing each tired muscle into activity for a little while, only to sink correspondingly LOWER after the excitement is over. This continual excitement and re-action is one of the most dangerous experiments upon human life. It lays the foundation for the most obstinate dis-cases, and cuts off many a manly and vigorous farmer in the prime of life.

Can you do MORE WORK when you drink whiskey? Perhaps so for an HOUR, but LESS in a WEEK. A healthy man, like a free and noble horse, CAN AND WILL do enough work with no other excitement than GOOD FOOD AND PURE WATER! For these things there is NO SUBSTITUTE. If you ply the lash to the horse, you may drive him to unusual exertions; may even keep him going till he will fall dead: so with the man: you may make him insensible to fatigue and pain—he may even work till his blood is in a perfect fever, and then perhaps die in slaking his thirst with cold water. At any rate, he will find himself unfit for work next day, without an unusual amount of stimulation. Feed your HORSES well, and they will work cheerfully from day to day, and from week to week. There will be no complaint of stiff joints and lame backs in the morning; no spasmodic exertions for a minute which will use up the strength of a day. Remember then to FEED your men well, so that they may NOT FEEL the WANT of excitement. Give them a substantial LUNCH instead of a dram. Let COFFEE, well charged with sugar and cream, be a substitute for whiskey, and my word for it, you will find your men to work better, and feel happier.

By discarding whiskey from your farms, you will be every way GAINERS. Your work will be done QUICKER and BETTER. Your men, being sober, will not quarrel, or make unnecessary waste or breakage. There will be little danger of accidents of any kind. No upsetting loads of hay or grain—no beating of horses—no leaving gates open, or driving against gate posts. There will be no brawling or disobedience to your orders. In short, everything will go on like clock-work.—Will you not try it? Come, gentlemen, for this time, “all speak at once,” and say “aye.”

But there is still another consideration which must not be overlooked. Are you quite sure that even during a single harvest you may not sow the seeds of DRUNKENNESS in your own son, or your NEIGHBOUR'S son? Remember, that he who drinks regularly for a single month only, must have a struggle before he can OVERCOME HIS APPETITE!—Like the goaded horse, he is waiting for the lash—his powers want their accustomed excitement!

Would you make your son a drunkard? If so, teach him by your own EXAMPLE, that whiskey is NECESSARY in the harvest field. Let him have his drams during THAT season, and he will probably take them at OTHER times. When he leaves the paternal roof and finds himself wearied and dispirited, among strangers, perhaps, who have neither kindness nor sympathy to offer, it will not be strange if he shall give way to the appetite you implanted within him, and seek forgetfulness in inebriation!

This is not idle talk. I have seen many a young man similarly circumstanced, who could date his downfall from the HARVEST FIELD. The appetite there formed soon leads to DAILY INDULGENCE, and there is not the slightest security against HABITUAL DRUNKENNESS.

Do not let your own child CURSE you as the author of all his woes! Put not, then, the cup to his lips, or YOUR OWN, and your example will not bring him to a drunkard's miserable grave! Discard liquor from your fields, and from your houses, and try the experiment of total abstinence for one year, and if you find yourself poorer and less happy for it, you are at liberty to take your names from the pledge, stop the Olive Branch, and call your humble servant a fool.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

The regulations of the post-office require that the Christian name of the party to whom post-office orders are sent, should be given in full. As some inconvenience has arisen from small money-orders being made payable to several parties, it will oblige us if our friends will in future procure their orders for Thomas Beggs, 11, Tokenhouse-yard.

The sittings of the Convention will be held in the Theatre of the City of London Literary Institution, Aldersgate Street; to commence on Tuesday, the 4th of August, at 10 o'clock.

The following gentlemen have already arrived from America, all warm friends of temperance, who, we trust, will be present in the Convention:—Revs. Drs. Cox, De Witt, Patton, and Skinner of New York; Rev. John Marsh, Secretary of the American Temperance Union; Rev. Mr. Hopkins, Doctor Mussey of Cincinnati; Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith; Rev. Dr. Smucker of the Lutheran Theological Seminary; Rev. Dr. Baird, Rev. E. N. Kirk, Ward Stafford, Esq., and Henry Clapp, Esq. of Massachusetts; Rev. Mr. Brainerd, and J. Ashmead, Esq. of Philadelphia; President Olin of the Wesleyan, and Professor Elton of the Brown University; Rev. Mr. Pohlman of Albany; Rev. Dr. Brinsmade of New Jersey, and others whom we are not able to name. By the next steamer, we are expecting to see Dr. Beecher, General Riley, President Emory, Professor Caldwell, Rev. Dr. Tyng, Rev. Dr. Justin Edwards, and E. C. Delavan, Esq., Neal Dow, Esq., and many other warm advocates.

The World's Convention.

The preliminary arrangements are now completed, and we continue to receive encouraging communications from all quarters. We urge upon all societies and associations who have not yet appointed delegates to do so at once. Much confusion will be prevented by attending to this request.

Delegates will please to report themselves at the Society's office, Tokenhouse Yard, near the Bank of England, where they will receive their Cards of Admission, and every necessary information.

A circular has been issued to several gentlemen in London, inquiring whether they can find residences for any of the foreign delegates, and they now take the liberty of urging a reply from those who have not yet acquainted the Committee with their wishes. A number of gentlemen have already kindly offered accommodation. As many of the delegates will probably arrive before the 1st of August, an immediate intimation will be convenient.

The committee have made arrangements for holding a number of public meetings in various parts of the metropolis during the week, particulars of which will appear in the regular announcements. They have also arranged for a number of religious services, and expect the valuable aid of several distinguished ministers from various parts of the world.

On Friday evening a GREAT DEMONSTRATION will take place in Covent Garden Theatre, which has been specially engaged for the occasion. The tickets are now ready, and may be had at the Society's Office, or of any of the parties advertised in the bills, at the following prices:—Dress Circle, 2s., Boxes, 1s. 6d., Stage, 1s. 6d., Platform, 1s. 6d., Pit, 1s., Lower Gallery, 6d., Upper Gallery, 3d.

Delegates will be admitted at the Stage Door, on presenting their tickets.

There will be accommodation for a few families and select parties in the private boxes, terms of which may be obtained at the office.

The committee are glad to find that considerable excitement prevails throughout the country, and that several special trains are provided. One we hear is from Newcastle, and another from Liverpool, and they are highly gratified to receive the appointments of many of the most distinguished friends of the cause, both as delegates and visitors.

CONVENTION FUND.

The Committee have found that an effort upon which they looked at first with some doubt and difficulty, has grown in magnitude as they proceeded. They have found that the sum originally stated as necessary to conduct the Convention through would be inadequate. No doubt a small sum would suffice to defray the mere incidental expenses of the meeting, but to give due publicity to its proceedings, to employ to a proper extent the platform and the press, and to give to the world the results of its deliberations in the daily papers, as well as in a more tangible and permanent form, in a word, to give dignity and efficiency to the proceedings, worthy of the greatness of the cause, a considerable sum would be needed. A liberal friend suggested that £1000 should be raised for the immediate purposes of the Convention. The Committee carefully considered the recommendation, and felt that not only might that sum be profitably spent, but that it was absolutely required to enable them to discharge the responsibilities resting upon them, with satisfaction to themselves and honour to the cause. Their first application by private letter to a number of friends of the movement, has been kindly and generously responded to, but they still want one-half of the required sum.

They submit the following list of subscriptions already received and promised, and urge upon the temperance public the importance of making this occasion the beginning of a new era in the temperance movement. The success of the Convention depends upon the British teetotalers, and to them the committee appeal for prompt and liberal aid.

Subscriptions are requested to be sent to the Society's Office; or to the Treasurer, George William Alexander, Esq., 40, Lombard Street.

We again most earnestly appeal to our friends throughout the United Kingdom to exert themselves in promoting the object of the Convention by every means in their power. A report of a most extraordinary Temperance Convention recently held in Sweden will be found in the former part of our paper. The king and queen, and many of the nobility honoured the meeting with their presence.

DECREASE OF DRUNKENNESS.—For a length of time it has been the practice of the police to take into custody all persons found in the streets drunk and incapable of taking care of themselves, more especially on Saturday and Sunday nights, when there are generally a greater number of drunken persons about than on any other of the nights of the week. The following account shows that during the last few years, a great decrease has taken place in the number of drunken persons found under such circumstances. In the course of the year 1837, between the hours of 12 on Saturday night and 12 on Sunday night, the number thus taken charge of by the police at the station-house in Bow-street alone was 755, of whom 404 were men, and 351 women. In 1845, the number was 311; of whom 177 were men, and 134 women; thus showing, on a comparison between the two years, 1837 and 1845, a decrease of 444 persons.—Globe.

MISSION FUND.

We are compelled once more to make a special appeal in behalf of the Mission. The funds are nearly exhausted, and it has become a question with the committee, whether they can sustain it along with their other agencies. It is with extreme reluctance that they entertained for one moment, the idea of abandoning a sphere of labour which has been so signally blessed, but want of means compels them to say, that the friends of the cause must come to their help, or they must relinquish the Mission. At a time when public opinion is gathering around the temperance principle, and general attention devoted to the condition of our neglected districts, it is painful to reflect that we are forced upon considerations of narrowing, rather than extending our efforts. It must be borne in mind that thousands of our fellow-beings, the victims of intemperance by education and habit, never hear of the remedy that might give them back to society, and shed comfort on their miserable home, except through the visitation of the temperance missionary. Many have been extricated from this moral gulf by this instrumentality. It must not be forgotten, that in the neglected neighbourhoods of our large towns, thousands of young and tender beings, that under better auspices, might be trained up to paths of sobriety and virtue, are training up by drunken and vicious parents, to a life of evil, misery, and crime. The value of every one rescued outweighs a world. There is every prospect of an enlarged measure of success attending the advocacy of our principles. Good men of all parties are pleading in behalf of the poor and the lowly, and are turning their attention to that rising generation who will have to become the preceptors for good or for evil, of a generation that has to succeed to them. We would that we could send an invitation to every darkened home—to every vicious heart. That we cannot hope as yet, but we trust that our friends will enable us to maintain the small force we at present employ. We have received the following donations to this object, and hope to have a more gratifying announcement to make in our next. The accounts of the success of our missionary labours, are more cheering as we proceed, and we trust, after the World's Convention, that we shall be enabled to place this invaluable means of good upon a permanent footing.

HOBART TOWN.

We have received the Third Annual Report of the Hobart Town Total Abstinence Society, from which we make the following extracts:—

During the past twelve months our Society has made great progress. Above one thousand persons have signed the pledge during that period. We regret our want of means to ascertain the number of consistent members, though at least three-fourths may be counted upon. We have gone forward in prosperity and in peace. Active opposition has ceased to exist, and the tide of public sentiment is not against us but with us. From our increased experience, and from our enlarged views of the subject of total abstinence, we are not only better assured of the firmness of the ground upon which we stand, but we are better prepared, and more ardently resolved, to carry forward the great work of true temperance.

With much satisfaction do the committee present a few facts, illustrating the workings of this society. As to the amount of reformed drunkards in connexion with us, we may be justified in saying, that there are hundreds of them in this town. One who is now among our most active members was, two years ago, suffering from delirium tremens. At the period of his signing the pledge, he was £50 in debt; and though he has been frequently out of employment since that time, he has paid off that large sum, and now owes no man anything. £150 has been saved by one of our members since he joined us. Another mechanic, in seven months, paid off a large debt, including a seven pounds' grog score, purchased furniture, bought a bible for twenty-five shillings, has four bags of flour in the house, and two pigs in the sty, and is, after all, several pounds in pocket. Teetotalism has been the means of leading him and his wife from drunkenness to a place of worship, and to the feet of their Saviour. One of our most useful public advocates declared that he had been a drunkard for twenty years, that he had blasted his reputation, ruined his health, injured his morals, soured his temper, debased his intellect, and brought his family to abject poverty. His friends in the society who know and value his character, can best bear testimony to the pleasing change wrought in him by total abstinence. Another declared that it was not until he became a teetotaler that he began to think.

A man long known as a wretched slave to liquor, that often in his maddened moments cruelly beat his wife and children, whose aspect would have moved any but a drunkard's heart,—this man has now been a consistent teetotaler for nearly three years. He and his wife are regular attendants at a place of worship, and the well-clad offspring are Sunday scholars. Numbers of cases might be adduced of drunken fighting parents becoming sober and affectionate partners; the effect of such a change upon the children can be better imagined than described. A woman, who was a very frequent visitor at the factory, and whose cries from the unmerciful thrashings of an exasperated husband had often broken the stillness of a Sunday morning, is now a quiet industrious teetotaler. Another desperate drunkard had been induced to sign the pledge. Soon after this, her husband desired her to go and fetch him some rum. She refused, and received for her reward a sound beating. Turning round to him she said, with great emphasis, "Jack, though you kill me, I'll not fetch the rum." The man gave in first, for he shortly after dropped the use of rum altogether. It is pleasing to add, that he has since left off his old habit of swearing. A speaker at one of our meetings lately declared that his habit of drinking was derived from his father's own table; and though for sixteen years he had not looked into a Bible, he now rejoiced in the reading of this blessed book. His father had been a leading member of a religious society, and was a moderate drinker for sixty years, and yet after all died of delirium tremens. He alluded also to five young men, his companions, members of a christian church in this town, three of whom have died drunkards, and the fourth is a living drunkard. One of the committee had occasion to visit the family of a working man, which he found in the most distressing state. The poor children presented that appearance of neglect and misery which declared them to be the offspring of a drunkard. The father signed the pledge; and the change from poverty to plenty, from disease to health, from wretchedness to happiness, from an ill-regulated household to a comfortable and orderly family, was never more conspicuous than in this instance. Indolent, disreputable, and uncivil servants, have become, under the teetotal regimen, diligent, honest, and attentive. Not long ago, one of our most active members was giving his experience of the benefits he had received from teetotalism; but when he came to speak of the advantages his family had received, his throat was choked, his eyes were full, he could say no more.

The good effected by this society is not confined to Hobart Town; our branch societies can exhibit the same. There is now a country member, who had left home as a prodigal, and whose father is a deacon of one of the largest London churches. What pleasure will fill the soul of the good old man when he hears the happy news! At one of our country stations an advocate went round the township the morning after a successful meeting. He called upon one who had signed on that occasion. His address betokened better days of old, but his haggard countenance told a sad tale. A hope being expressed that he would keep his pledge, the poor man replied, in a deep, and solemn tone, "I trust I shall; for when I went to bed last night I prayed unto my God to help me." A hearty shake of the hands, with an expressive meeting of tearful eyes, hastily broke up this interview. Can a man help engaging heart and soul in a work after such a sight as this; and shall a cold, unfeeling, and unsympathising world reproach us for wild enthusiasm? If the vain worldling—if the negligent professor, knew the joy which sometimes overwhelms the heart of a Temperance Advocate, as he sees God so blessing the labours of this Society, he would not pity him, but envy him. O! then, let every one who has the feelings of a man, the feelings of a brother, the feelings of a christian, haste to the rescue of the unfortunate drunkard. Time is passing away—many are sinking to destruction;—and can one stand unheeding by and not extend a willing hand to save them? Time is passing away;—delay in the performance of duty may harden the heart; and the man may depart from this life with the miserable thought, that with the desire to do good he had not courage to do it, and that the sad influence of his want of faithfulness will be felt when his bones are mouldering in the grave.

UNITED STATES.

The American papers contain many details of the movement now making there on the License question. The New York Organ gives a summary of the result up to June 13.

Our returns thus far are from 785 towns, of those 666 have voted No License, and 119 License. There are 856 towns in the state, and consequently 71 more to hear from. The actual vote has not yet been received of only about half the towns; of them, about 400 which have voted No License have given an aggregate majority of over 50,000; while of 70 towns voting License the majority is less than 3,000. The present indications are, the aggregate majorities will be more than ten to one for No License. The expression of the popular voice on this subject, has been as decisive and emphatic, as on any question ever submitted to the people of this state. Every town but one in each of the counties of Chautauque, Madison, Schenectady, Kings, Niagara, Onondaga, Clinton and Yates, want No License. Wayne, Washington, Wyoming, Warren, Orleans, Tompkins and Tioga gave No License majorities in every town.

The Troy Whig says, of the result of the election of the 19th:—"The cold water deluge has submerged the whole state, with the exception of here and there a fiery nosed town, rising like a volcano above the temperance ocean."

Man brings upon himself a thousand calamities as consequences of his artifices and pride, and then overlooking his own follies, gravely investigates the origin of what he calls evil.

Earth has no sweeter music than a gentle word, breathed into a sorrowing heart.

LIBERIA.

The governor of this interesting colony of liberated Africans, in his message, under date 5th January, 1846, thus speaks:—

"Permit me, gentlemen, to recommend to your consideration the propriety of increasing the restriction imposed on dealers in spirituous liquors. I am aware that various opinions are entertained in regard to the propriety of legislating upon this subject. We are told that the unrestrained use of intoxicating drinks, is a moral evil that should be corrected only by moral suasion, and not by legislative authority. This opinion, however, is evidently founded in error, and cannot possibly be sustained by any sound reasonings. For my own part, I am decidedly of opinion, that tippling-shops, in any community, are public nuisances, and should be deemed so by the law. Their pernicious effects will be felt, more or less, in any community where they are established, and the sooner Liberia can rid herself of them the better. I am persuaded, gentlemen, that you will do all in your power to suppress this unrighteous traffic."—Colonization Herald.

GREAT MISSION MOVEMENT.

THE HONORARY TRAVELLING AGENT'S REPORT.

WESTON, SUPER-MARE.—I addressed the children of the Sunday-schools, at the Wesleyan chapel, on Sunday, 14th ult., and the teachers and parents at the Independent chapel. On the 17th ult. I addressed the members at the Temperance Hall, and re-organized the society; and the Loan-system will likely be carried out; but the society is in a languishing state, and there are few that take an active part, the onus of the society falling on the Independent minister, and one or two more. The hall was given to the society by a Wesleyan, and there is a Mechanics' Institution, which bids fair for usefulness. It is an increasing town, and partakes of the dissipation of watering-places.

BANWELL.—On the 19th ult. I held a meeting at the Temperance Hall, the Rev. the vicar presiding, when it was resolved to form the society into an association, in connexion with the National Society, the Rev. W. H. Turner being appointed corresponding member. A Branch Society was formed for the town and vicinity, and a goodly number of the leading friends, and among others, Mrs. Turner and one of her daughters engaged to take districts. I was hospitably entertained at the vicarage, and warmly supported by the devoted incumbent, who will lend the society his best aid.

WELLS.—I visited the schools, on Sunday, 21st ult., met the Committee the following evening, when it was resolved to form an association, and establish a branch for the whole city, and J. F. Lawrence, Esq., was nominated corresponding member. The annual festival was held on the 23rd ult., when a procession paraded the town, and the members took tea in the evening, at the Temperance Hall; after which, a public meeting was held, at which Mr. Clarke, a friend from Street, presided, and the Rev. Mr. Evans, Baptist, of Wells, Gregory, Independent, from Bristol, and Rev. Mr. Solly, from Shepton-Mallet, took part in the proceedings. The following evening I met the committee and members, when arrangements were made to carry out the loan-system. The society has long been in a very languishing state, but it is hoped a fresh impulse will be given to it.

BRIDGEWATER.—On the 25th, I held a meeting at the Friends' meeting-house, when it was resolved to propose, that the society should be formed into an Association, and Mr. J. B. Thompson, a Friend, was nominated corresponding member; and on the following evening, it was confirmed by the members, and the organization carried out in the town. This Society had anticipated the National Society, in preparing printed covers for Loan Tracts, which it was determined to adopt for the present supply, and a goodly number have offered their services as tract distributors.

TAUNTON.—On Sunday, 28th ult., I addressed the Sunday-school children of the town, at the North-street chapel, and the teachers, in the same place, in the evening, and distributed tracts among them. On the 29th, I met the temperance committee, when it was resolved to re-organize the society into an association, and to form a branch in the centre of the town. The following evening, the above resolutions were adopted by a large meeting of the members, J. B. Young, Esq., being appointed corresponding member.

The society was, at one time, very energetic; but has got into a languid state. The organization was highly approved of, as being greatly needed. The population was, in 1840, 12,000, and there are 250 public-houses, and 400 to 500 pledged members, including juveniles. They have an excellent Temperance Hall.

MILVERTON.—I accompanied a party of temperance friends to the above place, on the 1st inst., where an annual festival was held; and after taking tea in the Friends' meeting-house, a public meeting was held, when it was determined to form the town into a branch society, in connexion with Wellington, and some leading persons promised their patronage.

WELLINGTON.—On the 2nd inst., I met the committee and members of the society at the coffee-house, when it was agreed to form an association, and Silvanus Fox, Esq., a Friend, was appointed corresponding member, and there is a fair prospect of the society becoming efficient and successful. The society was in a languishing state.

EXETER.—On the 6th inst. a public meeting was held in the Athenæum, R. W. Fox, Esq., a Friend, presiding, and a numerous attendance. An association was resolved upon, and the parish of St. Sidwell's was fixed upon as the centre of a branch; and on the following evening, I met the members, when both were fully organized, and a goodly number came forward to be tract distributors. Some benevolent ladies have circulated tracts on the loan-system, for some time. The President was appointed corresponding member. The population of Exeter is about 32,000. There are eight breweries, and 240 public-houses. The number of pledged members is about 1500, including juveniles. There is a reading-room and library, used also for lectures. Delegates were appointed to attend the World's Convention, and a handsome contribution will be made to the same. The friends here have taken up the cause with great spirit.

EXMOUTH.—On the 8th inst. a public meeting was held in the Albion room, an Association was organized auxiliary to the National Society, and a branch for the whole town formed, and Thomas Hall, Esq., appointed corresponding member. The population is about 6000. There are above twenty public-houses. The number of members, including juveniles, is about 500. The Independent minister, is president of the society, and is a devoted friend to the cause.

TOPSHAM.—This is a small town between Exeter and Exmouth, where the cause of temperance has been often advocated; but little success has attended such efforts. I held a meeting on the 9th inst., and formed the society into a branch of the Exeter Auxiliary, the committee of which will visit and encourage the society.

SHAFTESBURY.—It was my intention to visit the above town, on Sunday 12th inst., but having been detained a day longer than I expected, in holding a meeting at Topsham, I could not reach Shaftesbury in time; therefore I remained over Sunday, at Yeovil, where I addressed the schools in the Independent chapel in the afternoon. The temperance cause is in a low state at present, having lost an able advocate and patron, by the removal of the late curate, whose labours were greatly blessed in this place.

Knowing that the annual conference of the Bristol and Somerset County Association was to be held on the 14th inst., at Shaftesbury, I resolved to be present, in order that I might confer with delegates from the surrounding places, in regard to the state of the temperance cause, in their respective localities, and to recommend the National organization. I attended the said conference, which was held in the Town Hall, when, at my suggestion, and warmly supported by delegates from towns I had visited, a resolution was passed, recommending the societies in the county to carry out the improved organization, and that the itinerant lecturers should encourage the same, in their periodical visits to the several places. I was much pleased by the respectful attention which was paid to my suggestions, and the good feeling manifested to the National Temperance Society. Joseph Eaton and John Rutter, Esqs., were nominated as delegates from the County Association, to the World's Convention, in addition to those who may be sent from each society.

I took part, likewise, in the public meeting, which was held at the same place, in the evening, when I had the pleasure of listening to most interesting addresses from Messrs. Eaton, Thomas, and Charlton, from Bristol.

To-day (Wednesday 15th) there are to be processions of the teetotalers, rechabites, and juveniles, through the town, a lecture to be delivered by Mr. J. Rassom of Bristol, and a grand gala in the grounds of a gentleman, in which a tent has been erected, capable of accommodating 1000 persons, under which tea is to be taken, and a public meeting held in the evening. I purpose addressing the assemblage, on the subject of organization, which is much wanted here, and which I have reason to hope will be taken up with much spirit, as some of the leading friends to the cause are intelligent and energetic, and have promised their cordial support.

In concluding this brief report of my operations for the past month, I have to record the friendly reception I have everywhere met with, and the readiness with which my suggestions have been adopted; but let it not be supposed, that what has been accomplished, has been unattended with conflicting opinions, prejudice, and misconception, or that the Veni Vidi Vici, style of my report, is to be interpreted into a too early conquest over preconceived notions of the past efficiency and success of long established societies. The transition from the passive enjoyment of public lectures, annual festivals, and holiday pageantry, to the humble and self-denying labours of the devoted tract distributor, among the families of the inebriate and destitute, is great, and cannot be accomplished except by the sacrifice of time, and the exercise of christian feeling to the bodies and souls of men.

Nearly all the societies were found in a languishing state; meetings were seldom held, and even the lectures of itinerants, appear to excite little interest, and are attended chiefly by the members. The members are not regularly visited—the subscriptions fall off, or are difficult of collection—the numbers of pledged members cannot be obtained, and the returns are conjectural; in fact, there is found the greatest need for proper organization, and that recommended, is acknowledged to be the thing most wanted at the present.

The World's Convention is exciting a lively interest, and if half of the delegates attend, that are spoken of, the Literary Institution will scarcely accommodate them. I purpose visiting Poole, Southampton, &c, on my way to town, to attend the aforesaid meeting.

FLINTSHIRE.

DEAR SIR,—I rejoice to say, that my feeble labours with the temperance movement, is not altogether in vain, but that it is much approved of by all the friends, and many others are coming over. I have, of late, delivered open air lectures, to workmen on the railway, to stone-cutters, farmers, &c.

June 20th. I lectured at Trelogan, to lead-miners. June 29th. At Gwespyn. July 1st. Near Mostyn, to stone-cutters and others. The lectures were well attended, and much satisfaction was evinced; and, I am informed, that many have signed the pledge in their respective places. Wishing the people to have time to inquire and judge for themselves, and that the cause should not appear at all sectarian, I do not press upon any to sign in my presence, but join different branches of the temperance societies, in their respective places of worship.

Just the same as regarding great revivals of religion, we continually learn that those who have joined us under any excitement, or for fashion's sake, or have been pressed on by the force of public opinion—almost all such members have withdrawn! On the other hand, those who have joined us from principle, and others who have found great benefit by the movement, are as firm as ever; and some of such are very uneasy at office-bearers in christian churches who are quite indifferent, or opposed to the temperance cause. It is very likely that great trouble will be occasioned. Now, who is to give up?

Newmarket, July 18, 1846.

EVAN DAVIES.

HAMPSHIRE.

25, Cannon-street, Winchester, July 15, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—During the past month I have lectured at Poole twice, at Newtontoney, Winterslow and Allington once, and have been engaged in visiting from house to house, and distributing tracts at the following places—Twyford, Crowdhill, Bishopstoke, Gosport, Hartley-Row, Haselyheath, Crondell, Odiham, Winchfield, Hinton, and several other villages. The result of my month's labours has been 43 signatures to the pledge.

July 2nd. At Newtontoney, the society held their anniversary; about 100 sat down to tea. The Rev. Mr. Rowe, having preached the annual sermon in the afternoon, stayed to the public meeting in the evening, which was addressed by Messrs. Young, Rowe, and your agent—several signatures. This is the most efficient village society I ever met with.

July 7th and 8th. At Poole, assisted in the formation of a union to be called, "The Dorset and Hants Teetotal Association," in connexion with the National Temperance Society; sixteen delegates were present, and all entered heartily in the project; much good is expected from this association. The societies in the two counties have been comparatively powerless, owing to their disunited character. Mr. W. Holmes of Alton, presided at the business meeting, and was elected treasurer; the choice of secretary falling upon your agent. A committee was also elected to carry out the objects of the association. The following is a copy of the fifth resolution:—

"That the National Temperance Chronicle and Recorder be the organ of this Association."

It is, however, needless for me to refer more particularly to this subject now, as a copy of the resolutions, &c., will be duly forwarded when printed.

A. W. HERITAGE.

"Secretary of National Temperance Society."

BATH.—The eighth annual report of the Bath Juvenile Temperance Society, has also reached us, and we are glad to find that special efforts have been made during the year, with regard to that important class of persons—the teachers of youth. We hope the following will inspire others to follow their example.

The Committee directed their especial attention, during the past year, to the importance of interesting the very influential body of Sunday-school teachers who labour in this city, in favour of the principles of the Society. They, therefore, presented each Sunday-school teacher in Bath and its neighbourhood, to the number of 700, with a copy of the Prize Essay on Temperance, addressed to teachers, as also with an invitation to a meeting of Sunday-school teachers, to consider the propriety of introducing the temperance subject into Sabbath-schools. This meeting was held on the 19th of March, in the present year, and the Committee deem it one of the most important ever held, since the establishment of the society. Nearly one-half of the teachers invited were in attendance, and the following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

I.—That this meeting, deeply deploring the manifold evils resulting from the vice of intemperance, and fully recognising the importance of training the young in the principles and practice of entire abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, cordially approves of the efforts made by the Bath Juvenile Temperance Society to promote this object.

II.—That this meeting, being fully conscious of the importance, influence, and responsibility of the station held in the christian church by Sabbath-school teachers, earnestly recommends the temperance question to their serious and prayerful consideration.

III.—That this meeting rejoices in the successful efforts made by the teachers of the various Sabbath-schools in Bristol, to further the temperance reformation in their respective schools, and is willing to aid in the promotion of such an object in this city.

A considerable number then signed the pledge. A second meeting of teachers was subsequently held, when a Sunday-school temperance union was formed. Fifty-one teachers immediately joined the union, and appointed a Committee, who have been making exertions to hold meetings in connexion with the various Sabbath-schools. The Committee hope, at their next anniversary, to be able to report much good resulting from this movement. The Committee earnestly commend the temperance question to the adoption of Sunday-school teachers, as they firmly believe that if their influence and exertions were directed to the inculcation of our principles in the minds of their youthful charge, their self-denying efforts would not in so many instances be rendered nugatory, as is now unhappily the case, in consequence of the drinking customs of society. The Committee feel pleasure in stating that the practice of giving intoxicating liquors to the children of our public-schools has, with one or two exceptions, been discontinued. In those cases where the custom is still kept up, memorials have been presented to the managers of the schools, praying its discontinuance; and the Committee trust, that the teachers of youth universally will soon see the propriety of withholding from those committed to their charge, those drinks which in the end bite like a serpent and sting like an adder.

CHATTERIS.—On the 1st July, the quarterly meeting of the delegates of the West Norfolk Temperance Association, was held in this town. There was a large attendance of delegates, and the business of the meeting was satisfactorily conducted. The reports of the various societies were generally of a favourable character. A dinner was provided for the delegates, and ten, with other requisites were served up for the friends of temperance, in the General Baptist School Room. Afterwards a public meeting was held in the Independent Chapel. Mr. William Lyon was called to the chair, who introduced Messrs. Lallam, Hatman, and Rawlings, from Downham Market, with Messrs. Lowe, Giscard, and Keed, from Lynn, whose several speeches were animating and encouraging. Mr. Edwards also addressed the meeting. We consider this to have been one of the best temperance meetings ever held in this town.

NORFOLK.—DOWNHAM MARKET RECHABITE FESTIVAL.—On Thursday, the 18th June, our town was enlivened by the appearance of numerous parties from the surrounding villages, uniting with the members of our "Moral Reform" tent, to celebrate its sixth anniversary. Having first attended to the business of our order, we walked in procession to the General Baptist Chapel, where a sermon was preached by Mr. Griffiths of Necton, afterwards we proceeded in the same order to dinner in the Wesleyan Chapel. We afterwards went to the market-place, our esteemed agent, Mr. Diffey, addressed the public, and from thence proceeded towards the field in the occupation of Mr. Savage, where roomy tents and ample provision for tea, cheered the countenances of all. Mr. Brootman was called to the chair, when several Baptist and Wesleyan ministers, each took part in recommending the principles of the temperance reformation, which occupied the time to a late hour.

OUTWELL.—NORFOLK. The annual festival of our Temperance Society took place on the two first days of July, as in former years, so in this, our procession, and the attendance of our various meetings made such an inroad on the anticipated pleasures of those who came to pay their yearly homage to Bacchus and his companions, that we may safely add, they were ready to hang their harps on the willows. Above 300 took tea each day in the Primitive Methodist chapel, and the company out of doors, upwards of 3000, were addressed by various speakers. Mr. Addleshaw, agent of the East Norfolk Temperance Association, was listened to with the deepest attention. Mr. Edwards from London, delivered a lecture on Friday. Thus ended Outwell fair with the teetotalers, to which they may look back without regret.

DR. GRINDROD'S LECTURES.

Dr. Grindrod has now concluded his visit to the Channel Islands. He has delivered upwards of twenty lectures, more than half of which have been free. These have been addressed to all classes, including meetings for females and youths. Dr. G. also made a gratuitous visit to the island of Sark, and there established a new society. At Jersey, among the signatures, we may include one clergyman, one surgeon, and many other respectable individuals. At Guernsey, three clergymen made a public profession of a change in their views, and their determination to try the principle, and one minister and his lady signed the pledge.

As a proof of the interest excited by the labours of Dr. G., we present the following letter, which was handed to the lecturer on Monday evening, with a handsome donation on behalf of the funds of the institution. The sentiments expressed by the excellent lady (who wishes to be anonymous) do her infinite credit; and we feel assured that the thousands who have had the privilege of attending this interesting course of lectures, will cordially unite in the fervent aspiration, that the members of the Universal Church may soon be influenced by the spirit of the apostolic maxim: "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak."

"DEAR SIR,—I regret that indisposition has prevented my attending your second course of lectures, the first having interested me greatly. Although I have not become a member of your society, I feel that the truths you have so kindly and disinterestedly laid before us, demand our exertions in its behalf; and I trust, under God's blessing, to further its object, so far as my feeble efforts will enable me. I enclose a small trifle for the society, humbly hoping and praying that God will continue to bless and prosper this, your work and labour of love, to immortal souls, more especially in this our highly-favoured, but greatly guilty island. May your visit amongst us prove a blessing to many a family, is the sincere prayer of one who takes a deep interest in the success of the society you have so warmly advocated! I remain, dear sir, in the bonds of Christian love,

"Yours, very truly,

"Monday, July 6, 1846.

ANON."

HOWDEN.—Interesting Gathering of the York and Howden Teetotalers.—On Tuesday the 30th ult., upwards of 200 of the York teetotalers visited Howden by the City of York Steam Packet. About 2 o'clock, the teetotalers of Howden met the York members and friends, immediately formed a procession and entered the town, accompanied by a band of music. After perambulating the principal streets, they proceeded to the Market Cross, when the following advocates were present and addressed the members and friends of the Society, viz., Messrs. F. Hopwood, E. P. Hood, Bormond, Edwards, and Jarvis Craike. At 4 o'clock about 800 persons partook of tea in a spacious and commodious tent erected in the pleasure-grounds attached to the Manor House, once the residence of the Bishop of Durham, the use of which had been kindly granted by J. D. Jefferson, Esq. In the evening, the chair was taken by E. Thompson, Esq. of Armin, and the company was addressed by the Revs. R. G. Mason, J. Cummins of Snaith, and Messrs. Hood, Bormond, Edwards, Craike, &c.; and judging from the great attention with which this large audience listened to the addresses, a favourable impression was made in the minds of the people on the subject of teetotalism. At the conclusion of the meeting, a vote of thanks was given to J. D. Jefferson, Esq. for the use of the grounds.—From the Doncaster Chronicle, July 3rd, 1846.

FILLEIGH.—The third annual festival of the Total Abstinence Society, was celebrated on the 18th of June. The Lynton teetotal band was engaged for the occasion, and a procession was got up, and joined by a large body of teetotalers from the surrounding villages, and consisted of both adults and juveniles. We have members here under twelve years of age, the children of notorious drunkards, who have stood firm against every temptation which was offered them. A public tea-party was held, of which about 260 partook. We were enabled to admit children at a reduced price through the kindness and liberality of Earl Fortescue; to whom we are indebted for many other favours. The chair was taken by the Secretary at the public meeting, who, after a few remarks, called upon Mr. Irewin of South Molton, who made a sensible, and practical speech in favour of the good cause. Mr. Woolcock, Bible Christian minister, then addressed the meeting, and in a speech of considerable length, full of argument and sound sense; successfully combated many of the objections brought against teetotalism, and made a good impression upon the audience.

Our old and tried friend, Mr. Veysey of Torrington, came next, and in a telling speech of more than an hour, successfully answered the arguments which have been brought to bear against our principles. He not only proved the uselessness of alcoholic drinks as a means of strengthening and supporting the human constitution, but also the injurious properties possessed by such beverages. At the close of the meeting, eight signatures were received, which makes the number of members in our society about 135.

A. SAUL, Secretary.

SCARBOROUGH.—We have received the Ninth Annual Report of Scarborough New Temperance Society. It is a most interesting document. The society seems in a prosperous condition, and we regret that we can only find room for the following extract from the report:—

"Your Committee had determined to engage a permanent Temperance Home Missionary, who should visit from house to house, in order to seek to reclaim the abandoned drunkard, and to invite the co-operation of all classes in behalf of this great moral reformation. In the absence, however, of a person, in all respects eligible for this important work presenting, the President of the Society, Mr. W. Wood, kindly and generously offered his services gratuitously; and the Committee feel that it is due to disinterested labours like these, thus to record their sense of the value of this service. They know that such service to be rightly performed, must be attended with much personal sacrifice—but they rejoice to know, that, in the course of 380 visits which have been paid since the commencement of the work, many, very many, are trophies of success which have crowned these self-denying efforts. Many of the victims of intemperance, and these comprising both male and female, have been rescued from their dreadful position, and are now enjoying those fruits of sobriety, of moral, and in some instances, religious reform, which, through divine grace, have been so conspicuous in the history of the operations of the temperance society in Scarborough.

"It is fearful to witness the vast amount of intemperance that prevails, and especially amongst the working part of our population; many of whom, from not being permanently connected with Scarborough, are much less under the influence of public opinion, and therefore, allow themselves to indulge with comparatively little restraint, in various kinds of dissipation and excess; and it must be lamentable to every right feeling mind, to know, that the common public house, which is usually a school of vice, is much more frequented by this class of our population, than was the case some time ago."

STAINES.—On Monday, July 13th, a festival and tea meeting was held, in this place, 400 persons took tea together. The weather being fine, the friends from various distant auxiliaries attended. The company was extremely numerous, highly-respectable and orderly; after the tea a public meeting was held, and addresses delivered by Messrs. Metters of Drayton; Claridge of London (Missionary to the National Temperance Society); Holden, Worley, and others. It being our first attempt every thing went off well, and was truly encouraging.

Reviews.

The Contrast, or a History of William Smith and Richard Young, By J. RUSSELL. Houlston and Stoneman.

We recommend parents and teachers to place this little tract in the hands of children and youth. It is a little narrative prettily and effectively drawn. Parents themselves may glean a useful lesson from it, and may be induced to inquire how much their own example has to do with the future conduct of their children, and it will operate more powerfully on the minds of young people than more ambitious efforts. Its size and price fit it for extensive circulation; and we hope that all our readers will give it a perusal. We regard it as well adapted for its purpose—the instruction of youth—and hope its author will be encouraged by its success to other efforts of the same kind.

The Scottish Temperance Herald, a newspaper, conducted by Mr. Robert Somers, who is a staunch friend of the temperance cause, as he has generously manifested by opening his columns to its advocacy, and excluding all advertisements of strong drink, or houses where it is sold, contains the following, among other remarks, on the World's Convention:—

"A great number of the ministers from all parts of this and other countries will be present at the great meeting of the Evangelical Alliance which is appointed to take place in London about the same time, and will doubtless co-operate in the proceedings of the Temperance Convention, and by their countenance and their sentiments, give the best evidence that the Temperance Movement is not that anti-evangelical system which so large a portion of the religious world supposes it to be. By a judicious selection of the topics to be discussed, by devolving the speechmaking part of the business upon practical and experienced men, and restricting them to short and argumentative addresses, the conductors of the World's Convention will earn the gratitude of the friends of temperance throughout the world, and prove the happy instruments of accomplishing an incalculable amount of good. We will wait the result of this Convention with deep interest; and in the meantime it only remains for us to add, that the expenses of this great effort are to be defrayed by the contributions of societies sending delegates, and of individuals who feel interested in its objects. Each society is expected to contribute a sum of not less than One Guinea. We trust that there will be no deficiency of funds, as the success of the Convention will necessarily depend in a great measure upon the publicity which is given to its proceedings, and the vigour with which its resolutions are followed up."

A LETTER TO THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, appointed to be held in Bristol, on Wednesday, July 29th, 1846, in which are considered the claims of the Temperance Reformation on the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, and its bearings on the Convention of the World. By Eli Walker, Wesleyan local preacher, in the Hull East Circuit, pp. 64.

This is an appeal to the Conference by a member of the Wesleyan body; calmly and dispassionately written, and setting forth every argument that ought to be cogent with that body of people. The author is evidently in earnest, and pleads the claims of the Temperance movement with the fervor of a Christian mind, seeing its great importance as an instrumentality in preparing the way for the more extensive reception of divine truth. It is calculated to make a deep impression upon candid minds; and we trust the teetotalers of our country will make every exertion to place it in right hands, and give it an extensive circulation.

ASTOUNDING THOUGHT.

We learn from a letter from Archdeacon Jeffreys of Bombay, that the native Hindoos, being trained up on the principles of caste, are almost exempt from drunkenness; but that on their renouncing caste and becoming christians, they are at liberty to drink; and as sure as they do, such is their native constitution, that they will at once become the worst of drunkards, and practise every species of wickedness; that there is nothing, therefore, but the most thorough temperance among christian missionaries that will prevent all christian missions from "becoming a curse and not a blessing." This is a thought big with momentous consequences, and what ministers of the gospel will do with it who plead for moderation in the use of intoxicating liquors in preference to total abstinence, we know not. But we give the language of the venerable Archdeacon:

"I am persuaded, too, from many years of past experience, that God will not bless the cause of missions on this side of India with any extensive success, till the missionaries of the everlasting gospel take up this position.

"Even already, from the melancholy instances of the falls of our native converts, solely through drink, that have come to my knowledge, I am certain—and from the very nature of man I can prove—that Hindoos cannot outrage all those principles of 'pure temperance' in which they have been brought up, and wound their 'weak conscience' by even TASTING intoxicating drinks, without danger—I should rather say, a certainty—that in a very large proportion of instances, they will become drunkards. And I am certain, that when we have churches of native christians, there will be found a much larger proportion of drunkards among them, than among an equal number of Hindoos taken indiscriminately from the villages in India; and, consequently, that all the crimes which are the known result of intemperance will abound among them.

"On receiving them into the 'christian caste,' if the missionary does not exhort them to continue in the SAME principles of pure temperance in which they have been educated from their youth, and set the same example in his own person; if he once loosens the cord or puts the stumbling-block before their 'weak consciences,' by even the SIGHT of intoxicating drinks upon his own table, a flood of intemperance, with all its crimes, will come in upon the infant church, and spread over India; and all our missionary efforts will end (on the whole) in a curse, and not a blessing to this country."—American Temperance Journal.

DASH THE WINE CUP AWAY.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

(From the Fountain.)

Dash the wine cup away! though its sparkle should be More bright than the gems that lie hid in the sea,—
For the Demon, unseen by thine eye, lurketh there,
Who would win thee to ruin, to woe, and despair!

Believe not the tempter who tells thee of joy
In the bright flashing goblets that lure to destroy;
Nor barter thy birthright, nor give up thy soul,
For a moment's mad bliss, to the Fiend of the Bowl!

Oh, the mighty have fallen!—the strong and the proud
To the thrall of the wine cup have abjectly bowed;
For its maddening delights flung their glory away,
And yielded, insanelly, their souls to its sway.

The wise and the learned in the lore of the schools,
Have drank—and become the derision of fools;
And the light that made radiant the spirit divine,
Hath often been quenched in a goblet of wine.

Youth and Beauty, while yet in their strength and their glow,

Have been marked by the fiend and in ruin laid low;
And the Priest and the Statesman together have knelt
To the Wine-God obscene, till in madness they reeled!

Oh, the Earth in her woe for her children hath wept,
To the grave of the drunkard in hecatombs swept;
While the Demon, enthroned o'er her sunniest climes,
Hath unleashed, in his wrath, all his woes and his crimes!

And the altars of devils still smoke with the blood
Of our sires and our sons—once the wise and the good—
While dark and more dark, gather o'er our path
The clouds that are charged with JEHOVAH'S dread wrath.

Shall we wait till they burst, and from mountain to sea,
Old Earth like the Valley of Hinnom shall be?
And sternly o'er all, Desolation shall reign,
While the vulture sits gorged o'er heaps of the slain?

Nay—up to the rescue! The land must be torn
From the grasp of the Demon whose fetters we've worn—
Our homes, by his touch, be no longer profaned—
Our souls in his thralldom, no more be enchained!

Dash the wine cup away! we will henceforth be free—
Earth's captives their morn of redemption shall see,
And the foul fiend that bound them be thrust back to Hell,
While the songs of our triumph exultingly swell!

The Cabinet.

CHURCH ACTION ON TEMPERANCE.—The Indiana Annual Conference of the United Brethren, at its recent session, passed the following resolution:—

Resolved, That all our preachers shall fearlessly advocate the cause of temperance in all our charges.

Since the discontinuance of intoxicating drinks in the British army in India, chiefly voluntary, through the influence of temperance societies, six years, at least, it is computed, are added to the soldier's life. In hot climates men cannot endure intoxicating liquors. They melt away before them as does snow before an April sun. But this is not all. Nothing produces insubordination, corruption, vice of every character, brutality, and blasphemy like the distribution of rum rations.

A WITTY PRISONER.—Not long since, the chaplain of one of our state prisons, being engaged in preparing a table of crime, held the following dialogue with a prisoner: Chaplain—Well, what brought you here? Prisoner—The sheriffs, sir. Chaplain—But I want to know if liquor had anything to do with it? Prisoner—O yes, sir, they were both drunk!

LADIES' TRACT LENDING SOCIETIES.

We have pleasure in stating that any ladies desirous of forming tract lending societies, on the plan laid down and recommended in No. 62 of the "IPSWICH TEMPERANCE TRACTS," (see advertisement,) and wanting means to commence operations will receive some assistance in tracts on application to the EDITOR OF THE TEMPERANCE TRACTS, IPSWICH.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received several reports of meetings for which, in consequence of going to press earlier this month, we are not able to avail ourselves. We may take this opportunity of stating, that we cannot promise attention to articles that do not reach us on or before the 15th of each month. We may also say, that whilst we shall be obliged by communications sent—as our space for intelligence will be limited—we hope the writers will make them as brief as possible, and embodying such points as will make them reports of general interest.

A Hydropathist.—We think his inquiry a fair one, but after the decision of the jury, we do not see it necessary to publish it.

The pages of our next number will be devoted to the Proceedings of the Convention, but as there will be many valuable facts and papers of a permanent character, which will form an important part of a Temperance Library, and be of great interest to all moral reformers, the committee have determined upon publishing a separate volume containing a revised account of the sittings of the body, and the various meetings held in connexion with them, and have engaged a competent party to take a verbatim report. Full particulars we shall announce in our next.

TESTIMONIAL TO JAMES TEARE.

ESTEEMED FRIENDS,—The object of this Address is to call your attention to the strong and pressing claims which we consider that long-tried and very laborious Advocate of Temperance, JAMES TEARE, has upon the friends of that cause in which he has so successfully and disinterestedly laboured. Had the same amount of self-denying effort he has expended in the cause of benevolence, been devoted to any enterprise connected merely with the mercantile or scientific interests of his country, and been attended by a measure of success at all equal to what has attended his services in the cause of Temperance, it can hardly be questioned, that he would have been liberally rewarded with both honours and riches:—as it is, he has, hitherto, received but little, in return for those philanthropic exertions by which he has blessed thousands; but the satisfaction which ever attends the consciousness of doing good from sincere and upright motives. The facts of his case are simply these:—

In the beginning of the year 1832, when residing at Preston in Lancashire, he became a member of the OLD BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY; and in May of the same year, having adopted the Teetotal principles, he commenced the advocacy of entire Abstinence from all Intoxicating Liquors. The immediate consequence of this procedure was the reformation of two drunkards, of whom, one afterwards proposed the Total Abstinence Pledge, and was the first who signed it. During the four following years, JAMES TEARE attended nearly all the meetings in Preston, and frequently visited the surrounding Towns and Villages, and almost entirely at his own expense. In 1836, having been the means, under Divine Providence, of greatly extending the Temperance reformation, and finding himself called upon from all parts of the country for assistance, he felt it to be his duty to devote the whole of his time and energies to the establishment of Total Abstinence Societies; and accordingly, after much thought and prayer to God for direction, on the 4th of April, he started from Preston, as the first Teetotal Missionary. During the first twelve months, he visited thirty counties, travelled more than Eight Thousand miles, and held nearly four hundred meetings. At the period now alluded to, there were but few Societies organized on the Total Abstinence principle; and hence its Advocates had to labour under very peculiar difficulties and discouragements; not only on account of the prejudices they had to overcome, but through the want of any regular provision being made to meet their necessary expenses. JAMES TEARE had saved a little by his business, and not only did he give it up, but went forth, so far upon his own charges, as never to make collections, nor to ask for anything towards his expenses; if freely offered, he did not refuse to accept it, but, to a very great extent, he not only had to labour without reward, but with the sacrifice of his own earnings.

As the cause to which he was devoted extended and became more established, he has been more liberally sustained; but to the present time, about £65 per annum, a sum not equal to the wages of a respectable mechanic, is all that, on an average, he has received from the public towards his expenses, to say nothing of remuneration for his extensive services.

Had he not, then, practised the utmost economy, he could not have maintained that character for unimpeachable honesty by which he has been distinguished; and at the same time, have accomplished that amount of good which must be ascribed to his persevering and self-sacrificing labours.

JAMES TEARE has devoted 14 years of his life to the Temperance cause, more than 10 years of which he has been constantly travelling: he has given more than 12 months to the county of York, 32 weeks to the Isle of Man, 12 weeks to Scotland, 14 months to London, and nearly two years to Cornwall. The rest of the time he has spent in establishing and reviving societies throughout England Scotland, and Wales. His labours have embraced a journey of nearly 100,000 miles, and the attendance and addressing of more than 4000 meetings. In all places his efforts have been attended by the most extraordinary and gratifying success.

In the view of so much devotedness to the happiness of his fellow-creatures, and believing that he still purposes to devote his time and the best of his remaining energies to the object which already owes so much to him, the undersigned have deemed it but an act of justice to endeavour to present him with such an amount as will, at least, remunerate him for past services; and, if possible, furnish him with the means of maintaining the conflict against Intemperance with that feeling of independence he has hitherto been so laudably desirous of cherishing.

We are aware of the numerous demands which are constantly being made upon the benevolently disposed; but we make this appeal in the confidence that you will regard it not so much an appeal to your generosity as to your sense of justice.

The following friends, under a sense of the propriety of the above appeal, have constituted themselves a Committee to carry into effect the proposed object of raising a sum of money to be called the TESTIMONIAL TO JAMES TEARE, and trust that individuals and societies, so many hundreds of which have had JAMES TEARE'S services without fee or reward, will not omit to exert themselves to raise such a sum as shall be worthy of the object they have in view.

SEPTEMBER 1ST, 1846.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

This body (having been convened by the National Temperance Society) commenced their sittings in this metropolis, at the City of London Literary Institution, Aldersgate Street. The little theatre in that building was well and respectably filled, and several ladies were present, who appeared to take a warm interest in the proceedings. There were upwards of 300 delegates in attendance from different parts of the world. Soon after ten o'clock, A.M., on the motion of Dr. Beecher, from America, seconded by Edward Smith, Esq., of Sheffield, the chair was taken by Samuel Bowly, Esq., of Gloucester.

At the suggestion of the chairman, the proceedings of the day were prefaced by a silent prayer to the Author of all Good, to invoke His blessing upon the sacred cause which they advocated.

The Chairman having then briefly addressed the meeting, on behalf of the principles of the Convention, read the following letter from Mr. Joseph Sturge:—

"TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

"Having placed in the hands of the committee, who made the arrangements for this Convention, a cheque for £50, to be used towards the expenses, if no slave-holder were a member of it, I am desirous of removing an impression which I believe exists in the minds of some of the friends of the temperance cause, that it was my intention to take the sense of this Convention on the subject.

"Though I unite with those who entertain the opinion that the slave-holder should be placed on the same footing in our social and public intercourse as the pirate and murderer, I wish thus to regulate my conduct towards him. Yet even had slave-holders been appointed delegates, which, I believe, they have not, I should have rather felt it a duty to have absented myself from the Convention than raised a discussion upon the subject on the present occasion.

"Very respectfully,

"JOSEPH STURGE."

"August 3rd."

Mr. JOSEPH STURGE, who was present, came forward to move, "That the following gentlemen be requested to act as vice-presidents—viz., Dr. Beecher, Dr. Cox, Rev. W. Reid, James Haughton, Lawrence Heyworth, and Dr. Mussey; and that the following gentlemen be requested to act as secretaries:—Messrs. Thomas Beggs, Henry Clapp, James Haughton, and Edward Chrimes." He said that he was a teetotaler for a period of twenty years' standing, and the earnest prayer of his heart was, that the blessing of God would rest upon their labours. A few months ago, they were alarmed at the probability of a war with America, but now, those fears were altogether dispelled. They now saw their American brethren crossing the Atlantic, for the purpose of assisting them in their efforts, and mingling with them on the present occasion, to endeavour to check and abolish one of the greatest evils that ever afflicted humanity—the use of intoxicating liquors.

The Rev. JOHN MARSH, Secretary of the American Temperance Union, seconded the resolution. From the time that he first heard of that Convention, he felt desirous of coming to it. The clouds of war, however, hovered over them and their wives and children, and a voice seemed to say, "You cannot go; there is danger. But they did not believe that the dogs of war would be permitted to hinder them, and by the time ships were ready to bring them, the voice of peace was heard, and they came away amidst the congratulations of their friends. They had intended to have sent an address, and to have said, if the teetotalers of both countries put their heads and shoulders to the work, they will put down war; for, as teetotalers, they will not and cannot fight. But God in his Providence had permitted them to come to England, and it delighted his heart to see the faces of men of whom he had heard for years, and who had gloriously aided in the great work.

The Rev. T. SPENCER, A.M., of Hinton Charterhouse, near Bath, moved that the following persons form the committee for conducting the business of the Convention:—John Rutter, Joseph Sturge, John Meredith, John Dunlop, Rev. John Marsh, Joseph Eaton, and the Rev. Dr. Beecher.

The Rev. E. N. KIRK, of Albany, seconded the resolution. He could not but congratulate the Convention on the time at which they had met. The question had been fairly put to the Empire

State of New York, as to License, or No License, and the answer had been returned, No License! So that they came flushed with victory, though they talked of peace. The fact was, they were a little warlike still; but their war was with bottles and beer-barrels. They sympathised deeply with the English in the great work. The English had endured a long dark night of struggle, but light was now bursting upon them, and full success was in their view.

The Secretary stated, that letters had been received from the Rev. T. Mathew, Dr. Pye Smith, Dr. Marsh of Leamington, Dr. Higginbottom, Dr. Fothergill, J. J. Gurney, Esq., E. C. Delavan, Esq., the Rev. J. Caughey, Dr. Lees, and others, apologising for their unavoidable absence.

Mr. THOMAS BEGGS, Secretary of the National Temperance Society, then read a paper prepared by himself, on behalf of the business committee. This document was greatly cheered in its several important points. It contained an exposition of the requirements of the Society, and important hints as to the mode of conducting its future operations. It stated, that 420 home societies and 50 foreign had been corresponded with, as well as nearly 800 individuals.

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., of Liverpool, moved that the report now read be referred to the business committee, and spoke of the great importance of the temperance movement as connected with the commercial prosperity of this country.

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., considered himself an old friend of the Society, having stood by it through obloquy and reproach. He eulogised the Secretary for the great talent displayed in the preparation of the address, he said, that as many papers of this description as he had heard read in his day, he remembered no one of more interest and value than that under notice, and urged that some step should be taken with regard to the accurate collection of statistics. This resolution was carried unanimously.

The Rev. JOHN MARSH, a delegate from America, then brought forward the following resolution:—“That this Convention, in assembling from different and distant parts of the world, for the purpose of promoting the temperance cause, do entertain and express a grateful sense of the goodness of the Ruler of Nations, in the rise, progress, and wonderful triumphs of this great enterprise, and do unitedly implore wisdom from above that all their deliberations may be such, as shall be approved by the wise and good of all countries, and be happily instrumental of giving that cause a still wider extension, and a permanent continuance upon the earth.” He said, that this was a resolution which called for the outpouring of their hearts to that God, who had enabled them to arrest the horrible progress of that vice which was spreading so much misfortune and wretchedness over the whole earth. It was now twenty years since the attention of the community in this and every other country was called to this great evil. Their fathers were suffering under this desolating scourge, but they knew not of any relief. The cry went up to heaven from many a father, wife, and child, inquiring how this plague might be stayed; and yet there was a silent response from every face upon the earth, indicating that nothing could be done. The evil was great, but they must yield to it. Every remedy that was resorted to had signally failed; but at length the God of Heaven had put it into the hearts of a few individuals to try the simple principle of total abstinence. Thank God that their cause was in a blessed state in America.

Many there would have continued drunkards to the present day (if they were permitted to live so long after imbibing such poison) but for the great reformation. Their cause was steadily advancing in the army, the navy, and the churches. It was a delightful spectacle, to see in America about 4000 children enrolled under their teetotal banners, and singing temperance hymns. The president of their oldest university there, at his inauguration dinner, had 600 of the first citizens of Massachusetts present, including Mr. Webster and other eminent individuals. At that dinner, there was not one drop of intoxicating liquor at the table. The students of that noble seminary had all their rejoicings without the wine cup.—(Hear, hear.) This occurred just before he left America. The greatest enemy they had to contend against in America was that licensed traffic which gave such facilities and encouragement to the drunkard. They applied to the legislature to take away this license, and they refused, for fear of losing the votes of the electors. They then asked them to let the people themselves say whether they would have the license or not, and the result was so successful, that in the state of Massachusetts, with the exception of one small county, there was not now one licensed rum-seller. The speaker then proceeded to give a statement of the progress of temperance in the other states, which was highly satisfactory, and justified them in saying, that it was one of the greatest moral triumphs the world had ever witnessed.

Dr. BEECHER, who was introduced to the meeting by the chairman, as the father of the temperance movement in America, next came forward to address the meeting, and proceeded to give an interesting history of his exertions in the cause since the year 1811; but until he adopted the total abstinence principle, all his efforts turned out to be futile and without the slightest success. When they adopted that principle, it went like an electric shock through the states; the judges bowed to it, and the highest authorities in the country supported it; and at the present period, there were upwards of 150,000 persons, who had been drunkards, now enjoying the comforts and happiness of teetotalism and a better system of education.

Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, in supporting the resolution said, that when he was lately in America, he observed, that the farther they went into the slaveholding states, the more vice and drunkenness was to be seen, but in the free states they did not see anything like such drunkenness and misery.

Mr. THOMAS SWINDLEHURST, from Preston, gave an account of his conversion, about 15 years ago, which was owing to a pamphlet put into his hand, which was written by Dr. Beecher of America. He was then at the beer-shop, where he had often drunk two or three gallons of porter without being intoxicated. He was the first in Preston who stood up for the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

Dr. GRINDROD rose to draw the special attention of the Convention to the mode of advocacy, as a question of the highest moment. He wished to see the establishment of societies for the improvement of speakers, having in connexion with them libraries. He thought great dangers arose from the inconsiderate and unwise way of speaking some indulged in. Unless they bore and forebore, they would not bring out the large body of the christian community on their side. He urged the vast importance of endeavouring to secure the influence and co-operation of medical men. Alcohol was a poison, and it should be so admitted. Men were often made drunkards by medical prescription; not intentionally, but such was the case. The stability of the members was closely allied to this subject. He was anxious to train up the youth of the country in these principles; he hoped discussion would arise on this question, for he gloried more in the conversion to temperance of a child than an adult.

Mr. CLAPP, from America, said, that out of 80 regular physicians in Boston, 75 of them had signed a document, stating it to be their belief, that intoxicating liquors were poisons, and ought under no circumstances to be used.

Mr. G. JOHNSTON, president of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society, gave a pleasing account of the progress of the cause in Edinburgh. He attributed much of their success to their regular and systematic meetings and proceedings. During the past year, 3238 persons had joined the Society, 2500 of whom had joined since the 1st of January last. He dwelt on the great importance of diffusing regular information through the medium of periodicals and other publications.

Mr. EDWARD SMITH of Sheffield, had been somewhat startled at the announcement that the American Legislature had been petitioned to put down dram-drinking; he at first thought it was an infringement of liberty, but he considered it was right in this view, that as long as the people had to pay so heavily for poor-rates and other taxes they had a right to say, how far they would allow the cause to be in existence. He believed that the gaols, prisons, poor-houses, lunatic asylums, all harboured men and women chargeable upon the country, and brought there by intemperance. The manufacturing districts were, indeed, in a fearful state—with high wages for skilled labour, the condition of the artisan did not improve with his wages—intemperance was the great curse. He knew a workman who allowed his wife 11s. per week for gin, and spent as much himself. In Sheffield the dram-shops exceed in number all the shops for other provision. He remarked on the great importance of providing some suitable means for occupying the leisure time of the members, and especially of those who had been reclaimed from habits of intemperance. For want of some such recreation or employment, many of them were apt to congregate in places avowedly temperance houses, but where they engaged in practices which were but little removed from those of the public-houses they had left. He also urged the importance of impressing total abstinence principles deeply on the minds of children.

AFTERNOON SITTING.

After the preliminary business had been disposed of, and rules passed for the government of the Convention, the chairman called upon the secretary to read a letter from E. C. Delavan, Esq., enforcing the absolute necessity of a total abstinence from all alcoholic liquors, which entailed the greatest misery and degradation upon the human race. The writer then went into a statistical statement of the amount of money expended in New York upon intoxicating drinks, the extent of crime committed thereby, and the number of unhappy individuals consigned to an early grave, to the workhouse, and to the dungeon by their indulgence in these dangerous draughts. He then paid a high eulogium to Father Mathew, whom he considered to be one of the greatest benefactors that the world ever produced. He proceeded to urge the necessity of greater exertion in the glorious cause, by the appointment of regular officers in London, to work out the principles of teetotalism, to disseminate temperance tracts, and to establish a regular periodical, embodying their views and every fact that came daily under their observation. He concluded by invoking a blessing from the Almighty upon their labours.

Rev. T. SPENCER moved, that the letter of Mr. Delavan be printed and circulated; and after some remarks of Mr. James Haughton of Dublin, Mr. Willis of Luton, the Rev. Jabez Burns, and Mr. Sturge, the resolution was carried.

Mr. L. HEYWORTH reminded the meeting that, before a committee of the House of Commons, it was clearly proved there were about 60,000 human beings annually poisoned by the use of intoxicating beverages; and he urged upon all persons to promulgate these facts, and to enforce the absolute necessity of rejecting alcoholic liquors altogether. He knew from experience, that the teetotaler was able to make use of his physical powers with far greater effect than even the man who indulged in these drinks with great moderation. He had tested it among his own workmen, and he could pledge himself to the truth of this statement.

Mr. J. S. BUCKINGHAM, in supporting the resolution of Mr. Heyworth, combated the prevailing opinion that these intoxicating drinks were neither bad nor good. Mr. Fearon, a London gin-seller, who made his fortune by the traffic in these drinks, acknowledged that he knew well that in proportion to the quantity of these liquors he sold, misery and wretchedness prevailed in society. I can clearly prove that most of the evils which prevail in society around us are produced by the use of these pernicious beverages. He was delighted to hear that a Convention was held at Stockholm, at which the King and Queen attended. When he was in Canada, in the time of the late Lord Sydenham, he recollected having asked him for liberty to deliver a temperance lecture in the Governor's Hall, when he looked at him (Mr. B.) with amazement, saying, "Well, that is decidedly the most extraordinary request I have ever heard." Ultimately, however, things so turned out that a lecture of the kind was actually delivered in the American Senate House, and listened to with the deepest attention. He trusted that the time would come when a similar discourse would be permitted in their own senate here, and that the Queen and Prince Albert would sanction it by their presence.

Mr. PIGOT, chemist, of Stokeferry, was afraid the remarks made by some previous speakers might do harm. He was for no half-and-half measures, but for the whole truth to be spoken out on this great occasion. As a medical man and a chemist, he knew alcohol to be a poison. There was a difference of opinion among medical men as to the use of alcohol. But he would challenge them to prove that alcohol was not a poison. Medical men were not honest. They, in his opinion, stated what was not the truth to keep their practice going.

[The Convention dissented from this opinion, and some excitement followed.]

Dr. GRINDROP said, as a medical man, though not now in medical practice, he could speak with greater confidence on the medical profession. A more honourable, humane, or feeling class of men did not exist than those engaged in the medical profession. He could not, therefore, sympathise with the observation of Mr. Pigot, which, reflected on the integrity and honesty of the medical profession.

The CHAIRMAN observed that the Convention had expressed no opinion as to the character or conduct of medical men.

Dr. OXLEY stated what Sir Astley Cooper had said to him a little before his death, to the effect that medical men had been brought up in mistaken notions as to the real nature of strong drinks, and had but too frequently recommended them as tonics, where they should only have recommended them as stimulants. Medical men, Dr. Oxley continued, needed information on the subject. He believed there was not a more humane body of men, and that they were a great blessing to society.

Rev. E. N. KIRK supported the motion of Mr. Heyworth. He was no new convert to the belief that alcohol was poison. It was a fact, an eternal law that God had written, and they rested upon it without doubt. The chemist said it was poison, and experience and observation confirmed his testimony. The medical man who should say alcohol was not a poison, his moral influence ought to be arrested in society. And if alcohol was wrong to be taken, it was wrong to be manufactured—the traffic must be put where gambling was placed. On the point of legislation, he never wished to see a government legislate upon a Divine command; but upon matters of public utility, such as the observance of the Sabbath, they had a right to legislate. One business of a Convention like this, was to frame a sentiment for the public as a text and motto.

Mr. CHRYMES stated that, from several cases he knew, medical men were not honestly dealing with the temperance movement; they confessed that they could not keep their pledge and their practice too. The great difficulty was the very moderate use of pernicious drinks. The Wesleyan conference of New York had decided upon the question of moderate drinking, and agreed that it was full of immorality.

Mr. JAMES TEARE said, the grand question is—Is the principle of total abstinence right, or is it wrong? If wrong, then why are we here? We have no business here. But if total abstinence be right, then the traffic in these drugs—these poisonous drugs—and the practice of taking them is wrong. Is it right to sell them? There are 100,000 public-houses open for the sale of these poisons. Is that right? There are 600,000 drunkards in these kingdoms, or were a few years ago. Is that right? There are 60,000 of these drunkards dying every year by this sin. Is that right? It is sometimes said there is no command from God for abstinence. But there is no command from God to abstain from cock-fighting, and other evil things, and yet is it not right to abstain from them? No man will question this; so, if there is no command from God to abstain from these liquid poisons, it does not follow that it is not right to do so. I for one shall be grieved if this Convention separates without condemning the entire usages of society with respect to those poisons.

Mr. HENRY SOLLY of Shepton Mallet, recommended an appeal to the medical men; for to convert them they must be convinced. Did they take means to do this?

Some further conversation ensued, after which the resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. W. LLOYD GARRISON, from America, though not a delegate, requested a hearing, and, upon the vote of the Convention, was permitted to speak. He was an old teetotaler, and had been the editor of a temperance magazine. The object of his rising was to remark upon an opinion expressed by Mr. Kirk, as to the charitable feelings that actuated some christian men in retaining their slaves; but as it was contrary to the rules, and calculated to destroy the harmony of the meeting by the display of much strong feeling on the subject, it was decided that the discussion was irrelevant and inadmissible.

WEDNESDAY MORNING SITTING.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.—A large body of the delegates took breakfast together, at the Guild-hall Coffee-house, where a number of very interesting addresses were delivered. Some of these we may furnish hereafter. The delegates then went in procession to the Literary Institution, Aldersgate Street, and resumed their sittings. Samuel Bowly, Esq., in the chair.

The Chairman then called upon Mr. Beggs, the Secretary, to read a paper on the statistics of Temperance. It detailed some most important facts. It entered into a variety of minute statements as to the cost of intoxicating drinks, the mortality occasioned by their use, &c. We can only select a few points. It stated that in the town of Bury, it had been ascertained that an average of £2 3s. 4d. per head was yearly spent in the purchase of alcoholic drinks. It stated that it had been computed that 30,000 persons go to bed drunk every Saturday night in Glasgow alone; and that in the same city every tenth house was a public-house. While the revenue of the United Kingdom is fifty-two millions, sixty millions are annually spent in the purchase of intoxicating liquors. In Dumfries, it was stated, there were only twelve bread-shops to seventy whiskey-shops. It noticed the diminished mortality in gaols, attributing it to the fact, that prisoners were compelled to be total abstainers. It stated, that sickness was more extensive in times of brisk trade than when depressed, arising from the fact that the working classes, with increased means, consumed larger quantities of intoxicating beverages. In conclusion, the document stated that the statistics were not taken from teetotal sources, but had been drawn from official and other documents. This paper was intended, by the business-committee, to open the discussion on the second point for which the Convention was assembled.

The Chairman then proposed a resolution, appointing a committee to prepare the statistical returns made to the Convention for publication. Mr. John Dunlop and Mr. J. W. Green were named, to which he suggested additions should be made.

Mr. J. ANDREWS of Scarborough, seconded the motion. He had been for many years engaged in obtaining the statistics of temperance, which he considered, if generally obtained, would be calculated greatly to advance their cause. From examination, he found that about one-tenth of the teetotalers were reformed characters—men who had once been confirmed drunkards; and that one-fifth of them had joined christian churches. If, therefore, the number of registered teetotalers in England, Scotland and Wales be one million, then there are 100,000 who have been reclaimed from drunkenness, and 20,000 brought into the fold of the christian church. This was to him a peculiarly gratifying fact. The publication of facts relative to the great temperance reform, was more likely, he thought, than any other means to command attention and secure the co-operation of good men in advancing and adopting their principles.—(Cheers.)

The Rev. J. MARSH characterised the statistical report just read as one of the most valuable documents that had ever been produced, inasmuch as the facts therein set forth were proved by the authority of the most able and distinguished individuals unconnected with any teetotal societies. In America, the prisons and poor-houses were visited for the purpose of obtaining statistics, and valuable information was thus obtained. In the American House of Congress, they had recently returned three representatives who, only four years ago, were dragged out of the gutter in a state of the most shocking drunkenness. They now proved themselves to be the most intelligent and upright of that assembly, and exhibited the most unwearied industry in the performance of every christian duty, in gratitude for their emancipation from their recent slavery. Facts were stubborn things, and should be broadly stated.

Mr. T. WHITAKER suggested that in all cases of sudden death, the facts should be published to the world, attesting the deceased's mode of living, so as to discover whether the individuals were in the habit of indulging in strong drinks. Coroners' inquests should be carefully watched.

Mr. BEAL of Wellingborough, said, it was a fact that about three-fourths of the jurors attending inquests were composed of public-house keepers. This accounted, perhaps, for the non-publicity of those facts connected with the deceased's habits in the way of drink, which were so important in furtherance of their sacred cause to have distinctly stated.

Mr. W. MELVIN of Paisley, said, he believed that the subject of statistical accuracy connected with the condition of the people was at present under the consideration of a committee of the House of Commons. He suggested the appointment of a committee from this Convention for the purpose of holding a conference with the heads of the government upon this subject.

Mr. F. HOPWOOD, Secretary of the British Association, said that it was the intention of that association to correspond with their auxiliaries, with a view of collecting the most correct statistics in reference to this subject. He enumerated about eight towns in the manufacturing districts, comprising a population of 1,212,000 persons. There were 14,300 public-houses within the same district, which, on an average, were supported by the number of fifteen families to each. There were 117,000 pledged teetotalers—24,000 reclaimed drunkards; 105 pledged ministers of religion, and only fifteen medical men.

Dr. BEECHER and Mr. RUTTER made a few remarks, after which

The Rev. THOMAS SPENCER of Hinton Charterhouse, wished for statistical information as to the mortality amongst beer-shop-keepers and publicans. At Hinton, within the last twenty years, he had known no less than six landlords buried from one house, all of whom had entered upon the business in good health. He wished also for returns as to how many maltsters, brewers and publicans were guardians of the poor, deacons of churches, &c. He hoped that their statistics would embrace the widest field, and that they would inform them of the number of teetotalers they had among the bishops; in the Houses of Parliament; aye, and even in the royal household.

The Rev. Dr. CAMPBELL, rose, and playfully observed, that in the annals of Jurisprudence it was the first time that a witness had been called upon to make a speech. He came to the meeting as a witness, and presently he should tell them what he thought of them and their proceedings. While he rejoiced at very much of what he had heard, he was also pained with some things which had been spoken. He said, there was a "common" salvation, and what he wanted in reference to the temperance question was a "common" platform. If to-day he could obtain the signature of every minister and every member of a christian church, he would take it on their own terms, either the high or low principle. He urged the members not to fire at each other but at the common foe. For himself, he admired the zeal and honesty of James Teare, and could listen to him from noon till midnight; but he must say that if the principles laid down in his speech were true, then he must go home and excommunicate nine-tenths of his church for immorality. He besought the delegates to weigh well their words, for while these meetings were but for a day, their influence would be perpetuated. For himself, he was but as a boy among them, but he knew well what ministers thought about the teetotalers and about him also. He could do much, but they must not paralyse his efforts by insisting at once upon the adoption of the highest principles. Let such advocacy as that of Dr. Gridrod, and others whom he might name, be adopted, and then success was certain. He approved, in general, of the teetotal literature, but some portions of it required a check.

Mr. TEARE wished to reply to Dr. Campbell's remarks, but the Chairman thought that, as the Doctor alone was responsible for the sentiments he had uttered, the time of the meeting ought not to be occupied in such a discussion.

JOHN DUNLOP, Esq. said, that accurate statistics would prove England to be the most drunken country in the whole world. In confirmation, he read the following statistics of crime committed in London and Paris, from the metropolitan reports published in London, in 1841, and in Paris, 1842:—

If these statistics were false, he invited contradiction, but he believed that they were culled from the most authentic information.

Mr. SINCLAIR's name was added to the committee, and the resolution was passed unanimously.

J. STURGE, Esq., said that it was highly important that they should obtain as many young people as possible to take the teetotal pledge, for it was a well-tested fact, that when the pledge was taken by young persons, they very seldom broke it.

He suggested that one very useful means of labour with regard to the young, would be in finding them recreations of an enlivening and innocent character. He had for instance, at his own expense, got a special train for a great number, who left Birmingham for Gloucester, and were delighted with their trip.

Mr. CHRYMES wished for returns respecting Sunday scholars; it had been asserted that one-half of the scholars in a Sunday-school at Birmingham had turned out drunkards. It was really important to obtain a confirmation or refutation of such a lamentable statement.

Rev. J. W. Miatt of South Shields, Rev. Jabez Burns, Mr. Clapp, and Joseph Sturge, Esq., having briefly addressed the Convention, the chairman declared it adjourned till three o'clock.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

Mr. CLAPP, Jun., furnished a brief history of the Washingtonian Society, which commenced in the year 1840, and converted upwards of 100,000 confirmed drunkards. Out of the ranks of the drunkards had come those who were now doing their utmost to carry this glorious reformation throughout the land. They carried on their good work in Boston by kindness and charity towards the unhappy victim of this vice, by opening his eyes to his own folly and supplying him with those necessaries of life, of which he was deprived in consequence of his indulgence in those poisonous draughts; his family were taken care of, and no rational excuse was left him for resorting to his pernicious habits. There were upwards of 400 men who were but a short time ago drunkards—a burden to their families and themselves—now numbered amongst the members of this society, industrious, intellectual, and religious men, and ornaments to the country that gave them birth. The women of America were doing more in furtherance of the movement, and rendering it more successful than any other class of persons. He thought that an institution formed upon the same principles as that at Boston should be established in this country, and their success would be much greater than it now really was. He was rejoiced to find that the communication between this country and America was now placed upon such a friendly basis, that instead of quarrelling about some boundary line in almost unknown regions, they could unite together in the laudable task of forwarding the temperance movement, and of seeing which country would confer the greatest benefit upon the human race. He should conclude, then, by saying "England and America against all the world." He moved the following resolutions.

"That in the opinion of this Convention as a means of extending the temperance reformation, the following truths should be spread throughout the world, and that temperance men and temperance organization be exhorted to give them the widest possible extension.

"That alcohol, the intoxicating principle, is a subtle poison, at war with the physical, intellectual, social, and religious interests of man.

"That it is generated by the process of fermentation, and is the same, though existing in different degrees, in cider, wines, and malt liquors as in distilled spirits.

"That it is a perpetual fountain of disease, poverty, crime, temporal and spiritual death, never needful or useful to men in health, in any clime or any employment.

"That total abstinence from it as a beverage is the only true principle of the temperance reformation; the only hope for the drunkard and of security for others.

"That the whole manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drink as a beverage, though a source of revenue to government, is a manufacture of human misery, and highly injurious to the souls and bodies of men, and should not be licensed more than other moral evils by human governments.

"That the Word of God often prescribes total abstinence to avoid existing evils, and that the spirit of christian love directs us to shun wine, or anything whereby our brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

"That a voice comes up from every part of the globe, calling upon kings, and all who are in authority, upon reflecting and influential men of all climes, upon parents, teachers of youth, medical men, ministers of religion, and all who love their race, to put forth the hand and stay the plague which is filling our world with woe, and which, unless checked, will continue to sweep thousands of succeeding generations prematurely and wretchedly to eternity."

The secretary then submitted to the attention of the meeting a letter from India, giving a favourable account of the temperance cause in that part of the world. It was written by the delegate of the South Eastern Temperance Union.

Mr. JABEZ INWARDS, in seconding the resolution, argued upon the well-authenticated fact, that alcohol was a poison, and therefore it could not be congenial to the physical economy of man to permit it to come in contact with his vital energies.

HENRY TUSON, Esq., of Ilchester, urged unanimity in their proceedings. The principal point, he thought, for consideration, was as to the best mode of advancing the temperance reformation. He thought they ought to be temperate in the advocacy of their principles. He was of opinion that great good would result from the matter being brought under the consideration of the Government. The press, all powerful as it is, should be enlisted on their side, and he hoped some steps would be taken to obtain help from public journals.

Mr. Jones of Manchester, Rev. Dr. Patton of New York, and Mr. Lomax of Manchester, severally made a few remarks.

The Rev. B. PARSONS, author of Anti-Bacchus, was loudly cheered on presenting himself to the Convention. He simply rose to speak to a point in the resolution. In reply to the objection brought against them, that they put teetotalism in the place of the gospel, he said, teetotalism was to take poison out of the body; the gospel to take sin out of the soul. We should endeavour to persuade men, and seek to conciliate our opponents.

Dr. CAMPBELL having suggested one or two alterations in the resolution, and several delegates also having made a few remarks,

The CHAIRMAN submitted the resolution, which he declared to be carried with only one dissentient.

Mr. JOSEPH SPENCE of York, moved the following resolution:—

"That this Convention have heard with much satisfaction of the progress of our cause in various parts of the world among seamen, and of the readiness of many Insurance Companies, to deduct a portion of the premium on such ships as renounce entirely the spirit-rations; and they would earnestly commend the great subject to the more serious attention of ship-owners, Marine Insurance Companies, and commanders of ships, both for the better security of vast amounts of property, of the lives of passengers, and the preservation of seamen in every clime from brutal degradation." As a chemist, he declared that half a bottle of spirits, was quite enough to be taken out for each seaman as medicine.

Mr. J. THORPE of Halifax, in seconding the resolution, said, that in Halifax, 2600 individuals were members of their Society, 100 of whom had been reclaimed from drunkenness. About one-tenth of the population of Halifax were teetotalers; his desire was to enlist as many, and offend as few, as possible.

Dr. MARSH said, that 60,000 American seamen were pledged teetotalers. A commodore on board an American vessel had emptied the spirit-store, and afterwards filled it with water.

Mr. ANDREWS hoped that the matter might be brought under the notice of ship owners. To obtain sober seamen and reduced rates of insurance were matters worthy of their attention.

Mr. G. C. SMITH, adverted to the efforts made to promote temperance among sailors.

Mr. R. G. MASON said, vessels sailing on temperance principles were insured at lower rates of premium.

Mr. Thomas Whiteley, Dr. Oxley, and the Rev. B. Parsons, addressed a few remarks upon the resolution.

Mr. JOHN GIBBS of Emmiscorthy, thought that the use of intoxicating liquors were not necessary as medicines. He had seen 3000 cases successfully tried without it, and he himself was an instance of the same.

Mr. BOTTERELL and two or three other delegates having briefly addressed the Convention,

The CHAIRMAN submitted the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN declared the sittings adjourned till Thursday.

THURSDAY MORNING.

The chair was taken by SAMUEL BOWLY, Esq.

The proceedings of the day were commenced by the reading of several papers from Montreal, and other parts of Canada, containing very valuable information respecting the progress of temperance and morality in America.

Mr. RUTTER read an interesting document from the "Young Men's Metropolitan Drapers' Total Abstinence Association," detailing the circumstances attending the formation of this society, and the progress made in the temperance movement within this great city.

Dr. LOVELL addressed the meeting, in reference to this important body, congratulating the advocates of the cause upon the prospects thus held forth towards the reformation of this metropolis.

Rev. Dr. COX, delegate from Brooklyn, New York, moved the following resolution:—"That this Convention have entire confidence in the practicability of the reformation of the most degraded drunkards, and would earnestly recommend in view of all that has been accomplished, both in Great Britain and America, and other parts of the world, that no pains be spared to raise all this debased class from their deep degradation, and bring them back to be a blessing to their families and the world." He expressed his deep regret that the clergy of England, generally, were so far behind the age as not to head this movement, rather than holding, as it were, by the traces, and thereby retarding its advance. What possible objection could be advanced against a glass of water, when they very well knew that their common parents, Adam and Eve, had nothing but the pure stream to drink of when celebrating their nuptials in the glorious land of Paradise? He repudiated the general belief (in which he confessed he at one time shared) that there was no hope for the drunkard. Experience had told him that there was not only great hope for him, but that if they met him in the spirit of perfect charity, instead of repulsive condemnation of his past life, he was capable of being reclaimed, and made one of the best and most zealous advocates of the cause. He believed it was only by connecting religion on catholic principles, founded upon the fundamental doctrines of all christians of all nations, that they could obtain perfect success in their movement. He adverted, in terms of high praise, to the indefatigable and successful labour of Dr. Beecher, by whose six sermons he (Dr. Cox) had been greatly assisted in his advocacy of the principle.

Mr. WILLIAM LOGAN of Rochdale, seconded the resolution. It was a distressing fact that the great majority of drunkards in his district were "unfortunate females." Concurring with the preceding speaker, he adduced examples of inveterate drunkards being thoroughly reclaimed. He had met with the strongest examples, that the Bible was in almost all instances found in the hands of those who threw aside the cup of alcohol and renounced the demon of intemperance and his works. If the moderationists would embrace total abstinence, drunkenness in twenty years would be totally extinguished, either by conversions or deaths. He referred to the fact, that persons accustomed to strong drinks may, with perfect safety, discontinue them entirely, either at once or gradually after a short time. Propositions to that effect were signed by sixty-six of the most eminent medical men of the day, including Sir B. Brodie, Bart., Sir J. Clark, W. F. Chambers, Esq., Sir James M'Gregor, &c. At the same time, it must be borne in mind, that the reformation of the drunkard was only one object of the temperance movement. They were glad to reclaim the drunkard, but they were more anxious to prevent drunkenness. The resolution was then carried unanimously.

Mr. WHELOCK from New York, then submitted the following resolution:—"That the hope of the temperance reformation is in the rising generation, and that this Convention do earnestly recommend the formation in every county, of juvenile temperance associations, in Sunday-schools and day-schools, and the wide circulation of juvenile papers and tracts to interest the youthful mind, and secure the millions which are coming after us from the arts of the destroyer."

Mr. WILLIAM BOLTON of Manchester, having seconded the resolution,

Mr. H. C. WRIGHT from America, was next called upon by the Chairman to address the meeting in support of the resolution. He thought that, together with the family Bible, every father should have the total abstinence pledge attached to it, as if it formed a portion of it. He should be glad to see even the infant made a pledged teetotaler; for it was most important that the good seed should be sown at the earliest period, when it would have time to germinate and to bring forth good fruit. If children were permitted to see the drunkard's cup before them, they would assuredly grow up with a drunkard's appetite. He hoped that they would exert themselves in changing the present system of holiday-keeping. Instead of being made occasions of abominable conduct, the holidays should be dedicated to those rational enjoyments which total abstinence would assuredly suggest. He wished Dr. Campbell would get up a temperance celebration.

Mr. JOHN BRUMBY of Bath, supported this resolution. He said that they had established a juvenile association in Bath, which now numbered about 25,000 young persons, all pledged teetotalers.

Mr. LLOYD, from Wales, said that the Welch Calvinistic body had passed resolutions on this subject which did them much honour. They formed there juvenile associations and schools, and they passed one resolution, recommending that no person should be received as a master in those schools, and another, that no man should be considered as a proper member of a christian church, who had not become a teetotaler.

Mr. LOMAX, travelling agent to the Manchester Temperance Society, argued in favour of the principle of having none but teetotal teachers placed over these juvenile schools. He also denounced the system of having music saloons, as they were highly dangerous to the morals of youth.

Mr. Joynson of Runcorn, Mr. Bottrell of Huntingdonshire, Mr. Jones of Manchester, Mr. Hudson, and others addressed the meeting upon the subject of Sabbath-school teachers.

The resolution was then passed unanimously.

The Rev. E. N. KIRK, moved the following resolution:—"That the exportation of intoxicating liquors from Christian to Pagan countries, especially in ships which carry out christian missionaries, spreading, as it unavoidably must, drunkenness among the poor Pagans, to the serious hindrance of gospel influences, is to be deeply deprecated by every friend of humanity and religion, and calls at once for universal condemnation." He said that while beer and wine were sent out in our missionary ships to the castes of India, the mission produced as much evil as good. He was not extreme in identifying christianity with total abstinence. The latter was a negative, the former a positive medium of reformation; but of one thing he was well assured, that christianity did not approve or sanction the existence of gin-palaces, and the degrading train of vices, miseries, offences, and crimes they engendered. They struck at the root of christianity. He appealed to the inhabitants of London, and asked if christianity approved of the existence of these gin-palaces and other houses for the sale of fermented liquor (cries of "no, no.") He also answered the query from his heart in the negative. Why, then, in a country like this, the institutions of which no Englishman respected more than he did, were so many houses permitted to raise their heads to the serious injury of the real principles of christianity? The rev. gentleman in the course of a very eloquent address, read part of a letter from Archdeacon Jeffreys, in Bombay, stating some curious facts respecting the habits of the Hindoos and the Pagans in reference to strong drinks, and declaring the decided conviction of the Rev. Archdeacon, that unless the missionaries were decided teetotalers, and urged total abstinence on every one of their converts, that the introduction of christianity would prove a curse and not a blessing. Mr. Kirk's statements and arguments produced a deep impression.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES of York, seconded the resolution.

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., said that the Hindoo could not taste wine, except at the risk of losing caste. It was, therefore, highly important that the missionaries sent out to foreign countries should be teetotalers, so that they might not teach those poor people to indulge in intoxicating drinks, while they were endeavouring to make them christians. The speaker then proceeded to relate several interesting anecdotes connected with the subject, which came under his own observation in his travels to the east.

The resolution was then passed.

Mr. RUTTER of Shaftesbury, read an address from the Annual Conference of Bible Christians, sitting at Devonport, sympathising with the objects of this Convention, and desiring to co-operate with them. It was signed by every member of the body but three.

The Rev. Dr. CAMPBELL suggested that a discreet address should be circulated from this Convention to christian ministers of all persuasions, and also one to Sunday-school teachers, in reference to the subject of teetotalism. He would have the address to ministers embody some of the facts respecting missions, and the damage done to them by the introduction of strong drinks, which might be found in Ellis's Polynesia, and other works. Dr. CAMPBELL remarked, that, as they had unanimously passed a resolution expressive of their belief that there was a hope of the conversion of the vilest drunkard, why should they not indulge hope as to the conversion to their principles of wise and good men. For his part, he despaired of no man. His own conversion was owing, in some considerable degree, to the arguments of Mr. Sherman and others; and it would be but graceful, complimentary, courteous,—and he might add, it would be highly useful,—to issue a distinct address to christian ministers. Such a document, discreetly drawn up, could scarcely fail to effect good.

AFTERNOON SITTING.

J. DUNLOP, Esq., read a paper in reference to medical testimonies. The paper displayed great research, and adduced a number of interesting facts in reference to the use of strong drinks. He maintained that the opinion of many medical men as to the nutritious properties of strong drinks were opposed to facts. In the training of pugilists and racers for example, "the body was kept under"—strong drinks were prohibited, and beef-steaks, bread, and water were the only diet. He then read the following testimony, to which were appended signatures of some of the most eminent physicians and surgeons in the kingdom, as follows:—"We, the undersigned, are of opinion—

1. That a very large portion of human misery including poverty, disease and crime, is induced by the use of alcoholic or fermented liquors, as beverages.—
2. That the most perfect health is compatible with total abstinence from all such intoxicating beverages, whether in the form of ardent spirits, or as wine, beer, ale, cider, &c.—
3. That persons accustomed to such drinks, may, with perfect safety, discontinue them entirely, either at once, or gradually after a short time.—
4. That total and universal abstinence from alcoholic liquors and intoxicating beverages of all sorts, would greatly contribute to the health, the prosperity, the morality, and the happiness of the human race."

Dr. R. B. GRINDROD then moved the following resolutions:—"1. That the thanks of the Convention be given to John Dunlop, Esq., for the very laborious exertions which for several years past he has made in collecting signatures to medical certificates against the use of alcoholic drinks.

"2. That the means be taken to publish in the most extensive manner, through the press, the latest of the above certificates.

"3. That this Convention, aware of the very frequent medical prescription of alcoholic drinks, cannot but think it matter for further and serious consideration whether such drinks cannot entirely be dispensed with, and appropriate substitutes be found, in accordance with a considerable amount of evidence on the subject. On moral as well as physical grounds this inquiry is of the utmost importance. Numerous proofs have been laid before this Convention that drunkenness results from the continued use of intoxicating drinks after they have been prescribed medicinally.

"4. That Messrs. Beaumont, Higginbottom and Forthergill, be a committee to get and collect evidence, and to prepare an address on this subject to medical practitioners, under the sanction of this Convention."

H. MUDGE, Esq., surgeon, of Bodmin, seconded the resolution, defending the medical profession of which he was a member, from the charges of ignorance and recklessness brought against them, on the ground of traditional regulations and early tuition; and on the score of the great difficulty of subduing the prejudices of patients, and breaking through the reverence paid to ancient customs. He concluded with a variety of amusing details of the absurdity of ancient practice in the administration of alcohol by nurses and medical old women. He had, with certificated advantage to the inmates, got rid of all alcoholic supplies in a union workhouse to which he was the medical attendant. The medical fraternity were conscientious men; they only wanted clear evidence and support, and they would in the end co-operate with the temperance advocates. Intoxicating drinks had already wonderfully diminished in medical practice. Instead of attacking medical men for not coming forward in support of this movement, he called upon the Convention to build an hospital in London, to be attended only by teetotal doctors, upon the principle that no alcoholic liquor was to enter the house, and in a very short time they would do more to settle this question, by a comparison of the effects produced with the system now generally pursued in the hospitals, than all their efforts in another direction could possibly attain. The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Rev. Dr. PATTON of New York, moved the next resolution in the following form:—"Resolved that the late signal triumphs on the license question in the state of New York, America, wherein by a trial at the ballot-box an overwhelming vote of the electors of this state have decided that no license for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be granted in five-sixths of the towns, of that state, calls for our grateful acknowledgments, and affords an assurance that civil society is in a state of progression towards an entire relief from the great burden of taxation, pauperism, and crime now imposed by intemperance upon society." The city of New York was disfranchised on this occasion, and therefore licenses were allowed them as usual. The origin of the movement was with Dr. Rush, a medical man, who was followed by Dr. Ebenezer Roster, Dr. Humphrey, Dr. Beecher, and others. He ridiculed the idea of regulating moderate drinking. It had been tried in New York. They knew nothing now but total abstinence. A man that had a great principle was called a great man, and he was one, provided that he held on to it. They had had a strong battle on the traffic-question, and because principle was their weapon the victory was gained.

Mr. HOPWOOD moved an amendment to the effect, that the people of England should imitate the example of Americans, and that the Legislature should be petitioned to inquire into the present license-system, to put down Sunday-traffic. There were men in the House of Commons who would, but dare not, because of the immense influence of brewers and distillers over elections. Their only hope was the House of Lords.

The amendment was seconded by Mr. WHITE of Glasgow; but subsequently withdrawn.

The Chairman then put the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

After some observations from Mr. CLAPP, the Chairman called on Mr. Baker to read a paper on the Temperance Provident Institution, and its connexion with the cause of temperance.

VITAL STATISTICS.—The paper gives a brief account of the progress of the Institution since its commencement in December, 1840; showing the considerations which led to its formation, its triumph over all difficulties, and its steady progress to a position of undoubted security and respectability. The number of members is now 2127, of whom 1843 are assured for sums of money payable at death. In the life assurance department, the yearly issue of policies has been as follows:—

In 1841 the Assurances granted were	182
1842 " " "	248
1843 " " "	298
1844 " " "	405
1845 " " "	467
1846 to the end of July	243

But the fewness of the deaths amongst the members, is the most interesting and extraordinary circumstance.

Out of nearly sixteen hundred assurances, only twelve claims arose in five years! A statement is given of the comparative number in this and other offices, from which it appears, that the deaths in the teetotal office have been scarcely one-half of the smallest number in any other office! This is a most remarkable fact; but it must be borne in mind, that no members are admitted but those who appear, on careful examination and inquiry, to be of sound health and constitution. The statement referred to is as follows:—

Members and deaths in the first five years of some of the most successful offices.

A issued	944 policies,	and had	14 deaths
B " "	1901 " "	" "	27 " "
C " "	838 " "	" "	11 " "
D " "	2470 " "	" "	26 " "
T. P. I.	1596 " "	" "	12 " "

Since the 5th July, 1845, a period of more than 13 months, there have been but two deaths amongst the whole number assured; a fact which, it can hardly be questioned, is unparalleled amongst the same number of persons in any class of society, and which reduces the deaths to the present date to an annual average of only 3½ per thousand!

The importance of this Institution is still further enhanced by the circumstance, of its being the means of furnishing the most unquestionable statistical evidence, not only of the entire safety of total abstinence from alcoholic drinks, to persons of all ages, and of various constitutions and conditions; but of its absolute tendency, by promoting health, to prolong the duration of human existence. As time rolls on, the directors anticipate being able to furnish the world with such facts, from their official records, as shall unanswerably demonstrate that teetotalism is as essentially connected with the physical, as it is with the intellectual and moral welfare of mankind, and thus to leave every man, who shall be made acquainted with those facts, inexcusable for persisting in the use of any quantity or kind of intoxicating liquor.

Rev. JABEZ BURNS moved a resolution grounded upon the above paper, and urging the influence of the above demonstration in diffusing temperance societies. That question (the prolongation of life) interested many persons more than the question of morality, or health, or pecuniary profit, or religion.

The resolution being seconded by Mr. HIMES, an American delegate, was carried unanimously.

The Chairman then stated that business of importance required him to withdraw from the further attendance of the Convention. He thanked them sincerely for the kindness which had been shown him, and trusted that the blessing of the Almighty would rest upon them during their sittings.

A resolution of thanks to S. Bowly, Esq., was carried with acclamations, and the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY MORNING.

The Chair was occupied by W. CASH, Esq.

Mr. J. DUNLOP read a paper on the drinking-usages of Great Britain. It stated that a conventional connexion had been injuriously and compulsorily established between business and drinking; drink-fines were organized in infinite forms; and a heavy tax, accompanied with moral and physical injury to the individual, was laid on journeymen, workmen, apprentices, small functionaries, commercial travellers, and young tradesmen starting in business; marriages, births, and even funerals were subjected to their brutalizing tax. The system constituted the most slavish habits, the most deadly persecution, and the most arbitrary despotism on the face of the earth. He had a list of 300 of the above usages; but he would merely record the effect of seven in one small town of 3000 inhabitants (Grennock), where the annual aggregate of this degrading tax inflicted a cost of £26,800! He said that the subject had for eighteen years occupied his attention as one of vast importance. Much of it was comparatively unknown to the public; and he lamented that he had been left to stand nearly alone in his advocacy upon it.

The Rev. J. BURNS moved, "That direct systematic and peculiar means be used by the friends of temperance to draw public attention to the artificial and compulsory drinking-usages of society, and to obtain their entire abrogation throughout the world."

J. S. KENRICK, Esq., of West Bromwich, supported the resolution, expressing his belief that the usages in question were by far the greatest hindrances in the way of the temperance reformation. He had proposed to some masters, to make the men a compensation and abolish the usages, but the men objected to that course, on the ground that they would derive little benefit from it. Besides many of the under employers, kept public-houses, and the men who refused to take liquor were often thrown out of employ. The usages had often led to pledge-breaking.

Mr. WHITE of Glasgow, mentioned some instances in which a successful stand had been made against many of the usages. The resolution was then passed unanimously.

The Rev. J. MARSH next introduced the subject of a World's Temperance Union. As by Divine Providence a plan had been discovered for remedying the plague, which had afflicted the world for 4000 years, it was of importance that that remedy should be extensively and permanently established. The principle had been agreed upon, and societies had been established; but the want of a common centre was felt, and that centre ought to be London. Then a publication was needed, which should contain not merely reports of meetings, but principles and facts which might be put into the hands of the Peels and Russells, and other great statesmen with effect; and which might be sent to all parts of the world to men of all ranks. Men that could write like Macaulay or Jerrold should be employed and duly remunerated. For those purposes ample funds would be required; but as the cause had been, and would be still more, the means of saving much money, the funds would be surely forthcoming. Mr. Marsh concluded by reading the following plan:—

"Whereas it is considered as desirable by the friends of temperance in various parts of the world, that there be a more perfect concentration of their energies, some greater bond of union, which shall result in a wider dissemination of their principles; and therefore,

"Resolved, That there be organised by this Convention a general association under the following constitution:—

"Article 1. The name of the association shall be the World's Temperance Union.

"Art. 2. The seat of the union shall be the city of London.

"Art. 3. The basis of the union shall be, total abstinence from the manufacture, sale and use of all intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

"Art. 4. The officers of this Convention shall be a president, vice-presidents, an executive committee of thirteen, recording secretary, corresponding secretary, and treasurer. The committee, secretary, and treasurer to reside in London. The president, vice-presidents, executive committee, recording secretary, and treasurer to be appointed by this Convention. The corresponding secretary shall be appointed by the committee at their leisure.

"Art. 5. The executive committee, with the treasurer, shall constitute a finance committee, to carry out the objects of the union, and shall annually report to the public all receipts and expenditure.

"Art. 6. It shall be the duty of the recording secretary, to keep a record of all the proceedings of the union; and of the corresponding secretary, whenever funds are secured for his support, to maintain a correspondence, as far as possible, with temperance organisations and friends of temperance throughout the globe; to publish, under the direction of the committee, a monthly periodical of a high order, and annual report of the state and progress of the cause among all nations.

"Art. 7. All temperance associations throughout the world, which adopt the total abstinence principle, and send in their adhesion, with consent to correspond, shall be considered auxiliaries of the union and entitled to copies of its reports.

"Art. 8. "This union shall hold a triennial meeting, at such place and time as shall be considered best by the executive committee, the meeting to be composed of delegates from the auxiliaries, not exceeding ten from each auxiliary; when the officers may be re-elected, and the constitution altered by a vote of two-thirds present."

Dr. PATTON of America, moved "That it was expedient to establish the World's Temperance Union."

Rev. W. REID of Edinburgh, thought that nothing was to be gained by the establishment of such a union, which they could not now obtain from the existing societies if vigorously wrought. It was of far more importance to concentrate than to diffuse. A good metropolitan association might do all that was desired.

Rev. J. Mathews, Aldborough; Mr. Gallepine, from Alleghay; Mr. Rutter, of Shaftesbury; Mr. Perfect, from Lancashire, and some other delegates supported the resolution.

T. BEAUMONT, Esq., of Bradford, in a very eloquent speech, supported the resolution. Most of the mischiefs done to the cause of temperance had proceeded from severance, and from want of consolidation. They would have been assailed from without in vain, had greater harmony prevailed within. Let there be such a union as was now proposed, and there would be a regular transmission of the pure heart's blood of the temperance cause through every part of this kingdom, and of the world.

A number of gentlemen spoke on the subject. Messrs. Jones of Manchester, Solly of Shepton Mallet, Clapp from America, Ashton of Oldham, Seddon of Manchester, &c.

Dr. OXLEY, wished for union, and in London. It was especially desirable in connexion with great movements, such as addresses to government, to crowned heads, &c.

Dr. PATTON said, that though "one" might "chase a thousand," "two" might "put ten thousand to flight." A world's union would increase the strength of the society at least tenfold.

Mr. J. ANDREW denied that the proposed union was likely to retard or hinder individual or local exertion. The establishment of a good and influential periodical was an object of great importance, very likely to be accomplished by such a union.

Mr. BEGGS said that he had, hitherto, confined himself strictly to matters relating to his official duties. But he felt it to be a duty he owed to the temperance cause to move an amendment. He thought he understood something of the wants of the population—and something of the means at our disposal to meet those wants; and it was his duty to state his honest conviction, that the country was not in a condition to undertake the management of such a gigantic machinery as that proposed; he suggested the following as the only thing within the capabilities of the societies in England, to meet the exigencies of the case:— "That, in the opinion of this Convention, it would be premature to form a World's Union at present; but that it be recommended to the States' Societies in America, the British Association in England, the Scot-fish Temperance League, the National Temperance Society, and other associations, to appoint corresponding officers, with a central committee in London, to collect information, interchange it, and take efficient steps to diffuse it over the world; and that they also be recommended to take steps to call another Convention in two years from that time, when the state of public opinion, and the position of temperance societies, may render the formation of a World's Union more practicable."

Rev. Mr. Jones, Mr. Dyer, Mr. Mudge, Mr. Melvin, Mr. Grimshaw, and others, spoke to the resolution and to the amendment.

Dr. CAMPBELL said that the present was the day of scheming and speculation, and of endeavouring to accomplish great objects by very quick means. An outlay of at least £1000, or £1200 would be required to carry out the proposed union for one year, and how would they obtain it. He cautioned them against plunging themselves into difficulties, as two or three large associations, begun under flattering auspices, had recently done.

The CHAIRMAN believed that if the proposition were adopted, funds would be obtained. He thought a hundred persons might be found willing to put down £100 each. He was willing to be one of the hundred.

J. AINSWORTH, Esq., of Oldham, said, that he would be another. If he had but £300 a-year, he would willingly give £100 to that noble and god-like cause.

Several other delegates took part in the discussion, most of them expressing their belief that the proposed union was rather a question of time than of principle. The meeting adjourned without coming to a decision.

AFTERNOON SITTING.

The discussion on "the World's Union" was resumed. Messrs. Chrimes, D. G. Paine, J. Guest, G. Bury, J. Dunlop, Pigott, White, Anstie, R. Charleton, J. Burns, P. Edwards and others, took part in the discussion.

Rev. Mr. POMEROY (U. S.) said, that if they were ready for an "Union," the Americans would respond. Did their meeting represent the movement of Ireland—(yes, yes.)—or the movement on the Continent? He doubted if the times and the Convention were ripe. He regretted it, for the future "great brotherhood of man" was an idea which he loved and adored.

Mr. J. S. BUCKINGHAM urged that if the arguments used had any weight against the "World's Union," they availed against the formation of any society at all. If similar over-cautious views of early difficulties had prevailed, the anti-slavery movement, the catholic, the reform, and the league movements would have failed, he doubted not that money would be supplied, if society were impressed with the importance and popularity of the cause. If ripe, as they demonstrated they were, for the World's Convention, why were they not ripe for the World's Union?

G. W. ALEXANDER, Esq., expressed his opinion that the projected union was inexpedient and injurious. That was the opinion, also, of liberal and judicious friends who were not present. It must produce division among them, as the forthcoming voting would practically prove. Judging practically also, as treasurer of the Convention, and the trivial supply of pecuniary means, he felt assured that the project would financially fail. First shut up those avenues of temptation, the gin-shops, the public-houses—the sources of misery and crime. That was their first duty; while that remained unaccomplished, they were not ripe for more ambitious measures.

Mr. Joyason, of Runcorn, J. Meredith, Rev. W. H. Turner, F. Hopwood, J. Cassell, J. Lomax, W. Collins, W. Logan, Mr. Clapp, and others, spoke to the resolutions, and to the amendment. Opinions seemed to be so conflicting, and unanimity so desirable, that the Chairman at length suggested that the resolution and amendment should be withdrawn. The time spent in discussion would not, he conceived, be altogether lost, and a plan might at some future time be proposed more acceptable and practicable.

Mr. COLLINS argued in favour of a unanimous vote. A vote either on the original motion or the amendment would prejudicially exhibit division.

After Mr. Rendall, Mr. Logan, and other members had addressed the meeting to the same effect,

Dr. MARSH withdrew the resolution.

Mr. BEGGS, therefore, withdrew the amendment, and the whole discussion ended by a unanimous vote concurring with the withdrawal of the original resolution.

When the business had so far terminated, Mr. Haughton read a short address from the Irish Temperance Union on the state of the temperance cause in Ireland.

The meeting then adjourned till Saturday morning.

SATURDAY MORNING.

W. CASH, Esq., again occupied the chair.

Dr. MUSSEY said that when notice of a World's Convention, for the purpose of forming a World's Union, arrived in America, he determined, God willing, to be present. He rejoiced to find that the flame of temperance beamed so brightly in the land of his fathers. Having been engaged in promoting the healing art for thirty years, he had discouraged altogether the use of alcoholic drinks, and his success had been greater than ever it had been while he allowed the use of them. He thanked the brethren present for the kindness which had been shown him and his brethren from America, and hoped the time would soon arrive for a World's Temperance Union to take place. He felt bound to devote a portion of his pen and of his earnings to the promotion of the great work.

Mr. PRIESTMAN of Newcastle, suggested the importance of devising means, whereby their female friends could urge forward the glorious cause. The influence of mothers, especially, was great, and should be enlisted on the side of temperance.

Mr. R. ALLEN of Dublin, gave a brief account of the progress of the temperance reformation in Ireland. There were upwards of four millions of pledged teetotalers. Still great exertion was necessary. The members were, for the most part, of the humbler classes; very few, indeed, of the gentry, were with them, and but a very small portion even of the Catholic clergy. He urged the great importance of diffusing information through the medium of the press. He felt assured that if short pithy paragraphs were sent to the public papers, containing indisputable facts, they would meet with ready insertion. He had long tried that experiment in Ireland with great success.

Mr. ANDREW, from Pennsylvania, moved "That the papers which have been sent in to the Business Committee, but which it has been found impossible to overtake by the Convention, be referred to a committee to inspect, arrange, and select therefrom what may be fitted for publication, and to consist of the following gentlemen: John Dunlop, W. R. Baker, Charles Gilpin, Jabez Burns, G. W. Atwood, and Thomas Beggs." He rejoiced to find that the principle of Union was in the hearts of all present, and hoped that it would, ere long, be accomplished.

Rev. Mr. TABRAHAM seconded the resolution. As he was the only itinerant Wesleyan minister present, he thought it his duty to state that several of his brethren were pledged teetotalers. He regretted that they were not all so, but trusted that the proceedings of that Convention would operate so as to induce all the members of the Wesleyan body to become teetotalers.

TO SUBSCRIBERS, &c.

We had prepared Reports of the Soirée and other influential meetings, held in the metropolis during the sittings of the Convention, but the length of the other Reports preclude their insertion. As the committee have determined upon publishing a full and accurate report of all the proceedings, with the valuable documents submitted to the Convention, after they have been carefully revised by their respective authors, we have only given a brief account of the Convention's sittings; embodying, however, all the practical matters we could put in our limited space, and a mere skeleton account of the great Covent-garden demonstration.

This number contains a list of all the subscriptions hitherto received and promised. We have nearly realized the £1000 proposed, and a financial report will be ready in a few days. The committee are left with a number of valuable and important documents, which deserve from the talent displayed by the writers, to be put in a permanent form. It is to be feared, however, that when all expenses are paid, there will not remain a sufficient sum to give that extensive publicity to them which is desirable. In a few weeks they will be issued in a cheap, popular, but permanent form, along with the proceedings of the Convention. The price will not exceed 2s. 6d. but is expected to be less. We hope that an effort will be made throughout the country to enable us to give them an extensive circulation. In order to do this, it will be necessary, that societies and individuals should at once inform us what number they can take, in order that the committee may be encouraged to issue a large edition.

This number also contains, a list of the delegates, made as perfect as circumstances will permit. We are afraid that some inaccuracies remain; we shall therefore be obliged by any intimations or corrections, in order that the permanent report may be correct.

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION.

The World's Temperance Convention is now a matter of history, and amongst the many opinions offered, as to its spirit and results, we shall be permitted, perhaps expected, to offer ours. By a reference to an article in the last Chronicle, it will be seen that our expectations were not large; and it is probably owing to this circumstance that they have not been disappointed. We offered suggestions with all diffidence, as to what ought to form matters of deliberation in such an assembly. Other subjects mainly engrossed its attention, but we believe the results have been decidedly good, and that we shall have to look to the future for the fruits; not that it is barren of present results, but that these form a very small part of the benefits which it will confer on the cause.

It will be objected, that no practical measures have followed. Have those who expected largely, reflected upon the character of such a gathering, or attempted to anatomise the elements of which it is composed? To call together men of every shade of opinion on all other subjects, but the principle which convened them; and differing very widely on the means of carrying it out, nay, not even agreed on the principle itself; to bring together from 300 to 400 men, full of zeal and love to their common cause, but the majority of them taking their seats for the first time in a Convention; good and excellent men, but unused to public business, and many of them full of projects which they deemed as of first importance, and impatient of every speech and resolution which kept them from the opportunity of enunciating their favourite schemes, to expect such a body called together for a few days, with a mass of business to begin with that would occupy a parliamentary session, to expect such a body to form a calm, sedate, and deliberative assembly, would appear at first sight chimerical and unreasonable. We looked forward to it with apprehension, arising from a knowledge of previous Conventions, but are happy to say, that it will challenge a comparison with the most, if not all the similar assemblies we have been acquainted with. There was some difference of opinion, but wherever there is a healthy sentiment that must be the case; there was some excitement, the effervescence of our Saxon blood, but tempered with much good humour and kindly feeling, and its warmest discussions were characterised by a generous love of the cause they came to promote, rather than a desire of conquest for the views of any particular individual or class. Those who expected great and showy results will look back upon its proceedings with dissatisfaction; but those who know the difficulties in the progress of great movements, which strike at the prejudices, appetites, and interests of a whole people, will look in the quiet expression of its opinions, the practical character of its suggestions, and the earnestness and moderation of its tone, for the best assurance that the hopes it creates are not to perish, when brought out from the atmosphere in which they were first generated.

Those who will sit down to look carefully over the proceedings, will find that independent of the circumstance of bringing so many men united in one cause, but strangers in person into communion, even for so brief a season, in itself a most important end, that there were set forth many sound and practical views as to future operations. To many of these we shall call attention in a subsequent number; we have now to do with the Convention and its immediate results. One thing was clear, that the minds of those present were sobered by a long connexion with the working of societies, and they came impressed with the conviction, that a work of great labour was before us, and that such a reform as was contemplated could not be accomplished except by hard and incessant application. One good will follow, it may be a negative one, but it is one of the most valuable lessons conferred by that Convention, that we must not hope to do great things by large organizations, but must trust to individual effort. It was well said, that this "age was an age of scheming." Men are trying to find out short paths to desired ends. Industry is the only way appointed by providence for humanity to secure its attainments. This is true not only in the physical but in the moral world, and large confederations are becoming more difficult to construct or keep in motion, as men become intelligent and thoughtful. We therefore rejoice that the Convention decided against the attempt at a World's Union at present. A single glance at the state of our temperance societies in this country, and the differences of opinion prevailing, shew that we need consolidation at home, before we place ourselves in the ambitious attitude of heading a world's movement. We may be dazzled by looking at America, but if we continue to look steadily, we shall see that it is much more difficult to change the habits of a nation grown old in its trespasses and sins, than those which are the inheritance of yesterday. The feeling growing up amongst the religions as well as all other classes of men, is that of individual responsibility, the necessity of personal effort and exertion. This feeling must be cultivated, until every man becomes a labourer. As it grows, organizations will not only become more difficult, but their functions will be superseded. And are there not abundant instances of individual men becoming the instruments of achievements that no body of men in their most daring hours would dream of attempting. Look at one out of many that might be named. What association has accomplished one tithe of the good effected by the humble Catholic priest, Father Mathew. The temperance movement must depend on individual labour as its most efficient helper. So long as men look to powerful organizations to do that which simpler means are more fitted to accomplish, we shall see disappointments and failures. The last acquisitions unhappily of science and experience are the lessons—when to let things take their natural course, and to adapt the agencies employed to the spirit and genius of the times. This requires a knowledge of society, and an acquaintance with general principles, an entire and unshaken faith in their truth, and considerable patience in waiting the gradual process by which obstacles are steadily but slowly surmounted. How much wasted energy have we had to deplore, because men grow impatient of the slow advancement of that which they feel to be true. And the lesson is seldom learnt, until it is accompanied by the bitter feeling that it comes too late.

We feel assured that those men who went away from that meeting with feelings of disappointment, would, on reflection, have less faith in associations and more in themselves; and that those associations already existing, will learn that their great object will be best gained, by their developing the individual energies of their members.

The World's Convention—from the numbers, respectability and talent of its delegates, and the importance of its object, commanded attention from the press. Nearly the whole of the daily, and many of the weekly press, giving copious reports. Many of the leading articles were candid and complimentary, both to the conduct of the Convention and the principle it met to promote. We only hear of one article against us from any respectable portion of the press; in the Morning Chronicle. We have been urged to reply, but it carries its own refutation. It is founded upon mistake, and contains some misrepresentation. We can only account for its appearance in a journal usually containing articles acutely reasoned, and of some merit in composition, by its being the work of some sub-reporter, getting in by accident, or as a hoax upon the editor by some wag of the printing office.

The meetings have been highly successful; and that at Covent Garden, unequalled by any meeting held in the metropolis. Those present, felt it to be a "great fact," and the beginning of a series of movements, that will one day issue in one of the most glorious triumphs for mankind, recorded in his social progress. The sermons and religious services, and the other meetings were all of a deeply interesting character. We have only now to endeavour to realize the fervent hopes of those, who, on the platforms of those assemblages, have thrilled many hearts with high expectation, and carried courage to many fainting minds.

To the parties who took the responsible duty of getting up and conducting the arrangements of those meetings, we feel that the thanks of the temperance public are due. We cheerfully accord it.

MILITARY FLOGGING.

(Extract of a letter in "Times" of August 24, 1846.)

"It is not pleasing to be reminded of our own failings, but there is no doubt that drunkenness is our national vice. It pervades all classes in a degree more or less, and until the character of the people is changed in this respect, there is no hope that corporal punishment can be done away with in the navy, either with advantage to the country or to the good men serving on board Ships of War. Eight out of ten cases of flogging that take place, are caused by crimes committed by men in a state of intoxication; and it would be well if those philanthropic persons who are so interested in the welfare of the soldier and the sailor, would heartily set to work and cure the disease of drunkenness. When they succeed in this, the cat-o-nine tails will be powerless.

A CAPTAIN, R.N.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

Dr. OXLEY proposed that Mr. J. W. Green be added to the proposed committee. He had laboured long and hard in the cause and ought not to be overlooked.

Rev. J. BURNS seconded the proposition.

Mr. RUTTER supported the proposition. He hoped that as soon as possible after the Convention, a grand Metropolitan Union would be formed, and all those differences merged which had stood in the way of the prosperity of the cause.

Dr. OXLEY said that the hearts of many were bent on such a union as should make an impression on the public, and be able to correspond with every part of the world.

T. BEAUMONT, Esq., recommended mutual concession, forbearance, and affection. He rejoiced in having had the opportunity of associating with so many distinguished friends of the temperance cause, and in the noble expression of manly christian feeling displayed in Covent-garden Theatre. He united in the congratulations and in the thanks to Divine providence for bringing their American brethren among them. He hoped that all differences would be merged, and that the friends of the cause would bring all their best feelings to the organization of a plan for such an union, as might promote the great and glorious objects of the temperance movement.

The resolution was then carried unanimously.

Mr. CLAPP offered some explanation as to certain statements which had fallen from Mr. F. Douglas, at Covent-garden Theatre, on the preceding evening, in reference to the brutal treatment the coloured teetotalers had met with from the white population. He did not believe that Mr. Douglas designed to give offence. It was a sad fact that a powerful prejudice against colour prevailed in America, and that one-sixth of the American population were, through that prejudice, virtually excluded from the temperance organization.

Rev. J. MARSH denied that such prejudice existed to anything at all like the extent stated by Mr Clapp. He (Mr. Marsh) had frequently rendered assistance to the coloured people, and sincerely bade them God-speed. He loved them, rejoiced to have them at their meetings, and had preached in their pulpits. In reply to questions put to him by several members of the Convention, Mr. Marsh declared that advocates from the societies of coloured teetotalers would readily be admitted to the platforms of the temperance society, and be listened to with pleasure. It was wrong to insinuate that the temperance societies of America were encouragers of slavery, or of the prejudice against colour.

Dr. COX explained further. His great grandfather was a slave-holder; but long before Wilberforce arose—from reading his bible, and from thinking as a christian—he called his lawyer, and emancipated all his slaves. He (Dr. Cox), had ever been the friend of the coloured people. He had coloured members in his church, who sat in connexion with the other members, and he declared that if that were not the case he would not administer it to the whites. He had imbibed the anti-slavery principle with his mother's milk, and from the instructions of his sainted father; and had more than once been exposed to the fury of mobs, and in danger of his life, in consequence of his advocacy of the rights of the coloured people. The mob referred to by Mr. Douglas were not temperance people; but was composed mainly of foreigners, of Irish chiefly, who were equally opposed to teetotalers and to colour, but the ground of whose quarrel was the jealousy which subsisted between them and the coloured people on the subject of labour. The foreigners were opposed to the coloured people because they stood in the way of their (the foreigners) being employed. The temperance people of America lamented the outrage referred to by Mr. Douglas, and had entered their solemn protest against it. Colour was not made a qualification of membership. He made all allowances for Mr. Douglas, a man into whose soul, as Mr. Kirk had said, the iron had entered, but he thought it highly injudicious to have it so brought before such an audience as were assembled in Covent Garden Theatre. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of prayers were sent up from the christians of America for the slave population, and he never heard of one prayer being offered on the other side. Could such prayers be presented they would have leaden wings, and would come down again and stick in the mud. He felt it to be his duty to pray as zealously against slavery as he did against infidelity.

Dr. SEMMUCKER, of the Lutheran Theological Seminary, Pennsylvania, considered the expressions used by Mr. Douglas unwise, and even unjustifiable. He (Dr. S.) was an anti-slavery man; he had educated coloured men, and had assisted to organize societies of coloured people. He regretted that Mr. Douglas had made his statement without any qualification. It was true in part, but it was far less true in reference to the temperance population than to others. The statements made by Mr. Marsh and Dr. Cox were perfectly true, though there were other places to which these statements would not apply. The following resolution was then passed unanimously:—"That this Convention acknowledges with devout gratitude to the Author of all good, the kindness of his providence in bringing so many brethren in safety from various and distant parts of the world, to deliberate on the subject of the deliverance of our race from the curse of inebriation, and sincerely hope that the time is not far distant when all the friends of teetotalism through the earth will be found united in one distinct, harmonious, and determined confederacy, for the attainment of this noble, benevolent, and sublime object."

Dr. PATTON responded to the resolution. The very kind and friendly terms in which the resolution was expressed claimed his warmest acknowledgment. He rejoiced in that Convention, There had been a few movements which resembled flashes of electric fluid, but they had tended to purify the air, and would cause the corn to grow. He presented his best thanks to the Convention; and expressed his hope that the next would be held at New York. Should the British delegates favour them with a visit, he could assure them of open houses and open hearts. He recommended a correspondence with all parts of the world, and all other measures by which the wise and good of various nations could be brought into intercourse. As to America, he believed such intercourse would assist greatly to perpetuate the peace of the two countries. He trusted that the Lion of England would watch over the tents of Judah, while the Eagle of America would soar above; and that all nations would unite to promote the peace and happiness of the world, and thus place the crown at His feet on whose head were "many crowns."

Rev. W. MORTON, missionary from India, moved the following resolution:—"That this Convention fully impressed with the great value and importance of Domiciliary Visitation, and having good reason to believe that this instrumentality has been signally blessed in snatching thousands from misery, vice, and degradation, strongly recommend to every temperance society the necessity and advantage of employing home missionary effort both by regular agents and individual members of teetotal societies." He furnished some encouraging particulars as to the progress of the cause in India, but complained that sufficient information was not circulated, especially among missionaries in foreign stations. Of thirty missionaries in one part of India, he only knew of four who were teetotalers.

Mr. J. MEREDITH seconded the resolution, and after some remarks by Messrs. Buckle, Teare, Kaye, and others, it was carried unanimously.

T. BEAUMONT, Esq., read an address to be presented to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, now sitting at Bristol. He trusted it would, if presented, at least lead to discussion and conversation. It was desirable that the temperance movement should be talked about, not only in the conference, but among all religious bodies.

This was cordially supported by J. S. Buckingham, Esq., Rev. R. Tabraham, Dr. Oxley, Mr. Mudge, and others, and agreed to unanimously, with a few verbal alterations.

AFTERNOON SITTING, AND TERMINATION OF THE CONVENTION.

The Convention re-assembled at three o'clock, and the chair was taken by William Cash, Esq. The number of delegates was reduced to less than fifty.

The proceedings commenced with a motion of Mr. DUNLOP, to the effect:—"Resolved, That the Convention are of opinion that in order to advance the cause of temperance those engagements ought to be preferred, which, agreeing to personal abstinence from alcoholic liquors, also, tend to restrain the parties from giving or offering these liquors as beverages."

Mr. T. REID moved an amendment, to the following effect:—"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Convention, that it is imperatively required of all those who would take part in the temperance reformation, that they should abstain from giving, as well as taking, intoxicating liquors, as essentially necessary to the present success and ultimate triumph of the great cause of genuine temperance."

A long and desultory discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Scott of Topsham, T. Reid, Glasgow, Dr. Lovell, J. Ainsworth, Esq., Mr. Chrimes, Rev. Mr. Tabraham, J. Teare, J. Burns, J. Meredith, J. S. Buckingham, Esq., Rev. W. Reid, Dr. Beecher, T. Beaumont, Esq., T. Whitaker, G. W. Alexander, Esq., and other gentlemen, took part. Mr. Dunlop then replied. The Chairman suggested that it was rather the business of local societies than of the Convention. Some member then moved the previous question, which was carried. Messrs. Reid, Melvin, and Sinclair, entering a protest against the decision.

The prepared paper of Mr. Beaumont to the Wesleyan Conference, was then read by the Secretary, and a motion of Mr. Beaumont, for its adoption and transmission that evening, being seconded by Mr. Buckingham, was unanimously carried.

The following resolution was, with deference to the time of the meeting, proposed by Mr. HAUGHTON of Dublin, without preface:—"Resolved, That in view of all the information given to this Convention, our conviction of the immorality of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a common beverage is deepened and strengthened, and we desire loudly to enunciate to the world this strong conviction. Whether men may or may not be prepared to receive this great truth, this Convention is not able to determine, neither are they anxious on that point. They desire faithfully to do their duty, and to impress upon the consciences of all men who are engaged in the demoralizing practices referred to, that it is their bounden duty to renounce them at once and for ever."

Mr. SOLLY read a paper on the subject, which was afterwards withdrawn.

G. W. Alexander, Esq., Messrs. Melvin, Buckingham, T. Reid, F. Hopwood, Chrimes, &c., expressed opinions, after which the resolution was carried; 27 voting for it, and 7 against it.

Messrs. Melvin and Reid again entered their protest against this resolution as inconsistent with the former vote.

In reply to questions from members, Mr. J. BURNS, referring to the resolution and address, stated that it would occupy the business committee for at least a week to come, to superintend these and other matters, inasmuch as it was intended to publish the selected papers in a printed report of the Convention. It will be a volume. Its communication to each delegate must depend on the surplus fund, otherwise it will be published in a cheap form.

The following resolution was then moved by J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., and seconded by JOHN GUEST, Esq.:—"That a very general feeling having been manifested during the sittings of this Convention in favour of one of the principal objects for which it was called together, namely, the formation of a World's Temperance Union, as soon as measures could be taken to ensure its proper organisation and support, it is desirable to form a special committee for the purpose of opening a correspondence with the State Temperance Societies of America, as well as with the National and other principal Temperance Societies of the British dominions, and other parts of the world, in order to ascertain how far such a union would meet their approbation, and to what extent they might be disposed to contribute for its support. And that the following gentlemen be appointed a committee, with power to add to their numbers, and to appoint a secretary, if necessary, to report in due time the result of their correspondence to such public meeting or Convention as may be called together for that purpose:—John Dunlop, William Cash, Dr. Lovell, Rev. Jabez Barns, T. Beaumont."

The remaining papers, which were voluminous, were referred to the committee, for the purpose of arrangement and of publication, as far as their importance demanded and the funds would allow.

Mr. J. W. GREEN moved "That this meeting rejoice most sincerely that the World's Temperance Convention has been held, and tenders its grateful thanks to the committee of the National Temperance Society for the judicious arrangements they have made in reference to this Convention, and for the measures they have adopted to secure the permanency and efficiency of its proceedings."

A resolution was then moved, and carried unanimously, That the Committee for the publication of the papers and documents, should, in association with the Committee of the National Temperance, complete the work of the Convention.

Mr. J. SCOTT of Topsham, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Resolutions of thanks were unanimously passed to the Secretaries, and to the Managing Committee of the Convention; also to Samuel Bowly, Esq., and W. Cash, Esq., as Chairmen of the Convention.

W. CASH, Esq. returned thanks, and congratulated the friends present on having brought the business of the Convention to a conclusion.

The Convention was then closed, as it had begun, by a few moments of silence.

ADDRESS

TO THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBER OF THE CONFERENCE OF THE WESLEYAN CHURCH, NOW HOLDING IN BRISTOL.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIRS,—We take this opportunity of stating, for the information of your body, that a "World's Convention for the Promotion of Temperance," has been sitting in London, during this week, which has been attended not only by delegates from all parts of the British empire, but also, by a considerable number of the most pious and talented ministers, medical professors, and distinguished philanthropists of America, and other parts of the world; at which, the claims of the temperance cause, upon all classes of the community, have been most fully and affectionately considered. The attention of the Convention has been particularly directed to the vast importance of obtaining, at least, the candid and kind consideration of all christian churches, seeing that the interests of religion and morals, throughout the world, are so essentially connected with the temperance cause; and that to a far greater extent than can be imagined, by those who have not yet taken into their most serious and pious consideration, the enormous evils which accrue to society, not only from what is popularly termed, the abuse of intoxicating liquors, but also, that the font et origo of all the evils which afflict society on this head, are attributable to the general and even "moderate" use of such drinks. And, that since it has been triumphantly demonstrated, not only that the most perfect health is compatible with the total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, but that the moral, social, and religious interests of the community are immensely promoted thereby, the claims of humanity urgently require, not only that there should be no indifference (not to say hostility) to the great cause of temperance, but that it should receive from christian churches, and more especially from all christian ministers, the most unequivocal marks of sympathy and support. On this subject, the delicacy of which is only equalled by its importance, the Convention cannot omit to state the feeling which is entertained by all present, of the immense moral power which is wielded by your distinguished and venerable body. Nor can we conceal from you, the intense anxiety, and the disappointment which has been felt throughout the temperance community, on the subject of a feeling which has existed on the part of the Methodist Conference, towards the temperance cause. And in referring to this part of the subject, we feel it our duty to apprise you, that we have reason to believe that more than thirty thousand English teetotalers, are at this moment, members of the Wesleyan church, and hence we feel that they have a strong claim upon us, to state on their behalf, the anxious feeling which is universally entertained by them, that, although it is too much to assume, that every member of your body shall become identified with us; yet, we humbly presume, the time has gone by, when the cause of temperance shall be treated with feelings of disesteem and repudiation: and we now respectfully and confidently appeal to you, on behalf of a cause, which has been instrumental, under God, in rescuing from misery and vice, thousands of men, who are at this moment in the strictest fellowship with christian churches, and an honour to the christian name. Under these feelings and convictions, this "Convention" expresses a confident hope, that you will confer upon the temperance cause, that consideration and support which it so eminently deserves at your hands. Wishing, and fervently praying, that every blessing may attend your sittings, and that you may long continue to advance the interests of christianity.

We are yours most respectfully,

Signed on behalf of the World's Convention for the promotion of temperance,

WILLIAM CASH, Chairman.

THOMAS BEGGS, Secretary.

The Convention deeply regret, that any feelings of alienation or disaffection to the temperance cause should ever have been occasioned by hasty and unwarrantable expressions, on the part of the advocates of the societies, and are by no means prepared to justify the slightest departure from the most becoming and kind language; at the same time, a hope is strongly entertained, that in future, no feelings or expressions but those of kindness and respect shall be exercised on either side.

The following notice appears in the minutes of the Wesleyan Conference:—

The PRESIDENT stated that he had received an address from the Temperance Convention assembled in London. He observed, that it came from an assembly of respectable persons, and was worded in a very respectable manner; it was, therefore, deserving of respectful attention. He said that all other temperance addresses and memorials which he, as president, had received, (and they had been very numerous) were very impudent and very tyrannical, and therefore did not merit attention. But this from "the Convention" merited respectful treatment from the Conference. It was then read at length, and attentively listened to; and, after a few remarks from two or three preachers, it was unanimously resolved that a respectful answer be returned to the address of "the World's Convention."

And the following letter has been received by the Secretary:—

Bristol, August 11th, 1846.

SIR,—I am directed respectfully to acknowledge the receipt of the communication forwarded by you to the Wesleyan Conference, now assembled in this city, from the "World's Convention for the promotion of temperance."

The memorial has this morning been laid before the Conference, and the subject to which it refers will receive due attention. I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

ROBERT NEWTON,

Secretary of Conference.

Thomas Beggs, Esq., Secretary, &c.

GREAT MEETING AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

This demonstration, in connexion with the sittings of the World's Temperance Convention, took place on Friday evening, in Covent-garden Theatre. The platform (which was erected upon the stage), pit, and galleries, were crowded to excess (notwithstanding the admission was by payment), and the boxes were filled with elegantly-dressed ladies and gentlemen. The vast building consequently presented a most animating scene, and forcibly reminded us of the similar immense gatherings that were wont to be held there for the purpose of promoting free-trade. The Morning Chronicle of Saturday the 8th, observed, "The Theatre was crowded with as large and respectable a mixed audience as we ever saw in that magnificent saloon, collected by the most attractive performance or appearance, theatrical, royal, or political." George W. Alexander, Esq., took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said he would not trouble them with many observations, knowing as he did, that he was surrounded by some of the ablest friends of the anti-slavery cause—(great laughter and cheers)—he meant by some of the ablest friends of the total abstinence cause, not only in this country, but in the United States of America—(cheers)—and it had been to some of them a delightful treat to listen to the statements which had been given to them (during the three days of the Convention) of the progress of total abstinence in the United States. He did not doubt that that assembly would listen to those gentlemen with equal satisfaction; and he trusted that no small amount of benefit would be derived to this great cause from the meeting of that evening. (Cheers.) He did feel that while some of them esteemed it to be at once their privilege and their duty to do all they possibly could to abolish slavery from every part of the globe—(cheers)—it was at the same time a solemn duty, which was incumbent upon Englishmen, to abolish the slavery of drunkenness, and to remove from our own countrymen those dreadful evils of which intoxication was the cause.—(Loud cheers.)

JOHN RUTTER, Esq., of Shaftesbury, began by remarking upon the very different standing which their cause now assumed to that which it did a few years since, by a few working-men at Preston.—(Cheers.) A standing not only proved by the overwhelming scene before him, but proved, also, by the convention of men assembled from different parts of the world, now assembled on the subject within this city, and proved also by the presence of their American brethren then around them, who had come across the Atlantic to bear with them the kindly feelings of their teetotal friends in America, and to give them the right hand of fellowship, and to wish them "God speed" in their noble and philanthropic cause.—(Cheers.) Was it not the duty of every one present to do all in their power to benefit their fellow-man? Were not the members of the Total Abstinence Society the true Samaritans, who looked after the poor drunkard wounded by strong drink? They went over to him and poured the oil of consolation and hope into his wounds. This was truly a great and good cause. It had received the stamp of approbation from on high—(hear)—and therefore it was the privilege as well as the duty of every thinking man and consistent christian, to give it the right hand of support and help.—(Loud cheers.)

The Chairman then introduced the Rev. Dr. Beecher from the United States of America, one of the fathers, if not the father, of this movement in the United States, and the world at large.—(Great cheering.) And on account of his age—he being upwards of seventy years of age—he was sure that they would listen to him with the greatest attention.—(Cheers.)

The Rev. Dr. BEECHER said it was an unhappy fact, in the progress of this reform, that many great and many good men had doubted the necessity and lawfulness of it. After depreciating the system of preaching the gospel in alliance with temperate drinking, he alluded to the latter, and said that all other obstacles had been surmounted, and if they could but surmount that, and lodge in the consciences and intellects of this densely-populated country, that temperate drinking would defeat and paralyse extensively the preaching of the gospel, and render it nugatory, he thought it would have the desired effect, and the seeds scattered there would become an harvest, which would wave like Lebanon over the whole world.—(Cheers.) The effect of the success of this movement would be the germination of health, vigour, and enterprise in the nation; and it would be productive of labour, for like as the gospel strengthened the intellect and formed the conscience, so would it concentrate the best energies of human nature—(hear, hear). Indeed, it was always found that where the community were evangelised, there were they the most industrious, the most economical, wanted the least, and produced the most. No man ever became a drunkard by drinking two or three times; no man was ever born a drunkard. From the ranks of the moderate drinkers came the hosts of the intemperate. These furnished the standing army of demagogues, who relied for their power on those upon whom they perpetrated their mischief—namely, the standing army of the drunkards—upon those who think they had better reign in hell than serve in heaven, and they therefore went to the drunkard to place the infernal crown upon his head. He had watched the progress of the subject for thirty-six years, and he had seen it falter, but never stop, and in every faltering, the elastic power increased till it moved again, and received fresh support, so that it had now become an important and prominent movement.—(Hear, hear, and cheers.) He had not expected to have lived to see the effects he had, and he was rejoiced to think that the battle was nearly won. He had seen "the beginning of the end," and his heart exulted in what had been done.—(Loud cheers.)

Mr. F. HOPWOOD of York, Secretary of the British Association, said, that the position which they now occupied was very different to what it was a few years ago. True it was, that at the outset they themselves had been convinced of the purity and truth of their principles; and they were also conscious that those principles were so much opposed to the existing habits and practices of general society that they appeared before the world with something like fear and trembling. They had expected that those individuals who were engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and whose interest it was to oppose them, would be up in arms against them. They expected also to meet with opposition from those thousands—nay, he might say millions, of individuals who lived entirely for themselves, and did not care in the least for the comfort and happiness of others.—(Hear, hear.) They felt it was their duty to endeavour to remove from the world the cause of such dreadful evils. They found that there were some old laws which had been made for the prevention of drunkenness, but at the same time they found that the same government licensed thousands and tens of thousands to sell intoxicating drinks.—(Hear, hear.) How many magistrates were there who sat upon the bench, and after having fined the drunkards brought before them, it was no uncommon thing for them to go and indulge in a bottle or two of sherry or port.—(Hear and cheers.) Was it to be expected that the lower orders would leave off the habit, when they saw legislators, magistrates, and ministers, drinking the drunkard's drink?—(Cheers.) No; let them set the good example of abstinence—total abstinence—and it was then, and not till then, that they would be able to reclaim the drunkard.—(Hear.) Every other means used for the purpose of reclaiming the drunkard, or of preventing sober men from becoming drunkards, had failed. The cause was now reaching its meridian splendour, and an enlightened and indignant British public were determined to promote the peace and prosperity of the country by abolishing the use of strong drinks.—(Cheers.)

The Rev. E. N. KIRK of Boston, America, observed, the meetings in connexion with the Convention were now drawing to a close.—(Hear.) They had passed four days—Britons and Americans had met, not in deadly conflict,—(great cheering)—they had met to make mutual congratulations—they had met in friendly council. They had met to impart mutual encouragement and mutual instruction, and they felt not only that they had enjoyed the favour of Divine Providence, but that they were about to enter upon their great work with renewed vigour.—(Cheers.) The members of this society meant, by the help of God, to set free the face of the earth from one of its direst scourges,—(cheers)—and dry up one of its damning fountains.—(Cheers.) God was with them, and they need not fear the issue.—(Loud cheers.) Truth, immortal, immutable truth, was what they relied upon as the chief means of diffusing the glorious principles of total abstinence. They heeded not prejudice, passion, and interest; as Milton had well said, "Only give truth a fair open field, and she must triumph."—(Cheers.) When our blessed Lord was on earth he went about preaching his religion, not expressing his disgust at everything that offended him, but dealing with men as if they had consciences and hearts that could feel the power of the holy lessons he inculcated. He could not sit down without saying that he did feel ashamed as a child of England—a grandchild he would rather say—to pass through the streets of London, and see so many trap-doors for immortal souls.—(Cheers.) He did think they could be closed, and his prayer was, that their efforts, might enable them to behold old England and America delivered from this evil, and going forth under the blessed influence of the gospel, to teach mankind the advantage of temperance and peace.

The Rev. J. MARSH of New York, said there was a beautiful figure presented in one of the old prophecies, which represented the gospel, first as a little stream, reaching to the ancles, then swelling to the knees, till spreading and rolling on, it became a broad, deep river, fertilising the nations of the earth. Every gift of God was small at its beginning. The very gospel itself was once confined in an upper chamber. At one time the predominant religion was confined to the breast of a monk.—(Hear, hear.) Wilberforce laboured twenty-six years before he could induce truth and humanity to break up the slave-trade—and the cause in which they were engaged had also overcome great obstacles, and was now delivering the world from the thralldom of intoxicating liquors. Any famine or disaster which cost the country millions sterling would have been considered its ruin, and yet that vice of intoxicating liquors had saddled this country with an annual expense of £60,000,000. Look at the poor drunkard! what a wreck of a man! Look at him, and at his family; look at the miserable man in his bed of straw, dying of delirium tremens. Look at that burning ship on the ocean, amidst the dark mass of midnight, all enveloped in flames, and rising up the rigging to the sails. And yet they had a cure for all this evil—a cure so simple, so easy that they were too proud to adopt it—a cure costing so little, and blessing them with everything, namely, total abstinence.—(Hear, hear.) He had heard a very pretty anecdote of the Queen, through one of the American newspapers, which gave them a good opinion of her, and they had never lost it.—(Cheers.) One day her minister waited upon her and urged upon her a particular act, on the ground of its being "expedient." She replied, "My lord, talk not to me of expediency; is it right?"—(Cheers.) They had raised this standard in America, and they had so pressed it to the consciences of men, because they knew that was the only way to redeem this world. They were satisfied of this principle, that supply creates demand, and they wished them to understand it here, and also that as long as it continued the demand would continue.—(Hear, hear.) Take away the supply, and its loss would not be felt—take the drink away from the poor drunkard, and he would care nothing about it in six weeks.—(Much cheering.)

The Rev. W. REID of Edinburgh, observed, that the support of temperance was pre-eminently a clergyman's subject. When he saw the blighting effects produced by the use of strong drinks, not only upon the temporal, but upon the spiritual interests of men, he could not—dare not—stand aloof from using his influence and exertions to remove so tremendous an evil. As his time was limited to a few minutes, he confined himself to one point,—namely, the interests of the young. He said, we have duties to discharge towards the young—duties which, if neglected now, can never be performed. The people of this generation had no right to leave behind them a system which would degrade and demoralize those of the next generation—(hear, hear). This might be prevented by the proper attention and training of youth. He believed that there was a most intimate connexion between the mind of the child and of the man; and the mind of the man was framed in the head of the boy—(hear, hear). The moral influence which you bring to bear upon the child is that which makes the man. We must train them to the thought, that there is better worth than gold, better glory than warlike butchery, purer pleasure than the harlot cup of intoxication. The character of the child was being framed even now; hence the necessity for training it in a healthy, pure, and uncontaminated atmosphere. Indeed, if the parents would just let their children remain as God had created them, they would all be teetotalers.—(Loud cheers.)

The Rev. Dr. COX of the United States, next addressed the meeting. He said, he had not before visited a Theatre, but their cause (the cause of man and God) was sufficient to consecrate any location. Amity with England, co-operation in humanizing purposes, and brotherly reforms, was the aspiration of all the good and wise in America. We were come together to ratify the late treaty. There were moral ligaments capable of putting a stop to the brutalizing massacres of war beyond the short-sighted ken of ordinary legislators. Still one sight distressed him, and he might denounce the gin-palaces of London, whence flowed a flood of poison, which, if collected in one reservoir, would float a navy. Never was John Bull's example so estimated in America as now. Let England show the example, in throwing down those brutalizing altars of the demon of all crime. He came to ask England to help America with her example; it was England taught America her rights. Let the mother country set a bright example to her daughter America—an example that would expand and encircle, as her vast empire did, every boundary of the globe.—(Cheers.)

Mr. G. S. KENRICK of West Bromwich, congratulated the advocates of the cause at this great meeting, which he thought was an excellent omen of the ultimate and complete success of the principle of teetotalism in this country. The most effectual way of carrying out their principle was by the law of kindness and charity. There was no place in the three kingdoms that did so much honour to the cause as Ireland—(cheers). He had travelled through that country, and he had never heard a word spoken against Father Mathew but from one publican. This was a fact which he attributed to the universal benevolence of that great man's character. At one town in Ireland, which he and Mr. James Haughton had visited, they had delivered temperance addresses from the balcony of a public-house—(laughter), and administered the pledge in a room in that house, lent them by the landlord, and the landlord had himself pointed out several pledge-breakers who were in the room, and who came forward and took the pledge again. In America, a large proportion of the ministers of the gospel were advocates of the cause, because the feeling there was so strong that ministers were expected to become leaders in the cause; here, he was afraid, there was a contrary feeling, so as to keep the ministers of religion altogether back from the cause—(cries of "No, no.")

Professor Caldwell (Professor of Moral Philosophy) of Dickinson's College, Pennsylvania, followed. He had been a working man in the cause of temperance for the last fourteen years. From his experience of the last four days in this country, he could see no difficulties or impediments that might not be overcome. In Pennsylvania the temperance cause had not been so triumphant as in other parts of America. By perseverance and individual effort, however, every difficulty could be overcome, to render their movement most successful. The clergymen of America had not always been advocates of this cause, for he had found sometimes the greatest difficulty to contend against from that quarter. However disposed they were to maintain a different opinion from him, he had always been met by them with the greatest courtesy, and a great many of them had actually signed the pledge before he had left their company. He could bear testimony to the disposition of the Wesleyans in America to support the cause, for he did not know one Wesleyan clergyman there that was not now a teetotaler. The teachers of the youth in the college were, every man of them, pledged to total abstinence. He hoped that the same progress as had been made in America, would be also made here, for he did not believe that there was any dignity of the church of England that they could not approach upon this subject. He should conclude by repeating a maxim that they had in America, which was—"Be sure you are right, and then go a-head."—(Cheers and laughter.)

Rev. Dr. PATTON next came forward, and commented by asking whether his hearers were teetotalers—(cries of "Yes.") Then they were his countrymen, and he would drink their healths—(here the reverend gentleman took a hearty drink from a glass of water, which caused a loud burst of cheers.) He maintained that religion could not get on well without temperance. If they were to inquire into the number that had fallen into a drunkard's grave, from all classes of persons, they could not come to any other opinion. He would, in support of such an assertion, refer them to the evidence of that great man, Archdeacon Jeffrey, from Bombay, showing how pernicious were the practices resorted to by some of the missionaries in their efforts to convert the Hindoo or the Pagan. Mr. Ellice, a missionary in Polynesia, gave similar evidence. His next proposition was that temperance could not get on well without religion. This was a maxim which he thought it would not be necessary for him to prove. Let the glorious hope of heaven, and the awful fear of hell, be brought to bear in aid of this great work. All drunkards were made out of moderate drinkers.—(Hear, hear.) They were such advocates for free-trade, they wanted to send out to America their poisonous liquors. As fond as he was of free trade, he hoped they would keep such goods as these to themselves. When a man lifted the intoxicating glass to his lips, let him read upon it the words, "If I drink this glass, I shall certainly become a drunkard." If he read those words, the glass would drop to pieces from his palsied hand, and he would shrink with horror from its touch—(Cheers). He had no fear of the miser becoming a drunkard, for his fate would be that of an idolater, but it was the young and generous-hearted man who he dreaded would fall into the drunkard's grave, if he had not the moral courage of becoming a teetotaler—(Cheers). He hoped that the lives of these young men would be marked by purity and morality, and that their deaths would be like the going down of the morning star, which sets amid light and glory—(Great cheering).

Mr. RICHARD ALLEN of Dublin, was then introduced to the meeting and commenced by saying that he felt himself exceedingly small when surrounded by so many learned and eminent men. He was an Irishman—(Laughter). He was speaking the other day to the parish priest of Arklow, who informed him that 700 of the poor fishermen there had taken the pledge, not one of whom had ever broken it. The parish priest of Trim informed him that out of 4000 pledged teetotalers, there were only four who had gone back. He had stood with Father Mathew on the steps of the custom-house at Dublin, under the canopy of heaven, when, as far as the eye could reach, the crowd extended, and when the pledge was administered to large batches of people who came forward to take it. The consequences in Dublin were soon to be seen, for the prisons in the neighbourhood were emptied of their usual inmates, and the utmost charity and propriety of conduct prevailed—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. JOHN ANDREWS of Scarborough then came forward. He reminded his hearers of the progress they had made in the cause since 1835, when he came to London with his friend John Livesey, for the purpose of forming a total abstinence association. There was a great deal of charity and benevolence in this country, but that benevolence was in some degree improperly directed, for persons should rather make an effort to remove the cause of all this poverty and misery, which, to their credit, they were always ready to relieve, than to be encouraging the use of strong drink by their example and their apathy. Let there be no such thing as impossibility to deter them in their work, but let them buckle on their armour, and meet every difficulty as became men determined to free their country from one of the greatest evils that ever afflicted humanity—(Cheers.)

Dr. BEAUMONT physician of Bradford, next addressed the meeting. All were not aware that intoxicating liquors of every kind were of necessity unwholesome, for it was impossible they could be otherwise—(hear, hear.) He defied contradiction on the point, for no medical man had ever examined the subject in the way it ought to be examined, without coming to this conclusion. A patient lately consulted him upon the subject of teetotalism, asking him whether he should be benefited by abstaining from all fermented liquor? to whom he replied, by saying, that he might as well ask whether he would not be benefited by pure air. Alcohol must produce carbon in the stomach, and exhaust oxygen, and therefore must necessarily inflict the most serious injury upon the person who partook of those drinks. He hoped that the medical public would be henceforth the great teacher of teetotalism, and that there would be no necessity for further complaint against them for their indifference to this great question.—(Cheers.)

HENRY CLAPP, jun., of Lynn, Massachusetts, United States, I have compared the influence of the temperance movement to a stream—a stream of water. And there is a peculiar pertinence in the comparison. For the destructive element against which this stream is directed is fire—the fire of the brewhouse and the still. Let me relate an incident which will illustrate my idea, and then I will take my seat. The other day I was in Liverpool. While there an incident occurred which disturbed the whole town, and figured largely in the papers. That incident, if you will believe it, was simply the burning down of an apothecary's shop. Strange as it may seem, this little fact—the destruction by fire of a few thousand pounds' worth of perishable property—did actually call forth the energies of a large portion of the people of Liverpool, and interest the public mind, to a certain extent, for several days! Now this may be very well, and I would certainly be the last man to prevent a similar interest being excited on all similar occasions. But, really, when I consider that in that very town of Liverpool there are at this time thousands of human beings on fire—and yet, that this fact is hardly thought worthy of notice, I must express some surprise. So true is what I have said, that those few hundred people who think differently, and endeavour to raise an alarm at this frightful conflagration among human beings, are looked upon by the great mass of the people as little less than crazy.

FREDERICK DOUGLAS was received with great applause. He experienced great pleasure in bearing his testimony to the benefits of teetotalism. He was not a delegate from America, for those who would be anxious to send him there in such capacity were themselves slaves.—(Loud cries of "shame, shame.") He was sorry to say, that there were 3,000,000 of his brethren kept down in a state of slavery.—(Shouts of disapprobation.) He loved the Americans; but they had neglected their duties towards their fellow-creatures, because they had "a skin not coloured like their own." In 1842, when the temperance movement was making such immense progress among the white men, a great number of the black men had the wisdom and the courage (though the white men denied them the credit of possessing any of these virtues) to declare in favour of the movement. They walked in procession through Philadelphia, on the 1st of August, and how were they treated? Why, the Anglo-Saxons met them with shouts of contempt, and hurled brickbats and other missiles upon them.—(Shame.) He did not mention this fact with a view of insulting his American friends here, but he wished that when they went home to America, they would exert themselves, while advocating the cause of their white brethren, also to rescue the black man from the pit of slavery into which he was thrown.—(Great cheering.)
