GENTLEMEN,—Space will not allow of my giving you a very lengthened report of the meetings recently held by myself and my friend and colleague Mr. Whittaker, I will therefore state as concisely as possible the particulars of our visit to Wantage, Swindon, Stroud, Cheltenham and Framilode-on-Severn.

On February the 2nd, Mr. Whittaker held a very interesting meeting at Wantage, which was very numerous attended, and a flattering invitation was given that another meeting should shortly be held. February the 3rd, Mr. Whittaker proceeded to New Swindon, and addressed a very delightful company in the Mechanic's Institute, kindly granted by the committee. On the 4th, I joined Mr. W. at Swindon, and took part in the second meeting, which was one of the best and most impressive meetings I ever remember. The band raised by the munificence of the railway company, was in attendance, and enlivened the proceedings by their admirable performance. The principles of temperance have taken hold in the town and neighbourhood, and the efforts made to correct the drinking-habits of the population are highly approved by the railway authorities; in proof whereof, Mr. Whittaker and I were politely favoured by Mr. Locke, with a first-class free passage from and back to London. On the afternoon of Sunday, the 6th of February, I delivered an address on temperance to the congregation of the Rev. Benjamin Parsons, (author of Anti-Bacchus) the Rev. gentleman conducted the devotional exercises, and made some very impressive observations at the close of my address. A second meeting was held in the same chapel on the following night; the Rev. B. Parsons presided. Mr. Whittaker and I addressed the meeting at considerable length, and the chairman closed with some suitable monitory remarks. Notwithstanding Mr. Parson's ultra teetotalism, this gentleman has nine publicans constant attendants on his ministry. On the 8th and 9th, we held meetings in Cheltenham, which were well attended, and from all I could gather, good was effected. Mr. Weare, Mr. Higgins and other friends here, have long been ardent promoters of our cause. Dr. Lovell of London presided on the first night, and Mr. Higgins on the second occasion. The Victoria Rooms at Stroud were crowded on the evening of the 10th. Thomas Parsons, Esq. of Stroud, an uncompromising man, presided, and introduced the speakers, Mr. Whittaker, myself, and the Rev. Benjamin Parsons in suitable terms; the people here are looking forward with great expectations to the visits of several distinguished temperance reformers. On Friday the 11th, in the British School, at Framilode, I and my friend finished our journey in a westerly direction. Here numbers of watermen reside. The meeting was very large; several signatures were taken to the pledge, and several subscriptions were given to the funds of the National Society.

I am, gentlemen,

Yours respectfully,
THOMAS HUDSON.

HERTFORD, WATTON AND TEWIN.

On the evenings of the 16th, 17th and 18th of February, lectures were delivered by Mr. Thomas Hudson, agent of the National Society, at Hertford, Watton and Tewin. The Wesleyan Chapel at Hertford was kindly granted for the occasion, and a more than usually respectable and attentive auditory assembled to listen to the arguments and statements of the lecturer. The meeting at Watton held in the school-room in connexion with the Rev. E. Bickersteith's church, was completely filled, and at the close, signatures were subscribed. The series of meetings was terminated by one in the newly-built school-room at Tewin, used for the first time, which together with the fact, that no meeting on temperance had ever been held in the parish before, had the effect of drawing a very numerous company from the surrounding villages. Mr. Thomas Spencer Jackson presided, on the two former, and Mr. Bettinson on the latter occasion. Both these gentlemen are connected extensively with agriculture. Mr. Jackson produced considerable impression at one of the meetings by the announcement that while many of the farmers of the county were fearful that they would not be able to dispose of their barley otherwise than for the purposes of malting, he had grown 120 quarters during the past year, the whole of which he had transformed into the finest beef and mutton that had been sent into the market.

The whole of the meetings were highly satisfactory, but nothing could exceed the kindly feeling and enthusiasm of the people at Tewin, while listening to the admirable speeches of Mr. Bettinson, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Bishop, and Mr. Hudson, whose visit has been of eminent service in creating an interest in behalf of the temperance movement.

DEAR SIR.—During the last three months I have been employed as usual in furthering the general interests of teetotalism in Dorset and Hants, in connexion with your society. My plan of operations comprises the following distinctive features: 1st, Domiciliary visitation and tract distribution; 2nd, Public lecturing; 3rd, Arrangement of meetings as secretary of the "Dorset and Hants Teetotal Association." My visiting department is very laborious, and sometimes painful to my feelings. In this particular sphere my time is mostly devoted to the rural districts, and owing to our scattered population, it necessarily involves considerable fatigue, and in some instances hinders our progress. Persons not accustomed to mingle with the working population of the south of England, cannot form a correct idea of the destitution, misery, and mental and moral degradation of the people. The state of thousands is indeed deplorable in the extreme. Look at the following description, and I can assure you it is a faithful representation of many villages I know, and amongst the inhabitants of which I have been permitted to labour. Here is a village, say of 500 inhabitants; you will find for the religious instruction of the people a clergyman of the Established Church, and a Wesleyan or Dissenting place of worship. Of the character of the instruction imparted to the people by their spiritual guides, it is not my province to speak. Doubtless there is much room for improvement, but to the honour of Christianity it may be affirmed, that what there is of moral worth in our rural population is traceable directly or indirectly to religious teaching. In addition to the means of instruction already enumerated, in many places Sabbath and day-schools exist, many of which are badly supported and inefficiently managed, and in some villages no institutions of the above kind are to be found. These, sir, are the scanty advantages of the supposed 500 persons; for them no scientific classes, social meetings, or reading-rooms are established; to these weary sons of toil no mechanics' institution opens its stores of mental and moral worth. They are isolated beings, and in too many instances, there are no home associations. The domestic enclosure is broken down; the habitations of many are an outrage upon humanity, injurious to health, and subversive of common decency. Children of tender age, both male and female, are sent into the fields to labour, instead of receiving an education. Mothers of large families are to be seen laying aside their usual habiliments, and partially dressed in the garb of men, labour in the fields at least nine months of the year. The spectacle is sickening. This is not woman's mission. Add to all these distressing circumstances, you will see to a population of 500 souls, one or two, and in some instances more, beer-shops, sending forth their streams of pollution and death. Here young men and young women, with no parental restraint or home associations, congregate together. Here the aged father and his neglected sons may be seen on the Sabbath-day wasting part of their scanty wages. Here in these sinks of iniquity, the thoughtless labourer spends his money; the parent annihilates his authority; the son loses every filial feeling; and here too the daughters of these wealth-producing classes in numberless instances barter away their honour and destroy their happiness. Oh, Sir, my heart sickens at the picture drawn! but I have seen the reality; I have closely observed and extensively studied the habits of our village population during the three years I have held an appointment in this vicinity in connexion with your society, and I unhesitatingly avow, that if required I could prove from statistical information, that three-fourths of the immorality, and one-half of the extreme destitution of the people, is produced by their drinking habits. During the three years I have laboured here as a visiting agent, I have taken upwards of 1000 signatures to the pledge, some hundreds of whom remain consistent abstainers. I have also, through the kindness of your committee and private individuals, put into circulation 17,893 tracts.

Notwithstanding the gloominess of the preceding observations, it will afford you pleasure to learn that the condition of the people is improving. There is a spirit of inquiry abroad, and it has already begun to penetrate the thick darkness of our rural districts. We have a noble work before us. It is true there is an absence of those exciting causes which attend the public advocacy of teetotalism; but quiet and unobserved, the temperance missionary strikes at the strong-holds of intemperance, and could but the number of labourers in this department be increased, and the whole brought under systematic arrangement and superintendence, a more powerful impulse would be given to the temperance reformation than its most sanguine friends anticipate.

During the past quarter I have given several public lectures, and also attended the annual festival of the society in the Isle of Portland. At this place I received the warmest expressions of sympathy and earnest co-operation from the Rev. Mr. Hogarth, the rector, who is a zealous teetotaler of some years' standing. At Newtowney and Allington interesting public meetings have been held; having, however, dwelt at some length on the visiting department of my labours, I will not enlarge except just to remark that I have been enabled to make arrangements for Mr. J. Inwards, one of your agents, to visit Dorset and Hants, who has lectured at Poole, Bridport, and Blandford, in Dorset, Ringwood, Fordingbridge, Romsey, Southampton, Andover and Alton in Hants. The above meetings have proved very successful. I am now engaged in getting up a series of meetings for Dr. Carr, of Birmingham, and hope to secure him at least one month's engagements.

Yours sincerely,
A. W. HERITAGE.

Broughton, Jan. 27th, 1848.

POOLE TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL.

The nineteenth half-yearly festival of the Poole branch of the National Temperance Society was celebrated on the 3rd, 4th, and 5th January, 1848.

On Monday evening, Mr. Jabez Inwards commenced his far-famed Trial of Alcohol, to a full audience, in the Town Hall, and so weighty and truthful were the charges brought against the fell destroyer, that it was evident its doom was sealed, even before the prisoner's defence could be heard.

On Tuesday evening, a tea meeting was held by the members and friends; after which, the doors being thrown open, the spacious hall was soon filled. After addresses by several gentlemen, Mr. Inwards opened a fire upon moderate-drinkers, which lasted upwards of an hour and a half, during which the attention of the audience never flagged. On Wednesday evening, the crowning blow was given to poor Alcohol. He was found guilty, and burned forthwith. Signatures of an influential kind were obtained; and we regard the festival as a decided revival of the temperance cause in Poole.

J. B. PORTEOUS, President of the Poole Branch.

BOROUGH OF GREENWICH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

On Thursday evening, February 3rd, a very instructive and highly interesting lecture on "the Physiological influence of Beer, Wine, &c., on the Human Frame," was delivered in the Greenwich Literary Institution, by Daniel Carr, M.D., of Birmingham, and which was illustrated by numerous large coloured diagrams. The lecture was listened to by a numerous and respectable audience with manifest interest, and the important information so clearly conveyed on the scientific verities connected with the temperance movement, seemed as well to delight as to surprise many by whom the subject had not hitherto been seriously considered. The admission was by ticket at a charge of fourpence and sixpence each person, and a good attendance was secured.

H. COLE, Hon. Sec.

SCHOOLS.

The missionary, accompanied by Mrs. Carlile, (widow of a Presbyterian minister of Dublin, and companion of Elizabeth Fry in the prison reform,) visited the schools in John Street, Old Kent Road, when, by the kind permission of the master of the boys and mistress of the girls, we both addressed each school, and in the girls' received twenty-one signatures, and in the boys' forty-six; total, sixty-seven. And on inquiry since Christmas, the mistress assured the missionary that not one had broken the pledge; and that in more cases than one, had the parents come and expressed their thanks for the interest taken in the children's welfare, and a determination on their part to throw no obstacle in the way of their children keeping the pledge.

Visited the boys' and girls' school attached to Lambeth chapel, and after delivering addresses in each, received in the girls' school forty signatures, and in the boys' thirty-three; total, seventy-three.

The mistress is a teetotaler of twelve years' standing, and at this visit received also the signature of a young woman, her assistant.

Visited the boys' and girls' schools in York Road, Westminster, when, after addressing the children in each school, received in the girls' thirty-one, and in the boys' fifty-eight signatures; total, eighty-nine. The master, a pledged teetotaler of many years' standing, and the mistress, one of two years' standing; this is a new teacher recently come, the late teacher having signed the pledge with the missionary at a former visit.

BROCKHAM.

TEMPERANCE.—The members and friends of the Brockham Temperance Society, through the kindness of Mr. Tickner by the loan of his room, enjoyed the pleasure of hearing a most able lecture from Mr. William Claridge, of the National Temperance Society. The room was filled to excess by a respectable and very attentive audience. The lecturer commented upon several passages of Scripture relative to wine and strong drink, and detailed some most affecting narratives of suffering caused by the use of intoxicating drinks in the present day. The worthy gentleman also showed how much the working classes were injured by the drinking usages of our country.

MR. BUCKINGHAM.

LECTURE ROOM FOR MR. BUCKINGHAM.

The committee of the National Temperance Society have received a letter from Mr. Buckingham, enclosing a copy of a Testimonial from the members of the late British and Foreign Institute, of which the following is an extract:—

PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION TO BUILD A LECTURE ROOM IN LONDON FOR MR. BUCKINGHAM.

"At the close of the British and Foreign Institute of London, over which Mr. Buckingham had presided for nearly five years as the Resident Director, the members evinced the high sense they entertained of his valuable services, by subscribing towards a TESTIMONIAL to be presented to him, the amount of which, already contributed, is nearly £700.

"It having been resolved that this should form the nucleus of a more general subscription, for the purpose of raising a fund, to build for Mr. Buckingham's use a Public Lecture Room in the metropolis,—the contributions of those who may be disposed to assist this object will be progressively added to the sum already subscribed; and in the meantime the amount will remain invested in government securities, there to accumulate at interest, till the total sum shall be sufficient to accomplish the object proposed."

On the receipt of the above communication, the committee unanimously passed the following resolution:—

"That this committee respectfully acknowledge the receipt of the letter of J. S. Buckingham, Esq., of the 31st ultimo; and whilst they think it is obvious that they cannot appropriate the funds of the Society to the purpose alluded to, they very cordially recommend the object to the favourable consideration of the members of the National Temperance Society, convinced that they will duly appreciate the valuable labours of Mr. Buckingham in the temperance cause."

The committee will have pleasure in receiving subscriptions for the object at their office, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, and of inserting the same in the Chronicle.

DRINK AND MADDENED FURY!

We have never read of a more demon-like influence through strong drink, than the following case presents:—

THAMES POLICE OFFICE.—THE ATROCIOUS ATTEMPT AT MURDER IN SHADWELL.—This being the day appointed for the final examination of Michael Hagarthy, the coal-whipper, who was charged with attempting to murder a young woman named Ellen Cahill, under circumstances of a most savage and sanguinary character, at the house, No. 7, St. George's-court, Bluegate-fields, Shadwell, on the morning of the 29th ult., the court and its avenues were crowded to excess by persons anxious to hear the prosecutrix.

The previous depositions having been read over, the woman Cahill said that on Friday night week she was in the Lord Lovel beer-house, High-street, Shadwell, with a girl named Lyons, when the prisoner called her out. She at first refused to go, but subsequently went with him to the Duke of York, where they had some rum, and then went to her house. About seven or eight o'clock in the morning she said she wanted to get up and wash some things, as it was Saturday. He said, "Is it Saturday? I'll cook your goose for you this Saturday!" and began to stab her in the throat with a knife. He stabbed at her all through; he did not cut at her. She called to him as well as she could speak, begging him not to stab her any more, and she would not expose him; but he continued to stab on, and after that for some time she did not feel the wounds—she was insensible like. He then stopped a little, upon which she revived somewhat, and called out "murder!" upon which he said, "What! are you not dead yet?" and commenced stabbing again. By this time she had dragged herself to the foot of the bed, and was hanging over; he then renewed the attack, and stabbed her several times, holding her by the hair and jobbing the knife into her. A sailor then came in with a poker, and beckoned her to come out, which she did as well as she could, the sailor, who was afraid to enter, keeping the door with the poker. The last stab she received was in the arm, which is very painful.

The prisoner, in his defence, said he was mad drunk at the time, having taken six glasses of rum before he got out of bed that morning, and a great quantity in the course of the day. She would not let him go home, but tore his coat, and called him all sorts of provoking names. "I suppose," added the prisoner, "I shall suffer for it; but I was raving drunk, and I told her I had drunk two pints of rum with her mother, who has been dead these 14 years. I tried to stab myself too. I have three stabs here (on the breast)."

Mr. Ballantine.—Well, I will send you to trial for this atrocious attempt at murder.

The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

BRIEF NOTICES OF TEMPERANCE PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. Alexander, of Ipswich, who has published so many excellent tracts and useful temperance pieces, has recently added to his admirable and useful collection, two of four pages each, illustrated with wood-cuts, by Mrs. S. C. Hall, entitled,

"The Guide to Glendalough," and "Bridget Larkins," which form Nos. 88 and 89 of the Ipswich series.

One by John Bright, Esq., M.P., entitled "A Word with Serious People," four pages, with wood-cuts; this is 87 of the series.

Besides these, one of twelve pages, No. 81, "The Use of Intoxicating Drinks," by Archdeacon Jeffreys.

"An Honest Spirit-Dealer's Advertisement," 84 of the series.

"The Five Nips," by James Dixon of America, four pages, No. 83.

"Drink and be Happy," No. 82, four pages.

"Seven Years' Experience of a Reclaimed Drunkard;" and the sweet poem, "The Erring," on two pages, No. 85. And finally,

"A Drinking Education," illustrated with six engravings.

The whole of these tracts are well adapted for general circulation, and under the Divine blessing likely very much to serve our cause. They can be had of the proprietor, R. D. Alexander, Esq., Ipswich, or of Simpkin and Marshall, London.

We have much pleasure too, in earnestly recommending to the liberal patronage of teetotalers every where, "The Sunday School and Youth's Temperance Journal." This excellent periodical for the young can be received post-free for sixpence per annum. What family should not treat their children with it! Six postage stamps! sent (free) to Mr. F. Hopwood, 3, Low Ousegate, York, and the volume for the year will be yours. We shall be glad to hear that the monthly sale is 50,000.

Remember that you will have eight pages of teetotal reading, with wood engravings, four pages of wrapper, and delivered at your own doors for one halfpenny per month.

THE WAY TO OBTAIN MONEY.

A HINT FOR WESLEYANS.

Mr. J. Elliott, Secretary of the West Cramlington Total Abstinence Society, writes:—"Our opposers say, that we spend most of our time in the temperance cause, to the neglect of more important duties. I am enabled to give an account to the contrary. I am the steward of the Wesleyan Society in this place. Both our leaders, and most of our members are teetotalers. Within the last eighteen months we have doubled our society, and nearly trebled our contributions to the Circuit funds, as will appear from the following statement:—

1846-7.		£	s.	d.
Quarter Day,	June 30th	1 8 6
"	September 29th	1 18 0
"	December 29th	2 4 0
"	March 30th	2 16 0
"	June 29th	3 6 7
"	September 29th	3 15 0

Let the Wesleyan Societies generally take knowledge of this. Let ministers, leaders, stewards, and members, give us their assistance in the temperance reform. We are intending to establish a Juvenile Society in the Sabbath-school, and have already received forty names."

THE PLEDGE—RE-ANNEXATION.

An interesting case of "re-annexation" occurred in this city recently, which amply justifies the adage "nil desperandum," or to use a free translation, "It will never do give it up so, Mr. Brown." A mechanic of this city, now about 45 years of age—a most excellent and expert workman at his trade, (silver plating), fell many years since into habits of confirmed drunkenness, and not only neglected to provide for his family, but brutally abused his wife. Finally, in one of his drunken fits about eight years since, he drew a knife upon her, and while she endeavoured to wrest it from him she was wounded, as he declared accidentally, in the scuffle. She now swore her life in danger, a criminal prosecution followed, and he was sentenced for seven years to the state prison—the law righteously regarding his plea for drunkenness an aggravation rather than a justification of his crime—and his wife sued for and obtained a divorce. He was pardoned out before the expiration of the term of his sentence; but alone and friendless, shunned by the better part of mankind on account of his disgrace, he fell again into his old dissolute habits and dragged on for some years a miserable life, bloated, ragged and wretched.

About the first of January last, he went to a prominent Washingtonian, who had known him well in his best days, and asked for work. "I will do any thing," said he; "I will blow and strike for you, or file, or any thing—only give me something to do to keep me alive, and out of idleness and mischief." His old friend gave him this kind and seasonable advice: "Now B—," said he, "I know just what is the matter with you—its nothing but rum! that's the bottom of all your troubles. I have drunk my share of rum in my life-time, and have quit it, and if you ever want to get along in the world you must quit too. Now I will tell you what I will do with you; come and sign the pledge, and I will get you some work." B— promptly took the good advice, signed the pledge and kept it, punctually attended the meetings of the society,—thus keeping his interest alive in the matter,—and has in every respect ever since behaved in an exemplary manner, and promises to be hereafter a sober, industrious and useful man.

In the meantime, his late wife had by great and praiseworthy exertions succeeded in bringing up her children, and placing herself and them in comparatively comfortable circumstances. She heard of his reformation, and, her old affection reviving, sent word to him that she would be glad to see him. He went, and they soon agreed to have the matrimonial knot re-tied; which was done a few weeks since, and he is again in his home, surrounded by smiling faces and happy hearts after years of wretchedness, poverty and suffering, brought on by rum. Another testimony to the virtues of the pledge.—Newark (N. J.) Advertiser.

TO SPIRIT SELLING AND SPIRIT DRINKING CHRISTIANS.

(From the Herald and Journal, a Methodist paper published at Boston, U. S.)

Notwithstanding all that has been said and done during the last twenty years to suppress intemperance, with its attendant evils, there are still some professors of religion among us who both drink and sell intoxicating liquors as a beverage. And I am sorry, very sorry, that there are some among the Methodists who do it. The Methodists are the last people to sell and drink ardent spirits. They are bound above all others, 1st, to do no harm; and 2nd, to do all the good in their power to the souls of men. Can such as drink and sell rum have any adequate sense of the sacredness of their holy profession? Can they be aware of their inconsistency, and the scandal they bring upon the innocent, but bleeding cause of Christ? Do they see they are accessories, lending their influence to aid a cause which has destroyed more happiness, more hopes and more lives, than the sword, pestilence, or famine? And how can they plead ignorance in the midst of such a flood of irresistible light!—in the midst of numberless living, dead and dying witnesses? Impossible! They are—must be, sinning with their eyes wide open. And for what? For money! Yes, for money, Christians, Methodists are leading husbands, wives and children to pauperism, to the grave, and to hell!

Rum sellers stand directly in the way of all reformation. It is impossible to do much effectually and permanently, where the traffic is carried on. They make more drunkards and tipplers than all the lecturers and ministers in the country can cure. And unless something is done to end this soul and body destroying traffic, especially by church members, our youth, and children, and best friends, must still go on being destroyed, one after another, and there is no help for the widow's son.

There is something indescribably melancholy and inharmonious in the idea of a Christian Methodist rum-seller! Is it not as absurd and ridiculous as the idea of a Christian Methodist murderer!

And now, Mr. Editor, what can—what ought to be done in the premises with such Christians—such bad Methodists? Will you oblige us with an answer? We all think out here in the country much of your opinion and counsel in ecclesiastical affairs. In doing a thing, it is important that it be done right, touching time, place, manner and spirit. Would it be too much to advise all rum-drinking and rum-selling professors in general, and Methodists in particular,—

1. To seriously, prayerfully, and in the fear of God their Maker and final Judge, reflect on what they are doing, and on the sordid black motives for which they do it! To look upon it in its bearings in all sorts of happiness, all sorts of useful knowledge, and upon all sorts of human interests, temporal and eternal, and then abandon at once and for ever the foul business, as “earthly, sensual and devilish?” Let them wash their hands clean, and be Christians, what they profess to be, and no longer deceive themselves and others. But 2nd. If after all they are determined, in spite of reason and conscience, in spite of the counsels and character of the Church of Christ, of which they are members, regardless of the tears and sufferings of widows and fatherless children, and in defiance of the authority of both God and man, to drink or sell intoxicating liquors, had they not better by far leave the church forthwith? Never be called again by the name of Christian or Methodist. Never come again to the holy communion until they can get their bread by honest and honourable means, no matter if it be by begging. It is too bad for profane and irreligious men to poison and destroy their fellow-creatures; but for Methodists it is insufferable.

I have been led to make these reflections at this time, (which I have long designed to make,) from the awful and heart-appalling fact, that another of our fellow-beings has just been sent into eternity from the influence of cider and other alcoholic drinks. Immediately on arriving in town, (Hartland, Vermont,) yesterday, I was informed that Mr. Steven Rogers had been stabbed the evening before in the abdomen, and that some six feet of his intestines came out, and that he could not live. The next we heard he was dead. But he died praying for mercy. Our esteemed brother Johnson, stationed preacher, visited him immediately on his receiving his death-wound, and prayed with and for him. Other Christian friends also prayed with and for him. The last he was heard to say was to a brother present, “Pray for me quick; in three minutes I shall know nothing,” and died instantly. The perpetrator is now in Woodstock jail waiting his trial.

Here is a striking mirror into which all rum-sellers, and especially Methodist rum-sellers, can look and see just what manner of persons they are. Here they may see a dependent and confiding wife deprived of an affectionate husband, made a desolate, mourning widow. Here they may see a family of little children made fatherless, and a community robbed of a virtuous citizen. And on whom must fall most heavily the blood and blame of this awful murder, if not on those who furnished the rum and cider? What honest and good man could wish—dare, to stand in the place of such men? Such awful tragedies are liable to take place at all times, and every where intoxicating liquors are sold and drunk. Every man's life, property and peace, are in jeopardy, wherever rum-sellers, drunkards and tiplers live. No one is safe a single day. Any of us may expect to be stabbed in our own house, as this poor man was, or in the street, or in the field, as thousands have been through the same means. I would I had a voice to reach from pole to pole, and around the earth, I would beseech all, and especially all rum-selling Methodists, to leave this soul and body-destroying business. They had better a thousand times have a clear conscience and a joyful heart while they live, and go to heaven at last, though they go as poor as Lazarus, than to hoard up thousands by the unholy traffic, and finally go to be the companion of the rich man in hell for ever.

JUSTIN SPAULDING.

Hartland, Vermont.

At the TRIENNIAL CONVENTION of FREE-WILL BAPTISTS, held at SUTTON VERMONT, United States of America, the following resolutions were unanimously passed. The Rev. Dr. Burns of London was present, as one of the English deputation:—

TEMPERANCE.

39. The committee on Temperance made the following Report, which was adopted.

1. Resolved, That we have cause of sincere gratitude to God for the important change produced in our world by the temperance reform.

2. Whereas intemperance still exists in our country, and threatens to roll the waves of death and ruin over our land, blighting the fairest flowers of earth, filling the world with misery, lamentation and woe, causing broken hearts and bleeding souls, and sending thousands annually to the world of death and dark despair,—Therefore,

Resolved, That the professed minister of Christ who prays for the spread of religion and temperance, and does not totally abstain from the use of distilled and fermented drinks of all kinds, as a beverage, or neglects to lift his warning voice against their use, as such, is recreant to his high and holy calling, opposes his own prayers, and fights against God.

3. Resolved, That the professed Christian who does not wholly abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks of every kind, as a beverage, is aiding the prince of darkness in his diabolical work of destroying the bodies and souls of men, dishonours his Christian character, and walks unworthy of a disciple of the sacrificing and benevolent Jesus.

4. Resolved, That the vendor of intoxicating drinks, as a beverage, is guilty of a most flagrant violation of the rights of man, is deeply implicated in the crimes and sufferings of those who become the victims of alcohol, and his odious traffic merits the scorn and execration of the civilized world.

THE FORTHCOMING ANNIVERSARIES.

By the time our April number will be well circulated through the kingdom, the various religious denominations and benevolent societies will be preparing for their annual gatherings in Exeter Hall. Missions to the perishing heathen, the religious education of the young at home, and the circulation of the Bible to all, will be powerfully and eloquently pleaded. Sympathy for the prejudiced Jew, and for the down-trodden slave will be inculcated. We shall have spirited appeals on the subject of Righteousness, Liberty and Peace. Many good and great men will assemble from every quarter of our nation, and many will be the earnest prayer offered up, that great grace may rest upon them all. We desire to sympathize with every movement identified with the promotion of knowledge, humanity, moral order, or religion; and we unfeignedly wish success to any and to all the philanthropic movements of the day. But is it not worthy of note, that the annual resources of all the benevolent and religious societies holding their meetings during the next few weeks, will be as nothing compared to the constant expenditure of Great Britain and Ireland, in intoxicating drinks. Probably six or seven hundred thousand pounds will be collected for these great and laudable objects; but upwards of fifty-three millions of pounds sterling are annually expended in strong drinks. Thus, there is one idol in Christian Britain more expensive to the nation, than the cost of all the Christian and benevolent institutions we support, by a hundred fold. Neither can there be any doubt, that every religious denomination in Christian Britain, spends more by its own church members, in the moderate use of spirits, wines and beer, than they devote to all christian purposes together. How painfully these truths reflect on the material of which the christian world is composed? And yet there is one thing even worse than all this, and it is the spirit of unconcern with which this state of things is contemplated by the majority of those who profess to love the Lord Jesus Christ and immortal souls.

How surpassing strange that ministers do not discern the dark deep shadows of this picture, and lift up their voice as a trumpet and warn their people. Nay, we have still to go farther, and grieve we do to affirm it, that with many religious and benevolent societies, wine will be extensively handed round, both in the committee-rooms, and at the public dinners connected with their meetings. In many cases, much will be said of the growing evils of the times, while the very worst evil, the intemperance of the nation, will be indirectly sanctioned by the patronage given to the drinking customs of our land. Much will be said of the deficiency of funds and the necessity of self-denial, while the foolish and expensive drinks of the country, will be both purchased and consumed.

Well, before the April and May meetings terminate, the National Temperance Society will also hold its anniversary in Exeter Hall. On Thursday the 25th of May, (D.V.) the friends of sobriety and thorough abstinence from intoxicating drinks will meet, to report progress as to the past, and to avow their resolutions in reference to the future. We cannot yet distinctly state who will be the speakers; but we expect brethren from America, and probably some who have been missionaries to the dying heathen in India. Several of our staunch English, Scotch, and Irish brethren, too, we hope both to see and hear on the occasion. But if self-denial, liberality, and devotedness, to the well-being of men are the grand elements of the speakers in the other institutions, ought they not every one to be with us, to see how easily these elements may be brought into practical and active exemplification. The temperance cause is essentially allied with every good work. Without its influence, the Bible and religious books will be sold or pledged for gin. As usual, the Sabbath scholar will be seduced into the paths of inebriation, and missionaries will have to mourn that the exported alcoholic drinks of Britain, prove the great stumbling-block to the conversion of benighted pagans.

When will the religious public of Britain feel the force of these truisms? Must they not cast out the spirituous demon at home before they expect much success in exorcising by the power of faith, idolatrous demons abroad! Surely the day cannot be far off, when all true christian and benevolent minds must feel, that consistency demands that in caring for the millions abroad, they should not forget the myriads of dying drunkards at home. There is indeed a great and momentous work to be done at home, to stay the tide of death and woe in connexion with the use of intoxicating drinks, and we have no doubt, that while much will be said at the forthcoming anniversary, to distress us, that not a little will be said to cheer us on, in the direct self-denying and benevolent course, so distinctly developed by the Temperance Reformation.

INFLUENCE OF DRINKING CUSTOMS ON THE TEMPORAL AND SPIRITUAL WELFARE OF HEATHEN COUNTRIES.

On Monday, the 27th ultimo, a Temperance Lecture was delivered by the Rev. R. W. Hume, in the American Mission Chapel. The Lecturer has favoured us with the conclusion of his address. To this we would invite the attention, especially of those who desire the moral and spiritual regeneration of this land.

The facts and considerations here presented, constitute a loud call on Philanthropists and Christians to do all in their power to prevent the use of intoxicating drinks, as a beverage, among the people of this country. And more especially are those in any way connected with the Native Christians, called upon to seek the removal of this grievous stumbling-block out of the way of their weaker brethren. This they can in no way do so effectually as by themselves presenting the example of total abstinence.

We have thus considered the connexion between the use of intoxicating drinks and the crime, pauperism and wretchedness of countries nominally Christian. We have also referred to the lamentable spread of intemperance in this country, particularly at the large civil and military stations, and have noticed certain causes which have hitherto exerted a powerful influence in staying the progress of this evil. We have shown that ceaseless and mighty agencies are at work for the removal of these restraints, and that, in all probability, intemperance will hereafter make far greater progress in this country, and work far greater ruin than it has hitherto. But in judging of the effects to be apprehended from the use of intoxicating drinks in this country, were the existing checks to their use wholly removed, it is proper for us to refer, not only to civilized, christianized nations, but also to the experience of unevangelized, heathen lands. And we cannot look over the world and consider the influence which nominal Christians have generally exerted upon those savage and heathen nations with whom they have come in contact, without a mingled feeling of sorrow, and shame, and indignation. That influence has generally been most deplorable, most ruinous. And, while this has not been owing wholly to the introduction of intoxicating drinks, it has doubtless been owing to this in a very considerable degree. Savages, having first adopted the drinking customs of nominal Christians, have thus been prepared to adopt their other vices. It can not be denied, that strong drink has proved the ruin of the North American Indians. Those simple, and in many respects, noble sons of the forest, giving way to a wonderful spirit of infatuation, have ever been ready to sacrifice every thing for rum; and, under the influence of this destroyer, they have vanished away like the morning dew. A few were slain in battle by the whites, and a few in wars among themselves. But tribe after tribe have been wholly exterminated by strong drink and its attendant vices. I myself have seen the miserable remnants of these once numerous and powerful tribes; and, alas! they are still the slaves of drink. As that fell disease, the consumption, gradually, yet surely, preys upon and consumes its victim, until, wholly wasted, he goes down to the grave; so it is with these Indians. A destroyer more fearful than the consumption is consuming them, and soon they must wholly cease to be. Soon the red man will be found only on the page of history.

Many and noble efforts have been put forth by the churches in America to civilize, christianize, and save these Indians. And these efforts have not been wholly vain. But too often, through the agency of strong drink, the brightest hopes have been blasted, and those who bade fair to become a civilized and Christian people, have been plunged into more than their original degradation. Too often, when the missionary, after years of prayerful, patient toil, has gathered a community about him, and begun to see the fruits of his labours, some human demon from among the whites has come and planted a grog-shop in his vicinity. And then the flood-gates of intemperance have been opened, desolation has spread over the rising community, and the church which had been gathered, has been scattered to be gathered no more.

The missionaries of the London Missionary Society landed among the islands of the South Seas in March 1797, and "for a number of years they rejoiced in the signal manifestations of divine favour. Churches were gathered; schools opened; printing presses established; vice, frowned upon by public opinion, was abashed; and the prospect continued to brighten, that Christianity and civilization, and learning, with all their inestimable benefits for the present and future life, would shortly be extended over all that part of the world."

But mark the change. Men bearing the name of Christian, but animated only by the lust of gain, went forth to those islands, bearing with them quantities of strong drink. Numerous grog-shops were established, which, among those simple islanders, did not fail to produce their natural fruit. The march of improvement was arrested, the joy of the missionaries was turned into mourning.

The news of these things excited a painful interest among the friends of temperance and religion throughout the United States. Resolutions expressive of sympathy with the London Missionary Society and the missionaries in the South Seas, as well of abhorrence of the conduct of the authors of these evils, were adopted by a large number of benevolent Societies and ecclesiastical bodies. The following are taken from a series of resolutions adopted on this occasion by the American Temperance Society:—

"Resolved,—That we deeply sympathise with our brethren in the South Seas and in Great Britain, in view of the distresses, which, through the agency of some of our countrymen, have been brought upon them; and deplore the calamities which that agency has inflicted, by obstructing in those islands the progress of the gospel, demoralizing the character of their inhabitants, and destroying, in vast numbers, the lives and souls of men."

"The public press did not fail to lift up its voice on such an occasion. One of the papers speaking of this subject, said, 'For many years, the Society Islands have been quoted in Europe and America as a fine specimen of the happy effects of Christian Missions in elevating the character and improving the condition of a heathen people. With the blessing of God on the labours of the missionaries, the people had abandoned their bloody superstitions, and were advancing rapidly in religion and civilization. But, alas! the demons who deal in rum have alighted on their shores, and all is again one extended scene of moral desolation. No man, we think, can read the account of these things without feeling that the men who send rum from this country, to be sold in the Society Islands, deserve to be ranked with the most depraved of their species.' Another said, 'It is painful thus to see the labours of devoted missionaries, for a series of years, blasted by the introduction and sale of that fiery liquid, which now seems to be rolling round the globe, laying waste all that is fair and lovely. Will merchants in our highly favoured land, who call themselves Christians, not forbear to send liquid poison to the other side of the globe, when they hear of the havoc it is making? Surely, if they will continue this traffic, they know not what they do; and the silver thus acquired 'will eat like a canker,' &c.

Similar sentiments of "abhorrence of these destroyers of all that is excellent, and lovely, and glorious; and of deep regret at the vice, degradation and ruin, which they have occasioned," were general throughout the land. But the pernicious influence of strong drink in the South Sea Islands is not a solitary case. The American Temperance Society justly remarked, "Such are the known and legitimate fruits of this poison in every country in which it is used; and especially among the unevangelized and partially civilized nations and tribes of men. This it is which has hindered the efficacy of the Gospel, and caused vice and wickedness, desolation and death, wherever it has been used, in every country, and among all people, throughout the world. Its constant invariable tendency, is, to increase human wickedness, and to counteract all the merciful designs of Jehovah, and the benevolent efforts of his people, for the salvation of men."

When the Sandwich Islands were discovered by Captain Cook in 1778, the population, as is supposed, amounted to 400,000 or upwards. And now, these Islands do not contain more than one-fourth of this number. Among the causes which have swept away three-fourths of the population in less than 70 years, strong drink stands conspicuous. And had not missionaries gone there, and, by the blessing of God, been successful in staying the progress of intemperance, the nation would doubtless have been soon wholly exterminated. This evil caused the missionaries much anxiety and sorrow. They had to contend not only against the drinking habits which the natives had formed, but also to meet the opposition of men from Christian lands, who, hoping there to wallow without restraint in the mire of moral pollution, naturally wished the natives to be as degraded and polluted as themselves. At one time, when the king had become perfectly sober, and had fully determined on reformation, great efforts were made by some of the foreign residents for the purpose of alluring him back to his former vices. He was invited to dinner-parties in the hope that he might, while the bottles were passing around, be again induced to drink. All other devices having failed, he was invited on board a ship to view some beautiful specimens of goods. Refreshments were offered, but he refused to take the liquors presented, knowing that to do this would bring him again under the power of appetite. Finally, a bottle of cherry brandy was produced, such as he had never seen, and he was told that it would not intoxicate. He tasted; tasted again; requested a bottle to carry on shore; and at sunset was found by the missionaries in the front of his tent, the principal actor in a drunken revel. In a tone of self-condemnation, he exclaimed:—"Why do you come here? You are good men;—You are my friends; but this is the place of the devil; and it is not well for you to be here."

But it is not at missionary stations alone, and among unevangelized nations, that the use of intoxicating drinks forms one of the chief obstacles to the progress of the gospel. On this point, the churches of Britain and America have also had much painful experience. One who had taken much pains to collect the facts bearing on this subject, in America, says:—

"In 135 churches, out of 800 cases of excommunication, 370 were for intemperance;—and of 834 confessions reported from the same churches, intemperance was confessed in 379 cases, besides 56 cases in which the individuals became intemperate soon after their exclusion, or were placed under discipline for indulgence in the same degrading vice. Thus of 1,634 cases of discipline reported, 805 show the appalling power of this sin. But even this statement is far from exhibiting the full extent of the evil: the indirect influence of spirituous liquors must be added, and then the documents bearing on this subject furnish abundant evidence that seven-eighths at least of all the offences requiring discipline in the American churches, for the last twenty or thirty years, have originated directly or indirectly, in the use of strong drink."

And there is much to show that a similar statement might be made of the Christian Church generally. Is not intoxicating drink the curse of the churches in Great Britain?—and does not its use lead to more instances of backsliding, and to more cases of discipline, than all other causes put together?

The Rev. Dr. Poor, of Ceylon, after having been a teetotaler for some fifteen years, says: "On a review of my missionary life, few events occasion more poignant regret, than the deadly example I unconsciously set, in regard to the use of ardent spirits." Like many others, he, for several years, drank in moderation, unconscious of the fearful influence he was exerting upon the natives around him, and particularly, upon the members of the Native Church. One who was in his employ, and in whom he felt much interest, became a sol and a wanderer. In reference to him, he says: "Had I become a teetotaler at an earlier period, this person from a high caste family, the husband of one of the first female converts in our charity boarding school, and the father of several sons, would probably have been saved from the drunkard's grave, if not from the lake of perdition." After nearly thirty years of missionary labour, he states, as the result of his extensive, careful observation among the native Christians of Ceylon and Southern India, "Whenever a native commences the use of intoxicating drinks, I regard him as lost for time and for eternity."

The Madras Christian Instructor, which is conducted by missionaries of various denominations, speaking on this subject in a recent number, commends it to "the careful consideration of all in any way connected with the Native Christians, and who can directly or indirectly (and is not this the case with every one?) do any thing to stem that flood of evil which is fast engulfing the Native Church." I use the very language of these missionaries. They say that something should be done "TO STEM THAT FLOOD OF EVIL WHICH IS FAST ENGLUFGING THE NATIVE CHURCH."

REV. A BARNES ON THE TRAFFIC.

This is in reality the teetotalers book of the political economy of the question, other classes however than economists are addressed. We give the concluding paragraphs of the pamphlet.

Here I close. The path of duty and of safety is plain. These evils may be corrected. A virtuous and an independent people may rise in their majesty and correct them all. I call on all whom I now address to exert their influence in this cause, to abandon all connexion with the traffic, and to become the firm, and warm, and the thorough-going advocates of the temperance reformation. Your country calls you to it. Every man who loves her welfare should pursue no half-way measures, should tread no vacillating course in this great and glorious reformation.

But more especially may I call on young men, and ask their patronage in this cause. For they are in danger, and they are the source of our hopes, and they are our strength. I appeal to them, by their hopes of happiness, by their prospects of long life, by their desire of property and health, by their wish for reputation, and by the fact that, by abstinence, strict abstinence alone, are they safe from the crimes and loathsomeness, and grave of the drunkard. Young men, I beseech you to regard the liberties of your country, the purity of the churches, your own usefulness, and the honour of your family—the feelings of a father, a mother, and a sister. And I conjure you to take this stand by a reference to your own immortal welfare, by a regard to that heaven which a drunkard enters not, and by a fear of that hell, which is his own appropriate eternal home.

Again, I appeal to my fellow-professing Christians—the ministers of religion, the officers and members of the pure church of God. The pulpit should speak in tones deep and solemn, and constant, and reverberating through the land. The watchmen should see eye to eye. Of every officer and member of a church, it should be known where he may be found. We want no vacillating counsels, no time-serving apologies, no coldness, no reluctance, no shrinking back in this cause. Every church of Christ the world over, should be in very deed an organization of pure temperance, under the headship and patronage of Jesus Christ, the friend and the model of purity. Members of the church of God most pure, bear it in mind that intemperance in our land, and the world over, stands in the way of the gospel. It opposes the progress of the reign of Christ in every village and hamlet, in every city, and at every corner of the street. It stands in the way of revivals of religion, and of the glories of the millennial morn. Every drunkard opposes the millennium, every dram-drinker stands in the way of it, every dram-seller stands in the way of it. Let the sentiment be heard and echoed, and re-echoed all along the hills and vales, and streams of the land, that the conversion of a man who habitually uses strong drink is all but hopeless. And let this sentiment be followed up with that other melancholy truth, that the money wasted in this business—now a curse to all nations—may, the money wasted in one year in this land for it, would place a Bible in every family on earth, and establish a school in every village; and that the talent which intemperance consigns each year to infamy and eternal perdition, would be sufficient to bear the gospel over sea and land—to polar snow, and to the sands of a burning sun. The pulpit must speak out: and the press must speak: and you, fellow-Christians, are summoned by the God of purity to take your stand, and cause your influence to be felt.

EXTRACT FROM NOTES OF A DISCOURSE ON THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS TRAINING OF THE YOUNG.

By the Rev. J. C. Warren, Secretary of the New York State Juvenile Temperance Society.

I would now call your attention to another feature of education. It has been my privilege for some years to lecture on temperance, but yet, considering it only in a secondary light, I would not be satisfied if I were not enabled on Sabbath to hold up Christ to my fellow-men. I look on temperance as tending to lead men to him. We are now making systematic efforts to reach every village—to have all to kneel around the family altar, and, at the same time, have their names on the temperance roll, that they may thus be bound together. We have felt more and more need of this, since of late years, boys have been seized on by the emissaries of Satan to make drunkards of them. There must, therefore, be corresponding efforts on the part of the friends of truth. It has been ascertained that in the United States, in the course of forty years, 1,500,000 have fallen into the drunkard's grave. Let any one look back on his companions and he will find that the fairest and most promising of the flock have been swept away by this sin. My heart was pained very lately, to see at a hotel in Albany, a lawyer, who was qualified by his talents to shine at the bar, in a state of drunkenness, leaning against the wall, holding a tumbler in both hands. This was at ten o'clock at night, and, by two o'clock next morning, he was ushered into eternity under the influence of delirium tremens. One of our best clergymen, Dr. Sprague, while visiting the jail, found a man who had been committed for riotous and boisterous noise on the streets. He told him that he had been a pupil of Dr. Chalmers, and had followed him in the same pulpit, "Take my key, he said, and go to my boarding-house and you will find proof of the truth of what I say." It was all true. He was persuaded to sign the pledge, and was taken from prison, and from that day to this, has been faithful to his pledge. At the request of Dr. Sprague he prepared some notes respecting Dr. Chalmers, which were found to be sheets written in a style worthy of the great man himself. Do we err in pressing the claims of temperance when we find such things? Is there not reason for effort? Mr. W. added, he would return home with hope if he could do something towards saving children in this Province. "I would urge on you," said he, "systematic, combined effort—may God bless you—may he enable you to train up your children in his fear, fit them for honour and usefulness on earth, and finally, for glory beyond the skies."

TEMPERANCE SHIPS.—"I returned in an American ship from New York, which had touched at the Island, with flour. This was a temperance ship. I never heard a bad word or oath, or saw any body of men more happy and more contented than those American sailors. They told me that they never felt the want of spirits, that they had met with some fearful storms in their way out, that for two or three days they were without a dry rag to their backs, and working incessantly at the pumps, but that they could work better with coffee than with grog."—From 'A Voyage to Madeira.'

INTEMPERANCE THE GREAT DESTROYER.

The Hon. Judge MARSHALL, of Nova Scotia, said that few men had had such means of observing the evils of drunkenness, and the good of teetotalism, as himself. He had been for many years a barrister in the superior courts of his country, and for fifteen years he had been a judge in them. He had had forty years' experience of the first and great evils of intemperance; and he was prepared to say that the evils of drunkenness in Nova Scotia were equal to anything found in this country. Of eleven murders tried before him, eight had been induced by habits of intemperance; and robberies had been traced to the same source. Every branch of industry had been paralyzed and embarrassed by this evil. He had belonged to the legislature of that country, and he could speak from knowledge gained while a member, that drunkenness paralyzed their trade and commerce, and kept their timber trade and other mercantile branches in a state of apathy, and ruined its merchants, till the abstinence principle obtained, when all revived, and became profitable. He knew practically little of the effect of strong drink upon the trade, commerce, and social condition of England; but he was able from experience to state that in Scotland the moral and social condition of the people had suffered beyond all conception from the appetite of the people for strong drink. These evils had existed in all countries; and in America it was at one time calculated that every 25th man was a drunkard, leaving out of consideration those in the intermediate stages. All experience went to prove that drunkenness was the parent of crime; and this had been declared by all judges, from the days of Lord Hale to the present day. Such would ever be the case; and the statement made the other day, that of 550 prisoners in a Scotch gaol, 490 had been brought there by drunken habits, was not only true of intemperance in Scotland, but was the type of that vice wherever it existed. Moderate drinking led to habits of intoxication. Take, for example, tavern-keepers; fifteen out of every twenty became drunkards; one-half of the professional men became drunkards, if they were ever moderate drinkers; and the result he had arrived at, was that so long as the drinking-customs prevailed, so long would drunkenness obtain. How then, were they to do away with the evil? Some had thought the law was sufficient; he had tried it in hundreds of cases, and he had found that the arm of the law was powerless, so long as drinking-customs existed. Others urged that religion was sufficient; he agreed that the spirit of the gospel was sufficient for the purpose; but christian ministers and christian people fell into the awful mistake, that they could find their way to heaven, and yet indulge in alcoholic liquors. This had been an egregious error; and he contended that total abstinence was the means of helping forward true religion. The drinking-customs were the greatest stumbling-blocks to true religion, and they were removing this stumbling-block out of the way of the progress of truth,—of religion, and the gospel. As to teetotalism having an infidel tendency, it was wholly untrue. With regard to the connexion of drunkenness and crime, he mentioned that in the state in which he resided, there was a population of 14,000, and of these 3,000 were teetotalers; when they remembered that these were nearly all adults, they would see that this was a very large proportion. In that county there was not a single case, at the last term, to come before the judges; in the next county, the case was precisely the same; whereas, in an adjoining county, where the drinking-customs prevailed, the judges could not get through the cause list in ten or twelve days. All this was to be traced to their drinking-customs. Regarding religion as connected with total abstinence, he stated, that within the knowledge of himself, and others on whom he could depend, the conversion of drunkards to teetotalism had led to their conversion to Christianity. But it was not confined to Nova Scotia; in America, testimony on testimony had been given, that the increase of teetotalism had brought with it an increase of religious membership in the several churches. But such a charge was pitiful: he cared not whether it were true that they had infidels amongst them—it was sufficient for him to know that teetotalism did not make them so. It was the end and design of their Creator that we should enjoy the utmost happiness possible on earth,—and the total abstinence principle had the tendency to produce these effects: it improved their minds, their bodies, and their social condition; and it prepared them, not only to enjoy, in the best way, the good things of this world, but to lead them to a brighter hereafter. Expediency might do very well in some cases, but in all questions where morality and religion were concerned, there should be no such thing as expediency, or temporizing. He therefore felt sorry to find great and good men taking this low ground; and he was anxious to prove to them that the use of intoxicating drinks was not defensible upon Christian grounds, or authorized by Scripture. On the contrary, the Scriptures denounce the use of intoxicating drinks; and the wine referred to in the Old Testament was unfermented wine, except in those cases where its use is denounced. So far was this feeling progressing in America, that three Christian churches had resolved not to tolerate in its communion, persons who dealt in intoxicating drinks or used it as a beverage. Thus they saw the churches were being moved in this cause, though unhappily the great body of the clergy in England, Scotland and Ireland were lukewarm on the matter, if they did not even look upon it with distrust and jealousy. In his own colony, the Baptist ministers took a lead in the cause, and the consequence was, that almost all the Baptists in that country were total abstainers. This was the case in the United States of America; and the great progress the temperance cause had made in that country was attributable to the active part taken by their ministers. Mr. J. S. Buckingham, the eminent oriental traveller, expressed his concurrence in the position that the Scriptures of truth did not authorize the use of intoxicating drinks, and added, that he had frequently met with non-intoxicating wines in the Eastern world. The hon. judge concluded by urging that Christ could never have sanctioned the use of a liquor calculated, as intoxicating drinks are, to ruin the temporal and spiritual welfare of God's creatures.—(Cheers.)

GOOD TIMES.—It is worthy of remark, that at the Rotherham Court-House, one Monday lately, Mr. Bland informed the Bench that he had not upon his list a single person for being drunk and disorderly, a circumstance unparalleled for fourteen years. It is evident, the important temperance movement now taking place in Rotherham has exerted a powerful influence in effecting this improvement.—Sheffield Mercury.

Literary Notice.

A Journey beyond the Rocky Mountains, in 1835, 1836 and 1837. By the Rev. SAMUEL PARKER, A.M.

A very excellent People's edition of this American work, has been issued by the Messrs. Chambers, which for cheapness and execution reflects great credit on their literary enterprise. We notice it chiefly on account of its bearings on temperance, to which there are many incidental allusions. Mr. Parker was deputed by the American Board of Missions, to inquire into the practicability of increasing the number of mission stations amongst the Indians, beyond the Rocky Mountains, and on the Columbia River. There is a charming simplicity throughout the work, and its details are valuable in every point of view. The writer infuses his own freshness of spirit into one's heart, and it cheers and animates to see the unsparing lash applied by the agent of a great missionary society to drinking usages which to a great extent neutralize the benefits of all missions to the heathen. It will be seen by these pages that the curse of this Upas has spread across this vast continent, pervades the aboriginal tribes, and revels demoniacally amongst the trappers, hunters, and voyagers of the great fur companies. We proceed to make a few extracts from this most interesting work, cordially recommending it to our readers' notice. It is charming to see the true temperance tone which pervades the whole literature of our western brethren.

Voyaging up the Missouri by steam, an accident happens on the Sabbath to the boilers of the engine. Mr. Parker says—

"From a disregard of any thing but extreme speed, the captain set no bounds to the raising and applying of steam; and as I observed that ardent spirits were lavishly used, I apprehended the worst consequences. Soon the disaster came, but it proved less extensive than I feared, the main shaft broke * * * Our captain remarked at dinner to-day, that most of the accidents which happened to steam boats take place on the Sabbath; and that he did not believe it would be long before they would not run on that day."

"Travelled to-day twenty miles, which brought us beyond the limits of civilization, and into the Indian country . . . Our mode of living from day to day had already necessarily become uniform. Dry bread and bacon constituted our breakfast, dinner, and supper. Our bacon we cooked when we could obtain wood for fire; but when 'out of sight of land,' that is, when nothing but green grass could be seen, we ate our bacon without cooking. A very few of the simplest articles of furniture were sufficient for our culinary purposes. The real wants of life are few, artificial ones are numerous."—pp. 9, 10.

Journeying onward across the Prairies, we read—

"In consequence of the men being drenched with rain, whisky was dealt out freely to keep them from taking cold. Most of them (Mr. Parker travelled with a caravan of the Hudson's Bay Fur Company) became much excited, and one of the men who took an active part in killing Garrig, stabbed a man with full intent to have pierced his heart; but the knife by striking a rib turned aside, and only made a deep flesh wound."—p. 14.

Mr. Parker was only a passenger, and had no power to prevent these scenes.

"A day of indulgence was given to the men, in which they drink as much as they please, and conduct themselves as they may choose. It was as usual found that ardent spirits excited so many evil spirits, that they may be called legion. A Mr. G. shot at a man named Van B., with the full intention to kill him. The ball entered the back, and came out at the side, Van B. exclaimed, I am a dead man! but after a pause said,

No, I am not hurt! G. on this seized a rifle to finish the work, but was prevented by some men who stood by, who took it from him, and fired it into the air. The day of indulgence being passed, a quiet day followed. The exhilaration was followed by consequent relaxation, and the tide of spirits which ran so high yesterday, ebbed to-day proportionably low. The men were seen lounging about in listless idleness, and could scarcely be roused to the business of making repairs and arrangements for the long journey yet before us. The Indians were active, and manifested a disposition to be sociable and kind."—p. 17.

"I was agreeably surprised to see tall young chiefs well dressed in their mode, leading their ladies by the arm. This was not what I expected to see among 'savages.' Though as yet ignorant of religious truth, and unacquainted with the refinements of civilized life, yet in decency and politeness, as well as in many other particulars, they differ widely from those Indians on the frontiers who have had more intercourse with bad white men, and who have had access to whisky."—p. 18.

We detail one more scene of debauchery, and then take our leave of this enterprising missionary.

In the country of the Nez Perce and Flathead Indians, Mr. P. says—

"A few days after our arrival at the place of rendezvous, and when all the mountain men had assembled, another day of indulgence was granted to them, in which all restraint was laid aside. These days are the climax of the hunters' happiness, I will relate an occurrence which took place near evening, as a specimen of mountain life. A hunter who goes technically by the name of the great bully of the mountain, mounted his horse with a loaded rifle, and challenged any Frenchman, American, Spaniard, or Dutchman to fight him in single combat; Kit Carson, an American told him, if he wished to die, he would accept the challenge. Shunar defied him, Carson mounted his horse, and with a loaded pistol rushed into close contact, and both almost at the same instant fired. Carson's ball entered Shunar's hand, came out at the wrist, and passed through the arm above the elbow. Shunar's ball passed over the head of Carson, and while he went for another pistol, Shunar begged that his life might be spared. . . . Their demoralizing influence with the Indians has been lamentable, and they have imposed upon them in all the ways 'that sinful propensities dictate.' It is said, they have sold them packs of cards at high prices, calling them the Bible; and have told them, if they should refuse to give white men wives, God would be angry with them, and punish them eternally; and on almost any occasion when their wishes have been resisted, they have threatened them with the wrath of God.

"Mr. Parker considers this statement to be probably true. Such is the thirst of these hunters for liquor, that Mr. Townsend, an ornithologist, with whom Mr. Parker met, could not even keep the spirits in which his reptiles were preserved, the keg was emptied by a man named Thornberg, who was afterwards shot dead by another, for attempting the forcible abduction of his concubine."—p. 41.

"There are, Mr. Parker says, he believes nine thousand white men in the North and far West, engaged and connected with the fur trade, of which the Hudson's Bay Company is the principal, indeed the monarch, beyond the Rocky Mountains. From privation and excess their average hunter's life is three years."—p. 43.

"We recommend it to the Hudson's Bay Company, to consider well their responsibility towards these men; to discourage by every means the introduction of spirits amongst them. In trading with the Indians it might well be dispensed with. We trust this will meet the eye of the London Governor. Can nothing be done to arrest such horrid exhibitions, and such fearful waste of life. The introduction too of spirits, according to Mr. Parker's showing, and every traveller we remember, is numbering the very days of the Company's existence. Mr. Parker tells us, that such is the unwholesome industry of these hunters, trappers, and Indians, engendered by the expense of their drinking habits, that if the animals continue to diminish for the next thirty years as they have during the last thirty, the Company will probably have to abandon its forts and be here at an end. More northward towards the pole similar accounts are furnished of the scarcity of furs. Now was there not this too ardent pursuit of the furs, were the beaver, &c., permitted in some sort to multiply, the Company need have no such prospect of dissolution. The reckless extravagance and intemperance stimulates the hunters of the Company to exertions beyond their strength, and destructive to the very races of the animals which are their quarry; and we see in all this, but another proof added to the many which demonstrate drunkenness as, destructive to all prosperity, and enterprise, and trade.

Mr. Parker embarked on the Pacific, at Vancouver in the Oregon, and proceeded to the Sandwich Islands, where after visiting the various American Missionary Stations, he returned in safety to his native States, where we wish him all happiness.

Foreign Intelligence.

WEST INDIES.

The temperance cause is progressing most satisfactorily. In England, Ireland, and Scotland: in the East and West Indies, success attends the efforts of temperance advocates. Last month we announced that Government had resolved to discontinue the Canteen system; to-day we have the satisfaction to lay before our readers, intelligence concerning the cause which will fill every philanthropic bosom with delight.

It is not many years since a total abstinence society was formed in the Island of Bermuda. As usual, the friends were few, the enemies numerous; the former laboured, and amidst much opposition the good seed was sown; it took root, and now a rich harvest is being reaped. Under the patronage of Governor Reid, the society circulated large numbers of periodicals, and they found their way into high circles. Those periodicals did their work surely:—converts to total abstinence have been won from the highest rank—Bermuda has attained a point in reference to this cause reached as yet by none of those islands, as the following extracts from the legislative proceedings will show:—

“Mr. Ingham, sen., presented a petition from certain residents of Southampton parish, praying that an Act may be passed that no License for the sale of Spirituous Liquors should be granted in the said parish, without the consent of a majority of the legal voters of the said parish.

“Mr. Washington presented a similar petition.

“The Bill to regulate liquor shops, taverns, and ordinaries, was read a second time and committed.

“Mr. Ingham, sen., in the Chair.

“Mr. Robinson moved that the price of a license for the sale of spirituous liquor be £12.

“Mr. E. Seon moved that it be £20.

“Mr. Higgs moved that it be £30.

“The question being put on Mr. Robinson's motion, it was lost 11 to 15.

“Mr. E. Seon's motion was carried 20 to 6.”

Other resolutions raising the prices of licenses, &c., were then put and carried; also one prohibiting the sale of spirits in grocers' shops, &c., on which the Editor remarks:—

“The clauses prohibiting groceries and other goods from being sold on the premises with spirituous liquors, and regulating the opening of liquor-shops, are admirable. They will tend to stamp the character of the places, and to drive alcoholic beverages into the druggists' shops, to which they properly belong. Then, and not till then, can our efforts be slackened. That the time is approaching we believe, for

“This Babylon the Great must fall,

Its poisonous waters soon must fail,

And Temperance o'er the world prevail.”

A LOVELY TOWN.—In Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, a town lying on the west branch of the Susquehanna, containing 3000 inhabitants there is not a single grog-shop or tavern, where alcoholic liquor is sold.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF A MISSIONARY.

(From the Canada Temperance Advocate.)

“By my repeated visits to the four villages where I preach, I have seen more of the effects of ignorance and heathenism than ever I expected to witness in this—a land of Bibles! And yet, in some of these villages where I have called upon every family, I have found sixty out of every hundred have had neither Bible nor Testament, and very many could not read them if they had them * * * I went into a house at S. H.—, with a tract * * * What a scene presented itself to me when I entered! The house bare of all furniture, the children in rags, the father (unworthy of the name) was lying in a corner in a state of intoxication—his wife, poor creature, was crying. I tried to comfort her in her misery. She told me they had no Bible now, her husband had destroyed it because he believed it all lies. She had been obliged to sell all the furniture to buy food for herself and children; for though her husband could earn 4s. 6d. a day, he spent it all in drink. I left her a tract, and promised to call again. When I did so, I found her husband had seen the tract, ‘What do you get by Gin-drinking?’ He told me he had read the tract, and that he was convinced drinking was wrong, but he was sure there was no truth in religion. I reasoned with him on the subject—induced him and his wife to attend the meeting, and gave him another tract, ‘Believe and be saved.’ The mists of infidelity have by these means been cleared away. He has bought a Bible, and regularly attends our meetings on the Sabbath, and as often as his work will permit in the week.”

A MAN, praising porter, said it was so excellent a beverage that, though taken in great quantities, it always made him fat. “I have seen the time,” said another, “when it has made you LEAN.” “When, I should be glad to know?” said the eulogist. “Why,” no longer since than last night—against a wall?”

SUGAR DESTROYED IN PLACE OF MALT.—The quantity of sugar used in licensed breweries, from the passing of the 10th of Victoria to the 5th of July last, was 3,477,458 lbs.; the quantity used in distilleries was 22,458,240 lbs., which produced 185,165 gallons.—From the Healthian Journal.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY

Will be held (D.V.) in the LARGE ROOM OF EXETER HALL,

On Thursday Evening, May 25th,

AT SIX O'CLOCK.

Further particulars in our next.

We have received notice of an addition of three new Tracts to the very valuable collection of the Ipswich series, under the superintendence of R. D. Alexander, Esq., making an accession of fifteen new Tracts during the present year, each and all of which are of the best kind, and well calculated to serve the cause of Temperance. We would, however, call the especial notice of our friends to the Tract No. 94, by that Venerable and long tried friend of the cause, Archdeacon Jeffreys, which we deem admirably calculated to call the attention of christians of all denominations to the subject of Temperance.—Ed.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

During the past month, three important and influential meetings have been held in the metropolis, presided over on each occasion by members of the Executive Committee; the first in Enon Chapel, Paddington, John Cassell, Esq., in the chair; the second in Fetter Lane Chapel, Holborn, T. B. Scutt, Esq., in the chair; and the third in Jewin Crescent Chapel, Aldersgate-street, G. W. Atwood, Esq., in the chair.

MORAL COURAGE.

This is an excellent virtue, enabling its possessor to achieve deeds of noble daring—it is a constellation of graces; it led the intrepid, generous Howard to explore the cell of the criminal, and to devise means for his comfort; it drew on the holy philanthropic Wilberforce in his work of mercy and labour of love, till he had the satisfaction of seeing the galling chains taken from the hands and legs of the slave, the lash from his back, and his body freed from the yoke of the oppressor. Many others possessed of this noble influence have stood forward when their country's liberty and independence have been threatened, and have wrought wonders. Moral courage is as much needed now in prosecuting any good cause as formerly, and in reference to the great principle we heartily espouse, viz., total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, we feel that a high degree of this virtue is necessary, and must be attained, if we would make progress and free our fellow-creatures from far worse than West India or American slavery,—the slavery of both body and mind. True it is, the inquiry may fairly be put, who is sufficient for these things, who is naturally possessed of this holy principle? We answer none—but let us not be misunderstood—we mean not to say none are naturally bold and energetic, and that too in the cause of humanity. No, but we assert that naturally none are impelled forward from the right and the only enduring motive, 1st, love to God, and springing out of that love, to man as a citizen of this world, but above all as a candidate for eternity. Let us then seek for this grace, it is to be obtained by all who sincerely desire it; if any man lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all liberally, and upbraideth not. Let us never expect to effect a moral regeneration but by moral means. Truth is mighty, yea it is almighty, and must prevail. We have it with us in our crusade against the monster intemperance. Christians, we call upon you, we urge you in the spirit of love and affection to consider this matter; this work emphatically belongs to you; this moral darkness must be dispersed by the bright shining of the light imparted to you for that purpose by the Great Head of his Church, who has solemnly warned you against putting that light under a bushel. This state of moral putrescence can only be reacted upon and made sweet by the holy savour of that salt which you possess, let its influence then be seen and felt. Dare to be singular in this noble enterprize, give all your energies both of body and mind to this God-glorifying cause, that the stumbling-block may be removed, that your weak brother may no longer be offended and stumble through the habits and customs of society, to which you give your sanction and support, that the accursed unclean thing may be entirely removed out of the camp of Israel. "For thus saith the Lord, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel, thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you.—[Ed. N. T. C.

Home Correspondence.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle and Temperance Recorder.

SIR.—It is an adage, almost become an axiom, that example has a more potent influence, and teaches more successfully either for good or evil, weal or woe than precept; hence to track the bright example of the wise, the virtuous, the philanthropic, in a word, the friends of God and man is a pleasing and delightful task. But in our inquiries and observations in reference to the great family of man, it behoves us, also, to point out the course which has, and is daily proving fatal to thousands, so that those who are wise may be warned in due time, and be saved from the same. For the welfare, therefore, of the living and not to disturb the quiet of the dead, is this written.

Amid the baneful effects produced by the great pregnant source of so many evils—strong drink, an awful instance occurred in this village during the early part of the week. J. H., by trade a bricklayer, who for years has been a confirmed drunkard, was, as went on Sunday last, spending the earnings of the week in that which proved his temporal and there is, alas! too great a reason for believing, his eternal bane; for on the Monday morning following he was found dead, having fallen into the river Blackwater, which flows past the lower part of the village, and was there drowned.

To minds familiarly acquainted with the words, that "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven," it is unnecessary to dilate. The sequel can best be supplied by the mind's own imaginings. The father of the deceased, who is an inmate of a Union House, and who attended the funeral of his son, was drunk on the night previous to his son's interment, and also on the same day.

In reference to the funeral, a more melancholy spectacle could not present itself; the remains of the poor unfortunate were borne to the grave unwept, unpitied, and unattended, save by his drunken father, whose pernicious example, most probably, induced to a great degree, so fatal a course of procedure in the son.

A few words in reference to inquests and the burial service. Would it not be wise, would it not have a tendency to aid the laudable efforts of the noble band, who seek through the medium of total abstinence from all intoxicating drink, the reclamation of the drunkard? When there is every evidence to prove, that drunkenness was intimately connected with the cause of death, not only in this case, but in many others, should not the jury return a verdict to that effect? Does not truth demand that they should, that there should be no mincing, no delicacy about the matter? And, then, with such a verdict with what grace could his reverence, he, who above all others should utter truth, and by every means discountenance falsehood, pronounce the solemn words, "In sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life?" Surely it is a matter of solemn moment, and one that commends itself to the serious consideration of all parties.

I cannot find words to utter all my thoughts on the subject, but this in connexion with, alas! too many similar cases, calls upon the friends of abstinence to exert themselves to the utmost in every possible way to crush the monster—drunkenness. Temperance is the Hercules that can and will effect it. Let parents then, who would not have their children partakers of the drunkard's woes, masters,

"WILL YOU ALLOW ME TO SIGN?"—A female came to the missionary's house one day. He being at home, she came in and said,—“Oh, Sir, will you be so kind as to put my name down in your book, for I am sure your society is the only safe one for me!” The request was complied with, and subsequent visits have found her quite firm and comfortable.

TRIUMPH OF TEETOTALISM.

At a delegates' meeting, held lately at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, the report from Newbridge, a village about 6 miles from Newport, contained the following extract:—

"In the year 1840, there were in Newbridge not less than nine sly grog-shops, besides the licensed "Horse and Jockey," nearly 40 persons obtained their living by smuggling, drunkenness and wretchedness abounded, and the Sabbath-day was but little observed.

In 1847, through the determined conduct of a few teetotalers, a great radical change has taken place, all the men have abandoned smuggling, and obtain their living by honest labour. Every sly grog-shop is closed and the "Horse and Jockey" has quitted the field, as drunkenness is now quite unknown, and almost all in the village have signed the pledge; but the best result of the labour bestowed is, that the places for divine worship are so crowded that an increase in their size is imperatively demanded and must be had.

PRESTON.

On Friday evening, February 11th, a respectable and well-attended meeting was held in the School Room belonging to the Friends' New Meeting House, when a First-day (Sabbath) Total Abstinence Society in connexion with that place was established. Mr. H. Bradley, who was for several years the Secretary of the Preston Temperance Society, was called to the chair; and addresses enforcing the necessity of the formation of Total Abstinence Societies in Sabbath-schools and amongst religious bodies were given by Mr. T. Swindlehurst, sen., Mr. T. Swindlehurst, jun., Mr. J. Barnes, Mr. Charnley, Mr. J. Catterall and Mr. Charles Wilson. This new society is the fourth connected with Sabbath-schools that has been formed in Preston within the last eleven months, and it is very likely that similar societies will very shortly be introduced into other Sabbath-schools in the town. We hope the Friends in other towns will imitate their brethren in Preston.

GREENWICH.

We have the pleasure to record another among many gratifying evidences of the indirect influence of temperance principles on various sections of society. Connected with the Literary Institution in this place, is a "discussion class," composed of several of the leading members, and which is kept up with great spirit and general good feeling. On former occasions, this "class" has met together at one of the principal taverns in the town to celebrate the anniversary of its formation, and as (not altogether unusual at such festivities) "the evening's amusement did not bear, as it should, the morning's reflection," some of its members thinking the temporary deprivation of reason there produced not quite consistent with the worship they were professing to pay the "goddess" in their weekly pilgrimage to her shrine, brought the matter fairly and boldly before the "class," and proposed that at their forthcoming anniversary a soiree, at which no intoxicating drinks should be permitted, be given in one of the large rooms of the institution, at which their friends, including wives, sisters, sweethearts, &c., should be invited. This suggestion, after some opposition from a few of the members, was agreed upon, and the "experiment" determined to be made. The soiree took place on Friday evening, January 22nd, and at which the Hon. Secretary of the institution presided, and it is not necessary to say further than that the several gentlemen who were most opposed to such a "tame and slip-slop affair," rose one after the other, and frankly stated before the meeting, that a more delightful and harmonious evening they had never experienced, and were utterly astonished that without the excitement of the wine-bottle so much hilarity could be produced.

About eighty ladies and gentlemen partook of the refreshments provided, consisting of tea and coffee, ham sandwiches, cake, fruit, &c. &c. Several appropriate "sentiments" were given with great ability from the chair, all of which were suitably, and many eloquently, responded to, and the pleasure of the evening further enhanced by vocal harmony, many expressing, at their dispersion, their hope that another entertainment, conducted on such principles, might soon again take place.

FOXES LANE, SHADWELL.

The annual meeting and festival of the above society was held on the 20th of March, upwards of eighty sat down to tea. The public meeting commenced at seven o'clock; Mr. Green opened with singing and prayer. The report was read by the secretary, proving that teetotalism had added several members to the church; the whole of the meetings having been conducted on religious principles, and the society, morally and religiously, had been eminently successful in its operations.

Mr. P. EDWARDS spoke at some length, and was applauded.

Mr. CLARIDGE, the present Secretary of the National Temperance Society, in his truly christian and persuasive address, shewed by incontrovertible truth the goodness of our cause, referring to the strong injunctions laid down in Holy Writ in reference to Aaron and his sons, Samson, John the Baptist, the Apostle Paul and others, that has left a most decided good impression upon the minds of some that are high in the christian church, that we know will do good, and for whose services we are much indebted on this and other occasions.

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., the Chairman, to the delight of a very attentive and large audience, elucidated by powerful argument and correct comparison the evil effects of drink and the great prosperity attending the adoption of teetotalism.

Mr. BURT and others also addressed the meeting, upon the whole this was one of the very best meetings held here.

P. H. LEX, Secretary.

AGENCY.

In this department, Messrs. Whittaker, Hudson, and Inwards, have been most actively engaged during the past month. The accounts received from Mr. Inwards, from February 18 to March 17 inclusive, show that he has been unremitting in his exertions. He has held highly encouraging meetings at Leicester, Derby, Chesterfield, Rotherham, Rowmarsh, Greesborough and Mexborough. We extract the following from the communication forwarded to us by Mr. Inwards:—Tuesday, 15th of February, I visited Leicester. In this town I held six public meetings, and had the pleasure of speaking to about eight thousand persons; nearly one hundred signatures were obtained, and it is confidently believed much good was done. On 22nd and 23rd, two meetings were held at Derby, in the British School, and on both occasions crowded. On 24th, 25th, 26th, and 29th, held meetings at Chesterfield. At Rotherham, I delivered three lectures to crowded assemblies, about 30 signed the pledge. I am now (March 17) at Doncaster, where I have held two meetings. I have never had the pleasure of holding such good meetings as during the last three months. The cause is making decided progress."

Messrs. Hudson and Whittaker have also been very assiduous, having attended as a deputation to the following places:—Royal Mint Street, Princes Street, Uxbridge, Chesham, Hemel Hempstead, Epsom, &c.; at the last place they met with a most cordial reception. Mr. Whittaker has also attended and delivered one or more lectures at Dorking, Epsom, Kingston, Finchley, Lewes and Brighton. Mr. Hudson has also attended meetings at the Rev. Caleb Morris' chapel, Fetter Lane, Brentwood and Walthamstow. Such, however, are only an outline of the many important meetings held by the agents of the society.

CORK TOTAL ABSTINENCE UNION.

Founded, October 20th, 1847.

OPENING ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

That a great many of the evils which afflict this country, are distinctly traceable to one source, the unnatural vice of Intemperance—that the entire disuse of intoxicating liquors is an easy and effectual remedy for those evils—and that Temperance Societies, under the Divine blessing, though hitherto limited in their operations, have already effected a vast amount of good, are propositions so evident that they claim the assent of all the right-thinking and enlightened portion of the community.

In this city, as elsewhere, the indefatigable and praiseworthy exertions of the Rev. Mr. Mathew, and other philanthropists, have done much to diminish the evils of intemperance and to establish habits of sobriety especially amongst that important section of society, comprising the mechanics and labouring classes; but there still remains in our midst, a fearful amount of drunkenness spreading a moral pestilence throughout society.

To aid in cutting off this great source of evil—to work with all of every creed and class who are willing to labour with us in this good cause,—to endeavour to introduce a correct knowledge of our principles and purposes into circles where that knowledge has not yet penetrated—we have felt it to be our duty and privilege to unite in the formation of the Society, the title of which heads this address.

The practice of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors is not opposed to the truths of either of science or of revelation.

It is frightful to contemplate the host of evils attendant upon intemperance. It is melancholy to think of the thousands who annually fall its victims; the many whom it makes widows and orphans, the families whom it pauperises, the numbers, whom it yearly sends to our hospitals, our workhouses, our lunatic asylums, our gaols, our penal colonies, and to the gallows; and never did the attendant evils of intemperance appear more awful than when, in the midst of our late direful visitation, we beheld the good creature of God, which Providence designed as food for man, perverted from its legitimate purpose into a source of innumerable woes, while tens of thousands were perishing of famine.

All classes of the community have a near interest in our efforts, and will be benefited in proportion to the extent of our success.

We affectionately invite the victims of intemperance to seek a cure for that which is a physical as well as a moral disease, by adopting the practice of total abstinence from all that can intoxicate.

We invite the philanthropist to aid us in our efforts to save his and our fellow-men from the most fatal and destructive of vices.

We ask the Political Economist to unite in furthering a reform which will have the certain effect of relieving society from a large amount of taxation, imposed for the repression and punishment of crime, or for the relief of poverty, and from a much larger amount of taxation, self-imposed in the indulgence of pernicious habits.

We request the Physician to use his influence to prevent rather than wait to apply a remedy to a large amount of self-inflicted diseases.

We entreat the Minister of Religion to assist us in removing one of the greatest obstacles which interposes itself as a barrier to the more extended reception of gospel truth.

In this necessarily brief address, we cannot do more than thus succinctly lay before our fellow-citizens a statement of our principles and our purposes; but, as soon as our organization is complete, and our plans are matured, we trust that we shall be able to present to the public, through the press, and from the platform, such facts and arguments as shall have the effect of awakening the consciences of all patriots, philanthropists and christians, to the vast importance of the movement which is now pervading society, reforming evil habits, fostering education, cutting off many diseases, diminishing crime, and making smooth the way for religion.

A KIND ANSWER.—The missionary accompanied Mrs. Carlile to the Sunday School in New Park Street, where he addressed the children; after which stayed their monthly tea and prayer meeting, which being over early, Mrs. C. addressed the teachers present for a short time, prior to going to evening service, when one of the male teachers said, "Dear madam, can you oblige me with a Scripture or Bible proof that God is the author of the temperance movement?" When Mrs. C. says, "Do you believe the temperance reformation is doing any good?" The answer was, "Oh, certainly, madam." When Mrs. C. says very solemnly, "Every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh from the Father of Lights, with whom there is no variableness, nor the shadow of a turn." When he says, "Thank you, ma'am," and he came and signed the pledge.

The number of children who have signed the pledge in the various schools visited, from January 1st, 1847, to February 1st, 1848, are 1334.

DRUNKENNESS AND CRIME.

MR. JUSTICE COLERIDGE ON DRUNKENNESS.—During the recent gaol delivery for Yorkshire, two young men were convicted of a highway robbery. They received excellent characters from several witnesses, and on the night of the robbery it appeared that they, as also the prosecutor, were in a state of intoxication. The jury found them both guilty, but recommended them to mercy on account of their previous good characters, and because they, as well as the prosecutor, were all drunk at the time. His lordship, addressing the prisoners, said, "The jury, on account of your previous good characters, and because all the parties were drunk at the time, have recommended you to mercy. I must say that the first ground is an exceedingly good one; but I think if the jury had considered the mischief and crime that results in this county, as well as in every other part of England, from the use of liquor in excess, they would hardly have considered that that is any extenuation of your offence. True, you would not, perhaps, have committed this offence if you had not been in liquor; but if a man will commit crime when drunk, he should take care not to get drunk. I venture to say, that with much more than half the offences which have been brought before the assize, liquor has had something to do. Liquor has either been the temptation beforehand to robbery, to get something to purchase it; or it is the provocation, under the influence of liquor, that causes them to quarrel, and, perhaps, commit murder; or it is liquor upon which the fruits that have been obtained by robbery are generally spent; and it seems to me that, but for the cases where offences are brought on by the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, the courts of justice might nearly be shut up. I am sure that a great deal more than half the time of criminal courts is taken up in consequence of offences which have something to do with liquor. The first recommendation of the jury I shall take into consideration, but the second I cannot. The laws of this country do not allow drunkenness to be either a justification or extenuation of any offence. The old law said, that if a man killed another man when drunk, he should be hung when sober. It must not be for a moment heard that intoxication is to be anything like an excuse for crime."

MURDER.—GLOUCESTER, March, 8.—The village of Twigworth, near this city, was thrown into a state of no ordinary excitement on Friday last, by a report which spread abroad, that a milkman residing there, named William Hall, had, in a fit of drunken fury, murdered his wife. A crowd soon hastened to the spot, when the report was found to be too true. Those who first arrived found the wretched man himself in a state of stupified horror, gazing at the body of his murdered wife, which lay on the floor of the cottage. His four children were screaming at the spectacle of brutal violence, the meaning of which they scarcely understood. From inquiries then and since made, it appears that Hall had left home early that morning, as was usual, to sell his milk in Gloucester, and that, after he had done so, he spent the whole of the day in various public-houses, returning intoxicated late in the afternoon. His unfortunate wife began to upbraid him with his unfeeling conduct in wasting the money required for the support of his family. High words ensued, and then blows, screams were heard by the neighbours, and hence the alarm which brought so many to the spot. The children stated that their father kicked their mother in the stomach while she was on the ground, and that she made no noise afterwards. An inquest was held on the body yesterday by the district coroner, when these facts appeared in evidence, and a verdict of "Wilful murder" against William Hall was returned by the jury. An unfortunate accident, which may have a fatal termination, resulted from this deplorable affair:—A young man named Hobbs, who rode into Gloucester for a medical man, was thrown from the horse he rode and fractured his skull in the fall. He is now lying dangerously ill.

MANSLAUGHTER BY ALCOHOL.—Read the following, ye lovers of alcoholic liquors. One Monday afternoon lately, James Tibbs called at the house of his friend J. Herbert, of Farthingstone. They drank gin, brandy, and beer together, until reason was drowned. About two o'clock the following morning, Tibbs resolved to return home; and upon making known his intention, Herbert reached a charged double-barrelled gun, and expressed a desire to accompany him a part of his way. But, alas! before the threshold of the outside door was crossed, Herbert declared he would shoot him. He did so, and Tibbs is now no more. Upon questioning Herbert as to what induced him to commit the tragic deed, he replied—"I only did it in a joke." Poor Herbert! the equilibrium of thy mind was destroyed by strong drink; therefore the shedding of thy friend's blood—the acme of crime—appeared unto thee but as a joke. An inquest was held over the body of Tibbs, and a verdict of wilful murder returned against Herbert. Should not the verdict have been—"Manslaughter occasioned by alcoholic excitement?" O, Alcohol! thou foul spirit! again thou hast been accessory to the taking away of human life. If thou hadst not a name, I would call thee DEVIL! Herbert is now incarcerated in Northampton jail. Will he be hung? May God avert it! S. C.

CLOSING OF PUBLIC HOUSES ON SUNDAY.—A public meeting was held on Monday night, in the Wesleyan School-room, Jordan-street, Liverpool, for the purpose of adopting a petition to Parliament, for closing public houses on the Lord's Day. The Rev. W. Elton, of Altrincham, A. Dunlop, Esq., and other gentlemen addressed the meeting. The Rev. P. M'Own occupied the chair. The petition prayed that public houses might be closed from eleven on Saturday night until six on Monday morning. The prayer of the petition was grounded on the facts, that the sale of liquors on the Lord's Day exercises an injurious influence on the morals of the nation; that several persons in the trade have desired to be relieved from business on that day; that the servants employed in the traffic are deprived of the blessings of the Sabbath, whilst no class needs more its sanctifying influences; that the places for the sale of liquors on Sunday prepare a resort for the idle and worthless, who are allured thereby to crime, and that they form one great reason why working men are generally unable to provide education for their children, who are not sent to the Sunday-school, but are taught evil and injurious habits.

WESLEYAN SUNDAY SCHOOL, NOTTING-HILL.—WHAT A LITTLE GIRL CAN DO!—A little girl, the daughter of a reclaimed drunkard, hearing her teacher lament that she could not, for want of funds, give the children of the above Sunday-school breakfast on the morning of Christmas-day, went home and told her parents, who immediately gave her two shillings, and told her to canvass the neighbourhood, and try to raise the amount necessary for the repast. She did so, and obtained twenty shillings, which she took to her teacher. On Christmas morning a good breakfast was provided for the children, and afterwards a vote of thanks, and a simple token of regard, were given to her by the teachers and children for the treat she had provided for them. Our correspondent adds—"I am happy to state that ground has been obtained, and it is in contemplation to build a commodious Wesleyan chapel for this district."

RUM AND MISSIONARIES.

[From the New York Telegraph.]

On Wednesday of last week, the barque Catalpa, sailed from this city, with a number of missionaries, for Smyrna, under the direction of the American board of Foreign Missions. These men of God embarked to carry the gospel to the heathen, to spread truth among the benighted idolaters. A part of the cargo, strange to say, consisted of forty thousand gallons of rum! The Boston Journal very properly remarked, that "thus the Catalpa goes forth to heathen lands like Cato, 'doubly armed,' and may say to the unbelieving Moslems almost in the words of that stoic, 'bane and antidote are both before ye.'" The Journal might also have added, the Tarantou Dew Drop thinks, "this in a moment brings me to an end; but this informs me I shall never die." Rum and the Bible! An instrument of death and an instrument of life! No blame, however, is to be attached to the Board of Missions. We do not suppose, of course, that they had any agency in shipping the rum; they probably knew nothing about it; but the fact is singular and striking. The Christian Missionary and New England rum bound to the same port! Life and death! Excelsior.

PHYSICAL ADVANTAGES OF TEMPERANCE.

The severe attacks of dysentery, and the former indispositions caused by remaining in unwholesome climates, and by exposure to the weather, seem to have made no inroad into my constitution; for although life's index points to sixty-two, I am a stranger to all sexagenarian disabilities, and can mount to the top of a tree with my wonted steadiness and pleasure. As I am confident that I owe this vigorous state of frame to total abstinence from all strong liquors, I would fain say a parting word or two to my young reader on this important subject. If he is determined to walk through life's chequered path with ease to himself, and with satisfaction to those who take an interest in his welfare, he will have every chance in his favour, provided he makes a firm resolution never to run the risk of losing his reason through an act of intemperance; for the preservation of his reason will always insure to him the fulfilment of his resolution, and his resolution will seldom fail to crown his efforts with success. The position of an irrational ass, cropping thistles on the village common, is infinitely more enviable than that of a rational man under the influence of excessive drinking. Instinct teaches the first to avoid the place of danger, whilst intemperance drives the last headlong into the midst of it. To me there is no sight in civilized society more horribly disgusting than that of a human being in a state of intoxication. The good Jesuit who, six-and-forty years ago, advised me never to allow strong liquors to approach my lips, conferred a greater benefit on me than if he had put the mines of Potosi at my immediate disposal. I might fill a large volume with the accounts of miseries and deaths which I could distinctly trace to the pernicious practice of inebriety. I have seen manly strength, and female beauty, and old age itself, in turns under the fatal pressure of this degrading vice. The knave thrives on the follies of the drunkard, and whole families may trace the commencement of their decay to the dire allurements of the public-house.—Autobiography of Charles Waterton, Esq.

We have great pleasure in referring to the fact of Ebenezer Chapel, Denmark Street, Soho, under the pastorate of the Rev. R. B. Isaac, a staunch teetotaler, being opened for the advocacy of the principle, on the third Monday in every month, we wish them great success.—Ed.

PETITIONS TO PARLIAMENT.

We submit the two annexed petitions for the consideration of our readers, the one in connexion with the profanation of the Lord's day is worthy of very grave attention. The British Association are with their usual energy labouring to secure the zealous co-operation of all teetotalers on this subject. A few petitions will produce no effect in the House of Commons, but let every Temperance Society in the United Kingdom move in the matter, all, all move together, and the subject must then meet with respectful attention, and ultimately we hope with complete success.

To the Right Honorable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Petition of the undersigned inhabitants of the town of _____ in the county of _____

SHEWETH,

That intemperance, the prolific source of crime, demoralization, and evil of every kind, prevails to an alarming extent in this kingdom, especially on the Sabbath day.

That intemperance is commensurate with the facilities afforded for obtaining intoxicating liquors; and the lamentable amount of drunkenness prevalent on Sunday is occasioned by licensed victuallers and beer-shop keepers being legally permitted to pursue their ordinary occupations on that day, when the greater leisure of the industrious classes and their recent receipt of wages, lead them to greater excess.

That since the introduction of the Metropolitan Improvement Act in 1839, which enforces the closing of public-houses, from midnight on Saturday until one o'clock in the following afternoon, there has been a decrease in the convictions for drunkenness occurring in London on Sundays, of nearly 50 per cent; and the beneficial results of similar regulations, adopted at Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, justifies the conclusion that such benefit might be made general by the legislature.

That the various and continued efforts made by ministers of the gospel, and by benevolent persons of all parties to diminish the vice of intemperance have been greatly impeded by the Sunday traffic, and will prove in a great degree unsuccessful so long as that traffic remains legalized.

Your Petitioners therefore earnestly pray that your right honorable House will be pleased to enact a law, greatly restricting or entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays.

And your Petitioners will ever pray, &c. &c.

Newport, Monmouth, March 9th, 1848.

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Petition of the undersigned inhabitants of the Borough of Newport and Parish of St. Woods within the said Borough, in the county of Monmouth,

HUMBLY SHEWETH,

That your petitioners are deeply and seriously impressed with the evils inflicted on this neighbourhood and the county at large, by the indiscriminate allowance of licenses for beer-houses.

That in consequence of the facilities at present afforded for obtaining licenses, houses are often over-rated at the request of the tenants, in order to qualify them as beer-house keepers, the rateable value being taken from the assessments.

That it is a lamentable and generally admitted fact, that persons of bad character who have failed in other schemes embark in this business, and draw a number of disreputable acquaintances after them, who pursue a course of vice and depravity, whilst many of the keepers of beer-houses also carry on an illicit trade in exciseable liquor, by which the consumption of spirits is increased to an enormous extent, to the great injury of the fair trader and loss to the revenue, as well as appalling extent of pauperism, wretchedness, and crime; and from the most correct observations, your Petitioners declare that such beer-houses, especially encourages, idle and dissolute habits among the youth of both sexes, operating fearfully in the demoralization of the labouring classes, by affording facilities for criminal practices of all kinds; and besides these great moral evils, it is stated as a fact, supported by statistics, that seven-tenths of all the sickness and accidents which occur, and by which (through the distresses in which they involve whole families) the poor-rates are so greatly increased, originate in intemperance. It is also a melancholy and well ascertained fact, that a large majority of the cases of illness in consequence of which the members of the different benefit clubs declare upon the box, are actually the results of beer-house drunkenness, where too often a spurious and unwholesome drink is chiefly supplied, thus morally and physically sinking the frequenters lower in the scale of degradation, and causing serious and ruinous effects to the funds of the said benevolent and praiseworthy societies.

Your Petitioners, moreover, beg respectfully to direct the attention of your honorable House to the testimony of a large number of physicians and surgeons, including the most eminent practitioners in the empire, which has often been laid before Committees of your honorable House, proving that the use of strong drinks is not at all conducive to the health of working men, but is on the contrary, highly injurious.

Your honorable House is earnestly and with all humility requested to afford the moral benefit to the neighbourhood of Newport, which a legislative Act for the discouragement of beer-house licenses would effect.

And your Petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Upwards of 2000 men and 1000 women were taken off the streets of Aberdeen drunk during the last year! At one time 45 females were huddled together in a small cell in the police-office.

The number of tobacco pipes used in London last year was 364,000 gross, or 52,416,000 pipes.

CONFERENCE of TEMPERANCE ADVOCATES.

It is proposed to hold a Conference of Temperance Advocates, in the Month of September next, at LEICESTER. For the carrying out of this object, a Committee has been appointed, and a Circular to Advocates and Societies issued. The design of the Convention is to afford an opportunity for the ploughers of the ground and the tillers of the soil to spend a week together in fraternal consultation on the History, Prospects and Requirements of the Temperance Movement. The Leicester Society will provide free accommodation for all Advocates who may be invited by the Conference Committee or recommended by Societies. A liberal Subscription has also been commenced towards the necessary expenses. Full particulars will be given in future Advertisements, or should any Advocates or Societies be overlooked in the distribution of the circulars, information will be given in reply to applications addressed to the Secretaries, 26, Granby-street, Leicester.

THE MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE.

WE regret that want of space will oblige us to curtail our observations on this important body, whose sittings were brought to a close on the 14th ultimo. The conference is described by a gentleman who took a prominent part in the proceedings as one of the most paramount in the annals of conventional gatherings. Its numerical strength alone was a sufficient demonstration that strong sympathy is felt by a portion at least, of the ministers of this country, in relation to a cause, which the ministers of Christ, as a body, have not yet openly espoused. The venerable Jay of Bath was unable, from declining age and other causes, to be present; but that his heart is right in this matter, we refer for proof to the valuable testimony which appears in our outline of the proceedings. There, too, it will be evident, that almost every section of the Christian church was represented, there being 180 delegates present, representing the various dissenting bodies, including seven ministers of the Church of England.

It was not, however, from the numerical strength alone, as exhibited at this conference, or from the almost uniform unanimity that prevailed throughout the whole of the sittings, that its chief characteristic is derived, but from the fact, that 180 ministers of religion had been brought together, from different parts of the empire, for the purpose of holding friendly converse on the best means of promoting a scheme akin to that religion whose ministers they are, and whose essence is glory to God, and good will to men. Nor were they there simply in their own individual capacity, as merely expressing their own views and opinions, but they were there to stand in the place, and as the mouth-pieces, of a vast number of the most excellent, pious and devoted teetotalers in the country. We would that the gathering had been larger, that numbers upon whom our eye was fixed had been present, to aid by their counsel, and to add weight by their presence; yet it was, notwithstanding, a conference in some measure worthy of the cause, and such an one, we believe, as could not have been convened seven years ago, and we hail it as the precursor of still greater things. Feeling, no doubt, the full force of the position they were called to occupy, the reverend assembly proceeded to discuss the several resolutions and papers submitted to them, in a spirit of philosophic inquiry and christian charity. Many admirable testimonies were borne to improved health experienced since the abandonment of intoxicating drinks, so that the physical and physiological claims of the cause were not recklessly abandoned. We were bound, however, to look from such a conference for testimonies of a still higher character, and we have not been disappointed. Evidence was tendered of the good that had been effected among the young, and by the formation of Church and Congregational Temperance Societies; while still more blessed fruit was made to appear, in the numbers of those who had been rescued from the error of their way, and who have since been led to become constant attendants of the sanctuary. Thus to have interchanged thoughts and feelings on the progress of a movement so dear to every member of the conference, must add new feet to all, and as each retired to his family, his home and his flock, he must have had a still stronger desire to walk honestly as in the sight of all men, and in this, and every other good work, to "lure to brighter worlds, and lead the way." Doubtless, on retiring to their respective charges, each minister will have called his people together to communicate to them fresh information, and to infuse into them new vigour, so that in every direction may be felt the power and influence of the Manchester Conference.

TEMPERANCE REFORMATION CONFERENCE.

This long looked for conference of ministers of various religious denominations has just been held in Manchester. The object of the meeting was to consider the best means of promoting the temperance reformation: the arrangements connected with the conference were made by a committee of the Manchester Temperance Association, of which Mr. Robert Jones is the honorary secretary. Mr. F. Hopwood of York, was associated along with Mr. Jones in the secretaryship of the conference. The number of reverend gentlemen invited to the meeting comprised all the known pulpit strength of the temperance cause throughout the kingdom, of whom no less than nearly 200 were enabled to obey the invitation of the committee.

The first meeting in connection with the conference was held on Tuesday, in the Lecture Room of the Athenæum. Such of the ministers as had arrived in town were present, and the Rev. Walter Scott, president of Airedale Independent College, Bradford, was unanimously called to preside. The object of this preliminary meeting was shortly explained by Mr. Hopwood to be to make arrangements for the proper conduct of the business of the conference.

WEDNESDAY.

The general business of the conference commenced, and was opened with devotional services. The chair having been taken by Dr. Ritchie, according to previous arrangement, a letter in favour of the movement from the Rev. W. Jay of Bath, was read, and Mr. Hopwood said that he had received 350 letters—all of a cheering character; and he was glad to inform the meeting that it was now quite certain the number of ministers, who were total abstainers, throughout the kingdom, was much greater than was anticipated. He himself had received the names of 1200 such—(hear, hear)—and he was led to believe from subsequent information that in Great Britain and Wales, there were nearly 2000 abstaining ministers. He wished to state these facts, knowing that they would be very cheering to the gentlemen present. Mr. Jay's letter was in the following terms:—

Bath, Percy Place, April 7th, 1848.

To the Secretary of the Manchester Temperance Meeting, to be holden April 12.

DEAR SIR,—I herewith transmit a five-pound note, to be applied towards discharging any expenses arising from your convocation; but from attending it I must be excused: my engagements and age forbid much journeying.

I am within a month of seventy-eight. Fifty-seven of these years I have been pastor in this place, where (though now I have received assistance) I have had hitherto all the duty of the relation to perform alone (as well as extra services abroad, and my labours continue acceptable, and I hope useful. One reason why I mention this, is, because I owe much to the cause which you are pleading. I was a teetotaler before your institution commenced, and have perseveringly adhered to the practice, with few and slight exceptions, and these of a medicinal recommendation, always submitted to with only a half conviction, but resigned with a full one.

I sincerely lament that many of my ministerial brethren, in our several denominations, feel so little interest in this subject, especially as they know, or easily may know,—

First: The immensity of evil of every kind arising from the use of these liquors, and counteracting every means of doing good.

Secondly: That the entire abstraction alone can preserve the mass from the malady and the curse.

Thirdly: That their own example would have an extensive and powerful influence, in their moral admonitions, to sway others, and that influence is a talent for which we are responsible.

Fourthly: That self-denial, for the sake of usefulness, is a species of benevolence the most noble, heroic, and Christian, enforced by Him who said, "If eating meat will make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth;" and, above all, by Him who "pleased not Himself, but, when rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." What! cannot we watch with Him one hour?

Fifthly: That though we cannot, and do not, deem this practice a substitute for religion, it amazingly promotes the temporal welfare of men, personally and socially. And, as to religion, it is a preparation for it, and aids it in numberless ways, which must be obvious to every reflecting mind. I have not time to enlarge. In haste, and wishing you encouragement and success, believe me, dear sir, respectfully yours,

WILLIAM JAY.

The CHAIRMAN then expressed his satisfaction in the holding of such a meeting. It would have the effect, he believed, of wiping away the stigma which had attached to the cause of total abstinence on both sides of the Tweed. His heart was and had been in this cause for many a year.

Rev. WALTER SCOTT, of Airedale College, then rose to move the first resolution, and made a few observations in support of it. He knew the conference did not want any information from him on the subject of total abstinence. It was the happiness of many of them that they did not know from experience the miseries of the drinking-system. His own habit had been just to take such a quantity as he thought was useful to him. He had now, however, for ten years been a total abstainer, and consequently he had the means to enable him to compare his experience previous to and since his giving up the use of intoxicating drinks, and it was his decided opinion, that he had never derived any advantage whatever from their moderate use. In many instances, he believed, their use had been positively injurious to him. Their use might be considered, perhaps, somewhat cheering when at the time a man was entertaining a friend; but there always came after that, sinking and depression, which more than counterbalanced any previous advantage or temporary elevation of spirits. As regarded bodily health and mental power, he would say, from experience, that the moderate use of alcoholic drinks was not beneficial, but otherwise. He was quite agreed in the opinion he had heard expressed by the chairman, that it would be less injurious to a man to be thoroughly intoxicated once a month and a total abstainer for the remainder, than to be every day, to a certain extent, partaking of intoxicating liquors. The speaker then referred to the alienation and declension from religion which the system of indulging in intoxicating drinks produced in many who had had a religious education. No practice was more degrading to human nature, and introduced more moral degradation and misery into society, than that to which the use of intoxicating liquors had given rise. It was the fruitful source of murder, robbery, impurity, and violence, in all its forms. It had been calculated that we might conclude that nine-tenths of the crimes which debase society had been owing to this practice. Three-fourths of the prostitution, and the same proportion of the insanity of the country, were owing to the same cause. These facts called on all the friends of humanity to make efforts for the extinction of the evil. Drunkenness had well been described as the putting of an enemy into one's mouth to steal away the brains. It deprived man of the reason which placed him above the animal creation, deprived him of those rational faculties which enabled man to soar to heaven, and to rise to the view of the glories of the Divine Being, and so made the knowledge of his character bear an influence on the heart. It reduced men to the state of idiots and demoniaes, every glass helping to drag the victim into the hands of his enemies; and when the victory over him was complete, he was deprived of the use of his faculties, robbed of his character, his property, and his peace of conscience; and, unless the grace of God interfered in his behalf, robbed also of his eternal happiness. In every sense the system was one of the greatest enemies of human nature.—(Great applause.) Mr. Scott moved, "That the mischiefs and the miseries arising from the use of intoxicating liquors are of such appalling magnitude, as to call for all the efforts of the friends of humanity for their extinction."

Mr. HARRIS seconded the motion.—Agreed to.

Rev. ROBERT MARTIN, of Heckmondwike, said, the longer he was a teetotaler the more he approved of the principle, and the more convinced of the right and truth of the practice. He cordially supported the resolution put into his hand to propose, as it embraced a sentiment which had always been a great favourite with him, namely, "That science has now demonstrated that intoxicating liquors were not only unnecessary for persons in a state of health, but also contained properties which were essentially injurious to the human system."

Rev. J. SHREWSBURY, Wesleyan minister, seconded the motion. They were all convinced that there was nothing in intoxication which was useful, and not only not useful, but positively injurious. One passage of scripture had been brought to bear to prove the usefulness of these drinks. That was the passage describing the treatment of the man who fell amongst thieves by the good Samaritan, who gave him wine. An excellent illustration, however, he had once heard of the meaning of that passage, by a sea captain, at a meeting in Bradford. The captain was describing the mode he had seen adopted in some parts of Spain to heal wounds, which was nothing else than the application externally of a mixture of wine and oil. This practice may have been the same as that described in the New Testament, and may have been handed down to the countries where it is still adopted from these remote times.

Mr. MATHEWS, of Boston, hoped the conference was not committed to every sentiment uttered by all the speakers. He felt constrained to object to the language of Mr. Martin, as to intoxicating drinks not being a creature of God.

The CHAIRMAN said, the conference, as such, would only be committed by the resolutions and declarations it put forth. The members of conference spoke their individual sentiments, for which they alone were responsible.

Rev. Dr. BURNS said they could not suppose that any member was precluded from contradicting any sentiments uttered by another member with which he did not agree.

The resolution was put and carried unanimously.

Rev. HENRY SOLLY, of Cheltenham, moved the next resolution:—"That entire and universal abstinence from intoxicating liquors is proved to be, in the opinion of this conference, the only effectual remedy for the above evils, and that this conference believes it to be incumbent on christian professors, not only to give up the personal use of them, but also to employ all legitimate means to effect their universal abandonment." This resolution was a very important one, and went at once to answer the unjust and unmeaning cry of infidelity which had been urged against their principle. It was, he thought, the duty of the conference to lay down the grounds on which they were bound to advocate this cause, and the principles which they believed to be the highest and the strongest; and that while they eschewed anything like bigotry and intolerance, they were bound to take up this principle and to act upon it. The christian should take his place on this, and on all practical matters of reformation, and might they not therefore clearly and explicitly lay down, as christian professors, on this question, that they felt themselves bound not only to abandon the use of these drinks, but also to dissuade others from the use of them?—(Hear, hear.) They were there brought together on the common ground of love to God and obedience to the Saviour. He thought that great credit was due to the gentlemen who had been instrumental in calling the conference together. They felt that though they differed on some points and some subjects, they could unite on this question with much good. As christian men whose religion was founded on a sacrifice, they thought that they could put this question before men on the ground of self-sacrifice, and tell the world that, in so putting it, they were simply carrying out the soul and spirit of the christian religion. If the practice of using intoxicating drinks was injurious and dangerous to the individual members of the christian church, it of course would be injurious to the church at large. What they needed to do was to show to men that far more blessed and happier associations could be gathered around the practice of total abstinence, than were believed to be connected with the drinking system. In this case, as in all others, self-sacrifice led to self-blessedness; and they could show that here the sacrifice was one that promoted the individual happiness of those who adopted the principle.

Rev. F. SKINNER, of Blackburn, rejoiced in being one of the ministers present to promote this good cause. If they could convince the christian public that christian ministers generally were in favour of the principle of total abstinence, its progress would be much more rapid than it had been. When he looked on some of those present who had long practised total abstinence, and when he pointed to the chairman, and thought of what he had done in the cause in connexion with other societies, it only showed him what an individual was able to do. The language of the resolution was very strong, but it was just what should come from the conference. Entire and total abstinence was the only remedy. All other remedies had been found to be totally ineffectual. He was not going to say that total abstinence should be put in the room of the gospel, but he did say that it was the means of opening the gospel to the minds of many men who would not otherwise have been brought to a knowledge of it. He related a remarkable instance of this in his own experience. It was seventeen years since he had abandoned the use of spirituous liquors.

Rev. HUGH BURN, of Burslem, read a paper which he had drawn up, and which he was allowed to read as his speech. Its argument went to rebut the charge of infidelity made at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance. The quaintness of the style of reasoning gave rise to no little laughter in the conference.

Rev. Mr. BUCHAN, of Home, justified the interference of the christian church in this matter, on the principle that it had been induced to interfere in behalf of the slave for the breaking of his bonds. They had in the victims of this vicious system a worse kind of slaves than even those, and it was their duty to bring the influence of the gospel to bear upon their fellow-men lying under this bondage.

Rev. Mr. PATTERSON, of Liverpool, advocated the conducting of this movement on christian principles, as the most likely to lead to success. He most cordially approved of the principle, and would carry it out wherever he went.

The proposition was put from the chair, and carried by acclamation.

Rev. R. TABRAHAM, of Clitheroe, moved the next proposition. Thirty-three years ago he became the advocate of total abstinence in a certain way, and for the last twenty years of his life he had been a complete total abstainer, and had advocated the principle from the pulpit and the platform. The movement would still have the benefit of his advocacy, such as it was; but he rejoiced that it had now the benefit of the services of abler and better men than himself. The resolution put into his hands needed no remarks from him, and he would content himself by placing it before the meeting—"That the use of any kind of intoxicating drink, in business, or in social intercourse, but especially at marriages, births, baptisms, and funerals, and at ordinations, and all other meetings of ministers, is a great evil, which has, in multitudes of cases, ensnared the unsuspecting, encouraged dishonest bargains, desecrated and embittered the most endearing relationships and solemn events, and exposed even sacred acts to reproach as well as suspicion, and, therefore, should be religiously avoided by all." It was a very common practice in his part of the country, for parties at auctions to be provided with abundance of drink, by which many were entrapped into giving a much larger price for articles than they were really worth. He had heard of such cases where the excess of price paid by one purchaser would clear the whole expense of the liquor and refreshments. He hoped they would go forth from this conference with renewed zeal in the cause to which they professed to adhere.

Rev. Mr. FRANKLIN, of Coventry, said that both he and his wife had been long pledged teetotalers, and although in the 76th year of his age and the 50th of his ministry, he was able to preach three times every Sunday, and take his week-day amount of labour in the villages in his neighbourhood. The intoxicating drink might gratify the taste for a short time, but in a few minutes the somniferous, or, to use a more vulgar phrase, the "muddling" effect was produced which disabled from all active exertion. He had been subject sometimes to extreme depression of spirits, even to a state approaching to insanity, and when in this state he was visited by a horrible imagination, and during his sleep to dreadful dreams. He had tried the abandonment of the moderate use of fermented liquors he was in the habit of taking as a means of escape from these torments, and the result was an entire absence of these unpleasant sensations, and old as he was, he never felt excessively fatigued. (Hear, hear.) He was even in better spirits than ever, and last Lord's Day he was able to preach three times. They had 800 pledged teetotalers in Coventry, and their meetings were attended by large audiences. He stated his own experience to be that the worst persons to deal with on the question of total abstinence were ministers.—(Hear, hear.) The members, too, of churches, screened themselves in this matter under the example of their ministers. His experience enabled him to say, that nine out of every ten exclusions from their churches was owing to the drinking customs.

Rev. Mr. ROAF, of Wigan, seconded the resolution, and said the meeting would be happy to know that in Canada, in the Independent denomination, there were neither ministers nor students, in either of the provinces, who were not total abstainers. (Applause.) This news had appeared to him, when he first heard it, to be too good to be true; but his brother, who was superintendent of the mission, had since assured him that such was the fact, that there was not a single minister nor student who had not joined the total abstinence cause.

Rev. Mr. ELLIS, a minister from America, said he had lived 24 years in the United States, and during that time he had seen not a few laid under the clods of the valley; but at none of the hundreds of funerals he had been present did he ever see any intoxicating liquors introduced.—(Applause.)

Rev. Dr. BURNS said that this was a most important resolution, as it had reference to ministerial practices. They felt the time had come when the system must be rebuked. He reminded the conference that many ministers were subjected to much persecution in connexion with this thing. He gave an instance in which an ordination service was blazoned forth in the newspapers, with full particulars as to the wines at the dinner being furnished by Mr. So-and-So. What was the result in that case? In less than two years the minister and the deacon (the latter the person who furnished the wines) were both miserable apostates.—(Hear, hear.) He trusted every brother, whether at evangelical alliance, missionary, or ordination services or meetings, would be prepared to deliver his soul on such occasions, and feel it his solemn duty in the presence of God to insist that intoxicating liquors should be banished from such places. How could they expect the presence of the Holy Spirit in such circumstances as they sometimes had heard of in connexion with meetings of this description? He sincerely trusted that they would go from this conference with strength and courage to act in this matter for the cause of Christ, and for the sake of a perishing world.—(Applause.)

Rev. Mr. MUIR, Paisley, mentioned that in addition to the congregational ministers of Canada, as stated by Mr. Roaf, a large number of the Free Church ministers in the colony had given in their adherence to the cause of total abstinence. Dr. Burns had, since he left Scotland, himself signed the pledge, and when he (the speaker) went to Canada, as he expected soon to do, he would carry with him the sympathies of this meeting towards those who had adhered to the principle. The new world seemed in this respect to be giving a pattern and an example to the old.

After observations from the Revs. WALTER SCOTT, STEADMAN, TOWNEND, HANNEY, JACOBS, and SCOTT of Shelley, the resolution was passed unanimously.

The next resolution was moved by Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS, of Ebley, to the following effect:—"That the gift and use of these intoxicating drinks at the election of parochial, municipal, and other officers, and especially at the elections of members of parliament, is calculated to demoralize the British public and to destroy patriotism; to encourage the traffic, and to rivet the fetters, of the licensing system, and to continue the bondage of the nation to those dangerous beverages; and therefore it is a solemn duty of all to shun these public evils." The speaker said that elections were generally exciting occasions, and if ever they were to be conducted properly, christian men must take a greater part in them than they had done hitherto. There was no reason why professing christians should not come forward, and throw moral and religious influence into all public meetings and concerns. The resolution referred to the demoralisation by elections, and the drinking they encouraged. He begged to say that, as far as he had seen, demoralisation had not been confined to the masses of the people. He had seen more of it among the higher classes on these occasions than among the lower classes, and that entirely from the use of intoxicating drinks. He had seen ministers demoralised, and members of churches, and they would never put an end to such scenes until they had put an end to the drinking system.

Rev. F. HOWARTH, Bury, seconded the resolution. He said the man was the best patriot who promoted the virtue of the people. By that they would best cherish the principle of patriotism. The security of a country was not in the amount of its army and navy armaments, but in the dignity, the moral virtue, and the sobriety of its people.—(Applause). If they looked into the state of any religious institution, they would find how much intemperance was doing to undermine their prosperity. Britain was the most drunken nation on the face of the earth, and this unenviable notoriety was maintained solely by the drinking usages of the country. It brought great pain to his mind to notice how important questions were often treated in the House of Commons; the laughter and the ridicule on the most serious matters was truly painful. But what could they expect if the House of Commons were the representative of the beer barrel?—(Hear, hear). He believed the House of Commons would always be the representative of the general average intelligence and morality of the country, and that to raise its character, the character and morals of the people must first be raised. Mr. Howarth then detailed the circumstances connected with Mr. Lawrence Heyworth's being a candidate for Stafford at the last election. He knew his success was certain, if, as his friends told him, he would only consent to treat the electors in the public-houses, as had been the regular custom at elections there. He asked time to think over the matter; his son came upon him in his time of thoughtful reflection, and urged him in the most pressing way to give his sanction to the required condition; but Mr. Heyworth, who had prayerfully thought of the subject, continued firm, and replied to his son's entreaties, "I have thought over the subject deeply and prayerfully, and have come to the determination that I cannot, and will not sanction the giving of anything."—(Great applause).

Rev. Mr. MATHEWS stated how he had struggled to introduce temperance customs into the local bodies of Boston, particularly the board of guardians. At the last general election too they had conducted their canvass of the liberal members on the same principle, much to the gratification of the liberal Member returned.

The resolution was carried.

Rev. Dr. BURNS moved that the recent declaration by the six hundred medical men against the use of intoxicating liquors, should guard the medical profession against the dangerous and too common practice of advising its use, especially to ministers and others whose exhausting duties may generally overtax their physical powers. Dr. Burns said that they owed this declaration to John Dunlop, Esq., the founder of the temperance movement in this country, who was still labouring in this field.

The motion, after some remarks, was carried by acclamation, and the forenoon sederunt was brought to a close.

At the afternoon sederunt, the Rev. WALTER SCOTT presided, and at great length urged the importance of the temperance movement. He had joined the cause from religious motives and for religious objects.

Rev. Mr. SOLLY, of Cheltenham, read an address to members of parliament on the subject of Sunday traffic in intoxicating liquors.

The address was moved by Mr. SHREWSBURY, to which was added an approval of the efforts of the committee of the British Association to obtain the prohibition of Sunday trading in intoxicating liquors; and pledging the conference to promote congregational petitions during the present session, and declaring their resolution to send the address to all Members of Parliament, in order to the furthering of the great object in view.

Mr. D. DAVIDS, of Swansea, seconded the motion. He said the conference should be very careful as to what they asked parliament to do. They had all their objections to parliament legislating in matters of morals; and he only consented to go to parliament on this question, because a premium was given to this particular trade, for the detriment of the morals of the public, which was denied to all other traders whatever. The publican had more liberty, and more privilege, than other classes of traders; but there were circumstances for that state of things, for which he accounted by several things which he had seen going on in his own part of the country.

Rev. Mr. STEADMAN wished to know what were the sanctions which government extended to the publicans to sell on the Sabbath. Was there any compulsion on the publicans to sell on the Sabbath day?

Rev. Mr. M'KERROW said they all knew that the law prohibited the opening of places of business. With regard to the publicans, they had a law which allowed them to open on that day, which was not given to others.

Rev. Mr. STEADMAN replied that the thing wanted by the conference was, then, not so much a withdrawal of countenance as an extension of compulsion, so as to include the publicans as well as other traders.

Dr. RITCHIE related the case, that in Edinburgh more drinking was brought before the magistrates on a Monday morning than during any other day in the week; and the publicans said that if they could not sell on the Lord's day they might as well not be open at all, because they made more than on all the other days of the week put together. His views were clear in favour of the address, and the object it sought to attain.

The CHAIRMAN saw Mr. Steadman's difficulty, that it was against the legislating in regard to religion. He sympathised with that, and hoped the address would put the matter of prohibition more on social than religious grounds.

Mr. LINDSAY, of Perth, said the removal of the prohibition of the publican selling at particular hours would place him on the same footing as any other trade; he would be then amenable to the ordinary law the same as all other kinds of business. It was the one prohibition against selling at particular hours at night and morning, which created the privilege to sell on the Sabbath; and if the prohibition were withdrawn, the privilege would cease at once.

After remarks by the Rev. Dr. Burns, and Mr. Morris, of Morley, Mr. Guthrie, of Kendal, and others, Mr. M'Kerrow, to settle the question, moved that the address should be sent to a committee to revise it and bring it up at a future sitting. This was ultimately agreed to, no action to follow on the subject unless the members could agree, the Rev. Mr. Bardsley, of Burnley, and the Rev. Mr. Morgan, of Bradford, members of the Established Church, being named on it.—Mr. Bardsley said that, while he would not object to anything forming part of the report which interfered with the scruples of dissenters in regard to legislation on religious matters, he would equally object to anything in it in regard to the Sabbath which directly militated against his views and those of the church on that question.

The proposal having been agreed to, the meeting was adjourned.

THURSDAY.

The morning sitting was opened at the usual hour (nine o'clock); the Rev. W. Shrewsbury, of Retford, presiding.

MINISTERIAL TOTAL ABSTINENCE CERTIFICATE.

The business committee brought up a draft of a ministerial certificate to be sent out in the same way, and to much the same effect, as the medical certificate lately issued. The certificate was read by Dr. Burns, and the terms of it gave rise to considerable discussion, particularly in reference to the question of Sabbath profanation, in which Dr. Ritchie, Mr. Steadman, Mr. M'Kerrow, Mr. Buchan, Dr. Burns, and others, took part. Dr. Burns agreed to the addition of certain words having reference to the Sabbath in the body of the certificate, and the motion having been put with this proviso from the chair, was carried by a large majority.

ADDRESS ON TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

Dr. Burns then read the address to the ministers of the United Kingdom. It is an ably-written and powerfully argumentative statement of the evils it deploras, and the benefit to society, morally, socially, educationally, and religiously, that would result from the banishment of the drinking customs of the country.

The Rev. Mr. Bardsley, of Burnley, said it was an admirable document, and his duty in moving it was simple. There was nothing in it that could cause discussion, and he believed that it would be revised, and its wording altered in a few points, which would give it the character of a document issuing from the christian church generally, and addressed to the christian church generally. He wished the conference to avoid all subjects on which useless discussion might be introduced. He came there determined to sacrifice every personal feeling, and to yield on all points of difference not involving his own convictions of truth; and he believed they could discuss the important bearings of this question without reference to any matter now much discussed out of doors. He considered the total abstinence cause second to none in the kingdom—not even to the Sunday school education of the young (cheers); and he rejoiced to think that the moral results of this conference would be permanently visible in the advancement of the cause of temperance. He cordially moved the adoption of the address moved by Dr. Burns.

Mr. Lamb, of Hull, in seconding the motion, gave several particulars of his course in advocating the total abstinence cause.

Mr. Bolton, Dr. Ritchie, Mr. Solly, and others, made some remarks on the wording of the paper, which was at length carried unanimously.

A resolution in favour of congregational societies was then moved by Dr. Ritchie. The motion recommended their institution in all religious societies wherever practicable. If these societies were good for the grown up, they were also good for the young. The young of a congregation, the minister regarded as the hope of his flock, and it was his duty to instil right principles and habits into the minds of the children under him, as well as that they should be educated in the knowledge of the Bible. The Sunday school was a creation to supply the want of family religious education by the parents, and on the same principle total abstinence societies might be immensely beneficial.

Mr. M'Kerrow seconded the motion. His own congregation had had a total abstinence society for five years, he having been from the first convinced that religious influence should be brought to bear on the temperance movement, if any good was to be done, and that a congregational influence should be brought into action for the benefit of those who were the objects of the society's anxiety. He related the circumstances under which his congregational society was brought into existence: not only of the young men in his congregation, but a large proportion of the entire number under his ministry, had most zealously identified themselves with the cause. 175 adult members of the congregation had joined, and were now members of the society. The Juvenile and Sunday School Society, afterwards formed, had now 350 members.—(Applause.) Their chapel was situated in a working class district of the town, and they had pledged no less than 1100 working people in the neighbourhood, who were perhaps not all staunch to the cause, but their branch society numbered 500 pledged members, all consistent total abstainers of the working classes. A second branch society had now 200 members, which made the entire number of members 1225 connected with their congregational society.—(Cheers.) This society was doing much good morally, socially and religiously, and he rejoiced that many had been drawn from the vortex of degradation and ruin by its means.—(Cheers.) The formation of such societies put aside the charge of infidelity which had very uncharitably been brought against them. He gave these details as the result of his experience, to show them what could be done by a united effort in the direction the motive indicated.—(Great applause.)

Mr. Slade, Independent minister, Preston, had established a similar society in his congregation; and although he could not speak of results such as those Mr. M'Kerrow had given, he was happy to think that it promised the best results.

Dr. Burns, Messrs. Shirwell, Slade, Leigh, Towers, Steadman, Bardsley and Hodgson, severally spoke to the motion, which after a few remarks from the chairman, was carried by acclamation.

Mr. Tabraham then read the address to Sunday-school teachers, which he had himself drawn up, after which the forenoon sitting was brought to a close.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

Dr. Burns was in the chair, and took occasion to correct a mistake which evidently existed as to the Evangelical Alliance. Reference had been made oftentimes during the sittings of the conference to the fact, that the total abstinence movement had been supposed to be connected with infidelity, and that charges to that effect had come from high authority. Particular reference had been made to the meeting of the Alliance held in Edinburgh last June. He was present, and heard all that occurred. At previous meetings of the Alliance it had been arranged that certain important topics should be taken into consideration by the committees in Scotland, in the north of England, and in London. The Committee in Scotland was to engage and employ itself in obtaining information upon the subject of infidelity. Mr. Bickersteth was deputed to get all the information he could upon this subject, and at that meeting read his report. It went on to say that he had thought it desirable to obtain all the information he could on the connection of infidelity with the literature and the sciences of the day, and also with reference to its connection with benevolent institutions and teetotalism. As soon as Mr. Bickersteth had finished his report, he (the chairman) expressed himself as exceedingly anxious that teetotalism should not appear upon the report. Mr. Bickersteth's school-room was open to teetotal lecturers; he (the chairman) had lectured there himself, and, moreover, a practical teetotaler and subscriber to the temperance society, and, on his (the chairman's) recommendation, Mr. Bickersteth at once agreed to the suggestion. But that was how the impression had got abroad, and it had been suggested to him that it was necessary to disabuse the minds of those who certainly entertained some misconceptions upon the subject.—(Applause.)

The discussion upon the essay read in the meeting then commenced. Mr. M'Dowall, Mr. Shrewsbury, Mr. Watson, Mr. Steadman, Mr. B. Parsons (Ebley), Mr. D. Davis (Swansea), Mr. H. Burn, Mr. Francis Bishop (Liverpool), took part in it, and ultimately a resolution was come to, that the address should be adopted, printed and circulated throughout the Kingdom.—It was then proposed by the chairman that the brethren individually should state the progress of the teetotal movement in their own immediate localities, and it was agreed that five minutes only should be allowed to each speaker. The suggestion was at once acted upon, and much gratifying and valuable information was communicated by Mr. Winterbottom, Barton-upon-Hull; Mr. Robert Parks, Leicester; Mr. Lindsay, Perth; Mr. Harley, Whitby; Mr. Guthrie, Kent; Mr. Scott, Glasgow; Mr. Howarth, Bury; Mr. Towers, Edinburgh; Mr. E. Davis, Haverford West; Mr. Davis, Swansea; and Mr. Ellis, Methodist Episcopal minister, of the State of New York. In corroboration of the latter gentleman's remarks, the chairman observing that during a three months' tour in the United States, he had only been in company with one minister who partook of intoxicating drink, and he was newly imported from this country.

The conference terminated at five o'clock.

FRIDAY.

Mr. SHINWELL, of Monkwearmouth, was in the chair. After the usual devotional services, Mr. PARSONS, of Ebley, read a paper to the vendors of intoxicating drinks. The paper gave rise to a short discussion, in the course of which Mr. EDWARDS, seconded by Mr. WATSON, moved that the paper should also contain some reference to the wholesale vendors of these drinks, as they did not come so much in contact with the many evil features of the system.

The motion was unanimously adopted.

Mr. STEADMAN moved "that the members of conference are unanimously of opinion that the Sabbath traffic in intoxicating drinks is productive of a great and incalculable amount of evil, and that of a greatly aggravated nature; and strongly sympathise with the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance, in their aim to obtain the cessation of the traffic in these liquors on every day, and especially on the Lord's day,—that day affording greater facilities for intemperance than any other day; and urge upon the total abstainer to follow that course of procedure for the attainment of this end which his conscience dictates." Mr. Steadman said his resolution had been adopted after a very friendly discussion, to avoid the debatable points to which the question had on a former occasion given rise.

After some discussion, the motion was carried, Mr. Stansfield, of Oldham, objecting.

Mr. PARSONS moved, and Mr. Priestly seconded a motion, "That the meeting have learned that many members of the society have been induced to abandon our principles from the injudicious advice of medical men, and therefore deems it of great importance that all their friends, and ministerial brethren especially, should make themselves well acquainted with the physiological arguments in favour of temperance, that they may preserve themselves and protect others from the seductive influence of science (falsely so called), and would particularly recommend to their attention the medical testimony above alluded to."

Mr. William Jones, Oldham, supported the motion, as did Mr. Farmer, of Romsey, and Mr. Owen, of Swansea—Carried.

Mr. PARKS, Leicester, moved a resolution, urging on ladies the necessity of refraining from offering intoxicating drinks by way of hospitality.—Seconded by Mr. SAMUEL ANTLIFFE, of Rotherham, and agreed to.

After a discussion regarding the publication of the report,

Mr. M'DOWALL, Alloa, moved a cordial vote of thanks to those members of families who had so kindly entertained the members of conference. Many of them, he believed, had formed friendships which would continue through life.—Mr. WATSON seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. M'KERROW moved votes of thanks to Mr. Solly, Mr. Shrewsbury, and Mr. Priestly, for their papers, which had been committed to the publication committee. Mr. GUTTERIDGE seconded the resolution.—Agreed to.

Mr. M'KERROW at some length condemned the practice of obtaining commercial orders, which prevailed largely in Manchester, by treating parties who were connected with the establishments with which they wished to do business. These practices were extremely demoralising to the young men connected with many of their manufacturing establishments, and often led to that deterioration of character which made them lose their situations, and cast them upon the world, ruined in their character and prospects.

Other gentlemen gave instances of the evil effects of drinking in connexion with business, especially in the case of parties seeking orders for commercial and manufacturing houses. The matter was ultimately referred to a small committee, and a motion on the subject was afterwards agreed to.

After passing several other resolutions, and completing the business matters which remained to be disposed of, the conference was dissolved.

A Soiree and several Public Meetings were held in connexion with the Conference, an account of which, press of matter obliges us to withhold. ED.

(To the Committee of the National Temperance Society.)

GENTLEMEN,—I beg to hand you a brief account of the meetings I have attended during the last three months, which are additional to those I have attended, in company with my friend and colleague, Mr. Thomas Hudson, of which he reported. I have preached two sermons; attended a tea and public meeting on behalf of the Dunstable Temperance Society, a large tea and public meeting on behalf of the Tunbridge Wells Society; a concert, tea and triumphant meeting on behalf of the Cheltenham Society. The meetings were suitably addressed, (I was not the only speaker) sensibly affected, and highly satisfactory in their results. I have also attended two meetings at Tottenham, one at Epsom, two at Kingston, one at Dorking, three at Finchley, and one at Woolwich. At Tottenham, things are looking well; we have got a good society, a capital hall to lecture in, and a number of striking proofs of the efficacy of our principles. Epsom is a new society, commenced under favourable circumstances, respectably supported, and the advocate affectionately received. Kingston, the Town Hall has been granted by the mayor, who is a teetotaler, the meetings well attended and peaceably conducted—we have evidences of good, and a few burning and shining lights. Dorking, a small meeting, a quiet society, silently progressing, a number of nice young men leaning upon and guided by those of grey years. Woolwich, mild, warm and working; there had been a dead calm for some time, then came the gentle breeze, the sails were spread, the vessel put in motion, and now I am told, there is a strong wind from the north, and they are making most decided progress. Rocks and quicksands beset their path, but by prudence and forethought Woolwich may be guided into the haven of temperance. Finchley never stood better in matters of temperance than at this time; we have the countenance of the Rev. Mr. Berch and his deacons, with several other parties of great influence in the neighbourhood. I have been much pleased, profited and blessed, at the three meetings held. In Finchley we have living epistles seen and read of all men. I have made two journeys into Sussex, and held meetings at Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings. The Town Hall at Brighton was engaged for two meetings. I was favoured with large companies, and a goodly number of signatures. In my calls amongst the benevolent I was well received and liberally supported. Lewes was visited, by invitation from my friend B. Godlee, Esq., and three lectures given in the hall of the Mechanics' Institute. The first to the members of the institute; the second, to the children in the different schools; and the third, to the public generally; the whole of the meetings were largely attended, and gave evidence of the onward progress of the cause. The fact of a mechanics' institute, and one of the best managed and most prosperous I have come in contact with, receiving a lecture, betokens good, as also does a number of public and private schools assembling together in the middle of the day. At Hastings, we had a small meeting, but we have a few good men and true, and I hope shortly to visit them again. Early in May we hope to have the battle of Hastings over again.

"Cannon balls may aid the truth,
But thought's a weapon stronger,
We'll win our battle by its aid,
Wait a little longer."

By invitation from the Uxbridge Society, I have spent a week in that neighbourhood, holding meetings at Denham, Rislip, Ickenham, and Colnbrook. Since which, I have, in company with Mr. Hudson, attended meetings at Hertford and Tewin. I have also attended two meetings at Sheerness, besides a few meetings in London; the committee will perceive I have been doing the work of a temperance advocate, and I am still strong to labour. In reviewing the past three months, I may say we have not the bursts of excitement we were accustomed to witness some years ago, but we have a calm and sober hearing, and temperance truths take a firmer hold and make a more enduring impression than ever they have done in my experience. We cannot boast of teetotal communities as can America, nor produce national blessing to compare with Ireland, but we can point to a foundation laid, broad and sure. The judgment of John Bull is before his practice in this particular; and though slow in his movements, he is giving outward and visible signs, "That the welcome light hath broken." Parliament is about empowering magistrates to hold their sessions away from public-houses, that persons attending them, may no longer be placed in the way of temptation. Baron Alderson and Justice Coleridge, from the bench, are entreating young men if they wish to be preserved from future crime, to shun the public house, and by all the solemn realities of eternity, beseeching them to guard against the maddening influence of intoxicating liquors. The Rev. S. Clay, the worthy and devoted chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, has again, in his annual report shown, that public-houses pollute the people, and that drink, ignorance, and crime are almost inseparable. Numbers of clergymen, magistrates, military and naval officers, with whom I have come in contact, have a settled and decided conviction, that the reformation proposed by our society is essential to the well-being of the nation. These facts, with many more of the same description, which might be named, prove, that though the British lion has for some time past, been asleep on this momentous question, he is now beginning to shake off his slumbers and awake to the attack of the foe. And when once the enemy is fairly before him, he will in all his might and majesty, as in the case of foreign slavery, arise and with one lash of his tail lay the monster in the dust. At least so thinks yours faithfully, T. WHITTAKER.

DEVON.

EXTRACT FROM MR. GAWTHORP'S JOURNAL.

On the first of September last, I commenced a six months' engagement in Devon, under the management of the Bristol and Somerset Temperance Association. The special objects for which I visited the county were, first, to deliver lectures on the great truths of our hallowed cause; and second, to organize the several societies into a County Association. These objects have been accomplished, and another temperance advocate has succeeded me in my work. On my arrival I found that in many parts of the county nothing was doing to promote this good work; but now the friends generally are in active association, aiding by their efforts "the good time coming." There has been a great deal of good done by the movement in this lovely county; a great deal more, however, remains to be done before intemperance ceases to exist. There is great need everywhere for active and persevering labours to help to pull down the strongholds of the drinking system.

MR. JABEZ INWARDS.

"During the last fortnight," says Mr. Inwards, "I have held two meetings at Goole, two at Selby, two at Darlington, and four at Sheffield. All have been well attended, eight have been crowded, and a goodly number of signatures have been obtained. In Sheffield the meetings were of a highly interesting nature, the Town Hall was crowded to overflowing, and one of the lectures was reported verbatim in the Sheffield Mercury. My soul has been many times cheered at the progress of the cause. Meetings have only to be announced, and the places are generally full. It is not now as it was ten years ago; then we were despised, now we are respected; then our difficulties were great, now they are comparatively small; then teetotalism was considered a futile scheme, now it is recognized as a practical boon; and temperance reformers may congratulate themselves amid all the confusion of these revolutionary times, that the tendency of their principles can only be the moral, social and intellectual elevation of man."

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.—HAMPSTEAD ROAD.

Thursday the 6th inst., a very respectable tea party and public meeting was held in the school room, Henry-street. Mr. T. Hudson, one of the agents of the National Society, presided. In his opening speech, Mr. H. effectively engaged the attention of an interesting audience for upwards of half an hour, in his best style of advocacy. His lively beginning was succeeded by Messrs. Gill, Capon, and Higgins, three home missionaries, whose remarks were suitable and impressive, and were followed by Mr. Roberts, who judiciously introduced some startling statistics, to the surprise of some and the gratification of others present. The remainder of the evening was occupied by Messrs. Whittaker and Spriggs, the former eliciting frequent and well merited applause by the aptness of illustration, and the power of argument. The above meeting is deserving of peculiar and lengthened notice did space permit. The company consisted, principally of respectable, serious persons, evidently prepared and willing to receive information, and whose earnest attention plainly indicated their deep and decided sympathy with the subject of teetotalism. If signatures to the pledge are to be taken as evidence of efficient, successful advocacy, it was strikingly evinced by numbers crowding to sign when we left the room, and for some time previous.

W. S.

SOHO.

A meeting was held in Ebenezer chapel, Soho, on Monday the 17th of April; the chair was occupied by the Rev. R. B. Isaac (minister of the chapel) and an address was delivered by Mr. W. Claridge of the National Society.

TOTTENHAM.

The last of a series of public meetings was held at Tottenham, in the New Lecture Hall, on Tuesday, the 4th of April; Mr. Henry Cove occupied the chair. The meeting was addressed at considerable length, and to the great satisfaction of the auditory, by Messrs. Hudson and Whittaker, who attended as a deputation from the National Society.

NORTHAMPTON.

(From the Weekly Journal.)

Dr. Carr lectured at this place to good and delighted audiences on the evenings of Thursday, Friday and Saturday, March 30th and 31st, and April 1st. In prosecuting his tour through Hants, Dorset, and other parts, he has met with great success; his faithful exposition of true temperance principles has won over numbers to our side.

GUERNSEY.

Some very effective meetings have recently been held in this Island, by the Revs. W. Wild and S. Spurgeon. Mrs. Stamp, also, has recently given several very telling lectures, and at the close of her engagement, was presented by Dr. Collenette, in the name of the friends of temperance, with a handsome testimonial.

SELBY.

Our highly talented and much respected friend, Mr. Jabez Inwards, has again visited the town of Selby, and delivered two very popular and interesting lectures on the Trial of Alcohol, in our large public room, Park-street, to the most respectable and overwhelming assemblies.

We need not say that the lectures, which occupied about two hours and a half each in the delivery, were listened to with the most profound attention. Hundreds were obliged to leave for want of room. Mr. Inwards, as a lecturer, ranks high in the esteem of his Selby friends, and we earnestly hope that societies will avail themselves of his valuable services throughout the entire length and breadth of the land.

The cause of temperance is making rapid strides in Selby. Every fourth man, woman, and child, is a teetotaler. Things are quite altered. It is no longer respectable for men to smoke and drink away their brains, their property, their lives, and their all. May the Author of all good still send prosperity.

A. B. HOOVER, Secretary.

HASTINGS.

On Tuesday Evening, March 21st, we were favoured with a lecture from Mr. Thomas Whittaker, who did justice to the principles in a powerful and convincing speech; at the close of which, four persons signed the pledge.

MATRICIDE.

We read that the Spartan laws, as instituted by Draco, were of so stringent a character as to defeat their intended object, since he inflicted death on all crimes, small or great, without exception. These laws, said to have been written not in ink but in blood, received considerable improvement by the milder and more humane administration of Solon, who repealed the whole of the laws of the former legislator, with exception of those against murder. It is remarkable, however, that against one particular kind of murder there is no record; "for," says the historian, "against the crime of Parricide he made no law, supposing it could never exist in society."

Of MATRICIDE we have no distinct mention; it is presumable, therefore, that no child in the Spartan States was considered so far sunk in brutality as to commit so unnatural a crime on either of his parents, and that the law relating to the murder of the father, applied also in the case of the mother. The exalted opinions entertained by Solon of the virtues of his countrymen would certainly have undergone considerable change, had his subjects been transferred to the baneful influences of those drinks which have proved the curse of England, and the civilized world. The annals of crime are replete with the most bloody recitals. Yet intoxicating liquors are still vended, still drunk, and still stimulate to the committal of murder, and other crimes of blackest hue. How far the following case may be considered the result of strong drink, or whether the murderer himself was at the time under the effects of alcoholic excitement, does not appear from the evidence. Whether the guilty murderer was himself a victim of drink, or whether he was tempted in an evil moment to imbrue his hands in the blood of his aged mother, being exasperated on finding her intoxicated; of this we are certain, the example set by the mother must have been most injurious to the morals of her child, and may serve to throw some light on the following case of matricide, while the case itself, as reported in the daily papers, will serve as a warning to all drinkers of intoxicating liquors.

GUILDFORD—MURDER OF A MOTHER BY HER SON.—This day William Harris was brought up for final examination, charged with having murdered Jane Harris, his mother. From the evidence of Thomas Rignold, it appeared that on Saturday, the 25th ultimo, about 10 o'clock at night, he went to Davis's Lime Kilns to sleep; after being there about half an hour, the prisoner's mother came, as well as three other persons, named Stevens, Ward and Hawkins. The deceased had been drinking a little, but she was perfectly conscious and able to take care of herself (?). She sat down at the side of Ward, with whom she entered into conversation, when the prisoner came up and in an authoritative manner demanded to know what she was talking about. She refused to tell him, when he ordered her home directly. She, however, refused to go, and said she should stop as long as she pleased. On hearing this, the prisoner gave her a violent blow on the face with his clenched fist, which knocked her down on her back. He afterwards swore at her, then placed his arms round her waist, and dragged her to and fro in the kiln. He then lifted her up, and threw her several times down on her stomach with great violence. Having so ill-used his parent that she became insensible, he gave her another blow, and left her on the ground, saying, as he went away, "You d— old — I have a good mind to throw you on the fire and settle your hash." The poor creature was left lying on the ground during the whole of the night, and at day-light she was found bleeding from the face and temples, and unable to utter one word. She was placed in a cart and conveyed to an out-house hard by, but was eventually removed to the Union-house. Mr. James Steadman, surgeon, did all that was possible for the unfortunate woman, but without success, and she died from the effect of the prisoner's savage conduct. In answer to the bench, the witness said, he did not interfere to prevent the prisoner from murdering his mother, as no one else would. The prisoner was fully committed for the capital offence.

THE BOTTLE.—Another of the melancholy and fatal results of intemperance, occurred on the South Devon Railway, on Saturday night, between Exeter and Starcross. A young man by the name of Mathews, a greaser of the Atmospheric Tubes, doing night duty was run over by the nine o'clock up-train, and killed on the spot. From information the writer obtained on the line yesterday, the young man had been drinking the Saturday afternoon, and went to work at six o'clock, and at the time he lost his life, was lying across the rail with his head on the pipe. The loss of life is an awful thing—but where is the soul?

THE OPENING OF A GIN PALACE.—On Saturday, April 1st, a gin palace recently fitted up by one of the leading Wesleyans in Howden, (who is likewise a common brewer,) was opened; and as might be expected, drunkenness, midnight revelry, and Sabbath desecration was the result. On Wednesday evening, a dance was given; I am glad to say, but very few were found simple enough to be duped; however, those who did attend, were kept dancing, drinking, &c., till five the next morning. On the Saturday evening following, between ten and eleven o'clock, the neighbourhood was greatly disturbed by two men, who were turned out of the said gin palace in a state of intoxication; one of them in a fit of desperation which lasted about fifteen minutes, struck every body who came in his way. When the delirium subsided he fell down in a state of insensibility, and in that state was carefully placed by the police on a butcher's hand-barrow, and removed to the lock-up.

NO TIME TO WASTE THE BOUNTIES OF PROVIDENCE.

The General Central Relief Committee of Ireland, of which the Duke of Leinster is a member, have agreed to their first annual report, which contains statistics of the highest importance. In the balance sheet the Committee show the distribution of about £62,000, among the most destitute districts in Ireland. The report says, "The Committee have been furnished with returns from 580 parishes, authenticated by the signature of the parochial clergy, in reply to query sheets issued by them in the months of September and October, 1847. These state that 35,166 individuals died of actual starvation since the famine commenced; that 94,007 died from diseases produced by bad and insufficient food; and that 58,340 were at the date of the returns labouring under disease.

The number who had emigrated from the commencement of the famine, up to the 25th of September, 1847, is stated to have amounted in these 580 parishes to 62,756. If it be taken into the account, that these returns do not include more than a third part of Ireland, [some idea may be formed of the extent of the calamity that has befallen this country, when notwithstanding all the exertions of the government, assisted by numerous benevolent societies, both in England and in Ireland, and by the great sacrifice and exertions made by individuals, so many human beings have been swept away]"—Leeds Mercury, March 25, 1848.

The use of stimulating liquors is often the cause and always the concomitant of crime.—Sir Thomas Powell Buxton.

For the improvement of the debtor you should labour, because the grand causes of debt are sickness, idleness, or intemperance:—You must therefore provide against its recurrence by those measures which may secure the health, the industry, and the sobriety of your prisoners.—Ibid, Prison Discipline, 1818.

WHAT CAN BE THE REASON!—In a Silk factory with which we are acquainted, employing about 400 hands, it is observed that the workmen drink more water on Monday morning than on any other day in the week.

A POLICEMAN'S TESTIMONY.—Mr. Henry Cotter, Inspector of Police for the district of Hemel Hempstead, has been in not fewer than eleven fighting rows, on a Sunday morning, in the parish of St. Giles, while acting as a sergeant in the Metropolitan force; but, neither before his promotion, nor since, has he ever had occasion to lock up a teetotaler, charged with an offence against the law. Mr. Cotter is secretary of the Hemel Hempstead Temperance Society.

OPINION OF OUR ANCESTORS.—In this reign (Edward 2nd) there was the most terrible earthquake that had ever been felt in England, and a dreadful famine which lasted three years, and destroyed a vast number of people. During this time the brewing of any sort of beer was prohibited on pain of death, that the corn which used to be consumed that way might be applied to the making of bread.—Barclay's English Dictionary.

EVIL HABITS.

Let never man be bold enough to say,
Thus, and no further shall my passion stray;
The first crime past, compels us into more,
And guilt grows faté that was but choice before.
—Athelwold.

THE REVENUE.

It is customary for Chancellors of the Exchequer to estimate, with as much nicety as may be, the amount of revenue to be derived during the ensuing year from the various sources whence it is derivable; and it is well known that they look to the consumption of intoxicating liquors as indicative of our national prosperity. The Budget introduced into the House of Commons on the 18th of February, by Lord John Russell, shows a deficiency, up to January 5, 1848, of £1,562,028 on the following items:—

	INCREASE.
Molasses		£31,452
Sugar		540,091
RUM		71,714
Butter		16,921
Cheese		7,179
TOBACCO		111,620

Total increase £778,974

On the other hand, there is a decrease in the following items:—

Suspension of Corn duties	£705,890
" Timber duties	143,751
Wine	132,361
Malt	664,000
Spirits	695,000

Total decrease £2,341,002

Net decrease, £1,562,028, of which £1,491,361 are upon Malt, Wines and Spirits.

On these items the Premier remarked, "This decrease is undoubtedly the result of the failure of the Barley crops, of the general distress which has prevailed, and of the want of power to consume those articles of luxury during a period of great commercial depression."

Yet, notwithstanding this depression, it is observable, that while there is an increase in the Customs, for example, on the article Butter, to the extent only of £16,921, the same return shows an increase for the same year of an increase of £111,620 on Tobacco.

On the motion of Lord Hatherton, the following return was ordered:—A return of all paupers who shall be chargeable in any parish in England and Wales, on the 25th of March, 1848, distinguishing adult males and females, and children under 16 years of age: distinguishing, also, those chargeable to parishes and those chargeable to Unions, and distinguishing, further, those who are relieved as vagrants, wayfarers or tramps."—House of Lords, Feb 18, 1848.

At a recent meeting in the metropolis, Mr. Hudson, one of the speakers, suggested the following as addenda:—A return of all paupers in England and Wales, distinguishing, as far as can be ascertained, those who have become chargeable to the Unions through intemperance. Also, a return of the number of teetotalers who have become chargeable to the said parishes or Unions, since signing the teetotal pledge, distinguishing those who have been relieved as wayfarers, tramps or vagrants. Also, the number of paupers, distinguishing males from females, widows and orphans of both sexes, made by the publicans of England and Wales."

A witty moralist used to say of taverns, that they were places where men sold madness by the bottle.

UGHT NOT THE PUBLIC HOUSES OF MANCHESTER TO BE CLOSED?—On the 16th of February, 1847, those employed in Manchester, full time, were 21,698; on the 2nd of November, they were reduced to 14,861; and on February 8th, 1848, they were again 32,146. Those employed short time, on the 16th of February, 1847, were 13,404; on the 2nd of November, they were 14,578; and February 8th, this year, they were only 4,901. The unemployed, on February 16th, 1847, were 5,600; on November 2nd, they had risen to the enormous number of 11,716; and on the 8th of February, this year, they had fallen in 7,543. I think, Sir, the house must agree that it was impossible such changes could take place, such distress be felt, and the revenue of the Excise not be very much affected by those changes and that state of distress.—Speech of Lord John Russell.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS.—A very benevolent and well-known M.P., recently stated to us that he had twice presided at the licensed victuallers annual dinner; and was pleased to find that in this body, a few at least, have become ashamed of the disreputable practice of sending men from their houses in a state of intoxication.

TESTIMONIAL TO J. S. BUCKINGHAM, ESQ.

The friends of Mr. Buckingham, desirous of following up the step taken by the members of the British and Foreign Institute, who have subscribed to present to him a TESTIMONIAL of their respect for his character, and acknowledgment of his services, invite the public at large to assist them in the accomplishment of their object.

The amount of the Testimonial will be devoted to the erection of a Public Lecture Room in London, for Mr. Buckingham's use and benefit, in which he may have an opportunity of following up those literary and philanthropic labours to which the greater portion of his life has been devoted, in India and in England, and for his faithful conduct, in which, it is well-known that he has suffered large pecuniary losses, for which he has never been compensated.

Besides the peculiar services rendered by Mr. Buckingham to the cause of free trade, in advocating the opening of India and China to British commerce, at a time when its principles and advantages were far less generally understood than at present, there is scarcely any public movement connected with political, moral, or social reform, in which he has not taken an active part, both by his pen and his tongue, in Parliament during the six years in which he represented Sheffield, and in public meetings elsewhere; especially in pleading for the rights of seamen against the cruel and unjust practice of impressment; for freedom to the slave; for parks, museums, libraries, and schools for the working classes and the poor; for a revision of our unequal system of taxation; for the suppression of duelling in England, and widow-burning in India; and, above all, for the promotion of education, temperance, benevolence, and peace.

Mr. Buckingham has lived to see almost all the great objects for which he has written and spoken for the last thirty years accomplished; but is now, with advancing age, and, necessarily, declining vigour, without an adequate provision for that period of life into which he must speedily pass. Among the millions of hearers and readers who have derived pleasure from his lectures and writings, and among the thousands who are reaping the benefits of his public labours and private sacrifices, it ought not to be difficult to raise a sum, without inconveniencing any party by large payments, that should at once testify a nation's gratitude, and give honour and satisfaction to one to whom it is due.

Mr. Buckingham, it is well known, has no desire to pass even his old age in idleness; nor would he, it is believed, accept of any pecuniary advantage on condition of labouring no longer for the public good. Both the conviction of its being a duty, and the habit of enjoying it as a pleasure, confirm him in the wish to do this as long as he may live; and all that is asked for him by his friends, and those who take an interest in his welfare, is, that he shall be placed in a position to do this efficiently, without the anxieties and toil of the wandering life which is now his only resource for subsistence.

It can hardly be doubted that the country generally will readily assist towards the accomplishment of so just, so remarkable, and so useful a mode of uniting compensation for past services with the means of securing and facilitating future labours for the public good. Other labourers in the field of commercial and social reform have been munificently rewarded by the public at large; and it is hoped that one of the earliest, steadiest, and most persevering of these labourers, who, in addition to thirty years of almost incessant activity, has also made larger pecuniary sacrifices for the promotion of the public interests than any of his contemporaries, will not be neglected or forgotten.

“THE STANDARD OF FREEDOM.”

To the Friends of RELIGIOUS, POLITICAL, and COMMERCIAL FREEDOM throughout the world—to all who are opposed to INTOLERANCE, the GIBBET, INTEMPERANCE, WAR, and all other systems which degrade, demoralize, brutalize and destroy Mankind.

FRIENDS:—

On Saturday, July 1st, it is my intention to issue the first Number of a new WEEKLY PAPER, to be entitled, “THE STANDARD OF FREEDOM.” It will be printed on paper of the utmost dimensions allowed by law, and larger than the double sheet of the Times newspaper; price 4½d. per Number, or 4s. 9d. per Quarter, paid in advance.

In making this announcement I rely with the fullest confidence upon the support of those friends of the TEMPERANCE REFORMATION throughout the United Kingdom who sympathize with me in my political views; and, assisted by them, I hope to carry on this undertaking with vigour and success, gigantic though it may appear. I design the STANDARD OF FREEDOM to be not only the advocate of entire Liberty of Conscience, and the complete disenfranchisement of RELIGION from the control of the Civil Power;—of the POLITICAL rights of the People, just representation and equitable taxation;—freedom of COMMERCE from all impolitic and injurious monopolies and imposts;—but, also, the strenuous upholder and dauntless advocate of the TEMPERANCE REFORMATION, as the most important, astonishing and salutary movement of the age in which we live. For this purpose I shall secure the aid of the most intelligent writers on the Temperance Question: writers who can so exhibit and enforce its claims, as to commend it to the judgment, the conscience, and the affections of all Christian and Philanthropic men.

Such a medium of communication with the public has long been accounted a desideratum. The Friends of Temperance justly regard it as the greatest reformation that has dawned upon the world since the introduction of Christianity. They know how intimately it is connected with the success and utility of all the great Institutions of our country—with the true elevation and happiness of the people, in all their Social, Political and Religious relations. They are satisfied that unless the population of a country be strictly sober, Trade and Commerce cannot greatly flourish—full Political Freedom cannot be safely enjoyed—Social and Domestic Comfort can be held by no secure tenure—while vital Religion must languish, and be materially obstructed in its progress through the world. TEETOTALISM,—as it is technically termed,—is regarded by its friends as a moral Railway for the more rapid transit of those powerful engines, Education—Sanitary Reform—the amelioration of the Criminal Code—the enlargement of the Elective Franchise—the abolition of Slavery—Peace—Christian Missions—and every instrumentality by which poverty, crime and misery may be banished from the earth. Hence they have frequently expressed their desire that wider scope might be afforded for the exhibition of the Temperance system, in all its comprehensiveness, splendour and blessedness. For, zealously and successfully as its numerous advocates have employed themselves, it is still a melancholy fact that this mighty system, pregnant as it is with innumerable blessings, has not hitherto received that support from the PUBLIC PRESS which it may legitimately claim. If the doings of Teetotalers have occasionally been chronicled, it has been,—with some few honourable exceptions,—more with a design to hold them up to contempt, than to cheer them on in their arduous course.

A medium of communication with the Public, such as the friends of Temperance have so long wished for, I have now the honour of announcing; and it is for them to determine whether they will adequately support a WEEKLY JOURNAL issued by one of themselves. I need scarcely state, that I have been connected with the Temperance Movement for thirteen years. In addition to an unflinching advocacy of its principle in various parts of the Kingdom, I have sent forth, during the last two years, a very large amount of Temperance literature, at the lowest possible rate of charge. Besides my monthly periodical, the “Teetotal Times,” which has obtained an unprecedented circulation, I have issued nearly two hundred thousand copies of the “Teetotal Essayist,” containing Original Essays on the chief bearings of our great question, for most of which I paid Premiums of TEN POUNDS each. I have also issued many hundred thousand Tracts, Essays, and other publications,—many of them gratuitously, through which a vast amount of information has been communicated to Christian Ministers, Magistrates, Gentlemen, and others, who otherwise would have known little or nothing of our principles or operations. I speak not thus boastingly, but to remind you that I have not been an uninterested or inactive member of your Body.

At the same time, however, that TEMPERANCE will receive its due share of attention, the STANDARD OF FREEDOM will be, to all intents and purposes, a NEWSPAPER. All the striking events which may occur from week to week, throughout the world, will be duly recorded and arranged, in a compendious and instructive form. The Original LEADING ARTICLES will embrace every topic of real interest, and will be written in a vigorous, terse and sparkling style, so as to fix the attention of the reader, and arouse his most serious thoughts.—As a FAMILY PAPER, it will not be surpassed for interest and utility. Literature and Science; Arts and Manufactures; Agriculture, Trade, and Commerce, will receive appropriate notice; so that, altogether, it will prove, in the strict sense of the term, a PAPER FOR THE PEOPLE; a Journal devoted to their social, political, moral and religious elevation.

THE STANDARD OF FREEDOM, be it remembered will be larger than the double Times newspaper. And to make its contents in every respect worthy the support of all who are attached to the principles of Religious, Political and Commercial Freedom, a powerful staff of writers, at a heavy weekly expense independent of the Editorship, is engaged, so that the intelligence and talent developed in the various topics discussed, will be unsurpassed by any portion of the London Press.

If it be asked, how can complete success be secured for such a gigantic undertaking, I answer, by every individual who wishes it success, exerting himself with promptitude and perseverance to render that success certain. To this end every Subscriber for a copy will powerfully contribute; or two or three may unite to take a copy, and thus lend their valuable support. Friends and acquaintances may also be induced to become Subscribers; while every Temperance Reading Room and Committee Room, and every Temperance Hotel and Coffee House may be furnished with a copy. These are modes of assisting me which are easy of adoption, and which, if not neglected, will materially contribute to the success of the undertaking, and to the speedier triumph of the great cause with which we are identified.

In CONCLUSION, then, allow me to urge you to make the enterprize in which I have embarked your own. As the friends of unqualified Temperance, you have had to exhibit no ordinary energy and decision of character and procedure. Let but a measure of that energy and decision be displayed in behalf of the STANDARD OF FREEDOM, and around it will continually rally a noble host of the good and great, while its onward progress will denote the march of Intelligence, Peace, and Temperance, and of every humanizing and Godlike system.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

EVERY body with whom we have conversed, speaks of the meeting held at Exeter Hall, as surpassing in intensity of interest any that have preceded it. This it may be said is a matter of course result of an overwrought enthusiasm. Believing that we are not guilty of allowing the feelings so far to warp the judgment, so as to prevent the exercise of our reason, we do on sober reflection regard the meeting held on the 25th of May, as one of a very extraordinary character. Some twelve years ago, it was natural enough for people with itching ears, and others like the Athenians, ever on the alert to be hearing or telling of some new thing, to flock in crowds to Temperance Meetings. The motive power by which hundreds were then propelled into activity has since been greatly diminished. Many who were then valiant, and therefore ready "to shoulder their crutch and show how fields were won," have since cooled down, and walk no more with the active promoters of the temperance movement. Now it is not for us in all cases, to busy ourselves in tracing the actions of men to the fountain, whence they spring, for that in spirit were a violation of the divine command, "Judge not lest ye be judged." Yet are we led by intuition to ask, whither have gone the men, we were accustomed to see on the platform of Exeter Hall, and whose eloquence we were so ready to applaud? We do not speak of those whom death has taken in its grasp, nor of those whom affliction, age, or circumstance, beyond their control, have been compelled to return from busy life; subtracting these from the sum total, we fear (with all our charity) there are not a few who have gone out from us, because they were not of us, and who find more enjoyment in the pursuit of luxury, than in the luxury of doing good. How good then and pleasant a thing it is, when the friends of temperance are called together once a year, what a cheering set-off to the dreary picture we have just ventured to pencil—to look on the old faces that were wont in the less palmy days of our operations, to shine resplendent with hope and gladness—to see there are not a few Calebs and Joshuas who are faithful found among the faithless.

that these have not abated one jot or one tittle of their ardour in this best of causes. Although in the opening remarks of the Chairman, some allusion was incidentally made to the thinness of attendance on the raised seats of the Hall, they did not long remain without occupants; every part was speedily filled, and never do we remember so large a meeting, where so much disposition was manifested by the auditory, even when the "iron tongue of night" had struck ten, to catch every thing that was said by every speaker, (even to the reading of that dullest of all documents, the Report,) as marked these proceedings. Of the character of the speeches delivered, let our readers form their own opinions. Nothing could afford us greater pleasure, than to furnish a commentary on the several addresses of the eloquent gentlemen. Every speech was replete with information, elucidated by variety of illustration, and put in a way so cogent, that conviction, without which all speaking is but as sounding brass and as a tinkling cymbal, was carried to the heart. Never was there furnished a greater proof than on this occasion, that the character of the audience is what we ourselves choose to make it. The time, the place, the speakers,—the men by whom such a gathering is convened; all have to do with the success or non-success of the spread of temperance principles. We may here repeat what we long ago stated elsewhere. It is not to be understood that we disparage the efforts of any body of men, however humble that body may be, in their attempts to rid the nation of its greatest bane; far from this, we would be among the foremost to offer our meed of thanksgiving for the noble sacrifices, not a few of these have made of money, of time, and of domestic enjoyments. We are willing to have meted out to every man honour to whom honour is due; and because we thus conscientiously express our opinion, therefore it is we feel at liberty to add, that the time has come when the advocacy of teetotalism must not only be brought down to the level of the cottage and the hovel, to the pigmy capacities of men whose intellects have been steeped in gin, till the mind, like the tissues of the body, has become shrunken and decayed; but the "set time is come," when the principles we hold must be carried up to the mansion and the palace, to men of rank, of station, and exalted genius. If teetotalism has not yet been accounted respectable enough, to attract to our meetings the classes who yet require enlightenment, but who are not so easy of approach, it is in our power, if that power be rightly used to make it so; and on this we may rely, that those at present without the pale of our influence, will set a value on our operations only in proportion as they observe we ourselves hold principle in high esteem; and to them this will be best evinced by the amount of importance they see the friends of temperance attach to their own Society.

With the divine favour attending us, the temperance cause may ultimately appropriate to itself the sentiment quoted by Mr. Kennedy, Veni, vidi, vici, "I came, I saw, I conquered."

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

(Reported for the Chronicle.)

THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the Society was held in Exeter Hall, on Thursday Evening, May 25th, 1848, at six o'clock, William Cash, Esq., in the Chair. The attendance was large and highly respectable, and deep interest seemed to prevail throughout the evening; indeed, never during the whole of this auspicious month of May, did we notice Exeter Hall present a more animated appearance. The collection amounted to upwards of £40, being £14. 13s. 4½d. more than the sum realised at the last Annual Meeting. On the platform, we observed, the Revs. Dr. Burns, B. Parsons, J. Kennedy, H. Townley, and J. T. Messer; J. Meredith, J. S. Buckingham, Elihu Burritt, Joseph Sturge, Samuel Bowly, Christopher Bowly, William Cabell, Joseph Eaton, W. Holmes, J. Cassell, G. W. Atwood, Edmund Fry, Joseph Clarke, T. B. Scutt, T. S. Jackson, Thomas Compton, James Christy, and Robert Charlton, Esqs.; Dr. Lovell, Dr. Oxley, Dr. Ferrier, and R. L. Pinching, Esq., Surgeon; Messrs. Gawthorp, Whittaker, J. W. Green, H. Cole, W. Spriggs, J. Buckle, Passmore Edwards, T. A. Smith, G. C. Campbell, and other friends of the cause.

The CHAIRMAN rose and said, my friends, in calling you together again, we trust to be able to bring some subjects before you to excite your interest on the great question that will occupy your attention to-night. The question of teetotalism is one, in which not only the Committee of this Society, but I hope the country at large, continue to feel an increased interest from year to year—(cheers.) I may assure this meeting that the National Temperance Society feel, that they have a great work to perform, and if they are to succeed, it must be by the aid of such meetings as these, and the uniform assistance of all classes of Society—(hear, hear.) We are about to bring before you a Report of our proceedings for the past year, which has in many respects been truly successful, though it may not have been so noisy; and although quite so many meetings may not have been held as during former years, yet the Society has been progressing (as I believe you will admit when you have heard the Report,) in a satisfactory manner—(cheers.) The more we look at this Society, the more we see that the ramifications of it are but very imperfectly understood and appreciated—(hear, hear.) Teetotalism is a subject which interests us to a degree, of which few of us have any idea—(hear, hear.) We believe that it would elevate every description of persons and have a most beneficial tendency upon the country at large, and that it would have the effect of reducing many of the burdens, under which, I must say we do now groan, and which are brought upon ourselves by the habit of taking intoxicating liquors—(hear, hear.) The sum spent in this country in intoxicating drinks may be calculated at Sixty Millions per annum; and if we could calculate what this would do for us, if spent in a proper way, we could hardly help coming to the conclusion that we ought to assist the great movement attempting to break up the system—the dreadful system, I will call it—of taking intoxicating drinks—(hear, hear.) Whether we look to the workhouses, to the hospitals, to the lunatic asylums, or the prisons in every direction, we find that the source of an immense amount of evil, arises in the use of these drinks. At the same time, we do take some satisfaction in believing that public attention is being more and more turned to the subject—(hear, hear.) I wish we could say that all classes were accepting the invitation as we could desire; but we cannot bring every mind to believe that much of the evil around us would cease to exist, if our countrymen and countrywomen would adopt the system we are here to recommend. If this system were adopted, we believe there would be order, harmony, and peace, where now there is disorder and disturbance. We look at the Ragged Schools and the various charitable societies of this country, and we feel convinced in our own minds that they would be very much better supported than they are now, if it were not for the amount of money spent in intoxicating drinks. The amount of money spent in intoxicating drinks is an important consideration to us—(hear, hear.) I heard at the Borough Road Schools the other day, that many of their schools are not nearly filled, and I believe it arises principally from the carelessness and indifference of parents, who spend their time at the public-house and the gin-palace; and we feel if they were to adopt our principle, they would never be satisfied till all their children had enjoyed the advantages of a good education—(hear, hear,) and even if they paid rather more for that education than is now charged in any of our Lancastrian or National Schools, they would find themselves considerably in pocket at the end of the week by adopting the teetotal principle. Few of those schools charge more than 3d. a week, and they give a very good education for it; and there can be no doubt whatever, that upon the average, those persons who take intoxicating drinks, spend at least 3s. or 4s. per week in obtaining them—(hear, hear.) If they would only put a portion of that sum on one side, and take care that their children were educated, what a different position they would be in; and I put it to them, would it not be infinitely better for them to spend a portion of their earnings in this way, than to spend it at the public-house or the gin-palace—(hear, hear.) Now, look at the sum raised in this country for the purpose of supporting Missions, and see what a small amount it is, compared with the sum spent in intoxicating drinks. The amount raised for all the charitable societies, not exceeding £700,000, is comparatively a trifle, when put alongside the sum spent in the purchase of intoxicating drinks; and then, again, were this principle adopted, we should not require many of those charitable institutions, because the working classes and others would be above receiving the support of others, if they were only provident themselves—(hear, hear, and cheers.) We want to see our fellow-creatures raised in the scale of society—we want to see them placed in that position of independence to which they are entitled—(hear, hear.) I will not speak politically, for our object on this occasion is not to introduce politics, but to raise the Standard amongst our countrymen and countrywomen universally, and to induce them, if possible, to adopt a principle, by which they would find their position infinitely improved—(cheers.) We have arranged to-night that each speaker shall be limited to a brief space of time, which will allow of a greater number of speakers addressing you. I now call upon the Secretary to read the Report.

Mr. THOMAS HUDSON then read a very animated Report of the Society's operations, which was loudly cheered.

Mr. JOHN MEREDITH read the Treasurer's Account. The balance sheet showed a sum in favour of the Society of £107. 18s. 10d.

The Rev. JOHN KENNEDY, of Stepney, moved the first resolution—

"That this meeting has heard with great satisfaction the references to the introduction of the temperance principle into schools and factories, and among seamen, to the favourable opinion entertained by the press, to the increased circulation of the National Temperance Chronicle, and other similar publications, all indicating the steady, if not rapid, progress of the cause, and the ultimate overthrow of the drinking customs of society."

He said, you will perceive, sir, that this resolution is an echo of the report, and a speech to this resolution would only be an amplification or prolongation of that echo. Sure I am that the report is worthy of being echoed, and if any one here had not the privilege of hearing it, I hope he will not fail to avail himself of the privilege he will have in reading it when published—(cheers.) I feel, to speak minutely or particularly would be quite impossible within the brief space of time allotted to the speakers this evening. Short speeches are sometimes very desirable for the audience, but very difficult for the speaker—(hear, hear.) If we could compress our eloquence, if I may be permitted so to term it, into sentences as brief as that chosen by an ancient general, who said, after he had achieved a gallant exploit,—gallant, as the world then judged, and as, alas! it still too frequently judges,—that great general said in three short words, which must, however, be translated by six words, "I came, I saw, I conquered." Would that the time were come when the friends of the Total Abstinence Society could pronounce the accomplishment of their great purpose, in this brief sentence, "We came, we saw, we conquered." The day is breaking, and I believe the time will speedily come, when, even in our enslaved country, the advocates of temperance can triumphantly exclaim, "We have come, and seen, and conquered." (Cheers.) It has often struck me, that if our own minds, and the minds of our countrymen, could be brought fully to appreciate certain simple, intelligible, and undeniable facts, they would find a fountain of argument and motive in favour of the total abstinence movement which would not be exhausted until our work were entirely accomplished. Take one fact from the report. How many quarters of barley are destroyed in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors! Not less than eight or nine millions; which eight or nine millions, we are informed, are sufficient for the support of six or seven millions of human beings for a year! We, during a year of famine destroy all this gracious bounty of heaven, recklessly destroy that which is equal to the support of six or seven millions of starving fellow-countrymen!—(hear, hear, and cheers.) And there are but a very few individuals who appear to see the bearing of such a fact, on the duty or on the guilt of our country. Let the Christians of our country look at this fact. Let the patriots of our country look at this fact. Let the statesmen of our country look at this fact. If they will not, we shall, and shall sound it until the ears of the country are familiar with it, and until it has found some place in their hearts—(cheers.) The words of one of the greatest statesmen of his age are sometimes quoted relative to our Missionary Societies. Burke spoke of the spires of our cathedrals as the electric rods which diverted the wrath of heaven from bursting on our country. I do not admire the sentiment so put, although in another form I might approve of it. Our Bible Societies and our Missionary Societies are sometimes spoken of as the salvation of our country, and there is some truth in it, I believe; but if they are so, and as they are often called in this Hall, the glory of our age and country, what shall we say of our age and country, when against £700,000, raised for the purpose of sending the gospel to heathen lands, the sum of £50,000,000 are spent on the gratification of our own lusts,—(hear, hear.) If those religious societies divert the wrath of heaven from bursting on our country, what shall we say of those habits which enslave every class of the community? If the God of heaven were not a God of mercy,—if he were to enter into judgment with us, let me ask the Christian, what were our prospects? Sir, the worst that is to be said, is not that the drinking-customs of our country consume so large a sum, but we have to record that so far as all home-operations for the religious and educational benefit are concerned, they are much more than neutralized by our drinking customs. I am the friend of City Missions, of Bible Associations, and Ragged Schools, and I would do all I could to promote the interests and to encourage every one of them. But I cannot help remembering that there are practices sanctioned by those labouring to do good for their fellow-men by these means, which do greater harm than all the good their efforts can ever accomplish—(loud cheers.) Take any street in London, and you will find its best corner occupied by a public-house—(hear, hear), and its splendour and brilliance are supported by the wretchedness of the surrounding population. And what is done to counteract their influence? You will find in a neighbouring street, perhaps, a Ragged School, you find it with difficulty; it is wrought by a few honest, earnest-hearted men, doing all the good in their power. But say, what can you expect as the result of all those labours of love, while such means of doing evil exist, and are sanctioned and supported by the very classes labouring with the one hand to undo the evil they have done with the other?—(applause.) This is a fact which must be looked at seriously by the Christian portion of the community. They only need to look, and they will tremble. I know how often it has been said, and how zealously it has been said, that we propose an extreme remedy. Sir, the evil with which we have to grapple is an extreme evil. Devise another remedy that will accomplish the end, and you shall have your share in doing the work. Can anything short of total abstinence accomplish the work? It is admitted by universal acknowledgment that nothing less than total abstinence will do for drunkards. I had the other day, a singular illustration of this truth. Happening to travel in the north of Scotland on a stage coach, an old man mounted the top, and took his seat beside me. I saw spots on his face that were of a black and blue appearance, and a few minutes' conversation let out the secret that he had been so drunk, that he had been obliged to be put down off the coach the day before. He was an old pensioner, had served in the Scotch Greys. It happened to be on the week succeeding the famous 10th of April, on which day I was in London; I left London the next morning, and all the travellers were anxious to know what I had seen in London on the 10th. Whilst this was the subject of conversation, the old pensioner became very eloquent on the events of that day, "he would die for the Queen any day, old as he was, and as for the Chartists a few of the Scotch Greys would soon send them flying." I said to him, "I wonder now, that such a bold and brave man as you, have not courage to resist your worst enemy, the whiskey." He said, "Sir you know it is the nature of the whiskey, that when you take one glass you canna stop." I said to him, "But do not take the first glass," and I reasoned with him for one or two hours; he took all I said in good part, but what the result will be I know not. But, sir, it should ever be remembered that it is the nature of those drinks which invites and seduces. Take not therefore the first glass. It is, sir, an extreme remedy, but I repeat it, the evil is extreme. Look at the truths we have heard to-night, and say will any measure short of this set our labourers free? Will anything short of this measure set the other classes of society free from the bondage in which they are held by etiquette and ceremony? No other remedy can liberate them. I would ask is this measure lawful? Not is it obligatory? You say it is lawful to partake; but is it not lawful also to abstain, if it be lawful to abstain, may I not discover something which renders this lawfulness to abstain a rule of duty for me? The Apostle Paul, where anything was obligatory, paid the obligation at any cost, and in things lawful, he asked is it expedient? and if inexpedient, he at once abandoned it. On this principle I assert the christianity of Total Abstinence, and let these considerations go out and influence the Christian portion of the public. For the love of God, for the love of country and of mankind, give up that which is ruining thousands and millions, and will continue to ruin millions more, until you and others rise to the rescue. Difficulties there are, and may be; but let us remember the response made to Peter the Hermit at Claremont, when he applied for aid to carry on the Crusades, "It is the will of God," they exclaimed, and there was no more question. I believe, sir, it is the will of God that we should abstain, and that we should try to induce our countrymen to abstain. In this spirit we devote ourselves to this great work, and shall rejoice that we have contributed somewhat to render the commonwealth, to use the words of Milton, "one huge and Christian personage, one mighty growth and stature of an honest man, as big and compact in virtue as in body."—(Loud applause)

Mr. THOMAS SPENCER JACKSON, a farmer, seconded the resolution. He said Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, Little did I think, a few weeks ago, of being invited to come from the woods of Hertfordshire to address such a large and respectable audience at Exeter Hall. Neither do I flatter myself that it was for my powers of oratory that I was invited, or for any other reason, than that God has given me firmness to carry out those principles we have assembled here to-night to advocate—(hear, hear, and cheers.) With your permission, I will give you a brief account of my own experience in the temperance cause—(hear, hear.) I was born and bred a farmer, and although not so ruddy and robust as farmers generally are, yet, I trust, mine is a hand of industry. Eight years ago, I was suffering under the same delusion, which doubtless many here assembled, are now labouring under, namely, that of taking intoxicating drinks every day, and fancying I could not live without them. I was, in fact, ordered to take it several times a day by the medical man, because I was very delicate—(laughter)—and to give you a proof of my great weakness, I confess I did take it—(laughter.) It is true, I had heard something about teetotalism at that time, but I scarcely knew what it meant, never having seen such a thing; but hearing of a meeting to be held at Hertford, with Sir Culling Eardley Smith, in the chair, I thought I would just go and hear what could be said against the drink we thought so good; and on hearing the powerful arguments introduced by the Rev. W. R. Baker, I came away with the determination to belong to the drinking-classes no longer—(cheers,) and not knowing another teetotaler in the neighbourhood, I had to fight the battle single-handed. Yes, and a far more glorious battle it was than Nelson ever fought, for whereas he was engaged in sending his fellow-creatures unprepared to meet their God by wholesale, I was using my little influence in trying to rescue them from the drunkard's grave and the drunkard's hell—(hear, hear.) Although I strictly adhered to the temperance principle, I did not sign the pledge till three years after, when I had the satisfaction, with many others, of doing so, at a meeting in the village of Watton. Did time permit, I could mention many who at that time snapped the chain which had bound them to the drinking-customs, and have even since conscientiously kept their pledge. Having seen many of my father's men gathering in the harvest with nothing stronger to drink than tea or coffee, and one I particularly remember drinking nothing but water from the limpid stream, I had an opportunity of observing its effects on those who practised the principle of total abstinence, and it was observable that those who were in the habit of taking strong drink at their work, before the close of the day, got stupid, and lazy, and sleepy; but no sooner did they turn teetotalers than they were "wide awake"—(laughter.) But I must answer that question, to speak to which principally brought me here, "If every body turned teetotalers, what is to become of the barley?" Allow me to tell you, that last Michaelmas I rented a farm on my own responsibility. It was notoriously out of condition; indeed there were scarcely any prospects of gaining a livelihood, except by the constant sweat of my brow. When the time was at hand for me to sow my first seed, barley was selling at about sixty shillings per quarter, and, I believe, my friend, Mr. Hudson, will remember that I told him of that fact, and declared, that let it be what it would, I was determined never to sell one grain to make the drunkard's drink—(cheers.) I sowed a field of fifteen acres with peas, and I doubt not that many of you are aware that the pea-crop was almost a failure, and the peas around my farm were almost destroyed by the blight, but the teetotal peas grew and flourished abundantly—(laughter and cheers) and yielded far more than my most sanguine anticipations could lead me to expect from such land. But I had some few acres of beautiful barley, and what was to become of that. Why ye christian beer drinkers! instead of employing men on the Sabbath-day to convert it into malt, I employed men on the week-days to grind it into meal—(hear, hear)—and in the second place I employed a number of pigs to eat it—(laughter); and in the third place, I took a ride to Barnet fair with two neighbouring farmers, and we each bought a number of bullocks. Theirs went home to fatten upon oil-cake, but mine upon barley-meal, and after fattening and selling them, and counting up the cost, the teetotal bullocks were found to have gained the largest profit—(cheers and laughter); and in the fourth place, although the old and practical farmers told me it would not do for sheep, though it might for pigs, I told them I meant to try the experiment, and I had the satisfaction and the credit of sending into the town of Hertford some of the fattest (if not the fattest) mutton which had been there for many years—(hear, hear) I would not sell the barley to the maltsters, but had it ground into meal; and to trace the difference in the results, had it gone to the brewers then the pigs would get the barley, and human beings would only get the wash—(laughter); that wash which has destroyed hundreds of thousands of my fellow-countrymen, both here and hereafter—(cheers). I hope there are none here who drink beer; but if there are, I ask them to come and help us in this labour of love. It is true we are but a little band, but we have truth on our side, and truth is stronger than error. God is stronger than Satan, and if He be for us, we care not who shall be against us—(hear, hear and cheers.) For the last eight years I have not had one day's illness, although I was so very weak—(laughter), neither has it cost me one sixpence for the doctor, except for having some teeth taken out—(laughter),—and for the last three or four years my only drink has been the crystal spring. I have had water for breakfast, water at lunch, water for dinner, and as an Irishman would say, water for tea, and water for supper—(cheers.) Further, within the last twelve months I have married a teetotal wife—(laughter and applause, in both of which the speaker joined)—and we had about twenty to sit down to a teetotal breakfast; and in our teetotal home one drop of strong drink has never been permitted to enter on any condition whatever. I will conclude, by entreating your most sincere and earnest prayers, that I, though a stripling, may be enabled to carry out this work of reforming the drunkard; for much as I hate this Sabbath-breaking, this soul-destroying system, I do feel that if left to my own feeble strength, Satan might yet win me back to his drinking-customs. If the Saviour should make me the means of reclaiming but one poor drunkard, and that I believe he has, then truly has he chosen one of the weakest things of this world to confound the mighty, and he shall have all the praise—(hear, hear, and loud applause.)

The resolution being put to the meeting, was passed unanimously.

JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM, Esq., in moving the second resolution, said, Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, the resolution I have been requested to move is as follows:

"That this meeting rejoices in the growing support given to this Institution by ministers of religion and gentlemen of the medical profession, especially in the increasing liberality of its friends, by which its present financial position has been attained, and would still appeal to all the friends of Philanthropy, to multiply the means for extending its influence until the principle of total abstinence shall be advocated and established in every town and village of our country."

In offering a few observations on this resolution, I must express first my deep interest in both the speeches we have heard, but more especially have I been interested by the statements of the gentleman who has just sat down. He has given us an epitome of facts of the highest possible value; and if the principles which he has enunciated and illustrated were universally carried out, national regeneration would be the result. A few years ago, he tells us, he laboured under the delusion that intoxicating drinks were necessary, and this idea was sanctioned by the opinion of the medical profession, those to whom we naturally look for the truth in these matters. A fortunate event led him to listen to the arguments on both sides; the result was that he embraced the principles and carried them into practice. The picture he has given of the prosperity awaiting his operations, is a picture in an individual case of what we desire to accomplish in the whole nation. Now that gentleman has riveted your attention, and so riveted my attention, that if you will allow me, I will extend the matter, and show what sad injury this country has suffered as a nation, in consequence of the drinking habits of the people. There is no nation on the earth more proud of its position and character, or that boasts more frequently of its superiority to other nations than Britain. None more sensitive of any implication upon their courage and honour in their principles and in their practice. Though we have professed great humility as a nation, we have ever exhibited great pride; and it has been a favourite saying with us, that we were the envy and admiration of the world. I shall show you, I think, that the things in which we have been most distinguished are changing every day, and that we are losing what in times past we did possess. One feature on which England has boasted itself, is its great wealth and vast resources, these have been constant themes of admiration. But if the country just now were as rich as is pretended, then the labouring classes could live on what they had saved; but the fact is, that they are so pinched for want of money, that there are but very few on a Saturday night that have a shilling beyond what is required for the wants of the week, much less have they anything to lay by. Wealth can never be said to be the characteristic of a country, without each having a surplus beyond his immediate wants; if they have not, then in all cases of famine, or of commercial depression, misery must follow, as they have nothing to fall back upon. They are obliged to apply to, and become dependent on the parish, some charitable friend, or some benefit society to which they have subscribed. Poverty is now our characteristic; the labouring classes live from hand to mouth, they have nothing saved to depend on. Now why have they nothing? Because they drink it; because they smoke it; or because they snuff it all. They disperse it in things really injurious. The wealth of the country, would be great if the fifty or sixty millions spent annually in intoxicating drinks were laid by. Our people then need not mind being three, six, or even twelve months out of work—(cheers.) The country is therefore unwise and improvident in this matter. The people spend their money to enrich the publican, to make wealthy pawnbrokers, and others by whom they are never benefited—(cheers.) The people have the money in their hands, we want to teach them to hold it fast, after supplying themselves, of course, with proper food, good clothing and education—(hear, hear,) to always have something in hand for a tempestuous day. Another thing of which our country boasts, is its zeal in propagating the Gospel, for which large sums are raised every year, though not large enough, and great and crowded meetings held in this Hall. But what is the result of this? Why we are by the propagation of drinking-customs demolishing all that they do; by giving the Gospel with one hand, and the cup of intoxication with the other—(hear, hear.) I hope the day will come when it shall be deemed a sine qua non amongst the qualifications of a missionary to go out with the Gospel to the heathen, that he be a teetotaler—(loud cheers.) You have a right to demand this qualification. If you engage a captain to take the command of a ship, you expect that he shall be possessed of a knowledge of navigation, or if you engage a surgeon you expect that he shall be skilled in anatomy; and if you send a missionary to make men purer, you have a right to demand that he in all his principles and practice be pure. In this particular too, the balance is going against us, because the drinking-customs are mixed up with all our habits, and we have thus sent destruction where it was not before. Another feature of which we have boasted, is the excellence of our mercantile marine. Many of you know that I passed many years of my life at sea, and had the command of a ship. There I learnt much of the disasters, accidents, loss of property and loss of life, amongst officers and crews, through the use of intoxicating drinks. I have poured it upon the ears of government in every shape, but it has fallen on stoney ground, and brought forth no fruit. Government, however, has now sent abroad letters to all the British consuls at foreign courts, to beg them to give answers, relating the estimation in which our ships were held in foreign ports, and if there were reasons for change, to state them. Now, if we love our country at home, we always love it much more abroad, because we then think only of the blessings that are at home; whilst, when we are at home, we say little about the superiorities, but are more disposed to point out its defects, in order that they may be mended. This is true of consuls; they have a positive interest in making the country appear better than it is. Their answers have come home, and have been laid before our parliament, and the result is this, that English ships are deteriorated in foreign estimation; Americans, Russians, Danes, and Swedes, are preferred to us, and can get greater freights, and get their cargoes more expeditiously than we do. Many foolish reasons have been given for this; but the consuls say it is from the drunken habits of the officers and crews, by which so many ships are lost and goods damaged. Wrecks occur almost always in consequence of drunkenness. Well now, these are some of the disastrous effects of our drinking habits. From the statements of the gentleman you have just heard, you learn the great personal benefits to be received by the entire abandonment of all such habits. Let every man in the country try this. Let drink not be taken in our ships. Let drink not be taken by our missionaries, and so shall we advance ourselves, and become an honour to our country. He concluded by saying, that an engagement made some time before he knew of the meeting now called him away, but he hoped that his retiring would not be regarded as anywant of interest in the meeting, for the longer he lived, the stronger became his attachment to the temperance cause. After moving the resolution, he retired amid loud cheers.

Dr. BURNS in seconding the resolution said, Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, I have been thinking while sitting here on the very altered position of the teetotal question during the last fifteen years. I believe it is thirteen years since the first teetotal meeting was held in this Hall. At that period, the principle of teetotalism was a mere theory, and was supposed by a great number of intelligent men, medical men, ministers of the gospel, and philanthropists, to be an extremely fanatical theory. Thirteen years ago nothing was deemed more absurd in the metropolis of the world, than the theory of teetotalism. We meet this evening under very favourable circumstances. The subject of teetotalism is no longer an untried, and supposed fanatical theory, but a matter of fact. It has been embodied in the practice of hundreds and of thousands, and it stands forth this evening as one of those well-tested theories, deserving the resolute assistance and support of all rational beings. The theory has been tested in this country by persons for the whole of that period. I have entered on my thirteenth year of teetotalism, I have tried it at home and abroad, on land and at sea, and I believe, that under all circumstances, teetotalism is decidedly adapted to, and promotive of, the physical and the mental elevation, and the moral improvement of mankind—(cheers.) Last year I attended the triennial Conference of a body of Baptists in America, and I was struck by the difference between the condition of that country and that of our own. I was amazed at the almost universal appearance of respectability, the quietness of the streets, the large attendance on places of worship, and during my visit to Boston I never saw a drunken man, or heard a profane expression, or saw any disorder in the streets. The Rev. Dr. Sharp, who has been a minister in Boston forty years, says, "I have witnessed forty thousand persons meeting together to discuss various thrilling and exciting subjects; they have heard the most exciting speeches; and they have separated with all the quietness, the order and the respectability of persons coming from a place of worship." Now would this be the case in our country? I say, No; and the reason is the addictiveness of such vast numbers in our country to the use of intoxicating liquors—(applause.) I visited New York, and though in that city there are always a great number of emigrants from all parts of the world, yet in that city, I only saw three intoxicated persons—(cheers.) I visited Baltimore, and Washington, and Pittsburgh, and I also visited several of the cities of the Western States, and everywhere I saw manifested the admirable results arising from the temperance principle, and let me say in one word, that drinking intoxicating liquors is disreputable among the religious of all denominations in America—(loud applause.) I met with ministers of all denominations and visited them at their homes, and I never saw wine or any intoxicating drinks whatever upon the table of any minister in the United States. I attended a large assembly in Vermont, consisting of ministers from nearly all the States of America, and two most powerful resolutions against using and vending intoxicating liquors were passed.

Now nothing would give me more pleasure than that these excellent resolutions, or some similar ones, should pass at the Wesleyan Conference—(hear hear, and cheers), and that such resolutions should pass at all the associations of Baptist and Congregational ministers in this country—(applause.) I was much impressed with what Mr. Buckingham said, on the importance of having teetotal missionaries—(hear, hear). Let all teetotalers demand that their means shall be applied only in supporting teetotal missionaries—(loud cheers); but it would be a very strange anomaly for some board of directors to have a missionary before them who was on the eve of going out to assist in evangelizing the heathen, and to use wine in his presence, and then tell him to go and practice abstinence in another country. No sir—let it not be so. I believe that in this matter, as in others, the best way is to begin at home, and I believe if persons would only speak out on this matter, the anomaly of sending out brandy and wine and whiskey along with the Gospel of Christ, would be blotted from our history—(hear, hear, and cheers). Sir, I will venture to affirm that one-half of the societies, educational and religious, which have held their anniversaries during the last six weeks, could be dispensed with, if the principles of teetotalism were universally practised. Were teetotalism general, we should not need Ragged Schools, for we should have no ragged children; we should need no Penitentiaries, for very few would be the number of dissolute women on our streets, if none were drinkers of intoxicating liquors. Sir, the City Mission lacks one thing yet, and that is, that every missionary whom they send out should do all that he can to suppress the drinking habits of those amongst whom he goes—(cheers.) He has a vast power, and it would be gloriously exerted in rescuing the poor and depraved from the baneful influence of intoxicating drinks. A great mass of the people never come within the range of a Christian minister, and it is in vain we preach; it is in vain we print bibles and tracts; it is in vain we send missionaries abroad and into our own streets, unless those drinking habits are removed; without this is done, most of our societies are comparatively powerless. I say, advisedly and calmly, that during the thirteen years that teetotalism has been established in the metropolis, it has done more good in all respects—and I take every view of the question, I take the physical, the intellectual, the moral and the religious views of the question, and I assert that teetotalism has produced more good than all the other benevolent institutions put together—(applause) and I would challenge the secretaries and the committees of all those institutions to bring forward their statistics and prove the contrary. Our Society has been acting as a great auxiliary to all those societies, we have been helping every one of them; we have been making people sober, that they may be the better prepared to read the bibles circulated by the Bible Society, and we have been endeavouring to raise men from the position in which they feel the necessity of receiving the support of charitable institutions. In reference to the progress of teetotalism in our country, supposing that only 100,000 drunkards have been reclaimed, and supposing that only 200,000 others have been preserved from becoming drunkards, may we not be proud to look at the mass of human beings blessed and elevated, and preserved by the influence of our noble Society?—(hear, and cheers). In reference to the past, may we not look back, and see, with very great thankfulness that the foundation of our noble Society has been so firmly laid, that it has stood the test of fifteen years' ordeal. The teetotal missionary has been working in every part of our country, thousands of lectures have been delivered, the printing press has been throwing out the leaves of sobriety in every direction—(cheers), and all these influences must still be kept up, and, if possible, increased—(cheers). We must also still have the personal influence of teetotalers. I believe this personal influence, whereby every teetotaler has been to some extent a teetotal missionary, recommending the subject in all quarters, has been the great cause of our success. My resolution refers to two important features at home. One is the greater amount of medical and ministerial influence recently given to the teetotal cause. I suppose most of those present have heard of the Teetotal Medical Certificate, a certificate which was read in the report, shewing the compatibility of perfect health with abstinence from intoxicating beverages. Now, I have got this Certificate in my possession, and here it is, [The rev. gentleman here unrolled a long narrow strip of paper] signed by fourteen hundred medical men—(loud laughter and applause). These names are closely printed, and in a small type, and they measure 10 feet 8½ inches. Now, here is 10 feet 8½ inches of medical testimony in favour of teetotalism—(continued laughter). How much better for a man to be influenced by these 10 feet 8½ inches of medical advice, which he gets for nothing, than by a prescription not half the length, for which he has to pay his money—(roars of laughter.) I would have all persons who profess to be weak, or fancy themselves so through teetotalism, whether weak in the stomach or weak in the head—(laughter) obtain this medical certificate with the names attached, and in this form too—(laughter) and have it hung up in the loftiest room they have, and when the doctor advises the taking of beer or of any intoxicating liquids for preserving the health, let those fourteen hundred doctors' testimony stare him in the face—(loud laughter and applause). So much for the Medical Certificate, a long Certificate, and a strong Certificate, and a glorious Certificate it is—(loud applause). My resolution also refers to the greater amount of influence gained to our side from the Christian ministry. If anything has caused me aching of heart, it has been the backwardness of ministerial brethren to take up the question and carry it out. I have mourned much over the apathy and the unconcern of ministers, evidently good men, but seeming perfectly infatuated on this question. Well, a better day is coming, a more glorious day is brightening!—(applause.) Recently there has been a Ministers' Conference held in Manchester for the purpose of considering the best means for promoting the Temperance Reformation; I see on the platform around me some of the valuable friends who attended that Conference. There were nearly 200 ministers there from various parts of the country, and I have been analyzing the names and characters of those ministers, and I find that they represented, in some measure, more or less, fifteen christian sects. I hope the time will shortly come by some means, either by the means of the "Evangelical Alliance," or something better—(hear, hear), when there will be only one sect, one fold and one shepherd—(cheers). In addition to the 200 ministers who attended the Conference, letters were received from 350 teetotal ministers. Among those, the following was received by the Conference from one of the most influential ministers of this country, which I think you will permit me to read. [The rev. gentleman here read the eloquent and affectionate letter received from the Rev. William Jay of Bath, which we gave in our last number.] I would observe that I trust that letter will be circulated through Great Britain and Ireland, and through the world, and I trust the Society will print that letter in the form of a tract, and see that every minister in this country shall have the opportunity of perusing a copy—(applause). That Conference was one of the most interesting I ever attended. I was never at a conference where the members were so united—every resolution introduced into that Conference passed unanimously, and I would fain hope, for the sake of the cloth, for the credit and the honour of the cloth, that a better day is coming—a day when the strange apathy at present existing shall have disappeared, and been succeeded by a disposition to aid and seek by every means to ex-

AGENCY.

Mr. JABEZ INWARDS, during the month of May has held meetings at Wincombank (near Sheffield) Derby, Whitstable, Ramsgate, Lenham, Leighton Buzzard, Selby and Rowmash. From thence Mr. Inwards proceeds to Scarborough.

Mr. THOMAS WHITTAKER, since his last report, has visited and delivered lectures in the following towns of Staffordshire, Lancashire, Cumberland and Westmoreland:— Newcastle-under-Lyne, Blackburn, Mellor, Chipping, Preston, Lancaster, Kendal, Workington, Maryport and Cockermouth. During the present month, Mr. W. leaves London en route for the counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland.

MR. WILLIAM GAWTHORPE is engaged in Dorset and Hants Association, and has held a series of Meetings at Poole, Bridport, Lyme Regis, Verwood, Romsey, Alton and Southampton. Mr. Gawthorpe continues in this district.

The Rev. A. W. Heritage and Dr. Daniel Carr, have recently commenced operations in connexion with the National Society.

PRESTON.

The 16th Annual Festival of the Preston Temperance Society, and the 1st Annual Festival of Grimshaw Street, Sabbath School and Congregational Total Abstinence Society, was held in the week commencing on the 16th April. On Sunday, the 16th, the Rev. R. G. Mason, (the Father Mathew of Scotland) delivered three excellent discourses bearing on the temperance question, in the morning and afternoon in Grimshaw Street Independent Chapel, and in the evening in the theatre. All the services were well attended, especially the one in the theatre. On Monday evening, a crowded and respectable meeting was held in the spacious school, belonging to Grimshaw Street Chapel the Rev. R. Slate, minister of the chapel presided, and a most excellent address was given by the Rev. R. G. Mason. On Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday evenings, meetings were held in the theatre. On the Tuesday evening his Worship the Mayor of Preston, T. Birchall, Esq., presided, and the meeting was addressed by G. S. Kenrick, Esq. of West Bromwich, Rev. R. G. Mason, and Mr. T. Whittaker of London. On Wednesday evening Mr. Lowe, silversmith, occupied the chair, and the Revs. R. Tabraham of Clitheroe, R. G. Mason, and R. Slate and Mr. Whittaker addressed the meeting. On Thursday evening, the 16th, the annual meeting of the Parent Society was held, Mr. G. Cartwright, optician, was called to the chair. After the business usually transacted at annual meetings had been gone through, the Revs. R. G. Mason, and T. Jobling, and Mr. Whittaker spoke. On Friday afternoon a tea-party was held in Grimshaw Street School, between 200 and 300 persons sat down to tea. After tea, the first Annual Meeting of Grimshaw Street Sabbath School and Congregational Total Abstinence Society was held, the Rev. R. Slate, the president, was called to the chair, and the Rev. R. G. Mason, Mr. T. Swindlehurst, Mr. Wm. Howarth, and others, spoke; and on the Saturday evening, a Washingtonian meeting was held in the Theatre. Mr. T. Swindlehurst took the chair, and several reformed characters related the benefits they had received through becoming abstainers.

tend such a glorious cause—(applause.) My resolution also refers to the increased liberality displayed during the past year in supporting teetotalism. Were I not surrounded by many of the gentlemen who have made princely donations, I might mention names. There are numerous gentlemen on the platform who have in every difficulty stepped forth, and given noble contributions to aid in carrying on the cause. Whilst I thank God for that liberality, I would much prefer that teetotalism should be independent of those princely donations. I would much rather our friends, rich and poor, one and all, should say, "You have been noble in your contributions to teetotalism, but teetotalism, fifteen years old, ought to be able to earn its own living"—(laughter), and I know that our friends will not withhold their means from its support. I trust that this evening every man who loves teetotalism will prove his love by nobly giving his support—(applause.) The Treasurer's Report notices a very great increase in the amount of the annual subscriptions, and these I consider the chief means of keeping the agents and missionaries at work. My motion will have to be supported in an extraordinary manner, by some very talented gentlemen on this platform, and it will have to be supported by every individual in this Hall, except indeed there be some stern anti-teetotalers here, or some young teetotalers not yet fully matured. My motion will have to be supported by a general collection, and I trust it will be a good collection, that is to say, I trust it will be one where every person gives something, and as much as he can afford. If every one present does that to-night, we shall have a princely and a noble collection—(hear, hear.) Put to yourselves individually the question, "What has teetotalism done for me?" and then put the question, "What have I done for teetotalism?" and let the balance sheet be made up to-night, and the account settled.—(loud applause.)

JOSEPH STURGE Esq., briefly supported the resolution, he remarked that the longer he lived, the more he became impressed with the importance of this Society, and had himself now served three apprenticeships of seven years each, to the cause. He would mention one fact to illustrate the progress of the principles in Birmingham. The year before last, they had great difficulty in raising 1000 youths who were pledged teetotalers to go on a railway trip. Last summer, however, they had 1600; and he hoped that the next trip they would have 2000—(cheers.) The resolution being put to the meeting was passed unanimously. The chairman now announced the collection, which amounted to £40. 5s. 7d.

SAMUEL BOWLY of Gloucester, moved the next resolution as follows:

"That while this meeting would gratefully acknowledge the goodness of Divine Providence, in the removal, in a measure, of that general destitution, which afflicted our country during the last year; yet that it is confidently persuaded that the real and permanent amelioration of the condition of the working classes, is essentially connected with the progress of the Temperance Reformation."

He said the temperance reformation, my friends, has now been in existence for some ten, twelve, or it may be fourteen years, and we begin to inquire how it is that some of us have found it necessary to establish different morals to those around us. I confess to you I could not now, being a father of eight children, put intoxicating drinks on my table without committing sin—(hear, hear.) I think it is high time then for those individuals who wish to act the part of kind parents to consider their duty in this matter. There are many who have not felt it their duty to take the same position with reference to the temperance reformation that we have done, who would be sorry to hold up a finger against the movement; who rejoice in our labours, acknowledge the existence of all the evils we assail, and acquiesce in the benefits we are conferring. So far from hindering us, they bid us God speed. But I would ask those individuals who have signed their licence to say this without joining us? Has religion, that self-denying spirit, has that entitled any man to stand still and see perishing souls falling into their premature graves, and they stand still and coldly approve the efforts of those who exert themselves? and whilst they thus approve make no effort to assist. One of the most powerful efforts made against the advancement of our cause, is that which the good and virtuous, and religious man makes when he lifts the glass to his lips—(hear, hear.) I should not be afraid to trust my children in the sight of the drunkard; I am not afraid of their turning aside by that, but what I am afraid of is, their being drawn aside by the example of the moderate, the virtuous, the good—(applause.) Well then, some persons will tell us that they should be glad to join us, but their licence is endorsed by the medical man. Why if some of us had listened to the voice of an individual practitioner, we should not have been teetotalers now. I was told myself some years ago, by a medical man, that my constitution was of that character, that it would not do without strong drinks; but that medical man, would be ashamed to tell me so now; if they cannot teach us, we must teach them.—(cheers.) I think medical opinion is very often given as are other opinions, very much according to the case, for the purpose of pleasing the patient, and like the opinion of counsel can be bought for any side. Why what man will appeal to the recommendation of one medical man against 1400 medical men?—(hear, hear.) And then does our patriotism enable us to use these intoxicating drinks? We hear a great deal about politics in the present day, I am called by some, a violent politician, and I am not afraid of being called a reformer; but mark me I say, that all the reforms would not do half so much to promote the happiness and welfare and prosperity of the nation as universal teetotalism, (cheers.) I hope the time is coming, when every human being will be recognised as a brother to be loved, rather than as a mere machine to be worked—(cheers.) The lower a man is sunk in society, the greater object of sympathy and regard he becomes. I have no notion of those men who talk of political reforms, who commence not their labours at home. After all, I believe that which indorses the licence is simply the custom, fashion, or appetite. A large number there are in that class amongst whom I move, whom I assert are held in bondage by custom or fashion; I hope the day is coming fast, when fashion and opinion will be on our side. I sat down lately to a table in London, where there were twenty-seven individuals, and I only saw one who drank the intoxicating drink. I somewhat pitied him, but I did not serve him as I had been served many times, I did not jeer him, but left him to his own conscience. I have come to London to attend a meeting of the church with which I am connected, I am sorry our borders are not clear. We have acknowledgments from many parts of the country of members falling during the year through intoxicating drinks. No mention is made of thousands fallen in years gone by, but some are constantly falling and will continue to do so, as long as there are moderate drinkers in the society. Few possess the religious and moral advantages that members of the Society of Friends possess, yet with all the advantage of early training and religious education, there are continually victims falling under the influence of intoxicating drinks. Now there is one class of persons, who, if they will not listen on the score of benevolence, perhaps may be induced to regard it as a matter of self-interest, or self-preservation, I mean travellers by railway. In the late accident on the Great Western Railway; the foreman of the jury was acquainted with the policeman on duty, he well knew he was a man accustomed to intemperance. In reference to the other man, who was away from duty through illness, the foreman asked what kind of illness it was, for he had seen him at the public house smoking his pipe. And these were two of the men to whom the lives of the people were to be entrusted. I know another instance near to my own home, where the man who keeps the gates in connexion with that part of the railway, who has been all his life addicted to drink, and yet he is stationed there, within twenty yards of a public house. How is it that the Railway Directors get such men recommended to them? I'll engage, if one railway would get a set of men who were teetotalers, they would have no accidents—(hear, hear.) But mark the difficulty, I thought the most important person to be the engine driver, but if the foreman of the station was a drinker, what was the use of a teetotal engineman? and if the secretary and directors were not teetotalers, I could scarcely hope for any under them to be teetotalers either, so I find to do the thing properly they must all be teetotalers from the engine-driver to the directors—(cheers.) Some people tell me this subject is beneath their notice, they are not drunkards. Let such remember, that those who wait upon them are often those who are victims; the man learns to drink behind his master's chair. I know many men who now keep public houses of the lowest description; and who are now drunkards themselves, who learnt their drinking habits when in situations as butlers. They saw their masters drink in moderation, but the masters could not give the servants their religious principles, and the servants learnt to drink to excess. A servant who I remember once opened the door to me at the bishop's palace, now keeps a public house in the city of Gloucester. I hope the time is nearly come when we shall bring the subject before those who occupy high places in this land, whether they will or not. It is some years since our friend who has just left the meeting, (Joseph Sturge) moved for a return of the statistics on this question. The time is come I think, when we should move them again, not merely to induce them to legislate on the subject. We want them to know the facts connected with the subject. We want more sobriety in the House of Commons itself—(hear, hear.) I applaud friend Brotherton's remark, when he said to a member of that house, that he would do well to take the temperance pledge, (cheers,) and now at a time when there is so much heard of the qualification of members, I think it would be well that one qualification, be that they should be sober men—(cheers.) Amongst the various ways in which I think we can and ought to advocate this cause, I think the local press might often be used with good effect, the various accidents constantly occurring, caused by the use of strong drinks, might each form a peg on which to hang a temperance argument in our local newspapers. There are many persons who would join our ranks if we could once get the truth to hear upon them, but they are afraid to come to our meetings lest they should be convinced—(hear hear.) Let us each act consistently, whatever our position, we have each some influence to exercise; our cause must triumph, not by the aid of public meetings alone, not by the press alone, but by individual exertion also. Let each individual then aid thus, to bless his country.—(Cheers.)

EDMUND FAY, Esq. of Plymouth seconded the Resolution. He said, Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, I need hardly say, sir, that I cordially acquiesce in the first sentiment of this resolution, namely, the expression of our sincere gratitude that the affliction of famine, or at least of partial famine, which has lately afflicted a large proportion of the inhabitants of one portion of this country, and of that general destitution which pervaded large masses of the inhabitants in other parts of the country is somewhat relieved, but yet I would at the same time carefully guard those before me against closing too early your sympathies in reference to the actual suffering of many portions of the community as it exists at the present moment—(hear, hear.) I believe that actual famine still prevails to a lamentable extent amongst many portions of the Irish population, as we learn from the reports in the newspapers; and although our country has happily been freed from all such severe want as was experienced on the other side of the channel, yet it is useless to shut our eyes to the fact, that the condition of large masses of the manufacturing portion of the society of this country, is very far from being in such a state as it should be in, in the midst of such a mighty,—such a renowned,—and such a wealthy population as this professes to be—(hear, hear.) Within the last few months, the newspapers have repeatedly, represented to us the distress caused by the closing of mills, and the suspension of labour in various branches of trade. We are not, perhaps, sufficiently aware of the extent to which that suffering prevails, and I had my doubts at first, whether this resolution would not have a tendency to close our eyes and ears to the still abundant manifestations of distress—(hear, hear.) After relating an affecting incident in proof of the sufferings of the poor at the present time which were occasionally brought to light through some mysterious agency, and remarking that the worst cases of human suffering were not those which came before the public eye, and made the most noise in the world; the speaker continued:—If I had no other argument put before me to induce me to become a teetotaler than this, that hundreds and thousands are perishing for the want of that food, the elements of which are destroyed to make malt liquors, that argument would be sufficient to make me discard them for ever—(hear, hear.) Oh! let me appeal to you who are here present, if not for your own sakes, at least for the sake of suffering humanity, let me entreat you to give up the use of that which is only a matter of personal gratification, and make the little self-sacrifice required in carrying out the temperance pledge, and unite in extending its beneficent sway. Notwithstanding the efforts made to extend the influence of this Society, and to expose the fallacy upon which the drinking customs are maintained; I fear there are, perhaps, many persons in this assembly still allowing themselves to be influenced by those prejudices. I will take the liberty of referring to one at least of the fanciful objections brought against the teetotal cause; it is that "although total abstinence is a very excellent thing for the drunkard, it ought not to be followed out by those who are strictly temperate in their use of those spirituous liquors." Now all unite in agreeing that intemperance is a great evil, and all avow their readiness to acknowledge that the cause we have in hand is a glorious one, and they wish us God speed, and they say they would do as much as we would do to get rid of intemperance from the land; all they contend for is, that men should let them alone, and that if men are but temperate in the use of intoxicating drinks, there is no necessity for them to sign the temperance pledge. Until we overthrow this delusion, we shall never make much progress in the cause of the eradication of intemperance from our land. When persons use terms, it is necessary that they should clearly understand them, and also that they should take care their hearers fully understand them. Now what do our opponents mean when they say that only drunkards should sign the pledge, and that temperate drinkers need not do so; and what do they mean when they say that temperance in the use of intoxicating beverages is a commendable thing, and that intemperance is the only thing to be avoided? Who is to draw the line of demarcation between the drunkard and the temperate man. If this line of demarcation is to be of any value whatever, let it be borne in mind, there must be no doubt or delusion as to who it is that should sign this temperance pledge. Let us endeavour to illustrate this subject by supposing that the company gathered in this Hall represents the inhabitants of this country. Let me imagine I have the people of England assembled before me. Our temperance opponents wish to divide this community into two classes, the temperate and the intemperate. Let us assist them by making some preparatory classification and arrangement. Of course this platform may be supposed to contain none but teetotallers. And here let us gather the whole body of teetotallers in Great Britain, and then let us arrange the individuals in the body of the Hall, according to the amount they use of intoxicating drinks; some use them only occasionally, and in slight quantities; let such occupy the first seat, and those who take a little more, or take the same quantity more frequently occupy the second seat, and so let us go on arranging our friends according to the quantity or the frequency in which they use intoxicating drinks. Having arranged our meeting thus, and got the old, confirmed, notorious drunkards in the back and further corners of the room; let us now appeal to these temperance objectors, to draw the line across this Hall and shew us clearly and definitely who should and who should not sign the pledge—(hear, hear, and cheers.) Let us imagine two of the most determined opposers of universal teetotalism, with a white cord stretching across the Hall, and let them walk backwards from this point until they begin to think it right to drop the line which should signify that all beyond that mark were bound to sign the pledge as being unable otherwise to avoid excesses. With what anxiety would the friends look at the spot, and what a commotion there would be just at that particular point of the line where it was evident they thought the line would be dropped—(laughter and cheers)—and when they really made a demonstration of their intention of dropping the line, what an outcry there would be by the friends who were just beyond the line where the cord was dropped—(cheers.) They would say, "What right have you to drop the line here? Have those before us never been seen the worse for liquor?"—(laughter.) Be kind enough to move it one foot further back." How long do you think it would be before they gained the permission of the occupants of any form to drop the line before them?—(laughter.) This may raise a laugh, but it is the true key to the secret of teetotalism. It cannot be expected that any class of persons will voluntarily submit to the wearing a badge, if that badge be a mark of disgrace, but when it is a mark also worn by honourable men, then the objection to wear it on the part of those who really need it, ceases. It is from the difficulty of drawing a line between the temperate drinker and the drunkard, that has allowed thousands to go from temperance to intemperance and so long as this difficulty remains, the only post of security will be upon this platform where there can be no mistake at all—(cheers.) But supposing the line was dropped, and every one was clearly satisfied, that the drunkards did occupy a certain definite portion of this Hall, and that all sitting between them and this platform were strictly moderate and temperate men, still these temperate men acknowledge with us, that teetotalism is the only safeguard to those drunkards. But how, let me ask you, are those drunken men to get here to teetotalism while you sit between?—(immense cheering.) That would be difficult enough if you were to keep your places, and be still; but you do not even do that; but you are shrinking back from our appeals and arguments, and pressing back those who are behind. Now supposing in this room we wanted to get those who occupied that position to occupy this position in the room, how greatly the difficulty would be increased if those occupying the places between were not merely not to press forward, but were to shrink backward, that would have the effect of pressing those still further from the only safe resting-place—(cheers.) Then up, and "CLEAR THE WAY;" and when the way is clear they will find it easy to come forward. You ask them to sign the pledge, and yet raise objections yourselves. Why, if it is difficult for you to take the one step to place yourselves here, cannot you imagine how much more difficult it is for them to take the twenty or thirty steps to bring them on to the platform. They require every encouragement, and we believe nothing will encourage them so much as your example and influence—(cheers.) My friends, if it is a great sacrifice for you to give up your moderate drinking, how can you expect them to give up their long-cherished and deeply-loved habits of intemperance; how can you expect it of them when you show that you are too selfish to give up your moderate drinking? I ask you therefore by all the shame, the wretchedness, the destitution, and death connected with this state of things amongst us, by that sense of injury which you yourselves feel to be connected with this country, in reference to the stigma lying upon its name, that it is the most drunken nation on the earth, to show your influence and example on the side of those who are urging the only means by which this country can ever hope to be effectually cured from the disorder of intemperance—(hear, hear) and every one who has paid the slightest attention to the subject, must be convinced, that if our moderate drinkers would be the first to abandon the use of intoxicating drinks, intemperance must necessarily die a natural death, and we should hear no more of the evils connected with drunkenness in the land—(hear, hear.) We know what a fearful disease typhus fever is; but who would think of getting rid of it altogether by the mere erection of a fever hospital for the cure of the complaint? Every body knows, that although we were to multiply the erection of fever hospitals in every parish of this metropolis, although a great number might be cured, yet society and humanity would not be free from the scourge of fever, so long as the causes of fever continue to exist amongst us; so long as acts of parliament continue to exclude the air and the light of heaven—(hear, hear, and cheers); so long as our city corporations maintain their right to have open cesspools here and there; and so long as the causes of fever are allowed to riot uncontrolled; so long, notwithstanding the erection of hospitals, typhus fever will continue to sweep off its victims, by thousands and tens of thousands before us. Recent investigations respecting Sanitary measures tell us that if we would have the disease removed, we must attack the cause of the disease—(cheers); and believing that the real and permanent welfare of the working classes of this society can never be experienced until teetotalism prevails amongst them, I feel much gratitude in being permitted to second a resolution the sentiments of which I so cordially approve.

JOSEPH CLARKE, Esq. of Southampton spoke of the deep and awful responsibility of parents in connexion with this question, he had ten children, of whom eight were pledged teetotallers, and the other two he believed were practically so. He concluded by cordially supporting the Resolution which was put and carried unanimously.

Mr. MESSER proposed the next resolution, as follows:—

"That this meeting has witnessed, with approbation, the disposition manifested by the Government to ameliorate the condition of our navy, by authorising the substitution of tea and coffee for the usual allowance of grog, and that they would impress on the authorities in power the necessity of taking away the various insidious temptations to drunkenness from the soldier, and employing all rightful influences for the promotion of general national sobriety."

He said, I come from the north, and we are accustomed to do things there somewhat earnestly, and I should like this meeting to close as the meetings there are accustomed to do. I am now on my way to Wales, and after I have visited the Welsh people I shall pass on to Cornwall; but being to-day in London, I thought I would creep into this meeting, and get into a corner and see how cockneys managed teetotalism, and then report about them when I got home—(laughter and cheers.) I never imagined that I should have been recognised, but a warm-hearted brother beckoned me to the front, and I passed the rubicon; and having been connected with the cause, almost from its commencement, it would have been downright cowardice in me to refuse to speak. I am very glad that this resolution is to be seconded by my dear friend in the work of faith and the labour of love, the Rev. B. Parsons. If I should touch a vibratory chord in some heart and win it over to Christ, I shall not have laboured in vain. I hate slavery; I hate it in all its protean and withering manifestations; I hate it in the church, I hate it in the shop, I hate it in the factory, and I hated it as it existed in our colonies—(applause.) I shall never forget the hallowed emotions that were awakened in my mind, when after we had toiled long in that glorious cause, we were favoured with the opportunity of singing, just as the eyelids of the morning of the 1st of August opened;

"Hie to the mountain afar
All in the cool of the even,
Led by yon beautiful star,
First of the daughters of heaven."

And whilst we were going through that piece, written by one of the sweetest christian poets the world has in it, our esteemed friend Montgomery of Sheffield—(loud applause), we thanked God we had exerted ourselves in trying to melt away the fetters from the limbs of the slave, and in raising him to the position and stature of a man. But, sir, look on this picture and on that. My mind's eye runs back over several years. I remember once addressing a vast assembly, consisting of some four thousand persons in one of our largest chapels in Leeds on the subject of negro emancipation, and I remember we had hardly a tearless eye in the assembly, and when a certain speaker remarkable for his impassioned mode of address, had acted so powerfully on the minds of the people, as to persuade them that there was something wrong in continuing the use of sugar, and all our christian ladies in Leeds began to talk of sacrificing sugar. They felt so much for the men who had "fleecy locks and black complexions"—(laughter.) Their charity was so extensive that it spread across the Atlantic ocean, and felt for the negro there, and said, whatever sacrifice you demand, here we are in the spirit of our christianity ready to make it. I have addressed similar assemblies since, and whilst I have talked about a slavery ten times worse than colonial slavery, I say, and I make the remark unhesitatingly, a slavery ten times worse than the bondage that existed in our colonial settlements. Sir, what is the slavery of the body compared to the slavery of the mind?—(cheers.) There you might see millions living under the fierce taskmaster's eye; and Here you see a million drunkards bearing upon their brows the brand of a slavery, which if God in his mercy does not interfere with and wipe out, they will carry with them into an everlasting world—(applause.) Sirs, look on this picture, and there behold the christian missionary going away and away over the mountain soil, with a heart full of zeal, full of holy heavenly fire, to carry the message of mercy to the negro. There the negro stood; the iron entered into his heart; he was a poor, tasked, degraded, withered mass of humanity; the fetters were upon his limbs, but his mind is free—(applause.) Sir, it often affords me the highest satisfaction to know, that however men may weave fetters and put them upon these limbs, God never suffered a white tyrant, nor a black tyrant, nor a brown tyrant to sway his sceptre in the empire of mind—(loud applause.) You may shut me in a dungeon if you please, you may expatriate me from all my fond associations, you may rob me if you will of the light of day, you may rob me if you will of the music associated with the human voice; but robbed, as I might be under such circumstances, you could not keep my mind from soaring upwards—(hear, hear.) Oh no, the mind will rise; it will find its way to the very pinnacle of purity and bliss. The missionaries talked to the negroes in a style the most colloquial and touching, and by and by the poor slaves begin to feel and exclaim, "I am a man; I am interested in a covenant ordered in all things and sure; I am the purchase of blood; I am going to a bright and better sphere; I am living amidst the sun-light of heavenly favour." He believes, and then he goes on in the pathway of purity, and that path on which he trod shines brighter, and brighter, and brighter unto the perfect day, and when the slave comes to the verge of the Jordan to die there, he leaves on the banks, on this side of the river, every fetter that had galled him; and when his spirit gets out of his lacerated carcase it spreads out its wings and it soars sublimely home to the land of the blessed—(loud applause.) Well, sirs, now look on this other picture. Here we have, in a land of vision, in a land redolent with all that is delightful, in a land crowded with christian ministers, in a land filled with bibles; here, in a land in which philanthropy ever seems to be stirring herself somehow or other—in that land there are a million of drunkards—(loud applause) and when you talk to some christians about the fetters of these slaves they pucker up their pharisaic faces. Oh! there is no flesh in such obdurate hearts—(hear, hear, and cheers.) I see no consistency whatever in weeping over the black slave, while you suffer the poor white vassal at home to wear the badges of slavery—(cheering.) But I must not carry on this strain, or I shall be breaking your rules, and monopolising all the remaining time to myself, and I hate monopoly as I hate slavery—(laughter and applause.) I most cordially move the resolution.

The Rev. B. PARSONS of Ebley in seconding the resolution said, he had been for twenty years a member of the Peace Society—(cheers,) and he firmly believed that soldiers and sailors, so far as they were engaged in war, were altogether unnecessary—(cheers.) He believed the time was coming—for he was a believer in the Bible—when men should beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more"—(loud cheers.) He had lately been preaching on the book of Revelations,—he had been for sometime very much puzzled with that part which alluded to the loosing of Satan. He had at length come to the conclusion that after a thousand years of peace, a thousand years of temperance, a thousand years of intelligence and benevolence and goodness, the people would begin to believe that the history of our age was a fabulous one; they would not believe there was an age in which men took barley, or grapes, or wheat, or apples, and made them into poisons; they would say the history was a libel upon human nature. They would not believe that men made swords and spears to stab one another; they regard the history as fabulous, and the names of such men as Lord Howe, Collingwood, Nelson and Wellington, would be regarded by them as were the names of Mars, Apollo and Venus by ourselves, as quite fabulous—(cheers.) And then to let man see what human nature was when not preserved by the grace of God, Satan would be loosed again, and then would come the end, and man should learn that all good came from heaven, whilst all evil came from hell—(cheers.) He believed, then, that whilst it was bad to have soldiers at all, it was worse to have drunken soldiers, and he thought it a great movement in the right direction, that the men should have, tea, coffee, and cocoa instead of intoxicating liquors. He related a fact that had just been told to him, that a number of men consisting of 400 special constables who had been sworn in to cut down, beat, or anything else, the poor chartists, they were allowed each man a quart of beer, and a quart of punch—(hear, hear, and laughter,) and the policemen were told if they saw any of them drunk, not to lock them up, but lead them gently home—(laughter,) and this was in the great city of London! Why if they did away with drink, they might do away as soon as they liked with soldiers, and policemen, and special constables, and gaols, and unions, and workhouses—(loud cheers.) He referred to the remark made at times by some, that all teetotalers were pale, thin, and melancholy, but he thought one look at that platform, and at that meeting so animated, would at once and for ever silence such remarks. He hoped that each present would resolve that teetotalism should prevail through the land, and then peace, plenty and independence should be the portion of the working classes, and everlasting happiness and joy abound. The Rev. gentleman concluded a long and humorous speech amid much applause. The resolution being put was passed unanimously.

THOMAS COMPTON, Esq., moved, and ROBERT CHARLETON, Esq. seconded the last resolution, as follows:—

"That the thanks of this meeting be given to our much esteemed friend, W. Cash, Esq., for his courteous and impartial conduct as chairman of the Committee of this Society; and for the ability with which he has presided over the business of this evening."

The resolution was carried by acclamation. The Chairman having briefly responded, the meeting separated.

RAILWAY LABOURERS.

Correspondence between Sir GEORGE GREY and WILLIAM CASH, Esq.

ALTHOUGH the following Correspondence is not directly connected with the subject of teetotalism, yet there cannot be a doubt, that indirectly it has a very close bearing upon it; and we have reason to know that numerous, indeed, are the hardships inflicted upon individuals who have been determined, if possible, to withstand the barbarous customs which may be said to compel the working population to drink, in many instances, to excess; especially on railroads; and other large works of contract. The profit, if there were no other cause, obtained from the intoxicating drink sold by the very persons who give employment, prevents the adoption of habits calculated to improve the condition of the labourer; the last letter from the Commissioners of Railways, does not in our opinion fairly meet the question, it only tries to shelve it, but the object may easily be effected, if the public take up the matter. Government now a-days only want to be sufficiently urged to do that which they know to be right. Nothing would more essentially serve the object projected by Mr. Cash, than the adoption of rules like the following:—

1. To pay all working-men individually, and not in gangs, and never at public-houses or beer-shops.
2. To pay them before six o'clock in summer, and before five o'clock in winter.
3. Wherever practicable, to pay on Friday instead of Saturday.
4. If possible, always to pay weekly instead of fortnightly.

With these brief suggestions, we commend the correspondence to the consideration of those who feel interested in the welfare of that much oppressed class of men, railway labourers.

To Sir George Grey, Bart., M.P., Secretary for the Home Department.

RESPECTED FRIEND,—As one of the Commissioners of the coalwhippers, it has been very gratifying to me to witness the willingness of this class of men to become conservators of the public peace; but the particular object of my taking the liberty of addressing these few lines, is on behalf of a far more numerous body of individuals—I mean the railway labourers throughout the kingdom.

The coalwhippers were shamefully treated before the late Acts of Parliament were passed for their protection, and the "navvies," as they are called, are very little, if any, better used by those whom they serve. They are a hardy race, and very industrious, and, when properly attended to, and kept from the influence of intemperance, mostly conduct themselves with propriety; but, through the medium of sub-contractors, and sometimes contractors themselves, who reap a profit by their excesses in drink. It is not, I am well aware, an uncommon circumstance to find them committing outrages of a serious character, by which much alarm is occasioned and serious results take place; but I make free to assert, were they regularly paid at an early hour in the evening—were they paid individually, and not in gangs, and never at public-houses or beer-shops—we should rarely, if ever, hear of any disturbances. These are the points which have been attended to by the Coalwhippers' Commissioners with the best results; and it is a singular fact that the Act of Parliament effecting these changes does not interfere with "free-trade principles," nor in any degree with the price of labour. The labourer is protected from imposition by his employer, and does not necessarily expend that which he earns by severe labour, for his own benefit or for his wife and children's in riotous conduct at the beer-shop or public-house. Doubtless, at the present time, it would be a great satisfaction to Government to find such a body of men ready, at any time, to keep the peace, instead of disturbing it. I fear to extend this letter, but if allowed an interview personally, I would shortly state what I have seen and know of this class of our fellow-beings, and the impositions under which they have been most unjustly treated; also their excellent conduct, even where many hundreds have been congregated together, but where their passions have not been called forth. I ought to apologise for taking up thy time, but I have long taken a deep interest in this question, and satisfied I am it would be a great advantage to the employer to have rules made under Act of Parliament to protect the employed, without interfering with the freedom of trade; and to the hundreds of thousands of railway labourers it would be a boon for which they would ever feel grateful, and evince it by the same disposition which has marked the late conduct of the coalwhippers, who were formerly regarded as the most desperate and degraded body of men in the metropolis, almost without exception.

I am, very respectfully,

WILLIAM CASH.

39, Wood-street, London, 3 mo. 27, 1848.

P.S.—I omitted to state that, as with the coalwhippers so with this body of men, the country would not be put to any expense, except perhaps a trifle for preliminary charges; it is, in fact, a self-supporting principle.

Whitehall, March 28th, 1848.

Sir,—I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th instant, relative to the treatment of railway labourers, and to inform you that a copy of your letter has been transmitted to the Commissioners of Railways.

Sir George Grey regrets that the pressure of public business will prevent his fixing a time at present for seeing you on the subject.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
DENNIS LE MARCHANT.

William Cash, Esq., 39, Wood-street.

Office of Commissioners of Railways,
Whitehall, 27th April, 1848.

SIR,—I have been directed by the Commissioners of Railways to inform you, in reference to your communication of the 27th March last, on the subject of railway labourers, addressed to Sir George Grey, and forwarded by him to this Department, that in their opinion the provisions of the Coal Whippers' Act will not apply to the case of the parties in question. The Coal Whippers are employed in one locality, where their interests can be attended to by resident Commissioners, which is a very different situation from that in which railway labourers are placed.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
H. D. HARNESSE,
Capt. Royal Engineers.

Mr. W. Cash, 39, Wood Street.

We shall probably refer to this subject again at no distant period.—Ed.

NEW ZEALAND.

We are glad to find that in the new settlement of New Zealand the cause is progressing. The Wellington Total Abstinence Society, lately held their annual festival in the Wesleyan chapel in that place. We have not received any details of the proceedings, but in the Wellington Spectator we have this notice of the meeting:—"The proceedings of the meeting were harmonious, and the members of the association appear determined to wage war against the frightful evil of intemperance." We wish success to everything that can in any way benefit our species. The Rev. Messrs. Watkins and Inglis, and Messrs. Bradshaw, Harding, Hartley and others, assisted in conducting the meeting. One of the chief attractions was the music and singing: there were several instrumentalists present, and their performances were excellent.

We beg to notice that Mr. J. H. Donaldson is open to an engagement as a Temperance or Town Missionary. Letters may be addressed to the office of this Society.

By an advertisement in another part of our paper, it will be seen that Dr. F. R. Lees of Leeds, the distinguished advocate and writer on temperance, lectures this evening (June 1st) in the Literary and Scientific Institution, Greenwich. Dr. Lees has arrived in town, for the purpose of delivering several courses of popular lectures, the first series to be given in the National Hall. Those who have not heard this masterly tactician and debater, we strongly recommend to avail themselves of this golden opportunity. This is Dr. L.'s first appearance here, and his stay is only limited.

A MODEST EDITOR.—We have tasted Dick's bottled Edinburgh ale, sold by D. Tellet and Co., and can pronounce it excellent; a good hearty swig this hot weather is worth all the cold water of the Amazons, whatever teetotalers may say. When we have half-a-dozen long-necked bottles sent us, as in this case, for review, we get on with some spirit. The country at large know not what they lose by being stingy with newspaper editors.—Manx Liberal.

Abraham Murray was charged with striking William Lappen, labourer, College-wynd, and Gilbert Holmes with being actor, art and part, in the commission of the offence. Holmes pled not guilty, and Murray admitted that he was so beastly drunk at the time on which the charge was founded, that he did not know whether he was guilty or not. The charge was found proven against him, and a fine of 3s. was imposed. Holmes was dismissed from the bar with an admonition.

On Tuesday week, an inquest was held at Stratton-on-Trop, Warwickshire (but within the Coroner's boundary for Gloucestershire,) on the body of Amelia South, aged 26, who, when being driven in a gig by a young man named Joseph Phipps, was thrown upon the road, by the vehicle being upset through furious driving, and almost immediately expired; Phipps was tipsy, and was likewise thrown out and rendered insensible by the shock, but afterwards recovered. A verdict of "Manslaughter" was returned against him, and he has been committed to Warwick gaol.—Bristol Mercury.

On Saturday week William Dishman, Captain of the Speed, Teignmouth, poisoned himself on board his vessel at Newport. His wife was accidentally drowned about twelve months ago, which preyed upon his mind, and led him to excessive drinking, which, in turn caused his premature death.—Bristol Mercury.

WATER CURE ESTABLISHMENT, SUDBRROOK PARK,

NEAR RICHMOND, SURREY.

This noble mansion, formerly the residence of the Argyle and Buccleuch families, has recently undergone considerable alterations and improvements. The accommodations are both ample and agreeable, and suited to those who are seeking to recruit their health by change of air and scene, retirement, or cheerful society, and requiring at the same time a partial or complete water treatment. The grounds are extensive, and much admired for the manner in which they are laid out, and residents have the privilege of a private entrance to Richmond Park. Dr. Ellis hopes that the success he has met with in the cure of Patients of all ages may help to remove the prejudice which has more or less existed against the treatment of disease by means of water (not necessarily cold water). It is now, however, well known to be the safest, as well as the most speedy and effectual, cure for many disorders; amongst those may be mentioned aphonia, or loss of voice from public speaking and otherwise, gout, rheumatism, contracted or swelled limbs, nervous debility, &c. Dr. Ellis may be consulted at Sudbrook Park daily, and at 28, Sackville-street, Piccadilly, from 10 to 3 o'clock, every Friday. The Mansion, Park, and grounds may be seen on Wednesdays only, by cards, which may be obtained at 28, Sackville-street, or Wall's Library, Richmond.

THE SUNDAY TRAFFIC.

Within the last few months, public meetings have been held in Liverpool, Bristol, and in other parts of England, at which petitions to the legislature in favour of a suspension of Sunday trading in alcoholic liquors have been adopted, and duly forwarded for presentation. Aably written articles have also appeared in the different periodicals, setting forth potent reasons, why the Government should be importuned, to the end that the opening of public-houses on the first day of the week, no longer remain a licensed paradox, a veritable and special nuisance, tolerated in this age of unprecedented reform, only because clothed in the panoply of law.

In the present number of this paper will be found the copy of a petition recently forwarded to both Houses of Parliament, expressive of the views entertained by the Committee of the National Temperance Society. From this it will be seen, that the petition movement has our hearty approval. Thousands we believe whose attention has not been arrested by the question of temperance as we view it, will from this agitation be compelled to look our principles in the face, or instead of seeking shelter, as numbers now do, in neutral ambuscade, they will assuredly be driven to the necessity of making a truce, or declaring for open war. To the latter, the friends of temperance could have no possible objection. Open and manly encounter is not half so much to be dreaded, as the apathetic hostility that too generally prevails. If public opinion, that pressure from without, to which even legislative bodies have so frequently yielded, compel parliament to pass into law that which we at least deem desirable, it may be predicted that then it will be manifest to those now slow of belief, that a diminution of drunkenness and crime on the one hand, with a correspondent increase of social order on the other, is only typical of the blessings of UNIVERSAL TEMPERANCE.

the traffic one day in seven (a very modest request from those who believe the system of making and selling intoxicating drink, to be evil only and without mitigation) have emanated from the petitioners, and have been held as answers to objections either expressed or understood. Now we are far from concluding that the business of affirming the advantage likely to arise from such policy rests with the advocates of the Petition movement. We hold that those engaged in the traffic are called upon to show why their vocation should enjoy extraordinary privileges, it rests not with us to show cause why houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath, should not be opened, but with them to show cause why they should not be closed. Let any one compare the following provisions of some ancient statutes, and it will at once be manifest that the trade of the licensed victualler does not answer to its original design, much less was it intended that houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors as now licensed, were to be rendezvous for the lounge, the idle and the profligate. In Jacob's Law Dictionary, published in 1729, this point of law is fully explained. Victuals, (victus) sustenance and things necessary to live by, as meats and provisions. Victuallers are to sell their victuals at reasonable prices, or forfeit double value. And victuallers, fishmongers, poulterers, &c., coming with their victuals to London, shall be under the government of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and sell their victuals at prices appointed by Justices, &c.—23 Ed. 3, c. 6, 7 R. 2—13 R. 2.

Again, no person during the time he is Mayor, or in office in any town, shall sell victuals on pain of forfeiture, &c. But if a victualler be chosen Mayor, whereby he is to keep the assize by statute, two discreet persons of the same place who are victuallers are to be sworn to assize bread, wine and victuals, during the time that he is in office, and then after the price assessed by such persons, it shall be lawful for the mayor to sell victuals, &c.—6 R. 2, c. 9.—3 H. 8, c. 8.

And again, 29 Car. 2, cap. 7, it is held : Sunday

(Dies Dominicus.) Is the Lord's day set apart for the service of God: and if any butchers shall kill or sell meat on a Sunday, they are liable to a penalty of 6s. 8d. And carriers, drovers, &c., travelling on the Lord's day incur a forfeiture of 20s. No person shall do any worldly labour on a Sunday (except works of necessity and charity) on pain of 5s. And crying or exposing to sale any wares or goods on a Sunday, the goods to be forfeited to the poor, &c., on conviction before a justice of peace, who may order the penalties and forfeitures to be levied by distress; but this is not to extend to dressing meat in families, inns, cook-shops, or victualling-houses, nor to crying of milk on a Sunday in the morning and evening.

From the foregoing statutes we conclude—1st. That licensed victuallers as a body have failed to sustain their identity simply as victuallers, and that 2nd. The permission to open houses on the Sabbath, was granted only because victualling houses were placed in the same category with cook-shops and inns; being regarded as houses for the sale of useful and beneficial articles. Hence the prohibition was not to extend to "dressing meat in families, inns, cook-shops, or victualling-houses, nor to the crying of milk in the morning and evening of the Sabbath." Whatever may have been the primary intention of the law, no sane person will argue, that a necessity now exists for the gin-shops and drinking saloons that everywhere abound. To say that the same law which made it imperative on the victualler to provide food or refreshment, was to be understood also to mean that the man so requiring food might act the voluntarious demon by the same law, is to shock all common sense, is to "strain" the law, would be as nonsensical as to contend that other than a spherical body, can cast a circular shadow in every direction. With views and feelings akin to those now expressed, deeply deploring the juvenile depravity, and the gross wickedness everywhere abounding in this Christian country, greatly promoted by the Sunday traffic in intoxicating drinks, the following Petition for presentation to both Houses of Parliament has been prepared:—

To the Honourable the House of Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament Assembled. The Petition of the Committee of the National Temperance Society,

SHEWETH,—

That the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors are fraught with most pernicious effects to all classes of her Majesty's subjects.

That while there is wide-spread distress among the working population, a considerable portion of the earnings of the industrial classes is spent in providing the means of demoralization.

That while your Honorable House is engaged in enacting laws for the regulation and well-being of society, your petitioners desire to direct the attention of your Honorable House to intemperance as one great cause of social disorder.

That your petitioners, more especially deplore the sanction permitted by the Statute Book for the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sabbath, because on that day such license is particularly operative for evil.

That the diminished cases of drunkenness in London, Manchester, Liverpool and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, since the Metropolitan Improvement Act of 1839, has demonstrated the wise policy of the Government in the partial closing of public-houses on Sundays, and your petitioners therefore pray your Honourable House to make more stringent the law, or altogether to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath, throughout the kingdom.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

A Bill, which has passed its second reading, has just been introduced in the Upper House by the Earl of Harrowby, for regulating the sale of beer, and other liquors on the Lord's Day, which is an extension to the whole of the kingdom, of the Metropolitan Improvement Act of 1839, and which may be taken as indicating that the "powers that be," are not quite satisfied with the obvious connexion that exists between Sunday tipping and Sunday demoralization.

CHRISTIAN DUTY.

To the Editor of the Bombay Temperance Advocate.

VERY DEAR SIR.—Might not the following Prayer of John Bunyan form a useful Handbill to put into the possession of pious opponents to the total abstinence principle? I would have them to read the passage upon the margin; and then let them offer up the prayer.

"O Lord, leave me not, in my own blindness either to approve of, or condemn this doctrine;—If it be of God, let me not despise it;—If it be of the Devil, let me not embrace it. Lord, I lay my soul, in this matter, only at thy feet; let me not be deceived I humbly beseech thee."

Methodists, I hear your readers exclaim—"Who is so ignorant of his bible as not to know that the passage on the margin is the 21st verse of the 14th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans!—"

Permit me in reply to this exclamation, to offer a brief memoir, not of fictitious persons, but (I solemnly affirm) a memoir of men and women, who shall as certainly appear at the judgment-seat of Christ, as I shall.

I knew a lady of my own rank in life, in Scotland who died of fits brought on by drinking whisky. After the first attack of fits, her husband asked my advice as to the mode to be adopted for keeping whisky out of her reach. Finding him either unable or unwilling to espouse and vindicate the principle of total abstinence, I advised—the next best thing—that he should be an abstainer on constraint, and (locking up all intoxicating liquors) make his household forego their drink.

He did this—he did all this! all this slavish bondage was submitted to rather than underrate the glorious emancipation of mind and body involved in the total abstinence principle!—

The lady was too far gone; her stomach was ruined; her days were numbered; but the salutary nature of total abstinence received a testimony even in a case so destitute of hope as hers was.—Although she had for a long period given up going abroad, and actually believed herself to be incapable of the exertion; after a few days of constrained abstinence, she discovered that she really could take exercise, and she walked out daily; but the self-will which had led her to exceed in liquids, rendered her obstinate in the use of solids, which were deleterious to her ruined stomach, and seizure after seizure, with months of interval came upon her, till the last of all came upon her, and she died.

The husband also improved greatly in health; at all times handsome, he became quite youthful in his appearance; and after a few days, drank water at meals without at all regretting the loss of his accustomed whisky-punch; nay, when dining from home, he used both wine and whisky with a degree of moderation to which he had not previously been accustomed.

Let me now attempt to describe this man's character. He is a good man; he is a never failing communicant, but he is better still—He bears very many distinct marks of the Christian character, and he is of a particularly tender, compassionate, and gentle disposition. He and his wife married young; theirs was a love match; they have prosperous and happy children. Will it be believed that, these things being so, this excellent man resumed the use of whisky on his wife's decease.

He did so,—he resumed the use of a fluid, which not only made the wife of his bosom stumble in her Christian course, but actually murdered her.

Does this man know that God has said, that "It is good not to drink any thing whereby a brother is made to offend?"

He well knows this; but does he act upon it? Does he pursue the course dictated by God?—

The brother of the poor lady, whose sad history I have related, is still alive; he too was a drunkard, and is now the wreck of one; and fear of consequences has compelled him to give up his dearly beloved whisky at the twelfth hour.

The wife of this gentleman is, by mere nature, the most temperate woman I am acquainted with; she takes but little, and that little she cares not to have; indeed, she as often leaves it as she takes it.

But this woman sneers at Temperance Societies! The total abstinence principle is the most marked object of her contempt; she holds the thing to spring from weak or even crazed intellects! She can gaze upon the inane countenance of her husband with trembling solicitude for his safety, she can implore him to adhere to the physician's advice; and yet in that blessed principle which was expressly framed for the prevention and rescue of such as he, this lady can only behold what she considers to be deserving of derision!—

This lady reads her bible; it is all I can say with truth upon the subject; I think it is likely enough that she may have heard that there is such a thing as a passage condemnatory of using anything that is injurious to her brother; but it is as likely that she may not be aware of any such passage.

I have portrayed two characters in real life; I know them well, and have done them entire justice; they are both persons of much good sense—of the highest possible decorum—and (prone to reprobate what is cruel or unfeeling) they would be much shocked if anything of such a tendency could be imputed to them.

Now, let me ask, how is a state of mind such as theirs to be accounted for in a Christianized country?

My reply is short—Look at the clergy!—

We shall cease to wonder that it should be so with the religious and the decently conducted of the gentry, and the poorer classes of Scotland, if we look at their spiritual instructors. The marginalized portion of the counsel of God in the beginning of this essay, is never made known and insisted on by the professed teachers of the "whole counsel of God;"—nay, those very teachers themselves are guilty of drinking what "causes their flocks to stumble and offend."

The Judges of the land have repeatedly declared whisky to be the cause of almost all the crime in Scotland. The clergy know this to be a true testimony, and yet they drink whisky!—

know that it is breaking the hearts of all who use it, and that the eternal consequences are of a character more sad than tongue can tell; they know that their example causes the use of whisky and is quoted in justification of the abuse of it; they know that the drunkard quotes their example; and yet they use whisky!—

Do they not know that He, whom they profess to serve, and to follow, has said—"It is good not to drink what causes brethren to offend."—They know this but they disobey it!

The clergy of Scotland know that whisky produces those sins which they are called upon to deal with in their ministerial capacity; and yet they can find it in their hearts to use whisky!—When a poor sobbing child of twenty stands before them, covering a poor sweet babe with scanty shawl, and with many sore tears, to hear their reproof, the clergy of Scotland know that whisky was used to accomplish her wretchedness; and, yet, the clergy of Scotland do not feel heart-sick when they see whisky!—they know that the hellish poison is benumbing all feeling in the heart of our land; that it is blighting up that warm heartedness and nobleness of manhood, which did at one, and that no distant period, form within the Scottish bosom the safeguard of the gentle sex; and yet the Scottish clergy use whisky! O! it is quite enough to make my hard stony eyes shed scalding tears to think of the rural female loveliness of Scotland so dishonourably and basely betrayed to ruin!—But, by whom betrayed?—Who are responsible for our nation's degeneracy? Who but the public teachers of that nation, who use the fluid which corrupts it. Who but the public teachers of Scotland, who know that God has said—"It is not good to drink whisky, or any thing, by which brethren stumble and are made weak, and drunken."

It may appear to some that my words are harsh against the clergy; I ask, are they contrary to scripture? are they contrary to right feelings? David called the water from the well of Bethlehem the blood of his generals, and could not feel it to be right to drink it; only let the clergy of Scotland regard whisky in the same light! It is ruining thousands of souls; they must give it over, they must not drink whisky. I charge them, as they shall answer to God at the great day of judgment, to cease drinking "what causes brethren to offend."

I tell them that it is in vain for them to speak as follows—"We are not of those who would inculcate total abstinence as a duty, where the rules of temperance are never transgressed; for we fail to see on what ground men, who can use in moderation the good gifts of a beneficent Providence, are called on to relinquish them, merely because such gifts are abused by others who possess less power of self-restraint." I tell the clergy of Scotland that they are bound by the word of God to abstain from any of his gifts of drink, when they are "abused by others;" this very abuse is made in Scripture the very reason for abstinence—"It is good (saith God, who cannot err) not to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, is caused to offend, or is made weak."

But it may be asked, how does all this concern persons in India? We cannot persuade the Scottish clergy to cease from drinking whisky. Yes; let us but abstain from all beverages which intoxicate, and the clergy of every country under heaven will feel the moral force of the act.

Let us but raise that voice crying in the wilderness of men's hard hearts. . . . Abstain from what causes brethren to offend! and the way of the Lord will be prepared with a smoothness hitherto unknown; only get whisky banished out of mansees, and Scotland might be born in a day.

If the total abstinence principle were exempt from sacrifice, all would be total abstainers; it would, in that case, but agree with the universal inclination of mankind, which can rarely be pronounced the path of duty.

To conclude—Would to God that I could persuade all who read this letter of this truth—Total abstinence is its own great reward. I never enjoyed any fluid so much as I now enjoy cold water. The use of the richest wine never conveyed to my palate the enjoyment of nature's simplest element. Sacrifice and relinquishment, and such repulsive words, may accurately describe the beginning of the total abstainer's career; but enjoyment, happy freedom from infatuation, and thankfulness, can alone be applied to his after experience. I repeat my solemn aspiration—Would to God that I could persuade the temperate of the truth of these things, ere it be too late to move them by any such consideration.

I am, your humble servant,

MICHAEL SHAW.

Shikarpore, 25th January, 1848.

THE REV. JAMES CAUGHEY AND TEETOTALISM.

(To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.)

DEAR SIR,—I have just met with an interesting letter from Mr. Caughey, it is published in the Wesleyan newspaper, date June 1st, and it is well worthy the perusal of every lover of his kind. In the letter, he describes a temperance meeting which he attended at Albany, United States; and forwards to the Editor an epitome of the speech he delivered on the occasion. I have thought an extract for the Chronicle would be acceptable, and I think do good; it ought to be read by every parent. He says:—

"The Lord graciously assisted me to plead the cause of the rising generation; their exposure to bad example; the possible effects of intoxicating drinks upon their destiny in time and eternity. I insisted that every parent should be notified, that if the race of drunkards is to be sustained and perpetuated as a class, they must be recruited from the youthful generation springing up around them; that race of wretched beings who hoot and yell in our streets, babble in the grog shops, mourn in the workhouse, pine in the state prison, groan in the malefactor's cell, and dangle from the gallows;—if the ranks of these are to be sustained, the supply must be obtained from those bright-eyed little fellows who lift up their gleeful voices around us. I begged of every parent one favour, that, on his return home, he and his wife should go into the sleeping apartment of the children God had given them; and while gazing upon their precious charge, to ask themselves the following question: When the genius of intemperance is making a draught to replenish the ranks of his ruined sots, which of these little fellows shall we consent to surrender to the demon? Which of these daughters shall we give up to be the wife of the drunkard? Where is the father or mother that could bear the terrible thought? The bare possibility is too horrible to be entertained for a moment. And yet such a fatal demand, such an appalling catastrophe, is within the limit of possibilities with regard to the children of all the parents in this assembly. How is it possible then that heads of families can stand aloof from the glorious cause in which we are engaged. How can they look up to heaven with confidence, or look forward to Providence in trust, while they treat the total abstinence society with cold indifference! Is it not the palladium of your children's safety? and your carriage towards it may leave upon the minds of your children an indelible impression for good or evil. We would have you look upon every liquor-shop as the mortal foe of your household; as the probable instrument in the ruin of some of your little ones, present and eternal. We would urge upon you to entertain no notions of security, even should you join the teetotal ranks, so long as one of these infernal dens remain open in this city. We would entreat you to lend your influence with the legislature of this state, and pray also that the time may speedily come when public opinion shall unite with the strong hand of the law in sweeping away these nuisances from a jeopardised community."

Mr. Caughey evidently believes, that the heads of families and the governments of countries, are the parties to whom we must look for deliverance from the thralldom of strong drink; and I most fully concur in the sentiment. If the rising generation fall into the snare of intemperance, the guilt will lay, to a very great degree, with those parents who have by their practice and example, given to their children the desire and the appetite for intoxicating liquors. Let me say for the hundredth time; children know nothing but what they learn, and they learn from those by whom they are surrounded, and so long as preachers, teachers, and parents drink, it is madness to expect children to abstain. Mr. Caughey says, "we would have you look upon every liquor-shop as the mortal foe to your household," and is it not so! Strong drink has been to this country and to America, what the destroying angel was to the city referred to in sacred history: "There is not a house in which there is not one dead." And yet we, who have thus suffered in our families, stick to the bottle, the beer barrel, and the cyder cask, as if our salvation and existence were corked up in them. He says, "We would urge upon you to entertain no notions of security so long as one of these infernal dens (public-houses) remain open in this city." This is the advice of a true watchman on the walls of Zion, it has been wafted across the Atlantic by the wind of heaven, the million tongued press has taken up the cry, and by its mighty power; backed by the living voice, we reiterate the injunction of this man of God. "Entertain no notions of security so long as these places remain open." The public-house is a snare and a trap, and all supporters of such places are abettors of evil. Public-houses must be pounced upon, and government must be made to feel its responsibility in this matter. No family is unscathed, no church free, and no country safe where they exist. It may be law for the publican to sell drink, but it is not justice.

Where do our paupers come from?

Where are our thieves made?

Where are our morals most endangered?

We reply at the public-house.

'Tis here they learn

To indigence and rapine; till at last

Society grown weary of the load,

Shakes her encumbered lap, and casts them out.

It may be law, but we repeat it is not justice. Government must be appealed to in this matter, and if we can do no more, let us petition the legislature, at least to close these flood-gates of iniquity on the Sabbath.

Yours faithfully,

T. WHITTAKER.

SEAMEN.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER ADDRESSED TO LLOYD'S.

DEAR SIR,—It has surprised me to learn with what apathy the Underwriters act in regard to the passing qualifications of masters and mates in the Merchant Service, for they are the party who ultimately have to pay.

Since I left attending Lloyd's personally, my experience, practically as a ship-owner in Liverpool, has proved beyond confute, that two-thirds of the vessels stranded and wrecked, are occasioned by the ineligibility of the captains, one-half of this two-thirds, I set down to drunkenness and the consequences thereof, the other half of the two-thirds, to want of the necessary qualification; and that only one-third of the whole losses at sea, are occasioned by stress of weather and incorrect charts.

I never expected that Captain Fitzroy's bill would pass; it was altogether unsuited to the merchant service. What the Underwriters want is, simply a sober captain and mate who can find his place at sea in latitude and longitude, by all the methods in use at THIS DAY. Who can rig a ship—who can work and handle a ship, either at sea or at single anchor—who knows how to stow cargo correctly, as regards placing the heaviest and lightest parts in their proper places, in regard to centre of gravity, and who knows the main leading features of the lights in, and features of the English and St. George's Channel.

Now, with regard to sobriety, I do most certainly believe this is the greatest want. Poor Captain —, of the —, so many years, he was when I first took him by the hand as one of — men, one of the most correct and industrious young men I ever met with. I educated him and gave him a lift, others did so afterwards, and then I gave him the —, which he superintended building; he worked well for four or five years, but at last drink, that monster, mastered him. I was compelled to unship the very man (I thought most of) for drunkenness; his wife then used her influence, and he worked for a few years in the employ of —, but he fell often, it grew upon him; and last year he died an awful death at sea, a confirmed drunkard. You may recollect the poor fellow got on his way to Manilla, as far as the Bay of Biscay, one voyage, and then put back to Cork again. I went down there and found the monster drink had done it, he had been drunk all the time he was out, and he was raving mad when I boarded the vessel in Cork; of course I unshipped him. This is only one instance which I note, because you may recollect it, as you were on either vessel or cargo without doubt. I could name, I believe, a hundred similar cases. I do not assert that the captains are all drunk when their ships are lost, but I do know that the effects of drinking and tipping—at it—at it always—mystifies a man's mind, and he becomes careless of his imperative and necessary duties. The officers become negligent, the ship's order becomes bad, her gear out of sorts; he forgets the proper times that the best observations can be taken for latitude and longitude; he forgets the lead, and timely look out for land or danger; a gale arises, and she is lost, or runs on dangers or the land, on account of incorrect reckoning, or no reckoning at all. Too many captains lead a hermit kind of life, avoid all harmonious and domestic conversation with their mates, make the rum bottle their companion, and do not even allow their mates to know the latitude and longitude they reckon in daily. This I know arises in some cases from the captain being sensible of his defective qualifications and of his neglect, and he wishes to hide those defects from those under him, his proper duty would be to compel by AGREEMENT his chief mate, at least every day at noon, to bring his reckoning in latitude and longitude to the captain, they should then compare notes, and should jointly, together prick the ship off on the chart, deliberate together on their future course, &c., &c., shape it, &c., and so on every day at noon, from port to port; this would be some security to the Underwriters, even if the captain were a drunkard, the mate might not be so.

ROBERT WISE.

Doings of Suong Drink.

ROBBERY FROM THE PERSON.—Edward Tappin, aged 21, was charged with stealing money from the person of John Lewis. About four o'clock on Sunday morning, the 19th March, the prosecutor left the Three Horse Shoes public house, and was followed by the prisoner, who put his hand in his pockets and took out his money and a tobacco-box. The prisoner struggled with him and tried to get away, but P.C. 220, came up, and took him into custody. Before the constable came up the prisoner threw some money away from him. When searched, 4s. and a tobacco-box were found upon the prisoner; the tobacco-box was identified by the prosecutor. The prisoner and prosecutor had been drinking in the same house for several hours, but it did not appear that they were companions, or knew anything of each other. The prisoner questioned the prosecutor as to how much liquor he had taken before leaving the house, and a running conversation took place between them, by which the Court was enlightened as to the degrees of drunkenness. A quart of beer will make a man "merry;" three pints, "a little on;" two quarts, "half-drunk;" five pints, "nearly gone;" but how much it will take to make a man "quite drunk," was not shown. Guilty. A prior conviction (in 1842) was proved against the prisoner. He was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, with hard labour.—Felix Farley's Bristol Journal.

DEATH BY DROWNING.—Early on Sunday morning, a party of young men, eight in number, who had been taking their potations throughout the night, determined upon an excursion by water, and for that purpose engaged two boats at a ferry-house on the river Aire, known as the Spring Gardens Inn. Taking some ale with them, they started down the river; but before they had proceeded far, the party in the leading boat commenced rocking it, which caused it to dip, fill with water, and sink. The crew, after being immersed in the water, eagerly grasped at the second boat as it was passing, and caused it to capsize, thus plunging the whole of the party in the water. One of them, named Hampshire, being a good swimmer, succeeded in rescuing six of his companions from drowning, and landing them on terra firma, but the seventh was drowned.—Unicursal.

AWFUL SUICIDE.—A damp was thrown on the features of Christmas, in our little town, by the melancholy circumstance of a soldier of the detachment of the 88th stationed here, having committed suicide by shooting himself, the ball passing through the chest and coming out at the back of the neck. It seems that on Christmas-eve he was the sentinel stationed before the officers' quarters, where he had an opportunity of meeting persons, some of whom conveyed liquor to the unfortunate man to such a degree that he became incapable of executing the duties of his post, and was accordingly stripped of his belt, and confined in the guard-room. In the morning he was brought before the commanding officer, who told him that he should represent the heinousness of his offence to the colonel, with the view of bringing him to a court-martial. Being a man of very good character previously, it seems that this had such an effect upon his mind as to cause him to meditate self-destruction. He complained of illness after his interview with the officer, and was accordingly allowed to retire to the hospital, which is situated in the upper story of the barracks. A comrade brought him his dinner and a pint of ale, which each man was provided with through the munificence of the officers on Christmas day; but he desired the man that brought the dinner to drink the ale, as he himself did not care for it. The man being pressed to do so, drank part of the ale, and then retired on other business. Deceased was in a small room of the hospital, and took the opportunity, whilst the rest of the patients were in another apartment, to steal a musket, which he conveyed unperceived into the bed. He then fastened a string to his toe and attached it to the trigger, by which he was enabled to carry out the rash design. The report being heard, his comrades rushed in, and found him in the last gasp and enveloped in flames, as the sheet caught fire. When the smoke and fire were cleared away, the unhappy man presented a melancholy spectacle before the eyes of his comrades, to each of whom he was endeared, having been a general favourite from his many good qualities. He was a remarkably fine-looking soldier.—Limerick Reporter.

INQUEST.—Thursday May 25th, at the Plume of Feathers, Redcliff Street, on the body of James Bishop Chapman, aged 50. The deceased who was landlord of the house, was an excessive drinker, and his intemperate habits caused a softening of the brain, which ended in delirium tremens and a wretched death; verdict accordingly.—Bristol Mercury.

ANOTHER DEATH BY DROWNING.—A seaman has perished in the Clyde, at Glasgow, from a foolish wager. He had been bathing; a man offered a bet that he would not swim across the river; he accepted the challenge, and drank so much whiskey from his companion's bottle, that he was drunk before he entered the stream. As soon as he got into the water he sank.—Ibid.

MANSLAUGHTER IN PRESTON.—On Tuesday evening, April 25th, great excitement prevailed in Preston through a report that James Duckworth a livery stable-keeper, had been killed; the report proved too true. An inquest was held in the Town Hall on the following Thursday. Two men, James Townlay, a beer-house keeper, and Richard Catterall, a plasterer, were in custody. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased who was well known in Preston, had been drinking with Townlay in a spirit vault, in the shambles. A dispute arose between deceased and Townlay, both of whom were in liquor, respecting money matters. Deceased said to Townlay, "Well, Jem, will you go into the yard and fight me a round or two." Townlay agreed. They left the vault for that purpose, but were persuaded not to fight by the vault-keeper, with whom Townlay returned into the vaults, where they met Catterall, who, according to one of the witnesses, was very drunk. Catterall said, "What's to do?"

Townlay told him. Catterall then said, "I'll go and fight him." Catterall then ran to the deceased and challenged him to fight; he refused. Catterall challenged deceased again, when deceased said, "I don't want to fight you, but if you will stand on your feet, I'll fight you a round or two." Deceased then pulled off his coat and hat. Catterall seized deceased by the thick of the thigh, and ran him backwards, when he fell on his side against the corner of a projecting stone, which formed the basement of a pillar of one of the butcher's shops, and Catterall fell on him; deceased cried out and said, he was killed. He was taken up and carried to the Golden Lion Inn, where he died in a few minutes after. The jury returned a verdict against Catterall. Townlay was discharged. The deceased was about 48 years of age, and reputed as a good natured and generous fellow, but for many years had been a slave to intemperance.

OUTRAGE ON BOARD A STEAM BOAT.—J. Green and J. Robinson, two of the crew of the Era steam-boat, were charged with the following outrageous conduct: Mr. G. Waugh, of 5, Great James Street, Bedford Row, stated that he engaged the Era steamer for Saturday last, to convey a party of his friends to Hampton Court and back, the boat, of course, to be exclusively theirs for the day. The party took a great quantity of provisions, champagne and other wines on board, in hampers, and after a visit to Hampton Court, returned to the vessel, where they partook of a cold collation which had been prepared during their absence, and then, the deck having been cleared, dancing commenced. The first disagreeable thing that occurred was, that although he (Mr. Waugh) had paid the captain (brother of the defendant Green) for the hire of the vessel, and every other contingent expense, he again demanded the pier dues, and, having been reminded that they had been paid, set up a claim of fifteen shillings extra for servants, which, to prevent any dispute, witness paid. The next thing was, that Mr. Waugh ordered some bottled beer to be given to the musicians, when the defendant Robinson came and demanded payment. Mr. Waugh, who had ordered his servant to pay for the beer, called him, and the latter informed Robinson that he had paid for it. Shortly after this, Mr. Waugh went to the captain, and pointing out Robinson, who had been extremely abusive, told him that he was drunk, and, finding both the defendants in a few minutes afterwards lying amongst the wine bottles and hampers, again called the captain's attention to the circumstance, when the latter went towards the men. In the course of two or three minutes, Mr. Waugh saw that there was something the matter at one end of the boat, and on going there he found the two defendants attacking the captain in a most ferocious manner, at the same time making use of most disgusting language. Mr. Waugh and other gentlemen interfered, observing that they could not allow such gross misconduct, and endeavoured to separate the parties. At that moment the man left the helm, and came to the assistance of the two defendants, and the greatest confusion prevailed. Mr. Waugh received a blow on his chin; at the next moment Green struck him a violent blow in the eye. Some of Mr. Waugh's friends came up, and insisted upon his going to the other end of the boat, which he did. During the confusion, which lasted some minutes, the party were left to the mercy of the stream, the captain and helmsman both being engaged upon deck. The vessel was at the time a little above Battersea Bridge; and, but for the good conduct of the persons in the engine-room, who speedily shut the steam off, the consequences must have been most frightful. As it was, one of their friends, a nautical gentleman, went to the wheel and rendered considerable service. Defendants, after the most desperate conduct, were confined below until the arrival of the vessel by the side of the Investigator police ship, off Somerset House, whither the captain, by orders of the many gentlemen who had been assaulted, had consigned them. It then required at least four constables to secure Green, and it was found necessary to pinion him by tying his hands and legs. The party then discovered that the whole of their provisions and wine had disappeared; and, upon its being demanded, joints and delicacies, champagne, port, sherry, and brandy were produced from different hiding-places; but, on their arrival at Hungerford, three bottles of champagne, one of port, and another of brandy, had again been carried off.—Mr. Waugh, who exhibited a black eye, said that the party consisted of seventy persons, the greater number of whom were ladies. Their alarm was extreme: one, the wife of a barrister, was so overcome by fright that her husband was obliged to convey her on shore in a small boat; and the consternation of another, who was enclave, was such as to cause serious apprehensions for her safety. When the captain was informed that no person was to be allowed to leave the vessel until the police were brought on board he readily acquiesced.—Mr. E. Stanley, Mr. C. J. Nealds, and Mr. J. D. Sadler, who were of the party, gave confirmatory testimony of the outrageous conduct of the prisoners. The whole of them had been assailed, and some of them bore marks of the violence with which they had been attacked. Mr. Stanley, after parrying some of the blows dealt at him, was thrown down and beat as he lay on the deck by two persons, one of whom he believed to be Robinson. Mr. Neald, who acted for a time as helmsman, proved that Green stuck him twice in the face. Mr. Sadler also received a violent blow from one of the parties, and the two servants were also beaten. The defendants said "Here goes," as they ranged themselves for the attack; and it was the impression of the witness that they intended to have swept the deck, if possible; at any rate the fellows appeared to have indiscriminately attacked all who came in their way.—Mr. Broderip observed that the case was of by far too serious a nature for him to dispose of summarily. He therefore felt it his duty to send the defendants for trial at the Middlesex Sessions. He would accept bail, themselves in £100. each, and two sureties in £50. each, for their appearance to answer the charge.—Defendants were locked up.

Public Meetings, Progress, &c.

NEW TEMPERANCE FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

Two preliminary meetings have been held in London, during the past month, for considering the propriety of forming a National Temperance Friendly Society, on Scientific Principles; both meetings were held at the house of F. G. P. Neison, Esq., 3, St. James's Square, who was present on both occasions. Mr. Neison stated it as his opinion, "that very few of the Temperance Friendly Societies at present in existence are founded on safe principle," and strongly recommended the formation of a National Temperance Friendly Society.

Benjamin Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P., Dr. Oxley,

Dr. Ferrier, R. L. Pinching, Esq., (Surgeon), W. Sims, Esq.; Messrs. Thomas Whittaker, Selway, Culverwell, and other gentlemen, spoke as to the desirability of such a Society, and promised to render it their most cordial support.

It was moved by Mr. W. H. Freemantle, seconded by W. Sims, Esq., and unanimously adopted.

"That in the present state of the temperance cause, it is considered desirable to establish an institution, for the purpose of raising by contributions from its members a fund or funds, for mutually relieving the members during sickness, infirmity, old age," &c.

It was moved by Mr. J. Sandle, seconded by Benjamin Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P., and unanimously adopted.

"That the following gentlemen (with power to add to their number,) be a provisional committee, to organize a Society, such as contemplated in the preceding resolution, viz.:—Dr. Oxley, Dr. Ferrier, R. L. Pinching, Esq., W. Sims, Esq., Messrs. W. H. Freemantle, W. R. Selways, W. Culverwell, and Tresidder.

All persons favourable to the formation of the above Society, are requested to communicate with Mr. John Edward Tresidder, Secretary, pro tem., 4, Rockingham Row, East, New Kent Road, London.

DR. F. R. LEES.

The metropolis, and a few privileged places in the vicinity, have during the past month, been favoured with a visit by Dr. Frederic R. Lees, F.R.S.A., of Edinburgh; the uncompromising advocate of genuine temperance. Dr. Lees gave his first lecture (on the Laws of Life,) at the Literary Institution, Greenwich, on Thursday evening, the 1st ult., and a second (on the Wine Question,) on Thursday, the 22nd. His first course in London, was delivered in the National Hall, Holborn, on the evenings of the 5th, 7th, and 8th, ult. During the month, the Dr. also lectured at Lewes, Tunbridge Wells, Stoke Newington, and Hackney, and in every instance the audience has evinced a strong and lively sympathy with the original views enunciated. Here, as elsewhere, misrepresentation had done its work, and many attended the lectures, expecting to see,—as we heard one gentleman remark, a real "wild man," a ferocious savage; but their expectations were not a little disconcerted at finding that the "wild man" was a calm, thinking and tolerant expositor of great and holy principles. The spirit pervading these lectures, was not less christian than the matter of them was just, genuine and philosophical, tending throughout to demonstrate the wisdom and adaptations of the divine works on the one hand, and the accordance of their laws with teetotalism on the other. Even his exposition of "the wine question," generally supposed to be abstruse and difficult, was, by his mode of treatment, made at once harmonious, simple and satisfactory. We like his idea of the "Concordance of scripture and science," the oneness of God in the scriptures of nature and the scriptures of revelation, it increases one's admiration of the works of God, and one's reverence for his word. We shall not soon forget the thrilling delight we experienced while listening to these lectures—they gave us glimpses of God in nature, as well as visions of Him in revelation, and we hope to have our own, as well as the faith of our brethren, in this great city, strengthened by the continued labours and repeated visits of this champion of our cause.

Erratum.—On page 293 of last Chronicle, and 19th line of Mr. Cash's letter, the sense of the writer is obscured by a full stop placed after the word "drink," which, with the capital I that immediately follows, omit, and the meaning is obvious.

NOTICE.

We beg to call the attention of those of our subscribers to the Chronicle who are in arrears, to the coloured envelopes, which indicate that their subscriptions are due.

AGENCY.

Mr. Thomas Whittaker since his departure to the North, has held interesting meetings at Whitehaven, Cockermouth, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in which town he is at present actively engaged.

Mr. Jabez Inwards has delivered three lectures in Scarborough, in the Wesleyan Chapel, Baptist Chapel, and in the Town Hall, to crowded audiences, exclusive of holding a very interesting juvenile meeting in the British School. Mr. Inwards has also delivered four lectures in Sheffield in the Friends' Meeting House, and in the Town Hall. Edward Smith, Esq., of this town, bears testimony to the zeal and ability of this devoted lecturer.

Dr. Daniel Carr, under many discouraging circumstances has given Physiological lectures at St. Albans, Aylesbury, Calne, Melksham, Devizes, and Ramsbury.

Rev. A. W. Heritage has visited and held meetings at Lydney, Chepstow, Redbrook, and other places in the counties of Monmouth and Gloucester, and on the 6th ultimo, left Southampton for the Channel Islands.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS' TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The first public meeting of this society was held on Thursday evening last, in Surrey Chapel School-room, Blackfriars-road. It had been announced that the Rev. James Sherman, minister of Surrey Chapel, would occupy the chair, but the decease of Mrs. Sherman, which took place in the afternoon of that day, prevented his fulfilment of that engagement.

The chair was filled by Mr. LEE, who after exploring the Divine blessing, said he believed the cause the present audience was assembled to promote, to be in perfect harmony with the will of God as revealed in the Scriptures, and in harmony, also, with the laws of our animal economy. He was glad that a society was formed for Sunday school teachers specially, because the strange and unguarded sentiments advanced by some of the professed friends and advocates of total abstinence, had certainly done much injury to a cause which was certainly good in itself. He did not think that such deplorable effects would have ensued had Christian men, and especially Christian ministers, thoroughly investigated the subject, and given the cause due support. He believed it to be connected with all that was fair, honest, lovely, and of good report. Special reasons would, no doubt, be assigned why Sunday school teachers especially should abstain from the use of strong drinks, and induce others to abstain also.

The Rev. B. PANSONS, of Ebley, moved a resolution expressing the importance of inculcating the principle of total abstinence on the minds of parents. He was glad to see such a society formed, because he regarded Sunday school teachers as persons exercising a great influence on the rising generation, and as forming the character of our future men and women. To the exercise of such influence he attributed, chiefly, our preservation from alarming popular outbreaks, in seasons of considerable excitement. Even where conversion did not take place as the result of their labours, there was a general fear of God, and a consequent decency of deportment. The habits of the people became more serious and steady, and if, in addition to their ordinary teaching, they could inculcate the principle of strict sobriety, their success would be still more apparent. The conduct and example of parents went far to nullify the effects of Sunday school instruction. Habits of intemperance prevailed, and a fearful havoc of immortal souls was the result. Even where moderate drinking was practised, a fatal appetite was created, and the ranks of drunkards were constantly filled. Sunday school teachers might do much, but very extensive good would not be accomplished till we had religious day schools; for what good could be hoped for from teaching merely about three hours on one day, and leaving the children for the remainder of the week to learn all manner of evil. Christians certainly had not done their duty. Where the principle of total abstinence prevailed as the rule of conduct, many were brought to the house of God, joined Christian churches, became happy in themselves, and useful to those around them.

The Rev. J. MIRAMS seconded the resolution. He regarded the present union as most important, because it would prove a most valuable auxiliary to a great variety of other institutions, and because it was calculated to do good to the teachers themselves, to the parents and to the children.

Mr. J. DAVIES supported the resolution. He had been reclaimed from habits of gross intemperance. Taking one glass of wine in the vestry of a Wesleyan chapel, after performing his duty as a local preacher, the appetite for a second was created; and in less than six months he lost his standing in the church and in the Sunday school, and became a fearful drunkard. He could relate many cases of Sunday school teachers and preachers, who had fallen away from the pulpit, from the school, from usefulness, from happiness, by similar means.

J. TYLER, Esq., testified to the piety and usefulness of the late Mrs. Sherman: she was a zealous and consistent teetotaler, and often pleaded the cause of that institution. When she was in company where wine was placed upon the table, she expressed her hope that the day was about to dawn when more light and purity would bless the church.

Mr. T. A. SMITH felt interested in that society, because he was indebted to Sunday schools for knowledge that was more valuable than all he had acquired in any other schools. He was interested in it too, because it was connected with other popular movements—with the health movement for instance. The unhealthy condition of many districts was attributed to a variety of causes, but most of those causes might be traced to the love of strong drink. The money which should procure good houses, decent clothing, and wholesome food, was spent in public houses upon destructive drinks. He rejoiced that there were so many thousands who voluntarily took up the work of Sunday school teaching, with all the self-denial, privation, and confinement it required. They had much influence, which, if exerted aright, might be improved for most extensive usefulness. Mr. Smith proceeded to answer several of the objections usually preferred by professing Christians against the practice of total abstinence; he maintained that those who were most temperate and most exemplary, were the very persons who ought to join that society, and give its operations all possible support.

The Rev. J. FISHER moved a resolution pledging the audience to the support of the society. In discharging the duties of his office as a Christian minister, he had to encounter a host of opposition, infidelity, profanity, open ungodliness of every kind, but not all these united were so powerful as the love of strong drink. The effects of that met him at every turn, and not till they were removed could he hope to be successful. He trusted, therefore, that as Sunday school teachers came in contact with many who were addicted to the practices of drinking, the present society would be supported and successful.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Liverpool, expressed his anxiety to form a union of Wesleyan Sunday school teachers. Awful instances were constantly presenting themselves of Sunday scholars departing from all that was good, and plunging into every kind of vice. One chief reason of that was, that they were not sufficiently placed on their guard against the evils resulting from the use of strong drink.

The Rev. Mr. GEORGE stated that he had held the office of pastor in the Christian church for twenty-three years. He had been placed over three different churches, and the first cases in each of them, in which he had to exercise Christian discipline, was in the cases of Sunday school teachers who had fallen through intemperance. That very afternoon he had visited the "insane ward" of a workhouse at the west end of the town, and there he found a wretched female who had been a Sunday school teacher, but who had fallen through drunkenness. He besought Sunday school teachers to consider seriously what they had heard that night, and to increase their usefulness by becoming teetotalers.

Mr. J. W. GREEN moved, and Mr. W. SIMS seconded, a resolution of thanks to the chairman, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. CABELL moved, and Mr. TYLER seconded, a resolution of deep sympathy with the Rev. James Sherman in his recent bereavement, accompanied with an earnest prayer that he might receive divine consolation and support. The Gloria Patri was then sung, and the audience, which was crowded, separated.

PECKHAM.

We have held meetings in the Hall, Arthur Street, Old Kent Road, every second Tuesday in the month from January last; at one of which Mr. T. A. Smith delivered an interesting and instructive lecture on the Philosophy of Drinking. On Tuesday, May 9th, Mr. Thomas Hudson of the National Temperance Society favoured us with a lecture on "Popular Objections to the Temperance Movement." The Rev. Jonathan George of Horse-ley Street, Walworth, occupied the chair, and introduced the lecturer by making some very judicious and well-timed remarks on the advantages to be derived from the adoption of temperance principles, and illustrated his positions by some pleasing circumstances which had come beneath his notice, especially in reference to the young. After some further observations, he introduced Mr. Hudson, who commenced by referring to the drinking customs and usages of society as handed down to us from our forefathers, and mentioned some facts as related by Addison and others, showing the manner in which those usages had operated. He then came to the temperance reformation, and contrasted the present aspect of the times in regard to these drinking customs, as compared with former times. He deeply deplored that opposition yet prevailed, and very judiciously, and in a masterly manner handled three forms of objections brought against the temperance movement. Having dwelt upon each of these topics, he clearly proved the entire fallacy of the charges, illustrating his remarks by many living facts that had come within his knowledge. At the conclusion, Mr. Springs moved, and Mr. Hodgson seconded, the thanks of the meeting to both the chairman and the lecturer.

RICHARD HODGSON.

FITZROY ASSOCIATION.

The Honorable Judge Marshall, who for eighteen years presided over the superior courts of justice in Nova Scotia, delivered an interesting address on the Temperance Reformation, in the Temperance Hall, Little Portland Street, Marylebone, on Friday evening, May 5th, to a numerous and respectable audience. At the close of the meeting a vote of thanks was carried by acclamation.

T. P. DRAPER.

WALWORTH AND CAMBERWELL TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

On Monday evening, May 29th, 1848, an interesting meeting in connexion with the above society, was held in the new Lecture Hall, Carter-street, Walworth.

The chair was taken at half-past seven o'clock, by WILLIAM CASH, Esq., who commenced the proceedings of the evening by saying, that he felt a deep and increasing interest in the success of this cause, and it gave him much encouragement to know that it was making a steady, and sure progress. He knew that a glass of wine was now seldom seen at the social meetings of "the Friends."—(Cheers.) It was more than ten years since he first became a total abstainer, and instead of filling his cellar with wine, he had converted it into a dairy.—(Hear, hear.) He was surprised at the conduct of the working-classes in reference to this question—(hear)—notwithstanding all the facts brought before them, they still continued to spend their money upon a drink that did not strengthen them, thus depriving themselves of the enjoyment of many of the comforts of life.—(Cheers.) He saw also that the education of the people was in a great measure retarded by the use of intoxicating drinks. Many parents who say they cannot afford to spend two or three shillings per week on the education of their children, will spend seven or eight shillings on intoxicating drinks, and the children instead of learning that which will make them wise and happy, learn the evil habits of their parents, and thus the race of drunkards is continued.—(Cheers.)

Mr. SPRIGGS, at the request of the committee, made a few statements in reference to the cause of temperance in that locality.

Mr. JAMES SEARS said he had been a member of this society from its commencement, and he had adopted the principle contrary to his own appetite, in order that he might be in a position to do good to those who were sunk in degradation and misery.

Mr. THOMAS WHITTAKER, (of the National Temperance Society) said, the temperance advocate had many facts to present in support of his system, and the drinkers had some startling facts in connexion with their system too.—(Hear.) He had been made a teetotaler in consequence of the facts brought before him at the first meeting he had attended. He then described the influence which parental and ministerial influence had upon him in childhood in reference to the drinking-customs. If ever the world was reformed, it would be by the influence of individuals in their private circles.—(Hear, hear.) Many good people would not connect themselves with teetotalism because they could find nothing about it in the bible. He proved the folly of such a statement, inasmuch as they engaged continually in acts of kindness about which they would find nothing about (directly) in the bible; and by an amusing illustration, he showed how injuriously it would act, should they always demand a warrant from the bible before they would do good, however urgent the case requiring their help might be. If the word was not there, the principle was, and therefore they were bound to adopt it.—(Cheers.) This movement had many well-wishers—they were useful in their way; but he wanted them to join their ranks, and help them in their onward movement.—(Loud cheers.)

Mr. THOMAS HUDSON next addressed the meeting.

Dr. BURNS, who had just come from a meeting of the "League of Universal Brotherhood," said, he thought that the poor working men of this country had quite enough to do to keep their own houses, without trying to keep two or three others. He described the conduct of drinking men as the height of folly, for he was quite sure that they could not take these intoxicating drinks into their system without doing that system a serious injury.—(Hear, hear.) We should be careful of the influence we exert upon our fellow-creatures. He entreated them to use their influence in promoting this cause. Moderation was not sufficient, they must abstain entirely, for the moderate drinker, by his example, was pointing the way to drunkenness.—(Cheers.) He (Dr. Burns) was determined that no man should be able to say that his example led him to a drunkard's course.—(Cheers.) He believed he was addressing a thinking assembly, and hoped they would retire to adopt the principle, seeing that morality and Christianity were on its side.—(Cheers.)

The collection was then made, after which

J. C. FERRIER, M.D., rose to move the following resolution:—"That a petition to the House of Commons be prepared and signed by the chairman, praying the honourable house to introduce a bill for the closing of public houses on Sundays, and that the Right Hon. Charles Tenyson D'Eyneourt be requested to present the same, and that Charles Pearson, Esq., M.P., be requested to support the prayer of the said petition?"

The Rev. J. GEORGE seconded the resolution, and in doing so, he said he had recently visited a young woman, who had been a Sunday-school teacher and a church member, but who through strong drink had fallen, and was then in a workhouse a raving maniac. He concurred in the resolution, and recommended it for their adoption, not on religious grounds, for he disclaimed any attempt to promote religious ends by legislative interference.—(Cheers.)

The resolution was then put, and carried unanimously.

W. STMS, Esq., recommended parents especially to set their children a good example, by abstaining from all intoxicating drinks, and named several instances in which the good effects of such a course had been seen. He concluded by moving a vote of thanks to the chairman.

W. FREEMANTLE, Esq., in a few remarks, seconded the resolution, which was put to the meeting, and carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN hoped they would show their sympathy with the cause by uniting themselves with it, and contributing to its funds. The secretaries would be happy to receive the names of subscribers.

On Tuesday evening, 30th of May, 1848, an address on teetotalism was delivered to a most respectable audience, in the Infant School Room, York-street, Walworth, by Edmund Fry, Esq., of Plymouth.

MR. THOMAS HUDSON (Secretary of the National Temperance Society), on taking the chair, exposed the discrepancies between the writings of our own poets, Shakspeare, Goldsmith, &c., on the subject of intoxicating drinks; and said he believed that Robert Burns had done much by his songs to perpetuate the drinking customs of Scotland. He gave several extracts from Shakspeare, Goldsmith and Burns, to illustrate the statements made, and concluded by calling on EDMUND FRY, Esq., who said he congratulated the meeting on the signs of the times. It was not now as it was some ten years since: then the principles of true temperance were comparatively unknown and its advocates opposed. Mr. Fry stated that eight years since at Plymouth, a meeting was called for discussion: the strolling players determined, as they said, "to give the teetotalers a regular dressing." The meeting was held, the building crowded to excess by the working-classes; his (Mr. Fry's) opponent spoke remarkably well, and seemed to receive the almost unanimous cheers of the vast assembly; Mr. Fry, in his reply, showed by facts that the working-classes did not need intoxicating liquors to assist them in their labour, and when the chairman put the vote to the meeting, the temperance reformers had an overwhelming majority.—(Cheers.) But, say our opponents, if you were to make every body teetotalers you would ruin thousands of the people; you would diminish the revenue of the country. Such persons talk as if we would wish them to throw the £50,000,000, they spend annually on intoxicating drinks into the sea; no, we merely propose that it should be turned into a more useful and proper channel.—(Cheers.) The best workmen are the hardest drinkers; the workmen employed at Messrs. Maudsleys, engineers, spend on Easter Monday in intoxicating drinks no less a sum than a £1,000. Many men earning twenty-five shillings per week, spend fifteen shillings at the public-house, and give ten shillings for the support of their wives and families; and many spend the whole, while their wives are slaving at the wash-tub, to procure bread for themselves and children. Some persons say, "they do not see why we should entirely give up the use of intoxicating drinks: don't you think you go too far? would not temperance be enough? What is temperance? One friend told him he called temperance a wine glass of beer per day;" another friend on his asking him for his definition of temperance, coolly replied, that he was a very temperate man, he only, on the average, "took six glasses of beer, half a bottle of wine, and six glasses of grog per day." No true definition of it can be given: it is like an inclined plane, very easy at first; down this inclined plane of temperance groups of young people are thoughtlessly, heedlessly, running; and 60,000 run from this plane down to the level of drunkenness every year. With such a picture who will maintain that it is safe to be on this inclined plane? There is not a family who has not in some of its members been injured by these drinks; not a town or a hamlet in the kingdom, that has not been robbed of some who might have been ornaments and blessings to society; not a Christian church whose pews have not been deprived of some member; yes, and many pulpits too of its ministers, through these drinks. He then referred to the state of our seamen, and the loss of life occasioned by intoxicating drinks to that important class. He stated that in Plymouth, at the paying off of the crew of a man-of-war, drunkenness was awful; he had heard of one sailor spending £60, and one crew spending £1,000, in Plymouth alone, on intoxicating drinks. Having urged upon them to join this society, he resumed his seat amidst great cheering.

BRISTOL TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL AND RURAL FETE

On Tuesday last, the friends of the Total Abstinence Society provided an entertainment for the holiday-keeping public, in our beautiful Zoological Gardens. The weather was anything but favourable in the early part of the day, and only a few persons, comparatively speaking, dropped into the gardens. However, in the afternoon the sky became clearer, and as the rain ceased to fall hundreds and thousands of visitors began to pour into the grounds. The amusements were of an old English rustic character, and were participated in by a vast multitude who appeared to highly enjoy themselves. Two bands of music paraded the grounds and contributed greatly to keep up the liveliness of the scene. Tea, coffee, lemonade, ginger-beer, and other drinks of the same character, were provided in abundance, but nothing of an alcoholic nature was permitted on the grounds. The eatables consisted of all sorts of pastry and fruit.

At three o'clock, a number of the visitors assembled round a tent, erected in the principal open space, and were addressed by the following speakers.

Hon. Judge Marshall of Nova Scotia, Rev. Dr. Burns of London, Mr. J. Russom, Mr. Brooks of Nailsea, Mr. Davis of Cheltenham, Mr. James Allen, Edward Thomas, Esq., and John Rutter, Esq., of Shaftesbury.

In the interval of the above meetings, the juveniles were addressed by several young men, who spoke very energetically upon the evils they would escape by becoming teetotalers early in life.

Soon after nine o'clock the company began to disperse, and by ten the gardens were vacated. The entire number of persons admitted during the day was within a hundred or two of eight thousand, and notwithstanding this vast mass of humanity being congregated together, there was not the least approach to a disturbance, indeed there was nothing to damp the enjoyment of the day, except the wet state of the grounds, and one or two showers. The aviaries and dens were crowded all the afternoon by continually changing throngs, who behaved themselves in a very orderly manner. The entire amusements of the day passed off with such eclat, as to lead numbers to express a wish for a repetition of the fête at an early period, and we have every reason to believe that their desire will be met.

HASTINGS.

The friends of the good teetotal cause in this place, held a public tea meeting, on Wednesday, 17th May, at which upwards of 100 attended. The chair was taken by J. Rock, senior; and the meeting addressed by F. Beck, secretary; Rev. J. T. Willmore of Rye; J. D. Bassett, Esq., of Leighton Buzzard; Mr. A. Morris, junior, of Lewes; and lastly, by that tried and powerful lecturer, T. Whittaker, who in a speech of upwards of an hour, thoroughly demonstrated the varied and important benefits which would necessarily accrue to society from the general adoption of temperance principles. At the close of the meeting, nine persons signed the pledge.

SELBY.

We have been favoured with another visit from your Agent, Mr. Jabez Inwards. This is the fourth time he has visited Selby within the last six months. He has delivered six lectures—met the children and teachers of the various Sunday-schools, and held a Washingtonian meeting of the members of the Selby Temperance Society. Our large public hall has been densely crowded on each occasion. The lectures have been quite of a superior order, and have produced a very happy influence, not only upon teetotalers, but also upon the inhabitants of the town generally. A. B. HOOPER.

LEIGH, SURREY.

A highly respectable and influential meeting was held in the National School Room, on Wednesday evening, May 10th, 1848. The chair was taken by the Rev. John Herbert, the incumbent of the parish, who related some touching anecdotes of the ravages of strong drink, in the production of misery and woe, and the happy effects of total abstinence, in rescuing these unfortunate victims, and placing them in circumstances of comfort and respectability. He then introduced Mr. W. Claridge, of the National Temperance Society, who began by communicating some most pleasing intelligence of the progress of temperance principles, both at home and abroad. He then proceeded to comment upon several passages of Scripture relative to the wines of Judea, their nature, use, &c., referring to several passages of holy writ, in which total abstinence was enjoined, illustrating his arguments by appropriate anecdotes; and in conclusion, impressed on all present the responsibility devolving upon them to assist in the furtherance of this noble movement, urging especially on professing christians to calmly consider their position in reference to this truly philanthropic principle. The meeting was honoured by the presence of the Rev. John Miller, the Incumbent of Brockham, and several influential friends from Dorking; votes of thanks having been passed to the chairman and lecturer, the meeting broke up. We hope much good was done, and the way prepared for further effort.

CALNE.

Two lectures were delivered in the Town Hall here, on the evenings of the 6th and 7th inst., by Dr. Carr, of Birmingham, "On the Scientific Truths of Total Abstinence." The object of the lectures was, as stated in the bill by which they were announced, "to remove false impressions, and to raise teetotalism to its proper eminence as a science, by showing that it is firmly based on the principles of chemistry, that it is intimately conducive to the healthy functions of the human frame, and that it suggests the most rational modes for the treatment of disease." In the course of his prefatory remarks, the lecturer said that the indifference which had been manifested towards the total abstinence question by a large number of well-disposed individuals, as well as that opposition which had been manifested towards it by others, arose from its not being understood; that prejudice arising from education and habit was a great obstacle to its progress; that those who were labouring to extend its principles courted for it the strictest inquiry, as well as claimed the same impartial examination that is extended to every other science; and that almost every other great discovery had shared the same fate as that of total abstinence, instancing as he did the discovery of the rotatory motion of the earth, the circulation of the blood, as well as that useful discovery the cow-pox. The positions maintained by the doctor throughout his lectures were that alcohol is a poison, and that when taken in ever so small a quantity it is injurious to the healthy functions of the human frame. He showed that it retarded digestion, first, by hardening the food in the stomach, and, second, by injuring the gastric juice, by which that operation was performed; that it affected the circulation; that the exhalation of carbon was lessened by it; and that it frequently laid the foundation of various diseases, viz., stomach complaints, affections of the brain, the heart, the lungs, the eyes, as well as produced gout, palsy, &c. The reasons advanced were grounded on the deductions of Liebig, Gregory, Turner, Sir Astley Cooper, Bell, and other eminent chemists and medical practitioners. From the large number of drawings by which the doctor illustrated his subject, as well as from his popular manner of treating it, the lectures were particularly interesting and instructive. At the close, the lecturer, in the most courteous manner, expressed a hope that some of his medical brethren might have been present, and if they or any one else should have heard any thing advanced to which they could not agree, he should be most happy to answer any questions they might be disposed to put to him in reference to it. The hall was crowded on both evenings, and the greatest attention was paid to the lectures throughout.—From a Correspondent.

ELVASTON.

DEAR SIR,—On Whit Monday, the "Elvaston and Alvaston United Temperance Society," held their annual tea festival, when about one hundred regaled themselves. After which, Mr. Jabez Inwards gave an admirable lecture, "Teetotalism the temperance of the Old and New Testaments," and on the 15th instant at Borrowash, and the following day at Aston-upon-Trent, the same gentleman delivered two more lectures in behalf of the cause. At all three of the meetings, he secured the deepest attention, and I am convinced that the many home-thrusts of truth, which he eloquently hurled at the reasoning powers of his audience, will have a lasting effect, and be productive of much good.

This gentleman places the principles of Teetotalism, not on the ground of expediency, as many of its advocates do; but he assumes a much higher position, he takes the ground of Eternal truth, the Word of God, as the rule of his faith and obedience! He demonstrated in a masterly style, that malting, brewing, and drinking malt liquor, in short, that taking the bread-corn which God has given for the good of man, and changing it into a pernicious and destructive poison, is strictly forbidden by Divine command. The wine-question he disposed of in a similar manner, clearly proving from Scripture, that God has given for the use of man, a non-intoxicating wine, and that whatever is intoxicating He forbids man to touch or even look upon. This ground once taken possession of by a champion for truth, armed at the same time with the sword of the Spirit, he cannot fail to dethrone the enemy.

Satan's stronghold in this conflict is, no doubt his success in persuading the religious part of the community, that the Word of God sanctions the use of intoxicating drinks.

Mr. Inwards on the afternoon of Friday, gave a pleasing and profitable address, to the juvenile members of the above society; after which they partook of tea, and spent the evening in innocent recreation. I remain, Dear Sir, faithfully yours,

WM. BARROW.

RAWMARSH.

Amid the strange events which have taken place in this village, within the last few months, there is one which is likely to be long remembered for good. On the evenings of the 25th and 26th of May, Mr. Jabez Inwards, agent of the National Temperance Society, delivered two lectures in the Infant School Room, kindly lent for the occasion by the Rev. Mr. Mahon. The room was well filled by a respectable audience. Mr. Inwards's lectures gave great satisfaction, many left the meetings acknowledging that it was good to be there.

Literary Cleanings,

A WORD TO THE DRUNKARD.—Have I one who comes under this denomination here, on this occasion? If so, I would ask his attention for a moment. Your case, my friend, is very deplorable. That, I need scarcely tell you, your own conscience tells you that—your disordered home tells you that—your poor emaciated forlorn wife tells you that—your ragged starving children tell you that. But there is one thing above all others which renders your case deplorable, and it is the fact, "That no drunkard can inherit the kingdom of God." No, with your present character, that happiness cannot be yours. A more hopeless character I scarcely know. Will you, then, remain the same besotted, degraded, wretched individual you now are? Shall your wife be still the poor forlorn creature she now is? Shall your children be yet the hungry, ragged, neglected creatures they have hitherto been? Has then the cry of hunger no more power to move your heart to compassion! Shall the neighbourhood in which you dwell still deem you a pest, and your fellow-creatures shun you as they would some loathsome object? Will you forego present comfort, respectability, happiness, future safety, honour and blessedness, for the indulgence of your sinful appetite? If so, Go then, and drink to thy fill! Go then, and plunge into the very vortex of thy sensualities! but, "know thou, that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment." Know thou, that for thee, there is "no entrance into the Kingdom of God."—Rev. W. Clements of Halstead.

A CASE FOR CHRISTIANS.—"To a young man named _____, of _____ street, I was first introduced in September, 1843. He was then on a bed of affliction, occasioned by his irregular habits as a sailor, for he had left his home much against the wish of his friends, and had been to sea. The influence of his habits had evidently produced a reckless irreligious feeling. I paid him several visits before he appeared to manifest any concern, and then my success seemed to be owing to the instructions he had received in St. John's Chapel Sunday-school, for as I was one day reading the 2nd chapter of Ephesians, some remarks that I made revived impressions long since forgotten. On his recovery he began attending public worship, gave up his sea-faring life, procured some employment, and for about six months was very consistent in his conduct, until an old companion of his came home from sea. Through the influence of this bad companion, he again fell into the sin of intemperance, and was very irregular in his habits for some time, but he could not forget the resolutions and promises he had made, and I followed him up with counsel and advice, which, I am happy to say, he never slighted, but always looked upon me as his friend. About eighteen months ago he was induced to sign the total abstinence pledge. This, through the divine blessing, proved a turning-point in his history, as it removed the principal cause of his instability. He applied himself closely to the trade of shoemaking, which he has learned since I first knew him. By these means he soon became respectable in his appearance, and for nine months past has been a regular attendant at the house of God, where his impressions have become deepened, and serious concern has been produced for his eternal interest. He resolved, in September last, to unite himself with the people of God, but he was then taken seriously ill, and sent for me. I found him deeply concerned about his soul, introduced to his notice the 51st Psalm, as applicable to his case, urged the adoption of its language to his own state, and accompanied my remarks with reproof for his past unfaithfulness. He was deeply affected, and thanked me for the visit. This anxiety continued to increase each time I saw him. On his recovery he fulfilled his promise, and united himself to a class at the Wesleyan Chapel, is now, he says, happy in the Lord, and intends to devote his future days to His service. When I look at him now, and think of what he was when I first met with him, there is much cause to rejoice. He was then a dissipated sailor, living in the practice of almost every vice, but is now respectable in his appearance, a consistent and useful member of the Temperance Society, and has become a Sunday-school teacher.—City Mission Magazine.

PRESERVATION OF LIFE.—The first and most immediate end of eating and drinking is the preservation of life. For as God hath planted in every man a natural desire of life, so this is the only means he has given to support it; and if it is the duty of every one to preserve and cherish the life which God has given, it is his duty to use and apply the necessary means in doing it. But to determine what kinds or proportions of nourishment are requisite for that end, we must always remember that it is life we are to provide for, and not luxury; that the feeding more liberally than nature requires, or can bear, is not the way to preserve life, but to shorten and destroy it; and that it is very sinful in itself, and very ungrateful and unreasonable in us, to suffer an inordinate appetite to turn those very blessings to the destruction of life which God graciously gives us for the preservation of it.—Bishop Gibson.

A PROPER DISTINCTION.—The great guard and caution which God requires at our hands, is not so much to keep to the nice proportion that will barely preserve life, as to keep from that which will weaken and destroy it.—Bishop Gibson.

JUVENILE DRUNKENNESS.—In 1829, when I first went from the place I now live at to Edinburgh, for the purpose of suggesting the establishment of Temperance Societies, I met with a number of influential lawyers and clergymen there, whom I addressed both in conversation and at a subsequent meeting, upon the subject of temperance, and I then stated to them the inebriation of children; they started up with horror at the idea, but I mentioned to them that I should not leave Edinburgh without ascertaining the point for their satisfaction; accordingly they directed a clergyman, one of their number, to go with me the next day, and the result was, after a short investigation, assisted by a town missionary; a list of twenty-nine boys, from 11 to 15 years of age, was discovered, not only occasional drinkers, but notoriously given to inebriation. In one court, nine boys had not attained to open profligacy, but it was ascertained they occasionally met in secret to drink a bottle of whiskey.—Evidence of John Dunlop, Esq.

THE ORIGINAL MACBETH.—Walker, the original Macbeth, was at this time, by his irregular mode of living, reduced to a state of distress and poverty, and obliged to shift from one playhouse to another. He had from nature great advantages of person and voice, the latter was very strong and pleasing, till he spoiled it by intemperance, and the abominable practice of drinking between the plays. This unhappy man died in great poverty in Ireland, about the year 1744.—Davies' Life of Garrick.

VERY DELECTABLE.—At this time I got a distaste for red wine, which I could never overcome, a few of us went into a wine store where was a hole about two feet square. There was not much wine in it, so we buckled our Canteen straps together, until a camp kettle attached to them reached the liquor. We drew it up once, we all drank, down it went again, it got entangled with something at the bottom of the tub, a candle was lowered, to our disappointment the corpse of a French soldier lay upon the bottom. The Portuguese soldiers never would drink red wine, if white could be got, and when asked the reason, their reply was, they knew how it was made.—Encampment after the Battle of Vittoria.

THE CONTROLLING POWER.—Society cannot exist, unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere, and the less there is within, the more there must be without. It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things, that men of intemperate minds cannot be free,—their passions forge their fetters.—Burke.

REASON.—Providence has gifted man with reason; to his reason, therefore, is left the choice of his food and drink, and not to instinct, as among the lower animals; it thus becomes his duty to apply his reason to the regulation of his diet, to shun excess in quantity and what is noxious in quality, to adhere in short, to the simple and the natural, among which the bounty of his Maker, has afforded him an ample selection; and beyond which if he deviates, sooner or later, he will suffer the penalty.—Proust.

MAN'S RESPONSIBILITY.—Those men who destroy a healthful constitution of body by intemperance and an irregular life, do as manifestly kill themselves, as those who hang, or poison, or drown themselves.—Sherlock.

INTEMPERANCE.—Man is not happy in a course of life in which he is ashamed; intemperance though it may fire the spirit for an hour will make life short or miserable.—Dr. Johnson's Russelas.

STREET NUISANCES.—When night Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine.

—Paradise Lost.

A CURE FOR GOUT.—Ask God for temperance that's the appliance only which your disease requires.—Shakspeare.

Poetry.

INTEMPERANCE.

Fresh is fair beauty's cheek, and bright
Within the festive room,
Yet may not brook the morning light,
When night has brushed its bloom.
And bright is valour's mailed vest,
Yet soiled in nightly jar;
It may not bear with ruffled crest
To meet the morning star.
But more unseemly is the view,
When morning beams are poured
On signs of revelry, that strew
The late carousal board.
And still, unseemlier than the signs
On that foul board you trace
Are the deep drawn inveterate lines
That mark the reveller's face.
The brow with clammy moisture spread,
The beating pulse, the languid head,
The cheek's pale glow with wrinkles hid,
The bloodless lip, the heavy lid,
The reddening eye's unsteady glance,
These are thy marks, Intemperance.

(The Rubi, a Tale of the Sea.)

Rebels.

The Standard of Lawfulness, &c. By BARTON DELL.

This production contains some startling truths, which perhaps may not be new to the general reader of temperance literature. Nevertheless, many of the illustrations are very original, and the whole is pervaded by what we take to be the best criterion of an author's sincerity; namely, an earnest seriousness, which cannot fail to command the respect even of those who may take exception to the doctrines taught by the writer.

The Truth Seeker and Christian Thinker. (Post-free from Dr. Lees, Leeds.)

The Editor, Dr. F. R. Lees, has long been known in this country and in America, as a distinguished leader of temperance reform. His writings, though not so extensively circulated, either as their intrinsic merits would lead us to desire, or so much as some publications of less sterling value, will, as elsewhere expressed, endure through all time as evidences of his unwearied application and great ability.

The Truth Seeker Magazine is a monthly periodical devoted to the consideration of temperance and kindred subjects, and abounds with much learned research, philosophical and philological information, appreciable only by those, "who do not think by proxy." Nos. 1 and 2, of vol. I. New Series, have just appeared, containing "Manifesto of Principles," and original articles from the pen of the Editor, Goodwin Barmby, and other popular writers.

THE MODEL PARISH

DIETETIC COCOA,

Is a genuine and very superior article, furnishing a nutritious and delicious beverage strongly recommended by many eminent members of the medical profession, as light and easy of digestion.

Benevolent families, and the friends of temperance, are respectfully entreated to use this article in their own household, and to encourage its consumption among their connexions.

If 1,000 or 1,200 families will benevolently determine to use the MODEL PARISH DIETETIC COCOA, the above sum will be realized, and enable the Trustees to carry out their

JUVENILE DESTITUTION.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD ASHLEY, M. P.

MY LORD,—We have read with intense interest, your Lordship's speech, as reported in the public papers, recently addressed to Parliament, on the subject of juvenile destitution. Your Lordship has long been known as a distinguished philanthropist, as one who has sought the elevation of the working classes. To this point especially, have your efforts in the senate house been directed, for which the country stands greatly your Lordship's debtor. We believe, as you then expressed it, that on no one occasion have you submitted to the consideration of Parliament a question more vitally affecting the welfare and condition of the whole community. "Of the existence," said your Lordship, "of the evils you were about to lay before Parliament no one could doubt, who perambulated the streets and thoroughfares of the metropolis. Every one who took the trouble, could not fail to see large masses of ragged, sickly, and ill-fed children, squatting at the entrance of miserable courts and alleys, idling away their time, and engaged in no occupation that was either creditable to themselves or useful to the community; and if from the physical condition of these outcasts, they proceeded to an estimate of their moral condition, and if they consulted the records of Police-courts, they must come to the conclusion, that there was a necessity for immediate inquiry, and for the application of an immediate remedy."

Such were your Lordship's well-timed introductory remarks; and it is gratifying to know, that you spake from actual observation, that unlike many of the exalted ranks among whom you move, you are able to testify to what you have seen. You have not stood afar off. Though revolting to Christian sensibility, you have dared to approach the confines of the great cess-pool of moral corruption. It is not therefore our business with your Lordship to complain, that the statements presented to the House were untrue. We fully believe them, and believe also, that with more light, there will still be more terrible revelations. But we venture to submit, that although the facts and statements cannot be gainsayed, that your Lordship, from an insufficient acquaintance with the drinking habits of the adult population, has erroneously concluded that the "dstitution" of the juvenile population with its attendant vices, has arisen from poverty, rather than that the poverty and profligacy of both parents and offspring have resulted from their intemperance. Before, therefore, we give too much heed to plans suggestive of relief, it well becomes to take a few steps backward, and to ascertain if possible the root of the evil for which remedies are proposed. For this purpose we will briefly glance at your Lordship's statements of the actual condition of the juvenile population. To give weight and authority to your own observations, you quoted to the House, the evidence of the London City Mission, Dr. Aldis, and the Rev. Mr. Champneys, from which it appeared, "that the naked, filthy, deserted, roaming, lawless children, who formed what might be called the seed-plot of nineteenth-twentieths of the crime that desolated the metropolis were not fewer than 30,000; and these were described in a report by Dr. Aldis, "as emaciated, pale and thin, and in a low condition." Now if it cannot be proved to mathematical certainty that the greater proportion of these children are the offspring of drunken parents, there are facts which strongly favour this view of the matter. In 1834, Mr. Mark Moore, in answer to a question put to him by the Parliamentary Committee on Drunkenness, said, "I adopted a plan a few months ago, in order to ascertain what number of persons went into the leading gin-shops in various parts of London; and I commenced by attending myself, in order to operate as a check upon others. I afterwards employed two men, on whose testimony I could depend, and the result of the visits they made to these houses has been of a very appalling character. I selected fourteen houses. I have made out a tabular account of the number of men, women and children, who went into each house on each day, for one week. The result of the whole calculation is, that in the fourteen houses in one week, there were 142,453 men, 108,593 women, and 18,391 children, making a grand total of 269,435 persons, who went into those fourteen houses in a single week." Now your lordship must have observed that the more numerous the gin-shops in any given locality, the more degraded is the neighbourhood, the more numerous are the "masses of ragged, sickly, and ill-fed children squatting at the entrance of miserable courts and alleys." Is there not then think you, my Lord, a great sympathetic connexion between the existence of these houses and drinking, and between drinking and juvenile destitution? Are these "gin-traps" the effect of the physical condition and moral depravity, or are they not rather the fountain, the fons malorum, from whence issue all that is base, sensual and devilish?

"Behold the schools, in which plebeian minds
Once simple are initiated in arts,
Which some may practice with pollter grace,
But none with reader skill!"

Your lordship furnished one proof at least that "Boys had been sent out daily by drunken parents to beg and steal, being often cruelly treated if unsuccessful," and this one fact would prove upon stricter investigation a model only of the class of facts evolved by the operations of our temperance mission. Boys, it may be added, are not only passive agents of wickedness, but long before the period when youth are expected to show signs of manhood, they imitate but too readily the vile practices of their seniors. Mr. Dunlop says:—"In 1829, when I first went from the place I now live at, to Edinburgh, for the purpose of suggesting the establishment of Temperance Societies, I met with a number of influential lawyers and clergymen there, whom I addressed both in conversation and at a subsequent meeting, upon the subject of temperance, and I then stated to them the inebriation of children; they started up with horror at the idea, but I mentioned to them that I should not leave Edinburgh without ascertaining the point for their satisfaction; accordingly they directed a clergyman, one of their number, to go with me the next day, and the result was, after a short investigation, assisted by a town missionary, a list of twenty-nine boys, from 11 to 15 years of age, was discovered, not only occasional drinkers, but notoriously given to inebriation. In one court, nine boys had not attained to open profligacy, but it was ascertained they occasionally met in secret to drink a bottle of whiskey."

First, then, whence come the materials for our Ragged Schools, of which your lordship is so ardent a promoter? Not we aver from the class of men who, poor as they may be, bowed down as they may be by over toil, for which they obtain a bare subsistence; not from the children of the sober mechanics or artizans, are these schools replenished, but from the idle and the profligate. The chief contributors of such schools are the drunken parents who frequent the gin-shop, who drink the price of their children's education, whose love of liquor is paramount to all other considerations. We have it upon undoubted authority, that the proprietor of a certain gin-shop in the parish of St. Giles, before the operation of the Metropolitan Improvement Act, was accustomed to take £20. on the Sunday morning before the time of divine worship, for Gin from the most abandoned of the inhabitants.

Mr. COURTEN, formerly a sergeant in the police force, has been in no fewer than eleven fighting rows in the same parish, but gives it as his experience, that neither then nor since his promotion to the Inspectorship of the Hemel Hempstead district, has he ever taken into custody a teetotaler charged with any offence against the law.

We call your Lordship's attention to the Report of the Statistical Society on the dwellings in Church-lane, St. Giles's. Colonel Sykes, Dr. Guy and F. G. P. Neison, Esq., visited eighteen houses for the purpose of reporting to the Council the condition of the population. That Report exhibits a state of destitution, filth and squalid wretchedness, enough to sicken the stoutest heart. But if your Lordship will refer to page 12, you will at once see that where sobriety exists, (other things being equal,) the superior condition of the people in habits of order and cleanliness.

"This family consisted of husband, wife, and 7 children, English, the eldest girl 16. The man made razor-strops and hawked them. They had all taken the temperance pledge, and in spite of their poverty, they, their room and furniture, exhibited a marked contrast to the Irish tenants of other rooms. The mother had not had good health for 16 months.

"No privy and no water. The landlord, when Rogers (the tenant) paid his rent, always offered him a pint of beer, which he did not take."

If too your lordship will consult accurately the records of our police courts, you will find that the "seed plot" of crime and juvenile depravity is watered by the drinking system, that by means of it, it fructifies and yields the harvest of 30,000 naked, filthy, deserted, roaming, lawless children, the objects of your lordship's commiseration. It would be easy enough, to multiply blue books, ad infinitum with facts like the foregoing, it is difficult rather to know what to select from facts so multifarious. Would your lordship take evidence from the Missionaries of the Temperance Society, or select fifty cases of juvenile depravity and destitution, and probe those cases thoroughly, it would be seen how largely that depravity and destitution are the result of intemperance.

But there is a particular evil, to which the drinking system is very tributary, which in the consideration of the important subject of juvenile destitution and depravity should be made to stand prominently to view; for manifold as are the evils inflicted on the male offspring of drunken parents, they are nothing comparable to the ruinous effects produced on the bodies and the minds of female members of the family. The case cited by Robert Broughton, Esq., police magistrate of Worship-street, in his evidence before the House of Commons, will exhibit the evils to which we make allusion. "A decent man," says Mr. Broughton, "a mechanic waited upon me, and asked my advice what he should do; he said I have two daughters, one is only sixteen, not quite, and the other fourteen; and I have sons, my wife has taken to the habit of drinking, and all my Sunday clothes, my tools, and every thing she can get hold of, goes to the pawn shop ; I have redeemed them a hundred times ; all the children's clothes are taken whenever she can ; the children are left, but what am I to do ? I am obliged to go to my work, or my family would starve, and when I am at work, here is my daughter, between fifteen and sixteen left wholly unprotected." "I gave him," says Mr. Broughton, "the best advice I could, and he went away. He returned to me in a day or two afterwards, with these two daughters, I was then on the bench. With tears in his eyes, he led his daughters into the office, one in each hand, and said, 'What am I to do your worship ? at this moment, the mother of these two children is beastly drunk, with the gin bought by the things she has pawned, laying on the bed.'" "The consequence," adds Mr. Broughton, "to these poor girls is inevitable ; nothing but a miracle can save them from prostitution."

Nothing we assure your lordship, would so soon cleanse the great Augean stable of juvenile destitution and immorality, as the universal spread of temperance among the adult population. Teach these to subjugate their appetites, to abandon strong drink, to have self-respect, then cleanliness, and godliness, and contentment, would in very deed flow as a river, and the miserable courts and alleys, where large masses of ragged, sickly, and ill fed lawless children are now seen squatting at the entrance, would suddenly disappear, and like the gates which opened of their own accord, there would be opened up far and wide every incentive to physical purity and moral advancement. The proposition of your lordship to transport every year 1000 of these juveniles to our Australian settlements, educated and improved as doubtless they would be, we have little faith, would be felt as any great diminution of the evils universally deplored. It would skim the surface, while below there would yet remain a putrid settlement from which would constantly be emitted "a foul breath contagion," the pabulum of a moral pestilence. We, therefore, ask your lordship to turn your philanthropic mind to the great question of Temperance Reform, to aid by your talents, your great influence, and your exalted station, a movement, the merits of which have neither been fully understood nor appreciated, and your lordship's exertions for your country's good will be crowned with triumphs, unequalled in any other sphere of benevolent enterprise.

STRONG DRINKS ANTAGONISTIC TO CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

On arriving at Raiatea, I was perfectly astounded at beholding the scenes of drunkenness which prevailed in my formerly flourishing station. There were scarcely a hundred people who had not disgraced themselves ; and persons who had made a consistent profession of religion for years had been drawn into the vortex.

The son and successor of old Tamatoa, was a very dissipated young man, and when he succeeded to the government, instead of following his father's good example, he sanctioned the introduction of ardent spirits.

Encouraged by him, and taking advantage of my absence, a trading captain brought a small cask on shore, and sold it to the natives. This revived their dormant appetite, and like pent up waters, the disposition burst forth, and with the impetuosity of a resistless torrent, carried the people before it, so that they appeared maddened with infatuation. I could scarcely imagine that they were the same persons among whom I had lived so long, and of whom I had thought so highly.

As the small cask which had been imported was sufficient only to awaken the desire for more, they had actually prepared nearly twenty stills, which were in active operation when I arrived. A meeting was immediately called, which I was requested to attend, when resolutions were passed that all the stills should forthwith be destroyed. A new judge was nominated, the laws were re-established, and persons selected to go round the island, and carry the resolutions into effect. In some districts these met with considerable opposition, but in others they succeeded without difficulty. The following week they were dispatched again, when they destroyed several more ; but in their last journey they were accompanied by the late excellent Muihara of Huahine, the favourite daughter of our good old King, who had come to Raiatea, with some respectable officers from her own island, for the purpose of completing the destruction of the stills. This they happily accomplished ; for, on their return from their last circuit of the island, they reported that every still was demolished, and every still-house burnt to the ground. Some of the natives, however, determined to purchase ardent spirits from the ships : while the majority wished me to form a Temperance Society with a view to its entire abolition ; but as I could not remain to superintend its operation, I did not think it advisable to accede to their request. This however, has been effected since I left ; and a letter, just received from the formerly dissipated young chief, afforded me much satisfaction. It is dated Raiatea, April 30th, 1836 :—

DEAR FRIEND,—“Blessing on you, Mr. Williams, from the true God, through Jesus Christ, the King of Peace, the Saviour in whom alone we can be saved. This is my little communication to you. The spirits about which your thoughts were evil toward me, I have entirely done away with, because my heart is sick of that bad path, and I am now pressing towards the mark for the prize of my high calling ; these are now my thoughts, that God may become my own God, this is really my wish, I am commending myself to God, and to the word of his grace,” &c. &c.

Whether there be a real change of heart or not in this individual, I cannot say, but I am truly thankful—and in this feeling every friend of missions will participate, that the people with their chief, have been brought to see their folly, and abandon the use of that which was unfitting them for earth and heaven, by rendering them poor, profligate, and miserable. The circumstances under which the use of ardent spirits was abandoned at Tahiti, were of the most interesting character. The evil had become so alarming that the Missionaries felt that something must be attempted, and therefore determined to set the people an example, by abstaining entirely from the use of ardent spirits, and by forming temperance societies. These worked exceedingly well, especially at Papara, the station occupied by our venerable and indefatigable brother, Mr. Davies. The beneficial results were so apparent to the natives themselves, that all the inhabitants of the district agreed that no ardent spirits should be introduced into their settlement. Most of the people of the other districts observing their prosperity followed their example. At this time, the parliament met ; for since they have been brought under the influence of christianity, the representative form of government has been adopted. On this occasion, and before the members proceeded to business, they sent a message to the Queen to know upon what principles they were to act. She returned a copy of the New Testament, saying, "Let the principles contained in that book be the foundation of all your proceedings;" and immediately they enacted a law to prohibit trading with any vessel which brought ardent spirits for sale; and now there is but one island in the group, Porapora, where these are allowed.—Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands, by the Rev. JOHN WILLIAMS.

As evidence that the cause of temperance has lost none of its interest in the South Sea Islands, we present the following communication from the Rev. Samuel C. Damon:—

Honolulu, March 3rd, 1848.

DEAR SIR,—Yours of September 1st was duly received. I immediately forwarded the two volumes of "Reports," as requested. They were placed in the hands of his Majesty's Secretary of Foreign Relations. The following reply was received, and I feel it my duty to forward the document to you. It contains a summary explanation of the policy of this government in regard to intoxicating liquors. I doubt not that it will be read by you, and others, with interest.

Foreign Office, 29th February, 1848.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, accompanying for His Majesty the King, and His Highness the Premier, two copies of the Report of the Committee of the World's Temperance Convention, held in London in 1847, with two packets addressed severally to these high personages, to whom I have just forwarded them.

"Knowing that temperance and its concomitant moral advantages are the cardinal points of the policy to which the king and all his counsellors aspire, I can assure you that these gifts will be most welcome, and not the less so that they come through you. To carry fully out that policy throughout these islands, the concurrence of all the philanthropists in Great Britain, France, the United States, and the whole christian world, is wanted; and the period is expected soon to arrive, when all considerations of mere political economy, and commercial advantage, will yield to the more exalted motive of moral health to all mankind.

"So far as regards these islands, the king, notwithstanding the scantiness of his revenues, to that exalted motive sacrifices the interests of his exchequer and of the agriculture of his islands, to an extent greatly exceeding the commercial advantages which any nation could possibly derive from the free importation of its intoxicating beverages. No commercial advantages resulting from that importation to any nation having ships which frequent these islands, are at all commensurate with the benefit arising from the disuse of such beverages, even in a pecuniary point of view. Of this important fact, none is a better judge than yourself; no one knows better how many foreign whale ships have been unsuccessful through the insubordination of intemperate crews; and no one can bear better testimony to the fact that, in 1840, the peace of the whole community was disturbed, lives endangered, and the town, with all the merchants' houses and stores full of merchandise, in jeopardy of being set fire to, by bands of sailors inflamed by liquor parading the streets in numerical strength, rendering all control by the police utterly hopeless.

"I have the honour to be, with much respect, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

"R. C. WYLLIE."

The foregoing communication of Mr. Wyllie, His Majesty's Secretary of Foreign Relations, I could wish might be read by all the law-makers in the world. At present the King's government is actually prohibited by the English and French treaties from carrying out its honest views in regard to the importation of strong drink. An effort, I learn, is now making to modify the said treaties. I sincerely desire to hear public sentiment in the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and the United States of America, set right upon this great and vitally important subject.

The temperance publications received for "Vancouver" are most acceptable, and I doubt not will do great good in this quarter of the world. Thanks for your kindness in filling the box.

With the sincere hope and devout prayer for the success of the great object in which we are engaged, I remain your friend and fellow-labourer,

SAMUEL C. DAMON.

To the Secretary of the National Temperance Society.

THE DRUNKARD'S CHILDREN.

Those who are acquainted with the last productions of George Cruikshank's pencil, which he put forth under the title of The Bottle, (and who has not dwelt with painful interest over those harrowing and truthful scenes?) will have been prepared for this "sequel." The inevitable consequence of drunkenness in the head of a family is the ruin of its younger branches. Whatever may befall the infatuated victim of the "bottle," he may safely calculate that his sins will be visited on his family from generation to generation, in the first instance, and on society at large in the next. The pernicious and debasing example must soon tell on the young ones, who, deprived of their accustomed support, and untended by their parents, seek not the fold of the Great Shepherd and Saviour, but repair to the gin-shop and gambling night-house for that recreation which is denied them at home. At length their ill-fated parent sinks into madness, almost a happy release; and though the hideous spectacle may at first not be without effect on the tender susceptibility of youth, and some good impression may be produced by that appalling example, and though many good intentions may have been formed, for lack of soil and cultivation the seed perishes, the jeer of ridicule puts a speedy termination to a conflict which was alike unequal between impulse and passion; and both boy and girl, "neglected by their parents, educated only in the streets, and falling into the hands of wretches who live upon the vices of others, are led to the gin-shop, to drink at that fountain which nourishes every species of crime." In the plate to which this description is attached, we see the "beginning of the end" which will soon overtake the infatuated creatures. We mark the vulgar slang of the youth, as, aided by the example of a most unmistakable-looking woman, whose calling is apparent, even though her face is not, he beckons on his sister to her ruin. There she stands, not quite honest or scrupulous, and yet not quite a wretch, doubting whether she shall put the poison to her lips; and yet not undismayed by the fallen creatures around her, who are portrayed with life-like reality, from the drivelling dotard, to the squalling infant, to whom its mother is administering a drop of "something short," just to quiet it. The next scene is "The Kidleywink," a low dirty beer-shop, where the boy-thief squanders and gambles away his ill-gotten gains, among the lowest of both sexes—a scene to which Ferdinand's exclamation may be applied, for truly it seems that "Hell is empty, and all the devils here;"

Nor is the girl now so reserved as at first. The step "from the gin-shop to the dancing-rooms," is a short but fearful one; and here again her evil genius—he who ought to protect her mind and guard her person from pollution—stands by a willing admirer, as she "threads the mazy dance" with a suspicious-looking "gent," in a white coat.

The original of the scene here depicted we fear may be witnessed every night at those abominable places with which the metropolis has recently teemed—places where, under the specious pretence of "classic representations" and "balls," the foulest treason is plotted and perfected against public morality. We are not surprised, therefore, to behold the brother, in Plate IV., arrested in the course of crime and handed over to the police, who have tracked him, after the commission of a desperate robbery," to a "three-penny lodging-house." In this scene the artist has exceeded himself in a style of which he is the master, and which he has made familiar to the public in his illustrations to some recent works of fiction. We allude to that wondrous effect, so strikingly introduced by Rembrandt, in "The Woman taken in Adultery;" and in "The Birth of our Saviour." In the print now before us, the effect of the dark lantern is quite magical—the countenance of the disturbed and frightened negro is wonderfully alive to the dangerous proximity of the minister of justice, and looks as though the owner had himself been engaged in some "dark and midnight" tragedy. The transition from the police to the dock is natural, or, as Mr. Cruikshank expresses it, "from the bar of the gin-shop to the bar of the Old Bailey is but one step." The fifth plate represents that well-known court, and we may say the well-known features of that court. There we see the "bar," little heeding how much of real feeling there may be beneath the assumed indifference of the male culprit, or of shame in the hidden features of the poor girl who stands beside him, a suspected partner in his felonious practices. There also we see the jury; some intent on their notes, others disputing on a point in the evidence, and others again hanging on the lips of the judge, as he sums up the case against the two prisoners, and mildly echoes the arguments used by the girl's counsel, to show that she was not "art and part" in her brother's crime, but only lent herself perhaps to shield him from justice, by assuming a greater knowledge of the transaction than she really possessed. In all this scene there seems but one benevolent bald-headed gentleman, who, gazing narrowly on the dock, is thoroughly satisfied that she is utterly ignorant of her brother's offence. Suddenly the die is cast. "We find the boy guilty, and acquit the girl," says the foreman—"a very sound distinction," remarks the judge, as the distracted creature falls senseless into the turnkey's arms, and is borne, all unconscious, from that dread spot, at which another victim is soon placed. The boy is removed to prison, but he is not left alone. His sister visits him, and that touching scene is vividly depicted in No VI. "The brother and sister part for ever in this world," says the author, and they seem to feel that their opportunities are few indeed. In that moment of agony, when the gaoler beckons the visitor to withdraw, there steals across the wretched convict's features a dazzling flash of times gone by, and he shudders as he thinks of what he was, and is, and might have been, but for that cursed drink—drink. The clenched fist betokens the fearful struggle that is raging within his heart, and his countenance shows that even now he is the victim of deep-rooted disease, the offspring of dissipation and exposure. We are not, therefore, surprised when we behold him (in Plate VII.) stretched, pale and emaciated, on the truckle-bed in the Justitia hulk, with uplifted hands, invoking mercy from that Being whom his tongue has seldom invoked save in blaspheming mockery. The good chaplain steals from the bed, book in hand, with averted face, indicative of pain and distrust—and well he may, good man, for who can place any reliance on a convict's death-bed repentance? But what next? The last sad scene of all—the death of the girl—miserable wretch! "The maniac father and the convict brother are gone. The poor girl, homeless, friendless, deserted, destitute, and gin mad, commits self-murder." It requires no stretch of imagination to track her faltering steps on that sad night when she bade adieu to her guilty but still beloved brother—that brother who had been so instrumental to her ruin—but to whom she still clung with all the feeling that her ruined heart was capable of entertaining. Where shall she gain a night's shelter!—where look for a bed? Echo answers "where." She has no home, nor a penny in her pocket. She begs, and is unsuccessful—she is told to go to the union. Desperate, she goes to the gin-shop where she commenced her career of vice, and solicits a glass of gin. Tired and weary, pale and ghastly, she excites the pity even of the tapster, who stealthily does good for once in his life, and gives her a shilling for "auld lang syne." Inspired, we might say maddened, by the liquor thus produced, she rushes out, and gaining the bridge with rapid strides, she mounts the parapet. She halts a moment, undecided—a passer-by suspects her object and clutches at her shawl—too late, too late—the attempts to thwart her add fresh strength to her nerves—she springs over the parapet, and madly clasping her hands over her frenzied temples, she descends like the plummet, with a fearful rushing sound, to the waters below; and ere many seconds are sped, ere the passer-by can point out the spot whence she assayed the leap, her lifeless corpse is hurried under countless barges, and vain are all attempts to reclaim it, till the greedy tide "gives back the dead" at its own time and pleasure. This fearful catastrophe of this sad story is told by the artist in a most speaking way, and forms one of the most striking of the whole series—which possesses the rare merit of being quite as good as its predecessor. We doubt not that, from the extreme cheapness of the whole, they will both find their way into the poor man's cottage, where they may warn him from the village ale-house, as they cannot fail to do in London with regard to the gin-palace. We, therefore, earnestly recommend the dissemination of these moral lessons among those humbler classes, the members of which are more obnoxious to the evils intended to be portrayed and checked by the artist, whose great pride it must be that in the prosecution of his art he has administered to morals, by portraying a seductive weakness in its proper colours—those of hideous sin.—Morning Chronicle.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION—ITS CONNEXION WITH THE POLITICAL RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE.

The movement having a prior claim upon our attention, because it strikes at the root of most of our domestic as well as social evils, is that carried on for the promotion of the temperance cause. Among the higher and more educated classes, it has never been fully considered in any of its bearings upon the national prosperity, and scarcely among its own advocates has it been felt in all its relations. It is true that it has been glowingly pourtrayed, as an instrumentality in restoring the lost and raising the fallen, in rescuing those in peril, in promoting individual happiness, and in bringing back joy to the sad and cheerless family circle. Thousands of men lost to connexions, religion, and hope, have been given back to all. On this theme we do not propose to dilate, as every temperance platform and periodical proclaim the glad tidings to the abandoned and the lost. We regard it as more within our province to show it in another, and as we take it, a still more important aspect; in its relations to the moral and social improvement of the people, and to the political welfare of the state. It cannot be long before its consideration will be included as a leading topic in popular discussions on political economy. We shall in the mean time, urge with every power and earnestness we can command, its claims upon the philanthropist, the christian, the educator, and the politician; feeling convinced that the more it is discussed in a spirit of candour, the more will it be found identified with the best hopes of the nation, and the true prosperity of the working classes.

In the first instance, it may be regarded as an agent in elevating the character of the industrious classes. What do we see around; masses of men sunk in poverty and debasement, and the drinking habits associated with their degradation. No policy, however enlightened, no legislation, however good, can benefit such a class. The work must be their own—must begin by an abandonment of drink. The statistics of poverty, crime, and insanity, have again and again shown the fearful amount of depravity produced by the insatiable love of drink, which is the curse of our population, and which, more than any other cause, tends to their demoralization. We can entertain no hope so long as this evil remains—it prevents the labour of the reformer ensuring its promised end—and the educator sinks down in all but despair before the mischief it induces. No institutions can make men free who are debased in mind. Freedom implies something nobler than the mere possession of immunities and franchises. No extension of privilege—no recognition of right—can improve a race of men who are slaves to their own vices. No cause has stood more in the way of improvement than the vice of drinking. It has degraded the English workman. Under the dominion of tyrant custom, he perpetrates a fouler wrong on his fellow-workmen by his maintenance of many of the drinking usages, than any government could dare to inflict, and with all his clamour for liberty, he sinks into submission under this rule. His means are wasted, his character injured, his heart depraved. No man is so thoroughly a slave as he who is enslaved by his own appetites and passions.

We cannot point to a more striking example of the evils of drinking than that afforded by our elections. Well may good men pause before they consent to enlarge the franchise, when they see the wholesale corruption practised on these occasions. The mere trafficking politician—the man who purchases suffrages that he may sell constituencies—has a ready market. And what high honour can actuate a man, who is conscious that he owes his seat to means so base. Electors and non-electors are bought by drink or money, and thus the very fountains of society are corrupted. It induces a prostration of mind, and an abjectness of spirit. How can it be expected that a parliament can be good or pure, elected by such means; and by what right can a constituency complain who knows that its representative has had to draw largely upon his resources to find gold and drink for the men whose interests he is sent to represent? Is it to be wondered at that he occasionally, nay, generally seeks to promote his own? Is it not calculated to poison the very nature of that intercourse which ought to subsist betwixt the represented and the representative? The feeling induced by this practice extends through every ramification of the body politic, and must carry its pernicious influence, even into the domestic circle, polluting the most sacred relations of life. It is a duty, then, while seeking an alteration in our representative system, that we should labour to make the people place a due regard upon the charge committed to them. They must be taught to regard the vote as a trust reposed in their hands, to be discharged for the good of their country, and not as an article of merchandize to be sold to the highest bidder.

There is another important view of this great subject. The waste of individual means and national wealth in the manufacture and purchase of this pernicious luxury. It is worse than money wasted—it purchases misery, degradation, destitution, and crime. We sow the wind and reap the whirlwind. A sum of £65,000,000, an amount greater than the entire revenue of the country, is spent in intoxicating drinks. Can a nation be otherwise than poor which is spending its available means in so profligate a manner? God has blessed us with enough, and to spare. We convert his good gifts into poison, and then impiously complain of bad harvests and unproductive seasons. We cannot now pause to ask what could be done with this immense sum if it was spent in procuring the necessaries of life for our people, or in carrying out the various schemes of practical benevolence which are the glory and the pride of our time. Our people want education—here is the means! We want employment for the population—what would this do if turned into the channels of useful industry! Nay, the working classes cry out about injustice. They spend £26,000,000 per annum in beer and spirits. Let us see whether they have not the power to improve their own condition, and to give activity to every field of manufacturing labour. A glance at this topic will shew what power rests in the hands of the population, if it is properly and wisely used. We have long been satisfied that no government can do for the people what they can do for themselves, by the abolition of the drinking-system.—Standard of Freedom.

Doings of Strong Drink.

AWFUL EVENT.—A circumstance occurred on Wednesday night lately, so appalling in its nature, and so calculated to inspire the mind with feelings of wholesome terror, that it is advisable the entire case should be detailed unabbreviated. Every particular transpired exactly as follows:—George Shaw, of Lane End, Holmfirth, aged forty-five, or thereabouts, a wheelwright, having a wife and three children, the youngest ten years old, after transacting some business in the adjacent village of Nether Tong, called at an inn there, kept by Mr. John Bates, on the evening of Wednesday. He was supplied with refreshments, but did not exceed in his potations the bounds of moderation (?). Amongst the guests there was present one Richard Wood, proprietor of a public garden at Fearnought, Holmfirth, and with him Shaw (ever a petulant irascible character) picked a quarrel on some slight pretence. The altercation between the two men was running very high, when suddenly Shaw, who was a tall athletic man, rose up, and swore by his Maker, he would send Wood to immediate and everlasting perdition, by placing him bodily on the fire then blazing on the hearth. To execute this diabolical threat, Shaw seized his intended victim before he could be prevented, and, with another horrible oath, was lifting him from his seat, when suddenly his hold relaxed—he fell heavily to the earth—and on being raised, the man of blasphemy was dead! The body was afterwards carried to an upper room, there to await a coroner's inquest.—Leeds Intelligencer.

DEATH IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH PRISON.—An inquest was held in the above prison on Monday, on the body of Capt. W. C. Clayton, aged 25, who died of delirium tremens, caused by drinking brandy.—Verdict accordingly.—Bristol Advertiser.

EFFECTS OF STRONG DRINK.—At the Mansion-house Police-court, on the same day, a master baker was charged with having attempted to commit suicide. It appeared from the evidence of Musard, a Horsleydown waterman, that he and another waterman, having heard a splash in the river, soon observed the defendant floating through the second arch of London-bridge. They picked him up and carried him to the Swan public-house, from whence he was conveyed to Guy's Hospital. They believed the act was the consequence of intoxication. The surgeon said the man was drunk at the time. Upon his person were found in a bag, £14. 10s. in gold, £1. 4s. 2d. in silver, and some halfpence, with which he had intended to go to make a purchase of flour in Mark-lane.—The Lord Mayor (to the defendant, who appeared to be in a state of complete astonishment:—) Well, sir, what account do you give of this attempt upon your own life?—The defendant: I really cannot give any account of it at all. I must have been mad drunk to do what it appears I have done. I have as good and comfortable a home as any man can have, and I am a man of the most sober and industrious habits, but if I take any strong drink I am quite a madman.—The Lord Mayor: Are you a married man? Defendant: I have been married exactly nine weeks.—The Lord Mayor: Have you had any quarrel with your wife or her family? Defendant: Not the least. No man can be happier in domestic circumstances than I am. I never knew, nor had the most distant idea, that I had jumped over the bridge until I recovered my senses. I am quite unconscious of having made any attempt of the kind.—The defendant's wife corroborated the statement of her husband as to his sober and quiet habits; after which the defendant declared that he never again should yield to any persuasion to touch strong liquor, and he felt most grateful to those who had saved his life, and would willingly and liberally reward them.—Standard of Freedom.

CAUTION TO DRUNKARDS.—On Sunday evening last, a man named George Foulson, an engineer at a factory at Hyde, having drank during the day a gill of rum, and other liquors, brought on delirium tremens, and died in a state of raging madness.—Manchester Examiner.

INTOXICATION AND CRIME.—On Thursday, the 6th, the dead body of a woman was found in her own house, Split Close, Greenock. It appears that having come in late on that evening intoxicated, William Walker, her husband, who is a coal-heaver by trade, asked her to attend to one of their children, when she immediately snatched up some instrument and struck him on the leg. He then hit her with his fist and she fell down. In fifteen minutes she was a corpse. Walker immediately absconded, threatening to drown himself, and has not since been heard of. She has left five young children.—Standard of Freedom.

A DROP OF DRINK! (?)—William Newman, aged 53, late a waiter at Beaufort Arms, Monmouth, was charged with having on the 20th of May, at the Borough, stolen money, the property of Charles Evans, his master. The prisoner, who presented a very respectable appearance, and who appeared much agitated and distressed, and conscious of his degraded position, pleaded guilty. He was recommended to mercy by the prosecutor, both on account of his age and his previous good character; and the prisoner called a gentleman named Clifford, as a witness to character. He said a drop of drink was the cause of this offence. He was feelingly addressed by the Chairman, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment.—Monmouth Quarter Sessions.

SAD EFFECTS OF INTOXICATION.—At the Southwark Police-court, on Tuesday, Ellen Merritt, a middle-aged female, was placed in the dock before Mr. Cottingham, charged with wilfully murdering Thomas Winter, a man with whom she formerly cohabited. At the inquest held on the deceased, a verdict of accidental death had been returned; but after a full investigation of the case yesterday, the magistrate expressed his surprise at such a termination, and committed the prisoner for trial on a charge of wilful murder. It appeared that the prisoner at the time she inflicted the blow on the deceased, was intoxicated, and the quarrel between them arose at their residence in London Street, Southwark, on the night of the 24th ult.—Standard of Freedom.

DEPLORABLE DEATH.—On Saturday, the Rev. E. Spencer, a relative of Earl Spencer, was found dead in the arch under the Adelphi. Deceased died of the effects of drunkenness. He was friendless and pennyless.—Bristol Advertiser.

DISGRACEFUL ASSAULT.—Yesterday, at the Gorbals Police-court, a ship-rigger, named Wilson, was charged with committing a reckless and unprovoked assault upon a little child, while in Centre Street, on Tuesday afternoon. On the day in question, Wilson, who was considerably the worse of liquor, was going along Centre Street, in company with one or two companions, in a similar condition with himself, when he stumbled on a water-stoup, standing on the street. In a moment of drunken passion, he lifted up the vessel, and threw it from him with considerable violence, against a little child named Mc'Connell, who was playing on the street. The blow knocked down the child, and it fell with great force on the pavement, by which its head was severely cut and bruised. The street was in an uproar in a moment, and the drunken and reckless offender hurried off to the Gorbals Police-office. From the aggravated nature of the circumstances, the sitting magistrate inflicted a fine of two guineas; failing payment, thirty days' imprisonment. The fine was paid.—North British Mail.

SUFFOCATION.—An inquest was held yesterday, at Bedminster, on the body of John Osborne, a milkman, who after retiring to rest in a drunken state, on Wednesday night, was found dead, with his head on the floor, his feet remaining in bed. The jury returned a verdict, that the deceased was suffocated.—Mercury, July 15th.

Public Meetings, Progress, &c.

MR. THOMAS WHITTAKER.

DEAR SIR,—Since my last quarterly report I have had additional proof that teetotalism is ascending. The tide of public opinion is veering round to the temperance cause. I never experienced more universal sympathy—never laboured with more delight. High and low, rich and poor, stretch out to me the right hand of fellowship. The meetings, with few exceptions, have been large, in some cases overflowing, and the number of signatures cheering.

My subscription list will give some evidence of my private labours and success, while at the same time it proves that the people are prepared and willing to sustain a systematic and well directed effort to rouse public opinion, and enforce temperance truths. As you have already had a condensed report of the meetings I attended for the first two months of the present quarter, I will simply enumerate those I have attended during the last five weeks; three in Cockermouth, two in Whitehaven, one at Grey Southen, one at Maryport, eight in Newcastle, five in Sunderland, one in Stockton, two in Darlington, two at Shotley Bridge, one at Ingot, and two in Gateshead. It will be seen that I have addressed twenty-eight public meetings, in addition to which I have made not fewer than 200 private calls on behalf of the society.

The machinery of the temperance cause in Newcastle is as complete and in as good working order as in any town with which I am acquainted. We have a parent, or old men's society, as the young ladies are pleased to call it. The leaders of this society have stood like the anvil to the stroke. These men became teetotalers when the chicken-hearted quailed, and for fear of the cross swore they knew not the truth. All honour to the old men of Newcastle, they have weathered many a storm, and brought life and salvation to hundreds in the far north. These are the friends of my youth, and, excepting a few who have died in the harness, those who rallied round me on my first visit to the north to the present day give a certain sound.

We have also got a ladies' society, through whose influence and exertions (mainly) a temperance town missionary, in the person of Mr. Buchanan, is employed. Mr. B. does the work in a most effectual and satisfactory manner; he is the continual dropping of water on the stone, and is honoured and beloved.

We have also a Young Men's Society, which just now is perhaps doing more than either of the others. Many of these young men were mere boys, taking the pledge by consent of their parents, twelve years ago; they are now respectable young men doing a good business, teachers, secretaries, superintendants in Sunday schools, and exerting an influence for good on the whole population.

The temperance society in Newcastle stands high, and commands the respect of all classes. There is no church that has not felt its influence, nor street in which its triumphs have not been witnessed. The pulpit has been purified, the press profited, and the public house put to shame.

In Sunderland, we have got 5000 teetotalers, and a large and respectable committee. I had the use of four large chapels and the Seaman's Hall for my meetings. At some future time I will give a few facts connected with this place, but for the present must pass on. At Stockton I met with a warm reception, but as I had not more than a few hours to spend in the town, I had not the opportunity of making many calls. In Darlington, my heart was gladdened by meeting many old and devoted friends. There are some good men and true here. We had two capital meetings in the New Baptist Chapel; the first was presided over by the Rev. D. Adams, minister of the chapel, and one of the oldest and best teetotalers in the country; the second was presided over by John Fothergill, Esq., Surgeon. Mr. Fothergill was one of the first, if not the first, medical man, who publicly allied himself with the temperance society in this country. The names of Fothergill, Higginbotham, Mudge, and Beaumont have been a tower of strength to the temperance advocate, when medical men were more influenced by custom and prejudice than by truth and honesty.

In Shotley Bridge the enemy has made some inroads into our camp, and we seem to have retreated for a time. Some of the national guard have refused to fight! while others of them have actually gone over to the enemy!! But plans are in progress for bombarding the citadel—a good friend has furnished me with a little ammunition, with a promise of more if it should be needed;—I endeavoured to strengthen the things that remain, and told them I would come again. As our friend Paxton Hood has it,

"It will never do to give up so."

In these revolutionary times we must not stick at trifles. Blow up the barricades; plant the guns; erect the standard; arrest the people; paralyze the publicans; and preach liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound. The men who are earning from £3 to £6 per week at Derwent Iron Works, in this neighbourhood, must not be pilched and robbed, their wives beggared, and their children pauperised, without an effort to rescue them. If some of those from whom we had expected better things have turned recreants, even in Shotley Bridge, notwithstanding the tide of intemperance has burst in upon them, and the Church of God become a wreck, we have reserved to us a few men who refuse to bow the knee, and I trust it will not be said of these, "Died Abner as a fool died," but that they died whilst defending their country and their homes from a curse, which of all the curses is the greatest; and should the Philistines be permitted for a time to conquer, they will, like Samson of old, slay more at their death than they have done during their life. In Gateshead, the two meetings were held in the open air, they were large, orderly, and effective. Public opinion would execrate the man who dared to insult or annoy us. I may say that the newspaper press in the North of England is quite disposed to help us; and there are very few newspapers in these parts that do not number a teetotaler either amongst their editors or proprietors. The signs of the times are with us. Yours faithfully,

T. WHITTAKER.

MR. JABEZ INWARDS.

(Extract from Letter.)

On June 12th, I attended a temperance festival at Elvaston, it is a small place, but the head gardener of Lord Herrington is a staunch teetotaler, and is doing much good in the village and neighbourhood. On the 13th, there was an excellent tea-party in the British School, Derby, and afterwards a public meeting. Several signatures were obtained. Another meeting was held on the following night. On the 15th, a meeting in the Wesleyan School, Borrowash; there was a great attendance, and several signatures. 16th, held a meeting at Aston, in a large room, belonging to a public house, the place was crowded. It was the first time a temperance meeting had been held in the village, and the people gladly received the truth. Thus while some school rooms are closed against us, and many chapels, a publican, without any charge, lends the use of his room. On the 26th, 27th and 28th, I held three overflowing meetings, in the town hall of Middlesborough. It was the anniversary of their society. It is a new and important town, and I scarcely ever met with more active and zealous teetotalers. Nearly fifty signed the pledge. On the 29th and 30th, held two meetings in the beautiful little village of Ayton, at which place there is a large agricultural school, conducted on the principles of Friends. All the children attended the lectures. They were most excellent meetings in reference to number and respectability. Monday, July 3rd, I travelled to Gringley-on-the-Hill, a beautiful place in Nottinghamshire. In this place, I gave three lectures, on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. On the Monday, about 700 partook of tea under a large booth; and in the evening I had the pleasure of speaking to more than a thousand individuals who had come from the surrounding country to mingle with their friends. This evening (the 8th) I lecture in Dowster. During the last fortnight, I have delivered ten lectures, and travelled nearly 500 miles, thanks to the Railroads. During the last year, I have delivered about 200 lectures, and generally to crowded assemblies. Hundreds have signed the pledge, and I rejoice to know that my labour has not been in vain.

REV. A. W. HERITAGE.

(Extract from Letter.)

I have attended eight meetings at St. Helier's, and two at St. Catherine's Bay in the Island of Jersey. The season of the year prevented many persons from attending the different meetings, but a lively interest is taken by the friends of temperance in the objects of my visit. At the close of one of my meetings in Guernsey, a publican of intemperate habits ascended the platform and publicly signed the pledge. After devoting a month's time to the advocacy in the Channel Islands, and making extensive observation, on the general habits and local circumstances of the population, it is my opinion that such a peculiar combination of causes rendering the advocacy of teetotalism necessary cannot be found in any other provincial locality. The unfortunate cheapness of ardent spirits and wines, places the intoxicating cup within the reach of all. This circumstance taken in connexion with the notorious fact, that many persons of dissipated habits whose pecuniary embarrassments render a removal from England to these islands desirable, will in some measure account for the extensive spread of intemperance. The number of half-pay officers on the island, and I hope not to give offence by adding, the military spirit of the inhabitants, contribute to the sad results every where visible.

But a most important and interesting feature in the operations of the temperance societies in these islands, arises from the fact, that the men employed upon the fortifications and other Government works, are for the most part strictly moderate and willing to attend our meetings, while some few have signed the pledge. It is but just to add, that the foremen on these works give us their countenance as far as persons not practising teetotalism can be expected to do. They will announce the meetings, provide us a place in which to meet and sometimes favour us with their presence.

In the Channel Islands, there are extensive Government works going on, and to prevent the workmen from contracting intemperate habits, towards the formation of which there are so many facilities, appears of the greatest importance.

LONDON.

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.

Pell Street, Ratcliff Highway.—The first of a series of weekly meetings in furtherance of the abstinence cause, was held on Tuesday evening, 20th June, in Caledonian Chapel, Pell Street. On that occasion, Mr. Hudson, Secretary to the National Temperance Society, delivered, by request, a lecture on the Extent, the Causes, and the Cure of Intemperance. The audience, which was numerous and respectable, listened with marked interest throughout to the able and conclusive statements of the lecturer, and testified their sympathy with his views by frequent and enthusiastic applause. At the close, the thanks of the meeting were, on the suggestion of the chairman, awarded in a very cordial manner to Mr. Hudson for the lecture which he had delivered, and the hope is entertained that he may be able, before long, to re-visit this locality, which, at least as much as any other of the Metropolitan districts, needs the labours of the temperance advocate. Several names were admitted to the total abstinence pledge at the close of the proceedings, and the promoters of the movement in the Pell Street neighbourhood feel much encouraged by the auspicious commencement which has been made by the visit of Mr. Hudson.

FITZROY ASSOCIATION.

On Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., a crowded meeting gathered at the Hall, Portland Street, to hear addresses from Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke, and the Rev. W. Reid of Edinburgh, President of the Scottish Temperance League. Mr. George Miller, Treasurer, occupied the chair, and delivered a suitable introductory address. Mr. Reid addressed the meeting at great length, on the several important bearings of the temperance cause. This association took its annual aquatic excursion, on the 26th of June. The party consisting of about 600, were conveyed in the Comet steamer to Southend, where the company disembarked, and enjoyed themselves each after his own taste. A temperance meeting was held on the Common, which was addressed by Messrs. King, Draper, Dean, Ure, Campbell, Gawthorpe, Tritton, Davies, Hodgson and Richardson. The company returned to town at an early hour.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

SERMONS.—On Sunday, July 9th, sermons were preached in the Barony and St. Andrew's Churches, by the Rev. Thomas C. Wilson, of Dundek; in Lauriston Free Church and Erskine Church, by the Rev. W. B. Clark, of Dumfries; in Nile-street, and West George-street Chapels, by the Rev. Alexander Hannay, of Dundee; in the New City Hall and Gillespie Church, by the Rev. Francis Johnstone, of Edinburgh; in Hope-street Chapel, by the Rev. James Paterson; and in East Regent-street Congregational Chapel, by the Rev. William Scott. Nearly all the services were well attended, and some of them were crowded; and it is believed that this mode of promoting the temperance movement will prove exceedingly effective. Never, on any former occasion, were the doctrines of abstinence propounded in the hearing of so many of the citizens of Glasgow at one time.

PUBLIC MEETING.—On Monday night the annual public meeting of the League was held in the Rev. Dr. King's Church, North Albion-street. In the unavoidable absence of Bailie Robert Smith, John Dunlop, Esq. of London, was unanimously called to the chair. There were present the Rev. T. C. Wilson of Dundek; the Rev. Ebenezer Syme, Glasgow; the Rev. John Kirk, of Edinburgh; the Rev. W. B. Clark, of Dumfries; the Rev. William Reid, of Edinburgh; the Rev. C. J. Kennedy; Rev. Robert Simpson; James Mitchell, Esq. of Lochside; Alexander Linton, Esq., Surgeon, R.N., Aberdeen; John Davie, Esq., merchant, Dunfermline; Messrs. William Logan and James Stirling, agents of the League, William Service, jun., and John McGavin, A. H. McLean, John Jackson, James McKenna, William Crawford, George Gallie, Thomas Brown, James Winning, of Paisley; W. C. Gregory, of Edinburgh; John Murray, of Bowling Bay; John Moffatt, of Rochdale, &c., &c.

Eloquent speeches were delivered by the Rev. T. C. Wilson, Mr. J. Mitchell, Rev. Mr. Syme, Alexander Linton, Esq., Surgeon, R.N., Rev. John Kirk, Rev. Mr. Clark, Rev. William Reid, Mr. John Davie, Mr. William Service, and Mr. Robert Rae, Secretary of the Scottish League.

PUBLIC BREAKFAST.—At eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, about fifty of the members and friends of the Scottish Temperance League breakfasted together in the Eagle Hotel, Maxwell-street, Glasgow. The chair was occupied by the Rev. John Kirk, of Edinburgh, and John Dunlop, Esq., of London discharged the duties of croupier. The meeting consisted of the leading friends of the temperance cause in Glasgow, with a number of their coadjutors from different parts of the country. The Rev. Thomas C. Wilson, of Dunkeld, asked a blessing; and after the company had partaken of the sumptuous entertainment provided by Mr. Graham, an animated conversation took place on various important topics, and the meeting broke up shortly after ten o'clock.

MEETING OF MEMBERS.—At eleven o'clock, the members of the League assembled in the Eagle Hotel, for the transaction of the usual business of the annual meeting. The Rev. William Reid, of Edinburgh took the chair, and the Rev. W. B. Clark, of Dumfries, implored the Divine blessing on the proceedings.

The Chairman introduced the business by a few appropriate remarks, and called upon Mr. Robert Rae, Secretary, to read the Report of the Executive Committee.

The Report stated that the meeting had been deferred three months beyond the usual time, to meet the wishes of a number of country friends, who found it inconvenient to travel during the season of the year at which the meetings were formerly held, and the Report would therefore extend over a period of fifteen months. In connexion with the advocacy department, Mr. William Logan, Commissioner of the League, had been collecting information, stirring up and re-organising societies and committees, &c., since June, 1847, and his efforts had been very successful, particularly in connexion with the juvenile movement. Mr. James Stirling had made a six months' tour through the north of Scotland, and had succeeded in re-establishing many defunct societies. He had also spent three months in Ayr and Dumfries shires, where his labours were highly appreciated and eminently useful. Mr. Edward Grubb had delivered lectures on the literary and scientific aspect of the question in many of the principal towns of Scotland; and Mr. John Dyer, of Northampton, had lectured on the accordance of abstinence with chemical and physiological science, at a considerable number of places. In addition to the labours of the agents of the League, important service had been rendered to the cause by a number of gentlemen resident in Glasgow and elsewhere, who had delivered lectures, preached sermons, and addressed soirées. The publication department had occupied a great deal of the time of the Executive Committee. The Scottish Temperance Review had an average circulation of 2,400 copies monthly. The Adviser had circulated to the extent of 12,500 each month, and upwards of 1,000,000 pages of tracts of various kinds had been sold, making an aggregate circulation of four and a half millions of pages of tracts and periodicals.

This was succeeded by a general conference of the adherents to abstinence principles from different quarters of the kingdom; and the whole was appropriately brought to a close by a juvenile demonstration.

HOUGHTON, HUNTS.

ANNUAL TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL.—The annual festival of the Temperance Society was held at this place, on Tuesday, the 11th of July. The weather being exceedingly fine, a large number of visitors availed themselves of the opportunity of spending an afternoon at this pleasant village; and the company was further augmented by the arrival of upwards of a 100 persons from Huntingdon and Godmanchester, who came and returned by a special train, which stopped at Houghton for their accommodation. An excellent tea was prepared, to which about 1300 persons sat down, in a large tent belonging to P. Brown, Esq., and considering the great number who were present, the arrangements certainly reflected great credit on the managers; every effort being made for the satisfaction of the company, who appeared highly to enjoy themselves. The afternoon was enlivened by the presence of an excellent band, from Huntingdon, which played at frequent intervals during the proceedings.

The public meeting, which commenced about half-past seven o'clock, was opened by J. Longland Ekins, Esq., of Woodhurst, being called to the chair, who immediately introduced to the meeting, E. P. Hood, Esq., of York, which gentleman, after a few words, proceeded to give the audience a few temperance songs, which consisted of pleasant rhymes, expressive of temperance principles, and adapted to popular airs. The meeting appeared highly entertained, and joined in the chorus with much readiness. Mr. Hood explained that these songs had a moral tendency, and were calculated to subvert the objection so often raised against the temperance movement, that it is anti-social in its character. He observed that the influence of song had been long enough devoted to intemperance and vice, and recommended its being enlisted on the side of truth and sobriety, when its harmonizing and cheering effects would be discovered.

Mr. J. ADDLESHAW, Agent to the West Norfolk Association, next addressed the meeting in a profoundly argumentative and very interesting speech, in which he shewed the baneful effects of intemperance on the working-classes, and that this monster evil was at the root of the greater part of the poverty and misery to be found in the country. Some people contended that the sole cause of these evils was improper legislation, but which he denied. Admitting, however, such to be the case, was not intemperance the foundation of corrupt legislation. In many cases the way to the House of Commons was over the beer barrel. Let temperance be established in the country, and the qualification for a member of parliament would no longer be plenty of drink to give to the voters, but real moral and intellectual worth. He displayed the comfort and happiness which the principle of total abstinence had caused where it was practised, and asserted that the object of the temperance movement was to utterly destroy intemperance in every shape, and to promote the moral good of humanity.

Mr. Hood again rose, and delighted the meeting by a most impressive and earnest address, delivered in a masterly style. His beautiful illustrations and powerful appeals were listened to with enthusiasm, and at the conclusion, he was greeted with tremendous applause from all parts of the meeting. In the course of the evening, he entertained the company by several new temperance melodies, and the proceedings did not terminate till a rather late hour. The occasion will not be readily forgotten by those who were present, and the effects of such a pleasant and sociable demonstration on the minds of the public must be beneficial.

OXFORDSHIRE.

Very interesting meetings have recently been held in this county (during a visit by Mr. Claridge,) at Banbury, Bloxham, and Milcombe. Great interest was excited, and signatures to the pledge obtained. The meeting at each place was well attended.

DEVIZES.

TEMPERANCE WHITSUNTIDE FESTIVAL. — On Tuesday evening, the annual Whitsuntide Festival of the Devizes Temperance Society was held at the Town Hall. The talented Dr. Carr, of Birmingham, and Josiah Hunt, a member of the Society of Friends, from Gloucestershire, were present. About 200 persons sat down to tea, the arrangements for which were made with the utmost liberality and precision. In the orchestra was a full and efficient choir, who performed several vocal pieces during the evening.

After tea, the President, G. W. ANSTIE, Esq., gave an introductory address on the nature, the prospects, and the difficulties of the temperance cause. The two principal drawbacks he considered to be,—the indifference of religious professors; and the insufficient means in operation to enlist the young in the ranks of total abstinence. He showed the peculiar calls which this movement had upon the countenance and support of all religious men; and trusted its claims would soon be felt by those who of all others most anxiously desired the happiness of the whole world—he referred to the members of the Christian church.

After Mr. ANSTIE, Mr. HUNT addressed the meeting. His remarks were expressive of the feelings of a mind deeply imbued with the holy principles he advocated. There was an honesty of purpose, and a sincerity of aim apparent in every sentence uttered by this straightforward and unassuming man. Several of the facts related were of an affecting nature; and altogether this effort of Mr. Hunt's to "diminish the great mountain of human misery, and to increase the small heap of human happiness," bade fair to be a successful, as it was a well-directed one.

Dr. CARR followed, in a scientific address of great length, upon the effects of alcohol on the human system, and concluded by giving an earnest exhortation to his audience to weigh the facts of the case fairly in their minds, and to decide according to their better judgment, between the system of drinking and that of total abstinence. He sat down amid great applause.

Mr. STAPLES of Urchfont then proposed, and Mr. MACK seconded, a vote of thanks to Messrs. Hunt and Carr for their attendance and excellent addresses, which motion was carried by acclamation and briefly acknowledged.

A vote of thanks to the Mayor was also carried, on the motion of Mr. Fox and Mr. Sinclair.

It was announced, to the great satisfaction of all present, that Dr. Carr had consented to visit the town again on Thursday week, June 22nd, to resume the subject he had now so well begun: the announcement was enthusiastically received.—Abridged from the Wilts Independent.

GILLINGHAM.

On the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday the 21st and 22nd of June, we were favoured with a visit from D. Carr, Esq., M.D., of Birmingham, who delivered two lectures in the Temperance Hall on the scientific truth of teetotalism; endeavouring by his arguments to remove false impressions, by showing that it is based on the principles of chemistry, and that it is eminently conducive to the healthy functions of the human frame. The lectures were numerous and respectfully attended, and the audiences were highly gratified with the opportunity thus afforded them for obtaining more correct information in reference to the principles of total abstinence from alcoholic beverages.

EDWARD NEAVE.

HARWICH.

DEAR SIR,—I am happy to inform you that the cause has received a fresh impetus in this town, through the visit of the Rev. William Heritage. We held an open air meeting on the Green, on Tuesday evening, about 500 persons present; J. M. Dore, commenced the meeting and introduced the lecturer, who earnestly, solemnly and strikingly addressed them; he was listened to with much approbation; a number of tracts were also distributed and eagerly asked for. On Wednesday evening, he preached a sermon in the Independent Chapel, a deep and tender feeling was produced, and several contributions were given towards the Temperance Missionary Fund; after the service a meeting of the friends took place in the Vestry, the Rev. J. Hill presided, and signed the book as a member of the society; and it was agreed to re-organize the society, and form an Auxiliary to the National Temperance Society. I remain, yours respectfully,

JAMES M. DORE, Sec.

HIGH WYCOMBE.

On Monday, July 17th, 1848, we (the High Wycombe Total Abstinence Society) held our Fifth Teetotal Fete, in West Wycombe Park, kindly granted for the occasion by G. H. Dashwood, Esq., M.P. The meeting was well attended, there being about 1500 persons present. Mr. W. Gawthorpe attended, and spoke with much effect. The speaking was listened to with great attention, and we make no doubt a lasting impression was made. The fineness of the day, the music, the various sorts of innocent amusements, together with a good supply of refreshments at the various booths and stalls, rendered the meeting very attractive, and the holiday seemed to be much enjoyed by the numerous and respectable visitors.

A. TURNER.

DOWLAI8.—Drunkenness is very prevalent, and beer-houses abound to an extent wholly unnecessary for any good purpose. There are said to be more than 200 such houses in Dowlais alone. The publicans are active in getting up clubs of all kinds, for which the Welch have a great passion; the business of these clubs is transacted at beer-houses.—Report on the State of Education in Wales.

The Dowlais Company have intimated that no person in their employ will be allowed to keep a public house. When it is known that considerable evil arose from the permission, by men who might be employed by such people being obliged to go to such places to get paid, we hail the measure as a very judicious one. Under the pretence of going for his payment, many a hard-working man has found that a public house is a serious inroad upon his small pittance, and also that unless he left a portion of it for drink, there were all the chances that he should not be employed at all. It is also rumoured that Cyfarthfa is about to follow such example, and that the regulation will be strictly enforced. This prohibitory system has been in operation for a considerable time in the Plymouth works, and it has produced the most beneficial effects.—Monmouthshire Beacon.

Gleanings.

VERY ACUTE.—The next vessel which visited Mauke, was His Majesty's superb frigate, the Blonde, commanded by the Hon. Captain Lord Byron, who had just conveyed the bodies of the deceased chiefs of the Sandwich Islands to their own country. From the published narrative of that voyage I present the following extract:—"They (the natives) were much astonished at every thing they saw on board the frigate, though it appeared they were not ignorant of the use of guns and other things; but they evidently had never seen so large a vessel. The galley fire, and the players on wind instruments in the band, seemed to surprise and delight them more than any thing. Our bread they ate, after smelling it; but it is impossible to describe their faces of disgust on tasting the wine.—Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands. By the Rev. JOHN WILLIAMS.

A WHOLESOME REGULATION.—Just as we were ready to go on shore to take tea at George Bicknell's, to whom as Deputy-consul, the mail brought from New South Wales had been delivered, the young King, or perhaps it is more correct to say, the husband of the Queen, came on board with his younger brother and uncle, and several others; they behaved with great openness and cheerfulness, and seemed highly pleased to see us. Our captain was personally known to them already. They soon looked round the vessel, apparently delighted; left us a basket of oranges, and said they would come again to-morrow. To my great rejoicing, the pilot soon after coming on board, informed us of the entire disuse of ardent spirits in Tahiti; saying, "Rum is no good here." The total prohibition of spirituous liquors has been so strongly enforced, that they have taken them out of private houses without exception, and thrown them away; and the natives have carried it to the length of smelling the breath of people, to ascertain whether they had been used, and if found to be the case, a severe fine was imposed; so that a person well known to lead a thoroughly sober life was not allowed to have such a thing in his possession, but was liable at any time to undergo a search.—Nineteenth Chapter of the Memoirs of Daniel Wheeler.

INDIAN SAGACITY.—"The conversation of the Indians that evening, while they were passing their pipe round and making their comments upon what they had seen, was exceedingly curious, and deserves to be recorded. They expressed great satisfaction at the kind manner in which they had been entertained by the mayor, understanding that he was the head man of the town of Manchester—"chief of that village," as they called him; "they saw him and his squaw, and many other beautiful squaws, all drinking; and they saw many people through the windows, and in the doors, as they passed along the streets, who were drinking; and they saw several persons in the streets who were quite drunk, and two or three lying down in the streets, like pigs; and they thought the people of Manchester loved much to drink liquor. They saw a great deal of smoke, and thought the prairies were on fire; they saw many fine-looking squaws walking in the streets, and some of them holding on to men's arms, and didn't look sick neither. They saw a great many large houses, which it seemed as if nobody lived in. They saw a great many people in the streets, who appeared very poor, and looked as if they had nothing to eat. They had seen many thousands, and almost all looked so poor that they thought it would do no good for us to stay in Manchester."—Callin's Notes in Europe, vol. i.

INDIAN NOTIONS OF ENGLISH SOCIETY.—"It seemed that in their drive this day, Jim and the Doctor had both rode outside, which had afforded to Jim the opportunity of seeing to advantage, for the first time, the immense number of "gin-palaces," as they passed along the streets; and into which they could look from the top of the bus, and distinctly see the great number of large kegs, and what was going on inside. The Doctor had first discovered them in his numerous outside rides, and as he was not quite sure that he had rightly understood them, hearing that the English people detested drunkards so much, he had not ventured to say much about them. He had been anxious for the corroboration of Jim's sharper eyes, and during this morning they had fully decided that the hundreds of such places they were in all directions passing, were places where people went to drink chickaboboo, and they were called *chickaboboo*s. The conversation of Jim and the Doctor, enlarged very much on this grand discovery, and the probable effects they had upon the London people. They had seen many women, and some of them with little babies in their arms, standing and lying around them, and they were quite sure that some of those women were drunk. Jim said that he and the Doctor had counted two or three hundred in one hour. Some of the party told him he had made his story too big, so he said he and the Doctor next day would mark them down on a stick. Jim said there was one street they came through, where he hoped they would never drive them again, for it made their hearts sore to see so many women and little children all in dirty rags: they had never seen any Indians in the wilderness half so poor, and looking so sick. He was sure they had not half enough to eat. He said he thought it was wrong to send missionaries from this to the Indian country, when there were so many poor creatures here who want their help, and so many thousands as they saw going into the *chickaboboo*s to drink fire-water."—Callin's Notes in Europe, vol. ii.

LEGAL ENACTMENT.—Drunkenness is an offence for which a man may be punished in the Ecclesiastical Court, as well as by Justices of Peace by Statute. If any person shall be convicted of drunkenness, by the view of a justice oath of one witness, &c., he shall forfeit five shillings for the first offence, to be levied by distress and sale of his goods, and for want of a distress, shall sit in the stocks six hours; and for the second offence, he is to be bound with two sureties in ten pounds each, to be of the good behaviour, or be committed. For drunkenness, seamen may be punished by fine, &c., as a court-martial shall think fit, by statute 13 Car. cap. 2 c. 9; and he who is guilty of any crime through his own voluntary drunkenness, shall be punished for it as much as if he had been sober.—Jacob's Law Dictionary.

HOSPITALITY.—Let thy hospitality be moderate; and, according to the means of thy estate, rather plentiful than sparing, but not costly. I never knew any man grow poor by keeping an orderly table, but some consume themselves through secret vices and their hospitality bears the blame. But banish swinish drunkards out of thine house, which is a vice impairing health, consuming much, and makes no show. I never heard praise ascribed to the drunkard but the well-bearing his drink; which is a better commendation for a brewer's horse or a drayman, than for either a gentleman or a serving man.—Lord Burleigh.

ABSTINENCE SAFER.—Let no company or respect ever draw you into excess in drink, for be you well assured, that if ever that possess you, you are instantly drunk to all the respect your friends will otherwise pay you, and shall by unequal staggering paces go to your grave with confusion of face, as well in them that love you as in yourself; and therefore abhor all company that might entice you that way.—Lord Strafford.

MISSING THE WAY.—He that misseth his road from the beginning of his journey, and is deceived in his first marks at his first setting forth, the greater his mistake is, the more difficult will be his entrance into the right way.—Barclay's Apology.

GARRICK A WINE MERCHANT.—During the short interval between his mother's death and his commencing comedian, he engaged for some time in the wine trade with his brother, Mr. Peter Garrick. Foote used sarcastically to say, that he remembered Garrick living in Durham Yard with three quarts of vinegar, calling himself a wine merchant.—Davies' Life of Garrick.

A BROKEN HEART.—Miss Mehetabel Wesley, sister to the celebrated John Wesley, married a dissolute and drunken character, who spent his evenings from home, and, by a series of ill treatment, broke the heart of his amiable and accomplished wife. How affecting to find her prayer for the death of herself and infant in the following lines:—

Drooping sweetness! verdant flower!
Blooming, withering in an hour!
Ere thy gentle breast sustains
Latest, fiercest, mortal pains,
Hear a suppliant! let me be Partner in thy destiny!
That whene'er the fatal cloud
Must thy radiant temples shroud;
When deadly damps, impending now,
Shall hover round thy destin'd brow,
Diffusive may their influence be,
And, with the blossom, blast the tree!

Anon.

WANTS.—It is not from nature, but from education and habits, that our wants are chiefly derived.—Fielding's Amelia.

TO THE UNDECIDED.—That we ought to do an action, is of itself a sufficient and ultimate answer to the questions, Why we should do it? How we are obliged to do it? The conviction of duty implies the soundest reason, the strongest obligation, of which our nature is susceptible.—Whewell.

MAKING A DRUNKARD.—Lord Byron had a particular penchant to see Downton intoxicated, a circumstance it is said which had never taken place. One cold frosty night, finding the comedian about to leave the theatre, his lordship invited him into his private room, and observed that he was sorry he could not ask him to take wine, but seemed in Downton's opinion to wish it on his own account. Downton observed, that he could obtain what was necessary from Raymond, who was plentifully supplied by Mrs. Coult's; they consequently went together, but Raymond had nothing but whiskey. Lord Byron then expressed his skill in making toddy from that liquor in a superior style; the toddy was prepared in his lordship's private room, when the pleasing conversation and the strength of the liquor produced the desired effect. Downton finding the effects of the potion, attempted to make an honourable retreat, but his legs refusing to perform their natural functions, he staggered, and reeling left the theatre. Lord Byron, delighted at his success followed him, and ordered his carriage to convey Downton to his house in safety; but Downton persisted in going in his usual pedestrian-like manner. His lordship finding that he could not prevail, desired his servant to protect him, and not to leave him until he reached home. This was highly relished the next morning by the whole corps dramatique, many attempts having been previously made upon the sobriety of Downton, without producing the desired effect.—Nathan's Reminiscences of Lord Byron.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN.—He was light and active of body, walked with a certain stateliness of air, and his constitution rather delicate than robust, was saved, it is said, from consumption by habits of regularity and temperance.—Allan Cunningham.

IT IS NOT FOR KINGS TO DRINK WINE.—

Boundless Intemperance
In nature is a tyranny; it hath been
The untimely emptying of the happy throne,
And fall of many Kings.

—Macduff to Malcolm.

DRUNKENNESS.—A certain people among the ancient Greeks, (the Locrians I think,) punished with double rigour any crime committed in liquor; first and principally for getting drunk, and secondly, for the crime committed: for certainly he who eradicates his reason deliberately, as drunkards do, is much more guilty of what is committed for want of that reason, destroyed by his own fault, than he whose reason is overcome by any accidental attack of passion.—Taylor's Laconics.

A TRUE PICTURE.—

Pass where we may, through city or through town,
Village, or Hamlet, of this merry land,
Though lean and beggar'd, every twentieth pace
Conducts the unguarded nose to such a whiff
Of stale debauch, forth issuing from the styes
That law has licensed, as makes Temp'rance reel.
There sit, invol'd and lost in curling clouds
Of Indian fume, and guzzling deep, the boor,
The lackey, and the groom; the craftsman there
Takes a leathern leave of all his toil;
Smith, cobbler, joiner, he that plies the shears,
And he that kneads the dough, all loud alike,
All learned, and all drunk!

—Cowper's Winter Evening.

Poetry.

WATER.

Life blood of the mighty earth,
Flowing from creation's birth;
Throbbing infinite and free,
In the heart-beat of the sea;
Pulsing down each river vein
Of the green enamelled plain;
Stealing up from deep repose,
Through the crimson bosomed rose;
Glorious thou in all thy forms;
Whether whirled in midnight storms,
Or by wavelets rocked to rest,
On the snow-white lily's breast.

On thy pearly curtain fold,
Fringed with amaranth and gold,
Sunset, as her coursers linger,
Writes her tale with rosy finger;
And a blush is on thy mist,
As its brow is warmly kissed
By the opening lips of morning,
On the fresh love of its dawning;
Midnight sees its waveless deep
Like an ocean stretched in sleep,
With the dark green trees and highlands
Rising o'er its breast like islands.

Bride of heaven! O, Protean water,
Lo! the rainbow is thy daughter,
Clasping thee in radiant arms,
Even in the hours of storms.
And in many glittering hues,
See! the million-orbed dews,
Sisters of the glorious arch,
Dance along thy showery march;
And the grass gives odour sweet,
Bathing all their "twinkling feet,"
As it bends along their track,
Till the light winds call them back.

Every old and gnarled trunk,
In whose roots thy stream is drunk,
Feels along its breast a thrill Creeping undisturbed and still,
As the sun with magic art
Melts into its frozen heart;
Till its warmth and hueless blood,
Crowding into leaf and bud,
Clothes in green each giant limb,
Gorgeous as the robes that swim
Round the knights of Fairy-land,
By the breath of roses fanned.

Oh! thy coming down is sweet,
When oppressed by summer's heat,
Bowing every herb and flower
Praise thee for the pleasant shower,
See, each thirsting plant holds up
For thy gift its little cup,
While on every grassy spear
Hangs in light a grateful tear.
Orbs of beauty bathed in gold
On thy sunlit way are rolled,
Each fair orb, a mimic world,
Through the sky in splendour hurled.

Bubbling in thy granite urn,
Where the day-beams never burn,
Twinkling in the pebbly run,
Grass defended from the sun,
Rustling in the little pool,
Thou art sweetly musical;
Never bird or voice divine
Hath a gladder tone than thine;
Man hath richer earth-gift never,
Ne'er more spurned with gift or giver.

IMPORTANCE OF TEMPERANCE HABITS TO MOTHERS PHYSICALLY CONSIDERED.

HEM by her smile how soon the stranger knows,
 How soon by his the glad discovery shows,
 As to her lips she lifts the lovely boy,
 What answering looks of sympathy and joy;
 He walks, he speaks, in many a broken word,
 His wants, his wishes, and his grief are heard,
 And ever, ever to her lap he flies,
 When rosy sleep comes on with sweet surprise.
 Lock'd in her arms, his arms across her lung,
 (That name for ever dear upon his tongue),
 As with soft accents round her neck he clings,
 And cheek to cheek, her lulling song she sings;
 How blest to feel the beatings of his heart,
 Breathe his sweet breath, and kiss for kiss impart,
 Watch o'er his slumbers like the brooding dove,
 And if she can exhaust a mother's love.—ROBERTS.

Notwithstanding the want of consideration in some, it is exceedingly probable that among the intellectual and reflecting of womankind, there are not a few who are willing to be guided into all truth in matters connected with the welfare of the rising race. To such it will be an inquiry of no small interest, whether the majority of mothers during the period of lactation, have not unwittingly departed from nature in the use of fermented and spirituous drinks. Upon examination, it will be found that "the poisonous stream of ardent spirit is conveyed through the milk of the mother to the infant at the breast, so that the fountain of life through which nature supplies that pure and healthy nutriment of infancy is poisoned at its very source, and a diseased and vitiated appetite is created, which grows with its growth, and strengthens with its increasing weakness and decay." And, first, one proof, that alcohol in none of its combinations is needed, is furnished in the natural history of the female brutes. "What would be thought," says Mr. Higginbottom, "of an old woman who should give her cow a gallon of ale under the idea that it would then be better able to suckle its calf?" What should we think of the same practices being pursued towards any or the whole of the creatures that God has made? Do the canine species, or the tiger in miniature of the domestic hearth, lack nutriment for their young? Does the lioness require fermented drinks to enable her to supply her whelps? Are the offspring of the tigress weakly, when as we have seen a whelp six months old bid defiance to the power of three athletic men? But if the axiom here holds good, that what is true of the individual is true of the class, then standing as woman does at the head of the class mammalia, requires not for her own support, or that of her offspring, any kind or quantity of alcoholic drinks. If, moreover, nothing can be nutritive to the babe, that is not nutritious to the mother, it will follow (if it be proved that liquids contain no elements for the formation of blood) that the child is not nourished by virtue of any liquids with which the mother had been supplied. Two inquiries then must be solved. First, what constitutes nourishment for the mother; secondly, what is necessary for the child. "If we hold," says Professor Liebig, "that increase of mass in the animal body, the development of its organs, and the supply of waste, that all this is dependent on the blood, that is on the ingredients of the blood, then only those substances can be called nutritious, or considered as food, which are capable of conversion into blood." Sir Anthony Carlisle affirms that "Nourishing substances require to be of a similitude with the substances to be nourished and the constituent materials of man, and the whole of living creation contains no such composition as fermented and spirituous liquors; such liquors cannot, therefore, be reckoned useful in the way of nourishing or maintaining the principal materials of the human frame." Upon the authority of the German philosopher above quoted, "the chief ingredients of the blood contain nearly seventeen per cent. of nitrogen, and no part of an organ contains less than seventeen per cent. of nitrogen." He adds finally, "The most convincing experiments and observations have proved that the animal body is absolutely incapable of producing an elementary body, such as carbon or nitrogen, out of substances which do not contain it; and it obviously follows that all kinds of food fit for the production either of blood or of cellular tissue, membranes, skin, hair, muscular fibre, &c., must contain a certain amount of nitrogen, because that element is essential to the composition of the above-named organs, because the organs cannot create it from the other elements presented to them, and finally, because no nitrogen is absorbed from the atmosphere in the vital process."

From these considerations, it is obvious that nourishment is not derived from any non-azotised substance, in other words, substances which contain no nitrogen. Fermented and spirituous drinks contain a principle for which they are chiefly estimated, namely, ALCOHOL. This alcohol, it should be remembered, contains no elements for nourishing the human body, its composition being hydrogen, three equivalents; carbon, two equivalents; oxygen, one equivalent, product 23, and therefore destitute of nitrogen. All liquids, too, being amorphous, or unorganized, as such do not contribute to the formation of blood. This holds equally true of fat, starch, sugar, and all other substances destitute of nitrogen. "To determine, therefore," says Liebig, "what substances are capable of affording nourishment, it is only necessary to ascertain the composition of the food, and to compare that with the ingredients of the blood." Food, then, the elements of which are identical in composition with the constituent elements of blood, is essential to the formation of the vital fluid, and from this fluid all the organs of the body are originally derived. Hence the important bearing that the physical condition of the mother has upon the organic development of the child is obvious, if we consider that the condition of her blood must determine the quality of her milk, and that this milk, when healthy and pure, contains the exact ingredients required for amalgamation to the living organs of the child.

There is one principle in the composition of the fluid "which the body of the mother secretes in the shape of milk, one nitrogenized constituent, known under the name of caseine; besides this, its chief ingredients are butter (fat) and sugar of milk." Now, this butter and sugar of milk serve important ends in the animal economy of the child, for although "the blood of the young animal, its muscular fibre, cellular tissue, nervous matter, and bones must have derived their origin from the nitrogenized constituents of milk," (the caseine) yet these substances, being destitute of nitrogen, are needed as elements of respiration for the production of animal HEAT. "The young animal, therefore," says Liebig, "receives in the form of caseine the chief constituents of the mother's blood.

Such is the theory, but what is the fact. Let us listen to evidence of a positive nature, derived from the experience of those well qualified to form and to pronounce judgment. A. Courtney, Esq., surgeon, of Ramsgate, in a recent communication to the secretary of the National Society, says,—

"I have heard of cases in which, on account of the bad quality of the milk, or the want of digestive power in the mother, the child must have been weaned, but for the assistance of small quantities of wine or porter occasionally. How alcohol can improve the quality of the milk, I am at a loss to know; and that it can increase the functional power of the stomach better, or even so well as many simple tonic medicines I do not believe. On the contrary, alcoholic liquors do but injure, more or less, the digestive powers, and poison the blood and the milk, and as a consequence of this last effect, thousands of infants are cut off annually by convulsions, &c.

"If a mother cannot nurse her offspring without alcoholic liquors she should not nurse it at all. All that these beverages can do, is to stimulate the system to efforts which it cannot sustain, which efforts are sure to be followed by future weakness, the weakness more or less permanent, in proportion to the repetition of the indulgence and to the quantity taken at each repetition. In this way, the health of mothers is gradually undermined and destroyed, and its destruction, I regret to say, very generally attributed to any but the true cause—to the consequences of nursing, instead of to the use of a beverage, whose every action is to pervert and derange the healthy movements of the system."

To take a retrogressive step, we find another gentleman of equal experience, (L. M. Bennet, Esq., of Winterton) declaring,—

"During the last twelve years of practice, I have attended upwards of 720 cases of midwifery, during which time I have in no single case used brandy, wine or other stimulant, and although I have had several severe cases of hæmorrhage, have not lost one single patient from that cause."

But here we must pause. Not to mention the infantile mortality produced by the drinking of ardent spirits and fermented drinks by thousands of ill-guided parents, (which may hereafter furnish matter for very serious reflection) we have at least thrown together thoughts which mothers especially would do well to ponder, for on them will depend, under God, whether we are blessed with a healthy or a sickly, a puny or an athletic, a sober or a drunken, a vicious or a virtuous population.

THE HISTORY OF ALE.

ALE.—The etymology of this word is rather uncertain; the most probable conjecture is, that it is Anglo-Saxon. For specific information respecting the mode of manufacturing ale, and its distinction from beer and porter, we must refer to BREWING, confining this article to a general history of ale as an article of consumption by man. The use of an intoxicating beverage composed of barley or other grain steeped in water and afterwards fermented, may be traced in several parts of the ancient world. Pliny the Naturalist states, that in his time it was in general use amongst all the several nations who inhabited the western part of Europe; and, according to him, it was not confined to those northern countries whose climate did not permit the successful cultivation of the grape. He mentions that the inhabitants of Egypt and Spain used a kind of ale; and says that, though it was differently named in different countries, it was universally the same liquor. See Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. xiv. c. 22. Herodotus, who wrote 500 years before Pliny, tells us that the Egyptians used a liquor made of barley (ii. 77.) Dion Cassius alludes to a similar beverage amongst the people inhabiting the shores of the Adriatic, lib. 49, De Pannonis. Tacitus states, that the ancient Germans "for their drink drew a liquor from barley or other grain, and fermented it so as to make it resemble wine."—Tacit. De Mor. Ger. c. 23. Ale was also the favourite liquor of the Anglo-Saxons and Danes; it is constantly mentioned as one of the constituents of their feasts; and before the introduction of Christianity amongst the northern nations, it was an article of belief amongst them that drinking copious draughts of ale formed one of the chief felicities of their heroes in the Hall of Odin. It is expressly named as one of the liquors provided for a royal banquet in the reign of Edward the Confessor. If the accounts given by Isidorus and Orosius of the method of making ale amongst the ancient Britons and other Celtic nations be correct, it is evident that it did not materially differ from our modern brewing.

They state, "that the grain is steeped in water and made to germinate; it is then dried and ground; after which it is infused in a certain quantity of water, which is afterwards fermented." Henry's History of England, vol. ii. p. 364.)

In early periods of the History of England, ale and bread appear to have been considered as equally victuals or absolute necessaries of life. This appears from the various assizes or ordinances of bread and ale (assise panis et cervisie) which were passed from time to time for the purpose of regulating the price and quality of these articles. In the 51st year of the reign of Henry III. (1266) a statute was passed, the preamble of which alludes to earlier statutes on the same subject, by which a graduated scale was established for the price of ale throughout England. It declared that "when a quarter of wheat was sold for three shillings, or three shillings and four-pence, and a quarter of barley for twenty pence or twenty-four pence, and a quarter of oats for fifteen pence, brewers in cities could afford to sell two gallons of ale for a penny, and out of cities three gallons for a penny; when in a town (in burgo) three gallons are sold for a penny, out of a town they may and ought to sell four." In process of time this uniform scale of price became extremely inconvenient and oppressive; and by the statute 23 Henry VIII. c. 4, it was enacted that ale-brewers should charge for their ale such prices as might appear convenient and sufficient in the discretion of the justices of the peace within whose jurisdiction such ale-brewers should dwell. The price of ale was regulated by provisions like those above stated, and the quality was ascertained by officers of great antiquity, called "gustatores cervisie,"—ale-tasters, or ale-conners. These officers were regularly chosen every year in the court-leet of each manor, and were sworn "to examine and assay the beer and ale, and to take care that they were good and wholesome, and sold at proper prices according to the assize; and also to present all defaults of brewers to the next court-leet." Similar officers were also appointed in boroughs and towns corporate; and in many places, in compliance with charters or ancient custom, ale-tasters are, at the present day, annually chosen and sworn, though the duties of the office are fallen into disuse. These ancient regulations appear to have been dictated by a regard to public health; but in modern times, since ale and beer have become exciseable commodities, the numerous restrictions and provisions which have been introduced are directed principally to the security of the revenue and the convenient collection of duties; though they undoubtedly secure the consumer, to a certain extent, from any adulteration of the article by the admixture of improper ingredients.—Penny Cyclopaedia.

AN ADDRESS TO THE MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL.

Nothing is more clear than that the habit of drunkenness is reached by slow and insidious steps; that all men have been at one time exceedingly moderate in their use of the ensnaring drink; that by very gradual processes their attachment has been formed. The liking once acquired, the fetters of intemperance are soon fixed and fastened. In this way not only have well educated and respectably trained persons become the victims of drunkenness, but even religious professors, officers of christian churches, and not a few distinguished ministers of the gospel, have been slain in their high places by this fearful destroyer.

Experience has demonstrated that it is somewhat hazardous to use these drinks at almost any time, or for almost any purpose. Dr. Adam Clarke refers to religious people whom he had known, and who were ruined in body, soul, and estate, by the use of alcohol in the form of patent medicines. And it is to be feared that many really conscientious persons have been in the habit of taking spirits and wines as cordials and comforting medicines, until the deadly attachment has been formed, which has resulted in their physical and moral ruin. May we not also add, that the customs and usages of moral and respectable society are fraught with danger even to ministers of religion.

We have known persons most generously press wine and spirits on ministers when visiting in their families, or when going to preach or officiate on other public occasions; and yet those were the very persons to remark how the minister seemed to enjoy his glass, and would, no doubt, have been the first to proclaim his fall to the world.

Mistaken hospitality in this way has been a fatal temptation to some, apparently of the best men that ever filled the ministerial office,—and therefore a regard to our own personal preservation demands that we should not despise so simple yet efficient a safeguard as the total abstinence principle.

We confess that we feel no little surprise that there are some of our brethren who treat with indifference, or even with scorn, the temperance movement, although they have been the companions of brethren ruined by strong drink, and although in some cases the most awful results have occurred in their own families, and the victims have been their nearest earthly kindred.

There is not a Christian denomination in the world that has not been wounded and made to mourn over such catastrophes, as we have now referred to; and BRETHREN, WE ALL KNOW IT!! How then should we be concerned for our own personal honour and security, to enlist in a cause which at once removes every temptation, at least to this one great and prevailing sin.

But if ministerial reputation, consistency, and absolute safety were secure in the fullest indifference to our principle, yet surely there are other considerations which ought to be deemed sufficient to induce you to encourage and aid the temperance cause.

The ministerial office is necessarily clothed with considerable influence. What you say and do on all questions will tell on large circles of mankind, and on those especially who have much power for good or evil. As is the minister, so generally will be the officers and members of the church. If he ridicules the temperance principle, or treats it even with neglect, it will not be marvellous if his people should do the same. Surely, they never dream of being better or more self-denying than their teachers. To them they look up as their models under Christ. To them they listen for the voice of warning, admonition, or reproof. Happily, in our day, priestly domination does not fetter the human mind, as it did once; but yet, how certain and powerful is the influence of the minister over the people of his charge! Then, brethren, how great the responsibility! And how much you must do for or against us, by the stand you take and the course you adopt! If you partake, even very moderately, of intoxicating drinks, you give respectability, sanction, and religious patronage to their use. You aver by such a practice, that you do not believe it to be dangerous, much less in any sense wrong, to act in this manner. You attract towards you all persons of kindred feelings and customs, and with you they deem themselves absolutely safe; and perhaps wanting the resolution and vigilance you possess, they may, by your unintentional approbation, be led on until they pass from the indefinite and indefinable point of moderation, to the ruinous declivity of excess and degradation. Where, brethren, is the true standard of moderation for the good and the pious? Have any definite rules ever been laid down?—any distinct limits ever been prescribed? Is it not always left to the judgment of the individual, or to his feelings, or appetite? The results are too well known to need remark. Brethren, it is for you to declare the danger of using these drinks to all. It is for you to raise the voice of warning, and to give energy to the proclamation of divine truth, that "wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging," and that "whoso is deceived thereby is not wise." And the surest way to avoid this mocking deception, is neither to touch, taste, nor handle the treacherous beverage. It is for you to urge, that, in the social circle, none who love the souls of their fellows, should place intoxicating liquors before them, and thus be the means, even unintentionally, of tempting them to evil.—Rev. Jabez Burns, D.D.

AN ADDRESS TO SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Why is it, dear friends, that in some localities crowds of children of both sexes, never enter your schools, but roam at large in rags and immorality? Is it not, in most instances, through the drinking habits of parents, which deprive them of means to clothe their offspring, of natural affection to care for them, and of grace to restrain them? Why are some of your youthful charge so frequently absent from their class? Is it not generally because their fathers—not to say their mothers—are addicted to drink, and have neglected them; have spent the money which would have made them decent; or possibly have pawned or sold their Sunday dress to obtain the fiery liquid? Why do others leave you, just at the time when you might hope to make impressions which would issue in their permanent welfare? Is it not frequently because the tempting forms of folly presented by the drinking habits of those who surround them, have proved too fascinating for their resistance? Is it not a painful fact which many of you have anxiously considered, and seriously discussed, and even wept over, before the Lord, that of the millions of young people who pass through these noble institutions, comparatively few join themselves to the church of God? Multitudes throng the downward road, and, among the other forms of vice which they assume, they swell the drunkard's ranks, by stepping into the place of those who have rushed, uncalled, into the presence of God, through strong drink? Alas! many of these will soon fall into similar disgrace, crime, misery, and an early grave! Is not the free use of drink, on the part of parents, relatives, fellow-workmen, yea, even young people also, the great stimulus to youthful depravity, and the main hindrance with which many of you have to contend?—the blight which passes through your fair garden, and destroys the blooming promise of much fruit, which you had hoped to gather? Your frequent sorrow of heart speaks your conviction, and answers our painful inquiries.—Rev. Richard Tabraham.

AN ADDRESS TO THE MANUFACTURERS AND VENDORS OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

There are no individuals in the country so fully qualified as yourselves to narrate the thousands of ills that arise from the use of those beverages which you dispense. You, above all persons on the earth, were you only to tell what has come under your notice, would exhibit facts which would stir the heads of the nation. You have seen hundreds brought to beggary by coming to your tavern or tap-room. How often is it the case that the tradesman wastes his time, his money, and his business, by sitting at your fire-side, and drinking your liquors! He was once a successful and a hopeful man. He was industrious, his trade or profession prospered, his family smiled, and his home was a paradise; but, alas! the cup which you mix and vend, has blasted all his prospects. He is now an idle sot, his customers are deserting him, his affairs are on the verge of bankruptcy, his wife is a widow with a living husband, his children are worse than fatherless, though their father is not dead, and his home is the abode of wretchedness. Often he goes from your fascinating hearth to his own miserable dwelling. There, maddened with the drink you have sold him, he maltreats one of the best and most amiable of wives, and inflicts unmerited vengeance on those lovely children whom God gave him to be the hope and joy of his life, the solace of his last hours, and his crown of rejoicing in a brighter state of existence. You have frequently known the hopeful son, the heir of all that heart could wish, seduced by strong drink into profligacy and debauchery of every kind, and at last die a mass of disease, a pauper, and a vagabond. The numbers that have perished prematurely through the use of intoxicating liquors, would fill volumes with "lamentations and weeping and woe." On the altar of Bacchus, at whose shrine you minister, you have seen everything dear to earth or heaven sacrificed. Property, intellect, character, domestic bliss, hope in this world and that to come, have all been immolated to the god of wine, while the song, the harp, the viol, the tabret and fife, have been summoned to celebrate these orgies, and give the show of mirth to the most desolating woe. What cruel and brutalizing passions your cup has evoked! What oaths, cursing, and blasphemy you have heard! What vulgarity and obscenity have resounded through your roof! How your poor children and servants have been polluted! Bad as the world is, it could not, it would not, read what you have doomed yourselves to witness. Did you keep a journal of all that comes under your notice, you could not find a publisher who would dare to print and sell your diary. Granted that, in the conventional sense of the term, your house is well-regulated, yet you know that strong drink renders the tongue licentious, and you hear and see what must deeply pain your heart. We are all sent into this world to do good, and to leave our age better than we found it; and woe to the man or woman that dies without having answered the glorious end for which he was made! We are individually responsible to heaven for our thoughts, words, and actions. "Every one of us must give an account of himself to God;" and as no one "can live to himself," the influence of our example and conduct upon others, will form no small portion of our responsibility at the bar of the Eternal. With all these facts before you, what think you will be the judgment of the King of kings, respecting brew-houses, distilleries, gin-palaces, taverns and ale-houses? Have they blessed or cursed the world? Have they raised a soul to heaven? Have they not sunk millions in perdition? Your answer to these queries must be one that will make you tremble at the thought of being ranked with the manufacturers or vendors of strong drink at the day of doom.

It is well for you to reflect that your traffic upon the whole is not the most profitable one. Some may have made fortunes, but in the majority of cases the money has not spent well. It is "the blessing of the Lord maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow to it."—"The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposal thereof is of the Lord."—"A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." You have often seen these sacred texts verified. There can be no real and permanent prosperity without the approbation of heaven, and I need not ask you, whether you think that the smile of our Universal Father can rest on wealth which has been obtained, not merely at the peril, but at the eternal cost of millions of his children? You have everywhere before you the history of your brethren and their families. Hundreds, from being manufacturers and vendors, have become drunkards, and have died a premature death. Many have launched into extravagance and luxury, which has brought them to pauperism. Yours is the temple in which the gay, the thoughtless, the gambler, the prodigal, the dissipated and debauched assemble, and therefore you have opened a school which threatens your family with ruin. Not a few of your brethren have seen this, and have trembled for their children to come home. The parental hearth should be a sanctuary, in which intelligence, virtue, and indeed every virtue which can adorn humanity, ought to be inspired and cherished; but, alas! your roof, instead of being the temple of truth and religion, is perhaps the asylum of almost every vice; and we need not tell you the result. How often the children of publicans have been polluted and ruined! What think you will be their judgment in another world, respecting the home which you have provided for them? If contaminated with the foul or obscene jest; if rendered profane and presumptuous by the language of the bold blasphemer; if they become spendthrifts through witnessing so much profligacy; if they have grown fond of a cup which you manufactured and sold to the peril of millions; and if at last they ended their days in poverty and impenitence, will they not look, perhaps through an endless eternity, to their father's house as the source of all their misery? These thoughts are worthy of your most serious consideration, and it is because we take a deep interest in your well-being here and hereafter, that we present them to your notice. Were we your enemies, we should be silent. But our earnest desire is, that you do yourselves no harm, that you may do your families and your country no harm, and therefore we earnestly entreat you to abandon a traffic which wears so threatening an aspect to yourselves, your children, and the world. Your self-love, your affection for your offspring, and all the sacred duties of patriotism and religion, call upon you to bear this word of exhortation.—Rev. Benjamin Parsons.

AN ESSAY ON THE CONNEXION OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE WITH CHRISTIANITY.

The elucidation of a theme depends much upon a clear statement of the topic proposed for discussion. Such an object may be often best obtained by a brief consideration at the onset, of the elementary parts of which the proposition is composed. It may be advantageous, therefore, briefly to explain what is meant by christianity, and what by total abstinence. We may then endeavour to resolve the question as to the connexion of the one with the progress of the other.

Christianity is that perfect system of religion, which was introduced into the world by Jesus Christ. He was its sole author. All that went before him were his harbingers; all that come after him declare his glory. * * * If this be christianity, it must be exceedingly desirable to spread it abroad, among all nations. Its universal reception would end moral misery, sanctify what afflictions might remain, and make all men happy. Then "Man would know nothing in man, but a friend and a brother." God designs this just and benevolent religion to be universal. Christ must reign. The church throughout all ages prays "Thy kingdom come." Hitherto the world has opposed and rejected christianity. But it greatly needs it. The woes of the world bespeak its wants. "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now."—Rom. viii. 22. What a fearful responsibility then do they incur, who are deaf to this unceasing groan of a world in labour, and who hinder the progress of the christianity destined to assuage its woes! Does this responsibility really rest on the members of temperance societies?

What is their object? It is to teach and persuade all men every where neither to buy nor sell, neither to give nor take, any kind of intoxicating drink whatever. From it they totally abstain. Their motto is, "Touch not, taste not, handle not."—Col. ii. 21. Were it in their power to do so, they would annihilate it at once and for ever. They abhor it as a deadly evil. Against it they have sworn eternal war; a truce with this enemy is quite out of the question. They look upon inebriating drink as a thing of its own kind, a product not of God's bounty, but of man's mischievous inventions, "One of the many inventions he sought out," after he ceased to be "upright."—Eccles. vii. 29. So that they regard the toleration of the existence of strong drink, as one of the direst proofs of man's sad and awful fall from his original greatness and glory. Of such as delight therein, they are ready to say, "O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united."—Gen. xlix. 6. Total abstinence then has nothing complex and bewildering in it. It is a simple cause, and aims at a single object. It is not an attempt to Judaize christianity, by laying down a law of meats, and drinks, and carnal ordinances; but it embraces a combined effort to induce mankind to forsake one kind of drink, and one kind only, namely, that which is alcoholic, spirituous, or intoxicating. In working out this great principle of total abstinence, however, reason requires that men should also refuse opium, and tobacco, and every thing else of a radically poisonous and intoxicating nature.

Now if this be all that is meant by total abstinence, must not every candid mind be at once relieved from any impressions that it is a scheme unfriendly to christianity, and inimical to its progress? Can such persons avoid the conviction that it would have been much better for christianity, if strong drink had never been known amongst men? Is not that a truth about which no one can doubt? And does not that involve another truth, namely, that a society whose efforts are directed against this foe of christianity, must be favourable to the progress of the christian religion, and be its natural ally, and aid its conquests in the earth? What mystification of prejudice can possibly prevent any man from seeing conclusions so plain and obvious? But let us examine the question by those rules of equity and benevolence which are the glory of christianity. The subject, however, must not be treated in an abstract manner, as though total abstinence, rather than strong drink, was placed on its trial; but the two shall be examined together, and the one put in contrast with the other, as to the result, so far as they come under human observation, that we may know whether on abstinence or strong drink, the shadow of the Cross will fall. By such a method, we may hope to arouse christianity to a sense of duty. For in the present day, two opposite modes of proceeding force themselves upon public attention,—abstinence from inebriating drink, and a refusal to abstain. The question is no longer one of degree, but of principle. Neutrality is impossible. To attempt it is cowardice, and unworthy a christian. The day is past in which he can be allowed to say, "I wish well to the cause, though I am not an adherent to it." That betrays the weakness of a feeble mind, and not the manly courage and simplicity of a christian. If the cause be a bad one, why should he wish it success? If it be a good one, why should he be content with empty wishes, instead of heartily supporting it by his example, his influence, his efforts, and his prayers? The matter then is to be urged on the attention of men, till they are compelled to a decision, as to whether they will be for strong drink and against abstinence, or for abstinence and against strong drink. The line of distinction and demarcation is strong and clear. We cannot stand on both sides of it. Neither should we hop about first on this side, then on that. Vacillation is contemptible. Let every man that has in him the soul of a man, make his choice, and stand to it. Let every christian who has hesitated, now well observe which of these two warring principles best accord with the progress of christianity; and as he values his christianity, and the salvation of the world, let that consideration bring him at once to a decision, from which he shall henceforward be immovable all his days.—Rev. William J. Shrewsbury.

Doings of Strong Drink.

A DISTRESSING HISTORY.—R. B. was a man of ancient and noble family, but being from a younger branch of it, had very little property. His mother was left a widow at an early age, and made considerable sacrifices to obtain for him a good education; and he profited so much by the pains bestowed on him, that he was enabled to get his own living as a teacher, at the age of sixteen. His talents were of a general character, and he possessed so much perseverance and application, that at the age of twenty-two he was master of five languages, besides his own, and was also an excellent mathematician. He possessed a handsome person, with a most gentlemanly deportment; and nothing in his disposition, habits or appearance, would have led any one to anticipate that the handsome, erudite, and gentlemanly man, formed to charm and adorn any society, would one day become an object of scorn and derision to the vulgar and profane. He married at an early age; and his wife seemed well calculated to make him happy, and to add to the attraction which his society offered. He had a family, such as any father might be proud to own, handsome in person, and inheriting their father's talents. He was appointed to a good situation in a public school in one of the colonies; and the advantages he conferred on the establishment were speedily perceived, and he was welcomed into the highest families, and employed every spare hour very profitably; for no master in the place was so highly esteemed. He was now in the way of making a rapid fortune, with great honour, when, alas! he began to indulge a love for strong drink, which soon caused him to lose one place after another, and caused his friends to grow shy of him. The effect of drink on him was terrible. He became a perfect fury while under its influence, and his estimable wife and interesting family were often obliged to flee from his drunken rage, and hide from him, (who ought to have been their protector) as from a savage foe. Still his high talents procured him profitable employment; and so much was he esteemed as a professor, that much irregularity was overlooked, for the sake of a few lessons when he was perfectly sober.

His conduct towards his wife and family became at length so outrageous, that they were obliged to leave him, to save their lives, often endangered during his drunken fits; and he was then taken care of by a faithful servant, whose devotion was often repaid with blows and curses. Strange to say, the greater excesses seemed to have no effect on his intellect, and although pointed out as a common drunkard, he often found persons glad to employ him in his sober moments, and pay him well for his instructions. When not disguised by drink, he was still a perfect gentleman in his manners; and several friends endeavoured to reform him by taking him to reside with them, and watching over him to prevent his getting liquor. But this was all in vain; he became more and more enslaved to this pernicious indulgence. One night, when going home intoxicated, his foot got caught in a grating, and he broke his leg in such a way as to render amputation necessary, and it was accordingly performed. This warning was useless to him, and he no sooner got about again, than he rushed into the grossest drunkenness, with an avidity sharpened by temporary privation. He at last drove away the faithful servant, who had borne with insult and ill-treatment for a long time, and became the companion of the lowest of the low, frequenting the most filthy grog-shops, and begging a drop of liquor from any one who would give it, and abusing in the vilest manner those who refused him.

It was at this period that I became acquainted with him, and I determined to make another effort to save him from the abyss to which he was so rapidly hastening. I therefore sought divine direction in what I was about to undertake, and watching for an opportunity of speaking to him when in a reasonable state, I told him, in a polite way, (for I had never spoken to him before) how grieved I was to see him in a situation so totally unbecoming one of his birth and education. I then offered him a home, and every thing necessary for him, on condition of his conforming to the rules of my family, and becoming a total abstainer from every thing of an intoxicating nature. He thanked me for the sympathy I expressed, and requested a few hours to reflect on my proposal. He came to me shortly after, and said he would place himself under my control, and would do any thing in his power to make himself useful. At this time, he possessed nothing whatever, save what he had on, which was of the commonest description, and very dirty.

I took him accordingly, and my wife was so disgusted at the idea of having so confirmed a drunkard in the house, that she was quite poorly the day he came. The next day, he met with her in the yard, and his gentlemanly address so won her, that she consented to his coming to our table; and from that time treated him with consideration. He became much attached to us, and was so sincere in his desire to avoid temptation, that he would not leave my yard, lest he should fall into his old vices. He became daily more attached to us, and we to him; and I entertained hopes of seeing him once more restored to his family. He went on thus for two months, and often expressed the warmest gratitude for the comforts he enjoyed, and said, that had he before fallen into a family where he saw nothing to tempt him, he might have known many happy years. He was then attacked with dysentery, under which he sank, but during the three weeks that he was confined to the room, his time was spent in reading the Bible and other good books; and his expressions were those of a sincere and humble penitent, who depends on the infinite mercy of God in Christ Jesus, and so he died. Far as he had wandered from the right way, I feel persuaded we may safely declare there was "hope in his death." He had, as far as he could, brought forth "fruits meet for repentance;" and we may trust that he found mercy, though at the eleventh hour.—ALPHA.

DRUNKENNESS IN SYDNEY.—Amongst a population so constituted as that of Sydney, which for more than half a century was the head-quarters of the penal settlements of Great Britain, there must be a large proportion of sin and vice; this is unquestionably the case, and drunkenness prevails to an extent perfectly appalling, men and women alike indulging in boundless potations of strong fiery rum. Where wages are generally high, and the necessaries of life most moderate in price, the means of intoxication is within the reach of all, and the number of licensed places of resort for the sale of spirits is perfectly astonishing, and the rents paid for them quite as much so. It is a thing of every day occurrence, for a labouring man or mechanic to arrive from the country with the savings of twelve or eighteen months, amounting to some £40 or £50, and proceeding to a public-house, place the amount in the landlord's hands, requesting him to notify them of the fact as soon as it should be all spent. The donor then enters on his spree, treating all around, and indulging himself so deeply as to remain in a partial state of intoxication whilst one shilling of the money remains; as soon as that disappears, the nervous and enervated drunkard, perhaps labouring under the effects of delirium tremens, once more seeks the interior to procure the means for another similar debauch at no distant date.—Emigrants' Guide to New South Wales, by J. C. Byrne, Esq., 1848.

A HEARTLESS RUMSELLER.—A fact, showing the debasing effects of the rum-traffic upon the mind of the rumseller, was stated at a recent meeting of tract-visitors in one of the up-town wards of this city, by the missionary of the ward, who is a zealous friend of the temperance cause. One of the customers of a rumseller in the ward recently dying, left his wife and six children in a state of destitution, and in want of the most common necessaries of life, without even the means to give him a decent burial. Some benevolent individuals discovering the suffering condition of the family, exerted themselves to raise means for their relief. They called upon this rumseller who had furnished him the deadly poison, to contribute a SIXPENCE towards his funeral expenses. But how did this dealer in human woe and death receive them? With a scornful air, and as if in perfect contempt of the poor drunkard in whose ruin he had been instrumental, he replied, "Before I would give a sixpence for him, I would give five dollars to have the brute drowned!" He who had helped to make him a "brute," had beggared his family, and supplied him with the means of his destruction, refused to render the smallest aid to his burial.—Journal American Temperance Union.

WHO WAS TO BLAME.—During my stay in Chelmsford, I attended the Quarter Sessions then being held in the town, and witnessed two persons placed at the bar, the one a male, and the other a female, and both cases (the one immediately and the other remotely) connected with strong drink. The female, who was twenty-six years of age, pleaded guilty to the charge of stealing two bottles of wine, the property of her master. Although this was the first offence, (and she had previously borne a good character,) she was condemned to three months' hard labour in Colchester Jail. If there be no legal question as to the course adopted by the chairman of the Sessions, perhaps one in morals may arise. Had the drinking-usages of the prosecutor's establishment anything to do in prompting the unfortunate woman to the commission of the robbery? If the regulation of the house in which she had been a domestic had fostered the appetite for intoxicating drinks, then the guilt of the prisoner, if not justifiable, ought to have been extenuated, on the plea that the prosecutor himself was "an accessory before the fact." Ought the victimized to be punished, and the tempter go free?—Editor's Recollections of a visit to Essex, 1845.

On the 25th ultimo, the body of a man named William Holtham, a plasterer, of Brothers Place, Gloucester, was found in the Gloucester and Berkeley Canal. The coat and hat of deceased were found on the bank of the canal, near where the body was found. It appeared from the wife's statement, that the unhappy man had been entirely neglecting his work for the last month, had been drinking daily and deeply, and latterly had become singular in his habits. He was last seen alive near the Cross, on Saturday the 22nd inst. The coat, when found, had the appearance of being lain on by some one, so that deceased might have rolled into the water while asleep. An inquest on the body was adjourned.—Bristol Mercury, August 5th.

YEOVIL.—SUDDEN DEATH.—On Monday evening, a man named King, of this town, was at the Castle Inn, when a fight took place between two other parties, one of whom he seconded. He appeared to be much excited thereby, and shortly afterwards, he suddenly fell down and expired. Verdict, "Died by the visitation of God."—Ibid.

A horrible instance of suicide occurred at the Burra Burra Mine, one evening last week. The name of the party we could not discover, but he was a miner of some property who was doing well, but a very hard drinker. On the night in question, he left his own hut in a state of delirium tremens, and sought shelter in the police station, from some of Tam O'Shanter's persecutors, who had been gliding down the chimney. The police gave him quarters, and watched him for some time, till they thought all was right, and dozed off to sleep. The miserable man watched his opportunity; got hold of a razor, and cut his throat half through. The room presented, in the morning, a dreadful spectacle, the wretched drunkard, now of course a corpse, literally enveloped in a clotted mass of gore. The body was shortly afterwards buried.—Adelaide Observer.

POTATO FAILURE.

We are truly concerned to find by information from almost all parts of England and Ireland, that there is every reason to apprehend another failure of the potato crop, such a fearful calamity cannot fail to affect every friend of humanity, and ought to lead all to serious consideration, how far the suffering which such a failure must inevitably produce can be mitigated. The result of our most serious consideration is, that not only the calamity itself may be greatly alleviated, but that it may be made the means, under the blessing of Divine Providence, of great good to the whole community. It is well known, that not less than 60,000,000 bushels of corn are annually converted into intoxicating drinks, instead of being consumed as wholesome and nutritious food, and that every form of misery, disease and crime is greatly accelerated by this perversion of the bounties of the Almighty. To those who doubt the accuracy of this statement, and who believe that these drinks are necessary for the welfare of the community, we request a candid perusal of the following important Medical Testimony, signed by upwards of 1400 of the first medical men of the age, including the names of

 1. That a very large portion of human misery, including poverty, disease, and crime, is induced by the use of alcoholic or fermented liquors as beverages.
 2. That the most perfect health is compatible with total abstinence from all such intoxicating beverages, whether in the form of ardent spirits, or as wine, beer, ale, porter, cider, &c.
 3. That persons accustomed to such drinks may, with perfect safety, discontinue them entirely, either at once or gradually after a short time.
 4. That total and universal abstinence from alcoholic liquors and intoxicating beverages of all sorts would greatly contribute to the health, the prosperity, the morality, and the happiness of the human race.

We cannot but think, that under existing circumstances, it is a fearful thing that brewers and distillers should continue to consume the grain which is so well calculated to sustain and support the human frame, much better than that root, the failure of which has caused so much alarm. We, therefore, urge upon our friends the necessity of giving the utmost publicity to this important subject.

Extract from the Dublin Correspondent of the Times of August 19th, as to the Potato Crop.

"The reports from the country continue unfavourable, and the apprehension of deficient grain-crops, and of the total failure of the potato, are becoming every day more serious and well-founded."

Extract from the Times, August 21st, 1848.

"The failure, I regret to say, appears to be as complete as that of 1846. There are now lying before me reports from Tipperary, Carlow, Cork, Sligo, Limerick, Derry, Antrim, Down, Louth, Armagh and Monaghan, and unhappily they all concur in representing the Pestilence as universal."

CHOLERA.

Extract from the Times, August 21st, 1848.

"The cholera was very mild at Constantinople, it was declining rapidly in Russia, and the Russian physicians had declared that its ravages had been principally owing to the inordinate use of spirituous liquors by the people."

Progress of Temperance.

ENON CHAPEL.

An interesting meeting was held in Enon Chapel, (the Rev. Dr. Burns') on Wednesday evening, the 16th August. A temperance hymn having been sung, and prayer offered by Mr. W. Claridge for the Divine blessing, the chair was taken by Mr. Thomas Hudson, the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, who opened the proceedings by a few very suitable remarks on the intimate bearing of the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drink, on the distress of the country, shewing that its adoption would prove the most powerful instrument in removing that distress. He then called on Mr. Jabez Inwards, who commenced by drawing a comparison between man and the beasts of the field, shewing the superiority in favour of the latter, through the use of intoxicating liquors by the former. Asking the question, does intoxicating drink conduce to make men more intellectual, more wise, or more holy?—proving the reverse to be the case—then establishing the fact, that teetotalism was suitable for all constitutions, and had been the instrument, in thousands of instances, of producing social and domestic comfort, which had never been derived from the use of intoxicating drinks. He then alluded, at some length, to the teetotal pledge as a means of safety, proving to the satisfaction of the audience that the bondage lay on the other side; and concluded by combating the objection of putting teetotalism in the place of religion, demonstrating its absurdity, maintaining that nothing else but the preaching and teaching of the (whole) gospel was needed to reclaim the drunkard and prevent the moderate from becoming such, as the carrying out of the precepts of the gospel would necessarily involve total abstinence. After a few closing remarks by the chairman, and the singing of the doxology, the audience separated. Eleven signatures to the pledge were obtained.

GREENWICH.

On Monday evening, August 7th, a social tea-meeting of the members of the Borough of Greenwich Temperance Society, was held in the Literary Institute. Benjamin Rotch, Esq., L.L.B., Barrister at Law, presided, and addressed the meeting in an appropriate and humorous speech, applying in a very happy manner, the story of the New Zealand pig. Mr. Rotch, in affecting terms, spoke of his experience as a visiting justice to Cold Bath Field Prisons, he had proved, and that repeatedly, that eleven-twelfths of the prisoners were incarcerated in the jails of the country through strong drink, and concluded by reference to the influence of woman as associated with drinking-usages.

MR. ISAAC ENGLISH had been a teetotaler for twelve years, and had done what he could (he could not well do more) to promote the cause in the Borough. This he had done, because both physically and mentally he had experienced great benefit from the adoption of temperance principles.

MR. HARDING was frequently interrogated as to whether he still adhered to the pledge, he was happy to say that having put his hand to the work, he was not inclined to look back, God being his helper, he hoped to continue firm to a pledge which had proved a safe-guard to hundreds of his fellow-creatures.

MR. SELBY delivered his maiden speech, in the course of which, it was made to appear that he had become a teetotaler by challenging a poor inebriate to sign the pledge, which was readily accepted.

The Rev. O. SQUIRE was accustomed to look upon temperance as the great moral lever to raise the people of this country from their present degraded condition. He had formerly stood opposed to the movement, believing it to be utopian, but on more sober reflection, he came to the conclusion, that he had been grossly deceived, though a great advocate for political freedom, he would pause before he gave any great extension of the suffrage to a drunken people. He would recommend to the advocates a conciliatory course, and called upon them to meet all in the spirit of kindness and forbearance.

MR. THOMAS HUDSON followed, and was succeeded by Mr. Henry Cole, who made some very suitable and practical remarks.

A vote of thanks was tendered to the chairman, and also to the ladies for the excellent tea and dessert provided for the evening's entertainment.

STOKE NEWINGTON TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.)

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Jabez Inwards delivered a lecture last evening in the Lancasterian School, Stoke Newington, to a respectable meeting, the Rev. H. Robinson, pastor of Pembury Grove Chapel, Hackney, presided, and gave a powerful and interesting opening address, after which Mr. Inwards took for his subject "Teetotalism the Temperance of the Old and New Testaments," upon which he lectured with great force and eloquence for nearly two hours, to a very attentive audience. After a few remarks by the chairman the meeting separated, evidently well pleased, and I trust deeply impressed.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

J. COLDWELLS, Hon. Sec.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.

The fourteenth annual Conference of the British Association, held its sittings in the Music Hall, Leeds, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of July, 1848. The number of delegates assembled was about equal to that in former years; and the societies represented, included some of the most important in the north, as well as other parts of England.

SELBY.

On Wednesday last, the twelfth anniversary of the Selby Temperance Society was held in the Public Hall. The room was most tastefully decorated with flowers and evergreens. Banners were exhibited in different parts of the room, bearing, among others, the following inscriptions: "Wine is a mocker."—"Train up a child in the way he should go."—"Because of drunkenness the land mourneth."

At five o'clock in the afternoon, 300 individuals sat down to a most excellent tea. A more splendid set-out of cheese-cakes, tarts, sponge-cakes, ham and confectionery, we have never witnessed. We despise flattery; but still we feel bound to say that the tea-parties of Selby are quite equal to those of any town in the kingdom. The temperance cause here is well supported. Some of our most influential men are on our side, and not merely teetotalers in profession, but active and zealous members and supporters of the society. After having bountifully partook of the blessings of Providence, we were prepared, with sober heads and warm hearts, to listen to the soul-melting truths of teetotalism. Our old and much esteemed friend, Mr. Morrell, occupied the chair. The chairman opened the meeting in a most interesting and affecting speech, detailing some of the reasons why men stood aloof from the temperance cause, and concluded by exhorting all who were not pledged teetotalers not to leave the meeting until they had determined, at once and for ever, to abandon the intoxicating cup.

MR. HOOPER, the secretary, then read the report. The Rev. Dr. BURNS, of London, was then called upon to address the meeting. He expressed great pleasure in visiting Selby. He had been a teetotaler thirteen years. From 1829 to 1835 he was a moderation man. He went to London in 1835, and attended a teetotal meeting, and signed the pledge. He was induced to sign it as a man, a father, and a Christian. Whilst in America, he visited the lunatic asylum, and there found a D.D. a lunatic, through strong drink. When he was in the habit of taking intoxicating drinks, he always felt what preachers term Mondayish, after the labours of the Sabbath; but since he had been an abstainer, he was quite as able to work on the Monday as any other day in the week. All his family have signed the pledge, and he never keeps intoxicating drink in his house. A short time ago, a lady visiting at his house, who thought she could not live without beer, wished to have some for dinner. The doctor told her that there were several insuperable obstacles to her drinking beer in his house. In the first place, he said, "You cannot expect your minister to fetch beer on the Lord's day, nor can you expect his wife or his children to do it; and then, as to the servant, she is a long-pledged teetotaler, and therefore if you want beer, you must go to the public-house and drink it there." The lady stayed at his house several days, but had no beer, and before she left, she thought that there was a possibility of living without it. The doctor then produced the medical certificate, signed by 1400 of the profession, printed in small type. He stated that it was fourteen feet eight inches and a quarter in length, and that several hundreds more had signed since that was printed. He thought ministers of religion ought to attend our meetings, and that their non-attendance should not be overlooked, unless they sent a note explaining the cause of their absence. The doctor resumed his seat amid great applause.

The chairman here remarked that we had three Jabez—Jabez Waterhouse, Jabez Inwards, and Jabez Burns—and if he were in the habit of giving toasts, which he always thought senseless things, he would give the three Jabezs.

Mr. THOMAS WHITTAKER, our old friend, was then introduced to the meeting. He referred to the causes which induced men who have signed to relapse into their former habits. He said that the man who signs the pledge in spite to the publican, frequently breaks in spite to some teetotaler who has happened to offend him. Men have two constitutions, physical and mental, and therefore when they tell us teetotalism will not suit their constitution, they must mean their mental, not their physical constitution. The man who signs merely to please some gentleman from whom he expects a favour, will break to please another. A man sees a teetotal procession—he falls into it—goes to the tea, and drinks as many cups as the lady will supply—becomes happy and cheerful, and thus says, "If this be teetotalism, then I'll be a teetotaler!"—He signs the pledge. Soon there is another procession—a procession of Odd Fellows, with odd hats, odd shoes, &c. They are going to the sign of the Sun, Moon, and Seven Stars, where there is a quantity of drink to be given away. He goes with them—drinks because others drink—and then says teetotalism did not suit his constitution. A draper goes to a teetotal meeting—signs the pledge. The next day, he sees the publican's daughter come out of the draper's shop over the way, followed by the porter with a large parcel of goods, and then he begins to feel poorly, and says, "Teetotalism will not suit my constitution." A minister of religion, a few days after signing the pledge, calls upon two maiden ladies. They persuade him that he is poorly, and that teetotalism will injure his health, and if he has no regard for himself, he ought at any rate to respect his wife and children, and the church over which God, in his providence, has made him minister. He goes home and tells his wife, she joins in the same cry, and insists upon the family-doctor being consulted. The doctor recommends him to take a little wine, and then he sits down and writes a polite note to the secretary of the temperance society, saying that his medical adviser is of opinion that teetotalism will not suit his constitution. What would you think of a man going to the clergyman, and requesting him to take his name off the marriage-book? One man will not be a teetotaler, because he cannot find a passage in scripture, which says "Thou shalt not drink intoxicating drink." What would you think of a man who would not lend his ladder to rescue a family from a burning house, because he could not find anything about it in the Bible."—(Great applause.)

The thanks of the meeting were presented to the ladies for their unwearied exertions. The doxology was then sung, and the meeting separated under feelings of the most interesting description.

A. B. HOOPER, Secretary.

HADLEIGH, SUFFOLK.

On Monday the 17th instant, Mr. Alfred Heritage visited us, and gave a very interesting lecture in the Reading Room of our Society, to a respectable audience, which was listened to with the most marked attention and the deepest interest. The following night, he delivered a second lecture, subject, "The Drinking Habits of this country, the great hindrance to the Progress of the Gospel;" addressed principally to the religious public. The meeting was tolerably well attended, and the statements well received.

FORDINGBRIDGE.

Our first teetotal festival was held here on Thursday, August 3rd; the weather which in the morning assumed a threatening aspect, cleared about two o'clock, and the afternoon and evening proved beautifully fine. It had been intended to hold the tea meeting in the gardens of Mr. Samuel Thompson, who had kindly lent them for the occasion; but the quantity of rain which had fallen for two or three days previously, rendered this quite impracticable. It was, however, considered sufficiently dry for the children to have their tea in the gardens, which were accordingly decked out with banners, flags, &c., and in every way that could tend to enliven the scene. About half-past four, the children, members of the society, about 100, formed in procession, and walked from the Town-hall to the gardens, about a quarter of a mile, preceded by an excellent brass band. Several of them carried banners, flags, &c., with various mottoes written on them. One, however, particularly attracted our attention. It was worked with blue silk on a white ground, and the inscription was, "The Fording-bridge Band of Hope." One could not help wishing that those who bore it might catch the beauty of the idea and prove themselves to be a band of hope, and a light as it were set on a beacon, round which, in after years, others might rally, and that thus that hope might be realized, and the world improved. Every thing being prepared for their reception, they entered the gardens and took their seats in order along the gravel walks; the band assembling round a table prepared for them on the lawn. The scene was in the highest degree animated, and the children appeared much to enjoy the repast which was prepared for them. While this was going forward, the company assembled occupied themselves by walking to and fro, and admiring the surrounding scenery, which for the pastoral style of view is very picturesque and beautiful. In the foreground, the River Avon rolls its waters rapidly along, while beyond are numerous meadows clothed in living green, and shaded in various directions with trees and woods; the whole bounded by a range of hills crowned with oaks and various descriptions of evergreens. As soon as the children had finished their repast, the company retired to the Town-hall, when about 200 sat down to tea, every thing being provided in the best way possible, and the room decked with various mottoes, wreaths of flowers, &c., &c.

After tea, an excellent address was delivered by Mr. Hudson, the Secretary of the National Society, the chair being occupied by the Rev. G. Harris of Ringwood. Mr. Hudson's address was listened to with much pleasure and interest, and we believe much good will be derived from it. Three or four signatures have been since obtained. The meeting separated about ten o'clock, every one being much pleased with the whole of the proceedings.

LOWESTOFT.

On Thursday evening last, the 3rd of August, a public meeting of the Lowestoft Temperance Society, was held in the Town Hall, and which for the period of the year was very fully attended. Mr. W. A. Heritage, a deputation from the National Temperance Society addressed it, and proved himself to be a powerful advocate for that great and good work, the temperance cause. His speech was very energetic as to manner, but most temperate, eloquent and convincing as to matter, and we doubt not, but that it made a powerful impression upon the hearts of his audience, who listened to him at times with breathless attention, whilst relating some awful facts produced by intoxication, brought on by the drinking-customs of society; and at others elicited much applause, when he mentioned the beneficial effects resulting from a course of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks.

DUNSTABLE.

The annual meeting of the Dunstable Temperance Society was held on Monday the 14th. An excellent tea was provided, and considering the unpropitious state of the weather, a larger number assembled than was expected. In the evening, a first-rate meeting was held, when that aged veteran, the Rev. Michael Castledon of Woburn, took the chair. Mr. Thomas Harris of St. Albans, gave a very thorough-going speech; Mr. Lowrie, from Scotland, gave an admirable address; and last, though not least, Mr. James Larnier rivetted the attention of the audience for more than an hour, with a speech replete with humour, good sense and sound argument. In conclusion, he made a most solemn appeal to moderate drinkers.

JABEZ INWARDS.

BATH.

The Juvenile Temperance Society of this city, held a rural fête at Sydney Gardens, on Monday, August 7th, when a goodly number of the friends of temperance assembled to show their attachment to the cause. At five o'clock, 250 members and friends partook of tea in the beautiful Gothic Hall. A public meeting was subsequently held and presided over by Mr. E. Saunders. The Rev. Thomas Spencer, A.M., Mr. J. Brooks of Nailsea, Mr. Saunders of Bristol, and Messrs. Davis and Chester of Bath, severally addressed the assembly.

SOUTHAMPTON.

A lecture on the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors was delivered at the Town Hall, on Wednesday evening, by Mr. T. Hudson, Secretary of the National Temperance Society. The audience, which was very respectable, listened with marked attention to the lecturer's statements. And at the close of the meeting, a vote of thanks was awarded to him, on the motion of Mr. J. Clark, Jun., for his very interesting address. —Hampshire Independent.

SUNDERLAND.

We have recently had a visit from Mr. T. Whittaker, an old tried friend of the cause, which has been of considerable advantage to the movement. His visit has been marked with a special degree of success, which with us was much needed. We had a full week of his labours, in different parts of this populous town. Several signatures were obtained. Abstainers likewise were edified, refreshed, and strengthened.

EPSOM.

Dr. Carr delivered two lectures on the "Scientific Truths of Total Abstinence," on the 26th and 28th ult. On the first lecture evening, the unfavourable state of the weather prevented our attendance being large; about seventy persons however assembled, and T. J. Graham, Esq., M.D., (author of "Domestic Medicine," &c.) kindly presided. At the conclusion of the lecture, which was listened to with the utmost attention, William Everett, Esq., publicly thanked the lecturer for his "lucid and excellent address," but stated it as his opinion, that to produce a lasting benefit to the present enslaved attendants at the inns of the town and neighbourhood, we must provide other places of resort, and other amusements and pursuits, (a point which our Committee have this evening met to consider.) The chairman having received the thanks of the meeting, the delighted auditors reluctantly separated. The propitious weather of second lecture evening, and the entire satisfaction given by Dr. C., filled the British School-room, kindly lent for the occasion, with a most respectable company of ladies and gentlemen, Dr. Graham again presiding; this lecture, if possible, was better received than the first, and at its close, a general expression of approbation ensued. The chairman rose to verify the statements of a strictly medical nature advanced, which from his standing as a christian and a physician, he was enabled to do with good effect. Mr. Keeling, a chemist, then proposed a vote of thanks to the lecturer, stating at the same time the very strong attachment a few months of total abstinence and candid consideration had given him for the cause so ably advocated. The Rev. Thomas Lee seconded the proposition, which on being put to the meeting, was carried by acclamation. So ended our lectures, but the sober scientific truths then advanced, are still the subject of much conversation, and I am happy to say, that from that time to the present, we have heard of many who have forsaken the intoxicating cup. That God will bless these efforts and all similar ones, to drive our common enemy into the ocean of disuse, is our constant prayer.

THOMAS CAVE.

HALSTEAD, ESSEX.

The Committee of the Halstead Temperance Society, invited Mr. Thomas Hudson, Secretary of the National Temperance Society, to deliver a lecture in the public room of this town on Tuesday evening, August 8th. The subject selected for the lecturer, was the "Great Moral Movement of the Age." There was a full attendance of persons representing the different grades of which society is composed. The best evidence of the lecturer's acceptability, is the fact, that a strong wish was expressed that he should revisit the town for a similar purpose.

TAMWORTH.

(To the Secretary of the National Temperance Society.)

SIR,—No doubt you will be glad to hear of the success which the cause of temperance is likely to meet with in this town, from the visit of Dr. Carr, whose services you were kind enough to grant us this week. It is extremely gratifying on our parts to state, that a complete revival has been the happy result, and we feel confident that an impetus has been communicated, which will bear down the opposing force of prejudice and ignorance.

Immediately on the arrival of Dr. Carr last Tuesday, it was determined by two or three zealous friends, that instead of one lecture there should be a series of three; and we felt assured, that the attendance on the first evening would be so great, that a mere notice after the lecture would be sufficient to secure future numbers without printing any more bills. Nor were we disappointed, for the room was completely filled in every corner, and nothing could exceed the interest which the audience exhibited on the occasion; they seemed riveted to the spot by the interesting and varied information which the lecturer brought forward. The silence during all the time, except when applause evinced their delight, was very marked; and at the conclusion, it was observed by one or two friends, that the company were most unwilling to separate.

I may briefly observe, that the second and third lectures were attended with the same decided success. The many different views in which the subject was placed by the doctor, must have carried conviction to the most determined opponent; and as the room was crowded to overflowing on each occasion, it is fair to calculate that a great amount of good has been effected. The courteous but confident manner in which Dr. Carr invited questioning and objections, was very delightful to the friends of the cause; for they found that now was their opportunity to bid respectful defiance to their adversaries. None were found bold enough to offer anything like the show of opposition, well knowing that all the argument is on our side, and that they can only shelter themselves under the wing of prejudice, custom, and love of the intoxicating cup.

A great many signatures were obtained to the pledge, and a society has been organized in, we hope, a very efficient manner, so that in future we look forward to a steady progress in this noble reformation.

Accept the best thanks of the society for the favour you have conferred upon us, and believe me, dear sir, yours much obliged,

A CORRESPONDENT.

KENSINGTON AND BAYSWATER.

The eighth annual meeting of the Kensington and Bayswater True Temperance Society, was held in the Temperance Hall, Silver-street, on Monday, August 14th. The chair was taken by Dr. Oxley. Speakers—Mr. W. Claridge, of the National Temperance Society, Mr. Buckle, Mr. Mann, Mr. Mellor, and Dr. Gourley of Birmingham. The united ages of the latter gentleman and the chairman, as teetotalers, were upwards of a century.

HAMMERSMITH.

Mr. W. Claridge, of the National Temperance Society, delivered a lecture in the New Hall, Hammersmith, on Tuesday evening, August 15th, on the entire harmony of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks with the revealed will of God, both in the Old and New Testament, much to the satisfaction of a numerous and highly respectable audience. A few very reasonable and appropriate remarks were made at the opening of the meeting, by Mr. Beal of Walworth. The friends at Hammersmith appear to be all alive, and harmoniously working together in the good cause, in a systematic manner. We augur much good will result from their diligence in this good work to the neighbourhood at large. We most heartily wish them success in the name of the Lord.

NORFOLK AND SUFFOLK.

TO THE EDITOR.

DEAR SIR,—During the past three months, I have addressed influential and numerous attended meetings in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk; and under the direction of the committee of the Norwich Temperance Society, thirty meetings were held in that city, the greater number being held in the open air. The attendance, and the interest taken in the proceedings were very gratifying. The friends of temperance in this city are earnestly labouring for the spread of the good cause, headed by many good men and true, who have remained steadfast during the earlier history of the Society, when persecution and suspicion was awarded to those who engaged in the advocacy. But we may say, truly a good time has come, for we have peace instead of riot, and confidence has taken the place of suspicion. And it is evident that those who are not with us in practice, rejoice that the peace-giving principle is spreading among the people. The friends in the city have engaged Mr. G. W. McCree as their missionary, who is labouring earnestly and efficiently by means of domiciliary visitation, and by public meetings, to convince the drunkard and the moderate drinker of the ruinous consequences connected with the use of intoxicating drinks. I took my leave of the friends at Norwich with regret, on July 29th, and proceeded to Yarmouth, and addressed two meetings in the market-place, which were well attended, and was ably assisted by Dr. G. Sexton, who delivered addresses on the physiological bearings of the temperance question. The meetings were announced from the pulpits of various chapels in the town, and an incident may be mentioned, shewing the light in which the temperance principle is regarded by some who are engaged in the traffic. The friends were in want of a platform for the speakers, and a publican was requested to lend his waggon for the purpose; to the surprise of many, the vendor of strong drink said, you have done much good in this town, and you may use my waggon for temperance meetings whenever it is vacant. So manifest is the effect of the temperance reformation in this town, in restoring to their right mind, many who for years have been regarded as lost to hope, that even those who live by the sale of that which destroys their fellow-creatures, are constrained to admit that the adoption of the temperance principle is followed by peace and prosperity; and while admiring its effects, virtually exclaim,—

Oh! widely spread the glorious plan,
Which heals a grief like this;
That raises fallen, degraded man,
And seals domestic bliss.
That bids intemperance vile depart,
And pitying, binds the broken heart.

Yours, &c.,
J. WILLIAMSON.

WHETSTONE.

MR. EDITOR.—On Tuesday the 15th, I had the pleasure of visiting Whetstone at seven o'clock, p.m., sixty railway labourers sat down to tea, they were all remarkably clean and appeared to enjoy themselves very much. Every fortnight the same number, through the liberality of a gentleman well known in the temperance cause, are supplied with a social cup of tea. At eight o'clock, a public meeting was held, when J. H. Pugett, Esq., took the chair, who, after making a few remarks, called upon the writer to address the meeting. It was indeed a good meeting, the place was crowded, and the deepest attention was paid; Mr. Pugett takes a deep interest in the railway labourers, and doubtless, there are many, who, when they leave that district, will remember his benevolence with much gratitude. For the last twelve months, fortnightly tea and public meetings have been held, when addresses and lectures have been delivered by Messrs. Whitaker, Hudson, Balfour, Claridge, Gawthorpe and others, whose efficient labours have been the means of doing much good. I was informed that our friend Goddard and a party from Westminster have held a good meeting in the same place. It is pleasing to find a gentleman of Mr. Pugett's influence so deeply interested in the moral and intellectual elevation of the labouring classes, earnestly hoping that his efforts to do good may be crowned with abundant success.

I am, Mr. Editor, yours very truly,
JABEZ INWARDS.

NORTH WALES.

(To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.)

MY DEAR SIR,—Having visited several places in Merionethshire and Denbighshire of late, as well as Rhyl, Dyserth, Meledon, Wespwy, Waenesgon, and Sarn, in this county, I find the noble cause of temperance gradually, but powerfully, progressing, and rising in the estimation of the public, especially among the better informed, and the most religious.

All will allow now that it is not good for the young to begin to use intoxicating drinks as a common beverage, and that it is not essential for the support of the labouring man—and they generally allow, that it is the duty of all ministers of the gospel to be abstainers.

Now, I beg leave respectfully to make a few observations, which are my own reflections, in connexion with my travelling, lecturing, and preaching in North Wales.

1st, That no reasonable man can seriously deny the great waste and misapplication of money, the dreadful losses, and many injuries done among the working-classes by intemperance, in former times, which still continues in a very great degree. We often see the poorest of the poor, the most destitute and wretched, in these hard times, and even in this very poor country, getting money for poisonous liquor, when in every other respect they actually seem to be starving for want of bread, and have nothing fit to put on to appear in public on the Lord's day! Surely, all must confess that something should be done to prevent such a dreadful state of things among our numerous poor class—why should not this branch of national education and great reform have the first place in the consideration of our legislators? I would say, all moral and physical force should be made use of. Visiting Chester jail, a few days ago, the governor told me, that upon examination he had found that almost all the prisoners have been degraded and ruined by drinking, either directly or indirectly.

2nd, That it is evident to every unprejudiced mind, that nothing will do but total abstinence to save and cure this country. If spirituous liquors are the chief ruin of other countries, doubtless malt liquors are the chief enemies and causes of the miseries of Wales—nothing but total abstinence can work effectually for the principality. And it is strange to say, that those who have not joined us, and even opposed us for fourteen years, do not now say a word respecting intemperance—not a word shall we hear from their lips, once in the year, in conversation, preaching, or prayer—they are quite speechless about the matter, as if their conscience tells them that they are not fit persons to speak against drunkenness, after opposing the best means to prevent it.

3rd, Total Abstinence being the only safe remedy for drunkenness, it can hardly be expected that poor, ignorant, and working-men, should give up entirely the habit of drinking, without seeing the better informed giving them good example, and especially as the foolish idea is so deeply-rooted, that hard labouring men should have strong drink; and besides, it is not reasonable to expect that the uneducated working class should be reformers, and to be at the head of such a great movement as the temperance cause. All salutary reforms and great movements must be brought about by great and good men; at least by men of cultivated minds and persevering spirits; others have neither the influence nor the firmness necessary for the great work.

4th, As we can not expect poor people to be the instruments of reforming the world, in this most important subject of temperance, have we not some claim upon the well-informed portion of our fellow-creatures, and especially upon the religious world, ministers and deacons, and upon all the churches in general? Should it not be a matter of conscience, by all true christians, to leave off the habit of drinking at once and forever; and "take heed lest by any means this liberty of theirs, become a stumbling-block to them that are weak."—"Shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?" What does Christianity teach, if it does not teach self-denial, and that the strong should help the weak, by all means, by example, as well as by precept. Should the ministers and the churches fail to deny themselves, and in every respect to help the weak, poor, and the uncultivated working-class, who will do it? In vain are we to expect the high, proud, and wicked world to reform the world, and sympathise with the lower class. Besides, what are we to understand by our Lord calling his people, especially ministers, the light of the world, the salt of the earth, &c. It grieves me exceedingly to find that great and eminent ministers of the gospel do not come forward to advocate the cause of temperance—that public dinners and toasts are used in religious meetings, &c.

5th, Wherever temperance has been well received, and faithfully and steadily advocated, much good and great blessings have been the fruit. Had I the gift of writing English, I could say much of the great good resulting from this noble cause, during the last fourteen years in Wales. I can now only attempt to write a few hints.

1. Total Abstinence has greatly improved the health of individuals—has renewed their constitution.

2. Many broken characters have been restored, and brought to situations of credit and profit.

3. In a domestic point of view, many a family has been made comparatively happy and peaceable, by joining this good cause.

4. In many instances, the magistrates have had much less to do to keep order and peace.

5. Much less burden on the parishes, as husbands, are not so apt to forsake their families, &c.

6. The Lord's day has been better observed and places of worship much better attended.

7. Many have been added to christian churches, who are now teachers in Sabbath-schools, and the most active and useful members.

8. A great number of hopeful youths, who signed the pledge, when very young, are now grown up to be men, and are quite firm total abstainers, and great enemies to all intoxicating liquors.

Is it not most lamentable, that many churches and ministers, having had the above facts before their eyes, for years, after all, do not espouse the cause? How are we to account for this? And, oh, how can the ungodly world think highly of the church, professors and ministers.

I remain, dear sir, yours truly.

E. DAVIES.

IRELAND.

BELFAST TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.—We have just been favoured with the tenth annual report of this society, from which we learn that, during the past year, weekly meetings have been held,—lectures have been delivered by several talented and well-known friends of the cause,—a local agent has been employed, who has paid 4000 visits to families,—10,000 tracts and periodicals have been circulated,—about £40 have been expended in promoting the objects of the association: and 300 new members have been added to the society, twenty-five of whom were formerly abandoned to gross intemperance. In addition to these operations, much exertion has been put forth, and much good has been accomplished by Father Spratt and his adherents. From an appendix to the report, we learn that there are nearly 800 licensed spirit-shops in Belfast and suburbs, which gives about one public-house to every twenty-two families. This opens up a wide field of usefulness to the temperance reformers, which we trust will be faithfully occupied by our friends in Belfast.—Scottish Temperance Review.

THE MIGHTY CHAMPION.—Chorus of the Deities.—Desire of wine and all delicious drinks,
Which many a famous warrior overturns,
Thou couldst repress; nor did the dancing ruby,
Sparkling, out-poured, the flavour or the smell,
Or taste, that cheers the heart of gods and men,
Allure thee from the cool crystalline stream.
Samson.—Wherever fountain or fresh current flowed
Against the eastern ray, translucent, pure,
With touch ethereal of heaven's fiery rod,
I drank, from the clear milky juice allaying
Thirst, and refresh'd: nor envied them the grape
Whose heads that turbulent liquor fills with fumes.
Chorus.—O madness, to think use of strongest wines,
And strongest drinks, our chief support of health,
When God with these forbidden made choice to rear
His mighty champion, strong above compare;
Whose drink was only from the liquid brook!
Samson Agonistes.

THE PRESS.

There is at present certainly no dearth of materials for our Magazines. The Editor's box this month is crammed with articles of vital interest, culled from various periodicals, and some professedly of anti-teetotal tendencies. From these sources we have plucked the choicest fruits of the season for presentation to our readers,—from sources too, that, a while ago, were barren and unfruitful. How unlike former times, when we deemed ourselves fortunate, if the "Press" would only leave us unmolested, or allow us to escape without insult and condemnation. They who are not with us are against us, is perhaps, therefore, hardly true now, in the sense in which we have been accustomed to regard that phraseology. True it is, that the same periodicals which insert articles illustrative and commendatory of our principles, contain much "the other way," which justice, humanity, and religion condemn. But we deem it an advance on that older state of things, that now the daily and the weekly press,—from the Religious Magazine to the Sporting Chronicle,—that the editors of these should occasionally "discourse most eloquent music" on temperance. It was only a few days ago, that we had occasion to call at the office of one of the weekly journals, a quarter most unlikely to proffer much that would extend our principles; yet we were politely assured, that if certain matter of temperance information, which we then communicated, were forwarded to the Editor, it should find insertion. To give a place in our present impression of the Chronicle, to the articles that have recently appeared in the Journal of Public Health, "On the mutual relations existing between Intemperance and Insanity;" on "Intemperance and Ragged Schools," from the Standard of Freedom; "Barrack Canteens," from the Observer; "Report of the Annual Licensing Day," from the Bolton Chronicle, (containing most terrible revelations); "the New Beer Act," from the Brighton Herald, and other articles of great interest, we have concluded to suppress much original matter, to which we may hereafter give publicity.

But we take this opportunity to say, that since our accession to office, we have been gratified by kind assurances, from various quarters, that our efforts to serve the cause of human progression are receiving a measure of appreciation. We do not forget that the readers of temperance periodic literature are as diversified in their mental tastes as, perhaps, any class of readers with which we are acquainted. It was said of Dr. Watts's versatility of genius, that he could with the same ease write a logic for the University and Hymns for little children. If this be not descriptive of the qualifications requisite to make a successful Editor of a temperance periodical, it not inaptly represents the multiform nature of the materials required to suit all the readers of this class and kind of publication. That we shall really please every body, we do not hope; to expect it, would subject us to much chagrin and disappointment, still we are cheered by the following and similar communications:—

"DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for two numbers of the Chronicle since I last saw you, and to express my opinion that your paper has greatly improved, its articles being of a more interesting description generally, as well as of a more diversified character, which is the principal charm in a periodical.

"Yours faithfully,
"RALPH ASHMAN."

"Framlingham, Suffolk, September 6th, 1848.

"MY DEAR SIR,—The Temperance Chronicle and Recorder for this month is deemed so good by the Committee of the Temperance Society in this town, that they have determined upon leaving one at every house, if so many can be procured; and as such, I am instructed to apply for five hundred copies.

"Yours truly,
"JAMES LARNER, Sec."

The Committee, in compliance with the request of our well-known and indefatigable friend, forwarded the required number for general distribution. We doubt not they will be blessed to the good of the people. "Smallest helps, if rightly given, make the impulse stronger;" and happy shall we be to hear of a still wider diffusion of our own and kindred publications, and would urge upon our numerous readers to disseminate the excellent articles contained in this and the preceding Chronicle, and to imitate in spirit and in deed the laudable example of our friends of Framlingham.

ON THE MUTUAL RELATIONS EXISTING BETWEEN INTEMPERANCE & INSANITY.

BY GEORGE ROBINSON, M.D.,

Lecturer on Medical Jurisprudence in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Medical School, and Hon Sec. to the Newcastle and Gateshead Sanitary Association.

Of all the movements which characterize the present age, there is none promising happier or more glorious results, none better calculated to improve the temporal and eternal welfare of mankind than that which encourages us to trace the source, with a view to the prevention and removal of the various evils, physical as well as moral, which afflict and disgrace society. It has hitherto been too much the custom for those who have considered the question at all to refer those evils to agencies over which man possesses no control; whilst the great majority turn from their contemplation as they would from any other hideous and revolting spectacle, and endeavour to forget their existence in the observation of more cheerful and gratifying scenes. Both lines of conduct are, I think, to be deprecated; but the former is much the more pardonable error, inasmuch as it arises from excessive though misplaced humility, whilst the latter must, in every instance, be the result either of moral cowardice or of selfish indolence.

As the unnatural interpretation and forced application of a religious principle may thus possibly induce some persons to view with indifference, if not with dislike and suspicion, attempts to diminish crime, disease, and misery, by removing their presumed causes, I may, before entering upon the proper subject of this paper, perhaps be permitted to say a few words in justification of the general practice.

Experience, or the knowledge gained by observation and comparison of the events continually occurring around us, has so far as we can see, fully shown that the mental and moral nature of man is governed by laws as definite in their action as those which regulate the phenomena of the human body. Thus we know that the operations of the intellect can proceed only under certain physical conditions, (i. e., so long as the structure of the brain is unimpaired, and a full supply of pure arterial blood is constantly maintained; that its vigour is affected by changes in those physical conditions, (being enfeebled, excited, or perverted by structural injury of the brain, and by irregularities in the quantity and quality of the blood supplied; that the different faculties of the mind bear to each other certain fixed relations; that those faculties are extremely diversified; that their combination constitutes the perfect mind; that an undue preponderance of one impairs the harmony of the whole; and that the minds of different individuals are in general similarly affected by the same physical and moral sources of disorder. In like manner, not only do the same moral faculties exist in a greater or less degree in all members of our race, but certain general principles are also discernible in the growth and government of those faculties. We can thus detect in every human being more or less capability of pity, gratitude, veneration, and benevolence. We find that the same agencies, the same peculiarities of education and habit, produce everywhere the same effect in developing or suppressing the manifestation of those virtues. We recognise in the millions constituting a nation, the virtues and the vices peculiar to its individual members. And if among ourselves we can invariably trace a close connexion between physical discomfort and defective education, on the one hand, and numerous and varied forms of sin and suffering on the other, are we not justified, nay, are we not bound, by every consideration of philanthropy and religion, practically to acknowledge the existence of that connexion by using our utmost exertions to remove and prevent the further operation of those causes?

Having thus endeavoured to guard against any misconception of the objects of the present and similar inquiries, I may at once proceed to submit for consideration, a few questions connected with the causation of two of our chief social evils, intemperance and insanity, believing that the great subject of PUBLIC HEALTH comprehends such investigations within its sphere. The brief limits of this communication will, of course, render it impossible to enter upon anything like a complete review, either of the causes of these states, or of the psychological peculiarities which they respectively exhibit in different individuals. I shall therefore content myself with endeavouring to determine—

1. The extent to which the habit of intemperance operates in this country as a cause of insanity.
2. The rationale of those causes in which insanity is considered to manifest itself by an irresistible desire for intoxicating liquids.
3. The practicability of materially diminishing both sources of domestic misery and national weakness, by improving the physical condition of the working population, and by diffusing throughout all classes of the community the blessing of a sound, moral, and intellectual education.

Intemperance and insanity, the two greatest curses of civilization, are, in their very nature, so intimately connected, that any examination of one would necessarily be incomplete without some reference to the other. For both exhibit as their essential phenomena, perversion or disorder of those mental powers which impart to man his vast superiority over the rest of the material creation. So close, indeed, is the resemblance between the two states, that whoever has carefully observed the language and conduct of a number of intoxicated persons, must have witnessed most of these varieties of mental disorder, which are, unhappily, often spontaneous in their origin and of permanent duration. He will have seen, as in miniature, the excitement of raving delirium, the maudlin sensibility and groundless apprehensions of the melancholic, the blood-thirstiness of the homicidal, the cunning desperation of the suicidal maniac, the prostration of the moral feelings, the inflation of the mind with delusions as to dignity, wealth, and knowledge; and finally, in the last stage of intoxication, he will have noticed the gradual disappearance of every manifestation of reason, until the vacant gaze and drivelling smile have for the moment stamped upon the countenance the fearful inanity of idiocy. Since, then, a single dose of an intoxicating substance possesses the power of temporarily disordering the intellect, perverting the moral sentiments, and even wholly suppressing the operations of the mind, it is not wonderful that the continued use of such agents should frequently induce permanent mental derangement. Continuance in that habit may occasion this effect either directly or indirectly. We possess no data by which to estimate its influence in predisposing to insanity; we can, however, readily conceive that it must be very considerable. It is found that the minds of persons who have once laboured under an attack of mania are ever afterwards more liable to excitement, and less capable of preserving their equilibrium whilst exposed to disturbing influences, than those which have never deviated from a healthy state. We have seen that each fit of intoxication is, in fact, a temporary attack of insanity. We notice in every day life how frequently the intellects of habitual drunkards become impaired; and knowing these things, we cannot avoid the conclusion, that an excessive use of intoxicating substances will in time so enfeeble the mind as to render it incapable of bearing ordinary sources of disturbance, and thus act as a powerful predisposing cause of insanity.

A series of statistical tables, published in 1844, by the Metropolitan Commissioners in Lunacy, though in many respects incomplete, will enable us to form an estimate of the extent to which intemperate habits operate in this country as the exciting cause of mental disorder. Before entering upon their consideration, it may, however, be necessary to premise that the exciting are also often the predisposing causes of insanity, and that an individual born with an hereditary predisposition may discharge all the ordinary duties of an active life without any disturbance of the mental equilibrium, unless exposed to unnatural or extreme sources of anxiety or excitement. The study of the immediate causes of insanity is, therefore, of great importance in connexion with any attempt at diminishing the frequency of that terrible malady.

The following table shows the proportion which intemperance bears to the other exciting causes of insanity, as exhibited in the returns from ninety-eight asylums in England and Wales, including all those which afford any information as to the relative influence of that cause.

Number of cases in which hereditary predisposition was traced.	Number of cases caused by intemperance.	Number caused by vice and sensuality.	Number induced by various moral causes—viz. Poverty, grief, disappointment, sudden fright, &c.	Number caused by study and intense mental excitement.	Number caused by religious anxiety and excitement.	Number caused by bodily disorder (including 367 puerperal cases.)	Number of cases in which the cause was unknown.	Total number of cases returned.	Proportion per cent. ascribed to intemperance.	Proportion per cent. ascribed to intemperance and vice.
2526	1799	551	2969	358	808	3187	2335	12,007	17.97	19.57

Even according to this imperfect return, then, intemperance constitutes the immediate cause of one-seventh of the cases contained in the English asylums; but a very brief examination of the question will suffice to prove, that this estimate is greatly below the truth. In the first place, it may be observed that, until very recently, no general register of the causes of insanity was preserved in this kingdom, and that, even now, many cases are annually transferred from workhouses into asylums, without any history or statement of their causes. And there is every reason to believe that intemperance has induced the mental disorder in many of the cases returned as from "unknown" causes. Thus, in the Commissioners' Report, page 95, the medical officer of a private asylum in London, in referring thirty-two out of sixty-four cases, to causes "unknown," adds, "but probably exposure in a tropical climate, combined with intemperance." And, at page 198 of the same Report, I find in the return from a provincial asylum, admitting all classes of patients, six cases of delirium tremens, included among seventeen referred to physical causes, independent of intemperance.

THE NEW BEER ACT.

The new Beer Bill, prohibiting publicans from opening their houses on Sundays till after morning service, is now in operation, and has been received as a boon by the publicans as well as by the public generally. The bill has long been in operation in London, and attended with the best effects. Why it was withheld so long from the country at large, we cannot conceive. We think that the law relative to the retailers of beer and spirituous liquors might be rendered still more effective. It is well that men found drunk in the streets, especially on Sundays, should be punished; but they who sell beer to drunken men, or in large quantities to make them drunk, ought to be punished also, just as the receiver of stolen goods is punished more severely than the thief. Publicans might be summoned and fined for permitting drunkenness in their houses, and many of the respectable publicans wish for such a law. There is another practice calling loudly for legislative interference—that of tradesmen paying their men of a Saturday night at a public-house. This leads to more drunkenness and vice than any thing else whatever. It is a common thing for needy tradesmen to borrow money of publicans, to enable them to pay their wages. This leads to a compact between the needy tradesman and the publican. The tradesman engages to pay the men at the publican's house, and that every man shall have a certain quantity of beer. When men have abstained, perhaps all the week, from strong drink, and sit down, tired and weary, at the pay-table, they are glad to get a pint or two of beer; the pipe is introduced to create artificial thirst, and they must wait till "master" comes. He makes it late in order to oblige his friend the publican, and that the men may drink more beer. One pint soon leads to another, and another, till the men begin to get drunk. At last "master" comes, and pays his men with the money borrowed from the publican. The beer must now be paid for, and more had, for companionship, and by this time many of the men are drunk, and, as lock-up time is arrived, they go rolling into the street, ripe and ready for a row. They fall in with a policeman, abuse the "unbiled lobsters," and get taken off to the black hole. Shut up from their families all day on Sunday, they go sober enough, but in a sad plight, before the magistrates on Monday, get fined, and go home to be scolded by their wives, and to be despised by their friends and neighbours as drunken sots. This is the history of half the Saturday night rows, which originate in the pay-table in the public-house. We want a law to prevent any men from being paid their wages in a public-house.—Brighton Herald.

BARRACK CANTEENS.

The recent order of the War Office, practically interdicting the sale of spirituous liquors in barrack canteens, has excited a great deal of unnecessary and by no means uninterested indignation in the minds of certain persons; and the Government are blamed for every conceivable evil that can accrue to the soldier for simply interposing to prevent the destruction of his health, at least within the walls of those institutions which the State has provided for him. But calmly and dispassionately considered, there is no reason whatever for this great outcry; on the contrary, every well-wisher of his species and every true patriot has cause to praise the course that has been adopted by the authorities on the instance.

The duty of the State to the soldier is to supply him with all the necessaries for the support of life, and also to make his condition as comfortable as possible. Cut off from intercourse with civilians, or only admitted into communion with the worst class of individuals, the representatives of social life, the natural and inevitable tendency of the military mind is to brutality; the soldier who herds alone with his fellows, each in the same predicament as himself, can derive neither knowledge nor edification from such intercourse; and as he has, strictly speaking, no home—"for without hearts there is no home"—he almost necessarily adopts the vices of the degraded state in which he is placed, and of the reckless companions with whom he is compelled to associate. Of these vices the most destructive of life, of health, and of discipline, is the indulgence in ardent spirits. This liquid poison is not necessary to the soldier's support—on the contrary, it totally unfits him for the performance of that duty which is the condition of his sustenance by the State; nor is it necessary to his comfort, for what comfort can accrue from the loss of health and strength, and self-respect, and along with them all the happiness of which his situation is susceptible? Therefore, in putting a bar to the sale of spirituous liquors in barrack canteens, the War Office has not alone fulfilled its duty to the soldier as well as to the public, but it has discharged, for so much, a debt due by the State to humanity at large, in respect to the normal condition of its military servants.

Another step, however, remains to be taken in the matter; another instalment remains unpaid, as regards the soldier. It is a tradition long since disproved, that strong drinks are at all requisite for the maintenance of life and the promotion of happiness; while, on the contrary, it has been clearly shown by the experience of ages, that moral and intellectual culture is the only thing that conduces to both. Why, therefore, should a Government permit strong drinks of any kind to be vended within the precincts of the barracks of the kingdom; on the contrary, why not rather convert the several canteens into coffee-houses, and regimental reading-rooms! The advocates of the system of strong liquors may urge that the soldier who is so disposed will procure his pabulum without the barracks, if he cannot procure it within it; and, doubtless, their assertion is to that extent true. But suppose he should do so, is that a reason why the State should furnish him with any facilities whatever for destroying his health and unfitting him for the due discharge of his duty, besides demoralising him to a degree still lower than that to which he is reduced already.

"In every deep there is a lower deep."

Such arguments are worse than idle—they are disingenuous and noxious; and consequently they are worth less than nothing—supposing for a moment the existence in logic of such a quantity.

Every true man—every honest man—every good citizen, and every patriot must approve of the course taken by the Government on this occasion, and give them credit for the best intentions towards the soldier—tempered only by the regret that the prohibition is not sufficiently comprehensive to include all intoxicating drinks whatsoever. Rome, however, was not built in a day, nor can the condition of the soldier caused by ages of indifference, of cruelty, and of neglect, be amended in a moment. That they may persevere in this course is the earnest prayer of every well-wisher of his species.—Observer.

REPORT OF THE ANNUAL LICENSING DAY FOR THE BOROUGH OF BOLTON, AUGUST 24, 1848.

On Thursday last, the annual licensing meeting for victualling houses in this borough, was held at the Borough Court, Bowker's-row, before the following magistrates:—R. Heywood, Esq., in the chair, J. Scoweroft, J. Arrowsmith, T. Cullen, R. Walsh, E. Ashworth, and J. Knowles, Esqrs. The magistrates met at ten o'clock, in their private room, and, having signed the whole of the ordinary licenses, came into court about eleven o'clock, when Mr. Heywood intimated that they were ready to listen to any applications which might be made for new licenses.

Mr. Taylor, coroner for the borough, then rose to address the bench in opposition to the granting of new licenses. His learned friends, he observed, had no doubt done the best they could for the interests of their clients; for he could not suppose that the persons who had applied for new licenses on that occasion, had any other desire in view than to serve their own interests. He should have been very glad, indeed, to have seen some commercial traveller placed in the witness box to give evidence that he found good beds at a house that had been referred to, but had to go out to get spirituous liquors; inasmuch as that would have been a very great support to the magistrates, were they inclined to grant the license required. He (Mr. Taylor) had a memorial to present—one which, he thought, would have its due weight with the magistrates when they looked at the signatures. These commenced with the name of our worthy Vicar, and included, he believed, the names of all the clergymen of the established church, and, with one or two exceptions, those of the clergymen of every other denomination in the borough; also the names of a number of professional men, tradesmen, gentlemen, and others, who, he believed, had at heart the interest and welfare of the population at large. Before presenting that petition, however, he would refer the court to statistics respecting crime and other matters, from which the magistrates might be able to judge whether more licenses ought to be granted. In the first place, there were 96 inns in Great Bolton, and in Little Bolton 20, without the one whose license was suspended; there were also beerhouses in Great Bolton, 125; Little Bolton, 66; in addition to these there were in the two townships, 11 houses at which beer was sold off the premises: total of licensed houses at which ale and spirits were sold, 318. Now, he had no hesitation in saying that these ale and beerhouses would hold every man, woman, and child in the borough of Bolton; and that, therefore, we had space enough for drinking, whatever else we were short of. There was a drinking place for every 25 houses, or one for every 200 souls, including men, women, and children, total abstainers, and those who would not, could not, or durst not drink; and if it was said that persons came to the market who got drunk, it might, on the other hand, be said that those who did not drink should be taken as a set-off against them. Such were the present resources for selling drink, or poison—some called it by one name—some by the other. Of 12 of the inns of which he had spoken, the occupiers had this year been fined or reprimanded for offences committed on the Sabbath; eight were notorious as places at which gaming was permitted; at twelve (not to speak of the vaults) prostitutes were permitted to assemble. Then, there were five beerhouses at which gaming was permitted, and eight beerhouses where prostitutes were permitted to assemble, some of them being no better than brothels. The total number of prisoners apprehended for the last year (ending August) was 2,541. He had arrived at this aggregate by taking from the police accounts the number apprehended during the first eleven months, and adding the average for another month. 2,541 had been apprehended for all offences, civil and criminal; but he would analyse them. 367 of the number were males, who were found by the police drunk and incapable of taking care of themselves; 62 females were found under similar circumstances; for being drunk and disorderly, 317 males, and 60 females; and, the disorderly characters, resorting to low alehouses and beerhouses who were taken into custody, amounted to 244. The disorderly prostitutes apprehended were 117: making a total of 1,167. Now, let them see how many were apprehended for being disorderly whilst sober, for by that means, the cause of disorder, crime, and prostitution might be ascertained. 93 men and 28 women—in all, 121 were the number thus taken into custody; or, in other words, one-tenth of the number that were apprehended for being drunk or under the influence of drink: so that this, at all events, bore out the impression of judges, magistrates, keepers of prisons, and others, that nine-tenths of the crime of the country was chargeable upon the drinking-usages and customs. He had not taken into account the felonies that were committed; and he would leave the magistrates who attended that court and the quarter sessions, to say whether the same ratio did not shew itself, in respect of these offences. He wished, however, to offer some evidence, to prove the influence, which increased facilities, for drinking had upon the conduct of the people. In order to do this, he would draw a comparison of the offences of this and the last 3 years, and also of the number of alehouses in those periods. In 1846, there were 317 ale and beerhouses, and 1169 persons of the character previously described, being under the influence of drink, were apprehended. In 1837, the number of ale and beerhouses was 341, or an increase of 25 beerhouses upon 1846; and that increase produced an increase of prisoners apprehended under the influence of drink, of 193; which showed, beyond all doubt, the relation that existed between the drinking system and crime. In the present year, there were 318 ale and beerhouses; and, as he before stated, 1167 persons of the character spoken of had been apprehended; so that the increase of 193, in 1847, had fallen down again to within 2 of the number of 1846, while the ale and beerhouses had also diminished till they were merely one over what they were in that year. Now these statements could be proved to be true, on inquiry being made at the source whence they were derived. And, after hearing them, he would ask, could any disinterested mind fail to see the relation to which he had alluded? if not, he presumed, the magistrates would consider, before they afforded increased facilities for the procuring of drink. Now he begged to give an account of the inquests held in the borough during the past year. He had no other opportunity of giving an account of his stewardship, and should be very happy in availing himself of the opportunity now afforded, of doing so. There had been 68 inquests in the year ending August. Of the persons on whom these were held, 21 were infants, or under 21 years of age; and it therefore could not be expected that they would be influenced by drinking, though, incidentally they might have died from the misconduct of their parents in that respect. That number deduct from the whole, 47 remained, the end of twenty-three of which he would give them. He then went through the 23 cases, leaving out names, but briefly stating the following circumstances of death:—

1. Beerseller: fell drunk; died from concussion of the brain.
2. Verdict, "Excessive drinking."
3. Drowned himself; "Excessive drinking."
4. A drunkard for 20 years and upwards; died in workhouse.
5. (female) Drinking at an alehouse until 12 o'clock at night; found in the morning suffocated.
6. Innkeeper; hung himself; had drink supplied in the night time.
7. Drinking at an alehouse until 12 on Sabbath night; found drowned the following morning.
8. (female) A drunkard for 20 years; found drowned.
9. (female) Separated from her husband; maintained at a brothel and beerhouse; drinking ale within an hour of death; "Excessive drinking."
10. Boy of 12; son of drunken parents; sent to work young from misconduct of parents; caught by machinery.
11. (female) 22 years; drinking at a beerhouse on Sabbath morning; died from taking mercury to cure herself of a loathsome disease.
12. A beerseller; verdict, "Excessive drinking."
13. (female) Drunkard 25 years; hung herself; verdict, "Excessive drinking."
14. (male) Drinking at a club held at an alehouse until 11 at night; skull fractured by a fall.
15. (male) Self-hanging from "excessive drinking;" son cut his throat a year previous; drunkard, and kept company with prostitutes.
16. (male) Run over by a cart-wheel; had been drinking late.
17. Beerseller; self-hanging; "Excessive drinking."
18. (male) Verdict, "Excessive drinking of rum."
19. Hung himself; drunkard 20 years, and beggared his family.
20. (female) Self-hanging; son drunkard; husband killed drunk.
21. (male) Self-poisoning; drinking 3 days (Sabbath one.)
22. (male) Found dead in a cellar hole, skull fractured; drunkard many years; when body lifted up, drink oozed out at mouth; possessed of property; verdict, "Excessive drinking."

might think fit to call it, of drink. This was his experience as coroner for one year. What, therefore, might they consider had been the experience of all the coroners in England for the last twenty years? It must be shocking to think of the disease, suffering, cruelty, madness, murder, and suicides that must have taken place from drink. We had been alarmed at the approach of cholera; and it was certainly well to look about us and try to make arrangements to meet it. But the pestilence of cholera was nothing compared to the pestilence of drinking; taking, as an instance, the last visit of the cholera to this town. On that occasion, all the fatal cholera cases that could be found were 17; but it was not at all improbable that 100 died in the same year whose deaths arose, directly or indirectly, from drinking. Now, what was the effect of drinking usages upon the poor-rates? Great Bolton had paid £17,000 during the last year; and was no proportion of the sum attributable to the misconduct of paupers? was it not found that scores of children were left to be maintained by the parish in consequence of the drunken habits of their parents? And for the demoralizing effects of drinking, let them look to the last election. Let them look also at the desecration of the Sabbath that took place. And here, he would observe, he felt obliged to the gentleman who exerted himself to promote the observance of the Sabbath. One remarkable feature of the effects of drinking, was the idioy that it produced. In Paris, out of 1,200 idiots, 1,100 had drunken parents. Mr. Taylor then referred to the last year's report of the Rev. J. Clay, chaplain to the Preston House of Correction, from which he read the following extracts, shewing the connexion between drinking and crime:—

“Every Report of this nature would be incomplete without some observations on the causes which lead to crime. Though it may be almost unnecessary to say that ignorance and irreligion are those causes; and that, in proportion as they are removed, crime will disappear;—it may be useful to advert once more to the intermediate or secondary causes, brought into activity by the primary ones just named, and so generally admitted,—viz: idleness, parental neglect, desecration of the Sabbath, and,—mingling with all other causes, yet predominating above them—drunkenness! I believe that but for this besetting sin, the population of North Lancashire would exhibit virtues of the highest order. On several former occasions I have adduced evidence to shew that our population is much more capable of facing the temptations which press upon them when straitened by poverty than those which beset them when they can indulge in drink. An examination of the records which I have kept for many years, assures me that the offences for which distress is pleaded are exceeded five-fold by those in which drunkenness is admitted. During the last year I have examined more carefully the alleged pleas of distress, in order to note the fact rather than the excuse; and the tables in the appendix shew that while only seventeen felonious offences could be attributed to distress—that being in many cases the consequence of drink or idleness,—one hundred and seventeen were undoubtedly caused by drunkenness. I trust I am not flattering myself in supposing that this enormous vice, and its enormously ruinous consequences, are attracting attention in quarters powerful to discourage and check the evil. If anything of the kind should exist, I shall not be uselessly occupied in gathering and presenting details, which, if disgusting in themselves, may yet be borne with, on account of the necessity for a thorough conviction of the nature and extent of this national sin. The appendix contains statements and narratives by numerous victims of intemperance—or rather of the beer-shop and public-house. I possess fifty-two of these personal histories, written, or dictated by adults; and, in all but two of them, these places figure as the first cause and continued incitement to almost any crime by which society is injured. I earnestly solicit the perusal of the autobiographies given in the appendix, that it may be seen distinctly how crime flows—the metaphor is not so inappropriate as it may seem—from, through, and into, the beer-shop. It is there that the poacher receives his first lesson and his chief encouragement; there, the reckless “navy” squanders his earnings and his strength; once drinking himself into desperation, and so becoming ready for any act of robbery or plunder, in order to purchase means for another debauch: there, labourers and artizans assemble by troops, and drink away wages, clothing, health, life. There, they take their wives’ and children’s bread and cast it to dogs! A consideration of these facts will perhaps make us ponder more seriously the evils of our social condition, and convince us that the efforts of the state and voluntary energies are both required to mitigate them. There is, however, ground for comfort in the fact that crime and disorder are decreasing; and circumstances authorize the hope that the favourable movement is something even more hopeful, than the mere moral fluctuation of the great popular wave. The decrease since 1845 is attributed, by Mr. Sheppard, the chief constable of Salford, mainly to the restricted means of indulgence in liquor. In this view I fully share; and it is, I think, singularly corroborated by the falling off in the revenue derived from malt and British spirits in the present year. A decrease of eight millions of bushels of the former, and two millions of gallons of the latter, argues less drinking and consequently less crime. But comparing 1846 with 1842, both periods of great distress, we discover, with a population increased about 9 or 10 per cent., offences decreased (taking the tables of Captain Woodford and Captain Willis as a guide,) exactly 30 per cent.; and, as regards committals to this jail, nearly 40 per cent.,—a fact noticed in the early part of this report. We may hope, then, that in spite of the prevailing ignorance and excess, there are some agencies working beneficially on our Lancashire population.”

Mr. Taylor next produced a plan, about five feet square, of the town of Great Bolton, shewing, in black marks, the public houses already licensed; in red, the beerhouses; and by stars, the houses for which licenses were sought. There were from 90 to 100 already licensed; but he could find 30 within the space of 300 yards, and within that distance of the Parish Church, too. Churchgate was one black mass (laughter.) In addition to the memorial from the clergy and tradesmen, Mr. Taylor now produced the following memorial from the Sunday School Teachers, signed by 484 male teachers, representing 9,000 children:—

“To the Worshipful the Mayor and Magistrates assembled for Licensing Public Houses. The humble memorial of the undersigned Sunday School Teachers of the Borough of Bolton, Sheweth,—That there are at present, within the Borough of Bolton, 116 licensed Public Houses, 191 Beerhouses selling on the premises, and 11 Beerhouses selling off the premises, amounting, altogether, to 318 places for the sale of intoxicating liquors. That your memorialists are informed it is the intention of 10 several persons to apply to your worships for licenses to sell spirituous liquors, but your memorialists humbly submit that an increase of such places of resort would be attended with demoralizing consequences to the population of this borough, and would be the means of presenting additional temptation to the thousands of scholars under their instruction. Your memorialists also submit that the applicants for licenses are already Beersellers, and that the granting a license to a Beerhouse, for the sale of spirituous liquors gives, to an already existing evil, a permanency and fixedness of character it did not previously possess. Your memorialists therefore humbly pray your worship that no additional licenses may be granted. And your memorialists will ever pray," &c.

The Magistrates retired, and, after an absence of half an hour, returned into Court, and intimated that no new licenses would be granted. The one, however, formerly suspended, for the Talbot, would be renewed.—Bolton Chronicle, August 26th.

INTEMPERANCE AND RAGGED SCHOOLS.

We have been somewhere told of a farmer who year after year employed a number of labourers, at the cost of a large sum of money, in picking up the weeds and rushes growing upon a marshy tract of land. The conditions always remaining upon which they depended for subsistence, every year they appeared again, demanding the same expenditure of money and labour. The successor of this agriculturist, by draining the land, deprived the weeds of the moisture which nourished them; they then disappeared and gave place for a more wholesome vegetation. This is a brief history of what society has done with its moral evils. They have been suffered to grow up to great magnitude. Like the ignorant husbandman, great means have been expended to palliate their severity, or lessen their virulence. The great causes—the conditions upon which poverty, crime, and disease depend have been allowed to remain. We have no lack of charitable feeling, but it has been content to look at the surface and treat the symptoms rather than the disease. This policy has led to lamentable results. It has consisted in mere remedial agencies: means that, if employed in preventive measures would have removed much of the evil which offends the eye at every turn. A loaf and a cup of water may relieve the hungry and athirst, but in the order of nature the appetite will return. It is necessary that the Samaritan's heart should be regulated by knowledge, and that the actions of good men should be wise to secure a desirable and appropriate reward.

We are driven to this reasoning by the various attempts at education now making, more especially by our new and popular institutions, Ragged Schools. We rejoice at the establishment of such institutions. We hail every attempt to improve the people. We see in this effort a recognition of the claims of the neglected and the ill-used; an admission that wrong has been done them; and an intimation that there is a disposition to atone for the past by the conduct of the future. Ragged Schools will snatch some few from the wretched and outcast lot to which thousands in this Christian country are doomed; it will exhibit to those who have few opportunities of observation, the actual condition of the thousands who crawl from the light of day into loathsome dens, and generate in misery, recklessness, and crime; leaving a progeny still more debased to fill the workhouse and the gaol. Let us not be misapprehended. Ragged Schools will not remove the festering sores afflicting the social body. They constitute another class of palliatives, less objectionable than some, as they cannot be fairly said to reproduce the very evils they seek to remove. But we must not forget in all these appliances that the true philosophy is to call out, arouse, and strengthen the responsibility of the parents. The great majority of the children sent to early toil; or left to ramble among vile associates in the street; or driven to beggary or fraud, are the offspring of intemperate parents. While this is the case, we cannot see what asylums can do but make our parents more reckless, and our children more wretched.

There are many orphans and deserted children to whom this will not apply, but we speak of the mass. We cannot see what education is to effect upon the thousands who are prowling about our streets, learning in their wretched homes the petty vices which in the world harden into daring crime. We cannot hope any great change so long as parents are the slaves to the most selfish of all vices. Besides the education of the school, there is the education of the home; and what fruit can be expected from those homes where drunkenness riots—where one or both parents are indulging to excess, and exhibiting before their children the passions and vices which for an hour or two a-day at school they may be taught by a pious teacher to abhor? Daily familiarity with all the miseries of a drunkard's home will not only enbrute the mind, but feed every propensity and suggest every evil thought."—Standard of Freedom.

Doings of Strong Drink.

ATTEMPT TO COMMIT SUICIDE.—On Tuesday, Mary Lambert, a good-looking young woman, was brought before Mr. Cottingham, charged with throwing herself off Blackfriars-bridge into the river. Policeman 63 M stated that, between three and four o'clock that morning, his attention was arrested on observing a female mount the balustrades and precipitate herself into the river. He and a lad immediately jumped into a wherry, and reached the spot where the prisoner was struggling in the water, she having gone down twice before they came up. Just as the prisoner was sinking a third time, he got hold of the upper part of her dress, and pulled her into the boat, and then conveyed her towards the station-house. On the way she expressed her regret that she was not suffered to die, and added that although she was saved from drowning, she was determined on effecting her death, as she was tired of life. The policeman added, that the prisoner appeared to have been drinking. The prisoner now said that she lived with her aunt, who failed in business, and that she then went out to service, from which she was seduced by a man who had deserted her. Since then, having lost her character, she was ashamed to return to her relatives, whose places of residence she was now ignorant of; she was, consequently, compelled to seek the means of subsistence by an irregular life. She was in the habit of frequenting the theatres on the south side of the water; and on the previous night had been drinking. While in a state of intoxication she threw herself headlong into the river. Mr. Cottingham, after an earnest admonition, committed her to prison for one month, in order that she might have the advice of the chaplain, and be provided with the means of restoration to her relatives.

MR. WHITTAKER'S JOURNAL.

DEAR SIR,—Since my last report, my labours have been distributed over rather a large surface. The season of the year has not been favourable for public meetings in every place, so that I have been compelled to tuck about considerably in order to catch the breeze. I have, however, succeeded to some extent, and not a few have been landed in the haven of temperance. I have again visited Sunderland, and held seven meetings under the direction of that society. The chapels, generally speaking, have been at our service, and the meetings of a very encouraging nature. The society in Sunderland numbers a vast number of men, and some women who have been rescued from destruction. A considerable number of middle class men have espoused our cause, and a little more activity on their part, would make the Sunderland Society one of the most useful and influential in the country. Middlesborough has also had a visit, in which I held two meetings. The society in this town is instant in season and out of season. If the cold water poured upon this town does not put out the fire of intemperance, it will not be because there is no engine, nor men to work it. They act upon the advice of Wellington at Waterloo, and apply it in a good cause, "Up boys and at them." I have also revisited Stockton, and given three lectures. I never had more satisfactory meetings in this town than on this occasion, they were crowded, and the number of signatures large. I also made a great many calls on behalf of the society, and was pleased and encouraged. Stockton is constitutionally a quiet, still, place; they often need the poker to keep the fire burning, and I hope the watchmen will use it. Hartleypool has also had three lectures from me, and they were well attended, there is fruit in this town, and some warm friends, and a large field for useful labour; but there exists a little narrow-mindedness on the part of some, which does not accord with the spirit of benevolence, which is to bless the world. The north of England teetotally speaking, is the land of my adoption, and "though they may have many teachers, and not many fathers, and any chain put round me will be green wreaths." All true temperance advocates take up the language of Jehovah, and apply it morally, "Let there be light." I have also had the pleasure of attending the anniversary of the Selby Society, at which I gave three addresses to the adults, and one to the juveniles—Dr. Burns was my companion. Selby for many years has stood high in the estimation of the temperance advocate, it is not surpassed by any society in this country. It is marrow to one's bones to meet with them, and makes us feel young again. My friend, Jabez Inwards, has laboured very successfully amongst them, during the past year, and given them great ideas of teetotalism. From Selby I went to Blackburn, the place in which I was made a teetotaler. I looked at the pit from which I had been dug, and the rock from whence I was hewn; and prayed that God might give me a grateful remembrance of my deliverance, and help me to open the prison-doors to them that are still bound.

From Blackburn I went to Kendal, and spent two weeks in that neighbourhood. During which, I visited Wensleydale, and held two meetings, one at Bainbridge, the other at Haines, and was very much pleased to meet old friends, and witness the progress of the cause. I also took a trip across the lakes to Wolverstone, and held two meetings in the National School Room of that town. This was a very agreeable visit to me, I had not been to Ulverstone for more than twelve years. On my first visit, I had the honour to form the society, and had not seen the friends since. They have seen many changes since then, but teetotalism triumphs, and many that were troubled rest with them. The meetings were good, they treated me well, and I thanked God, and took courage. I returned to Kendal, took leave of my parents, and here I am again in the far north. During the present week, I have held meetings in Yarm, Ayton, and Gainsborough. These are all scenes of my early labours, and the comforts and kind acts that I now experience, is some reward for former toils and trouble. The good cause lives and grows in these parts, and there is abundant evidence that we have not spent our strength for nought. The good lady with whom I am staying is in her 76th year, she became a teetotaler more than ten years ago, her health has much improved, and the enemy has long since been turned out of doors, and no accident has happened in consequence. The good lady whose house I left yesterday morning, is in her 81st year, and she became a teetotaler twelve years ago, and appears to enjoy perfect health; she, with her family, are living examples of the truth of the passage of Holy Writ, which says, "Great fear have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." The meeting at Yarm was very large, heart-stirring and successful. The one at Ayton got the second prize, and in that held at Guisborough, there was a good show of fruit and flowers. This evening we hope to repeat it. On Monday I go again to Ayton—on Tuesday to Redcar—and on Wednesday to Bishop Aekland. On the 26th, I go to Darlington, and in the early part of next month, I hope to come south.

Your's respectfully.

T. WHITTAKER.

MR. JABEZ INWARDS.

During the last month, Mr. Inwards has lectured acceptably, and addressed large and respectable audiences at Southampton, Poole, Bridport, Broadwindsor, Dorchester, and Huddersfield. At Poole the Town Hall was kindly granted by the Mayor; and Mr. I. remarks, I am happy to say many here are readers of the National Temperance Chronicle, and are zealously affected in the good cause. In Broadwindsor, the Independent Chapel was very kindly given up for the meeting, the worthy pastor presiding. Of Bridport, Mr. Inwards observes, I was much pleased to find that during the last year they have made considerable progress.

MR. WILLIAMSON.

TO THE EDITOR.

DEAR SIR.—Since my last report I have addressed fourteen meetings at the following towns:—Plymouth, Stonehouse, Devonport, Exmouth, Torquay, Brixham and Kingsbridge. There are it is true, some of the societies of which it may be said, If their glory be not departed, it is very much tarnished. The members appear to give themselves up to slothfulness—meetings are but seldom held, the great difficulty being to obtain the funds necessary for advertising a meeting when it is needful to call one. The truth uttered by the apostle, "He that soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap bountifully," is forgotten, if not disregarded; and as a consequence, such societies decline in proportion as there is lack of energy on the part of the members. In some cases, societies which, if we regard the number of members belonging to them, appear strong enough to carry on a successful agitation, have been divided through some attempting to introduce principles which, had the proposers been successful, would have diverted the mind from the true bearing of the temperance question. But the attempt to introduce politics, was by the thinking portion of the members and by the Committee, successfully opposed; and there is reason to believe, that those who made the attempt, now the period of excitement is passed, see the folly of attempting to make the temperance question a stalking horse for the introduction of any disputed point in politics—many of the meetings have been numerously attended. The Rev. J. Sherman gave valuable testimony on behalf of the principle, at a meeting held at the Guildhall, Plymouth, contrasting the views which he held, in reference to the use of intoxicating drink, on the occasion of his previous visit to this town, thirty years since, with those which he now holds. Then, he believed they were necessary; now, he believes any quantity is injurious to health. Public sentiment in this town is progressing in favour of our principles. The local newspapers frequently insert articles shewing the evils connected with drinking; and it is pleasing to know, that the magistrates are awakening to a sense of their duty. At the last licensing-day, there were four new applicants for licenses, and all were refused. Two excellent meetings were held in Stonehouse, the society has been lately re-organised, and is under the superintendence of the Revs. J. Webster, and William Rogers, Baptist ministers. At Brixham, I held three meetings. The society in this town furnishes an example shewing what may be accomplished by perseverance and union. It was established in 1839, after enduring much opposition, and for a time went on prosperously, but suffered a decline through want of care on the part of members, and was for a time almost extinct. There was one, however, who had stood firmly by the cause from the commencement, who determined to make an effort to raise the society. It was happily attended with success. They have now a flourishing society; and it would be difficult to find a town with so small a population, where so great an amount of good has been done, and where the meetings are so well attended. Captain Blake is still at the helm, and the temperance ship is manned by as gallant and steadfast a crew of blue jackets as ever volunteered for honourable service; they are assisting their commander in constraining the moderate to sign articles, and in pressing the drunkard to abandon the ruinous craft, which has periled the body, and will ultimately, if not abandoned, destroy the soul. May they persevere, till by persuasion and entreaty, they shall rescue all whose interests have in any way been endangered by the great destroyer.

Yours respectfully,
J. WILLIAMSON.

Metropolis.

ENON CHAPEL.

NEW CHURCH STREET, EDGWARE ROAD.

A public meeting as announced under the auspices of the National Temperance Society, was held in the above chapel, on Tuesday evening, September 19th, T. B. Scutt, Esq., one of the committee, presiding on the occasion. After singing and prayer, the learned chairman opened the proceedings by observing that all were in search of happiness, however diversified their opinions might be as to its true nature, and the path to obtain it. He then exposed the fallacy of those who were seeking it in the use of the intoxicating cup, showing on the other hand, that it had been found to a great extent by those who had been wise enough to abandon the drinking-system and embrace teetotalism, he then drew a vivid picture from the history of the four worthies of the inspired volume, as recorded in the book of Daniel, setting forth the decided superiority of the water-drinkers over the wine bibbers. Mr. W. Claridge then spoke on the moral bearing of the question, pressing it upon the hearts and consciences of professing christians to unite effort with prayer in this matter, that the accursed thing might be for ever cast out of the Church of Christ. Mr. Thomas Hudson, the Secretary of the National Society, in the absence of Dr. Gourley, kindly attended and delivered a very masterly and powerful address, on the physiological bearings of the question, (which we believe could not have been exceeded had the worthy doctor himself been present,) entrancing the large and respectable audience, and repeatedly calling forth rapturous bursts of applause, altogether it was decidedly the best meeting that has been held in Enon Chapel for a considerable period. A vote of thanks having been unanimously awarded to the deputation from the National Society, the assembly dispersed.

OBSERVER.

HENRY PASSAGE—HAMPSTEAD ROAD.

On Thursday evening, September 14th, a lecture was delivered by Mr. W. Claridge, of the National Temperance Society, in the above place, proving the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks to be in harmony with the revealed will of God both in the Old and New Testaments. The audience was both numerous and respectable, and expressed themselves fully satisfied with the line of argument taken by the lecturer. The Committee, in testimony of their approbation, handed over a donation to the funds of the National Society,

BAYSWATER AND KENSINGTON.

A lecture was delivered at the regular weekly meeting of this society, on Monday evening last, September the 18th, by Mr. Hudson, Secretary of the National Society. The Rev. Thomas Cooper occupied the chair. The meeting was deeply attentive throughout Mr. Hudson's lengthened address. The lecturer was warmly greeted on resuming his seat, when a vote of thanks was passed to him and the chairman by acclamation.

TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

Last night the first public meeting of the members and friends of the London Temperance League was held at the Hall of Commerce, and was very numerously attended. In the absence of Mr. Heyworth, M.P., who was to have presided, Dr. Gourley was called to the chair. The secretary having stated that the object of the League was to promote the cause of temperance by public meetings and other means,

Mr. J. ANDREWS of Leeds, was called on to address the meeting. He said that all the experience he had acquired since he adopted the principle of temperance, now fourteen years ago, confirmed him in the opinions he had originally formed of the baneful effects of intoxicating drinks. It was strange that the love of these drinks should be so prevalent when their evil effects were so apparent. Indeed there was the greatest obstacle to the spread of temperance in the rooted habits and prejudices of the people. They had that obstacle to contend against in the north of England, but they had done much to remove it. It was a sorrowful thing to see so many temples erected to Bacchus in this metropolis, and so many snares set to entrap the weak and the unwary. Total abstinence from all intoxicating drink was their motto. They would push that principle, and they had sufficient stimulus to do so when they contemplated the effects of strong drink. Strong drink destroyed the happiness of millions—it blighted genius, marred the fairest scenes of nature, and even penetrated the sanctuary of God. They must, therefore, boldly meet the evil—they must discountenance intemperance in every shape and form. A vigorous and united effort should be made in the metropolis; they should rally round the London Temperance League, and promote the cause of humanity and progress by putting down the dreadful evils of intoxication.

Mr. R. G. MASON shortly addressed the meeting. He denied that there was the least use in intoxicating liquors, for God never made a human stomach capable of digesting spirits. Strong drinks corrupted the blood, as was well known, and therefore they injured the whole man. It was their duty, therefore, to impress on all those who came within the sphere of their influence the evil effects of strong drinks. He believed that there was enough in that room to leaven this great city with the benefits and blessings of temperance if they only exerted themselves properly. In fact, the whole philosophy of the temperance question was contained in this text: "Love thy neighbour as thyself." It was therefore a question of humanity and christianity, and as such he recommended it to them.

Mr. CLAPP, an American, said that the objection most commonly urged against the advocates of temperance was, that they claimed too much for it. It was objected to them that they inculcated the principle that temperance and christianity were the same thing—that if a person was reformed from intemperance, he was, as it were, transfigured and translated. Now, he never heard that said by the advocates of temperance—he never read a line in any temperance organ to that effect. But as temperance was a virtue, he believed it was a part of christianity. For himself, he believed it was not the wisest course to force the cause by penal enactments. It was also said, that there was none of the learning of the country on the side of the temperance question. It was true that they had neither Oxford nor Cambridge on their side; they had few bishops or archbishops, and but few lord mayors.—(Laughter.) Those persons who made those objections said, that they would join the movement when it became more popular, that is, when they were not wanted. There were a great many who were always ready to go along with the current, but they should recollect that dead bodies always did that, whilst it required energy and life to go against it. They should keep their eyes steadily fixed on the star which would guide them into the harbour of safety. He could assure them the cause was advancing in America. There was a disposition amongst the most respectable classes there to give the movement countenance and support. On the occasion of a festival which was given in Boston, after the funeral of the lamented John Quincey Adams, the mayor of that city refused to preside, if intoxicating drinks were permitted.—(Hear, hear.) He was happy to find that the mayor of Boston in England did the same thing. The two cities, as it were, shook hands with each other across the Atlantic. This was an evidence that the cause was progressing. If carried on in the spirit of love and truth, he had no doubt it would be successful.

After a few words from Mr. GROSJEAN,

Mr. M'CURRIE said that he was now a teetotaler of eleven years' standing, and what had it done for him? He was in the lowest state of poverty and degradation when he became a teetotaler. But, by sobriety and industry, he elevated himself from that state, and now he was full of health, and plenty smiled upon his home. The cause of total abstinence was therefore dear to his heart, and he regretted it was not progressing as it ought in this metropolis.

The Rev. Mr. ROBINSON said that the use of spirituous drinks was an immorality and a sin. He therefore refused to give the right hand of fellowship to any man who used them. He removed them from his vestry, and even from the Lord's Supper. He gave up his pastoral charge rather than have anything to do with a person who used spirits. He hoped the league would support those who advocated temperance on those grounds.

A vote of thanks was then passed to the chairman, and the meeting separated.—Daily News, September 19th.

STRATFORD TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A most interesting meeting of the members and friends of the above society, took place at their Hall, near Bow Bridge, on Tuesday evening, September 5th. Presided over by Thomas Roberts, Esq., of Plaistow, for the purpose of expressing our esteem and friendship to Mr. Williamson Monro Smith, our old and much respected Secretary, and fellow-labourer in the cause of temperance, moral and social reform, in this and many other places, now about to leave us, and the land of his birth, for an adopted country, New South Wales.

Among the number of speakers on the platform, we noticed the chairman, the Rev. J. Ward, of Stratford, Messrs. J. W. Green, Spriggs, Buckle, Randle, Hart, Catton, W. Green, Phillips, Howlett, Harvey, Rowe, and many others, well known to the friends of temperance generally.

The business of the evening commenced at six o'clock with a number of Mr. Smith's friends from London and the neighbourhood, sitting down to a beverage,

"that cheers, but not inebriates."

After which, the public meeting, which was kept up till half-past ten, during which time sixteen different speakers addressed the large and attentive assembly, all testifying, in the highest terms, to the character of Mr. Smith, for his zealous activity, unquestionable integrity, and almost unparalleled candour.

To give even an abstract of the speeches delivered, would almost be needless, (as all the speakers well knew Mr. Smith, some three, five, seven, and some even more years) being so commendable of our friend's good feeling, liberality, and usefulness to his fellow-creatures, looking neither upon colour nor creed, but endeavouring his utmost to do good whenever an opportunity offered.

The following testimonial, written by the Secretary, on behalf of the Committee, on parchment, was read, adopted, signed, and presented by the chairman to Mr. Smith, who received the same, in a speech so impressive and much to the purpose, that made even those that were opposed to him on account of his candour, express their regret in losing so useful and talented a member of our much loved cause:—

"Dear Sir,—The friends of temperance in this locality, ever anxious for the welfare of mankind, and taking as their motto, that 'Good men of all nations, are impelled by the same great spirit to seek after the same great end, the happiness of the human race,' consider that there is dignity in presenting to the world an elevated standard of individual character, of which we can only rightly judge, by useful labours, that will improve the moral, intellectual, and religious condition of mankind, lead the world to the highest sources of enjoyment, and induce the fallen sons and daughters of Adam to honesty, sobriety, and charity.

"You, sir, having been particularly industrious and persevering in these labours, after working in so laudable a cause, and for objects of so noble a nature, endeavouring to promote, and greatly assisting at, the formation of institutions for the dissemination of useful knowledge, after being amongst us for the last five years, as Secretary to the Bow and Bromley Temperance Society, as our representative at all the metropolitan meetings, as a member of the 'World's Temperance Convention,' and making so many exertions of a like nature amongst us, are now about to leave the land of your nativity, for a far-off clime, there to labour in the same wide field of usefulness.

For your invaluable exertions here, you have the most unbounded and hearty thanks of this meeting, and the best wishes of us all. Though deeply regretting the removal of so important a member of our Society, yet we sincerely trust that you are destined successfully to promulgate the same exalted principles in the country of your adoption, that you have loved to advocate in that of your birth. And we heartily pray that your labours may be crowned with immeasurable success, that you may have the happiness of seeing abundant fruits of your labour, that you may be long spared to the work and the world, and finally hear the unspeak-able welcome,—“Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”

“Signed on behalf of the meeting,

“THOMAS ROBERTS, Esq., Chairman.

“ANDREW MAYTHORN, Secretary.”

On the following evening, a meeting was held at Fair Field Works, being the factory at which Mr. Smith laboured, consisting of his shopmates and fellow-workmen, and presided over by W. B. Adams, Esq., one of the proprietors. After some preliminary business, the chairman read the following paper, which was afterwards presented to Mr. Smith, signed by all the men present:—

“Our object in meeting this evening, is one involving both pain and pleasure: pain that we are about to lose the companionship of one who has become endeared to us by a long course of disinterested activity in promoting the welfare of his fellow-men—pleasure that it gives us the opportunity of testifying our cordial sympathy with him, and desire that, wherever he may go, he may meet the appreciation which is his due. At the first founding of Fair Field Works, he came amongst us almost a stranger, won his position by his good conduct, and has held it till the opportunity offers of legitimately bettering his condition, by emigrating to one of the great colonies founded by England in the southern hemisphere, and wherein English enterprise and progress must largely aid, in the diffusion of civilization over the globe, bringing the ends of the earth together.

“Well and earnestly has Mr. Smith devoted himself to promote mental progress amongst the working-men of Fair Field, to provide for them healthy excitement of a more enduring kind than mere corporeal stimulus. As one of the founders of the Fair Field library, his name shall be remembered while Fair Field Works shall exist,—an example to others to go and do likewise.

“Perchance, in his new abode, Mr. Smith may apply himself to the same branch of civilization, work to which Fair Field is devoted, facilitating man's transit over the earth's surface, and thus destroying barbarism. Perchance new emigrants from Fair Field may follow in his track, and a new Fair Field arise in Australia, with a generous emulation in the race of improvement. Pleasant in future days, would be the interchange between the parent and the colonial factory. Pleasant would it be to tell, mutually, how mill after mill of the “Bush” was conquered by the rail at the antipodes, while here at home, the moors of Norfolk and the fens of Cambridge and Lincoln were becoming cognisant of steam, in the very homesteads of the farmers. If all this be but a pleasant dream, still, individually, we shall rejoice in the success of Mr. Smith, in whatever path he may select. And that he may the better bear us in remembrance, we now offer to his acceptance a testimonial of our sympathy, that he may carry constantly with him,—a pencil-case and a purse, voluntary offerings from those who appreciate his efforts; the former bearing an inscription, and the latter, though less weighty than we could wish, still, we trust, an emblem of the pecuniary ease, that will finally be his lot, the better enabling him to follow out the emotions of his heart—benevolence growing into beneficence.”

Mr. Adams then having read a note from Mr. Ralston, another of the firm, excusing his attendance, and couched in very flattering terms to Mr. Smith, presented him with a handsome gold pencil-case, appropriately inscribed, and a purse, containing the overplus of the subscription from buying the pencil-case. Mr. Smith, in a neat speech, returned thanks for the great and unexpected kindness he had received on all hands, more especially from his employers and fellow-workmen.

Two or three of the men then said a few words, and Mr. Adams also spoke again. All present then signed the testimonial, and, after shaking hands with Mr. Smith, and bidding him farewell, the meeting broke up.

HASTINGS.

On Thursday evening, September 14th, we were favoured with an able and interesting address by Mr. Charles Reed of Stoke Newington, in which arguments were adduced and statements advanced, proving the temperance reformation to be the great movement of the age. The cause in this place has been for some time past rather at a stand, yet we have some honest-hearted, good men and true, who are determined not to yield to the enemy, but to fight the moral battle till the foe is defeated.

F. BECK, Secretary.

SOUTHAMPTON.

On Tuesday evening a public meeting was held at the Victoria Rooms, on which occasion the large room was well filled with a respectable audience, convened to hear a lecture from Mr. Jabez Inwards, of Leighton Buzzard, on “The Social, Political, Intellectual, and Religious Bearings of the Temperance Question.” The chair was taken by Mr. J. Clark, jun., who made a few preliminary observations, and was followed by Mr. Joseph Harding, who in a brief address showed the intimacy existing between the evil which it was the especial object of the temperance society to remedy, and the spread of female depravity and all kindred vices. Mr. Inwards, who on rising received a hearty welcome, commenced his address by remarking, that truth was simple and easily to be understood, whilst error was complex and difficult to comprehend. He referred to the christian graces enumerated by St. Paul, ending with temperance, and the apostle's declaration that “against such there is no law;” and then advanced arguments to prove that temperance was total abstinence from things injurious, and the moderate use of those things which are good—a practice against which there is no law. His next position was that no man could be guiltless who manufactures or drinks intoxicating liquors, because to make them it was absolutely necessary that the precious corn, or the juice of the grape, must first be destroyed. On this part of the subject Mr. Inwards expressed himself in very forcible terms, and, after giving a respectful challenge to all the ministers of the gospel to discuss with him the truthfulness of the temperance principle, he unequivocally declared that should the coming winter experience a famine it would be mainly attributable to those who, for the sake of pampering a morbid appetite, had during the last twelvemonths destroyed nearly 9,000,000 quarters of grain. He looked upon the manufacture of intoxicating drinks as a great sin. Such physical waste was distressing to man, and must be abhorrent in the sight of God; but even that was insignificant, when compared with the utter ruin of the bodies and souls of thousands. The moral question of temperance was next discussed. It had been clearly proved that five-sixths of the crimes committed were caused by strong drink. Blasphemy was almost always connected with the use of strong drink. As a nation we had suffered, and were suffering, much from that foul degeneracy which strong drink occasions. By its power how had language been abused, and how grossly degenerated many had become. There was a power in language which they all ought to venerate. It was the medium of thought—it connected them, by moral and intellectual ties, to their fellow-men—and what a pity that such a gift should be so abused. An earnest appeal was here made by the lecturer to all who were guilty of abusing such a precious gift, to “cease to do evil, and learn to do well.” It had been said by some that education would put an end to intemperance; but such an assertion was glaringly untrue, as thousands could be found who were educated men, but who were much addicted to drunkenness. Bacon was educated, but intemperance left a deep stain upon his character. Byron, notwithstanding the power of his intellect and the splendour of his imagination, drank deeply of the Circean bowl, and that mind which was sometimes soaring aloft, to drink in the rich inspirations of nature, was often in a state of stupid enervation through the potency of alcohol. The brightest intellects have fallen to rise no more—the flame of true poetry has been extinguished—the efforts of benevolence thwarted—the anticipations of hope have been withered. Oh! what a wreck of morals—what a wreck of minds. As they associated importance with the human mind, so ought they to associate importance with that principle which has such a tendency to elevate it. The fruits which God had supplied were good; the drinks which man had supplied were bad. The grape juice quenches thirst; alcohol creates thirst. The wine in the cluster is cooling and refreshing; the wine used in England is heating and exciting. In reviewing the havoc of intemperance, and in looking over the vast field of moral desolation, he could not but ask, what evil demon has done all this? What blood-hounds of destruction have been let loose upon man? And the sorrowful answer was that, to manufacture this curse, man had turned the bread of the Lord into the poison of man. He then highly eulogised the excellencies of cold water, and spoke of the nature of intoxicating drinks. Breweries did not look like places where a drink was made morally to elevate the people. The religious bearings of the temperance question were then treated upon, and an earnest appeal was made to religious professors, on whom he called, as lights of the world, to reflect by their conduct the glories of temperance truth. The talented lecturer resumed his seat, at the conclusion of an address extended over nearly two hours, amidst much applause.—Hampshire Independent.

(TO THE EDITOR.)

MY DEAR SIR,—The Total Abstinence Society in this town, has recently been re-organised, and, I believe, that by attention and perseverance, we shall succeed in doing some good in this dissipated place. We have about eighty members, and from the general feeling manifested at our meetings, further additions are reasonably anticipated. We have been lately favoured with an able lecture, by the Rev. B. Parsons; and still more recently with two visits from Mr. John Williamson, who on both occasions delivered very useful and deeply interesting lectures, by which twelve persons were induced to take the temperance pledge. We anticipate the benefit of another visit from Mr. Williamson, whom we consider as an efficient advocate of this great cause, and whose manner, and the subjects of which he treats, are highly calculated to promote the extension of our principles. The President and Secretary are both dissenting ministers, and feel deeply interested in the prosperity of the society.

CHARLES ROGERS, Secretary.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

(To the Editor of the Temperance Chronicle.)

DEAR SIR,—By your kind permission, I beg to inform the friends of temperance, that the good cause of moral and social elevation continues to make considerable progress in this ancient and populous town. There are four distinct, yet harmonious, societies, carrying on their operations against the drinking-customs. The Gentlemen's Association, established twelve years ago, is still vigorously pushing the battle to the gate. The Ladies' Association, conducted by their missionary, Mr. W. H. Buchanan, continues to pour down upon the people light, through the agency of tracts, domiciliary visits, attention to the aged, sick, infirm, and destitute, and co-operation with the Gentlemen's Association, and attention to public meetings. The Westgate branch of the Newcastle Society, conducted by excellent men, connected with the St. John's Church, confine their labours to this parish, which contains about twenty thousand souls; their efforts have been, and still are, successful. The Young Men's Association, in addition to village and monthly town meetings, very actively attend to Sabbath School organization, and with an industry that reflects the highest credit upon them, avail themselves of all opportunities to further the object of their organization—universal happiness—by reclaiming some and preventing others. Among the means applied for this purpose, allow me to notice, that the living voice of the temperance agent is not the least. Our Temperance Hall was well filled, on opening it for the season. Lecture by Mr. Joseph Bormond, whose talent as a lecturer is well known, and whose zeal to promote human happiness has procured for him an extensive circle of valuable friends. Mr. Bormond is the agent at present employed by the Northumberland and Durham Temperance League; is much and deservedly esteemed. We have had the pleasure of listening to a chaste and eloquent address from Mr. T. Hudson, Secretary of the National Temperance Society, who, upon his return from Scotland, was so kind as to sojourn with us for the night, and assist at our weekly meeting; the audience was greatly delighted, and are hoping they may have the pleasure of his able services at no very distant period. Mr. Reid, of Glasgow, the zealous friend and advocate of our cause, gave us an interesting address, on paying us a similar visit to that of Mr. Hudson. Two evenings have been devoted to conversations on The Bottle, eight cartoons by Cruikshank, so much admired for their fidelity in representing the downward progress of the drunkard. John Priestman, Esq., occupied the chair on both evenings, and expressed his unqualified approbation of the cartoons and conversations; the testimony of so good and benevolent a man cannot fail to commend these works of art to the temperance public; the audience was numerous and respectable. Gateshead Mechanic's Institute is open for the same purpose two evenings this week, and the Sunday Schools of both towns will be allowed to bring their children at a mere nominal admission; it is to be hoped that a deep and lasting impression will be made upon many for good by the representations of the cartoons of The Bottle. Success to them and all other legitimate means made use of to arouse the drunkard and warn those who, as yet, are lingering on the brink of this awfully-disgusting vice. In drawing this, perhaps, too lengthy report to a close, permit me to say, that vital active teetotalism is the order of the day in Newcastle; the committees avail themselves of first-class advocacy, whilst they do not set aside the less brilliant, though plain and honest advocate; and their very hearts desire is, to see resulting from an enlightened agency, a sober, virtuous and happy community.

VERITAS.

WHETSTONE.

On Tuesday, September 5th, 1848, the tea-festival of the Temperance Club, belonging to the above town was held at the Infant School Room. Above seventy persons sat down to tea, and afterwards a public meeting was held. J. H. Puget, Esq., took the chair, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. J. H. Donaldson, a deputation from the National Temperance Society, Mr. Freeman of Finchley, Mr. Stutchbury, and a reclaimed drunkard. The meeting was well attended, and at the close some signatures were taken, and several persons joined the Temperance Club.

The following interesting fact was communicated to the Club by Mr. Donaldson. He said, for some years there lived in this town, a man named Freeman, a shoemaker by profession, and a member of the Wesleyan Society. At that time, he was a drinker of intoxicating liquors and a drunkard. They called him Providence Freeman, in consequence of his going about the fields and hedges to look for old shoes to repair the jobs given him by the neighbours, and when he found any, he would say Providence sent it him. He, however, attended a temperance meeting, and signed the pledge, and has since that time ceased to look for leather. He now keeps a shop, and has a cart and horse of his own. He is now living at Dunstable, and they call him Temperance Freeman, Mr. Stutchbury confirmed the above, and declared he had become a member of the Temperance Society, in consequence of Temperance Freeman's advocacy.

SCOTLAND.

The Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society held its weekly meeting in the Rev. Mr. Wight's chapel, Richmond Place, on Tuesday evening last; the president, Mr. Neil McNeil, in the chair. The meeting being opened with prayer, the chairman said he would take that opportunity of stating how deeply grateful they felt to the students of the United Presbyterian Theological Hall, for the very efficient service they were rendering the movement. Mr. Dods, on rising, delivered a lengthened and animating address, showing the decided advantages which were sure to result to the community, were this cause receiving that measure of attention it deserved. Mr. Hudson, Secretary to the National Temperance Society, was next introduced. This gentleman commenced by taking a retrospective view of the movement; bringing before the audience the various epochs in its history, where the most happy consequences had attended its progress, these cheering results not unfrequently being brought about by the hostility of their opponents. Mr. Hudson entered into a variety of statistical details connected with the fearful amount of intemperance emanating from the public houses, and contrasting the useful articles of commerce which were purchased in the adjoining shops, argued the point as a question of political economy—the one increased (said the speaker) the comfort and prosperity of the community, whilst the other went to deteriorate the morals of the people—aggravate and perpetuate the poverty in which they were sunken, so that, ultimately, there was saddled on the nation an amount of taxation which paralysed the industrious energies of the virtuous and sober portion of the community. We regret that our space prevents us giving more of the eloquent and touching sentiments of this able address. The speaker resumed his seat amidst the protracted cheers of the vast assemblage, the church being crowded to overflowing. The meeting was further addressed, at some length, by the Rev. Mr. Reid and Mr. Flinn. At the conclusion eighty joined the society.—North British Express.

Notes of a Tour in the United States and Canada, in the Summer and Autumn of 1847. By Jabez Burns, D. D.

The reverend author is already well-known to the public by his numerous works, chiefly of a theological character; but he has also some celebrity, both as a writer and as a speaker on temperance and kindred topics. He is now introduced to us as a tourist in the United States and Canada. Being appointed as one of a deputation from the General Baptists of England, to the Triennial Conference of the same body of Christians in America, he was thus furnished with an opportunity (though rather limited,) of making observations on the state and condition of society on the other side of the Atlantic. In doing this, we have the reverend gentleman's own assurance that he endeavoured to observe and judge with all possible candour. He also adds, "I wrote daily a record of the things in which I was most interested." Now candour is not always a constituent element in the mental or moral character of men who journey to other climes; they are too apt to be warped by prejudices that more or less take possession of human nature, that the "first best country" is the land in which they live; and thus they frequently observe only the vices and defects of other nations. Dr. Burns appears to us to give a faithful delineation, and expresses himself in unqualified terms on the various subjects on which he dilates.

Though the volume before us, would be chiefly interesting to persons desirous to know the state of religion in connexion with the Free Will Baptists of America, yet the book abounds with a variety of useful information. The temperance cause is not forgotten, the 13th chapter is entitled the "Temperance Movement," and which did space permit, we would gladly transfer to our columns.

The Christian Aspect of Teetotalism. By SAMUEL GREEN, B. A., Minister of Silver Street Chapel, Taunton.

This is a very important little work, couched in terms of great seriousness, befitting the "Christian Aspect," of so grave a question. Its very title is of itself a sufficient refutation of the unadvised sentiment sometimes uttered by thoughtless men, that rendering the head clear by abstinence from strong drinks tends to the corruption and infidelity of the human heart. The christian aspect of teetotalism should have a wide circulation among christians who are still unilluminated on the subject of which it treats; it would "chase away the ignorant fumes that mantle their clearer reason."

The Blessings of Temperance. A Poem, by JOHN O'NEILL.

Gleanings.

This is the production of a very worthy old gentleman, whom we have the pleasure to know, who without the advantages of scholastic lore, has exhibited, in the poem bearing the above title, much originality of thought and taste in composition. He is one of those who proves that God's glorious image is often found engraven on very rude exterior. The work has been very favourably noticed by many of the Daily and Evening papers, by Howitt's Journal, and other literary periodicals. It unfortunately happens, in this case as in many others, that poverty and genius are often found in very close relationship. "Age and want," sings Robert Burns, "are an ill-matched pair." Mr. O'Neill is a living illustration of this sentiment of the Scottish bard. A few there are who feel interested in the case of our venerable friend, and a number of gentlemen, including the names of E. Moxhay, Esq., and S. C. Hall, Esq., have made an effort to assist him, and have also allowed their names to be used as approvers of the effort. The Secretary of the National Temperance Society would feel but too happy to be the bearer of any tangible proof of sympathy.

"GIVE THOSE WHO PREFER IT CHAMPAGNE."—In a work just published, entitled The Whole Art of making British Wines, Cordials, and Liqueurs, by James Robinson, the trade-secrets are fully divulged. See what "sparkling champagne" L'OIL DE PERDRIX is made of! "Sliced rhubarb stalks, the tops of young spring nettles, sugar, and eggs!" Taste, also this "FINE OLD PORT," compounded of the juice of Hamburg grapes, sugar, a decoction of purple beet-root, sliced ginger, and red sage-leaves—together with a large proportion of French brandy, isinglass, bitter almonds, sugar-candy and lemon-peel! Roughness is given by alum, oak-bark, or some other astringent; and the real port-flavour, by adding the tincture of the seeds of raisins!—Gateshead Observer.

BYRON'S OPINION OF WINE.—

Hath wine an oblivious power?
Can it pluck out the sting from the brain?
The draught might beguile for an hour,
But still leaves behind it the pain.

Farewell to England.

CHOLERA.

A huge volume would barely suffice as a record of all that has been written during the last few weeks on that all-engrossing subject, the Cholera. Penny pamphlets, learned treatises, by "members of the faculty," newspaper leaders and proclamations from the "Board of Health," are big with wholesome counsel, not so much how to avoid, but rather how to remedy the prevailing epidemic. But since, as temperance expositors, we have been accustomed to insist on the observance of our principles as of vast importance in the prevention of disease, it is but fitting, at the present juncture, that our few accustomed prefatory remarks should point in that direction. Those of our readers who feel interested in the history of this malady, may with profit consult the works of Sydenham, Johnson, Chisholm, Copland, and Dickson, (author of Fallacies of the Faculty) whose work, entitled Revelations of Cholera, has just appeared; from these it will be seen, that many speculations have been indulged by the most learned of the medical profession; 1stly, as to the cause or causes of the disease itself; 2ndly, whether or not "Is Cholera infectious?" and, 3rdly, what are the remedial measures to be employed? In the seventh volume of the Penny Cyclopædia, (under the article "Cholera") the first question is discussed; the writer, after describing the thermal phenomena relating to the disease, observes,

"It is generally conceived that the use of certain kinds of fruit which abound at this season of the year, as cucumbers and melons; and certain vegetables, as peas and the undressed vegetables used in salads, are powerful concurrent causes. In persons very much predisposed to this malady, such articles of diet may co-operate with the season to produce it; but when the state of the season is such as to render the disease epidemic, it attacks numbers of persons who never use food of this kind. Animal food of a bad quality, or too long kept, as animal food of all descriptions is very apt to be at this season of the year, is a much more powerful concurrent cause. So also is excess of food, though of the best quality, and intemperance in the use of malt, vinous, and spirituous liquors, together with whatever causes tend to diminish the vital energies; and so to lessen the power of resistance inherent in the body to the influence of noxious agents."

In Dr. Samuel Dickson's work, (Revelations of Cholera, p. 36) it is still more apparent that intemperance may be regarded as the greatest exciting cause of the disease in question; although, in the opinion of the Doctor, the letting of blood more or less predisposes the patient to attacks of epidemic and endemic diseases.

"We see," (says Dr. Dickson, who is writing in reference to India) "these diseases daily produced by inebriety. From the same cause, I am sure I have witnessed every symptom of Cholera. Case 1.—Captain M—, generally of austere habits, drank deeply for two days, during one of the ravages of the epidemic. On the third, he was seized with the symptoms of the disease. He remained in a state of more or less collapse all that day and night; the pulse now faint, now strong, raising and repressing hope accordingly. On the evening of the next day, he vomited some matter like coffee grounds, became every hour more feeble, and sank altogether about nine o'clock at night.

"Case 2.—Lieut. B—, several years resident in India, a few months after my disembarkation at Madras, sent for me in the morning to his quarters. He had been indulging in deep potations for many days. He complained of mal-aise, for which I gave him some calomel and rhubarb. During the day, he drank a good deal; and about two o'clock, P.M., his servant came to tell me his master was very ill. I hastened to him, and found him, with his face livid, the external jugulars gorged with blood, and his whole appearance that of a person suffering from strangulation. He was sensible, said he was like to choke, and that he had cramps of his limbs, and had vomited. I immediately opened a vein, but he died as the blood flowed; which it did in a full dark stream."

Much mischief has also resulted, from the want of proper caution on the part of those who from ignorance, believe that the use of stimulants and a highly animalized diet are antidotes to the epidemic, such may be reminded of the evidence of Dr. Farre (query 1271) as detailed before the House of Commons in 1834.

"It might appear to the Committee that the Cholera had generally assaulted those under-fed more than those that were over-fed. The gardeners and the fishmongers were almost ruined in the first assault of the disorder, by the fear of the public of low diet, but I found that more perished of Cholera, in its dreadful form, who had dined on beef-steaks than those who had taken lighter diet; and I also saw it cut down the most robust with perfect ease, with dreadful rapidity; in four hours they were placed hors de combat, while delicate women, having it also in its fiercest forms, escaped; and I further observed those who drank water, escaped better than those who drank brandy, even in its worst forms."

If it be objected by those who indulge moderately, so called, in the use of spirituous and fermented liquors, that the foregoing cases point only to the injury produced by access, it is easy enough of proof, that the effects produced on the drinker differ in nothing else than the degree of mischief engendered by their indulgence. It is for the professor of the "healing art" to expound the why and the wherefore, though even a slight acquaintance with the laws of causation would lead us to a rational conclusion. Now, what is Cholera but a "preternatural quantity and a morbid quality of the biliary secretion?" what is it but an undue quantity of morbid humours internally propelled, or a withdrawal of the blood from the surface—or a disturbance of the balance of circulation? If the moderate drinker supposes he is not predisposed to the action of agencies which prove fatal to the drunkard he should at once be undeceived. What does Dr. Adams of Dublin affirm?

"Our foreign reports testify that drunkards are carried off at once by this dire disease; but those who, by daily use of a moderate quantity, debilitate the tone of their stomachs and biliary organs, become easy victims to the Cholera."

"The habitual use of ardent spirits, in the smallest quantity," says Dr. Bronson of Montreal, "seldom fails to incite the Cholera, and to render it incurable when it takes place."

In the American Temperance Permanent Documents we are told, that "In the city of Albany, with a population of about twenty-five thousand, three hundred and thirty-six persons, over six years of age, died of Cholera. Of these one hundred and thirty-six are described as 'habitual moderate drinkers' and persons 'strictly temperate,' while of the five thousand members of temperance societies, there were only two deaths; showing that the latter description of persons was not one-fortieth part as liable to death by that disease as other persons. Of the rest of the population one in sixty died; while of the members of temperance societies, only one in twenty-five hundred."

"Whisky," says Father Mathew, in a letter to the Secretary dated Cork, May 23d, 1848, "has ever been the fatal source of crime in unhappy Ireland. It is also true that the pestilence that has ravaged our country has passed lightly over the teetotalers; there have been but very few who did not recover from that fatal disease. Like the Cholera, the intemperate were its victims. These facts, more powerfully than the tongues of the most eloquent, demonstrate the blessedness of total abstinence."

While so much has been written on the subject of epidemic diseases in general, it is notorious that comparatively little has been said on the subject of prevention; and what little has been said or written has been scarcely heeded by the great body of the people. Whether Cholera be contagious or not, the faculty itself are not all agreed, though the most eminent of them support the view that Cholera is not infectious? There is little need then of that alarm which too readily takes possession of the uninformed on this matter; it is of far more moment we conceive, that such receive advice, not so much how to cure but how to ward off the inroads of disease.

"It is perfectly notorious," (says Dr. Dickson) "that comparatively few of those who are in vigorous health, or who have opportunities of occasionally breathing fresh country air, or who live in good houses, and are not over-worked, nor over nor under fed, nor crowded together in sleeping apartments, nor addicted to intemperance, are attacked with Cholera."

To prevent the encroachments of this much dreaded disease, Dr. Dickson very properly lays down the following protective rules.

"Of all protectives against Cholera, the most effectual is a clean skin, which fortunately the number of private baths, and the public baths and washhouses, enable every one to have, at no great cost, and with very little trouble. To preserve the skin in such cleanness, assures its perfect tone and health; it is not sufficient to bathe occasionally, or even once a week, the entire person should be completely washed every day, and that for the very reason that makes most persons think it unnecessary, because we are so closely covered by our clothes. On that very account the pores of the skin which may be called the vital safety-valves are clogged by the deposit of the insensible perspiration. Doubtless many persons will be utterly astonished at the idea of having to wash all over every day. For them it is quite trouble enough to wash face, hands, and as much else as is seen above their dress. It is better, however, to take this daily trouble, than to be trembling from day to-day at the thoughts of Cholera, and after all this daily purification of skin is no such difficult matter. The best and easiest way of accomplishing it, is to have a coarse sheet partially wrung out of cold water, thrown over the person, and to rub not with but over the sheet briskly for five or six minutes, and then to rub dry with as coarse a sheet or towel as the skin can comfortably bear. Those who adopt this practice, or even rub all over every morning or night with a well-wet towel, will soon learn from their sensations of increased vigour, spirits, and general comfort, that even so simple a process may be a powerful resistant to disease.

If the working classes object, that either of these measures of protection are too expensive for them, we have but to reply, that for the most part the sums spent in gin-palaces and public-houses, in increasing the tendency to Cholera, would be more than sufficient to accomplish both the above powerful means of prevention."

It were easy enough to extend these remarks, which may have we trust the tendency of alarming the intemperate, admonishing the man of moderate indulgence, and of leading both to renounce their present practices, while to the man of abstinence it will be consolatory to know, even should he from some hidden or unforeseen cause fall a victim, that he may from the experience of others reasonably expect a speedy recovery; and that because to the physical and organic laws to which the Divine Being has enjoined obedience not less than to his moral injunctions, he has observed a stricter conformity.

ON THE MUTUAL RELATIONS EXISTING BETWEEN INTEMPERANCE & INSANITY.

BY GEORGE ROBINSON, M.D.,

Lecturer on Medical Jurisprudence in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Medical School, and Hon. Secretary to the Newcastle and Gateshead Sanitary Association.

A second obstacle to the acquisition of correct information on this point, is occasioned by the dislike of friends and relatives to expose the former vices of patients. There is, therefore, from this cause, often a tendency to ascribe the mental infirmity to some bodily disorder, or to regard it as an inscrutable affliction, instead of recognising in it a natural punishment of former excess.

And it is scarcely necessary to add, that certain of the other causes of insanity, as vice and bodily disorder, are either generally connected with, or often a consequence of, intemperance.

For these reasons I beg to subjoin a second table, exhibiting the proportion which intemperance and vice bear to the other causes of insanity, as described in the returns from twenty-five asylums, situated in various parts of England, and admitting different classes of patients:

DESCRIPTION OF ASYLUM.	Number of cases caused by intemperance.	Number of cases caused by vice and sensuality.	Total number from both causes.	Total number of exciting causes returned.	Proportion per cent. caused by intemperance alone.	Proportion per cent. caused by intemperance and vice.
6 Metropolitan, private	101	44	145	424	23.82	34.19
9 Provincial, private	92	16	108	282	32.62	38.29
10 Provincial, pauper and mixed	495	110	605	2086	23.72	29.
Total	688	170	858	2792	24.64	30.73

It will be seen that these returns refer to intemperance alone one-fourth, and to it, in conjunction with vice and sensuality, nearly one-third of all the cases of insanity admitted. And, as a large number of the causes are, even in these selected reports, marked as "unknown," we are, I think, fully justified in considering the results afforded by this table as fairly representing the proportion which intemperance bears in this country to the other exciting causes of insanity.

In another report, published a short time ago by the Metropolitan Commissioners in Lunacy, the total estimated number of lunatics in England and Wales is stated (p. 54) to have amounted on the 1st of January, 1847, to 26,516. If, then, we apply to this number the estimate just adopted, we shall find that intemperance alone has reduced 6629 of the present inmates of our asylums to their lamentable condition, and that to it and other bad habits 8838 persons now under restraint owe the deprivation of reason.

It appears from another part of the same official document, that the sum annually expended in England and Wales for the maintenance of the insane exceeds £750,000., and that of this sum, (exclusive of £15,756. applied to the support of Bethlem and the Naval and Military Asylums,) £296,263. are contributed by rate-payers for the charges of pauper lunatics. On re-applying the estimate for intemperance and vice, it will be found that the influence of the former in producing insanity entails an annual tax upon the community of £74,065., and the joint operation of the two evils, one of £98,754., in addition to the sums required for the support of families left destitute by the removal of their heads. And if we extend the same calculation to the cases of insanity existing among the wealthier classes, it will be found that, of the £365,628. annually expended for their maintenance, the sum of £91,407. has been diverted from its legitimate uses by intemperance alone, and £121,876. by that and other vicious excesses.

These facts may suffice to show the extent to which insanity, with its long train of domestic miseries and public evils, is the result of preventible causes. The examination of those causes, with a view to their removal, is a task deserving the attention of the statesman and the divine, as much as that of the physician, for they ramify into a boundless field, inasmuch as they are not only intimately connected with the hidden motives and secret springs of action which agitate society, but also involve in their consideration questions of the gravest importance, affecting the laws and the religion, the literature and the customs of the nation. On the present occasion I shall merely allude to one or two of the more important influences which tend to induce moral weakness, and its effect—permanent mental disorder. And these few observations may, perhaps, be conveniently deferred till we have briefly noticed the peculiarities of those cases in which the habit of intemperance is considered to be but the manifestation and effect of a form of insanity termed dipsomania.

Until a recent period, the intellectual faculties were alone considered subject to insanity, and we accordingly find that the various questions formerly discussed by medical writers on the subject, had reference solely to the intelligence of the individual, and to the possession by him of reasoning power. By many modern physicians, however, the boundaries of mental disease have been much extended; and it is now represented as also affecting the moral feelings, and thus inducing various forms of crime and depravity. This latter state of mental disorder or moral insanity is described by Dr. Pritchard "as consisting in a morbid perversion of the feelings, affections, and active powers, without any illusion or erroneous conviction impressed upon the understanding; it sometimes co-exists with an apparently unimpaired state of the intellectual faculties." And with respect to the particular form of moral insanity in which we are at present interested, the same author subsequently remarks, that "not unfrequently persons affected with this form of disease become drunkards; they have an uncontrollable desire for intoxicating liquors, and a debauch is followed by a period of raving madness, during which it becomes absolutely necessary to keep them in confinement."

As I wish to avoid entering upon the discussion of the general question, as to the possibility or expediency of drawing a distinction between moral insanity and vice, my notice of dipsomania shall be very brief. In it, as in all other forms of purely moral insanity, the mental disorder is stated to consist essentially in moral weakness, the controlling or governing power of the mind being no longer capable of repressing its criminal propensities. A person previously temperate, humane, and pious, whilst still in the perfect possession, not only of the intellectual faculties, but of the moral sense, may thus, according to this view, rapidly succumb to an irresistible impulse, and become at once a murderer, a suicide, a thief, or a drunkard. In opposition to the high authorities recognising moral insanity, it may seem presumptuous to doubt the existence of such a disease, and certainly no one will for a moment hesitate to believe that the facts appeared as described. But, unless we could inform ourselves of the ideas previously occupying the minds of those unhappy persons—unless we could examine the train of thought which immediately preceded the commission of each offence—unless, in short, we possessed that knowledge of the motives influencing the conduct of others which as mortals we can never possess, it does appear to me, (viewing the question by the light of reason and common sense,) a bold and dangerous procedure to exempt the authors of criminal actions, or the slaves of degrading habits, confessedly in the possession of their reasoning faculties, from that legal responsibility which constitutes the chief guarantee for the preservation of social order. If, indeed, we exclude from the category those cases in which crimes have been committed during a fit of delirious excitement, the various forms of moral insanity may be referred to two heads—viz.,

1. Cases in which the tendency to crime results from the existence, in the individual's mind, of some delusion, or morbid train of reasoning, which may not have previously manifested itself in his language or conduct, and which he may possibly never disclose.

2. The more numerous class of cases, in which a long-continued indulgence of the passions and emotions has almost wholly deprived the person of self-command, and so rendered him the slave of criminal impulses or vicious cravings.

Among the latter class, I would place all cases of dipsomania. For, whatever may be the source of those mysterious impulses which occasionally prompt persons of reputed intelligence and virtue to the destruction of life, there is not, I think, any adequate ground for believing that the habit of intemperance, even in its most irresistible form, ever originates in any other cause than the neglect of moral discipline.

THE MATERNAL MANAGEMENT OF CHILDREN IN HEALTH.

No one aspect of the temperance reformation is more important than that which relates to mothers and their offspring, and hence we gladly avail ourselves of everything that is issued from the press by men qualified to write on so engaging a topic. In a work reviewed in the British Banner, and bearing the above title, from the pen of Dr. Thomas Bull, we have the following incidental allusions to the value of temperance, under the head of WATER, WINE, BEER, AND SPIRITS.

"Water should be the only beverage throughout childhood—toast-and-water, if the child prefer it, which is rendered slightly more nutritive than the more simple fluid. The water employed in its preparation, however, must be at a boiling temperature, and it ought to be drunk as soon as it has sufficiently cooled; for by being kept it acquires a mawkish and unpleasant flavour.

"The practice of giving wine, beer, or, indeed, any stimulant, to a healthy child, is highly reprehensible; it ought never to be given except medicinally. The circulation in infancy and childhood is not only more rapid than in the adult, but easily excited to greater vehemence of action; the nervous system, too, is so susceptible, that the slightest causes of irritation produce strong and powerful impressions: the result in either case is diseased action in the frame, productive of fever, convulsions, or some functional derangement. An experiment made by Dr. Hunter upon two of his children illustrates, in a striking manner, the pernicious effects of even a small portion of intoxicating liquors at this tender age. To one of the children he gave, every day after dinner, a full glass of sherry: the child was five years of age, and unaccustomed to the use of wine. To the other child, of nearly the same age, and equally unused to wine, he gave an orange. In the course of a week, a very marked difference was perceptible in the pulse, urine, and evacuations from the bowels of the two children. The pulse of the first was raised, the urine high coloured, and the evacuations destitute of their usual quantity of bile. In the other child, no change whatever was produced. He then reversed the experiment, giving to the first the orange, and to the second the wine, and the results corresponded: the child who had the orange continued well, and the system of the other got straightway into disorder, as in the first experiment.

"Marcellin relates an instance of seven children in a family whose bowels became infested with worms, from the use of stimulants. They were cured by substituting water for the pernicious beverage.

"In this city, spirits, particularly gin, are given to infants and children to a frightful extent. I once saw an old Irish woman give diluted spirits to an infant just born. A short time since, one of these dram-drinking children, about eight years of age, was brought into one of our hospitals. The attendants, from its emaciated appearance, considered the child was dying from mere starvation; which was true enough in a certain sense. Food was accordingly offered and pressed upon it, but the boy would not even put it to his lips. The next day it was discovered that the mother brought the child very nearly a pint of gin, every drop of which before night he had consumed; a quantity which must have destroyed life, if dram-drinking had not been the habit of the boy.

"It is easy to discover when children have been fed upon spirits: they are always emaciated; have a lean, yellow, haggard look; the eyes sunk, the lips pale, and the teeth discoloured, the cadaverous aspect of the countenance being most fearful. They are continually suffering from bowel-complaints and convulsive disorders; which, under these circumstances, terminate invariably in an early death."

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

There are a few omissions to notice as regards the public doings of the Court at Balmoral. One incident, which occurred when we were in that neighbourhood, has been made much of, but the whole truth has not been told. Every public-house and gin-shop rings with the story of the QUEEN's visit to the Lochnagar Distillery; but no scribe has yet published all the facts of that visit. It is quite true that in the course of their rambles, the Royal family stumbled on this distillery, and also that they were each offered a glass of spirits: but, it is true also, that when Prince ALBERT was about to take a second mouthful, the QUEEN, taking hold of his arm, asked, "Do you know what you're drinking, ALBERT?" On which he laid down the "accursed thing." When the Prince of WALES tasted the whiskey, he instantly spluttered it out of his mouth as if he had drunk poison, emphatically inquiring, "What's that, Mamma?" while no persuasion could induce the Princess Royal to taste the liquid fire. The QUEEN put the glass to her lips: but, after all, the friends of morality and virtue will ever look upon this visit as an error in judgment committed by the QUEEN.—British Banner.

MILITARY MORALS.

BY ENSIGN JOHN FANNING.

SOBRIETY.

"In the Naval and Military Gazette of the 23rd of September and preceding numbers, Ensign John Fanning of the 1st West India Regiment, has been and is continuing to discourse Military Ethics to the British Army in the columns of the above-named periodical. The writer has very properly borne in mind, and argues to his reader, that the "soldier must, if he wishes to obtain and keep the reputation of a steady man, be obedient, patient, observant of time, sober and active—not only for a week, a month, or a year, but every year, and in all situations, without intermission or variation."

This gallant officer has devoted one entire article of the series to "Sobriety," which in part we here present, and design the remaining portion to follow in the Chronicle of December. When the whole shall have appeared, we may then take exception to some of the doctrines of Ensign Fanning. The writer's anxiety to promote the virtue of temperance in the army is thus exhibited.

"Sobriety, so indispensable to respectability in every station of life, is particularly necessary in the army. Drunkenness is the bane of the British soldier, and the Service abounds in examples of its ruinous effects. Many of the best-educated and cleverest men I have known in the ranks of the army were privates, and upon inquiring into their histories I have generally found that drunkenness was the impediment to their promotion. It is lamentable, as it is true, that a being capable of reasoning from cause to consequence, and therefore foreseeing the inevitable result of his actions, will, for the poor gratification of swallowing liquor (which is sickening and even maddening in its physical effects alone,) deliberately ruin his health, stain his character, and doom himself to a life of unpitied misery and degradation.

"Servility and meanness enter largely into the character of the poor drunkard. Such a one, when his pocket is emptied, will not hesitate to be a sycophant and a beggar to procure the means of continuing his enjoyment. I have often observed with scorn the pitiful shifts and entreaties of a drunkard, on the morning succeeding a night of intoxication, to obtain the price of an additional potation to cure him of what is emphatically called "the horrors." On such an occasion, it is impossible, however tolerant we may be, not to feel the utmost contempt for the man who voluntarily places himself in such a degrading position. To beg, even under the pressure of real necessity, involves degradation; but to beg, to persevere in teasing importunities, for the means of gratifying vice, is the lowest depth of self-abasement.

"Drunkenness, of all vices, has the least plea of necessity to apologise for it. A small quantity of liquor will serve the end of moderate refreshment; whatever is taken beyond that, is vicious excess, and tends to the formation of a most pernicious habit. There is an aggravated evil in every indulgence which leads to the abuse of our Creator's gifts. A sound mind and a healthy body are justly considered the greatest blessings bestowed upon man—blessings which he is bound by every moral and religious obligation to cherish with reverence and gratitude to their great Giver. How, then shall we estimate the enormity of drunkenness, which, more than any other vice, contravenes the benevolent purposes of the Deity, destroys the body and obscures the divinity of the soul?

"There is another crime involved in the drunkenness of a soldier, which does not appertain to the same vice in other classes of society.

"A soldier is guilty of positive dishonesty and breach of faith in ruining his health by intemperance. The man who takes the obligations of military service surrenders the control of his person to his country, and his health is public property. They are the value in return for which he receives pay and expects to be pensioned, and therefore he has no more right to lessen that value by vicious indulgence, than to steal a shirt from the knapsack of a comrade.

"I shall here present to the consideration of reflecting men, a tabular view of the pecuniary penalties incurred by drunkenness, followed by a specification of the punishments and disadvantages to which a soldier is liable for that crime.

Periods of Forfeiture to which a Soldier may be Sentenced.	RATES OF FORFEITURE.
	1d.		2d.		3d.
	per diem.		per diem.		per diem.
	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.
Six Months	0	14	0	0	0	0
One Year	1	10	5	3	0	10
Two Years	3	0	10	6	1	8
					9	2

"In addition to these forfeitures, there must be taken into consideration the pay lost for every day a soldier is in confinement awaiting trial and under sentence, and the consequent delay in obtaining additional pay for length of service.

"These sums are, comparatively, no inconsiderable losses, and were they savings, as by virtue of sobriety they might be, would contribute materially to a soldier's respectability and comfort.

"The consequences of drunkenness to a non-commissioned officer are much more serious, and extend through a longer period of time. Nearly every reduction that occurs in the service may be traced to intemperance, either as its remote or immediate cause.

"A reduced corporal forfeits £6. 1s. 8d. every year he serves subsequent to reduction.

"A reduced serjeant suffers annually the loss of £15. 4s. 2d.; should he serve five years as a private after reduction, the pecuniary loss incurred will amount to £76. 0s. 10d. Should his service after reduction reach the period of ten years, the pecuniary loss incurred will amount to the serious sum of £152. 1s. 8d.

"The difference between the pensions of a serjeant and a private, is the same as between the pay of these ranks in active service. There are few men who do not live at least ten years after discharge, many survive double that time and upwards; but I shall take the lowest number, ten, to calculate on, as the average duration of life after discharge; and it shows us another sum of £152. 1s. 8d. which the reduced drunkard might have enjoyed, but for himself.

"A reduced non-commissioned officer has great disadvantages to contend with when seeking employment in Civil life after discharge. The stigma of reduction will debar him from many excellent situations which he might otherwise obtain, because a reduction for drunkenness is an enduring record of the unfitness of the person for any situation of responsibility. The unhappy drunkard has therefore to endure the evils of poverty, the mortification of distrust, and the stinging consciousness of deserving all."

THE CHOLERA.

We had just finished our leader, when we were favoured with the following valuable communication from R. L. Pinching, Esq., Surgeon, detailing his experience as a practitioner in Ireland in 1832,—which we deem of sufficient importance for insertion, because confirmatory of the views expressed in the article on Cholera.

Walthamston, 23rd October, 1848.

SIR,—Having had considerable experience in the treatment of Cholera whilst it prevailed in Ireland in the year 1832, I have thought a few remarks on the subject might be useful to our temperance friends, particularly at the present time, when we are threatened with another visitation of that formidable epidemic.

By the accompanying letter, you will perceive that my success in the treatment of Cholera was very considerable, and this I attribute to paying attention to the looseness of the bowels which generally precedes an attack; when this, the premonitory symptom, was checked at its commencement, I invariably found that the cure was certain, whilst, if allowed to proceed to the 2nd, or collapsed stage, it became in the vast majority of cases unmanageable.

I would, therefore, recommend immediate attention to bowel complaint, and as all medical men understand the treatment of diarrhoea, I feel that it is not necessary in this place to specify remedies. I would just wish to observe, with respect to the injudicious administration of intoxicating stimulants, I have never seen them do good, but rather harm; and I am persuaded that taken as beverages, they have a tendency to produce bowel complaint and even Cholera, particularly when that complaint is prevailing, so that I would advise our temperance friends not to be led away with the vulgar prejudice, that these drinks will guard persons from an attack, they will on the contrary, by depressing the vital powers of the system, leave the individual more open to the invasion of any prevalent epidemic, particularly such a depressing one as Cholera; attention to diet generally, and to drinks particularly, should be attended to, and in no case ought they to be of an intoxicating quality, warm clothing, such as flannel next the skin, and protecting the chest and stomach which contain organs vital to our existence—must not be neglected.

It is very satisfactory to know, that the generality of medical men who have observed the nature of Cholera, give it as their opinion, that it is not infectious, so that we need be under no apprehension, should duty or circumstances call us to minister to the wants of any of our neighbours, or fellow-creatures, labouring under the disease. I would then in conclusion, beg earnestly to impress on our friends what I have above remarked; namely, the first symptom of Cholera is looseness of the bowels, and that intoxicating drinks in my opinion are neither preservative, nor curative.

I am, Sir, your faithful servant,
R. L. PINCHING, Surgeon.

Townley Hall, Drogheda, Sept. 26th, 1832.

MY DEAR SIR,—As we are provisionally delivered from Cholera, Mr. Pinching, whom you recommended, returns to Dublin. It is but justice to him, and to your recommendation to say, that he has given very general satisfaction, both in respect of his attention and humanity, as well as of his success, which has been very great, as you will see by comparing the number of cases with the mortality.

I am, my dear Sir, your faithful servant,
B. BALFOUR, Surgeon-General.

Doings of Strong Drink.

THE FRENCH LADIES AND THE DONKEY DRIVERS.—At Marylebone court, on Friday, James Brown and Edward Lamb, both of them donkey drivers, a class of persons by whom robberies in the suburbs of London are very often committed, were placed at the bar before Mr. Broughton, charged under the following curious circumstances, with having robbed Madame Casenora, a dashing-attired French lady, residing in Leicester-square, of a green silk purse containing half a sovereign and 9s. 6d. in silver. Complainant stated that on the previous evening she and three other ladies went out for a walk as far as Hampstead, and on the heath they hired four donkeys of the prisoners. After riding about for some time, they alighted from their seats, and went into the garden of a tavern in order to obtain some refreshment. She (complainant) almost immediately afterwards missed her purse and money, and in consequence thereof she gave the prisoners into custody. In answer to the magistrate, complainant said: While riding upon my donkey, I pulled up to give 6d. to a poor woman, but she did not come close enough to me to rob me. I knew that after I had relieved her I returned my purse to my pocket. All four of the donkeys remained outside of the gate at the tavern, and so did the prisoners, who were waiting for us to come out, as we had not paid them for the hire of the animals.—Police constable 75 S said that the prisoners were searched at the station, but that neither the purse nor the cash was found.—Mr. Broughton (to Brown): What is your answer to this? Brown: I'll tell you all about it, your worship. The ladies get on the top of the donkeys, and I and my mate drove 'em as nicely and as decently as possible for a long while. They were all smoking cigars while they were mounted, and we had cigars too. They also paid for four or five pots of strong ale, which we drank among the lot of us; and, besides that, they were kind enough to pay for a lot of biscuits for the animals. On the road one or two of the ladies tumbled right off into the road, and we had the trouble of picking 'em up, and clapping 'em right bang on the saddle again. I know nothing about the "puss" nor the money.—Mr. Broughton: This seems to be a very curious story altogether. To the officer: Did the ladies appear to have been drinking? Officer: Yes, sir; they were certainly rather "elevated." The other prisoner, Lamb, asserted his innocence.—Madame, on being questioned by the magistrate, said she was not in the habit of smoking cigars when she was in London, but she thought there was no harm in indulging in that way when out for a little recreation in the country. She further stated that, in regard to what had been stated respecting the ale, that the donkey drivers drank the greater portion of it. Brown said it was no such thing, and that the ladies took quite as much as their share of the "lot."—Jones, the usher of the court, said that Madame's face was grazed, and that it was evident she had had a fall, as had been described. Mr. Broughton was of opinion that the case was not strong enough against the prisoners to justify him in committing them, and he should therefore, for the present, discharge them both; they were, however, liable to be apprehended again if any stronger evidence could be got up against them.—Observer.

DIABOLICAL OUTRAGE—FOUR PERSONS SHOT.—On Saturday evening, between seven and eight o'clock, John Lallham, better known by the cognomen of "Happy Jack," who occupies a cottage and some land on the western side of Maiden-lane, King's-cross, came home intoxicated, and had a quarrel with his wife, who was also the worse for liquor, he took down an old musket, which hung over the mantelpiece, deliberately loaded it with powder and small shot, and fired at her. Several of the shots entered her jaw and lips, and her screams naturally attracted a number of persons on the spot, who, on learning what had happened, gave expression to their indignation. This proceeding excited the ire of Lallham, who, without warning, reloaded his musket, and, coming out into the road in front of his cottage, fired indiscrimi-nately amongst the people, and a poor woman, named Eliza Carter, residing at No. 4, Adam's-cottages, Maiden-lane, two boys, one named Henry Chapman, living with his parents, at No. 4, Randall's Row, and the other named Robert Green, were severely wounded. The miscreant (who is said to be 86 years of age) loaded his piece a third time, but it was wrested from him before he could fire it off. Mrs. Carter and the two boys were conveyed to the Royal Free Hospital, where they yet remain in some danger. Lallham was taken into custody.—Observer, October 9th.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—Elizabeth Workman was the third female who was brought up, charged with having attempted self-destruction.—The prisoner had been pulled off the parapet by a policeman, as she was about to fling herself into the river. Her husband declared to the officer who saved her that she was in the habit of consuming all his earnings in gin, and he did not at all wonder at the attempt.—The prisoner said it was true the gin did overcome her, and she was afraid her husband would thump her, and she had taken his money on Saturday night, and had nothing to return to him but herself.—The Lord Mayor ordered that the prisoner should be confined until she procured bail for her good behaviour.—Standard of Freedom.

NOT IN TROUBLE BEFORE.—On Monday, amongst the night charges brought before Mr. Broughton, one was preferred against a highly respectable looking middle-aged man, who, at the station-house, gave his name John Thomas, and described himself as an architect, residing in Gillingham Street, Vauxhall Bridge Road, it however turns out that his proper name is Whitelaw. Sergeant Battersby, 4 D, deposed that on Saturday night between 11 and 12 o'clock, as he was on duty in Baker Street, Portman Square, he saw the prisoner walk up to a genteel looking woman and assaulted her in a grossly indecent manner. Other charges of a similar nature were preferred against the prisoner. Mr. Broughton was he drunk or sober? Witness, "He was drunk sir." The prisoner on being asked what he had to say, replied, that if he had committed himself in the way stated, he was extremely sorry; he had partaken too freely of wine with some friends, and had not been in any serious trouble before. Mr. Broughton gave him a suitably severe lecture, and fined him £2. or a fortnight's imprisonment in the house of correction.—Weekly Dispatch.

A DRUNKEN FREAK.—MANSION HOUSE.—Richard Fubbes, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having, in a fit of intoxication, taken a dive into the Thames, on Monday night, at a quarter-past ten o'clock.

A policeman upon going to the neighbourhood of the bridge, saw the defendant go down the steps at London-bridge, near Fishmongers' Hall, at the time above stated, and soon afterwards he heard a splash in the water. He quickly found that the defendant had got into the river, and was struggling there for his life, and he managed with assistance to rescue the unfortunate man from his most dangerous condition. Upon being taken to the hospital the defendant was quickly restored to consciousness and sobriety, and it was believed that he had actually mistaken the river for his bed.

It was the belief of those who stripped the defendant for the purpose of administering the necessary remedies in cases of drowning that he had, in endeavouring to secure a comfortable bed to himself, tumbled head over heels into the water.

The defendant's wife and friends attended, and expressed much astonishment at the occurrence; and nothing was further from their thoughts than the suspicion that he had ever meditated self-destruction.

SECRETARY'S NOTES OF A RECENT TOUR.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," so says the adage; and so for the purposes of health and recreation, as well as to add to our stock of limited information, we bade adieu to London for a few days, and proceeded by train on the morning of the 18th of August, on our way to Scotland, calling at Howden in the county of York. It was our intention to hold a meeting in this town, but circumstances did not allow. Alas! how often do circumstances alter cases. One goeth and another cometh, "Friend after friend departs," and the temperance cause in this town has lost, by death, one of its ardent promoters; but "his works do follow him," and "fresh as dew-drops" will long be remembered. To all human appearance, our lamented friend could ill be spared, for the number of energetic persons in this locality, alive to every good word and work, we fear is lamentably few. The town is more remarkable for its noble specimen of ecclesiastical architecture, (the relics of other days,) and its October horse fair, than for its Mechanics Institutes, or Reading Rooms. Indeed, neither exists, yet since our last visit, some two years ago, new public-houses have been opened, one of which is a pigmy imitation of the gin-shops of London. Is it not lamentable that here as elsewhere, while large sums of money can be raised to minister to the carnal appetites of the people,—that while inducements are thus held out to take the rising manhood and womanhood of our country by craftiness, so little should be attempted by way of raising the intellectual and moral tone of the people? Would that some angel would go down and trouble the waters. Yet the salt of the earth has preserved even here from total putrefaction; and we encourage, not depress the attempts made by a few who stand out in bold relief, as lights placed on a candlestick—as cities set upon a hill.

Having shared the hospitality of our Howden friend, we departed on the afternoon of the 21st for Hull, amid torrents of rain. It was a hydro-pathic Jouche on so large a scale, that we fain would have remained "a little longer," but time and tide wait for no man, neither in ordinary cases does the railway, so away we went, and all agog to dash through thick and thin, as poor Cowper says. At Hull we were detained two days, as no steamer sailed for Leith before Wednesday. This afforded us opportunity to pay our respects to our old friends, with whom we had passed not a few happy hours, long, long ago; also, to attend two public meetings, and to note the advances made by the temperance reformers of this great sea-port town. Dr. William Gordon, on hearing of our arrival, kindly sent to us a similar warm and courteous invitation to those we had the pleasure to receive on former occasions. This truly christian physician, is the "poor man's friend," we never remember to have met with one, who desires more sincerely the good of the humbler classes. This endears him to the poor, while his standing as a man of science and as an author, command the esteem of the rich and the learned, though perhaps being an original thinker, he is often at issue with his own profession. He and his son-in-law, the Rev. Newman Hall, are devoted temperance reformers, they are frequently from home together on a temperance mission, and are regarded as Gemini, or as twin stars in the circle of their benevolent operations. There are some three or four branches of the temperance society in Hull, each conducted by a committee; we hope this dividing of the forces, will not weaken the general body. Meetings are held almost nightly, and when a stranger is expected, a large auditory is sure to be the result. The two meetings we addressed were large and very attentive, and appeared deeply impressed by the speeches delivered. We cannot but pronounce the cause, so far as we were able to judge, in a very healthy state, which owes, we believe, much of its prosperity to the untiring zeal of Mr. Smithies, the town missionary employed by the Christian Temperance Society of the Borough. The good done here, and in other places, proves that every town should have its temperance missionary, a person duly qualified by physical strength not less than by mental and moral qualifications, and possessing with these a heart overflowing with the "milk of human kindness," one sincerely anxious to be made a blessing to the poor degraded outcasts of society, whom he is called to visit. Such employment may be irksome, it may meet with little reward, but to teach men and women fallen and ruined, that they may rise even at the eleventh hour to comfort, respectability, and to favour with God; this we say is a blessed work, but this is digression.

At half-past one, p. m., on Wednesday the 23rd, we were floated out from the harbour, and were soon "going a-head" down the noble Humber. Every body knows, who understands a map, what sort of a coast we pass between Hull and Scotland. The bold headlands, light-houses, and other objects of interest, were we suppose, just as interesting to us as to any body else, and so no one will care to have them described—"A blade of grass, is a blade of grass all the world over," said Dr. Johnson to Sam Foote, when the latter kicked up his heels in ecstasy on their first landing in France, "let us go on and see men and manners wherein they differ," said the Hercules of literature. One thing we observed, that at the dinner-table very little was drunk of intoxicating liquors, the old fashioned practice of a glass of "best brandy-and-water" after dinner, to prevent sea-sickness, was not dispensed with, but only compare the very moderate quantity drunk now, and in days gone by, and the improved deportment of captain and crew and passengers on board ship, needs excite no surprise.

Passing on the morning of the 24th, the Fern Islands and the memorable spot, the scene of Grace Darling's dauntless exploits, we soon began to near the Frith of Forth, and after a voyage of twenty-four hours we landed below Leith, at Granton Pier. We were now in Scotland, and had every thing to see, and every thing to learn. We were soon conveyed by rail to the classic city of Edinburgh. Nothing struck us so soon, being on the look out for a resting-place, as the number and quality of the temperance hotels as compared with England. We had not been prepossessed in favour of the cleanly habits of our countrymen on the other side of the border, and even now think that mechanical and chemical unison of soap and cold water and the outer man of the masses, would be well if it were more frequent; still the temperance hotels that we visited are infinitely superior in cleanliness and general management to any thing we have seen, barring some very noble exceptions, in any part of England. We have often been asked to recommend to parties about to visit the provinces, a suitable temperance hotel at which to locate, which has often been to us a great puzzle. Does anybody imagine, that commercial men and others, will leave the comforts and conveniences of an hotel of the old school, to be badly accommodated, at a first rate price, at some of the temperance houses in this country? It is idle to say, that houses of respectability would not be adequately supported, let the experiment be fairly made, and then it will be time enough to talk of failure. It is our opinion founded upon long observation, that nothing would so soon win over from the inns and taverns those who are now the frequenters of them, as the introduction of suitable houses, where the same kind of accommodation could be had, apart from the temptations to vinous indulgence. These houses should be made homes for travellers, reminding you as much of home as possible, and not as too many now are, one remove only from public-houses, to which our enemies point in triumphant derision.

In Scotland, we saw what strangers in general see, with this difference perhaps, we saw something more. We were on the look out, not only for castles, monuments, towers, observatories, rivers, lakes, and "story-telling glens,"—we sought not only "to muse on ancient mountain brows," to drink of "old and fabulous wells,"—to brood o'er battle-fields, "where valour fought in other days,"—or "where'er the old inspiring genii dwelt;" to seek "ought that could arouse, expand and refine the soul;" but, descending from these lofty points of feeling, we at least were determined to see something of districts and objects less refined and classical. Accordingly, we traversed the highways and byeways of Canon-gate and Cowgate in Edinburgh, and Salt Market Street, and streets adjacent, in Glasgow, which we regard as the ne plus ultra of all that is physically and morally degrading.

If the proposition of Rasselas, that the "sight of human misery is necessary to the possession of human happiness" be true, then let all travellers visit one spot only which we visited, in Glasgow, and which, for stench and darkness, as much resembles the Black-hole of Calcutta as anything we can divine. We groped our way down one avenue, not knowing whither we went; and when we found ourselves at a point beyond which we could not proceed, we were just able to discern, that in a damp and cold recess, in the midst of filth and noxious exhalations, human sufferers had taken up a lodgment. Yes, we actually conversed with people whom we did not fairly see; and yet for these wretched and pestiferous habitations, into which the light of heaven never darts its rays, nor a fresh current of air penetrates, parties there are who assume the title of landlord, and receive from 7*d.* to 10*d.* a-week rental. Equally, too, as in the most degraded districts of London, we met with squadrons of little urchins, who have long matriculated in vice, or, in the language of Lord Ashley, "these naked, filthy, roaming, lawless children, the seed-plot of nineteen-twentieths of the crime," are crowded together in dense masses, objects, indeed, of christian commiseration.* We turned out from

* Lest any one should suppose the picture overdrawn, we insert the following note from Knight's Land we live in:—

WHISKEY DRINKING IN GLASGOW.

It is impossible to walk up the Saltmarket and the High-street without a feeling of astonishment at the facilities afforded for pouring pennyworths of whiskey down the throats of the densely-packed inhabitants of that neighbourhood. The "stores" and "cellars" are frightfully numerous. They are seldom, it is true, indued with the gin-palace splendour of the London houses; nor is the liquor there sold such a villainous compound of drugs as too often goes by the name of English gin; but it is difficult to conceive that such an immense mass of strong spirit can be taken without the body, mind, and purse of the drinkers being deteriorated. In the High-street, near the University, there were a few months ago four spirit-houses in a row, without any others intervening; and from thence down to the Clyde they occur much more thickly than in any part of London. In the Saltmarket alone, out of less than two hundred houses, there are no fewer than fifty spirit dealers and vintners! The consumption of malt liquor is by no means excessive; and a stranger can this quarter, and near at hand, we saw, amid this worse than Hottentot barbarism, a placard announcing that a celebrated divine, from London, would preach a sermon on Christian Union, while, a little further on, we listened to a congregation in "harmonic numbers joined," lifting their thoughts to heaven. How little, thought we, are these parties aware of the actual state of things, though they themselves are in the midst of this great Sahara of desolation. We would not be so wanting in charity towards the great body of professing christians in this country, as to question their want of sympathy with suffering and degraded human nature, when brought in contact with it; but because they explore not the hidden recesses of darkness, they remain ignorant, and "ignorance is bliss." Such persons should put themselves under the direction of Mr. Logan, the David Nasmyth of temperance missionaries; a morning's exercise of this sort would much contribute to their enlightenment. Christians would do well to go occasionally, and take a nearer view of humanity. It would furnish topics for reflection, which their own paucity of language would fail to depict. How often is that prayer uttered,—

"O! let thy word prevail to take away
The curse of human nature. Spread the law,
As it is written in thy holy book,
Throughout all lands. Let every nation hear
The high behest, and every heart obey.

Such is the devout wish of every Christian; but such hallowed aspirations proceed most sincerely from him, and him only, who, while not unmindful of the gross darkness of other lands, is solicitous that the light which God hath given to every man to profit withal, be not extinguished at home, to his own and his country's condemnation.

Nothing contributes more to foster the appetite for ardent spirits, and especially among the women, as the practice of vending intoxicating liquors by the grocers of Scotland. In Edinburgh and Leith, Mr. Johnstone informed us, "there are about 340 grocers, and out of the whole, there are not more than ten who do not sell intoxicating drinks." Women of dissipated habits can thus easily obtain, under the cognomen of soap or candles, (husbands not being supposed to understand what quantity should be consumed,) a quantum of whiskey. The temptation on the part of the shopkeeper to indulge his customers is the greater, inasmuch as, by the law of Scotland, no debt incurred by the purchaser of whiskey can be recovered, if the defendant choose to challenge the grounds of liability. This law, we believe, has reference only to the drinking of spirits on the shopkeepers' premises.

In Glasgow there are about 2,200 places where intoxicating liquors are sold. Who can wonder then at the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noon day? Yet neither in Glasgow nor in Edinburgh did we observe those outward attractions which the gin-shops of London present. The system of drinking is evidently more quiet and dissimilar to the English system, but the results are the same over all the country. We had elsewhere said, might not the legislature do a service to the nation by the erection of houses similar to our County Lunatic Asylums? That these houses might not inappropriately be styled RESTRAINERS, in which men and women, openly and notoriously drunkards, might be restrained from cursing the nation with a race of inebriates, who hardly avoid remarking how few are the butchers' or "fleshers" shops in the humbler neighbourhoods, and how poor is the quality of the meat there exposed. A little more beef and a little less whiskey would not make the Glasgow operatives any poorer in pocket: would not the change be advantageous in some other respects?

live and move and have their being, for little else than as "canker rots" at the root of Society, or as blights on the opening buds of civilization. This idea is in part carried out on the Drunken Island, as it is called, in Loch Lomond. During a sail down this enchanting lake, the passengers were pointed to many natural objects, among the rest to an island, on which is situate two or three farm houses, where reside females who being incorrigible in the vice of intemperance, or deemed incurable, are placed by their friends under restraint, on anti-whiskey treatment. In lapse of time, if signs of amendment are visible they return to their homes, which is frequently tantamount to returning again to former scenes of temptation. We shall long remember our trip of Monday the 28th of August. We returned to Glasgow in the evening, and according to previous invitation and arrangement, met a company of intelligent gentlemen (the Executive of the Scottish Temperance League) over a friendly cup of tea, at the Eagle Hotel. This hotel is decidedly the most aristocratic house, conducted on temperance principles, in the kingdom. The accommodation is just what you obtain at a first-class hotel. Commercial-rooms, dining-rooms, suits of apartments for private families, coach-houses, and baiting-stables, can be had at the same charges as at other hotels, but one thing minus, no intoxicating liquors are obtainable on the premises. The Executive of the Temperance League are a band of noble fellows, and though a stranger to the company (with the exception of Messrs. M'Kenna and Logan) we soon felt that each possessed —"a heart whose tone Beat to the music of our own."

This interchange of thought and sentiment was very delightful, as demonstrative of the good will of our Scottish friends to their English neighbours,—as proof that the same hopes animate the breasts of both,—looking for, and hastening unto, the same blessed realization. We attended but one public meeting in Scotland, that was in Edinburgh, but it was such an one as to make us feel very desirous to be present on a like occasion. We were rather behind time, for we had stopped to see the issue of a "drunken fracas," as Robert Burns has it. The large church, of the Rev. Mr. White, was densely thronged, the platform not excepted—on which were seated the Rev. William Reid, and other distinguished friends of the movement. Although there was a host of speakers, and each speaker a host, we were by courtesy allowed to speak ad libitum, of which we certainly took advantage, and was agreeably surprised that a Scotch auditory should exhibit so much fervour and enthusiasm. Every appliance seems to be set on foot, in Edinburgh, to stem the torrent of whiskey-drinking. Public meetings, missionary effort and juvenile societies, all are checking the streams of dissipation that had threatened to overwhelm the people.

By an early train, we left on the morning of the 31st for Berwick-on-Tweed, and from thence we proceeded to Newcastle-on-Tyne. We have an old friend in this town, whom we were wishful to see, and who prevailed upon us to remain over the night, more especially as it was the weekly meeting of the Parent Society. We made our début in the evening, at the public meeting; again we were allowed to supersede an able exponent of our cause, Mr. Bormond, who is a workman of good repute. Mr. W. H. Buchanan took the chair, and delivered a very interesting address. Mr. B.'s sphere of operation, however, is not so much the platform, but he goes from house to house, and gives humanity

"a leg up," for which many will bless him when "time shall be no longer." We looked round here, as elsewhere, at the "Lions" of the place; and again, by an early train, on the following morning, (1st of September,) we were on the line for York, where, having "baited" our engine, we started for Leeds. We just had a glance at our friend Dr. Lees, and that universally-beloved good man, Mr. John Andrew, and then away again were we for Derby. Here we thought it due to our jaded self to take repose for the night. Before we did so, we sallied forth to spy out whether any of the "free and independent electors" were "flown with insolence and wine." All was quiet, though but a few hours before, the four candidates for parliamentary honours had been put in nomination. Saturday, the 2nd, was polling-day. Messrs. Bass, Heyworth, Lord, and Freshfield, each was confident he should win the Derby. But our friend Lawrence Heyworth, who retired some time ago from Stafford, rather than jeopardise his consistency as a teetotaler, together with Mr. Bass, of Pale Indian Ale celebrity, were duly returned at the close of the poll to St. Stephen's; and we, being duly qualified with a railway ticket, were returned to London.

DEATH OF RICHARD HICKS, Esq., SURGEON.

The adoption of the principles of entire abstinence from fermented and spirituous drinks, while it improves the health, and tends to the prolongation of human life, does by no means exempt men from those diseases which are wholly independent of alcoholic agency. Of this we have recently had melancholy proof, in the death of Mr. Hicks of Argyle Square, whose demise took place on the 7th of October. The number of medical men who have openly espoused our cause, is few indeed as compared with the great body of the faculty,—the loss, therefore, of the deceased gentleman is the more to be regretted as he was a warm and able defender of the scientific doctrines held by intelligent temperance reformers. Mr. Hicks was a member of the Committee of the National Society. At a meeting of the board held on the 11th ultimo, it was resolved:—

"That this committee have heard with deep regret of the decease of their late respected fellow-labourer, Mr. R. Hicks, whose upright and consistent course as a Christian abstainer, had greatly endeared him to the friends of this movement, and whose loss will be much felt in the present aspect of the temperance reformation."

DEATH OF MR. WILLIAM DONALDSON.

DEAR SIR,—The deceased previous to the formation of the Teetotal Society in London, was employed by the British and Foreign Temperance Society, but he brought down upon him the displeasure of that body by the advocacy of teetotal principles. He was one of the first, if not the first man, who publicly advocated teetotalism in the metropolis, and from that time to the day of his death, teetotalism was as dear to him as his life. He was instrumental in introducing the subject into the town of Hull, and, I believe, his name stands first on the list of that flourishing society. He endured hardness like a good soldier; and though often cast down he was not destroyed. He wore the harness of his warfare to the last, and with a heart bleeding for suffering humanity, and a faith that made Christ to him the altogether lovely, on the 2nd of September last, he

"His body with his charge laid down,
And ceased at once to work and live."

T. WHITTAKER.

Metropolis.

FAIR STREET, HORSLEYDOWN.

The eleventh anniversary of the County of Surrey Temperance Association, was held in the Lecture Hall of the above place, on Monday evening, October 23rd, 1848. About 150 sat down to a plentiful repast of tea and cake, &c., provided for the occasion. At seven o'clock, according to announcement, the public meeting commenced; in the absence of John Cassell, Esq., through indisposition, Mr. Thomas Hudson, Secretary of the National Temperance Society, was warmly and unanimously voted to the chair. Mr. H. opened the business of the evening very appropriately, by referring to the arrangements in progress for a great meeting of the friends of universal peace at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday, the 31st instant, to receive the President and Vice-Presidents of the Peace Congress, recently held at Brussels, alluding especially to the necessity existing that these gentlemen should add to the noble virtue of peace, the no less honourable and necessary one of true temperance, as promotive of their own principles. The respected chairman then called on Mr. Buckle, who delivered a neat argumentative speech, which was well received, followed by our loquacious and highly amusing friends, Mr. T. A. Smith and Mr. T. Whittaker, who provided each a rich fund of entertainment for the highly-respectable audience assembled. The chairman then concluded by calling attention to the financial department of the Society, which was reported to be in a healthy condition.

BOROUGH OF GREENWICH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Probably a little intelligence of our proceedings in this populous and important borough, may not be without interest to the readers of the Chronicle, who I am happy to find are becoming, and are likely to become, much more numerous than hitherto. I am the more desirous to make this communication, as the operations of this society are conducted, in many respects, somewhat differently to those of most others.

Our meetings (which are held on the first Thursday evening in every month, in the Literary Institution.) have been continued uninterruptedly since our commencement in 1846, and in addition to these, we have had several special scientific and other lectures, thus diffusing no little amount of information on the great subject of temperance.

I might perhaps mention, that among the gentlemen who have honoured us by their advocacy, during the past year, are comprised the names of Benjamin Rotch, n.c.r., William Cash, Rev. William Lucy, and J. English, (vice-presidents of the association;) Revs. J. Kennedy, Squier, and Henry Robinson; Drs. Carr, Lovell, and F. R. Lees; Messrs. Rickman, Campbell, P. Edwards, Smith, Culverwell, Hudson, Beggs, Whittaker, Gordelier, Gawthorpe, M'Currie; Honourable Judge Marshall, &c. &c., and I add without hesitation, that their various addresses have been characterised by a display of talent, earnestness, and power, unsurpassed probably in the aggregate, by any society whatever, temperance or otherwise.

We have been much encouraged by the increased attendance at these stated meetings, and by the realization of our belief, that, notwithstanding the many obstacles, it is possible to present our principles to the minds of the educated and reflective, so as, by the exhibition of charity, sincerity, and truth, to secure their attention, and ultimately their co-operation. We have already adjourned from the room we formerly occupied in the Institution to the largest class room in the building; but the last and previous month's meeting, brought together so large an assembly that accommodation could not be afforded to all.

The result of these efforts is, that our register-book shows a considerable increase of members, (all of whom pay to the funds five shillings annually, or sixpence monthly,) and there is little doubt that, under God, great and lasting good will be effected by our instrumentality, that many will be saved from habits entailing on all unnecessary expenditure, inducing physical disease, and on many, poverty, misery, and woe.

Our committee (the majority of whom I rejoice to say, are fully alive to the good work they have in hand,) intend after our anniversary in the ensuing month, to take into their serious consideration the propriety of forming a LADIES and likewise a YOUTH'S ASSOCIATION, in connexion with this society, believing that the advantages aimed at will then be more readily attainable, and should this suggestion meet the eye of any persons in this locality, who would be willing to assist in bringing about this desirable organisation, a note addressed to me, or to any of the committee will receive immediate attention.

Mr. Thomas Whittaker delivered in the Literary Institution here, on Wednesday evening, the 18th October, his celebrated lecture, entitled, "THE THREE TOWNS." The admission being by payment, (except from members) the attendance, as was to be expected, was not so numerous as at the monthly meetings of the association, notwithstanding, a large and respectable audience was present to listen to this humorous, highly interesting, and argumentative address,—an address which ought to be delivered in every mechanics' and public institute in the metropolis.

The chair was ably filled by Mr. Thomas Hudson, who introduced the lecturer in an appropriate and scholar-like speech. Such was the intense excitement produced by this Lecture, which must be heard to be appreciated, that a strong desire was manifested that it might be repeated at the next meeting of the association, (Thursday, 2nd Nov.) The committee, desirous to afford this gratification to their members, and the friends of temperance in this locality, have made the necessary arrangements (through the National Temperance Society) with Mr. Whittaker, the admission to which will be free.

Praying that the counsels of temperance reformers may everywhere be characterised by discretion and guided by wisdom.

I remain, Mr. Editor, faithfully yours,
H. COLE, Hon. Sec.

Blackheath Hill, 19 October, 1848.

Provincial.

EPSOM.

Our first anniversary is past, but the recollection of it will remain for many a year on the minds of that portion of the Epsom public who were privileged to be present. I will endeavour to give you a very short sketch of our proceedings. Benjamin Rotch, Esq., had engaged to be with us on the 4th of October, and his well known talents as a barrister, and an advocate of temperance principles, had caused us to look forward to the day with considerable pleasure and confidence, nor were our hopes for a moment disappointed. By five o'clock, the time appointed for the tea, a numerous and respectable company had assembled, most of whom, however, were strangers to the great moral reformation they were that evening met to hear discussed. Our female committee, had not been unmindful of the old adage, that the best way to an Englishman's heart, is through his stomach, for a more sumptuous tea, we seldom remember having partaken of on any public occasion, besides tea and coffee, sandwiches, biscuits, currant, and hot tea-cakes were abundantly supplied, and the entire management of the repast did them considerable credit, and prepared the meeting to receive good-naturedly, all the able speakers might have to communicate. Thanks having been offered, in song, by all present to our heavenly Provider, the chairman made a few remarks calculated to conciliate all, and called on Mr. Claridge to address the friends, which he did at some length, mainly urging the practice of total abstinence, as a Christian duty and a Bible truth.

Mr. Hudson was next summoned to labour in his noble vocation of calling men from the darkness, which custom and inclination have enveloped them in, to the light of truth and soberness; and he did so too, with an energy and aptness creditable to himself and serviceable to the cause.

The chairman had reserved himself till last, and though the evening was somewhat advanced, the utmost attention was manifested throughout the delivery of his deeply interesting and impressive, though oftentimes very amusing speech. The learned chairman somewhat objected to the grounds on which Mr. Claridge advocated our principles; and that for two reasons. 1st. Because the position taken by Mr. Claridge, was at best a disputed one; and 2nd, Because many impregnable arguments might be advanced, open to no such objection. The benevolent spirit and appearance of the chairman much endeared him to all, particularly the members of our infant society (about fifty in number,) and we again repeat, it will be long before we forget the pleasurable and profitable meeting of the 4th October, 1848.

With many thanks to your committee for their oft-repeated acts of kindness.

I remain, my dear Sir, yours truly,
THOMAS CAVE.

HASTINGS.

The good teetotal cause in this ancient Cinque Porte, and now fashionable watering-place, still progresses, and received a fresh impetus by a public tea-meeting, held on Wednesday, October 11th, at which about 150 persons sat down to enjoy the social entertainment. The chair was occupied by the Rev. W. Evans, Baptist minister, and suitable and energetic addresses delivered by Messrs. H. Sinden, F. Beck, Secretary to the Society, F. Streeter, W. Ransom, Jun., editor of the Hastings News, and by J. Pitter. At the close of the meeting, ten signatures were obtained. Our circulation of the Chronicle is forty monthly, and to this we attribute much of the general stability of our Society.

QUORNDON, NEAR LOUGHBOROUGH.

STR.—For some time, a few persons in this large village have felt anxious to arrest the progress of intemperance. Last night, we were favoured with a deeply-interesting lecture from my highly-esteemed friend, the Rev. Dr. Burns, of Paddington. Between thirty and forty persons have signed the pledge; and we hope, by prudence and perseverance, to establish a useful society.

September 22nd, 1848. J. STADDON.

CHESTERFIELD.

Mr. Inwards, in the month of August, delivered three lectures in this town, to overflowing audiences, all of which were received with a welcome no words can describe. The simple eloquence of the orator went to the heart, and produced impressions in favour of our cause that will not easily be erased from the minds of those who heard him. Numbers were induced to sign the pledge, and numbers who have not added their names to our list, have confessed that Mr. Inwards had fully convinced them, that the cause he so ably advocates was founded on truth, and must ultimately prevail.

In the same month, Mr. Inwards delivered a lecture on the "Trial of Alcohol," at Brompton, a village about a mile from Chesterfield, and was the means of leading many to sign the pledge.

During the present month, he has also visited Stavelly, a village four miles from Chesterfield, and was there received with manifestations of enthusiasm that was calculated to remind the beholder of the reception of Cobden and Bright, in the days of corn-law agitation. His address was pathetic and convincing, and his appeals rewarded by proofs of conversion to our cause.

Since that period, Mr. Inwards has delivered another lecture in Chesterfield, on "Teetotalism the temperance of nature." The audience was riveted; never do we remember seeing so large a meeting so silent and attentive. The lecturer on this occasion almost surpassed anything we have ever heard on total abstinence. His displays of eloquence, his vivid depictions of the misery the drinking-usages had produced, the beautiful connexion between nature and temperance he exhibited, and the fertile imaginative powers he called into action, were inexpressibly instructive, and calculated to arouse to thought, those who had long been dead to virtue and truth.

Such is the opinion of the majority of those who heard Mr. Inwards, and that gentleman has only to be announced here, and our lukewarm cause, and equally lukewarm people, shake of their dulness, and rush to hear him.

J. JOHNSON SAYER, Hon. Sec.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.

DEAR SIR,—I have the pleasure of informing you that the friends of the total abstinence cause here, were very much delighted with a lecture delivered in the Temperance Hall, on Friday, September 22nd, by our valued friend Mr. T. Hudson, who in the first part of his address laid before the meeting such a large amount of evidence, collected from the report of the different coroners, of the number of deaths in their respective districts, by which it was made to appear that strong drink was the primary cause. He then shewed his audience in strong but persuasive language, the necessity of at once and for ever abandoning that drink which had been the cause of such awful and sudden destruction to the people. Yours truly,

D. TRIBUTE, Secretary.

NORWICH CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The members and friends of this society assembled on Friday evening last, in Tombland Chapel, for the purpose of hearing from Mr. G. W. McCree, an account of his missionary labours in the city.

The meeting was opened by singing and prayer, after which, Mr. S. Jarrold was called to the chair, and made a few observations on the objects of the mission.

Mr. M'CREE then rose, and after a few remarks, divided his subject into the following heads:—First, The moral condition of the city; Second, The plan of labour he had adopted for the improvement of that condition; Third, The character of some of the cases that had come before him; Fourth, The statistics of his labours; Fifth, The present position of the mission. In respect to his first division, the moral or immoral state of the city, Mr. M'Cree alluded to his statements to a large audience some time since; which statements, it was then thought, were full of fearful facts. He was grieved, however, now to tell them, that he had since found that, on that occasion, he did not reveal the whole truth. In the very midst of this great and influential city, there was an awful mass of ignorance, depravity, irreligion of the most revolting character, Sabbath-breaking, prostitution, adultery, intemperance, and every thing that was adapted to disgrace a man, and sweep his soul into perdition. Mr. M'Cree proceeded at considerable length to enforce the claims of the mission, and concluded by the following statistics of his labours. Since March 22nd, comprehending a period of six months and ten days, he had delivered seventy-seven temperance lectures, seventy of which were in the city. He had preached in chapels and mission rooms, seventeen sermons, and had delivered twenty-seven addresses to Day and Sunday-school children—total number of addresses 111. The entire number of persons who had attended the services was about 13,095. The number of visits he had paid was 824, and of tracts given away 1195. The number of pledges taken in Mr. M'Cree's book was 136, and in addition to these twenty-five drunkards had also signed. The greater part of these, he was glad to say, had kept their pledge. With respect to the prospects of the mission, he represented it as fairly established, and as requiring an immense amount of time and application to promote its interest.

The Rev. A. REED addressed the meeting at some length, on the value and expediency of total abstinence principles, and on the importance of Mr. M'Cree's labours, as a means of leading sinners, step by step, to the gospel of Christ; and gave some pleasing anecdotes of the immense good which had followed the exertions of the missionaries in and around London.

IRELAND.

The very Rev. Father Mathew, in compliance with the invitation of the Rev. Mr. Brennan, P. P., attended at the chapel of Paulstown, on Sunday, September the 3rd, and delivered a sermon to a crowded congregation. At the conclusion, he exhorted all to join the temperance movement. He continued to administer the pledge until after three o'clock, by which time 5000 had joined the total Abstinence Society. At the close of the proceedings, a deputation from the Graig Society presented the apostle of temperance with an appropriate address, to which Mr. Mathew made a suitable reply. Besides the clergy of the parish, there were also present, as spectators, the Right Rev. Dr. Haly, Rev. Dr. Walsh, Rev. Mr. Mulligan, and other influential personages.—Extract from Kilkenny Journal.

A GREAT TEMPERANCE MEETING AT DENBIGH.

October 11th and 12th, 1848, in the Independent, Wesleyan, and Calvinistical Methodist's Chapels, in rotation, different meetings were held. Two sermons were preached by the Rev. M. Jones, Bethesda, and Rev. E. Davies, Newmarket, on the subject of temperance.

The Rev. D. Price, Rev. Moses Parry, and Thomas Gee, Esq., (all of Denbigh) were called to preside over the public meetings. Powerful and scriptural speeches were delivered by Messrs. Jones, Davies, Ellis, Lewis, Edwards, Jones, &c. All the meetings were well attended, each time, notwithstanding a great many friends of temperance were engaged with the remnant of the harvest, as the weather was very favourable. About one hundred came forward to sign the temperance pledge, viz., the total abstinence pledge. It was clearly proved that nothing is true temperance but total abstinence, as almost all the intoxicating drinks of our country are utterly unsuitable, and even dangerous, to be used as common beverages.

In the Conference, it was resolved, "That a temperance assembly shall be held at Ruthin or Denbigh, in June, 1849, and a deputation from each Sabbath-school, belonging to all denominations, throughout the counties of Denbigh and Flint, shall be earnestly and affectionately invited to attend; so that the teachers of our Sabbath-schools should be impressed with the great necessity of urging upon the rising generation the value of temperance Societies, and joining the same in early life."

It was also resolved, "That all the friends of temperance in North Wales are deeply impressed, and feel great loss by the death of the late Rev. Humphrey Gwalchmai, and David Jones, Esq., who were instrumental in doing much good to the temperance cause, as well as to other public institutions in North Wales."

As it was a busy harvest-time, I have not attempted to hold regular public meetings of late, except in August, among the Welsh in London, where I delivered two lectures; one in Jewin Crescent, at the Calvinistical Methodist's Chapel, and the other in Guildford Street, Borough, at the Independent Chapel. Yours truly,

EVAN DAVIES.

Cleanings.

HABITS.—Man (says some one, Lord Bacon I believe) is a bundle of habits; if from this bundle you can take away those that are noxious, and introduce others which are good and serviceable, the probability is, that the mass will eventually be improved.—Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton.

PERSIAN SCHOOLS.—Xenophon's schools of equity in his life of Cyrus the Great, are sufficiently famous. He tells us that the Persian children went to school, and employed their time as diligently in learning the principles of justice and sobriety, as the youth of other countries did to acquire the most difficult arts and sciences.—Addison.

THE STARTING POINT.—I regard the first application of intoxicating drink (though the quantity may be infinitesimal) to the uninitiated palate of the child, as the starting point, to which all subsequent excesses must be referred, as with ancient Thebes, the catacombs of the dead commenced at the precise point which terminated the abodes of the living.—Editor.

A REASON FOR DRINKING.—Last night, as I was walking in the park, I met a couple of friends. "Pr'ythee, Jack," says one of them, "let us go drink a glass of wine, for I am fit for nothing else." This put me upon reflecting on the many mis-carriages which happen in conversations over wine, when men go to the bottle to remove such humours as it only stirs up and awakens. This I could not attribute more to anything than to the humour of putting company upon others that men do not like themselves. Pray, sir, declare in your papers, that he who is a troublesome companion to himself, will not be an agreeable one to others. Let people reason themselves into good humour before they impose themselves upon their friends. Pray, sir, be as eloquent as you can upon this subject, and do human life so much good, as to argue powerfully that it is not every one who can swallow, who is fit to drink a glass of wine.—Letter to the Spectator, vol. ii.

LASTING PLEASURE.—There is no lasting pleasure beyond the bounds of temperance, and multitudes have perished from forsaking her wholesome laws.—Petrarch's View of Human Life.

A FACT FOR THE BIBLE SOCIETY.—After the delivery of a short but very pointed speech by a labourer of the name of Bray, at the recent Tent Meeting, at Ruislip, Mr. Charles Henwood rose and stated that the previous speaker presented him (Mr. H.) with the first five shillings he had saved after signing the pledge, for the purchase of a copy of the scriptures.

INTEMPERANCE AND CRIME.

"Since the mighty mind of Bacon beat down hypothesis and introduced the inductive system, philosophy has reasoned from FACTS, and experimental philosophy has been applauded."—REV. WILLIAM JAY.

To exhibit the mutual relation between intemperance and crime is the object of the present paper, which consists not in vague abstract theories, but a collection of FACTS from the "Chaplain's Twenty-fifth Report on the Preston House of Correction, presented to the magistrates of Lancashire, 1848," kindly sent to us by the author, the Rev. John Clay. To put the reader as quickly as possible in possession of the startling statements contained in that document, we shall withhold further introduction, and present extracts and illustrations of the deep-rooted vice of drunkenness, which for the sake of perspicuity we have arranged under several heads, leaving the candid and unbiassed mind therefrom, to reason and to draw its own conclusions.

NAVVIES.

"The check to railway operations having thrown out of employ a large number of "navvies"—a reckless class, whose existence is almost made up of hard work and hard drinking, alternately.—an unusual proportion of these men have found their way into prison. In the year now under consideration, thirty-six of them were indicted at the sessions, and 146 were received under summary commitment. In the preceding year the total of sessions and summary cases was only ninety-one, and in the year before that only thirty-one. These men are from all parts of the United Kingdom, a large portion of them being Irish. Having too frequently dissipated their wages in drinking and other excesses, they wander towards their homes, or in search of work; they meet with old comrades who can afford to treat them to liquor, and they are, consequently, soon taken into custody for being 'drunk and disorderly.'"—p. 4.

JUVENILE CRIMINALITY.

"The boys and girls are sent out, systematically, to beg; but the temptations of a town, the thronged streets, the places of low amusement, the open doors of yards and dwellings, soon convert the little beggar into an adroit and bold thief. One instance out of many which have come under my observation, during the past year, will serve to illustrate this state of things. Six girls, whose ages varied from eleven to sixteen years, were committed together as 'rogues and vagabonds.' Their offence consisted in entering an unoccupied house, and pilfering whatever was capable of removal. Most of them had been driven out by their parents to beg; and, according to their own statement, were beaten or otherwise ill-used, unless they carried home a certain sum in the evening. They had been in the dangerous habit of lighting fires in the unoccupied house. They had formed an acquaintance with a boy employed in a dram-shop, who supplied them occasionally with stolen spirits, and with which some of these little girls got drunk. 'Worse remains behind.' The younger ones had been trained by the oldest to a kind of profligacy for which, at their early age, natural propensity could scarcely be alleged in excuse. All these girls were the children of Irish parents."—p. 5.

CLASSIFICATION OF OFFENCES.

"The fourth table in the appendix presents a classification of the offences for the last year, and also the means of comparing them with those of the previous five years. The following offences have decreased in frequency, viz., common assaults, from four to two; assaults on police, from four to none; breaking into shops, from ten cases to five; highway robbery, from six to one; larceny in dwellings, from thirty-seven cases to twenty-six; larceny in shops, from fifty-three to forty-five; in public-houses, from forty-seven to thirty-one; by work-people from employers, from fifty-four to thirty-four. It is certainly satisfactory to perceive these grave offences so decidedly reduced in number, during a period of severe and general distress. At the same time it may be observed that breaches of the law accompanied by violence, such as assaults, highway robberies, forcible entry into dwellings and shops, are usually most predominant when full wages lead to drinking, and that to the more daring crimes."—p. 6.

FEMALE OFFENDERS.

"In my report for 1843, I had occasion to observe—'I must revert to the fact of the small proportion of female offenders here; and I would suggest that in it we find what strengthens the opinion already advanced, as to the inadequacy of poverty alone to account for the amount of crime. Every one conversant with the condition and habits of the poor, knows that when distress falls upon their families, it is the mothers who feel it most poignantly. Too often they and their children are wanting necessary food, while their husbands are spending the last sixpence in the alehouse; too often, when the husband is 'on tramp,' seeking employ—or, still worse, when he has entirely deserted his family—the poor wife is left at home, to resist, as she may, the temptation to obtain by dishonesty the bread for which her children are crying.'—p. 7.

SUMMARY COMMITTALS.

"The increase in the whole summary committals of the last year over the two preceding years amounts to 244 males, and 91 females, caused, chiefly, by additions to the offence of vagrancy, begging, insubordination, drunkenness, &c."

"It is not to be wondered at, that, under the pressure of the times, a considerable increase should have taken place in vagrancy, begging, petty thefts punished summarily, insubordination in the work-house, &c., &c.; but it is strange and sad that, at the same juncture, drunkenness and disorderly conduct should be so aggravated!"—pp. 10, 11.

UNEMPLOYED OFFENDERS.

"The following summary shews the gradually increasing proportion of unemployed offenders since 1845, and also the comparatively slight variation in the yearly amount of offences;—the absence of all connection between the two, in the relation of cause and effect, is sufficiently obvious:

Years.	Com. to Sess.	Offends. unemp.	Cent. prop. unem.
1845	301	17	5.6
1846	289	21	9.3
1847	366	57	19.8
1848	343	108	40.8

"It is thus again manifest that full employ, or want of employ, has very little to do with the slight ebb and flow of criminality here. There is a certain portion of the great mass predisposed to dishonesty, which drink brings into prison, in good times, and idleness, in bad times."—pp. 13, 14.

HOW OLD DRUNKARDS SPEND THEIR TIME IN PRISON.

"J. S.'s statement, (under sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment). . . . "I have seen it frequent enough, after service on a Sunday, and more so then, because they had nothing else to do. Him that could tell of the best tricks, or the biggest lie, used to be best thought of in the yard. In the first place, there has been a set of old drunkards, telling how they have stolen this thing or the other, to get their spree out."—p. 19.

CAUSES OF CRIME.

"It is not to tell what changes come over men! Twelve months ago I was a sub-contractor on a Midland line. I had 400 men in my employ and a time-keeper at 30s. a-week, as I could not write myself, and now I am here! . . . All through drink!"

"These words were taken down by our excellent schoolmaster, as spoken to him by one of the innumerable victims of drunkenness. After having exhibited, for so many years, the miserable consequences of this vice, I scarcely know how to recur to it again, and present it under new features. The main outlines of the sad picture remain unchanged. The GREAT SIN is still, even in these times of poverty and sorrow, foremost in the ranks of iniquity, or rather foremost as the leader of a host of crimes,—heading on a disorderly multitude of brutal passions and vile propensities which, but for its inflaming influence, would remain dormant and harmless. It still rises, in savage hostility, against everything allied to order and religion: it still barricades every avenue by which truth and peace seek to enter the poor man's home and heart. It is not that I am at a loss for new facts connected with this sin; but the disgusting materials for commentary lie in so huge a heap, that it is difficult to extricate and arrange even a small portion of them. The concise memoranda in my 'character book' alone might be amplified into volumes. These are some of the excuses for crime—'I had been drinking all week with money I got from my mother.'

... I should have married a young woman; and I got £2. 10s. from her to buy furniture, but I drunk it all.' A boy of seventeen says,—'I had been to pay my footing; and I did this job while I was drunk.' . . . 'I had been drinking three days before I came here, and spent between nine and ten sovereigns.' . . . 'I received £2. 14s. on my master's account, and spent it all in two days—A man of forty-nine, who involved his son in the same crime of which he was convicted, said,—'I have been drinking, without stopping, for almost eight months.' The statements and narratives in the appendix supply further examples of the daily ruin wrought by this legion; and yet we profess to think that demoniacal possession has entirely fled before the advance of civilization and christianity."

"Any one reading the statements referred to, will see that now, as always, the prodigal begins his course by 'leaving his father's house.' The ignorant and headstrong lad, when he has reached

"In my report for 1843, I observed, 'Those who best know the poor, know their kind feelings towards each other when in distress. But their sympathy is sometimes sadly misdirected. An unemployed workman, with a destitute family, meets an acquaintance who is better off. The compassion of the latter is at once excited, but most injuriously exercised. Instead of giving a little real aid to the sufferer and his family, he spends five times as much in making him drunk.' Thus it is still. In the last year thirty-one men have been committed to the sessions, and 117 summarily, all of whom were out of employ at the time of their misconduct; and all of whose offences had arisen from the drink to which they had been treated. Three brothers were committed for three months each. Their 'drunken spree' commenced by one of the brothers and their father treating to liquor the two other brothers who were out of employ! Since writing the foregoing, I have conversed with an infatuated man about to take his trial at the ensuing sessions, who only a short time since returned from the hulks. He is a first-rate workman; and of superior natural intelligence; but he is now indicted for the fourth time—every offence having originated in drinking. He has a wife and family; and was out of employ at the time of committing this last criminal act. In my conversation with him, he spoke of the distress of his family; and I inquired from him, 'How did it happen that, being out of work, you were drinking?' He replied, in a tone as bitter as it was sad—'Why, sir, you can get drink given you when you can get nothing else!'" thirteen or fourteen years of age, 'runs away from home,' forms vicious connexions, 'gets agate drinking,' becomes the associate of poachers; soon adopts their axiom—'anything before nothing,' and is rapidly urged on to burglary, and worse."

"Whatever may be the predominant cause of crime, it is very clear that ignorance—religious ignorance—is the chief ingredient in the character of the criminal. This combines with the passion for liquor; and offences numberless are engendered by the union."—pp. 33, 34.

The autobiographies of criminal offenders are not less interesting than the foregoing, which we shall take leave to furnish to our readers in the January number of the Chronicle.

ON THE MUTUAL RELATIONS EXISTING BETWEEN INTEMPERANCE & INSANITY.

BY GEORGE ROBINSON, M.D.,

Lecturer on Medical Jurisprudence in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Medical School and Hon. Sec. to the Newcastle and Gateshead Sanitary Association.

(Concluded from p. 136.)

Having thus attempted to illustrate the connexion existing between these two great social evils, I may, in conclusion, offer a few remarks upon the remedies best calculated to diminish their frequency.

It requires but little observation and reflection to perceive that any permanent improvement in the habits, and consequently in the physical and mental condition, of the great mass of our population cannot be effected merely by reasoning or exhortation. For the accomplishment of this desirable end, we must rely rather upon our efforts to remove the causes which induce a state of mind favourable to the growth of vicious and intemperate habits than upon vows or promises uttered in a moment of temporary remorse or enthusiasm. A detailed examination of the causes of intemperance would be tedious and inadmissible; but there are two agencies which operate so extensively and powerfully in vitiating the habits of the poor, that they may perhaps, even on the present occasion, be briefly adverted to. They are—1. The excessive depression of the mental and vital powers, caused partly by the impurity of the air which they are compelled to breathe, and in part, also, by the discomfort and squalor of their homes. 2. The utter neglect of their moral education, in consequence of which they are left without any check upon their passions and desires, though exposed throughout life to more than ordinary temptations. And until these two evils are obviated, the advocates of temperance and the friends of religion will vainly attempt to check the progressive demoralization of a large proportion of the working-population of this country.

Nor is it difficult to show the connexion between these physical and moral defects and the production of insanity.

In proof of the influence of physical discomfort in inducing, first, vice, and through it insanity, I may refer to the return of the exciting causes of mental derangement furnished by a large asylum situated in the east of London; near those districts which the investigations of Dr Southwood Smith have rendered notorious as the seats of filth, disease, and misery. It there appears (Commissioners' Report, p. 100) that of the 241 cases enumerated, ninety-nine were induced by intemperance, and fifty-three by vice and sensuality, making the total number of cases from these sources amount to 152, being a proportion of 41·07 per cent. from intemperance alone, and 63·07 per cent. from it and other vices. This proportion is very much higher than that of any other asylum in the kingdom, amounting to nearly two-thirds of the total admissions; whereas in the estimate previously adopted as an average for England, we ascribed to these causes but one-third of the cases met with in asylums. And it is impossible to avoid the conviction that this great excess is chiefly referable to the dissolute and reckless habits generated amongst the inhabitants of the adjacent localities, by the discomfort of their homes and the depressing influence of an impure atmosphere. And with respect to the second cause above specified, it may be observed that all cases of insanity, resulting from the agencies now under consideration, and cases of moral insanity, however occasioned, are directly referable to one and the same radical defect in the mental constitution of those affected—viz., the absence of an adequate controlling power, whereby to regulate their actions and to render them amenable to the laws of reason and religion.

The development of this power of self-government, so indispensable to the personal happiness, the social prosperity, the intellectual vigour, and the moral integrity of each individual, should therefore constitute the unceasing, the first, the all-pervading object of education. And yet how lamentably deficient in this particular are most modern educational systems! It would be folly to hold up for imitation the sternness of ancient stoicism, or to bestow unlimited praise on the harsh training of the Spartan school; but it may be doubted whether our statesmen and public instructors have much surpassed those of Greece and Rome, either in their estimate of the importance of mental discipline, or in the adoption of systems calculated to diffuse throughout the community a spirit of magnanimity and virtue. For what is modern education? The eye is taught to admire the beauties of art, the ear is trained to a nice perception of all the modulations of harmony, the child studies the graceful carriage of its person, and learns to utter in foreign tongues the empty phrases of social intercourse. And having subsequently acquired a few maxims of conventional morality and economical virtue, the youth encounters the dangers and difficulties of the world, without any adequate provision having been made for the guidance and government of the noble intellect and immortal spirit of which that highly-cultivated body, with all its symmetry and structural perfection, is but the casket and the tool. In other cases, to use Dr. Pritchard's words, "too great sacrifices are often made to the cultivation of intellect, or even to the mere acquisition of knowledge, while the education of the moral affections is considered as a matter of secondary importance." And if the evils consequent on this preference of the material, the mercenary, and the sensual, be occasionally observed amongst the noble and the wealthy, how shall we describe the gloomy gulf of moral and intellectual nonentity into which the poor are plunged? Unprovided with higher sources of gratification, they are driven to seek enjoyment in sensual pleasures; and ignorant of the necessity for exercising over their actions a constant moral control, they yield to vicious impulses, and so swell the number of the criminal and the insane. There are, however, at length some indications of the advent of a brighter era, and we may confidently hope that an improved system of social legislation will ere long remove many of the existing causes of physical and mental disease, and so save the state much of that unnecessary expenditure which arises from its neglect of one of the first duties of a civilized government.

I cannot better conclude this rude attempt to direct attention to the importance of diminishing insanity, through the removal of its causes, than by presenting a brief extract from one of the Reports previously referred to:—"The subject of lunacy," say the commissioners, "has frequently been made a text for medical dissertation, and the income of a patient, his fitness for liberation, or the cause of his death, has occasionally become matter for inquiry, and has thus brought some facts before the public in the shape of a legal or equitable question affecting a particular case. But it has never been sufficiently taken up as a matter of general interest, nor has it ever been considered by the community in the light of a great national evil, spreading through different families, to which every remedy that medical science can suggest, and law can enforce, ought immediately to be applied."

OPIUM QUESTION.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

DEAR SIR,—The following paragraph appeared in a late number of the Medical Times:—

"CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM IN ENGLAND.—According to commercial statements it appears that the quantity of opium imported into this country is on the increase. Take the month of May, for instance. In 1847, during this month, 3083 pounds were admitted, whilst during the same month of the present year the quantity amounted to 7029 pounds. We trust that the progress made among the lower classes in habits of temperance, in a great measure owing to the valuable abstinence societies, is not counterbalanced by an increase in the number of persons addicted to that worst of vices, opium-eating. This matter deserves investigation."

As a vague impression exists in certain quarters that the increase in the consumption of opium has some connection with the growth of total abstinence principles, I desire to occupy a portion of your space by some remarks upon that fallacy.

Many years ago, it was thoughtlessly or mischievously asserted, that persons leaving off the use of drink, pretty generally resorted to opium as a substitute. On investigation being made in Lincolnshire, where it was said to occur, the statement was found to be without the slightest foundation. There are no doubt many instances where inveterate drunkards have become confirmed and incurable opium eaters; and some instances where persons leaving off the use of ardent spirits have taken to opium; but in either case, the one habit has grown out of the other. I propose, in the first instance, to examine the fairness of the statement made in the Medical Times, and then, as the subject is of some importance, account for the increase in the consumption of opium.

The writer, I perceive, puts in comparison the month of May, 1847, with the same month in 1848. There could not possibly be a more fallacious test. Such a fact is perfectly compatible with a decrease on the whole of the year. I have taken the trouble to consult the Government tables, and I find the quantities entered for home consumption as follows:

In the 9 months ending 10th Oct.,	1846,	20,049 lbs.
"	"	1848, 54,745 "

This shows a great increase, but not to the extent made out by the comparison contained in the paragraph referred to. It is an undoubted fact that the consumption of opium has increased; and we may now inquire how has the increased demand been created.

In the first place, it is a matter of familiar knowledge that opium is an ingredient much used in the adulteration of beer and porter. Accum in a Treatise on Adulterations of Food, published twenty years ago, stated, "The brewer is prohibited by Act of Parliament from using any other ingredients than malt and hops; and according to the evidence of the most experienced judges, the best malt liquor can be made out of these materials, and out of them only. The art then of the fraudulent brewer, consists in the discovery of other and cheaper ingredients, by which he continues to imitate the qualities of genuine beer or porter. In a practical treatise on Brewing (Child on Brewing) which has run through eleven editions, the author observes that 'malt, to produce intoxication, must be used in such large quantities as would very much diminish, if not totally exclude, the brewers profit.' Recourse must be had therefore to less costly materials; and though this practice is prohibited by several Acts of Parliament, the same author affirms that 'he could never produce the present-flavoured porter without them.' 'The intoxicating qualities of porter (he continues) are to be ascribed to the various drugs intermixed with it; and as some sorts of porter are more heady than others, the difference arises, according to this author, 'from the greater or less quantity of stupefying ingredients contained in it.'" He goes on to specify the substances with which beer is adulterated, among which are "molasses, honey, vitriol, grains of paradise, opium, extract of poppies, copperas, spanish liquorice, nux vomica, cocculus indicus, orange powder, ginger," &c. Since the time Accum wrote, there have been several reductions in the price of beer; and it is certain the brewers could not be remunerated now, without recourse to this system of adulteration. The practice is known to be on the increase; and yet the infatuated workmen rush to beer, and flatter themselves that the effects it produces are so many indications of its strength-giving properties. Did they know of what their favourite beverage is composed, they would most assuredly reject it.

But the increased consumption of opium has to be accounted for in another way:—the use of narcotic drugs as popular medicines. In the manufacturing and some of the agricultural districts, this practice, prevailing to an alarming extent, producing much suffering and disease, and preparing the way for habits of intemperance. It is found too, to be on the increase. Dr. Lyon Playfair made it a subject of special inquiry, and gives in his report the evidence of several druggists residing in various parts of Lancashire, as to the extent of the practice. A respectable druggist in Manchester is asked "if the poorer classes are much in the habit of using opiates." His reply is, "Of the really poorer classes, I may safely say that there is scarcely a single family in which this practice does not prevail. The way it is done is this: the mother goes out in the morning, leaving her child in charge either of a woman who cannot be troubled with it, or with another child of perhaps ten years old. A dose of quietness is therefore given to the child to prevent its being troublesome. The child thus drugged, sleeps and may awaken at dinner-time; so, when the father and mother come home at night quite fatigued, and as they must rise early to begin work for the day, they must have sleep undisturbed by the child ; so it is again drugged, and in this manner young children are often drugged three times a day." He says further, "I sell in retail alone, about five gallons per week of 'quietness,' and half a gallon of 'Godfrey ;' the former preparation contains 100 grains in an ounce, a single tea-spoonful is the prescribed dose, so that allowing one ounce weekly to each family, this one druggist supplies 700 families every week. The same druggist was asked, "Do you consider that the practice is on the decrease? —Quite the contrary, I am sure it is very much on the increase, and it is now finding its way into the middling classes."—It has been alleged that the sale of opium and laudanum has been much increased since the temperance movement; Do you know this to be the case?—"No! the sale has decreased among adults of late years, owing I think to the distress of the times." There is a great amount of evidence of a similar character. A druggist describes the appearance of the children: "You may know at once a child who is accustomed to the use of these drugs. It becomes so thin, that you feel nothing but bone. Its eyes get sunken and fixed, its nose pinched; in fact, such children look exactly like little old-wizened men and women. They sink off in a decline and die. I have often reprobated the practice to mothers: but their answer is, 'What are we to do, it is so very cross?'" Another druggist says, "It is curious to see the children in the shop; they stretch out their little hands, for they know the bottle; and when they get it, drink it as eagerly as the drunkard drinks his glass!" Another states, "I have seen the little children in the shop put the neck of the bottle in their mouths and bite the cork, so fond are they of the preparation; for coming to the shops so often they know the bottle." There is not space to multiply evidence; it will be seen at once that this fearful practice will account in a great measure for the consumption of opium. The results are truly mournful. A large proportion of these children die off at an early age, the survivors become diseased, ricketty, and consumptive, and many of them take to drinking spirits. One of the commissioners exclaims, "When compared with this frightful practice, the infanticide of China is merciful."

Yours truly,
THOMAS BEGGS.

METROPOLITAN MISSION

"Although the Committee's funds will not allow of the employment of so many missionaries as formerly, they have thought it right not wholly to abandon the important work of domiciliary visitation. Messrs. Balfour and Hodgson have been engaged in this department, with what success the following tabular statement will exhibit. In addition, the missionaries have been engaged, as already shown, in visiting seamen and emigrants in the Port of London, in obtaining signatures to the employers' certificate, and in the visitation of Day and Sunday Schools."

Extract from Sixth Report.

[Through the kind liberality of a gentleman, well-known for his philanthropy, the Committee are now enabled to employ a third missionary, Mr. Stoneman.]

No. 1.

DRINKING-USAGES.

Three hundred and sixty-one additional signatures have been obtained during the present quarter (from employers) to the certificate against the drinking-usages.

MEETINGS.

The missionary has attended and addressed various evening meetings, in different parts of the metropolis and suburbs.

The missionary has also made a tour into Yorkshire; and spoke in Hull, Selby, York, Leeds, and Wakefield, &c.—attentive and well-attended meetings.

PORT OF LONDON.

In this important field of labour the missionary in the last quarter visited—

RICHARD HODGSON.

UXBRIDGE.

The friends at Uxbridge having applied for a missionary, Mr. Stoneman was recommended. The following is his report: I commenced my labours August 7th, and finished September 9th. There are many individuals in Uxbridge who understand the temperance question, but numbers know little and care less about the cause, others are willing to hear the principles of total abstinence explained, and received the tracts well and kindly. On my first visit, I found a general apathy prevailing in Uxbridge, on the subject of teetotalism. On subsequent visits, I found many whose attention was becoming alive to the cause, and I was successful in inducing many others to commence a fair trial of the system, while others signed the pledge, being convinced in some cases of the necessity, and in others, the propriety of so doing.

Among the opponents of the cause, none are more determined, in Uxbridge, than the doctors. No sooner does a teetotaler unfortunately require the assistance of a medical man, than porter, beer, or wine is invariably ordered. No matter what disease, no matter the circumstances of the poor unfortunate, the porter, beer, or wine, is made the sine qua non of recovery.

A mother and five children had been teetotalers five years. The mother becoming ill, was ordered by the doctor to take beer,—she took it (as medicine of course), and has continued to do so to the present, a period of two years. Her children also, all broke the pledge.

A widow and her family were teetotalers seven years. She was obliged to apply to the parish doctor, who ordered her to take a pint of porter per day. She refusing, he threatened to deprive her of her parish allowance, and in fear of losing that, the poor woman conformed to the doctor's orders. I induced this woman and her children to re-sign the pledge.

A drunkard and inveterate snuff-taker of forty years' standing, was induced to sign the pledge, and to forsake both these disgusting habits.

A man who had been a teetotaler six years, fell again into intemperate habits. He was met with by the missionary, who succeeded in inducing him again to sign the pledge. His wife and six children also signed.

A woman who took very little drink herself and whose husband is a drunkard, signed the pledge in the hope her husband might eventually be induced to do the same.

All the tradespeople in the town have been supplied with temperance publications which have excited considerable interest.

I succeeded in paving the way for the future visitation of the Union-house.

A great number who are trying the principle promised to attend at the next meeting, and there to sign the pledge.

The following summary of my labours will shew that they have not been altogether in vain.

WILLIAM STONEMAN.

AN URGENT CALL TO SUPPLY A GREAT WANT.

Instead of writing on some point of medical treatment, allow me to suggest a plan, this month, to be started with the new year.

The great thing to weigh with medical practitioners is EXPERIENCE. They are accustomed to treat diseases after a certain known method; and into most of our methods alcohol enters as a supposed remedy. The question is, how can we get to know the results of non-alcoholic treatment? A case here, and another there, in private practice will occupy years (I was going to write centuries,) in accumulating the necessary amount of evidence. I propose then to open Dispensaries in a few of our large towns, for the express purpose of treating patients without one drop of alcohol, either as medicine or as diet. Let a careful record of cases be kept and published, and then let us note the results.

I should think £100 would do for one Dispensary for a year: say £60 for drugs and appliances, £20 for rent of a suitable room, and £20 for one who would act as dispenser and clerk. About six (out-)patients could be treated for each pound, so in one year (not a long time to wait,) according to the above plan 360 cases might be reported upon. Now if the drinking usages and the doctors' prescriptions are, as Mr. DUSLOR says, the two pillars of drunkenness, here is a feasible plan for undermining at least one of them!

I allow nothing for physicians' and surgeons' remuneration; they attend other Dispensaries gratuitously, and surely might assist in this most interesting and magnificent experiment. I contend not for gratuitous labour in general, but surely, if ever excusable it would be here.

A dispensary would provide only for out-patients, but then if the report was favourable to teetotal practice (as I doubt not it would be,) I think it would have weight enough to prevail on some one or more of our great hospital physicians and surgeons to try the non-alcoholic plan in some of their wards for twelve months.

Let me recommend this to the notice of teetotal editors.

Could not three places try, so as to get 1000 cases? Say London, Leeds, and Manchester. I shall be happy to head the first subscription list that opens, with a promise of £5.

RULES FOR PRESERVING HEALTH AND AVOIDING FEVER AND DISEASE.

Temperance, Cleanliness, and Pure Air are essential to Health.

RULE 1.—Very often open the windows and doors of rooms, and let the air go through.

2.—In the morning open the bed-room door and window, and let the air pass over the beds, at least half an hour before they are made up.

3.—Sponge the body with cold water, or bathe every day.

4.—Sweep out all rooms, passages, and stairs every day, wash them once a-week, whitewash at least twice a-year.

5.—Use as much water in your house as you possibly can.

6.—Never live on poor food in order to obtain money for drink.

7.—Walk in the open air as often as you can.

8.—When there is any fever or small-pox in your house, keep the rooms well-aired, and separate, if possible, the healthy from the sick. Do not then go or send your children into other people's houses unnecessarily, nor let others come into yours.

9.—Whether the patient dies or recovers, wash every article of clothing or bedding used. Get a bottle of solution of chloride of lime, sprinkle the bed and floor with it, and keep a plate of it on the floor. Bury the dead without any unnecessary delay.

Lastly, remember that typhus fever finds out the drunkard and fastens on him.—Journal of Public Health.

Doings of Strong Drink.

ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE.—J. Richman, residing at 44, Robinhood-lane, Poplar, was charged with attempting to cut the throat of his wife, Caroline Richman, and afterwards his own throat, whilst locked up on the charge at the Poplar station-house.—Mrs. Richman stated that for the last fortnight she had lived apart from her husband, owing to his violence when under the influence of liquor. She had been 18 years married to him and borne him five children. She met him by appointment on Sunday morning to make some arrangements for their coming together again, and agreed to meet subsequently at his sister's on the same evening, to conclude the arrangement, and they parted with the utmost apparent affection. Whilst they were talking over their re-union at his sister's, he caught her round the neck, embracing her closely, whilst his cheek rested upon hers. She then felt something cutting her neck. She cried out, "Oh, a knife, a knife," and put up her hand to protect her neck, when she found that her thumb was also wounded. Her throat was but slightly cut, having been protected by her thumb and the ribbon of her bonnet.—James Caffan corroborated the evidence of Mrs. Richman.—Sergeant Yeoman booked the charge at the Poplar-station house, and seeing the excited state of the prisoner searched him no less than three times, apprehending that he might have some weapon about him. The sergeant, not being satisfied, shortly after looked in, and saw the prisoner with his head resting on the cell bench, and some blood coming apparently from his throat. Witness immediately gave the alarm, and called for the key, upon which the prisoner put up his hand to his throat and tore open a wound which he had contrived to inflict upon it, when the blood rushed out in a copious stream and formed a large pool in the cell. On searching the cell, one of the buckles of the prisoner's braces was found in the blood, and it would seem that it was with the teeth of this buckle he had contrived to wound himself.—Mr. Yardley recalled the prosecutrix, but nothing further was elicited. The prisoner was remanded.—Daily News.

MURDER OF A WOMAN BY HER HUSBAND.—On Friday the inhabitants of Brilley were thrown into a state of great excitement, in consequence of the perpetration of a murder, the victim being the wife of a man named Whitford, a cattle-dealer, who is supposed to be the perpetrator of the crime. He appears to have been much addicted to intemperance, which was the cause of frequent quarrels between them. It is reported that just before the murder was committed, Whitford being at the time in liquor, wanted to leave the house for the purpose of indulging in his favourite propensity. His wife, to prevent him, locked the door, which so infuriated the husband, that he seized some heavy weapon and inflicted a number of violent blows on the head of his wife, which immediately caused her death. The husband was apprehended and conveyed to Kingston police-station, to await the result of the inquest.—Standard of Freedom.

DELIRIUM TREMENS.—An inquest was held at the Norwood Arms inn, Shurdington-road, Cheltenham, on Friday last, on the body of Edwin Tilly, a young man who died from the effects of delirium tremens. The deceased was employed as stoker at the Montpellier-baths. Verdict accordingly.—Ibid.

EXETER HALL.

A SPECIAL MEETING, under the patronage of the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, will be held on Monday evening, December 18th, 1848, on which occasion the following gentlemen will speak to the undermentioned topics:—

JABEZ INWARDS.

“The claims of the Temperance Reformation.”

THOMAS HUDSON.

“Illustrations of Moderate Drinking.”

THOMAS WHITTAKER.

“Teetotalism and the Constitution.”

JAMES TEARE.

“The Immorality of the Traffic.”

THOMAS ALLEN SMITH.

“Popular fallacies respecting Strong Drinks.”

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., will preside. Doors open at five; chair to be taken at six o'clock.

We are requested to insert the reply of Mr. William Claridge, in justification of the course adopted by him in his speech at the meeting held in the school-room, Epsom, on the 4th of October last, commented upon by the worthy chairman, B. Rotch, Esq.

He, W. Claridge, begged leave to remark that merely as a matter of courtesy, he felt bound to bow to the chair on that occasion, but wished it to be distinctly understood, he was fully prepared on any future, suitable occasion, to prove the soundness of the position he had taken.

NOTICE.

BOROUGH OF GREENWICH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.—The Second Annual Festival and Anniversary will be held in the Lecture Hall, on Wednesday, 13th December, 1848. Benjamin Rotch, Esq. B.C.L. of Lowlands (one of the Vice-Presidents) to preside. Rev. Jabez Burns, D.D.; Rev. William Lucy; William Cash, Esq.; Edmund Fry, Esq.; Thomas Hudson, &c., &c., will also take part in the proceedings. Refreshments on the table at five o'clock precisely. Tickets, One Shilling each. Public Meeting at seven. Admission Free.

Progress of Temperance.—Metropolis.

ENON CHAPEL.

Sunday, November the 5th, being fixed upon by the devoted pastor, the Rev. Dr. Burns, for the delivering of his annual discourse to the teetotalers of the metropolis, a numerous congregation assembled at the hour announced for divine service.

A very energetic and eloquent sermon was preached by the Rev. Doctor, from Deut. vii. 26, and 2 Kings xviii. 4.

“Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thine house, lest thou be a cursed thing like it: but thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it: for it is a cursed thing.”

“He removed the high places, and brake the images, and cut down the groves, and brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: that he called it Nehushtan.”

The discourse was designed to show that intoxicating drinks were a curse to mankind. He remarked that the grain and fruits of which they were made, were the bounties of God's benignant providence, just as the silver and gold of which idols were made, were valuable and useful metals, but when formed into objects of worship, then were they perverted and became abominable, and were to be treated as an accursed thing. So, also, in making intoxicating fluids, the blessings of God's beneficence become perverted, and their history in all ages and countries, proved them to be an accursed thing. He showed that they were so, in the physical suffering which they produced; in their deteriorating influence on the mental powers; in debasing and demoralising effects on the heart and life; in being the main producers of crime, wretchedness and woe; in filling asylums with maniacs, the grave with earthly victims, and perdition with lost souls. In proof of these statements, he appealed to the short lives of those engaged in the traffic, and avowed he would abstain, if it were only out of compassion for this ruined class of persons.

He appealed to the crowds of starved and neglected children, heart-broken wives, mothers and sisters, and said, if those who had perished through strong drink could address them, they would solemnly abjure them not to taste or handle the accursed thing.

He urged upon all who professed to be patriots, philanthropists, or christians, to abandon the use of intoxicating drink, and enrol themselves among the friends of the temperance reformation.

He endeavoured to meet the chief objections of those who still used these drinks, and was very severe on those who pleaded merely that they liked them, and persisted to gratify an animal appetite, while moral devastation was spread abroad by their use.

He concluded by an earnest appeal to total abstinents, to be firm and unyielding in their adherence to the principle. To maintain and endeavour to extend it in the spirit of candour and kindness, and to pray that the Divine blessing might bless all their means, and make them eminently effectual.

Three thorough-going temperance hymns were given out by Mr. Balfour and sung on the occasion. Mr. Edward Ashdown, an officer of the church, and superintendent of the Sabbath-school, read the scriptures and prayed, and a liberal collection was made for the support of the temperance movement. A number of signatures to the pledge were also taken. It is a fact worth noticing, that since Dr. Burns introduced non-intoxicating wine at the Lord's Table, that the church has been enabled to give upwards of seven pounds per annum more to its poor and afflicted members.

SURREY CHAPEL.

Pursuant to announcement, on the evening of the 7th ultimo, the customary Annual Temperance Sermon was delivered by the Rev. James Sherman, one of the Vice-presidents of the National Temperance Society. There was, as usual, a full and very respectable auditory on the occasion. After devotional exercises, the rev. preacher proceeded to address his congregation from the 6th chapter of Galatians and the 9th verse. “And let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.”

The well-doing spoken of by the apostle, argued the rev. gentleman, is the doing of good to others in contra-distinction to the principle of selfishness, by which man in his unregenerated state is characterized. Self-denial was the leading principle in the constitution of the christian religion, and in the application of that principle to the ordinary concerns of life, it was peculiarly relevant to the subject of that discourse.

Mr. Sherman pointed out, in his own peculiar, happy manner, many of the hindrances to the progress of the temperance society, and on that account continually urged upon his hearers, "not to be weary in well-doing." In a very solemn appeal to the christian sympathies of the congregation to care for the hapless drunkard, he read the following affecting letter from a recently bereaved widow.

"MY BELOVED PASTOR,—I take the liberty of writing to ask you to pray for a poor widowed sister, who this day week followed her husband to the grave, whence drink, and that alone had brought him. Through drink he had brought himself into disgrace, got overwhelmed in debt, and fearing that he should lose his situation, he put an end to his life, by committing the same act that Judas did. I therefore ask your earnest prayer on behalf of her whom he has left behind. Oh! that the word may reach that troubled heart to-night, and enable her to seek comfort where alone it can be found. May the Lord rend the heavens and come down, that every mountain of sin and unbelief may melt at his presence."

Mr. Sherman, in conclusion, invited persons convinced that it was their duty and their privilege, to repair to the vestry. We are happy to say the sermon and the invitation were not without results, forty signatures being taken by the missionaries.

HARP ALLEY.

The eleventh anniversary of the Farringdon-street Temperance Society, was held in the British School Room, Harp Alley, Fleet-street, on Tuesday evening, November 13th, 1848. The Rev. W. Woolhouse Robinson, M.A., Incumbent of Christ Church, Chelsea, occupied the chair. An appropriate address was delivered by the chairman, and an admirable report read by Mr. J. W. Green.

The first resolution was moved by WILLIAM JANSON, Esq., seconded by Mr. D. G. PAINE, and supported by Dr. Oxley,

"That grateful ascriptions of praise are due to Almighty God, for the blessings he has conferred upon thousands through the instrumentality of total abstinence from strong drinks; and that the report of the proceedings of the Farringdon Temperance Society, now read, be adopted, printed, and circulated, under the direction of the Committee."

The second resolution was moved by Mr. T. HUDSON, and seconded by Mr. ROE.

"That as great mischiefs are daily accruing from the use of intoxicating liquors, it is the duty of every Christian philanthropist to discountenance, in every possible way, the use, the manufacture, and the sale of such drinks, and to promote the practice of entire abstinence therefrom, in all classes of the community."

A resolution of thanks to the Rev. Chairman was also moved by Mr. CHARLES TAYLOR, and seconded by Mr. H. N. RICKMAN, when the meeting, which was large, respectable and enthusiastic, dispersed.

Agents' Reports.

MR. THOMAS WHITTAKER,

My last journal left me at Guisborough. I repeated my meeting in that place, as I did also at Ayton; both of these meetings have been an improvement upon the preceding ones, and I did not leave them without believing that some of the seed had fallen in good ground. From Ayton I went to Redcar, and held a meeting in the Wesleyan Chapel, the meeting was well attended, and several took the pledge. From Redcar I went to Yarm. We had a full house, and another triumphant meeting. From Yarm to my old and kind friends at Darlington. Tea was provided by the kindness of a few ladies, and the large hall looked quite gay, and heart-cheering. The Darlington people are not excitable, but there is a determination of character about many of the teetotalers, that is worth more than gold. You do not one day hear of the whole town going out after teetotalism, and the next of some vagabond teetotaler robbing the Rechabite Tent, and all the rest hanging down their heads in confusion. Talk to them about giving up teetotalism, and you may fancy them exclaiming, "Am I a dog, that I should do this wickedness, and thus sin against God." We had a good week. Here I met my colleague Jabez Inwards, laughing and looking as fresh as a spring morning. No man can descant more eloquently on the excellency of cold water than Jabez, and I am sure no one can look more in its favour. He will do any teetotal society good to look at him; and to hear him, why, it is like the bubbling, gurgling, dancing, jumping spring, in the praise of which he speaks. I never heard a man who could say so much, and who, when he had done, had got so much to say. He is the Niagara of the teetotal society, the fall is tremendous, and the people look with amazement. He did me good, and I think I should get fat myself if I were to keep his company. We also had the presence of the Honourable Judge Marshall. He is the very ideal of the adage, "as-sober as a judge;" I had not met with him in a public meeting before, but he is evidently a man who feels the importance of his mission, and believes teetotalism will deliver this country from its commercial difficulties, and the church from its present dead and disgraceful position, and I think he is "no bad judge." We had four meetings in the town, the whole of which passed off very encouragingly. On the Sunday I was favoured to address two large congregations in Paradise Street Chapel, and thus ended my visit to Darlington. My colleague left for Middlesborough, and I went to York. I had two old-fashioned Yorkshire meetings in the large new hall in the city of York. They were presided over by Judge Marshall and Mr. Braddock. I think York society stands well. They have an indefatigable secretary, a respectable and united committee, a useful and unwearied missionary, and a number of benevolent ladies, who sigh and cry for the rescue of the drunkard, and comfort and encourage the temperance advocate: it was an agreeable visit, and I think the walls of the drinking citadel shook at the blowing of the ram's horn. From York I went to Malton. This town is cursed with the malting and brewing influence, and though we have several teetotalers, there is a want of energy amongst them. We had a very decent, patient meeting, but it was got up in the day after the fair style, and yet the result was satisfactory. Derby was the next place visited, and a good meeting held; I was pleased here by meeting many old and consistent teetotalers. On the 6th of October I arrived at home, after a six months' tour in the north of England, and though wearied by incessant labour, I was not without my reward. During the six months, I laboured in the following counties:—Stafford, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, and Derby. Since my arrival home, in addition to attending a few meetings in London, I have visited Kent, Essex, and Bedford, holding meetings in the following towns:—Greenwich two, Chatham one, Brompton one, Sheerness three, Tonbridge one, Chelmsford two, and Leighton Buzzard one. With the exception of Chelmsford, Leighton, and one at Greenwich, the meetings have been crowded almost to suffocation, and the others were by no means discouraging in numbers, when we take into account the circumstances under which they were held. If the meetings I have attended since I came south are a specimen of what is to be my winter's campaign, let me beg of the teetotalers to have mercy, and do what they can to comfortably seat, well light, and thoroughly ventilate, the room. It is not possible for me, or any other man, to breathe in such an atmosphere, say nothing about speaking in it, without serious injury. There are many encouraging circumstances connected with the meetings enumerated, yet there are powerful influences at work against us. Chatham is a sink of iniquity. The authorities of this town are asleep, and vice and crime is rampant. The publicans are resorting to immoral and barefaced practices to entrap the thoughtless; saloons, casinos, and low theatres, are being attached to numbers of these places, and our Sunday-schools and family circles are being inundated by the impure streams, which flow from these impure and ungodly fountains. The watchmen on the walls of Zion are asleep, while the authorities are too much in the mud to pull the rest out of the mire. Brompton is a mountain of sin, but we have scaled the walls, and our banner has been unfurled in the heart of the citadel, and we are daily gaining ground. On the occasion of my visit, we celebrated the seventeenth anniversary of our captain for this department, Mr. Walchurst, and many who were exposed to the manslaughter were rescued. I am now on my way to Maidstone, where we hold a meeting this evening.

Yours faithfully,
T. WHITTAKER.

MR. JABEZ INWARDS.

On Tuesday the 17th of October, I gave a lecture in the Court House, Rotherham; 18th, in the National School, Guisborough; 19th and 20th, again at Rotherham, in the same place. During my connexion with the National Temperance Society, I have had several delightful meetings in this place. Here the principles of abstinence are well understood; and there are many happy proofs that the God of Temperance has blessed the labours of those who abstain. On the 23rd, I paid a second visit to the ancient city of York, and although the weather was very unpropitious, we had a large meeting. The subject of the lecture was "Teetotalism the Temperance of the Old and New Testaments;" during the lecture the most intense interest was manifested, and at the close several signed the pledge. In York, much good has been done. They have a spacious hall, in which weekly meetings are held. 24th, held a meeting in the village of Warmsworth; Joseph Clark, jun., of Doncaster, took the chair, who opened the meeting with a speech, plain, telling and practical. 25th, held a meeting in the New Guildhall, Doncaster. On the morning of the 26th, a meeting was convened for the purpose of affording the higher classes an opportunity of listening to the principles of temperance; J. F. Fisher, Esq., Mayor of Doncaster, took the chair; it was not numerously attended, but very respectable. On the evening of the same day, a large meeting was held in the same place, to hear the conclusion of the lecture commenced on the previous evening. On the 27th, I gave another lecture in the Guildhall, to an overflowing congregation; such was the interest excited, that the large hall was crowded in every part, half an hour before the time. The subject of the lecture was, "Teetotalism accordant with the voice of Nature." On the following day I returned home, possessing a grateful and cheerful heart in reviewing the labours of my short visit to the north. All the meetings were full, though some of the evenings were very wet, some were crowded, and signatures were always obtained, and I found warm-hearted friends in every place, whose kindness I shall ever remember.

On Thursday, the 2nd of November, by the kind permission of the Vicar, we held an excellent meeting, in the National School Room, Stevenage; the place was crowded, and the attention very good. November 3rd, in the Town-hall, Hitchin. In this town intemperance has made fearful ravages, and we know at the present time many are suffering by its influence. There are a few staunch friends to the cause, and their labours have been blessed in the reclamation of some who were once very intemperate. On Monday, the 6th, after travelling about 150 miles, I found myself in the interesting little town of Corsham, in Wilts. In the evening a temperance festival and meeting were held in the National School. The chair was taken by J. Eldridge, Esq., who, though not a teetotaler, made some excellent remarks. Our esteemed friend, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, was then called upon. The lecture he gave was exceedingly interesting, and well calculated, we think, to convince all parties, that it is physically and morally wrong to drink intoxicating drink. The Secretary of the Juvenile Society of Bath then said a few words, after which your agent took up no small portion of the time. Mr. Cox of Bath, then followed in his own peculiar style, and the interest of the meeting was kept up until a late hour, and some good signatures were obtained. On the 7th and 8th, lectured in the town hall, at Devizes. At the first meeting, J. Anstie, Esq., took the chair; it was not numerously attended, but according to the testimony of the friends, it was quite as much so as they expected. The second meeting was full, orderly and respectable; Mr. J. J. Fox in the chair. Nothing could have been more satisfactory than the attention paid. On the 9th, held a meeting in the Lecture Room, at New Swindon, at which place I found many warm-hearted teetotalers. 10th, gave a lecture in the British School, Highworth; in this place there had not been a temperance meeting for many years. Our friends hope that the time has now arrived when the good cause will prosper here. I expect shortly to go into the West again. On Thursday and Friday of this week, I go to Coventry. The meetings are not so large in the West as in the North; this is in some measure accounted for in consequence of the population not being so great. I have been much pleased, during the last fortnight; the friends every where have been very kind, and the temperance principle has taken deep-root in many of their hearts: it is not looked upon as a mere matter of expediency, but it is believed as a great truth, and adopted as a solemn duty. All the revelations of science, in reference to alcohol, and the physical economy, prove that that "Temperance against which there is no law," can only be found in total abstinence from that which is injurious, and a moderate use of that which is good. Earnestly hoping that all your efforts may be crowned with abundant success, I am, with high respect, yours very truly, November 13th, 1848.

JABEZ INWARDS.

REV. A. W. HERITAGE.

Having entered upon a three months' engagement as the agent of the "Suffolk Temperance Association," I visited and lectured at Hadleigh, on Monday, October 16th. The room was full, and great attention was given to my address. The few friends of the cause here are very active.

Tuesday 17th.—Proceeded to Needham Market, and on my arrival found the friends quite dispirited, in consequence of the thin attendance at the meetings; this induced me to fill up and circulate a number of the small bills of invitation. In this work I made forty-eight calls upon the cottagers and others, and in the evening had a good company, who listened attentively.

Wednesday 18th.—Meeting in the hall at Ipswich. One of the town missionaries signed the pledge.

19th, 20th, and 21st, I spent in visiting from house to house, and distributing tickets of membership, and obtained one signature to the pledge. In the course of visiting, I called upon John Anderson, the barrack-sergeant, who signed the pledge through my persuasion on the 30th of August. The change in his appearance is most striking. This is one of the most pleasing cases I ever met with. Poor fellow, he wept for joy when I visited him.

Monday 23rd.—Visited upwards of sixty houses in Ipswich, and attended a meeting in the evening at the Primitive Methodist Chapel.

Tuesday 24th.—Lectured in the hall at Framlingham, a good meeting, assisted by our indefatigable friend, Larner, whose praise is in all our societies.

Wednesday 25th.—A meeting at Leiston, quiet, orderly, attentive; one valuable signature. Our Leiston friends are not excitable, but steady and determined.

Thursday 26th.—At Yoxford, a large, attentive and successful meeting, seven signatures. At this place, the landlords feel considerably annoyed at our success, and tried to get up an opposition meeting. We have some noble trophies at Yoxford.

Friday 29th.—At Saxmundham, found no society, but arranged for a meeting next month. The strong-drinking habits of this place must be assailed.

Monday 30th.—Met the Ladies' Society at Ipswich, to arrange for the bazaar. Our friends are determined to expect and labour for great things. In this favoured town, I have held several public and private meetings, with some pleasing indications of success; I have also revised the register of this society, and find 1844 good members.

Tuesday 31st.—Went by train to Bury St. Edmunds, and could not hold a public meeting, in consequence of the anniversary meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. The once flourishing society in this place has ceased to exist. I met the few friends, and arranged for a meeting next month, after which I returned to Ipswich.

Such is a brief outline of my labours up to the present time.

WALTON.

A populous village, here I have lectured twice, and found about forty members.

RECCLES.

In this town the cause of temperance is respectably supported, but makes very slow progress. I have attended three public and two private meetings here.

LOWESTOFT.

Has been visited by your agent. Meetings in this place are thinly attended. Our friends want more zeal in promoting the cause. Drunkenness prevails in Lowestoft to an alarming extent.

GORLESTON.

A large village near Yarmouth, with a small society, and a few zealous friends. Lectured once in the Primitive Methodist Chapel.

BUNGAY.

In this town I found no society in existence, and not more than three or four teetotalers. I have lectured twice, received upwards of twenty signatures, and established a society, which bids fair to work well. The Rev. J. Waddington is president.

HARWICH, (ESSEX.)

The cause here is reviving, and the friends seem determined to persevere. I lectured there last week to a large company, in the Independent Chapel.

A considerable portion of my time has been occupied in corresponding with various friends of the cause in the county, and in maturing plans for the formation of an association. The whole of my proceedings have been under the direction of the Ipswich committee, and the friends have been assiduous in their attempts to form a union.

A. W. HERITAGE.

MR. WILLIAMSON.

(Devonshire.)

SIR,—During the past month there has been a decided improvement in the attendance at the meetings which I have held; and it is gratifying to know that the church is awakening to a sense of her duty, in reference to the temperance question. The ministers, as the representatives of the church, are lending their influence in aiding the high and holy enterprise of delivering the world from the curse of drunkenness, by inducing its population to abstain from intoxicating drinks. And although in all cases the ministers do not feel fully alive to the necessity of entirely abstaining; yet it is pleasing to know, that the efforts which are being made by the advocates of true temperance, at the present time, secure the approval of those, who a few years since were opposed to any attempt being made to remove drunkenness by moral means. The Sabbath question is engaging the attention of christians of various denominations, and I was informed by an active friend of the cause at Hatherleigh, that the friends of temperance being anxious to get up a petition against Sunday tipping in public houses, obtained the sanction of ministers to stand at the doors of various places of worship in the town, on the Sabbath day, for the purpose of receiving signatures to the petition; the petitioners praying that public-houses may be closed the whole day on Sunday, and that 1500 persons signed that petition out of a population of 1800. There is abundant evidence that the temperance question never has been so highly estimated by the public, as it is at the present time, and it is only for the friends of the cause to take as their guide the injunction, "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," and they will find, great as our success has been, that a united effort made at the present time, will be attended with results an hundredfold greater than they have been in the past. The friends at Devonport are actively engaged in an effort to raise a temperance hall. The lord of the manor has kindly promised a site on very liberal terms, and there is every prospect that success will attend their labours. Weekly meetings are held for the advocacy of the cause, and attention is paid not only to the drunkard at their doors, but periodical meetings are held in villages in the neighbourhood, and numbers of drunkards are reclaimed by the establishment of juvenile societies. The young are trained in a salutary fear of all connexion with the great destroyer before whom so many of the wise and good have fallen to rise no more. At Stonehouse, the meeting was presided over by the Rev. J. Webster, Baptist minister. I was ably assisted by that well-known friend of the cause, Dr. Mudge of Bodmin, who in a speech of much ability, traced the connexion between strong drinks, and physical and moral disease; pathetically appealing to the audience to abandon the use of that drink for which,

The strong man gives his health,
The wise man reason, the rich man wealth,
——— youth its charms,
And mothers the children in their arms.

At Holdsworthly, Marytavey, Torrington, Bideford, South Molton, Filligh and Appledore, the meetings were variously attended. The meeting at Appledore, when compared with others which have been held in this town, gives promise of the "good time coming." The Rev. J. Clapp presided, and your agent was ably assisted by the Rev. Mr. Ball; and at the close of the proceedings, the chairman in an eloquent speech summed up the evidence given, and urged upon the audience the necessity of abstaining from intoxicating drinks, and by precept and example, labour to remove intemperance. Were the excellent advice given by Mr. Clapp, to be carried into practice by christians generally—

Oppression's heart might be imbued,
With kindling drops of loving-kindness;
And knowledge pour,
From shore to shore.
Light on the eyes of mental blindness.

Yours truly,
JOHN WILLIAMSON.

MR. ROBERT GAMBLE.

During the past quarter I have exchanged nearly 400 tracts, written to, and enclosed suitable tracts to 47 farmers, urging the necessity of making efforts to stop the scenes of intemperance which disgrace both the commencement and termination of the corn-harvest; in some cases I have paid personal visits, and been well received, and am sorry the state of my health has prevented my doing so more extensively. Left the Parliamentary Evidence on Drunkenness with three magistrates, (two of whom are clergymen,) which is still in the possession of one. I have three copies of Dunlop's Drinking Usages, which have been lent to nine persons during the quarter, and returned with thanks for their use. Have lent four copies of Anti-Bacchus to twelve dissenting ministers, and Baker's Idolatry of Britain (the cheap work), to seventeen deacons and church-members. In this department, I get at such persons as never attend any meetings on the subject, but who can read by their own firesides without trouble or effort. I am happy to inform you that several cases have occurred to my knowledge, of farmers giving each man a quantity of beef, with materials for plum-puddings, to have with his family, instead of making a drinking feast as formerly: you will admit with me, that this is a step in the right direction. I know of two houses built this summer, where the workmen had a supper without strong drink, and spent a very comfortable evening; a few teetotalers among them gave their experience, and at ten o'clock the party separated, highly pleased with the entertainment. I have attended a few public meetings, but have been unable to do much in the way of speaking. Hartwell Park festival was well attended, as also some others in this locality. I have distributed tracts at several of them, and felt pleased to witness the spirit of inquiry manifested. I believe teetotalism to be more appreciated and well-spoken of by many, than formerly, and daily experience convinces me that one result of temperance societies is, that vast numbers drink very much less. People are frequently to be met with who admit this, and who also state that the less they drink, the better they feel, and these have ultimately adopted total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

Berkhamstead, September 29th, 1848.

A WEEK'S RUSTICATION.

SIR,—Having a little period of leisure from business engagements, I thought it could not be more pleasantly, or more usefully employed, than in visiting some of the former scenes of my temperance labours, scattering the good seed of total abstinence when opportunity offered, and giving a friendly "how do you do" to old teetotal acquaintances; and if you think a very brief sketch of my week's proceedings suitable for your readers, here it is at their service.

On Monday, October 2nd, I left home for Hastings. Here the cause, though still alive, is not vigorous, and the Committee were not able to get up a meeting. This I regretted, as it deprived me of an opportunity of seeing some whom I before knew as the liberated slaves of drink.

The next day, I delivered a lecture in the Mechanics' Institution, Lewes, Mr. Thomas Davey (whose history by the way is a standing lecture to the Lewes population) in the chair. The attendance was highly satisfactory. Here I had the pleasure of a hearty recognition by some who were once in the "miry clay" of intemperance, but who have found a safe footing on the pledge of total abstinence.

On Wednesday, I addressed a meeting in the Infant School-room, Little Hampton, at which Thomas Compton, Esq., of Sompoting, extracted the spirit from various kinds of intoxicating liquors, and burnt it before the company. The unfavourable state of the weather would not permit a very crowded place, but I have rarely attended a meeting when a more gratifying degree of attention prevailed. A body of brewer's men were grouped together, but whatever might be their object in attending a teetotal meeting, their conduct was exemplary, and their interest seemingly unbroken.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Compton presided at the Town-hall, Worthing, and repeated his experiments in distillation. Here, in accordance with an almost invariable rule, I asked for the statement of objections, if any were entertained; which was met with a speech from a gentleman named Phillips, who after eulogising our exertions, and even suggesting a vote of thanks to Mr. Compton and myself, commenced a lamentation over the poor labourers, whom we might deprive of their beer, and gave utterance to a most piteous wail on behalf of the toil-worn females, who stood so many hours at the wash-tub and the ironing-board, without the help of a little good beer.

I am not very partial to female oratory, indeed quite the reverse; but how was it possible to feel displeased, when two or three females nearly simultaneously rose with all their teetotal zeal awakened, to undeceive the compassionate old man! one of them with a mother's pride held up a chubby infant, whose fat little limbs certified to the inutility of beer; another declared that from the early hour of five or six in the morning, she had been unremittingly engaged in her customary toil as a laundress, and had only ceased her work when she prepared to attend the meeting. These, in addition to the personal testimony of — Osborne, a working man, who joined the Society when I was in the neighbourhood, seven years ago, came in pat and powerful enough, to disconcert one far more brazen faced than Mr. Phillips appeared to be.

Still with John Bull's characteristic tenacity, the gentleman did not like to give in, and asked for another opportunity of grappling with the subject; and the result was an arrangement that we should meet in discussion on the following Saturday evening.

The next evening I lectured in the Town-hall, Brighton, Isaac Bass, Esq., in the chair. The attendance was highly satisfactory. The pleasure of this occasion was enhanced by meeting with Mr. Roberts of Hackney, to whose lectures at Deptford, sixteen years ago, I am indebted for my first impressions in favour of the temperance movement.

The following day I returned to Worthing, to fulfil my engagement at the Town-hall. With the exception of the platform, the place was excessively crowded, and the greatest interest appeared to be excited. It would not be befitting in me to give the details of a discussion in which it was my lot to play first fiddle; but I may say, that if the brunt of the battle had fallen entirely on the person whose request led to the debate, it would have been, for the pro-drink party, a most miserable failure; but two or three others came to the rescue, and one of them, whose name did not transpire, but who, I believe, is connected with a company of players, proved a far more talented opponent; his objections, however, though urged with much taste, were chiefly of a character familiar to all temperance advocates, and it did not require any very great deal of logic to demolish them.

I must not omit one incident in the evening's proceedings. Mr. Phillips spoke of malt liquor as "liquid food;" this expression chafed on the mind of one of the Worthing teetotalers, a "fly-man," named Edwards, who had often found it to be liquid something else, and under the impulse of his feelings, he mounted the platform, and told what this liquid food had done for him. The manner in which he played upon this favourite expression of our antagonist was very effective, and the more so, because evidently unstudied.

After I had made my final reply, the chairman called for a show of hands for and against teetotalism; the majority was too evidently in its favour to admit of doubt, and when I left the room the signature book appeared in active requisition.

There appear to me the materials for a very efficient society at this place; but the members must try their own strength. It will not do for them to wait the unfrequent visits of an accredited agent, when there is no county association, or the stray services of an amateur advocate. Such an affair as a discussion may give a temporary fillip, but it is internal organization and activity, which can alone maintain vigour, and insure increasing success. This cap, however, will fit other societies beside that at Worthing.

Shall I be pardoned for adding, that on Sunday I heard two excellent sermons from an evangelical clergyman, who presided at the first meeting I held in the county of Sussex; and who thus pledged himself, not by such flimsy instruments as pen and ink, but with an oral invocation to Heaven. His parishioners, I think, to the number of fifty-two, then and there enrolled their names, and the character of the village population underwent an immediate and striking revolution. Twelve months after, from his pulpit, he told his flock how well his year's abstinence agreed with him; his labours had been equally unremitting, and his health more than as well sustained. But alas! all this was but to add another painful item to the long list of ministerial defalcations, in spite of his solemn pledge, in spite of the improved aspect of his rustic people, in spite of the advantages accruing to his own feelings and health, his teetotalism has been relinquished, and "like priest like people;" drunkenness is as rife as ever, and a mere handful of the first adherents now remain. How is the gold become dim! On whom shall rest the responsibility?

Yours very faithfully,

D. G. PAINE.

YORK.

We have just concluded a series of five of the most interesting temperance meetings ever held in this City, which have been addressed by Mrs. Hardwick of Malton, in this county (wife of the Rev. W. Hardwick, Baptist minister) with most pleasing results. The closing lecture was addressed to females only, and notwithstanding the night was wet, the large hall was crowded by the fair sex. At this meeting upwards of forty signed the pledge. Several of our committee were previously strongly prejudiced against female advocacy, but the modest and unassuming demeanour, joined with the delightful eloquence of Mrs. Hardwick, have entirely removed their objections.

Gleanings.

A TEETOTAL PEDESTRIAN.—Henry Hentall the post-man of the Hillingdon Hays and Botwell District, has exercised his vocation as "a man of letters," during the last six years on teetotal principles. He walks on an average thirty miles a day, or 210 miles a week, or 10,920 miles a year, or for the whole period, 65,520 miles, or a distance of nearly three times round the Globe. In addition to these fetes of walking, he not unfrequently employs his spare time in gardening operations, acting as waiter at private dinner and other parties, and attending teetotal meetings.

PUBLIC-HOUSE versus PRAYER MEETING.—I attended the opening of Hope Chapel, yesterday morning, it has been enlarged, and at the conclusion of the service, John, sobber John Kershaw announced from the pulpit, that for the accommodation of strangers from a distance, there would be a plain substantial dinner, at one shilling a head, at the "Hare and Hound," public-house, Yorkshire Street, at which he (the minister) intended to be present; and there would be a Prayer Meeting in the school-room, for those who did not go to dinner; so that, says our correspondent, they had two chances either to go to the Devil's Sanctuary or to the Prayer Meeting.—Rochdale August 28th.

INTRODUCTION OF GIN.—Gin-drinking was first brought into fashion by William III., at St. James's Palace, where his Orange Majesty sat drinking Schiedam till all was blue.—Wesleyan.

WATER.

Wine, wine, thy power and praise
 Have ever been echoed in minstrel lays ;
 But water, I deem, hath a mightier claim
 To fill up a niche in the temple of Fame,
 Ye who are bred in Anacreon's school
 May sneer at my strain as the song of a fool :
 Ye are wise, no doubt, but have yet to learn
 How the tongue can cleave and the veins can burn.
 Should ye ever be one of a fainting band,
 With your brow to the sun and your feet to the sand,
 I would wager the thing I'm most loathe to spare
 That your Bacchanal chorus would never ring there :
 Traverse the desert, and then ye can tell
 What treasures exist in the cold deep well ;
 Sink in despair on the red parched earth,
 And then ye may reckon what water is worth.

Famine is laying her hand of bone
 On the ship becalmed in a torrid zone ;
 The gnawing of hunger's worm is past
 But fiery thirst lives on to the last.
 The stoutest one of the gallant crew
 Hath a cheek and lips of ghastly hue ;
 The hot blood stands in each glassy eye,
 And " Water, oh God !" is the only cry.

There's drought in the land, and the herbage is dead,
 No ripple is heard in the streamlet's bed ;
 The herd's low bleat and the sick man's pant
 Are mournfully telling the boon we want.
 Let heaven this one rich gift withhold,
 How soon we find it is better than gold ;
 And water, I say, hath a right to claim
 The Minstrel's song and a tithe of Fame.

THE NEW YEAR.

"How like the dial's tardy moving shade,
Day after day glides from us unperceived.
The cunning fugitive is swift by stealth,
Too subtle is the movement to be seen,
Yet soon the hour is up, and we are gone.—YOUNG.

Swiftly yet imperceptibly glides time away, bearing upon its glassy stream terrestrial joys and sorrows. Yes, time once past never more returns, but onward flows to the ocean of eternity. This is a solemn consideration for all, but more so for the votaries of dissipation; for time waits for no man to repent. On the threshold then of the New Year let us pause, and glancing into that now "numbered with the years beyond the flood," reflect on the brevity of life, our duties, and our responsibilities.

Since the midnight bell announced the approach of last year, what vast and momentous changes have taken place! We speak not now of political revolutions, anarchy and confusion. No, we narrow our views to domestic life; and, looking upon the multitudes slain by the great enemy, we ask, "Who slew all these?"—and awful is the reply. Homes that a year ago were then the abodes of bliss, have since been made dreary. Hearts then palpitating with high hope have been brought low, and left like a skiff cast upon some barren rock, the wreck only of what it once had been; while, (still sadder thought,) many a victim of intemperance has been summoned to render its account at the bar of the Eternal.

The intoxicating cup, like some vast whirlpool, draws all ranks within its vortex. 'Tis the great maelstrom of society. Even now as we write, are being engulfed all that is lovely and of good report, appertaining to a nation's weal—converting "whatsoever things are lovely and pure, into things most base and polluted." The poor mechanic, deaf to the cries of his hungry children, is spending his scanty earnings at the ale-house. The tradesman, neglectful of his business, is plunging into bankruptcy and ruin. The man of fashion and of pleasure, he too is filling up the measure of his folly, all unmindful, that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." But should not the punishment endured by the drunkard, even though self-inflicted, excite our sympathy and commiseration? Is he not a man? Is he not our brother? and though debased, ought we not to lift him up by our own self-denial, teaching him by example, high and holy principles,—even habits of self-government and moral control?

By such lessons of goodness alone is society to be relieved from its present degraded condition, and doubtless, if it is the duty of one man, it is the duty of every man to assist in this work of moral reform. What though our efforts for a time appear fruitless, should we therefore be disheartened? Not suddenly, nor hastily, do great truths at all times sink deep into the heart, but slowly, even as the gentle rain penetrates the parched and thirsty wilderness, and permeates the soil, in like manner the customs, habits, and prejudices, that have long spell-bound society, may finally be subdued.

What is our duty, therefore? but to let the light within our own souls so shine before men—so to extend the knowledge of our principles—that the truth may make every man free, nor rest until that liberty shall extend from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. With such hopes and feelings, with such devout yearnings for the liberation of our race from this "second curse," and with the remembrance of the triumphs we have already achieved, may we not indeed realize the blessedness of a HAPPY NEW YEAR.

THE INTEMPERANCE OF WOMAN.

Intemperance in woman, is in three respects somewhat different from the same vice in men. 1st. In them it is not often a social vice: men frequently become drunkards from the allurements of association rather than a love of the drink itself. Indeed, intemperate men have been known to become comparatively sober, if kept from drinking companions. Women, on the contrary, in the solitude of home, under the influence of weak health or depressed spirits, and often, how often! under medical advice, commence using intoxicating drinks, become habitual to them and fond of them, and when in the sequel they degenerate into drunkards, it is not from the love of company, but the love of drink.

2dly. It is much more difficult to reclaim them. The annals of every Temperance Society can present cases of reformed men, but the instances of female reclamation are exceedingly rare.

3dly. Intemperate women suffer more in the opinion of society than men do. The most degraded inebriate among men looks with horror and disgust on an intemperate woman. The circumstance that women who drink, are fond of the drink itself, and that they lose reputation and station in society by drinking, furnish the reasons why they are more difficult to reclaim. Feeling keenly the morbid cravings of a diseased appetite; stung by the sense of degradation, the contumely of society, they think their own case hopeless. It is difficult to get them to make the necessary effort to change their habits. However great the guilt of an intemperate woman, her misery is greater. Much that in the wretched class passes for hardened selfish recklessness, is in reality the gloomy indifference of deep despair.

The consequences arising from female intemperance are undoubtedly far more awful than in any other case. 'Tis bad when the father of a family becomes a drunkard, but if the mother fall into that vice it is infinitely worse. The poison of her example contaminates all around; a disordered home, a neglected family, must be the inevitable results.

Neither the head nor heart of that individual is much to be envied who would say, "But intemperance in woman is confined to the lowest section of the humbler classes."

Grant that it is so. The well-being of society depends greatly on a virtuous populace. The expense of maintaining paupers or punishing criminals, of keeping multitudes of sick whose infirmities are of their own producing, falls heavily on the industrious and respectable portion of the community; and no one cause is so productive of pauperism, crime, and disease, as female intemperance. Among the many plans for elevating the working class, that of improving the moral and mental condition of the women of that class will be found the most thoroughly effectual.

But is it a truth that intemperance in women is confined to the humbler classes? We have some opportunities of observation, and we dissent from this position as a positive rule. A physician in Lincolnshire, not a teetotaler, was conversing with the writer one day during the summer of 'forty-six: he complained of feeling depressed by a melancholy case then under his care, of a lady who was dying of intemperance. Such an announcement excited curiosity, and the particulars of the case were inquired. It seemed the lady in question nursed her husband during an illness that kept him a prisoner in his room two years, and ended in his death. She commenced taking stimulants to support her through the fatigue and anxiety of her duties; the habit grew upon her, and when her charge was taken from her, she felt too depressed in spirits and health to take measures for altering her way of living; she felt that "stimulants kept her alive," and therefore continued to take them, and in three years lost the respect of every one, and was lying on a drunkard's death-bed. The remark of the physician at the conclusion of this narrative was very striking. Being asked if such frightful cases were common, he drew his chair closer to the inquirer, lowered his voice, and said in a confidential tone, "Such cases are by no means so uncommon as you would imagine. Medical men see a great deal of human nature, and it is wonderful how many women learn to drink while attending on their sick relatives."

In the early part of the same year, the writer visited a town about thirty-five miles from London. The wife of the mayor was then lying dead, having been two years entirely secluded from society; a determined brandy-drinker! In both these cases, the individuals had received the usual advantages of education, and prior to their becoming addicted to the vice in question, were considered highly estimable women.

When all circumstances are fairly reflected on, surely abstinence from intoxicating drinks becomes to woman a personal as well as a relative duty. Granting that in general she is far more temperate than men, yet if she should fall, her degradation is greater and her recovery more hopeless. "Women," said Addison, "are either the best or the worst of human beings," and experience daily justifies the remark. The very feelings which, rightly directed, prompt her to soar to the very apex of the pyramid of human virtue, warped from their bright exercise, precipitate her to the lowest and most grovelling depths of human vice. How necessary then, that such a being, so wondrously endowed with powerful feelings and acute sensitiveness, should guard against all temptations that might hurry her into error, or fasten upon her that chain of habit which has often proved "too light to be felt, until it was too strong to be broken!"

There is yet another class of women whom the temperance reformation contemplates. With a thrilling heart we designate them—the innocent victims of intemperance. Oh! at this very instant, how many a mother is shedding tears of the bitterest disappointment as she thinks of the son of her hopes, anxieties, and prayers. Long years pass in array before her, when her heart was lifted up with expectations little inferior to those of the first mother, when she exclaimed, "I have gotten a man from the Lord;" and the grief of the drunkard's mother is not much less keen than that which wrung the first maternal heart in her hour of bitter disappointment. No pen can describe a grief like this. Suffice it there have been more grey hairs brought down with sorrow to the grave from the intemperance of offspring than from any other cause. And wives—how fares it with them? alas!

if we could look into the thousands of cheerless homes to be found this day in England; see the old gloomy room, the pallid little children shivering in their scanty clothing, lifting their thin faces and eager eyes to their mother for food which she cannot give them, and could we look on the face of that woman who, as she tries to pacify her famished babes, knows that the husband and father is spending his earnings in maddening drink;—could we enter into her history, learn how her confidence has been betrayed, her hopes destroyed, her affections blighted; how poverty and disgrace have closed in and settled down upon her, how she has borne sickness, want, neglect, unkindness, it may be brutality—love of her poor children being the one strong ligament that has bound her to life and to sorrow; for them she has endured miseries that “wake the nerve where agonies are born”—Oh! such a sight as this would surely rouse the most torpid observer to exclaim, “Can I do anything to mitigate such woe!”

Such cases are not fictitious, to “point a moral or adorn a tale:” every town in England presents numerous similar instances, that no tongue could exaggerate and no pencil paint. And can the intelligent christian women of England wrap themselves in the mantle of indifference when griefs like these are presented to their notice? would they not desire to wash their hands in innocence from all participation in customs that blight more characters, break more hearts, and ruin more souls than any other cause?

In addition to the miserable wives and mothers of the intemperate, there is a class who can only be casually mentioned, from want of space.—These are children. The suffering of children from the drinking customs of our land are appalling. An infancy of sorrow, a childhood of famine, exposed to every want and the contamination of evil example. Look at the home, listen to the brutal threats of the drunkard, and then cease to wonder that our papers are filled with accounts of juvenile delinquency: how should it be otherwise? British mothers hear with shuddering horror of the infanticides of heathendom, where as votive offerings to sanguinary gods, the mother leaves her infant to be destroyed in the pagan temple, or to perish in the sacred river; but the worst infanticides of heathendom are not more horrible to the reflective mind than the miserable, neglected, perverted life of many a child in christian Britain. For the sake of these little ones, if for no other consideration, women should be willing to give their hearty co-operation to any accredited plan likely to prevent or cure such evils.

Women of England! let it no longer be said that you are indifferent to a principle that dries the tears of suffering wives, relieves the miseries of neglected childhood, reclaims the degraded, preserves the sober, removes poverty, and by preparing the mind for the reception of religious truth, elevates man to his true dignity as a child of God and an heir of a blissful immortality.—Woman and the Temperance Reformation, (Section 4th) by Mrs. Clara Lucas Balfour.

INTEMPERANCE AND CRIME.

NARRATIVES, &c. OF CRIMINAL OFFENDERS:

“I make no apology for the length of these papers, &c., being convinced that they give an insight into the tenor of what may too often be found in humble life; and which it is most desirable to become acquainted with, in order that the real friends of the people may direct their endeavours to its improvement. It will be observed that none of the statements are by persons belonging to the known class of thieves; but are specimens of what might have been written by almost every prisoner—had the requisite power of expression been possessed.

“It cannot but be observed how, in every narrative, the crime and misery portrayed are associated with the great sin,” (intemperance).—Extract of Chaplain's 25th Report on the Preston House of Correction, 1848.

“Narrative of W. H. (written by himself,) showing how poaching and burglary are consequent of drinking:

“I was a weaver before I went to a tailor. When I had been there (with my master) about four months he was sold up for debt: and then I was forced to go home until things were settled: he was sold up four times the time I stopped with him. So now, sir, I will let you know how I left him. There was going to be a cricket match, and I was one that was going to play. After we got agate of playing the ball burst my finger, and I was not able to work with it. So the next morning when my master got up, he said, ‘Well Bill, thou hast lamed thy finger, hast thou?’ He told me to go home until it was better, so I told him that I durst not, for my father would beat me. At last I went home. When I had been there about a month, I went to B— to serve my time out, and it was opposite the White Hart Inn, so I could see and hear how they went on of a night. So at last I got hardened to go in; and when I had been there a few times I got to be a waiter on them, and there was some men came from that house to poach, and they asked me one night if that I would go with them, so I told them that I would. The first night that I went with them I got 6s. 8d. for my share, so I thought that I was doing well. So with the money that I got, I bought a dog for 10s. 6d.; and they found the nets and all the things that we wanted. So they told me they were no poachers who would not take one thing if they could not get another. I thought myself as hard as any of them, and so it was that I am brought here at last; but, sir, one night that I should have gone off to — Park a poaching, I told them I could not go that night for my legs were over ill swelled; for we had been out so often that I could not go. So they went off, and as they were going over R— Moor, they light of a young woman that was leaving her place, so they asked her if she had any money, and she told them she had not. They was not content with that, so they stripped her and sent her home that way; and as it happened the young woman knew them; so her father got the constables to take them up. R. B. got seven years transported, and R. S. fought himself away. After that R. B.'s brother got taken up for coal stealing, and got seven years. So when they all had gone but myself, I got in with a man that they called George ——. That man has been many a young man's ruin; for he would take anything that came in his way, unless it was too hot or too heavy. So at last I sold him my dog, and I told my father and mother that I would go on tramp and give over poaching. I got work with James M—, but I was forced to leave through drinking; so I set off and came to —, and got work there, until Saturday night, and he would not give me any more work, because I spent my money in drinking. So then I was forced to leave. I went to John H—, that is a beer-shop, and I got on the spree, and spent the remainder of my money there. There was a young man in that I knew; so he asked me if we could not get into the shop; so I told him that we could ; so when the beer-shop shut up, we went into the fair place until about two o'clock, and then we went to the shop ; and I got the key and gave it to the young man, and told him where the clothing was ; so he went in and brought me two coats, three waistcoats, and two pair of trowsers. So I went off to Manchester. I lit of a man that told me that the shop was broken into the same night that I went away, and they thought it was me ; so I left Manchester, and went to K—, and got work with Mr. T—, and stopped with him seven months ; and then I set off to go home ; and I was taken up for this robbery that I am now in prison for. I am not sorry for coming into prison this time, for what I have learnt since I came in it is worth all the trowsers or coats that I could have on ; but I will assure you if I once get out of prison, I shall never come into another for being a thief or any thing else."

"W. B., aged 37, (dictated to the Schoolmaster :)

"I was a chance child. I went to a day school three years, so that I could read the Bible when I left. Then my mother got married to the overlooker at the mill ; and I was always very steady and went to the Sunday-school regular. When I left the factory and began to weave I got agate of card playing, and I never went to the school after, nor thought of ever looking at a book. I have read more since I came here than I have done for the last twenty years. I have thought of nothing good, my better powers being drowned in gambling, drunkenness and debauchery. I always spent 3s. a week in drink, and very often more ; I have done that regular for the last fifteen years. I have hurt myself with such heavy drinking ; it is what has made me so paralytic. It is a good thing me coming here, I have been taught to do different. I see that I can find as much pleasure in reading as in carding and gambling, and it leads folk into nothing that is good—it gets them into drink, and then they get hardened to do any thing, but I intend to be different in future."

"Extract of Narrative of A. E., aged 38, sentenced to six months, for defrauding a benefit club. (Written by himself.)

"I was born of poor parents, and brought up, not so much in the knowledge and fear of God as I ought to have been ; and I continued so until I got married ; and after I got married, I began to get worse, for the fear of God never entered my mind ; and I kept on that way, regardless of my soul ; and when any one asked me if ever I went to church, I always made this reply, that I never went to church except when they wanted something of me ; and that was at a funeral, when I buried some one. Well, then I began to keep company with one that liked his glass, and he induced me to take it ; and on a Sunday, instead of going to church we made for the ale-house ; and spent the sabbath-day in drinking, if our money would last ; and when we have got drunk, we used to go through the back streets, for fear any one should see us, not thinking that God could see us—no such thought ever entered my head, and when I got home I either used to go to bed, or else to sleep in my chair ; and when I had wakened, my children would have begun to tell me what they had sang at school, and what the minister had said to them ; still this never altered my hardened heart."

[The subsequent part of this narrative show the altered condition of the prisoner, which is ascribed by himself to the religious training of the pious chaplain. ED.]

"Extract of Narrative written by a prisoner under sentence for felony):—

"T. R., sixteen years of age, born of poor parents. They might have done well, but my father was a drunkard ; he was a moulder, and got thirty-six shillings a week, but he called at the ale-house on Saturday night, and spent half his money before he came home ; my mother would sit crying, not knowing how the shop bill would be paid. About twelve o'clock my father would come home as drunk as a pig ; he would clap down about eighteen shillings, and with that they might have done well, but he kept wanting drink all the week. This way he went on until he got into prison for debt. He never paid the ale-house what he owed them. So we went to the town for relief ; so they gave us an order for the workhouse, so when we got in I was sent to the school ; this was the first time I had the chance of learning to read well. My father came out of prison, and at last he got work, and then sent for us out of the workhouse, I had two brothers and two sisters. So we got home again, and my father became a temperance man for about ten months, so he had money enough to buy some goods ; and he bought me and my brother a new suit, and this was the only suit he ever bought me in all his life. He never thought of sending us to the school, but let us run up and down the streets just as we thought fit. My mother was a very steady and industrious woman, but very ignorant of religion. She cannot read, and knows not the good of the Bible. Well, my father got agate with some drunkards at the ten months' end, and went off his work ; and at last he got my mother agate drinking, and she would go away for about three days, and leave five children in the house with no one to take care of them, and sometimes no bread. She would come home at the three days' end, and then my father would go to work for five or six weeks. He began of taking me to the ale houses on a Saturday night, and going off his work some part of the week, and the master told him if he did not mind his work he would 'bag' him. This made him steady for a bit, till he got agate with some cock-fighters and card-players, and spent his money. Then he went off his work and got 'bagged.' He said he would soon get more work ; but instead of doing so, he began a selling all the goods till he sold all that we had, only ten chairs and a bed ; he also sold the bedstocks, and spent all the money in drink. He then said he would go and work, so he went off out of the town ; and my mother began to be industrious and steady, and saved some money, what little she could, and we lived happier without him than with him ; and my mother got the house full of goods. My father came back at the end of eighteen months, but with no money. He soon got agate drinking worse than ever, and was never at rest without he were drinking. One night he came home drunk, and laid himself on the bed and never doffed his clothes. And in the morning he was found dead ; and the people said my mother had poisoned him. So this brought my mother to grief and shame ; and the doctors were sent for, and they opened my father, but found nothing of the sort. We had to go to the workhouse for a coffin, for we had no money to buy one. After his death I was sent to work ; I was nine years old. I worked at a cotton-mill, 'short time,' and I got two shillings weekly. When I was twelve years old I passed 'full time ;' my mother told me to say I was thirteen years old. I had a companion that I was with, and he said that it was right that we should play on Sunday ; he said, when people had been working hard all week, they ought to play on a Sunday.

* Discharged.

There was another lad that told me he had plenty of fun at nights, and wanted me to go with him ; so when I had been with him about two weeks, they said among themselves, ' Lads, it's fair to-morrow,' so they all went to the fair, and I went too. When they got to the fair they began a-stealing, and that was the way I began ; they first stole one thing and then another, but never was caught. In six weeks the fair began again, and we thought to carry on the same way again, but we were caught and sent to prison.' "

CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETIES.

We have read with pleasure the recently published Address of the Committee of the Banbury Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, on the Importance of forming Congregational Temperance Societies. As the subject is one of great importance, and the address issued by the Banbury Society is very apposite, we give it insertion. It may be from the perusal of this document other societies will be stirred up to activity. But while Congregational Societies are formed, we trust it will not be to the narrowing of our cause, but rather to the widening of our ground,—the members of the different sections of the christian church being drawn into our ranks by congregational influence,—the world's sobriety may be brought about the more speedily. We take this to be the object contemplated by Congregational Societies ; and as such, we wish the project unmeasured success. The Address proceeds to say—

" Deeply impressed with the evils resulting from the continuance of the habits of using intoxicating substances, in Banbury and its neighbourhood, the Committee have ventured to suggest as a remedy, the establishment of Congregational Temperance Societies in the various religious assemblies of the town and neighbourhood. They are aware that it may possibly divert the support of the Temperance Society now formed, into other channels, which they earnestly hope may not be the case, but the greater obligation of using the most powerful means to disabuse the public mind of the value or utility of these drinks, as well as to influence the religious classes towards a total expulsion of the vices which they universally produce, makes the Committee willingly forego whatever part their efforts may have gained, but which they trust vigorously still to use by the kind and liberal help afforded.

" The weight and influence of congregational authority to carry forward the work, is felt by the Committee so valuable, that whilst they dare not lightly presume to solicit its co-operation, they consider its right application so solemn a responsibility, that they are only encouraged to apply for it on a subject second only to the gospel, and which it is eminently calculated to promote in all its breadth, and in the practical fulfilment of all its moral and religious duties. The Committee beg to present for careful attention, the views of influential clergymen and ministers who have adopted the experiment, as copied from the ' Report of the proceedings at the Conference of Ministers of various religious denominations, held at Manchester, to consider the best means of promoting the Temperance Reformation, in April, 1848.'

" In the Chapel of United Presbyterians, under the Rev. W. M'Kerrow, in Manchester, a Congregational Temperance Society has been formed five years : they had 175 adult members ; 350 in the Juvenile and Sunday School Society ; 500 in the Old Branch ; and 200 in the New Branch ; making a total of 1225 total abstinence members in connexion with his Congregational Society. He had never repented the step he had taken, but was convinced that he had commenced in his congregation a movement which was producing the most delightful influences, morally, socially, and religiously."

" The Rev. R. Slade, (Independent minister) of Preston, had formed one in the Sunday School, in which nearly all the teachers and children were members, and twenty or thirty of his congregation."

" Dr. Burns, of London, said, they had had a Congregational Temperance Society in the church over which he was pastor, for several years ; four-fifths of the teachers and a considerable number of the members of the church ; they find it indispensable to form a society, to which they could invite their christian people, and thus remove one great stumblingblock out of the way,—the injudicious advocacy of the temperance cause."

" The Rev. W. Paterson, of Liverpool, (Wesleyan Association) would add the benefit of his experience upon the subject,—it was now thirteen years since he formed seven Congregational Societies, and in every instance, they had been attended with the best advantages to the congregations."

" The Rev. James Bardsley, M.A., (Church of England minister) of Burnley, said, it was now two years since he formed what they called the Church Temperance Society, in Burnley, the result had been most gratifying ;—they had established five other Societies ; and he believed from 200 to 300 young persons had continued in connexion with the church, mainly through the influence of the Temperance Society."

" In Colne it was stated that five Congregational Associations had been formed, which were going on in the most satisfactory manner."

The Committee conclude by saying—

" The influence of religious bodies thus exercised, is shown by the foregoing, to promote the increase of members, the reclamation of offenders, and the preservation of all ; whilst in a pecuniary point of view, the benefit is doubtless equally satisfactory, it being too well known how difficult it is to raise funds adequately to support the cause of missions, schools, or even the maintenance of churches,—enough for all which, and vastly more, is now absorbed in every community where the wasteful expenditure in intoxicating drinks is encouraged,—whilst they produce the awful catalogue, of prostrated health, pining poverty, deserted homes, and premature death.

" The Committee therefore respectfully but earnestly solicit the establishment of Congregational Temperance Societies in connexion with each association of christians, in Banbury and its neighbourhood,—they feel assured that with the blessing of Providence, they would prove of more lasting and real benefit than is generally supposed, that families, from the highest to the lowest, would bless their efforts, that the cause of righteousness and truth would flourish under their benign influence, and thus hasten the day, when ' Righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.' "

MILITARY MORALS.

By ENSIGN JOHN FANNING.

A brief abstract of the services of two soldiers, detailed from my own observation, and perfect knowledge of the parties, and facts stated, will furnish us with a forcible illustration of the evils resulting from the vice in question, and the solid advantages of the opposite virtue.

James Matthews and William Galvin were, when first they came under my notice, serving together as privates in a Regiment of the Line, into which they had enlisted at the same time. As these men were from the same town, and had been schoolfellows, a considerable intimacy subsisted between them for several months after their enlistment; and each possessed in nearly an equal degree, such personal qualities and acquirements as were likely to constitute efficient and prosperous soldiers. They held on in a parallel course of good conduct for about two years; but James Matthews then began to fall into habits of intemperance. His progress in the vice was at first slow and almost imperceptible; his visits to the canteen or public-house outside the gate, became gradually more and more frequent—he lingered in either haunt in the evenings, till the last note of the bugle summoned him away, and eagerly watched the first opening of the canteen to procure his morning dram: ardent liquors became eventually a necessity to him—he could not live without them—he exhausted all his pay in their purchase, and when his pockets were emptied, he did not scruple resorting to any degrading solicitation by which “another glass” could be obtained. The sale of his necessaries to procure means of continuing his darling enjoyment presented a temptation which he could not resist. Shirts, trousers, stockings, &c. &c., disappeared in rapid succession, until a bare back and an empty knapsack revealed his self-plunder. From the time he first sold his kit until the end of his service, life was to him merely an alternation of crime and punishment: he became a notorious nuisance to the Regiment, and, after nineteen years, in which he gave perpetual trouble to others, and suffered continually himself, the wretched man was sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, for having, in a moment of drunken frenzy, struck a non-commissioned officer in the execution of his duty. In closing the record of his service, previous to his being handed over to the civil power, it appeared that he had been tried by courts-martial eleven times, had received corporal punishments to the extent of seven hundred lashes, and endured imprisonment at various times, solitary and with hard labour, amounting altogether to two years and nine months. Exclusive of all this evil, he had also suffered loss of pay by several sentences of forfeiture, to the amount of £19. 15s. 5d., and an incalculable amount of knapsack drill and other minor punishments.

And yet this man, bad and worthless to the service as he undoubtedly was, never committed crimes but those which were the immediate consequences of his evil propensity. He was, in his sober moments, remarkably clean in his person, obliging, and obedient; but drunkenness neutralized his good qualities, involved him in wretchedness and contempt for nineteen years, and ultimately consigned him to chains and the hulks.

Let us now turn from this melancholy view of human degradation, to contemplate the prosperous career of a temperate man.

William Galvin, the contemporary of James Matthews, was neither a saint nor a teetotaler; he had his full share of the faults incidental to youth, with one exception, namely, that he was habitually temperate. He never sourly rejected any reasonable enjoyment with his comrades; but he knew when pleasure should terminate, and had always the moral firmness to withdraw himself at the right time. In fact, the art or faculty of leaving off was the secret of his success; and it is, I can assure my readers, a secret worth knowing in the army. His education was only ordinary; but, in conjunction with his established sobriety, it fitted him for any duties that devolve on a non-commissioned officer, and he obtained more notice and approbation during his service, than many of his comrades who were superior to him in every respect but one. After a very creditable career of twenty-two years, he was discharged a serjeant-major, on a pension of 2s. 4d. per diem, with the medal and gratuity. The officers and non-commissioned officers of his corps each presented him with a piece of plate in token of their esteem on leaving the regiment; and he had whilst serving (having been many years in lucrative situations), saved money to the amount of four hundred pounds, with which he returned to his native place and entered into business.

The same success which distinguished him in the army attended him in civil life, and from the same causes he is now progressing fast to wealth, and all the consideration which it obtains.

Compare, I beseech you, kind reader, the lives of James Matthews and William Galvin, and say which you would resemble,—the choice is yet yours, and as you decide now and act in future, so will be the course and termination of your military service.

Drunkenness is favourable to no virtue, save a maudlin and indiscriminating good-nature; if that can be called a virtue which only make a man ridiculous. On the contrary, it revives old enmities with double force, rouses pride, excites revenge, stimulates sensuality, and tends to the rapid development of every evil propensity to which human nature is subject. On the constitution its prejudicial effects are numerous and severe. Medical officers have frequently declared it to be “the remote or proximate cause” of nearly every sickness which comes under their treatment. When excessive, it induces loss of memory, paralysis, aberration of intellect, delirium tremens, and death. How many wretched men have perished, suffocated in their liquor! It is not my province to dwell upon the awful considerations which such a catastrophe suggests; but what Christian can think, even for a moment, without shuddering, upon the probable fate of that soul, which is separated from its earthly tenement in drunkenness?

I hope I have sufficiently exhibited the evils, many and serious, of inebriety, and the certain and solid advantages of sobriety, to convince the soldier that he should cling to this as his safeguard, and abhor the other as his sure destruction. It is not intended here to advocate “teetotalism,” which is, with reference to military life, an impracticable and unnecessary renunciation of articles whose occasional and judicious use may be enjoyed with propriety. The austere and monkish extinction of an appetite is not what a soldier should aim at, but its perfect subjection to the demands of duty and the rule of reason.—From Naval and Military Gazette.

[We shall in a future number recur to the subject of "Military Morals," and shew how little the advantages of teetotalism are understood, by Ensign Fanning. Ed.]

BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

In a recent number, we briefly intimated that the British Association, had held its fourteenth Annual Conference, in the Music Hall, Leeds, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of July. The report of that association has since reached us, which is a valuable document, and from which we make the following extracts:—

"The Committee of the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance, in presenting the Fourteenth Annual Report, desires to record its gratitude to the Almighty Disposer of human events, for the gratifying degree of success which has attended their efforts to further the interests of the Temperance Reformation during the past year. The period which has elapsed since the assembling of the last Conference has been one of unusual activity, the operations of the institution having exceeded all precedent. The petition movement—the conference of ministers of religion—the commencement of the Sunday School and Youths' Temperance Journal—and the extension of the Agency department,—have, however, not only involved a serious amount of labour, but considerably increased the responsibilities of the committee, and presented fresh and urgent claims upon the liberality of the friends of the association. It is, however, with peculiar pleasure that the committee is able to report its continued and entire freedom from debt; and it is hoped that a brief statement of the various plans attempted to be carried out, and the partial or entire success attending them, will induce the members and friends, not merely to continue, but to increase the pecuniary support hitherto given to the association.

AGENCY.

During the past year, the committee have never had less than seven agents employed; and, without an exception, the endeavours of these sincere and earnest men to diffuse the knowledge of the principles of true temperance, have merited the approval of the committee, and given entire satisfaction to the friends in the districts they have visited. In consequence of the defective condition of the societies in counties where no district unions have been established, it has been deemed proper to confine the labours of the agents, as much as possible to localities which are organised. This course has been pursued under the impression, that where a union of societies has been attempted, every encouragement ought to be afforded; and in no other way can it be so effectually given, as by supplying such districts with efficient advocates, upon whose zeal and devotion the prosperity of the movement materially depends. While in those unions, the physical and mental labour performed by the agents has been very heavy—in some instances excessive; it is believed, indeed, that nothing save a just appreciation of the immense importance of the cause, and of the numberless blessings it is adapted to confer upon mankind, would have enabled them to sustain it. The agents at present employed, are John Addleshaw, T. B. Thompson, Robert Gray Mason, Joseph Bormond, William Crawford, John Spencer, and Benjamin Glover.

We observe, also, with pleasure, that local societies are becoming more systematic in their operations in publishing annually a statement of their transactions, Income and Expenditure. We would recommend this practice to general adoption, as being but justice to the subscribers themselves, and calculated to inspire public confidence.

SELBY TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Extract from last Report.

Nearly twelve years have elapsed since this society was first established. During that period, many have been the wild predictions uttered against it, and many the difficulties it has had to encounter. Hitherto it has come off triumphant. Opposition has only tended to increase the ardour of our friends; the cause is still progressing; drunkenness and vice are giving way; the drinking-customs of society are falling into desuetude. A brighter day begins to dawn: the dark cloud is broken. We look with pleasure upon the signs of the times; and, whilst we lift our hearts in grateful acknowledgment to Heaven, we pledge ourselves to renew and increase our exertions, until every link in the tyrant's chain shall be snapped asunder,—the oppressed slaves of intemperance liberated from the power and thralldom of their depraved appetites,—and the foul blot which stains our national character, shall utterly disappear.

The number of members enrolled in the books of the society is 1200; of which, 793 are adults, and the rest juveniles. According to the last census, the population of Selby was 5600; so that at least one-fifth of the entire town may be regarded as pledged abstainers. From among our adult members, we may select representatives of all classes of society: thus proving the universal applicability of our principles to all circumstances and conditions in life.

Public attention is especially requested to the fact that, far from there being any connexion between total abstinence and infidelity, (as some have insinuated,) your committee are enabled to produce living witnesses—members and officers of Christian churches, who owe their all to teetotalism. We can point to numbers of once poor, degraded, forlorn drunkards who, through the efforts of this society, have been led to abandon their evil habits, and attend the temple of the Lord.

No expense has been spared in securing men of talent to advocate our principles: it is with pleasure we recount the labours of that distinguished advocate, Mr. Jabez Inwards (from the National Temperance Society), who has delivered six lectures, met the children and teachers of the various Sunday schools, and held a Washingtonian meeting of the members. All these meetings were densely crowded; and we doubt not, impressions have been made upon the town, generally, which will never be obliterated. The Rev. Benjamin Parsons delivered an excellent lecture on the wine question; and the Agents of the British Association have visited the town once a month, and delivered lectures which could not fail to bring home convictions to the minds of their hearers.

PLAIN SPEAKING.—An article lately appeared in Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, entitled "A Look into a Directory." The writer, in reference to London, says, "Her table is supplied with wine by 1000 wine-merchants, and, alas! her poor are poisoned with intoxicating beverages by eleven thousand public-houses."

Progress of Temperance.—Metropolis.

A meeting, under the patronage of the National Temperance Society, was held last evening at Exeter-hall. Mr. Cassell having been called to the chair, addressed himself to the statistical part of the question, showing that much might be saved in the way of police-rates and poor-rates, by the adoption of the temperance principles—principles which, he contended, would do more to elevate the people morally, socially, and even politically—judging from the impetus given to drunkenness at contested elections—than any amount of political agitation. Mr. Inwards proved to the evident satisfaction of the meeting, which he addressed in a humorous strain, that teetotalism was faultless in principle and operation, and that its disciples were better, and healthier men than were or could be the votaries of Bacchus. Messrs. Hudson, Whittaker, and Smith also dilated on the advantages of temperance and the many evils that flowed to individuals and society generally from the use of intoxicating beverages, and thanks having been voted to the chair the meeting separated.—Daily News, Dec. 19th.

Being unable from certain circumstances, to furnish a more lengthened report, we refer our readers for full particulars of this interesting meeting to the "STANDARD OF FREEDOM," of the 23rd of December.

FITZROY ASSOCIATION.

The Ninth Anniversary took place on Monday, November 6th, at the Hall, Little Portland Street, by a tea-party and public meeting. B. Rotch, Esq., B. L., Visiting Justice for Middlesex, took the chair. The secretary read the report, which was cheering and encouraging; the weekly meetings have been well attended during the year, in addition to which, a number of lectures on temperance and other interesting subjects had been delivered. Tracts had been distributed in the streets, from house to house, and in many localities in the district, from room to room. The treasurer presented his accounts; the receipts were, £159, 18s. 5d.; the expenditure £135, 15s. 9½d. leaving a balance in favour of the society, but which will be counterbalanced by some considerable outstanding expenses.

The various resolutions were supported by Rev. Dr. Burns, Messrs. Roberts, Grosjean, Davies, Beesley, Green, and Moody, in able addresses, which were listened to most attentively by a crowded audience, as also a most interesting speech from the worthy chairman.

F. P. DRAPER, Hon. Sec.

GEORGE STREET, LAMBETH.

A festival and public meeting were held on Thursday, the 23rd of November, in the British School, when 200 persons sat down to a substantial repast, after which excellent addresses were delivered by Dr. Oxley (chairman), Messrs. T. A. Smith, Balfour, Campbell, Spriggs, Buckle, M'Currie, Davis and M'Bain. At the close a large number of signatures was obtained.

KENSALL NEW TOWN AND KENSALL GREEN TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

DEAR FRIEND.—Two months ago the Rev. A. G. Pemberton, incumbent of St. John's, Kensall Green, kindly granted the gratuitous use of the school-room, which he rents of a person who is also the proprietor of a beer-shop in the immediate neighbourhood. This landlord, as might be expected, refuses to allow the meetings to be continued on his premises. Consequently we are obliged to discontinue them until, by the assistance of some kind friend or friends, we are enabled to build a hall for ourselves. In addition to a place of meeting, a library is much needed, in order to elevate the people in this almost heathenish locality. Here we are, with a population of about 6,000 persons, enveloped for the most part in profound darkness, ignorant of the motives which ought to prompt rational beings to the proper discharge of the duties which devolve upon them. If London, with a population of one million and a-half, contains 18,000 gin and beersellers; Kensall New Town and Kensall Green give us an average in this locality of three houses for one in London, where intoxicating fluids are sold. Can we wonder, then, that we have many resident confirmed drunkards, or that many of the rising generation should be becoming such. Combined with the aforesaid evils, thousands of persons resident in London, who take a country walk on the Lord's-day, are seen visiting these beer and gin shops, so that the minds of the rising generation are becoming familiarised with drunkenness; consequently perish they must and will, if we cannot obtain a hall for the advocacy of our principles.

JOHN METCALFE, Sec. Pro. Tem.

P.S. We have been favoured with gratuitous lectures from our friends Messrs. Balfour, Spriggs, Mann, Claridge, and others, and have obtained about twelve names to the abstinence pledge.

DEPTFORD.

The Twelfth Anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society in this place, was celebrated by a festival and public meeting, in the Infant School Room, New Street, on Wednesday, November 15th. B. Rotch, Esq., had engaged to take the chair, but the visit of the Queen to Harrow, on the following day, imposed magisterial duties upon him, which prevented his attendance. Mr. Spicer, Minister of the General Baptist Chapel, presided in his stead. Although the numbers at tea, were not, we believe, quite so numerous as on the previous year, the meeting was one of great interest, and must have been alike gratifying to the committee and the audience. The speakers were Messrs. Lucy, of Greenwich, Independent Minister, Hudson, of the National Temperance Society, Beal, of Walworth, Nelson, of the Royal Artillery, Woolwich, and Perfit. Perhaps the most remarkable portion in the evening's proceedings was the report, read by the secretary, Mr. D. G. Pain, and which according to what appears to be the rule in this society, was a poetical one; we subjoin the four last stanzas for our readers' entertainment.

"Your Committee in closing, would say, that surrounded
By multiplied proofs of the evils of Drink;
So intense, that too often the Christian confounded
By its profligate measures, is ready to sink;
They will still persevere—they believe it their mission,
The work which their Master assigns them to do;
They will not, they dare not, relax their decision,
'Tis the path they should tread, and that path they'll pursue.

But not to themselves is this duty restricted,
The mandate which bids them the Drunkard unthrall,
To each lover of God and of Man is directed;
It lays the same mighty command upon all.
Till Religion's pure precepts you totally sever—
Till you tear up the roots of Humanity's laws,— Till you abrogate all that is sacred,—you'll never Be free from the claims of the Temperance Cause.

You may search with exemplary toil for excuses,
And Pride will dictate a great many no doubt;
And the palate without much persuasion produces,
Some obvious motives for standing without:
But with Conscience, each far-fetched apology goeth
For nothing,—it finds out the dross and the tin;
For the Scripture asserts, that "to that man who knoweth
To do good, and doeth it not, it is Sin."

Then we ask for your aid, here's a wide field before us;
The harvest is great, but the labourers few;
Drink's sceptre is waving with magic power o'er us;
And a gloomy Golgotha expands to our view,
Join us heart, join us hand, and we'll give over fearing,
With our anticipations bright hopes shall entwine;
With the blessing of God, if we're spared, far more cheering,
Shall be our Report for eighteen forty-nine!"

TOTTENHAM.

The advantages of having a respectable and convenient Hall, in which to propound our principles, has not been lost sight of by our good friends at Tottenham. Since the Theatre of the Literary Institution has been employed for the purposes of the Temperance Society, there is a vast improvement both in the numbers and the intelligence of the auditors. This was apparent on the evening of the 27th of November, when sometime before the time of meeting, the Hall was well filled in every part. Mr. Henry Vincent delivered a long and as usual an eloquent address on some of the moral features of the Temperance movement, which told powerfully on the assembly. Charles Gilpin, Esq., presided, and introduced the lecturer in a very telling speech, in which was graphically depicted the blessings true sobriety had conferred, having especial reference to the industrial classes.

Votes of thanks were tendered to both these eloquent and philanthropic gentlemen.

SPALDING.

This town had long been in a dormant condition in respect to the temperance movement. A few individuals, anxious that the flame should not be wholly extinguished, made application to the National Society for assistance and advice. Mr. Thomas Whittaker was accordingly deputed to deliver two lectures in the town, on the evenings of the 20th and 21st of November. So great however was the interest created, that a third lecture was requested and delivered. The room was densely thronged each night; and large accessions to the society, and a re-kindling of the scattered elements, have resulted. From accounts we have since received from the secretary, the Spalding Society bids fair to effect a complete revival.

SHEERNESS.

On the evening of Monday, Nov. 13th, a lecture was delivered in the Bethel School Room, Mile Town, by Mr. T. Whittaker. Mr. George Morgan in the chair. The lecturer faithfully exhibited both the effects of drunkenness upon its victims, and the great responsibility of moderate drinkers, and combated many popular objections.

On Tuesday evening, a tea festival was held, and about 200 sat down to tea; happiness and comfort seemed to prevail with all present. After tea, Mr. Whittaker delivered his second lecture, in which he fully illustrated the influence of example, having special reference to the rising generation. He also made an earnest and pathetic appeal to those who profess to be followers of Christ, no longer to withhold their adherence to the temperance cause.

It affords pleasure to those who have struggled hard in the temperance cause in this place, to know that their labour is not in vain. The fruit is appearing in rich clusters; much good has been done by Mr. Whittaker's lectures here; many have been induced to look with more complacency on our cause than they have formerly done. The room was crowded both evenings, about thirty signed the pledge. The society now numbers 325 members, and is in every way in a prosperous condition.

HOWDEN.

The total abstinence society of this town has the pleasure to announce to the public, that Mr. James Teare, has recently favoured us with a course of five lectures on the "Immorality of Making, Selling, and Drinking Intoxicating Liquors." The lectures each evening were well attended; a few signed the pledge, and numbers are thoroughly convinced of the sinful practices of the drinking system.

ST. IVES, HUNTS.

TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL.

The committee of the temperance society in the above town, being desirous that something should be done to counteract the evil tendencies of the Michaelmas Fair, made arrangements for holding a festival in connexion with their society during the fair, hoping that the immorality which abounds on that occasion might be checked by their efforts. Their anticipations have been in a great measure realized, and considering that this was the first attempt of the kind that had been made in the town, there is much cause for encouragement. The festival was held on two of the days of the fair, commencing on Thursday, the 12th of October, on which day tea was provided in the New Public Institution Room, at which about 200 persons were present. After the tea, a public meeting was held, when the spacious room was completely filled. The Rev. E. Davis (President) was called to the chair, and was received with applause. On rising to open the meeting, he remarked that the gentleman who had proposed him as chairman, had said that the society was honoured by having as its president, a minister of the Gospel. He would adopt the same language, in a rather different form, and say, that he considered it an honour to himself to occupy that position, and that it would always be his desire to do all in his power to promote the objects of the temperance movement. He recommended the principle of total abstinence to others, as he was convinced from his own practice, of its benefits. The meeting was next briefly addressed by the Rev. J. Harecourt, after which the chairman introduced

Mr. EDWIN PAXTON HOOD, of York, who was received with loud and continued cheers, and in a lengthened and highly interesting address, he proceeded to shew the good effects of temperance, and the connexion which its progress had with moral and social reform, and the improvement of the condition of the people. He urged moderate drinkers to abstain, and aid by their example the progress of the temperance cause. During the evening he entertained the company with several of his delightful temperance melodies.

On Friday evening, Mr. Hood delivered a lecture in the same place to a crowded audience, on "The moral, social, and political aspect of the temperance argument." Mr. J. L. Ekins occupying the chair. Mr. H. spoke in a masterly style for about two hours. The proceedings were again enlivened by vocal music, the lecturer observing, that if truth was but lodged in the mind, it mattered but little how it was done, whether by song, speech, or example. Song, he said, had a mighty influence over the mind, and that influence might be turned to good purposes. After a few other friends had addressed the meeting, it was concluded.

The assembly on both occasions appeared highly interested and gratified, and it is hoped that the beneficial effects of the meetings will be apparent. The necessity of a movement in the right direction, in this town, will be seen, when it is stated, that there are upwards of eighty public houses, with a population of only about 4000 inhabitants. The Temperance Society intend to hold a series of meetings during the winter.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform the friends of progress that the cause of temperance is still warmly espoused in this town and neighbourhood. In addition to Mr. Bermond, the committee have engaged

Mr. Irvine White to deliver a course of lectures in the principal towns connected with the Durham and Northumberland Temperance League. Since my last account kindly inserted in the Chronicle, an interesting temperance festival has taken place. The Girls' Jubilee School have established a society. Out of 150 girls trained for useful situations in life, 146 have, after being duly instructed, signed the pledge. At the suggestion of the missionary, an ardent lover of temperance, one of the committee of the school resolved to give the young folks a splendid treat: creating an anniversary, and giving a "warm welcome home" to their amiable teacher, who had been absent for some time studying in London. The 30th of October found the school decorated with evergreens, mottoes, &c., and at four an assembly of well clothed and happy children, to the number of 200, sat down to abundance of cake and coffee; the side tables were occupied by parents and friends of the school. Among the latter were many distinguished members of the Society of Friends, ever ready to every good word and work. After the repast and thanks to God being sung, the meeting commenced—Mr. Buchanan briefly stated the object of the meeting, dating the commencement of this Juvenile Day-School Temperance Society in 1846. The children then sung a melody; "A Warm Welcome Home," to their teacher, who, deeply affected by this mark of affection, gracefully returned thanks; then another melody was sung, "The Crystal Spring." Mr. Buchanan, acting as master of the ceremonies, introduced Messrs. Whitehead, Weir, Barkas and Bensons, who severally addressed the meeting. We hope their very interesting speeches will not be soon forgotten by young and old. Several cold water melodies, appropriate to the occasion were sung, and finally the Doxology. Thus ended this interesting assembly. We hope the lovers of education and temperance, who wish to see a sober generation of young persons, will be encouraged by these unvarnished details of this anniversary, and give the same kind co-operation to the temperance agents, that has been given here, in their endeavours to initiate the youths of our country into a knowledge of the beauty and necessity of abstaining from the use of intoxicating drinks. The writer is happy in having it to state that he has succeeded in establishing two other Juvenile Temperance Day-school Societies, numbering 120 members, under the care of their respective teachers, who are themselves consistent members of our Temperance league. I cannot conceive a more interesting and beautiful sight than these young boys and girls, glowing with health, full of animation and buoyant with hope, wearing their medals and ribbons when the missionary pays a monthly visit: their steady attention to the address and satisfactory answers to questions, give us strong hope of future "Hope for the world." My earnest prayer is, may they never become the victims of any vice or of drunk-ness.

Very much is due to the Ladies' Committee who visit this school and superintend it; if they are not named personally they are highly esteemed for their great urbanity of manner and labour of love.}

Nov. 10th, 1848. VERITAS.

TONBRIDGE.

On Tuesday, the 7th, instant Mr. T. Whittaker favoured us with a visit, and a lecture on total abstinence, after a public tea meeting, which took place in our Town Hall, and which was respectfully attended. The worthy lecturer proceeded, in his own peculiar and effective style, to advocate the noble cause, and in so doing delighted and benefited a numerous, intelligent, and attentive audience.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN WILLIAMS.

UXBRIDGE.

The members and friends of the society held a festival and meeting in the Public Rooms, October 3rd, when about 140 persons sat down to tea and enjoyed themselves after a fashion to which the votaries of Bacchus are utter strangers. The Rev. W. R. Baker presided, and delivered an excellent and eloquent address, prior to the introduction of five agricultural labouring men from Ruislip. The testimony of these men was nearly as follows:—William Bunce (in an ironical strain) declared that when he was a drinker he was so enfeebled as to require help; drink had made him like work so well as often to induce him to lay down by it. But he had been a teetotaler for some time past, though not half long enough; he was now happy, his master was better satisfied with him as a workman, and he now delighted in the exercises of religion. He had mown and reaped during the past season with great advantage on abstinence principles.

Henry Lavender, had often gone home drunk, and as a consequence had frequently nothing but the bricks of the floor for bed and pillow; when he rose in the morning he had sore bones, and nothing refreshed by his hard repose. He had performed his duties as an agricultural labourer during the past summer and autumn to his own satisfaction.

William Lavender, jun., had been a teetotaler for a year and nine months, and had gone through two seasons in the hay and the corn-fields, and he believed his master (Mr. Pearce, of Ruislip,) had found no fault with him on the score of his inability to work. Since he had signed the pledge it was his delight to look at home; and in a higher sense the things he once hated now he loved, and he would humbly invite others to follow his example.

William Lavender, sen., bore similar testimony. He had experienced much peace of mind by the course he had latterly adopted. His employers during the last two summers had much encouraged him in his good resolutions, by which he had been strengthened to resist temptation.

Edward Bray, who had formerly gained the unenviable notoriety of being the greatest drunkard in the parish of Ruislip, testified his obligations to the temperance cause in a very homely but forcible manner. During the delivery of his address, Mr. Ives, a farmer, involuntarily rose and stated to the meeting, that when his man (Bray) drank beer he could do nothing with him; that he was accustomed to misspend the time of his employer who was often put thereby to great inconvenience. Mr. Ives, however, could now find him when his service was required, which was either at home or at his work, or on the Sabbath day in a place of worship.

After the delivery of an address from Mr. T. Hudson, the Rev. Chairman concluded the proceedings.

At Ruislip, a few weeks previously, a similar meeting was held in a commodious tent, on the grounds of Mr. Pearce, who is a warm friend (though not a pledged teetotaler) of the labouring population. At the latter meeting 21 persons signed the pledge. The two policemen present to keep order (f) were not of the number.

HALSTED.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

ESTEEMED FRIEND.—Believing a very beneficial impetus would be given to our cause, were parties more ready to forward reports of meetings and proceedings than is at present practised, I pen a few remarks relative to our position and movements in this town. We have listened with pleasure, and with profit also, to two addresses from John Spencer, of York, our present county agent, (since we were able to exchange sentiments during thy late visit to this locality;) his subject at the last lecture, on the 7th inst. tended to prove the fallacy of attributing strengthening properties to alcoholic drinks, in which he clearly proved them inadequate to that purpose. He interspersed his address with very clear simple illustrations and facts, in proof of his arguments.

Our juvenile "Band of Hope" continue to attend their weekly meetings, and evince an increasing interest in the proceedings thereat; about sixty or seventy mostly attend, to hear addresses, or the temperance publications read, exchange their tracts, and recite pieces of the most impressive character, and thus we hope we are able to realize anticipations correspondent with our motto "The Band of Hope." John Spencer meeting these an hour previous to the lecture, enabled him to interrogate, examine, and animate this promising branch of the temperance movement, in a way which we believe will prove of lasting utility in carrying on the most useful train of exertions amongst them, and we trust in his next visit he will find his labours are not in vain. Thy assured friend,

BARON SMITH, Treasurer.

NEWMARKET, FLINTSHIRE.

MY DEAR SIR.—I have lately visited Dysent, Rhyddla, Llanasa, Waeneson, and Sarn, lecturing and distributing tracts, &c.

Ipswich temperance tracts are of great service to me, when I go among the English. I have abundant reason to believe that a Scotch gentleman has received a lasting benefit by looking over, and perusing the above tracts—yes, I hope and pray that temperance, or total abstinence, may be the means of leading him to the Saviour! Thousand thanks to R. D. Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich.

Although the noble cause of temperance is rapidly gaining ground in North Wales, still we have much to do, many, many, obstacles to be removed, and powerful enemies to be gained over and conquered. Among the chief hindrances are these,—

1. That there are many other sins closely connected with the drinking habit, such as an excuse for indolence—public-houses being so convenient for the gay, foolish, and thoughtless, to meet each other, for every kind of indecency and iniquity. Wales would be like a paradise upon earth, humanly speaking, but for the numerous public houses we have everywhere!

2. That maltsters, brewers, and publicans, are the only men of station and influence in many small towns and villages in Wales—almost all transactions are carried on by them, in a temporal and spiritual sense.

3. We have also to contend with the religious people, professors, and even ministers, who continue to call at public-houses for drink and tobacco! Church ministers, and many dissenting ministers, stand aloof entirely from us.

How long are we to hear of ordinations in England kept up with great dinners, and toasts drunk?

Does not the Bible connect fasting, imposition of hands, and prayer? (Acts xiii. 3.)

No wonder that the Holy Spirit is grieved, and so few souls saved!

Do not we find the people of God conforming to the wicked world, by feasting, drinking, smoking, &c.? Then, how can we expect any great revival of temperance and religion? Yours truly,

EVAN DAVIES.

COVENTRY.

SIR.—I feel it my duty, on behalf of the society in Coventry, to express our thanks for the visit of Mr. Inwards. During the present year we have been making great efforts to raise the cause in this city—have had able and earnest advocates, who have set forth our principles in every possible way. But the visit of your talented agent has put new life into us. Every teetotaler who speaks of the lectures seems more confident, encouraged and devoted to the cause. It is very gratifying to hear teetotalism advocated in so decided and uncompromising a manner. Mr. Inwards neither apologises for introducing the subject, nor does the principle suffer for want of fearless advocacy or plainness of speech. He appeals to Scripture, and by accumulated evidence, carries his audience forward to his inevitable conclusions. His visit will be long remembered.

C. P. NEWCOMBE, Sec.

LEIGHTON.

DEAR SIR.—I have the pleasure of informing you that the inhabitants of this town and neighbourhood were favoured with a lecture from Mr. Whittaker, on Friday, the 3rd of November; the subject "Great Britain stranded in Drunken Bay," which gave great satisfaction. The chair was taken by our president, J. D. Bassett, Esq. On Friday 17th, we were favoured with a second lecture from Mr. W., subject, the "Three Towns;" the humorous manner in which Mr. W. introduced the different characters so riveted the attention of his audience, that the time fled too rapidly. The meeting was presided over by the Rev. J. Wilson, the clergyman of the parish.

D. TRIBUTE.

GREAT TORRINGTON, DEVON.

On Thursday, 2nd November, Mr. Williamson, agent of the National Temperance Society, delivered an interesting lecture in the Town-hall. The chair was taken by our respected President, Mr. Veysey, to whose liberality and exertions the society in this town owes its existence. Mr. W. appealed to the audience as to the facts he was about to deliver, and should expect from them the same unbiassed and just verdict as if they were a jury sworn by their country. He proceeded to describe the evils of intemperance, physically and morally, and appealed to scripture for support in his arguments. He denounced the drunkard's drink in good earnest. His general remarks upon the effects of total abstinence, shewed he had an intimate acquaintance with the subject. His remarks were plain, impressive and practical, and was listened to with deep attention. Good must have been effected.

HENRY SANFORD, Secretary.

PLYMOUTH.

SIR.—Having been for many years last past connected with the temperance cause in this town, and feeling as I most cordially do, a warm interest in everything connected with its prosperity, I beg to forward the following brief report of a few meetings which we have recently held here on occasion of a visit from your agent, Mr. John Williamson.

Some four or five weeks since, on his first visit here, after a long absence, we held a meeting in our Guildhall, when the Rev. James Sherman of London, gave us the benefit of his personal attendance and advocacy.

Mr. Williamson then followed in a most masterly address. Since then we have held two more meetings, at which he has attended and spoken—the first on Monday week last, was attended by about 300 persons. Mr. Williamson spoke about an hour with very great interest and energy, and at the close of the meeting twenty-two signed the pledge. Last Monday we had the second meeting, when he again spoke and with equal success.

Wishing him and your Society increased success,
I am, dear Sir, your fellow-labourer,

N. HOOPFELL.

[A very lengthened communication has also been received from Mr. S. Pickard of Bideford, bearing similar testimony to the zeal and ability of the Agent of this Society.]

AMERICA.

Our cause has the active co-operation and support of many Governors of States, Judges of Courts, Senators and Representatives in Congress, Legislative Societies, Mayors of cities, Presidents of Colleges, Officers of the Army and Navy, calling for gratitude and trust.

The remark of his Excellency, Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, when complimented for having come to Roxbury to attend a temperance meeting, that "he had not come down to do an act for the temperance movement, but that he had come up to give his testimony and influence for temperance, for it was an honour to any man, however high his station, to be engaged in this work," was no less creditable to that noble-minded magistrate than a just tribute to the cause.

Among American seamen on the ocean and inland seas, temperance has become an abiding law. Not a merchantman or a whaler now sails from our ports with the spirit-ration. Our national flag alone, floating over the whisky tub of a man-of-war, is disgraced, and blushes for its country.

Our churches and the sacred ministry have recently taken a new interest in our enterprise, and associations are formed for the better promotion of the cause on strict Christian principle, believing that "except the Lord build the house they labour in vain that build it." State Conventions, State and County anniversaries and local meetings have imparted a sound and healthy tone and given good impulse to the cause. Numerous leagues and orders of a popular character have risen and spread over the land; one, the Order of the SONS OF TEMPERANCE, now numbering over 160,000 members; another, the Order of RECHABITES, numbering over 14,000; others enlisting female influence, and arraying the children and youth over all our hills and valleys against the fatal destroyer.—Abstract of the Annual Report of the American Temperance Union.

RATHER FAR-FETCHED.—"Well, my boy, do you know what syntax (sin-tax) means?" said a schoolmaster to the child of a teetotaler. "Iss, sir; the dooty upon sperrits."

Doings of Strong Drink.

ATTEMPT TO HANG A CHILD.—Hunslet has nearly been the scene of a second tragedy this week. On Saturday night last, Joseph Phillips, who resides in Taylor's place, Hunslet Carr, and is by trade a potter, returned to his home rather the worse for liquor, and immediately went up stairs to bed. His wife had not retired to rest, but his child, an only one, was fast asleep. He took the child out of bed, tied a handkerchief round its neck, and suspended it to the railing of the bedstead. His wife, hearing an unusual noise up stairs, proceeded thither, when, to her astonishment, she found her infant nearly in the agonies of death, and her husband quietly looking on. She instantly took the child down, and alarmed her neighbours, but whilst she was doing this, the father, who is said to have a penchant that way, thought he would try hanging himself, and "tucked" himself up, but he took special care to rest his feet on the bed, and in this position he was found. The fellow is in custody.—Leeds Intelligencer.

DESPERATE AFFRAY.—Monday night a surgeon named Addison, was in company with Mr. Thomas Hartnoll, a painter, drinking at a public-house in Southampton. They left about two o'clock on Tuesday morning, quarrelling with each other. When they arrived at the Houndwell, a large open space in the centre of the town, Addison took a pistol from his pocket, and shot Hartnoll in the groin. Addison was immediately apprehended. Hartnoll, after walking a few paces, fell, and was conveyed to the infirmary, where he now lies dangerously ill, and is not expected to recover.—Bristol Mercury.

THE EFFECTS OF HAVING A DISSIPATED WIFE.—"We regret to learn that three other cases of Asiatic cholera have occurred in different parts of the city, (Glasgow,) all of which have proved fatal. The first occurred on the forenoon of the Sabbath, at Burnbank, a tenement on the Great Western Road, the patient being a jobbing gardener of the name of John Gordon. It is stated that the man has [had] the misfortune to have a very dissipated wife, who, during the past week, allowed her husband to go without his regular meals, and to this circumstance is attributed the origin of the disease."—Globe, November 17th, 1848.

BRISTOL POLICE REPORTS.—October 30th.—Eliza Douglas, an old Scotch woman, was charged with wilfully breaking the windows of Mr. Betts. The prisoner, it appears, was drunk, and broke the window with a large stick, without any provocation. The damage was seven shillings. The magistrate asked what made her break the window. The prisoner, in a strong Scotch accent, "Eh, sirs, a cannie Scotchman gave me two tumblers o' toddy, an' I was only a talking to mysel'; I did na know what I was doin wi' mysel.'" Mr. Sanders inquired whether she had any money to pay for the window. The prisoner; "Eh, nae I hae nae money; I dinna know what I have doon wi' aught-and-saxpence I had. She was sent to Bridewell for ten days.

Ann Sims was charged with being drunk and disorderly, and assaulting P. C. 192. The offence was proved, and she was fined 5s., or seven days imprisonment in default. The prisoner said she would go to prison like a brick, for it was impossible to pay the money with a family of eight children.

Captain Swiney, 63rd regiment, committed suicide at his apartments in the Strand, on Saturday morning, by "falling on his sword." Through reckless intoxication he had brought on delirium tremens.

THE CHOLERA.—Among other instructions given by the Board of Health, in the third number of its official circular, we have the following wholesome advice:—"Fifth Instruction.—On the bane of SPIRITS, CORN-BRANDY, WINE, &c. It is a very common notion among sailors and other people, that brandy, whisky, rum, wine, and the like, are good, as protection against the cholera. This is a total and fatal mistake: in every county and town where the cholera has broken out, drunkards, and those who drink freely, have been the first and greatest sufferers from the disease; temperate men usually escape, drunkards usually die. It is, therefore, earnestly hoped and requested, that captains will warn their crews against all excess in drinking, more especially warn them from taking corn-brandy or gin, which often acts as a poison."—Morning Chronicle, November 29th.

HOW TO CIRCULATE THE CHRONICLE.

(Extract from an Old Lady's Letter to her Nephew.)

MY DEAR THOMAS,—I have received several temperance papers, for which I return you my most sincere and affectionate thanks. I cannot say how many papers I have received, not having them at home; but this I can say, both myself and friends read them with great pleasure. I must tell you how I proceed with them; I read them first of course, as the least thing I could do for your kindness, and need not say with what kind of feelings I peruse them! Then they are read by my neighbours, then they travel towards Leigh and West Leigh, and Mr. L. and Mr. S. are much pleased with them, and then I finish up with George Oakile who says, "Now have you read them enough, for you know when I once put my hand upon them you never need expect to see them again," and indeed he keeps his word, I never do, though I don't despair of hearing of them again, as he makes a most enormous noise about them. [We trust our subscribers will go and do likewise.] Your affectionate Aunt,

MARY IRLAM.

The writer of the foregoing is upwards of 70 years of age, and has been a practical teetotaler all her life.

TEMPERANCE PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, AND
GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, 39, MOORGATE STREET, LONDON.

MORE THAN THREE THOUSAND POLICIES have now been issued, and the claims on account of death, have been only 11 in the current year.

THE WHOLE PROFITS are divided among the assured in three different modes, at each Member's option.

LOWER PREMIUMS than in most Mutual Offices; thus securing an immediate Bonus of 10 to 35 per cent.

Every assurer is a Member, and entitled to vote at the Annual Meeting.

The benefits assured can be secured to survivors FREE OF DUTY, by simply registering the names in the Books of the Society.

Persons abstaining from alcoholic beverages, are assured in a distinct section, free from any possible losses through intemperance.

As the first division of PROFITS is intended to be made at the close of 1850, early application for admission is recommended.

THEODORE COMPTON, Secretary.

To Youths' Temperance Committees, and Sunday-School Teachers.

On the 1st of January, 1849, will be Published, under the superintendence of the Committee of the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance, No. 1, Volume II. of the Monthly Periodical entitled

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL AND YOUTHS' TEMPERANCE JOURNAL:

Price One Halfpenny per No., or 4s. per 100,

PAID IN ADVANCE.

THIS periodical is issued from the Isle of Man, from which it can be sent free by post to all parts of the United Kingdom. It will be printed on better paper than that hitherto used, with a clear type, and will contain 16 pages, the size of the 'Christian Penny Magazine,' conducted by Dr. Campbell. The outside leaves will form a cover, and will be used for notices and advertisements connected with juvenile movements, leaving 12 pages to be devoted to useful and instructive matter, adapted to Sunday scholars and young teetotalers generally.

The editorial department is under the care of a literary gentleman of influence and long standing in the temperance world, and also of extensive experience in education; and the friends of the rising race are assured that no efforts will be spared to render this little messenger of truth acceptable and instructive to those for whom it is specially designed.

The hope of the Temperance Reformation is now, in a great measure, centred in the young; and the encouraging success which has attended the formation of 'Bands of Hope' and other similar organizations for training youth in the path of sobriety, renders it important that the good work, thus auspiciously begun, should be strengthened and consolidated by every available means. In furtherance of this object the Youths' Temperance Journal was begun, and with this aim it will be continued; and the friends of the cause have only to give their earnest co-operation, in order to produce a harvest of good both abundant and lasting.

This Journal, during the present year, has attained a very extensive circulation; but as there is a large field of operation almost wholly unoccupied by any work of a similar character, the Committee are convinced that with little effort its sale may be greatly extended.

Sunday-school superintendents and teachers are urged to make arrangements for supplying a copy to every scholar in their respective schools, and Youths' Temperance Committees should promote its circulation at all their meetings.

The following will be the Scale of Prices for 1849, always required to be paid in advance:—

1 copy per month,	3d.	—per year,	6d.
6 copies do.	3d.	do.	3s.
12 do. do.	6d.	do.	6s.
26 do. do.	1s. 0d.	do.	12s.
50 do. do.	2s. 0d.	do.	24s.
100 do. do.	4s. 0d.	do.	48s.

The usual allowance made to the trade; and Temperance Committees, Sunday-school Superintendents, and others, taking 50 copies and upwards, will be allowed a discount of 12½ per cent.

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Five lines across the entire page, 3s. 6d.; and 4d. for each additional line.

All orders for the ensuing year, accompanied by a post-office order or postage stamps, must be sent to Mr. John Cunliffe, Temperance Hall, Bolton, not later than the 15th of December.

Agents and others are requested to prepare for next year's orders.

To those who desire to raise the social and moral condition of Great Britain.

THE

MODEL PARISH DIETETIC COCOA,

Manufactured by Messrs. Cadbury Brothers, Birmingham, and sold wholesale by Messrs. Wertheim and Macintosh, publishers, Paternoster-row, London; and may be had through order of Booksellers, Druggists, Grocers, and respectable tradesmen, throughout the kingdom.

First quality, 1s. 6d. per lb.; second, 1s., in half lb. packets, 6d.

The profits of this article are devoted to the Model Parish and its schools.

Benevolent families and the friends of the Temperance cause are therefore earnestly entreated to get the tradesmen in their respective neighbourhoods, to keep this superior Cocoa.

If any difficulty occur in obtaining the Model Parish Cocoa in any place, two or three families can join and have a box of 14lb. or 20lbs., direct from Messrs. Cadbury, Birmingham, who promptly execute all orders, and pay the carriage.

The trade are informed that Messrs. Cadbury make the usual allowance, as well as pay the carriage, but as the manufacturing profits go to the establishment of the Modern Parish, and its schools, or Post Office remittance payable to Messrs. Cadbury, Birmingham, must accompany each order.

Agents wanted for all parts of the Kingdom.

In a few months, upwards of 7,000lbs. of this delicious article have been sold.

WORKING MEN'S ESSAYS ON THE SABBATH.

A very extraordinary and interesting meeting was just taken place in Exeter Hall, at which were awarded prizes to the several successful competitors "for the best Essays (written by working-men) on the temporal advantages of the Sabbath." In the report read by Daniel E. Oakey, Esq., one of the adjudicators, it is observed:—

"The moral sentiments which find expression in the Essays are, in almost every case, of a high order, as they are of scriptural authority. The numerous advantages of the Sabbath in the promotion of private and public virtue, are prominently exhibited. Many crimes are traced to the violation of the Sabbath, as their common and prolific source. The prevalence of intemperance and carnal infidelity, especially among the youth of this country, are distinctly shown to issue largely from this cause. Characters and scenes of deep interest are often described with great effect, all giving evidence of the high moral sentiments with which the writers of the Sabbath Essays are imbued.

Now while we can rejoice, yea, and do rejoice, at indications of the growth of intellect and the religious principle among the working-classes is visible; while we are firm believers in the great advantages of the Sabbath as a day of rest, regarded even as restorative of the bodily powers of man; we cannot but observe how both the reports and the speeches err in ascribing the prevalence of intemperance (though to be sure the subject was at little alluded to) rather to the desecration of the Sabbath, than the desecration of the Sabbath to the wide-spread evils of intemperance. If any proofs were needed of the position we have thus ventured to transpose, the history of almost every Sabbath-breaker in the country would furnish the required demonstration. Our Prison Reports—our Police Records—and even our Church Registers bear testimony to the fact, how that many had ceased to remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy, having first forgotten "to be vigilant," "to be sober"—having set at nought the divine admonition of the Redeemer to his disciples, "Take heed lest your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and that they come upon you unawares."

At the meeting subsequently held at the Freemasons' Tavern, evidence of this nature was offered in homely and forcible language by more than one competitor, showing how drink had led to the violation of the Sabbath, and the abandonment of drink was the prelude to a "newness of life." What said Mr. Fisher, a labourer of Wisbeach?—

"I have often been before the public, especially in connexion with the temperance movement. I am sorry to say it was a long time before I regarded the Sabbath; yet I believed that those who kept the Lord's day, and did their duty, were more happy than I was. I spent sixteen or twenty years of the most useful part of my life in seeking pleasure where none was to be found, and I had the character of being a miserable, wretched drunkard. But it pleased God to give me eyes to see the danger I was in, and I was persuaded by kind friends to give my hand to the temperance cause. If you, dear sir, were in Wisbeach, I could show you the spot where I first made up my mind to give my heart to God, and said, 'If I cannot live without this drink, I will die without it.' Soon after I had made this resolve, the hand of affliction was laid upon me, and I was led to see what I really was: for I expected to be called into the presence of an angry God. At this time I was forty years of age. I poured out my soul in prayer to God, and gained some amount of happiness. I have made every endeavour to educate myself. I have spent a good deal of my time in Sabbath-schools, and I have been blessed with the care of about a hundred souls as superintendent of a Sabbath-school.—(Cheers.)

"We regard this movement," says the Standard of Freedom, in a very pointed article on this subject, "with especial interest, and have, in consequence, ventured to express our views of its merits; and if the opinions of temperance reformers are of any weight with the gentlemen who are its anxious promoters, we would say to them that, if they wish to succeed fully and completely, they must admit us as their auxiliaries. They must do so warmly and unhesitatingly, or they may depend upon it that the cause which they have so much at heart will suffer. The drinking-usages of England are the implacable enemies of the Sabbath. These usages—and their name is legion—are so entwined around all the events, habits, and courtesies of life, as to render an escape from their bewitching snares almost a matter of impossibility. All classes are ever haunted by them. Like the body of death, they impose their crushing, deadly weight on all living energy, and consume much time and money. But as the working man's time is limited, the day of rest is too often devoted to the gratification of the artificial and pernicious appetite which has been created by strong drink. He repairs to the beer-shop on Saturday night. The hard-earned wages of the week are squandered, the man returns to his home a brute, or stays in his den of infamy until he becomes like an infuriated demon, and when on Monday he returns to his daily toil, he does so with an enervated frame, hardened sensibilities, and a seared conscience.

The friends of the Sabbath movement will agree with us, that one day out of seven is indispensable for the moral education of the labouring-classes. Without it, order, morality, and religion would soon be banished from the land. Not only would the Sabbath be spent in drinking, but the effects of the Saturday evening debauch would quite incapacitate the mind for any religious exercises on the coming day. And even if the working man in that state of depravity might desire to attend church or chapel, his wardrobe and the domestic misery created by his drunken habits would present almost insuperable obstacles in his way. The day of rest would thus soon become the festival of sensuality and disorder, and the next step would be its sacrifice to the grasp of commercial cupidity, whereby its beneficent, social, political, and moral influences would be entirely lost. To such a lamentable state the drinking-usages of England are rapidly leading us. Hopeful and promising as are the symptoms of a healthful tone of morals among our labouring population, we must not close our eyes against the solemn evidence which is afforded, day after day, that social drinking is the curse of Britain, and that thousands of the sons of labour are annually sacrificed on the altar of lust. We regretted to find that scarcely an allusion was made, in the excellent speeches delivered, to the drinking-usages of society. Sir Edward North Buxton and Lord Ashley advocated legislative interference in order to put down Sunday-trading. Sunday-drinking is far more baneful in its demoralizing effects than any traffic that can be carried on. It is in the power of the working-classes and their friends to put this down without the assistance of Parliament. They may become their own lawgivers, and thus effectually settle the question. Let total abstinence become universal, and sobriety, self-respect, self-reliance, morality, and religion, will find a home among the labouring-classes of Britain as long as the world endures.

It needs only to be added, that the low districts of London, which typify also the low districts of the large provincial towns, and even the less populated rural districts, abound with so many evidences of the unholy alliance of strong drink and the desecration of the Sabbath, that blind indeed are those advocates for a devout observance of the Lord's-day, who seek not first the extirpation of the arch-enemy of God and man—this great antagonist of social order and religion. Assuredly this must first be done before they that sit in darkness can reasonably be expected to see the glorious light of the gospel, or the song of David, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! become the National Anthem of a regenerate people.

MOTHERS—THEIR PHYSICAL, MORAL AND MENTAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Every sensible, conscientious mother desires that her child should possess a sound mind in a sound body. She knows that temper and disposition are greatly influenced by the physical constitution, and that in all cases where there is no hereditary disease and no organic defect, a careful judicious system of training is the means appointed by Infinite Wisdom to promote health, vigour, cheerfulness of disposition, and vigour of mind. The wise mother, therefore, is in the first place careful of her own health for the sake of her offspring, and prepares for a right performance of her maternal duties by due attention to her own physical system. All articles of diet that disorder the stomach, affect her appetite, or agitate her nerves should be carefully excluded. Yet how strange is to observe, that many expectant or nursing mothers, most anxious about their food, careful not to go into heated rooms, or to fatigue themselves with exciting amusements, will from the tyranny of pernicious customs, daily take fluids that inflame the blood, and debilitate the system, (simply because use has made these fluids agreeable to the palate,) and take them moreover without any inquiry into their nature or effects. Surely common sense, without entering into scientific details, ought to convince every mother that drinks, however small in quantity, which flush the cheeks, quicken the pulse, heat the blood, and exhaust the frame, cannot be taken with impunity. A very little candid observation will soon convince any one, that such are the effects even of moderate drinking on the excitable frame of woman.

Scientific opinion has been given in abundance on this subject.

Dr. Grindrod says, "The peculiar temperament of females, in many respects, renders them more susceptible of the influence of stimulants. The conduct of the mother undoubtedly influences the health of her offspring. The child inherits, to a remarkable extent, the physical temperament in particular of its maternal parent. On the conduct of mothers, therefore, depends, to a great degree, the vigour and health of the rising generation."

Dr. A. Combe, in his work on "Physical Moral Management of Infancy," says, referring to nursing mothers, "The best supply of healthy milk is to be derived, not from a concentrated and highly nutritious diet, but rather from one consisting of a due proportion of mild vegetable, farinaceous, and liquid food, with a moderate allowance of meat, without either wine or porter."

Dr. Macnisch observes: "Women who act as nurses, are strongly addicted to the practice of drinking porter and ale, for the purpose of augmenting their milk. This very common practice cannot be sufficiently deprecated. It is often pernicious to both parties, and may lay the foundation of a multitude of diseases in the infant. The milk, which ought to be bland and unirritating, acquires certain heating qualities, and becomes deteriorated to a degree of which those unaccustomed to investigate such matters, have little conception."

To these testimonies, multitudes might be added. The difficulty in this case, is not selection, but condensation. Ten years' practical experience of the total abstinence principle, with a tolerably ample opportunity of observation, gives the writer of these remarks some authority to speak of the children reared on this system. Every teetotal society in Britain of any extent, can furnish a nursing mother to testify, that during the time of performing the tenderest maternal office to her infant, she abstained not only without injury, but with advantage to herself and offspring. This testimony is so common, that the writer has heard it in various parts of England, and usually with the addition, that the children nursed on the temperance plan were better tempered, more cheerful and lively, than the others who had been differently reared. Dismissing prejudice, is it not rational, that a child should thrive better, and be happier, whose diet from its mother is not liable to all the heated changes which irritating stimulants must create? How desirous are all considerate mothers to prevent, during the time of nursing, all irritation, to avoid if possible all frights or agitations, knowing that a very little disturbance of the system will affect their infant charge; and yet mothers careful in all these matters will, with uninquiring acquiescence, take intoxicating drinks that must inevitably disturb the whole system, and go unchanged into the milk to heat the susceptible blood and irritate the delicate brain of the babe she nourishes.

Has it never occurred to those mothers who think nursing cannot be performed without the assistance of alcoholic stimulants, that myriads of the human race in ages past have been reared on what are now called temperance principles? Instead of this being a new plan, it is an old one; a return to those laws of physical training, adhered to when the world was free from many of the deadly maladies that now afflict its inhabitants.

Wherever our travellers have discovered savage tribes, they have usually been astonished at the good and uniform health enjoyed by the people they beheld. This was the case with the aboriginal inhabitants of North and South America; the New Zealander, and all the people inhabiting the islands of the South Seas. The mere physical system was far superior to that of more refined nations. Of course, this was attributable to their living more in accordance with the laws favourable to health. The women of these tribes performed the tender maternal office of their nature, and their offspring, unvitiated and unstimulated by alcohol, were vigorous and healthy.

One would suppose nursing, with us, was a disease rather than a natural function of the system, to judge by all the artificial arrangements which some mothers think it necessary to make for its performance. Among the millions who worship the false prophet of Mecca, no stimulants as beverages can be used by the nursing mother, for wine is strictly forbidden by their law, and they have no drink analogous to our malt liquors. Indeed, no country in the world has such a costly array of drinks for general consumption, and yet in all countries the female constitution has to afford the same supply to infancy.

Important as the question of health is, there are other considerations of equal, if not superior moment, that claim a mother's attention. The early tastes of infancy become the habits of riper years; "Man," says Paley, "is a bundle of habits," and in the first seven years of life the impressions made are indelible. What a reflection, that the babe nursed with fondest solicitude, the present delight, the future hope of its tender mother, may become that fearful thing—a drunkard! Every mother looking on her innocent babe, that heard such a whisper sounded in her ear, would thrill with mingled horror and indignation, and as she clasped her babe to her bosom, would exclaim, "Never! it is too dreadful a supposition." Alas! every reeling, blaspheming drunkard that defiles God's earth, and pollutes the air of heaven, was once as innocent as the sweetest babe this day reposing on its mother's bosom. And if we could have the real history of all the incidents that led to the fatal consummation of the drunkard's vice, we should find in most cases, that a habit of love for strong drinks was implanted in childhood; and that by considering them a treat, a reward, an indulgence, the baneful seed was first sown; which, though long torpid, germinated ultimately, and produced the foul fruit of intemperance. It is of little use that a mother says, "I was always abstemious; I drank only in excessive moderation;" a habit acquires respectability in proportion to the excellence of those who practise it: and a mother's habits will have, to her child, all the pleasing sanction of her authority and her virtue. How can the child think that habit wrong in itself, or dangerous in its consequences, which he sees a beloved mother practise? He grows up connecting ideas of hospitality, courtesy, and happiness, with strong drink; and the cases are by no means rare, where these early predilections in favour of their use degenerate in after life into odious intemperance.

Thus, as a question of paramount importance to the moral welfare of her child, a mother should be careful to check the beginnings of evil in reference to intemperance. She should not sanction by her practice any habit likely to be dangerous to her child. Her offspring comes to her, with tastes unvitiated, an appetite undepraved. If strong drink is never presented to it, it will never desire it; nay, its repugnance is so strong, that considerable pains are necessary to induce the child to overcome its natural dislike to stimulants. Nature makes the child a teetotaler, why not leave it so?—Woman and the Temperance Reformation, by Mrs. Clara Lucas Balfour.

DR. CAMPBELL ON CHOLERA.

It does not come within our object to discuss the propriety of medical men presenting alcoholic drink as a cure for this disease. We are aware that it has been very much in favour with most medical men, and that while they unanimously condemn its use as a most likely agent in the production of cholera, they approve of its applications as a remedy for the disease. That the faculty has even misgivings regarding its use as a medicine is evident, and we subjoin one proof of it. Dr. Andrew Buchanan, Professor of the Institutes of Medicine, Glasgow University, has just issued a work, entitled Observations on Malignant Cholera, from which we make the following extract:—

“Stimulants have appeared to me to tend only to inflame the stomach, and to be of no use in exciting the heart to a salutary action. They should never be used in larger quantities than to act as cordials to an irritable stomach. Employed on the principle on which they are used in typhus, they are worse than useless. The injection of spirits and other stimulant liquids into the bowels, is still more highly pernicious, causing inflammation and ulceration of the colon and rectum, as was repeatedly ascertained by dissection.”

We submit these facts and testimonies to the dispassionate consideration of every honest-hearted man. That there exists a most intimate connexion between drinking and cholera cannot be doubted. And the man who shuts his eyes to the facts we have stated, is shutting out the light, and courting his own destruction. Appetite or prejudice may be whispering excuses in your ear, but this, we tell you, is not the time to hear them; you must dismiss from your councils those enemies of your welfare, and prefer truth and reason as your guides.

Doubtless these pages will be read by many who profess the Christian name, and who add to that profession the practice of moderate drinking. We have most respectfully to assure such persons, that their practices are at utter variance with their professions. Better never to have known the facts of the case, than knowing them to despise and reject them: there can be no suffering so little entitled to sympathy, as that which results from a wilful disobedience of the laws of our nature, and especially when that disobedience is aggravated by the cloak of Christian profession.

You call your body a temple consecrated to the living and true God, and yet to satisfy your lust for false excitement, or in obedience to a depraved custom, you pour down your throat an inveterate poison; thus defiling that temple, endangering its safety by admitting within its precincts one of its most malignant enemies. Your example, if imitated, must certainly be followed by the most fatal results. If you should escape the fatal malady which these drinks are so well-fitted to engender, it may not be so with others who have followed your drinking example; and a day of reckoning may proclaim to your shame, that you have been instrumental in casting upon this cold world disconsolate widows and helpless orphans.

We have no hesitation in asserting, that the drinking-system, old as it is, stands before the world without one redeeming feature in its character; and now that it appears before you the prolific parent of disease, you must either renounce it as the work of the devil, or openly embrace his service; for, be assured, Christianity will have nothing that does not belong to it.—Christian's Penny Magazine, January, 1849.

CANTEENS.

The subject of the following article, as it appeared in the Morning Herald of the 6th ultimo, was evidently written, firstly, to show that the partial suppression of the canteen system has effected but little good; and secondly, to furnish the readers of that paper with a political moral. As to the latter, we pronounce no opinion, but we take leave to say there is so much point in the article itself, that we presume not to withhold it from our readers.

We doubt whether there are many military men in the country who have felt any surprise, whatever regret they may have experienced, at the statements which have from time to time appeared in the public journals, to the effect that the new canteen system has not been particularly successful. Whilst acknowledging the good intentions of the reform, we were always sceptical of its beneficial results. Nothing, at the first blush, could appear more undeniably recommendable in itself than a regulation prohibiting the sale of ardent spirits in those licensed military taverns which are called canteens. To the old canteen system many objections were to be urged of a very potent and intelligible character. Its evils were all in front. They who ran might read. The military authorities were themselves selling ardent spirits to the too-easily tempted soldier. The dram-shop was contiguous to the barrack. Dram-drinking, by the official sanction of the old canteen system, was rendered legal and respectable—it was “made easy” by authority. The canteen was a standing temptation under the very barrack windows. Everybody could see that there was something wrong about that. It was the Horse Guards fishing for drunkards—establishing schools of intoxication; and it was not difficult to find the weak points of a system which carried a record of its deficiencies on the very forehead. The principle of the change was excellent; for the change was one that involved the direct removal of an admitted evil. But men of experience could plainly perceive other and greater evils in the back-ground. They did not deny that the experiment was worth trying, but they distinctly foresaw its failure. They saw that not one dram less would be drunk by any regiment in the service. They saw that the propensity would exist all the same, and that the effect would be, not to diminish dram-drinking in the army, but to force the soldier back upon more obscure sources of evil, and compel him to draw the suave sœculus from a more impure font. It was predicted that drams would be drunk under the new system as under the old; the only difference being, that under the former the checks would be less, and that, removed beyond the reach of official inspection and control, the vendors of ardent spirits beyond the boundaries of barracks would sell a more deleterious compound to the soldier, at a higher price. And so it has turned out. Little or no good has come of the change. There are not more virgin pages in the character-book than before. The guard report does not contain the names of fewer prisoners. The hospital returns are not more encouraging. Neither the military nor the medical authorities of a regiment can bear witness to any striking improvement in the moral or the physical condition of the soldier. There is not less dram-drinking than before, and therefore there is not less crime and less disease. The experiment, we say, was worth trying, but it has not succeeded.

It is easy to determine how this has happened. It is not by such outside material changes that dram-drinking is to be rooted out of the army. The change, to be effective, must be a moral change. It little matters whether spirits are sold within or without barrack boundaries; under military authority, or under civil authority; or, as often happens, under no authority at all. It is not a question affected by such local and personal considerations. The soldier longing for a dram will get it whether the canteen serjeant will furnish it to him or not. He may go a little farther for it, he may pay a little more for it, and get a much viler drug for his money. But he will get it, and in larger quantities too than would be served out at the canteen. What we ought to endeavour to effect is, not the removal of the site of the dram-shop, but the removal of the inducements to resort to it. The dram is the soldier's solace. He takes to drinking because he is miserable—because he is surrounded by drear discomfort—because he has not the shadow of a home. Make the soldier more comfortable in barracks, and he will go less to the dram-shop, and, therefore, less to the hospital and the guard-room. It is an old truth, often repeated, and often again to be repeated; for acknowledged as it is in words, it has yet found but little practical acknowledgment. We are still trying the effects of all sorts of restraints but the right ones. The change must come from within. We can introduce into the army no material checks which will restrain the soldier from destroying himself, body and soul, by strong drink. But it would not be so difficult to diminish the temptations of the bottle,—the brightness of the present allurements. Now, the dram has it all to itself. There is no rival near the throne of that potent monarch. There are no home comforts—no pleasant rational amusements for the soldier—to keep him, in cheerfulness and self-content, from flying to the aid of those noxious spirituous stimulants, which lift him for a time above his cares, to plunge him again more fearfully into the abyss. What has yet been done to afford the soldier innocent recreation within barrack bounds, has as yet been done on so small a scale as in no wise to have affected the general character of the army. It would not be easy to calculate the sum which dram-drinking in the army costs the country; but every one who has any military experience knows at how large a figure it may be written down without fear of exaggeration. If we would render our army a cheap, we must study to render it a moral one.

FINANCIAL REFORM.

Our distinguished friend, James Silk Buckingham, Esq., has published a long letter to Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., on his proposed National Budget. As was to be expected, Mr. Buckingham has devoted a considerable portion of his letter to the consideration of temperance as a part of financial reform. After discussing other topics, he thus proceeds:—

Let the people everywhere advocate and practise the greatest of all reforms, whether considered nationally or individually—the abolition of the use of all intoxicating drinks. If any evil is to be judged of by the amount of expenditure it occasions, its waste of the national wealth, the entire absence of any corresponding benefit, and the creation of an immense mass of disease, poverty, and crime, this national evil of indulging in the use of intoxicating drinks is the greatest that has ever afflicted the country, and therefore calls the loudest for immediate and extensive remedy. And as it is strictly within the limits of "National Financial Reform," I make no apology for closing my letter with a brief allusion to it, as it would take a long epistle to dwell upon all its evils in detail.

The amount of our useless and unnecessary expenditure in this unwholesome and pernicious indulgence, is greater, by six-fold, than all the £10,000,000 which you propose to cut off from the cost of our armaments—for this exceeds £50,000,000 per annum. Here, then, is an available fund, out of which the whole of the national debt might be paid off in less than sixteen years! and thus the whole of its interest of £28,000,000, which hangs like a mill-stone round the neck of the nation, and furnishes the perpetual stumbling-block to all extensive plans of financial reform, might be swept away at once and for ever!

This, indeed, would be a reform worthy of a great nation to effect, and do it far more honour than any other that could be named: because, like the national sacrifice made for the abolition of slavery, it would prove, but in a much greater degree than that, the virtue, resolution, and courage of the people to achieve a victory over themselves, by conquering and subduing one of the strongest and most injurious of their propensities. For this reform we should need no consent of Parliament—no concession of any Chancellor of the Exchequer—no reciprocal disarmament of other nations—no costly public agitation—nothing but a firm resolution to make a trifling sacrifice of our own personal appetites for the good of our country, and the relief of the houseless, naked, and starving portion of our fellow-countrymen. This reform is wholly within our own hands, and we have only to pass the following resolution, each in his household, and faithfully to act on it, to make the victory secure—namely, "That from this day we resolve to abstain from the use of wine, spirits, beer, and every other intoxicating drink, and appropriate the weekly or monthly amount heretofore expended by us in these drinks, to a fund for the redemption of the National Debt, till it is completely liquidated and abolished."

If the Queen of England would set the example, by having all intoxicating drinks removed from the royal palaces, as the young heroine, Miss Arnold, recently requested that all the ardent spirits on board the Rainbow steamer, on her voyage to Aden, should be cast into the sea; and if the officers of the royal household would comply with their royal mistress's desire, as readily and cheerfully as the gallant and hardy seamen did with that of the young daughter of their deceased commander, the nation at large could hardly fail to be influenced by such a truly noble example of self-denial for the good of others, and it would crown the already illustrious name of Victoria with immortal honour, as the sovereign whose example had led, in a single reign, to the payment of all the debts contracted by all the kings who had preceded her, and thus relieved her subjects from the enormous burthen of £800,000,000 sterling, or an annual tax of £28,000,000 per annum—with which her predecessors had loaded them, by their extravagance and disregard of public economy.

If the abolition of the National Debt be thought too remote a contingency (though less than sixteen years would be a short time for such a great achievement) to justify the sacrifice of personal enjoyment required—though in reality the sacrifice is very slight, as all who have tried the experiment find themselves better in health, without those stimulating drinks than with them, and are consequently more happy—there is another important purpose to which the saving of the immense sum squandered in useless drinks might be applied—might be immediately and most advantageously applied.

One of the great evils under which this country, like every other in Europe, is suffering, is the vast number of persons who, having no employment by which they can earn their bread, became paupers, beggars, or thieves, by necessity; while thousands of even those who can obtain work are so scantily paid, that they have not the means of procuring sufficient food, raiment, or fuel, while their children are reared up in rags, filth, and ignorance.

Think for a moment, what a happy revolution it would be for all this large suffering class, abounding in every town and parish, and increasing every year, if the £50,000,000. per annum, thus wasted and lost, could be saved, or diverted from its present pernicious application into the giving employment, in productive agricultural labour, draining and cultivating all the bogs and wastes of Ireland, Scotland, and England, increasing the supplies of food and clothing for all—building healthy and comfortable cottages for the labourers—establishing schools for gratuitous education of the poor—asylums for the aged and infirm—and employing every individual able and willing to earn his bread by labour throughout the country. Think of such a blessed and bloodless victory as this, and I am sure you will be disposed to hasten it with all your power.

Or if this should be insufficient to absorb the whole of our unemployed population at home, what a magnificent fund might be formed out of these savings from intoxicating drinks, to defray the expense of emigration for the young and healthy persons of both sexes, who are most anxious to seek a new home in our fertile colonies, but have no means, either to pay the cost of their voyage, or to furnish themselves with the necessary materials for pursuing their avocations when they arrive there; in consequence of which, we see the melancholy and contradictory spectacle, of millions of acres of the most fertile land lying idle for want of cultivators in our colonies, and millions of hands lying idle at home for want of occupation, wanting only the money requisite to bring both into contact; the government declaring itself to be too poor to furnish the funds, and the community, who possess more than sufficient for the purpose, squandering £50,000,000. sterling a-year in useless and pernicious drinks—a sum that would amply provide transport, land, and sufficient capital to commence its tillage, for a million of unemployed persons as emigrants every year.

Here then is a "Financial Reform" in every man's power, and the benefit of which would be a hundredfold greater, in its collateral consequences, than any other reform that could be thought of. No new charter of liberty, whether of five points or of ten—no improved constitution of government yet proposed, not even the abolition of war, fearful as is that scourge—nor all the other reforms, of colonial emancipation, improved prison discipline, voluntary education, universal suffrage, vote by ballot, or all the political changes advocated from time to time by every party, would effect any thing like the benefit, in so short a time, as would the simultaneous and voluntary relinquishment of a practice more productive of wasteful expenditure, of generated diseases, of poverty, want, crime, and misery, than all other causes put together.

Does any one pretend to disbelieve this? Let him consult the evidence given before the Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the subject, and its Report laid before the House of Commons in 1834, or let him ask the judges of the land, the guardians of the poor, the keepers of prisons and lunatic asylums, the magistrates of police, the teachers of religion, or any other class who have extensive experience in the habits of the population, and they will all confirm the fact, that besides the wasteful expenditure of £50,000,000. per annum in drinks which medical science, and the experience of millions, have proved to be wholly unnecessary for either health or strength, more than half the misery of the working-people, of the embarrassments and bankruptcies of the middle-classes, and of the vicious propensities and crimes of all ranks, arise from the use of stimulating and intoxicating drinks. But in addition to the wasteful expenditure of £50,000,000., in their cost, the use of these drinks occasions a loss of time, and of the wealth which this time industriously employed would produce, as well as a destruction of life and property beyond all calculation, besides being the most prolific source of the poor rates, the police rates, the costs of our hospitals, lunatic asylums, jails, hulks, and penal colonies; since it is the use of these drinks which engenders the recklessness, indolence, theft, prostitution, and crime, which fill all these establishments, and require such enormous expense for their maintenance, making the whole cost to the nation exceed £100,000,000 at the very least, and leaving all other branches of financial extravagance and waste quite in the shade!

If it be said, that those who make only a moderate use of these intoxicating drinks, do not contribute to the evils thus described, they deceive themselves; because, besides contributing, in whatever proportion their consumption may be, to the wasteful expenditure, and to the sinful conversion of wholesome fruit, nutritious grain, sugar, and other valuable substances of food, into pernicious drinks, and thus lessening the quantity of sustenance available for the nourishment of the poor; their example, in making even a moderate use of these drinks, encourages and excuses their less intelligent countrymen, as they constantly refer to such examples for the justification of their own practice.

There may, possibly, be some, let us hope they are but few, who may say, "Why should I be called upon to make a sacrifice of my personal comforts and enjoyments, because others are unable to restrain themselves within the bounds of moderation?" The answer to such persons will be very brief, namely, "That the whole theory of the Christian religion is based on the principle of our so loving one another, as to be ready to make any sacrifice of our superfluities that may be required to supply our fellow-creature's necessities. This, too, is the basis of all philanthropy, benevolence, and patriotism. No man can truly be said to be a Christian, whose bowels of compassion do not yearn towards a suffering fellow-being. No man can have the least claim to the title of benevolent, who is not willing to deprive himself of some enjoyment, if by so doing he can add to the happiness of others. And as for patriotism, how can any man pretend to that virtue, who does not love his countrymen as well as his country, or who can see his fellow-townsmen perish from hunger and nakedness, or live a life of drunkenness and misery, without stretching forth a hand to save him? Whether as Christians, philanthropists, or patriots, therefore, our duty is clear, if we claim to be either, and would support it by our conduct; if not, it is mere hypocrisy to pretend to these titles, and we should therefore either practise this Christian virtue, of making some sacrifice for the good of others, or relinquish all claim to the honour and credit of the Christian name.

Since, then, the entire abolition of the use of these drinks would save £50,000,000. a year in money uselessly spent, and at least £50,000,000. a-year more, in time saved, and property rescued from destruction, as well as in the saving of the expenses of maintaining the paupers and criminals degraded by their use, making in the whole £100,000,000 a-year, or ten times the amount you propose to cut off from the national expenditure, I am sure you cannot fail to see, that the language you have applied to the "Liverpool Financial Reform Association," on the abolition of the malt-tax, would apply with tenfold force to this self-imposed branch of useless and pernicious drinks; namely, that as by this expenditure "the supply of bread-corn is considerably decreased," (there being upwards of 8,000,000 of quarters of grain annually destroyed as food, by distillation and brewing, to say nothing of rice, sugar, and other grains in our colonies,) "and the comforts of the people, and the wealth of the country, greatly impaired, your National Budget would be wholly undeserving the name, if it did not include its total repeal."

That all these objects will sooner or later be achieved I have no doubt whatever; and for every effort you may make towards the promotion of either, the world will be your debtor. I hope, however, that your attention, and that of the nation, may be more seriously directed than it has hitherto been, to the greatest of all these questions, "Temperance Reform;" and if you will take counsel on this subject from your excellent friends, Mr. Joseph Sturge, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Joseph Brotherton, Mr. Edward Baines, and Mr. Lawrence Heyworth, with all of whom you are in familiar communication, I have no doubt that they will all confirm the soundness of the facts and conclusions to which I have directed your attention on this subject.

I am, Dear Sir, yours faithfully,
Dunfermline January 8th, 1849. J. S. BUCKINGHAM.

GOOD ADVICE TO EMIGRANTS.

A young Irish man called upon me, who came to Van Diemen's Land, a few months ago, with a small sum of money, and soon after his arrival got into a situation; but giving way to dissipated habits, and making a mock, as he said, of temperance, he found many of his own stamp who were willing to seek his friendship while his money lasted. This was not long; and as he soon incapacitated himself by intemperance, he lost his situation. When his money was gone, his friends were gone also; and some that he had helped were unwilling to help him in return, and he was at his wit's end to know what to do. Many young men who come out with fair prospects, ruin themselves in this way, and then find fault with the colony. Without persons have capital, and conduct to take care of it, they should not emigrate to the Australian Colonies.—Backhouse's Australian Colonies.

DECREASE IN THE CONSUMPTION OF GOOD PORT WINE.

A certain house of eminence in the city, under date 26th of December, 1848, has issued a circular, and from which we extract the following passage, from which it would appear that the drinkers of port wine should take heed to their stomachs:—

"We take this opportunity of laying before you our usual statistical return of the consumption of Wines in this country, and regret to observe a considerable and gradual decrease in Port Wine, the quantity now consumed being less than it was fifty years ago, although the population is about double; which is the more surprising, as it is generally acknowledged that good Port is one of the most wholesome and suitable Wines for this variable climate: we fear the introduction of low and inferior Port has contributed greatly to produce this result."

DRUNKENNESS.

Man with raging drink inflam'd
 Is far more savage and untam'd;

Supplies his loss of wit and sense
 With barbarousness and insolence;
 Believes himself, the less he's able,
 The more heroic and formidable;
 Lays by his reason in his bowls
 As Turks are said to do their souls,
 Until it has so often been Shut out of its lodging, and let in,
 At length it never can attain
 To find the right way back again.

TO A CORRESPONDENT.

In answer to a query of a correspondent, as to whether a man breaks his pledge by drinking elder wine, we reply that the matter may thus be disposed of: If the elder wine contain alcohol it is intoxicating, ergo, if a man drinks intoxicating elder wine he breaks his pledge. Whether elder wine contain the property of intoxication, may easily be ascertained by handing a portion for experiment to an analytical chemist. We think it wise, whenever any doubt exists, to err on the right side and abstain.

For the accommodation of strangers from a distance, Tea will be provided in the School Room afterwards, at Sixpence each.

Progress of Temperance.—Metropolis.

WALWORTH.

On Tuesday evening, November 14, 1848, a physiological lecture was delivered in the Infant School Room, York Street, Walworth, by Mr. W. H. Freemantle, called "The People Poisoned," illustrated with diagrams. The Rev. Jonathan George, of Horseley Street, occupying the chair. In introducing the lecturer, he made some very judicious and practical remarks, backed as they were by his own experience of the benefits derivable from upwards of eleven years' total abstinence, he could and did testify to the practicability of the principles, enforcing his remarks by stating that all sin was based in error, and that there could not, nor did not exist a greater error than the supposition that intoxicating drinks were the good creatures of God.

Mr. Freemantle introduced his lecture by stating "What had God made man for?" He then went into the beauty, the consistency and harmony of the Divine Being in the creation of man, and delightfully showed how wrong and inconsistent it was for man, so fearfully and wonderfully made as he is, that he should take any thing into his system which tends to interrupt or disturb the beautiful workmanship of God; and by reference to various diagrams, proved the injurious influence and effects of alcoholic stimulus upon the human constitution.

On that evening fortnight, Mr. J. W. Green delivered a lecture in the same room, called "The People Cured," in which he proved the salutary influence of "Touch not—taste not—handle not," as a means of curing or reclaiming those who were already to a certain extent poisoned.

RICHARD HODGSON.

GREENWICH.

The Annual Meeting of the Borough of Greenwich Association, was held on the evening of the 12th of December, 1848, in the Theatre of the Literary Institution. Benjamin Rotch, Esq., LL.B. Vice-President of the Association, occupied the chair. The public meeting was preceded by a tea party, in a smaller room of the building. The tables, as might be expected from the well-known taste exhibited on all occasions by the directors of the society, were laid out after a fashion that gave rise to well-merited encomiums. At the hour appointed, the company adjourned to the larger room of the Institution. The chairman was supported, right and left, by the Rev. Dr. Burns, Rev. William Lucy, Henry Cole, Esq., Isaac English, Esq., Edmund Fry, Esq., Messrs. Hudson, T. A. Smith, J. Phillips, J. Buckle, G. C. Campbell, and other gentlemen.

Mr. H. Cole read the report, which was much cheered, and from which we hope to give extracts in a future number of the Chronicle.

The Chairman, in a very powerful address, pointed out the hydra evils of intemperance. He could tell many a tale of woe resulting from drunkenness and also from the moderate use of strong drink. But first he would say, that he liked to hear of these balances in hand in connection with such societies as the present; and he liked the money test of membership—it showed the heart was in the work; the sum of 5s. was not too low for the high, and the payment of 6d. a month was not above the power of the very poorest friend of temperance. Money was the sinew of war, and they had to wage war with alcohol! He saw a bright uniform before him, and he would put it to the soldier, who may have gone to the cannon's mouth in the service of his country, if he was not a braver man who refused a false friend to taste the drunkard's drink? "Bull-dog courage" may do the one, but it required moral greatness to do the other. He did not speak against the army so much as for temperance. If temperance spread, there would be neither army nor police.—(Hear, hear.) He would illustrate what he had said. And he had the story he was about to tell, from the sufferer himself. A sober man went into a public-house and had a glass of water, for which he offered a penny. "Oh, no," said the publican, "we don't sell water!" The man, on leaving, met a "friend," who was very glad to see him, and insisted on his taking a glass. He refused the first offer, but, unfortunately, yielded to the continued importunity of his friend. He drank and he chatted till he became too insensible to be wise. Another party in the room fell out—words came to blows—the police were called in—resistance followed, the man sat quietly by, but he "did not like to see Englishmen beat down by police"—the police left the troublesome fellows, and marched off the "lamb." He was committed to gaol for resisting and assaulting the police! For three months he was not permitted to communicate with his family (such were the regulations of the prison) when at last that time expired—he went to the grate, expecting to see his poor wife—but found only his eldest little girl—she was in mourning. Mother was dead! The Chairman, after making a proper application of this sad fact, appealed powerfully to all present, and as far as his words might be carried, to support the temperance movement.

Dr. Burns of London, addressed the meeting in the language of facts of which he seemed a perfect master. He held up a long list of medical names, those of eminent physicians, who testified against alcoholic drinking. Also a list of clergymen's names—another protest against ardent spirits. The learned doctor then went through the taxes and public expenditure—some £53,000,000, per annum, showing what he would do with the still greater revenue spent in strong drink to do away with taxation, if the people would only become teetotalers. There need then be no army, no police, no poor-laws. He laid out in an off-hand manner the sum of £60,000,000 yearly in various items for the public good, eliciting, by his following each item with the expression, "and still have plenty of money left," much good humoured applause. Dr. Burns concluded by a strong appeal to his hearers on behalf of the temperance cause.

Mr. Edmund Fry of Plymouth, followed in an effective and eloquent speech.

Mr. Hudson confessed that if the charges sometimes brought against Teetotal Societies were true, that they lacked the elements of good order and respectability, those charges were certainly not applicable to that Association; for he knew of none that might with more propriety lay claim to the character of a Normal Institution. That no doubt arose from the fact of there being a committee at all times willing to co-operate, and that the managers had been wise enough to select an intelligent and persevering secretary who had proved the great wheel in the machinery, setting all the lesser ones in motion. The payment of five shillings and upwards yearly, by each member, had tended also, he believed, to make the parties so subscribing, feel an interest in the objects and success of the Association. He was an advocate, therefore, in that instance at least, for a property qualification, especially as temperance societies had taught its members the most philosophical principles of economics ever propounded.

Mr. T. A. Smith gave his experience as a man, and as a chemist, against fermented liquors, and spirits of every description. They were but spurs for a moment. He formerly drank ale with his bread and cheese, but found water a good substitute. He showed in his own person (much to the amusement of his audience)—that temperance was happiness and comfort. An old lady in Bristol told him she felt beer do her good. He showed her not to rely upon feeling, by the old illustration of putting a pen between her fingers.

A collection was made, pledges signed, thanks passed to the chairman, and the meeting separated highly gratified.

The usual monthly meeting of this Association, was held in the Literary Institution, on Thursday the 4th ult. The Rev. George McCree, of Bloomsbury Chapel, London, occupied the chair. The Rev. speaker, in presenting Mr. John Addleshaw, agent of the British Association, to the meeting, delivered a very serious and impressive speech, in which he furnished some illustrations of the danger of moderate drinking, instancing the case of an eminent artist, who, having risen to the zenith of fame by sobriety and industry, fell to the lowest depth of misery by the use of intoxicating drinks, and died a wretched drunkard. His wife and two of his daughters also became victims of intemperance and outcasts of society.

Mr. Addleshaw spoke in very forcible terms, and took in the first instance a review of the state of public opinion in reference to intoxicating drinks, antecedent and subsequent to the spread of temperance principles in this country. He then demonstrated, in a very masterly manner, the absurdity of blaming the legislature for that lack of employment which has resulted from the intemperate habits of the working population. He referred also to the increase of prisons, the constabulary force, and other appurtenances of the law, connecting these with the drinking system.

CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

On Tuesday evening, 16th January, 1849, a Tea and Public Meeting were held under the auspices of this society, in Beulah Chapel School-room, Welsted Street, Somers Town. The meeting was numerously attended; about 150 partook of the excellent repast provided. B. Rotch, Esq., B.C.L., kindly presided over the meeting. The chairman, in his opening speech, expatiated on the peculiar characteristic of the "Union" whose interests had convened the meeting, viz., the identification of members of Christian churches with total abstinence principles. Several very interesting addresses were delivered on topics relevant to the great temperance cause, especially in reference to this society, by Mr. J. W. Green, Mr. Carter, of the London City Mission, Mr. Spriggs, Mr. Ware, Honorary Secretary to the Field Lane Ragged School, Mr. Claridge, of the National Temperance Society, &c. Great interest was excited by the delivery of the addresses, and it is hoped beneficial results will follow from the impressions that were made. A vote of thanks to the chairman having been unanimously adopted, and the doxology sung, the meeting separated.

The Committee would earnestly invite the co-operation of members of Christian churches, of all denominations, to aid them in carrying out the objects of the "Union." The rules, and every information, may be obtained at the Committee Rooms, 32, Platt Terrace, Old St. Pancras Road.

J. EDWIN LUCY, Hon. Sec.

TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON TEMPERANCE UNION.

Extract from last Report.

During the last fifteen months, public meetings have been held, and lectures delivered regularly at the New Hall, with the exception of an interval during the summer. The attendance on these occasions has been invariably good, in some instances very large; considerable interest respecting the temperance question has been excited; the result is the accession of several names to the list of pledged members, and it is believed, an increasing spirit of inquiry into the truth of the principles on which temperance societies are based. With especial satisfaction, the Committee would refer to two lectures on the influence of intoxicating liquors on the health and constitution, delivered early in last spring by Dr. Carr. The diffusion of information on this particular branch of the question is of the highest importance; unfortunately for the cause of total abstinence, but few members of the medical profession have given it their support; into the reasons which have induced them for the most part to withhold it, it is not now relevant to inquire.

To revert to this more immediate neighbourhood; from recent investigation it appears, that in the parish of Tottenham, there are three brewers, forty-one public-houses and beer-shops, and eighty-three dealers in tobacco; the total number of butchers and bakers, together, falling short of thirty. These few simple facts tell their own tale: the Committee would respectfully commend them to the consideration of the many benevolent individuals, whose constant exertions to promote the welfare of their poorer neighbours deserve all praise, but who have not yet given their influence and support to the cause of total abstinence,—at the same time expressing their conviction, that whilst such a state of things continues, the effect of home missions, schools, and district visiting, will be greatly impaired and neutralized.

To the religious public especially, the Committee would appeal, believing as they do, that both the spirit and the letter of the Gospel, point distinctly to total abstinence as the remedy for the widely spread and debasing sin of intemperance. All other means have been tried without success. Total abstinence alone has not been found wanting, and has proved, in thousands of cases, the first step in a path of gradual progression, eventually conducting the reformed inebriate from vice and wretchedness, to a respectable position in society, and the fellowship of a Christian church.

In conclusion, the Committee tender their grateful acknowledgments to those friends not residing in the immediate neighbourhood, who have favoured them by contributions to their funds, or by taking part in their public meetings; to Richard D. Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich, their thanks are especially due, for a large grant of the excellent tracts published under his superintendence.

WILLIAM JANSON, Treasurer.

THOMAS ASTON BINNS, Secretary.

BRISTOL TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

The Annual Christmas Festival and Tea-meeting of the above society took place on Tuesday evening, in the Large-room, Broadmead, and although the attendance was not quite so large as last year, it was yet very numerous, about 700 persons sitting down to tea, and the number being subsequently augmented to fully a thousand.

The repast having been concluded, and a temperance hymn sung, the Rev. George Newnham, A.M. a clergyman of the Church of England, of Coomb-down, near Bath, was called to the chair.

The Honorary Secretary, Robert Charleton, Esq., read the report of the committee, which contained a brief review of the progress of the temperance cause during the last twelve months. The committee observed that they considered the review of considerable interest, not so much on account of any remarkable spread of temperance organization, as from the more general and practical acknowledgment of the importance of temperance principles in connexion with the success of the various institutions, having for their object the social, moral, or religious improvement of the labouring poor. Among those were the sanitary movement, and also the efforts to promote the better observance of the Sabbath, the conductors of both which important agencies had had repeatedly to refer to the blighting influence of intemperance, and to the formidable barrier to the success of their plans presented by the drinking-habits of the community; and at the same time to hail the temperance movement as a valuable and powerful auxiliary. Last year the committee had to refer to certain indications of a more favourable feeling towards their cause by the then recent proceedings of the government: first, in fitting out the expedition to the North Pole, in which it was requested that the seamen should totally abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks; second, in prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors to soldiers in the canteens; and, third, in the offer made by the Lords of the Admiralty to such seamen as might prefer it, of an allowance of tea and sugar in place of one half of the usual rations of grog. The committee had now the pleasure of referring to the yet more decisive indication of that feeling furnished by the bill passed during the last session of parliament, requiring the closing of all houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks between the hours of twelve on Saturday night, and half-past twelve on Sunday afternoon. The accounts received from different parts of the country, relative to the working of this measure, was highly satisfactory. In Bristol the beneficial results of it are very conspicuous. The comparative order and decorum prevailing, even in the inferior parts of the city, on the Sabbath morning, present a striking contrast to the scenes of intemperance and disorder by which they were not long ago so often disgraced. The time which had elapsed since the measure came into operation was too short to admit of many statistics, but the committee learnt from various places of a diminution in the cases of drunkenness brought before the magistrates on Mondays, and they had lately been informed by Captain Fisher, the respected superintendent of the Bristol Police (with permission publicly to make the statement) that he calculated from present experience that the alteration in the law referred to would occasion a decrease of at least one thousand prisoners in a year. The success of this measure, partial and incomplete as it confessedly was, should stimulate the friends of order to a persevering endeavour to get the operation of the bill extended to the whole Sabbath; for surely it was an anomaly in legislation, that whereas the sale of bread, meat, and all other useful articles during the Sabbath was prohibited by law, an exception was made in favour of that one article, the sale of which, on every ground of morality and religion, it was essentially important to restrain. The committee rejoiced to hear that the whole subject of licensing beer-houses was likely to be brought under the notice of the parliament during next session, the same member of the House of Lords who managed the late bill having engaged to bring in another, which, if passed into a law, would gradually extinguish those prolific sources of vice and misery. In the meantime, the friends of sobriety were advised to petition the magistrates not to grant any new licenses for public-houses. Amongst the events of the past year, was a most important meeting of ministers of religion in Manchester, at which 200 were present: the testimonial in favour of total abstinence adopted by it, had been signed by about 600 ministers of all denominations. In Bristol, the usual weekly meetings at the Tailors' Hall had been kept up during the year, upwards of 1200 had signed the pledge; about 40,000 copies of the Temperance Herald and 80,000 tracts, had been circulated from the dépôt, besides a considerable quantity of temperance tracts obtained from other sources. The committee adverted with deep regret to an increase of 150 shops in the city for the sale of beer, and although they could not regard this as indicating any corresponding increase in the consumption of malt liquor, they yet considered the increase as much to be deprecated. The committee concluded thus—"Our opinion of the importance of this cause, strong as it was soon after we had entered upon its advocacy, has since that time been greatly strengthened, and we never felt so fully assured as we do now, that most of the attempts to improve the condition of our countrymen will, to a large extent, be rendered abortive so long as our drinking-usages are sanctioned by the religious and influential classes of the community, and strong drink consequently remains the common beverage of our population."

The CHAIRMAN then rose and said—Some might wonder why he came from a distance to occupy that prominent position. Though a young member, as far as the pledge was concerned, he was happy to say he had practised total abstinence nearly all his lifetime. Another reason why he consented to preside was this—his occupation was such as to awaken in him an exceedingly deep interest in the cause in which they were embarked. Few parishes suffered more from the indulgence in the use of intoxicating liquors than that in which he, in the providence of God, had been placed. They might think how they felt the smart, when he told them that, in a small parish numbering a population of about a thousand, there were nine public-houses, seven of which were licensed for the sale of liquors stronger than beer. The people were not poor: the men earned about a guinea a week, and the women went out to work too, and yet there were few parishes in which a lesser number of children were sent to school—the parents could not find the pence, because they all went to the drinking-shop. He was speaking to a parishioner the other day, who admitted to him that £20. a year would not pay his beer bill, and that was a man whose house was full of ragged, untaught children. He (the chairman) went to see him the other day, and thought that he could observe a little improvement in his condition, but the reason was that work was rather short, and so not having the money to squander in beer, he could be seen now and then on Sundays at his church; but when the spring came, and wages came in again, he feared the poor fellow would find some other way of spending his time. He was told, only a few weeks ago, of a family reduced to the greatest destitution through intemperance. They had been a family of credit and respectability, and in a good way of business, but were brought down to wretchedness and want. He went to the house where he was informed they were, and found a mother passed the middle age of life, two daughters growing up into womanhood, and a son, a very interesting lad. They were standing—for there was nothing for them to sit down upon—the pictures of despair. The father, through habits of intemperance, had squandered his substance, ruined his business, sacrificed his character, loaded himself with debt, and after coming home in that state of half madness, produced by strong drink, he went to a furniture-broker, and sold the whole of his furniture, and everything which he had left for his use. Such things were not of uncommon occurrence, and therefore it was that they were there that evening to spread their principles and make new conquests, until they were delivered, in some measure, from a system which could produce such bitter fruits.

The Rev. JOHN BURDER said—The meeting would allow him to lay down, as the basis of the few observations he should address to it, three propositions. 1st, That intemperance was an evil immeasurably great; 2nd, That total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks was the most efficient remedy or cure for it; and, 3rd, That total abstinence might be practised without injury to the parties practising it. It struck him if those three propositions could be proved, that the case of the total abstinence Society was made out. As to the first proposition, he need not occupy much time in an effort to prove it. It amounted almost to a truism—a truth undeniable and undenied; but, although all persons were ready to allow that intemperance was a great evil, it would, upon investigation, be found that it was a much greater and more widely spread evil than most persons supposed. In reference to the second proposition, Mr. Burder observed, there was one custom in particular which he thought most objectionable—that of obliging a workman, upon his joining a workshop, to lay out a sum of money in drink, upon pain of refusal to work with him. He (the speaker) called that tyranny—(cheers)—it was a harsh and a prejudicial custom, and many a young man had to date his drunkenness to some occasion of that kind. Another injurious custom was that of pledging each other in company, but that, he was glad to say, was getting out of date. There was no doubt that persons so disposed might promote temperance by encouraging habits of sobriety and checking those of dissipation, but still there were no means so efficient as totally abstaining. After further remarks, the reverend speaker offered some well-merited observations on the self-denying exertions of two or three of the promoters of the movement, and concluded by urging the society to go onward in its progress, to lead to temperance and practical piety, and, like John the Baptist in the wilderness, to prepare the way of the Lord.

Dr. STEPHENS of Birmingham followed, and condemned moderate drinking in strong terms, and drew a fanciful picture of a country squire's Christmas dinner party.

Mr. HUDSON, Secretary of the National Temperance Society, spoke with much force against the habit of drinking, and reviewed the progress of the movement during the year; and referred with satisfaction to the bill introduced by the Attorney-General, empowering magistrates to remove special and petty sessions from inns and public-houses, the passing of which he hailed as indicating the growing feeling of the legislature in favour of temperance principles. He then referred to Mr. Cobden's plan of financial reform, condemning that portion of it which recommended the entire repeal of the duties on malt and hops as impolitic, and of no real benefit to the community. The speaker went on to complain of the use of grain for the purposes of distillation and brewing as being wilful waste, depriving the people of their food crops, and concluded by expressing a conviction that teetotal principles were taking deep-root, and were spreading far and wide to the glory of the Most High.

Mr. M. BOWDEN, a commercial traveller and practical teetotaler, addressed the meeting, assuring those present, as the result of his own experience, that total abstinence tended to improve the health, reputation, and wealth of those who have courage enough to encounter opposition.—Abridged from the Bristol Mercury.

HASTINGS.

A public meeting in advocacy of the benign and saving principles of total abstinence, was held here on Wednesday, 13th December, and was well attended. The chair was occupied by Mr. Rock, sen., who in a short appropriate introductory address opened the meeting, and called upon Mr. F. Beck (Secretary), who made some general remarks upon the varied evils of the drinking customs, and the benefits of teetotalism. The meeting was afterwards addressed in an effective manner by Messrs. W. Ransom, F. Streeter, and J. Pitter. The good cause in this place is evidently widening and taking a firmer hold upon the people. Our meetings are better attended; our numbers are considerably increased, and our circulation of your admirable Chronicle, &c., advanced to nearly fifty per month.

BATH.

(To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.)

DEAR SIR,—Dr. Grindrod has visited us during the past month, (November,) and has done not a little to hasten the "good time coming." His lectures in this city were attended by very large and respectable audiences, and if ever drunkards and moderate drinkers were stripped of every argument, it was on this occasion. The masterly style in which he handled his subject, together with his beautiful drawings, (about 100,) must have caused conviction to every thinking mind present. The Doctor addressed about 2000 juveniles in the banquetting-room, Guildhall, and did very considerable execution, and very clearly proved that, though

"Cannon balls may aid the truth,
Yet thought's a weapon stronger."

About 400 signatures were obtained at all the meetings. On the Juvenile Society's books we have now more than 3000 names. Surely, before this large army, in future days ragged schools will cease to exist. Hoping our friends will devise liberal things in the circulation of the Chronicle for 1849, I am, dear Sir,

Yours truly,

THOMAS MARTIN,

President of the Juvenile Temperance Society.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

A series of most numerous attended and enthusiastic meetings have been held in this town during the Christmas season. The anniversary of the Ladies' Association for the suppression of intemperance, was, as on former occasions, attractive; and the missionaries' report received with much satisfaction. John Priestman, Esq., presided, and the meeting was addressed by the Reverends Cocker of Newcastle, and T. T. White of Glasgow, with Messrs. T. P. Barkas, Wilekie, Elliot, and others.

The St. John's branch had their festival too, and it was a brilliant affair—short addresses, melodies and piano at intervals—the annual report very cheering. C. W. Walters, Esq., barrister-at-law, presided. New year's day brought its working-man's annual gathering, under the able management of Mr. G. Dodds, a zealous, consistent, and reformed character, a leading man in Newcastle, prosperous in business, universally esteemed, and deservedly so; 1000 persons took tea in the Hall, which had been beautifully ornamented with evergreens for the ladies' anniversary. After tea about 1800 persons crowded the Nelson Street Methodist Chapel, which is lent to the forwarding of every good work, when not occupied for Divine worship. The trustees do not think temperance demonstrations desecrate the house of God. Mr. Dodd conducted the meeting. W. H. Buchanan first addressed the audience, and was followed by working men.

1. A potash-maker, working in 120 degrees of heat, for two years, finds himself a better man, and intends to abide teetotal; is a member of a christian church, and occasionally preaches the gospel.

2. Thomas Dixon is a common carrier, and for eleven years has abstained with advantage to himself and family—is much interested in temperance, and a Sabbath-school of his own founding. He looks well, and is well.

3. Mr. Hudson is a sailing captain,—has weathered the storms for twelve years without alcohol, and is a pious, God-fearing man, quite healthy, and thanks God for his acquaintance with teetotalism.

4. Mark Littlefair is a bottle-maker, eleven years have brought to him a happy home, peace with God, and is an ardent lover of his fellow-man.

5. McWirther is a ball furnace man; drank from his childhood; his father was ruined in business by drink. Became first a religious man, then a teetotaler. He spoke a volume in ten minutes.

6. Embleton Allen, is a blacksmith; was much addicted to drinking, but has, like others, altered his ways, and tried the abstinence plan; goes to chapel on Sunday since he signed the pledge, and keeps his family instead of the publican's. A great sensation was produced by Allen's speech, and many came to hear this splendid trophy. He is likely to be a clever and very useful man.

7. Edward Elliot, twelve years a teetotaler; brought up from the deepest sorrow and misery, occasioned by drinking; is now a master builder; displays very considerable intellectual powers, and is much esteemed by those who are acquainted with him.

8. Mr. Thomas Butterwick, is a minister of the gospel—signed the pledge as an example to his flock and is a zealous preacher of the truth as it is in Jesus.

9. Alexander Drummond, thirteen years an habitual drunkard—is a corn meter; meets every difficulty presented to his now sober habits, by the grace of God.

10. Mr. G. Charlton, eleven years a member; one of the committee, and a gentleman whose love of the cause and zealous labours, are appreciated by many in town and country. God only knows his worth, man cannot estimate it.

11. T. T. White, baptist minister and temperance lecturer, eleven years a teetotaler—eloquent, laborious and successful.

12. A blacksmith, a man in his true dignity, was a drunkard at thirteen years of age—reformed and fears God.

13, 14, and 15 are all men of standing, reclaimed by the early advocates on the water, in the iron works, and at hard labour; enjoy health, peace of mind, esteem of their neighbours, with the Divine favour. Such testimonials need no comment, they speak for themselves.

W. H. BUCHANAN.

Wednesday, the 3rd of January, Temperance Hall full again, and signatures numerous. Thursday the 4th.—Thirteenth Anniversary of the Newcastle society. Never so crammed as on this evening; it cannot be described. Officers elected; speakers, Messrs. Buchanan, White and Whittaker. Mr. White was serious and effective; Mr. Whittaker was lucid, earnest, and powerful. Many wept and laughed by turns. Oh, it was a night to be remembered; fifty signed, ten the next day, with writer's son, Buchanan, jun. Well done Thomas Whittaker, many a heart was cheered that night, go on and prosper. £31 was subscribed to the society's funds, and all our branches have funds which encourage them to go on. To give you an outline of what has been done for twenty miles around this town, would fill a volume; I shall not attempt it, but thank the Giver of all good, who has crowned our temperance year with gladness and innumerable mercies.

YORK BOND OF HOPE.

On Christmas-day, the first festival, or Fruit Soiree, of the York Bond of Hope, or Sunday School and Youth's Temperance Union, was held in the Lecture Hall, Goodramgate. All the members were admitted free on showing their new cards of membership, (printed in gold and colours,) and non-members at a charge of threepence each. The gallery was occupied by parents, teachers, and friends, and the Hall was decorated with banners, evergreens, mottoes, &c., and in addition, the platform was hung round with lion, leopard, tiger, and buffalo skins, and a great many other curiosities and paintings of African scenery, belonging to the "Bosjesmen," or "Bush People," who had been exhibiting in the city, which gave the hall a very beautiful appearance. The proceedings were of a most interesting character, commencing with silent prayer, and the singing of a temperance melody called the "Bond of Hope," after which the report was read, and addresses delivered by Mr. T. Monkhouse, (chairman,) Mr. T. B. Smithies, and Mrs. Stamp, from Hull. Recitations were also delivered by juveniles, and other melodies were sung, after which the fruit was distributed, each juvenile receiving a white paper bag containing an orange, raisins, and confectionery walnuts. At the close of the meeting the Temperance National Anthem was sung, and the children, upwards of 500 in number, separated, highly delighted and gratified with their evening's entertainment. It appears from the Report, that about 700 have already joined this society, and that the temperance cause is making rapid and sure progress amongst the teachers and scholars of the different schools in the city, and we hope that the efforts put forth by this society will prove to be a great means of doing what is far the best, preventing the young from falling into habits of intemperance, and thus save them from the many snares and evils connected with such a course of life.

JOHN LEAK.

CASTLETON.

On the 8th and 9th ult., J. Inwards delivered two lectures in the Friends' Meeting House, Castleton, to a numerous and attentive audience. He gave us his lectures on the wine and food question, and I need hardly say that his remarks met with universal approbation. To those of us who were previously abstainers, he has confirmed and increased our attachment to the good cause.

MR. JOHN WILLIAMSON.

Mr. Williamson has recently held meetings at Tavistock, Peter-Tavy, Devonport, Appledore, Homebridge, and Mary-Tavy, in Devonshire; also at Wellington and Bristol, with very satisfactory and cheering results. He mentions among other pleasing incidents, having met with a person in Devonshire who had signed the pledge many years before at Merchant Tailors' Hall, Bristol, who had remained firm to his convictions, which is only one instance among hundreds, showing the necessity of sowing "beside all waters."

MR. JABEZ INWARDS.

(EXTRACT FROM A LETTER.)

On Friday, December 29th, an interesting meeting was held in the village of Winocobank, near Sheffield. Monday, January 1st, the friends of Sheffield held a large temperance soiree; nearly 700 sat down to tea; the ex-Mayor presided at the public meeting. The large Music Hall was crowded, and the interest of the meeting was kept up till a late hour. January 2nd, I paid another visit to my old friends at Rotherham: a goodly number partook of tea in the Court-house, when our highly esteemed friend Mr. John Guest took the chair. The place was very full. Our musical friends gave us a rich treat, and never, I think, was it more clearly proved that a company could be happy without strong drink. January 3rd, by a kind invitation from the friends of temperance and education, I had the honour of laying the foundation stone of a British School at Mexborough. On the committee (consisting of nine) there are seven teetotalers, and the school will be used for lectures on moral and scientific subjects. In the evening, an excellent meeting was held in the Wesleyan chapel; temperance and other friends came from a distance, and it afforded me no small pleasure to find that two of the most active in adjusting the stone, were reformed men, who by temperance have been led to pursue the path of peace and sobriety. 4th, 5th, and 6th, held three good meetings in the town of Stockton-on-Tees, one in the Temperance Room, and two in the Friends Meeting house; several signatures were obtained. January 8th, after a long, cold and dreary journey, I arrived at Castleton, where I was warmly received by the temperance friends. In the evening a meeting was held in the Friends' Meeting-house, and on the following evening another. In this romantic part of Yorkshire the population is thinly scattered over hill and dale, and many have a long way to come to the meetings.

INTEMPERANCE.

"I believe that the nation might bear up against beggars, vagrants, thieves, debtors, swindlers, and poor-laws, pay heavy taxes, and be guilty of great waste of all sorts, and yet be tolerably prosperous, if it were not for the health-destroying, and poverty, crime, and madness-producing habit of intemperance. Thirty millions of pounds sterling are said to be spent, by the working-classes of England alone, in intoxicating liquors; and if we allow half that sum as the expenditure of temperate men, who never drink to excess, the other half may probably be looked upon as engaged in producing every degree and form of every conceivable physical and moral evil which flesh or spirit is heir to. Say that only five millions of this large sum is spent in excess, bordering upon or actually amounting to intoxication; that only five millions are withdrawn from reproductive employment, to be squandered in this brutal and degrading way, which Satan himself would be ashamed of; and what an awful vision of waste, misery, disease, cruelty, crime, and madness does the thought conjure up! This great subject, however, is in such able and energetic hands, that I shall not dwell upon it at greater length. I will content myself with these two questions, addressed to the advocates of the right to eat:—1. Is not the proper punishment for the drunkard that starvation to which his habits naturally and inevitably tend? 2. And if you revolt from this punishment, why are you so indifferent to the starvation to which these wretches devote all who depend upon them for support?"

The above extract is taken from an excellent work, just published by Parker, entitled "The Evils of England, Social and Political, by a London Physician." The work is comprehensive, and shows that the author has quick perceptions and acute powers of observation. He combines with these an admirable spirit, as all the remedies hinted at and spoken of are of the preventive, rather than the palliative kind.—Ed.

VERY ILLOGICAL.—A lover of good wine indulged in this merry argument with his confessor, who reprimanded him for his failing, and told him that he would never attain to the salvation of his soul, unless he reformed himself, "My father, good wine makes good blood, good blood produces good humour, good humour creates good thoughts, good thoughts produce good actions, good actions lead a man to heaven; therefore good wine conducts me to heaven." "Be it so," answered the priest.—Mons. Beauvoisin's Anecdotes, page 13.

Review.

LETTER TO THE REV. JOHN STOUGHTON.

BY E. TISELL.

Although we are not advocates for selecting ministers of religion or any body of public men, and especially any particular member of that body for the purpose of bringing him or his doings prominently to public view; on the other hand, it must be borne in mind, that if it is conceived that injury is done to a cause we hold to be productive of immense good, as we know the Temperance Society to have effected, then provided the remonstrance be couched in respectful terms, we have no objection to see that conviction candidly and honestly expressed. Mr. Tisdell is anxious to win over his pastor to a cause in which he feels deeply interested, and believing that Mr. Stoughton is a type only of the class to which he belongs, he has addressed to him a letter, characterised by much good sense, and breathing throughout, as we think, a spirit of candour blended with christian charity. We are sorry that we have not room for extracts; our readers would do well to purchase and read the whole, and thus judge for themselves.

DUTY AND HOPE.

“Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy MIGHT.” This is a command of universal comprehensiveness, and of supreme authority. To me is it of more importance than to the philanthropist and moral reformer. Those who labour for an immediate personal reward, have a constant, tangible, appreciable stimulus to go on. But moral causes are proverbially slow in operation. They resemble rather the gentle and almost imperceptible progress of the springing corn, than the rushing, rapid and noisy impetuosity of the high-pressure engine on the iron tram-way. The ardent and zealous advocate of moral reforms must therefore learn to wait, as well as to work.

But it is not easy to adjust the mind so accurately as to wait with patience; and yet untiringly and constantly to work on. He, who has ordered the relations of the moral, as well as the physical world, has therefore implanted in every human constitution the capacity to hope. It is divine in its origin, but it is temporary in its use. It belongs to man, not as a possessor of perfect enjoyment, but as a candidate for it. “What a man seeth,” is already his own, “why doth he yet hope for.” The object of hope is vividly perceived. Imagination paints it in loveliness, and faith gives it a pathos reality ere yet it has begun to be.

Looking round, therefore, upon moral desolation, the moral reformer pants to give beauty, order and light, to realize the prophetic vision of “the wilderness and solitary place” bursting forth in shouts of gladness, and “the desert” adorned with the beauteousness and breathing with the fragrance of the rose.

The mere utilitarian may smile at the fanaticism of the expectation, but the philanthropist smiles again. The one smiles in derision, but the other in hope. The one regards the object as impossible, the other expects its accomplishment with certainty. He has made his calculations, and has proved their accuracy. He has analyzed the material on which he is to act—has scanned the ordained laws of nature, and observed their unchanging uniformity—he has tried the implements by which the work is to be accomplished—and he is thus prepared both to discharge duty and to cherish hope.

Friends of temperance, we have a great work to do! We have arrayed against us passion, with its ever urgent demands; interest, with its instinctive jealousy; custom, with its fondly cherished claims; suspicion, with its eagle-eye; indifference, with its icy coldness; prejudice, with its ignorant dogmatism; and not unfrequently, contempt, with its curled lip and scornful sneer. But our object is good. It commends itself to our judgment—it has been welcomed in our practice—it has entwined itself around our heart. The means by which we purpose its accomplishment are tried and approved. “The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty.” We have truth on our side—or rather we feel that we are on the side of truth. We desire no other argument but clearly established, unanswerable, immutable and immortal truth. Yet even truth may be rudely advocated; we have, therefore, to seek continually to let it speak in tones of mercy and mildness; assured that even severe truth uttered in love, is more pungent and more effective.

While adopting this course, we hope for success. Truth will triumph; its progress is always an onward one. Suppressed by external forces in one place, it causes the earth to tremble by its power in another. Obstructed by one method of advocacy, it adopts another. Deserted by one ally, it woos new friends, and wins new conquests. Faith in the power of truth speaks to us in our desponding moments, and inspires our hopes by the welcome encouragement, "Go forward."

Nor are we less convinced of the force of love. "Many waters cannot quench love, nor the floods drown it." Its kindly voice speaking in terms of respect even to the degraded sensualist, whose vices have cost him many friendships, it has often succeeded in awakening new thoughts, new desires, and new resolves. Its spirit never tires—its energies never flag—"love never faileth as a source of moral power." But it must be imbibed, felt, cherished, exhibited; or like the talent wrapped in a napkin or buried in the earth, it will involve its possessor in fearful responsibility.

Let it not be forgotten, that even true self-interest is with us. This is, of course, extensively doubted; but the doubts are not insuperable—they can be removed. And, how secure must we be of success, when present self-interest are shewn to lead in the same direction as future well-being, and when philanthropy, and personal advantage, dictate the same course.

Arouse then friends of temperance! Here is work for all! Abstain, read, study your principles; be ready to give your reasons to every man that asketh you; do not be ashamed of your principles, nor feel as if you were compelled to shrink abashed in the face of moderate-drinkers. State with calmness and kindness your conviction, that you have found "a more excellent way;" defend your position with the best argument you can, and you will yet find your course triumphant. Remember that our mission is an aggressive one. We must extend our conquests—we need all classes of society—all must be appealed to—all must be provided for—all must be enlightened, and all, if possible, secured. Work on, then, friends, under the inspiration of hope. Your cause has nothing to fear, but the neglect or imprudence of its friends. Already the day-star of hope has arisen, and smiling sweetly upon us, it urges us TO DISCHARGE WITH INCREASED VIGOUR OUR PRESENT DUTY, AND EXPECT SUCCESS.

INFLUENCE OF WIVES.

The use of strong drink has been, in our country especially, the symbol of courtesy and the sign of hospitality; and in some circles it yet remains so; though, thanks to the diffusion of light and knowledge upon this subject, not to the same extent that it once was. Women, married women in particular, give the tone to manners. They can keep up, or alter, any social custom; and surely if they are once aroused to perceive that any particular custom is bad, their duty is plain—to abolish that custom. It is clearly the office of the wife "to guide the house;" the habits of living of a family are her peculiar province. By the exercise of combined good sense and good temper, she can usually introduce her own system into the home without contention or interference. And if that system conduce to a wise expenditure of means, and to the preservation of domestic comfort and order, the husband is rarely so blind to his own interest, or so careless of his own comfort, as to find fault with it. Now, strong drinks are not only unnecessary, but they are very expensive. The moderate drinking of what is called an abstemious family amounts to a large sum annually—

Suppose a family of four persons take	s. d.	Total Weekly s. d.	Total Yearly. £. s. d.
Weekly, 2 bottles of wine, at 3s. 6d. per bottle	7 0	10 6	26 18 0
Ditto 3 gallons of beer, at 1s. 2d. per gallon	3 6
Annually, 2 gallons of spirits, at 8s. per gallon	16 0		0 16 0

Now, as a mere monetary question, is it right for married persons, even supposing their circumstances tolerably good, with all the vicissitudes of life, and all the claims of a family, to expend such a sum on an article which science has proved to be to all healthy persons unnecessary, and in most instances positively injurious. Millions testify in various parts of the world, that these drinks may be safely and pleasantly dispensed with in all climates. Among these millions there are young and old, rich and poor, weak and strong, the man of toil, and the man of ease.* The testimony may come from every quarter of the globe, and from all varieties of the human family, but it agrees in this one particular, that strong drinks are not needed to promote either health, or beauty, or enjoyment; that people are vigorous and cheerful without them. The inference, therefore, is plain, that to keep up their use in the social circle, is to expend means which might be better employed, on an unnecessary, injurious, expensive luxury. Regard to the principle of wise economy forbids their use.

The position assumed in the foregoing remark—that women preside over social drinking-custom—may be disputed. Let us examine the matter. It is the custom to drink when there is a birth in the family—to hail the arrival of "the lamb of the world's extended fold" in alcohol. No one can say that women do not preside on these occasions and keep up that plan. It is the custom to offer wine to persons making casual calls; as ladies are the most frequently at home to receive visitors, they mainly keep up that fashion. It is the usage to take wine at the dinner-table, and a gentleman rarely commences drinking without singling out some lady to take wine with him. The lady responds by filling her glass, and thus sanctions that custom.

At times of sickness a great quantity of stimulants are often consumed by the attendants on the sick, from a fallacious idea that they assist the strength and keep up the spirits. Woman reigns supreme in the sick chamber, and, therefore, entirely perpetuates that custom. At funerals, the same kind of fluids that hailed an individual into the world, celebrate his departure from it. Women regulate funeral hospitalities and ceremonies, and are instrumental in keeping up that usage. Let any one glance at this sketch of domestic drinking-customs, and then we cannot think they will venture to deny our deliberate solemn assertion—That the social drinking-usages of our land are kept up principally by the sanction of woman; we do not say by her individual practice.

And has the wife no cause to fear the result of these pernicious customs? If she be a woman of reflection, she must be fearful of the consequences; if a woman of observation, she must know that myriads of drunkards trace their ruin to the appetite created and fostered on occasions of domestic festivity. If she be a woman of conscientious feeling, surely she must ask herself, "Is it right for me, safe in the sanctuary of my home, to give my sanction to any custom which exposes my family, friends, or guests, to temptation? Supposing it is safe for me to take it, and that I might never become a drunkard, those who go forth from my dwelling into the busy scenes of life are not likely to escape evil if they have learned a dangerous habit under my roof?"

It is the duty of a wife to strengthen her husband in the practice of virtue, and to remove as far as she can all temptations to vice.—Woman and the Temperance Reformation (Sec. 2) by Clara Lucas Balfour.

STRONG DRINK AND EDUCATION.

The following cases may be cited among many, to shew that talent and education do not preserve men from falling into the degrading vice of drunkenness. The conclusion is inevitable, that all education is defective, which does not include salutary warning and sound information regarding the nature and properties of strong drink. Is it not immensely important that educators of youth should be practical teetotalers? Would not such cases be less frequent, if proper direction were given to our rising youth? Do not the educated classes need enlightening on this subject?

Experiences of Literary Men. By an EX-EDITOR.

We were greatly struck with the fate of the poet Dermoddy, whose singular history fell into our hands two or three years after it was published. It was too much the fashion in those times to imagine that the career of genius gave a license to its possessor to outrage every conventional decency. He hurried himself to the grave by drunkenness, at Lewisham, at 27 years of age, after having had advantages very rarely conceded to those who, against every obstacle, have travelled through life unpatronized, and left enduring names. He would sell his clothes at last, and wander the streets bare-footed and drunk. He was noticed by Grattan, and had a commission in the army given him by Lord Moira, but it was all in vain to restrain him from rum. He died in 1802.—Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper, February 3rd.

REV. CALEB COLTON.—We recur to this singular and pervertedly gifted man again, and to the place where we last saw him before he committed suicide. A vast deal reported of him was untrue. Some of his eccentricities were sui generis. He would dine off a hard boiled egg cooked by himself, and sit for hours over Burgundy. He would invite a friend to dine, and grudge him a fair allowance for a common appetite, but treat his guest to most expensive wines.—Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper, Feb. 3rd, 1849.

HOME-MADE FOREIGN LIQUEURS.

The following is a copy of an advertisement which appeared in the Times newspaper:—

WYNAND FOCKINK.

Our chief aim being both in wine and spirits to give the public all the advantages of cash payments, by quality, quantity, and economy, we are induced to act with the same liberality in liqueurs; the former and the latter recommendations will therefore be found unrivalled. The quantity cannot be altered, as our liqueurs come direct from the celebrated Dutch merchants named above, and to prove their genuineness bills of lading will be shown. We make this remark, full well knowing that three-fourths of the curaçoa, noyau, maraschino, &c., sold in London for foreign liqueurs, are manufactured in its suburbs. Our prices are:—For Copenhagen cherry brandy, 11s.: curaçoa, maraschino, noyau, and all other others, 14s. a bottle.—CADIZ WINE COMPANY, 26, St. James's-street: WILLIAM PAAS, Managing Director. Terms strictly cash.

We have here the testimony of wine merchants, that three-fourths of the "foreign liqueurs" are manufactured in the suburbs of London. May not the same remark be equally true of many foreign wines and spirits? We suggest the inquiry to awaken attention and not by any means to strengthen the wide-spread delusion, that because an article is genuine, it is therefore good for the human frame. Wine drinkers often pride themselves upon having genuine port, sherry, bucellas, &c. &c., forgetting that the alcohol they contain, even if genuine, is only—a genuine poison.

Stranings.

THE POWER OF INTemperance.—It drives wit out of the head, money out of the pocket, wine out of the bottle, elbows out of the coat, and health out of the body.—Nonconformist.

GIN DRINKING.—If you have a comfortable and peaceful home, a cheerful fireside, a good bed, a joint of meat to put in the pot, with a trifle of money beforehand towards paying your rent, and have resolved to get rid of all these good things together, there are many ways of doing it, but the easiest way is to learn to drink gin!—Old Humphrey.

AN OLD WATER DRINKER.—Spotswood mentions one Kentigern, (afterwards called St. Mungah, or Mungo, from whom the famous well in Wales is named,) who never tasted wine or strong drink, after he came to years of understanding, and slept on the ground; notwithstanding which, he lived to the very extraordinary age of one hundred and eighty-five years.—Easton's Human Longevity.

Metropolitan Mission.

This important sphere of the Society's operations is still vigorously worked, under the direction of its zealous superintendent Mr. John Meredith. We hope our readers will give to the statistical reports of the Missionaries, the attention they assuredly deserve. Every right feeling awakened—every kindly word uttered—every holy resolution formed—under the combined influence of truth and love, should be regarded as so much real philanthropic gain. Of this kind there is plenty of room in this busy hive of men, for many labourers. We have more faith in the personal appeals of men used to such occupation and having sufficient clearness of head and warmth of heart to do it well, than in all the pet schemes of legislation. Could not our local metropolitan societies, each raise the salary necessary to maintain one such labourer? There is still enough ground to employ all our voluntary agency, even if it were all in good and constant working order. But to this subject we shall return, and for the present commend to our readers the

REPORTS OF MISSIONARIES.

LODGING HOUSES.

T. K., was formerly in good circumstances, as a master bootmaker, but through drink was reduced to beggary, and when the missionary met him, he obtained a living by singing in public-houses. He signed the pledge, which he has kept these ten weeks, and now earns his living by selling small books.

A DRUNKARD'S BED.

Mrs. P., a tradesman's wife, was found in D— Lane, lying on the pavement insensible. She was conveyed home, her husband informed the missionary that she had been absent six days, and that she had twice attempted to commit suicide. As soon as sober, she signed the pledge.

INCIDENTAL.

Several necessitous cases have been relieved with food, coals, and clothing, by the liberality of a benevolent lady, on the recommendation of the missionary.

MEETINGS.

The missionary has delivered addresses at Paddington, Lambeth, Southwark, and Staines.

TESTIMONIES.

Magistrates and the Governor of a Prison.

Two magistrates on signing the certificate against the drinking usages, said they could bear their testimony to the truth of all the statements contained in the certificate. The Governor of one of the metropolitan prisons also signed the document.

The Chief Warden of the same Prison.

"I have been in my present situation eleven years, and I believe fifteen out of twenty of all the prisoners I have had under my charge, have been through intoxication." Five out of nine of the wardens of the same prison, are total abstainers.

From the statistics it will seen that there are forty-six houses in which strong drinks are more or less sold, or which are directly interested in their sale. The bakers and butchers being twenty-four; the houses for sale of intoxicating drinks, nearly double that number. These houses, also, more than double the united number of churches, chapels and schools.

Although there is a society in Tottenham, yet on becoming acquainted with the mass of the people, two things forcibly attract observation:—1st, The small number of persons who are actually in the consistent practice of teetotalism; 2nd, The vast amount of prejudice in the public mind against it. This has arisen principally from the following causes:—1st, From ignorance; 2nd, From the division among teetotalers themselves; 3rd, From the circumstance of many breaking the pledge, and returning to their former practice.

The general habits of the people, in regard to drink, may be in some degree judged of by the foregoing statistics. One general description, however, would not serve to characterize the whole, as in some parts they are much more depraved than in others.

The visitation has not been confined to the poorer localities, but has been pretty general among the tradespeople of the place, by whom the tracts have been well-received, and conversations freely entered on. At houses of a higher grade tracts have been left with the servants; and, in some instances, gentlemen have received them themselves. The results of the missionary's labours have not been so apparent as might have been expected or desired. This has arisen partly from persons trying the system before signing, and partly from the preference given to signing at a public meeting. Many persons, through the persuasions of the missionary, have been induced to attend the public meetings held in the neighbourhood, and their impressions have been confirmed. Many others are trying teetotalism with a view to test its practicability.

Among these a policeman said, "I might swim in drink this Christmas, but have resolved not to take a drop from any one."

Two other policemen who had been previously spoken to, were again met, and they both promised to attend the annual meeting. One said he had "had quite enough of the drinking system, and had made up his mind to sign the pledge."

"I hold with total abstinence," said a female; "my son has been a teetotaler these three years. I will not sign the pledge now, but I will most likely sign at the meeting, as I wish to take a little more time to consider the subject."

Many manifest a spirit of anxious inquiry in reference to the questions involved in temperance generally; and as they read this spirit increases. The following is an illustration:—One of a group of men who were at work in a gentleman's garden, called for the missionary to know if he would favour him with another tract; saying that "the last was so excellent in its explanations of the evil of strong drinks, that he had been trying to do without them the last three weeks, and he thinks he shall be quite a teetotaler soon." The others, who were at work, at first refused a tract, but after some further conversation, accepted some. The missionary left a tract at the gentleman's residence, and spoke to the servant-maid upon the subject. Several drunkards are under instruction, among these is a railway-labourer who has since signed the pledge.

A female, who was a notorious drunkard, promised the missionary she would sign at a meeting, which she accordingly did, and is going on well.

A sailor was met with in a destitute state, having been robbed a few days previously of £48., besides several articles of wearing apparel. He signed the pledge.

W. STONEMAN.

AGENTS.

The Agents of the Society are zealously pursuing their avocation, and we select from their reports a few facts and statements which will shew that the work is going on—

The Rev. Evan Davies writes as follows:—

"My labours in December were chiefly confined to this locality, Newmarket, Waenesgon, and Llanasaph. But this year, I am invited to go again more from home, and I comply.

"January, 1849.—4th, at Rhyl; 8th, at Tnefriw; 9th, at Llanrwst. February 1st, at Wespyn; 6th, at Rhyddlan.

"My lectures were well attended, and notwithstanding the cold nights, the audience seemed most attentive, and many fully convinced and confirmed; others coming forward, signed the pledge. I am perfectly sure that my labour is not in vain, and that it is owned and blessed by the Lord. I am happy to say that the most active and consistent members we have are total abstainers, who formerly were more or less injured by drink. Some young boys and girls who signed the pledge about thirteen or fourteen years ago, are now grown up, and married, and are still firm teetotalers. Yes, and some of them are students, preparing for the ministry, and four have been ordained.

"Last Saturday week, at night, three individuals have been killed—two near Ruthin, and one near Bala. One was found dead on the road on Sunday morning; he was drunk every Saturday! The other two were thrown out of their vehicles, and killed on the spot!

"These awful events make us grateful that we have seen the importance of total abstinence, and urge us to labour diligently, that others may have the advantages we enjoy."

Mr. Jabez Inwards writes :—

"On January 23rd and 24th, I held two excellent meetings in the town of Hartlepool. In this place, there is an active temperance society. As in most of our sea-port towns intemperance is doing its awful work, the rich and the poor fall victims to its power. Only a few evenings before the meetings were held, the Mayor of the town, under the influence of strong drink, fell into the Dock, and was drowned."

"Our principles are making ground. From the commencement of the year, I have attended none other than crowded meetings; and earnestly desire that ere long our principles may triumph, and sobriety universally prevail."

TEMPERANCE BAZAAR.

A few weeks ago a number of ladies of Carlisle, who are in earnest in the temperance movement, resolved themselves into a committee, for the purpose of getting up a bazaar in aid of the funds of the Temperance Society in that city. They began to work with a zeal and energy peculiar to their sex, when a great undertaking has to be brought to a successful issue. Their appeal has been nobly responded to. Contributions are pouring in from all quarters; and before the beginning of March, the time when the bazaar will be held, we have no doubt but useful and ornamental articles of great value will be contributed. We hope temperance ladies throughout Britain will assist in this honourable undertaking. During the week which the bazaar will be held, E. P. Hood is engaged to lecture. This is as it ought to be, spreading a mantle of interest and instruction over the temperance movement.—From the Cause of the People.

[We are happy to find the Carlisle ladies so honourably engaged in behalf of the good cause. Benevolent ingenuity will devise many plans to advance in the right direction. May the time soon come, when the ladies of our country, shall in multiplying thousands devote themselves to the movement. The principles of the rising generation are to be decided by them.]—Ed. Nat. Temp. Chron.

A FRIENDLY REQUEST.

The art and science of medicine is the result of experience. For a long period practitioners have been in the habit of prescribing alcoholic liquors, and the extent to which this has been carried, has been the cause of thousands of persons becoming drunkards. The evil habit will have to be met with experiments made in an opposite direction; and if such prove successful, then encouragement will be given to try further, and to persevere longer; and ultimately, we may hope, truth will be elicited, and an innocent mode of practice developed and adopted.

I suppose I have had as much experience as most in the treatment of disease without the use of alcoholic beverages, and I have it in contemplation to publish the results in a small volume of cases. The cases published had better extend over a wide surface of country (I have sufficient as far as mere number is concerned) and I shall, therefore, feel much obliged to any persons, who having been ill have recovered without the use of such liquors, if they will send me a report of their sickness, and treatment, and recovery.

Every correspondent whose case I publish shall be presented with a copy of the volume.

I am very desirous to win over my professional brethren to a method of simpler treatment which I think will be beneficial to themselves, their patients, and the community.

Bodmin, Cornwall.

[We earnestly commend to our readers the above request, and hope our esteemed professional friend will be promptly supplied with such facts as he seeks to obtain. The majority of persons in sickness place almost boundless confidence in their medical attendant, and it is a melancholy fact that that confidence is so frequently, through prevailing prejudices, abused. Many of our teetotal friends—men of decided character and general information—have, in cases of personal indisposition, felt it their duty to abjure professional recommendation of alcoholic stimulants, and they are in a position to furnish such information as Mr. Mudge requires. We hope they will do so without delay. We want facts.]—Ed.

AWAY FROM THE REVEL.

Away from the revel! the night-star is up,
Away, come away, there is strife in the cup!
There is shouting of song, there is wine in the bowl,
But listen and drink, they will madden thy soul.

The foam of the goblet is sparkling and bright,
Rising like gems in the torches' red light;
But the glance of thine eye, if it lingers there,
Will change its mild beam for the maniac's glare!

The pearl-studded chalice, displaying in pride,
May challenge thy lip to the purple draught's tide,
But the pearl of the dew-drop, the voice of the breeze
Are dearer, are calmer, more blessed than these.

Oh! come, it is twilight; the night-star is up;
Its ray is more bright than the silver brim'd cup;
The boat gently dances, the snowy sail fills,
We'll glide o'er the waters, or rove on the hills.

We'll kneel on the mountain, beneath the dark pine,
Our hearts' prayer the incense, and nature the shrine,
Back on the festal, we'll look from the wave,
As the eye of the free, on the chains of the slave.

Oh! come, it is twilight; the moon is awake;
The breath of the vesper-chime rides o'er the lake;
There is peace all around us, and health in the breeze,
And what can be dearer, more blessed than these?

Review.

Scottish Temperance League Register and Abstinence Almanac for 1849.

Well done! An excellent design, and well carried out. It is to be regretted that "the necessi-of going to press without delay" has prevented "the number being very considerably augmented." We have long felt it a most desirable thing to obtain an accurate estimate of our numerical strength, and hope that the system adopted by our Scottish friends may be carried to perfection in future years. Here is a register of all members of the Scottish League, arranged, 1st, alphabetically; 2nd, under trades and occupations; and, 3rd, locally, the towns and places taking alphabetical order.

In addition to this, we find a liberal and choice supply of valuable information on the history of the temperance cause, and statistics of drinking, with an important collection of facts from the most authentic sources, and opinions of the wisest men and most unexceptionable witnesses.

Under the head of Malt, p. 53, the Editor appears to have fallen into the common error of confounding weight and measure, in calculating the quantity of barley consumed in malting, which we think it important to correct. He states that "barley loses one-fifth of its weight in the malting process, so that to produce the 381,078,328 bushels of malt, on which duty has been paid during the last ten years, required 476,347,910 bushels of barley; being an annual average of 47,634,791 bushels." Now, although barley loses one-fifth of its weight, it increases in bulk, in malting. On an average, the increase will be about 5 per cent., or one-twentieth. To ascertain the number of bushels of barley required to make a given quantity of malt, one-twentieth should be subtracted from the given quantity. The calculation would then be as follows:—

Malt paying duty in ten years	381,078,328
Deduct for increased bulk by malting, 5 per cent., or one- twentieth	19,053,916
Barley consumed in ten years by malting	362,024,412
Or annual average	36,202,441
Instead of the amount in the Register	47,634,791

We submit these calculations to our contemporaries, from a desire to advance the cause we are all anxious to promote, and hail the publication of the Scottish League Register as an important step in obtaining the statistics of the temperance movement. We may add that it is brought out in an attractive form, and at an exceedingly moderate price. It will no doubt become a hand-book among our Scottish friends.

Correspondence.

[The Editor does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of his correspondents, but only for the candour and courtesy with which they are expressed.]

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

Considerable interest has been excited by the publication of Mr. Cobden's financial budget, and the project of the honourable member for the West Riding, has been honoured with much praise. But there is one proposition of Mr. Cobden's, which I trust has not escaped your notice, and which ought immediately to engage the attention of all teetotalers; and that is, the proposed abolition of the malt tax. I am at a loss to know what is Mr. Cobden's object in proposing to take off this duty; I should be loth to charge him with doing it for the purpose of raising up a body of political supporters among the maltsters, brewers, publicans, and all those who are interested in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, but without a better and more practical reason than the one given for so strange a proposal, I cannot divest myself of doubts as to the integrity of his motives for so doing. What good, moral, physical, or commercial, is sought to be accomplished by the abolition of this duty? Will it not rather increase our commercial difficulties and add to the black catalogue of crimes that result from the drinking customs of this country. During the last year, about 3,000,000 quarters of grain were destroyed in the breweries and distilleries, one-fifth part of the quantity consumed for food, and only 1,000,000 quarters less than the amount of our importations. In the present state of the manufacture of intoxicating drinks, we destroy in five years one year's supply of food; and as this country's produce is not sufficient to support its population even in food, we are obliged to import large quantities of grain from the Continent and America:—to pay for which, when the importation is larger than usual, as in 1846; the resources of the country are crippled by the payment necessarily being in gold, and the present ruinous state of trade is the consequence. What then would be the effect if the duty on malt was removed—undoubtedly to increase the consumption of malt liquors—necessitating a larger importation of grain from abroad—and an increased exportation of gold, thereby further reducing our present crippled means of trade—a reduction in the value of labour, and an increase in the price of bread. But this is not all, an increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquors must necessarily increase the already fearful amount of intemperance with its accompanying crimes and poverty. It is impossible fully to realize the loss from the use of intoxicating drinks—here is one item.

It is calculated that 60,000 confirmed drunkards annually die in this country, whose individual lives have been curtailed on an average, ten years, showing a loss of labour equal to that of 600,000 men, which estimated at £20. per head, shews an annual loss of £12,000,000. Mr. Cobden very justly adds to the cost of a standing army, the loss arising from the non-employment of the men in useful and profitable labour; but has he ever taken into account the above calculation, or estimated the national loss from our standing army of maltsters, brewers, and distillers, who are worse than idly employed since they annually destroy £16,000,000 of grain to make a deleterious and poisonous liquor, the consumption of which is the direct cause of the greater proportion of the crime and disease that afflicts and desolates our country. It is no use now to argue that beer is necessary to the performance of labour, since we have the testimony of men employed in every description of labour, from the agriculturist, to those engaged in the hottest departments of the manufacture of iron and glass; that they can perform their work, whether it be hot or cold, with greater ease and comfort to themselves without the aid of intoxicating liquors, than ever they could when they partook of them. In conclusion, I trust Mr. Cobden will see the necessity of erasing so objectionable a clause from his financial budget, but if he persists in retaining it, we must use every means in combating so mischievous a proposition.

I beg to subscribe myself,

NOTICES.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

The Rev. Isaac Doxsey, late of Thame, (Oxon) has been appointed Secretary to the National Temperance Society. Upon the retirement of Mr. Hudson, the following resolution was passed by the Board:—

Minute.—“That this meeting desire to record their satisfaction with the zeal, integrity, and perseverance, manifested by Mr. Thomas Hudson during the time he has been in the service of the National Temperance Society.”

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall be happy to receive interesting and important facts from all parts of the country. Mere notices of meetings must not occupy our space. We might easily fill the Chronicle with them, even if three times its present size. Our friends, whose notices have been omitted, must consider that they have been passed by purely from want of room. As a general rule, we can only insert those which are extraordinary either in the occasion or the results.

We beg to remind our friends that the Chronicle is open to communications from all ranks and classes. We wish to justify our title of National. We aim to be an effective advocate of the cause, and an accurate exponent of the position, aims, labours, and aspirations of every section of the Teetotal world. We urge our friends to seek unity in essentials—to give as well as claim liberty in non-essentials—and to display a spirit of candour, and love on all occasions, toward every opponent and every friend.—ED.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

OF THIS SOCIETY WILL BE HELD

IN

EXETER HALL,

ON THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 24TH,

AT SIX, P.M.

ISAAC DOXSEY, Secretary.

11, Tokenhouse Yard, February, 20, 1849.

Progress of Temperance.

HERTFORDSHIRE.

HARKEY FIELD (WELWYN PARISH.)

A company of between forty and fifty brick-makers and railway-labourers was convened on the evening of the 1st of February, in a temporary meeting-house used for divine worship at Harkey Field. The audience was rough, but both attentive and well-behaved, and listened with apparently deep-interest to the addresses of Mr. T. S. Jackson, and Mr. Dunford the Missionary; the latter concluded his address by signing the pledge; and was followed by sixteen others, among whom were two master brick-makers. Another meeting is shortly to be held, which we hail as another sign of progress. The spread of temperance principles among the foregoing classes of men, would be an inestimable blessing to themselves and their families; and contribute much also to the peace, quiet, good order and prosperity of the neighbourhood.

TEWIN.

About a year ago, the first meeting for the setting forth of the principles of temperance was held in this village, and shortly after a second, which arose out of the great interest excited by the former meeting. The night of Monday, the 5th ultimo, furnished evidence that here there is no want of sympathy with the abstinence cause. Although the population is thin and widely scattered, at an early hour the National School was densely crowded by the hardy sons of labour (among whom were brick-makers not a few) together with a sprinkling of the better educated classes. Mr. Thomas Hudson of London, occupied the chair, and made some general observations on the evils of drunkenness, which he characterized as being both far-spread and very appalling. He was followed by Mr. Thomas Spencer Jackson of Tewin Hill Farm, who entered into an able defence of the Society against the attacks of opponents, in which he referred the violation of the pledge, by certain parties, to the temptations held out by the drinking-customs. At this stage of the proceedings, much interest was created by the examination of John Bishop, a sawyer, and two brothers, Edmund and John Bury, farm-labourers, who, though not possessing the gift of eloquence, gave such convincing answers to the questions proposed to them by the chairman, of the great benefit of teetotalism, as much to amuse and edify the company. It was a matter of regret that the force of the testimony of these worthy men was somewhat marred by the frequent attempts at interruption by a certain "lewd fellow of the baser sort," who has the reputation of being a shrewd man when sober, but who demonstrated that on this occasion, at least, that his intellect had gone out on a short excursion. Mr. Dunford, a missionary actively engaged in promoting the spiritual interest of the labouring population, addressed the meeting at some length, giving several striking examples of the doings of the enemy which told powerfully upon the meeting. The chairman having exhorted the people to parley no longer with a foe they were unable to vanquish, dissolved the meeting, when twenty signatures were added to the Society's declaration.

HERTFORD.

The temperance cause has progressed but slowly in this borough of late; it is the more pleasing, therefore, to be able to record, that on Tuesday evening, the 6th of February, the Council Chamber of the Town-hall was not only full, but filled to repletion long before the time announced for the meeting. Among the company were many influential persons connected with the various congregations of the town and neighbourhood, who had not previously been in attendance at meetings of the Society. Mr. Bettinson, whose personal appearance is a "living epistle" in favour of temperance, occupied the chair. Mr. Thomas Spencer Jackson spoke at some length in a strain of great seriousness, addressing himself chiefly to professing christians. Mr. T. Hudson followed in an animated speech of an hour and-a-half in duration, in which he took a rapid view of the evils of the drinking-system. At the conclusion of this highly important and interesting meeting, numerous signatures were obtained, which may be taken as additional proof of a revival of the movement in this borough.

HADLEIGH.

We, as the Auxiliary of the Suffolk Temperance Association, have just had our first Annual Meetings in aid of its funds. On Monday, the 22nd, the Rev. J. C. Bodwell, of Bury St. Edmunds, preached a sermon in the Baptist Chapel, on behalf of the cause; and on the following evening, a tea meeting was held in the Lecture Room of our Society, when between eighty and ninety persons sat down to tea, and after the tea, a public meeting and addresses were delivered by Mr. Larner of Framlingham, Rev. J. C. Bodwell, and the Rev. J. Mathews of Aldboro', to a crowded and attentive audience. Mr. Fraser of Ipswich kindly occupied the chair. The collections were good beyond our expectations. We think it just to state, that the Association bids fair to become one of the most valuable and efficient in the country, under the superintendence of the able and indefatigable secretary, A. W. Heritage, whose unceasing labours, zeal, and talent in this great cause, are worthy of all praise.

JAMES ASHDOWN, Secretary.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.

On the 12th instant, our town was favoured with a lecture from that excellent friend of the temperance cause, Mr. T. B. Thompson of Leeds. His thrilling tales and earnest appeals were listened to with the greatest attention, and left a good impression on the minds of many. He did not labour in vain, for I have had some return, who had gone astray, and hope many more will join our ranks.

D. TRIBUTE, Secretary.

LEWES, SUSSEX.

We are about to present a most gratifying report. A great part of our town has recently been brought under the influence of temperance tracts on the loan system, which has been undertaken by a number of ladies: and we must not omit to state that we are entirely indebted for this new, yet powerful agency, to the labours of a most benevolent lady, Miss H. Lupton, who is residing here for a time.

On Wednesday, 17th January, our highly-esteemed president, Burwood Godlee, Esq., delivered a lecture on Organic Chemistry, at the Mechanics' Institution, towards the close of which he introduced some most striking remarks in favour of abstinence from alcohol, which were heard by many who seldom, if ever, attend temperance meetings.

But the drinking system has received "the unkindest cut of all," by the visit of Dr. Grindrod to our town. The large room of the County Hall was kindly granted by the magistrates, in which the Doctor delivered four popular physiological lectures, on the evenings of January 19, 23, 24, and 26. The attendance was very numerous, and highly respectable. The following gentlemen kindly presided on the respective evenings:—J. W. Woolgar, Esq., F.R.A.S., (a magistrate) Robert Perfect, Esq., M.P. for Lewes; Edward Monk, Esq.; and A. R. Briggs, Esq. Dr. Grindrod introduced a mass of medical evidence, made up of testimonies and experiments, which gave overwhelming proof that alcohol is a poison, and consequently productive of physical injury in proportion to the quantity in which it is taken. The splendid anatomical paintings (about a hundred in number) which covered a great part of the walls of the Hall, and with which the Doctor illustrated his lectures, were justly admired by all who beheld them. We feel that were we to give even an outline of the various parts of the Doctor's addresses, we should trespass too much on the columns of the journal; but suffice it to say, that the intimate acquaintance displayed by Dr. Grindrod with the different organs of the human frame, his elaborate description of the changes which food undergoes ere it becomes part of the living temple, his professional talent and gentlemanly address, gained him the esteem and respect of all, whether medical or non-medical, opponent or friend. At the close of the fourth lecture, great interest was excited by Alfred Wood, Esq., brewer, ascending the platform, who, in a speech of nearly half-an-hour, advanced several objections to the arguments and facts Dr. G. had adduced. He was ably replied to by Dr. Grindrod, after which both gentlemen continued in friendly discussion. Edgar Blaker, Esq., proposed votes of thanks to Dr. Grindrod, for his able lectures, and also to Mr. Wood. These were cordially and unanimously given.

The controversy was resumed at the Lecture Room, Mechanics' Institution, on Monday evening, 5th February, 1849, when (although the admission was by payment) we had the largest assembly we ever beheld in that room. Alfred Wood, Esq., and other gentlemen, advanced several objections, to which Dr. Grindrod replied with energy and effect. At the close, John Blaker, Esq., proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Grindrod, A. R. Briggs, Esq., (the chairman), and Alfred Wood, Esq., which was briefly acknowledged by each; and to show the friendly feeling existing between the two principal disputants, Dr. G. cordially shook hands with Mr. Wood, which elicited an universal burst of applause. While we entertain decided views respecting the result of the discussion, we feel pleasure in bearing our humble testimony to the gentlemanly behaviour of Mr. Wood towards his opponent. The meeting did not terminate till half-past eleven, yet the interest was sustained till the close. Respecting the results of Dr. Grindrod's visit, they are apparently of the most gratifying character. An impression has been produced which we think will not easily be effaced. Let the temperance body re-apply themselves to the work which has now received so mighty an acceleration, and great will be our success.

(Signed) ARTHUR MORRIS, JUN.,
Sec. Juvenile Temperance Society.

THAME, OXON.

A meeting was held in the British Schools in this town on Monday evening, January 29th. Mr. William Johnson presided, and the assembly, which was very large, was addressed by Messrs. Marsh, British schoolmaster, Thame; James Young, Independent Minister, Tetsworth; H. J. Allen, Primitive Methodist Minister, Chinnor; and J. Doxsey, Baptist Minister, Thame. The Thame Temperance Brass Band attended and enlivened the meeting, which was both entertained and profited by the engagement of the evening.

The society here still continues to work for the advancement of temperance principles. It has been instrumental in spreading them not only in the town and immediate neighbourhood, but also in several other towns in the district.

UXBRIDGE.

Extract from Tenth Report.

We have had during the past year several lectures delivered; one by B. Rotch, Esq. of Lowlands, and Mr. Hunt, of Bristol, and by Messrs. Inwards, Hudson, and Whittaker, from the National Temperance Society; also an excellent sermon on Total Abstinence by the Rev. B. Parsons, author of "Anti-Bacchus;" with many useful speeches from several of our own members; and we can say with pleasure, the Society is in a healthy and promising state, and should rejoice if we had a place for meetings on more economical terms, or a hall of our own, believing that much more good might then be effected.

We sincerely regret the loss of some of our best friends and most liberal supporters, who have been summoned as stewards to give in their accounts, and we believe the reception they have met with was "well done," and they have rested from their labours, and their works have followed them. To partly make up this loss, the Committee feel it their duty to enter upon the work with renewed energy, and hope that with the liberal support of their friends, combined with every exertion on their part, to lay before the subscribers of next year, such success as will gladden the hearts of our friends, and prove to all that we have "not laboured in vain, nor spent our strength for nought."

Meetings have also been held in the villages of Denham, Ickenham, Colnbrook, and Ruislip Common; in the latter place, several hard-working men have joined the Society, who have found, to use the expression of one of them, "that giving up drinking has set them to thinking." They now constantly attend a place of worship, and we have every reason to believe some are sitting at the feet of Jesus clothed and in their right mind, and are doing all they can to help forward our glorious cause. One praiseworthy act deserves to be noticed here, that the masters of these men have given them every encouragement, and some have received money instead of beer, which is a good proof that masters generally like their men not only to be sober, but sober minded.

GUISBOROUGH.

We have had splendid meetings, the Town Hall crammed every night. We never had such convincing lectures, twenty-six have signed the pledge, and we expect more. Jabez Inwards has exceeded any previous efforts here, and never will be forgotten. These meetings were held on the 10th, 11th, and 12th January.

WHITBY.

On the 15th, a meeting was held by Mr. Inwards, at Whitby. We take the opportunity of writing these few lines to inform you, that we have been highly interested and gratified, and the cause generally has been greatly benefited by the lectures of Mr. Inwards. On Saturday evening, he gave a lecture on "Barley," to a deeply attentive audience. On Sunday evening, he preached in the Independent Chapel, an unusually instructive and impressive discourse, on Rev. xix. 6. On the evenings of Monday 15th, Tuesday 16th, and Wednesday 17, his subjects were the Trial of Alcohol, "Alcohol's Defence," and the "Wine Question," the audiences were overwhelming, (such indeed as were never witnessed in Whitby previously,) and deep marked attention, and the most intense interest were visible on every countenance. The whole of the subjects, and especially the last named, were most ably and eloquently discussed by the talented lecturer. His definitions were so easy and his illustrations so natural, that every one seemed to coincide with his conclusions, and consequently, an interest has been excited, and an impetus given to the cause which we are confident will be felt for a long time to come. Upwards of fifty have signed the pledge, and many more we have no doubt will be constrained to join us very shortly.

STOKESLEY.

On the 18th and 19th, J. Inwards delivered two lectures in the National School Room, Stokesley, on "Barley" and "Wine." A half-filled house was scarcely expected, but the interest taken in the cause was soon manifested by the rapid assembling of more than the room would admit, and by the deep attention of those who were so fortunate as to gain even standing room. On the second evening, the seats were given up to the ladies, and every inch of standing room occupied by a dense mass of men, who listened for two hours with the deepest attention. The force of truth was irresistible. Reason was appealed to, and facts supported by the precept and precedent of Scripture. A total abstinence society has been formed by many of the most respectable and influential gentlemen and tradesmen in the town, and a great number have signed the pledge. There is some talk of building a temperance hall, with a large public room and suitable rooms for a Mechanics' Institute. This is a wise measure, and we hope it will be carried out.

AYTON.

On the 20th and 22nd, two lectures were delivered at Ayton, and the interest taken in the cause here may be judged by the fact, that with a population of less than 1000, upwards of 500 attended the second lecture.

HARTLEPOOL.

At Hartlepool, two crowded meetings were held on the 23rd and 24th, in the Town-hall. Many were unable to gain admission, upwards of thirty signatures were obtained, and a great impetus given to the cause.

DARLINGTON.

On the 25th and 26th, J. Inwards delivered two lectures, entitled the "Trial of Alcohol" at Darlington, to very large and respectable audiences in the central hall.

MIDDLESBOROUGH.

We were very sorry that we could not arrange for a lecture here this time, but we are looking forward with pleasure to April, when J. Inwards has promised to visit us again and spend about six weeks in these parts. The cause is steadily progressing here, we have from 300 to 400 generally at our weekly meetings, which are chiefly addressed by working men. Upwards of fifty have signed during the last four weeks.

THOMAS R. TAYLOR, Secretary.

HAVERTON-UPON-HILL.

On Tuesday, the 26th instant, the members of the Haverton-upon-Hill Temperance Society, held their first festival, when they were joined by several of the friends to temperance from Hartlepool, Stockton, and Middlesborough. About 160 sat down to tea, in one of the rooms of the glass works, kindly lent for the occasion, by the proprietors. The character of the meeting was somewhat aptly described, by a motto on one of the youth's flags, "young but in earnest." For though there were many old men, yet the greater part were teetotalers, and some of them as sober men, could only number months, but old or young, all were in earnest,—earnest because so many had been benefited through the adoption of the principles of total abstinence. After tea, a public meeting was held, and before it closed there were upwards of two hundred present. The report was read and unanimously adopted, after which there was a quick succession of speeches, argumentative and congratulatory, interspersed with the enlivening and soul-stirring temperance melodies of Paxton Hood.

ENON CHAPEL, MARYLEBONE.

A Special Temperance Experience Meeting was held in the above place of worship on Sunday afternoon, February 4th. The Rev. J. Burns, D.D., Pastor of the Church, presided. A most stirring meeting. The addresses were of the most practical character, fully developing the connection between temperance principles and practice, and personal godliness. Deep feeling was evinced by the large and respectable audience present, the tears chasing each other down the cheeks of many during the soul-stirring and appalling statements.

THE MOVEMENT IN CANTERBURY.

During the last two weeks we have been favoured with the highly valuable services of P. W. Perfit, M.R.C.S. He was first engaged by the Temperance Committee here, to give a course of six lectures on Human Physiology, and the effects of alcohol on the various organs and their several functions; but such was the satisfaction expressed, and so great the desire which prevailed for still further information on topics so universally interesting, that the Committee did not hesitate to re-engage him for four additional evenings. His descriptions of the brain and nervous system, of the stomach and digestive organs, of the heart, veins and arteries, of the lungs, of the liver, &c. &c. &c., made level as they were even to the comprehension of a child—and his demonstrations of the injuries inflicted on each by even the habitual moderate use of intoxicating beverages, made visible as all were to the eye by upwards of a hundred beautifully coloured drawings and diagrams—made an impression, not easily to be eradicated, on the minds of a highly respectable auditory. Such indeed were the effects of his lucid description, cogent argument, varied illustrations, and stirring appeals, that upwards of one hundred and twenty adults (some of them ladies and gentlemen of considerable social standing) and almost the same number of children, subscribed the total abstinence pledge. The meetings were presided over by the Rev. R. E. B. Maclean, Dr. Edward Scudamore, Samuel Rigg and W. A. Venning, Esquires, and Mr. Kingsford—a Churchman, a Quaker, an Independent, and two Unitarians—thus affording a delightful spectacle of the union of the most different sects in promoting the moral elevation of the people.

SUFFOLK TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

There are not wanting, in the present day, many who boldly assert that teetotalism is on the decline—that it has lost its vitality, and is, in fact, "dying out." This cry prevailed in the very infancy of the movement, and has been diligently repeated from time to time ever since. Never did it receive a more complete and marked refutation than in the anniversary meetings in connexion with the Suffolk Temperance Association, held in Ipswich last week. This county has always stood among the foremost in the temperance movement, and although, perhaps, the excitement which characterised the earlier operations of the society has to some extent subsided, there has always existed a warm and sincere devotion to the cause of temperance, and a willingness to labour for its extension, which it only required an efficient organisation to bring into active and successful operation. With this object, in the course of the past year, the services of Mr. A. W. Heritage were engaged as secretary; and under his able management, the association has been established on a new basis, and a system of mutual support and co-operation arranged which bids fair to lead to the desired result.

We now record the first public anniversary meetings held in Ipswich under the auspices of the new association.

On the evening of Tuesday, a Preparatory Sermon was delivered at the Turret-green Meeting-house, by the Rev. A. Reed, B.A., of Norwich; subject, "The religious aspects of the Temperance Movement."

The rev. gentleman took his text from the 10th chapter of the First Epistle of Corinthians, and part of the 23rd verse: "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient." The Christian said he had a right to make moderate use of the good creatures of God; no man could dispute this right, and even the gospel of Christ did not question it; and that it was honourable to religion to show that by its aid he could safely use things which others could not: any attempt to interfere with this would be an infringement of Christian liberty. He (the preacher) would, however, endeavour to give an answer to such a line of reasoning. He would admit all for which the Christian contended, though many around him would not go so far; still, when an appeal was made to their Christian generosity and self-denial, were they not required to give up something in order to correct the glaring evils of drinking of which they complained? Would they not wave their "right" in a case of this kind? A Christian surely could not love wine so much as to be unable to give it up, nor could such an one be afraid to meet society if he did abstain. In judging of what was their strict "right," they must, according to Paul's teaching, judge of circumstances, and have especially in mind the bearing of the text. If they were convinced that they were sanctioning an evil custom, or causing a weak brother to offend, then scripture required that they should cease to do so. Though the custom might not be wrong in itself, the question was still whether the practice of moderate drinking did not become wrong on the principle laid down in the text. Did not their custom sanction one of the most awful sins of the day, and discourage one of the most benevolent movements at present in existence? Was it not a case for voluntarily refraining from that which might not be absolutely wrong in itself, but became wrong when viewed in the light of scriptural expediency? But some zealous abstainers might say, are not intoxicating drinks poisonous, and do not they ruin souls?—do you call the giving them up an "expedient?"—why you should anathematise all the cowardly pretences of professing Christians, who stand aloof from the movement, and indulge in the moderate use of these liquids; they Christians! should Christianity shield such a practice as this! But, said the speaker, it is quite possible for a good thing to be pushed too far; a system of lashing is not the way to win over opponents. Many do not see that moderation is a sin, and, whether right or wrong, violent language will have no weight with these. Let them take the admitted principle that Christians should avoid the very "appearance of evil," and they would have really impregnable ground that could always be used with force and propriety. He advised these to forsake the vexed questions, and plead that it became them, for the sake of religion itself, to support this society. Such a plea would not invalidate that which many believed to be true, but it would bring to their aid all that they needed. He would now make an appeal to Christians on the grounds he had stated. Many regulations were made in the churches of Christ for the sake of expediency, and why should not the practice of moderate drinking be abandoned from the same consideration? By the present system they seemed to sanction an awful evil, and discouraged a most benevolent work. If all were using the juice of the grape, and it was unknown that it could intoxicate, then there would be no need of this abstinence; but whilst excess was the rule, and moderation the exception, Christian expediency required total abstinence in order to put the evil down. He need hardly allude to the evils connected with intoxicating drinks. In England there were six hundred thousand confirmed drunkards, and of this number sixty thousand passed away every year to their final account! Could they know this without thinking of the passage which said, "No drunkard can inherit the kingdom of Heaven." The preacher, after detailing many of the evils occasioned by the drinking practices of this country, said, that to all this the christian replied, "I believe it all; but if my example of moderation was followed, there would be no need of this: it is unjust to charge me with sanctioning a custom which I openly condemn." But he (the speaker,) feared there was more abhorrence of these and other crimes than tender solicitude to save the unfortunate victims. Instead of seeking to restore the lost ones, they separated, and put a brand upon them—thus hardening them in their guilt, and almost forcing them to pursue the same evil courses from which kindness might have drawn them. How could he invest this cause with moving interest?—why, he would remind them that the drunkard had an immortal soul, and did they but know the painful process by which his love for drink had been engendered, and the many attendant circumstances, he thought a tear would moisten their cheeks when a drunkard staggered past them in the streets. Let them try to feel a warm and affectionate interest on the behalf of these men, and try to win them by the exhibition of the love of Christ beaming in their own lives. Christian professors expected one another to refrain from many things for the sake of example, and hence a rigid line had been drawn between them and the world, but none of these were so injurious to Christian character as the sanctioned practice of moderate drinking. Let their example, then, be on the right side, for they frequently mingled in the society of those who were in danger of falling into the sin of drunkenness. Were gambling introduced, they would discourage it, and would not sit down with those who indulged in this vice; but the Christian would sit down with them when the ensnaring glass was brought out, would ask them to drink of its contents, or, at all events, sanction the doing so by their example. Perchance they might have determined not to drink, having suffered from it, but such an example from a professing Christian was too much for them—it destroyed all their weak resolves, and the draught was taken. Would the Christian publicly upbraid him, or for his sake, on that occasion, abstain!—why such a course would be marked cruelty to him; the only effectual thing would be to abstain altogether from such drinks. He called upon them to give the benefit of their example to those who were so much weaker than themselves. So long as professing Christians encouraged these practices, it would be very difficult to overcome the evil of drunkenness; if all would set the example, the happiest results would soon follow: the sacrifice was a small one, but how much good would result from its adoption! In thus withholding their aid, Christians certainly seemed to discourage a blessed work, and no Christian could refuse to give his aid to a benevolent movement without incurring heavy responsibility. The speaker then proceeded to contend that the practice of abstinence would have the best effects on physical organisation, and then added that “moderation” would never save the drunkard; the only effective example was habitual abstinence. He then alluded to the circumstance that the Americans at one time refused to partake of tea on account of the tax which Great Britain had put upon it, and asked if English Christians were not prepared to make a smaller sacrifice when such important interests depended on it. The subject of the pledge was then referred to, and its necessity strongly pleaded. The successes of the society in America and Ireland were then referred to, and allusion was made to the already altered habits observable in this country. The lecturer concluded by making an eloquent appeal to Christians and their ministers to join in so important and benevolent a movement.—At the close of the service a collection was made in aid of the society's objects.—Ipswich Express.

On Wednesday evening the members and friends assembled at a public tea-meeting at the Temperance Hall, which was tastefully decorated with evergreens, &c., for the occasion. Upwards of 550 tickets were sold, and the room was crowded with a cheerful and respectable assemblage. The tables were furnished gratuitously by friends of the cause, so that the whole receipts from the tickets will be devoted to the purposes of the Association. This meeting was addressed by R. D. Alexander, Esq., George Alexander, Esq., Rev. J. Matthews of Aldborough, Rev. A. Reed, B.A., of Norwich, Rev. J. C. Bodwell of Bury, and H. Clapp, Esq., of Massachusetts, whose able and eloquent addresses told powerfully in favour of temperance principles.

[We regret that our space prevents us giving the admirable report furnished in the Ipswich Express of January 30th, to which we refer our readers. We earnestly desire increased prosperity and speedy success to crown the devoted, intelligent, and manly operations of the Suffolk Temperance Association.—ED. N. T. C.]

CIRENCESTER.

On the 13th and 14th of this month, two meetings on the temperance question were held in this town, which will be long remembered by the friends of total abstinence. On both occasions they were favoured with the services of Jabez Inwards. On the first evening, malt liquor formed more particularly the subject of the lecturer's discourse; he boldly, and most admirably, displayed the sinfulness of destroying the barley, “a good creature of God,” and which if otherwise appropriated would feed 6,000,000 of our fellow-men. He most convincingly portrayed the rottenness of the whole drinking-system, from the first process of malting the grain to the last act of swallowing the liquor. On the second evening, the wine question was handled in a manner that enraptured the attention of a large and respectable audience who seemed to go with the speaker in all he advanced; the unscriptural nature of moderate-drinking was fearlessly asserted, and the assertion was supported by arguments most indisputable. The lecturer's appeals were impressive, and delivered in elegant language, but so clear and convincing as to be perfectly intelligible to the man of humble abilities. Until this visit Jabez Inwards was a stranger to the friends of temperance in this town; but he is so no longer; they feel that he has strengthened their hands in their great and glorious career, and they hope, at no very distant period, again to be favoured with his valuable services.

ALFRED KNIGHT.

PETT, NEAR HASTINGS.

The little village of Pett, was enlivened on Wednesday evening last, by a tea-meeting, and a large assembly afterwards of temperance friends in the chapel belonging to the Bible Christians of that place. The Rev. James Ching presided; and Messrs. Pearson and Stokes (of Pett), F. Beck, W. Ransom, jun., and F. Streeter (of Hastings,) delivered addresses on the financial, moral, and physical bearings of the question on society and the world. A branch society of the Hastings Association was formed: upwards of thirty signatures obtained.

Doings of Strong Drink.

AN UNNATURAL PARENT.—On Monday, a man was brought before the Gorbals Police Court, in company with a woman, implicated in the charge of having thrown his own daughter, a child of tender years, out of the window of his dwelling-house, by which she was seriously injured. From the facts which have transpired, it appears that on Saturday night he came into the house accompanied by the woman referred to, and that he was under the influence of liquor at the time. His daughter, who is an interesting girl not more than ten years of age, remonstrated with him, but all the rejoinder she received was a command to leave the house, or he would throw her out of the window. The poor girl, terrified at the threat, endeavoured to leave the apartment; but as her brutal parent had unconsciously locked the door, she could not open it, and told him so. With an oath the wretched man ran forward to where his child was standing, and lifting her in his arms, carried her towards the window and thrust her out, shutting it down upon her. The girl in her agony caught hold of the wooden-sill with her hands, and hung there as long as her strength held out. In this effort her fingers were cut and blistered, but her strength was soon exhausted, and she fell heavily down on the pavement, where she was picked up. Had she fallen in any other position than she did, the result would probably have been immediate death; the window being on the second floor. It is not known yet whether the injuries are likely to prove fatal; if the spine (as there is reason to fear) has been injured, her ultimate recovery is doubtful.—Times.

WRECK OF THE TIGRESS.—DISGRACEFUL SCENES.—This unfortunate East Indiaman, which went on shore on Sunday night last, to the westward of Shakespeare-cliff, Dover, has become a total wreck, and portions of her cargo have strewn the beach as far as the South Foreland. The consequence has been that hundreds of the lower orders, men, women, and children, have lined the shore all day long, eager to possess themselves of floating pieces of the wrecked ship, spices, cocoa-nuts, or any thing else that came in their way, wherewith to make lawful prize; and, unfortunately, in one or two instances, despite the vigilance of the officers of customs and coast-guard boatmen, casks or puncheons of rum have been washed ashore, the heads of which have been knocked in, and the contents carried off in the crowns of hats, in boots, or any available article at hand; and such a scene of drunkenness and bestiality ensued, as to beggar description—men, women, and children, lying on the beach, huddled together in the worst state of intoxication, so that many of them have stood a chance of being drowned by the rising of the tide, whilst others have been rendered so insensible through the drink, that it has been found necessary to remove their bodies on shutters to the workhouse, and other places. It is doubtful whether some of them will recover. It is reported that one or two persons are missing, and it is feared that they were not removed high enough up the beach to prevent their bodies being caught by the flow of the sea. This scene was likely to have been repeated yesterday, by another puncheon of rum coming ashore; but the coast-guard, arriving in time after it had been broached, succeeded in overturning it into the sea—a charitable rescue to many.—Canterbury Journal.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

5th, The extent to which the example of Teetotal parents would promote the moral and religious well-being of families, and afford to parents the means of sending their children to school.

6th, The practical working of the drinking-usages and customs in manufactories, workshops and elsewhere.

The names of the adjudicators will be announced at a future time.

The Essays, which must not exceed forty-six 8vo pages, to be sent under cover, accompanied with a sealed letter enclosing the real name and address of the writer, on or before the 1st of September, 1849, to the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

The Committee, also, offer a further prize of £10 for the best Essay on the most efficient means of conducting Temperance Societies, with the view of accelerating, and giving permanence to the Total Abstinence Reformation. This Essay must not exceed thirty-two 8vo pages, and is open to competition by writers of all classes. To be sent in by the 1st of July, to the office of the National Temperance Society, and the adjudication to be made under the direction of the Committee.

ISAAC DOXSEY, Secretary.

THE DRINKING CUSTOMS, versus LIFE ASSURANCE.

The mind of man is gifted with the faculty of comparison, and deeply affected by its exercise. Many a time have we seen a child entreated in vain to part with an amusing toy, abandon it at once, when another was presented to it. Its little eye has scanned with a philosophising glance the proffered object, comparison has been instituted, and readily its idol is relinquished. This principle exists in persons of adult years; and if you would successfully attack a pernicious indulgence, you must seek to substitute one less baneful, and, if possible, equally attractive. In vain do we, for instance, speak of the enormous expenditure of strong drink, if we do not point out some neglected duty which demands fulfilment, or some neglected enjoyment which invites acceptance.

We wish to apply this fact to the important duty and elevated luxury of providing for the future well-being of the community. The dissipation of the present must be paid for with fearful interest. Those who for national glory, or from supposed necessity, lead armies to the field, entail upon unborn generations the crushing expense. The indolence or folly of a father often condemns to a life of wretchedness and difficulties, the future families over which his sons and daughters may rule. Every individual instance of forethought and prudence has an influence extending beyond the immediate circle in which it was designed to operate; and the social system is elevated and purified by many an act of kindness or of wisdom directed to a particular object, but by its ten thousand vibrations, awaking many slumbering spirits to virtue, and kindling many desponding souls with happiness and bounding joy.

Every man who has a wife or a family has "a stake in the country," and his patriotic and paternal feelings, if guided by intelligence, will alike prompt him to provide against the contingencies of the future, according to the ability of the present. This is a most sacred responsibility, and should be prepared for, even at the expense of present indulgence, or the cost of actual sacrifice. Now, a young man, who, at twenty-five years of age, may be at the head of a family, and able to provide for them by his labour or his skill, may also secure for them at his death £150., by the simple sacrifice of one pint of beer a-day. Suppose him suddenly removed by death, the young widow, and perhaps one or two orphan children, are at once ruined, and compelled to seek refuge in the parish workhouse, wretched in themselves, and a burden on their neighbours. The sum which the daily pint abandoned might secure, would, by judicious use, place the poor woman in circumstances to provide an honourable maintenance for herself and her fatherless babes.

But let us suppose another case. A clerk is receiving £150. a-year. He spends four shillings weekly for wine and malt liquor. This would not be considered extravagant, by even moderate men, for a small family; but it would secure (at twenty-five years of age) £500. for his family at death, in addition to the accumulated advantages which he would receive through life in the shape of bonus. How often are families in such circumstances, plunged into irretrievable distress, for want of some provision. Five hundred pounds would be a sufficient capital to start in some business by which the necessities of the family might still be met, and the considerate husband and father would not have his dying pillow disturbed by the destitution suspended by the thread of his own trembling life, over the head of his beloved wife and family.

With these views, the friends of temperance, some years since, established a Life Assurance Society, limited in the first instance to total abstinents, but subsequently thrown open to the public in general; still, however, providing that the accounts of the abstaining insurers should be kept separate from those of the non-abstainers. At a meeting of this Institution, held at Radley's Hotel, on the 16th February, some facts were stated by the Secretary, which on account of their importance, we here transcribe. After giving

"A concise description of the three distinct classes of Life Assurance Companies, and the peculiar features of several of the most remarkable offices; and contrasting them with the variety and combination of advantages to be secured in the Temperance Office; he said the main point, the most interesting to the present company, was, the remarkable difference in the rate of mortality experienced by this office as compared with others. In one of the most select and successful offices, the deaths during the first eight years were 43 out of 1059 policies issued: in the Temperance Office, there had been 47 out of 2836, being little more than a third! The persons assured in the old offices consisted principally of the wealthy classes, who for the most part live freely, and use comparatively little exertion—except such as is injurious rather than beneficial to health. And it was a singular fact, that the Life Offices, with all their care in excluding diseased lives, actually experience a higher rate of mortality than the whole population! It would appear, then, that the higher classes were inferior lives, instead of being, as is often supposed, the best. At the age of 35 years, the expectation of life in the whole population is 31 years! in the Life Offices only 30; in the peerage only 27, whilst among the rural labourers it is 37. The length of life seemed to be actually in the inverse ratio of what are supposed to be the means of enjoying it. Now, the Temperance Office is chiefly composed of the industrious plain living classes, the tradesmen and shopkeepers, with some mechanics and labourers; a class of people pronounced by two leading actuaries to be the best class for a life office. Accordingly, the deaths in the Temperance Office, compared with those in one of the most successful of the public offices, had been only 17 to 40. The rate of mortality in the old offices is about 18 per 1000 annually; in the Temperance Office, it has been 6 per 1000. In the population of England and Wales, in the prime of life, say at ages 20 to 50, the annual rate of mortality is 14 per 1000; in the Temperance Office it has only been 4. Taking particular classes of members. In several unhealthy and hazardous occupations, including tailors, painters, bakers, shoemakers, railway-guards, and engine-drivers, the deaths had been only 1 per cent in eight years. The common rate of mortality among clerks is 2 per cent. yearly; in the Temperance Office, out of 136 clerks insured, there has been but one death in eight years, and the age of that individual was 73. Out of 148 tailors, during eight years not a single death had occurred. Out of 271 persons, of miscellaneous occupations, the deaths had been only three, and of those three, one died of cholera, and another from a prevailing epidemic during the fatal winter of last year. In eight years, out of about 3,000 assurances, the total number of deaths had been only 47, four of which were persons upwards of 60 years old, and six between 50 and 60." Mr. Compton then gave some interesting particulars, shewing the great benefits which had been realised by the families of several of the deceased members: one case in particular, where the widow had been enabled to continue the business of her late husband instead of being left destitute, as she would otherwise have been. The same case, however, showed the danger of procrastination. The deceased had actually concluded to assure in a much larger sum, but had delayed completing the additional assurance, until fatal disease had overtaken him. Another case served to show the great privileges granted by the Act of Parliament, under which this Institution is enrolled, in enabling the members to secure the sums assured to any other persons, by simply appointing them nominees to receive the money when due. This, the party alluded to had omitted to do, and having left no will, the usual heavy expenses were incurred before the money could be received. By appointing nominees, the sums are exempted from probate and legacy duty, and all expenses are avoided. The nominees can be changed at any time, at the discretion of the member appointing them, but those to whom he finally leaves the money, receive it in full, free from all deductions whatever. The office, notwithstanding its extraordinary good fortune, has already paid nearly £4000 to the families of deceased members, for which sum scarcely one-tenth had been paid by the assureds: thus showing the great advantages of Life Assurance in securing a certain and immediate benefit whenever it may be required. Mr. Compton concluded by reading the following extract from a letter received by him from a medical gentleman in the country:—

"The adoption of provident habits, in connection with temperance institutions, appears to me the best circumstantial aid to the moral force of the temperance society, and I have long wished that every itinerant advocate would embody this idea in his persuasive addresses. I think they should do this without any pecuniary reward, and rest on the conviction, that it is the surest way to render permanent the altered habits of the industrious classes."

The closing remark of this quotation embodies the principle with which we set out. We hope it will be reduced to practice by our friends, in their lectures. It is not necessary, nor possible, for them to dwell at length on the distinctive features of Life Assurance Companies, but let them bring occasionally forward the important consideration that young husbands and fathers may obtain for their families such advantages, by the exercise of such an amount of personal self-denial, and they will succeed in making many happier families, and many better men.

We hope the above remarks on the Temperance Provident Institution will not be considered invidious. By inserting them we had no design of because we believe that it is sometimes urged with scrupulous conscientiousness. The objection to which we refer is that such societies, not requiring a profession of religion, are a violation of the command, "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers." It might be sufficient to reply, that the command has reference only to church fellowship, as shewn by the context, and that to carry it out in every circumstance of life would be impossible and absurd. The Christian tradesman could not enter into a commercial partnership with one who made be co-existent, and thus accelerate the approach of the time, 'when all shall know the Lord from the least even to the greatest!'"

The Union appears to recognize two important facts,—1st, That Christian men may fall by strong drink; and 2nd, That total abstinence is a safe and easy remedy. It thus states the objects which it contemplates:—

"That the objects which this Society desire to accomplish are, the dissemination of teetotal truths among members of the professing Christian church, and the prevention and cure of intemperance, among all persons, generally throughout the world."

undervaluing similar societies. Any man who can by the sacrifice of personal indulgences, save "something for a rainy day," had better insure with the worst managed company, and pay the highest existing premiums than not insure at all. This is our deliberate conviction. We hail therefore the increase of such societies as an unmistakable indication of national and social progress. We are glad that in various forms, and by different methods, the public mind is becoming awakened to their importance, and regard every advertisement of every life assurance company, as an indirect auxiliary to the temperance cause; while it, in its turn, is a powerful ally and faithful friend to them all. Young men! remember the important alternative! Who will give up his daily pint, to secure his family from sudden and perhaps irremediable distress? Who will support the life assurance company in preference to the public house?

no profession. The Christian gentleman could not be on the direction of a railway company, or the committee of an hospital, or the common council of a city, or the government of a lunatic or orphan asylum, and then "we must either go out of the world" or materially abridge our usefulness in it. This Union seeks to adapt itself to the existing scruple, and therefore requires that all persons desirous of uniting with it, shall have made an honourable profession of christian principle, by union with a christian church. But the Union shall speak for itself. In an admirable address now before us, it says:—

"Perceiving and sincerely lamenting the opposition offered by Christians, in particular, to teetotalism, a few teetotal members of the Christian community, earnestly desirous that the Church might no longer be deprived of those sources of information which had been so readily afforded to the world, and fully conscious of the still greater results which would undoubtedly follow their cordial co-operation, held several private meetings, when various plans to effect this laudable object were severally considered—resulting in the formation of the present Society—the 'CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.'

"Its object is—as might from the foregoing remarks be inferred, and as its title in some measure indicates—the Union of Christianity and Teetotalism; and whilst its members are not prevented from exerting themselves to reclaim the drunkard—but are, on the contrary, by their rules enjoined so to do—their principal efforts are directed to the dissemination of the truths of teetotalism amongst that class whose public Christian profession is some surety for their consistent public practice; and whose aspirations, professedly directed to another and a better world, render them less liable to the failings, imperfections, and prejudices, of those whose hopes are centred on the pleasures and vanities of the present life.

"In conclusion, the Committee would affectionately and earnestly invite the co-operation of members of Christian churches, of all denominations, who at present maintain neutral ground respecting the all-important principles now briefly presented to their notice, and seriously urge them to ponder their position, and come to such determination as shall satisfy their own consciences, and at the same time, promote the glory of God.

"To those members of churches who have identified themselves with teetotalism, the Committee would respectfully suggest the propriety of their becoming members of the 'Union,' and throwing in the amount of their influence to advance the objects sought to be obtained by the 'Union,' when the profession of teetotalism and Christianity shall be co-existent, and thus accelerate the approach of the time, 'when all shall know the Lord from the least even to the greatest!'"

The Union appears to recognize two important facts,—1st, That Christian men may fall by strong drink; and 2nd, That total abstinence is a safe and easy remedy. It thus states the objects which it contemplates:—

"That the objects which this Society desire to accomplish are, the dissemination of teetotal truths among members of the professing Christian church, and the prevention and cure of intemperance, among all persons, generally throughout the world."

It has long been a matter of regret that Christian churches have so long stood aloof from the temperance reformation, although it must be acknowledged that the cause has found its most sincere, consistent, and zealous, and stedfast friends among Christian men and Christian ministers. The Christian Temperance Union was formed with the view of organizing those only who were members of Christian churches, from the supposition that they would be able to act with greater efficiency on the minds of the brethren with whom they were united in so holy a fellowship. Some "weak brethren" have raised an objection to temperance societies in general, of which we could never perceive the soundness or feel the force; yet we are to respect it, because we believe that it is sometimes urged with scrupulous conscientiousness. The objection to which we refer is that such societies, not requiring a profession of religion, are a violation of the command, "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers." It might be sufficient to reply, that the command has reference only to church fellowship, as shewn by the context, and that to carry it out in every circumstance of life would be impossible and absurd. The Christian tradesman could not enter into a commercial partnership with one who made

We think no objection can be offered to this design, or to the manner in which it is stated. The means are in harmony with acknowledged principles of its members and the class of persons on which it seeks to act. They are,

"The holding of public meetings, prayer meetings, the delivery of lectures, the circulation of temperance publications, private visitations, and, when practicable, the formation of branch societies."

We very cordially commend this movement to the christian public, and to the brethren who are entrusted with the management of its affairs we say, Manfully fulfil your vocation. You have selected an important sphere of operation—fill it with the light of truth, and warm it with the fire of love. Every earnest convert you secure in the church will tell with power on the world. The strong drink question is rapidly rising to be the great moral and physical question of the age. It speaks through committees of sanitary reform. It turns up in inquiries about penal codes and prison discipline. It mingles with considerations of domestic economy and social comfort. It demands attention from all the advocates of national education, whether State or voluntary. It is suggested by nearly two-thirds of the cases of ecclesiastical discipline that are exercised. It forces itself upon the attention of the home-born and the stranger in every street of our great towns and cities. The christian church ought not, must not, CANNOT LET IT ALONE. Her high claims—her divine mission—her benevolent character—her unsuspected consistency—all require that she pronounce her verdict. We already anticipate it. She cannot condemn. She may rebuke the utterance of rash and unguarded expressions, but she will admit the value of the principle, and testify to the efficacy of the practice. The thorough emancipation of the church from the thralldom of custom, would be followed by large accessions to her ranks, and a mighty increase to her moral power. "God even our own God," would "bless us," and that blessing will usher in the glorious prophetic day when "all the ends of the earth shall fear him."

SANITARY AND SOCIAL RESULTS OF TEETOTALISM.

We are glad to observe numerous indications that the temperance cause is making great progress in Manchester and Salford. There are many rooms opened in which meetings are held every week, so that there is scarcely a night passes in which one is not held. The speeches, principally by men of the working classes, are full of truth, eloquence, and earnestness. We select one speech, because it bears reference to the sanitary and political reforms that might be effected by temperance. At a crowded meeting, held in the large school room at New Windsor Chapel, on Tuesday evening,

MR. PRENTICE said: Four months ago, in this school room, I publicly gave in my adhesion to a total abstinence from the use of intoxicating liquors, and now, after those four months' experience, I have come for the purpose of declaring that so far from ever having, even for a single moment, repented of that adhesion, I am only sorry that my determination was not made at an earlier period of my life, for I am more and more convinced, the more I think upon the subject, that the drinking usages of society give rise to more misery and crime than can be attributed to any other single cause. I have never been of opinion that the use of exciting drinks has been necessary to the preservation of health. I have never thought that it enabled a man to do more bodily labour, for I have had occasion to compare the farm work done in my native parish in the north, where nothing stronger than milk or water was taken, with the farm labour of the south, where the mower's daily allowance was a gallon of beer, or two gallons of cider, and I saw that for regular, continuous hard work, from day to day, from week to week, from year to year, the advantage was greatly on the side of the water drinker. I have never been of opinion that the use of exciting liquors has enabled a man to do more mental work. The brain may be excited to greater activity by the quicker circulation of the blood, which is the consequence of taking wine or spirits—there may be more quickness of apprehension, more flashes of wit, more eloquence, more hilarity, more mirth,—but it is momentary; it does not even last out the night. There is nothing good written under the inspiration of drink. Burns did not write the Cotter's Saturday Night under the inspiration of drink. Byron did not write Child Harold under the inspiration of drink. His Don Juan might have been aided by copious draughts of the gin-and-water which the poet loved. The more's the pity; its morality breathes throughout of the degrading influence. Our best writers have been sober men. Our greatest orators have been sober men. Sheridan might be an exception amongst the latter, but even Sheridan sobered himself to compose his speeches. Under pretence of recovering himself from a debauch, he would shut himself up for days together, to concoct speech, word by word, and sentence by sentence till he had it perfect, and then he would palm it upon the House of Commons as an extemporary effusion. His very jokes were elaborated when sober and in secret, to be let off over the bottle or exploded in the house, as if they were the inspiration of the moment. Our hardest working public men have always been sober men. Cobbett, the most voluminous, often the most forcible writer of modern times, was almost a teetotaler. Cobden who has distinguished himself by his last ten years labours, is almost a teetotaler. Bright, his fellow labourer, is a teetotaler. Colonel Thompson, distinguished by his literature as much as by his politics is a teetotaler. George Thompson, the unwearied opponent of slavery and monopoly, is a teetotaler. Henry Vincent, the fervid, eloquent, never-tiring advocate of progress, is a teetotaler. Joseph Sturge constant in labour for the public good, is a teetotaler. Mr. Brotherton, the member for this borough, is a teetotaler. Mr. Alderman Harvey our public-spirited fellow-townsmen, whom I have the pleasure of seeing here to-night, is a teetotaler. Are we not in good company, my good teetotalers? Are we not in a position to tell the world that w can work with our hands and with our heads better than if we resorted to the miserable excitement of drink? Work is the destiny of man. Your true nobleman is he who works with head or hand—not for self alone, but for the good of all. To work with head or hand, we must have the healthy mind in the healthy body. To have both, we must abjure artificial and unnatural stimulants. Convinced as I was that the use of stimulating beverages was unnecessary to the preservation of health, either bodily or mental, and convinced also that the abuse was greatly prejudicial to both, it may be asked why I did not join in the temperance movement instead of only bestowing on it my commendation? I praised the movement, saw it was a good movement, respected those who took a part in the movement—why did I not join it? The truth is, I did not see the importance of individual example. I had, now and again, practised abstinence for months together, so as to be able to say from my own experience that it was not injurious to health. I did this to knock on the head the physical argument—I did not then see the importance of setting a moral example, and using a moral argument. I went to America, and saw the misery occasioned to many of my countrymen by intemperate indulgence. I found men of high morality joining the temperance movement as a moral movement—I saw religious men taking an active part in it as a religious movement. I heard that every member of the numerous body of the Congregationalists in Connecticut, not only was a total abstainer, but had given over dealing in intoxicating liquors. I came home, and was often consulted by persons intending to emigrate. My conviction was that no working man could do any good in a country where strong whisky could be had at threepence a quart, unless he was a teetotaler. I told them of my conviction, and recommended them not to wait till they got there, but to commence total abstinence here—to confirm themselves in sober habits before they left home. In common consistency I could not advise that which I did not practise myself. But it was not merely for the sake of consistency that I became an abstainer. That was an inferior motive—I trust I had a higher. The man who teaches a truth which he has only recognised speculatively, will often be led by his own teaching to hold it as a principle of action. I had faith in the principle—I felt that my faith was to be shown by my works. In warning others to put themselves beyond the chance of an abuse, I convinced myself that it was a duty I owed to society to protest against the use, for out of the use the abuse comes. If by my example a single person could be prevented from making wreck of health and morality, I felt that it was my duty to set that example. I came here four months ago and made that declaration. I come here now to declare that I have nothing to regret as to my determination, but that I did not make it sooner. It is not, however, yet the eleventh hour—we have the heat and the burden of the day before us yet—we have yet much work to do, and we must do it with all our might. I mean to be among the workers. I have worked for political and commercial reforms; take me among you as a worker for this great moral reform—this consummating reform which will give double value to the civil, religious, and commercial liberty which we now enjoy, or which we shall hereafter achieve. I have made no sacrifice by my resolve. I have endured no persecution on account of it. I have had almost no solicitation to join in the drinking usages of society. No one has laughed at me as affecting a singularity. I don't much care—never much cared for a fool's laugh; but the fool has not dared to laugh. The teetotalers have placed themselves above that petty annoyance. Although their practice is not followed, their principles are respected. This is a great point to have gained. Young men dislike to join us lest they should be laughed at. They need not fear that now. Nobody will laugh at a virtuous resolve but the profligate, and who needs to care for the profligate's laugh or sneer? Laugh! We are the men to laugh. "Let them laugh who win" is an old adage. We are the winners. We win health and strength; we win the respect of the good; we win the power to an almost incalculable extent of promoting the welfare of our fellow-men. We are those who should laugh, if it were permitted us to laugh at folly and shame and sin. I have said that I have had little solicitation to join in the drinking usages of society. I have been asked, "Have you given up wine also?" "Yes, I have." "What, do you drink nothing stronger than water?" "Nothing stronger than water." "Is your health none the worse?" "None the worse: on the whole rather better." "But are your spirits as good?" "On the whole rather better, more equable, less of ups and downs; always ready for mental effort." "But it looks a little unsocial that we can't have a cheerful glass together as we used to have." "Nothing unsocial at all; I will take as many social glasses of water as you like. If I can't be social with you over wine, you can be social with me over water." One night after supper, when I was in Scotland, a fortnight ago, five gentlemen who had been asked to meet me, chose to be social with me in my own way. Instead of the whisky and the hot water and sugar, some cold water was placed on the table, and a very merry evening we had. We could truly have sung—

"Six blyther lads, that lee lang night, Ye wadna find in Christendee."

And there were no headaches next morning, and no drams in the forenoon to sustain the flagging frame, and no evening sederunt to rouse the depressed spirits. Is there no sociality, no joviality amongst us? Why, we are the really jolly fellows. "We are the boys who life enjoy." Commend me to him who has life, and liveliness, and wit, without the help of the wine, or the brandy, or the whisky. The man who cannot talk well and cheerily without such mean appliances is a stupid fellow. He is what in Scotland they call a "sumph." If at any time any wit comes out of the heavy lump, it is not his—he has bought it from the wine-merchant or spirit-dealer. We sneer at the soldier who needs brandy to give him courage in the field of battle. We sneeringly call that sort of courage "Dutch courage." The wit that can't be brought out till the utterer is half drunk, is of no better quality. It is only the explosion of gas from the bung of a fermenting beer-barrel. It is one of the evils of society in England that we have too little sociality. We are not social, because we have the notion that there is sociality only in drinking. Our mistaken notion of sociality drives real sociality out from amongst us. The decanters, the eternal decanters, as Cobbett used to call them, have banished the good old English hospitality. A man dare not ask his friend to a quiet family dinner, because he thinks it a part of hospitality to set out the decanters; and though he has time to take a quiet dinner, he has not time, perhaps he has not health, to permit his indulgence in wine; so the invitation is not given until there be a great formal party, when all the drinking can be done at once. Then, again, the friend dare not make a call near dinner time—dare not invite himself to take pot-luck. He has time to spare for a quiet friendly talk, but he fears the decanters. Thus do friends live apart in the same town, perhaps in the next street, perhaps next door to each other, without a quiet interchange of those small unpretending hospitalities which are so delightful. They never eat together but at a great feast, where there is much speech-making, but no talk. All this formality arises from the decanters. Again, the man of small means cannot, for the decanters, associate with his richer friends. He can give a friend a well-cooked plain dinner, but he cannot give him East India madeira, and champagne, and claret. He will not accept, he ought not to accept, dinners when he cannot give dinners. Banish the decanters, and these men could meet on a footing of equality. By banishing the bottles from the table there would be better company and greater enjoyment. There would then be real sociality instead of a sham. The spirit bottle in the cottage is as potent an enemy of sociality and hospitality as the claret decanter in the mansion, and we shall never be merry old England again till they be thrown out of house and hall, and from coal and waxen light. The claret decanter men, the black bottle men, the brown jug men, only pretend to be merry. You will sometimes hear one of their infatuated number say, "Give me a short life and a merry." Merry! Is there any merriment in the broken-down father who sees one whom he fondly hoped would have been the stay of his old age, sunk into the hopeless, helpless, debased condition of a drunkard? Merry! Is there any merriment in the heart-broken mother, who sees all her tender cares to bring up a man thrown away upon a brute in human form? Merry! Is there any merriment in the wife who sees the once-beloved sinking from the consequences of his own vices into an early and disgraceful grave? Merry! Is there any merriment in the child—the drunkard's child—when her meek look of love is returned with a satanic scowl, and instead of a blessing she receives a curse or a blow? Merry! Is there any merriment in the victim himself, in his alternations of lethargy and madness? Any merriment when in his waking dreams he sees the tormentors come before their time, and already feels the horrors of hell! Young men, young men! if you have any longing for the short life and the merry, visit the chamber of the man who is suffering under delirium tremens, see his maniac terror, and hear his agonising shrieks, as one horror after another presents itself to his diseased vision, and you will see what the merry life is of which he has boasted. His fate may be yours. Beware of the tempter! Touch not, taste not the infuriated draught. Let the contents of the poisoned cup never pass your lips. I will not take the religious view of such a deplorable case. The respected minister of the adjoining chapel will deliver a sermon on the subject of abstinence on Sunday night. Hear him. In the mean time think, with dread and shuddering, on the death-bed of a man whose life departs in a fit of raging madness induced by drink.

A word or two as to the saving that may be effected by temperate habits: let us have no sneering about miserly savings, and laying up dirty pelf. The poor man cannot "lay up," but it is something if he can lift up his head amongst his fellow-men and say, "I owe nothing to any body." If he cannot lodge money in the bank, he can secure his own independence. He saves money—

Not for to hide it in a ditch,
Nor for a train dependent,
But for the glorious privilege
Of being independent.

He can besides, for himself and children, make provision for a considerable advancement, morally and intellectually, by a little saving. The price of a single glass of beer in a week would furnish him with a weekly number of "Chambers's Journal" to read in his family, and to furnish many agreeable conversations; the price of another would enable him to send one child to the infants' school; the price of two more would enable him to send an older child to a respectable day school. Abstinence from a quart of seven-penny beer a week would do all that for him and his. Let any man here ask himself which of these is the best way of spending seven-pence. Allan Ramsay represents his Gentle Shepherd as sitting on the hill-side and "talking with kings." With books you may talk with greater than kings, and books are cheap companions now. The best of books, the book of books, the Bible—thanks to the labours of John Childs, of Bungay, and Joseph Hume, who broke up the monopoly of Bible printing—may now be had for nine-pence; the New Testament, neatly bound, for four-pence halfpenny.

Any man who can afford to buy beer can afford to buy books. Let me now point out to you how a shilling a week saved from the beer-shop would affect both the sanitary and political condition of the community. You all know how the working classes of Manchester and Salford are crowded into narrow lanes and courts, ill paved, without sewers, and where purifying air and the light from heaven can seldom penetrate. They are not so badly circumstanced in that respect as the inhabitants of Glasgow, and, therefore, have not been visited by cholera, which has been so destructive in the northern manufacturing city. But the crowded state of the population is greatly prejudicial to health, and typhus fever is always most prevalent and most fatal where there is a want of cleanliness, and air, and light. An immense improvement would take place if the man who pays £12 a year in rent were to remove into a £15 house; if the man who lives in a £10 house were to remove into one of £12; and if he who pays £8 were to remove into one at £10. This would ease the crowding into unhealthy localities. The health of every family would benefit by the change: the health of the whole community would benefit by the change. How is this to be effected? The saving of a shilling a week now spent in drink, would do it all: or this saving, put into a building club, would soon enable a man to live in his own house, rent free. So much for the sanitary improvement that might be made. Let us look at the political change that might be effected. If he who now pays 3s. a week for his cottage paid 4s. he would possess what, in my opinion, every sober man ought to possess—the elective suffrage. He would have a right, whether he paid his rent weekly or quarterly, to require that his name should be registered as an elector. This is a privilege not to be lightly prized. At present, in a great number of boroughs, the representation is sold by the drunkards. If they were to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage, there would be some sense in it; but they sell it for a pot of stupefying beer. A candidate could not bribe a teetotaler. The teetotaler is above his reach. Only think how much better the House of Commons would be if it represented not the drunkards, but the sober men of the community. Recently, in this borough of Salford, the member was carried by a majority of only one. That one voter was a teetotaler. Have some more teetotalers ready for next election. Look at a recent election in Stock port. The successful candidate said he did not give away drink, but somehow it happened that a great deal of drink was given away—somehow it happened that out of 42 publicans who voted, 40 voted for the man who said he had not opened public-houses. If there had been some 40 more teetotalers in that borough, that man would not now be giving his vote against retrenchment in the enormous public expenditure. In a very great number of boroughs, so nearly are parties balanced that a body of fifty men could turn the balance either way. This is a great power to possess. In whose hands ought it to be? In the hands of a drunken band, who will sell it for beer or brandy, or in the hands of sober thinking men, who will exercise it for the benefit of the community? Mr. Cobden wishes to extend the forty-shilling freehold suffrage. The extension already effected has done great good—its further extension would do still greater. His movement deserves our most earnest support, and I hope there are some here who will possess themselves of a county vote; but for every freeholder added to the county registration we could add twenty to the registration in boroughs. If his movement should add 10,000 to the county constituency, we might add 200,000 to the constituency in the boroughs. Think of the influence which such a body of men would possess. I do not say that they would be Tories, Whigs, or Radicals. There would be 200,000 men clear-headed enough to form an opinion—honest enough to express their opinion. They would spurn with contempt and loathing the dirty and degrading bribe; they would set an example to all the other electors. An election would no longer be a spectacle of man in his most degraded state—below the level of the beasts that perish; but it would be a spectacle of man exercising an ennobling right—not, indeed, a legislator, but a maker of legislators. And would not the example rise? The sober elector would not choose a drunken representative. Go into the House of Commons an hour or two after a late dinner, and you will see flushed faces, and see conduct, and hear sounds, that tell you plainly enough that honourable members have been indulging too much in wine to be able to listen to an argument. Go in an hour or two later still, and you will find the whole atmosphere of the house redolent of Bellamy's brandy and cigars. In common decency, these men would not be less decorous than their constituents. Up, then, teetotalism! "Up higher yet our bonnets,"—"There's a brave time coming,"—"We'll mak' the world better yet." We mean to do some good in our day and generation; let all who have a similar ambition come and join us—and when? to-morrow? next week? next month? next year? No! Now. This very night. Men, women, children,—you all have something in your power,—do not leave this room until you have put your hands to the good work by enrolling your names in our body. Why should any one delay? It is proved that the ordinary use of intoxicating liquors is not necessary to the preservation of health. It is proved that the abuse is most destructive to health. It is proved that cholera is almost always fatal when it attacks a person debilitated by drinking. It is proved that the use of stimulating drinks is destructive to the reasoning powers. It is seen, or beginning to be seen, that the drinking usages of society lessen hospitality and lessen sociality. It is seen, that out of the savings of abstinence a comparatively poor man may educate his children, and supply himself with books. It has been proved, by the Rev. Mr. Lee, minister of the adjoining chapel, that three-fourths of the pauperism which falls so heavily on us in Salford, is caused by drinking. It is seen that by the savings of abstinence, a man may have the great comfort of living in a better house, and a more healthy locality—that he may live in a house his own property—that he may acquire the suffrage, and thus be greatly influential in procuring good laws and cheap government. As a friend to morality, then, I say let us have teetotalism; as an advocate for sanitary improvement, I say let us have teetotalism; as a politician, as an earnest reformer, as an old labourer in the cause of government for the benefit of all, I say let us have teetotalism. Let us set the example to the world of a sober people, living at peace with each other, at peace with all the nations of the earth, and daily making progress in comfort, in useful knowledge, in morality, and in religion.—Manchester Times.

AN AFFECTIONATE APPEAL TO CHRISTIAN MODERATIONISTS.

Ye friends of moderation,
Who think a reformation,
Or moral renovation,
Would benefit our nation;
Who deem intoxication,
With all its dissipation,
In every rank and station,
The cause of degradation;
Of which your observation
Gives daily demonstration.
Who see the ruination,
Distress and desolation,
The open violation,
Of moral obligation;
The wretched habitation,
Without accommodation,
Or any regulation,
For common sustentation;
A scene of deprivation,
Unequal'd in creation:
The frequent desecration,
Of sabbath ordination,
The crime and deprecation,
Defying legislation,
The awful profanation,
Of common conversation,
The mental aberration,
And dire infatuation,
With every sad gradation,
To maniac desperation.
Ye who with consternation,
Behold this devastation,
And utter condemnation,
On all inebriation:
Why sanction its duration?
Or show disapprobation,
Of any combination,
For its extermination?
Without prevarication,
We deem a declaration,
That offers no temptation,
By any palliation,
Of this abomination,
The only sure foundation,

For total extirpation;
And under this persuasion,
Hold no communication,
With noxious emanation,
Of brewers' fermentation,
Or poisonous preparation,
Of spirit distillation;
Nor any vain libation,
Producing stimulation:
To this determination,
We call consideration,
And without hesitation,
Invite co-operation,
Of spirit distillation,
Not doubting imitation,
Without provocation,
Will raise your estimation,
And by continuation,
Afford you consolation;
And by its adaptation,
To cure this inflammation,
Insure your approbation.
And by your advocacy,
Excite the admiration,
Of our poison'd population,
And the acceleration,
Of entire abrogation,
Of this assassination:
Till with holy adoration,
All shout with acclamation
The praise of their salvation,
To God's administration,
For this annihilation,
Of life's abbreviation.
And in participation,
With this association,
You may by application,
Ensure the preservation,
Of a future generation,
From all contamination.
And may each indication,
Of such regeneration,
Be the theme of exultation,
Till its final consummation.

There is a certain proposed time and law of living. Who made that law? not he that received it; with the giver it rested, even with God.—Petrarch's View of Human Life.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

PRIZE ESSAYS.—Inquiries have reached us from various quarters for more specific information regarding the limits to be observed. The successful Essays would probably appear in post hoc, which, in the same type as the recent prize Essay on Juvenile Depravity, by the Rev. H. Worsley, M.A., would contain about 250 words to the page. Of course such exactness is not required, as, if necessary, they might be printed in smaller type.

Some difficulty has been felt as to the meaning of the expression, "working classes." As generally understood, it is limited to those engaged in manual labour.

CIRCULATION OF THE CHRONICLE.—As all our subscribers of 5s. and upwards receive it regularly, post free, our circulation ought to be much larger than it now is. Teetotalers should sustain their own periodicals. Will our friends take this matter into their consideration? Many, we fear, return to drinking habits, after the excitement under which they signed has died away. Would not country societies do well to supply some periodical every month to their members? We do not say, "Order the National Temperance Chronicle;" but we do say, "Take care that every pledged member is periodically supplied with some temperance literature. Many will buy them, if asked. Those who cannot afford it, (and there are a few who cannot) should be supplied by their more favoured brethren. We shall be happy to receive from our friends any hints tending to increase our circulation.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

IN

EXETER HALL,

ON THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 24TH,

AT SIX, P.M.

ISAAC DUXSEY, Secretary.

11, Tokenhouse Yard, February, 20, 1849.

THE MODEL PARISH.

TRUSTEES.

Rev. William Marsh, D.D., Incumbent of St. Mary's, Leamington.

Rev. Spencer Thornton, M.A., Vicar of Wendover, Bucks.

Rev. W. W. Robinson, M.A., Incumbent of Christ Church, Chelsea.

Rev. W. Carus Wilson, M.A., Casterton Hall.

Rev. W. Wight, M.A., late Curate of St. John's, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

During the past two months, lectures have been delivered in Somersetshire and Cornwall, by the Rev. W. Wight, in furtherance of the proposed scheme of a "Model Parish." We subjoin a report of the meeting at Bridgewater, which was held on Monday, February 13th, at the Public Rooms, and attended very numerously. The reverend gentleman commenced the subject by making a few remarks on the present state of our own country; and in continuation observed,—

"Whilst many nations of the earth seem to be reeling to their very centre, our own remains quiet, but how soon our turn may come we know not. We are a nation of unparalleled wealth—a nation of benevolent institutions, churches, chapels, and schools—a nation possessing advantages over other nations. Look at the condition of this unparalleled nation. The Hon. Charles Scott, at a lecture lately delivered at Nottingham, said that within the last few years pauperism in England had increased one-tenth; in Ireland one-third; and in Scotland it was greatly increasing—all owing to intemperance. He would refer to another important matter connected with this subject. He would ask what was the condition of our people with regard to education. One district alone in London has 16,000 children of an age capable of being taught, who have never been sent to a school. And in England it was calculated there were 100,000 children who never received any education at all. But if we for a moment considered to what a pitch drunkenness was carried, we should not wonder at the state of education. There are in this country 600,000 drunkards—60,000 of whom die annually from intoxication; 60,000 human beings rush every year into another world in such a state—is it not enough to call forth all our energies for a remedy? And, again, as it was important that we should know the real conditions of our country, he would refer to one more of its leading evils—he alluded to those degraded wretches who walk the streets of our towns. There are 200,000 of these unhappy beings in Great Britain, and upon the average they do not live more than five years after entering upon this miserable state of existence. Every five years then 200,000 of our daughters and sisters go to fill up the places of those who die. He would touch upon the last point in this portion of his subject. They could not expect their missions to prosper, for if they sent out a little band of faithful men, did they not send forth a vastly larger number of men who inflicted greater evils than could be overcome by our missionaries. There was an Achan in the camp. There was a giant evil existing in our country, which, if not crushed, would crush us—it was drunkenness, from which nine-tenths of the crime and pauperism of this country result. There is the evidence of our judges to bear us out in this assertion. Lord John Russell stated that there had been £1800 given away in one parish in London, and the consequence was that the landlords of public-houses and gin-shops were obliged to increase the number of attendants. A gin-shop keeper at Glasgow lately acknowledged that he received eleven pounds more on the day the poor were paid, than on any other day of the week. It had been said that twenty-five per cent. of the youths educated in our Sunday and day schools turned out drunkards. It was a most remarkable fact that the three greatest professedly religious countries in the world were those in which there was the greatest amount of drunkenness—they were Great Britain, the United States, and the North of Europe. He would ask them whether their present system of religion would remedy the evil. He contended that it could not—that they wanted a more practical religion—a religion more in accordance with divine scripture.

"We have, unquestionably, been all labouring under a strange and absurd delusion. Every one has been trained in the belief that alcoholic beverages are necessary. The minister takes intoxicating drinks, his friends and teachers do the same, and, of course, such example, recommendation, and authority influence the population at large. The rising generation are initiated into the same dangerous and corrupting habits, and thus the fatal delusion with all its concomitant evils is perpetuated.

"This is the history of our drinking system in our parishes throughout the country generally. Here lies the secret, the source of this giant evil, the master curse of Great Britain.

"Now we propose in the Model Parish to dispel the delusion and to eradicate the habit, and by this simple process to remove the occasion of three-fourths of those disorders over which we have to mourn in all our parochial districts.

"For the accomplishment of this object, it is proposed to purchase an advowson. And to the parish thus obtained, the trustees (the projector having the first appointment) will nominate as the minister a clergyman who will himself totally abstain from all alcoholic beverages. He, in his turn, will appoint under him teachers and all subordinates, on the same principle.

"In this way, minister, teachers, and others, will thoroughly indoctrinate the young in the conviction, not only that such articles are unnecessary, but that since the evils growing out of their use is so great, it is a moral and a sacred duty for them wholly to abstain.

"Further efforts would be made to induce the owners of property to insert clauses in their leases, so as to prevent places ever being opened for the sale of intoxicating drinks, also to influence the magistrates in withholding licenses.

"It may be said, there are parishes already managed very much upon this plan; but supposing this to be the case, yet where is the security, when the minister and his teachers are removed by death, or any other cause, that they will be succeeded by other parties prepared to follow up their work? In the Model Parish we have this guaranteed, and it constitutes a most important feature in the undertaking."

The Rev. gentleman concluded a most interesting address by drawing a picture of the probable condition of the Model Parish after it had been established a few years, "no ragged school would be required;—there would be much less disease, misery, and pauperism than with a drinking population. No 'lock up' would be necessary, nor, it is hoped, a large body of police. On the contrary, having removed the occasion of rags, pauperism, and disorder—having applied the axe to the root of all these evils—we may, with God's blessing, anticipate the most striking and beneficial results."

[We commend to our readers the consideration of this important project. The design is one which will commend itself to every man interested in the elevation of the people, and especially in the destruction of that gigantic and fearful evil—strong drink. There will, of course, be differences of opinion among our readers, as to the means of effecting the benevolent intentions of the projector. Many persons, both in the church and out of it, have serious and unconquerable objections to the purchase and sale of advowsons, of which fact no one can be more fully aware than our reverend friend. Moreover, another difficulty of a practical character naturally suggests itself, viz., How can an assurance be given that public-houses and beer-shops should be excluded from the model parish? One proprietor in the parish may ruin the scheme, provided he can obtain a license. And should those gentlemen now in the commission of the peace refuse to grant licenses through the influence of the existing incumbent, what security can be obtained that magistrates, who may be hereafter appointed, will be equally favourable to the object? We state these difficulties with candour, and with an honest desire to promote the cause which is dear to our hearts. We shall be happy to insert, in our next, any communication from our valued friend, by way of removing difficulties, and explaining, as he is no doubt prepared to do, the way in which these objections are answered in his own mind. To those friends who are prepared to throw in their aid, we may mention, that they can do so by ordering the Model Parish Dietetic Cocoa, for particulars of which see our advertising columns.—Ed.]

LORD ASHLEY AND JUVENILE DESTITUTION.

The acts of Government extend into every ramification of the social body, and possibly there is no part from which its influence is excluded. In any enlarged scheme of social improvement the effect of our political institutions must be fairly estimated. That system must be exploded which grinds down the people and then takes infinite credit to itself for raising them up by charity. The true corrective is giving them a fair field, and teaching them how to help themselves.

On this subject we could not expect Lord Ashley to comment; but there is another that we imagined he could not overlook in a discussion on juvenile destitution, and that is intemperance, as a cause and incentive to crime. In 1843 he quoted a letter from the chaplain of a county gaol, in which the writer said, "I am within the mark in saying, that three-fourths of the crime committed is the result of intemperance." In the last report of the Inspector of Prisons, equally strong testimony is borne to the fact that our national sin of drinking is the great fountain of crime. The most powerful testimony that was ever borne to the evils of our beer-shops was by Lord Ashley himself, in the speech referred to. He clearly made them out to be the great sinks of iniquity, and the resorts of the abandoned of both sexes. This may be an evil with which it is difficult to contend; but when it is seen that our drinking-system is after all the most influential cause of that depravation of morals we see around us on all hands—when we see that a vast number of those wandering outcasts of the street, who sleep in filthy sties, under bridges and gateways, and who live by mendicancy, vagabondry, and petty theft, are the children of drunken and debauched parents, ought there not to be a close and earnest attention paid to this the greatest of all sources of depravity and destitution? Is this not a subject grave enough for Parliamentary inquiry? It is clear that so long as our drinking habits remain to curse the population, our best efforts can only relieve—they cannot cure. It has been proved that in a great number of cases the children who are brought to our police-offices are sent out into the streets to beg or steal, in order that the proceeds may be devoted to gin or beer. The reports of our city missionaries and temperance agents record many instances of youth, of both sexes, being seduced and debauched at singing and dancing saloons, and other entertainments, licensed by law to be held where drink is sold, and which amusements are only humble copies of many of those patronized by the aristocracy. In Scotland it is stated by the Inspector of Prisons that, in Edinburgh, "In the localities where 73 per cent. of the crime is committed, more than 50 per cent. of the spirit-licenses are held; and it may be safely assumed that not less than 60 per cent. of the drinking-houses, properly so called, are in these very localities." It is not necessary to multiply evidence. The intimate connexion betwixt crime and drink is a matter of familiar knowledge, and we urge it upon the consideration of those who have the conduct of youth as a preliminary inquiry of vast importance. We may establish schools, and endeavour to rescue from the multitude some few of the more hopeful or less abandoned; but if we intend to grapple, as men and Christians, with the evil in all its force and malignancy, we must look at it in every aspect, and endeavour to cut off the sources from whence the great fountain is supplied. Whenever that inquiry is fairly made, it is quite clear that the drinking system must have a full share of attention; and we hope that Lord Ashley will duly estimate the obstacles it places in the way of all those benevolent enterprises in which he is embarked.—Standard of Freedom.

CIRCULATION OF WATER.

Another thing in this element, not less to be admired, is the constant round which it travels; and by which, without suffering adulteration or waste, it is continually offering itself to the wants of the habitable globe. From the sea are exhaled those vapours which form the clouds; these clouds descend in showers, which, penetrating into the crevices of the hills, supply springs, which springs flow in little streams into the valleys, and there uniting, become rivers; which rivers in return feed the ocean. So there is an incessant circulation of the same fluid; and not one drop, probably, more or less, now than there was at creation.—Paley.

THE FOUL SIN.—What more foul common sin among us than drunkenness? And who can be ignorant, that if the importation of wine, and the use of strong drink were forbid, it would both clean rid the possibility of committing that odious vice, and men might afterwards live happily and healthfully without the use of those intoxicating liquors.—Milton.

Notices of Meetings.

DEVIZES.

On Monday, January 29th, the friends of temperance held a musical festival in the Assembly Room, (which was gratuitously lent by the mayor for the occasion) when addresses were delivered by the president of the society, G. W. Anstie, Esq., by Mr. Mack, and Mr. J. Williamson, agent of the National Temperance Society. Profound attention was paid to the speakers; and, at the close of the meeting, sixteen persons signed the pledge.

DORKING.

The cause of total abstinence, which it was feared was declining, has received a fresh impetus, and we hope it will not again be suffered to become dormant. On the 5th ultimo, a tea-meeting was held at the British School Room, at which about 200 took tea. After the repast was finished, and a suitable time had intervened, a public lecture was delivered by the popular lecturer, Jabez Inwards; the respected Independent minister, John Bright, in the chair. The lecturer clearly developed the philosophy of total abstinence in opposition to moderation; and proved, by argument and reason, the futile character of the claims put forth by its supporters, when compared with the substantial foundation of total abstinence on the rock of truth. At the close, several signed the pledge.

EPHING, ESSEX.

On the evening of Thursday, February 22nd, a meeting was held in the British School Room, in this town. R. L. Pinching, Esq., surgeon, Walthamstow, kindly occupied the chair, and, in a speech of some length, explained the useless character and injurious operation of alcoholic liquors upon the human system; and, with his statements, connected much sound advice. The master of the school next addressed the very large and respectable auditory: congratulating the meeting in having the valuable services of such a chairman; and endeavoured to point out the weakness and folly displayed by those who assert that they consume alcoholic liquors simply and only as medicines.

Mr. A. W. Heritage was then introduced; and in a lecture characterised by eloquence, truth, and power, ably exposed and refuted some of the "popular objections" urged by what are called "moderate drinkers." Although but few signatures were obtained, the Epping friends of this good and great movement feel much encouraged, and look forward with a confident hope to the establishment of a flourishing society in this place.

LYNN.

On Monday evening, Mr. Hudson of London, delivered a lecture on temperance, at the Temperance Hall, Blackfriars Road, Lynn, to a very numerous and attentive auditory. Mr. Charles Bootman was called upon to preside, who, after a few introductory remarks, touching the importance of, and interest he took in the teetotal movement, introduced Mr. Hudson to the meeting; but, however, before the lecturer made his appearance in the front of the platform, Mr. J. Keed announced that he had received an anonymous letter, containing a publican's card, from Outwell, stating that wine and spirits of the first-rate quality were to be had there. The letter announced that the teetotal system would not do—there were about to be two or three public-houses opened shortly, and concluded with these words—"Hurra for the beer system—for good beer—and down with the teetotalers." Mr. Keed next alluded to the speech made by Mr. Flatt, at the anti-malt tax meeting, with reference to the expression—that he (Mr. F.) disliked to see the labourer stoop down to drink at nasty brooks, which Mr. Keed thought was meant to apply to the teetotalers. This was, in his opinion, perfectly ridiculous, as teetotalers drank clean water, and drunkards dirty. The lecturer then appeared, and commenced by announcing to the meeting that he had been a total abstainer for twelve years, but did not enter the ranks because he had been a drunkard, never having, in the course of his life, expended more than 60s. or 70s. in intoxicating liquors. He then referred to various statistics from different authorities, to show that there were a greater number of houses open for the sale of intoxicating drinks than there were for the sale of nutritious food, and that that state of things, he contended, was encouraged by the Government, because a source of revenue arose therefrom; and mentioned the passing of the Beer Act, to which might be attributed a vast amount of the crime and misery of this country. He next argued that the police force and the expense of keeping it were rendered necessary by drunkenness, as there had never been a teetotaler who had required the assistance of that force; in which fact he was borne out by the assertion of several police officers, who stated that they had never had one of that society in custody. He next quoted statistics to show that drunkenness was the cause of increase in the local rates, and argued that where the makers of intoxicating drinks became rich, that the people in that district as surely became poorer. He then proceeded, with considerable eloquence, and at great length, to show that drunkenness was the cause of much misery, and that the only remedy was total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. —Norfolk Mercury.

MARLBOROUGH.

On Friday, the 2nd instant, the teetotal friends in this town held a soiree in the Town Hall, which was attended by a numerous and respectable company. The proceedings were enlivened by the strains of sweet music. And during the evening, addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. A. Harrison, Mr. Mack of Devizes, and Mr. Williamson, agent of the National Temperance Society.

The several addresses were received with profound attention by the audience, and many determined to aid "the good time coming," by abstaining from our country's curse, intoxicating drink. At the close, seventeen signed the pledge.

ST. PANCRAS TEMPERANCE SOCIETY,
LONDON.

On Monday evening, 29th January, a special meeting of the members of this society, was held in their large hall in Milsted-street, which was crowded on the occasion. A letter from Benjamin Rotch, Esq., who had been announced as chairman, apologising for his absence, from indisposition, having been read, the chair was taken by Mr. W. Tweedie, who proceeded to address the meeting. He said there were many objections to sign the teetotal pledge, which it would be well to clear away. For instance, he had lately heard Dr. Raffles, in the course of a lecture delivered in Exeter Hall, take some slight notice of the temperance movement, saying that the temperance movement did not triumph over the Gospel. Now, he considered that this was a preposterous absurdity, as nobody ever thought of such a thing.—(Hear, hear.) He might as well have talked of Mercury or Venus overcoming the sun, (laughter) or of the crew of a fishing-boat telling that of a large steamer to get out of the way or they would run them down. It was also objected to teetotalism that it would not make men Christians. He admitted it; but if they were to proceed to Birmingham, and had taken their seat in the carriage at Euston-square, on the same ground, a person might say, "This will not make you a Christian." No, but their end would be obtained; they would be taken to Birmingham.—(laughter and cheers.) If the teetotal pledge did not make them Christians, it would make them sober men, and him a worthy member of society, who had formerly been a disgrace to it.—(Cheers.) Another class objected to the pledge, on the ground that they did not see any use for it. Now, he considered it to be the duty of every member of a civilised community, to use all the means in his power, to alleviate the degradation and wretchedness he saw around him, and until every drunkard was reformed, and our drinking system abolished, it was the duty of every one to take up the movement, and raise his protest against these practices and customs of the country. He wondered what system could stand against the virtuous indignation of the public. The next objection he came to was a real honest one, that "I would take the pledge if I thought I could keep it."—(Hear.) He believed if they did take it, they would stand to it like men and keep it. After some further remarks, Mr. Tweedie concluded, amid much applause. Mr. Wanford then came forward and addressed the meeting. He said he was glad to see so many present, as it demonstrated that a considerable degree of interest was still felt in their cause. It had been said that teetotalism would destroy the constitution of the working-men of this country, but he rejoiced that they numbered in their ranks, in addition to many in the upper grades of society, hundreds of working-men, and their united testimony from personal experience, showed the fallacy of the question. If they could induce the many hundreds seeking at present for political reform, to begin with reform at home,—(hear, hear)—to reform themselves, he thought their object would be the more speedily attained.—(Cheers.) Let them but sign the teetotal pledge and they would demonstrate that they were men, and rational men, with minds capable of improvement; and they would raise themselves to that noble position their Creator intended them to occupy.—(Cheers.) Mr. Main said they could not pass a corner of the streets, but they heard vibrating in their ears, "There's a good time coming boys,—wait a little longer."—(Cheers and laughter.) But he had made up his mind to wait no longer, for it struck him that if they wanted it they must go and fetch it.—(Laughter.) It appeared to him that whenever teetotal abstinence was universal—that that would be the "good time." They must, therefore, exert themselves and bring that happy consummation about. He had been a teetotaler for upwards of twelve years, and he knew something of it experimentally; and during all that period he had not had an hour's ill-health. Its effects had therefore been most beneficial. The meeting was subsequently addressed by Mr. T. A. Smith, and Mr. Campbell, and after a vote of thanks to the chairman, separated about eleven o'clock.—The Cause of the People.

TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON.

The committee of this union have recently been so fortunate as to secure the services of Dr. Grindrod, who has delivered three most excellent lectures on Diet, Digestion, and Temperance, at the Lecture Hall, Tottenham, to crowded audiences. The lectures were illustrated by a collection of colossal drawings, which excited much interest, and the facts and arguments adduced by Dr. G. in support of the principles of total abstinence, have raised a general spirit of inquiry, from which the happiest results may be predicted. The cause in this district is doing well.

Doings of Strong Drink.

DEGRADATION.—Mr. and Mrs. — were a few years ago people of great respectability. They had for some years a flourishing business, and by industrious habits soon obtained the means of purchasing some property in houses, and likewise an excellent ship, which they built and called after their own name. This situation in life did not make them forget those in less prosperous circumstances, but on the contrary, Mrs. — was one of the most kind and charitable ladies in the neighbourhood. She was ever, at the call of the poor, ready to do a kind action. Her husband was an intelligent man, and every thing seemed to promise him a long and prosperous life; but alas! this happiness was only for a season. Mrs. — began to use intoxicating drinks rather freely, but for a while no difference could be perceived; her house, however, which had always been a model of order and neatness, began to be neglected, and likewise the comfort of her partner, which soon drove him to seek a solace in the drink that was destroying his wretched wife. In a short time they both became miserable drunkards. Day after day was spent in drinking, and after spending all the money they had, they plunged into debt. Their property was at last sold to meet the demands of their creditors, and the business which before was brisk, now entirely decayed. This state of affairs, combined with the influence of drink, so affected the husband, that he fell sick and died. His wife, instead of taking warning by the melancholy death of her husband, still pursued her course of wretchedness, and has often been seen wandering the streets in a state of intoxication, or resting her weary frame on the cold step of some house. She has been sometimes for weeks together more or less intoxicated, and at such times, when her money has been all expended in drink, she has begged at the roadside for a penny "to buy a pennyworth of bread," and when she has got it, has immediately gone to the ale-house. This is the life that this wretched woman still leads. Her friends have remonstrated with her, but to little effect. She has signed the temperance pledge five or six times, but has always broken it, thus fulfilling the proverb, that a drunken man may be reclaimed, but a drunken woman is past all hope. Let all, and especially the fair sex, take warning from this tale of misery, and bear in mind that if they wish to be safe, they should at once resolve never to taste those accursed liquors, that have been the bane and curse of society ever since their introduction as beverages.—Communicated.

CHARGE OF MURDER.—A very distressing case of homicide occurred at Badminton on the night of Friday, by which one unfortunate man has lost his life, and another is placed in great peril. A party of ten or a dozen persons had been drinking together during the evening, at the Portcullis Inn, in the village of Badminton, one of whom (a tailor from Didmorton, named William Watts,) had a bundle of clothes, which he placed in the bar of the inn, whilst he was drinking in the parlour. Later in the evening, when he was about to go home, the bundle was missing, and a search made for it, without success. This caused a disturbance, and eventually a quarrel and a scuffle between Elijah Hobbs, one of the carpenters employed by the Duke of Beaufort, and a man named James Watts, an assistant in the stable-yard. After a time the disturbance seemed at an end, but it was unfortunately renewed again in the street, outside the house, and Hobbs fell to the ground, and James Watts upon him, striking him with his fists. The standers-by interfered, and the men got up. Mr. Dowding, the landlord, desired Watts to go home, which he said he would do, and he went through the archway of the inn into the yard, as if going home. Hobbs was not seen for about ten minutes, and then he came to the front of the archway, where Mr. Dowding was standing, and spoke angrily to him as to the treatment he had received. Hobbs and Mr. Watts, the tailor, then went away to their homes. This was about a quarter past eleven o'clock. Soon afterwards a person going through the yard, saw some one lying on the ground, as he supposed tipsy. On a light being procured, it proved to be James Watts, and on raising him, he was found to be quite dead. His clothes were saturated with blood, which had flowed from two punctured wounds in his left side, near the heart, which had penetrated to a considerable depth. Hobbs was soon after taken into custody by one of the county police, and a large clasp knife, opening with a spring, found in one of the pockets of the jacket he had worn that evening, the blade of which was marked with blood. Hobbs then made a remark to the policeman as to the provocation he had received. An inquest was held on Monday last, before W. Joyner Ellis, Esq., and a highly respectable jury, on the body of James Watts, and after a very protracted and patient inquiry, a verdict of wilful murder was returned against Elijah Hobbs, who was thereupon committed by Mr. Ellis to take his trial at the next assizes.—Bristol Gazette, December 14th, 1848.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT ORIEL COLLEGE, OXFORD.—On Saturday morning, March 3rd, 1849, the members of Oriel College were thrown into the greatest consternation from the circumstance of the dead body of Mr. John Key, a commoner of that College, aged 19, having been found in the front quadrangle. Deceased had fallen from the top of the College, a height of about 40 feet. An inquest was held in the Hall of Oriel College, before the University Coroner, and a jury composed of matriculated citizens. It appeared deceased had been spending the evening at the rooms of a commoner of his own College, where he had become so much intoxicated as to be unable to take care of himself; and on being conveyed to his own room, became furious, and his friends were obliged to fasten him in by barricading the door with the sofa. The deceased afterwards, having probably got out through his window, attempted to get into the rooms of another fellow-student, who heard him say something about getting out upon the leads by the window. Nothing more was known of him till he was found lying dead in the Quadrangle in the morning. The verdict returned was, "That the said John Key having, as it appears to the jury, got out on the roof, did accidentally fall over the parapet, and was killed by the fall." Mr. Key was the son of a widow.

Facts and Scraps.

THE LOST HUSBAND FOUND.—F. G. began life under favourable circumstances, with sufficient property to unite with a partner in a wholesale business in London. About seventeen years since, he married, and soon afterwards gave himself up to drinking; the habit continually increasing, so as to be almost uncontrollable. His partner, finding it inconvenient to continue in business with a person of his habits, dissolved the engagement; and he was now placed in straitened circumstances, to be shared by an amiable wife and one daughter. Their sufferings need no description. Several times the unhappy man, under remorse of conscience, took the temperance pledge, and as often broke it. In the mean time his affairs grew worse and worse. At length, he came in one day, when his wife and daughter were sitting together, and throwing a card on the table, exclaimed "There, it is done! done for ever." It was a temperance pledge—and he has kept it. His mother hearing of the step he had taken, promised to build him a house, if in the course of six months he had not broken the pledge. She built the house, and he now inhabits it, with his wife and daughter. This is about twenty months ago. He has recommenced business, in which he is assisted by his amiable daughter, and they are now again a respectable and happy family.—Communicated.

DECEITFULNESS OF STRONG DRINK.—M. B., was educated for one of the learned professions; his parents were respectable and opulent—his father, immersed in the cares of a large practice in the law, committed the moral training of the children chiefly to their mother, who carefully instructed them in the truths of the gospel. She is a conscientious, pious person. There was, however, a fault in their education. Surrounded with all the luxuries that wealth procures, they were not taught to deny themselves; nor to defer a present gratification for the sake of a future good. M. B. had sufficient abilities, but he was idle at school. When articulated to a solicitor, he preferred pleasure to labour. Became a partner in a respectable firm, he married a lovely and accomplished young lady. Still he would not work—he spent freely, drank largely, incurred debts far beyond his means, (which were ample;) and once under the influence of brandy, he grossly ill-treated his gentle wife, and used his two little sons with harshness. He was after four years turned out of the firm for breach of the articles of partnership. Although he is now feeling deep compunction for his past conduct, he has not resolved on total abstinence from drink.—Communicated.

SONG OF THE SURGERY, OR TEMPERANCE SONG FOR 1888.

In dressing gown tattered and torn,
His thin hair all lanky and grey,
A poor surgeon sat by his surgery fire,
And thus he was heard to say—
Oh! would I had never been born,
'Twould much better have been for me,
Than here to sit like a being forlorn;
For nobody brings me a fee.
Wait, wait, wait,
From ten till half-past four,
And not a carriage has stopped at my gate,
Nor a patient has rapped at my door.
Oh! it was not always thus,
Not always wait, wait, wait,
Without a patient to rap at my door
Or a carriage to stop at my gate.

It was drive—drive—drive,
Through hail, and rain, and snow ;
It was drive—drive—drive—
As fast as my horse could go,
It was pill, and blister, and draught,
Draught, and blister and pill—
Till the sight of a phial made me sick,
And the smell of it made one ill.

I know what has caused the change,
Why my rounds I so seldom go,
'Tis the Temperance Cause with its sapient laws
That has left me nothing to do.

I had but two patients last week,
And one was too poor to pay :
The other has left off whiskey and gin,
So he got quite well in a day.

Oh ! will it be always thus,
Will the happy time never come,
That my purse will re-fill because people are ill
With drinking brandy and rum—
There's drosy, hysterics, and gout,
Delirium tremens, and fits,
This Temperance folly has put to the rout,
And Physicians are losing their wits.

Alas ! that the people should know,
What the doctors took care not to say,
That, if they'd abstain from the poisonous drink,
They'd not have a doctor to pay.

In dressing-gown tattered and torn,
His thin hair all lanky and grey ;
A poor surgeon sat by his surgery fire
(He'd gladly have ridden through mud and
And thus to himself did say— [through mire,]
Wait, wait, wait—
From ten till half-past four,
And not a carriage has stopped at my gate
(Will nobody pity the poor man's fate),
Nor a patient has rapped at my door.

MIRIAM.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

5th, The extent to which the example of Teetotal parents would promote the moral and religious well-being of families, and afford to parents the means of sending their children to school.

6th, The practical working of the drinking-usages and customs in manufactories, workshops and elsewhere.

The names of the adjudicators will be announced at a future time.

The Essays, which must not exceed forty-six 8vo pages, to be sent under cover, accompanied with a sealed letter enclosing the real name and address of the writer, on or before the 1st of September, 1849, to the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

The Committee, also, offer a further prize of £10 for the best Essay on the most efficient means of conducting Temperance Societies, with the view of accelerating, and giving permanence to the Total Abstinence Reformation. This Essay must not exceed thirty-two 8vo pages, and is open to competition by writers of all classes. To be sent in by the 1st of July, to the office of the National Temperance Society, and the adjudication to be made under the direction of the Committee.

ISAAC DOWSEY, Secretary.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL & BOARDING HOUSE, SCARBOROUGH.

THOMAS WHITTAKER begs to inform his numerous friends throughout the kingdom, with whom he has had the happiness of becoming acquainted, during a period of fourteen years' service in the Temperance cause, that he has taken the above House, lately occupied by JOHN ANDREW, which, for cleanliness, elegance, and general comfort, is equal to a first-rate Hotel.

T. W. hopes that all who honour him with their good wishes, will inform such of their friends as have occasion to visit this lovely watering-place, that they may enjoy all the comforts of a home, combined with due economy, being freed from the necessity of taking wine, as is the custom at ordinary Hotels. The House itself is well situated, and neither diligence nor expense will be spared to secure the comfort and enjoyment of those who may favour the Establishment with their patronage.

N.B.—T. WHITTAKER has many friends in business, who may render him good service by recommending his House to those COMMERCIAL GENTLEMEN who may wait upon them for orders. He is determined that as a Commercial, as well as Family Hotel, it shall maintain the character of first-rate.

REPEAL OF THE BEER BILL.

It is now a fact, almost universally admitted, that the Beer-houses have worked most injuriously upon the morals of the working-classes. The bill under which they were established was professedly designed in its operation to benefit the working-man; but it is difficult to conceive how the immense increase of opportunities for drinking, and temptations to drink, could be an advantage to any class of society, excepting the brewers and others engaged in the manufacture and sale of these destructive liquors.

A philanthropic movement is now on foot, to which we earnestly direct the attention of our readers. We shall be anticipated as referring to a general appeal to the legislature for the repeal of the act by which our country has been so fearfully and extensively demoralized—the Beer Act.

In pledging ourselves to this important movement, it is right that we should show clearly the ground which we are prepared to maintain, and the results which we are warranted to expect. As to the first point, we think that the great and paramount duty of the legislature is the protection of the property and persons of the commonwealth over which it presides. In the discharge of this duty, in a complicated state of society, where there are many conflicting claims, and many opposing interests, it sometimes becomes exceedingly difficult to decide on the course demanded by equity in specific instances. Every subject has a right to such an amount of individual liberty as may be consistent with general security and prosperity.

Now we maintain that it is a universal law in social economy, that no man has a right to promote his own real or apparent interests by the injury of his neighbour. This law is violated by the entire licensing system, not in reference to the little beer-shop, but also the public-house and the gin-palace. All “these styes that law has licensed,” injure society, and especially in three respects.

1st, They expose its younger and weaker branches to temptations, which have, in many cases, proved too powerful for existing virtue, and are constantly leading thousands to ruin.

2nd, They increase the burdens of society by the extension of pauperism, which must be relieved, insanity which must be watched, sickness which must be ministered to, and crime which must be restrained.

3rdly, They strengthen the demoralizing influences in society, by pandering to vicious appetites, and stimulating depravity into crime.

To this it may be supposed sufficient to reply, that every man has a right to the exercise of his own liberty in choosing his trade or calling, and that no man is obliged to purchase intoxicating drink because it is offered.

The first rejoinder is antagonist to the social law we have already recorded. We are not advocates for the introduction of an Egyptian law compelling every man to follow his father's trade, nor for a practical recognition of the popular absurdity, that the state sustains a paternal relation to all its subjects; and may, therefore, legitimately dictate to its rising sons by what means they shall seek to provide a maintenance for themselves. Still, where any means of acquiring wealth is obviously injurious to the interests of the commonwealth, the duty of an enlightened and patriotic government is not to patronize it by licenses, but to suppress it by law.

"But men are not obliged to purchase the drink." This rejoinder evidently implies that a man ought to be at liberty to present a temptation, although he has no right to use restraint. But what is the character of that man who takes advantage of a neighbour's weakness to aggrandise himself? He who imposes on ignorance or credulity, to secure an exorbitant price for his merchandize, is justly regarded as an extortioner. The law seeks to suppress gambling-houses and practices, perceiving that they offer a temptation too powerful for the virtue of many, and this recognizes the duty of protecting the young, the ignorant, and the unwary, against the craft of designing men. In these facts we have a precedent. The drinking-houses exercise over many a seductive influence which is all but irresistible. They present the temptation in varied forms of delusion—they take advantage of the weak points of social virtue—they display the attractions of art—they secure the aid of music—they invite fascinating and agreeable company—they make a highway in the road that leadeth to destruction, and strew flowers in the path that goeth down to the chambers of death. What wonder that when they ministered to the vilest passions, and the most vitiated tastes, their labours have secured such a fatal success, or that they have been able to "Smile on the ruin which their hands have made!"

No one, we presume, will deny the right of the legislature to use its power to suppress this growing evil. The power that made can destroy. The authority which signed the license can assuredly withdraw it. To those who are willing to aid the movement, which the British Association has had the honour of commencing, we submit the following form of

PETITION.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled,

The HUMBLE PETITION of the Inhabitants or the Congregation of

SH EWETH,

That the establishment of beer-shops, so far from answering the end proposed of benefiting the poor, has proved decidedly and increasingly injurious to the working-classes.

That even the strongest affection our nature is capable of, the love of wife and children, is, in too many instances, completely overpowered by the temptations these houses afford.

That vast numbers are thereby reduced to utter poverty, who, by throwing themselves on parochial relief, inflict a grievous wrong on the industrious and sober portion of the nation.

Your petitioners, therefore, earnestly entreat your Right Honourable House to prohibit the granting of any new licenses to beer-shops, and to enact that those already granted shall not be renewable after next licensing day.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Many of our friends may prefer making an effort to obtain an act requiring that every application for a license, whether for a public-house or beer-shop, shall be sustained by the signatures of at least HALF THE RATE-PAYERS in the parish or district-parish in which it is sought to be opened. It is surely right that those for whose convenience these houses are said to be opened, should be allowed to give their judgment on the necessity of an addition to their number: and when the above considerations are duly weighed, it will appear neither unjust nor unfair that those who have to pay rates should have some direct veto against those establishments which tend so seriously to increase them.

We subjoin a form of petition to this effect.

To the Right Honourable the Lords, &c. or Commons, &c.
THE HUMBLE PETITION of

SH EWETH,

That public-houses and beer-shops present temptations to drunkenness and dissipation, by which the young and unwary and irresolute, are led into idleness and poverty, and stimulated to crime.

That the habits thus superinduced greatly increase the burdens of poor and county rates, which already press heavily on the industrious and well-conducted.

That these houses are professionally established for the public convenience, and are licensed for traffic in fermented and distilled liquors on that ground.

That your petitioners pray your honourable house to enact that after next licensing day, NO LICENSE BE GRANTED to any public-house or beer-shop, unless it shall be certified in writing by at least half the rate-payers in the parish or district-parish in which it is to be opened, that such an establishment is necessary; and that in case such a certificate be produced, the licensing magistrates be allowed a discretionary power to refuse or grant the required license.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

The form of address to the HOUSE OF COMMONS is as follows:—

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled,

The humble Petition, &c. &c.

Observe—Petitions must be copied in writing, and there must be at least three signatures on the same sheet on which the petition is written. They have greater weight when the address and occupation of the Petitioners are inserted; and Congregational Petitions are especially desirable, as they are considered to be DISINTERESTED AND GENUINE.

A promise has been received from the Earl of Harrowby to bring in a Bill on this subject which should be well supported by petitions. They should be sent for presentation immediately, and it is desirable that they should be posted on Monday so as to be presented on a Tuesday. In order to pass post-free, it is requisite that they should be open at both ends, with the word Petition written outside, and that the address be simply the name of the member and not his address, as for example, Right Hon. the Earl of Harrowby, House of Lords.

Petitions to the Commons should be sent to the representative of the place or county from whence they come, and in some instances a letter accompanying the Petition will be of service.

Some may object to sign any such petition on the ground that injury would, by the withdrawal of licenses, be done to the property embarked in the traffic. On this we reply, that the interests of the many must not be sacrificed for the advantage of a few—that society has already paid at an awful rate for the beer-house traffic, and has a right to demand compensation—and that, as no license is granted for a longer period than twelve-months, every man entered the trade knowing the nature on which the permission was held. We could be no parties to injure, either in person or property, a single brewer, distiller, publican or beer-house keeper. That the extension of sound and sober principles would have a partial and temporary effect upon the property of the traffickers we do not deny, but that is, so far as we are concerned, unavoidable. The only sound principle of action for the philanthropist is NEVER TO SACRIFICE PUBLIC UTILITY TO PRIVATE FRIENDSHIP OR PERSONAL FEELING. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.

THE SOCIAL GLASS—WHY DO YOU TAKE IT?

An amusing author states, what we have often found to be true, that every one who is in the habit of indulging in "a social glass" further than the bounds of strict moderation would justify, has ways, in his own estimation, a good reason for so doing. Thus, says he,

Mr. A. drinks because his doctor has recommended him to take a little.

Mr. B. because his doctor has ordered him not, and he hates quackery.

Mr. C. just takes a drop because he's wet.

Mr. D. drinks because he's dry.

Mr. E. because he feels a something rising in his stomach.

Mr. F. because he feels a kind of sinking in his stomach.

Mr. G. because he's going to see a friend off to Australia.

Mr. H. because he's got a friend come from Australia.

Mr. I. because he's so hot.

Mr. K. because he's so cold.

Mr. L. because he's got a pain in his head.

Mr. M. because he's got a pain in his side.

Mr. N. because he's got a pain in his back.

Mr. O. because he's got a pain in his chest.

Mr. P. because he's got a pain all over him.

Mr. Q. because he feels light and happy.

Mr. R. because he feels heavy and miserable.

Mr. S. because he's married.

Mr. T. because he is not.

Mr. V. because he likes to see his friends round him.

Mr. W. because he's got no friends, and enjoys a glass by himself.

Mr. X. because he has come to his fortune.

Mr. Y. because his aunt has cut him off with a will.

Mr. Z. was found too drunk to answer.

Fellow-countrymen! such are the reasons assigned by different classes of people for indulging in what is termed "a social glass."

Examine them for yourselves, and see how small an amount of reason is contained in any one of them. If alcoholic liquors would remedy the diseases of the body here referred to—if they would prevent the effects of wet, or allay the thirst—if they would take away the heat, or remove the cold;—if they would cure the pains in his head, his back, his chest, or his side;—if they would increase his happiness, or diminish his misery;—if they would add to the comforts of his married life, or cheer him in his single blessedness;—if they would enlarge the pleasure he feels in the society of his friends, or soothe him in the hours of solitude;—if they would increase his wealth, or tend to improve a slender patrimony;—if any of these results would attend the use of alcoholic drinks, then might we find some reason for supporting the practice. But it is not so. They cannot produce any one of these results. Ask the physician, who has made the diseases of the body his constant study, and he will tell you, that the use of them too frequently tends to weaken the digestive organs, impairs the mental powers, renders the frame more liable to the attacks of disease, and frequently hurries its victims to an untimely end. Ask the philanthropist—he will point to the hundreds thronging the costly and splendid gin-palaces of our land to take "a social glass," whose rags and wretchedness betoken their poverty and their want—to the goals and penitentiaries crowded with victims, from the novice in crime to the most hardened reprobate; men, women, children, whose first impulse to sin arose from indulgence in "a social glass"—to the workhouses whose poverty-stricken inmates took their first downward step in the road which has ended in their finding there an asylum from absolute want, when they indulged in "a social glass." Appeal to the minister of religion—he will turn with horror to the sickening details of some soul rushing, unprepared, into the presence of its Maker, when under the influence of intoxication; whose relatives he has attempted to console, when alas! he felt that for him at least, there could be no hope!—or, he will recount the death-beds he has attended, and listened in the last hours of life to remorse for sins attendant upon indulgence in "a social glass," which hurry their victims to the grave, and aggravate the horrors of the tomb.

All these will concur in reprobating a custom that entails so great an amount of misery upon its victims, both here and hereafter. We appeal to you then, as men of sense, as men endowed with the feelings of reason and of understanding—as men whose souls must live for ever in a world of happiness or of woe, and we ask you to weigh well the advantages and disadvantages of this custom, confident that the verdict will be one of condemnation. And having done so, we ask you to disregard the conventionalities of society, and set an example to your families, your friends, to the church and to the world at large, in abandoning that which has been the bane of thousands, the curse of tens of thousands of your fellow-countrymen.

Do this—and while the worldling may scoff—the moderate drinker may insinuate—the drunkard may sneer—you will have the approving testimony of your own conscience, and the proud reflection that you have laid one stone in that mighty fabric, which is destined, we trust, at no distant time, to increase the glory, the honour, the greatness, of the British empire, and to render it the most illustrious, because the most temperate nation beneath the surface of the sun. Then, and then only, will he fully realized the saying of the wise man, "Righteousness exalthe a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

LICENSING DAYS.

BOLTON.

We have great pleasure in presenting our readers with the following admirable speech of the coroner at Bolton; shewing the increase of crime with the increase of public-houses:—

In various parts of the country, the friends of temperance have recently interfered with success, to prevent the increase of houses licensed for the sale of those drinks, by the use of which so many thousands injure their health, their character, and their comforts. In few places has this stand been made more successfully than at Bolton. To a report of the proceedings of the Annual Licensing Day for that Borough, contained in the Bolton Chronicle, we are indebted for the following account. After several applications for new licenses had been made, Mr. TAYLOR, the Coroner for the Borough, addressed the court at considerable length. He had, he said, a memorial to present—one which, he thought, would have its due weight with the magistrates when they looked at the signatures. These commenced with the name of the vicar, and included, he believed, the names of all the clergymen of the established church, and, with one or two exceptions, those of the clergymen of every other denomination in the borough; also the names of a number of professional men, tradesmen, gentlemen, and others, who, he believed, had at heart the interest and welfare of the population at large. Before presenting that petition, however, he would refer the court to statistics respecting crime and other matters, from which the magistrates might be able to judge whether more licenses ought to be granted. In the first place that there were 96 inns in Great Bolton, and in Little Bolton 20: there were also beer-houses in Great Bolton 125; in Little Bolton 66: in addition to these there were in the two townships, 11 houses where beer was sold off the premises: total of licensed houses at which ale and spirits were sold, 318. There was a drinking-place to every 25 houses, or one for every 200 souls, including men, women, and children, total abstainers, and those who would not, could not, or durst not drink; and if it was said that persons came to the market who got drunk, it might, on the other hand, be said that those that do not drink might be taken as a set-off against them. Such were the present resources for selling drink, or poison—some called it by one name—some by the other. Of twelve of the inns of which he had spoken; the occupiers had this year been fined or reprimanded for offences committed on the Sabbath; eight were notorious as places at which gaming was permitted; at twelve (not to speak of the vaults) prostitutes were permitted to assemble. Then, there were five beer-houses at which gaming was permitted, and eight beer-houses where prostitutes were permitted to assemble, some of them being no better than brothels. The total number of prisoners apprehended for the last year (ending August) was 2541. He had arrived at this aggregate by taking from the police accounts the number apprehended during the first eleven months, and adding the average for another month. 2541

had been apprehended for all offences, civil and criminal; but he would analyze them. 367 of the number were males, who were found by the police drunk and incapable of taking care of themselves. 62 females were found under similar circumstances, for being drunk and disorderly, 317 males and 60 females; and the disorderly characters resorting to low ale-houses and beer-houses who were taken into custody, amounted to 244. The disorderly prostitutes apprehended were 117: making a total of 1167. Now, let them see how many were apprehended for being disorderly whilst sober, for by that means, the cause of disorder, crime, and prostitution, may be ascertained. 93 men, and 23 women—in all 121, were the number thus taken into custody; or in other words, one-tenth of the number that were apprehended for being drunk or under the influence of drink: so that this, at all events, bore out the impression of judges, magistrates, keepers of prisons and others, that nine-tenths of the crime of the country was chargeable upon drinking-usages and customs. He had not taken into account the felonies that were committed; and he would leave the magistrates who attended that court and the quarter sessions to say whether the same ratio did not show itself in respect to those offences. He wished, however, to offer some evidence to shew the influence which increased facilities for drinking had upon the conduct of the people. In order to do this, he would draw a comparison of the offences of this and the last three years, and also of the number of ale-houses in those periods. In 1846, there were 317 ale and beer-houses, and 1169 persons of the character previously described, being under the influence of drink, were apprehended. In 1847, the number of ale and beer-houses 341, or an increase of 25 beer-houses upon 1846; and that increase produced an increase of prisoners apprehended under the influence of drink, of 193; which showed beyond all doubt, the relation that existed between the drinking-system and crime. In the present year there are 318 ale and beer-houses; and as he before stated, 1167 persons of the character spoken of had been apprehended; so that the increase of 193, in 1847, had fallen down again to within two of the number of 1846, while the ale and beer-houses had also diminished till they were merely one over what they were in that year. Now these statements could be proved to be true, on inquiry being made at the source whence they are derived. And after hearing them he would ask, could any disinterested mind fail to see the relation to which he had alluded? if so, he presumed, the magistrates would consider before they increased facilities for the procuring of drink. Next, Mr. Taylor begged to give an account of the inquests held in the borough during the past year. He had no other opportunity of giving an account of his stewardship, and should be very happy in availing himself of the opportunity now afforded of doing so. There had been 68 inquests in the year ending August. Of the persons on whom these were held, 21 were infants, or under 21 years of age; and it therefore could not be expected that they were influenced by drinking, though incidentally they might have died through the misconduct of their parents in that respect. That number deducted from the whole 47 remained, the end of 23 of which he could give them. He went through the 23 cases, leaving out names, but briefly stating the circumstances of death,—proving that there were 23, or half of the grown-up persons on whom inquests had been held, whose deaths were directly attributable to, or connected with, the "use," or "abuse," as people might see fit to call it, of drink. This was his experience as coroner for one year. What, therefore, might they consider had been the experience of all the coroners in England for the last twenty years? It must be shocking to think of the disease, suffering, cruelty, madness, murder, and suicides that must have taken place from drink. We had been alarmed at the approach of cholera; and it was certainly well to look about us and try to make arrangements to meet it. But the pestilence of cholera was nothing compared to the pestilence of drinking; taking, as an instance, the last visit of the cholera to this town. On that occasion, all the fatal cholera cases that could be found were 17; but it was not at all improbable that 100 died in the same year whose deaths arose directly or indirectly from drinking. Now, what was the effect of drinking-usages upon the poor rates. Great Bolton had paid £17,000 during the last year; and was no proportion of the sum attributable to the misconduct of paupers? Was it not found that scores of children were left to be maintained by the parish in consequence of the drunken habits of their parents? And for the demoralizing effects of drinking, let them look to the last election. Let them look also at the desecration of the Sabbath that took place. And here, he would observe, he felt obliged to the gentleman who exerted himself to promote the observance of the Sabbath. One remarkable feature of the effects of drinking was the idiocy that it produced. In Paris, out of 1200 idiots 1100 had drunken parents. Mr. Taylor then referred to last year's Report of the Rev. J. Clay, chaplain to the Preston House of Correction, from which he read several extracts shewing the connexion between drinking and crime. Mr. Taylor next referred to evidence given before a committee of the House of Commons in 1834, to prove the nature of alcohol, the distribution of which, he observed, the applicants for new licenses sought to increase, and thereby do more mischief: Dr. Dod stated that "Writers on medical jurisprudence rank alcohol among narcotic acrid poisons;" and he added that "small quantities, if repeated, always prove more or less injurious;" and that "the morbid appearances seen after death, occasioned by ardent spirits, exactly agree with those which result from poisoning, caused by any other substance ranked in the same class." Sir Astley Cooper had declared, "No person has a greater hostility to dram-drinking than myself, inasmuch that I never suffer any ardent spirits in my house, thinking them "evil spirits;" and if the poor could witness the white livers, the dropsies, the shattered nervous systems, which I have seen, as the consequence of drinking, they would be aware that spirits and poisons are synonymous terms." Mr. Taylor next produced a plan, about five feet square, of the town of Great Bolton, shewing in black marks the public-houses already licensed; in red, the beer-houses; and by stars the houses for which licenses were sought. There were from 90 to 100 already licensed, but he could find thirty within the space of 300 yards, and within that distance of the parish church too. Church-gate was one black mass. In addition to the memorial from the clergy and tradesmen, Mr. Taylor produced a memorial from the Sunday-school teachers, signed by 484 male teachers, representing 9000 children, praying that no additional licenses might be granted. He ridiculed the idea of Mr. Richardson, (one of the advocates for the granting of more licenses) that to increase the number of public-houses would promote morality. He referred to a law definition of an inn or hostel, as being a place where such persons as travellers and wayfarers were to refresh themselves and their horses, &c.; nothing being said about bar, tap-room, or smoking-rooms for neighbours to spend their time in; and he argued that it was not legal to license houses for the purpose to which they were put. In conclusion, he asked the bench to take the two memorials he had to present against an increase of licenses, and to consider the motives of those who had signed them, as well as the motives of those who sought new licenses. The clergy, the Sunday-school teachers, the temperance society, and the public had done their duty, and he should like the magistrates on that day to do their duty also. He simply asked them to weigh over the evidence laid before them and exercise their judgment upon it, trusting that they would see the propriety of refusing to grant any new licenses, and thus to give encouragement to a system which blighted the morals of the population, destroyed the peace of man, woman, and child, here, and endangered their hope of happiness to all eternity. He was earnest on the subject, which was a practical—a social,—a religious one; and he begged to say that, if the applications were refused, the whole town would rejoice at the circumstance.

The Chairman thought the bench were indebted to Mr. Taylor for the statements he had laid before them.

As the result, three old licenses were suspended, and NO NEW LICENSES WERE GRANTED.

LEEDS.

The magistrates of this borough recently held a special session at the Court-house for the renewal of licenses granted to keepers of inns and taverns, and also to hear applications from parties for new licenses. The Mayor, F. Carbutt, Esq., presided, and after reading the new act, relative to the opening and closing of public-houses, stated that the bench had received a memorial from the Leeds Temperance Society, praying that no new licenses might be granted. The wishes of the memorialists were complied with, and a number of those who previously held licenses were refused a renewal, on the ground that they had kept disorderly houses.

STOCKPORT.

At the last annual licensing day, a memorial was presented to the mayor and magistrates of this borough, praying them not to grant any new licenses: to the honour of the magistrates be it spoken, after deliberating upon the subject in private, they ascended the bench, and as soon as properly seated, the mayor—looking towards those who came for licenses, said that the magistrates had taken into consideration the subject of granting new licenses, and the result was, there would be no new licenses granted, for this year at least.

IMPORTANT TESTIMONIES CONCERNING BEER-SHOPS.

G. V. DRURY, Esq., magistrate, Shotover Park, Oxon, says, "The Beer Bill has done more to brutalize the English labourer, and take him from his family and fire-side, into the worst associations, than almost any measure that could have been devised. It has furnished victims for the gaol, the hulks, and the gallows, and has frightfully extended the evils of pauperism and moral debasement."

LORD FRANCIS EGERTON, "considered the system as promotive of enormous evils. No bill had ever been more productive of drunkenness and immorality than the sale of beer-act."

LORD DUNGANNON, "considered beer-shops as places where crimes of the deepest dye were concocted."

The Rev. JOHN CLAY, A.M., Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, observes in his twenty-fourth report, "I earnestly solicit the perusal of the autobiographies given in the Appendix, that it may be seen distinctly how crime flows—the metaphor is not so inappropriate as it may seem—from, through, and into, the beer-shop. It is there the poncher receives his first lesson and his chief encouragement; there, the reckless navvy squanders his earnings and his strength, often drinking himself into desperation, and so becoming ready for any act of robbery or plunder, in order to purchase means for another debauch: there, labourers and artisans assemble by troops, and drink away wages, clothing, health, and life. There, they take their wives' and children's bread and cast it to dogs. From three entirely independent sources, and at different times, I received statements fully confirming each other, which leave no doubt of the extent to which this profligate system (of keeping prostitutes) is carried on. Sixteen houses in one town, harbouring, or rather maintaining, about fifty-four prostitutes, have been named to me. And this is not the full amount of the evil. The neighbourhood of those houses is corrupted. Women, married women, occupied to all appearance, with their own proper avocations at home, hold themselves at the call of the beer-house for the immoral purposes to which I have referred."

The Liverpool Mail, newspaper, remarks, "It is not in large towns only (the natural haunts of profligacy, where vice, like vermin, is hatched in the steams of filth), where the evils of the beer-house are most conspicuous. Go where you will, into any village in England, to any spot where a few houses are planted together, and there you will find the nuisances indicated by competing sign-boards.—In many places there is a beer-shop for every half-dozen families. The legalizing the sale of beer, wherever and whenever a man chooses to sell it, has proved to be a national curse. These beer-shops are resorts where low gambling is carried on to a serious extent; and as they abound every where, they are the retreats of intrigue and seduction, where domestic servants peril their reputation, and are cherished, or coerced into still more vicious and deplorable avocations. It is within our own knowledge, that in these places robberies of private houses are planned; and where the unhappy woman, who for her information or her connivance is flattered by the hope of marriage, is almost invariably duped, and flung helpless and despoiled upon the streets. The whole system demands revision and reform. The beer-shops must be swept away altogether. The evil has reached such an extent, that it can no longer be borne."

JAMES CHILD, of Leeds, Inspector of Police, states, "There was a great deal of drunkenness, especially among the young people. I have seen children very little higher than the table at the beer-shops. There are some beer-shops where there are rooms up-stairs, and the boys and girls, old people and married of both sexes go up."

JOHN STUBBS, of the Police Force, confirmed the above testimony. He said, "we have a number of girls on the town under fifteen, and boys who live by thieving. There are half a-dozen beer-shops where none but young ones go at all; they support these houses."

LORD ASHLEY, when speaking on the subject in the House of Commons, observed: "the country was weary of mere palliatives—schemes of prison discipline and so forth—the evil was wider and deeper than could be reached by mere corrective processes, and if not grappled with, we might anticipate, in twenty years, a general convulsion and displacement of the whole system of society. There could be neither comfort nor peace, but in a virtuous and religious people."

MR. R. GREGORY, a large farmer, at West Ham, Essex, says, "The great source of evil is the beer-shop. You are sure to find the robberies concocted at the beer-shops. When I took my farm there was no beer-shop; one was set up, and the difference seen in the working-people before and after was such as no one would conceive."

TAPPING, the murderer, who was executed at Newgate, said to the Chaplain, "I deeply regret having frequented the beer-shops and singing-houses, in the neighbourhood of Bethnal Green: and I am convinced that my own ruin and that of the unhappy girl whom I deprived of life is to be attributed to that."

The Merthyr Guardian, newspaper, remarks, "So long as beer-houses are suffered to exist, we must expect to have the evils complained of, to the great injury of public morals, and in too many instances, as the nightly resort of thieves of every description, from the petty depredator of the hen-roost to the daring and reckless house-breaker. The country cries out loudly for the extirpation of this great pest."

HENRY POWNALL, Esq., one of the Middlesex magistrates, says, "I cannot but think that the increase of juvenile delinquency is owing, in a considerable degree, to the increase of beer-shops. In the course of a short time, about three thousand children, below the age of fourteen, have passed through the prisons of the county; of these cases, many may be traced to the neglect and dissolute habits of the parents, in consequence of their intemperance, or to the sad lessons and examples which they have met with in those resorts of wickedness."

The Morning Herald observes, "Surely it seems hard that the government should by means of beer or Tom and Jerry Shops, lay traps in the way of the ignorant multitude, and then hang them up like dogs for doing acts in their state of inebriation, which they would shudder at the thoughts of, if they had not been contributing to the destruction of their own souls and bodies, in the government-protected beer-haunts of crime and infamy."

The Rev. E. EDWARDS, Perpetual Curate of Marsden, York, asks, "Where was the vaunted patriotism of our professedly christian governors, and legislators, when they concocted and enacted that most demoralizing and infamous act, commonly called the BEER ACT?"

The Rev. E. FAULKNER, Chaplain of Worcester Gaol, states, "Instances have occurred of women being driven to procure for themselves and families, by illegal means, the bare necessities of life, whose husbands were, at the same time, earning sufficient for all their wants if it had not been squandered at the beer-shop. Children too, the offspring of such dissolute and drunken parents, almost without a home,—certainly without advice, example, instruction, correction, or parental care, are left, from a very early age, to seek a precarious subsistence, how and where they can."

The Rev. JOHN COLLINSON, late of Lamesley, says, "Beer-shops which have become so numerous, are the bane of country districts. Formerly a man in the country had some trouble to reach a public-house, but now he can hardly go home to his cottage without passing the doors of several, into which he is tempted to enter. But drinking is not the only evil they produce. Night is the poachers' time for depredation, and from these haunts they steal into the neighbouring preserves, drawing after them ignorant young men, who would never otherwise have been guilty of theft."

Extracts from THE CONSTABULARY COMMISSIONERS REPORT.—An experienced thief deposes:—"There are bad of both kinds, for gambling there is nothing to choose, but for 'Travellers' there are more jerry-shops started by thieves for the accommodation of their acquaintances. Two at Nottingham in a court. Then at Leicester three, and three at Sheffield. I have been at all these myself. I know many that are brothels in Manchester, Rochdale, Halifax, Huddersfield, Nottingham, and indeed in all towns."

RURAL POLICE.

An attempt was made at the Exeter Sessions, at Oxford, to introduce the Rural Police into that county. The discussion of the subject excited great interest, and an unusually large assembly of magistrates was convened. The names ex brevitate we omit, but when we inform our readers that no less than six-and-forty are specified in the local papers, it will be seen to have been an important occasion. The subject was introduced by J. Lechmere, Esq., from whose introductory speech we submit the following quotation—

"He had long seen and felt the want of a better constabulary force, for at present it was quite impossible to get a commitment executed; and though the beer-shops, where all mischief was concocted, were kept open at all hours of the night and constables called in to put down disturbances, yet no charges arose, because those officers were either afraid or unwilling to do their duty.

The testimony of another magistrate, the Rev. C. E. R. Keene, was to the same effect—

"He should regret if this opportunity were neglected, because there was not only a want of security to the property of this county, but the present constabulary force was insufficient to look after the beer-houses, that fruitful source of crime; it was difficult in villages to get constables to do their duty, and run the risk of laying information against beer-houses, which had become such intolerable nuisances, that, if not arrested in their progress, crime would increase instead of decrease.

The motion was rejected, as we learn from the report, principally on the ground of expense. But the fact of its discussion shews the light in which intelligent men view the beer-shops in the rural districts. Universal testimony is borne to the unmingled and unmitigated mischief of these haunts of vice. Is it to be tolerated that a whole county must be burdened with the expense of a rural police; that a few scores of men may be licensed to seduce the rising youths of our villages to habits of indolence and dissipation? Should the proposal for a "temperance village" or "model parish" be fully carried out, will a rural police be required there?

OUR ANNUAL MEETING.

We shall meet in Exeter Hall, according to announcement, on the 24th May, and hope to have the opportunity of welcoming many of our old friends and fellow-labourers in the great work. We anticipate the annual meeting with intense interest, not unmingled with anxiety. With interest—deep interest—for we believe the cause of temperance both needs and deserves such a meeting. There is something imposing in a crowded assembly; and when thousands throng, to examine past success, and to start for a new race, with stern resolve, and yet with smiling affection and ardent hope, we participate the happiness, we forget past sacrifices, and look forward unto the things that are before.

Yet is anxiety an element of our anticipations. So many and such rare qualifications must needs be concentrated and combined to make a "monster meeting" as effective as the christian and the patriot desire. Many meetings produce only evanescent results, and the resolutions which pledged to a year of faithful labour and persevering earnestness, have frequently little more assent of the heart than is necessary to raise the hand in their favour. It is necessary to success that the powers of the mind be all in harmony. There must be the enlightenment of the understanding—the conviction of the judgment—the resolve of the will—the kindling of the affections—the confederacy of all the powers and passions of the man, to make an effective labourer in any cause—especially in those movements that require opposition to be met and disarmed—prejudice to be subdued by love—and timidity and indifference to be aroused from torpor, and inspired with life. To this whole result an annual meeting should contribute; and can we but be anxious that the multitude should be filled with decision, and the cause receive a powerful impetus from such a gathering as we are accustomed to meet on these occasions.

Our annual meeting of members will be held at noon, on the day before, at the offices of the Society, when a new committee and officers will be appointed, and we hope, such new arrangements entered upon as may secure the "present complete" efficiency of the National Society, and at no very distant period, the "future complete" success of the principle of TOTAL ABSTINENCE FROM ALL THAT INTOXICATES.

WHAT IS DRUNKENNESS?—Drunkenness is a flattering devil, a sweet poison, a pleasant sin; which whosoever hath, hath not himself; which whosoever doth commit, committeth not a single sin, but becomes the centre, and the slave, of all manner of sin.—St. Augustine.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

ORIGINAL RESEARCHES IN NATURAL HISTORY.

THE DISTILLER.

The lion is a majestic, philosophical-looking creature. The alligator, notwithstanding its weak—or rather its strong—points, has its uses in the economy of the tropics. Even the serpent has good qualities; it operates beneficially as a check on organic redundancy, preventing the brute population from increasing more rapidly than the means of subsistence. The jackal and hyena, odious creatures though they be, are useful members of Egyptian society, consuming carrion which might otherwise feed the plague. The hawk keeps down the chattering impertinence of sparrows; and the shark, in the opinion of the tars—the men who should know best—officiates as a kind of sea-attorney. But the distiller is an animal, in whose favour nothing can be said. Of all the creatures in the heavens above, on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth, the distiller, and its varieties, is the only species that possesses no redeeming quality whatever. It is the most destructive and untameable of creatures.

The fabled dragon-monster poisoned the air with its breath for miles around, and many human beings sickened and died in consequence. This was bad enough certainly, but the breath of the distiller-monster is a great deal worse. It not only diffuses itself over whole countries, but packed up in casks, finds its way to the remotest corners of the earth, so that the breath of the same monster that kills in Britain, suffocates at the antipodes. The distilling-monster is such a huge, hideous, overgrown brute, and has been breathing so lustily and so long, that its pestiferous halitus may be said to form a component part of the earth's atmosphere. From facts furnished by trustworthy persons, it appears that the air of Asia, India, America, Africa, and Australia, as well as that of Europe, is tainted with it to an alarming extent. Whole Indian tribes have been suffocated by it; cut down like desert travellers by the deadly simoon. Civilised nations, such as Britain and America, have suffered severely. The Americans, however, are striving manfully to purify their atmosphere from the noxious fumes; but, shame to the British people—the distilling-monster is still allowed to blow in Britannia's face, and she is consequently breathing convulsively, sadly pained, and rapidly losing her health.

It is an important and interesting fact, concerning predacious animals, that not one of them has been designed to prey on man. That a lion or tiger sometimes surprises the traveller among the brushwood of Africa or the jungle of Bengal, is certainly true. But such catastrophes are accidental, and occur but rarely. The function of the carnivora appears to be "to maintain the balance of power" between the contending swarms of earth's irrational offspring, and their food accordingly consists of the lower genera. Not so the distiller. It passes over the inferior creatures, and preys on man alone. This most monstrous of all monsters thrives and fattens on human wretchedness.

The distiller is more decidedly poisonous than any other animal. Its poison is stored up in large barrels, whereas that of the boa-constrictor requires merely small bags to hold it. Moreover, the poison of a serpent may be swallowed without doing any harm, there being no danger from it except when injected into a puncture; but that of the distiller operates from the stomach with such force as to cause stupor, delirium, and death.

It is a melancholy fact, that the distiller extracts its poison solely from human food, of which it consumes an enormous quantity. In the year 1846, the potato blight destroyed the food of about three millions. During the same year the distiller consumed (we dare not say destroyed) as much food as would have fed five millions for twelve months. There was a terrible outcry about the potato blight, which comes only once in a generation, but not a word about the distiller-monster, which is never away and never at rest. The blight had very stupidly forgotten to take out the license.

Fortunately for mankind the distiller cannot spring upon its prey like a tiger. Indeed, it possesses no locomotive powers whatever, and would be absolutely harmless, but for the co-operation of human beings. Its retreat is generally in some secluded valley, by the side of a stream, or in the neighbourhood of large cities. Like all wild animals, the stench of its lair is intolerable, and there are instances of persons perishing by incautiously venturing into the deeper parts of its den, where they were choked by noxious effluvia. Prone among its vats and worms, belching fire and smoke, the monster, both day and night, elaborates its poison, which is collected with greater care than if it were milk, and sent to all parts of the country.

An incomprehensible blockhead, "a long time ago," after expressing the wish that his neighbour might enjoy good health, immediately drank some distiller poison. The idea was too absurd to sink into oblivion: it spread like wildfire. Henceforth every man of common sense, in sympathising with other people's health, gave a decided proof that he had no regard for his own. Another original nuns-kull, during the dark ages, in selling lucifer matches or something else, treated his customers to drams of the poison; and so began the disastrous reign of the distiller over commercial men. Some stupid monks, better qualified to put devils in than to cast them out, invented presbytery and induction dinners, and so laid the foundation of an enormous demand for the poison. In this way the wonderful qualities of the distiller were gradually discovered and made subservient to the destruction of the best interests of society. The present generation clings with amazing pertinacity to the absurdities of their ancestors, illustrating the progressiveness of the species when the road happens to be downhill.

Some twenty years ago, the dreadful ravages of the distiller excited general attention, and led to an attempt to tame the monster. The expedient was ludicrous enough. It was the drinking of the weaker and muddier poison of another monster called the brewer. The whole affair, as might have been expected, proved a failure. It was ridiculous to expect that one rascal would starve because another was fed.

Subsequently an important discovery was made by some men of common sense in the ancient town of Dunfermline. Like all other great discoveries it was remarkable chiefly for its simplicity. It was an infallible method of being safe from the distiller, and consisted simply in letting the poison alone. The scheme was laughed at by many; for the earth has always been fertile in fools. But it spread notwithstanding, and is spreading still. No man arrived at years of discretion, need be victimised by the distiller. He has only to let it alone. Parents who teach their inexperienced and unsuspecting children to imbibe the distiller's poison, deserve to be whipped.

Another part of the discovery is the interesting fact, that the monster itself will perish if nobody drinks its poison. Thus the same beautiful and powerful principle, "let it alone," at once preserves mankind, and kills the distiller.

As soon as the monster is dead, its large mash-tub skeleton should be sent to the British Museum, and set up partly in the gallery of heroes, and partly in that dedicated to idols. It would occupy a higher niche than either Alexander or Napoleon, and stand upon a loftier pedestal than Budh or Vishnu, for it has slain and deceived a greater number of mankind than all these worthies put together.—Scottish Temperance Review.

Juvenile Depravity, Prize Essay, by the Rev. H. WORSLEY, M.A., Rector of Easton, Suffolk. pp. 275. London: CHARLES GILPIN.

This work is the successful Essay to which the prize of £100. has just been awarded. Fifty-two competitors entered the field, and from their various productions, "some of which," the adjudicators inform us, "were elaborate and valuable treatises," the one before us commanded an unhesitating preference.

The importance of the subject itself can scarcely be over-estimated, for as we are reminded in the opening paragraph,—

"The mind of the statesman and the philanthropist in considering the future destinies of a nation, its prospects in regard to domestic industry, comfort and happiness, naturally turns to the moral condition of the rising generation, and accordingly as this is good or bad, anticipates an increase of general prosperity and happiness, or the reverse."

Hence the necessity, if we would see our country prosperous, to train up the rising youth in those principles of duty and those habits of self-government which alone will render them virtuous and good citizens.

The Essay is divided into six chapters, in which the following subjects are successively treated:—The first furnishes "statistics of crime, particularly juvenile," and demonstrates that notwithstanding the great advance of popular education, juvenile delinquency has most fearfully increased, and that whether we regard its relation to the population or to the whole number of criminal offenders.

The second chapter is devoted to the consideration of the "condition of the labouring class before the era of manufactures," and traces the effects of the "altered circumstances," upon the "rural districts—on country gentlemen—on the farming class"—and on the labouring population.

The third chapter unfolds the "strong tendencies in the system of manufactures to moral evil, particularly drunkenness"—and reveals some melancholy instances of juvenile delinquency, showing how the existing tendencies to evil have not merely remained unchecked, but have frequently been aggravated by the "entire independence of children of parental control," and by the pestilential example of those with whom they were in most frequent contact.

The fourth chapter exhibits the "prominent features of the present condition of society—the causes of the increase of drunkenness—the connexion between drunkenness and crime"—and concludes by the consideration of the two questions, "Is education frequently or generally perverted?" and "What agency is there abroad calculated to impede the progress of national instruction?" Our readers will anticipate that in reply to the latter of these, drunkenness is stated as the most powerful counteracting agency—and be ready to respond to the conclusion that, "The degraded moral habits, the drunkenness of parents, seduce their children into early guilt, and preclude the admission of useful knowledge of every kind, religious or secular."

The fifth chapter, states the need of more education, and enforces the "duties" respectively of "the legislature—of proprietors—and of the mass of the people."

The sixth, and last chapter, examines "past remedies," and the "reason of their failure," and lays down the following conditions as "essentially requisite" to the success of any remedy for the growing delinquency among the juvenile population of our country:—

"1. It must reach the case of the parents: it must change the education of home.

"2. In order to effect this, it must assail those drinking-habits to which it has been shown parental neglect is so largely attributable.

"3. It must destroy under this head the dominion of habit."

The author proceeds to apply these conditions to those agencies which have sought to grapple with the vice of drunkenness, and the first considered is the British and Foreign Temperance Society, which he declares has "signally failed," and that because it did not fulfil the third of the foregoing conditions.

Having glanced at the formation of total abstinence societies, the author thus delivers his judgment:—

"The total abstinence principle has completely realized the three conditions, which must be essential to the success of any scheme of moral amendment, under the particular circumstances of our age and country. NO OTHER SYSTEM HAS FULFILLED THEM; and hence it is apparent, that not only is the total abstinence principle an effective remedial and preventive means; but it is equally evident, both from the nature of the case and from the evidence of experience, that, whatever may be affirmed of individual cases,—nationally, THERE CAN BE NO OTHER REMEDY."

In this conclusion we entirely concur, and we have a deep and deepening conviction that this conclusion must become general before any thing can effectually contend with the mass of corruption now underlying society, blighting its fairest prospects—withering its fondest hopes—and threatening to engulf it, with all its interests, in irretrievable ruin.

We commend this work to the serious consideration of our readers, and commend to them the practical lesson which it suggests. Let our strength be devoted to THE YOUNG. We must endeavour to reclaim the fallen and the vicious, as a safeguard to the young. We must plead with those who will not relinquish it on their own account, to do so for the sake of the young. We must have the aid of Sunday-school teachers, for our cause is a blessing to the young. We seek the co-operation of the friends of education, for we look with compassion on the young. We turn with mingled gratitude and pity to our ragged schools, and we ask the noble Lord who presides over their operations, whether we are not auxiliary in our efforts, when we endeavour to reclaim the abandoned parents, who, like the ostrich, have deserted their young. Without the temperance cause, all other philanthropic efforts to remove juvenile delinquency must fail, for, nationally, THERE CAN BE NO OTHER REMEDY.

Ragged Schools and Juvenile Destitution. A letter to the Right Hon. Lord Ashley, M.P., by T. HUDSON. pp. 8.

Intemperance and Cholera, by T. HUDSON. pp. 8.

Occasional Papers on the Evils of a Drinking Education, by THOMAS HUDSON. pp. 16.

We have pleasure in noticing these valuable tracts. The first is a laudable—would we might be able to add successful—attempt to call the attention of that distinguished philanthropist, Lord Ashley, to the influence of the drinking-customs on the depravity and destitution of the masses.

The second is an exhibition of the close connexion between intemperance and cholera, and supplies sound information from indisputable sources of evidence, with practical advice, which will commend itself to all teetotalers, and supply with arguments on this subject those who, from limited means, may not have access to more elaborate treatises.

The last and largest is, we think, the most important of the three. The first is limited in its object—the second occasional in its subject—the third belongs to all classes of society, and will, we fear, be too long true, and too long required. Parents especially mothers, should read this, and circulate it. Temperance mothers should read it for impression—moderation mothers for conversion. We cordially commend them all, assured that, unpretending as they are in their aspect, and moderate as they are in their price, they contain some truth that will prove “more precious than rubies” to those who practice it.

DESCRIPTION OF A RUM-SELLER.

BY REV. ROBERT HALL.

“Invested with the implements of office, he damns men's souls, and then sinks himself to hell.”

Implements are the tools of a trade adapted to the kind of work designed. The Rum-seller's office is to make drunkards, produce misery, and occasion death. He knows that the use of his implements will bring drunkenness, misery, and death. All that they do in his hands, is his work. He controls them. He gets paid here in money for the use of them. Sometimes he turns them upon himself, and then he is paid in the punishment which he has inflicted. These implements are cordials, wines, rum, gin, whisky, brandy, &c.

He damns men's souls. What a work! Hinders every good, cherishes every evil—incites men to almost every crime, occasions nearly every murder, but chiefly kills the victim of his avarice, by destroying his body, and sealing his soul up in sin and pollution, which ensures his portion among the lost.

Then sinks himself to hell. The man who works to ruin others must not think to escape himself. The man that will knowingly aid in murdering his neighbour's child, cannot but expect to hear the cries of that blood for vengeance. If there be a fearful vengeance hanging over any man, it is that over the man who, for the sake of gain, has aided in murdering his neighbours and their children.

Oh! what a traffic! Oh! what a business! How hard must be the heart, how unfeeling the man, and how debased the woman, who can continue therein.

How many parents have, with aching hearts, wept and mourned without consolation, over the work of him who has been their neighbour, and professedly their friend! But judgment cometh. Murder will out. The man who has aided in doing the work of death for others, will do it for himself. Oh! that it were written over the door of every seller of intoxicating drink,—The office for damning the souls of men; or, as Judge Dagget says, it should be written in great capitals over every grog-shop, “THE WAY TO HELL, GOING DOWN TO THE CHAMBERS OF DEATH.”—Maryland Herald.

DROWSINESS.—“Drowsiness,” says Solomon, “shall clothe a man with rags.” And of all the drowsiness and laziness that are witnessed in the world, nine-tenths arise from an inordinate indulgence in strong drink. When once this vice has taken fast hold of a man, farewell industry, farewell emulation—farewell attention to things worthy of attention—farewell the love of virtuous society—farewell decency of manners—and farewell, too, even an attention to person; everything is sunk by this predominating and fatal appetite.—Cobbett.

Notices of Meetings.

CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

A meeting of this society was held at the British School Rooms, Perry Street, St. Pancras, on Monday, the 16th April, which was presided over by the Rev. Jabez Burns, D.D. The engagements of the evening commenced with praise; and prayer was offered by the Rev. I. Doxsey. The chairman, after briefly referring to the objects of the society, commented upon the state of drunkenness and its offspring, crime, in Great Britain, as compared with our American brethren; who, when accused by us of maintaining upon their country's escutcheon the foul blot of slavery, upbraided us as guilty of worshipping the idol Bacchus. He concluded by showing the dangers to which members of Christian churches were exposed, and the responsibilities they incurred, by countenancing and supporting the use of intoxicating drinks—affectionately appealing to all professing Christianity to enlist in so noble a cause, and use every exertion, in their several spheres of Christian labour, to promote the dissemination of truths so elevating in their tendency. The meeting was then addressed by Mr. Roberts, upon the natural philosophy of teetotalism; the Rev. I. Doxsey, (Secretary to the National Temperance Society) on the duty of Sabbath-school teachers in relation to the temperance reformation; Mr. Campbell, on the drinking customs of Britain as calculated to retard missionary operations in heathen lands; and Messrs. Griffiths and Judd on the objects of the Christian Temperance Union. The meeting, although not numerically large, was effective, and we trust that much good may speedily follow among the Christian churches, which the Union seeks to enlist in this holy cause.

E. GRIFFITHS, Hon. Sec.

R. B. GRINDROD, LL.D., AT DOVER.

Dr. Grindrod has just concluded a course of popular physiological and scientific lectures in the Apollonicon Hall, Dover, to crowded audiences, illustrated by his colossal drawings, with a splendid model of the heart, lungs, &c. To do justice to the interesting, instructive, and scientific character of his addresses, is impossible in a brief notice, comprising, as they did, many points of medical, physiological, and anatomical information, highly useful to every class of the community.

On the 20th instant, the learned Doctor concluded his labours here with an address to upwards of 1000 children, adapted to their juvenile capacities. The spacious hall was literally crammed in every part, and hundreds were compelled to leave for want of room. His lecture to these infant minds was listened to with all the attention to be expected from so numerous an audience, more particularly from the crowded state of the room; and the interrogations proposed were readily replied to by the children.

On the 19th, the public Lecture Room was also crowded, and increasing interest was excited from the circumstance that all the members of a Mechanics' Institution, lately formed, consisting of 180 members, attended, by free tickets, at the special invitation of a benevolent lady, favourable to the cause of total abstinence. Many persons who entered the room prejudiced against the system of total abstinence, left with new ideas; and the result has been a considerable addition of signatures to the temperance declaration.

DUNMOW.

On the 7th and 8th of March, Mrs. Stamp paid a visit to our town, and delivered two excellent lectures on the temperance question. The meetings were very numerous attended, and the subject was ably handled. Her clear and earnest appeals were listened to for more than three hours with evident satisfaction, and her visit to this place will not, we believe, be soon forgotten. She appears thoroughly to understand the subject, and we doubt not a visit from her would be duly appreciated in other localities.

BOROUGH OF GREENWICH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The first quarterly meeting of the members of this society was held in the Greenwich Literary Institution, on Wednesday evening, 18th April, when about fifty ladies and gentlemen sat down to tea, provided gratis by the committee. The meeting was convened (according to the terms of the circular) "for the purpose of friendly conversation and discussion on the objects they were united to promote;" and in accordance therewith, some suggestions and observations, together with addresses and recitations, were made by various members. The evening was spent most harmoniously, pleasantly, and profitably; and several handsome donations were announced towards the formation of a Temperance Tract-distributing Committee. It is believed the establishment of these periodical réunions will contribute to the increased zeal and usefulness of the Association. Isaac English, Esq., ably fulfilled the duties of chairman.

HENRY COLE, Hon. Sec.

Greenwich, April 23rd, 1849.

NOTE.—Public meetings are held in the above place, the first Thursday evening in every month.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The friends of temperance here have availed themselves of the services of Mr. J. Inwards, who gave four of his popular and instructive lectures to the Young Men's Association, a zealous and enterprising body of temperance reformers. On Thursday evening, the 12th, Mr. James McKenna, agent of the Temperance Life Assurance Association, delivered an interesting address on behalf of that Institution. He commented upon the longevity of the Society of Friends, showing that while one-half of the children of Friends live to be twenty-seven years of age (which he attributed to their temperate habits,) the average of children generally, who die in infancy, was one-half of the births. Adverting to the security of the Temperance Provident Institution, and its success up to the present time, he shewed that while the average number of deaths among one thousand members in other offices was 9, in the Temperance Office it had been only 4½ per thousand. This appeared to make a deep and pleasing impression, as it is well calculated to do, when the fact is understood, that abstinence from intoxicating drinks will greatly prolong life, and augment human happiness.

SHANKLIN, ISLE OF WIGHT.

We have been favoured with a visit from that old and tried friend of the temperance cause, C.

Lovell, Esq., of London. The cause of temperance has been much revived through his labours, whilst staying amongst us. During his visit, a public meeting was held, when he had the pleasure of addressing a crowded assembly.

On a subsequent evening, a tea-meeting was held for total abstainers exclusively. The evening was pleasantly spent, and the interest of the meeting sustained by the Doctor's inexhaustible fund of information.

Through these efforts, upwards of fifty signatures were obtained. A society was formed and organized through the kind advice and under the superintendence of the Doctor, and a committee of twelve appointed to give practical effect to the objects of the association. In addition to this, a juvenile society has been formed, which already numbers forty members. They meet once a fortnight, and are addressed by some of the committee, who are anxious to train them up in the path that lead to sobriety, virtue, and happiness.

THE SURREY AND SUSSEX FREE TEMPERANCE FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

PATRONS.

The Duke of Norfolk,
The Bishop of Chichester.
Colonel Charles Wyndham.

The Sixth Anniversary of the above society was celebrated in Brighton on Easter Monday. The members dined together at Saunders' Temperance Hotel, and took tea with their friends in the town-hall. The society, though young, is in a flourishing state. The number of members is increasing, and they have a balance of £200. in the Treasurer's hands. After tea, a Public Temperance Meeting was held; Thomas Compton, Esq., kindly occupied the chair. The meeting was first addressed by Thomas Davey of Lewes, who shewed the working-classes, that by temperance and energy they might greatly elevate themselves. He adverted to his own experience when he was a drunkard, and stated, that though earning good wages he was in a state of great destitution, living at one time with his family in an almost unfurnished room, in a poor state of health, and in a very dissatisfied state of mind. After signing the pledge about thirteen years ago his health and circumstances improved, and he is now a very respectable tradesman, living in a well-furnished eight roomed house. He stated that they had in Lewes twenty reformed drunkards, eighteen of whom had joined christian churches. The accounts of some of those, before and after signing the pledge, were interesting and extraordinary. He was followed by an Irishman who gave an account of the temperance movement in Ireland. The meeting was also addressed by members from Worthing, Arundel, Littlehampton and Brighton, and concluded by singing the doxology.

JOHN HILTON, Jun.

GREAT TORRINGTON, DEVON.

Mr. Williamson gave us a second lecture, on Tuesday, 3rd instant, in the Bible Christian Chapel, when the number of the audience more than doubled what we expected; and the attention given, proved that the lecturer was listened to with intense interest. Never, says the president, did I ever see in this town a more attentive meeting. Teetotalism has done great good in this town. Many drunkards have been reclaimed, and moderate men drink less than heretofore. Scores have signed the pledge; and eleven public-houses have been closed. If we had held meetings more frequently, to agitate the question, more good would have been done. But our meetings are "like angels' visits, few and far between."

HENRY SANFORD, Sec.

[Our friend, Mr. Sanford, is right. Wherever the local societies are working well—intelligently, prudently, kindly, and in earnest, the cause is prospering. Why, then, not alter the state of things lamented? "One firm resolve of mighty men is worth a tide of tears." Gird yourself, Mr. Secretary, for the work. Every thing depends on you. Have regular meetings of committee—circulate information—strengthen the weak—work the willing—win the reluctant—and depend upon it, the angels will multiply their visits.—ED.]

NEVER DESPAIR.

Never despair! Let the feeble in spirit
Bow like the willow, that stoops to the blast;
Droop not in peril! 'Tis manhood's true merit,
Nobly to struggle and hope for the best.
When by the sunshine of fortune forsaken,
Faint sinks the heart of the feeble with fear—
Stand, like the oak of the forest, unshaken—
Never despair, boys! Oh, never despair!
Never despair! Though adversity rages
Fiercely and fell as the surge on the shore,
Firm as the rock of the ocean for ages,
Stem the rude torrent till danger is o'er.
Fate with its whirlwind, our joys may all sever;
True to ourselves we have nothing to fear.
Be this our hope, and our anchor for ever,
Never despair, boys! Oh, never despair!

LINES ON DRUNKENNESS.

(By Thomas Randolph, an English poet, 1640.)

Fly, drunkenness, whose vile incontinence
Takes both away the reason and the sense,
Till with deep-flowing cups thy mind's possess'd,
Leaves to be man, and wholly turns a beast.
Think whilst thou swallowest the capacious bowl,
Thou let'st in seas to wreck and drown the soul.
Consider how it soon destroys the grace
Of human shape, spoiling the beauteous face:
Puffing the cheeks, blearing the curious eye,
Studding the face with vicious heraldry.
What pearls and rubies doth the wine disclose,
Making the purse poor to enrich the nose!
How does it nurse disease, infect the heart,
Drawing some sickness into every part!
The veins do fill, glutted with vicious food,
And quickly fevers the distempered blood.
The belly swells, the foot can hardly stand,
Lam'd with the gout; the palsy shakes the hand;
And through the flesh sick waters sinking in,
Do, bladder like, puff up the dropsied skin.
It weaks the brain, it spoils the memory,
Hasting on age and wilful poverty.
It drowns thy better parts, making thy name
To foes a laughter, to thy friends a shame.
Quite leave this vice, and turn not to't again,
Upon presumption of a stronger brain.
For he that holds more wine than others can,
I rather count a hogshead than a man.

GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY, PATENTEES, City Road, London,

It cannot now be doubted, even by the most sceptical, but that Gutta Percha must henceforward be regarded as one of the blessings of a gracious Providence, inasmuch as it affords a sure and certain protection from cold and damp feet, and thus tends to protect the body from disease and premature death.

"GUTTA PERCHA TUBING," being so extraordinary a conductor of sound, is used as speaking tubes in mines, manufactories, warehouses, &c. This tubing may also be applied in Churches and Chapels for the purpose of enabling deaf persons to listen to the sermon, &c. For conveying messages from one room or building to another, or from the mast-head to the deck of a vessel, it is invaluable.

MILL BANDS.—The increasing demand for the Gutta Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLACKS, &c.—Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to manufacturers, engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-bucket valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size or thickness without seam or joint, and as cold water will never soften them they seldom need any repair.

Gutta Percha soles, solution, inkstands, card trays, medallions, picture-frames, brackets, mouldings, window-blind cornices, vases, fire-buckets, bowls, pen-trays, bougies, catheters, stethoscopes, thin lining, thread, flower-pots, ear-trumpets, &c. &c., may be had at the Company's Works, Wharf Road, City Road, London, or of any of their wholesale dealers in town or country.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

5th, The extent to which the example of Teetotal parents would promote the moral and religious well-being of families, and afford to parents the means of sending their children to school.

6th, The practical working of the drinking-usages and customs in manufactories, workshops and elsewhere.

The names of the adjudicators will be announced at a future time.

The Essays, which must not exceed forty-six 8vo pages, to be sent under cover, accompanied with a sealed letter enclosing the real name and address of the writer, on or before the 1st of November, 1849, to the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

The Committee, also, offer a further prize of £10 for the best Essay on the most efficient means of conducting Temperance Societies, with the view of accelerating, and giving permanence to the Total Abstinence Reformation. This Essay must not exceed thirty-two 8vo pages, and is open to competition by writers of all classes. To be sent in by the 1st of September, to the office of the National Temperance Society, and the adjudication to be made under the direction of the Committee.

ISAAC DOWSEY, Secretary.

OUR ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Society was held on Thursday, the 24th May, at Exeter Hall. A very numerous gathering assembled on the occasion; indeed the spacious hall was crowded in nearly every part, and the deepest interest was manifested in the proceedings from the commencement to the close. The chair was occupied by Samuel Bowly, Esq., of Gloucester. Amongst other gentlemen on the platform were Rev. W. W. Robinson, M.A.; Thomas Krag, Esq., of Norway; C. H. Lovell, Esq., M.D.; Henry Clapp, Esq., of Massachusetts; John Wilson, Esq., of Boston, U.S.A.; W. Gutteridge, Esq., of Dunstable; J. D. Bassett, Esq., Leighton Buzzard; W. Janson, Esq.; Rev. Jonathan George; Rev. John Stevenson, M.A.; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P.; Elihu Burritt, Esq.; Joseph Sturge, Esq., Birmingham; Joseph Eaton, Esq., of Bristol; — Colman, Esq., of Boston, U.S.A.; B. Rotch, Esq., U.S.A.; J. S. Buckingham, Esq.; Rev. Ozra French, American Missionary from Bombay; Rev. B. Parsons, of Ebley; Dr. Oxley; Rev. H. Robinson, of Hackney; John Cassell, Esq.; Rev. W. R. Baker; Rev. W. Bishop, of Liverpool; W. Cash, Esq.; Rev. John Kennedy, M.A.; Rev. W. Forster, of Kentish Town; Mr. J. W. Green; &c., &c., &c.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said:—As I have placed myself in the hands of the Committee, I think I should ill fulfil the duties of chairman, if I occupied any part of the valuable time of this meeting in making any excuses or apologies as to why I occupy the chair. I venture to say this, that I will do the best I can to act my part, and I have no doubt that I shall have the assistance and co-operation of this large meeting. I happen to hold in my hand a list of the various meetings held in this metropolis for benevolent purposes during the present month. I think about sixteen of these meetings have been held within this spacious Hall, and I venture to offer it as my deliberate opinion, that not one of them has had an object in view of greater importance to mankind, than that for which we are now assembled.—(Applause.) Some of these meetings have been for missionary purposes. Far be it from me to make any comparison which might be injurious to those societies; I may say, indeed, that if the individuals interested in them would get rid of intoxicating drinks, we should have more money brought into them than we now have. Speaking of missions, I may say that a soul in our own country is as precious in the sight of God as a soul in the Antipodes; and further, that there are many more individuals, the loss of whose souls may be attributed to the use of intoxicating drinks, than there are persons saved by all the missionary efforts put forth by this country.—(Hear, hear.) In heathen lands too, the effect of intoxicating drinks has been perhaps of more injury—destroyed more lives than all the labours of missionaries have saved. These drinks may have done a vast injury also to the character of the missionary himself; for if, in this enlightened land, with the amount of public opinion we have around us, intoxicating drinks can pull down a dissenter and a churchman from the pulpit, however high the position he before occupied, how may the case be in those countries where the inducement to intemperance is still greater, and where the public opinion as a check to it is still less!—(Hear.) But some of these meetings have been held on the important subject of education—a subject in which I feel a lively interest. I know not the statistics of the City of London; but as far as Gloucester is concerned, I believe there are teachers and school-room enough for all the children in the city, if they were disposed to attend. Yet scarcely any of the schools are full. And why? Because many children are too ragged to attend—because the parents are, in many instances, too poor to pay even a penny or twopence a week—and because many of them are so demoralized and debased by drinking habits, that they do not estimate the value of education. To the use of intoxicating drinks alone I attribute the want of education in Gloucester. I will venture to say that of all the total abstainers in the city, there is not one whose children shall be found about the streets without shoes and stockings, or who have not something like a decent education.—(Applause.) One branch of the education-movement has been the establishment of Ragged-schools —an excellent institution;—and one cannot but admire the zeal and benevolence of those who have taken these poor and destitute objects, and endeavoured to give them education. But in my opinion it would have been far better to have prevented the rags and the destitution of these children, by doing away with intoxicating drinks, than endeavour to snatch a few of them from their wretched condition, after they have been reduced to it by the drinking habits of their parents. I greatly admire the benevolence and zeal of Lord Ashley in this cause, but I believe Lord Ashley would further his own objects immensely, if he would become a total abstainer.—(Applause.) I do not like speaking behind men's backs, and, if any other person on the platform will volunteer his services to accompany me, I will go to Lord Ashley, and tell him my opinion upon the subject.—(Applause.) [Mr. J. S. Buckingham said—that rather than such a challenge should go unaccepted, he would himself be happy to accompany the chairman to his lordship.] Lord Ashley is a perfect stranger to me, but I know enough of his character to believe that, if he does not see with us, he will admire our effort, as we admire his; and that, at any rate, we may assist one another in the great cause of humanity and education. One of the meetings to which I have alluded, was presided over by Prince Albert, and was attended by a large number of fashionable people, met together in order to benefit the domestic servants, to make them provident and careful. This is an excellent institution, but, in my opinion, it would be far better if these honourable individuals would teach these servants not to drink intoxicating beverages, inasmuch as the drinking habits are almost always the cause of the improvidence. Mark, many of these servants who have laboured for years, and laid by some little sum in the Savings' Bank: let them get connected with a drunken husband, and what becomes of all their savings? We have in Gloucester, and no doubt you have here, hundreds of persons who have not only drunk away the savings of years, but hundreds and hundreds of pounds besides. Drinking is the greatest source of improvidence among the poor, and it is one of their greatest temptations. We have had also in this city a large meeting on financial reform, and the necessity of reducing the expenditure of the country. We all think it a good thing to get rid of taxes; but why not get rid at once of the fifty millions spent annually in intoxicating drinks?—(hear)—why, Richard Cobden only proposes to strike off ten millions; we would strike off fifty millions.—(Applause.) There is no financial reform like that; and we need no petition to Parliament about it, for we can untax ourselves to-morrow if we will.—(Applause.) A part of the financial scheme is to remit the malt-tax, so that beer might be reduced to a lower price to benefit (as we are told) the agriculturists, and get them to join in the movement. Now I know something of the habits of the working-men in agricultural districts, and I venture to say, that not one in a hundred of them would have home-brewed beer if the malt-tax was taken off to-morrow.—(Hear.) Where is their convenience for brewing? They might brew the quantity which I have heard that an old woman brewed—a peck, of which she made four casks, and

"The first was twinkle cum-twink,
The second was pretty good drink,
The third was that that came after,
And the fourth was worse than water!"

—(much laughter.) If the agricultural labourers then are to consume more beer, it must be at those pestilential houses which we are trying to put down—the beer-shops,—so degrading to our country, and so demoralizing in their effects. But some of our friends have attended meetings on political reform, and those who know my sentiments will give me credit for having a fair share of political reform feeling about me; but, nevertheless, I believe that if the most wild political reformer of the day could have all the Acts of Parliament passed that he would wish to-morrow, they would not put the country in anything like such a position as would the destruction of the intoxicating drinks of this country. I know that much of the safety and tranquillity of the country of late has been attributed to the form of our constitution; now, whilst I am not going to find fault with the form of our constitution, I do not wish that it should have all the credit. I believe that a large amount of the quietness of the country is to be attributed to temperance lecturers who, during the last few years, have gone about preaching up order and sobriety, telling the people not to depend upon political reform but upon their own personal reform, showing them that the way to clean a city was for every man to sweep before his own door—thus teaching the great lesson which we want to be taught, that no change of government can benefit the working-classes until they know how to govern themselves.—(Applause.) In considering these various societies, therefore, which are now in operation—and I have taken part in many of them—I am inclined to believe that the Temperance Society is the foundation-stone of them all; and every man who wishes to advance their interests, cannot do better than sign the temperance pledge. Now we have been opposed in various ways in this great movement, and we have lived out a large amount of that opposition. Scarcely any man now ventures to come upon our platform and argue the question with us. We disregard the violent opposition we now and then meet with; we disregard the opposition of the sensualist who admits that he has a gratification in his wine, and that as long as he can have that gratification he will retain it without regard to others. It is not the opposition of the landlords that we fear; but what we have most to fear, or rather that which I have found most to obstruct the progress of temperance in the part of the country in which I live, is the example set by the moderate-drinking people who lead the young people to follow the same practice. It is the religious man, the benevolent man, the worthy and patriotic man, who is looked up to by his fellow-countrymen—it is the moderate and careful drinking of such individuals which mainly keeps up the practice, and prevents numbers from joining in the movement.—(Hear.) Let me illustrate, for a moment, the way in which these persons, in my humble opinion, operate upon society. Many years ago, I was in Bath for the benefit of my health, and occasionally bathed in the warm baths there. I very well recollect, that on the outside of the bath the water was moderately warm, but towards the centre it became warmer and warmer, owing to the rising of the hot spring there. I felt a constant inclination to go nearer and nearer the warm parts, because every time I turned back it felt cold and chilly; and so I went on and on to the warmest place, and there I stayed, sometimes, I believe, much too long. Now I am disposed to take this as an illustration of the drinking-system. When a man begins to drink, he feels that he wants a little more, and a little more, till he gets, as it were, to the warmest parts of the bath, and there he is very apt to remain. Now let us suppose, that men paid for this bathing by the hour, and that they remained in the bath hour after hour, notwithstanding what they had to pay; and that individuals, by yielding to this temptation, were continually weakening their constitution, and ultimately destroyed their lives; and still the people went. Suppose at length, some sensible man said, "Why do you go to a bath that is heated thus, and holds out such a temptation;" and afterwards erected a bath of an equal temperature all over. Suppose this bath was found to answer the purpose admirably, and that people were not induced to remain in it longer than was necessary, and always came out refreshed; would not one think that society would have been rejoiced at the discovery? But not so. Notwithstanding all that has been proved, men still choose the injurious bath, and slide away from the edge to the centre, drawn, as it were, by the increased luxury of getting warmer and warmer. Thus is it with drinking. It appears to me, that every individual who goes into that bath, leads somebody or other with him. Now I will suppose, that some steady Quaker—an elder, it may be, in the church of which he is a member—walks into this bath which has destroyed so many people, do you not think that there are many people who would say, "It is perfectly safe to follow that Quaker; he is a steady man: he never comes out the worse for bathing in the hot bath?" Don't you think it would be very likely that such an individual would lead somebody or other into the bath? He himself would dip in at the edge of the bath, and take good care to come away before it did him any injury; but the man whom he led there gets into the centre of the bath, and gets injured just in the way that individuals do, who begin the use of intoxicating drinks and end with an immoderate use of them. So with the Dissenting minister, the Wesleyan, or Baptist, or Independent, if he goes into the bath he leads some of his congregation after him, and exposes them to all the temptations incident to the place. Under these circumstances, therefore, it appears to me to be the duty of every individual, just in proportion to his influence in society, to take care into which bath he goes; seeing that one is a place of temptation, and that he cannot control those who bathe in it, and that the other is free from temptation, and attended with the greatest advantages. I think that is a fair illustration of the drinking system. I have never so much advocated the temperance principle for the benefit that we may individually receive from it, as for the advantage of others on whom our example may have some degree of influence. We all know the evils of intemperance, and that there is no cure for it but total abstinence. Every one who admits these evils is, in my opinion, bound to adopt the cure which we recommend, or show us some other. I have always said that if I could be shown any other mode of curing intemperance, I would gladly give up mine, but until I do see another way, I shall feel it my duty to continue to adopt a practice which has hitherto been so remarkably successful. I am especially astonished at the indifference to this cause manifested by persons who make a religious profession, although they see that numbers have been reclaimed through the instrumentality of the temperance movement; and not only reclaimed, but have become converted characters. They must admit that the blessing of God has rested upon us; and it seems to me taking upon ourselves a serious responsibility to lift up our standard of practice against God. I freely admit that when we commenced this great movement, I did not expect so much to reclaim individuals, as to protect society hereafter from falling into the snare. But what is the result? Thousands and tens of thousands have been reclaimed; we can give you their names and addresses. Go and ask them for yourselves; ask their wives, once sunk in misery and despair—nay, you need not stop to ask, for the answer is now upon the smiling and cheerful countenances;—ask their once neglected children, and they will tell you what have been the blessings of temperance. Well this is admitted. I have known persons who have said: "Well, I wish you success in your onward movement;" but I ask what license have these individuals to acknowledge all this amount of benefit, and yet stand still, and do nothing? Has that license to do nothing, while so much is to be done, been signed by Him who came upon earth for our sakes, and lived a life of persecution, and died a death of bitter suffering to save us? Has he signed our license to stand still and see immortal souls perishing? Are means offered by which thousands have been saved, and those means not embraced? I should be sorry to take such a responsibility upon myself. Nay, if the Temperance Society had only saved one soul, I should think that was a sufficient reason why I should become a member of that Society.—(Hear.) The saving of one immortal soul is surely enough to repay you for the giving up of so paltry a gratification as a glass of wine or a pint of beer. We have been sneered at and laughed at, but I consider that there is no greater disgrace to a Christian country, than the sneering and laughing at the man who is willing to make some sacrifices of his own enjoyment for the sake of benefiting his fellow-creatures.—(Applause.) But, my friends, I wish to set a good example to the speakers not to make a long speech; and, as I may have other opportunities of addressing you in the course of the evening, I shall better consult the convenience of the meeting, and pay a better compliment to the speakers who are to follow me, if I now call upon the Secretary to read the report.—(Applause.)

The Secretary, Mr. DOXSEY, then read an animated and cheering report of the Society's operations during the past year; which was warmly received and applauded by the meeting. Mr. MEREDITH read the annual statement of accounts.

The Rev. W. ROBINSON moved the first resolution. He said, my christian friends, as an unworthy minister of the Lord Jesus Christ, I feel it a peculiar privilege to take any part in the proceedings of this meeting; and during the short time I shall have to address you, may the Holy Spirit be poured out largely upon speaker and hearers, that there may be an abundant blessing resting upon us for Immanuel's sake! I have been requested to move,

"That this meeting, convinced that intemperance is one of the most costly, degrading, and ruinous evils with which Society is afflicted; and persuaded, that no sufficient remedy has yet been devised, except 'total abstinence from all that intoxicates,' rejoices in the continued and persevering labours of the National Temperance Society, and all other local and general organizations for the advocacy and advancement of temperance principles; and pledges itself to do its utmost to sustain their efforts."

Now, before I speak to this resolution, I would, with your permission, read a very short portion of God's word applicable to our noble cause, though without giving any comment, for want of time. [The reverend gentleman here read the lxxvii. Psalm.] Allow me to say, before I proceed to the subject of the resolution, as there has been a proposal made by our respected chairman to visit that noble and excellent philanthropist, Lord Ashley, which has been seconded by our old and tried friend, J. Silk Buckingham, Esq., that as an unworthy representative of the Church of England, it will afford me much pleasure and honour to accompany those gentlemen to Lord Ashley.—(Applause.) Mr. Chairman, his lordship is not altogether ignorant of this great movement. I have the honour of knowing his lordship personally; I have sent him tracts upon this subject, and I know that in one point of view, he looks upon it with favour. But with regard to the nobility, and, I grieve to say, the clergy of our land, how many drawbacks are there to the coming forward in this cause. But I rejoice, sir, to bear testimony to the fact to which you have alluded: that we now no longer hear the ridicule which formerly beset our path; there are individuals in the highest circles, as well as the lowest, who wish us God speed, and admit that a great work is being accomplished under the Divine blessing, by the instrumentality of total abstinence. I had intended to have enlarged somewhat upon the point to which you have called our attention—the various religious meetings which have been held during the past month. I confess I was grieved to hear those societies so nobly advocated without a single speaker daring to lift his voice and say, “make the people teetotalers, and then our object will be gained.”—(Applause.) As an illustration, I may mention the case of a gentleman intimately connected with Her Majesty the Queen Dowager’s household, who himself said at a public meeting in Somersetshire, and told me the same in private, “I have been examining my wine-merchant’s and brewer’s bills for the last three years, and I find that on the average I have spent £35 a year in intoxicating liquors, which I think have done more harm than good. Having now given up the use of them, I give £5 a year more to the Church Missionary cause, £5 to the Jewish cause, £5 to the Tract Society, and the remainder to the poor of my parish.”—(Hear, hear.) If every one would “go and do likewise,” we should not hear about a paltry three millions a year to religious societies, when we know that nearly a hundred millions annually are spent in doing injury to the bodies, and indirectly, to the souls of Britons.—(Applause.) I am sure teetotalism is now prevailing to some extent in the higher classes of society; and I am quite certain if we visit Lord Ashley in a right spirit, that he will receive us as a Christian gentleman, and listen to our arguments; and who knows the result? And I now ask for your prayers on this mission, for if we can convince that excellent philanthropist, his Lordship’s influence is so great that it will be a noble day for teetotalism in our happy land. I had intended to argue this question in a medical, moral, and religious point of view, but as there are so many speakers on the platform—a circumstance of which I was not aware when I was requested to take part in the proceedings—there will be no necessity whatever for this; I will therefore, by your permission, occupy the remainder of the time allotted me, in answering some few objections to this noble cause, and for this I have a peculiar reason, which I did not know when I entered this Hall. One objection brought against us is, that teetotalers put this system in the place of the gospel. Now, sir, there never was a fouler libel uttered than that.—(Applause.) Some years ago I met a rural Dean in Somersetshire, who said to me, “Mr. Robinson, I admit that you have answered every objection to your society but one, but you cannot answer that”—alluding to the object to which I have referred.

“My dear friend,” I said, “it either is true, or it is not; if it be not true, you must admit that it is a libel: and if it be true, I ask you whether you and I, who, through rich grace, know something of a Saviour’s love, should not come forward and teach them better?” And what was his reply? “I am very glad you are the president of the ‘Yeovil Total Abstinence Society.’” This admitted all that I wished him to admit—that he could not answer the fact. If we wanted further proof of the injustice of this objection, we might have it from the records of the National Temperance Society. Our own report entirely repudiates the idea that we ever thought for one moment of putting this noble cause, great as it is, in the place of the gospel of Christ. Teetotalism is a physical remedy for a physical disease. Now if I had to preach at St. Luke’s, where poor creatures are confined who are bereft of reason, my desire would be “First make them sane, and then give them the Gospel.” Thus teetotalism is for the temporal, and, as a pioneer, for the spiritual welfare of our fallen race. By nature every man is dead in trespasses and sins, but the drunkard is worse than dead, because he cannot listen to the sound of that blessed gospel, which is able to make him wise unto salvation. Teetotalism unstops the avenue; and while a drunkard, as such, cannot listen to the truths of religion, total abstinence will make him sober, and then, like others he can listen to the gospel of Christ.—(Hear.) Thus, if I may use a scripture term, teetotalism is a kind of John the Baptist to Emanuel, a pioneer to the glorious gospel of the ever blessed God. Our friend observed, that if only one individual had been converted, it would be worth all the labours of the Society. Now, I rejoice to be able to mention the case of a blaspheming, infidel sailor, who attended a Yeovil Temperance Meeting. From that time he became first a sober man, and then a powerful advocate of our cause; and in the course of a few months he requested me to purchase him a large copy of God’s word for his family that he might have reading and family prayer, morning and evening; and I rejoice now to believe him to be a faithful brother in Christ. That man’s name is John Perry; he is known to some on the platform, and especially to our old and valued friend, whom we shall hear presently, Thomas Whittaker.—(Hear.) Another objection which has been brought against us, is taken from God’s word. “How,” it is asked, “do you answer Paul’s advice to Timothy—‘No longer take water, but a little wine for thy stomach’s sake, and thine infirmities!’” Why, it answers itself. Even admitting that the wine recommended was the same as the wine of the present day (which I do not) Timothy was only to take a little, and when he was ill. We do not object to a little being taken medicinally, but we see no sanction to men meeting around the social board, and taking wine as a beverage. Another objection is urged by those who are called “high-churchmen.” They say, “we cannot join your Society on account of the various denominations of dissenters connected with it.” Now as a minister of the Church of England, I confess to you that my feeling is one of peculiar joy to meet my dissenting brethren in such a cause.—(Loud applause.) Ever since I knew a Saviour’s love, my feeling has been, “Grace be with all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.”—(Applause.) Now, suppose I see a fire in Piccadilly, and a number of dissenters are running to put out the flames; should I stop them and say, “You are not members of the Church of England.” But oh! there is an infinitely worse fire burning in hell, which can only be quenched by the blood of Jesus. Shall we then say to our Nonconformist brethren, "Stand off!" No, we will embrace them with the arms of love, and say, "Although you have one peculiar captain for your regiment, and we another; although you wear one uniform, and we another, we are all fighting under the Great Captain of our salvation, and by his grace we shall be more than conquerors."—(Loud applause.) Again, it is asked us, "How do you reply to Christ's miracle in Cana in Galilee, that of turning water into wine?" Now, I would have it understood that I firmly believe every word in the Holy Bible to be of essential use; and I wish that men would notice every word in this incomparably holy volume, and then they would not bring such an objection against us. Now, you will remember that it is written, "Fill the water-pots with water, and they filled them up to the brim." Now, there was a reason for that command. Will you imagine with your mind's eye that you see six water-pots with water in them on this platform. Could you see the water in them unless they were filled to the brim? The fact of their being filled then was that the congregation around might see what was in them. Now I wish to show you that instead of our Saviour turning all this water into wine, he only converted one goblet full of that water. Infidelity might at first triumph, and say that the miracle might have been accomplished, but that it was only by putting a little colouring matter in the water, which might very well deceive a set of drunken men in the room; and thus that the miracle was all a hoax. But this could not be said on my explanation. While they drew out a goblet full for the Governor of the feast, the people saw that at the top of the water-pots was water, but that wine came out underneath. This was the miracle; we have nothing to show that all the water was turned into wine; but only that which was drawn out underneath. The Rev. Speaker concluded his address by reading the following children's pledge, which he hoped would be extensively read and signed by the juvenile portion of the community:—

" This little band
Do with our hand,
The Pledge now sign
To drink no wine;
Nor brandy red,
To turn our head;
Nor crazy gin,
To tempt to sin;
Nor whiskey hot,
That makes the sot;
Nor filthy beer,
To make us queer;
Nor fiery rum,
To turn our home
Into a hell
Where none can dwell,
Where peace would fly,
Where hope would die,
And love expire,
'Mid such a fire.

So here we PLEDGE perpetual hate
To all that can intoxicate."—(Loud applause.)

JOSIAH HUNT, Esq., seconded the resolution. He said:—It being understood that on such occasions as these, it is well to have various classes of the community represented, I was induced to leave my home, and present myself here to express my full concurrence in the resolution you have heard read. I consider that intemperance is indeed a most fearful and costly thing to this country. I am bound to arrive at the conclusion that, taking man as we find him, so long as intoxicating drinks are used in this country, so long shall we have a large amount of intemperance; and, consequently, that if we wish to get rid of it, we must get rid first of all intoxicating beverages. I, as a farmer, have ceased to drink them for about fourteen years—(applause,) and for nearly ten years I have conducted my business without having any upon my premises, or supplying them to my workmen in any shape. And here let me say a word to some of my temperance friends. I find many who wish us God-speed, and occasionally subscribe to our Society, whose practice does not go to the extent that mine does. My belief is, that we cannot ask our servants, our neighbours, and friends to leave off drinking intoxicating liquors, unless we entirely give up the practice ourselves. And I confess I do see a manifest incongruity in our subscribing to the temperance cause, and advocating it before others, and yet putting the temptations of wine or beer before our servants and friends. Our ground is this: We believe that the drinking road of our country, call it the moderate drinking road if you will, is a dangerous road; and that the teetotal road is a safe one. We point to the dangerous road on every hand; we see it by the slipping of many who were once steady, by the fall of those whose loss we deplore; we see ruined families, beggared children, widowed mothers, with troubles, and anxieties, and wretchedness of all kinds: in the other road we see the reverse; we see wretchedness giving way to joy and peace, we see an alteration in pecuniary circumstances, and an improvement in every way. Seeing these results then, I ask our temperance friends, if we can with any degree of consistency, support in any way the travelling by the road of drunkenness? I feel strongly on this point, because I think with my excellent friend, Samuel Bowly, that the great opposition we have to contend against is the example set by our respectable and moderate drinking friends. Turning to country matters, my opinion is that it is perfectly useless for Lord Ashley or any one else to attempt an improvement in the agricultural population, until they have altered their practices as regards the use of intoxicating drinks. We may exclaim as we will about union-houses and poor-laws, you may rely upon it, as the observation of one who has given more than twenty years' close attention to the subject, that so long as the drinking habits of the people prevail, so long your workhouses will be filled—so long you will have a pauper and a wretched population. I speak this from my own observation and experience; I have seen children taken from union workhouses by teetotal relatives, and supported out of the savings derived from total abstinence. The farmers say, however, that the land cannot be cultivated, and business be properly carried on, without giving the labourers these drinks. To all such assertions my own experience is a complete answer. My labourers perform every kind of work, during every season of the year; in summer's heat and in winter's cold, I see them more equal to their work, as well as improved in morals by the discontinuance of their drinking practices. As regards the cultivation of the land, I have always considered the question about what is to become of the apples and the barley a much simpler one than people imagine. The question lies in a nut-shell. Those who contend for the use of these drinks advise the people of this country to drink apples and to drink barley, and we advise them to eat them.—(Applause.) And surely the latter is as rational as the former. Whilst I do not wish to interfere with the practice of any man, as regards the cultivation of the land, I maintain—and am prepared to meet any brother farmer on the point—that it is not essential to the good cultivation of the soil of this kingdom, that barley should be grown at all.—(Hear.) It has been grown and sold because the people have demanded it; and lately we have taken to grow chicory very extensively for you, and have found it very profitable.—(laughter.)—but as soon as you grow wise enough not to drink chicory with your coffee, the demand will slacken, and we shall take care to grow something else. The farmer, if an intelligent man, is as much a tradesman as the commercial man; he is obliged to study the wants, and habits, and feelings of the age, and adapt his articles accordingly. Up to the present time, the growing of spring-wheat, as it is called, is largely taking place of the cultivation of barley. I could have enlarged upon the subject, but I will now sit down, merely mentioning the way in which the subject often presents itself to my notice. I confess I often look at it in a consolatory point of view. In the human family there is a large amount of wretchedness, and comparatively but a small portion of happiness; and the former is much increased by the use of intoxicating drinks. Now if by anything I can say or do, I can be the means of taking the smallest portion from the heap of human wretchedness, and adding it to that of human happiness, I shall indeed have gained a point, and secured the object I have in view.—(Loud applause.)

Dr. LOVELL, in supporting the resolution, said:—There is one portion of this resolution which speaks of the costly, degrading, and ruinous evils with which society is afflicted. I can say advisedly, in the presence of several medical men, and after a large amount of experience, that three-fourths of the disease incident to humanity, is occasioned by the use of intoxicating drinks. I have no hesitation in saying, taking a retrospective view of an extensive practice of nearly thirty years, that in the case of every family afflicted with insanity, I could fairly trace the effects of this malady to the use of intoxicating liquors. The same might be said in many cases of disease of the heart, which have been very frequently taken for apoplexy. Until the teetotalers called the attention of the medical profession to the fact, a great number of cases were called apoplexy, which were no other than diseases of the heart, caused by the use of stimulating drinks. You must bear in mind that the heart is a muscle, and like every other muscle, is affected by any extra exertion to action. It has, you will remember, a very fine valve, called the mitral valve, as fine as a spider's web, which is of essential service in preventing too great a flow of blood through the heart; and this membrane, by the increased action, occasioned by the use of stimulating drinks, becomes, in time, ossified. This, I hope, will convince you that intoxicating drinks, instead of being of service to you, are injurious. It is impossible for you to take any portion of these drinks, without suffering some injury in proportion to the quantity you take. Last summer, I visited the gaol at Gloucester, with a county magistrate with whom I was residing; I had permission to speak to nearly the whole of the inmates, and every one who answered my queries told me that intemperance was the commencement of his crime. I visited also, some time since, the gaol at Bury St. Edmunds, in company with a medical gentleman, and all the inmates there told us that their crime also originated in drinking. We cannot be surprised at the immense sums of money expended in the punishment of crime, when we think of the number of inmates of the gaols of our country. Fifty millions of money, we are told, are spent in the punishment of criminals, and fifty millions also are worse than wasted, by being spent in intoxicating liquors. I could say much more on this subject, but that I may not prevent others from addressing you, I will sit down with expressing simply my cordial concurrence in the resolution.—(Applause.) The resolution was then put to the meeting and unanimously adopted.

The Rev. JOHN KENNEDY of Stepney proposed—

He said—When I came here, it was with the intention certainly of saying something, but I found that first the chairman, and then another and another of the speakers ran away piece-meal with every thing I had thought of; and, to crown the difficulty of my position, I had put into my hands a resolution which had scarcely any connexion whatever with a single thought I had in my mind before entering the hall: you will see at once that it brings me on delicate ground, for it has been my lot, for some ten years, to stand between two fires—the fire of teetotalers who went, in some points, rather further than myself, and that of people who thought I was perfectly extreme and rabid on the question. While in company with my brethren of the cloth, I have not spared argument, nor perhaps strength of feeling in appealing to them on the subject of temperance; and while, on the other hand, in the company of red-hot teetotalers, I have felt it my duty sometimes to use that favourite beverage of ours—cold water—and endeavour to keep them within bounds. I think much good may be the result of taking a medium course—not that I think that any thing short of the most complete total abstinence will effect the great cure that we design and desire to effect.—(Applause.) I have preached this from the pulpit and the press everywhere, yet I have had to differ with some who, in appealing to Christian men on the subject, have maintained that the tasting of intoxicating drinks is per se, in all circumstances, and irrespective of consequences, a sin. I have never myself arrived at that conviction.—(Disapprobation.) This resolution brings me to the question as to how we can remove the difficulties of religious men in reference to this matter. Having stated what I conceive is not the best way, let me state what I believe is the best method. You should place before religious men such facts as are now patent to the public—such as have been laid before us in Mr. Beggs's little volume, and in its twin volume by Mr. Worsley—and you will reach their understandings and their hearts more readily, than in any other way. Add to this the great argument of the apostle Paul, who would not drink wine or eat flesh, so long as he thereby made his brother offend or commit sin. The great doctrine of christian expediency should be adopted; and by christian expediency I do not mean that trimming thing often so called; it is a great law, a great gospel ordinance, which I take to be this, that I am bound under certain circumstances, and in consideration of certain consequences, to abstain from things which, in themselves, and under other circumstances, I might consider perfectly lawful; and I do not refer to eating and drinking only, but to the general course of a Christian's conduct. In other words, if I would obey the law of the Apostle Paul, "Be not conformed to this world," every thing which I regard as doubtful I must put on the side of the world, and if from that thing I, as a Christian man must abstain.—(Hear, hear.) This, I take it, is the best ground on which to appeal, when addressing Christian men on this subject. The question before the meeting in this resolution is, how to bring a larger amount of direct religious influence to bear on the total-abstinence movement. Nothing has delighted me more than to observe the spirit in which this cause has been advocated to-night by every speaker. My conviction is deep and strong that it must be the religious principle, that, in the end, will work out the great good we desire to effect. Our office has been designated as that of pioneers—John the Baptist going before the way of the Lord; and I believe that in ten thousand cases, the truth of God will not find access to men, except the way is pioneered by the total abstinence movement. You, sir, have assumed a noble mission to-night. You say, you do not like to speak behind men's backs. Now, sir, it happens that I spoke before Lord Ashley's face almost the very thing that you spoke to-night in his absence. I am an earnest supporter of Ragged-schools, and I am sure there is not one in this room whose heart does not beat with the warmest sympathy in support of these institutions.—(Applause.) But I have never been on a Ragged-school platform without being constrained to ask myself, "Whence come these rags?" and at the last Ragged-school meeting I attended, I ventured to state my long cherished conviction that something was needed to prevent people from falling into the wretched condition, from which Ragged-schools were designed to raise them. So strong is my feeling on this matter that, I think, that instead of the Temperance Society's Meeting being the last in the season, it should have been the first,—(applause),—so that at the subsequent meetings, the speakers might have something to think and speak of. We should have our flag up first, to tell our friends engaged in other causes—and we are engaged in them as earnestly as ourselves—that after all there is a great obstacle in the way of their success, that their voice of triumph is checked and drowned by the consideration that the car of intemperance is murdering its thousands upon thousands throughout the country, while they are endeavouring to benefit their tens and their hundreds. Let us then, in a Christian spirit, and in a conciliatory tone, at the same time with the most dogged and earnest perseverance, press on the understandings and consciences of Christian men, the real claims of this great question; and, like other questions of a like nature, it will surely triumph; its triumph, too, will be of a joyous character, and will make us all feel that we are not blaspheming, but honouring God, when we offer to him all the praise.—(Loud applause.)

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., in seconding the resolution, said:—It has been my great pleasure and honour to advocate the cause for which we are now met for fourteen or fifteen years,—(hear),—during which time I have not had occasion to take a single drop of alcoholic drink. I do not say that total abstinence will always rescue a man from sickness, but I do firmly believe that there is no occasion why any man should take intoxicating beverages. Our object is to rescue our common humanity from a great mass of the suffering which it is now enduring. Do we see poverty stalking abroad in misery and wretchedness? We believe we have a remedy for this terrible evil. Do we see sickness prevailing, and our hospitals filled? We think we see in temperance principles a remedy for this. Do we see men lost to all principle, and sunk in degradation? We think we have, to a considerable extent, a remedy for this in our hands. And we are borne out in these assertions by good authorities. Our judges tell us that nine-tenths of the crime perpetrated in the country is occasioned by the use of intoxicating beverages; and a medical gentleman has told us this evening, that most of our bodily diseases come from the same cause. If you ask those who have the charge of our paupers, they will tell you that pauperism is occasioned by drunkenness. How strange is it that in a country like ours, enjoying an excellent constitution, with every advantage that literature and science can afford, and with so high a degree of civilization, there should be so radical an evil constantly pressing the people downwards! If we could only get the people teetotalers, we should have vanquished the great mass of evil.—(Applause.) But it is not one or two, or a dozen people on this platform that can convince the world of the magnitude of this evil; the work rests upon your own shoulders; and especially upon you, the females of the country, does a great portion of the work rest—you who can appeal to the human heart, and tell of the misery and woe which have been brought upon mankind by intoxicating drinks—you who can, in the confidence of love and affection, describe the happy enjoyment that results from the disuse of these beverages—you who can speak to your neighbours on the right and on the left, and tell them of the excellency of the principle we have adopted—it is you who must carry out this great work. Some people think we go to too great an extreme in totally abstaining; but, if people drank nothing but water, could we see a man intoxicated? And let me ask, is there any one who has tried the total abstinence plan, who will say that alcoholic beverages have done him any good? Millions protest against them, and say they never have benefited them. After mentioning the case of a clergyman, who was induced to give up total abstinence during a period of sickness, but who, on afterwards resuming it, declared that he found no benefit from his stimulating drinks, the speaker alluded to the statement of Mr. Hunt, as to his plan of giving no beer or wine to his labourers. I have also had (he said) domestic servants and labourers employed under similar circumstances, and not only have they done their work as well, but better than when they partook of stimulating drinks.—(Applause.) If this be a fact, how deep is the folly of continuing to use as common beverages those things which are so injurious to mankind! Something has been said as to Scripture authority in these matters. Now the Scriptures are given us to teach certain great and good principles, which we are to apply to our conduct, and which will at last carry us to Jordan. One of these principles is, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; if thine hand offend thee, cut it off." What does this mean? That if you are fond of alcoholic beverages, and find that they destroy your happiness, as well as that of your family, and increase the poverty of your country, you must abstain from them—"cut it off." Tell every clergyman that if these beverages offend against the moral goodness of God, against his holiness and righteousness, and against the phy-

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

The report of the Annual Meeting occupies so much of our space, that we are compelled to ask the indulgence of our correspondents. Many communications, already in type, are necessarily delayed.

“MICKANARY NO DRINK RUM.”

Upon the return of an American squadron from the Pacific Ocean, a few years ago, two boys, of the Sandwich Islands, were brought to this country, at the solicitation of their parents and friends, to be educated and instructed in Christianity. The faithful missionaries who had visited these islanders, had, in addition to the first principles of our holy religion, impregnated the unsophisticated minds of these children of nature, with such an abhorrence of the consequences of rum-drinking, as to fix the idea firmly in their minds, of the utter incompatibility of rum-drinking with the character of a Christian ministry. Upon their arrival at Norfolk, Virginia, they were taken by a citizen of that place, of well-known hospitality, under his own roof, where they were treated with the utmost kindness, which they repaid by a simple hearted cheerfulness, which fascinated their host. During their stay with him, he was visited by a minister of the gospel, whom he introduced to the boys, using their own vitiated pronunciation of the English language — as a “mickanary.” The boys, accustomed to associate with the idea of a “mickanary” all that was lovely, pure, and of good report, were manifestly awestruck at finding themselves in the presence of so high a dignitary, and, withdrawing to a respectful distance, seated themselves in a remote part of the room, eyeing, with interest, the august character before them. This unwonted reserve soon attracted the attention of their kind friend and entertainer, and various means were used to draw them out—but in vain—until the jolly host prevailed upon the no less jolly parson, to take a drink of the excellent “Jamaica,” which was always kept ready on the sideboard. The drink was no sooner taken, than the spell which had hitherto bound the boys in breathless silence, and fearful reserve, was dissolved, and springing up from their seats, they walked through the apartment with the utmost freedom and ease, audibly and scornfully exclaiming “He no mickanary; mickanary no drink rum.” — New York Observer.

MRS. HARDWICK.

We understand that this valuable Temperance Advocate (wife of the Rev. William Hardwick) whose labours in Yorkshire have recently been crowned with such pleasing success, is about to pass through the metropolis. Societies desirous of securing her services can communicate by letter with Mr. T. B. Smithies, 7, Baches Terrace, Brunswick-place, City-road.

sical good of mankind, they must "cut it off," and tell their congregations to do the same.—(Applause.) There are institutions connected with our religious bodies, which have the seed in them of future greatness and benefit to mankind—I mean Sunday-schools.—(Hear.) Now if Sunday-school teachers become total abstainers, and teach their pupils to become so, you will have a generation of teetotalers, who will soon spread over the whole world. In Manchester, I am happy to say, a delightful change is taking place, owing to the Sunday-schools taking this matter up; and I earnestly hope their example will be followed in our great metropolis, and in every town in the kingdom.—(Applause.)

The Rev. Dr. Burns said, in supporting the resolution:—It has been my great privilege and pleasure for many years to attend the anniversary meeting of the Temperance Society in this place, but I have never attended a more interesting or a more crowded one than the present; I have never seen so great an array of talent—ministerial and otherwise—upon the platform, as I see around me now; and I very much rejoice that we have such a thorough-going practical teetotaler presiding over us.—(Applause.) I think too that the report read this evening, will compare with any previous report read from this platform. We have had a most admirable Christian speech from our reverend brother (the Rev. Mr. Robinson), full of Christian Catholicity, and worthy of the day in which an attempt is made to lessen Sectarianism and promote Christian unity; and then, if our worthy friend, Mr. Hunt, had come to the meeting for no other purpose than to show himself as a good specimen of teetotalism, his journey could not possibly have been in vain.—(Laughter and applause.) But he also gave us a good speech. Then we had the testimony of a medical man as to the serious evils of drinking. The resolution was then put and carried. I don't know whether the meeting is aware of it or not, but that resolution contained a "pledge." We pledge ourselves, in carrying it, to sustain the operations of the Temperance Society.—(Loud applause.) Afterwards we had an honest, independent, and excellent speech from my worthy ministerial brother. It is possible that some present may not sympathize with the whole of it, but at any rate you will agree that all teetotalers ought to have a free expression of their conscientious opinion.—(Hear.) I hope, however, the speech will not be misunderstood. Some might suppose that our brother meant to say that persons might at all times, and under all circumstances, use intoxicating drinks moderately; he merely meant, I think, that, in his opinion, the taking of intoxicating drinks might not, under some circumstances, in itself be sinful. But there are, I think, occasions when it becomes the obvious duty of every one to stand out boldly for our principles. If I see a person falling into the water, is it not my duty to save him? If I see a creature perishing, and do not use the means I have to save him, do I not commit sin? Now let me ask solemnly, can we suppose that there is any Christian minister in London, who does not know that he is surrounded by drunkards who are perishing!—(Loud applause.) Can he read the daily papers without seeing that men are perishing, bodily, mentally, eternally, through strong drink? I have yet to learn then by what argument indifference, much less opposition, can be maintained. But I see the most startling anomalies around me. I find a learned minister, for whom I have a most profound respect, writing the best volume, perhaps, ever published on prostitution, and yet an anti-teetotaler. I am utterly confounded.—(Applause.) Who does not know that nearly all the misery and profligacy of that kind is the result of drinking. The resolution, I find, assumes that something has been done by the Christian Church. We want, it says, a larger amount of religious influence: then we have some! Yes, some in the Wesleyan body, some in the Church of England, and I am not aware that there is any Christian body where we have not some influence. I think the Church is in a false position, if it is indifferent, or opposed to us. We should not only labour to have temperance societies in different congregations, but every church should be a temperance society.—(Loud applause.) We are recommended to bring the subject affectionately before Christian ministers. Let us do this fairly and honourably. I think we have made a great mistake in not sending to all the clergy in London cards of invitation to attend the meeting.—(Applause.) One reason why they are not convinced, is because they are not here to be convinced. There are thousands of hearts beating in sympathy with human suffering, who, if they were only here, would be made to feel deeply on the question. I am glad a suggestion has been made to wait on Lord Ashley. As has been properly said, we should need no Ragged-schools, if all persons were teetotalers. I should like Lord Ashley to ascertain how many teetotal children are in the London Ragged-schools.—(Applause.) I think I ought to state here a pleasing fact, that Lord Ashley has subscribed already to the funds of this Society. I think that augurs well for the cordial reception of the chairman and those who accompany him. We must now press the matter upon the church, and show it that it must come to our help, or stand publicly before God and man rebuked.—(Applause.) But we must do something ourselves. I believe we have as much reason to complain of our own apathy as of indifference from without. To-night we are to set an example to the nation of how much the temperance cause demands from us. Remarks have been made as to the fewness of our great metropolitan meetings. It has been said, that we ought to have a meeting in this place every month: and I think so too—but we cannot have meetings without money. A few months ago one of our best public meetings was held here; the people were positively electrified; I saw some with their mouths open for a quarter of an hour together, but when the collection came, what was the result? The people were so completely charmed and carried away from earthly things by the sublimity of the eloquence that they forgot to give.—(Laughter.) Now don't let us fall into that mistake this evening. If my speech has no other tendency, I hope it will have the effect of bringing you from the transcendental to the palpable—to terra firma. I want to have a splendid collection. The collections made this year in this hall have been greater than on former occasions; and I want teetotalers to show that they are as alive to their cause as other people are to theirs. And I trust that the surplus of the collection will be applied to the getting up of efficient meetings in the metropolis. Let the collection this evening be worthy of the gathering. There are upon the platform nearly a thousand persons—some one says more.—Now, we ought to have £150 from them. In the body of the hall we have at least 2500 persons; and two persons and a half in the hall are any day worth as much as one man on the platform; so that we ought to have £150 more from them, £300 has often been raised for very inferior purposes. Now, one word more. We want a sober world; we must have a sober world before we can have an enlightened one; we must have an enlightened world before we can have a converted one; and we must have a converted world before we can have a millenium. Therefore, I consider the temperance cause intimately connected with the physical and moral interests of men. The resolution I am supporting is emphatically a religious one. Now, I have a great respect for, and a firm belief in, the great doctrines of our religion; I ought to have a profound respect for everything that is devotional, for everything connected with experimental religion; but I want to have the evidence of both in practical religion. If the practical be wanted, I believe the doctrinal and experimental are worth nothing; they are the mere shadow; I want the substance. I believe, however, that under God, the total abstinence movement is calculated to bring into operation a great amount of humanity, benevolence, and self-denial, which form the three great elements of practical religion.—(Applause.) The resolution having been unanimously adopted.

BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., a magistrate, moved the third resolution:—

“That this meeting, affected with the extent and increase of juvenile depravity (as recently developed in the prize essays on that subject,) and deeply convinced that all efforts to arrest its progress will be inefficient while the drinking customs prevail, affectionately urges a consideration of temperance principles upon the superintendents, teachers, and committees of Sunday and Day-schools, Ragged-schools, and all other Institutions that seek to instruct youthful minds, and to surround virtue and simplicity with such safeguards as benevolence must desire, and prudence can suggest.”

It was, he said, to the depraved juvenile portion of the community, that by far the greater portion of the crime committed in the country was to be attributed. And to what could we attribute the depravity of our juvenile population, but to the drinking-customs of the country? He was often asked the question at meetings where, if he were to give the only answer that ought to be given, he would be scouted from the platform, and where it would be thought that he was taking particular views that were not justified by the facts of the case. As to the prize essays alluded to in the resolution, he thought they had reason to be deeply thankful to their respected friend Mr. Eaton, of Bristol, for having so ingeniously devised them. He doubted not that if Mr. Worsley's Essay had been an essay on teetotalism, it would have been used by those who drank and smoked for lighting their pipes, but its present attractive title had secured the attention of philanthropists generally. To his own knowledge it had converted many to teetotalism, who scorned it before. Mr. Beggs's book was somewhat different; the teetotaler peeped out in every page, and this showed how intimately connected with crime were the drinking customs of society. Still he could forgive all classes of society but one or two, for not joining in the temperance movement. There was one class with whom he was inclined to be more severe than the rest—the class to which he himself belonged. He knew not how county justices and city magistrates could sit day after day, and commit so many drunken fellows for that crime which they had never put out their hand to prevent.—(Loud applause.) He found it difficult, too, to excuse clergymen in this matter—whose duty it was to set an example to those over whom they were placed. The speaker here narrated the case of a lad whom he had seen in prison, whither he was brought, owing, chiefly, to the drunken habits of his parents. Seeing that the lad was disposed to amend he gave him the temperance pledge, and a situation was procured for him after he left prison; owing, however, to the interference of a policeman, the lad lost his place, but by the interposition of the speaker, to whom he appealed a few days ago with the pledge in his hand, he regained it. This lad, he said, was a London thief, of whom it had been said by an individual, whose feelings he envied not, that it was impossible to amend him.

J. SILK BUCKINGHAM, Esq., seconded the resolution. He said: he subscribed entirely to the doctrine laid down by the previous speaker respecting juvenile depravity. The subject had occupied his attention for more than twenty years, and the longer he lived the more he was convinced of the ravages committed by the drinking system every year, and the more he lamented that he was able to do so little for the temperance cause compared with what he should be glad to do, if the means were within his reach. Having said thus much, he might be permitted to make an announcement which he hoped would be received with favour, as intimately connected with this subject. He was not deterred from stating it from the fear of being thought visionary, for he had found that in some dozen instances, at least, where he had put forward projects, they had been at first denounced as utopian, but had been ultimately deemed worthy of adoption. Of late years he had been impressed with the various efforts made to better the condition of society, as shown in the establishment of model lodging-houses for the poor, Ragged-schools, societies for the improvement of prison discipline, &c.; now he desired to see a union of all these scattered elements in the erection of a model town; the architecture to be such as would admit of the adoption of every improvement in ventilation, drainage, sewerage, and the like; and, in order to ensure the morality and prosperity of the town, he should wish it to be inhabited by teetotalers.—(Hear.) The calculation he had made embraced a plan of a town a mile square, to be accompanied by the rental or purchase of 5000 or 10,000 acres of land. Now the new forest belonging to the crown contained 60,000 acres, and £16,000 a year were expended on it. They could afford to pay £10,000 a year for what they wanted; and that would be something in the pocket of the nation. If such a town, containing 10,000 inhabitants, could be erected, into which alcohol in any shape, gunpowder in any form, and tobacco in any quantity could not find admission, connected, of course, with proper municipal establishments, such a town might be pointed to as a triumphant proof of the truth of temperance principles. He had calculated that it would cost about £3,000,000, to build the town, and £1,000,000 to stock it: and that 25 per cent profit might be made on the capital invested in it. He had a volume preparing on this subject, containing a plan of the town, in which he had been assisted by the talented and promising architect, Mr. James Bell, which would appear in July.—(Hear.)

Dr. BURNS mentioned that there was a town answering the description given by Mr. Buckingham, in the United States, containing a population of 3000 or 4000, in which there was a university with about 600 students, and where no alcoholic fluid was admitted; the whole community, too, being thoroughly imbued with peace and anti-slavery principles.

JOSEPH STURGE, Esq., of Birmingham, in supporting the resolution, urged the utility of teetotal pleasure trips, especially for the young people, as being something to which they could look forward, and as forming an inducement to many to sign the pledge. Though some, he had no doubt, might break it afterwards, many would keep it, who never would have become abstainers but from that circumstance. Everything was certainly liable to abuse, but nothing seemed to delight the young people so much as a railway trip; and this could be readily secured now that railway companies were becoming so liberal. Next month an opportunity would be afforded them of going eighty miles and back again for 9d.—(Hear.) The resolution was then put and unanimously agreed to.

On the motion of W. JANSON, Esq., seconded by J. MEREDITH, Esq., a deputation was appointed to wait upon Lord Ashley, to request that the careful consideration of that nobleman be given to the temperance question, and its bearing upon the alleviation and civilization of the human race.

The REV. MR. FRENCH (from Bombay) then proposed—

“That this meeting rejoices in the general efforts now making to bring under the attention of both Houses of Parliament the growing evils of the Beer-shop Act; and indulges the hope, that an entire repeal of that law may be secured as early as possible.”

He said—I have come from a dark land—and one which is growing darker not only from idolatry, but from the sins of christians. The vices of this nation are growing there. You have carried ardent spirits to the dark land of India, and I would now call upon you to counteract, as far as may be, that sad influence, and to send thither temperance principles. How can this be done? You must be teetotalers yourselves, and then your example, and the example of those who go to that land, will be felt, as it is now in an opposite way. I am sorry to say, that intemperance prevails sadly in Bombay and the vicinity; shops where ardent spirits are sold, and other things of a like ruinous nature, are to be seen in the streets. The venerable Archdeacon there, and a few friends associated with him, have done much good; but what can they effect, unaided by others? I have seen it stated, that the Portuguese, in establishing a new town, first erect a church, the French a fort, and the English a grog-shop.—(Laughter.) I do not say whether this is true or false, but, as far as my own observation goes, it seems to be a fact with respect to Bombay. But it is a sad fact.—(Applause.) I am from America where the cause of teetotalism has prevailed more perhaps than in any other country. I have seen it stated in some of the papers that in the state of Massachusetts very few alcoholic liquors can be obtained, and that the people there have legislated upon the subject.—(Hear.) For myself I have been twenty-two years a total abstainer.—(Hear.) Not by any compulsion, not by having the pledge presented to me, but from my strong personal conviction of the evil effects resulting from the use of ardent spirits.—(Applause.)

MR. THOMAS WHITTAKER seconded the resolution in a humorous and eloquent speech, of which our space only leaves us room for an abstract. Did you ever, he asked, know a beer-shop that did you any good? Did you ever know a poor working man's wife on a Saturday night go down upon her knees, and thank God for the beer-shop? Did you ever know a poor family get up on Sunday morning, and rejoice that their father had been at a beer-shop? I have known many women, who have gone down on their knees, and thanked God for teetotalism. I have known many children rise on the Sunday morning, and go to school with glad hearts, because their fathers were teetotalers. Sometime ago, a law was passed to shut up public-houses till one o'clock on Sundays. Are you aware that any accident has happened to anybody in consequence?—(Laughter.) Any life sacrificed? Any shop set fire to? Any ship lost? Has it been necessary to increase the police force, or to enlarge our jails? “Half a loaf is better than no bread?” We are very thankful for the half-loaf; but suppose we have the whole!—(Loud applause.) Did you ever know a beer-shop do any good to those who kept it? A few months ago, while sitting by my father's fire-side in Kendal, he counted up forty public-houses and beer-shops there, and he mentioned from memory forty-three men who had died in them within the last seven years! We don't say that people will not die under teetotalism, but they will not die in such multitudes, and in such sin and disgrace. The speaker, after adverting to the injustice of allowing beer-shops to exist, so long as they were a manifest public nuisance, mentioned that a missionary meeting was held a short time since in Exeter Hall, at which an extensive brewer presided; and the first speaker at the meeting was a man who got to the House of Commons on a very large beer-barrel. He had no hesitation in saying, that that chairman presided over a brewery that had demoralized and destroyed as many souls as all the missionaries connected with his Society had ever saved.—(Applause.) Seeing the iniquity and inconsistency which prevailed, was it not their duty as teetotalers to endeavour by every lawful means to put it down? He trusted the resolution would meet with unanimous support. If the objects they had in view were to be accomplished, it could only be by general sympathy and co-operation. They must sign a petition to the legislature on the subject, and multiply their meetings, so as to enlighten the public mind. It was a disgrace to London that they had not more meetings, and of a better description. On the way they went to work in this matter, depended half the battle. He earnestly hoped that their endeavours would end in the shutting up of the beer-shops; then might they hope the nation would be sober, and the people have enough and to spare.—(Applause.) The resolution was then put, and declared to be unanimously carried. A man, however, in the centre of the hall urged that such was not the fact; and on the resolution being put a second time, one hand only was held up against it. The chairman declared the resolution carried, adding: “Let that be told in the House of Commons; one hand was held up for the beer-shop.”—(Laughter and Applause.)

The REV. B. PARSONS of Ebley, in proposing a vote of thanks to the chairman, said that some remarks had been made during the evening just the opposite of what he had stated in “Anti-Bacchus.” He confessed that he felt a little pugnacious at the time. A gentleman had stated that there was no harm in intoxicating drinks by themselves, without any attendant circumstances. Now it seemed to him that we could commit no sin, if we separated it from circumstances.—(Applause.) We might say it was a sin for a man to commit suicide; but it would be no sin for a man to cut his throat, but for the circumstance that it killed him. Take away the circumstances, take away the God in heaven, take away our relations to our fellow-creatures, and we could find sin nowhere. Talk of circumstances! Why we had ten thousand thousand circumstances compelling every one of us to denounce, and abstain from, the use of intoxicating beverages. He had been requested by one of the coal-whippers to state that before the Act of Parliament was passed compelling them to go to the regular office on the arrival of vessels, they were obliged to go to public-houses, where they were made drunkards; but that since the passing of the Act, some hundreds of them had become teetotallers. The publicans, finding themselves losers, were endeavouring to revive the former custom, and prevent a renewal of the Act, which would soon expire. He hoped that all teetotallers would keep their eye upon the Act, and be resolved that this valuable body of men should never again be exposed to the temptations of former years.—(Applause.)

HENRY CLAPP, Esq., in seconding the resolution, contended that the temperance question was not a theological one. The time had gone by when it was considered a matter of speculation: he remembered when the movement was only an idea; now it had become life. Everybody once said that it was impracticable, yet now two thousand of the leading medical men of England, including the physicians to her Majesty, had openly declared it to be their opinion, that these cursed drinks were not necessary to the human race, but that men would be better off without them. But, for himself, he would not give a chip for the certificate which they had signed, valuable as it was, for he had the certificate in the manly countenances of millions of teetotallers. Immediately after the American Revolution, some of the Connecticut farmers who had to till that hard and granite soil of New England, signed a pledge of total abstinence from spirituous liquors; and when they proved in their lives that they could do so well without them, what need had they to go knocking at the doctor's door to ascertain his opinion? or to get a prescription written in unintelligible Latin to certify to that which they testified in their own experience, and were willing to write out in letters of light in the blue heavens above!—(Applause.) After a few further observations from Mr. Clapp, the resolution was put by Mr. DOXSEY, and carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN briefly replied, and the proceedings terminated.

Notices of Meetings.

WINCHESTER.

Seldom has it been the privilege of the inhabitants of our city to listen to topics of such thrilling interest and such high importance, treated in a manner so truly masterly, as in the recent lectures of Dr. Grindrod on Diet, Digestion, and Regimen. These lectures were based on the important discoveries of Liebig on animal chemistry; and this new branch of scientific investigation gives them the force of experimental results, or mathematical demonstration. The wonderful contrivances by which animal life is sustained, by means of food and nutriment (brought forward as they were clearly and eloquently,) could not fail to impress on the audience exalted ideas of the wisdom and power of the great Creator; and to shew how, indeed, we are "fearfully and wonderfully made;" thus producing, in every well-ordered mind, feelings of mingled awe and admiration. Dr. G. shewed how necessary it was that all our food and articles of diet should be such as, on principles of chemical affinity, would assimilate and unite with the blood, "the life" of the system. The analysis of this living fluid was given, and thence was deduced what food was suited to its nature, and to digestion and nutrition. The action of the stomach and gastric juice was clearly pointed out; the transformation of the various articles of wholesome food into chyme and chyle, and the different secretions and excretions, was admirably shewn. From these principles, the source of health and enjoyment on the one hand, and, on the other, those of disease, fearful disorganization, misery, ruin, and death, were lucidly traced, and unanswerably demonstrated. Excess of all kinds, particularly drunkenness, the scourge and pest, and disgrace of our country, and especially the use of ardent spirits, well and truly called, by the eloquent Robert Hall, "distilled ruin and liquid damnation," (or some equivalent expressions) on which enormous sums are continually being squandered with frightful and impious perversion in this christian country, to the ruin and misery of their consumers; sums which, in no long time, would go far in paying off the national debt of England; and, as means, christianize the world. All fermented liquors—wine, beer, &c.—were shown to be, in their own nature, devoid of nutriment and support; administering only a temporary stimulus, which soon subsides into the reaction of languor and exhaustion. Proofs, from experience and experiment, were adduced of the superior health and strength of the strictly temperate water drinkers. Drawings, from nature and anatomical preparations, shewed the truth of the lecturer's assertions; stomachs inflamed by the use of spirits, which in several cases had eaten holes through the coats, producing miserable death, formed striking and most instructive objects of exhibition. In a word, ardent spirits, and even wine and fermented malt liquors, were proved to act as slow poisons. The third lecture closed with a most earnest, solemn, eloquent, and truly Christian appeal to the feelings and the judgment of the hearers. Whatever they may have thought, or however they may be disposed, as to "taking the pledge," (Dr. G. objected to this phrase) no one among them could fail of being highly interested by the matter of lecture, or of deriving information of the most important nature, as respects personal and social comfort, welfare, and happiness; while every one must have admired the consummate talent and ability of the gifted and zealous lecturer. The result of his labours must, at least, be the conviction of the vast and eternal importance of temperate habits and self-denying principles; and, on the contrary, the enormous evils, the appalling mischiefs, the deadly results, both in this life and that which is to come, of sensuality and intemperance. Before Dr. G.'s audience life and death were, indeed, most feelingly, powerfully, and eloquently set forth. The meetings were presided over each night by Dr. Lyford, who thus gave the sanction of his respected name to the general principles advocated. At this every friend of temperance, and all other Christian graces, must rejoice.—Hampshire Chronicle.

BRIDGEWATER.

On the 12th ult. James Allan, the County Temperance Agent, delivered a lecture on the "Power of the People, and how they may effect a peaceful revolution." The novelty of the announcement drew a good audience, and J. Allan treated the subject ably and judiciously. He commenced by dilating on the general acknowledgment of "bad times," "stagnation of trade," "heavy taxation," and "oppressive local rates." He then alluded to the fact elicited by a late parliamentary return, that in England and Wales, with a population of 15,906,741, the total number of paupers relieved in 1848, inclusive of casual poor, was 1,876,541, at an average cost per head of £3.5s.10½d. He read from the Prize Essay just published, on Juvenile Depravity many passages, to show the enormous amount of crime which existed in this kingdom; and he quoted judicial authority to prove that the evils deplored were fostered by the drinking habits of the population. James Allan now turned to the bright side of his subject, and strongly impressed on his audience the power which the people possessed, irrespective of any legislative enactments, to work out a reform, and effect a peaceful revolution which would diffuse happiness and prosperity through the land. Abstain, he said, from intoxicating liquors—let there be fewer public-houses and more bakers' and butchers' shops—let there be less money spent at the ale-bench, and more in the purchase of furniture and clothing, &c.; the working-classes would derive the benefit, for when there was less drinking there would be a greater demand for labour; pauperism and crime would be diminished, trade would revive, and the text of the lecturer be verified.

WATLINGTON, OXON.

On Friday, May 11th, the friends of temperance held a tea-meeting in the Town Hall, when upwards of sixty persons were admitted by tickets. At seven o'clock, friends re-assembled upon the same plan, and the chair was taken by Mr. W. G. Spyer. After two or three brief addresses, Mr. Thomas Hudson of London, delighted a numerous audience with a very convincing, intelligent speech. He was listened to with marked attention, and it was truly encouraging to observe the order and goodwill that prevailed, on a spot where, previously, some of the opponents of the noble cause had sadly disgraced themselves. It was signal success; we hail it as a token for good. Our motto is "Onward."

WHITBY.

On Monday and Tuesday evenings, April 23rd and 24th, Mr. Jabez Inwards delivered two lectures on the temperance question in the Temperance Hall, Whitby, to large and deeply interested audiences; and although a slight charge was made for admission, the spacious Hall was crowded each evening. The lectures were marked by the most beautiful displays of popular eloquence—the speaker evidently feeling deeply himself the truthfulness and importance of the sentiments which he uttered. At the close of the lectures a vote of thanks was presented to him by acclamation; the meeting rising to testify their approbation of his mode of presenting the truth. Each meeting was presided over by the Rev. E. Heywood, Wesleyan Association minister, who is ever willing to give his valuable aid to the good cause. A considerable number signed the pledge at the close of the lectures.

HUDDERSFIELD.

ANTI-BEER-SHOP PETITIONS.

The feeling of the town and neighbourhood of Huddersfield against the beer-houses will be shown by the following list of petitions presented against them. The signatures abundantly prove that the clergy, dissenting ministers, merchants, tradesmen, and the people generally, are so fully convinced of the many evils arising from these dens of iniquity, as earnestly to desire the repeal of that iniquitous measure which legalizes their existence:—

The friends of temperance in Huddersfield, although quite aware that a greater number of signatures would have added weight to their own petition, and whilst feeling that they have not done all that is desirable in their locality, are anxious to impress upon societies generally throughout the kingdom (who have not already prepared petitions) the importance of energetic action in this movement; and they would respectfully suggest to the temperance public, that by a little exertion, they may secure the co-operation of many christians and other benevolent individuals, who are not yet convinced of the necessity of entire abstinence from alcoholic beverages. They trust, however, that the discussion of this measure in parliament, with the immense array of striking facts which may be expected to be then exhibited, showing the close connexion between the drinking customs and pauperism, crime (especially juvenile depravity, as strikingly manifested in the admirable essay of the Rev. H. Worsley, M.A.) and irreligion, will induce many to examine the question for themselves; and they are fully satisfied that in many instances inquiry will terminate in their thorough conversion to teetotalism.

HOMAGE TO CONSCIENCE.

The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER of Bridgewater, Minister of the Unitarian Congregation there, has ceased to hold that office, because he could not conscientiously, as an advocate of Temperance, receive as a part of his salary the rents of certain Beer-shops.—Illustrated London News.

THE MAN OF TOIL.

Man of Toil, wouldst thou be free?
Lend thine ear to Reason's call;
There's folly in the Drunkard's glee—
There's madness in the midnight brawl;
The ribald jest, the vulgar song,
May give a keener sting to care;
The riot of a reckless throng
May lead to ruin and despair:
Let Truth unloose thy fettered soul,—
There is no freedom in the bowl.

Man of Toil, wouldst thou be wise?
 The paths of moral right explore;
 Pierce the human heart's disguise,
 And track its motives to the core;
 Creation's boundless beauties scan,
 Observe its wonders—search its laws.
 Look on the vast harmonious plan,
 And learn to love the Eternal cause:
 Let Truth illumine thy darkened soul,—
 There is no wisdom in the bowl.

Man of Toil, wouldst thou be blest?
 Give thy purest feelings play;
 Bring all that's noble to thy breast,
 Let all that's worthless pass away.
 Let generous deeds bid sorrow cease,
 Let gentlest words thy lips employ;
 Scatter the seeds of love and peace,
 And reap a harvest full of joy:
 Let Truth make glad thy harassed soul—
 There are no blessings in the bowl.

TEMPERANCE MISSIONARY.

The Committee of the Leicester Temperance Society are desirous of engaging a well-qualified person to act as Missionary in that Town.

The Committee are anxious that the gratifying progress which the Temperance Cause is making in Leicester, may be continued; and they are desirous that the Missionary whose services they propose to engage to assist them, should be thoroughly competent and experienced.

In addition to domiciliary visitation, &c., the Agent will be expected to take part in conducting the Public Meetings of the Society.

The Committee are prepared to offer a liberal salary.—Applications, with testimonials enclosed, to be addressed to—THE COMMITTEE OF THE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, 26, Granby-street, Leicester.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

* The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

5th, The extent to which the example of Teetotal parents would promote the moral and religious well-being of families, and afford to parents the means of sending their children to school.

6th, The practical working of the drinking-usages and customs in manufactories, workshops and elsewhere.

The names of the adjudicators will be announced at a future time.

The Essays, which must not exceed forty-six 8vo pages, to be sent under cover, accompanied with a sealed letter enclosing the real name and address of the writer, on or before the 1st of November, 1849, to the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

The Committee, also, offer a further prize of £10 for the best Essay on the most efficient means of conducting Temperance Societies, with the view of accelerating, and giving permanence to the Total Abstinence Reformation. This Essay must not exceed thirty-two 8vo pages, and is open to competition by writers of all classes. To be sent in by the 1st of September, to the office of the National Temperance Society, and the adjudication to be made under the direction of the Committee.

ISAAC DOXSEY, Secretary.

GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY, PATENTEES, City Road, London,

It cannot now be doubted, even by the most sceptical, but that Gutta Percha must henceforward be regarded as one of the blessings of a gracious Providence, inasmuch as it affords a sure and certain protection from cold and damp feet, and thus tends to protect the body from disease and premature death.

"GUTTA PERCHA TUBING," being so extraordinary a conductor of sound, is used as speaking tubes in mines, manufactories, warehouses, &c. This tubing may also be applied in Churches and Chapels for the purpose of enabling deaf persons to listen to the sermon, &c. For conveying messages from one room or building to another, or from the mast-head to the deck of a vessel, it is invaluable.

MILL BANDS.—The increasing demand for the Gutta Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLACKS, &c.—Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to manufacturers, engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-bucket valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size or thickness without seam or joint, and as cold water will never soften them they seldom need any repair.

Gutta Percha soles, solution, inkstands, card trays, medallions, picture-frames, brackets, mouldings, window-blind cornices, vases, fire-buckets, bowls, pen-trays, bougies, catheters, stethoscopes, thin lining, thread, flower-pots, ear-trumpets, &c. &c., may be had at the Company's Works, Wharf Road, City Road, London, or of any of their wholesale dealers in town or country.

RELIGIOUS PHILANTHROPY.

To EDWARD MIALL, Esq., Editor of the Nonconformist.

DEAR SIR,—If any apology be needed for addressing you, let it be found in the importance and urgency of the cause we plead. We regard you as representing a numerous and influential class of our fellow-subjects, and desire through you to bespeak their attention, and, if possible, to enlist their sympathies and secure their aid.

Philanthropy may exhibit itself in different phases—may be arrayed in a variety of costume—may devote its energies to alleviate many forms of suffering, and banish many causes of distress—but it is inspired by one spirit, and possesses an identity of character, which leads us, notwithstanding the proverbial inconsistencies of human nature, when we have discovered it swaying the decisions of a mind on any one important subject, to anticipate, almost instinctively, the whereabouts of the individual in relation to kindred topics. We may be thrown for some hours into juxtaposition with a fellow-traveller to whom we are personally unknown, and having maintained the silence of etiquette until its restraints are found to be burdensome, conversation may be introduced. Some philanthropic movement has been adverted to, and we find to our surprise and delight, that our companion on the journey is an enthusiastic admirer and zealous friend of some holy cause enshrined in the best affections of our heart. Do we not immediately feel encouraged to broach some subject, to us equally dear, and to society equally valuable? Look through the country, yea, extend your observation to other lands—the intrepid friend of the negro slave is generally the eloquent advocate of peace; and he who pleads the sacredness of human life, against the certain dangers and awful chances of the battle-field, will usually be found as sternly opposed to the violent and irrevocable decisions of the guillotine or the gallows. We do not wonder at this. The identity of the philanthropic spirit leads us to expect it. Our astonishment is in immediate and active exercise, when the contrary is presented; and when those, whose benevolence speaks in tones of indignant remonstrance to the oppressor, or whispers its gentle consolations to the helpless, or gushes forth in tears at the sight of sufferings which it cannot relieve; can look upon other forms of wretchedness, as soul-harrowing, as wide-spread, as pitiable, and as patent to observation,—with cold indifference or with positive contempt.

A beautiful instance of the identity we have adverted to, was presented at the late meeting of the Peace Society, at Finsbury Chapel. All, or nearly all, the advocates of peace who addressed that assembly were practical pledged abstainers from intoxicating beverages; and it is to this point we wish to direct your serious thoughts. To many, the relation of these two important movements has long been familiar. Both are advocated, in many instances, by the same persons—both appeal to the same motives—both contemplate the same objects: the alleviation of human misery, and the elevation of human character—and both may, to a considerable extent, be supported by the same arguments.

In proof of this position, we refer with pleasure to your speech in Exeter Hall, on the substitution of arbitration for war.

You pleaded that it was “impossible to paint in too gloomy colours, or to describe in terms of exaggeration, the atrocities of war—the demon passions which it kindles, the horrid cruelties which it perpetrates, or the wild waste of desolation it leaves behind it.” Now, we entirely accord with the truth thus forcibly stated, but we ask you, dear Sir, to glance over it again, just reading DRUNKENNESS for WAR, and we appeal to you, whether it would require the slightest modification!! Does War most recklessly sacrifice human life, so does strong drink. On the most moderate calculation we have seen, 10,000 persons are annually sacrificed in Great Britain and Ireland, to this demon-spirit, and this will give a total of 340,000 victims during the last 34 years of peace, which is equal to the massacre of the entire population of a considerable town every year. Nor is this all. Think of the wretchedness that is endured by the families of these victims of alcohol, during the progress of their lingering destruction,—the blighted hopes—the forgotten vows—the trampled obligations—the neglected duties—the crushing debts,—and the ultimate and irretrievable ruin into which thousands of families are annually plunged, and you must surely admit this application of your own eloquent reference to the evils of war.

Moreover, you remarked that “in concentrating our blame upon war, we have too much lost sight of the proximate cause of war,” viz:—standing armies. We rejoice also to subscribe to this sentiment; but let us ask whether the sentence is not equally true thus modified:—“in concentrating our blame upon drunkenness, we have too much lost sight of the proximate cause of drunkenness, viz:—the moderate drinking of unnatural stimulants. Does not all the patronage which this practice receives from benevolent and religious men—the drinking of toasts and sentiments at public religious festivals—the caresses bestowed upon alcohol as one of “the good creatures of God”—the association of its use with all that is generous and kindly in visits of pleasure and in the intercourse of social life—the falsely cherished virtues with which it is supposed to be endowed, and the despotic and almost omnipotent customs in which it is enshrined—does not all this tend to perpetuate and increase the great social vice? Is not this the proximate cause of drunkenness? While we have seen members fall from our churches, teachers from our schools, ministers from our pulpits—while we have raised our hand for the vote of excommunication, wiped away the starting tear which christian benevolence has shed forth over the ruin of one we have loved in the truth—while thus “concentrating our blame upon drunkenness,” have we not also “too much lost sight of its proximate cause?”

Further, you pleaded in reference to the soldier, that his condition could only be accurately described by the term “slave,” and very properly sought to enlist the sympathies of the audience by an appropriate reference to negro emancipation. Here, we ask, have we not a parallel case? It is said that there are 600,000 drunkards in the United Kingdom. On this point we pretend not to accuracy, but admitting it to be a gross exaggeration, the number must be awfully great. In the city of Dublin, in the year 1847, (as we gather from a paper read before the Dublin Statistical Society, by James Haughton, Esq.) 10,758 persons were apprehended as “disorderly,” and 12,238 for “drunkenness and tipping in unlicensed houses,” being a total of 22,996 persons taken into custody, in consequence of drink. In Glasgow, Mr. Sheriff Alison states that there are 3010 houses licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, and declares his belief, that every Saturday night 30,000 persons go to bed drunk in that city. We need not trouble you by details, for it is universally admitted, that DRUNKENNESS is, more than any other, THE NATIONAL VICE. And let it never be forgotten that every drunkard is a slave—the meanest and most degraded of slaves. But “he loves the bondage”—so do many, perhaps most, of our soldiery. “The drunkard goes voluntarily into the slavery”—so does the soldier. “The soldier, however, has been beguiled by false notions and deceitful promises”—so has the drunkard by the almost universal testimony of his fellow-men, and the almost universal practice of society. “The soldier,” you say, “may not think his own thoughts with a view to action”—but the drunkard, more pitiable, becomes so besotted, that he cannot think at all.

Again, you argue that “men thus brought up,” under the usual military regulations, “are disposed to overleap all the land-marks of virtue and lose all sensibility of conscience.”

Strictly, awfully true, as thousands of families know to their cost, but vividly descriptive also, not indeed of what the drunkard is “disposed” to do, but of what he has already done. “These men seem to carry along with them a moral pestilence—the worst plague with which society can be afflicted. You may track their course through our villages and towns, especially, in those parts where they make a protracted stay, by the debauchery, immorality, and general low tone of religious feeling and susceptibility, that pervades the population with whom they have come in contact.” Surely, you cannot but observe the correctness of this language in application to the drunkard and the tippler. Must our marching soldiery be regarded as a deadly simoon, how would the evil be increased if their pestilential influence could be so localized as to affect every town, every district every village, every hamlet!! But the deadly vice of drunkenness has set its traps, spread its nets, gilded its baits, engaged its decoys, IN EVERY INHABITED PLACE. There is not in our country any sanctuary into which the simple cottage youth can enter and be secure, except the society whose claims now seek your consideration. In many places, even the watchman of Zion has ceased "to blow the warning trumpet," except with "an uncertain sound." Hence the unwary swallow the delusive draught, as a boon from Heaven—as "a good creature of God," and find too late that the beer-shop is the road to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

We ask you, dear Sir, and through you all the friends of man—all who labour for the elevation of the working classes—all who seek to emancipate them from the thralldom of ignorance, and to deliver them from the pressure of every social wrong—we ask you, we entreat you, we implore you to weigh well this subject. Look round upon the seductions of the public-house—the dazzling splendours of the gin-palace—the diversified attractions of tea-gardens, casinos, saloons, and the thousand and one inventions by which innocence and virtue are sacrificed—consider whether the dangers of these places are not either entirely overcome, or rendered comparatively innocuous by the resolution of entire abstinence from intoxicating beverages—enquire whether it is possible that the unmitigated evils of drunkenness, and the poverty, disease, crime, and degradation which mark its pestiferous career, or follow in its sickly train, can ever be removed, while the virtuous, intelligent, and religious portion of the community indulge in the use of these drinks—examine the evidence of those who have been reclaimed by the abstinence system, and study it by its fruits, making a careful discrimination between the necessary and the incidental, in ought that may appear objectionable, in its advocacy or in its results—and then give it the benefit of your eloquent advocacy, your moral influence, and your personal example.

REV. DR. CUMMING AND TEETOTALISM.

DR. CUMMING is a well-known and highly esteemed minister of the Presbyterian Community, and whatever he says in the pulpit, on the platform, or through the press, deserves to be treated with respect. We submit therefore to our readers a paragraph from a recent discourse of the Rev. Dr., which has been kindly furnished by a correspondent, from notes taken at the time. It will no doubt be read with painful interest by those who recognise the dangerous tendency of the argument, and its direct influence in strengthening practices which every christian should use his utmost influence to destroy.

We give the extract entire as it has been sent to us, that it may speak for itself, inserting our comments (for the sake of brevity,) at the points to which they refer.

"But it has been objected by one of the German infidels, that our Lord did not show a deep sense of the danger of wine when he created by a word so excessive a quantity—some hundred gallons—by an act of omnipotent power. But then would not this apply to the case of every vintage? If God gives a plenteous vintage, you would not say: This is a temptation to men to drink to excess. There was no more temptation to drink to excess from the fact that he filled many large water-jugs than that he was pleased to give the sun beams and rain drops that make a plenteous vintage."

This paragraph obviously assumes that the wine and the vintage are of the same physical character—a fact we should be quite prepared to admit, but one which, as will be presently seen, Dr. Cumming denies. Surely every man is aware that the seductive influence of strong drink is its stimulating quality—the alcohol; which every tyro in vegetable chemistry is now aware cannot be traced in the natural product of the vine. Dr. C. may be safely left to choose between the horns of the dilemma. If the wine was intoxicating, then it cannot be true that "there was no more temptation to drink to excess," from the brimming jugs of alcoholic stimulant, than from the pure juice of the grape, which, while its sugar remained undecomposed, would cloy if taken to excess. If, on the other hand, the wine was the pure unfermented product of the vine, the whole argument in defence of modern wine-bibbing, is completely destroyed, Dr. C. himself being judge.

"The secret of temperance is not in the cellar, but in the heart of the landlord of the wine cellar. A christian man will not become intoxicated if he drinks from a cask; a drunkard will become intoxicated if he drinks from a bottle."

We should like just to ask the Dr. one question, and to have a plain, straight-forward, yes or no reply. Did you ever know a christian man become intoxicated? We will not trouble you to define exactly how far a man must be influenced by drink before you would say he is intoxicated—though that might not be a very easy task—but do you know one indisputable case of a christian man—a man whom you regarded as converted—falling into the vice of drunkenness, by the delusive influence of strong drink? If you do not, your experience is, we hesitate not to say, diverse from that of every christian minister of any standing in this kingdom. If you do know such a case, we ask confidently, What becomes of the argument? Yes, dear Sir, we declare, with deep sorrow, our conviction, that there is not a christian church in the kingdom of twenty years existence, that cannot from its bitter experience furnish a refutation of this statement.

"It is not in the quantity before you that the element of temperance is, but in the grace of God planted in your hearts. It seems to me, without the least disrespect towards those who differ from me, that if God designed that men should be teetotalers, that is, should not taste wine, or anything that had the least alcoholic element in it, he would have prevented the growth of the vine, and rendered fermentation impossible, because if there were no fermentation there could be no alcoholic element."

True, quite true; but surely Dr. C. is aware that nature, left to the complete operation of the physical law of fermentation, produces no intoxicating beverage. The vinous stage is speedily succeeded by the acetous, as is familiarly known in the exposure of alcoholic fluids to the sun for conversion into vinegar. From the existence of the divine law of fermentation, there is no more proof to be deduced that God intended men to stimulate themselves in any degree with alcohol, than that in causing the poppy to grow, he designed us to poison ourselves, in any degree, with opium.

"But he has not done so; he gives the vintage, and he gives the fruit of the vine; he allows fermentation just as much as vegetation; therefore it seems to me that temperance is to arise, not from the absence of wine, but from the presence of christian principles, and that we are to be sober because it is a christian duty, and not because we have not around us all the elements for being the reverse. It appears to me that character is perfected, not by being placed beyond the reach of temptation, but within the reach of it, and thus triumphing over all its suggestions."

Here it is admitted that strong drink is a temptation, and it will surely be remembered that He, whose practice is now pleaded in defence of our moderate drinking habits, has taught us to pray—"Lead us not into temptation." We are persuaded that Dr. C. uses this prayer, and inculcates its use upon his flock, yet he here advises a lingering within the sphere of temptation, with a view to the perfection of christian character. While reading it we found ourselves involuntarily offering the prayer of the litany, "from all false doctrine," &c. But we are pained to see such an argument—true in the abstract, but awfully erroneous in the application—used by so talented and influential a man.

"Our Lord ministered not to supply a necessity, but to add an enjoyment. I admit teetotalism has done much good, and I admit the perfect liberty of every one to adopt it who is satisfied that it will do good. I would not say a word against the teetotal society, because they are doing good, and I pray that they may do more; but while they claim the liberty of holding their sentiments, I must not shrink from the duty of expounding what is plainly God's Word."

Then we have the prayers of our reverend friend, and we are not disposed to undervalue the fervent prayer of any spirit of man. But for what does the Dr. pray? "That the teetotal societies may do more good." We are amazed!! Does not the argument go to prove (if it be sound) that the very existence of such societies is a standing libel upon the character of the immaculate Jesus. Has not the Dr. stood aloof from those whom he admits "have done much good," and "are doing good;"

on the ground that their sentiments are unscriptural, and does he not feel compelled, in opposition to their opinions, to expound what he considers to be "plainly God's Word," on the matter? We are at a loss to conjecture the burthen of our friend's prayers for us, unless it be that we may be converted from our teetotalism to the moderate drinking of alcoholic beverages, and that our eyes may be opened to see that such a practice is enjoined in the scriptures, and enforced by the example of Him in whose steps we feel it our earnest desire to follow. Should these prayers for us be answered—and we submit that they are in accordance with the argument—what would become of all "the good we have done and are doing," even on the Dr.'s own avowal?

"Most of the letters I receive are upon three great topics—first, capital punishment; secondly, teetotalism; and thirdly, war."

We affectionately congratulate the Dr. upon ministering to a flock who are evidently aiding him in bearing the burden of his office, by occasionally stirring up his "pure mind by way of remembrance," and drawing his attention to important movements, which in his multiplied engagements he might otherwise overlook.

"I candidly say that if I could, by a wish, substitute the arbitration of peace for the unsheathing of the sword, I would do it; but it is not what we would like, but what we are driven to tolerate. So in reference to drunkenness. If I could, I would make every man sober; but my prescription, if you will allow it, is not a mechanical change, but a moral revolution in the unregenerate and unsanctified heart. "There is danger," you say, "in wine." So there is; there is danger also in other things: there is danger in tampering with the Word of God; there is danger in reading the Bible in the light of teetotalism, instead of reading teetotalism in the light of the Bible; for you may depend upon it whenever a man begins to adopt another mode of life than that which the Saviour gave, he soon begins to adopt another rule of faith than that which the Bible affords."

If this be true, the teetotalers are in imminent danger. According to the Dr. we have adopted "another mode of life than that which the Saviour gave;" and if we have not already begun,—we soon shall begin,—"to adopt another rule of faith than that which the Bible affords." Yet we are following a course which apostolic authority has pronounced to be good, for "it is good not to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth." We submit our conduct to the Apostle, and our reverend friend;—the former pronounces a favourable verdict, and declares it to be a principle he would himself, in such circumstances adopt; the other warns us that our principles are unscriptural, and dangerous, and our conduct inconsistent with the example of our blessed Lord. The Dr. will pardon us if we demur to his ex cathedra decision, and prefer the Apostle before him.

"Let us, therefore, be jealous of the glory of God; and let us not shrink from expounding what seems to be the mind and spirit of God. Some have left the congregation because I will not be a teetotaler. I have no liking to wine; I could do without it as well as any of you could; but what my Lord consecrated by tasting, I will not pronounce unholy.'

Did our "Lord consecrate by tasting" an alcoholic stimulant? We are perfectly aware of the differences among teetotalers upon the quæstio vexatissima of their principles, but we shall briefly state our opinion on this point. We do not think it capable of indisputable proof, that our Saviour never tasted alcohol—But who can prove that he ever did? Can Dr. Cumming? We beg to remind the Dr. that the burden of proof logically rests with him. He asserts that the Saviour consecrated by tasting an alcoholic stimulant, and this he is bound to prove. We consider this impossible to be sustained. We do not say he did not do so—we do not admit that he did; but we refuse to yield the argument until this premise has been established. It is entirely a question of probabilities. As such it should be considered, and the decision, we think, will be triumphantly in favour of our principles. THE PURE JUICE OF THE GRAPE WAS DRUNK IN THE TIME OF OUR LORD—AND IT WAS CALLED WINE. Will any scholar deny either of these propositions? We do not assert that there was no intoxicating wine—but simply that all wine was not intoxicating. Admit this, and then let any man logically prove that what the Saviour miraculously produced was alcoholic. We challenge Dr. C. to establish this point—he shall speak for himself in our columns, if he please. Let him do this, or let him candidly and publicly acknowledge the unsoundness of the argument.

"Remember what I have often said—I am not placed in this pulpit to preach to your prejudices, or to echo your opinions, but to proclaim, as responsible at the judgment bar of God, what is true, and that, by God's grace, I am determined to persevere in doing."

To this no one can object. No minister is worthy of his office, who did not maintain the position, that he is not "to flatter the prejudices or echo the opinions of his flock." But was this warning required? Has the Dr. so many teetotal hearers that he was compelled to vindicate his ministerial prerogative, and assert his official responsibility? We fear not. We tremble to think that the doctrine thus eloquently expounded in the pulpit, would find but too ready a response in the pew. We can almost imagine that wealthy professors, on that sabbath afternoon, found that the Dr.'s sermon had given more zest to their claret, and caused their champagne to sparkle with increasing brightness, and while they devoutly thanked God for "his good creatures," rejoiced that they had an indulgent shepherd, who watched over and delighted in the enjoyments of his flock, and so ably vindicated them from the aggressions of those who inculcated the ascetic doctrine of self-denial for the benefit of others. But we must conclude the quotation.

"To return to what I have been saying: I gather from this passage that wine is lawful, that it is not unholy, that the temperate use of it is legitimate, that its employment as a medicine is perfect. Nothing can be more degrading to a human being than drunkenness; nothing can be more disgraceful to a christian being than excess. The great law, the beautiful law is—The time is short; it remains for them that marry to be as though they married not, for them that sell as though they sold not, and them that buy as though they bought not, thus using the world, and not abusing it, for the fashion of this world speedily passeth away."

We lay down our pen with a sigh. Looking around us upon the desolations which alcohol has caused—regarding it as incomparably the most potent among the "wiles of the devil"—met on every hand as we pass through the street, with its blazing and attractive seductions—scanning in our daily papers, the evidence of vice, profligacy, and crime, sustained and perpetuated by the drinking habits of our nation—our heart sickens at the thought that the example of the pure and holy Saviour should,—on the sabbath day—from the pulpit—by an eloquent, able, and popular minister of the gospel—be pleaded in support of the practice of moderate drinking, out of which all the evil arises. The drinking customs could not long survive the conversion of the christian church to total abstinence principles. The moral influence of every christian society and of every christian minister is immediately felt in the locality where it is exerted. Of this none can be more conscious than Dr. C. Were he to abstain, his flock would enquire. Were he to advocate total abstinence, they would listen consent, resolve and follow; wondering that they could not see before, the sublime simplicity, and intrinsic holiness of the cause. A thousand families would be more or less directly influenced by his example. His brethren in the ministry would entertain the question. But knowing all this—conscious that his influence must tell either in strengthening or weakening these dangerous customs—feeling that the sacrifice is but very small, that "he can do without" intoxicating liquor "as well as any" of his teetotal hearers—he deliberately resolves to drink for personal gratification and enjoyment, that by which myriads have fallen and thousands have perished; and then publicly defends his resolution, by the groundless assumption that the "Saviour consecrated alcoholic stimulants by tasting," and by the conclusion that, therefore, his followers should "not pronounce them unholy." We cordially reciprocate the doctor's christian remembrance of us, and while thanking him for intercessions on our behalf, we cordially acknowledge that "he has done much good," and pray for him, that by adopting our practice, and advocating our principles, "he may do more."

THE MODEL PARISH.

(To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.)

SIR,—It is with pleasure I avail myself of your kind suggestion and permission to clear up the supposed difficulties connected with the Model Parish Scheme, and referred to in your April number.

There is an apparent difficulty, but I trust not an invincible one, as respects the "advowson." It ought to be distinctly understood that the Model Parish experiment is not to establish any ecclesiastical system, nor to legalise a new parish—nor to create an "advowson." We wish to soberise one of our existing parishes, and therein present practical demonstration of the superiority of abstinence from strong drink over the ordinary drinking-usages of society—to shew what would be the condition of all our parishes, and the country generally, if the ministers of religion, and teachers of youth, were examples of abstinence—training the rising generation never to touch alcoholic beverages. That we may make this interesting experiment, it is necessary to secure for ever the appointment of the minister, and through him of the teachers to the Model Parish. At present the appointment of the parochial minister is in the hands of those who uphold our drinking-customs; we must, therefore, get it into the hands of such as are opposed to these great evils. This is all we ask when we speak of the "advowson." Into the abstract question of the desirableness of advowsons, in a christian community, we do not enter. Advowsons exist according to the law of this land, and our Model Parish scheme can neither abolish, extend, nor perpetuate them, but it is unquestionably a step towards purifying them. And supposing the law of advowsons to be an evil, which nevertheless must be in the hands of some patron; may we not make an effort to have the presentation secured to a party determinately opposed to a greater evil than all the advowsons which were ever created can possibly prove against the greatest scourge that ever assailed the human family? In such conduct we see no compromise of principle even on the part of the most scrupulous nonconformist.

Let us imagine a case—say of a Chinese parish controlled by opium sellers and eaters. Some philanthropists are anxious to deliver the parishioners from the scourge of opium eating, and to free the parish from this pernicious habit, and thus set a strikingly benevolent example to the rest of the nation. To effect this object, it is necessary to appoint a priest and teachers who are anti-opium-eaters. They make an effort, therefore, to get the parish appointment out of the hands of opium eaters into the hands of anti-opium eaters, and to secure it in perpetuity to anti-opium eaters. Here then is sought an opportunity of delivering the opium victims from a dreadful plague, and perhaps, through them, finally, the whole country.

But the Chinese are idolaters, and we are christians. How can we be associated in such a work? Shall we not be sanctioning and upholding idolatry?—certainly not. We do not create the Chinese parish or priest, much less his temple with its gods. All these have a lawful existence in China. We deplore the victimised opium eaters, and gladly would we rescue them from both evils; but we cannot repeal the law, at least we cannot immediately deliver them from idolatry. We may, however, rescue them from the other evil, viz., from opium eating. Now can we consistently, with pure christian benevolence, refuse to do the latter, because we cannot accomplish the former? Dare we deliberately say, that we would rather allow ten, twenty, or even thirty opium-shops to continue open in this Chinese parish, covering the children with rags, ulcerating the bodies of the people, corrupting their minds, and ruining their souls? Can we contentedly rather witness all this misery and ruin, than aid the effort to get the appointment of the priest and teachers out of the hands of opium eaters into the hands of those opposed to this mischievous and wicked habit? If we withheld our influence because some ugly word such as an "advowson" were mixed up with the appointment, would it not be like straining at a gnat, and swallowing a camel? Surely our inability to alter their religious system is no reason why we should not help to improve their temporal condition, especially as the latter may possibly lead to the former. Our Lord's conduct harmonizes we think with our view of the subject. When there was little prospect of reaching men's hearts so as to benefit their souls, our blessed Master still displayed solicitude for their physical condition. Thus when the ten lepers presented themselves saying, "Lord have mercy on us." He who knew what was in man knew that only one of all the ten would be rightly influenced, yet he cured the ungrateful nine as well as him whose soul was touched by hallowed principles and feelings. So in the case of the multitudes who followed him, not for the gospel, but because they did eat and were filled. So strongly are we satisfied that the spirit and genius of the gospel accords with our Model Parish scheme, that we should feel it a duty and a privilege to encourage any similar work undertaken either by Nonconformist or Churchman. And happily very many Nonconformists do thus look at the Model Parish, and are giving it their cordial support.

With respect to the exclusion of public-houses in the Model Parish, it must be borne in mind that we are not physical-force men. It is not compulsion but moral suasion, moral coercion is to do the work. We reasonably conclude that the ministers and tutors, the professors and under masters in the public school with their families, dependents and work-people, would possess a moral influence and christian consistency which would frown the drinking usages of society for ever from this district. The system of instruction in the various day and Sunday-schools, by example as well as precept, would perpetuate the great moral reform. In such a district no stranger would think of embarking in the abhorred traffic of intoxicating liquors. The trading in such body and soul destroying poison, at least in this Model Parish, would be so disreputable, that any one thinking of selling it; would immediately anticipate being "sent to Coventry," and numbered among "the baser sort." Our practices and training in the Model Parish, would prevent the demand, and the supply as a matter of course must cease. When the present race of alcoholic drinkers were gone to their account, there would be none to occupy their seats at the ale-bench. Instead of ten, fifteen, or twenty public-houses, we hope to have a Model Temperance Hotel of ample dimensions with all the necessaries and comforts of life, minus maddening draughts and polluting fumes. We thus anticipate the difficulty of the licenses.

Of course it is not presumed that this Model Parish scheme is perfection, but we do feel it must prove a great boon to our country, and if crowned with success will suggest similar efforts in other parts, in factories, in shops, families, schools, &c.

Nor is the agitation of the scheme unproductive of good, indeed many non-conformists have said that the indirect good of this work is such that they are prepared on this ground to support it. The Model Parish meeting, generally, draws many who have never been seen at temperance gatherings, and not unfrequently the clergy and others moving in the higher grades of society, have in consequence adopted our abstinence principles, and often become strenuous advocates for us.

Trusting you will excuse the length of this explanation.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully and obliged,
W. WIGHT.

DESPOTISM AND CRUELTY.

Some time ago, an engine-tender was dismissed from his situation, after repeated admonition, for intemperance. Amongst the applicants for the place, one was engaged (in other respects well qualified) because he was especially recommended for sobriety. As soon as he came to his duty, the men gathered around him and demanded the sum of eighteen shillings for drink. He felt this to be particularly grievous from his own respectable habits, and because that, from having been out of place for some time, he was very poor. He remonstrated with them. He told them that "he had been three weeks without work, and was very badly off;" that "he could not find the money;" and that, "as he was averse to liquor himself, he could not comply." But the tyranny practised on these occasions was soon brought to bear upon him. Systematic and relentless persecution from that moment was his portion. His tools were taken away and hidden; it was contrived to interrupt him continually, and means were effectually taken to obstruct the regular working of the engine. He was soon convinced that he must appear to his employers unequal to his duty, and be discharged. Indignant as he was at this treatment, he must either comply or leave the place to seek another, probably beset with the same objection. The struggle was a hard one; too lately had he been on the verge of want. His resolution could hold out no longer. With a heavy heart he went to the overlooker, and borrowed of him ten shillings to provide for the drunken revel!—Tetotal Times.

* * The Committee of the National Temperance Society, with the desire of ascertaining what can be done for the protection of those who seek to resist the drinking usages by which so many of the working men are enslaved, hereby invite communications from any person who may be in circumstances similar to the above. Letters addressed to the Secretary, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, or personal applications, may assist in the arrangement and adoption of vigorous protective measures. Parties may give their names in confidence if they please, but the real name and address must in every instance be furnished, or no attention can be given.

PRIZE ESSAY ON BEER-SHOPS.

The Anti-Beer-shop Association have adjudged their first prize of £20, for the best essay "On the evil effects of beer-shops," to Mr. J. Russom, of Bristol.

LORD ASHLEY.

As our friends will be anxious to know the result of the proposition at the Exeter Hall Meeting, for a deputation to wait upon Lord Ashley, on the subject of true temperance, it is considered desirable to state that a letter was addressed by the Rev. W. W. Robinson, to his Lordship, and a kind answer immediately returned, appointing the next Monday for an interview. The deputation, however, on arriving at Lord Ashley's residence, were informed that his Lordship was detained at Harrow by the dangerous illness of a beloved son. It has pleased God to remove that promising young gentleman by death; consequently, for the present, the proposed interview is postponed.

AN EXTRA ALLOWANCE OF GROG AND ITS LEGITIMATE FRUITS.

MALTA, JAN. 12.—As customary on board all men-of-war, Christmas Eve is generally an eve of jollity. In the Rodney was served out an extra allowance of grog. The day and evening passed off in mirth and harmony; but at half-past nine the order was given to out lights and turn in. Half a dozen youngsters, not long in the service, and half drunk, then began to make a noise and skylark, throwing the mess-kids, &c., about the decks. The captain and officers went round, and all was quiet; but as the noise was renewed, four of the ring-leaders were seized, put in irons, and a few days afterwards punished with four dozen lashes each. This was merely a movement of the "spirit," in the shape of too much rum-and-water, for the Rodney is in fine order, and was highly complimented by Vice-admiral Parker for her state of discipline and practical efficiency as a man-of-war.—[So long as it is "customary on board all men-of-war" to give grog to the seamen, so long will they be liable to be put in irons and flogged, and so long will our ships be in anything but "in fine order," the statement above to the contrary, notwithstanding. It is a question, with some experienced persons, whether if it were put to the vote, a majority of our seamen would not prefer the grog to an extra allowance of good tea, coffee, &c., but from our own experience and knowledge of seafaring men, we venture to assert that they would be willing to dispense with the grog, (its accompaniment, the cat-o-nine-tails they were never partial to) providing a good substitute for this grog was served out to them. The great fault they find with what are called "Temperance Ships," is, that they are not only deprived of the grog, but of every other luxury which could be conveniently and beneficially substituted for it. In those ships where the comforts of the crew are attended to, and when intoxicating drinks are disallowed, there the men are orderly and happy, but in ships where an extra allowance of grog is given, there also we find four dozen lashes are administered into the bargain. In the case above, who was most to blame, the commander or his mates? verily our principles are not yet sufficiently known and appreciated! Ed.]
—From The Cause of the People.

NO TROUBLE.—The drinkers of water needed not to care when the wine was laid waste; they could live as well without it, as they had done,—it was no trouble to the Nazarites. The more delights we make use of to our satisfaction, the more we expose ourselves to sorrow and disappointment.—Matthew Henry.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

To Subscribers for the Chronicle.

With a view to save time, and avoid much correspondence, we have adopted the plan of placing coloured wrappers around the CHRONICLE, when the time has elapsed for which our friends have paid. Should we not be favoured with the wishes of subscribers after that notice, the Chronicle will, as a matter of course, be discontinued.

Should any person, in the habit of receiving the Chronicle, find it at any time either late or missing, we shall be happy to have a line from them, as we find many of our friends have been disappointed by its non-arrival, which may have been caused by some mistake in the address, or oversight at the post-office.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

From May 20th to June 20th, 1849.

JUDGE O'NEALL ON LICENSES.

From the earliest history of our country, even so far back as two hundred years ago, there was legislation on the matter; and though licenses were granted to sell spirituous liquors, yet very stringent laws existed to punish the drunkard; and from that day to the present there has been constant legislation on the subject, especially in South Carolina, where the evils of selling liquors were terribly apparent. As the law now exists, town authorities have the power to reject or grant licenses, as may appear to them right and proper—the persons receiving them coming under bonds to “keep a good and orderly house”—a bond which in the nature of things must be, and is, constantly broken. Who ever heard of a “good and orderly house” in a grog shop?—No one—it can't be. Where occur the homicide, the murders, which so often shock humanity? In grog shops and taverns. What causes the angry passions of man to rise above all restraint, and lead to deeds of blood? The ardent spirits sold by legalized and lawful retailers. What horrid cry comes from yonder place of fashionable amusement, and from that other scene of startling orgies? The death shriek of men stabbed to the heart by those who had lost reason and sense, in the legalized cup. Oh dreadful, terrible traffic, which, under law, sells that which makes a man a demon, and a murderer! And who benefits by this accursed trade? Certainly not community as a mass; for facts have shown that for every dollar received for licenses, five are paid away to sustain the drunken pauper and to punish the drunken criminal. Individuals are not benefited. Experience exhibits the startling fact, that the curse of the Prophet of old rests upon drunkard makers to this day.—They do not prosper in their “basket and store,” nor do their families usually benefit by the morals of the trade; while the husband and father often becomes—alas, how very often—his own destroyer.

The judge states that in an experience of thirty-three years as a Lawyer and Judge he had found that retailing liquors was the cause of more crime in South Carolina than anything else—and this is confirmed by the experience of every Judge in the land.—Charlestown Mercury.

A TRUE PHILANTHROPIST.

It is melancholy to think how systematically calous society is to the struggles which are before the discharged criminal. Yet this is the great source of crime. Here the dam must be found. If the current be arrested at all, it will be here. It will be no purpose that we build model prisons, and change our ancient penal terms for phrases more polite—that our “dungeons” become “workshops” and “oratories,” that our “prisons” become “hospitals,” and our “transports” “exiles,” unless we find out more effectually what to do with our offenders after punishment.

It is in this good work that Thomas Wright, of Manchester, has made himself a name. He has no theory; in fact, no plan. Like Howard, he is a simple-minded man, whose attention has been accidentally directed to the vices of the prison-world, of which he knew nothing previously. And with theories of penal science he has not meddled, but gone on doing all the good in his power in a straightforward matter of fact way, just as if the theorists had not beset themselves with every sort of difficulty.

Thomas Wright is now a venerable old man of about seventy, but is still remarkably vigorous for his age. He is the father of a very large family—nineteen children if we mistake not. He fills an humble but confidential situation in a large foundry. Of the way in which his attention was attracted in the first instance to the prison world, he gives the following account:—There was a man of a sailor-like appearance who had got work at the foundry as a labourer; he was a steady and industrious workman, and had obtained the favourable notice of Mr. Wright. One day the employer came, and asked if he (Wright) was aware that they had a returned transport in the place? He had learned that the sailor was such. Mr. Wright desired to be allowed to speak with the man, and ascertain the fact. Permission was given; and, during the day, he took a casual opportunity—not to excite the suspicions of the other workmen—of saying to the man, “My friend, where did you work last?” “I’ve been abroad,” was the reply. The man was not a liar. After some conversation he confessed, with tears in his eyes, that he had been a convict. He said he was desirous of not falling again into ill courses, and kept his secret to avoid being refused work if he told the truth. Wright was convinced that in the future he would act honestly, and repairing to their common employer, begged as a personal favour that the man might not be discharged. He even offered to become bound for his good conduct. This was ten years ago; and the prejudice against persons who had ever broken the law was more intense than it is now. There were objections; and other partners had to be consulted in so delicate a matter. Great numbers of men were employed in the foundry; and should the matter come to their knowledge, it would have the appearance to them of encouraging crime. This was on the day of paying wages for the week. Before night, however, Wright had the satisfaction to obtain a promise that, upon his responsibility, the convict should be kept. So far all was well.

The following day Wright went to look after his protégé,—he was gone. On inquiring, he found he had been paid off and discharged the previous night. It was a mistake. The first orders for his dismissal had not been countermanded, and gone he was. Mr. Wright at once sent off a messenger to the man’s lodging to bring him back to the foundry. He returned only to say the man had left his lodgings at five o’clock in the morning, with a bundle containing all his property under his arm. He had said he should go towards Bolton, and try to get work there. This was the only trace of him. But Mr. Wright, still anxious to save the poor creature from destruction, sent another man off to the Bolton road, with orders to walk on rapidly and approach any sailor-like man he should overtake, and if he found him to be the same man, to desire him to return, as it was all a mistake. This messenger came back without him also; further search was now useless, and from that day to this, the poor fellow has never been seen nor heard of by his generous friend. Let us hope he found another.

The unfortunate termination of this affair was well calculated to affect a humane mind. And, pondering much on the subject, Mr. Wright began to see that this case—so extraordinary and pitiable to him, because it came home to his feelings—was only one of a mighty number, every one of which had an equally strong claim upon his sympathy and assistance. He went to the New Bailey and saw the prisoners—he spoke with them, read with them. For a time his visits, which now became regular on the Sabbath, his only day of rest, were not approved of by the chaplain and governor. They were somewhat jealous; but by-and-by they found out how useful he might be made. The chaplain was an upright and intelligent man—a little jealous of laics, perhaps, but well-intentioned and very desirous of doing good in his office. A prisoner was about to be discharged, of whose future good conduct Mr. Wright felt assured, and he was asked if he could find the man a situation. He did so. This was the commencement of his ministry of love. In ten years from that time he has succeeded in rescuing upwards of three hundred persons from the career of crime. Many of these cases are very peculiar; very few indeed have relapsed into crime. He has constantly five or six on his list, for whom he is looking out for work. Very frequently he persuades the former employer to give the erring another trial. Sometimes he becomes guarantee for their honesty and good conduct—for a poor man, in considerable sums—£20. to £60. In only one instance has a bond so given been forfeited, and that was a very peculiar case. The large majority keep their places with credit to themselves and to their noble benefactor. Most of them—for Mr. Wright never loses sight of a man he has once befriended, through his own neglect—attend church or Sunday-school, adhere to their temperance pledges, and live honest and reputable lives. And all this is the work of one unaided, poor, uninfluential old man! What, indeed, might he not do, were he gifted with the fortune and the social position of a Howard?

Nor is this all. The ministry of this good man is a heavy drain upon his limited means. He gives away a large portion of his earnings. He cannot always procure situations for men immediately on their discharge. Weeks may elapse, and in the interval he keeps them, sometimes three or four at a time, out of his own pocket.

What do these facts indicate? If an obscure individual can do so much, what might not an organized society do? Is not this man’s time too valuable to be wasted in the common duties of a foundry? A small pension from government—a tithe of the amount his exertions have saved to the state—would set him free to devote his entire life to the good work. And why do not the philanthropists of Manchester organize a society with which he might co-operate? A few hundreds judiciously laid out would save many thousands. A little assistance, as Mr. Wright is continually finding, applied at the right moment, saves from a life of crime. Every such redemption is a great gain. Cure is cheaper than punishment.

DR. RAFFLES' CAUTIONS.

With much pleasure we have read the volume of Lectures, delivered during last winter at Exeter Hall, by various eminent ministers, before the Young Men's Christian Association, and recently published by the Tract Society.

Amongst them that by the Rev. Dr. Raffles, on "The Internal Evidences of the Old and New Testament," occupies a prominent place. After adducing different internal proofs of the divine origin of Christianity, the Dr. makes a powerful appeal to its effects on the conduct and character of those who feel the strong influence of its motives, and act under the guidance of its principles. He then goes on to say—

"I am well aware that the force of this argument may be somewhat diminished by the acknowledged triumph of the total abstinence principle in the present day. The zealous advocates of that principle (and all honour be to them, for incalculable is the good which they have been instrumental in effecting) may point to similar results in proof of its efficacy. But let it be remembered that christianity had been accumulating such trophies for a long succession of ages before the total abstinence pledge was ever heard or thought of; that similar triumphs it is achieving still without its aid. . . . You are a Young Men's Christian Association; and to you as Christians, do I say with confidence, teetotalism must not be permitted to triumph over the Gospel, nor be honoured at its expense."

One thing is very clear; that the Rev. Dr. entirely misunderstands the first principles of the cause, which he thus goes out of his way to condemn. The evidence of the divine origin of Christianity drawn from its effects on the lives and characters of its consistent professors, diminished by the success of total abstinence!!! The absurdity is too palpable to call for a refutation, were it not backed by the high character and standing of such a man as Dr. Raffles.

The root of this grievous mistake is an idea evidently present in the Dr.'s mind, that christianity and total abstinence are opposed to each other—were this really the case, his inference would be unassailable; but is it so? On the contrary, we think a pointed and valuable argument for the truth of Christianity might be drawn from the very facts which the lecturer arrays against himself. At the time when the temperance movement began intoxicating beverages were universally considered not only a luxury, but almost a necessary of life. Meanwhile the evils caused by their abuse were appalling; the land abounded with drunkards, a class of whose reclamation and conversion, long experience and vain exertions had caused even ministers of the Gospel almost entirely to despair. What was to be done? A ray of light at length broke in upon the minds of a few. What if the Apostle's language—1 Cor. viii. 13; Rom. xiv. 21—was to be understood literally? A little band of earnest christian philanthropists pledged themselves to total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, and made this the first step in an attempt to effect the physical and spiritual emancipation of their fallen and sin-bound brethren; with what success, Dr. R. has himself testified. Again, the "foolishness of God" was found to be wiser than men; again, the simple and unostentatious weapons of the Cross triumphed over the strongholds of Satan. The world says, "Are we to deny ourselves the temperate use of any article of diet, which some men may be weak and foolish enough to abuse? let them bear their own burden, we have remonstrated with them, and there our duty ceases! The word of God says, "If wine cause thy brother to offend, it is not good for thee to drink wine." The world's plan for reclaiming drunkards, even when employed by the Church, utterly failed; God's method has been tried, and has proved effectual. For the sin of drunkenness, as it exists in the present day and in our own country, we think total abstinence is the remedy clearly indicated by the spirit and letter of the Scriptures, and that remedy fairly applied, in the hands of christian men, has been crowned with entire success, whilst all others have as signally failed.

Do these results diminish the force of any argument for the divine origin of Christianity drawn from its effects as exhibited in the lives and conduct of its consistent professors? We think that no man of sound mind, be he christian or infidel, can affirm that they do: and we sincerely regret that Dr. R. should ever have appeared to acknowledge the validity of such an objection. Might he not justly have accumulated with his argument the evidence afforded by the temperance reformation, and have exerted the energy of his well-cultivated mind to shew, that self-denial for the good of others, was an important practical principle of the gospel; and that thus the triumphs of teetotalism were, in fact, most striking and satisfactory evidences of the divinity of that religion, by the power of which they were sustained, and by the spirit of which they were animated and inspired!—From a Correspondent.

THE BEAUTIFUL TOTAL ABSTINENCE BOYS.

Ancient history tells us of four boys, of great beauty and intelligence, that were carried captives from their native country and presented to the king, a mighty monarch, to stand before him as his most honoured servants. These favoured youths were provided with every means which the court of this great monarch could furnish for making them skilful in all wisdom, cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, beautiful in person, and accomplished in manners. The richest fruits and the most delicious wines were given to nourish them. But they were lads of greater wisdom than even those persons who were set to perfect and polish them. And when the wine was brought them to drink, they decided among themselves, "None for us." It is not said that they signed a pledge, but they formed a total abstinence society, and it was impossible for those who were set over them to break their rank. "If you pine away," said they, "we shall endanger our heads to the king." "But," said the boys, "give us WATER to drink ten days, and then if our countenances look not better than the countenances of those who drink wine, then deal with us as you see fit." The experiment was eminently successful. Their countenances were fairer than all the children who partook of the king's delicacies.

For the character of these youths, when they became men, look into your bibles, in the book of Daniel.—Bombay Temperance Advocate.

Doings of Strong Drink.

AN AWFUL FACT.—The following very awful event occurred in my parish a few days ago. If you think it likely to be useful as a warning against the, alas! too common sin of drunkenness, and as shewing the evils which frequently result from attendance at the race-course, perhaps you will give the narrative a place in your magazine. On Friday, the 21st ult., two men, fellow-labourers, employed as charcoal-burners, came to the town of — for the purpose of attending the races. Of their conduct during the day I know nothing; but the whole of the following night was spent by them in drinking at different houses in the town. About six o'clock on Saturday morning, they called at a public-house in this parish, where the awful event which I am about to relate took place. At the time of their arrival they were both in a state of intoxication. They called, however, for more drink, which was supplied them, and they continued drinking with some others who were present for more than an hour. An altercation then took place between them, and the one challenged his companion to fight, at the same time declaring, with a fearful oath, that "he would go and dig his grave, and then come and settle him." He took up a spade which was at the door, and went out, apparently with this intention. On his return into the house he said, with an oath, "There, I have dug your grave, and now I'll do for you." He proceeded to take off his coat and waistcoat—his companion, who shewed no disposition to fight, at the same time observing, "Perhaps you have dug your own grave." No sooner had he taken off his clothes, than he sank down upon a chair, put his head upon his hand, and died instantly, without uttering a word or even a sigh. From the evidence of the medical gentleman, who was immediately sent for, it appeared that he had died from the rupture of a vessel in the region of the heart, the effect of excessive drinking and excitement. The writer was present at the inquest when the different facts stated were proved in evidence.—Churchman's Penny Magazine.

A DRUNKARD'S MISTAKE.—James Perry, a mechanic, was brought before Mr. Yardley, charged under the following circumstances:—The complainant, James Purcell, residing in Shakspeare's-walk, Shadwell, said he was alarmed at a late hour on Christmas night, by a man entering his room and pulling him out of bed. As soon as he recovered from the fright, he collared the intruder, and asked him who he was and what he wanted, on which the stranger said he was in his own room, and wanted to go to bed. He endeavoured to get the man from the room, when a violent struggle ensued, and his night-shirt, the only garment he had on, was torn to pieces. The noise brought several persons to the apartment with lights, and the prisoner was secured, but not before he made a desperate resistance.—The prisoner said he had been enjoying the festivities of Christmas with his friends, and feeling ill, he left them, with the intention of returning home, and strayed into the complainant's house, the door of which was open, by mistake, he believing it to be his own. He was far gone with liquor at the time, and scarcely knew what he was about.—Mr. Yardley asked the prisoner where he lived, and he named a street half a mile from Shakspeare's walk; on which the magistrate said it was strange indeed he should have committed such a mistake; and although he acquitted him of any intention of committing a felony, he must order him to pay six shillings for the man's shirt he had destroyed, or to be imprisoned for five days.—Standard of Freedom.

ATTEMPT AT SUICIDE.—A DRUNKEN HUSBAND.—Mary Moss, a respectable-looking woman, was charged with making two attempts to throw herself off Waterloo-bridge into the river.—A gentleman named Bickerton stated that on Wednesday night, as he was walking over Waterloo-bridge, he saw the prisoner from the opposite side enter one of the recesses and get upon the parapet. Suspecting that she was about to throw herself over, he ran to the spot, and seized her clothes, while she struggled to get free and to precipitate herself into the river. He had some difficulty in holding her, and being a strong woman, she did break away from his grasp, and again attempted to ascend the parapet, but he prevented it, and a policeman coming up at the time, he gave her into custody. The witness added that he subsequently heard her state that she was prompted to make the attempt upon her life owing to the brutal treatment she experienced at the hands of her husband. She was perfectly sober at the time.—The policeman said that the prisoner's husband had been keeping up the Christmas holidays, and that he was drunk night and day, and beat and abused her in such a manner that she was compelled to quit the house.—The magistrate inquired if her husband was made aware of what had occurred, and the reply being in the affirmative, the husband's name was then called aloud, but no answer was returned, and the magistrate having remarked on the heartless conduct of the man, said that after the unfortunate woman had made such a determined attempt to put an end to her life, he would not feel justified in permitting her to go at large, although she promised not to repeat her attempt, without responsible persons becoming surety for her, and he therefore committed her.—Standard of Freedom.

FRUITS OF THE DRINKING SYSTEM.

"Understand ye brutish among the people:
And ye fools when will ye be wite?"—Psalm xciv.

The brutishness and unnatural selfishness of the sot, is at times so disgustingly exhibited, that all the maudlin recklessness of drunkenness, which some have called generosity, because of its imbecility and waste, cannot shelter its depraved and odious character. The wife, the child, the parent; every tie is sacrificed to low appetite, and to a covetousness of vice, which is disgusting, sensual, and devilish. A recent exemplification of this form of brutality may be shortly sketched. A smith who had worked but a part of the week, spent in the whiskey-shop what wages were coming to him; but this did not make him more than partly drunk; consequently, he returned to his house to demand any few half-pence which his unfortunate wife might have saved to provide his family with food. She saw that he had strength enough to be brutal, and his savage look showed that he was dangerous; she fled, and took two children with her; locking after her one room, in which there was still some unpawned furniture. Though fierce and furious, his sottish stupidity prevented his being able to break in the door, so seeing nothing else, he seized a cage with a bird in it, which hung in the passage, with this for sale he staggered along, but his brawling and imprecatory mode of tendering the bird and cage for sale made the passengers keep away from him. During this scene his child, a boy about six years old, whose pet the bird was, prayed to have it returned, but in vain; at length the cruel tyrant dragged out the bird, wrung its head off, and trampled it, swearing though he could not sell it, he could the cage; he then reeled along to one of those doubtful marts where things are bought without inquiring as to the justice of the sale, got sixpence for the cage, and made for a public-house. This boy badly trained and passionate, screamed furiously, and tried to prevent the fellow from entering the dram-shop, but it was no use, the miscreant turned round, and striking his child a furious blow flung him prostrate and bleeding along the stones, thus perpetrating the deed of a Demon outside the threshold of one of our pandemoniums. This is but one of many such scenes, the fruits of drunkenness; the seeming dam of all

"High passions—anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord;
Toss'd and turbulent,
Her understanding rul'd not, and the will Heard not her love, both in subjection now
To sensual appetite; who, from beneath,
Usurping over sovereign reason, claimed Superior sway." Paradise Lost.

Do not such frightful evils loudly call every heart of mercy to the rescue?

THE HORRORS OF DRUNKENNESS.

We refer our readers to an advertisement in our last month's Chronicle, bearing the above title. The advertiser is an aged man—we believe upwards of seventy summer-suns have shone upon him—and although "unblessed by fortune and to fame unknown," he is possessed of genius, and deserving of encouragement. His poem on the blessings of temperance, has some admirable thoughts, and not a few elegant expressions. The plates advertised, are sketches by George Cruikshank, Esq., illustrative of the above poem. It is said that "Time builds a monument to merit, but denies it a house," and as John O'Neill has, by his genius, erected his own monument, we hope our temperance friends will, by purchasing it, help him to secure his house and furnish his table.

Notices of Meetings.

BECCLES.

On the 28th February, the members of Beccles Temperance Society celebrated their ninth anniversary by a tea-party and public-meeting. A goodly number sat down to tea, and enjoyed themselves in a manner to which the worshippers of Bacchus are utter strangers; after which, a sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Wright, Baptist minister of this place, from the familiar text, "To him that knoweth to do good," &c. And we think we never heard anything more applicable and soul-stirring in our lives, and we fear not that good will be the result.

J. ARNOUGH.

BRISTOL.

The annual procession and fete of the teetotalers of this city and neighbourhood, took place on Tuesday, and drew together a vast assemblage of people. Large bodies of teetotalers came from Gloucester, Bath, Exeter, and other places, to join in the procession, which was formed in the old market with all the "pomp and circumstance" that accompanies such demonstrations. Beautiful banners, multitudinous in number, and diversified in shape, size, and description, flouted the sky over the heads of the assembled friends of the temperance cause, whose extremely neat appearance and orderly demeanour, created favourable impressions in the minds of the surrounding spectators, and elicited many eulogistic commentaries from individuals whose predilections were more for "wine that maketh glad the heart of man," or for "pots o' the smallest ale," than for the contents of "the cup which cheers but not inebriates." The procession which numbered, we believe, between 3000 and 4000, started about eleven o'clock, amid the music of several bands, and proceeded through the city to the Zoological-gardens, where arrangements had been made for spending the rest of the day in innocent and rational amusement. In the course of the afternoon, addresses were delivered by John Cassell, Esq., of London, Mr. Russon, of Bristol, Mr. Richard Horn, Mr. James Balfour, Missionary of the National Temperance Society, and Mrs. Stamp.

The Gardens were well attended during the day, and towards evening, there were at least 19,000 persons within the boundaries of this favourite place of resort.—Abridged from the Bristol Mercury.

JERSEY.

This town has lately been favoured with the efficient services of the eminently successful advocate of temperance, the Rev. R. Gray Mason, agent to the "British Association for the promotion of Temperance," whose labours throughout the United Kingdom have won for him a far extended fame and "golden opinions." In this town, Mr. Mason has preached six most excellent sermons on the Sabbath-day. In the English Independent Chapel, on the evenings of two Sabbaths, he has been listened to with delight by very crowded congregations. In the French Independent Chapel on Sunday afternoon last, a very large congregation heard him with joy; in a word, the whole of the services have been attended with large and respectable audiences, and Mr. Mason has, to a considerable extent, been the means of removing that prejudice which existed against the temperance movement. Mr. Mason has also delivered five public Lectures in the Temperance Hall; one at St. Catherine's Bay, and one in the French independent chapel; the whole of which have been well and numerous attended. In fact, we have never before seen lectures or any other public meetings attended by such large and respectable audiences.

A very great interest has in consequence been excited in favour of the temperance cause. A considerable number of pledges have been taken, many of them from respectable members of Christian churches; while in a pecuniary point of view, we are glad to learn Mr. Mason's services stand in the very first rank.

The crowning meeting took place last evening, when a very large company took tea in the Temperance Hall; the tea was provided gratuitously by a number of influential ladies; nearly 200 persons partook of "the cup which cheers but not inebriates."

After tea a public meeting was held; the chair was taken by the society's president, Mr. Collette, and for upwards of two hours, Mr. Mason delivered a very large company, with one of the best speeches ever delivered. Mr. Mason decidedly possesses a talent to please—and causing his hearers to be in good humour with themselves, while the arguments in favour of the principles he advocates, are of that nature that none can gainsay or contradict; he seems to have an inexhaustible fund of humorous anecdotes closely connected with the subject of temperance. May he continue to prosper.—Jersey British Press.

NOTICE !

THE Committee of the National Temperance Society, are desirous of having a Sermon preached in London, on the subject of True Temperance, at least once in each month; and are in correspondence with several ministers of various denominations, with a view to such an arrangement.

They have great pleasure in informing their friends, that the Rev. B. Parsons, of Ebley, (author of "Anti-Bacchus,") has kindly consented to deliver the first of the series, on Sunday Evening, July 1st, at Zion Chapel, Whitechapel.

No collection will be made, as the object is simply the presentation of our principles, by this means to the religious part of the community.

A MEDICAL OPINION.—An unfortunate man, who had never drank water enough to warrant the disease, was reduced to such a state of drowsy that a consultation of physicians was held upon his case. They agreed that tapping was necessary, and the poor patient was invited to submit to the operation, which he seemed inclined to do, in spite of the entreaties of his son, a boy of seven years old. "Oh! father, father, do not let them tap you," screamed the urchin, in an agony of tears, "do anything, but do not let them tap you!" "Why, my dear," said the afflicted parent, "it will do me good, and I shall live long in health to make you happy." "No, father, no, you will not. There never was anything tapped in our house that lasted longer than a week."

BEST ACCORDING TO NATURE.—The Almighty gave us corn, but not gin; grapes, but not wine; barley, but not ale; rice, but not arrack; in the form which God gives they are nutritious and valuable; in the state into which man changes them, they are injurious and destructive.—South India Temperance Journal.

NEW USE FOR ARDENT SPIRITS.—A correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator says that a little alcohol, or almost any kind of ardent spirits, placed on the bottom boards around and under a hive of belligerent bees, will allay their fury, and cause them to cease fighting. If an article which sets the human race by the ears will produce peace and harmony in a hive of bees, the fact is certainly anomalous.—Washingtonian.

Augustus Caesar dined on simple cheese, and a few small dishes. Cuvius Fabricius eat out of earthen vessels, on herbs gathered with his own hands; and Cato the Censor drank none other wine than his soldiers did. Augustus used seldom to drink wine—not above thrice at supper; but now ye quaff before meat, and at meat, and your carouses cannot be numbered. He when he was athirst, eat bread dipped in cold water, or a moist apple, or a cucumber; but ye inflame your thirst instead of quenching it; nor remember that ye drink the blood of the earth, and the poison of hemlock, as did Alexander, who slew his friend and perished himself in wine.—Petrarch's view of human life.

Poetry.

A DROP OF GIN.

Gin! Gin! a drop of gin!
 What magnified monsters circle therein!
 Ragged, and stained with filth and mud,
 Some plague-spotted, and some with blood!
 Shapes of misery, shame, and sin!
 Figures that make us loathe and tremble,
 Creatures scarce human, that more resemble
 Broods of diabolical kin,
 Ghoule and Vampire, demon and gin!

Gin! Gin! a drop of gin!
 The dream of Satan! the liquor of sin!
 Distill'd from the fell
 Alembics of hell,
 By guilt and death, his own brother and twin,
 That man might fall
 Still lower than all
 The meanest creatures with scale and fin.
 But hold—we are neither Barebones nor Pryune,
 Who lash with such rage
 The sins of the age;
 Then, instead of making too much a din,
 Let anger be mute,
 And sweet mercy dilute,
 With a drop of pity, the drop of gin!

Gin! Gin! a drop of gin!
 When darkly adversity's day's set in,
 And the friends and peers
 Of earlier years
 Prove warm without, but cold within,
 And cannot retrace
 A familiar face
 That's steep'd in poverty up to the chin;
 But snub, neglect, cold shoulder and cut
 The ragged pauper, misfortune's butt,—
 Hardly acknowledged by kith and kin,
 Because poor rat!
 He has no cravat;
 A seedy coat, and a hole in that!
 No sole to his shoe, and no brim to his hat;
 Nor a change of linen, except his skin—
 No gloves—no vest,
 Either second or best;
 And what is worse than all the rest,
 No light heart, though his breeches are thin;
 While Time elopes
 With all golden hopes,
 And even with those of pewter and tin;
 The brightest dreams,
 And the best of schemes,
 All knocked down, like a wicket by Mynn.
 Each castle in air
 Seized by Giant Despair,
 No prospect in life worth a minikin pin;
 No credit, no cash,
 No cold mutton to hash,
 No bread—not even potatoes to mash,
 No coal in the cellar, no wine in the bin;
 Smashed, broken to bits,
 With judgments and writs,
 Bonds, bills, and cognovits distracting the wits,
 In the webs that the spiders of Chancery spin,
 Till weary of life, its worry and strife,
 Black visions are rife of a razor—a knife—
 Of poison—a rope—"louping over a linn."

Gin! Gin! A drop of gin!
 Oh! then its tremendous temptations begin,
 To take, alas!
 To the fatal glass;

And happy the wretch that does not win
To change the black hue
Of his ruin to blue,
While angels sorrow, and demons grin,
And lose the rheumatic
Chill of his attic
By plunging into the palace of gin!

TESTIMONIAL TO Mr. T. A. SMITH.

A number of Friends of the Temperance Movement wishing to mark their appreciation of the great services rendered to Teetotalism, by the zealous and scientific advocacy of Mr. T. A. Smith, during a period of Thirteen Years, have determined upon presenting that gentleman with a Testimonial, to consist of Electrical and Chemical Apparatus, &c., to enable him to prosecute his labours of benevolence upon a scale more commensurate with his talents; for which purpose William Cash, Esq., has kindly consented to act as Treasurer. Believing that Teetotalers generally would gladly contribute towards making this Testimonial worthy of Mr. T. A. Smith's acceptance and their own regard, the undermentioned gentlemen have engaged to receive subscriptions:—Wm. Cash, Esq., (Treasurer;) John Cassell, Esq., 80, Fenchurch-street; Dr. Goutrley, 4, Easton-square; Temperance Provident Institution, 39, Moorgate-street; Rev. I. Doxsey, National Temperance Office, Tokenhouse-yard; Mr. West, 1, Cambridge-terrace, Clapham-road; Messrs. Wilson and Campbell, Blackfriars-road; Mr. J. W. Green; Mr. Spriggs, 14, Brook-street, Lambeth; Mr. Tisdale, High-street, Kensington; Mr. Cole, Blackheath, Greenwich; Mr. T. Machin, 25, Lower Kennington-lane.

June 21st, 1849.

THOMAS MACHIN, Sec.

AWAY WITH ALL YOUR ALCOHOL.

Every teetotaler should know how to make that beautiful beverage, Lemon Syrup, which far surpasses all other drinks as a substitute for the alcoholic poison: it is a pleasant and wholesome drink, well-suited for young or old, rich or poor; and all classes of people who have been invited to taste it have declared it to be the best drink that has yet been offered to the public in the room of intoxicants. Four pint and a half bottles of pure Syrup will make seventy-six half-pints of pure XX, can be made in twenty-five minutes, and costs 2s. 7d. A full recipe, with every particular, will be sent to any person on forwarding with their address, 31 postage stamps to the advertiser, J. WHITLEY, MR. TISDALE'S 5, CHURCH-STREET, KENSINGTON, LONDON.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

5th, The extent to which the example of Teetotal parents would promote the moral and religious well-being of families, and afford to parents the means of sending their children to school.

6th, The practical working of the drinking-usages and customs in manufactories, workshops and elsewhere.

The names of the adjudicators will be announced at a future time.

The Essays, which must not exceed forty-six 8vo pages, to be sent under cover, accompanied with a sealed letter enclosing the real name and address of the writer, on or before the 1st of November, 1849, to the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

The Committee, also, offer a further prize of £10 for the best Essay on the most efficient means of conducting Temperance Societies, with the view of accelerating, and giving permanence to the Total Abstinence Reformation. This Essay must not exceed thirty-two 8vo pages, and is open to competition by writers of all classes. To be sent in by the 1st of September, to the office of the National Temperance Society, and the adjudication to be made under the direction of the Committee.

ISAAC DOXSEY, Secretary.

THE UNITED KINGDOM TEMPERANCE AND GENERAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, 39, MOORGATE STREET, LONDON.

Enrolled under Act of Parliament.

This Institution was established on the 31st December, 1840. It has issued upwards of 3300 Policies, and the deaths have averaged less than 6 per annum, a fact which is believed to be unparalleled.

THE FIRST DIVISION OF PROFITS will take place at the end of next year, when the whole of the surplus funds will be apportioned among the assured, in three different modes, at each Member's option.

LOWER PREMIUMS than in most Mutual Offices; thus securing an immediate Bonus of 10 to 30 per cent.

Every assurer is a Member, and entitled to vote at the Annual Meeting.

The benefits assured can be secured to survivors FREE OF DUTY, by simply registering the names in the Books of the Society.

Persons abstaining from alcoholic beverages, are assured in a distinct section, free from any possible losses through intemperance.

GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY, PATENTEES,
City Road, London,

It cannot now be doubted, even by the most sceptical, but that Gutta Percha must henceforward be regarded as one of the blessings of a gracious Providence, inasmuch as it affords a sure and certain protection from cold and damp feet, and thus tends to protect the body from disease and premature death.

"GUTTA PERCHA TUBING," being so extraordinary a conductor of sound, is used as speaking tubes in mines, manufactories, warehouses, &c. This tubing may also be applied in Churches and Chapels for the purpose of enabling deaf persons to listen to the sermon, &c. For conveying messages from one room or building to another, or from the mast-head to the deck of a vessel, it is invaluable.

MILL BANDS.—The increasing demand for the Gutta Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLACKS, &c.—Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to manufacturers, engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-bucket valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size or thickness without seam or joint, and as cold water will never soften them, they seldom need any repair.

Gutta Percha soles, solution, inkstands, card trays, medallions, picture-frames, brackets, mouldings, window-blind cornices, vases, fire-buckets, bowls, pen-trays, bougies, catheters, stethoscopes, thin lining, thread, flower-pots, ear-trumpets, &c. &c., may be had at the Company's Works, Wharf Road, City Road, London, or of any of their wholesale dealers in town or country.

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, 1849.

The time of religious and benevolent festivity has again arrived, and we hasten with glad hearts and smiling countenances, to meet and welcome our friends and fellow-labourers in the temperance reformation. Never, perhaps, have the friends of Temperance had more reason for devout thankfulness to the "God of all grace," or more cause for mutual gratulation and encouragement. It is true the desolating curse has not been utterly banished—it is true the triumph of temperance principles is not complete—it is true the manufacture of, and traffic in strong drink is not yet frowned out of existence—it is true that the Christian church in this country has not yet consecrated her moral influence to the temperance cause—but, still the storms of opposition have subsided, and our vessel has not sunk nor stranded—she has outridden the fury of the tempest—the mock lightnings of petty wit, have ceased to illumine the drinking-customs with their lurid glare—the hoarse murmurings of sub-terranean thunder are silent, or heard only faintly and in the distance—and calmness and sunshine invite us to labour lovingly to spread the truths we have espoused.

In presenting our friends with an outline of the state and progress of the temperance cause, our attention is first summoned to the condition of those organizations which are devoted to its advancement. We regret that the absence of a well-digested and uniform system of registration prevents us from giving anything like a complete view of the working of local societies, and the number of members they respectively contain.

The following table presents a view of what has been done in the several localities to which it refers, and from the indiscriminate way in which the returns have been selected, and the wide district over which they extend, we think they may be taken as a fair sample of the country in general.

These returns evidently indicate that where the local societies are in a healthy state, enjoying plenty of exercise, they are increasing in strength, both numerically and influentially. We will not make any selection but leave our statistical friends to examine this subject carefully, much regretting that we cannot furnish them with so complete and accurate an account as we desire.

A few extracts from communications received from various parts of the country, should not be lost either for their interest or importance.

ANDOVER.—The report says, "It is with regret that we have to mourn the absence of ministers and other influential persons from our meetings as well as from our ranks. On the other hand, we receive great encouragement from all classes not excepting the clergy and gentry of the neighbourhood, thus proving their willingness to support by increasing the funds, although not by taking the pledge, and exercising a little self-denial by which they would efficiently aid the benevolent object we contemplate."

BRADFORD LONG-PLEDGED TEETOTAL ASSOCIATION.—"A number of interesting meetings had been held during the winter, several talented lecturers had been engaged, and the register reported that upwards of 1,500 persons had signed the pledge of the Association since the last Anniversary. The committee having learned that great numbers of young persons, of both sexes, visited the music saloons of the town, resolved to obtain some statistical information on the point, and on Saturday evening, the 12th of February last, persons were appointed by the committee to stand at the entrance of the Bermondsey and Druid's Arms, from seven until ten o'clock, and count the number of persons who entered. The following result could be depended upon for accuracy. Persons entering the Bermondsey Saloon:—males, apparently above the age of sixteen, 491; under sixteen, 169; females, 99; total, 759. Druid's Arms Inn Saloon:—males, above sixteen, 250; under sixteen, 163; females, 49; total, 462. Grand total at both Saloons in three hours in one night, 1221. Each person has to pay 3d. for entrance, which is returned in the shape of some kind of liquor. The consequence is, that most of the money is spent in intoxicating liquor, which, combined with the grossly immoral songs, recitations and indecent exhibitions displayed on these occasions, are inculcating lessons and implanting habits amongst youth of our town fearful to contemplate. These exhibitions were occurring nightly, and the committee submitted whether it was not within the province of the temperance reformation to adopt plans of a counteracting tendency in order to put a stop to this system of wholesale demoralization."

EDINBURGH.—Our Scotch friends are displaying in the temperance reformation the cool, steady, perseverance so eminently characteristic of their nation. Mr. Johnston writes,—"Our society is in a most prosperous condition. At present the weekly additions average fully one hundred. With our staff of advocates, missionaries and other appliances, we are hopeful of being able to teetotalize this drunken community at a much earlier period than many may be disposed to expect."

FITZROY TEETOTAL ASSOCIATION.—"Your committee would not calculate upon the progress of this cause, solely by the numbers who publicly subscribe their name, though they would impress on the minds of those who are decided in respect of our principles the great importance of so doing. Since last September, 284 signatures have been attached to the pledge of this Association; from recent inquiries which have been instituted, 119 are found to remain firm, of whom thirty-seven have become members (no person is considered a member unless subscribing towards the support of the cause) forty-eight were found to have declined, the reason in every case assigned for so doing, being either a strong appetite for drink, or the opposition they received from the custom of drinking so much connected with trading and followed in the workshops—all without a single exception praising teetotalism as a practical and beneficial system, nine of these have re-signed; of the remaining 117 from removals to great distances and other causes it could not be ascertained."

BOROUGH OF GREENWICH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.—This association was established in November, 1846, on the principle of "total abstinence," but differing in several of its characteristics from any previously instituted, as auxiliaries to the great temperance cause. Its objects were, "to diminish the evils of intemperance," and "to abolish the drinking usages;" and the committee, believing from their individual observation and experience, that the time had come when the true philosophy of the subject should be brought more prominently before the middle and upper classes of society, and prosecuted in a manner more generally adapted to arrest their attention and command their consideration, organized the following as their plan of operations:—

1st. Holding regular meetings once in each month, in a place suited, by its comfort and respectability, for the classes they more particularly wished to interest.

2nd. Requiring from all their members a moderate annual or monthly pecuniary subscription.

3rd. Obtaining but two or three well-qualified advocates to address their monthly meetings, who should be engaged, and their names announced beforehand, by means of printed bills, &c.

4th. Using no objectionable or equivocal aids in promulgating their principles, but relying on the power of moral and scientific argument, and the inherent truth of those principles on which their practice is based.

5th. Employing a suitable person as district visitor and collector.

The committee report that these regular monthly meetings have been held, without intermission, in the GREENWICH LITERARY INSTITUTION, (beside several special lectures and public meetings,) which have been uniformly well and respectfully attended. They report further, that considering the money-qualification required by the rules from each member, they progress steadily and satisfactorily: that now nearly 150 members are in active co-operation with them; that many influential persons have aided them by contributions; and that altogether, this society being, it is believed, laid on a broad and permanent basis, cannot fail (by God's blessing) to exert an influence for good throughout this populous and highly-important district.

HENLEY TEETOTAL SOCIETY.—This society has now been in existence about fifteen months. At its formation, there were but about six total abstainers to be found in this populous town. Several efforts had previously been made by different individuals, at different times, to introduce the principles, and establish a society of this kind, but all efforts appeared in vain. The subject was at last taken up, in right good earnest, by a few individuals who had for years been pledged teetotalers, and whose lot had, in the order of Providence, been cast here. As the result of zealous, united, and persevering efforts, we have a tolerable good society. From six, our numbers have gone up to nearly 200. It is but just, however, to say, that some have broken their pledge; so that the members now on the register fall below the number. Nevertheless, among those who still practise total abstinence, we have many "good men and true," who are determined to follow up the attack made upon the intemperance which so awfully prevails, and perseveringly labour, and "never give up," until the "good time coming" shall have fully arrived, when the degrading, brutalizing, drinking habits of our fellow-men shall be entirely banished, and righteousness, truth, and peace shall prevail.

Huddersfield.—The report says, "In addition to the facts given above, there are two Christian churches where the ordinance is celebrated in unfermented wine."

Lowestoft.—The secretary writes, "We had the happiness of taking the name of one man last May, when he was drunk. I visited him on the following day and left some tracts. Every article in his cottage shewed the awful effects of strong drink. He has regularly attended our meetings both public and private ever since, and I have made frequent calls at his house. My last visit I contrasted with the first last May, and could not find words to express the difference. It rejoiced my heart greatly, for I am sure, if there had never been any good done in the temperance cause beyond the above, it would amply repay us for all our labour, for he has not only become a sober man, but he is constantly found at the house of God on the Sabbath day."

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Our correspondent says, "I beg to state that the temperance cause both in this town and for twenty miles around is progressing most satisfactorily, meetings well attended, signatures numerous, and the advocacy of an intelligent and respectable character. We thought that the enthusiasm round about Christmas would have subsided, ere this, but it appears to gain strength daily, and is bidding fair to be the master-spirit of our district. We will aid it all we can, and hope that the young and vigorous spirit of 1849, may surpass in knowledge, charity, and prudence, the spirit of other years."

Preston Temperance Society.—This society appears to be in a flourishing condition, and especially alive to the necessity of enlisting the young, as the following paragraph from their annual report will shew—

"The committee attach great importance to Sabbath-school Temperance Societies, and hope the managers and conductors of the other Sabbath-schools in Preston will speedily establish such societies in their respective schools. The propriety of such a step cannot now be questioned, for it has been proved, beyond doubt, that intemperance is the chief obstacle to the success of Sabbath-schools. The following facts demand the serious attention of the friends of Sabbath-schools. At Launceston, in Cornwall, it was ascertained that in a well-conducted Sabbath-school, one hundred names of boys were taken as they stood on the register, and out of that hundred, twenty-six had left the neighbourhood and were unknown: of the remaining seventy-four, forty had been overcome by drunkenness." A teacher recently visited York Castle, and in one of the wards were fourteen young men, most of them under sentence of transportation. On conversing with them, he found that not fewer than thirteen of them had been Sunday-scholars, and ten of them declared, that it was under the influence of liquor that they had been led to commit the crimes which had brought them there. If necessary, other facts, similar to the foregoing, might be adduced, but the committee think these sufficient to arouse attention to this subject. It will be a happy day for the Church, and the world, when our Sabbath-school scholars are taught to practice total abstinence, as one of the great duties of life."

Sheffield Temperance Association.—"In spite of the apathy of many, your committee are happy to state that several hundred signatures have resulted, during the last year, from their labours and those of the working branches. Yes! as many signatures have been taken as would form a very efficient Temperance Society! We must therefore take courage and press forward, never doubting but a good tree will bring forth good fruit, if properly attended to. Sheffield cannot afford to spend £360,000 yearly in a poisonous drink that does not produce one solitary good to those who purchase it; one pound's worth of which only employs sixpenny worth of labour; while other manufactures employ 8s. 6d. in the pound on the average, without producing work for judges, policemen, poor law guardians, asylums, and hangmen. Your committee sincerely believe that the interest of this cause is the interest of every man, woman, and child in Sheffield."

Stoke Newington Teetotal Society.—"The Committee feel much pleasure in being able to state that the cause is progressing steadily in this place. They are confident that the principle is taking firm hold of society, but that there are many abstainers who do not come forward and join the Society; which they much regret, for they believe it to be the duty of every one who agrees with a good principle, to support it in all possible ways."

"There are now upon the books of the Registrar the names of 230 persons, who are thought to be acting consistently with their profession of total abstinence from every kind of intoxicating drink, and many of these have cause to rejoice that teetotalism was ever brought into this place, as they acknowledge that it has been made instrumental in bringing them to the house of God, and where the blessed gospel of salvation has (they have faith to believe) been divinely applied to the saving of their souls. And here the Committee would beg to observe that, although many professing christians and christian ministers have stated that teetotalers put their teetotalism in the place of religion, and think that if they (the teetotalers) can reclaim a drunkard, and make a sober man of him, they have done all that is required, they most distinctly wish it to be understood that this is entirely false, and without the slightest foundation; for they desire to give all the glory to God, and to direct the reclaimed drunkard, and every sinner, to that Saviour without whom there is no hope."

Sunderland.—The report says, "Seven Christian ministers belonging to various bodies are abstainers and members of our committee. We have no medical gentlemen who can exactly be considered members, but three or four are in favour of our principles and are we believe consistent abstainers. The good cause is progressing with us and gradually working its way into public estimation. There is much, however, yet to do. We hope the present year will bring forth greater triumphs for the temperance cause."

Wantage.—Mr. Lovegrove (the secretary) says,—"I believe, within the past year, we have obtained something like an hundred signatures in the whole, of whom there are, at the present time, about fifty good members. Of this number there are fifteen reclaimed drunkards, some of whom have been the most degraded characters our town ever produced, and were reduced to the most abject and wretched state, their families literally starving, while they were continually to be found on the ale-bench. We trust the change wrought on these will have a salutary effect in reclaiming others of the same kind, and of removing the bigotry from the minds of those who, as yet, have so strenuously opposed us."

YORK.—The report says, "These gentlemen [the doctors] have in many instances done us great mischief in recommending the liquors to their patients; we have through that, lost some members of years standing. Some of the superintendents and a great number of teachers in Sunday schools are pledged, and are doing much good amongst the rising generation."

YOXFORD.—The report says, "At one of our meetings a child came forward and requested to be allowed to sign the pledge. His mother heard of it and endeavoured by offering money and other means to induce the child to break the pledge, but all in vain, until the ignorant mother deceived the child by giving him beer instead of tea, which caused the child to cry heartily, although but about eight or nine years of age. We are sorry we cannot name any Christian minister among us; nor any medical man. We have to contend against some strong opposition from the medical fraternity, who seem to be unanimous in recommending alcoholic beverages not only in sickness, but even in health."

To these many additions, calculated both to interest and animate, might easily be made, but space forbids us enlarging.

There are, however, a few of the older and more extended organisations which must not be passed over in silence.

The BRITISH ASSOCIATION continues to hold on its way, and is zealously working in the great cause. From its last report we gather that,—“In the aggregate, the agents of the association have travelled during the year not less than twenty-one thousand miles, chiefly on foot, delivered nineteen hundred lectures on week days, distributed many thousands of tracts, visited numerous families, and addressed 450 religious and Sabbath school meetings on Sundays. More than 400 drunkards are known to have been reclaimed from their deplorable condition, and upwards of 7000 persons have signed the pledge in the places visited.”

The WESLEYAN UNION of total abstinents, an association originated in Liverpool in 1846, with a view of spreading temperance principles, among those who bear the name of John Wesley; we are happy to learn is earnestly pursuing the object for which it exists. We find the names of no less than thirty ministers of the Wesleyan Methodist body among its patrons, and are happy to learn that including its various branches, it already numbers about 2500 members.

The CENTRAL ASSOCIATION—Which we regret has sustained a heavy loss in the death of the late G. S. Kenrick, Esq., is still endeavouring to spread far and wide those principles of which he was so worthy a patron and so warm a friend. During the last month, a conference of the office bearers and delegates from the various societies in connexion with it, has been held at Coventry, to stimulate the zeal and concentrate the wisdom of all, for its future plans of operation.

The SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, established in May, 1848, under the presidency of that long-tryed friend of temperance, the Rev. J. Sherman, demands a passing notice, particularly on account of the vastly important work it has undertaken to do. It has, in addition to its other and more private operations, held a meeting in the Hall of Commerce, over which the Rev. J. Sherman presided, which was addressed by Messrs. Beggs, Doxsey, Culverwell, and Whittaker, on topics embracing the several branches of the subject, relating particularly to the duties and responsibilities of Sunday-school teachers, in reference to the temperance reformation.

The SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE, labours on manfully, intelligently, and successfully in the northern part of the British dominions. Its anniversary services were held in Glasgow in July, 1848, and embraced, sermons in eight or ten places of worship, a public meeting in Dr. King's Meeting-house, a public breakfast and meeting of members at the Eagle Hotel, a conference of adherents to abstinence principles from different parts of the country, and a juvenile demonstration in the meeting-house of the Rev. Dr. Robson. This noble association has deserved well of the temperance body, for its general labours, and its admirable publications. We regret to learn from the report, that the Review has not attained a circulation of more than 2500 copies per month, yet rejoice that the cause in Scotland is progressing under its energetic influence.

But while your Committee have been actively employed in watching the state and progress of the temperance cause, and the habits of society more immediately relating thereto, they have not been idle or indifferent spectators, but have adopted such modes of operation as circumstances might appear to require.

Your Committee, in seeking to circulate information, have during the past year made grants of tracts and books to various societies and private persons in different parts of the country.

The AGENTS of the Society have been actively and usefully employed in lectures and public meetings.

The REV. A. W. HERITAGE has been engaged principally in connexion with the Suffolk Temperance Union, but he has also laboured in the counties of Essex, Monmouth, Gloucester, Hants and Dorset, and visited the Channel Islands.

MR. INWARDS has visited Coventry, Leicester, Derby, Chesterfield and Sheffield; in some of these places eight or ten meetings have been held, in none less than two. From Sheffield he proceeded to Rotherham, Mexboro', Doncaster, York, Darlington, Stokesley, Middleboro', Aytton, Whitby, and several other places in Yorkshire; he has also lectured at Dorking in Surrey, Dover, and Sheerness. In the counties of Wilts and Berks he held meetings at Corsham, Devizes, Calne, Swindon, Highworth, Newbury, Marlborough and Hungerford. In Gloucestershire two meetings at Cirencester. In Hampshire and Dorset, at Bridport, Dorchester, Poole, Fordingbridge and Southampton. And in each of these places he considers that our principles are making progress.

MR. T. WHITTAKER has laboured in the following counties:—Surrey, Sussex, Kent, Middlesex, Beds, Essex, Cambridge, Lincolnshire, Leicester, Gloucester, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Durham, Derby, and Yorkshire, in all seventeen counties, in seventy-six towns, of which he has attended two hundred meetings, besides occasional labours on the Sabbath. He has also waited upon many respectable parties, to whom he has introduced the subject of teetotalism, and with whom he has left reports and documents. He has almost universally met with a kind reception, and is positive that, so far as public sentiment is concerned, though slowly, it is most assuredly veering round towards the haven of temperance.

Mr. WILLIAMSON has held meetings in the counties of Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Berks and Wilts, and also in several places in Wales. He bears a similar testimony to all our other agents as to the general state and progress of the cause. One instance will serve to show that clergymen and other influential persons are becoming alive to the evils of intoxicating drink. Mr. W. was requested to visit the village of Faulkland, near Norton St. Philip, and on his arrival learned that the clergyman had postponed the regular evening service, that the people might attend the temperance meeting. At the same time the Primitive Methodist preacher, concluding the service in his chapel at an earlier hour than usual, adjourned to the meeting himself, and invited his friends to accompany him.

The Rev. EVAN DAVIES continues his zealous labours in Wales, under the direction of the Society. While he complains that in many places the cause does not advance with the rapidity with which it secured and followed up its earliest triumphs, he entertains an opinion, now becoming pretty general among the friends of temperance, that if there be less of display, there is more of deep feeling and settled conviction, and that although our movement no longer attracts by its novelty, its course is still an onward one, and must, by the faithful labours of its friends, ultimately succeed.

In addition to these agencies several meetings have been attended in and around London, and a few in the counties of Hertford, Berks and Oxon, by our late and present Secretaries.

METROPOLITAN MISSION.

This is a most important feature of the Society's operations, but we can only occupy your attention by a brief and hasty glance. Two missionaries have been employed during the whole year, and a third has, by the liberality of our long-tried friend, William Janson, Esq., been engaged for a time to labour in the district of Tottenham, under the direction of the Superintendent.

The following returns of the engagements will show that they have abounded in their work.

By these devoted labours 1014 persons, of whom 173 were drunkards, have been induced to sign the pledge, and 67 who had broken their pledges to sign again; 356 members have been added to societies in the neighbourhoods in which they have happened to reside, upwards of 400 persons have been prevailed upon to attend temperance meetings, between eight and nine thousand tracts on temperance principles, and about 300 convention reports have been gratuitously distributed, besides the attainment of nearly 800 signatures to testimonials from schools and factories, to which reference will be hereinafter made. The missionaries have in addition to their regular labours delivered upwards of 300 lectures or addresses at Leeds, York, Wakefield, Hull, Selby, Staines, Whetstone, and in various districts of London.

Before leaving this branch of the Society's operations a few cases may be cited illustrative of its value and importance.

Three years ago after many visits, the missionary succeeded in obtaining the signature of a tradesman and his wife to the pledge; the former having been given to drink, was frequently compelled to apply to the doctor, to whom a considerable sum was then due. Last Christmas, the tradesman waited on the doctor to settle accounts, which had been mutual. The tradesman having on this occasion to receive a balance, the doctor exclaimed, "What nothing against you on my books, this year?" to which he replied; "The little we have had," (not amounting to ten shillings) "we have paid for as wanted." The two years previous to signing the pledge, the account was upwards of forty pounds. The doctor on handing the tradesman the balance said, "Why how was it you could not take my advice, I always told you, that if you would leave off drinking, you would not want so much of my assistance," and subsequently having occasion to attend a member of this family, on seeing their temperance diploma which they have framed said; "Ah, I can say nothing against teetotalism, for it has indeed saved you many pounds."

The MISSIONARY visited a stonemason near Kingsland, who was a great drunkard, the man was out, but the missionary saw his wife, and left her a tract, she promised to give it her husband on his return, she did so telling him that a gentleman had been to see him, acquainting him at the same time of the object, "Is it possible," (said the man) "that there is any one in the world that cares for me, why I thought I was beyond the care or pity of any one, well" (continued the man) "if it be true, that any one does care for me, it is high time I should care for myself." He read the tract, and then went to a temperance meeting and signed the pledge, and he still continues firm.

CHILDREN'S INFLUENCE ON PARENTS.—On the Missionary visiting a school in Hoxton and receiving additional signatures, the master stated that he knew of several cases where, through the children's example, the parents had become total abstainers.

LADIES' COMMITTEE AND TEETOTAL CHILDREN.—In a female school, the Ladies of the Committee, with a view to encourage the children to keep their pledge, had instituted a Savings' Bank, giving interest on the amount deposited, and last Christmas the parents of some of the children received clothing to the amount of between seven and eight pounds purchased with the money. This year the Savings' Bank is thrown open to all, but to those only who keep their pledge is interest allowed.

RAGGED SCHOOLS.—After an address by the Missionary in a Ragged School in Westminster, forty signed the pledge. Amongst the number was a boy who proved to be the son of a widow, who after a serious illness in which she was daily visited by the Missionary, died. The absence of this son (who had long left her) was a sad grievance to her in her dying pillow. Never will the Missionary forget the feelings manifested by this boy, when he heard of his mother's death. "It is me," said he, "that has broken my mother's heart." . . . His subsequent good conduct in the school occasioned his being selected by the Emigration Committee, to form one of the first drafts to Australia.

STREET LABOURS.—J—S—, once a clerk in a merchant's house at Liverpool, meeting the missionary in the street said, "Sir, do you not know me! I am as you may now see well-dressed; but about eighteen months ago, I and my family were quite destitute. Under these circumstances, you visited us; and we all signed the pledge, since then my poor mother has died, and left me a little money, which painful experience has taught me to lay out to the best advantage."

M—G—, a female servant found on the step of a door in Oxford Street, stated that on going out for a holiday; she was taken by a young man to a concert. He made her intoxicated, kept her out all night, consequently she was dismissed from her situation. She signed the pledge, was relieved and sent to her friends in Buckinghamshire.

J—N—, wife of a furniture broker, was found in Drury Lane, surrounded by a mob, she was quite insensible with drink, was taken home, when her husband said she had been out for four days, leaving him with a family of six children, and had attempted four times to commit suicide. She signed. This case has been frequently visited and is going on well.

T—W—, a gentleman's coachman said that he had been a teetotaler for seven years, but had now been out of a situation for nine months; "but thanks to total abstinence, I shall not want, if I do not obtain a situation for the next two years." He told the missionary he knew one of the largest stable-keepers in London, employing three hundred hands, and who will not allow any strong drink to be brought into his yard or stables.

These facts might be indefinitely multiplied, and it might be confidently affirmed that the advantages arising from the visits of your missionaries are such as must command the approbation and confidence of every thoughtful man. It is much to be regretted that want of funds cripples the energies of your Committee, and compels such a limitation of this important sphere of usefulness.

With the design of securing the attention of the working classes and more effectually influencing the masses of the people, your Committee have during the past year, resolved to offer two prizes of £20 and £10, to the competition of the working classes, for the best two essays shewing, "that the general spread of temperance principles will tend to the physical, mental, social, and religious elevation of the working classes." The time allowed for the production of these essays will terminate on the 1st of November next, and it is hoped that this effort will result in great and lasting benefit to the masses of the people by contributing to the spread of temperance principles among them.

Efforts are also being made to secure the most efficient working of temperance societies, by inducing a consideration and discussion of the most suitable plans to be adopted for that purpose. It has been considered desirable therefore to offer a further prize of £10. for the best essay on this subject. The adjudication to be made under the direction of the Committee of this society. These essays are to be prepared by the 1st of September, and the prize awarded as soon as convenient after the close of the allotted period.

With a desire to promote the formation of a World's Temperance Union, and which object your Committee conceived might be accelerated by a visit of the Rev. Theobald Mathew to the United States; £20. have been granted from the surplus of the Convention Fund towards the expenses of that visit, which grant will no doubt meet with a most cordial approval from friends on both sides of the Atlantic. Ill health and pressing business have united to prevent the completion of this design, but Father Mathew has now left Cork, and is en route for America.

In the last REPORT it was mentioned that a certificate had been drawn up, on the subject of the artificial and compulsory drinking usages, and also a testimonial of patrons, members of Committee, and masters, mistresses, and teachers of day and Sunday-schools, on the relation of the drinking habits of society to the education of the young. These are still in course of signature, and furnish most valuable evidence as to the evils arising from those customs against which we contend.

Our friends will remark that we have confined ourselves hitherto to our own Island, and will naturally be ready to enquire for some information respecting other lands.

IRELAND has long been an interesting scene of the triumphs, and proof of the benefits of temperance. We cannot do better than give you entire a letter of the Rev. Theobald Mathew, furnished to our secretary under date March 28th, 1849.

"MY DEAR FRIEND—I delayed my reply to your esteemed letter, until the anniversary of our great national festival was celebrated, and as a proof of the perseverance of the Irish people in the practice of the principles of total abstinence, I am happy to inform you, that in this large and populous city, not a single individual was observed under the influence of intoxicating drink on St. Patrick's Day, heretofore desecrated by Bacchanalian orgies, and scenes of frightful intemperance. The same gratifying announcement has been made for the whole of this county, and I feel confident, that generally speaking, it may be applied to the entire kingdom.

"From the statistical information supplied to me from influential sources, I can state that the people of Ireland, who have taken the pledge, continue faithful to its observance. There has been, it is true, a falling off; but it is nothing, comparatively speaking, nor is it to be wondered at, when the position of this unfortunate country, and other circumstances, are taken into account. During the late seasons of famine and pestilence, there were some, who in a moment of despair, suffering from want and disease, became reckless, when they felt that, although teetotalers, they were equally visited with dire affliction, and gave up the pledge. Many when in fever, who were ordered by physicians to take wine and other stimulants, persevered for a time in such indulgences; but several returned again to our society, and the great majority have found consolation and strength in their adherence to this sacred cause. Perfect sobriety is now a settled habit with the people of this country. The foul stain of intemperance, which was formerly branded upon the character of Irishmen, is banished for ever. In this assertion I am confirmed by the fact, that the children to whom I administered the pledge eight and nine years ago, have now grown up into manhood and womanhood, faithful teetotalers, and are also rearing their children in the practice of total abstinence. Every where throughout the kingdom, I behold on my journeyings this gratifying spectacle.

"The members of that excellent order, the Christian Brothers, to whose fostering care, I may say, the education of the Catholic youth of Ireland is entrusted, have all taken the total abstinence pledge at my hands, that they may be the better able to instruct these little ones in the cardinal virtue of temperance. This admirable community has branches of its order established in almost every county in Ireland, in whose schools the children are brought up in the observance of temperance, and every other virtue. Of the co-operation of the Christian Brothers I feel justly proud, and when it shall please the Lord to take me out of this world to sleep the sleep of death, I shall be cheered and consoled by the reflection, that I have confided the teetotalers of Ireland to the hands of such eminent, such virtuous men.

"At a great meeting which I lately held at Croome, in the county of Limerick, and where I had an immense accession of new postulants, I was proud to observe thousands, who travelled to me to Cork at the commencement of the movement, for the purpose of being enrolled, and who rejoiced at having to assure me of their fidelity. These facts, and the present consumption of whiskey and malt liquor in Ireland, contrasted with the excise returns in 1838, will prove the flourishing position of temperance in Ireland, and the sober habits of our people. The eclat of splendid processions, bands of music, gorgeous banners, &c., does not accompany our temperance meetings. The circumstances of the times, and the poverty of the teetotalers, do not permit such displays; nor are they considered necessary: for the Irish people are now convinced of the benefits of sobriety, and are as anxious and zealous in the cause as when the great enthusiasm first prevailed. As an instance, I may remark, that in this city there has been of late a new impulse given to the movement by the old members of our Temperance Halls, who are renewing their exertions with energy and advantage.

"With the happy conviction on my mind, of the prosperous position of teetotalism in Ireland, and as it has pleased the Almighty to grant me restored health, I feel that I can without any apprehensions leave the country for a time, to visit my friends in America. I have ardently longed for this gratification, and I intend, God willing, to pay my long promised visit early in May. Hoping for a favourable passage, and a successful termination of my labours in the United States, I am, my dear Sir,

"Yours devotedly,

"THEOBALD MATHEW."

GUERNSEY.—Our esteemed friend, Dr. Collenette, has kindly furnished an interesting account of the rise and progress of the cause in that island. We regret that space will not permit us to do more than give an extract or two. He says:—"Since August, 1841, weekly meetings have been held, and though the society has met with very much opposition from the trade, the world, and the church, it has held on its way, enlarged and beautified its hall, reclaimed about 120 drunkards, several of whom are now members of Christian Churches, and has taken about 3000 pledges, 600 of which are the result of last year's labour. On the Committee there are this year four dissenting ministers, one medical man, one law agent, several master mechanics, and four reformed drunkards. On the Speakers' Plan there are, one medical man, five dissenting ministers, (one Baptist, one Independent, one Primitive Methodist, and two Bible Christians, eight reformed drunkards, two females, and nine master and journeymen mechanics. There is also a very active Ladies' Committee, who circulate tracts, gather in contributions, and get up bazaars, the proceeds of which are devoted to the spread of temperance principles in the island."

Notwithstanding the work is not done, and the existing difficulties are not light, as the following facts will prove:—"A very large part of the population is, directly or indirectly, engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, or related by marriage or otherwise to those who are. The population, according to the last census, was 27,000. There are 36 butchers, or one in every 750 persons; 32 bakers, or one in every 850; 33 physicians, surgeons, or druggists, or one in every 818; 56 schools, or one for every 482; 8 booksellers, or one in every 3375; 3 circulating libraries, or one for every 9000; one mechanic's institution, and two hundred and fifty houses for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, being one for every 108 of the population, or taking away the 3000 abstainers, one house for every 96 persons. There are, as a necessary consequence, two poor-houses and one prison, which are always well filled, and considering the number of houses, and the low price at which the drinks are sold, this is not very wonderful. The best (!) brandy and gin sells at 3s. 4d. per gallon, wine from 1s. 8d. the gallon to 30s. the dozen bottles, best (!) beer 1s. 1½d. the gallon."

Still there is even here some ground for hope, for while, in 1836, £5729. were paid for duty on spirituous liquors, only £5075 were paid in 1847, making a difference of £654, which (at 1s. per gallon duty shows a decrease in the quantity actually consumed of 13,080 gallons, or nearly half a gallon per head for every man, woman and child in the island. This is surely encouragement to proceed.

CANADA.—The Rev. Thaddeus Osgood, who is now again visiting this country, says, "It is supposed that there are in Canada 150,000 pledged members."

The cause is promoted there by all parties, and Mr. Osgood informs us, that last autumn he "attended a meeting in Montreal, at which upwards of 3000 persons were present, and on which platform were seen a Roman Catholic bishop, and a number of ministers of different denominations." He adds:—"I was told by one of the late Governors of Canada, that nine-tenths of the crimes of which he had been called to take cognizance, were occasioned by strong drink."

UNITED STATES.—Our American brethren are extensively agitating the license question, and in some places public opinion has been taken at the ballot-box. It of course devolves afterwards upon the legislative bodies to take action thereupon, and such has been the influence of the traffickers, that even in those places where the suffrages of the people have declared against all licensing, the practice has still been legally maintained.

"The first state which gained the privilege of trying the license question at the ballot-box was Connecticut, in 1839. The sale of wines and spirituous liquors was forbidden, without permission granted by a majority of the citizens in public town meeting. In a large number of towns, the effort to obtain the public approval was a failure. But such a blow at the traffic was not to be endured; the political character of the Legislature was changed, and the law repealed."

"The prohibitory statute of Maine remains unaltered. Rhode Island retains the liberty of action on the license question, and has freed all her towns but five from the license. In New Jersey a law was passed in 1847, giving the license question to the people. Here also, in many of her most important towns, the license was ruled out by overwhelming numbers, though, in a majority, license was granted."

A strong tide of public opinion is thus rising, and will, it is believed, ultimately sweep away these awful temptations. The Committee of the American Temperance Union believe "the legislation of the land to be behind the voice of the people," and consider that, "if legislators could be chosen simply on the temperance question, there is scarcely a state which would not return a temperance legislator." But "the rum power creeps into the legislature through a thousand loop-holes."

The Annual Convention of Pennsylvania, in an appeal to the legislature, after detailing the evils arising from strong drink, asks, "What then is the remedy?" and declares, "In our opinion there is but one, and that is entire prohibition, with such penal sanctions as will effectually put a stop to the traffic."

A gentleman writing from TENNESSEE, advertising to the legislature of that state, then in assembly at Nashville, says:—"It will certainly repeal the last act of sin and abomination, by which persons are granted a license to vend poison with impunity, and which has for two years past been a curse to our people, and a disgrace to our state. The tocsin of repeal has sounded already; the hearts of a hundred thousand freemen, good and true to their country and the happiness of mankind, boil with indignation at this desecration of their rights, and have said in their more than voice of thunder, that this stain SHALL BE WIPED OUT."

In Massachusetts the cause is progressing. The Lieutenant-Governor of the state lately "remarked as evidence of progress in the reform, that the amount of distilled spirits imported into Boston in 1827, was 692,915 gallons; domestic manufactured about the town, 1,300,000 gallons; wine in proportion. In 1847, 250,000 gallons imported, and about the same manufactured, amounting in all to 550,000 gallons. The number of inhabitants has, meanwhile, more than doubled, and the business quadrupled."

And in CONNECTICUT, Dr. Charles Jewitt, described as one of the ablest advocates, says:—"The ministers of religion, with but few exceptions, are with us. We have the good hearty wishes, if not the active co-operation, of nine-tenths of the mothers, wives, and daughters—the Sabbath-school is our auxiliary—nineteen-twentieths of those engaged in the instruction of youth, from the professors of Yale to the teachers of our district-schools, are with us, heart and hand. The very consciences of our opponents bear testimony to the excellence of our principles, and the practices we recommend—the truth is with us, and, last of all, we have had abundant and soul-cheering evidence that God himself is with us in this struggle to secure obedience to his laws, respect to the principles of eternal justice, and the annihilation of one of the most fruitful sources of mischief and misery that has ever disgraced or crushed the earth." With such convictions as these, he may well exclaim, "What then have we to fear? Nothing, if we are true to ourselves, and true to our cause."

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—A regiment in which there were 300 teetotalers has recently returned from this settlement, and we are informed by a correspondent, who had an interview with the captain, that he inquired what crime had been committed by these 300 men during a year, and that the captain's reply was, "None." The captain further stated, that "there was a man who had been punished in every way that could be thought of to cure him of drunkenness, but all was in vain, until he became a total abstainer, and that then he not only became a sober man, but was converted to God."

RUSSIA.—At the recent meetings of the "Suffolk Temperance Association," an interesting document in the Russian language, was presented to the Society, by R. D. Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich. It was written entirely by peasants, and we are assured was beautiful in its style of execution. The following is a translation and we give it entire, as serving to shew that the same difficulties are in the way of temperance reformers all over the world, but that perseverance will always and everywhere command success.

"The Peasantry of the Parish of Nishny Bartoff, greeting, to all their own class.

"We have attentively read what has been written in our newspapers about the Temperance Societies of other countries, and have humbly attended to the words of our pastor, when he told us, in the words of Holy Scripture, the evil effects of intemperance to soul and body, and of the happy results of the temperance cause in other countries. His words and advice were deeply impressed in the hearts of our community. They began to persuade others to establish the same in our country. This occasioned a great deal of words—some were agreeable—others thought that temperance would not answer, and many even laughed at our intentions, and called it an impossibility. This, however, did not dishearten us. We kept firm to our intention, and at last the good work appeared.

"On the second day of Christmas, after the morning service, 96 of us assembled at the parsonage, and having explained our intention of establishing a temperance society amongst us, we begged he would administer the pledge to us, never to take any intoxicating drinks, and to look after each other that every one kept his pledge. Our pastor commended our intentions, gave us his blessing to proceed in this work, and took down our names. At first some felt it rather difficult to give up their old practice of drinking, but that soon wore off, and they all own that they are better in health since they took the pledge than they were before, as well as being much livelier.

"Although this society has existed only a few years, its salutary effects are already felt. All those who have signed the pledge have more comfort at home—quarrels have ceased—peace reigns everywhere—works go on much better—what used formerly to be lavished upon drink, is now kept; that is, health, and money, and time—there seems to be more time for household work. This substantial evidence of the good effects of our Society induced 83 of those men to join us that formerly laughed at us, so that now our Society consists of 179 individuals, and, with the blessing of God we shall increase in number.

"Having experienced the salutary effects ourselves, we are determined to inform others of it. Let them read over this our publication, and let them think over it, and try to do as we have done. It only requires firmness to begin, and then they will get used to it; and seeing the good effects of it, they will not wish to leave it off. And we pray God not to leave them, but to bless them as he has blessed us, and enabled them to begin this good work. Adieu."

This relates not to Russia proper, but to Finland.

We would fain proceed with details from the mass of interesting information which crowds upon us, but we forbear.

We cannot close this report without paying a passing tribute of respect to our departed friends. During the present year the temperance cause has been deprived by death of three most valued and faithful friends. We allude to Mr. Hicks, Mr. Kenrick, and the Rev. G. W. Carr of New Ross, the father of the movement in Ireland. They rest from their labours, but their works remain, and being dead they yet speak. Let us take up their fallen mantles, and gird up our loins anew for the work, each resolved to labour and if needful to suffer for our principles, and each fired with the holy ambition of being worthy successors of our departed friends, and worthy advocates of our philanthropic cause. Everything proves the necessity for our work—every passing day furnishes new indications of the evils of our drinking habits—every rising sun shines on the misery and ruin that alcohol has caused—every closing evening draws its curtains around scenes of depravity which philanthropy sickens to contemplate—every stillly night is broken by the agitated sobs and deep-heaving sighs of hearts that intemperance has riven; and every dawning day enlightens, yet without cheering, prospects that intemperance has wrecked. Yet, though our work demands some sacrifice of personal feeling and a large contribution of individual and continued efforts, we are on every side beckoned onward, and by every argument encouraged to proceed. We are pledged to the movement, and shall we violate our promises? We have confidence in truth, and shall we sacrifice our faith? We have love kindling in our hearts and shall we repress its rising emotions? We have a country to reclaim, to elevate and purify, and shall that spark of our patriotism be extinguished? We have the fallen to restore, the feeble to strengthen, the timid to encourage, the self-confident to warn, and the young to counsel, and we have no slight or equivocal manifestations of the approval of God, and, to every one who would divert our attention, or impede our progress, we give our one calm, deliberate, earnest reply, "We are doing a great work, and we cannot come down."

RESOLUTIONS PASSED AT THE ANNUAL MEETING, MAY 26TH, 1849.

I. Moved by the Rev. W. W. ROBINSON, M.A., seconded by JOSIAH HUNT, Esq., and supported by DR. LOVELL.

"That this meeting convinced that intemperance is one of the most costly, degrading, and ruinous evils with which society is afflicted, and persuaded that no sufficient remedy has yet been devised, except 'Total Abstinence' from all that intoxicates; rejoices in the continued and persevering labours of the 'National Temperance Society,' and all other local and general organizations for the advocacy and advancement of Temperance principles; and pledges itself to do its utmost to sustain their efforts."

II. Moved by the Rev. JOHN KENNEDY, M.A., seconded by LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.F., and supported by the Rev. Dr. BURNS.

"That this meeting convinced of the paramount importance of securing for the Temperance Reformation a larger amount of direct religious influence, a more constant appeal to religious convictions, and a more powerful presentation of Christian motives; affectionately and earnestly commends its claim to the prayerful consideration of ministers of the Gospel, members of Christian Churches, and all who labour for the advancement of religion, and the alleviation of the sufferings and sorrows of mankind; and would advise the formation of Congregational Temperance Societies wherever practicable."

III. Moved by BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., B.C.L., seconded by J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., and supported by JOSEPH STURGE, Esq., Birmingham.

"That this meeting affected with the extent and increase of juvenile depravity (as recently developed in the Prize Essays on that subject;) and deeply convinced that all efforts to arrest its progress, will be inefficient while the drinking customs prevail; affectionately urges a consideration of Temperance principles, upon all Superintendents, Teachers and Committees of Sunday and Day-schools, Ragged-schools, and all other institutions that seek to instruct youthful minds; and to surround youthful virtue and simplicity with such safeguards as benevolence must desire, and prudence can suggest."

IV. Moved by WILLIAM JANSON, Esq., and seconded by JOHN MEREDITH, Esq.

"That the following gentlemen be respectfully requested to wait upon Lord Ashley, and present to him the earnest desire of this large meeting, that the careful consideration of that nobleman be given to the Temperance question, and its bearing upon the elevation and civilization of the human race, viz., S. Bowly, Esq.; Rev. W. W. Robinson; J. S. Buckingham, Esq.; Rev. Dr. Burns; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq.; and B. Rotch, Esq."

V. Moved by Rev. OZRA FRENCH, American Missionary at Bombay, and seconded by Mr. THOMAS WHITTAKER.

"That this meeting rejoices in the general efforts now making to bring under the attention of both Houses of Parliament, the growing evils of the Beer-shop Act; and indulges the hope that an entire repeal of that law may be secured as early as possible."

VI. Moved by the Rev. B. PARSONS, and seconded by HENRY CLAPP, Esq.

"That the thanks of this meeting be presented to Samuel Bowly, Esq., for his kind and courteous conduct in the Chair."

DR. CUMMING'S RESPONSE.

MR. EDITOR,—In your talented number of the National Temperance Chronicle for July, I was amazed to observe an article, entitled "Rev. Dr. Cumming and Teetotalism." I perused it with mingled feelings of sorrow and indignation, more particularly so, because I know how he is beloved in private, for his kind, amiable, Christian excellencies, and in public for his brilliant erudition, powerful eloquence, and apostolic faithfulness in his ministrations as a preacher of God's blessed gospel, and also conscious of his deep sympathy with every movement calculated to elevate our common humanity, and feeling that such sentiments proclaimed in the hearing of a dense and highly respectable congregation, were likely to operate as a barricade in the hearts of hundreds against the introduction of teetotalism, coming down not like the gentle dews of benignant Heaven, to fructify and cause nature to deck herself in her loveliest garments, but like a cold stormy blast, "Eat out the heart and core of virtue, and nip the early blossom of the human spring." Under these throbbing emotions I felt irresistibly constrained to enter my uncompromising protest against the Dr.'s dangerous and unphilosophical arguments, and to exhibit in truthful language his awful thrilling responsibility as an influential citizen and distinguished ambassador of Jehovah's eternal truth; and finally, urged him for his own sake,—for the sake of the community,—for the sake of myriads of perishing drunkards,—for the sake of the rising generation,—for the sake of his panting flock,—for the sake of his glorious Redeemer, who, for us, made the greatest of all sacrifices,—for the sake of that precious cause for which he agonized in the garden, expired on the cross, and now intercedes in heaven, to fling aside the poisoned chalice, weave no more chaplets of adulation around the blood-stained altars of Bacchus, but come boldly forward and sign the pledge of "touch not, taste not, handle not the accursed thing."

The worthy Dr., with his accustomed courtesy, sent the following reply by the next post, which I forward for the gratification of your numerous influential and intelligent readers and co-workers in the good cause of true temperance. I am, Mr. Editor, yours truly,

JOHN H. ESTERBROOKE.

7, Hunter Street, Brunswick Square, July 23rd, 1849.

DEAR SIR,—Many thanks for your,—I am sure kindly meant, though somewhat intemperate, strictures on me. I assure you I take it to be very kind of you, or any one else to suggest, admonish, and instruct me. I admire your zeal. May God prosper your efforts to put down the abominable and soul-destroying sin of drunkenness; a sin that is destroying thousands, and to which as you remark even ministers of the gospel have fallen victims. I candidly pray that your efforts may be crowned with success.

I too, am anxious to see it end. I assure you I must stand in my pulpit, simply as an expositor of God's word. I cannot read that Divine book in any light but its own. The extracts in the magazine you refer to, if it be the same that some body sent me, are substantially, though not verbatim, a part of what I said in John ii., and were I to preach from the same passage again, I cannot see how I could say any thing else. I regret in writing you headed his extracts as "Dr. Cumming against Teetotalism," and still more that you stated it "an attack on Teetotalism," which it was not meant to be. May it please God to pour down his Holy Spirit on all flesh, and so make the tree good, and those bad branches you and I deplore will soon cease.

Thanking you for your kindness and valuable counsels. I am, truly yours,

JOHN CUMMING.

John H. Esterbrooke, Esq.,
Hon. Sec. Christian Total Abstinence Association.

We gladly insert the above correspondence, as tending to shew the amiable and Christian spirit of the minister, whose erroneous views on a certain passage of scripture we have been compelled to expose. The interests of truth demand a few additional remarks. From the Dr.'s letter it appears that he is fully alive to the gigantic evil of drunkenness, to which he admits that "even ministers of the gospel have fallen victims." Then does not duty prescribe total abstinence? If "Ministers of the gospel have fallen," is even our esteemed friend secure? "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," is the admonition of that book of which Dr. C. is a public expositor.

Further, does not sincere prayer for the success of any cause oblige the supplicant, to use such means of help, as lie within his power? The Dr. "candidly prays that the efforts of teetotalers may be crowned with success." Then we confidently anticipate his deliverance from his present anomalous position; for prayer is the expression of desire, and desire is a motive power. What most of all hinders our success? The customs, the toasts, the notions of good fellowship and hospitality, which make it appear respectable for even religious men to drink. Does not the Dr. strengthen these customs by his practice, and has he not defended them from the pulpit? With all the intense earnestness which can move our souls, we entreat our reverend friend, to abandon the customs, to suppress the defences, which obstruct the answer to his own solemn appeals to God in our behalf. We do not see how his prayers for our complete success, can possibly be answered but by his conversion to our principles, or his removal from the world. Our object will never be gained while any minister of the gospel can use, or patronize, the most powerful instrument of the enemy of souls, and yet maintain his standing in the church of Christ.

Another point demanding attention, is embodied in the passage—"I cannot read that Divine book in any light but its own." So far as scripture can be brought to elucidate scripture, the principle is sound, and the caution justifiable. But there are matters in the book of God, illustrated by information ab extra. Is not scripture geography explained by the testimony of ancient and modern travellers? Are not scripture parables illustrated by eastern manners and customs? Does not the Dr. avail himself of the labours of men in various countries, who have sought to throw light upon dark and difficult passages of the holy book? or does he dispense with such aid on the ground that he "cannot read the Divine book in any light but its own"? The universal application of the principle is not simply unsound, but is ABSOLUTELY IMPOSSIBLE. Suppose that a man reads for the first time the account of the marriage in Cana of Galilee—he finds that a beverage described as good wine, was produced at a certain stage of the feast—and he desires to know how the expression "good wine" is to be understood. Is it not obvious that it must be explained by the social customs, either of our own time and country, or of the time and place in which the events occurred? Now, what would be thought of the man who should spurn the information which contemporary history supplies, and explain the term "good wine," by the notions extant among the wine-drinkers of Great Britain in the nineteenth century? But by these customs or those, the phrase must be explained, and we beg Dr. C. to consider that both are ab extra. The difference between total abstainers and their antagonists on this point, is that the former take the depositions of Pliny, Columella, &c., as to the tastes and habits of their day, and explain the phrase under inquiry by their undisputed testimony,—while the latter suppress that testimony, and virtually declare that modern British notions of good wine must not only be admitted as a standard now, but that all ancient tastes must have been coincident with them.

With these views, we regret that the Dr. "cannot see how he could say any thing else," if he should expound that parable again. We respectfully suggest that he may caution his readers against imagining that the master of the ceremonies at Cana had been trained in the fashionable circles of England,—and that he may hint that "good wine," in the estimation of that practised ancient, was not the potent fiery poison which contained 25 per cent. of proof spirit,—and further, that he may unhesitatingly inform them, that "even ministers of the gospel have fallen victims" to "the abominable and soul-destroying sin of drunkenness,—a sin which is destroying thousands" in every rank and position in society,—and that then, with all the affectionate solicitude which his ministerial responsibility can awaken, and all the thrilling eloquence which his natural endowments can command, he may urge the venerable caution of the inspired word, "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright; for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

But if we cannot yet prevail on our reverend friend, to give to the subject the investigation which its importance demands, at least let him avoid making pulpit-attacks upon our principles. If he must stand as the champion of modern, religious and genteel wine-bibbing, let him meet us on common ground, and let the press or the platform be in future the arena in which his polished shafts shall fly; and truth, even in a stripling's hand, shall be potent to avert even a giant's blow. We thus take our farewell of our reverend friend, anxiously expecting the time when his earnest prayers for the destruction of the evil he deprecates shall be consistently sustained by vigorous efforts to remove the cause of which drunkenness, with all its degrading concomitants, is the ultimate, but natural effect.

MATRIMONY.

"The government of the principality of Waldek, in Germany, have given public notice, that no license to marry will be hereafter granted to any individual who is addicted to drunkenness; or, if he have been so, he must exhibit full proofs that he is no longer a slave to this vice. The same government have also directed that, in every report made by the ecclesiastical, municipal, and police authorities, upon petition for a license to marry, the report shall distinctly state whether either of the parties desirous of entering into matrimonial connexion is given to intemperance, or otherwise."—Stuttgard Journal.

We present our readers with this interesting quotation, as shewing that continental states are alive to the evils and dangers of drunkenness. Such a law would find its justification in the fact, that persons addicted to such habits, sooner or later become chargeable upon the industry of their neighbours for support. Hence it is right that they should be restrained from matrimonial alliances, by which an innocent partner and unoffending babes might be involved in the ruin, and might increase the incumbrance.

Still, as we are not likely to get such a law passed in England for some time to come, even if it were desirable, we think it may be well for those who are contemplating matrimony to weigh the matter with some seriousness. Look at the awful possibility of being bound for life to one, who would sacrifice every thing to an inordinate love of drink! It is enough to make a stout heart shudder, and surely the bare possibility will cause the softer sex to tremble. The habit may not yet have grown to its maturity, but like all habits it must strengthen. A liking for a "wee drap," should be regarded by every considerate woman, as a sufficient reason for a decided and unalterable negative to "the question." True, the fond one may never proceed to extremities, and earn for himself the reputation of a drunkard, but he may yet ruin his partner and family, by his indulgence in wine and the extravagance and neglect to which it almost invariably leads. Thousands who started in life with the fairest prospects, have gone to a premature grave in "embarrassed circumstances," and left a family, trained with no mean nor ill-founded expectations, to struggle through this toiling world with scarcely a sufficient pittance to secure them against absolute want and starvation; and yet have never been considered tipplers, although they "really enjoyed a glass of good wine."

Nor is the caution less necessary to the other sex. What man would willingly unite himself to a drinking wife! Yet there are not a few men, of high respectability and in circumstances of comfort, not to say affluence, who would willingly give all they possess, to see her on whom their youthful hearts were set, and in whom their fondest hopes were centred, restored to the virtue and innocence from which she has fallen by the insidious foe. Yet perhaps they encouraged her in the first glass—they laid the foundation—they forged themselves the first link of that moral bondage, which now defies their skill to unrivet—they, yes, they, with all the warmth of early love, and with all the gentleness of sincere and winning affection; invited her to sip the poison, offering their own suretyship for its harmlessness, and now they stand aghast at the horrid transformation their own magic has wrought, and perish by the bite of the adder their own folly has hatched.

Parents! if you would save your sons and daughters from the terrible reverses that strong drink occasions, purge your houses of the delusive draughts, direct your instructions to their nature, strengthen your parental counsels, by your wise example, and let your most earnest cautions include an affectionate entreaty, to enter into no alliance that shall expose them to that greatest of social evils, a drunken husband, or a tippling wife.

THE JOHN WESLEY MISSIONARY SHIP.

Audi alteram partem.

A statement was made at the time this vessel was launched, that a considerable quantity of the "fire-water" with other descriptions of intoxicating drinks was taken on board, and the attention of the Christian public was drawn by various portions of the press to this subject. During the sitting of the present Conference the matter has been discussed, and we were pained to read in the columns of our excellent contemporary, the Christian Times, that Mr. Irving "demolished the ignorant fabrication, concerning a cargo of wine being taken out in the John Wesley." We were amazed and confounded at the assurance with which the declaration made by an honest man, and verified by the custom-house books, was styled an ignorant fabrication, and said to be demolished. Being anxious for the cause of truth and honesty that the world should not be allowed to suppose that these things were invented to serve a purpose, we applied to the originator of the "ignorant fabrication," and were furnished with the following account:—

"Quantity of drunkard's drink taken out by the John Wesley Missionary Ship, which sailed from Southampton in December, 1846, with eight Missionaries,—

- "1 cask of brandy, 36 gallons,
- "1 " rum, 36 "
- "1 case with 3 dozen bottles of gin,
- "54 cases of wine containing 2 dozen each,
- "10 casks of wine containing from 10 to 18 gallons each,
- "47 cases of bottled ale and porter.

"This account was compared with the custom house officer's books in the docks.

"JAMES BALFOUR."

Now how has this been demolished? By the admission of Mr. Irving that he ordered it to be put on board? This may place the responsibility on an individual, but does it disprove the statement?

According to the Wesleyan Times of the 30th July, Mr. Irving admitted, that the following were among the stores of the John Wesley :—

140 dozen bottled ale,
30 " port and sherry,
1 hhd. rum,
2 gallons hollands,
58 " brandy.

This is pretty well for the supply of Christian missionaries, sailing out under the name of Him, whose writings abound with most solemn cautions against intoxicating drinks, and whose character warrants the conclusion that his practice and teachings were ever in harmony.

But let us look at the admitted disposal of these stores. During the voyage 65 dozen of bottled ale,

20 " port and sherry,
33 gallons of brandy were consumed; 1 hhd. of rum sold at Auckland; and the remainder is still on hand.

Surely there must be some mistake here!! Do Christians at home purchase missionary ships and send them out to traffic in rum? Do not our missionary records testify that many of our most flourishing stations have been blasted by the "fire-water"? Have we not heard it again and again on missionary platforms? And is the "ignorant fabrication" demolished by the assurance that the rum was "sold at Auckland?"

But let us ask how many individuals there were on board. The first information we received, says there were eight missionaries, but of course others accompanied them. As nearly as we can learn (and we state the number subject to correction) there were twenty passengers and fourteen in the crew, in all thirty-four persons. Let any one divide the quantity consumed by the number of consumers, and the conclusion must be irresistibly forced upon them, that Christian self-denial was not very severely exercised in reference to the article of intoxicating drink.

Giving perfect credence to the statements of Mr. Irving, (if correctly reported,) the whole transaction is anything but creditable to the parties concerned. But we hesitate to accept them. They may contain the truth, but we doubt if they are the whole truth. The originator of the "ignorant fabrication" assures us, that he sent his original memorandum of the quantity to an eminent member of the Conference, and accompanied it with the offer to appear before the Conference to substantiate his statements, and that if he failed to do so, he would (although a poor man) pay all his own travelling expenses from London to Manchester and back, but that should he succeed, he should expect to be re-imbursed by the Society. Why was not this offer accepted? Can the Conference or the Methodist body consider that "Mr. Irving demolished the ignorant fabrication"? Is it fair to describe the honest statements of a veritable witness by such opprobrious terms? We respectfully urge our contemporary to disabuse the public mind on this matter, and admit the truth of a declaration which is not yet disproved, and is not by any special pleading ever likely to be overthrown.

THE BRITISH NAVY.

The temptations to drinking habits in the navy are well-known, and generally lamented; but it is not extensively circulated, even among teetotallers, that any man in the navy may abandon his rations of spirits and receive a daily allowance of tea and sugar in lieu thereof. The following is a copy of the instructions issued by the Lords of the Admiralty on this subject, and shews that a liberal and enlightened policy is being pursued by the government in relation to the drinking customs :—

Admiralty, October 12th, 1847.

Applications having been made to their Lordships, on the part of the Crews of Her Majesty's Ships, to be allowed the indulgence of taking up an additional quantity of Tea and Sugar, in lieu of the daily ration of Spirits, their Lordships, with the view of carrying into effect, and encouraging so desirable an arrangement, are pleased to sanction the issue of the following quantities of Tea and Sugar, for the daily ration of Spirits, to such of the Crews of Her Majesty's Ships as may be desirous of making the substitution, viz :—Tea, $\frac{1}{2}$ an ounce, Sugar, 2 ounces, daily. Any men that may be disposed to take up only one half the allowance of Spirits, would then receive one half of the above proportion, viz :—Tea, $\frac{1}{4}$ of an ounce, Sugar, 1 ounce, daily, or they may be paid the savings' money upon the Tea and Sugar, in lieu thereof.

The above Circular is to be read to the different Ships' Companies, and fully explained, that the proposed change is to be entirely voluntary on their part.

By Command of their Lordships,

H. G. WARD.

To all Flag Officers, Captains, and Commanding Officers, of Her Majesty's Ships and Vessels.

We think that this is all that enlightened abstainers can require. Full scope is now given to those in the navy, who favour our principles, to advocate and extend them, and we hope that our friends who may be thrown amongst sea-faring men in the ports, will not overlook the important concession of the Admiralty, and that the same principle will be speedily adopted among all classes of society, by whom strong drink is either given or received in part payment for services rendered. Among agricultural labourers the practice of giving beer during hay-time and harvest, is productive of incalculable evils, and we ask, why should not the choice be given to them which is now permitted to every seaman in Her Majesty's Navy?

BREAKERS AHEAD!—"SODA DASH."

There, dear reader, is a name for you. Soda Dash! What do you think of it? The devil has put on a new coat, brushed up his boots, and coiled his long tail away within the folds of his nether garments, and now takes his stand behind the marble counters of some of our most fashionable soda fountains.

A member of one of the Divisions of the "Sons" in this city, was invited into an apothecary's shop a Sunday or two since, to take a glass of soda, and having arrived at the counter his friend (t) called for Soda Dash. A red liquid was poured into the glass, and then filled up with soda. The moment our unsuspecting "Son" brought the glass to a proximity with his nasal organs, they were assailed with the fumes of brandy! and it was only by earnest persuasion that the tempted man was prevented from knocking down the miserable being who had thus set against him the deadly instruments of hell.

This is a development that should open our eyes. We knew, or rather supposed, that those soda fountains in palpable rum shops were as likely to yield rum as any thing else; but we never dreamed that an eminent apothecary in the most crowded part of our city would prove such a mean scamp as to pander to the appetite that is damning so many of our fellows. We assure this apothecary that there is a Division of the Sons of Temperance in this city, numbering over two hundred members, whose eyes are upon him, and they are men who are not to be trifled with. We have a rod in pickle for him, and if he is not careful we shall advertise his business, and himself, too, in a manner that will not be calculated to add much to his moral reputation.—New England Washingtonian.

TEMPERANCE EXPERIENCE MEETING.

A writer of considerable eminence has observed—"Experience is the best of all learning, and example the best of all teaching." Whether this sentiment will admit of qualification or exception, we leave for consideration. This we do know, that temperance experience meetings afford ample evidence in its favour. A meeting of the above description was held on Sunday evening, June 3rd, at the Star of Temperance Hall, King-street, Seven Dials, at which Mr. W. SPRIGGS of Lambeth presided. After an appropriate hymn, and reading the 143rd Psalm, Mr. S. briefly alluded to his bitter experience during a long career of intemperance, and the benefits of twelve years' abstinence from the intoxicating cup.

Mr. FRENCH was for twenty-two years a wretched and degraded drunkard. Had been six years a teetotaler. Knew not a letter in the alphabet prior to signing the pledge; could now read and write, and was most of all thankful for ability to read the scriptures.

Mr. LINYARD had enjoyed nine years of teetotalism, (the happiest in his life,) after twenty-six years of intemperance. Experienced benefit in every respect by the abandonment of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. PLEASE, eleven years a practical abstainer. Had formerly adopted the moderation plan of abstinence from distilled spirits, but found it inefficient for the prevention and cure of intemperance.

Mr. WAYTE, a fishmonger, three years and six months a teetotaler. Though never a drunkard, had derived many and great advantages from leaving off the moderate use of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. TAYLOR, fifteen months a teetotaler. Though a young man, had suffered much from prodigal and intemperate habits. His occupation was that of a waterman, near one of the theatres. Was much exposed to temptation, but had hitherto maintained the integrity of the pledge, and hoped to continue steadfast unto the end. He knew of six cabmen that were teetotalers.

Mr. BESLEY, tailor, eighteen months a teetotaler, and was blessed with a teetotal family. His suffering from strong drink, and the good he experienced since he had given them up, caused him to feel deeply indebted to the instrumentality that had produced the happy change.

Mr. STEARNE, shoemaker, eleven years a teetotaler, had reason to bless God for his providential goodness in leading him to adopt habits of healthy and happy sobriety, after being long mixed up with drinking company, from which he had sustained much injury.

Mr. MANTIN, a working farrier, had been a great sufferer for many years from a violent cough. In a morning his breathing was so distressingly impeded that it was with the greatest difficulty he could dress himself. He left off intoxicating liquors by the recommendation of Mr. Vincent of Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was not long before he found himself much better, and in a few months his cough was gone. He was now in the enjoyment of good health and spirits, and could perform his arduous labour with comfort to himself, and satisfaction to his employers.

Mr. SAUNDERS, a compositor, though only five months an abstainer, was very thankful for having identified himself with the movement.

Mrs. STEARNE gave a painfully interesting statement of the wrongs and sufferings she had endured owing to the intemperance of relatives.

Mr. BRYAN, a coal-porter: twelve months' experience in teetotalism had enabled him to do his work much better without strong drink than ever he could do with it.

Mr. SCARD, tailor, had been reduced to great suffering and degradation by strong drink; six years' teetotal practice had in a great measure repaired the mischief. He felt truly grateful for having signed the pledge, and courage to persevere.

Mr. SABINE, printer, experienced decided advantage in his employment over those of his fellow-workmen who indulged in beer, gin, &c.

Mr. COMPTON, fourteen years a teetotaler. From the period he began the practice to the present moment he felt an undeviating attachment to the cause, arising from his personal experience, and the unmixed good he had witnessed in others.

A military friend gave pleasing and interesting evidence in favour of abstinence, appertaining to himself and comrades.

The meeting, of which the above is a faint outline, was one of a very satisfactory and encouraging character. As a proof, twenty-seven signatures were added to the pledge.

If time and space allowed, it would be a delightful exercise to indulge in comment upon testimony so solid, convincing, clear, and animating as that tendered at the above happy gathering, by the healthy and joyful partakers of teetotal benefits and blessings. The brief narrative must be left to speak for itself.

Where is the prejudice, however stubborn—where is the opposition, however formidable, that can gainsay or withstand such testimonies of those who are indeed living witnesses for the truth and value of our principles?

A VOICE OF WARNING.

A few evenings ago, a funeral procession might be seen wending its way to the burial-ground of — (a small town in one of the midland counties). It conveyed the mortal remains of a man, who, in the prime of life, had fallen a victim to his intemperate habits. He had early acquired a taste for the soul-destroying cup; and had often felt something of the "serpent's sting."

About nine years since, poor J— joined himself to the total abstinence society, which had recently been found in C—, and continued for some time a consistent member. He often expressed himself to the writer, and others, as being healthier in body, and happier in mind, ever since he had abstained from the accursed cup; but unhappily, he was at that time a member of a club, into which money was paid quarterly, to be equally divided every seven years. He attended the various meetings of his club, for a long time without tasting intoxicating drink, although it was freely taken by many of his fellow-members. On the day when the money was divided, he dined with them, and after dinner he again tasted the fatal cup, and fell again into drunken habits. *While an abstainer, he regularly attended a place of worship on the sabbath, but since then the public-house has been oftener sought by him, and on the last sabbath in July, he went to a village feast (or wake), about three miles distant, where he became intoxicated, and continued drinking at intervals until the following Saturday, when he felt himself ill, (as he thought with a cold) and unadvisedly took brandy, after which he became worse. On Sunday his friends sought medical assistance. His doctor ordered him to remain in bed, but on the following Tuesday he found him up, and in a state of delirium. A friend called to see him on Wednesday, and told the writer that he should never forget the sight,—the terror that marked his countenance,—the wild gaze,—the frantic gesture,—and the fearful foreboding of the future, bordering on despair,—were so vividly indicated on his countenance, and expressed in broken accents, that it filled the visitor with surprise and sorrow. He secretly wished the drinking companions of poor J— had been there, to have seen the effects of drunkenness on their associate. But no; seldom does the drunkard visit the bed of the dying, to soothe the sorrow of their suffering fellows. The friend called on Thursday and found him in the same agitated state, trembling at every joint, sweating at every pore, looking anxiously for rest, but finding none. On Friday he was sensible, and deeply affected with his situation, and at his request, a portion of scripture was read to him by a friend who conversed with him on the sin of drunkenness,—he made solemn promises if the Almighty spared his life, he would again become a total abstainer from intoxicating drink. His friend left him, and called again in the evening, but poor J— was no more. Delirium tremens had finished his earthly career.*

EXTRAORDINARY CASE.

DEATH FROM DRINKING SPRING WATER.

An inquest was held on Wednesday, at the George Inn, North Town, near Bridgewater, on the body of John Spurlie, a wheelwright, whose death was caused by drinking an extraordinary quantity of cold water. Jane Mansfield deposed as follows:—The deceased told me he had been to the Cottage Inn for a pint of gin, and had drunk half of it there, and brought the rest home in a bottle. He desired me to take it upstairs and let his father drink. Deceased's mother would not allow her husband to drink any part of it. Deceased then desired me to go for four-pennyworth of tarts and he ate the whole of them in my presence. They were raspberry tarts. My aunt made him some tea, and he drank eight tea-cupfuls: afterwards I got him a pint of cold water from the pump, which he drank. He then cried out, "For the Lord's sake get me a pitcher full of cold water." I got it, and the deceased drank the whole of it—about six quarts!—a pint at a time, as fast as I could pour it out for him. After he had finished that, he desired me to get some more, but I refused to do so. Deceased then went out to the back-house and looked into all the pitchers and buckets that were there for more water. There was a two-gallon pitcher half full of spring water there, which he drank one basinful after another. He then said, "I am a dying man, I shall be dead before nine o'clock." He again asked for more water, which I refused to give him. He took a basin and ran across the road to a stream of water, and, dipping up a basinful at a time, brought it into the house and drank it. He continued this from five o'clock to half-past six. On his sister returning from work, he told her he was dying; she laughed at him, and endeavoured to get him up to bed, but he refused to go. He laid his head back in the arm-chair, and I washed his head with vinegar. He again wanted water, and I then called a neighbour, (James Shearn,) who kept him in the chair to prevent him going for more. At this time, Mr. Liddon, surgeon, who was passing the house, was called in to see deceased. Mr. Liddon pronounced him to be dying, and desired us to give him some brandy and water. We got some, but deceased refused to drink it, and became very sick. I went to my mother, and I was absent about half-an-hour. On my return, he was lying in the chair quite dead. The jury returned the following verdict—"That death was caused by congestion of the venous system, by taking a large quantity of cold water into the stomach."—Daily News.

The above case has gone the round of the papers, and will doubtless tend to increase the prejudice that is felt by many ignorant persons against cold water. The verdict of the jury, (no doubt honestly given,) most clearly indicates the existence of such a prejudice, while it conceals the real cause of the death of the wretched man. No man in the wide world ever swallowed water by pailfuls, for the sake of drinking. In the instance before us, the miserable victim of alcohol, had drank half-a-pint of gin, before he commenced his libations of water. Nor can it be doubted by any intelligent man, acquainted at all with the influence of gin upon the human system that it was, to allay the irrepressible thirst produced by the spirit, that he had recourse to the water. The temporary relief thus afforded, induced the fearful and fatal repetition, which was the proximate cause of death, admitting the verdict of the jury to be correct.

But another consideration should not be lost sight of, on which our medical friends will be best able to form a judgment, and on which we should like to be favoured with their opinions. We doubt whether any individual could with the rapidity stated, swallow so large a quantity of fluid unless a rupture of the stomach or bowels had occurred. It is much to be regretted that no post-mortem examination was made, as some facts would probably have been thereby revealed which would have demanded another verdict than that which the jury have recorded.

In the absence of such information, we only further remark, that the melancholy death before us, cannot disprove the perfect safety of individuals, confining themselves to the constant and habitual use of cold water, although so restricted a diet is not required, even in the complete and final triumph of the principles we advocate.—EDITOR.

THE CONTRAST.

Extracted from the Tectotal Times for July, 1849.

The following affecting incident occurred in the city of York: On a Sabbath in 1848, when leaving the Wesley-place Sunday-school, and proceeding up Black Horse-passage, I met an emaciated creature, staggering at every footstep. Taking hold of him by the arm, I kindly remonstrated with him on his unhappy condition. Although he had been drinking at the public-house all the night, yet he was able to converse with considerable collectedness, but he had to make use of the wall to prevent him from falling. I soon found that I had encountered a man of considerable natural talent, and who had evidently once moved in better circumstances. He boastingly avowed himself an INFIDEL, ridiculing all reference to the Bible and a future state of being, whilst he loudly protested that religion was all "humbug." Fixing my eyes steadily upon him, and still grasping his hand, I earnestly but affectionately said, "I have met with others who, like you, have ridiculed religion whilst they were in health, but who when death stared them in the face have wished me to pray with them; and in the last half hour of your life, DEATH will make you think differently to what you now do." The awful look of despair, the gnashing of the teeth, the clenching of the fist, and the fearful oath with which he exclaimed, "That DEATH plagues me," I shall perhaps never forget.

In further conversation I endeavoured to move him by referring to his departed mother. He became affected, and, with a deep sigh, exclaimed, "Ah!! I was once a happy man."

From answers to inquiries, I found that he had been a member of a Christian church for seventeen years, but that during the last seven years he had been an unhappy "backslider."

I now assured him that there was still hope for him if he would abandon his ways, and return to Christ for pardoning mercy. "You may again become a happy man," I assured him. "No, never! sir; it is all over now," he replied. After pleading with him to become a total abstainer from drink, as a step towards the right way, he exclaimed, "I never will! Every morning when I awake, I am as miserable as man can be, until I get some drink, but when I've got it, then I'm as happy as any man in the world, and care for nothing."

On inviting him to accompany me to a place of worship, he said, "No, sir; I shall never put my foot within either church or chapel again." On handing him a tract, he refused it, and replied, "I do not wish to insult you, sir; but I shall not read either it or the Bible, nor will I let any one read to me. It is no use now." My heart yearned over the poor unhappy wanderer, but remonstrance seemed altogether unavailing.

When parting, I expressed a hope that he would, on reflection, adopt a new course of life. He shook my hand, and, with a quivering lip, exclaimed, "I thank you, sir; I know you wish me well, but I shall never alter now."

As I left him, I thought I had never met with a more striking instance of the iron grasp with which intoxicating liquors seem, as it were, to "seal the ruin" of many of their victims. He was a man of superior abilities; he commenced life with a bright prospect of success; for many years he adorned a Christian profession; but he was a moderate drinker. The "bottle" and the "decanter" were in his house. Many of his Christian brethren had invited him to take "one glass" with them. Imperceptibly a love for drink was created; private prayer was now neglected; the house of God forsaken: relatives and those who had first "emboldened" him to drink, now turned their backs upon him; until, step by step, he sunk so low, that he could, (when under the influence of drink,) fondly hope that there was no God to judge him, no heaven to gain, no hell to shun.

Parents! Brothers! Sisters! Sunday-school Teachers! Professing Christians! beware of commencing the moderate use of alcoholic drinks. Look at "THE CONTRAST;" see "WHAT HE WAS," and "WHAT HE BECAME;" and may the sight move you as it moved me, to pledge myself to renewed exertion in promoting the temperance cause.

MORAL INFLUENCE OF RIGHT PRINCIPLE.

In our June No. we noticed the resignation of the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, Unitarian minister of Bridgewater, in consequence of the funds of his chapel being increased by the rents of certain beer-shops. The result of this honourable decision we present with great pleasure to our readers—EDITOR

The congregation meeting at Christ-church Chapel, Bridgewater, of which the Rev. R. L. Carpenter was the late minister, have passed the following resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is undesirable for a Christian congregation to derive any portion of its income from the rent of beer-houses, believing that in many of such houses, vice and immorality are fostered and extended."

In conformity with this resolution, the treasurer for this year has served the occupants of beer-houses on the chapel property, (who are yearly tenants) with legal notice to quit.—From the Inquirer, (London paper), July 7th.

THE MONTHLY SERMON.

Our London readers will be pleased to hear that the next Monthly Sermon will be preached at St. George's Presbyterian Church, in the Borough Road, Southwark, by the Rev. JOSEPH FISHER, on Sunday, September 30th, at half-past Six, P.M. Ed.

TEMPERANCE HYMN.

O! Father of mercy look down from above,
With an eye of compassion, and pitying love,
And from our bless'd country, help to remove,
Every stumbling block out of the road,
From earth, to a blessed eternal abode.

O! Father of mercy, look down from thy throne
And our efforts, though feeble be pleased to own,
The power of intemperance we seek to dethrone,
That every inebriate sinner may learn
From the sin of intemperance quickly to turn

O! Father of mercy, look down from the sky,
With a loving, compassionate, pitying eye,
And save the poor drunkard,—O let him not die!
But snatch him from ruin, and let his song be,
Thanksgiving, and glory and honour to Thee.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

TO LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

THOMAS B. SCUTT, Esq.

It is our painful duty to inform our readers that this steady friend of the cause, and valued member of the Committee of the National Society, has been suddenly removed by the prevailing pestilence. After attending his usual place of worship on Sunday, August 26th, he was seized at 2 P.M., and expired before midnight. Our deceased friend was an estimable member of the legal profession.

SIMULTANEOUS MOVEMENT.

We have great pleasure in presenting to our readers the following resolution, passed unanimously at the late conference of the British Association at Lincoln. We sincerely hope it will be acted on as far as possible.—EDITOR.

“That this Conference recommends the various societies in Great Britain to hold a series of simultaneous meetings during the first week in the ensuing October, and to use any other means, during the same week, for bringing the question of total abstinence more prominently before the public.”

SNUFFING AND SMOKING.

Both snuffing and smoking, if they were to burst upon us as novelties in some distant country, among a horde of wild savages, would be put down at once as the natural result of that absence of civilisation we are apt so much to deplore. To see a man, for the first time, stuffing his nose full of black dust, or pulling and puffing, and making all sorts of unaccountable faces at, to all appearance, a dirty piece of stick, would be a sight worthy of being set down among the savage fancies of the race, rather than as the practice and recreation of poets and philosophers. Self-gratification is not the great rule of life. Whilst a part of society, we should endeavour to arrange all our pleasures in harmony with those around us, otherwise the sooner we retire to the woods and let our nails grow the better. Snuffing and smoking are anything but agreeable to one-half of those with whom we associate; both are unwholesome, both apt to engender a taste for other and even worse indulgence. It is an early habit of smoking amongst the young people of the working classes that leads to the more brutalising habit of drinking. A dry parched mouth, and a hard, dry skin, are among the first promptings to the gin palace,—among the higher grades of society, the most frequent stimulants to further excess. But in addition to all this, they are no slight item in the household expenses of both rich and poor ; and, worse than all, great abettors of a false revenue system, and a large share of the payment of savage war, with all its horrors and its bloodshed. Free traders and peace lovers should, above all others, abjure the wicked weed.

To a well-regulated mind, that has passed into the perception of the value of well-regulated health, all physical excitement will wisely be avoided. Thanks to a rapidly-improved and improving state of society, the wine bottle and the spirit decanter, the boisterous assemblage that was wont "to set the table on a roar," the host that could lock the door and put the key in his pocket, that called every three minutes for "bumpers and no daylight,"—and the guest that found a difficulty in staggering into the drawing-room, are all fast becoming traditional,—dreams or stories of a past life, not to be recognised or acknowledged in their grossness by the generation now springing into the world and marching in the world's ways. Let us hope that these other features of a rude life—for rude they are, however their many pleasant advocates and disciples may think to the contrary—may pass also into the usages that have been ; that they will be laughed at as freely as we now laugh at the hooped petticoats and painted and patched faces of our great grandmothers, or the Indian squaws of those uncultivated but peaceable races which Christianity, in its love or its hypocrisy, is rapidly exterminating from the face of their own and God's beautiful earth. Try the experiment of abstinence for a time, to ascertain if other and wiser means of happiness and social pastime may not be acquired, and if the world cannot go on, and your own wits be kept in full exercise and vigour, without the necessary motive power of a puff or a pinch.—Manchester Times.

DRINKING AT FUNERALS.

(To the Editor of the Temperance Chronicle.)

DEAR SIR,—It is now better than eight years since I adopted the principles of teetotalism, and consequently, I have had some little experience of the benefits derivable from consistent adherence to them. I am an undertaker, and think there are scarcely any men so given to indulgence in these customs as those connected with that business. It has not unfrequently been my lot to witness relatives of a deceased friend intoxicated at his funeral, and more frequently those men who are engaged in it. I have even seen ministers perform the last sad rites in a state of inebriation. Having recently to conduct a funeral, I resolved to observe strictly my teetotal principles. The deceased had died in one of our hospitals, and having accompanied the men with the coffin, I was just about to leave the institution, when one of the party said, "Sir, I hope you will remember me," &c. I of course knew what was his meaning ; so placing a trifle in his hand, I said, "Now I hope you will not spend it in beer," &c. He replied, "Oh no, sir, my wages will not allow me to spend my money in beer." Having had a little more conversation on the subject, we removed the corpse to the place from which it was to be interred. On the day of the funeral, I said to the person who employed me, now in providing refreshments for the mourners, I shall furnish no intoxicating drink. The friends assembled, partook of what they required, and then I supplied the men who were engaged at the funeral in the same way, and gave each a trifle instead of "allowance." When I settled with them afterwards, I had this pleasing testimony from one of the men, "I am happy to inform you that neither I nor the other men ever attended a funeral at which we were more comfortable in our lives. We were not compelled to go to a public-house. Instead of intoxicating drink you very kindly gave us money, which we took home to our families, and we only wish every funeral was conducted in the same way." Now, dear sir, I have sent you this to use as you may think proper, thinking it might conduce to forward the temperance reform ; feeling fully assured that there are no circumstances in which that reform is more needed than at funerals.

Yours, &c.,
AN UNDERTAKER.

SERIOUS OCCURRENCE AT CAMBRIDGE.

On Saturday, the 5th inst., some paviours were at work near Trinity College, Cambridge, when some students gave them bottle after bottle of wine to drink, until one of the men became so drunk that he died.

(To the Editor of the Temperance Chronicle.)

Sir,—If I, either through carelessness or by some sad accident sold prussic acid or any other poison in the place of some harmless drug, and thereby caused the death of one person, and the bodily injury of others, I should very properly be indicted for manslaughter. It might be some little extenuation, if I pleaded ignorance of the injurious powers of the article vended, or if I said the accident was quite unforeseen ; but if I gave a deleterious drug for the purpose of injuring one or more of my fellow-creatures, not only physically, but also mentally, knowing full well the injurious and even fatal effects, both by my own knowledge of the article as well as by experience, and if that drug produced a most miserable death, robbing a family of its parent, and a wife of her partner, I should very properly be indicted for wilful murder. Now, sir, can the jury fairly and conscientiously do their duty who had to sit on the body of a poor man who met his death in the latter mentioned way, without returning a verdict of murder ? I state the particulars above. The murderers (I call them so without hesitation,) knew very well the fatal power of the liquid which they so wantonly gave the labourers. They knew as well as I can tell them, that even if they were but intoxicated, they were then literally poisoned, the very word intoxication being derived from τοξικόν (toxicum.)

Shame, shame ! Are the noble powers of man, both physically and intellectually, to be tampered with in so wanton a manner ? Can sorrow for the untimely fate of the deceased, and few jokes on the inebriation of those whom a merciful Providence has spared, mitigate the slaughter of a fellow-creature ?

I trust, sir, that you will take up this matter as it deserves, and publish the names of the wanton creatures—men they are not—who have thus acted.

I remain, Sir, yours obediently,
T. PLATO.

Reviews.

Drinking and Sabbath Desecration. By Rev. W. REID.

Another important addition to Mr. Reid's invaluable labours in the cause of temperance. It is a powerful argumentum ad hominem addressed to the advocates of Sabbath reform, and indisputably proves that they can never be consistent without abjuring entirely the use of all preparations of malt. He states that "in 1846 there were 53,373 brewers, maltsters, and distillers licensed in the United Kingdom. Taking, then, the moderate calculation of two persons on an average being so employed in each brewery, distillery, or malting-house, we have upwards of 100,000 men employed every Sabbath day in making liquor alone." To these are added 200,000 sellers and 1,000,000 drinkers in public-houses, with myriads more who drink at home, and it is hence concluded that strong drink induces at least two millions of persons out of the twenty-seven millions of the United Kingdom to violate the Sabbath day.

From the scorching fire of this well-directed attack there is only one ground of escape, viz., That malt drinks are necessary, which is barricaded by the signatures of many hundreds of medical gentlemen, who have avouched the contrary doctrine. To this might have been added the experience of millions of water-drinkers throughout the world, and in every age, who can testify to its perfect sufficiency for all the purposes of the animal economy. There is no hope for the Sabbath-garrison but to capitulate at discretion or SIGN THE PLEDGE.

We should not do justice to this valuable paper if we did not add that it contains many important facts—well put—in a small compass, and for less than half the smallest coin in the realm.

An Enquiry into the Extent and Cause of Juvenile Depravity. By THOMAS BEGGS. London, CHARLES GILPIN, pp. 184.

The valuable essay is one of those which competed for the prize of £100. offered by that well-known philanthropist, Joseph Eaton of Bristol. Though unsuccessful in obtaining the prize, it was rightly regarded as too important to be entirely suppressed. Our limited space prevents us from doing justice to the mass of interesting and thrilling facts and conclusions which are here amassed, and at present, we can do little more than give a bird's-eye view of the whole.

The introductory chapter, states the subject and produces some facts which shew its importance and general bearing upon the social state. From this it appears, that in the Middlesex Sessions, the third quarter of 1847, twenty-four offenders were presented for trial, "whose ages did not exceed twelve years, and states, on the authority of Serjeant Adams, that 1600 cases of summary conviction had occurred in one year,—the ages varying from seven to fifteen years. To sum up the numbers in one almost inconceivable total "nearly twenty thousand children under seventeen years of age, pass through our gaols every year, besides those summarily disposed of."

Chapters 2, 3 and 4, are devoted to an examination of the numbers—state of education—and social condition of the dangerous classes," as Mr. Beggs, following the French writers on social economy, appropriately styles them.

The 5th and 6th chapters enquire into the causes of juvenile depravity among the mining, the factory and the agricultural population, the two latter classes being considered together. This we regret because there is so much in the domestic and social habits of each class that is peculiarly its own that we think they would have been more advantageously presented in different sections.

In the 7th chapter, the general condition of the poorer classes, with statistics, and the amount of means spent in drink, are searchingly investigated.

The 8th chapter is on the extent and causes of prostitution. The 9th on vice and profligacy among the more educated classes; and the 10th is devoted to a consideration of remedies. The work is materially enhanced in value by the statistics furnished in the Appendix, an important aid to those who will not be contented to lay down the book without pursuing the subject further.

It will be readily conjectured that such a subject could not have been successfully treated without a reference to Sabbath-schools. The teachers and friends of these invaluable institutions will find in the essay, ground to suspect that the drinking customs have a most deadly effect upon their youthful charge. On this point we beg attention to the following: The committee of the Rochdale Temperance Society inform us, that one of their number "visited one of the singing saloons in Rochdale, and on a Saturday evening, about eleven o'clock, observed sixteen boys and girls seated at a table in front of the stage; several of the lads had long pipes each, with a glass or jug containing intoxicating liquor, and no less than fourteen of the number were members of the bible classes in different Sunday-schools. There they sat, listening to the most obscene songs, witnessing scenes of the most immoral kind, and swallowing liquid fire." They add, "These sinks of iniquity are thronged with old Sunday scholars, especially on Sunday evenings, and not unfrequently until twelve o'clock. The appalling results of the drinking-system, are not wholly confined to the scholars. Many a promising teacher has fallen a victim."

A teacher in Birmingham informs Mr. Beggs:—"I know that in the Sunday-school of which I was a pupil, a great number turned out drunkards, myself amongst them. The class I was in consisted of about seventeen or eighteen scholars, and I am sure that twelve of them became sots. Some remain so to this day a pest to the neighbourhood, a disgrace to the borough, and a trouble to their families. It has been, unfortunately, my lot to sit at one time or another in the tap-room, with eight or nine of my former fellow-scholars." He adds, "My own intemperate habits were formed during the time I was a teacher in the school,"—and exclaims, "Oh! sir, if Sunday-school superintendents and teachers could only see a small portion of the immense amount of their labours which are utterly, and I fear for ever, frustrated by this foe to human improvement, (strong drink,) I feel satisfied that the same love which induces them to teach the scholar, would induce them to bid an eternal farewell to that article which has so long and still continues to lay waste so much of their labour."

We commend these considerations to Sabbath-school teachers, and take our leave for the present of this interesting essay, urging all our readers to read, study, and ponder the thrilling facts and statements of this valuable contribution to the literature of the temperance question.

Youthful Piety: exhibited in its principles, excellencies and happy results. By Dr. BURKS.

The design of this book is to promote early and practical religion, a purpose for which it is admirably adapted. It contains a variety of interesting facts and stories in prose and verse, and will no doubt be a great favourite with the younger branches of those families into which it may be introduced. Those who know the author personally, or by report, will expect the temperance practice to be inculcated, and in this they will not be disappointed. We quote one specimen of its poetical contents. It is on the "Sad effects of Intemperance."

Asiatic Cholera, and its Treatment. By H. MUDGE, Bodmin, pp. 12.

A little tract containing most important facts, on a painfully interesting subject. In a few brief pages, the causes, symptoms, preventives and remedies are glanced at in turn, and a most decided preference given to treatment with salines and cold water, under which fewer deaths have occurred than under any other means. The following is from a table compiled on observation of Mr. Ross, extending to 6,296 cases, and shewing the number of deaths per centum, under the different remedies which have been experimentally applied.

Confessions of a Convert from Teetotalism to Temperance. By THOMAS SMEETON. pp. 32. London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co.

This is a perfectly unique specimen in the history of teetotalism. Backsliders we have heard of, not a few; as was to be expected by every intelligent observer of human nature. But that a man should be convinced of the truth of a principle—converted to the practice it demands—and publicly employed in its advocacy and defence on the platform, and through the press—and then suddenly have his faith blasted, and instantly spring into the most assured conviction of the untruth of the principles and the inexpediency of the practice; this is a case absolutely sui generis. Happily, the philosophical difficulties of the case are removed by the author himself, who informs us—

"From the moment of my first adhesion to the teetotal society, my suspicions were secretly at work in reference to the scriptural grounds on which the disciples of teetotalism assumed to base their principles."—p. 6.

We take the writer to mean that he never was convinced of the soundness of the scriptural arguments produced in defence of total abstinence, and yet during a public advocacy of the cause, he has in various forms avowed his belief. We tremble for any Christian professor, that can stoop to such a course as this opening confession most unmistakeably indicates.

The conclusions at which he professes to have arrived, and under the force of which he has abandoned and attacked teetotalism, are the following:—

"1. The teetotal system, as an organization, reflects upon the personal character and conduct of the Lord Jesus Christ."—p. 7.

"2. Teetotalism, as a system, very injuriously confounds the scriptural distinction between drunkenness and drinks."—p. 9.

"3. Teetotalism, as a system, assails unjustly the character of many Godly Ministers of the Gospel."—p. 12.

"4. Teetotalism, as a system, makes one preceptive part of the Gospel of none effect."—p. 15.

The first of these is an utterly unfounded assertion, proceeding on the supposition that Jesus Christ was in the habit of drinking intoxicating drinks—a proposition which no man has ever proved nor ever can.

The second proposition is gratuitous; and is sought to be supported by a statement obviously false,—

"But modern teetotalism has almost changed the sense of our own tongue, and instead of frowning on drunkenness, we hear on every side, Oh! this accursed drink. This confounding of things that differ, will have, I fear, a most unhappy effect on the rising mind of our nation, for the sin is getting shifted from the shoulders of the sot, and charged upon the good creature which he has sinfully misused."—p. 11.

We must retort the charge. Has the penitent ever heard any thing in temperance meetings likely to blunt the sensibility of conscience, in reference to the sin of drunkenness—any thing to palliate it in public estimation? On the contrary, have not many, perhaps most, abstainers more keen and vivid perceptions of the enormity of the evil, although combined with pity for those who are at once the perpetrators and the victims of it! Have not many been found among moderate drinkers, who declare that an occasional act of drunkenness is very excusable? Are there not some among them who boldly advocate the "physical advantages" of occasional drunkenness, and assert that a man is all the better for it? We have looked at such persons with our own organs of vision, and "heard with our ears," more than once or twice, such statements.

The third proposition may be true or false, but has nothing to do with the subject. Perhaps the author has recorded his own experience, and designed by his "confessions" to atone for his trespasses, when he says,—

"Nearly every teetotal meeting is amused with over-drawn caricatures of 'little drop deacons,' or 'leaders,' or 'ministers,' or edified by some sharp strictures upon holy men who are eminent in the Church of Christ often uttered by speakers and agents who are strangers to true religion, and applauded to the echo by the worldlings present, who delight in wounding the religion of Jesus Christ in the persons of its ministers and teachers. I have known such advocates as I have referred to at a London theatre one evening, and on another in the pulpit."—p. 12.

Whether this be so or not, no one can be more conscious than our penitent author, that even Christianity may be objected to and is attacked by infidels on precisely the same grounds. Are we now to hear that teetotalism is accountable for all the vagaries and improprieties of its numerous advocates, of every class and description? If this rule of judgment must be adopted, it is doubtful whether our principles are greatly under obligation to our author for his advocacy and support.

The fourth proposition is simply ridiculous. If you make all men teetotalers, some of the precepts of the Gospel will be unnecessary! The same may be said if you make all men honest, or chaste, or sound-minded, or holy. Should a society be formed to promote universal chastity, and our author become first an advocate and then a "convert," his second volume of confessions may contain the same charge, "your system makes one preceptive part of the Gospel of none effect."

But, we ask, may not people be warned against "excess of wine" unless wine contains "poison?" Are they not warned against excess of "food," even although in itself it is good? We are ashamed of having to review anything so perfectly childish.

Such are the main pillars of this strong-hold of little-drop-drinking. They will not require a Samson's might to lean upon them to reduce the fortress. A few blasts from the rams-horns of temperance, and like the walls of the ancient Jericho, they will crumble to dust.

The remainder of this lucubration is employed in replying to supposed objections, to the number of eleven. Our space will not allow us to notice them, nor is it necessary, as we conceive that any intelligent boy in our juvenile societies, who has entered his teens, may demolish ex tempore all the replies to them.

In laying down the pamphlet we would beg the author to scrutinize the motives which prompted to this publication. We can assure him that he has surprised no one—staggered no one—and deceived no one, excepting himself. With trembling pity for the victim of such childish excuses for personal indulgence and self-gratification, we commend to his especial consideration the apostolic injunction, "Let him who thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."

Notices of Meetings.

HARTWELL PARK, AYLESBURY.

The annual festival in this beautiful park was held on the 31st July and 1st of August, under the presidency of the Rev. T. Pyne, M.A., Incumbent of Hook, Surrey. Two meetings were held on each day, which were addressed on the great questions of universal temperance and universal peace, by John Lee, Esq., D.C.L., the learned and patriotic proprietor of the demesne; also by C. H. Lovell, Esq., M.D., Rev. William Stokes of the Peace Society, Mr. Adey of Leighton, Mr. Allen, Primitive Methodist of Chinnor, Oxon, John Hamilton, Esq., Editor of the Bucks Advertiser, Mr. Jabez Inwards of the National Temperance Society, and other well-known friends of both these philanthropic movements.

Dr. Lee read a passage from Waller's History of England, shewing that as far back as the reign of Henry VII. England had recognised the blessings of peace. The learned Dr. remarked that he was indebted for the passage to Mrs. Lee, who had called his attention to it, thus shewing how ladies not accustomed to address public assemblies may yet work effectively in great moral reforms.

The last meeting was enlivened by a somewhat animated conversation, which arose from the avowal of Mr. Stokes that he was not a teetotaler, but a moderate drinker. This ended in a friendly challenge being given to Mr. Stokes by Mr. Jabez Inwards, who undertook to defend, in the County Hall at Aylesbury, the assertion that "teetotalism is the temperance of the Bible." The report does not inform us whether the challenge was accepted, but we conclude not.

Such festivals are calculated to have a most humanizing and elevating effect upon the neighbourhoods in which they are held, and our earnest desire is, that Hartwell Park, heretofore the residence of dethroned monarchs, may be made tributary to the advancement of His reign whose rightful title is the Prince of Peace, and whose advent to our world was ushered in with the proclamation of "Peace on earth and good-will to all men."—Abridged from Bucks Gazette.

BATH.

The Juvenile Temperance Society in this place has just held its eleventh Annual Meeting, and seems to be in a flourishing condition. The Committee thus express its object and hopes:—

"The founders of the Society, deeply sensible of the lamentable effects of the drinking customs upon the rising generation, and forcibly impressed with the truth of the principle, 'prevention is better than cure,' saw the propriety and necessity of training up youths of both sexes in the practice of the total abstinence of strong drink; which principle, they considered, beautifully accorded with the spirit of the Divine command, 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.' And, in pausing to consider for a moment the feeble circumstances under which the Society commenced, and its gradually-increasing importance,—the extent of direct good accomplished,—and the probably large amount of evil prevented,—the great success of the year which has just passed, and the incalculable amount of indirect beneficial influence the whole will undoubtedly have upon the future condition of thousands,—the Committee feel assured that every right-thinking friend of humanity will agree with them, that they have abundant cause to rejoice that their labour has not been in vain.

"Among the most pleasing events of the past year, the Committee would refer with pleasure to the gratuitous lecture, delivered by Dr. Grindrod to about 2000 juveniles, in the Banqueting-room of the Guildhall, which was attended with great success,—nearly 300 children having signed the pledge upon that occasion. Since the last anniversary, many public and private meetings have been held, and several valuable lectures delivered. In August last, the Committee held a Fête and Public Meeting at Sydney Gardens, when an important accession of members was made to the Society. Another important feature of the past year, worthy of observation, is the formation of a Juvenile Society, in connexion with the Lyncombe and Widcombe Temperance Association, which is likely to be attended with much good.

"The thanks of the Committee are due to the Rev. G. W. Newnham, for his kindness in preaching the Anniversary Sermon of the past year; and also to the Rev. S. H. Widdrington, for the use of Walcot church on that occasion."

Huddersfield.

A temperance tea-meeting of the members of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, and of this Union, was held in the large vestry of Queen's Street Chapel, Huddersfield, on Easter Tuesday, April 10th, 1849. About 225 sat down to tea. After tea the Rev. G. B. Macdonald, superintendent of the circuit, opened the meeting, he gave out a hymn, and prayed; he afterwards moved that Mr. Samuel Booth, Surgeon, Huddersfield take the chair. The Secretary read the report, a few extracts from which we give. The Wesleyan Union of Total Abstiners was instituted in Liverpool in 1846, by some zealous friends of the temperance reformation. A want had long been felt by religious teetotalers in the Wesleyan connexion, of a Christian bond of union, in which prayer should form a prominent feature; teetotalism should be closely connected with religion, and a spirit of humble dependence upon God, and friendly feeling towards each other should be cultivated in its members.

The Huddersfield branch of this Union was formed in the vestry of Queen Street Chapel, on the 29th July, 1848. The primary design in admitting only members of the society, was to secure heart union in prayer, which is the chief cornerstone of the building. At the first meeting it was resolved,—That we be considered a branch of the Liverpool Union of Wesleyan Total Abstiners, and that we co-operate with other kindred institutions. We have enrolled already ninety members, consisting of trustees, local preachers, leaders, Sunday-school teachers and tract distributors; twenty-five of whom have been persuaded to sign the pledge, for the sake of example and their future safety. 1st. Because it is the duty of all Christians, to try to reclaim the drunkard, both by precept and example. 2nd. Because the example of extreme moderation is not sufficient to lead the drunkard to a position of safety. We are glad to announce that thirty Wesleyan Methodist ministers are patrons of this Union. That above fifty branches were already formed in various parts of the United Kingdom. In Huddersfield, we have had sixteen Wesleyan temperance prayer meetings in the vestry of Queen Street Chapel; they were attended with much of the power and blessing of Almighty God. While it is our settled conviction, that more of the Wesleyan ministers and members have been degraded by this sin than any other; we wish distinctly to state, that we abhor intemperance, and hail this Society as a harbinger for good. We desire to see Wesleyan Methodism fully identified with the cause of temperance, on account of the intimate connexion which exists between that cause and the revival of "pure and undefiled religion." None but God can estimate the amount of talent which spirit-drinking has neutralized, or the magnitude of those barriers which it presents to the progress of truth, or the number of souls it has sent to the bottomless pit. Many causes have contributed to bring about this lamentable state of things; but far above all others, we place intemperance, verily "believing that this single sin is destroying more souls, than all the ministers in Great Britain are instrumental in saving." Many interesting addresses were delivered of a practical nature, by Mr. Joseph Harding, of London, (the agent for the Associate Institution for Improving and Enforcing the Law for the Protection of Women,) Mr. B. Bentley, Mr. John Senior, Mr. Thomas Watson, Mr. John Wild, and Mr. Joseph Wood. Meetings of this kind are calculated to have a salutary effect upon the members of our society; inducing many to sign the total abstinence pledge, who are in great danger of being overtaken "by the easily besetting sin" of intemperance and love of company.

LEEDS.

On Monday, June 25th, the children of the "Band of Hope," which numbers upwards of 4,000, had their annual procession. At one o'clock the children of the various districts, under the care of their superintendent, met in the area of the Coloured Cloth Hall, and sung three of their beautiful Melodies, Nos. 6, 9 and 16, and then formed into procession, and were led by two boys mounted on ponies, and a band of music, through some of the principal streets of the town, halted in St. Peter's Square, where they sang Melodies, Nos. 7, 8 and 12, and again formed and moved through the streets to the Free Market, where they formed into a square and sang Melodies Nos. 2, 12, and 32, and then retired to their respective districts and were regaled with buns and tea. The day will be long remembered. The weather was fine,—the rain on the previous night having quelled the dust.

So many children, with smiling faces, neat and cleanly dressed, walking in orderly procession, formed a pleasing sight. The children sang with a correctness and an enthusiasm which called forth the approbation and even the tears of many of the numerous bystanders. Too much importance cannot be attached to these beautiful combinations of rhyme and music, as a means of indoctrinating the minds and engaging the affections of the young.

WALLINGFORD.]

On Friday the 13th of July, we were favoured with the efficient services of Mr. Jabez Inwards of Leighton Buzzard, who delivered a very interesting lecture in the Town Hall. Mr. Isaac Broad of Wantage presided. The attendance was excellent, and by very many persons it was acknowledged to be the most quiet temperance meeting ever held in this town. After a vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. Inwards for his instructive and pleasing lecture, the chairman for his kind assistance, and the Mayor for the use of the Hall; the meeting broke up, and a few persons signed the pledge.

THEODORE COMPTON, Sec.

Scottish Temperance League Register, for 1850.

In compliance with the cordial and unanimous recommendation of the members of the League, at the annual meeting, held last month, the Executive Committee have entered into arrangements for the issue of this publication.

It will contain a list of the members of the League, arranged alphabetically under the names of the different towns where the members reside.

It will also contain a large amount of statistical information and striking facts, bearing upon every department of the temperance question, with remarks and inferences of a practical character. The resources at the disposal of the Committee will enable them to render this section of the work exceedingly valuable and complete.

Great attention and care will be bestowed upon the construction of a good general Almanac. A full Calendar will be given, containing the usual information respecting the sun, moon, tides, and weather, with copious chronological notices of important temperance events.

A number of other improvements are contemplated, and will be introduced as extensively as circumstances will permit.

The Executive Committee are anxious that the REGISTER should appear with the other Almanacs and Annuals generally published about the end of November, and to enable them to have it ready by that time, it will be necessary that names intended for insertion be received by 1st October.

Abstainers, male and female, wherever resident, who approve of the Constitution of the League, and who contribute two shillings and sixpence, or upwards, to its funds, are eligible to membership, and may have their names enrolled in the REGISTER, if sent by the time specified.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

5th, The extent to which the example of Teetotal parents would promote the moral and religious well-being of families, and afford to parents the means of sending their children to school.

6th, The practical working of the drinking-usages and customs in manufactories, workshops and elsewhere.

The names of the adjudicators will be announced at a future time.

The Essays, which must not exceed forty-six 8vo pages, to be sent under cover, accompanied with a sealed letter enclosing the real name and address of the writer, on or before the 1st of November, 1849, to the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard.

ISAAC DOXSEY, Secretary.

penny Packets.

Fifty Packets of Juvenile Temperance Books or Tracts delivered in London for a Guinea, sent by P. O. Orders to Richard Dykes Alexander, Ipswich. All the Tracts may be had of any country Bookseller, through Simpkin and Marshall, London.

GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY, PATENTEES,
City Road, London,

It cannot now be doubted, even by the most sceptical, but that Gutta Percha must henceforward be regarded as one of the blessings of a gracious Providence, inasmuch as it affords a sure and certain protection from cold and damp feet, and thus tends to protect the body from disease and premature death.

"GUTTA PERCHA TUBING," being so extraordinary a conductor of sound, is used as speaking tubes in mines, manufactories, warehouses, &c. This tubing may also be applied in Churches and Chapels for the purpose of enabling deaf persons to listen to the sermon, &c. For conveying messages from one room or building to another, or from the mast-head to the deck of a vessel, it is invaluable.

MILL BANDS.—The increasing demand for the Gutta
Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLACKS, &c.—Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to manufacturers, engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-bucket valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size or thickness without seam or joint, and as cold water will never soften them, they seldom need any repair.

Gutta Percha soles, solution, inkstands, card trays, medallions, picture-frames, brackets, mouldings, window-blind cornices, vases, fire-buckets, bowls, pen-trays, bougies, catheters, stethoscopes, thin lining, thread, flower-pots, ear-trumpets, &c. &c., may be had at the Company's Works, Wharf Road, City Road, London, or of any of their wholesale dealers in town or country.

PEACE, UNIVERSAL PEACE!!

We pause to pay a tribute of respect and affection to our lovely sister. Her success is our delight—the extension of her empire, the augury of our triumph. War has ever smiled, or we should rather say grinned, with demon delight upon strong drink, its faithful ally and spirit-stirring friend. For there is alliance among fiends. So is there an intimate and indissoluble connexion between teetotalism and peace. They are both the offspring of temperance—both inculcate self-government—both demand self-sacrifice—both pledge themselves to the increase of human happiness and the mitigation of human woe—yet they live in sweet and undisturbed harmony, each seeking the increase of the other's empire, and each rejoicing in the other's success.

The second Peace Congress has been held, and France, warlike and war-loving France, has welcomed its advent with true Parisian politeness; and republican France celebrated it with regal honours. A demonstration of the influence of truth and right has been given to the world.

“Such as earth saw, never;
 Such as heaven looks down to see.”

The principle of peace has been owned and honoured—to a delightful extent it is now understood—by thousands it has been embraced with all the fondness of a pure heart-affection, while foes dread, and friends anticipate its ultimate and perhaps early adoption.

Anticipatively we commence reading history in a prophetic light. The fate of standing armies for the preservation of international peace is sealed. Probably the present century, will chant their requiem. The twentieth century of the Christian era, will wonder at the national folly, which could imagine that the best way for nations to live in peace, was to go “armed to the teeth.” Missionary enterprizes inform us of islands in the South Pacific, in which no man dared to pass his neighbour but with uplifted javelin, with eye fixed upon him, each describing a semi-circle, and then walking backwards until out of javelin-cast. We naturally regard this as the extremest degradation of barbarism, and how then must “an armed peace” among neighbour nations be described?

The cause may lose some whose adherence arose from the stimulus to action, which their better nature received from the late magnificent assemblage, but the truth has gleamed with its light into many minds, and warmed many hearts by the radiation of its heat. These effects will be both permanent and progressive, and universal peace among the nations will gladden man and glorify God.

The friends of peace are hereby invited to share their affections with her twin sister temperance; and the admirers of temperance to rejoice in the prospects of peace. They have one spirit, and all who sincerely and intelligently, and heartily adopt the one, soon find their hearts beating in unison with the other. Some allowance must of course be made for the prejudices of early education, the mistakes of fallible judgment, and the potent influence of social example, but assuredly the two causes fairly examined, prove the identity of the philanthropic spirit, and lead us to expect that when one is fairly espoused, the other will be loved as a sister, and welcomed as a friend.

A PATTERN FOR KINGS.

Oscar, King of Sweden, accompanied by his Queen, attended personally a grand temperance meeting, held recently at Stockholm, and became himself so impressed with the importance of abolishing intemperance in his dominions, that, besides giving in his adhesion, and that of the Queen, to the principles and practice of temperance societies, he offered full pecuniary compensation to all distillers of ardent spirits who would cease manufacturing alcoholic drinks, which was accepted by many.—National evils, &c., by J. S. Buckingham.

The foregoing fact, which many of our readers may have probably read in the daily papers, is an illustration of the beautiful simplicity of manners which characterises the King of Sweden. Such a monarch deserves the title of the Father of his people, for such conduct is more "paternal" than "regal." In our own country much has been done during the reign of our beloved Sovereign, Victoria, to purify the morals of the Court, the Aristocracy, and the Army and Navy, and in this effort, her amiable Consort, Prince Albert, has cordially joined. His "moderation" (we use the term in the popular sense, without attempting philosophical correctness) has contributed to form a new standard in fashionable life, in respect to the drinking customs. We are neither unable to appreciate, nor unwilling to acknowledge the progress of society among the higher classes; but we are earnestly desirous that the present edition of Court practices should not be stereotyped, as it will admit of many corrections and improvements.

Can any reason be given why it should not be considered as essentially vulgar to drink fermented wines, as it is for ladies to take neat spirits? The leaders of fashionable life, are sure to be followed, in any practice they may choose to adopt. Every conceivable vagary in dress—every trivial punctilio of etiquette, has an origin, is to be traced to a cause. Why should not nobility and royalty recognize, adopt, sanction, and enshrine, customs from which alcohol in every form was carefully excluded? Gradually, yet surely, their example permeates and leavens all society, and it cannot be doubted that the formation or adoption of such practices as those we desire, would be productive of a vastly greater amount of good than could be obtained from all the charitable donations which the hearts of the generous could prompt, and the purses of the wealthy supply.

We are not accustomed "to speak evil of dignities," and are equally far from fawning before titles and cornets, or truckling to wealth and power. But as society is constituted, wealth, rank, and names, are sources of influence, and we are anxious to consecrate them to high moral uses, by allying them—universally, if possible—with that dignity which consists in self-denial, and that heaven-born virtue, which will display itself in heroic devotedness to the intellectual and moral progress of the spirit of man. With delight we read the paragraph above quoted, and with fervent spirit exclaim, "Oh! for ten thousand British Oscars to aid in the warfare, and hasten the triumphs of UNIVERSAL ABSTINENCE FROM ALL THAT INTOXICATES."

DR. CUMMING.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE EDITOR OF THE "NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE."

"Please all men in the truth—wound not the truth to please any."

A love of fairness and desire after truth induced the following correspondence, which we now present to our readers, and with which we take leave of our reverend friend. It is much to be regretted that when the Dr. has opposed our principles from the pulpit, he cannot find time to defend statements which have been shewn to be unproven. No doubt that friends and foes alike have desired that such a vindication should be at least attempted. Our esteemed friend must pardon us for declaring our conviction, that if his assumed positions were defensible, no man is more able than himself to place them in the class of established truths, and hence that we are driven to the conclusion that they cannot be maintained. Let our readers remember that the premise yet unproved is that "our Saviour was in the habit of taking intoxicating wine," and that until this is established, the Dr.'s whole argument is utterly baseless.

Another point on which the Dr.'s logic is grievously at fault, is, that "whenever a man begins to adopt another mode of life than that which the Saviour gave, he soon begins to adopt another rule of faith than that which the Bible affords." There is no logical connexion here between the antecedent and the consequent, and while the position is unsound in logic, it is utterly unsustained by fact. Our moderate drinking friends need not be scared by this caution from examining or adopting our principles, and we hope that they will consider the warning most salutary when the premise is established, and the conclusion shewn to be fairly deducible.

We have not heard from our reverend friend any sentence that has imputed any unworthy motive, and hence we have nothing to retract. The only passage to which he has taken exception, was penned under the conviction that the Dr. was acknowledged by wine-drinkers as a champion of their favourite indulgence, as well as considered by teetotalers a determined and voluntary antagonist of their cherished principles. We do not now see how the sermon which gave rise to this correspondence could have been otherwise viewed by either party, and assuredly meant nothing discourteous or unkind in the use of terms which appeared, and still appears to us, to convey only the simple truth.

"DEAR SIR,—I enclose a copy of the Temperance Chronicle, with your acknowledgment of an article containing extracts from a recent sermon of yours, calculated seriously to retard the progress of the temperance reformation.

"As nothing is desired but truth and Christian courtesy, our pages are at your service, if you are disposed to answer the arguments by which (permit me to say) your statements are materially shaken, if not entirely overturned.

"Confidently anticipating the ultimate triumph of truth, and considering that its interests loudly demand from you a defence of the opinions you have advanced, OR a public retraction of them,

"September 4th, 1849.

[Post-mark Tunbridge Wells.]

"DEAR SIR,—I am truly obliged to you, as Editor of the Temperance Journal, for sending me another copy of your publication, and at the same time so courteously inviting me to defend my opinions in its pages.

"I regret to say that other duties, at least as important and pressing, render it impossible for me to avail myself of your kind invitation. But I may add, that in my pulpit and ministry I am endeavouring to accomplish the very end you have in view, by a long-trying and effective weapon, which is to the world foolishness, but to them that are saved, Christ the wisdom of God, and the power of God. I have perfect faith in its ultimate success, and in that faith I can easily read, and yet not without regret, the unwise, and to the common cause injurious, remarks of the Journal you have sent me, that I 'stand the champion of modern religious and genteel wine-bibbing.' Do you recollect of whom it was said eighteen hundred years ago, 'Behold a man gluttonous and a wine-bibber?' I do not think that controversy does any good, however well-meant, which attributes motives, flings random charges, and concludes that two good men are not contributing to the same good cause, because they do not walk in roads perfectly parallel. Judge nothing before the time. The day will declare whether such instruments as those of the City Mission, the Scripture Readers' Society, and other Home Missions, or those of the Teetotal Society, have done most in leading men to live soberly, righteously, and godly.

"My conviction is, that till the rich raise the sanitary and physical condition of the dwellings of the poor, at least above that of the kennels of their dogs, all efforts to promote temperance will be powerfully thwarted. Dirt and foul air drive their victims to the injurious use of alcohol.

"I am truly yours,

"JOHN CUMMING."

"The National Temperance Society,
11, Tokenhouse Yard,
London, Sept. 13th, 1849.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I beg to acknowledge your favour of the 4th instant, and exceedingly regret that any thing in my strictures on your sermon or opinions should appear harsh or uncharitable. Permit me to assure you, that every line has been penned in a spirit of fraternal regard and christian love. I do not see a single sentence in either article that attributes any motive, and shall assuredly feel bound to acknowledge publicly my error, if it can be pointed out.

"I have great pleasure in acknowledging the power of that spiritual weapon, 'which the world calls foolishness,' but would remind you that the Gospel triumphs over man by operating as a motive, inducing him to 'abstain from all appearance of evil.' While it is admitted as a mental credo, and is yet dormant as a motive power, does it not come under the denomination of 'dead faith,' as so vividly described by the Apostle James?

"The injunctions to holiness of life are, in the present position of the church, fearfully neglected; at least such is my painful conviction. 'Be not conformed to the world,' says the apostle; but see, oh! see, my dear sir, how this command is fulfilled. Are not the amenities of life in many religious circles as much bound up with the mantling poisons, denominated 'wine and spirits,' as in many, perhaps, most worldly connexions, of the same standing? And are not many of the fairest hopes of pious families blighted by the growing attachment to intoxicating draughts?

"But, if any further reply were needed to the objection—'the Gospel is sufficient without teetotalism,'—I would urge that teetotalism is the adoption of a Gospel precept relative to the case in hand. Does not the apostle command, that we shall 'not put a stumbling-block or occasion to fall in our brother's way?' But strong drink is a stumbling-block—has occasioned many to fall—from the christian family, from the Sabbath-school, from the Lord's table, from the pulpit. You know these things, my dear sir—you have witnessed them—you have publicly acknowledged them—and can you now cherish the cause of stumbling, and openly advocate the propriety and lawfulness of its habitual indulgence?

"With respect to the comparative influence and usefulness of different religious institutions, I do not desire to boast against any, but rather rejoice in the success of all. Still there is not one of the noble societies to which you refer, but would add tenfold to its success by the adoption of our principle, and by fearlessly proclaiming and consistently practising it. Many of these christian agencies are almost powerless with regard to the vice of drunkenness—not because they do not take that Gospel which is 'the power of God to salvation, to every one that believeth,' but because they tolerate and patronise the use of those drinks, which present the most powerful barrier to their own success. On this point I speak with some confidence, for the most decisive testimony of pious clergymen fully substantiates the fact, that until they proclaimed the necessity of total abstinence, the Gospel failed to reach the case of a single drunkard, and to bring him to the feet of Jesus. Yet THOUSANDS who have been drawn from the ale-bench and the gin-shop by the agents of temperance societies, have afterwards been brought under the sound of the Gospel, and been saved by its Divine power.

"I agree with you on the importance of raising the physical condition of the poor, but think that the adoption of our principles pretty generally among them, would produce the very results you consider so desirable. These consequences have followed almost invariably. One of the first and most immediate effects of signing the pledge has been a regard to personal cleanliness and domestic comfort. And very few, if any, cases can be found of persons observing total abstinence for any considerable time, and yet remaining in the degraded condition which you and I so deeply deplore.

"You have, doubtless, reasons which to your own mind appear sufficient to justify a neglect of the facts now extant with regard to the advantages, physical, mental, moral, social, and religious, which our principles are calculated to secure. But to me it appears that nothing is more loudly demanded of the christian church than that self-denial which the Saviour has required of all his followers. When that high moral principle is generally recognised among Christians, intoxicating liquor will no longer be considered as necessary, nor regarded as useful. The ruin it has unquestionably wrought will be a sufficient answer to all pleas in justification of its use, and the pulpit, instead of being silent concerning its mischief, or vocal in its defence, will blow loud the warning trumpet, that the rising youth of our churches may avoid the deadly snares which lurk in our drinking customs, and ruin the most hopeful of Britain's sons.

"I am, my dear Sir,
 "Yours most truly,
 "ISAAC DOXSEY,
 "Ed. N. T. C."

LETTER FROM A JEWISH RABBI ON SACRAMENTAL WINES.

(From the York Temperance Visitor.)

The following letter will be read with interest by many of our readers. It was written some time ago, in answer to an application from a religious friend, who was anxious to satisfy his mind as to the probability of intoxicating wine being used at the Sacramental Table in primitive times. We are glad to find that in many churches throughout the kingdom, the use of that wine which is truly "a mocker," which "biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder," is being substituted for what Christ himself used, "the fruit of the vine." In one congregation in this City, where the teetotalers had become numerous, they sent a kind and affectionate request to the Minister and fellow-church members, stating that they could not consistently partake of the intoxicating wine, and would be glad if their brethren would substitute unfermented wine in lieu. The application was met in the same spirit that it was given, and the brandied wines have not since been used. We have no fear as to this course being universally adopted by all the churches before long, but in the mean time it behoves those who wish well to the temperance cause, to act with christian charity and prudence. Let the word of God be more thoroughly read, accompanied by earnest prayer for the guidance of God's Holy Spirit, and "Alcohol" shall not long find a shelter in the Sanctuary of the Lord.

"DEAR SIR,—In answer to your inquiries whether I am 'a convert from the Jewish to the Christian faith,' and 'if so, what the custom of the synagogues with which I was connected was, as to the passover wine?' I beg to say I am a convert, and the practice of the people of the synagogues with which I was connected, as to the passover wine, was as follows. But it were perhaps well, just to remark, that for seven years previous to the time when I left my people, I sustained among them the office of Hebrew teacher. I mention this simply to show you that I had ample opportunities of knowing what that practice was. All the Jews then, with whom I have ever been acquainted, are in the habit of using unintoxicating wine at the passover; a wine made in this country expressly for the occasion, and generally by themselves. The process by which it is made is very simple. Some raisins (dried grapes as you know) are steeped in water for a few days previous to the passover, the vessel being placed near the fire. This liquor is bottled off and used at the feast of unleavened bread under the name of the 'fruit of the vine.' Sometimes when time does not permit of steeping, the raisins are boiled on the same day on which the feast is to be celebrated at night, and when the whole of the saccharine matter is thought to be extracted, the decoction is bottled off and cooled, and this is the passover wine. These are the modes in which the wine was prepared by my own mother, and generally by those in the town with which I was connected (Manchester), in which I was born, and spent among my own people twenty-six years of my life. Having caused the passover-table to be prepared, the host, his household and guests seat themselves around it, to commemorate the deliverance of their fathers from Egyptian bondage. During the feast, four cups of the above wine are poured out for each person, over which, and previously to its being drunk, the master of the feast pronounces the benediction, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, Creator of the fruit of the vine.' After supper they sing a hymn, which closes the paschal solemnities. This was the mode in which the passover-wine was made and administered during the whole time I was under the parental roof, and when subsequent to the death of my father, it fell to my lot, as the eldest son, to preside at the celebration of the feast of the passover, I administered the same kind of wine. In short, all the Jews, as far as I know, use a perfectly unintoxicating wine at this delightful feast, the reason why they do so, being that the use of the common fermented wine would be a contravention of the laws of the passover. Of course the inconvenience of having to make their own wine would be altogether removed in a vine-growing country, such as Palestine—a land of vineyards, where for the ancient Jews there was, as in all vine-growing countries there is, an abundant supply of the pure unintoxicating 'fruit of the vine.'

TRIP TO HULTON PARK.

Never, in this neighbourhood, has there been a fact more significant of the pleasurable recreation which may be afforded to one part of the human family by another, than that set forth on Saturday last, in the shape of a visit by persons from Bolton and other places to Hulton Park. We have had "cheap trips" in abundance, by which the factory worker and the foundry operative have been whizzed from crowded streets to the sea's margin, there to inhale the bracing air; and multifarious contrivances for providing healthful amusements for the humbler portions of society have at times been made. But the scheme of Saturday was, from its monstrous character and the novelty of the circumstances, the most striking of any of the kind in our recollection.

For two or three years the more ardent advocates of sobriety—the teetotalers—have in Bolton paid peculiar attention to the rising generation, some of whom, at different Sunday Schools, have been formed into Branch Temperance Societies, and been termed "The Band of Hope." Each of these branches has had its own meetings, and taken its own steps for spreading its principles; but about twelve months ago a system was set on foot for acting at stated periods together by "monthly gatherings," or meetings held in the Temperance Hall. At these assemblies thousands of children have simultaneously attended and listened to others "of larger growth," who have endeavoured to stimulate and encourage both young and old to carry out the principles of total abstinence; a small selection of appropriate hymns and songs, compiled for the use of the juveniles, has been used, the Hall being made to ring by the blending of youthful voices; and recitations learnt by some of the children have been spoken. The Committee of this youthful band some weeks since contemplated, we understand, providing a cheap trip for their charge, and subsequently thought of other modes of finding them amusement; but, upon consideration, it was felt that the object would be best promoted by taking the children a few miles out of the town on a Saturday afternoon, after the close of their weekly labours, so as to allow them a view of the "face of nature," and to indulge for a few hours in recreation.

The anniversary of the commencement of the gatherings was deemed a fitting time for putting such an intention into execution, and the Committee set about the work accordingly. Hulton Park was named as a suitable place, and means were taken to ascertain whether its use could be obtained. William Hulton, Esq., the owner of the Park, as well as of the whole of Over Hulton, was communicated with, through his son William Ford Hulton, Esq., who at once shewed the utmost willingness to second the wishes of the Committee; and the result was, that without hesitation the desired favour was conceded, the venerable owner of the property fully appreciating the Committee's intentions, and evincing every desire to afford them facilities. Negotiations were entered into with the London and North Western Railway Company for conveying parties to Chequerbent, and announcements were made for a cheap trip on Saturday last. Previous to that day between four and five thousand tickets were sold for children and adults, and the sale, which had been stopped, was resumed on Saturday morning. The applications were again numerous, and when the total number of tickets disposed of amounted to 5,500, it was deemed desirable to cease selling, as more parties could not conveniently be taken on the railway, though many more were wishful to go.

On Saturday afternoon a train left the Cotton Station, Crook-street, about twenty minutes past one o'clock, for Chequerbent, and was followed by others up to about six o'clock, the arrangements being intended to serve the convenience of persons leaving off work at different parts of the afternoon. With the nature of the railway for the distance, which consists mainly of a single line, and has an unusually steep incline, it was found impracticable, by the engines and carriages employed on the occasion, to keep the station anything like clear, the number of passengers fast accumulating. About two o'clock the parties conveyed by the first train were met at an entrance to the Park by W. F. Hulton, Esq., who conducted them to the centre. It was originally intended that each section of the visitors should, on entering, be taken through the beautiful grounds and scenery; but, owing to the anxious wishes of the children to romp, this was found to be impracticable. Nevertheless the gentleman just named, who was present during the whole of the afternoon, actively exerted himself throughout, to contribute to the pleasures of the immense party, and the day proved to be in reality what was proposed in the Committee's announcement, "a grand gala day."—Abstracted from Bolton paper.

RAGGED SCHOOLS.

Extract from the Seventh Annual Report of the Field Lane Ragged School, under the Presidency of Lord Ashley, M. P.

"In previous reports we have had to tell of the depraved and vicious character of the inhabitants of the district in which the school stands. Satan has a glorious reign here. His great agent drunkenness is spreading a curse around,—but for this, your Committee's duties would well nigh cease. Through strong drink they are out of the way."

This confession most clearly indicates the duty of ragged school supporters and friends, and awakens the hope that in crowds they will ere long join our ranks. Many would be happy, if their charity-purses warranted, to increase their subscriptions to their respective schools. A most valuable contribution to the object, would be the subscription of the temperance pledge. Ragged schools are palliative, and on very high authority we have been assured, that "the country is weary of mere palliatives." Temperance Societies are a powerful auxiliary to ragged schools, and if generally extended, would prevent the rags and wretchedness, that have touched the sympathies of tender-hearted ladies, and philanthropic noblemen, and secured the establishment of ragged schools. Prevention is better than cure. We are not at all disposed to depreciate the one institution, but we are jealous for the influence of the other. The "ragged school" collectors, teachers, superintendents, should all carry a pledge book in their pockets, and having first subscribed their own names, endeavour to enrol all the children of the classes, with their parents and guardians. Try it, try it, TRY IT, friends of ragged schools.

SCRIPTURE WINES.

(To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.)

It appears to me that all the objections to teetotalism by members of the various religious denominations, whether preachers or people, are made on the supposition that intoxicating drinks are sanctioned in Scripture. Now, if it can be shown that this supposition has no real foundation, we shall remove the cause of those objections, and promote the best interests of the Society, by securing the co-operation of some who have hitherto stood aloof from us and our movements, under the mistaken notion that our cause is not scriptural.

I must confess that I adopted the principle on the simple ground of expediency, believing it right to deny myself of drink, the use of which leads to excess, and thus becomes physically injurious and demoralizing in its tendency and fruits. But in our search after truth, we are led on step by step, seeing and understanding more and more in relation to the whole. In this way I have been led to consider the various passages of Scripture which speak of wine, and I find there were at least two sorts or classes of wines, intoxicating and unintoxicating; and it is my deliberate conviction, that there is no clear or direct sanction for drinking the former kinds, and that all which may be gathered from Scripture in favour of drinking wine relates to the latter. If this point can be established, it will be of immense advantage to our cause, as we shall thereby cut off occasion for disputation from some who desire occasion, and compel others either to array themselves against Scripture evidences, or to confess that teetotalism is in accordance with Scripture. That the ancient genuine approved wine of Scripture was not intoxicating is capable of demonstration.

I am well aware that I have now entered the field of controversy, where the ground will be disputed inch by inch, and shall therefore start with one of the best authorities as it regards a knowledge of biblical languages and criticism. Adam Clarke on Genesis xl. 11, (published in 1814) "And I took the grapes and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup," &c., writes, "From this we find that WINE anciently was the mere expressed juice of the grape, without fermentation, the saky, or cup-bearer, took the bunch, pressed the juice into the cup, and instantly delivered it into the hands of his master. This was anciently the yayin (or wine) of the Hebrews," &c., and as it was the vine from which the grapes were taken by Pharaoh's butler, to furnish wine for the king, so it is the vine in Jotham's parable, Judges ix. 13, which is represented as saying, "Should I leave my wine which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?" This is also the very wine spoken of as a natural product in connection with oil and corn, Psalm civ. 14, 15, "That he may bring forth food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart." This wine is also spoken of as one of the choicest of God's blessings bestowed on his people in their most favoured condition and circumstances, Deuteronomy xxxii. 13, 14, "He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock; butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape."

That this is genuine wine we have the highest possible authority, Isaiah lxxv. 8, "Thus saith the Lord, as the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith destroy it not: for a blessing is in it," &c. This wine then is denominated pure, it makes glad the heart of man, it cheers the heart of God and man, it is the wine in which a blessing is found, and it is the only wine spoken of with divine approbation, and therefore we may safely infer that such was the wine at the marriage of Cana in Galilee, where Christ made the water wine. To suppose that he made an article capable of intoxicating the guests, and producing fruits uniformly condemned by himself in the Old and New Testaments, to say the least of it, would be a high reflection on the pure and spotless character of the Redeemer. I speak it advisedly. It was the genuine wine—it contained the essential qualities of the grape—it was the pure juice or blood of the grape, a blessing was in it, and it cheered the heart of God and man.

It was also the pure inspissated juice of the grape which was the celebrated medical wine of the ancients. Such, no doubt, was the wine which Timothy used for a diseased stomach and his other bodily infirmities (1 Timothy v. 23). Had he taken wine charged with spirit into a diseased stomach, it would have irritated and increased the disease instead of soothing and healing it. If this be admitted, and I cannot see how it can be denied, Timothy was still a teetotaler, though he took a little wine for his stomach's sake and his often infirmities.

With regard to that passage in 1 Corinthians xi. 21, "One is hungry and another is drunken," which may be thought to favour the opinion that the first Christians drank intoxicating wine in their religious assemblies, A. Clarke and other biblical critics show, that the original word translated drunken, refers to fulness or repletion, and the passage reads thus,—“One is hungry and another is filled to the full.” Dr. Clarke affirms that this is the meaning of the word in many places of Scripture.

If the foregoing views are correct, and I think there is every reason to believe them so, the cause of total abstinence rests on a firm basis—it is based on truth—truth supported by the highest scriptural authorities, and as a further confirmation and present witness; its benefits are daily experienced by thousands physically, socially, morally, and spiritually. These are evidences beyond dispute, and we may reasonably hope, if these facts engage the attention, they will enlist the services of professing Christians and all well-wishers of the human race.

(To the Editor of the Temperance Chronicle.)

STR.—Mr. Smeeton in his attack upon teetotalism, has taken care to make his hottest assault upon its weakest point, upon a point, indeed, which is not held by all teetotalers, nor, I think, by the majority of them. I refer to the direct scriptural authority, which some teetotalers imagine they have for their practice; and to the idea that a uniform distinction is preserved in the sacred writings between intoxicating and unintoxicating wine—that the one is mentioned with a blessing, and the other with a curse, and that, in no case, had the practice of drinking intoxicating wine the Divine permission or approval.

I have never, myself, been able to discover any solid ground for this belief, on the contrary, nothing seems plainer to me, than that drinks which would intoxicate were drunk by good and bad men throughout the entire of sacred history, and evidently in violation of no Divine command. Take as a proof, the command given to Aaron in Leviticus x. 9, "Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die," &c. This command would imply that priests might drink wine and strong drink, except when employed in the service of the sanctuary. Again, the vow of the Nazarite to refrain from wine and strong drink, yea, even from "the liquor of the grape," as clearly implies that this practice was to distinguish them from the people at large, who therefore were accustomed to drink wine and strong drinks. But this seems to be reduced to a certainty by Numbers xxviii. 7, "And the drink-offering thereof shall be a fourth part of a hin for a lamb, in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord, for a drink-offering." Here a certain measure of strong wine was to be poured unto the Lord for a drink-offering. Now a drink-offering, was simply an offering of a part of that which was the accustomed drink of the people; just as a meat-offering was part of the usual food of the people, but with this difference, that the offering must be of the choicest and best. Is it not fair then to conclude, that wine was the unprohibited beverage of God's peculiar people, and that they offered as the best of it, wine which is here denominated strong.

The repeated injunctions, in the New Testament to drink moderately of wine, are unanswerable proof that the drink would intoxicate, or why the warning! Abstinence, then, from such drink was not the inspired requirement, but temperance in the use of it. And this, of course, affords us the key to such passages as speak of wine as a blessing or as a curse. It becomes a blessing to those "who use it as not abusing it," and a curse, a bitter curse, to those "who tarry long at it."

I cannot help thinking that this view of the question is the nearest to the truth. If the contrary can be shewn, I shall be willingly convinced. I have been for some time a teetotaler, but I take my scriptural guarantee not from any express command, for I can find none, but from the law of love pervading that holy religion, which received its fullest development in the teachings of our Lord, and in the perfect example he has left us.

And, can we want more? Without being able to point to the express command, "Thou shalt drink nothing which can intoxicate," what Christian can challenge our conduct as not in conformity with the word of God, when we deny ourselves a lawful gratification, that we may not cause our brother to offend. The law of love—the essential principle of christianity, is the ground upon which teetotalers should take their stand—it is a rock, and nothing can prevail against it.

If the foregoing is not altogether in conformity with the principles of your magazine, perhaps you will still publish it. Many I know are of my way of thinking, and if wrong, we shall be glad to be put right.

I remain, Sir,
Yours respectfully,
JOSEPH MAYHEW.

Reading, August 28th, 1849.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

DEAR SIR,—I am exceedingly pleased to be able to communicate to your readers a fact in reference to teetotalism, which is calculated to confirm total abstinents in their noble principles, and to lead others who are partakers of the cup that inebriates, to resolve at once to abandon those drinks which they have for so long a period partaken.

On the 19th of November, 1848, Mr. B. of this town, who has been a teetotaler for many years, and a zealous advocate of temperance principles, was taken seriously ill, and continued from that time getting weaker every day. He, of course, called in medical aid. Dr. C. was his physician—a most eminent Christian and skilful man. Mr. B. stated to him that he was a firm teetotaler, but as he had sent for his advice, he should submit to whatever he (the learned Dr.) thought fit to prescribe. The physician administered to his patient medicines of different kinds, but finding they produced no good effect, requested Mr. B. to take two spoonfuls of brandy, in milk and soda water, thinking that as he was then suffering from extreme exhaustion, it would be beneficial. The experience of Mr. B. proved to the contrary. He received this preparation, feeling justified from the advice given by Solomon, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish," but soon found that the means were ineffectual. Other prescriptions were now resorted to, which, by the blessing of God, succeeded in restoring Mr. B. to health again. For two months he was so excessively weak, that his physician thought the case a hopeless one. But to the surprise and delight of the doctor, relatives, and friends, he rallied, having fully proved that fermented drinks were of no avail to him. Some may now inquire for the means by which he was restored? I reply, simply by receiving nutritious food, viz., arrow-root, milk, and beef-tea. Such aliments alone were efficacious. Here, then, is the case of a man who has been raised from complete prostration to perfect strength without alcoholic fluid. Any person who may doubt it, may, by communicating with you, be furnished with the name of the person referred to, that he may ascertain the truth for himself. I trust that this may strengthen the resolution of temperance reformers, and encourage them to persevere in arresting the progress of intemperance, and the evils resulting therefrom, even though medical advice may cast a momentary doubt upon the soundness or safety of the principles they profess.

I remain, dear Sir,
Yours most sincerely,
HENRY SHRIMPTON.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

DEAR SIR,—Wednesday, the 19th instant, was appointed by the Bishop of Winchester as a day of humiliation (for the south side of the Thames) under the present serious calamities, relations and friends being cut off around us after only a few hours' suffering. The hand of an offended God is upon us, and truly ought we to repent and turn from our wicked ways. All business ceased, with very rare exceptions; but I noticed, with extreme regret, one class of tradesmen, who, in spite of the general request to abstain from trading as much as possible, and use our exertions to induce all under us to attend a place of public worship, PUBLICANS and BEER-SHOP-KEEPERS kept open as usual, and no exceptions could I see. Their houses were open as a trap, it would appear, to the poor sinner, to invite him in and draw him from his duty to an All Merciful God. How disgraceful! These men ought to have done as their fellow-tradesmen, and bow to the general rule of society; but they, like their poor victims, break through every rule of decency. Why not have shut up their houses, and thus give their servants an opportunity of attending a place of worship. How truly did these drinking-houses appear on this quiet day as the agents of the devil, to destroy the souls of our poor fallen brethren. When, my dear sir, will these evil influences be driven from our lands? Let every teetotaler be up and doing, and raise both tongue and hands to expel the demon from the face of the earth.

Yours,
R. BANNISTER.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

W. CASH, Esq., AND THE VENERABLE ARCHDEACON JEFFREYS.

We regret to have the painful news to communicate, that this society and the temperance cause have sustained, during the past month, the loss of William Cash, Esq., Chairman of the Committee, and the Venerable Archdeacon Jeffreys, of Bombay, a Vice-President.

DEMISE OF W. CASH AND T. B. SCUTT, ESQRS.

At a meeting of the Committee of the "National Temperance Society," held on Wednesday, September 19th, 1849, the following resolutions were recorded:—

"That this Committee records, with profound resignation to Almighty God, yet with deep and painful regret, the loss of its valued and steady friend and enlightened coadjutor, Thomas Benjamin Scutt, and trusts that others may be raised up to supply the place which he not only occupied, but constantly and steadily filled.

"That this Committee cannot meet under the bereaving stroke of Divine Providence, which has suddenly removed their late much-esteemed chairman, William Cash, Esq., without expressing their high estimate of his christian and philanthropic character, and recording their deep sense of his faithful, liberal, and devoted efforts in the total abstinence cause, and of his constancy, urbanity, and activity, as the chairman of the National Temperance Society. That this bereavement having befallen our great and good cause, at a time when but few comparatively of the more influential classes are identified heartily with it, the loss cannot but be generally and deeply felt and lamented; but that the Committee earnestly hope that other eminent friends will be raised up to sustain and extend the temperance reformation.

"That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the relict and family of our late revered chairman, with the expression of our sincere condolence with them, under this heavy and trying affliction."

JAMES MORRIS.

The ravages of the cholera have removed from the ranks of the teetotalers James Morris, a coal-whipper, well known to many of the London abstainers. Having earned, on an average, only ten shillings per week for the last six months of his life, his means were exhausted, and his widow and four young children (of the ages of 8, 6, 4, and 1½ years) are left in a state of utter destitution.

An appeal is now made to the charitable and generous for contributions toward placing the poor woman in a small way of business, that she may be enabled to provide for her fatherless babes. We have pleasure in informing our friends that John Cassell, Esq., has kindly consented to act as treasurer to the fund, and his name will be a sufficient guarantee for a wise appropriation of the money.

Any donations forwarded to the Office of the National Temperance Society, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, shall be duly acknowledged. The Society in Rosemary Lane has contributed upwards of £5, a gentleman, who modestly conceals his name, has given a donation of £5, and John Cassell, Esq., £1.

Reviews.

Remarks on the Confessions of a Convert, &c. By JABEZ INWARDS, pp. 24. London: W. HORSELL.

A Word for Teetotalism, in reply to the Confessions of a Convert, &c. By T. MACHIN, pp. 24. London: HOULSTON & Co.

These are two admirable little pamphlets in reply to the lucubrations of Mr. Thomas Smeeton. They need not be compared, both are excellent, and both deserve, and will, do doubt, receive extensive circulation.

The authors of these tractates have each followed the example of the "Convert," and have respectively adopted appropriate mottoes. The former has been suggested by a most obvious trait of character in the subject of his critique. "For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed," &c., and the latter expressive of an apprehension which will arise in every truly christian mind, conceiving the misguided man, who is now clasping to his bosom the viper which has before inflicted on him a nearly mortal wound;—"The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways."

We would fain supply our readers with quotations, but amid so much that is really excellent, we find it difficult to select. The following will serve as a specimen of Mr. Inwards' method of answering his antagonist:—

"We might as well argue that God has given man two tongues, because David calls his tongue his glory; and the apostle James says of the tongue, it is fire," &c.

"Here is the difference. No man has two kinds of tongue; but almost any man may have two kinds of drink. The tongue is under two influences—the good and the bad. When under the right influence, it may be called our glory; when under the contrary influence, it may be compared to fire. So the body, when under the influence of the good wine, is cheered and made glad; when under the influence of the wine which is a mocker, it is injured and poisoned. Before a perfect analogy can be established, Mr. Smeeton must prove that there is only one kind of wine, and that that one wine is called a mocker, a blessing, a serpent, an adder; that it bites, stings, curses, poisons, nourishes, and blesses—that the sacred Scriptures speak for it and against it—that they tell us to take it, and not to take it. Were there only one wine, what a clever argument this would be. By Mr. Smeeton's sophisticated way of reasoning, there are not two ways spoken of in the Bible. It is true, one is called the broad way which leads to destruction, and the other the narrow way which leads to glory. These two ways are clearly spoken of. Oh, no! exclaims Mr. Smeeton; I'll prove there is only one way: for the tongue is said to be a glory in one part of the Scripture and a fire in another. And there is only one tongue; and although these ways are called by different names, there is only one way. This is Mr. Smeeton's mode of reasoning. By such plausible statements he would, if possible, deceive the very elect; and if we allow men thus to handle the Word of God with such reckless impunity, they will extinguish every ray of light, and overwhelm the soul with darkness and death. Such a mode of reasoning would make right, wrong; good, bad; high, low; vice, virtue; time, eternity; a fiend, an angel; and Heaven, Hell. Such a cunning and sophisticated style of reasoning, if believed, would make religion a farce, and atheism a fact."

As a fair sample of Mr. Machin's tract, we quote from pp. 20, 21:—

"You write that 'the meetings of many temperance committees are little more than arenas for the display of hatred and uncharitableness.' No two men view one object through precisely the same medium, and defective education necessarily increases this obstacle to perfect unanimity. Is it not natural, then, that when bodies of men consult as to the best mode of achieving a given object, that each should have his peculiar plan. When such assemblies are largely composed of those whose previous habits have favoured the growth of passion rather than the culture of reason, we may expect that, while they agree in the object to be gained, their views as to its best attainment will greatly differ, and each will insist with an earnestness in proportion to the intensity and purity of his zeal upon the wisdom of his individual scheme. With such materials, and such objects (antagonistic to the fondest prejudices of our early education), would it not be a wonder if the warm impulse of the zealous teetotaler did not sometimes rise beyond the measure of his judgment? A wise man would here discover the important element to which the temperance society is greatly indebted for the vigour which has marked its operations.

"Instead of interpreting these exhibitions as arenas of hatred he would perceive a noble enthusiasm bursting through their asperities for the attainment of a common object, and would by his superior intelligence and skilful counsel show how to create such a fusion of sentiment as would give precision and effect, and turn to the most vigorous account, the ardent energies of these disinterested and devoted bodies of men. While you have seen schism by teetotalism, you direct us to the peace of your own flock; but what have they to disagree about, their affections clinging to sensual entertainments, under a minister who has shown how little he is likely to disturb an indulgence of their tastes? Under such a convenient pastorship, what is there to move fear or unsettle prejudice?"

Our space forbids us enlarging. Nor is it necessary, as we are persuaded many of our readers will get early possession of these replies. Not that for any man who is sound in the faith any answer will be needed, but for the sake of the wavering and uninformed, it may be desirable to have at hand an antidote for the insidious poison, just as in a season like the present, chloride of lime and other disinfecting preparations are in very general request.

On the Connexion between Intemperance and Crime: A paper read before the Dublin Statistical Society. By JAMES HAUGHTON, pp. 10. Dublin: HODGES & Co.

An admirable paper on a most important subject. Such men as Mr. Haughton deserve and usually enjoy the universal esteem of the wise and good, for the energy and perseverance with which they seek to advance principles, generally unpopular among the circles in which they move. The paper before us has introduced facts pretty well known among temperance reformers, (and yet not sufficiently pondered) under the notice of those who otherwise would remain ignorant of them, and yet who are able from their high position and influence to use them to the greatest advantage. We commend this tract to our readers, as one well calculated for circulation among ministers and magistrates, and all others whose duty or whose habits lead them to arrest the march of crime, by removing as far as possible its originating causes.

The Moral Statistics of Glasgow. By WILLIAM LOGAN, Commissioner of the Scottish Temperance League, pp. 76. London: HOULSTON & Co.

Mr. Logan is already favourably known among philanthropists, as a man of facts and figures, and he has here brought together in a small compass an immense amount of statistical information, bearing on the temperance question. Nothing would be more valuable than such a document, developing the state of the drinking practices, in every city, town, village, and hamlet of the United Kingdom. INTEMPERANCE is here considered in reference to disease, mental derangement, pauperism, crime, female prostitution, industrial schools, sabbath-schools, sabbath profanation, and missions, and the whole concludes with a chapter on the estimated cost of the drinking system in Glasgow. On the latter point, application was made by the Scottish League to the Board of Excise, for information respecting the quantities of spirits and malt respectively, but this was, of course, refused. However, the Honourable Sheriff Alison concludes, that £1,200,000 are spent in intoxicating liquor in that city alone, while the religious, benevolent, and educational institutions of the city, with the poor-rates, police, and criminal department expend only £410,000. What can be expected from such a state of society, but degradation and wretchedness. The amount sacrificed to the accursed lust of strong drink, might, if wisely used, mitigate every form of human suffering, and arrest every development of social crime, and Glasgow would be happy and prosperous. Security would be given to property, elevation to morals, success to trade, while extreme want would be entirely banished, and crime comparatively unknown. When will this be? When Glasgow learns to esteem man more than whiskey, and renders more homage to Jehovah, than she now foolishly and wickedly devotes to selfishness and Bacchus.

Original Views on Diet, with Remarks Addressed to Consumptive Patients on the Water Cure. By ONE OF NATURE'S SCHOOL, pp. 66. London: W. HORSELL.

What is Vegetarianism? A letter to a friend in reply to the question pp. 48. London: W. HORSELL.

These little works, each containing much that is excellent, are directed to the question of food. This is the age of investigation. Men take nothing for granted, excepting a good dinner when it is set before them. Now, however, even our dinner-tables are criticised, and like the old lady, who "drank tea by stratagem," we shall dine according to organic chemistry, and prepare our daily meals by the canons of Liebig and Sylvester Graham.

Vegetarianism is a very ancient practice revived, and while some theologians are smiling back on antiquity, and in the exuberance of their veneration, almost ready to worship their grandfathers' bag-wigs and buckle-shoes, the cooks will outvie them by many centuries, and draw their inspiration from antediluvian practices and fossil remains.

But, to be serious, there are, no doubt, many evils arise from the enormous consumption of flesh-meat, and many cruelties perpetrated in order to obtain it. Any thing that promises to mitigate these ought therefore to challenge a patient hearing and an impartial investigation. Without pledging ourselves to all that is said of the advantages of vegetarian doctrine, there can be no doubt that for centuries man lived without the flesh of animals, and that the normal condition of the human frame was developed under a diet from which animal flesh was excluded. The men whose lives were prolonged through nine or ten centuries, were, no doubt, vegetarians. Many are now trying the system, some with obvious benefit, and most without any injury, and most probably an extensive adoption of the practice would induce the conviction, that even in our artificial state of society, butcher's meat is not a necessary of life. We commend the subject to the consideration of our readers.

Ocean Penny Postage: its necessity shewn and its feasibility demonstrated. By ELIHU BURRITT, pp. 32. London: C. GILPIN.

A masterly tract, on a matter of national progress—in perfect accordance with the spirit of the age, and calculated to mark it with honour, and secure for it the affectionate remembrance of succeeding ages. As inland penny postage has mightily accelerated in the United Kingdom the cause of philanthropy—the march of commerce—and the interchange of thought and emotion—so the ocean penny postage will accomplish the same beneficial results for the world at large. The proposal does honour to the land that cradled and succoured this eminent scholar and philanthropist, and the adoption of it will greatly enhance the respect with which Britain is regarded among the nations of the earth. Now for a combined and general effort to give life and being to the ocean penny postage. Temperance reformers should take their stand and use their influence, and the paper under consideration will awaken their interest, command their assent, and secure their aid.

National Evils and Practical Remedies, with the plan of a Model Town, accompanied by an examination of some important moral and political problems. By JAMES S. BUCKINGHAM, pp. 512. London: PETER JACKSON.

Another addition to the numerous proposals for social amelioration and advancement, from the pen of one of the most practical men of the day. That many evils exist in society, everybody admits, and almost everybody deplures. The real friend of man, is he who seeks to trace these evils to their source, and to suggest any practicable means by which they may be removed. Such a man is Mr. Buckingham, who by natural endowment, liberal education, world-wide travel, and accurate observation, combined with an extraordinary faculty for generalizing, has either suggested or promoted more social improvements than perhaps any living man.

In the work before us, the following evils have each a share of attention:—ignorance—intemperance—national prejudice—restrictions of commerce—war—competition and rivalry—pauperism—and the opposition in several influential classes between duty and interest. A state of society is vividly conceived and graphically described, from which these things should be absent; and proposals are there laid down to embody the author's principles in a model town, where all should contribute to the general prosperity, and all share equitably in it.

That immense, and to many minds overwhelming difficulties, stand between the proposition and realization of this plan, no one can doubt, but those who have seen time and space overcome, and the lightning of heaven directed here and there in telegraphic communications, need not quail before gigantic barriers, but should address themselves earnestly to the most rapid and effectual methods of removing them.

Anciently, the world has seen its model cities, but while they have exhibited architectural beauty and orderly arrangement, they have manifested also the unquestioned dominion of a tyrant's authority, and the degraded servility of the popular mind. Modern towns will probably be formed, developing ideas of human progress, out of which such plans may ultimately be evolved, as will reduce the present jarring state of society to order and health, to harmony and peace, to mutual respect and mutual aid.

This may be visionary dreaming, but we hail such books as that before us, as calculated to convert sentimental pity into practical progress, and to supply materials for thought, which will germinate, grow, and ultimately bloom in beauty and fragrance over the face of the land.

We shall return to this work. Meanwhile, we urge our friends to read it. Mr. Buckingham, with a view of giving facility to the poorer members of our temperance societies, has authorized his publisher to supply it to them at a reduced price. Those who cannot afford a copy to themselves, by contributing each a small sum, may all read and jointly possess a work which points to a practical method of giving the fullest development to the truth they desire to extend and perpetuate.

Notices of Meetings.

COLSTERWORTH.

In this village, for several years, one man, a reformed drunkard, stood alone. About a year and a half ago, several persons joined him, and the first lecture on the subject of total abstinence was delivered in July, 1848, by Mr. Bormond, of York, when several persons signed the pledge, and in August, Mrs. Stamp, of Manchester, spent a fortnight in holding meetings here. Her persuasive and eloquent lectures won over many to our cause, until our number nearly reached one hundred, (many of them professing christians,) who stand true to their pledge. We have just held our first anniversary. After a sermon by Mr. Anderson, surgeon, of Castle Bytham, from these words of Paul, "If meat make my brother to offend," &c. About 160 persons sat down to tea. In the evening a public meeting was held, which was addressed by Mr. Anderson and Mrs. Stamp, after which several persons signed the pledge. Most of the teetotalers in this place are members of the Wesleyan Society, and amongst them are several officers of that church. We have also held a meeting at the neighbouring village of Skillington, where after a lecture by Mrs. Stamp, fifteen persons signed the pledge. In a population of 1000 persons, we have here nine public-houses, but good has already been done, and we are determined to persevere.

W. SIMMONDS, Sec.

An admirable example of the moral influence of one consistent abstainer. We hope that the members of this interesting village-society will still encourage each other, and be true to principle, and the publicans will find another trade.—EDITOR.

FINCHLEY.

The friends of total abstinence here, held their annual festival and tea-meeting, on Tuesday, the 22nd May. The chair was kindly and ably filled by J. Hey Puget, Esq., of Totteridge. The platform was occupied by a great many gentlemen of the village. About 120 sat down to tea enlivened by a good band. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. M'Bain, Gun, Eversden, and others, and several members were added to our society, which is going on steadily and well. The Rev. G. Birch, signed the pledge, and after an appropriate speech, was followed by — Crane, Esq., and L. Mason, Esq. Several working men and women also signed, and no doubt more will follow. This meeting was the best and largest we have ever held. The band played the national anthem, and thus the meeting concluded.

HASTINGS.

The cause has recently experienced a considerable impetus in this place, by the delivery of a course of ten Lectures on Human Physiology and Pathology, by P. W. Perfitt, Esq., of London. The lectures were of the most impressive and instructive character, fully showing the baneful effect of intoxicating drinks on the human system, as well as the moral, social and religious advantages which would accrue from the general adoption of teetotal principles. Every branch of the subject were handled in a masterly manner, and elicited general approbation. Twenty-four persons have signed the pledge, three of whom were drunkards, and many others are adopting the principle who have not as yet affixed their names.

On Wednesday evening, September 5th, we were favoured with an able lecture on "The safety of entire abstinence from intoxicating drinks, and the benefits of such abstinence to individuals and society," delivered by Mr. W. R. Baker, of London. The lecturer maintained the subject with power, and his reasonings were lucid and telling, and will not soon be forgotten.

METROPOLIS.

CHRISTIAN UNION TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY. — On Wednesday, August 8th, a tea festival and public meeting was held at Wenlock Hall, Hoxton, at which Mr. Simmons, Baptist minister, presided, and the principles were advocated in an able manner by Messrs. Cain, Catton, McCarrie, Alford, Ball, and others, and several signed the pledge. We were glad to see many members of the Methodist body with us on this occasion, and we hope they will soon be brought over to help us in this great and glorious cause. The lecture delivered by Mrs. Hardwick, on Friday, August 3rd, gave universal satisfaction to the ladies, and several pledges were signed.

HENRY STREET, HAMPSTEAD ROAD. — Three lectures have been delivered by the Rev. G. W. McCree, of Bloomsbury. His subjects were, "The education, employment, health, and virtue of the working-classes, and the relation of the temperance movement thereto." There was a good attendance. This hall is in the midst of a dense population, whose habits are very unsatisfactory to the moralist and reformer. We hope the Committee will persevere in their mission.

TEMPERANCE HALL, SEVEN DIALS.

A series of monthly lectures on Literary, Moral, and Scientific subjects, are delivered in this Hall. The committee thought such lectures would tend to refine and improve the minds of the members, and have not been disappointed. Lectures on Providence and Universal Peace have been delivered by Mr. Parker; and on Life Assurance and Self-Education, two lectures by the Rev. G. W. McCree, the assistant preacher at Bloomsbury Chapel. On July 4th, a lecture on "The Human Mind and its Improvement" was given by the Rev. J. Robertson, M.A.

Doings of Strong Drink.

A female who is married to a man, by trade a ladies' shoemaker, a very clever workman, and one who can earn thirty shillings per week when he likes, but is a very great drunkard and an irreligious man, many months ago signed the pledge, and has kept it, as she says, by way of example for him. Since signing she has attended the Baptist Chapel in the neighbourhood, and having received the word, was proposed a candidate for baptism. This circumstance excited the rage of her husband, who thus addressed her on the subject:—"So you are about to be baptised, are you? a thing you know I hate and detest. Well, I know I am a bad man, and fain would I well flog you, but I cannot lay a hand on you while sober; but while you are gone to be baptised, I will well supply myself with that DEVILISH drink, (to use his own words,) and then I can do as I wish, and when you come home you shall have a thorough thrashing." This threat he put into execution, and on her return from the ordinance, most grossly and cruelly ill-used her. Still this poor Christian woman asks, "Is it not my duty yet to pray for him?" and thus returns good for evil, and like the Saviour she professes to serve, prays for him who "despitefully uses and persecutes" her.—Communicated.

MURDER OF A POLICEMAN AT BRISTOL.—John Pym, a policeman has lost his life from the injuries sustained by an attack on the part of Andrew Daley and John McFarlane, of the 15th Regiment, at Bristol, in a drunken affray. A verdict of wilful murder has been returned by a coroner's jury, and Inspector Bosworth has left Bristol for London with letters to the police authorities, and to the Commander-in-Chief, in order to apprehend the soldiers, but their regiment has sailed for India.—Nonconformist.

EDINBURGH. VALUE OF A WOODEN LEG.—On Wednesday evening, as a barouche containing a tipsy party, was driven up the street by a tipsy driver, the pole of the vehicle came against a tipsy man and knocked him over. One of the wheels of the vehicle went over one of the legs of the man, and snapped it asunder. Luckily the leg was a wooden one, so that its owner was as entirely free from pain as if he had been under the influence of chloroform. He was, however, so disabled as to be unable to walk home; but we understand the driver of the barouche, is to furnish the cripple with a handsome new leg, in lieu of the one he broke by his carelessness.—North British Mail.

ANNUAL LICENSING DAY AT BRIGHTON. AUGUST 30TH.

All the old spirit-licenses and billiard-licenses were renewed.

The magistrates next heard the application for new licenses, of which there were forty-two, viz., forty-one in Brighton, and one in Hove.

Mr. Upperton (magistrates' clerk) stated that a memorial, signed by a great number of inhabitants, had been sent in, with a request that it might be read on this occasion. Understanding, they said, that numerous licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors were about to be applied for, they wished to state that there were already in Brighton 120 hotels and public-houses, and 210 houses for the sale of beer, making a total of 330. This large number offered a great temptation to drunkenness, which, in the words of Mr. Justice Alderson, was a most fruitful source of crime, and if removed, would render the assizes of the country mere nullities. According to Judge Hale, as much as four-fifths of all crime was the product of excessive drinking; and similar testimony had been borne by Lord Erskine, Mr. Justice Pattison, Mr. Justice Wightman, and many other judges. Drunkenness, in the opinion of the memorialists, was the cause of nearly all the crime; and to increase the number of houses where it could be indulged in, would be to increase unhappiness, pauperism, and crime. There was a testimony of 1300 medical men of rank in their profession, that total abstinence from all alcoholic or intoxicating beverages would greatly tend to promote public health; and the memorialists, therefore, implored the magistrates to refuse all application for new licenses, and also to take every legitimate mode of decreasing the number already existing. Six new licenses were granted in Brighton, and one in Hove.—Brighton Gazette.

Facts and Scraps.

Excise.—In the year 1847, the duty paid on Spirits, was	£8,376,078
Wine	1,892,242
Malt and Hops	5,370,915

Total amount of duty only, £15,639,235 in one year, on Spirits, Wine, Malt, &c.

The gross annual expenditure of this nation on intoxicating liquors, the great source of demoralization, pauperism, and crime, the very canker and blight of this country, may be fairly taken at £52,000,000.

If only a portion of this vast sum were expended in the purchase of articles of manufacture, and of agricultural produce, it would cause such an INCREASED CONSUMPTION, as to give a mighty and lasting stimulus to our HOME TRADE—LABOUR would be in LARGER DEMAND—the people would be better clothed and better fed—and, with the blessing of God, prosperity would shine on our land.

PRESIDENT EVERETT.—The Boston Reporter has a statement which is highly creditable to the late president of Harvard University. It says that when Mr. Everett "returned from Europe, just before entering upon his duties as president of Harvard University, he was led to measure the grand results of the temperance reform in this country, as contrasted with the drinking habits of Europe. This candid weighing of the matter showed him (though a temperance man before) the new duties that would devolve upon him at Harvard, as the guardian of young men. The result is told, when we say, no intoxicating liquor was allowed at his inauguration, none at the levee, none at the dinner of the Phi Beta Kappa Society, none at the commencement dinner, and none allowed among the students. In short, he banished it from the Institution. A noble example for a great man to set before the world. He must retire from the office with pleasing reminiscences."—Evangelical Pioneer.

SIR C. NAPIER AT CALCUTTA.—On reviewing the troops on the 11th of May, at Fort William, at the close of his speech said to the men of the 96th, "Let me give you a bit of advice—that is, don't drink. I know young men do not think much about advice from old men. They put their tongue in their cheek, and think they know a good deal better than the old cove who is giving them advice. But let me tell you, that you are come to a country where, if you drink, you're dead men. If you be sober and steady you'll get on well. But if you drink you're done for. You will be either invalided or die. I know two regiments in this country,—one drank, the other didn't drink. The one that didn't drink is one of the finest regiments, and has got on as well as any regiment in existence. The one that did drink has been all but destroyed. For any regiment for which I have a respect, and there is not one of the British regiments whom I don't respect, I should always try and persuade them to keep from drinking. I know there are some who will drink in spite of the devil and their officers—but such men will soon be in hospital, and very few that go in, in this country, ever come out again."—Daily News.

Mrs. CARLILE.—This venerable friend of the cause is still abounding in the work. In her is fulfilled the promise—"they shall still bring forth fruit in old age." She has visited Coventry, Leamington, Bedworth, Nuneaton, Leicester, Sunderland, &c., and in all has been greeted with her usual success. In Coventry, nearly a thousand juveniles were added to the Society in the course of about a fortnight. This is glorious!! But we tremble for parental influence. Will it sustain the noble resolution of the dear "little ones," or crush it in the bud? The juveniles must be watched and tended. They are our country's hope.—Communicated.

THREE WALKING NUISANCES.—A drunken Irishman with a short dudheen, a peripatic tinker with a portable fire-place, and an ill-bred puppy with a cigar.

A SENSIBLE YOUTH.—Mr. John Moor, of Norton, near Stockton, an active, temperate young man, who has not yet completed his first century, but will do so in a few months, digs and cultivates his own garden, and says he shall be glad to live so long as he has health and strength, but "has no wish to live to an old age." Mr. Moore is a wise youngster. He knows that a man may be juvenile at a hundred, and old at twenty. Think of this, ye "fast" young men!—Gateshead Observer.

Poetry.

THE THREE PREACHERS.

There are three preachers, ever preaching,

Each with eloquence and power;

One is old, with locks of white,

Skinny as an anchorite;

And he preaches every hour

With a shrill fanatic voice,

And a Bigot's fiery scorn:—

"Backwards! ye presumptuous nations;

Man to misery is born!

Born to drudge, and sweat, and suffer—

Born to labour, and to pray;

Backwards, ye presumptuous nations—

Back!—be humble, and obey!"

The second is a milder preacher;

Soft he talks as if he sung;

Sleek and slothful is his look,

And his words, as from a book,

Issue glibly from his tongue.

With an air of self-content,

High he lifts his fair white hands:—

"Stand ye still, ye restless nations;

And be happy, all ye lands!

Earth was made by God our Father,

And to meddle is to mar;

Change is rash, and ever was so:

We are happy as we are."

Mightier is the younger preacher;

Genius flashes from his eyes;

And the crowds who hear his voice,

Give him, while their souls rejoice,

Throbbing bosoms for replies.

Awed they listen, yet elated,

While his stirring accents fall;—

"Forward! ye deluded nations,

Progress is the rule of all:—

Man was made for healthful effort;

Tyranny has crush'd him long;

He shall march from good to better,

And do battle with the wrong.

"Standing still is childish folly,

Going backward is a crime:—

None should patiently endure

Any ill that he can cure;

Onward! keep the march of Time.

Onward, while a wrong remains

To be conquer'd by the right;

While Oppression lifts a finger

To affront us by his might:

While an error clouds the reason—

Or a sorrow gnaws the heart—

Or a slave awaits his freedom,

Action is the wise man's part.

"Lo! the world is rich in blessings—

Earth and Ocean, flame and wind,

Have unnumber'd secrets still,

To be ransack'd when you will,

For the service of mankind;

Science is a child as yet,

And her power and scope shall grow,

And her triumphs in the future

Shall diminish toil and woe,

Shall extend the bounds of pleasure

With an ever-widening ken,

And of woods and wildernesses

Make the homes of happy men.

"Onward!—there are ills to conquer, ills that on yourselves you've brought,

Tyranny is swoll'n with Pride.

Bigotry is defied,

Error intertwined with Thought.

Vice and Misery ramp and crawl,

Root them out, their day is pass'd:—

Goodness is alone immortal;

Evil was not made to last!

Onward, and all Earth shall aid us—

Ere our peaceful flag be furl'd."— —And the preaching of the preacher,

Stirs the pulses of the world. C. MACKAY.

TEMPERANCE SONG—No. 1.

BY J. PIERPONT.

TUNE—"Auld Lang Syne."

SHALL e'er cold water be forgot,

When we sit down to dine?

O no, my friends, for is it not

Pour'd out by hands divine?

Pour'd out by hands divine, my friends,

Pour'd out by hands divine:

From springs and wells it gushes forth,

Pour'd out by hands divine.

To Beauty's cheek though strange it seems,

'Tis not more strange than true,

Cold water, though itself so pale,

Imparts the rosiest hue:—

Imparts the rosiest hue, my friends,

Imparts its rosiest hue:

Yes, Beauty, in a water-pail

Doth find her rosiest hue.

Cold water too—though wonderful,
 'Tis not less true again—
 The weakest of all earthly drinks,
 Doth make the strongest men :
 Doth make the strongest men, my friends,
 Doth make the strongest men :—
 Then let us drink the weakest drink,
 And grow the strongest men.

I've seen the bells of tulips turn,
 To drink the drops that fell
 From summer clouds ; then why should not
 The two lips of a belle ?
 The two lips of a belle, my friends,
 The two lips of a belle—
 What sweetens more than water pure,
 The two lips of a belle ?

The sturdy oak full many a cup
 Doth hold up to the sky,
 To catch the rain, and drink it up,
 And thus the oak gets high :
 'Tis thus the oak gets high, my friends,
 'Tis thus the oak gets high ;—
 By having water in your cups,
 Then why not you and I ?

Then let cold water armies give
 Their banners to the air !
 So shall the boys, like oaks, be strong,
 The girls, like tulips, fair ;
 The girls, like tulips, fair, my friends,
 The girls, like tulips, fair ;
 The boys shall grow like sturdy oaks,
 The girls, like tulips, fair.

GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY, PATENTEES, City Road, London,

It cannot now be doubted, even by the most sceptical, but that Gutta Percha must henceforward be regarded as one of the blessings of a gracious Providence, inasmuch as it affords a sure and certain protection from cold and damp feet, and thus tends to protect the body from disease and premature death.

"GUTTA PERCHA TUBING," being so extraordinary a conductor of sound, is used as speaking tubes in mines, manufactories, warehouses, &c. This tubing may also be applied in Churches and Chapels for the purpose of enabling deaf persons to listen to the sermon, &c. For conveying messages from one room or building to another, or from the mast-head to the deck of a vessel, it is invaluable.

MILL BANDS.—The increasing demand for the Gutta Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLACKS, &c.—Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to manufacturers, engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-bucket valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size or thickness without seam or joint, and as cold water will never soften them, they seldom need any repair.

Gutta Percha soles, solution, inkstands, card trays, medallions, picture-frames, brackets, mouldings, window-blind cornices, vases, fire-buckets, bowls, pen-trays, bougies, catheters, stethoscopes, thin lining, thread, flower-pots, ear-trumpets, &c. &c., may be had at the Company's Works, Wharf Road, City Road, London, or of any of their wholesale dealers in town or country.

THE UNITED KINGDOM TEMPERANCE AND GENERAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, 39, MOORGATE STREET, LONDON.

Enrolled under Act of Parliament.

This Institution was established on the 31st December, 1840. It has issued upwards of 3300 Policies, and the deaths have averaged less than 6 per annum, a fact which is believed to be unparalleled.

THE FIRST DIVISION OF PROFITS will take place at the end of next year, when the whole of the surplus funds will be apportioned among the assured, in three different modes, at each Member's option.

LOWER PREMIUMS than in most Mutual Offices ; thus securing an immediate Bonus of 10 to 30 per cent.

Every assurer is a Member, and entitled to vote at the Annual Meeting.

The benefits assured can be secured to survivors FREE OF DUTY, by simply registering the names in the Books of the Society.

Persons abstaining from alcoholic beverages, are assured in a distinct section, free from any possible losses through intemperance.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.
PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEETOTALISM.

The Committee of the National Temperance Society, in order to promote the objects to which it is devoted, offer two Prizes, one of £20 and the other of £10, for the best Essays on the Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The Prizes to be competed for by either MEN OR WOMEN AMONG THE WORKING-CLASSES.

The Essays must shew that the general spread of Temperance principles, would tend to the Physical, Mental, Social and Religious elevation of the working-classes, embracing the following propositions:—

1st, The practicability of Teetotalism in the performance of labour.

2nd, The extent to which the disuse of strong drinks would increase the demand for useful labour, and promote the expenditure of the money in food, clothing, furniture, &c.

3rd, The value of Temperance in promoting the comfort and happiness of the homes of the working-classes.

4th, The adaptation of Temperance principles to render the working-man independent of charitable relief.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

THE autumnal meeting of this religious body has been held during the past month at Sheffield. Ministers and gentlemen to the number of 300 were assembled. The object of such convocations is, primarily, the advancement of religion among the people; and, secondarily, the extension of denominational peculiarities. With the latter we have, of course, nothing to do—in the former we are deeply interested. Among temperance reformers, especially those whose temperance principles are the offspring of earnest practical christianity, it is a deep settled conviction that the alcoholic beverages, as at present used, are among the most powerful obstructions to the success of the Gospel among the masses of the people. Such an affirmation, made by any christian man, demands an investigation. But when made by multitudes of christians, of every sect—when sustained by accumulated facts—when deposed to by city, town, and village missionaries—when established by recorded acts of church discipline—when presented for consideration to those whose profession and position require that they should know and ponder it—and when pressed with affectionate, yet intense urgency, by earnest labourers for the amelioration of the social state, we conceive that it has a right to expect such an amount of attention as its importance warrants.

With a view to obtain, if possible, some advice or recommendation to the churches of the Congregational body, on the subject of temperance generally, and especially with reference to the drinking of toasts in public assemblies of Christian men, the National Temperance Society presented to the Congregational Union, assembled at Sheffield during the past month, the following memorial.

To the Ministers and Members of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, assembled at Sheffield.

The Memorial of the Executive Committee of the National Temperance Society, respectfully sheweth,—

That in the opinion of your memorialists, one of the most important subjects which can engage the consideration of an assembly of British Christian Ministers, is the fearfully prevalent use of fermented and distilled liquors as the ordinary beverages of society.

That the insidious nature of these beverages gradually induces the formation of habits which have a ruinous effect upon moral and religious character, by which many christian churches have been robbed of their brightest ornaments, and the christian ministry of many able and devoted labourers; while the same cause has operated in placing myriads as far beyond the sphere of christian effort and influence, as if they were the inhabitants of a heathen land.

That the testimony of hundreds of medical gentlemen, and the still more powerful affirmation of multitudes of practical abstainers, prove that these beverages are altogether unnecessary to persons in health, and that even invalids may discontinue them, not only without danger, but with positive advantage.

That practical abstinence is sustained by not a few scriptural examples, which arose from divine command, or are recorded with divine approval; and that while many passages of Holy Writ obviously involve the principle we seek to establish and extend, even direct scriptural injunction can be pleaded for the practice.

That the moral influence of the christian church would be greatly extended by the universal adoption of temperance principles, by multitudes being brought within the range of its ordinances, to whom the sound of the gospel is now unknown; and christian institutions more liberally supported, and more vigorously worked, by the consecration of much time and wealth to the service of Christ, now spent in ministering to merely animal enjoyments.

That the drinking customs exert a most baneful influence in seducing the rising generation from the paths of religion and virtue, and leading them into irregular and vicious habits, which render them injurious to society here, and in many painful instances send them to an untimely grave, and an awful destiny.

That these considerations appeal strongly to all christians, especially to those who occupy prominent positions in the church, for their decided practical protest against all habits and practices which tend to throw around the drinking customs the sanction of religion, particularly against the use of intoxicating beverages at the holy convocations of Christians, the dedication of houses for worship, and the settlement of ministers.

That your memorialists affectionately commend this important subject to your serious consideration and prudent counsels, and trust that such action may be resolved on, as may be calculated to advance the moral and religious prosperity of the masses of the people.

Signed, by desire, and on behalf of the committee,
WILLIAM JANSON, Chairman.
ISAAC DOWSEY, Secretary.

Here, reader, pause, and ask yourself, how you would expect such a document would be received by a body of Christian ministers. Do you anticipate that it would be carefully read, solemnly pondered, and wise and well-digested resolutions thereupon adopted?

The report of its reception we quote at length from the British Banner.

"The Rev. A. WELLS intimated, that he had two Memorials on the subject of temperance. He suggested that they should be read, and a resolution adopted, stating that, though the Union was not prepared to adopt the principle, it rejoiced in the success of all labours to diminish the vice of intemperance.

"Several ministers urged the inconvenience of having the business of the meeting interrupted by Memorials from any other body, and objected, on principle, to reading what they could not stop to discuss.

"The Rev. N. HALL urged that these Memorials should be read, and then a rule laid down for the future. He urged that not to read them would have a very evil effect.

"The Rev. Dr. CAMPBELL said, considering the assistance which the temperance advocates had from the publications of the Union, they had no right to complain that the meeting could not hear and discuss these Memorials. He undertook that they should be read.

"The PRESIDENT put the matter to the meeting, and it was decided that the Memorials should not be read; but it was suggested, that the receipt of them should be respectfully acknowledged."

We are not disposed to complain, especially of Christian brethren, but we cannot resist the impression, that such a mode of dealing with any respectful memorial is discourteous and reprehensible. But nothing amazes us more than the remark attributed to Dr. Campbell. We should like to ask the Dr. to suppose that a memorial had been sent from the Congregational Union to the World's Temperance Convention, and had been even refused to be read;—What would our Independent brethren have thought of such treatment? Would it have been justified by saying, that "Considering the assistance which the Congregational churches have received from the labours of temperance reformers, they have no right to complain that their memorial was not read?" The Convention might expect, and would no doubt richly deserve, one of the severest rebukes which Dr. C. could give.

But we cannot be diverted from our object—we have discharged our consciences—and if assemblies of ministers have no time and no inclination to look this grave matter fairly in the face, we must quietly, but earnestly, work on, with such assistance as we can secure.

It will be seen by our readers, that one main design of the above memorial was to take a step towards the abolition of the absurd and barbarous custom of drinking toasts at religious assemblies. A discussion on this point would no doubt have been very inconvenient, if immediately followed by the reprobated practice. On this occasion, even the venerable Dr. J. P. Smith was honoured by a toast. The Dr. is a staunch teetotaler, and, as such, must regard the practice of drinking honours as a part of a dangerous and delusive system; yet even he is not suffered to escape. It would have been graceful to have acknowledged the Dr.'s known predilections, and to have presented the honours he so well deserves, without the accompaniment which he cannot but regret.

It is in vain to plead that the Congregational Union has no interest in this subject. No Christian church can earnestly prosecute temperance work as one department of Christian labour, without reaping a speedy and a rich reward. Many churches can point to their brightest ornaments, and most devoted and zealous members, and remember that they were reclaimed by the influence of temperance principles. Hundreds of ministers have subscribed this declaration:

"That the universal success of this principle would tend, under the Divine blessing, to lessen human sufferings—to stay the progress of pollution, crime, and Sabbath profanation,—and to promote the high interests of natural order, sound morality, and true religion."

If this be true, then all the assistance that the Union publications have given to the temperance advocates, has been so much clear gain to the religious body they represent; and the temperance reformers, instead of being regarded with suspicion or indifference, should be welcomed as brethren, and acknowledged, not only as true philanthropists, but as fellow-helpers in the gospel of Christ.

LIBERTY AND DESPOTISM.

TO THE WORKING MEN OF ENGLAND.

"Who would be free, himself must strike the blow."

If the three millions of slaves in America could emancipate themselves, no doubt the southern states would immediately resound with the chorus of

"Earth's holiest music, the breaking of chains."

But there is a bondage in England—a bondage which separates husbands from wives—parents from children, and drags many an intelligent man from his own fire-side, and his own domestic enjoyments, to the noisy skittle-ground, or the smoky dungeon called a tap-room. The bondage to which attention should be awakened all over the land is the drink-usages of our factories, yards, and workshops. These are self-imposed and self-sustained. They are heavy in amount, they are numerous in occasion, they are inexorable in demand, and when declined, are barbarous, cruel, and malicious in their inflictions. But they must be abolished, and they will be, working-men, as soon as you have

TOO MUCH OF VIRTUE TO BE TYRANTS, AND TOO MUCH OF MANLINESS TO BE SLAVES.

Look at the influence of these fines, footings, mulcts, &c. upon your exchequer. You understand "the ways and means" of replenishing it. It can be debited with nothing but what you earn. The tension of your muscles—the vigour of your arms—the sweat of your brows—the skill of your intellects, must obtain the necessary supplies. Could you afford to give your employer a discount of 15 or 20 per cent. on pay-night? or to pay an income tax of 10 per cent? But the excise customs of your factory or workshop frequently levies on you such amounts as these.

Look at the result to your personal comfort. You are fathers, husbands, brothers. These relationships imply affections meant for your enjoyment, and obligations required to be performed. But how constantly after the toil of the day, do your shop customs lead you to the public-house, while personal cleanliness and domestic comfort are sacrificed to guzzling beer, and inhaling an atmosphere of filthy smoke.

Look at the effect on your mind. That soaring intellect which might rise and roam through all the material universe, and busy itself with everything in earth, air, sea, and fetch in facts which would minister to your increased usefulness, and awaken thoughts which would kindle with emotions of wonder, gratitude, and love, yea, that might rise from earth and hold communion with the infinite source of all purity, and wisdom, and benevolence; and by frequently cherished intercourse, assimilate you to itself—that mind grovels in ignorance, or wallows in sensuality; and gradually, yet surely, loses all the purity that allies it to the angel, and all the power that distinguishes it from the beast.

These drink-practices have only one sound argument in their defence—they are supposed to secure carefulness in the performance of duty. Now, working-men of England, what say you? Are fines and mulcts necessary to induce you to fulfil the engagements of the shop or factory according to the best of your ability? Is there not in English workmen any true principle which will lead them to exert their skill? Is not the most skilled labour the best rewarded? Do not such considerations prove that fines and penalties are unnecessary? Are there not many factories and workshops in which they have been utterly abolished?

But while these inflictions and evils are unnecessary, they are also undesirable. A general system of espionage, the conversion of every man into a spy over his fellow-man's actions, and an informer against his fellow-man's shortcomings and mistakes, has a natural tendency to degrade. Every man of course strives to conceal the faults and flaws of which he may be conscious; general concealment leads to general suspicion—while discovery and information enkindle jealousy and ill-will. These results may not always and invariably follow; but if the system tends to produce them—and of this there can be no rational doubt—a sufficient reason exists for their entire and immediate abolition.

Admitting, however, that under any conceivable circumstances fines may be necessary or desirable,—Can they not be better appropriated? A library for circulation and reference, by which wholesome knowledge and information could be constantly supplied—a fund for relief in sickness, by which many a comfort could alleviate the sufferings of the toiling labourer—a provision for the widows and orphans of deceased workmen, which would mitigate in some measure the heaviest of worldly afflictions—a means of bringing lecturers of talent and repute, who could improve and entertain by oral instruction on the various branches of science and literature—or any appropriation that could be devised that would benefit the working-man, in body, in mind, or in circumstances, or minister to the comfort and happiness of his family, would be infinitely preferable to the present ruinous and degrading system of drinking.

What say you, working-men, and what are you prepared to do? To emancipate yourselves, your brethren, your class, from this bondage, is worthy of your noblest aspirations, your warmest desires, your best efforts. The liberty we urge upon you to gain for yourselves, would bring immediate comfort to your firesides—immediate improvement to your circumstances—immediate satisfaction to your consciences. But how must it be done? By light, by truth, by reason, by love! Now is the time for a discussion on the subject in every shop—in every factory—in every mill, where the drink-fees are yet exacted. Talk over the matter among your fellow-toilers—calmly consider how you can best accomplish the object—let every man who has a thought, coin it, circulate it, and truth will become greater and brighter by every examination, and even by every repulse. The world is advancing—light is spreading—on every hand we behold the dawning of a brighter day, and a deepening conviction that “there’s a good time coming.” To those who are determined that the slavery of drink-customs shall no longer continue, we say, “Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.” Not the might of brute force but the might of truth, the might of reason, the might of benevolence.

Working-men, be in earnest and your deliverance is at hand.

THE REV. NEWMAN HALL, B.A.

At the recent meeting of the Congregational Ministers at Sheffield, this gentleman urged that the memorials on the subject of temperance should be read, and that their rejection would have a very injurious influence. He has since addressed a long letter to the Editor of the British Banner, on the condition of the working-classes, in which he urges ministers of the gospel to identify themselves with the temperance movement. The following quotation from this document will be read with interest. All honour to the Christian minister who dares thus to speak out on a theme so unpopular among the leaders of the body with which he is identified!

“There are other movements among the people, still more important than those professedly intellectual. I mean especially, that great moral reformation, with which so many hundreds of thousands of working-men are associated, and which, far more than any mechanics’ institute, halls of science, or socialist and political associations, engages their strong sympathy and their active zeal. Little are some persons aware of the strong hold which the temperance cause has gained on the affections of the working-classes. In many of the large towns of the north, the number of people assembling at the week-night temperance meetings, exceeds many times over the united week-night congregations of the churches of all denominations. In Hull, throughout eight months of the year, there are several crowded temperance meetings every evening of the week. On Good Friday, when the annual meetings are held, upwards of 2000 sit down to tea, and many more tickets would be sold, if the rooms were larger. There are at least 100 working men who advocate the cause at these meetings; many of them with an untaught but thrilling eloquence, and most of them with an ardour which would put to shame many of our religious platforms. In too great a degree these efforts are not aided, in some instances they are discouraged, by Christian ministers. Who can wonder at the result? Here are men, who were, a short time ago, sunk in the lowest depths of vice and wretchedness, but who, by the efforts of the friends of total abstinence, have been raised to sobriety, respectability, and comfort. They say ‘How can Christian ministers be sincere in their wish to do us good, when they hold aloof from such a cause as this?’ They infer that Christianity does not seek their temporal well-being; or they impute love of strong drink to its professors and advocates. They thus cherish prejudices against those members of the Gospel, who encourage practices which they deem so destructive, which have proved so dangerous to themselves, and which they are exerting all their energies to repress. Thus at temperance meetings the conduct of Christians is often severely censured, and an influence is thus produced unfavourable to Christianity itself. It is well known that multitudes of teetotalers refuse to attend the ministry of any one who does not abstain from alcoholic beverages. I am not defending these interferences, or this conduct. Far from it. I only state the fact, which I have good opportunities of knowing. What then should we do under these circumstances? Dr. Halley, in his admirable letter, read before the Union, spoke of the immutability of the great truths of the Gospel in connexion with the liberty we possessed of endless diversity in the method of diffusing it. The principles are the same; the modes of operation vary with circumstances. Paul ‘became all things to all men, that by all means he might save some.’ Whatever, then, may be our individual opinions on the necessity or expediency of total abstinence for ourselves, I would venture, Sir, with all humility to suggest, whether we should not, for the sake of the Gospel and the souls of men, ally ourselves to this great movement. None can surely think that total abstinence is a sin. None will say that their religious influence will be lessened by it. If, then, to drink wine or to drink water be in itself a matter of indifference, does it still remain so, if by becoming a water-drinker, I may obtain an influence over the minds of great multitudes of the working classes, which I could not otherwise possess? Should I not be willing to relinquish a gratification I may feel to be quite innocent and harmless if by so doing I ‘may save some?’ It is often a matter of complaint, that the working of temperance societies is hostile to Christianity. Let Christians work those societies themselves, and the hostility will at once cease. Do temperance advocates sometimes utter infidel sentiments? Though I have for some years frequented temperance meetings, and have never heard them, yet, if this is the case, should not we be there to counteract them? May we not in preaching temperance preach something still better. May we not by our presence and co-operation, not only stop the evil complained of, but turn a tide, the course of which some deem at least questionable, in the direction of pure gospel truth? May we not imbue the principles of total abstinence with religion, and be the means of leading multitudes from the temperance hall to the Christian church, to return again the safer and still more zealous advocates of sobriety?

“Such results have already more than realised all the expectations which the most sanguine could have indulged. Allow me to mention an instance or two. A working-man in Hull, who had not attended any place of worship for twenty years, heard me speak at a temperance-meeting, signed the pledge, followed me on the Sabbath-day to the sanctuary, received the truth in the love of it, is one of the most consistent members of my church, and has been the means, not only of inducing most of his fellow-workmen to join the temperance society, but to attend the house of God. Last year, a drunken man, named Wilkinson, was induced to attend one of our temperance meetings, signed the pledge, went on the Sabbath-day to hear the Rev. Mr. Lamb, a Primitive Methodist, who had spoken at the meeting, became a sincere Christian, laboured diligently to benefit his companions, was suddenly killed by an accident in the docks, where he was working, was followed to his grave by some hundreds of his fellow-workmen, sixty of whom appeared well-dressed at the next temperance tea-meeting, some of the fruits of his efforts. The Rev. Mr. Rose, of Alford, in Lincolnshire, told me, the other day, of a working-man who had been reformed from drunkenness through the efforts of the temperance society, with which he zealously co-operates; who was subsequently induced to attend the house of God, became a Christian, is now working at the new docks at Great Grimsby, where the effect of his labours among the other workmen is such, that every day at noon, when there is an interval of rest for dinner, part of the time is spent in holding prayer-meetings, by many different groups of men in various parts of the works. Is not this the cause of British missions? Is not this home missionary work? Last year, in connexion with our temperance society, I delivered, besides other addresses, two lectures to working-men, in the Music-hall of Hull. Upwards of a thousand were present on each occasion, a great part of them not being attendants at any place of worship. The particular topic selected was of little comparative consequence, but it was important that I was able, in both lectures, clearly and plainly to preach the gospel without losing the ear of the audience, and to commend the word of God, which I held in my hand, as the best charter and friend of the working-man and the poor. During the coming winter, it is arranged for various ministers of the gospel to deliver a course of weekly lectures in connexion with the temperance society, on various subjects of interest, which cannot but give them many opportunities of introducing the greatest of all truths, as well as of securing the kind feeling of their audience. In visiting various towns during the summer months, I see the good effect of the temperance lecture delivered to working-men on one evening, in the large congregation collected on the following night to hear the gospel. I have often been told that persons never known to attend public worship, have, on these occasions, been seen to listen attentively to the preaching of the cross. What an illustration of the same thing has recently occurred at Zion Chapel, Whitechapel. That building was well-nigh deserted; about fifty formed the congregation. It was proposed to close the doors, but a minister, who was known to be a friend of the working-classes, and a zealous advocate of temperance, Mr. Parsons of Ebly, went to do the work of a missionary there for three months, and long before the expiration of that period, every seat was occupied, the aisles were crowded, and numbers went away unable to obtain admission, and these almost entirely the working-classes.

"And these effects will follow wherever the same means are tried. Are they not worth a trial? Or can a better method be suggested?"

THE QUEEN'S OWN BALMORAL GIN.

WHAT mysterious elements are combined in royalty!—What incongruous duties is it often required to perform! English majesty, as the head of the Church, commands the people to keep holy the sabbath-day; but English majesty, at the head of the Government, orders post-office clerks to desecrate that day, or quit the service! Her Most Gracious Majesty (long live Victoria!) appears as the patroness of a society for the suppression of spirit-drinking—a society which had the honour of taking the lead in the Temperance reformation, and took many by the hand, inviting them, for the sake of their brethren, to abandon "toddy" and "punch"—a society, which awakened in many minds a sincere desire for the emancipation of their country, and gave them principles, which, followed to their legitimate extent, found their complete consistency and ultimate resting-place in "total abstinence from all that intoxicates." Of this society, which we desire to esteem for its work's sake, we have said Her Most Gracious Majesty is the patroness; and, with this high and honourable office, she now combines the awfully incongruous one of patroness of the Lochnagar Distillery. Some may be inclined to smile at what they consider the beautiful inconsistency, but a moment or two of calm reflection will show the propriety of this distribution of royal patronage. Her Majesty is the ruler of the nation, and as a nation is composed of various classes, all of whom acknowledge her sway, there is a fitness in her royal sanction being given to the church and the play-house, the temperance society and the gin-shop. This is indeed the perfection of liberality. It affords to every subject an opportunity of following his predilections and displaying his loyalty. The orator on the anti-spirit platform may deliver his eloquent appeals under the sanction of royalty, and invite men to abandon the curse of spirit-drinking, and "to discountenance the causes and practice of intemperance," assured of royal patronage—while those who are hardened against all such arguments, and devoted to the worship of Bacchus, may retire to "the Crown and Cushion," or some other rendezvous for moderate tipping, and indulge in a plentiful imbibition of the "QUEEN'S OWN."

But to be serious in a serious affair. One of the metropolitan associations has adopted the following recommendation, which we have great pleasure in presenting to our readers:—

Resolved—"That the Queen having granted her public patronage to the Balmoral Distillery, and a great impetus having been thereby given to spirit drinking, this association respectfully recommends to all temperance societies throughout the kingdom to adopt forthwith petitions to the Throne, presenting to Her Majesty's consideration the serious evils likely to arise, and humbly praying that the royal patronage may be withdrawn."

We cannot, of course, expect that all will concur in the recommendation. If generally acted upon, it would call public attention to the subject, and peradventure Her Most Gracious Majesty might be induced to distribute her royal favours in future with some regard to personal consistency and sacred conviction, instead of following the rule of regal anythingism, and exposing the royal patronage to the smile of derision or the sneer of contempt.

GOOSE CLUBS.

Suppress your smiles, gentle reader, we will not ask any unnatural excitement of your organ of ideality. We are not about to carry you into the airy heights of imagination,—do not expect it,—but simply to whisper a plain, unvarnished matter of fact.

This is the age of institutions—the religious, the philanthropic, the speculating, and the crafty, have all their favourite plans, and all seek to accomplish their purposes by the principle of association. No doubt it is a law of nature, that men should increase their power by uniting; but the law of combination, like all others, may be adopted for most mischievous purposes, and may mightily increase the power of malignant agencies. Greatly should men rejoice, if schemes, designed for their ruin, are laid bare for their inspection, that they may not fall by the snare.

Goose-clubs!! Let us beware of a mistake. Are the bipeds who furnish these societies with their distinctive name to be construed in the genitive or in the dative case. Horne Tooke has admonished us of the power of prepositions, and his cautions must not be lost upon us, in adjudicating between the claimants of and for. No doubt many will consider the titles of both as equally valid, and determine that the parties shall be admitted to a joint participation. The publicans will no doubt clamour for a decision in favour of the dative case, but at the same time indulge a mental reservation in favour of the particle of. Little doubt can be entertained that they presume greatly upon the proverbial gullibility of John Bull.

But, to give the association a fair opportunity of asserting their own claims, we supply the rules of one which is now rejoicing in the eightyyear of its existence:—

“1. That this club is to consist of an unlimited number of members; that each member is to pay the sum of 12s. into the club for a goose, and a bottle of gin, and a bottle of rum.

“2. That each member, on entering his name in the club, is to pay the sum of 1s.; and 1d. for the card of rules; and 1s. next week; and 7d. per week on every Monday evening, commencing on Monday, August 13th, 1849, till the sum of 12s. is paid up. The above sum must be paid on or before Monday, December 17th, 1849, or else the sum that has been paid into the club will be forfeited.

“3. The subscriptions will be received every Monday evening, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock, by the landlord; on which evenings the members are respectfully requested to attend.

“4. That each goose is not to weigh less than 9 lbs.

“5. That the drawing for the geese will take place on Monday evening, December 24th, at seven o'clock precisely.

“6. That no member will be allowed to be a defaulter more than 6 meeting nights; if so, to lose all claim upon the club.

“7. That on the last night of payment, each member must pay the sum of 6d. for the bottles, and when the bottles are brought back, the 6d. will be returned.”

Oh! for the pencil of a Hogarth or a Cruikshank, to sketch the distribution scene; with a series illustrative of all the melancholy results of connexion with this club upon the several members. The frequent pinching and stinting of absolute necessities, to supply the weekly subscription, and the drinking expenses invariably and inevitably connected with it—the habits of sottishness and indolence induced or fostered—the total neglect of social duties—the utter disregard of paternal obligations, and the consequent abandonment and ruin of children—the low and degrading associations with which the mind is familiarized—and the ten thousand social evils which fatten and flourish in the public-house and the beer-shop.

It is scarcely necessary to remark on the unblushing manner in which the dupes of the publican's wily arts are pledged to continue their contributions to this object. The poor man may have paid up his 8s. or 10s. but sickness or the other casualties of life, to which none are more subject than the miserable patrons of the public-house, causes a deficiency of the means, the critical 17th December arrives, and all the deposits are forfeited without hope of recovery, and remorselessly pocketed by the greedy treasurer of the goose club.

We are reminded of a vegetarian, who, in the ardour of his affection for his favourite practice, assured a friend, that man became assimilated to the nature of the animals on whose flesh he fed. His friend wishing to enjoy a laugh at his expense, immediately replied, “then you must have fed much upon goose of late.” Perhaps the publicans are staunch believers in the doctrine of our vegetarian friend, and having an eye to their own advantage, hold out the goose as a bait, in hope that those once entrapped may become annually more willing subjects and more abject slaves.

When will the common sense of our workmen see through these miserable schemes? Surely they must know that the authors of them laugh in the sleeve at the folly and weakness of those who are at once their patrons and their dupes! If the working man must have a Christmas goose, our advice is, that he buy it at a proper market, without allowing the publican to force on him the vile, intoxicating poison, and to tax the goose heavily at the same time. No man has more right than the hard-toiling sons of Britain to such lawful indulgences, and if our plan be adopted many of them can feed upon goose more than once in the year, without allowing the publican to transmute them into geese, that he may feed on them all the year round.

A RUINED FAMILY.

It is now thirteen years since the writer with the view of doing good to the rising generation chiefly, not supposing at that time that her example would have weight with others, signed the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages. She unfeignedly rejoices in the fact many a youth has been led, through her advice and practice, to abandon the path of danger and distress, while even some adult inebriates have been induced to listen to her counsel, and have at length gratefully acknowledged the benefits they had experienced from the adoption of the total abstinence principle. Truly happy would she have felt, had the family, whose history she is now about to record, been led to shake off the trammels of habit, and abandon those customs which are at once both unmeaning and expensive, to say nothing of their tendency to extravagant and immoral practices. Alas, for them that it was not so!

Mr. and Mrs. — resided for some years a few miles from the metropolis. Their family consisted of three daughters and four sons, and no expense was spared to render them accomplished young persons, but mental and moral training was lamentably neglected. The parents exercised no authority over their household—their indulgence was almost without bounds, allowing every wish of their children to be gratified, and seldom, if ever, reproving them, however reprehensible their conduct might be. The sad results of such foolish indulgence and criminal neglect may be easily imagined. Three of the sons soon manifested very untoward and rebellious dispositions; not having been subjected to restraint, they had never checked their vain and unreasonable desires, and they resolved as they advanced towards manhood, to listen to no advice which parental or friendly solicitude might dictate. As they possessed pecuniary resources independent of their ill-fated father, they determined to gratify their sensual appetite, regardless of all consequences. But a very short period had elapsed, before two of these youths were classed among the most reckless of their companions, and when they had well-nigh spent their all, they hesitated not to engage in dishonourable practices in order to maintain a decent exterior, while they remained in the neighbourhood, where once they had mingled with persons of respectability.

After a time, however, they became, by their dissolute conduct, the cause of the almost entire ruin of their family; their mother rapidly declined, and died apparently a victim to grief and depression;—while their misguided father removed from his native home and settled in a land of strangers.

In a few months the three brothers also expatriated themselves, foolishly imagining that on a foreign shore they could pursue with impunity their guilty pleasures and abandoned habits. Most unwelcome tidings have since reached the relatives of these unhappy youths, proving that sin can meet with its due reward in every land. The career of one was soon ended; for, far from all who could have loved him, was he borne to the silent grave, alike unheeded and unlamented. A second has often experienced the misery of those who by their own folly become homeless and friendless—ashamed to revisit the scenes of his childhood and youth; and when brought into contact with any branch of his once flourishing family, he is greeted with indifference and suspicion. The third has never returned to his native land, but lives as an exile, at a distance from all his early associates.—May he be sensible of the great necessity of personal reformation. I would that this were the only gloomy picture in this family's history, but it is not.

One of the sisters, who was naturally amiable, and had many personal attractions, but whose mind was undisciplined and vain, fell a victim to the wily seducer, and at an early age, after having frequented the ball-room, the concert, and the theatre, and experienced the unsatisfying results attendant on such scenes, she became, sad to relate, an habitual inebriate. At the family repasts she had, when a child, acquired the relish for those intoxicating beverages, which were then seen in great abundance at her father's board. Now, having lost all self-respect, and feeling at times her degraded position, she, instead of endeavouring to overcome her sad and baneful practices, gave way to her appetites, and thus was the once beautiful and modest eye changed to the unmeaning stare or stupid dulness of approaching intoxication. After the death of her mother, and the departure of her father, she left the neighbourhood of London, and lived a few years almost forgotten by those who had flattered, admired, and ruined her. Her habits of intemperance from so early an age had totally changed her appearance; for even her fair and delicate complexion had become red and bloated; whilst a coarse and unladylike demeanour characterized the once admired and beloved Emma —. In this manner did she for a time exist, calling forth the commiseration and regret of those who had occasionally the opportunity of witnessing the sad reverse of all that had been most endearing. Now!—where is she? Within the precincts of the cold and dreary grave. She fell a prey to disease, convulsion seized her debilitated and injured frame, and the last reluctant groan was almost immediately heard. No tender mother's tears embalmed her tomb—no kind father's sighs were heard at her interment—but the mournful ceremony was performed with all the indifference of strangers. Ah, ye parents! ye too indulgent parents, be not, by your indecision and dangerous example, the murderers of your immortal offspring. Put far from them in the future the inebriating draught; invite them not to partake of the poisonous liquid; be not accessory to the injury of their physical powers, nor to the prostration of their mental faculties.

Remember the foregoing is not the production of the writer's fancy—it is no picture of imagination, but the real circumstances of a family with whom she was long familiar, and for whose unhappiness she has often shed the tear of deepest sorrow.

May those who peruse this melancholy sketch be more and more anxious to do all in their power to aid the cause of total abstinence, especially among the youth of our land; for the time must come, when, with the combined influence of the aged and the young, intemperance will cease to be the stigma of our country—and peace, happiness, and prosperity shall be established on the ruins of discord, misery, and want.

THE LATE BISHOP OF NORWICH.

Bishop Stanley "having established temperance societies in Alderley, and having witnessed their beneficial influence there, was desirous to encourage them in Norwich, and therefore presided at some of their meetings. This however was, to some persons, very offensive; and when Father Mathew came to hold his great meeting in St. Andrew's hall, the bishop was entreated, and almost commanded, by some of his clerical friends, not to attend.

"But persuasion and remonstrance were in vain, He believed the cause was good, and that the man was worthy to be supported: and he therefore made his appearance on the platform, and joined his hearty and Quaker friend, Joseph John Gurney, in giving a commendatory welcome to the Roman Catholic Teetotaler."—Norfolk News.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

THE MONTHLY SERMON.

In consequence of the meeting of the Walworth and Camberwell Temperance Society on the 6th November, the Monthly Sermon will be deferred.

THE CHILD'S APPEAL.—The following lines, by a child aged thirteen years, appeared lately in the Rochester Star of Temperance, and are very touching from their simplicity, and the associations they suggest. It sounds in our ears like the appeal not of one child, but of tens of thousands of forsaken and worse than fatherless ones.

Come, father, come
This is no place for thee;
Dear mother's sick at home,
Then father come with me.

Come, father, come,
Your clothes are soil'd and torn,
And all is dark and drear
In our once happy home.

Father, do come,
For I am lone and sad,
Forsake your filthy rum,
'Tis that that makes you mad.

GIN PALACES.—The investment of capital in gin palaces is one of the greatest commercial disgraces of the present day, and how men can quietly pocket the profits of such speculations, and compose themselves to sleep at night, with the wages of such iniquity in possession, is one of those mysteries which confound the thinking mind.—Westleyan Methodist Magazine.

SOMETHING IN A NAME.—The names of several sorts of liquor serve to remind us of the miseries which they occasion. Ale will cause many to ail; beer will bring many a man to his bier; gin is a snares; brandy will brand-ye with the infamy of a drunkard; wine causes many to whine; and champagne often gives real pain—Bristol Temperance Herald.

LIFE ASSURANCE.—Mr. Compton, Secretary of the Temperance Provident Institution, in a letter recently addressed to Mr. Russon, the agent for this city, observes:—"We have issued no fewer than 530 policies in the last eight months, being within ten of the number issued in the whole of 1848, though that year greatly exceeded any other. The deaths have only been six more this year than last!"—Bristol Temperance Herald.

CONSTITUTIONAL TEMPERANCE.

A letter from the Rev. John Dunmore Lang, D.D., appears in the British Banner of Oct. 17th, in which he expatiates on the productiveness of the colony where he has established himself, and the interest of which he is labouring to promote. He quotes a statement from a Sydney paper, referring to the cultivation of the vine, in which the writer says—

"There are not more than five acres in bearing, and I have made upwards of four thousand gallons of wine, one hundred and fifty gallons of vinegar, and I expect to make, at the least, sixty gallons of brandy."

The advocates of temperance are often unfairly represented as much opposed to the production of the vine, and to other fruits. Nothing could be more erroneous. It is the conversion of them into intoxicating fluids that excites their indignation. What a melancholy thing that a new and rising colony should be deluged with the destructive poison that has ruined myriads in the mother country, and as we shall presently see, is doing its own horrid work in the young colony. In reference to this quotation Dr. Lang remarks—

"I fear I shall stand but a very indifferent chance of canonization, on the part of the Right Worshipful the Teetotal Society, for these extracts; but begging the pardon of the worthy members of that Society, for whom I have the sincerest regard, I must state my belief and conviction, that the cultivation of the vine in Australia, and the general use of the light wine which it produces, similar in quality to that of the Rhine and of France, are likely to do far more eventually for the cause of temperance in that country, than even the Teetotal Society. The natives of Australia, I mean those of European origin, are, I am happy to say, constitutionally indisposed to intemperance, even those whose European parents on both sides have been remarkably dissipated, and I have no fear for the country in this respect, as soon as the race of European drunkards now in the colony shall have died off."

This is indeed awful. Who can contemplate the loss, the inconceivable, the eternal loss of one soul! One human spirit lost to purity and holiness—lost to happiness, to heaven!! Yet here is a "race of European drunkards," in Australia, coolly contemplated as "dying off." But will no influence remain? Are there no young aspirants for their dismal fame? No juvenile followers in their dangerous steps! Oh no! "the natives of Australia, of European origin, are constitutionally indisposed to intemperance." We tremble for those who have expatriated themselves to Cook's Land, if the representations they have received are not more credible than this astounding statement. Where, in the world, has "constitutional indisposition to intemperance," stood long against brandy, powerful, and plentiful and cheap? "No fear for the colony in this respect!!" What! are all the lessons of history to be thus reversed? Have not "cheapness and plenty" in these things, produced nearly the same result in every climate, and under every sky! Reports of temperance societies in every British colony, in Asia, Africa, and America, blow loud the warning trumpet, yet an eminent and successful advocate of colonization hears not or heeds not the sound!! Common sense bids us avoid the sunken rock, and the Saviour of sinners, teaches the earnest prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." Shall we, dissatisfied with the temptations with which the arch-enemy has surrounded us, multiply snares for our rising sons and daughters? Shall we erect our distilleries—manufacture the spirituous temptation—cheapen and render accessible the delusive draught—hand round the poisoned chalice to every colonist—and then trust to a supposed "constitutional indisposition" for an universal resistance, and a successful escape? And do christian ministers recommend this suicidal policy—this dallying with temptation—this deliberate infringement of the physical laws of God? Awake, awake, Australian teetotalers!! Dissipate the darkness that broods over your interesting colony, and let light penetrate even the legislative council, that your darling sons and blooming daughters may be saved from the temptations, which are, with daring impiety, to be wrung out of the bounties of Divine Providence.

But one word of pity for "the race of European drunkards" that is "dying off." We presume that the mind that trembles under "no fear" for the un-fallen—expands with no hope for the degraded. The two things are correlative. Oh! Christian brethren, will you not make many sacrifices for these dying Australian drunkards? What will you give for the salvation? How much of labour? Of property? Of self-denial? They are admitted to be "dying off"!! Oh! terrible danger!! Oh! appalling calamity!! Oh! inconceivable ruin!! It is worth many an earnest thought—many a fervent prayer—many a willing sacrifice—and many a weeping effort, to rescue one—only one. But contemplate a race of perishing drunkards! and if a ray of hope gleams across their darkening destiny, follow that gentle light, and seek to reclaim the lost, even if that effort demands the abandonment of the wine-cup and the determination to abstain.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A RECLAIMED ONE.

DEAR SIR,—It is now upwards of thirty years since I was led to listen to the truth, and I humbly trust, receive that repentance which needeth not to be repented of. In course of time I became, and continued so for several years, a member of an Independent church, from which I, with a few others, seceded, and founded a separate and distinct sect, then designated The Happy Few. Among other things, this society maintained that no sooner is the breath out of the body, than we should treat the remains of a friend as we would a loathsome nuisance—get rid of it as soon as possible. I have known some, who, having lost their husbands,—others, their wives or children,—never gave the least manifest sign of sorrow or regret, but hurried their remains from their dwelling with indecent haste. Disgusted with their practices, I returned to the world, and soon became the companion of those, who frequent more the ale-house, tea-gardens, &c., than they do the church or chapel, until, by imperceptible degrees, I became a wretched, miserable DRUNKARD, lost to every fine and manly feeling. For upwards of twenty years I was an outcast of society, experiencing all the wretchedness and misery consequent upon a course of intemperance; but after a series of almost untold sufferings in affliction, brought on by my own improvidence, I was led, near nine years ago, to sign the teetotal pledge, and, by God's blessing, have been enabled consistently to adhere thereto, and thus to conquer my easily besetting sin.

I have not only been reclaimed from my habits of intemperance, but have been received again into church fellowship, and am I humbly hope, now endeavouring to walk worthy of the high vocation whereby I am called.

Oh, when I look at the hole of the pit from whence I was digged,—when I look at the rock from whence I was hewn, the language of my heart is "To grace—to grace how great a debtor—daily was I constrained to be;" and I cannot but love and thank God for a principle which, in my case, has been the means of my restoration.

Perusing, lately, a little work entitled Sobriety contrasted with Intemperance, by George McCulloch of Stirling, in page 101, I read the following reply to the enquiry, "How may intemperance be cured?" It is represented as given by a person of angelic appearance.—"Intemperance is the polluted fountain whence flows the river of woe, which carries desolation and despair in its course; and while that river continues to flow, desolation and despair will continue to involve in one common destruction all who come within its influence. 'Tis in vain that you tell mankind to be virtuous, while intemperance is allowed to undermine the very foundations of virtue; 'tis in vain you tell mankind to be wise, while intemperance steals their wisdom; 'tis in vain you tell mankind to be good, while intemperance, the root of almost every evil, is suffered to exist amongst us; 'tis in vain you tell mankind to be holy, while intemperance, the fruitful source of iniquity, remains; 'tis in vain you tell mankind to be pure, while intemperance, the fountain of impurity, remains unsealed; 'tis in vain you tell mankind to be happy, while intemperance, the source of misery, continues to send forth its pestilential streams; 'tis in vain you preach 'repentance toward God, and faith to our Lord Jesus Christ,' while the withering demon of intemperance is allowed to retain one spot on which to rest his form; 'tis in vain you point to heaven as the place of never-ending joy, while the false, the fleeting pleasures of intemperance enslave the mind of man; 'tis in vain you point to hell as the place of never-terminating woe, while the soul and spirit are steeped in the lethèan sea of alcohol. 'What then,' I asked, 'is to be done—where is the cure to be found?' As I put the question to him, I thought—

"My strange partner seemed no longer man;

His youthful face grew more divinely sweet,

His robe turned white, and flowed beneath his feet.

His feet scarce seemed to press the grass of the valley in which we were standing. Strains of heavenly music burst upon my ear, and as the sounds grew fainter and more faint, the celestial messenger ascended on expanding wings, and as he disappeared in the region of upper air, he dropped a scroll, which I knew contained the cure I had been so anxious to learn. I caught the precious gift, ere it reached the earth. I unfolded it. I found inscribed, in golden characters, TOTAL ABSTINENCE FROM ALL INTOXICATING LIQUORS is the only cure."

The above remarks seemed so peculiarly applicable to my experience and feelings, that I could not help penning them down, and sending them to you. I think the above facts shew that total abstinence is one very powerful means, in the hands of God, in leading many, who were once drunken and disorderly, now clothed and in their right mind, to the feet of Jesus. Wishing every possible success to the cause of true sobriety, viz. teetotalism,

I subscribe myself, yours, &c.,
ONE RECLAIMED.

Correspondence.

RAGGED SCHOOLS AND TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

DEAR SIR,—In the October number of your very valuable journal, you inserted an extract from the Seventh Annual Report of the Field Lane Ragged School, to the effect, that, "but for drunkenness the committee's duties would well-nigh cease." And you followed up this extract with some very strong appeals to the teachers and friends of ragged schools to join the temperance movement, which I sincerely hope may have the effect of inducing many to do so, and by that means increase their usefulness to a very considerable extent.

I have much pleasure in informing you that the gentleman who drew up the Report of the Field Lane Ragged School, Mr. J. T. M. Ware, the honorary secretary, has been a pledged abstainer for some time; and that two of the committee, viz. Mr. Tomkins, the London City Missionary, and myself, have been pledged abstainers for some years.

There are also two pledged abstainers in addition to myself on the committee of the Ragged School Union, and Mr. Horrocks, the inspector of the schools, has been a pledged abstainer for many years.

Our noble chairman, Lord Ashley, presided lately at a meeting of the City of Westminster Total Abstinence Association, and Juvenile Bond of Hope, when his lordship, in a long and excellent speech, warmly expressed his approbation of the temperance movement. I have therefore great hopes that his lordship will ultimately be led to give the temperance movement the benefit of his great influence, by signing the pledge of total abstinence from that drink which is the chief cause of so much of the wretchedness, misery, crime and rags, which his lordship has so earnestly and perseveringly endeavoured for so many years to remove from our land.

Several of the teachers and scholars of the Brook Street Ragged School are pledged abstainers, and a public meeting has been held every Thursday for some time past in the school-room, Henry's Passage, Hampstead Road. The secretary, treasurer, and several of the committee of the Hinde's Mews Ragged School, Manchester Square, are pledged abstainers, and a temperance meeting is held in the room the first Monday in each month. I have much pleasure in giving the following extract from the last report of this school.

"Your committee feel called upon to state most distinctly, that after much enquiry, observation, and experience, it is their conviction that the great proportion of the misery, vice, and ignorance, with which they come in contact, is the direct result of intemperance, and that if they would remove rather than palliate these effects, they must destroy the cause; they have, therefore, felt it to be their duty to urge upon the youths to abstain altogether from all intoxicating drinks, and in several cases with success, and the most pleasing results."

I have sent you the above particulars, to show that some of the teachers and committees of ragged schools have seen it to be their wisdom to join the temperance movement, and endeavour, in dependence upon the Holy Spirit's assistance, to explain to their scholars that "The grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works."—Titus ii. 11-14.

I remain, dear Sir,

Your's faithfully,

JOHN VANDERKISTE.

Field Lane Ragged School, Oct. 1849.

Reviews.

The Cholera: the Claims of the Poor upon the Rich. By THOMAS BEGGS. pp. 12. London: C. GILPIN.

The Cholera: the Duties and Interests of the Working Classes as to Cleanliness, Temperance, &c. pp. 12. London: C. GILPIN.

Two excellent and admirable papers, by one who understands the subject, and who knows both how to advocate the rights of the poor, and to teach them their duty and interest. They both assert and defend the principle that health is dependent on physical laws, divinely appointed, and having their own proper sanctions so annexed, that reward and punishment follow with hasty step their observance or infringement. Cholera, typhus, and other epidemics are the natural result of filth, overcrowding, and intemperance. All these are removable causes. The philanthropic, the wealthy and well-instructed, have a mission to perform; and those who visit the homes of the poor, should kindly point out the things to be done, and the best method of doing them. The female members of our temperance societies, while carrying temperance tracts around the district in which they reside, should endeavour to make the working-man's home clean, comfortable, and attractive, by gentle hints to the working-man's wife. One district of a certain Irish town, was, and still is, remarkable for its, neat, clean, and tasteful appearance. Every cottage is neatly whitewashed inside and out; a small plot of ground smiles with simple flowers; the jasmine, clematis, &c., are trained round the windows and doors, inviting observation and awakening enquiry. Two or three ladies (members of the Society of Friends) have produced this change, by kind advice and watchful care. No rest ought to be taken until we have made the poor man's home as cheering and inviting as circumstances will allow.

But there must be co-operation, cordial and persevering. Hence Mr. Beggs has not only advocated the poor man's claims, but tendered the working-classes sound and salutary advice. These tracts ought to be circulated by thousands, and on this account we regret the price at which they are published. We earnestly hope a cheap edition will be called for, and that our temperance friends will see that every cottage has a copy of "the duties and interests of the working-classes."

Tetotalism Defended. An Examination of the "Confessions" of T. Smeeton. By A. W. HERITAGE. pp. 36. London: W. TWEEDIE.

Another reply to Thomas Smeeton's tract, in form more to our mind than any of its predecessors. It contains—

"1. A review of his introductory remarks.

"2. An examination of the four main propositions in the work.

"3. An investigation of the author's answers to objections.

"4. A consideration of the statements advanced in the Appendix."

The doubts which Mr. Smeeton confesses to have had through his whole course, are well met by quotations from his own writings, and will no doubt convince every reader that either this confession was insincere, or that the author of the quotations was skilled at most consummate hypocrisy. A man may apologise for a rash or overheated remark made in the excitement of an enthusiastic meeting, but that he can sit down alone and commit to paper earnest thoughts, confident assertions, and stirring appeals, upon a subject about which his own mind is in a state of grave doubt, and all this while making a profession of religion, is such an exhibition of deep-laid deception, that we blush for any man who can coolly attribute it to himself.

The main propositions of the work are carefully considered, and the stronghold of the author of "Confessions," in reference to the example of the Saviour, is completely demolished.

We cannot enter at length into the consideration of this interesting tract; nor is it needful. The fact that its substance was delivered in two lectures to an Ipswich audience, and by them requested to be printed, is, in our judgment, sufficient recommendation.

A TEMPERATE RETORT.—A tourist, who had "put an enemy into his mouth, that stole away his legs," tumbled from the deck of a barge into the Crinan canal, and being fished out, quarrelled with the captain for not having a rail round the craft. The skipper turned the laugh upon him by retorting, that he should have had a rail round his mouth.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—At one of Mr. Grubb's meetings in Broseley, Salop, the chair was taken by the Hon. and Rev. O. W. Forester, who stated that, when on a visit to London some time ago, he met at the house of his brother-in-law a gentleman who stands high in the medical profession, and on the subject of temperance being broached, the medical gentleman remarked, that from a circumstance that occurred when at Malta some years ago, he had become an abstainer, and had experienced much benefit from the practice. He stated also, that being by appointment one of the medical attendants of His Grace the Duke of Wellington, he stated as a fact, that, for the last two years the duke had not drunk a glass of wine—water being his only beverage.

Temperance Operations.

HOLLAND.

In every country our principles are seen to be important. It is interesting to know the opinions of enlightened men of other nations, and we have great pleasure in submitting to our readers the following interesting letter from Dr. Egeling of Haarlem. It was written in English, a language which our learned friend is not much accustomed to write. This will account for some peculiarities in the style, with which we preferred not to interfere, excepting so far as was necessary to make it readily intelligible to uneducated readers.

"SIR,—Thanking you for regularly sending me the National Temperance Chronicle,—a journal which I endeavour to make useful to the cause of temperance in my country, and begging you to be so kind as to continue doing so, I take the liberty to send you herewith the Fifth Report of the Dutch Society, from which you will see that the number of our pledged members is now about 6000.

"This number would be considerably greater, if we did not grow more and more prudent in accepting new members. We do not admit drunkards before they have undergone a trial of some months, because experience has taught us, that many drunkards, well feeling the misery of their condition, and wishing to be delivered from it, refuge to our society, brought thereto by the example or instigation of others, or by a momentary excitement of mind, without the earnest and sincere purpose to continue fighting with all their powers against the enemy. And even when this purpose is serious, they almost always fail in due courage and power, and soon—sometimes very soon—they fall again into the former fault, and so do much evil to our cause, seeming, by their fall, to give a weapon to our adversaries. The cause of temperance has taught us how little the inferior class of men regard the word they once have given. The hope of assistance, benevolence, or productive work, is, for many of them, the only motive to unite themselves—with the word, but not in fact—to temperance.

"We believe this to be the great reason that the good cause of temperance does not make greater progress as well in America as in the continental part of Europe,—That the fidelity of the members, and the true progress of our cause, is not much greater in England than in the Netherlands, appears, I believe, from some passages in the Temperance Chronicle of August, edited not long ago, and that the same is observed in Germany, where the unfidelity of the members is a common cause of complaint, was told me just now by Kaplan Selig, from Osnabrück, a well-known apostle of temperance.

"This fall of the unfaithful members greatly diminishes the moral influence of our societies, and their respect among the public. It discourages good and honest men from uniting with us. Therefore we seldom accept any one whose temperance and good behaviour is not known to us, or certified by a well-known person. Since we have observed this rule, more honest men—also more from the highly cultivated and influential classes—are united to us, of which we are much rejoiced, because, taught by the experience of some years, we believe that in this manner only we can make great progress, and that the condemnation of fire-water must descend from the higher rank to the lower. And so the fellowship of the temperance society must be for the working and inferior class a title of honour and testimonial of good behaviour, so it will be from itself a personal recommendation for them, and a reason of preferring them to others who have not signed the pledge.

"In this way, we believe, we shall advance, slowly, but surely, because, although the number of our members will not increase very soon, we shall be, though weak in number, strong in internal power. Therefore we always endeavour to persuade that the temperance societies do not impose on themselves principally the task of curing drunkards for ever, (which is almost always impossible), but especially that of preventing drunkards to be formed. It is true there are examples of perfectly cured drunkards, but they are scarce. It cannot be denied, also, that for him, who wishes to be converted from drunkenness, the engagement [the pledge] must be a powerful support in the fight, which sometimes is heavy enough, and that we are sorry to be obliged to refuse the repenting; but is it advisable to buy the possible but not probable assistance of one, for the almost sure infidelity of many, the fall of whom exposes our cause to false judgment and contempt? Do we not expose in this manner the possible preservation of thousands of temperate men (who otherwise would have united themselves to us, and be secured from drunkenness) by trying the not probable saving of a few drunkards?

"Forgive me, Sir, that I have treated this point somewhat amply, but it is in the opinion of many in this country, a vital question for our cause, and if I did not fear to be too arrogant, I would take liberty to beg you to submit those ideas to your particular attention, and to that of other temperance brothers.

"I am, Sir,

"Your respectful servant,

"W. EGELING."

"Haarlem, October 30th. 1849."

There may be in the circumstances of our Dutch brethren some national peculiarity, which may render necessary the probationary measures to which our esteemed fellow-labourer adverts. Throughout England and Ireland the general plan has been, to take a pledge of any man the moment he was in the mind to sign or declare it. No doubt it is desirable to have as few pledge-breakers as possible; but we doubt whether, if all the pledgers in this country were divided into two classes,—the formerly moral, and the formerly inebriate,—whether the proportion of defaulters will be as great among the latter as among the former. We shall on this point be happy to receive statistics from all our correspondents who may be able to supply them. In our own experience, while scarcely one reclaimed drunkard in twenty has gone back, two-thirds of the moral, religious, and generally respectable, have deserted our ranks.

It is worthy of remark, that in Great Britain, Ireland, and America, thousands of drunkards have been reclaimed, while in Holland it appears almost a hopeless case to restore the fallen. How can this be accounted for? Our past experience in this matter should awaken our own gratitude, and stimulate our own zeal, and our abundant and increasing success may arouse our continental friends, and they may henceforth have a more cheering prospect, and a brightening hope with respect to the rescue of the wretched inebriate.

One other point is suggested by the foregoing letter. Is it desirable to consider as members of the society all who merely give a contribution occasionally or periodically? The latter plan, we believe, has never been adopted: but the former extensively prevails. Membership should consist only of those who subscribe both the pledge and the list of contributors. Obtain pledges from all who are willing to sign—and donations from all who are willing to pay: but by all means expect both qualifications from MEMBERS. If the privileges of membership were what they ought to be, it will be an honour to be a member of a temperance society. The fallen who may sign, will then anticipate the honour of a membership as an object to be obtained by steady perseverance in the good way, and by a pecuniary subscription as soon as his finances may be recovered from the awful consumption which continued intemperance almost invariably produces.

AGRA.

At a Meeting held at the Benevolent Institution, on Monday evening, the 19th March, 1849, pursuant to a notice in the Agra Messenger, of the 17th instant, for the purpose of forming a society to discountenance the use of fermented and intoxicating liquors, on the total abstinence principle, it was moved, that the Rev. T. Phillips take the chair.

Moved by the Rev. A. B. Lish,

Seconded by Mr. W. H. Blackburne,

That a Society be constituted and denominated THE AGRA TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, the pledge being as follows:

"We, the undersigned, do agree, with Divine aid, that we will not use any kind of fermented or intoxicating liquor, or drug, nor traffic in them, and that we will, in all suitable ways, discountenance their use throughout the community.

"This declaration or promise, does not apply to any religious or medical use of the articles mentioned in it."

Moved by Mr. J. C. Parry,

Seconded by Mr. W. McLeavy,

That the following be the rules of the Society:

1st. That this Society be Auxiliary to the British and Foreign Temperance Society in London.
2nd. That every member of the Society be expected to contribute something monthly to its funds, for the purpose of purchasing periodicals, tracts, &c. for their own information, and for general circulation: and that every member use his influence to extend the temperance cause.

3rd. That a Committee, consisting of a President, a Secretary and Treasurer, and five Members, be appointed to carry out the objects of the society, with power to add to their number.

4th. That these officers be elected annually, at a general meeting, which shall be held as early as practicable after the first week in January, when a Report of the Society shall be submitted to the meeting.

5th. That the Committee be expected to meet for business, at least once each month.

6th. That the Committee be instructed to solicit donations and subscriptions, generally, in aid of the funds; and that a friendly correspondence be maintained with kindred societies, and with the parent institution in London.

7th. That quarterly meetings of the members and friends of the Society be held to advocate the temperance cause.

Moved by the Rev. R. Williams,

Seconded by Mr. N. Parsick,

That the following gentlemen be pleased to take office for the ensuing year.

J. W. Urquhart, Esq., President.

Mr. W. Parry, Secretary.

Members.

J. Parsick,

W. H. Blackburne,

J. McConnell.

J. Jahans,

J. C. Parry,

Moved by Mr. C. Haygarth,

Seconded by Mr. J. Scott,

That the thanks of the Meeting be presented to the Committee of the Benevolent Institution, for the use of the building.

The pledge was then read by the chairman, and signed by himself and thirteen others, after which the meeting was closed.

THOS. PHILLIPS, Chairman.

LICENSES.—BRADFORD, YORKSHIRE.

The cause, which has for some time been rather languid in this town, is now happily reviving. The society has lately presented a memorial to the Brenster Sessions against the granting of new licenses, and asking them to suspend the license of the Bermondsey Hotel, where musical concerts have for some time back been held, and to which hundreds of our youthful population have resorted nightly for amusement, to the injury of their physical and moral condition. I am glad to state that the magistrates have suspended the license for twelve months; but the keeper declares she will still carry on the concert room, and keep the house as a TEMPERANCE HOTEL!!! If however she does hold her immoral and obscene concerts, the magistrates will probably not renew the license at the expiration of that period.

The licenses of three other houses, which had been suspended, were renewed, on the condition only that, as to two of them where concert rooms had been open before, no such concerts were again held.

The magistrates are evidently awakening to the enormities of the drinking system; for, although they granted two new licenses, yet they would not have done so had not the keepers promised not to open dram-shops on the premises. One other publican, who had a notorious dram-shop connected with his house, was obliged (though very reluctantly did he consent) to close it, or he would have lost his license.

It is to be hoped that all temperance committees will see the importance of memorializing the Sessions on this subject.

We have this week been favoured with the services of Mr. Jabez Inwards, of Leighton Buzzard, who has delivered four lectures in our hall, and much good we trust will result from them.

The society has engaged a town agent for three months to stir up the slumbering energies of the teetotalers of this place. His labours are already telling, and it is to be hoped that he may be the means of teetotalism flourishing once more in this town.

The committee are making strenuous efforts to relieve themselves from a debt of £111. 8s. upon their hall. Circulars have been forwarded to many influential and benevolent friends of the temperance movement throughout the county, and I shall be happy to receive any donation, however small, towards causing the hall to be ranked among, I am sorry to say, the few temperance halls which are free from incumbrance.

GEO. HALLIDAY, Secretary.
Green Lane, Bradford, Oct. 13, 1849.

LONDON.

The first of a series of six aggregate meetings in advocacy of the principles of temperance, took place at Exeter-hall on Monday evening last, and the arrangements for the meeting were of the most complete character. It was announced that the subject of the addresses would be—

“THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION, IN ITS BEARING ON THE MORAL, SOCIAL, AND POLITICAL ELEVATION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.”

This fertile theme was divided into four heads or portions, one being allotted to each speaker, as follows:—By the Rev. Benjamin Parsons: “The Importance of the Working Classes, and the Duty of Promoting their Welfare.”—By Mr. Thomas Beggs: “The Drinking Usages of the Working Classes destructive of their Social Comfort.”—By Mr. Robert Lowery: “Strict Sobriety essential to the Moral and Political Elevation of the Working Classes.”—By Mr. T. A. Smith: “The Popular Delusions as to the Real Properties of Strong Drinks the Great Hindrance to the Progress of the Temperance Reform amongst the Working Classes.”

At half-past six o'clock the chair was taken by John Cassell, Esq., and the proceedings were commenced by singing the 27th of the Temperance Hymns.

[We regret that our space forbids a report of the admirable speeches which followed; but necessity knows no law. Our friends who feel interested in the subject have no doubt seen some notice of them in the daily papers, and this reconciles us to the exclusion which we are compelled to make.—Editor.]

WATLINGTON, OXON.

On Thursday, October 18th, Mr. T. Hudson of London, delivered a lecture in the town-hall, on “Physical Slavery,” or the evil tendencies of strong drink. The chair was taken by the Rev. — Lockyer, Wesleyan minister, late missionary in the West Indies, and who for several years, in that burning climate, had practised total abstinence. Although a slight charge was made for admission, the hall was well filled, and (with one slight exception), the able and intelligent lecturer was listened to with great attention and interest.

CAERNARVON.

MORIAH CHAPEL.—On Monday last, at seven o'clock in the evening, the Rev. Evan Davies, Newmarket, delivered a lecture on total abstinence, at this chapel, to a very numerous congregation. After dwelling upon the effects of intemperance, the lecturer very clearly proved that teetotalism is an effectual means to raise man in the scale of being, as an individual, a head of family, a citizen, and as a sojourner in this world on his way to eternity. Great attention was paid to the address, although it lasted very long; and several new members have been since added to the society.—Caernarvon and Denbigh Herald.

A GOOD ANSWER.—“What shall I do,” said a liquor-seller to a temperance lecturer, “if I quit selling rum?” “Go into the poor-house,” said the lecturer, “and be supported there, and let the poor you have made paupers come out.”

GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY, PATENTEES,
City Road, London,

It cannot now be doubted, even by the most sceptical,
but that Gutta Percha must henceforward be regarded as one of the blessings of a gracious Providence, inasmuch as it affords a sure and certain protection from cold and damp feet, and thus tends to protect the body from disease and premature death.

"GUTTA PERCHA TUBING," being so extraordinary a conductor of sound, is used as speaking tubes in mines, manufactories, warehouses, &c. This tubing may also be applied in Churches and Chapels for the purpose of enabling deaf persons to listen to the sermon, &c. For conveying messages from one room or building to another, or from the mast-head to the deck of a vessel, it is invaluable.

MILL BANDS.—The increasing demand for the Gutta
Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLOCKS, &c.—Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to manufacturers, engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-bucket valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size or thickness without seam or joint, and as cold water will never soften them, they seldom need any repair.

Gutta Percha soles, solution, inkstands, card trays,
medallions, picture-frames, brackets, mouldings, window-
blind cornices, vases, fire-buckets, bowls, pen-trays, bougies, catheters, stethoscopes, thin lining, thread, flower-pots, ear-trumpets, &c. &c., may be had at the Company's Works, Wharf Road, City Road, London, or of any of their wholesale dealers in town or country.

THE TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE AND RECORDER.

For four years the Chronicle has now been issued in its present form, during which time it has subjected the National Temperance Society to a very heavy loss. This is a disastrous course both for the Society and the cause; and it cannot, and must not continue. It seeks to "chronicle" important proceedings—to "record" facts of interest to the workmen in this reformation—to propose plans of operation—to notice, with gravity or lightness as the case may require, each new manifestation of the drinking customs, and every existing barrier against their abolition. It aims to strengthen the new convert, by furnishing replies to the most popular objections to our principles; and to stimulate the sometimes desponding hopes of the veteran reformer, that he may gird himself anew for the work, and resolve never to forsake the standard he has nobly borne until death shall demand its surrender, and introduce him to his reward.

But in order to its efficiency and permanence, it must have the support of the temperance world. Will this be earnestly and heartily given? We have had many communications respecting its enlargement. An enlarged and more powerful organ may be demanded by the necessities of the times, and the gigantic difficulties with which we have to cope. But if teetotalers do not themselves encourage temperance publications, how can they in reason expect the triumph of their principles. No doubt many pledgers go back to their former practice for want of more deep conviction of the truth and importance of the cause they have espoused. Amidst the opposition with which they have to contend in society, they need information and impression. The subject should be kept constantly before them, and their "minds stirred up by way of remembrance." LET EVERY TEETOTALER ORDER SOME MAGAZINE devoted to the subject.

A word to Societies. Have a plentiful supply of books, tracts, and especially of periodicals! If some member undertake the sale and regular delivery of these, societies would be materially strengthened and the cause advanced. Secretaries have enough to do. Divide the burden. Appoint an individual for this especial work, who will undertake it con amore, and if any profit arise let the funds of the society reap the benefit.

Subscribers to the National Temperance Society of 5s. per annum and upwards have hitherto received a copy of the Chronicle by post. This has been a heavy expense to the Society, yet one which if able it would willingly bear still for the promotion of the cause. But not a few have declared that they would rather pay for it, than encumber the Society. The committee have resolved, however, to forward it as usual to all who subscribe 10s. and upwards annually, but do not introduce this limitation from any disrespect to those who cordially contribute the smaller sum and feel that they cannot consistently with other claims afford more. Necessity alone compels this decision—a necessity deeply regretted, against which the Society has struggled as long as prudence would warrant; but to which they now feel it their duty to yield.

Will our friends throughout the country do us the favour to weigh well this matter. The temperance reform will never triumph until an earnest, persevering, and long continued effort be made to extend temperance information. No one can expect either moderate or immoderate drinkers of alcohol to seek for these things of themselves. We must bring the light to them—and then bring them to the light. We must point their attention to some star of truth, and attracted by its beauty, the firmament may become subject to their profound and admiring study.

In commencing a new year, we shall seek to give new life, new energy, and new beauty to our advocacy. Variety is required to suit all readers. We ask original articles from thorough going men. Biography of successful advocates, and signal trophies will be read with interest, and our friends can furnish them from all parts of the country. New plans of operation, thoughts, desires, suggestions, hints, tending to advance the work will be welcome. In short, whatever can tend to remove prejudice, to banish ignorance, to confute objections, to illustrate duty, to make the chord of sympathy vibrate, and to brace the energies of the will for a wise, firm, unalterable decision; we hope our educated friends, whether ladies or gentlemen, will plentifully supply.

With renewed devotion to the glorious work we have in hand, we take leave of our friends and of the current year, and invite them all to resolve solemnly, that with the help of God, 1850 shall be a distinguished era in the history of the temperance reformation in Great Britain.

TEETOTAL IMBECILITY.

"It is characteristic of the age that it comprehends a large class of minds apparently unable to distinguish between use and abuse." Thus oracularly does the Examiner of October 27th, introduce a philippic against Elihu Burritt, B. Rotch, Esq., and Thomas Beggs particularly, and against teetotalers in general, whom it describes "as running a-muck like Malays," and as therefore "a bad example and a public evil, only less intolerable than drunkenness itself."

Now intelligent abstainers can afford to smile upon such an estimate of themselves and their work, concluding, no doubt, as is suggested by the Standard of Freedom in reply, that the writer was in that peculiar mesmeric condition denominated after-dinnerish. But in a very few words we propose just to vindicate our claim to common sense, and to quote the Examiner himself as a unique specimen of that "large class," whose mental weakness he deploras.

Now we hold that before a case of abuse can be made out in regard to any article, its proper use must be determined by correct reasoning. If a chemist take any substance in hand with a view to test its virtue—if his object were to ascertain the propriety of using it as an article of food—he might ascertain the elements of which it was composed, and the proportions in which those elements were combined; and this might afford ground for some conjectural conclusions. Perhaps he might suppose that it could be safely introduced into the human system. But to protect himself in his future experiments, he procures a small animal, and tries its effects upon it. Now if he should find death caused, or the healthy functions of the body deranged, he would decide at once, and pronounce it a poison. On such grounds, the evidence which teetotalers acknowledge, rests; and according to the evidence, they regard alcohol as a poison; and because a poison, not to be used as food.

They go further; and on the evidence of the best physiologists, assert that the system will not use it. It does not submit to the action of the gastric juice—is not convertible into blood—interferes with the process of healthy respiration—impedes the vitalizing operation of the lungs—inflames all the delicate membranes and tissues with which it comes in contact—irritates to wildness, and then stupifies to insensibility that wondrous organism the brain, and "generates a tendency to death." From all this they conclude, that its use is not to be poured down human throats, nor placed upon dinner tables or sideboards as an article of human diet.

These considerations will shew how wretchedly informed upon the subject the writer of the following paragraph must be.

"So, because drunkenness is, for the most part, inseparably associated with crime and misery, a leap is made at the conclusion that there must be no drinking. Because Bill Brute, the robber in Newgate, and Mr. Brallaghan of Killaloo, resident down the next court, make wild beasts of themselves under the influence of strong liquor, therefore Jones, the decent and industrious mechanic, going to Hampton Court for a summer day with his wife and family, is not to have his pint of beer and his glass of gin-and-water—a proposition which we make bold to say is simply ridiculous."

Ridiculous enough! if alcohol be a necessary of life. But what if thousands are converted into "Bill Brutes" by this drink!! What if Jones and his family are gradually sinking under its influence to the degraded level of Mr. Brallaghan of Killaloo!! What if on investigation it may be found that nineteen-twentieths who live in the same court with Mr. B., or in similar abodes of wretchedness, are brought to that condition by multiplying "pints of beer," and increasing glasses of gin-and-water! What if the wise, the moral, the virtuous are entrapped, and fall by its bewitching influences! What if writers of witty paragraphs and even editors of newspapers, sink from being occasionally "after-dinnerish," or "a little fuddled," to become in their turn "Brutes" and "Brallaghans!" What then? Why it would be as well to give it up, especially when it is proved that the use of poison for food is a crying abuse.

The Examiner is exceedingly angry with Mr. Rotch, whose praiseworthy and disinterested labours among the degraded inhabitants of Cold Bath Fields, have secured him the thanks of magistrates, and the esteem of philanthropists. It is well known that during his term of office as a visiting justice, Mr. Rotch "remembered mercy" to the outcasts of the jail, and sought to use a kind and subduing moral influence to reform their manners, and render them fit for civilized society. Several of the warders took the pledge, and endeavoured to aid in the humanizing work. But Mr. Rotch's term expired, and the duty was confided to others. The teetotal warders were abused and insulted as "Rotch's saints," and sought to be driven from the pledge by persecution. The Examiner says that "the chief of these saints was discharged from his office for drunkenness," and in a parenthesis pledges the mysterious "we" to a "knowledge of the fact." Suppose this statement were true, how does it serve the moderation cause? Is teetotalism unsound in theory or useless in practice, because one individual under vexatious and annoying persecution breaks his pledge? But the "fact" proves to be a "fabrication," as will appear from the following letter from Mr. Rotch, in reply to our inquiry on that subject:—

Lowlands, 7th November, 1849.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to your note of last week, inquiring if there be any truth in the statement contained in the scurrilous article in the Examiner of the week before, as to the chief of my teetotal warders at Cold Bath Fields Prison having been discharged for drunkenness; I beg to say, as you will of course have anticipated, that no such thing has occurred.

I am informed upon inquiry that, after I ceased to be a visiting justice of that prison, some man pretending to be a teetotaler, and having a letter of recommendation from Mr. Janson of Tottenham, the chairman of the Committee of the National Temperance Society, addressed to me, but which man I neither knew nor recommended, presented himself to the visiting justices and was appointed a junior subwarder, and a very short time afterwards proved to be a drunkard, and not a teetotaler, and was very properly discharged from his situation for coming drunk to duty.

I cannot find that there is any other foundation on which the author of the absurd paragraph in the Examiner which you allude to, could have rested his very bold but equally false assertion; and I of course do not mean to admit that he had even this excuse for what he has written, for he may never have heard even of this poor delinquent; and the whole story may have been as pure an invention of a brain evidently distempered on the subject of true temperance, as his insinuation that common London thieves and vagabonds had the temperance pledge administered to them indiscriminately by me in the prison, another statement in the same article equally at variance with the truth.

I really cannot advise your wasting your time by replying to or in any way noticing such a disreputable article in a paper so comparatively little read as the Examiner, but hope you will be satisfied to set off against it, the admirable and well-written article which appeared only a few days afterwards in that most respectable and widely circulated newspaper the Morning Chronicle, on the singular death of poor Mr. Morton, the assistant surgeon of University Hospital, which is likely to do far more good to the great cause of temperance, than all such intemperate and contemptible attacks as that in the Examiner, can do it harm.

I am yours faithfully,
BENJAMIN ROTCH.

The Examiner has been publicly challenged to discuss the principles of total abstinence with Dr. Lees, F.S.A., who recently lectured at the Mechanics' Institution in London. To that meeting the Editor of the Examiner was invited by an official note from the Secretary of the National Temperance Society, with a promise of a courteous, candid, and patient hearing, and with the choice of delegating the task of defending his sentiments to any friend he might select. This offer he, of course, did not notice, but having committed to paper four and a-half columns of gentle and friendly strictures (?) acted on the principle that "discretion is the better part of valour," quietly abides in the darkness, from which he fired his random shots at Elihu Burritt and Co., and proves himself utterly incapable of defending what he writes and prints.

But who now need fear the charge of imbecility vended against moral reformers in the Examiner? Like all truth, the more violently it is attacked, whether by vulgar ignorance or polished satire, the principles of temperance shine with increasing loveliness and brilliancy.

AMUSEMENT.

"There is a more profound meaning in the word 'amusement' than most people in this country are disposed to admit. There is a philosophy in amusement, as well as in education; indeed, we have no hesitation in averring, that Amusement is a most important part of Education.

"Of course, there are many kinds of amusement, varying according to the degree of moral and intellectual culture of those taking part in them. There are the low amusements of the gross and the uneducated, whom society has allowed to grow up in its midst, with minds untrained and untaught, with tastes unrefined by intercourse with art or letters, and who are narrowed in all their sources of pleasure and enjoyment. To these the brutal exhibition of a dog-fight or a public execution affords the only opportunity for a saturnalia of enjoyment—an enjoyment which is level with the meanest capacity, and no other.

"How different the amusements of the intelligent and refined—such as an intercourse with the beauties of nature, a ramble through a beautiful country full of historic associations, a concert of exquisite music, a picture exhibition, a soirée, an agreeable book, or an evening's delightful conversation with intelligent persons. Then, there are the out-of-doors amusements; the manly games, of which the healthful game of cricket is one of the most cheerful and exciting.

"The occupations of a very large portion of our town population are sedentary and unwholesome, and require, for health's sake, a frequent relaxation in games of this latter sort, which bring a man's muscles into action, and healthfully excite all the organic functions of the system. What is better calculated to blow away the vapours from the brain, and to give a thorough fresh-airing to the blood, than the breeze blowing across the heath, while the cricketer is actively engaged in batting, balling, fielding, and the other exercises of the game? Every muscle is put in action: he must run, and ply his limbs actively, the use of which, while sitting at his city desk, he had well nigh forgotten. He must be all alive—he makes the green carpet of turf fly from under him, while the welcome breeze plays around his head. He is cheerful and full of good-humour; care and anxiety are banished; and lumbago, head-ache, or gout is driven further from him in every run that he takes. He goes to bed well-tired, and then enjoys the profound and refreshing slumber which he has earned on the cricket-ground; rising in the morning clear-headed, and renovated in health and strength.

"It is a mistake to suppose that the man who plays at cricket, or who otherwise amuses himself in active exercise during the intervals of business, is wasting his time. Amusement is not waste of time, but rather economy of life. Relax frequently, if you would enjoy good health during a longer period of existence. If you relax not, and take no amusement—that is, if your calling should not itself be a constant exercise—then you will mentally suffer, in the pangs of indigestion, in weak and unhealthy lungs, in colds and rheumatisms, and in all the penalties which attend confinement and sedentary occupation.

"Man has a strong natural appetite for relaxation and amusement, and, like all other natural appetites, this has been implanted in us for a wise purpose. It is not to be repressed, but will break out in one form or other. If we provide not the opportunity for enjoying wholesome amusements, men will certainly find out vicious ones for themselves.

"There are, we believe, some people in the world who, under mistaken notions, would, if they had the power, hang the heavens about with crape; pick the bright stars from the sky; veil the sun with clouds, because of his shining too merrily on the gay green earth; and pluck the silver moon from her place in the firmament, no more to brighten the young wooers who laughed and loved under her beams; or throw a shroud on the beautiful and life-heaving bosom of this fair planet; shut up our gardens and fields, and all the sweet flowers with which they are bedecked, and doom our world to an atmosphere of gloom and cheerlessness. But there is no reason nor morality in this, and still less religion. A benevolent Creator has endowed man with an eminent capacity for enjoyment, set him in a fair and lovely world, surrounded him with things good and beautiful, and given him the disposition to love, to sympathize, to produce, to co-operate, to enjoy; and thus become an honourable and a happy being, bringing God's work to perfection, and suiting the divine creation in the midst of which he lives.

Who knows not that the heart of man is greatly influenced by the moral atmosphere which he breathes; and that he is disposed to an affinity with the good, very much in proportion as his spirits are kept in that genial tone which their due relaxation promotes. Make a man happy, and his actions will be happy too; but doom him to dismal thoughts and miserable circumstances, and you make him gloomy, discontented, morose, and probably vicious. Hence coarseness and crime are almost invariably found among those who have never been accustomed to be cheerful, whose hearts have been shut against the purifying influences of a happy communion with nature, or an enlightened and cheerful intercourse with man.

And yet all, even the meanest of human beings (if any human being can be mean), possess the sense to discern, and the heart to love and even reverence beauty in all its forms. Why should not some care be taken, then, to cultivate a taste for the beautiful in art and nature among all ranks in the community? Why should not this means be adopted of unfolding the noble powers and affections of men? Why should not the fields and the gardens be thrown freely open to the classes who now waste their long hours in consuming toil, cut off from all higher pleasures, and impelled too often by the strong love of excitement, to seek a deceitful solace in sensual excess, after escaping from the burden of their daily care and labour? Above all, why should not Music be made a lightener of toil, a cheerer of social intercourse, a relief of loneliness, and a means of solace even in the poorest dwellings?

"'Regarded as a refined pleasure,' says Channing 'Music has a most favourable bearing on public morals. Let taste and skill in this beautiful art be spread among us, and every family will have a new resource; home will gain a new attraction; social intercourse will be more cheerful; and an innocent public amusement will be furnished to the community. Public amusements, bringing multitudes together, to kindle with one emotion, to share the same innocent joy, have a humanizing influence; and among these bonds of society, perhaps no one produces so much unmixed good as music. What a fulness of enjoyment has our Creator placed within our reach, by surrounding us with an atmosphere which may be shaped into sweet sounds! And yet this goodness is almost lost upon us, through want of culture of the organ by which this provision is to be enjoyed.'

"The improvement of the character of our popular amusements is a subject, we believe, well worthy the attention of our temperance reformers. Perhaps they do not sufficiently consider how much intemperance is the result of gross and uncultivated tastes, and of the too limited opportunities which exist in this country for obtaining access to amusements of an innocent and improving tendency. The workman's tastes have been allowed to remain uncultivated; present wants engross his thoughts; the gratification of his appetites is his highest pleasure; and when he relaxes, it is too often in indulgence in intoxicating stimulants. In the beer-house he finds comfort; there is a bright fire and clean hearth, contrasting strongly, perhaps, with his own uncomfortable home. Here he joins in merry talk with his fellows; he discusses the topics of the day, or the news of the neighbourhood. He thus learns to talk, to argue, and to measure wits with others. He acquires the habit of frequenting the public-house, for no other public place is open to him. There are few or no public galleries of art open to the poor. There are few or no cheap amusements, nor rooms for rational enjoyment and recreation; and until the people at large are furnished with such means of rational, healthy, and exhilarating enjoyment, we fear public-houses will continue to be frequented as now, and intemperance prevail in its grosser forms.

"Men cannot be expected to spend their whole time in labour, going home merely to eat and sleep. There must be intervals of relaxation. Picture galleries, museums of art, concerts, gardens, exhibitions, theatres—all are better than the gin-palace and the public-house. Possibly we may only be giving a more concentrated form to vice, by frowning down in a pharisaic way those popular amusements. There was some time ago a kind of crusade against music licenses, originated by a belief amongst the respectable classes, that every assembly of the working class for singing and dancing, must, of necessity, be a scene of vice. To a certain extent they may be so; for, when innocent pleasures are forbidden by public morality, and repressed by law, these very pleasures become poisoned fountains. It is the prohibition, not the indulgence, which creates the vice.

"No such objections, however, can be taken to the cultivation of a popular taste for music. Father Mathew, very properly, followed up his temperance movement by a singing movement. He promoted the establishment of musical clubs all over Ireland; for he felt that, as he had taken the people's whiskey from them, he must give some wholesome stimulus in its stead—and he gave them Music. Having taken away a mischievous pleasure, it was necessary to give a wholesome one; and Music was found to be the very thing wanted. Singing classes were established, to refine the taste, soften the manners, and humanize the mass of the people. As a means towards this end, we believe that nothing is superior.

"We should like to see galleries of art also thrown open freely to the people. Accustom them to the sight of beautiful objects, and in course of time they will learn to understand them; their tastes will be educated, and their respect for genius excited. The exhibitions of Mechanics' Institutes, which, some years ago, took place throughout the provincial towns, were a good beginning, and we should like to see them repeated. Some of the most liberal and public-spirited members of the aristocracy are at present opening their fine picture galleries freely to the public; among others, the Duke of Devonshire is allowing immense numbers of the working classes to inspect his magnificent collections of painting and statuary at Chatsworth; and railway trips for the purpose are got up at Bradford, Leeds, Sheffield, and others of the smoky towns of Yorkshire. The conduct of the working men, on these occasions, does equal justice to their manners and their intelligence. Let all such means of wholesome amusement be encouraged, and we shall shortly find foreign observers giving a much better account, than they can give at present, of the character, manners, and intelligence of the mass of the English people."

[The above admirable paper is from Eliza Cook's Journal. Differences of opinion may exist among temperance reformers, as to what amusements are lawful and desirable. As a general rule, such as tend to improve the health without depraving the morals, and to brace and purify the mind in relaxation, without giving a distaste for the stern yet wholesome demands of duty and obligation. RECREATION is the proper name for all amusement strictly useful. Man was sent into the world, not to spend the energies of an immortal mind in giddiness and frivolity, but to work for the happiness and advancement of the race, and for the honour of the God who made him. Amusement, therefore, which recreates, refreshes, energizes the man, in body and mind, for the work to which duty summons him, is that which every man needs—that which may be innocently and usefully enjoyed—and that which we urge temperance reformers, as far as possible to supply.—EDITOR.]

Reviews.

The Moral Reformer's Almanac, a Manual of Advancement and Civilization for 1850. Edited by EDWIN PAXTON HOOD. pp. 64. London: C. GILPIN.

The Temperance Almanack for 1850. pp. 27. London: B. L. GREEN.

Both admirable publications, not rivals, but fellow-helpers in social advancement. The former embraces in its interesting paragraphs, original and select, the subjects of capital punishment, anti-slavery, peace, temperance, &c. The latter is a teetotalers almanac. No member can have it in daily use and forget his pledge, and no advocate can refresh his mind with its useful and interesting matter without improving himself and thus advancing the cause. If any should be in doubt which to prefer, our advice is to follow the example of the Bishop of Bath and Wells and choose baath. The astonishing cheapness of these useful publications will enable any one to adopt our advice without effort, as the two will not cost sixpence, and will furnish gems of thought and facts of importance well worth a sovereign.

The People's Abstinence Standard. London: W. TWEEDIE.

A new advocate of our good cause, published weekly, at a small charge. We cordially wish it success.

British Folly, or the Patchwork Institutions of Great Britain. By a Clergyman of the Church of England. pp. 20. London: WERTHEM & Co.

A spirited pamphlet on the enormous sacrifice of money in the drinking cause, compared with the tardy and reluctant contributions for charitable purposes. It is "addressed to thinking people," and to such we cordially recommend it.

WISE MEN.—In Lewis and Clark's Travels among the Indians, is the following anecdote of the native good sense and virtue of the tribe of Ricaras. At the time it occurred, the value of the example was not practically appreciated by the civilized Americans, but in this day of temperance organization and practice, it will be felt. "We are gratified," say the travellers, "at discovering that these Ricaras made use of no spirituous liquors of any kind; the example of the traders who bring it to them, so far from tempting, having in fact disgusted them. Supposing that it was as agreeable to them as to the other Indians, we at first offered them whisky; but they refused it with this sensible remark, 'that they were surprised that their fathers should present to them a liquor which would make them fools.' On another occasion, they observed to M. Tabeau, 'that no man could be a friend who tried to lead them into such follies.'—Canada Temperance Advocate.

All communications to be addressed to the Editor, 11, Tokenhouse Yard, London.

To LOCAL SOCIETIES.—We should be obliged by our friends the secretaries of local societies, furnishing us with their names and addresses, and the names of the societies with which they are connected. This request is made that an accurate registration of all societies connected with the temperance movement throughout the kingdom may be made, and as a step towards ascertaining the position and influence of the cause. Those societies which are in connexion with existing Associations—the British—the Central—the Scottish League—will be kind enough to specify it.

THE PRIZE ESSAY.

We have pleasure in informing our readers that the prize of £10. for the best Essay on the "Management of Temperance Societies," has been adjudicated to Mr. D. G. Paine of Deptford. His Essay which is entitled "Scaffolding for Teetotal Societies, or How to Reach the Top-stone of the Temperance Reformation," is in the press, and will shortly be attainable at our publishers. It is scarcely necessary to urge all Societies to give it a vigorous circulation.

TEMPERANCE SERMONS.

We have great pleasure in informing our friends, that the following Sermons will be preached during the month of December.

On Sunday evening, December 9th, at Stepney Meeting-house, by the Rev. John Kennedy, M. A., Subject—"Intemperance."

On Sunday evening, December 23rd, at the Borough Road Chapel, by the Rev. Asa Mahan, M.A., President of Oberlin College, Ohio. Subject—"The influence of the Temperance movement, in promoting the salvation of souls, and extending the kingdom of Christ."

The services commence at half-past six, P. M., and all classes are respectfully invited to attend.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.

The Editor begs to acknowledge the following donations:—For the Widow of James Morris, from J. M. W. 0 10 0

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

We have much pleasure in stating that Mr. Cornelius Newcombe has been appointed Secretary to the Central Temperance Association, vice, Mr. Wakelin resigned. We congratulate our friends upon having secured the services of one so eminently qualified for the office; and would express the hope that his labours may be as successful in his new position, as they were while Secretary of the Coventry Temperance Society.—Communicated.

EXTRAORDINARY CASE.

(From The Times, November 2nd.)

Yesterday morning Mr. T. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest on the body of Mr. Thomas Morton, an eminent member of the medical profession. The jury assembled at the house of the deceased, No. 7, Woburn-place, Russell-square, and having been sworn, proceeded to view the body, which was that of a well-proportioned good-looking man, of 36 years of age.

From the testimony of the medical gentlemen who conducted the post mortem examination, it appeared that the unfortunate man died from the influence of prussic acid. Among his papers various memoranda were found of which the following is a specimen:—"Never take beer or wine in the morning. Let me never exceed my quantum under any circumstances. Never take wine and beer together. Two glasses of wine are quite enough for the twenty-four hours. Rise early from table. Do not be in too great a hurry to get rich. Always be doing some good and useful work. Don't dwell on unpleasant affairs. Laugh and be cheerful. When things go wrong laugh and be cheerful. Remember the happy lightsomeness of a water drinker."

Other memoranda repeatedly inculcated rules to be observed—to avoid drinking beer or wine, and specified a determination to avoid either. They said—"I fail from want of sufficient firmness, and from running into temptation to try myself; also from an opinion that I can stand a good deal of beer." Another concluded with these words—"Let me not forget my dreadful sufferings in the morning, after taking two or three pints of ale (delirium tremens.)" Another said—"To pray night and morning to be strong against temptation; avoid going to taverns and oyster shops for beer." An old memorandum said—"It is the system of 'Well, one glass more,' which breaks a man down. Regular attention to business will enable a man to get through his work. Let me remember my dreadful sufferings in the morning—lowness—suicidal feelings—despondency—gloomy thoughts—pulse 100 to 120—limbs tremulous—pains about the heart—flatulence—eructation—incapacity for duty—irritable temper."

These memoranda afford grounds for grave consideration. The deceased is declared by intimate friends to have been a most temperate man, indeed exceedingly abstemious. But that he had with more or less frequency practised secret intoxication no reasonable doubt can exist. Whether the practice was superinduced by the mortifications of his professional career, or whether indulgence was the cause of the vexations which, in view of those circumstances, afflicted him; the warnings are equally important. They bid us abstain. The excitement produced by the fiery stimulant, alcohol; prepared the way for the more deadly poison, prussic acid. Habitual and persevering abstinence from the one, would in all probability have saved this eminent man from the administration of the other.

The jury of course declared the deceased "in an unsound mind." What could they else? But is not every man insane when under the influence of intoxicating drink? Drunkenness is a state of temporary insanity—and frequent repetition produces perpetual derangement. Such a case loudly demands the abolition of this horrible scourge—this social pest—this most powerful satanic temptation—alcoholic drink. These are its proper fruits. To such results it is always tending, and only extreme caution in handling this poisonous serpent prevents all who cherish it from perishing by its bite.—EDITOR N. T. C.

CHOLERA AND COLD WATER.

WE do not profess to intrude into the province of the medical profession—to adjust the disputes of homœopathsists and allopathsists—nor to pledge ourselves to the belief in hydropathy as a branch of the healing art. But the following paper appears to be so important, as embodying the opinion of a distinguished man, that we submit it for consideration to all whom it may concern. It may be remarked, however, that should hydropathy ever succeed in pushing itself into universal or very general adoption, it will be another most beautiful illustration of Divine wisdom, in compassing several important ends by one simple arrangement. The beverage which nature provides for man's daily wants, now claims to possess powerful healing virtues for most of "the ills which flesh is heir to."

Pressnitz recommends the following treatment in cases of cholera; it has appeared in the German papers, and been printed for circulation.

"In the year 1831, I applied the following treatment to cholera patients with the best results:—one or two abreibungen; if much pain in the body a clyster of perfectly cold water; a sitz bath, water 6 to 8 degrees of Reaumer; copious water drinking to promote vomiting; remain in the sitz bath till the vomiting and diarrhœa have ceased. If there is much cramp several abreibungen should be taken in succession, five minutes each, with the dry and wet sheet. Bind an umslag round the body and go to bed; on awakening, a tepid bath 11 to 12 degrees Reaumer; fresh air should be freely admitted to the room; eat cold victuals, but on no account meat. The bath-man has nothing to fear from contagion, and cholera treated in this manner is not at all dangerous, and can generally be cured in a few hours without after pains.

A cold wet bandage worn round the body with a dry one over it, and re-wetted so often as it gets dry; washing the body all over, morning and evening, in cold water; drinking two or three tumblers of cold water when fasting and at meals; is a great preservative against cholera and laxness of bowels. No hot food or drinks on any account allowed.

Abreibung, is a large linen sheet, wrung out in cold water, thrown over the whole body and head, in which you must be rubbed for some minutes by yourself and the bath-man; a similar one, dry, is then used and rubbed for a few minutes; when nearly dry, flap the sheet about the body, so as to make the air act upon the skin; this flapping is called an air bath.

Umslag, is a linen about 6 feet long and 1 foot wide, wrung out half the length in cold water: wind it round the body, the dry end the last over the wet.

Sitz bath, is the common hip bath.

On this subject, the following cases have been furnished by a temperance friend in London, and being well authenticated, and on a subject of painful interest, are presented to the attention of our readers. We sincerely hope that all necessity for putting any remedial processes to the test in this awful disease will soon cease, and that such precautionary arrangements may be generally adopted, as may ward off any future attacks.

No. 1.

I was attacked, about the last week in July, with diarrhœa, which continued for a month with increasing severity. I was then attacked with cramp in the bowels, attended with vomiting. I had, hitherto, resorted to no remedial measures; the matter now becoming serious I left my employment and went home. I first washed myself with soap and water from head to foot, continuing till the sickness and cramp abated; I then took a sitz bath for thirty-five minutes, the water being changed three times. I then had three wet sheets, the two first an hour each, and the third two hours; I went to sleep in the last sheet and a profuse perspiration came on; on coming out of the sheet I was well rubbed in a cold bath five minutes. During the entire process I drank cold water freely—about two gallons. After the cold bath all the bad symptoms entirely ceased—the cure was most satisfactorily complete—and I have since had no return.

No. 2.

One morning, the first week in September, an engineer was going to Stratford; in crossing Victoria Park, he was overtaken by a smart shower and got wet through. He was immediately seized with a sense of itching in the neck, then in the arms and thighs; he began to swell all over; sickness and cramp, came on severely, so that his flesh turned black and was drawn up in knots on the arms, legs, and in the body. He managed to get by some means to a friend's house at Old Ford. He immediately stripped off his clothing, and assisted by his friend, with a towel and vigorous rubbing, he applied water to the entire skin. In an incredibly short space of time the blackness gradually left the skin, the sickness was subdued, the cramp gradually subsided, and the knots dispersed. He left the house in less than an hour from his arrival, perfectly cured. The man can be produced, and the fact can be attested by competent witnesses.

CONGREGATIONAL TEETOTALISM.

To the Editor of the National Temperance Chronicle.

On Monday evening, November 12th, the members and friends of the "Association for the diffusion of total abstinence information in the Church," took tea in the Fitzroy Temperance Hall, in commemoration of its third anniversary. Nearly 100 persons sat down to the social feast, after which a meeting was held, Mr. Roberts, Treasurer of the Association, presiding; having sung a temperance hymn, Mr. Carson, of the City Mission, supplicated a blessing.

The chairman in a few pointed remarks, having spoke of the perpetuation of the drinking system, depending, in a great measure, on the position and practice of professing Christians, called on the Secretary to read the report, which stated the origin of the Association to have been a result of the World's Temperance Convention. The operations of the Society chiefly were confined to the circulation of tracts among the attendants at the house of God.

Among other encouraging circumstances narrated, was the following:—a Christian man, through the perusal of one of the tracts, became an abstainer; shortly after he visited his native town, carrying the tract with him, which was made the means in leading several to pay attention to the subject of temperance, and of inducing a maltster to give up his occupation from conscientious convictions. Nearly 10,000 tracts, including pamphlets, had been distributed during the twelve months; the report concluding with an appeal to all classes of professing Christians, to give that attention to the question which the wide-spread and continued ravages of strong drink in the world and in the church demanded.

Mr. G. Campbell then addressed the meeting, and in a clear compact argument supported by fact, demonstrated that while Sabbath-schools and Missionary Societies might severally be injured by drinking, it was not possible for them to be benefited by it; and on the other hand, each of these might be benefited by those connected with them becoming abstainers, and could not possibly be injured. The object of teetotalers was not to put teetotalism in the place of Sabbath-schools, or of Missionary Societies, or of the Gospel, but in the place of drinking; so that the question was not whether teetotalism be better than either of these, or any other mode of Christian operation, but is teetotalism better than drinking?

Mr. Mann, in the course of a powerful impressive speech, referred to the position of usefulness a Christian who was an abstainer occupied distinct from those who were not, and advanced the following fact:—a man had several times been cut off from the church in consequence of drink, his wife applied to an officer in the church to visit him, urging that if he would make her husband a teetotaler, all might be well; not being a total abstainer, his conscience would not permit of his enforcing what he did not conform to; he therefore, thought that he had opportunity for Christian usefulness, which it was impossible those who drank strong drinks could have.

The Rev. W. Morton stated several cases of individuals who had occupied high and influential stations, losing property and character through drink. In an appeal to mothers, he showed the education given in childhood to be the implanting of principles which would grow with their growth, illustrating this by the manner in which idolatry was perpetuated in India, the mothers taking their children from the earliest period to the shrine of the idol gods, and instructing them in the obscenity and follies connected with that devotion, to which afterward they become desperately attached.

The hymn of dismissal was then sung, and this delightful and refreshing meeting concluded.

A. S. D.

INTEMPERANCE.—On Saturday evening, July 28th, a young man, lately from Ireland, came to Port Credit, by the steamer Eclipse, in a state of intoxication. He went up to the tavern, and after treating a man who helped him to carry his trunk, returned again to the pier, and either fell or leaped into the water and was drowned. His body was obtained in about an hour, and after the usual proceedings, consigned to the silent grave.—Toronto Messenger.

Temperance Operations.

CHESTERFIELD.

We are happy to hear that the teetotalers of Chesterfield, are not unmindful of their obligations, to that estimable friend of temperance, W. Bingham, Esq. This gentleman has made considerable sacrifices for the sake of principle. The room in which the meetings are held was formerly a malthouse, and was converted into a hall for meeting by Mr. B., who has allowed the use of it for some years free of expense. The temperance men determined to testify their gratitude by an appropriate testimonial, which was presented on the re-opening of the rooms which have recently been enlarged.

The following account of the interesting circumstance has been kindly forwarded to us.

Mr. Bingham took the chair as usual and called on an old Scotchman, who spoke a short time; after George Hewitt of Leeds, and William Saunders had spoken, Mr. Cutts rose, and in a neat address said, he had the honour of presenting a teapot, salver, and cream-jug, from the teetotalers of Chesterfield and Brampton, as a testimonial of their esteem of Mr. Bingham, and on Mr. C. resuming his seat, a deathlike stillness prevailed. Mr. B., sat some minutes quite overcome by the intensity of his feelings with his head resting on his hand. Mind appeared to influence mind, and no sound was heard but the deep drawn sigh, and all seemed fixed as statues. Mr. B. at length arose and stood some minutes prior to being able to give utterance to thought. When he tried to speak his lips quivered and rushing tears prevented him, at last he conquered and replied, deeply impressing his audience, and by the manner of receiving the testimonial calling forth fresh feelings of admiration and esteem.

The inscription on the teapot was—"Presented to William Bingham, Esq., by the teetotalers of Chesterfield and Brampton, as a testimonial of their high esteem of his benevolent and philanthropic character."

When Mr. Bingham had resumed his seat, Mr. Cutts again rose, and said that he had another testimonial to offer;—not from the temperance society, but from a teetotal girl, and addressing Mrs. Bingham, presented to her a very neat pin-cushion, made of white silk. Mrs. B. replied and said, "that she hoped that this mark of esteem would pin her more closely to the temperance cause."

The Scriptures teach that honour should be given to whom it is due, and they who labour and spend for the welfare of man, deserve the expression of human gratitude, though they do not seek it, and are overwhelmed when it so unexpectedly and so heartily appears.

BURNLEY.

Dr. Grindrod commenced his course of physiological lectures in Burnley, on Tuesday week, in the Court-house, which was granted by the magistrates for the occasion. The audience was very crowded and highly respectable. The lecture occupied about two hours and a half in its delivery, and was received with frequent expressions of applause. James Simpson, Esq., of Foxhill Bank, occupied the chair.

On Thursday evening, the 1st inst., Dr. Grindrod delivered the second lecture of the course in the Court-house; Mr. Clegg, sen., churchwarden of the Cathedral Church, Manchester, in the chair. The large building was crowded to excess by a highly respectable auditory, and the greatest degree of enthusiasm prevailed throughout the entire proceedings. At the conclusion of the lecture, numerous questions were put to the lecturer and answered from time to time. A vote of thanks having been passed to the chairman, he made an effective address in behalf of total abstinence. The third lecture was delivered on Monday evening last.

The success of Dr. Grindrod's visit has been so great that in two lectures, the committee have been enabled to meet all expenses, to pay off an old debt, and to reserve a fund for future efforts. A strong impression has been produced on the public mind in favour of the views and principles of the lecturer.

Dr. Grindrod was induced to deliver a fourth and additional lecture on Thursday evening, to which young persons from eight years of age to sixteen were admitted free. The audience was numerous and attentive.

SUFFOLK TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The first annual meeting of this Association was held on Wednesday, the 14th instant, at Ipswich. The proceedings commenced at 10 o'clock, A.M., with the delegates from the local societies, assembling at the house of the Secretary, for the transaction of business, which was amicably conducted, and closed shortly after 2 o'clock.

In the evening, about 230 partook of tea in the Temperance Hall, which, considering the very unfavourable state of the weather, was more than might have been expected.

At 7 o'clock, W. D. Sims, Esq., took the chair, and after some appropriate introductory remarks, called upon the Secretary, the Rev. A. W. Heritage, to read the report, which was a very interesting and encouraging document, showing that 162 meetings had been held during the year, for the diffusion of the principles of total abstinence in Ipswich, and other localities in the counties of Suffolk and Essex—that great attention had been given to the general organization of the district, with a view to the future efficiency of the Association. There was also much cheering information, indicative of the growth of our principles in the public mind, and assuring us of the ultimate triumph of truth and sobriety in these counties.

The meeting was addressed by R. Charlton, Esq., of Bristol, Rev. I. Duxsey, of the National Temperance Society, Mr. Steele, a farmer from Walton, and one or two other friends; after which the company separated, highly gratified.

J. ASHDOWN,

Secretary of the Haldleigh Temperance Society.

HAWKSTONE HALL.

SIR,—I have great pleasure to inform the temperance public through your Chronicle that the large Hall in the Waterloo Road, Lambeth, is again opened for the advocacy of teetotalism, under the name of Hawkstone Hall, that name being given to it in consequence of the schools held there in commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Rowland Hill, and Hawkstone Hall being the birth-place of that venerable man. The first meeting was held on the evening of October 19th, when the President, Rev. James Sherman, took the chair. Long before the time announced, a large crowd of persons were waiting to obtain admission; and soon after the doors were opened, the place was overflowing with a highly respectable and intelligent audience. The chairman delivered a very effective address, and was followed by the Rev. Mr. Pennington of New York, Dr. Burns, John Cassell, Esq., and Mr. Isaac Duxsey; and the best proof of the effectiveness of their speeches is seen when it is told that forty signatures were taken.

On the following week Rev. W. W. Robinson of Chelsea, presided. Messrs. J. N. Lee, and T. A. Smith, took part in the proceedings.

November 2nd, Benjamin Rotch, Esq., took the chair. Mr. D. G. Paine of Deptford, and Mr. Mann of Paddington, spoke to a packed meeting; the speeches produced a marked impression.

November 9th, Dr. Lovell presided, the Hall was quite full. Mr. Burt of Poplar, Rev. G. W. McCree of Bloomsbury Chapel, were the speakers.

Tuesday, November 13th, Dr. F. R. Lees, delivered one of his splendid lectures to a meeting highly respectable, enthusiastic, and intelligent, the lecturer was listened to throughout his discourse for two hours, with almost breathless attention, and concluded amidst loud cheering, between eighty and ninety pledges were taken at the five meetings.

Allow me to inform you that the Hall is opened every Tuesday, at half-past seven, chair taken at eight precisely. We publish a large bill for every month, naming the chairman and speakers with the topics to which they speak. We have a missionary, Mr. James McBain, who visits all those who sign the declaration. If this should meet the eye of any wealthy friend of the cause, we promise him if he will assist us, to lay out the money in a way that shall answer the end desired. Yours truly, G. CAMPBELL.

FARRINGTON TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The twelfth anniversary of this society was held at the Mechanics Institution on Monday evening, November 19th. The chair was taken by George Cruikshank, Esq., and the meeting addressed by Messrs. Philp, T. B. Smithies, Smyth, from Canada, Isaac Doxsey, G. W. McCree, and J. H. Esterbrooke.

The annual festival of this Society will be held on Thursday, 27th December, in the School-rooms at Harp Alley, when B. Rotch, Esq., has kindly consented to preside.

SEVEN DIALS.

On Sunday evening, November 18th, the Rev. G. W. McCree preached in the Temperance Hall, Seven Dials. His subject was "Drunkness and its Results," and the text Proverbs xxiii. 29-32. A large audience attended, and at the close of the discourse two young men—both of them drunkards—signed the pledge.

PEMBURY GROVE, HACKNEY.

A course of three lectures has been delivered on the 23rd, 24th, and 31st October, at Pembury Grove Chapel, Hackney, upon the following subjects. The accordance of "Teetotalism" with the authorised version of the Scriptures, as a principle, a doctrine, and a system. On the wines of Scripture, with reference to the original Hebrew and Greek. The use of intoxicating wine at the Passover, or Lord's Supper, a violation of the letter and spirit of the Old and New Testament. It was proposed by the Rev. H. Robinson, minister of the chapel, seconded by Mr. R., senior deacon, and carried unanimously, "That the cordial thanks of this meeting be presented to the highly esteemed and talented lecturer, Dr. F. R. Lees, for the singularly clear, convincing, and eloquent manner in which the varied propositions in the lectures just referred to, were laid down, illustrated, and enforced. Also, that this meeting would express as its opinion, that we may confidently challenge the whole world to controvert the conclusion that teetotalism is a principle and doctrine of truth. Further, this meeting expresses as its belief that the principle of true 'temperance' cannot be more effectually promulgated and defended than by causing the delivery throughout the length and breadth of the land of such lectures as those herein referred to. And in conclusion this meeting would prayerfully hope it may please God, that the valuable life of Dr. Lees, may be continued yet many years to reap freely of the fruits of his Christian, manly, dignified, self-denying, and self-sacrificing advocacy of that part of Divine truth now clearly and distinctly recognised in the principle of 'teetotalism.'"

THOMAS MANTON, Secretary.

TEMPERANCE ALMANACK for 1850.

In addition to the Calendar and other matters usually found in Almanacks, it contains much statistical information in connexion with the formation of Temperance Societies, and original articles on the following subjects:—Temperance promotes health and longevity, intellectual vigour, industry, domestic comfort, moral conduct, respectability, usefulness, forethought, independence, political freedom, religion, and national prosperity. Also,
The Contrast, with an engraving; Temperance Poetry ;
Cost of the Drinking System ; Farewell to the Bottle ;
Medical, Ministerial, and Employers' Certificates ; Tee-total Budget ; Claims of Abstinence on the Christian ;
The Good Time Coming ; &c., &c.—The whole forming a rich treat for teetotalers, and a source of valuable information as to the principle of Total Abstinence.
