any offensive sense—to urge the Government to take this question, which, as he says, cannot be dealt with by private, unofficial members, into their own hands, and to bring it forward from this bench, which will be a great advance. That is quite true. I do believe the conditions of the House have been such for many years past, that it has been almost impossible at the end of a Session to hope that anything could be done except by the help or by the direct action of the Administration. As the House will recollect, the members of the Government voted some in one lobby and some in the other. It was not then, it is not now, in any sense a party question, and I hope it will never become a party question. In a matter of this nature, in which the public are so much interested, in which the morals of the country are so greatly interested, it would be a great misfortune that party spirit should enter into it, and mar the great work which it may be possible for Parliament to accomplish. I say the resolution of last year did not bind the Government at all; it was merely an expression of opinion on the part of the House; and, although my hon. friend has taken out of the resolution words to which objection has been taken, I am sure that in asking the House to re-affirm the resolution of last year, he does not mean more than to bring a certain pressure to bear on the Government, and to induce them, perhaps at an earlier period than they otherwise would, to introduce some measure upon this difficult question. But carrying a resolution is a very small matter indeed compared with carrying a Bill through all its stages. My hon. friend shrinks from engaging in what we all know would be an almost if not an entirely impossible task. The session is already blocked up by a measure of extraordinary urgency and importance. We have as much to do this session as can be done, and if that great measure be passed it may be that very little else may be done, and some efforts to pass other measures may end in total failure. Though nothing may be done by the Government or by the House this session, I may say for the consolation of the hon. baronet that the question continually grows, and this growth holds out to him a promise of future result. There are two difficulties in the way of a Government dealing with this question. Any Government Bill would meet with considerable obstacles. If it did not give power to suppress the traffic in liquor, but only gave power within limits to control it, I am not quite sure that we should have the earnest and cordial support of the hon. member for Carlisle. In the time that may elapse between now and the introduction of a Government Bill I hope he will in some degree, if not change, at least moderate his views, so that the force behind him may support a Government honestly attempting to deal with this question. The other difficulty is the question of compensation for the suppression of a public-house in case there had been no breach of the law. I gather almost from what the hon. baronet said, that he would not hold it absolutely wrong if Parliament did provide some mode by which men now in lawful business should not be deprived of it without some sort of compensation. (Cheers.) These are two points on which I take it any Bill brought in by any Government would probably differ from that of my hon. friend; and I should regret very much if he felt himself bound the moment a Bill founded on his resolution was brought in, to say it was a measure he would not by any means accept or support. If we are to pass this resolution, it will be another step in advance; we shall be gradually coming to something more like unanimity, and possibly approaching a state of opinion which may facilitate legislation at no distant time. There are several grave questions that are blocking the way. Hon. members are acquainted with a metaphor attributed to me, but really borrowed from my old friend, Colonel Perronet Thompson, who said you could not get six or twelve omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar. We are just in that position now with the great questions to which we are urged to give our attention. There is the question of the land laws with which my hon. friend (Mr. W. Fowler) dealt the other night. There is that other question on which the Liberal party, with scarcely any exception, are united, and which I believe will find support from many gentlemen opposite—the question of the extension of the county franchise. (Hear, hear.) Then there is the question of the redistribution of Parliamentary seats, which I hope will meet with general support. There is also another question which is pressing very much, and that is the question of the municipal government of this great city of four millions of people. (Hear, hear.) Ireland itself contains only five millions of people; the metropolis in which we are sitting contains, I understand, four millions, and a greater confusion of government probably never existed in time of peace in any great city of the world. (Cheers and laughter.) These are very great and pressing questions, and some of them, at least, I think, are ripe for the consideration of the House, and for being dealt with by Parliament. Well, if the Government is to make a choice, what choice shall it make? It may be that the question of the drink traffic is one so critical and for which public opinion is so little ripe that it would be injudicious to take it up before the other questions I have mentioned. (Hear, hear.) I will not argue against legislation on the general position of my hon. friend; but I may argue that the passing the resolution of last year and the re-affirming the resolution this year must not be understood as compelling the Administration to take up the question and deal with it. If that be the case and the conclusion to which we come, my hon. friend has no reason to regret or despair. My hon. friend may take comfort in this—that although the Government are not prepared now to introduce or promote any Bill upon the question, the agitation among the people, the discussion of the question going on hereafter, as it has gone on during the last few years, will create a movement of opinion which will not only compel some Government to deal with the question, but is necessary to enable any Government to deal with it in a manner which will be effective and satisfactory. The policy pursued by the Government on this bench last year is the policy it pursues now. The resolution is not a resolution of the Government; the policy of the resolution is not a Government policy. It is a policy upon which every member of the House has a right to form his own opinion, and to act upon it. I hope that, whatever the division may be, it will be a division not influenced by party, but by a consideration of what is suitable to the time, and that its result will be to advance the cause which my hon. friend has at heart. (Cheers.)

Colonel MAKINS said that there was one advantage which the House had derived from the speech of the right hon. gentleman, and that was, it had got a rough draft of the Queen's Speech, not only for next session, but for many sessions to come. But the hon. baronet, the member for Carlisle, would not derive much consolation from the right hon. gentleman, for what he said came to this—that the Government could not help him at all, and that he ought to go on agitating and agitating so as to exercise pressure on some future Administration. For his own part he felt as much the necessity of doing something to put an end to the evils of intemperance as even the eloquent apostle of local option himself. But what he quarrelled with was the hon. baronet's method of dealing with the evil. The natural result of the division of last year was that the hon. baronet should have brought in a Bill embodying his views, and then the Government could have said whether they approved it or not. Hon. members might, therefore, go back to their constituents and say that they had voted in favour of temperance, but they must see the Bill on the subject before they could say whether they should support it or not. As the House appeared to be impatient for a division, he would only add that, feeling as strongly as the hon. baronet the evils of which he complained, he did not think the remedy he proposed was likely to be effective, while it would undoubtedly seriously interfere with the liberty of the subject. (Hear, hear.)

The House then divided, when the numbers were:—
 For the resolution, ... .. 196
 Against, ... .. 154

Majority, ... .. 42

The resolution was therefore carried.

Nothing could better evidence the state of the House of Commons at the present time than contrasting it with its previous condition when discussions on the Permissive Bill or Local Option resolution took place. Like the lasses of Ettrick forest after Flodden field, hon. members seem "lanely, dowie, and wae." The cheery sprightly feeling that used to animate Her Majesty's faithful Commons has given place to a feeling of apprehension which drives pleasure away. The Land Bill like a huge vampire absorbs all vitality from the proceedings of the House. On bye-past sessions the lobby was crowded with strangers urging their various interests on the attention of their representatives, and these were moving hither and thither paying courteous attention to their constituents. This year the Tory squires and aristocracy had not all returned from their Whitsuntide holidays, and of those who had returned the larger portion were at Ascot Races sunning themselves in the radiance of the Court. "Count-outs" are becoming matters of habit. Hon. members are rather sluggish in coming down merely to find the signal of the assembled House on the clock tower of St. Stephen's quenched, and Parliament "Biggared" for the night. The word ran round that a count was one of the likeliest things to happen this evening at nine. But a number of the sympathisers with Sir Wilfrid resolved to form and keep a House. When the Speaker took the chair at nine, Sir Wilfrid immediately rose to face an audience only fair in numbers. The Opposition benches were at first totally deserted, and never were what could be deemed filled; the ministerial side of the House, and under the gangway, furnished the large and appreciative audience which our champion addressed. Year by year Sir Wilfrid grows more serious in his parliamentary utterances; his array of facts was well set forth, and made a deep impression, even the Speaker seeming greatly interested in all he had to say. His witticisms were heartily enjoyed all the more that they were, we think, in due proportion to the earnestness of his address. His speech was well received, only lasting 45 minutes. It appeared as if those in favour of the motion had a common understanding to be brief. Mr. Burt was unusually so, but was as usual impressive. From below the gangway Mr. Samuelson, who has written on drink, vigorously smote the fallacies of preceding speakers, but, to our sorrow, showed as great aversion to the Permissive Bill as its opponents. Mr. Bright rose along with several on both sides, but in respectful deference to the wishes of the House all these gave way. The right hon. gentleman should leave diplomatic speeches to others. He does not shine in halting statements. He was at much pains to show that Government was not committed by the resolution, and that compensation must find a place in any measure dealing with the liquor traffic. He showed that though the Prohibitionists had converted the House, they had not yet converted the Cabinet; but he believed if they went on they would compel some future administration to pass a measure to their liking. Of those who spoke against the motion little need be said. Mr. Daly addressed himself to opposing what Sir Wilfrid did not say, a convenient way of evading the point of his opponent's speech, but scarcely likely to further the cause he has to champion. Capt. Aylmer made a stand in defence of the magistrates, as did also Mr. Hicks; Col. Makins trotted out the old scarecrow of the liberty of the subject, and then came the division. Cheering began as soon as the Clerk handed Sir Wilfrid the paper, and by midnight all was over, another and greater victory adding additional lustre to the efforts of Sir Wilfrid Lawson to free his bleeding country from the evils of the liquor traffic.

THE DIVISION LIST.

The division on the 18th June, 1880, showed that 40 Scotch members voted, and 3 paired in favour of the Local Option resolution, while 5 only voted against it. The members for Scotland affirmed the resolution by 40 votes to 5 or 8 votes to 1. On the 14th ult., Sir Wilfrid moved a resolution asking the Government to deal with the resolution of 1880; this resolution was finally in the following terms:—"That in the opinion of this House it is desirable to give legislative effect to the resolution passed by the House on the 18th day of June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic." The House divided, when 354 members went into the lobby. Of these four were tellers, viz., for the resolution, Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Mr. Burt; against it, Mr. Daly and Capt. Aylmer; 196 voted in favour of the resolution, and 154 against it, showing a substantial majority of 42 in its favour, being 16 more of a majority than the Local Option resolution had a year ago, and that in a House 82 fewer in numbers. The following is the voting as regards COUNTRY:—English votes and pairs—for, 139; against, 159; Welsh for, 20; against, 2; Irish for, 28; against, 22; Scotch for, 43; against, 5. Total for, 230; against, 188. As regards party it is as follows:—In favour—English Liberals, 136; Welsh Liberals, 20; Irish Liberals, 8; Scotch Liberals, 41; Home Rulers, 11; English Conservatives, 3; Welsh do., none; Irish do., 9; Scotch do., 2. Total for 230. Against—English Liberals, 17; Welsh do., 1; Irish do., 3; Scotch do., 1; English Conservatives, 142; Welsh do., 1; Irish do., 4; Home Rulers, 15; Scotch Conservatives, 4. Total against, 188. Majority, 42.

The pairs on the division number 32; this brings the number in favour up to 230, only 15 behind last year, which, when we consider that 82 fewer voted, speaks eloquently in favour of the progress of the principle of Local Option in Parliament. A very significant fact was disclosed with regard to pairs, namely, that those willing to pair for the resolution could not do so, owing to the failure of the whips to get hon. members to pair against the bill. But for this many more would have paired for the resolution.

The voting on the part of members of the Government was most remarkable. Of thirty members having seats in the House of Commons, 20 voted for the resolution, and 5 only against it. This shows 4 to 1 in its favour, a fact deserving remembrance. Of the Cabinet 5 voted on the resolution—4 for and only 1 against; the four in favour were Right Hon. John Bright, Right Hon. W. E. Forster, Right Hon. G. J. Dodson, and Right Hon. J. Goschen. The one against was the Prime Minister!

THE SCOTCH VOTE.

The Scotch vote was virtually the same as last year, —39 voting and 4 pairing in favour of the resolution, and 5 against it. The vote is diminished by 1 and the pairs increased by 1. Scotland is again a magnificent contributor to the majority, giving more than fourfold that tendered by England, Wales, and Ireland. We annex the list of voters and pairs:—

COUNTIES.—For—Ayr (South), Colonel Alexander; Kincardine, Sir George Balfour, K.C.B.; Clackmannan and Kinross, J. B. Balfour (Solicitor-General); Stirling, J. C. Bolton; Fife, Hon. R. Preston Bruce; Argyll, Lord Colin Campbell; Renfrew, A. Crum; Perth, D. Currie; Bute, C. Dalrymple; Roxburgh, Hon. A. R. D. Elliott; Aberdeen (West), Dr. R. Farquharson; Aberdeen (East), Sir A. A. H. Gordon, K.C.B.; Lanark (South), J. G. C. Hamilton; Orkney and Shetland, S. Laing; Linlithgow, P. M'Lagan; Caithness, Sir J. G. T. Sinclair, Bart.; Sutherland, Marquess Stafford; Peebles and Selkirk, C. Tennent, 18. Paired for—Elgin and Nairn, Sir George Macpherson Grant, Bart.; Kirkcubright, Captain J. M. Heron Maxwell, 2; votes and pairs, 20. Against—Haddington, Lord Elcho; Dumbarton, A. O. Ewing; Midlothian, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone; and Wigtown, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., 4; majority for the counties, 16.

Border Burghs, G. O. Trevelyan; Aberdeen, John Webster, LL.D.; Haddington District, Sir David Wedderburn, Bart.; and St. Andrews District, S. Williamson, 20. Paired for—Montrose District, Right Hon. W. E. Baxter; Wick District, John Pender, 2; votes and pairs, 22. Against—Wigtown District, Admiral Right Hon. Sir John C. D. Hay, Bart., 1; majority for the Burghs, 21. Universities.—For—Edinburgh and St. Andrews, Right Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair, 1. Against, none.

There are 56 party constituencies in Scotland, apportioned as follows:—32 counties with 32 members, 22 burghs and groups of burghs with 26 members, and 4 universities with 2 members—total, 56. On the division we analyse, 18 county members voted for, and 2 paired, while only four voted against the resolution, and 8 absented themselves; then 20 burgh members voted and 2 paired for, while 1 only voted against the resolution, and 3 absented themselves. As regards the universities, one hon. member voted and the other absented himself. On no other question relating to Scotland can such a decided expression of opinion be shown. This is the eighth occasion out of thirteen divisions on which Scotland has emphatically declared in favour of her ratepayers having a direct veto on the liquor traffic.

Four Conservatives and one Liberal voted against the resolution, and two Conservatives and 41 Liberals supported it.

All the 5 members of the Government holding Scotch seats voted and paired in favour of the resolution.

While the number of adherents of the principle embodied in Local Option continues to increase on every division, no honourable member who once voted for it has ever been found to vote against it. This cannot be said of those who once supported the publican party. To their credit they have given effect to their altered convictions by recording their votes in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P.

We append the names of the 12 Scotch absentees:—Ayr (North), R. W. Cochrane Partick; Banffshire, R. W. Duff; Berwickshire, E. Marjoribanks; Dumfriesshire, R. Jardine; Dundee, G. Armitstead; Forfar, J. W. Barclay; Glasgow, R. T. Middleton; Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities, Dr. J. A. Campbell; Invernessshire, Donald Cameron; Lanark (North), Sir T. E. Colebrooke, Bart.; Paisley, W. Holms; and Ross and Cromarty, A. Mathieson. It is due to Mr. Armitstead, Mr. Marjoribanks, Mr. Jardine, and Mr. Holms, to state that they were anxious to pair for the resolution, but as adverse pairs could not be got, they could not be paired. Had they been paired, the number taking part would have been 52=47 votes and pairs for, and 5 votes against. One wonders how much nearer unanimity the Government would desire Scotland to be on Local Option.

The following formed the deputation to London in the interests of the resolution:—John Williams, Esq., Wishaw; D. Stenhouse, Esq., Cupar-Fife; J. Winning, Esq., Paisley; John Nisbet, Esq., Edinburgh; R. C. Murray, Esq., and T. L. Selkirk, Esq., Glasgow; Mr. M'Donald Tynecastle; Mr. J. H. Waterston, and R. Mackay. Their energetic efforts materially contributed to maintain the splendid Scotch vote.

WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL.

June 15.—The order for going into committee on the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill was resisted, several hon. members speaking strongly in favour of the exemption of several towns from the operation of the Act. The order was carried by 123 to 29—majority 94. On the division in favour of the second reading the Scotch vote was 27 in favour to none against. On this vote of going into committee, the Scotch vote was 25 for—against, not one. We are glad to see included in the twenty-five Mr. A. O. Ewing, Right Hon. Admiral Hay, Mr. R. W. Cochrane-Patrick, meantime sturdy opponents of Local Option. An attempt to mutilate the Bill by exempting Cardiff from its operation, was defeated by 118 to 27—majority 91. The Scotch vote was 19 against exemption and none for it. Scotland has given noble assistance to the Sunday Closing Bills for Ireland and Wales.

FIFTH GENERAL UNION FOR PRAYER FOR THE ENTIRE AND SPEEDY REMOVAL OF THE TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS AND IN OPIUM.

THE Temperance Prayer Union Society have this year decided that the union for prayer will take place on the week, 4th to 11th December, 1881. They suggest the following subjects for prayer in relation to the

DRINK TRAFFIC.

SABBATH, 4th December.—Confession of the sin of intemperance, by which God is so much dishonoured—multitudes of persons of all classes are still hastening to ruin—with prayer that the causes of the evil may soon disappear. Read Daniel ix. 1-19; Luke xviii. 1-17.

MONDAY, 5th December.—Renewed supplications that the people may soon have the entire control of the liquor traffic, and may rightly use the power when it is obtained. Read Matthew v. 1-16; Psalm lxxviii. 1-8.

TUESDAY, 6th December.—That the fate of those who have fallen victims to intemperance during the past year may lead others who are walking in the paths of the same destroyer to turn without delay from their course of sin and danger. Read Ezekiel xxxiii. 1-16; Psalm vii. 9-17.

WEDNESDAY, 7th December.—That all Agencies and means employed for promoting the temperance reformation may be greatly blessed, and be more and more multiplied. Proverbs iv.; Deuteronomy vi.

THURSDAY, 8th December.—That all who are abstainers, or who may become so, may be true followers of the Saviour, and active workers for the promotion of His glory. Isaiah lv. 6-13; Luke xiii. 23-30.

THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

FRIDAY, 9th December.—Confession of the great guilt in which the British nation is involved in continuing this fatal traffic with China and other nations. Prayer that the eyes of all ranks may be opened to perceive their sin in this matter. Ezra ix. 4-15; Psalm, cxix, 33-40.

SATURDAY, 10th December.—Thanksgiving to God that the deplored opium traffic has again been the subject of discussion in the British Parliament, and that petitions and remonstrances against the evil have been transmitted from the representatives of various churches and societies during the past year. Psalm ciii.; 2 Thessalonians i.

SABBATH, 11th December.—That the Chinese may resist all inducements to the cultivation of the opium plant in their own country, and may universally combine in abolishing the whole traffic. That thus the destruction of human life, which is fearfully extensive, may be arrested; a powerful obstacle to the present and future wellbeing of the people removed, and that the Gospel in its conquering progress, under the Divine Spirit, may more rapidly advance. Isaiah, lxi.; Isaiah lxii.

All who read this, or receive a copy of the tract itself, are requested to send to Lorimer & Gillies, 31 St. Andrew Square, Edinburgh, for copies—8d. per 100, or 10d. per 100, post free, and diligently circulate them. They are also requested to unite in one or more of the meetings for prayer, and also to make the topics suggested the subject of much private supplication.

KILLEARN.—A very gratifying ceremony took place in this village on Saturday, 11th ult., namely, the introduction, by means of fourteen wells, of the Burn of Barrachie water for the use of the villagers. This boon was secured through the generous liberality of a native, Mr. Alexander Buchanan, of Messrs Buchanan Brothers, the eminent confectioners of Glasgow and Manchester. The works cost £700. The water is delicious, the supply equal to 50 gallons a day per head of the population, the motive to aid the temperance cause, which Mr. Buchanan has ever at heart. By this deed he has built himself a lasting name as a benefactor of one of the most lovely villages in Strathendrick.

During the past year the casualties on the Railways of the United Kingdom were 1135 persons killed and 3956 wounded; but there are more than 120,000 slain by drink.

The London correspondent of the Dundee Advertiser understands that a number of the Edinburgh Liberals are in communication with Mr. E. Jenkins with a view to his standing for the city at the next general election.

DROVERS.—The drover’s work must often make him thirsty one would think, and yet, according to the unimpeachable testimony of the police, he is a sober man. Colonel Henderson, speaking last night at the annual dinner of the Drovers’ Benevolent Institution, said he had asked one of his superintendents what was the general character of the men, and his reply was that he had never seen a drunken drover, and the public-houses built round the cattle market were all failures.—Globe.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR CARD EXHIBITION.—A novel exhibition of designs and pictures, suitable for the Christmas and New Year season, is announced to take place in the Gallery of the Society of British Artists, London, in August ensuing. Messrs. Hildesheimer & Faulkner, publishers, 41 Jewin Street, London, E.C., offer for these designs and pictures prizes to the amount of £3500, and expect, by their own additional purchases, to raise this sum to £5000. The judges are Messrs. Frith and Millais, the Royal Academicians, with Mr. Stone, A.R.A. All designs and pictures must be in the gallery by Tuesday, 26th July, 1881. We hope that the first prizes will be obtained by staunch teetotalers.

A circular, of which the following is a copy, was forwarded to every Scottish representative, in view of the debate and division:—“Intoxicating Liquors (Licenses) Resolution—Sir Wilfrid Lawson’s motion, Tuesday, 14th June, 1881.—Right Honourable and Honourable Members are respectfully reminded that on Tuesday next the following resolution will be moved by Sir Wilfrid Lawson:—‘That, in the opinion of this House, the resolution passed by the House on the 18th day of June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic, ought, without delay, to be embodied by the Government in a bill giving effect to the said resolution.’” The House of Commons divided twice in 1880 on Sir Wilfrid Lawson’s resolution. The Scotch vote on each occasion was as follows:—On 5th March, voted and paired, for, 32; against, 7. On 18th June, voted and paired, for, 43; against, 5. On no public question of practical and pressing importance is there at present such substantial unanimity of opinion in Scotland as on this, and the votes referred to are a significant and indisputable proof of it. It seems, therefore, hardly necessary to advance further argument in support of the principle of Local Option, which the House of Commons, twelve months ago, distinctly affirmed. At the same time it is right to state that a widespread impatience has been manifested throughout the country at the delay in giving effect to the resolution. The state of public business may doubtless be pleaded for inaction in reference to this question, on the part of the Government, although numerous measures of minor importance and less urgency have been introduced and discussed. Right honourable and honourable members are earnestly requested to be in their places on Tuesday next, and to support the resolution, in order to strengthen the hands of the Government in giving effect, without delay, to the decision of the House. James Hamilton, J.P., City Treasurer, Glasgow, President; James Torrens, J.P., Glasgow, Chairman of Executive; Thos. Dick, ex-Chief Magistrate, Kinning Park, Vice-Chairman; James L. Selkirk, J.P., Glasgow, Honorary Secretary; Robert M’Callum, Commissioner of Police, Govan, Treasurer; Robert Mackay, Secretary.—Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association; offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, 10th June, 1881.”

POLITICAL ASPECT OF THE TEMPERANCE
REFORMATION.

(Being a Paper read at a Meeting of the Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union.)

BY W. DICKIE.

Scope of the Paper.—It would be impossible to discuss exhaustively the political aspect of the temperance question within the limits of a paper such as I have undertaken to read. All that I can hope to do is to state certain general principles and briefly to present to you some considerations in explanation and support of these principles. I therefore propose to pass over in silence the present licensing laws. Indeed, the time for criticism of them may be said to have passed. Parliament has already pronounced their doom, although it has not yet shaped the substitute for them. Neither will I ask your attention to any of the particular measures which have been proposed as legal palliatives of an evil which, by its universality, has unhappily too well earned the epithet of "national," and the gigantic proportions of which are forcing it upon the attention of statesmen, and of all who take an intelligent interest in the welfare of the people and the prosperity of the country. I believe I shall best secure the object of this paper by addressing myself to the general question, "Is the liquor traffic a proper object of legislative prohibition?" If that question is answered in the affirmative, we will at the same time have made out a case for any measures which, while stopping short of total prohibition, yet proceed on prohibitive lines. And I submit that it should be so answered.

Viscount Sherbrooke's Argument against Prohibition.—In discussing any question, it is an advantage to have the case against you clearly and forcibly stated. I therefore take as the text of this paper a succinct statement by Viscount Sherbrooke of the argument against prohibition. Before his elevation to the peerage, and while sitting in the House of Commons as the representative of London University, Mr. Robert Lowe received a memorial from 269 graduates of that University, asking him to support the Permissive Bill. With characteristic candour, he refused to do so, and with characteristic cogency he gave his reasons for that refusal in the following words:—

"I hold, and am supported in my view by the authority of Adam Smith, that the trade of a retailer of liquor is a useful and necessary trade, especially for the poor, and that the multitude of public-houses is the effect rather than the cause of the taste for intoxicating liquors. Such a trade requires regulation and inspection, but is no fit subject for proscription or extinction. You might as well proscribe the sale of arms because they may be used for the purpose of murder, or of useful medicines because their use in excess may prove deleterious or even fatal.

There is a wide difference between regulating and destroying freedom of action. The former is the legitimate office of Government; the latter is only right when the object is to prevent a specific offence or crime."

Powers and Duties of Government.—As the more convenient course, and also the course most consistent with the rules of logic, I shall deal first with the major proposition here advanced, viz., That the Government has no right to destroy freedom of action, or to prohibit particular trades, unless with the object of preventing a specific offence or crime. I meet this with another general proposition:—

That it is the duty of a Government to adopt efficient measures to protect the lives and property of its subjects. In the discharge of this duty it is called upon not only to punish crime, but to take precautions against its commission, to suppress vice, and to prevent the dissemination of disease; and for these purposes it may, in the exercise of its legitimate functions, impose restraints on individual freedom of action, and prohibit acts or trades not necessarily criminal in themselves, but which are proved, by uniform experience, to be attended with results injurious to the community.

It is not necessary to dwell, by way of proof, on the first part of this proposition. We have abundant proof in the existence of our extensive judicial and criminal establishments, the object of which is the protection of life and property. Neither will I enter into a discussion of the abstract principles of civil liberty. But I shall at once proceed to show by one or two illustrations that the principle which I have laid down has been admitted in the legislation of this country, and is being daily acted upon. Take, first, the case of gambling. There is nothing necessarily criminal in two persons playing together a game of chance, such as cards. Neither does it become so if the parties should agree that the loser is to pay to the winner a sum of money. They would be perfectly entitled to plead that they injured no one, that they only used their own money in the manner which pleased them best. In the same way they could defend the gambling-house which was established for the convenience of those who desired to engage in that form of amusement. They might say, "We need pleasure and relaxation after our day's work, and we find it most to our taste in this form; therefore, the gambling-house is as necessary to us as the news-room is to others; nobody is obliged to frequent it who does not wish to do so; and nobody else has a right to complain so long as we don't defraud anyone." The legislature, however, takes a very different view of the case. It replies: You may be all as honest as you profess to be; gambling in your case, and in the case of thousands of others, may be as innocent as you say it is; but experience has shown that it has a demoralizing effect upon the community, that it leads many persons to play for what is not their own, and to commit thefts and forgeries, that they may obtain the means of indulging their passion; therefore, in order to remove from those unfortunate persons this temptation, you must give up this form of pleasure; we cannot follow you into your dwelling-houses to see what takes place there, but we will prevent you from pursuing it in any public place. Accordingly, during the reign of our present Queen, several laws have been enacted which prohibit the keeping of gambling-houses, and the playing of cards and other games of hazard in any public place, such as by a roadside; and several cases have lately been reported in which penalties as high as £100 have been imposed for contraventions of these Acts. Thus, the trade of a gambling-house keeper, which was not in itself criminal, and which the frequenters of such a house might plead was necessary for their convenience, has been prohibited because of its mischievous results.

This is an illustration of the anxiety of the law for the protection of our property, which it displays by the removal of temptations to dishonesty. One other example, and that a very homely one, I may cite from the department of sanitary legislation to show that it is equally solicitous about the preservation of our lives, and that for this purpose it adopts similar precautionary and repressive measures. The rearing of pigs is in itself a very innocent, and to many people, I believe, a very profitable form of industry. But experience has taught our rulers that there is great danger that epidemics may be caused, or increased in virulence, by the existence of filthy places such as pig-styes usually are, in districts where there is a dense population. Therefore, the law practically prohibits the trade or occupation of a pig-feeder from being carried on in a populous place. It may be objected that this is not properly a case in point, because the prohibition does not extend to the whole country. I might reply that it is a case of prohibition strictly analogous to what would occur under the Permissive Bill, when it was adopted only in particular districts; but what I am concerned to show is only that the legislature has exercised the power to prohibit this among other trades wherever it has been carried on under conditions inimical to the public welfare. Let it be shown that it can never be carried on except under such conditions, and the same reasons which justified a partial will then justify a total prohibition.

Two other instances of a similar kind I may adduce, in which prohibition has been resorted to for the protection of the lives, not of the people, but of their cattle. The last Parliament, in order to guard against the communication of rinderpest to our herds, prohibited for a time the importation of live stock from foreign countries, and conferred upon the Privy Council power to renew that prohibition whenever circumstances of danger should arise; and at the present moment the movement of live stock from England and Wales into Scotland, is prohibited because murrain has made its appearance in certain English herds.

The several instances of legislation to which I have referred not only prove by accepted practice the right of the State to restrict, and if necessary to prohibit, trades and occupations otherwise lawful when considerations of public health or public morality, or a due regard for the safety of our property, demand it; but they disprove in the same manner the statement of Mr. Lowe that this can only be done, or, as he puts it, freedom of action can only be destroyed, when the object is to prevent a specific offence or crime. There may be no reasonable probability that any specific offence or crime would have been committed in the case of thousands who find their freedom of action in this matter destroyed by the statutes against gambling and gambling-houses; but because it is necessary to protect others—intellectually and morally weak, we may consider them—from temptations to dishonesty, and the public from the consequences of their dishonest acts, the whole system is prohibited. The object here is to prevent the creation of a condition of things which there is reasonable ground for believing will lead, in a certain small proportion of cases, to the commission of crime. The sanitary laws and the laws regarding the live stock trade to which I have alluded, are enacted not because it is known that a specific offence or a specific injury to society is prevented by the prohibition in any particular case, but because there is a strong probability that the lives of our cattle will be endangered by the introduction of disease, it may be by a single animal out of a hundred herds otherwise healthy, and that the lives of our citizens will be endangered by epidemics occurring, most probably, only at distant intervals.

As still more direct evidence of the exercise of the right to "destroy freedom of action," I shall take three other examples from recent, and I may say, progressive legislation. The first of these is the law which requires that every child shall be vaccinated. Many persons, as you know, object to submit their children to this operation, and entertain a very strong opinion on the subject. Many have submitted to repeated fines rather than comply with the law, and some have suffered imprisonment. Yet, notwithstanding the tenderness for individual opinion which distinguishes the legislature of this country, it here, as in all such cases, insists that these opinions, however honestly and strongly held, shall not be acted upon in a way likely to be detrimental to the community. It has been scientifically demonstrated that vaccination affords a protection from the terrible scourge of small-pox. Therefore the law inexorably demands that individual opinions and personal freedom of action shall be subordinated to the public good; and it requires of all parents that they shall have their children vaccinated for their own protection and the protection of others to whom they might be the means of communicating small-pox.

Take again the Education Act. All parents are compelled by it to begin the education of their children when they are five years old. But I may say: I believe it is far better that a child should not be subjected to any regular course of instruction until it is eight or ten years old, that it should be allowed till that age to develop its physical powers only; I wish at least to make an interesting experiment with my boy; and I assure you that when he has reached what I consider a proper age, I will give him an education that will satisfy all the requirements of the law. But the legislature will listen to no such plea. It says: We are satisfied that ignorance is not only a great disadvantage to the person immediately concerned, but it is a source of great danger to society; and we are further satisfied that if children are not educated between the ages of five and thirteen, the great bulk of them will never be educated at all; therefore, although your opinions may be quite honestly held, and although you may possess both the means and the will to continue the education of your son after he has reached that age, in order that we may be able efficiently to carry out a system which we are satisfied is for the good of the community, you must sacrifice your personal opinions or wishes, and begin his education at the age which the law directs. Thus, in a matter certainly as important as that of trade, and no more but even less within the operation of the law, namely, the management of my family, my freedom of action is seriously restricted, and in this particular destroyed.

A convincing proof of the soundness of the principle for which I contend is to be found in the matter which for a long period in the early part of the present session monopolised the time of the House of Commons, and in the numerous coercive laws which at former times unfortunate circumstances have rendered it necessary to adopt in the case of Ireland. While Parliament is properly very reluctant to assume such a serious responsibility, it has repeatedly, when crime was more than usually common, asserted and exercised the right to withdraw from the inhabitants of the disturbed districts some of the ordinary privileges of citizens. It has even suspended in such cases one of the main safeguards of our liberties, the right to demand before punishment a fair and open trial, and where heinous crime is charged, the verdict of our peers. The history of "exceptional legislation" in Ireland would also supply an answer to one of the chief points on which Mr. Lowe rests his case. I am not aware that the sale of arms has been absolutely prohibited by any of the Acts to which I have referred, but a serious restriction has at times been put upon that sale, and it has occasionally been made illegal to possess arms without a special license. It has thus been conceded that if a reasonable probability is proved to exist that any considerable proportion of persons possessing firearms will put them to mischievous uses, it is a legitimate exercise of the functions of Government to forbid their use altogether. But these, you say, are exceptional measures. True, and exceptional only because the circumstances to which they apply are happily exceptional. If it can be shown that there are other evils which could be remedied by another exercise of the same prerogative, the case is not weakened by the fact that those evils, instead of recurring once in a decade, are continually operating.

Liquor Traffic Uniformly Injurious to the Community.—I think I may now claim to have established the proposition with which I set out, and to have shown that the Government may, and frequently does, destroy freedom of action and prohibit trades not in themselves criminal, when a regard for the public good requires that this should be done. Let me proceed to apply that principle to the case under consideration. My second proposition is:—

That uniform experience has proved that the public sale of intoxicating liquors is attended with results injurious to the community.

ROBERT BURNS AND THE WINE CUP.

TEMPERANCE men have often, probably none too often, pointed the moral of Robert Burns' life. Let us see if there is not something to be learned from his writings. He has been so long a beacon to warn, let us make him for once a light to guide.

Burns wrote as an inscription for a goblet these lines:—

"There is death in the cup, sae beware!
Nay, more—there is danger in touching;
But wha can avoid the fell snare?
The man and his wine's sae bewitching!"

That is the sum of the whole drink question, "There is death in the cup." To that conclusion are we driven by all research and experience from the poet's day to ours. "Nay, more—there is danger in touching." There is the philosophy of abstinence! Death is in the pot; at just what peg none of us may assuredly declare. Some who thought that it could only be in the lees, have found it in the topmost bubble. It is there we know, invisible, but terribly real. There is danger in touching; there is positive safety only in abstinence.

But though we are practically agreed about that; though it has been pressed home to young and old till it seems the veriest commonplace, yet does drinking go on, and drunkenness result to an extent that is appalling, even as we dimly realize it. Our brothers and our boys, alas, sometimes our sisters and our girls, do not—it would almost seem cannot—"avoid the fell snare," such is the witchery of its associations. Here is the reason and necessity for our temperance "propaganda" (we thank thee, Dr. Crosby, for teaching us that word). This heart-breaking fact, it is, that will not let us be happy in our personal practice of abstinence, but impels us by all sorts of suasion, moral and legal, to induce others to be altogether such as we are, bonds and all; urges us to call on all good citizens to declare a complete and eternal divorce of the man from the wine, of social enjoyment from its hitherto universal, but unworthy and pernicious symbol, the intoxicating cup; constrains us to use voice and vote to influence our legislatures to withdraw State sanction from the impoverishing and debasing drink institution, and give us Home Protection.

In his address "to the unco guid," Burns says:—

"See social mirth and glee sit down,
All joyous and unthanking,
Till, quite transmogrified, they're grown Debauchery and drinking!"

What a graphic picture of the easy and unconscious descent from innocent enjoyment to folly and vice! In this verse may be found the key to much of Burns' praise of strong drink. The goblet was in his day as in ours, the accepted symbol of sociability and good-fellowship, and the poet who would sing of these naturally chose their recognized emblem for his theme. Analyse "Willie brewed a peck o' maut," the heartiest drinking song extant, and see how little of its praise is given to the drink as drink—how much of it is bestowed on "social mirth and glee," at once the moving cause and natural outcome of such meeting of congenial souls. When Burns extols the drink for its own sake, it is usually in a humorous and half satiric vein. His oft-quoted phrase, "Freedom and Whisky gang thegither," if read understandingly with the context, is a piece of the keenest irony. When we read the verse quoted above, let us not say that Burns wilfully favoured debauchery and drinking. He sang of "social mirth and glee," but let us not accuse virtue of begetting vice. Innocent sociability never begat debauchery. Drink, its arbitrary symbol, is responsible for this vile spawn. Against the drink is our warfare, not against human happiness. We would increase the sum of social enjoyment, by guarding it against the foe who takes advantage of its unthanking and unarmed moments.

It is noticeable that Burns in his serious moods, and in the moments of worthy aspiration, despises drink and all mere sensual indulgence. "Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wines, A man's a man for a' that," is one of his stirring sentences. In another poem he says:—

"Gie dreeping roasts to country lairds,
Till icicles hang frae their beards;
Gie fine braw claes to fine life-guards,
And maids o' honour,
And yill and whisky gie to cairds,
Until they scunner.

While ye are pleased to keep me hale,
I'll sit down o'er my scanty meal,

Be't water-broze or muslin kail,
Wi' cheerfu' face,
As lang's the muses dinna fail
To say the grace."

It was the poet's prayer for his countrymen, shall we not echo it for ours—

"Oh, may Heaven their simple lives prevent
From luxury's contagion, weak and vile."

Alas, that we cannot point to the hard's practice for encouragement and example! Alas, that he was so little able, and so little helped to "avoid the fell snare!" But while we lament the folly of his ways, shall we not lay to heart the wisdom of his words, written as his own epitaph—

"Reader, attend—whether thy soul
Soar Fancy's flights beyond the pole,
Or darkling grubs this earthly hole
In low pursuit—
Know, prudent, cautious self-control,
Is wisdom's root."

D. M. HENDERSON.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

THE WATCH'S FIRST OWNER.

I WAS made in Geneva many years ago, in fact, I must acknowledge that I am far down the hill of life. My outward case is less brilliant than it used to be, and the wreath of forget-me-not's engraven on my back became visible only through a magnifying glass long ago, but I still keep time to a minute.

I have seen a great deal of life, and as I am of a peculiarly observant turn of mind, it would be an easy task for me to fill a volume with my experience. But during that long life I have met no human being who interested me as my first owner did, nor any life-history which left such an indelible impression on my mind. I will tell it to you now briefly; for your sake I wish what I have to tell were not so sad.

Geneva is a very beautiful place, as those who have visited it know well. I found it a pleasant residence during the short time I spent there, and I keep a warm corner in my heart for it yet. The first few months of my existence were passed in a watchmaker's window in the principal street of St. Gervais, from which I could obtain a good view of the Rhone and the streets on the opposite bank. It was the summer time, and tourists were plentiful. I used to beguile the time by trying to read their histories in their faces as they passed, only, to do this well, one must have a very brilliant imagination, which is not a gift of mine.

Nobody inquired my price, so when the autumn waned, and the weird summits of the Alps were capped by another winter's snow, I, along with a number of my companions, was shut up in a huge packing case, in which we remained till our spirits went down to zero. We were conscious of being transferred from one place to another, but were entirely ignorant of our destination. When we once more saw the light of day we found ourselves in the establishment of a fashionable jeweller in Regent Street, London, and after being carefully polished and regulated, we were placed in a case in the window. My amazement at seeing the never-ending throng passing and repassing the window cannot be expressed. Geneva in the height of the season was nothing to it. However, I gradually grew accustomed to it, and even to weary of the monotony. I had lost my old habit of trying to read faces, and the time passed but drearily. I began to long for a purchaser, and my vanity was severely hurt at being allowed to lie so long.

However, one day, to my intense delight, the shopman put his hand into the window and lifted me out, case and all. There were two customers at the counter, a lady and gentleman, young, well-matched, and handsome. The gentleman wished to buy a watch for his wife, and his taste seemed to be fastidious. The counter was littered with gold watches of every size and design, but he picked me up, and eyed me critically. My heart beat, especially when the lady took me in her hand. She looked at me for a minute with her gentle eyes, and then said,

"I should like this, Jack. The design is exquisite."

To my unspeakable delight a bargain was concluded, I was transferred to the lady's possession, my price paid, and the pair marched out of the shop. It was a disagreeable night outside, and almost impenetrable fog hung over the city, making queer yellow circles round the gas lamps, and dimming the shop windows. The gentleman seemed to be very anxious lest his wife should take cold, and both were glad to reach home. It was in a quiet street, which bore the unmistakable stamp of gentility, the house being substantial, and even elegant, while on the opposite side was a narrow strip of garden ground, named the Park. They paused at one of the doors and knocked. It was answered immediately by the neatest and daintiest of maid servants, quite a sight to see.

The lobby was prettily furnished, and had a new look; so had the dining room they entered, but it was the perfection of comfort. The big table was pushed back and a small one drawn near the blazing fire. Supper was laid for two. The lady left the room almost immediately, to remove her walking dress, I suppose, while the gentleman proceeded to get his feet into the slippers toasting on the fender. Now that I got a better look at him I did not like him. I could not tell why.

Before long the lady came back, and as she knelt down to warm her hands, I saw how fair she was, and oh, how very, very young. Too young, I thought, to be a wife.

"This is comfort, Jack," she said with a bright smile, and then she lifted me from the table, and admired me anew. By and by she placed me on the mantle, in close proximity to the timepiece, in whom I was delighted to discover a distant relation I had often heard of, but never seen. While our owners were at supper my cousin and I entered into a very friendly conversation, in which he told me that his master's name was Sylvester, that he held a lucrative situation somewhere in the city, and that he had married three months ago one of the sweetest girls in all London. She was an orphan and a governess. Ah, my friends, you don't know what bitter life histories lie hid beneath those two words. I have seen—well—I must not tell it, at least not here.

I asked him his opinion of Mr. Sylvester, but to my astonishment, he only shook his head ominously, and thereafter declined to talk any more. Then I took to looking again at our owners. They had finished supper, and Mrs. Sylvester was about to ring the bell, when her husband crossed to the sideboard, and opening it took from it a glass and a bottle labelled "brandy." She left the bell and laid her hand upon his arm.

"Don't, Jack, don't touch it," she said pleadingly.

"Not to-night, when you have been so kind to me."

He shook off her hand and laughed lightly.

"Don't be frightened, Mary," he said carelessly.

"The damp has got into my throat somehow—a glass will make it all right."

"You know you cannot stop at a glass, Jack," she said, and I could detect the quiver in her voice. "Give me the key, dear, and let me lock it up."

He pushed aside her outstretched hand more unkindly than he need have done, and filled the glass to the brim. She went from him then, and leaning her arm upon the mantel, looked into the fire with grave and sorrowful eyes.

"I don't want to hurt you, Mary," said her husband, speaking in a stern, harsh voice. "But you must not dictate to me in matters like this."

"I dictate to you! Oh, Jack, have I ever done it?"

"You are too good for me I know, Mary," he said, not heeding her interruption, "yet you were willing to take me with all my faults."

"In the hope that you would mend them," said she sadly. "You promised me so much, Jack, and yet you have broken faith with me more than once already. I don't want to lose trust in you, but how can I help it?"

He compressed his lips, and I saw how even a handsome face can be disfigured by selfish passion.

A WEEK IN EDINBURGH.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

STR.—All tourists are attracted by Edinburgh. Besides being the capital of our country, its situation and surroundings give delightful effect to its noble buildings. It is famous for this alone. But its history especially, and the extent to which it dips into the national history, are an attraction to all alike—to Scotsmen and the intelligent of every nationality. Mary, as she is still seen, siding with her subtle French relatives, in their attempts to stereotype the past, and restore to undiminished power the disrupted ecclesiasticism of the middle ages, is, in her courage, beauty, diplomatic capacity, and devotion to the old faith, a personality to hover about, if not in sympathy, in sadness. All who beget this kind of sadness are fascinating, and Mary is fascinating. Yet, it seems, from the glimpses we get of her, that the stains with which she is besmeared from her passions, might not have soiled her so, if the gifts and culture of her nature had been able to resist the temptations which came in upon her from the shock she received in the losing battle she had to fight against the new order of things which Scotland was in no small degree commissioned to diffuse throughout Europe. Mary, her beauty, her strength, and her failings, make Edinburgh and Holyrood attractive, as the scenes of sin and sufferings, very sadly human indeed. And John Knox, the great personality in the opposing host she had to grapple with and be overcome by, is as much in Edinburgh now as a man is felt to be in the room from which he has just been removed to his "long home." I never look on his house at the head of the Canongate without a feeling something like this. When he was there he had a right to remain that no power could invalidate; and when he is gone it is still his through his undying influence. John is in Edinburgh, Scotland, and Europe to-day in a greater and more real sense than he is in the Auld, the Free, and the U.P. Kirks. The logical outcome of his movement is felt in the onflow of government by the people, in critical investigation, and in the conferred and prospective benefits from science and mechanism. These in no small measure are John's outcome. But without doubt it is greater than he calculated on. With the aid of Puritan Scotland, helped ultimately by the English Puritans, he established the right of private judgment, and ever since free inquiry has gathered strength to overcome opposition.

As I kept the "crown of the causeway," from Adair's Dunedin Temperance Hotel in the High Street down through the Canongate to Holyrood, and back to the Castle, on Saturday night, the 11th of June, my mind was occupied with this and other events which have made Edinburgh what it is felt to be. And, flooded as my ruminating was with the screech of drunken voices which came from the stationary and moving groups through which I had to find my way, I was distressed with the consideration that the drinking which occasioned the commotion and noise was to our time, with all its development, a greater obstacle to the progress of the future than was the state of matters which Mary failed to maintain against the onslaught of John in their time. The present, with its culture and freedom and diffused wealth, is the result of John's success in leading the people to know, think, and act in and for themselves. But freedom, culture, and wealth, when they cultivate vice are more to be deplored than tyranny, ignorance, and poverty, for they are then its slaves. And when the best powers of our nature are enthralled to make prosperity minister to the worst, the hope of amendment becomes distant. This is especially the case when they are made to give brilliancy to the vice of drinking. While intoxication weakens will-power, it disposes to mental trifling and insincerity; and this state of mind is asserting itself so that its influence is felt in all directions. Wherever we turn we have to confront the demand for amusement. This demand has gone all the length of public houses without the drink, and in these centres of soberifying influence it is responded to with the means of gambling in comfortable circumstances. Even this attempt to wean the mentally enfeebled from drink must be baited with what is acceptable to trifling insincerity. It has already come to this. To save those tainted with drink they must be amused on the lines of insincere selfish mental excitement. They are becoming too weak to bear the strain of mental activity in the pursuit of a legitimate object, and too trifling to stand by a principle in self-denying persistent effort to give it headway. Everybody is craving of everybody to be entertained. In this respect our aim is little higher than that of a smart spoiled child. Our drink system, cultivated for revenue, substitutes the sensation of intoxication for the joy of sober thought; and we are becoming a funny people, without wit or sense, and a jolly lot, full of deliriousness, leading to despair.

I have been in all the large centres of population in the United Kingdom, with my eyes open to the social indications present in their streets, but in the High Street and Canongate of Edinburgh there were on Saturday night, the 11th of June, a greater display of drinking, and its effects, than I have ever seen anywhere in the same space and time. Those composing stationary groups who could not be reckoned drunk, were evidently on edge with the expectation of drink. It was interesting to observe the younger groups of this description. In their faces animal spirits looked out buoyant with the sense of relief from toil which Saturday brings. Thus relieved and at leisure, spirit-edness leaped in the spring time of their being, but there was in it the ferment of jolly-dog-ism, putting it on tip-toe to bound over into drunken excess, spiced with the indulgence which the young eagerly revel in when the bounds of innocence are passed.

These groups were on the first form in the school of publicanism, and reduced from the natural wholesomeness of youth. They were being transformed to have pleasure in intoxication, its inanities, sensualities, and brutalities, rather than in the guidance of thought and feeling, with their truth and joy, as they lead life, in order, up to development.

Mr. Gladstone would make every railway train a public-house, to cultivate this depravity and increase the revenue. And that it may not be diminished with the poverty that it gives, he votes with the Tories and the publicans against Sir Wilfrid and prohibition.

Then there were those who composed the moving groups. They were evidently intoxicated; and as they crashed through the crowded streets there could be no doubt that they were driven by a drunken impulse to realise the spree in swaggering good nature and maudlin fun, or in an opportunity for more unlicensed indulgence. They had made great progress under the training of publicanism, fostered by the licensing magistrates. They were enslaved and driven by the drink craving to waste themselves and their means in drunken indulgence.

The Liberals boast of repealing the Corn Laws, and of thereby releasing wages to purchase what the people produce. But where is the prosperity? The share of it that has come to the people is absorbed in the drink trade, and in the time of free-trade, as in the time of protection, crime and pauperism remain unsolved problems. In fact, restriction is perpetuated in publicanism as the means of revenue. The people, tempted and trained to waste their wages in drink, are less prosperous than they would be if they were sober and thrifty and eating their bread at Corn Law prices. Wages expended in drink are more effectually drained from trade than they were when expended on dear corn. For while the manufacture of drink gives little employment it takes corn for raw material and destroys it. This loss, added to the local taxes occasioned by pauperism and crime, cannot fall far short of the revenue derived. It must take as much in this wasteful manner to collect the drink tax as it amounts to. And while the Liberals foster and maintain this state of matters they are not free-traders, but the maintainers of a monopoly to demoralise and starve the people for revenue.

Besides these groups, in the drink-expectant mass, there were isolated swaggerers, stouterers, and lancers on to the perpendicular, by the strength they had in themselves, to keep erect, or by pressing close to a wall, or to a person able to uphold them. These could no longer keep the step and they had fallen out of the ranks. This army of Edinburgh revellers, organised and drilled by government licensing magistrates and their officers the publicans, had its wounded and its slain as other armies have in active service. These last that I have described were thus out of the ranks.

There was still another section, but those who composed it were obstructively active in no ordinary degree. They stood up and battered each other, or holding each other down rolled about on the causeway, surrounded by crowds who pressed in to see the brutal display with eager interest. It was evident that the police (or ambulance corps to this army) officered by the publicans, with their commissions from the Government, had more to do than they could overtake in removing the wounded, for they merely looked on at much of the battering and rolling, as if, like the swaggering and stottering, they were not to be too narrowly looked into. Such was Edinburgh as I saw it in the High Street and the Cannongate on Saturday evening, the 11th of June.

I had arrived to speak on the following evening in the Queen's Park, and when the hour had come round, and the meeting had gathered and settled down, it was such as a man with a thought to illustrate would desire to talk to. The people had come to listen as they had done in their places of worship during the day. They were an audience; and an utterance without an audience is a greater waste of mind and of time than an audience is without an utterance. People who are something mentally in themselves are not any the worse when they get little mentally presented to them. But he who talks to a rabble who can neither take in thought, nor stimulate thought in him while he does talk, is greatly to be sympathised with by every intelligent person. This meeting in the Queen's Park did both. The Daily Review estimated the numbers present at 1000.

On each of the following nights, except one, I delivered addresses in different quarters of the city until Saturday, the 18th. The meetings in Nicholson Square and in the Temperance Hall, Nicholson Street, which were addressed in one night, are pleasant to think of. They were attentive and orderly. But those held in Parliament Square and Lady Lawson Street were the reverse. It is a mistake to attract meetings in the open air where the need for sobriety greatly transcends the capacity or desire to listen earnestly to the discussion of any truth. This was the case at these meetings, and interruptions and disturbances prevailed while they continued. I believe it has grown customary at gatherings of this sort to sustain the audience, as it is called, with chaff for chaff, and stale joke for stale joke as they are thrown in upon the speaker in a stream of continuous interruption. The temperance movement is not to be sustained by such meetings and such advocacy. They have in many places chased away the thoughtful, sincere, and morally reliable. No movement to reform society can prosper in the absence of these. The other lot are for fun and horse-play. These are in earnest; the other lot live to be amused. These manfully think and act to make the present a blessing to the future. Abuses have never been removed by fun, nor progress facilitated by entertainment. To remove the one and secure the other is now, as it has ever been, the work of men impressed by the prevailing evil, and resolved in all earnestness to remove it. Drink is not to be counter-attracted, it is to be rooted out. Drink shop fun at temperance meetings can only have the effect of sending the people back to the drink shop for the fun and the drink together. To make out-door meetings a culturing power to root out the drink trade they should be held continuously in places favourable to the attraction of thoughtful people. In this way earnest men would be brought into contact to use the temperance movement, not as a counter-attraction to publicanism, but for its destruction.

And to cultivate this contact with all that it is fitted to bring about, the ablest and most earnest men of the movement should take to the CHAIR, and make out-door meetings, as they are fitted to become, the central, mental, moral, and political power in our movement.

THE UNFERMENTED WINE VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

6 Bond Court, London, E.C., July 5, 1881.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

DEAR SIR,—Some time ago you gave a cordial notice of the work undertaken by the Unfermented Wine Vigilance Committee. May I bring this same subject once more before your readers? The Report by J. Carter Bell, Esq., F.C.S., on Sacramental Wines is of so interesting and important a nature that it is most desirable that this document should be in the hands of every minister, church officer, and temperance reformer in the Kingdom. The committee have issued it with this end in view, and to secure this thorough circulation it is necessary to have a host of cordial co-operators. I am pleased to be able to acknowledge most valued aid already rendered to my committee, but much ground still remains to be covered, and those of your readers who have not already received a supply of these documents can render most important service by at once communicating with me, giving an estimate of required number for judicious distribution in the respective districts, when I shall have much pleasure in sending parcels of the papers, post free, to all such applicants. The postal addresses should be distinctly given, as I have already several applications to which I cannot attend in consequence of insufficient addresses. If any of your readers have not received their parcels in reply to this application I trust that they will kindly repeat this request, regarding the above as the explanation of my non-attention to their first request.

In conclusion I desire to solicit the help of your readers in the compilation of a list of churches where Unfermented Wine is now used. I shall be glad to have all such churches reported to me without delay, so that our list may be as perfect as possible,—I remain, dear sir, your obedient servant.

JOSEPH T. F. BISHOP, Hon. Sec.

In the Presbyterian General Assembly, the Rev. D. J. Macdonnell moved a resolution against prohibition, but the report of the committee on temperance was adopted by a vote of nearly two to one. This report urges the church to more energetic action, affirms that "total abstinence is correct in principle"; directs Presbyteries and Sessions to hold conferences upon the subject, declares the Scott (Permissive) Act "correct in principle, and that any changes should be in the direction of further restriction and more effective working of the act." There can be no doubt the endorsement of this influential body will add momentum to the movement towards prohibition—the only satisfactory solution of the drink problem. Other religious bodies have taken similar ground, and the sentiment in our favour is very strong. But we lack the organisation and determination which characterises the movement in the Old Land. It will be well for you to take newspaper statements regarding the working of prohibition in the United States with several large grains of salt. In addition to the great influence a wealthy community like the distillers and brewers must wield, there is a suspicion that they have actually subsidised the associated press. At all events the colouring of intelligence from Kansas, Maine, Vermont, &c., is unmistakable, and many of the statements put forth on some, to me unknown, but it is alleged, reliable authority, has no foundation in fact. If you want to witness a real failure, come and see the Ontario license law in operation. It is giving more and more satisfaction to the publicans, and I regret to say that some of our temperance men do not heartily condemn it while their political friends are in power. By the bye, the hon. Mr. McLelan, who lately joined the Dominion Cabinet, seems to be a prohibitionist, at least I find by the Senate debates that he spoke and voted against the amendment to the Scott Act proposed by Senator Almon.—Yours faithfully, Orillia, 6th July, 1881.

G. H. HALE.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, from 15th May to 14th July inclusive. During that period, 164 meetings were held, 79 being deputation, and 85 ordinary. At these meetings, 238 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Ayr, Dumbarton, Paisley, Govan, Glasgow, Perth, Kilmarnock, Dundee, Arbroath, Forfar, Brechin, Ferryden, Montrose, Greenock, Edinburgh, Partick, Pollokshaws, Whiteinch, Irvine, and Nairn, and addressed 49 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Stornoway, Invergordon, Beauly, Aberdeen, Macduff, Banff, Portsoy, Cullen, Dundee, Arbroath, Forfar, Brechin, Ferryden, Montrose, Peterhead, Fraserburgh, Elgin, Lossiemouth, Dufftown, and Nairn, and addressed 35 meetings.

Mr. John Paton has visited Ayr, Dumbarton, Paisley, Govan, Perth, Kilmarnock, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Greenock, and addressed 30 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has visited Paisley, Glasgow, Greenock, Clarkston, Pollokshaws, Kirkintilloch, Irvine, and Partick, and addressed 29 meetings.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Glasgow, Edinburgh, Freuchie, London, Kirkcaldy, Dysart, and Pathhead, and addressed 25 meetings. Mr. J. H. Waterston went to Ireland, in room of Rev. A. M'Kinley, and while there addressed meetings in Lurgan, Ballinahinch, Belfast, Dromore, Moyallen, Gillford, Carrickfergus, Druminess, and Donaghadee. The meetings addressed were 24 in number. We append a notice of them from the Irish newspaper press—

'IRISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—Mr. J. H. Waterston, of Edinburgh, has just concluded a lecturing tour in the north of Ireland, under the auspices of the Irish Temperance League, which has given great satisfaction. Most of the meetings were held in the open air, and as Mr. Waterston is a ready, racy, and agreeable speaker, and brimful of anecdote, his addresses, as may be expected, were highly appreciated by his large and enthusiastic audiences.'—Belfast Weekly Telegraph, July 16, 1881.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Nackerty, Glasgow, London, Greenock, Partick, Hamilton, Whiteinch, Kirkintilloch, and Irvine, and addressed 19 meetings.

Rev. A. M'Kinley has visited Edinburgh, Leith, Peebles, and Selkirk, and addressed 11 meetings.

The Rev. Mr. M'Kinley met with a very gratifying reception while in Scotland, and cherishes a pleasing remembrance of the kindness and attention of the friends concerned in the arrangements for his meetings, and in the provision for his comfort and accommodation.

Mr. Wm. Kesson has visited Glasgow, Bonhill, Partick, and Alexandria, and addressed 11 meetings.

Mr. John Ripley has addressed 5 meetings in Edinburgh.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 4 meetings in Edinburgh and Leith.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has addressed 3 meetings in Hawick and Selkirk.

Bailie Selkirk has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow and Edinburgh.

Mr. M. Edwards has addressed 2 meetings in Aberdeen.

The following gentlemen have each taken part in the proceedings of meetings in the places which follow their names:—Revs. John Kirk, Edinburgh; J. M'Dougall, Glasgow; and J. E. Dobson, Aberdeen; Ex-Bailie Lewis, Edinburgh; Messrs. R. M'Callum, Glasgow; James Winning, Edinburgh; John Buchanan, Dumbarton; W. J. Wood, Glasgow; D. Brown, Hamilton; D. Ramsay, Edinburgh; G. Sands, Edinburgh; John Butters, Edinburgh; and D. Moore, Glasgow.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Offices—112 Bath St., Glasgow, July, 1881.

DEAR SIR,—We are desired on behalf of the Executive to respectfully request a subscription from your Society to the funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

The Executive do so for the following among other reasons:—

I.—The funds at their disposal are not at all adequate to such a vigorous prosecution of the movement as they desire, and as is necessary for the speedy realization of the object of the Association—the suppression of the liquor traffic by the will of the people.

II.—By its energetic efforts—which they are glad to be able to state are now shared by all sections of the movement in Scotland—the Association has created a wide-spread, growing, and enlightened public opinion in favour of the abolition of all traffic in alcoholic liquors.

III.—Through its efforts at parliamentary election contests, and by its electoral canvass, the Scottish Electoral Constituencies at last General Election returned an overwhelming majority of representatives to the House of Commons, pledged to vote in favour of placing the existence of the liquor traffic unreservedly in the power of the ratepayers affected by its operations.

IV.—Twice since the General Election the House of Commons have divided on the Local Option Resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. The Scotch vote in 1880 stood as follows:—43 votes and pairs for; only 5 votes against. This is a majority of more than 8 to 1. Last month, on the House dividing on the same question, this splendid vote was maintained. On no other question of interest to Scotland can such a decided expression of parliamentary opinion be shown.

V.—While sedulously prosecuting its special objects in the constituencies, it has ever offered assistance and co-operation to kindred associations. On all platforms its advocates and agencies may be found diligently striving to diffuse the blessings of temperance and prohibition among all classes of the community.

To enable it to continue and increase its efforts, which have on them the stamp of unquestionable progress and success, we very confidently appeal to your Society as one who, recognizing the faithful work it has done, is prepared to encourage its labours by a generous response to this request for financial assistance. Waiting your kind and early reply to this application, addressed to the Secretary,—We are, very faithfully yours, James Torrens, J.P., Chairman of Executive; R. M'Callum, Treasurer; J. L. Selkirk, J.P., Honorary Secretary; Robert Mackay, Secretary.

Ward Beecher says that the saddest faces he sees are those of women who have passed middle life.

The Persians have a saying that "Ten measures of talk were allotted to mankind, and the women took nine."

ON A BREAD PLATTER.—"Well, Esther, can you read that?" "No, mamma." "Well, it is rather difficult. These are Old English characters." "Are they? Then it is no wonder the ancient Britons could neither read nor write!"

THE FUNDS.

* * * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, AUGUST, 1881.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

The twenty-third annual meetings of this Association will be held in Glasgow on Tuesday, 27th September, 1881.

The business meeting will take place in the Christian Institute, 70 Bothwell Street, at 11 a.m. Treasurer Hamilton, J.P., President of the Association, will occupy the chair. The annual reports will be submitted, office-bearers elected, and business of importance considered.

The social meeting of members and their friends will be held in the Saloon of the City Hall, Candle-riggs, at 4 p.m. precisely. John Williams, Esq., The Green, Wishaw, will preside at this meeting. Addresses by delegates and representatives of kindred associations.

The public meeting will be held in the City Hall in the evening, at half-past seven o'clock.

LORD COLIN CAMPBELL, M.P., in the chair.

Farther particulars will appear in the next issue of the Social Reformer. This early notice is given to allow the friends of the Association ample time to make arrangements for being present. The Executive have a confident hope that they will be gratified by a large and enthusiastic attendance at all the meetings.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION FROM A MEDICAL POINT OF VIEW.

BY JAMES MURRAY M'CUULOCK, M.D., &c., DUMFRIES.

We are glad that a second edition of this truly excellent lecture has been called for. It is beyond question the best argument for prohibition to which we can point, embodying the essence of all that has been written on abstinence as the duty of the individual, and prohibition by the will of the people as the duty of the state.

Copies are to be had from the office of this magazine, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, at one penny each, or six shillings per hundred, exclusive of carriage. Special terms for larger quantities. On receipt of twelve stamps, a dozen copies will be sent post free to any address.

We confidently rely on the liberal assistance of our friends in securing a large circulation for this admirable lecture.

The Temperance Reformation from a Medical Point of View. By James Murray M'Cuulloch, M.D., Dumfries. (Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow). One penny.

This is the reprint of a lecture delivered by request to the students of Glasgow University by a provincial physician of eminence. It is beyond question one of the most trenchant assaults upon alcohol and the traffic which has ever appeared. The Association does well to republish it, and to offer its 20 octavo pages of well-printed matter at the wonderfully low price of six shillings per hundred.—Dr. F. R. Lees in the "National Independent."

Orders (terms cash) respectfully requested.

Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow.

It is to us a perennial source of surprise that our Legislature should be so very inconsistent in their dealings with admitted dangers. The people of Scotland have, through their parliamentary representatives, often demanded power to suppress the liquor traffic which affects them. Yet Parliament hesitates, minimises the danger of the public house and, in very cowardice as it were, refrains from affording protection to the soberly disposed rate-payers anywhere, against their enemies the drinker and the drink seller. Yet, the other day, when Mr. Summers, M.P., in the House of Commons, put it to the Home Secretary that there was extreme danger menacing the citizens of Liverpool from the great quantities of gunpowder stored in hulks on the Mersey, the contrast between their supineness as regards the liquor traffic, and their vigilance as regards gunpowder could not be more marked. The floating powder magazines on the Mersey have in store 400 tons of gunpowder, the explosion of which would doubtless lay Liverpool in ruins. Some time ago a ship on the Mersey with a cargo of gunpowder blew up, and gave the glazier and other tradesmen an unlimited supply of work in reglazing and renewing the windows that were shattered by the explosion. Mr. Trevelyan, M.P., by whose department, and not that of the Home Office, the question had to be answered, informed the interested House that there were special places on the river where these floating powder magazines were moored, that the Admiralty could order them anywhere, that an officer was specially appointed to look after them, and that a revenue cruiser was specially appointed to watch them, and that its boats contained a row guard. Even these severe precautions did not seem to assure the citizens sufficiently, and something more was apparently determined upon, of which the questioner was to have the earliest information. Now, let our readers sum up all the disasters which have followed the manufacture and storage of gunpowder, and he will be pleased to find that because of extreme vigilance these have been comparatively few; in fact, for many years, Liverpool has enjoyed an entire immunity from such explosions. Yet that city has nearly 2400 public houses and beer shops with their appalling results. The murders, wife beatings, and similar fearful crimes, the fruits of these places, have multiplied to such an extent that Liverpool has received the name of "the dark spot on the Mersey." We cannot help thinking that our Government, to be consistent and even-handed, should take proper precautions to protect its subjects equally from the evils of intoxication, as from the dangers of gunpowder, just as the manifold dangers to the physical, moral, and mental nature, arising from the liquor traffic, transcend in quality and amount the happily rare dangers of gunpowder. As regards gunpowder, Government seeks to fortify the people against what is only a possible stroke; in the case of alcohol, we aim at getting power to avert the actual dangers and calamities which are inseparable from the traffic in alcoholic liquors. We cannot help mourning over their inconsistency, but we certainly shall not rest contented under their timidity or neglect to do us justice; they will neither have peace nor rest till justice be done to their subjects through the suppression of the liquor traffic being entirely in the power of the ratepayers.

During the present summer the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has "bad business on its hand." The demands upon its open-air agencies have been without a parallel in its history. The only regret is that it has not been better equipped for meeting them. So far as it has been able, however, it has gone heartily and devotedly into the work, and with the cordial co-operation of friends and committees, the truths of prohibition and the rightful policy with regard to it have been presented most effectively to the inhabitants of every town of importance in Scotland. Having a conviction in favour of the educational value of open-air meetings that deepens year by year, we rejoice at the abundant labours in this direction on the part of the agents and advocates of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and believe that they largely tend to speedily hasten the entire suppression of the liquor traffic.

A very important answer was given in the House of Commons by Mr. Trevelyan, M.P., the other day to a question regarding an engineer dismissed from the service for drunkenness. It appears that at the very moment his services were in request he was found utterly incapable of rendering them, and as, unfortunately for him, this was not his first offence, he was tried and sentenced to dismissal and disgrace. It is, however, to Mr. Trevelyan's comment that we wish to direct the attention of our readers. He said, "Drunkenness is a fault to which, however painful the individual cases are, it is not permissible to show indulgence when such vast and delicate machines as the 'Northumberland' with all her crew are dependent on the care and judgment of a single officer." The case between society and those under responsibility with respect to it could not be better stated. Take any great concern—a shipload of people, a train and its passengers, a work with its operatives, or public institutions and their curators—and apply the doctrine to their case as precisely as Mr. Trevelyan has done to the 'Northumberland,' and its engineer, and you establish a case in which it is no longer admissible to tolerate drinking people in positions of trust. But to make a wholesale holocaust of this sort would be little less than a calamity, and quite unnecessary, when the better alternative lies within our reach. We can retain their valuable services by the removal, like a wise people, of that which exerts if unchecked a disastrous influence on their fortunes. To conserve then that skill, that knowledge, that power of organization, and those invaluable services that have tended so much to the material supremacy of our country, we do right to demand the utter destruction of the facilities for the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors which have proved so often and so entirely subversive of the ability and steadiness of really capable men in all the industries of Great Britain. On what grounds can we tolerate amongst us a class whose operations tend to the danger and injury of what is confided to their care, and to their own lasting loss of social position? Simply on the ground of our ignorance and our customs. When the first is dispelled, and the last is changed, which will be the glorious and benign effort of the prohibition at which we aim, and which by the votes of our fellow-citizens and the blessing of God, we shall at no distant day secure.

Under "Progress of the Work," our readers will find a copy of a circular sent by the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association to a number of societies in the various districts of the country. Therein is clearly and succinctly set forth the claims of the Association, not merely upon the organisations to which it more immediately refers, but upon all who believe the liquor traffic to be the fertile source of many appalling moral and social evils, and on that account deserving of extinction by the voice and vote of the ratepayers. It is but two months since we drew the attention of our readers to the urgent need by the Association of funds adequate to the increasingly vigorous prosecution of the agitation, and we are glad to be able to inform them that our doing so has not been altogether in vain. We can without fear of challenge point to the untiring energy and absorbing devotion exhibited so markedly by the Executive and its various agencies; and in doing this we cannot help saying that if ever vigorous agitation was deserving of encouragement, it is due to the Association and its conductors to say that their efforts merit recognition in the best of all ways—in supplying them liberally with funds that they may increase and sustain their agencies, and be able to avail themselves of all means and methods which promise to still farther augment their power and influence in the country and over the Legislature as well as constrain the Government of the day to enact a law which will remit the liquor traffic to be dealt with by the ratepayers according as they may see fit. To give sparingly is just to protract the struggle and indefinitely delay the glorious consummation of labours which though as yet short of the attainment of their great object have conferred invaluable blessings on the community. To give liberally to the Association is to ensure seeing ere one goes hence the operation of one of the most beneficent laws that was ever asked for by Scotland—a law that will sustain virtue, discourage vice, and immeasurably swell the happiness of her people.

We have again earnestly to call the attention of all friends of prohibition to the electoral register. We do this with all the more pleasure that we believe that the attention hitherto bestowed by the friends of the cause throughout Scotland has been signally exhibited in her Parliamentary contests. She would not stand as she does, pre-eminently in the van of the agitation, had it not been that the electors favouring temperance and prohibition were actuated by a laudable desire to see to the electoral register. If ever eternal vigilance was required it is in this matter. We know not where or when every vote may be awaiting to maintain our position or secure an accession to our strength in the House of Commons. Nothing seems more uncertain than the tenure of a parliamentary seat. A parliamentary connection of twenty-four years' duration was last month severed by the choice of the Queen, and a contest for the seat vacated only averted by the lofty patriotism of the Liberal candidates. This will not always happen, however, so that in every case the highest wisdom is shown in being thoroughly organized and registered. We would earnestly urge upon all to see that their name is duly on the register. It may not be their fortune to cast the vote that may determine whether or not we are to have a warm supporter, a luke-warm friend, or a firm opponent, but it is always in their power to have a vote to give to the right, and thus swell the number of the friends of the suppression of the liquor traffic. The roll has to be completed by the 15th day of September, and to be afterwards submitted to the scrutiny of the ratepayers. All who have paid their rates previous to the 31st July are eligible for a place upon it, and it should be the special duty of friends or committees to see that all those willing to vote for prohibition should be duly and accurately on the rolls for their burgh or county. Lodgers require to be placed on the roll annually. LET ALL ATTEND TO THE ELECTORAL REGISTER.

Certain publicans sympathising with the Irish Land League, or overawed by its members, have declined to assist the military and the police in the discharge of their duty. Government has naturally resented such conduct, and instructed the magistracy to withhold the licenses of all publicans taking such a course. It is not to be supposed that Government that throws the shield of its protection over the publican, is to continue to do so while he aids and abets those that are thwarting the measures it is enforcing for the prosperity and peace of Ireland. Hence, if the Irish publican will not support the British Government, that Government has resolved on, in effect, retorting, "Well, go on and sell without us." Of course that would be felony, so some unhappy publicans, through trying to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, have come to grief on the matter. The Government takes up a position which is only tenable at the expense of its own inconsistency. The publicans everywhere injure its subjects, indeed they never stir within their bar without doing it. Why should the Government simply punish the publicans who interfere with the military occupation of Ireland, and let the thousands of them go scot-free that are ravaging households and ruining millions in the country? Is not a subject as good as a policeman any day? It may be urged that the publicans in question refused food and carriage to her Majesty's forces. Well, admitting that, what then? The publicans by supplying their customers with liquors, positively charge them till they become dangerous to themselves and all around them, a very much graver crime than merely withholding food and carriage. The whole relation of the traffic to the State is an anomaly, and the best way to deal with it is for all good citizens to combine for its removal in the interests of all.

The ancient burgh of Sanquhar has a Town Council composed wholly of abstainers—provost, bailies, and councillors, all having a natural or acquired aversion to alcohol in all its forms. Were toppers to read our magazine this statement would inflict a painful shock of surprise upon them. It would do more, it would set them wondering how the affairs of the burgh could be conducted at all when they were wholly in the hands of teetotal fanatics. Where, they would triumphantly ask, is the loyalty of the burgh on a Queen's birth-day, when the municipal authorities should meet to drink the Queen's health? God save her. How could they invest an illustrious stranger with the freedom of the burgh when "cake and wine" is not in all their thoughts? How could they duly lay the foundation stone of some public building or other when they were unable to pour the baneful wine of commerce upon the stone? Why, Sanquhar has never had such a visitation of providence since the Sanquhar declaration against Charles II. was proclaimed within it; and they would be even found going the length of saying that they really believed that these abstain-ing authorities would be found prepared at any moment to frame a similar declaration against the tyrant and usurper, strong drink. "They say, let them say," the governing burghers of Sanquhar have no occasion for anxiety as to what such victims of the lung are pleased to say. They are the chosen of their fellow-burghers, and it is a high compliment to the temperance movement that the practice of abstinence is rather a help than a hindrance to municipal honours. The day is fast approaching when all our citizens, and all their rulers, will be called up to banish the publican in the interests of those they hold dear. When we see how, under the drink dispensation, they value those that adhere to a temperance life, we can be in little doubt as to the course they then will follow. They will exclude the publican from citizenship as entirely as the burghers of Sanquhar have, meantime, excluded him and his infatuated customers from the municipal dignities of Sanquhar. May God hasten the day.

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—VII.

TERRORISING THE GOVERNMENT—SIR WILFRID LAWSON ON THE GOVERNMENT AND THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC—WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL—THE ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC-HOUSES FORBIDDEN BY THE LAND BILL—MR. CAINE'S MOTION IN FAVOUR OF LICENSING BOARDS—THE OPIUM TRAFFIC IN BURMAH &c.

June 16.—The Earl of Dartmouth in "the Lords" dilated on the Solihull murder, where an Irishman in an ulster murdered a man named Gately in a public-house, on Sunday, 5th December, 1880, in the presence of a number of persons, and yet got clear away; and although a jury returned a verdict of wilful murder, the miscreant has still eluded justice. His lordship inferred that this murder was done to strike terror to the Irishmen in and around Birmingham, and was prompted by the tone of the Midlothian speeches, in which the Premier hinted that violence was necessary to force the Government to take measures for the benefit of Ireland. The Earl of Dalhousie effectually replied to what he termed his lordship's most ingenious attack on the First Lord of the Treasury, and the matter dropped.

June 17.—Sir W. Lawson, in reply to Mr. Newdegate, said his resolution adopted by the House on Tuesday was simply affirmative of the resolution passed last year, and designed to strengthen the hands of the Government in dealing with this question at the earliest practicable moment. He had full confidence in the Government—(hear, hear)—which came into power, as he understood, mainly to vindicate the authority of Parliament, and he did not think that it was at all likely they would ignore the instructions of the House of Commons, as it was clearly the mandate of the House. (Cheers.) If the Government did not act on the instructions of the House, of course he would have to consider the course he should take. (Laughter.) In that case he would give his hon. friend due notice of anything he intended to propose. He would hope to have his co-operation—(laughter)—and that of the hon. member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), and the other leaders of the Conservative party. (Renewed laughter.)

being reported as amended, Mr. Thomasson moved that the first clause be so far amended as to provide for the opening of public-houses on Sabbaths from 12.30 to 2.30 p.m. for selling off the premises. Mr. H. Richard could not accept this amendment. Mr. Warton moved the adjournment of the debate on account of the indecent haste with which the bill was hurried through Committee. He did not, however, press his motion. On a division, Mr. Thomasson's amendment was rejected by 81 to 32, majority 49. The third reading was fixed for 6th July.

June 23.—Lord Arthur Hill moved, on subsection 5 of the Irish Land Bill, the following subsection:—"The tenant shall not on his holding, without the consent of the landlord, open any house for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or undertake any trade or business of a dangerous or obnoxious character." The Attorney-General objected to the amendment on the ground that the liquor traffic was already under the control of the magistrates. Sir Wilfrid Lawson desired the progress of the bill. (Laughter and cheers.) Colonel Tottenham, remarking upon the amount of drunkenness in the rural parts of Ireland, said he knew of a village in that country where there were only twenty houses, ten of which were public-houses. (Oh!) Mr. A. M. Sullivan thought the gallant member must be libelling the Irish magistracy.

Mr. Callan said he happened to know the village to which the hon. member for Leitrim had referred. He would make no charge against the magistrates, but he must state one fact—that the ten public-houses in the village referred to belonged to one landlord. Every other house in the village belonged to other poorer landlords, and the magistrates would not give licences to any house except to those belonging to a brother magistrate. (Hear, hear.) Mr. M'Cartney supported the amendment, observing that he was sorry to see the hon. member for Carlisle (Sir W. Lawson) throw temperance and cold water altogether aside in connection with the bill before the Committee. (Laughter.) Sir J. M'Garel Hogg, as an Irish landlord, said he objected to the erection of public-houses on his property without his leave. He should, therefore, second the amendment. Mr. Gladstone said, there being great force in the arguments that the bill was for the protection of agricultural tenants in the prosecution of their agricultural pursuits—(hear, hear)—he was of opinion that it might be right to insert in the measure some such provision as was proposed by the noble lord. (Hear, hear.) The Government would not accept the amendment in its present shape. It might be best to bring up a subsection at the stage of report. Later on the Premier agreed to accept the amendment if it were to stop at liquors. Hon. A. Hill consented to modify his amendment. Mr. Callan expressed his strong approval of the course taken by the Prime Minister. (Hear, hear.) Mr. T. D. Sullivan wished to know if the consent of the landlord would entitle the tenant to a license. (Loud cries of "No.") Sir Wilfrid Lawson moved to omit "with the consent of the landlord" from the clause, and being ruled by the Chairman as too late, gave notice that he would do so at a future stage.

June 24.—Mr. Caine gave notice that that day four weeks, on going into Committee of Supply, he would move—"That in the opinion of this House the Government measure embodying the Local Option resolutions passed by the House on 18th June, 1880, and 14th June, 1881, while clearly defining the principles and conditions that are to regulate the trade in excisable liquors, should entrust the administration of the law to boards specially elected for the purpose by the rate-payers, leaving the jurisdiction affecting the breaches of the law as at present to the ordinary tribunals of justice."

sumption of which article he declared to be "affecting the very life of this young and otherwise prosperous province," had been carried out. The Marquis of Hartington said the principal measures recommended by Mr. Aitchison had been carried into effect. The number of shops for the retail sale of opium had been reduced from 68 to 27, the reduction to take effect from April 1 last. From the same date also the rate at which opium was supplied to farmers, licensed vendors, or medical practitioners, had been raised from 24 to 28 and 32 rupees. Three other recommendations were made by Mr. Aitchison in connection with this subject, but had not been adopted—first, that opium should only be consumed on the premises, and the possession of opium in any quantity, however small, outside a shop, except in certain cases, would be illegal; that habitual opium smokers should be placed under restraint, and required to find security for their good behaviour; and, thirdly, that a Commissioner of Excise should be appointed for Burmah. Sir Wilfrid Lawson—Can the noble lord inform the House whether the shops which are closed are to receive compensation? (Laughter.)

July 4.—The Marquis of Hartington, replying to Mr. O'Donnell, said the steps taken in Burmah to check the consumption of opium would end in a sacrifice of revenue amounting to £50,000 a year. The increase in the consumption of spirits was due to the increased prosperity in the province and to the fact that weaker liquors had been substituted for those previously used. There had been no increase of drunkenness in consequence of the adoption of the out-still system, which provided for the wants of the people in a legitimate manner.

Mr. Trevelyan, replying to Mr. Puleston, defended the condemnation and dismissal of Lieutenant Deacon for drunkenness. His messmates all testified that he was drunk at dinner. His conduct all through was not "good." He could not be employed again, as that would be simply to keep him as an annuitant on the public for life. (Cheers.)

Replying to Mr. Hussey Vivian, Sir W. Harcourt said his attention had been called to the case stated by his learned friend, of a resolution being passed at a Licensed Victuallers' Meeting, on the 29th June, denouncing "spurious clubs," and asking that they should be put under public-house supervision, but the real difficulty lay in distinguishing between "spurious clubs" and clubs which were not spurious, and he had not yet arrived at any firm conclusion regarding it. Of course any place called a club merely as a pretext for selling liquors without a license would be dealt with at once.

In reply to Mr. M'Donald and Mr. M'Intosh, Mr. Trevelyan stated that Mr. Milne of the Danae was sentenced on the 29th December last to be dismissed the service and to be imprisoned for twelve months. Since then his sentence has been confirmed by the Lords of Admiralty and his imprisonment remitted. His offence was being in a state unfit to take charge of the engines at the very moment when it was his duty to take charge of them. This was testified by the commander and the chief engineer of his ship. He was tried in 1879 for drunkenness, pleaded guilty, lost his ship and two years seniority—drunkenness is a fault to which, however painful the individual cases are, it is not permissible to show indulgence when such vast and delicate machinery as the Northumberland with all her crew are dependent on the care and judgment of a single officer. He (Mr. Trevelyan) did not think medical evidence any better than that of any other man as to saying whether or not a man was fit for duty of this kind. (Hear, hear.)

On the motion of Lord R. Grosvenor, the Speaker was ordered to issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the Elgin Burghs in room of the right Hon. M. E. Grant Duff, who had been appointed Governor of Madras.

July 5.—Mr. Gladstone, in reply to Mr. Samuel Laing, said that he thought he could give his hon. friend a satisfactory answer regarding the condition of the revenue. The decrease on the revenue of £420,000 was on the Excise. The difference in the distribution of the malt duty and the beer duty over the accounts of the year quite accounted for it. The beer duty is receivable in very nearly equal proportions in the four quarters of the year, but the malt duty varies as much in the four quarters as 14 per cent. in one quarter and 40 per cent. in another. The difficulty in the present case was this—that 30 per cent. of the malt duty was in a normal year, in the three months ending 2nd June, and only 24 per cent. of the beer duty. When I mention that 1 per cent. of the beer duty means £80,000 and that 6 per cent. means only £512,000, it will be obvious at once that that disposes of the whole of the apparent decrease.

In reply to Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Gladstone said that he could hold out no hope whatever that the Sunday closing bill would be taken to-morrow.

July 7.—Mr. Childers, in replying to Mr. Brand regarding the death of soldiers through the excessive heat, incidentally stated that a ration of 1s. or 2s. according to distance was issued to the Volunteers appearing in Windsor Park, that ample supplies of water and large blocks of ice would be in the rear of each division and at the railway stations, and great attention has been paid to the medical arrangements both on the ground and at the stations.

July 11.—On the motion of Mr. Nicholson, the return was agreed to of "the number of new licenses granted by the Justices in each of the several counties of England and Wales in the years 1878-79, 1879-80, 1880-81, with the total number in the whole of England and Wales in each of the said years," &c., &c.

The Attorney-General for Ireland informed Mr. Lalor that the Magistrates in Petty Sessions had the legal power to withhold a certificate of license from publicans who obstructed the constabulary in the discharge of their legal duties. Due notice was given to the publicans in question that their licenses would be opposed.

July 12.—On the motion of Mr. Stevenson, the order for the second reading of the English Sunday closing Bill was discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

July 14.—Mr. Childers, replying to Mr. Tottenham, said that Mr. Brown (publican) of Newbridge refused to supply liquors to John Costello not because he was drunk but because he had been employed by the police, and he did not intend to interfere with the decision of Sir Thomas Steele who had put that public-house out of bounds.

July 18.—Mr. Alexander Asher, introduced by the Solicitor-General for Scotland and Mr. R. W. Duff, appeared at the table and took the oath and his seat for the Elgin district of burghs. (Liberal cheers.)

THE ELGIN BURGHS ELECTION.

After a tenure of twenty-four years, the Right Hon. Grant Duff last month relinquished his seat as a member of Parliament for the Elgin District of Burghs. The right hon. gentleman has been appointed Governor of Madras in succession to the late Right Hon. W. P. Adam, who died in office. Mr. Duff was at first very strongly opposed to the Permissive Bill, either in principle or policy. On its first introduction by Mr. Lawson in 1864 he voted against it, and repeated his vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson, after five years' absence from Parliament, moving its second reading. In 1870 and 1871 he was absent, but in 1873 he voted against it. In 1874, when the Tory Government divided upon it, we gladly observed that he had left the House prior to the division. In 1875, however, he voted adversely, but the next year he was again absent. The next year Sir Wilfrid gave up his day to the Irish Sunday closing party; in 1878 the right hon. gentleman voted again against the bill. In 1879 he voted for the Local Option resolution, thus supporting the principle, as we think he preferred a scheme like that propounded by Mr. Chamberlain—a modified Gothenberg scheme—to the Permissive Bill. In the next year he voted both in March and June, and in June this year he was again voting with Sir Wilfrid. He admitted, in the lobby of the House, to a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, that he had received from his constituents more letters regarding the Permissive Bill than on all other questions put together. He has our best wishes for his success in the important office to which he has been transferred, and we earnestly hope that when he returns to his native land, he may find Scotland exulting over the success of her direct liquor veto law.

No sooner was there a probability of the seat being vacant than quite a number of candidates appeared before the electors. First there was Mr. A. Craig-Sellar, late secretary to Lord-Advocate Young, author of the Manual of the Scottish Education Act, and the energetic colleague of the late Right Hon. W. P. Adam, the Liberal Whip previous and during the general election of last year; second, Alexander Asher, Esq., advocate, who, in the Liberal interest, unsuccessfully contested the representation of the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities at the general election last year; third, Mr. Douglas Ainslie, who offered himself in vain to the electors of East Aberdeenshire and of the St. Andrews Burghs; fourth, Mr. T. D. Buchanan, who was defeated by Lord Elcho last year in an attempt to carry Haddingtonshire in the Liberal interest; fifth, Mr. Jeans, who announced himself as a Land Leaguer; and sixth, Mr. M'Lean, who appeared in the Conservative interest, notwithstanding his overwhelming defeat in these burghs by the Right Hon. Grant Duff last year. Mr. Buchanan retired early, Mr. Jeans' mind lost its balance, and the last we heard of him, poor man, was his committal to the Inverness Lunatic Asylum. The Liberal representatives of the Burghs—Elgin, Peterhead, Banff, Cullen, Inverurie, and Kintore—with the exception of Cullen, attended at Inverurie, and decided on a "test ballot." This ballot was taken on Saturday, 9th ult., when Mr. Asher secured an absolute majority over Mr. Sellar and Mr. Ainslie, and was declared the Liberal candidate, the others retiring at once in his favour. Mr. M'Lean, the Conservative, believing discretion the better part of valour, withdrew, so that on Wednesday Mr. Asher was the only one nominated for the seat, and was thereupon declared duly elected.

Immediately on the announcement that Mr. Grant Duff was likely to retire, Mr. D. Blackwood, the northern district superintendent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, appeared in the burghs in the interests of the permissive suppression of the liquor traffic. Mr. Craig-Sellar was first waited upon, and freely and cordially told Mr. Blackwood that he would support Local Option resolutions as well as any bill the Government would bring forward, and expressed a hope that the bill would cover the whole scheme of Sir Wilfrid Lawson; then Mr. Asher, who stated quite distinctly that he was quite prepared to go as far as Mr. Sellar in the direction of Local Option. Mr. Jeans, when waited upon, stated that it was the land laws and not the liquor traffic that were the cause of the evils abounding in the country. Mr. Douglas Ainslie, in his speech at Banff on the 1st ult., said:—"There is only one other subject, gentlemen, with which I shall trouble you at present, and that is a much vexed and important one—the drink question in Scotland—(applause)—which has been so long, and which, I fear, will be for so long, a most vexatious and distressing subject. I must, gentlemen, say for myself that I totally disbelieve in anything resembling direct or forcible legislation on this subject. I am totally against Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Bill. I believe, on the other hand, most strongly in what I may call the application, as the medical men would say, of counter irritation in the matter. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) I believe most strongly in the formation of clubs and of reading-rooms, in the establishment of cheap and good concerts, in everything which can elevate the minds of the people in large towns and elsewhere. I would wish to see in every village in Scotland some kind of club-house or coffee-house—call it what they will—where young men and others could meet in the evening, have games, amuse themselves pleasantly, see their friends, be sheltered from the wet, and have an occupation. (Applause.) For I am quite sure that it is loafing about the streets, having nothing in particular to do, which leads nine-tenths of the men into idle and drunken habits. (Hear, hear, and applause.) I am sure there would be no greater benefactor to his country than a millionaire who would bequeath money for such a purpose. I would desire to see these institutions self-supporting in the long run, but, of course, they would need assistance at the first. I am sure that in this way more will be done to check drunkenness than by any direct legislative provisions that could be imagined. (Applause.) Those who have no other place to go to will go to the public-house when they are wet and cold or bored. Give them some place to go to which does not come under the denomination of a public-house, but which can be described as a comfortable, pleasant, well-aired, well-lighted, warm room, and I am quite sure they will not go to public-houses and to public-houses alone as they are forced—and I cannot blame them—to do at present." (Applause.) Subsequently at Inverurie he modified his views by defining his position as the same as Mr. Foster's, which is to give the people the power of reducing the number of public-houses to a certain maximum (!) but to hold out against giving them the power actually to prohibit public-houses. At Macduff he ventured to reiterate his obnoxious views. He said:—"Gentlemen, there is a subject which is always of interest in Scotland, I think, and that is the subject of the traffic in drink. I cannot say that I am a supporter of the out-and-out principle of Sir W. Lawson's Permissive Bill, and I am not, for this reason. I think it is an interference with the liberty of the subject. (Slight applause.) I do not think that a majority in any town or village has a right to say to the minority—'We are of opinion that you are not to obtain a glass of spirits at a public-house or elsewhere.' I think that the good gifts of Providence were bestowed upon us for judicious and moderate use. (Loud hisses and applause.) I am very sorry—(renewed hissing)—I am very sorry indeed—(hisses)—to have excited the meeting so much—to have excited so much opposition, but what I mean to say is that I think if the richer classes are allowed to take their glass of wine, I do not think we ought absolutely to forbid the poorer classes to take in some form or another, whether diluted or otherwise, some sort of alcohol. (Hisses and applause.) Gentlemen, all I mean to say is this—(interruption)—if you will allow me to finish my argument on the subject, you will, I am sure, agree with me more closely than you seem to do at present. I was going on to say that although I do not approve of extremist form of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's bill, I do approve of the Local Option Resolution. (Applause.) That is to say, I approve of the local authorities having the power to keep within the narrowest limits the number of public-houses in any given area. All I object to is absolute prohibition. I highly approve of keeping public-houses, which are in so very many cases a mere temptation to drinking, within the narrowest possible limits; but, gentlemen, as I stated at Banff, I have very much greater confidence in something else as a remedy for the evils of drinking, and that is in the application of counter attractions. I believe most strongly in the formation of clubs, of reading-rooms, in the establishment of cheap and good concerts, in everything which can elevate the minds of people. (Applause.)

Mr. Buchanan was prepared, he said at Inverurie, to support a suppressive veto if conjoined with a restrictive veto.

Mr. Asher, at Inverurie, in reply to a non-elect, said:—"Gentlemen, Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution was submitted to the House of Commons during the present session, and it has been carried by a large majority. When the Liberal Government see their way to introduce a measure for the purpose of giving effect to the views embodied in that resolution, if you send me to Parliament, I shall support that measure. (Loud applause.)

At Macduff Mr. Sellar said:—"I propose now, gentlemen, to say a single word upon a question which I understand is specially interesting to you in this locality. I mean the question of the licensing laws. The system of licensing which gives the control of licenses to the Justices of the Peace seems to me to be indefensible. In saying this, I make no reflection on the justices who have discharged their duties, which are not congenial, in an impartial way. What I say is this, that the system of administering justice should not be mixed up with the system of controlling licenses. (Cheers.) You might as well ask the judges of the Court of Session to regulate the excise, or the minister of the parish to act as sanitary inspector, as to appoint the Justices of the Peace to control the licenses. And I have high authority for this statement, an authority which I am sure every one here will regard as of the highest importance. I mean the late Lord Russell. In 1835 Lord Russell, or as he then was, Lord John Russell, passed his Municipal Corporations Reform Bill. In this bill there were clauses which took the control of licenses for beer shops from the Justices, and transferred them to the Town Councils, and on this subject Lord John Russell, as he then was, made the following observations, which I commend to your attention, 'With respect to another part of this measure,' he said, 'it refers to the powers of granting ale-house licenses. It is proposed that this power should not be vested in the hands of the magistracy. We think it ought not to be mixed or confounded with the duty of administering justice, and that it should be left to the council, or a committee of the council. The council, being elected by the ratepayers, will always act under popular control, and be less likely to abuse the power of granting licenses than magistrates, in whose case the robe of justice is sometimes employed to cover a great enormity of abuses.' These words were spoken forty-four years ago, and the struggle has been going on ever since. I need not tell you that I am in favour of the ratepayers and against the justices, and would support any well-considered measure which deals with the control of licenses in this sense. (Cheers.) The bill passed the House of Commons, but these ale-house clauses were thrown out by the House of Lords. In other words, the House of Commons of 1835 passed a measure taking the licensing authority from the justices and transferring it to a popularly elected body. This is what Sir Wilfrid Lawson has been so earnestly struggling to carry out. His Local Option resolution has now been carried twice in full meetings of the House of Commons. In the face of such an expression of popular opinion, the Government must take the measure up, and deal with it in the sense of the resolution. If I were returned to Parliament as representative for the Elgin Burghs, I should gladly support the Government in passing such a measure. (Cheers.)

It is believed that it is to the fact that he is a native of Morayshire, an eloquent speaker, a highly successful pleader at the bar, and that he will soon fill the position of Lord-Advocate for Scotland, that Mr. Asher has so easily won the favour of the electors. He has our best wishes. None can foresee but he may yet be the Government official for Scotland, who may have most to do with ridding her of her bane and stain—the liquor traffic.

Twenty years ago there was only one public house in Nazareth, now there are a dozen or more. The Greek and native Christians support these places. The population is only between 8,000 and 10,000. How the Mahommedans must cling to their religion, and how much they must contemn the religion of the Nazarene!

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—Mr. Arthur Robertson, Gaelic-speaking deputy of the Highland Temperance League, has had wonderful success in gospel temperance work in the far north within the last few weeks. He can count his recruits in the districts of Durness and the neighbourhood of Cape Wrath by hundreds. Mr. S. Finlayson, secretary of the League, 278 Argyle Street, Glasgow, writes that funds are urgently needed for carrying on the temperance campaign in the Highlands.—Ross-shire Journal.

The Sons of Temperance have a membership of 15,000, an increase of 750 on last year. The funds now amount to £44,000, an increase of £3,000.

There are in the United Kingdom 31,500,000 acres of waste lands. One half could be made productive, and so profitably diminish our grain imports.

THE BLUE RIBBON ARMY.—It is reported that eleven thousand persons have taken the total abstinence pledge at Cardiff during the year, chiefly through the instrumentality of this section of the temperance movement.

The use of alcoholic liquors by nursing mothers causes convulsions (in the children). Beer increases the quantity but depraves the quality of milk. A large portion of infant disease and mortality comes from drink.

A Blackburn magistrate is said to own 140 public-houses and beershops. He presides on the bench and fines those who get drunk. If they get drunk on week day, 2s. 6d., on Sabbath, 7s. 6d! but the Herald of Health has never heard of him fining beer-sellers or publicans.

THE RECHABITES.—This body has now 35,000 members enrolled; these pay 1d. per week for every 2s. 6d. received during sickness and 5d. per quarter for each £5 to be received at death. It has 88 Districts and Tents. The 34th, 40th, 44th, and 48th districts are in Scotland.

An old toper, who had attended the Polytechnic where a learned professor caused several explosions to take place from the gases produced from water, said, "You don't catch me putting water in my liquor after this. I had no idea that water was so dangerous, though I never liked to take much of it."

Our readers will be glad to hear that Mr. Frederick Sherlock, recently the secretary of the Irish Temperance League, still more recently associated with Rev. Chas. Bullock on Hand and Heart and the literature connected with it, is now the editor of the Church of England Temperance Chronicle. Mr. Sherlock is, besides being a journalist, an author, and his many contributions to the literature of temperance are eminently fitted to give an impetus to the agitation.

THE IRREPRESSIBLE RELIGIOUS QUESTION.—At a church in the north-west of London the two kinds of wine (fermented and unfermented) are used. Those who partake of the fermented sit in the area, those who prefer the unfermented sit under the galleries. There is no discussion of the subject, but there is a steadily and quietly increasing migration from the area to the side seats—which foreshows that by and bye the area will be required for the abstainers.—Daily Review.

AN UNAPPRECIATED HERITAGE.—The Duke of Portland is disposing of a large quantity of the wines which came into his possession on his succeeding to the title and estates, and yesterday a portion of it was offered for sale in the riding school at Welbeck. Ninety dozen of port, of vintage 1857, was sold at prices ranging from 60s. to 45s. per dozen, which is said to be much below its value. Eighty dozen dry Malaga sold at 21s. to 9s. per dozen, and a similar quantity of Arinto fetched from 11s. to 9s. per dozen.

THE STUDENT.

He was a lover of all curious lore,
Far back through the dim ages he would peer,
And gathered knowledge up from far and near,
Knowledge was all he asked, he would explore
The deepest secrets of the earth, and bring
The truth to light, and wealth and rank he deemed Base things, unworthy; silver never teemed
Where he was, knowledge was the only thing
He deemed worth seeking, lore of Greece and Rome
He learned, and gained from sages of the past
A wondrous knowledge, deep, majestic, vast,
And in the distant he was most at home,
And deeper grew his wonder as he wrought
The web of strange unfathomable thought.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Books, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

Health Lectures for the People. Edinburgh: Macniven & Wallace. One penny each, or one shilling bound. It is to Mrs. Trayner, the wife of Sheriff Trayner, that the public owes the delivery and subsequent publication of these health lectures. But one in reading them has the same feeling as the minister who prayed that God would forgive what was amiss and bless what was his own. In the second and the ninth lectures there is very much amiss. Dr. Russell offers a great deal of good advice on food, and does so in a most attractive way; indeed within the space of his brief lecture his readers will often have to pause and admire his powers of clearness and condensation. The tables he gives will greatly facilitate the reception of his observations, deepen the impression made by his lessons, and prove of easy reference at all times. It is when Dr. Russell enters upon the subject of stimulants that he becomes so untrustworthy a guide and so unsafe an adviser. We cannot do better than put two or three of his sentences into juxtaposition, when our readers will easily infer the proper rule on which to act for themselves. "Alcoholic stimulants are the worst we can select, speaking generally, for the effects pass off with great rapidity and leave the depression worse than before. There is no doubt that alcoholic liquors should be abjured by growing people, except under medical advice, and for grown up people the only time that they cannot be proved to do harm is when taken largely diluted along with food after the day's work is done." "I believe a good deal in the poisonous effects of alcohol." "Strong and healthy people likely to live long, are more apt to become teetotalers than those in weaker health. The former feel that they have no need of stimulants and that it is no sacrifice to take the pledge; the latter feel the need of them and decline, and so by a process of self-selection the strong man goes to the one side and the weaker man to the other." "Spirits cannot be used if work has still to be done, or cold endured, as they merely give a temporary spurt, and the fatigue and depression are then worse than before." Now if we did not receive the same advice from medical men in England, Ireland, and America, we should just perhaps think that Dr. Russell's references to alcohol were characterised by the caution peculiar to the Scotch mind. No one with any sense of self-preservation can imbibe liquors about which a medical gentleman like Dr. Russell speaks with such bated breath. Liquors which are not for the young, and only when largely diluted are for the grown up when exhausted with labour, are not for those immediately engaged in labour, nor for those enduring cold, and above all poisonous, may very well be dispensed with altogether. It would in our opinion have been much better for Dr. Russell to have put his veto on their use, and thus have helped those members of the medical profession who are seeking their entire exclusion from indulgence by healthy people. In the Social Reformer for May last year we reviewed a lecture by Professor Fraser almost identical with Lecture No. 9 of these Health Lectures, and looking to the wider circulation it will receive in its new form we, with still more forcible emphasis, condemn his observations on and his advices regarding strong drink.

Temperance Prospects and Temperance Action.—Annual Sermon of the Irish Temperance League. April, 1881. By the Rev. R. J. Lynd, B.A. Published by request. Belfast: Irish Temperance League; Glasgow: Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, 112 Bath Street. One penny each, or 6s. per hundred. This is a powerful sermon in matter and in style. The matter shows the preacher to have a decided opinion that Christians should be at the polling booth, and while there vote, not merely themselves, but by their example induce their friends and neighbours also to vote down the odious traffic in strong drink. The way in which he shows this constitutes the eloquent charm of the discourse. Our readers should aid in circulating this truly appropriate sermon. It is on sale at the Social Reformer offices.

The Onward Reciter. Nos. 117, 118, June and July, 1881. London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row. One penny each. These numbers amply fulfil the anticipations which are begot by the thoughts of every coming number of the Onward Reciter now. It has bravely stood the test of time, and now is acknowledged to be the "only best" reciter in the market for Bands of Hope and other juvenile temperance societies.

Temperance Worker, Nos. 97 to 101, January to June, 1881. London: National Temperance Publication Depot, 337 Strand. One penny each. The more we examine this little work the better we like it. Even a cursory glance at these numbers must convince any one of their importance and value to temperance advocates and agents. To Band of Hope teachers and local speakers we believe them indispensable. There is no temperance serial we more heartily welcome.

Joseph Livesey: A Life Story. By Frederick Sherlock, author of "Illustrious Abstainers," etc., etc. London: Home Words Publishing Office, Paternoster Buildings. This is a reprint from The Fireside, but it is worthy to rank with the "English men of letters." Mr. Sherlock, although having little new to tell, has set what is known in such a clear and graphic light that even those who knew or thought they knew all about the patriarch of temperance must have a rare pleasure in going over this life story and its lessons. We have not been slow to express our high admiration of the veteran temperance reformer, nor our deep, sad sorrow that he is so greatly against the permissive prohibitive interference of the legislature with the bloated liquor traffic. Yet we very heartily commend this sketch to our readers as vividly setting forth in a succinct and happy style those characteristics which so highly distinguish and ennoble Joseph Livesey, of Preston. A most excellent likeness of the venerable reformer adorns the book.

The Eighth Annual Report of the London Temperance Hospital. May, 1881. The London Temperance Hospital, Hampstead Road, N.W. This is an invaluable report. It is not merely the history of a year, but from it the sympathising friend of the institution can refresh his memory regarding all the prominent events that has occurred in the history of the hospital. From it we with pleasure learn that the hospital was opened in March last free of debt. As, however, £4000 will be required for the maintenance of the hospital, there is room and verge enough for the liberality of all towards this truly valuable temperance agency. In the old place, 112 Gower Street, during seven years four months 952 cases were treated. Of these 533 were cured, 378 relieved, and only 41 died. During the past year the patients number:—Out, 1125; in, 143—total, 1268. Of these there were 1052 from the metropolitan district and 63 from the country as out-patients; 99 from the metropolis and 44 from the country were in-patients = 143. Of whom 77 were cured, 37 relieved, 5 died, and 24 remain under treatment. There were 9 males and 6 females life abstainers; 37 males and 24 females abstainers = 76. Of non-abstainers there were 34 males and 33 females—total, 143. Of the 1,125 out patients, there were 77 male and 90 female life abstainers; 264 males, 250 females abstainers = 701; of non-abstainers 184 males, 240 females = 424—total, 1125. The receipts for the year on accounts of patients was £1579 5s. 7½d., the discharge £1435 17s. 5½d.; the balance to carry forward being £143 8s. 2d. We leave the rest of the report for want of space, earnestly recommending this highly important institution to the liberal consideration of our readers. It has fairly exploded the idea that alcoholic liquors are essential for the preparation of medicine or for the cure or relief of disease, and to make this evident over a series of years all friends should subscribe as liberally to its funds as their circumstances may permit.

The Sabbath School Magazine: issued by the Sabbath School Union. Glasgow: John McCallum & Co., 172 Buchanan Street. One penny. This monthly is conducted with great ability, and contains an amount of matter excellent in quality and admirably calculated to be of great use to all who aim to be praiseworthy Sabbath school teachers.

Special Dangers to Health in Large Towns.—By John Tatham, M.D., Medical Officer to the Burgh of Salford. Manchester: John Heywood. One penny. This is an impressive lecture. Dr. Tatham begins with the startling comparison of Glendale with Salford as shown by the mortality registers. At all ages the rate of mortality in the former is 15 per 1000, in Salford it is 27! In Glendale infants die under one year at the rate of 79 per 1000; in Salford the rate is 185. While 30 under five years of age die in Glendale, 93 die in Salford. The mortality of Salford and large towns generally far exceeds that of country places. Why? Dr. Tatham answers that "the causes which constitute the chief dangers to health in large towns" are two. 1, Overcrowding and insufficient ventilation; and 2, The employment in factories of female labour. We refer our readers to the lecture itself for a very able and lucid treatment of these two points, along with which, as our readers will readily believe, alcoholic stimulants are powerful sub-causes.

The Food Reform Magazine and Journal of the London Food Reform Society. No. 1. For July, 1881. Published quarterly. London: S. W. Partridge, 9 Paternoster Row. Price threepence. This is the first number of a food reform journal, and the preface has a manly ring about it which we heartily applaud. Mrs. Dr. Kingsford has not yet learned to plead her case successfully. She will only excite stubborn aversion and prejudice by designating flesh eating "corpse eating." We like her speech in the Memorial Hall much better. The other articles are dreamy, pretentious, and aimless. Much is to be learned from the speeches at the Memorial Hall meeting. Anthropophagy is an article that should afford to us sufficient grounds for the immediate dismissal of the editor. Only think of people, even in satire (!), speaking of "the flavour of a nice chop off a British young woman," or "the leg of a fat child," as dainty viands! We believe heartily in food reform, support the movement with all our heart, but we certainly would never derive sympathy for its beneficent aims from such a worthless issue as, apart from the preface and the meeting, this first number presents.

Monaco and its Gaming Tables.—By John Polson. Second edition. London: Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row. Sixpence. Mr. Polson intends to create a public opinion that will in the end overthrow the Monte Carlo gaming tables at Monaco. Monte Carlo might be an earthly paradise; it is at present simply a field of action for one of the worst passions of the human race. Its lease as a "gaming hell" does not expire until 1916! Its mistress (for it is held by a woman) reaps fabulous sums, and the Prince of Monaco shares the unenviable gains—getting in cash £2,083 yearly as rent, besides having his standing army and his public officials paid, and having the place maintained in a condition of the most elegant grandeur. The Church also derives immensely from the infamous vice. The late proprietor gave £125,000 to the Prince to maintain the Holy Church; but as only a little portion ever reached it, Widow Blanc has devoted an equal sum, but administers it herself! There are seven churches, which are almost all supported by the unholy gains of Monte Carlo. There are 300 or 400 regular clergy in religious houses, who mostly subsist upon it. Monaco is the only place known at present where the Church of Rome holds sole and absolute sway, and there hell holds constant carnival. The most selfish of the human race here engage in a constant war on each other's means. Yearly nearly two hundred suicides take place, and thousands receive irreparable injury to their means and minds. The impracticality can be at any time measured by taking a good rifle and shooting from east to west and from north to south. In both cases the space measured by the bullet exceeds the limits of the principality! It is intolerable to think of permitting such a paltry territory to continue to degrade and debase people by affording facilities for the action of the worst of human passions. Mr. Polson deserves credit for so courageously exposing the terrible evils of Monte Carlo; and apart from his aim his pamphlet reads like a romance.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. JOHN M'GAVIN, GLASGOW.—We deeply regret to have to record the sudden decease of this amiable and large-hearted citizen at Kilwinning on Tuesday, 12th ult., in the 63rd year of his age. Mr. M'Gavin was no ordinary man. He had the rare faculty of winning hosts of friends in every walk of life he trod. In business, in culture, in philanthropy, he reaped abundant success. He studiously eschewed the distraction of municipal and Parliamentary life, and in railway management, in the promotion of the fine arts, and in works of benevolence, he found ample room and verge enough for business and for the leisure he could command. He was attached to the temperance movement for many years, being chairman of the Board of Directors of the Scottish Temperance League, always exhibiting a sustained and generous interest in operations based on the educational phase of the movement. To that institution he has left the princely legacy of one thousand pounds. He will be greatly missed, and long remembered as a man of unbending integrity and high Christian principle.

At the ordinary meeting of the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., in the chair, the following resolution, moved by Bailie Selkirk, seconded by ex-Provost Dick, was unanimously adopted:—

That this Executive desires to record the expression of its deep regret at the great loss which the Temperance movement in Scotland has sustained by the death of Mr. John M'Gavin, Glasgow, whose long, earnest, and generous devotion to the cause has contributed greatly to its progress, and the influence of whose example will doubtless be felt for many years to come.

That an excerpt of this minute be sent to the bereaved sisters of the deceased. R. MACKAY, Secy.

THE LATE REV. D. M'RAE.—A very deep and wide-spread feeling of regret will be evoked by the death of this truly good man on the 19th ult., at the venerable age of 86. Mr. M' Rae was held in affectionate esteem by his flock, to whom he had ministered in holy things so long. He had for 56 years adorned the doctrines he preached by a consistent life of vital godliness. Many a time he rendered effective service to the temperance movement, and his references to the value of total abstinence while he was building up the Gorbals U.P. Church testified loudly to the importance of an abstaining ministry. His son, the Rev. David Macrae, A.M., of Dundee, is, in this respect, the worthy son of a worthy sire.

THE LATE MRS. JAS. MITCHELL.—On the 30th April last, at West Plains, Invercargill, New Zealand, this worthy woman entered into her rest at the ripe old age of 84. Shortly after the decease of her husband, Mr. James Mitchell, Scottish Superintendent of the United Kingdom Alliance, and Secretary of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, she joined her family in New Zealand. She has survived him nineteen years, three months, and twelve days. When he undertook the work of organising the Glasgow Temperance Mission, Mrs. Mitchell supported him by efforts which might fitly be termed indomitable, and on all occasions the help she gave to the movement was entitled to admiration. She has had the proud satisfaction to find that the work done by her husband formed in no ordinary degree the foundation of the abundant progress which is daily evident to all. Her friends, and many who remember her with pleasure, will feel sorrow at her decease, and join in paying a tribute of praise and regret to her memory.

POLITICAL ASPECT OF THE TEMPERANCE
REFORMATION.

(Being a Paper read at a Meeting of the Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union.)

BY W. DICKIE.

II.

THE responsibility laid upon the advocates of prohibition is, I admit, a very serious one. They are called upon to prove, not simply that great evils exist alongside of the liquor traffic, but that those evils are to be traced to it as the cause; not simply that those evils have occasionally, and it may be accidentally, resulted from it, but that wherever the cause is present we have also the effect; and that the evils are so enormous as to justify a departure from what, notwithstanding exceptions such as those to which I have alluded, is the common rule of freedom of trade. But serious as this task is, it is not one from which they need to shrink from any fear of the weakness of their case. We assert that intemperance is the direct cause of more crime than any other single agency of which we have any knowledge: it has been frequently said, and it is I think universally admitted to be little if at all beyond the truth, that it is the cause of nine-tenths of the crime committed in this country: further that it is the immediate cause of death in a very large proportion of the cases which annually swell our death-rate, and of nearly all the pauperism which afflicts a great portion of the community and burdens the remainder for their support; and that wherever facilities exist for the purchase of intoxicating drink, there is intemperance as an invariable result.

The object of our present inquiry is not so much to ascertain the truth of the indictment which abstainers bring against the liquor traffic as to determine whether the charges, if proved, would warrant the Government in adopting their conclusion and prohibiting the liquor traffic. I am therefore spared the necessity of going through the long catalogue of evils which we lay to its charge and adducing evidence regarding them. It is well, however, to refresh our memories at times, so that we may be kept alive to the vast importance of the question at issue, of which familiarity is apt to make us think lightly. I shall therefore mention one or two facts tending to show that the question of intemperance is one of momentous and vital importance, that it is a fact too terribly real and not merely a hideous nightmare which disturbs the rest of some heated enthusiasts. The Westminster Review declared many years ago that "drunkenness is the curse of England—a curse so great that it eclipses every other calamity under which we suffer. It is impossible to exaggerate the evils of drunkenness." The last of these sentences was adopted in so many words by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Stafford Northcote, in one of his public speeches; and the truth of the statement here made has been admitted by all our leading statesmen and by all authorities on social questions. We get some idea of the extent to which drinking customs prevail if we consider the amount annually spent on intoxicating liquors. In the year 1879 the amount so spent in the United Kingdom was, I am glad to say, £14,000,000 less than the sum expended on them in the preceding year. That of itself was a vast sum, but it only represented the eleventh part of the sum still actually spent upon these drinks. That amounted to £128,000,000; and unfortunately, with the first faint signs of returning commercial prosperity our expenditure on intoxicants began to increase. I am not in possession of the figures for last year, but they will, I believe, be considerably larger than those for 1879. Speaking of our national drink-bill for 1878, Earl Cairns, the late Lord Chancellor, said: "The interest of the national debt, the cost of our army, navy, judicial establishments, civil service, and education amount to between seventy million and eighty million per year. But mark that we spend in drink double the whole revenue which pays the whole expenses of this country. If people would drink half, they would save the whole of the revenue which is raised by taxation in this country." If they would drink none the saving would go a long way towards extinguishing the local rates too. So you see, even from a financial point of view, it is a national question of the greatest importance.

In speaking of the specific evils of intemperance I shall confine myself to one branch of them, viz., its effects upon human life. It has been computed by eminent medical authorities that no less than 42,000 persons die annually in the United Kingdom of disease brought on by their own intemperate habits, and that if we take into account the deaths indirectly caused, through accident or otherwise, by the intemperance of the persons themselves or of others; the number would not be less than 120,000. Let us try to realise if we can what this means in such a way as this.

If to-night the angel of death were to visit every home in Dumfries and strike down, not only the first-born, but every member of every household, man, woman, and child, and to-morrow the town were without a living inhabitant, the victims of even such an appalling calamity as that would fall far, far short of the number who are annually laid in the grave by the hand of drink. If the desolate town were re-peopled, and on the following night every soul again fell under the destroyer's power, it would yet fail to furnish us with a parallel. The terrible sacrifice would need to be repeated yet a third time before the loss of life would equal that which annually results from this one preventible cause. And if we are to reckon the number of indirect victims, we find that they are more in number than the combined population of the two countries of Dumfries and Kirkeudbright.

Let us look at the sad picture in yet another light.

The loss of life in the United Kingdom from two of the most fatal and wide-spread epidemics which have visited this country in recent times, the cholera of 1848 and 1854, did not amount to more, taking both epidemics together, than 80,000. That is certainly a fearful bill of mortality; but it does not equal the numbers which in the same years would be carried off by drink; and if we take into account the larger figures, representing the indirect results as well, we find that the fatal cases from two distinct visitations of cholera form only a third part of those which in two years are caused by intemperance. And if the Government felt called upon to adopt sanitary laws of a repressive and prohibitory nature, in order to prevent the death of large numbers of its citizens by pestilence at rarely recurring intervals, surely we may with perfect justice call upon it to adopt measures of a similar character to stay the ravages of another pestilence, not intermittent but constant in its character, which carries off not once in a generation but every year a hecatomb of victims equal in number to those who have fallen before the most fearful visitations of disease.

Another aspect in which we may view the effect of intemperance upon human life is this. According to tables which have been formed upon an extensive series of statistics, and which are used by insurance and benefit societies to calculate their risks and fix the amount of premiums to be charged, the average duration of life after a person has attained the age of twenty is forty-four years; but by well ascertained data it has been established that the average duration of life after the age of twenty, in the case of persons of intemperate habits, is only 15 years. In other words, the young man who at twenty becomes addicted to intemperance diminishes his expectation of life, humanly speaking, by twenty-nine years. True, this only applies to the intemperate, not to all who drink; but let it be remembered that the inexorable logic of statistics proves to demonstration that more than 40,000 persons annually pass over the boundary line of moderation to supply the place of those whom drink has laid in an early grave. And let all who feel confident in their own strength reflect what security they have that they or their loved ones will not help to swell that number.

This, however, is a slight digression from the proper purpose of this paper. I have now to seek to connect the liquor traffic with the evils of which I have spoken. That intemperance accompanies the general sale and consumption of strong drink as regularly as effect follows cause is proved by the past history of this country. I need not go further back than the early part of last century. Drunkenness was then so alarmingly prevalent that Government imposed what almost amounted to a prohibitive duty on whisky, with the object of lessening its consumption. In this they were unsuccessful, not because they acted on a wrong principle, but because of the inefficiency of the executive, which failed to put down the numerous band of smugglers to which the new state of things gave rise, and who, by evading the duty altogether, were able to supply the people with spirits as cheap or more cheaply than before. The vice has gone on increasing since that time, or at least it has not decreased in a proportion at all commensurate with the efforts, political, moral, and social, which have been made to repress it. We have thus strong evidence from the general tendency of history that intemperance stands to the public sale of drink in the relation of effect to cause. We have further positive evidence of the fact in the disappearance of the effect in those restricted areas where the alleged cause has been removed. I will only refer to one case, that of the little Irish town of Bessbrook, Co. Armagh. That is a place of some four thousand inhabitants, which is in the happy position of having within its borders neither a public-house nor licensed premises of any kind; and from the fact that it also has neither a policeman nor a pawnbroker, you may gather that its condition, if not quite Arcadian, is in striking contrast to that of a great portion of the Emerald Isle. Without disparaging other remedial measures which may be necessary, I may observe that we have here two important factors in the solution of the Irish problem, in the absence of whisky and the presence of industry, with opportunities for the exercise of that industry. I might further refer to the experience of Maine and other prohibitory States in America to show at once that prohibition is possible, and that it is attended with the good results which we claim for it. I know that doubts are attempted to be raised regarding the results of the Maine Law, as doubts are raised about every fact within the range of human knowledge; but it is a sufficient answer to these doubts to point out that other States of the Union, and our own colony of Canada, are so thoroughly convinced of the beneficial results of prohibition in Maine that they are following her example. The Canadian Parliament in 1878 passed a Permissive Bill, which has been adopted in many of the provinces. Within the last few months, the State of Kansas has, by a popular vote, decided for a prohibitory law. I may also notice in passing that a Permissive Bill has recently been passed in South Australia. I think I have indicated sufficient reasons for attributing the evils resulting from intemperance to the public sale of drink. And we may at once settle the logic of the matter by this self-evident proposition, that if the drink cannot be had, and consequently cannot be drunk, the evils which result from its excessive use will be effectually prevented.

Not a Necessary Trade.—Returning to Mr. Lowe's statement, with which I set out, I am compelled to admit that if the trade of a retailer of liquor is a necessary trade, then even the powerful indictment which we lay against it would not justify the Legislature in suppressing it. I am reminded that here I have against me the weighty authority of Adam Smith, the father of political economy. But Adam Smith lived a hundred years ago, and he had not the benefit of the medical testimony which we now possess as to the real nature of intoxicating drinks, or that might possibly have modified his opinion. And in venturing to differ from him on this point, I am encouraged by the reflection that while the greatest deference is still entertained for his opinions regarding the science of which he was the founder, his opinions have not been on all points slavishly followed. Adam Smith defended the Navigation Laws, which prohibited the carriage of foreign goods to this country in any but British ships; but the Navigation Laws have been repealed as the necessary sequence of free trade. He also gave at least a qualified sanction to the commercial doctrine of reciprocity, which has been repudiated within the last two years by both political parties in the British Parliament. To differ from Adam Smith is, therefore, not such an astounding thing as it might at first appear. Further, when I examine the passage in his book, "The Wealth of Nations," in which Mr. Lowe finds the opinion which he quotes, I find a theory there advanced which does not seem to me to be quite sound. The writer contends that if wines are only made so cheap as not to be an object of desire from the difficulty of obtaining them, people will cease drinking them to excess. To push this theory to its logical result, the best way would be to give the drink away for nothing. By establishing pumps in every town from which people could get as much whisky, wine, or beer as they pleased without payment, you will effectually prevent them from getting drunk; and the way in which temperance reformers could most profitably direct their efforts would be to form themselves into associations for the free distribution of intoxicating liquors.

To proceed, then, to show—the authority of Adam Smith notwithstanding—that the trade of a retailer of intoxicating liquors is not a necessary trade, I apprehend I only need to show that intoxicating liquors are not a necessary article of food. On that point recent medical testimony must be regarded as conclusive. Some doctors of high authority—not in any way identified with the temperance movement—go the length of saying that alcohol is a deleterious poison, as Sir William Gull, physician to the Queen, did in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords. Sir William adds that many people are dying day by day, poisoned by alcohol, who do not know it, and that even when used in what is regarded as moderation, it is “the most destructive agent we are aware of in this country.” I do not consider it necessary, however, for my present purpose, to prove that intoxicating liquors are poisonous. All that I feel called upon to assert is that they are not a necessary food; and in this I think I am supported by all the eminent medical authorities who have publicly expressed their opinion. I shall adduce only the evidence of three witnesses, and these among the least favourable I know. Sir James Paget, in an article contributed to the Contemporary Review, in opposition to the pleas of total abstainers, was only able to assert in defence of the custom of taking alcoholic liquors, that it was “certainly pleasant, and possibly useful.” Dr. Kidd, who wrote in the same journal, also unfavourably to the temperance movement, was compelled, by his sense of honesty, to make this very material admission:—“To a person of perfectly sound constitution, in ordinary good health, undoubtedly the rule of life should be not to take alcoholic fluids habitually, to reserve their use, like medicines, for actual states of disease.” The other witness to whom I shall refer is Dr. Fraser, one of the medical professors in the University of Edinburgh. He delivered a lecture in that city last winter, in which he sought to prove that alcohol was valuable as a food; but he also was obliged to admit that “people could work as well without it as with it, and that the addition of alcohol to the diet might even diminish the capacity for physical exertion.” The gist of medical testimony, so far as I have been able to gather it—even on the most unfavourable construction—is that while intoxicating drinks, when taken in small quantities may be a convenient food for some people, they are certainly not necessary, and to many their use, even in the smallest quantity, is positively dangerous. I am entitled to submit, on this evidence, that the trade of supplying what is not necessary is not a necessary trade.

Ought to be suppressed.—In conclusion, I have only now to apply the propositions I have attempted to establish. If I have succeeded in the proof—or if those propositions are capable of being proved, whether I have proved them or not—it follows that it is not only the right but the duty of the Government to prohibit the liquor traffic. If it be once admitted that that traffic is productive of great evils, which would be prevented by its suppression, it becomes a simple question of calculation whether there are any compensating benefits derived from it to counter-balance those evils. In face of the admittedly enormous evils, I submit the only admissible plea would be that it is necessary to supply an article of food; and that plea must certainly fail when brought to the test of competent evidence. Prohibition is demanded in order to protect the lives of multitudes of citizens who annually fall victims to abounding temptations; it is demanded for the protection of their fellow-citizens, who are exposed to serious danger from the crimes of the intemperate; it is demanded as a measure for the prevention of crime and the suppression of vice, and also as a measure which would greatly lighten the burden of taxation. We can appeal to the Government to grant our prayer by every reason which there is for its own existence. And although I do not expect to see the subject dealt with in this thorough manner by the present Parliament, I have no doubt that it will eventually be so dealt with. When once the public conscience is thoroughly roused to the enormity of the evils to which, from long familiarity, it has become callous, it will demand, in a voice which will not brook refusal, that the remedy shall be applied.

THE ACTION OF ALCOHOL UPON HEALTH.*

WHEN a small tract like this reaches a circulation of twenty thousand within a month, it is a proof that it has some extraordinary claim upon the reading community to whom it appeals. This has more than one. The author is one of the first physicians in London, who has as yet taken up no strong position in the temperance reformation, and is therefore free, in the opinion of society, from the suspicion or the taint of fanaticism, or partizanship, or bias. Then, the contents of the book are marked by the highest excellence, whether of style or matter. Standing between the great competing parties for national sway, the publicans and prohibitionists, Dr. Clark is, as it were, asked to decide upon their respective merits, and inform the nation which of them is most worthy of national regard. The judgment so calmly given is decisive. Alcohol is the great enemy of the human race, and, according to him, deserves a short shrift and a sure cord. The lines upon which the address is framed are exceedingly simple—the nature and influence of alcoholic liquors on sound or indifferent health, in work, in disease, and in its influence on the unborn. Dr. Clark, after setting forth the paramount importance of a knowledge of alcohol to the individual, enters with a solemn sense of his responsibility in treating of alcohol and its effects into his subject. We just give one of his striking remarks under each head without comment, assured that nothing that may be said by anyone can add to the impressiveness of his words:—“Alcohol is a poison, so is strychnine, so is arsenic, so is opium. It ranks with these, and, like it, can be habitually taken without any obvious prejudicial effect upon health, but only in exceedingly minute doses.” “Health is the state of body in which all the functions of it go on without notice or observation, and in which existence is felt to be pleasure, in which it is a kind of joy to see, to hear, to touch, to live. That is health. Now, this is a state that cannot be benefited by alcohol in any degree; nay, it is a state which in nine cases out of ten is injured by alcohol. It is a state which often bears alcohol without sensible injury, and it is not one which can in any way be benefited by alcohol. This is a state in which, sooner or later, the music goes out of tune under the continuous influence of alcohol.” There is a secondary sort of health which is the health of most of us, and the question is, what of it? What does alcohol do to it? Such health bears better with alcohol than any other, and even seems for a time to be benefited by it. There are some nervous people, people who are born into the world to be always ailing, and yet never ill. Health of this sort is a heavy burden to bear in life. It is always oppressive. I will next ask your attention to the question of work. One way of determining this matter is by appealing to personal experience; another, and perhaps the better way, is by appealing to a carefully conducted experiment with bodies of men. Now, I will try both questions. I have no hesitation in saying that if a man has the courage to cast aside the imaginative difficulties which surround an experiment of this kind, and say, 'None of your nonsense, I mean to try this experiment: I'm not a coward, and I will try it honestly,' he will succeed. People always look a little paler or thinner under such an experiment, but bulk is not the measure of power, nor colour the measure of health." "If there is any honest man who really wants to get at truth, I would tell him fearlessly, and I would risk all that I possess upon the back of the statement, that as certainly as he does try the experiment for a month or six weeks so certainly will he come to the conclusion that, however pleasant alcohol is for the moment, it is not a helper of work. It is not only not a helper of work, it is a hinderer of work, and every man who comes to the front of a profession in London is marked by this one characteristic: that the more busy he gets, the less in the shape of alcohol he takes, and his excuse is—'I am very sorry, but I cannot take it and do my work.' Now for the experiment, Dr. Parkes got a number of soldiers of the same age, of the same type of constitution, living under the same circumstances, eating the same food, breathing the same atmosphere, and he did this that the experiment might be fair, and he divided the soldiers into two gangs, an alcoholic gang, and a non-alcoholic gang, and he engaged these two gangs in certain works for which they were to be paid extra. He watched these gangs and took the result of their work, and it turned out that the alcoholic gang went far ahead at first. They had buckets of beer at their side and as they got a little tired they took beer, and the non-alcoholic gang were in an hour or two left nowhere; but he waited and watched, as I told you, and as the experiment went on the energies of the beer-drinkers began to speedily flag, and do what they would, before the end of the day the non-alcoholic gang had left them far behind. When this had gone on for some days the alcoholic gang begged that they might get into the non-alcoholic gang that they might earn a little more money; but Dr. Parkes, in order to make the experiment clinching and conclusive, transposed the gangs. He made the alcoholic gang the non-alcoholic gang, and vice versa—the men being very willing to lend themselves to the experiment—and the results were exactly the same. The alcoholic gang beat the non-alcoholic gang at the starting, and failed utterly towards the end of the day. This is the most conclusive, and, I think, by far the most crucial experiment that I know of upon the question of the relation of alcohol to work. With that I will set aside this question by saying from personal experience, and from experiments most carefully conducted over large bodies of men, it is capable of proof beyond all possibility of question, that alcohol in ordinary circumstances not only does not help work, but it is a serious hindrance of work. Now, as to the effect of alcoholic drinks upon disease. I went to my hospital to-day thinking of my lecture, and I asked myself this question, How many of these cases are due to natural and unavoidable causes, and how many are due to alcohol? I do not desire to make out a strong case, I desire to make out a true case. I am speaking solemnly and carefully in the presence of truth, and I tell you I am considerably within the mark when I say to you that in going the rounds of my hospital to-day seven out of every ten there owed their ill-health to alcohol. I do not know that one of them was what you call a drunkard. It is not the drunkards that suffer so much from alcohol. There are a number of men that we know to be drunkards. They get drunk, and they get sober, and they are so much ashamed of themselves that they won't touch the accursed thing for months to come, until somebody tempts them. These are not the men to suffer most from alcohol. No; the men that suffer truly and really from alcohol are those who are habitually taking a little too much. They are very good fellows, do their work well, but they are always drinking just a little more than the physiological quantity I mentioned at the outset; they are being sapped and undermined by this process. Day by day—just as the grass grows, and you cannot see it—day by day this little excess—often a little one—is doing its work. It upsets the stomach, the stomach upsets the other organs, and bit by bit under this fair, and genial, and jovial outside the constitution is being sapped, and suddenly, some fine day, this hale hearty man whose steps seem to make the earth resound again tumbles down in a fit. That is the way in which alcohol saps the constitution. Surely, surely, you will agree with me that a terrible responsibility lies upon those who, forgetful of these plain teachings which the commonest experience can yield, will stimulate people to keep themselves up with glasses of wine and glasses of beer. It is not they alone who suffer, but so soon as a man begins to take one drop more than what I have called the physiological quantity, the desire of it is not only begotten in him, but the desire of it becomes a part of his very nature, and that nature, so formed by his acts, is calculated to inflict curses inexpressible upon the earth when handed down to the generations that are to follow after him, as part and parcel of their being. What an awful thought is this? Can I say to you any words stronger than these of the terrible effects of the use of alcohol? It is when I myself think of all this that I am disposed, as I have said elsewhere, to rush to the opposite extreme, to give up my profession, to give up everything, and to go forth upon a holy crusade, preaching to all men—Beware of this enemy of the race."

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

THE WATCH'S FIRST OWNER.

"Don't preach," he said rudely. The wife looked at him with startled eyes, and then left the room. He filled and drained a couple of glasses and flung himself on the sofa.

Before I had been a week in my new mistress's possession I grew to love her very dearly. Her husband was not so kind to her as he might have been, considering she had neither kith nor kin in the world. I believe he loved her, but he was wrapped up in the idol self. She did not complain; I never heard a reproachful word fall from her lips; she was always gentle to him, always. Her utter forgetfulness of self was the most wonderful thing I have ever seen. She was left very much alone; in the long evenings it was often midnight before he came; and then his step was often unsteady, and his eyes burning with the fire drink had kindled within. She would slip away from him at such times, trying, poor thing, to hide the loathing and disgust she felt. I have heard many a broken prayer ascend from her chamber, but on such things I have not the heart to dwell. She grew paler and thinner, more weary and listless every day; but he did not see it. No, the man's feelings were being blunted, and would soon be dead. I remember, and shall remember as long as I live, what happened one wild February night. Early in the afternoon Mary Sylvester was sitting at the window with her hands idly clasped on her lap, and her eyes fixed on the leaden sky. A cold northerly wind was moaning among the leafless boughs in the Park and driving the sleet against the window panes. About four o'clock the door opened, and her husband came in. She uttered an exclamation of surprise, and ran to him anxiously.

"Jack! Home already! What has happened? Are you ill?"

"Don't bother," was the surly reply, and he strode past her, and flung himself on the sofa. "Nothing's wrong. I've got the sack, that's all."

"The what?" enquired the wife timidly, not understanding his slang.

"I'm paid off; my services are no longer required. Can you understand that? Nice prospect for us, isn't it?"

She grew pale.

"Paid off! Why, Jack, what have you done?"

"The upright governors are not satisfied with my behaviour, that's all. Don't ask me any more questions. Get me some dinner, I'm going out."

She bit her lips to still their quivering, and proceeded to obey him without a word.

No further conversation passed between them till dinner was past and he took up his hat again.

"Don't go out to-night, Jack," his wife said. "Stay with me this one night, I have something to tell you which has been on my lips for days."

He looked at her curiously. "It'll keep another day then," he said, passing out into the lobby. "Don't sit up for me."

She stood still until the outer door closed upon him, then dropping on her knees she gave way to a burst of weeping, most pitiful to hear. It appeared to relieve her overcharged heart, for she rose composed and took up some sewing. The storm was rising outside. The wind soughed louder through the leafless boughs, the sleet battered fiercely against the panes. The hours sped, and when ten rang Mrs. Sylvester folded up her work neatly, and laid it past, aye, for the last time. Then she removed her slippers and put on her boots. She lowered the gas in the dining-room, and taking a hat and shawl from the lobby, slipped out into the street locking the door behind her. Heedless of the rain, Mary Sylvester hurried on her way, only pausing now and again to regain the strength which failed her at every step. It was evident she was bent upon a purpose, for she threaded the labyrinth of streets with methodical speed, and at length turned into one quiet and unfrequented, and going swiftly along, paused in front of a plain, unpretending-looking shop, with half-lighted windows and shaded door. She stood a moment on the threshold and then entered. The interior was a perfect blaze of light, it was veritably a gin-palace. The smooth paved floor, marble topped counters, glittering chandeliers, sparkling glasses, flashing fountain, everything calculated to dazzle the eyes, and please the senses. One would look in vain here for the tattered and hungry-eyed drunkard, the loungers, so far as outward appearance goes, were gentlemen. It was one of your aristocratic resorts. Many eyes turned to look in amazement at the slim, lady-like figure, as it crossed the floor, looking neither to the right nor to the left, until she paused before a man who was evidently the principal.

"Mr. Sylvester is here, sir," she said in firm, clear tones. "Will you be good enough to take me where he is." The man bowed slightly confused, and requested her to follow him. He led the way to a back room, comfortably furnished, in which a company of gentlemen sat round a table playing cards for heavy stakes. The place reeked with the odour of brandy and tobacco. Mary Sylvester went round the circle to the chair where her husband sat, and laid her hand upon his shoulder. His companions stared, some of them laughed.

"Come home with me, Jack," she said, in a low voice. "I am very ill, and I have come all this way to bring you."

He paused irresolute, but a titter ran round the table and that decided him. He shook off the gentle hand.

"You have gone mad, I believe," he said roughly. "Go home and stay there, I'll come when I'm ready."

"Come with me now, Jack," she repeated. "I am so weak, I am afraid I shall not be able to reach home alone. You cannot send me away." He turned impatiently from her, and shuffled the cards in his hands. Mary Sylvester raised her sad eyes to the company. "Gentlemen, you are his friends. Try and persuade him to come. You cannot have the heart to see a poor weak woman go home alone."

"You had better go Sylvester," said one, but again the titter ran round the table, and Jack Sylvester raised his eyes to his wife's face full of a meaning she well understood.

"Go home, I shall not tell you again."

"Yes, I am going," she answered huskily. "But let me tell you here what I meant to tell you to-night, I am dying Jack, and you know it. It is my earnest prayer that the remembrance of this night may not haunt you in days to come, with the bitterest remorse a human soul can feel."

Like a spirit she had come, like a spirit she glided from their midst. The wind had fallen when she reached the street, and the sky was breaking overhead. Among the flying clouds the new moon was struggling for a place, and the evening star shone out like a messenger of peace from God. It was close on eleven o'clock when Mary Sylvester reached her home; the fire was low in the grate, and she was wet through, but that she did not heed. She flung herself into a chair, and for a long time sat very still. It neared midnight, and still he did not come. She arose at last and crossed the room. The piano was open, and a piece of music lay upon the key-board. It was a hymn, one of the sweetest ever penned. Forgetful of the lateness of the hour, she sat down and played over the prelude; a moment more and her voice rang through the quiet house in clear and mournful sweetness,

"Earth hath no sorrows
That Heaven cannot heal.

At these words she broke down, and buried her face on the keys. Just then a familiar step was heard at the door, the key was fitted to the lock, and her husband entered. She did not lift her head, nor show that she was aware of his presence. "What did you mean by making a fool of me before my friends," he asked fiercely. "I'll teach you not to try it again." Give him his due, if he had been sober he would not have done it; but, his hand fell heavily upon her woman's breast, not once, but twice. She uttered no cry, but went silently from the room, and tottered upstairs to her own. She was ill for many days, and he dared not go to her. But when they told him at last that the end was at hand, he went up and entered her chamber. The nurse went out closing the door behind her; none were present during that hour. Such pages in human lives are best unturned, so I will hasten to a close. She died that night with her head on his breast and his name the last on her lips—died of a broken heart. And, friends, hers was only one of the many, of which our God keeps a record against the day of judgment.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE NORTH.

DEAR SIR,—Your readers had laid before them last month a clear and full account of the Elgin Burghs' election so far as that election bore upon the permissive suppression of the liquor traffic. In thus again referring to it, I wish to state some of the impressions made on my mind during my stay in the Burghs. For many years I have had the conviction that the matter of prohibition has been in the hands of the social and moral reformers of the country if they had only realised how to wield their power. This opinion was strengthened by the recent election in the Elgin Burghs. It was quite apparent that the prohibitionists in the Burghs could get at least three of the advanced men who had a desire to represent the constituency in Parliament to go for a complete suppressive veto over the issue of licenses to be put into the hands of the ratepayers. Another thing was perfectly clear, and that was that only those who had ideas in harmony with the Permissive Bill took a special interest in the position of the candidates towards the liquor traffic. There are many theorists abroad in the country, who differ from us, but you never find them advocating their opinions earnestly, in a public way, or pressing them upon the attention of members of Parliament. They are theorists and theorists only. Then, I find a class of people who are constantly urging that we are not ready for prohibition. Those who teach this doctrine don't know the mischief they are doing. They are the enemies of prohibition. Many places in Scotland are ready to adopt a permissive law, and surely there is nothing that would so much tend to ripen prohibitory sentiment as the knowledge that there was a law of this description upon the Statute Book. Law is a mighty educator either for good or for evil, and I was glad to see that the prohibitionists of the Elgin Burghs fully realised this fact, and the gentleman whom they have helped to send to Parliament will register their convictions in the House of Commons when the time comes round for him to do so.

Temperance reformers are not so much hampered by the politicians as by their own weakness of faith and want of action. The politicians will faithfully follow if we loyally lead. They will never go before us, but will aid us just as we are in earnest. Let our claims, therefore, be stated with definiteness. Let us never complicate our position but simply ask for justice, and we can only get that by having a full veto to suppress the drink trade within the licensing areas.

On the 14th of July Mr. R. Stevenson met me at Nairn, where we had an excellent meeting on the Links. Mr. C. Masson, of the East Coast Mission, took the chair, and a number of public-spirited young men sang a few hymns, and we soon had an intelligent company of fully 200 persons. These sat down on a green bank, and we addressed them from the level ground below. Those who have walked over Nairn Links will have some idea of the beauty of the surroundings. The earnestness of those present was all that could be desired.

We then went to Forres where we had three open-air meetings, and Mr. Stevenson preached twice on Sabbath in the Evangelical Union Church. We found the friends in Forres in good heart, and our visit was rendered very agreeable. The people listened to our arguments for prohibition with seriousness, and evidently appreciated the meetings. We then went to Elgin. There are a number of warm friends of the temperance movement in this burgh. We had two meetings here, and were well supported by the temperance men at the meetings which contributed greatly to our success. While Elgin can boast of a goodly number of earnest and intelligent reformers, it must also be stated that they have a heavy task before them. The burgh is sadly burdened with drink shops, there being one to every 13 electors. That is an enormous burden for 13 electors to carry. These places are all licensed for profit and rent. Moral considerations don't go for much with those who have an eye to big rents and large profits through the manufacture and common sale of alcohol. You must attack the liquor laws, and suppress the system of license, if you want to do anything worthy of the temperance movement.

From Elgin we went to Inverness. I have frequently visited the Highland capital since I came to the North, and have always been gratified by the kindly reception given to me. This time was no exception to the rule. A number of the friends increased their contributions to our funds, and our meetings were large, and an intelligent interest was manifested. We sold seven dozen of Social Reformers at the meetings. I hope to be back again to Inverness in September. Mr. Stevenson was well pleased with our tour, and we were both confirmed in the opinion that the permissive suppression of the liquor traffic should be held up more persistently than ever it has been done. The traffic is still sweeping multitudes of our young men into the vortex of ruin, and the fair fame of our country is even being more tarnished by the injury done to our women. History shows us that nothing but the legal suppression of the traffic will meet our case; all other efforts are "Weak as a feather 'gainst a giant's shield, Light as a gossamer floating on the wind."

PUBLIC PRESS.

GOVERNOR TALBOT'S MESSAGE VETOING A LICENSE LAW.—"When I think of the victims to the use of intoxicating liquors in every village of the commonwealth; when I study the great field over which our Board of State Charities has supervision; when I consider our jails and workhouses, and houses of correction and the State Prison; when I try to compute the loss and charges upon all our industries by reason of imperfect labour, and the taxes for the support of these institutions for reformation and punishment, my judgment unqualifiedly condemns, and my heart and my manhood rebel against a system that would permit the great source of all this wrong, and misery, and crime to exist by the authority of this commonwealth. My convictions against the policy of such a system are too strong; my desire for the welfare and progress of the people is too ardent, and my official responsibilities are too solemn and resistless for me to hesitate in doing the duty laid upon me. I therefore return the bill entitled, 'An Act regulating the sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquor,' to the House of Representatives form which it originated, without executive sanction."

THREE REQUISITES FOR SUCCESSFUL LEGISLATION.—Mr. Caine, in a letter to the Times recently, writes:—"There are three requisites for successful legislation. 1st, The repeal of every Act on the statute-book relating to the licensing of public-houses. 2nd, One comprehensive Act in their place. 3rd, To entrust the administration of that Act to a licensing board elected by the ratepayers every three years by ballot, and the cumulative vote, following in every respect the precedent of the Education Act." To this every true reformer adds a fourth requisite—An absolute veto power placed unreservedly in the hands of the people themselves.

IT DOESN'T PAY.—It doesn't pay to hang one citizen because another citizen sells him liquor. It doesn't pay to have one citizen in the lunatic asylum, because another citizen sold him liquor. It doesn't pay to have one citizen in the county gaol, because another sells him liquor. It doesn't pay to have fifty working men ragged, to have one drinkshop-keeper dressed in broad cloth and flush of money. It doesn't pay to have ten smart, active, intelligent boys transformed into thieves, to enable one man to lead an easy life by selling them liquor. It doesn't pay to have fifty working men and their families live on bone soup and half rations, in order that one shopkeeper may flourish on roast turkey and champagne. It doesn't pay to have one thousand homes blasted, ruined, defiled, and turned into hells of discord and misery, in order that one wholesale liquor dealer may amass a large fortune.

AN ANCIENT TEMPERANCE PLEDGE.—The appendix to the fifth report on Historical MSS., Part I., report on the MSS. of A. J. K. Erskine, Esq., of Dun, in the county of Forfar, contains:—Temperance Bond, Dundee, July 5th, 1627.—The parties to this contract, which is attested by four witnesses, are Alexander Erskine, of Dun, and Sir Jhone Blair, of Baigillo. They bound themselves to drink nothing, except in their own dwellings, till May 1st, 1628, under a penalty of 500 merks Scots, for the first "failzie and brack," and of 100 merks for every succeeding one, and for security agreed to register the contract. The reason alleged for this agreement is that the "access (i.e., excess), of drinking is prohibit bothe be the law of God and man, and that they were willing to give guid exampill to vtheris be their lyff and conversacioun to abstain from the like abuse."—Montrose Standard.

JEANNIE DEANS.—When the carriage [that was to take her to Scotland] was getting ready, she was informed that the Duke of Argyll wished to speak with her, and being ushered into a splendid saloon, she was surprised to find that he wished to present her to his lady and daughters. "I bring you my little country-woman, Duchess"—these were the words of the introduction—"with an army of good fellows as gallant and steady as she is, and a good cause, I would not fear two to one." . . . The Duchess advanced, and in a few words, in which there was as much kindness as civility, assured Jeannie of the respect which she had for a character so affectionate and yet so firm, and added, "When you get home you will hear from me." "And from me," "And from me," "And from me," added the young ladies, one after the other, "for you are a credit to the land we love so well." . . .

"Jeannie," said the Duke, "you must have doch an' dorroch, or you will be unable to travel." There was a salver with cake and wine on the table. He took up a glass, drank "to all true hearts that loved Scotland," and offered a glass to his guest. Jeannie, however, declined it, saying, "she had never tasted wine in her life." "How comes that, Jeannie?" said the Duke—"Wine maketh glad, you know." "Ay, sir, but my father is like Jonadab, the son of Rechab, who charged his children that they should drink no wine." "I thought your father would have had more sense," said the Duke, "unless, indeed, he prefers brandy. But, however, Jeannie, if you will not drink you must eat, to save the character of my house."—The Heart of Millothian.

COMMUNION WINE QUESTION. — "I will give the reasons for refusing to acknowledge sacramental intoxicating liquor as a legitimate article of commerce—1st, Because 'wine' is nowhere mentioned as in any way connected with the observance of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper; 2nd, because the fruit of the vine in a liquid state is the only thing specified as a beverage employed on this sacred and solemn occasion; 3rd, because the 'pure blood of the grape,' in its virgin and uncorrupted state, is like the Saviour—'holy, harmless, and undefiled'; 4th, because there is no warrant in the Word of God for substituting intoxicating liquor instead of the 'fruit of the vine'; 5th, because intoxicating liquor is the Scriptural symbol of God's wrath and curse from Genesis to Revelation, and is the appropriate symbol of everything that is wicked, sinful, corrupt, polluted, abominable, and destructive, and is therefore utterly unfit to represent the perfect benignity and holiness of the life and character of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; 6th, because in neglect of the dying injunction of the great head of the Church, and by unwarrantably substituting intoxicating liquor instead of the 'fruit of the vine' in a binding ordinance of the Christian faith, the Church has incurred the great guilt of sanctioning and enforcing the dietetic misuse of narcotic and intoxicating poisons in almost every age and country; 7th, because this deplorable and unwarrantable change is part and parcel of the great apostacy which came in after the working of Satan, and is the true cause of the failure of the Church to eradicate those gigantic moral and physical evils springing from drunkenness, which still continue to afflict and disgrace almost every country and nation professing the Christian faith; 8th, because alcohol, the distinctive principle of all excisable and intoxicating liquors, is the product of corruption, and is no part of the 'fruit of the vine' as it comes from the hand of God; 9th, because it is the duty of the Church to banish intoxicating liquor from the table of the Lord, and to restore the practice of using the 'fruit of the vine' according to Divine appointment, and by so doing raise an effective testimony against the bacchanalian practices of the world, delivering the Church from the guilt of complicity, and thus giving the glory of a coming temperance reformation exclusively to the Holy One of Israel; 10th, because the whole teaching of the Word of God is in strict harmony with this view of the question." (Applause.)
—James M'Nair's speech at annual meeting Scottish Temperance League.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, from 15th July to 13th August inclusive. During that period 85 meetings were held, 38 being deputational, and 47 ordinary. At these meetings, 126 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. J. R. Waterston has visited Bo'ness, Leith, Edinburgh, Linlithgow, Glasgow, Kilsyth, Grange-mouth, Hamilton, Freuchie, Kirkcaldy, Pathhead, and Cupar, and addressed 32 meetings.

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Forres, Elgin, Inverness, Edinburgh, Larkhall, Greenock, Glasgow, Pollok-shaws, Hamilton, Lanark, Biggar, Lockerbie, Moffat, Coatbridge, and Whifflet, and addressed 29 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Forres, Elgin, Inverness, and Aberdeen, and addressed 17 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has visited Irvine, Glasgow, Kilbarchan, Greenock, Bonhill, Hamilton, Biggar, Lockerbie, Moffat, and Port-Glasgow, and addressed 14 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Kilbarchan, Glasgow, Lanark, Coatbridge, and Whifflet, and addressed 8 meetings.

Mr. W. Kesson has addressed 4 meetings in Greenock, Glasgow, and Port-Glasgow.

Mr. J. M'Donald has addressed 3 meetings in Kirkcaldy and Pathhead.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 3 meetings in Leith.

Mr. M. Edwards has addressed 2 meetings in Aberdeen.

Mr. A. Bennet has addressed 2 meetings in Pathhead.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has addressed 2 meetings in Cupar.

The following gentlemen have each taken part in the proceedings of meetings in the places which follow their names:—Revs. T. Parr, Leith; and M. Bell, Hamilton; Ex-Bailie Lewis, Hamilton; Councillor Cross, Hamilton; Messrs. John Ripley, Edinburgh; J. M. Skinner, Glasgow; J. Hamilton, Hamilton; A. S. Munro, Aberdeen; D. Ramsay, Edinburgh; J. Bone, Edinburgh; and C. Mason, Aberdeen.

POETRY.

THE HAWTHORN SPRAY.

I mark'd the beauteous hawthorn
Bloom sweetly in the shade:
The fairest thing by far that liv'd;
Within the sunlit glade;
Not merely fair to gaze upon;
But every passing gale
Receiv'd sweet odour from its breath
In wandering down the vale.
It sinful seem'd to covet thus,
Yet I could not pass it by;
And, even while I pluck'd the flower,
I grasp'd it with a sigh.
How fondly I caress'd it,
As slow I moved along,
Through the dimly shaded forest,
Cheer'd by the bird's sweet song.
An hour had gone beyond me,
And, from my window high,
I watched the sun's last shadows
Sink in the glowing sky.
And through the gentle twilight,
And 'mid the forest's gloom,
I could see the hawthorn shining
In all its pride and bloom.
While lonely, blighted, at my feet,
My lately cherish'd spray,
All crush'd, and pale, and sighted,
In faded beauty lay.
As I gaz'd upon its sisters
In all their bloom and pride,
I wept that I could not restore
Their darling to their side.
Thus is it with the wanton,
Who, wandering in the glade,
Beholds a cottage maiden
Bloom sweetly in the shade.
Charmed by her quiet beauty,
He steals the flower away,
Leaving loving hearts to mourn the loss,
And curse her natal day.
And when her fragrance dieth,
She is coldly cast away,
To fade and die neglected;
Like my blighted hawthorn spray.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, SEPTEMBER, 1881.

* * We have been most reluctantly obliged to leave over "The late Mr. John M'Donald," "Band of Hope Lesson," a letter from Mr. John Paton, and other important items.

* * The Social Reformer for October will contain a full report of the proceedings of the Annual Meetings of the Association, and we will issue a supplement in order to do that report every justice. 50 Copies 3s, 100, 6s, 200, 11s, exclusive of carriage. All orders should reach offices by 27th current.

MR. JOHN PATON.

We have the pleasure of intimating that this gentleman is to be at the disposal of the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 19th September to middle of December.

Early application for his services is necessary, and those who ask him to deliver a course of two or more lectures will, all things considered, have preference.

Application for his services, syllabuses of his lectures, terms, &c., should be made direct to the Secretary, R. Mackay, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, by whom they will be duly attended to.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION. ANNUAL MEETINGS.

The twenty-third annual meetings of this Association will be held in Glasgow on Tuesday, 27th September, 1881.

The Business Meeting will take place in the Christian Institute, 70 Bothwell Street, at 11 a.m. Treasurer Hamilton, J.P., President of the Association will occupy the chair. The annual reports will be submitted, office-bearers elected, and business of importance considered.

The Social Meeting of members and their friends will be held in the Saloon of the City Hall, Candle-riggs, at 4 p.m. precisely. John Williams, Esq., The Green, Wishaw, will preside at this meeting. Addresses by delegates and representatives of kindred associations. Tickets one shilling each, early application only will secure seats and prevent disappointment. To be had at 112 Bath Street, or sent to any address.

The Public Meeting will be held in the City Hall in the evening, at half-past seven o'clock.

LORD COLIN CAMPBELL, M.P., in the chair.

The Executive have pleasure in intimating that the following gentlemen have signified their intention to be present—

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, Bart., M.P. (United Kingdom Alliance).

DR. CAMERON, M.P.

BENJAMIN WHITWORTH, Esq., M.P.

REV. R. J. LYNDE, B.A., Belfast (Irish Temperance League).

REV. DR. NICOLSON, A.M.

Other speakers will be duly announced.

Societies subscribing to the Association the legal sum will please communicate the name of their delegates (one for every 10s. subscribed) to the secretary by early post.

Having regard to the importance of the business to pass under deliberation, and to the eminence of the chairman and speakers to be present at the evening meeting, the Executive have a confident expectation that they will be gratified by a large and enthusiastic attendance at all the meetings.

R. MACKAY, Secy.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION FROM A MEDICAL POINT OF VIEW.

BY JAMES MURRAY M'CUCCLOCH, M.D., &c.,
DUMFRIES.

We are glad that a second edition of this truly excellent lecture has been called for. It is beyond question the best argument for prohibition to which we can point, embodying the essence of all that has been written on abstinence as the duty of the individual, and prohibition by the will of the people as the duty of the state.

Copies are to be had from the office of this magazine, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, at one penny each, or six shillings per hundred, exclusive of carriage. Special terms for larger quantities. On receipt of twelve stamps, a dozen copies will be sent post free to any address.

We confidently rely on the liberal assistance of our friends in securing a large circulation for this admirable lecture.

We have pleasure in presenting the following press notice in addition to those that have already appeared:—

"The Temperance Reformation from a Medical Point of View."—By James Murray M'Cuulloch, M.D., &c., Dumfries. (Manchester: United Kingdom Alliance.)

The substance of this lecture was delivered to the students of Glasgow University twenty-one years ago, and "has now been re-written, corrected, extended, and re-published at the repeated solicitation of various parties at home and abroad." It is a thoroughly able and rigidly logical exposition of the subject with which it deals, and is worthy of a wide circulation. The general conclusions arrived at by Dr. McCulloch are, "that total abstinence from alcohol and all other grain poisons as articles of diet and refreshment is an imperative personal duty, and that the total and immediate prohibition of their manufacture and sale for such purposes is the duty of the state."—Temperance Record.

Wilfrid Lawson, Chattoe, Stafford, writes to the United Kingdom Alliance:—"Kindly forward me twelve copies of Dr. McCulloch's pamphlet, 'The Temperance Reformation from a Medical point of view.' That pamphlet, soon after it appeared, was read by my father and resulted in a healthy teetotal family, of which I am the oldest of nine, and I want to spread such useful information.

Dr. Cameron, M.P., in his place in Parliament, felt constrained last month in view of the chaotic condition of the Local Government Board in London with regard to small-pox, to direct attention to the frightful mortality arising from that loathsome disease in the metropolis. It seems that in the face of the epidemic the authorities are powerless, and that nearly 12,000 persons had died who under proper sanitary arrangements, as regards small-pox, might have been alive. To illustrate his position and to show that his allegation was well founded, he pointed out that while 1590 per million persons died of small pox in Glasgow, the mortality in London was as much as 4580 per million. This result he attributed to the want of a responsible office or department the same as existed in Glasgow, and he asserted that the people themselves were entirely at a loss, not knowing what to do or where to turn. That is just their position in relation to a greater epidemic. The Government does a little to restrain the liquor traffic, but not near enough, and many valuable lives are in consequence literally thrown away. Were there power conferred on the rate-payers for the efficient isolation of the drunk, whose virus infects so many, we should very soon see its evils disappear. The people properly inoculated with the lymph of agitation, the result would be a pustule in the shape of a vote for ever guarding against a recurrence of the disease. Those responsible for peace and good order would see that the isolation of the drink from the stomachs of their subjects was strictly enforced, and one most wasteful epidemic, worse than even the black plague, would, like it, live only on the page of history.

The other day, in the House of Lords, Lord Waveney brought forward his Cottiers' Bill, the principle of which was the sanitary improvement of the cabins of Ireland and Scotland. In course of the debate his Grace of Argyll endeavoured to show that if the bill became law every landlord would be compelled to reconstruct the cottages on his estate, and so a noble lord who had 4000 cottier tenants would have to disburse £56,000 for the purpose. The cottage which would give all the Irish ideas of life would at least cost £14. We waive consideration of the state of a country which can furnish such fearful statistical proofs of its sanitary condition. Our interest is based on the means of finding for every cottier a new cottage, when one can be built for £14. Ireland, "first flower of the field, and first gem of the sea," spends nearly £14,000,000 on drink which ruins the comfort of her homes, and renders her people more disaffected than industrious. Could the cottier inhabitants not leave the landlord of the public-house, and become fired with the noble inspiration of setting up as their own landlords? Such a transformation would not occur for the first time in her history. When early in the century her distilleries were stopped because of the ravages of famine, she was more prosperous than in the years when she had plenty and largely indulged in drinking. She was equally prosperous when now nearly fifty years ago Father Matthew administered the pledge to so many of her people. Were she to give up drinking and set industriously to work, in a few years we should see on every cottier's ground the substantial cottage superseding the filthy dilapidated cabin, and her people rising so rapidly in the scale of being as to be distinguished as much for their manifestation of the "hardy" virtues as unfortunately they are to-day held up to opprobrium as lazy, drunken, improvident, and seditious.

One of the most gratifying incidents of the Royal Review last month to all temperance reformers was that of ex-Lord Provost Collins, in the ancient Palace of Holyrood, receiving the honour of Knighthood at the hands of her most gracious Majesty the Queen. The gentleman whom all of us to-day hail as Sir William Collins must have been born at an auspicious hour. The son of a man whose exertions in behalf of temperance in the infancy of the temperance reformation were as indomitable as they are lasting, Sir William has through life trod worthily in his father's footsteps, and, throughout a career marked by uninterrupted commercial success, has ever been found one of the most trusted leaders of the Scottish temperance movement. His adherence to it has in no way impeded his progress towards honour and distinction. He has risen to be one of the magistrates of his native city, to hold the Commission of the Peace and the Deputy-Lieutenanship of Lanarkshire, to be the Hon. the Lord Provost of Glasgow, and now to be the recipient of a most signal mark of his Sovereign's favour. As an abstainer, it may be said with truth that his career is as singular as it has been brilliant. He has the hearty congratulation, uttered or unexpressed, of the Scottish temperance movement generally, and all will join with us, we believe, in wishing the new knight long life to wear his well-earned honours. He has been told by his Queen to be faithful, brave, and fortunate. He has been so, and no doubt will be still more so. But it has always been the duty of knights to devote themselves to the deliverance of the oppressed, and to go forth in search of adventures to show their stainless courage. Our new knight will, we hope, select the floor of the House of Commons for the scene of his doughty deeds, and there bear himself with knightly courage by the side of our own true knight, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, until the liquor traffic be wrenched from its legal hold upon this country and be utterly routed, defeated, and destroyed. As he couches his lance in this great encounter, may God defend the right.

A change has taken place in the representation of Edinburgh. Notwithstanding that there were persistent rumours that the Lord-Advocate would have to leave his position for the Bench or the Bar, yet it was felt that as he had given fair promise of being an honour to the office he held and that until he had had time and opportunity afforded him for vindicating his aspiration to his high position, he should not either resign or be compelled to give way to others. But this feeling has received a rude shock through the sudden announcement of his leaving the Home Office for the Bench of the Court of Session. It is not our duty to enter upon the reasons ostensible and concealed that induced him to retire. To our movement he was friendly, and although he has been unable to give Sir Wilfrid a vote yet, we always cherished the expectation he would support the principle and the policy to which we adhere whenever opportunity allowed. Our best wishes go with him to the dignified position he has accepted. There was quite a plethora of candidates for the vacancy in the representation of Edinburgh caused by his demission of office. Among these was ex-Bailie Lewis, and we have to freely express our regret, which is shared by a large number of Temperance Reformers in Scotland, that he was unable to see his way to become a candidate for the seat. He would have been an invaluable ally of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's in Parliament. After much speculation and some turbulent feeling the Liberal Association selected Mr. T. R. Buchanan as their only candidate. This decision was loyally acquiesced in by the other two Liberal Candidates, and Mr. Buchanan is now M.P. for Edinburgh. We are glad to be able to inform our readers that Mr. Buchanan is to be a firm supporter of the suppressive Local Option, and who knows but that it may be his high privilege to lead on the prohibitionists of Scotland in their demand for power to relieve themselves of the Liquor Traffic. Mr. Asher, M.P. for the Elgin burghs, has been raised to the dignity of Solicitor-General for Scotland, Mr. Balfour, M.P. for Clackmannan and Kinross-shires, being now Lord Advocate for Scotland. Mr. Asher has had to seek re-election, and as no opposition is offered he will soon be returned. A rumour that Mr. Henry Campbell-Bannerman, M.P. for the Stirling burghs, was to be elevated to the Peerage, fluttered the Temperance electors there, and only for a prompt denial of the accuracy of the statement we should have soon seen them mustering together to maintain these burghs as loyal supporters of the movement for the abolition of the Liquor Traffic. The motto of our friends should always be "Ready, aye Ready."

Our readers will, we hope, from the annual meeting announcements in another column, which are barely more than preliminary, be able, in some degree at least, to realize that these meetings promise to be by far the most influential which have yet taken place. Speaking of the public meeting, the chair will be occupied by the honourable the member for Argyllshire, Lord Colin Campbell, M.P. In him we have the descendant of an illustrious race, famous for the services it has rendered to the cause of freedom, whose ancestors had died on the scaffold martyrs to the liberties of Scotland. Linked through him to the present head of his noble family, the Duke of Argyll, we have a nobleman famous for his contributions to the momentous metaphysical problems of his time. With a brother Governor-General of Canada and the husband of one of the Princesses of the Royal family, surely if ever there can be cause for the liveliest satisfaction, it must be at the fact that the audience in the City Hall on the twenty-seventh of this month will muster under so noble a name. Then we are to have Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., again with us. Our champion will share our gratification at meeting under such illustrious auspices, for when he came amongst us first, he found us but a hardy few, although undaunted and undismayed. Time after time as he honoured our meetings by his presence, he found us rising in the estimation of our countrymen and women, whose numbers swelled our ranks, and whose political strength has been sufficient to secure for us during the past two years so triumphant a vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution. We shall welcome our champion once more with all the fervour we can exhibit or his courageous and revered leadership deserve. Dr. Cameron, whose steadfast adherence to our movement we cannot sufficiently admire, will receive a right cordial welcome, such as shall in some degree attest how highly we value his unwearied service to the temperance cause. Mr. Benjamin Whitworth, M.P., is the Chairman of the Executive of the United Kingdom Alliance, and will see for himself how we in Scotland feel towards those principles and policy which his Association have propagated with so much undaunted vigour. The Rev. R. J. Lynde, of Belfast, comes amongst us for the first time with a reputation for eloquence which begets the highest, we believe justifiable, expectations of his oratorical ability. The Rev. Dr. Nicolson, of Linlithgow, appears amongst us in full sympathy with our aims, and will doubtless set forth right worthily his views on our questions. Such is an outline of what we may confidently expect at our annual public gathering. When the arrangements as to speakers are completed, it will be found that at no annual meeting has there ever been a platform of such influence or excellences, nor one which will give a more powerful impetus to our agitation.

Then, as regards the Business Meeting, we cannot say so much, simply because that does not altogether depend upon the Executive. So far as the Executive is concerned, they may well have a proud satisfaction in once more meeting with their constituents to render an account of their stewardship. On our friends and members it will depend to make this meeting worthy of the stage at which the movement has arrived. There can be no dispute upon one point and that is, that the agitation must be far more vigorous and effective in the country and in Parliament before we can hope to constrain the attention of the Government to our contention. The Association, with the means at its disposal, cannot do much more than it is doing, and a glance at what other organizations expend on the agitation compared with the expenditure and the work of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will be immensely in its favour. The weak point of the Association lies solely here. It is unable to command power and talent nor to enter upon the agitation as fully furnished and equipped as the importance of the object in view demands. The Executive have over and over again laboured with strenuous energy to carry out the instructions of their constituents, trusting that the funds would be forthcoming to not only maintain but to vigorously increase the agitation. It will be for the Annual Meeting to say if their trust has been over sanguine or well founded. Any one will be able to see for himself or herself by the attention and deliberation given to the question of finance what will be the immediate prospects of the agitation. For ourselves, we will cling to the belief that the Executive will be encouraged by the generous liberality of their constituents to set themselves boldly, if such is the will of the meeting, to the task of framing a measure for the abolition of the liquor traffic by the people, and of submitting it to the country during the recess.

The friends of education must have felt elated at the progress of education so conclusively shown by Mr. Mundella's speech on the education estimates. But their elation is open to question if they rely upon education as the powerful factor of morality and temperance. There are now more than four million children at school, and it is cheering to find that the progress they are making is most substantial. The Board and voluntary schools are being recruited to a great extent from the children of the working classes, so that it is not too much to expect that in a few years we will have a population immeasurably educated above their grandfathers. This is done at some cost, but we have no doubt as to ample returns from the investment. The education given costs, in Board Schools, per scholar, £2 1s 11 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., while the grant earned is, per scholar, 15s. 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. In voluntary schools the cost is £1 14s. 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., and the grant earned by the scholars is equal to 15s. 5d. per head. The whole expense for the year is thus set forth:—Endowments, £143,000; voluntary subscriptions, £731,000; rates, £756,000; public grants, £1,431,000; school pence, £1,902,000; other sources, £65,000—total, over £5,000,000. It is pleasing to find that so dangerous a foe to society as ignorance is thus being so effectively grappled with, and the pleasure of anticipating that in a few years our nation will be largely freed from its trammels must also be great. Those friends who stand by education as the means of making all classes sober will not, we hope, forget that their favourite remedy is on its trial, and that in a few years at most its failure or success will be proved. Meantime we, knowing the tyranny of law, habit, and custom, cannot help being apprehensive of the future of these children now at our schools. The precepts of their teachers on temperance is one thing, but what if they do not run on all fours with their practice. At school they may learn the knowledge of alcohol and may be implored to avoid "the fell snare," but what if their first duty at home is to run for the dinner beer? The parent may, by sad experience recognise the superior virtue of temperance over the vice of intemperance, and confess his impossibility to compass it, but he can hardly be successful in dissuading his son from beer or tobacco since he himself is addicted to indulgence in them. The State is blind on this matter. It dispels ignorance by establishing the conditions of knowledge; at the same time it tolerates institutions having for their direct—their only end—the weakening of men's moral restraints and the exciting of their vicious propensities. The consequence is manifest. We have in the community a vast multitude educated but intemperate. Many a poor wretch overcome of drink and rendered by it dangerous and pestiferous, had the privilege of Sabbath school instruction, and of many of our criminals the same has to be said. So that when we rejoice at the progress of education we rejoice with trembling, because of the fate that, despite their education, will inevitably attend many of the bright scholars to whom Mr. Mundella referred. Were the State to give a grant equal in amount to what it gives for education—namely £1,431,000—for the purpose of educating the country into a knowledge of temperance, and were it at the same time to leave it to these same educated subjects to deliver themselves by a vote from the tyranny of the liquor trade, we dare venture to affirm that there would be such a substantial decrease in the crime, misery, and public burdens due to it, as would largely decrease the anxieties of future Chancellors of the Exchequer and City Treasurers, besides immeasurably increasing the morality and spirituality of all classes in the community.

ABOUT HEALTH.

AMONGST those who are equally wise and good we see diversity in the choice of objects to which they devote their leading thoughts and efforts. Some are specially interested in the promotion of temperance; others do more for the advancement of education, legislation, science, &c. Much, no doubt, depends upon diversities of natural disposition, but more upon environments that press upon the attention of one the necessity of efforts in a given direction, and upon others the urgent need for efforts in other directions. To whatever special evil attention is most directed, that evil is likely, in proportion, to bulk largely in the view of those who contemplate it. When its magnitude has to be spoken to, those concerned are apt to speak of it as of more immediate importance than anything else. In this we have an exemplification of the truth of the memorable expression "Mine eye affecteth my heart." And hence the importance of efforts made to fix the attention of the benevolent public upon prevailing evils, and needed reforms. Persistent efforts are, also, necessary because of the multiplicity of objects that may be said to be constantly competing for a share of public recognition. As a general rule evils have had to come to a certain height before the public mind could be aroused to deal with them effectively. When they had attained to this height they, in a measure, compelled attention to themselves, or, at any rate, it became much more easy for those who were already interested to secure the attention of others.

But an improved state of the public mind generally has much to do in determining specific action. The state, for example, of the criminal law that our forefathers were, as a nation, contented with would not be tolerated now. The history of the Temperance Reformation furnishes clear illustrations of these principles, especially of the latter. Between the strenuous efforts made to arouse the public mind to a sustained consideration of the magnitude of the evil, and the improved state of public morals, results promise to be soon secured that the majority of people would, not long ago, have deemed altogether unattainable. An important question is, What can be said for Health Reform, in the light of these principles, and in view of the history of the temperance and other reforms? Is the public mind—are our churches, and most other organizations—comparatively asleep in reference to what may be called the universal prevalence of disease and premature death? When war is raging thousands find premature graves. Widows and orphans are multiplied, and grief and lamentation because of bereavement are the inheritance of many a lately happy circle. Wide spread public attention is wide awake; general sympathy is felt, and the determination of all who are right hearted is firm that an end must be put to the war as early as possible consistently with national safety and honour. When by a railway or coal-pit accident, or the wide prevalence of a disastrous sea storm, hundreds of lives are suddenly lost, the heart of the nation is instantly stirred, and much is done in order that such calamities may be, in future, prevented. In harmony with the views before us, we have now, in every corner of the land, and amongst all ranks in society, great and growing attention given to the prevalence and remedy of intemperance. We have our societies, our leagues, our lodges, our annual assemblies, our conferences and contributions, reckoned in the aggregate by many thousands. But we have nothing to compare with this in reference to Health Reform. We have rather an excess than a deficiency of trained medical practitioners all over the country doing their best to cure disease. They do much good. They are indispensable in the meantime, but nevertheless, at same time, disease and premature death are prevailing to a sad extent in all places, and amongst all classes. In order that our country may be brought into anything like a satisfactory state there is an immense deal to be done that our present medical resources fail to accomplish; and, so far as we can see, are likely to fail to accomplish in the future. The reason is obvious. We never can have a healthy country on the principle of cure. We might as soon expect to be free from the scourge of war on the principle of taking up and caring for the wounded, while conflict was still allowed to rage. Temperance reformers are fully alive to this as regards securing universal sobriety. It must come to the same as regards health. We are not indifferent to what is accomplished by our sanitary authorities—the improvements in regard to location and construction of houses, drainage, &c.; but all these are doing but comparatively little. The broad deplorable fact is that disease and premature death, with all the consequent grief and loss to mourn, still "hold carnival." If they prevailed only amongst the debased the case would be very different; but every one knows that large numbers of the loveliest, the best, the most useful, and those most full of promise, are amongst the yearly victims. The main reason is—people are so ignorant of one or other of the laws of health, and they remain ignorant because the public mind has not yet been anything like thoroughly awakened to our duty and interest in reference to this matter. The London Ladies' Sanitary Society, and other kindred associations, have been doing excellent work for years past; but when, notwithstanding the honourable array of names of officials and supporters, we look at the meagre funds with which the committee is furnished, we are reminded of the lad with five barley loaves and two fishes. After all the ladies have been able to do, the refrain still returns—"Disease and premature death prevail everywhere." Nothing short of sustained efforts to teach all, everywhere, all the essential laws of health, will meet the requirements of the case. Pastors of churches must everywhere inculcate upon those who sit under them the duty to themselves, to their families, and to their God, of having an end put to disease and premature death, all of which come from ignorance of, and consequent transgression of, the laws of health which are all divinely established, and divinely vindicated laws. In addition to this we must have organizations, and agents to take up health reform, just as we have taken up the temperance reform. It is evident that this reform would contribute to the advancement of every other. How much do our churches, our leagues, &c., lose every year, by untimely invaliding and deaths amongst their supporters? Speaking of the health of the city arabs, the Times once remarked that the vagabonds must live in order to be reformed. In like manner the best of people must live in order to do good to the world.

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—VIII.

IRISH PUBLICAN CERTIFICATES—IRISH COTTERS—RETURNS OF NUMBER OF BREWERS, DISTILLERS—THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—RETURNS ON SPIRITS, &c.—RATIONS IN THE NAVY—PUBLICAN REGISTRARS.

July 21.—The Irish Attorney-General, in answer to Mr. Healy, stated that the magistrate's certificate required by a publican on the annual renewal of his license, was certificate to his good character, and to the peaceable and orderly manner in which his house has been conducted. The Magistrates did grant certificates unless they were satisfied by evidence on oath that the publican was not of good character, or that his house was not conducted in a decent and orderly manner. There was no statutory definition of the character of a publican. There was no law compelling the publican to provide cars for public hire or to the constabulary, but if it appeared that their refusal to do so was part of a certain system for the purpose of obstructing the law, the Magistrates might consider whether the support of such a system was consistent or inconsistent with their good character. In all such cases the constabulary had received orders to oppose the publicans. Keepers of cars were not unnaturally connected with publicans who kept the cars for the accommodation of bona fide travellers and others. Mr. Parnell—Will the right hon. gentleman explain what connection there is between selling porter and whisky over the counter and driving policemen? The Attorney-General said a man could be but one kind of character, and if a man was of a bad character it made no difference.

July 21.—Lord Waveney (in the House of Lords) brought in a bill to enforce such sanitary supervision and improvement in the cottagers' dwellings in Ireland and Scotland as would bring them abreast of the high civilization of the present day, on the ground that besides being dangerous to the inmates themselves, they are a danger to the community as centres of disaffection and infection. The bill was read a first time.

July 25.—A return was ordered, on the motion of Mr. Wakely, of the number of persons in each of the several collections of the United Kingdom licensed as brewers for sale, victuallers to sell beer to be drunk on the premises, and to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises; stating also quantity of malt, and corn, and sugar, including the equivalent of syrups consumed by them, particularising each class in each collection, from the first day of October, 1880, to the 30th day of September, 1881, of the number of barrels of beer exported from the United Kingdom, and the declared value thereof, and where exported to, from October 1, 1880, so distinguishing England, Scotland, and Ireland, of the amount of license and beer duly charged in the same period, &c.

August 5.—Mr. M'Farlane moved "that the administration of the law in cases of outrage upon the person has long been a reproach to our criminal courts; that outrages and assaults of the most brutal character, especially upon married women, even when they cause a cruel death, are commonly punished less severely than small offences against property; and that the admission of the crime of drunkenness as an extenuation of other crimes is immoral and acts as an incentive to persons about to commit outrages to wilfully deprive themselves of the guidance of reason." Sir William Harcourt, who saw the weak point of this injudicious motion, replied, showing that it meant to censure all who held the commission of the peace; that only inaccurate reports of what was done at assizes reached the public; that as magistrates had a maximum and minimum within which to work, sentences varied accordingly; and it was very difficult to know whether the prisoner was a confirmed criminal or merely in for the first time. Mere offences against property were committed generally by hardened criminals, but the same could not be said of those who committed assaults. Mr. M'Farlane offered to withdraw his motion, but it was negatived without a division.

August 11.—On the motion of Mr. Charles M'Laren, a return was agreed to respecting the duties on spirits, wine, malt, beer, &c., together with the duty on tobacco, and the excise license duties, in order to show as far as can be ascertained the proportions of the several items of revenue derived from England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, the population of each kingdom separately, &c.

August 13.—On the motion for going into Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates, Mr. Caine moved, "That in the opinion of this House it will promote good conduct and sobriety among the men and boys of the Royal Navy if the spirit ration were henceforth discontinued, and some equivalent given equal to the value of the spirit ration in the form of improved dietary or increased wages." The hon. member said the navy cooks were frequently drunk from spirit rations; the rations were allowed to accumulate for birthdays, and hence disorder and dissipation ensued; then teetotalers sold their rations to the drinkers, and authority and discipline were with difficulty maintained; then petty officers were bribed with rations to overlook offences. After all rum was not food, but a drug injurious to health, and should be discontinued. Medical evidence was adduced to show that neither in arctic or tropical regions did it serve the end intended, for temperance men in all cases distinguished themselves above their fellows. The spirit ration had been discontinued in the American navy for 18 years, and the best private shipowners in the country ran their ships on teetotal principles. He hoped before long they would see this very stupid regulation abolished to the advantage of the government and the improvement of the naval service. (Cheers.) Mr. Williamson seconded, saying that he sincerely believed that the existing arrangements were really a temptation to men and boys, impairing their efficiency; they were an obstacle to the spread of temperance among the crews; his experience as a large shipowner was that although grog had been at one time served out in his fleet, yet it had not been for more than 20 years. The change had done the men good, and had been promotive of efficiency and good conduct. (Cheers.) Sir John Hay held that the navy was not ripe for the proposal. A great deal had been done in the direction indicated in the motion, but there were a number of considerations of climate, &c., which weighed against the ration being done away with. Then the water on board was often of a questionable character, and the medical officers were in favour of the ration. For the last 20 years the ration had been withheld from all under 18 years of age, and a great number were members of temperance associations. He thought the great majority who used it should be allowed still to do so. The Admiralty should by all means go on and endeavour to induce the habit of temperance among our seamen and marines which had been making so much advance of late years. (Cheers.) Mr. Trevelyan congratulated the House on the interesting discussion, and especially thanked the hon. member who moved the motion at the very time when the Admiralty for the first time in 20 years were going to do something effectual. (Cheers.) An order had passed the Admiralty to fleets serving abroad, the effect of which would be to abolish flogging in the navy as long as that order was in force, and it was necessary to do something seriously to reduce the crimes for which flogging was inflicted. About the cause of these crimes there was no doubt whatever. In 1850 a committee of admirals and post captains reported that they had come to the conclusion that the evening grog was the source of all those evils which rendered discipline irksome and gave the navy a character for harshness which did not exist. (Cheers.) That report reduced the ration of grog one-half—from a quarter to an eighth of a pint per diem, and very considerable additions were made to the diet of our seamen. The present scale of diet was this:—breakfast, on cocoa, at 7 A.M.; dinner at noon, at which he had rum; supper at 4.30 P.M., and nothing till breakfast again. One feature was the cheapness of the allowance. The Admiralty purchased the spirit in bond with duty; the ration would be worth 2½d., but it only cost the country one-third of a penny. Last year these rations cost £14,500, but this year, in consequence of a rise in their price, they would cost £18,000. If a man chose to forego his ration, he got double its worth in savings; but if he chose to forego his provisions, he saved less than they cost. Then no one could draw his ration under 18 years of age. The danger to a youth was this,—there was always such a lot of liquor going a-begging in the lower deck, that he was tempted to take more than was good for him. Of the 38,000 6,333 were teetotalers, yet only 3,000 took money, or tea, or sugar in lieu of liquor. It was a bad thing for youths to take liquor, yet it was bad for them to get nothing to sustain them from 4 p.m. to 7 a.m. The following changes were to be made:—No lad was to get any spirit ration till he was 20 years of age, but in its stead he, and any other that liked, would get soluble cocoa and sugar. Chocolate was preferred by many to cocoa, and it was much more suitable than cocoa to the few weak stomachs in the navy. (Laughter.) Commanders were asked to see that the sailors should take this cocoa in a hot meal during the night watch, or instead of taking any cocoa, sailors could get sugar—the most popular ration on board ship. The present allowance of 1½ lbs. of biscuit would be changed to 1 lb. of biscuit and ¼ lb. of flour, out of which the sailors could make their great favourite “duff.” (Laughter.) The belief of the Admiralty was, that when the young sailor got a hot meal during the night, besides additional flour and sugar, he would not care to draw his grog ration, but prefer the healthy substitute for it. In the case of officers, the ration would be entirely stopped—(cheers)—and its cost incorporated in the mess fund. Then the exhaustive labour in the stokehole in tropical climates had excited the pity of the Admiralty, and captains had been permitted to serve out extra grog to the stokers and claret to the officers. In the case of stokers the permission had been used to its fullest extent. In tropical climates the allowance to officers and men was doubled, as it was thought alcohol would counteract the effects of the heat. Several courts-martial had shown the peril of this course, and to the tropical grog several poor fellows owed the fact that they were not now in her Majesty’s service. The present Board abolished these allowances, giving unlimited issues of oatmeal, and sugar, and water, and they were found to be, though not exhilarating, very cheering in their effects. (Laughter and cheers.) The present cost of rations was £18,000, but the proposed changes, if adopted by the whole navy, would cost £36,600. The operation, however, would be optional and gradual. The proposal of Mr. Holmes to put a value on the ration, so as to induce the teetotaler to sell to the navy rather than to his fellows, would entail a burden of £96,000, and add £80,000 to the navy estimates. The Government looked forward with confidence to the good which such changes would bring about. (Cheers.) Mr. W. H. Smith approved of the action of the Admiralty. Mr. E. Clarke spoke against the motion. Mr. Caine expressed his pleasure at the course taken by the Admiralty Board, and his motion was negated without a division.

Aug. 15.—Mr. Forster, in answer to a list of 14 queries by Mr. Brown, stated that Robert Humphreys had held the office of Deputy Assistant Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in two electoral districts in Belfast. In 1875 he married a widow who held, and still holds, a spirit license. Such license, even if held by himself, would not constitute a legal disability to act as registrar, but it would be contrary to the regulations.

EDINBURGH ELECTION.

Owing to the promotion of Lord Advocate M'Laren to the bench a vacancy last week occurred in Edinburgh. The following Candidates were immediately named:—T. R. Buchanan, Esq., Ex-Bailie Wilson, Ex-Bailie Lewis, and Treasurer Harrison, Edinburgh, and A. Dunn, Esq., London.

Strong efforts were made to persuade Ex-Bailie Lewis and A. Dunn, Esq. to stand, but after consultation with the parties favourable to each, these two gentlemen were withdrawn. The others issued addresses which, so far as our question was concerned, were as follows:—

Mr. Buchanan—“Deeply sensible of the terrible effects of intemperance, and considering that the greatness of the evil is such as to demand every effort at Legislative remedy, I will gladly vote for Sir W. Lawson’s Local Option resolution.”

Ex-Bailie Wilson—“It is generally acknowledged that the existing method of granting Licences for the Sale of Excisable Liquors requires reconsideration.

The principle of ‘Local Option’ has been approved of by the House of Commons, and on the last occasion that it was discussed it was voted for by a large majority of Scotch members. It now remains for consideration how the principle is to be applied, and in doing so I shall give a ready support to such a scheme as may best tend to lessen the evils of intemperance.”

Treasurer Harrison—“If the citizens of Edinburgh do me the honour to return me to Parliament, I shall consistently support the Government of Mr. Gladstone in all liberal legislation—in placing the Licensing Laws on a popular and workable basis.”

The friends immediately took action, and it was resolved that Mr. J. H. Waterston arrange an interview with each, and that the two following questions be submitted to them:—

1. “Are you prepared, in your view of Local Option, to give the ratepayers the entire control of the liquor traffic in their respective localities.”

2. “In the event of a Bill being introduced into Parliament embodying these views are you prepared to give it your strenuous support.”

Messrs. Buchanan and Wilson were waited on and gave an answer to both questions in the affirmative.

Treasurer Harrison could not see the deputation, but his friends intimated that if the questions were sent he would reply to them. Accordingly, this was done, and on Saturday evening at a public meeting he made the following statement:—“The Local Option question is something like the Permissive Bill, and, if I understand aright, what is meant by the Permissive Bill, is something which I don’t believe any free people would submit to for any length of time. (Hisses.) It proposes, as I understand it, to give to a majority of three-fourths of the inhabitants the power of dictating what we shall drink. (‘No, no.’) That is the power. (Cheers.) If it does not give that power then I am quite prepared to consider any measure which will tend to diminish intemperance, and to give it my most careful consideration and adopt it if it be practicable. (Cheers.) I will never consent to give any majority—a Voice—‘Free trade in all things’—absolute power over the minority.” (Cheers.)

Our friends now saw that Mr. Harrison must be defeated at all hazards and either Mr. Buchanan or Mr. Wilson returned. Great interest was taken in the action of the Liberal committee who met on Monday evening, when there was a large turn out. On the first vote Mr. Harrison was thrown out with a sweeping majority, and the final vote was taken between Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Wilson: the former receiving 100 votes and the latter 95—thus Mr. Buchanan was afterwards unanimously elected, and to-day he has been returned unopposed.

The temperance vote was pretty equally divided between Messrs. Buchanan and Wilson, parties being left to do as they considered best under local circumstances. Edinburgh maintains the proud position of having still two members who support Sir Wilfrid Lawson in his noble efforts to free his deeply suffering country.

IRVINE.—TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.—“Do good unto all men” is a proverb that seems to be acted upon by the members of the Rock of Safety Lodge of Good Templars in Irvine. Some few years ago the Royal Renfrew Militia encamped on the Irvine Moor, under the command of Sir Archibald Campbell, and no sooner were they settled than the Good Templars at once set about work to draw the men from the canteen and public houses. Year by year this has been going on, and each year sees efforts more strenuous than the previous one put forth. Last year, weekly entertainments, distribution of temperance tracts, and other works were carried on, and the concluding entertainment was a most enthusiastic gathering at a soiree given by the Lodge and friends to close upon 350 of the militia. The results have been most gratifying. This year the Lodge determined to carry on a still greater effort by having a Temperance Crusade extending over three weeks. To enable them to do so successfully they applied to the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, the Scottish Temperance League, and the Executive of the I.O.G.T. for lecturers, but only by the Scottish Permissive Bill Association was the request granted. The action of this Association was received with gratitude by the lodge, but the refusal of the others so damped the ardour of the members that it was resolved to abandon the crusade, and adhere to the entertainments only. When this was made known Mr. R. Mackay strongly urged the lodge to proceed with a week's crusade. Having resolved to do so, arrangements to begin on the evening of Friday, 8th July, were made, Mr. Robert Stevenson opening the proceedings. The attendance was reckoned very good for a beginning, and Mr. Stevenson delivered a very telling address reaching the hearts of his audience, and showing forth the benefits to be derived from total abstinence. Mr. Stevenson also addressed a meeting on Saturday evening, and gave great encouragement to all. Mr. Dransfield lectured on Monday evening, and was followed on Tuesday evening by Mr. R. Mackay who took advantage of the fine evening to have an out-door meeting. Taking his stand at the Bridgegatehead he held forth for about an hour and a half to an audience of about 300, and at the close announced next night's meeting in the Good Templar's Hall. At eight o'clock on Wednesday night the hall was well filled with an audience of upwards of 400, about one-half being from the camp. Mr. Mackay, on this occasion, gave a very telling address, the home-truths of temperance being listened to with marked attention. Following Mr. Mackay on Thursday evening came Mr. R. Dransfield, who also closed the course of lectures on Friday evening. Mr. Dransfield at once secured the ear of the house, more especially of the militia, by the recital of part of his own life, and as he proceeded and waxed eloquent in his denunciation of drink, his audience rewarded him with hearty plaudits. On both nights the audiences were good. The success that has attended these lectures warranted the lodge in making the proposal they first did, viz., of having a three week's campaign, for when brought to a close the audiences were not only large but enthusiastic, and not only would greater good results have been accomplished with the militia, but with the public as well. On Tuesday, 26th, the members of the lodge brought their efforts on behalf of the militia to a close with a soiree, to which the soldiers from the camp to the number of three hundred and fifty were invited, and eagerly accepted their invitation. The soiree was held in the Templar's Hall, and was under the presidency of Mr. S. B. Yuille who was ably supported on either hand by ministers of the town, sergeants of militia, prominent temperance reformers, etc. After a most substantial tea, served with precision and despatch, had been enjoyed, the chairman, who was warmly cheered on rising, referred to the work which had been done by the lodge in behalf of their military friends during their past and present sojourns on the moor. They hoped that their aim to benefit their friends in camp would have the result they earnestly and prayerfully desired. Their intercourse with the soldiers had been of the most pleasant kind, and they parted with them with the heartiest good wishes, trusting that they would staunchly adhere to a sound temperance practice. (Applause.) Mr. R. Dransfield of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association next addressed the meeting, and spoke of the personal advantages he had derived from total abstinence. He had tried both sides of the question, had experienced all the miseries that flowed from drink, and so was in a position to advise. His advice was to have nothing to do with the liquor traffic, as it brought only misery in its train not only on the individual himself but on all related to him. The illustrations given by Mr. Dransfield very forcibly illustrated the evils attending the use of intoxicating drink. The Rev. Messrs. Somerville, Rev. Mr. Maceaulay, and other friends addressed the meeting, paying a high tribute to the soldiers and to the Rock of Safety Lodge. To the one for their behaviour, and to the other for their enterprise and philanthropy. Songs, recitations, readings, and instrumental music imparted the liveliest enjoyment during the evening.

The usual votes of thanks to militia, members of the lodge, singers, speakers, readers, etc., were cordially awarded, and an effort which is so highly creditable to the Irvine I.O.G.T. Lodge, and fitted to do so much good, came to a close for the present.

EDINBURGH.—TEMPERANCE OPEN-AIR MEETING.—The last of the open-air meetings for the season, under the auspices of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society, was held last night in Jeffrey Street. Mr. R. M'Laren presided. Mr. Robert Stevenson from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association delivered an earnest and thoughtful address to a large audience. During the past week Mr. Stevenson addressed a number of meetings in different parts of the city. He was well received, always securing for himself a patient and attentive hearing. The meetings carried on for the past two months, it may be stated, have proved great successes. The attention exhibited throughout shows that the masses are taking an interest in the movement, and are beginning to be convinced that "drunkenness debaseth, and sobriety exalteth a nation," and that some strenuous means must be used to curb this sad social evil.—Daily Review.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

The "Eclipse" Temperance Elocutionist. London: John Kempster & Co. (Ld.), 9 and 10 Bride's Avenue. We heartily welcome the second edition of this excellent volume, and congratulate the publishers on their success. A new edition affords a gratifying and substantial proof of the estimation in which their Elocutionist is held. May another edition soon be required.

The Starlight Series of Temperance Tracts, compiled by the Editor of the British Workman. Sixpence packet, containing 1 to 40. London: S. W. Partridge & Co, Paternoster Row. We believe that the purchaser of this packet of Tracts will find in it a selection of all those telling stories and anecdotes which have made the temperance platform so impressively effective. The tracts are printed on fine paper, slightly toned, and are illustrated in the superior style which characterises all the publications of the renowned publishers.

Twentieth Annual Report of the Bonhill Total Abstinence Society. June, 1881. George L. Melville, secretary, address, Bonhill. We have always a pleasure in receiving this Society's report. There is a genuine ring about its temperance; a most hopeful outlook on the part of the committee visible on every page; a busy activity quite apparent even on its surface; and it always can command financial support from wealthy neighbours in the Vale. This year is no exception to the persistent progress which has distinguished it, nor to the prosperity its report unfolds. Income, £17 14s. 0½d., with balance from last year, £20 15s. 11d. and it commences the twenty-first year of its activity with the respectable balance of £3 5s. 8½d. It seems proud at being associated with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and we know of no Society that more closely co-operates with that institution.

A Word for the Pledge, and a Word to the Pledged.—By the Rev. Charles Courtenay, Curate of St. Paul's, Onslow Square. London: Church of England Temperance Society, London Palace Chambers, Bridge Street, Westminster, S.W. One penny each, or six shillings per hundred. These little books will easily go into a vest pocket. Yet, the first is thoroughly exhaustive of the subject of which it treats. In the 30 pages we find set forth the nature of the pledge—the prejudices against it—the form of it—exceptions—objections, and, lastly, an exposition of it. The Rev. Mr. Courtenay deserves credit for putting in a word for the pledge, but we have no sympathy with his interpretation of it. It is too lax for us. The companion volume is a word to the pledged, and is treated in the same incisive manner. We have the fate that overtakes him who takes the pledge—the being laughed at and avoided—the nature of teetotalism—temptations—warnings—living faith in abstinence—temperance work—the dangers of teetotalism. Here we have an earnest, kindly monitor, and even the staunchest of us will derive profit from the homely truths so pithily put before us.

Health: How to Obtain and How to Preserve it.—By Philip Foster, M.D. London: J. H. Roberts & Co., Essex Street, Strand. The edition for the million. One penny. This is a really excellent little guide to health, although so brief. It is crammed with sensible information on all the conditions and practices of health. If some of our Bible readers and missionaries were to distribute this, and urge on those to whom they gift it a strict compliance with its teachings, the lives of thousands would be saved and that of millions improved. Dr. Foster's remarks on liquor, although not so strong as the case demands, certainly offers no sanction for the use in health of intoxicating liquors.

Consumption and other Chest Diseases.—By George Thomas Congreve. London: Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row. One shilling. This is not simply an advertisement of the nostrum of a medical professor, but it is a most excellent treatise on the subject matter of which it treats. Consumption as exhibited in its preliminary, advanced, and closing stages, is set forth so clearly as to be readily recognised by the patient, and prescribed for by Dr. Congreve in a way that inspires confidence in his experience and skill. He has a medicine—the Balsamic Elixir, and also Camphor and Quinine Pills—which are said by patients to be invincible and infallible. He lays down a course of diet and hygiene which, if persevered in, must largely contribute to the restoration of those suffering from the dread disease of consumption. Observations on coughs, colds, asthma, and chronic bronchitis, add much to the value of the volume. We know cases that but for the beneficent intervention of Dr. Congreve must have proved fatal, and we heartily urge those who believe themselves to be in the fangs of this fearful scourge to read the book and judge for themselves.

The Lay Preacher: a Magazine for all Christian workers, etc. Edited by Rev. F. Wagstaff, F.R.H.S. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Twopence monthly. Vol. VI., third series. Nos. 61 to 67. We have perused these numbers with intense interest, and gained abundant profit and pleasure from the examination. It is hardly possible to exaggerate by praising the work. To lay preachers, evangelists, and Sabbath school teachers its worth is simply invaluable. Passing over the interesting "leading" articles, we can safely affirm that the outlines for the pulpit on Corinthians and Mark can hardly be surpassed for lucidity of exposition and fulness of illustration. "Work among the young" is excellently attended to, and the "Illustrative quotations and anecdotes" are exceedingly appropriate and incisive. The Lay Preacher needs only to be seen to be appreciated, and if some of our rich and benevolent Christians were to send a number to missionaries in whose work they were interested, they would find that they had taken a pleasant and effective means of stimulating thought and encouraging careful preparation on the part of those to whom they had shown this kindness. Rev. Mr. Wagstaff has our best wishes for his success in this truly needed and praiseworthy work.

William Morley Punshon, Preacher and Orator. 1824-81. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane. One shilling. This does not pretend to be more than a sketch of this famous man, but it is quite vivid enough to place before us the great excellencies that adorned Dr. Punshon's too brief existence and career. A burning earnestness was the life characteristic of this eloquent preacher. When he was being ordained, he is reported to have said—"Methodism was my birthplace, and by the grace of God shall be my home. I know not where there are greener pastures and stiller waters. It shall be my one purpose to devote my life to the service of God, and before this assembly—before my fathers and brethren in the ministry—and before the spirits of the just made perfect—I offer myself 'upon the altar which sanctifieth the gift to live and labour, serve and suffer, toil and triumph—to do and to die for God.'" This is the grand key-note of his life. How he moved on from service to service—how he sounded the praises of Methodism—how he lengthened its cords, strengthened its stakes, enlarged its borders, we are well reminded here, and the press has happily preserved some of the masterly addresses that have deservedly swelled the triumph of his oratorical reputation. Seven of these great orations are to be found in this book, which should be in the possession of every thoughtful reader. Its worth far exceeds its price.

Received—Health Papers for the People, 1880-1881, 1 to 7; Medical Temperance Journal; Graham's Science of Human Life, &c., &c.

AMBITION.

To yonder peak the youth inclined his eyes,
High was the hill and dangerous the way,
But conning to himself a poet's lay
He sought the peak that towered near the skies.
He climbed and climbed, dark storms came on, and shrill
The tempest blew, but still with eager foot
Unbaffled still he urged his mad pursuit,
Through dangers sought the pinnacle of the hill.
But midway when his heart did still beat high
To reach the summit, o'er a crag he fell
On the wild mountain, and the shepherds tell
How a fair youth, most beautiful, did lie
Dead, midway up the hill, his lovely form
All beat upon by the wild mountain storm.

VARIETIES.

Somebody has discovered in this country a tombstone to a good stepmother! It was erected a hundred years ago.

When a man married a large homely woman, his friends said that he took her in bulk, and didn't care for the workmanship.

Fashionable young lady, detaching her hair before retiring—"What dreams may come when we have shuffled off this mortal coil."

There is a charitable man in Cincinnati who keeps two ferocious dogs at his door, so that tramps desirous of getting a "bite" can have one without going indoors. He is not a rare fellow in these days.

A beer-seller wrote over his door, "Bear sold here." An old toper declared it was spelt right enough, for the fellow's beer was of his own "bruin."

"This milk is rather warm, boy, for such a cold morning," said a customer to a milk boy. "Yes; father put hot instead of cold water into it to keep it from freezing," was the simple and truthful reply.

The other day one of our distinguished pickpockets, who has a pew in one of the fashionable churches of the city, and cannot be induced to steal on Sundays, transferred a well-filled wallet from the pocket of an infamous stockbroker to his own. The next morning the stockbroker received his wallet and a note by messenger boy. The note read:—"From the contents of this wallet, I perceive that you are engaged in the unholy traffic of stock gambling. Therefore I return your wallet, for my conscience will not permit me to retain anything arising from that iniquitous business. I would return your money also had I not unfortunately spent it before discovering your real character."

M. Douglas ; Profr. W. G. Blaikie ; Revd. Thomas Kirkwood ; Revd. David Macrae ; Revd. Wm. Logan ; Revd. Alexander Oliver ; Revd. Wm. Clark ; Revd. John Renfrew ; Revd. Hector Hall ; &c., &c. ; Messrs. Daniel Bates, James Miller, James Richmond, Peter Campbell, John R. Miller, D. Stenhouse, Stewart Clark, Robert D. M'Ewan, James Wood, John Polson, Wm. Howat, John Logan, R. Monteith of Carstairs, Alexander Allan, James Craig, Edward Howat, John Davie, Alexander M'Clymont, T. Fairgrieve, David Rowan, John Tait, R. P. Blair, &c., &c., &c.

The CHAIRMAN then delivered his address, and remarked that one could not help asking why they were meeting to-day? The answer, he thought, was a simple one—their work had not been accomplished, and he considered his first duty was to congratulate them on being present at the annual meeting. It was very delightful to see old faces coming forward year after year, and it was still more grateful to know that they were making progress. (Applause.) He thought that was a great satisfaction they had got. Perhaps their movement in the past might be described as being faint yet pursuing, but now he held they were seeing very many signs of improvement to induce them to go forward with greater determination to gain their point than ever. (Applause.) It was interesting to notice a few of the signs of the times. Of course, in looking back to the great events that had taken place in the movement they must cast their eyes on the Forbes Mackenzie Act, an Act which had done an amount of good for Scotland and had been the precursor of other reforms and the pattern that other nations had taken to carry out their object. Since those days they had had the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, which had been another great step in the direction they were marching—(applause)—and it was an astonishing fact, and he had it on the authority of a Bishop, that there had been a million and half less money spent on drink in Ireland during the first year's operation of the Act than formerly, while apprehensions and convictions for drunkenness had been about 60 per cent. less than formerly. These facts regarding Ireland must tell upon the country, and whatever some individuals might say, these facts stood out, and people would ultimately be obliged to yield to facts. Then they had during the year the Local Option of Sir Wilfred Lawson. (Applause.) Although the resolution was good, yet the way in which it was received, and the speeches supporting it were better—even Mr. Bright's on the subject pointed very much in the direction of the suppression of the traffic. There was one point he would notice—the only thing that rather alarmed him—the question of compensation to the trade. That seemed an idea that many people had got—that the men in the traffic should be compensated. Mr. Gladstone had the idea himself, and if they were to be compensated on the principle of some five houses put up for sale in England which were valued at between £330,000 and £340,000, it was indeed to be a serious matter. Another point in the march of improvement was the passing of the Sunday Closing Bill for Wales, and although there seemed to be some ambiguity as to its effect at present, the question would soon be cleared up, and they would, no doubt, find it producing results similar to the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. They would doubtless have noticed that at the recent meeting of the British Association Mr. Hoyle read a very interesting paper on the cost of drink. He was opposed by Mr. Wheelhouse, who, however, unfortunately, seemed to be in want of education. Some people complained about the introducing of teetotal lectures at the meetings of the Association, but he (the chairman) really thought they would be the better of some of these lectures—(applause)—for he found that some of the individuals who appeared to despise these lectures seemed to have profited by them, and to admit that alcohol was not required by a person in health. (Applause.) The Social Science Congress was to be held in Dublin next month, and he had no doubt there would be some Armstrong guns loaded and discharged against the traffic. All these things showed that they were going on swimmingly, and those who were backing up the subject were advancing it very much. (Applause.)

He then called upon Mr. Mackay, Secretary, to read the report, which was as follows:—

TWENTY-THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Submitted to the Annual Business Meeting, held on Tuesday, 27th September, 1881.

Your Executive have once more the pleasing duty to discharge of submitting to you a brief and rapid survey of the past twelve month's work. The Great Temperance Reformation is gaining for itself the sympathy of all classes. The pulpit, the press, and the platform with deepening earnestness are spreading its truths throughout the country, which is being rapidly prepared to join in a united demand for legal powers to deal effectively with the liquor traffic. Parliament has by a substantial majority again affirmed its desire that the Government should without delay and without demur frame a measure on the lines of local option, and it only remains for the people to exhibit such an unquenchable determination to have it placed unreservedly in their hands for the agitation to culminate in a decisive triumph. During the year your Executive have, in prosecuting the Scottish agitation with courageous vigour, humbly, they believe, done what they could to bring about a triumphant issue for the permissive prohibitory movement there.

They now proceed to lay before you a short summary of the efforts of the year.

AGENCY.

In this department there has been no change. The Agents have been carrying out the instructions of last Annual Meeting, under your Executive's supervision, with unwearied energy, and, on the whole, to your Executive's satisfaction. Messrs. Black, Blackwood, Dransfield, Kesson, Lossock, Stevenson, and Waterston, are at present on the staff. Mr. Black has devoted himself entirely, with signal success, to the collection of funds, and his labours cannot be too highly praised. Mr. Blackwood continues to labour in the North, which he so worthily superintends. Messrs. Dransfield and Kesson are partially engaged, and co-operate principally and effectually with Mr. R. Stevenson, and meet with much appreciation. Mr. Lossock's services in the South-East continue to bear abundant fruit. Mr. Stevenson has a large district under his care, in the superintendence of which his well known ability is most manifest. Mr. Waterston labours in Edinburgh and neighbourhood. The district is a most important one, and he has shown himself admirably qualified to work it well. Your Secretary assists these gentlemen as often as his own duties will permit.

It may be interesting to you to know the platform labours of your agents as chronicled in Social Reformer, it is as follows:—Mr. Waterston 247 lectures and addresses: Mr. Stevenson 244, Mr. Blackwood 198, Mr. Dransfield 103, and Mr. Kesson 36. Mr. John Paton has delivered 69 addresses, and your Secretary 82 during the year.

Laudable as the efforts of your agents have been, still your Association is decidedly undermanned. Were you to-day to recommend the Executive to engage an additional agent, at least, they would be able to enter upon a long contemplated scheme of readjustment of their Agencies, which they feel would increase its efficiency, and of which they could, by even next year, present a most gratifying report. Were a new agent to be appointed your district superintendents would be in the proportion of one agent to fifteen members of Parliament. They could not urge a stronger reason in favour of such an increase than such a statement, and with it they leave the matter to your best consideration.

THE MEETINGS OF THE YEAR.

Your Executive are gratified to have to report that the meetings of the year have been uniformly successful. They have been largely attended, and have excited considerable attention in the localities in which they have been held. They number, 956, of which 304 are deputational, and 652 are ordinary. At these meetings 1311 addresses and lectures were delivered. They have been held under all auspices, all sections heartily co-operating with your Executive in making them effective. In no other way can the misconceptions, misrepresentations, and the ignorance on your question be more effectually dispelled, and that enlightened public opinion formed, which will one day by its invincible power crown your agitation with success.

Your Executive acknowledge with deep gratitude the kindness of those gentlemen who have taken part in these as well as other meetings for the consideration and dissemination of your principles and policy:—Sir William Collins; W. S. Allan, Esq., M.P.; W. S. Caine, Esq., M.P.; Jas. Stewart, Esq., M.P.; Hon. A. Vidal, Canada; Ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P.; Sheriff Dougal; Provost Campbell; ex-Provost Dick; ex-Provost Rogerson; ex-Bailie Moncur; ex-Bailie Lambertson; ex-Bailie Maxwell; ex-Bailie Torrens; Bailie Kerr; Bailie Selkirk; Bailie Lyall; Treasurer Hamilton; ex-Councillor Rutherford; Rev. Professor Blaikie; Rev. Professor Hunter; Rev. Dr. Adamson; Rev. Dr. Ritchie; Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown; Rev. Dr. Nicolson; Revs. D. Macrae; T. Evans; J. Kay; John Kirk, Jun.; W. Tooley; Thos. Dickson; E. J. Boon; W. Armstrong; T. L. Armitage; J. Strachan; W. Arnot; J. Paterson; S. Harding; R. Wallace; R. Paterson, and Capt. Brothie; Messrs. Jas. H. Raper, J. Wilson, J. P.; J. Horn, D. Fyffe, James Paterson, A. S. Munro, H. Batters, W. Briggs, W. Scrymgeour, J. Scrymgeour, W. J. Wood, D. Moore, M. Edwards, A. Bennet, John Nisbet, John Steel, J. Ripley, J. M. Skinner, J. Bone, J. M'Donald, J. W. Mackay, etc., etc.

During the year several important meetings have taken place. Among those specially worthy of mention the following may be named—at Greenock that most excellent meeting in The Temperance Institute, over which Provost Campbell presided, and at which the member for the Burgh, James Stewart, Esq., M.P., and ex-Provost Merton took part, and where Bailies Torrens and Selkirk, and your secretary represented the Association; at Pollokshaws with ex-Provost Cameron in the chair, where Mr. James Winning and Messrs. Stevenson and Drausfield addressed a very excellent attendance; at Peebles with Dr. Connell in the chair, the deputation being Mr. Steel and Mr. Waterston, and in which a number of warm local friends joined; at Pollokshields where Provost Hamilton presided, and where your deputation included ex-Bailie Torrens and Bailie Selkirk; at Bo'ness Mr. J. Hyslop presided, and where your deputation comprised Rev. S. Sleath, Rev. J. H. Paterson, Mr. J. H. Waterston, and Mr. T. Hope, J.P., A. Brown, Esq., Mr. Dymock also largely contributed to the success of this meeting; at Rutherglen where, under the chairmanship of Rev. Wm. Armstrong, ex-Bailie Torrens, Bailie Selkirk, and R. M'Callum represented this Association; at Grangemouth where Provost Macpherson occupied the chair, while Rev. J. H. Paterson, Bailie Selkirk and Mr. Waterston assisted by many warm friends in the town formed your deputation; at Hamilton where your Association had the able assistance of ex-Bailie Lewis who was accompanied by Mr. Waterston. Meetings have been held in many of these places: at Dumfries, where, joined by Councillor Johnstone, Rev. W. Tooley, Rev. James Strachan, and Dr. M'ulloch, Mr. Stevenson, and your secretary had two excellent meetings.

Your Executive cordially invited Mr. J. W. Manning of Canada, to Scotland for a week. Mr. Manning accordingly visited Kilmarnock, Dumbarton, Kirkcaldy and Galashiels. His meetings were, as might be expected from his high reputation and well known ability, most successful. Mr. James Winning, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Rev. Samuel Harding, Mr. James H. Waterston, and your secretary accompanied him. Very warm assistance was rendered by local friends so that these meetings were among the most gratifying of the meetings of the year. Mr. Manning met the Executive in friendly conference in Glasgow, where a most interesting conversation took place on prohibition in Canada and "the States," by which your Executive's favourable impressions of the prohibitory movement in the Far West were deepened and extended.

The usual deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance visited Scotland, unfortunately at a time when the weather was extremely inclement. Rev. H. H. Pereira was the sole English member of the deputation. He began at Dumfries and visited successively Irvine, Montrose, Aberdeen and Greenock. To these places he was accompanied by Rev. Samuel Harding, Mr.

James Winning, Mr. Robert Stevenson, and Mr. Wm. Blackwood, and at all of them he received most efficient local support. At Greenock he preached a sermon. He succumbed to the excessive cold. His place was taken at short notice at Linlithgow by Bailie Selkirk, who along with Rev. J. Paterson, Dumbarton, and Mr. Waterston, met with a most cordial reception. The local friends rendered substantial aid and the meeting as might be expected was highly successful. At Cupar his place was taken by Rev. E. J. Boon, Mr. D. Fyffe, and Mr. J. H. Waterston, and a most satisfactory meeting testified to the ability of the improvised deputation. Although not so brilliant as the Alliance meetings in Scotland usually are, these did much to attract the public in the places visited, and greatly commended permissive prohibition to the listening audiences.

At the annual meeting of last year it was a special instruction to the Executive to have a number of district conferences to assist the parliamentary efforts of the Association. These conferences have largely contributed to the satisfactory prosecution of the agitation during the year. Chief among them may be mentioned that at Edinburgh where a signally successful conference took place in the New Waverley Hall, ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., presided and the speakers included such well known friends as Professor Blaikie, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Revs. John Kay, and J. C. Cunningham, ex-Provost Dick, Bailie Selkirk, Messrs. J. Winning, G. Tait, J. Coutts, and J. H. Waterston. The whole proceedings were such as to encourage an early visit to the Scottish Capital. A very successful conference was held in the Young Men's Christian Association, Dundee, over which Bailie Selkirk presided, in the absence of ex-Bailie Torrens. This was a most gratifying meeting, the several speakers exhibiting such a grasp of the object aimed at as to make all they said interesting. Ex-Bailies Moncur and Maxwell, ex-Councillor Rutherford, Rev. David Macrae, A. Inglis, and T. Dickson, Messrs. Briggs, W. Scrymgeour, and J. Winning took a prominent part in the proceedings. Conferences were held at Dunso, Dunbar, Peebles, at which Mr. John Steel and Mr. Waterston represented the Association. At Grangemouth an excellent one took place, on which occasion Provost Macpherson took the chair. Conferences were held at Edinburgh, Broxburn, Loanhead, Falkland, West Calder, Irvine, Govan, Aberdeen, and many other places, and were very pleasant to those joining them, and largely beneficial to the agitation.

Previous to the debate and division in Parliament it was resolved to follow up the Electoral work by Mr. John Paton in North Ayrshire by as many deputational and conference meetings as possible. The dreadful inclemency of the weather marred in some degree the attendance, but the spirit of these meetings was most commendable, the resolution to act in view of the coming division being enthusiastically adopted. Bailie Selkirk and your secretary were present at Ardrossan, and Mr. James Winning was present with your secretary at those of Dalry, Beith and Kilbirnie. One of the most agreeable was at Kilbirnie where an enjoyable conference followed the meeting. Warm hearted local friends assisted your deputation in all the places. Local deputations with memorials from various towns in the country waited upon Mr. Cochran Partick, M.P., and it is gratifying to note that he did not vote against the Resolution.

OPEN-AIR MEETINGS.

It affords your Executive much satisfaction to state that the open-air advocacy this year has in success distanced its predecessors. In Edinburgh Mr. John Paton addressed meetings from the 11th to 17th June; Rev. A. M'Kinley, 28th June to 1st July; Mr. J. H. Waterston, 10th to 15th July; and Mr. R. Stevenson, from 24th to 29th July. All of them concur in stating that these meetings were largely attended, and pervaded by the most evident enthusiasm. A week's meetings were arranged in Greenock, which were addressed by Messrs. Paton and Stevenson and your Secretary, in addition to the usual summer supplies. So both Greenock and Cartsdyke societies. A lumber of meetings were held in Glasgow, Dumbarton, Partick, Perth, Ayr, Govan, Aberdeen, Paisley, Dundee, and one or more in almost every town in Scotland, so that by this means multitudes who rarely or ever attend indoor meetings have been reached. These audiences evidently took a deep interest in what they heard, and it is most gratifying to observe that they appreciate the value of the facts and arguments which the various speakers lay before them. Your grateful thanks are due to those friends who, believing thoroughly in the pervading power of this apparently unconventional advocacy, go boldly with your agents to the streets, there to sow the seeds of temperance and prohibitory truth in the minds of the common people.

Your Sabbath meeting on Glasgow Green has this year been vigorously carried on under the able and genial superintendence of Mr. R. Dransfield. At no season of these meetings has there been such an able and varied advocacy taking part in its proceedings. Rev. W. M'Dougal, Stonefield; Mr. Jas. Horn, Lanark; Mr. W. Stockbridge, London; Mr. J. M. Skinner, Oxford; Mr. John Steel, Edinburgh; Messrs. John Paton, J. H. Waterston, W. Blackwood, R. Stevenson, Wm. Kesson, R. Mackay, and the talented chairman. The audiences have been enormous. So highly are these meetings appreciated that a very pressing desire for their continuance during the winter months indoor has been brought to the notice of your Executive.

Ex-Bailie Torrens and Mr. James Winning were your representatives to the annual meeting of the Irish Temperance League at Belfast this year. The friends enjoyed the addresses of both gentlemen, and as usual the eloquence of ex-Bailie Torrens roused the warm enthusiasm of the Belfast people, who keenly appreciate his visits. The Rev. R. J. Lynde, B.A., represents the League at your meetings to-day.

Ex-Bailie Torrens and your Secretary represented your Association at the Alliance anniversary meetings in October. These were as usual imposing and impressive. The vast crowds that thronged the council room and the public meeting strongly testify to the growing interest in this question which actuates the English people. Your deputation were appointed to take part in the overflow meeting, over which the worthy Bailie presided, setting the meeting aglow by his address from the chair. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., and Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., are deputed to represent that Association here to-day.

Bailie Selkirk was deputed to represent the Association at the annual sessions of the I.O.G.T. The most cordial relations continue to exist between this order and your Association. The Rev. R. Wallace attends on behalf of that order to-day.

Messrs. J. Winning and R. M'Callum were deputed to attend the breakfast party of the Scottish Temperance League. Your Executive are on the best terms with the National Temperance Association, and the Rev. James A. Johnston and ex-Bailie Burt represent it at your social meeting to-day.

The Rev. David Tatum, one of the Temperance Reformers of Ohio, paid a hurried visit to this country. Coming to Scotland as he did during the new year holidays, your Executive could not extend fraternal co-operation to him. He had, however, several meetings in Edinburgh, and had the co-operation of your district superintendent, Mr. Waterston.

At the desire of the Irish Temperance League your Executive heartily consented that Mr. Waterston should go to Ireland on a lecturing tour, while Rev. A. M'Kinley was to come to Scotland to address an equal number of meetings in his absence from his district. The interchange was a great success. The U. K. Alliance has requested Mr. Waterston for a fortnight to Newcastle district, Mr. Paton holding an equal number of meetings in Mr. Waterston's district. Your Executive highly approve of such reciprocity on the part of associations, and their agents, believing that those concerned—speakers and districts—will be mutually benefited.

Mr. John Paton by the kindness of the United Kingdom Alliance has been lecturing in Scotland. His first visit extended from the 2nd November to the 22nd December, his second visit lasted from the 16th May to 25th June, and his third will extend from 19th September to the end of the year.

A very interesting, and somewhat novel series of meetings in connection with the camping-out of the Renfrewshire Militia, took place at Irvine. The Good Templars there have been in the habit of holding meetings, concerts, and a soiree, with the special view of benefiting the militia while away from their homes. This year your Association was asked for speakers, and gladly complied with the request. Messrs. Stevenson, Dransfield, and Mackay respectively, addressed large audiences, and met with a very cordial appreciation from the audience, and with warm thanks from the committee at Irvine, for their stirring appeals to the soldiers and townspeople who thronged these truly excellent meetings, the arrangements for which reflect great credit on those who organised and carried them through.

Your Executive rejoice to be able to add, that the various organizations in Scotland devote a very large portion of the time of their lecturers and advocates to the promulgation of the principles of Permissive prohibition. The addresses that are most heartily applauded are those that advocate the right of the ratepayers to be invested with a direct veto over the liquor traffic. Highly as the people appreciate the truths of total abstinence, they yet more highly extol the principles and policy of your Association, believing that the great stumblingblock in the path of a universal fidelity to the practice of total abstinence is to be found in the legalised temptation of the drink traffic, and they hail all efforts that go to secure the abolition of that traffic, whose destruction will make it easy for the community to adopt and follow personal abstinence.

To all, whether organisations or individuals, who have with such readiness co-operated in sowing the seeds of an enlightened public opinion through these meetings, your Executive ask you to tender your most cordial thanks.

THE CHURCHES.

One of the most encouraging features of the agitation is the growing earnestness of the various churches on the subject of temperance and prohibition. Many of the leaders of the Church have been painfully convinced by the late prosperity and present adversity of the country, of the power of the liquor traffic to diminish the wealth gained in prosperous times, and to intensify the sufferings which adversity brings. Although far from a unanimity on the cardinal principles of the temperance reformation, yet it is gratifying to observe that they fully recognise the vital urgency of legislative interference with the liquor traffic, as well as the necessity laid upon the Church to establish, in connection with every congregation and every mission station, some temperance organisation, to train the young in the principles of abstinence, and to restrain those of maturer years from the destructive vice and sin of intemperance.

The United Presbyterian Synod met in Edinburgh. During the sittings, the convener of the Temperance Committee, in presenting their report, while rejoicing at the marked advance made by the movement with regard to ordination and induction dinners and funerals, still had to deplore the ravages of intemperance and the drinking usages. He suggested the following as the deliverance of the Synod:—1st, That the Synod express its hope that the Church would discourage drinking usages on all public occasions. 2nd, That it recommend the preaching of a warning sermon in December against the dangers connected with these usages, and urging the adoption of practical measures for the suppression of the evils of intemperance. 3rd, The securing of an earlier hour of closing than eleven o'clock, of power to the ratepayers to control licenses, and liberty to the temperance committee to petition in favour of any bill brought into Parliament having these objects in view. 4th, That sessions be recommended to specially look after the young under their care, in connection with the evils of intemperance, and the formation of Bands of Hope auxiliary to all the congregations.

This suggestion became the deliverance of the Synod, and thanks were heartily awarded to the committee on temperance and its convener the Rev. Mr. Rankine. The committee petitioned in favour of the Local Option Resolution.

The usual annual breakfast party under the auspices of the U.P. Temperance Society, was held during the Synod Sittings. Rev. Dr. Adamson and Mr. J. H. Waterston represented your Society. They express their high appreciation of their own reception and of the interesting proceedings.

The Free Church this year brought in its report on Public Morals disjoined from its report on Temperance. The convener, Rev. Mr. M'Kenzie, in submitting the first named report, referred to the numerous instances of revival which had taken place; the larger portion of those impressed being church members of some standing. The report deplored the prevalence of illegitimacy, and urged the Church to rouse itself against this fearful sin and great national evil: the widespread evil of profanity which was greatly affecting the young: the too rapid independence of the young through earning wages early; and the prevalent scepticism which was apparent all over the churches. The report called for strenuous efforts to check and remove these fearful evils, and urged that ministers should deal more firmly with their flocks. There was no reference to the temperance question in the report. In an interesting discussion on the Sabbath question, Dr. Thomson of Paisley made excellent use of the principle of Permissive Prohibition, as shown in the course taken by Government in regard to the Scotch, Irish and Welsh Sunday closing questions. He asked that no legal desecration of Sabbath should take place if the people signified that they were opposed to it. The report on temperance was, as usual, most elaborate in dealing with the various aspects of the temperance question. The deliverance moved by Mr. C. J. Guthrie recommended the preaching of the usual sermon in December, and through interchange of pulpits, as far as that was possible; rejoiced to observe the growth of temperance in the Church, exhorted all ministers, &c., to diligence in advancing temperance among the young and others agreeably to repeated deliverances of this house; resolve on the issue of a short pastoral address on the subject to be referred to or read from the pulpit about the new year; express their cordial satisfaction with the passage of the Local Option Resolution in support of which they petitioned Parliament last year. They are convinced that public opinion is more ripe in this country than in England for the embodiment of this resolution in practical legislation. Having regard to the general and concurrent expression of opinion by presbyteries upon the subject, the Assembly resolve to petition Parliament to the following effect:—"That a 'Local Option' measure for Scotland should be introduced into Parliament as soon as possible; (2) That, while maintaining all existing restrictions on the drink traffic, Parliament should intrust the working of such a measure to local boards, to be elected for this purpose by the ratepayers on the same principle as school boards; and (3) that within the limits of existing restrictions, such boards should have power to determine all questions regarding the number of licensed houses, hours of sale, &c." The Assembly instruct the committee to prepare petition to Parliament in accordance with the above resolution, to be signed by the Moderator in name of the Assembly.

The members of the Temperance Society in connection with the Church met at breakfast, and Mr. James Winning and Mr. Waterstone attended as a deputation from your Association. The proceedings were full of encouragement, and great earnestness and enthusiasm pervaded the meeting.

The Assembly petitioned in favour of the Local Option Resolution.

The Established Church Committee's report on Temperance spoke on Temperance legislation with bated breath. The report stated that according to the instructions of last venerable Assembly, they had "watched over the interests of Temperance within the Church" while co-operating in outside movements. The Committee thought that it was pre-eminently a Church question with which the Church was bound to deal. The work could not be done effectively by a Committee; every minister should take it up and make a practical effort. The number of ministers and laymen interested in this matter was yearly increasing. There had been an increase in parochial Temperance Associations, and much attention had been devoted to the young. Whatever might be thought of legislation on the subject, the committee were of opinion that the number of public houses might be decreased, and thus temptation to over-indulgence removed out of the way. The committee asked to be allowed to continue their work. Mr. Marjoribanks moved the adoption of the report, the reappointment of the committee, with power to add to their number, with instructions to promote temperance principles throughout the Church, especially among the young. He frowned on temperance tracts, and urged the Church to have a temperance printing press of her own (applause). Mr. M'Laren seconded the adoption of the report, and Mr. Webster said that if half the efforts devoted to heresy hunting had been put forth in behalf of temperance, it would be well for their Church, well for their country, and, in the case of thousands, life would then become better worth living. The report was then adopted.

The annual meeting of the Church of Scotland Temperance Association took place during the sittings. Rev. Dr. Dodds presided. The annual report was read by Rev. Mr. Jamieson, Portobello. The chairman was sure the meeting could not but feel that intemperance was doing great harm in the country. There were many agencies at work to counteract its effects, but while the Assembly sympathised with their objects, they could not be at one as to the means. Some of them were associated with political objects, but the association felt they could not thoroughly associate themselves with such. Their organisation was rather in harmony with gospel views. Other addresses, equally out of harmony with your line of action, were delivered.

The Established Church Temperance Breakfast was held as usual. Your district agent, Mr. Waterston, was present.

The Congregational Union met at Aberdeen, and bestowed much consideration on the temperance question. This Union has not a publican within its pale, nor more than half a dozen wine merchants. About 70 per cent. of the pastors, and a large percentage of the members of the church are abstainers.

The other denominations—Evangelical Union, Baptist, and others—use means for bringing the temperance question before their members, with gratifying and growing results.

LITERATURE.

Your Executive are profoundly sensible of the power which the Press can wield in favour of your agitation, and often regret that they have never felt themselves warranted in diminishing the resources at their disposal, to the extent of putting this department into a state of efficiency. That, in their opinion, can only be done by the friends making a resolute effort for that special purpose. Your Executive have gradually augmented their stock of literature, until they can safely say that at no time was it more varied and extensive. All the most important volumes, and the newest pamphlets on the temperance and prohibition question are in stock. During the year they printed for Dr. M'Culloch, Dumfries, a new and thoroughly revised edition of his famous lecture, and with his permission, and jointly with the United Kingdom Alliance, a second edition, which is already nearly sold out. They have also thrown off a large edition of the paper read by Bailie Selkirk at one of the winter conversaziones of the Scottish Temperance League. It is entitled "The Duty of Temperance Electors at Parliamentary Elections." The New Year's Tract of Rev. Dr. Bonar of Edinburgh met with a most gratifying sale, indeed better than this series of tracts has met with for years.

Your Executive are glad to be able to state that the New Year's Tract for 1882 will be written by the Rev.

Professor Kirk, and earnestly bespeak the efforts of the friends for its extended circulation.

The Social Reformer, the Organ of the Association, continues to fulfil its mission as the fearless exponent and upholder of the principles and policy of the Association. Its merits continue to receive the flattering recognition of the contemporary press. Your Executive would earnestly ask you to recommend it to the notice of your own friends and neighbours, and in this way enlarge its sphere of usefulness. To its contributors and Editor your grateful thanks are due, and the assistance of friends willing to contribute to its pages is earnestly invited, while suggestions for its improvement and for its increased circulation will always be gladly received.

The temperance press is assuming enormous dimensions. The skill of the Journalist, the art of the graver, combine with the printer in the production of literature which can appeal to the most critical mind, while the stores which offer themselves in all the departments of human knowledge, furnish the temperance movement with invincible weapons for aggression and defence. The literary services of Dr. Kerr, Dr. Richardson, and Dr. A. Clarke, Mr. Wm. Hoyle, and others less conspicuous, but not less ardent upholders of temperance doctrine, powerfully recommend the literature of the agitation to all classes of the community. Mr. Hoyle's annual letter to the "Times," and his paper read before the British Association are signally prominent even in a year which has witnessed numerous triumphs of literary skill in behalf of the temperance reformation.

The general press has during the year been affording ample space to the consideration of the questions affecting the movement, and its treatment, save in very exceptional circumstances, has been most respectful and sympathetic, and in numerous instances laudatory. The more intelligent and influential journals although not prepared yet to accept all the conclusions of the agitation, are with increasing frankness admitting that the days of publican tyranny are virtually over, and that the sooner the "trade" sues for terms the better. The Scottish agitation is deeply indebted to The North British Daily Mail, The Daily Review, The Christian News, The League Journal, The Greenock Telegraph, The Aberdeen Daily Free Press, The Alloa Advertiser, The Dumfries and Galloway Standard, The Irvine Express, and other newspapers, for space for reports, correspondence, as well as for the editorial comments which have from time to time appeared. The Alliance News deserves special mention. The Weekly Record, The Medical Temperance Journal, and The Church of England Temperance Chronicle are unsurpassed for the admirable manner in which the special aspects of the question with which each has to deal is issue by issue treated. Bearing in mind that before the Maine Law was established in Maine, that state had to be sown knee-deep with temperance literature, your Executive trust that this important means of enlightenment will receive your increased favour and attention.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

The Parliament opened this year on the 6th January, and was prorogued on August 27th. Notwithstanding the truly exceptional nature of its proceedings, and the exacting nature of the Irish questions it had to deal with, precluding the treatment of any but Irish grievances, the Temperance has been signally successful. The gratifying position attained last year by the Local Option Resolution has been improved, and as a concession to the vigour of that agitation, the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill has to be numbered among the Parliamentary victories of the movement.

The Queen's speech did not, as was hoped, allude to the Liquor Traffic, but on the afternoon of the opening day a number of Bills were noticed, among these were a notice by Sir Henry James regarding Corrupt Practices at Elections; of the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill, by Mr. John Roberts; the English Sunday Bill, by Mr. Stevenson; of a Bill Closing Public Houses during Parliamentary Elections, by Mr. Carbutt. Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice of a question on the 10th, "Whether the Government intended to introduce any measure during the present Session of Parliament for carrying out the resolution of the House with respect to the licensing system and local option." The Premier on the 10th answered this question in the negative, and on the 11th Sir Wilfrid gave notice that on the earliest possible day he would move "that in the opinion of this House, the resolution passed by the House on the 18th June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic, ought without delay to be embodied by the Government in a bill giving effect to such resolution." On the 17th May he gave notice that his resolution would be moved on Tuesday, 14th June.

So soon as the date was fixed your Executive communicated with the Scottish Temperance League, all the orders of Templars, Rechabites, United Temperance Associates, &c., for support. A strong appeal was made to all friends and subscribing societies, and such other steps taken as were necessary to bring the full pressure of the electors to bear on their representatives. A hearty response to this appeal was received, and the kindred associations appealed to rendered invaluable co-operation. The Executive appointed a deputation to go to London to support the interests of the resolution, among the representatives from Scotland:—Messrs. J. Nisbet, R. C. Murray, T. L. Selkirk, J. Winning, J. H. Waterston, and R. Mackay; John Williams, Esq., D. Stenhouse, Esq., and Mr. M'Donald joined the deputation. The energetic efforts of the united deputation materially contributed to the magnitude of the vote.

When the House resumed on the 14th June, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., rose to move his resolution. He did so in a most impressive speech of 45 minutes duration, Hon. members trooping in and filling the benches as they returned from dinner. Mr. Burt, Sir Wilfrid's staunch supporter, seconded briefly in an excellent speech. He was followed by Mr. Samuelson, and then Mr. Bright spoke for the Government. He showed all the old feeling he had against the Permissive Bill in his speech on the resolution, counselled patience and more work in the community, and expressed a hope that some future administration would concede permissive prohibition. Mr. Daly, Mr. Hicks, Col. Makins, and Capt. Aymer spoke against the resolution in similar terms to those used by its opponents all along, and then the division was taken.

The division shows that 196 voted for the resolution and 154 against it, majority 42; including the 4 tellers and 33 pairs the numbers are 231 for, and 189 against; majority as before 42, or an increase over the second division of last year of 16 votes. The voting on the part of Scotland was virtually the same, 39 voting for, and 4 pairing for; total 43, against 5, or a majority of 38. Both counties and burghs show majorities. The majority for counties being 16 (20 for and 4 against); that of the burghs 21 (22 to 1), only one burgh vote being cast against it. The universities gave one vote, showing a majority as before of 38. The majority over England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland was 42; to that majority Scotland contributes 34, a truly magnificent aidance. On no other question regarding Scotland can anything like the same unanimity of voting by Scotch members be shown, and this is the eighth time that her Parliamentary representatives have declared in favour of her people having power to directly veto the liquor traffic of their respective localities. It is due to Mr. Armitstead, Mr. Jardine, Mr. Majoribanks and Mr. Holms to state that they would have been paired in favour of the resolution could adverse pairs have been to be had, but the publican party could not muster more. These pairs would have brought up the number to 47 for, as against 5 opposed; and it is matter for wonder how much nearer unanimity the Parliamentary representation of Scotland would require to be to induce the Government to grant its people a direct veto over the liquor traffic. All the members of the Government holding Scotch seats, with one exception, voted and paired in favour of the resolution. The voting (and pairing) was as follows:—

BURGHES.—Glasgow, G. Anderson, Dr. Cameron; Kirkcaldy District, Sir G. Campbell, K.C.S.I.; Ayr District, R. F. F. Campbell; Stirling District, H. Campbell-Bannerman; Edinburgh, J. Cowan; Elgin District, Right Hon. M. E. G. Duff; Leith District, A. Grant; Dundee, F. Henderson; Inverness District, C. F. M'Intosh; Edinburgh, Right Hon. J. M'Laren (Lord Advocate); Dumfries District, E. Noel; Perth, C. S. Parker; Kilnarnock District, J. Dick Peddie; Falkirk District, J. Ramsay; Greenock, J. Stewart; Border Burghs, G. O. Trevelyan; Aberdeen, John Webster, LL.D.; Haddington District, Sir David Wedderburn, Bart.; and St. Andrew's District, S. Williamson, 20. Paired for—Montrose District, Right Hon. W. E. Baxter; Wick District, John Pender, 2; votes and pairs, 22. Against—Wigtown District, Admiral Right Hon. Sir John C. D. Hay, Bart., 1; majority for the Burghs, 21. Universities—For—Edinburgh and St. Andrews, Right Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair, 1. Against, none.

The most important temperance measure of the session was the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill. Notice was given of its introduction on the first day of the session. The second reading was taken on the 4th May. Mr. Roberts presented a splendid case in its favour—the almost entire unanimity both of the Welsh people, and their parliamentary representatives (the principality has 30 members, and 29 of these voted for the Bill). The canvass was a marvel of exhaustive and disinterested work. The opposition the Bill received came, as might be expected, from outsiders. The Premier, himself a Welsh landlord, supported the Bill in a powerful speech, and the division showed 163 in favour and 17 against, showing a majority of 146. 27 Scotch members were in the majority, and not one against it. On June 15, the order for going into committee was opposed, but, after some lively debating, was carried by 123 to 29—a majority of 94. Again 27 Scotch representatives voted with the majority, and not one against it. Afterwards an attempt to exempt Cardiff from its operation was defeated by 118 to 27—a majority of 91. On the 20th June, Mr. Thomasson was defeated in an attempt to allow the public-houses to sell on Sundays off the premises from 12.30 to 2.30 p.m. by 81 to 32—majority 49. On the 19th August Mr. Richard moved the third reading, and after a feeble protest from its opponents, it was carried without a division, amid great cheering. On the 23rd, in the House of Lords, Lord Aberdare moved the second reading in a most significant speech, being on local option lines. On the 24th Lord Denman objected, because liquors were to be sold at railway stations. Objection was over-ruled, and the bill passed through committee without amendment. On the 25th it passed the House of Lords, and on the 27th received the Royal assent, and is now law. It is not fully in operation, because it is not definite as to the time of its becoming operative.

The English Sunday Closing Bill met with a hapless fate. On the 6th January Mr. Stevenson gave notice of his bill, but on the 8th January Mr. Callan "blocked" it, and on the 12th July Mr. Stevenson moved the order for its discharge, and it was by leave withdrawn.

Mr. Carbut's bill for the closing of public-houses during polling at parliamentary elections was read for the first time on the 12th January. On the 30th March he moved the second reading. The whole draft of the interesting debate was in favour of the bill, and in view of the Government dealing with the evil against which the bill was aimed, Mr. Carbut withdrew the bill.

Then Mr. Meldon on the 20th May moved the second reading of his bill that in all Irish towns of 10,000 inhabitants the hours of publicans selling liquors should be materially shortened. After a spirited debate the bill was rejected by 49 to 33—a majority of 16.

During the discussion on the Land Bill Lord Arthur Hill, on the 23rd June, moved as an amendment, that "a tenant shall not, without consent of the landlord, open any house for the sale of intoxicating liquors." The debate was well-sustained, and the amendment was ultimately accepted by the Government.

The next matter of importance was the Budget introduced by Mr. Gladstone in a speech which quite disappointed expectation, a brilliant one being anticipated. His proposals were simply re-adjustments of the liquor duties, and his faith in the substitution of a beer duty for the malt tax was deep, for he took off the penny of income tax which he required to impose to enable him to entirely abolish that tax.

On the 14th May the Committee on Ways and Means adopted the following resolution, "That there shall be charged and paid upon every license for the sale of intoxicating liquors and tobacco in any carriage used for the conveyance of passengers on any railway an excise duty of £5." Mr. Gladstone undertook to bring this matter forward. Mr. W. Fowler on the instant gave notice, that in going into Committee on the Customs Bill, he would move "That any system of grant of license for the sale of intoxicating liquors in railway carriages will be injurious to the public." One of the most remarkable national manifestations of sentiment took place. Foremost in the opposition were a number of honourable members who declared a strenuous opposition to the proposal; then the various temperance and prohibitory associations rose en masse against it, and the general public looked upon it with strong aversion. Under these circumstances Mr. Gladstone on the 23rd May frankly disclaimed anything like a revolutionary character in the proposal, and admitted that it was effectually killed by the menace to which it had been exposed. On May the 26th the proposal was finally abandoned. Such was the result of a national rising against any reactionary legislation on the drink traffic, another signal instance of the power of public opinion in favour of Temperance, and of the rapidity with which it can act on the Legislature.

Your Executive lost not a moment in co-operating with the various Scottish organisations who with all promptitude met this proposal with an uncompromising resistance. A memorial from your Association was forwarded to Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and a copy of it to the Home Secretary and to every member of parliament for Scotland. The horrors and dangers averted by the action so universally taken against this proposal are incalculable; it is matter for joy that it was so signally successful.

Mr. Caine brought forward two very important motions during the session, one on the 31st March in Committee on the Army Discipline Bill. He moved the abolition of all sale of alcoholic liquors either in canteen or on the march in a most exhaustive speech. Although defeated—156 to 34—he was able to secure a promise from Mr. Childers that greater stringency would be exercised in this matter in the army commissariat in future. On the 13th August in Committee on the Navy Estimates, he moved in favour of the discontinuance of the spirit ration, and in favour of giving increased dietary and wages in its stead. Here another most interesting debate took place, and a strong case made out for the naval authorities. Action by Mr. Trevelyan in the direction urged by Mr. Caine, who withdrew his motion after expressing his deep satisfaction with Mr. Trevelyan's explanation.

In the beginning of March what was stated to be a first draft of the Government licensing bill appeared in the Standard. Questioned on the subject Sir W. Harcourt stated with confidence that "no printed draft of a Government measure for regulating the trade of licensed victuallers has got abroad, and for this reason that there never has been such a draft." This is conclusive as to the Government intention at the time, and it will rest with the temperance electors of the various constituencies if the same will have to be said by the Home Secretary on a similar day of March, 1882.

The slightest reflection on the progress of temperance and prohibition in the Parliament of last session must be of an exceedingly gratifying character to all staunch friends of the agitation. We see that year by year the Government is making larger concessions to the growing public opinion on the liquor traffic, and that it is in making these basing its reasons on the amount of local sentiment prevalent on the question at issue, and vindicating its concession by a reference to the right of the people to protection from institutions affecting themselves and their families to an injurious degree. So soon, as was the case in Wales, as the people give sufficient evidence of their sentiments, the Government will feel constrained to grant their demand. This is most encouraging to all true friends of prohibition, and is well calculated to induce us to increase our efforts for the creation and direction of an enlightened public opinion on the evils of the liquor traffic and on the abundant necessity for immediate legislation for its suppression by the injured and burdened ratepayers.

BYE-ELECTIONS.

A number of bye-elections have taken place during the year, and your Executive rejoice to intimate that all have gone in favour of the principles of local option. The elevation of Mr. Adam to the high position of Governor of Madras created a vacancy in the united Shires of Clackmannan and Kinross in the month of November of last year. Mr. J. B. Balfour, who unsuccessfully contested North-Ayr, offered himself to the constituency, and was returned unopposed. His election is a decided gain to the movement, as, for the first time during the agitation, this constituency supports Sir Wilfrid Lawson's policy. His elevation to the distinguished position of Lord-Advocate is full of significance for the future of the cause. The death of Col. Muir, a staunch Parliamentary friend, created a vacancy in Renfrewshire. Mr. Alex. Crum was unanimously chosen to succeed him, and was returned unopposed on the 29th November. He, like the gallant Col. supports Sir Wilfrid Lawson. The retirement of Mr. Duncan M'Laren, the senior member for Edinburgh, and one of the best friends in Parliament of the movement, led to a contest there between Lord-Advocate M'Laren and Mr. Edward Jenkins. Both gentlemen favoured your principles, and our friends in the constituency appeared to be divided in their preference. The poll was in favour of the Lord Advocate, the numbers being:—for his Lordship, 11,390; for Mr. Jenkins, 3,940—majority, 7,650. The Right Hon. Grant Duff in July accepted the post of Governor of Madras, which had only been held by the late Right Hon. W. P. Adams for a few months, and thus severed the political connection between himself and the Elgin district of burghs, which had lasted twenty-four years. Quite a number of candidates offered themselves,—Mr. Craig Seller, Mr. A. Asher, Mr. T. D. Buchanan, Mr. Douglas Ainslie, Mr. J. Jeans, and Mr. M'Lean. The three first and the last named had more or less sympathy with the aims of your Association, the others were not even intelligent upon them. The electors by a test ballot accepted Mr. A. Asher as their candidate, and he was returned unopposed on the 13th July. On his appointment as Solicitor-General for Scotland, Mr. Asher sought re-election, and on the 25th August was again returned without opposition. The Right Hon. Lord Advocate having intimated his resignation, and his acceptance of a judgeship in the Court of Session, a vacancy occurred in the representation of Edinburgh. For the seat several candidates appeared—Mr. G. Harrierson, Mr. John Wilson, and Mr. T. D. Buchanan. The Liberal Association having by a majority chosen Mr. Buchanan as its candidate, the others withdrew, and that gentleman was, on the 23rd August, returned unopposed. Mr. Buchanan will take the place of the Lord Advocate in supporting Sir Wilfrid Lawson. There has thus been six bye-elections in Scotland during the year, and the gain has been with your agitation, the vacancies being filled with men pledged to vote against the liquor traffic, and Clackmannan and Kinross giving their support to your principles for the first time.

DEPARTED FRIENDS.

As year after year the members of the Association assemble to review the past and to resolve for the future, they have to regret the loss of some well known friend, whose warfare is forever at an end. This year we enter on the same sad experience, for during its onward march many worthy friends have been called away. Councillor Johnston, of Dumfries, a well tried friend, died in a foreign land; Mr. John M'Gavin's decease was a serious loss to the temperance movement generally, to your Association he gave liberally, and his sympathy with your object was increasing; Mr. John M'Donald, Aberdeen, has not left behind him in the North one that could surpass him in loyalty to the principles you uphold, or one who can exhibit greater sympathy or liberality to the agitation; Mr. D. Carswell, Paisley, heartily befriended the association; Dr. Morrison, Beith, did much to advance your question; the Rev. D. Macrae, Glasgow; young Mr. Nicol, Rattray; Mr. T. Biggart, Dalry; Rev. Wm. Jaffray, Irvine; Rev. G. Charles, Stranraer; Rev. A. Thomson, Peebles; Mr. James M'Ilroy, Dunning; Mr. Wm. Gibb, Glasgow; Mr. A. Lamberton, Kilbirnie; Mr. James Fimister, Kirriemuir; Mr. Jas. Grant, West Calder; Mr. J. Slater, Lerwick; Mr. Wm. Shanks, Bridge-of-Weir; Mr. W. Jamieson, Stow; Mr. John Shaw, Kilsyth, all deserve the sorrowful recognition of their services to the good cause.

Mrs. Mitchell, the widow of the former Secretary of this Association, herself an ardent adherent of the movement, and a true yoke fellow to her gifted husband, departed this life at Invercargill, New Zealand, on the 30th April, last.

GENERAL PROGRESS.

As an instance of the great advance of temperance and prohibitory sentiment in the community, with its inevitable result, greater discernment of the relations of the liquor traffic to society, your Executive have to record a resolution by the School Board of Glasgow in the following terms:—"That the clerk be requested to report to the Board in committee, previous to each licensing term, all applications made for new licenses for spirit shops or for transferred licenses, if the premises are situated within 200 yards of either a Board School or the High School, with the view of the Board taking such action as they may determine in the interest of the young attending such schools."

The London Temperance Hospital is now removed to its new premises in Hampstead Road, and is entirely free from debt. The successful establishment of this institution, and the signal evidence which it has afforded through the seven years of its existence, that alcoholic liquors are quite unnecessary either in the preparation of drugs or as drugs themselves, has vastly contributed to expel the idea from the minds of the medical faculty and their patients that these baneful liquors are in any way useful in morbid conditions of the human frame. It will, though indirectly, be a powerful auxiliary to the prohibitory phase of the agitation.

THE FUNDS.

The state of the funds must always be a matter of anxiety to your Executive, which every true and earnest friend of the Association will share. The present commercial depression, whose pressure is scarcely if at all relaxed, has been a period of grave concern to your Executive, whose difficulty was to maintain and increase the efficiency of the agitation. The difficulty was increased by the loss through death of many generous friends. Many friends however have this year kindly augmented their subscriptions, while a number have subscribed for the first time, so that it is pleasing to record that the funds are in a healthy condition, having sufficed for the vigorous efforts of the past year.

The amount received during the year, exclusive of balance, is £2071 15s 1d, which shows the satisfactory increase of £55 2s 8d over the income of last year. Under the head of "Subscriptions and Donations" there is the very satisfactory increase of £67 8s 7d. This latter increase testifies to the continued generous liberality of friends to the funds of the Association. The amount expended on the operations of the year is £2065 19s 11½d, leaving in hand a balance of a similar amount to that of the last two years.

With a view to enable the Executive to ascertain what amount of support they might expect to receive during the year, they asked the friends of the Association to indicate the extent to which they were disposed to contribute during the coming year in aid of the agitation. A large number of friends have made a generous response, and many, recognising the encouragement which the early payment of subscriptions affords to your Executive, have in the kindest manner sent their cheque along with their promise forms. With the balance in hand, and with the amount realized already from the promises of friends, your Executive are enabled to begin the year's operations with larger resources than has for some years been the case. They earnestly trust however that you will not separate to-day without giving your best consideration to this urgent matter, so that the agitation may be prosecuted with greater vigour and increased agencies.

Your Executive are convinced that a generous and spirited policy, on the part of their friends, with respect to the movement at all times, will do much to inspire the public mind with the earnestness and determination which actuates them in this vitally important agitation, and infuse still greater courage and devotion into the heart of the leaders of the movement, and its supporters throughout the country.

THE OFFICES OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Your Executive have removed the Offices from 30 Hope Street to 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The change has been most advantageous to the Association. There is increased and better accommodation at a rent much less than was paid for the premises lately occupied.

CONCLUSION.

In bringing their Report of the operations of the Association during the bygone year to a close, your Executive have to congratulate you upon the position and prospects of the agitation. The advance that was made last year and which has been fully maintained this year is proof of the solid progress of the movement. All sections of the Temperance and Prohibitory movement are looking earnestly forward to the time when the Government will grant some means of relief from the terrible national infliction of the liquor traffic, the application of which they will gladly leave to the ratepayers. Social Reformers everywhere are manifesting a growing amount of sympathy with the object you have in view: the churches have accepted the principle of a local interference with the liquor traffic, and at no distant day will show themselves the most powerful and influential of your allies. Great as has been the progress of the agitation, your Executive are glad to observe that it seems as if it were but whetting the resolution and the determination of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory party for a more decided advance, and the time seems to smile upon the effort. The people have again and again affirmed through their parliamentary representatives their desire to have the ratepayers of Scotland invested with a direct veto over the liquor traffic, and are becoming profoundly convinced that only through the demand which you continue to so earnestly press upon the attention of the Legislature can they hope to secure the final settlement of a question the most vital to the welfare of society. The justice of this demand cannot be gainsaid. It remains with the community to say how much longer it is to be withheld. The people have on every occasion declared in favour of the principles and policy upheld and maintained by this Association. They will sustain its efforts and strengthen your hands in the good work fortified by their confidence, cheered by their sympathy, be it yours with indomitable firmness to press your demand upon the attention of the Government. Whatever has been gained all through the agitation has been achieved by the most determined action on the part of the loyal friends of the movement. Let us bear ourselves like them, let us emulate their indomitable energy, their uncompromising firmness, their glowing faith, and through this course unwaveringly and faithfully pursued we shall in the near future reap the reward of our efforts in the enactment of a law by which the ratepayers of Scotland will effectually uproot and destroy the liquor traffic.

Mr. M'CALLUM then read the treasurer's statement.

Glasgow, 26th September, 1881.—I have examined the books of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for year ending 24th September, 1881, and compared them with the vouchers produced, and I certify the whole correct—the balance on hand being Sixty-four pounds seventeen shillings and two pence sterling.

(Signed) JNO. GOURLAY, C.A.
Auditor.

Mr. M'CALLUM said the Executive had to return their warmest thanks to the friends for their support. The Executive could go on cheerfully with their work when they got the sinews of war. This was the most satisfactory state they had been in for six or seven years back. The Executive were somewhat anxious as to how they were to get on in consequence of the depression in trade. Then there was another matter they had to contend with. Many people did not know whether Local Option was the Permissive Bill. The Permissive Bill was Local Option, and Local Option was the Permissive Bill. (Applause.) Well there had been £56 more in subscriptions than last year. That was a gratifying fact. (Applause.) He then thought there was no society in Glasgow stood upon a firmer footing than theirs, and he expressed the hope that the friends of the Association would continue to give it their support. (Applause.) A few members had been doubling their subscriptions and promises had been received from many others; they would soon with a full treasury gain the end they all had in view. (Applause.)

Mr. LINDSAY, in moving "that the reports now read be adopted, printed and circulated," said he had much pleasure in doing so, though he was sorry the report had not been read in its fulness. The chairman remarked that they had not yet come to the end of their work. He (the speaker) did not think that was to be lamented. The people had to be educated, and he thought every year which passed they must have observed there was a greater desire prevailed in the breasts of the people, either for legislation, or for some effort being put forth to lessen the intemperance of the land. (Applause.) The work of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association was thorough, and no make-believe. He closed by asking the meeting to agree unanimously to his resolution. (Applause.)

Mr. JAMIESON of Ayr, in seconding the resolution, said some people were very apt to find fault, but they could have no occasion that day to speak disparagingly of the labours of those engaged in the working of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN.—The first resolution has been moved and seconded. Is it your wish that it be carried? (Applause.)

Mr. MATTHEW EDWARDS of Aberdeen moved "That the following gentlemen be the office-bearers of this Association for the ensuing year." (The list is held over.) Mr. Edwards said it was very important that men of sound wisdom and common sense, and thoroughly understanding the objects of the Association should be at the head of its affairs; therefore, he had much pleasure in proposing those gentlemen named.

Baillie KENNEDY of Moffat, in seconding the motion, trusted all the gentlemen named would be thorough-going and earnest social reformers.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. JOHN WILSON, J.P., said—Before speaking to the resolution put into my hands, I would throw out a hint to our excellent Secretary, Mr. Mackay, that the next time he advertises the business meeting of the Association, he should put in a separate paragraph "ladies cordially invited to attend." (Hear, hear.) We all know how much we are indebted to the ladies in this movement, and I am certain had an opportunity been given them, they would have been present at this meeting. (Hear, hear.) I shall now read the resolution which has been put into my hands. It is, I think, the most important which will come before this meeting to-day:—

"That this meeting regards the progress of the agitation during the year as highly satisfactory; rejoices at the very decided parliamentary vote of this year in favour of Local Option, heartily approves of the energetic manner in which the conference resolution of last year has been carried out, recommends the Executive to continue these conference meetings, and to otherwise prosecute the agitation with unabated energy, so that a thorough-going measure for Scotland may be introduced into Parliament at the earliest possible moment." (Applause.)

From what we have heard stated by the preceding speakers, and from the exhaustive reports which the Secretary read to us, I feel that you will be fully convinced that the agitation during the past year and the work of the Society have been highly satisfactory. (Applause.) We all rejoice at the results which have been arrived at in the House of Commons with reference to the resolution proposed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson on Local Option. (Applause.) Parliament by a large, ay, exceedingly large majority, so far as Scotland is concerned, has approved of that measure twice over. (Applause.) I feel proud of my country that we stand in such an enviable position before other nations as temperance people. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the drunkenness of the country, we can, as temperance reformers, bring such an influence to bear upon our Members of Parliament that they shall be constrained, some of them against their mind, to go in with us in the views we hold. At the last annual meeting a special resolution was adopted that conferences should take place during the year in different parts of the country in order to educate the people up to that standpoint in which we ourselves are. These meetings did great good. Notwithstanding the very unfavourable weather, our agents have been most indefatigable in their efforts to spread temperance knowledge over the country, and the results of their labours are manifesting themselves, because there is now a healthy sentiment in society with reference to our work and temperance principles generally. (Applause.) I trust that the Executive will continue to carry out the programme which they have entered upon, and hold conferences, conversaciones, and other meetings, and also get up electoral memorials and deputations to press the important points which we hold upon the minds of Members of Parliament. (Applause.) I think we in this country have arrived at the stage that we are ripe for a prohibitory measure for Scotland—(applause)—a measure that will give us a power—the principle which the British House of Commons has now twice over accepted. (Applause.) Scotchmen were the first, as our chairman stated, to teach the sister countries the blessings of the Sunday Prohibitory Act, which for many years has worked so well that Ireland has entered upon the same lines. (Applause.) Last session saw the crowning triumph of Wales, which had voted so persistently to come under the beneficent influence of this measure. We shall probably see England moving in the right direction, for Cardinal Manning, at a meeting held in Liverpool last week, stated "that, as sure as summer comes next year, we shall have this measure for England." (Applause.) All these things are certain indications of progress, and I would ask you to do all in your power to aid the Executive of this Association in their endeavours to keep this important subject prominently before the public mind, so that when the hour arrives for carrying a thorough-going measure, we may be ready to use all the power we possess in gaining a great triumph. (Applause.)

Mr. A. SHANKS, Barrhead—The speech by our worthy friend Mr. Wilson saves me from making many remarks in seconding the motion. The resolution states, "That this meeting regards the progress of the agitation during the year as highly satisfactory, and rejoices at the very decided parliamentary vote in favour of Local Option." Now, our progress has been very great. In fact, if we had received nothing else but that which Wales got, we would have reason to be thankful, and to take courage. This has been a great step in the right direction of temperance legislation. I believe that although the United Kingdom Alliance, and the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, have not been specially working for Sabbath prohibition in Wales and in Ireland, yet, I say, it has been through the influence of these associations that the measures were passed. (Applause.) With regard to Sir Wilfrid Lawson's measure, though I believe his putting before Parliament his Local Option Resolution was a wise one, still his idea of Local Option, and the ideas of many who voted for it, are very different things indeed. But I approve of it as a temperance move, because it sets to the test the principle of putting this matter in the hands of the people in one form or another. What we want is something more substantial. What I like about the Permissive Bill is that people know what it means; that it is power for the people to put down the liquor traffic if they so choose. This is the policy of our Association, and I would not like to see it degenerate into anything else. (Hear, hear.) I think it would be a good idea if we had in several parts of the country little local Permissive Bill associations, because I know they are required. I can speak from experience. In Barrhead, when the Good Templars came to the front, the old reformers dropped their flag, and left their work to be done by the new society of Good Templars. I do not wish to say anything against that body, but the particular work we pursued has not been taken up by them, so there is room for the reconstruction of the old teetotal societies, which could aid us in pushing forward this Permissive Bill. (Applause.) I am puzzled that we have forty Scotch members on our side, and not one of them is prepared to take up our measure and make it his own. (Hear, hear.) Scotland has the reputation of being a nation of heroes, and it has a history of heroism both in political and ecclesiastical affairs; therefore I am astonished as years roll on, that no one has been brave enough to take up the measure. There is our friend Mr. Wilson. He has made enough of money—(a laugh)—could he not be persuaded to make the Permissive Bill for Scotland his life work? (Laughter and applause.) I have much pleasure in seconding this resolution. (Applause.)

Ex-Bailie MAXWELL, Dundee, in supporting the motion, said he was glad to see the temperance question had been brought up at the recent meeting of the British Association. He hoped that it would not only come up there, but come up at meetings of all kinds of institutions, for he held there was no kind of meeting where it could not be discussed. He would welcome any measure in the right direction, even one where the grocer's license was separated from the beer license. When speaking of licensing boards which would be an improvement, he was met by a cry of no, no. To which his response was that he was there to give his opinion. (Applause.)

Dr. M'CUCCLOCH said they would never raise the enthusiasm of the people with an indefinite measure. They, in fact, did not understand Local Option. Everyone understood the Permissive Bill. (Hear, hear.) His opinion was they could not improve the liquor traffic, the only improvement that would be effectual, would be to improve it off the face of the earth. (Applause and laughter.)

Mr. T. ROBINSON, Hurler, said that although they had so many Scotch members of parliament, they had no one amongst them who was willing to be the leader. There must be something wrong when no man could be got to fill that position. He thought there was a fear of dividing the Liberal party in getting at what they aimed. That was their weakness. But why need they wait, could they not get one of their own men there to-day to be the leader; ay, there was the mover of the resolution sitting there. (Applause.)

Mr. AENEAS MACKAY, of Edinburgh, asked what he was to understand by the latter part of the motion, was it Local Option or Permissive Bill?

Bailie TORRENS interposed and said, he thought the answer was easily given. The resolution carried this in its face, they were willing to accept any legislation which came in their direction; but their demand was nothing less than the Permissive Bill. (Applause.)

Mr. REID, of Coatbridge, asked if there was nothing less than Permissive Bill, why was it not stated in the resolution? Were they ashamed of the organisation of their Association? He said as a member they ought not to be ashamed of their name, they ought to go on at once, and not say "a thorough going measure," but "a Permissive Bill for Scotland." (Applause.)

Bailie TORRENS said they were not ashamed of their position. He asked that the expression be withdrawn.

Mr. REID in doing so proposed as an amendment, that we introduce "Permissive Bill for Scotland instead of thorough-going measure." (Applause.)

Mr. AENEAS MACKAY was glad to hear that it was not a Local Option measure that they were going in for. This resolution had been put before them year after year, and he asked what really were the Executive doing? If they would pay attention to the few Scotch members of parliament who were wavering they would find that their cause was much advanced.

Mr. R. MACKAY, the Secretary, said it was evident that some of the members were beginning to twit them just like the outsiders, but some morning the Executive might be able to meet them to congratulate them on the success of their efforts. Their great difficulty was this, they could not get a man with backbone enough to stand along with Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

Rev. Dr. ADAMSON, Edinburgh, considered that to make the change suggested would be going back instead of making progress. (Applause.) A Local Option measure was in effect a Permissive Bill, and vice versa. It was, he thought, insulting to his intellect for anyone to come and ask what was meant by a thorough-going measure.

Mr. M'LAREN considered this resolution as the most important, and it was their duty to discuss it fairly and fully before letting it go past. It ought to have been made a little more definite, and in order to make it so, he did not see why that meeting could have any objections to wording the latter part of the resolution in this way; "to prepare a thorough-going measure for Scotland to be introduced into Parliament during the ensuing session." He did not see why the motion should not pass with that alteration. They could have nothing tangible before them till they got a bill. To talk about Local Option and nothing definite, they would never make any progress. (Applause.)

Ex-Provost DICK said they could get plenty to adopt a measure on certain grounds, but what they wanted was a thorough-going measure, as stated in the resolution: These words, "thorough-going measure," were nothing less than "a thorough-going Permissive Bill." (Applause.)

Mr. AENEAS MACKAY said that it was wasting time to move resolutions year after year. The Executive had never yet made a draft of a bill, and he thought that until they did that they could not shew what they wanted. He would ask Mr. Mackay why a bill was never framed.

Mr. MACKAY said that being the servant of the movement he had never taken an active part in the business meeting, preferring to listen. But being directly appealed to, he could easily answer the question. The Executive in 1870 drafted a bill and laid it before the friends in the most important districts. It was far too advanced. In 1876 a second bill was drafted and laid before Honourable members in the Conference Room of the House of Commons, but its penal clauses were considered much too severe. These were in the IX. clause. He would read it. It was to the effect that neither sale, barter, or otherwise disposing of liquor was to be allowed. The penalty for doing so was imprisonment for a first offence of three months, &c., and with the confiscation of the liquor and utensils. But they were quite hopeful on the subject and did not give way to despair. (Applause.) The Executive would be very glad to send to the country a draft of the bill. It could be read at conferences, and then sent back with a resolution stating the decision the conferences had arrived at regarding the proposed bill.

Mr. M'DERMID of Dollar said the Executive should hold a conference in Clackmannan. He did not think they ever held a conference there. Clackmannanshire was one of the most important counties at the present time. If the electors under whose auspices he was met that day, knew the principles of the Association they would make the Lord-Advocate know them, and knowing them he would have an influence in the Cabinet, and also would be backed up by the members for Scotland. (Applause.)

After some further discussion Mr. Mackay, Edinburgh, said he was thoroughly satisfied with Bailie Torrens' answer, and the chairman putting the resolution to the meeting, declared it carried.

Mr. AENEAS MACKAY, Edinburgh, moved the fourth resolution, which read as follows:—

"That this meeting records its warm approval of the Social Reformer; tenders its grateful thanks to editor and contributors; approves of the issue of literature which has taken place during the year; heartily recommends this important department to the co-operation and support of members and friends throughout the country, in order that the Executive may be enabled to devote increased attention to the issue of solid, educative, and appropriate literature."

He said public meetings did a great deal of good, but literature did more, because it went into the homes, and was distributed to, and read by, persons who would not otherwise learn of the great work the Association was doing. He highly approved of the Social Reformer which was a working representative of the Association. (Applause.)

Councillor RUSSELL of Perth in seconding the resolution, said he derived the greatest amount of blessing—and he had no doubt it was the experience of many throughout the country—in perusing the Social Reformer and other literature issued by the Association. (Applause.)

Captain BROCHIE rose to support the resolution, because the literature issued, including the Social Reformer, had done an immense good throughout the country. (Applause.)

Mr. SEMPLE said it was a pity the circulation of the Reformer should be so limited. He thought the agents should bring it more prominently before the constituents. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. MALCOLM said the organ of the Association was a capital one. He took eighty copies per month, and distributed them to many persons who were not temperance reformers. (Applause.)

Rev. Mr. HARDING thought it would be well to get the boys upon the streets to sell the Social Reformer.

The CHAIRMAN put the motion to the meeting, and it was carried.

Mr. JOHN WILLIAMS, of Wishaw, moved the fifth resolution, as follows:—

“That this meeting, having in view the pressing necessity that exists for increasing and extending the operations of the Association, earnestly and respectfully urges members and friends to take the financial requirements of the movement into their immediate and generous consideration, so that the Executive, during the coming year, may be amply furnished with financial resources for a vigorous and sustained agitation.”

He said, in moving that resolution he was not begging for money for orphans and widows, but for funds to prevent children becoming orphans and women widows. He hoped that this matter would be generously considered. (Applause.)

Mr. JAMES WINNING, of Paisley, in seconding the motion, said their friend from Clackmannanshire had been complaining of their having no conference. The fact of the matter was this—the Executive had to cease meantime having such conferences because they had not the means at their command. He was looking at his friend, Bailie Torrens. That gentleman thought him one of the most irrepensible of men. The Bailie, if he (the speaker) recommended any scheme, would remark they were going into bankruptcy. (Laughter.) The resources required to be developed, and no agitation could be carried on to success unless the members and friends gave funds to sustain that agitation. (Applause.)

Bailie TORRENS said it was rather amusing to come to that meeting and hear how the Executive were to work, and also find money besides—(laughter)—and to listen to the complaints as to what they were doing. Could any of the gentlemen calculate the valuable time he and many of his colleagues had spent in prosecuting the work of the Association. He had been the previous night at Kirkintilloch, and the other night at Kilsyth advocating the cause, and his travelling expenses were not paid, and in fact he had to pay for his ticket that evening to the City Hall. (A laugh.) Mr. Winning had to make too much begging. He should not have stooped to beg. It was the duty of every one to give as the Lord had prospered him to this, the greatest cause that was ever agitated in the land. (Applause.)

The resolution being put to the meeting, was heartily carried.

Mr. DUNCAN FERGUSON of Barrhead moved the sixth resolution—

“Fully and gratefully recognising the valuable services rendered to the Association and the movement by friends and supporters, this meeting tenders its most cordial thanks to advocates, to agents of the Association, and to all who have in any way striven to advance the interests of the agitation.”

He thought the resolution deserved the cordial approval of the meeting. He was satisfied from the discussions which took place that day there was a healthy, thorough-going temperance sentiment being among the Executive, and those in the meeting.

Mr. EDWARDS seconded the motion, which was adopted.

Mr. JOHN SCOTT, Lesmahagow, moved a vote of thanks to Treasurer Hamilton for presiding, and Mr. John Concher, Glasgow, proposed a similar compliment to the Executive. On the motion of the Rev. S. Harding the Secretary was thanked for his services. All these motions were cordially adopted, and the proceedings concluded by Rev. Mr. Hamilton pronouncing the benediction.

THE ANNUAL TEA MEETING.

This meeting took place in the saloon of the City Hall, which was crowded by an audience largely composed of ladies. The chair was occupied by John Williams, Esq., Wishaw, who was supported by R. M'Callum, Esq., ex-Bailie Burt, Rev. R. J. Lynde, and Mrs. Lynde, Rev. Dr. Grundy, Mrs. Professor Kirk, Miss White, R. C. Murray, Esq., Bailie Selkirk, Mr. James Winning, Rev. J. A. Johnstone, and Mr. R. Mackay.

After the company had partaken of a sumptuous tea, and accompaniments served in a superior style by Mr. Jenkins, Great Western Cooking Depot, thanks were returned by the singing of the hundredth psalm, Mr. R. Semple of Paisley leading the melody.

The chairman then gave a most excellent address, based upon what he held to be the cardinal principle of the temperance reformation, the most important truth ever discovered—that man had no need of intoxicating liquors. (great applause). Addresses were then delivered by Mr. Matthew Edwards, Aberdeen T. A. Society; Mr. Campbell, Independent Order of Rechabites; Mr. Matthew Hilson, Edinburgh T. A. Society; Mr. John Stewart, I.O.G.T.; ex-Bailie Burt, Scottish Temperance League; Mr. Neil Baie, Greenock T. A. Society; Mrs. Helen Kirk, Scottish Christian Union British Women's Temperance Association; Mr. John Paton, United Kingdom Alliance; Mr. Wm. Noble, Blue Ribbon Army; Mr. James Malcolm, St. Rollox Temperance Society; Mr. Andrew Brown, Kerse, &c., &c. The thanks of the meeting to the chairman were heartily awarded on the motion of ex-Provost Dick, and this most enjoyable meeting was dismissed by Rev. James A. Johnstone, who represented the Scottish Temperance League, pronouncing the benediction.

MEETING IN THE CITY HALL.

PROPOSED LOCAL OPTION BILL FOR SCOTLAND.

THE twenty-third annual public meeting of this Association was held in the evening in the City Hall. There was a large gathering. The proceedings were announced to begin at half-past seven o'clock, but long before that hour the large hall was quite crowded in all parts, and later comers were sent into the Lesser Hall where an overflow meeting was held. In the large hall the chair was taken by Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., who was supported on the platform by the speakers, and amongst others, by Treasurer Hamilton, Bailie Farquhar, Bailie Selkirk; Councillors Torrens, Osborne, Lamberton, Ure, and Filshill; ex-Bailie Burt, and Bailie Maxwell, Dundee; Dr. M'Millan, Dr. M'Culloch, Dumfries; Rev. R. Mitchell, Manchester, Rev. George Gladstone, Rev. John Edgar, Rev. Robert Finlay, Perth, Rev. Wm. Jackson, Eyemouth; Rev. Dr. Morison, Rev. Dr. Nicholson, of Linlithgow; Rev. Dr. Adamson, of Edinburgh; Rev. Samuel Harding, Messrs. Wm. Robertson, and Jas. Winning, of Paisley; ex-Councillor Fulton; ex-Provost Cameron, of Pollokshaws; Messrs. John Wilson, J.P., Andw Wallace, Thomas Jackson, John Turnbull, James Finlayson, Wm. Johnstone, James Jamieson (Ayr), William Carney, Wm. Noble (London), R. E. Aitken, A. H. M'Lean, Thomas Jenkins, James Miller

Drysdale, Edinburgh; Wm. Fyfe, R. Moyes, Wm. Coghill, R. M'Callum, R. Dransfield, J. N. M'Allister, P. Ferguson, R. Mackay, Glasgow; Thos. Clark, Largs; A. Brown, Kerse; J. Morris, Broxburn; P. Turner, and G. Wilson, Leith; Councillor Russell, Perth; J. P. Lossock, Peebles; J. Lightbody, Lanark; Bailie Kennedy, Moffat; J. Howison, Uddingstone; Jas. Dymock, Boness; J. Osborne, Mearns; W. Crombie, Avonbridge; Matthew Edwards, Aberdeen; W. Blackwood, Aberdeen; J. Fullarton, Saltcoats, &c., &c. Mr. Charles Tennant, M.P., of The Glen, sat in the side gallery, with Lady Campbell, wife of Lord Colin Campbell.

LORD COLIN CAMPBELL, M.P., who was received with loud cheers, said—Ladies and Gentlemen—I have been several times on several occasions in this hall, but I do not remember on any one of them to have experienced a more cordial and kindly welcome than I have got this night. (Cheers.) I can assure you that I am not so vain as to take this entirely to myself—I take it to be your way of congratulating me upon the fact that I come here surrounded by those who have really earned some such welcome, accompanied by the hon. member for Carlisle—(cheers)—who we all know is the best company in the world—(laughter and cheers)—and accompanied by many others who have put their hand to the plough and endeavoured to work out a great social reform. (Hear, hear.) Well, I can assure you that I am very glad to come here, glad to show my respect not only to that large and increasing body of electors which I learned to respect at the last election—(laughter and cheers)—that large and increasing body of electors which has adopted and acted upon the programme of this Association, but also to show my respect to the hon. member for Carlisle, your leader, our leader—(cheers)—in and out of Parliament, who by his indefatigable exertions, by his courage in the face of obstacles which would have disheartened many a less earnest and conscientious man, has gone on until he has placed you in a position from which, if you cannot now look on complete and absolute victory, yet a position from which the steps towards final and complete victory and triumph are comparatively few and easy. (Cheers.) When I remember that this movement originated, as far as Parliamentary history is concerned, in 1864, that in the course of seventeen years, if I am right, he has thirteen times challenged the opinion of Parliament upon this question in four successive Parliaments, and that in spite of many discouragements, in spite of adverse decisions and of great majorities against him, aye, and in spite of the unfavourable attitude of many who are now the leaders even of his own party, he has persevered until he has influenced the election of a Parliament which is prepared to carry out this great work of reform. (Cheers.) It in fact has declared itself twice, on two successive occasions, in favour of such reform. I think that you will search in vain in the history of our Legislature for an instance of more splendid tenacity and fixity of purpose. Well, I must say that I think you have nearly reached the goal. You have overcome what I will term the inertium of the Parliament, and I must express the hope, and even the confident hope, that another session of Parliament will not pass away without there being added to the Statute Book a measure which will grant to the people that degree of freedom which you have been educated up to, a measure which, while granting this degree of freedom, will also—I fear that I am about to trespass on somewhat contested and debateable ground—will also grant a recognition of those rights which we are apt to term vested rights—rights which have unhappily grown up—been suffered to grow up—by the lethargy and the apathy of the Legislature. Well, now, I remember that on the last election, and I had that experience, you were told—I am not quite sure that I was not amongst the number who told you—that you might lay aside all crotchets, that for the sake of the party it was necessary to lay aside all crotchets. Well I have to congratulate you that I am convinced that you took the right course. (Hear, hear.) I have to congratulate you that you did not allow this question to be put into the category of crotchets, that you have lifted it out of this category, and though I do not, though I cannot, go as far as many of you, though I am not in favour of absolute restriction of the liquor traffic—a voice, “Prohibition”—the prohibition of the liquor traffic—well so be it; but I know there are many of you who believe that absolute restriction of the liquor traffic is possible. I don't believe that it is possible, and if it were possible, I am not very sure, indeed I am persuaded I may say, that it would not be entirely just. (Cheers.) But I go far enough. I think you will say I go far enough, in accepting the great principle that the ratepayer should have a voice in the determination of the number of public-houses or pest-houses, which you choose to call them—(cheers)—determine the number of such houses which a locality is to have. In accepting this doctrine I think you are urging reform which is most vital to the interest of the community. I think you are urging reform which exceeds in its importance, which is more clamant, more urgent, than any party cry—(cheers)—than any question which is now before the Legislature; ay, than the question of the agrarian state of Ireland—(cheers)—and I sincerely trust that you will not allow another session of Parliament, at least as far as the question concerns Scotland, to pass without putting some pressure on the Ministry to bring forward a measure which shall give you those rights for which you have been agitating. (Cheers.) Well, ladies and gentlemen, I do not know, I cannot see why this question should be postponed. I cannot see why you should not force it, with all the power of this great organization, upon the attention of Parliament and upon the consideration of the Ministry. I tell you that there is nothing more important. I do not know that those questions upon which Parliament has proceeded and debated during the last session are more important. I am not sure that it is wise to allow the people of this country to think that the Land League of Ireland is to be the only league using weapons which the people of this country will never use (hear, hear, and cheers)—the only league which shall extort from the Ministers the principle which is founded upon the abiding principles of justice; and I must say I think that the difficulties which encompass us in considering the reform of the licensing laws are insignificant in comparison with that great work which Mr. Gladstone undertook. (Cheers.) And I think also that the evils arising from leaving it alone are likely to be much greater than the evils which we might conceive possible to arise from allowing the peasants of Ireland to remain at the mercy of the landlords and the feudal laws. The Liberal party at the present moment are thinking of extending the franchise. (Cheers.) It would be a strange anomaly if the Liberal Government were to pass such a measure dealing with the franchise before it had conceded to the people—before it had granted to the ratepayers a certain control—that control which you wish for your own internal affairs. We think to codify the criminal law. It is certainly a question of great importance. But why not go first to the fountain-head—(hear, hear)—to the main cause of all the crime in this country. (Loud cheers.) We shall be told next session that there are great fiscal difficulties—great difficulties of a social and economic kind. Ladies and gentlemen, there were great difficulties 50 years ago, when Parliament, prompted by the philanthropy, and aided by the devout labours of Wm. Wilberforce, carried that great Act of Emancipation which cost this country twenty millions of money, which freed something like 800,000 negroes, and which abolished, root and branch, the most detestable and most obnoxious trade which has ever disgraced the commerce of mankind. (Cheers.) Now, there is one aspect of the case which, I think, at this time we cannot overlook. It is the expression of opinion which has come from Scotland. (Cheers.) I need only remind you of the vote of 1880, of the vote of the 18th June, that forty Scotch members voted for the resolution of the hon. member for Carlisle—(cheers)—while only five voted against that resolution. (Cheers.) And if you will go to the trouble of analysing the number of that vote, I think you will find that represents the vote of a majority of 310,000 electors, as compared with a vote of less than 13,000. (Cheers.) Now, I am afraid to go too deep into figures, but I don't think it would be unreasonable to take the minority in each case at a fourth; and if you will work out the figures of that vote, you will find that you get something like a net majority of 148,000 votes in favour of that measure which is advocated by the hon. member for Carlisle. (Cheers.) Now, I cannot see that if the people of England are not ready to give their assent to some such measure that the people of Scotland should be held back. (Loud cheers.) And I say this, if the Government do not introduce a measure for the United Kingdom, they are at least bound by these figures to introduce a separate bill for Scotland. (Cheers.) I am in great hopes that there will be no great occasion for such separate action. We have the satisfaction of knowing that many members of the Government have passed into the lobby with the hon. baronet. We have the satisfaction of knowing that some three or four members of the Cabinet have declared their adhesion to the principles embodied in the resolution. (Cheers.) And, above all, we have the declaration of Mr. Gladstone. (Cheers.) We have the earnest declaration that the Licensing Laws were urgently in need of reform. We have his declaration that as soon as the pressure of public business—and mind you, if I may say it with respect,—it is for you to increase the pressure—(laughter)—will permit this question shall engage the attention of the Administration. (Cheers.) Not only that, it shall be based upon this resolution which has twice been affirmed by the House of Commons. I trust we may not see Parliament placed in the false position of twice declaring itself by two resolutions passed in two successive years, in favour of this measure. I am sure that would be a false position. I know that an abstract resolution is very awful, and most disagreeable to a Ministry. It is a most disagreeable pill to take, especially when the Government know they must be prepared with a draught to swallow afterwards. I say that it is the duty—the urgent and solemn duty—of the Executive to give effect to the resolutions of the House. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I thank you most cordially for the kind-hearted and patient attention you have given to me. (Loud cheers.)

Rev. Dr. NICHOLSON moved the first resolution, as follows:—"That this meeting regards with profound concern the abounding social and moral evils which originate in and are fostered by the liquor traffic, together with its enormous waste of the national resources, and calls earnestly for such an united effort on the part of the electors of Scotland as will secure to the people the legal power to remove these gigantic national evils." He said that there was no call why he should enlarge upon these abounding moral and social evils, because they were seen all around. The victims of strong drink thronged into the corner shops, for the publicans knew well how to secure the best sites. They could always afford to give the best prices for the best sites. The time was when there was a great deal of wordy commiseration upon this subject. The time had now come for action. They were going to the Legislature—the most intelligent for many years—and ask them to give justice. Considering that restriction was applied to the sale of drugs and dynamite, the objection to the restriction of the liquor traffic was utterly baseless and illusory. The drunkenness of the country was in proportion to the number of public-houses. Depend upon it, the more you multiplied the public-houses, the more you increased the drunkenness of the country. It was said that the liquor trade should be thrown open to all. But this was tried in Liverpool, and the result was they had to revert to the other plan—to a certain extent to restrict the number of licenses. Then as to compensation, when that was broached, the idea was received with a smile of incredulity by those interested in the traffic. But when it was brought forward by others, and notably by the head of the present Government, it demanded attention, and ought to be faced. But really the certificate to sell liquor never conveyed the right to compensation. It only stated that the right was to be exercised for a year. It was no very great inducement to go into an ordinary business to be told that the license to sell a commodity was for only one year, and no longer. (A voice—"It is long enough," laughter and cheers.) He was glad to see their friend agreed with him. (Cheers.) Some would say it was too long. Dr. Nicholson then pointed out how on the one hand public-houses increased the value of the property in which they were situated, and how on the other they depreciated the value of adjoining property, the owners of which obtained no compensation.

Mr. JOHN WILSON, J.P., Glasgow, said—My Lord, ladies and gentlemen,—I rise with much pleasure to second the resolution so well and ably put by Dr. Nicholson, with every word of which I cordially concur. It appears to me that while this great movement is one that ought deeply to interest us all, yet in a special manner it is a movement of supreme importance to working men. Their more favoured and well-to-do fellow-citizens in the social scale of life can and do protect themselves from the evil effects of having public-houses planted in their immediate neighbourhood, and in most cases you have to go a good way before you can get one of those institutions which are ostensibly planted with such extravagant consideration for the benefit of the working classes. (Cheers.) In fact, my lord, it is most difficult to suppose that a working man is able to live and rear a family surrounded with such incentives to all that appeals to the lower instinct of human nature without being contaminated with the vice of intemperance. (Cheers.) As for the waste of the national resources, when we think of the sum annually spent on strong drink one stands appalled at the nation's wickedness. I use strong language, but nothing stronger than the circumstances of the case demand. Within the last three years it has been my misfortune to look over accounts involving millions of money; but I confess that when I look at what is stated as the sum of this nation's drinking bill, I feel persuaded that it is impossible to comprehend intelligently its vastness, prodigality, and waste. Indeed, language is too feeble to convey to the mind what 150 millions of money means. (Cheers.) Nor is this all, if you add to it the outcome of this misguided power, in the idleness and indolence, the crime and poverty which it generates—the requirements of benevolence that is needed to counteract and minimise the misery entailed on society—the criminal jurisprudence that is required to keep it in check—the sorrow and affliction that has to be endured, on which no figures in money value can be placed; the whole making such a total that I feel convinced, were the Christian intelligence of the country calmly to weigh the whole subject, this resolution would meet with the unanimous approval of every right-minded ratepayer, not only of Scotland, but also of the whole British empire. (Cheers.) It had been said by a great statesman that the object of all government ought to be to make it easy to do right, and difficult to do wrong. I trust that the worthy statesman who is reported to have said this will yet see his way to bend those wonderful God-given powers of his to the consideration of this great question, and may light be given him to see his way to devise and carry through a measure that will emancipate this grand old country of ours from this great evil. (Cheers.) I cordially beg to second the resolution.

LORD COLIN CAMPBELL—I should like to read a telegram I have just received from the annual conference of the North of England Temperance League, Sunderland:—"This annual conference sends hearty greetings to you and Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and sincerely wishes the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association anniversary all success." (Cheers.) I shall now call upon Sir Wilfrid Lawson. (Cheers.)

Mr. JOHN WILSON—The organist was not at his post to play "See the conquering hero comes;" but here he is. (Cheers.)

Sir WILFRID LAWSON, M.P., who was most enthusiastically received, the audience rising to their feet, waving hats and kerchiefs, and cheering heartily, said—Ladies and gentlemen, I have always heard, and, indeed, I know, that the Scottish people are people of great intelligence—(laughter, and hear, hear)—but I am inclined to think that among that intelligent race about the most intelligent and the shrewdest specimens who can be found are to be found in the Executive of this Association. (Laughter.) I will tell you what they did, pretty nearly accurately, perhaps not quite accurately, but they did something of this kind. They wrote to Lord Colin Campbell before writing to me, before having any promise from me, and they said, "My lord, will you come and preside at the annual meeting to meet Sir Wilfrid Lawson?"—(laughter)—and then they wrote to me, I think by the same post, and they said, "Sir Wilfrid, you really must come to do honour to Lord Colin Campbell"—(laughter)—and that is the history of our both being here. (Laughter.) But I say, in all sober earnestness, that you are intelligent—(laughter)—and you proved it on the 18th of last June, when you gave me that tremendous and overwhelming majority of the Scotch vote on the Local Option resolution. (Cheers.) Ah! I think it was a good vote; I think it was a good policy. To-night we are here to advocate fair trade, the policy of Protection. (Laughter.) Oh, yes; not the protection which is in vogue in some quarters, not the protection which is to prevent us eating too much, but it is the protection to prevent us drinking too much. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) We are not fighting to protect ourselves from imports, to drive away people who wish to sell us goods. No; we are trying to protect ourselves from a foe that is entrenched in our midst, and that foe is the liquor traffic, which John Bright—(cheers)—several years ago said was a traffic producing in this country crime, disorder, and madness. I have said that you showed your intelligence by sending members to Parliament who agreed with me. (Laughter.) That always is the real test by which we try any man's intelligence. (Laughter.) And in agreeing with me they voted for what is called Local Option, and to-night I am here advocating Local Option. But I will be bound to say there are a good many people in this meeting—(At this stage a person at the back of the hall shouted at the pitch of his voice and apparently in an excited manner, "Sir Wilfrid Lawson")—probably the gentleman who shouts is one of them—(laughter)—who do not exactly know what Local Option means in regard to the liquor traffic. It does not mean giving you any judicial power, any of those powers which now belong to the magistrates as regards licenses; it does not mean giving to the people of this country any power to regulate the liquor traffic, and arrange how it should be carried on. It simply means giving you the power of the veto on the issue of licenses by whomsoever those licenses may be issued—(cheers)—simply giving you the choice, the option of saying whether you will have licenses among you or whether you will not. That is the whole of Local Option, and it is very natural that our friends the publicans do not like it. There is a peculiarity about every institution and every vested interest that they have—that they think the world was made for it, and not it for the world. It is the same with all sorts of institutions. My lord, you and I have sat in the House of Commons. Is not night made hideous by every colonel in the British army crying out that everything is to be done for them, that the country exists for them, and not they for the country? So it is with the officers of the law. Propose law reform, and the lawyers are down upon you directly. They want to live by the law, to live on you, and not you to live on them. (Laughter.) If you try to take away any privileges from the Irish landlords, it takes a whole session for us to do it; because they think the earth is not the Lord's, but the landlord's. (Great laughter and cheers.) Very naturally our friends the publicans say—We are a great institution, and the country is bound to maintain us, and we ought to be allowed to carry on our trade wherever we like; wherever we and a bench of three or four magistrates choose to say that our trade should be carried on, there it ought to be carried on; and the people for whom one would imagine it was carried on have no right to say anything at all in the matter. Now that, I think, is a grievance. I think that the privilege which is granted to the drink sellers, whenever they can get the magistrates to agree with them, of setting these down wherever they please, is a very serious evil to the people of this country. And why? The trade is not like any other trade, as my rev. friend, I think, explained to you. If a butcher's shop be set up, or a baker's shop, the people deal with it. It does not increase the rates. That man does a fair business, and lives by legitimate profit. But the publican, when he sets up a shop, immediately increases your rates and taxes for the crime, and the pauperism, and the riots that are produced. You see that they have some disturbances in Ireland now and then—it is not so peaceful as Glasgow. (Laughter.) And in Belfast, I think, they have religious fights now and then; but I do not believe they would fight, even about religion, there if it was not for the drink, because I have observed over and over again, after they have been at war in Belfast for a day or two, you see a telegram in the Times, "About five o'clock in the afternoon, the Magistrates decided that all the drink shops should be shut up; since then the town has been perfectly quiet." (Laughter and cheers.) Ah, now mankind are the same all the world over—Ireland, Scotland, and England—in this respect. One more case though for Ireland—I got it only the other day, and it is rather good. It is connected with the Limerick races. Now I should think that if there was a hot-bed of riot anywhere, it would most likely be Limerick races. But the Magistrates took a sensible course this year, and they shut up the drink shops. They said there should be sold no drink on the racecourse of Limerick, and the sporting correspondent of the Freeman's Journal, writing from Limerick on the 13th September, says—"All was peace and harmony at Ballinacurra to-day, and not even a passing thumping match called for the intervention of the police. I have never been on a racecourse where I saw less rowdiness or intemperance. Peace, absolute and utter, characterised the opening day of the Limerick meeting." Now, I say if the prohibition of the liquor traffic can produce peace at the Limerick races, there is no spot in the wide world which it won't help to pacify. (Hear, hear.) One more quotation to show how this drink is the curse, as the poet says, of every age and every clime. We are all thinking a deal of America to-day, and our hearts are sad as we think of the grief that has befallen that country—the home of freedom and the home of progress; and we hope that, surmounting that trial, they will go on and prosper. (Cheers.) But what is the danger in America? There is no danger from Democracy in itself. This is the danger, as Wendell Phillips, their greatest speaker, said only the other day—"If universal suffrage ever fails here for a time—permanently it cannot fail—it will not be incapable civil service, nor ambitious soldiers, nor Southern vandals, nor venal legislatures, nor greed of wealth, nor boy statesmen, rotten before they are ripe, that will put universal suffrage into eclipse—it will be rum entrenched in great cities and commanding every vantage ground." That is a strong indictment against the drink traffic, and a strong fact is that where we find that drink boycotted, put a stop to just as at Limerick races, there you have peace, order, and increasing prosperity. (Cheers.) Now I do not propose, I never have proposed in the House of Commons, that you should have a law shutting up all the public houses. We do not want to shut up a single public house, we only want to prevent them selling drink. I never proposed to stop the sale of drink. I would do it in a minute if I thought I had a chance of carrying it. (Laughter.) What I have said is, "Let local communities have their option in this matter—(cheers)—leaving all the machinery, licensing magistrates to license the houses, jailors to take care of the manufactured article, policemen to look after them—leaving everything exactly as it is—only, I say, put a key into the hands of the people by which they can turn off the steam and prevent the machinery going to work if they wish to do so. Now, I am not going into the compensation question. You have heard a good deal about that already very ably put. All I say is that if the publicans have any right to compensation, I sincerely, earnestly, and cordially hope that they will get it. (Laughter.) I am waiting anxiously every day to see their case. Nobody pays a bill until it is sent in, but when we get our Local Option Bill—which I hope, as the chairman says, the Government soon will bring in—when we get that bill into committee, then the publicans, no doubt, will state their case; and you may be quite sure they will have a very favourable jury, for the House of Commons has an affection for all sorts of scoundrels—(laughter)—and I have not the slightest doubt that the publicans will get what they deserve, and perhaps rather more. (Laughter.) Now, I think it is two years since I had the pleasure of addressing your great annual meeting, and, to use a classical expression, a great many things have happened since then. (Laughter.) One thing was the Midlothian campaign. (Cheers.) I am glad that the campaign made an impression on your minds; it made an impression on a great many people's minds. (Laughter.) I think that Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, in the House of Commons, has more than once explained that from the Midlothian campaign arose all the subsequent evils in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America—(laughter)—Turkey, India, and the Fiji Islands. (Laughter.) I do not think it did so much harm as that. I think it did an immense deal of good. (Cheers.) What was the great lesson that the greatest orator of his day—(cheers)—when he came to Scotland, taught to the people in the Midlothian campaign? Why, it was the wickedness of our selfish aggressions upon foreign nations and selfishly taking from them what was not ours in pursuit of what we called our own interests; and I agree with that great statesman. But surely if war and outrage are wrong when perpetrated against foreigners, they are equally wrong when perpetrated against the people of our own country. (Cheers.) And what does this drunkenness, do, this drunkenness which is the outcome of the liquor traffic? Why, in the words of Mr. Gladstone himself, it produces in this country the cumulative evils of war, pestilence, and famine. (Cheers.) So I say we may take courage from the Midlothian campaign. But something else has happened since I have been here two years ago. You have had a general election. Unfortunately it put out the Tories. (Laughter.) This is not a political meeting, and so I may shed a tear over this unhappy event. But what I have to explain to you to-night is that it put out somebody else beside the Tories. What became of the great drink traffickers? Why, it was like a flood. There were two or three dozen brewers struggling in the water all at once. Morning after morning, when we got our papers, we read how another batch of brewers had gone to the bottom. (Laughter.) Don't you remember what Mr. Gladstone made of the three jolly Allsopps who went out to dine, or something of that kind, and never came back again. Why, it was the greatest overthrow imaginable. As the late Lord Beaconsfield said himself, concerning the overthrow of the Tories on that occasion, it was the greatest smash that had ever been seen since the days of Overend and Gurney. (Laughter.) And what was the result of that great election as regards our point? Well, the chairman has told you what the result was. No sooner did we get a Parliament more truly representing the public opinion than any Parliament of our day, no sooner did we get that Parliament installed at St. Stephen's than within a very few months they passed a resolution declaring and affirming the policy which I am advocating to-night, declaring in a full house, by a majority of 26, that it was unjust and wrong that places for the sale of liquor should be thrown upon communities who did not wish to have them. (Cheers.) That was the whole meaning of the resolution. But we did nothing that session. We were very busy last session. A number of important things had to be attended to. In England, you know, we are not so much civilised as you are, and up to last year we could not bury Dissenters decently. We had to put all that right, and Mr. Gladstone was busy repealing the Malt Tax—which appears to me to have puzzled everybody and satisfied nobody—and looking after the affairs of Montenegro. We are always very anxious to see justice done to foreign countries, whatever is done at home. And my friend, Sir William Harcourt, was very busy combating the ravages of hares and rabbits. So we could not attend to the drunkenness of the English people when we had all these things on hand. Then came the session of 1881, and I moved my resolution again—only, mark you, it was stronger. We increased the dose this time. Instead of affirming merely the injustice, we affirmed that the House had already affirmed the injustice, and that we ought now speedily to legislate on the matter, and have a law carrying out the principles of the resolution already passed. The dose was stronger, but the majority was bigger. That was very encouraging. Instead of 26 we had a majority of 42, and although I have said we are not Liberals or Conservatives here—we are neutrals—yet we may be very glad—there is no harm in that—we may be very glad that there were so many Liberals in the majority, because the Liberal party being in power it is the party to whom we must look to doing us any good. And what were the numbers? Why, 245 Liberals voted for me and 22 against me. (Cheers.) No party question! Oh no, the Conservatives did better this time; in fact they did in England three times as well as they did before, because in 1880 I only got one, this year I got three. (Great laughter.) As the noble chairman has told you, the vote of the Scotch Liberals was one of the most remarkable votes in the annals of our Parliamentary history. Forty-one to one of the Liberal members in Scotland voted in favour of this great right being granted to the people of England, Scotland, and Wales. And we had two or three Conservatives from Scotland—I think two—and if you take Scotch Liberals and Conservatives together you have a majority of eight to one of the Scotch members in favour of my motion. Now, of the 22 Liberals who voted against me, personally they were excellent good men. I have not a word to say against them, but I think if anybody was to go through them man by man, he would find that a more unreliable, shaky, weak-kneed lot of Liberals never assembled together in any place before. (Laughter and cheers.) I wonder how Mr. Gladstone felt when he found himself in such company. We all have the greatest regard for Mr. Gladstone, and we all must be sorry to see him getting into bad company. Why, there were three "Basses" with him in the lobby. You know we have brewers in the House of Commons. By whole families they come in—fathers and sons, and I daresay the grandsons by and by. There were the three Basses—the great ale-kings of England—marching around Mr. Gladstone into the lobby. I wonder if he thought of the old song about the "Three Allsopps" then when he was there with Bass's entire around him. (Laughter.) I think he must have felt lonesome, and would have liked to have been with the respectable people—with the noble lord and me. (Laughter.) But it is no use to be too much vexed about anything. Don't be too much vexed about Mr. Gladstone not going with us on that occasion. I say that we had a great triumph in regard to Mr. Gladstone himself—a most remarkable triumph, because Mr. Gladstone, although he went into the lobby voting in the division in which ten to one of the party of which he is leader were on the other side, he did not speak, and when Mr. Gladstone does not speak you may be quite sure there is nothing to be said. (Great laughter and cheers.) Now, you know I am here to-night defending Mr. Gladstone, that is my business—(laughter)—because I know some of you would feel rather sorry at that vote: and if there are any Midlothian electors here—I think I can see some of them hanging their heads for shame—I want to encourage them, give them hope, and give them more confidence in Mr. Gladstone, because he really is with us in spite of himself. Why, my friend here quoted his memorable words in which he said it was the duty of the Government to make it easy for men to do right, and difficult for them to do wrong; and if he thinks for a moment he must know that scattering public houses about the country is the way to make it easy for men to do wrong and difficult for them to do right. (Laughter and cheers.) And more than that, you have heard of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill which we had such fights over some sessions ago. Well, Mr. Gladstone used to help us warmly in that matter. And why did he support the Sunday Closing Bill in Ireland? For this reason—he said that the members in Ireland were—here are his words, he said this—that we had the highest and most reliable of all manifestations, the most regular and constitutional, namely, the votes of the large majority of the representatives of Ireland. But in that case—I looked it out the other day—the majority was only five to one; but here in Scotland the demand for local option is backed up by the representatives of Scotland by a majority of eight to one. (Cheers.) They have as much right to this benefit as our Irish fellow-countrymen had to their Sunday closing, and surely Mr. Gladstone could not long resist all this overwhelming evidence in favour of there being a strong popular opinion on this matter. Nay, I hope, as the noble chairman hopes, that before long we shall see him leading the van in the attack upon this grinding and crushing monopoly. (Cheers.) My lord, you are quite right. I don't think Ireland ought to block the way for ever. I say the thirty million of people in England, Scotland, and Wales have as much claim to be attended to as the four or five millions in Ireland. (Cheers.) We do not really ask the Government to take up any great amount of its time in this matter. We have told you we want no grand bills for licensing boards and fresh regulations and fresh choices as to the character of publicans, and all sorts of regulations of that kind. Nothing of the sort. Let the Government bring this in if they see their way to do it. But we do not ask them to do that. We say, "You license regulators have had a fair chance. You have done your best, and now it is time that the people who believe in permissive prohibition should have their chance also." (Cheers.) Why, the Tories tried licensing reform. Mr. Cross brought in a bill. Mr. Gladstone's first Government brought in a bill. Mr. Cross made the thing a little worse, and Mr. Bruce made it a little better. But we find that all these licensing schemes are failures. Sometimes the licenses have been granted by the Excise, sometimes by elected magistrates, for you have elected magistrates in Glasgow, who grant the licenses; but we always find the same thing, whether administered through a Board, or bench of magistrates, or the Excise; and whether you administer to the people in the shape of whisky, beer, or wine, it still works evil and woe to the country. It is no use people saying that the evil is not very great. We know it is. I heard a bishop the other day saying we were the drunkenest nation in Europe; and what did Mr. Samuel Morley say? Quoting the opinion that the world has of us—I am quoting this to show that the thing is no light evil—Mr. Morley said when he went to Switzerland, the people had a song which, translated into English, was this:

A Swiss will drink whenever he can,
Till he gets as drunk as an Englishman.

(Laughter.) Now, I say the time has come to wipe out this reproach on our national character. Who can do it? The present Government can do it. (Cheers.) Who can make them do it? The Parliament of this country can make them do it. And who can make Parliament act? Why, you, the electors of the kingdom, and nobody else. (Cheers.) The Government is in earnest when Parliament is in earnest, and Parliament is in earnest when the electors are in earnest, and at no other time. Here then, let me sum up the case before I sit down. Parliament has twice admitted a grievance and a crying wrong—the thrusting of drinking shops on places where they are not wanted. No private member could carry a bill through dealing with that evil. The present Government came into power declaring especially that its mission was to restore the authority of Parliament. And I say it is not credible—at least I will not believe—that the present Government will be so false to all their promises and their principles as to ignore the mandate of the country and the decision of the House of Commons. Our course is clear—we must give them no rest until they hearken to the voice of the nation. Lord Colin Campbell told us with ingenuous frankness that he had learned to respect the Permissive Bill electors in his constituency, and that is what we want. We want the House of Commons to respect us, and the Government to learn to respect the decision of the House of Commons; and I say, my lord, that surely what we are fighting for is worthy something more than a mere party struggle, the mere putting out the one Government and putting in another, dethroning one Prime Minister and replacing him by his successor.

Ours is no dark intrigue for place,
No jostling in a party race;
Beneath our banner proud to stand,
Look up the noblest in the land.

And what is inscribed on our motto? Why, the grand old words, that what is morally wrong can never be politically right. Under that motto, if we be true to ourselves, beyond the shadow of a doubt, we shall ere long march to a great and glorious triumph. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN, after putting the resolution to the meeting, declared that it had been carried unanimously.

Lord COLIN then asked if the meeting would return as answer to the telegram from the North of England Temperance Society the following: "That you reciprocate the good wishes and congratulations of the North of England Temperance League." (Loud cheers.) Before calling on the next speaker, his lordship said he would read a second telegram which had come in from J. M. Skinner, Oxford, who telegraphed—"Our magistrates have to-day refused the licenses of six of the twelve publicans who were scheduled for corrupt practices at the late election." (Cheers.)

REV. R. J. LYNDE moved—

"That this meeting declares its profound conviction that no legislation on the liquor traffic will be satisfactory to the people of Scotland which does not confer full powers on ratepayers or householders to veto all traffic in alcoholic liquors when they shall so determine."

He came among them, he said, as a representative of the Irish Temperance League—(cheers)—to convey to the Glasgow brethren their warmest sympathy with the present movement, and to catch and carry back if he could some of that sacred enthusiasm which animated their breasts in connection with one of the noblest national causes which ever banded a people together. (Cheers.) The presence of Irishmen even in the highest councils of the realm was not always conducive to harmony—(laughter)—and he feared they were credited with an amount of pugnacity which if it could not find an adequate field abroad must seek an outlet in intermittent eruptions at home. (Laughter.) Whatever truth there might be in that, he thought he might safely say that on no public question within the memory of living man had there been such a consensus of opinion as that which existed at the present moment in favour of Local Option. One of the best omens for the future of Ireland was that the cause which they were met to promote had overleaped all separating walls of ecclesiastical creed and political party. Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, and Presbyterian—Liberal, Conservative, and Home Ruler—were found standing shoulder to shoulder, and, by a large majority of their Parliamentary representatives, following the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Out of 56 Irish members who voted or paired 36 supported him, the minority only numbering 20. In Ulster 21 members voted, and of them 17 determined for the Local Option resolution, and only 4 against. (Cheers.) He was in a position to tell them that the drink bill of Ireland had decreased since their Sunday Closing Act by £2,000,000—(cheers)—whilst both England and Scotland had increased their drink bill during the same period. He humbly submitted that with all her faults, and with them all he loved her still and strongly, Ireland had not been a source of weakness but of strength to the temperance cause. It obstructives to hostile or inefficient legislation were wanted she could furnish apt and experienced agents in that department. (Laughter.) If the principles of combination were in their infancy among them, she could teach them how to form a league whose edicts would carry the force almost of law. If they wished to be indoctrinated in the wholesome principles of boycotting breweries, distilleries, and public houses, he did not know where they could find more efficient teachers than in some parts of Ireland. (Renewed laughter.) If the zeal of the boycotters outran their discretion, Ireland could supply them with Emergency men who would preserve a salutary equilibrium in agitated society; or if they wished for large-hearted, self-denying, and devoted combatants in the cause—(cheers)—the land which gave them Edgar from the North, the father of the temperance reformation, and Father Mathew from the South would not be lacking in a supply of men of kindred spirit who held that the serfdom of drink was the most galling bondage, and that the truest patriotism consisted in hewing through the devil's chain which manacled the kingdoms. (Loud cheers.) There are three questions to the motion I was called on to move—1st, Is it practicable; 2nd, Is it right; and 3rd, Is it necessary? As regards the first we have no intention of creating an Utopia, or constituency, or community which should be fortified against the inroads of evil, but we hope and fully expect the Government of these lands to pass a measure which shall abolish the prime taproot of crime, disease, waste, and death, from which the nation acknowledgedly suffers. (Cheers.) How is this to be accomplished? Our Parliament makes the laws, but our people make the Parliament. The House of Commons has declared that the time is ripe for legislation on the subject, and the greatest living statesman, though non-pledged to the special proposal of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, has again and again expressed his conviction that some drastic remedy is needed for the regnant evil of the day. But what proves the practicability of the present proposal is that in America it has in several States become an accomplished fact. The thing has been already done. (Cheers.) In States larger than Scotland, public-houses have ceased to exist. The sale of intoxicants, save for medical purposes, is a crime punishable by law, and distilleries, breweries, and whisky stores have been swept into the dust-hole of things that were, and are remembered as we remember the dwellings to which the memory of a great crime clings like a shadow, tenanted tenements which we cannot pass without a shudder. (Cheers.) In my own province we can point to Bessbrook, where some thousands of workers subsist without a public-house, and are all the better for it. The thing is practicable. (Cheers.) The abolition of slavery seemed impracticable, but it was accomplished. Reform seemed impracticable, but it was effected. Catholic emancipation seemed impracticable, but it was attained. Free trade seemed impracticable, but it has irresistably been established. (Great cheering.) Disestablishment seemed impracticable, but there are no Dissenters in Ireland now. The Land Act seemed impracticable, but now every tenant in my island may cultivate his farm, none daring to make him afraid. (Cheers.) The interest in the traffic is immense, but I believe in a living God and in going against any form of evil in His name, and though it had the thews, and the helmet, and the spear, and the boasting defiance of Goliath of Gath, I believe the stripling of Temperance can bring it to the dust, and strike off its head amid the songs of an emancipated nation. (Great cheering.) My answer to the second question, Is it right? It is certainly, for no harm has been proved to have followed to any community who has carried and enforced a law suppressing the sale of these baneful liquors. (Applause.) Indeed, great good would be effected all round. It would set ten thousand thralls who are now sunk in the most degrading bondage. It would be a blessed evangel to multitudes who cannot call up strength to combat with the strongest temptation of their nation. It would remove the curse from a million homes which now sit in the shadow of death. A Christian nation should have learned long since to rise above the level of the first murderer's question, "Am I my brother's keeper?"—cheers—into the pure gospel light of their self denial, "I will eat no flesh while the world standeth if it make my brother to offend." (Loud cheers.) Of one thing we may rest assured, that no more righteous cause has ever fired a people's zeal or roused a people's efforts than that to which we have put our hand. (Applause.) In other causes we may sympathise with the vanquished, for many noble traits may have characterised a system which stern necessity commands us to abolish, but when the liquor traffic has been abolished no righteous man will shed a tear over its fall, no lover of his kind will bewail its disappearance, no hater of vice, immorality and crime but will rejoice when its doom is struck, for its history down the whole long line of its existence has been the fearful record of lamentation, mourning and woe, such as no other system ever called forth. (Cheers.) Lastly, is it necessary this power of absolute veto? It is too late in the day to prove its necessity for the evils to which the drink traffic leads. We have all supped full of its horrors. It has been no temporary plague cutting off its thousands and then passing away. It has not been like the stern arbitrament of war which, after a few soaked battlefields, will give place to a permanent peace. It is not like a year of famine which scourges a kingdom till a fresh harvest is ripened, but it has all the concentrated evils of permanent war, permanent famine, and continuous pestilence combined. All other means of lessening its ravages but the veto power have been tried and failed. Education has failed, the teaching of the pulpit has failed, the power of example has failed, the dread proclamation of the horrors of drink has failed to warn men away from it, and why? Have we any right to expect that these weapons will succeed when we refuse to employ the most effective weapon of all? I am a Christian, but I am a member of a Christian community, and until I have used the political power which God has given me with which to war against this traffic, and have done my best to drive it from its legal entrenchment, I have no right to expect that the God of battles will give us the victory. (Cheers.) The Christian religion is not to be severed from politics but to leaven them; and every Christian voter is bound, if he takes our view of the evil of intemperance, to give his vote in favour of the representatives who are pledged to put down the drink traffic, or at least to allow the people to do so if they will. (Cheers.) Each is responsible for his political influence. The State can give us this power, can most effectively prohibit, and it is the solemn duty of all voters to see to it that those who represent them in Parliament should no longer trifle with the national need, but grant a boon, the greatest which Government ever gave a people. I have great pleasure in moving the resolution. (Loud and protracted cheering.)

Mr. WILLIAM NOBLE, in seconding the resolution, asked what right had any one to place legalised temptations in the way of others. Dr. Moffat, at a meeting at Cardiff, told an incident of a mother sitting with her child when a lion appeared. The mother rose, and facing the lion, called out she would be torn in pieces ere she would allow the lion to go near her child. The lion gazed upon her, and after a while, seeing her determined attitude, went away into the jungle. (Cheers.) Mr. Noble asked whether the mothers of Great Britain would be brave enough to stand up for their children, and oppose the great lion of strong drink, which was threatening their lives? The mothers manifested courage like that of the poor

African woman, we would soon hear of a great diminution of intemperance. (Applause.) Glasgow had the same evil to contend with as London. At the present moment there were men connected with the churches, who were taking money from poor people in exchange for that which sent them to perdition. The Christian public were responsible for this state of things. (Cheers.) Again, alcohol was no respecter of persons. It would knock down a bishop as fast as a chimney-sweep. (Laughter and cheers.) He had yet to learn whether alcohol entered the system of the refined man; and then said, "I beg your pardon, I have made a mistake." When a poor man was found drunk in the gutter, some of our refined men would say, "Poor fellow, let us open the museums on Sunday." We would never make a man moral by first making him break God's law. (Cheers.) Other men said, let us give the poor man some light wine. But the so-called light wine made him drunk. There was a Frenchman invited to a college supper, who partook of a liquor which gave him a fearful headache. On the following morning, he said it was a liquor full of contradictions. It contained brandy to make it strong; sugar to make it sweet; water to make it weak; and a lemon to make it sour. (Laughter.) He asked what was its name, and was told it was called Punch. He said it was a very good name, for it had punched him very much about the head. (Laughter.) Mr. Noble affirmed that 60 per cent. of the reformed drunkards relapsed. A poor fellow told him, in James Morrison Street Hall, that he was a "waster." Mr. Noble had never heard the word before—(laughter)—and asked the man to explain. The man told him it meant that he was a wreck. For that class, prohibition was the only safety. (Applause.) Finally, Mr. Noble said, there was Scripture authority for their warfare, and their watchword should be "If we conquer in the fight, thine shall the glory be." (Cheers.)

Provost MACPHERSON moved the third resolution as follows:—"That this meeting hails with the liveliest satisfaction the numerous evidences of the progress of the movement, in particular the decided vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Option Resolution, especially the Scotch vote (and pairs) of 43 for and only 5 against; urges on the friends in the constituencies the vital importance of continuing and increasing the agitation in and out of Parliament for securing a direct veto on the liquor traffic, and pledges itself to support the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association by vigorous co-operation and liberal support." He said—My Lord, ladies and gentlemen,—I think one of the best evidences of the progress of the movement is to be found in the large and enthusiastic gathering in this hall to-night. In the early days of the temperance reformation, and that not so long ago, it was very difficult to get a place in which to hold a temperance meeting, and even more so to get anything like an audience. Ministers, doctors, and the great body of the people were against the movement—and even Sir Wilfrid experienced this in the House of Commons, in having to lead, year after year, many a forlorn hope against tremendous odds. It is said we must not legislate in advance of public opinion. But I am glad to say that now public opinion seems in advance of legislation, and one of the most decided marks of progress is the recent votes in the British Parliament, when the Local Option resolution was carried, and afterwards reaffirmed, with this significant addition—that it ought to be given effect to by the Legislature. We trust, therefore, that before long Her Majesty's Government, as they are in duty bound to do, will pass a measure embodying the principle, thanks to Sir Wilfrid for his persuasive eloquence and able leadership, and specially to the Scotch contingent, the gallant 43, who supported and accompanied Sir Wilfrid into the lobby of the House of Commons. (Applause.) A great deal is made by those who oppose the movement of majorities ruling minorities. But is not the whole line of the legislation of the country based on this very principle—the vote of the people? When a Liberal Government is in power, the Tories say they are not represented, or rather they are misrepresented, and that the whole country is going to the dogs. (Laughter.) When a Conservative Government is in power, then the Liberals turn round and say the same thing. In asking, therefore, for Local Option, or the power to a community or a district to say whether or not they wish public-houses in their midst, we only ask what is recognised as just and right in Parliamentary and Municipal Government. Another evidence of progress is that the sympathies of the churches are being increasingly arrayed on our side. Ministers are beginning to see it to be their duty, both by precept and example, to throw in their influence with the movement. One of the most eloquent and earnest ministers in your city had the moral courage, in this hall, and from this very platform, to tell his fellow-citizens that in consequence of the terrible evils connected with the use of intoxicating drink he had resolved to become a total abstainer—and this, too, against the expressed wish of his medical adviser. (Applause.) A further evidence of progress is the almost unanimous testimony of the highest medical authorities against the use of alcohol. What did Dr. Andrew Clark, one of Her Majesty's physicians, and medical adviser to Mr. Gladstone, say the other day? That for twenty-five years he had been physician to one of the largest hospitals in this country—that it had been a part of his daily business to ascertain the influence which alcoholic drinks exert upon health. After such a long experience what is Dr. Clarke's testimony? That upwards of 70 per cent. of the patients in the London hospital owe their ill health to the excessive use of alcohol. He further says that alcohol is a poison, and ranks with strychnine, arsenic, and opium. That a healthy person cannot be benefited by it; and although the system can bear it sometimes without obvious injury, yet is benefited by it never. (Applause.) Working men, and I am glad to see such a large number of working men present, this is a matter which is closely connected with your interests and that of your families. These places generally are planted thickly around your homes, and are temptations not only to yourself but to your wife and children, whilst your more wealthy fellow-citizens live away from them, and will on no account allow even one to come near their dwellings. Working men I have yet to learn that your children are not just as dear to you as the sons and daughters of those who live in the squares, terraces, and parks in the west end. Then rally every one of you round Sir Wilfrid, whose Local Option will put you on equal footing, and give you the power to say whether you wish them or not. (Applause.) Only yesterday a large landed proprietor informed me that in a district of the county in which he is interested, four-fifths of the inhabitants protested against a license being forced upon them, yet even in the face of this remonstrance the Justices granted it. He said also that he sometimes thought of sending to Sir Wilfrid the particulars as they might be interesting and useful in the crusade in which he was engaged. The last part of the resolution "urges upon all friends of the movement the great importance of increased agitation and co-operation by personal efforts and liberal support." We find that large contributions and legacies are given to our churches, hospitals, and asylums. So far good. But very small sums comparatively are given to temperance organisations. If, however, it is, as Dr. Clarke says, that upwards of 70 per cent. are in hospitals in consequence of the effects of alcohol, and a still larger percentage is to be found in our prisons and poor-houses from the same cause, does it not occur to you that it would be better to give larger contributions to our Alliance and Permissive Bill and Temperance Associations, whose agencies would save many from ever reaching the hospital, the prison, or the poor-house. (Applause.) Your late townsman, John M'Gavin—(cheers)—loved and esteemed by all who knew him, seemed to act on this principle, for many years he gave annually £100 to the Scottish Temperance League, and left a legacy of £1,000 to the same cause. I tremble for the future of our country and the rising generation, and yet, forsooth, in seeking to remove the temptations out of the paths of our brothers and sisters we are told that we are interfering with the liberty of the subject. Call this liberty, I call it bondage, slavery, thousands upon thousands of our fellow-creatures bound by the enslaving chains of strong drink, and to-night are sighing and groaning for deliverance, and that the temptations by which they are surrounded may be swept away, and swept away for ever. Is there not a Wilberforce who, for the sake of his country, will step out as its liberator, break the fetters and let the oppressed go free? (Cheers.) Did you ever hear foreigners say, as I have heard them, "De Scotch is a drunken people, de Scotch is a drunken nation," how humiliating to listen to this and know that it is only too true. Scotchmen, descendants of Wallace and Bruce, who fought for our freedom and independence; Scotchmen, sons of your noble covenanting forefathers, who, that they might transmit to us the legacy of civil and religious freedom, stained the heather with their life blood, will we, their children, not unite together as citizens and patriots in doing everything that lies in our power to wipe away our nations greatest curse and reproach? (Applause.) Would not our noble chairman, in whose veins there flows the blood of M'Callummore, lead on the van. (Cheers.) His illustrious ancestor, the first Marquis of Argyle, signed the National Covenant and sealed it with his blood. Not less illustrious in the history of our country would our chairman be, if, in the House of Commons, he would move and carry a Local Option Bill for Scotland, and thereby effect our country's deliverance from a curse, the evil of which Mr. Gladstone, the Prime Minister, says is greater than the accumulated evils of war, pestilence, and famine. (Loud cheers.)

The Rev. ROBERT WALLACE said—I came here as a representative of the Good Templars—(cheers)—in order to show our sympathy with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. I trust it will never relax its efforts until the drink trade is banished from our midst and our country set free. I second the resolution. (Applause.)

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Ex-Bailie TORRENS said he had very little to do on the present occasion. He was one of those who worked in other halls and kept himself in the back-ground at such large gatherings. He had a pleasant duty to perform, namely, to propose a vote of thanks to the various speakers who had advocated the great cause. (Cheers.) It was a pleasure that amongst these speakers Scotland, Ireland, and England were well represented. If it were proved satisfactorily that this great evil existed amongst us, then it was right to seek its removal. (Applause.) He had heard it said that the machinery of the licensing law was to be kept as it was, only the people were to have the veto, and some person mentioned licensing boards. He had no objection to that change, although he thought we had already as good a licensing board as it was possible to obtain. He believed that the magistrates were honest men, and sought to discharge a very disagreeable duty in the licensing court. A licensing board could do nothing more. (Applause.) The magistrates had this advantage, that they knew the cause of the evil, seeing the results so frequently in the courts. They would be strange Bailies, indeed, who sought to vindicate the extension and perpetuation of the liquor traffic. (Applause.) Personally, he had witnessed scenes which had brought the tears to his eyes, and he was not ashamed to own it. Indeed, his heart burned with shame at the degradation of poor humanity. This was especially the case when, in a cell, he saw a young mother lying drunk with a babe a few weeks old beside her. Looking upon this spectacle, he vowed that though he had wrought years and years in the temperance cause and in the effort to get others to follow his example he would continue to labour and to proclaim the necessity of removing this thing which was destroying the vital energies of the men and women of our land. (Cheers.) They had got Lord Colin to vote for the Permissive Bill, and now they had got him in the chair. (Cheers.) They wanted the Members of Parliament to study the question as Christian politicians and philanthropists, and consider whether it was right that anything should go into the national exchequer which perpetuated the immorality of the people. They were honoured with the presence of the member for Peebles-shire. (Great cheering.) If that gentleman and the other members from Scotland saw their way to bring in a bill for this part of the empire, Government would not long stand in the way. He moved a vote of thanks to those gentlemen who had so worthily addressed the meeting that evening. (Loud applause.)

Sir WILFRID LAWSON said—On behalf of the other speakers and myself, I thank you very cordially. But I have something even more pleasing to do than to thank you. I have to move a vote of thanks to the noble lord who has so ably filled the chair to-night. (Cheers.) There is one circumstance which I do not think any one has mentioned to-night. I believe his father has carried out the principle of Local Option in a portion of his own property—(cheers)—and that very good effects have arisen from the prohibition of places for the sale of drink, which we always do find arises in such cases. I am delighted to find his son here to-night prepared to give to the working men and the poor men of this country the same power to do good which the rich men already possess. (Cheers.) Now, it is needless for me to talk about his lordship, because the way in which you have received this proposition proves to me the opinion you have of him. On my own part and yours I thank him for the straightforward manner in which he has advocated our policy. Something has been said about a bill giving the power of the veto to Scotland alone. "Well, I never saw my way individually to bring in such a bill, because I think it better to go on the broad principle that I should endeavour to get justice done for the whole of my fellow-citizens throughout the united kingdom. But there is no reason whatever, after the vote which your Scottish representatives gave last June, and after the Welsh and Irish Bills, and the Scotch Sunday Closing Bill, why some Scotch member should not bring forward a Local Option Bill for Scotland. (Applause.) I do not know what his lordship will think of that suggestion—(laughter)—but I do know, after having heard him to-night, that if he should think well of it, there is no Scotch member more able to do justice to the question and to his fellow-countrymen than the noble lord in the chair. (Cheers.) Well, whether he will think it right to come forward and do that great service for his fellow-countrymen I have no means of knowing? One thing I do know and feel convinced of, and that is, whatever his future career in Parliament, it will be one in which he will be true to his principles and to his supporters. (Applause.) I now ask all who are in favour of the motion to hold up their hands. (Cheers, and all hands held up.) All those who are contrary. (Laughter.) None. The motion is carried unanimously, my lord. (Cheers.)

Lord COLIN CAMPBELL—I have to express my acknowledgment of the more than kind terms in which the honourable baronet has moved this vote of thanks. I confess that if I had foreseen all the consequences of my speech I might have thought better of it, or at least I might have been more prudent in what I said. But as the challenge has been thrown down to me, I cannot refrain from saying this, that if after consultation with other members of Parliament it may seem wise and expedient—after consultation with the honourable member in the gallery there (Mr. Tennant, M.P.)—(cheers)—it may seem wise to take a separate line of action for Scotland, I shall be most glad indeed, and I shall esteem it a great honour, to put my name on the back of a bill which shall give to the people of Scotland that for which the people of Scotland have pronounced in the most unmistakable terms. (Applause.) Well, it occurred before I came here to one or two of my friends on hearing I was to take the chair to-night to say—"Is it true you are going to take the pledge?" (Laughter.) I am very glad to come here under the wing of Bailie Torrens and learn a great deal of the temperance movement. But I confess I have not come to that. I think I have given sufficient promises for one night. (Cheers and laughter.) Ladies and gentlemen, I do thank you from my heart for the most cordial reception you have given me. I have met with receptions which, I will say, could only have been made and found among the warm-hearted people of Glasgow. (Loud cheers.)

The Rev. Mr. HARDING then pronounced the benediction, and the proceedings concluded.

When Lord and Lady Colin, Sir Wilfred Lawson, and Mr. Tennant left the hall they were cheered most enthusiastically by the large multitude who had been in the hall. Lady Campbell and the gentlemen bowed their acknowledgements, and drove off amid continued cheering.

OVERFLOW MEETING.

HUNDREDS desirous of being present in the large hall reluctantly turned away unable to secure admission. About 500 went to the lesser hall. There ex-Provost Dick took the chair. During the evening, the resolutions prepared for the large meeting were submitted, and carried by acclamation. The first resolution was moved, seconded, and supported by Rev. Dr. Grundy, Mr. Wm. Blackwood, and Provost Macpherson respectively; the second one, by Mr. J. H. Waterston, ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., and Mr. John Paton; the third, by J. Wilson, Esq., J.P., Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., and Rev. R. J. Lynde. A vote of thanks was, on the motion of Mr. R. Simpson, most cordially paid to the chairman; and the meeting, highly pleased, dispersed.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. JOHN M'DONALD, ABERDEEN.—On the 5th ult., in the 76th year of his age, there departed this life one of the most estimable and disinterested friends of the Temperance Reformation in the North of Scotland in the person of Mr. John M'Donald. He was truly a remarkable man. None could be in his presence for any time without coming naturally to that conclusion. On the Temperance question in its length and breadth, its depth and height, he was an authority. He had brought the exercise of a singularly acute and searching reason to bear with such effect upon this question that no one surpassed him in the knowledge of it in all its bearings. His views were those of the most advanced thinkers on the question, and these he upheld even in the face of formidable opposition and at the risk of rupturing private friendship. Far-reaching in the sweep of his intellect, eminently sagacious as regarded the future, singularly trustful in the progress of truth and right, he inspired all in contact with him with a fervid sense of duty towards the movement that had such a hold upon his affections; and also with an unflinching expectation in its ultimate and triumphant success. None who knew him well but felt that his convictions were pervaded by that love of truth which is the sovereign good of human nature, that honesty and sincerity, that intelligence and wisdom which distinguish the highest order of minds. His capacity of thought so largely transcended his powers of expression that in public he was never able to sufficiently exhibit the exuberance of wisdom he had so carefully treasured up on this matter, so it was the privilege only of the more intimate of his friends to enjoy that communion of mind with mind which constituted the supreme pleasure derivable from his friendship. Singularly free from dogmatism, he was eager to give all who differed from him the same credit for truth-seeking as he inflexibly claimed for himself—hence the respect entertained for him even by those that were unable to agree with him, and that was never diminished or withdrawn. He held no parley with insincerity nor faithlessness, nor hesitated to bestow on such vices his withering rebuke. Like other noble souls, although he had a presentiment that he might not participate in the final triumph here below of the cause he held so dear, yet he laboured none the less ardently and hopefully in its behalf. During his long life he had been assiduous to his personal duties and enjoyed almost uninterrupted health. Latterly, however, he was sensible of the failure of his eyesight, and had become blind in one of his eyes. The exhaustion caused by nursing his partner, to whom he was most devotedly attached, had not passed away, when, in July last, she suddenly died by his side. The shock, together with jaundice acting on a frame which had long survived the allotted span of human existence, overwhelmed his weakened powers of resistance, and cut off a life as pure in its aspirations, as loyal to its obligation, as clear in its moral vision, and as resolute in the pursuits of true happiness, as exists. No more leal adherent to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association lived than John M'Donald, who has been one of its vice-presidents for nearly a score of years, and one of its most liberal supporters in the north. The Executive have recorded in their minutes their deep sense of the loss sustained by the cause through his decease, and their high appreciation of his worth as a man and a social moral reformer.

THE LATE JOHN MACDONALD.—Our obituary of the 6th inst. contained the name of this quiet, unostentatious but worthy citizen, a man little known beyond the precincts of the well-conducted coffee room on the New Market stairs, where, since the opening of that important public institution in 1842, now a period of thirty-nine years, he successfully carried on a quiet, useful business, respected by his customers alike for his uniform courtesy and the superior quality of the viands he supplied. During so long a business career as that indicated, Mr. Macdonald could not fail to have made the acquaintance of many of his fellow-men; but few of them, probably, were likely to have imagined that their quiet, unostentatious host was none else than the last male representative of the famous Macdonalds of Glencoe. Speaking from a thirty-six years' intimate acquaintance with him, and an even more intimate acquaintance with his bosom friend, the late Dr. Linton, R.N., we can say that John Macdonald had higher life aims than temporary distinctions and mere material interests. He believed in God as a reality, not as a figure of speech. His faith in the ultimate triumph of righteousness by Jesus Christ was immovable. He knew his Bible much better than many professional divines; and what was of far more practical value, he reduced its golden letters to practice in his life. His theological opinions might not have squared with some creeds, but his life was all right. His reading was select. He knew what and how to read. He was a thinker of no mean order; and the select circle of his intimate acquaintances do not need to be told of the clearness with which he could lay down a proposition, and the cogency with which he could enforce it. Nothing gave him greater delight than to make the acquaintance of a thoughtful young man, nor could anything exceed his patience with the early prejudices which his keen eye never failed to detect as obstructions in the path of an ardent inquirer. His method was to shed a ray of light in upon the mind and heart, thus silently but surely displacing prejudice from the mind, as the fresh and budding life of spring displaces the withered leaves of a former growth. His adherence to the temperance cause was whole-hearted and progressive. His knowledge of the nature and effects of alcohol upon the human system was extensive and thorough. The prohibition of the traffic in all intoxicants for beverage purposes, by the will of the people, he was one of the earliest of temperance reformers to apprehend and fully appreciate. In all questions affecting the good of mankind, John Macdonald took a deep and lively interest, and was ever ready to aid every good cause, both by counsel and means. He was an indulgent and attached husband and a loving father; but leaves neither wife nor family behind him.—Aberdeen Daily Free Press.

Upon being promised a penny by his mother if he would take a dose of castor oil, a bad little boy obtained the money and then told his parent that she might "cast her oil" into the street.

I clasped her tiny hand in mine; I vowed to shield her from the wind and from the world's cold storms. She set her beauteous eyes on me, and with her little lips said she, "An umbrella will do as well."

THE FUNDS.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

OCTOBER, 1881.

\** The almost entire absorption of the space at our command by the Annual Meetings proceedings has forced us to crush out everything not already in type, even although we give an eight page supplement. Our contributors may depend on us doing our best to overtake all possible arrears in next issue. May we hope that this number will have its circulation helped by our friends this month?

\** We fell into an unaccountable error last month when we said, in our leading columns, that Ex-Lord Advocate McLaren had not yet voted for the Local Option Resolution of the House of Commons. He did so in June last. Such of our readers as file our magazine will we hope correct the error with a pen.

Month by month for the past nine months all that had a bearing on our question in the Imperial Parliament has found a place in our columns. We have not anywhere seen a similar attempt. Only the more important matters have been thought worthy of record. In our opinion a history not omitting anything will more vividly show the relation of the Liquor Traffic to the State, how much that system interferes with the business of Parliament, how invariably it requires State interference, and how were it not for the constant exercise of public opinion little even of legislative palliatives would be secured. As a mirror, too, of the steady flow and force of the tide of public opinion, such a history cannot fail to be interesting. We have made the attempt for one session, and that a most remarkable one. None but those who have entered upon such attempt can judge of the patience and the research required, but if it prove half as interesting and half as useful to our readers as it has been instructive to ourselves we shall rejoice.

OUR ANNUAL MEETINGS.

We have to congratulate the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on its annual meetings, which were a brilliant success. Nothing like them has taken place. The friends are feeling the progress being made; they see that in Parliament, as well as in the country, the cause is a power. They find that at every bye-election the active friends of the movement exert themselves, and there will at no distant date be no candidate returned who does not sympathise with their efforts. They believe the time is ripe for an advance, and last Tuesday they gathered themselves together to rejoice over the past and to determine what action should mark the coming year.

The attendance at the business meeting largely exceeded the attendance of past years; and, to our liking, a deep earnestness pervaded the proceedings. Men assembled to strengthen the Executive in their unflinching purpose, and once more to declare that their conception of Local Option was identical with the Permissive Bill. It was pleasant to find that the presence of more of the fair sex than we have seen only whetted the desire that there should be many more. We see no reason why women should not crowd our business meeting. There is no barrier in the way. We have seen a lady and her daughter there, with scarcely an exception, for twenty years, and we feel sure that the presence of other women as loyal to the movement as they have ever proved will be in harmony with the feelings of the executive. The chairman's speech was as usual a resume of the progress of the movement in all its aspects. It deserved the applause bestowed upon it. The Report was too lengthy a document to be read, but we think that a mistake was made in compressing its special points into ten minutes. The Treasurer's report was most creditable to the liberality of the members; the funds, if not flourishing, are in a healthy condition. The resolutions were fewer in number, to allow of fuller discussion on the policy of the movement. The Report was warmly praised and unanimously adopted, the Office-bearers cordially elected, the Social Reformer unstintedly praised, and the literature of the year heartily approved; the friends co-operating with the Executive and the Agents received the warm thanks of all; the Executive's services gratefully acknowledged, and the Secretary received a meed of approbation. The real resolution of the meeting was the third. It meant approval of the past work, and the continuance of conference work, and that preparation of the country for a determined Parliamentary struggle to get a Local Option Bill for Scotland. The most superficial present must have seen from the tone of the meeting the unquenchable spirit that had brought the movement to its present stage glowing brightly in the resolution, and we anticipate that our pages will be crowded by the records of the struggle resolved upon.

The tea meeting was quite a jubilant affair—one of the sunniest we have seen. There was a larger number of the fair sex, and their presence lent a gay appearance to the saloon. The provision for their enjoyment was superior and most admirably served. The chairman was truly a most genial governor of the feast. His position was acknowledged, but his power was never felt, so great was the sympathy between him and his guests. A most significant fact was reflected from the programme, that was the unification of the Scottish Temperance Movement on permissive prohibition. There were present the representatives of the United Kingdom Alliance, Scottish Temperance League, the Independent Order of Good Templars, the Rechabites, the Scottish Christian Union British Women's Temperance Association, and delegates from many temperance societies. Such a representation is truly significant of the position of the hopeful prospects of the agitation. As a citizen association in the parliamentary interests of the great temperance reformation, it is rallying around it all sections of the movement who see in its success their own decisive triumph. Then we had the representative of the Irish Temperance League, and the founder of the British Blue Ribbon Army. No wonder, then, that this meeting was successful and so enjoyable. It could hardly be otherwise, for on its platform and throughout its proceedings there was that feeling of unity and identity of aim which, in a warfare like ours, is so indispensable to power and success.

The evening meeting was a brilliant success. The appearance of the meeting was magnificent. The City Hall was so densely crowded, and the passages so thronged, that if it were not for the good humour and forbearance of the vast assembly it might have been unmanageable. To relieve the tedium of the long interval between the opening of the doors and the commencement of the proceedings, the city organist's services were engaged, but he never appeared. The Lesser City Hall was also densely packed. Lady Campbell, accompanied by Mr. Tennant, M.P., occupied a seat in the gallery to the right of the chair, and on their appearance both were warmly greeted. As soon as the noble chairman appeared the audience received him with cheers again and again renewed; the same reception awaited Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and the other speakers and prominent friends as they appeared came in for their share. The chairman's speech was excellent of its kind, not so thorough as some looked for, but full of sympathy with the principle and in hearty accord with the tactics of the Association. The Rev. Dr. Nicholson was unable to ingratiate himself sufficiently with his audience. Mr. John Wilson's speech was as eloquent and forcible as it was judiciously brief, and he "scored" a great success. Sir Wilfrid's speech was, as his always are, brimming with the gayest of wisdom, hopeful and undaunted in tone, eminently clear and simple; it carried the minds and hearts of his listeners. His reception was one to be remembered. Hats were waved, kerchiefs streamed welcome and cheers, and the Hall echoing with cheers again and again renewed. Such an outburst of gratitude as this dispels the sense of weariness and discouragement, enlarges the hopes and strengthens the energies of a leader. The Rev. R. J. Lynde, Belfast, made a most brilliant appearance, his speech was a clarion cry, and at times rose to a thunder peal of eloquence. He has had few equals and no superior on the City Hall platform. Mr. Wm. Noble, of London, gave a most characteristic address, and all interested in the Hoxton Hall blue ribbon agitation can easily apprehend how, under such an advocate, it has risen to fame. The Provost of Grangemouth's speech was powerful and appropriate, and met with deserved approbation. The Rev. R. Wallace, in a few burning words addressed the audience, and then ex-Bailie Torrens moved a vote of thanks to the speakers. Nothing could indicate the effect of the various addresses more clearly than the fact that, carried away by them, the worthy ex-magistrate gave one of his inimitable addresses, for which he had the strained attention and the unstinted approbation of his audience. Sir Wilfrid, in replying, moved a hearty vote of thanks to the noble chairman, and put it to the meeting, and when it was endorsed by vociferous plaudits, conveyed it to his Lordship. Then his Lordship promised much more than was ever expected, that if he could at all he would put his name on the back of a Local Option Bill. The proceedings then closed, but the meeting's influence did not end. It will roll on. If we dared to speculate we might trace great issues from what then took place. We forbear. To the pen of the historian we leave this, as we have left the other meetings, but this may be said of it, as of all, that it was worthy of the agitation, and was in every sense a resplendent demonstration. The overflow meeting was, though not so imposing, no less worthy, and on a par with the great demonstration of which it was the "overflow."

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—IX.

THE COST OF IRISH WINE AND BEER LICENSES—THE WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL—ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS—THE WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL IN THE LORDS—MR. WARTON ON CLUBS—THE NEW MEMBER FOR EDINBURGH—THE ROYAL ASSENT TO THE WALES SUNDAY CLOSING BILL—END OF THE SESSION.

August 18.—Lord F. Cavendish, in reply to Mr. Biggar, said he was not aware that £3 licenses for the retail of wine and beer for consumption off the premises had been refused by magistrates sitting in petty sessions, to any Irish trader who was entitled to obtain them, or that the collectors of revenue in Ireland compelled traders to take out two separate licenses—one for beer, at a duty of £4, 11s. 1d., and the other for wine, at £2, 10s., making a total duty of £7, 10s.

August 19.—Mr. Richard moved that the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors (Sunday) Wales Bill be read a third time. Mr. Warton, seconded by Sir H. Giffard, moved that Cardiff be exempted from the operation of the bill, and that it be recommitted on clause 1. Mr. Gladstone opposed the amendment in the first place, the hon. gentleman has already had full opportunity—and a more favourable opportunity than the present one, because it was a fuller house—of stating the whole of the arguments which he thinks ought to show that Cardiff should be excluded from this bill. The House has decided this matter when three times the number of persons were present than now. On the 15th June a motion was made, and there was a debate and division. The ayes were 27, the noes 118; and he submitted that we ought not, in the reduced numbers and exhausted condition of the House, to overturn a decision which is of so much greater weight than any we might now arrive at. But we had some experience upon this subject in the case of Ireland. In the case of Ireland it was granted for the sake of securing the passage of the bill, rather than on account of any conviction of the parties who made the concession that certain large towns should be excluded from the operation of the Irish Sunday Closing Act. But he understood that, speaking generally, the same Irish opinion which pronounced so emphatically in favour of that bill, is eminently unfavourable to the countenance of that exclusion; and that as soon as the temporary measure comes to be renewed, undoubtedly Parliament will be asked to put an end to that exclusion, and to allow the bill to pass for the whole of Ireland. The hon. gentleman has frankly owned that there is a general and wide-spread disposition for the passing of this bill. The exclusion from the bill of a large town of this kind would be a gross anomaly—an anomaly of the most unfortunate kind—and we ought not to introduce such an exception. (Hear, hear.) The bill was read a third time, amid great cheering, without a division, although one was called for.

August 22.—On the motion of Mr. Onslow, a return was ordered of arrests from drunkenness on Sunday.

August 23.—Lord Aberdare, in the House of Lords, moved the second reading of the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill. He conclusively replied to the objection that the bill was very late for the consideration of their Lordships. The Irish people had wished for a similar measure, and he contended that the same measure of justice should now be extended to the Welsh people. The inhabitants of Wales were anxious for the measure now proposed, which was similar to that in existence in Scotland and in Ireland—namely, that the vending of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited on Sundays. When he said prohibited, he meant with the same exceptions—the bonafide traveller, the lodger, and the railway traveller. What he desired to show their Lordships was that there was a genuine desire on the part of the Welsh people—an almost universal desire, he might say,—that the proposed change should be effected. With respect to Wales, nothing was more clear than that the opinion was in favour of an alteration of the law. In the parish of Aberdare, he found that the number of householders whose opinion was taken, resulted in 4,659 being in favour of the closing movement, and only 210 against it. The population there was mainly composed of colliers, and it was therefore obvious that the feeling of the labouring class on this question as to drink, was decidedly in favour of Sunday closing. Such being the case, he thought there was a sufficient justification for the passage of the measure by their Lordships. The only question which, however, their Lordships had to consider was, whether the principality of Wales was sufficiently distinct from England, as to entitle it to lay claim to having separate and distinct legislation. Scotland and Ireland had been benefited by Sunday closing to the extent of having a diminution of fifteen per cent. of their drinking. Wales might therefore be considered to have a right to separate and distinct legislation. He was not urging forward the measure on the ground of more drunkenness on Sundays, as compared with other days. There was, however, the amplest evidence that on Saturdays there was a far greater amount of drunkenness than on other days of the week. The next most drunken day was Monday, and there could be no doubt that continual drinking did go on from Saturday, through Sunday, and so on till and throughout Monday. Now, a measure which broke through this habit was of itself a measure of great importance. Quite apart from the religious aspect of the question, it was of great importance that the day on which the working man received his wages should be separated from the Monday by the intervening Sabbath, and thereby interrupt a course of continued intoxication. (Hear, hear.) The bill was read a second time.

August 23.—In reply to Mr. Warton, Sir Wm. V. Harcourt was afraid that he could not promise to give a return of the number of clubs in the United Kingdom, the number of members, the places where such clubs existed, the amount of subscription annual or otherwise, whether proprietary club or bonafide working-men's clubs, or registered under the Friendly Societies' Acts; and giving the annual sale therein of all excisable liquors during the last three years, or as long as they were established, if established less than three years. He did not know of any means by which he could obtain such a return. If the police made such an inquiry, he was afraid that there might be just cause for complaint.

August 24.—In the order for the Lords going into committee on the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill, Lord Denman objected to that part of it which proposed to allow liquors to be sold at railway stations. The objection was overruled. The bill then passed through committee without amendment.

August 24.—Mr. T. R. Buchanan, introduced by the Lord Advocate and Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, took the oath and his seat for the city of Edinburgh, amid cordial cheers.

August 25.—The Welsh Sunday Closing Bill passed the House of Lords.

August 27.—The Royal assent was given to this bill, which is therefore law.

Parliament to-day was prorogued to the 12th day of November next.

PARISHES WITHOUT PUBLIC-HOUSES.—There are no fewer than 1325 parishes, townships, and hamlets in the Province of Canterbury alone, without either public-house or beershop. The absence of crime in these parishes is remarkable, or may seem so to those who do not know the intimate connection between drink and crime. The Northern Province has not yet made a report, so the above numbers represent but the half of England. There are no public-houses on the Shaftesbury estate, Battersea, nor the Queen's Park estate, Harrow Road. Similar estates are being formed in Liverpool and Birmingham. The town of Bessbrook, near Newry, is the property of Mr. J. G. Richardson, the proprietor of the Bessbrook Spinning Mills. This large linen factory employs about 2500 hands, and they reside in the town adjoining the mills, all of which have been erected during Mr. Richardson's lifetime. He lets the houses to the workers at a fair rent, and has neither public-house, police, poor-law, nor dispensary in the town. The shops are co-operative stores belonging to the mill-workers. The town of Saltaire, erected under very similar circumstances by the late Sir Titus Salt, has the same immunity, but speculators have built public-houses close to the boundaries of the estate, and found magistrates to license them. The village of Elvetham, Hants, the sole property of Lord Calthorp, has not a house or place for the sale of intoxicating drinks. The village of Scorton, near Lancaster, has no public-house. A little village in Wales, the inhabitants of which are almost exclusively employed in a slate quarry in the neighbourhood, is a paradise as regards the dwellings of the operative classes. Every man is possessed of a small freehold, purchased by his own exertions; many have one or two cows, and some of them have saved as much as £400, £500, and £600 out of their wages. So striking is the happiness and prosperity of this little district that it has attracted the notice of many statesmen, amongst the rest Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, who visited it, and expressed a desire to know the secret of this prosperity and happiness. It was explained that there never has been let in that locality a plot of land on which a public-house can be built. The result is that there is not a public-house within seven miles of that little village.

NOVEMBER, 1881.

A PLEA FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

Of all that God has committed to our care, children are the most important. They are not things, but beings. They have souls as well as bodies. They are endued with power, capable of indefinite improvement. They are precious vessels intended to be filled with the pure and the good. They are plants given us by the wise Husbandman, that they may be cultivated for the great future of time and eternity. With what care and concern therefore should we deal with the soul of the child, and yet with what carelessness parents and guardians act towards the children. Though a child is a child it should be dealt with as having in its nature the germs of future nobleness. We watch and tend with care the young plant in our garden, and protect it from the frost of night, and from the scorching heat of the sun, and water its roots and support its stem that it may gradually become strong and hardy. We don't deceive it by pouring salt water over it instead of fresh. We don't expose it to the gaslight instead of the sunlight. We deal faithfully and honestly with the plant, we don't mock it. And if we thus act in relation to the plant of a day, how much more so should we act in relation to the human intelligence that has been committed to our trust, to be trained for time and eternity. I make these remarks in order to an observation or two on the harmfulness of playing with the feelings of a child, and mocking it by setting before it a dangerous example. The child is simple and trustful, guile has not yet polluted its mouth, it takes upon trust all that you say, and therefore on no account ought the child to be deceived. No advantage should be taken of its spirit of trust. The open receptive heart should get only what is lovely, pure, and true. The child opens its mouth for bread, and woe be to that one who gives it a stone instead of bread. A stone will not digest, it will not give strength, neither will the false and the untrue nourish or strengthen the soul. You don't take bad money to the bank to be put to your account. You don't send to your tailor or dressmaker rotten cloth to be made up into garments for wear. You don't mix sand among the flour you use in the kitchen. You don't want an adulterated article when you go to your grocer, you want the genuine article. And shall we act contrary to all this when we are dealing with the dear child, shall we adulterate the mouth with error when we feed the young mind, or shall we do even worse, give that which is altogether untrue. There is nothing more common than to hear parents and others telling the dear child the most unlikely things that had never happened, nor ever will happen, and using threats that they never mean to carry into execution, and making promises that they have not the slightest intention of ever performing. Is this the way to deal with your child? Do you want to train your child to believe that you do not speak the truth, and if you do not speak the truth to it how can you expect it to speak the truth to you? If you want truth to come from the lips of your child, then let truth go from your own lips into its open ear. Make no promises to induce obedience that you don't mean to fulfil. Employ no threat you do not intend to execute. Do not awaken in your child groundless fears about that which has no real existence. Do not put before its imagination stories about persons or things which have never occurred or never will. You may please the child for the time. You may quieten the creature that it ceases to cry, but you are doing the child an evil which may prove an affliction to its nature for life. I have at the age of more than half a century a vivid recollection of things that were told me when I was a child, that even haunt my thoughts to this day. Not that I believe them now, but the circumstances when they were spoken are fixed in my memory and imagination [and likely will be there till I die. These stories were told me doubtless without any bad intention on the part of my seniors, but it was not only foolish but sinful on their part to put such things into my mind. It is almost an impossibility to efface from memory the evil effects connected with untruths planted there in the early years of life. They start up unbidden every now and then, not as pleasant pictures but often as dark spectres on the walls of memory. George Combe in his autobiography tells us when he was a boy in Edinburgh, he was out one day with one of the men employed by his uncle. On the road they met with a sergeant of the Black Watch or 42nd Highland regiment, a tall important looking man, dressed in the highland costume, having a huge cap surmounted by clusters of black feathers, with a sword hanging at his side. After the two had exchanged greetings, the sergeant, looking at the boy Combe, said to the man, "Is this your son?" He replied, "No; he is my employer's nephew." The sergeant said, "I hope he is a good boy." "O yes, he behaves very well." "I am glad of that, for (laying his hand on his sword) it is my duty to cut off the heads of all naughty children. The king, you see, pays me and gives me this sword and sends me out in his service, and I must do something for his money." The boy naturally believed every word that the sergeant said to him, and from that time he felt a terror lest he should at any time meet with one wearing the dress of a soldier. Combe remarks, "This way of playing with the feeling of children is highly injurious; not only was I frightened, but my moral perceptions were again perplexed and outraged, for no act of misbehaviour which I had committed or seen other children commit appeared to me to justify cutting off their heads, and henceforward I regarded a Highland sergeant as a sanguinary monster, like the ogre of fairy tales." The Rev. Wm. Arnot tells us of a somewhat similar occurrence that took place with him when he also was a boy. A person in a military dress took him fondly in his arms, slipped a shilling into his hand. When this same person happened to pass at any time, grown-up people told him seriously that he was enlisted, and when he was old enough the officer would return and take him to the wars. "This intimation," writes Wm. Arnot, "sunk into my soul, and lay at my heart like lead all the period of my childhood. I was afraid to speak of it, and suffered in silence. The terror was never taken off by a serious explanation, for no one knew how great it was. I obtained no relief until my understanding gradually outgrew it. That he wrought grievous harm to me. Besides overclouding life at its rosy dawn, it left within me when it departed a general grudge against mankind for wantonly wounding the helpless. When the boy was big enough to shake off the phantom he was full of indignation against the world, for amusing itself by torturing a child." But there are other ways of deceiving the children. How many thousands of children are deceived by their parents in regard to alcoholic drinks. They are familiar with the decanter and the glass at the table, and they see those drinks in daily use just as they see the bread put down on the table. What impressions are they likely to form of the nature of these drinks? They cannot suppose them to be dangerous to take, when they see their parents and friends daily using them, and not only do they see others take them, but in many cases they are taught to partake themselves. This is a sad deception which is practised upon the children. Thousands of children get their first love for these drinks at their parents' table. If they are trained to look upon these drinks as harmless beverages, what can be expected from them after they leave their home to go out into the world; will they not be in danger of forming a habit the germ of which has been planted in early life by the example that has been set before them by their parents? The Book says "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." We ask, Is this one of the ways to train up a child, to teach it to suck a poison out of the glass, or to frequent the public-house in order to obtain a beverage to quench its thirst? Many parents don't seem to realise at all the awful danger of setting such an example before their little ones. And these same parents send them to the Sabbath school, and to the church, that they may be taught to "abstain from all appearance of evil" and at home they counteract this divine teaching. Oh, if parents would only think as they look into the sweet innocent faces of their children, of the awful possibility of any of them becoming drunkards, reeling along the streets a curse to themselves and a curse to all connected with them. Methinks they would make sure that their own practice would not tend to lead them in that direction. We would therefore make this loving appeal to parents, that if you value the present and future happiness of your children, that you purge your home of these poisonous drinks, and show to your family a more excellent way,—the way of total abstinence from all which can intoxicate. Let your example in all things be such that it will be safe for your children to follow in your footsteps. W. S.

IS ALCOHOL FOOD?

[Specimen Lesson given in illustration of "How to Conduct a Band of Hope." See "Social Reformer" for May and July.]

Introduction.—You will remember, children, that at last meeting I explained to you what Alcohol was. I said—

(a) That it was the poisonous spirit, found more or less in all strong liquors that make people drunk. I noted on the black board that

Rum	contained	15 ounces	of it	in every	pint.
Brandy	"	10	"	"	"
Wine	"	4	"	"	"
Pale Ale,	"	2½	"	"	"

(b) That it got its name from an Arabic word—"Al-Kool," i.e., "devil," because it stirs up to all manner of evil.

To-night I am to tell you other two things about it—

(c) That it acts on the brain, producing a pleasurable excitement which is mistaken for strength.

(d) Those who sell it call themselves victuallers, because, say they, "it is food in a liquid form."

Food, you know, is all those substances taken into the body to give and maintain its strength, and in doing so it

I. Gives warmth; II. Makes flesh; III. Makes bone.

[Write these on black board, and get the class to repeat them simultaneously.]

Get examples of food under each head, thus—

I. Warmth giving—e.g., sugar, fats, potatoes, flour, &c.

II. Flesh forming—e.g., meat, fish, game, cheese, &c.

III. Bone making—e.g., water, fresh vegetables, salt, &c.

Observe (a) that the body does not need these different kinds of food in equal quantity. The number 8 would represent the amount of warmth-giving food required, 4 the flesh forming, and 1 the bone making.

(b) There is only one food which, by itself, does these three things—viz., Milk, it is therefore pattern food.

Let us inquire now if Alcohol

I. GIVES WARMTH.—When taken a burning sensation is felt in the mouth, and all the way down into the stomach, just as you would feel a burning heat if very hot water touched your skin. But this kind of heat, you know, does not warm you. So with alcohol, it burns but does not give heat. This is proved

(a) By applying the thermometer to the body after taking spirits—its heat is lowered.

(b) By the inhabitants of cold countries showing a preference for oils, fats, &c.

(c) By examining (post mortem) the internal coating of the alimentary canal (explain) and stomach of drinkers.

Observation.—One is very apt to suppose that because alcohol is distilled from wheat, which contains 60 parts of starch (a warming food) in every 100; or from oats, which contains 40 in every 100, that therefore it must be a warmer. But the many processes through which the grain has gone—mashing, boiling, cooling, fermenting, cleansing, &c.—have so changed it that every nourishing property has been completely destroyed.

God has sent the nourishing grain—"His good creature"—but the Devil has taught man to cook it, so as to work his destruction.

II. FORMS FLESH.—The name given by learned men to those foods that form flesh is nitrogenous food, because they are largely made up of a substance called nitrogen. An ordinary man needs 250 grains of this substance daily in his food else his body will soon fall into decay. When the chemist, i.e., a man who tries to find out what substance all bodies are made of, examines alcohol he finds various things in it, but not a single trace of nitrogen.

He farther tells us that alcohol enters and leaves the body the same, having undergone no change, that instead of dissolving food as water does it hardens it, so that it cannot in any way nourish the body, and that what is sold as "highly nourishing beer" contains exactly one part of nutritive matter in 1666 parts.

You will remember in connection with this that Daniel and his companions, on pulse and water, were fairer and fatter in flesh at the end of the ten days than all the children which did eat of the King's meat and drank his wine.

It is therefore no flesh former.

III. MAKES BONE.—Bone is made chiefly out of the salts—e.g., phosphorus, sulphur, chlorine, potash, soda, lime, common salt, &c., taken into the body from water, vegetables, fish, seasonings, &c., of which the body needs half an ounce daily. The chemist cannot discover any of these substances in alcohol, and

It is therefore no bone maker.

Observation.—The grand error made by the champions of alcohol is, mistaking its stimulating qualities for strength. Food produces fresh strength, but alcohol is merely a whip to call out whatever force the frame contains, and is always followed by depression.

Conclusion.—(a) Food satisfies; alcohol does not.

(b) Food makes men work better; alcohol does not.

(c) Food never robs a man of health, character, and happiness; alcohol does.

(d) Food does not pauperise, nor sweep 60,000 annually into untimely graves; alcohol does.

Alcohol, therefore, is not food; nay, more, science has proved it to be a poison—"toxicum" of the same class as chloroform, laudanum, strychnine, &c.

Repeat altogether this text—"Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?" Isaiah lv. 2.

With senior boys and girls I would advance and tell that when lovers of alcohol are driven from this position they say, "Well, if it is not food it economises food," and they instance cases where people were deprived of beer and the consumpt of bread was strikingly increased. They make no mention of the cost of beer versus bread, nor of the decrease of work and probable increase of doctors' bills under the one as compared with the other.

Laughed out of this, they maintain now that alcohol arrests waste in the tissues of the body. But this is the dearest economy of all, for our bodies are kept healthy by natural changes, for I am told by scientific men that every part of my body is renewed in seven years. The most unanswerable argument on behalf of total abstinence is to be found in the tables of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution, where abstainers and non-abstainers are insured under separate schemes. On black board quote examples in proof.

YET ANOTHER WARNING.

IN 1879, we had a cloudy and dull summer, and a hopelessly late harvest, followed, however, by an open winter, which was succeeded by a sunny, glorious summer, and untold abundance both by sea and land. The Heavenly Father smiled plenty upon us. But we heeded not, but went on our way transgressing his commandments, setting at nought his will, defying his will, perverting his authority, and transforming his bounties from solid wholesome grain into a poisonous liquid. "As our fathers did, so also do we." Mammon and Bacchus are the twin deities we "free-born Britons" delight to worship. Altars are reared to these and libations are poured out to them by thousands of householders, morning, noon, and night. No matter that storms and tempests linger over us for months, deepening distress in the midst of plenty. Abundance of food in our storehouses, plenty of garments in our groaning warehouses, but no money with which to purchase, for labour cannot be had. But the old proverb holds good, "The drunken man gets aye the drunken penny," and the dram shop is frequented as of old, and our intoxicating drink bill runs up, with its thousand and one concomitant evils—poverty, and crime, and wretchedness; which when looked into reveal a sad and depressing state of matters, individual, domestic, social, moral, and religious, enough to make us blush for shame, and recorded of any other country under heaven, would stamp its inhabitants as little better than barbarians. But so it is in so-called Christian Britain. How much longer shall this state of matters last and endure?

Were we in the midst of a series of swamps whose pestiferous exhalations every now and then thinned our population by fell disease, traceable to preventive causes, what should we do? Drain off the swamps, and no mistake! These swamps, dear as childhood's joys from early associations, and stretching back from time immemorial, may be looked upon by some, it may be by many, as next to a sacrifice to touch, far less to remove, these swamps, but walk they must. The common-weal demands their removal. The brave few who would venture to moot such a thing are sure to be described as "fools" or madmen. "Take away the swamps fringed with trees, shrubs, and wild flowers, yielding water-cresses, and swarming with water-fowls. The whole district would become a desolation!" Tradition and association and fancy may cling for a time to preserve things as they are; but what with the spread of knowledge and the ever recurring diseases striking down some youthful member of a household, consigning the victim after a lingering illness to an untimely grave, leaving the survivors draped in mourning, public opinion gets stirred up, reaches a point when something must be done. This is hopeful, and feeling becomes intensified, till action is taken, and one after another the swamps are drained off, and the whole district speedily assumes a changed aspect for comfort, health, and plenty; and people begin to wonder why the swamps were allowed to remain so long; and precisely so will it be with the removal and the fruits of clearing away our drunkenness-beggetting centres—the licensed groceries and dram-shops. Every conceivable means has been tried, shorter hours, closer inspection, a closer scrutiny of the character of the vendors; but the stream of drunkenness rolls on, much the same as before; and will continue to roll on till by local option the sources are dried up; and to make such an attempt public opinion is rapidly ripening. Slowly but surely it is nearing the point for action; and the polluting centres once drained off, can never again be allowed to settle down, will no more be tolerated.

COMMON SENSE, COMMON FACTS AND COMMON HONESTY.

PHILOSOPHY without common sense is a matter for study rather than to be clearly understood and made practical; and science unsupported by common facts may be a very learned affair, but not a reliable guide. Sound philosophy and real science start from common sense and common facts. They are to the development of wisdom and truth, as the sights, sounds and forms of Nature are to poetry, music and art. A man with poetry in himself sees it, realizable, in the combinations which evolve beauty out of the details of Nature. He is attracted by these, for in it right himself he is in sympathy with them. The feeling, pensive heart, responsive to the charms, the shows and forms of Nature, does not pass her by to burrow in books in the search for poetry; nor does the observant intellect overlook what is commonly known in the search for a foundation of facts strong enough and broad enough for truth to rest on and to be displayed from. All that is commonly known is rather more clearly seen than overlooked by the intellect endowed and trained to overtake minute and extensive observation. Degrading habits, extensively practised, may be despised as vulgar, but, he is even less than vulgar who despises the knowledge held in common before he begins to know for himself. Truth is not confined to what is known by the multitude, but its development takes place from their knowledge. This is felt by the wise as they develop knowledge into wisdom and happiness. The sense, common to all as to what it is well and wise to do, is to the true philosopher the first step in his ascent to the higher regions of wisdom and goodness in labouring for the people's well-being. In the development of knowledge and for its reasonable application, to succeed, we must feel at one with the people in all that they really know, and also in the capacity they have to make it beneficent and practical. In these respects the common people are not to be despised except at the risk of being ignorant in the name of knowledge and foolish in the name of wisdom. But religion must also receive vitality from common honesty to make it practical. He is the best philosopher who has the most common sense; and he is most scientific who is most intimately and most extensively acquainted with the common facts. This is true, but it is also especially true, that he who does not say yes when he should say yes, and who says no when he should say yes, is in the way of removing himself from the obligations he is under to God and man: and these, well fulfilled, constitute religion. Common sense, common facts, and common honesty are common to all; for, without what is called learning, all are necessitated to keep their eyes open to what transpires about them, and to keep on reasonably good terms with their fellows. And social order, after all, is to be attributed more to this attitude than to the enforcing of the laws, for they do not enforce themselves, but operate through public opinion. The multitude have therefore from the exercise of their natural faculties, the sense, the facts and the honesty which make them wise enough, knowing enough, and good enough to make life, property and freedom, tolerably secure. In the light of this acknowledged outcome, look at the common facts which enforce the practice of abstinence from alcoholic drinks. They intoxicate. This is a fact observed by everybody, and intoxication is insanity. Even children are impressed by this fact. Afraid of intoxicated people, they run from them in greater alarm than they do from those who are out of their minds from other causes. Impressions begotten in children's minds by the personalities and manifestations of those they come in contact with are suggestive. But intoxicating drinks also beget physical derangement. A man who is drunk reels and falls to the ground in a state of feebleness which unfits him for doing work. This fact is so commonly known that a man, even partially intoxicated, is recommended, when he presents himself to do work, to go home and sleep himself sober, so that when he does it he may be in a state not to spoil it. It is a matter of common knowledge that intoxicants produce mental and bodily derangement, and that under their influence men are unfitted for the duties of life. This is the science of common facts, but the science of other facts which are so impalpable that the learned dispute about them, affirms that intoxicants are food. It is a common fact that porridge maintains the mental and physical vigour to give endurance and efficiency in doing all the work that devolves on us. It has never been known that a man reeled and fell to the ground from taking porridge and was sent home to sleep it off and get into the state in which he could do his work and not spoil it. It is therefore clear to common sense that the impalpable and uncommon facts which magnify the nutritive qualities of intoxicants may be of service as the occasion of disputes between the learned; but to the common people, who must have sound minds in sound bodies, they are not to be substituted for the common facts as guides to health and strength. It is evident that the mental and bodily derangement which comes of intoxicants should beget suspicion. Results so unlike the wholesome manifestations from well attested food should set aside the assumed facts which would establish their dietetic use. Such facts have no claim to be relied on as dietetic data. The common facts are sufficient, and it is both scientific and philosophic to be guided by them. While physical and mental derangement result from taking intoxicants he must be a philosopher without common sense who attributes the effects merely to the quantity taken; and such common-senseless philosophers, while drunkenness increases from their advice, secure its continuance by encouraging the drinkers to cultivate sobriety by persisting to drink as little as possible. If the intoxicating quality was not in the drink the quantity in which the drink might be taken would not produce drunkenness. It is the quality that is to be avoided. If a large quantity produces much drunkenness, a small quantity can only produce less to increase the craving for more. If much drunkenness is therefore to be avoided the commencement must take place in abstaining from the least quantity of intoxicating drink. Little drunkenness from a small quantity of intoxicating drink is just less mental and physical derangement than results from a large quantity. Common sense can give no choice between little evil and much evil. Little evil leads to much, and in this case emphatically so. The science and philosophy which recommend little drinking in order to avoid much drunkenness are antagonistic to the common facts and to common sense, and foster the evil they affect to cure. But if science opposed by the common facts and philosophy opposed by common sense, lead to drunkenness, in this attempt to lead their victims to sobriety, to what an extent must the mistake be accelerated when they are helped by religion divested of common honesty. To common honesty the Holy Spirit is revealed as the culturing power of our nature. It is guaranteed by the Saviour to every one who may ask it. It is our birth-right, to rise by to the height of manhood. But that our personality, body and soul, may be its own to dwell in, there must not be enshrined in us a defiling lust, nor a principle of action the outcome of which is to subvert justice and kindness between men. To enshrine these, and pretend to be religious, is to say yes for no, and no for yes. The Holy Spirit claims the mind and body in a state free from the diseases which result from moral perversity, and little intoxication is a degree of insanity which, when enjoyed and justified as mental pleasure, must be felt to be the outcome of moral perversity. A religious man cannot respond honestly to his intelligence who at the same time claims the pleasure of alcoholic delirium and the guidance of God's Spirit. It is a matter of common knowledge that they are incompatible. The Divine Being waits in the fatherly attitude to aid the faculties with which He has endowed us, that they may operate in harmony and conform to His will. It is thus that He makes us co-workers with Himself to realise his purpose of infinite goodness. We are in union with God when we allow ourselves to be guided by His spirit, but out of union with Him and among ourselves when we are driven by the spirit of alcohol. The state of mind resulting from the Divine influence compared with the delirium, violence, and impurity produced by alcohol is as light to darkness, goodness to badness, and wisdom to foolishness. But still the use of alcohol is justified on religious grounds. It is called "a good creature of God to be used with thankfulness." If experience did not endorse the utterance that "a drunkard cannot inherit the kingdom of God," those who talk thus might be excused, but everybody have it recorded in their experience that intoxication more than most other sins does flagrantly overturn the rule of God in the soul. And those who thus talk are seduced by this deceiving spirit of alcohol from responding to experience with the common honesty which begets confidence in the ordinary affairs of life. In fact their yes in experience is made no in this utterance to the truth that intoxicants are as subversive of the state of mind favourable to Godliness as they are to bodily health and to the state of mind needful to investigation and business success. The scientific are bound to respect the common facts and start from them in prosecuting their inquiries after all that is to be known of the action of alcohol on the mind and on the body; these are the true indicators, and in observing from them scientists must be directed to the true issue. This is now the attitude taken by scientists who have the most accurate powers of observation, and their inquiries are illustrating the common facts and vindicating them from ignorant and unmerited contempt.

And as this state of matters grows into the order of the day, philosophers and religionists, not to be relegated out of place and influence, will no doubt take up with common sense and common honesty for the inspiration and guidance which can alone relate them to truth and goodness. The immediate future of our temperance movement is therefore much brighter than some of the overtaken periods that I can think of.

JOHN PATON.

PARTNERSHIP IN INIQUITY.

BY THE REV. S. HARDING, PAISLEY.

THIS is an age of innovations. Among the many that might be mentioned, there is the modern style of conducting business. The old-fashioned way has been superseded by co-operative societies, limited liability companies, and partnership in business. There may be advantages arising from this altered state of things, but we confess our sympathies are with the old-fashioned way of every man being held personally responsible for the conduct and results of his own business. As matters now are, society is in the dark concerning the parties embraced in the word company. If the business be a legitimate one, the public have little concern about it; but if it be questionable, and its results injurious to the community, then the people have a right to know who are the parties hiding themselves behind the scenes. It is only when a financial crisis comes, or a serious defalcation takes place, that the real parties are known, and made to bear their share of blame and responsibility.

The liquor traffic is one vast system of partnership. In its list of shareholders are to be found the rich and the poor, the learned and the ignorant, the refined and the debased, the theologian, the atheist, and the sinner. All of these are more or less interested in the prosperity and perpetuity of the traffic. In consequence of the secrecy observed by many connected with the traffic, it would be difficult to obtain a complete register. But the eye of the Omnipotent One is upon every one, and their names are registered on high, and when the "Great Assize" shall be held, every one will be judged, not according to their status in society, or the creed they held, or the profession of religion they made, but "according to their works." We are not referring to those engaged in the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors. Their position is clearly defined, and their guilt and responsibility is tremendous. But every man who, in any degree, profits by this traffic, is a partaker in that iniquity, just as the receiver of stolen goods is a participator in the occupation of the thief. Whoever allows himself to profit by wrong doing is guilty of that wrong. The same principle holds good even to nations. Let us particularize.

The Government of this country are large shareholders in this iniquity. It has been, and still is, to their interest to give every facility for the consumption of intoxicating liquors, say what they will to the contrary. They hold fellowship with the throne of iniquity, and frame mischief by a law.

If we accept the definition of a Government, as given by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone in his speech at the Mansion House, London, on the 13th October, "A Government is a portion of the community, selected by that community, for the purpose of discharging duties, but dependent for their efficient discharge upon the support which the government receives from the community itself," then every person who gives his vote for a member of Parliament who upholds the liquor interest, is a shareholder in this iniquity, and must bear his share of the responsibility of the guilt occasioned by the traffic.

Magistrates who grant licenses for the sale of these liquors must not be alarmed at finding their names in the list of contributors to the vices of the people. In God's Statute Book there is no permission, or license granted to evil doers. Thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not bear false witness, &c. To license an immorality is to ignore God's prohibition of evil, and whoever does so takes upon himself the responsibility of such an act.

House proprietors are in the shareholders list who enrich themselves by the rent of houses devoted to the sale of intoxicating liquors. They may never frequent such places themselves, and would scorn to be found in the company of the lewd and drunken. But they are partakers of the sins of these unholy and ungodly persons while they receive their share of the wages of iniquity in the shape of rent for their houses.

The Church is in partnership with this iniquity. It has taken the liquor traffic under its special protection and grants indulgences to its supporters. This is a fearful accusation to bring against the Church. Our proof is,—That there are to be found in the majority of the churches in Scotland those who are engaged as distillers, maltsters, brewers, or publicans, many of these holding offices as elders, and contributing largely of the proceeds of the traffic towards the support of the Church and ministry. A further proof is,—That, in the majority of churches at the Holy Communion, they place the alcoholic wine upon the Lord's Table to represent the blood of him who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. Thus throwing the wing of the Church around the "mockers."

What would be said of that church which allowed gamblers, keepers of immoral houses, and receivers of stolen property to be members and office-bearers therein, and periodically receive its share of the plunder and ill-gotten gains?

Society would cry Shame, and in the name of common decency demand the expulsion of such persons therefrom. And yet many of the churches allow within their pale, and even honour with office, those who are engaged in the liquor traffic, which is the great contributory to vice, immorality, and prostitution, and receives a share of the proceeds of the traffic. But society does not cry Shame upon such conduct, or demand the expulsion of such persons from these churches. Strange anomaly! Wonderful inconsistency!! Where are Zion's watchmen? Are they asleep, or quietly acquiescing, so as not to disturb the peace of the Church? Fearful perversion of the New Testament order, "First pure, then peaceable." Paul's injunction to Timothy in matters of this kind was, "Neither be thou partaker of other men's sins, keep thyself pure."

Lookers on are found among the partners in this iniquity. Meroz was cursed by the angel of the Lord, not because it opposed Israel, or rendered assistance to its enemies, but because it remained neutral. "It came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty." The conduct of the priest and Levite was reprobated, not because they inflicted additional wounds upon the already half dead traveller by the road side, but because they simply "Looked on him, and passed by on the other side."

The servant who received the one talent was not condemned because he had squandered it, but because he had not used it like the rest of his fellow servants. "If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain. If thou sayest, Behold we knew it not, doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul, doth he not know it? and shall he not render to every man according to his works?"

Matters have come to a crisis. Sides must be taken. There is no neutral ground between right and wrong. There must be loyalty to conscience. Convictions of duty will make obligations plain. The course is definite and discernable, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

CHAPTER I.

"EVENIN' NEWS."

"EVENIN' NEWS, ma'am; murder in Edinburgh; Evenin' News, ma'am," cried a shrill little voice at the elbow of a young lady, as she turned from Princes Street into St. Andrew's Square in company with a tall dark gentleman, on whose arm her daintily-gloved hand lay affectionately and trustingly. They were brother and sister, tenderly attached to each other and to their widowed mother, the light of whose lonely life they were. The mite of a girl who addressed them brushed close to the young lady's rich skirts, and she drew back in disgust. "Go away, child; I don't want any. There's a penny for you," she said crossly. But her brother's hand closed over hers, and removed the copper from it to his own.

"Give me a paper, child," he said; and the shivering child gratefully complied.

"It is not right, Alice," he said as they passed on, "to give these newspaper children money without taking wares in return. It encourages a new system of begging, which, Heaven knows, we have no need of in the city. Poor little mortals! They have a hard time of it."

Alice Taylor shrugged her shoulders. "They are hideous-looking children, and so filthy I shudder to have them near me. Why can't workhouse and ragged school authorities remove these nuisances from the streets? I declare one can't walk in peace of an evening; it is a disgrace."

"The authorities you speak of, Alice, have their hands full already," returned James Taylor gravely. "But among that regiment of newspaper children there is wide scope for the exercise of individual charity."

"Is that a hint to me, James?" asked his sister half pettishly.

"I think if you were to take some of them in hand, I would not hear so many complaints of ennui from you, dear."

"You are absurd," was his sister's sharp reply. "Why, I teach in the Sabbath school, distribute tracts, sing at the free breakfasts, attend the soup kitchen, and I don't know all what. What more would you have? Are my hands not full enough of these things?"

"Yes, if you feel it so," was the enigmatical answer given, with a peculiar twist of the firm lips, which was very distasteful to Alice Taylor. She withdrew her hand impatiently from his arm.

"If you had some girls for your sister, James, you might have reason to complain. Look at the Wilsons, the Templetons, and Georgie Hume; they think of nothing but dressing, and going to parties and such things. You are too fastidious. I try to please you, but it seems I am as far off as ever. I have given up a great deal for you, James. I have left off going to the theatre, and refused wine always at people's houses, besides persuading mother not to offer it at ours. If you knew how much ridicule I have borne in silence for your sake, you would not be so hard upon me." And Alice Taylor finished her long speech by brushing away a few rebellious tears.

Her brother drew her hand within his arm again, and looked down into her face with his grave, earnest eyes.

"My darling, I am not hard upon you, and I did not mean to vex you. Do you think I am not proud and grateful for what you have done for my sake? I was only hurt to hear you speak so sharply and unkindly to that poor little child who surely deserves our pity if not our help."

But Alice was offended, and would not be conciliated. There was an uncomfortable silence, and both were glad when they reached the door of their own home in St. Andrew's Square.

It was a grateful change from the chill, damp March air to the warmth and comfort and elegance of the cosy drawing-room which some of the Taylors' friends declared was the pleasantest room in all Edinburgh. It was handsomely and tastefully furnished, everything in keeping, and the lonely old lady in the easy chair on the hearth looked as if she found it so, especially when her children came in that night.

"You are late, my dears," she said. The lines and wrinkles on her face softened wonderfully by the loving smile with which she greeted them.

"Late; yes, I think we are," said her daughter, her face clearing a little now. "I stayed two hours with Minnie Templeton, and hurried to James's office, dreading his patience would be gone. But he was busy with a client, and kept me waiting nearly another hour on him."

"She did not find it long, I assure you, mother," said James Taylor teasingly. "Wilson happened to be in, and I heard their tongues go like bells."

"Nonsense, James," said Alice, reddening slightly. "May we have tea up, mamma?"

"Certainly, dear; whenever you like."

Miss Taylor touched the bell, and the servant brought in the tray. Tea was only a nominal meal with them, as they dined late to suit James.

"How did you find the Templetons, Alice?" asked Mrs. Taylor, as she handed Alice her tea.

"Well, but in trouble as usual with Fred," was the reply. "He has been dismissed again, it seems, and came home from Manchester yesterday. Mrs. Templeton had a letter from the firm saying he had scarcely been sober for the last two months."

Mrs. Taylor shook her head. "It is very sad; his poor mother will be heart-broken."

"She is, poor creature; she was crying very bitterly to me. I wish you saw Fred; the change would frighten you. He is not the same man he used to be. You would scarcely know him. He was a nice-looking fellow once, but now"—Alice shuddered.

"He wants backbone—mental backbone, I mean," said James Taylor; "and his up-bringing was against him from the first."

"There was always plenty of drink going at their house anyway," said his sister. "And to-night Mr. Templeton was denouncing Fred in strong terms to me, and sipping his wine at the same time. I nearly told him of his inconsistency."

"He was taught to drink at his father's table, I do not doubt," said James Taylor gravely, "and that young Walter will follow him, or I am much mistaken."

"Drink is a dreadful thing," said Mrs. Taylor. "Nobody had ever a better chance in life than Fred Templeton. Three hundred a year and a prospect of a share in a first-class business is not to be had every day."

"It is a dreadful thing," said Alice Taylor with a sigh. "It made my heart ache to-day in that beautiful home, where such a shadow dwells always. It is the same in poorer homes too. When Minnie and I were coming to the car we met a drunk man being led along by his wife, who was crying like to break her heart."

"Let us be thankful, my children," said the mother, with streaming eyes; "Let us be thankful always that we are spared that kind of grief."

"Ay, and do what we can to lift the curse from other homes," said her son with impassioned earnestness. "Mother, I think God demands it of us."

CHAPTER II.

ONLY ONE.

Meanwhile the little elf-like figure who had so disgusted Alice Taylor's sensibilities was wending her way with weak and weary feet up the North Bridge, to her home in the High Street. She had a dozen or more papers beneath her arm yet, and only a very few halfpence in her pocket. She was a pitiful-looking little creature but only one of many in the city, and therefore no likely to meet with either notice or pity. She might be nine or ten, not more, but meagre and stunted, as children must be, reared as she had been. Her face was small and pinched, and sore lined and seemed like an old woman's. Her eyes were very beautiful, large, dark, and lustrous, but dim and worn to-night; for poor little Jennie Gibson was ill enough to be in bed instead of wandering on the streets of the city on one of the bitterest nights of a very bitter spring. She had been jostled and pushed and kept in the background by the other newspaper children, and she was wending her way home in fear and trembling, knowing what awaited her there. As she turned into the High Street, the bell of the Tron rang ten. All shops save the public-houses were closed an hour ago, but the latter were busy enough, as they ever are, selling the stuff which brings ruin and desolation to so many hearts and homes. She walked more slowly, still dreading the reception she would get from a mother whose feelings had long since been blunted by drink and vice.

At the mouth of one of the closes a group of ragged, dirty women were standing, arms akimbo, talking in loud rough voices, and among them a red-faced, blear-eyed woman, whom Jennie called "Mother." She was watching and waiting impatiently for the child's return, and darted towards her, holding out an eager hand for the hard-won coppers. A dark scowl spread over her face when she saw how few they were, and how many papers yet remained unsold.

"Ye lazy little brat, what hae ye been daein' a' nicht, staunin' about. I see warrant, claverin' wi' some o' thae limmers o' bairns." She took the child by the arm, and swung her round like a leaf in a storm.

"Dinna, mother. I'm no weel. I wasna able to fecht afore the rest," she moaned, her great eyes full of pleading. "I couldna' help it. Dinna strike me. O mother, dinna."

If there had been one spark of motherly or womanly feeling left in Jean Gibson's heart, that cry, those pleading eyes, might have touched it; but there was none. Her clenched hand fell heavily on the shrinking child, who cried out with pain, and then she flung her from her into the gutter, and, grasping the precious coppers in her hand, stalked into the nearest public-house.

Slowly Jennie picked herself up from the mud, and crept down the close, and feebly up the broken stairway to the garret which was her home. What a burden of pain and misery rested on that child I do not suppose any who may read this can even faintly guess. Her one longing was to be able to fall asleep never to wake again, never to open her eyes on the world, beautiful and dear to some, but black and cold and cruel, cruel to her.

Into that little low room the moon and stars were shining, but Jennie did not know the kind Hand that made them shine, nor the infinite heart of love dwelling above them. God's name had never fallen on her ears, save in dreadful oaths and curses; but though no human eyes saw the tears of agony she wept that night, God saw and treasured them up, ay every one. By and bye, growing calmed, the child's thoughts flew back to happier days she could but dimly remember, when father and mother had been kinder to her, and when they had had a comfortable home in a far better place than this. Father was gone away now—dead, the neighbours said. Drank himself to death, they said too, when she asked sometimes. She had not seen him for a long time, and did not expect ever to see him. She did not feel sorry, for he had beaten her dreadfully when he was drunk, more than mother even, and she was bad enough. Must I tell you? The one passionate longing in Jennie's heart that night was that her mother might die soon and leave her in peace. She was not afraid of being left alone in the world, for who could be more utterly alone than she at this moment?

Poor Jennie! Poor little riven, ignorant heart! There is One above—a great Friend with a heart bleeding for the woes of such as you! And the day is coming when you will know and love him, and by and bye go with him to his home above.

VARIETIES.

Oh, she was a jewel of a wife; she always struck me with the soft end of the mop.

"To be continued in our necks," said the toper, as he listened to the liquor gurgle from the bottle.

Why is a drunkard like a bad politician? Because he is always putting his nose into measures to the injury of the constitution.

"How seldom it is," said a philosophical old lady, "that the 'flower of the family' does anything towards providing the family bread."

A doctor and a military officer became enamoured to the same young lady. She said it was hard to choose between them, as they were both such killing fellows.

An old bachelor explained the bravery of the Turks in the last Russo-Turkish war by saying that a man having more than one wife was willing to face death at any moment.

"Why," said a physician to his intemperate neighbour, "don't you take a regular quantity every day? Set a regular stake that you will go so far and no farther." "I do," replied the other, "but I set it down so far off that I get drunk before I reach it."

A Cincinnati girl spent all her leisure time for three years learning to box, and then when she got married and wanted to fight her husband, she went at him and pulled hair and scratched the same as any other woman would. You can't make over human nature.

A drunken man at a Yankee temperance meeting, interrupted the speaker by exclaiming—"I say, mister, do you think does a gin sling do a fellow any harm?" "Not if a man slings the gin far enough, but when the gin slings him ever so little, then it does harm."

Have you heard this before? A child asked: "Mother, what is an angel?" "An angel? Well, an angel is a child that flies." "But, mother, why does papa always call my governess an angel?" "Well," explained the mother, after a moment's pause, "she is going to fly immediately."

The Corporation of Preston having come into possession of the licences of three public-houses, by the removal of property to make room for the new free library, has wisely determined to sacrifice the £900 which could have been secured by their sale in order to diminish by three the enormously excessive number of public-houses in the borough. There are far too many drinking places in London; but in Preston the number is proportionately twice as great, for there is one public-house to every 173 inhabitants, or, allowing five persons to each house, one house in every thirty-seven is licensed for the sale of intoxicants. The result is that "proud Preston" has become drunken Preston, even the policemen being continually intoxicated.—Pall Mall Gazette.

POETRY.

BOOKS.

I sit within my chamber, and the good
And great who lived in the grand olden time
Are here beside me; here are bards sublime
That minister to me in pensive mood,
And here are sage philosophers that peer
Into the mysteries of life and bring
The meaning clear of many a hidden thing,
And wise and deep historians are here.
All stand assembled here in order due,
And at my bidding wait—they are my friends,
And neither time nor ill that friendship ends.
Few human friends have I, Oh! very few.
But books in choicest language speak to me,
Give knowledge, mirth, and silent ecstasy.

THE FUNDS.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

NOVEMBER, 1881.

MR. JOHN PATON.

We are glad to state that Mr. John Paton has been in the north—Inverness, Elgin, &c.—and been received with great satisfaction. He has been also in the south-east—Kirkcaldy, Dysart, Edinburgh, and neighbourhood—where his labours have been highly appreciated. During this month we observe that he is to labour in Glasgow to the 4th Nov.; Stirling 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th; Greenock 14th and 15th; Parkhead 17th; Dalry 18th; Dumbarton 21, 22, and 23; Plantation, 28th; Glasgow, 29th. His engagements, it will be seen, are rapidly filling up, so that friends desirous of a visit should at once communicate with Mr. R. Mackay, 112 Bath Street.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION'S NEW YEAR'S TRACT.

This tract is from the pen of Rev. Professor Kirk of Edinburgh, and bears the significant title of "National Poverty." It is unnecessary to say one word in recommendation of anything on the liquor traffic from the pen of this able writer. The tract is illustrated by the same artist who has so skilfully illustrated those of previous years. The tract may be had at 10s. per 1000, or 1s. per 100—carriage not paid. Societies may have their name and the night and hour of their meeting printed upon it at an extra charge of 1s. 6d. on orders of not less than 500. On orders of 2000 and upward there will be no charge for heading if more than 40 words are required, by special agreement. The price post free is 1s. 5d. per 100. Orders should be sent in without delay as the tract is certain to be in great demand.

The other day we railed from the coast to Glasgow, and were one of a party of eight in a compartment of a most comfortable carriage, but, alas, at a side station, two of the company left, and their places were supplied by a drunken workman and his chum "not so far gone." For the rest of the journey we had a vivid illustration of what railway drinking carriages would have been had our Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme of railway carriage licensing been adopted. The contents of the cauldron of Shakespeare's witches seems horrible enough to read of, but it was as the nectar of the gods compared to what we heard during that short run. The "mair o' horrible and awfu'," that Burns suppressed in Tam o' Shanter, must have been the profanity belched forth by our fellow traveller. The incoherent jumble of sense and nonsense might have well provoked the risibility of all of us, but that nonsense was continually pervaded by a running fire of oaths, not minced oaths, but downright, aimless, unmanly, blasphemous oaths, discharged in such intermittent volleys that we sat amazed and ashamed. And looking back on the whole matter, the sense of relief is deadened by the reflection that we should all have remained silent when our fellow worm was so openly and daringly impious. Burke tells us that the time was when ten thousand swords would have leaped from their scabbards to avenge the look even that would have threatened Marie Antoinette with insult, and here half-a-dozen of men had never a voice to lift in honour of their Maker who was being defiantly offended in their presence. Well, we for ourselves plead guilty, and hope that our sufferings will be our penance. We shall certainly never cease to associate the scheme of licensing railway trains with the drunken working man who exhibited such a horrible ingenuity in profane expression as to silence and confound, as well as to inflict upon us the severest mortification we have been called upon to endure.

But we are by no means alone in our travelling experience. A voyager to New Zealand in one of the splendid sailing fleet of the Orient Line had an experience to which ours was as the small dust in the balance. A passenger to Nelson, New Zealand, he had to endure the horrors of the "bar" of the ship all the way. There was a free and unfettered "bar," and some half-a-dozen of his fellow passengers went to the most frightful excesses during the voyage in drinking, profanity, and strife. There was no cessation, cooped up in that splendid vessel the sober and well disposed had their feelings outraged by night as well as by day, and timid women saw and heard enough of mankind during that time as must have driven them pale with affright, not to speak of utterly destroying all idea of trustfulness, generosity, and chivalry ever entertained by them of man. This may appear strong language, but it does by no means measure the horrors of that by no means exceptional voyage. There is no public place free of this abomination that maketh miserable; and on a peculiarly sensitive and pure mind the effects must be in a high degree deplorable. The progress of culture, education, and social and moral advancement may do much, but it is idle to hope that on such debased natures as those who made the emigrant vessel a floating hell, these virtuous agencies can make a permanent impression. Let Britain be wise, and first cast out the devil that is tearing and wounding her sons and daughters, leaving them more than half dead, and then to these factors of a life in sympathy with all goodness may be safely left the process of shaping the life of man, no longer drink-enthralled, in accordance with his destiny and the good purpose of God concerning him.

We were gratified to learn that the promises to the funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association reach a gratifying amount, and that many of the friends have generously resolved to increase the sum they have been in the habit of subscribing to the Association. Every one who yearns for its progress and success will rejoice at this. We hope that all who have not yet intimated what they intend to do during the current year will do so at the earliest convenient moment to them. We can fancy with what pleasure the Executive can deliberate upon any desirable course when a list of promises rises before their minds' eye for their encouragement and incentive; and the larger that list the greater their enterprise. The Constitution forbids them contracting debt. Is it not just to infer that when this restraint was imposed upon them the members thereby meant to affirm that they would give them resources in abundance? Surely it did, and so vividly has that idea presented itself to the minds of many generous friends that they have, with unflinching kindness, supplied the sinews of war. Last year the income and discharge might be said to have met each other, but that chiefly arose from the determination of the Executive that their efforts would be strictly measured by their income. That is not the position in which the movement should stand, and this would not be the position of the agitation for one moment were our friends to carefully take the matter of funds into their generous consideration. Were they to scrutinise their respective subscription lists in the light of the principle that prevention is better than cure, we believe that next to the gospel and its claims, there is no movement that would receive such munificent support as the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association during the short period it would require to labour to secure a triumphant issue to its efforts. Were our friends on the first day of the new year, now so fast approaching, to devote but a small portion of the sum usually expended on the gratifications common to that festive season, they would not be less happy, while their accumulated offerings would swell the treasury of the Association, invigorate all its agencies, and vastly encourage the heart of the Executive. We shall cherish the hope that this suggestion, so easy of adoption, will bear fruit in the shape of a new year's offering on the part of many of our readers.

The Scotsman when on the rampage always makes us turn and look for the red rag that puts his bovine-spirit so greatly on his mettle. He has been on the rampage since we met our readers, and this time the proceedings of the annual meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are the existing causes of his fury. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, that used to escape the fury of his rushes, is the object of his rage, and had the hon. baronet not already passed the gauntlet of hosts of such infuriated critics who, fortunately, in their madness miss their aims, it would have been all over with him. The statements at the meeting, which the Scotsman thinks would be a waste of time to examine, were not marked by any desire to convince the public, but only by a resolution to coerce them, were based upon serious exaggeration, total misrepresentation, and intended to be the foundation for gross intolerance." Could our readers undertake to lay before the public as the result of careful research an equal number of words marked by equal hardihood of assertion? We think not. In the tempest of his wrath he has fairly missed the point of all the agitation carried on by the Association. It is cause, however, for honest satisfaction that the public, with fuller vision and better reason, does not look upon the agitation with similar feelings to this venomous writer. We are more desirous of the good words of the electors than afraid of the random thrusts of the publican's ally, the Scotsman. The writer is of the opinion that "success has demoralized Sir Wilfrid, who speaks in the tone of a man who is master of the situation." In what other tone would the Scotsman have Sir Wilfrid speak? Surely not in the tone of despair when he himself gathers from the tone of the hon. baronet his anticipation of coming victory. He falls foul of Sir Wilfrid's liberal opinions. Now, we have always understood, and its enemies have always declared, that liberalism means redress of grievance even though to secure redress interests had to be abolished. If Sir Wilfrid is such a liberal, what ground can the Scotsman have for cavil? How any one professing a liberalism of this kind can cut and thrust at Sir Wilfrid because he cannot tolerate the liquor traffic—a mighty grievance—is to us a mystery, and a mystery with which we wish to have nothing in common. As regards this party matter, however, we have no desire to defend Sir Wilfrid from the Scotsman's blind fury, especially as he is so incensed that the object of his attack is beyond danger. This we will say, that liberalism knew its best supporters were of the temperance party, and by enlisting their sympathy it is now, to-day, in office and in power. He clearly perceives the favourable issue of the agitation on the part of Sir Wilfrid and his followers, and yet he tilts against Lord Colin Campbell for presiding over the late annual meetings of the Association. He points out that his Lordship is not yet so advanced in his opinions as Sir Wilfrid. Well, though he does not as yet see so far he does not sin against knowledge as the Scotsman does, but shows a kindly sympathy and offers a helping hand. When his Lordship endeavours to define how much power the ratepayers should have, and is willing to grant them a larger share of power over the traffic than they have now, he will fail as certainly as now to satisfy the Scotsman. None who offers to assert in getting power for the people to defend themselves and those near and dear to them from that evil, will ever enjoy the Scotsman's good wishes—if he has any. Lord Campbell can afford to choose his own course whether the Scotsman be pleased or angry. His lordship no doubt sees that, notwithstanding all the incorrigible opposition of that doughty champion of the drink traffic, that the agitation has grown into a movement of commanding national importance. Like Giant Pope in the Pilgrim's Progress, the Scotsman gnashes his teeth in impotent rage and mumbles the opposition to the movement which he is too impotent to enforce. Lord Colin Campbell is not the first reformer who, while couching his lance against a foe, believed that he might satisfy honour by slightly wounding him; but found his enemy so worthy of death that he did not hesitate to inflict it. The great majority of prohibitionists entered upon their warfare against the colossal wrong of the drink system, in the belief that it could be controlled. Stern experience of its operations undeceived them, and they are now earnestly striving for its overthrow. Stern history points her finger at 480 Acts of Parliament which were designed to regulate the operation and restrict the area of the traffic mischief, but all these are branded with failure. The Act we strive for, puts it into the power of the ratepayers affected by the liquor traffic to suppress that traffic, and when our work is done and the Act finds a place on the Statute book, the work of the ratepayers will begin. They, and they alone, apply the suppression, and the question may well be asked, where then can be the coercion. Oh, says the advocate, the Scotsman, you coerce the minority. To that we have the conclusive reply, The minority seems under our constitution to be only when in the wrong, coerced. We were the minority once, and we were coerced. We had to pay rates, to endure annoyance, to see our sons and daughters and our bosom friends betrayed and ruined. We appealed to the people for justice, for redress, and all the wicked sophistry of the Scotsman, notwithstanding our appeal, appears to be so just, so fair, that a scion of the noble family of Argyll sympathises so far with us as to preside over our annual meeting, and 42 of his Parliamentary colleagues vote against the drink system, and its great aider and abettor, the Scotsman. Let him continue to wallow in his venom, we will continue to move proudly onward with the growing multitude that will soon be armed with sufficient legal power to lay the great national wrong against which, with so many good citizens we stand arrayed, for ever in the dust.

We are glad to learn that the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are making their arrangements for carrying out with vigour the instructions of the recent Annual Business Meeting. They are to have conferences with the friends in as many places as they can reach. We drop the hint that friends might cordially invite them to hold a conference in their town or city. There is Dumfries, Kilmarnock, Ayr, Perth, Stirling, Forfar, Cupar, Falkirk, and Hamilton, where a conference would be of mutual benefit to Executive and friends. When we also have to state that a bill, "with all the latest improvements," is under adjustment and consideration, we have done enough to stimulate the desire of our friends for a visit. The Executive are about to pay a visit to Lord Roseberry, the Under Secretary of State for Scotland, and what will gratify all our friends, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., is to visit Edinburgh early in December. A little flattering attention to one deep in the secrets of the Executive has enabled us to place this information before our readers. We could really have gained much more from the same obliging source, but we think that what we have given will convince our readers that, quietly but vigorously, like some irresistible stream, the Executive is prosecuting the agitation, and all will be abundantly satisfied if we have placed before them what will stimulate them to a closer and more energetic co-operation with the Executive during the Parliamentary recess.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.

The anniversary meetings of this grand political organisation took place last month at Manchester, and were a great success. The first meeting was the breakfast one in the area of the Free Trade Hall, and so many assembled that breakfast was taken in relays, a number being served giving way to others. It was a sight as striking as it is rare to see such an immense party so early in the morning assembling to fortify themselves for the deliberations and demonstrations of the day. Mr. John Nisbet, of Edinburgh, was chosen the Scotch representative on the Business Meeting Committee, on the ground that he was a constituent of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.

The Council meeting assembled at ten o'clock in the Friends' Meeting House. Long before that time more than a thousand persons thronged the building. Friends met with friends. Eager were the enquiries about the working of each other's district, and hearty the congratulations showered in return for good news of progress made. Cheer after cheer resounded as some prominent leader of the movement appeared. When Mr. Barker, the indefatigable secretary, entered, followed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., Mr. B. Whitworth, M.P., Mr. T. Burt, M.P., and other friends, the audience cheered, waved their hats, handkerchiefs, and sticks, and shouted their welcome till the welkin rang. After the excitement was over the President gave a most able and vivid statement of the objects and aims of the agitation. Mr. Samuel Pope, Q.C., read a portion of the annual report. As usual, this is quite a formidable document, the most valuable of all issued by the Alliance year by year. There are many appreciative references to Scotland in its pages, notably on Sunday closing, bye-elections, the voting in favour of the Local Option Resolution, and specially the following:—"The movement in Scotland continues to advance in the most marked and satisfactory manner. The overwhelming Scotch vote in 1880 and again in 1881 in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution has demonstrated the strength of public opinion on the question of Local Option, and has given urgency to the demand for a separate measure for Scotland, which has always led the van in temperance legislation. At the recent annual meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which were the largest and most enthusiastic ever held in connection with the movement in Scotland, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who was present, reiterated his willingness to see a Scotch bill introduced, and suggested the chairman, Lord Colin Campbell, M.P. for Argyllshire, as an eligible member to introduce it. The noble lord promptly replied that if after consultation with some other Scotch members the way appeared to be clear, he would have great pleasure in responding to the appeal, and in introducing a measure. The announcement was received with unbounded satisfaction, and it only remains for the friends in Scotland vigorously to follow up the success they have achieved so that a Scotch Local Option Bill may be brought forward next session of Parliament." The report showed that the aggregate from all sources, inclusive of last year's balance, was £18,907, leaving a balance to carry forward of £1,702, almost the same balance as last year. A series of ten resolutions was submitted to the council by friends from various parts of the kingdom, in speeches displaying a wide range of speaking ability, the audience marking with their vociferous approval all the thorough-going utterances, while what was up to the high level of the prohibitory platform received the stamp of their signal approbation, references to restriction and regulation scarcely awakened even the echo of a response. The proceedings did not strike us as so stirring and striking as usual, and our impression is that the Alliance should at once regain the position she held with the Permissive Bill. Far distant as it seemed, and slow as was the progress made, yet the warmth, the fire, the eager glow of the proceedings, made an atmosphere for the ardent spirits that sent them to work with an energy and fire amidst which the foundations of the agitation were laid with an adamant stability, and work done which requires no undoing.

We reproduce the substance of Mr. Nisbet's speech, in submitting the fifth resolution calling upon the Government to redeem its promise to deal with the liquor traffic. He said:—I wish to call your attention to the fact of our condition in Scotland. We have three great agitations at the present moment before our population. I don't wish to say a word on any of the first two, the Land Question and the Disestablishment of the Church, for I am not here to deal with them, but I want to tell you how differently these two respective questions stand as compared with our own question. The meetings which are held all over the country in connection with these meetings are nothing compared with the meetings which we have with us in this great issue. We never hear of special trains being required to bring hearers to any of the meetings for these specific purposes, but when the great exponent of our question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, comes down to Scotland, it is not uncommon for it to be necessary to run special trains that the friends of the movement may hear his voice and listen to the inspiration which he gives them. It will be proof sufficient of what I have said to remind you that in Scotland, out of the gross vote given upon our question when the resolution was moved upon the last occasion by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, there were 43 to 5, or 8 to 1, of the Scotch members in favour of Local Option. (Applause.) This is a very flattering condition of things in Scotland, and it has instigated us to do as much as we can to make the others either to come round to our way of thinking, or we will have to try if we can't put somebody in their places who will think otherwise. Before I sit down I would like to refer to the last portion of the resolution. It refers to the promise which was made by the Prime Minister, that at the earliest possible date a measure would be introduced dealing with the licensing laws, and embodying the principle for which the hon. gentleman in the chair has contended. I am afraid that some of my friends here may say that we have not educated Mr. Gladstone up to the mark, but I hope that after we have five years past us we will have educated him up to the mark. (Cheers.) I had something to do in calling the first, ay, and the second, expression of opinion which he gave by repeated communication with him, and very much satisfied we were with these declarations. We had some little reason to be dissatisfied with the action that succeeded, but I have hope of the great statesman and that his heart is right, and before long he will take the same position on our question as he has taken with the Welsh Sunday closing. What gives us hope is this, that if Mr. Gladstone has enunciated one principle more than another it is this, that whatever great movement likely to benefit the people was afoot, all that was necessary was that the Government of the day should be convinced that the people wanted it, and no Government could withstand the voice of the people, but in time would have to give way. I call upon the friends upon this side of the border to imitate the example we are setting them. Put your shoulders to the wheel and give us a majority in England, and I am satisfied that you will not find Scotland and Wales lagging behind. We have ten members to get from you if a redistribution of seats comes, and if we get that there will be ten more of our men. (Hear, hear.) I have every hope that Mr. Gladstone, when he knows the great heart of the nation throbbing with impatience to read of his course, will respond to the righteous call of the people and of God. (Applause.)

The annual public meeting took place in the Free Trade Hall in the evening. The hour was fixed at seven; by half-past five, however, the platform was filling fast, and the portion at the back of the area under the gallery free to the public, was already full. To all the other portions, area and galleries, admission was by paid ticket. The overflow meeting took place in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall adjoining, which was crowded. The speakers included eight members of Parliament, all abstainers—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P.; Messrs. H. Mason, M.P.; W. S. Cain, M.P.; T. Burt, M.P.; W. S. Allen, M.P.; J. N. Richardson, M.P.; B. Whitworth, M.P., and the chairman, Mr. E. Stafford Howard, M.P., together with Sir William Collins, Bart., and other gentlemen. All spoke most fervently if not always thoroughly on the resolutions which they had in charge. The speech of Sir Wilfrid was quite a model speech and our advocates should make it the framework of their winter addresses.

There was quite manifest at these meetings an amount of enlightened public opinion at which all true friends of the movement must heartily and prayerfully rejoice; but it is waiting, it is in reserve, it is not yet concentrated, and until there is a Bill either by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., or by the Government, the grand Alliance will not show that great ebullition of public sentiment so signally as we would like to see. When one thinks of all that it has done—how it has exposed the big traffic, expounded the principles of prohibition, and built on them an irresistible demand for a law enabling the people to be their own protectors against the odious inroads of the liquor traffic, one has the most cogent reason for wishing from the bottom of his heart prosperity and speedy success to the national and patriotic aims of the "grand" Alliance.

The Burton brewers have been forced by the pressure of competition to supply private parties with beer at wholesale prices. We trust that ere long, by the pressure of public opinion backed by law, they will be compelled to cease supplying either private people or public traders with their baneful wares.

BERWICK ELECTION.—Mr. Jerningham, the Liberal, said at a meeting of the electors that his views on temperance had known no change. He gave Sunday closing his firmest adhesion, believing that most licensed victuallers desired it themselves, and that the measure will do good without prejudicing any interest whatever. Local option was coming to the fore. He would support any Government which would embody that principle. (Cheers.)

Messrs. Waterton & Sons (Limited), have prohibited the introduction of any kind of intoxicating liquors into their establishment, but have arranged for non-intoxicants being obtained for those of their staff who desire to purchase them.

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION—INTERVIEW WITH MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH, M.P.—Mr. William Blackwood of the Permissive Bill Association, and Mr. John Paton of the United Kingdom Alliance, with leading men of the temperance movement in Inverness, were introduced on Saturday by Councillor Elliot to Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh, M.P. for the burghs. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh votes with Sir Wilfrid Lawson for Permissive prohibition, and it was to thank him that the deputation was introduced. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh expressed his pleasure at being approached by the representatives of his temperance constituents, and stated that his support of Sir Wilfrid and the Permissive Bill Association would be continued. It is encouraging to know that our Scottish Parliamentary representatives are at one in this important matter.—Inverness Advertiser.

We have pleasure in giving insertion to the following:—Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society. Instituted 1836. President—Baillie Cranston. To the Citizen Electors of Edinburgh. The time has again come round for the discharge of a grave and responsible duty—the exercise of the municipal franchise. It is incumbent on us as a professedly Christian people that we promote to civic appointments those only who entertain healthy views on the social problems of the day—the most important of all such problems pressing for solution being that of the drink traffic. That the citizens may form an intelligent opinion on what so greatly affects alike the material prosperity and the morality of our people, the following statement of facts is supplied on data which cannot be gainsaid:—Population of Edinburgh—say 230,000; deduct two-fifths as under 16 years, 92,000, also one-tenth as abstainers, 13,000—total, 105,800: leaving a non-abstaining population, 'liable to be tempted to drink,' of—say 124,000. The police convictions for 1879 are as follows:—Drunk and incapable, 2,758; allow to cover repetitions, 1,379—total, 1,379, that is 1 in 90 of non-abstaining population. Drunk when apprehended for breaches of the peace, &c., 4,556; allow to cover repetitions, 2,778—total, 1,778, that is 1 in 54½ of non-abstaining population. Unite the two sections of police-convicted drunkards, and we have 7,315; allow to cover repetitions 3,657—total 3,658, that is 1 in 34 of non-abstaining population. Adult paupers 3,198; less as the sober poor 1,066—total, 2,132, that is 1 in 58 of non-abstaining population. Uniting the police convictions and the bibulous paupers gives a total of 5,789, equal to 1 in 21½ of non-abstaining population. The amount of misery—personal and relative—involved in these figures cannot be reckoned. They do not exhaust the evil. It consists with the knowledge of every elector that there are numerous cases of evil fruit from the drink traffic which never find a record in police books or their full fruition in a poorhouse. The accumulated evils are incalculable. Note that—as showing how accidents occur, having their source in drink—of the police convictions, 117 were of lorrymen, cabdrivers, &c., incapable of taking charge of their horses; and 82 were of mothers incapable of taking care of infants! The electors are invited to ponder earnestly this state of matters, and then let conscience say what is individual duty in relation thereto.

ELGIN—MR. PATON'S LECTURE.—On Wednesday evening, 12th ult., this veteran advocate of the temperance cause addressed a meeting in the Congregational Chapel, South Street, Elgin, his subject being "Wealth and Waste, or a Picture for Punch." Baillie Orr occupied the chair, and, after calling upon the Rev. Mr. Swan to engage in prayer, he introduced the lecturer as a very old friend of his, who had borne the brunt of the temperance battle from almost the very first. He promised the audience a rare treat. Mr. Paton then rose and commenced a concise review of our country's history, especially of the last fifty years, which came within his own personal experience, showing the vast improvement in the material well-being of the nation during that period. He took such a wide circuit and drew such a masterly survey, that it did not look like a temperance lecture at all, but rather one by a great political economist, so replete was it with reference to Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" and other authorities. The point of the argument came at last, however, with tenfold force. He showed that with Adam Smith's principles and James Watt's power the nation had worked up nature for the production of wealth, but that the nation, by its own act, was depriving itself of the enjoyment of its resources. The often-used phrase "over-production" came in for a most merciless scathing. He would substitute for it "under-consumption," and showed that no fewer than seven millions of the population were living under the mark and sliding towards pauperism—one million actually in it—who, if sober and wise, would make a large home trade in the necessaries of civilized life, and make us more independent of a precarious and capricious foreign demand. If appointed editor of Punch for one week—no more—he would represent John Bull misapplying his means as he has long been doing, and take his motto from Burns—"O wad some Power the giftie gie us," &c. The lecture lasted one hour and twenty minutes, and was sparkling with humour all through. Though a master of good English, Mr. Paton in a great measure prefers the broad Doric, and it has a most telling effect. Baillie Orr corroborated much of what had been said, and proposed a vote of thanks to the lecturer, which was rapturously accorded. Mr. Blackwood moved a vote of thanks to Baillie Orr for his admirable conduct in the chair, Mr. Swan pronounced the benediction, and the meeting separated.—Elgin Courant.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, from 14th August to 15th October inclusive. During that period 137 meetings were held, 55 being deputationary, and 82 ordinary. At these meetings 215 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Glasgow, Campbeltown, Paisley, Port Glasgow, Greenock, Rutherglen, Partick, Broxburn, and Parkhead, and addressed 41 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Stonehaven, Aberdeen, Glasgow, Paisley, Perth, Keith, Dufftown, Grantown, Insh, Portsoy, Inverurie, Laurencekirk, Inverness, Nairn, and Forres, and addressed 41 meetings.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Ceres, Nenthorn, Campbeltown, Edinburgh, Aytoun, Galashiels, Eyemouth, Chirnside, Addiewell, West Calder, Loanhead, Pathhead, Musselburgh, Fisherrow, Peebles, Kirkcaldy, Blantyre, and Glasgow, and addressed 34 meetings.

Mr. John Paton has visited Partick, Kilsyth, Govan, Glasgow, Ardrossan, Inverness, Nairn, Forres, Elgin, Keith, and Dufftown, and addressed 20 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Bonhill, Glasgow, Kilsyth, and Coatbridge, and addressed 12 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has addressed 11 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. M. Edwards has addressed 5 meetings in Aberdeen.

Ex-Baillie Torrens, J.P., has addressed 3 meetings in Kilsyth and Glasgow.

John Wilson, Esq., J.P., has addressed 3 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. Wm. Kesson has addressed 3 meetings in Greenock, Glasgow, and Port-Glasgow.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Rev. R. J. Lynd, B.A., has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. Wm. Noble has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow and Leith.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh and Leith.

Mrs. Professor Kirk has addressed a meeting in Glasgow.

The following gentlemen have each taken part in the proceedings of meetings in the places which follow their names:—Peter M'Lagan, Esq., M.P., Broxburn; Rev. Drs. Adamson, Glasgow, and Nicholson, Glasgow; Revs. S. Harding, Glasgow; and R. Wallace, Glasgow; Provost M'Pherson, Glasgow; Ex-Provost Dick, Glasgow; Bailie Kennedy, Glasgow; Ex-Bailies Lewis, Carluke; Maxwell, Glasgow; and Burt, Glasgow; Councillor Russell, Glasgow; Captain Brothie, Glasgow; Dr. M'Calloch, Glasgow; Messrs. J. Bone, Linlithgow; W. Stockbridge, Glasgow; A. Jamieson, Blantyre; R. M'Callum, Glasgow; J. Lindsay, Glasgow; J. Jamieson, Glasgow; J. Williams, Glasgow; J. Winning, Glasgow; A. Shanks, Glasgow; T. Robinson, Glasgow; Eneas Mackay, Glasgow; D. Ferguson, Glasgow; J. Scott, Glasgow; Campbell, Glasgow; M. Hilson, Glasgow; John Stewart, Glasgow; and N. Buie, Glasgow.

PUBLIC PRESS.

"One morning recently, when on duty at the Post-office, Gravesend, a coal carter came with a load of coals. After he had delivered them in the usual way the coal-ticket was handed in for signature. It being very early, I told him I had no cash then out of which to give him the accustomed gratuity. I asked him to please call again, and at the same time I offered him his choice of either doing so or accepting a few postage stamps instead of money. 'The stamps are no good to me,' he rejoined, 'they won't buy me any beer, master.' 'But, my good friend, why should you not have a savings bank account with her Majesty?' I replied, handing him at the same time a blank Post-office Savings bank form. It was a new thought, and a happy one to the man; and with a glad look he took the stamps and form from me. I am pleased to inform you that this coal-carter has now an account opened in his name, and every night for the past sixteen weeks after work is done, he might be seen coming to the Post-office to purchase stamps out of his so-called 'beer-money,' and steadily adding to the sum standing to his credit in the bank. I think this would be a profitable plan for others to adopt, as, no doubt, a great sum is daily wasted in this way as 'beer-money,' instead of being turned into capital by being regularly invested in the Post-office Savings-bank." J. H. B.

A man of the name of Buckley went to the European Hotel in Sydney; he had with him a considerable sum of money, and in about three weeks he died of alcoholic poisoning. At the magisterial inquiry, the publican acknowledged that he had supplied Buckley with the incredible number of 2,080 drinks, or nearly three drinks every hour, night and day, for three weeks. Now, sir, that poor man is dead, and there is not the least doubt that he has been murdered. The Government of the day support by their action the wholesale slaughter of her Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects; therefore I hold that the time has arrived when an enlightened and intelligent public should raise their voices high towards the utter destruction of the Publicans' Licensing Act. And in seeking to create public opinion that will render trading in intoxicating liquors a crime, we are endeavouring to introduce no novelty in legislation. From the very first this traffic has been a vagabond always in the hands of the police. From the very first our legislators have aimed at protecting the community from its effects. Scarcely an Act of Parliament has been passed which had reference to the sale of liquor without setting forth in the preamble the dangers to which strong drink exposes us. The ticket-of-leave system, then, as applied to the trade, has proved a downright failure—fornearance being exhausted and reformation hopeless—and we now demand not merely the total abolition of the licensing laws, nor limitation and restriction merely, but that the traffic in liquor as a beverage be entirely prohibited.—Mr. J. Deans in Queensland (Australian) Times.

NORTH-WEST CANADA.—On the farther side of a beautiful bay lay the white barracks of the mounted police; on its nearer shore we encountered a small hamlet, embracing a carpenter's shop and a couple of hotels. One of the latter claimed to be the "Temperance House," but it was hard to see that any credit could be accorded on that score in a country where alcoholic liquor is tabooed, and not even the passing traveller allowed to carry the means of rectifying stagnant prairie water, without having previously armed himself with a permit. The restriction in question, originally enacted by the Hudson Bay Company in the interest of the Indians of the north-west, has been continued under the Government regime, and seems to be very strictly enforced by the mounted police, who have apparently got the country into such good order that very little else is left for them to do. We had not been long at Choral Lake when a keen-scented officer smelt out a case of brandy which had been quietly joggling along in the mail waggon for the comfort of some thirsty soul farther west. The relative permit was demanded, and none being forthcoming, the officer forthwith stove in the case, and having duly tested the character of the liquor remorselessly consigned it to the lake. I was told that a member of the Dominion legislature, out here on an excursion, was pounced upon at the same spot and ruthlessly reduced to a condition of compulsory abstinence. Some people take the trouble to obtain permits and so continue to enjoy with official sanction what others no doubt feel it rather hard to be deprived of, but do not care to have it upon such terms. As the general result of the system liquor is unquestionably excluded from the north-west to an extent which must be highly gratifying to prohibitionists, though it must not be supposed that over-indulgence in the forbidden luxury is altogether unknown. Nothing stronger than tea is to be had at any hotel or roadside stopping-place, and the beverage appears as an indispensable part of every meal. In the absence of beer and spirits many people who were accustomed to the moderate use of these articles would really seem to have left off wishing or thinking of them, and I have been repeatedly told by men who did not profess to be abstainers, that, owing to the pure and exhilarating quality of the Canadian air, they never felt out here the same necessity for stimulants as they did in the old country. On the other hand, the conditions described are clearly favourable to the unfortunate class who cannot be within reach of liquors without indulging to excess. A good many such persons are said to come here in order to escape their besetting vice, and to have found it an easy matter as compared to what it might have proved elsewhere to fall into habits of confirmed sobriety.—The Scotsman, 21st Sept.

HOW TO SUCCEED.—The Hon. H. G. Eastman, of Pongkeepsie, gave this terse advice to the students of Eastman's Business College:—"My students, you are the architects of your own fortunes. Rely on your own strength of body and soul. Select some speciality for your life's work, and adhere to Paul's precept: 'This one thing I do.' Let your star be industry, self-reliance, faith, and honesty, and inscribe on your banner, 'Luck is a fool, Pluck is a hero.' Earnest effort in one direction is the surest road to wealth and high position. Don't take too much advice. Keep at the helm, steer your own ship, and remember that the great art of commanding is to take upon yourself the largest share of the work. Don't practise too much humility. Think well of yourself. Strike out. Assume your position. It is the jostlings and joltings of life that bring great men to the surface. Put potatoes in a cart over a rough road, and the small potatoes go to the bottom. Turn a raft of logs down a mill-race, and the large logs come on top. Rise above the envious and jealous. Fire above the mark you intend to hit. Energy, invincible determination, with a right motive, are the levers that move the world. Don't drink. Don't chew. Don't smoke. Don't swear. Don't deceive. Don't read novels. Be in earnest. Be self-reliant. Be generous. There are two sides to every balance, and favours thrown in one side of the scales are sure to be reciprocated in the other. Be civil. Be a gentleman. It is a foolish man who does not understand that molasses will catch more flies than vinegar. Read the papers; they are the great educators of the people. Advertise your business. Keep your own counsels, and superintend your own business. Make money and do good with it. Love God and your fellowmen. Love truth and virtue. Love your country and obey its laws."

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL ASSOCIATION—DEPUTATION TO LORD ROSEBERRY.—On 28th ult. a deputation from the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, comprising gentlemen from Glasgow, Edinburgh, and the leading towns in Scotland, had an interview with Lord Roseberry, in the Lord Advocate's Chambers, Parliament Square. There was a large and influential meeting. Mr. John Wilson, Hillhead House, introduced the business of the deputation, and he was supported in urging the principles of the Association upon the attention of the Government by Rev. Dr. Adamson, Bailie Torrens, Glasgow, and ex-Provost Dick, Kinning Park. It was forcibly pointed out to his lordship that nothing would satisfy the claims of temperance and social reformers in Scotland but the conferring of power upon the ratepayers to entirely veto the liquor traffic in their respective localities. The speakers gave his lordship statistics as to the temperance electoral power of the country, and expressed the hope that the Government would take early steps to legislate in the direction indicated by the deputation. His lordship expressed satisfaction with the manner in which the deputation had stated their case, and intimated that he would favourably represent their views to the Government.—Daily Review.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

The Food Reform Magazine and Journal of the London Food Reform Society, published quarterly. October, 1881. Threepence. This is an excellent number, the contents varied and instructive, the "hints to beginners" and "what it costs" being specially worthy of perusal. The whole contents are eminently worthy of the society, and specially fitted to advance a purer and more economical mode of living.

Le Voyage du Chrétien, &c. Par J. Bunyan. Imprimé pour Benjamin West. Se trouve chez Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row, London. This is a cheap translation into French of the Bedford tinker's immortal allegory. It is well printed and profusely illustrated. We have only the first part, but the excellencies of the dream are remarkably well produced, and as a French text-book for students essaying the mysteries of the language of "La Belle France," we can confidently recommend it.

The Public School Series Drawing Books, first grade, freehand, No. XI. London, Daldy, Isbister & Co., 56 Ludgate Hill. Fourpence. These books are designed by a practical art teacher. We can well believe it. The copies are admirably set. By dotted lines the self-educator may, with needful care, do them all. The choice of studies is excellent and the paper of a quality to stimulate the art students to do them justice. These books deserve, and will, we believe, find a place in our best educational institutions.

Le Nouveau Testament de Notre Seigneur Jesus Christ. Traduction nouvelle d'après le texte grec par Louis Segond, Docteur en Théologie. Imprimé pour Benjamin West. Se trouve chez Elliot Stock, London, E.C. Within the compass of 126 pages, double columns, non-pareil type, we have the New Testament in French. Thirteen spirited illustrations adorn the little book. The text is not disfigured by verses but is in paragraphs. Such an arrangement is seen in all its excellence when the reader gets to the Epistles. Although in paper covers, this testament will supply a want in the library of students and self-educating youths and maidens.

BOOKS RECEIVED.—"Testimonies of Medical Men on Vaccination." "Are we a Sober People?" "Onward Reciter." "Temperance Worker." "The Lay Preacher." "The Rechabite Magazine." "The Border Counties Magazine." "Sylvester Graham's Lectures on the Science of Human Life." "Journal of Proceedings of the I.O.G.T. Grand Lodge of Scotland." "Western Temperance Herald." "Value of Alcohol in Health and Disease." "Monaco." "Thirty-sixth Report of the Aberdeen Temperance Society." "Good Cookery." "Mrs. L. D. Brown." "Vaccination." "The Drink Catechism, by J. C. M'Kenzie." "Danger Signals," by E. N. Holmes, &c., &c.,

The Abbotsford Copybooks: for the Six Standards. London: William Isbister & Co. (Limited), 56 Ludgate Hill, E., and 13 Frederick Street, Edinburgh. Twopence each. These are unquestionably the best writing copybooks we have seen. The specimen before us focuses the excellencies of them all. Repetition of elemental form is duly attended to, and the whole series is constructed to form the style of the pupil like that which Lord Palmerston so highly valued. There are several special features; first, the figures are remarkably good. The capitals are formed for formal or for business hands, a most excellent idea, and to test the pupil's progress long sentences are introduced to be written by him without a slavish following of a copy. These features must certainly commend the book to all who value the combination of beauty of form with practical utility, and rapid and satisfactory progress.

The Passion of the Drunkard for Stronk Drink. By Thos. P. M'Naught, Detective Officer, Glasgow Police. Twopence. Not since the issue of Cruickshanks' "Bottle," or the "Nemesis of Drink" by Dean Close, have we seen a more forcible exposure of the horrors attendant on drinking. Mr. M'Naught from his vocation must have ample opportunities of viewing the darker phase of humanity, and being possessed of a keen observation, he here presents the drunkard as he drifts down the rapids of intoxication to dash upon the rocks of intemperance. One's flesh creeps, and one's heart throbs with indignation when they think that in a Christian land such systemic debasement as is here so graphically described, should be legally carried on. Young men should turn to these pages and as they trace a fellow-youth's career from the elegant bar with its champagne and cigars to the narrow coffin with its loathsome and dishonoured tenant, ask themselves with a shudder if they are prepared to enter upon a similar career. We heartily recommend this tract, and hope that, as the contribution of a detective officer, it will be welcomed by a host of sympathetic readers.

The National Temperance League's Annual for 1881. Edited by Robert Ray, secretary. One Shilling, or One shilling and sixpence cloth. London, National Temperance Public Depot, 337 Strand, W.C. This is a most valuable work of reference, one that will very fitly take the place of "Tweedie's" Year Book. The biography and the thirty-two articles which make up the book deserve a very large meed of praise. To our liking the articles by Rev. D. Burns and Mr. W. Hoyle and the other statistical portions of the book are the most useful. The article by Mr. W. R. Selway, M.B.W., would have been perfect if he had not been, as regards legislation on the drink question, so "ready to halt." He pleads the hardship of having to pay for the consequences of intemperance and not sharing in its profits, but why should there be consequences at all? Why not veto the traffic altogether? Temperance men should not suggest compromises, but should always insist that no liquors should be sold on any pretence, and the people educated to feel with them would soon render the issue of licenses impossible. These deductions from its value, notwithstanding the book, is one of the handy means of reference which should not be absent from the desk of the temperance advocate. A better "coach" we do not know.

The Smoker's Guide, Philosopher, and Friend. Hardwicke & Bogue, London: 92 Piccadilly. One Shilling. Professes to tell the reader "what to smoke, what to smoke with, and the whole 'What's what' of tobacco, historical, botanical, manufactural, anecdotal, social, medical, &c." The design of the book is, as has been remarked by a reviewer, "not to set before youth an estimate of the advantages and disadvantages of using tobacco. It is rather an attempt to carry by storm the position that tobacco is one of the prime blessings bestowed on the human race." The literary merits of the book are certainly small, and the language is often unwarrantably strong, at times even profane. The arguments used, moreover, are in many cases weak and illogical, and some of the statements made are, to say the least, open to question. A few extracts will suffice to show what nonsense this book contains, and how little likely its author is to prove a true guide to the many smokers who are possibly only less blinded by prejudice and the fascinating power of the weed than himself:—"The invention of smoking is one of the most remarkable events in the history of mankind. It seems to be more or less connected with man's religious instincts. Smoke, fume, or perfume of some sort, from the earliest times was an emblem of divine satisfaction." The author considers the man blessed "who first discovered in this providential herb the means of sleeping with our eyes open," and calls it a "sacred herb," and

"The daintiest dish of a delicious feast,
By taking which man differs from a beast."

"Just as he does by getting drunk!" he might have added. The "special function of tobacco is described as "the intellectual alleviation of the excited and the weary." The chapter on tobacco in the religious point of view contains some absurd sentences, e.g., "If he who smokes dines, it is also certain that he who smokes thinks, and equally certain that who thinks must become a good Christian sooner or later!" How could any sensible, unprejudiced person be expected to trust themselves to the guidance of one who holds that "tobacco came upon civilised man as a 'conquering hero;' that it conquers pestilence, kills time, is the 'solace of the poor insane in their dismal affliction,' 'is good for the wits and makes us moralise;' is 'a moral, material, and governmental or financial benefactor,' 'a spiritual power,' 'a completion, as it were, of our corporal and mental state.'" The concluding remarks are addressed to the young; and, as coming from a warm advocate of smoking, are, to say the least, suggestive:—"To us few sights are more painful than mere boys indulging in the pipe or cigar. How these wretched little miscreants must poison themselves to acquire the 'manly' habit, is sufficiently obvious; but they should know that they are playing with dangerous edged tools." "Tobacco is not required by the young, whose brain will develop itself by its own natural force in due time, and in a normal manner." "A great many boys, however, take to the practice through human apishness—that is, in order to ape their elders and appear 'manly;' indeed, there is no telling how many of our 'young rascals' are not already masters of the art." "The Smoker's Guide" entitles himself also his "Friend;" but the above extracts show that he has befriended him truly in a way which he little intended, by strengthening the hands of those—his real well-wishers—who seek to induce him to give up a practice which injures body, mind, and soul. ### OBITUARY NOTICES.

On the day preceding the Recent Royal review of Volunteers, the "place of tombs" called Warriston Cemetery, Edinburgh, received the mortal part of Mr. John Slater, stonecutter, Lerwick. His health having failed some months ago, he went south in the hope of recovering it; and was several weeks at Dr. Kirk's Seamill Sanatorium, West Kilbride, where, to all appearance, he considerably improved. After leaving it he stayed at his son's house, 30 Maryfield Place, Edinburgh, and latterly seemed gradually to be gaining strength, so that he and his friends anticipated his early return home to Lerwick. On Monday, 22nd August, he took a trip to Portobello without any apparently bad effect; he seemed more than usual cheerful and lively, but during the night a blood-vessel gave way and he quickly passed from the lower to the higher sphere without pain, at the age of 62. He has left a widow with five sons and five daughters, from the age of 12 years and up to man's estate, who deeply feel their loss; but, as they all apparently inherit their father's gentle, active, earnest, and intelligent disposition, and withal his antipathy to the liquor traffic, there is little fear of them doing ill for themselves. After learning his trade, and while a young man, Mr. Slater went south, and wrought in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Ayr, Falkirk, &c., and having been brought to the knowledge of saving truth by the Rev. John Kirk, Edinburgh, he very soon became an admirer of the professor, not only as to his religious opinions, but also as to his views of the temperance reformation, hence he became an ardent prohibitionist. Mr. Slater's temperance efforts resulted in the formation of a temperance society in Shapinsay. He faithfully worshipped in the Congregational Church, Lerwick, but never joined until the introduction of unfermented wine at the Communion. Always active, self-denying, and unassuming, he was most esteemed by those who knew him best, would there were more of his character and disposition to oppose the social evils which he so earnestly fought against. He was a sound prohibitionist, and a warm supporter of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

THE LATE MR. EDWARD HOWAT, NEWPORT.—It is with deep sorrow that we record the decease of this gentleman on the 5th ult., of heart disease, at his residence, Albany Villa, Newport, Dundee, in the 65th year of his age. As a citizen he was intensely patriotic, as a merchant a man of the highest integrity. His patriotism took the lines of temperance reform, and few men were to be compared with him for the stability of his temperance principles, or for the constancy of his adherence to them. With him, in the present circumstances of the country, temperance was the primary essential to usefulness in society, and the vice most to be shunned by all who wished to have their conversation in heaven. In evangelistic matters Mr. Howat was fervent and devout, ardently desirous of the salvation of souls. As regards the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, Mr. Howat was one of its most devoted friends, and at one time was a member of Executive. On his removal to Dundee he accepted a vice-presidency; and at a time when vigorous means were needful to secure a footing there, Mr. Howat ably assisted both by counsel and effort. He was one who admirably united the temperance reformer and the Christian. His Christianity was made practical by his temperance efforts, and these were inspired by his love of Christ, who was his chief joy.

THE LATE MRS. BADGER, HADDINGTON.—After a lingering illness this very warm friend of the movement passed away on the 18th ulto. Mr. Badger who is one of the truest and staunchest friends of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement, took the deepest interest in the fortunes of the agitation, and his lamented spouse evinced equal sympathy with its objects. At the general election none could have been more actuated by an eager desire to render all the service in their power than both were, and their house and their hospitality were at the service of the friends of the cause. Mrs. Badger does not leave behind her equal in this respect in the south-east of Scotland. We regret to state, that she has been called away from a loving husband and a large family, who are left to mourn a true helpmate and an affectionate mother. Her remains were followed on Saturday the 22nd ulto. to their last resting place by a very large attendance of mourning friends.

THE MITCHELL MEMORIAL.—On the west side of this beautiful monumental tribute erected in the Southern Necropolis, Glasgow, in memory of the late Mr. James Mitchell, the eminent advocate of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement, who died in 1862, the following inscription has been placed:—

Also,
In Memory of
ELIZABETH WALKER,
Spouse of
JAMES MITCHELL, who died at Invercargill, New Zealand,
30th April, 1881,
Aged 84 years.

A small sum was left over after paying for the monument, and out of this sum lodged in bank and bearing interest, the cost of the above inscription has been defrayed. The monumental stone, which is a good one, is beginning to waste, having been up for so many years, and the waste will go on rapidly if not checked. For its preservation it would require to be well polished down and receive a coat or two of raw oil. If a few of the old friends of Mr. Mitchell wish to assist the fund in meeting this expense they can kindly communicate early with the treasurer, R. Mackay, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, who will see all that is needful done, and will duly acknowledge their kindness.

CHAPTER III.

THE BREWER'S TROUBLES.

Two gentlemen were standing talking together on the kerb-stone at the corner of Castle Street, the one old and whitehaired, the other tall, and lithe, and strong, with a pleasant face and grave earnest eyes. They were Mr. Templeton, the great brewer, and James Taylor, the young lawyer.

"I don't know how it is," said the old gentleman in a tone of grieved annoyance; "I don't see what I have done that I should be so afflicted. Fred was bad enough, but it cuts to the quick to see Walter following in his footsteps—only two sons, and both of them going to the dogs as fast as possible. Can you account for it, Taylor?"

Yes; Taylor could account for it very well, but at that moment held his peace.

"I wish I had a son like you, Taylor," said the old gentleman, after a moment's pause.

"You are making your mark—so are mine in their own way," he added, with grim humour. "It is a pleasant thing, isn't it, for my girls to be afraid to go out with their brothers for fear they get drunk on the way." James Taylor looked as if he felt full of pity for the girls, and for the old man with his white hair and anxious face. "It isn't as if they had never tasted liquor of any kind or had been taught to think it a forbidden pleasure, to which they might rush whenever they were free from my control. It has never been forbidden them; one would think they would grow up careless about it, as they get of other luxuries."

"Is it wise, Mr. Templeton," said James Taylor, "Is it wise to bring up one's children in the midst of such temptation? There are very few who could withstand it."

He feared his plain words might offend, but they did not. "Fred turned upon me the other night when I was rating him, and asked me who taught him to drink if I didn't. Hot that from one's own flesh and blood, eh, Taylor?"

He spoke half jestingly, but with painful bitterness. "It was hard enough, I grant you, but there was truth in it. I am a young man, Mr. Templeton, forgive my seeming presumption if I ask, do you not feel it a duty now at least to banish drink from your house and table?"

"No, I don't," was the sharp retort; "Maria and I can't do without our wine in our old age. Why should we, but the girls, Minnie especially, are dead against it."

James Taylor remained silent, thinking of Minnie, of the cross weighing on her young shoulders, of her brave stand, her earnest endeavour to do what good she might in her own home.

"Well, I must be off," said the old gentleman; "you, a temperance reformer might speak a word in season to my lads. They need it, I assure you, as much as any of your bundles of rags at the free breakfast. Look up soon and bring Alice with you. My regards to your mother, good day;" and without waiting an answer he nodded and was off.

James Taylor touched his hat and walked off slowly towards St. Andrew's Square. Five was pealing from the city bells; he had half an hour yet to be home in time for dinner. It was a raw afternoon, and bitterly cold, the gray lowering sky giving promise of a coming storm. The fashionable promenaders had long since quitted Princes Street, and were replaced by clerks and business men hurrying home to dinner or tea. As usual, the newspaper regiment were plying their trade briskly, but their repeated offers of "Evenin' News, sir," fell unheeded on James Taylor's ears. He was absorbed in thought, revolving a thousand plans and schemes for the lessening of the great evil which seemed to meet him on every hand. At the corner of the Square as usual, little Jennie Gibson stood shivering with her papers under her arm. She held out one timidly to James Taylor, recognizing him, and remembering that he had glanced kindly at her before. She was a shy shrinking creature, unable to cope with the bold impudence of her companions, and so was often pushed into the background. James Taylor's eye was arrested by her blue, pinched face, and he paused in front of her.

"What's your name, child?" he asked.

"Jennie Gibson, sir."

"Are you well enough? you look very ill, not fit to be out."

"No, sir, I'm no weel," she answered simply, her eyes running with tears. "But I hae to come, or—"

"Or what?"

"Mither'll lick me, sir," was the low reply.

"Are you telling the truth?"

"Ay, sir."

"You are hungry and cold, I suppose; at least, you look it."

"I'm near deid, sir; after a bit I get that I dinna feel. Ha'e a paper, sir?"

"Not to-night, come along with me."

The child drew back.

"I daurna, I maun sell them every yin the nicht, or she'll kill me, and see I've only sold twa."

"Never mind," said James Taylor, authoritatively, "I'll pay you for them, come along."

The child, trusting him implicitly, as did every one who came in contact with him, followed him obediently up the square to his own house. His ring was answered by the housemaid, a damsel the perfection of dainty neatness, who looked with extreme surprise and disgust at the master's strange companion.

"Take the child down to the kitchen, Mary," he said, half smiling at the expression on the girl's face. "Let her warm herself at the fire, and give her some tea. I'll be down by and by."

Mary gingerly obeyed, and James Taylor went upstairs to the drawing-room. Alice was there looking fair and sweet in her sweeping black velvet robe, and turned with a smile to greet her brother.

"Where's mother?" he asked.

"In her room, I think. Do you want her particularly?"

"After dinner will do," he answered, and Alice wondered what was the meaning of that odd smile lurking about the corners of his mouth.

CHAPTER IV.

THE HOMES OF THE VERY POOR.

Meanwhile Jennie Gibson was being attended to in the kitchen. Mary gave her in charge to the kitchen-maid, and retired not caring to be in company of a "dirty street brat," as she termed her, and added that "goodness only knew what the master would fetch into the house next." The kitchen-maid, though not so pretty and smart as Mary, was much kinder of heart, and did her best to make the child comfortable; she was perched on a chair on the spotless hearth, her bare feet stuck out to the blaze, and the graceful warmth pervading her chilled frame. Tea was placed before her, but she ate meagrely; she was ill, you see. Thus, the three from the dining-room found her when they came down about an hour later.

"Is that what you brought us to see?" cried Alice Taylor, blankly. "Why, James, what will you do next?"

"You poor forlorn little waif," said her mother, moving closer to the child. "Have you had any tea, my dear?"

"Yes'm," answered Jennie fearfully; these ladies were more formidable by far than the gentleman.

"Deed, mem, it's a precious wee morsel she's eatin', puir thing. It's wae fu tae see her," said the kitchen-maid.

"Is your mother living?" asked Mrs. Taylor, in her kind voice.

"Yes, mem."

"And why does she let you out when you are so ill as you look?"

"I hev tae sell the News, ye ken," said Jennie, with that odd simplicity which always characterized her. "If they're no a' selt she'll kill me the nicht, she said she wad."

"Your mother said that?" enquired Mrs. Taylor, much shocked.

"Ay."

"Is she your own mother?"

"Ay."

"I can scarcely believe such a thing possible, James," said the old lady looking at her son.

"When she's drunk mem, oh she's awfu', I'm feared, an' creep awa doon the close an' sleep on a stair, or ony gate till mornin'," said Jennie, quite calmly; "she had me by the hair o' the heid last nicht, gan to fling me ower the windy, but I yelled out, an' Mrs. Tavish came in an' stopped her"—the child broke down now, weeping piteously.

"Wull ye gie me the money for the papers, sir, for as shure as deith she'll kill me if I dinna sell them a'. I'll hae tae gang hame noo."

Alice Taylor turned her head swiftly away, her grey eyes brimming with tears, but her brother saw them.

He took out his purse, counted the papers, and gave her money for them.

"Tell me your address," he said, "and I'll come to-morrow and see if all you have been telling me is true."

"Very weel, sir, it's just Jennie Gibson, Blair's Close, High Street. I'll wait at the mooth o't till I hae tae gang for the papers—about three o'clock."

"Wait a moment," said Alice, and flew up stairs to her own room, returning in a minute with one of her own wraps, a soft grey woollen shawl, which with her own hands she rolled round Jennie, her brother looking on with glistening eyes. Bewildered with the warmth and the comfort and the kindness, Jennie tried to stammer out her thanks, and gathering up her money curtised to them all, and was shewn out by the maid.

"If I come up at one to-morrow, Alice," said James Taylor to his sister, "will you be ready to go with me on a visit of enquiry to the child's home?"

"Yes, I shall be ready," was the reply quietly spoken, for the girl's heart was very full.

But it happened next day that James was unusually busy in his office, and at one o'clock the boy came with a note for Alice saying the visit would need to be postponed till after dinner. The day was clear and beautiful though frostily cold, and the night was one of rare beauty and enjoyment for pedestrians, whose warm winter garments bid defiance to the icy touch of the north wind. In her heavy serge dress and rich furs, Alice Taylor looked as if she felt delightfully comfortable, and said to her brother there had not been such a beautiful night for long. There were many not a stone's throw from her who could not have re-echoed her words. They did not see Jennie at her accustomed corner, nor did they encounter her on her way up the North Bridge; both feared that the child would be too ill for her ordinary work. The clock was ringing seven as the brother and sister made their way up the High Street, the latter shocked and saddened at sight of so many miserable human beings whose life in such a place and in such circumstances was a mystery to her. James Taylor had no need to ask where Blair's Close was, his labours among the poor took him to this district many times, and he knew every lane and court and by-way in the High Street. At the mouth of the close the usual groups of men and women were lounging. Keeping his sister's hand on his arm, he stepped up and asked to be pointed to Jennie Gibson's house.

"An' what d'ye want wi' her, nicht I speir?" enquired her mother, who was one of the group.

"Are you her mother?" asked James Taylor.

"I'll no say but what I am," she said with a leer.

"What d'ye want wi' the bairn?"

"Is she in the house?"

"Maybe ay an' maybe no," returned Jean Gibson, at which the rest laughed, and the sound made Alice shudder.

Then the pair passed through the group, down into the close, meeting a ragged urchin there. James asked him to shew them to Gibson's house. The lad stared.

"That's Jean Gibson stannin' there, but if it's Jennie ye want she's in the hoose, up there; see, the very tap garret," and pointing to a low dark doorway the urchin darted off.

"Are you afraid, Alice, you are very pale?" said her brother anxiously. She held his arm the closer, and answered bravely.

"Not when you are with me. Let us go up and see the poor child; she must be ill, surely."

Then without further pause they ventured in at the entry, and clambered as best they might up the broken stair. James struck several matches, which guided them to the top. There were half a dozen doors on the landing, and knocking at one was answered by a little thin scraggy woman, with an anxious, sincere face and dim weary eyes.

"Does Jennie Gibson live here?"

"No, sir," was the civil answer; "in there," pointing to a door at the further end.

"Is she ill, do you know?" asked Alice, encouraged by the woman's appearance and manner.

"No, mem; at least, no that I ken o'; but I heard her greetin' sair last nicht late, aboot twel' or there aboot. Her mither was drunk, my Geordie said, an' wad be threshing' her likely; she's an awfu' deil o' a wummin Jean Gibson, especially when she's fou. Jennie's no been oot wi' the papers the day; she's no able, I believe, puir cratur."

"Thank you," said Alice; "she was speaking the truth, you see, James. We will just go in."

The door the woman had indicated was shut, but the handle turned easily, and they heard a noise inside like some one rising and coming feebly across the floor. They flung open the door, and saw a bare wretched place whose gloom was only made visible by the rush light burning in a broken bottle on the window ledge. There was a straw mattress in the corner, a broken table propped up on a brick, one chair, and a child, standing wan and shrinking in the middle of the place. Seeing and recognizing the visitors she burst into tears, saying brokenly,

"I thoct it was my mither? She said she'd fling me doon the stair if I wasna up gin she cam' back."

"Are you ill, Jennie?" asked Alice pitifully.

"I canna move—see that an' that," she showed her arms and her shoulders black and blue and bruised; the result of her mother's beating the previous night. Before they could speak there was a shuffling on the landing outside, and Jean Gibson bounced into the room, red and angry, and smelling vilely of whisky.

"What ye daein' here, I'd like tae ken, walkin' in tae a decent wummin's hoose, athoot saying by your leave?"

James Taylor's face grew dark and stern, and he pointed to the shrinking child.

"You will be punished for your cruelty and neglect of this child; it's time some one interfered."

Jean Gibson's manner changed. "I'm a puir weedy wummin, sir and mem," she whined, "anxious tae dae weel, if it wasna for the drink; my man learned me tae drink, sir an' mem, an' God kens I've tried sair to gie't ower. But naebody gies me a kind word o' help, an' sae I just drink on an' on, an' I never meddle wi' Jennie, sir an' mem, except when I'm drunk. Dear lamb, I loe' her ower weel."

"Will you give the child to me?" queried James Taylor, taking no notice of the long speech. "Let me take her away to-night, I can promise you she will be properly cared for, and you can see her sometimes if you wish."

Jennie's face brightened momentarily, but fell again when her mother spoke.

"Deed, I'll dae nae sic thing—bonnie Christians ye maun be tae tak' an' only bairn frae a puir weedy wummin. Na na, if that's a' ye want ye'll better tak' the road, sir an' mem, unless ye can gie' me a bit o' siller tae buy a bite for her an' me."

"I'll send up some things, the money would go straight to the public house, Alice," said James Taylor to his sister; "And mind, I'll keep a sharp eye on you," he added to Jean Gibson, "And if I hear of you ill treating Jennie again I shall report the case and have you punished for it."

"Very well, sir," said Jean Gibson humbly; "It's just the drink; ask the neebors, they'll tell ye."

"Good bye, Jennie," whispered Alice, bending over the child; "Whenever you are able come to our house, I want to see ye."

"I thank you ma'am," answered the child, her eyes brimming with grateful tears.

Then the pair went away. A grocer at the corner of the close was found willing to send up a basket of things to that wretched home, and was willing, too, to procure some coals, for which the gentleman paid him most liberally. The shopkeeper added his testimony to the worthlessness of Jean Gibson's character, and her constant ill-treatment of her child.

"We must talk the matter over with mother," said James Taylor, when they were walking quickly home. "She will be able to suggest some way of getting poor Jennie away from her mother. It's a pity she isn't old enough to take into the kitchen. Hannah would learn her to be of use."

Alice remained silent, and guessing something of what was passing in her mind, he said no more. When they reached the quiet street where their own home was, he felt her hand tremble on his arm, and she uplifted shining wet eyes to his face.

"I have been a wicked selfish ungrateful girl all my life, James, caring for nothing but my own ease and pleasure, forgetting how many of my fellow creatures are in abject want both for body and soul. I will not be so any longer, James, and God will help me if I ask Him, to be a better girl than I have been."

"He will help us all, my darling, if we but ask Him earnestly, and will bless, too, our feeblest strivings after good, our weakest effort in His cause. Ay, indeed, the vineyard is large and the labourers few."

Dear friends, is it not so, and is it not time we bestirred ourselves in the Master's work?

"What is the worst side of naval warfare?" asked a school teacher. "The broadside," replied a boy in the back seat. He went up to the head.

Two men were conversing about the ill-humour of their wives. "Ah!" said one, with a sorrowful expression, "mine is a Tartar!" "Well," replied the other, "mine is worse than that—mine is the Cream of Tartar!"

PUBLIC PRESS.

MR. BURTON ON THE PERMISSIVE BILL.

[In his political manual, lately published in an abridged form, Mr. Sydney Burton has done all parties in the State great service by presenting both sides of all the burning questions now before the country. We hope all our readers will possess themselves of this manual, and to induce them we give the Permissive Bill portion, leaving to them to get the manual itself for "Local Option," "Restriction," etc.]

Others would go further [than merely restricting the traffic], and would allow a majority of the ratepayers in any district to prohibit altogether the sale of any intoxicating liquor in that district.

The vote of the majority (two-thirds is the number proposed in the Bill) whether it sanctioned or prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors in the district, would be binding for a definite number of years (three years is the term proposed); at the end of that time the policy adopted would, by another vote, be either reversed or confirmed for a further period.

The principle of the "Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill" is upheld on the grounds:—

1. That "whereas the common sale of intoxicating liquors is a fruitful source of crime, immorality, pauperism, disease, insanity, and premature death, whereby not only the individuals who give way to drinking habits are plunged in misery, but grievous wrong is done to the persons and property of her Majesty's subjects at large, and the public rates and taxes are greatly augmented," the prohibition of sale would be an unmixed good to the pockets, bodies, and souls of the people.

2. That as the common sale does unmixed harm, no consideration of public revenue, or regard for vested interests, can justly be urged in opposition to its suppression.

3. That the public income would not suffer from the extinction of the liquor trade; the people, relieved from its thralldom, would be better able to contribute to the revenue.

4. (a) That it is impossible satisfactorily to regulate the sale of alcoholic beverages; and that unless extinguished, its evils will continue unabated. State interference (though it may have slightly improved public order) has so far been powerless to diminish intemperance. (b) That any attempt on the part of the State to regulate the trade gives it legal protection and sanction; raises up further vested interests; and depraves the popular standard of morals.

5. That the present licensing system has proved itself to be a complete failure, and gives rise to much abuse.

6. That suppression is quite compatible with legitimate free trade and rational freedom.

7. (a) That as drinking and drunkenness greatly injure the inhabitants of a district (in rates as well as otherwise), it is right and expedient to confer upon the ratepayers of cities, boroughs, parishes, and townships, the power to prohibit the common sale of intoxicating liquors. (b) That as a publican, when applying for a license, is obliged to give local public notice of his intention, it is evident that the principle of consulting local opinion in the matter of licensing has been already conceded. (c) That localities have at present large powers of dealing with local matters, and there would be nothing novel or dangerous in conceding to them one further power. (d) That in the case of a harmful trade like that of intoxicating liquors, the wishes of the many should outweigh those of the few.

8. That the drunkard himself will hail, and may fairly claim, aid in his efforts to avoid temptation.

9. That this is one of the points on which the relation of the State to its people should be that of a father to his children, not merely guarding their rights, but also keeping temptation out of their way.

10. That the State should have a sense of moral right, altogether apart from the duty of guarding its subjects from being wronged; it is therefore neither right nor politic of the State to give legal protection and sanction to a demoralising trade.

11. That in other countries—notably in the State of Maine, U. S. A.—the absolute prohibition of the sale or possession of intoxicating liquors has worked beneficially.

The principle of the Permissive Bill is opposed on the grounds:—

1. (a) That it is in no case the province of the State to withhold men from follies, but only to guard their rights and protect their persons. And that as long as the State takes care to punish A., if by his excesses he injures B., it is doing its full duty, and should leave A. alone to ruin himself if he chooses. (b) That the State would not be really omitting to guard, but would be itself trespassing on the rights of the people, in taking a harmless indulgence from Z. because A. finds it hurtful. (c) That it saps the force and self-reliance of the people for their rulers to do for them that which, by right, they ought to do for themselves. (d) That such attempts of the State to outstep its true field of work always miss their mark and do unlooked for mischief. (e) That though liberty which leads to abuse may fairly be restrained, the abrogation of all liberty in the matter of drink would be followed by a sweeping reaction, and more harm in the end be done. (f) That it would be neither just nor expedient that the purchase and moderate use of liquor by the majority of persons should be prevented, because there are some who abuse it to their own hurt, or that of others. (g) That the adoption of the Act would be a gross infringement of the liberty of all for the sake of a few; "it is better for the people to be free than sober."

2. (a) That as the Bill would prohibit the sale only, and not the manufacture, importation, or possession of intoxicating liquors, it is unsound in principle, and likely to prove mischievous or inoperative in practice. For it is not consistent in the State to prohibit the sale of an article, while it does not prohibit its manufacture, importation, or possession; either the article is so dangerous to the people that all dealings in it should be prohibited, or it is not sufficiently dangerous for the sale to be prohibited. (b) That the Bill, while professing only to be directed against the common sale of liquor, would indirectly affect the common use of all alcoholic beverages, and so affect the manufacture, importation, and possession of them, and the Legislature, while avowedly injuring one trade, would also injuriously affect another, and an entirely different one.

3. That it would be illogical for the State to allow a trade to be tolerated in a particular district and to be prohibited in another; the trade is equally harmful or beneficial in both. If it be pernicious, the State should prohibit it altogether; prohibition or toleration should not be left to the chance vote of the ratepayers.

4. That it would be an improper delegation of the notions of Parliament to give to local bodies the absolute power of toleration or prohibition in this matter.

5. That if the principle is conceded that the ratepayers in a given district have a right to forbid a trade or calling of which they disapprove (though the trade may be perfectly lawful elsewhere), logically they could claim a right to forbid unpopular places of religious or political resort to be opened—and this could never be conceded.

6. That the bill contains no real element of representation; the popular will would only be able to act by a mass vote.

7. That the districts in which restrictions are most needed, would be those least likely to adopt them.

8. (a) That where one district in which the sale of alcoholic drinks had been prohibited adjoined another where the sale was tolerated, the act would prove inoperative; there would be no difficulty in obtaining liquor. (b) That where such escape from the letter of the Act was difficult or impossible, prohibition would lead to the illicit and secret sale and consumption of liquor.

9. That ceaseless agitation and strife would usually result from the (absolutely indispensable) provision that the adoption of the law should be from time to time subject to revision by the votes of the ratepayers.

10. That the bill, by making tenure less secure, would unsettle the trade and give it more speculative character, and thus would deter respectable, and attract disreputable men to the business.

11. (a) That all vested interests which have been allowed to grow up in a trade must be protected, and if injured by the action of the State, must receive proper compensation. (b) And that the amount of capital which has been embarked in the liquor trade is so enormous that it would be imprudent and impracticable for the State to reimburse it.

12. That after public houses had been suppressed, and compensation paid, a change in the wishes of the ratepayers might reopen fresh houses, and raise up fresh vested interests, again to be compensated if suppressed.

13. That drunkenness is gradually confining itself to the lowest classes, and will ultimately almost completely disappear; there is therefore no need for drastic measures, from which unforeseen evils may arise.

14. That the restrictions proposed would be unfair on the working man, inasmuch as the public house is his club, and he is unable, like the wealthier classes, to lay in any store of intoxicating liquor.

15. That though in certain points the present licensing system may be with advantage reformed, it works in a satisfactory manner, and deals fairly and thoroughly with the issue of licenses, while it is sufficiently subject to popular opinion and public criticism.

ON THE WING.

The Presbyterian Church of England has commissioned its Committee on Temperance to form a Church Temperance Society. There are such societies in connection with one-third of the congregations. Alas, the Commission are to form societies either wholly or partially abstinent. If the Commission will profit by experience, we shall soon hear that all the societies it has organized are of the genuine character, for nothing else will succeed in the longrun.

Mr. B. F. Dunn, a prominent citizen of Edinburgh, urges meetings of certain wards in Edinburgh for the purpose, among other business, of "taking immediate steps to frown down that growing impertinently audacious interference with electoral freedom in our municipal contests by the rowdy section of the publican class in our midst." If he thinks to repress the publican, he may just save himself any taking of steps whatever. The thing can't be done. The only means of frowning down the publican is to suppress him.

That was a true remark of Lord Aberdare's when he said Sunday closing would break up the dreadful habit of drinking which, beginning on pay-day, ran over Sunday and as far into the week as the victim's earnings were able to hold out. Still, it leaves the great question of total suppression untouched, and it leads men to believe that drink is bad because the drinker violates the fourth commandment. Limited as drinking is on Sunday in Scotland, Ireland and Wales, the liquor traffic is nearly as far as ever from being tolerable to all right-thinking men, and this idea, that Sunday closing will do no more than palliate the evil, should be kept clearly in view.

It is pleasant in one's reading to meet with a newspaper that can estimate the worth of the temperance agitator. The Northern Echo does so in the following manly terms:—"Those who advocate what they deem a desirable reform are thoroughly in earnest, and the earnestness of the agitation goes a long way towards attaining the end in view. The temperance agitator is worthy of all respect. He cannot be accused of seeking any personal benefit. He does not plead for himself, or for any one class, but for the nation. He is convinced that restriction upon the sale of intoxicating drinks would save many persons from poverty, disgrace, and crime, and he bases his arguments upon facts which are indisputable." The cruel manner in which temperance advocates are treated by those who never did a tittle of what they do to benefit humanity does not say much for the Briton's love of fair play.

The minister of Prestonpans has been in the Court of Teinds, asking an addition of four chalders to his stipend. The learned counsel, in presenting the case of his reverence, dwelt upon the extent of the parish, the labour of preaching twice on Sunday, the number of summer visitors, and the fact of there being a large population, chiefly colliers, fishermen, and "those employed at public works." This last class awakened the curiosity of Lord Deas, and his desire to know what public works there were in Prestonpans. "What kind of public works?" was his question. "Breweries, my lord," was the instant reply of the learned counsel. It appeared, too, that the number of the poor was so great as to necessitate a missionary, who was partly a burden on the minister. Now, if woe was to be the portion of those who wrested the Scriptures to their own destruction, little less, we think, than moral reprobation should be his portion who wrests a good phrase like "public works" from its real utilitarian meaning, and uses it to signify a number of breweries, of which "works of darkness" would be the most fitting appellation. We are not surprised to hear of there being a large and poor population in Prestonpans. A brewery has little employment to offer, and the wages of those employed near it are sadly diminished by the powerful temptation to mis-expenditure it continually presents. A brewery is a work of darkness, but thank God, the day is drawing near when it will be a vessel doomed to social perdition by the veto Prohibitionists aim to secure.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

To the Editor of "The Irish Temperance League Journal."

SIR,—When your committee did me the honour of asking me to represent the Irish Temperance League at the meeting of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, in Glasgow, I acceded to their request with some fear and a little hesitation. Shortly after I reached the other side, however, I discovered that what I had contemplated as a task had been converted into a pleasure, and what in the distance I had considered a burden beyond my strength, was speedily resolved into a labour of love. The indefatigable secretary of the Association, Mr. Mackay, made me feel at once at home among the leading supporters of the cause to whom I was introduced, and who gave me a cordial greeting. This, I need not say, was not on my own account, for of me personally they knew nothing, but simply and solely as your representative. I went first to the social meeting, which was mainly composed of active members of the temperance cause; and the practical wisdom, intense earnestness, and subdued enthusiasm of the several speakers, elicited my warmest admiration. The spirit of union which was exemplified in that meeting was quite refreshing. There were represented the Independent Order of Rechabites, the Edinburgh Temperance Society, the Independent Order of Good Templars, the Scottish Temperance League, the Ladies' Temperance Association, the United Kingdom Alliance, the Greenock Association, the Blue Ribbon Army, and the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, with other societies, I think, whose names I cannot recall; but all were as much of one spirit as if they had belonged to the same society and were banded together under one designation. The speaking was all good. Mr. Paton, of the United Kingdom Alliance, struck me in the few sentences he uttered as being one of the most effective speakers I have listened to. His sentences were terse and to the point. His matter was more than ordinarily thoughtful, and his manner full of fire and nervous energy. A young gentleman who, I was told, is factor to the Earl of Zetland, spoke exceedingly well, as did also Mrs. Kirk, who is doing a great work among the Christian ladies of Scotland. The highly Christian tone of all the speeches was most striking; all seemed to feel that they were engaged in a great Christian work, and that without Christ it could not succeed, and with His spirit inspiring their efforts they seemed to dread no failure. On the whole it was a meeting to brace and draw tense the heart-strings of men lax in the temperance cause. The evening meeting in the City Hall was a sight not to be forgotten. Fully an hour before the time every seat was occupied, and standing-room ceased to be available. Another hall was filled to overflowing, and many were turned away who could gain access to neither. When the noble chairman entered, the audience rose; and rounds of applause with the waving of handkerchiefs and hats all over the hall on gallery and groundfloor, which greeted him, were repeated with still greater enthusiasm when Sir Wilfrid Lawson made his appearance. I need not attempt to characterise the several speeches. The whole nation is familiar with Sir Wilfrid Lawson's style. With a quiet and undemonstrative manner, and a voice of small compass, he rivets the attention by the strong common sense of his remarks, and by that irrepressible humour which ever and anon comes bubbling to the top, and for which the audience is constantly on the watch. Again and again they were intensely tickled, and the gravest Scotchmen among them had to relax, as something unusually good slipped, one would have thought unconsciously, from the speaker's lips. It would be a great mistake, however, to suppose that Sir Wilfrid is merely an amusing speaker. He has a thorough grasp of his subject, and discusses it most earnestly and effectively all the while that the light of his humour plays upon its surface. The meeting was prolonged till a late hour, but the enthusiasm never waned till the close. It struck me that among our friends in Scotland a far larger proportion of the magistrates and men of social position and influence are identifying themselves with Sir Wilfrid Lawson's movement than is the case with us. That movement, if I might judge from what I saw and heard, has taken fast hold on the mind of Scotland. Men who make no pretensions to be abstainers admit that the proposed legislation is required and perfectly right and practicable. I should be delighted to see the wealthy classes as well represented on the temperance platform at home as they are in Glasgow. There I saw several aged patriarchs—men venerable for their years, revered because of their lives, and respected because of their position in society—just tottering on the brink of the grave, coming forward to testify, before they died, against the great evil of the day. It is very probable that Scotland will secure a Permissive Bill next session. Only five of her members voted against Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolutions, and Lord Colin Campbell at the close of the meeting expressed his readiness to put his name on the back of a Bill for Scotland alone, if that should be thought the most advisable course. Several of the speakers, myself among the number, had to speak to the meeting in the smaller hall as well as the monster meeting. As to the reception I met with in the City Hall I leave others to speak; suffice it to say, it was all that even you could wish your representative to enjoy. I may add that my wife and myself enjoyed generous hospitality as the guests of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, and that previous respect and regard for Scotland and the Scotch have been deepened by our recent visit.—Believe me, yours sincerely,

R. J. LYND.

THE TEMPERANCE RIBBON MISSION.

SIR,—I beg, with your permission, to draw the attention of your readers to the missions by Mr. Murphy and Mr. Booth, who are eagerly trying to get up missions in this country on the blue ribbon principle. I exclude Mr. Noble of the London Hoxton Hall Blue Ribbon Mission from present consideration, because, like a true temperance reformer, he has organised his mission, and by efforts which are fully entitled to be called laborious, is trying with considerable success to build up his converts into unswerving abstainers. I, however, confess surprise at the rapture with which the ribbon mission of Messrs. Murphy and Booth are hailed on this side of the Atlantic. People in some places seem to be losing their heads about them. I cannot get into ecstasies on their work, because my experience of moral suasion efforts guides me better. These gentlemen simply "go in" for bringing people into a white heat for signing the pledge. But that is neither new nor effective. Temperance societies anyway energetic, can get hundreds a week to do this, and the roll books of such societies testify to the eagerness with which ensnared victims of the drink system "join" again and again. But what is wanted is not simply registration, but unflinching adhesion. To sign a pledge is one thing, to stand to it "like a man" quite another thing. Unless adhesion follows registration, the practice of abstinence follows the pledge, what can be expected but hopeless collapse and failure. To sum up the signatories by thousands, overlooking means for securing their adhesion, cannot be justified by wisdom or common sense; and to ask individuals who staunchly abstain, to sign their names and swell results, is a scandal to a moral movement. I am quite at a loss on grounds that are in harmony with Christianity to account for such action on the part of Christian men. The pledge to me means the visible sign of my inward conviction that total abstinence is to me at once a benefit and an obligation; by my after-life formed in harmony with the principle that underlies it. I set my seal to it that it is true. Now, of what use is it to me to sign that pledge whenever asked? It cannot increase the potent influence in behalf of temperance which my life sheds on those around me. Nay, it is wrong, for the poor fellow who signs, seeing how easily I sign, may get into the belief that it may be signed as often as he likes, and the solemn sacredness of the act disappears. Evidently the people at Leicester are appreciating the "totting up" process at its true value, for they are advertising for a missionary to look after those who have signed the pledge during the recent mission. The money expended on this "troubling of the waters" would do more than pay a missionary £80 a year for such a duty. The signatories have not come into the fold, and he is asked to go down and bring them up, and bring them in and harden them into staunch abstainers. Yet many of them may have signed the pledge half a dozen times during the visit of these clever American brethren. We hope that the missionary may reap a rich reward from his labours and we will eagerly look for his report, but our reason forbids our cherishing great expectations. When the Hoxton Hall Blue Ribbon Army, and the Templars of all sections, with special machinery, find it difficult to retain their members, it is too much to hope that merely asking men and women struggling in the meshes of the drinking habit, and who are got to pledge in the heat and excitement of a meeting, is all that is needful to make them stand firm. After the registration comes the terrible fight with the habit, and too often the surrender, if left alone, of the poor inebriate to his vice. The fight is fought at the bench or the desk, in the comfortless home of the drunkard, and as the mission has nothing but the exciting public meeting to meet this condition of the would-be abstainer, I see little in it to commend it to those who are toiling manfully in our temperance hall, to bring home the blessings of abstinence to the business and bosoms of the people. Moral suasion can only make progress through a special education on the temperance question, and by a mutual association in order to confirm and sustain the weak and develop a permanent abstinence from strong drink in the adherent. This twofold work in the absence of a prohibitory law does often largely tend to increase the number of abstainers. But to crowd a register with names of inebriates, and abstainers who have displayed a conspicuous fidelity to their principles, and submit such a register as a record of permanent results, is an insult to common sense and calculated to bring discredit on the great temperance reformation.

Yours truly,

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

SIR,—All who are persuaded that sobriety is not to be attained while drink-shops are licensed to facilitate drinking, must congratulate the Scottish Permissive Bill Association in the attitude it has taken to the Government, through its deputation to Lord Rosebery.

The Association, as seen in this deputation, stands clearly by prohibition untainted by the least leaven of license. The deputation, in talking to his lordship, put prohibition plainly as the remedy for drunkenness. They neither confused his lordship nor the public by propounding the notion that a mere majority of the ratepayers should be empowered to retain or reduce the number of drink-shops, until they can produce the large majority of three to two to prohibit the whole number. This mixture of license, with prohibition to neutralise it, was entirely discarded by them.

The Scottish temperance public are under a debt of gratitude to the Association for thus taking, at this critical time of prospective temperance legislation, the clear, well-defined position which it occupies; for, if it had encouraged his lordship to legislate on the principle that a mere majority should have power to perpetuate the drink trade, while a third of the ratepayers should have power to prevent a majority from establishing the conditions of sobriety in entire prohibition, a licensing law might have been expected, with a temperance sanction, which would have given an interested, corrupt minority power to overrule the majority, and flood society with drunkenness from a source difficult to dry up.

If this notion is ever produced in legislation it will be easy to continue the drink trade and difficult to put it down, for all who are interested in maintaining the trade will be legally helped to make up the required third out of the morally debased voters. The interested and the worthless, because they are less in numbers than the disinterested and patriotic, are by this notion to receive the power of law to enable them to inflict drinking and drunkenness on the majority. No licensing law has been the outcome of a notion so reckless of moral and social order as this. But it is, certainly, not entertained by the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. It exists to destroy the drink trade totally and immediately, by the will of the people, and it cannot consent to subject society to a minority who have a money interest in its drunkenness; hence its representatives assured Lord Rosebery, that nothing less than power in the people directly to veto all licenses would satisfy Scotland. Scotland, they told Lord Rosebery, was prepared for this, and the evidence, they affirmed, was in the fact, that nearly the whole of our representatives voted with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, for this, his avowed object. And well they could afford to say so; for the representatives had been helped to vote with Sir Wilfrid Lawson by the organised voting power of the temperance movement. A power the Association was fully cognisant of, for it fostered it, and knows that its extent is sufficient for its object. Let the Association continue to occupy this attitude, and every attempt to reduce it from being the rallying point of the Scottish temperance movement must fail. Temperance reformers could not, if they would, remain satisfied with a notion in the name of temperance, which boycotts prohibition and puts a premium on license.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

THE REPRESENTATION OF SCOTLAND FROM A LOCAL OPTION POINT OF VIEW.

OUR readers will, we believe, be glad to possess another of our statistical tables. The one we present shows the representation of Scotland, the number of electors for 1880, the area in square miles, and the amount of wealth represented. A glance is sufficient to show how very insignificant a portion of Scotland returns Parliamentary representatives opposed or indifferent to the permissive prohibitory movement. The most striking language in which we could clothe these facts could not represent them nearly so eloquently as the figures in which we tabulate them; and, hopeful of the deep impression they will make on our readers' hearts, we leave them to their serious consideration:—

A young woman in Rochester recently sued a man who kissed her for damages. A young man who can't kiss a woman without damaging her, should take means to get rid of his awkwardness.

A man who had been quaffing beer until he was completely drunk, hiccupped out that beer was both meat and drink. Soon after, going home, he tumbled into a ditch, on which a companion observed that it was not only meat and drink, but washing and lodging too.

"William," observed a Milwaukee woman to her husband, "Mrs. Halcomb feels pretty badly now, since the loss of her child, and I wish you would drop over there and see her. You might say that all flesh is grass; that we've all got to go the same way; and see if she is going to use her dripping-pan this afternoon."

"Whisky is good in its place. There is nothing like whisky in this world for preserving a man when he is dead. But it is one of the worst things in the world for preserving a man when he is living. If you want to keep a dead man put him in whisky; if you want to kill a living man put whisky in him."—Dr. Guthrie.

DECEMBER.

IN the cold frozen wood no song is heard.
Where are the birds now, and where are the flowers,
That gladden'd all our hearts in summer hours?
The ices firm the woodland streams retard.
Why should we roam abroad while winds blow shrill,
And icicles hang from the forest trees?
Beside the fire we'll sit, and at our ease
List to the wind that blows o'er wood and hill.
With books and music and with gentle friends,
The winter night will calmly wear away.
'Tis bleak December, and how short the day,
The night how long. But he who with life blends
Fair art and song can still with joy make bright
December's murkiest day and darkest night.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

DECEMBER, 1881.

OUR NEW YEAR TRACT.

WE beg to draw the attention of our readers to the New Year Tract of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and to solicit their early orders for a liberal supply. The tract is written by that experienced writer, Professor Kirk, and is well got up in illustration, type, paper, &c. The price is 10s. per 1000, exclusive of carriage; 1s. per 100, or 1s. 5d. post free. Societies ordering not less than 500 can have their name, night, hour, and place of meeting printed on their order for 1s. 6d. additional, if not more than 40 words. On all orders of 2000 there is no charge. Orders sent in before the 10th December can be headed and forwarded in time for an early new year distribution.

During the past month Mr. Paton has had, with scarcely an exception, an excellent series of meetings. He had a week's meetings in Bridgeton, Glasgow, which somewhat disappointed expectations. He was four nights in Stirling, two in Greenock, three in Dumbarton; he has also visited the following places—Parkhead, Dalry, Skelmorlie, Newmains, and Stonehouse, besides addressing several meetings in Glasgow. He has been highly gratified with his reception and reports very favourably of not a few of his meetings. During the month of December he is fixed for Rothesay (two nights), Paisley, Kilbarchan, Kilmalcolm, Pollokshaws, Milugavie, Troon, Lesmahagow, and Cross Hall, Glasgow. He will also be in the south-east for nearly a week. His time with the Association is fully taken up and he will leave, we believe, for Ireland, early in the year.

Our readers will be glad to learn that Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., has kindly consented to address a meeting in Edinburgh on Monday, 12th inst. Besides the Honourable Baronet there will be present T. R. Buchanan, Esq., M.P. for Edinburgh (in the chair), James Cowan, Esq., M.P. for Edinburgh; A. Grant, Esq., M.P. for Leith district of Burghs; J. Dick Peddie, Esq., M.P. for the Kilmarnock District of Burghs; the Rev. R. J. Lynd, of Belfast, who so eloquently represented the Irish Temperance League at the late annual meeting of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association; John Wilson, Esq., J.P., Hillhead, who so ably addressed the same meeting; Ex-Bailie Torrens, Sheriff Guthrie Smith, Rev. Professor Blaikie, Rev. Professor Johnston, Bailie Cranston, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Rev. J. Kay, Rev. W. H. Gray, Rev. J. Young, Dr. D. Brodie, Liberton, and many others will also take part in the proceedings. The meeting will take place in the United Presbyterian Church Hall, and promises to exceed in importance any similar demonstration on the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory question ever held in Edinburgh.

We have been creditably informed by a Parisian co-temporary that there are 35,000 medical men in Great Britain and her Colonies. We will accept this estimate and assume that each of these professional gentlemen have only during the year six patients, whose deaths are distinctly traceable to their intemperate habits. Yet it would show that 210,000 persons died by alcoholic poisoning every year in the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, India, &c. No medical man will, we think, assert that there is any exaggeration in this dread estimate. It was not wonderful that the Premier should characterize the drink traffic as productive of greater evils than war, pestilence or famine. It would take a great war every year with its costly loss of 210,000 men to equal the number on this low estimate slain every year by drink. If war in our day could point to such a multitude of victims, the moral sense of the civilized world would, we believe, be found arrayed against it. But death on the battle-field is still held to be glorious, and death by intemperance to be disgraceful. Hence there is every incentive on the part of relatives and friends to hush up the murder by intoxicating liquors, and the poor victim passes on to the bar of judgment to meet the living God, while there is none of all his kindred bold enough to cry even for vengeance on the system that has murdered him. We learn that 50 per cent. of the estimated number of medical men practise in the United Kingdom. Here within the four seas then we have no less than 105,000 persons sent into eternity yearly by the drinking system. This is more than one in every six deaths which take place in the country. Were it an injunction that the causes as well as the symptoms of disease were published in the quarterly reports of the Registrar-General the indignation of the country would be so aroused that in the outburst the drink system with all its evils would be utterly and deservedly consumed.

The poor old Scottish Standard, the organ of the beer, wine, and spirit trade of Scotland, is defunct, killed by the traffic it served, through sheer starvation. With a callousness which does not surprise though it certainly does chill, the publicans allowed their "flag" to perish. Another has, however, stepped into the gap left by the Standard. What's in a name, says Juliet. Looking to the name of the new "barrel" organ of the "vittlers," we say, much, my lady, especially when it is pretentious. Iago says, "he who steals my purse steals trash, but he who steals from me my good name, steals that which not enriches him and leaves me poor indeed." The honest word trade is filched by the new publican's defender, and made the sign of the most nefarious, no matter who is licensed to carry it on, of all traffics yet tolerated in civilized society. The National "Trade" Guardian, the representative of the Licensed Trade of Scotland, was lately ushered into being, and heralds its existence by a boisterous, if not a pointed, attack on the enemy. We will merely content ourselves meantime with sampling some of the literary wares of this new guardian of the publican traffic: "Temperance philosophically considered is an incontrovertible law of human existence, and it is a grossly gratuitous imputation on the honour and reputation of the large and important class of the community engaged in what is generally designated the liquor traffic, that its existence as a legitimate means for the proper use of alcoholic beverages is inimical to the welfare of society." That is, the publican issue and our friends should make themselves clear upon it. The writer's next sentence is a pregnant one. "The hackneyed proposition of the United Kingdom Alliance that it is neither right nor politic for the State to afford legal protection and sanction to any traffic or system that tends to increase crime, to waste the national resources, to corrupt the social habits, and to destroy the health and lives of the people has been conclusively answered." These sentences place the great issue between the publican and the Permissive billite fairly before our readers, and, besides, show how the one mystifies and deludes itself with a cloud of words while the other appeals to those principles of justice and constitutional right and obligation that must in the end prevail.

We had only time to transfer a paragraph from the Daily Review on the deputation to Rosebery to our columns last month, but no time to comment on the event. The gentlemen forming the deputation were received in the courteous manner for which his lordship is distinguished; and he heard the statement read with the closest attention, evidencing deepest interest in its contents. The facts stated and the reasons given in the statement converged to one point, that there was in Scotland a solid and matured opinion upon the necessity of special legislation on her liquor traffic. His lordship received the statement with more than official courtesy, indeed, we but do him justice when we say that it was with evident sympathy that he promised to lay the matter brought before him fully before the Home Office. The Executive feel, like their constituents, strongly in favour of a Bill for Scotland, and their grounds for this feeling were so clearly and forcibly put, that his lordship paid them a high compliment on the way they put their case. Some time ago, in London, they met Sir William Harcourt, the Home Secretary, on the subject, and found him impressed by the strength and growth of the sentiment they represented. They have now seen Lord Rosebery; the present Lord-Advocate supports by his vote the principle for which they contend, and the Solicitor-General's vote may be expected the first opportunity that presents itself. It will be seen that all the Parliamentary officials having to do special Scotch business, have been at one time or other put into possession of a clear, full, and urgent statement of the case for the suppression of the liquor traffic in Scotland. But it cannot be denied that there are abounding difficulties in the way of getting the question introduced in Parliament. The difficulties need neither daunt nor dishearten. As the event has justified the Executive in their creation of the enlightened conviction that the liquor traffic should cease, so we believe that they will emerge from the difficulties that beset the Parliamentary stage at which the movement has arrived. While our friends all heartily sympathise with them, they can do more, they can assist them. They can communicate with their representatives, showing them that they fully share the feeling that Scotland should, either by a special Act, have suppressive powers conferred on her ratepayers, or that such powers should be expressly provided for in the forthcoming measure of the Government. If they press home these views on their representatives they will lighten and speed the labours of the Executive, and do much to encourage an hon. member to step forth and lead the nation in its demands for such a reasonable measure of justice for Scotland.

For a long time a most anomalous state of licensing has obtained in Campbeltown. There are so many distillers there! Hitherto distillers, from their wealth, have been looked upon as peculiarly eligible for a seat in the Town Council, that till lately they have almost monopolised its seats, and filled all its offices. The awakening of the public mind on the drink system seemed to threaten the extinction of this arrangement. The licensing laws very properly exclude all interested in the traffic from a seat on the licensing bench, and as there is but one Bailie who has no interest in the liquor traffic it seemed as if no sessions for granting or renewing licenses could be held, with the result that all licenses would speedily terminate of themselves. The Justices have stepped in on several occasions to avert this consequence, taking the report of the only Bailie out of the traffic on the suitability of the premises as sufficient grounds for their action. This year that magistrate refused to certify, but, nothing daunted, the Justices have assumed the whole duty of licensing for the town, thus practically abolishing the Burgh Licensing Court. The licensing of Campbeltown public-houses is now on a level with the English licensing system. It is in the hands of an irresponsible body of Justices, and the people of Campbeltown have virtually lost all control over the liquor traffic that affects them. The Justices say that it is not contemplated by the law that because of the failure of one magistrate to report on the suitability of premises the whole of the licensing applications are to fall to the ground; but it was certainly not contemplated by the law that distillers—men expressly disqualified by their trade from licensing—should monopolise the magistracy. Matters cannot rest in this wise. The Home Office should be communicated with. It is evident that the disqualification of the distiller should be operative at an earlier stage, and as he is of no use in the magistracy, his services should not be accepted for the Council. We will be interested to know what will be done with the Confirmation Court. There is only one magistrate qualified to represent the burgh on the Confirmation Committee, but three are required. Will the Justices assume the whole functions of that court also? Surely not. Our friends in Campbeltown will, we trust, make some effort to avert the loss of their powers to check in some degree the liquor traffic. What a blessing to them would be the existence of a Veto Act. Ere many weeks had passed, we doubt not, that they would have had a poll as to whether or not the liquor traffic should exist or terminate in Campbeltown. In the present state of feeling there on the subject, the Act would most likely be adopted, and the greatest source of social corruption in the burgh ended for ever.

Our excellent contemporary the Church Standard points us to the sad condition of Switzerland through its intemperance. Round this country there cluster so many heroic achievements in behalf of liberty, and her annals are adorned with such deathless names as Tell, Winkelried of Unterwald, and Ulric Zwingle, that one cannot but feel sad when he hears that the Swiss nation is becoming, through drinking, the degenerate descendants of such a noble ancestry as once were the bulwarks of its freedom. Lately the Swiss Society of Public Utility held its annual meeting, and vigorously discussed the national intemperance. It appears that the imports of wine were in 1880 as much as 100 per cent. more than they were in 1861, and yet in the same nineteen years the increase of population was only 15 per cent. At the same time all the wine grown in this Alpine region is consumed in the country. Then, taking the canton of Zurich there are 4121 public houses in it, or one to 115 of the population. Such is the potency of these temptations that it is said 10s. a week is spent by the people, or about one-fifth of their average earnings, on liquor. This state of matters is condemned as "conducting to a multiplicity of evils, and constituting a serious national danger." It will be seen that other countries are like our own under the fell curse of intemperance and its most prolific nurse, the traffic in strong drink. It is worth glancing at the remedies proposed for this state of things. They are fourfold—1st, a heavy tax on the liquor sellers, which simply means increased robbery of those dependent on the drinker and augmented plunder to the State; 2nd, Regulated licensing for a kind of free trade. We hail this remedy. Regulation is partial prohibition, and may lead to total. 3rd, The punishment of offending publicans. This proposal is an evidence of the ignorance on the question which pervades the society. Hofer goes into A's, drinks; steps on to B, drinks; drops in upon C, drinks. He is now visibly drunk; C is flogged, fined, or confined, but A and B escape. The putting this remedy into practice will soon end in its being cancelled on the statute book. 4th, The imprisonment of any drinker seen three times drunk in public. Worse and worse. The poor fellow is punished enough by being poisoned without being deprived of his liberty. He is allowed to form a habit till it becomes uncontrollable; then he is imprisoned, and his wife, family, and business all allowed to suffer along with him. Yet the cause of this appetite, this public disgrace, doesn't lie so much in his want of control as in the liquor traffic. If this society had had the sagacity to discern the true relation between the drink and the man, they would have found a truer solution of the difficulty to lie in the prohibition of all liquor traffic, rendering it practically impossible in future for any to "put an enemy into their mouths to steal away their brains."

The Burgh of Grangemouth seems destined to be one of the great battlefields of the Scottish Permissive prohibitory movement. The echoes of the great struggle between the publican feu-holders and the Earl of Zetland, the superior of the town, have hardly yet died away. During that memorable struggle, not, however, closed, the inhabitants showed by an overwhelming number of signatures how much they were in sympathy with the Earl's course of action. Another struggle much more decisive has just taken place. At the last licensing sessions, application was made for a license to premises in Dundas Street, New Town. The residents viewing this aggression on their amenity with strong aversion, met in public meeting and unanimously protested against the granting of the license sought. Not satisfied with a protest, they memorialized the justices to refuse the application. We cannot help characterising the action of the justices in view of this resolution, and that of the memorial, as of the most high-handed sort. There were 350 rate-payers around, 32 were absent or at sea; 48 declared themselves undecided; 253 heartily signed the memorial, leaving only 17 who might be set down as in favour of the license! Against this overwhelming expression of opinion on the part of the ratepayers in the immediate neighbourhood of Dundas Street a counter petition was presented in favour of the license by 170 persons—commissioners, ratepayers, and inhabitants of the burgh! Very few of these had any interest in the new town for which the license was sought, and this petition was the fruit of the applicant's own canvassing efforts, which was sufficient to condemn it. The justices, however, took their own way, and granted the license by a considerable majority. This adds another to the numerous instances of Justices' tyrannical Quarter Session decisions, and will tend to deepen the conviction that laws so administered can never operate for the good of the district they sway; besides, a better argument for vesting the ratepayers with a direct veto over the licensing system affecting them could not be given. It is high time that a system which professes to legislate for the good of a neighbourhood, and yet thrusts upon that neighbourhood a public-house which is, judging by their action, bitterly repugnant to the great body of the inhabitants, should be abolished. This is the view, evidently, of a large number of the people whose wishes were so entirely set aside. They could not show their sense of the mischievous action of the Justices, to them; the great majority of them being irresponsible to the inhabitants. Mr. Henry Burrell, J.P., is also a Commissioner of the Burgh, and he had to ask re-election last month. So also had Provost Macpherson. These gentlemen had their respective colleagues, and from the diverse sentiments upheld by each there were two camps—the publican and the temperance camp. The issue could not be more clear, nor was it doubtful. The temperance party triumphed, Provost Macpherson being at the head of the poll, while Mr. Burrell was ruthlessly rejected. The people have shown him what they think of his conduct. Set over them by their own votes he goes to the licensing court, where, instead of averting from his constituents, as far as in his power, the calamity of a public-house, he joins the Justices in their outrage upon the social amenity of those he represented. Everyone must feel that he suffers justly in being ignominiously rejected. It may not bring him to a better mind, but it will show to the country that Grangemouth is clear in her sympathies for the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and that she will not permit those that favour that traffic to bear rule over those weighty interests which she requires to conserve.

It is marvellous how often the Church is found deploring the meagre inflow of the offerings of her children into her treasury. Ever seemingly on the verge of privation she just escapes poverty by the munificent bequests of the faithful. It would seem, however, as if there were a marked indifference to her financial condition among the great majority of her flock. When times of abundance occur she is enabled to rejoice through the large increase of tribute from her loyal subjects, but when times of leanness lower over the land her coffers are almost amongst the first to be overlooked and forgotten. It is as if her people looked upon her as the Chinese are said to look on their idols, but with, of course, a difference. The celestials are, when in prosperity, generous with their votive offerings and frequent in their devout attentions. But when misfortunes overtake them their wrath kindles against their deities and the chastisement they infallibly inflict upon their gods fills their joss houses with sounds. The difference lies in this that we do not punish our ministers with blows we visit them with leanness of teeth. There does not exist any who more heartily prays for the prosperity of Jerusalem, who wishes that peace may abide within her walls, or who seeks her permanent good more earnestly than we do, and hence we venture to suggest a more excellent way than she takes to replenish her stores. She labours to establish sustentation funds, mission schemes, and other ways and means with but indifferent success, especially among the working portion of the community. The wealthy pour into her coffers of their abundance as in the days of old, but the working people sadly lack the needful generosity at the door of the sanctuary; yet were the great body of the people interested and trained to be givers of the devoted shekel as in those days when Israel wandered in the desert, the worshippers in our churches would soon have to be asked to cease their liberality because the sacred vessels were full to overflowing. The Church sees with too little of earnest protest the profusion of offerings to Bacchus and the stinted support to the Church, and blind, apparently, to its cause it sits by the wayside begging. We are led into this line of remark by a writer in Life and Work, the parochial organ of the Established Church. He waxes woeful on the condition of its foreign missions. Congregations will not give, and the mission threatens to wither for want of support. The State Church is not, however, alone. The Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown said not long since that were those of the U. P. communion who partook of strong drink to diminish the amount of their drinking by merely fivepence per week that church would not only have a substantial income, but her schemes would flourish as they had never done before. The Free Church too complains. She boasts, and properly too, of collecting in the first twenty-seven years of her history eight and three quarter millions sterling, yet Scotland spends on her liquors a sum equal to that every six months. The three great Scottish ecclesiastical bodies have at least no advantage over each other with regard to this matter, for they are equally in a condition of impecuniosity. The writer in Life and Work puts his case well. The demands of the foreign missions for which he pleads would be met, he says, by a sum of fourpence half-penny a head:—three half-pence to the Indian mission, three half-pence to the Chinese mission, and three half-pence to that in Africa. Asking the members of a church to give fourpence half-penny a year, and thousands of them having a yearly drink bill of several pounds sterling to discharge! The Rev. Mr. Gray, one of a deputation to the churches, put his case at Dumbarton with considerable point when he stated that one farthing a week from each member in the Established communion would produce twenty-five thousand pounds yearly. This should open the way of the Church to a better solution of the question of means. The waste upon strong drink in Scotland is enormous, the fruits of that waste is incalculable, and the Church has also to maintain costly agencies to deal with the evil and its fruits. Nay more, how many does she lose a year through backsliding through intemperance? Let her stop the leak. Let her rouse herself against the liquor traffic in the might and grace of her supreme Head. When she overthrows this iniquity, and who dare believe she would fail if she was sincere, what would result? Peace and plenty would cover the land as the grass and flowers cover a field which the Lord God hath blessed. The foul brood of evils that rise in the wake of the liquor traffic would have disappeared, and with these those agencies that had to be maintained to keep them in check. The votive offerings of those delivered from the bondage of intemperance, and of those relieved from assailing the evil would pour in augmented flow into the Lord's house. With these the Church could deal effectively with those evils that would remain. The Christian graces would flourish as the palm tree in the courts of God, and the saints would truly inherit the earth. Instead of the Churches of the land begging for a dole, let them arise determined to purge the land of our present-day idolatry, and they would soon find the wealth, the power, and the influence of all classes at their command.

INTELLIGENCE.

LORD ROSEBERY AND LOCAL OPTION.

ONE of the advantages of such gatherings as that held in this town last week under the auspices of the Liberal Association is the bringing members of the Government into more direct contact with the popular sentiment on the great questions of the day. Lord Rosebery could not fail to be struck with the fact that no words uttered in our Town Hall elicited a warmer response than the allusion made by the Member for Perth to the subject of Local Option. The Scotsman was pleased next morning to pronounce a glowing eulogium on Greenock as the possessor of political traditions that place it in the first rank as a stronghold of genuine and robust Liberalism. No burgh in Scotland can present a nobler record in this respect than our own, and the fact was frankly acknowledged by our Eastern contemporary. But that journal, as well as the new Under Secretary at the Home Office, will do well to make a note also of the fact that this seat of Liberal sentiment has no stronger wish at the present hour than to see the subject of Local Option taken up in earnest and satisfactorily disposed of by the Government. The existence of this desire may not be a fact acceptable to the Edinburgh journal we have named; and, if we may trust the impression that appears to have been made upon the minds of a recent deputation to Lord Rosebery, it may to some extent be distasteful also to his lordship. We have not the slightest doubt of the noble Earl's strong attachment to Liberal principles; and we can quite understand how these principles may be so understood by his lordship as to make him doubtful of the policy that is advocated by that section of the Temperance Reformers who plead for further legislative interference with the liquor traffic. It is only of late that Mr. Bright has seen his way to the acceptance of the resolution that is identified with the name of Sir Wilfrid Lawson; and the member for Birmingham is but a type of many in the Liberal ranks who, while animated by the very strongest desire to see the stain of intemperance removed from Britain, have yet been slow to concur in the application of Sir Wilfrid's specific for the cure of the gigantic evil. The new Under Secretary at the Home Office would see, however, that the Liberals of Greenock, upon whom he bestowed a eulogium that was probably as well-merited as it was gracefully expressed, have made up their minds on the subject, and that there is no part of the work lying before Parliament in which they feel a deeper interest. In view of the votes of the Scottish members, it will be unfair to delay the matter much longer; and the sooner Lord Rosebery faces the problem the more likely is he to retain and strengthen the popularity which he at present enjoys. Mr. Parker mentioned three great subjects in relation to which Scotland is ready to lead the way; but there is not one of these about which the national sentiment north of the Tweed is so manifestly ripe as that of Local Option. In a material as well as a moral point of view, it is one of transcendent importance; and we hope that Lord Rosebery's communion with the staunch and well-tried Liberalism of this town will hasten a decision on his part conducive to the solution of a problem that cannot be trifled with by those who have the welfare of the country at heart.—Greenock Telegraph.

Nine-tenths of the Primitive Methodist ministers are abstainers.

The Newport Town Council condemn the pernicious custom of paying wages in public-houses. It is time that custom was condemned in Scotch ports.

Mr. R. T. Booth's temperance mission in Leicester is said to have resulted in 10,906 total abstinence pledges, and in the distribution of 19,630 blue ribbons.

It is stated that nearly 4000 dram shops in the city of New York are kept by women. There is only one American-born woman among them. They are mostly Irish.

At last Dr. F. R. Lee's Works, in 10 half crown volumes, are announced. Orders are being received at the National Independent Office, Guildford Street, Leeds.

We were very sorry to learn that the Secretary to the Admiralty, Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, has been prostrated with fever. It is satisfactory to know, however, that he is soon likely to recover.

The prosperous among us have an average duration of life of 50 years, the children of toil one of 32 years. That last need not be so low were these children to abstain from liquor and tobacco.

The San Francisco Rescue calls Mr. Wm. Hoyle Sir William Hoyle. Perhaps one day our sovereign lady's sword may be laid on his shoulder. There are few who are more deserving of the honour.

The Sons of Temperance have at length resolved to issue a monthly for the advocacy of the principles and objects of the Order. The first number appeared last month. It has our hearty wishes for its success.

Dundee can rejoice over a Provost who is an abstainer—ex-Bailie Moncur being now its chief ruler. We, too, rejoice at his elevation, and offer our heartiest wishes for a distinguished and successful tenure of office.

Kansas has an area of 50,000,000. Kansas is under liquor prohibition. Numerous immigrants are pouring in. It is believed that the constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic will largely increase the material prosperity of the State. When the question of prohibition was submitted to the whole vote of the people, a large number of habitual drunkards were foremost in voting for it, saying any legislation that would break the habits in whose fell gripe they were was worth the voting for. Kansas for ever!

It is cheering to learn that when Mr. Gladstone was entertained the other day by the Leeds Liberal Club, Sir Edward Baines, who presided, and who proposed the Premier's health, not only drank the toast as a teetotaler should, but boldly announced that his glass was filled with "Nature's noblest liquor—pure water."

Along the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, 14,000 miles long, the sale of intoxicating liquors has been abolished in the station restaurants, and 2000 railway servants are pledged abstainers. The fact has been proved that "a railway, especially a very long single track like the Grand Trunk, can be worked more safely and efficiently on total abstinence principles than in any other way."

LOCAL OPTION.—The highly popular League conversations began this year with a discussion on "Legislation for Scotland," led by the Rev. J. A. Johnston. On the motion of Mr. D. Fortune the discussion was adjourned till Monday 21st, when in Niven's Central Dining Rooms a paper of great excellence was read by Mr. Fortune on Local Option legislation for Scotland. So far as it went the paper was unanswerable. The discussion was continued, but save for the remarks of ex-Provost Dick, John Wilson, Esq., J.P., and Mr. Galloway, was devoid of interest. Rev. Mr. Johnston having replied the proceedings terminated with the usual vote of thanks to the chairman, Sir William Collins.

PRESENTATIONS TO SIR WILLIAM AND LADY COLLINS.—On the 27th October Sir William Collins was entertained by the Corporation of the City of Glasgow at a conversation in the Corporation Galleries. There was a large assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. The Lord Provost in an appropriate speech presented Sir William with a portrait of himself from the study of Patalano. Bailie Dunlop presented Sir William with a portrait of Lady Collins also by the same painter. Sir William made an appropriate reply. He is in court dress and her ladyship in evening dress. On the 29th in the presence of 50,000 spectators Mr. A. H. McLean unveiled a handsome fountain erected to mark the Provostship of Sir William. The fountain was accepted on the part of the Corporation by the Honourable the Lord Provost of the city. Sir William Collins returned thanks; addresses by several prominent citizens were hailed by the vast multitude with applause; cheers were given at the close for Sir William and Lady Collins. There was a procession of all sections of the temperance movement numbering 8000.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE AND TEMPERANCE.—A striking illustration of the value of total abstinence and the advance of public opinion on our question, is to be found in the prospectus of "The Lancashire and Yorkshire Accident Insurance Company." The directors of that company have wisely recognised the fact that abstainers run infinitely less risk, than those who do not abstain, in meeting with serious accidents, therefore they have resolved, with commendable enterprise, to offer a bonus of 10 per cent. abatement of premium to all their customers who have renounced the use of intoxicating drinks for the previous twelve months. There is not the slightest doubt that a very large proportion of the saddest catastrophes occur, by road and rail, by land and sea, through indulgence in alcoholic liquors, consequently this company is acting with praiseworthy prudence in holding out strong inducements to its numerous supporters to shun this active cause of eminent danger, and so avert calamities to the assured, and heavy claims on their own funds. Such a company deserves the very best encouragement from our friends for the bold step they have taken. A promise is held out that, if sufficiently supported, the directors will make the bonus even greater in the future. We trust they will be rewarded with the success they merit. Our good friends, Thomas Dick & Son, of 12 Stanley Street, Paisley Road, West, Glasgow, who are agents for the company, will no doubt be happy to afford all needful information to any one who may feel interested in this matter, and to them we heartily recommend our readers to apply direct.

WINES SCRIPTURAL AND ECCLESIASTICAL.—On the 18th ult. Dr. N. S. Kerr, of London, delivered a lecture on the above subject in the Chapter-house adjoining St. Paul's Cathedral. Dr. W. B. Richardson presided. Dr. Kerr had been driven to the study of this subject by the objection urged by infidel patients, who asserted that the Bible commended and that Christ made poisonous drinks. He was quite satisfied that the God of nature was the God of revelation, and that there could be no contradiction between His work and His word. To meet this objection thoroughly he determined to study the question. The true solution of the Bible wine problem was to be seen in the recognition of two essentially different kinds of scripture wine—one unfermenting and innocent, the other intoxicating and dangerous. This interpretation of biblical references to wine was so simple and natural, and so reconciled the teaching of the scriptures with that of science and experience, that it had been persistently disputed by sceptics. The only inference Dr. Kerr could draw from his study of the teaching and life of Christ, was that He could not have made a poisonous beverage for such as had freely drunk of poison already. This interpretation invested the miracle of Cana with peculiar beauty and force, inasmuch as it represents Christ accomplishing in a moment that which every year takes several months—the conversion of the watery sap of the vine into wine in the grape. He felt bound to test the objection that unfermented wine did not exist, and spent nearly a year in an extended and crucial series of experiments with grapes and grape juice. The result was conclusive. He had proved that unfermented wine could be kept from fermenting for days, and ascertained that the ancient methods were most effective. He showed a large variety of specimens in solid and liquid form. The only unfermented wine in the English market which he could recommend was that of Frank Wright, 68 High Street, Kensington, London. A host of authorities, including the Archbishop of Canterbury, 1737; the Archbishop of Armagh, 1796; the Bishop of Norwich, 1660; Rochester, 1702; and London, 1778, were quoted to attest that unfermented wine had been in use from the earliest times to the present day. Such unfermented and unfermenting beverages had all along, by travellers, scholars, poets, and other writers, been called wine; both unfermented and fermented palm juice had been known as palm wine; the chief use of grapes in the East was not to make fermented wine; grapes could be kept fresh all the year round, so that unfermented wine could be newly prepared at any time. Yayin, in the Old Testament, and oinos, in the New Testament, were general terms for both unfermented and fermented wine. Tirosh was unfermented, and probably the solid fruit. Distillation being then unknown, shakar, condemned in the Bible, would be what is called a "naturally fermented" wine, and therefore not more than half the strength of our ordinary port or sherry. Other words in the original and several scripture texts were commented on, and a warm tribute paid to the Bible Temperance Commentary. Dr. Kerr said that he was now in treating on ecclesiastical wine on sure ground, for he was on his own domain of medicine. As a physician with some experience in the treatment of habitual drunkenness, he knew that it was not safe for the dipsomaniac to taste intoxicating drink in any circumstances, while in a state of consciousness; and, therefore, he (the lecturer) Churchman though he was, even when a drinker himself, never allowed a reformed drunkard under his care to go near a communion table when intoxicating drink was presented. He was supported in this line of treatment by Dr. A. Fergus, of the General Medical Council, and recently President of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, by Surgeon-General Francis, and by other experts in the higher ranks of the medical profession. There need be no difficulty about the legal matter. At all periods in the history of the Christian Church, unfermented juice of the grape had been held to be wine for the purpose of the Sacrament. Witnesses were cited in the original from the second, fourth, seventh, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. Unfermented, un-intoxicating wine was, at the present day, recognised as a lawful element of Communion by the Methodist, Episcopal, and other bodies in America, by the Established Church of Scotland, by a large number of Nonconforming congregations throughout the kingdom, by a considerable array of Established Churches and mission charges in England, and by the annual Mildmay Conference. One bishop had sanctioned its use, while several bishops had communicated in it and had made no sign. The tent that so many churches used was not fermented wine at all, but, even at its best, unfermented wine with spirit added to it to prevent fermentation. As to the legality of the sacramental use of unfermented wine, the opinion of the well known ecclesiastical lawyer, Dr. A. J. Stephens, Q.C., seemed conclusive. Dr. Stephens says there is no evidence to show whether the fruit of the vine our Saviour administered at the Last Supper was unfermented or fermented; that in ancient times both freshly expressed and preserved unfermented grape juice was drunk; that such wine could not intoxicate; that in early times communion might be had by pressing vine clusters into the cup; that there are authorities for calling unfermented grape juice wine; that both fermented and unfermented liquors were in use in ancient times; that "mustum" meant "unfermented;" and that as a matter of principle it was indifferent whether fermented or unfermented wine were used, no question of doctrine being involved. The lecturer stated that he himself, as an individual, cared nothing about what kind of wine was employed at the sacrament. He had always communicated in fermented wine, and perhaps might always do so; but, in his capacity as a physician, he would be disloyal to truth if he did not honestly testify to the serious risk of communion in an intoxicant to the reformed inebriate, and to the yet unfallen subject of the hereditary drink crave. At present what was the fact? Some reformed drunkards had been repelled from the church altogether, some had deprived themselves of the privilege of communion, and some, while worshipping regularly at an Established Church, communicated at some Nonconformist place of worship where unfermented wine was used. He implored the clergy, as a mere matter of justice and of right, to render the most sacred rite of their venerable church safe for the weakest of the victims snatched from the fatal embrace of drink. The whole question was surrounded with difficulties, but he had perfect confidence in the candour and judgment of the bishops and clergy, to whose devoted labours for Christ he bore willing witness. Hitherto the truth on this delicate and important subject had not been laid before the Church. His confidence in the future action of the hierarchy and priesthood of the National Church on this question arose from his knowledge of their honesty and earnestness. Well he knew that no body of men were more open to receive the truth, and to carry their intelligent convictions into practice. (Applause.) A most interesting discussion followed. The Rev. W. Allan, St. James, Bermoudsey, had used Frank Wright's wine for 6 years. It had given entire satisfaction. The only objector was a brewer's daughter, but she became convinced and partakes still. Rev. G. S. Bott preferred to preserve the wine by immersion in hot water, and thought that done in this way no waste could result through not keeping. Surgeon-General Francis instanced the case of a lady who fell into drinking habits, but on his advice drank Wright's unfermented wine. She went to a church where the communion was dispensed in fermented wine, and she came to him to tell him that the old feeling was returning upon her. It was a dangerous precipice on which such communicants had to tread. The Chairman, Dr. W. B. Richardson, said that if you wanted a fermented article you ought to have it pure, but as regarded fermented wine that was quite out of the question. If you wanted a pure fermented article it was now easily procured, and it answered all the demands of the holy ordinance. With bread it is the same. You must have the best bread, but there is a kind of rye bread which, when taken, produces in some persons a singular condition of a disease of a cerebral spinal nature, that ends in mortification of the extremities of the body. Presuming it became a fashion in the churches to use bread of that kind, and it was found that it produced a certain amount of disease in the community who partook of it—and certainly it would never produce anything like the amount of disease that might be produced by wine—yet if that were suggested, that kind of bread would be put by entirely. The general term bread would be used to give the best and simplest, and purest bread, and that would be taken and used which was perfectly harmless. He thought that same argument might apply very well to wine—to take the wine that was perfectly harmless, and that would be unfermented wine. On the grounds of the heredity involved in the question, he earnestly urged a reform in this matter. The danger in using the present wine at the sacrament was very great. Hardly a month passed but patients were speaking to him on this subject. He invariably and strongly advised all in danger of relapse never to run the risk of going forward to the sacrament. He then moved the thanks of the meeting to Dr. N. S. Kerr. Dr. Kerr briefly acknowledged. There was a large exhibition of unfermented wines on the table, amongst which were those of Mr. Frank Wright, who remained in attendance and explained to an interested audience the system by which he produces his beverage.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, from 16th October to 15th November inclusive. During that period 75 meetings were held—17 being deputational, and 58 ordinary. At these meetings 84 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. John Paton has visited Edinburgh, Dysart, Pathhead, Dunfermline, Kirkcaldy, Penicuik, Bo'ness, Linlithgow, Addiewell, Glasgow, Stirling and Greenock, and addressed 22 meetings.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Braehead, Forth, Edinburgh, Linlithgow, Addiewell, West Linton, Leith, Clarkston, Portobello, Dalkeith, and Kilsyth, and addressed 17 meetings.

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Greenock, Glasgow, Aitkenhead, and Uddingston, and addressed 16 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Marykirk, Aberdeen, Lomay, St. Combs, Inveralloch and Rosehearty, and addressed 12 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Tyldesley, Glasgow, Dalry and Strathbungo, and addressed 7 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has addressed 4 meetings in Glasgow.

Ex-Provost Dick has addressed 2 meetings in Harpurhey and Manchester.

Rev. S. Harding has addressed a meeting in Glasgow.

Bailie Selkirk has addressed a meeting in Shettleston.

Mr. Wm. Kesson has addressed a meeting in Glasgow; and

Mr. W. Chalmers has addressed a meeting in Dalry.

If I poison my grocer, the very lightest sentence is penal servitude; but if my grocer poisons me—ah, that is a different thing—he is fined ten francs.—Alphonse Karr. [This fits the liquor traffic better than any business we know.]

A gentleman called last week at a large stationer's to order some note-paper with a heading. On being shown various designs, monograms, &c., "No," he said, "I want something simpler—just a flower, such as a forget-me-not." "But, sir, that would surely be more suitable for a young lady?" "I know what I want," was the prompt reply; "I am a tailor, and—the paper is for my customers."

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Books, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

We rejoice to observe that the Church of England Temperance Chronicle is, under the energetic editor, Mr. F. Sherlock, rising so rapidly in its circulation that many times lately the manager has reported that the supply has proved unequal to the demand. The Chronicle worthily deserves its success, only we wish it would, with a larger circulation, take higher ground on the prohibition of the traffic.

A Detective's Experience of the Passion for Drink.—We are glad to learn that this pamphlet, reviewed in our columns last month, has now reached its fourth thousand. The publican organ—The National Trade Guardian—is dreadfully annoyed by it, and even goes so far as to express the hope that Captain M'Call may have his attention drawn to Mr. M'Naught's publication. We may fairly conclude that this little admirable experience turns out to be a well-aimed blow at the traffic. Every temperance society and Templar Lodge should get a supply on sale at its meetings. Keep the temperance press agoing.

Danger Signals. A volume of temperance tales. By F. M. Holmes. With thirteen illustrations. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price Two Shillings. Mr. Holmes is an industrious writer, and his ability in story telling is manifest in the volume now before us. Working out his idea of danger signals he offers an abundance of warning in this volume. The instances given are so varied, however, the characters so numerous and yet so different, that one insensibly feels the impression gaining on him that the drinking customs are one great whirlpool in which of all that fall in only few are rescued, and of these, but few are really restored. There are thirteen tales, and though all are not of equal merit, we believe the wide circle of readers in which it will circulate, will have but one opinion, that it is most pleasant because profitable reading. We incidentally observe that the author holds advanced views on the temperance question, an additional good feature in our eyes.

Good Cookery. A culinary catechism for the use of schools and young persons. By Mr. D. L. Brown. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price Ninepence. This is a most excellent conception, very successfully carried out. In the compass of about 170 pages we have an amount of knowledge conveyed by question and answer of which the ordinary reader has scarcely any notion. We believe that, were the mothers of children who at school are going through lessons on domestic economy, would find it invaluable in questioning these on their progress in cookery, besides largely adding to their own knowledge and correcting by its means the defects in their own youthful education, when such an admirable little manual was never dreamed of. Many a cook could bring up "the scullery maid" wisely and well by the questions and answers so clearly set down here. We cordially recommend it.

The Thirty-sixth Report of Aberdeen Temperance Society. Aberdeen: Mw. Edwards, secretary, 2 Correction Wynd. The committee modestly term their report a brief outline, but we should rather call it an abstract of a brilliant year's work. True, the society is rich beyond any society in Scotland, but its merit lies in its using the wealth it has inherited for the vigorous prosecution of the work it was instituted to do. The summary of its work is as follows:—"206 members enrolled, 86 meetings held by the society, 150 addressed by its secretary, who has made 3,000 visits and collected £98. It has distributed 15,000 temperance periodicals, 400 circulars, 1,350 post cards, it has presented 6 petitions, organised 5 Bands of Hope and 1 temperance class, held 27 committee meetings, printed 6,400 bills and 4,000 tickets and 1,500 programmes, and sold 500 Band of Hope cards and 700 hymn-books, and 26,000 persons have through its efforts been brought into contact with temperance truth." There is a record of which any society may be proud, and one that reflects the greatest credit on all connected with the Aberdeen Temperance Society. We are sorry to learn that Mr. A. S. Cook, who has been in close connection with it for thirty years, nearly all that time as either hon. secretary or president, feels obliged to resign his office through overwork. A more faithful office-bearer than Mr. Cook, never held office in the society. The income, including balance from last year, is £393, 11s. 7½d., and there is a balance of £5, 6s. 5½d. to carry forward. By the stock account abstract we learn that the amount at the credit of the society is now £1,357, 6s. 5½d. The society has reached the golden age.

The Economic Influence of the Drinking Customs of Society upon the Nation's well-being. By Wm. Hoyle, Esq., Bury. Manchester: The United Kingdom Alliance, 44 John Dalton Street. London: National Temperance Publication Depot, 337 Strand. Price One penny. The desire to do justice to the proceedings of the annual meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association constrained us to omit any report of Mr. Hoyle's paper read at the September Meeting of the British Association at York. We gladly seize the opportunity, which its republication in pamphlet form presents, of noting some of its valuable features. The first paragraph is a model of what an introduction should be. Economic Science is the science of the production, distribution, and consumption of wealth. Its aim is to indicate the course of conduct to be pursued, to gain from our actions the greatest material good, and the object of the paper is to show that the drinking customs operate to the great detriment of its material well-being. Mr. Hoyle shows that the nation, in the ten years ending 1880, spent £1,363,330,711 on drink, or £136,000,000 yearly. In 1830 the consumption per head of liquor was £2 13s., in 1880 it had reached £4 3s. per head, an increase of 56 per cent. upon the former year. Now our intemperance in 1830 was deplorable, how much more must it have been in 1880 when the increase in consumption was so great. But we consume tea so largely that it has in a great measure superseded beer for dietetic purposes, and then there are a very great number who never take liquors at all now; in 1830 there were very few, so that there is an immensely increased consumption of strong drink is most obvious. The direct cost being £136,000,000 yearly, there is the indirect cost. Now estimating loss of time, £50,000,000; destruction and abstraction of property, £5,000,000; private and public charges for crime and pauperism, destitution, sickness, madness, and early death, £20,000,000; loss of wealth through idleness, &c., £28,000,000; loss on non-productiveness of capital spent, and of capital employed, £20,000,000; loss of wealth through cost of justice, police, &c., £5,000,000; loss of wealth spent on reinforcing the religious and moral agencies to cope with the evil, £10,000,000. Total, £138,000,000. Add to this the direct cost and you have a grand total of £274,000,000, from which, however, deduct £54,000,000 for revenue, and for what some would contend was lawful use, and there is £220,000,000 as the annual economic loss to the nation. This direct expenditure of £136,330,799 is slightly less than our expenditure on wheat, barley, and oats £80,787,500, milk £26,000,000, on cheese and butter £13,500,000, and on potatoes £16,650,000. Total, £136,937,500. We have complained of bad harvests the past six years, yet we have spent yearly not less than the value of our wheat, oats, and barley, our milk, butter, and cheese and potatoes. Why, though we had lost all these and been abstainers we should from what we could have saved from drinking been able to replace them. It is no wonder then that we have among us a large number of paupers and of persons trembling on the verge of destitution. Of the first we have 1,011,389 on the books, but three and a half times this number apply for relief in the course of the year, or 3,539,861 applying for help in the course of the year. An equal number to this is continually bordering on destitution, so that we have 7,000,000 or one in every five of the population either a pauper or next to it. The amount of poor and police rates last year amounted to £16,165,220, the largest amount ever paid in one year! Nothing more clearly shows how, by drinking alcohol, the individual and the nation violates the laws of wealth, and so diminishes and often destroys their chances of realizing material well-being. We have, we hope, so indicated the excellencies of this pamphlet as to induce our friends to master it themselves and aid its wide circulation around them. In this way they can best show their appreciation of Mr. Hoyle's eminent services to the cause of Temperance and Prohibition.

The Drink Problem and its Solution. By David Lewis, J.P., ex-Magistrate of the city of Edinburgh, author of "Britain's Social State," &c. London: National Temperance Publication Depot, 337 Strand, W.C. Price Four Shillings and Sixpence. Mr. Lewis stands in the foremost rank of Scottish temperance reformers, and few men have studied the drink problem more thoroughly than he has done. As might be expected his utterances on the question, whether expressed by the living voice or the pen, are always clear and vigorous. The volume before us is not a whit behind any of his previous efforts, and is a worthy contribution to a pressing social reform. The chapter on "Labour and Commerce" deserves very serious consideration at the hands alike of employer and employed, and is to our thinking quite unanswerable. His exposure of the inherent weakness of all remedial measures in chapters 7 and 8 is as complete as it is logical, and when in chapters 9 and 10 he treats of permissive and imperial legislation he urges his well known pronounced views with all his accustomed point and power. We hail the volume as a valuable addition to the sound and thorough-going teaching on this momentous question which is much needed at the present hour, especially by that large class of "sympathizers" with the temperance reform who are always ready to council moderation in the efforts to suppress this giant evil. Perhaps, however, Mr. Lewis will permit us to say that in some respects he has not done himself, his argument, and many of his temperance friends sufficient justice. The force of many of his best passages is marred by the use of language, especially when applied to the Government, that implies a strong moral culpability arising from a conscious participation in wrong doing. Now, no one knows better than Mr. Lewis that the Government is but the creature or executive of the nation, and that without the direct and unmistakable instructions of those who placed it in power, it is absolutely helpless in the matter of drawing revenue from the liquor traffic. The real responsibility rests with the people, and this Mr. Lewis has failed to give due prominence to, and to that extent has, in our view, weakened the force of his otherwise strong argument. Again, it is hardly fair to say, as he does on page 36, that the labour expended on the grain by the brewer and distiller "is all intended to make the grain unfit for the purposes for which it was given by a beneficent Creator in order to produce those fiery liquors which are the bane of our country." Mr. Lewis is too old a controversialist in the temperance ranks not to know that an imputation of motive to an opponent is almost equivalent to a confession of weakness in argument, and always serves as a handle for a sneer at what our opponents are pleased to call the intemperance of temperance advocates. Mr. Lewis will permit us to say further, that he does not sufficiently recognise the efforts of those organisations in Scotland that have contributed so materially to the education of the people on this question, which in its turn has led to the Scotch vote on local option with which he is so pleased. A franker acknowledgment of these efforts would have been graceful as well as gratifying, especially as Mr. Lewis knows full well what these have been. But we have no wish to find fault. We feel rather disposed, in view of Mr. Lewis's fervid appeal on page 259 to "the leaders in the cause of temperance and social reform" to "rise to the occasion and resolutely demand a full settlement of their country's claims," and in view of his suggestions as to the steps necessary to that end, to frankly and heartily invite Mr. Lewis's cordial co-operation in the line of conduct so well pointed out. No one is better able to state the case and to enforce its paramount claims, and no one has done more, in an independent way, in this respect than he. Indeed, one of the most pressing wants of the movement is the want of "public-spirited and acceptable speakers," other than the well-accredited agents and lecturers. If Mr. Lewis will, in conjunction with, say half-a-dozen of the ablest lay speakers on the prohibitory aspect of the temperance question in connection with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, volunteer his services for a limited period during the coming winter in joining deputations to "the various centres of population, so that the opinion of the people may be brought to bear on the Legislature," he will lay the movement under lasting obligations, and contribute in no small degree to hasten the accomplishment of the supreme object upon which he, as well as we have all resolutely set our minds.

A Scotsman, being asked by his minister, "What kind of a man was Adam?" replied, "Oh, just like ither folk." The minister insisted on having a more special description. "Weel, naebody got onything by him, and mony ane lost."

A clergyman was once forced to say to his congregation, "Brethren who will persist in putting buttons into the collection boxes will please not hammer down their eyes, for while the process does not increase their value as coins, it does impair their usefulness as buttons." The admonition was effective.

An inebriate got into an omnibus and became very troublesome and annoying to the other passengers—so much so that it was proposed to eject him. But a genial and kind-hearted reverend doctor, who was also a passenger, interposed for him, and soothed him into good behaviour for the remainder of the journey. Before leaving, however, he scowled upon the occupants of the bus, and muttered some words of contempt; but he shook hands warmly with the doctor, and said: "Good day, my friend! I see you know what it is to be drunk."

ESSAY ON THE PERMISSIVE BILL.

[The late Mr. A. B. Stewart, of Ascog Hall, offered £20, in three prizes, for the three best essays on "The Permissive Bill: Arguments for and Against." The judges—Rev. Dr. Williamson, and Rev. Messrs. Macfarlane and Thomson—awarded the first prize of £10 to Mr. Hugh Thomson, letter-carrier, Rothesay. We have pleasure, by Mr. Thomson's permission, in presenting that essay to our readers. It is in contemplation to give the others.—ED. S. R.]

THAT the drinking customs of our country are fraught with evils is a statement requiring no proof; we have but to look around, and the state of society supplies us with abundant evidence of their baneful effects. Indeed, the evils flowing from them are so great that it has taxed the wisdom of our statesmen to devise laws for the proper conducting of the liquor traffic. Many schemes have been tried, and to-day we have still to deplore that drunkenness abounds in our midst—dragging many of our countrymen deep down in the social scale, and causing misery beyond the tongue of man to describe. Who can tell how much is implied in these two words, "Drunkard's Home?" Here we need summon no imaginary heart-rending scene to make the picture more gloomy than it really is. Facts are more strange than fiction, and sometimes far more appalling; and certainly were it possible to picture out all the evil resulting from the drinking customs of our country, it would be something awful to contemplate. Can nothing be done to stop intemperance, which has justly been termed our national sin? All good men deplore it, however much they may differ as to the means that ought to be used to put an end to its onward course. Many who advocate moral suasion are not so sure of the Permissive Bill. They look upon it as if it were a something not in keeping with the British constitution—an undue interference with personal liberty, a making of people sober by Act of Parliament, which they seem to think not at all practicable. Now, I admit that we cannot be too careful in framing our laws so that there may be the utmost freedom compatible with good government. I am of opinion the less the Legislature has to do with the private actions of the individual—albeit these actions do not hurt or infringe on the liberties of others—the better; but we cannot have good government unless to some extent an investment of what might be termed our rights is placed in the hands of Government to be used for the common good. The great aim of Government ought to be the welfare of all, not any particular section of the people; and whenever anything is found that has a tendency to cast a blight upon the nation, it then becomes a matter for the State to consider.

The drink traffic has been already under consideration, and has been found a most difficult subject to legislate upon. Our statesmen have been endeavouring to modify the evil. The trade being an exceptional one, demanded exceptional measures; exceptional measures have been passed, but still the evil remains. "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." If it is the nature of the drink to produce intemperance, so long, then, as the drink is upheld by the State, so long will it produce its effects upon the people. If these effects are good, let the drink traffic be untrammelled—why place it under restraint? If these effects are bad, take away the cause, and its effects must cease. If the Permissive Bill were passed, the power would then be placed in the hands of the people to determine whether or not intoxicating liquors should be sold in their midst; and surely they are best able to judge of their own wants. At present the people have not the power to prevent public-houses being planted in their midst. If a man gets his license, the community is not consulted on the matter; he opens his place of business, and strives to do as much trade as he possibly can. The people who fall victims to his trade are punished by the law for being drunk and incapable, while he is licensed to sell that very thing which, to the extent of his success in business, means an increase in the intemperate habits of the people within his influence.

According to the Permissive Bill, if two-thirds of the ratepayers in any place object to the sale of intoxicating liquors, their objection will be carried into effect. Now, two-thirds is not a bad majority. We all admit that the majority ought to have the ruling power. "Yes," says an objector, "but in a matter which concerns personal liberty it alters the case altogether. What right has any majority to dictate to me what I shall eat or drink or what I shall clothe myself in? Have I not a right to eat and drink and clothe myself according to my own pleasure?" My answer is—"You have a perfect right to do all these things according to your own mind so long as you do not injure others; but if in the gratifying of your own desires, you do an injury to the community, I say you have no right." I would go further and say no one has a right to injure himself or herself, far less others. The majority have no right to suffer from the doings of the minority, and, if they can remedy the evil, they are justified in doing so. Now, the Permissive Bill gives them an opportunity of doing so; it puts the power where it ought to be—that is, into the hands of the people.

That the drink traffic is at the root of a great deal of the crime done in the country must be well known to all who read what is to be found in the daily prints. Many eminent judges have given their testimony as to drink being the fruitful source of crime. Our prisons are a standing proof containing many witnesses that would not require to utter one single word; of them it might be truly said—but in a sad, sad sense—"They are living epistles known and read of all men." Now I say whatever leads to crime, directly or indirectly, is a matter for the State to deal with. Our laws should be of such a nature that they prevent stumbling-blocks being placed in the path of virtue. Good government ought to have an elevating effect, and whatever causes an opposite ought to be swept away. It is the duty of the State to see that no obstacle is placed in the way of righteous living. Not that I believe we can make people virtuous by Act of Parliament; but if that cannot be done, this at least can be accomplished—and ought to be accomplished—by the State: to see to the removal of all hindrances. Surely no one will deny that the drink traffic is a hindrance to the sobriety of the people. Now, soberness is a virtue, and, as society is constituted at present, one that is sorely tried. Thousands have fallen under the temptation, and thousands will continue to fall. That being the case, who needs to be told that one vice leads to another. Why, whoever falls a victim to intemperance generally goes from bad to worse. It is quite unnecessary to enumerate the black list. Alas! society is made painfully aware of their presence. Not only are our prisons filled with the victims of intemperance, but our lunatic asylums receive their full share of the wrecks caused directly or indirectly by the drink traffic. What of our poor-houses? Who can shut their eyes to the fact that a great deal of the extreme poverty in our midst is due entirely to the drinking customs. I dare not say that in all cases poverty is to be traced to this source, but this I will say that it is one of the most powerful currents in our midst, driving men and women the straightest and surest way to the poor-house. There they are lost sight of, and soon fill a pauper's grave; while many more are out in the busy world pursuing the same course—fitting themselves to occupy the same position. I say fitting, because it requires some preparation before the mind is in a suitable frame to submit to all the circumstances that surround a pauper's lot; for intemperance has a tendency to blunt all the finer feelings of our nature.

Now, these are grave charges against the drink traffic, but they are, alas! too true. Every day we live is adding fresh testimony to their truthfulness. Surely a traffic producing such fruits ought to be dealt with by the State accordingly. Humanity demands it—the prosperity of our country demands it. Some may ask, What of the revenue? I frankly admit that a large revenue goes to Government from the drink, but if the revenue cannot be supplied unless at the expense of our national degradation, then I say there must be something very far deficient in our economy. Let the revenue be placed on one hand, and the expenses that the country is involved in through crime and all the other evils accompanying the drinking customs of our country on the other hand. Let it also be remembered how much grain is annually destroyed in the making of the drink, and then let the balance be struck and see whether we are not, as a nation, losers through this traffic. Therefore, apart from moral considerations altogether—looking at it as a matter of profit and loss—the sooner this traffic is a thing of the past the better will it be for our national prosperity. Why, it has been estimated that in the year 1875 about 90,000,000 bushels of grain were destroyed in the making of intoxicating drinks. The food destroyed in our own country in the year 1875 has been put down at 70,000,000 bushels of grain, or within about 8,000,000 bushels of the quantity of wheat produced in Great Britain; and to make up for this great waste we must purchase all the more of our food from foreign countries—thus wasting our own means while enriching other lands. So that, looking at this question in the light of pounds, shillings, and pence, the sooner we rid ourselves of this traffic the better. I suppose the grain destroyed in 1875 would give us a fair idea of what was destroyed in 1879. Whatever has been the exact quantity I cannot say, but this I am sure of that it must have been enormous. Now, apart from the effects of the traffic upon the morals of the people, true economy makes it imperative that something be done, and that speedily, to put an end to the ravages caused by intemperance. At any rate there can be nothing more fair than to allow the ratepayers to have their mind on the matter, as they are the most interested in it; and as this is the main object of the Permissive Bill—to place the power into the hands of the ratepayers—I think the principle is quite in keeping with the British Constitution. But, however much the passing of such a bill might benefit the nation in material wealth, there are still higher considerations to be taken into account. The poet was right when he sung—

And what is good for an individual man must be good for a nation of men. The law of right is not lost in the multitude; our national sins bring national calamities. It is false policy that ignores the moral bearings of anything. Whatever is purchased at the expense of morality is bought at too dear a price; so that if the drink traffic enriched our coffers—which I believe it does not—yet if it be found an enemy to morality, it ought to be looked upon as an enemy to the State. We may boast of our material resources—and no nation should undervalue wealth—but the stability of the nation has a deeper foundation in human nature. It is the spirit of a man that alone can sustain him in the battle of life, and it is the spirit of a nation that must form its surest bulwark. If we degenerate in morality, it is the surest sign of our decay; whatever strikes at the morality of the nation strikes at the vitality of the nation. Our own poet, Robert Burns, breathed a true patriot's prayer when he penned these noble lines:—

“ O Scotia, my dear, my native soil,
For whom my warmest wish to Heaven is sent,
Long may thy hardy sons of rustic toil
Be blessed with health and peace and sweet content.

And, oh, may Heaven their simple lives prevent
From luxury's contagion weak and vile;
Then, howe'er crowns and coronets be rent,
A virtuous populace may rise the while,
And stand a wall of fire around their much-lov'd isle!”

Yes, it is the virtuous populace that makes the nation secure; and, as the Permissive Bill would give the people power to some extent in removing temptation, so that their lives may be preserved from “luxury's contagion weak and vile”—and, as the result, live nobler and purer lives—surely such a bill ought to receive the hearty support of all who love their country's weal. I know it may be said that such a bill would give rise to illicit traffic in drink; but no law is condemned simply because some would try to elude it. Let the penalty of the law be enforced on all offenders, and I have no doubt that the stigma that would follow the carrying out of the law would have a salutary effect. No one likes to be thought lawless; self-respect has a great power in preserving order in society, and there its influence would be felt. Let the law set its seal against the drink traffic, and it will receive such a shock that it will soon sicken and die. And because I believe the death of the liquor traffic would be the moral life and prosperity of society, I advocate the passing of the Permissive Bill. VOX POPULI, VOX DEI.

CHAPTER V.

A SHADOWED HOME.

ON the Saturday evening James Taylor went out to the Grange, taking Alice with him, as Mr. Templeton had desired. The residence of the brewer was a substantial mansion, standing in its own grounds, about three miles out of town. It was long since they had been together at Temple House, and there was a sore change on some of its inmates in the interval. They were ushered into the drawing room, which was occupied by Minnie alone. She was a slight, graceful girl, in the first blush of womanhood, with a sweet face, somewhat paler than it ought to be, and dark tender eyes, which expressed every thought and feeling of her loving heart. She greeted her friend Alice warmly, and extended her hand with shy courtesy to the brother. His eyes dwelt longer on her face than they need have done; perhaps he found it a pleasant study.

"Papa, and mamma, and Kate are in town to-night," she said, when the greetings were over.

"Fred will be in his own room, I fancy," and her face reddened slightly. "Just touch the bell, will you, Mr. Taylor, and I'll ask for Walter."

The servant who answered the ring said he had just gone out, but had not intended to go far, as he went out with a smoking cap on.

"He will be in directly, then," said Minnie Templeton. "He often takes a stroll in the gardens. He is an idle fellow, I can tell you; eighteen past, and can't make up his mind to what he means to do or be. Papa wishes him to go into the business, but, but"—she paused, and turned her face away.

"Is your mamma well, Alice?" The abrupt turn to the conversation brought up other topics, and they were talking merrily when the door opened, and a young man came in, attired in dressing gown and smoking cap. It was Fred; and as James Taylor rose to greet him he remembered Alice's words, and saw how true they were. He had been a handsome fellow once, he was a wreck now. His face was haggard and worn, his eyes dim and blood-shot; for since his home-coming he had taken drink daily, more than was good or even safe for him in his present state of health. There was plenty in the house, you see, and he was beyond the time when a simple remonstrance could deter him. Minnie blushed painfully, and half rose from her seat.

"Oh, Alice, is it you?" said Fred, languidly, and offered her a couple of fingers. "Ah, Taylor too, how do? It's a deuced long time since I saw you. Pretty as ever, Alice, I see, eh?"

"Fred, Fred, do go upstairs," said Minnie, in a low voice, full of shame and pain. "You are not fit to come to the drawing-room just now." Fred smiled that meaningless smile you see on the face of a man slightly intoxicated.

"Nice way for a fellow's sister to speak to him, eh, Taylor; you used to be sweet on Minnie once—worn off; eh, well, I don't believe in tying one's self down to one girl myself."

"Alice, will you come to the parlour?" said Minnie, desperately; and Alice gladly rising, both girls quitted the room.

"Oh, Alice, I think I shall die," said she, breaking down, and leaning on her friend's shoulder. "Scenes like that are daily occurrences in our house now. God only knows what will be the end of it; and Walter too. Oh Alice, darling, thank God every day of your life for your brother." Alice Taylor could only offer her loving sympathy, for what comfort could she give in a sorrow like this. Truly none.

Fred had followed the girls from the room, but had gone upstairs to his own, leaving the guest alone in the drawing-room. But ere long Walter returned to the house, and being told who had come, ran upstairs at once, to find James Taylor alone, looking over a book.

"Have they left you alone, my boy?" he asked, in his gay, boyish voice. "Too bad; where's the girls?"

"Fred came down, and they left the room," returned James quietly, and Walter understood.

There was a moment's silence. Then James Taylor rose, and laying his firm hand on the lad's shoulder, looked into his face with his grave earnest eyes.

"I am older than you, Walter, and I have known you all your life. When I saw you come in at the door just now, I wondered how long it would be before you looked as Fred did when he came in not long ago."

"Oh hang it, Taylor," said Walter ashamed. "Don't suggest anything so awful. I'm not going to turn like that, you know."

"Small beginnings lead to great things, Walter; and you must know how insidiously this fearful habit grows. Was Fred always like what he is now?"

The lad was silent, and moved away from the range of these penetrating eyes.

"Do you care for your mother and sisters, Walter?"

"Don't be a fool," was the quick retort, shewing how the question had gone home.

"If you had seen your sister's face to-night when Fred came in, you would think seriously about the matter."

"I've seen it scores of times; you needn't tell me. Do you suppose it hasn't cut me like a knife before to-day?"

"You might one day cause her to look like that. Be a man, Walter, and make your sisters proud of you instead of ashamed."

There was silence again, broken only by the tick of the timepiece on the mantel. How fraught with issues for weal or woe these moments were to Walter Templeton, only himself now. James Taylor waited and prayed, and drew a long breath of relief when Walter turned his face to him, his curls pushed back from his broad brow, his blue eyes shining with a steadfast purpose.

"From this moment, Taylor, I am a total abstainer. I will be a man, and free myself from this hateful habit. It is growing on me; but I am done with it for ever, so help me God."

"He will, Walter," said James Taylor, in deep heart-felt tones, and their hands met in a long clasp, the seal of the new bond between them. Much more was said which I have not the space to tell; and by-and-bye a servant appeared to say, Miss Taylor waited downstairs for her brother. Then both went to the parlour.

"How are you, Alice?" said Walter; and his sister, looking at him, wondered what was different about him. "Minnie, put on a shawl, and let us go down the avenue. It's a fine night." She very willingly obeyed. Walter walked on first with Alice, and the other two came behind. Minnie was quiet and sad, but James Taylor made an effort to speak.

"Miss Templeton, do you know what Walter did upstairs to-night?" he asked.

She started, and shook her head in the full light of the moon; he saw how pale the sweet face grew. She seemed to live in a constant dread.

"He made a firm resolution, took a solemn vow upon him to become a total abstainer from this night, and with God's help he will keep it, I know."

She lifted her face to his in sheer amazement, scarcely crediting what she heard. But there was truth in that grave honest face, and she put her hands before her face, sobbing in very joy.

"Oh, Mr. Taylor, you have done this—God bless and reward you; my poor thanks are nothing, but you have them from the very depths of a truly grateful heart."

"Nay, I have done nothing; Walter owes it to you, and he will tell you so; but, Minnie, that will not prevent me asking a reward some day. Will you listen when I do?"

He bent from his tall height, and looked into the sweet face, but it was hidden still, and her eyes drooping beneath his gaze. But he guessed that when he asked his reward would not be denied him.

CHAPTER VI.

THE OLD OLD STORY.

ALICE TAYLOR was alone in the house, sitting at the drawing-room fire, her hands idly clasped in her lap, her grey eyes fixed dreamily on the fire. There was a change in her these past few days; she seemed to have grown gentler and kinder, and the sharp irritable temper the servants had been wont to fear, seemed to have been laid aside; they spoke of it among themselves wonderingly, not guessing their young mistress was learning the "beauty of holiness," and trying with all her might to imitate the Master she loved, and had vowed to serve. But so it was. The shadows of the early winter twilight were changing to darkness in the room, when a knock came to the door and Mary entered, her pretty face wearing a slight frown.

"Please, ma'am, here's that little ragged child come again. That's the worst of taking any notice of them, they'd never be done botherin'."

"Bring her up here, Mary, if you please," said Alice gently.

"La, ma'am, you don't mean it," exclaimed the girl in extreme surprise.

"A pretty object she'd be in a drawing-room, Miss Alice; why, she's just a mess of rags. The kitchen's good enough, I should say, if she must come in."

Mary was a good servant, and considered herself privileged to make suggestions when she pleased. But her mistress turned her head, and repeated quietly.

"Bring her up here to me, Mary, if you please."

Then Mary tossed her head and went to obey; but she did not forget to administer a few sharp words to the shrinking child as she ushered her upstairs. She pushed her into the room, and shutting the door, proceeded in great indignation to the kitchen. Alice rose, and came forward, smiling reassuringly at Jennie, who stood at the door in a maze of wonder and awe. She had never seen a place like this even in her dreams.

"I thought you had forgotten to come, Jennie," said the young lady. "What has kept you so long?"

"Please, mem, my mither wadna let me," said Jennie, finding her voice. "But she was that drunk the day that she could dae naething but sleep, so I ran oot."

Alice shivered. It was an awful thing to hear this young child speak in such a matter-of-fact manner about her mother's degradation; but what else could be expected of her. The thing was a daily occurrence. Poor Jennie lived in the very midst of the black work drink makes; it was according to nature's law that she should grow accustomed to it and regard it lightly. But it seemed none the less horrible to Alice Taylor on that account. She drew a stool close to the fire, and bidding the child sit down, resumed her own seat. She saw then, that Jennie had done her best to make herself neat and clean to pay her visit, and though the result was not very great, she honoured her for it. She was a fair, pretty child, but delicate looking; nay, more, it was evident she was wasting away. Her eyes looked out from great hollows, and her cheeks were wan and shrunken. She would cough sometimes too, and hold her hand to her side as if she felt pain. Alice Taylor's heart bled for her.

"Do you feel well, Jennie?" she felt impelled to ask.

"Whiles," answered the child. "The noo I'm fine, but oot wi' the papers i' the cauld I feel like to dee. What's deein', ma'am? I ken they bury ye i' the kirk-yard, but is that a'?"

"No, Jennie, my child, that's not all." Jennie lifted her eyes to Alice's face, mutely asking what else there was.

"Did you never hear of heaven, Jennie?"

Jennie nodded.

"I aince went tae the mission schule wi' Katie Brown, an' there was a gentleman tellin' aboot a braw place abune the sky, whaur fock gaed if they were guid. I dinna mind muckle o't, but I aye mind that he said there was na sorrow, nor cauld, nor hunger, nor ony o' thae things. That's whaur I'd like to gang.

But, ye see, I dipna ken hoo tae get; mebbe ye can tell me."

A prayer rose up from Alice Taylor's heart, that she might be able to tell the old story simply, and make the way to heaven plain and easy for this poor little seeking waif.

"Listen, Jennie," she said, low and earnestly. "Long, long ago, hundreds of years before you or I were born, the world was so wicked that God wanted to destroy it altogether. Then His Son, Jesus Christ, living up there in happy heaven, said he would come to the world and give himself for the wicked people in it that they might be saved from God's anger. So he came, Jennie, and went about healing the sick, and comforting all sorrowful people, till wicked men took him and nailed him to a cross, where he died so that God might forgive all people's sins." She paused a moment, her own eyes full, for Jennie's were running with tears.

"What mair, mem," she asked, breathlessly.

"Then Jesus went up to heaven again, where he lives now; and because he once died for us, every one of us may go to that beautiful heaven if we will only believe he died for our sins, and if we will only love him with all our hearts—that is all he asks."

"Did he dee for me, ma'am?" fell with intense eagerness from Jennie's parted lips.

"Yes, for you, Jennie," and Alice laid her hands on the child's shoulder to enforce her words; "and if you believe and love him he will take you to heaven when you die, to live happy with the angels for ever, and feel no cold, nor hunger, nor weariness any more; there are none of these things there, Jennie."

"But hoo am I to ken him an' lo'e him, ma'am; I canna see him; an' hoo am I tae believe he'll dae a' that?"

"When I told you to come here, Jennie, that I would be waiting to see you, did you not believe it? and though you have not seen me since then, did you not feel quite sure I would be here, and would be glad to see you when you came?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"It is just so with Jesus, Jennie. He tells us in the Bible he is waiting for us, and is longing for us to love him. Can't you love this great friend, Jennie, although you cannot see him?"

"Oh yes, I could, ma'am, but—but I'm sic a puir ragged lassie he'll no see me among a' the rest."

"He sees every one, Jennie, no matter how small, or poor, or miserable. In his own book he says 'Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' You will be glad to go by-and-bye, Jennie."

"If I was sure he wad let me in, mem, I'd ask him tae tak' me noo; it maun be a better place than Blair's Close; an' I'm that miserable whiles, mem, I could greet ma een oot. Ye see, mither drinks."

Looking at the child's face, looking old, and pale, and worn in the fading light, Alice Taylor thought pitifully that it would not be long before she was called away to a better home than the one she knew now.

"Just kneel down, Jennie," she said, "and we will ask the kind Jesus to bless you, and make you one of his own by-and-bye."

The child knelt down wonderingly, and Alice uttered a few simple words of prayer, which Jennie understood and felt with all her heart. Neither knew that the door had opened very softly, nor that James Taylor had turned away swiftly, noiselessly closing it again, nor that his eyes had grown dim as he looked.

"If your mother will give you to me, Jennie, and I think she will," said Alice, by-and-bye, "will you come, my dear, and when the sunny days come I shall take you away to the seaside, where you will grow strong and well again?"

"If she will, ma'am," said the child, a look of strange deep delight on her face. "I'll gang ony gate, dae anything ye want."

"We will see about it immediately," said Alice cheerily. "Now, come downstairs and I shall get you some tea. I have been making a new dress for you, Jennie, but it is not quite done; you will get it next time you come.

"Yes, ma'am," answered Jennie, her eyes speaking the gratitude her lips could not utter.

About an hour later, after being warmly fed and cheered, Jennie went away. Alice herself shewed her the way out, and, impelled by the strange wistfulness in the child's uplifted eyes, bent her head and kissed her on the brow.

"Good night, Jennie; next Monday afternoon at three your dress will be done, come for it; but before that I shall come and see your mother about giving you to me."

Then she went in and shut the door. Nobody saw Jennie press her lips to the handle which Alice's fingers had touched the moment before, nor heard the sob which broke from her as she ran quickly down the steps and away home.

"She is a dear child that, James," said Alice to her brother that night. "I am going up to that mother of hers, and offer her some money if she will give her to me. She is very ill, James, I don't think she will see the winter out, and I should like to make her last days easier than her life has been."

"God will bless you for it, Alice," was the earnest answer. "These neglected little ones are precious in his sight, and will be recompensed, I doubt not, by-and-bye, for the heavy cross they have borne on earth."

DR. RICHARDSON'S HISTORIC LANDMARKS.

In a recent lecture this gentleman points to twenty-one landmarks, salient points, in which great advance has been made in relation to the education of all classes on temperance.

The first point is the belief of people that when they bought liquor it was quite apart from water. The gentleman would tell "it was champagne at £7 per dozen," the poor say "this is not water but good malt and hops"—"the hotter the liquor the farthest removed from water." They all seemed to forget that in their beer there was 90 to 95 per cent. of water, in their wine from 12 to 42 per cent, in their spirits 50 per cent. of water, while the fact that the people are beginning to realise is that they are unwittingly, and in a very unfortunate way, water buyers and water drinkers.

The second point is the nature of alcohol. It was believed once that alcohol was the only thing of its kind, but now we are learning that there is a large family of alcohols; some the offspring of wood, wheat, potato, &c., and alcohol, instead of coming from molasses, malt, &c., might have come from quite another source.

The third point is that we are as a nation beginning to doubt that alcohol is a food. Foods are water which make up 75 per cent. of the mass of the body—substances like albumen, egg, cheese, meats, &c., substances that burn in the body like fat, oil, starch, and sugar. Now alcohol has been proved not to belong to water, not to nourish like albuminous substances, and instead of heating it lowers temperature and prevents the creation of the substances which come from the burning of the body. Indeed, it is no more food than chloroform or ether.

The fourth point. We have imbued many in the community with the idea that there must be a limit to drink. Formerly men never thought of a limit, now you hear them, when pleading for moderation, saying, "you may take a little if you do not exceed the physiological quantity." A gentleman declared when he went out hunting or to parties, he only took a spoonful of spirit. There are many such waiting till the cause gains strength and power, when they will declare themselves on our side.

The fifth point is this. People twenty-one years ago believed that they could with drink do more work than without it. Science showed that it was perfectly impossible that that which did not build up the tissues of the body, did not supply water, warmth, or vitality to the body, could impart strength to it. Now what are the facts. All men who are going into training for rowing, racing, or long walks, firing, &c., discover the advantage they get if they altogether abstain from the use of this degrading and debasing physical agent.

The sixth point. I remember the time when it was considered necessary to write at night that a man must prime himself with a glass of wine or spirit. Now we are able to show that nothing is so injurious to mental work and capacity as for anyone to lace himself up with strong drink, under the idea that he is assisting himself.

The seventh point. It was once believed that to meet the vicissitudes of cold and of heat, it was necessary that a certain amount of alcohol should be taken. Our ships went out to the Arctic regions charged with liquor to assist the men, and our soldiers went out to India with spirit rations. Look at the extreme absurdity of this practice. If the men who went due north had this alcohol to warm them, the men who went to tropical climes could not want it for this. We now know that those men who have been total abstainers have lived best, worked hardest, suffered least, and come home soundest. In the tropics those who have taken least have fought the hardest battles and made the best marches, and that those who have taken none at all have been better off still.

The eighth point. Twenty-one years ago it was supposed that persons could live for a certain length of time upon alcohol, and one of the hardest nuts we had to crack was this one. It was very common to give to people, weak and feeble, wine and strong drink, and they lived upon it, it was thought, though it was not the alcohol but the water that sustained them. The person who takes a rusk with wine or champagne, does not live on the alcohol, but on the rusk and water, and he could live on himself for many days if you were to supply him with water only. Take the Welsh miners. They lived away from nourishment, light, and alcohol, merely living on water flowing near them. If they had had an ounce of alcohol, all those opposed to us would have cried "behold what a small quantity of alcohol has done." But these men survived many days on water, and came out of their imprisonment almost unscathed. All who are said to have lived on alcohol have lived on the water in spite of the alcohol.

The ninth point. Then alcohol was the grand panacea in all diseases. Now you will find wherever you go that the treatment of disease by drink has passed into oblivion.

The tenth point. Then we attributed to alcohol but little as a cause of disease. There was gin-drinker's liver, delirium tremens, mania potu or dipsomania. Now you find that alcohol is an adjective in disease as alcoholic consumption. We did not know then that it was from the influence of this one particular agent that all this vast mass of disease was springing. A professional brother has even said, that in walking his hospital he has been led to the conclusion that sixty to seventy of the cases of disease which came there, were cases of disease brought about either directly or indirectly by this one agent.

The eleventh point. We have known always that when a man or woman sat down to table and began to take wine too freely, there is a stage of excitement, another stage of more excitement, another stage of wasted excitement, and coldness and pallor, or darkness of the face, and a final stage when the body lies helpless, or, as we should call it, dead-drunk. That was known as the first effects of alcohol. What do we now learn? We know that the slow insidious effect of alcohol upon persons taking it day by day, year by year, at last gives us great populations who, not being intoxicated in this special or acute form, are still its victims in the same way. These can take the physiological quantity which brings them to the first stage, and then numbers begin rather early in the day, and go from bar to bar and place to place, and are perpetually in the second stage; and others, who go on day by day and never go to bed thoroughly sober, are in the third stage; and when we go into our asylums and hospitals we find the victims of general paralysis, who are unable to help themselves, who are practically speechless and practically dead-drunk from the permanent use of this, because they have advanced into the fourth stage, in which they are ready and ripe to drop into the grave.

The twelfth point. Twenty-one years ago our insurance companies were blind to the fact of short lives through drink, but now so keen are they on this question of the effect of drink upon those that seek insurance, that on those that drink they put an extra tariff, and the question asked by them is the question of sobriety, for they know that there is nothing so fatal in a general way, or so likely to lead, not simply to disease from the agent itself, but springing up and intensifying by its employment other diseases, as the free use of this particular destructive national enemy.

Thirteenth point. Twenty-one years ago we never conceived it possible that the mortality from the use of this agent should be so great. Dr. Farr estimates that forty to fifty thousand a year die from what he calls "tippling." His returns showed this startling fact, that there were variations from 70 to 130, 100 being the standard. If the whole of the occupations examined had a mean mortality of 100, then the most favourable lives went up to 70, and the least favourable came down to something considerably over 100. We find that when we get to one occupation we get to the lowest but one. Among those engaged in the sale of spirits we find 138 deaths to the hundred to the mean of the population. The grocers, who, before they had the license to sell spirits, were standing in a most favourable place in the scale, 86 to 100, since they have begun to sell drink, have begun to go down and show a higher mortality. Then you see what an important point we have scored—that just in proportion as this agent is approached by the multitude who deal with it, just in proportion does the vast multitude begin to die with the rest of its fellows.

Fourteenth point. Then as regards insanity. Exactly in the same way as the body ceases to exert its proper power under this agent, so the mind begins to go. Twenty years ago this phase of the question was not under discussion. It is generally admitted that there is a very great amount of insanity produced by drink indirectly and directly. Dr. Edgar Shephard declares that 40 per cent. of the persons who come to Colney Hatch Asylum are brought there by the direct and indirect effects of the drink. The Royal Commissioners say that the direct effects are represented by 14 per cent. Dr. Masson would put the results of insanity from drink far higher than Dr. Shephard, and would say that all ranks and classes are its victims.

Fifteenth point. Twenty-one years ago we had no notion of heredity in drink. We know that the inebriety of parents should be regarded as one predisposing cause of the insanity in children. The principle cause is the inebriety of the parents—92 of 116 cases in our asylums have such a parentage. Think of the important solemn truth, that you unwittingly, by indulging in this one particular agent, may be the progenitor of abuse in another generation, which should be affected in a similar manner, and that that may go on for age upon age, always with the still continued increase of the same form of disease, intensified, perchance, and multiplied perhaps a thousand and a millionfold. Here, like as a forest may begin from the implantation of a single plant, so from the beginning of the taking of this agent the mischief may progress from generation to generation until at last, if such efforts as ours are not put forth, this world might indeed—I am using the words of truth and soberness—become one gigantic inebriate asylum.

Sixteenth point. We have now brought out in a manner never before attempted, the relationship of alcohol to crime. Our judges are now alive to this subject, and this very day Justice Kay says judicially, "I know by my experience that 50 per cent. of the crime of the kingdom springs from this cause." In the Medical Temperance Association, over which I preside, we were discussing the question of the treatment of dipsomania. We were all of this mind, that one of the most diagnostic marks of drink craving, that which distinguishes it as a mental characteristic from all other things, is, that the drink craver is always a falsehood-teller, that there is no actual case where a person affected with the drinkcraving has been known to speak the truth, that we never can believe a word they say, and many of us are of opinion that the tendency to untruthfulness descends to the offspring of those people. See how solemnly strange it is that a physical agent should be taken into the body which should, after a time, so destroy all moral sense of right and wrong of responsibility that the very foundation of morality is actually so changed that the person becomes as it were naturally and habitually the child and representative of falsehood. These are facts which were not known twenty years ago, and which must in the end tell largely, as they are made known, in the promotion of our cause.

Seventeenth point. We have declared that alcohol prepared and taken on a large scale is a source of starvation—that to take large quantities of this is to starve. All who have depicted drunkenness have connected it with want and penury. We get beyond that. We see the nations that are going to suffer severely are nations that destroy the produce which is given to them for the supply of the natural wants, by appropriating it to unnatural productions. For instance look at Ireland. One of my friends has brought me a book on the culture of land in Ireland, and has shown that 75 per cent. of the cereal produce of the country goes for the production of one grain—barley, which goes in its turn for the production of one destructive drink—whisky. Let us take that to our minds, and that is only one illustration of which many more could be given; but we have here this broad fact before us, that directly we begin to take food for a false purpose we take from ourselves that which nature wishes us to have, and starvation, misery, and penury are the natural results.

Eighteenth point. Twenty-one years ago it was common to say, "What the total abstainers say is right enough, but we are accustomed to the use of strong drinks, and are unable to leave them off; it is dangerous to leave them off. You may not break lightly a habit, you must be moderate." On that point we have a grand experiment going on in our model prisons, we know that those unfortunates who are locked up are locked up entirely from this agent. When my mind became turned towards the action of alcohol upon the body, I said, "Here is a crucial test about the leaving off." I inquired of all the prisons, "Do you let these people down drop by drop, and gradually reduce it?" "No," I found was the response. As the prison door closes, the tap closes, so far as they are concerned. Then I asked, "Do they suffer in any way?" The answer was "Never." So wherever I made inquiry into prison discipline of life, I have never once found an instance where it could be shown that the sudden leaving off of their drink by these people was a cause of any disease or any kind of defect whatsoever. In America and Canada we have had some experience. Dr. Buck has recently published some experiments he has conducted. In six hundred cases he has removed suddenly strong drink, and he says his asylum was never in better condition, and that he has never had the least occasion to suppose that the slightest injury was inflicted. For the cause of the moral side of this question, this is a fact of supreme moment for you to bear in mind.

Nineteenth point. Historians now are beginning to look up and say "There were great wars at various times—how did they spring up? Who were the men that led them?" They look at those great wars that led to the American Revolution. Who were the statesmen? Why they were the statesmen who were always in wine. Look at the great riots and troubles that have arisen. What was their origin? Wine and strong drink. Even Alexander the Great is spoken of as "Alexander the drunkard," and it is known that he died intoxicated. Historians will soon be able to pick from the history of the past that which was sober and that which was drunken in the history of mankind and nations.

Twentieth point. We have scored a point in legislation. Twenty-one years ago no statesman would have dared to have thought of legislation as to abolishing the English Juggernaut. On the contrary, he would let our people roll under its wheels and be killed wholesale, and think nothing about it; but now it is the ambition of statesmen to lead the van, and by-and-by Sir Wilfrid Lawson will have more compeers, perhaps, were it not that his heart was as sound as his head.

Twenty-first point. Lastly, we have given up the notion pretty generally—those who are men of science and thought—of alcohol as a necessity. That general expression of alcohol as a necessity has passed from our minds by the accumulated evidence derived from so many sources. We speak now of this as a plague, and we say it produces fever, and it kills. We speak of this as a pestilence, for we say that it infects and spreads and devastates. Twenty-one years ago we used to hear in our churches the ministers saying, "From plague, pestilence, and famine, from battle and murder, and from sudden death," and we used to hear the congregation give the response, "Good Lord deliver us." Now, by the knowledge we have, we say yes, and plague, and pestilence, and famine, battle, murder and sudden death are all more or less linked up with this one agent; and we declare that if we could say, and not only say, but ensure ourselves that we were delivered from this one agent, then the rest of our deliverance were indeed at hand.

THE GREAT MEETING IN EDINBURGH.

(To the Editor of the "Social Reformer.")

Sir,—Permit me through your columns to thank the many willing workers in the temperance societies and Good Templar lodges in Edinburgh, Leith, and Midlothian, who so nobly aided in the arrangements for the above meeting in U.P. Hall, Edinburgh, on Monday, 12th ult. The order and comfort of all concerned, as well as the general arrangements, were admirably carried out, which could not have been accomplished but for the kindness and energetic assistance of those named.

As to the meeting itself, the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have never had such an influential platform, and as for the speaking there was the right ring all through; no faltering in the demand; no trimming with the enemy, but a demand for the entire overthrow of the traffic by the will of the people. The audience numbered over 3500, and a glance showed that it was composed of the very best and most influential classes in Edinburgh. Judges, Sheriffs, Magistrates, Town Councillors, lawyers, ministers of all religious denominations, Professors from the Universities and denominational Colleges, leading merchants, and a large proportion of our noble working classes, and yet hundreds had to be turned away from the doors. The feeling and enthusiasm that pervaded the meeting was most affecting—all apparently in downright earnest, and this, next to the progress and success of the Association, I attribute largely to the glorious work being carried on in Edinburgh at present by these godly men Messrs. Moody and Sankey. The audiences they are getting at all hours of the day, and in the evening, surpasses anything ever witnessed in Edinburgh, and great and mighty good is being done. They never miss an opportunity of showing that drink is the greatest obstacle to conversion of the soul to God, and to the adoption of a Christian life; and not only do they urge the salvation of the drunkard, but it is not unfrequently that we hear from their lips as well as from many others in prayer and in the addresses, "God have mercy on the moderate drinker, the drink maker and seller; and Good Lord, remove this terrible curse, this awful temptation from the land."

I have felt it my duty to throw in my energies with this great work, so far as my time will allow, and I can honestly say it has not only been refreshing to me personally, but it has inspired many to more earnest work who are deeply interested in the object of our Association, I mean "The suppression of the liquor traffic." One thing all should feel deeply grateful for in connection with our great meeting, is this, that Mr. Moody waived his public meeting on Monday, the 12th, and only held a private meeting for the anxious enquirers, while Mr. Sankey and a host of the Christian workers attended our meeting. This act of kindness will long be gratefully remembered, for to it I am convinced much of the success which attended the Edinburgh meeting was due, all admitting that it was the most thorough, earnest, and powerful meeting ever held here. The singing of the Fountainbridge E.U. Church choir, admirably led by Mr. Steel, was also most refreshing, and on the whole it was the most memorable, soul stirring prohibitory gathering ever seen in Edinburgh. May the work now going on here by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and the grand appearance made by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., and others at the recent meeting, inspire all true hearts in the south-eastern district of Scotland with new hope, new energy, and increased determination to labour for the emancipation of our dear country as the chief end of our existence.—I am, &c., J. H. WATERSTON.

CANADIAN NEWS.

SIR,—You will be pleased to read of the action taken by the Church of England Synod of the diocese of Toronto, during its recent session, for the formation of a diocesan Temperance Society on the same basis as the Church of England Temperance Society in the mother country. After a discussion in which some Churchmen excused past inaction by accusing us poor abstainers of various sins, errors, and misdemeanours, the resolution was unanimously adopted, and a committee appointed with instructions to proceed with the work of organisation at once. It may be noted that the assistance of the total abstainers is not refused, nor even discouraged, notwithstanding their former "evil courses." Indeed, they are still in the fore-front of the battle, and it is the non-abstainers who are offering aid in carrying on the work which the "zealous" section has hitherto been left to do alone. We will not be inclined to cast any reflections upon the past apathy of our new allies, but endeavour to bring them altogether into the safe path of "look not upon strong drink."

G. H. HALE.

[We are pleased to see the Church moving, however slowly, but we should have liked better that she had planted her standard on the rock of abstinence than on the iron and clay of abstinence with "moderation."—Ed. S. R.]

The six governors of New England are all total abstainers, and yet some persons believe that the Maine Law is a failure.

We understand that ex-Bailie Lewis' new book "The Drink Problem," is meeting with a favourable sale. The hon. member for Edinburgh, T. R. Buchanan, Esq., M.P., at the great demonstration of the 12th ult. referred to it as a remarkable book, and the audience cheered the reference.

BARRHEAD—BAZAAR.—A grand bazaar in aid of funds for the erection of a Good Templar hall was held in the Public Hall on the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd ult. The bazaar was opened on the 1st by Sir William Collins and Rev. W. Clark, on the 2nd by Rev. J. A. Johnston and Rev. William Young, and on the 3rd by ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., Rev. Thomas Buchanan, and ex-Provost Dick. The total receipts for the three days was £128. Those engaged are gratified with their success. There is about £50 worth of goods left over for a supplementary bazaar. The committee were greatly indebted to the ladies, to the choir, and its leader, Mr. W. Patrick, and also Messrs. Cochran, Brown & Cox, for their services. It is the intention of the committee to commence the erection of the proposed hall immediately.

THE FUNDS.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

JANUARY, 1882.

ALLIANCE DEPUTATION.

MANY of our readers will be glad to learn that the Rev. William Barker, Queen's Chaplain, Isle of Wight, will make a short tour in Scotland on behalf of the United Kingdom Alliance. The dates will be Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th January. We learn that it is likely that he may visit Ayr, Port-Glasgow, Perth, and Portobello, but nothing certain is known. Many of our friends will share our regret that his stay should be so brief.

* * We have been obliged to leave over several interesting papers, reports, &c., although we give two supplements this month.

With our present number we present every reader of the Social Reformer as a New-Year supplement a copy of our New-Year tract for 1882, written by Rev. Professor Kirk, Edinburgh. We will be glad of further orders for quantities of this highly appreciated tract. Price 10s. per thousand, exclusive of carriage, or 1s. per hundred, 1s. 5d. post free.

A Happy New-Year to all our readers, and many of them! At so hallowed and gracious a time we rejoice to think we have the opportunity of mingling our good wishes with theirs for all who co-operate for the deliverance of our country from an avowed and terrible injustice. Standing, as we do, like Janus on the confines of two worlds, the world of the past and that of the future, we can heartily rejoice at the fruits of patient toil harvested in the field of prohibition in the one, and look forward hopefully and confidently to the fruition which will await the true-hearted toilers in the other. Truly the little has become a thousand. Time was when the permissive prohibitionists were met with the cry that they were wrong. But this cry came from the ignorant who had never really enquired either into their grievance or their remedy; from those who sympathize too little with the common people ever to wish to broaden their liberties; from those that shrink from the "active service" enjoined on all true reformers, and from the prophets who declared that they would never gain the end they had in view while those they laboured to have entrusted with power of self-protection were themselves contented with their slavery. But these reformers feeling themselves in the right, supported by the evidences which history, science, and experience supplied, and commending themselves to the Almighty Being who strengthens and supports those that enter upon the mission of defeating the oppressor and freeing the oppressed, went forth to wage a war of extermination against the colossal wrong of the liquor traffic. They went forth undauntedly, although the sympathies, habits, and interests of those they sought to benefit were seemingly arrayed against them, and at such a season, when wise men take a retrospective view, the question may be asked, how have they sped? By patient continuance in well-doing they have gained the sympathies of the good, and enlisted so many interests already in their favour, that their natural enemies, the publicans, begin to seriously realize their danger, and apprehend the end of the legal protection which has enabled them to reap enormous wealth from the demoralization and misery of the community. Although 1881 has passed without witnessing the destruction of the drink interest, yet it will be memorable from the rapid advance made by the Scottish prohibitory agitation, and it has seen the people more determined than ever to have a potent say in what concerns the existence of the liquor traffic, and their Parliamentary representatives mustering an overwhelming majority in favour of the speedy introduction by the Government of effective measures directed against the existence of that system: measures not on the old imperial lines, so inadequate and unsatisfactory, but measures framed to leave the responsibility of its future entirely to the ratepayers. There is at this moment a serious danger looming ahead—the danger of accepting the indirect power of a Board to the direct power of a veto—whether that Board is called local, county, or licensing. This is the step over which they will fall, or which they must overleap, for it lies directly in their way. They will stumble if they are satisfied with any other kind of power than a direct suppressive veto at the ballot box, and they will stumble heavily if they do not make a determined resistance against any kind of Licensing Board for Scotland. Let them make the year that has dawned upon them memorable by the persistency and unity of their efforts to constrain the Government to do them justice, along with the sister kingdoms, by the settlement of this question on local option lines, or by making Scotland a prohibitive area, and so test the virtues of genuine local option. As it appears more and more evident that this is their attitude, and that they are resolved to maintain it, they will induce some member of Parliament for Scotland to place himself at their head to enable them to carry their demand in the House of Commons itself. Let him be satisfied of their determination to decline all compromises, as the country has been satisfied with their energy and sagacity, and he will not hesitate to place himself in the van of the Scottish prohibitory army. Such a leader, warmly supported by growing numbers and qualified by wisdom and statesmanship, will draw around him those who see in the removal of the liquor traffic the indispensable condition of the progress and elevation of the Scottish people. Let us be ripe for action at any moment, and in this way we will best secure the fulfilment of the wish that meets us on the threshold of the new year, "A Happy New-Year and many returns."

Since we last noticed Mr. John Paton's operations, he has addressed three meetings in Glasgow, two meetings in Rothesay, two meetings in Grangemouth, and one meeting in Stonehouse, New Mains, Kilbarchan, Paisley, Kilmalcolm, Milngavie, Pollokshaws, Troon, and Leith. The attendance has been most encouraging, and his lectures fully appreciated. When about leaving Troon, he had a serious attack of inflammation, which, we are glad to learn, yielded to prompt and vigorous measures, so that we are glad to be able to state that he is now quite well. After a brief holiday, he leaves for the North of England, and then goes across to Ireland for some time.

By the time that this number of the Social Reformer is in the hands of our readers, the Annual Report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will most likely be in the hands of the subscribers to that Association. We always hail its appearance with satisfaction, and after we pause to first enjoy the same pleasure of seeing ourselves down in its subscription list, as those have who see themselves in print, we turn over its pages. The Office-bearers having been first scanned, the Report itself carefully perused, the Treasurer's Abstract pondered over, the several pages of valuable information duly laid to heart, we come upon the Subscription List. From it we gather a number of, shall we say striking facts? The Association was supported by—1st, the usual subsidy from the United Kingdom Alliance; 2nd, by 5,695 subscribers; 3rd, by 135 societies. The income from subscriptions alone is £1,854 6s, which is £154 10s. 6d. per calendar month, or £5 1s. 7d. per day. We find that in 1879-80 the Association had a monthly income of £148 18s. 1d.; in 1880-81 it was £154 10s. 6d.; then the daily income was £4 18s. 1d., in 1880-81 it is £5 1s. 7d. In the former year there was a special donation of £100, so that the ordinary funds of the Association have made most encouraging progress, although the increase per month be only £5 12s. 5d., and 3s. 6d. per day. Now that prosperous times are in the ascendant, may not all true friends of prohibition not only earnestly desire a large increase of subscriptions to the funds, but cordially co-operate with the Executive in bringing that increase to pass.

Continuing our investigations further, we find that two friends subscribed £20 and upwards, 8 from £10 to £20, 23 from £5 to £10, 60 from £2 to £5, 229 from £1 to £2, 251 from 10s. to £1, 701 from 5s. to 10s., 1,942 from 2s. 6d. to 5s., and 2,469 from 1s. to 2s. 6d. 678 paid 5s., 1,816 paid 2s. 6d., and 1,616 paid 1s. Under all the headings but the first and the last there is an encouraging increase. We see also that 135 societies subscribed to the Association the sum of £83 19s. 9d., or on the average 12s. 5d. each. Then, when we take up the subscribers, we find that the average sum they give is within a fraction of 5s. each. Last year, in analyzing the report, we expressed a hope that many friends, in looking over our figures, would make an effort to rise from the lower class of subscription to a higher. We have reason to know that many have kindly taken our hint and done so. We hope that many more will graduate, and from being subscribers of to them a merely nominal sum, will show a more generous liberality to the Association. The real strength of the Association does not lie in its advocates or officials, however worthy these are, and we cannot here sufficiently express our high estimate of their worth, but in the amount of resources at its disposal. It may be surrounded by the best of talent, but without the means to bear expenses of meetings, deputations, memorials, &c., these are of little avail. The funds are the steam, and we believe that the Association has never yet been driven at "full speed." We are among those that gratefully appreciate its energy, and have reason to laud its vigorous and so far successful efforts, but we entertain a firm belief that if the income were but doubled, that its efficiency, and its efforts, and the range of its operation would be far more than doubly manifest. Within the means allowed, it has every reason to be satisfied with the past. The only reason for regret we have is that the Executive of an institution with such a very satisfactory report should ever have any financial anxieties at all.

During the past month the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has been pushing its operations with great vigour and success. There were conferences in Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Irvine, Renfrew, and Hamilton. These conferences have been highly encouraging, much practical suggestion being under discussion which has gone to sustain the course being pursued by the Executive. These conferences were followed, with one exception, by public meetings. The most successful was the magnificent demonstration in Edinburgh. It was one certainly worthy of any cause but especially one the object of which is to exterminate the liquor traffic. We refer our readers to the very ample report we give of the proceedings and to the letter of the district superintendent of the Association, Mr. Waterston. The other meetings were of a highly encouraging nature, and as from them the resolutions adopted go to the members of the Government most nearly concerned with the liquor traffic, it is hardly possible to estimate the good that will follow these gatherings. The ordinary agitation has been steadily maintained. It being the custom at this season for ministers to deliver a sermon on temperance in view of the Christmas and New Year's festivities, the Executive were fortunate in securing the services of Rev. R. J. Lynd of Belfast to deliver a sermon in Glasgow, which was very largely attended. The arrangements for the New Year contemplate equally vigorous operations, and we shall have pleasure in reporting on these as they occur. The Association is at present doing most effective work otherwise. Indeed, all have long been of opinion that the efforts on which silence sets her inflexible seal are those that, in the long run, are among the mightiest for the pulling down of the stronghold of the liquor traffic.

From that indiscrimination of distribution which is so marked a feature of the commercial system we have received a copy of a little tractate on "How Scotch whisky is made;" of course it was not intended for us. It is well written; indeed in its crisp epigrammatic style will be found its danger. The writer sings the praises of whisky to the disparagement of all other members of the alcoholic family, he roams through the literature of all lands to dress out his favourite beverage, and even Samuel Johnston is brought in to show its power in softening rugged human nature; the butcher Cumberland is held up as quaffing it after Culloden, we are left to suppose that it was to drown his remorse, and the muse of Professor Blackie is said to need a lift in its flights from Oban whisky. All this seems strange until we glance at the writer's name Strephon, when all is clear. Strephon is the name of some Romeo of Arcadia, and the modern incumbent of the title has all the vices of his Arcadian prototype. He raves as wildly about the object of his devotion as stock lovers do, and some of his phrases induce us to believe that he has pilfered them from rings. When the tinsel is torn from his idol how ghastly its nature, how fearful its operations, how terrible its history! Notwithstanding the praises bestowed upon whisky, we manage to get glimpses of truth. Here we learn that "the age of port has passed. It has been succeeded by the age of whisky. We have grown suspicious of wines because they are brandied, while the highest authorities unite in opinion that beer is a beverage that should be seldom drunk after a man is over forty. Scotch whisky is the tittle most recommended by the medical profession. There is whisky—and whisky." And the public analyst of the City of Glasgow is pressed in to testify to the supreme excellence of the Oban produce. At the Oban distillery, "too small to live in and too large to hang on a watch chain," the mountain dew comes in at one door straight from the hills and goes out at the other door whisky. "The water comes down from moss and mountain vitalized with the zone of the hills fragrant with heather, sweet with wild thyme, and laden with the aroma of a thousand wild flowers, whose bouquet is preserved in the spirit." With this delightful water the beverage of heaven, we would cordially pledge the friends dearest to our hearts, but when it passes through the whisky still, contaminated with the impalpable and tricky alcohol, it is the devil in solution, and renders him who takes it liable to be presently a fool, by-and-bye a beast. Were we, like Strephon, to appeal to poetry we should o'erstep his wildest ecstasies by the emphatic testimonies of the great thoughts of the past. He sees in the Oban stores "whisky enough to make the apostle of the pump moralizingly speculate in pathetic conjecture as to how many drunks and incapables, how many splitting headaches, how many beaten wives and wretched homes this potentiality of puncheons, this arsenal of alcohol contains when it goes out into the world." Experientia docet. He may pooh pooh our advocacy, but what about our facts; they stand out horrible and grim after all the tricks of style and gorgeousness of language in which he can trim his theme. Of course he says "the intemperate teetotaler fails to conjure up the refreshing power of this imprisoned spirit—when it is liberated—to the London sportsman in a Scotch mist on a grouse moor, the gaiety it infuses into intellectual converse, its medical value in sick chambers, its destiny in cementing friendships, its worth as a stimulant to reasonable people who use and not abuse its privileges." Where, tell us where, is such a spirit to be found. Ah, shade of Owen Glendower, we can call such a spirit from Strephon's brain, but will the real one come when we do call? Nay, nay, the spirit he apostrophises is as different from the spirit that stalks abroad as Ariel is from Caliban, and the people are beginning to know that: and their indignation will kindle with the growth of their knowledge. In his last paragraph he has a "lament" over the strict supervision of this "sma' still," but we do not share his sorrow, nay, we rejoice in the hope that the Government will be compelled to take a sterner oversight of all such seed-plots of crime and misery, and it will be found that although Government interference now may be likened to whips, the legal interference of the ratepayers will be as fell as the successful assaults of scorpions.

Few burghs in Scotland seem so fully alive to the present necessities of the agitation as Greenock. The friends there tried to induce Lord Rosebery to grant them an interview when he lately paid a visit to that town. To his lordship's regret this was not possible. But fertile in resource, the committee of the Greenock Total Abstinence Society asked his lordship to receive a statement of their reasons why Greenock should have power to suppress the public houses therein whenever, in the opinion of the rate-payers, their suppression was necessary to the interests of peace, good order, and lessened taxation. His lordship having expressed the pleasure he would feel at receiving such a statement, the committee prepared a lengthy and exhaustive document. Mr. R. Stevenson, district superintendent, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, was invited to get this document signed. Mr. Stevenson, in the course of a very few days, got it signed by Provost Campbell and ex-provosts Morton and Lyle, a number of magistrates, town councillors, and commissioners of police, by nearly all the ministers of the gospel in town, by many leading gentlemen, and by the president, vice-president, and the committee of the Total Abstinence Society, also by members of the Carlsdyke Total Abstinence Society. Such an effort reflects the highest credit on all concerned. They feel that the Government will grapple with the liquor traffic when it is convinced that the people are determined that they shall do so. We commend the example of Greenock to every constituency in Scotland, and as far as is in the power of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, we believe they will heartily co-operate with any constituency who follows an example so laudable.

A paragraph from the Alliance News is going the round of the papers, showing that the liquor traffic has during the last eight years contributed to the revenue the sum of £256,770,497 stg. This sum is ghastly enough, but it is nothing compared to a fuller statement of the subject. In these eight years, then, the people that drink have contributed to the exchequer two hundred and fifty-six and say three-quarters millions as a drink tax, or the sum of £7 5s. 8d. per head of the population, or 18s. 2½d. per head of the population per year. Now this sum would be very much increased if we could say per head of those who drink, as we would subtract a large number of infants, of women, of men who have ceased or have not begun to drink. But the figures are as bad as bad need be; only worse remains behind. To enable the publicans to contribute that sum, the people of this country spend on drink on an average £136,937,500 yearly, or during the same period of eight years per head £28 6s. 2d., or each year per head £3 10s. 9¼d. It will be difficult to find a folly which can surpass this. The drinking of £28 6s. 2d. that the publicans may be able to hand to the Government that protects it the paltry sum of £7 5s. 8d. is one of the most absurd of acts. The British toper spends a shilling for the good of the revenue, as he thinks, and the publican pays over a quarter of the amount! Can this be the intelligent era to which the working men of fifty years ago looked forward as the threshold of the millennial age? But there is a lower depth. The drinker not merely spends, but in spending he becomes idle through his intemperance, diseased through it, mad and criminal through it; he becomes demoralised and pauperised through it, and indirectly loses at least as much as he spends. Hence it comes to this, that to support the revenue by his drinking he spends a shilling and loses a shilling, and after all only gives the revenue threepence; or to contribute £7 5s. 8d. he spends £28 6s. 2d. and loses £28 6s. 2d., or £56 12s. 4d! There is a dread on the part of some Conservative working men that the Government may become atheistic. It is practically atheistic already. The Government may never go to business until the chaplain has "read" prayers, but it as practically denies God's existence and defies his retribution by maintaining this drink system as if it had, like the fool, said in its heart, "There is no God;" and it would not surprise a Christian to witness its destruction for its crime.

The Charity Organization of Relief Society of Glasgow has been holding its annual meeting. It too casts a lurid light on the national bane. In its report it states—"then as to indiscriminate charity the council's experience showed that as a rule the most plausible story tellers were the most unworthy, while the most modest and retiring were the most deserving. There was nothing which added so much to the drunkenness, indolence, and crime, and therefore nothing so disastrous in its results as the giving money without first making sure that the applicant was worthy." Dr. Richardson confirms the experience of the society when he shows that the experience of the Medical Temperance Association is that the drunkards are like the Cretans, liars, and lie like truth. The society might recommend to the charitable public the withholding of money from all that are likely to be demoralised through "tips," (cabmen, charwomen, porters, and others) giving them instead orders upon some one or other of the restaurants, British Workman Public Houses, &c., or giving them the sum in stamps if they have the Post Office deposit form. At one time we thought it cruel to supersede the friendly "tip" by the cold and barren "thank you," but we felt constrained to acknowledge that "tips" were our indirect contribution to the traffic. The giving an order to these poor folks, procuring them a cup of hot coffee and a bun, or swelling their savings bank account, dischargeth you of an obligation in a graceful way, while conferring a substantial pleasure upon those whom you seek to recompense.

In our last we referred to the anomalous state of Campbeltown in relation to the liquor traffic. We stated that owing to there being only one magistrate unconnected with the traffic, the justices assumed the power to license, and now any control that the burghers of Campbeltown have over the liquor traffic is practically gone. The distiller may boast that he gives the world good liquor, but it is more certain that he has practically abridged the liberties of his fellow-townsmen in a direction the most perilous to their amenity. It did not perhaps occur to those concerned in voting in distillers to their Town Council that they were taking a course which would shortly result in their own disfranchisement so far as their liquor traffic was concerned, if it had perhaps they would have paused ere giving honour to distillers, they were losing the small control over the public houses affecting them which they possessed. The matter has advanced a stage. The justices licensed but they could not do so absolutely, and here the virtue of the "Cameron" Act is clearly seen. The licenses they granted must be confirmed, and by a court whose status and extent is expressly defined. That court met, but being unable to muster a quorum could not give effect to the decision of the justices. It is not likely that any privation will be felt by the town at the inability of the confirming court to give sanction to the licenses granted by the justices, but the matter cannot rest, and it may be that the Home Office may be taught by the present crisis at Campbeltown that the best court of appeal is the people themselves. There is always a quorum of them, and they are interested not merely in this or that institution, but in the welfare of the wives, their children, and their neighbours, and that in protecting their own and these other interests they are acting not on the lines of interest or caprice, but in accordance with the highest dictates of justice and righteousness.

Among the best things in the papers at the present time is the cheering and accumulating indications of prosperous times. Labour speaking on the "State of trade and the comforts of the people," says "the mass of the people are much better off than they were twelve months back, for they are much better able to buy the necessities and the comforts of life than they were at the earlier date. They have had more work, that work has been more evenly distributed, and in many cases the increased work has been remunerated by a higher scale of wages. The labour barometer applicable to an industry which is increasing in importance, furnished in the monthly reports of the Amalgamated Association of Engineers, shows how steadily previously unemployed labour of that class is being absorbed. At the present time in the great Manchester district the proportion of unemployed to the whole membership is only about 3 per cent. There is hardly an engineering establishment of note anywhere in the kingdom at which there have not lately been works extensions to meet present and prospective demands. Wholly apart from the heavier mill and tool concerns are those of Lincoln and Ipswich say, and establishments might be cited in those towns in which, if the capabilities had permitted, one hundred more agricultural and road locomotives might have been turned out than was last year possible." Now if the working classes were wise and would patronise the "savings banks" as fully as they have patronised the "losings" banks—our abounding public houses—we would not dare to set a limit to their health, their prosperous condition, their real happiness, or their ability to secure means to crown a youth of labour with an age of ease. This paradise of the future will never be reached by a path leading through the public house, but if all their order were heartily to combine to abolish the drink traffic, this highest earthly condition of their class is assured.

INTELLIGENCE.

GREAT TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION IN EDINBURGH.

ON Monday, 12th ult., a most successful temperance demonstration was held in the Synod Hall of the United Presbyterian Church under the auspices of the United Kingdom Alliance and Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The great hall was crowded to excess long before the hour announced for the commencement of the proceedings, and hundreds had to be denied admittance. While the audience was assembling the choir of Fountainbridge Evangelical Union Church, under the leadership of Mr. Steele, discoursed an excellent programme of music. The chair was taken at half-past seven o'clock by Mr. T. R. Buchanan, M.P. for the city of Edinburgh. He was accompanied to the platform by Lord M'Laren, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P. (who was received with great cheering); Mr. James Cowan, M.P.; Mr. J. Dick Peddie, M.P.; Mr. Duncan M'Laren; Sheriff Campbell; Drs. W. Menzies, D. Menzies, and Bowie; J. Cowan, J.P.; Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; Ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P.; Messrs. D. W. Paterson, S.S.C.; James Coutts, S.S.C.; Revs. Principal Cairns, Professors Calderwood, and Kirk; Rev. Drs. W. C. Smith and C. R. Teape; John Sutherland, G.W.C.T.; and a great number of representative men from the city and neighbourhood.

Prayer having been offered by the Rev. Dr. Gray, Liberton,

Mr. J. H. WATERSTON intimated the receipt of a large number of apologies, among them being one from Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with loud cheers, gave a lengthened address, claiming for himself and those holding views favourable to a moderate use of liquor as great a hatred to drunkenness, as the most advanced abstainer entertained, rejoiced that such could meet with the suppressionists on the common ground of local option, and appealed to them not to refuse the help they were willing to give them in their efforts against drunkenness. He thought that one thing was imperative, that the people should have a direct control over the liquor traffic of the district. (Cheers.) He proceeded to advocate the getting of palliative legislation, and was met with cries of "oh, oh," and prudently declined to proceed further in that direction. He said, in conclusion, that he esteemed it a very high honour to preside on the occasion over so large and so enthusiastic a meeting of the citizens of Edinburgh for an object which is so good, and the attainment of which will be the advancement of righteousness and temperance. (Cheers.)

The Rev. Dr. ADAMSON moved the first resolution, as follows:—"That, considering the vice, misery, crime, waste of food, increased taxation, and stagnation of trade caused by the traffic in intoxicating liquors, this meeting declares that no legislation will be satisfactory that does not confer the power of a popular veto on the liquor traffic." (Applause.) No civilised Government could keep its hand off this peculiar traffic, which is not a legitimate trade. It ought to be cut down as a cumberer of the ground. And this is to be accomplished by the will of the people. Those who suffer from the traffic, and who pay for its evils, should have the power to deal with it. And we wish to tell Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, the Earl of Rosebery, and the Lord Advocate that no bill they can introduce to Parliament to deal with this subject will be satisfactory that does not give the power to suppress the liquor traffic in their localities. Such a power might be placed in the hands of the ratepayers with the fullest confidence that it would be used justly and wisely.

Mr. JOHN WILSON, J.P., Glasgow, in seconding the resolution, said—We respectfully ask the Government to hearken to the voice of the people, as given expression to twice over in the House of Commons, and award them their inalienable right to protect themselves from the evils which result from the present licensing laws of the land. It lies with ourselves to determine this matter. Governments and Parliaments are very much what the people make them, and did there go forth from the people a persistent and united cry upon this question, it would be as of old when the embattled walls of ancient Jericho fell by an unseen hand before the astonished gaze of an armed host. (Cheers.) In view of what is looming in the near future, I tremble for the morality of my country; knowing well what the effect was on our working population when the last briskness of trade was upon us. I do trust when the tide of prosperity does again come to our shores, that the people will be privileged to possess that which a free and enlightened nation now demands, the right of self-protection from a traffic that is hurtful to the best interests of the commonwealth. (Cheers.) The Dominion of Canada has now the "Scott" Temperance Act in full operation, with the most encouraging results. Many towns and counties in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and also two counties in Manitoba, and two counties in Ontario, have adopted the Act. (Applause.) It needs no prophet to foretell, once a similar opportunity is given to this small island home of ours to wipe out this national disgrace, that we will not be slow to advise and educate our neighbours to go and do likewise. I have much pleasure in seconding this resolution. (Applause.)

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, who was received with loud and continued cheering, said—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen,—I feel a little nervous—(laughter)—before this great audience, not only because I well know the intelligence of a Scotch audience, but because I have been warned a little by the speeches of the chairman and the gentleman who seconded this resolution. In the first place, the chairman warns me that I must be moderate. I shall take his advice, and I hope that before I conclude I may be able to say that my moderation is known unto all men. (Renewed laughter.) Then my friend on the right has also been a warning to me. For once he seemed to me on the verge of deviating into party politics, and I shall take care that when I sit down nobody shall know from anything I have said whether I am a sound and respectable Tory or a reprobate Radical. (Cheers.) Our question is far above party politics, and I must say that I am glad it excites so much interest in the famous city of Edinburgh. I have been paying visits to a good many influential people lately, and to the constituencies of Cabinet Ministers. On Tuesday I addressed a large meeting of the constituents of Mr. Forster, on Wednesday I addressed the constituents of Lord Hartington. I found them, as far as I could judge, unanimous and enthusiastic in demanding that the power should be given to the people to protect themselves from the liquor traffic, which we are asking for now. And today I am addressing many of whom, I have no doubt, are the constituents of one who is greater in public estimation than even Lord Hartington or Mr. Forster, and that is, I am addressing the constituents of Mr. Gladstone. (Prolonged cheering and slight hisses.) Mr. Chairman, observe that I am adhering scrupulously to my rule. (Laughter.) I do not say that he is greater than anybody else intellectually, morally, or politically, but because, simply as a matter of fact, he is the greatest man in the country—he is the Prime Minister. (Cheers.) Well, as far as I can judge from the tone and aspect of this immense meeting, you are as enthusiastic in favour of this power of protection being given to the people as well as those other constituencies to which I have alluded; and I thank you for the feeling which you show, and I thank you as being in one sense a representative meeting—representing other constituencies in Scotland. I thank you for the support which you gave my resolution in the House of Commons from Scotland, when Scotch members of Parliament voted for my resolution in no less a proportion of eight to one of those who took part in the division. (Cheers.) They were in favour of protection; protection not against free trade—(laughter)—not against fair trade, but protection against the worst trade which ever afflicted the country. But although I am glad to see you here to-night, I do not know I was very keen of coming, because when I am asked to go and address meetings on this matter in which I take so deep an interest, I always say to those who are arranging those meetings, what is the use of going to people who are converted. I am a missionary, send me among the heathen. (Laughter.) Some places in the south of England where they talk beer, think beer, and believe in beer—(laughter)—I would do much more good there, because here in Scotland you are logical, intelligent, enlightened, and you have got rid of the old fallacies, which I used to encounter in the beginning of these agitations, and fight against. First of all we were told that we were trying to put a stop to public-houses and whisky shops, that it was very wrong to rob a poor man of his beer. My answer to that was that the Government at present robs a man through his beer—(laughter)—makes him pay taxation, and pay a large sum for that which injures him. Well, we used to hear the old talk about liberty of the subject. Would you interfere with the liberty of the subject? Certainly not. I am going to interfere with the licenses of the publicans, which is quite a different thing to liberty of the subject—the license of a man to do harm to his fellow-subjects. That is all I want to interfere with; and I think one has a right to interfere with a man who is injuring the public. I do not say on my authority that the drink-seller is injuring the public; I say it on the authority of the Edinburgh Review, which must be an authority to an Edinburgh audience. It said long since that the liquor traffic was a nuisance socially, morally, and politically. (Cheers.) That is a sort of thing which the law ought to interfere with. Then we used to have an argument that we were introducing the tyranny of a majority if we let the bulk of the population interfere with the precious drinking rights of the minority. But that is the case now. The magistrates are a very small minority of the people, and it is merely a majority of the minority of the magistrates who have the power to license all these places among us. Therefore, we are doing away with the tyranny of the minority. Well, I have said, I think, that most Scotchmen pretty well agree with me that the time has come when the people ought to have somehow or other some power to protect themselves from this drink traffic. But there are two questions which I shall discuss to-night, and which still remain. One question is—In what manner, in what mode, is this power to be entrusted to them? and the other question is—How are we to get it at all from the Parliament and from the Government? Well, now, the House of Commons has already laid down the lines on which our policy in this matter is to be moulded, and I think I had better quote the resolution which the House of Commons has passed, and which it has again reaffirmed, as it did during the last session of Parliament, because there is a good deal of misunderstanding about that resolution. It is—"Your committee, in conclusion, are of opinion that as the ancient and avowed object of the licensing and sale of intoxicating drink is to supply a supposed public want without detriment to the public welfare, the local power of restraining, issuing, or renewal of licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested, viz., the inhabitants—those who are entitled to protection from the injurious influences of the present system." Now, that was the resolution that I moved in the House of Commons, and now I want you to pay particular attention to the sentence in the report which succeeds that resolution, because that will make the resolution even clearer than as it stands.

It says—"Such a power would, in fact, secure to the districts willing to exercise it the advantages now enjoyed by the numerous parishes where, according to the reports furnished to your committee, owing to the influence of landowners, no sale of intoxicating liquors is allowed." Now, I think that is as clear as anything well could be. The great landlords of extensive property at present have a veto on the issue of licenses in their districts. Then my resolution says, "Let us, instead of a private veto, give a public veto to the people." (Cheers.) Let us put the people exactly in the same position in which the great landowners are now, and allow them, if they please to do so, to veto—that is, prohibit—the issue of licenses among them. Now, I think there never was a simpler resolution proposed to the House of Commons. You said something about teetotalers and people who believed that to drink was wrong and so forth. Well, they would be entitled to vote in the law embodying this resolution, which allows everybody—the moderate drinkers, the immoderate drunkards, habitual drunkards—everybody to have the chance of saying whether they would have these public-houses among them. I am quite sure the hatred and detestation of these moral evils, these nuisances described in the Edinburgh Review, are not confined to teetotalers, but would be found to exist among many, many good citizens besides. (Cheers.) When that resolution came on, I was astonished to find in the speeches on it that the resolution meant all sorts of things. But all I mean is that the people of this country ought to be entrusted with a public veto on these your licenses. (Cheers.) Some people say that that ought to be carried out by boards. Well, boards are all very good things, only we have so many of them that we are almost "bored" to death, I sometimes think. (Laughter.) Boards are very good things, and if the licensing party wish the license through boards I do not exactly know why they should not, only you must understand we prohibitionists do not go in ourselves for promoting anything of that sort. We do not believe that the quality of drink is altered according to the person who sells it, or according to the authority by which he is entitled to sell it. I know that in some religious persuasions people will not listen to those who have not been ordained in a proper manner; but, in my opinion, truth is the same whoever speaks it, whether he has been ordained or not. (Cheers.) And my notion of drink is that intoxicating drink has a tendency of intoxicating those who take it, whether it is sold by the saint or the sinner—(laughter)—and whether that saint or sinner has been licensed by an elected board, or by one of those great and good men, the magistrates of the country. (Cheers.) You see we do not bother about boards. What we want is a veto pure and simple, and if you are to veto through a board, that is doing the work twice over. Besides, boards are things well known to you in Scotland. Why, you have the system here already. Your municipal authorities are elected by the people, and these municipal authorities virtually, as I understand it, appoint a small council for licensing purposes among other things, that is those eminent men the bailies. The bailies, as I understand it, really are an elected board in Scotland, and are doing their best to promote sobriety, as all licensing authorities are. (Laughter.) But what is the result of these good men doing their best? Sir Wilfrid here referred to the great drunkenness in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Greenock, where licensing boards already existed, and to the deplorable fact that publicans were rarely or ever punished for their work. He continued that now the festive season was approaching, when the licensing system came into fuller play than ever, that in about a fortnight's time all the hospitals and infirmaries would be clearing decks for action, as it were making ready the cockpit of a man-of-war before she went into action, to receive the poor drunken wretches, lame and wounded, whom this glorious licensing system will carry there. (Cheers.) Now, you see that I do not think the licensing reformers can do much more. Nobody can bring accusations against the police. The police do their best; and nobody can bring accusations against the publicans, because they are doing their duty—only four in one place and five in another are found out transgressing the laws. Therefore, I say when you have this horrible state of things in this town of yours, like the evils of battle—this indescribable degradation and misery—I say it is not the men who carry out the system who are to blame, but it is the system, and you who keep that system up. (Cheers.) And the Scotch members of Parliament know that. I am happy to say they see this miserable failure, and this is the reason why they vote a majority of 8 to 1 when the reform we advocate is brought before the House. They voted for the giving of this veto power to get rid of all this evil or get rid of the most objectionable. And what do our opponents do? They cannot be satisfied, I think, with such facts as I have quoted; they must admit there is something wrong somewhere, but they say they must wait for the improved education of the people. After showing that, in spite of all the education operative in the country, that drinking and drunkenness abounded, he went on to say—But do not run away with the idea that I am a disbeliever in education. Nobody believes in it more firmly than I do. I believe in it fanatically, and that is the reason why I am here to-night. It is because I believe that the 150,000 licensed sellers of drink educate the people to drunkenness that I am here to-night to attack the system. And these 150,000 licensed drink sellers are paid by results—(laughter)—they are paid a premium on every glass of drink that they can persuade their fellow-subjects to consume, and that is why they are so earnest and diligent in business; and my opinion is that these 150,000 licensed publicans are beating the schoolmasters and ministers out of the field. Mr. Bright talks in his speech about "prisons and jails darkening the land." So they do; but why are they there? The prisons and the jails are nothing more than monuments of the energy of the publicans—(cheers)—and they are monuments of your disgrace, because you have hitherto maintained or allowed the laws by which they are licensed to do this great evil. You may say that I am undervaluing the work of the ministry. That is not the case at all. I believe in the power of truth—but I must use the proper means for bringing the truth before the minds of the people. There is no parable in the Bible more instructive than the parable of the sower. He sowed good seed, but when that seed fell where there were thorns, the thorns sprung up and choked it, and there was no crop; and you may depend upon it the most pious and most eloquent minister may preach for a long time in a district infested with whisky shops and public-houses before he has anything like the crop which he ought to have by sowing the truth. (Cheers.) Well, then, but other people say—"Oh, we need not do this thing now; let us wait till good trade comes again." I don't think that will do much, because good trade hitherto has meant a good trade for the publican; and that means what Lord Rosebery described when he said the enormous consumption of spirits which comes with good trade means an enormous amount of crime and pauperism. I think that there is something pathetic in the position in which we are standing now. There seems to be a turn of the tide. There seems to be a hope that good trade is coming again, and manufacturers and merchants are looking forward to the improvement of business. There are other thoughts arising when we are looking forward to that business. I saw an article in the Newcastle Chronicle two or three days ago, in which it said—"Trade is reviving. We are looking forward to better business, but with that improved trade there will come an increase of drinking and misery," and, it added, "the beat of the wings of this destroying angel is drink; the beat of the wings of this destroying angel is in the air, and, as in Egypt of old, we may have the result that there is not a house in which there is not one dead through this vice." I think there can be nothing more awful than in good trade, good wages, increased comforts to the working people, they should live in this miserable state of things, and that the larger proportion of their earnings should go to the publicans. But other people say a good house for the working people will stop drunkenness;

if a man has a good house he will not drink. I think a man makes a house quite as much as the house the man, and it is because the people drink and have no money that they live in these wretched houses. My friend General Neal Dow explains it in this way. He said if a pig were put into a parlour what would be the result? Do you think the parlour would reform the pig or the pig demoralise the parlour? I think the latter would be the case, as far as I could judge the pig. (Laughter and hear.) I go to the representatives chosen by the people—to your own old representative, Mr. Duncan M'Laren. (Loud cheers.) I go to your present representatives, Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Cowan, and I go to the whole body of Scotch members, and I say here—and you know I speak the truth—that there is not one of them, be he Liberal or be he Conservative, who dare go before a Scotch constituency and say, "I am in favour of the repeal of the Forbes Mackenzie Act," who would have the shadow or the shade of a chance to ever appear again in Parliament. (Loud cheers.) That one fact is worth all the newspaper articles that ever were written. It shows how the people really view the prohibition of the liquor traffic for one day in seven. It is a grand step in the right direction, but it is not enough. Now, I say the veto—the veto for stopping a trade. That is what we want. But you may ask, What is to become of the Government? The Government gets 30 millions a year from this trade, and want it very badly. In round numbers, our army and navy costs us about 30 millions, and in round numbers we get that sum from the drink traffic in England. We raise 30 millions by killing our own people, with alcohol, and expend the same money in gunpowder to kill people abroad. (Great laughter.) These sums balance very nicely. That is the beauty of this system. (Renewed laughter.) But why are we to be so tender about the Government? We talk about the Government doing this, Government stopping trade, Government preventing the opium business, and so forth, but when I say Government I mean you. It is a free country, you are the sovereign people, and you make the Government. As a speaker before me said, the Government is just as you make it, and you are all alike in this matter. What did the Morning Advertiser, the leading organ of the publicans, say about the traffic? The Government and the Treasury were sleeping partners, and that three-fourths of the profit derived from drink, viz., of every 20s. profit from drink the Treasury got 15s. Thus you are a sleeping partner with the publicans, and I am here to-night to do what little I can to rouse you out of this ignoble and selfish sleep. This is a great audience, representing, I am sure, members of all the different classes of society, but I think that this question appeals more to the workmen than to any other class of the community. You, the working men, have a deal of power now. I do not know what it is in Edinburgh, but there has been a recent decision in England in registration matters which virtually gives us manhood-suffrage in the burghs of England, and the working men now are a great and growing power, and they must work out their own salvation in this matter. You cannot expect the upper classes to be so keen about it as you are. The upper classes believe in drink. Of course, they drink moderately. The Saturday Review had an article not long since, in which the writer said if he had to lose the cellar key upon a Sunday, Sunday would be no Sunday to him—(laughter)—and being thus devoted to drink—moderate drinking, of course—they think that your happiness depends upon it also. I say they believe in this drink, even the best of them. Take our friend, Mr. Fawcett, the Postmaster-General—(cheers)—a great friend of mine, and not a better man to be found anywhere, doing as much good by his Post-Office reforms in getting people to save money and so forth, as any member of the Government. He has a craze about this drink, too. I saw the other day, in a window of the post-office near which I live, a placard saying, "If anybody will inquire inside, the postmaster will give a little pamphlet stating the advantages of going into the army;" and so I went in and got it. I got a paper—not that I was going to enlist myself—(laughter)—I am past the age—but I wanted to see what the inducements were, and I found that they got 15s. a week, all told, at the outset; and Mr. Fawcett said also that they would get cheap beer and tobacco. (Laughter.) That seemed to me rather extraordinary. I thought that glory would have been enough. I thought that the chance of having the honour of being shot yourself, or having the pleasure of shooting somebody else, which, I suppose, is glory, would have been quite sufficient inducement to men to enter the army; but I find my good friend, Mr. Fawcett, was obliged to have recourse to the stimulus of drink to increase the stimulus of glory. (Laughter.) You see, then, there is Mr. Fawcett—one of the best of men—he is trying to promote cheap drinking. What does cheap drinking mean? It means more consumption of drink. He thinks there is not enough drinking by the working people, and he absolutely sticks it in post-office windows—a placard to induce them to drink more. And then, of course, you know the trade is very powerful and very rich—I suppose it is the richest trade anywhere. If you look into a small town you generally find it is the brewer who gets richer than anybody else, and the distiller in Scotland gets richer than anybody else. Two or three years ago, when trade was bad, the licensed victuallers had a grand festival at Burton, the headquarters of the brewing interest, and they said, "Burton is the green spot of England; whatever trade suffers, this trade goes on, drinking goes on steadily, the brewer and the distiller thrive on apace." There are, however, a few good men—they build churches and chapels; and I honour them for that. I see now they are getting on a still more—Mr. Disraeli took one step in that direction, and Mr. Gladstone has taken another step, and two of them have been made peers, they have been raised from the "beerage to the peerage." (Laughter.) We see what tremendous powers we have to fight against. Notwithstanding all that, the great fact remains that the Parliament of the United Kingdom voting on my resolution, and supported by twenty-five members of the present Administration, have declared that you, the people of this country, have the right when you choose to put a stop to that trade. That is the position in which we stand at present. What we have to get now is to make the Government act on that resolution which has been passed, and make them carry it out in what is called practical legislation. Now, how shall we get this power? In the last Parliament, as we know, Ireland blocked the way—Ireland always does block the way, as far as I can see; but it would be intolerable, as I think, to spend another session over the wrongs of Ireland and neglect the wrongs of Scotland and England. It must not be done; how are we to prevent it? Mr. Herbert Gladstone, the son of the Prime Minister, wrote a letter the other day giving us advice; and he said—"Temperance men must make their views heard above those who are heard agitating for other reforms." (Cheers.) We must do that. We must let the Government see that we are in earnest. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I say is this. Our cause is a strong one, and let me sum it up. The House of Commons has twice declared that the people are entitled to the right of possessing this veto power. You have in office the strongest and most able Prime Minister that the country has seen—(cheers)—you have the House of Commons—and my fellow members on this platform will bear me out in what I say—you have the House of Commons, more imbued with a reforming spirit than any Parliament in our generation; and you have an overwhelming public opinion out of doors to back them on in the course of the agitation. Now is the time for us to speak in a manner which cannot be misunderstood, and to declare what we will have done.

If we have whispered truth,

Whisper no longer;

Speak as the thunder speaks,

Stern and stronger.

(Cheers.) Do that, and the day is not far distant when the power will be placed in the hands of the people to sweep away the most deadly obstacle which yet bars the progress of a great and noble nation in all the paths of peace, prosperity, and virtue. (Loud cheers.)

A show of hands was called for the resolution, which was declared unanimously carried.

The Rev. Mr. KAY, Argyle Place United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, moved the second resolution—"That, considering the advanced position occupied by Scotland on liquor legislation, and its preparedness for still further advance—as shown by the Scotch vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution—this meeting calls upon Government to introduce a measure for Scotland in next session of Parliament, which shall enable ratepayers to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors in their various localities." Mr. Kay pointed to the result of the last election. Proceeding, he said—I hold that if the public voice of Scotland be once heard in the House of Commons, it will be given all but unanimously in favour of suppression. (Cheers.) Every Church worthy of the name will go for suppression. (Cheers.) Every public man worthy of the name will go for suppression. The only exception, as I take it, in Scotland will be the publicans themselves. (Cheers.)

Sheriff GUTHRIE SMITH, in seconding the resolution, said—I wish to ask your attention to what the Act of 1828 was. It says the license should be granted to such and so many persons as the justices, or the magistrates, or the major part of them should think meet or convenient; that is to say, justices in granting or refusing a license should be influenced by the consideration of what are the requirements of the particular district. Now, there is no doubt in every community a very large section of the people who say, we don't want public-houses at all; and I want to know how, at the present day, in the present divided state of opinion, it is possible for a magistrate to find out the number of public-houses required in a district, except in the manner proposed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson's motion, namely, by public vote on the question of public-houses—"Yes" or "No." (Applause.)

The Rev. R. J. LYND, B.A., Belfast, in an impassioned address, supported the resolution. He said—If the community but realised a tithe of the evil which springs from drink—of the crimes to which it leads, the cruelty it creates, the tortures it inflicts, the homes it bares, the hearts it breaks, the ruin it works, the plagues it produces, the minds it maddens, the graves it digs, we believe they would arise as one man, and, in the righteous indignation of a passionate but just revenge, would rout the accursed traffic out of the kingdom, "so that the place which knows it now should know it no more for ever." (Cheers.)

The resolution was carried by acclamation.

The Rev. Professor BLAIKIE, D.D., moved—"That copies of the foregoing resolution be signed by the chairman, and forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Lord Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and Scotch Members of Parliament; and that it be remitted to the committee who arranged for this meeting to take such steps as they think necessary to press the claims of this movement upon the Government and others interested." The rev. doctor, in supporting the resolution, said—I have always felt it to be a great misfortune, and indeed a scandal, that in such a city as this, the working man is unable to find any street, or lane, or corner where he can find a dwelling suitable to his means free from the temptation of the drink-shop at his door; and even where working men had clubbed together and, by their hard-worked earnings, built clusters of comfortable dwellings for themselves and families, they had been unable to protect themselves from the temptation of the drink-shop at their doors. ("Shame.") Dr. Blaikie concluded by saying that he would be happy if in any way he could strengthen the hands of the noble champion who had raised this question of local option. (Applause.)

The Rev. JOHN YOUNG, M.A., Newington United Presbyterian Church, seconded the motion, which was at once adopted by the meeting.

Principal CAIRNS, in moving a vote of thanks to Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the other speakers, said the meeting gave him the greatest pleasure for many reasons, but particularly for the testimony which it gave them of the immense progress which the cause had made, especially in recent times. He thought this the very greatest meeting that had ever been held in the city on this question, and he rejoiced that it was so. It gave them a hope, a rational hope, of the very speedy settlement in the right direction of this great question.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON acknowledged the compliment. He said he was grateful to Principal Cairns for all that he said. The Principal assumed that they were very close on victory. Now, one should never prophesy unless he knew, and he knew more about it than the Principal—(laughter)—he knew what the House of Commons was, and the immense opposition they had to encounter. He never prophesied unless he knew, and he did know that they should win at last—(cheers)—and when they should win depended upon them, and he thought they had that night showed how great was their interest in the matter. (Applause.)

The Rev. Professor JOHNSTONE, D.D., moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

The Rev. Professor KIRK, D.D., pronounced the benediction, and the meeting separated.

AFTERNOON CONFERENCE.

In the afternoon a conference, called by the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, was held in the Young Men's Christian Association Rooms, to consider "How best to secure that a thorough measure for Scotland may be introduced at the earliest possible moment." Ex-Bailie Torrens, Glasgow, occupied the chair. The Chairman explained the reason for calling the meeting, and stated it was open to all to speak out their mind. In the last session of Parliament they had forty-three Scotch members against five in favour of dealing with the traffic. They, however, wanted men who would not simply put their names to a bill, but would press forward such a measure of local option. Dr. Adamson said they must insist on some measure being brought in by the Government. They looked to the Liberal Government to do this, and if they did not do so they were not entitled to be called a Liberal Government. He was prepared to submit the following resolution:—"That, considering the advanced position occupied by Scotland on liquor legislation, and its preparedness for still further advance—as shown by the Scotch vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution—this meeting calls upon Government to introduce a measure for Scotland in next session of Parliament which shall enable ratepayers to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors in their various localities." A very animated discussion took place, in which Principal Cairns, Rev. J. Kay, Mr. Sutherland, G.W.C.T., I.O.G.T., and others, took part. Rev. Dr. Adamson's resolution was heartily adopted. The Rev. Mr. M'Gregor also moved "That this conference requests the executive to approach the Government and the Scotch members with a memorial calling upon them to introduce a measure conferring upon the Scotch people the power to prohibit the liquor traffic within the various districts of the country; and that the executive use every effort to influence Scotch members of Parliament to support such a measure." This was seconded by Mr. George Tait, and unanimously agreed to. On the motion of Dr. Adamson, a vote of thanks was accorded to Ex-Bailie Torrens for presiding.

We are glad to see that the Perth Temperance Society issue a monthly, The Temperance Register. It is well run, and will, we hope, achieve a large circulation. The first number is excellent.

According to Father Carlisle of Stockton-on-Tees, there are 800 iron workers in the town who are teetotallers, showing that even the hardest work does not necessarily involve the use of intoxicating liquors.

We are glad to observe that there is a movement on foot to erect a monument to the memory of the late Mr. Alexander Dick, the well-known temperance advocate, whose labours at the foot of the Nelson Monument on Glasgow Green were so disinterested, so unwearyed, and so earnest. His many friends should co-operate heartily in bringing this attempt to do honour to his memory to a successful issue.

EAU-DE-COLOGNE AS AN INTOXICANT.—According to the report of Surgeon Major Lyon the inhabitants of Pen, in the Kolaba district, Bombay, use Eau-de-Cologne as an intoxicant, finding it to be cheaper than the native liquor Ab Kari.

THE ANTI-NARCOTIC LEAGUE.—This body have just engaged a lecturer and collector—Mr. John Davenport—for a twelvemonth. As the appointment in salary, travelling, &c., will involve an outlay of £400, it is hoped that the needful liberality will be forthcoming.

The total receipts on the British railways for 1880 was from passengers, £27,200,464; from goods, £35,761,303; and from miscellaneous, £2,529,858—total £65,491,625. That year was a most prosperous one, yet had all those receipts entirely disappeared, and the country devoted what it spent the same year in drink to making up the loss, the actual loss would not have been more than £10,000,000. This comparison should make economists pause.

“The Nottingham Town Council has decided not to open its Free Library on Sunday. The public houses, we understand, remain open as usual.” Now is it insinuated that the library and public house should both be open, we say no; because though one evil the public is allowed, there is no justification for allowing another, the Free Library. The thing to do is to close both. The people will have no occasion to indulge either in drink or in recreation that involves the loss of Sabbath rest and enjoyment to a number of their fellow men.

RICHARD COBDEN.—The Glasgow Herald, in its review of Morley's “Life of Cobden,” says, “For the cause of temperance he went in strongly, by example as well as by precept, for he gradually gave up the beer which had been his every day drink, the glass of spirits and water in which he used to join with others, and even to a great extent dinner wines, mixing water with the champagne when in company, while with his own family he took only water. The children he hoped to see teetotalers, but he would not himself take the pledge, because that would compel a singularity of habits in social life.”

On the 2nd ult. a circular was issued to the Fleet in which the Admiralty cancelled the existing regulations for allowing spirit ration in the navy. The issue of the ration is discontinued to all officers excepting warrants, the saving in price being paid into the mess funds. On special occasions and under careful report spirit rations may be issued to officers detached on particular service, if the mess stores are not available, but spirits will be issued on payment under no other circumstances. No spirit ration will be allowed to seamen under twenty, and warrant-officers, men, and boys may receive in lieu of spirits cocoa, chocolate, and sugar, or partly specie.

CRIME.—I am entirely at one with my friend Sir Wilfrid Lawson that one of the greatest and most fertile sources of crime has been and still is indulgence in strong drink. (Applause.) I may say that by far the largest number of these painful cases, of which I am sorry to say I am compelled to have personal cognisance—I mean these cases which result in murder—are crimes which are committed under the influence of drink. But, at the same time, I am happy to find that the figures which are given me show that for the special offences of drunkenness and disorderly conduct under drink, there has been a decrease.—The Home Secretary at Cockermouth.

THEN AND NOW.—Hear to what Uncle Billy said: “When I was a drunkard I could never get my barn mor'n half-full. The first year after I signed the pledge I filled my barn, the second year I filled my barn and had four stacks. When I was a drunkard I owned only one old cow, and I think she must have been ashamed of me, for she was red in her face. Now I own five good cows, and I own three as good horses as ever looked thro' a collar. When I was a drunkard I trudged from place to place on foot; now I can ride a conveyance of my own. When I was a drunkard I was three hundred dollars in debt; since I signed the abstinence pledge I have paid the debt, and have purchased 200 acres of wild land, and I have the deed in my possession; two of my sons, who are teetotalers, are living on the lot. When I was a drunkard I used to swear; I have ceased to be profane. The last year of my drunkenness my doctor's bill amounted to thirty dollars; since I signed the pledge I have not been called to expend a cent upon medicine.”

ABERDEEN.—CONFERENCE ON LOCAL OPTION.—A conference on local option was held on 7th inst., in the tea room of the Café, Shiprow. A number of leading men from the different temperance organisations in the city were present at the meeting. Mr. James Paterson, president of the Aberdeen Temperance Society, presided. There was a free expression of opinion on the question, and the mind of the meeting seemed to resent the idea of having boards to grant or refuse licenses. A direct vote of the people, without any change in the licensing authority, appeared to meet with most favour by the various speakers. Votes of thanks to the chairman, and to Mr. G. Kemp for introducing the subject, terminated the meeting.

RENFREW.—LOCAL OPTION MEETING.—On Monday, 12th ult., a public meeting was held in the Good Templar Hall under the auspices of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The chair was taken by Ex-Bailie Cuthbertson. The meeting was ably addressed by the chairman, the Rev. A. Wilson, Paisley; James Winning, Esq., Paisley; W. R. Stevenson, district agent of the Association; and Messrs. Jas. Blair, Jas. Vernal, Robt. Duncan, J. Hamilton, and James Tagg. Resolutions in support of local option and calling upon the Government to introduce a measure for Scotland containing full veto power to the ratepayers to prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquors in their respective localities, were carried with acclamation and great enthusiasm. Prior to the public meeting, a conference was held in the side hall, presided over by Bailie Cuthbertson, when a local option-measure for Scotland was discussed with great spirit, and with the very happy result of the warm adhesion of temperance friends who had hitherto been doubtful of the principle involved in the total prohibition of the liquor traffic in any locality, but who are now convinced that it is the most reasonable and only effective method of dealing with a traffic so detrimental to the interests of society.

BARRHEAD.—LOCAL OPTION CONFERENCE AND PUBLIC MEETING.—On Tuesday, 13th ult., a conference of those favourable to the suppression of the liquor traffic took place in the Lesser Public Hall. Mr. Jas. Osborne, Mearns, presided, and was supported by Bailie Selkirk, Ex-Provost Dick, and Mr. R. Mackay, secretary. Messrs. M'Lellan, Shanks, M'Farlane, Johnston, Partick, Craig, Ferguson, Robinson, and others, expressed their unalterable devotion to temperance and prohibition, and the result of the proceedings was a resolution to resuscitate the Total Abstinence Society, and a recommendation that a Women's Temperance Association should be formed on an early day. The public meeting afterwards took place in the public hall, over which Mr. A. F. Shanks, who introduced the proceedings in an appropriate speech, presided, supported by the speakers and many warm friends of the movement. A most efficient choir, under the leadership of Mr. W. Shanks, discoursed most excellent music; the singing of some of the pieces being exceptionally fine. The first resolution was, in substance, a call to the Government to fulfil its promise, and legislate on the liquor traffic on the lines of local option, was moved in a telling speech by Mr. W. Craig, followed by a vigorous and convincing address by Bailie Selkirk, and supported by the Rev. Samuel Harding, whose remarks were highly approved. The resolution was carried. The second resolution was briefly submitted by Mr. Johnstone, seconded by Ex-Provost Dick in a pithy speech, and supported by Mr. Mackay, whose remarks were summarily cut short by time. The resolution was carried. Other resolutions followed, and were likewise adopted. The usual votes of thanks to chairman, choir and leader, were most heartily awarded.

A CONVICT'S OPINION.—I am not a professed teetotaler, but compulsory association with the brutes that have been created and reared under the immediate influence of whisky shops, has forced me to the conclusion that to keep an establishment where liquors are sold over a bar to be drunk on the premises, is about the meanest thing a man can do to earn a living.—From "Convict Life," by a Ticket-of-Leave-Man.

THE NEWEST LEGAL DUTY.—A swallow doesn't make a summer, but it tells us that summer is nigh. Mr. Alex. Russell, of Ottawa, insured his life in the Canadian Life Insurance Company, and died last year. Being reputedly intemperate, his heirs were refused the amount of his policy. A lawsuit resulted. It was proved that though he was sober at the time he joined the company, he did not disclose his former intemperance. The Insurance Company were held justified in not paying his policy to his relatives.

Madame de Nedikoff will contribute to an early number of the Nineteenth Century an article on "The Temperance Movement in Russia." Strange as it may seem, the article is designed to prove by undeniable statistics that such a movement really exists. As to its success, however, some doubts may be allowed. Still, the Russians are in all things extreme, ebriety and inebriety included. So a great future may await Russian temperance. It was made clearly apparent to the soldier-mind during the Russo-Turkish War that tea was the real friend, not vodka; and the fact of which the soldier became convinced may be rendered clear to the moujiks in general. The Holy Synod, it seems, has taken the matter up, and is distributing tracts widely which advocate sobriety even on saints' days. Village societies are also being formed, which will inflict various penalties on drunkards; and the Selesky Vestnik or Rural Messenger, which is being widely circulated, under official protection, is writing against drunkenness.—Athenæum.

THE PRICE OF WHISKY.—Mr. Dobell questioned a statement by Sir Wilfrid Lawson "that the Chancellor of the Exchequer got 5d. out of every 6d. spent on spirits in the drink-shops," and gives his own estimate as follows:—The cost of making sixpennyworth of whisky may be divided as follows—actual cost of making, including materials, wages, wear and tear of plant, &c., 4d., manufacturer's profit 1d., cost of transit 1d., publican's profit 2d.,—total 3d.; leaving only 3d. for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This may be demonstrated another way—the Government duty on whisky is 10s. per proof gallon, but the publican adds 20 per cent. water to a gallon of whisky, thus reducing the duty to 8s. per gallon of whisky, as sold in the drink-shops. For this gallon the publican receives 16s., of which 8s. goes to the Government and the rest accounted for as above. Brandy is retailed at 32s. per gallon 20 per cent. underproof. The duty is about 10s. 5d. per gallon, or 8s. 1d. 20 per cent. underproof, so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer only receives 8s. 1d. out of 32s. spent on brandy, or 1½d. out of every 6d. In many cases he only gets 1d. out of every 6d. Sir Wilfrid quoted Lord Derby's speech in the Times of February 26th, 1880. "I do not think that the great consuming classes quite realise when they order sixpennyworth of spirits, that they are handing over 5d. out of every 6d. as their gift to the Chancellor of the Exchequer." Mr. Dobell is correcting Lord Derby and not Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

MR. J. H. WATERSTONE.—A series of meetings under the auspices of the Newcastle Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance, which have been held during the last fortnight in Newcastle and Gateshead, were brought to a close last night in the Central Hall, Newcastle. Mr. J. H. Waterston, of Edinburgh, who is an old Radical political reformer, and a very popular temperance and prohibitive advocate, has spoken successively at all the meetings, and notwithstanding the amount of eloquence that has been expended on the subject, introduced an amount of energy and force of argument as well as timely anecdotes that gave novelty, instruction, and interest to his remarks. The result has been that large audiences have attended every meeting after Mr. Waterston's powers as a lecturer became known. Last night's meeting was no exception to the rule, and we bespeak for Mr. W. a hearty reception should he ever again visit our town. Last night, after a brilliant closing address, the following motion was unanimously carried by the large audience:—"That this meeting express its high appreciation of the excellent and high-toned lectures delivered by Mr. Waterston during the last ten nights, and beg to convey to the Newcastle Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance their best thanks for securing his services, and further express the earnest hope that they may be able on an early day to secure his return again to this town for a series of lectures, which we have no doubt will do much to advance the Temperance Reformation."—Tyneside Echo, December 2nd.

GLASGOW.—SERMON BY REV. R. J. LYND.—On Sabbath, the 11th inst., this popular Irish minister of the gospel, at the request of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, preached a temperance sermon in St. George's Free Church to a very large audience. The service was varied, there being prayer, praise (Psa. xxxiv., 11), reading (Prov. xxiii.), praise (40th Hymn, or 26th Paraphrase), reading (1 Cor. xiii.), prayer, Psa. xxvi., 1, followed by the text (Isaiah lxxv., 25), after which prayer, praise, and the benediction. The rev. gentleman said his text implied three things, (1) Intoxicating drinks must be removed from the earth. (2) The employment of means on our part adequate to their removal; and (3) It contains an assurance that its removal will be complete. The sermon was admirably adapted for the season when the high courts of the Church have enjoined the preaching of sermons previous to the Christmas and New-Year celebrations, and the preacher was a Boanerges. We subjoin a few sentences whose eloquence will strike every reader as they did the entranced hearers:—"Hurt and destroy!" The prophet uses the wolf, the leopard, the lion, the asp, the cockatrice, as emblems of the hurtful and destructive agencies in the Lord's holy mountain; but the ravening wolf has never, in all the ages, committed such ravages as drink; the bear has never hugged his victim with such deadly embrace, as drink has done; the spotted leopard has never presented such an attractive appearance or so cunningly caught his prey, as drink; the lordly lion has never banquetted to the same extent on flesh and blood, as drink has done; the asp was the self-chosen executioner of Egypt's queen; but drink has been the self-chosen executioner of millions; and the cockatrice—poisoning, even with its breath, subterranean in its habits, and oviparous in its propagation—was pure in its breathings, and limited in its spread compared with the great destroyer of our day and of the days that are gone."

THE SCOTT ACT MARCHING ALONG.—The Act was first adopted in Fredericton, the Capital of New Brunswick, October 31st, 1878, by a majority of 2 to 1 on a full vote. Since then it has been passed in nine counties out of fourteen in New Brunswick; in the whole of Prince Edward Island; in eight counties of Nova Scotia; in two counties of Manitoba, and two counties of Ontario. It has been defeated in two counties of Quebec and in one city and one county of Ontario. That is a series of thirty contests, the Act has been carried in twenty-six, by an average majority of more than three to one. St. John City and St. John County, in New Brunswick, have filed petitions, and will vote upon the adoption of the Act in a few weeks, and as every contest in the Maritime Provinces has resulted in favour of the Act, it is expected that two more victories will be scored. Pictou, N.S., votes on the 9th November, and the passage of the Act is regarded as certain. Several other counties in Nova Scotia are getting petitions ready. Two other counties in Manitoba are pressing forward towards the Act of 1875, forbidding both the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors. In Ontario petitions are ready or filed for the Counties of Lincoln, Welland, and Lambton; Kent and Middlesex are at work; Norfolk, Elgin, and Huron are just about holding conventions for organisations for campaigns. Russel and Carleton are petitioning, and in several other counties the people are stirring for active measures. The Ontario Alliance is organising auxiliaries in every city or county, and throwing its whole force into the movement. The close of this year and the beginning of the next will witness an active contest in the Western peninsula. With Norfolk, Elgin, Kent, Oxford, Middlesex, Lambton, Huron, and perhaps others, carrying on a mutual and simultaneous campaign, the question at issue is likely to receive a large share of public attention.—Canada Casket. [Pictou has adopted the Act by a large vote.—Ed. S. R.]

GREAT TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT AT FORFAR.—A great temperance movement, with unprecedented results, is going on in Forfar. It commenced on Sunday week past, and was inaugurated and has been carried on by Mr. Francis Murphy, a temperance missionary from America. He came on the invitation of the leaders of the temperance cause in Forfar, and is very highly commended by high personages in the United States. One of his credentials is from ex-President Hayes, whose letter is authenticated by Mr. Lowell, late minister of the United States in London. Mr. Murphy, who is the founder of a body called the "Blue Ribbon Army," commenced his mission in the Reid Hall, which was completely filled by a very large audience. The chief characteristic of his address is his earnestness, and he throws intense energy into his work. He narrates the leading incidents in his somewhat chequered career with considerable pathos, and, at the same time, with the humour peculiar to America. During the whole of last week he addressed crowded meetings, and gathered about him nearly all the ministers and several of the leading laymen in Forfar. The people join his cause nightly in hundreds, amongst the recruits being the whole of the ministers in Forfar, with the exception of two. At the end of the week the meetings were removed to the Old First Free Church, where they are being nightly carried on, and attended by immense crowds of both old and young. His roll of recruits now numbers about 3,000 adults and about 1,600 juveniles, or nearly one-third of the entire population. Amongst the adults are many persons who have long been deemed hopelessly addicted to drunkenness, and a very marked difference is observable in the trade carried on by the dram-shops, of which there are relatively a large number in Forfar. People in all ranks of society can be seen on the streets wearing a blue ribbon in the lapel of their coat or in the breast of their dress—this being the badge of Mr. Murphy's "army." However long the effect may last there can be no doubt that a revolution, approaching the dimensions of a phenomenon, has taken place in Forfar, and that already a very marked difference in the social habits of the people is observable.—Daily Review.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

We are glad to observe that A Detective's Experience of the Passion for Strong Drink, which we have noticed in commendatory terms in these columns, is now in its sixth thousand, a marked evidence of its merits and its popularity. It can now be had at one penny per copy at Hamilton's printing office, 182 Trongate.

The Irish Temperance League, Band of Hope Union, and Permissive Bill Association. Twenty-third Annual Report. Belfast: Irish Temperance League Buildings. Secretary, Mr. William Wilkinson.—This is a report characterised by all the excellences of brevity, fulness, and relevancy. We have a singularly clear and an attractive record. The comprehensive title of the League gives it a wide area in which to carry on its operations, and on all fields of the agitation it has reaped success. While it has been working energetically its subscription list has not, however, defrayed its expenditure, and it has had to rely upon the profits of its coffee-stand and café account to make up its deficiency. It has, however, received in subscriptions the handsome sum of £1,160, 8s. The other matter in the report is very succinctly and clearly arranged, and altogether it is calculated to advance the interests of the League.

The Christmas number of the "Church of England Temperance Chronicle" is named the Amethyst, and deserves the highest encomiums and the widest circulation. It is crowded with good matter, five original Christmas tales, numerous Christmas papers, and besides is admirably illustrated. It is a temperance gem reflecting the utmost credit on all concerned in its production, and most of all on its able editor Mr. Sherlock, and what is most pleasing to record, there is no advance in the price.

Forty-fifth Annual Report of the Edinburgh Temperance Society. 1881. Edinburgh: 52 Nicolson Street. Mr. William Reid, Secretary.—As usual, the committee of this energetic society submit a most creditable record of their year's operations. Their report is under eleven heads and embraces all phases—educational, social, political—of the agitation. Great prominence is given in the report to the voting on the Local Option resolution. The income is, inclusive of balance, £289, 19s. 5½d., and there is a balance in treasurer's hands of £12, 11s. 1d., but all who know the society will regret to find that it is about twenty pounds in arrears, and will heartily wish that by another year it may be able to present to its supporters a balance on the right side. The committee acknowledge the services afforded to its advocacy by the secretary and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

Silver and Gold. Short Stories for Young and Old. By Emilie Searchfield. London: J. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price Half-a-Crown.—This is quite a gorgeous story-book, being handsomely done up in silver and scarlet and gold, and gilt-edged. It has a most attractive exterior. Within a compass of about two hundred pages we have page about of story and illustration. We are glad to be able to congratulate Mr. Longley upon the illustrations, which, with only a few exceptions, are the prettiest he has ever produced. So far as the letter-press is concerned, Emilie Searchfield has succeeded in putting an excellent story into a page. Altogether this is a signally successful combination of the engraver and the story-teller; and all into whose hands it may fall will, we believe, derive the greatest pleasure from picture and story. Beautiful without and within, it deserves to rank as a standard presentation book.

More than Conquerors. By Frederick Sherlock. London: "Home Words" Publishing Offices, 1 Paternoster Buildings. Price 1s. 6d. We will by-and-by give over the summing up of Mr. Sherlock's works. Biographer, journalist, historian, and novelist, he is certainly one of the most prolific and versatile of writers. We have admired his "Illustrious Abstainers," profited greatly by his history of "Fifty years temperance in Ireland," are informed by his weekly newspaper, and now we enter upon the pleasure of fiction supplied by his pen. The story, "More than Conquerors," suffers somewhat from two causes—it is by far too brief, and it is written piecemeal to meet the demands of a monthly serial. Still it shows us what the temperance-reading public has to expect from our gifted friend when he sets himself to frame and finish a novel full of incident, character, and description. The Conquerors are the sons of a distiller and the sons of a working bricklayer. The object of conquest is the drink, and the conquest is heroically achieved. We refer our readers to this finely written and beautifully illustrated story, advising them to jot its title on their memorandum before they sally out to secure a few capital books for New-Year's presents to the little folks.

Stones from the Brook. Talks with the Children, by the Rev. Richard Newton, D.D., author of "The King's Highway," &c. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price One Shilling.—The brook is the word of God, and in eleven sections we have such headings illustrated, as the Best Captain; the Best of all Blessings; How the Birds Praise God; the Good Soldiers; the Conqueror's Jewels; the Heavenly Bread, &c., &c. There is a marvellous profusion of stories specially suitable for children and fitted to draw their youthful hearts to God. We do not mean to say that the stories given in such profusion are all equally pointed, but we can and do say that we never in any book of its size saw scattered in such abundance so many really telling and delightful stories given in illustration of the worth to children of those things that belong to their life in God here, and their lasting peace hereafter. As a pious New-Year gift it deserves the widest possible circulation.

British Women's Temperance Association—Scottish Christian Union—Report of the Glasgow Prayer Union Branch, 1881. Secretary, Miss White, 1 Belmar Terrace, Pollokshields, Glasgow. This report, though not so ample as in previous years, yet shows well. The prayer meetings in Sauchiehall Street have been kept up and district prayer-meetings are also being carried on. There is a book kept for requests for prayer, and it is pleasant to find that answers to these requests have had to be recorded. Many of these requests are for intemperate young wives and mothers. The Saturday night gospel temperance meetings in the Evangelistic Tent and Hall have been highly successful, more than 1,000 pledges being taken during the year ending 1st September last. Deputations and memorials to magistrates and a petition to Parliament in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option resolution were successfully promoted. The Prison Gate Mission is another womanly work which has been carried on during the year. The poor discharged prisoners were almost all victims of the drink traffic, and the object of the mission is to relieve their wants, procure them employment, and seek their soul's welfare. From 30 to 40 women are in connection with the mission, working steadily, receiving a small daily wage, and others are doing well in situations. Then about 20 cabmen's rests in the city are supplied with interesting temperance and gospel reading, and one of the railway waiting rooms is similarly supplied. What one is there who on reading this simple record of their great and good, yet unobtrusive efforts, but must feel constrained from the bottom of his heart to pray that God would bless and prosper them.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. JOHN BUCHANAN, DUMBUCK HOUSE.—With keen sorrow we record the decease of this gentleman, who died at Dumbuck House, Dumbartonshire, on Sabbath, 11th ult., of a painful internal malady, which cut him off after years of painful suffering at the age of fifty-eight. A native of Killearn, he went to Glasgow and entered the firm of Messrs. John Gray & Co., wholesale confectioners. Ultimately, with his brothers, he entered into business under the designation of Messrs. John Buchanan, Bros., a firm which has from the integrity of its members a high reputation for its productions and its commercial honour. Mr. Buchanan was a most exemplary business man, large-hearted, loyal to his attachments, sympathizing with distress, and ready to afford generous aid to what could reasonably commend itself to his liberality. He will be greatly missed by a wide circle of friends who knew his worth, and with whom he was always ready to cooperate in every good cause. He was a vice-president of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, almost if not from its commencement, and was held in great esteem by the Executive. On hearing of his decease they met and passed the following resolution on the sad event:—"That this Executive hereby resolves to express the deep sympathy they entertain for Mrs. John Buchanan, and her orphan family, on the removal by death of her husband and their father, the late Mr. John Buchanan, one of the vice-presidents of this Association, and to proffer to them in their affliction, their sincere condolence on their inexpressibly sad bereavement; that the Executive, in paying this mournful tribute to his memory, desires to express their high opinion of the worth of their late friend, whom they always found warm hearted, unwavering, and generous in his sympathy with the objects of the Association, and whose kindly encouragement of their labours they deeply regret to think will gratify them no more. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to Mrs. Buchanan, and also to Messrs. Alex. and Andrew Buchanan, brothers of the deceased."

POETRY.

THE OLD CLOCK.

THERE is strange music in its sound,
The old clock in the kitchen there;
How long its old hands have gone round
I do not know, but I would dare
To say 'tis aged a hundred years.
And yet it strikes the hours so well,
So shrill and loud that one who hears
Seems listening to some minster bell.

I heard it long ago within
The old farmhouse so far away,
Where my young feet went out and in,
Protected kindly day by day.
Yes, I remember how its sound
Rang through the farmer's kitchen old,
And still as time goes round and round
It strikes the hours as shrill and bold.

Oft in the midnight, as I woke
And lay and listen'd, I would think,
As still its sounds the stillness broke,
How to Eternity's cold brink
Time bears us, and each moment brings
Us nearer to that awful goal;
I seem'd to hear Time's fleeting wings,
I felt a terror in my soul.

O grand old clock! O solemn thought!
Thou hast a prophet's voice, thou art
A monitor, and thou hast sought
To tell to every musing heart
How swiftly Time moves on and on,
How soon Eternity will come,
How soon men's short life will be done,
And all things meet a final doom.

And ever in the busy day,
And in the calm and silent night,
Thou sayest Time goes swift away,
Thou sayest haste and do some bright
And noble action, let not Time
Pass all away without some word
Or deed that will make life sublime,
For Time no respite can afford.

Woman's right—husbands.

An old maid was heard to explain, while sitting at her toilet the other day—"I can bear adversity, I can encounter hardships, and withstand the changes of fickle fortune; but oh, to live, and droop, and die like a single pink—I can't endure it; and what's more, I won't!"

The following bon mot is attributed to the Prince of Wales:—On being asked what he thought of Lord —, who always appeared clothed in the height of fashion, however extravagant the fashion might be, His Royal Highness is reported to have said—"To my mind he dresses not wisely, but too well."

THE PERMISSIVE BILL—ARGUMENTS FOR AND AGAINST.

SECOND PRIZE ESSAY, BY MR. JOHN C. HARVEY, ROTHESAY.

[The Essayist introduces his essay by making an affecting allusion to the generous aid which the late Mr. A. B. Stewart so kindly afforded to rising talent.]

BEFORE beginning to study the direct arguments for and against the Bill which for so many years has been intimately associated with the name of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, I think it is wise to enquire whether the "evil" proposed to be dealt with is real or imaginary. Is it a fact that the licensing system of our country is not what it ought to be? Is it a fact that there is no Act on the statute books of the realm which is able to prevent the cases of drunkenness which we daily witness? In considering the whole subject, I shall studiously avoid all exaggerations and mis-statements. I feel that the facts themselves are sufficient to induce any candid mind to agree with me that something ought to be done, and that immediately, to prevent the excesses which are draining the life-blood of many who should be the pillars of the State. It is absolutely impossible to deny that there are many in our land who have been ruined by the excessive use of strong drink, and that there are many more who even now are treading the downward path of drunkenness. It is scarcely within the scope of the subject of this paper to adduce the evidence of the clergy, the medical profession, the bar, and many others in places of influence and authority, whose daily work brings them face to face with the evils which follow the abuse of alcoholic beverages. Even those who are engaged in the liquor traffic have, time after time, publicly declared their abhorrence of drunkenness. An eminent brewer (the late Mr. Charles Buxton) said that "the struggle of the school, and the library, and the church, all united against the beer-house and the gin-palace, is but one development of the war between heaven and hell. It is, in short, intoxication that fills our jails; it is intoxication that fills our lunatic asylums; and it is intoxication that fills our poorhouses with poor. Were it not for this one cause, pauperism would be nearly extinguished in England." The Times recently said that "no way so rapid to increase the wealth of nations and the morality of society could be devised as the utter annihilation of the manufacture of ardent spirits—constituting, as they do, an infinite waste and an unmixed evil." Again I quote the leading English newspaper, which, in a recent issue, after describing the effects of intoxication upon various races of the human family, says, "For a scene of horrid vice, and filth, and lust, and fury, all drawn into one point and then fermenting, a man might search the world all over and not find a rival to a thriving public-house in a low gin-drinking neighbourhood of London." I frankly admit that some of the expressions used by the authorities I have quoted are rather stronger than I would have used of my own accord, but still I think I have taken my evidence from unbiassed sources. It will be enough for me to say that the immoderate use of intoxicating liquors is the cause of the drunkenness in our country, and it is quite as certain that the mischief resulting from intemperance tells not only upon our national position and the crime of the country, but also upon our social and moral well-being. Nothing tends so much to create the extremes of immense wealth and deepest poverty as the liquor traffic. By it insanity and disease are created, social demoralisation is induced, political corruption is engendered, homes are rendered desolate; whilst morality, religion, education, and all the virtues which go to exalt humanity, are obstructed; and for these evils this nation pays directly and indirectly an immense sum of money annually. The evidence of almost every judge in Great Britain could be adduced in support of my statement, that a very great portion of the crime which comes under their notice arises from the existence of these licensed houses, which are kept open by permission of the State, and which undoubtedly involve the intemperance which leads to the commission of crime. I am sure no one will venture to contradict the statement that the occupiers of houses presently legally licensed for the sale of intoxicants, could not obtain a subsistence but for the intemperance of at least a portion of the community. Interested parties have tried to prove, by dividing the total quantity of liquor used among the entire population of the country, that the amount per individual is very moderate; but even these statisticians must know very well that a large number of people use no intoxicating liquors at all, and this, of course, all goes to make up a larger proportion per head for those who do use it. Within the last fifty years there has been a great expansion of trade in the country; the working-classes are earning more wages; the hours of labour have been reduced; sanitary and other improvements have been made; the spread of education—religious, moral, and social—has done much to remove the cause of that crime which arises from ignorance, and yet the fact stares us in the face that our nation is more criminal now than at any time since the dawn of the present century. Why this should be so I cannot explain, and I do not believe it can be explained, otherwise than by pointing to the fact that the liquor trade has spread its poisonous influences so widely over the land. In the year 1860 the apprehensions for drunkenness and disorderly conduct alone were 88,361, while by the year 1874, the apprehensions for the same crimes were 185,730, or an increase of 110 per cent. Leaving out of account the very many cases of death indirectly caused by strong drink, not less than 30,000 lives are annually lost in England alone through overdrinking. Truly intemperance has a right to be called death's prime minister. Under a wise and just government the lives of the people are the wealth and strength of the nation, and when we consider that life is labour, and labour is riches, we must see that our nation is being hindered in its progress to prosperity by the curse of intemperance. Besides this, there is a direct loss in money of not less than two hundred and fifty millions of pounds per annum. During the past our legislators have been acting as if they believed the best method of dealing with the liquor traffic was to license it. Even very recently the local authorities of Liverpool tried free trade in licenses, but in a very short time they saw the evil of their work, as Liverpool has acquired for itself the unenviable distinction of being the most drunken town in the kingdom, and they are now trying to undo their work as speedily as possible; but under the present law, this will take some time.

If licensing the liquor traffic has been meant as an experiment, then it has been proved a failure, as is shown by the fact that drunkenness, with all its concomitant evils, is increasing more than the increased ratio of population warrants. But I do not wish to adopt an untried principle, for I hold that the principle of prohibition is as old as law itself. All that the supporters of the Permissive Bill wish is that this time-honoured and well-tried principle be applied. There are many acts which the law not merely restricts, but entirely prohibits. Thus the business of coining money is put down by every civilized State; gambling, polygamy, the slave trade, bull-baiting, cock-fighting, are all prohibited because the Government assumes the right to prevent or remove anything which may interfere with the moral, physical, and social interests of the people. Surely, then, seeing that the liquor traffic does interfere with the moral and social well-being of the people, it is the imperative duty of the Government to abjure licence and demand prohibition. This is simply the object of the Permissive Bill. The measure is not one clogged with many clauses, nor with a machinery difficult to understand or work. It is based upon the broad principle which I have just set forth, viz., that the liquor traffic as presently constituted is inimical to the well-being of the nation, as declared in its preamble as follows:—“Whereas the common sale of intoxicating liquors is a fruitful source of crime, immorality, pauperism, disease, insanity, and premature death, whereby not only the individuals who give way to drinking habits are plunged into misery, but grievous wrong is done to the persons and property of Her Majesty's subjects at large, and the poor rates and taxes are greatly augmented; and whereas it is right and expedient to confer upon the ratepayers of cities, boroughs, parishes, and townships, the power to prohibit such common sale as aforesaid.” I wish particularly to notice that Sir Wilfrid Lawson's measure will not necessarily put an immediate stop to the sale of intoxicating drinks. Hardly ever do I read a speech directed against the Permissive Bill in which I do not find statements to the effect that the measure is premature; that it would impose mortifications upon the majority for the vices and excesses of a small minority; that while it is a law designed to check an abuse, it would prevent the moderate and rational use of an article which only a few fanatics regard as injurious. I look on these affirmations as so much bluster and assertion without the slightest foundation, and I find that such statements never have anything appended to them by way of proof. The fact of the matter is, that the Permissive Bill will be entirely inoperative unless a majority, and a large majority too, are of opinion that the liquor traffic should be restricted. If the inhabitants of any town choose to encourage the liquor traffic, the passing of the Permissive Bill will not prevent them from having their will, but, on the other hand, if they desire to exclude or diminish the licensed houses in their own neighbourhood, it will be lawful for them to do so. The Permissive Bill, if passed, will not infringe on personal liberty, it will only acknowledge the liberty of self-government, for “Law does not put the least restraint

Upon our freedom, but maintains it;
Or if it does, 'tis for our good,
To give us greater latitude,
For wholesome laws preserve us free,
By stinting of our liberty.”

TEMPERANCE TEACHING FROM THE JOHN KNOX ST. MURDER, GLASGOW.

ON Sabbath afternoon, January 8, Dr. Fergus Ferguson, of Montrose Street E.U. Church, preached on the above subject, taking for his text Psalm cvii. 20 verse, “He sent His word and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions.” He remarked that although Thomas Ferguson had been reprieved the day before, and thus what some would call the sensational interest taken away from his case, he nevertheless thought it to be his duty to bring before his people the chief lessons the tragedy taught in a temperance direction, for he was of opinion that the woes wrought by drink often preached a better lecture than the best total abstinence advocates could deliver.

First. The first “destruction” he would take up that was wrought by drink, was the “destruction” of manliness. It was the duty of the husband to provide for the household, and he (Dr. Ferguson) never married a couple without telling the bridegroom that whereas up till that day he had a kind of liberty to expend his earnings on himself, he voluntarily denuded himself of that liberty by entering into the compact of matrimony, for thenceforth it would be incumbent on him to consider the interests of her he led to the altar as well as his own. Now, what do we find here? We find a man out of whom manliness has been so completely taken by drink that he is willing to allow this poor woman to work with her ten fingers, as she feelingly expressed it, for the support of herself and her children, whereas he works only when he pleases, and spends what he earns on his own lusts. We do read in books of South African travel and missionary enterprise that Hottentots and Caffirs compel their wives to work while they themselves lol lazily in the sun; and yet whenever Christianity truly enters their hearts, as if by a new instinct, the old regime is departed from, and the European custom, which is also the Bible enactment, immediately becomes the law of the house and of the day. O hearers, if you do not wish all the manliness taken out of you, and the meanness that is implied in such conduct as this tragedy brings before us, avoid, I beseech you, for ever, the fascination and the spell of the intoxicating cup.

Second. The next “destruction” that drink causes is that of conjugal love. Of course this is implied in the previous remark, but it deserves special notice by itself, for this man was most cruel when he should have been most kind. If at any time the tenderness of a husband's heart is specially drawn forth, it is when a man child or a woman child is born into the world. Then he walks through the house on hushed tiptoe, and beseeches all the rest to be quiet for the sake of her who is prostrate and weak, dividing his attention lovingly between the wife of his youth and the tender babe on whom he has impressed his own image. But O what a contrast have we here. All the kindness comes from the stranger, and the cruelty is from the husband and the father of the child. He comes about the house about five o'clock in the morning, and when the stranger asks his wife what is he wanting—for she did not know what he meant by "Give me my drops—my 10 drops,"—the reply is, "Oh, it is a glass of spirits he wants." Then wonderful generosity, for that forenoon he actually works and makes five shillings, and gives it for the support of the house, but in a few hours returns and demands it back again. When this demand is refused by her who knew the exigencies of her home, the glare of demoniac rage comes out of his eyes, and with clenched fist he says "I will do for you both." In a few hours he is seen in the neighbourhood intoxicated, and the poor frightened woman exclaims, "Lock the door, and take that heavy chest and roll it to it to keep him out." Husbands and fathers, that is what drink does in the hour when human tenderness is most called forth. What a difference when the husband's footstep on the stair is a source of joy—when all are glad when father comes home, especially the mother, with her new-born child on her breast, for she knows he will come and kiss it tenderly, and ask how she has fared since he left. What a contrast! And if you wish to be the latter and not the former, see that you abstain from maddening, brutalising drink, which, as Burns says concerning another vice, "hardens a' within, and petrifies the feelings."

Third. I remark next on this case that drink destroys life. The tragedy is not yet complete; the climax has not yet arrived. On that 16th of August a scream is heard on the stair, for one who had stood at the marriage altar vowing to nourish and cherish this woman for life has a gleaming knife in his hand, with his other hand on her shoulder, not in kindness, not in love, for the knife is about to descend into that principal organ of life—the heart. Ah, he had won the heart, and then he had broken the heart, and made the heart bleed with the bitterest drops of sorrow, and now he is about to perforate the heart through and through. "Must it have been a heavy blow," said Lord Deas to Dr. Moore in the witness box. "Yes," my Lord, "for you see the knife went through the cartilage of the rib and then penetrated the whole heart almost through and through." Again I say he had won the heart, and broken the heart, and now he pierces the heart through and through. Is it not enough to make all Glasgow rise that such a deed could be done at high noon, in broad daylight, in the city that should flourish by the preaching of the Word. In John Knox Street, too, with the monument of the Reformer visible at the head of it. Ah, me! if the city were rightly exercised in mind, the perpetration of such a deed would cause sackcloth to be hung next day on our sheriffs' benches, and our magistrates' benches, and on all the pulpits of the city, and signs of mourning exhibited from east to west and north to south. But, alas, they will drink on, and the very next entertainment the Provost will pass the loving cup round. Strange desecration of the name; for cup of hatred, or killing cup would be a far better name!

I have been listening to what the people were saying in Duke Street last week as they passed along the pavement, looking up to the prison. I heard two young women say, "Do you think he will be in yon window? He asked a knife to bone a ham, and he boned his wife." Poor things! I looked after them in all the attractiveness of their simple virgin beauty, and wondered if they would ever have hearts broken and hearts bled and hearts pierced by strong drink like their sister in John Knox Street. Still the thing moves on, and there are dozens of counters at which every morning the drink can be got by public license, just as Thomas Ferguson got it, for one man gave evidence that on the fatal morning he paid for his glass at 8 o'clock, and another that he paid for his glass at 10 o'clock, and when asked if he was drunk, the reply of both was—"No, but just hearty." Ay, hearty enough, excited enough to do the deed of blood.

Fourth. Notice next that drink destroys the intellect, the reason of man. The doctors have been giving evidence on different sides as to the sanity or insanity of this poor man, just as they are doing across the Atlantic on the case of Guitau; but there is no doubt that the persistent use of strong drink inflames the brain as the punishment of God, and induces that disease called delirium tremens, so closely allied to insanity, and very often its precursor. And if you wish never to be murderers, and never to have your brains so inflamed, touch not, taste not, the intoxicating bowl; for these dreadful consequences invade the Christian Church. I have got a call in my own house before now, as early as 8 in the morning, from two professing Christians, and the wife explained the visit by saying, "You see, sir, my husband says he has seen the Evil one. He says he saw him this morning looking out behind the blind in St. Andrew's Parish Church across to our house, for we live in St. Andrews Square." "Yes," said the afflicted man, "I see him, I see him, I see him." I was but a young man then and felt alarmed, as it was to me a novel sight and a novel narrative, yet what could I do but only kneel down with them both and pray Him who exorcised the legion of devils from the demoniac of Gadara, that He would deliver the poor possessed man who trembled before me. I have known also this visitation come on the office-bearer of a Christian church, for men come to us and profess to be converted, but afterwards the old habits return and their old sins master them. This man had flung articles of furniture from a high window one day. The police coming up exclaimed, "What is this? what is this? You, woman, cannot keep that man down in his bed, you must get help." That was the "destruction" that drink brings even within the bounds of the Church. O God, send Thy Word and heal us, and deliver us from such "destructions." Bless the word of a Richardson on the side of moral suasion, and the word of a Lawson on the side of legislative enactment, that we may be delivered from these "destructions."

Fifth. Notice further that drink destroys good grain, the people's food. Perhaps I should, in strict logical order, have brought in this particular first, as it may be called in one view of the case the cause of all these other "destructions," but I have designedly left it to the last, that my axe might, by God's blessing, give a blow at the root and help to bring the whole upas tree down. We hear it constantly said that drink is a good creature of God. I maintain that it is no more than are the torpedo or the Martini rifle, engines of destruction which man has made by his own skill and ingenuity. I have witnessed the whole process of the manufacture of drink; I have been told "This, sir, is the large vat in which the grain is steeped first; then this is the floor on which it is dried next, till it sprouts again, and you observe after it has sprouted it ceases to be of any use to the baker." When that remark was made I said to myself, "and can God be pleased that it ceases to be of any use to the baker?" Then I was led past the rolling stones that pressed it down to the mash tub and up again two or three stories to the fermenting vat, where first the peculiar odour of the alcohol begins to be felt, and by that time I was ready to say "It is not so much a creature of God as God's creature perverted and made poisonous by man." Even though you should call it in a very general sense a creature of God, who permits it to be fabricated by the reckless still, as my eloquent friend, Dr. Joseph Brown, quaintly remarks—"A hedgehog is a creature of God, but you do not take it into your bed with you." O, hearers, beware of this destruction, and God grant that the day may soon come when an end will be put to this "destruction," for I agree with Bailie Lewis in his late characteristic blast and manifesto, in which he declares that the land will never be right till brewing and distillation are branded as public crimes.

In the close of his discourse, Dr. Ferguson approached the spiritual part of his subject, and illustrated the Gospel of Christ by the reprieve which Lord Provost Üre had read just the day before to the condemned man in his cell. A word gladdened him, and healed him, and delivered him from his destructions; so, said the preacher, although there are important differences between the two cases, the Gospel of the death of Christ for man, and the pardon it brings, are the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

SIDE ISSUES.

BY REV. S. HARDING, PAISLEY.

If there ever was a time in the history of the temperance reformation when a declaration or re-affirmation of our principles should be known and widely diffused, that time is the present.

From various causes, there seems to be considerable doubt in the minds of both friends and foes as to the real attitude now assumed by the temperance party—whether it be one of uncompromising hostility or concession to the traffickers.

The matter is of vital importance, and the people should not be left in doubt as to the real position now taken.

Are our leaders really in earnest?

Are they seeking the overthrow of the liquor traffic?

These are questions that are being asked, and ought to be definitely answered. The people are tired of sham-fighting. The question at issue is one of life or death to multitudes of our fellow-men, of weal or woe to our country, of honour or shame to the name of our God and Saviour. The cause is too sacred, and the interest at stake too tremendous to be trifled with any longer. Either consolidate the forces, form into line, hoist the colours, sound the war-cry, and go forward to meet the enemy, or disband, drag down our colours, beat a retreat from the field, and hand over the perishing and dying to the tender mercies of the god of this world.

The country is weary listening to the various schemes and side issues that are being proposed as a remedy for the intemperance of our land, "shortening the hours," "providing counter attractions," "prohibiting the sale of liquor on the river steamers," "electing licensing boards," "reducing the number of licenses," &c.

These proposals indicate either sympathy with the traffic, moral cowardice, or want of faith in God and in the triumph of the truth.

Surely the men of Scotland have not forgotten the noble deeds and daring of their forefathers, who rather than compromise their principles stained the "heather" with their blood.

Shall temperance men be put to shame by those who are seeking a reform in the land laws, or by those who are banded together to separate the church from the state. What are these matters when compared with the magnitude of the evils occasioned by the liquor traffic, and yet there are no side issues, no compromises suggested by either of the parties named.

The Government are looking on, and carefully weighing the deliverances of those who assume the leadership of the movement, and the people will discover when it is too late that instead of the main question, the power to veto the traffic, they have a licensing bill in keeping with the side issues, so industriously propagated by temperance men themselves. Are not members of the Government calling upon temperance men to make their voices heard above others, with the implication that if they do so their wishes will be attended to. The present Government are not given to side issues upon any of the questions of the day. The noble deliverance of the Home Secretary at Derby in November clearly indicates their determination upon any matter they may take in hand.

"I will say for Her Majesty's Government, and if I did not say it, they would have no right to such a title—we will not swerve one single hair's breadth from the path which we believe to be necessary for the interest of the United Kingdom, whether we govern or whether we lose the Irish vote." Only let the temperance men of Scotland be true to their principles and press their demand upon the Government, that in the promised Licensing Bill power shall be given to the people to veto the traffic in alcoholic drinks, and earlier than many expect "Local Option" will become the law of the land.

LIQUOR PROHIBITION AND FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

It was announced in the daily papers the other week that the question of female suffrage is one which is about to receive the "careful consideration" of Mr. Gladstone and his Government. When Mr. Gladstone speaks in this manner we all know what he means. If the country is prepared to take up the question of female suffrage and press it to definite political issues, he is prepared to accede to the will of the country, and in due course frame a measure of political enfranchisement which knows no distinction of sex. The truth is, the question of female suffrage is no longer what it was only the other day—one of theory only—of mere abstract political speculation. From that purely verbal, inoperative realm it has finally emerged in tangible, concrete form, to take its place in the active arena of every-day politics. Women have now the right of voting at municipal elections.

When Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues have found time to turn their attention to this question of female suffrage, the very first difficulty they will have "carefully to consider" is the following:—At present the elective suffrage is a household one—the political property of male householders. To universalise the qualification so as to include female householders as well, would be advancing the political enfranchisement of women in name only, leaving matters very much as they are so far as the masculine gender of the mass of the electors are concerned. And the reason is obvious. Women are not householders—that is women as a class. In general, house property is owned and tenanted by the fathers, brothers, and husbands of women, but not by women themselves. Any change, therefore, in the direction of a purely adult franchise, without distinction of sex, must be one freed from the householding qualification if it is intended that women are to benefit politically by it. In short, if it is in contemplation to extend to women a participating share in the elective franchise such as will really place them on a footing of political equality with the male sex, there is but one perfectly just basis upon which such a scheme is practicable, and that is universal suffrage without distinction of sex.

Whether or not, as thus explicitly defined and set forth, this is the problem which Mr. Gladstone is prepared to take into "careful consideration," the moment is most opportune, we think, for liquor prohibitionists to do so. We will briefly adduce one or two very pertinent reasons why.

After eighteen years of indomitable drilling and tunnelling through the obdurate whinstone rock of parliamentary hostility and prejudice, our modern Archimedes, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, has at length succeeded in getting his world-famous lever of legislative interference with the drink traffic inserted into the very centre of parliamentary action. And now liquor prohibitionists have only to press with might and main, and lo! the huge incubus which is crushing the life out of society begins to move! Local Option passed, and our Archimedean lever dug anew into the granite bowels of the publican interest in the House of Commons; one strenuous, one irresistible heave—ho! more, and we have swept the curse of strong drink from our land? But to overtake this latter feat with assured and certain success we require one thing; we require the fulcrum of a new elective power in the State. We require to enlarge our platform, and go in heart and soul for the political enfranchisement of women—for universal suffrage without distinction of sex.

Now, it cannot be called in question for a single moment that if women had the power the traffic in strong drink would become non-existent to-morrow. It is chiefly males that drink, but it is chiefly women and children who are the sufferers. This vicarious distribution of indulgence and penalty may not be flagitiously at open variance with the strict letter of our brave masculine rights as defined by marital law and sanctioned by universal custom; but what do women themselves think about it? What do they think, or rather what is it that their crushed and agonized hearts do not daily and hourly endure in consequence of the hellish curse that dooms them and their hapless children to lifelong acquaintance with nothing in this world but poverty, hunger, nakedness, misery—misery unutterable; and cruel blows without end? And what they would do if, for a single day, the political remedy were entrusted to their hands no sane person need ask.

It augurs well for the final outcome of all recent controversy on this subject that we live in days when the alleged inferiority of women, as compared with men, is no longer shamelessly avowed as a sufficiently reasonable and valid ground why the former should be excluded from participating in the elective rights of our constitutional democracy. We must now leave ourselves room for one or two observations bearing more directly upon the fitness of women to be admitted to their just share of political responsibility.

Women bear rule in the domestic sphere, and they do so with a wisdom which rarely jars or comes into conflict with the cheerfully acknowledged regal authority of husbands and fathers within the habitable precinct. While males of despotic temper are humoured and conciliated, and the titular lord of the household is encouraged to believe that his spoken word is law, and that blind obedience to his most unreasonable mandates is first and last the sacred duty of the wedded wife, it is sufficiently notorious that the masculine head of the house has seldom the smallest claim to a particle of real authority inside his own doors. While clothed and honoured with tokens of respect and every outward semblance of undivided domestic empire, it is usually the good woman who butters his bread for him who retains all the substance of power. And it is well for the happiness of most homes that such is so very commonly the case. Most men will readily acknowledge that they owe everything that is pleasing and elevating, that sweetens the cup of existence, and renders life endurable to the good sense, taste, and good management of their wives. Only propose, however, that their women folks should still further illustrate their incomparable talents for making the best of things, for diffusing happiness, for bringing social joy and summer to the howling winter discontent of our barren over-masculine civilisation by voting for members of parliament, and nineteen out of twenty of these self-same matrimonial eulogists instantly stand aghast at the prospect. From the primitive times when there were female judges over Israel, from the days of Deborah, of Judith, of Zenobia, down to the reigns of Queen Margaret of Scotland, Queen Elizabeth, and our own Queen Victoria, the voice of history is not silent as to the admirable fitness of women to bear supreme rule. It is said we have a pretty lavish sprinkling of old ladies in the House of Lords already. No doubt we have, and if ladies—not so absolutely well stricken in point of years perhaps—literally sat on both the Ministerial and Opposition Benches of the House of Commons, surely the presence in Westminster of such a welcome guarantee of parliamentary good manners were infinitely to be preferred to our present interminable Irish rows and Bradlaugh expulsionscenes. But we have no reason to believe that women are a whit more ambitious of wielding direct political power than we know them to be non-ambitious of wielding direct domestic power. Women are much more largely gifted with modesty, and the precious culture of habitual non-selfassertiveness than their loud and braggart lords and masters of the opposite sex. And to suppose them rampantly ambitious of signalling themselves to public gaze as unsexed he-creatures, legislative amateurs in petticoats, is a bogus of very unenlightened and very irrational masculine superstition. Even in the matter of School Board elections women rarely vote for women.

The truth is, were women admitted to the elective franchise, and a new House of Commons were returned to-morrow, the present masculine personnel of that assembly would remain unchanged. There would be change indeed, but it would be quite other than a mere displacement of sex antecedents. A new spirit would be inbreathed into legislative debate and governmental action, giving utterance and ultimate embodiment for the first time in history to the diviner side of human nature—the noble, the impassioned, the unselfish humanitarian instincts of the feminine mind. There would be an end to many crying enormities of our crusty and lamentably defective civilisation. But first in the programme of swift reform there would be an end to the drink!

Meantime the responsibility of a great opportunity rests upon the shoulders of the temperance party of this country. We are in the thick of the most deadly warfare known to our race-history. Either we must destroy the drink, or the drink will destroy us. After fifty years of unparalleled conflict, this is the exact logic of the contention at issue, and it is one which is thoroughly understood on both sides. The camp of our enemy lies invested. We have drawn the lines of parliamentary circumvallation closer and closer, but to all appearance rearing front more invincibly above ground than ever rises the defiant fortress of the public-house interest; and pointed to our bosoms with more murderous effect than ever the fatal guns of the dramshop belch forth the indiscriminate slaughter of wife, of friend, of child. Surrounded with the heaped up slain of alcohol on every side, how are we to conquer? Well, we have the women on our side. Outside of the poisonous interests of the accursed traffic itself, every woman's heart in the country is with us, every woman high and low, rich and poor, married and unmarried. If, while pressing liquor prohibition to the utmost, the great temperance party take up the cause of our natural allies, and, doing so, engineer the question of female suffrage with the political skill and determination which they have heretofore displayed in agitating upon the lines of their more especial programme, they will accelerate the march of events, and anticipate, as with giant strides, the near and final extinction of the doomed traffic itself. One last word, our Archimedean lever lies ready to our hand, but if liquor prohibitionists are convinced that we must have the sure political fulcrum of female suffrage to enable us to sweep away the drink, then we have no time to lose. Instant action should be our watchword. Everywhere we should promptly set about utilising our organisations throughout the country for the purpose of specially educating women to a due sense of their political power and responsibility in connection with our especial agitation for the total suppression of the drink curse. If we seize time by the forelock, we may not succeed in entirely rescuing the present generation of drunkards, but assuredly we will save our children.

CHAPTER VII.

HOPE DEFERRED.

NEXT morning's post brought a letter from Mrs. Taylor's only brother, saying his wife was at the point of death, and begging them if they wished to see her to come off immediately. He was a doctor practising in a remote part of the northern Highlands, a long journey from Edinburgh, and one which, owing to the number of changes from train to steamboat, the ladies could not make alone. But though pressed with business, James said he would accompany them, for Aunt Ellen was very dear to them all. She was indeed a sweet, amiable, loving woman, who had borne an invalid's cross uncomplainingly for years. It was a terrible grief to them, and you cannot wonder that in the tumult of thought and bustle of preparation Alice forgot Jennie Gibson, and only remembered when they were fairly away that she should have left a charge to the servants concerning her. She would write, she told herself, whenever she reached Arrachdhu, but Aunt Ellen's spent condition demanded her attention and thoughts, and again the matter was laid aside and forgotten.

All Friday and Saturday Jennie watched hungrily for the friend who was far away, and her heart sank when Saturday drew to its close, and still she did not come. As she stood with her papers beneath the gas lamp at the corner of St. Andrew's Square, she eagerly scanned every passer by, hoping to see her among them, but again she was doomed to disappointment. So occupied was she that she forgot the papers must be sold if she wished to escape her mother's wrath; she came to herself with a start as a neighbouring clock struck nine, and now she saw Princes Street was almost deserted, for the night was bitterly cold, and the first flakes of a coming snow-storm were flying in the wind. She left her corner and sped across to the stairs leading to the Waverley Station, but they were already possessed by half a dozen eager urchins who would not be slow to drive the interloper away with oaths and blows, if she ventured to encroach on their domain. There was nothing to be hoped for there, so she turned wearily round the crowded corner of the North Bridge, sometimes offering a paper timidly to a passenger who would only push her aside with a shake of the head or a cross refusal.

As she neared her home noise and bustle increased, for in the quarters of the poor, the streets are always busy—you see there is so little, so very little in their wretched homes to keep them within doors. Jennie peeped in at all the public houses as she passed up the High Street, wondering fearfully where her mother was. There seemed to be a crowd at Blair's Close, a fight, Jennie thought likely. Saturday night could not pass in peace and quietness, drunken brawls and breaches of the peace were the common amusements of the eve of the holy Sabbath day. She elbowed her way through the crowd to see what the commotion was, and then she shrank back with a low cry. It was her mother and another drunken woman, fighting like tigers, blinded by fury, and urged on by the brutal encouragement of the depraved onlookers. Not a policeman was to be seen, but a gentleman passing went in search of one, and he was promptly on the scene, and handcuffed them both. I cannot describe to you the appearance of these two women—it would have made your heart sick to see them, human beings in whom God had implanted once the loveliness and purity of womanhood, sunk now lower by far than the lean and ugly cur yelping at their heels. Truly our God had need be merciful to such as these. The policeman led them both off to the police station followed by a hooting mob angry at being deprived of their sport; then Jennie, crying bitterly, crept down the close and up the stair to the garret. But lo, it was locked, and Jean Gibson had the key away with her in her pocket, so for the night Jennie was homeless. She did not much care after all, it was a poor shelter, and surely she would find some corner outside big enough to hide her till morning. She left the papers lying at the door, and went down again to the street. With one of the few halfpence she had earned she bought a roll, and ate as she retraced her steps down the North Bridge. She turned round into Princes Street again, and went quickly along by the railway to the gardens at the further end. By daylight Jennie had often looked longingly into that beautiful place, knowing it was not for her, and that she dare not set foot within the gates. They were locked now, for ten had rung; but Jennie meant to enter now, and when not a soul was in sight, she nimbly scrambled over the railing, and was soon lost to sight in the gloom of the valley below. She went lightly down the broad walk, not feeling afraid though it was dark and lonely. She was looking for some snug corner below some tree, perhaps, where she might pass the night unseen and unmolested. By-and-bye she slipped down beneath a thick spreading holly tree, standing in the great black shadow of the Castle Rock, and where no eye could see her now but God's.

It felt warm down there, it was sheltered, you see, and Jennie felt very snug and comfortable indeed, and happier than she often did in the garret at home. It was very dark away up in the street, the gas lamps shone steadily like so many stars, and the lights in the windows looked very beautiful indeed, so Jennie thought. By-and-bye a train whizzed past with a mighty noise and shriek, the red lights gleaming fiercely through the night. Jennie could see the men on the engine, and held her breath for fear they had seen her. How could they? The wind had fallen, and the snow did not seem ready to come on yet, for the flakes had gone. Away up in the sky, far beyond the grey turrets of the castle the stars were shining. In a timid way Jennie looked at them, and wondered about the God who lived above them, and knew and loved her, poor and wee and ragged though she was. Was He looking at her now? and was He angry because she had stolen in here where she was forbidden in the daytime. She shut her eyes up very tight and almost trembled to think of it. But by-and-bye that fear died away again, and she looked up at the twinkling stars, remembering only the words Miss Taylor had taught her, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

With that thought in her heart, Jennie fell asleep.

CHAPTER VIII.

UNDER THE SNOW.

By daybreak on Sunday morning Jennie was awake and stirring. It was grey and still, very still; there seemed to be no sound in all the great city but the twittering of a bright-eyed robin on the topmost bough of the holly tree. But the sleeping hundreds would awake by-and-bye; the church bells would ring their summons, and the streets would be alive with worshippers on their way to the house of God. The bells had no summons for Jennie; she had never been within a church door in her life, and did not very well know the meaning of the word. She hurried up again to the railing and vaulted over just in time, for a sharp-eyed policeman was on his beat not many yards away. But she was away along the street like a hare before he had time to wonder from whence she had sprung. She felt stiff and weary, and the pain at her side was worse than it had been the previous day; but she dragged her tired limbs slowly towards her home, although knowing well enough her mother would not be there, A neighbour at her window saw her enter the close.

and came out on the stair to ask her where she had been all night. Jennie told her, whereat she was much shocked.

"Ye micht hae cam' in tae me, bairn; I'd hae gi'en ye a corner some gate. Ye maun be stervin' o' hunger an' cauld, an' ye look for a' the world like a ghost. An' dear only kens when yer mither 'll be oot the gaol again. She'll get sixty days likely."

"Wull she?" asked Jennie listlessly, not caring much though she got sixty years.

"Come in, an' I'll get ye a cup o' tea," said the kind-hearted soul. "Ye're a waefu'-lookin' crater, bairn. My certes, Jean Gibson 'll hae a sair punishment to bear for this yet. I've heard the Lord forgies a'budy, but gin He forgies sic a mither as she's been, He's no' ill tae please."

"She wasna' aye as bad, Mrs. White," said Jennie. "I mind when she didna' get drunk, and never licket me."

"That's no' been this mony a year. Weel, come awa' in, an' I'll get ye some tea."

Jennie willingly obeyed. She did not feel hungry, only faint and sick, and like to drop where she stood.

The tea revived her considerably, and she fell asleep again by the kind woman's hospitable fire. In the afternoon she went out again, with many injunctions to be sure and come back to sleep all night, which was very willingly promised. She sought her way again to St. Andrew's Square, in the hope that she might catch a glimpse of her kind friend coming home from church; but, alas! at that moment Alice Taylor was weeping passionately at a dying bed in a far away northern village, and asking God to bring the sufferings of a loved one to a merciful close.

So the Sunday wore away, and at night Jennie lay down to sleep, thinking joyfully that to-morrow was the day when she was to see Miss Taylor again. On Monday she was to go for her new dress; but it was not of the dress the child thought, but of the sweet face, the gentle, kind voice, and above all of the wonderful story she might hear again about the kind Jesus who had loved and died for her, a poor little waif, nothing in the world to anybody—not even to her mother.

It snowed on Monday morning, but towards noon it fared a little; but it was only a breath of peace before the coming of the great storm which had been brewing for days. The hours seemed slow and long to Jennie that day, but they passed one by one, and three o'clock came at last. She hurried off full of hope and joy, heedless of the bitter cold and the icy wind. She felt tired when she reached St. Andrew's Square. A very little way wearied her now, and she paused a moment on the steps to still the pain at her side before she rang the bell. Her ring was answered by Mary, who had been quarrelling with the cook, and was out of temper. "Is—is the lady in?" queried Jennie, looking fearfully at the girl's flushed face.

"No, she isn't; she's away from home; don't know when she'll be back; and see here, you little beggar, don't come here again, botherin', or I'll get a policeman to you sure."

Then she slammed the door, and left the child chilled and astounded on the steps. It was a terrible disappointment. The tears welled up in her eyes, and a sob broke from her quivering lips. This was the end of all her happy hopes. The lady was gone, and had forgotten her. She would never see her again; she would hear no more of the kind Jesus, nor of His happy heaven where even she might go by-and-bye if she only loved and trusted Him. She wandered on through the streets, heedless of the direction she was taking; and then, feeling that she wanted a place to lie down and sleep in, she came back again with weak and weary feet to the Gardens in Princes Street. The snow was falling so thickly and heavily that she entered without being seen, and sped down to her corner beneath the holly tree. Creeping down there, she drew her little dress over her head, and whispered beneath her breath,

"Dear Jesus, tak' me hame tae heaven, for I've nae hame here, an' I'm tired an' sair, an' I like tae greet."
And the snow flakes fell thickly from the leaden skies, and, being whirled by the wind in upon the child in her poor shelter, made for her a pure and spotless shroud.

James Taylor and his sister returned to town on Tuesday afternoon. They had left their mother behind to comfort awhile the mourning household.

"Did Jennie Gibson come yesterday, Mary?" was the first question she asked the girl as she helped her off with her things.

Mary bent low over her mistress's bag to hide the flush of shame the question brought. But she answered carelessly enough,

"Yes, ma'am, and I told her to come back before the end of the week, as you were away."

"I forgot to tell you she was coming, and to be kind to her, that was all," said Alice wearily, for she was tired and sad. "I shall go and see her to-morrow. Let us have some tea upstairs as quickly as you can, please. Mr. Taylor must go to his office immediately."

(To be concluded in our next.)

POETRY.

A HUMBLE GRAVE.

RICH was the floral wreath he entwined,
To adorn the grave of his darling dead;
And with many a sigh and scalding tear,
The flowers were placed 'bove her beauteous head.

Proud was the meaning each floweret bore,
For she was a haughty and high-born maid,
But the giant Death despiseth rank,
She was smote by his hand and lowly laid.

And almost ashamed was this proud bridegroom
Of the humble grave by his darling's side;
The golden lines on the marble stone
Told their ancestral line with boast and pride.

Yet e'en she is loved, he coldly thought,
And gazed on the violets that deck'd her breast;
And perchance, like me, some have sighed and wept
When they laid her there to her final rest.

He sailed away that his grief might die,
Might fade 'neath the sun of a far off clime;
Then again he'd grace his father's halls,
Cheered by travel and soothed by time.

He came again when a year had passed,
And straight to the grave of his loved one hied;
But lo! the splendid wreath he entwined
Lay faded and brown, each flower had died.

But the violets bloom on the humble grave,
And a perfume shed as they sweetly wave;
What are noble birth, and pomp, and pride?
Humility only reigns in the grave.

MARY GRANT.

A little girl was the other day parsing the word angel when she stopped dismayed, and asked her teacher if there were any men angels in heaven?

"WHEN WINE'S IN, WIT'S OUT."—There is no rule without its exception, and the case of Jock Lawson was a striking exception to the above. On leaving off work one Saturday afternoon, Jock indulged too freely in "the cup that inebriates." Having assuaged his thirst, Jock started for home; but he had hardly reached the street when his head began to reel, and he was glad to avail himself of the support of a friendly lamp post. After steadying himself against it for a time, he essayed to move on; but his limbs refused their office, and after one or two ineffectual attempts at progression he gave it up, and stammered out, "This'll no dae, Jock; ye'll hae to tak' a cab—better a shillin' the day than five on Monday."

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

FEBRUARY, 1882.

* * We have been obliged, in order to find room for meeting reports, to leave over much of our general news, Book Shelf, and a number of important papers.

We beg to draw the attention of our readers to the sermon which we publish by Rev. Dr. Fergus Ferguson, Glasgow, on the man Ferguson, sentenced to death for wife murder in this city, but now in penal servitude for life. The reverend preacher speaks trumpet-tongued against the liquor traffic.

A GENEROUS DONATION.

The Secretary has received the following gratifying letter from Miss Jane Nicoll :—

“Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in forwarding through you to the Association the enclosed sum of twenty pounds sterling as a memento of my dear departed father and brothers, David and Robert. It will not make up for the loss sustained by the Association in their removal. But the cause is God’s, and he can raise up many others. Hoping that the day may not be far distant when the stain of intemperance shall be wiped from our beloved land, I remain, yours, in a common Saviour’s service,

JANE NICOLL.”

This is a truly generous donation, quite apart from its filial intention, which is worthy of admiration, and greatly enhances the value of the gift. We hope that the generous example of Miss Nicoll will encourage many of our friends who may be deliberating upon the many appeals to them for aid. They may like her encourage the Executive by sending such a sum as will be a memento of some friend who, had he lived, would have continued a generous supporter to the funds. We hope, for the sake of the agitation, that the noble gift of Miss Nicoll may be followed by many others.

Up to 1st January last the brilliant progress made by the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement has been made under the impression that severe as is the struggle to get the veto embodied in legislation it would not be more so than the effort to apply it in any constituency; the evils, nay, the horrors attending these efforts were made as appalling as was possible to the pen of the newspaper writer. While we had no desire to minimise the difficulties attending the introduction of so great and beneficial a change, we never faltered in our belief that we should succeed. Now that women—widows and spinsters—have a voice and vote in municipal affairs we believe that any misgivings on this point are removed. On all that relates to the stability of home their womanly instincts will lead them to vote for the right. They will not hesitate like men between their duty and their interests, but to relieve human suffering, to protect their cruelly wronged sisters, and their worse than orphaned offspring, they will crowd the polling-booths and vote down the publicans. Intelligent observers of American voting pay a just tribute to their unflinching efforts for Home Protection. We believe that in Scotland we will find in female municipal voters one of the best of our reserve battalions.

The Blue Ribbon movement is still making surprising progress in Scotland. In Forfar, although not near so rapid, still the impetus of Mr. Murphy’s visit continues its stimulus, and we hear the most pleasing accounts of the good work. We have not heard sufficiently of the effort made to fix the results attained by organisation, but we feel assured that the friends are quite alive to the necessity of keeping as many as they can of the large numbers who assumed the Blue Ribbon badge. Of the effect on the community of Forfar there can be no mistake. It has been asserted, and it has not been denied, that great prosperity to trade and commerce has followed this special temperance effort: the moral and religious results are to be seen in greater attendances at the churches and in the absence of disorder and crime. It is matter for regret that the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Act could not have been voted upon in Forfar. Not only would we have had the Blue Ribbon electors casting a joyful vote in its favour, but we should have had many of those going along with them who in all that concerns business and trade “take care of the main chance.” A combination of these would have triumphantly carried local prohibition in Forfar, and in all time to come its blessings would have rested on the community. Forfar has within itself a little prohibitory community which will be appealed to at the proper time. Meantime as the present agitation expands itself, not a few will be confirmed in their desire for a direct veto of the liquor applied and sustained by the ratepayers.

Dundee has had the Blue Ribbon agitation going on within its area for a month, and the results have been marvellous, about 25,000 persons putting on “the ribbon of blue.” Provost Moncur has been unwearied in his efforts to secure all the advantages to Dundee possible from such an agitation, and much is owing to him of the striking results that have attended this exceptional campaign. The friends working with him also can lay claim to great credit for their cordial co-operation during the whole progress of Mr. Murphy's visit to Dundee. There are two features of this agitation worthy of our readers' serious attention. The first is the singularly unchristian and unsympathizing attitude of the greater portion of the ministers of Dundee to this movement. They stand aloof, and let the work of rescuing the perishing lie to laymen's hands. They make a sad mistake; they show to those saved by this movement that salvation is not necessarily of the church, and that the church does not lead the moral and religious progress of the age. To allow that idea to lodge in the minds of the community is to widen the chasm that already obtains between ministers and the common people, and to allow of a state of matters that may sooner or later bring disaster upon the church. The very energy and self sacrifice shown at this time of special efforts by the few godly ministers who rally around Mr. Murphy and his fellow workers, make the absence of other ministers more striking. A reformation of our churches is urgently demanded and is among possible events. Woe be to those that resist its purging power. The other feature of the Blue Ribbon campaign is of the most encouraging nature. On the motion of Mr. A. S. Cook, of Aberdeen, a resolution in the following terms was adopted at the All-day Conference held in the Kinnaird Hall on the 24th ult. "As the liquor traffic ostensibly exists for the public convenience, this conference believes that the time has now come when power should be given to the people to veto the traffic when and where they are disposed." The adoption of that motion was carried by the conference en masse rising to its feet. Its passage with such hearty unanimity shows how great the change is that has taken place in the conduct of moral suasion effort. When kindred attempts to that of Mr. Murphy's mission used to be made, those taking part in them were at no pains to conceal their exultation over prohibitory efforts. At such times we prohibitionists were loudly reminded that to shut one's mouth was the only true abstinence that was consistent with human freedom. But what a change! People have been learning by bitter and chastising experience that great numbers in the community are unable to resist the legalised temptations to drinking that abound in our villages and our cities; that these unhappy people notwithstanding the herculean efforts of moral suasion missions, do fall under the fell spell of the public house, and that their last state is their worst. Now it is being clearly seen that prohibition is really the complement of moral suasive action, and at this moral suasion conference a demand goes up to Government that a veto ought to be given to the ratepayers by which when and where they are they may exclude the liquor traffic from their locality, and for ever relieve the ratepayers from the mischievous operations of a business which saps the physical, mental and moral vigour of the drinker, and proves dangerous to the life and property of all. We hail this resolution of the Dundee Blue Ribbon movement as one of the most obvious indications of national enlightenment on the precise attitude which prohibition bears to moral suasion—an attitude based on identical interest and of the duty which prohibitionists and moral suasionists alike are called upon to discharge—to spend and be spent in the prohibitory warfare until decisive victory crowns their patriotic struggle.

We are on the eve of another Parliamentary Session. An attempt has been made by many clever people to forecast its course. These clever people tell us that the Government will be wrecked about June or July, when there will be an appeal to the country on the assimilation of the county and burgh franchise. As there may be such an event, we hope that our friends everywhere will be prepared, as they were at the last general election, to carry out their old policy—supporting those candidates only who will give them suppressive local option. Indeed, after the recent definition of that term to mean prohibition or restriction or future prevention, it had better be dropped and the suppressive veto or the Permissive Bill take its place. Let our friends see that no man is returned by them to Parliament who declines to grant the ratepayers power to suppress the licenses in their district. Have no fellowship with restriction, but support prohibition. That is the want of Scotland, and that alone. Our friends will all the sooner gain their end that they do two things—make it clear to the Government that they want suppression, and that they are determined to have it. In that spirit a general election will be found still further contributing to the progress of their cause.

In our last issue we pointed to the highly creditable effort of the Greenock friends in getting up an excellent memorial to Lord Rosebery, and we hinted that such a memorial might go up to Mr. Gladstone from every burgh in Scotland. The Greenock memorial was signed by nearly one hundred of the municipal and other officials in the town, by almost all its ministers, and by many leading gentlemen. Such a course of action would redound to the credit of all communities taking it, while the publication of the memorial would, as in the case of Greenock, produce a stimulating influence on the movement throughout Scotland. We earnestly commend this matter to all earnest souls who desire to move the Prime Minister and their own representative to enact a law for Scotland embodying a suppressive veto. This is the true way to follow out Mr. Herbert Gladstone's advice, to let their voices be heard above the rest of their countrymen in demanding the overthrow of the liquor traffic.

During the past month the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have put forth a most strenuous effort. Beginning as soon after the new year saturnalia as possible, their representatives—including Revs. Dr. Adamson, A. Wilson, John M'Queen, E. J. Boon, W. C. M'Dougal, and Samuel Harding; ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; Bailie Selkirk, J.P.; Capt. Brothie; Messrs. J. Coutts, S.S.C.; John Steel, James Winning, and others, with the Secretary and agents—have visited a number of leading towns. Meetings, preceded by conferences, have been held in Dumfries, Port-Glasgow, Perth, and Portobello. The deputation to these four places had the singularly able assistance of the Rev. W. Barker, Queen's Chaplain. The other places included Dundee, Linlithgow, Grangemouth, Peebles, Galashiels, Kelso, Maybole, Whithorn, &c. At these places the utmost enthusiasm was manifest, and the Executive have been instructed to continue and increase their efforts to get a special suppressive veto Act for Scotland.

During the past few years the directors of the Scottish Temperance League, the Executive of the Good Templars, and the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, met from time to time in friendly conference with a view to uniting in promoting special liquor legislation for Scotland. These conferences resulted in the League's adhesion to the suppressive veto of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and in all the Executives accepting the famous "six points." When the Joint Executives, however, set themselves to frame a measure which would include the suppressive and lesser veto, difficulties, which were at last found insuperable, presented themselves. There was, however, no difficulties with the suppressive veto—none whatever. Its simplicity and directness were more than ever conspicuous. With the lesser veto this was not the case. The difficulties attending the attempt to embody it in a bill could not be overcome, and the plebiscite superseding it is as impracticable as a bill. Matters continued in this state until the beginning of October last, when a conference was called to consider certain proposals for the solution of these difficulties. These proposals are the methods of the united manifesto now before the country: namely, local boards with plenary powers, and an alternative plebiscite. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association attended this conference merely to intimate that they could not and would not enter upon these proposals, which were in their nature subversive of prohibition and alien to the principles and policy of prohibition of the Association. It is due to all

Up to the time of separation much benefit followed these conferences. All the associations became unanimous on the necessity of a suppressive veto. None of them has greater reason to rejoice over this gratifying result than the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. That unanimity vindicates years of agitation and encourages the hope that in the near future, if the agitation is maintained with its usual vigour, is liberally supported, and its supporters evince the same steadfast loyalty to their principles, their labours will see a triumphant issue. While they can thus regard their efforts with proud satisfaction, they cannot on the other hand refrain from expressing their deep regret at the appearance of the united manifesto. It will, in their opinion, lead to distraction and confusion in the ranks of temperance reformers, and suggests to the Government of the day reasons for shelving the question of special suppressive legislation for Scotland for another session. It will satisfy no truly intelligent and reflecting temperance reformer, while it will offer an opportunity to the timid and strategic alike of evading the direct issue of suppression. These proposals are a lame and impotent conclusion to the prohibitory declarations of both Associations in the united manifesto. There we find it is said, "The manifesto must not be regarded as a formal expression of the full or ultimate demand of either Association." Had they intended to issue such, "One short sentence would suffice, viz., total prohibition and suppression of the manufacture, sale, and importation of all alcoholic beverages." "While we insist upon local option, we must let all parties distinctly understand that no form or measure of local option will be satisfactory, or lead to a cessation of the agitation, which does not concede a pure veto, i.e., a veto on the traffic alone, and a full veto, i.e., a veto on the issue, transfer, or renewal of all licenses."

The just expectations arising from such laudable sentiments would be a resolute determination on the part of the League and Templars to ask for that only which they can rightly claim from the Government—power to the ratepayers absolutely to veto the liquor traffic affecting them. These Executives are at the head of associations who teach that alcohol poisons the brain, deranges the mind, and through that derangement brings innumerable and intolerable evils upon society, and they urge upon all who are within the reach of their appeal to abandon the use of these liquors. Yet in their united manifesto these abstinence doctrines are so clogged by compromises as to be practically worthless. It is a matter of convenience or expediency, not a matter of conscience or duty to deal with the evils of intemperance. Instead of calling upon men and women to take their stand upon what is right and due, they ask them to elect boards or to call for a plebiscite, neither the one nor the other necessarily resulting in prohibition. They cannot point to a licensing or local board scheme, having as its object suppression, and they know that the licensing courts or boards of Scotland have ever been in their attitude to prohibition a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. Within the last few weeks we learn that Maine has abolished local boards in favour of a popular veto. We should have as soon have expected to have found it recorded that Boards had been elected to administer the Slave laws effectively, or the Corn laws, as the drink system. It is due, however, to those responsible for the united manifesto to state that they prefer a ratepayers' veto to local boards.

The local option they desire may be fitly described as of Hermaphroditic or amalgam origin, being a compound of Lawson, Bright, Foster, Anstruther, and Parker. The united manifesto has done one good service by its attempt to define local option—it has shown the utter want of either temperance or prohibitory principle in a remedy founded upon its definition. The suppression of the liquor traffic is the right and duty of the citizen, and being so, what are the alternatives they offer but an evasion of that right and that duty. The liquor traffic is held as partly right or wholly wrong, as the man asked to vote may think, not a veritable wrong in itself. A man is told by the schedule that he may or may not interfere with the existing traffic, and that his duty as a voter may be fulfilled by simply declaring that he does not want more public-houses than those existing around him. The publicans can easily sign No. 3, laughing, most likely, at the gross ignorance of the preventive new licensing powers in Dr. Cameron's Act, shown by the framers of the united manifesto. They will be found signing No. 2 when a moment's reflection shows them the utter impossibility of carrying it out. There are 479 licensed places in Dundee, and it is proposed to reduce them to 279. The same difficulties that surrounded the lesser veto would cluster around No. 2 of the plebiscite, and it is for the owners of this manifesto to come forward and show to the authorities of Dundee how 200 are to be selected for sacrifice. "Two women were grinding at the mill, the one was taken and the other left"—but unerring wisdom made the choice. It is as likely as not that the 279 left would be more worthy of suppression than the 200 taken away.

After all, the suppressive veto of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association stands out more simple and clear. Its friends and supporters appeal to the people on one issue and one only, namely, the unutterable wrong that alcoholic liquors continually and of necessity inflict on society, and calls upon them to say if such a wrong is to exist—not whether it is to be diminished, but whether it is to exist. The one question with them is public-houses or no public-houses; their ballot-paper has a simple Yes or No. Their veto is pure, because it is uncontaminated by restriction or alternatives; it is full, as it provides for the only duty which can be founded upon the principles of the Association—the overthrow of a system alike emphatically condemned by Scripture, reason, science, and true politics. This is the issue which those who are responsible for the united manifesto should have placed before the people. In doing this they would have been leading the movement which they believe is the only one that will secure the destruction of the traffic, and they would have left the ignorant and interested "outsider" to tinker with a system incurably bad, by palliatives, which but slightly lessen its virulence. If they stand by their manifesto they will inevitably place themselves in the ranks of those whose abortive legislative schemes have been the sorrow of staunch prohibitionists, and have provoked the jeering comment of practical minds.

TEMPERANCE MEETINGS IN PERTH.

ON Thursday, 19th ult., two meetings were held in Perth under the auspices of the Perth Temperance Society.

CONFERENCE IN GOOD TEMPLARS' HALL.

At six o'clock a conference was held in the Good Templars' Hall, Canal Crescent. Councillor Russell, President of the Perth Temperance Society, occupied the chair, and amongst those present were:—The Rev. Mr. Barker, Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the Queen, Cowes; the Rev. D. D. Bannerman, Free St. Leonard's Church; the Rev. John Rainnie, Knox Free Church; the Rev. J. Symon, Free St. Paul's; Bailie Selkirk, Glasgow; ex-Bailie Torrens, Glasgow; Mr. Robert Mackay, Secretary of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association; Councillor Campbell; Councillor Bridges; Mr. John Moncrieff, Perth Glass Works, &c. The representatives present were as follows:—From Free St. Leonard's Temperance Association, Mr. Hugh Monro; E.U. Church, Perth, Rev. R. Finlay and Mr. D. Scrimgeour; Perth Women's Temperance Society, Mrs. Peebles, Princes Street; Perth Temperance Association, Mr. D. Allan; Perth Temperance Hundred, Mr. Crystal; Crief Temperance Society, Mr. John G. Allan; Pitlochry Temperance Society, Mr. John Young; District Lodge of Good Templars, Mr. A. Wright; Good Templar Lodge, Mr. P. Campbell, Mr. Watson; Bridge of Earn Good Templar Lodge, Mr. A. M'Niven; Fair City Lodge, Perth, Mr. John Wilson; Ark of Safety Lodge, Perth, Mr. D. W. Dewar; Star of Kinnoull Lodge, Perth, Mr. James M'Carrick; Star of Tay Lodge, Perth, Mr. R. R. Robertson; St. John's Lodge, Perth, Mr. J. Ferrier; Star of Hope Lodge, Perth, Mr. R. M'Lauchlan; Tayside Lodge, Perth, Mr. George Caird; Heather Bell Lodge, Crief, Mr. J. G. Allan; Hope of Stanley Lodge, Mr. Wm. Low, Stanley; Coupar-Angus, Mr. John Barnett.

After tea, the CHAIRMAN stated that letters of apology had been received from Sir Donald Currie, M.P.; Mr. C. S. Parker, M.P.; Mr. Robert Pullar; the Rev. A. Sutherland, York Place U.P. Church; and the Rev. Mr. Mackenzie, Dunkeld. Sir Donald Currie, in a brief note, assured the conference that he "would give his best consideration to whatever proposals may be made with a view to the increase of temperance amongst the people of Scotland." Mr. Parker in his note, which was also brief, hoped that in the proposals of the conference "regard will be had less to what societies for the total suppression by law of the liquor trade may desire than to what Parliament might practically entertain." (A Voice—"That's a sham." Laughter and applause.)

Baillie SELKIRK then proceeded to read a paper on temperance legislation for Scotland. While legislation had accomplished much, it had practically failed to meet the evil, because it had had reference not to the cause, but to the surrounding circumstances. Nothing short of prohibition would secure adequate protection, and that prohibition could only be attained by convincing the electors of the country that the truth they had been advocating was thoroughly sound, and of the beneficial effects that would accrue to the country by its adoption.

An open discussion followed, in which the following gentlemen took part:—Mr. Johnston, gardener, Perth; Mr. A. Wright, Perth; Mr. Mackay, Glasgow; ex-Baillie Torrens; and the Rev. D. D. Bannerman. In the course of his remarks, the last-named gentleman read an extract from a letter which he had recently received from Sir Wilfrid Lawson, in which he said, "Do not suppose I object to the veto being exercised through a Board elected by the people. It seems to me to be really a cumbersome way of doing a thing, but if those people prefer it let them by all means agitate for the mode they consider the best."

On the motion of the Rev. J. RAINNIE, a vote of thanks was awarded to Baillie Selkirk for his paper, and a similar compliment having been paid to the Chairman, the meeting separated.

PUBLIC MEETING IN THE CITY HALL.

A public meeting was held in the City Hall at the close of the conference. There was a large attendance. Most of those who attended the conference were present, and beside them there were on the platform the Rev. J. Tulloch, the Rev. A. Sutherland, ex-Baillie Greig, Mr. D. Hepburn, solicitor; Mr. Fairbairn, city missionary; Baillie Sime, Councillor Norwell, Councillor Campbell, and Councillor Logan.

Councillor RUSSELL occupied the chair, and in a short speech said he believed that the passing of a Local Option measure would be a great benefit to the country. Such a bill was the means to an end, and that end was the extinction of the liquor traffic altogether. (Applause.) Many said that was a utopian idea, and would never be carried; but in several places it had been tried and found to suit admirably.

Councillor CAMPBELL proposed the first resolution, which called on the Government in response to the well-founded expectations of the country to redeem its promise and pass a permissive prohibitory liquor law. In supporting the resolution, Councillor Campbell referred to the sights which were to be seen on Perth streets during the recent New Year or festive season. Speaking to gentlemen who were interested in the subject, they said to him that during many years' experience in Perth they never saw so many young men and lads under the influence of intoxicating liquor as they saw on the Monday of the New Year in Perth. Two or three years ago he had no doubt that many of these lads were members of Bands of Hope and similar institutions. It was high time that people had the power to control the temptations waylaying their young men. They in Perth had something to do in the matter. When they had occasion to return a representative to Parliament, they should keep the object of reforming the liquor system well before them. And on this subject he would remark that when they put to their Parliamentary representative a question as to whether he was prepared to give the people the power to put a stop to this traffic, they should not rest content with an answer so vague and indistinct in its terms as to suggest no precise signification. (Loud applause.)

Baillie SELKIRK, J.P., seconded the resolution. Referring to the talk which they now heard regarding compensation for vested interests in the liquor traffic, he said that when he heard that talk he began to think they were drawing near the beginning of the end, and his attitude on that point was—Let those who claimed compensation make their claim, and may they get all they were entitled to. (Laughter and applause.)

The Rev. Mr. BARKER supported the resolution in a long speech, in which he spoke on the evils arising out of the operation of the liquor traffic, especially upon the working class, and strongly advocated the granting of a direct popular veto upon the issue of licenses.

The resolution was then put to the meeting, and was carried by acclamation.

Mr. D. SCRIMGEOUR moved the second resolution, which was as follows:—

That this meeting shares in the almost universal dissatisfaction that prevails throughout Scotland with the licensing system, and being convinced that no measure of amendment will be satisfactory to the people that does not embody the principle of the Local Option Resolution as interpreted by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, earnestly invite the co-operation of moral, educational, and social reformers, and all true friends of their country, in pressing upon the Government the urgency of giving shape to the twice recorded resolution of the Legislature by passing such a law as will invest the ratepayers of Scotland with a direct veto over the drink traffic in their respective localities."

In proposing the resolution, Mr. Scrimgeour said that the drink traffic was the greatest obstacle to the spread of the gospel, the greatest obstacle in the way of all moral, social, and political reforms, and the greatest hindrance to all branches of industry and to their national and commercial prosperity. By the present laws it was impossible to regulate or restrict the traffic.

Ex-Baillie TORRENS, J.P., Glasgow, seconded the resolution in a humorous and racy speech, and spoke emphatically upon the physical and mental deterioration produced by the consumption of alcohol in the form of spirituous liquor.

Mr. MACKAY, Secretary of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, supported the resolution, after which it was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

Another resolution, asking the Chairman to forward the resolutions adopted to the Prime Minister, Home Secretary, &c., was, on the motion of the Rev. Mr. SYMON, Perth, seconded by Councillor CHALMERS, adopted. The Rev. Mr. Finlay moved the thanks of the meeting to the speakers. The Rev. W. Barker acknowledged the compliment, and moved the thanks of the meeting to the Chairman. The meeting closed by Rev. Mr. Chalmers pronouncing the benediction.—Dundee Advertiser (abridged).

Eighteen out of the thirty-eight ministers of the gospel in Greenock are abstainers. That is very near the half of them.

A SOBER BURGH.—There were no cases at Govanhill Police Court yesterday morning (2nd ult.), and it was intimated that on Sunday no person was taken to the office. Last year the same creditable record was made. In the whole burgh, with a population of 10,000, there are only two public houses, and these in the least populous parts, a fact which no doubt largely helps in preventing the usual drunk and disorderly cases at this season.—The Daily Press.

COUNTY GOVERNMENT BILL.—The forthcoming County Government Bill will be found to be a very thoroughgoing measure. The County Boards are to be wholly elected by the ratepayers, and they will be charged with almost every function of local government except the administration of justice. That will be vested in Stipendiary Magistrates, who will supersede the present Justices of the Peace, and transact all criminal business not of sufficient importance to be reserved for the superior judges. It may be taken for granted that a far-reaching reform like this will not pass without determined opposition, and I should not be surprised if it shared in the customary July massacre. At present, however, there is a firm intention to press it to an issue, and it will take precedence of every Government measure save the Bankruptcy Bill.

PEEBLES—LOCAL OPTION MEETING.—A conference of social and temperance reformers in Peebles, Innerleithen and district, was held on Monday, 23rd ult., in the Good Templar Hall. Mr. J. B. Lyall presided, and there was a good attendance. After a lengthened conversation a motion in favour of the Local Option Bill for Scotland was unanimously agreed to. A public meeting was held in the same place in the evening, Mr. J. B. Lyall again presiding over a large attendance. The speakers to the various resolutions were Treasurer Russell, Mr. D. Nimmo, Mr. James Coutts, Edinburgh, Mr. Thomas Robertson, Mr. Dunlop, Rev. E. J. Boon, Kirkcaldy, Mr. Allan Smith, and Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh. The proceedings were rendered more enjoyable by the singing of hymns, anthems, &c., by the parish church choir, under the able leadership of Mr. W. Ewing.—Daily Review.

The Illustrated Carpenter and Builder has directed its attention to the practice of smoking by journeymen during working hours. It gives three reasons why tradesmen should not smoke during working hours. 1st, it reduces physical energy by the sense of relaxation it imparts; 2nd, it often makes the worker stop till his pipe is "out," and 3rd, it is dangerous. It does not believe that any man can properly see what he is about with a cloud of hot smoke and gas rising into his eyes. He notes a case of twelve journeymen who smoked being timed, when it was found that a quarter day was lost, and that employer was obliged to stop the practice. In this extract a most pregnant matter to all employers is involved. The loss and danger in under or above-ground works is so great that we can easily foresee that a stern prohibition will be launched against it, and a more detestable and filthy practice never was suppressed.

PORT-GLASGOW—LOCAL OPTION MEETING.—On Wednesday, 18th inst., a public meeting was held in the Town Hall under the auspices of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The chair was taken by R. Duncan, Esq. The meeting was ably addressed by the Rev. W. Barker, M.A., Cowes; Rev. John Campbell, Dr. Kennedy, John Campbell, and A. Baird; Bailie Bell, ex-Bailie M'Bryde, Councillor Ross, and Joseph Russell, Esq., Port-Glasgow; J. Winning, Esq., Paisley, and Mr. R. Stevenson, Glasgow. Resolutions in support of Local Option and calling upon the Government to bring in a measure for Scotland to give full direct veto power to the people to prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquors in their respective localities, were passed with great unanimity and enthusiasm. Prior to the public meeting a conference was held in the Lesser Hall, presided over by Rev. A. Baird, when the subject, how best to promote a thorough-going Bill, was fully discussed, and it was cordially agreed upon to form a temperance fifty to carry out the object of the meeting, and in every way to promote temperance legislation. A president, secretary, and interim committee was appointed, both meetings were highly successful, and the speeches were thoroughly appreciated—a goodly sprinkling of ladies were present.

LOCAL OPTION MEETING AT LINLITHGOW.—A conference of the friends of local option in the burgh of Linlithgow and surrounding district was held on Tuesday, 17th ult., in the British Workman Public-House, Linlithgow—Councillor M'Alpine in the chair. The following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—"That this conference requests the directors of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association to approach the Government, calling upon them to introduce a measure for Scotland conferring upon the people the power to veto the liquor traffic within the various districts of the country." A public meeting was held further on in the evening in the Vennel Hall. There was a good attendance, and Councillor M'Alpine again presided. After an address by Mr. J. H. Waterston of Edinburgh, and others, the following motion was unanimously agreed to, and ordered to be forwarded to the members for the burgh and county, and others:—"That, considering the advanced position occupied by Scotland in liquor legislation, and its preparedness for still further advance—as shown by the Scotch vote on Sir W. Lawson's resolution—this meeting calls upon the Government to introduce a measure for Scotland in next session of Parliament which shall enable the ratepayers to veto the traffic in intoxicating liquors in their various localities."

TORY AND LIBERAL CLERGYMEN AS ABSTAINERS.—At the public meeting of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association in the Town Hall, Port-Glasgow, on the 18th ult., Rev. John Campbell, of Newark Established Church, in moving a resolution, said—"Mr. Winning has just told you that he is a fanatic. I say that I am a bigot, and I am a tremendous bigot, a Tory of the Tories, as touching the Kirk and Establishment, and a bigot in the sense of being from my infancy a total abstainer. I rejoice at being most tremendously bigoted on all these subjects. This is too big a question to permit for one moment to fall off into the narrower grooves of our party political movements. (Applause.) If it is going to pin itself to the coat tails of either party—well, well, bigot though I be, I do not know but I might say good bye to it." At a later stage of the proceedings Rev. A. Baird, of Newark Free Church, said—"You have heard the Rev. Mr. Campbell state that he is a bigot and a Conservative—(laughter)—but that still he is a total abstainer. I appear before you, ladies and gentlemen, as a Liberal—(great laughter)—a Radical, if you will. (Applause.) I am anxious for progress in this great question of temperance, and I feel that it augurs well for the prosperity of it that men occupying such different standpoints can meet together on one common platform to help on the movement. (Applause.)"—Daily Mail.

GREENOCK—NEW YEAR SOIREE.—The annual New Year Soiree of the Total Abstinence Society was held on Monday 2nd ult. in the Temperance Institute. The president, Mr. J. Lang, occupied the chair. On the platform were a number of local friends. After tea the chairman delivered a most seasonable address. Rev. Alex. Wilson, who represented the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, expressed the pleasure he had in being present at a social meeting in connection with this the oldest temperance society in the town. He had been at such a meeting in Paisley the other day, and he had to tell his present audience that they looked wonderfully like the Paisley bodies at such a meeting, there were so many who had grown grey in the service—veterans in the temperance ranks; and he felt his heart warm as he looked into their faces, for he remembered the battle they had had to fight in former years. It was much easier to be a total abstainer now than it was forty or fifty years ago. The temperance movement included within the charm of its circle a large number of societies, and he would say with regard to them that they were all needed. It was the duty of each individual to remember that they were fighting against an evil which had rooted itself in their life in all its various aspects, and the work would need most earnest and persevering energy. He was glad to know that the churches in Greenock were much in advance of those of many other districts in reference to this question, and he was glad to know of the large number of Greenock's clergymen who had adhibited their names to that Local Option petition that was to be presented to Lord Rosebery. (Applause.) But he did believe that churches as a whole throughout the country were standing on the wrong side. The Christian churches ought to see to it that in no way they had any complicity with this traffic that was working so much ruin. (Applause.) Their Christian Churches were at present stamping the traffic with an air of respectability—by admitting those who were directly engaged in the traffic into fellowship with their churches, and in connection with the use of fermented wine at the table of the Lord. These were knotty points, and he would not enter into them at length; but he would say that he hoped the time would soon come when no man engaged in the liquor traffic would find admission into Christian Churches. Mr. Wilson concluded by strongly urging personal effort in connection with the temperance cause. (Applause.) Addresses were afterwards delivered by the Rev. J. J. Cooper, the newly elected missionary and agent of the society, Rev. John Baird, Capt. Brochie, and Mr. J. M'Allister. The usual votes of thanks closed a most enjoyable meeting.—Greenock Telegraph (abridged).

DEMONSTRATION AT PORTOBELLO IN FAVOUR OF LOCAL OPTION.—A public demonstration in favour of local option, under the auspices of the United Kingdom Alliance and Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, was held in the Town Hall, Portobello—Mr. John Telfer, president of the Portobello Total Abstinence Society, in the chair. Amongst those on the platform were—Councillor Reid, ex-Bailie Kemp, Rev. A. Barron, Rev. Wm. Barker of West Cowes; Mr. R. C. Gray, Mr. James Coutts, Mr. J. H. Waterston, and others. There was a large attendance. The Rev. Mr. Gregor proposed the first resolution which affirmed that no legislation would be satisfactory to Scotland which did not embody a direct veto over the liquor traffic. Mr. John Pool seconded the resolution, which was supported by Rev. William Barker, who said—“If it was true that the womanhood of England was becoming addicted to intemperance, he asked those present, as persons of imagination, what must be the ultimate outcome of the calamity if it was not checked?” Referring to the principle of local option, he said it was impossible to have an Imperial enactment to close public-houses. Were there an Imperial enactment passed to-morrow, in his opinion, there would be such a violent reaction that, instead of good being done, the temperance movement would be retarded fifty years. In a free country, as it had been said by a great statesman, “force is no remedy.” Far be it from them to force their opinion upon an unwilling community; far be it from them to force by statute any political or social sentiment formed by another man. That was not their policy. Their policy was this—was it right, was it within the Constitution, was it according to the principles of their Legislature to entrust the people with the control or management of matters affecting themselves in their own localities? Was that according to the system upon which they governed. It was, undoubtedly. (Applause.) The resolution was passed with acclamation. Mr. James Coutts, S.S.C., proposed the next resolution, which declared that Scotland, because of her advanced position on the liquor traffic, deserved to have permissive prohibitory legislation for herself. Ex-Bailie Kemp having seconded the resolution, it was supported by Captain Brochie in his usual graphic manner and agreed to. A third resolution asking the chairman to forward these resolutions to the Prime Minister, &c., was also enthusiastically carried. The public meeting was preceded by a conference at which a resolution calling on the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association to approach the Parliamentary representatives of Scotland, and also memorialize the Government, was most heartily adopted. A letter was read during the evening from Mr. A. Grant, M.P., in which he said that had he been near the burgh he would have felt pleasure in being in the chair.

GRANGEMOUTH TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.—On Monday evening, 16th ult., a temperance demonstration under the auspices of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association took place in the Institute Hall here. Hugh Macpherson, Esq., Chief-Magistrate, was in the chair, and in the course of a very excellent address quoted an extract from a paragraph which appeared in this journal some time ago, describing the drunkenness which characterised the town on New Year's day. He asked what were to be the fruits if this continued? Poverty and then the poorhouse! Crime and then the prison! Disease and then death! The following resolution, proposed by the Rev. G. W. Cumming, and seconded by Mr. Thomas Lindsay, was then unanimously agreed to:—“That considering the vice, misery, crime, waste of food, increased taxation, and stagnation of trade caused by the traffic in intoxicating liquors, this meeting declares that no legislation will be satisfactory that does not confer the power of a popular veto on the liquor traffic.” Mr. John Steel, Edinburgh, supported the resolution in a very thoughtful and argumentative speech. Commissioner James Leishman proposed, and Mr. John Lyon seconded the next resolution as follows:—“That considering the advanced position occupied by Scotland on liquor legislation, and its preparedness for still further advance—as shown by the Scotch vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution—this meeting calls upon Government to introduce a measure for Scotland in next session of Parliament which shall enable ratepayers to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors in their localities.” The Rev. Samuel Harding, Paisley, supported this resolution, which was also unanimously adopted. The third resolution, as follows, was then proposed by Mr. M. Gavin, teacher, and seconded by Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh—“That copies of the foregoing resolutions be signed by the chairman and forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Lord-Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and members of Parliament for the County of Stirling and the Falkirk Burghs.” This resolution was also agreed to. This terminated the business, and a vote of thanks to the speakers was proposed by the Rev. J. Anderson, Falkirk, and to the chairman by the Rev. Mr. Harding. The choir in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association sang some hymns, &c., during the evening—Miss Yates acting as accompanist on the harmonium. Prior to the demonstration a conference was held of social and temperance reformers in Falkirk and Grangemouth, in the Commercial Room of the Institute—Hugh Macpherson, Esq., in the chair. There was a good attendance. After an excellent tea had been partaken of, considerable discussion took place as to the best mode of furthering the interest of the temperance cause. The following resolution was latterly adopted:—“That this conference request the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association to approach the Government and the Scotch members with a memorial calling upon them to introduce a measure for Scotland conferring upon the people the power to prohibit the liquor traffic within the various districts of the country; and that the Executive use every effort to influence Scotch members of Parliament to support such a measure.”—Falkirk Herald (abridged).

DUMFRIES.—LOCAL OPTION DEMONSTRATION.—An influential deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance and Scottish Permissive Bill Association visited Dumfries on Tuesday, 17th ult., under the auspices of the Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union. The deputation was composed of the following gentlemen: Rev. W. Barker, Queen's chaplain, West Cowes, Isle of Wight; Rev. John M'Queen, Free St. Andrew's Church, Kilmarnock (formerly of Wamphray); Mr. J. Winning, Paisley; and Mr. R. Mackay, Glasgow. A conference was held in the afternoon, in the Greyfriar's Hall, Irish Street, under the presidency of Dr. M'Culloch, president of the Union. Among those who took part in the proceedings, besides members of the deputation, were the Rev. G. W. Tooley, the Rev. F. Binns, Mr. W. Haining, and Mr. P. B. M'Kill, Dumfries. Mr. R. Mackay deprecated the proposal to embody in the forthcoming County Government Bill, as part and parcel of the measure, a provision for the establishment of a series of local boards for licensing purposes, which was likely to meet with as much opposition as Mr. George Anderson's bill for placing the power in the hands of the Sheriff; and expressed his conviction that Mr. Gladstone was not the man, seeing how magnanimously he had acted with regard to the railway carriage proposal, to turn a deaf ear to the demands of the people for the power of putting a direct veto on the liquor traffic. Subsequent speakers endorsed these sentiments. Mr. Tooley characterised Local Option as the question within the range of practical politics, of greater importance than the disestablishment of the Church, the extension of the county franchise, or any of these reforms, and declared that the temperance party were the backbone of the nation—the majority, if not in numbers, at least in quality. The Chairman advanced his favourite theme of exclusive voting, by which the repeal of the Corn Laws and other great reforms had been secured; and gratification was expressed that a bill came into force that day which would give them the assistance of females in the municipal arena. A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings. In the evening a large and enthusiastic public meeting took place in the same hall. Dr. M'Culloch again occupied the chair; and he was accompanied on the platform by the members of the deputation, Ex-Provost Shortridge, and Mr. J. B. A.

M'Kinnel, ironfounder. The chairman, in opening the proceedings, referred to the great reforms which had been accomplished during the last fifty years, and pointed out that intemperance had hindered these from conferring the immense benefits they would otherwise have done. He urged them to listen attentively to what they would hear that night regarding that great reform, the principle of which had twice been endorsed by the House of Commons, giving the power of licensing to the people instead of the magistrates and Justices of the Peace. (Cheers.) These gentlemen showed neither justice nor peace in this matter—(laughter and cheers)—and if we wanted an instance of that we had only to look to the fact that a public-house was never established at their own doors or where it was apt to injure their property. (Cheers.) Ex-Provost Shortridge moved a resolution urging the Government to introduce a measure giving a prohibitory power over the liquor traffic to ratepayers. The motion was seconded by the Rev. W. Barker in an able speech which was loudly applauded. The resolution was agreed to with cheers. The next resolution, asking a special optional liquor veto for Scotland, by Mr. J. A. B. M'Kinnel, seconded by Mr. James Winning in a telling speech, which was heartily applauded, and supported by Rev. John M'Queen, Kilmarnock, whose speech received deserved applause, and was agreed to amid cheers. The third resolution moved by the Rev. Mr. Cooper, and seconded by R. Mackay, instructing the chairman to forward the resolutions adopted to the parties named, was also heartily agreed to, and, the Rev. W. Barker having moved the cordial thanks of the meeting to the respected chairman, which were awarded amid cheers, one of the most successful meetings held in Dumfries for years came to a close.

PAISLEY TEMPERANCE JUBILEE.—Paisley claims to have instituted the first society founded on total abstinence, and on the 14th January, 1832, this society was commenced. Four of the eight members who sat at its cradle are still alive, and three of them are still in Paisley. The jubilee was celebrated by a Band of Hope demonstration, a conversation, a religious service, a conference and a public meeting. On the 13th ult. the Band of Hope meeting took place. There was a large attendance. Mr. James M'Lean, president of the adult society, presided. He said, since the society was started fifty years ago it had borne fruit to the glory of God and the good of man. (Applause.) Mr. Fielding Thorpe, of York, then spoke. He had lived fifty years and had never tasted liquors, and he hoped the same would be said of those before him. (Applause.) Addresses were then given by Messrs. J. T. Melvin, S. Clark, R. Robertson, Rev. S. Harding, and Mr. J. Scott, and the benediction, pronounced by the Rev. W. C. Miller, terminated a highly successful meeting. Dr. Fairlie and Mr. A. Fairlie, with a choir of 500 voices, contributed greatly to the enjoyment of the proceedings. On Saturday afternoon 14th a conversation was held in the Good Templars' hall. The chair was taken at four o'clock by Treasurer Clark, and was supported by a large gathering of local gentlemen and visitors. A most sumptuous tea was provided, after which the chairman gave a very appropriate address. Fifty years ago there were only some half a dozen members in the society, there were now he believed some 2000 abstainers in Paisley. He then entered upon an exhaustive history of the rise and progress of the Bible wine question. Mr. A. Fairlie presented an address, beautifully written, to Dr. Richmond and Mr. David Melvin, of Oxford, congratulatory of their being abstainers for fifty years, and of their being the founders of the Paisley Total Abstinence Society. The address was signed by Mr. James M'Lean, president, and Mr. R. Risk, secretary. Mr. James M'Nair having spoken to the work inaugurated by the gentlemen honoured, Dr. Richmond and Dr. Melvin having suitably replied, Provost Campbell, Greenock, J. Wilson, Esq., J.P., Hillhead, James Johnstone, Esq., Langbank, and other gentlemen addressed the meeting, which was enlivened at intervals with the performance of an excellent choir. On Sabbath 15th, the Rev. Alex. Wallace, D.D., delivered a sermon from Exodus xiv. 15, to a crowded meeting in the Good Templar hall. The conference was held in the Good Templars Hall on Monday, 16th ult., at noon. Amongst those present were Rev. Dr. Hutton, Rev. W. N. Challice, Rev. Alexander Wilson, Rev. William C. Miller; Dr. Richmond; Mr. David Melvin, Oxford; Mr. T. J. Melvin, Mr. H. Harper, Mr. William Hill, Mr. James Cook, Mr. James Fergus, Mr. Thomas Goodlet, Mr. John Spence, Mr. Thomas Muir, Mr. Robert Risk, Mr. James M'Lean, Mr. James Parlane (printer), and Mr. J. M. Cunningham and Mr. R. Mackay, Glasgow. Mr. Jno. Spence presided, and called upon the Rev. Dr. Richmond to read a paper on "The Dawn of the Temperance Reformation in Scotland." Mr. J. M. Cunningham read a paper on "The History of the Temperance Movement previous to the formation of the first Total Abstinence Society." A paper entitled "The opinion of a doctor of medicine on strong drink at the beginning of the century," by Dr. W. Whitelaw, Kirkintilloch, was read by the Rev. W. C. Miller. A paper, entitled "Prohibition Principles," by Bailie Selkirk, was, in his unavoidable absence, read by Mr. R. Mackay, Secretary to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. At the close, those who prepared the papers, those who read them, and those who presided over the interesting and lengthy proceedings, were heartily thanked, and the conference closed. The public meeting took place in the large hall the same evening. There was a large attendance. Provost MacKean presided, and was accompanied to the platform by the Revs. Dr. Hutton, Alexander Wilson, W. N. Challice, Richard Steel, J. A. Johnstone of Springburn; Mr. Stewart Clark of Kilnside; Treasurer Clark; Sir William Collins and Ex-Bailie Torrens, Glasgow; Mr. Fielden Thorpe, York; Mr. David Melvin, Oxford; Dr. Richmond; Messrs. T. J. Melvin, Archibald Fairlie, Robert Risk, James M'Lean, Hugh Harper, Thos. Goodlet, William Robertson, R. Chrichton, James Pinkerton, Robert Semple, James Walker, Wm. Hill, and J. T. Smith. The proceedings were commenced by the singing of a Psalm, after which, prayer was engaged in by the Rev. Dr. Hutton. After an interesting address from the chairman, Sir William Collins was introduced to the audience. Sir William referred to the enormous drink taxation which, in Glasgow, was equal to 10d. per £; affirmed that the only remedy for intemperance was total abstinence; appealed to the statistics of Assurance Societies as proving the deadly nature of strong drink, and declared the getting of a local option bill for Scotland a matter of urgency. Mr. Fielden Thorpe, of York, urged Christian Churches to aid the total abstinence movement. The Rev. Mr. Johnstone entertained the meeting with an address on "Anecdotes," and was loudly applauded. Ex-Bailie Torrens gave a characteristic address. "Before sitting down he would repeat," he said, "that it was his strongest conviction that, till the people should have the power to say that the whisky shops should not be amongst them, the workers in the abstinence cause will require to go on as they are doing." (Applause.) Mr. Semple sang three pieces of his own composing, which were warmly received. On the motion of Rev. Alex. Wilson, the speakers were thanked for their services. On the motion of Rev. Mr. Steel, Mr. Semple was awarded a hearty vote of thanks, and on the motion of Mr. Walker, the meeting paid a similar compliment to the chairman. The meeting was dismissed with the benediction.

ALCOHOL DEADENS SENSIBILITY OF FEELING.—On account of its stupefying nerve-deadening properties, alcohol is always classed among narcotics or sleep-makers. On account of its numbing effect on the nerves of sensation, it is also called an anæsthetic, which means a remover of feeling. In this respect it resembles chloroform or ether, which are derived from alcohol by chemical processes. It has long been known that in a state of intoxication (that is to say, a state in which the system is under the influence of a sufficient quantity of alcohol, more or less according to many circumstances, the sensibility is lessened. This is referred to by Solomon, "Who hath wounds without cause? . . . they that tarry long at the wine . . . they have beaten me but I felt it not." Before the discovery of chloroform it was not uncommon to make persons "dead" drunk if they had to undergo any painful surgical operation. The delicacy of the sense of touch is interfered with by a very small quantity of alcohol, and is gradually destroyed as the quantity is increased."—Band of Hope Chronicle.

THE FORCE OF EXAMPLE.—A minister in America preached a sermon one Sunday evening in favour of slavery and wine drinking. He defended slavery, and said it was scriptural; he defended wine drinking, and said that Christ made wine. There happened to be in that congregation an infidel, who did not drink intoxicating liquors. When, therefore, he heard that slavery and the drinking usages of society were defended from the Bible, he went away under a stronger conviction than ever that religion was a farce. A few days after, this minister, visiting from house to house, went into the house of this infidel. The minister asked if there was a Bible in the house. "No, sir," said the infidel, "and I never intend to have one!" "What! not have a Bible?" "No, sir. It is from that book I heard you defend slavery and drinking. If that be your Bible, it shall never come into my house." "It was a word spoken in season, and made a deep impression on this minister, for he determined to be an abolitionist and an abstainer. If the ministers of this country who have opposed the temperance reformation, knew the amount of mischief they are doing to the bodies and souls of the people by giving countenance to one of the most cruel, wicked and immoral systems on the face of the globe, they would no longer countenance the drinking usages of society."—Canada Casket.

"I thought before you died I'd just tell you how much I have always loved and honoured you." This sentence from a letter to one of our workers has in it matter for reflection. It hints at one of the most unaccountable errors in our conduct of life's relationships. We speak our words of praise too late. We blow the trumpet of our approbation at the earnest worker's ears—but not until Death's finger has closed it for ever. We utter at the grave side the tender words that might have kept sensitive souls with us in a new lease of life. We build monuments with money that if bestowed upon the living toiler would have re-enforced the wasted energies and re-awakened the declining courage. Dear friends, these things ought not so to be. I can speak freely to you who have been far more generous with me than I deserve. Let us as temperance women be more thoughtful—all of us hereafter—lest we sing with sad regret some day above the wearied and unconscious forms of beloved workers fallen,

"Strange we never heed the music
Till the sweet voiced bird has flown."

THE CRY OF THE CAPTIVE.—A letter from a lady to Miss F. E. Williard.—You asked me to write about my husband. His father kept a large country store which contained everything from "a pin to a plough point," including of course a barrel of whisky. There is where my husband learned to drink. Now he is 43 years old, and the appetite has become so strong that it comes over him like a mighty rushing flood, and there is no staying of it. He says he would give anything to be able to overcome it; yet I know that he does not realize that it turns a kind husband and father into a demon who causes his family to flee to the neighbours for the preservation of their lives. He is not near so kind though as he was years ago. I think it must be the intense craving for drink that causes his terrible temper even when not drinking. Three years ago I believe I received the inestimable blessing of purity of heart at one of dear Sister Palmer's meetings; but when I journeyed home and was met by the terrible liquor curse I seemed to let go of the Saviour's hand. My heart turned to lead; the heavens seemed made of brass; I could not pray or look up, for the agony of despair held me down. Now in the night season when he threatens my life, all I can do is to silently, tremblingly pray, Lord protect me. While praying for my husband's conversion, will you not ask that I may be made wholly the Lord's? Do pray also that my four children may become Christians before they feel an inherited appetite for liquor. Dear sister in Christ, will you form a request from this note to present to the other dear sisters to remember at our loving father's throne?—R.

WHICH IS HEALTHIER, THE DRINKER OR ABSTAINER?
Let us briefly see how it affects the health of our people. For the following tables I am indebted to our esteemed townsman, Mr. T. Cunliffe, which clearly show the relative amount of sickness and death in societies which are conducted upon total abstinence principles (Rechabites), and in societies which are not conducted upon total abstinence principles (Oddfellows). In Blackburn, Bolton, and Manchester there are 3,400 Rechabites; their deaths in 1876 were 46, or a rate of 13.5 per 1000. In the Bolton district of Rechabites in the same year the death rate was only 11.2 per 1000. In Blackburn there are 3,500 Oddfellows, and in 1876 they had 76 deaths, or a death rate of 21.42 per 1000. In the Rechabites they had 554 members sick, or 16.2 per cent.; while the Oddfellows had 720 sick, or 20.53 per cent. The total number of weeks' sick pay in the Rechabites was 2,999, or an average for each member sick of 5 weeks, 2 days, and 21 hours. The Oddfellows had a total of 6,355 weeks' sickness, or an average for each member sick of 8 weeks, 5 days, and 8 hours. For every 100 Rechabites there were 16 sick. For every 100 Oddfellows there were 20 sick. In Bolton district of Rechabites for 10 years the death-rate was 13 per 1000, while in Blackburn district of Oddfellows for 10 years their death-rate was 19 per 1000. During the year 1874, when typhoid fever prevailed in Over Darwen, the Rechabites, out of 164 members, had 3 deaths, while the Darwen Oddfellows had 91 deaths out of 620 members, or Rechabite death-rate 18 per 1000, Oddfellows 31 per 1000. But the publicans in Over Darwen during the same fever year died at the rate of 150 per 1000. That is, for 1 Rechabite 8 publicans died. Again, during the fever year, the Rechabites, who pay a less contribution per member, in the Darwen tent alone received £111 19s. 1½d., and they paid for sickness and funerals £79 4s., thus leaving a surplus of £32 15s. 1½d.; the Oddfellows in Darwen in the same year, although they paid a larger weekly contribution, lost over £90. In 1873 the average sick pay in Darwen to Rechabites was 4s. 9½d., and the Oddfellows 10s. 10d. But we must not lose sight of the fact that in the Oddfellows there are a number of total abstainers, or these tables would have shown a wider difference still, as we shall see if we examine the statement of the Rev. Stanton Eardley, B.A., vicar of Streatham. He sums up the result of a seven year's balancing of the Forester's Lodge of Streatham, thus—In seven years the abstaining members of the lodge, supposing them to have no better health than their non-abstaining brothers, would have received £180 11s. as sick pay. What they did receive as sick money was £56 11s., so saving the funds to the amount of £124. In conclusion, we find that alcohol is not a food; it gives neither force, nourishment, nor warmth; we can work better without it; total abstainers live longer and enjoy better health than those who take it in so-called moderation; and what to some of us is not the least commendable, it is a means of saving our money, as well as improving our health and lengthening our days. And now, if what I have said has strengthened any weak or wavering mind upon this point—if I have convinced any who before had doubts, then I shall feel that my labour has not been in vain.—Portion of Paper read at British Women's Temperance Association Annual Conference at Bolton, by Dr. Thornley.

Some say whisky hardens the brain, others say it softens it. Meanwhile people without brain keep on drinking it as it don't make an atom of difference to them.

MARCH, 1882.

THE RELATION OF THE CHURCH TO THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

A GREAT Roman orator was once heard to exclaim, "Whatever concerns mankind concerns me," meaning thereby, that everything that was to aid in the betterment of the human race would find in him an active and steady friend; or on the other hand, everything that hindered the march of progress, or the purification of society, would find in him an uncompromising and determined foe. Such I think should be the position of the Church to every benevolent and truly patriotic movement, and its hostility should be expressed in earnest words and worthy deeds against every form of evil that would impede her work or neutralize her mission. The Church has been entrusted by her great Living Head, to proclaim the message of peace and mercy to a fallen world. She has been commissioned to preach good tidings of great joy to all people and to bring back the human race to the love of God and to the enjoyment of true happiness. The gospel in its design is co-extensive with all human relations; it has been adapted for men in all times and in all countries. Its aim is to destroy the enmity which exists in the human heart towards God, and to set men in a career of obedience to his will by purifying their affections and making them morally like himself. The Church may be designated the honoured trustee of heaven, and everything that would seek to smile upon the object of her trust should receive her commendation, and whatever would seek to sully it should be met by her frown. The Church of Christ has had a relation to all social and political movements in every age. She has inspired many of those movements, and led them through difficulties and trials to the land of triumph. The Church cannot be an idle spectator in the great theatre of human action. She is either sending her own spiritual impulses through the grand movements of the time, or by her inconsistencies and indolence she is clogging the wheels of progress. There is no such thing as a neutral Church. Of course when we speak of the Church and its relation to the temperance question, we mean the Church as it is popularly understood by the denominations of professing Christians around us. Well, is the Church hostile to the temperance movement? No one, I think, would say that she is. Is the Church, then, the bitter antagonist of the drink traffic? Now let us give an honest answer—she is not. What, then, is her position? It is a position of half-heartedness. The Church acknowledges the evil; the Church mourns over the evil; the Church says she would like to see the evil wholly removed and universal sobriety reigning instead of drunkenness, but then many men in the Church like the drink, many trade in the drink; and, then, the Church derives some of its revenue from this same source. Now, the problem is, How can we have a pure Church—a Church at war with drunkenness, and yet a Church partially allied to the drink traffic?

No doubt it would be a solution of the question if every church member would become a total abstainer, and permit no drink trader into her membership. This would be a happy consummation. The world could not then say that there was any relation between Christ and Bacchus. Many have hope that the Church will yet put on her beautiful garments and throw off this stigma which all must say has hindered her work and operated against her success. A vast number of cases of discipline arise from the habit of drinking alcoholic drinks, by members connected with our churches. Well educated ministers often fall through the same cause, so that the Church's purity and usefulness suffer much through the drinking habits of her members.

Look at the drink traffic in the aggregate, and say if it is a help or a hindrance to the Church. Is it an ally of the Church or a foe of the Church? If we are to think of the Church as a living, acting organisation for the welfare of humanity and the glory of God, we must think of the liquor traffic as an institution or a system that destroys multitudes of our fellows. We must look at the fruits of the one and the fruits of the other, and by their fruits we must know them and judge them. The Church should have a care over the young, and if we are to believe those Sabbath school teachers who have investigated the matter, we find that drink is the great foe of Sabbath school work. Mr. T. B. Smithies, a zealous Sabbath school teacher, tells us that he found most of those prisoners whom he visited in the jails who had attended Sabbath schools had fallen through drink, and he was so overcome by what he saw and heard that he knelt down on the cold flags of York jail and made a solemn mental promise that he would urge entire abstinence from alcoholic drinks upon all Sabbath scholars in the future. Many of those prisoners told him, with tear-dimmed eyes, that they had attended Sabbath schools, but that the public-house had been their ruin. On one occasion he was in a ward with 17 young convicts, 15 of whom had been in Sunday schools connected with almost every religious denomination. On going carefully through the cases of the 15 who had been Sunday scholars, he found that 10 of them had committed the crimes (for which they were about to be transported) while under the influence of drink, while the others had been led into crime either through their own intemperance or the drinking habits of their parents. Mr. Smithies also made inquiries at prison chaplains in England, Scotland, and Wales, and he gave it as the result of his investigations, that 50 per cent. of our criminals have passed through our Sabbath schools for at least three years. There cannot be a doubt but that the drink system is striking a vital blow at the Church, and thus neutralising Sabbath school effort. It will be well if we awake to the realisation of this in time. Fifty-nine out of sixty-two criminals in Glasgow jail admitted to Mr. W. Logan that drink and public-house company had not only led them from the Sabbath school, but had led them to break the laws of their country. It would be interesting to those who doubt these facts to make similar experiments. It would be easy to multiply testimonies from ministers at home and missionaries abroad regarding the evil wrought in connection with the Christian Church. Some of the most honoured names might be cited to prove these assertions. The late Rev. W. Arnot said he had had a struggle with the public-house for 22 years, and he gave up in despair. He found that his preaching did not produce the results he anticipated in consequence of the drink traffic.

There does not seem to be any room for rational doubt that the Church would feel a new inspiration and acquire a mighty power for good in the world if the intemperance of this country were removed. The conversion of the world to Christ depends very much upon a pure Church in our own land. Her spiritual life would be increased, her finances would be augmented, her sympathies would be broadened, and her influence would go forth to the ends of the earth. This is clearly seen from the testimonies of eminent men in our foreign missionary fields. Archdeacon Jeffreys, of Bombay, said that "God would not bless the cause of missions on that side of India till the missionaries took up the question of abstinence."

The Rev. Thomas Brotherton, missionary of the Gospel Propagation Society, says:—"We wish it to be known at home that the Hindoos, on becoming Christians, are, if possible, more liable to become drunkards than while they were surrounded by the barrier of superstition and caste." Intelligent heathens are not slow to detect the hypocrisy that often mingles with our efforts to Christianise them. Mr. Goldie states that a heathen king asked the Christians—"How do you condemn the use of rum when you make and sell such quantities." It is not putting the case too strongly to say that we have injured the cause of Christianity abroad by associating it with the use of intoxicating liquors. It matters not what department of the mission field we turn our attention to, the same melancholy report comes from all quarters, that British drinking retards the work of the foreign missionary. It may be interesting if I draw a comparison between the profits of a single brewing firm in England and the income of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland in 1889. The income of the Church for all purposes was £304,670; the income of Bass & Co., brewers, for 1878 was £420,000. The sum of money realised by this single brewing firm, over and above the whole income of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland would give £200 for one year to 576 ministers, or it would give 1478 working men 30s. a week for one year. While the Church of Christ should bear in her hand the olive branch—symbol of peace to the nations—she should also carry the axe, which should be laid to the root of those trees which bear not good fruit, that they may be hewn down and cast into the fire.

EXCELSIOR.

A NIGHT WITH THE SALVATION ARMY.

HUGE placards, numerous newspaper advertisements, and a special invitation, brought us to a meeting in the City Hall on Monday 20th ult. Thinking that our presence a half hour previous to the taking of the chair would enable us to see the rise and progress of the meeting, we turned up at 7.30 to find the hall densely crowded, the platform with not an inch of standing room, and the people singing with their might the songs of the army. Of the nearly 4000 present there might have been fully a third members of the corps, the others might have been equally divided into sympathisers and scoffers. With few exceptions all were of the working and lower classes, and a great many were women. The order was remarkable, the absorbing interest in the proceedings intense; and altogether nothing but praise could be awarded to the audience who, even when sneered at, exercised a rare forbearance. "We are here," all seemed to say, "to testify, not to snarl." Major Edmond, the chief of the army in Scotland, has a highly nervous temperament, great self-possession, unflinching humour, the power of inspiring confidence and obedience, a memory most retentive, and a knowledge full and ready. Near him was Captain Newton, passionately earnest. The women beside him were comely, neatly dressed English girls: modest, with none of that boldness we have seen too apparent in some of our women preachers. Those of them who spoke had rich full voices, although somewhat strained by the earnest appeals they have to put forth daily to the unsaved. The other captains were like the rest youthful, one extremely so. They were by no means cultured; indeed, we did not expect that, but it would commend them to those that persistently ally illiterateness with vulgarity. The object of the meeting was to parade reformed drunkards, and make them testify to their former and present condition; in short, to show a sample of the efforts of the army. These trophies mustered strongly, the largest portion on the platform, the next largest in the galleries: in the area there were not many. The proceedings began by singing a hymn to a catching melody, which was most lustily given. The army's banners waved, the army waved kerchiefs, the silver trumpet aided the joyous strain, and the people repeated the words again and again. Scarcely a book was used, every one taking their cue from the major, who, mounted on the seat of his chair, led the singing. Prayer followed, led by the Rev. Mr. Broadley, whose prayer was brief, pertinent, and incisive. Captain Newton followed, with an urgency and force that often trembled on the brink of extravagance. Just as in Methodist prayers, there were all sorts of responses—"Hallelujah," "Praise God," "Hear prayer," "Amen," "Save, Lord," and so on. The major was about to follow, when an old man in the area cried out "Mr. Chairman." Starting to his feet, the major struck up "The army will be ready when He comes." The effect was electrical: the air and the words combined to form a trumpet song, and the audience gave it volume, until the hall resounded with the strain. The old man was ejected, but long after the stirring words were vigorously repeated. After this there was no attempt at interruption, and the army had it all their own way. The next item on the programme was "fixing bayonets," that is, all who were of the army were to affirm their belief in Christ by raising their right hand; this was done, but not to the major's satisfaction. "Let us have both hands," and all on the platform, the majority in the side galleries, raised their hands, shouting "Hallelujah," "Lift up the banner," "Glory," "Amen," &c. In the area not many fixed bayonets. Then at about 8.30 came the event of the evening—the testimony of reformed drunkards. It was not altogether that, however. Some had never tasted, many have never been drunkards. These confessed their former sinful life, and praised God for their connection with the army. The reclaimed drunkards were there in force, however, and their testimonies, if a common thing, must on some natures have a bad effect, for many seeking an occasion to the flesh will lay the flattering unction to their poor souls that they can sin a little more, and, long before they reach the stage reached by some, they can turn. In the Methodist class and in less public meetings they may unbosom with the best results, but in our opinion the masses may suffer through such candour. Brevity in speaking was imperative, and on the whole characterised the several testimonies. "I am bound for glory, praise the Lord" (hallelujah). "I was a liar, thief, and drunkard." (Bless God.) "Saved from whisky drinking, saved from sin, saved from tobacco, and now bound for glory." The converted cobbler, a "pretty" fellow, said he had not been to church for seventeen years. Went to the Salvation Army meeting in Anderson drunk: became impressed; went the next night, and never had from that night tasted liquor, and by God's grace never meant to do." (Hallelujah.) Another: "Eighteen years since I joined the church, yet all that time I was a confirmed drunkard. I joined the army and am bound for heaven. I thank God that ever the army came to Govan." Another: up to two years ago was a most wicked man, drinking and sinning, but the Salvation Army took him by the hand; glory to God he was saved. Another was a deep-dyed drunkard wandering the streets in Bridgeton, without a bite or without a friend, but he was now rejoicing in his Saviour. Another in the west gallery gave similar testimony, appealing to those in the hall to give up their sins. "You will never get to heaven unless you give up your sins." Here the major started a hymn, and again the hall was reverberating with the singing of the immense audience. The major then said that giving up drink was a condition of membership, for any found drinking with them would be deemed a hypocrite, and if he persisted would be expelled. There were 800 reformed drunkards among them in Glasgow, and 30,000 throughout the army. None of these "touch, taste, or handle the accursed thing." They showed no quarter to that which was sending thousands to hell. Ninety-nine out of every hundred who take drink curse it in their hearts. The army was not, however, a distinctively temperance organisation; it made war on every sin. Nearly all who join it are those who have been reclaimed from drink, and those who have spoken or may speak are raked from the streets, the gutters, and slums of this great city. Again leave was given to testify, and one said, My sins which are many are forgiven. Another was converted by a girl fifteen years of age. He could get no rest nor peace for three nights and days, but he threw himself on the mercy of God, and now was safe. Captain Newton now made a good confession. He was a drunkard, a great drunkard. His wife who was near could say that. He drunk the cursed drink till the devil must have felt that he had him hard and fast. "But Jesus is mine. He has saved me, and has come and taken away the desire even for the drink." (Hallelujah.) He had lost the taste for the drink. What a life he led. Why, he was derided for his evil ways, but when he turned, those who knew him could hardly believe it. Yet glory be to God, he was saved from sin and from drink; and oh, he said, come you who are still in your sins, come to Jesus, he will save you, he will make you happy, he will guide you and keep you in the way to heaven. (Praise God, lift up the banner.) Mrs. Steel, of Dundee, not as she said of the army, came from home to speak of the good work in Dundee. She spoke briefly in favour of women speaking, and made a good, if not a powerful impression. Captain Gideon David was introduced by the major, who said Gideon was nothing of himself, but the sword of the Lord and of Gideon conquered the enemies of the Lord. The effective sentence in the captain's address was "We must put in the sword of the Spirit into the core of the heart." The lady captain of Govan then spoke. She was a handsome and youthful woman, with a very rich voice. She never tasted drink, yet needed salvation. She was saved from sin. Christ would cleanse all from sin. Come, then, to him, and he will save you all. The lady captain of the Cowcaddens corps was a highly excitable and less pretty woman, but spoke with much more fervour. She declared that the army was resolved to have the darkest corners of the city at the feet of Jesus. (We will, praise God.) She seems eager for the salvation of our policemen. Captain Harvey, a beardless youth, was the next speaker. His address turned on the rescue of a drunkard, which was most effectively given. The ejaculations to the testimonies were innumerable, but pointed, showing that they were common in the army, and as they did not disturb the speakers, these must be used to them. Many a verse of some favourite hymn was sung which effectually relieved the speaking and kept up the excitement. The major then said they were now going to put a resolution, not in the cold argumentative formal way it was commonly done, but in the way usual in the army. Now, the resolution is "Death to the public house, but salvation to the publican and his family." Here with a great shout and hands uplifted the resolution was passed with loud amens. "Down with the breweries." Another great shout and hands uplifted testified eloquently where the traffic would be were the army master of the situation. We were here informed by the major that it would be a good thing if these large brewery premises were closed, for they could open them as barracks for the Salvation Army. ("Praise God, hallelujah.") The army contemplated opening a place in the centre of the city, near the High Street, for a midnight mission. The officers would go out and roam the streets, getting the unhappy women to come in. They would need a hall capable of holding 900 people, and means of giving the poor street wanderer a cup of warm tea. And more; they had now four stations in Glasgow. They must have eighteen. ("Hallelujah.") Mr. Thomas Robinson, treasurer to the army, then came forward. He said they wanted to get hold of the people, and they were. They had no money just now, but they would get all they needed yet. Those belonging to them gave liberally. They saved that which they used to spend upon drink, and they gave of it that others might be saved like them. Rev. Messrs. Ewen and Broadley addressed the meeting. Then Sister Grabble of Bridgeton arose. She said she was thinking of the last great gathering of mankind at the Judgment Day, where none could plead excuse for absence. Don't rest on churches or sacraments, but on the word of God and the work of Christ, and give yourselves to Jesus. Mr. John Govan expressed his pleasure at being present, as the army owned Christ as King. He hoped all would yield up their hearts to him as their King where he would reign for ever. A gentleman on the platform gave a short address on the beginning of the army in Glasgow, and said he believed in the army for two things—1st, Every soldier had to believe in justification by faith, and 2nd, in sanctification by grace. By the first the power of sin was broken; by the second they cut up sinful desires by the roots. Bailie Selkirk said he cordially sympathised with the movement. He had attended the meetings from the beginning, which were the most refreshing meetings he knew. He was glad to know that in England the army was seriously affecting the business of the Police Courts, and he hoped that they would be equally successful with the Police Courts in Scotland. He thought that the army was really solving the question of how to deal with the masses, and he knew that it was prepared to heartily co-operate with all who have the glory of God at heart. After some singing and testimonies, what is called the Hallelujah Chorus was given. It was, of course, nothing like Handel's magnificent chorus. There was tremendous fervour manifest, all waving handkerchiefs and singing at the extreme pitch of their voice. Banners waved, and the trumpet and trombone accompanied the singing. Captain Catherine Sheppard, in a thoroughly business spirit, intimated a ninepenny tea in the Wellington Palace on Thursday at seven, and offered tickets for sale. There was more singing, a powerful appeal for funds, and a hymn, and then, with the benediction, the proceedings came to a close at ten o'clock. It is impossible to put down such a religious agency by sneers. It has a hold and a great one on the masses of the people, and it cultivates in the hearts of its soldiers an intense hatred and aversion to whatever is of the licensing system. It enlists the women, and the meetings have much of the emotional to affect them. The singing is extremely enlivening, and gives an impetus to the proceedings. On the whole, none who know human nature can withhold sympathy and tolerance from the Salvation Army. There are forms and expressions used which are neither proper nor becoming. The assurance so openly proclaimed grates on a pious ear, and the rollicking manner and excitable service may displease many a God-fearing Christian; but against all these put the great fact that there are, through the efforts put forth already, thirty thousand reclaimed drunkards rejoicing in the knowledge of salvation; and "God speed them" must be every temperance reformer's prayer. M.

THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

WE have now reached a point in our political history when drunkenness has come to be regarded as a crime, and parties engaged in the liquor traffic are looked upon with a certain degree of disrespect. Our native country has long been desolated with the scourge of strong drink, but strenuous efforts are being made by many to overcome this great enemy to religion and morality. Many have come to see that the drink traffic is opposed to Christianity, and have been led to give up their connexion with it, and so prevent themselves becoming the actual slayers of many an unguarded soul.

There is another trade, however, in which Britain has for long been engaged, viz., the Opium Traffic. To our shame it must be confessed, that we are carrying on a traffic which is causing the death of thousands of human beings; and demoralising thousands, nay, millions more. Perhaps it may not be out of place to bring a few facts connected with Opium, and the Opium Traffic, before the readers of a journal which is actively engaged in the temperance movement.

Opium is the juice of the white poppy (Papaver somniferum), a plant of the order Papaveraceae, or poppy tribe. The word opium is derived from the Greek word ὄπιοσ, juice—in general, but it is now used as the name of the poppy extract.

Opium is obtained by incisions made in the green capsule when nearly at maturity, from which it exudes as a milky juice that gathers in a brownish mass, which is scraped off the capsules, and collected into lumps, which are carefully packed in large jars. About the end of March these jars are brought from the plantations to the workshops where they are weighed and valued. The contents of the different jars are mixed together in large vats, and then made up into balls for the market. The balls, when finished and dried, are packed with the stalks of the poppy-plant in two layers of six each in chests, and sent down to Calcutta. During the working season as many as 1,353,000 balls are manufactured at Patna for the China market alone. About the year 1812, the discovery was made by Seterner that opium was a compound substance; and subsequent research has brought to light the fact that traces of no fewer than sixteen ingredients may be discovered in opium, besides other matters. These are as follows:—

- |                  |                    |
|------------------|--------------------|
| 1. Morphine.     | 9. Papaverine.     |
| 2. Narcotine.    | 10. Brown Extract. |
| 3. Thebaine.     | 11. Caoutchouc.    |
| 4. Codeine.      | 12. Resin.         |
| 5. Narceine.     | 13. Concrete Oil.  |
| 6. Porphyroxine. | 14. Gum.           |
| 7. Meconine.     | 15. Bassorine.     |
| 8. Meconic Acid. | 16. Lignine.       |

The principal use which the Chinese make of opium is to smoke it with tobacco, when it produces a languor so pleasing and seductive as to almost take away the mind of the smoker. Mr. Archibald Fraser, speaking of the state of things in Java, says, "Let a native only once taste the alluring pipe, it is rare that he can stop—he goes on from bad to worse, neglects his family, seduces them to the same fatal vice, gradually incapacitates himself for work, sells every article he possesses, and ends generally in robbery, or, perhaps, murder, in order to get the means of indulging his insatiable craving." A writer in the Encyclopaedia Britannica says, "The effects of this vice are even more debasing than that of habitual intoxication by alcoholic liquors—enfeebling rapidly both the mental and bodily powers."

But the effects of smoking opium are mild in comparison to those of eating it. This is a vice which has been indulged in by many of our great literary men, among whom we may mention Coleridge, Dr. Isaac Milner, and the benevolent William Wilberforce; but the greatest sufferer by this vice was the learned

Thomas de Quincey. Who can read unmoved his "Confessions of an Opium Eater"? Every page is only, as it were, a fresh horror added to a list of unusual dimensions. Opium eaters generally begin with doses of from half a grain to two grains; but as the doses are increased both in quantity and frequency, an opium eater will sometimes consume two drachms and upwards per day. In fact, the passion becomes so great that to be without the means of gratifying it is to be in the greatest possible agony. De Quincey, who appears to have had an enormous appetite, used as much as 8,000 drops, about 8 teaspoonfuls, or 320 grains per day, to keep up the stimulation which at first he could obtain by merely swallowing a few drops. In his "Confessions," he says, "I do not readily believe that any man, having once tasted the divine luxuries of opium, will afterwards descend to the gross and mortal enjoyments of alcohol. I take it for granted 'That those eat now who never ate before;

And those who always ate now eat the more.'

These are the words of a man who sacrificed the happiness of his life to this horrible vice. So firm was the hold it had upon him that he would abandon anything to satisfy its cravings.

The effects of opium eating on the human body are, in themselves, horrible to contemplate. The digestive organs become shivelled and dried up, and all the evils of defective digestion become manifest; the saliva is also dried up, and to keep the throat and mouth moist, drink is resorted to, which is only adding misery to misery. In the year 1793 numerous experiments were conducted by Dr. Samuel Crumpe, M.D., to ascertain the effects of opium on the human body. To show the stimulating effect it has on the heart, he swallowed one grain of pure opium diffused in a tea-spoonful of water, his pulse beating at 70, its natural standard. In five minutes after partaking of the dose his pulse registered 74, and in fifteen minutes it registered 76, forty-five minutes elapsing before it again reached its natural standard. At another time he took  $2\frac{1}{2}$  grains of opium dissolved in an ounce of water, his pulse beating at 70 as before, it gradually began to rise, and in thirty minutes after partaking of the dose it registered 80, being 10 above its natural maximum standard; 90 minutes elapsed before it had attained its natural state. When the stimulation had subsided a severe headache attended with drowsiness and nausea began to be felt. Similar experiments were performed on individuals of different temperaments with similar results.

Such is a brief outline of the nature of this dreadful vice, and its effects. Like all other vices, however, it does not come alone: drunkenness often follows, and the poor worn-out victim is hurried to the tomb. It is in China where the chief seat of this awful vice is to be found, and Britain, with shame be it owned, supplies the drug which every year sends thousands of our fellow-creatures to a premature grave. The progress of civilisation and Christianity is hindered by this monstrous evil. Christian missionaries have over and over again been told by the natives that they would not listen to men who came from the country which sent them the opium.

We must now, however, pass on to cast a hasty glance at the opium traffic itself, and here the giant nature of the evil will become more apparent. We will simply present the reader with a few statistics, space forbidding our dilating on the history of this baneful traffic. The opium trade brings annually to the East Indian treasury, an income of nearly four million pounds sterling (in 1855-6 it amounted to £3,714,353), and the trade is increasing. To show the enormous increase in the consumption of opium we have but to look at the following figures which show the amount of opium imported into China by the Indian Government:

In 1827-28 it amounted to	-	-	8,435 chests.
In 1829-30	"	-	7,565 "
In 1853-54	"	-	53,321 "
In 1863-64	"	-	64,000 "

These figures represent the total exports from India for the years specified. In 1871, the Government alone exported 49,695 chests. These are but a few facts concerning this iniquitous traffic.

It may be asked, Is the Government aware of the immoral tendency of opium? To show that they are we quote from a despatch sent from the Government of Bengal to the Government of India, which shows that England protects and fosters a trade with whose direful results she is perfectly well acquainted. We make the following extract: "It is not professed that under the present system the quantity of opium is checked and limited by Government on any considerations of the injurious and demoralizing effects of the use of opium; and to claim for that system any superiority on this ground would be to set up, and set up unnecessarily, an unreal and unfair pretext." This is the language of Government officials in their own official organs, which, to us, looks very like a confession.

It has been asserted by some that the high import rates charged upon opium have a tendency to diminish its use, but, as Sir George Campbell said in the debate in 1875, "It (opium) was one of these things upon which the imposition of a heavy duty enabled us to serve God and Mammon at the same time—doing good to our neighbour by checking its consumption, and raising a large revenue for ourselves." A glance at the table we have given above will show that this is a fallacy, heavy duty does not check the consumption of opium, and therefore it follows that we are not serving God and Mammon, but Mammon only.

The question has often been asked, What would the Government do to make up the deficit in the Indian treasury if it abandoned the opium traffic. This appears to us to be a very thoughtless question; surely if the Government utilised the land at present taken up with growing opium, they would have as large if not a larger income. There might be a deficit for a few years, but we feel assured that it would soon be met if the ground was turned to a better use.

On the other hand, if this trade was abandoned, a great step would be made on the road to reform, and a great enemy to temperance would be removed. This, of course, could not be done at once, but what great reform was ever accomplished in a day? Let the Government abolish the traffic, or begin to do so, and we are contented to leave the results with God.

We earnestly hope the day will come when England will remove this blot on her escutcheon, and act consistent to her Christian profession. For, as Lowell says,

"He's true to God who's true to man; wherever wrong is done,
To the humblest and the weakest, 'neath the all beholding sun."

CHAPTER IX.

FRED.

"DIED at Temple Home, Grange, on the 17th, Frederick George Templeton, aged 26."

The above announcement James Taylor read out to his sister at the breakfast table next morning. Both were shocked and surprised; they did not even know he had been ill, but the same thought was in both minds, that his death must have been the result of an excessive drinking fit.

"I shall go out to the Grange this morning, James," said Alice after a while. "This will be a terrible blow to them."

"Stay there till afternoon then, dear, and I shall try and come for you," was the reply. "I shall be very busy, but I must steal an hour for that."

"I ought to have gone to see after Jennie Gibson, poor child. I don't think Mary would treat her very kindly on Monday when she came."

"Why, what is it James?" she asked, seeing her brother's face look changed as he turned his paper.

"There will be no need for you to go, Alice—Jennie is beyond all need of help. Listen—"

"On Tuesday morning one of the gardeners in Prince's Street Gardens found the body of a child crouched beneath a holly tree, almost buried in the snow; she was carried to the police station, and the doctor who attended said death resulted from exposure. Later in the day the body was identified as that of Janet Gibson, residing in Blair's Close, High Street. It seems her mother is at present undergoing a term of imprisonment for breach of the peace, of which she was convicted at the Police Court on Monday morning."

Alice Taylor leaned her arms on the table, and hid her face, bursting into tears.

"I shall never forgive myself, James, as long as I live, for my forgetfulness. If I had been more mindful she might have been saved."

"My darling, you must not blame yourself too much. Remember the fever you were in about Aunt Ellen. It was not sheer carelessness, Alice; you must not distress yourself so—and remember, she is in a far better home now than any you could ever have hoped to give her."

But it would be very long indeed before Alice Taylor would be able to think without regret or reproach about little Jennie. She did not know how much she had done for her already, but one day, when the books are opened, the poor little city waif will be set as a bright gem in Alice Taylor's crown.

The brother and sister left the house together, the latter taking a car for the Grange. Her heart was full of a great pity for the stricken house, and ached intolerably for Minnie, to whom this must be a terrible stroke.

As she passed through the great gates at the end of the avenue, the lodge keeper, seeing and recognising her, came out to the door to greet her; then Alice paused to ask a question here, it would save her the pain up at the house. The woman guessed what she wished to hear before the question was uttered, and answered in a low voice—

"He died on Sawbath nicht, Miss Taylor. It was delirium tremens, an' Jeanie—that's my lassie, the hoosemaid, ye ken—telt me it was awfu' to hear him. He was ill a' Setterday tae, though no as bad, an' afore he died it took fower men tae haud him doon. He thoct the devil was takin' him awa'; eh, Miss Taylor, it was an awfu' end for a braw young man; it's just the drink tae; I'm wae for his mither an' the young leddies." Alice could scarcely articulate her thanks, and hurried on, praying to be enabled to offer some slight comfort to those she loved, in their days of affliction. The blinds were drawn down, and the house looked mournful without as well as within, where the servants crept about on tiptoe, and talked in whispers. The one who admitted Miss Taylor silently pointed her to the drawing-room."

"The young ladies are there, Miss Taylor; the mistress is in her bed ill. The master and Mr. Walter are in town."

Alice nodded and slipped noiselessly upstairs. Opening the door very softly, she looked in, for both girls were there in their heavy crape dresses, Kate lying on a couch, and Minnie standing on the hearthrug looking into the fire. She turned at the opening of the door, and seeing who it was, smiled wintrily and held out her hand.

"Alice, I scarcely hoped you would be home from the north; come in."

"Oh, Alice, is that you? I am thankful to see you," said Kate, looking up, her eyes red with weeping. "I have not seen a soul these wretched days; a fearful business this, isn't it; have you heard?" Minnie turned her face to the fire again, while Kate went on—

"Everybody warned Fred of what the end would be, but he wouldn't be warned; and though we guessed he would kill himself in the end, it is none the less horrible when it comes. As long as I live I shall never forget that fearful Sunday; it was worse than being shut up in a mad house."

"Kate!" fell from Minnie's lips in a tone of intense pain.

"I must speak or die," said Kate recklessly, "and I can't pretend to be breaking my heart over Fred's loss; he was not very lovable at the best, and of late he has been a burden to us all. I don't know, I'm sure, what we have done that we should be shamed and afflicted like this. We are no worse than our neighbours who sail along quite smoothly. It's not right." There was a short silence, Alice took off her bonnet and gloves, then Kate rose. "You are getting a poor reception, Alice; it was kind of you to come to cheer our loneliness. I'll take your things upstairs, and look in upon mamma to tell her you have come." She gathered the things in her arms and swept out of the room, looking round to admire the graceful sweep of her train. Kate was a beauty, and knew her mourning became her delicate loveliness, and she was very vain besides.

When the door closed there was a brief silence in the room; the slight still figure leaning against the mantel never stirred, till Alice moved close to her, and laying a tender arm round the drooping shoulders, turned the wan, sad face to hers.

"Minnie, my darling, God comfort you! I want to, but I don't know how."

Then the slight figure swayed like a reed, and leaning her tired head on her friend's shoulder, Minnie Templeton gave way to a burst of weeping which almost frightened Alice. They were the first tears she had shed, and relieved the pent up heart wonderfully.

"You have done me good already, Alice," she said, by-and-bye. "I was longing for you to come; I have felt I can't tell you how, as if everything, even God had failed us in these sad days."

Alice was silent, passing her hand to and fro the brown head with infinite gentleness.

"You have been in a house of mourning too, Alice," said Minnie again; "your aunt is dead, I suppose—when did it happen?"

"Sunday afternoon just at sunset, Minnie, Aunt Ellen went home," answered Alice, her thoughts fleeing to that calm peaceful death-bed where suffering had been changed to victory, and dear Aunt Ellen had left her cross behind for ever and ever and gone to wear a crown.

"Fred died at six o'clock. None of us were present but papa and Walter. Papa would not let us come in; but we heard, oh, Alice, as Kate said, I can never forget that fearful Sunday!"

She paused again, and hid her face. "Walter feels it very deeply—more so, I believe, than Papa. I do not understand Papa," she said, with a great sigh. "Mamma is very much broken down. The funeral is to-morrow, you know. Will you come up and see Fred? the coffin is not screwed down yet. He looks quite peaceful and at rest. There are no marks of the struggle he had left upon his face."

"If you can bear it, Minnie," whispered Alice. Then they went upstairs to the chamber of death. Minnie drew up the blinds, and lifted the coffin lid. Death is a great smoother away of care, and Fred's face looked now as it used to be before the curse had fallen upon him. All that had been pure and noble and good in his nature seemed to be reflected in his face now. As Minnie said, there was no trace of the struggle left.

"You gave a loved one up to the grave on Sunday too, Alice," whispered Minnie, brokenly. "Sorrowfully, I know, but hopefully, for you have a sure hope of meeting her again; but oh, Alice, Alice, what is left to us?"

Ah! what indeed?

CHAPTER X.

CONCLUSION.

"I never heard of anything so annoying, so absurd, Taylor; and what is to become of the business I have toiled and fought to build up for one of my sons? I have a good mind to send the obstinate young rascal about his business, to see what his pair of hands can do for him."

So spake Mr. Templeton to James Taylor one afternoon, coming to the lawyer's office to vent his grievance, which was that Walter had firmly declined to have anything whatever to do with the Edinburgh Brewery, preferring, he said, to work with his hands, if need be, before he laid his conscience under such a burden. James Taylor sat silent for a moment, in almost painful surprise. To him it was a thing inexplicable that this man, who had lost one son through intemperance, should be aught but thankful that his sole remaining one had taken such a firm stand against it—had planted his foot securely in the right way.

"Such a business too," fumed the old gentleman, striding to and fro the office; "there isn't its equal in the Midlands, I know—worth a clear six thousand a year to anybody."

"Has Walter any business or profession in view?" enquired Mr. Taylor.

"Humph! he talks of wanting to be a doctor. I've a good mind to let him pull himself through college, see how he likes that. I told him so, and the young monkey said it was his intention to bring himself through by teaching in leisure hours, and writing for the magazines. A literary hack he means to be. Wish him much joy of the beggarly business. I suppose my lord considers my money contaminated because it proceeds from the brewing. Indeed, I don't know what the rising generation's coming to."

James Taylor lifted his head from his ledger, and looked straight into Mr. Templeton's angry face.

"Sir," he said, his voice grave to sternness, "Thank God for Walter's firmness. Would you like to see him come to an end like his brother?"

"No, of course I don't; but there is a medium. I never was drunk in my life. Minnie encourages him in it too. She looks quiet enough, but she can be obstinate as well as any woman. You will not get a very humble, pliant wife, Taylor."

James Taylor's lips parted in a smile, half amused, half tender. He had no fears about his wife's disposition, but he did not care to say so to his future father-in-law.

"Well, I see there isn't much sympathy to be got here. You're spoiled, Taylor, upon my word, by being such a bigot on the drink question. Talk of liberality and Christian charity! Your creed for everybody connected in the remotest degree with the trade is 'Down with them—no quarter.' Well, good day." And the old gentleman quitted the office as abruptly as he had entered it.

Walter Templeton nobly held to his decision, and in spite of strong opposition and much thoughtless pain inflicted by his father, he succeeded in owing his University course solely to his own exertions. His father held aloof, secretly amazed and proud of the unwavering application, the indomitable will and perseverance of his son. And when he closed his college course laden with honours, and went to pursue his chosen profession in a foreign land, the old man broke down utterly, and owned that he had misjudged and mis-doubted him, and asked forgiveness for what had gone before. It was freely accorded before it was asked.

Walter has prospered abroad; he has done, and is doing, incalculable good in the temperance cause. There is a close bond of union between him and his sister's husband (for James Taylor long since claimed his reward). They are one in heart on this great social question of the day. Alice Taylor, left comparatively alone in the world, save for the companionship of her brother's children, spends her life among the lowly, down-trodden ones of earth, and has been the means of leading many a wandering sheep back to the fold. The Edinburgh Brewery flourishes still, though it has now passed into other hands. Mr. Templeton is old and feeble, but sticks yet to his toddy and his wine, and is as prejudiced as of yore against total abstinence and all its votaries. He shuts his eyes wilfully to the fruits of the great curse.

But they will open by-and-bye, perhaps when it is too late.

THE END.

PUBLIC PRESS.

"UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF LIQUOR."—That blissful state defined by the expression under the influence of liquor, seems at last and very properly to be losing its charm in the eyes of judges and magistrates. A person described as a gentleman living at Putney had seated himself in a railway carriage and put his feet on the opposite seat. Upon being asked by the plaintiff to remove them to allow him to enter, he jumped from the carriage and knocked the plaintiff down, and behaved like a madman. The magistrate said it was a gross case, and sentenced him to a month's hard labour without the option of a fine.

TEMPERANCE MISSION AT ARBROATH.—Mr. Francis Murphy, the great American temperance orator, who has during the last two or three months been carrying on a "gospel temperance mission" in certain of the Forfarshire towns, concluded a successful series of meetings in Arbroath on Wednesday night, 8th ult. During the six days he was in the town meetings were held nightly in the public hall, which was crowded on each occasion, and overflowed into some of the neighbouring chambers. The number of persons who took the abstinence pledge is 4,295. The meetings are to be continued under the management of a committee.—Daily Review.

Miss M. A. Paul, author of Tim's Troubles, contributes a timely letter to the Temperance Record, touching "The Religious Aspect of the Temperance Movement," in which she says: "I have always been used to hear teetotalism spoken of as no light matter, but a solemn duty, and in this way it has been impressed upon the hearts of thousands from the first. I can never appreciate the beauty of the phrase 'Gospel Temperance;' to me all temperance is gospel temperance, and you may as well say gospel truth, gospel faith, gospel love. Temperance is a fruit of the Spirit of God—there is no such thing as secular temperance. Inasmuch as a man has temperance, he has a good thing, whether he be wise enough to class it amongst spiritual mercies or not."

As the State undertakes to protect certain interests against the vicious designs of evil men, we protect individuals and society at large, by prohibiting that which is fearfully prolific of crime, insanity, pauperism, disease, and death. It is impossible to imagine a reason for any kind of prohibitive, criminal or protective legislation, that if applied to the liquor traffic will not wipe it out of existence. Some deny the right. But as we have said, this right is included in the present license law; for if the State can prohibit at all it can prohibit entirely. If it has the power to license and regulate—to say that liquor shall not be sold by certain persons, on certain days, to certain parties, or that it shall not be sold, unless money is paid, and bonds given, then it has power to say that it shall not be sold at all. It is also argued that people are not prepared for prohibition. To this I say, they never will be prepared so long as they consent to license. A thousand years of tacit consent will never lead the way to prohibition. The way to be prepared for prohibition is to think it, talk it, pray it, vote it, preach it. Agitation will prepare the people and nothing else will. But it is my opinion that there is public sentiment enough now against the business, but there is not sufficient moral courage. The need is not more education but more back-bone. God pity the poor wretches who know that the liquor traffic is a great overshadowing evil but dare not say so. Of all species of slavery, moral cowardice is the most pitiable.—Rescue.

WHAT BARLEY IS.—Dr. Lees recently delivered a lecture in the Great Central Hall, Shoreditch, London, "On the worthlessness of beer as food," in which he thus referred to barley. "Now let us look at what barley is—and I am going to give you the very highest authority to-night—a page of the Brewers' Guardian. You cannot question the source of my information when I bring the Brewers' Guardian in to bear witness upon this point. It is a very flattering thing to us that after forty years agitation the chemist of the brewers should come and do the teaching of the teetotaler! I refer you to No. 233 of a very respectable organ, published, I think, at a shilling a number. It contains one of a series of articles on "The Modern System of Brewing," by Herbert C. Wright, B.A., and I find this passage in the very first column:—Barley is not capricious as regards climate—and that is the reason why it would be a very useful grain if it were properly used in this capricious climate. Of the four more usual sorts of grain its time of growth is the shortest. Another reason:—In spite of this fact, certain climatic conditions are not favourable to the production of good brewing material. They may be favourable to the production of an excellent food, though. Thus we observe that in districts where the summer is hot, where a high temperature usually prevails, and drought sets in after the barley is in bloom, the formation of the fruit is hurried on, but the grains are small with a close texture, and are rich in nitrogen—in this very substance, which makes blood, bone, muscle, tissues, nerve, and brain. The very thing which renders them unfavourable to the brewer is that which renders them all the greater blessing to the man." It goes on to observe:—"A grain of barley is a much more complicated thing than persons of an unbotanical mind would suppose." I have been endeavouring to show you that that is so.

POETRY.

THE RIVULET.

LITTLE sparkling rivulet,
Thou art flowing, flowing yet;
I have seen thee years ago,
Thou wert flowing then as now;
Dancing through the valley sweet,
With thy fairy footsteps fleet.
Wilt thou stay and rest awhile?
Thou hast wandered many a mile,
Over bank and mossy green,
—Tell me now what thou hast seen,
Since, a little tiny rill,
Thou burst forth from yonder hill,

Thou hast seen the cottage maid,
Darling of the woodland shade,
Lingering by thy verdant side,
Casting flowers upon thy tide;
Thou hast seen the lovers stand,
Grasping tight each other's hand;
Thou hast fed the busy mill,
Working with an eager will;
Over cascades thou hast danced,
Then in quiet flow advanced.
Rivulet, wilt thou rest awhile,
Thou hast wandered many a mile?

Still the little rivulet,
It is flowing, flowing yet,
It will flow unceasingly,
Till its waters reach the sea,
Till it joins immensity.

Like this rivulet too we go,
With a swift unceasing flow,
Towards an unmeasured sea,
Towards vast eternity.
Onward flows our life's fair tide,
Over rough and smooth we glide,
In eternity so vast,
We are swallowed up at last.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

MARCH, 1882.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

112 BATH STREET,
GLASGOW.

* * We have been compelled to leave over a large amount of matter—all our literary notices and reviews, several interesting papers, a valuable statistical table, etc., etc. We must content ourselves with the hope that next month we may find room for all these.

THE NEW LICENSING BILL FOR SCOTLAND.

It will no doubt be within the remembrance of our readers that at the last annual public meeting of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, Sir W. Lawson, Bart., M.P., moved a vote of thanks to Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., for presiding. Sir Wilfrid, in doing so, said:—"There is no reason whatever, after the vote which your Scotch representatives gave last June, and after the Welsh and Irish Bill and the Scotch Sunday Closing Bill, why some Scotch member should not bring forward a Local Option Bill for Scotland. (Applause.) I do not know what his lordship will think of the suggestion, but I do know, after having heard him to-night, that if he should think well of it, there is no Scotch member more able to do justice to the question and to his fellow countrymen than the noble lord in the chair. (Cheers.)" His lordship only promised to put his name on the back of a Bill which should give to the people of Scotland "that for which they have pronounced in the most unmistakeable terms. (Cheers.)" His lordship has done more than that. He has brought forward a Licensing Bill far ahead of any scheme proposed for Scotland. His measure contemplates—1, a licensing authority in burghs; 2, one license for every 500 of the population; 3, ratepayers to vote for as many licenses as they please, or for no licenses whatever: in no case can they vote for more than the maximum number; 4, they are to vote by wards or in School Board districts; 5, if the majority voting vote total prohibition, the minority may within three weeks get up a requisition praying for a license for every 300 ratepayers; 6, a licensing authority is to select and allocate premises and licenses; 7, applicants to be certified, and licenses to be disposed of by auction every ten years; 8, compensation to be granted to those whose claims are sustained. The rest of the Bill makes provision for transfers, steamers, licensing commissions, violations of the law, the adjudication of claims, and such like.

It is with the voting clause with which our readers will have to do. That clause gives power to every moral and social reformer to vote for no license whatever in his district; and it will stimulate all friends of the movement to educate all in their locality to vote for no public-houses. This clause will be the "Nileometer" of the agitation, showing what has been done and what may yet be to do to induce the ratepayers to vote solidly for prohibition. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association base their recommendation to their friends to give a vigorous support to the Bill on this voting clause. The passage of that clause into law will enable the ratepayers at once to give an opinion upon the liquor traffic, which will, we believe, in many cases, show that its presence is repugnant to the majority of the ratepayers.

There is a most objectionable provision to this clause—a provision which allows one hundred ratepayers within three weeks to ask one licence for every complete three hundred of the ratepayers. This provision is made in the interests of the ratepayers who now support the liquor traffic, and will have the most strenuous opposition of the Executive, who are hopeful that they will get that clause deleted, so as to allow the prohibitory clause to have ample room and verge enough to veto the issue or continuance of all licenses. They earnestly call on all their friends to enter upon the duty of giving that clause their combined support, at the same time memorializing their representatives to amend it by the removal of the objectionable provision it contains.

At this stage the Executive give no opinion on the other portions of the Bill, which fully provides for a most stringent limitation of the liquor traffic. When they know that the Bill is in itself not permissive, and that it comes into operation whenever it receives the Royal Assent, they will easily understand that, as an Act, it will inflict a blow upon the Burgh Licensing system of Scotland from which it is impossible it can recover.

We are compelled to go to press before the Bill has passed its first reading, but we understand that it is backed by the members for Glasgow—Mr. Anderson and Dr. Cameron, Messrs. M'Intosh, Bolton, Stewart, and Crum.

Many of our readers will rejoice to learn that the University of St. Andrews has conferred the degree of D.D. upon the Rev. John Kay, Edinburgh. We congratulate Dr. Kay upon his well-deserved honour, and we earnestly hope that he may be long spared to enjoy and adorn the high position in the world and in the church to which it raises him.

The School Board elections are drawing near. The temperance friends in Edinburgh are to run Rev. Drs. Adamson and Kay, and the Baptists, Congregationalists, and Evangelical Unionists in Glasgow have adopted the Rev. Dr. Fergus Ferguson as their candidate. By working hard and voting solidly, our friends may easily put these gentlemen at the head of the poll.

The National Trades' Guardian, the Scotch publican organ, has discovered a mare's nest. He sees "Friend" Abraham Sharman's subscription in the Alliance News, and thinking from his Christian name that the worthy "Friend" is a Jew, indignantly demands to know why he should largely subscribe for the overthrow of the drink trade while the nation is assisting the Jews in Russia? We have not come across such an egregious blunder for a long time. Our contemporary has been trying the boomerang, and suffers from the inevitable recoil.

The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has just issued a series of twelve leaflets. Their titles are:—"What is the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association?" "Law should not protect evil;" "Medical Testimonies;" "The Urgent Question of the Day;" "A Workman's Paradise;" "National Drink Facts;" "The Verdict of the Judges;" "Waste of Food;" "Opinions of eminent men;" "How we spend our money;" "The Nation's Drink Bill;" "Local Option." These are beautifully got up, and may be had at 112 Bath Street, at 2s. per thousand, exclusive of carriage. Committees can have notices of meetings printed on them, as they are only printed on one side of the paper.

The Rev. Newman Hall of London, lecturing in Edinburgh last month, informed his hearers that "he had been an advocate of moral suasion, but he had lately become a convert to asking the Government to do a little to help them. He had been forty years in coming to that conclusion, but he had come to it at last." Rev. Mr. Hall, it is true, only recognises the legal prohibition of Sunday traffic in alcoholic liquors, but it is satisfactory to find that so sturdy a champion of moral suasion as he has been constrained to approve of liquor legislation. Then look how difficult it is to educate people, and yet by an unwearied and undaunted educative effort, the aversion of the rev. gentleman to legislation has been overcome. Keep at it; keep at it! We will win by and bye.

During the month the vigorous activity of the agitation in support of the policy of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has been fully sustained. Messrs. Semple and Blackwood have in the north and the far north had a most excellent series of meetings, extending over a fortnight. Their tour embraced Fraserburgh, Peterhead, Wick, and other places, and lecturers and friends have been having a good time. Mr. Waterston has been successfully holding conferences, followed by public meetings, in Jedburgh, Hawick, Ceres, St. Andrews, Cupar, Kelso, Anstruther, Dunse, etc. Large deputation meetings and the ordinary meetings have also given a vigorous impetus to the agitation. The effect of this upon the friends immediately engaged has been of the most encouraging nature, and the determination to concentrate efforts upon the prohibitory phase of the agitation has made itself signally apparent on the part of a great number of the friends. Working in the temperance cause without the power of veto is just like Sisyphus rolling a stone up a hill without the power to hold it there.

With the present issue the sixteenth volume of the Social Reformer closes, and the editor looks back upon the labours in connection with the volume with a considerable degree of satisfaction. He is aware how much the magazine has to contend with through its publication once a month, but that being meantime inevitable, he has tried to make the best of it. During the year his own labours have been sweetened by the kindly notices of his contemporaries, and by the congratulation of numerous friends. He has had the invaluable assistance of numerous pens, whose services for the future volumes he is glad to say are promised. To them he tenders his warmest acknowledgements. He believes that he will have the pleasure of welcoming to the circle of his esteemed contributors many new friends during the year, and that numerous improvements and several attractive features will still more strongly recommend the new volume to the constant reader. The circulation during the year has slightly increased, and might be largely added to by a little friendly effort on the part of friends who have never yet done anything in this direction. They might easily bring it under the notice of their friends and neighbours and thus extend its usefulness, while they rendered an important agency of the association more valuable and effective. The magazine is their own, and has a claim upon their good offices. Title-page and index to the volume now ended will appear with the new number.

A very instructive census of public-house attendance in Bristol last December revealed a public-house traffic of the most appalling magnitude. It was clearly shown that a number—104,311—more than equal to a half of the entire population of that city—206,503—entered the public-houses between seven and eleven p.m. Of these, the men amounted to 50,723, the women 36,922, the children 16,666. Much has been written pro and con on this census. On the one hand it was looked on as a solitary fact, from which little practical could be gathered. Besides, the children went along with their parents, and not to get drink for themselves and others. On the other hand, the census afforded a striking confirmation of the shocking proneness of the men to spend like asses what they earned like horses, and the painful fact that the women are gradually drifting into habits of intemperance, while the dear little children were taken to these vile places to be initiated into a baneful indulgence in alcoholic liquors. Now we have another census, not in the west of England but in the north of it, for at Byker, near Newcastle, on the 19th ult. there was a census of church and chapel and public-house attendance that day taken. The attendance at the public-house was as follows:—Men 1584, women 634, and children 696; total, 2914. The numbers at church and chapel were:—588 men, 484 women, and 485 children—1557; majority for Bacchus over Christ, 1357! Drunkenness is coming in upon us like a flood, and the flow may alarm us no more than the flood alarmed the neighbours of Noah, but it will one day bring us face to face with the deplorable fact that the strength of our manhood, the purity and grace of womanhood, and the tender simplicity and docility of children have passed from us never to return. A few more of these censuses, with their dreadful revelations, and the nation must arise and suppress the traffic, or be for ever fallen—doing homage to Bacchus, and writing Ichabod on all that pertains to Christianity.

In the fourth part of the people's edition of the Life of the late Prince Consort, there is a vivid instance given of his Royal Highness's philanthropy. The ballast heavers of the port of London before 1853 "could only get work through a body of riverside publicans and middlemen, who made them drink before they would give them a job, made them drink while at it, kept them waiting for their wages and drinking after they had done their work, so that they could only take half their wages home to their families, and that half only reached them through a drunkard's hands. The consequence was that they were in a pitiable state; this truck-drink system was ruining them body and soul and their families too." Call up the remembrance of the worst forms of slavery, and you will find it paradise to that of these poor ballast heavers. It is hardly within the power of the mind to conceive the misery and injustice these men suffered at the hands of the publicans, or the corrupting power of the traffic over those that lived by its operations. More inhuman relations between man and man than what existed between "the Bungs" and the ballast heavers never existed in any civilised country. Fortunately his Royal Highness was elected Master of the Trinity House, and, failing otherwise to throw off their chains, these drink slaves boldly appealed to him, and not in vain. He inquired into their grievances, and at length got a clause inserted into the Merchant Shipping Act, 1853, placing them under the control of the Corporation of the Trinity House. He did not spend his time in drawing them away from their oppressors, or in remonstrating with these sordid tyrants, but simply called in the aid of law, and dissolved the fraudulent connection between them and their unfeeling masters. As if by magic, "the law, by sweeping away the system that was ruining them, redressed their wrongs." Our readers may faintly imagine "what a change this was to them from the corrupting publicans and grasping middlemen, seeking their money at the cost of their lives, to Albert the Good and his generous brethren desiring only their good! At one dead lift they raised these men from the drunkard's life and the drunkard's fate to the comfort and respectability of the fairly-paid, hard-toiling English working man." You cannot make sober by Act of Parliament! What a libel on the law. It did so with these ballast heavers, and not with them only but with their descendants. The thousands who drink of the publicans' "swill," whose families eat only of the "husks" he allows them, would rejoice over the enactment of a law for Scotland that at one dead lift would raise them from a drunkard's life and a drunkard's fate to comfort and respectability. When the people of Scotland fully set their minds upon this, they will appeal to Parliament in a way with which it will be found dangerous to trifle, and the oppressor shall be deprived of his power, and the oppressed shall go free. We own our hearty obligation to his late Royal Highness for his truly philanthropic lesson, and we hope that all who read it will profit by it.

Ex-Provost Lindsay, of Leith, is putting himself into communication with the municipal authorities of Scotland with reference to the question of the propriety of amending the "Lindsay Act" of 1862, and in what way? Many of our readers will be surprised to learn that this is a Permissive Act which the worthy Provost in 1862, with the valuable assistance of Lord Advocate Moncrieff, got placed on the Statute, and that its object is to render the General Police (Scotland) Act of 1833, another Permissive Act, more easy of adoption by the ratepayers. The machinery of the earlier Act was so cumbrous, and the consequent expense of working it so great, that it threatened to break the back (financially we mean) of any burgh adopting it. It was directed against filth, darkness, bad roads, and disorder, and where the only grievance was filth or bad roads, all the machinery for darkness and disorder had likewise to be established. Provost Lindsay's Act enabled any burgh to adopt the section that bore directly on any evil that annoyed it. Under it ratepayers might leave the section relating to water and adopt the other sections, or adopt all the sections save one. The wisdom of the promoters of the Act was seen in the great avidity with which the Act has been adopted, until at the present time there is hardly a burgh in Scotland outside its wise and beneficent control. All the benefits it has conferred, or offers, are just those of permissive legislation, which, when asked for to suppress the traffic in alcoholic liquors is so decried. Were we a magistrate or a town councillor, and our opinion asked, we would suggest that the public houses of any place be placed in the category of the local nuisances of which the Act takes cognizance. If this were done, and reason could not object, then in any burgh adopting the Act in this amended form it would be the duty of the authorities to deal with the drink shops as nuisances, closing them as they close open sewers, overcrowded graveyards, bad wells, or similar sources of disease. They would not remove them piece-meal, as some temperance reformers desire to do with public houses: they must be removed on the same lines as dungheaps are, altogether, and steps effectually taken to prevent their recurrence. Our readers can see from our remarks the inconsistency that marks the conduct of certain people: they laud the Lindsay Act, but they vituperate the Permissive Bill; they sternly suppress by Permissive Acts nuisances that slay their tens a week, and they obstruct the passage of a bill into law that would abolish the drink system that slays its thousands a week. We are willing to believe that many who thus oppose the suppressive veto do so ignorantly, and through unbelief, and therefore we labour to dispel ignorance, enlist sympathy, and invite the hearty co-operation of all citizens, that a law may soon be obtained for Scotland, which will fall upon the liquor traffic and grind it to powder.

Some of our friends "beyond the sea" have sent us a copy of the Health Reform Colonist, directing our attention to the prospectus of a new colony which it is expected will be established somewhere on the ever-advancing fringe of the American States. With the strong love for our native land which sways us, we never could think of crossing the ocean for a home. We hope that the same heather which has gladdened our hearts when living may sweetly bloom over us when we are dead. Moreover, we can hardly think that the maximum of happiness is to be found in comparative isolation from our fellows. The great Father of us all has framed us for society, and has made us so that the painful spectacle of misery and suffering, or contact with these, is a stimulus to a good man to make efforts for their alleviation or removal, and the best of mankind have endeared their memories to the generations that have followed them by their self-sacrificing efforts at Prison Reform, Freedom to the Slaves, or the overthrow of those barriers that interposed between our appetite for food and an abundant supply. It seems to us to savour somewhat of mockery or misanthropy for a body of men and women, to abandon the abodes of civilization, in order that they might, in some distant location or solitude remote, live in strict commercial relations with nature; at any rate it is a kind of experiment whose failures have greatly outnumbered the successes of which it can boast. We prefer, on the whole, to think men will find their truest happiness in casting in their lot with those who are striving to raise humanity by direct appeals to the individual, or by the amelioration of the conditions that affect him, to a higher stage of civilization. Voyagers tell us of the ennui which overcomes them in the Arctic regions where the sun never sets for weeks, and travellers would gladly vary the monotony of the endless sunshine of the tropics with its enfeebling rays, with an occasional cooling breeze and a cloudy sky. Our colonists may find that the strength and expansion of being may only be attained amid the constant conflict of good with evil which goes on in the community they have forsaken.

Still, we who choose to remain in a state of society for which they have lost desire, may yet receive much benefit from the contemplation of a scheme which is framed, on the whole, so much in harmony with those laws imposed upon our being by our Maker. In the scheme we find democracy in all rule; freedom of conscience and conduct; education to all; the most ample provision for the conditions of knowledge and recreation and the absolute exclusion of all habits, customs, and occupations dangerous to the physical, mental, or moral health of individuals or the little colony as a whole. Those of our readers who can fully realize what these five points truly mean, will find food for reflection in thinking out the actuality of a society based upon them, and then of endeavouring to obtain a vivid idea of the changed condition of Scotland were such an order of existence enforced therein to-morrow and henceforth. Disease and insanity, in their most grossly induced forms, would be unknown; ignorance, a prurient minstrelsy and an obscene literature, would have disappeared; while whatever was true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report, would flourish luxuriantly, pervading the thoughts, the speech, and the deed of all. The vicious of both sexes would find no field of action, but would be compelled to fall into line with the good, or seek in ungodly haunts that opportunity for sin which would be denied them in this happy state. It is, we frankly admit, given to but few to relieve themselves of all prejudice and false impressions, created and fostered by contact with our artificial existence, and to picture truly the more exalted life after which these home colonists yearn, and which would, in fact, in our opinion, bring them within measurable distance of paradise itself. All who adhere to the scheme are expected to pledge themselves to conformity with certain things, and to an implacable enmity to some of the most desolating evils of society. The fifth pledge, for instance, involves a determination against raising or using tobacco; the sixth is against the use, manufacture, and sale of all alcoholic liquors; and not only so, but against the disposal of any produce which may be transmuted into such deadly drugs. There is no halting here, no trifling with evils so deplorable. The determination to exclude these poisonous substances is not exhausted by their exclusion, but the produce of the land is not to be sold to the brewer or the distiller. Their resolution to colonize is not a dream or a theory—their action is beyond debate. There are already such colonies, of which Vineland is the most signally and successfully conspicuous. Their anticipations of a heavenly state on earth may not be realized, but their attitude to Drink in all its forms is a gladdening reality. They have determined that their mental and moral capacity should not be diminished, their faculties not dulled, their consciences not seared, through the operation of alcohol on their brains, and their minds will have the healthiest conditions, amid which they may develop and exercise them. Should the scheme succeed, we may look forward with assured confidence to the progress and growth of a colony whose inhabitants enjoy, in fruitful exuberance, the most exalted earthly happiness possible to the human race.

A new member of the alcoholic tribe has been discovered—not in the breezy hill, the lovely valley, the flowery mead, or the boundless prairie. It comes, like all the family, from the rottenness and decay of the productions of nature, and, like the race to which it is allied, it is the enemy of mankind. This newly-discovered poison rejoices in the name of Sotal. It is limpid, colourless, and pungent, and it intoxicates. It springs from the decomposition and decay of a gigantic lily, which has its home in Western Texas and in South-Eastern New Mexico. This lily grows best at an elevation of 500 to 600 feet. It is perennial in growth, and has long green leaves, with a stout flower stem of some 12 feet high. It does not produce alcohol. We have bread trees, milk trees, but no alcoholic tree has yet been found in all the wide domain of nature. This lily yields most delicious food and drink. People who are wise, boil or bake its leaves, and the inner part of these is much sought after. So that if people would only use this lily as wise folks use corn or wheat, making it supply a delicious food and a delightful beverage Sotal would never have been heard of. But there are some people who, like the French duchess, have no desire for anything but forbidden fruit. "Ah," she said as she laid down a water pitcher one day, "what a pity that taking water is not a sin, it would be more delicious!" Such people there are in Texas who, caring more for the gratification of their propensities than the satisfaction of nature, steep the lily till it decays, and from the steepings distil Sotal. Sotal will be heard of: it will, like all its deadly kindred, drive men and women mad, and hurl multitudes of them into premature graves. Between the lily as it blooms and as it is in its rottenness, there is as great a difference as there is between light and darkness; between the highest good and the vilest evil; between the brain nourished by food which strengthens and the brain maddened and overwhelmed. Men leave civilization with its pleasures to go forth as the pioneers of humanity: they forsake almost all comfort, but they carry with them supplies of deadly liquor, or, as in Texas, they seize on the vegetable productions around them and pervert them to a poisonous draught that dulls their sensitivity, darkens their understanding, weakens their will power, and hardens their heart. On how many a grave in Texas and Mexico may yet be fitly placed a tablet having this inscription,—“Here lies a settler, brave, courageous, daring and successful. But in the flower of his age he died of frenzied madness induced by that deadly and seductive poison, Sotal, He came here to find a fortune, but Sotal found for him an early and dishonoured grave.”

THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—I.

NOTICES OF MOTION—SALE OF SPIRITS IN NATAL—IMPORT DUTIES IN JAMAICA—MR. GLADSTONE ON LICENSING LEGISLATION—WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING DIVISION—WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING EXPLANATION BILL.

The present Parliamentary session was begun on Tuesday, 7th ult. The occasion was wholly devoid of ceremony. Rarely has a session opened under more excitement. It is truly deplorable when there are so many grievances awaiting redress that there should be so much party fighting, and that the Government of the day of whatever party should not have a clear stage for the transaction of needful and urgent legislation. We are hopeful that this obstruction will work its own cure by the nation rousing itself and setting legislators aside whose nature it is to fall out by the way. The Queen's Speech made no reference to the licensing question, but a very large number of notices of bills and of questions were given. Among these were a notice of motion by Sir Wilfrid Lawson on Monday, to ask whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate an alteration of the licensing laws. By Mr. E. Clarke, on an early day, to move a resolution affirming the desirability of bills which had reached the stage of committee in one session, but not becoming law, being resumed at the same stage the next session. By Mr. Pease, to call attention to the relations of this country with China, with reference to the opium traffic. By Mr. Warton, Bill to amend the Welsh Sunday Closing Act of last session. (Laughter.) Mr. Stevenson asked leave to bring in a Bill for Sunday Closing in England. Mr. Carbutt asked leave to bring in a Bill to close public houses during the hours of polling at Parliamentary elections. Mr. O'Sullivan asked leave to bring in a Bill for the improvement of spirits before being allowed to be sent out of bond for consumption. Sir John St. Aubyn gave a similar notice for a Bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor on Sunday in Cornwall. Mr. Lewis Fry gave notice that on Thursday "in committee of the whole House he would move that the Chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the granting of licenses for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors not to be consumed on the premises." Mr. Morgan Lloyd followed with the announcement that he proposed on February 21st, to reintroduce his "Bill to amend the laws relating to Parliamentary elections." This measure last session dealt with public-houses and committee-rooms. The Attorney-General intimated his intention of introducing on Thursday his "Bill for the better prevention of Corrupt and Illegal Practices at Parliamentary elections." This Bill as printed last year also contained provision to lessen the drink curse at elections.

Feb. 8th.—Colonel Barne asked leave to introduce a Bill to prevent the adulteration of beer. (Laughter.)

Feb. 9th.—Dr. Cameron gave notice that he would introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to the traffic in excisable liquors in passenger vessels plying between Scotch ports.

Mr. Onslow gave notice that in consequence of the motion of the member for Whitby (Mr. Arthur Pease), regarding the opium trade between India and China, he would move an amendment thereon.

Lord Hartington in reply to Mr. Fowler, said that he was aware that by the law of Natal the sale of spirits to natives was forbidden. It was proposed by the Secretary of the Colonies to the Government of Natal in 1879 to extend this prohibition of the sale of spirits to coolies, and the Government of India were consulted on the subject, and they obtained the opinion of the Governments of Madras and Bengal, who were of opinion that the traffic in liquors did great and manifest harm, but said it appeared desirable that existing contracts should stand, and that the law should be applied prospectively. It would be for the Colonial authorities and the Secretary for the Colonies to say whether it was advisable to take the risk of diminishing the traffic as suggested by the reports of the Madras and Bengal Governments. These were communicated to the Colonial Offices, and he had recently heard that the Natal Government had resolved that no legislation for stopping the sale of liquor be attempted. It would seem from what he had heard stated that if this traffic did great and manifest harm to the natives, there was nothing in the advice given by the Government of India to preclude the Natal Government from extending their legislation. Mr. Fowler gave notice that on an early date he would move a resolution in terms of the question.

Mr. Courtenay in reply to Mr. Serjeant Simon admitted that an import duty often had been levied to meet a temporary deficit in the revenue of Jamaica, but this was only for one year. There had been also an increase on the duty of rum imported, and the hon. gentleman was understood to say the authorities at the Colonial Office had not thought it their duty to interfere.

Feb. 13th.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government contemplated proposing any alteration in the licensing laws during the present session. Mr. Gladstone replied that Her Majesty's Government have no intention to propose to the House a measure which would be termed a measure for the alteration of the licensing laws during the present session, but they have already made known their intention to introduce a measure, at the earliest period in their power, with respect to Local Government, and that measure will have certain bearings upon the question of licensing. I hope that in the course of a short time—it must depend upon other circumstances when it can be introduced—the measure will be under the view of the hon. member, and then he will be able to judge how far he considers it an answer to the question.

Feb. 13th.—Mr. Warton asked leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act. The House divided—ayes 18, noes 51. The Scotch vote was as follows—ayes, Col. Alexander, A. Asher, J. B. Balfour (Lord-Advocate), E. Marjoribanks; noes, G. Anderson, T. R. Buchanan, Dr. Farquharson, P. McLagan, J. Heron Maxwell, E. Noel, J. D. Peddie. The first Scotch vote is as usual largely for Sunday closing.

Feb. 14th.—Mr. Warton gave notice to ask on Thursday to introduce a Bill to amend the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act 1881 No. 2. (Laughter.)

Feb. 16th.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson drew the speaker's attention to the fact that Mr. Warton was defeated on Monday in his attempt to introduce a Bill to amend the Welsh Sunday Closing Act. As he (Sir Wilfrid) did not believe the function of the House to be the explanation of Acts of Parliament, he wanted to know whether the hon. member was in order in bringing in the same Bill under a different name. The Speaker could not call the proceeding of the hon. member in itself irregular. If the Bill is the same he is clearly irregular, but only he can answer that question. Mr. Warton said the Bill was totally different to the other. The first was an exemption bill, this one was to explain the legal effect of the Act itself. Sir Wilfrid said that was just the point. He wanted to know whether it was in order to bring forward a Bill to explain a legal question: that was not legislation.

Trinidad has adopted a Sunday Closing Act. All shops close at 9 a.m.

Wise, the Cork distiller, died lately worth £3,000,000 sterling. What "fools" he had for customers!

The London public-houses, placed end on end or side by side, would form a street thirty miles in length.

All clubs and co-operative stores selling liquors are being compelled to cease either to exist or to continue selling strong drink.

In the new year's copy of the "Licensed Victuallers' Almanack" for 1882, all the members of Parliament who voted with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P., appear in black type.

A capital portrait of Mr. Joseph Livesey, now in his 88th year, adorned the Church of England Temperance Chronicle recently. We hope our readers have read Mr. Sherlock's "Joseph Livesey: a Life Story and its Lessons."

Mr. E. O. Greening, of Manchester, has been at Saltaire, and finds from his own observation that it is an artizan's paradise. Everything there that a working man can hope for, and not a public-house within the area in which 4500 happy working people live.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN AND THE LICENSED VICTUALLERS.—Mr. Joseph Cowen, M.P., in replying to a deputation of the Newcastle Branch of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, said he should be no party to inflicting injustice on licensed victuallers, or on any other class carrying on a legally recognised business.

A PRIZE OF £20.—A prize of twenty pounds stg. is offered by the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society for the best essay or essays "On the Secondary Effects of Alcohol on the System in Health and Disease." Open to the medical students of Edinburgh. For further particulars we refer inquirers to Dr. C. G. Miller, 11 Walker Street, Edinburgh, with whom essays must be lodged by 1st August, 1882.

The Irish Association for the Prevention of Intemperance has laid a declaration in favour of extending the benefits of Sunday closing to Cork, Waterford, Limerick, Dublin, and Belfast before Mr. W. E. Forster, Irish Chief Secretary. It is signed by 215 magistrates, 323 Protestant clergymen, 131 Roman Catholic clergymen, 303 medical men, 131 town councillors, and 171 poor law guardians. Mr. Forster characterised it as a "very important document."

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE LICENSING QUESTION.—The following letter has been received by the Bishop of Durham from Mr. Gladstone:—"My Lord,—Mr. Gladstone desires me to acquaint you that he has received the resolution in favour of an amendment of the licensing laws passed at a recent meeting at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which your lordship has done him the honour to forward. I am to say that Her Majesty's Government will be glad when an opportunity arrives, for making progress toward the settlement of this question.—(Signed), E. W. HAMILTON.

DRUNKENNESS IN DUNDEE.—It is a somewhat curious coincidence that the number of cases before the Dundee Police Court between the 1st and 31st January was the same this year as last—namely, 410. The temperance crusade has not had any effect in diminishing the drunks, as the list of incapables during the past month was one in excess of the same period in January, 1881. These numbers were:—In January this year, 132; last year, 131.—Telegraph.

UNFERMENTED WINE.—We are glad to learn that Mr. Matthew Waddell of the City and Commercial Dining Rooms, Union Street and 42 Argyle Street, Glasgow, has become agent for the sale of Mr. Frank Wright's Unfermented Wine. Mr. Waddell, from his extensive business connection, will give an increased stimulus to the sale of this, the only genuine fruit of the vine at present in the market. We wish him success enough to satisfy his business enterprise.

HEAVY DRINKING AT A BALL.—A writer in Truth says:—"I heard of a ball the other day in average middle-class society, at which less than 200 people were present, and the liquor consumed between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. amounted to seventeen dozen of champagne, two dozen of sherry, twenty bottles of brandy, besides several dozen of claret. The scene at the finale was almost precisely similar to that described at the commencement of the first chapter of 'Harry Lorrequer.'"

A TEMPERANCE FIFTY.—A meeting of temperance delegates was held in the Temperance Hall, Port-Glasgow, on Tuesday night, 14th February, when an organisation called "The Port-Glasgow Temperance Representative Fifty" was formed. A constitution on the lines of "The Dundee Hundred" was formed. The office-bearers elected were:—President, Mr. Robert Duncan, shipbuilder; vice-presidents, Rev. Alexander Baird and Rev. Alexander D. Anderson; corresponding secretary, Mr. D. M. Main; minute secretary, Mr. James Rowan; treasurer, Mr. David Gemmell. The formation of this organisation is the direct fruit of the recent conference on local option.—Daily Mail, Thursday, 16th Feb., 1882.

CONFERENCE ON LOCAL OPTION AT JEDBURGH.—A conference of the friends of local option was held in Douglas' Temperance Hotel, Jedburgh, on Tuesday, 7th ult., Mr. John Curle in the chair. After a statement by Mr. J. H. Waterston, of Edinburgh, it was unanimously agreed to request the Executive of the Permissive Bill Association to urge upon the Government the desirability of introducing a bill for Scotland giving the people power to veto the liquor traffic in their various localities, and also that a similar resolution be sent to the members of Parliament for the burgh and county, urging them to support the same. The conference comprised representatives from Jedburgh, Anerum, Denholm, and surrounding districts.—Daily Review.

LOCAL OPTION CONFERENCE AT HAWICK.—A conference of the friends of local option was held in the Evangelical Union Church, Hawick, on Wednesday evening, 8th February.—Rev. R. Macpherson, of Yetholm, in the chair. After consideration, it was agreed to request the Executive of the Permissive Bill Association to approach the Government, and urge upon them the introduction of a bill for Scotland giving the ratepayers power to veto the liquor traffic in their respective localities. A public meeting was held in the same place after the conference. Bailie Inglis presided, and there was a large attendance. The various motions were unanimously adopted. Among the speakers were:—Rev. Dr. Hislop, Hawick; Councillor Gilroy, Hawick; Rev. N. M'Pherson, Yetholm; Rev. Mr. Orr, Hawick; Mr. David Gaylor, Hawick; Rev. Dr. Adamson, Edinburgh; Mr. M. Cameron, Hawick; Mr. William Simpson, Hawick; Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh; and Mr. M. Muller, Hawick.

GOOD TRADE.—Mr. R. Power asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the other night in Parliament, if his attention had been called to the charge recently delivered by the Chairman of the Durham Quarter Sessions, in which he lamented the terrible increase of crime in that county—crimes of assault upon women and children showing a proportionate increase; and if he intends to take any steps for the better protection of Her Majesty's subjects in the county of Durham. Sir W. Lawson asked if the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions attributed the increase of crime to the better condition of trade, and whether it could be stated what was the description of trade to which he referred. (Laughter.) Sir W. V. Harcourt said, in reply to these cross-questions, he was sorry to have to confess he had not seen the charge of the Durham Quarter Sessions; but no information had reached him, officially or otherwise, which led him to think that any exceptional measures were necessary for the county of Durham. (Hear, hear.)

LOCAL OPTION CONFERENCE AT KELSO.—A conference of the friends of local option in Kelso and district was held on Tuesday, 7th ult., in the Masonic Hall, Kelso—Rev. R. Inglis, M.A., St. Boswells, in the chair. After consultation, it was unanimously agreed to write to the directors of the Permissive Bill Association, calling upon them to memorialise the Government and Scotch members to introduce a bill for Scotland giving the people the power to veto the liquor traffic in their localities when so disposed. After the conference a public meeting was held in the same place. Bailie Slight presided, and there was a large attendance. The following motions were unanimously adopted:—(1) Moved by Rev. Mr. Kirkwood, Kelso, and seconded by Rev. R. Inglis, M.A., St. Boswells—"That, considering the vice, misery, crime, waste of food, increased taxation, and stagnation of trade caused by the traffic in intoxicating liquors, this meeting declares that no legislation will be satisfactory that does not confer the power of a popular veto on the liquor traffic." (2) Moved by Mr. A. Campbell, Kelso, and seconded by Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh—"That considering the advanced position occupied by Scotland on liquor legislation, and its preparedness for still further advance—as shown by the Scotch vote on Sir W. Lawson's Resolution—this meeting calls upon the Government to introduce a measure for Scotland which shall enable ratepayers to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors in their various localities." (3) Moved by Mr. James Melrose, and seconded by Mr. Thomas Brown—"That copies of the foregoing resolutions be signed by the chairman, and forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Lord Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and member of Parliament for the county." Several songs, &c., were given during the evening.

INCREASE OF DRUNKENNESS.—At a meeting held last night in the Free Church Hall, Stockbridge—the Rev. Mr. Keay in the chair—ex-Bailie Lewis delivered an address, in which he referred to the fact that, notwithstanding all the educational, philanthropic, and religious agencies which are at work, and the healthy temperance sentiment that exists, drunkenness is still on the increase. The last excise returns published proved that there has recently been a large increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquors, while the most recent police returns available demonstrate the increase of drunkenness and other offences. He referred to the police returns during New Year's week for the cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow in proof. He found from these returns that in Edinburgh the number of drunk and incapables taken charge of by the police in 1880 was 101; in 1881, 115; and in 1882, 124. When, in addition to these, the apprehensions for disorderly assaults, crimes, and contraventions were taken into account, the numbers for the New Year's week in 1880 was 250; in 1881, 258; and in 1882, 337. Glasgow, he was sorry to find, afforded more conclusive evidence of the increase of drunkenness and social disorder. During the New Year's week in 1880 the number of drunk and incapable cases taken charge of by the Glasgow police was 459; for 1881, 603; and for 1882, 668. When to these were added the apprehensions for disorderly assaults, crimes, and contraventions, the increase was seen to be positively alarming. For the New Year's week in 1880 they numbered 1173; in 1881 they were 1632; and in 1882, 1755. It will thus be seen that during the New Year's week of the present year upwards of 2000 persons had been before the police courts of two of the most famous and highly privileged of our Scottish cities. If these facts were not enough to arouse our Scottish Churches to aggressive and well-defined action against the drink curse, and to compel the Government of the country forthwith to introduce such a measure into Parliament as would arm the Scottish people with the power to veto the drink traffic, he knew not what would.—Daily Review.

LOCAL OPTION MEETINGS AT ST. ANDREWS.—A conference of the friends of local option was held in Baptist Church, St. Andrews, on Wednesday, 15th ult. Rev. R. Troup presided. After a statement from Mr. Waterston, Edinburgh, a resolution was moved by Councillor Hull, seconded by Mr. John Toye, and unanimously agreed to, calling upon the executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association to memorialise Government to introduce a bill for Scotland giving the ratepayers a popular veto upon the liquor traffic. After the conference a public meeting was held in the same place. Rev. J. G. Gibson occupied the chair, and there was a good attendance. The following resolutions were agreed to:—(1) Moved by Mr. John Robertson, and seconded by Rev. M. Macgregor, of Dalkeith—"That, considering the vice, misery, crime, waste of food, increased taxation, and stagnation of trade caused by the traffic in intoxicating liquors, this meeting declares that no legislation will be satisfactory that does not confer the power of a popular veto upon the liquor traffic." (2) Moved by Rev. R. Troup, and seconded by Mr. J. H. Waterston—"That, considering the advanced position occupied by Scotland on liquor legislation, and its preparedness for still further advance—as shown by the Scotch vote on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution—this meeting calls upon Government to introduce a measure for Scotland in next session of Parliament which shall enable ratepayers to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors in their various localities." (3) Moved by Mr. John Wilson, and seconded by Mr. John Toye—"That copies of the foregoing resolutions be signed by the chairman, and forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Lord Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and members of Parliament for the burgh and county." Mr. William Smith and others also took part in the proceedings. After the close of the meeting an opportunity was given to take the Blue Ribbon pledge, when 34 came forward and received the ribbon from Mr. Waterston.—Daily Review.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

The following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 16th Nov. 1881, to 11th February, 1882, inclusive. During that period 273 meetings were held, 98 being deputational, and 175 ordinary. At these meetings 530 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Prestonpans, Edinburgh, Cockenzie, Gateside, Newcastle, Gosforth, Scotswood, Chirnside, Glasgow, Dysart, Greenock, Leith, Roslin, Burntisland, Newton, Portobello, Grangemouth, Linlithgow, Peebles, Galashiels, Earlstown, Ceres, Kirkcaldy, Jedburgh, Kelso, Hawick, and Blantyre, and addressed 68 meetings.

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Prestwick, Glasgow, Montrose, Ferryden, Kirriemuir, Alyth, Arbroath, Cupar-Angus, Dunning, Whiteinch, Renfrew, Hamilton, Irvine, Barrhead, Port-Glasgow, Daily, Girvan, Maybole, Stranraer, Whithorn, and Creetown, and addressed 61 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Aberdeen, Woodside, New Leeds, Aberdour, Inverallochy, Inverurie, Slap, Ballater, Broxburn, Portsoy, Aboyne, Banchory, Gourdon, Bervie, and Johnshaven, and addressed 61 meetings.

Mr. John Paton has visited Glasgow, Dalry, Dum-

AN OPPONENT'S GENEROUS RECOGNITION.—“The Twenty-Third Annual Report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association” is a record of continued persevering effort in a good cause. We may and do differ from the modes proposed by the Permissive Bill of dealing with the evils of drunkenness, but the mass of facts, the earnest effort, the unwearied iteration of truth, the determination not to allow the community to become dead to the evil—all this sowing of good seed will in the end yield good fruit.—Dundee Advertiser.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

The Health Reform Colonist. A Radical Health Reform Journal. Aug. and Sep. 1881. J. O. Clark, Syke's Mills, Elmore County, Alabama. Six cents, or 25 cents for six months. This is a curiosity; first, it does not contain so much matter as two pages of the Social Reformer, yet the difficulty of getting it up was so great that the editor makes an elaborate apology to his readers. He thought to have the number before us out by 1st October, but it appears it was the 1st of November ere he could congratulate his readers on its appearance. A Radical, Dr. Graham Windsor, Maine, says he has lived for days on baked potatoes, for years on Graham rolls and apples, and all these years never but once an unwholesome thing, which was when he swallowed a little common salt, which left a blister on his tongue when on its way to his insulted stomach. Here is the result of his survey of humanity. Grain food is immensely on the increase, tea and coffee on the decrease, the liquor pest at a level, tobacco is alas on the increase too. Dead flesh with the spices and condiments are not so much in use. Clean ripe fruit has displaced pastry in some degree, yet on the whole the great stomach of humanity is not so badly used as formerly. “The world moves although very slowly. We must expect this; it may have been long ages in becoming perverted, and it certainly will take long years to be reformed.” We have been much edified by the perusal of this number, which apart from those we have not seen, contains for us much profitable reflection. We should be glad to welcome such a thoroughgoing publication as this is on this side of the Atlantic ferry.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. DUNCAN SMITH, GLASGOW.—On Wednesday, 8th ult. this truly amiable gentleman, one of the most valued of the Vice-presidents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, passed away in the 79th year of his age and in the 44th of his adhesion to the temperance cause. He enjoyed comparatively good health till about three months ago, since which time he gradually sank till his death. The last survivor of three brothers, he dies leaving a most enviable reputation behind him for commercial diligence and integrity, personal worth and Christian excellence. Born in Balfour in the beginning of this century, he left his home for many years to push his fortunes, and returned more than twenty years ago to his native village, where he spent the remainder of his working life. During that time he did much to advance the cause of total abstinence, to which he was most devotedly attached. The Total Abstinence Society was a special object of his praiseworthy efforts. We think, however, that the greatest service he did to the cause he loved so well, was the wide distribution of temperance and prohibition literature which he steadily followed. Week by week his order came, week by week came his inquiries for the newest issues and the best. It is impossible to measure, even if it were needful, the amount of good Mr. Smith accomplished in this way, and he would have been the last to have reckoned it up. He latterly lived in Glasgow, taking up to the last moment of his healthy existence an unabated interest in the cause. His remains were laid in the Balfour churchyard amid the greatest marks of respect, all feeling that a truly good man had passed away.

PRINCIPLE AND EXPEDIENCY: THEIR TRUE PLACE IN THE TEMPERANCE ENTERPRISE.

PRINCIPLE is lasting, eternal; expediency is temporary, changing,—changing in modes and forms of application. What is expedient to-day may be inexpedient to-morrow. Wise expediency in certain places and under certain circumstances, may be foolishness itself in other places and circumstances. There is a worldly expediency and there is a Christian expediency; but whether worldly or Christian, expediency is essentially temporary in character and varied in application. Principle is always the same, in all places, and at all times.

Under other circumstances the apostle Paul would have partaken both of flesh and wine (unfermented wine doubtless), while under the then existing circumstances, and while the same continued, he felt it to be his duty neither to eat the one nor drink the other. The Christian expediency practised by the apostle is undeniable. In the circumstances it possessed in his estimate the imperative of moral obligation, and the prompt, willing, and whole-hearted manner in which he applied it to the guidance of his own conduct is the most conclusive proof of his deep and abiding conviction and of leal-hearted loyalty "to Him whose he was and whom he was bound to serve." There is no mistaking the high Christian tone of the apostle's whole nature. He walked in fellowship with Christ, acted as under his eye, carried with him an abiding sense of His Master's presence,—the only true source of a holy, consecrated life.

Let us briefly examine into the surroundings of the great apostle Paul when he uttered the memorable words, "If meat make my brother to offend" (literally stumble), "I will eat no flesh while the world standeth." A number of the recent converts to Christ, were but yesterday the sincere but blind devotees of idols and idol-worship, babes in Christ, with their life-long associations in connection with idols—the meats and drinks offered thereto and partaken of expressive of their worship and service and vows to these dumb deities,—escaped, or rather escaping from the bewitching influences which had long held them in bondage to dark and darkening idolatry—still so little able to distinguish between things that differ, so little up, so to speak, in the light and liberty of the children of God, that flesh and wine once offered to idols, could not be partaken of by them, without the thick and depressing shades of idolatry once more creeping over their spirits, which but yesterday, as it were, had been gladdened and blessed by the light of the rays of the Sun of Righteousness that had arisen on their souls. Not only could these infant believers not personally partake of these meats and drinks offered to idols, but they could not see other believers partake thereof, without their consciences being thereby defiled.

These were the circumstances in view of which the apostle, as was ever his wont, stepped to the front manfully and as became a wholly consecrated and uncompromising follower of Christ Jesus, stood up for the weak brethren, and for their sakes presented, enforced, and exemplified in his own conduct that spirit of self-sacrifice which marks him off as without compeer in the illustrious land of Apostles. Were his self-sacrificing spirit copied, not simply admired, by all who follow Christ, the Church would speedily be revolutionised and the world blessed.

Personally considered, the flesh and wine, assuming that the wine was unfermented, Paul could have partaken of not only without injury, but to real advantage up to the point of enough. To him their having been offered to idols was a matter of supreme indifference; to him an idol was nothing. Not so, however, to many who, though weak in the faith, were nevertheless his brethren in the Lord; and for their sakes he willingly, at once, and for ever, renounced what might prove to them an occasion of stumbling. This was true Christian heroism which none can fail to admire, however few may practise.

In the conduct of the great Temperance enterprise, this grand Christian expediency taught, enforced, and exemplified by the apostle of the Gentiles, has been largely quoted, appealed to, and enforced as the chief reason for abstaining from intoxicating liquors. I not only admit the Christian expediency contended for, but deplore the lack of it in myself and others, and yet I cannot but regret, and that deeply, what has all along appeared to me the misapplication in the advocacy of the temperance movement of that Christian expediency which has already worked wonders, and which is destined yet to accomplish far greater achievements. Why, or wherein, has Christian expediency been misapplied in connection with the temperance enterprise? I answer in urging its application for the abandonment, the giving up of intoxicating liquors, as ordinary beverages, instead of urging its application to the devising and persistently carrying out the best and fittest measures for wholly displacing the germ of intemperance from our country, a consummation possible only by the people, old and young, rich and poor wholly abandoning the beverage availment of intoxicating liquors of all kinds, and that in the smallest possible quantities; for from its very nature alcoholic liquor injures the partakers precisely in proportion to the quantity partaken of, and begets imperceptibly, a craving for repeated gratification; for as intoxicants meet no normal requirement of the human organism, the human system does not possess any natural check, as it does in the case of water, which however much relished by a thirsty person, the system's requirements once fully meet, the relish ceases, and intemperance in water drinking is thereby rendered impossible on the part of all persons in sound health, and all cases of intemperance in water drinking are invariably traceable to abnormal conditions in the subject. This being the case, does not principle require us one and all, to abstain, there being in consequence of the nature and effects of intoxicating drinks, no beverage availment thereof consistent with temperance. Principle, that is moral obligation, requires of us to abstain from that which does us injury; but intoxicating drink does injure us when in health, in proportion to the quantity partaken of; therefore on principle we are bound to abstain from intoxicating drink. But where moral obligation directly applies, expediency is excluded; and therefore expediency does not apply to personal abstinence from the beverage availment of intoxicating drinks. If, therefore, principle requires of us abstinence from intoxicating drink, our duty to do so is morally obligatory, and Christian expediency must operate upon and guide our action on other lines than that of abstaining ourselves, viz., on helping to devise and carry out the best and fittest means for persuading others to do as we have done. This is the true sphere and work of the temperance reformers, not to linger at and around the one solitary point of personal duty performed; but having got a firm footing there, to move forward, battling manfully with the foe, enabling others to get on to the solid rock for themselves, and to join in the noble crusade of wholly changing our habits and customs in connection with the beverage availment of intoxicant liquors, till as individuals and families, as communities and a nation, we banish intemperance from our shores.

THE WORTH OF WOMAN.

Not long ago we were told that the worth of a man after he had been educated, instructed, and trained, was between £150 and £160 stg., but that if we took the whole male and female population the value sank per head to £110 stg. Now, at first sight this might be a reflection upon our better halves. But the fact seems to be that they are not a wage-producing class like the men. This is self-evident; but it is not by that fact made clear that women should not be as positively profitable as they are negatively valuable to the community. Many a man owes his first advance to a good social position to his wife; and we could point out many men who move about in good society certainly doing nothing, and apparently not needing to, who, if truth were known, have found in their wives the patient drudge that supplies their wants fully and freely—such drudges, no doubt, thinking that they are only doing their duty by the partner of their bosoms. These women are as contented as the squaw that toils incessantly to please "the brave," who thinks labour beneath him, and is driven by sheer hunger to hunt or fish for sustenance. The hardy fisherman thinks that his duty begins and ends on the ocean wave and that his "squaw" should bait his lines and sell his "take" while he gossips and loiters at the pierhead with his like-minded fellows. The pretty female singer who draws down the praises of the "gods" is often secretly the bond-thrall of some lazy fellow who, having captured her affections, lives upon her earnings, and looks upon her as having no other or higher destiny than to spend her talents and energies that he may ruffle it with his set.

Viewed as patient drudges, women have a value, and a very marked one to those who own them, but has she not a value in an aesthetical sense? To the man who has been signally prosperous a beautiful wife is an acquisition, and if, in addition to her beauty, she is the happy possessor of accomplishments of no mean order—if she can dance, play, sing, paint, carve, drive, ride with the hounds, she is a paragon, and crowns the grandeur of his "salon" or his seat in the country, with its hounds, its equipage, or other articles of vertu which he may have inherited or acquired.

Women are a great gain to society. They have been compelled to train themselves to be teachers, painters, governesses, clerks, authoresses, and even merchants. They have, through such training, become a valuable acquisition to the commonwealth. Docile, skilful, steady, and content with a moderate remuneration, they have proved themselves formidable competitors of the "other" sex. They are now indispensable in many walks of professional life, and it is conceded that they might, with great benefit to society and themselves, enter many other professions with the confident expectation that they would supply a felt want, and not only increase the national wealth but ameliorate in a high degree their own dependent condition.

But to our thinking these do not exhaust the valuable properties of the fair sex. There are aspects of value which will not submit to be measured by a money standard, and which, when realised, make the value of woman far transcend the calculations of the stock exchange or the quotations of the money market. The woman upon whom this higher estimate may be placed may be so much absorbed into her husband's personality that the fact that she exists may never enter into the thoughts of more than half a dozen of people outside the immediate circle in which she moves. Yet, as a mother, she may be forming the character of her children day by day—equipping her boys for the race in which they shall win the prize. Little as we know of Shakespeare, we know still less of his mother, but we cannot help thinking that to her the poet for all time must have been indebted for much of that character which he has stamped upon his works, and through which they themselves are destined to live as long as the English language endures. How little do we know of Mrs. William Burns, but this we know that to her, as much as to his father, Scotland's national poet owed much of that deep insight to nature and mankind that, like the unceasing fragrance of a perennial flower, delights and charms as much to-day as it has done for the past hundred years. Do not let it be said that these are extreme types. Every woman that devotes her waking hours to the culture of her children's minds in digging and draining and planting in their understandings is creating value that will produce incalculable and imperishable wealth that shall one day purchase man's redemption from all that debases and degrades. The work of a woman in this view of her influence and ability is immeasurable, and might be an inducement to her who is not already the fortunate possessor of a value so much to be desired, to labour for its acquisition, even though that labour might be for the time the sorest of all labour under the sun.

The elements that make up the value in this view of the subject are not by any means redundant. Women generally seem in their maiden days to be more solicitous to get a husband than about what to do with him when they have him. They learn the arts of dressing, of charming, of engrossing attention to perfection; they can present the more attractive phases of their character to their lovers with a persistency that suggests the inference that they are angelic; and many a "brummagem" piece of female attractiveness through this art captivates the seeker after a good wife. Indeed, it would not be too much to say that but for "gilding" or "venering" many women, of no value domestically whatever, could not palm themselves off upon men who deserve a better fortune. Such women, after the excitement of courtship and marriage are over, seem to think that their destiny has been fulfilled, and that they have simply, like Alexander, to sigh for other worlds to conquer. After a brilliant courtship and a "fortunate" marriage to settle down to mend and darn and scrub and cook, to bear and nurse children, to sink at once out of sight, after dazzling the eyes and turning the heads of half of the smart young men of the circle in which they moved, is intolerable to such silly women, and, if not wise enough to avert it by reflection, they become truly an afflicted man's companion. Such women justify their fate; they laboured for the fleeting time of courtship and entirely neglected providing for the permanent period of marriage and motherhood; they triumphed, it is true, in the results of their labour to get a husband, but how could they succeed to keep him where they had neither sowed nor tilled to such an end? Not so, however, with the woman who reverses a training so fatal to the happiness of a household. While as eager for a mate as her more frivolous sisters, she cannot be diverted from her intention to perfect herself in all that is truly womanly. She can discharge all the varied duties of the household, and yet in no whit diminish her power to contribute to the delight of the society in which she moves. Whether at home or at market, whether cleaning or cooking, mending, making, darning, or knitting, she is labouring with a sincere desire to excel, and if one could know the inmost thoughts of her heart they would at such a moment gather that she had no ambition outside of such homely duties. Her heart is in her household work. There is as little waste of means as waste of energy. See her abroad, however, which is but seldom, and you find her as earnest in striving to please her friends and her lover as if she had no other design in life. When she is the mistress of a household of her own she brings to her high office the elements of enduring success, her husband praises her, her children bless her. She may not have brought him a rich marriage portion, but in her own person, in her affections, in her qualifications, in her sterling qualities, she brings wealth, compared with which the riches of Golconda and the abundance of a millionaire sink into insignificance. Such women show to us how poorly we estimate them if we do so by a standard of remuneration. It is in making and moulding the human race, whether girls or boys, for the respective duties they may be called upon to discharge; to restrain their propensities, to purify their desires, elevate their affections, render their conscience sensitive, strengthen their powers of will, build them up in an impregnable faith in goodness, that such a woman specially excels. Her girls have a man's firmness, her boys a woman's gentleness. Strong in their deep discernments of the moral perfections of God, and strong in their own moral perceptions, they, through what they have inherited from their mother or acquired through her watchful care, become the pride, the boast of society, at once its ornament and guard.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

The dentists in convention assembled, agreed to pull together for another year. Oh dear!

It is all nonsense talking about a well running dry. The only thing we ever noticed running when it was dry was a toper on a quick trot to the nearest public house.

An Englishman was boasting to a Yankee that they had a book in the British museum which was once owned by Cicero. "Oh, that's nothing," retorted the Yankee; "in the museum in Bosting they've got the lead-pencil that Noah used to check off the animals that went into the ark."

DICK SAUNDERS' ERROR.

By the Author of "Paradise Restored," "Charlie Tasker's Hogwanay," etc., etc.

DICK SAUNDERS had an intemperate wife. She was the apple of his eye, but she had taken to drink too much as if she ever drank the real measure and no more. They had been as happy as the birds in spring till this misfortune had befallen them. The sting of Dick's sorrow lay in this, that he had himself contributed to his misfortune. He liked to see her enjoy a "drain" along with himself, but never thought that the social "drain" would be followed by a "drain on the quiet," and then that the "drain" would neither be a "social drain," nor a "quiet drain," but a drain openly and often indulged in. Dick at last remonstrated, and she laughed; Dick swore, and she drowned her humiliation through his profanity in liquor, and, I must confess, almost swamped herself in the interesting process. Dick made a bold resolution. He told her that he should drink no more, and was called a fool for his pains. But he adhered to his resolution, and stuck to home like a limpet to the rocks. He never lost his temper now, and his unvarying kindness helped in some degree to prevent matters from becoming worse. Still Sally tumbled away, and it was curious, though painful, to see her with a drunken smile on her face as she sat hardly able to move, and poor Dick smiling back at her while he was putting the baby to bed. But Dick "stuck in." Sally had not reached the quarrelling or "improper" stage of drinking yet. Every day, almost, saw the same unsteadiness—witnessed the tell-tale breath and the reckless indulgence. There were lucid intervals, and then the agonies of remorse and the desire to be sober crept up, and on such days the house was truly miserable. After a while, the drowning of care recommenced, and indulgence on her part, and a kind of despair on his, was the fate of both for days. One day Dick was startled by hearing her wish she was dead, and the very thought of this set him a-crying, and a tender scene ensued, during which she declared that she could poison herself for being so unworthy a wife to such a loving, faithful fellow. Dick had a new addition to his care, the fear that in some moment of self-accusation she might do herself harm. He scarcely dared to go out at nights, and his neighbours began to smile at the hot haste with which he arrived at home from his work. He mounted up stairs two steps at a time, and his hurried glance round would have been serio-comic to an observer. Even when he found her in her cups, it was a relief; better her maudlin smile as she sat in her chair, than her stiffening body on the floor. At length Dick's fears subsided, and Sally was just sinking into the condition of a confirmed tippler, when baby took ill. Dick watched over it in the evenings with the tenderest solicitude, nursed it incessantly, and Sally, a capital nurse, was a little less self-indulgent. One day, however, she forgot herself, just when the fever was "about the turn," and but for the steadiness of Dick, fatal consequences might have followed. As she slowly woke out of her deep and troubled sleep, Sally muttered that she would put an end for ever to this disgraceful state of things. Dick was in agony, and left for work in a state of great perplexity and fear. A day or two of abstinence on the part of Sally was followed by another, though slighter, slip, and there was again the muttered threat or resolution, Dick did not know which. Poor fellow! he adored her when she was sober, for no smarter, tidier, cleaner little wife ever blessed a fellow than Sally. She was a neat-handed, skilful body, whose only fault seemed to be this fearful desire for liquor. Dick could not bear to think that he should lose her, and he lived on day by day in terror lest she should do herself and the baby harm through her drinking, or take her own life through her remorse. One day matters came to a crisis. Dick was as usual hurrying up stairs and into the room. There was Sally at the table seemingly in her best mood, and the baby crowing on her knee. Tea was set and all seemed well, and Dick's face lightened up. "Well, Dick," says Sally, rather resolute like, "I told you often I would do it, and I have done it at last." Dick's heart nearly stopped. His smile changed to horror, and with a loud "Oh, my God!" he was off like a shot. Down the stairs he went, three steps at a time. A cat was sunning herself on the door-step. Dick tramped on her tail; the yell and the spit was tremendous, but off Dick ran. Just as he turned round the corner, a butcher's boy was turning it in the opposite direction. There was a collision, but it was the boy that came to grief; Dick was off again. Trying to pilot his way through the crowd, he came into contact with a pair of steps on which a painter was standing lettering a sign. Over went the steps, and away went the painter, palette, pot, and all; and off, too, went Dick. People stood looking at him, as, bare-headed, breathless, and horrified, he tore along. Just as he rushed round another corner, he came into contact with an old woman's apple-stall, but fortunately only overthrew the old woman and not her wares. At last he reached the door of a surgery. Rat, tat, tat, tat, went the knocker. Rat, tat, tat, tat it went again. The cook, startled, overturned a delicious mess on the fire, and the housemaid did similar damage to some of the furniture upstairs; while the boy in the surgery nearly let a bottle of valuable medicine fall out of his hands, so startled was he with the tremendous and repeated knocking at the door. The doctor hurried to it, and there saw Dick dancing with downright impatience, biting his fingers, or using his arms as if he were disposed to punch somebody's head.

"What's to do, Richard, that you are looking and acting so wildly?"

"Oh, Sir, come on. My wife Oh, oh!"

"Well, your wife; what of her?"

"Oh, she has taken poison. Oh, come on; come on."

"Taken poison! Well, what kind of poison?"

"Oh, I don't know; but come and see."

"Well, how does she look? Is she stiffening with strychnine, or in a syncope with laudanum, or in agony with arsenic?"

"Oh, I can't tell. She was sitting in her chair. Oh dear, oh dear!"

"Well, I have some appliances here all ready, and we'll take the stomach pump along with us. I am ready."

So off they hurried, and only for the doctor's presence with Dick, that afflicted individual would have suffered somewhat at the hands of those that he collided with. At last the doctor and Dick burst upon the astonished Sally, who, after wondering what on earth kept Dick, and thinking that something had taken his head about his work, turned to her duties, and was busily engaged scrubbing away when she was so noisily interrupted.

The doctor was somewhat taken aback, as the sailors phrase it, at seeing her so different to what he had been led to expect, but putting down his things, he asked her to take a chair till he saw what could be done.

"What do you mean, sir?"

"Oh, there is no time to be lost, my good woman; the symptoms may immediately show themselves, and I have the pump here all right. Just lay down, and while your husband holds you, we will draw it off before it gets into the system to a deadly amount."

"Why, Dick, what's this?"

"Oh, Sarah! for my sake, for your baby's sake, do as the doctor wants you to do. Oh, darling, think of me and the baby."

Sally discerned the situation, and, holding her sides, burst into a loud guffaw. The doctor looked, bewildered, first to the one and then to the other, while Dick wrung his hands.

"Now, gentlemen," said she, "No more nonsense.

Tell me directly and distinctly, what you mean by your present conduct.

"Oh, Sarah! you told me you had taken poison at last."

"Yes, and I am here to relieve your system of it, if I can."

"Oh, Dick, you blunderer, I never intended nor threatened to take poison. I love you and the baby too well for that, but this day I went and TOOK THE PLEDGE!"

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—One has to pause sometimes and balance civilisation against barbarism, when he finds savagery manifesting the highest virtue and the strongest form of virtuous resolve. Why, there is the African kingdom of Boralong, where, although the males are adopting the garments of civilisation, the women cling to primeval dressing, the sovereign has sternly prohibited the importation of intoxicating liquor of every kind in the interest of his people's welfare. For some years, says the Cape Argus, there have been no attempts at smuggling, and, as a consequence, the inhabitants of the capital, Theba Nehu, are a sober, well-ordered, industrious, and prosperous community. Only think of the state of this great country if we could affirm the four adjectives qualifying the condition of the Boralongs as equally characteristic of ourselves. No country could be happier; sobriety, morality, religion possible to millions; rare occasion for police, poor-law officials, or prison wardens; no artizan loitering in enforced idleness on our streets or standing at our gates, imploring a job from his fellow-man; but abundance of wealth and satisfaction for all, not merely for accumulation, but for conferring the glorious privilege of independence. When the patriot thinks that the Borolongs will rise in judgment against our nation, can he be blamed if his heart gets sad?

We are told that we are spending at the rate of £400,000 a day in liquor, and of course people hold up their hands in incredulous amazement when you moot such an unwholesome fact. But it is no use; the figures are beyond dispute. Well, we find that the whole amount of the educational grants to Scotland for the year ending 31st August, 1879, was £433,436. Now, this vast sum, which has built and repaired schools, maintained 5,139 teachers, not to speak of pupil teachers and apparatus, and educated 385,108 children, would just suffice for one day and two hours of our national drinking. Is it not high time that such a leak should be stopped, and that a general election should be won or lost on local option?

It is curious at times to observe what an amount of good sense and truth you can get from people when they are not taking sides. The Saturday Review the other day was discussing the Post Office Money Order Bill; and, in doing so, printed as follows:—"In fairness, it should be borne in mind that the measure is only an experiment. If it prove successful, the charges [for postal notes] may be reduced, notes of other denominations issued, and in short any change may be made which experience may suggest. It is no valid objection against a plan admitting of development that it does not accomplish everything at its very first introduction." Now this little apology has a two-fold application to the Permissive Bill. We should adopt the bill, and, watching its progress narrowly, learn through our experience, what, if any, changes should be made. Why should we demand perfection in a method to suppress the traffic when we don't get it elsewhere? Ah, the time may be near at hand when the press, like the Saturday Review with its bill, may be similarly apologising for our Local Option Bill.

There are some telling facts in the election manifesto of the Irish Association for the Prevention of Intemperance. That there has been in Ireland, through Sunday closing, a decrease, in one year, of 800,000 gallons of spirits and 10,000,000 gallons of beer. Now these two facts tell in this way—1st, they show to what an extent Sabbath desecration is fostered by open public-houses on the Lord's day, and 2nd, that the assertion, that if you shut them up as much drink and more will be sold illicitly, is baseless. Capt. McCall of Glasgow told the Lords' Committee that he only required one-fourth of the police force on Sabbaths which were required on week-days because public-houses were shut. So in Ireland, for every 100 arrests for drunkenness which happened before the Act, there are now under the Act only 30. This fact shows that prohibition can prohibit, and that shebeening does not thrive in the absence of drink shops. *

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor cannot undertake to return rejected communications, nor hold himself responsible for the opinions expressed by his correspondents.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

MR. EDITOR,—It is gratifying to realise, that Scotland has kept up to her high mark in the support she gave to Sir Wilfrid in his local option resolution on the 5th of March. But in maintaining this mark of active support, she fell below her mark of opposition from eleven to six votes. Twenty-nine votes to Sir Wilfrid, with only six against him, is good for Scotland. It is obvious that Scotland is restrained by England from having the Home Rule that comes of sobriety. Englishmen claim to be imbued with the sense of fair play, and, on the whole, the claim can be allowed. Well, here is a clear opportunity for its exercise. By this Home Rule in Scotland, Scotsmen will be greatly benefited, and the stability and unification of the United Kingdom maintained. Scotland, empowered to establish within her border the conditions of sobriety, would be a closer and stronger support to the whole of this great country than she is at present, stultified in all the qualities, mental, moral, and industrial, which drinking and drunkenness debase. The opportunity of allowing Scotland, now that she is ready, to help herself with sobriety, and benefit England, ought to be accepted by English statesmen, to give full scope to all this fair play. It must now be obvious to every one of them that public opinion in Scotland has been pronounced in favour of investing the people with power to prohibit the drink trade and foster sobriety when they are so disposed. Year after year our representatives have spoken out in Parliament, with a full national utterance, that the people should be invested with this power.

With this well-established fact before me, I cannot but think of the pledges which I have recorded by the hundred in various constituencies to abstain from voting, except for such candidates as would promise to vote for the principle of prohibition in Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Bill. When I commenced to record these pledges, first of all in the Wigtown Burghs, it was supposed, even by temperance reformers, that temperance electors were so indifferent to prohibition and national sobriety that they would not leave their political party and propagate the temperance reformation through the prohibition of the drink traffic. There is not now a man in broad Scotland, looking at what has happened in the constituencies, and in the House of Commons, who would venture to give expression to such an opinion. From the Wigtown Burghs, which were considered, at the time I commenced this canvass, hopeless in the temperance sense, Sir Wilfrid has now a steady vote. As if to put the canvass to the most severe test, I was sent to the St. Andrews Burghs, after I had pledged a seventh of the voting power in the Wigtown Burghs. The St. Andrews group were a wilderness in the sense of not having undergone much temperance culture, but I recorded a fifth of their voting power. And since then until now, the temperance movement, with its culturing advocacy, has in its old way marched on and left them to themselves. But notwithstanding, all the candidates who have approached the electors to be returned for the constituency have promised to vote with Sir Wilfrid, with, perhaps, the exception of one, and there has been, in all, five or six of them. Then there was Perth, in which a fourth of the voting power was recorded, with a result equally if not more satisfactory. It is true that Mr. Parker would not promise to vote for the second reading of the Permissive Bill, as he objected to its details, but he stood by the right of the ratepayers to prohibit the traffic, and declared that he would vote for a measure containing that right when one was produced, with details reasonably and constitutionally fitted to carry it out. And now he votes with Sir Wilfrid for the Option Resolution. The list of constituencies canvassed to take this voting attitude also includes the county of Renfrew. Renfrew was canvassed when Lord Aberdare was its representative, and while nearly five hundred of the constituents signed a memorial, desiring him to vote with Sir Wilfrid, 340 signed a pledge, binding them to vote only for candidates in the future who would go furthest in supporting Sir Wilfrid. Col. Mure, the sitting member, was returned, by that pledge, not to vote against the Permissive Bill, and now he votes for the Local Option Resolution. Col. Mure was the temperance candidate and Col. Campbell was the publican's candidate. This pledging proved the preparedness of Scotland for prohibition, and the extent to which it has produced and maintained steady voting for the Permissive Bill and the Option Resolution is overwhelming evidence of its efficiency as an educative influence. In fact, the Wigtown Burghs, the St. Andrews Burghs, and Renfrewshire have really had no other culture worthy of the name, and until the Stirling and Montrose Burghs were canvassed, notwithstanding the usual soiree and temperance advocacy, their members had never really voted with Sir Wilfrid. But now they do vote. It would be unwarrantable to decry lecturing advocacy. It would, however, be very desirable if much of it were of a higher and more convincing order. But if now, in the present state of the movement, we were to be confined to lecturing or canvassing, unhesitatingly I would accept canvassing as the most culturing and practical power of the two. And when the canvass is sown broadcast over the whole country, and well followed up with all the other culturing influences, it will be demonstrated to the most sceptical that it has organised the men of temperance, patriotic, and religious REALNESS into an embodied moral and political force that society will have to respond to in the interest of temperance and all the virtues that flow from it.—I am, &c.,

JOHN PATON.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT IN LERWICK.

(To the Editor of the Social Reformer.)

DEAR SIR,—Having paid a visit to Lerwick, Shetland, during the first week of the present month, I believe you will be desirous to know how matters stand in that interesting town. I communicated with several of the friends previous to going north, and, being assured of a cordial reception, I sailed with very pleasant feelings. Lerwick is distant from Aberdeen about 240 miles. The steamers which run between Aberdeen and the Northern Isles are powerful, and fitted with good accommodation for passengers, so that the passage, though frequently rough, is generally deemed pretty safe.

On arriving in Lerwick Bay on Monday morning the 1st inst., I was welcomed by Mr. Hector Morrison, the District Deputy of the Good Templars, who kindly conducted me to the excellent lodgings which had been taken for me. I lost no time in getting into contact with the friends of the movement, and, as I had opportunity of addressing meetings, and of holding daily personal intercourse with the people, I found that the good opinion which I had previously been led to form regarding them had been in no way exaggerated. There are two Good Templar lodges in the town, led by men of earnestness and ability. There is also a Degree Temple, and the manner in which its business is conducted reflects the highest credit upon the officers and members. All the ministers of the town are favourable to the temperance cause, and two of them—the Rev. W. Farquhar and Rev. A. Yeats—are active members of the lodges. I was specially pleased to find not a few of the friends in Lerwick thoroughly sound in their political ideas in our question. The scrambles of Whigs and Tories over their bones of contention do not raise sufficient dust to blind their eyes to the reality of the situation. The suppression of the drink trade, and a “scientific frontier” around their dwellings, would be dearer to them than all the petty triumphs of party politicians. I found a considerable interest manifested in the debate on Sir Wilfrid Lawson’s Local Option Resolution, so I telegraphed for the result of the debate. I need not say that the adverse vote of Lord Hartington, and the neutral attitude of Mr. Gladstone, produced some disagreeable sensations. The action of these statesmen need not, however, much disturb us just now, for the solid vote of the drink monopoly, thrown on the interests of “the trade,” will open the eyes of great statesmen, and some great temperance men too, and that ere very long. I stayed in Lerwick from the 1st to 8th of March. During that time I addressed nine meetings. Most of my speeches were bearing upon the permissive suppression of the liquor traffic, for, after all, if we are not to have power through the principle of local option to prohibit it, it is not worth fighting for. I should state that there is a good juvenile lodge, under the able superintendence of Mr. George Morrison, a brother who throws much energy and intelligence into the movement, and to whom I was much indebted for his kindness. With the Rev. W. Farquhar and Rev. A. Yeats I had rambles on the hills around Lerwick. Tea-drinking is considerably indulged in in the island, and I was several times invited to parties to partake of “the cup which cheers but not inebriates.” These entertainments added much to the pleasure of my visit. Bailie Robertson took the chair at one of my meetings, and by his genial manner and hearty sympathy showed he was entirely with us in our agitation. The subscription list from Lerwick in our next report will show the readiness with which the friends responded in this direction. I shook hands and parted with them on Monday evening, and sailed for Kirkwall, where I arrived on Tuesday morning. Here I heard the first rumours of the dissolution of Parliament, and a telegram from our esteemed Secretary sent north on the afternoon of that day broke down my tour rather abruptly for the present.—Yours faithfully,

PARISHES IN SCOTLAND WITHOUT PUBLIC HOUSES.

(To the Editor of the “Social Reformer.”)

THE MANSE, CROSSHILL,
By MAYBOLE, 5th March, 1880.

DEAR SIR,—I am very much pleased and gratified to find you have inserted the parishes in Scotland in which there are no public-houses, but the complete parishes are only 141 instead of 151. The following ought to have been in italics.

	Pop. in 1871.	Return. p. 14 to 16.
Ayr.—1. Newton-on-Ayr,.....	4,877	200
Elgin.—2. Forres,.....	4,562	603
3. New Spynie,.....	1,612	573
Fife.—4. St. Leonards,.....	741	92
5. May Island (in Crail parish),
Kircudbright.—6. Kells,.....	1,007	742
Perth.—7. Kinnoull,.....	3,108	723
Roxburgh.—8. Wilton,.....	3,936	950
Wigtown.—9. Wigtown,.....	2,306	447
10. Whithorn,.....	2,906	1,329

In the great majority of these parishes there is not a single farthing of Poor's Rates to pay, the poor being so few that they are supported from the church-door collections. If this fact could be brought out, it would do great good in advancing our cause.—Yours faithfully,

JAMES CRAWFORD.

PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATES' OPINIONS.

“I am in favour of regulation, not of prohibition or suppression of the traffic. I desire to see means provided for bringing to bear on this regulation the opinion of the ratepayers in each locality.”—Hon. Preston Bruce, County of Fife.

Mr. Shepherd—The hon. candidate, says in his address, in regard to the liquor traffic, “I desire to see means provided for bringing to bear the opinion of the ratepayers in localities.” Does he mean local option as interpreted by Sir Wilfrid Lawson?—The Hon. Mr. Bruce said he did “not go in for local option as interpreted by Sir Wilfrid Lawson.”—Meeting at Burnt Island.

Mr. Barr asked if Mr. Bruce would support local option. Mr. Bruce—“I am in favour of the general principle of local option, but cannot say that I have yet seen it applied in the satisfactory and practical form I would pledge myself to support.”

“I approve of and will vote for the principle of Local Option and control, and would be glad to support any well-considered measure carrying out that principle, but protecting existing interests.”—R. F. F. Campbell, Ayr Burghs.

“Wider and more popular representation on our County Boards is a measure of reform most urgently needed; and on this principle I am quite prepared to advocate that form of local option by which the drink traffic of a district would be regulated by a Board elected by the ratepayers.”—Dr. Farquharson, West Aberdeenshire.

“I am in favour of an amendment of the licensing system founded on the principle of the representation of ratepayers.”—J. M'Laren, Wigtown Burghs.

“I deeply sympathise with the efforts of those who desire the suppression of intemperance, and I am of opinion that a better system of licensing laws than is at present in force may be devised.”—D. Currie, Perthshire.

In reply to Mr. Thomas Snodgrass, grain merchant, Mr. Balfour said he held “there ought to be a change in the law, which would remove from the Licensing Justices to Local Boards the power of regulating the liquor traffic. The localities which would elect the Boards ought to be of such a size as would really make them in a reasonable sense a neighbourhood. Being of that opinion, he was prepared to vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson’s Local Option Resolution, which was directed to affirm that proposition. That being a general proposition affirming a principle might result in bills of various kinds. It might be proposed under it to pass a bill going the length of total prohibition, or it might be that bills would be proposed under it not going the length of total prohibition, but giving a large power of regulation. At this moment he should not be prepared to vest in a majority of ratepayers the power to totally prohibit the means of obtaining liquor against a minority. Therefore he should not be prepared to vote for the Permissive Bill, though he should be prepared to vote for the Local Option Resolution as directed to affirm a principle to be followed by legislation.”—Meeting at Stewarton.

Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone on Local Option.—“When I was here, gentlemen, in November, I said a word upon a very practical, and, in a social point of view, a very important subject—the subject of what is called Local Option; and a gentleman who is a freeholder in the county has written to me expressing, in terms of great propriety and courtesy, his regret that I did not vote the other night for the resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Gentlemen, what I stated to you in November was, that to the principle of local option I took no preliminary objection, but that I must consider many matters in regard to its application—among which would be a strict justice to the interests which possibly the exercise of the local option might injuriously affect. Now, gentlemen, I could not support the resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, however much I respect his high patriotic motives and his high moral purpose, and however much I admire his abilities and character, for these two reasons:—one of them, that it contained no recognition of the fair and equitable title of those interests to be heard and allowed the opportunity of making their case for an equitable compensation, if new principles—fundamentally new principles—were introduced into our legislation which might bear injuriously upon their interests. We have little reason, gentlemen, for gratitude, undoubtedly, to that particular interest in England, but no man is entitled, because he does not think there is a case for gratitude—no man is entitled on that account—to deny or stint a full measure of justice. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) But, gentlemen, there is another reason which I am wishful to explain to you, because it affects my general conduct. I have never been in the habit, gentlemen, of voting for what are called abstract resolutions in the House of Commons until I am prepared with a plan to give them effect. I do not blame those who do. Those abstract resolutions are, I am aware, among the means of maturing and forming public opinion. But a person in my situation, who has served in so many Governments, who has passed twenty years of his life as a responsible servant of the Crown, who has even had the honour of filling the office of first minister of this great country—(cheers)—during a period exceeding five years, stands in a peculiar position. And when a man so situated votes for an abstract resolution, those who feel an interest in the subject are entitled to say to him, 'In what way will you now proceed to give effect to that abstract resolution?' (Cheers.) Therefore, gentlemen, until I am prepared with a plan, and until I see public opinion reaching such a point that I can make myself responsible for the proposal and support of the plan, I decline to raise false expectations by committing myself to an abstract resolution. (Cheers.) . . . I will do my best, gentlemen, upon every occasion, as I have done upon every occasion, to join in any fair, and rational, and practicable scheme for the amendment of the liquor laws, and for the mitigation of the curse of intemperance. (Hear, hear.) But I will neither upon that nor any other subject give a promise to this gentleman or to any other man, except such a promise as I am prepared, and I believe able, to redeem." (Loud and prolonged cheers.)—Speech at Dalkeith.

"The abuse of the liquor traffic is a question that has engaged, and will no doubt continue to engage the attention of parliament. The diversity of opinion as to the best means of regulating this traffic without prohibiting it, seems to me to point to the desirability of dealing with this subject—by experimental legislation in various centres throughout the country, and under some form of 'local option.' Such experiments would, I conceive, be best carried out."—K. S. McKenzie, for County of Inverness.

"He was put in the same difficult position on the question of 'local option' as Lord Hartington and Mr. Gladstone were on the recent debate on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution. He was not in favour of the resolution if it meant the Permissive Bill. He would, however, give his support to any bill for the alteration of the liquor laws which embodied these two principles, viz.:—the extension of the powers of the ratepayers over the control of the licenses, and care that the vested interests of those who were engaged in an honourable trade should be respected. (Applause.)—Mr. Buchanan, candidate for Haddingtonshire.

"It is a common error to confound 'local option' with the Permissive Bill. They are entirely different. Sir Wilfrid Lawson has said so, Mr. Bright has said so, and our member Mr. Anderson said it would take half an hour to explain the difference. I daresay he was right, but I shall take much less time to explain a few points of difference. By the Permissive Bill only two courses were open—either to allow public-houses to remain as they are, or to abolish them altogether. It is not so with 'local option.' It permits of the two courses possible under the Permissive Bill; but it also permits of the ratepayers restricting the traffic if they don't choose to abolish it. It will also admit of the trying of the Gothenburg system, or even of the one advocated by Mr. Gladstone, and which I saw in America and didn't approve—free trade in drink, with a high license duty and strict police supervision. In other words, 'local option' will permit of the ratepayers in each district abolishing or regulating the drink traffic as they may deem best for the interests of the community. I think that is a just and right power to place in the hands of the ratepayers. I have heard there are 2,000 parishes in Great Britain and Ireland, where, by the will of the proprietors, no public-houses are allowed, and I am assured this prohibition has produced good moral effects; but I confess I would rather see the power in the hands of the ratepayers than in those of any one man. To my mind it would savour more of a free country. As a magistrate I have always voted for the refusal of a license in any district where the population were opposed to its being granted, and I think the people themselves can be safely trusted to the exercise of the power of local option. We already have it in other things—such as the Libraries Act, which the people of Glasgow, in right of their local option, refused to adopt; also in the School Board elections. Another thing in which local option differs from the Permissive Bill is that all the advocates of local option in parliament—including Sir Wilfrid Lawson himself—said that fair compensation must be given to those who, by a popular vote, without any fault of their own, might be deprived of their licences. What that compensation ought to be—its nature, character, and extent, and from whence the funds are to be derived, will be a matter for the consideration and decision of parliament—a body that has always a jealous respect for vested interests of every kind. We have all heard of the proverb, 'They that bode for a silk gown may get the sleeve of it.' So the advocates of total suppression, if in advance of the public opinion of the day, may do good service in obtaining valuable restrictive measures which may be beneficial to the community and to the publicans themselves."—Sir James Bain at Glasgow.

"I allude, further, to the popular control of the liquor traffic. (Cheers.) I believe that all shades of political opinion recognise the evils caused by intemperance, and I need not harass your feelings by describing them. The case is recognised, and the cure is the difficulty. (Hear, hear.) No doubt much has been done by example, or moral suasion as it is called, and by counteracting agencies which appeal to the better and higher nature. Legislation has also done its part, but withal there is a necessity for something more; and I have no hesitation in saying, that as it is a question eminently affecting the people, their voice should be heard, and they should have the powers of practically legislating in the matter; and as a right step in this direction, I would support Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution." (Loud cheers.)—R. T. Middleton at Glasgow.

"This," said an agricultural implement dealer, expatiating to an old farmer on the merits of a new machine, "this is a corn planter." And putting it down, he planted it on the old man's toe and raised an acher on the spot.

CARRYING IT INTO POLITICS.—The Ohio Liquor Dealers' Protection Association at their meeting a few weeks ago, adopted the following resolution—"Resolved that we, the Liquor Dealers of Ohio, in convention assembled at Akron, do hereby pledge and affirm that in the future we shall not support any but outspoken, honest, and just acting and thinking men, in behalf of liberal legislation on the liquor traffic." The Newark (New Jersey) liquor dealers also resolved to "vote only" for such men for the legislature as would give them their "rights." Let those politicians who are just now advising temperance men not to carry their principles "into politics," change their tune a little and try their hands on the liquor dealers, and get them to "keep it out of politics." It is a poor rule that won't work both ways.—New York Temperance Advocate.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, APRIL, 1880.

*.* WE have been obliged to leave over a deal of matter in type and in copy. We hope to make up for arrears next month.

WE present our readers with title page and index to volume XIV., and respectfully recommend their own magazine to their continued favour. May we venture to express the earnest hope that they will help us in further extending its circulation.

Two members of the late Liberal Government have taken to warning the licensed victuallers about their electioneering tactics. The reason for this interesting and instructive proceeding on their part is the approach of the trade demanding to know if they will stand by the victuallers if they should stand by them. The first honourable gentleman—Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen—frankly gives them a bit of his mind, and he does so with pleasure. He tells them that they united “too much” against the Liberal party in 1874; indeed, they went the length of merely putting him, a Liberal and their friend, on a level with two new Tory candidates, although he was recognised as deserving of support by “the trade.” Indeed, in his opinion, the trade then took a “very complete revenge” by playing into the hands of the Tory party in a great number of constituencies. But he goes on to state that he feels that a repetition of the course taken in 1874 will be a great mistake. He thinks that the danger to the liquor traffic lies in these facts:—(1) The identification by the country of the trade with the evils of intemperance, and (2) the possibility of the Liberal party being compelled, through the hostility of the trade, to side with the public opinion that so identifies them. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen counsels them to keep on good terms with that party lest it become exasperated and do their interests irreparable mischief. He advises them to vote the political and not “the trade” ticket, because they may not profit as they hope to do by acting again against the Liberal party. The Tory party may not keep faith with them; for they should know that that party will scarcely hesitate to throw them over in order to meet the demands of a public opinion for the restriction or even suppression of their interests. Such is the advice of the Right Hon. Knatchbull-Hugessen, M.P., to “the trade.” In effect he tells them that they are in a perilous condition, they are open to three dangers—1st, From the public opinion growing against them; 2nd, from their avowed hostility to the Liberal party; and 3rd, from the expectations they have built on the gratitude of the Tory party. Their real danger lies, we believe, in the growing public opinion of which both parties in the State are but the unresisting ministers. No party can keep the trade safe should that public opinion decide upon their suppression. Their fate is simply a question of one or two Parliaments, and no attempt on their part to propitiate the one party or the other will shield them from the fatal scourge of public opinion when it has once clearly identified their operations with the abounding evils of the national intemperance.

The second right hon. gentleman is the Right Hon. Mr. Bright. He is the Cassandra of the licensed victuallers. They always approach him although he has nothing but gloomy warnings and darker prophecies to offer them. It is within ten years since he told them that by their refusal to make any concessions to the public opinion that was slowly but surely gathering in volume they were inviting the wrath of all good men, and he added the memorable words, “That in the long run they were sure to be beaten.” No one who is able to take in an intelligent view of the growth and progress of the temperance reformation but must see the extreme likelihood of the early fulfilment of these remarkable words. On this occasion to which we more especially refer Mr. Bright laughed at publican fears, which he said were those of monopolists apprehensive of their interest, rebuked them for their ingratitude to the temperance party, whose agitation had forced them to purge their trade of numerous abuses, and counselled them not to go to war with society for the sake of the bad houses which they themselves declared they would gladly see suppressed. He told them he would vote if returned for the local option resolution, and he hoped that they would be better guided than to maintain any hostility to the Liberal party. No “rest and be thankful” for these poor men. No one scarcely thinks of leaving them as they are. The very action of the public opinion they fear compels them to set their houses in order so that they may be tolerated. Mr. Bright held out no hope of permanence to their interests. He spoke as if their capitulation to public opinion was an accomplished fact, and as if the terms of their surrender were under discussion. As for these terms we will have something to say about them at the proper time, but whether it be Sir Wilfrid Lawson, or Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, or Mr. Bright, or Mr. Chamberlain, the knell of the doom of the liquor interest is being widely sounded, and the fulfilment of that doom is simply a question of time.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

THE General Election so long expected has unexpectedly arrived. Parliament, which was opened with all the pomp and circumstances of state and promise of length of days, has been summarily dissolved, dying almost ere it sickened. Permissive Prohibitionists will think of it kindly, for though it was adverse to their just demands it gave repeated proofs of the progress of their great principles, and it gave equal proof that anybody that has to do with “Beer” is of a quarrelsome, do-nothing disposition.

We rest in the hope however that we shall never see its like in this respect again. We are now in the heat of a contested election; speaking for Scotland, it seems as if all its parliamentary seats were to be contested. This General Election gives indications already of the prominent place which local option has taken, notwithstanding the aggressive enthusiasm of Liberalism and the stubborn resistance of Conservatism. Every candidate up to the moment at which we write has had to give his views on local option, and upon his answer will depend in a great measure the popularity or the reverse of his candidature. It is as difficult as it would be unwise to forecast the result of the Scottish elections so far as our principles are concerned, and it will be more satisfactory we believe to our readers to receive a careful summary of the result when all is over. But without speaking by the card we anticipate a greatly improved vote from Scotland in favour of local option: not merely of local option in the restrictive, but of local option in its suppressive and truly Scottish sense. Its friends have a glorious opportunity before them. They may not succeed in every case, but they can at least make every candidate aware of their existence: of their capacity for organization, and of their resolute determination to vote straight for the great national principle they have so much at heart. They may find that party politics are too strong for them, that because of the vehemence with which these are urged they may be unable to sufficiently assert their principles. In that case both candidates, all the candidates before them, should know fully what they want; and that they have determined that from that hour the education of each shall begin. To those friends who have a choice we say, choose the right man at all hazards, and give him that energetic support which will more than anything impress him with your power as a party. The friends in many constituencies are to be congratulated on their promptitude, their good temper, and their firmness, which have been so conspicuous in their interviews with candidates and the results of which will redound to the advantage of the movement. Those friends who have taken time by the forelock and waited upon representatives and prospective candidates, will at this moment enjoy the satisfaction which flows from duty done at the right time and in the right way. Now that meetings and committees have to be attended to, and the energetic measures necessary in the interests of the candidate they favour have to be taken, they are not distracted. They know their man and have only to place him where he can give effective support to their great principle by his voice and vote. We hope that all our friends will have by this time fully realised their position as electors of some one or other of the constituencies of their great country who have assigned the first place on their political programme to the suppression of the liquor traffic by the vote of the ratepayers. The interest of this vital question should be their supreme concern. If they play the man now they will feel abundant satisfaction in the fact that they proved equal to the duty imposed upon them at this General Election, and have discharged it to the best of their ability. The result of their stern adherence to their resolution to vote only for a candidate who pledges himself to vote for the object that lies so close to their heart, may be that as the hour is come when attempts should be made to free our beloved Scotland from the yoke of the liquor trade, it has been their ballot which has assisted in procuring the man. Of the issue we entertain no apprehensions. We have urged upon our readers the supreme importance of preparation for this signal opportunity, and we rejoice to witness how generally and fully our counsels have been followed. Regarding the result we have no fears. We have asked parliament to place confidence in the judgment and ability of the ratepayers: and in this critical moment on their judgment, ability, and patriotism, we firmly rely.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, Bart., having, with his usual good fortune, obtained a first place for his resolution, its discussion came off on Friday, 5th ult. The national organisations with ready alacrity appealed to the country in its behalf. Conspicuous amongst these were those belonging to Scotland. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association asked, and was cordially promised the co-operation of the Scottish Temperance League, both sections of the Independent Order of Good Templars, United Temperance Association, St. Andrew's Order of Good Templars, Crusaders, Sons of Temperance, Rechabites, as well as Total Abstinence Societies, as the very satisfactory result of the voting affords ample proof. Petitions, electoral memorials, letters, &c., thickly as the leaves in Vallambrosa, found their way to the addresses of honorable members, who frankly confessed that on no other question had they received so many communications from their constituents. Not content with their appeal to the friends of temperance all over the country, the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association sent a deputation to London, inclusive of the following gentlemen:—Ex-Councillor Paterson, Aberdeen, Mr. John Steel, Edinburgh, Messrs. R. C. Murray, T. L. Selkirk, and R. Mackay, Glasgow, who, during the brief time at their disposal, saw nearly all the honourable members who were in town. The interviews were, on the whole, satisfactory, and conducted materially to the state of the vote. Mr. D. Brown of Glasgow, being in London, kindly offered his services, of which the deputation gladly availed themselves. Every member of Parliament for Scotland had a special circular reminding him of the discussion, and respectfully requesting his support. When the House met on Friday, 5th ult., for the consideration of the resolution, the deputation found themselves in the speaker's gallery, crowded with tipplers, abstainers, publicans, and prohibitionists. Whether ever the ashes of the physical corporations present in that gallery mix, certain it is that the corporations themselves that afternoon were wedged together in a way that was as far apart from ease as "Yes" from "No." The speaker's gallery overflowed into the peer's gallery, and at the opposite end of the chamber, the ladies' gallery, or, more appropriately, "cage," seemed inconveniently filled, but in the dim twilight one could only distinguish the flutter of a dress, the sparkle of a gem, or the almost viewless movement of a figure. The speaker was in his place, the clerks of the House in theirs, and a fair sprinkling of members were listening with more or less interest, or with more or less pleasure to the answers returned by members of the Government to the questions on the notice-paper for the day.

THE DISCUSSION.

At a quarter after five Sir Wilfrid Lawson rose to move his resolution. He was warmly welcomed by a good attendance on both sides of the House, and as soon as it was known in the lobbies that he was "up," honourable members trooped in till the House was fuller than ever we remember to have seen it. He began by saying that had he no excuse for bringing forward his resolution, he could find it in the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Exeter during the recess. He is reported to have said—"The evils of drunkenness become more and more patent every day. If we examine into the matter, we are more and more impressed with the frightful evils which arise from it." The evil is a national one, and demanded the serious attention of this House. The laws that regulate the sale of liquor do not work well, they could be improved. Some thought free trade would answer, but he need not take up the time of the House to argue on free trade on drink. They could not allow the sale of drink in the same way that they allowed the sale of other commodities. The Government had to resort to regulation. Adverting adversely to the Beer Bill, the Wine Bill of Mr. Gladstone, and the licensed grocers, Sir Wilfrid entered upon the consideration of the how, when, and where they were to supply drink to the people, and successfully exposed the futility of using any means of doing so that did not increase the misery and burdens of the people. He then entered upon an interesting criticism of the various amendments to his resolution. These were six in number. There was the well-known one of Mr. Wheelhouse, declaring the undesirability and inopportunateness of changing the arrangements now provided for the regulation of the liquor trade. One by Lord Fitzmaurice in favour of making the sanitary authorities, or their committees, the licensing authority. One by Mr. Serjeant Simon to the effect that sworn evidence must be tendered to the licensing authorities in favour of licenses being granted before they are conferred. Sir Harcourt Johnstone wanted to amend the resolution so that the licensing authority might consist of an equal number of magistrates and ratepayers' representatives elected triennially to grant and renew licenses, who might acquire by agreement, or by compulsion, the interests of the publicans, the purchase money to be raised by a license duty. The last amendment was that of Mr. Norwood, which was a condensation of the Local Option Resolution. With the exception of the first, which he would never accept, the others were in reality amendments only in name. Sir Wilfrid at this point finished a most telling speech with reading the following sentences from the report of the Lords' Committee:—"When great communities, deeply sensible of the miseries caused by intemperance; witnesses of the crime and pauperism which directly spring from it; conscious of the contamination to which their younger citizens are exposed; watching with grave anxiety the growth of female intemperance on a scale so vast, and at a rate of progression so rapid, as to constitute a new reproach and danger"—those were not his words; he was not exaggerating—"believing that not only the morality of their citizens, but their commercial prosperity, is dependent on the diminution of these evils; seeing also that all that general legislation has been hitherto able to effect has been some improvement in public order, while it has been powerless to produce any perceptible decrease of intemperance; it would seem somewhat hard, when such communities are willing, at their own cost and hazard, to grapple with the difficulty, and undertake their own purification, that the Legislature should refuse to create for them the necessary machinery, or to entrust them with the requisite powers." Such was his case, and that case he would now very respectfully leave to the consideration and decision of the House. (Cheers.)

Mr. Burt seconded the motion in a speech in which he, notwithstanding the rusticity of the style of his address, commanded the deep attention of the House. He quoted Buxton's famous impeachment of the traffic; affirmed that 400 Acts of Parliament had been passed to regulate it without satisfaction or success. The Magistrates were, from the nature of the case, unable to know the wants of the neighbourhood so well as the neighbours themselves. This was not a teetotal question, though he was a teetotaler. If he ceased to abstain, he would not cease to hold his present views on the traffic. He adverted to the manner in which the House dealt with it in 1835, showing that they were more favourable to grappling with it than now. He then attacked the amendment of Mr. Wheelhouse, and exposed his inconsistency. He seemed anxious that ample facilities should be afforded to the working man, and yet, although he knew that there were nearly 1400 parishes with no means of getting drink through the intervention of the landlords, yet he (Mr. Wheelhouse) has never drawn the attention of the House to this arbitrary use of power. He hoped that the House would earnestly take this Resolution up. At present, he thought the House was behind public opinion. He did not advocate this question from an exaggerated notion that the people can do no wrong. It is an old saying that "the voice of the people is the voice of God," but, democrat as he was, he did not believe that. (Hear, hear.) He believed that the voice of the people was always an honest voice, though it was often mistaken. He believed it was often the voice of ignorance or of passion rather than that of reason and ripe wisdom, but this he would say, if ever the voice of the people deserves to be called the voice of God, it will be when it speaks the doom of that greatest of social curses—the traffic of intoxicating liquors. (Cheers.)

Mr. GLADSTONE, who, during the delivery of the previous speeches, was busy taking notes, then advanced to the table and, after extolling the mover and seconder of the resolution, declared his inability to follow them to their conclusion. The mover meant by the resolution the Permissive Bill; he held that there was not national unanimity enough on this question to justify, as in the case of the Irish Sunday closing resolution, the passage of this resolution. He could not vote for suppressive local option, and he would not vote for things as they are, so he would not vote at all. He had no plan himself. He thought that the question of compensation ought to be faced. He then adverted to the free trade scheme recommended by the Parliamentary Committee of 1854, and felt a regret that the scheme had not had a trial. He also regretted the rejection of Mr. Chamberlain's modified Gothenburg scheme, and he earnestly called on the Government to declare their intention with regard to the report of the Lords' Committee on Intemperance. (Cheers.)

Mr. WHEELHOUSE followed Mr. Gladstone. When he rose the House rapidly emptied until the Right Hon. John Bright and Sir D. Wedderburn were the sole occupants of the Opposition benches, and Sir W. Edmonstone, Mr. Kavanagh, and Mr. Cross of the Ministerial benches. The hon. and learned member, nothing daunted, talked on well through the dinner hour. He lauded the licensing magistrates, and to do so disparaged the popular vote, querulously demanded of the mover of the resolution why he did not bring in a bill rather than a resolution, and specially why he did not look with favour on the vested interests of the publicans. He admitted the failures of the licensing system, underrated the Gothenburg system, and intimated his intention to oppose the resolution.

Mr. LEATHAM, formerly a strong opponent of the Permissive Bill, warmly approved and supported the resolution. He said that Sir Wilfred was not the best member for bringing in such a resolution, as his opinions on the Permissive Bill were so well known, and he had never given them up. (Hear.)

Mr. RODWELL, a prohibitory landowner, spoke against the resolution.

Mr. MARK STEWART (the only Scotch representative who took part in the discussion) expressed his hope that a good measure would be placed before the House. He succinctly explained the difference between the Scotch and English licensing authorities, and expressed his belief that the assimilation of the English to the Scotch system would be a signal benefit to England. (Hear.)

Mr. COLMAN said, in voting for the resolution he would be supporting the principle that communities should have the same rights as individuals. Ratepayers should have the same power of self-protection from the evils of the liquor traffic as owners of estates.

Messrs. Bulwar, Muntz, and Ritchie all spoke against the resolution, the first on the ground that for the mover to ask Parliament to pass a resolution or act to make men sober was simply a waste of time; the second gentleman would vote for the resolution if it was to commit the House to do away with its own refreshment-room. He could not understand why they (hon. members), with all the comforts of their mansions and clubs, should wish to put down the poor man's beer-shop, which was the only club he had. (Hear!) He would support a bill giving the town councils power to license the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The third gentleman, Mr. Ritchie, would vote against it because it did not go to the root of the evil and stop the manufacture and importation. He was afraid when the hon. member got local option for drink he would ask it for tobacco. (Laughter.) He was not prepared to vote for a measure that would remove from those using it an article of legitimate consumption.

The Right Hon. Mr. BRIGHT was the next speaker. On rising he warmly defended Sir Wilfrid Lawson from the insinuations that he was inconsistent and strategic. Stated his insuperable objections to the Permissive Bill, which he hoped had disappeared from the House. He was in favour of the principle of local option and would vote for it, leaving himself free to deal with any measure that might be brought before that House. There must be compensation. He wished the resolution passed, as then it would be the duty of Government to deal with the liquor question; advocated the right of the ratepayers to protection against the liquor traffic; expressed his opinion that corporations might prove the best licensing authority, and he would confine dealing with this matter to the boroughs. Those, therefore, that voted against this resolution voted for things as they are—(no, no)—and they were most unsatisfactory; those that voted for it merely expressed their opinion that a change was desirable. No fewer than 20,000 ministers of the Gospel were praying the House to make a change, and, more than that, the great majority of the sober and industrious working men and their wives and families in every part of the United Kingdom would ask them to support such a resolution as this. (No, no, and hear, hear.) And a good many working men who were not always sober would, in their moments of soberness, add their penitent voices to the appeal. (Hear, hear.) The national intellect had been stimulated and enlightened on this question; the national conscience had been awakened, and he believed it would never sleep again until a great and substantial change had been effected. The facts of the case were overpowering; they were uncontested; everyone spoke in the strongest terms about the deplorable consequences of drunkenness. In addition, we knew that science, education, morality, and religion—all the great forces which moved good and wise men to action—were gathering about this conflict. The cries from our work-houses, the moans from the sufferers in our prisons—these all joined in one voice asking them to deal with this question. They knew the gravity of the evil. They had some difficulty as to the remedy; and they had before them a proposition of a most moderate character, which would only lead to one short step further. Listening to this great cry, nobody could say that the consciences of the members of the House of Commons would not be touched by the consideration of this great and solemn question. He would vote for the resolution most cordially. He propounded no scheme of his own that should follow it, but he thought he could propound a scheme very much better than that which was now at work. That, however, he deferred until the House gave its consideration to the proposition to be made. At present, at any rate, let them manifest their concern in the highest interests of the country for the moderate and reasonable proposal of the hon. member for Carlisle. (Cheers.)

Mr. E. CLARKE, the newly-elected member for Southwark, rose, and was more fortunate than Mr. Wheelhouse, for the House, which filled when Mr. Bright was addressing it, remained to hear the member for Southwark's maiden speech. His first appearance was a splendid triumph. In the maturity of his years and powers, with a clear and resonant voice, fitting gesture, skilled in the art of persuasion and powerful appeal, he was furnished with the means of making a deep impression on the House, and he made it, for he is now deemed a powerful acquisition to the ranks of the ministerialists. He scouted the wisdom of bringing forward an abstract resolution on the evils of the liquor traffic, especially by a private member. The organisation with which the mover was connected had surely means of making enquiries and devising remedies, but all that they could offer was an abstract resolution which there were not grounds for asking that House to accept. There were two minds and two purposes. One desired to suppress the traffic as a nuisance, the other to take sureties for its proper regulation, but the understood purpose of the resolution was the Permissive Bill and meant to be the Permissive Bill. He wanted legislation on the question too, but legislation founded on right principles. There was no discernible relation between the number of public-houses and the temperance of a district. He thought it had been unnecessarily assumed that there were serious defects in the present licensing authority. He was of opinion that they could not invent any better tribunal than the one now existing. They were gentlemen who, as justices of the peace, had seen the sad effects which occurred through intemperance. They were interested in property, they were interested in the peace and good order of the district, they were absolutely free from any suspicion of improper influence, and he did not believe that the same could be said of any tribunal elected by the ratepayers. It would not be easy to introduce a better and more independent tribunal. (Hear, hear.) The Permissive Bill was frankly put forward by the honourable baronet. There could be no mistake about his meaning. He had said that he knew of landowners who refused altogether to allow licensed houses in their district, and he wished to give the same power to other localities. That was the Permissive Bill without a compensation clause. He went on to explain the difficulties attending compensation which might be awarded in a district where the public-house had been voted down. Yet if that district chose to have a trade again compensation would have been given for nothing. Then where drink-selling had been suppressed drinking would not cease, and working men would join their clubs, and, for 5s. a year, have the privilege of enjoying themselves just as if they were members of the Reform or the Carlton. Nobody forced drink on the people. They were not compelled to go into public-houses. But the public-house was the poor man's cellar. He denied that drunkenness was prevalent, a very different thing from denying that drunkenness produced great evils, and he protested against ministers interfering with the material enjoyments of the working man. But he must refer to the hon. baronet the member for Carlisle, who referred to him as having obtained entrance to Parliament by the influence of a particular trade. He was not ashamed to acknowledge his obligations in that respect. He had been reading observations of hon. gentlemen, and even of right hon. gentlemen, on the other side of the House to the effect that it was a great misfortune to have obtained his entry into that House in such a way. He was bound to say that he was quite content with the distribution of parts. (Cheers.) While he was there he was entitled to speak for one of the largest constituencies in the country, and for a larger proportion of that constituency than had ever been polled before. He was not ashamed of the services rendered to him by the class referred to and other classes and trades; he fully avowed his acknowledgments. But those services were not bought; they were not purchased in any way. They were obtained by the expression of the opinions which he expressed before the members of that House, opinions which he deemed it important should prevail in that House. He regretted that that question had ever been made a political question. (Hear, hear.) It had never been made so on that side of the House. The evil arose when members were tried with cajolments and candidates were induced to take pledges in order to obtain the support of a particular class of the constituency. The hon. baronet the member for Carlisle had spoken of the question as if it was the only question to which it was allowable to subordinate all others. If such was the attitude of the hon. baronet and his friends, the publicans were certainly entitled to band themselves together to protect their threatened interests. He was very sensitive of the indulgence which the House had shown him, and while thanking the House for its kindness, he hoped that it would, by a decisive majority, reject a proposal which could not be carried into practical legislation. (Cheers.)

The Marquis of HARTINGTON followed at five minutes past eleven, and spoke very much as he did last year. Whilst in favour of some measure of local option, he was not able to go for the resolution, behind which he saw the Permissive Bill. He concluded his remarks by announcing that he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. CROSS, on behalf of the Government, intimated that they did not see their way to take up the recommendations of the Lords' Committee on Intemperance, with which he confessed himself somewhat disappointed.

It was now past twelve o'clock, and after a brief but earnest address from Sir Harcourt Johnstone in favour of local option on the basis of his own amendment, whilst giving his support to Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution,

The SPEAKER stated that the motion before the House was, "that the Speaker do now leave the chair," and that Sir Wilfrid Lawson propose to amend the motion by leaving out from the word "that" to the end of the question, in order to add the words of his resolution. He then put the question thus, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question." The House divided:—Ayes, 248; noes, 134; majority in favour of the House going into Committee of Supply, 114. As the resolution was lost, the amendments to it on the notice paper fell to the ground. So again, as last year, Mr. Wheelhouse did not succeed in getting the House to express its opinion upon his resolution.

THE DIVISION LIST.

On the former division on the resolution the voting and pairing was as follows:—For, 183; against, 271; majority against the resolution, 88. On this occasion the voting shows a decrease on the votes of 4 against and of 30 in favour of the resolution—the decrease in the support this year amounting to 26 votes. The Scotch vote was:—For—29 votes and 3 pairs = 32; Against—6 votes and 1 pair = 7; majority in favour of the resolution of 25 votes. It will be seen that again a majority of the members of Parliament for Scotland are in favour of local option. We will analyse the voting and pairing so as to institute a comparison between the two votings on the resolution:—

COUNTIES:—For—Sir George Balfour (Kincardineshire), Lord Colin Campbell (Argyleshire), C. Dalrymple (Buteshire), Sir Geo. Douglas (Roxburghshire), Sir Alex. Gordon (Aberdeenshire, E), Samuel Laing (Orkney and Shetland), Sir J. G. T. Sinclair (Caithness-shire)—7. Paired for—J. W. Barclay (Forfarshire), P. M'Lagan (Linlithgowshire)—2. Total—9. Against—R. V. Agnew (Wigtownshire), Sir W. Edmonstone (Stirlingshire), Lord Elcho (Haddingtonshire), Hon. R. B. Hamilton (Berwickshire), Capt. J. H. Johnstone (Dumfriesshire), Sir G. G. Montgomery (Peebles and Selkirkshires). Paired against—A. O. Ewing (Dumbartonshire). Total—7. Majority for the Counties—2.

BURGHs:—For—G. Anderson (Glasgow), Right Hon. W. E. Baxter (Montrose, &c.), C. Cameron (Glasgow), Sir George Campbell (Kirkcaldy, &c.), Henry Campbell-Bannerman (Stirling, &c.), J. Cowan (Edinburgh), M. E. Grant Duff (Elgin, &c.), Andrew Grant (Leith), J. F. Harrison (Kilmarnock, &c.), W. Holms (Paisley), E. Jenkins (Dundee), John F. Leith (Aberdeen), C. E. Macintosh (Inverness, &c.), D. M'Laren (Edinburgh), Ernest Noel (Dumfries, &c.), C. S. Parker (Perth), James Stewart (Greenock), Mark J. Stewart (Wigtown, &c.), Charles Tennant (Glasgow), G. O. Trevelyan (Hawick, &c.), Sir David Wedderburn (Haddington, &c.)—21. Paired for—John Pender (Wick, &c.)—1. Total—22. Against—NOT ONE. Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities—Dr. Lyon Playfair—1. The whole vote being, as stated, 32 for and 7 against.

Not only is there a majority of the Parliamentary representation of Scotland for the resolution, but there is also a majority of the county population. The population of counties voting in favour is 807,269; that of those voting against, only 371,307. This was not the case last year. Then the valuation of those counties voting favourably is in excess of those voting adversely. The first have a valuation roll of £2,857,055, the second one of £2,249,619, so that the majority of 1880 embraces the valuation, the population, and the county Parliamentary representation.

In the case of the burghs no such comparison is required, as their vote is practically unanimous.

There are other interesting facts connected with this division.

No Scotch Liberal M.P. voted against the resolution.

The voting in its favour has no party significance, as Liberal and Conservative alike voted for it.

Four of those who voted for it last year—Col. Mure, A. Mathieson, P. M'Lagan, and J. Pender—did not vote this year. The first was on leave through domestic affliction, and could neither vote nor pair. The second was seriously indisposed, the third was abroad, and the fourth was, it is believed, shut out from the division. The two last mentioned paired for the resolution. Mr. Barclay, who has paired for it both years, but for indisposition, would have voted for the resolution this time. Three honourable members who have not hitherto voted on the resolution voted in its favour:—Rt. Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair, Sir G. S. Douglas, and C. Tennant.

None who have voted for the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill or the Local Option Resolution have ever recorded their vote against it.

Twelve members of the late Government voted with Sir W. Lawson. Of these, five represent Scotch constituencies, namely:—Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, Right Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair, H. Campbell-Bannerman, M. E. Grant Duff, and G. O. Trevelyan.

The hostile vote continues to decrease. Last year ten Scotch votes were polled against the resolution. Of those then voting, R. Montgomery, Lord Dalkeith, D. Cameron, Sir T. E. Colebrooke, and A. Orr Ewing did not vote on this occasion. A. O. Ewing, however, paired against it; and R. B. Hamilton recorded his vote against it for the first time.

This is the sixth time that Scotland, through her representatives' voting, has affirmed the principle that her people should have a right to protect themselves against the grievance of having public houses forced upon them against their will—four times for the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill; twice for the Local Option Resolution. The votes on the resolution included a decided majority of her Parliamentary representation.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION AND THE DISCUSSION AND DIVISION ON THE INTOXICATING LIQUOR (LICENSES) RESOLUTION.

The following resolutions have been unanimously adopted by the Executive of this association:—

I. That the most grateful thanks of the social and moral reformers of Scotland are due to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., and the thirty-two members of parliament for Scotland—being a clear majority of its representation—who voted or paired in favour of the Intoxicating Liquors (Licenses) Resolution on 5th ult.

II. That the Executive tender their warmest thanks to the various organizations in Scotland which so energetically supported the Resolution; to the deputation that went to London, at their request, to promote its interests; and to all who in any way contributed to the very satisfactory Scotch vote in its favour.

III. That, having regard to the marked advance in the state of public opinion in Scotland in favour of the legal suppression of the liquor traffic by the majority vote of the ratepayers affected, of which the voting by Scotch parliamentary representatives on the recent division affords such abundant evidence, the Executive earnestly calls upon the electors in the various constituencies to press the claims of the Local Option Resolution upon the attention and acceptance of all candidates soliciting their vote and influence during the General Election, and urges them to support those candidates only who promise, if elected, to vote in favour of the Resolution, or of an efficient measure of local option for Scotland.

30 Hope St., Glasgow.

A circular, of which the following is a copy, was sent to every Member of Parliament in view of the debate and division on the resolution:—"Intoxicating Liquors (Licenses) Resolution.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson's motion on Friday, 5th March, 1880.—Honourable Members are respectfully reminded that on Friday first the following resolution will, in pursuance of notice, be moved by Sir Wilfrid Lawson:—"That inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquor is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of the licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected—namely, the inhabitants themselves—who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system by some efficient measure of local option." The resolution embodies the principle of conferring upon the ratepayers the power to deal effectively with a system that has admittedly a deep personal interest for them, and in relation to which all merely class interests must hold a secondary place. The existing Licensing Laws are acknowledged on all hands to be in an unsatisfactory state. Their defects and anomalies tend to destroy much of the good they were designed to accomplish. What is obviously required is chiefly a direct and popular voice in 'restraining the issue or renewal of licenses,' and this involves transferring the responsibility from the present authorities—who have confessedly found their position to be a most difficult, not to say disagreeable one—to those who are, in every view of the case, entitled to bear it. The progress of this question in public opinion has been most marked, particularly during the last year, and its settlement can only be a matter of time. When Sir Wilfrid Lawson divided the House last session on his resolution, thirty-two Scotch members voted and paired in its favour, and only ten against it. It is confidently hoped that, on this occasion, the vote will be still more favourable. Honourable Members are earnestly requested to be in their places on Friday first, and to give the resolution their cordial support and vote.—James Hamilton, J.P., City Treasurer, Glasgow, President; James Torrens, J.P., Glasgow, Chairman of Executive; Thos. Dick, Ex-Chief Magistrate, Kinning Park, Vice-Chairman of Executive; James L. Selkirk, T.C., Glasgow, Honorary Secretary; Robert McCallum, Glasgow, Treasurer; Robert Mackay, Secretary.—Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow, 3rd March, 1880."

The following is the summary of reasons advanced by the U. K. Alliance why honourable members should vote in favour of the Local Option Resolution:—

1.—It affirms the only principle upon which the licensing system, as one of control, can be justified, viz.:—that the public protection is the primary consideration in regard to the issue of licenses. But for this principle there is no reason why the traffic in intoxicating liquors should not be as unrestricted as the sale of bread, sugar, tea, &c.

2.—The principle of Local Protection would be best applied by means of Local Option. It cannot be pretended that the people are unworthy to be trusted upon this question when they are held worthy to elect members of Parliament, municipal and other bodies, and to exercise a general control over their local affairs.

3.—Licenses are always professedly issued and renewed for the good of the local residents: but the evils resulting are of every kind and degree, lowering the state of morals, impeding and crippling all local social reform, depreciating the adjoining property, and imposing the heaviest burdens upon the local public. There is no parallel to this state of things, and it is intolerable that localities should be powerless to deal with a system which is found to contravene its ostensible objects.

4.—The fact, which is indisputable, that wherever localities have been freed from the liquor traffic, they have been satisfied with this condition, and have benefited by it, in every respect, is the strongest reason why, on this local question, the locality should be enabled by Parliament to declare its wishes and act for itself. By lengthened experience in thousands of places, as testified by the Reports of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, the theoretical objections brought against such a change are disproved, and it is invariably found that the poorer class, on whose special behalf exception is taken to complete Local Option, are the first to appreciate the value of an arrangement, which, while it shields them from temptation, encourages economy, sobriety, and all the domestic virtues.

5.—The House of Commons has already entertained a modified form of Local Option, and Right Hon. and Hon. Members are respectfully requested to pronounce by voting in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution that the people are entitled to a measure of Local Option, which shall be effective and complete; and calculated to foster that national sobriety, which it is the sincere wish of all classes, creeds, and parties to promote.

GENERAL ELECTION.

TO THE TEMPERANCE AND SOCIAL REFORMERS OF SCOTLAND.

A DISSOLUTION of Parliament having been announced, a most important opportunity is furnished to all true temperance reformers for the exercise of their political influence in favour of those principles of moral and social reform which they have so long and so earnestly advocated.

There is no graver question of domestic politics before the country at the present moment than how most effectively to grapple with the evils of intemperance, and its paramount importance is being felt and admitted much more widely than ever before. Indeed, the persistent manner in which the permissive prohibitory agitation has been prosecuted during the past few years, has produced a most marked impression both in the country and in Parliament. There is now a very general concurrence of public opinion that the ratepayers must, ere long, have a direct and potent voice in the question of licensing public-houses.

On the occasion of the recent division in the House of Commons on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution, 32 Scotch members voted and paired in its favour, while only 7 voted and paired against it. On no question of national interest has there been so decided an expression of opinion on the part of the Scotch representatives. It only remains for the friends of the cause throughout the country in their various constituencies to unite in pressing the claims of our movement and the principles of the Association upon the consideration of all candidates. An opportunity like the present occurs but seldom, and it behoves that the fullest advantage be taken of it. Members of Parliament who have voted with Sir Wilfrid Lawson in the past, and who are seeking re-election, should be strenuously supported, as well as all other candidates who are prepared, if elected, to act in a similar way; and, in the case of all new candidates, immediate steps should be taken to ascertain their views on temperance legislation before any pledge of support is given. Of course it must be left to the friends in each constituency to adopt the plan for giving effect to this recommendation that may best commend itself to them in their local circumstances.

The Executive will be prepared promptly to render every advice and assistance in their power on being applied to.—By order of the Executive, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association,

R. MACKAY, Secy.

About five million persons visit the London coffee taverns yearly, or about 14,000 a day, and the company, after allowing for depreciation, declare a dividend of five per cent.

They say that Mr. E. Clarke, M.P. for Southwark, has got his silk gown, that is, made a Queen's Counsellor, for his splendid speech against local option, and that he is to be the Attorney General should the Tories return to office. What a pity he has lost his voice when such a chance of returning thanks offers itself!

Our readers will, we are sure, regret to hear of the death of Mr. S. Foley, of Dublin, the wise counsellor and the generous giver of the Irish temperance movement. Mr. Foley will be remembered as one of the representatives of the Irish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association at the annual meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

At last that urgent need for Clyde pleasure-seekers, a temperance steamer, that is, a steamer conducted on temperance principles, seems not far from realisation. The "Ivanhoe" is to be fitted up with every requisite and convenience for the comfort of her passengers, but she is not to have a "bar." As Mr. Alex. Allan said, this will be no bar to the enjoyment of those sailing with her. When she leaves the Broomielaw on her first trip may we have the pleasure of being there.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

The Sacraments: by Professor Candlish. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.) About two years ago a scheme was set on foot in the Free Church for securing the higher education of the youth connected with the Church in Bible and religious knowledge. All over the country, and in foreign lands where the Church has stations, examinations were held last spring, and the results were declared at the meeting of last Assembly. Then it was resolved to continue the scheme, and consequently we have now several volumes published suited to the requirements of the scheme. One of these now lies before us from the pen of Professor Candlish. We have no doubt that the author found his task more difficult than if he had undertaken to write a theological treatise on the same subject for the use of students or ministers. He has, however, happily succeeded in giving the fruits of his study in plain intelligible language, suitable to the class for whom the treatise is intended. His subject is the Sacraments, and he has taken the questions of the Shorter Catechism as the basis of his exposition. The volume is divided naturally into three parts. In the first he expounds the nature of the Sacraments generally, and points out wherein they differ from the other means of grace, which leads to the determination of the number of the divine ordinances to which the term properly applies. He then proceeds to show how the Sacraments are signs or symbolical ordinances. Under this head we could have desiderated a fuller exposition of the nature of a symbol, and a clear exposition of the fact that there must be a suitability of the sign, or harmony or analogy between the sign and the thing signified. It proceeds very possibly from oversight that this has not been more fully and clearly done. It is, however, of great importance to bear this in mind, that there must be a naturalness, a suitability, a harmony existing between the symbol and the thing symbolized, else false ideas and wrong impressions are apt to be conveyed to the simple mind by the signs used. The symbols used by the Saviour, in the Sacraments he has appointed, are peculiarly well fitted to convey truth to the mind. In the second part the subject of baptism is handled, its character unfolded, the mode of application explained, the subjects of it defined, and its efficacy and practical use expounded. In this part of the subject we have been much pleased with the liberality of sentiment, the catholicity of sympathy which the author displays. Many old, straight-laced Presbyterians might be inclined to find fault with the Professor for some of the admissions which he candidly makes in regard to the administration of this Sacrament, though we are satisfied that he has confined himself to the simple Scriptural exposition of the doctrine of the ordinance. In the third part he discusses the Sacrament of the Supper. There is the point which we are most concerned with. Our journal does not pretend to discuss theological subjects generally, nor even general literary questions. It is only when these come into contact with the great temperance reformation that we feel called upon to deal with, or criticise any work, which issues from the press. No one can discuss the nature and mode of administration of the Supper without coming in contact with this great question. On reading very carefully what the Professor has written on this subject, we have to note in the outset that there is in his sentiments a very great advance on those of many other divines with whom we have met, personally or in their writings. With the teaching of the book, as a whole, we cordially agree. The exposition, in general, is in perfect harmony with all that we have been accustomed to believe as to the teaching of Scripture on the subject. The divisions under the third part are, the institution and form of the Supper; the things represented; the pledges given; the persons for whom it is intended; its efficacy, and the practical use of the Supper. The whole of these are well and skilfully explained, in language which is quite easily understood by such as those for whom the work has been prepared. But while we have thorough sympathy with the general tenor of the book, we are compelled to dissent from the statements made in the book in regard to the wine of the Supper. There is, however, a cheering want of dogmatism in dealing with the question of the elements, and what we have to complain of is rather a looseness of expression, and want of precision, than any positive contrary doctrine. Virtually all that we contend for is conceded, while at the same time expressions are used which show that something has yet to be learned on the question. In discussing the institution of the Supper, he says, speaking of the time when the ordinance was appointed:—"It is not quite certain whether the last supper of our Lord and His disciples was on the very day when the Paschal feast was observed by the Jews, or on the evening before it," &c. And, again, in reference to the lessons taught us by Paul's address to the Corinthian Church, he says:—"The uncertainty whether our Lord's last supper with His disciples was on the Passover evening, or on the preceding one, makes it impossible to be sure whether they used unleavened or leavened bread;" and the wine is described merely as 'the cup,' 'the fruit of the vine.' Christ clearly used as the symbols in this ordinance simply the bread and wine that happened to be before Him at the time, and we must follow His example by taking those in common use." There we must demur to the Professor's teaching. We know that it has been disputed whether the last supper was held on the night of the Paschal feast or not. But let any one read the narratives contained in the Synoptic gospels, and study the expressions used there; let him read of the disciples sent to prepare the Passover, and their executing their commission; let him read what is said of the actual celebration, and come to any other conclusion than the common one, that the feast was held at the right and legally-appointed time, if he can, consistently with a common sense interpretation of the narratives of the three evangelists. If they are not to be trusted on this point they may be as little trusted on any other. Their narratives are consistent with each other, and with what we should naturally expect, and strong reasons must be shown before we can believe that they are not consistent with fact. True, a difficulty arises from one or two expressions found in the Gospel of John. But these may be explained and the difficulty avoided without throwing any discredit on the three other accounts. We are quite satisfied that the feast held by the band in that upper room was at the legally appointed time, and conducted in perfect accordance with the Divinely appointed rules. But even if we admit the feast to have been held the previous evening, would the priests have been ready to sacrifice the lamb for them the day before. We suspect not; and, besides, grant that Christ as lawgiver could have legitimately changed the day, He was not here as law-giver but as law-keeper. He was under the law to give it obedience in every point, and if He had proposed to antedate the celebration, would His disciples not have raised an objection, which we do not read that they did? Had there been anything irregular or uncommon it is likely that neither friends nor foes should ever have hinted at any such a thing or given any reason or explanation for their irregularity. And even if all this were got over it would not rid us of the other supposed difficulty in regard to the kind of bread and wine used. The kind of bread and liquid, the prohibition of everything that was leavened, the presence of the lamb slain and roasted, were all clearly defined; and even if the evening had been that before the regular period, the other rules must have still been in force, and so the difficulty is not one whit greater in fixing the elementary symbols in the one case than in the other. At this feast all ferment and all fermented things were absolutely prohibited. The bread on the table must have been unfermented (this is universally admitted), and the beverage, whatever it was, must have been of the same character. But it must be borne in mind that nowhere and at no time is any beverage ordered or specified. The beverage may have been present or not; wine, milk, water, palm-juice, or any other liquid may have been used, only, however, with the proviso that there was no element of leaven in it. It is a tradition among the Jews that wine of grapes will not ferment. But unless we allow that all the Jews were ignorant of the fermenting of wine, and especially that Christ, who knows all things, and who was the lawgiver, and knew what was meant by His own command, was ignorant of what modern science has now revealed, that fermentation in wine and fermentation in bread are the very same process in reality, then we must adhere to the belief that Christ and His disciples celebrated this Paschal feast with unfermented things (bread, and wine, and everything else). So far, therefore, as there is any dubiety as to the day of the feast, and consequent institution of the new ordinance, and so far as this determines the nature of the symbols, we think the clause might have been spared. Accepting as we do most cordially the statement "that Jesus gave no minute and specific instructions as to the forms and rites to be observed in the Lord's Supper," we believe that the details have been purposely left thus open just because they had to be carried to all quarters of the globe, where some things that might be easily enough carried out in some places, would become utterly impossible in others. Since then there is such liberty of detail left to the Church why does the Church cling so pertinaciously to what is productive of so much evil? She has not always been so persistent in attending to the minute details. In this very ordinance, while admitting that at first our Lord used unfermented bread, the Church has now and for long used fermented bread, because it was commonly in use, and most convenient. Now even if we grant, as we may do for argument's sake, that the liquor used as a beverage on that memorable night when our Saviour was betrayed, was fermented, can any greater divergence from that example be found in changing the wine that there has been and is in the change in the symbol of the bread. Those who try to make out a conscientious objection to the use of wine unfermented, are bound to go back to unfermented bread and raise the question in all our Churches. If the Professor is right that no specific rule has been laid down, then there can be no objection to the Church or any congregation adopting grape juice rather than the fermented stuff presented at the table so generally, not only fermented grape juice but often with grape juice or wine produce completely wanting. If the Saviour used, as we are convinced He did, this grape juice, we cannot do better than follow His example. If he used something else, He has not prescribed what we are to use, but it is only called fruit of the vine, or cup, and therefore in accordance with this freedom which He has left us, we can use what is most convenient and most suitable. But these elements are symbols, and they are appointed to represent and shadow forth the death of Christ, and the feeding and nourishing power of His body and blood to the soul when received by faith. The symbols must be suitable. Bread does nourish and strengthen and support the body. So does the fruit of the vine in its natural state as it comes from the vine. But when the process of fermentation has supervened, all, or very nearly all, the nutritive property is destroyed, and in its place comes a substance which tends to pervert the whole faculties both of body and mind. It would be at the same time somewhat out of the ordinary course that the same substance should be used as alcoholized wine is, both in the Old Testament and in the New, as the symbol of the wrath of God, and also as the emblem of the greatest of all the blessings God can or has ever given to man. If there is then no positive command requiring this to be used as the symbol of redeeming love, why should it be continued; or rather why should so many resist a change which is perfectly in harmony with all that Scripture says about this emblem? It must be noted that it is never called wine—only the fruit of the vine. Grape juice answers this description—is one of the most nutritious of beverages, and is easily got. It is regularly sold under the name of unfermented wine. A priori we could scarcely expect to find Jesus, who well knew what dire evils alcoholic wine would bring upon the world, would select what He knew could not nourish, but which could destroy; which could not support, but could kill, as the element to represent His blood shed for the remission of sin, and for the everlasting salvation of all who by faith receive and rest on Him for salvation.

One other point connected with this subject demands notice. Professor Candlish refers to the case of the Corinthian Church, as indicating that in early times some people used the fermented grape juice. He says—"Paul delicately hints at the possibility of even grosser sensual abuses—that is, than breaking up into sects and parties. The word methuei in the Greek of this passage has been a sad stumbling block to many. The proper meaning of the word is admirably represented by the Scotch expression to be fou. Everybody knows that this expression has a double meaning—say of a person who has just risen from a meal that he is fou, you convey the idea, and correctly, that he has had sufficient to meet all the cravings of nature—that his hunger is completely appeased. But tell us that a man has just come out of a drink-shop, and that he is fou, and a totally different idea is at once formed of his condition. The word methuei has exactly the same applications, and we require to know what has been consumed before we can state definitely which of these applications of the word must be used in the text before us. Paul, in finding fault with these Corinthian Christians, challenges them for violation of Christian duty at their love-feasts, which were very commonly held just before they celebrated the supper. He says they did not wait for one another, that the rich brought of their abundance, while many of the poor were but scantily provided for, and that they used what they had brought, keeping it to themselves, so that they were abundantly satisfied, while some of their poorer brethren were hungry, or but poorly supplied with food. This he condemns as uncharitable, and says that if they were hungry and were not willing to share their abundance with their poorer brethren they might eat at home, where such conduct would not be so blameworthy.

Note here 1. Not one word except the ambiguous methuei appears in the whole passage to indicate the presence in these agapae of any wine at all. That some beverage was present is very probable, but we have no evidence of its nature.

2. The presence of any intoxicating wine at the agapae does not necessarily imply the presence of the same kind at the Supper of the Lord, held immediately afterwards. The element used, then, may have been entirely different, and even the use of alcoholic wine by this branch of the church would not prove that in the use thereof they were acting in perfect accordance with general practice and apostolic example.

3. The fact of drunkenness appearing at these feasts is very unlikely, and, from the terms of the narrative, not admissible. The Apostle challenges their conduct and says he praises them not, because of the want of reverence, liberality, and orderly behaviour at these feasts, which, though not the Supper, were in close and intimate connection therewith. Hence he says of them, "One is hungry, and the other is fou," to use the expressive word of the Scotch language. The antithesis in the clause has a reference to the previous part of the sentence, where we are told that everyone taketh before other his own supper; or as the reading is in another MS., every one takes to himself, or snatches up, his own supper, or what he had brought with him. Hence there were who had very humble supply—some were hungry while others were well fed. Drink is not the antithesis to hungry. But suppose that some of them had been drunk, can we suppose that one so alive to the honour of his Master, and so sensitive to any disgrace brought on the religion he preached, would have failed to expose in the most severe terms the conduct of such persons as got drunk as a preparation for the solemn feast, and who either came to the feast in that condition or became such at the Lord's table? Nay, indeed. Had drunkenness been found in their feasts, Paul would have spoken in much stronger terms than he did. What they did was bad enough, but this would have been worse still—much worse.

4. It must be a bad case that needs the support of the Corinthian church to support it. If they were right, then no fault would have been found with them, if wrong, then their example cannot much avail, except as it is a beacon to warn of danger to be avoided.

Again we fall back on the broad ground, so well stated by Dr. Candlish, that no specific rule has been laid down, regulating the kind either of the bread or the fruit of the vine. We may use what is most convenient without violating the ordinance, and we are safest when we follow the example, as we believe, of our Saviour in using grape juice as the fruit of the vine, rather than any artificial, dangerous, destructive compound which has done, is doing, and, so long as used, will continue to do incalculable harm to the world and to the church. We prefer a substance which will feed and nourish and cheer the body as the symbol of that blood which is drink indeed, and which saves and strengthens the soul, to any other that is used as a symbol of wrath, and which destroys and kills.

On looking at the whole subject, we hope the author may see his way when a second edition is called for, as we hope will soon be done, to modify his expressions a little, and put himself on surer ground on these points. We rejoice to find him so liberal in his views, and so free from dogmatism. The book, though written for the youth, may be, and we have no doubt will be, read with much pleasure, as it may be with great profit by the older members of our churches. We cordially thank him for his able contribution to the education in religious knowledge of our young men and young women. Had we more such liberal and Christian expositions, we might have more general charity and greater religious life and energy among us.

The Home World, with which is incorporated Our Children, Sunday School World, and The Children's Visitor. An illustrated religious family paper. Conducted by F. E. Longley. London: Longley, 59 Warwick Lane, E.C. This volume is a treasury of amusement, instruction, and art, to boys and girls. Many volumes and not a few libraries have been searched in order to enable the talented editor to weekly spread his precious freight before his readers. Home World appeals to our common sense; offers us Golden Thoughts; peeps at our Sunday-schools; sets blackboard lessons; culls choice poetry; tells stories; reviews choice books; advocates temperance; keeps a well filled page of puzzles; offers prizes, and presents printed music and illustrations which merit high praise. To those who can only afford one good magazine for the household we cordially recommend Home World: they will secure in it the essence of scores of journals for home reading.

Loose Bricks for Temperance and Social Workers; by Amos Scholfield. (London: National Temperance Publication Depot.) Price 6d. We believe that these "Loose Bricks" will give stability to the principles of total abstinence and prohibition cherished by all who read this little book.

The Throne of Iniquity, or Sustaining Evil by Law. A Sermon by the Rev. Albert Barnes. Tenth thousand. Selkirk: George Lewis. One penny. We are exceedingly pleased to find that this admirable sermon has reached a circulation of ten thousand copies. Merely reckoning each copy as finding three readers there are thirty thousand minds brought into contact with this sermon, which has rarely been equalled and never in our opinion surpassed. Let our friends get a supply and they will find that the giving of one to an inquiring mind will do more to convince and persuade it than bulky packets of literature or a lengthened series of lectures. In republishing this sermon, Mr. George Lewis has placed the temperance movement in Scotland under deep obligation, an obligation they can easily discharge by liberal orders for his valuable reprint.

The Birthdays of the Temperance and Total Abstinence Movements in Scotland; by James M'Nair. (Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, 30 Hope Street.) Threepence. This is a model historiette. A marvel of clear condensation. Within the compass of 32 pages we have an excellent history of the rise of both movements. Mr. M'Nair conceals his own large share in the advancement of total abstinence movement, but it is greatly indebted to his persistent efforts to get at facts and to his untiring energy in upholding the true principles of total abstinence against a spurious and happily almost exploded theory of temperance. He has brought down the history of the movement to within the knowledge of those now living, and has rendered a service to the cause which he has so long and faithfully served as is not likely to be forgotten. We cordially recommend his pamphlet to the perusal of all who hold their principles dear, and also to all who feel a pleasure in finding truth grappling successfully with error.

A Few Words to Women; by a woman (Miss Jessie Craigen). Being a plea for the temperance movement. (Retford, Notts: Miss Craigen, Victoria Place, London Road. Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.) Price threepence. All who have had the pleasure of listening to Miss Craigen's eloquent appeals on behalf of those movements which are calculated to elevate the men and women of the present day will, should they purchase this lecture, we venture to believe, peruse it with unmingled satisfaction. They may miss the lady's earnest tones and energetic gesture, but they will have the womanly thoughts enshrined in chaste and elegant language. Miss Craigen is able, from her long experience among women and men, to form a vivid idea of the relations that do exist and should exist between them. She draws a painful contrast between them; the thoughtless man too often oblivious of his moral obligations when too confiding girls are concerned, or as permitted by law to inflict injuries where a wife is concerned. Then women themselves are too ignorantly brought up, too poorly paid, too much subjected to temptation. On both sides there is danger from the other, and that danger is intensified by the drinking customs of society. We must leave Miss Craigen's farther exposition of the evil and the remedies she suggests to the reader of her pamphlet with the belief that it will thoroughly enlist their sympathies with those for whom she eloquently pleads.

PRINCIPLE AND EXPEDIENCY: THEIR TRUE PLACE IN THE TEMPERANCE ENTERPRISE.—II.

THE Apostle Paul abstained from flesh and wine simply and only because of the sacredness with which he regarded the conscience of a weak brother in Christ, furnishing incontrovertible proof of the supreme estimate he had of his own conscience, seeing he "strove to have his conscience void of offence both toward God and toward man." Assuming that the wine spoken of was unfermented, it was therefore pleasant, wholesome, and nutritious, which all wine is before it is allowed to ferment, for all fermentation is decay, rottenness, corruption, and grape juice is no exception. Flesh could have produced no more physical injury than than now, unless partaken of immoderately, and precisely so with respect to unfermented wine, which is both food and drink—drink in exact proportion to the water it contains (for there is nothing drink but water), and food in exact proportion to the solid matter it contains, and on those who say the wine spoken of was fermented, and therefore intoxicating, rests the onus of proof on this point, for in the absence of proof the assertion goes for nothing.

To personal abstinence from intoxicating liquor Christian expediency never did and never can intelligently apply; all such liquors partaken of as beverages, being, as we have already seen, injurious to the partaker in exact proportion to the quantity partaken of. But Christian expediency does apply to the temperance enterprise, and when set on right lines, guided to right issues, fed and strengthened by Christ reigning in the heart and directing the life of His people, Christian expediency will take us out of the wilderness of social disorder, pauperism, crime, and lunacy, in which we are now wandering, and place us in the land of promise, "a land flowing with milk and honey." We look at the gigantic liquor traffic and, like ten of the twelve spies who were sent out by Moses to spy out the promised land, we are faithless and faint-hearted in view of the apparently insurmountable obstacles around and before us. But our God and Father is with us, and we need not be afraid. Our fear but hinders our progress, retards our march, and dishonours our God.

In our war with national intemperance we have already exceeded by ten years the time of Israel's wilderness wanderings, and we are far from the end of our journey yet. How can it be otherwise? The marching powers of our leaders we have spent in and around a selfish centre, personal abstinence from vile intoxicants; whereas we ought by personal duty first to have set our feet in the way of His commandments and, impelled by the exhaustless and permanent power of Christian expediency, marched with stout heart and unswerving purpose in the path of conquest.

But instead of this onward march to final triumph we have largely been engaged with our so-called expediency, circulating round and round a purely selfish centre. Is it any wonder, then, that our stationary Christian expediency is sadly deficient in stalwart, sturdy vigour, of these fine colossal proportions which were so conspicuous in the Christian expediency, which was so marked a feature in the character and life of the Apostle Paul? It may require courage to refuse compliance with pernicious custom and vicious habit, but it will never do to call such courage Christian expediency. Christian expediency operates outside ourselves, labours for others in the spirit of self-sacrifice, the highest and purest of all sacrifice, fed from a source pure as purity itself, expansive as righteousness, and in its action and results all-conquering as love, justice, and truth.

The erroneous application of Christian expediency to the one act of personally abstaining from the beverage availment of all intoxicating liquor, instead of continuously applying it to the noble and imperative task of banishing intemperance from our homes, our communities, our land, from the earth, is mainly, if not wholly, due to the erroneous idea long entertained that in small quantities intoxicating liquors were right and proper articles to be partaken of; but this false and fatal error by patient and exhaustive experiments on the part of competent and undeniable authorities, has been exploded, and all temperance reformers who are yet ignorant of this all-important fact are culpable to a lamentable extent, are weak-kneed apologists, when by this hour of the day in the grand temperance enterprise they ought to have been proof against all attacks and strong to assail and bear down all opposition. But the false notion which is here combated originated in ignorance of the precise, generic nature, and absolutely pernicious effects of all alcoholic liquors upon the human organism, a false notion which, I profoundly regret to say, still permeates the public mind to an extent we little dream of, and hinders the cause of temperance in relation to intoxicants to a degree we can scarcely imagine; and all this is mainly due to the foolish, I had almost said wicked, retention of extreme terms applied to our movement in its infancy. Ask the bulk of good men and women who in sympathy are with us, but in practice are against us, Is "temperance" and "teetotalism" (or "total abstinence") the same thing? and they will tell you they are not. Mr. Maxwell, chairman of the Urr School Board, in reply to a deputation of abstainers only a few weeks ago said "he was as strong an advocate for temperance as any man, but not for total abstinence." Does not Mr. Maxwell, and do not thousands more, look upon temperance and total abstinence as different things? And, pray, who has taught them to do so? On whom rests the blame? Trace this sad and saddening state of things to its source and you will find that the terms "teetotalism" and

"total abstinence," terms which expressed exactly what the founders of the temperance enterprise knew and believed, but which no more expresses what is now known and believed by all who do know, than the foolish notion that the earth is stationary, the sun, moon, and stars move round about it, correspond with scientifically demonstrated facts. If temperance, properly defined and correctly understood, does not sanction our practice of repudiating all beverage availment of intoxicating liquors, our case is hopeless. Continue to plant the acorn of the one glass of intoxicants and you are sure by and by to have the firmly-rooted oak of intemperance. It is the merest folly to expect the boy to grow up into the full stature of physical manhood, hampered by wearing the clothes of his boyhood. Parent and child may have a liking for the clothes of boyhood. If so, lay them aside, look at them as frequently as proper attention to immediate and more important duties will allow, but let the growing lad have clothes suitable to his advancing stature. Mr. Maxwell's idea that "temperance" and "total abstinence" are not one and the same is an exceedingly prevalent one, and our retention of the terms I have indicated in the advocacy of our movement helps to deepen, not to displace, this erroneous idea which is working a world of mischief. Temperance covers the ground we occupy, lends the imperative of moral obligation to the practice for which we contend. What more or else do we require? With the knowledge we possess, principle requires of us that we personally abstain from all beverage availment of intoxicating liquor, and Christian expediency demands of us the adoption and untiring carrying forward of all the agencies and instrumentalities necessary for the final displacement of that many-headed monster—intemperance.

The true place of principle in the temperance enterprise is personal abstinence from all beverage availment of intoxicating liquor, be the quantity ever so small; and the true place of Christian expediency is to work untiringly till the issue is gained, the complete emancipation of our country and the world from the galling bondage and polluting influence of intemperance.

"And come what there may
To stand in the way
That day the world shall see."

"For every plant which my Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." And how shall the liquor traffic escape? Impossible.

EARLY PROHIBITIONISTS.

AMONG the younger abstainers whose knowledge of temperance literature is confined to modern publications, there prevails an opinion that the agitation for the prohibition of the liquor traffic is of modern growth. They are of the opinion that the early abstainers never dreamt of invoking the aid of the legislature to help forward the temperance enterprise. This opinion has been strengthened by some recent utterances by those who ought to know better. The very reverse of this was the fact. Hardly had the pioneers begun to advocate the principles of total abstinence than they also pleaded with the legislature the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors. The early abstainers were unanimous in favour of legislative interference. While they based their appeals on human brotherhood and Christian law, they also appealed to the magistrate and to Parliament for aid in their noble work. It was the hope that Government would prohibit the traffic that sustained them in their arduous labours. In reading the other day the "Birthdays of the Temperance and Total Abstinence Movements," we were delighted to meet with the statement that the agitation for prohibition had marked the earliest effort of those who maintained the abstinence cause in opposition to what is termed the "Old Temperance Movement." This statement is fully confirmed by the early history of the abstinence movement. The Home Drummond Act was passed in 1828. It was an Act to render it more difficult to procure licenses. The magistrates had the power to limit the number of licenses to what was considered "meet and convenient for the community." The magistrates were endowed with almost unlimited powers in granting or refusing certificates, without which no licenses were obtained. The publican groaned under the restrictions placed upon them, and laboured for their removal. In the session of Parliament for 1838, there were two bills introduced into the House with the view of releasing the publicans from certain grievances under which they laboured.

The special object of the first of these was to enable publicans who have once obtained a license for the sale of excisable liquors to have the same renewed by the excise, without an annual renewal of certificates from the magistrates. The second bill was intended—1st, to repeal the existing laws which prohibit actions for tipping debts; 2nd, to repeal certain other enactments which prevent publicans from taking a pawn or pledge in payment of intoxicating liquors. This bill would have permitted the publican—after the poor drunkard had spent his last coin—to have taken the shirt off his back, or the blanket off his bed, as payment for drink.

A number of leading abstainers—opposed to these enactments—men who believed and taught that the whole traffic in intoxicating liquors was not only morally wrong, but was in direct collision with, and in opposition to the physical laws of our nature, and the general well-being of the community, exerted themselves, and on the 28th April, 1838, a meeting was called, on a respectable requisition by the Lord Provost, to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament against the said bills. The meeting was held in the Town Hall. In the absence of the Lord Provost, the chair was occupied by Bailie Paul. Long before the hour of meeting the hall was filled, principally with the publicans and their dupes. A stormy meeting ensued. A motion was submitted to petition against the bills. Dr. Weir, editor of the Glasgow Argus, who led the host of publicans, moved an amendment to the effect that the meeting petition in favour of the bills. After a long and boisterous time the chairman declared the amendment carried. A vote of thanks having been awarded to Bailie Paul, the meeting separated.

The Glasgow Total Abstinence Societies, under the presidency of James Mc'Nair, resolved to hold another meeting in North Albion Street Chapel on the 8th May following. In the absence of the President, Jas. Dawson presided. On the motion of Robt. Reid, the following petition was adopted, and it was agreed to present copies to both Houses of Parliament. The petition was submitted to the public, and was extensively signed by citizens—

"To the Commons, &c., &c.

"The petition of the members of Total Abstinence Societies in Glasgow, and other persons in that city, "Humbly sheweth,—That your petitioners deeply lament the great and increasing prevalence of intemperance in the British Empire; and that they consider the traffic in intoxicating liquors, which is sanctioned by the Government, to be its principal cause. They consider the permission to trade in those articles to be inexpedient and impolitic as no good except so far as the liquors are used as medicine is derived from it by the community; and they consider it to be sinful and injurious, as the intemperance which necessarily results from it is the source of the ignorance, irreligion, crime, poverty, disease, and premature death which abound to such an alarming extent.

"As all intoxicating liquors contain a greater or less proportion of alcohol, which all physicians and chemists declare to be a poison; and that though it may be useful to the human constitution when diseased, it is most pernicious to it when in health, your petitioners are convinced that to permit a traffic in such an article is inconsistent with that regard for the welfare of a people which every Government ought to manifest.

"The vast quantity of alcoholic liquors annually manufactured in the United Kingdom is derived from grain, which has been given by God that his creatures might use it for their food as it has come from himself, and not that it might be converted into an instrument fitted only for their destruction. To legalise such a waste of the bounties of Providence is surely most offensive to the Giver of all good, and is a direct violation of the laws of justice and benevolence, which He has appointed to regulate our conduct towards our fellowmen.

"Your petitioners beg finally to state their conviction that were the trade in intoxicating liquors to be declared unlawful, the revenue, which at present flows from the manufacture and the sale of these articles, would be supplied by the amount of taxes derived from other commodities which are necessary to the health and comfort of the inhabitants of these realms, an increased demand for which would immediately take place, by the saving of all the expenditure for the support of Government servants to overlook the trade, and by the limited number of jails, bridewells, and convict transports which would be required. And even though the Exchequer should suffer, the deliverance of the nation from the guilt which attended such a traffic, and by the physical, intellectual, and moral improvement of the community ought, by an enlightened Government, to be reckoned full compensation for any pecuniary loss which, by a righteous enactment, it might sustain.

"May it therefore please your Honourable House speedily to take this subject into your consideration, and to abolish the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and your petitioners will ever pray."

The petition was entrusted to Joseph Brotherton, M.P., for presentation in the Commons, and to the Right Hon. Earl Stanhope in the Lords.

An earnest appeal was made to all abstainers and philanthropists in the empire to unite their efforts to effect the overthrow of the whole traffic.

We hope that the above may prove interesting to your readers, and help to enlighten them as to the opinions and actions of the early pioneers of our movement.

WINE IS A MOCKER.

"Wine is a mocker," Scripture tells;

WOMAN—THE GIRL.

FROM the first moment in which they step across the threshold of this world women are looked upon as inferior. Their advent is not heralded with any such extravagance as is manifest when a man child is born into the world. Too often the baby girl who, because she is the first-born, has had some extra attention paid to her, is thrust aside because the second-born is a boy. All through it is the same. "She is only a lassie." The feeling of commiseration with which this is often said tells how deeply rooted in humanity is the idea that women are the "weaker" vessels. Instead of always continuing, so to speak, to live tolerated, women might gauge the capacities of their sex, and having ascertained where their true strength does lie, devote their attention to its development. At least they should not become the product of a sickly civilization. Travellers often notice how graceful savage women are, how free in their action, how natural in their carriage. They excel in fleetness, are often excellent swimmers, and, in short, have a physical culture which women in this highly favoured isle might envy. No doubt there are efforts being made by strong-minded women in this country to develop women into something more than dolls—to make them graceful, intelligent, and independent, but, alas, these efforts are chiefly put forth among the "upper crust." To carry them out among the working classes would require appliances whose name would be legion. But were these philanthropic women to make this kind of development fashionable their work would proceed by leaps and bounds, and, like the kindling of a sunlight, each fair one so trained would communicate an upward and elevating influence to her fair neighbours.

During the early years of a girl there should be no difference made between her and boys. She is easier brought up than boys are, and if her physical growth was as freely allowed as in the case of her brothers she would attain to a condition of superior physical health. She should be taught to run, to swim, to play not only at skipping-rope but at cricket, to ply the oar, to swing, in short, to go through, as it is termed, the elements of a thorough physical education. She should never be bound up in stays, nor wear garters, but in a more extended freedom continue to grow in stature and in grace. Lady Hamilton, the mistress of Lord Nelson, was at first a servant girl, but having a strong faculty for the imitation of the manners of the great, she set about training herself to have a most elegant shape, and a most graceful carriage. Daily she went through drill in her bed-room, marching backwards and forwards with a large book on her head or on her shoulder. This, she said, gave her the rudiments of a most graceful style of walking. Dancing gave her agility, and the skipping-rope that easy balance of figure so essential to elegance. She fenced also, her object being to perfect her physical condition. The consequence was that she was not excelled for either beauty or grace. Mothers should look forward a little and not merely let their girls grow any way; they need no care to do that, and sometimes very rank and troublesome growths they become, acquiring many habits of which they strive in vain to rid themselves when these have become part of their second selves. By following such a plan as we have indicated, children will soon attain to a grace and health of which they will never be deprived. Some will, no doubt, sneer at this way of bringing their daughters up as being unfeminine. Such trained girls may do for bondagers or field workers, but never for ladies. They are simply in error and are the victims of a prejudice. Girls thus developed will not be corpulent or frowsy, they will be lithe, muscular, graceful, and agile, models of easy elegance, buoyant spirits, and constant good health, capable of entering upon employment with the needful vigour and energy, and following it up with a persistency which will cost them scarcely an effort of will.

It is by mothers, however, the initiative should be taken. From their girl's earliest years there should be daily bathing, drill, and dancing, a moderate supply of homely food, and plenty of good and regular sleep. In winter indoor exercise may consist of drill, and even on stormy days a well-drilled girl will derive pleasure and add to her stock of health by going out for a vigorous walk. In summer swimming should take the place of bathing, rowing the place of drill, and excursions on foot the place of the skipping-rope and the dance. If her mother demand "a full, true, and particular account" of all that she has observed in these lengthened walks she will, by doing so, be educating the observing faculties of her girls to a higher degree than she is probably aware of. A girl trained in this manner is not necessarily unfeminine. She is a vigorous, rather than a sickly plant, the hue of good health will lend an additional charm to her interesting or, it may be, pretty face, and her constant and happy flow of spirits will make her the perennial joy of the household.

But if we did not do more than this we might have to meet the charge that after all we had made her a noble or graceful savage, and it might be difficult to meet it successfully. We believe, however, that a sound mind can only manifest itself in a sound body; the sound body once attained, we can easily see after the sound mind. In the present day ignorance is a crime, and the law is persistently compelling the education of all. But the education is hardly yet of an adequate kind. There is no systematic physical training, no moral training, religious training is optional, so that the training is merely intellectual. It consists of "the three R's," with a subject or two added, such as music or geography, or something of that sort. Perhaps girls get a little sewing, but the whole catalogue of girls' education is singularly defective. To supplement what is deficient, to ever keep the girl's future life in view, and adopt her education to that life, should be the care of the mother. If she fails she will find things sadly amiss when the stages of maidenhood, wifehood, and motherhood, are reached. From her earliest years the girl's memory should be exercised. It should be filled with the choicest flowers of poetry and song,* and great pains taken with her singing lessons. The mother should exercise a watchful care over her temper, her habits, and her good breeding; the first should never be broken by harshness, the second should be formed with steady method day by day, the third should increase and extend even as her days do grow. Then a constant share of house work should be allotted to her, the quantity proportioned to her strength and her years. It is one of the saddest phases of modern life that women should think house work beneath them. In such cases girls have not been trained to such work, they have seen that the house affairs have been carried on without any responsibility resting upon them, and when they have had to enter upon it it has been found to be so odiously irksome to them, that it is to be shirked as often as possible. A good, indulgent mother calls in some help, and continues, though at some risk of failing health and some sacrifice, to perform her usual tasks. An energetic one, crying out that she cannot bear to see her girls in her way, does the work herself, but the wrong done to girls in such cases is irreparable. Now, this wrong can be best averted by setting the girl to do something from her earliest years, and by kind, encouraging praise inciting her to do her house work tidily and deftly, she soon has the estimable blessing of a little girl who delights to lighten her labours by sweeping and dusting rooms, cleaning brass, polishing mirrors and windows, making markets, and in many other little matters. Then a wise mother will set her knitting and hemming as early as she can; it is delightful to see girls sitting with their mother darning in the evening after tasks are over, repeating little scraps of poetry, or describing somewhere they have visited that day. A mother with such girls is never alone. It may have cost her much trouble, much care, to make them so useful, so healthy, so strong, but every day the trouble of their education is lessening, while its fruits are becoming more plentiful, and as she looks at them she fondly declares that they are "the very apple of her eye."

Then she sees that they are kept at school, that they learn to write. Of all the slatternly habits chargeable to the average girl of the period that of writing is the worst. Girls in nothing show themselves so far behind the age than in their writing. They are like the people "of ton"—a few years ago who believed that the more illegible their writing was the higher a mark of good breeding it showed. They never made a greater mistake. Sensible women are beginning to perceive that it is so, and are showing signs of careful attention to their writing, the result is that we are meeting with letters written by women which cannot be surpassed by men. Mothers should not allow their girls to correspond or to write out their school exercise in a slovenly fashion, but insist on neatness and cleanliness, rapidity will come in due time. Reading and recitation are supposed to be taught at school, but mothers should always make their children read aloud to them some beautiful story, it will afford the darlings pleasure and her an opportunity of seeing whether they are contracting any of the vices of reading or reciting which is so frequent in society. Let them be guarded from reading the newspaper with a Bible "twang." Then arithmetic should have attention, and book-keeping should not be neglected, nor the rudiments of music and drawing.

The training of a girl to such a point may seem a formidable undertaking, but it is only seeming. The farmer that could take his bull by the fore-foot and lift him up could not have done so had he not begun with him when he was quite a calf. The mother who realises her responsibility for her daughters will not loiter over its discharge. She will begin betimes and mould the little plastic being which God has committed to her care. She will see of the travail of her soul and be satisfied.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

AN ILLUSTRIOUS ABSTAINER.—A correspondent sends in an extract from the Wexford Recorder: "At the weekly meeting of the Gorey Board of Guardians Mr. Palmer reported having admitted an old woman, 112 years of age, to the infirmary, named Mary Byrne, who never carried a stick, and was strong, healthy, and active until a few weeks since, when she got something like paralysis. When sending her to the workhouse the medical officer ordered her a glass of wine to help her on the journey, but, when offered, she said she was too well able to go without it—that she never tasted wine or drink in her life. She came from Aske, Inch, Gorey. Dr. Allen said he offered her wine in the infirmary. She replied, "Do you want to poison me?" and would not take it." We commend Mary Byrne to Mr. Sherlock for his next volume of "Illustrious Abstainers."—Hand and Heart.

OPEN-AIR MEETINGS.

Now that summer with its loveliness is almost upon us, and singing birds, budding trees, opening flowers, clear skies, and sunny days are inviting to enjoyment, temperance reformers can with pleasure transfer their efforts from the hall to the open air. The open air affords rather an extensive area for their advocacy, and is inclusive of a great variety of meeting places from the sea shore to the mountain side—from the park or lawn to the crowded thoroughfare or the churchyard gate. Rightly used, there is nothing to rival open-air meetings as a mode of propagating the principles and practice of the temperance reformation in their personal, social, or legal aspects. Hence it is a matter for keen regret that such an advocacy should be so much neglected by the committees of our temperance societies.

Unfortunately the temperance movement has suffered from its very success. At the beginning of it we had a cheesemonger, a shoemaker, a raw factory lad, a butcher, a gauger, and a painter as leaders of the national enterprise. These wrought with a will. They came face to face with the havoc of drink in their own one and two-roomed houses, where one drunkard could make home as bad as hell itself, and they reasoned with the wretched drunkard when sober, and went boldly before the public, imploring men and women to band themselves together to resist the contact and encroachments of the liquor demon. They set the heart of the country on fire, and they drew towards the movement the sympathy, the assistance, the power of the community, till all that moral suasion could accomplish was disclosed. Day by day their numbers augmented, but the enthusiasm, the self-sacrifice of the early temperance reformers did not augment in proportion. False pride, the first-born of a quasi-respectability, has injured the movement in many aspects, but in none so much as in open-air advocacy. There are too many temperance reformers who hide their light in a poorly-furnished hall, in an unfrequented back street, where it sheds its murky glare in the faces of a shivering audience, whose presence is begged by the Bible-woman, and who are only looked after in the dark days of winter. Such Reformers never seem to think that the warm days of summer increase the demands of thirst, and cause so many to fall away from their vow of abstinence. If they were to let their light shine, they would throw aside false pride, confer upon the best way of making open-air advocacy available, and be found signal examples of an out-door, well-arranged, high-class temperance propaganda.

Once resolved on this duty, a Committee might easily light upon a conspicuous place in their district which they would have little difficulty in making attractive to those they desired to elevate by a series of addresses on temperance, cleanliness, thrift, and the other minor virtues. Pledges could also be dispensed, literature sold, and even little musical entertainments held.

It is objected that such a mode of spreading temperance truth is vulgar. Yes, just as much as undressing before you jump into the river to save a drowning man; but in the one case so in the other, the offence may be pardoned because of the good that is to be done. Just think of the vulgarity of the man that rushes after a runaway carriage, shouting for help; or of a fellow that rolls up his trousers and his cuffs and manfully becomes one of an impromptu fire brigade, and passes buckets of water along to extinguish a burning house, and then measure the enormity of that vulgarity of which the temperance reformer is guilty that, in the strength of God, goes out to the highways, the lanes, and market-places to rescue the perishing through indulgence in alcohol. The two-fold objection of trouble and fear of Mrs. Grundy has no real weight for the staunch temperance reformer. He will cheerfully undergo the first, and resolutely overcome the second, and join with similarly brave, self-sacrificing lovers of his kind in making the summer out-of-door advocacy redound to the credit and advantage of the movement.

It is said that as very few can speak easily and effectively out of doors, the appearance of the same speakers palls on the interest of the people. This objection may be easily met. The hardy few that tenaciously follow up this mode of advocacy wherever and whenever an opportunity presents itself, do so in the face of discouragements which few will endure. Let committees work as heartily, arrange as creditably for their summer as they do for their winter advocacy, and plenty of talented speakers will willingly comply with their invitation. True, there are many favourite advocates who cannot venture on open-air speaking, either from a weak chest or because they cannot speak extemporaneously; but there are many others who, if they had reasonable prospects of an audience, would gladly lend their assistance from time to time. Indeed the failure has been oftener with the audience than with the speakers. If committees who have made any attempts in this direction were to sum up their experience, it would amount to something like this—that the same speaker at a small and at a large out-door gathering was a totally dissimilar person. He appears at the first, and finds two or three shame-faced individuals, with their heads close together, whispering their fears that there will be no meeting. Some fifty yards away there are two or three groups waiting, like Micawber, to see what will "turn up." No platform, no table, no tracts, no placards, no choir, no secretary, and no chairman. A speaker would, we think, be more than mortal if, under such circumstances, his courage, like Bob Acres', did not ooze out at his finger ends. But it is now five or ten minutes past the hour, and faith with the public must be kept. Those representing the society will not take the chair and introduce the speaker, so he takes it himself; talks low to incite the curiosity of those the breadth of the street away, and draw them nearer; retails a few jokes to create a laugh, and so, when his audience is gathered, he finds that he has committed himself, and cannot commence his prepared address, because twenty minutes or thereby of his time has been spent in drawing the audience together. His object is now to get through, and he gets through something after the way in which a fellow gets out of a labyrinth—with little encouragement on the part of his hearers and a great loss of self-respect on his own. The whole affair is most depressing; it is certainly distressing to the speaker, and is not creditable to the committee, who might easily have made better arrangements. But that same speaker finds himself at a meeting of a very different kind. At the place of meeting there is a large placard displayed intimating the object of the meeting, the name of the speaker and his subject, and challenging discussion. The members of the Band of Hope have been for an hour previously distributing tracts, leaving one in every house in the district, and inviting the inmates to the meeting. A choir is present, singing some beautiful temperance melodies. There is a platform, and chairs for chairman and speaker. Fifty members of the society are there to constitute the meeting, and the secretary and the members of committee are ready to welcome him. Let our readers pause for a moment and measure the effect of such careful preparations on the part of the committee on the feelings of the speaker. Of course his reputation is at stake: he must vindicate his claim to be worthy of such elaborate arrangements. But he knows what to expect from the committee; they are known and read among all open-air speakers, and these feel bound to make careful preparation. Our speaker, therefore, feels the stimulus of such an occasion, and ascends the platform under its power, and of course succeeds. The attention of his audience is rivetted from the first, he requires no forced jokes to attract their presence, and between speaker and audience the heartiest sympathy is manifest. They mark his points, and admire the beauty and wonder at the fertility of his illustrations, and applaud his eloquence to the very echo that doth applaud again. At the small meeting he made a double failure—failed to satisfy either his audience or himself; at the larger meeting his exertions culminated in a great oratorical triumph, in which the committee, no less than himself, had a share.

This is no fancy sketch—it is a pity that it is not. We could almost set down the names of those places where, if there is no change for the better, the same discouraging results will follow, and those other places where similar success may be expected. We will not. We hope that this summer there will be a heartier appreciation of open-air temperance advocacy, and that many a trophy will reward the efforts of those who engage in so laudable an enterprise.

In the hope and belief that there are many earnest temperance friends who would gladly be advised on the best way of making open-air meetings effective, we submit a general plan of arrangement which committees may adapt to suit their special circumstances, we believe that open-air meetings arranged for in harmony with it will rarely or ever fail. Of course as the weather is not under our control, we make our scheme quite independent of it.

When a talented speaker, or better still, a talented deputation, is invited or accepted, the arrangements should be, as nearly as possible, as follows:—

I. The meeting should be well advertised by posters, by drum, or by bell, and through the local newspaper.

II. The bills for the meeting should be widely posted, and a suitable tract left in every household in the district by the members of the Band of Hope.

III. If possible, the services of a choir should be obtained. Their programme should be confined to temperance songs.

IV. The reporters for the press should be invited to attend.

V. Let the meeting be held in the market or chief square, or some other equally conspicuous place, such as quay head or public park. A small movable platform, with a skeleton reading-desk, might gracefully supersede the antiquated kitchen chair. It might be large enough to hold a chair, which the chairman might occupy. The front might be formed of a board handsomely painted, and lettered with the name and objects of the society. If the platform was set out about two hours before the hour of meeting, it would attract and insure a large attendance.

VI. Let there be an attractive programme, speeches and music alternating.

VII. If the meeting is to be addressed by a deputation, three speeches of half an hour each will afford abundant material for thought. If there be one chief speaker, give him forty-five minutes; and the chairman's speech and another of fifteen minutes from a local celebrity will answer best.

VIII. Let there be at least fifty members of the society present at the opening of the meeting. This gives the meeting a standing at once.

IX. The secretary or a substitute should be present to take the names of any disposed there and then to take the pledge. He should furnish them with pledge cards at a moderate price.

Some friend should be enlisted to sell temperance literature; and should the speaker or the deputation bring literature to sell, the committee should pay them the graceful compliment of disposing of it for them, and settling up at the close of the proceedings.

We leave our subject and our scheme to the thoughtful consideration of our readers

“EVERY MAN IN HIS PLACE.”

THERE is a disposition on the part of the leaders of a movement to “rest and be thankful” after the achievement of a great victory and congratulate themselves upon their successful stratagems. This course would be all right were the enemy completely routed, every stronghold demolished, and all danger for the future averted.

We fear that many who distinguished themselves at the late parliamentary elections in connection with the temperance movement will be congratulating themselves upon the results obtained, and so far become satisfied that they will retire into the quiet of domestic life, forgetting that what has been done is simply the election of representatives to Parliament—to tabulate our strength, and place ourselves in a position to enter upon one of the most glorious crusades the world ever witnessed. The old war cry, “The sword of the Lord and of Gideon,” will have to be sounded throughout the temperance camp, and every true reformer must take his place and perform his duty to God, his country, and his fellows. It is only by determined and united action that our legislators will believe in our principles and policy. We expect those who have given their promise to vote on our side will be in their place, and do their duty, and they have an equal right to expect and demand that every temperance man will be in his place, and do his duty. Members of Parliament will only succeed when supported by temperance men outside. To retire at this critical juncture will be to betray our trust, weaken the powers of Members of Parliament, and play into the hands of the enemy. The traffickers have no idea of retiring from the field. They are formed into leagues and defence associations, and have proclaimed their policy in their Guardian “that with them it will be war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt.” Those who are time-servers—who veer round as the political, social, or ecclesiastical wind blows—who can accommodate themselves to any position or circumstance—who are able to bend or twist, ascend or descend just to suit the times, these persons had better retire, for the battle will be long and severe, and no quarter will be given to the enemy. Some cautious brother may remind us to be careful of our utterances and guarded in our movements. Another will offer the same advice as the town clerk at Ephesus, “Do nothing rashly.” To calm the fears of these timid souls, who are afraid of our revolutionary proclivities, we beg to say that we have no sympathy with mob-law or illegal measures; but we have sympathy with earnest, enthusiastic, devoted men. Do these cautious ones reason thus on any other subject? Some of them were running themselves almost out of breath the other day, to the astonishment of friends and foes, in their anxiety to secure the return of their favourite member to Parliament. Have they so soon outlived their usefulness that henceforth they are to be drags upon the wheels of our glorious car?

“Every man in his place” is the desideratum at the present time. Many persons hide themselves behind an organization, and by their membership and contributions believe they are doing all that is necessary for the overthrow of the liquor traffic. Their time and talents are employed in other directions, or they fritter away their precious lives in the pursuits of the pleasures of the world. Organizations are grand and powerful for consolidating and co-ordinating forces which might otherwise be incoherent and conflicting. But it is not numbers, influence, or wealth that is the strength of an organization, but the persistent efforts of each individual member.

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

The march of the Temperance Reformation has given no clearer indication of its leavening power than that recently furnished by the Times. In writing on the general elections, past and present, it prints:—“One comforting circumstance is pretty sure—if business will be impeded for a fortnight throughout the kingdom, the whole land will not be a scene of bacchanalian riot. That was the necessary accompaniment of a general election of the old type. Respectable people in every town drew 'bated breath until all was over, for they knew that a carnival had come in, in which, by established usage, rogues were free to do as they liked. Moralists looked forward to such a time with sorrow and distress, for they knew that drunkenness and debauchery would abound, and that the country paid a heavy price for the privilege of self-government. It is some satisfaction to know that such fears are now impossible.” How has such a gratifying anticipation on the part of the Times become possible? Our readers, we think, will agree with our answer, which simply is, that the law has backed up the temperance conviction that such drunken rowdyism was a disgrace to our free institutions.

The recent report of the Inland Revenue Commissioners informs us that in Ireland not fewer than 6,048 of the licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors are six-day licenses. In this respect Ireland compares favourably with England, where for a population nearly five times greater, only 6,866 licenses were of that character. While we have always held that the mere number of licenses does not measure the drunkenness of a neighbourhood, we just as strongly hold that the prohibition of the facilities for the sale and consumption of alcoholics measure the extent of suppression. In Ireland we anticipated great results from Sunday prohibition, and these results are known to the intelligent everywhere. But there is an important point in connection with the legal limitation of these facilities—that is that the arguments of the prohibitionists become greatly modified. The facts and figures which they were able to place before the community when they first drew attention to the evil are not sustained. "The Trade" sets its house in order. Many measures dealing with one or other of the salient evils of the traffic become law, and were it not that public opinion is grounded on immutable right and moral obligation, it might happen that the agitation might die, just because the wrong connected with the traffic was so greatly redressed as to render it unnecessary to continue it against evils which had become apparently so trifling. Mankind, however, when an evil has reached such a restricted stage look upon it as they do upon the annoyance of a gnat, and crush it altogether.

The Rev. Mr. Wagstaff, of the Temperance Worker, who writes occasionally for the Social Reformer, draws attention to an important provident fact, namely, the great sum wasted by abstainers who are members of provident clubs or friendly societies. In the famous instance of the Streatham Forrester's Lodge, he shows that during the years 1869 to 1875, in a membership of 1,080 there were 264 abstainers. On summing up the respective shares of the abstaining and non-abstaining members' drawings for sick pay, it was found that the abstainers contributed £124 11s. 2d. more to sick pay than they would have required to do had all in the club been abstainers. If this applies to every similar club in the kingdom, and we have no doubt it will, the amount sacrificed by abstainers to the drinking customs must be enormous. As regards insurance offices the same must hold good also, so that if there is to be reform in this direction it cannot happen too soon. If our Sons of Temperance and our Rechabites had more enterprise they might greatly accelerate such a reform.

That was an extraordinary purchase by Dr. Brodie of Liberton, near Edinburgh, the other day. He bought three dozen of unfermented wine by auction. The wine bears the name of Kramer & Strauss, a Rhine firm, and is certified by Dr. Stevenson M'Adam as being the pure and genuine juice of the grape. Dr. N. S. Kerr certifies that it is a genuine, pure, high-class wine, and that it is the finest and pleasantest wine he ever tasted. This is truly gratifying intelligence. We need to have a standard foreign wine of this kind. If once the public could believe that a pure, genuine, non-alcoholic and at the same time nutritious wine was purchasable; and if once the medical faculty lent their influence in its favour, and recommended it to their patients, I venture to believe that the liking of Britons for "fortified" wines would cease, and that, happily for the country, alcoholic wine tasting, with all its delusion and all its boasting, would be soon one of the unregretted lost arts of the age.

The publican is the same all the world over—generally characterised by a burning desire to feather his own nest. In Dunedin recently, when times were bad, an enterprising member of the trade conceived the business-like idea of reducing the price of his drinks, and thus having a large business and small profits rather than a small business and large profits that came so seldom as to barely pay expenses. Conceive of the disgust of the trade. It was as strong at this member as it was when grocers took to selling liquors, or when Gilbey & Co. announced that they were going in for an honest trade. First they ignored our enterprising friend; then they interviewed him, and were told to make the acquaintance of a certain gentleman who enjoys the hate and fear of the human race; then they asked the brewers to concuss him into the old prices; then they sulked, and said it would not do to sell four-penny drinks, forgetting that if it would not do the offender would soon have to stop. He is holding on, however; and though we cannot, and shall not, wish him success, yet his conduct lets in the light into that plundering of their customers which is so true of the liquor trade, which not only empties the purse, but often ruins both body and soul of their deluded customers.

It is about time that we had an amendment of the Poor Law, to the extent, at least, of popular election. The poor law guardians are not elected on proper grounds. They seem to be elected to grind the faces of the honest poor, and superintend the drifting scum of the liquor traffic. It was resolved the other day that the chairman of the Chesterfield Board of Guardians do sign a petition in favour of the Sunday closing of public-houses. A Mr. Linaere objected, as petitioning on such a subject was outwith the Board's consideration, but the Rev. Mr. Bolton reminded him that the public house question involved about three-quarters of the rates paid for the police and the poor. Just let each of 820 poor law boards in Scotland combine for the suppression of all traffic in alcoholic liquors, and with the consequent disappearance of the drink-caused pauper and the harshness of poor law administration, so far as the poor by the dispensation of providence is concerned, would pass away for ever.

"ONLY A GLASS OF CIDER."

It was only a glass of cider,
From the hands of a fair young girl!
How could he decline the kindness?
She would deem him a mannerless churl.
It was only a glass of cider,
But it kindled anew the flame
Which had burned up his noble manhood,
And left him in grief and shame.
He had broken away from the tempter;
He stood on the rock again;
No longer the penniless drunkard;
He stood a man among men,
When "only a glass of cider"
Threw open the gates again,
To a pathway of pain and sorrow—
To a death of hopeless pain.

"ON THE TOWERS OF LIFE."

BY REV. CHARLES WHEELER DENISON.
ON the towers of life, slow knelling,
Peals a solemn sound,
To the world in sadness telling
Of thousands in the cold, cold ground—
Telling of the hosts who perished
In the prime of day,
Hopes and joys once fondly cherished,
Swept like smoke away.
Peal, O mournful bells of childhood!
Peal the departed dear;
Yonder in the burial wild-wood
Sleep they many a year.
The tyrant of the cup betrayed them
With his cruel chains—
A pile of dust where pity laid them
All that now remains.
Life was theirs—its strength, its treasure,
Beaming bright and fair;
In the cup of sensual pleasure
They drank deep despair.
Near their tangled graves dark billows
Roll; death-murmurs by;
Dank above them weeping willows
For the lost ones sigh.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, MAY, 1880.

* * We have been compelled to leave over our usual summaries and other matter, but hope to overtake arrears next issue.

ELECTION literature is strewing the country like snow flakes the surface of some solitary path. The financial portion is quite a feast for reflection. How severely the politicians, from Gladstone at the top to some mere retailer of financial statistics at the bottom, treat the Government of Lord Beaconsfield for entering office with a surplus of six millions and leaving it with a deficit of eight millions sterling. Mr. Lowe informs us that the Liberal Government took off thirteen millions of taxation, paid thirty millions of debt, and left its successors a legacy of six millions to spend as they pleased. All this they did with a revenue of not more than seventy-two millions. But the Beaconsfield Government have raised the expenditure to eighty-three millions a year, imposed taxation to the extent of twenty millions stg., and left to its successors a legacy of debt of fully eight millions stg. The contrast is striking and painful, but, after all, what is the Beaconsfield Government extravagance to the terrible misexpenditure on drink? Take the figures as they stand, and they may be stated thus:—Ten millions extra yearly, twenty millions debt, or  $10 \times 6 + 20 = \text{£}80,000,000$ , or not nearly two-thirds of Britain's yearly drink bill. The nation has been spending on an average one hundred and forty millions yearly during the same period, or  $140 \times 6 = \text{£}840,000,000$ . We have no opinion here on the Beaconsfield expenditure. It may be gross or it may be just, but when we compare it with the nation's drink misexpenditure and compare the loud cry against the one resounding through the land with the culpable silence on the other, we are reminded of the expressive text about "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel."

With one exception—that of Orkney and Shetland—the elections of members of Parliament for Scotland are all over. The most ardent friends of temperance amongst us could hardly have anticipated anything like the results which have been attained. The hostile representation of Scotland has been diminished to six votes, while the favourable representation has been increased from 32 to 46: showing an increase of no less than 15 votes on a division. While the support to local option can rely on 46 votes, or fully three-fourths of the total Scotch parliamentary vote, the votes of those opposed to that principle and those who are neutral, taken together, only amount to 14 votes, not a third of the number returned as favourable, and less than a fourth of the whole parliamentary representation of Scotland. The general prospects of the agitation are exceedingly favourable: no less than about 250 active supporters and nearly 60 sympathisers being returned by the various constituencies in the three kingdoms to the new Parliament. If it has been possible to show progress in a Parliament under obligations to the intoxicating interest, what may not be expected from a Parliament pledged to peace retrenchment, and reform? We heartily congratulate the friends of the movement upon their arrival at the present advanced stage of the agitation, but we would at the same time urge upon them the necessity of continued efforts until the Government shall be compelled, by the growing power of their organized numbers, to enact a law calculated to suppress all traffic in those districts which show that a majority of the ratepayers and householders have decided against the sale of alcoholic liquors being longer carried on in their locality. That is our aim, that is only what can content us, and until we have that satisfaction there is no discharge from our patriotic warfare. We believe that the splendid results of the general election will nerve us all to yet greater labours until, at no distant day, our warfare shall be accomplished, and peace and plenty will shed their choicest blessings on our beloved people, no longer injured and endangered by either the sale or the consumption of alcoholic drugs.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION AND THE GENERAL ELECTION.

THE following resolutions have been adopted by the Executive of this Association:—

I.—That the Executive hail with feelings of profound satisfaction the gratifying results of the general election, which has terminated so signally in favour of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement as to justify the anticipation that special legislation for the evils of the liquor traffic in Scotland may be reasonably looked for from the Parliament now elected.

II.—That the Executive record their high appreciation of the efforts put forth by the various Scottish Temperance Organizations to promote the return of Parliamentary candidates favourable to Local Option; and tender them, and also all who individually laboured for the same end, their most grateful thanks for their invaluable services.

III. That the Executive, convinced that the substantial results to the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement accruing from the general election are due to vigorous efforts at electoral organization on the part of friends of that movement, would most earnestly urge the continuance of these efforts, so that in future electoral contests, only those candidates in full sympathy with their views may be returned to Parliament.

IV.—That the Executive cordially congratulate Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., upon his return to Parliament, and on the election of so many members to the House of Commons pledged to support him in his philanthropic efforts to secure the passage of a law vesting ratepayers with the efficient control of the liquor traffic.

V.—That the Executive thankfully acknowledge the blessing of Almighty God on their labours, and record their deep conviction that he has been graciously pleased to overrule the recent general election for the present advantage and speedy triumph of the great temperance reformation.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

THE Scottish people are not aroused on frivolous pretexts. They have, on the contrary, laid themselves open on many occasions to the charges of stolidity and want of enthusiasm. When once they are aroused, they keep so a long time. During the political ferment, now at length at a close, they seem to have been at fever heat. They have scarcely had room in these capacious brains of theirs for aught save the general election, and I fear that even Sabbath, for which they have justly so great a regard, has not always been given up to the services of the sanctuary, to devout meditation, or to the catechising of the household. There is no disguising the fact that on some one or other of the byepast Sabbath days in Scotland, election intelligence was being circulated with the celerity and the vehemence which characterised "the fiery cross." They were terribly in earnest. Men on the verge of the grave crept to the polling booth, and died marking their ballot paper; the sick, the halt, the maimed were carried from their couches to record their votes; the very deaf and dumb exercised their franchise; the Jew, notwithstanding the great sanctity of the passover, came to the booth to add one vote at least to the great Liberal majority, the Gentile gladly marking his voting slip for him. Women wore party colours, the red and blue, or blue and buff, setting off the charms of many a pretty face, looking none the worse for the excitement that marked the play of their handsome and interesting features. The children were going about with party favours, in procession, with extemporised bands of musicians, whose discordant sounds might well be excused, seeing that even Handel himself might fail to draw harmony and melody from brass whistles, bones, and tin pans. The dogs themselves took sides. We have seen a dog painted red, and having to all appearance great pride in the distinction. At one of the polling booths, two dogs, whose masters happened to be on different sides, came to close quarters, and had at length to be separated by the police, not, however, until it was obvious that blue had come to grief. The mind of Scotland was fairly roused, her blood was fairly up, and a long time will elapse before the most memorable of general elections will be forgotten.

THE DISSOLUTION.

It is not in our province, and certainly far from our intention, to chronicle the conflict between Liberal and Conservative. We leave that to the party journals; the Social Reformer must not be involved in the complications or implications of party politicians. The appeal to the country came upon the country with something of a surprise; but as both parties had been expecting a dissolution for some time, they were not unprepared: both were looking forward to being called upon to express at the polling their verdict on the Beaconsfield administration. The Government supporters pointed to the compact majority which they could always command on a division, to the tone of the London press and to the bye-elections, which seemed on the whole in their favour. The Opposition maintained that the country and the Government were at variance on the latter's foreign policy, its neglect of domestic legislation, and financial extravagance. Yet contrary to general expectation, the Parliament had been opened, and Her Majesty's speech led to the belief that there would be a busy session; but hardly had Her Majesty's faithful Commons set themselves earnestly to work, ere the Premier announced a dissolution. The ninth Parliament of our Sovereign Lady came therefore to a somewhat inglorious end. It has been said of it that it came in with beer, and that it has gone out with water. The verdict of the country, which Lord Beaconsfield asked for, has gone against him, and as we write, office and power are in the hands of the Liberals. We hope that that power will enable the new Government to deal vigorously with the evils of the liquor traffic.

AT THE DISSOLUTION.

It may interest our readers to be reminded of the attitude of honourable members representing Scotland at the dissolution. Scotland, for Parliamentary purposes, is divided into fifty-six constituencies. The counties return 32 members, the burghs 26, and the universities 2—total, 60 members. On 5th March last, one-half the county representation voted and paired on the Local Option resolution, 9 for and 7 against; 22 of the 26 burgh members voted for it, and not one against it; the universities gave 1 vote in favour, and none against it, so that we had 9 county and 22 burgh members, and 1 university member, being 32 in all in favour of Local Option; 7 county members voted against, and 1 university, 16 county and 4 burgh, members were absent. Of the 60 members at the dissolution, 11 retired, and, with one exception, did not seek re-election:—Lord Douglas Gordon, since elected for an English constituency; J. F. Leith, E. Jenkins, J. F. Harrison, J. Maitland, R. Vaas Agnew, R. Montgomerie, Captain J. Hope Johnston, Hon. W. Watson (Lord Advocate), Sir R. Anstruther, and E. Ellice. Our grateful wishes, which we firmly believe our readers share, go with Messrs. Leith, Jenkins, and Maitland on their retirement. Their services, both in Parliament and in the country will not be readily forgotten. As to those who opposed our movement, or stood aloof, and left its supporters to struggle on against the beer interest when they might have afforded valuable aid, we have frankly to express our gratification that the House of Commons, that knew them once, is to know them again no more.

There are those who have been rejected now to account for. We heartily rejoice that the Hon. R. B. Hamilton, Sir William Cunningham, Bart.; Sir G. G. Montgomery, Bart.; Sir W. Edmonstone, Bart.; and Mr. James Yeaman, have been, to use a sea phrase well known to the Admiral, condemned "to walk the plank." It must have added bitterness to their defeat to find how impotent the beer interest was on their behalf. Lord Dalkeith, Sir Wyndham Anstruther, Bart., and Colonel Moray, would not assist the interest of Local Option, although professing as ardent desires for its success as any of its adherents. They claimed, in short, to be temperance reformers, yet they did not think the sphere for showing their sympathy for it was the House of Commons. Well, let them use their enforced leisure in behalf of the great temperance reform; the harvest is truly great, and the labourers few. We express our hearty sorrow at the exclusion of Mark J. Stewart, C. Dalrymple, and Sir G. S. Douglas, who shared the general defeat of their party. They voted for us, and have a claim on our sympathy and regret. It will be seen then that 11 retired and 11 were rejected, making 22; 38 have been re-elected or returned unopposed. Four members have been returned with no change in their hostile attitude to Local Option; these are Lord Elcho, D. Cameron, R. W. Duff, and A. Orr Ewing. They are reinforced by Dr. Campbell and Sir H. Maxwell, the newly-elected members for Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities, and Wigtownshire respectively. All told these will but fill a first-class railway carriage, and only amount to one-tenth of the Parliamentary representation of Scotland. There are also four representatives who meantime intend to maintain a neutral attitude:—Marquis of Stafford, Sir G. M. Grant, Bart., Sir T. E. Colebrooke, Bart., and Col. Alexander. Still these groups of retired, rejected, hostile, and neutral representatives only amount to the one-half of the representation. The other half, we rejoice to state, have been returned, some unopposed, the rest by considerable majorities. The following were unopposed:—Sir A. H. Gordon, Bart., D. M'Laren, J. Cowan, J. W. Barclay, C. F. M'Intosh, A. Grant, Rt. Hon. W. E. Baxter, W. Holms, A. Mathieson, and J. Pender. The solitary member who was, although hostile to Local Option, returned unopposed is R. W. Duff.

We welcome with pleasure the entrance of several new members whose views are in harmony with the objects of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. Dr. Farquharson, representing West Aberdeenshire; Capt. Campbell of Craigie, the chosen of the Ayr burghs; E. Marjoribanks, for Berwickshire; T. Russell, for Buteshire; R. Jardine, for Dumfriesshire; F. Henderson and G. Armitstead, for Dundee; R. T. Middleton, for the City of Glasgow; J. Dick Peddie, for the Kilmarnock burghs; Capt. Maxwell, for the Stewartry; Major Hamilton, for South Lanarkshire; D. Currie, for Perthshire; Hon. A. Elliot, for Roxburghshire; S. Williamson, for the St. Andrew burghs; J. C. Bolton, for Stirlingshire; and J. M'Laren, for the Wigtown burghs.

We have to express our regret that a number of friends who would have gladly voted for us in Parliament, failed to succeed. There was J. W. Burns, who failed to oust A. O. Ewing, J. B. Balfour, who was unsuccessful in North Ayrshire; Viscount Dalrymple, who did not succeed in Wigtownshire; and his brother, the Hon. N. de C. Dalrymple, who was defeated in South Ayrshire; T. R. Buchanan, who did not succeed in Haddingtonshire; and the same has to be said of Sir T. M'Kenzie, who contested Inverness-shire. Mr. Cuthbertson owed it more to his politics than to Local Option that he is not the elected of the Kilmarnock Burghs, and this is what may be said of Sir James Bain, who failed to secure a seat for Glasgow.

We rejoice to add that all the 5 members of Mr. Gladstone's Government who held Scotch seats—Rt. Hon. W. E. Baxter, H. Campbell-Bannerman, M. E. G. Duff, Dr. Lyon Playfair, and G. O. Trevelyan, have been again returned.

One of the best features in this election was, to our mind, the number of constituencies where there was no local option issue before the electors, owing to both parties having brought forward local option candidates. The following constituencies were in this position:—Wigtown burghs, with J. M'Laren and Mr. J. Stewart; Kilmarnock burghs, with J. Dick Peddie and J. N. Cuthbertson; Buteshire, with T. Russell and C. Dalrymple; Roxburghshire, with Hon. A. Elliot and Sir G. S. Douglas; Falkirk burghs, with J. Ramsay and Capt. M'Aggart; Kincardineshire, with Sir G. Balfour, K.C.B., and D. Sinclair; Kirkcaldy burghs, with Sir G. Campbell and C. Scott; and Kirkcudbrightshire, with Capt. H. Maxwell and Murray Stewart. In these eight constituencies the publicans were ignored by the agents of both political parties, while the candidates were equally eager to represent the great drink prohibitory interest. This is as it should be, and as we firmly believe it will be, when our friends are prepared to assign the first place on their political programme to our question. It is highly important that when they are put to it, local optionists should make a vigorous and successful effort to return a candidate in favour of the local option veto; but it is supremely so that they should be victorious in any event by manifesting such numbers and organisations as will determine party agents to bring no candidate into the field who is adverse to, or unsympathetic with local option. Having all candidates right on their question, they can fight out the battle on any other issue they please, knowing that success will in any result perch upon their banners. These eight constituencies are, to our minds, the premier constituencies in the recent general election, and we hope will be an example which every constituency will be eager to follow.

We append a list of all the successful candidates for

Scotch Parliamentary seats with their attitude to the local option veto. (See next page.)

From a comparison with that table, and the tables recently published in the Social Reformer, the following summary is drawn. It appears that as regards honourable members there—

THE UNITED KINGDOM.

The Alliance News furnishes a gratifying list of members elected to the new Parliament, amounting to 248 honourable members, who will follow Sir Wilfrid Lawson to the lobby on the next division he takes on his Local Option Resolution. Of these 148 have already been there with him, and, having been returned, are prepared for a second excursion there. In addition to the 248 we have 57 who are in sympathy with the principle embodied in the resolution, making 305, or within 21 only of the half of the Commons Parliamentary representation.

THE PUBLICANS.

How does the publicans stand at this election? They do not stand—they have been overthrown. Their great chief, Mr. Wheelhouse, has been rejected by nearly 12,000 votes. No less than 80 of his followers, the friends of beer interest, bite the dust. Among them, all brewers, are:—S. C. Allsopp, Stafford East; Henry Allsopp, Worcester East; Sir Gilbert Greenall, Bart., Warrington; J. T. Agg Gardner, Cheltenham; Sir A. E. Guinness, Dublin City; A. W. Hall, Oxford; Pickering Phipps, Northampton; W. B. Simonds, Winchester; Daniel Thwaites, Blackburn; Robert Tennant, Peterborough; Edward Wells, Wallingford; T. K. Sanderson, Wakefield, maltster. The following failed to get seats:—G. H. Allsopp, Droitwich, brewer; H. Bell, Stockport, brewer; J. R. Haig, Blackmannan, distiller; F. Seager Hunt, Marylebone, brewer; A. G. Sandeman, Reading, wine merchant; W. H. Worthington, Tamworth, brewer, and many others.

The public press have been keen observers of the conduct of the "trade," and have weighed their influence with scrupulous exactness. The result is damaging to the "great" intoxicating interest. They put in the late Government, and never fowl cackled over its egg as they cackled over that political achievement, and despite the warnings of some of their best friends they tried their little game once more, and as it has proved once too often, the Press has set itself to examine into their real weight and influence, and it gives us pleasure to lay the opinions as to the result of one or two influential journals before our readers:—

Not the least satisfactory feature of this election is that the Liberals have triumphed in the teeth of the fiercest opposition of the publicans. There seemed at one time a danger of the political life of England being dominated by the influences which emanate from the pothouse. That fear no longer exists. The publicans have done their worst, and have been smitten hip and thigh. The Liberals will now be in a position to grapple firmly with the licensing and kindred questions.—Christian World.

THE PUBLICANS AND THE GENERAL ELECTION.

One thing is clear, and that is that the "interests" which affected to be "harrassed" in 1874, and still hold themselves aggrieved, have less influence on the popular vote than they seemed disposed to credit themselves with. It was confidently said that the publicans would control the elections, and that the publicans were on the side of the Conservatives. It is now clear either that the publicans were not united, or were not Conservative, or that they had far less influence than has hitherto been supposed. The fact is that interests, whether harrassed or not, are commonly weakened by division, even where they are not swamped in the numbers of those who do not share them, or do not care for them. A coalition of interests may control an election, but a single interest, even that of the publicans, is clearly much less formidable than it claims to be. All reasonable men must rejoice that this should be the case. A publican's vote in itself is, of course, as good as that of any other citizen, whether it is given on one side or the other; but if it is given in defence of a supposed interest, and irrespective of political sympathies, it is not amiss that he who gives it should learn that, however powerful his class may be, the people at large is more powerful than any class whatever.—Times, April 5.

The friends of the temperance cause, for example, are largely reinforced in the new House of Commons, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson will have no mean following in future at his back. It is calculated that very nearly one-half of the members elected on this occasion are favourable to the principle of Local Option. The brewing interest, on the other hand, has sustained about as grave a repulse at the polling booth as the fighting interest. The "three jolly Allsopps," whom Mr. Gladstone has immortalised, have all disappeared into obscurity, in company with Sir Arthur Guinness, the prince of Dublin brewers; Sir G. Greenall, of Warrington; Mr. Daniel Thwaites, of Blackburn; and that voluble advocate of the interests of "the trade," Mr. Wheelhouse, of Leeds. Never, probably, has a greater mistake been made by those who pretend to gauge the temper of the nation by the feeling of a section of the people of London than when they came to the conclusion that the country would submit to be dictated to by the beer interest. Jingo was a bad pilot to be guided by, but Bang was still worse, and when the two allied their forces their overthrow was only a question of time and opportunity.—North British Daily Mail.

THE LIQUOR TRADE AND THE ELECTIONS.

The officials of the liquor trade are anxious to explain their recent action, and to deprecate any restrictive legislative action. Mr. Copeman, of the Beer and Wine Trade Defence Association, protests that they did not blindly advise an undivided support to the Conservative party, and that if the prominent leaders of the Liberal party will discountenance fresh onslaughts upon "the trade," they will be glad to get rid of the necessity for combining in electoral matters. Mr. George Candlet, the Parliamentary agent of the Licensed Victuallers' National Defence League, who certainly did much in some northern towns to restrain "the trade" from doing as they did in London, also comes forward to make it appear that "the trade" combination was not nearly so general as the public suppose. He points to Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's letter of advice to the publicans, which advice he declared was largely adopted and acted upon, and he ventures to hope that the Liberal party will avoid legislation of an extreme and hostile character. We gladly note the sobered tone of the official representatives of the trade. When Mr. E. Clarke, ex-M.P. for Southwark, was returned, the licensed victuallers exulted over it as a trade victory. They threatened to produce like results in every metropolitan constituency. They met in each burgh some hundreds strong, and in every case they resolved to use their utmost exertions in support of the Tory candidates, though, as in Hackney and Finsbury there were only single Tory candidates, they were sufficiently impartial to determine which of the two Liberal candidates should be allowed to occupy the second seat. They did their worst and they failed. We doubt if there were fifty public-houses or beer shops in all London that even exhibited a Liberal placard. In most of the principal constituencies the great majority of the trade went for the Tories. The trade staked everything upon the success of the Tories, and the Tories have failed. We warned them against this months ago.—The Echo.

N.B.—We would venture to suggest to our readers that they carefully look over the Advertising Columns of the Social Reformer month by month. We believe these will repay a careful examination, as many excellent articles are always being offered through them to their notice.

INTELLIGENCE.

AN AID TO TEMPERANCE.—249 of the 1,009 members who joined the Victoria Assurance Society have joined its temperance section.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS' ACT.—The Gloucester Quarter Sessions granted a license to a retreat for habitual drunkards at Stroud last month. This is the first license of the kind granted.

A bill to provide for levying a £1 license on tobacconists for the closing of their shops on Sunday has been laid before the St. Heliers' States, Jersey. Will the English Chancellor of the Exchequer take the hint about the license duty?

SCOTTISH RAILWAYS TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—The first annual soiree of this Society took place in Glasgow on 26th March, under the presidency of Mr. John McGavin, and was a great success. Two hundred and forty members had been enrolled, inclusive of 46 clerks, 33 engine-drivers, 25 firemen, 15 station-masters, 16 porters, 8 signalmen, 6 pointsmen, and 6 goods guards.

TEMPERANCE BEVERAGES.—The principal of the laboratory of the Inland Revenue Department believes that there is a growing demand for these drinks, but does not think that they will ever come into anything like general use. Perhaps that is because there is nothing in them to create thirst, which is the secret of the popularity and success of alcoholic liquors.

"THE SOCIAL REFORMER." Glasgow: R. Mackay, 30 Hope Street.—This monthly number concludes the fourteenth volume of this publication. It is well conducted in every respect, and the promoters of the temperance cause have in it a most faithful organ. We observe from an article in it that there are nine parishes in the Stewartry where the liquor traffic in the shape of a public-house does not exist.—Kirkcudbrightshire Advertiser.

DECREASE IN LIQUOR CONSUMPTION.—It seems that bad times and temperance combined are decreasing the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors. The following information will gratify our readers:—There was a decrease in spirits of 1,422,064 gallons, a decrease of 897,786 gallons of foreign spirits, a decrease of 1,327,202 gallons of foreign wines, and a decrease of 7,323,467 bushels of malt, or of 14,646,934 barrels of beer in 1879, as compared with 1878. This is good news.

THE LICENSING COURTS.—The Spring Licensing Sessions took place last month. There was the same diversity of action. In some places there was a decrease. This appears to have been the case in Greenock, Aberdeen, Forfar, Hamilton, Hawick, Irvine, &c. In most other places the number of licenses are about the same, or there is a slight increase. Those who have faith in the Licensing Magistrates becoming temperance reformers should have had their faith shaken as year by year nothing materially is done in the way of reduction.

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—Messrs. S. Finlayson and J. Spence have been holding largely attended meetings, under the auspices of the League, in South Uist, Beubecla, and North Uist. Much good is expected to result from these meetings. The temperance movement is in a most flourishing state in North Uist, where Mr. Donald Stewart, evangelist, one of the directors of the League, labours with much success. Between 300 and 400 persons are said to have signed the pledge. There are also very encouraging signs of spiritual growth under Mr. Stewart's preaching.—Ross-shire Journal.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD'S COMMITTEE ON TEMPERANCE AND PUBLIC MORALS.—1. That, in the judgment of the Committee it is the duty of the members of the church, in view of a General Election, to ascertain the opinion of candidates on such measures as may tend to abate the evils of intemperance, from which the country is suffering to a lamentable extent, and to support the candidates favourable to such measures. 2. That, while admitting the importance and desirableness of proposals for amending the liquor laws and conferring on the ratepayers a greater measure of control over the whole licensing system, the Committee is desirous of fixing the earnest attention of the church on two practical measures, which, in their opinion, may be secured through the hearty co-operation of temperance reformers. These are the closing of public-houses at an hour earlier than eleven o'clock P.M.—say ten o'clock meantime—and the extension to England and Wales of a Sunday Closing Act. 3. That, in the matter of the "Contagious Diseases Acts (Women)" of 1866 and 1869, the only proposal that can be entertained by the church is total and immediate repeal, and on this ground the Committee recommends that prudent measures should be taken for securing the election of members of Parliament favourable to the repeal of said Acts.—By order of Committee, JOHN RANKINE, Convener. United Presbyterian College, Edinburgh, March 24th, 1880.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON'S LATEST.—"He had nothing whatever to say to his Tory competitor, Mr. Mattinson. He hoped they would give him a fair hearing; he is an able and rising young man. He (Sir Wilfrid) had been told that he has a legitimate and laudable aspiration some day to attain to the woolsack. (Laughter.) His advice to those that listened to him was to let him go somewhere else for his wool and you the electors of Carlisle can give him the sack." (Much laughter and loud cheers.) They did that right heartily by putting him at the bottom of the poll, the numbers being—Ferguson, 2,802; Lawson, 2,691; Mattinson, 1,968.

LICENSING DIFFICULTIES.—Baillie Scott, as senior magistrate of Glasgow, presided at the Licensing Sessions there on 13th ultimo, and thus tersely summed up the work that had to be done:—The court would then adjourn for a week, and the parties who would be desired to be then present would be warned by the police. The adjourned cases would include persons who already held licenses and had applied for other licensed houses; of that class there were 5 public-houses and 1 grocer—6 in all. Of presently unlicensed applicants for licensed houses there were 47—2 hotels, 32 public-houses, and 13 grocers. There were also 6 public-house dealers and 2 grocers to be dealt with, who had been fined. Besides there were a great many who came under the miscellaneous category—those who had received permission, or been instructed to make alterations on their premises; those who had made alterations without permission; those who had a door or doors to their premises without permission; those who had badly conducted their business, although they had not been convicted; those who were intemperate, and who should not be licensed to conduct spirit-dealing licenses; those hotel-keepers who had not conducted their business properly on the Sundays, though no convictions had been obtained; those who kept objectionable "free and easies," and who had rooms unfit for accommodation of a number of persons; those who kept billiard-tables, and the conduct of whose houses was objectionable; and those who had received intimation from the Procurator-Fiscal that intoxicated persons had been seen leaving their premises.

PROFESSOR BLACKIE AT THE CITY HALL, GLASGOW.—On Saturday, the 10th ultimo, the Glasgow Abstainers' Union concert was under the immediate patronage of this distinguished Scotchman, and was crowded in every part. Mr. Lindsay, the president, having appropriately introduced him, he was, on rising, loudly cheered. Silence being restored, he said:—I came here because I don't like to be out of the element of Scottish song. Neither have I any objection to the element of cold water. Whether taken inside, as by total abstainers, or outside, I believe it to be most healthy, a most strengthening, and a most robust institution. (Laughter and cheers.) But I am not here to say anything about total abstainers. I can only say I have a great admiration for all who practice that transcendental virtue—(hear, hear)—though I am too weak and too human to practice it myself. I may say, however, it is a most orthodox virtue, and founded upon that text—"If thy right eye offend thee pluck it out and cast it from thee, and if thy right hand offend thee, pluck it off and cast it from thee; it is better to lose your one eye and one hand than that your whole body should be cast into hell fire." Now, I say nothing more utterly ruins both soul and body than drink—(cheers)—and it is far better to deny yourself wine, or a thousand other things, than fall a victim to that most beastly of all beastly and truly contemptible vices which is the disgrace of Scotland. (Great cheering.)

RIGHT HON. MR. GLADSTONE ON LOCAL OPTION.—Great dissatisfaction was felt by certain earnest Prohibitionists in Midlothian with the right hon. gentleman's speech. The result was a meeting on 31st March, when it was decided to memorialize him on his attitude to local option, and meanwhile recommend him to the vote and support of the electors. The memorial is a somewhat lengthy document, but we reproduce the following most pertinent portion:—"Without entering into details, may I ask you to say whether you would promote or support such a provision as the appointment of county boards, embracing representations of the ratepayers who should be entrusted with the necessary power for enabling them to deal effectively with the liquor traffic. May I request the favour of a reply at your earliest convenience.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

"JAMES BUCHANAN, Chairman.

"To the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone."

The following is Mr. Gladstone's reply:—

"Dalmany Park, Edinburgh, April 2, 1880.

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your considerate letter. You will I am sure bear in mind my declaration in November at Dalkeith, covering all questions alike, without special reference to any, that I could give no pledges as to what I should do, without knowing the circumstances under which I might be called upon to do it; but could only state the principles on which I should proceed, and point by way of interpretation to acts which I had done. In the important instance of the subject you bring before me, I adhere, without qualification, to my declaration at Dalkeith, and to show that I have no aversion to legislative provision for granting under suitable considerations a control in inhabitants over the action of the liquor laws, I point unhesitatingly to the bill introduced by Mr. Bruce, now Lord Aberdare, on behalf of the late Cabinet, and therefore on my behalf. As to the particular form of applying a principle, I must, of course, take advantage of all experience since obtained, but as to the principle itself I think you will find this reference perfectly unequivocal.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

"W. E. GLADSTONE.

"To James Buchanan, Esq."

This letter was immediately submitted to the friends, who, after consideration, accepted it as satisfactory, and resolved that Mr. Gladstone should now receive the undivided support of the temperance party, and Mr. J. H. Waterston was instructed at once to visit the various districts of the county, so as to secure early and united action. The polling took place on Monday—our friends all over working with a will. The result was as follows:—

Gladstone, ... ..	1,579

Majority for Gladstone, ... 211

A QUERY.—What is it that has three feet but no legs, is all body but no limbs, has no toes on its feet, no head, moves a great deal, but never uses its feet for the purpose, has one foot at each end and the other in the centre of its body? This is a queer creature in some respects, and is very popular with all the ladies, and some men. It never walks out, but goes with one foot where its head might be, dragging the farther end behind. These feet have nails but no toes, no heels and no bones in the foot? A yard measure.

PUBLIC PRESS.

The Rev. J. Colwell states that he began his work as a Wesleyan minister at Ashton. He entered the ministry not as an abstainer but as one of those more respectable individuals—a moderate drinker—but the moment he became engaged in his work in this district he found it was impossible for him to do it consistently and effectually without washing his hands of all participation in the drinking customs of the country, and before he had been in this circuit six months he signed the temperance pledge, and had kept it from that time until now. (Cheers.)

The great curse of the drinking habits of our people is the havoc they make with homes. They make a husband's arm a weapon to strike instead of a shield to protect, and a father's knee a place for outraged purity to shun instead of a throne for happy infancy to climb. They destroy the sweet relationships of life and make women into widows while their husbands live, and children orphans though their sires survive. Every movement to make and keep men sober is a demonstration to drown the yell of the beast in the voice that is human, and to bring back its sanctity to the altar, its beauty to the home, her joy to the wife, her support to the mother, its hope to the child, his truth to the husband, his love to the father, and his honour to the man.—From Arthur Mursell's Lecture on "Cups and Saucers."

THE REVENUE RETURNS AND THE BUDGET.—The remarks of the Daily News on the temperance phase are worthy of remembrance. One great falling off in revenue will be read of with various feelings by different classes of persons. The income derived from the duty on spirits has been greatly reduced. It is probable that the reduction is partly owing to the general depression among the employing classes, and the consequent distress among the employed. But we may surely hope also, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested, that it is in some manner to be attributed to the growth of habits of sobriety. This would seem to be the more probable, seeing that, although the returns from the malt duty have fallen off, there has been no decrease in the consumption of tea and coffee. We do not wish to appear sanguine, but it does perhaps appear not wholly impossible that a time may be coming when it will be less necessary to quarrel over Permissive Bills, and to endeavour to define the meaning of Local Option. Lord Derby said that we drank ourselves out of the Alabama difficulty. The increase in the spirit duties soon paid off the claims. We have not drunk ourselves out of the cost of the Zulu War. That expense remains to be met out of other sources. The Morning Advertiser, which is the special organ of the licensed victuallers, makes the following remarks on the subject of the Grocers' Wine and Spirit Bill, as quoted in the case of the death of the late Fanny M'Lean:—"These figures speak for themselves. This we do not hesitate to say, that private drinking, which has been stimulated to an enormous extent by the facilities afforded by the grocers' licenses, and which is now absolutely unchecked, that calls most loudly for more perfect regulations; and these it is in Lord Hartington's power to aid in passing through Parliament without damaging a trade, and with great advantage to the public."

ON CANVASSING.—The Saturday Review, on writing down this political mode, prints:—"Another difficulty to be contended with, and one against which it will be well to be prepared, is the man with a crotchet. He is a teetotaler, or an anti-vaccinator, or flogging in the army is his particular antipathy, and upon one or other of these hobbies his entire political energies are concentrated. Your feeble protestations in favour of temperance, or your general declarations against persecution and cruelty, serve rather to excite than appease him. He will have a pledge or nothing; he demands the immediate suppression of the class or practice to which he objects, and unless you are prepared to join him in a Parliamentary crusade against publicans, or doctors, or the cat, your eloquent remarks on Imperial interests and European policy are wholly lost."

AN ILLUSTRATION.—A working-man at Manchester recently made a very effective temperance address in the public square. In his hands he held a loaf of bread and a knife. The loaf of bread represented the wages of the working-man. After a few introductory remarks he cut off a moderate slice. "This," he said, "is what you give to the city government;" then, with a vigorous flourish of his carving-knife, he cut off three-quarters of the whole loaf. "This," he said, "you give to the brewer." By this time only a thin slice remained. He set aside the greater portion of this to the "Public House," and left only a few crumbs; "and this you keep to support yourselves and your family."—Advance.

AN UNERRING MARKSMAN.—"Whisky never misses fire," said a man to us the other day. No; it never does. It is sure to bring down its victim sooner or later, whether he be high or low in the social or intellectual scale. And fluttering all about him will always be the wounded hearts of mother, father, wife, children, sisters, brothers, and friends, while behind and beyond all this is too often a trail of ruined virtue and contaminating influences. At least six hearts on an average carry a life-long, overshadowing, dreary sorrow for every victim alcohol brings down. The undertone of all family and social life is largely silent sorrow and dreary heartache over the victims of alcohol. No; whisky never misses fire, never.—Advance.

A JUDGE'S OPINION.—The Emerson (Manitoba) News of the 13th March says—"Chief-Justice Wood would make a good temperance lecturer. In his charge to the Grand Jury he said—"I shall not dwell upon the evils flowing from the use of intoxicating liquors. It has destroyed—is destroying—more lives than war, pestilence, and famine. It not only shatters the casket, it destroys the jewel within. It kills beyond the tomb! The slimy trail of the serpent may be traced even over the virgin soil of Manitoba. It not only disrobes its victims of manhood, but demoralises and brutalises his whole nature. It casts over the land a dark and sinister shadow, it spreads over the face of the country a dark flood, on the turbid bosom of which float in wild confusion, ruined fortunes, wrecked hopes, blasted reputations, bursting sighs, and broken hearts."

THE CONSIDERATIONS THAT SHOULD WEIGH.

SIR,—We are told that as often as a jug is taken to the public-house to carry a pint of beer home, twopence is spent. Twopence a day in a year amounts to £3 6s. 10d., which, with compound interest, would in twenty years come to £100 6s. If the jug is filled twice a day with a pint of beer, fourpence is spent. Fourpence a day is equal to £6 1s. 8d. a year, which, with interest, would in twenty years amount to £200 12s. But supposing that the jug is sent three times a day for a pint of beer, costing twopence each visit, we are told that the 6d. a day would amount to £9 2s. 6d. a year, which, in twenty years, would reach, with compound interest, to £300 18s. This sum would buy many a working man a tidy two-room-and-kitchen house to stay in. This is a good economical argument, but it might easily be met in England, though rarely in Scotland, by the statement that, though costly, beer was indispensable to the health and comfort of the drinker. Now, let me add to this argument a consideration that should weigh with the drinker. If he reflected that every time he drinks his pint of table-beer he pours a teaspoonful of poisonous spirit into his blood; that every time he drank a pint of ale he pours two tablespoonfuls of alcohol into his blood; that every time he consumes four glasses of "fortified" wine, he pours one glass of alcoholic poison into his blood; that every time he takes two glasses of rum, brandy, or gin into his system, he is simply contaminating his blood with a glassful of alcohol—he must feel, if the instinct of self-preservation belongs to him, that he is in danger of doing an irretrievable injury to his frame, so fearfully and wonderfully made. These are the considerations that should weigh, and will weigh, with every man and woman of judgment. The drink, whether ignorantly or deliberately partaken, will work according to its own laws, and the mode of its operation is always tending to the injury and, if persisted in, to the destruction of the subject of its action. He who persists, in the light of its nature, which is in the present day so clear and so greatly diffused, sins against his own soul, and the soul that sinneth it shall die.—I am, &c.,

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

360 DUMBARTON ROAD,
GLASGOW, April 16th, 1880.

DEAR SIR,—At our first quarterly business meeting we shall, funds permitting, engage one or two Gaelic-speaking lecturers. This is absolutely necessary if Highlanders are to have the benefit and blessing of temperance. I regret to say, however, that our funds are anything but encouraging; but believing that many friends of the good cause in which we are engaged need only a hint, we appeal to such to aid us financially, so that we may be enabled to prosecute the work with energy and success. Apologizing for thus troubling you, I am, yours faithfully,

S. FINLAYSON, Secy.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE FUNDS.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the representatives of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 15th Feb. to 10th April inclusive. During that period 136 meetings took place—19 being deputation and 117 ordinary. At these meetings 176 addresses were given.

The following is a summary of each speaker's work: Mr. William Blackwood has been at Lerwick, Kirkwall, Inverness, Aberdeen, Gourdon, and Stonehaven, and delivered 34 addresses.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has been at Stow, Melrose, Denholm, Edinburgh, Leith, Dunse, Kinross, Milnathort, Darnick, Hawick, Langholm, Polmont, Avonbridge, Gorebridge, and Selkirk, and delivered 33 addresses.

Mr. R. Stevenson has been at Lanark, Cumbernauld, Mearns, Paisley, Largs, Glasgow, Cardsyke, Stenhousemuir, Dailly, Maybole, Girvan, and Hamilton, and delivered 27 addresses.

Mr. R. Dransfield has been at Largs, Campbeltown, Glasgow, and Paisley, and delivered 17 addresses.

Mr. Charles Bent has been at Kilsyth, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, Barrhead, Campbeltown, and Bonhill, and delivered 14 addresses.

Mr. R. Mackay has delivered 10 addresses in Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Greenock.

James Torrens, Esq., J.P., has given 5 addresses in Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Kinross.

Baillie Selkirk has given 4 addresses in Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Kinross.

Mr. James Winning has given 2 addresses in Aberdeen.

Captain Brochie has given 2 addresses at Hamilton and Greenock.

Mr. R. Adams has given 2 addresses in Aberdeen.

Mr. Wm. Kesson has given 2 addresses in Glasgow.

The following gentlemen have each delivered one address in the places following their names:—John M'Donald, James Paterson, David Burge, Wm. Clark—Aberdeen; R. C. Murray, ex-Provost Lyle, Tainsh, Henderson, and Miller—Greenock; Rev. Drs. Adamson, Ritchie, and Stewart—Dunse; John Paton, Dollar; Gilbert Archer, Leith; Rev. A. Yeatts, Lerwick; Rev. Mr. Rose, Dr. Bowie, and J. P. Lossock—Edinburgh; Rev. Wm. Crombie and Peter Campbell, Darnick; Dr. Bruce and R. M'Callum, Glasgow; John Steel, Liberton; Rev. H. M'Millan and J. Melvin, Avonbridge.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for REVIEW, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

A Penny Testament: Mr. Elliot Stock is about to issue a pocket English Testament, with copious notes, references, and introductions, three maps, and twenty-four illustrations, for one penny. The object of the issue of the Sacred Book at this exceptionally low price is to give Christian people the opportunity of circulating the Word of God throughout the length and breadth of the land at the slightest possible cost.

Alcohol at the Bar: The Highest Medical and Scientific Testimony concerning its Use. (Compiled by G. W. Bacon, F.R.G.S.) London: G. W. Bacon & Co., 127 Strand. One Shilling. This is an admirable compilation. It consists of Eighteen Chapters, and refers to Alcohol as food, as medicine, as a luxury, and shows its relation to manual labour, brain work, longevity, and legislation. We cordially recommend it.

Told with a Purpose: Temperance Papers for the People. (By Rev. James Yeames.) London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. One Shilling. We have here twelve stories, of which it may be emphatically written, that better practical ones are not to be had. Graphic, brief, incisive, they will afford pleasure and instruction to all who provide themselves with a copy. Each story is illustrated by a spirited engraving, and in get up, in blue and gold, the book is a gem.

Who shall be England's Leader? (By a Cornish Woman, author of Peace or War, etc.) London: E. Stock, 62 Paternoster Row, E.C. One Penny. One of the main arguments on which we base our favour for the removal of the disabilities of women is our conviction that they would devote the exercise of their franchise to the protection of their homes from drink, and of their country from war. We have just an excellent instance in the lady's tract before us. Her tract is not a piece of mere declamation. She is intelligent upon her subject. She draws attention to the great fact that at present "the peace armies of Europe number two millions of men, five times the largest army Imperial Rome ever maintained. Already the expenditure exceeds £120,000,000, without counting loss of labour. Wise statesmen could cover Europe with railways, or make enlightenment universal, or extinguish the horrors of pauperism for the cost of the armies only." On this she pertinently remarks: "It is the special aggravation of this new waste of human energies that it is interminable, that it settles nothing finally, that the consequences of war is not peace, but a condition of further preparation, in which victory or defeat alike are used as agents for further preparation." A finer appeal in favour of Christ and His loving law, as who should lead England, has never come under our notice.

The Onward Reciter, 103, April, 1880. (London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row.) One penny. As usual, excellent in its choice of subject. The present issue will bear comparison with all that have gone before it.

Intemperance and the Licensing System: By Alex. Balfour, Liverpool. In this pamphlet Mr. Balfour confines himself to the point that alcohol should only be vended after taking all reasonable guarantees against its abuse; and the reason is that the article is dangerous alike to the welfare of the individual and to society. Well, he proceeds to discuss what these guarantees should be. He generally desires a reform of the licensing laws on the principle of local and imperial control. He would allow the ratepayers to control the traffic and set the state to oversee them in the doing of it. To anyone wishful of having a sound view of the numerous proposals which are competing for public favour with the local option of Sir Wilfrid Lawson we cordially recommend this pamphlet.

Peeps at our Sunday Schools. (By the Rev. Alfred Taylor.) London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price, Two Shillings. Our first motion after reading over this keenly interesting book was to sigh because that we were a Sabbath School superintendent long before we had the pleasure of meeting with such a delightful monitor. We have here a series of twenty peeps at our Sunday Schools, and nothing like them has ever come under our notice. Mr. Taylor lets us peep at various Sunday Schools—the parsimonious, high pressure, gloomy, hotel, frost-bitten, inharmonious, sunshiny, and other Sunday Schools, and never scalpel laid so bare the object of dissection as he does the defects of our average Sunday Schools. There is no bitterness whatever displayed, however, rather a quiet vein of humorous sarcasm pervades the book. A wise superintendent would never feel rebuke in reading it, rather be incited at once to reform altogether whatever has been shown by Mr. Taylor to be amiss. We congratulate Mr. Taylor on the issue of a most indispensable mirror for Sunday School teachers, and we urge all earnest ones to possess themselves of Peeps at our Sunday Schools without delay. Mr. Longley deserves a word of praise for the tasteful form in which the book appears.

Alcohol: Its Function and Place. A Lecture. (By Thos. R. Fraser, M.D., F.R.S., Professor of Materia Medica in the University of Edinburgh.) Edinburgh: D. Douglas. One Shilling. The occasion of the delivery of this lecture was an invitation from the Edinburgh University Temperance Society to the learned Professor. The result has been a double mistake. The lecturer did not know that the Society was one having total abstinence as its object, and the Committee have adopted Temperance, without reflecting that their opponents lower the word to mean a moderate-governed use of a seductive poison. The lecturer frankly avows that he is not an abstainer, but is equally candid in acknowledging that that is a serious blot in his character. He, however, recognises the evils of immoderation, and he assumes that his greater knowledge of that which the members shun might justify him in venturing to address them. Professor Fraser, after informing us that there are many symptoms of alcoholic disturbance, and that the explanation of each symptom may be found in a number of possible actions of alcohol, goes on to show that these apparent various actions may be eliminated till the real cause of the symptom is disclosed. He gives an instance, that of the remarkable power of alcohol to modify the ability to walk steadily—the motor function of the individual. "This impairment of motor function is the result of any one of at least five possible and different actions—an action upon the sensory nerves, upon the spinal cord, upon the brain, upon the organ of seeing or hearing." Now we are not too curious about these fine distinctions. It is sufficient, we think, for reasonable people to know that the action of alcohol is the cause of impaired function, and that being the case, total abstinence from its use ought to follow. He says if it were an action on the brain: we say there is no if in the investigation. The actions he endeavours to discriminate have all their spring and source in the brain, and hence the duty to avoid the source of danger is greatly increased. He says, "Unfortunately the most careful scrutiny of the individual presenting unsteadiness of gait will not lead us to the solution of this or similar problems." This may be quite true, but it cannot be denied that the individual is injured by alcohol, and it does not much matter how when the fact itself is patent to the meanest capacity. A poor fellow is shot: must we discuss whether it is with Harvey's, canister, or grape, or swan, or small shot, before we determine that he is dead. He is fatally injured: the duty that lies nearest our hands is to prepare him for his last low resting place, and arrest his slayer. The learned Professor marshals a variety of facts before his audience which have been ascertained, although many problems still remain for further investigation. We do not quarrel with the facts, but we denour emphatically to his explanations. The first fact is that there is not merely a difference of degree but different kinds of action flowing from the use of alcohol. In small quantities it is beneficial, in large injurious. Like the late Dr. Anstie and others of his school, Professor Fraser tries to demarcate between beneficial and injurious quantities of alcohol. The alcohol must be diluted with something, at least 50 per cent. of the alcohol. If not so the effects are very different from beneficial. Dr. Anstie made a distinction on account of sex, the sterner being allowed 1½ oz. of absolute alcohol a day, and the fair only ¾ oz., so that the old indefiniteness crops up, and we are without a true compass by which to steer. But the learned Professor does not meet the other difficulty. Alcohol comes under the law of narcotics, and hence the dose must be increased in time and measure. So that his line of demarcation will not stand. On page 13 he tells us "with repeated quantities, not necessarily excessive in amount, the dilatation of some of the vessels becomes permanent, and it may be that the frequent repetition of the dose prevents an opportunity being given them to contract, and the result is that tell-tale rubicund complexion which one occasionally sees." The Professor cannot save the moderate drinker; for while he would guard him from the Charybdis of excess, he lands him in the Scylla of injury from repeated though not excessive drugging. This is virtually the fallacy of the paper, and it runs through all his treatment of the action of alcohol on the stomach, circulation, respiration, nervous system, temperature, and also its value as a food. The testimony borne by the lecture to the advantages of total abstinence far outweighs the Professor's painfully apologetic defence of moderation. On page 26 we find the following: "Men undergoing great and prolonged physical exertion work as well without alcohol as with it. The experience of recent campaigns which have been successfully conducted on total abstinence principles have proved that men in a healthy condition, and supplied with a sufficient amount of food, retain their health and are capable of performing the most arduous labour in every variety of climate without alcohol; and further, in some of these campaigns opportunities were afforded for observing that the addition of alcohol to the diet may actually diminish the capability for prolonged physical exertion. When we direct our attention to mental work I believe the same conclusion must be arrived at. Mental work may seem to be rendered more easy, but facility is gained at the expense of quality. . . . This consideration appears to me to clearly confirm experience derived from many sources, that alcohol is not necessary to enable a healthy individual to lead a useful and happy existence." The learned Professor in these words settles the question for every healthy man and woman. When once the publican has only invalids for customers he will soon leave the sale of alcohol to the druggist, thus relieving society of a most seductive temptation.

A NEW ASPECT OF LICENSING.

It has been reserved for Possil Park, a recently formed suburb of Glasgow, to show a new and we may say encouraging aspect of licensing administration. That suburb lies to the north of Glasgow, between the villages of Maryhill and Springburn. It was once an estate, and the mansion-house was tenanted by the late Sir Archibald Alison, the historian of Europe. It consists of a large foundry known as the Saracen Foundry, and about fourteen streets, partly built upon. It has several missions, a Good Templar Lodge, and the foundation-stone of a Free Church was laid the other day by the Superior, Mr. Macfarlane, J.P., the chief partner of the Saracen Foundry.

There are about five thousand inhabitants congregated here, many of them well-to-do working men who have betaken themselves to this rural spot to enjoy the advantages of retirement and country life, and especially to be safe from the dangers and peril of the public house. But their worthy intentions are in danger of being frustrated. The danger is of a kind which, whether suspected or not, has hardly ever been clearly recognised. Hitherto it has been believed that the public house was the consequence of a demand for liquor: that the liquor vendor never turned up until after the denizens of such places as Possil Park had been suffering the acute agonies of thirst. No use of pointing to the actual resistance offered to publican aggressions by the dwellers in such places. Some publican landlord or drunken family raised an outcry for liquor, and sooner or later an entrance for the odious drink institution was forced, and the amenity of a place attacked, injured, or destroyed. All along the course of time this has been the case. The aggression of the liquor vendor was a fact, the invitation to him to come and settle was the delusion. That delusion is not yet dispelled. But the painful fact remains. Hillhead and West Pollokshields have up till now debarred public houses from a footing there, but Polmadie, Crosshill, and East Pollokshields have had to succumb to the aggression of the liquor seller who has secured a footing through the connivance of the licensing authorities. We have been told that the publican follows in the wake of civilization. Precisely so: but it is like the shark after the ship to seize the weak: the vulture after the diseased camel to profit by the carrion of society. If he did not make enormous profits he would perforce turn to other creditable if less lucrative sources for a living. Of this we are assured, that there is no spot sacred from his profanation: he will destroy the amenity of every place not legally secured against his aggressions.

Mr. Macfarlane, the superior of Possil Park, did not foresee this danger, and let his feus without any restriction at all. Some builders procured feus and built houses, and it needed no artificial help to see that many shops in these buildings were destined for public houses. There was an outcry in the place about having a beer license, for how can a working man do without his beer? Mr. Macfarlane did not oppose the skilfully-laid attempt to gain a footing. The grocer took out a porter and ale license, plied it for a year, and then at next licensing term turned it into a grocer's license. Very soon, however, his customers began to complain of his wares: they were not of the right sort, but the nearest alternative shop was at least half a mile away, so instead of abstaining they grumbled and continued to buy. In the meantime the property holders found plenty of speculative publicans ready to take their shops provided a license could be secured, and in consequence about a dozen of license applications were made to the justices of the lower ward of Lanarkshire. The friends of temperance, on seeing the list of applications in the newspapers, took steps to convene a meeting, but having only asked the presence of all friendly to the exclusion of public-house traffic they fell into a blunder by which their wily opponents profited. However, they adopted a memorial against the existing licenses, and of course against all that were applied for. Their opponents called a meeting of the inhabitants, but called it in the forenoon of the day their meeting was to take place, thus placing the friends of temperance at a disadvantage. A memorial was adopted and duly signed. It prayed for a grocer's license to allow of healthy competition, and thus secure good liquor to the lieges, and for one public house that the wearied working man might have a place where he might have a glass of beer with his friend. The two memorials put their honours the licensing justices into a corner. Which memorial was really the voice of the people. There was no reply to the question. Happily at this critical moment a bright idea darted into the magisterial brain. It was to ask the people themselves to signify their pleasure on the matter. A committee was appointed and it went to Possil Park. As the result of consulting the ratepayers, it decreed that no public houses were required, but that for the sake of better liquor an additional grocer's license should be granted. So decreed, it so came to pass. All the applications for licenses were withdrawn for the time.

This year, in view of reviving trade and expanding commerce, numerous applications for licenses were presented to the justices, who again appointed a committee to go down to the ratepayers and consult them about having or not having licenses. That committee reported on Thursday last through its chairman, Mr. J. C. Wakefield, J.P., that the committee appointed this day week to inquire into the licensing necessities of Possil Park had consisted of Messrs. Miller, Davidson, Christie, Dunlop, Kidston, M<sup>r</sup>Farlane, Graham, and himself. They went to Possil Park, and drove to Mr. Macfarlane's office. They had a very long interview with him, and he was quite opposed to any licenses being granted in that neighbourhood, he being a large employer of labour. Further than that, they saw a petition subscribed by the only other five employers in that neighbourhood, protesting against any public-houses being put down in Possilpark. The committee also examined the policemen in the district. They came to the almost unanimous conclusion that no houses were required in that neighbourhood. Mr. Wakefield had objected to this finding, but he gave in to the opinion of the committee in this instance, reserving to himself freedom to act next year as he might see fit. He did not think it was contemplated by the Act that a population of 6,000 people should be without one or two public-houses.

In view of the statement made by Mr. Wakefield, all the applicants for licenses in this district withdrew their applications.

Was there ever a more transparent proof of the advantage of consulting the ratepayers? When they are not consulted, and they have not been consulted for centuries, public houses have been thrust upon them till they have become debased; crimes have become rampant, madness, murder, disease and poverty so common as scarcely to provoke comment. When they have been consulted they have with scarcely an exception declared against the public house as they would against the plague. But the Possil Park relief from publican aggression has too much of the ex gratia element in it to suit our taste. Had the committee been all like Mr. Wakefield the old leaven of the licensing authority would have once more exhibited itself, and by this time some publican would have been legally installed to poison Her Majesty's subjects in this rural village wholesale. The present administration of the licensing authority must yield to the claims of justice and fairness. The people must have a legal power to sustain their veto of all liquor traffic in their midst. The last appeal of the publican must be made to them: from them he must ask permission to destroy the infants and their mothers; bring the son to crime and the daughter to the streets; confine the husband as a hopeless maniac and doom the father to the gallows. If such a permission be denied him, there being no power superior to them so far as their own affairs are concerned, the denial is absolute, and they may live on not even haunted by a fear of the publican's hateful settlement among them. To that happy and we may venture to affirm natural state Possil Park has not attained: far from it. Mr. J. C. Wakefield threatens to force public houses upon its residents, and what is most intolerable he is to do it in the name of the law. "He did not think that it was contemplated by the Act that a population of 6,000 people should be without one or two public houses." Perish that law and perish Mr. Wakefield's functions! The spirit he manifests belongs rather to the worst days of the Stuarts than to the latter end of the reign of Victoria: and it must be opposed to the utmost. It is an insult to the residents in Possil Park, a challenge to the enlightened social and moral reformers of Scotland. The interest of Possil Park is unspeakably greater and of far more importance than the interests of the publican, the publican landlord, and the drinker: immeasurably superior to the dictation of Mr. Wakefield, and when the good people of Possil Park recognise the relation in which they stand to these interested parties and to Mr. Wakefield, these sinister interests and that painful intention of tyrannical dictation must surrender to the social, moral, and religious interests of Possil Park.

THE BATTLE OF AGINCOURT.—A gentleman, seeing a violent battle in front of a gin palace, facetiously termed it "The battle of a-gin-court."

TEMPERANCE IN RELATION TO THE GOSPEL.—I.

We are told by professing Christians who oppose our movement, that temperance will not save souls. And what, we are asked, will be the sum total of ultimate good resulting from all this expenditure of teetotal zeal, fiery eloquence, time, and money? If it be only to help mankind to feel themselves slightly happier, by saving them from the evils of intemperance in this present life, and make no provision for the life to come, is it worthy of the price that is being paid for it? Moreover, they say, it does not appear, to us, that you are even managing to do as much as that. Now, we hold that if, instead of your temperance societies, you would organize evangelistic associations and set about praying and working as zealously for the salvation of souls, we could then have hope of, and sympathy for, your movement—we could then hope to have some real work done for eternity—done for God; and

"Whate'er may die or be forgot,
Work done for God it dieth not."

If you would aim at doing evangelistic work, we could then see our way to join you, and to mingle our tears, and our prayers, and our burning words with yours, that men and women perish not, but live with Him who died for them, and sing throughout the endless ages of eternity to his praise and glory their rapturous song of redeeming love. In a work like that, they say, we could join you. That would be real work—work that would entirely supersede your total abstinence pledge, for there is no need of a total abstinence pledge where the grace of God is. Hold, we say, good friends; you have said too much at one time, as we shall presently show you. We admire your evangelical spirit. Our hearts accord with yours in regard to that great question; yea, our souls travail with yours that all Christ's blood-bought ones may be brought home in triumph amid the joyous acclamations of the angelic throng, to sparkle for ever as gems in our Saviour's kingly crown. We admit that any reform that is not more or less tributary to that great end is scarcely worth while engaging in. But we too, like you, have been trying to advance Christ's kingdom in that way, and we have found that it cannot be done very well in the way you propose. We have spoken of Christ and redeeming love to the followers of Bacchus, and what do you think was the result? They laughed a fiendish laugh, and passed on in their giddy excitement unmoved—quite unaffected by our entreaties—down the fatal slippery ways of death, where the arch-fiend leads. Bacchus laughed at our efforts. The intoxicating cup was his shield. The intoxicating cup, with its horrid enchantments, stood between Christ and those for whom He died! We looked on with deep sorrow. We felt that something must be done to remove this ponderous Juggernaut. We remembered the mighty power and many promises of God, and took courage. We remembered that Jesus Christ himself said—"Take ye away the stone" (John xi. 39). We looked on the intoxicating cup as a stone of stumbling and rock of offence. It lay heavily against the mouth of the sepulchre, enclosing those who were "dead in trespasses and sins." We resolved that by the help of God we should roll back that stone. We admit that we have found the task difficult. We have, however, succeeded in moving it slightly, and some faint streaks of light are now darting through; but those who ought to help us are standing by and refusing their assistance. They are declaring that we are wrong, that our position is unscriptural, and that all our enthusiasm is being spent for naught. Speak to the dead, they say, that they may arise and for ever go free. How impossible, we answer, while that huge stone of intemperance lies at the mouth of the sepulchre.

We have been misunderstood, misrepresented, and falsely accused. Among other things we have been accused of having put temperance before the gospel. We do not deny this. We admit it frankly. We have put temperance before the gospel in point of time. In point of time, but not in point of importance. And why have we put temperance before the gospel in point of time? Because the stone must be rolled away before Lazarus can come forth.

We remember that John the Baptist came before Christ in point of time. Are we to infer from this that John the Baptist was greater than Christ? Let John the Baptist himself answer—"He it is who, coming after me, is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose" (John i. 27). The temperance cause says the same thing of the gospel to-day. But did John the Baptist think that his was a work of supererogation? Did Jesus Christ himself think so? Let Christ answer—"But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet. For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee" (Matt. xi. 9, 10). We need no further testimony as to the greatness of the work of John the Baptist. Though he was but "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight,'" his mission was an urgent necessity. So great a mission was it, that it was greater than the mission of any of the other prophets who had gone before him. He had come not only as a prophet, but as the herald of Christ, and, after calling the people to repentance, it was his infinitely high duty and privilege to point out to penitent sinners for the first time, "The Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world."

Temperance then, we say, is the precursor of the gospel. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord. Make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it" (Isaiah xl. 3, 4).

See John with his raiment of camel's hair, his plain, blunt address, his plainer ways of living, his strictly abstinent principles, his whole life a protest against indulgence, vice, and extravagance of every sort. The Jewish nation, at the time of his coming, had great need of such a reformer. The people at that time had become very wicked, and there was a twofold necessity for such a man as John the Baptist to call them to repentance.

This British nation of ours has become degraded to a degree that from our high fame as a Christian nation one would scarcely think possible. This thing alcohol has come amongst us like a serpent, poisoning our moral and religious life, blunting and destroying all our finer sensibilities, until myriads of those who promised to be noble specimens of Christian manhood and Christian womanhood have become degraded below the level of the brute creation. Yea, this nation has become degraded until we have many thousands passing yearly into drunkards' graves—taking their final leap into the dark unknown without a single spark of kindly light to guide their wayward feet, without one single promise of God wherein to trust, with no kind Saviour's arm on which to lean. Every week sees its hundreds passing away in this state. The pictures that could be drawn from real life are, many of them, by far too horrible for reproduction. Who could make a week's tour of the death-places (we cannot always say death-beds, for many of them have no beds) of such; who, we ask, could witness the last look of wild despair in the bloodshot eyes of the drunkard—a look seeming to say more emphatically than words could—"The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved." Who could witness that terrible wreck of human life; who could stand by and witness one of those poor suicides, at the last moment, despairing for the light where there was no light, nothing but impenetrable gloom, and God had said—"I will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh." What Christian man or woman could witness such a scene and not feel that God was calling loudly upon him or her to do something towards saving others from coming to that sad and terrible end? Sweet echo, bearest thou not on the wind from pole to pole from every Christian reader the answer "Not I"? Say, sweet echo, has that noble answer not gone in a chariot of light to the eternal throne as sweet incense offered to Him who died for them? When we reflect upon the terrible thought that perhaps in one week a thousand such scenes have taken place within these Isles—that a thousand of our fellow-creatures, with their lives wrecked for time and for eternity, may have gone down in one week into drunkards' graves, "unwept, unhonoured, and unsung"—we cannot believe that the Christian church will remain indifferent. We cannot believe that the Christian church could be fully aware of such a state of things, and not feel duty-bound to stretch forth a loving hand to save the dying. We cannot even believe that in this nineteenth century of the gospel of the grace of God in Christ, under the full noontide glare of Christian light, it is possible in one week for a thousand of our fellows so to pass away without tears of Christian pity being dropt upon their graves. Unhonoured they may be, but Zion, to-day, weeps over her slain. The winds are forbidden to publish the tale, and soon the kindly grass over all grows thick and green to hide their shame. Will flowers grow over the grave of vice and folly? Yea, on what uncongenial soil will they not spring, if it be for the healing of broken hearts!

WOMAN—THE MAIDEN.

It is difficult in the present day to say where girlhood ends and maidenhood begins. Some girls have all the maturity of maidenhood; some maidens never seem to have been able to pass the stage of girlhood. We will set the boundary line between the two at eighteen, by which time there should be little doubt on the matter. At that age a maiden's character should be manifest. Physically she should be the embodiment of physical health and vigour, and in possession of those habits which sustain them. These include early rising, bathing, suitable dress, moderate household labour, healthful exercise, temperate living, an abundant flow of spirits, and a cheerful temper. We might fairly anticipate that she should be animated by feelings the object of which is not simply her own but her family's happiness. By no means selfish or self-regarding, she should be able to discriminate, and have realized that self love and social are the same. Gay as the lark, her very presence should have music in it, and happiness should be shed from it as the fragrance from the rose. We have seen such women, and what lent a charm to this faculty of inspiring happiness was the unconsciousness on their part of its exercise; it was their very nature to make those around them happy. If ever they were grave, it was at another's failings; if sad, it was at another's sorrow; if ever a frown darkened their sweet face, it was when vice or malevolence roused itself to strike; and if ever joy beamed more brightly from their features, it was when they witnessed another with their cup of joy brimming over. This is the lofty altitude to which every woman ought to aspire, but it is not acquired—it cannot be put on. It must grow, and where its germs are it will grow if it is cultivated as it ought to be. A woman of high-toned feeling, deeply conscientious, sympathetic, and social is a treasure beyond all price. She is the depository of an accumulation of happiness which never fails, and in the darkest hour of human experience pours forth its richest treasures. If her affections are pure, her hopes high; if veneration of all that is venerable is active, and if she is gifted with firmness, and is free from vacillation, she may look calmly forward to all the vicissitudes of human life; she will be found prepared for them all. Her bitter cup will never be without consolation, her sweetest never unshared by those less happy and fortunate than herself. In her atmosphere the great and the excellent will be revered, the mean and the base abhorred. She will teach by her example what is right and true and good, and inspire all around her to "make life death, and the vast forever a grand, sweet song."

A true maiden will not merely have these high moral impulses under reason's firm control, but she will also recognise the grand truth that in all that she has acquired hitherto her co-operation was merely that of a task, and that now her farther excellencies in maidenhood and wifelyhood will not be done for her, but largely, if not altogether, by her: she must voluntarily engage in that education which means the perfecting of her feelings, will, and intellect. Thus realizing her responsibility, she will easily find means and opportunity for its rightful and ample discharge. The continued unfolding of her intellect should be her supreme object at this stage. One of the delusions of men of the narrow view is that women have little if any real intellectual ability, and they do all they can to discourage attempts made by them to acquire sound and useful knowledge. These wisecracks gravely assert that intellectual women are the most disagreeable and intractable of their sex, and that the acquisition of knowledge on their part results in their assumption of masculine airs and in the loss of their womanly grace. That this is generally the case we most emphatically deny. Let any one think over the names of his female relations and acquaintances, and he will find as he recalls the individual characteristics of each that intelligence gives firmness and tone to women, that their womanly sympathies are not merely the impulses of a blind caprice, but the regulated outflow of a loving heart that not only feels but knows why it feels. That a woman should have, during her whole existence, to grope in the dark as it were in regard to all that she sets about, while men are carefully trained in the knowledge of the processes of nature and of reason, should, we think, arouse a suspicion of an inequality for which the mere fact of sex will not account. There must be the unfolding of her intellect. Every maiden should diligently inquire into her own constitution, so as to know what duties are demanded of her, what laws she ought to obey, what habits she ought to form, and for what end she was made. She should deeply investigate the nature and distinctions of morality. There is a fearful lack of morality among all classes, but notwithstanding that, no maiden should shrink from forming her moral chaacter because conventional morality may be lax, and the sense of moral distinctions on the part of too many obscure. Failure here is to fail all through life, for without healthy moral habits life is shorn of progress and happiness. She should not take up prejudices on this vital part of her education. Rather, it will be most profitable for her to investigate the claims of all the systems, and adopt that as the best which is found by her to be most in harmony with the revealed will of God. In utilitarian morality—where pleasure is the end—she will find that the quantity and quality of pleasure is set forth in a way that will largely add to her happiness to know; and in intuitional morality the universality of the moral sense will confirm her in her idea of the high dignity and destiny of the race. While her powers of moral discrimination are developed her moral impulses will be strengthened, and duty in its most exalted sense become the keynote of her character.

She will have recognised by the time that her education has reached this stage how frail she is, how liable to temptation, how prone to sin. She will see her need of grace, her need of a Saviour. It may be quite true that women as a rule are more religious than men, that they are more in harmony with the attributes of God than men are, that they have more of truth, gentleness, temperance, purity and love, but these qualities require to be developed by study and meditation, and sustained by constant prayer and practice. Maidens should cultivate a devotional spirit and be rigidly tenacious of attention to their religious duties. They need not be less loving, less cheerful, less buoyant, less hopeful. That form of religion may be justly suspected that is ever obtruding itself and wrapping those that manifest it in gloom. It is preposterous that His children should never find joy and happiness unless they stray from God; that in places where temptations are rank and pleasures gross, joy is only to be found. This fatal delusion has been the ruin of many youths and maidens, and has sensibly diminished the happiness of multitudes. Were young women only to bear in mind that they are ever in the presence of God they would never fall into this mischievous error. With a sense of his all-seeing eye continually looking down upon them pleasure would never become folly, liberty never become license, joy never become levity. The innocent gaiety of their nature, their rippling laughter, their sweet simplicity would enhance their natural charms, and keep their cup of joy mantling to the brim. They should be daily readers of the Word of God; daily feeders in His pastures; as the hart panteth after the water brook so should their soul pant after the living God. In a word they should taste and see that God is good, and have the delightful experience that it is well with them that fear Him. As Christ has shown mankind the Father so they should make Him the pattern of the Father of their Spirits, and fashion themselves according to his glorious likeness, so that as He has saved and cleansed them by His blood, they should be like Him in the light of His resurrection. If they use the Bible and the other means of grace to secure this lofty ideal of the Christian, they will easily find out the best method of using them all. Let them store their memory with the precious words of the Bible, commit the Psalms, the Proverbs, and the Sermon on the Mount to memory, and they will have a treasury of Scripture that will ever flow and fail not. A maiden thus divinely nurtured is supreme over all the changes of time or fortune; to her nothing can come amiss. She will ever be found where the channels of Divine Grace are, ever on the spot upon which the precious blessings of our common Father descend.

Next to the knowledge of her own being, the notions of duty, and her dependence on God, should be the knowledge of mankind, in society, under God's providential rule, and under earthly law and government. The knowledge of her own country is most important and cannot be safely neglected. There she will find that there is a providence that shapes our ends rough-hew them how we will. She will easily learn philosophy as she acquires history, for history is simply philosophy teaching by example.

Her fine taste should be cultivated in the direction of either painting, sculpture, or music. Many women earn an honourable independence by their prosecution of some one of these arts; to his wife's accomplishments many a man has owed his ability to tide over adversity, nay, his second rise in the world. No maiden should despise the acquisition of a really thorough practical acquaintance with this or some similar art. The present Countess of Roseberry—a lady whom wealth has, one would think, removed for ever from penury—is a trained school-mistress, and not less fit for her station. It is always a barrier against poverty, or what is nearly as bad, dependence on friends for support. But apart from these considerations, the possession of such invaluable accomplishments has a highly elevating influence on the receptive mind of women, and tends still more to endear her to all who share her society. The choicest gems of literature should also form a part of her mental acquisitions. The pleasures of reading are among the most solid and satisfactory of all. We find ourselves in the society of the wisest and best of mankind; we travel in their company and view the beautiful and sublime in nature, the march of the seasons, the luxuriance of the forest, the effulgence of the garden, and the treasures of the field, until our soul recognises the grand truth that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. We wander with the historian down the stream of time from the moment when his first faint records chronicled the doings of mankind. We pass on, leaving behind us the empires that have been founded, have flourished, and passed away, past systems of philosophy and of society that now serve to absorb the attention and the research only of the antiquary. As we wander on, poesy, song arrest our attention, as they sing of the seasons as they roll; of the exploits of kings of Troy, of the death of Arthur, of Paradise Lost, of Jerusalem Delivered, the Vision of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven, of the human heart with its tens of thousands of chords vibrating to the music of the spheres.

By a spirit so attuned to all that is true, and beautiful, and good, filial obedience will be lovingly paid, the home ties lovingly respected, her elders revered, her youngers caressed and encouraged, her dependants cherished, and all the relations of life faithfully upheld.

And when the time comes when she receives the attention of lovers, she will be able to bear herself with true maidenly affection and modesty; she will be able to discriminate and choose, not for wealth, display, or even for position, but for genuine worth. The husk may charm others, but it cannot deceive her. She has weighed well the gold and the glitter, ascertained the value of the dust and the diamond, and she fixes her warm, honest, constant affection upon one who values her for the sterling qualities she possesses, and feels in gaining her unchanging love that he is the happiest of men and that the object of his life must be to make her the happiest of women.

The young lady who tempts a young man with a glass of wine, deserves a drunkard for a husband.

NOTES OF AN ADDRESS TO WOMEN,

Delivered by the Rev. J. W. Horsley, at a Drawing-room Meeting at the Rev. J. Haslock Potter's, Streatham.

ALL lovers of mankind and of manliness, all true citizens and patriots, jealous for the fair fame of their native land, all Christians, above all, grieving over the insults to God, the hindrances to the full advent of His kingdom, and the irreparable loss of myriad souls, must vindicate their right to the noble titles they claim by striving with all their powers, and with their varying talents and opportunities, to roll away from England the reproach of intemperance.

There seem, moreover, some special reasons for women engaging actively in this work.

1. They have more leisure, at any rate, in the day time. Not unconscious of their many pressing and holy duties at home, we are yet mindful of the work they already do in district visiting and mothers' meetings, which are most conveniently at hours when their husbands and brothers must be elsewhere and otherwise occupied.

2. To them chiefly God seems to have given the gift of influence. "Who is she?" a judge used to ask, thinking that in every quarrel a woman will be found the proximate or remote cause. But this influence is more for good than for evil. Moreover, they, by their very weakness, it may be, have an influence over men, and rough men. Witness the labours of Miss Weston, Miss Nightingale, and many more honoured in every town and village. "As unto the bow the cord is, so unto the man is woman: though she bends him, she obeys him, useless each without the other." Eve made Adam to eat, and many another Eve has persuaded another Adam to drink. But, on the other hand, how many an Eleanor has, with self-sacrificing love, withdrawn the poison from her wounded and weakened spouse.

3. They have the training of children and of servants. "She who rocks the cradle rules the world," said the great Napoleon, and how much of St. Timothy's virtue was due to Lois and Eunice? The memory of a mother's words and example preserves many from some sinful lusts of the body, why should not this same power preserve from the defilement of intemperance? And how the habits of the mistress are reproduced in the artisan's wife who has been in service. The liberty of the one becomes too often the license of the other. "Why should I abstain? My old mistress was a religious woman, but saw no harm in her glass or two." N.B., of 3,976 fallen women in Westminster Prison, 1,589 had been in domestic service, and of the same number 2,524 were brought in directly or indirectly by drink. Had some of them had better mistresses they would have known a better fate. The mistress, above all others, is a city set on a hill that cannot be hid.

4. Women are specially liable to the temptation. I quote from the Health Primer on Alcohol by Dr. Greenfield (not a total abstainer). "At some periods of life there is an especial tendency to drinking. One of the most dangerous of these is middle life in women, and it is at this period that many previously sober and moral women become addicted to drinking, often in secret at first, and lay the foundation of habits which shorten the life and degrade the character. No doubt this tendency is encouraged by custom and the influence of bad advice, but, in many cases, there is a very strong inclination towards drinking which needs nothing but the possibility of secret gratification to cause it to be indulged in. Those who have not had the opportunities which doctors unfortunately enjoy of hearing the sad revelations which are sometimes made on this subject, would be astonished at the amount of secret drinking amongst apparently respectable and sober middle-aged women."

5. Intemperance is much caused by women. I quote the same writer, "In the state of maternity and child-birth, the same is true to an enormous extent. The amount of drinking which is carried on, both at these times, and by nursing mothers, under a wrong idea of the necessity for alcohol, and an entire misconception of its true action, is almost beyond belief. On no subject connected with drinking is it more necessary to speak emphatically, for the direct and indirect efforts of such a misuse are evils of incalculable extent. It seems to have become one of the doctrines and tenets of the female world that alcohol is essential to women who are nursing, and that it is not only a benefit to them, but their duty to take a considerable quantity. If this error were confined to the lower classes we might not be surprised, but unfortunately it is equally common in the higher. Monthly nurses are probably more chargeable with spreading drunkenness among married women than any other class. Their position and supposed experience as 'wise women,' enable them to insinuate the temptation, and propagate the error, in spite of all the efforts of doctors and moralists. Young mothers especially are led by their advice, as if they were bound hand and foot; and, in spite of their better judgment, they give way to their leaders in a hitherto unknown land, and blindly follow their blind guides. There is no evidence that alcohol is more necessary or beneficial to mothers, as such, and all experience points strongly in the opposite direction."

Add, that the want of restraint caused by the sight of the mother's perennial teapot, and the being allowed to drink (albeit milk or water) between meal, and at the first desire, makes often the nursery the ante-chamber of the public house.

6. Heredity in this matter is mainly from the mother's side. An unbelieving doctor said, "At any rate one text is true—the sins of the parents are visited upon the children." Freewill and grace may avert the curse spiritually and morally, but physically the taint remains. So Dr. Greenfield again—"The habit tells upon the offspring it is intended to benefit. There is the strongest probability that the moral and mental character of children is influenced by the action of alcohol in the mother, a greater misery is thus caused than even by crippling or fatal disease." Will you transmit to children the colour of your eyebrows and not the tendency to intemperance, or the inability of self-control. So Dr. Brunton before the Lord's Committee, "There is a distinct transmission of both the propensity to drink, and also the bad effects of it, mental qualities and tastes, as well as bodily, being very often transmitted." And the spark in the mother may be the flame in the child. One day in Westminster Prison there were four generations of the women of one family brought in from drink; might not the youngest, a baby at the breast, be said to have been born drunk?

7. Women are especially interested in the prevention of infant mortality—and how many babes are drowned in beer? Eight of 100 babes in the upper classes, 32 per cent. in the lower, die in their first year. But note the proportion among the intemperate. From one page of my prison note book I find that 20 men had 204 children, of whom 128 were dead. One (aged 50) had 11 of 13 dead; why? "I am one of the worst drunkards in the world; my wife don't drink so regularly, but very hard when she goes about it." A woman, 38, had 9 children, all dead, both parents drink. A woman, 44, had 1 of 12 alive, husband died of paralysis of the brain, from a "gay" life; she drinks hard when out of prison. A woman, 31, had 9 children, "all dead, thank God," the ninth conviction for drunkenness.

8. The extent of female intemperance. The ordinary proportion of crime ought to be, and has been, 1 woman to 7 men, but London imprisons 16,525 women to 18,883 men for drunkenness. One day at Marylebone, of 22 cases 21 were for drunkenness, and 14 of these were women. In one week 146 female offenders entered Westminster Prison, 126 for drunkenness. In Liverpool the women have even outstripped the men in the hideous race, 6,276 females to 5,537 males being apprehended for drunkenness in one year. Satan seems to have changed his policy since the days of Pharaoh and Herod.

9. The almost hopelessness of reclaiming female drunkards. Five men for one woman may be permanently reclaimed, the loss of shame being more fatal with women. They will steal for drink and prostitute themselves for drink. In Manchester Gaol, in 1877, there were 3 women in respectively for the 146th, 133rd, and 108th time. In York, 1 for the 150th time. One I have myself known in for the 150th time. One came in for drunkenness the same day as she was discharged from a month for drink, leaving her husband a corpse at home. An artisan came to pay a fine for his wife who had been in innumerable times; he was 2½d. short in the amount: "Never mind," said the inspector, "as you're a regular customer, she'll be in again to-morrow." Another entreats the magistrate to send her to Clerkenwell for some months as her only chance. H. R., aged 64, amassed a large sum, but lost all by drink; went to live with total abstiners and seemed cured; ordered brandy in St. Bartholomew's, took to old habits, bought two bottles of gin one evening and drank one before going to bed, in which she was found dead. A tradesman's wife, on whom an inquest was held, had for weeks drunk nothing but neat brandy, of which she had taken as much as three pints in a day. When found dead she had in her pocket a bottle of brandy obtained on credit.

Add the testimony of clergy, doctors, leaders of society, owners of laundries and register offices, and pastry cooks.

Let, then, womanly shame, jealousy for the honour of your sex, sisterly sympathy, Christ-like love for the perishing and lost, animate your especial powers of patience, winning gentleness and self-sacrificing love.

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

THE number of marriages in Scotland last year was 23,462, being the lowest for the last twenty-five years. "Of course," says the press, "it becomes natural to seek an explanation of this reduced marriage rate by connecting it with the period of dull trade and financial disaster that has recently prevailed throughout the land." And there has been less drinking just for the same reason. We wish that we could say that there was really an increased desire for prudent marriages, and also a lessened desire to spend so much on drink, when times improved; but we fear with good times there will be hasty marriages and heavy drinking. The first will only yield to the efforts of intelligence and education, the last will certainly yield to nothing short of a prohibitory law.

The publicans can't do the impossible. At any rate they cannot reconcile their interests with their duty to society. They undertake to sell excellent drink, excellent victuals, to have no dealings with boys or girls who want drink for themselves, or trade with "a drunk." They may give "tick," but it is at their own risk; they may take their customer's belongings in pledge, but they do so at their peril. A Dumfries publican the other day, however, looked so closely to his own interest that he forgot what was due to the law—he took his customer's Bible in pawn for his spirits, and has lost his good name and six pounds by the transaction: he speculated and, as is the fashion on 'change at present, he lost heavily. If the law had any bowels of mercy it might have some compunction for the subject of so heavy a fine. It may have a bad effect on him; he might have a strong aversion to the Holy Book, so strong that he may rarely or never open it. But what about his customer? Dr. Chalmers used to speak of the "expulsive force of a new affection," but it was in a divine sense. Here we see the expulsive force of a malevolent affection for drink. The customer imbibes the poison and expels the Word. When the people are wise they will spread the Word and expel the liquor.

We are often treated to glowing pictures of America as the home of the free—our sons and daughters whom we have reared crowd to the emigrant ship, bid farewell to the land of their birth, and cross the seas to the new world. Yet, even in this land of liberty, independence, competence—the very paradise of the working man—we find that drink, by law protected, is the same deadly enemy to all that directly or indirectly come under the sweep of its terrible power. In New York they have a "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." The New York Herald gives us two instances of the Society's operations. Minnie Green, a coloured girl, of 11 years, is rescued from the brutality of a stepfather, who compels her to drink till she is intoxicated, and beats her savagely if she refuses. The girl is in the police office under a matron's care. The other is that of a girl, Minnie Hughes, of 6 years, discovered in a room amidst the greatest filth, and without food. Beside her is a Mrs. Harrington, in a beastly state of intoxication. As the girl was nude clothes were begged for her, and she is, like Minnie Green, under the police matron's care. The National Temperance Advocate draws attention to the fact that these children were not in starving Ireland or heathen Africa, but in the so-called Christian city of New York. In Britain I believe that thousands of equally hapless children, through drink, could be found were there a similar society instituted to discover them.

There is often in the Lancet incontestable proofs of the doctrine you and I hold in common. During the past month we find that Professor Cameron, of Dublin, read a paper upon the quality of whisky on sale in Ireland. It appears that the constabulary had collected for him samples of whisky at fairs, race courses, and wayside public-houses. All these were of very bad quality. The greater proportion consisted of what was called patent still whisky, having nothing save alcohol and a little flavouring matter. Much of the whisky consisted of new whisky containing fusel oil (amyl alcohol), and aldehyde. Aldehyde is a substance formed by the oxidation of alcohol, and is intermediate between alcohol and acetic acid. Dr. Cameron regards it as the toxic ingredient of new whisky. It disappears when whisky is stored for a couple of years. He stated the case of a whole family poisoned by drinking for some months "poten," or illicit whisky, containing 23 per cent of amyl alcohol—father and mother had become insane. The infatuation for drinking in no way manifests itself more strikingly than at fairs, race courses, cricket and football matches, regattas, &c., for which special licenses have been obtained, and liquor vendors having got an idea that men are only silly geese or sheep furnished by a benignant providence for them to pluck or fleece, have no scruples at doing so effectually. They do not minister to the vicious propensities of their customers without regard to a consideration for doing so, and the terrible consequences that follow drinking are intensified through their relentless rapacity.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER, Vol. XIV. Glasgow: 30 Hope Street.—Although the organ of the United Kingdom Alliance Movement in Scotland, the Social Reformer contains much useful matter upon other than prohibition topics, while the temperance news is selected with care, and condensed so as to preserve all really useful information within as small a compass as possible, no slight recommendation in these days of organisational verbosity.—House and Home.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER.—The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association publishes this useful monthly, and the fourteenth yearly volume, in paper binding, is now before us. Each number usually contains several able leading articles on current temperance topics, in addition to reports of meetings and of other temperance work, and to well-selected information specially valuable to advocates. Permissive prohibition is stoutly upheld, and total abstinence receives effective aid. We wish all possible prosperity to this well-conducted organ of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.—Alliance News, 5th ult.

POETRY.

CREEPING UP THE STAIRS.

IN the softly-falling twilight
Of a weary, weary day,
With a quiet step I entered
Where the children were at play;
I was brooding o'er some trouble
That had met me unawares,
When a little voice came ringing,
"Me is creepin' up a stairs."
Ah! it touched the tenderest heart-string
With a breath and force divine,
And such melodies awakened
As words can ne'er define;
And I turned to see our darling,
All forgetful of my cares,
When I saw the little creature
Slowly creeping up the stairs.
Step by step she bravely clambered
On her little hands and knees,
Keeping up a constant chattering,
Like a magpie in the trees;
Till at last she reached the topmost
When o'er all her world's affairs
She, delighted, stood a victor,
After creeping up the stairs.
Fainting heart, behold an image
Of man's brief and struggling life,
Whose best prizes must be captured
With noble earnest strife;
Onward, upward reaching ever,
Bending to the weight of cares,
Hoping, fearing, still expecting,
We go creeping up the stairs.
On their steps may be no carpet,
By their side may be no rail,
Hands and knees may often pain us,
And the heart may almost fail;
Still above there is the glory
Which no sinfulness impairs,
With its rest and joy for ever,
After creeping up the stairs.

Happiness is the gay to-morrow of the mind that never comes.

A tipsy boy is a shame to his father, and a ten-year-old smoker is a disgrace to his mother.

"Help the sweeper, please, sir." "Can't, my man, I wasn't brought up to the business; besides, I have no broom."

An Irishman, who had a very ragged coat, was asked of what stuff it was made. "Bedad if I know," says he, "but I think the most of it is made of fresh air."

"Do you see any grapes, Bob?" "Yes; but there are dogs." "Big dogs, Bob?" "Yes, very big." "Then come along—these grapes are not ours, you know."

When Charles V. read upon the tomb of a Spanish nobleman, "Here lies one who never knew fear," he wittily replied, "Then he never snuffed a candle with his fingers."

Apples, grapes, and grain are excellent articles of food, but cider, wine, and beer afford no nourishment to speak of. Their value as food is destroyed by fermentation.

AYR BURGHS ELECTION.—A little fellow, going along Newmarket Street with a red rosette pinned to his jacket, snatched a blue rosette worn by a bigger boy. The latter retaliated, plucking the red rosette from the other's jacket and trampling it upon the ground. A scuffle ensued, out of which the smaller boy came to grief, but his spirit was big if his body was small. Standing with his hands and face smeared with blood, which issued from his nose, and looking at his antagonist, he triumphantly exclaimed, "Ah, man, I ha'e my colours yet!"

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, JUNE, 1880.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1880.

* * WE have received several excellent articles—"Righteousness and convenience (expediency);" "How can what is called the moderate drinking of alcoholic liquors be a right and safe course of action?" "Fulfilling Conditions—Nos. I. and II.;" "Early Prohibitionists." We reiterate our intention to prefer those articles that are brief, vivacious in their treatment, and crisp in their style. Too many writers do not take time, else their articles would be very much briefer and better. Let them take more pains, else our readers will care less for their communications. To those contributors who earnestly desire to assist us we tender our warmest thanks. To those friends who send us a newspaper occasionally we are truly grateful. May we hope that all sending us newspapers will cut the paper at the portion to which they wish specially to direct our attention.

A SPECIAL DONATION.

It affords us much pleasure to acknowledge, per James Torreus, Esq., J.P., a special donation of £100 sterling from a friend who will not allow us to publish his name. He is a staunch friend of the movement, and has been a generous supporter of the funds of this Association for more than twenty years. At a trying time like the present, such a donation is peculiarly acceptable. We earnestly hope that others of our friends may emulate the example set them by this truly liberal donor.

WE regret that our early going to press prevents us having the pleasure to chronicle the results of the intention expressed by the Earl of Zetland to enforce his feu rights on and after the 15th May, the consequence of which would be the suppression of all liquor traffic in Grangemouth after that date. We know two facts, however. The Commissioners are of opinion that there is no hope that his lordship will change his mind on the subject; and that the Crown Hotel, of which his lordship is proprietor, is already closed. Should his lordship carry out his intention he will find none more loud in his praise than those—apart from the publicans—who are meantime apprehensive of the consequence of such an apparently sweeping change.

IN the tabular statement given in last month's Social Reformer we expressed a pretty confident anticipation that Mr. Samuel Laing, M.P., would be re-elected for Orkney and Shetland. Our anticipation has been realised, Mr. Laing being elected by 896 to 518 polled for his opponent, Dr. Badenoch. Mr. Laing has been one of the staunchest supporters Sir Wilfrid Lawson has had, having voted constantly with the hon. baronet. He has voted five times in favour of the second reading of the Permissive Bill and twice in favour of the local option resolution. The electors of his constituency, judging by the overwhelming majority by which he was returned, appear proud of him. It would have been better for our cause and perhaps for other burning questions if southern constituencies had acted as patriotically and intelligently as the electors of Orkney and Shetland have done.

THE contest for the representation of the Wigtown Burghs—Stranraer, Wigtown, Whithorn, and New Galloway—has terminated in the rejection of the Lord Advocate, and the election of M. J. Stewart, Esq., who was rejected only last month by the election of the Lord Advocate. At that time his lordship gained by twelve votes, this time he has lost by twenty-three. We are sorry at this result, not that we have any aversion to Mr. M. J. Stewart, M.P.—far from it; he voted with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and will likely do so again; but simply because his lordship held more advanced views on our question than Mr. Stewart, and because he is Lord Advocate. He might have exerted a powerful influence in our favour when the Local Option Liquor Bill for Scotland was brought before the Legislature. Even Mr. Stewart must see that in this light the Lord Advocate was much the superior man for the temperance party. However, the electors of the Wigtown Burghs evidently do not know their own mind. We do not envy them their preference of an ordinary member of the House to a member of the Government. The preference is absurd on the face of it. We earnestly trust his lordship, in his next attempt to secure a seat, may meet with better fortune.

IT seems that the brewers have been comparing notes, and find that excise officers have been paying visits to various breweries of a nature to suggest to their owners the imposition of additional taxation. This is a singular inference. No merchant or manufacturer in the kingdom would draw the same conclusion, but no one is in partnership with a guilty Government except the brewers and distillers, and the partnership is one that, if broken, must result in the ruin of Bung, Tap & Co., and not of the Government that protects them. The question of the brewer then, when he sees his partner's officer prowling about his premises, is not what does he want, but how much taxes does he mean to impose? With the public another view can be taken. Is not the liquor traffic taxed heavily enough? Well, as we are against deriving taxation from vice and public immorality, we will not stop to discuss that question. But if the question put was, Are the distillers and brewers taxed unequally? we would say, very unequally; and so long as taxes are to be imposed on a system for promoting vice, poverty, and crime, it is scarcely fair to compel one branch of this system to disgorge more than the other. The distillers will tell you that previous to 1860, when the duty on spirits was 8s. in England and Scotland, and 6s. 2d. in Ireland, was the golden age of the spirit trade. It got on splendidly—"the 8s. duty had so adapted itself to the peculiarities of the retail trade that neither those engaged in it nor the consumers felt the tax to be oppressive." Mr. Gladstone, however, equalised and raised the duty to 10s. for the three kingdoms in 1860, and from that hour the distiller has been in a declining trade, not merely from the high duty, but from the fact that the brewer has not been taxed so heavily as him. It will be best to show this by an example. A distiller from a quarter of malt produces 18 gallons of proof spirit, on which of course, at 10s. per gallon, the duty is £9. The brewer, from the same quantity, extracts 12 gallons of spirit, on which the duty would be, at 10s., £6. He only pays £1 1s. 8d. Why this unequal tax, this seeming favouritism to the brewer? Simply because the Government has been pleased, in the case of the distiller, to tax the manufactured product, and in the case of the brewer the raw material. No wonder that the beery dovesots have been fluttered by the visits of the excise officers. If Mr. Gladstone succeeds in equalising the spirit and beer duties by as heavily taxing the latter, as it is roundly asserted he has the former, we may soon find a vast accession to the ranks of the abstainers, and an increased determination on the part of the great nation to no longer poison itself by alcohol for the sake of the revenue, or, as we fear, the poor dupe of a customer will pay his additional penny with rather a proud consciousness that he is patriot; and that in the case of the Alabama Claims and the Abyssinian war, so in the case of the Indian deficit, he is drinking the nation out of a difficulty.

LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION.

By the time that our issue is in the hands of our readers the exact date on which Sir Wilfrid Lawson will submit his local option resolution to Parliament will be announced. Now our friends may, looking to the credit they deservedly received for their efforts all through the late beer Parliament, consider that less strenuous efforts may suffice to impress a Liberal House of Commons. There never was a greater mistake. They require to remind honourable members of the promises made by them during their candidature, and to urge them to fulfil them. Hence the efforts they have so patriotically made in previous sessions are still required. Honourable members have no means wherewith to measure the determination of the supporters of prohibition to secure power to veto the liquor traffic but by the number and the respectful urgency of their communications. Friends can—in cases where they are in ignorance of the private address of their representative—address him at the "House of Commons, London, S.W." We earnestly advise them, when they have written him, to intimate to the Secretary of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow, that they have done so, so that should a deputation in London be necessary its members may know that they have done so. If they follow the course of action here suggested they may have the proud satisfaction of seeing the local option resolution carried this session. If this be the case, then, the Government will find it necessary to take up the matter by bringing in a bill to give effect to the action of the House. In the event of their doing so we may fully anticipate a stronger bill than the Licensing Bill of 1871. Truly our movement will be a power when the strongest Liberal Government yet seen in Britain has to legislate in accordance with its aims.

INTELLIGENCE.

Dr. F. R. Lees ruptured a blood-vessel while in a bath near Regent's Park, on the 20th April. Dr. N. S. Kerr, who was called in, has enjoined absolute rest for a time.

The Queen has granted Mr. S. C. Hall, the author of "Sir Jasper" and "The Old Story," editor of the Art Journal, &c., a pension of £150, in recognition of his long services to art and literature.

MEMORANDUM FOR RATEPAYERS.—Less drunkenness means less drinking. Less drinking means less publicans' profits. Less publicans' profits means less crime, misery, pauperism, rates, and taxes.

As a check upon "Temperance Tramps" the Red Ribbon State Central Committee of Michigan advise all Red Ribbon Clubs in that State not to employ any strangers to address them who do not possess the Committee's certificate.

CURE OF INEBRIATES.—I am informed by an ancient physician that the customary treatment of gradually reducing the alcoholic doses of an habitual drunkard is an entire mistake. The only real cure is to knock drink off altogether.—Old Parr in "Life."

Fun says:—"There is not the slightest doubt that the Conservatives did themselves harm by going in for the publicans. Had they showed themselves equal to public interests that have no connection with taverns, it is possible they might not have been bunged up."

About 20,000 gallons of beer were very appropriately and usefully employed in extinguishing a fire in a German brewery in Monte Video some time ago. The beer was not, however, resorted to until the water supply was entirely exhausted. What a pity that taking it into the human constitution generates instead of quenching thirst.

NO DANGER IN THE PLEDGE.—Dr. Richardson and Dr. Gull assure us that there is no danger in cutting off the liquor: no need of tapering off—cutting off a dog's tail an inch at a time to make it easier. And here is a pregnant fact. Of several hundred women in the Wandsworth Workhouse, five hundred had been drunkards, but no harm came to any one of them from sudden and total abstinence. This fact is conclusive. If alcohol were suddenly to vanish out of the world, and there were no means of making any more, no human being would be the worse for its disappearance, and millions would be the better.

SPREAD OF TEMPERANCE.—A curious instance of the spread of temperance is to be found in the fact of the publication of a weekly paper in Shanghai, China, called The Temperance Union, which advocates the movement in a thoroughgoing style. It is printed in the Chinese characters.

The friends of the United Kingdom Alliance in London are to hold a Bazaar in behalf of its funds in the Canon St. Hotel on the 7th, 8th, and 9th curt. The treasurer is Mrs. Ellis, 51 Jewin St., E.C. The secretaries are Miss Stuchberry, 60 West Smithfield, E.C., and Miss Hilton, 234 Burdett Road, E. Goods may be sent to Alliance Offices, 52 Parliament Street, S.W.

ELECTION DAYS AND PUBLIC HOUSES.—A letter to the Times calls attention to, and advocates the adoption of, the system which almost universally prevails throughout the United States—namely, that on every election day—whether for Federal, State, or municipal purposes—all bars and refreshment rooms where liquor is sold, are by law compelled to remain closed during polling hours.

At a charity dinner given recently in London the chairman, a distinguished member of the Corporation of the City of London, asked for Apollinaris. A bottle was produced, and about three-fourths of a tumbler drank. Being compelled abruptly to retire, it was discovered that Hunyadi Jairos had been given him instead of what he asked. By and by the perils of drinking at public dinners will be as great as those of railway travelling.

Mr. Kegan Paul, at the meeting of the National Temperance League on 3rd ult., said "he took exception to the view that the temperance movement was a leaven from above to below. He believed it was the reverse, and that this movement was from the working-men who felt their own great needs. The movement was reaching the upper classes, who were engulfed in the evil to the neck. He objected to the view that total abstinence was self-denial—he regarded it as self-benefit."

PARLIAMENTARY NEWS—ABSTAINERS.—In the Parliament of 1874 there were eleven abstainers; in the present Parliament we can count twenty-three, viz.: Sir W. Lawson, Sir Charles Dilke, Sir Charles Reed, Right Hon. John Bright, W. S. Allen, Samuel Morley, A. J. Mundella, W. S. Caine, Joseph Cowen, Thomas Burt, W. Fowler, A. Pease, G. Palmer, Hugh Mason, Saml. Plimsoll, D. Davies, J. P. Corry, M. Richardson, Thos. Greer, John Givan, B. Whitworth, A. M. Sullivan, and J. L. Finnegan.

NEW SUPPORTERS.—We are glad to note among the new supporters of Sir Wilfrid Lawson the following gentlemen: Lord Ramsay, Sir Charles Reed, Hon. L. Stanley, R. Jardine, F. Henderson, R. T. Middleton, J. Dick-Peddie, Capt. H. Maxwell, Major Hamilton, S. Williamson, J. C. Boiton, Hugh Mason, Hon. A. Elliot, Prof. Bryce, Prof. Rogers, Firth, Thomasson, Tillet, W. Fowler, Wren, A. Pease, J. A. Blake, Hillingworth, Armitage, J. Stagg, A. Arnold, W. S. Caine, A. Leitke, and F. G. Richardson.

DR. KENNEDY ON THE DRINK TRAFFIC.—Dr. Kennedy, at the Synod of Ross last month, is reported to have spoken as follows on the report on temperance given in by Mr. Grant, Tain:—Dr. Kennedy expressed in general terms his approval of the report. There were, he remarked, some things stated which he perhaps did not entirely agree with, but they were all of one mind as to the extreme desirability of reducing the temptations to drunkenness within the bounds of the Synod. A mere dram-shop—a shop in which neither lodging, accommodation, nor food was supplied, but a shop in which merely drams or intoxicating drinks were supplied—was, in all places, under all conditions, and in all circumstances, unnecessary, and the Synod should use all legitimate means to reduce their number. Dr. Kennedy concluded by complimenting the convener of the committee, Mr. Grant, on his zeal and earnestness in this important matter, and submitted a formal motion for the approval of the report. — Caithness Courier.

Mr. William Blackwood, temperance lecturer, gave a sermon on total abstinence in the Benevolent Institution, Thurso, last month. There was a large attendance of young people present, who seemed much interested in the cause of temperance. He also delivered a lecture in the West Free Church. The subject was, "Our Political Prospects regarding the Temperance Movement." His references and illustrations were well chosen, and much admired by the audience. The Thurso folk are seemingly alive to the evils of the drink traffic, and desirous for the suppression of dram-taking customs. — Caithness Courier.

OPENING OF BRIDGETON TEMPERANCE INSTITUTE.—On Saturday, 17th April, the "Bridgeton Temperance Institute" was formally opened. A large gathering participated in the opening ceremony. The Hon. Lord Provost Collins presided; and along with him on the platform were Mr. R. T. Middleton, M.P.; Rev. Messrs. Edgar, Howie, and Campbell; Bailies Waddell and Thomson; ex-Bailie Torrens; Councillors Stuart and Moncur; ex-Councillor Ure, &c. The Rev. Mr. Wilson opened the meeting with prayer; and speeches were delivered by the Lord Provost; Mr. R. T. Middleton, M.P.; Rev. Mr. Howie, Rev. Dr. Marshall Lang, Bailie Waddell, and others. The proceedings, which were highly successful, were enlivened by a choir under the leadership of Mr. W. M. Miller, and terminated with the usual votes of thanks.

MR. J. H. RAPER.—This highly-esteemed reformer and prohibitionist is expected from France early in June with his newly-wedded wife. Sir Wilfrid Lawson has found in Mr. Raper a files Achates, and desirous of seizing an apt occasion to honour him, has suggested the institution of a fund to purchase a marriage present for the happy couple. He has asked Mr. Caine, M.P., of Scarborough, to manage the little affair, and promised a contribution of £200 towards it. Mr. Caine is already able to announce that, up to 20th April, subscriptions to the amount of £1332 14s. have been received. Not one word is required on our part to recommend the claims of Mr. Raper to such an appropriate recognition of his services. He has been known, read, and heard of all men, and is the right man in the right place.

THE CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT, 1878.—The Canada Casket says: "On Tuesday last the long expected judgment of the Supreme Court was given at Ottawa in regard to the constitutionality of the Canada Temperance Act, and we are glad to say that the judgment sustains the constitutionality of the law as it now stands. It will be remembered that, last year, the Supreme Court of New Brunswick gave a judgment declaring the Act unconstitutional, as it was beyond the prerogative of the Dominion Parliament to enact such a law. It was from this decision that the appeal was made to the Supreme Court—our highest legal jurisdiction,—and the decision this week therefore settles the question so far as its constitutionality is concerned. The way is now clear for the friends of temperance and prohibition throughout the Dominion. For years such a law as we now possess has been agitated for, and now that we have it there should be a general move all along the line to secure its adoption in the largest possible number of counties. Already the Act has been adopted in 15 counties in the various Provinces, and there is good reason to hope, during this year, that it will be submitted and carried in many others. Let the necessary petitions be put in circulation at once, let meetings or conventions be held in each county or city if necessary, and let us have definite, united, and successful action in the cause of right and humanity. 'Speak to the Children of Israel that they go forward.'"

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The quarterly meeting of the Managing Committee of this recently formed organisation was held in Glasgow on the 15th ultimo. Captain Hatfield presided. Resolutions to the effect—(1) That as out of 25 ministers and elders present at the Free Synod of Glenelg, only three or four were not pledged abstainers, the League rejoices at the fact, and expresses its earnest trust that other Highland Presbyteries and Synods may be soon found in the same gratifying relation to the temperance cause. (2.) That the best thanks of the League is heartily tendered to all rendering assistance to the cause of temperance in the Highlands by means of sermons, lectures, and personal example. (3.) That in order that efficient and permanent Gaelic lecturers and speakers may be engaged without farther delay, a guarantee fund be raised, independent of the ordinary subscriptions, and the Committee urgently recommend friends of the cause to co-operate in carrying out this laudable scheme. The resolutions were cordially adopted. The Secretary, Mr. Simon Finlayson, submitted the quarterly report, which bore that although only three months in existence 179 members are on the roll; 1216 pledge cards had been sold; subscriptions and donations to the amount of £35 14s. received; and £10 1s. 5d. collected at public meetings. As some promised subscriptions are still unpaid, the Committee would be glad if the friends who promised them would kindly send them to the Secretary, at 360 Dumbarton Road, Glasgow.

SONS OF TEMPERANCE FRIENDLY SOCIETY.—The twenty-first annual session of this society opened in the Oddfellows' Hall, Edinburgh, on Monday, 17th ult. There was a very large attendance of representatives. The Most Worthy Patriarch, M. McLeod, in his address stated that notwithstanding the trying character of the past year there had been an increase in numbers and funds. The society had not succeeded in introducing the order into Ireland. The officers had been, like most of the members, active in burying the "publican's" Parliament and bringing into existence one practically pledged to local option as understood by Sir Wilfrid Lawson. The Most Worthy Scribe, Brother Clarke, submitted the statistics of the Order, showing:—Married members, 10,236; single, 3,873; half members, 370; total adult membership, 14,479. The death rate was 8.84 per 1000 during the year. The total income was £43,333 9s. 9d., being an increase of £1,036 16s. on the year. On Tuesday a memorial to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone in favour of Sunday closing for England and Wales, and also in favour of local option as understood by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, was heartily adopted. This latter subject was to be brought before the members for Edinburgh by memorial. On Wednesday a resolution was carried declaring that the brother who should apply for absence on his own or another's behalf violated his obligation. A proposal to eliminate smoking from the cadet's pledge was rejected. The session closed with the usual formalities.

SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The anniversary meetings of this organization took place in the beginning of May, and were characterised by a fair amount of success. The first of the series was the usual City Bands of Hope demonstration on Saturday, 1st May. The City Hall was crowded. Alex. Allan, Esq., presided, and addresses were delivered by the chairman and Rev. James Scott. The Springvale band played at intervals, and the young evidently fully enjoyed their May-day outing. The annual sermon was preached in the City Hall by Rev. Dr. Wallace. Mr. Lambeth presided at the organ, and the choir of the rev. doctor's congregation led the praise. The annual meeting was held in the City Hall on Monday, 3rd ult., and we regretted to find the attendance only fair. Lord Provost Collins, president of the League, occupied the chair. His Lordship gave a statement embracing a summary of the annual report, and was very effective. Addresses were then delivered by Rev. J. A. Johnston, J. McCredy, Thomas Evans, ex-Bailie Lewis, and D. Crossley, and the proceedings terminated with the benediction. On Tuesday, 4th, the members and friends breakfasted together in the Trades' Hall under the genial presidency of Bailie Lamberton. Grace was said by Rev. Mr. Macphail, and addresses delivered by the chairman, Rev. J. McCredy, Rev. William Halliday, J. Torrens, Esq., J.P., representative Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association; Rev. Mr. Evans, Rev. J. McLean, Rev. W. Ross, Messrs. R. Simpson and D. Crossley. The proceedings were of the most cheering character. The business meeting was held in the Trades' Hall at 11 A.M. A. Allan, in the absence of the Lord Provost, in the chair. The thirty-sixth annual report was then submitted. From it we gather that the League has made marked progress in all its departments. The jubilee celebration was a great success; the conversazioni in Glasgow were very interesting and successful. Eulogistic reference is made to the Lord Provost's temperance entertainments, and to special deputations, occasional advocacy, and the travelling agents. The Register soirees amply fulfilled their object. The publication department was as usual active, 40,000 volumes being issued during the year. The joint-executive's action about a Local Option Bill for Scotland receives laudatory notice, as does Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, which had the energetic support of the League, &c. The report was adopted. The Treasurer's statement showed that the income was £8115 11s. 9d., the total expenditure £8062 19s. 11d., leaving a balance to carry forward of £52 11s. 10d. The income showed an increase of £290 7s. 9d. The statement was adopted. Resolutions thanking ministers who delivered anniversary sermons, representatives of kindred associations, the directors, and the officials. Mr. Macnair's annual motion in favour of the total suppression of the whole liquor traffic was negatived. This meeting concluded with the usual formalities. A most enjoyable social meeting concluded the anniversary proceedings.

U. P. SYNOD.—This reverend body met on the 3rd ult., in the new buildings of the Synod in Castle Terrace, Edinburgh, formerly the Edinburgh Theatre. On the 4th, for the first time, a complete statistical statement was submitted. There are 550 congregations in the 39 presbyteries; 10,630 baptisms, being a decrease of 179; this is an average of 19 for each congregation. Among these were 109 adults. There are 352 Sabbath schools, with 10,805 teachers, and 84,075 scholars; 172,170 persons are in full communion with the church, being an increase of 1,964. There are 101 students at the classes in the Theological Hall. The congregational income is £255,402, 17s., being a decrease of £14,352, 0s. 4d. The average membership is 317; the average contribution for each congregation being £409, 16s. 6d., a decrease in the latter of £30, 8s. The missionary income is £79,268, 19s. 9d., a decrease of £5,641, 11s. 2d. The average contribution per member is £1, 15s., which shows a decrease of 2s. 3d per member. The legacies received during the year amounted to £32,649, 12s. 3d., or £11,378, 17s. 7d. less than the previous year. The total amount received by the church in 36½ years has been £8,535,966. On the 7th a conference on temperance took place, Professor Calderwood, Moderator, in the chair. Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown said that the prestige of the ministers was being lowered, and he thought that blame might attach to them from their apathy to the temperance movement. He had abstained for 45 years. If only £1 a head was spent by the membership of the church, that would be £174,000, and one-fourth of that would relieve them from their difficulties, and fill their treasury to overflowing. Rev. Dr. Ritchie recommended the formation of Bands of Hope. Rev. Mr. Goldie condemned the frightful havoc among missions by alcoholic liquors. Dr. Wallace pointed to the triumph of Local Option at the General Election. The conference then closed. Mr. Rankine, Cupar Fife, laid on the table the report on temperance and morals. He indicated the healthy progress of the temperance movement by (1.) the attention paid to inculcating temperance principles and practice on the young; (2.) the advance of medical testimony in favour of abstinence; (3.) Organization of sectional effort in the army, navy, among railway servants and women; (4.) public-houses without intoxicating liquor. Various overtures in favour of Bands of Hope, early closing, &c., were submitted—Mr. Watson submitting that the drinking customs led many to fall from church membership; Dr. A. Thomson submitted, 1st, that the church discourage drinking customs at funeral, induction, and ordination dinners; 2nd, that a sermon be preached on some Sabbath of December; 3rd, that liberty be given to the committee to petition in favour of any parliamentary bill for the restriction of the liquor traffic; and 4th, that the committee petition in favour of the closing public-houses at an earlier hour than eleven o'clock. Rev. J. Kay proposed to enjoin the committee to petition in favour of all the measures that might be brought before parliament, especially in behalf of a Local Option Bill for Scotland. Rev. J. A. Johnston moved a resolution far short of Rev. Mr. Kay's, seeing that it excluded all reference to the Local Option Bill for Scotland. Dr. Thomson's motion was carried. Later on Dr. Thomson moved that the Public Morals Committee deal exclusively with temperance, and the public morals would be otherwise provided for. Agreed to. The United Presbyterian Ministers' Abstinence Society's Breakfast Party was held in the New College Buildings on the 5th ult., Rev. Principal Cairns in the chair. Rev. Mr. M'Kerrow having asked a blessing, the chairman introduced the proceedings in a brief but able address. Rev. Dr. Reid reported a loss of 6 members, the adhesion of 17, giving a present membership of 212 ministers, being an addition of 11 in the course of one year. Addresses were delivered by Bailie Selkirk, Rev. Dr. Hutton, Rev. Dr. Wallace, Prof. Calderwood, Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown, and Rev. W. Ross. There was also an overflow meeting, which too was largely attended.

FREE TRADE AND COMPENSATION.

A LECTURE on the above subject was delivered in North Public School, Dysart, on Monday evening, 26th April, by Mr. J. H. Waterston. The lecture was under the auspices of the Dysart Temperance Society, and the chair was occupied by Rev. Mr. Guthrie, president of the society, who briefly introduced the lecturer.

Mr. Waterston said his reasons for taking the subject of free trade and compensation was because these subjects had been raised by their political leaders, and considerable importance was attached to their views on the question. He admitted the licensing question was beset with difficulties. Since it first began in 1504, in the reign of Henry Seventh, it had been a source of perpetual annoyance. Lord Hartington had said that free trade in drink had never had a fair trial in this country. This, however, could not be said to be true. The retail sale of spirits was absolutely free until the year 1736, when the first license duty was imposed. The excise duty from 1684 to 1741 varied from 2d. to 6d. per gallon, a tax so very small that we may say both the production and sale of spirits were carried on in England from 1684 to 1736 on the principle of free trade, and what was the result? The consumption of spirits increased from 527,000 gallons in 1684 to 5,394,000 gallons in 1735, the year in which the first license duty was imposed. The effects of the free trade system on the morals of the people was still more marked: their habits became such that in 1751 very stringent measures had to be passed. These restrictive measures proved powerful restraints to excessive drinking, and the consumption of spirits steadily diminished till in 1761 it had fallen from 5,394,000 to 3,181,000 gallons, and continued to decrease till in 1781 it had fallen to 2,000,000 gallons. Then it was argued by Mr. Gladstone and Lord Hartington that the free trade experiment tried in Liverpool from 1862 to 1866 had the effect of reducing the number of criminal apprehensions even with an increase in the number of licensed houses, whereas when the restriction system was again adopted the apprehensions were considerably increased. He admitted the correctness of the figures quoted, but was the decrease owing solely or partly to the adoption of the free trade system? He thought not. They all knew that a committee of the House of Lords had sat on the question of intemperance, and had examined witnesses from all parts of the United Kingdom—and it happened that these witnesses included the Mayor, Chief Constable, and two Justices of Liverpool, who were in office while the experiment was tried. These pointed out that in 1864, the year when the number of arrests showed the first decrease, a night closing Act was passed, which produced the best effect, and in 1866 a fearful depression of trade prevailed, which had the effect of further reducing the number of apprehensions. Then in 1869 the flood of commercial prosperity set in and continued till 1874. Wages rose extremely high, more money was spent in drink, and while the shops were reduced in number they were greatly augmented in size—drunkenness prevailed to an alarming extent, and the arrests were considerably increased thereby. Mr. Waterston regretted that this free trade was not continued as it might have proved a better argument. Touching the question of compensation, he said the statements of Mr. Gladstone were greatly misunderstood. All the Premier had said on this was that if vested interests had grown up under the present system compensation would have to be considered. So say we. But had vested interests grown up; he thought not. The liquor dealer had only a privilege, he had no legal right. The question of compensation was a mere ghost to try and frighten them. The certificate of a publican was only endorsed for twelve months, and at the expiry of his term he could be deprived of his license by the action of the magistrates and no compensation allowed, and he saw no reason why a publican should be compensated if he lost his license by a popular vote. Mr. Waterston concluded his lecture by enforcing the claims of local popular control as the only effective method of at present dealing with the difficulty. On the motion of the Chairman a cordial vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. Waterston for his able and instructive lecture, and a similar compliment to the Chairman terminated the proceedings.

GLASGOW ABSTAINERS' UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union was held on the 5th ult., in the Religious Institution Rooms—Mr. John Lindsay presiding. Mr. Airlie, secretary, read the report for the past year. It referred to the domestic mission in Calton and Gorbals districts, to the cookery classes, the public-houses without the drink, the street coffee-stands, and to the Kilmun Seaside Homes. Regarding the last institution, the report says:—"Of the 1009 patients during the past year—of whom 497 were males and 512 were females—193 were under fourteen years of age, 367 above fourteen and under twenty-five, 375 above twenty-five and under fifty-five, and 74 above fifty-five. It will thus be seen that the great bulk of the patients were within the more active and useful period of their lives. The length of stay at the Home for each patient was from two to four and five weeks, and in special cases for a longer period. As regards results, Miss Blair, the esteemed matron, reports that 737 left able for work, 178 improved, and 94 no better. She also adds—'During the past year we have had a larger number of respectable working men and women in the Home than at any former time, a class usually able to save something to help in times of sickness, but the long-continued depression of trade, want of work, and bad health have reduced many of them to a very sad condition, and for the first time in the lives of some of them, they were thankful to receive in the Home the comforts they need but can no longer provide for themselves. We can gather from some of them that they have had a hard battle to fight with poverty and sickness before coming here.' The ordinary income from subscriptions and otherwise for the support of the Home during the year has been £956 12s. 9d. There have also been two legacies, viz. :—£500 (less legacy duty) from the Trustees of the late John Ross, jun., Esq., and £20 from the Trustees of the late Major Robert Walkinshaw Young. In order to meet the annual estimated expenditure a sum of not less than £1200 is required. The ordinary income for the past year having fallen short of this, the directors were under the necessity of drawing somewhat freely upon the legacy fund, which they regret." The report also referred to the fact that the City Hall Concerts had been financially prosperous, and that, on the whole, the funds of the Union were in a much more favourable position than they were last year. The report was adopted on the motion of Mr. W. Fife, seconded by Mr. Hector. Office-bearers were appointed, and the proceedings concluded with thanks to the chairman.

THE SCOTTISH CONGREGATIONAL TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

THE thirteenth annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday, 13th April, in connection with the annual meetings of the Congregational Union of Scotland, in Ewing Place Church, Glasgow. The Rev. G. Rutherford, in absence of the president, occupied the chair. After the meeting was opened with prayer, the secretary, Rev. James McLean, Glasgow, read the Thirteenth Annual Report, from which we make a few interesting extracts:—"When we go down beneath the surface, many and striking facts are soon discovered to prove that, in reference to the drink system of the land, these are better days than those in which the temperance movement originated. But while the history of those fifty years justified the jubilation of the last few months, there are abundant reasons all around us why temperance people should review the whole line of action, and, if possible, adopt wiser methods and seek a livelier inspiration to enable them to reach the end, which, alas! is yet too far in the future. As long as the enemy is at the gate there is no time for rest. . . . The annual conference with the students took place in the Hall of Hope Park Congregational Church, Edinburgh, and our respected president, Mr. Watt, occupying the chair. A number of temperance friends resident in Edinburgh and neighbourhood were present, some of whom took part in the proceedings. . . . At the beginning of winter your committee issued a circular to all the pastors of our churches requesting them to preach on intemperance on Sabbath, 28th December, or a Sabbath as near to that as convenient. We are not in a position to say how far this request was acceded to, but we know that a number of our pastors did so, and, no doubt, with good results. It would be of great advantage to the cause of temperance if arrangements could be made to have one Sabbath in the year which would be known throughout the churches as Temperance Sunday. . . . Agreeably with the practice of the last few years, the secretary wrote to the convener of the local committee of the Congregational Union expressing the hope that no alcoholic liquor would be found in the refreshment room connected with the forthcoming meetings of the Union in this city, and also suggesting that the joint-communion service should be observed with non-alcoholic wine. As regards this latter point, 'use and wont' have decided against us. . . . Your committee, fully alive to the need of farther legislative action in relation to the traffic in intoxicating drinks, prepared and forwarded a petition to the House of Commons in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution. A similar petition was also forwarded from the Edinburgh Conference, signed by Dr. Lowe, as chairman of the meeting. . . . The committee close their report by earnestly urging all the friends of sobriety in our churches to earnest, persistent, prayerful efforts—for intemperance and its accompanying evils can only be effectively grappled with by the devoted followers of the Lord Jesus Christ." The financial statement showed that the income of the society was steadily improving. The reports were adopted, workers thanked, and a resolution in favour of the formation of Bands of Hope unanimously passed. The proceedings terminated with the benediction.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE FAR NORTH.

(To the Editor of the "Social Reformer.")

SIR,—As I understand that a little information regarding the progress of the movement in the various localities of the operations of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which one visits, is generally acceptable to your readers, I do not hesitate to proffer mine. My last epistle to the Social Reformer related to Lerwick, where I spent eight days among the temperance friends, and experienced much pleasure from my sojourn. Since that time I have visited Kirkwall, in Orkney, and it is gratifying to tell of that northern burgh, that the temperance cause is in a healthy state. There are two Good Templar Lodges in the town and a temperance society. They have an excellent hall in connection with the order, for which the members are largely indebted to Mr. James Walls, a gentleman who takes a marked interest in the temperance reformation. You will be pleased to see that Kirkwall will not be unrepresented in our lists this year. The Rev. Mr. Pirie and others assisted me; and while I had the satisfaction of addressing two good meetings, my enjoyment was enhanced by spending an evening with Mr. J. Phillips, of the Scottish Temperance League, and in listening to a lecture by our talented brother, the Rev. J. J. Cooper, of the Independent Order of Good Templars. From Kirkwall I went to Shapinshay—an island a short distance north of the mainland of Orkney. I spoke three times in the Rev. Mr. Tiplady's church on the Sabbath day, and found a comfortable home in his manse, where I tasted of the pleasures of his hospitality and those of his goodwife. Shapinshay contains a thousand of a population, and no public-house threatens the amenity of the island. If the editor of the Scotsman was north there, he would hear no complaint about "the liberty of the subject," and no clamour about the absence of "refreshments," unless he himself felt disposed to raise the vulgar cry. The distance from Kirkwall to Stromness is fifteen miles, and you get an easy drive, along a good road, by the mail gig. Mrs. Rendall's lodgings are most comfortable—there, indeed, the weary find themselves at rest. My meetings were fairly attended. In this town I formed several agreeable connections, which I hope will be lasting. The principles of prohibition, which I advocated, did not fail to give us a respectable list of subscribers. Captain Robertson, of Stromness, maintains a steady loyalty to our association. I crossed the Pentland Firth on a somewhat stormy morning. The sea is frequently rough. The steamer rolled and pitched very much, and the waves broke over her deck; and as I had to hold on by a post, there was no leisure to survey the old Man of Hoy, or watch the waves dashing in surges of foam on the rocks of Dunnet Head. However, I arrived safely at Thurso. Here I met some very kind friends, who interested themselves in getting up meetings for me, and through their influence, I am glad to say we were pretty successful. I was delighted with the number of young men who attended my meeting on the Monday evening. One cannot feel too grateful when he is privileged to speak to a number of young men on the principles of popular prohibition. Most people believe now that the liquor traffic is not righteous, and the thoughts of young men especially should be directed to its removal. It is a corrupt social institution licensed by the State, and it can only be broken down by the same means by which it has been set up. It is the creature of law and must be destroyed by law. Never did the drink trade feel alarmed till the United Kingdom Alliance unfurled the banner of prohibitory law. The Messrs. Waters, Mr. Bain, and others showed me many kind attentions. Mr. Campbell, librarian, conducted me through the museum, and showed me a number of curiosities, amongst which were the beetles and botanical specimens of Mr. Robert Dick, the Thurso philosopher and naturalist. Altogether it was a pleasure for me to be at Thurso, and I don't mind how soon I return to that town. Thurso will not be out of our register this year. There are two lodges in Thurso, one of the I.O.G.T., and one of the U.T.A. The next town I visited was Wick. There is a splendid Temperance Hall in Wick, which is generously placed at the disposal of temperance reformers by the committee of the temperance society. I availed myself of the opportunity afforded and held two meetings, but I regret that they were not largely attended. However, I managed to secure the adhesion of some first-rate men, and spent a happy night with the members of the Pultneytown Lodge U.T.A., getting them to give us their support. I must arrange to visit Wick again about the beginning of winter. Helmsdale is a nice little town about thirty-seven miles south of Wick. A temperance association has sprung up here under the able presidency of the Rev. D. Macrae, F.C. minister. About 200 were present at my meeting, and at the close 8 men, I think, took the pledge. There was an air of sociality and friendliness about the gathering which contrasted greatly with the formality and stiffness which are occasionally seen at temperance meetings. This is no doubt principally due to the genial spirit breathed into the association by the kindly words and animating presence of Mr. Macrae. I was pleased with the association, and if it is not presumptuous in me to say so, I must candidly confess that I think that many ministers have not yet learned the good which they might do in this present world, if they would shed the fragrance of their sympathy oftener among the people. There is a fine instance of this in Helmsdale. The Highland Railway skirts the coast from Helmsdale to Golspie, a distance of seventeen miles. I got to the latter town early in the morning. I went and meditated among the tombs for nearly an hour till the Post-office opened. I cannot tell you how joyful I felt when I read in the Alliance News the declared constitutionality of the "Canada Temperance Act." You know that this Act is almost identical with the Permissive Bill, and you see how it has sent the liquor traffic of the Dominion into consternation. I like to see a poor dissipated fellow brought into a lodge or a temperance society and induced to sign the total abstinence pledge, but my faith rests much more in changing the law in order to make prohibition possible. At Golspie I had my first open-air meeting for the season. It was an experiment in the village, but the friends thought it should be tried. Considering that we had no advertisement, it was moderately successful. There is a lodge of the I.O.G.T. in the village, with a number of earnest men doing their best to promote the cause. Both the ministers of the village entered their names on our list, and a number of others gave me cheering evidences of their appreciation of our movement. So you will observe Golspie is not to be behind in assisting to bring round the day of triumph. Truly Sir Willfrid Lawson is gaining many friends. I hear his name spoken of with admiration, and one cannot help feeling a justifiable pride in having him for a leader in the country and in the House of Commons. Dornoch is seven miles south from Golspie. It is one of the burghs of the Wick group, and is pleasantly situated on the north shore of the Dornoch Firth. It was quite unusual for a Permissive Bill agent or an Optional Prohibitionist to enter within its quiet precincts. I found a good friend in Councillor Frazer and another in the Rev. George R. Kennedy, of the Free Church. One meets with sweet surprises sometimes in this transitory world, and I was destined to meet with an agreeable one in Dornoch. Being informed that the tutor of Mr. Kennedy's sons was a Mr. Hunter, son of the late Rev. George Hunter of the U.P. Church, Tilliecultry, I replied that I knew his father. In a few minutes I had the pleasure of shaking hands with Mr. John L. Hunter. Oh, how our interview recalled the old Ochil hills and the clear winding Devon. Many of your readers will be aware that the Rev. George Hunter was a sound temperance reformer, a man of public spirit, and an eloquent preacher of the gospel. The son is following in his father's footsteps. From Dornoch I went to Tain, but meantime I was compelled to make a short stay. I, however, met several of the warm friends of the temperance movement. I wanted to get on to Dingwall. This burgh sits snugly between two hills at the western extremity of the Cromarty Firth. When the history of the temperance reformation comes to be written, the careful historian will certainly not exclude Dingwall from his pages. Here is one of the best lodges of the Good Templar Order I have seen in Scotland. It thrives, although some people might think that it does not breathe the most congenial atmosphere for cultivating the virtues of total abstinence; still, I think, we may rest assured that many social and moral reformers will emanate from Dingwall, and if all our lodges could show a front like this one they would hasten the day of Scotland's emancipation from the bondage of the drink curse. I hope to have a few interesting things to tell you of next month.—Yours truly,

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD.

POISONOUS UNFERMENTED WINE.

68 Kensington High Street,
London, May, 1880.

SIR,—The enclosed paragraph from the Manchester Examiner and Times has had a very wide circulation, and is calculated not only to do me a great personal injury, but to seriously prejudice the discussion of the Sacramental Wine question. You will, therefore, greatly oblige me by publishing the following correspondence relating thereto, as the best corrective I can devise for so unfortunate a publication.—I am, very truly yours,

FRANK WRIGHT.

"To the Chairman of the Health Committee,
Salford, April 27th, 1880.

"SIR,—The following paragraph from the Manchester Examiner and Times, and quoted therefrom into other widely-circulating newspapers, has been brought to my notice:—

PUBLIC ANALYST'S REPORT.—A DANGEROUS NON-ALCOHOLIC WINE.

Mr. J. Carter Bell, the borough analyst, reported that during the last quarter he had analysed 138 samples, including 90 of milk and 26 of beer. He found 43 samples adulterated, viz., 38 of milk, one of unfermented wine, one of oatcake, one of whisky, and two of beer. The sample of unfermented wine contained a considerable amount of copper, which might be seriously detrimental to health. In warm weather a person might be inclined to drink a large quantity of that acid, sugary compound, which contained a very dangerous dose of copper salt, a proof that it had been prepared in a careless and ignorant manner.

You may not be aware that I am the principal maker of unfermented wine in this country, and that besides me the only manufacturer whose wine is now in the British market is the Liverpool firm recently prosecuted under the Adulteration of Food and Drugs Act. It is obvious that the circulation of such a statement as this is calculated to do me a serious injury unless explained more definitely than in this paragraph. Allow me, therefore, to ask that you will place it in my power to correct any false impressions which may have been produced by the circulation of this 'Report,' by informing when and where the sample of unfermented wine in question was purchased, and by whom it was stated upon the label to have been manufactured.—I am, sir, very truly yours,

FRANK WRIGHT."

"12 Radford Street, Higher Broughton, Manchester, April 29th, 1880.

"SIR,—The chairman of our Health Committee has handed to me your letter, in which you have asked for some information in regard to my last 'Quarterly Report,' containing an account of an unfermented wine which contained a considerable amount of copper. I cannot give you the maker's name, as it was not upon the bottle. The label upon the bottle was the following:—'Unfermented Wine.—Port, for family and sacramental purposes, manufactured from the juice of the grape. Wholesale depot, 104 Breck Road, and 52 Brunel Street, Liverpool.'—I remain, yours truly,

"J. CARTER BELL, F.C.S., F.I.C., &c."

ELECTIONS AND PUBLIC-HOUSES.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

Orillia, 25th April, 1880.

SIR,—Judging from what I see in your illustrated and other newspapers, the dear old Motherland might learn a lesson in the conduct of elections from this young dominion. Here, taverns, and all places where liquors are sold, must be closed during the polling. "Treating" by candidates or agents during the canvass voids an election; hiring of vehicles to convey voters to the polls is prohibited, and no vehicle is permitted to display any flag, streamer, or placard in the interest of any candidate. Betting on elections is forbidden, and other precautions taken to prevent "undue influences," particularly on the part of the publicans or other powerful interests. "Open houses" are a thing of the past, and publicans are anxious rather to avoid the undue display of partisanship and placards likely to give offence to either party which might prove successful. This all helps to lessen the influence of "the Trade" in politics, and also prevents much of the excitement which characterised election contests in the olden time.—Faithfully yours,

G. H. HALL.

AN EXPLANATION.

30 South Mount Street,
Aberdeen, 20th April, 1880.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

MY DEAR SIR,—Kindly insert the enclosed note as my reply to "Delta," whose note I also return herewith.—Very truly yours,

WM. CLARK.

Glasgow, 19th April, 1880.

MR. WM. CLARK.—Sir,—I observe in this month's number of the Social Reformer in your article entitled "Principle and Expediency: their true place in the Temperance Enterprise" a quotation, viz., "To Him whose he was, and whom he was bound to serve." Will you kindly mention in next month's number of the Social Reformer from whose writings the quotation is taken, especially the words in the quotation "was bound," and you will greatly oblige yours, DELTA.

P.S.—As this article is to be continued, a reply is looked for.

"W. C." begs to convey his best thanks to "Delta," who very properly calls attention to a quotation in No. 1 of last month's issue—"To Him whose he was, and whom he was bound to serve." In the indirect form this quotation should have read, "Whose he was and whom he served." The idea wished to be conveyed—entire consecration to Christ—remains intact, but correct quotation ought to have had place. The Apostle's own words, as rendered in our authorised version, are, "Whose I am, and whom I serve," Acts xxvii. 23.

THE NATIONAL DRINK BILL FOR 1879.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

DEAR SIR,—The Excise Returns giving the consumption of intoxicating liquors for 1879 have been published, and now that the excitement of the election is passing away, it may not be unacceptable to your readers to have placed before them a statement showing the amount of money expended upon intoxicating liquors during the year 1879.

The following table gives particulars of the various kinds of intoxicating liquors consumed, together with the money expended thereon. It also gives the consumption for 1878:—

It will be a source of much gratification to all who are concerned for the national well-being to observe the great falling-off which there has been in the consumption of intoxicating liquors in 1879, as compared with 1878, reducing the drink bill to an amount below that of any year since 1871. That year it amounted to £118,906,066; in 1872 it rose to £131,601,400; 1873, £140,014,712; 1874, £141,342,997; 1875, £142,876,669; 1876, £147,288,760; in 1877 it fell to £142,007,231; in 1878 it rose a little, being £142,188,900; and in 1879 it had fallen to £128,143,864, being, as I have said, less than any year since 1871, and Nineteen Millions less than in 1876.

Perhaps it may be said that a considerable proportion of the falling off has arisen from the diminution of the people's means owing to the depression in trade. Doubtless some of it may have arisen from this cause; but if the falling off were wholly attributable to the badness of the times, we should find the same cause affecting the consumption of other things, such as tea, coffee, &c.; but this has not been the case, as the following table will show:—

Table showing the consumption of tea, coffee, and cocoa during the years 1878 and 1879:—

	1878.	1879.	Increase.
Tea.....	157,692,762 lb.	160,652,187 lb.	= 1.9 per cent.
Coffee...	33,393,248 lb.	34,696,256 lb.	= 3.9 "
Cocoa...	9,980,162 lb.	10,111,526 lb.	= 1.3 "

Giving an average increase of 2.3 per cent.

From the tables which I have given it will be seen that whilst the consumption of intoxicating liquors fell off to the extent of 9.8 per cent., the consumption of tea, &c., increased 2.3 per cent. clearly proving that the reduction in the former case did not arise entirely from the crippled resources of the people, but partly from a change in their habits, due to the spread of temperance truth, to the establishment of coffee-houses, &c., and to improvement in the general legislation of the country.

It will no doubt also be interesting to your readers to know in what proportion the drink expenditure is spread over the United Kingdom. The following table will show this, so far as concerns the consumption of beer and British spirits, which are the main items of expenditure. The particulars for wine and foreign spirits are not given in the returns.

Table showing the consumption of beer and British spirits in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, for the two years 1878 and 1879:—

Beer.	1878.	1879.	Decrease.
England.....	£74,951,769	£66,179,066	= 10.4 per cent.
Scotland.....	3,996,562	3,337,792	= 16.7 "
Ireland.....	4,850,424	4,040,695	= 16.7 "
Spirits.
England.....	16,697,663	16,314,174	= 2.3 "
Scotland.....	6,559,147	6,287,477	= 4.1 "
Ireland.....	6,101,905	5,335,000	= 12.5 "

From the above figures it will be seen that whilst the falling off in the consumption of intoxicating liquors has been considerable all round, it has been much greater in Ireland, where Sunday closing had recently come into operation, than in England or Scotland, and there can be no doubt that the good resulting from Sunday closing in Ireland would have been still more marked had it not been that five of the large towns, viz., Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and Waterford, are exempted from the operations of the Sunday Closing Act.

On taking a general survey of the position of matters relating to the nation's intemperance, there will everywhere be a feeling of great satisfaction, if not of relief, at the rapid progress which has taken place in favour of temperance during the past few years. During the height of our prosperity, six or seven years ago, whilst the evils of intemperance were universally admitted and by many deplored, there yet appeared on the part of the public to be an indifference and an apathy that filled with gloom the hearts of good men, and the fear arose in many minds that the nation had become so greatly debased and enslaved by drink as to have become callous to its vital interests. The continued spread of temperance truth, coupled with the severe distress which has existed, and which has largely been the result of this intemperance, has at length not only enlightened the understandings of the people, but has roused them to such a sense of personal obligation as has borne the wholesome fruits to which I have referred.

This growth of opinion has been largely manifested during the recent elections. For the first time, perhaps, in the history of electioneering, politicians have taken little or no account of the publican power; the conscience of the nation has been too much aroused to permit of its lending its influence in support of an interest which is so antagonistic to the commercial, moral, physical, and social well-being of the people, and the result is, we have a Parliament more in sympathy with questions of social reform than any previous Parliament during the present generation, and if the new House of Commons succeeds in dealing with the licensing system in such a manner as will redeem the country from the fearful evils resulting therefrom, it will earn the gratitude, not only of the nation, but of the whole civilised world.—I remain, yours truly,

WILLIAM HOYLE.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for REVIEW, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

Temperance Landmarks: A Narrative of the Work and the Workers. (By the Rev. R. Maguire, D.D.) London: "Hand and Heart" Publishing Office, 1 Paternoster Buildings, E.C. The year of Jubilee has impelled many to offer material to the history of the temperance reformation. Dr. Maguire contributed a series of papers on "Temperance Landmarks," to Home Words. In their serial form they met with high approval. They are now reprinted, and appear in the form of an excellent handy book which an advocate of temperance may easily put in his pocket, making each chapter serve as a reading to some temperance meeting. Dr. Maguire has done his work with singular fidelity and success, and we specially commend the last chapter to our readers, as one well fitted to supply them with the most powerful motives for engaging in the urgent work of temperance reform.

The Band of Hope Handbook, &c. Prepared under the direction of the Committee of the Lancashire and Cheshire Band of Hope Union. (London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row.) While heartily sympathising with the Band of Hope movement, and when and where we can stamping our sympathy with willing help, we demur to the statement with which this handbook begins, that this movement has developed more and is more hopeful than any other phase of the temperance question. Comparisons are deemed odious, certainly they are so in this case, and it serves no good purpose whatever to make them. The handbook has many and singular excellences, and it is fitted to enable any committee to easily surmount those difficulties they may meet with in their attempts at forming Bands of Hope. The various suggestions it contains are based upon a widely extended and observant experience. It aims most wisely to make the children workers, in entertaining each other, in distributing temperance literature and otherwise. This is the true way, and faithfully followed will make the Band of Hope which adopts it flourish and grow as it flourishes. We cordially recommend this handy handbook.

The Preston Temperance Teacher; by Joseph Livesey, Preston, (the Author, 13 Bank Street). Price 8d. per 100. The venerable patriarch of the temperance reformation, Mr. Livesey, "is always at it." "The Preston Temperance Teacher" is a monument to his sterling enterprise. Admirably clear and plain and sensible, each issue is well fitted to do abundant good. Curiously enough, like the latter issues of the old man, it is addressed more to temperance reformers than to drunkards. No. 1 furnishes a speech of Mr. B. Whitworth's and an article named "What should be Done?" No. 2 is more varied than its predecessor, and is a striking issue. No. 3 is also an excellent number. On the whole, we heartily can and do wish success to Mr. Livesey's latest venture, which we hope will be scattered widely and continually over the land.

BOOKS RECEIVED:—Elliot Stock's marvellous Penny Testament (three sorts); The Princess, Dupay's Magazine of Fashion; Evidence on the Closing of Public Houses on Sunday, by E. Whitwell; The Missionary Juvenile, No. 1; Notes on Prisons; Studies in Life, by Dr. H. S. Paterson; The Human Body, by Dr. H. S. Paterson, &c., &c.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. EBENEZER ANDERSON, GLASGOW.—This staunch temperance reformer has passed away at a good old age, having departed on the 4th ultimo, aged seventy years. As long as health and age would allow Mr. Anderson devoted his efforts to the promotion of the movement in its personal, political, but specially in its gospel aspect. His presence will be missed at the meetings of the Dale Street and Plantation Street Total Abstinence Societies.

THE LATE MR. JOHN SMITH, GLASGOW.—We deeply regret to have to record the decease of this estimable gentleman and steadfast friend of the temperance movement, who died at his residence, Fairmount, Bothwell, on the 10th ultimo, in the seventieth year of his age. Mr. Smith, although of a retiring and unassuming disposition, was deeply interested in the temperance reformation in all its phases, and was one of its earliest and most attached supporters. He has for many years been one of the esteemed vice-presidents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, to which he has ever proved an unfailing and generous friend. It was always a pleasure to him to receive friends coming from a distance on the business of the Association, who at his hospitable fireside never missed the comforts of their own homes. Mr. Smith had in Mrs. Smith one as warmly attached to the movement and as devoted to its interests as himself. She co-operated vigorously with the leaders on all possible occasions. A widow, a son, and two daughters are left behind to mourn their irreparable bereavement. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have minuted their deep sense of the loss sustained by Mr. Smith's decease, and their sincere sympathy and condolence with his mourning relatives. They were represented on the occasion of his funeral by J. Torrens, Esq., J.P.; Bailie Selkirk; R. C. Murray, Esq.; and R. Mackay, Secretary. His remains were interred in the Glasgow Necropolis on the 14th ultimo, in presence of a large company of mourning friends.

GOSPEL.—II.

WE have been speaking of those who die directly by drink. Our heart's blood almost freezes when we think of the almost incredible number of young children who are suffocated by their drunken parents by being overlaid, poisoned by foul air and bad food and drink, or dying by starvation—all ills that the drunkard's children are subject to; the number of wives broken-hearted, dying before their time; the number of young lives blighted and shortened; the number of grey heads brought down with sorrow to the grave. These form another awful indictment against the destroyer, alcohol. This goes on in this our "Home of Christian liberty," and perhaps far more than 300 lives are sacrificed daily at Bacchus' brutal shrine. The thing is appalling—too great for our conception—and we can but stare blankly at the figures, and pass on. The angel of temperance, clear-sighted and sympathetic, looks in on the terrible naked reality, wrings her hands in bitter sorrow, and begins to preach her gospel of repentance and temperance reform. She has found an effectual cure, which she calls TOTAL ABSTINENCE, and holds it up like a "serpent in the wilderness." Many have embraced her teaching, and borne testimony to its soundness. Science has come forward and given her passionless, unprejudiced testimony in its favour. Yet Churchmen who have got tired of hearing the bare, uninviting doctrine of self-denial for the good of others preached, cry, "Away with your total abstinence, your narrow-mindedness, and your sectarianism; we want none of them here! Preach the gospel to the people, and there will be no need of your total abstinence pledge. Down with your 'pledge' and up with Christ, and teach the people true self-control by the grace of God, and such teaching will be honourable to you." The reply to this is always ready. These well nigh nineteen centuries you have, in your own way, been preaching the gospel; and while this strong drink has been eating the heart out of our nation, and bringing her down to this terrible condition, you have been saying the same things. We cannot, therefore, listen any longer to such meaningless babble. We find that the gospel does not prevent alcohol from working its deadly course with those who take it. We find there is no temperance in the use of, but only in entire abstinence from it. We find this thing alcohol to be deleterious in the smallest doses. We find also that the Bible, whose teaching you say rules your conduct, says, "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." We find this thing alcohol to be a cerebral poison. It has a special affinity for the brain, and, consequently, when a man is under its influence, as the late Professor Miller well says, "reason is at a discount, and voluntary control placed more and more in abeyance. What is specially human is lessened, what is merely animal is intensified; the passions rise rebelliously, and defy all moral control; and the man becomes, under his own act, what the law has quaintly termed him, voluntarius demon. He is temporarily insane, and fitted for any act of violence to himself or others." "And this condition of insanity," he remarks, "may not prove temporary, but may be prolonged. The man, though become sober, is mad, and may remain so for some time." We do not argue that what doctors are pleased to name insanity is usually induced by small doses of alcohol, but we maintain that if it be a brain poison and an impairer of reason in large doses, it must be the same in small doses. That which is water in a gallon does not become milk in a drop; it is still water. The question, clearly, is only one of degree; and we hold that as long as people continue to imbibe a drug that destroys their reason and sense of responsibility to God and their fellows, preaching the gospel will be little more than fighting the air. Man was created a rational being, with the power of choice. God entered into a covenant with him as a rational, responsible, free agent. Man, by the exercise of his own free will and choice, violated the conditions of that covenant. The penalty of this was death. Man could not save himself. God provided means by which, on the acceptance of certain conditions, man would be saved. Those conditions are set forth in the gospel we are told to preach as the antidote of intemperance. Man cannot and will not accept the conditions unless he feel responsible. This thing alcohol destroys his sense of responsibility. Man cannot understand, much less accept, any conditions, without the exercise of his reason. Alcohol destroys his reasoning faculties. Nor is this all; it blunts his moral sense, inflames his lower passions, "the lusts of the flesh that war against the soul." It not only impairs or destroys his reasoning faculties—it goes further, and eats out of him, like a cancer, all that is good and Godlike, all that is manlike, and renders him lower than the brutes because self-debased, and soon places him beyond the reach of every better influence, human or divine.

The gospel, therefore, having no power over the physiological effects of this or any such drug, can do absolutely nothing for a person who is under its influence and power. The "moderation" party say they do not contend that the gospel may be preached with permanent effect to a person in a state of intoxication, but they would speak to the person when sober, and then the gospel would be understood and accepted, and all would be well. If the gospel, they say, cannot be accepted when a person is in a state of intoxication, neither can the total abstinence pledge. True, we say, but the more the sense of responsibility is abused by the use of alcohol the weaker it becomes. The brain becomes clouded, and the moral perceptions are partially destroyed.

He knows that the demon alcohol has got him in his relentless grip. He knows the torture he daily receives at his hands, through that burning, quenchless thirst. Begin to preach the gospel to that man and tell him to accept Christ, and He will give grace to enable him to drink in moderation as you do. You will no more get him to believe it than you would get him to believe that the grace of God would enable him to jump over the moon. He will tell you you do not understand his case, or you would not talk to him of moderation. He will tell you you know nothing of the flame that is kindled by the first drop he takes. He will tell you that the grace you speak of is too high for him—he cannot attain to it. He will have difficulty in understanding a Christianity that tampers with a thing that he has found to be a destroying devil. Such a man will never be able to understand your Christianity apart from total abstinence; and if you do not believe in total abstinence he will have great difficulty in believing in you or your teaching. He will tell you you are quite mistaken, that 'the harvest is past,' and there is no salvation for such as he, and you will probably fail to make a single beneficial impression on him. And why? Because you have not met his case. He knows that strong drink is his soul's greatest enemy; and when he is told to drink "moderately," this question presents itself to his mind—How is he to give up all his evil ways unless he also give up the vile thing that induced them all? The thing is impossible, and he can go no further. On the other hand, if you invite him to follow your example and abstain, shake him warmly by the hand, and promise him your kind Christian sympathy and help, promise him that, as far as you can by your prayers and your practical brotherly sympathy, you will help him to fight the great enemy of his soul, he will promise, with a tear in his eye, that with your help and God's he will try.

This basis is sound, and, if reform be possible, you will reform your man in this way. Indulgence in intoxicating drinks is a practice condemned by scripture, and not only out of harmony with, but opposed to the gospel of Christ. Our total abstinence, then, is a part of the doctrine of repentance, as taught by John the Baptist. Repentance must always go first (Acts iii. 19). Repentance must be characterised by a change of practice (Matthew iii. 8; Acts xxvi. 20). Drunkenness is not only a sin in itself, but it leads to innumerable other sins. This the drunkard knows very well, and hence he knows that true repentance is impossible without the giving up of his drinking habits entirely. There is no other single vice known that induces so many others as drunkenness, and therefore in the call to repentance at the present time the question of temperance must be a prominent doctrine. The Church in times past has been ignoring this fact. In this important particular her "orthodoxy" has been rather heterodoxy. She has, in great part, been oblivious to the highest Christian law of love—the law of self-sacrifice for the good of others. This being so, we who are of clearer vision, and are alive to the fact, are obliged to have a society organised for the purpose of preaching this essential but neglected part of the gospel of repentance. Our temperance societies would not have been necessary if the Church had not gone off the straight in the matter. It would have been the Church's work, as it is the Church's duty, to teach that indulgence in a drink that destroys that highest of man's faculties—reason—and his sense of responsibility, is a great sin, and in direct opposition to the cardinal doctrines of Scripture.

MODERATE DRINKING: CAN IT BE A RIGHT OR SAFE COURSE?

It is a belief shared by many, that there are both women and men so constituted that they can take a moderate quantity of alcoholic liquor, and never appear to approach intoxication, and can continue in this moderate way all their lives. Again, it is no less certainly believed that there are others, also for constitutional reasons, who cannot habitually take intoxicating drink without being in danger of going at times a little too far from the path of sobriety. While regarding others, it is universally admitted that their feeble power of self-control ought to be sufficient reason for not touching intoxicating drink at all.

Now, supposing there are men and women so constituted that they can habitually take intoxicating drink, and perhaps they may never be seen by outsiders to be in the slightest degree approaching intoxication, who is there to say that they never are, let it be ever so little, a little beyond what could with truth be called soberness. Are they to speak for themselves, because they are not, as a rule, the working men whose general conduct is open to the observation of the community, that they are easily known as steady men or otherwise? Now, if they are to speak for themselves—I mean, if simply their word is to settle the question as to whether they ever exceed the strictest bounds of moderation—I believe if they were asked such a question, which they would of course consider a very impertinent question indeed, but which I should not consider to be an impertinent question, as in conversation with a total abstainer they would ask what questions they thought fit, and also criticise severely enough—I say, if they were asked such a question, they would deny, with the greatest of imaginable indignation, that they ever were, or that they ever should be, in the slightest degree intoxicated. But I say that, let them answer with all the vehemence they like, still we are not sure that they either never have, or never will take what might be termed just a little too much, or be, as an observer might say that they had had a little. Of course I mean, that though it might be said a little, the little would be quite sufficient for an ordinary observer to see that that little had been had, and necessarily made an alteration in the appearance of the individual from what was the appearance of the individual before that little had been taken.

Now, as I think that at present we cannot very easily ascertain for a certainty that some of this class of people ever do go as far as I have intimated, let us look at those of whom it might be remarked by their acquaintance, that sometimes they really do get a little too much, but that it is very seldom, and of no importance, as they go off quietly, and very few know anything about it. Suppose you were to ask one of this class if he ever got a little too much, you would sharply be told that he never did. O no, not he; he could take his glass or two with a friend, and leave it without any desire for more. Well now, I know of many whose answers to such a question would be something similar—namely, that they never took too much, and that they did not care much for it, but took it to be sociable; or that they took it because they thought it did them good; or often, perhaps, that they were ordered by their doctor to take a little. I know the case of an old man. He gets too much sometimes, and he says a little overcomes him; but if a little does overcome him, he seems to take more after he is overcome. He would say young folks don't require it, but that old folks do, and that doctors say so. But I think that it looks a deal better, and is a deal better, for a man to be a sober man in his later days, even if he has gone a little wrong in his younger days, than for him to have been very steady and industrious as a young man, and then in after life to take to the use of intoxicating drink, and sometimes get beyond the mark.

And of the class of whom there is no mistake but that they do get intoxicated, I do not know whether it is simply for the sake of argument, or whether they believe they are speaking the truth, when, if you had seen them intoxicated, and you were remonstrating with them afterwards, they would say that they had not been so. But there are plenty of that sort; for you may often hear a drunken man, if spoken to about being drunk, saying that he is not, and that he has only had so much. I have seen a man hardly able to stand, and heard him say, "I'll go and get drunk." It seems if they can manage to get home somehow without being carried they consider they were not drunk, but only had had a little, and were just fresh.

So we see the man in a high position or station in life seems to consider himself quite out of danger in taking intoxicating drink to excess; but I fancy when those who are in a lower station know that such a person takes his wine, or what not, in that line, regularly, they think it very likely that he sometimes goes farther from the unmistakably sober point than he would care for them seeing or knowing; and though there might not be the least whisper of anything of the sort from any quarter likely to know if it were so, still the doubt would be there if they knew he took it at all; and if such a man was to speak to a working man respecting his conduct, it would have a deal less good effect upon that man to what it would have had if he, the reprover, was known never to err in like manner.

The Bible speaks strongly against the drunkard, and a man may be a drunkard without necessarily exposing himself to the gaze of the people. And now comes a very difficult question, When is a man to be considered sober, and when is he to be considered drunk? The other day I saw two men considered gentlemen; now, if I were asked to say whether they were sober or drunk, I should hardly like to say that they were drunk, but I certainly could not say they were sober. But it is my belief that if any one were to have asked them (I mean any one not given to taking intoxicating drinks—I won't say for any of their own sort) the next day, if they were sober last night, they (the querists) would come in for a good share of abuse, though I doubt not but that after I saw them there would be more drink consumed.

Now, my idea of when a man is sober is when he has tasted no intoxicating drink, but as soon as ever he takes a little, he is so far on the road to intoxication, and not quite sober, though he may not be altered to outward appearance, or very little. It won't do to say that, as it is such a small quantity, it has produced so little change in the system that it may be said to have made no alteration at all. It must of necessity have made as much difference as it was capable of, according to the quantity consumed. If it is a small quantity, and that small quantity is repeated, the results will soon show, or at least there will soon be signs of what has been going on. It is similar in some ways to poison (and I think it is considered a poison by medical men)—a little might be taken, and not be sufficient to kill, but for all that it would have effect as far as its power went.

And why should people take it at all? A man naturally has no desire for it, but a dislike, something similar to what he has to smoking. When a beginner has his pipe it makes him bad; but he intends if possible to get over that, and be a smoker; and after a while it gets such a habit that it seems difficult for him to leave it off. We have the first physicians of the day saying that alcohol is not necessary to support life, or to in any way assist in the support of life, but that it is injurious to the system.

Is it not a great pity that people should take it at all, when the least to be said against it would be that it does no good, and we know very well that it does a great deal of harm? Many people are still under the delusion that there is strength in what they call "good home brewed" ale, and as it seems to be a deal stronger, in having greater intoxicating power than the general ale-house stuff, they seem to think that it must give strength to the body; and good old port, nourishing stout, porter, &c., are all believed to have a wonderful amount of nourishment and other good qualities. Dr. Norman Kerr says, "The every-day prescription of nourishing stout to nursing mothers is not scientific medicine, but is the grossest quackery, and is but too often productive of most lamentable results to both mother and child." How can it be safe for a nursing mother to be continually taking alcohol in some form or other? May it not give an artificial thirst to the child? Is it not a very great pity that a child should be so brought up? Who can say what the effects of such bringing up may be upon the poor child? When he gets big enough to understand things a little, he will naturally want to imitate his mother; and then if he takes alcohol, the appetite very likely will soon be created, and be a source of unhappiness, perhaps for his life. Example is better than precept.

A DAY WITH THE "IVANHOE."

On a raw and gusty Saturday of last month, on which, as Cato would have said, the dawn was overcast, the morning lowered and heavily in clouds brought on the day, we found ourselves on our way by train to join the Ivanhoe at Greenock. Pope sings of "Hope eternal, that springs triumphant from the human breast." This day we furnished a signal instance of his theme. We hoped the day would be fine. Our hopes and fears collided, but hope had her way, and we let her soar. Amid a weeping rain, we went on board the namesake of "the disinherited knight," and found her decks from stem to stern all before us where to choose our place of rest or our coigne of vantage. A glance at her beautiful proportions and her handsome appearance, evoked our admiration; and we anticipated great pleasure from a tour of investigation during some part of the voyage. The rain ceased, but the sun sulked in his tent, and the troubled waters only reflected a leaden sky. Stepping below, we found all in first-class style—a confectioner's tiny shop, bookstall, a dairy, with its dairymaid dispensing the famous milk which Dr. Fergus warrants free from "Simpson" and typhoid germs. We invested in a glass, which cost us the moderate sum of three halfpence. The fore cabin had stores of milk, but did not seem, in purveying, enterprising enough to our taste: it was difficult to get a moderate refreshment. We were informed that the after cabin was the place for "gents," engineers and such like being provided for here. We sauntered to the dining saloon, below the saloon cabin, but we must frankly express our opinion that the tariff is a mistake: breakfast, lunch, or tea, 2s.; dinner, 3s.; plain tea, 1s. 6d.; cup of tea for 6d.; and temperance drinks, in almost every case, 4d. per bottle, are, as charges, far too high. No doubt all is sumptuous.

ous and plentiful, but with the remembrance that dinner can be had in Glasgow at 1s. for the three courses, and tea and lunch at half this figure, it is useless to expect that such extreme charges will be met by passengers in general. If a moderate figure for less costly diets were adopted in the fore cabin, we feel sure that the owners would, in the long run, reap richly by their enterprise. The dining saloon is finished in the most elegant style, and the service of meals, as we can testify, is expeditious and efficient. We sauntered into the upper saloon, and found it pretty well filled with both sexes. The seats are in striking contrast to those to which we have been accustomed. The old style of seats reminded you of a gigantic omnibus or tram-car, or a room cleared for dancing, with a table or two in the centre. Here they were on the compartment principle, seated for little parties, who could, by themselves, enjoy a pleasant chat; or, with their back to the engine, or with their face looking ahead, enjoy all the pleasure of railway travelling by gazing on the varied aspects of sea and sky and shore, as each severally flitted past: or even, with a well-filled stationery box at their elbow, amuse themselves by inditing an epistle to absent friends. We tried, on this special day, to write, but, with wind and sea combined, to do so was impossible, so we, perforce, desisted. Everything in this saloon was characterised by a chaste, rather than an ornate elegance: carpets, curtains, seats, bearing strong testimony to the æsthetic merits of those who decked out this elegant resort with so much good taste. The passengers, notwithstanding the dull day, were, like ourselves, manifestly enjoying themselves. Calling at Dunoon and Kilmory, our steamer soon shot over to Wemyss Bay; then we steered for Bute, with weather still unpropitious. The island looked sombre-like in the absence of the sun. At Rothesay we shipped the happiest group the Ivanhoe carried that day. The ladies, two in number, were evidently sisters, they resembled each other so much. Their swains had fallen deeply in love with them—so deeply that it would almost seem as if they could never reach the bottom. All through the stormy day they sat cosily at the base of the forward chimney, and their rippling laughter and merry sallies were like medicine to a sick man, or like the oasis in the desert to the weary traveller. There were no others that attracted our notice, save it might be a girl dressed like a duchess, but as swarthy as a Spaniard, and another, like Eve, most divinely fair. The most of those on board were husbands and wives, with their bairns, out for a holiday, or on a visit to their friends at the coast. In their several spheres, many of them are influential, and sway those around them on political and ecclesiastical affairs. We could easily have roused our readers' interest by naming several who were on board the Ivanhoe that day; but as it would merely gratify a curiosity which is not laudable, we shall forbear. The Kyles of Bute, which present so many charming features, looked lovely, notwithstanding that the sun never appeared to lighten them up. The rain had freshened the vegetation and vivified the grass, so that the little cottages with which the Argyllshire shore is dotted, contrasted finely in their snow-like whiteness with the hills and trees, and also with the ruggedness that was so evident in the opposite shores of Bute. Tighnabruich did not please us as it had often done before, and, for the first time during the day, we heaved a sigh at the continued absence of the sun. The mist-like showers swept across the decks, adding to the regret we felt at the gloomy weather. The wind was rising too, and the sea, more troubled than ever, made our vessel pitch and occasionally ship a sea. As we were passing the "drunken" island, I thought of how much misnamed it was. It is an island where the diseased inebriate may, free from sight and smell of alcoholic liquors, regain his health through the withdrawal of the drug, and restore the tone of his mind, which the liquor has debased: there at least the man is out-with the powerful influence of the brain poison, and it will be a happy day for countless thousands of our countrymen and women when the same can be said of the "adjacent islands of Great Britain and Ireland." Crossing Lochfyne, we soon reached Arran. Passing gloomy Glen Sannox, which lay shrouded in such murky darkness as might have been felt, we stopped at Corrie, a charming little spot, with its twenty to thirty cottages whiter than marble, and as prettily situated as one could desire. All along the Arran shore we found new cause for pleasure and delight. We never had before seen its lovely villages, looking to the sunny south; and we thought, if they so please the eye now, they must delight it when kindled up with the glory of the sun. Leaving Whiting Bay, we stood over to Ailsa Craig, which appeared far out at sea, half shrouded in mist. There was a scowl on the sky, the water, in yeasty waves, dashed on our vessel, and, aided by the tempestuous wind, broke over the Ivanhoe until she quivered with the strain. The temperature was low, and many, feeling cold, sheltered themselves as they best could about the deck. Many of the women grew sick, and had to go below—children, too, were overtaken, and rapidly succumbed; and when mothers and children were prostrate and helpless, other women lent their aid to assuage their misery. The men, to a man, resisted the nausea, and did their best to assist their poor wives. On went the Ivanhoe, and certainly she stood the test of her seaworthiness bravely. We were soon alongside the Craig, whose huge dimensions grew slowly on the perceptions of those on board. The rock, basaltic, seemed covered with sea-fowl at rest. Suddenly, the firing of a small cannon, whose report was multiplied by numerous echoes, created an extraordinary spectacle. Countless wildfowl burst into the air, and in wild confusion gyrated over our heads. A second cannon was fired, and with its multiplied report startled the fowl even more so than at first. Some flew far out to sea, others rested on the careering waves. After a while the greater portion returned to roost upon the rocks. We were unable to see the rock fully, as the rain-burdened clouds would not rise from its summit. One solitary man was all we saw of human kind upon this solitary isle, but several boats, drawn up on its stony shore, seemed to betoken much intercourse on the part of its inmates with places around them. The wind was now a gale, the sea lashed into foam, made our stout steamer roll and pitch so heavily that it was with difficulty that one could pace the deck, or even stand without laying hold of something for support. She shipped sea after sea, some of them sweeping the fore saloon deck, and drenching its occupants. This damped the dress, but not the spirits, of the mirth-indulging youngsters. We soon rapidly passed along the Arran shore, called at all the places on it, and then, making for Bute, skirted its southern shore, which formed a striking contrast to its northern limits in the Kyles. Once at Rothesay, our interest in the voyage ceased. At half-past eight we stepped ashore at Greenock, fully satisfied with the Ivanhoe. She proved a splendid boat in rough or smooth water. Finely appointed, affording most capacious accommodation, and providing an excursion which no other of the Clyde steamers exceeds, she offers advantages of which every lover of the beauties of the West coast should eagerly avail themselves. The extent of the trip is wonderful—the very names of the ports of call is proof of the assertion :—Greenock, Kilm, Dunoon, Wemyss Bay, Rothesay, Tighnabruich, Corrie, Brodick, Lamlash, and Whiting Bay, not to speak of the sail around Ailsa Craig. Such a run ought to satisfy the most exacting. Besides she sails on temperance principles—no intoxicating liquor is sold on board—none. And what is still more interesting, on the day we were on her, no drink was taken on board, unless it was in the stomachs of the passengers themselves. Many had brought food with them, but they had left the cut-ter at home, for although we kept our eye wandering warily, we never saw, nor even felt the smell of liquor. The quiet aboard was signally conspicuous, no drinking, no brawling, wrangling, swearing, fighting; but the lively conversation of talking age, the joyous chit-chat of happy lovers, mingled with the prattle of infancy and childhood. The absence of all that is so conspicuously offensive in river steamers, which are merely floating public-houses, was as marked as we believe it was unregretted. We were glad to learn she had been fully patronised, and we felt as we walked ashore that we must go with her again when the sun shines, when the waves sparkle in his beams, when the balmy air kisses the cheek as it dances along, when nature, as regards sea, sky, and shore, is in her gayest mood—then we must have another day with the Ivanhoe. ### OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

LAST month there was a scene and some excitement at University College, Oxford. Both had their source in the "Bump" Supper. The young graduates "got jolly," and went out for "a lark." In this boisterous recreation some of them audaciously "screwed" up the door of the senior Proctor, and that gentleman had to enter his rooms from the window by means of a ladder. This insult to his dignity could not be passed over, and it was not. All the students were charged to point out the author or authors of the outrage, and all refused. Authority must be maintained, and as in this instance it was defied the decree went forth that the whole body of undergraduates, with a few exceptions, be "rusticated," and so they were. Happily, however, the banishment was of brief duration, for one of the principal participators confessed, and all were invited to return. We believe that "rustication" is the most dreaded of all college punishments, as the discredit which attaches to it endures. The newspapers discuss the matter at great length, yet not a word escapes them about the cause of this compound of folly and severity, the Standard—the publicans' organ—excepted. It says, with charming frankness—"It is no doubt most disgraceful that a Proctor should be 'screwed out' of his room, but 'bump' suppers were not invented yesterday, and their traditions were never altogether decorous. The Dons who permit them should either carry pocket screw-drivers or be prepared to encounter in some dignified way an unwelcome stubbornness in their doors." The real cause after all of the rustication of these eighty students is their drinking heavily at their "bump" suppers, and the tricky spirit of alcohol once entered into their frame, the spirit of unreason and misrule speedily follows. Were the Proctors to use their screw-drivers to screw up the public-house as effectually as the students screwed up the room of the senior Proctor, we should never hear from the academic groves of Oxford of drunken revelry with its severe consequence of 'rustication.' Ah! if alcohol can upset the order of our halls of learning, why should we stand surprised when it plays similar pranks in our slums of ignorance?

We have from the Lancet of last month one of those little homilies similar to what we have had from our medical attendant when he had to be called in to "set us to rights" after some wide departure from the right. Hear it. "It cannot be disguised that there are great practical difficulties in dealing with the use and abuse of poisonous drugs." "It is not easy to control the sale of these 'medicines,' and it is obviously impossible to restrain those who once have them in their possession from employing them in excess or improperly, either intentionally or by accident." Now, we readily admit that the Lancet is writing of poisons generally; but we ask in all earnestness if these two sentences are not singularly applicable to alcoholic liquors? Is there not great practical difficulties in dealing with alcoholic beverages? Every one but an abstainer will admit as much, and tell you that one and all are at their wit's end on the subject. The abstainer, having put himself into a right relation with the seductive liquor—a relation of deadly aversion—is relieved from all difficulty on the matter. The difficulty rests with the liquor. It finds it too difficult to get within the frame of the abstainer, who is saved the difficulty of controlling it when there. It is as equally difficult to control the sale as to control the action of alcoholic beverages, for the Lancet boldly affirms that it is impossible to prevent their uncontrolled use. The writer claims for these poisons the power to overcome the self-control of those who use them. Now, why should not that power be also claimed in a high degree for the special poison of alcohol? The writer goes on to say—"There are always in any large number of persons some who are especially sensitive to the action of particular drugs." And again, "A class of persons, to which any individual may for aught he can tell belong, are so constituted in respect to the nervous system that almost any potent drug acting in a particular way will prove dangerous." Does not the dipsomaniac occur to the mind of every reader on reading this sentence? Has he not a dangerous, not seldom a fatal, susceptibility to the potent drug, alcohol? He begins to use it, and the use, owing to his sensitiveness, engenders the use which all are ready to admit is an abuse, but it is a frightful physical disease which in the presence of the liquor defies regulation and mocks control. The Lancet says we ought to teach people that the man who does take doses of these potent drugs does so at his peril. So we do, but they drink and die, and will do till law suppresses the sale of the dose.

There was one minister deposed by the Free Church Assembly for drunkenness or drugging, although he got into a low condition through hard work in behalf of the Church. There was one reponed who had fallen through intemperance, because he is now in Canada, and wishful once more to be in the service of the Master. Well, I think Rev. A. C. Kay, the deposed one, should go to Canada. There are plenty of places where it is illegal to purchase drink, and where practically drink is never used. He will be there without being in a constant state of resistance to one temptation. Curiously enough Principal Rainy grants the reponed minister, Rev. A. Mackenzie, liberty to preach in Canada so far as the Free Church of Scotland is concerned, but he will not grant him liberty to preach in Scotland. Now in Scotland he fell by the publican's strong ones, and may again; in Canada he has already recovered his balance in some Canadian prohibitory town, and need never lose it again through drink. God hasten the time when the temptation to drunkenness in this land of brown heath and shaggy wood may have as entirely disappeared as it has done in Maine and many parts of the Dominion, and the gospel find abundant entrance into hearts from which, through drink, the light and law of heaven are at present quite shut out.

A correspondent of the Scotsman writing from Athens expatiates on the state of "the eye of Greece." He describes its progress in population, in public buildings, and in character. Here is one of his points of comparison. "The Greeks, as they seem to me, are a hard-working, energetic, frugal race, sober beyond anything I have ever witnessed in any other city; hospitable and polite to strangers, and having gone through almost every street and alley alone, and at all hours of day and night, I can truly say that I have met with nothing I could call offensive, seen no quarrelling and never come across a drunken and disorderly person, male or female. I do not say that Athens is a paradise of all the virtues, but it is singularly exempt from many of the vices which disfigure and disgrace other capitals. If this city be not overflowing with wealth, it is certainly not cursed with drunkenness and its natural accompaniment, beggary. I was so struck by this outward aspect of things that I asked one of the leading citizens, 'Where were the poor and what assessment was levied for their support?' 'No assessment,' was the answer, 'we have no poor; it is believed that no one goes to bed without a dinner.' . . . Another pleasing characteristic of this city, which a stranger cannot help noticing is the free mode in which females of all classes of society move about by themselves at all hours of the day, as freely as in any town in England or Scotland, and with much less liability of being insulted by some disgusting man, or what is worse, some coarse half-drunken woman, hanging about corners, filthy in their language, and filthier still in their appearance and demeanour." There is a contrast for your readers to ponder over. Greece rising from the torpor of slavery and oppression, has dashed down her cup of Samian wine, and shows forth to observant Britons those virtues that languish in our drink-sodden country. Already her academy gives forth indications that its scholars will soon appear in the front rank of the philosophers of the world, as already her builders are showing in the magnificent public buildings, that neither the Greek nation nor Greek art is dead. Sweden, France, Italy, Canada, the United States, and Greece are by their progress in the virtue of sobriety, and its attendant blessings, shaming this great nation of Britain, which has not virtue sufficient to expel the liquor traffic from its own hearths, and is in the vacuous mission fields and in India sowing the seeds of intemperance which will one day yield a harvest of sin and infamy that will recoil on its influence and rule, and indefinitely delay the triumph of His kingdom who is the "desire of all nations."

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor cannot undertake to return rejected communications, nor hold himself responsible for the opinions expressed by his correspondents.

BEFORE AND AFTER.

SIR,—All the recent exhibitions of cool audacity pale before that of Mr. George Candelet, the parliamentary agent of the licensed victuallers. The publicans, during the general election, were conspicuous for their strenuous and unavailing opposition to the Liberal party. When the elections are over, and it is found that large numbers of the "bungs" have fallen at the polls, that Whelhouse and Guinness, Lowther and Greenall, and the three jolly Allsopps, are numbered among the vanquished, and that a rout all along the line has extinguished the hopes of the "vitlers," Mr. Candelet turns round and tells the victors that all these fell fighting on their side! You, Sir, drew your readers' attention to the subject in April Social Reformer by quoting the gist of Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's warning to the licensed victuallers on the eve of the general election. That firm friend of the publicans told them not to oppose the return of the Liberals to power else they might live to regret it. Mr. Candelet, to whom that letter was addressed, openly disregarded its warning at Carlisle, where he hounded on his men by haranguing in the following "spread-eagle" vein:—

"United you Stand, Divided you Fall."

CARLISLE ELECTION.

Carlisle, 30th March, 1880.

TO LICENSED VICTUALLERS, BREWERS, BEERSSELLERS, AND OTHERS ENGAGED IN THE TRADE.

Gentlemen,—The struggle in which you are at present involved is not one of mere local interest, but one of national importance. The eyes of all England are turned towards you, and the result of the election in this city will be anxiously looked for by your fellow-tradesmen in all parts of the country on Thursday next, the first of April.

For upwards of 25 years Sir Wilfrid Lawson has sought through Parliament to suppress your trade without compensation, and on these grounds his proposal has been rejected over and over again.

In 1878 he withdrew the obnoxious "Permissive Bill," but in 1879, he, for the first time, proposed the same measure under the name of "Local Option," and again, in 1880, but on both occasions Parliament ignominiously rejected it as being impracticable.

In this way, year after year, he obstinately perseveres with one idea. To reason with him is folly. Under these circumstances, is it not time there was a change in the representation of this city.

The man who would drive the population of England by force from open to the secret consumption of drink, though he cannot see or believe it, is an enemy to the future of his country, and his hand in legislation is to be dreaded, because he at the same time would render capital unsafe, inflict inconvenience on the public, and he mischievously diverts the electors from their political convictions. The object of Sir Wilfrid Lawson is not only to prevent new licenses from being granted, but also the renewal of existing licenses.

Should he again be elected for this city, you will admit his rash principles, and encourage him to persevere with his crotchets; but you will best serve the interests of yourselves and that of the Trade in general by rejecting him. I therefore beg to suggest that you "Plump for Mr. Mattinson," and canvass for him as if though the success of his election depended upon your own individual exertions, and by doing so you will prevent much mischief from being inflicted on the trade and people in general, and which will in all probability take years to undo, or before such another opportunity will present itself such as the present.—

Yours truly,
GEO. CANDELET.

Here we find him as a bully before the election, but, after it, as may be expected, he is a sneak, a crouching "Uriah Heep," at whom one's gorge rises. Listen to the "fawning publican"—

"We are therefore in hope generally the Liberal party will, during their coming term of power, avoid extreme and hostile legislation of such a character as that which was resorted to prior to 1874. If an attitude of moderation is manifested by the new Government towards the trade, I venture to hope the day is not far distant when the rule of acting at future elections in a combined form will become exceptional. The rash and violent attacks which have hitherto been made upon this trade have, from my long experience, caused the trade at past elections to do that from necessity which was not a matter of choice, considering the interests involved. I therefore venture to hope that the moderation which Mr. Hugessen has successfully encouraged may be strengthened, so that the licensed victuallers and beersellers may learn to feel that they have friends on both sides of the House of Commons."

On reading this cringing paragraph, with its hope and its ventures to hope, one is reminded of ancient Pistol, who also was a publican. But, Sir, as the Liberals were not afraid of their powder, so I venture to hope (if all the hope in Pandora's box be not exhausted by beaten Mr. Candelet) that they will not be conciliated by their prayers. The eyes of the nation are on them. Let them do justice to the liquor trade by fixing, in the interest and welfare of the people over whom they have been placed, that its doom by suppression shall take place at as early a date as possible. Few mourners will follow it to its interment in the inexorable past, and resurgam will not be found carved on its tomb.—Yours, &c.,
MELIORA.

CANADIAN TEMPERANCE NOTES.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

Orillia, May 24th, 1880.

Sir,—The Synod of Toronto and Kingston, now in session at Toronto, has taken advanced action in regard to temperance. The importance of training up children in principles of total abstinence was urged upon parents; Sessions were requested to take concerted action towards checking the evils of intemperance in their respective neighbourhoods, Presbyteries were recommended to hold conferences on the subject, at least annually, ministers and church courts were recommended to urge upon their people the practice of total abstinence as a matter of Christian expediency; the Legislature was urged to enact that all places where intoxicating liquors are sold should be closed on public holidays, and that such places should be separated as far as possible from groceries. "That every effort should be made to bring about, as soon as possible, the prohibition of the liquor traffic" was adopted by a small majority, several members declining to vote. The Synod also overtures the General Assembly to appoint a committee on temperance. Senator Brown, who died the other day, was indirectly a victim of the drink, having died of a wound inflicted by a drunken man. Yet we are told drink will not harm those who let it alone! The Methodist Episcopal Conference has recommended Dr. Richardson's "Temperance Lesson Book" for a text-book in our schools, but seems to think it is an American work, as the New York edition alone is mentioned. Now the London edition is retailed in this Dominion at five cents per copy less than the American, and is quite as good and more suitable. We need an agency for supplying British temperance publications wholesale.—Faithfully yours,
G. H. HALE.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE FAR NORTH.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

Dear Sir,—My last letter to you was written from Dingwall, where I found the movement pretty vigorous under the care of the Good Templars. I have been at a number of places since that time, and am desirous to tell you something about them. From Dingwall I went to Cromarty, another of the burghs of the Wick group. Cromarty is a remarkable place. It is beautiful for its situation, and rendered famous by the genius of Hugh Miller. Although late in the evening, I went along with an intelligent young friend, and had a survey of the glorious scenery around. The population of Cromarty is not large, there being only 73 Parliamentary voters in the burgh, but it is well supplied with liquor shops, and the poor rates are very high. There is a temperance society in Cromarty which has monthly meetings. There was once a Good Templar lodge, but it dissolved some time ago. No temperance agents have been in Cromarty for a good while. I addressed a religious meeting on the Sabbath evening, and a temperance meeting on Monday evening. There are several gentlemen around Cromarty who take an interest in the movement, and who very cordially gave their support. Several others in the burgh gave me a kindly welcome, and I had no reason to regret that I paid a visit to the birth-place of Hugh Miller, the great mason, geologist, and journalist. I next went to Invergordon.

Here I had an open-air meeting, and at its close a number of questions were put about compensation to publicans. Ideas of compensation are not started till you speak about stopping the issue of licenses. Traffickers seem to feel quite safe until you speak of submitting their trade to the verdict of the people. There is nothing they dread so much as such a proposal. There is a Good Templar lodge in Invergordon, and a few earnest men striving to promote the interests of the agitation. I was very glad to meet the friends in this town and to spend a day amongst them. Beaully, a little town about fifteen miles north from Inverness, was the next place I visited. There is a lodge of Good Templars there, but they have a sore fight to hold their ground. They pay a dear rent for a small room; still there are men of public spirit among them, and the cause under their care will yet make progress. Mr. A. MacLennan conducts a thriving Band of Hope, and otherwise renders valuable aid to the temperance movement. I was now bent on crossing over the country to the island of Lewis, and of visiting Ullapool on the way; and, certainly, I never began a journey with cheerier anticipations, nor finished one with more agreeable results. In going to these places, you take the train from Dingwall to Garve, then you drive from the latter place to Ullapool—a distance of thirty-four miles. The first half of the journey is through interminable moors, and along the base of wild dreary mountains. Then you pass through a more fertile and picturesque part of the country; now you drive by a deep ravine whose sides are clothed with trees and adorned with flowers of loveliest hue; then you skirt the banks of a river, meandering on in silvery beauty, until it loses itself in the waters of Loch Broom; now you are beneath over-arching trees, whose boughs afford a grateful shade; then you see the pleasant fields and the farms and the smiling cottages on the opposite hills, and Loch Broom breaking in gentle ripples on its shore far below the mountain road. Somewhat dusty, but neither tired nor weary, you arrive at Ullapool. The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie kindly bids you wash your face and refresh yourself with a cup of tea, which being done, you go to see the town, and interview those who are favourable to the suppression of the liquor shops. The Good Templar lodge here has done splendid work. Dr. McCallum and Mr. Maclay are sturdy reformers, going forward on all the lines of progress. The lodge pays £12 10s. a year for a small room to meet in. One gentleman travels six miles to teach a Band of Hope; three drive ten miles to the lodge meeting. I addressed two good meetings. The Rev. Mr. McInnes took the chair at the Saturday evening meeting. Give ratepayers a local option law in Ullapool, and the liquor men would get an effectual notice to quit. It is forty-five miles from Ullapool to Stornoway, but the little steamer 'Express' does its work well. It takes fully four hours to sail out of Loch Broom and cross over the Minch to Stornoway. There is a great number of temperance people in Stornoway. The Good Templar lodge met on the night on which I went. I attended the lodge meeting and soon got acquainted with the Templars. The lodge is fully 200 strong. I asked them to give me their assistance to get up open-air meetings, which they did with great readiness. There was no standing aloof, waiting till other people came to the meeting, but the temperance men were there at the time "punctual as lovers to the moment sworn," and we had a great audience. The Rev. D. J. Martin, F.C., took the chair the second night, offered prayer, and made a short speech, and all came off well. Temperance friends in all parts of the country could easily make out-door meetings successful if they would act like the reformers of Stornoway, and just "lead the way." Nearly all the merchants in Stornoway are abstainers, and most of the chief citizens are in favour of removing the public-house. You can quite see how a prohibitionist like myself found many men in that island whose thoughts were in harmony with my own, and who most cordially joined our association for the suppression of the drink trade. I fear I have already trespassed on your space, or I would willingly tell you more about Stornoway. The Rev. Mr. Martin was my host all the time I was there, and his kindness was much appreciated by me. I came home by the Isle of Skye, and took the train from Strome to Dingwall. Since I entered the service of the association I have seen some of the most romantic parts of Scotland, and if I were asked which part I liked best, I think I would be inclined to give the palm to the rugged grandeur and the sublime scenery of the Strome valley.—Yours most truly,

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD.

POST-CARD FROM HON. NEAL DOW.

PORTLAND, 31st May, 1880.

MY DEAR MR. MACKAY.—At a temperance meeting last evening at Congress Hall (at the close), Mr. Jamieson [of Ayr] presented to me your letter. We were sorry not to know he was present, so as to have had a speech from him—a down-right hearty Scotchman; a capital specimen of that race and blood, so heroic on many a field, so true and tenacious in church and council. May the race never be fewer; the blood cannot be purer! Of all immigrants to our country the Scotch are always by far the most welcome. They bring to us muscle and brain, and tried skill and trustworthiness in many of our great industries, of which they are often the managers of the most successful ones. What a wonderful election you have had! Was ever a man before sent to the right-about so summarily as your Jew? Do the brewers cry piteously for mercy? Our true friend John Smith has gone before. I want very much to see the old fatherland once more.—Truly yours,

NEAL DOW.

PUBLIC PRESS.

ABUSE OF THE LONDON HOSPITAL SYSTEM.—The Students' Journal has a thoughtful and forcible article on this subject, in which it says—"Thinking men cannot be ignorant of the fact that our hospital system is greatly abused. No doubt, in our profession, as in that of the Church, much gratuitous work is done, and its members must be prepared to make many sacrifices for the general good of the community, but that there is no reason why we should be imposed on. One example of very many is afforded by a drunken man. Why should a drunken man be attended to at our hospitals? We maintain that if a man can pay for the privilege of getting drunk, he can pay, and should be made to pay, for being cured of the effects of any accident the result of that drunkenness. If our readers will just think for one moment, they will see, as clearly as we ourselves do, the justice of this view. A man goes to a public-house and indulges in too much drink; in a drunken brawl he cuts his head. What does he do? He simply staggers instinctively to the nearest hospital and gets his head dressed for nothing; he then staggers back to the public-house, and spends in beer the money which he ought to have paid some surgeon for dressing his head. This is no fanciful dream, nor the result of an article-writer's imagination; it is a reality, a reality which happens every day of our lives, and just one phase of the abuse of the hospital system. Why, we ask, should the casualty assistant at that hospital have been drawn upon in the slightest degree for such a purpose? Why should drunkenness be thus encouraged? and why, lastly, should an outside practitioner have been cheated of a patient and a fee?"

WHAT IS THE USE OF SPIRITS?—The noble lord has been pleased kindly to inform us that the trade of distilling is very extensive, and that it employs great numbers, and that they have arrived at exquisite skill; and therefore the trade of distilling is not to be discouraged! Once more, my lords, allow me to wonder at the different conceptions of different understandings. It appears to me that, since the spirit which the distiller produces is allowed to enfeeble the limbs, vitiate the blood, pervert the heart, and obscure the intellect, the number of distillers should be no argument in their favour; for I never heard that a law against theft was repealed or delayed because thieves were numerous.

It appears to me, my lords, that really if so formidable a body are confederate against the virtue or the lives of their fellow-citizens, it is time to put an end to the havoc, and to interpose, whilst it is yet in our power, to stop the destruction. So little, my lords, am I affected with the merits of that wonderful skill which distillers are said to have attained, that it is, in my opinion, no faculty of great use to mankind to prepare palatable poison; nor shall I ever contribute my interest for the reprieve of a murderer because he has by long practice, obtained great dexterity in his trade. If their liquors are so delicious that the people are tempted to their own destruction, let us at least, my lords, secure them from their fatal draught, by bursting the vials that contains them. Let us crush at once these artists in human slaughter, who have reconciled their countrymen to sickness and ruin, and spread over the pitfalls of debauchery such a bait as cannot be resisted.—Lord Chesterfield in the House of Lords.

POETRY.

THE BATTLE OF THE BUNG.

DEDICATED TO SIR WILFRID LAWSON, BART., M.P.

TUNE, - - "The Battle of Stirling."

THE Drunkard's rights we'll sing,
Against John Barleycorn;
For down this mortal foe we'll bring,
We'll have his proud locks shorn.
It may not be, poor drunkards cry,
It shall not be, the pubs reply,
By the name "our trade" doth bring us;
Our drink is just as good's it was,
We care not for your Temperance cause,
Our heavy purse shall save us.

Up, sons of Temperance! vow
This nation's curse o'erthrow;
Oh do not slack your efforts now
Till once you lay him low.
He shall not lead our sons to death,
He shall not hush our nation's breath,
By deeds of wreck and ruin.
His whole ambition is to kill,
The poorhouse and the grave to fill;
He's aye destruction brewin'.

There's many a happy home
Deprived of all its joy;
The husband cast abroad to roam
The wife's peace doth destroy;
The children sent to beg for bread,
Home comforts now much worse than dead;
Lost are these glorious treasures.
To rescue such is all our aim,
To save such from a life of shame,
And bring them back their pleasures.

Up, Templars, to the fight!
Gird on your armour strong;
Come in your power with grace and might,
The conflict won't be long.
Down shall their signboards one and all
Like old wood in confusion fall,
We'll one and all them shiver.
Then shall our hopes of truth and right
Rise as the pubs are taking flight;
We'll banish them for ever.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson leads,
Reformers follow on,
And with united voice and deeds
We'll have this foe put down.
We'll shut those man-traps one and all,
We'll save our brothers', sisters' fall,
By acts of legislation.
The land shall then be free from pain;
No pubs or brewers making gain
From moral degradation.

21st June, 1880.

The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1880.*

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, JULY, 1880.

* * Notwithstanding that we give a supplement with the present issue, we are compelled to leave over "Woman—the Wife," "The Wanderer," "No Compromise," and other excellent papers.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE twenty-second annual meetings of this Association will be held in Glasgow, on Tuesday, 28th September next.

The executive earnestly hope that the friends of the Association will note the date of this meeting, and make arrangements to be present. They expect to be able to furnish farther particulars in next issue of this magazine.

THE LADIES' LOCAL OPTION FUND.

WE desire anew to direct the attention of our lady readers to the claims of this important fund. We are glad that a number of ladies have generously responded to its claims upon their substantial sympathy, but there are many who, in regard to it, have as yet made no sign. We earnestly hope that these will not allow this call upon their sympathy and service to pass unheeded. We hope to have the pleasure to see, previous to the annual meetings (see preliminary announcement above), this fund exhibiting, in a substantial manner, the warm sympathies of the ladies of Scotland to a movement which aims to render the liquor traffic, that agency of temptation and debasement, for ever inoperative.

ONE of the most unsatisfactory features of the general election of 1880 was to be seen in the number of electors who, by their ignorance or carelessness, were deprived of their votes. They were prepared on the polling day for any trouble, or for any sacrifice, if either would only result in vesting them with the power of voting for the man of their choice. But nothing could be done, and the decision of the country was carried out without them. Our friends will, we hope, continue to maintain a vigilant attention to their local electoral registers. During the last parliament there were not fewer than thirteen bye-elections, and many of these were decided by a very few votes—lost for want of a very few votes which might easily have been forthcoming if the electoral register had only received ordinary attention. We are convinced that any of our Templar Lodges, or temperance committees, might easily add twenty or thirty names to the register yearly, and such an increase, small though it may be considered, might easily determine the issue of a contest in favour of local option. The roll has to be completed by the 15th September, and is then exhibited for the purpose of scrutiny by the ratepayers. All individuals who have paid their rates in good time are eligible for a place on the register; and if their name be omitted, the friends should ask them to fill up the statutory form of application to be put upon it. Lodgers require to be put upon the register every year. LET ALL ATTEND TO THE ELECTORAL REGISTER.

The Canadian Temperance Act having been declared constitutional, one would have thought that it would have been left in the hands of the people to adopt or reject it as they felt disposed. But it seems it is to have a different fate. Almost at the last moment of the past session of the Dominion Parliament, an attempt was made to destroy its efficiency. It was necessary to amend it by explanatory (or interpretation) and declaratory clauses. Advantage was taken of this necessity to insert a provision that it could not be carried anywhere unless there were an absolute majority of the electors in the voting lists in its favour. This simply means that if there be 7,000 electors in a place, and only 5,000 of them vote in the proportion of, say 3,000 and 2,000, the bill could not pass. There must be at least 3,501 in its favour. Our readers will easily see how unfair this is to the object of the bill. Still, the adoption of this amendment was carried by 96 to 73. When the bill went before the Senate the amendment was rejected by 31 to 22, and the "Scott" Temperance Act remains as it is for another year. By that time other towns in the Dominion will come under its provisions, and additional evidence of its benefit be thereby secured. The friends in Canada may have a severe struggle before them ere the Act root itself in the necessities and the affections of the people, but every day it is maintained will count in its favour, and by and by, like the Maine Law or our own Forbes M'Kenzie Act, it will prove of too great advantage to be successfully assailed.

In our last issue we ventured to infer from sundry visits of Inland Revenue officers to great breweries that some change in the mode of taxing the liquor traffic was looming in the near future. It seems we were right. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes the abolition of the malt tax, the imposition of a beer tax, the readjustment of the wine duties, and, we are sorry to add, an increase in the income tax. The malt tax was, rightly or wrongly, looked upon as a farmers' grievance, and its removal was a statesmanlike proposal. The imposition of a beer tax, while spirits and wines are taxed, and more especially when it removes the fetters from the farming interest, is hardly a step to be deplored meantime. Why should the beer-drinker be favoured at the expense of the wine-bibber and the spirit-drinkers? If it be right at all to levy taxes on alcoholic liquors, the levy should be made all round. As for the readjustment of the wine duties, were those who deal in wine to be listened to, we would hear that it will be a very great hardship to dealer and drinker, without any advantage to the revenue. We can hardly credit this: we are rather disposed, on the consideration of the whole question, to believe that no amount of taxation imposed upon alcoholic liquors will greatly affect their increasing consumption. When people are bent upon any gratification, especially a gratification reinforced by a craving, they will not narrowly inquire into their ability to procure it. That will be a secondary consideration with them. They will drink, dread consequences notwithstanding, and our fear is that they will not be led through the expenditure of a few pence more to relinquish a daily and exacting gratification. The real question is, why should a traffic be protected by Government simply on the grounds that it yields gold for statesmen to vote away? That is the question, and to it there is but one answer. That traffic cannot support the revenue but at the expense of the means, health, and welfare of millions in the community. To maintain it for the taxation it yields, in view of that solemn fact, is to maintain a covenant with sin and death; and the sooner that the traffic is suppressed and the revenue realized from the lands and the accumulations of the community, it will be the better for the honour of the country, and more favourable to a just and economical administration of the revenues of the British Empire.

The division on Saturday morning, 19th June, must have rejoiced the heart of every staunch prohibitionist, and no wonder. After a fight which has raged all over the country for three and twenty years, and ranged over sixteen years in Parliament, the great principle of local option has been affirmed by the British House of Commons. We offer our hearty congratulations to all who have shared the toilsome efforts of which this is the triumphant result. What matters now all the gibes and taunts and scorn showered upon its advocates by wiseacres? What all the active hostility and obstruction which beset the path of our great aim? All is lost in the jubilant acclaim of a great victory, which justifies the wisdom and the persistent courage of those by whom it has been gallantly won. At this supreme moment how proud we are of our leader, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, whose efforts have been crowned with so great a victory. Amid the most depressing discouragement, the most persistent misrepresentation, and the most stubborn hostility, he never wavered, and to-day he has the proud satisfaction of having effectually aroused the House of Commons to the necessity of dealing with the liquor traffic in harmony with the great principle of local option, for which he has so stoutly contended.

But while we so heartily rejoice that the movement has reached so satisfactory a stage, we do not at all share the hallucination of those who believe that our warfare is accomplished, and that it may be safely left to Government to embody the principle it has affirmed into the statute law of the realm. This would be a fatal policy. There is no true discharge from our warfare while a vestige of the traffic remains—until that drink interest is prostrate, and the foot of the nation on its neck. We must not deceive ourselves with regard to our position. We have successfully vindicated the claim of the rate-payers to a veto on the issue and renewal of licenses, but it remains to be seen if we are to be allowed to exercise that veto upon all and every license that may affect us. We must not merely be allowed to interfere, but to do so effectually whenever need arises. We must have such full permission. That is the object that demands all our energies. That is the duty which lies nearest to our hand. That duty let us fearlessly discharge.

What does that duty demand of us? To educate the Government into an exact knowledge of the national demand. To do this we must exhaust all the resources of expression that are to be found in national conventions, conferences, memorials, petitions, resolutions, and personal communications. In whatever form we choose to make our wishes known the burden of them must be that we will not be satisfied unless we are legally enabled to prevent the issue or renewal of liquor licenses in the locality where our lot is cast. Between the present time and the next session of Parliament there is time enough, if well and faithfully used, to evoke such an expression of opinion, so far as Scotland is concerned, as shall effectually remove all dubiety from the minds of our legislators as to what shall satisfy us. Let us all with renewed vigour, the stimulus of our great victory, gird us for this work. Let us bring increased appliances into the field and increased resources into action, and as has been our good fortune in the past we will succeed. The Government is now bound to co-operate with us, and it should be our duty to see that its co-operation does not slacken until the liquor traffic perish in obedience to the fiat of the national will constitutionally expressed and vigorously enforced.

INTELLIGENCE.

LOCAL OPTION DEBATE AND DIVISION.

(By our own Reporter.)

THE marked accession to the ranks of the supporters of Sir Wilfrid Lawson which was the consequence of the general election, induced the hon. baronet at the earliest moment to test the feeling of the new Parliament on his Local Option Resolution by a debate and division. He succeeded in getting the 18th ult. for this purpose. The announcement of his intention sent an electric thrill through all ranks of the temperance movement, which instantly set about rendering him a cordial support. The Scottish temperance and prohibitory adherents were conspicuous for their alacrity, and the result of the division is a most emphatic testimony to their ability and activity. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association appealed to the friends in every constituency. The Scottish Temperance League, and all the orders of Templars, United Temperance Association, Crusaders, Rechabites, Sons of Temperance, and other total abstaining organizations lent their powerful influence and put forth enthusiastic energy in behalf of the Resolution, so that there was an entire unanimity of effort and influence shown by Scottish temperance reformers in its favour. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association appointed a deputation to proceed to London to more immediately press the claims of the Resolution upon Scotch party representatives; the deputation included Rev. Dr. Adamson, Messrs. John Nisbet, and J. H. Waterston, from the Eastern Division, and Messrs. Colquhoun, Murray, Winning, and Mackay, from the Western Division of the Association's operations. Ex-Bailie Little, Kilmarnock, and Councillor Johnston, Dumfries, joined the deputation in London. By a wise division of labour the deputation were able to see every Scottish Parliamentary representative in town. The interviews were in nearly all the cases of an extremely satisfactory character, exceeding in cordiality previous interviews with honourable members; nearly all the new members showing a laudable desire to know the nature of the claims of permissive prohibitionists. Every Scotch member received a circular from the Scottish Temperance League, and also from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, reminding them of the coming debate, and respectfully requesting them to be in their places and vote with Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Petitions, memorials, and letters beyond enumeration continued to be received by honourable and right honourable members up to the hour of the division, and the acknowledgement of these communications was a serious tax upon their time and energies. During the week previous to the division the lobbies were thronged with the friends and the opponents of the bill, the Scottish local optionists meeting with members, and displaying business-like ability, tact, energy, and persistency, which, conjoined with their good cause, gave them a supreme advantage over their adversaries. Hearing that the Home Secretary was to receive a deputation from the Scottish liquor trade, the deputation succeeded in inducing Sir William to also grant them an interview. That he kindly agreed to do. Both deputations met him by appointment on the day previous to the debate. We have never seen such a commotion in the lobby as took place on that afternoon. The publicans failed to secure the presence of honourable members at their interview, but at the last moment Lord Elcho, at the instance of one of the local option deputations, was prevailed upon to introduce them to the Home Secretary. This was unfortunate for the licensed victuallers, for had they gone in by themselves to Sir William they might have been able to explain that they did not wish any honourable member to be present, now they must admit that their cause is sadly lacking in the element of parliamentary influence when only one Conservative member could be got to lead them on. Their interview was as short as it was whispered it was unsatisfactory. While they were presenting their case the local optionists were marshalling their forces, and when we merely mention the fact that they stood in the presence of the Home Secretary flanked by eleven honourable members and the Lord-Advocate, we have sufficiently indicated how obvious it must have been to Sir William that the friends of the bill were by far the most influential and popular party. Mr. D. M'Laren, M.P., the staunch friend of the deputations that have in London successively represented the temperance party, introduced the Scottish local option deputation, which was accompanied by the following party representatives—General Sir Alex. Gordon, M.P., Sir G. Campbell, M.P., Dr. Cameron, M.P., Messrs. Williamson, M.P., Noel, M.P., M'Lagan, M.P., Grant, M.P., Middleton, M.P., Dick Peddie, M.P., Mr. Currie, M.P. Rev. Dr. Adamson and Mr. R. C. Murray stated the case for the deputation. The Home Secretary made no public statement, but his remarks were peculiarly encouraging. He is reported to have said that he had been convinced that while both publicans and prohibitionists exerted themselves to the utmost the country went with the latter. He had at one time little sympathy with the efforts of the friends of prohibition, but his views were changed by the Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland. When he found that Sunday closing was the desire of the people of Ireland, he could not refrain from supporting their claim, and if the people of Scotland showed similar unanimity they would no doubt greatly impress the legislature in their favour. He believed that members of the Government would be free to vote on the resolution as they pleased, but they must excuse him from stating what the Government intended to do when the local resolution was brought before the house; all he felt called upon to say was that the Government would by the division learn the tendency and force of public opinion on this question, and be guided by it if they had to deal in any way with the reform of the licensing laws. The deputation, having through Mr. R. T. Middleton, M.P., thanked the honourable gentleman, withdrew.

As instructed by the Gladstone memorialists in Mid-Lothian, Mr. J. H. Waterston, their secretary, communicated with the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., reminding him of the debate and division, and expressing the hope of the memorialists that he would be in his place and vote in favour of the local option resolution. The right hon. gentleman replied "that when Sir W. Lawson moved his resolution on the subject of local option he would not fail to express himself in the House of Commons." On behalf of the memorialists Mr. Waterston again wrote him (1) reminding him that he had received a memorial signed by 140 electors in the county of Mid-Lothian, praying him to vote in favour of local option; (2) that these memorialists energetically promoted his return in the belief that he would co-operate with them in advancing the interests of local option; (3) expressing their hope that in his speech he would not weaken the position which, judging from the vote of parliamentary representation local option holds in the estimation of the Scottish people, and (4) trusting that the memorialists would learn by the speech he purposed to deliver, he intended to exert his powerful influence on behalf of a movement which would promote the virtue, happiness, and progress of the people. This letter was duly acknowledged.

THE HOUSE BEFORE THE DEBATE.

Those who had members' orders for the strangers' gallery mustered in great force in the outer corridor, and those who had orders for the speaker's gallery thronged the entrance of the inner corridor. A large force of police, under the direction of Inspector Denning, were present to preserve order: a very difficult task, but one which, from the forbearance on both sides, was on the whole satisfactorily accomplished. Considerable merriment was indulged in as batch after batch of successful applicants for the strangers' gallery in the custody of policemen passed on to their seats. When all entitled to a seat there were cared for, the speaker's gallery was attended to. The gallery is gauged to hold 60, 36 seats being at the disposal of members, and the rest at the immediate disposal of the speaker's secretary. There is also a supplementary list consisting of those who take the seats of such as are pleased to relinquish them. The numbers wanting admission would have filled the gallery twice over. It was instantly crowded to overflowing, and several seats of the members' gallery in front of it pressed into requisition. The unfortunate individuals who were disappointed of a seat had then to withdraw into the outer lobby. The aspect inside the House was peculiar. The benches were rapidly filled, the galleries and the ladies' cage being crowded by an eager and expectant audience, and on the front ministerial bench were Sir W. Harcourt, Messrs. Gladstone, Forster, Bright, Grant Duff, and others. Sir R. Cross was the solitary occupant of the front opposition bench.

THE DEBATE.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Sir WILFRID LAWSON rose to move, "That, inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected, namely, the inhabitants themselves, who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system, by some efficient measure of local option." He said he should endeavour to address himself more especially to the new members, who had not heard this subject thoroughly discussed, and who wished to know what was meant by local option. The result of the late general election proved that there was a very general interest felt in this matter throughout the constituencies of the kingdom. One result of that interest was that some of his old and valued opponents were not there to oppose him as they used to be. He missed the familiar face of his old and respected enemy Mr. Wheelhouse, and he had had some doubt in his mind as to who would take his place. He did not know for certain who would do it, but he had been told that the mantle of Mr. Wheelhouse had fallen upon the noble lord the member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). (Laughter.) Not long ago the Prime Minister said that amongst the questions which any new Government would have to deal with, the question of altering and amending the liquor laws would hold a foremost place. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "The evils of drunkenness become more and more patent every day," and that "the conscience of the country is fairly aroused upon this subject." If legislation was able in any way to deal with such a state of things, then that legislation was the most important subject which could occupy the time of the House of Commons. He had not come there to advocate a new licensing law. The preceding Liberal Government dealt with the liquor laws in 1872, and made them a little better, and the late Home Secretary dealt with them in 1874, and made them a little worse. (Laughter.) A proof of the evil of the liquor traffic was to be found in the innumerable bills which were brought into that House dealing with this question, and the curious thing was they all went in his direction. They were all meant to restrict the trade. He did not "go in" for a comprehensive measure of dealing with the licensing system, but left that to cleverer fellows and statesmen, neither of which he was. (Hear, and laughter.) All he proposed was that the people for whom these places were licensed, the inhabitants, should be allowed to choose whether they would have them or not. That meant "option." Then "local" meant that there should be a certain district marked out in which they should be allowed to exercise that option. He proposed to constitute no new powers as regarded licensing. "Local option" seemed to be a word that puzzled a good many people. The word was first used by the Prime Minister, but his resolution came from Convocation. (Laughter.) Convocation presented a report on drunkenness, and in that report would be found embodied a recommendation in the words of the resolution he was now moving, copied verbatim, with the exception of the words added at the end, "by some measure of local option," in order to make the thing a little clearer. The resolution was endorsed by 14,000 clergymen of the Church of England. Her Majesty's Government ought to give him some help in this matter, because they were very strong on local self-government. He knew that hon. members looked upon the resolution with suspicion, and regarded it as the Permissive Bill in disguise. (Hear, hear.) He knew somebody would cheer that; but he wished to ask those gentlemen who cheered, how it was possible for a resolution to be a bill! It was a thing impossible. He had annoyed hon. members over and over again with the Permissive Bill, and he had been often told that they wanted a principle and not details. He believed that the resolution did contain the principle of what he used to call the Permissive Bill—(hear, hear)—and that was that licensing should only be allowed where the people wanted licensed houses. Some of his hon. friends seemed to think that it meant a great deal more. If it did he should be delighted, and so much the better for the resolution. The principle upon which he proposed the resolution was well understood by the Lords' Committee on Intemperance. They condemned the Permissive Bill, but they thoroughly endorsed the principle of the resolution. In an admirable sentence they pointed out the enormity of the evil and the feeble and unsuccessful efforts hitherto made to reduce it. He hoped he had clearly explained that the resolution was not the Permissive Bill. Turning to the amendments, he believed he had no objection to any of the schemes propounded in the amendments. Matters could not be much worse than they were; and all he said was, "Don't let the magistrates force drink-shops upon places which don't want them." Objection was taken to the resolution because it was an abstract resolution; but he believed—for there were exceptions to all rules—that there were occasions when an abstract resolution was laudable. He recollected the celebrated resolution brought in by the hon. baronet the member for Devonshire (Sir M. Lopes) about local taxation, and when a Conservative Government came into power they acted upon it. The Prime Minister, some years ago, moved an abstract resolution condemning the Irish Church, and when an opportunity offered, and he had a majority at his back, he very properly carried a bill for disestablishing the Irish Church. There was another case in point. A worthy friend of his—the late Professor Smyth—introduced the question of Sunday closing in Ireland by means of a resolution, and having carried it, in a year or two he was able to carry the bill which had already worked such wonders in the way of benefiting the people of Ireland. It was said that he ought to include in the resolution something about compensation. Now he did not want to condemn compensation, but it was not the question for consideration now. The question was the right to force these houses upon an unwilling neighbourhood, and if a remedy could not be found without compensation, then let them have compensation. All he would say now on the question of compensation was that at the right time, when the question was seriously raised, he and his friends would be ready to consider it. In conclusion he urged that there must be something in a demand which the people so persistently urged, and the House knew as well as he did that the demand sprang from the poor and working people of the country. Hardly any rich man, hardly any great man, hardly any statesman was in favour of it. The rich and the influential treated it with scorn. The press up to the last year or two were generally against it. No great orators went about the country as in the days of the Anti-Corn Law League, and there were no large subscriptions to aid in getting rid of this monopoly. They had had all this to contend with, and yet at this moment, notwithstanding all obstacles, it was a question which excited the deepest interest in every constituency. The only reason why the question occupied so prominent a position was that their cause and their demand was right, just, and reasonable. He knew very well that the Government had many intricate and troublesome matters to deal with, but he must say that this was one which they could not very long delay dealing with. The Prime Minister in several of his recent speeches stated that it was a matter upon which public opinion must be formed. No Parliament could go before public opinion. He would not urge the Prime Minister to vote for the motion, but he did ask him most respectfully to leave the matter to the unbiased opinion of the House to reflect the opinion of the country. It was his belief that the House was not insensible to the evil he had attempted to describe, and that a great many of its members were convinced there was some sense and some reason in the policy he was urging, and he was not without hope that the result of the division would be such as to lay the foundation of a course of legislation the full accomplishment of which would entitle this House of Commons to an honourable place in the annals of English Parliaments. (Cheers.)

Mr. HUGH MASON seconded the motion, and in doing so said that both the House and the country desired that something should be done to check the great evil of intemperance, and he was sure Parliament would afford them the means of doing so. There were some good men who were of opinion that legislation would be inoperative to check this evil, and that they must be content to wait for the slow growth of moral feeling before they could expect this improvement in the habits of the people, and yet they had to admit that Bills passed in relation to Scotland and Ireland for closing the public-houses for one day in the week had accomplished a great deal of good. He denied that this was an attempt at class legislation. What they really desired was to take the power of licensing out of the magistrates' hands and place it in the hands of the people. The people themselves desired to be invested with this power. If the buying up of all the public-houses in the country would eradicate the evil, he would be ready to pay that immense price for such a great, moral, political, and social gain, and in conclusion he appealed to the House to give the working men the power to protect themselves. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, who was received with loud cheers, said—I do not rise at this early period of the debate with either the idea or the desire of checking the course of this discussion. On the contrary, I think that the delivery of speeches, full of argument and full of information on a matter of this enormous social interest, is a thing highly valuable and important to the public welfare. But I rise at this time because I thought it my duty to meet without a moment's delay, so far as it depended upon me, the courteous and encouraging invitation addressed to me by my hon. friend, the mover of the amendment. I understood my hon. friend to say at the close of his speech he did not propose, and he did not much expect me, to give a vote in favour of the adoption at the present time of the motion, but he hoped no attempt would be made on the part of the Government to bring whatever authority belongs to the Executive Government, as such, to bear on the deliberations of the House, but that everybody should be encouraged to declare his own sentiments, and to vote according to his own belief and judgment in the matter. I can meet that invitation and challenge of my hon. friend in a manner that I hope will not be unsatisfactory to my hon. friend. The opinion he entertains on that subject, viz., as to the course the Government ought to take, is an opinion to which we ourselves had arrived. (Ministerial cheers.) We do not desire to bring any pressure whatever to bear upon the House. I recognise with pleasure the statement of my hon. friend, that it is not in the power of the Government to take largely into its own hands the decision of a question such as this; that it must be content to march with a close and sedulous regard to the progress of public opinion, and that even if it be true, as it is true, that the Government may at a certain stage do something towards ripening or giving form to that public opinion; yet if it places itself in a position entirely apart from, whether in advance or in the rear, it mistakes its functions, and a premature attempt will probably result in its action being foiled. There are members of the Government who have voted already in favour of the resolution of my hon. friend, and those members will, so far as I know, renew that vote to-night. I shall not follow my hon. friend into the lobby, and I may tell him at once frankly the reason that will lead me to pursue the course which he hinted as probable on my part. He quotes a case in which I was the mover of an abstract resolution—namely, the series of resolutions in 1868 on the Irish Church Establishment. That is perfectly true, but my hon. friend will do me the justice of saying that those abstract resolutions were simply the preface to a bill which I proposed, and eventually carried through this House. (Sir W. Lawson.—In the same session?) Yes. Not a Bill to disestablish the Irish Church, because I considered that a dying Parliament was unequal to such a task, but a Bill to arrest all appointments in the Irish Church until after the election then approaching, in order that legislation might be reserved to the next Parliament. And even as in 1868, when, in proposing a resolution of this kind, I was prepared to give practical effect to it in a definite form on which the judgment of the House could be tested, the very same expectation would be, I think, legitimately entertained of me, especially in the place I have now the honour to fill, if I were now to vote in favour of the abstract resolution of my hon. friend. My hon. friend will also perceive that I have greater facility in taking the course

I have indicated, because the forms of the House enable me to deal with the motion for Supply as if it were a motion for the previous question. My hon. friend will see that a responsibility rests upon me, and an expectation would be held to follow on my vote which would be different from that of one not charged with official duty. I should have been better satisfied with the matter of the resolution if my hon. friend had included in it some reference to the principle of equitable compensation. I don't want my hon. friend to commit himself upon that point, but I want a recognition of the principle that we are not to deny to publicans as a class the benefit of equal treatment, because we think their trade is at so many points in contact with, and even sometimes productive of great public danger. Considering the legislative right they have acquired they ought not to be placed at a disadvantage on account of the impression we may entertain, in many cases too justly, in relation to the mischiefs connected with the present licensing system and the consumption of strong liquors as it is now carried on. Having said this much it is unnecessary for me to follow my hon. friend into his argument, but a few words I will say expressive of my general sympathy. I am bound to say there is not a word in the remarkable passage read by my hon. friend from the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords at the close of his speech which I am not prepared to endorse. (Cheers.) My difficulty in this case is not the ordinary one of want of time, but the intricacy with which the subject is surrounded. I do not yet see the particular measure by which just effect can be given to the principle of my hon. friend; but I earnestly entertain the hope that at some not very distant period it may be found practicable to deal with the licensing laws, and, in dealing with them, to include the reasonable, the just application of the principle for which my honourable friend contends. We all go together up to a certain point. We all recognise and allow that the evils of intoxication are not merely great, but monstrous. Their extent and their depth and their intensity need hardly be described; but, having made that admission, our paths begin to diverge. I do not myself agree with those who say that legislative means are impotent in these matters. Legislation has great powers in removing powerful sources of temptation, and the question will be to what extent, in what manner, and under what conditions legislation can be employed at a suitable moment for the purpose of lessening or removing those sources of temptation, either in cases that admit of a universal application of principles, or in those in which the local judgment of the population should be allowed an influence. I deny that this movement is inspired by any desire for class legislation, as it has mostly come from the working classes themselves. For myself I certainly am one of those who, regarding the general structure of the licensing law, are thoroughly and radically dissatisfied with it; but at the same time I am no believer in monopoly, either here or in any other matter, and I believe, also, that as monopoly is bolstered up, so is it more difficult to deal with the evil it covers. I do not wish to be drawn into any premature conclusion, but it is only fair to make that admission. With regard, however, to the question which my hon. friend has brought before us, I will say these two things in conclusion: First of all, that I believe that one of the great subjects which will call for the attention of the Executive at as early a period as the heavy competing pressure of some other subjects will permit will be the reform of the licensing laws; and secondly, I believe that that reform is so eminently called for and is so favoured by the circumstances in which we now stand, that I regard it as an essential part of the work and mission of the present Parliament. (Cheers from all parts of the house). I have no prejudices upon this subject, but I am glad to have at least the pardon, if not the approval, of my hon. friend if I decline to express by my vote distinct adhesion to an expression of abstract principle on the subject until I feel myself armed with the possession of some practical plan that I am in a condition to recommend for the approval of Parliament. (Loud cheers.)

Sir ROBERT GUNLIFF said he was one of those who had never been able to support the Permissive Bill, and in voting for this resolution he should not consider himself pledged to any particular bill. It appeared to him that a bill which gave the ratepayers some control over the granting of licenses would do much to get rid of many evils of the present system.

Captain AYLMER said that all this resolution pretended to do was to transfer the power of granting licenses from one body to another. That would not put an end to intemperance. He maintained that the magistrates were the best licensing authority; they lived in the place, and were independent of any improper influence that might be brought to bear upon them. He should oppose the motion. (Cheers.)

Mr. A. ARNOLD said that for Local Option—mysterious term—he would much prefer to substitute the expression “local control.” (Hear, hear.) That part of the resolution which was intelligible to himself, and with which he was in entire accord, was to the effect that the representation of the people on this matter—a matter of such vital, such deep social importance to them—should be in their own hands; that they should have, as he contended they had a right to have, local control. The people of this country were not represented by their magistrates. For himself, he regarded the license possessed by the man privileged to sell wine, beer and spirits by retail as a very substantial property. It was impossible for anyone who seriously understood any course of reform to be anything but tender towards the rights of property; the very essence of the work of reform was to pay proper and consistent respect to those rights.

Lord ELCHO said the hon. member for Carlisle had told the House that he (the noble lord) had inherited the mantle of the late member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse). He laid claim to no such Parliamentary inheritance. (Laughter.) They were urged to vote for local option because it did not necessarily mean suppression, but only restriction. His hon. friend, however, was too honest to stop there, and he added that he wished to suppress the liquor traffic altogether. (Hear, hear.) In this free country it would be an intolerable state of things to establish that a majority of the ratepayers—half the ratepayers of a district plus one—should lay down a law which would prevent the other half minus one, who might be most temperate men, from being able to take a glass of beer or spirits in that district. It was a climax to the harassing of interests. He believed this legislation was proposed at a time when it was not necessary. He heartily sympathised with every member who desired by every possible means to repress intemperance. But the resolution was introduced at a time when far from intemperance being on the increase there were many signs of improvement.

Mr. CAINE said he supported the resolution in the interests of temperance and morality. There had been a good deal said about the rights of property, but they must not, while protecting those rights, forget the rights, the sorrows, and the aspirations of the people.

Colonel BARNE opposed the resolution. This was essentially a poor man's question, and before the decided it they should wait until household suffrage got extended to the counties, which would give them a Parliament elected by the labourers. The magistrates were much more fit to be the licensing body than the inhabitants of the parish. (Cheers.)

General BURNABY opposed the resolution.

Mr. WARTON, who rose next to oppose the resolution, was greeted with loud cries of “divide.” He spoke throughout amid a running fire of interruptions from all parts of the House, which rendered his voice almost inaudible.

The House divided, and the numbers were—

For Sir W. Lawson's resolution.....229

Against.....203

Majority.....—26

The announcement was received with loud cheers from the Government benches, this demonstration being taken up by the occupants of the Stranger's Gallery, many of whom rose to their feet and clapped their hands.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson was in good form, more argumentative and earnest than usual, but this was greatly in favour of his contention, his speech being cheered at its various points and warmly cheered at its close. Mr. Hugh Mason made a most excellent speech, bristling with telling argument and fact and full of eloquent pleas in behalf of the people having a veto-power over the liquor traffic. The Speaker having read the resolution which was now before the House, the Prime Minister, who seemed eager to speak, rose amid cheers and made one of the best speeches he has delivered during the present session. Calm, frank, sympathetic, and masterly, it made a great impression on the House, and we are of opinion that it moved many to vote for the resolution. He was loudly cheered throughout; and after he sat down, the House was not disposed for further debate, and gave scant hearing to those who opposed the motion. Mr. Caine, however, got a most attentive hearing. Lord Elcho was laughed at, and as for Mr. Warton he was shouted down; no one in the House could hear an entire sentence of his thirty minutes' speech. At last the Speaker put the question—“That instead of the words ‘the House shall go into supply,’ the words of Sir Wilfrid's resolution shall stand part of the question.” His ruling was challenged and a division ordered. At the end of the two minutes' grace, the doors being locked, the question was put and the House divided, members going into the lobbies. The suspense at this moment was painful, for it was felt that the division was to be a close one. At last members began to return to their seats, and amid breathless excitement all eyes were bent on the tellers to see whether those for supply or those for the amendment were to receive the paper bearing the numbers. Sir Wilfrid went forward to the Clerk at the table, and when the paper was put into his hand the House cheered, as did also the ladies and those in the galleries. Of course the strangers had at once to compose themselves, but honourable members being under no such restraint, cheered while Sir Wilfrid walked up the floor and read off the paper that 203 went for supply and 229 for him. Another loud outburst of cheering took place, at the announcement, which was shared in by both sides of the House and by those below the gangway. Many members shook Sir Wilfrid heartily by the hand, and he retired to the lobby to receive the warm congratulations of his friends and supporters who thronged around, cheering at the victory and congratulating each other on their great triumph.

THE DIVISION LIST.

On the two occasions on which the resolution was brought forward the voting was respectively—for, 183; against, 271; majority against, 88; for, 134; against, 248; majority against, 114. On this occasion the vote, including tellers, was—for, 231; against, 205; majority for, 26. To this number has to be added from 10 to 15 pairs, so that there will likely be a majority of about 40. On looking at the last and present vote the immense change of public opinion on this question becomes apparent. On the last occasion the majority against was 114, on the present it is 26 in favour, showing a difference in favour of the resolution of 140 votes. The Scotch vote on the first division on the resolution was 32 to 10, on the 5th March last it was 32 to 7, on the present occasion it was 40 to 5, exclusive of pairs, or 8 to 1 in favour of local option. Three members paired for, so that the votes and pairs stand 43 for and 5 votes and no pairs against. This is fully two thirds of the Scotch parliamentary representation. Some of our readers may point to our May number, and call our attention to the summary of the results of the general election there, which shows that 46 candidates promised to vote for, that 8 were neutral, and 6 were opposed, and ask us to explain. Of the 46, 39 voted, and 7—viz., Lord Colin Campbell (at Constantinople), Mr. Russell (resigned his seat for Buteshire), Hon. Preston Bruce and Mr. G. Anderson (resiled from their promise), Colonel Mure (on sick leave), A. Mathieson (ill), J. Ramsay (necessarily absent), are accounted for. The Lord Advocate was defeated in the Wigtown Burghs, but Mr. Stewart voted for the resolution. Dr. Webster, who was believed to prefer a neutral position, voted with Sir Wilfrid, thus making forty, and Messrs. Anderson and Ramsay and Lord Colin Campbell paired in its favour. Then it was concluded that 6 would vote against the resolution. Mr. R. W. Duff and Dr. Campbell fortunately did not fulfil the anticipation, but Mr. R. W. Cochrane-Patrick voted adversely, contrary to expectation, thus there were only five against. The following is the voting:—

Ayes—Sir A. H. Gordon, Dr. Farquharson, Dr. Webster, Major Campbell, E. Marjoribanks, Sir J. G. T. Sinclair, R. Jardine, E. Noel, G. Armitstead, F. Henderson, D. M'Laren, J. Cowan, Right Hon. Dr. Playfair, Right Hon. M. E. G. Duff, J. W. Barclay, Dr. Cameron, R. T. Middleton, J. Stewart, Sir D. Wedderburn, G. O. Trevelyan, C. Fraser-M'Intosh, J. Dick Peddie, Sir G. Balfour, Sir G. Campbell, Captain Maxwell, Major Hamilton, A. Grant, P. M'Lagan, Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, S. Laing, W. Holms, C. Tennant, D. Currie, C. S. Parker, Hon. A. Elliot, S. Williamson, J. C. Bolton, H. Campbell-Bannerman, J. Pender, and M. J. Stewart—40. Paired for—Lord Colin Campbell, J. Ramsay, G. Anderson—3. Total for, 43.

THE LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION.

We have been requested to publish the following correspondence between Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P., and Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., respecting the debate and division of 18th ult. :—

"My dear Sir Wilfrid,—I am sorry I had to leave the House on Saturday morning without having the opportunity of congratulating you on the success of your motion in favour of local option. I rejoice with you that after many years of earnest, able, and untiring advocacy on your part, the House of Commons has at length affirmed the principle that the inhabitants of localities should have the power to veto the sale of intoxicating drinks in their neighbourhoods. The question is being anxiously asked as to what course you will take to give effect to the resolution which has just been passed. I presume it will now devolve upon the Government to bring in a bill to carry out the wish of the House of Commons on the subject.—With kind regards, I am, ever yours, THOMAS BURT."

"Dear Mr. Burt,—A good many persons ask me the same question as the one which is contained in your note. There is no doubt that those who are opposed to the liquor traffic never stood in so favourable a position as they do at present. Not only has the House of Commons, by a substantial majority, declared that localities are entitled to the power of protecting themselves from the invasion of liquor shops, but the Prime Minister himself, although he voted for the motion for the Speaker's leaving the chair, and not for my amendment, virtually gave a very cordial support in his speech to the principle embodied in the local option resolution. It is quite clear that the Government cannot long delay dealing with the liquor question; and if they deal with it in the manner which Mr. Gladstone indicated we shall secure legislation of the kind which you and I have so long advocated. It appears to me that any immediate action of mine in Parliament, at the present moment, could hardly improve the prospects of sound and early legislation, but might on the other hand tend to embarrass the Government in dealing satisfactorily with this vital question. Let us give them time; and for our part let us, between now and the opening of next session, do all that is in our power to show the Government that there is a real, thorough, and earnest demand on the part of the public for that popular veto on the issue and renewal of licences, which is the sum and substance of our present demand, and which will perfectly harmonise with any measure of licensing reform which Government may introduce next session.—Yours very truly,
W. LAWSON.

"Grosvenor Crescent, S.W., June 22nd, 1880."

THE PRESS ON THE DEBATE.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson is assuredly well content with the result of last night. He scored a decisive victory, and thus gave an unforeseen reality to the belief of the Prime Minister that this Parliament must deal with the licensing question. All men may, indeed, rejoice at a result which forces the Government to take the matter in hand. A tendency to let it drift has been the danger of the situation. Sir Wilfrid Lawson has his scheme. He may hide it under the cloak of a Local Option Resolution or in any other fashion that pleases him, but the scheme is prepared and only waits the appropriate hour. It is in this way that the impossible has so often become possible, and what we say never can happen does somehow come to pass. But after last night's vote the Government cannot allow another session to pass without elaborating some definite plan of dealing with the licensing question. This is to be desired in the interests of all men.—Times.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson has succeeded in taking hold of a practical principle which is forcing itself every day more and more into serious consideration. It is a very important question whether the regulation of the traffic against which Sir Wilfrid Lawson directs his efforts would not be more safely left in the hands of a properly representative body in each locality than entrusted to any specially constituted licensing board. But however Sir Wilfrid Lawson's main object may be affected by the principle he strives to call into action, it is clear that the principle itself is coming rapidly into recognition as a part of our public policy. The proposed principle does seem no doubt as if it put some of the daily habits of a small minority at the will of a large majority. But it is to be remembered that in almost every kind of legislation we have to put up this principle to some degree. We cannot help believing that a properly constituted representative system, having the power to deal with the liquor traffic and the licensing trade, would be found to take more account of all the various claims, interests, and rights brought within its charge than is done by means of the machinery at present in operation.—Daily News.

The division resulted in Sir Wilfrid Lawson's triumph. The hopes to which we referred yesterday have thus been realized. In a House of more than four hundred and thirty members, the resolution was carried by a majority of twenty-six. The House of Commons is thus committed to the principle of local option, and we suppose that the next step will be to propose positive legislation on the subject. Here the real difficulty will begin. But it is evident that a question of this kind can only be dealt with by the responsible Ministers of the Crown; and Sir Wilfrid Lawson will probably be satisfied for a time with the victory he gained last night. After years of patient labour, and in spite of misrepresentation and ridicule, he has convinced the House of Commons of the expediency of local option, and may be congratulated by all parties on the success he has achieved.—Daily Chronicle.

If the working-classes are content to place in the hands of the majority—in many instances, this majority would be those who do not frequent public-houses—the power of preventing the sale of stimulants, let them pronounce boldly to that effect, and we can assure them that their wish will meet with no opposition from those above them in the social station.—Globe.

Whether the principle is called local option or local control, it is to be hoped that we have heard the last of the absurd doctrine that to take the control of the drink traffic out of the hands of the present licensing bodies, and hand it over to elective bodies, would be to sanction local tyranny. There is nothing more tyrannical in local government of drink than in local government of anything else—of sanitary works, roads and bridges, water or gas. It has been found expedient to entrust the control of these matters to local representative bodies; and there is no reason to suppose that, if the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors were entrusted to the same authorities, they would at once forget all that they have learned in generations of the practice of local self-government, and rush into a tyrannical abuse of their trust. We must have confidence, after all, in the good sense of the majority in this as in other matters.—Pall Mall Gazette.

It is somewhat amusing to find the recognised organ of the liquor trade comforting its clients with the assurance that, though the local option resolution has been carried by a majority, yet they will fall into the hands of Mr. Gladstone, and not into the hands of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. This subdued and mellow tone is in strange contrast to the fierce war cry that so recently called upon the dealers in drink to combine as one man against that Liberal party which threatened to lay its sacrilegious hands upon the most lucrative of all monopolies.—Echo.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION AND THE DEBATE AND DIVISION ON THE LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION, JUNE, 1880.

The following resolutions have been unanimously adopted by the executive of the association:—

I.—“That the warmest thanks of the friends of temperance and prohibition throughout the country are due to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., and the 230 right hon. and hon. members, of whom 40 are representatives of Scotland—fully a two-thirds majority of its representation—who, on the 19th inst., voted in favour of the local option resolution, embodying the principle that ratepayers should be legally empowered to prevent the issue or renewal of licenses for the sale of alcoholic liquors in their several localities.”

II.—“That the executive tender their hearty acknowledgments to the various temperance organizations in Scotland, which so energetically promoted the movement in favour of the resolution: to the members of the Parliamentary deputation, whose exertions in London contributed greatly to the satisfactory Scotch vote; and to the large body of earnest friends throughout the country to whose co-operation at the present juncture the movement is very deeply indebted.”

III.—“That, as the result of the triumphant passage of the resolution, the executive hail with satisfaction the prospect of the early introduction of a Government measure dealing with the licensing laws in the interests of the community, including the principle for which temperance reformers have so long contended, and earnestly calls upon the friends of the movement everywhere to continue to press the claims of that principle upon the attention and consideration of all classes, in order that the Government may fully and speedily recognise the fact that no legislation on the liquor traffic can be satisfactory to the people of this country which does not enable the ratepayers to veto all traffic in alcoholic liquors.”

A circular, of which the following is a copy, was sent to every member of Parliament in view of the debate and division on the resolution:—“Intoxicating Liquors (Licenses) Resolution. Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Motion, Friday, 18th June, 1880.—Right honourable and honourable members are respectfully reminded that on Friday first the following resolution will, in pursuance of notice, be moved by Sir Wilfrid Lawson:—“That inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquor is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected—namely, the inhabitants themselves—who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system by some efficient measure of local option.” The principle embodied in the resolution is one which, it is now widely admitted, must form the basis of any really practical and satisfactory amendment of the licensing laws. It is at once just, equitable, and reasonable that localities should have power to deal effectively with a system that is maintained professedly for their convenience, and that nevertheless is fraught with great public mischief, and largely contravenes its ostensible objects. If anything were wanting to remove misgivings as to the probable results of local option, it is to be found in the testimony—clear and strong—afforded by localities that have been freed from the liquor traffic, to the effect that they have benefitted in every way by the change. That public opinion is ripe for the adoption of such a measure has been abundantly evidenced by the position the question held at the late General Election, when no question of domestic legislation was more strongly urged upon candidates by the constituencies, and none received more decided support. When Sir Wilfrid Lawson divided the House on 5th March last 32 Scotch members voted and paired for the resolution, while only 7 voted against it. Right honourable and honourable members are earnestly requested to be in their places on Friday first, and to give the resolution their cordial vote and support.—James Hamilton, J.P., City Treasurer, Glasgow, President; James Torrens, J.P., Glasgow, Chairman of Executive; Thos. Dick, Ex-Chief Magistrate, Kinning Park, Vice-Chairman; James L. Selkirk, T.C., Glasgow, Honorary Secretary; Robert M'Callum, Glasgow, Treasurer; Robert Mackay, Secretary.—Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association; Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow, 14th June, 1880.”

THE ASSEMBLIES.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—The General Assembly met at Edinburgh, on the 20th May, with the usual august ceremonial and solemnities. The Earl of Rosslyn was Lord High Commissioner; Rev. Dr. Watson was chosen moderator. On Friday, 22nd ult., the report of the Sabbath Schools was submitted, and showed that for the first time every Presbytery was represented. 56 parishes had not yet reported, and there were still 34 parishes without a Sabbath School. There was a large increase (18,000) in the number of scholars; 130 school libraries had been established, and £2126 2s 9½d had been collected in the Sabbath School of the Church. On Saturday, 22nd, the report on Christian Life and Work was submitted. The deliverance of the Assembly bore, among important matters, the following instructions:—That Presbyteries be asked, “How can the efficiency of the Church be promoted in developing and utilising within the constitution of the Church the special gifts of ministers, such as aptitude for organisation, or power of effective address on missionary, evangelistic, temperance, or other subjects.” Mr. Watson of Cavers disapproved of the paragraph in this report about getting youths of the highest class to enter the ministry. He considered that his service, if he had been a poor man, would have been as valuable as those of the son of a rich brewer or country magistrate. On Thursday, 27th, the Committee on Intemperance gave in their report. In it they drew attention to the Board of Trade returns, the newspaper reports, and the New Year's celebration, as all bearing witness to the improved state of the country through lessened inebriety. This may not, however, arise altogether from changed habits, but from the enforced sobriety of hard times. They would impress upon the General Assembly that the most hopeful view of the country in regard to intemperance implies a state of matters calling for the earnest and continued effort of every minister and kirk-session of the Church to lessen the evil that is so widely spread, and is so ruinous in its consequences. The committee, in their suggestions for the future, proposed among other things that they should be authorised to form a temperance register for the Church—the register to include (1) parochial societies, (2) the names of ministers and elders who are members of such societies, with the number of ordinary members attached to each. The deliverance of the Assembly was an injunction “to watch over the interests of temperance in the Church, to have prayers and conferences in all the Church Courts, to devise measures to promote temperance, to furnish information to the Assembly on the subject, to keep parochial temperance registers, and to preach a sermon on Sabbath, 18th December next.” The mover (Mr. Allison) congratulated the Assembly on the report, complimented the working classes upon their increasing sobriety, charged the labouring classes with the great mass of drunkenness existing, and commended the report because it did not suggest any action in furtherance of legislation. The less the Church had to do, said this rev. gentleman, with legislation the better; first, because temperance legislation was of doubtful value, and second, because it was outside their province, the Church's duty being to deal with the people religiously and morally. The deliverance was unanimously adopted. Nothing farther of interest to our readers occurred during the sittings.

FREE CHURCH ASSEMBLY.—The General Assembly of this denomination opened on Thursday, 20th May, with the usual solemnities. Rev. Dr. Maine, Moderator. On Friday, 21st, the Committee on Religion and Morals brought up their report. The committee had no report upon a marked and wide-spread work of grace, as was the case on previous years, but there were tokens that the gracious power of the Spirit accompanied the ministry of the Word. Such tokens were more manifest in Home Mission work. The committee deprecated the increased Sabbath travelling by farm servants. The Jedburgh Presbytery report that the two prevalent sins are drunkenness and unchastity. In many districts in the country intemperance was decreasing. This arose from the marked attention bestowed upon the evil, and from the way ministers headed temperance work. On Saturday, 22nd, Rev. A. C. Kay, Loanhead, was disjoined from his charge at Loanhead owing to the sin of taking opiates—a very harsh proceeding on the part of the Assembly, seeing that he laboured so zealously for the Church at Stornoway, had an attack of fever on his return during his pastoral visitation among his own people, and seeing, above all, that there was no law forbidding ministers to take, touch, and handle liquor, and that the holiest ordinance of the Church is celebrated with intoxicating liquors. On the 24th, the Committee on Temperance submitted their report through their convener, Rev. D. D. Bannerman. There were many indications of progress in the country, judging by the reports with which the report teemed. "The publicans of Rothessay had agreed to close at ten o'clock: effect good." "Beyond question the more opportunities, the more intemperance. Markets, fairs, and cattle shows, are scenes and occasions prominent for excess." "There is one parish in Dumfries in which there is no public house, and an intoxicated person is never seen there." The convener said if any wanted to know in what school they may best learn what intemperance means in this country, he would say to them, try to do a little Home Mission work in however small a way; try to get into contact with the people among whom you are living, and help them towards higher things, moral and spiritual, and you will soon find what stops the way. (Applause.) There was an urgent need that the Church should be fairly roused to grapple with this great question which faced it, and that the hearts and consciences of their Christian people should be stirred. He would appeal to the women of this city—of this country—to the women of the Church. (Applause.) This was a woman's question, and they could do much in raising the public tone of feeling and sentiment on this matter. (Applause.) Several overtures on the subject were presented. Principal Rainy moved the deliverance of the House on the temperance report, which approved of it, thanked the committee, and convener, and secretary, renewed their injunction to all the ministers of the Church, in addition to appropriate references in their ordinary ministrations, to preach a sermon on temperance on the third Sabbath of December, or on either of the two following Sabbaths, and instructing Presbyteries to see that this injunction is attended to; renewing their request to ministers and sessions to see that the young of the congregation are trained in habits of temperance; again recommended all kirk-sessions to consider the propriety of forming congregational temperance associations upon a well-considered basis, and under the superintendence of ministers and office-bearers of the Church; renewing the Assembly's support of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, and resolving to petition for the bill for closing public-houses in England and Wales on the Lord's day, introduced by Messrs. Stephenson and Roberts; pressing upon Parliament the necessity of a measure for Scotland giving to the ratepayers an efficient control over the drink traffic, and for the earlier closing of public-houses; and finally, the Assembly pressed anew the whole subject of intemperance, and the imperative duty of using all reasonable and expedient means for its removal on the attention of all office-bearers and members of the Church; and, in particular, enforcing the duty of discouraging in every way, both by influence and example, the drinking usages of the country." Principal Rainy said he had great pleasure in moving this resolution, which was very nearly in the same terms as the resolution of last General Assembly. He felt free to move the adoption of the report, and to take the opportunity of expressing his sense of the earnest attention which all men and all Churches ought to devote to this most pressing social, moral, and spiritual question. He felt especial pleasure in taking up this subject in connection with the Church and with the General Assembly. (Applause.) He had no hesitation in joining with every Christian man or men interested in the welfare of the community, but he felt that the Christian Church was, and ought to be, the Christian Temperance Society, and that the results they ought to bring about ought to be results sought and laid in the line of Christian action in Christ's institution. The evils connected with intemperance had beyond all doubt taken most exceptional proportions, and besides that fact he pointed out that they had not yet got the minds of the people sufficiently impressed with the peculiar and insidious dangers connected with intemperance. Though many men were very powerfully impressed with these facts, yet he felt that there were great sections of the community who, after all that had been done, had not accepted with their minds impressions on this subject. He moved the adoption of this report with a great deal of pleasure, because he thought there was evidence that the subject was making progress, that it was drawing attention to itself on every side, that it was taking hold of the public mind in influential quarters, and that there was an increasing tendency towards something like a sound public opinion on the subject. Whatever point, however, it had reached, it would soon begin to go back unless Christian men kept at the subject, and continued to be resolute in calling attention to it—(applause)—and to all the evils connected with it. The progress that had been made would very easily be lost unless they kept at the subject. They must endeavour to push on as nearly abreast as they could, seeking to lay hold in some shape of the evil, so that by God's blessing they might subdue and overcome it. He could heartily say that it would be a very useful thing that a large proportion of the people should simply disuse the ordinary use of these things. He believed that if a great many more people would do it, it could do nothing but good, and he did not for his own part see what conceivable harm it could do. He wished it to be observed that this was one of those things in reference to which it was of the greatest importance to form public opinion, to embody public opinion in common with social habits and practices, because this was one of those things on which public opinion told with extraordinary force. Even class opinion, in a given class of society, told with a great force, and if they could get the public opinion on the side of temperance they might come to see a very great change on men's practices in this respect. (Applause.) Men would then begin to think how to get rid of this extraordinary tendency to an insanity—to an influence which, when it took hold of them with a power of delusion, of enslaving, to carry them down the hill, to bewitch them to their ruin—as inexpressible as it was deplorable. One other thing the report directed attention to, and that was popular action on temperance—he meant the action of law. Now, in regard to that, he had just to say that he did not believe in law making men sober, but he did believe in the law regulating the temptations by which men are made drunk. (Laughter and applause.) But there should be no question on this point, for the law already took cognisance and control of the liquor traffic. The question was how far the law should go, and how far it should be made most efficient? Mr. Kerr, shipowner, Glasgow (elder), expressed, amid some applause, the hope that they would ere long see many steamers such as that recently launched on the Clyde, in which no intoxicating liquors are sold. He ventured to ask the younger men of the Assembly and of the Church to consider the times in which they lived. If they would give up the luxury of wine and other intoxicating liquors he was convinced they would increase their influence for good. (Applause.) Mr. Kidston, Ferniegair, held that intemperance was caused by improper legislation, and that the evils of intemperance would be remedied by amended legislation. In concluding, Mr. Kidston intimated that having been for a number of years convener of the Temperance Committee he thought it desirable now to retire, and he had pleasure in proposing as his successor Mr. Bannerman. Councillor M'Lachlan, who confessed himself one of the fanatical teetotalers, asked how could they allow kirk-sessions to constitute congregational temperance societies, while one of their number might be a licensed grocer? Accordingly, he wished the committee to put in a clause in the motion to have these congregational societies superintended by ministers and office-bearers who were themselves abstainers. The suggestion, however, was not entertained. Principal Rainy, in connection with the resignation of Mr. Kidston, took occasion to propose that there should be a fitting expression of the long and diligent services Mr. Kidston had rendered on this committee. Mr. Bannerman also testified to the value of Mr. Kidston's labours, and the deliverance was passed. Nothing else of moment took place in the Assembly. On the 19th a great temperance demonstration took place in the Assembly Hall—Lord Provost Collins in the chair. On Wednesday, 26th, the annual temperance breakfast took place—Provost Campbell, Greenock, in the chair. The Chairman's address had a jubilant ring about it, as instance after instance of progress was detailed. The proceedings were of the most hopeful and enjoyable kind.

LADIES' LOCAL OPTION FUND.

The secretary, Mr. Mackay, has received the following letter:—"Dear Sir,—Enclosed you will find card and P.O.O. for 15s., which will speak for itself. Being in Edinburgh some little time ago, Mrs. Dr. Kirk gave me this card to collect a little money. I am sorry the card is not filled. But most of my temperance friends are already subscribers either to this or other temperance funds, and others think that there is no use trying to pass either Local Option or the Permissive Bill; but my faith is stronger, and I sincerely trust that general good will follow Sir Wilfrid Lawson's efforts this month.—Yours most sincerely, GRANGEMOUTH.—LORD ZETLAND AND THE PUBLI-CANS.—Mr. Wilson, solicitor, Falkirk, as agent for the licensed victuallers of this place received the under-mentioned letter from Lord Zetland's agents, communicating his lordship's answer to the memorial from the proprietors, factors, and tenants of licensed premises, here, forwarded by him to them on 11th February last:—"After carefully considering the memorial, his lordship regrets that he cannot, consistently with what he considers to be his duty in the circumstances, agree to delay any longer enforcing his rights in the case of the seven public-houses situated in Middle Street, North Basin Street, Harbour Street, Forth Bridge Street, and Grange Street, and understood to belong to Messrs. Peter Fealy, Baird's Trustees, John M'Arthur, Stewart's Trustees, J. Hislop, and R. Webster. According to our information the proprietors and tenants of these premises are still continuing to use them as public-houses, taverns, or dram-shops, in face of the notices published in January calling the attention of the parties to the prohibitions in the feu-rights, and intimating that these would be enforced after the 15th inst. Unless we hear from you with an assurance to the contrary on or before 26th inst., we shall understand the parties intend to refuse compliance with these prohibitions ex-judicially, and in that case the requisite legal proceeding will be adopted without further information. As regards the four licensed grocers' shops and the hotel in North Basin Street, it is not intended to interfere with them at present; but if any of them should be conducted in a way which Lord Zetland may consider to be objectionable, the parties may lay their account with the prohibitions being enforced. It will depend on circumstances whether the prohibition be enforced in the case of the Royal Hotel, in Grange Street, and the restaurant, in South Bridge Street." Mr. Wilson asked all the parties interested to meet him in his chambers, to consider what course should be adopted.

STRATHAVEN.—TEMPERANCE LECTURES.—Mr. R. Stevenson and Mr. R. Dransfield (of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association), on the evening of Monday, 24th May, delivered addresses under the auspices of "Drumclog" Lodge, I.O.G.T., in the Good Templar Hall, Kirk Road, to a large and enthusiastic meeting. Bro. A. H. Groves, as chairman, with a few appropriate remarks, introduced Mr. Dransfield, the first speaker, who is blest with a rich stock of racy, humorous anecdotes, coupled with hearty earnestness. In referring to himself, he said, after twenty years' "fuddling" he was an old man, but with twenty years' abstinence he had become young again. None who saw his energy and listened to his eloquence could doubt it. Mr. Stevenson, who took up the subject of the evening—"The British Government and the Revenue from Intoxicating Liquor"—treated it with great power of reasoning. By illustrating from prosecutions under the "Public Health" and other Acts, he proved the right of Parliament to interfere with and stop the traffic if it was proved injurious to the public good. The chairman then asked the audience to award the two gentlemen a hearty vote of thanks, which was heartily responded to. Mr. Stevenson, in replying, expressed the hope that the time was not far distant when they would again address a Strathaven audience. The benediction having been pronounced, the meeting dispersed, all highly pleased with the evening's enjoyment.—Hamilton Advertiser.

HAWICK.—INTERESTING SOCIAL MEETING.—The temperance hotel and restaurant, lately conducted by Mr. Rankin, has found a new "host" in Mr. James Patterson, who has for many years been connected with the temperance movement, and he is determined to carry on the business to which he has succeeded on strictly total abstinence principles. The premises having been thoroughly renovated and re-opened, representatives from most of the temperance associations in the town, and other friends, including the Rev. John Thomson, met in the hotel on Thursday night to encourage Mr. Patterson in his work, and spend a social evening together. After a plentiful supply of tea and cake, Mr. R. Murray, W.L.D., Scottish Border Beacon Lodge, No. 164, I.O.G.T., occupied the chair, and in the course of a few genial remarks, spoke of the difficulties which had to be determinedly faced in successfully carrying on a temperance establishment. Rev. Mr. Thomson said there was much need of such a house in the town, and he had no doubt that if it was conducted in a right spirit, and in such a way as to set temperance principles in their brightest light, it would be a thorough success. In concluding, he observed that nothing pleased a traveller better than to get a smile of welcome from the landlord. Mr. W. Simpson also encouraged Mr. Patterson to set a stout heart to his work. Mr. Cameron and Mr. C. Haig made a few remarks, and Mr. Patterson, in briefly acknowledging the good wishes of those present, said he was determined to do his part in making his house a home for those "from home." Songs and recitations were given by Messrs. Scott Smith, Allan, and Inglis, and the evening passed very pleasantly, additional vivacity being added to the proceedings by the presence of a number of ladies.

THE NEW ZEALAND CHAMPION SHOT FOR 1880.—The Faranaki Herald gives an account of a complimentary banquet given, on March 15, to Sergeant N. Okey, the winner of the champion belt for rifle-shooting. In responding to the toast of his health, Sergeant Okey said:—"Perhaps it would not be out of place if I were to say a few words as to what should tend to make a man a good shot. In the first place, he must be steady. There is no use in him taking what is now in these decanters before us. I am one who can say that I never drank a glass of liquor in my life, and I consider that it is owing in a great measure to that fact that I am the winner of the belt. There is another thing that tends to make a man nervous, and that is smoking. If a man tries to win the belt he must not take anything that will make him nervous. He must be temperate in eating and in everything else. I think Dr. O'Carroll will be able to explain that to you better than I can."—Temperance Record.

GLASGOW.—THE GOOD TEMPLARS' HARMONIC ASSOCIATION.—This Society, which is now one of the most important and active in the city, has found it necessary to remove to premises which will suit their largely increased membership and business. Those premises, situated in Watson Street, were opened on Wednesday evening, the 23rd ult., with a soiree, which was a great success. Mr. Walter Freer, the president in opening the proceedings, made one of those earnest, shrewd, common-sense speeches which indicate his sterling qualities of character. His statistics of the growth of the Association, of the contrast of the "plant" held now as compared with what was held a few years ago; of the extra thousands of cups, of the hundreds of yards of table-cloth, of the high sums paid to their artistes for music, and to their bakers and grocers for bread and tea—I hope the artistes won't object to being associated with the bakers—of the fact also that while at the beginning two men were sufficient to take the tickets, hand round the bread and pour out the tea, it now requires forty men to do so every Saturday night. Besides the speech of the Chairman, Bailie Torrens, Messrs. W. Turnbull and Alex. Macdougall addressed the meeting in the intervals of some nicely-sung songs by members and others. The Bailie was in rare form, and in a short address ran up the gamut of his various styles. He was humorous, argumentative, pawky, eloquent, persuasive, forcible, and the meeting did not miss a single point. Mr. Turnbull was both interesting and amusing, and his speech was quite a novelty as to form. Mr. Macdougall's principal idea was the necessity for recognising the value of the labours of all the sections of the temperance party, and he strongly deprecated any action which would cripple or damage any organisation, even when one might be strongly opposed to it. The earnest manner in which Mr. Macdougall enforced this idea was not without its effect on the audience. We can only hope that Mr. Freer and his friends will go on prospering. The work they are carrying on is an absolute necessity, and they have proved themselves the men to do it.

LEITH TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.—This society has lately been distinguishing itself by special efforts having for their object the creating and maintaining of a more enlightened interest in the temperance movement amongst the people. A series of fortnightly meetings was first held indoors, at which Mr. George Easton, of the Scottish Temperance League, and Mr. J. H. Waterston, of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, took a prominent part, assisted on each occasion by the pleasing accompaniment of music, rendered by several friends. The result of these meetings was so encouraging that the committee resolved upon undertaking a series in the open air. For these, they were fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Charles Bent, of Manchester, and Mr. J. H. Waterston. Large and enthusiastic audiences listened to earnest and eloquent addresses, on Giant's Brae, night after night, and an impetus has been given to the cause which, it is hoped, may be lasting, and which must greatly gratify all concerned.

UNITED KINGDOM TEMPERANCE AND GENERAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.—The thirty-ninth annual report of the directors of this institution, like the previous ones, exhibits great success. They completed 1979 proposals, involving a sum of £483,479. The present capital of the institution is £2,700,000. A bonus is to be declared this year to "with profits" assurers. The annual income was £355,761 4s. 4d. But what is of most interest to our readers is the temperance section as compared with the general section. There were expected claims in the temperance section to the number of 196, for £40,844; the actual claims were 164, for £28,690, or 32 claims and £12,154 less. In the general section the expected claims were 305, for £64,342; the actual claims were 326, for £74,950, being 21 claims and £10,608 more than was expected. This emphatically proves the superiority of temperance over not only intemperance but moderation, and loudly calls on all who taste alcoholic liquors to wholly and forever abstain from their use. If any of our readers have not already insured, by all means let them insure in this institution.

POSTAGE STAMPS.—The number of different kinds of postage stamps which have been hitherto issued all over the world is estimated, in round numbers, at 6000.

"THIS AWFUL AGE" is the title of an original moral comedy, newly issued, from the pen of Mary Grant, of Aberdeen, a frequent and esteemed contributor to our columns. We wish the venture every success.

ONE YEAR'S TETOTALISM.—The manager of a savings bank persuaded a workman to sign the pledge. The man kept his own council; but about a year after signing the pledge he came and deposited £15 10s. as the first fruits of his total abstinence.—Temperance Record.

ABSTAINERS IN PARLIAMENT.—Our good friend Henry Hibbert, U.K.A. agent in Bradford, sends us the name of A. Illingworth, Esq., M.P. for Bradford, as an abstainer of two or three years standing, not included in our list in last issue. We shall only be too happy to make further additions.

HE KNEW BETTER.—"I wish I could join the Band of Hope," said a little boy of six years old, who stood shivering in the doorway of a gin-shop by his mother's side. "You are not old enough," replied his mother; "you can't understand it." "I guess I'm old enough to know better than to drink gin," was the reply.—Temperance Record.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE QUESTION.—We lately quoted a speech from Lord Derby to the effect that a working man consuming 3 lbs. of sugar, 6 oz. of tea, 2 oz. of cocoa, 2 oz. of coffee per week, would pay only 2½d. to the revenue. He went on to say:—"If I had to talk to working men on financial matters I should tell them, 'Don't complain of being taxed; you are hardly taxed at all. It is you who tax yourselves, and if you make yourself sheep you must expect to be shorn!' I don't think they sufficiently understand how completely the publican and the tax-gatherer are identified. I don't think they quite realise that whenever they order sixpenny-worth of spirits they are handing over 5d. as a free gift to the Chancellor of the Exchequer."—Church of England Temperance Chronicle.

ORIGIN OF BIBLE SOCIETIES.—A young Welsh girl in 1802 was wont to walk a distance of seven miles weekly for an opportunity of reading the Bible. In one of these weekly journeys she was met by Mr. Carlz, of Bala, who, on learning the fact, went up to London to ask for Welsh Bibles for distribution. When in conversation with some friends on the subject, one John Hughes exclaimed—"Why not establish a society for sending Bibles to Wales? But, if to Wales, why not to England? If to England, why not to Europe? If to Europe, why not to the whole world?" This small mustard-seed has spread into the British and Foreign Bible Society, as it now is; and the simple fact of that little girl's going seven miles a week for a Bible has led to the wonderful distribution of 74,000,000 copies of the Word of God, in whole, or in part, throughout the length and breadth of the world.

BREWERS IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.—It appears by a Parliamentary return, just issued, that, in the year ending September 30, 1879, licenses were issued in the whole of the United Kingdom to 2,648 common brewers, not being victuallers or retail beer-sellers; to 99,013 victuallers, to 37,849 persons to sell beer to be drunk on the premises, and to 10,079 persons to sell beer to be drunk off the premises. It will thus be seen that the whole of the licenses issued amounted to no less than 149,589. Of this number 2,510 common brewers' licences, 69,840 victuallers, and the whole of the beer-sellers' licences were issued in England; 13,172 victuallers, of whom 13,081 were in England, 90 in Scotland, and only one in Ireland, brewed their own beer, as also did 6558 retail beer-sellers—all of whom were in England. The common brewers consumed, last year, 46,659,637 bushels of malt; the victuallers, 5,595,774 bushels; and the retail beer-sellers, 2,824,375 bushels. In the year ending December 31 last, 51,576,890 bushels of malt were made, and the amount of duty charged was £6,994,259, as compared with 58,752,933 bushels and £7,967,512 duty in the previous year—1878.—Public Opinion.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Constitutional Liberty: or Social, Civil, and Political Rights and Principles, in their more Popular Aspect, and as a Bond of Union. In three parts. Part first—Social Rights and Principles. Glasgow: Printed by Aird and Coghill. 1880. This work has been issued without a publisher or the author's name. In the absence of the former, the author may indicate that his book is intended for private circulation, or may be had from the printers. Without his own name, he may wish that the work should be judged simply on its own merits. At page 26 he remarks:—Sometimes the most popular writings have at the outset met the very same treatment as those rejected. In competition, the slightest thing will put a purchaser from buying. To mention that a certain dish had been offered in sacrifice, would, in early Christian days, put a person from eating it; in general there was no occasion for him asking or the others telling. . . . A purchaser might have a strong dislike to a person who wrote a book; but no occasion for him knowing this or anything not contained in the book itself. He is to look at it, and judge for himself as he would with any other article." This, no doubt, is true, with a modification. A book costs money, and to buy a book without a name is much the same as to receive a stranger without an introduction. He may turn out well, but the reverse is possible, and experience makes people cautious. Still, to judge a book simply on the ground of its merits is undoubtedly the proper method to adopt. The present volume is a very thoughtful production, and entitled to the calm consideration of kindred minds. The author, in his preface, intimates that the treatise will likely be followed by two other parts, but that the present book is complete in itself. The first three chapters are devoted to the consideration of "Law and Liberty;" the fourth treats of Rights beyond the Law; the sixth on Fundamental Rights; seventh and eighth on Remedies and Securities; ninth on Manners and Laws; tenth on Manners and Knowledge; and the eleventh on Manners and Forms. From this it will be seen that the author traverses a large number of deeply interesting questions affecting our civil and our social life. We might quote much, but must confine ourselves to a few sentences. Regarding work, the author says:—"A little work is not inconsistent with higher pursuits. Its advantages have often been shown. Incessant mental toil is bad. There might be more or less. Young men might work more than those older. A great deal of this at present depends on mere fashion and opinion, but if these were changed, there is nothing unsuitable in the mixture within certain limits; it is little else than healthy exercise mixed with mental pursuits. In war it implies no disgrace. All pursuits, indeed, have their rough work as well as smooth, and it is generally thought best to take all together, instead of creaming off the mere agreeables. The mixture, too, would prevent whole classes being degraded, made worse than they need be. No labour, probably, need degrade, unless it is incessant, hopeless—leaving no time or chance for anything better.

The mind can shed a light
On each worthy labour done,
As lowliest things are bright
In the radiance of the sun."

On amateurs the author remarks:—"If there is no deceit or imposition, the existence of amateurs or irregular parties outside all professions is no evil. It is a check and spur. Sometimes discoveries and improvements have been made by them while they have been opposed by the regular bodies. . . . Necessity quickens the intellect." Regarding Fundamental Rights, the writer observes:—"The foundation of a building is of the utmost importance; however good the superstructure, it will be liable to fall if the foundation is undermined. In like manner in social and civil matters, nothing will be secure so long as we neglect what is lowest and most obscure, and leave anything to be done there. Our institutions, &c., however excellent, will not prevent this. Thus, to secure the foundations of civil things, it has been found necessary that no one should be deprived of liberty without a distinct accusation and speedy trial." Whilst the author has given deep attention to the subject discussed, we have not observed any remarks upon one of the burning questions of the day—the relation of liberty to the suppression of the sale of intoxicating drinks. The advocates of these constantly affirm that what is termed "Local Option" is an interference with the liberty of the subject. The author may take up the question in one or other of the treatises to follow, but had he discussed the subject it would have been germane to the work under review. In treating of "Social Rights," there are few or any of more moment than the right of the people to be protected, or to protect themselves, from a trade that shortens the lives of the community, and is productive of pauperism, insanity, and crime.

The Pictorial New Testament. (London: E. Stock.)—This is a marvel. In a neat form, on good paper, and in clear type, we have a copy of the New Testament, containing, besides many illustrations, maps, notes, references, etc., short historical accounts of Jerusalem, the New Testament, the Tabernacle, and Mounts Sinai and Horeb, all for one penny. Surely the issue of such an exceedingly cheap and at the same time useful Testament, cannot fail to have a powerful influence upon the religious life of the common people. Home heathenism should go down before it, and a great impetus be given to every-day Christianity. It ought to be carried continually in the pocket, and consulted earnestly. We cannot too highly commend the enlightened enterprise which projected such an issue, and we earnestly hope its circulation may be counted by millions.

In Memoriam.

JOHN SMITH,

BORN DEC. 11, 1811. | DIED MAY 10, 1880.

Interred at the Necropolis, Glasgow, May 14, 1880.

HE was a gentle, thoughtful, kindly man,
Quiet in mood,—in purpose firm and strong.
Who knew him, loved, esteemed, and honoured him!
His word was as a sealed bond secure:—
A promise given, performance halted not,
But with prompt step and cheerful mien came forth,
The friend of all! the enemy of none!
His heart with milk of human kindness full,
O'erflowed responsive to the gentlest call
Of private suffering or of public need.
Nor class, nor creed, nor party zest restrained
His sympathetic, generous, manly soul.
THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE he loved and nobly helped,
As at the basis of the common weal.
His hand, his home, his heart were open wide
To aid and foster every onward course
Of patriotic aim and purpose pure.
He will be missed and mourned by loving hearts
That long have known and prized his honest worth;
Whilst those most near and dear to his true soul
Who fondly lingered by his dying couch,
And soothed him with the looks and words of love—
May they rich balm of consolation find
Applied by Mercy's gentle hand, with spells
Of precious memories,—and joyous hopes
Of brighter, purer, more enduring bliss,
Beyond the reach of earthly sorrow's shade;
In regions of unending, quenchless love!

TEMPERANCE IN RELATION TO THE GOSPEL.—III.

It has been said that no one defends drunkenness as a right and proper thing. Yet, although drunkenness be a sin, there is no harm in taking alcoholic drinks in "moderation." We reply, in the name of science, that if it be a sin to take it in large quantities, it is also a sin to take it in small quantities. There is only the question of degree. Alcohol, in the smallest quantity, still retains its affinity for the brain. If it be a brain poison in a gallon, it is also a brain poison in a tea-spoonful. The fact that one man can take six glasses and not be helplessly drunk, while another man is intoxicated with two glasses, does not prove it a non-intoxicant. It only proves the strength of the man's constitution to resist the action of the poison. Here is a problem worth looking at.

One man thought he could stand six glasses; he drank them and stood. Another thought he could stand two glasses; he drank them, and had to lie down. Which of the two men was the greatest sinner—the man who drank six glasses, or the man who drank two? They would have been both alike if they had both stood it, and our "moderation" advocates would have said that neither had sinned. Yet, because the man who drank the two glasses was mistaken, he is guilty of the sin of drunkenness. He is not found guilty because he commits a deliberate act—for if he had stood them, it would still have been virtue to drink six—but because he committed an error in judgment, notwithstanding that his judgment was formed from past experience. We think this is rather queer doctrine. The motive in the heart of the man who drank two glasses was as good as the motive in the heart of the man who drank six. The difference was a physiological one, over which the man who became guilty of the sin of drunkenness had no control. We hold, therefore, that if one sinned, both sinned; for God judges not the outward acts or results, but the heart itself. (Jer. xvii. 10.)

The mind of man is rendered impure, and the lower passions are excited by the use of alcohol. In short, the moment a man begins to take alcohol as a beverage, he starts on a downward journey, away from God, and truth, and virtue; he starts on a course from which return daily becomes more difficult; and in course of time he becomes, as it were, proof against the sound of the gospel. On the other hand, the man who is an abstainer from such injurious articles of drink or of food, and whose conduct, in the sight of his fellow-men, has been all that could reasonably have been expected of human nature—the man who is intelligent, benevolent, has a taste for good literature, and a proper regard for the feelings of others—in short, a person of culture, will more readily accept Christ (circumstances being otherwise favourable) than the man who is sunken in vice.

Man, as we said before, is always a responsible being; he must accept God's terms as a rational responsible being; he will only correctly understand his position when he is in health of body and mind. It may be that there are exceptional cases; yet in the domain of religion it is the same as in agriculture. The ground must be tilled and prepared for the seed. The weeds must be rooted up and destroyed, and the water drained off, and every preparation made that the ground may be susceptible to growth before the agriculturist sows, expecting a crop. Men do not always sow grain on a piece of land immediately it has been tilled for the first time. It is often allowed to lie for a few years before a crop be sown in it at all. Temperance, then, we say, is the preparer of the soil. God does not work miraculously where natural means are available. Men do not expect that a crop of corn will grow if the soil be not prepared to receive the seed. And why should sowers of the word of God expect a crop if the soil be unprepared? Has the church of Christ forgotten that He taught that seed sown by the wayside would be devoured by the fowls of the air?

Man's spiritual and physical natures are nearly related. Man is a trinity—body, soul, and spirit; he is "fearfully and wonderfully made." He must have health in all his parts before he can be sanctified. We hear Christians often sing—

"Still all my song shall be Nearer, my God, to Thee—Nearer to Thee."

Man, however, can only come near to God in proportion as he is pure. Alcohol renders both the body and mind impure, and hence it is one of the strongest barriers that can be placed between a man's soul and God. It is the great stone that is rolled against the mouth of the sepulchre, shutting man in from the light—shutting him into his chamber of death—in from the sweet sound of God's voice—in from the glorious light of the Son of Righteousness—in from the glorious and delectable music of heaven—in with the darkness of death—in with the maddening music of pandemonium—in with the angels of vice, whose fiery cars most surely run him to eternal destruction.

Temperance, full of pity, stands weeping, and crying, "Take away the stone!" The bright armies of heaven are all upon her side. Christ himself stands pleading with his professed children, and his, too, is the same request. He asks them to "Take away the stone" that he may call Lazarus forth.

Christ has told the labourers in his vineyard to "lay aside every weight," and yet few—how few!—have heard and obeyed. Fashionable Christianity is ready to lay aside those weights, the laying aside of which involve no sacrifice. It is somewhat different when any great sacrifice is required. We tremble for such a Christianity as this. If the religion of Christ means anything, it means SACRI-FICE—noble self-sacrifice—noble self-denial for the good of others. It was founded on that great and ever-memorable sacrifice on Calvary—such a sacrifice as never was before, and never shall be made again. Christ himself says, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me" (Matt. xvi. 24). It is the duty of professing Christians to live so that every one may be perfectly safe in following their example, and that they may not in any way put a stumblingblock in the way of others. The principle regarding meat and drink was well defined by the noble Paul, that model teacher of Christian doctrine,—“It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.” (Rom. xiv. 21.) “If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest it make my brother to offend. (1 Cor. viii. 13.) This is the true spirit of a real, living, healthy Christianity. Every soul is precious in the sight of God; and those who have taken up their cross to follow in the footsteps of him who loved them and gave himself for them, are willing and ready to make any sacrifice for his cause—yea, they are willing to be “all things unto all men” if they might, “by any means, save some.” How different from the popular Christianity of this nineteenth century! Thank God, the day is fast approaching when the self-styled Christianity that cannot give up a paltry glass of wine or beer—liquid poison!—that the gospel of Christ may have free course, and the glory of God, and the eternal weal of mankind be promoted, will have to hide its face for shame, and give place to a better and truer type of Christianity that will! This state of things cannot long continue. We rejoice to observe that even now in this present time God’s own people are bestirring themselves, and inquiring what is their duty in regard to this burning question of temperance reform.

To clear-sighted individuals, who have been holding life-long warfare with intemperance, the wonder is—in the face of the emphatic testimony that has everywhere been given—that these things have not transpired sooner. Christian workers of every degree, who have sought to evangelise the masses at home, have testified that strong drink has ever been the great obstacle in their way. And the most crushing evidence against our drinking habits has come over the seas from our foreign mission fields. Our missionaries no sooner land on a foreign shore than we have a quantity of intoxicating liquor sent after them to nullify their work. W. W. Smith, of Owen Sound, Upper Canada, gives the following sad testimony:—“Indians—men that I love and value as brethren—have told me, with low and melancholy voices, of the devastation of this thing. A friend, a few weeks ago, told me of an effort he once made to induce a chief of a tribe of the Mohawk nation to allow a friend of his, a missionary, to come and dwell among them. ‘What you preach—Preach Christ!’ ‘Yes.’ ‘Don’t want Christ. No Christ!’ My friend persevered. At length the chief got warm, and, towering to his full height, with a volcanic fire in his eye, broke out—“Once we were powerful; we were a great nation; our young men were many; our lodges were full of children; our enemies feared us; but Christ came, and brought the fire-water! Now we are very poor; our hunting grounds are deserted; our council fires are gone out; we don’t want Christ! Go!” It is to our shame as a nation that the same kind of testimony has been given against us over and over again. We send out along with the gospel of love and life this demon of strife and death. The two are quite antagonistic to each other. Oil and water will be reconciled sooner than fire-water and the gospel of Christ. Little good can come of all our missionary effort if this be the picture it presents to those for whose sakes we make yearly sacrifice. Well might the heathen abroad say to worse than heathen Britain, “Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother’s eye.” Rather stinging this would be to our British pride, and yet—we blush to think of it—indisputably just. How unlike our boasted wisdom. How unlike our vaunted learning—

How unworthy England’s fair fame;
Less worthy of shrewd Scotland’s name.

How unbusiness-like! It is like as if we sent two opposing forces into the field, that we might be amused by the contest.

Shall this state of things continue? Nay! Even now the clouds are breaking. Fair Temperance is being questioned, “Who art thou?” Her answer is, in the voice of John the Baptist, “I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, ‘Prepare ye the way of the Lord.’” The popular mind and eye are turning towards her as she preaches, loud and ever louder, her gospel of repentance. Many are coming from the east and from the west, and are sitting down in her councils. The wise and good and great are becoming her servants, and are bearing testimony to her greatness. One by one the obstacles are being removed. Nor will she cease her crying, but cry on, until at last—and may God hasten that day!—in the noontide glory of her triumph, when all eyes shall be affectionately turned towards her, her last words to her followers will be those surpassingly grand, and ever-memorable words of John the Baptist, “BEHOLD THE LAMB OF GOD, WHO TAKETH AWAY THE SIN OF THE WORLD.” Then shall Truth and Temperance be wedded together, and for ever reign as ONE. Then swiftly shall come that happy—oh, thrice happy!—day, when every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord.

WOMAN—THE WIFE.

In this our concluding paper we affirm, with all the emphasis of language, that we know of no more solemn earthly obligation than that involved in marriage. Marriage is the very fountain of society, on which depends the most momentous issues of life, from which flows the purest and most abiding pleasures, or streams of the most agonizing misery. They who lightly or insincerely assume its obligations are in danger of laying up for themselves the anguish of the undying worm. Those who estimate its real worth generally secure the plenitude of earthly happiness. People with reckless hardihood do marry regardless of whether or not they possess that divine feeling which really constitutes marriage. They trust that with the new existence will come sooner or later the needful love and affection which stamps it as divine. They covet position, wealth, marriage itself, and for these barter themselves foolishly away. They profess to seek a husband or a wife, but they really aim at the circumstances in which he or she exists. They find too often when it is too late that they have their reward, and that as they never sought love as the prime essential of that union into which they have entered, so love stands aloof from them and leaves them, even under the most favourable conditions, to a cold and heartless existence. The victim of such a heartless fraud, if a woman, cannot dismiss an aversion for the husband that has betrayed her, and the husband, the guilty perpetrator of such treachery, although invested with the wealth and trappings on account of which he told a lie “before God and these witnesses,” feels a load on his heart which increases with the progress of the suns. Reverse the case, and the Nemesis is no less terrible in its severity. Although eating, drinking, talking, and living with each other day by day, such a married pair are far as heaven from earth apart. It may startle but it will not surprise their friends, intimate with all the painful circumstances, that one or other, defying the conventionalism of society and the binding obligation of the altar, had sought in forbidden sources, or in other lands, relief from a companionship which, because based on deceit, had become intolerable.

The only basis of a real marriage is genuine love and genuine worth; and the woman whose education and training as girl and maiden we have sketched will see that she has both, as well on her own part as on his that desires her hand. She is of genuine worth. With a good sound constitution, feelings with no acridities in their flow, a will inclined at all times to the right, and an intellect that is ever exercising itself on the golden stores of knowledge, she is fitted to venture upon the untried existence of married life with no mean chances of success. Above all, she fears God. As she stands before His minister, giving herself unreservedly into the keeping of her husband, one cannot imagine that she can do so without having first weighed the supreme importance of the step. Some of her profoundest thinking has been given to it, but being at last satisfied that her suitor is worthy of her hand, and that she can make him happy, she bestows her hand, with her heart in it, upon him, resolved, in joy or sorrow, in foul or fair, to be, under the divine grace, in every way worthy of his choice.

The words "Love, honour, and obey," which are so distasteful to ill-regulated minds among us, have no chill in them so far as she is concerned. She has weighed them well, and traced them to their farthest-reaching consequence. She loved, and she means to love still. While her husband exhibits those sterling qualities that first gained the deepest homage of her heart she cannot but love. That delightful tenderness and sympathy which has led her heart a willing captive has improved and exalted every amiable quality of her nature, and reposes now upon her unwavering and undecaying affection. Of all the other sex she has looked upon, he, by the very excellence of his character, comes the nearer to her ideal, and stands the highest in her regard; and she has felt inexpressible pleasure in the anticipation that the happiness will be hers of being united to him by the dearest of earthly ties. Such a wife needs no incentive to love. She cannot but love, and where such love is, marriage has no fetters. To be apart when so well fitted for each other would be to be plunged into the depths of anguish and despair.

Honour, like love, implies no inferiority. As "Love, like death, levels all ranks, laying the shepherd's crook beside the sceptre," so honour is equally widely bestowed. Honour peereth in the meanest habit. It is begotten by excellence of character and true nobility of nature, and it is bestowed upon those who manifest qualities worthy of esteem. The woman that we hold up as the true wifely ideal for this degenerate age gives to her heart's lord that honour which is due to his genuine worth. To accept his hand is paying him honour; to exhibit in her home, her person, her surroundings, the qualities that may be fairly expected of her, is to do honour to her husband, to his estimation of her worth, his discrimination of her character. To be loyal to him under all the vicissitudes of human life, to suffer none but him to share in the smallest degree in her wifely affection, to beget in the minds of her children the same exalted sentiments towards him which she entertains is to do him honour. To ever look up to him as her lover, her protector, her unfailing sympathiser, and constant friend is to confer upon him an honour which dwarfs all the other honours that fall to the lot of mankind. The husband of such a woman can safely repose upon her confidence—can wholly rely on her love. His heart does safely trust in her.

Obedience—that much-abused, because so much misrepresented word—is almost divorced from the idea for which at one time it stood—the idea of holy service. Happily its meaning as regards God is still acknowledged. In this sense surely it should be construed in the marriage service, for there is no fear in love. If the Master had to tell the twelve, "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister," surely we should acknowledge the dignity of the service implied in that obedience which has received the stamp of divinity itself. It is in this sense that our true woman looks upon her duty to obey. She is not a slave. She is a wife—a free woman, not bound to render merely perfunctory homage, but privileged to be the loving and faithful helpmeet of her husband. Her sense of what is implied in her altar promise to obey has been finely rendered by a master of the English language:—"That principle to which polity owes its stability, life its happiness, faith its expediency, and creation its continuance, is obedience." "Obedience is indeed founded on a kind of freedom, else it would become subjection, but that freedom is only granted that obedience may be more perfect." In the liturgy of the English Church, obedience is that service which is perfect freedom. The duties that a true wife owes to her husband will be cheerfully discharged, with heaped measure running over. The perfect accord which results from the union of such a man and wife ensures the mutual discharge of every obligation; and no true woman with a girlhood or maidenhood such as we have delineated will for a single moment intermit the discharge of duties so congenial to herself, or so well-pleasing to her heavenly Father.

Involved in the marriage relation are many, very many and varied services—of housekeeper, cook, nurse, and mother—but to our ideal woman these present no difficulty. From garret to basement her house is under her control, and her servants conscious of her intelligence and her powers of management, become contented portions of that admirable organization which she has imposed upon all her domestic affairs. Her chief excellence as a nurse shines in the preventive measures against disease which she has established. As a mother, she is as fortunate as she is as a wife. Her husband delights in her, and her children rise up to call her blessed. She deserves the most abundant felicity which can be a true woman's lot. Let us leave her to the ceaseless enjoyment of it. That there are such women is proved by the idea we have placed before our readers. Let girl, maiden, and wife who reads these papers, and has vividly realized the features of our sketch, strive to emulate like labours, secure like training, similarly improve their minds, and when the hour and the man arrives, like her they can enter upon that state of happiness for which they have lived and laboured, with confident anticipations of the rich harvest of enjoyment such a life is so well fitted to yield.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

Nothing in the annals of quackery can be more empirical than the mode in which fermented and distilled liquors are directed or permitted to be taken by a large proportion of medical practitioners.—Dr. Carpenter, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S.

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

WERE one to take a walk through the Bethnal Green Museum, London, making a careful inspection the while of the contents of the many cases there, he would probably light upon one which, whether he is a drinker or abstainer, would have a great claim to his attention. It contains samples of those articles with which immoral publicans adulterate their wares. For the adulteration of beers he would find burnt sugar, treacle and burnt sugar, common salt, green vitriol, grains of paradise, cocculus indicus, liquorice, logwood, elderberry juice, spirits and water (grog), &c.; for wines, he would find solution of fuchseine, partially burnt sugar, raw grain spirits, &c.; for gin he would find essence of bitter almonds, essence of capsicum, &c.; for whisky, burnt sugar, whisky improver, sulphuric acid, &c. There is no mention of water, because we can hardly give in to having water, "honest water," charged with adulteration. Still, when water, which costs nothing, and these adulterants are used to cheapen the liquors to the publican and increase his shameful gains, we must admit that the water in such a case is in very bad company, though doing very good work, and that it must just for the time and under the circumstances bear an opprobrious name. The poor deluded, deceived drinker looks upon a vile concoction of alcohol and its adulterants as a good creature of God, eagerly tastes and then drains the covert death draught, exclaiming with more or less of bitterness against those that with clearer discernment endeavour to undeceive him, and persuade him from an indulgence which always injures and often kills. What's in a name? Cocculus indicus, or sulphuric acid, under the name of beer and whisky, secure an easy entrance to the human frame, which would be emphatically denied them if they were first compelled to send up their own names.

Not long ago a suicide was drawn out of the Seine. Like many others of that unfortunate class, he was careful enough to relieve the minds of the community regarding the reason for his abrupt and untimely departure to the society of the future. He was a grocer. Failing, notwithstanding exhaustive research, to find any instance of a grocer attaining a position in the higher worlds of Art, Science, or Politics, rather than live a grocer despised and obscure, he "jumped the life to come." If this despairing vendor of tallow, hominy, and bathbrick had but possessed his soul in patience and come over from France to Britain, he would have found some grocers to his mind—not all. There are grocers and grocers: those that sell tea, sugar, rice, and raisins, whom we all honour; and those that deal in brandy, beer, and whisky blends, wicked men whom all good people should unite to overthrow. Licensed grocers are simply publicans who angle for women's liquor custom with baits of tea and other necessaries, but who soon tempt them to buy liquor on their own account, to the ruin of many a home and of many women and children. There is an outcry on the part of the Aberdeen grocery publican trade because the new chief constable there is enforcing the law as to the shutting up of publican back doors. Well, if grocers in Aberdeen will continue to be so wicked as to sell drink, they cannot complain if the law about drink-selling disarranges their legitimate trade. Let them stick to dealing in tea and treacle, and no police-officer will trouble himself about either their back or their front doors. The stork in the fable, pointing to its feathers, said it had no affinity with the ravaging crows with whom it was found in company, but it paid the penalty of its bad association. Let the grocer-publicans beware. They are under the stigma of the State. May the liquor portion of their business soon be under its emphatic prohibition.

The Westmoreland Gazette has furnished teetotalers with "a jaw-breaker," in the shape of a nut which the editor implies cannot be broken, except at a sad cost (figuratively) of the teetotal maxillary. This hard nut is the fact that a publican in Keswick district is 76 years of age, has been 46 years in the trade, was never before the police for the contravention of his license, has drunk say 10 pints beer daily, amounting to 20,976 gallons, or nearly 200 cart-loads of liquor, which at 2s. per gallon is equal to £2097 12s. The duty on this quantity is £174 18s. Yet, exclaims the Gazette triumphantly, the man lives and is prepared to continue drinking. Now, there is the nut. Is that the nut? where are my nut-crackers? It is all very well to speak of this publican, but let us know where all his boon companions are. Are they living, too, after drinking say only half the quantity of which he boasts? If not, why not? The express contention is that he lives in spite of his drinking, which is not a high estimate to take of the liquor, that it has not yet killed its victim! Well, I am bound to say that it involves harder work on the part of alcohol to kill a publican, living where there is all the conditions of long life, than it would be to kill people residing in the poorer districts of our large cities. Yet our publican friend should not shout yet. When he is 100 years old—not a very singularly rare age now—and a toper all the time, we will be the better able to compare him with some people who have reached that advanced age without liquors, without either a sore head or a sick heart, and with an unclouded mind. When he stands that comparison successfully, why, we will reconsider the subject. Meantime, his boast is like an air-cushion, full of wind, full of wind.

There is another crack to be given to this dreadful nut. The solemn fact is before us that there are men who have tiddled for nearly fifty years at a cost of more than two thousand pounds; men who, like the last of the classes of readers mentioned by Coleridge, are like sponges. These took the contents of books and gave them out again, only a little dirtier. These do the same by the drink. This publican is like a sandbank with tremendous powers of absorption, but none of assimilation. Yet he has consumed, on an average, two cart-loads of liquors, amounting to £2097 12s., and is daily wondering that he is still alive. Alas! there are millions among us emulating his beastly example, and, though possessing abilities that would have brought them, if sober, to the front rank of the community, are doomed to remain the hewers of wood and drawers of water to those who have not half their talents, with no brighter prospects before them than a lean manhood or an alms-receiving old age; and at the end of all the suicide's fate or a pauper's grave.

In the Times of September, 1860, the late George Stephenson, the great railway engineer, has a letter, in which, contrasting the past and present state of the Stockton and Darlington Railway as regards having alcoholic liquors on sale at the various stations, he says:—"Although in a pecuniary point of view it appeared a sacrifice, the duty to abolish the traffic became so apparent, that the directors could no longer hesitate to make the change. It is now some years since this was done, and I am happy to say that we have never yet had cause to regret it. There is not now a station on this the oldest line in the kingdom where intoxicating drinks are sold, and I hope that this state of things will ever continue. I am not aware that any other railway company has adopted this plan, but am satisfied that if all railway companies were to do away with the sale of drink at their stations, they would be best consulting the interests of the shareholders and the welfare of the travelling public." As Count Fosco would say, there are three remarks to be made regarding this letter written twenty years ago. First remark, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company to this day has never swerved from the resolution which George Stephenson commends. Second remark, other railway companies have not banished drink, but have lost far more than their profits on its sale, from accidents taking place through drunken stupidity or carelessness. Third remark, if a railway company gives up drink and has never had cause to regret, I want to know if it is unreasonable on the part of abstainers to believe that drinkers who give up drinking will never have cause to regret their doing so. If not unreasonable, then, drinkers, give up drinking, and unite on a national resolution, banishing public houses from our streets as effectually as refreshment rooms have been banished from the stations of the Stockton and Darlington Railway. The nation, like the railway, will never regret taking this course of action.

EARLY PROHIBITIONISTS.

On page 30 of the "Birthdays of the Temperance and Total Abstinence Movements," there is the following remark—referring back to 1836—when the Tradeston Total Abstinence Society removed its place of meeting to the city, and became the Glasgow Abstinence Society—"A new element was introduced, and the abstainers became divided into two parties." From that day to this, these two parties have existed—the one seeking the speedy and complete overthrow of the whole liquor traffic; while the other party has formulated schemes of restriction for the regulation of the traffic. These two parties, though acting harmoniously and unitedly on the general temperance movement, at intervals their distinctive characteristics became manifest—the prohibitionists always stepping to the front, taking up a position more in advance. The failure of the potato crop in 1846 made the two following years memorable for human suffering. By the failure of the potato crop, above 3,000,000 of the labouring population in Ireland, and over 300,000 of the same class in the highlands and islands of Scotland, were deprived of the food on which they mainly depended for the support of life. In the House of Commons it was stated that 5,000 adults and 10,000 children had perished in Ireland through sheer starvation. There was great suffering all over the land. Bread stuffs were at famine price; famine and pestilence thinned many families in the lowlands of Scotland. Public attention was aroused; benevolence did its best in order that the torrent of destruction might be stemmed. There were loud calls to open the ports for the free admission of grain, so that the supplies might be increased and the famine mitigated. The advance brigade of the temperance army stepped to the front, and demanded the CLOSING OF THE DISTILLERIES. Large meetings were held everywhere; public attention was directed to the wanton destruction of human food in the production of intoxicating liquors. Petitions, largely signed, were forwarded to the House of Commons, praying the House to "immediately arrest the fearful waste by stopping the manufacture of intoxicating drinks." Able articles appeared in newspapers and periodicals, recommending the stopping of the distilleries as the best and speediest means of averting the famine and saving the people. Public sentiment was quickened, the heart of the nation was touched, and it rose up against the traffic, and the cry "No license" ran over the country.

A periodical entitled "The British League" was started in January, 1847. In its first article it said, "This is our rallying cry for a movement in the Legislature—NO LICENSE. We care not what steps may be taken to lessen—to modify—to make respectable—to limit to six days of the week, or to certain hours in those days—the abominable traffic in ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS. Their nature and effects are uniform—deadlier than the sirocco of the desert or the malaria of the Pontine marshes. It is not a periodical influence, returning at distant intervals, but it is a pestilence, breathing always—diffusing the poison when men sleep and when they wake—by day and by night—in seed-time and in harvest. The destroyer seeks its victim alike in every hogshead and in every glass. He exempts no man from danger that uses it, and is always sure of prostrating the most vigorous—of clouding the most splendid intellect—benumbing the most delicate feelings—of palsying the most eloquent tongue—of teaching those on whose lips listening senators hang to babble and mutter with the drunkard—and of entombing the most brilliant hopes of youth, wherever man can be induced to drink. We are resolved not to expend our energies on anything short of the immediate and total repeal of that license by which men and women are consigned to ignominious graves." Noble words these with which to welcome in the year of 1847. It was a gleam of light radiating the gloom that shrouded the land.

Following this, the "Scottish Association for the Suppression of Drunkenness" entered upon a vigorous crusade against the Sabbath traffic. By the powerful advocacy of Dr. Guthrie, Edinburgh, and many others, the country was soon aroused. The result was that early in 1851 Lord Kinnaird's Bill—better known as Forbes M'Kenzie's Bill—was brought before the public, and became law in 1853.

At the annual meeting of the League, 8th July, 1850, Mr. Wm. Robertson of Barrhead submitted a series of resolutions, declaring the traffic in intoxicating liquors to be illegitimate. The preamble to these resolutions was as follows:—"That we will aid, to the extent of our ability, the local magistrate and the Imperial Parliament in suppressing the licensing system, and establishing the criminal character of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; and we do hereby sympathise with all, in every place, who labour, by legal enactment, to put an end to them."

These resolutions were lost. The disappointment on the part of those labouring for legal enactments was deep and lasting, and one of the most stirring episodes in the history of the temperance movement followed. But the defeated were neither disheartened in their work nor diverted from their object. The agitation went on, and took form as a separate and decided movement for the entire suppression of the whole traffic.

In February, 1853, a few friends met in the back-shop of James Morton, baker, Sauchiehall Street, and formed an association for the "legal suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors." A series of public meetings were held under its auspices, and 20,000 copies of the amended Maine Law, passed by the State of Maine, 1851, were circulated as a four-paged tract. Many other tracts were specially written for the association, and widely circulated.

On the 3rd June a public meeting was held in the Merchants' Hall, to discuss the question, "Ought the Legislature to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors?" Mr. James Morton presided. Rev. Dr. Bates and the Rev. Robert Gault spoke in favour of legislation. Messrs. George Roy and Thomas Brown spoke in opposition. The meeting broke up in confusion. Other meetings were held, and great good was accomplished.

On the formation of the United Kingdom Alliance, 1st June, 1853, a correspondence took place, and the Glasgow Association became the first auxiliary of that honourable and noble institution. The inaugural meeting of the Glasgow Association, in the character of an auxiliary of that Alliance, was held in the City Hall on the 16th November, 1853. The meeting, which was large and enthusiastic, was addressed by a deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Burns, London, John Everett, Esq., and Samuel Bowley, Esq.

The movement went on gathering strength and influence. At this time (1854) each elector had to apply to be put on the roll. Considerable trouble was necessary to obtain a vote, and a fee of 5s. had to be paid. The Liberal and Conservative parties had agents engaged to look after all claims on their side, and the strength of parties was annually tabulated. There was also an agent for the Independents, who stood aloof from both parties. This year ('54) there was a new party formed. The association engaged an agent for the Maine Law party. He was most assiduous in his labours. In his report he says, "My calculation is that friends to the cause of about 400 have been added to the roll. 320 opponents struck off, and 130 persons prevented getting double enrolments, to enable them to vote in different wards—or a gain in all of 800 votes." A great many abstainers got themselves enrolled quietly as independent voters. The great contest lay between the publicans and the Maine Law men.

In August of 1854 the following petition, with over 18,000 names, was forwarded to both Houses of Parliament, and was presented in the House of Lords by the Duke of Argyll, and in the Commons by John M'Gregor, M.P. for the city:—

"To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled,

"The Humble Petition of the Subscribing Male Inhabitants of the City of Glasgow, in Scotland, above 14 years of age,

"Sheweth,

"1. That the Petitioners believe that at least eighty per cent. of all crime committed in Great Britain originates, directly or indirectly, in drunkenness. They are confirmed in this belief by the concurring evidence of the most eminent judges in the criminal courts, and others having the best opportunities of ascertaining pertinent facts connected with, and forming correct opinions on, the subject. They could cite numerous such testimonies, but will confine themselves to the latest, viz., that of Justice Coleridge, who (in passing sentence on the 14th June, 1854, in the case of Charles Wood, convicted of homicide, before a jury in the central criminal court, London,) deliberately and emphatically stated that 'Drunkenness was the disgrace of our country, and the cause of at least three-fourths of the crime investigated in criminal courts.'

"2. That at least two-thirds of the cases of insanity sent to Lunatic Asylums can be traced to the same fruitful source of evil, as is evidenced by the governors and physicians of these establishments.

"3. That the pauperism which is so wide-spread, and so loudly complained of everywhere, has also, as is notorious, had its origin almost wholly in the unnecessary use of intoxicating liquors.

"4. That crime, insanity, and poverty have been always found in proportion to drunkenness, and drunkenness has invariably prevailed in proportion to the facilities afforded for alcoholic drinking.

"5. That while drunkenness has thus been the cause of such evils, it is impossible to point to any necessity for, or benefit derivable from, drinking alcoholic liquors as beverages. A large body of talented and influential physicians and surgeons have attested that these liquors are never necessary as beverages, but, on the contrary, injurious alike to corporeal and mental powers. It is alleged that a revenue is derived from relative taxes for governmental purposes. Assuming this to be true, it is a sufficient answer to say, that it is wrong to do evil that good may come. But that allegation is erroneous in point of fact, for independent of the enormous expense of collection—the unjustifiable destruction of almost incalculable quantities of the best food for man—the impossibility of poor people spending their cash both in drink and at the same time in other tax-paying commodities—that revenue is far more than lost to the country by the maintenance of jails, penitentiaries, convict settlements, lunatic asylums, poor-houses, courts of justice, legal functionaries and the like—all necessary, almost entirely, from drunkenness.

"6. That drunkenness is not only a great cause of crime, insanity, sickness, and death, misery and wretchedness to individuals, families, and whole communities, but it is also the greatest barrier to the spread of the gospel at home and abroad.

"7. That the Licensing System, and the Statute commonly called 'Forbes Mackenzie's Act,' prove that the sale of intoxicating liquors and the sellers thereof require to be restrained by law, and the doing so to a limited extent, by the provisions of the Act last referred to, have already been productive of great good.

"8. That the total prohibition of the importation and manufacture for sale, and the sale of all intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal and mechanical purposes, have been attended with most beneficial effects in several of the States of America; and it is believed that from a similar enactment like good results would follow in Great Britain.

"May it therefore please your Honourable House to pass a Law prohibiting the Manufacture, Importation, and Sale of all Alcoholic Liquors, except for use in Religious Ordinances, and for Artistic, Manufacturing, and Medicinal purposes, and that under the strictest Regulations: And your Petitioners will ever pray."

This petition was followed by a memorial to the Queen, from the females of Glasgow. But I have exceeded my limits.—Yours truly,

AN OLD ABSTAINER.

CHAPTER I.

It was on one of those sunny days of October which are so bright and beautiful as to remind travellers of an Indian summer. The air was balmy, the woods all aglow with warm and delicate autumn tints of brown and yellow; the fields in green and russet shone resplendent in the sun's rays. He, sinking slowly to the western wave, bathed all in lovely splendour—the clouds gave variety and motion to the sky, the water mirrored their beautiful forms as it rolled on to the sea, shimmering here, moving in deep shadow there, now rolling on silently, and again chattering on its stony ways. The cattle were slowly leaving their pasture, and lowing as they wended their way. All was as bright as midsummer; and no wonder. Where there is the musical flow of water, the melody of birds, the fragrant air, and the glory of the shining sun, there is all the charms that make nature to be so much admired—all the elements of natural enjoyment.

On this beauteous day, and on one of the great coach roads that, although less frequently traversed, are still largely used, a man, footsore and weary, was dragging his slow length along. He did not look at all respectable, for his dress in which he travelled was the same as that in which he worked when he did work, which might be very seldom. He never once looked up, still less around him. The sunny sky, the singing birds, the murmuring river, the waving foliage, and even the cheerful green grass, called forth no answering emotion from him. His thoughts were either far away or centred all on self. He might apparently at that moment have been in the solitudes of Glencoe, or in the still sterner solitude of some great city, as among such lovely scenes of nature. He plodded on, evidently bent on getting to some shelter before the evening wrapped the scene in gloom, but it required a strong will to master the feeling of fatigue which possessed him, and he was so absorbed in this task that nature had neither charms nor influence with him.

He was not old in years; he looked upwards of thirty, but he ought not to have been so much. Vice had thus early left her sad seal on his features: the eye was dull, the mouth was marked by indecision, the face with "the downward look," and the nose gleamed with a light that never was on sea or land but was derived from potatoes bottle deep. His hair was brown and curly, and his head finely formed. His brow had fallen, and his chin rested on his breast. His clothes were those of a working mechanic, and served him for all weathers, and for morning, evening, and, we fear, often for night-dress costume as well. His shoes were dirty and hard, rendering his walk laborious and painful. He was, there was no doubt, in the hard thorny path of transgressors, and no doubt was wishing himself far enough away.

Happening to arrive at a milestone, he looked at it earnestly, gave a sigh, and sat down on the bank beside it to rest. Taking off his cap, he fanned his brow, waved his cap to throw off the clammy air that had accumulated inside of it, and then, drawing out his pipe, prepared to charge it for a smoke. This was a very slow process. He was in no great hurry however. He slowly cut off the requisite supply of tobacco, minced it to the needful degree, filled his pipe, and then put on the top all the half-consumed piece which he had taken out of his pipe. Kindling a match by rubbing it briskly against the rough exterior of his clothing, he applied it to the tobacco, and was apparently on the verge of enjoyment, when screams reached his ear. Mechanically he stopped and listened—they were genuine. He heard the tramp of horses, the dash of either cart or carriage wheels, and almost in an instant there came in sight an open carriage, with a woman clinging and screaming all her might. Our traveller saw the situation at a glance, threw away his pipe, and ran forward. But what could he do? No time, however, was to be lost if he was to do any good. Without a moment's hesitation, he threw off his jacket, and, as the near horse rushed past, cleverly threw it over his head. The effect was almost magical: the steed slowly stopped, and, in doing so, brought the other to a stand. Our hero seized the reins, and then drawing the horses to the wayside, jumped up to hand them to the fair occupant. But she had fainted. Here was a situation for one like him to find himself into. Tying the reins to a tree, he ran for water, and soon returned with the lady's hatful. Sprinkling her face and allowing her hands to rest in the water for a moment or two, he soon brought her round, when she slowly opened her eyes, which met his, eagerly gazing on her beautiful face, in which the blood was rising once more.

"You have made a lucky escape, madam," said he.

"I have indeed, I have indeed; oh I owe you much for your intrepid courage. I cannot sufficiently thank you; but you would favour me still farther by leading the horses back. I fear there is an accident, else some one should have been here by this time."

"I can easily drive you back at once, but I don't know where you have come from, and wait your instructions."

"Oh," she said, "we were at Woodgreen, a few miles on, and had hardly left it a mile behind us when this accident occurred."

He drove off, and whatever he may have become, he was once an adept at driving: whatever he may have lost, he had not lost the art of managing horses. But no more words passed between them. She kept crannyng her neck to see her friends coming after them, but it was not till fully two miles of the return journey had been traversed that a man on horseback was seen rapidly approaching. Behind him there was a carriage, and even at the distance it seemed full of excited occupants.

The man rode on, but when the carriage met him, he reined up, looked at the woman, took off his cap and waved it over his head. There was an answering signal from the other carriage.

"God be praised," looking up, "that you have not suffered but from fright," said he, as he looked into her pale face and tearful eyes. "Frederick is badly hurt, and poor Jenkins has, I fear, some of his bones broken."

"Oh, I am so glad that no lives were lost." Thank God, thank God, she said fervently.

"Dora, how far did they run?"

"Why, till within half a mile of Willow Copse, when this good man stopped the horses and saved me."

"The deuce take me, I entirely forgot him: he drives well."

"He does indeed, and has saved me from a horrible death."

But before he could address a word to our traveller, the carriages met. Then there were the usual fervent, tearful congratulations, and many praises bestowed upon the lady's rescuer. Immediately the friends met he prepared to dismount, but Dora said to him, "I hope you won't mind to drive me home? As soon as you have rested there, you may go on your way; but if you will accept my father's hospitality for the night, the best we have is at your service."

Without a word, but with a low bow, our hero resumed his seat, and the party drove onwards.

As he rapidly drove on, our hero as rapidly communed with himself. "Why did they not arrive sooner? The coachman and this Frederick must be hurt, else they might have managed to get her sooner. Then where has her father come from, and how comes the other carriage? I can't unravel the clue just now. But it is as lucky for me as for the lady. Why, I could drive this way for ever so long. I shall in any case get a night's lodging, and, of course, a few shillings, or similar patronage. Oh, what a fool to have fallen so far as to look with pleasant anticipation on payment for meritorious services, which to the good are themselves their own reward."

Just as the distant spire of a village church came into view, the horseman called a halt. The party were evidently going to separate. The lady who was called Miss Dora bade them all good-bye, the horseman thanked them, and, leading the way, turned off from the main road. Our party drove on in silence for a few miles, till a neat porter's lodge was reached. It was quickly opened by a woman, who answered the eager inquiries of the gentleman by saying that the coachman and Master Frederick were both at the house. The doctor had been sent for, and had said that the young master was unhurt, and all were anxiously awaiting his return with Miss Dora.

On they drove along a most beautiful avenue. The wind just moved the trees and shrubs, making the rays of the setting sun dance and tremble on the pathway and the green grass that skirted it on both sides. The trees were shedding their foliage, and in their symmetry and grace they lent a delightful charm to the scene. We question very much, however, if either rider, or driver, or young lady felt the charm the avenue was fitted to impart. All were driving, riding, or being driven at their utmost speed. At last they came in view of a beautiful mansion, in front of which a number of servants were drawn up, and all of them looking very grave. The gardener and footman seized the horses by the head. The gentleman dismounted, and received the lady as she stepped from the carriage. She tripped hastily up the steps to be folded in her mother's eager embrace. Her father stood giving his orders about the horses, meantime examining them very careful. Apparently satisfied, he went up the steps, kissed his wife and daughter, and spoke to them in whispers.

Meantime our hero slowly dropped off his box, and stood looking at the master and servants as the horses were being examined. He was evidently waiting to be disposed of. He had not long to wait.

"Stranger, I am doubly indebted to you to-day, and really do not know how I can show you my deep sense of your service. At any rate you will dine with us, and stay all night, and then to-morrow we can talk matters over."

A profound bow was the only response to the invitation. All then went up the steps, and disappeared within the house.

FRUIT ACID.—Dissolve 2½ oz. tartaric acid in one quart of cold water. Pour it over 5 lbs. of ripe fruit, and let it stand 24 hours. Pour into a sieve to drain, as the fruit must not be bruised. To each pint of juice put 1½ lbs. loaf sugar, stir it frequently until dissolved. When the sugar is quite dissolved, bottle and cork it, and keep it in a cool place. These quantities make nine pint bottles. Raspberries are the nicest fruit to use, but cherries also answer well. To make jelly, dissolve 1 oz. isinglass in a pint of boiling water, strain it, and add a pint of the acid. Stir until cool, and pour into a mould.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, AUGUST, 1880.

OUR ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE Annual Meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will be held in Glasgow on Tuesday, 28th September next. The meetings will as usual be three in number:—The annual business meeting at 11 a.m.—Treasurer Hamilton, J.P., President of the Association, in the chair. The annual tea party will be held at 4 p.m. The annual public meeting in the City Hall at 7.30 p.m. R. T. Middleton, Esq., M.P., will preside. Farther particulars will appear in this magazine next month. This early notice is given that friends throughout the country may make their arrangements to be present.

R. MACKAY, Secy.

The British Temperance League held their forty-sixth annual meeting last month. The Executive, in their annual report, say:—We would fain hope that recent political changes may bring about for us those much-needed and much-desired alterations in legislation as regards the facilities that exist for multiplication of drinking houses, as well as to institute more stringent and repressive measures for the safe keeping and restraint of habitual drunkards than the new bill represents, or at least can be made responsible for.

Speaking at a meeting held in Bradford on 17th ult., Dr. Richardson thus referred to the attitude of the present medical profession in regard to temperance:—He was proud to say that his profession was unquestionably making a move in the right direction. He was the president of a society of medical men, numbering 300, who were all abstainers—(applause)—and there could be no doubt that through the whole ranks of the profession of medicine there was a growing feeling that a great deal too much wine was taken, that stimulants could often be dispensed with where they used to be thought necessary.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Raper having returned from a lengthened marriage tour, protracted in the interests of Mr. Raper's health, met with a number of warm friends at the hospitable board of Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., London, on 25th June, and were presented with a splendid tea and coffee service and cheque for £1600, as a marriage gift from their many friends resident in various parts of the country. We are glad to be able to state that Mr. Raper's health seems thoroughly re-established, and it gives us the highest pleasure to record such an appropriate expression of regard towards Mr. Raper and his wife. His manifold labours have often evoked our wonder and admiration.

On the 8th ult. a number of his friends and acquaintances met Dr. Norman S. Kerr in the rooms of the Medical Society of London, under the genial presidency of Dr. W. B. Richardson. The occasion was the presentation of a carriage and harness to Dr. Kerr in consideration of his eminent services in the cause of temperance and social reform, and also crayon portraits of Dr. and Mrs. Kerr, with an illuminated address. We heartily congratulate Dr. Kerr upon the receipt of presents so useful and so handsome, and we entirely agree with Dr. Richardson, when he said that "the charm and sanction about this presentation was that it was given from the hearts of those who offered it, and that it had been won by the hearty service of him who received it." We hope that there are nobler honours in the future for Dr. Kerr, who, judging by his benevolent work in the past, bids fair to be one of the eminent benefactors of mankind.

The vagaries of drunkards would fill a volume. They are so utterly at variance with sound sense, that we treat them as we treat the antics of monkeys—we laugh at them. It is only when the drunkard involves us, as his near relations, in the inevitable consequences of his shameful vice, that we feel disposed to weep at him, and feel a loathing at his folly which never arises while looking at the droll creatures with which we compare him. They know no better. What senselessness, for instance, can compare with that of the drunkard that sank down on the banks of the Thames the other day in a drunken stupor? There he lay on the slimy shore, within high water mark, his head resting against the stoney wall, the sun beating on his unprotected head, utterly helpless and presenting a disgusting sight. Some photographers passing made a picture of him, and it was lucky for him that some good samaritan passing loosed his cravat, thus saving him from the danger of strangulation. Fortunately, the poison evaporated in time to save him from death by drowning. Yet, many people would laugh at this, but it is no laughing matter when his narrow escapes from death are realized. It is a matter for profound humiliation that such dreadful possibilities exist in this country, which prides itself upon its Christianity and gets into a dreadful fit of indignation at a professed Atheist getting into Parliament, but laughs at or resists the attempts being made to prevent that practical Atheism which was exhibited by the publican who sold the liquor that put that man on the banks of the Thames in such danger, and by the man himself, in deliberately choosing to drown his manhood in the bowl. We have no sympathy with Atheism, but we honour consistency. Let this great nation cast the beam of intemperance away in the interests of clearer and purer living, and then deal with the paltry mote of Atheism, in harmony with common sense.

OATMEAL DRINK.—Allow a tablespoonful of coarse Scotch meal to every quart of water; boil twenty minutes, add lemon peel, sugar, ginger or nutmeg to palate. This is a most cooling and nutritious beverage. In hot weather it should be made overnight.

LICENSING BOARDS.

From time to time we have deemed it our duty and privilege to review the various schemes for dealing with the liquor traffic, more or less effectually, which have originated within and without the temperance movement, and after receiving a momentary attention have been committed to the safe keeping of Lethean oblivion.

The (shall we put it) temporary withdrawal of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's famous Permissive Bill has given occasion for the birth of a number of schemes to render the liquor traffic harmless, less ostentatious to public view, as profitable as ever to the liquor dealer, and a valuable tributary to the rates. The Licensing Board schemes, like the Hartz demon, look imposing by the very haze in which they are enveloped, and, like that optical terror, they disappear in the light of investigation. We will endeavour to bring to our readers' remembrance the various features of this scheme, from that of Mr. Cowen's downwards, adding what portion of the schemes are at present receiving attention, in order that our readers may at least know exactly the true relation of Licensing Boards, as contemplated, to the aim of true temperance reformers—the suppression of the liquor traffic by the vote of the ratepayers.

MR. COWEN'S SCHEME.

During the contention on the part of temperance reformers for power to veto all liquor traffic, it was soon apparent how great was the chasm in England between the licensing system and the Permissive Bill. That system was administered by a body—justices of peace and magistrates—over whom the persons most affected by their action had not one iota of control. These authorities could not brook remonstrance, suggestion, nor memorials, but did what seemed right in their own eyes—as in too many places they are doing now. Mr. Cowen thought that the transfer of these powers from an irresponsible authority to one responsible to the ratepayers would be most beneficial to the interests of the community. Such a bill, if passed, would have placed the English licensing system ahead of that in Scotland, as all appeals to Quarter Sessions on new or old licenses or transfers would have been abolished. He, however, simply with this difference asks that the power of the irresponsible authorities he dismisses be assumed by the new power it is the object of his bill to create; and he never contemplates vesting in the licensing board he proposes to establish the power of a direct veto over the traffic. His scheme is regulative and restrictive, nothing more.

MR. HARRISON'S SCHEME.

Last year this gentleman, then representing the Kilmarnock district of burghs, brought forward a bill to establish licensing boards chiefly on the lines of Mr. Cowen's proposal. It would have abolished Quarter Sessions, created an electorate co-extensive with that of School Boards, but would simply hand over the administrative functions of the magistrates and justices of the peace, as regards the licensing system, to a popular board, elected by the ratepayers. It too is licensing, and in no way more suppressive than the present licensing authority.

MR. M'NEEKING'S SUGGESTIONS.

This gentleman, living in Helensburgh, has sent us a copy of his suggestions for "giving effect to the [Free] General Assembly's resolution to press on Parliament the necessity for a measure to give the ratepayers an efficient control over the drink traffic." He pertinently remarks that local option includes the power to increase, diminish, or withhold licenses, but he entirely ignores the suppressive aspect of local option; at least, he does not deal with it in any way. He expressly states the power of granting licenses for hotels, public houses, and grocers, but no other powers, now vested in county justices and in borough magistrates would vest in licensing boards. These licensing boards, with powers identical to those exercised by licensing sessions, would be strictly administrative, and would regulate and control—not suppress—the action of holders of licenses. If publicans hold their licenses at the time licensing boards are appointed, they are to hold their privilege for life, on condition of their good behaviour. To guard against the excessive issue of licenses by boards, the present confirming committees are to be retained. This scheme is licensing, and not suppressive.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND TEMPERANCE SOCIETY'S SCHEME.

The Church of England Temperance Society has formulated a licensing board scheme. The board is composed of ratepayers and justices of the peace and licensing magistrates, in equal numbers. The board is to ask tenders for fresh licenses, the basis of which will be an advance upon the rental of the houses, as fixed by the board. Grocers are not to have spirit licenses. The board is to withdraw all licenses on which a second endorsement is recorded, and is to decide how many licenses are to be extinguished, and the holders of these must ask for compensation. If compensation cannot be agreed upon, an arbiter is to be called in. The compensation granted is got by borrowing the sum required from the Public Works Commissioners, and said sum to be repaid by existing license-holders in thirty years. The society is opposed to suppression.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE'S BILL.

This is a Licensing Board's Bill, and is simply the scheme of the Church of England's Temperance Society framed into a Parliamentary Bill. It is for England only. The Board is to be constituted in perpetual succession, its members elected every three years, and during their tenure of office can only once resolve on the reduction of licenses. All licenses are to be granted by tender. Any surplus income goes in aid of local rates, and any deficiencies of licensing fund to be defrayed out of special poor's rate. As may be inferred, it does not pretend to be in any sense suppressive.

MR. CAINE'S SCHEME.

Mr. Caine, M.P., lately wrote to the Times a letter on liquor legislation. He points to the local option division of 18th June as proof that the country is ripe for thorough licensing reform, and suggests a Licensing Board whose precedent shall be the Education Board. He would repeal all existing statutes, carry one comprehensive Act instead, and administer that Act by a Licensing Board elected wholly by the ratepayers. His scheme is administrative, and not suppressive, although he would not exclude that element from the operations of a Licensing Board.

Such is a slight sketch of these doubtful schemes of dealing effectually with the liquor traffic. Their genesis has its source in Mr. Cowen. The Church of England Temperance Society, who differs so widely on the question of liquor legislation with the United Kingdom Alliance, adopts this idea as entirely in harmony with the principles of its members generally. The admittedly unsatisfactory administration of the licensing laws in England, and the national sympathy with the principle of local option, has evidently led its executive to propose the infusion of the ratepaying element into the administration of the law. But the hybrid is as bad as things as they are. The Lords' Committee on Intemperance afforded the friends of such a scheme the opportunity of setting forth its merits, but we find that its pro-motors have not been able to secure the sympathy of their Lordships with their views.

THE LORDS' COMMITTEE ON LICENSING BOARDS.

Their Lordships state that the effect of such a measure as that of Mr. Cowen's would be to entrust the granting and renewing of licenses to a body elected by the ratepayers, but their Lordships see no reason to believe that such a Board would discharge their duties more effectively than the present licensing authority. While magistrates have great power of control, it is too often exercised only so long as an indolent public opinion is moved to exert pressure upon them. On the other hand, the Local Board, it is feared, would be found more accessible to local influence, and less impartial. It would be constantly changed, and with its changes of membership there would be a change of policy. The election of members on it would be a cause of strife, and they might be open to the powerful influence of the publicans. On these grounds the committee are unable to recommend the passage of a law authorising the institution of Licensing Boards dealing with the traffic in alcoholic liquors.

Here we pause, and in our next and concluding paper will deal with this important subject from our own point of view.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE TEMPERANCE ACT.

WE have published, several times, summaries of the new Canada Temperance Act, but as there are still inquiries each week about it, the following excellent summary from the Canada Casket will be of value:—1, The vote cannot be taken in a less municipality than a county or city; and counties cannot be grouped with each other nor with cities.—2, One-fourth of all the electors in the county or city must sign a petition, asking the Governor-General to submit the Act to a vote of the people.—3, Before this petition is sent to the Governor-General, it must be deposited in the Sheriff's or Registry office 10 days to give a chance for people to see if the signatures are genuine; and two weeks previous notice of the deposit must be given in the newspapers.—4, If the Governor-General is satisfied everything is right, he issues his proclamation; this has to be inserted three times in the Canada Gazette, and the same number of times in the Ontario Gazette.—5, Amongst other things, this proclamation appoints the day when the vote is to be taken.—6, The voting, by ballot, is to be taken in one day between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.—7, Either the Registrar or Sheriff will be returning officer.—8, Persons entitled to vote are the same as those who can vote for a member of Parliament. That is, in a city, they must be assessed either as owner or tenant for 400 dols., or have an income of that amount, and their names must appear in the voter's list. No woman can vote, and a man must be 21 years of age.—9, The following is a form of the ballot paper:—

FOR THE PETITION.
AGAINST THE PETITION.

—10, Those who want to vote for the Act put a cross in the upper apartment, and those who want to vote against it, a cross in the lower one.—11, A voter can only vote once.—12, Bribery and corruption, carrying banners, treating, &c., are forbidden under heavy penalties.—13, Hiring hacks to convey voters not allowed.—14, Special licenses will be granted not to exceed one for every 4,000 inhabitants for druggists to sell in quantities not less than one pint for medicinal or manufacturing purposes, and also wine for sacramental purposes.

In the case of medicine, a doctor's certificate is required; in manufacturers, a certificate by two Justices of the Peace; and for sacramental purposes, by a clergyman.—15, Distillers and wholesale dealers can sell 10 gallons, and brewers 8 gallons, but to be used outside of the municipality.—16, The penalty for violating the law is not less than 50 dols. for the first offence, not less than 100 dols. for the second, and imprisonment not exceeding two months for the third—and any person may inform.—17, The liquors and the kegs, &c., are to be forfeited.—18, Search warrant will issue upon affidavit of any respectable witness; the liquor, if found, may be brought before the magistrate, and if there is not more than 20 gallons of it he may order it to be poured out, and the receptacles destroyed.—19, 50 dols. fine for tampering with a witness.—20, There is no appeal from the decision of the Police Magistrate.—21, To compromise a case is punishable by imprisonment.—22, It is not necessary to prove that money passed, or that liquor was actually consumed, or the kind of liquor, if the Police Magistrate is satisfied that a transaction in the nature of a sale or barter or other unlawful disposal actually took place.—23, Wife and husband shall be competent and compellable to give evidence.—24, Not less than one-third of the fines shall be set apart for a fund to secure the prosecution of infractions of the Act.

As bearing on the subject of the use of alcohol in the great London hospitals, the following statistics are of no little interest:—

Hospitals.	Wine and Beer consumed, 1878.
	Number of In-patients, 1878.	Total Cost.	Cost per Patient.	Equivalent of Alcohol in ounces.
Westminster.....	1,703	£165 5 9	1s. 10½d.	8½
London.....	7,055	539 12 2	1s. 6½d.	10½

Middlesex.....	2,040	547 23 0	4s. 4½d.	32½
	£6,976 4 4

The last of these columns is of peculiar interest, as showing the differences in the average quantity of alcohol per patient used in the chief London hospitals; varying from 8½ ounces in the Westminster Hospital to 32½ in the Middlesex Hospital. If the patients in the former have a sufficient supply of alcohol, what is to be said of the patients in the latter? The drop from 32 to 8 looks more serious than from 8 to 0, which is the relation in which the patients of the London Temperance Hospital stand to alcohol.

The cost of wine, spirits, and beer consumed by the in-patients of Saint George's Union Infirmary for the year 1878 is given for comparison:—

Number of in-patients, 2,496.
 Cost for wine, spirits, and beer, £8 3s. 6½d.
 Cost per patient, 3½d.; or more exactly, 9-10ths of 1d. per patient.

The Republican State Convention for Maine refer to experiences as demonstrating the wisdom of the policy of prohibition.

THERE was a decrease in the consumption of home-made spirits as beverages in the first quarter of this year of 649,699 gallons. The foreign spirits also show a large decline.

SUNDAY CLOSING IN WALES.—Mr. John Roberts, M.P., moved the second reading of the Sunday Closing (Wales) Bill. The measure is practically unopposed in Wales. Mr. Wharton moved and Mr. Scott seconded that it be read that day three months. After an interesting debate the second reading was carried without a division.

A PROHIBITORY VILLAGE.—Low Moor, a village about a mile from Clitheroe, Lancashire, contains a population of about 1,100 souls. There is neither public-house, beer-shop, nor any place for the sale of intoxicating liquors; neither is there a policeman, prison, pawnbroker, doctor nor lawyer. The rate of mortality is remarkable. During the last ten years the average number of deaths per year has amounted to only fifteen, or only a small fraction per thousand of the population.

People are already busy in foreshadowing the nature of the Government measure which the temperance party expect to be introduced next session. It is asserted that it will proceed in the direction of appointing district representative licensing boards, with power to reduce or extend licenses, and also liberty to adopt the Gothenburg scheme. Compensation, drawn from remaining and granted to prohibited licenses, will be a special feature of the new measure. We expect that this forecast, like many others will be discredited by the facts.

Another "feat of endurance" has been accomplished; this time by a young lady of nineteen, who has succeeded in exhibiting herself for thirty consecutive hours in a huge water tank at the Aquarium, Westminster. She never left the water once, and at the conclusion of the swim did not appear much exhausted. We pass no opinion upon the desirability of these displays, for, whether good or bad, it is quite certain something sensational will always be provided while crowds assemble to witness such affairs. There is one thing, however, we note here, and the fact must speak for itself, viz., that Miss Beckwith's refreshments were the same as those which enabled Captain Webb successfully to cross the Channel, for we read they consisted only of coffee, beef-tea, eggs, minced meat, &c. Not a single drop of alcoholic stimulant was given. If the young lady had been "kept up" by wine, beer, or spirits, some would have said that she could not have done the feat without—but how very quiet people are when the fact is against them.—Church of England Temperance Chronicle.

REPRESENTATION OF THE WIGTOWN BURGHS.—On the 14th ult. the Wigtown Burghs were declared vacant on petition in respect of bribery proved against certain agents of the sitting member, Mr. Mark Stewart. In giving judgment, Lord Ormidale "quite exculpated Mr. Stewart from any personal impropriety" in the matter, Lord Craighill concurring. Mr. Mark Stewart helped by his vote to carry the Local Option Resolution on the 18th of June, and has voted for it on other occasions. As soon as the vacancy in the burghs was known Mr. R. Stevenson, the central district agent of this association, was on the ground in the interests of the temperance party. It is to be hoped that our vote in Wigtown will not be reversed by the coming election. The candidates for the vacant seat are, in the Liberal interest, Mr. Gilbert M'icking of Miltonise; and in the Conservative interest, Admiral Sir John Hay, one of the defeated candidates at the General Election. Mr. M'icking, in his address to the electors, thus refers to the licensing question—"The licensing laws require revision, and should the Government introduce a measure in accordance with the sentiment of the ratepayers, it will have my support."

The Irish judges have decided that a licence is property which cannot be extinguished, without compensation, save for an offence against the law.

ONE of the objects of the Croydon Church of England Temperance Society is "to ask licensed victuallers to use their influence in lessening drunkenness"!!!

THE OLDEST TEETOTALER.—Mr. John Price, of Penkridge, Staffordshire, has been an abstainer for seventy-six years, having never in that time drunk anything else but tea, water, and milk.—Temperance Record.

Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., writing to the Times on "the position," says—"There are three requisites for successful legislation:—1st. The repeal of every Act on the statute-book relating to licensing of public-houses. 2nd. One comprehensive Act in place of all. 3rd. To entrust the administration of that Act to a Licensing Board elected by the rate-payers every three years by ballot, with the cumulative vote, following in every respect the precedent of the Education Act.

SACRAMENTAL WINE.—Unfermented wine is now used in about 1200 churches and chapels in the United Kingdom. One of the latest congregations to resolve upon its use at the communion is the Kent Road U.P. Church, Glasgow. A memorial, very largely signed in favour of the change, was forwarded from the congregation to the session, another for statu quo was entirely insignificant. The session wisely agreed to the prayer of the first one. This event has given considerable satisfaction to the congregation, the majority of whom, we are told, are abstainers.

The publicans are not taking kindly to their altered prospects since the passage of the local option resolution. They are sorely hit, and are crying out in consequence. They have hoisted the bogey of "infringed liberty," and are trying to look like martyrs, in order to beget sympathy. Some of the bolder spirits amongst them, however, affect to look indifferent, as if confident in the final appeal of certain triumph, and interpret their present defeat to the lethargy and criminal negligence of the trade. Prospects brighten for our old down-trodden, drink-stepped country!

GLASGOW, CROSS HALL.—The usual weekly meeting was held in the hall of the City of Glasgow United Working Men's T.A. Society. Mr. J. Campbell, president, was in the chair, and in a few brief remarks called upon Mr. R. Dransfield to address the meeting. Mr. Dransfield in a very vivid manner depicted the evils arising from the use of strong drink, and the blessings that follow the adoption of a total abstinence pledge loyally adhered to. The hall was crowded. 37 received the pledge. A hearty vote of thanks was, on the motion of the chairman, awarded to Mr. Dransfield for his really excellent lecture.

THE repression of the Liquor Traffic is engaging the attention of the Dutch legislature as well as of the British Parliament. The Dutch Government has introduced a Bill into the States-General providing for the limitation of public houses to one per 500 inhabitants in towns of 50,000 souls, one per 400 in towns of 20,000, one per 300 in towns of 10,000, and one per 250 in all smaller places. The bill also forbids the supply of intoxicants to children under sixteen. It further imposes from one to eight days' imprisonment for supplying intoxicants to persons already drunk, and a day's imprisonment or a fine of 10 florins for being seen drunk on the streets.—Daily Review.

The Eleventh Annual Sessions of the Grand Lodge of Scotland (I. O. G. T.) was held at Perth on the 5th ult. and two following days. 400 representatives from various parts of the country were present. The Grand Secretary's report showed that the total membership of the order in Scotland was 46,124 (being a decrease since last year of 4624), and the number of lodges 719. 811 of the 20,486 juveniles in the order had been transferred to adult lodges. The Treasurer's report was able to announce a balance in hand of £846. The Rev. J. A. Johnstone, Springburn, was elected G. W. C. T., and Mr. W. W. Turnbull re-elected G. W. Secretary. The sessions meet next year in Edinburgh.

THE second bye-election in Scotland since the general election, was declared in Buteshire on the 3rd ult., and resulted in the return of Mr. Charles Dalrymple by 45 votes. At the general election, Mr. Thomas Russell unseated Mr. Dalrymple, but proceedings were taken to show that he won the seat by corruption, and was also disqualified by being a member of a firm having a government contract. The charge of corrupt practices was dropped, but as there was no doubt of his disqualification on strictly technical grounds, Mr. Russell at once resigned and made a second appeal to the constituency, with the result above stated. Mr. Russell promised to support Local Option. Mr. Dalrymple voted twice in favour of the Local Option Resolution. There is therefore no change in the strength of the Scotch vote on Local Option.

TEMPERANCE ELECTORAL ACTION IN CANADA.—The following pledge is being circulated in connection with the Scott Act campaign:—"We, the subscribers to this article, believe the policy of the Dominion towards the liquor traffic should be decided by the electors at the polls. We believe no party can act higher than its average sentiment, and that, as a consequence, neither of the Canadian political parties, divided as they are between licence and prohibition, can make the suppression of the liquor traffic an avowed and distinct issue. We believe the time has arrived when the advocates of national prohibition should place their question first on the political programme, and force it to an issue. Therefore we pledge ourselves to support no candidate for parliamentary honours who is not a practical man and an avowed prohibitionist. We agree to use reasonable efforts to add subscribers to this article, and to give our aid and support, as citizens or electors, to any platform adopted by them in public convention."

ABERDEEN.—CONFERENCE OF TEMPERANCE REFORMERS.—A meeting of the friends and supporters of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association was held in the Aberdeen Cafe Company's Hall, Shiprow, on Saturday, 3rd ult.; Mr. William Davidson, clothier, presiding. The following resolutions were unanimously and enthusiastically adopted:—"1st. That this meeting tenders its hearty thanks to Sir Wilfred Lawson, Bart., M.P., and the 229 hon. members who voted and paired for the Local Option Resolution. 2nd. That this meeting expresses its sincere thanks to Dr. Webster, member for the city, and to Dr. Farquharson and General Sir A. H. Gordon for the cordial support they gave to Sir Wilfrid Lawson in his efforts to secure the reformation which is so earnestly desired. 3rd. That this meeting of temperance reformers desires to express its high satisfaction at the marked progress made in the present Parliament, and hails with pleasure the growing conviction that no measure will meet the requirements of the time that does not give the ratepayers a complete veto on the issue or renewal of licences. 4th. That copies of these resolutions be sent to the member for the city, the members for the county, and the Prime Minister." The various temperance associations in the city were well represented at the meeting.—Aberdeen Daily Free Press.

THE LORDS ON INTEMPERANCE.—On the 2nd ult. Lord Onslow, in the House of Lords, called attention to the report of the Select Committee on Intemperance, and inquired whether Her Majesty's Government intended to introduce any measure based on the recommendations of that committee. One of these was, that facilities should be afforded those localities desirous of attempting to repress intemperance. He hoped that after the utterances of the Premier, the Government, which had received so much support from the Temperance party, would not hesitate to do all that they could in the matter. The Bishop of Carlisle said there was a wide distinction between law and Lawson, and the difficulty was to convert local option into law. He was favourable to a trial of Mr. Chamberlain's plan. Lord Cottesloe believed there was a strong feeling upon the question of intemperance throughout the country, and he wished Her Majesty's ministers would take it up.

The Earl of Fife, speaking on behalf of the Government, pointed out that this subject was one of large and complex character, as was shown by the number of recommendations made by the Committee on Intemperance. Of these, the one which seemed to him both the shortest and the clearest was undoubtedly No. 7, which said in less than a line that a considerable increase should be made in the licence duty. That recommendation had been acted upon at the very earliest opportunity. On one point all were agreed, that it was our duty to do all in our power, consistently with liberty, to diminish the evils of intemperance, which was unfortunately only too prevalent. But when once this agreement was arrived at on all sides, temperance reformers were found joining issue on every conceivable point. Some were in favour of absolute suppression, others of perfect freedom in the liquor traffic, while others again put forward schemes of varying complexity, such as the Gothenburg system, and the more practicable proposals connected with licensing boards. However interesting and admirable the report was, unfortunately it was hardly possible to find in it any one complete scheme which the Legislature were invited to adopt. The entire suppression of the liquor traffic was hardly possible or practicable in the present state of the public mind, nor would the policy of public freedom be likely to recommend itself to any large section of the community. The question of the hours of closing was one which had been under the consideration of successive Governments, and was one in which they had introduced many alterations of various sorts. For his own part, he very much doubted whether these changes really very much affected the general questions of the temperance or intemperance of the people. With regard to the Gothenburg system, of which he had heard so much lately, that seemed to him one more interesting to study than easy to adopt. (Hear, hear.) Perhaps the most promising part of the subject was that which was connected with the whole question of licensing and how far the power of granting licenses should be vested in the ratepayers or in boards directly elected by them. The last general election had shown that the temperance forces in the country had considerably increased, and that there was a growing feeling in favour of some sort of local option, and possibly in favour of some restrictions in the Sunday liquor traffic. But he would venture to say that it was hardly fair or reasonable to expect that a Government which had been so short a time in office, and had had, in the ordinary course of affairs, so many and such great questions pressing simultaneously for immediate solution, could have already elaborated a legislative proposal on a subject which had pre-eminently baffled the ingenuity of successive Administrations. Those who were most earnest in the cause of temperance reform would admit that it was hardly one of those questions in which it would be wise to go far ahead of public opinion. After all, we must not lose sight of the redeeming features of this distressing subject. Recent legislation had had a beneficial effect throughout the country by producing good order in the streets. Drunkenness had not increased in the rural districts of England and Scotland, or even in Ireland. As a rule, the higher classes of artisans are becoming more sober, drunkenness being more confined to the lowest grades of the community, where education had not yet kept pace with the growth of wages. In conclusion, he wished to say that the Government were both earnest and anxious in this question. The whole matter was under their consideration. They were noting the various changes which were now taking place in public opinion, and they hoped at no distant date to introduce a measure which might mitigate some of the worst features of this lamentable evil. (Hear, hear.) Lord Aberdare and the Earl of Kimberley made some remarks, and the subject dropped.

Dr. Lewett, while arguing for prohibition, once said, "Why not pour the drink into the gutter? It is destined to the gutter at last. Why not pour it there at once, and not wait to strain it through a man, and spoil the strainer in the work."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE NORTH.

BY MR. WM. BLACKWOOD,

Northern District Superintendent, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

DEAR SIR.—In my last letter I gave you an account of my visit to Stornoway, in the Island of Lewis. To me that was a most important journey, and I will have a lively recollection of it for a long time to come. Some individuals use the editorial "we" in detailing their proceedings regarding the temperance movement. I will just use the first personal pronoun, and I hope I will not be charged with egotism for so doing. I spent about a fortnight in Aberdeen after my return, and then went north to Macduff. This was one among the many places where I got a hearty welcome when I first came to the north, and I found the friends still as genial and warm-hearted as they were on that occasion. I addressed two meetings, one in the open air and one in a lodge room. There are two lodges in the town, one a U.T.A., and the other an I.O.G.T. Upon the whole the cause is healthy in Macduff. Banff stands on the west bank of the Deveron, and is only separated from Macduff by the river. I had a good open-air meeting in Banff, and all our friends promptly renewed their assistance. I then went to Portsoy, and had some very interesting interviews with the temperance men of the town, whom I found to be earnest, and doing good work to strengthen the cause. There was a good open-air meeting, at which a number of kind friends put in an appearance, and said a few words to those who turned out to listen. After this I went to Cullen. Temperance reformers are never at a loss in Cullen. Mrs. Bennett makes them feel quite at home, and Mr. George Pirie's services are always tendered with a readiness that impresses one with the feeling that his heart is in the work. Cullen was well-nigh deserted when I was there, the fishermen being away plying their industry at another station. The Countess of Seafield has generously fitted up a coffee-house for the inhabitants of the sea town. It is a neat, commodious little place, well supplied with newspapers and pamphlets, and apparently taken advantage of by the young men of the village. It can only get fair play, however, like all these places, when the public houses are suppressed round about it. Peterhead was the town I next visited. The Good Templars here have ceased to work in the meantime. The U.T.A. have closed their doors till after the herring fishing. They find it difficult to get attendance during its great bustle and excitement. There is a large number of genuine temperance reformers in Peterhead. I had two excellent meetings in Broad Street, and secured the gratifying co-operation of the good friends of our agitation. I am often asked, What are you going to do now? and my answer is always ready. There should be a general advance along the whole line to secure a complete veto clause in any measure that may be brought before Parliament. Anything less than this is not justice, and to demand less wants the true ring of the prohibitionist. There will always be plenty of people ready to divert attention from the right thing without temperance reformers foolishly doing it themselves.

You could not wish to meet with kinder friends than the temperance men of Fraserburgh. I spent two days in that town, and my sojourn did me good. I had the pleasure of addressing a large meeting at the Cross, and of conversing with a large number of men, whose sentiments, aims, and aspirations are in unison with my own on the question of prohibition. There is a Temperance Society in Fraserburgh, also a Good Templar Lodge, and a Lodge of the U.T.A.'s. I heard the question of compensation discussed in Fraserburgh from several standpoints, and I am of opinion that there will be a good deal said before compensation is granted to the disestablished liquor men. There are many besides prohibitionists whom it will waken to a thoughtful attitude. Even those who have drunk deeply at the font of Bacchus, will be disposed to think that his high priests have already got sufficient without paying them off under a local option law.

We have had a fine conference in Aberdeen. The different societies in the city were all represented. It was called under the auspices of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and resolutions were passed with great enthusiasm thanking Sir Wilfred Lawson, also the Members for the city and county of Aberdeen, for their votes on the Local Option Resolution. Tea was partaken of, and three hours of eloquent speech-making brought a most pleasant and happy meeting to a termination.

A WEEK'S WORK IN EDINBURGH,

BY MR. R. STEVENSON,

Western District Superintendent, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

I BEG to submit a sketch of my week's meetings in Edinburgh, which commenced on Sunday, 4th ult., in the Queen's Park. Mr. Armstrong presided, and Mr. John Steel gave a short, pithy, and practical opening address. I spoke up the hill to a very large and attentive audience, composed of all classes. There could not be less than from 1500 to 2000 people within the compass of my voice. The evening was fine, with a slight breeze, which wafted the sound of my voice clearly and distinctly a long way. I took as my subject "The Bible and the Liquor Traffic," on which I spoke for an hour. I introduced my subject by saying that the Temperance cause was too solemn a subject on which to crack jokes or use frivolous speech in its advocacy, and that they must not expect such from me, neither on this occasion nor on any other throughout the week. It was quite possible that my meetings might not be so large on that account. Still I had no faith in either singing or joking people into sobriety. I drew a contrast between the effects of the Bible and the Liquor Traffic. The influence of the one as contrasted with the influence of the other. The influence of the Bible in civilizing and christianizing at home and abroad, in contrast with the demoralizing and brutalizing influence of the Liquor Traffic. The friends appeared greatly pleased with the meeting.

On Monday the meeting was in Parliament Square. There was a very large attendance, and with only two exceptions, I had the most profound attention. My subject was "The Curse of Drink and the Cure." Mr. J. Milne presided. The meeting thoroughly appreciated the address—and a hearty response was given to the salient points of the lecture. I spoke for 75 minutes. At the close the meeting awarded a cordial vote of thanks.

On Tuesday night I spoke first in the open-air at Nicholson Square, and afterwards in the Temperance Hall. Mr. J. Milne presided on both occasions. The meeting outside was large, highly respectable, and very attentive. I have seldom seen so many well-dressed persons standing at an open-air meeting. I spoke outside for 30 minutes on a subject raised by one of the audience during the chairman's remarks, viz.:—Moderate Drinking or Temperance. I began by saying that I wished the question of limited drinking and total prohibition to be calmly and dispassionately considered. It was a subject that demanded calm and deliberate thought. I then said, how are we to proceed in our enquiry. We must first of all ascertain, apart from both prejudice and appetite, whether, as human beings, we are made capable of taking intoxicating liquors without injury. I then illustrated my subject by a reference to animal and vegetable life, the lion, dog, &c., and also to flowers, and carried my audience with me. I wound up my argument by granting for a moment that alcohol was a creature of God. What then? So are beetles. Do we cultivate them for our use? I referred to the Colorado beetle, and the act passed in 36 hours for its extermination because it was said voraciously to devour potatoes. I asked, are human beings not of more value than potatoes, and if an act is passed to destroy the destroyers of potatoes, how much more urgent is the necessity for destroying alcohol, which destroys all that is good and noble in humanity. The meeting adjourned to the Temperance Hall, which was filled. Rev. Mr. Parr first addressed the meeting, then I spoke on the Danger of Drinking Alcoholic Liquors, &c. Mr. Nisbet, in a short speech, moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, which was warmly adopted.

On Wednesday evening the meeting was in Parliament Square. Mr. Forbes presided, but the night being wet, our meeting was not large. My subject was the "Theory of Compensation," and seemed to be appreciated by the audience, as I endeavoured to expose the fallacious reasoning and illustrations of "compensation" advocates.

On Thursday evening the meeting was held in Jeffrey Street. Mr. Armstrong presided. There was a very large and very attentive audience, chiefly composed of working men resident in that locality. My subject was, "The Publican as a Tradesman," contrasting the efforts of his workmanship with that of the tailor, shoemaker, &c., and pointed out that just as this trade prospered every other trade was depressed; pointing out the late Father Mathew's efforts, and the failure afterwards, through want of legislation to sustain the glorious results of his labours; gave Bessbrook as a proof of what all Ireland might have been if law had been then framed to allow the people to suppress the traffic in alcoholic liquors in their varied localities. I may here mention that a gentleman, a visitor to Edinburgh, stopped me in the High Street to thank me for my address on Tuesday evening in Nicholson Square. He was then on his way to take tea with Professor Masson, and he stopped rather long with me. He said that he had mentioned to the Professor what he had heard of my address, and they both agreed that such teaching on temperance and prohibition must do uncommon good, as many doubtless would listen to our advocacy on such an occasion that would not enter a Temperance Hall. He said that he often dined with Sir H. Thomson, M.D., and knew Dr. Richardson well.

On Friday evening the meeting was in Parliament Square, and was fully as large as the former in the same place. Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Forbes assisted. My subject was, "The Right of the People to Suppress the Liquor Traffic." The meeting at the close unanimously and heartily awarded me a vote of thanks. I may say that the committee was very attentive, and fully alive to the abundant and abiding results of out-door meetings, as was signally apparent by their personal attendance and co-operation. It is very encouraging to work night after night in connection with the Edinburgh T.A. Society.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

\* Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1880.*

THE following meetings have been addressed by the representatives of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 11th April to the 10th July inclusive. During that period 203 meetings were held, 78 being deputation and 125 ordinary. At these meetings 286 addresses were given.

The following is a summary of each speaker's work:

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Perth, Armidale, Montrose, Ferryden, Forfar, Kirriemuir, Dundee, Carnoustie, Glasgow, Coupar-Angus, Partick, Stranraer, Renfrew, Motherwell, Strathaven, Dumbarton, Paisley, Pollokshaws, Kilmarnock, Ayr, Edinburgh, Greenock, Kilsyth, and Bonhill, and addressed 58 meetings.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Denholm, Pitlossie, Dysart, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Tranent, Leith, Addie-well, Pencaitland, Ceres, Hawick, Peebles, Galashiels, Kirkcaldy, Cupar-Fife, Dunfermline, St. Andrews, and Strathmiglo, and addressed 56 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Kirkwall, Stromness, Shapinsbay, Thurso, Wick, Helmsdale, Golspie, Dornoch, Tain, Dingwall, Cromarty, Invergordon, Beauly, Ullapool, Stornoway, Aberdeen, Millseat, Macduff, Banff, Portsoy, Cullen, Durriss, Peterhead, Duncanston, Clatt, Fraserburgh, and Stonehaven, and addressed 48 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has visited Mearns, Kilsyth, Glasgow, Johnstone, Paisley, Renfrew, Motherwell, Strathaven, Dumbarton, Partick, Govan, Edinburgh, Kilmarnock, and Kilsyth, and addressed 33 meetings.

Mr. Charles Bent has visited, Hawick, Peebles, Galashiels, Leith, Kirkcaldy, Edinburgh, Cupar-Fife, Dunfermline, Bonhill, Glasgow, Paisley, Greenock, Ayr, Dundee, and Perth, and addressed 33 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Kesson has visited Glasgow, Greenock, Pollokshaws, and Partick, and addressed 10 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Glasgow, Forfar, Johnstone, and Stewarton, and addressed 8 meetings.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has visited Edinburgh and Peebles, and addressed 6 meetings.

Mr. Joseph Milne has addressed 5 meetings in Edinburgh.

Baillie Selkirk has addressed 4 meetings in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 4 meetings in Edinburgh.

Ex-Baillie Lewis has addressed 3 meetings in West Linton and Edinburgh.

Ex-Baillie Torrens has addressed 3 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. James Horn has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. Joseph Bone has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh.

Mr. J. Scrymgeour has addressed 2 meetings in Dundee.

The following gentlemen have each delivered one address in the places following their names:—Mr. J. Anderson—Ferryden; Rev. D. M'Rae, Rev. Mr. Steele, and Mr. Rutherford—Forfar; Rev. R. Burgess and Mr. J. B. Lyall—Peebles; Rev. Dr. Adamson, Rev. Mr. Parr, Mr. J. Nisbet, Dr. Bowie, Mr. J. Coutts, and Mr. D. Anderson—Edinburgh; R. C. Murray, Esq.,—Glasgow; Rev. Hector Hall and Rev. Mr. Clugston—Stewarton; Mr. D. Stenhouse—Cupar-Fife.

PUBLIC PRESS.

ALCOHOL AND OPIUM.—The two articles above named seem to be considered indispensable factors in maintaining the credit of the United Kingdom and of India. Hence licensed victuallers at home, and we doubt not opium growers in India, regard themselves as pillars of the State, and, therefore, entitled to special consideration. There is, however, one noteworthy difference; in the United Kingdom we raise a considerable revenue from the demoralization of our own subjects; in the case of India we rely upon the demoralization of the Chinese. It will not, we believe, be denied that both alcohol and opium have their uses; in so far as revenue from either is derived from its proper use, we hold that revenue to be economically unsound, and in so far as it is derived from its abuse, we hold it to be immoral. There is, with respect to China, the additional wrong that our opium has been forced upon them by most iniquitous wars; but, in other respects, both kinds of revenue, that, viz., derived from alcohol and that from opium, appear to us to stand upon a similar footing. It is, however, a very common idea to regard the taxes upon alcohol as satisfactory, and to condemn the revenue derived from opium. It is argued that a great moral result is secured by taxing alcohol, that the price is raised, consumption diminished, and sobriety promoted. That the price is raised is no doubt true, and that increase of price diminishes consumption is equally true; but there are other elements in the case; the consumption of alcohol may be diminished, but the consumption of deleterious and maddening drugs may be increased.

The taxation of intoxicating drink has, moreover, this consequence, that it makes the Government a participator in the profits of riots and excess. The publican who is fined for permitting drunkenness is practically fined for permitting his customers to swell the revenues of a professedly Christian country. Behind the counter of the lowest drinking bar, where, to quote the words of the late Mr. Dudley Baxter, "emaciated and in rags, the drunkard puts down the wages that should have supported his children, calling for glass after glass until his earnings are exhausted, and then staggers off to a poverty-stricken home to wreak his madness upon his wife," stands, in his official capacity, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and sweeps into the coffers of the State the largest portion of the money thus worse than wasted. With that inconsistency which is a frequent characteristic of humanity, there are those who condemn the gains of the gin palace while they regard with equanimity, if not approval, that portion of them which is appropriated by the State; but the question arises whether that which is held to be wrong in the individual, can by any process of logic be shown to be right for the State.—Financial Reformer.

OVERWORK.—Let me embrace the opportunity to say a word by way of caution in regard to the mistaken measures too often taken for the relief of what is supposed to be "overwork." In nearly all the cases of this class which fall under the notice of the alienist there has been a more or less prolonged use of stimulants to mitigate the sense of suffering and mental fatigue. It is no uncommon occurrence to find that the patient has been taking alcohol habitually though in small doses as a restorative and sleeping draft—composed of opium in some form, chloral hydrate, or bromide of potassium—night after night for weeks, or even months. Patients of all ages, conditions, and temperaments, terrible with sleeplessness of all forms and degrees, arising from the most diverse and contradictory causes, are dosed by their friends or physicians with these deleterious drugs. This is a serious business. The reckless routine prescription of stimulants and sedatives is one of the most unsatisfactory and unscientific of practices. Alcohol cannot possibly be harmless in cases of the class we have been considering. Over stimulation of the lower centres is the very evil which we have most to dread, and most sedulously to try to avoid. Alcohol never increases the power of the higher centres. It can only for the moment irritate them, and, in the long run, ruin their nutrition.—Dr. Granville in the Lancet.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, etc., for REVIEW, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Office, 30 Hope Street.

The Leaflet Reciter; by J. H. Evans (London: National Temperance Publication Depot, Strand). This is a series of leaflets, healthy in tone and educative in tendency, consisting of 8 sorts (6 of each), enclosed in a neat packet, and intended for recitation at Bands of Hope, etc. A happy idea, which should certainly be appreciated by conductors of juvenile entertainments.

Illustrious Abstainers. By Frederick Sherlock. (London: Hodder & Stoughton.) We heartily welcome a second edition of this volume of the finest temperance biographical sketches in the English language. It has the approving notice of such eminent men as Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., and Canon Farrar, and is indispensable to every temperance library. If we are reminded by the study of great lives to make our own lives great, with what force will these twenty eminent examples of a life of abstinence come home to the business and bosom of one and all of us, impelling us to do what in us lies to get a copy of it into the Temperance and Good Templar, and even City Free Libraries in our neighbourhood. We offer our hearty congratulations to Mr. Sherlock on his well merited success.

Hand and Heart, No. 236. (London Offices, the Paternoster Buildings.) In addition to the usual varied, useful, and pictorial contents, this number contains a portrait and genial notice of Mr. Frederic Smith, the esteemed secretary of the Band of Hope Union. Full justice is done to Mr. Smith's ability and energy, but we are left to guess his age from his portrait—not a very remarkable omission in any life notice of a lady, but certainly an error in the present case.

The National Temperance Hymnal, No. 8; edited by the Rev. John Compston (Maidstone: G. H. Graham). We have always regretted the comparative lack of really worthy temperance song. We were of the opinion, and we think not without some reason, that the devil had all the best of the music; but that opinion has been considerably modified by the appearance of the publication before us, which we highly commend to Bands of Hope, Good Templar Lodges, etc. The music is arranged for four voices and the pianoforte, is printed in large type and on good paper, and every piece is pointed with expression marks, so as to secure good and effective singing.

Twenty-Second Annual Report of the Irish Temperance League. The past twelve months mark an epoch in the history of the temperance movement. We have celebrated the year of jubilee—we have seen the overthrow of liquor domination in the British House of Commons—we have hailed with joy the recognition of our great contention by a new Parliament—and we have watched the rapid progress of our principles amongst the people; events which have not only filled us with gratitude, but which have nerved us to still greater efforts in the great cause of our country's liberty. Our sister association in Belfast has shared largely in the labours of which these triumphs are but the results. In the annual report before us we find the record of a year's honest, zealous, useful, and successful work accomplished by our Irish ally, in the cause of personal, social, and political temperance, for which Ireland will yet bless her. Like other good institutions, she is only limited in her noble effort by the pressure of monetary considerations. Our wish for the friends in Belfast is that they may secure the sympathy and aid of an ever-increasing membership, so that the future may be even brighter than the past has been.

The Human Body and its Functions. Lectures. By Rev. H. S. Paterson, M.D. A second series of lectures delivered to the London Young Men's Christian Association, of which Life Studies, elsewhere noticed, is the first. The same skilful treatment—the same mastery of the subject and its details—is apparent, the same clear and cogent argumentation and forcible style is visible on every page. The volume is divided into eight chapters—the organism, tissues, preparation, and conveyance of aliment, removal of waste, the nervous system, the special senses, and the evolution and application of energy. Dr. Paterson protests against the doctrine which obtains in certain philosophical circles "that mind is simply another aspect of the body—the outcome of it in one direction—and that when we have exhausted the study of the physical components of man, we have nothing left to examine." And he gives to our mind invincible reasons for making it. In treating his subject, Dr. Paterson displays a perfect knowledge of the strength and weakness of his opponent's position, a mind receptive of whatever truths his opponents have to offer, and a skilful mode of setting forth the truths upon which he takes his stand, which, while keeping up the interest of the reader, at the same time thoroughly enlists his sympathy and irresistibly invites the action of his judgment upon the point at issue. Let anyone take up this volume in the true spirit of enquiry, and he will be constrained to acknowledge the fairness, ability, and courteousness which distinguishes Dr. Paterson. As for the book itself, it is well printed and handsomely bound; but we miss those illustrations which are so necessary in a physiological treatise; all the more that his audiences apparently had the advantage of a very complete set of apparatus, which constantly illustrated these most interesting series of lectures.

"A Famous Boy" is the title of an address delivered to Sunday-school scholars, by Fred. Sherlock, author of "Illustrious Abstainers," etc. In it the author makes an interesting episode in the early life of Milton—when he hurried home from the pleasures of the Continent to share in the grand struggle for civil and religious liberty in which his countrymen were engaged—the groundwork of an earnest and eloquent appeal to the young to recognise their responsibility, and aid in the overthrow of the giant evil of intemperance. It should circulate by thousands. The price is sixpence per 100.

Studies in Life. Lectures by Rev. H. S. Paterson, M.D. (London: Hodder & Stoughton.) It is often remarked that ministers of the Gospel do not sufficiently guard their flock from the insidious and dangerous teachings of Pseudo-Science. They are, it is said, too often to be found in the theological groove, and seldom found meeting sham scientists on their own field of conflict with reasons in the one hand and religious principles in the other. It will be rather difficult, we think, for the accused to secure a verdict of acquittal. Certainly we see the utmost expenditure of energy and research put forth by men of science, falsely so called, to exclude God from His own universe, and to enthrone a negation in His stead. The whole field of current thought is overrun by bands of men whose sole purpose apparently is to establish in the minds of mankind a belief in a world which was not framed by God. At the same time we look to the ministry and the priesthood, only to find the great body of them either incapable or indifferent, and the defence of the truth, as against the destructive rationalists of our day, left in the hands of a few noble spirits, who, with great advantage to the cause of Christ, do battle for the cause of truth. Anyone looking over the field of science must be made painfully aware by his survey of the absurd credulity not seldom exhibited by her votaries. Theories not half made up are flaunted in the eyes of the people, and made current for a little time by the authority of some great name, only to be, by the prick of an Ithuriel's spear, exposed and cast aside. The credulity of science during the past twenty years as regards Bioplasm, Protoplasm, Evolution, Involution, and other "isms," would be discreditable in a high degree to the investigators of nature in the infancy of scientific research. Scepticism and Christianity have often been in conflict. At one time men would not believe in Christianity, because miracles could not be demonstrated. Nevertheless and notwithstanding, belief in Christianity won its way. Now she might turn round and ask Science to demonstrate a great many of those so-called truths with which her schools are teeming. The danger which science at present has to fear is the disregard—unconsciously in most cases, no doubt—of all the canons of investigation on the part of many of her followers, and the consequent damage to truth and the world. We are not of those who look for perfection in scientific investigations, or dream that it will have been attained even for centuries to come. While so much in nature has yet to be explored, so much generalised, so much experimented upon, it is useless to think for one moment of resting and being thankful. The great living principle of science is progress towards higher generalisations and higher truths. What we desire to see, and what we have, we think, a right to, is true inductive research, properly formed hypotheses, correct scientific methods, knowledge gained and accurately registered, leading to the consequent conquest of the whole realm of nature. It is in this spirit that we heartily welcome Dr. Paterson's book. It deserves a place among those works having as their object the defence of true religion against false science. Dr. Paterson, although a minister, is also an M.D. in medicine, and has the training and the culture for scientific investigation—placing him on a level with those whose theories he examines. We can, therefore, take up his book with confidence, and enter upon the studies of life and man which he has laid before us, with some anticipation of fruitful result. He is a Scotchman, too, with more than an ordinary measure of the caution of his race. He holds, very properly we think, that the claims of certain scientific men to have found out other than Divine origination for the beginning of all things have not been sustained—in other words, he is disposed to ask a verdict of "not proven." This may not be considered a great deal to ask, but it is a fair way of putting the subject, and it involves tremendous issues. It means the failure of theories and hypotheses the aim of which is to show that the world around us and within us are simply the result of cold upon the incandescent vapour in which this world was once, and—nothing more. He, on the other hand, maintains that there is no choice between the theory of Divine origination, which he accepts, and the theory of chance. Those, as he truly says, who adopt chance as the explanation of things are in danger if they carry out their theory consistently of landing themselves in universal doubt or pyrrhonism. Dr. Paterson studies nature and life as the works of God. In the first chapter, nature and the study of nature is treated with the utmost fairness, and with ability conspicuous in every page. The question which has been raised with regard to the Book of Nature and the Book of Revelation has been stated thus: Is it possible to reconcile the various statements that we read in the Bible with the various facts that we find on examination in the universe? Dr. Paterson accepts the question if amended, by putting for Scripture the interpretation of Scripture, for, as he says, the interpretation of Scripture is quite a different thing from Scripture itself, just as the interpretation of nature is different from nature itself. Having set nature down as an effect whose cause is God, and quoted Augustine's saying that the will of God is the nature of things, the author deals with the laws of nature, which with him are simply the observed succession of nature. The regularity of these laws he admits, their immutability he denies. God is always present in His universe, guiding it with vigilant care, and it is because of His watchfulness that the succession we all so much admire is sustained. The second chapter, treating of life and its characteristics, is equally interesting. In life, the author recognises—first, growth and development common to all life; second, thought and will, restricted to the animal kingdom; and in life in the human family conscience and spiritual inspiration. He calls up among the various theories of life that of evolution, which he contrasts by the recognised quality of matter "inertia!" contrasts force as admitted by true science with the vagaries which some philosophers would impose upon it; the co-relation of forces with the great fact that while chemical, electrical, and mechanical forces are interchangeable, vital force cannot be so interchanged, it can only be produced from pre-existent life, and so regarded it stands alone. The successive chapters treat of the origin of life—its varieties, its record, its natural history, its enemies, and its results. And in all these the author is quite at home in his subject, highly satisfactory in his treatment, cogent in his arguments, forcible in his style, and accurate in his science. His design was to show that we have as yet no real knowledge of nature that warrants suspicion or rejection of the claims advanced by the Bible. We are convinced that he has accomplished that design in a manner eminently conclusive and satisfactory, and were we asked to recommend a hand-book introductory to the consideration of nature and life, we should warmly point to "Studies in Life" by Dr. H. S. Paterson.

SEPTEMBER, 1880.

"CHAMBERS'S JOURNAL" IN THE MIST.

AN article in this journal on toast-drinking, excellent in its matter and treatment, is sadly disfigured by the vagaries of the worthy editor respecting liquor legislation. We go a long way with him in some of his strictures. We believe with him that there are many getting demented upon the liquor traffic. They are not the staunch prohibitionists. These at least are not demented. They see a great evil, and they have at the same time a clear knowledge of its cure. The world may be getting stupefied with schemes for lessening drunkenness, but the blame of this lies upon those who seek to merely scotch the liquor snake and not to kill it. We regret, as much as the writer, the fact that all who set themselves in array against the liquor traffic are not, as we are, total abstainers; but we do not despise their aid at the polling booth. There "noses count," and the vote of a non-abstainer and one who abstains are equally valuable. It is to the honour of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association that it has all along aimed at uniting all classes of citizens against the drink traffic. And while, in doing so, it has been unable to acquit the drinker who assists it of inconsistency, it at the same time leaves his inconsistency to himself and Him with whom he has to do. The editor is, for a man of his judgment and experience, singularly oblivious of the principles and policy of prohibition. He evidently knows nothing of the difference between restriction and prohibition, or he looks upon alcohol as a good thing, to which restriction and not prohibition should apply. The instance he offers as decisive of the folly of legislation confirms our view. All the evidence afforded by Bessbrook, Saltaire, and St. Johnsbury, has never appeared above his mental horizon, and hence the great density of ignorance he displays. He says, "We do not expect much good from legislating on the liquor traffic. A rigorous Act of Parliament to restrain drunkenness in England at the middle of last century, proved a complete failure, and had to be rescinded." One of the Acts to which he probably refers is that of Anne, I., cap. 24, which allowed every merchant to sell spirits off the premises; the other, of George II., suppressed the sale of liquors except in dwelling houses—thus virtually turning every dwelling house into a public house. This Act declared that spirits should not be sold in less quantities than two gallons without a £50 license, and that 20s. a gallon should be levied upon gin. Shortly before this the Middlesex magistrates declared "that spirits were sold by persons of all descriptions." Here, then, was a severely restrictive law passed in the teeth of unbounded license. Could anything but failure be expected? There was no public education antecedent to its passage, but instead quite a liquor demoralization. The temperance reformation was not then organized;

then the parliament, which did not represent the people, passed laws without regard to the opinions of the masses, whom they despised. Now laws register the opinion of the people. There can be no argument against the present agitation for liquor legislation drawn from the failure of the rigorous Act of last century. Then the Act was, after all, restrictive—severely restrictive, but it only, after all, altered the mode of sale. The legislation sought at the present day is to render all sale felonious; and we hope to succeed because the masses are in sympathy with our aims. He says "the cure was worse than the disease." But it was not a cure, for the people who had means could indulge in the grossest manner. There is no desire on the part of prohibitionists "to supersede moral discipline by statutory enactments." The fact is, with all the means of moral discipline we have we are not becoming a sober people. Why? Because our people are the slaves of a physical substance and the institutions for its sale, not merely victims of ignorance. They are under the tyranny of the drinking customs and the traffic. The upper classes, notwithstanding their advance in culture attend dinners, and drink toasts with all the honours; and our very ministers at ordination dinners, display a grossness sadly at variance with the moral discipline they so earnestly enforce in the pulpit. The fact is, that the public house, notwithstanding what has been done to curtail its operations, defies all the means of culture which seeks simply to strengthen the moral principle, but does little or nothing to remove conditions which expose people to temptations which they cannot resist. The editor cannot show one place where public houses exist wherein the people have succeeded in tipping without harm to themselves or their neighbours. The very use of these liquors tend to the larger use, which all acknowledge to be abuse; and hence, in the wake of every public house there is drunkenness, poverty, crime, and death. In those places where there are no public houses quite another result takes place. There the non-expenditure on drink leads invariably to augmented comfort, and wealth, and enjoyment. Temperance reformers see this going on in such places before their eyes, whether the absence of these places have been brought about by landlords or by laws; and they argue that if this can be done in various countries—Sweden, Canada, Greece, the United States, and Norfolk Island—and under all conditions of life, ranging from savagery to civilization, there should be such a law on the statute book giving the people power to place themselves under its benign sway. The editor has all his life been urging upon society the development of the higher, and the restraint of the lower faculties of its members, and he looks for the highest form of social life when the mentality, the morality, and sensitivity of man are co-ordinated and harmonized. But has legislation been of no avail in this development?

Has it not been found necessary to evoke law in the interests of education—to establish the conditions of knowledge? and can it be futile or unwise on the part of temperance reformers to evoke that same law for the removal by the people themselves of those conditions of intemperance, the public houses—the admitted stain and bane of our country, and the fostering cause of our abounding intemperance?

“NO COMPROMISE.”

BY REV. SAMUEL HARDING, PAISLEY.

A LITTLE gained is better than nothing, is a favourite phrase with many persons who shudder at the bold measures taken, and the Utopian schemes propounded by the advanced leaders of the temperance army. Having scored such a magnificent victory in the House of Commons on the local option resolution they would have us be content, and quietly hope, and patiently wait for a favourable opportunity and then make a move in the direction of limiting the hours of sale, or diminishing the number of public-houses. We have little sympathy with this mode of operation. We adopt the platform of the early prohibitionists—No License. “We care not what steps may be taken to lessen, to modify, to make respectable, to limit to six days in the week, or to certain hours in those days, the abominable traffic in alcoholic drinks, we are resolved not to expend our energies in anything short of the immediate and total repeal of that license by which men and women are consigned to ignominious graves.”

If we believe that the liquor traffic, as carried on in licensed houses, is sinful and demoralising, that it is a curse to the community, giving rise to crime, pauperism, insanity, immorality, disease, premature death, domestic misery, bad trade, waste and loss of property, unnecessary heavy taxation, besides forming the greatest outward hindrance to the moral and religious improvement of society and to the spread and triumph of the Gospel of Christ; and that these are the necessary, inevitable, and unpreventable results of the traffic, as the whole history of the system demonstrates. For this reason the article which is sold in these places is a poisonous article, which disturbs and deranges man's physical system, and tends to increase the desire for itself in those who drink it. Experience proves that you cannot permit this traffic to be carried on without inflicting infinite injury to the temporal and eternal interest of the people. If the foregoing indictment be true, what attitude should the temperance men and prohibitionists of Scotland take in regard to the liquor traffic?

Suppose a dangerous epidemic broke out in our midst, what attitude would be taken by the authorities and medical faculty in relation to it? Would they confine it to a certain district or limit its fatality to a limited number of the inhabitants? We unhesitatingly answer no. Medical skill would be brought into requisition and every measure adopted, not to regulate or restrict the epidemic, but to stamp it out entirely and purify the locality from further contagion. And this course of action would have the consent and meet with the approval of the entire populace, with, perhaps, here and there a solitary exception.

What plague has ever visited these shores that will for one moment compare with the results of the liquor traffic in its blighting, withering, blasting influence—that has left so dark a stain behind, that has sent up to heaven so terrible a wail of agony from broken hearts, that has contributed so largely to the number of those whose cry of despair comes up from the drunkard's hell. And yet, notwithstanding all this, some who are regarded as leaders in the temperance movement hesitate, and fear to grapple with this evil in its entirety. Poor, weak, frail humanity trembles before the magnitude and power of the traffic, and well it might; for if ever there was a combination of “principalities and powers, and the rulers of the darkness of this world, and spiritual wickedness in high places,” such exists in connection with the liquor traffic.

“But our sufficiency is of God.” The battle against intemperance is God's battle against iniquity. God is on our side, “Whom shall we fear? of whom shall we be afraid?” Temperance men have been looking too low for help. Too long have they trusted in the arm of flesh. They have separated in many instances what our glorious leader—“The Captain of our salvation”—joined together and enjoined upon His followers as an imperative duty, to “watch and pray.” A very large portion of time has been devoted to the former but too little to the latter duty. God's warriors in the past fought many a battle against cruelty and oppression on their knees, and if we would succeed we must often be found in the same attitude taking hold of the divine strength, and then we shall go forth “terrible as an army with banners.”

There must be no compromise.

“Right is right, as God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.”

Our duty is clearly before us. Every means must be employed to arouse and instruct the people upon the prohibition question. The truth must be proclaimed and defended at all cost. It may be that those who persistently advocate the prohibition of the liquor traffic will be regarded as extreme men and fanatics, and, like many of the reformers of the past, for the time being become unpopular. But when our principle becomes popular we shall have many of these timid temperance men coming stealthily over on the prohibition side, and claiming to have been there all the time.

We want men of uncompromising character and principle, having faith in God and in the triumph of our cause, who “Laugh at impossibilities

And cry, It shall be done.”

Then, only then, shall we see the liquor traffic shaken to its foundation, the truth winning its way, mountains levelled, valleys exalted, crooked places straightened, darkness scattered, Satan defeated, God glorified, the cross of Jesus the attraction, and multitudes of souls rejoicing in the Saviour of men.

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

The question of female drunkenness is one which will soon compel attention. So long as our women generally kept studiously aloof from participation in the bouts which have brought so much misery and disgrace upon the other sex there was always a surety that boys would at least have the stronger example of their mother to keep them, at least in their boyhood and youth, from following the pernicious example of their fathers, brothers, and “chums.” But now that women are daily falling away from this high eminence we say most advisedly, God help the young. A poet says, “Hell has no fury like a woman scorned.” We have never seen such a fury or her type, but we should say hell, among all its bestial troop, has nothing so odiously foul as a woman drunk. In the Lancet the other day a Dr.

Brown asks for a diagnosis on a case of female drunkenness or apoplexy. He thus describes it—"On 5th August, at 8.30 p.m., I saw a woman at her own house. She was lying on the floor of her room occasionally breathing stertorously, both pupils widely dilated, the right most so, the left contracting feebly when the candle was brought, the right totally insensible to light. She was quite unconscious. Her husband said she had been drinking brandy freely for a week. I had attended her frequently for the effects of her drinking bouts, but I had never seen her unconscious before. About twelve o'clock she came round, and in twenty-four hours she was all right." Conceive, my gentle reader, of your mother or sister or companion being found in her room on a beautiful summer evening so steeped in drunkenness, so utterly unconscious, so near the confines of the eternal world as to be on its very verge, and tell me what your thoughts are. For myself, being a man with a very high estimate of the truthfulness and purity of women, I can conceive of nothing so utterly vile and foul, it is blacker than Milton's abhorrent picture of sin at the gates of hell; and I think that women should take fright and shame at the spread of intemperance, and each and all unite to banish drinking from their hearts, from their parties, and from every phase of their life, lest those of them that drink may be one day found grovelling in drunkenness as swinish as Dr. Brown's patient wallowed in, and lest those that meantime maintain their womanly purity amidst the abounding intemperance may be overborne by the dissoluteness which the general corruption of women, through intemperance, at no distant day may bring to pass.

It is the season of holidays, and at no time have we seen or heard of so many moving about on pleasure bent. While we have long been persuaded that we should never, in going off for our holidays, take the "comforts of the Sautmarket," along with us, yet we find that the generality of pleasure-seekers will not stir without them. At the coast or country or continent madame must impress the people of the places she visits with an exact conception of how she lives and dresses at home, and she is continually giving audible expression to her disappointment at missing some one or other of those luxuries to which she was accustomed at her own fireside. Her lord is generally of an opposite disposition. He lays aside his tall hat, stand-up collar, and broad-cloth coat, attires himself in a holiday costume, and takes it easy everywhere. All women are not so stupid nor all men so wise as our types, but certainly most holiday-seekers miss the point of true pleasure when they do not go off for a change of living as well as change of scene. Dwelling in some quiet solitude remote and living on a level with those amongst whom they sojourn, resting, walking, as fancy dictates, roaming the green fields, climbing, boating, and exploring, they would then return to the comfort or, it may be, elegancies of home with a renewed zest for them, and with a memory stored with the pleasures of their country home, which would, when brought forth, avert all the gloom and all the discomfort of city winter life. The saddest spot upon the brightness of the holiday season is the drinking, which so largely detracts from its pleasures. With liberty comes leisure, so to many who leave home in order to obtain a "stock of health" too often return with the seeds of early death, sown, alas, by themselves during the unchecked indulgence which marked their absence. But the trail of the serpent of intemperance is over all portions of our existence, and its poison is corrupting the national vitality to an extent of which very few but the leaders of the temperance reformation have any conception. We pay in diminished enjoyment a heavy penalty for our baneful alcoholic indulgence.

It always affords pleasure to a patriot, and we modestly lay claim to the appellation, to witness the progress of his country in wealth and greatness. The receding commercial depression and the coming prosperous times has been the cause of unbounded satisfaction to us. Hard times are more than privation, they prove a time of extreme danger to the weak who prefer gilded vice and forcible acquisition to the patience and resignation which are the true elements of a virtue sure in the long run to be exalted. But to those who endure, like the bees, the winter trading and manufacturing adversity, there seems rapidly approaching a period of abundance. The Board of Trade returns for July show that there is more than double the expansion in the exports than what is in the imports. The total imports for the month were £33,354,595, which is an increase of 10.5 per cent. over the same month of 1879. The total increase of the seven months of 1880 is 20.3 per cent. Looking at the exports we find that in July they were £20,270,579, an increase over July, 1879, of no less than 22.0 per cent, and for the seven months of this year the increase is 21.3 per cent. Otherwise, the contrast between 1879 and 1880 is even more favourable than these figures show. America, too, is prosperous, and in consequence of her great cotton and wheat harvests she is eager to sell, so that we will have cheaper cotton and cheaper wheat, which means more clothing and more food. If the nation would only know the time of its merciful visitation and utterly root out the liquor traffic there is no conceivable limit that one would desire to put to its advancement in mental, moral, or religious progress short of perfection itself; but, alas, such prosperity to a drunken nation is less of a blessing and more of a curse. It enables it to produce boundless wealth, which it consigns to a bag with holes and ruins thousands of its weak and infatuated members in the process. *

FESTIVE DEMORALISATION.

It is a pity, we think, that social intercourse in our festivities should continue to be disfigured by the absurd old usage of drinking toasts. In nothing do men of good education and repute make themselves so ridiculous as when, at the word of command, they impulsively rise in a body, and with glasses of liquor in their hands, frantically, like so many lunatics, drink the health of some one, following up the ceremony by uproarious shouts and other manifestations of delight, at having done what they consider to be a great and good action. Such is what is called toasting with all the honours. The practice is no doubt ancient. It is identified with national traditions, it is fashionable, and it is acknowledged to be expressive of good feeling. But for all that, it is very irrational, and very much of a sham. Certainly it is an encouragement to waste and intemperance.

In private life, toasting has almost entirely disappeared. A hundred years ago and less, it was rife in the extreme. Half-a-dozen men could not sit down to dinner without drinking toasts. . . . It was part of a young man's education to get familiar with a few toasts, which he could bring out when "called upon" in turn at evening entertainments. At the ripe age of fifty, he had become so hackneyed in toasting as never to be at loss for a hero, or for a sentiment suitable to the character of the company. At the very least, he could give "The rising generation," "All ships at sea," or "May the wings of friendship never lose a feather." . . .

Discountenanced in general society, complimentary toasting holds its ground in public festivities. There the libations are observedly as copious, as provocative of oratorical display, and as much attended with senseless uproar, as ever. Corporation dinners, charity dinners, reception and farewell dinners, are all alike in these respects. Every toast must be prefaced by a drink all round. The quantity of champagne consumed on some occasions is immense. . . .

On this account we venture, with deference, to recommend that an end should be put to all drinking usages whatsoever by general concurrence of feeling. That conspicuous and antiquated usage, toasting at public entertainments, should at all events cease. No doubt, there may be difficulties to overcome. Inveterate prejudices stand in the way, as they always do, when the reform of any kind of abuse is suggested. On the other hand we are inclined to think that many who complain of the tediousness and absurdity of the toasting system at public banquets would be glad to see something more simple and rational substituted. To take the thing quietly, the first step in reform might consist in getting rid of the bellowing toast-master who acts as fagman to the ceremonies. The next and more important step would be to drop "the honours"—that is to say, the blatant shouting, hurraing, clapping of hands, and stamping of feet. Last of all, the practice of wishing instead of drinking healths might be introduced, along with such complimentary remarks as are called for in the circumstances.

Evidently the present usage cannot be continued without invoking the contempt of the classes who are preached to on their intemperate habits; and contempt is a serious obstacle to reform. How those wretched ne'er-do-weels, glad to seize an excuse, must derisively laugh at admonitions to abstain from drink, when they read of a titled chairman at a public festivity saying in a lively manner to a select company:—"Fill your glasses, gentlemen, to the next toast which I have to give—The navy, army, and reserved forces—with all the honours, if you please." And then follow the drinking and boisterous applause. We ask all who have participated in such saturnalia, if they have not, in responding to the toast, felt somewhat ashamed of themselves at the figure which they cut? Grave statesmen, reverend divines, learned professionals, and sound men of business, taking part in a buffoonery which could only be excused in a parcel of children! Independently of this abasement, the participators must, on consideration, feel that they have contributed a very bad example to intemperates, who doubtless make unceremonious remarks on the subject: "Here have we been reprimanded and sent to prison by these magistrates and fine folks for taking a glass, while they swill no end of glasses in drinking toasts at these grand dinners of theirs." The subject is too painful to pursue, and we leave it to others. Surely it would be possible, as we have hinted, to indulge in sentiments of loyalty and personal esteem without anything like Festive Demoralisation.—Chambers' Journal.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE NORTH.

BY MR. W. BLACKWOOD,

Northern District Agent, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

In my last month's letter to you I gave an account of how I found matters in connection with our movement in various parts of the Buchan district and along the coast of Banffshire. I am always delighted to find a number of excellent friends who receive with pleasure information through the Social Reformer regarding the progress of our prohibitory agitation. I have since visited Inverness. You are aware that this is one of the prettiest towns in the Highlands, and that there there are a number of staunch temperance men. What Inverness requires is the removal of her liquor shops, so that the moral order, the social prosperity, and the religious progress of her people may be in harmony with the beauty of her surroundings. I addressed a large open-air meeting in front of the Exchange, and at the close sold eighty Social Reformers. There are three Good Templar Lodges in Inverness and a Temperance Society, and the butchers contribute a strong contingent of reformers, whose ideas in favour of prohibition are clear and pronounced. A number of the ministers of the town are abstainers. All the friends cordially renewed their subscriptions, and many were the good wishes expressed for our continuous success. From Inverness I went to Nairn—the "Brighton of the North." There is a Good Templar Lodge here and a Temperance Society in connection with the Free Church. I had a good meeting in Nairn, and was ably assisted by Mr. C. Mason, one of the east coast missionaries, as well as by a few public-spirited young men, who sung a few hymns to attract an audience. One is glad to see a number of young fellows with a moral backbone in them bravely facing the liquor interest "in the chief places of concourse, in the openings of the gates." This is a kind of moral support which seems entirely wanting on the part of many temperance men. What a fine example our old temperance veterans have shown to us in this as well as in other respects. Where would our local option movement have been to-day had our Torrensens and our Lewises, our M'ullochs, our Patons, and our Brochiehs failed anywhere to assert the people's right to veto the issue of licenses and to prohibit the liquor traffic? We need stalwart men still upon the high places of the field who will press this thought home to the hearts and consciences of the people. Victory will be secured just as we are earnest in this matter. Forres was the next place I visited. We have a number of excellent friends in Forres. The Good Templars and the U.T.A.'s are, I am sorry to write, in a state of great weakness. There is, however, an effort to be made to form a Total Abstinence Society. All that is required in Forres is just a little united action. Our friend, Mr. Naughty, took the chair at my open-air meeting, and we had a good audience. I must visit Forres again before our annual meetings. My next place was Elgin, where I had an open-air meeting, with our friend, Mr. R. Stewart, in the chair. I believe there are two Good Templar Lodges in Elgin and a Lodge of the U.T.A.'s, also a Temperance Association. The statement was made at the meeting that Elgin had a drink-shop to every twelve electors—a heavy burden to carry. It is a wonder that they should manifest patience under the load. I like to go to Elgin, and I hope our Association will always merit the confidence of the good friends there. I had a good open-air meeting at Lossiemouth, but as the fishing was being prosecuted with vigour I left with the intention of going back in September. There is a Good Templar Lodge at Lossiemouth, which has recently been resuscitated and has done good work. May it prove a blessing to the town. At Fife-Keith and Keith I had capital meetings. Our esteemed friends, Messrs. Cunningham and Brown, gave their assistance and success attended our efforts. There is a Temperance Society in Keith, but there is considerable room for development on the lines of progress. Keith is situated in Banffshire, and if I am correctly informed there are thirteen or fourteen distilleries in that county. The whiskymen are kings in Kirk and State, so that our friends have a hard battle to fight with intemperance. Huntly is situated in West Aberdeenshire and occupies a front place in the temperance movement. The Good Templar Lodge is healthy. I think all the ministers are abstainers. Some of the leading townsmen are in warm sympathy with abstinence and local option. I addressed a meeting in Huntly Square, a splendid place for a gathering, and gave away a number of tracts entitled "Prohibition is worth working for." This is a first-rate tract, worthy of a large circulation. My meeting was well attended. A series of open-air meetings have taken place in Aberdeen under the joint auspices of the Aberdeen Temperance Society and the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. These have been agreeable meetings and have been well attended. I may say that since I came to Aberdeen I have found Mr. Matthew Edwards, the esteemed Secretary of the Aberdeen Temperance Society, a very hearty co-worker in the movement. The more one sees of the demoralising effects of drink, and the eager rush of men to secure licenses to sell it, and the more one reflects on the cunning manoeuvres of property-holders to get licenses attached to their houses, the greater the necessity appears for having the law altered in relation to this nefarious business. Legislation is the vital point in the temperance movement. The traders in liquor dread nothing so much as this. We may be sure we are right when we receive their bitter hostility and opposition.

PUBLIC PRESS.

Show us the man who sells drink and the man who drinks them, and we will show you men whose whole life and influence are bad.

The drink traffic and its blighting results go hand in hand with infidelity and every debasing and abhorrent evil and wrong-doing in society.

Let dissolution come when it will, it can do the Christian no harm, for it will be but a passage out of a prison into a palace—out of a sea of troubles into a haven of rest—out of a crowd of enemies into an innumerable company of true, loving, and faithful friends—out of shame, reproach, and contempt, into exceeding great and eternal glory. What will dissolution mean to the drinker who steepes his senses in alcoholic forgetfulness?

The poor drunkard does not chiefly support the public house, he is too poverty-stricken to do it. The total abstainer does not support them at all. "The moderate drinker" is the man that keeps them in prosperity. If it were not for the support of this class, the traffic in strong drink would soon cease to exist. The old drunkards would die out or reform. It is only out of a moderate drinker you can find grist for the publican's mill, and recruits for the great drunken army that, like locusts, spread misery over the land. The moderate drinker is the fountain of intemperance.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER AT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.—We could not help remarking how frequently the drink question cropped up among these petitions. Prayer on behalf of the victims of the drink is well, but it does seem something like a solemn mockery for the Christians of England to be continually crying to God to deliver their country from an evil from which they can very well deliver themselves if they choose. As long as our social customs are what they are, and as long as we are content to have places of public temptation to this sin in every street and at every street corner, we do not think God will interfere with the natural sequence of cause and effect in order to relieve us from the consequences of our apathy and contributory guilt.—Christian.

DRINK A GREAT ENEMY OF LIFE.—I am not going away from my subject, or attempting to ride a hobby, when I say, that of all causes producing weakness, there is not in this country a greater or worse than intemperance. I am speaking from the physiological platform, and not as the advocate of teetotalism, or any other "ism" whatever. No one who has given attention to the subject is unaware that of the causes of weakness in this country, intemperance may not unreasonably be said to equal all the rest put together. I believe that drinking strong drinks, within even what are known as the bounds of moderation, produces a weakened condition of the body that makes it less able to perform its normal amount of work, and more likely to succumb, not only under extraordinary pressure, but under the ordinary pressure of business life. We must take care that nothing is put into our bodies that will lessen their vigour, or make them less able to perform their functions. It has been calculated that 100,000 lives are lost in this country every year through intemperance. I suppose the lowest calculation that would be made would be that that at least 50,000 are lost, though I do not think the higher estimate at all exaggerated. But take this lower estimate; what an immense sacrifice of life it is! If we lost 50,000 men in a campaign, we should think we had lost a tremendous number, and yet we lose more than that every year through this single vice! You cannot wonder that some people are greatly incensed against intemperance, and are anxious to bring it to an end by any available means. Nor can you blame this exasperation. Anything that will help us to prevent this immense yearly sacrifice of life is warrantable, and more than warrantable, within the limits of sound sense and prudence.

Now, young men, let me say very deliberately, that I do not think any of you need strong drink. There might, perhaps, be a good case made out in some circumstances for its medicinal use, and it is prescribed by some physicians in the weakness of old age. But I have not got old men here; and if I had, I would not say anything to encourage them to drink. But for us, young men, there is no excuse whatever. We certainly do not need alcohol.

I sometimes fear that the attention bestowed, wisely and necessarily enough, on the external causes of disease, may throw altogether into shadow the necessity of endeavouring to obviate the internal. There are two ways of saving the weak. Either you may shelter them from the cold blast, or you may make them strong enough to face it without fear. We cannot afford to neglect either method; and as individuals the latter is more within our own control. By avoiding all well known causes of debility; by rational and reasonable precautions in eating and drinking; by avoiding equally over-fatigue and indolence; by cheerfulness, and obedience to those who are truly our superiors, we can do much to make "our days long upon the land."—"Studies in Life," by Dr. Paterson.

CHAPTER II.

Dinner was served without delay. Our hero had been enabled to improve his toilet, and as he dressed himself there was no exultation visible at his good luck. He seemed to be in no way elated at his good fortune, and felt more the loss of his pipe than the finding of himself so transformed. He looked well; and though he was not able to obliterate the marks of dissipation evident in his features, he softened them so as to render them less disagreeable. His manners were those of one accustomed to good society, and when he sat down at table, all were at once at ease in each other's presence. The dinner was excellent, but no liquors, save water, were on the table. Our hero bore the privation without flinching. There was no reference during dinner to the cause of the mishap, nor to the son. With his host, our hero was at once at home. He showed considerable knowledge of country life, of farming, of stock, of markets, and thoroughly enlisted the eager interest of Mr. Vernon. Dora paid him marked attention, and he was evidently at pains to be worthy of it. Mrs. Vernon was an excellent listener, and perhaps as excellent an observer. Dinner over, the ladies retired, and the gentlemen were left for some time to themselves.

"May I ask how the accident occurred to which I am indebted for the present pleasure?"

"Yes, certainly," said Mr. Vernon, "but one has no heart to enter upon painful details."

He then told the old story of an only son, well and carefully brought up, going to college, and then going astray; of dark rumours, of enormous bills, of rustication, and so forth; of coming home under the mastery of evil habits and an apparent powerlessness, let us say, rather than an unwillingness to reform. That day he had gone into Woodgreen, and while Dora was shopping he had met some of his boon companions, had merely a glass or two, took the reins from the coachman, lost all control over the horses, resented the interference of Jenkins, who, however, snatched the reins just as his young master fell, but, in the attempt to save both, he also fell, and the horses, feeling themselves at liberty, darted off, with the result with which our readers are acquainted.

By the time he reached the end of his short narrative, Mr. Vernon was visibly affected. His voice trembled, tears filled his eyes, and his features were overcast with sorrow.

"I owe you a deep debt of gratitude indeed, and shall have a sincere pleasure in repaying to the best of my ability. So I hope you will be my guest for some time at least. It may be the better for all of us."

When they joined the ladies at tea, it was evident that they were aware that Mr. Vernon had explained the reason of the alarming accident which had taken place, and there was on the part of Dora an eager inquiring glance at the face of the guest to learn the impression the disagreeable communication had made upon him. Apparently, if not satisfied, she was pleased to find that there was nothing in his returning look to create any anxiety, and the evening wore away in a most agreeable manner.

As they parted for the night, Mr. Vernon said, "I am quite at leisure to-morrow, and after breakfast we will have a few hours to look over my home farm, when no doubt your observations will be of great value to me. Good night."

Once more in the room allotted to him, our hero—whom we may at once call Harry Milbank—looked quite another man to what he did when he arrived at the Grange. Then he thought only of his hardships, of his mean appearance, of securing some paltry recompense; but now other feelings possessed him. He had been admitted freely to this mansion, received on an equality with its owner, not merely for one night, but for sometime. Pacing backwards and forwards, he struck his hands often together, as if to clench some resolution, or as if he had decided on some important course of action. His eyes sparkled, his lips were compressed, and a certain elation marked his demeanour. He could hardly contain himself. But at length he spoke.

"So, Harry, you are once more in clover. After being down so far that surrender appeared to be inevitable, you are happily in this superbly-furnished mansion—feted at its hospitable table, invited to stay under its kindly roof, and trusted as a welcome guest. At a bound you have leaped from pinching vagrancy to affluent hospitality. It is yet scarcely half a day since footsore and weary you were plodding along the king's highway a most miserable wretch, and yet here you are in circumstances to which you have been a stranger for years. It must be a dream. Ah, would it were! But it is not a dream, for there lie the threadbare clothes you have so lately put off, and which, ere the sun sets to-morrow, you may have to put on. Never! Rather than do that, I shall discover myself to Mr. Vernon. I feel new thoughts rising within me, to the exclusion of those which have swayed me too long; the buried aspirations of years are once more making themselves felt, as if they were coming out of the pit into which I have thrown myself and them. My share in the escape of Dora Vernon shall be the upward turning-point in my career; and if I do not regain all I surrendered, I at least shall not need to blush for my condition. I have yet youth and energy sufficient to redeem the past and win back my reputation. I cannot see my way clear. I may be after all under the gush of momentary feeling. Ah, I had better go to sleep. To-morrow will shape my destiny, but not downwards—oh, no, not downwards."

He slept. His slumbers were profound and prolonged. Seldom these many years had he enjoyed such comfort. No dreams disturbed his repose. The system, estranged from ease for so many years, wholly surrendered itself to the pleasure of the moment, and it was not till the morning was far advanced that Milbank awoke. At first he was confused. How came he to be in such a luxurious bed, a carpeted room, and within a room with a curtained window? Recollection soon revived all the new-found circumstances, and for many minutes he surveyed the room and what of its outward surroundings he saw from the window. It was a guest chamber, to be expected in such a wealthy dwelling-place. Every appointment in it was in the best of taste, and to the guest that had a good conscience, rest in it was more than recovery from fatigue—it was a luxury. Somewhat reluctantly he arose; gratefully he availed himself of the means of making a gentlemanly toilette; thankfully he surveyed himself in the mirror; and then, at the summons of the gong, went down stairs. Would young Vernon appear? If so, there would be some painful disclosures. If he did not, there might be another day of pleasure; and who could tell what might occur to lengthen, even for the day beyond the present, his stay at the Grange. To his great relief, no one was there. He had scarcely begun his survey of the grounds from the window, when Mr. and Mrs. Vernon entered the room, and, with great heartiness, exchanged the compliments of the day. As they were sitting down, Miss Vernon stole in. After being fondly caressed and kissed by her parents, she shook hands with Mr. Milbank, saying as she did so—

"You must not think me a lie-a-bed, Mr. Milbank. I rise early, and have been very busy all the morning, although (turning to her father) I cannot say that I have been at all successful."

During the meal, which was accompanied with the liveliest conversation, Milbank seemed deeply touched. Here he was at table with a gentleman and his family, to all of whom he was a perfect stranger, and with nothing to recommend him but the service he had rendered to Miss Vernon. He might have been sent to the servants' hall, but instead of that, they had treated him with the greatest hospitality and kindness. He felt that he must exert himself to keep in the good grace of all; and to an observer it would have been difficult to think of Milbank as being other than an old and valued friend of the family. Towards the close, a servant entered with a tray, on which were letters, documents, newspapers, which were carefully put on the sideboard.

"I hope, Mr. Vernon, I am not keeping you from the perusal of your letters?"

"I am glad to be able to tell you that you are not. I never permit myself to read my letters or papers at breakfast. I think it disturbs the pleasure of those present, and has a hurtful effect on the morning meal. When I was at college, a chum of mine used to tell, with much gusto, how his landlady always sent in letters before breakfast to her boarders, and was overheard once remarking to her servant girl, 'It makes a great deal in the course of a year, my dear, as it takes the keen edge off their stomachs.'"

A hearty laugh passed round the table at the expense of the shrewd lodging mistress. Breakfast over, Mr. Vernon informed his guest that family worship was to commence, and that if he felt at liberty to join them, all would be glad. Milbank having acquiesced, the servants assembled, and the singularly brief and simple service began. A portion of a hymn was given out, when one of the maid servants led the music, the singing being accompanied by Miss Vernon on the harmonium. A chapter was then read, annotations by Mr. Vernon, making it peculiarly interesting; and then a brief but touching prayer by the master, thankful, supplicative, and intercessory, was offered. Twice did Mr. Vernon's voice quiver—once when asking God to melt the hard heart and gently rebuke the forward and perverse; and again when he invoked heaven's choicest blessings on the stranger who was sojourning with them. Milbank never had so felt the power of Christian influence till that morning, and he anew resolved that he would embark upon the voyage to heaven. The recollections of early piety, fatherly counsel, womanly entreaty, rose before him, as if to upbraid; but heavenly mercy breathed upon them, and changed them into incentives to a new and better life.

The Vernons at length turned to the postal tray. There was a careful scrutiny of the envelopes, and many fortunate guesses made of the writers. Milbank was courteously offered the morning paper, and withdrew to the window recess to read it at his leisure. There he saw the adventure of the day before duly set forth in all the gorgeous vocabulary of the provincial paragraphist. He could not forbear smiling at the record of his own prowess; but what was the most gratifying to him, was the real unaffected terms in which Miss Vernon was referred to, and the vigorous castigation given to her brother's obstinacy. Looking over the paper, his eye fell on the following advertisement:—"Left his home, Henry Estcourt, younger of Lea. He is entreated to return home, when every reparation will be made to him. Any of his friends knowing of his whereabouts will kindly communicate with Mr. Estcourt, the Lea, Rockshire. A reward of £100 will be paid to any who can give information leading to his discovery, or produce indubitable proof that he is no more."

"Why, how absorbed you are, Mr. Milbank. I was asking you if there was anything remarkable in the papers, but I think you are finding more pleasure communing with your own thoughts."

"I beg your pardon, Miss Vernon, I was absorbed. There are often so many things in a newspaper that impress you which are not new. They have their rootlets in the past."

"That's quite true. Now I never take the morning paper but I always read one special advertisement first—the one inserted by a friend of my father's, Mr. Estcourt of the Lea. They were college chums, but my father has been long abroad, and was not aware of the distress into which Mr. Estcourt has fallen through the disappearance of his younger son Henry. Mr. Estcourt writes yesterday to say that he is to see my father in London next month, and that he has heard no news whatever of his son."

"Ah, a young scapegrace, I suppose?"

"No, I don't think that altogether; but to tell you the truth, it is all a mystery. It has often been debated. I have always taken young Estcourt's side, because I have never seen anything said against him which could justify the harsh measures taken against him at home. My defence is none of the best, because I am, like all but a few, outside the real facts of the case; however my father admits that I make my defence go a long way. I am sure that it would give me great pleasure if I could in any way be the means of restoring Mr. Estcourt to his family."

"If Mr. Estcourt ever comes to know of your interest in his welfare, he will not require other inducement to return."

"Ah, yes, if he knew. But surely, Mr. Milbank, he must have sometimes seen the advertisement; and if so, don't you think that he is too stubborn-hearted not to give way to such a yearning desire for his return as that advertisement seems to show. If you'll allow me, I will point you to the advertisement. Ah, here it is now, just read it over. There, does not that breathe the essence of reconciliation?"

"Yes, it does. I believe, Miss Vernon, that you have already half enlisted me on your side, if my opinion was worthy of consideration."

"Oh, you have no idea how very much my father is pleased with you. You are accustomed to good society, are brave, can drive splendidly, and know much of country matters. Unless you are very much hurried, you must stay with us for a few days, and interest and instruct us. You are to go over part of the estate with my father before dinner, as he would like to have your opinion upon some of his most recent improvements. We shall all meet at dinner. I am off to see how my brother is. Dr. Fletcher assures us that, beyond a severe shake to his system, he has sustained no injury, and may be up in a few days. He will be glad to thank you for preserving his sister."

In another room lay Wentworth Vernon in anything but a subdued spirit. It was not the body that was tortured, it was the mind. That he should have furnished a paragraph for the papers, in which his conduct was so severely reflected upon, was maddening. If he was only within arm's length of the reporter, he would horsewhip him to within less than an inch of his life for his insolence. There's Jenkins, too; what the devil had he to do with meddling with his taking the reins; and then there was a new volley of curses, not loud but deep, alternating with feelings of bodily pain,

There by a table, with liniments and drugs and so forth, was a decanter, which he insisted, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Dr. Fletcher and the pleadings of his sister, should be there, and of which oftener than of anything else he availed himself. After being apparently asleep for some little time, he awoke, and demanded some liquor.

"Where's Jones? Send him here at once."

"Yes, sir; I think that he is to take Jenkins' place for the next few days."

"Is he? They had better ask me first. Send him here."

In a few minutes Jones made his appearance in no very amiable humour. When the patient saw him, he said—

"Where have you been, sir? Do you think that I have broken my neck, that you have so unceremoniously cut my service? I say, where have you been?"

"Nowhere. I have never been a moment off duty. As you were to be kept quiet for a day or two, I refrained from intruding on your privacy."

"Ha, ha; refrained from intruding on your privacy. That's devilish good from a cheeky fellow like you. Just you stow your gammon the next time you are sent for, and be within call whenever I want you."

"I heard it said this morning that master was to ask you for me for two or three days till Jenkins was able to go on duty. The man that saved Miss Vernon from accident is to stay a day or two, and I would be a useful substitute for Jenkins."

"The devil, he is. Why didn't the governor throw a crown to him and let him go?"

"He drove the carriage home, and is not a common tramp. He is a capital driver, an excellent judge of horse flesh, and the butler says he has the manners of a gentleman."

"Fiddlestick!"

"Not so much of that as you think, sir. I think that there will be a blow-up when you meet."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that he is not the chap he seems, by a long way."

"Who the deuce is he?"

"If you would allow me to lift you up, so that you could look into the courtyard, you can see for yourself."

"Why, it's that insolent scoundrel Milbank—curse him. Does he know you?"

"He hasn't said, and he doesn't look like it yet."

POETRY.

TILL THE ECHO DIED AWAY.

I SAW them meet 'mid the noon-day sun,
Blythe as birds in their sylvan bowers;
Gaily they roamed hand lock'd in hand,
The livelong day 'mid trees and flowers,

I watched them part when evening fell,
And the sun on the hill tops lay,
She listened with love to his footsteps' sound,
'Till the echo died away.

I thought of the time when somebody came
To me at the closing of day,
When I used to list to his footsteps' sound
Till the echo died away.

It struck the tenderest chord of my heart
Awaking to life the dear old strain;
But it murmur'd only, in wailing sounds,
As if joy had changed to grief and pain.

Sometimes a note that filled me with bliss
Fell soft on my listening ear;
My poor heart leapt with a mad delight,
Though my eye grew dim with a tear.

Silent I sat till night came and went,
And the day dawned pale and grey—
Till the weary world resum'd its toil,
And the echo died away.

THE FUNDS.

* * * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1880.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, SEPTEMBER, 1880.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS, 1880.

The Executive have the pleasure to announce that the Twenty-second Annual Meeting of this Association will, D.V., take place at Glasgow on Tuesday, 28th current.

THE ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING

Will take place in the CHRISTIAN INSTITUTE, 70 Bothwell Street, Glasgow, at 11 A.M.—Treasurer Hamilton, J.P., President of the Association, in the chair. The Annual Reports will be submitted, office-bearers elected in room of those retiring, and business of an important nature pass under deliberation. Societies in connection with the Association will please intimate early to the Secretary the name (or names) of the Delegate appointed to represent them at this and the other meetings.

THE ANNUAL TEA MEETING

Will be held in the CITY HALL SALOON, Candleriggs. Tea on the table at four o'clock precisely. Provost Campbell, Greenock, will preside. Addresses will be delivered by representatives and delegates from various parts of the country. Tickets 1s. each, early application for which will facilitate the arrangements of the Committee and prevent disappointment to intending visitors.

THE ANNUAL PUBLIC MEETING

Will take place in the CITY HALL in the evening at 7.30. The Executive are glad to be able thus early to announce the following list of speakers:—

W. SHEPHERD ALLEN, Esq., M.P., Newcastle-under-Lyde.

W. S. CAINE, M.P., Esq., Scarborough.

J. DICK PEDDIE, Esq., M.P., Kilmarnock Burghs.

B. WHITWORTH, Esq., M.P., Drogheda.

Rev. THOMAS EVANS, Merthyr Tydvil.

Rev. J. M. SLOAN, M.A., Glasgow.

R. T. MIDDLETON, Esq., M.P., Glasgow, will preside.

Other speakers expected will be afterwards announced.

The Executive having in view the satisfactory results of the general election, the gratifying division on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution, and the necessity of vigorous Parliamentary action in the next session of Parliament, anticipate a very large gathering of members, delegates, and friends at the approaching meetings.

R. MACKAY, Secy.

The attention of our readers is requested to extracts from an article against toast-drinking, taken from an article on that subject which recently appeared in Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, and which will be found, by permission, on page 87 in our present issue. It is really time we were getting less heathenish and barbarous in our social observances and were showing the courage required to banish intemperance from our hearts, our homes, and our country.

Dr. Tanner has been and done it. He has shown that under extremely favourable circumstances a person can subsist without solid food for six long weeks. He may dispel a very hurtful superstition which lurks in the mind of too many of us that if you take plenty of food no fear of you. Some people are day by day, summer and winter, loading their stomach with large quantities of solid food whether the season or the state of the eater require it. They have a keen horror of fasting and fully believe that were they to miss one meal grievous consequences would follow. They may gather a better notion of eating from Dr. Tanner's fasting and learn to proportion the amount of food they consume to the season and the healthy wants of their organism. Of the gluttony that followed the fast we won't venture to treat, it was disgusting. Alcoholic baths and after the fast a plentiful indulgence in liquors preclude us from drawing any temperance lesson from the experiment. In these circumstances we are not sorry to learn that it has been set down as of no scientific value.

Once more Mr. Bernard, the manager of the Gaiety Theatre, Glasgow, has received from a bench of Glasgow Justices permission to deal in intoxicating liquors within his theatre. Mr. Bernard is no doubt a worthy man and an indefatigable caterer for the public amusement, but as licensed to deal in alcoholic liquors he is not to be trusted. He appeared deeply hurt that in Glasgow alone he should have to appear year after year before a court of Licensing Justices to get a player and publican's license. But this is the law, a law framed in the interests of society. He set up a claim for exemption from his doubtful position on the ground that the English Justices gave their license empowering him to deal in liquor, to his clerk. But their neglect of duty should furnish no example to Glasgow J.P.'s. All this humiliating procedure should, we think, make Mr. Bernard, who is by no means obtuse, reflect, and as a consequence of such reflection impel him to have done with a branch of business which brands all engaged in it with a want of respectability. We were glad to find by the vote that the minority against his having a publican license in connection with his theatre is growing, and are hopeful that in a year or two Mr. Bernard may, through his enforced exclusion from the drink trade, go out and in amongst us without implied reproach on his character.

LICENSING BOARDS.

II.

IN our last issue we set forth, for the information and consideration of our readers, the various Licensing Board schemes which have been suggested as the best solution of the drink problem. This, in our opinion, was the most effective way of showing how extremely inadequate such schemes are for the suppression of the liquor traffic. There is nothing final about them. They do not even profess finality, but as it were simply offer themselves as an addition to the 470 Acts of Parliament which have been passed at one time or other for the restriction or regulation of the liquor traffic, and now only encumber our Statute-book. We exhibited a want of sympathy with them as we described them, and we will now show that our want of approval is at least reasonable and such as might be expected from a searching investigation of the relation in which they stand to the suppression of all traffic in alcoholic liquors.

On the very threshold of the temperance reformation temperance reformers perceived that the evils of alcoholic intemperance required a special education to dislodge the pernicious misconceptions on the nature of the drink which unhappily prevailed regarding it, and combined their efforts to resist successfully the oppressive and almost irresistible drinking usages. They also felt that the liquor traffic was one of the most potent and tyrannical of the factors that produced the abounding intemperance. They therefore established a propaganda for the diffusion of intelligence which enlightened the public mind on the nature and powers of strong drink; silenced popular prejudice against total abstinence; and even "taught science to physiologists." They instituted societies, which proved a barrier against the inroads of the drinking customs, and enabled millions to show conclusively by their lives the uselessness of alcoholic liquors either as food, fuel, or force. They also formed themselves into political organisations, which have called forth an enlightened public opinion against the existence of all traffic in alcoholic liquors, and have so effectually directed that opinion in favour of the suppression of the liquor traffic by the votes of the ratepayers immediately and injuriously affected by it, that it appears as if it were only yesterday since the British Parliament had affirmed the principle contended for, and had promised to deal with the liquor traffic on the very lines on which these staunch temperance reformers had so often and so earnestly declared that effective and final legislation on the liquor traffic must be based.

From the first there was no concealment regarding their aims. They advocated entire abstinence from intoxicating drinks on the ground that they were poisonous, disturbing by their noxious qualities the healthy action of the human system in proportion to the quantity taken, and they have never swerved from this doctrine. On this very ground they have combined as citizens, and with citizens, to secure the passage of a law declaring traffic in such deadly beverages illegal, and enabling ratepayers to exclude it from their localities. They have appealed this matter to the country, and in doing so have successfully met all the assaults inspired by appetite, custom, and the traffic. The views they hold on the drink and the traffic have generally been admitted as sound but wholly impracticable. This latter objection has been met by facts. Landlords and laws have amply demonstrated the practicability of legal suppression, and the Canadian people are at this hour in the enjoyment of a law which almost exactly reflects the legislation at which they aim.

At this supreme moment of the triumph of our principle and the solid progress of our legislative policy, we are met with suggestions from within and from without the temperance camp. It is suggested that Licensing Boards are the most feasible and effective means of dealing with the liquor traffic on the lines of local option. These have been ushered before our notice as Local Option Boards, but though the voice is the voice of Jacob, the hands are certainly those of Esau. They profess to meet all the claims of local option, while avowedly non-suppressive! In reality, however, they are merely new centres for the administration of the licensing laws. Now, this implies licensing, and licensing implies the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors, very much more limited than now it may be, but still, within the narrowest possible limits, a sale and consumption dangerous to the welfare of all who may be tempted to take advantage of it, and consequently utterly alien to the truths and aims of the great temperance reformation.

Now, the ground on which such a suggested system of administration is based cannot be prohibition but restriction and regulation, and by whomsoever enforced, these have never gone and never can go to the root of the evil. We have had centuries of their sway, have got pious and wicked men licensed to deal in these drugs, and found them as injurious to society when dispensed by the one as by the other; have licensed their sale in the low tavern as well as in the gilded gin-palace, with the result that the latter is more seductive and dangerous than the other; have at one time permitted their sale a double round of the clock all days of the week, and at another only during fifteen hours on the six lawful days of the week, and still, curtail the traffic as we may, it has ever played dreadful havoc with the most of those that used the poison which it dispensed. Under all circumstances except those of prohibition, the traffic has mocked regulation and defied control, and at this present moment not one single instance can be adduced to show that it has been carried on, or can be carried on, without doing evil to those who buy. And how could it be otherwise? The licensing system aims at rendering the sale of alcoholic beverages harmless, or at least tolerable, and it does so by protecting the vendor rather than his victim. It aims to furnish a temperate supply of liquor, yet it has never been able to prevent the successful inducements to drinking on the part of the seller nor the grossest indulgence on the part of the buyer. The very fact that it is restricted to those who are licensed is proof that it cannot be controlled and should therefore be suppressed. The problem is to reconcile its existence with the safety and welfare of society, and yet it has never been found possible to bring about such a reconciliation. The benefits with which foolish people credit the licensing system are due entirely to prohibition, partial, we admit. In the presence of such prohibition, the traffic is a sleeping adder; when it is relaxed, it shows the venom and the activity of the folded snake. Under license it has for hundreds of years dispensed a liquor that has degraded character, impaired the vigour, diminished the energy, and shattered the nerves of the drinker; filled prisons, penitentiaries, and poorhouses with inmates, and inflicted upon its unfortunate victims an infinity of evil for which there is no human compensation, and hardly a human cure.

This licensing system has been administered by a body of men of reputation in all ages and under a variety of circumstances—by landlords in virtue of a commission conferred by Royalty, and by magistrates in virtue of their election to municipal office by their fellow-citizens; in short, by the wisest and best of men. At once the Acts were so stringently enforced that only 40 licenses were granted in London, 8 in York, 6 in Bristol, 3 in Westminster, 2 in the other towns; while in the villages none were allowed. At other times the bench was so generous that the free grant of a license to all was the rule. This has had to be said of every attempt by licensing authorities to administer the license law in the interests of society, that their efforts have been followed by a total and disheartening failure. We do not wish to say one harsh word about magistrates or justices of the peace, but this we cannot with justice withhold, that they have been, with a few noble exceptions, too accessible to influences derogatory to their position, and their own conduct on the bench has not seldom invited the severest condemnation of the community. But for the vigilance of our temperance organizations, and in combination with Christian men, our streets might have been overrun with public houses. None who have ever attempted to reform the licensing system have been able to boast of success, and it is an incontrovertible fact that many justices of the peace have abandoned all attempts in this direction in despair.

Notwithstanding the confessed failure of the licensing system many of our friends would look upon a trial of a licensing board with approval. They desire a constituted authority to deal with the liquor traffic, as a school board deals with education. They forget that we in Scotland have such a board at the present moment; but to this they say, "Ah, the board we would see established would have simply licenses to attend to and nothing else." So much the worse for such a system. The answer given implies that the business of the board would be of some magnitude, and this means considerable demoralisation through drink. There is no analogy between a school board and a licensing board. The one is required to supervise those in charge of the development and training of the mental faculties of the young, the other would mainly have to keep in check those who ministered to the baser passions of the people. In the one case we look after teachers, who are as necessary to the progress of society as the pastor, in the other we would have to look after men who were debauching society by selling its members a deadly and seductive drug. Every child is born in a state of ignorance and must be trained; drunkards are the pests and dangerous results of a system which is preventable and which undoes in many cases the efforts of the teacher and the mother. In the case of ignorance administration is demanded, in the case of liquor selling suppression is required. In Roman shows the whole audience doomed the wretch that displeased them to death by turning down their thumbs. Would it have been better done if they had remitted it to a board of their number? We want a verdict only and not control, we want the people of themselves and for themselves to declare that all traffic in alcoholic liquors shall cease, we do not want them to perpetuate it under a new name and, from the nature of the case, by an inefficient administration. They know better than any one whether the liquor traffic is their friend or their foe; to their deliberative judgment, then, let the fate of that traffic be consigned. Those favouring this scheme have surely never thought of the constitution of such a board. One would think that they mean to get a body of men superior to all that ever had to do with licensing, and that none but those having an inveterate aversion to the drink traffic would be elected to serve upon it. This expectation is just as vain as to expect a permanent course of action from a fluctuating body. The board will not only change in personnel but fluctuate in policy, just as the public electors are indolent or patriotic. Then there will be the trouble of triennial elections, the expenses of palatial offices, an array of officials, inspectors, and informers, entailing not only a charge on the rates but much red-tape patronage, and consequent demoralisation. No true temperance reformer could with reason prefer such a scheme to the one asking the ratepayers to register their opinion on the existence or extinction of the traffic, and we are confident that, as a final means of dealing with the evil, it will not gain the approval of the community. It is only a new phase of an old and unsatisfactory policy, and notwithstanding the bait thrown of its yielding contributions to the rates, we await with confidence the moment not far distant when the country will demand instant and permanent relief from the menaces and the burdens of the drink interest.

All temperance reformers eager to get at the root of the evil will adhere the more firmly to the policy of the past—the suppression of the liquor traffic. Averse to licensing in any form, they will continue to support the principle embodied in the local option resolution so lately adopted by the House of Commons. The traffic stands before the country as antagonistic to its best interests, and Parliament is pledged to deal with it on the lines laid down by prohibitionists. Let these stand firm, decided upon not resting satisfied until invested with adequate power to rid themselves of a system which has never yielded benefit to any but the trader, and is the most manifest source of public disorder and mischief in the country.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE LOCAL OPTION VICTORY.

A WELL-ATTENDED social meeting, under the auspices of the South-Eastern District of the Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, was held in the Temperance Hall, Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, on Saturday, 24th July, to commemorate the passing of the Local Option resolution in the House of Commons, and to consider the present position of the prohibitory movement in Scotland. Rev. Dr. Adamson presided, and amongst those present were—Revs. M. Rose, T. Parr, and T. B. Johnstone, Edinburgh; Dr. A. G. Miller; Councillor Scott, Leith; Messrs. Samuel Neil, A. D. Mackenzie, Cumberland Hill, James Coutts, James Watson, and J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh; R. Stevenson, Glasgow; R. Blair, Lasswade; William Laurie, Portobello; D. Mackay, Liberton; James Rae, Falkirk; G. Barclay, Kirkliston; A. Bennet, Dysart; and M'Intyre, Winchburgh; Mrs. Wellstood, Edinburgh, &c.

The CHAIRMAN referred at length to the work which the deputations from their association, of which he was a member, had done in interviewing the Scotch representatives in Parliament on the subject of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option resolution. For the result of the division on the resolution they were very much indebted to the present Government. He contrasted the manner in which the deputation had been received by Sir William Harcourt, the Home Secretary, with the manner the previous Home Secretary, Mr. Cross, received similar deputations. The present Home Secretary was a very different man from the late occupant of that office. He first heard what the deputation from the publicans had to say, and then heard our deputation, listening most attentively to all they said, and expressing his opinion that, were the people of Scotland to show unanimity in their ranks, he had no doubt that it would make a favourable impression on the Government. There was no doubt, continued Dr. Adamson, that were the present Government to continue in power they must very soon deal with this subject. The Scottish members, the Chairman said, were all right, but he was sorry that the member for Mid-Lothian did not go into the lobby with the majority. The right hon. gentleman's speech was very much in their favour. The result of the division was that they had got the Local Option resolution, but they must now think what they were to do next. They had got on the right line. They had got their principle recognised by Parliament. They must now keep on the right line, and keep progressing. They must one and all unite in an entire mass, and devise some means for the carrying out of this resolution, and putting it into practical working.

Mr. J. B. LAWSON, solicitor, said he was at one with them all on the local option question, though he leaned more to the opposite side of politics from Mr. Waterston. He would say, however, that whatever were the views of the leaders of the Conservative party in the House of Commons, there were many men in that party who, if they were convinced that Sir Wilfrid Lawson was right—and many of them were—they would throw overboard party feelings.

Mr. BLAIR, Lasswade, expressed his great pleasure at the passing of the Local Option resolution.

Addresses were afterwards delivered by Messrs. Hill, Bone, Ramsay, Stevenson, Anderson, Nisbet, Watson, Waterston, Steel, and M'Kenzie.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. Bone, seconded by Mr. D. Ramsay, was agreed to:—"That this meeting is of opinion that a national conference should be called, in order to consider what steps should be taken to carry out Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution to a practical issue." Another resolution, moved by Mr. A. D. M'Kenzie, seconded by Rev. J. B. Lawson, was also agreed to. It was in the following terms:—"In view of the approval by the House of Commons of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option resolution, this meeting is of opinion that temperance reformers should more than ever determine to press on the public the poisonous nature of all alcoholic drinks, and the moral and physical evils propagated by the liquor traffic, and the desirability of its abolition."

On the motion of the Rev. M. Rose, a hearty vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. J. H. Waterston for his arduous labours on behalf of the prohibitory movement, and for convening the present meeting. Mr. Mackenzie moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, when the meeting, which was a most enjoyable one, terminated. —Daily Review (abridged).

The British Medical Association have resolved that in future the price of the dinner ticket shall not include a charge for wine.

The Baptist's Total Abstinence Association are desirous, should the necessary funds be forthcoming, of engaging a travelling secretary or agent.

The Free Methodist Assembly last month resolved upon the formation of a Connectional Temperance League upon the basis of total abstinence.

The Earl of Derby has sent a contribution of twenty guineas to the London Temperance Hospital as a mark of his interest in the object of the institution.

The Glasgow Bakers' Gospel and Temperance Society had their second annual trip to Hamilton Palace one day last month. About 280 sat down to tea in the grounds.

Captain Brochie, who is in his 74th year, ascended Ben Nevis 4358 feet high, on Friday, the 13th ult. Long life to him; for few have used their past life to better purpose.

It is said that the Australian cricketers at present on a visit to this country are all, or nearly all, abstainers. Has this fact no connection with their success with the willow?

It is said that the Lord-Advocate intends bringing in a bill for authorising the granting of six-day licenses to river steamers, and forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor in them on Sundays.

Dean Stanley, referring incidentally to the prodigious evil of drunkenness, declared that the "one thing needful" in the present distress "is to remove the alcoholic temptations by every means which lie in our power."

An officer on the North American and West Indian station, writing from Manan Island, Nova Scotia, says that "at Yarmouth all the people are teetotalers; no alcoholic liquors are sold in the island; and no licenses are given."

The School Board of Glasgow have resolved that the scholars under their charge shall be instructed as to the evil effects of alcohol and the virtue of TEMPERANCE. It is, however, forbidden to the teachers to urge upon their scholars the duty of total abstinence.

There is at Gorey, Wexford, an old woman 112 years of age, who, when lately asked by her medical attendant to take some wine for the infirmity she was labouring under, asked him if he wanted to poison her, and told him she had never tasted strong drink all her long life.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE AND CIVILISATION.—In one of Mr. Mackey's letters from the Nyanza Mission, he remarks that "drink is the curse of Africa." Wherever grain is plentiful he has found drunkenness. Whoever would introduce civilisation into Africa, he adds, must be total abstainers.

The Directors of the Scottish Temperance League have offered three prizes—five, three, and two pounds—for the three best essays on the constitution, organization, and efficient working of Total Abstinence Societies. The essays are to be in the hands of the secretary by 1st November next.

The President of the United States, Mr. Hayes, and his wife, lately entertained 1000 persons at their official residence in honour of the diplomatic corps. Though not a single drop of wine was provided, the proceedings were splendid and successful. How few have the courage to act like President and Mrs. Hayes?

SUNDAY DRUNKENNESS IN ENGLAND.—It appears, from a return just issued, that between September, 1876, and September, 1879, the number of persons convicted in England for drunkenness on Sundays was 46,317, and of that number 13,870 were not bona-fide residents in the districts where the offence occurred.

We are glad to hear that the Lord Advocate expects that his Steamboat (Scotland) Passenger Liquor Bill will become law this session. We believe that the entire prohibition of the sale of liquors on board steamers plying in the waters of the Clyde, Forth, and Tay, will be of incalculable benefit to all that travel by them. About the interests of the owners we care little, so long as they are opposed to the public good.

The Society for Enforcing the Licensing Laws has issued its prospectus, which states that it is proposed to employ a staff of able and experienced inspectors, under the society's solicitor, to compel publicans to obey the existing laws. New licenses in districts already provided with public-houses will be opposed by the society, and also renewals in cases where two or more convictions have been obtained.

THE RECHABITES.—From the register of Districts and Tents, published in the Rechabite Magazine, we with pleasure learn that the Order is making progress in Scotland, there being 24 tents—19 male, 1 female, and 4 juvenile. These are located in four Districts, namely, Glasgow, Dundee, Dumfries, and Perthshire. There are about 35,000 persons connected with the entire Order, which is, as one may say, world-wide.

The new and beautiful pleasure steamer "Ivanhoe," placed this season on the Greenock and Arran route, and which is conducted upon temperance principles, has been a decided success. Everybody speaks highly of it, and although it is premature to say that the proprietors intend building a sister steamer, to be called the "Waverley," yet the success which has attended their enlightened enterprise this season will probably induce them to run another steamer on the Clyde, conducted on similar principles, next season.

The British Workman Public-Houses in Glasgow are flourishing. At the annual meeting of the shareholders a dividend of five per cent. was declared, after deducting £500 for depreciation. The company now possess sixteen houses and a bakery, and the drawings show a marked increase over last year. The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said he trusted that the success of the coffee-house movement was "an indication of an improvement in the tastes and habits of the people, and of a diminution of the intemperance which has so long been a disgrace to the country."

LANARK.—On Monday, 2nd ult., a meeting was held at the church gate here, when the able and energetic lecturer, Mr. R. Stevenson, the agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, spoke for nearly one hour and a-half upon the Curse and Cure of Intemperance. An audience of five hundred persons listened with deep interest to the telling remarks of the speaker on the right of the ratepayers to protect themselves from the curse of the liquor traffic. Mr. James Horn afterwards addressed the meeting, and concluded by proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Stevenson, which was very heartily responded to.

WINTER EVENING ENTERTAINMENTS.—The friends of moral and social reform will be making arrangements for the winter. We heartily advise them to include in their winter programme a series of entertainments by Mr. J. W. McCall, of London. We can speak personally of the artistic excellence of his lantern slips and of the variety and superiority of his subjects. His lectures are of acknowledged ability, and are most gracefully delivered. Our readers will find him at 73 Westwick Gardens, London, and may consult advertisement in this issue.

The British Temperance League have decided to remove their headquarters from Bolton to Sheffield. We notice with regret that Mr. Aitken, the esteemed secretary of the League, has resigned his office, it is said in consequence of the change, but we rather think in consequence of increasing years and failing strength.

There are at present 1831 Bands of Hope, with a membership of 178,207, and 117 temperance societies, with a membership of 8124, in connection with the Wesleyan Methodist denominations. The temperance societies are composed of a mixed membership—abstainers and non-abstainers.

Dr. John Rae, of Arctic Expedition experience, writing to the Alliance News, says:—"Sir Charles Tupper, in the course of his address [at Westminster Palace Hotel], said 'he had the honour of proposing in 1872 to the Parliament (of Canada) the most stringent prohibitory law that ever was proposed in any country, applying it to a section of territory 2,500,000 miles in extent, called the North-west territory. It was a measure for entire prohibition.' It is but fair to the Hudson's Bay Company, formerly the governing powers of this vast country, to state that they had carried out an 'entire measure of prohibition' over the whole interior of this great land for something like forty years prior to the date (1872) named by Sir Charles Tupper. The chief factors, traders, and clerks of the H.B. Company voluntarily gave up their yearly allowance of a few dozens wine and brandy, so that the Indians and the employees might not have it to say that we refused to them what we took for ourselves."

OPEN AIR TEMPERANCE MEETINGS IN ABERDEEN.—On Thursday evening and last night (5th and 6th August) temperance meetings under the joint auspices of the Aberdeen Temperance Society and the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, were held in Castle Street. The speakers on Thursday evening were—Rev. John Hunter, Mr. Wm. Blackwood, agent, Scottish Permissive Bill Association; and Mr. William Davidson, who presided; and last night the meeting was addressed by Rev. George Moir, Mr. M. Edwards, secretary of the Aberdeen Temperance Society; and Mr. A. S. Monro, who presided. Large audiences attended the respective meetings, and appeared to listen with evident interest and appreciation to the addresses, which dealt more particularly with the moral, social, and political aspects of the temperance question. We understand that this mode of bringing the claims of the temperance movement before the community is to be adopted at frequent intervals during the present season.—Free Press.

BEER AND BRIBERY.—The Conservative reaction seems to have been a curious compound of beer and bribery. Mr. Hall's election was carried against the Home Secretary by floods of beer and lavish expenditure. The electors of Oxford saw the merits of Beaconsfieldism through the medium of the amber fluid, their search for it being stimulated by silver put into their pockets. At Sandwich the reaction had been prepared for by much money and malt liquor; and the strong sense of Conservative wisdom which a majority of the electors showed was that commonly found in men who have been assisting at the consumption of the product of the brewing of "pecks o' maut." In the Wigtown Burghs again, beer and meat and money were freely given as incitements to Conservatism.—Scotsman.

TEMPERANCE SERMON.—The first of a series of temperance sermons, under the auspices of the Good Templars, was delivered on Sabbath, 15th ult., in Fisherman's Hall, Newhaven, by Mr. J. Waterston. Notwithstanding the fine weather to attract people outside, there was a large attendance.

PRESENTATION TO MR. A. CRAWFORD.—This gentleman having been appointed Assistant-Secretary to the Glasgow Sabbath School Union, resigned his position as Clerk and Cashier to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which he had held with much acceptance for nearly three years. On the 27th July, he met the Executive at their desire, when the chairman (Ex-Baillie Torrens), in graceful and appropriate terms, in their name, presented him with a splendidly bound copy of the Leopold Shakespeare, bearing the following inscription:—"This volume is presented to Mr. A. Crawford by the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, on the occasion of his leaving their service, to mark their sense of his ability and probity as Cashier of the Association, and their high regard for his personal worth. R. Mackay, Secy." Mr. Crawford made a happy reply. The volume is from the artistic press of Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin, is profusely illustrated, clearly printed, handsomely bound, and elegantly inscribed. Our best wishes follow Mr. Crawford into his new and congenial sphere of labour.

BEER IN EUROPE.—Some official tables connected with the production of beer in all the European countries and the United States have been lately issued under the authority of the Austrian Government. The following is a summary of the production during 1879:—The whole German Empire produced 38,946,510 hectolitres, or 23,311,117 British barrels; Great Britain, 36,597,550 hectolitres, or 22,375,010 barrels; United States of North America, 15,400,000 hectolitres, or 9,425,252 barrels; Austria-Hungary, 11,184,681 hectolitres, or 6,838,090 barrels; France, 8,721,000 hectolitres, or 5,331,845 barrels; Belgium, 7,854,000 hectolitres, or 4,801,778 barrels; Russia, 2,300,000 hectolitres, or 1,406,174 barrels; the Netherlands, 1,600,000 hectolitres, or 978,208 barrels; Denmark, 1,100,000 hectolitres, or 672,518 barrels; Sweden, 930,000 hectolitres, or 568,583 barrels; Italy, 870,000 hectolitres, or 531,900 barrels; Switzerland, 724,000 hectolitres, or 448,753 barrels; Norway, 615,000 hectolitres, or 376,000 barrels. The greatest production in proportion to the population is in Belgium, where 167 litres, or a little over 3½ gallons per head, were manufactured; and the smallest production was in Russia, where the ratio was only 3 litres, or a little more than 5¼ pints for every inhabitant.—Times.

THE EDINBURGH CAFE COMPANY.—Last month this company opened large and magnificent refreshment rooms in Princes Street, Edinburgh. The chief characteristic of this venture is to supply in the centre of the city a first-class refreshment room, in the nature of a café, but without alcoholic drinks. Among other gentlemen present at the opening were Sheriff Guthrie Smith, chairman of the company; Professor Calderwood, Bailie Colston, Mr. C. J. Guthrie, advocate, &c. The chairman in declaring the café open, drew attention to the manner in which the building was fitted up. If the establishment, he said, succeeded, it was the directors' intention to open other places of a similar kind, until the whole city was properly supplied. He thought the company were especially fortunate in obtaining the services, as manager, of Mr. Ritchie—(hear, hear)—a gentleman who might be expected to bring all necessary intelligence and energy to bear in carrying out a scheme which he had so much at heart. The directors intended to supply goods of the very best quality; indeed, it was on the matter of quality they proposed to take their stand. The café, he hoped, would be regarded as the proper place for ladies to go to; and it was principally from a desire to meet their cases that the room was opened. Without making any reflection upon licensed houses, he believed it was in accordance with a general feeling that it was not desirable that there should be put before people any condition or suggestion which should savour of what might be called temptation. Professor Calderwood said he considered it extremely desirable for people to obtain refreshment in the centre of the city without having decanters before them. He thought the presence of so many of the medical faculty, and also of representatives of the Town Council, was a proof that these respective bodies appreciated the intentions of the promoters. Bailie Colston said he did not expect that the house now opened would ever come before the magistrates in the way some others did. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) Dr. Fraser, Hull, in the course of a few remarks, said there had already been opened eleven houses in Hull—(applause)—and these paid a dividend of 10 per cent.

MR. DONALD CURRIE, M.P., ON THE PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE REFORM.—On Saturday, 14th ult., Mr. Donald Currie, M.P. for Perthshire, laid the foundation-stone of the new Temperance Hall in Stanley, in presence of a large assemblage, including upwards of 1000 Good Templars from Perth and surrounding districts. Lord Provost Richardson, Perth, presided. At the conclusion of the ceremony, Mr. Currie, who was received with loud cheers, made the following remarks:—This is a temperance hall, and I would like to say a word of encouragement to those who have for their purpose in the hall—in their motive, and in their temperance movement, this—the good of all men. (Applause.) This is a noble purpose—a purpose worthy of you and worthy of legislators—for the country's greatest good is sought, as its greatest development is secured, when the private purpose and the public interest go hand in hand. (Applause.) Is it a public interest that temperance principles should prevail? (Applause.) I say it is. (Great cheering.) In this Parliament I recorded my vote for the principle that ratepayers should control—or at any rate have a voice in—the liquor traffic of this country. (Applause.) I said that I would do so in every town that I visited in my canvass for the county of Perth—not that I was so thoroughly in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Bill as to argue for it—but was willing to have this principle, involved in local option, that those—that is the electors—who have interests at stake, are entitled, as ratepayers, to consider wherein their interests are affected. (Applause.) And this local option principle is the principle of Government in England, and Ireland, and Scotland—the principle that we judge what is best for the whole is best for ourselves, for the community—and by a large majority in Parliament we declare your voice, the voice of our constituents, and so accomplish your purposes. (Applause.) Take Ireland. In Ireland the Sunday closing movement took a development. Has it succeeded in Ireland? I am not advocating it for England, because in England the people are not ready for it yet—and we had better not propose measures for which the public are not ready—but in Wales the voice unanimously for Sunday closing was shown to the present Parliament—(applause)—and I would have voted with those who were for Sunday closing in Wales if the House of Commons had not unanimously agreed without a division. (Applause.) There is another argument I would like to draw from this, and it is this—that this closing on the Sabbath, which in Scotland prevails, and which has been so beneficial in Ireland, has had, on comparison, this singular effect, that on Saturday and other days of the week there might be an advantage by earlier closing. (Applause.) On Saturday if all closed earlier there would be an immense advantage, even to the publican who does not wish to make a man drunk. It is not his interest. His interest is to have sober, moderate drinkers. Between eleven and twelve o'clock on the Saturdays in Ireland, there was 665 arrests of drunken men; between ten and eleven o'clock there were only 535 during the year 1879; between nine and ten only 440; and between eight and nine 462; while between twelve and one in the morning it was as much as between seven and eight at night, exactly 377, and it fell off between one and two to one-fourth of what it was between eleven and twelve. Therefore moderate closing, local option, legislation for reduction of hours at night, like closing on the Sabbath day, has had, in Ireland, a beneficial effect. Now I argue this from all I have told you, that while we must not prohibit in the sense of interfering with the rights of the people as a people, there is a right to the nation, to Parliament, to legislate in such a way as to secure the best good to the community, in harmony with the wishes of localities, and even week-day early closing has been beneficial. Therefore, we are all indebted to the temperance movement. (Applause.) The Temperance Hall established in Stanley has been established on no narrow basis, and, as having the good of mankind for its object, it ought to have our heartiest sympathy. (Applause.) I hope that this hall may be ever a happy place for the old, in which you may meet friends, and talk over old times. I hope it will be a place within which the middle-aged will meet and talk over the politics and questions of the day, and I hope it will be a place where the young may meet together in wishing for the advancement and the prosperity of right, and the best of Great Britain as a whole—(applause)—and that temperance may be advanced, friendship advanced, and good of every kind secured by each place doing its little in its own way throughout this great nation. So do I wish you all every happiness in Stanley. (Great cheering.) Ex-Bailie M'Neill, Perth, moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Currie for his kindness in laying the foundation-stone, at considerable inconvenience to himself. (Cheers, and a Voice—"Three cheers for Mrs. Currie." Renewed cheering.) The Rev. Mr. Thomson, Free Church, Stanley, shortly addressed the assemblage on the benefit of total abstinence. Three cheers having been given for the Queen, the vast assemblage repaired to a large park where numerous games were engaged in.

Magistrate—"Prisoner, what had you to drink?"
"Only a pint of beer, your worship." "What next?"
"Only another pint, your worship." "What next?"
"Only a fight, your worship."

CHURCH WHISKEY.—The assertions of the Mormons is that their religion saves them. Being God's "chosen people," they can do nothing wrong, hence many of their doings are sacrilegious. A gentleman who had occasion to make a purchase at their store recently, showed us the bill he received, of which the following is a copy:—"Holiness to the Lord." Mr. Blank Doe: Bought of Zion's Mercantile Co-operative Institution, two gals. whiskey, 8.00 dols.—Daily Tribune, June 22, 1879.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the representatives of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 11th July to 14th August inclusive. During that period 87 meetings were held, 30 being deputational and 57 ordinary. At these meetings 125 addresses were given.

The following is a summary of each speaker's work:

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Markinch, Jedburgh, Kelso, Yetholm, Newcastleton, Langholm, Dunse, Gavinton, Pencaitland, Edinburgh, Lauder, Ceres, Pennicuick, and Dalkeith, and addressed 35 meetings.

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Glasgow, Partick, Kilsyth, Ayr, Helensburgh, Edinburgh, Greenock, Kirkintilloch, Lanark, Dumfries, and Port Glasgow, and addressed 21 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has visited Glasgow, Greenock, Partick, Kilsyth, Kirkintilloch, Clarkston, Paisley, and Aitkenhead, and addressed 15 meetings.

Mr. William Blackwood has visited Inverness, Nairn, Forres, Elgin, Lossiemouth, Fife-Keith, Huntly, and Aberdeen, and addressed 13 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Glasgow, Kilsyth, Edinburgh, Clarkston, and Greenock, and addressed 9 meetings.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has visited Jedburgh, Kelso, Newcastleton, Langholm, Dunse, and Pennicuick, and addressed 8 meetings.

Mr. William Kesson has visited Partick, Glasgow, Kilsyth, and Greenock, and addressed 7 meetings.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh.

Mr. W. Davidson has addressed 2 meetings in Aberdeen.

Mr. Joseph Milne has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh.

The following gentlemen have each delivered addresses in the places which follow their names:—Rev. Dr. Adamson, Edinburgh; Captain Brochie, Greenock; Rev. Mr. Hunter, Aberdeen; Messrs. D. Moore, Glasgow; D. G. Simpson, Helensburgh; A. Brown, Fife-Keith; J. Nisbet, Edinburgh; Fuller, Edinburgh; J. Horn, Lanark; Edwards, Aberdeen.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, etc., for REVIEW, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Office, 30 Hope Street.

Mr. Frank York, of 87 Lancaster Road, Notting Hill, London, W., has sent us a photograph of a drunkard taken at a ferry on the Thames. It is most artistically done. Temperance reformers should place it in their album, where it can paint a moral and adorn a tale.

Winsome Words. One penny. (London: F. C. Longley, Warwick Lane, E.C.) This is the monthly magazine of "The Help-one-another Society" for boys and girls. A glance at its pages will dispose the most fastidious to commend it for the purpose it has in view.

Home Words for August. (London: Paternoster Square.) This is a magazine which must come close to the hearts of those who peruse its pages. All its articles have one chief characteristic distinguishing them, a gentle persuasiveness to good deeds and dispositions. This month's (August) contains "A word to our harvesters," by our friend, Mr. F. Sherlock, which has had the honour of being reprinted in many temperance magazines.

Onward Reciter, No. 107. One penny. (Manchester: "Onward" Office.) We have felt real pleasure in reading the various pieces which compose this number of the "best and most popular reciter." One of these, "A word to our girls," should be read by every girl, so wholesome and timely is the counsel which it contains. Here are the opening lines of it:—"Girls, whatever else you do, do not marry a drunkard. No matter how deeply in love you may fancy yourselves to be, do not marry a man who drinks intoxicating liquor. It is better to go on through life single and alone, to keep a cat, and make aprons for the heathen children, than to be a drunkard's wife."

Supplement to Whitaker's Almanack, 1880. Those who are wise enough to furnish themselves yearly with this very useful and interesting Almanack will be alive to the desirability of procuring a copy of the Supplement, rendered necessary by the great political change which has recently taken place in Imperial affairs. Those who are not subscribers to the Almanack, and who yet desire to be well informed as to the administration of our national affairs, will find in this Supplement the fullest information detailed, analysed, and summarized.

The Little Dears. A photograph of over one hundred children is certainly the happiest idea in photography we have ever seen. It is difficult for one to say whether the sterner or the fairer sex has the odds, but it is certain that a lovelier group never arrested the eye. They are in all positions, from little "Sooty" in the wash-tub to "Beauty" in the perambulator, and "Lovely," dressed as if for a baby show. There's "Tiny" and "Shinny," the sweetest of pets, and we don't know how many more, all of them somebody's darlings—bless them—for all have sat for their bright little pictures. One could linger fondly over such a charming galaxy of beauty, archness, and innocence, but we must forbear. Only we the more earnestly urge our readers to possess themselves of a copy of this delightful sun picture. It is to be had of F. E. Langley, 39 Warwick Lane, London, E.C.

Women's Medicinal Use of Alcohol. By Mrs. Helen Kirk. Read at Conference of British Women's Temperance Association. (London: Memorial Hall, Faringdon Street, E.C.) It was once our cherished belief that women would be impelled to offer an active antagonism to the personal, social and national intemperance of our day. That belief is now sight; they do. It was also a belief of ours that when they did so, they would be found in intelligence, equipment, and fertility of resource, most effective for offence against all the causes and practice of intemperance. We welcome Mrs. Kirk's admirable paper on the medicinal aspect of the question, and point to it in support of our belief. We are old enough to remember her husband's famous pamphlet on medicinal drinking, which at the time did so much to enlighten the mind of the community on the errors and the cruelties of the medical profession as exhibited in their prescription of alcoholic liquors. In Mrs. Kirk's too brief paper we have an excellent resumé of the progress of temperance medical opinion, a valuable exposition of the various ensnaring occasions for a "little stimulant," and an eloquent appeal against their use. It is thoroughly reliable, eminently practical in treatment, and a marvel of condensation.

God's Arm: To the Sceptics of Scotland. By Rev. G. G. Macleod, Carnwath. (To be had from the author. One Penny.) We always remember with admiration the reply of the old lady to the terrified women that clung to her during a fearful thunder-storm, "I love a God that can shake the world." And, notwithstanding all that has been said about intemperance in language, we do hear with pleasure the fiery outburst of passionate eloquence with the grandeur and power of the Almighty for its theme. Mr. Macleod has a talent for vehemence of assertion, as was obvious in his sermons on "Hell" and "Satanic Sacrifices;" and he closes with "Nogodism" as fiercely and, we think, as successfully as with Universalists and Alcoholists. He begins by saying, "God is! In the face of creation, Atheism is arrant nonsense. Science has long since knocked the bottom out of the antiquated thing for all except blind moles. Voltaire tried to send blood through its icy veins, and lost his soul in the attempt. It has long since been scouted from educated circles as too profoundly coarse to be entertained by rational minds. Its ghost however, in the garb of evolution, has arisen to haunt this age. Atheism we know, and the devil: but Evolution, who art thou? Evolution is the refined and cultivated form of the rotten carcase buried with Voltaire." In this strain he discourses throughout his sermon, which is well sustained from its beginning to its close. For energy and grace, sarcasm and appeal, it is not surpassed by any of the discourses that teem from the press, and is fitted to exert a powerful influence on all by whom it may be read.

The Two Sides of the Question: A Sermon. By the Rev. G. Calthrop, M.A., Vicar of St. Augustine's, Highbury. (London: Elliot Stock.) "Save us from our friends," are the first words which reach our lips after a perusal of this sermon. It was avowedly preached in the interests of temperance by one who claims to be a temperance reformer; but certainly the tendency of its teaching is to exalt "moderation" to the pinnacle of admiration, and patronisingly to regard total abstinence as the innocent weakness of rabid reformers. The author fully recognizes the extent of the evil we combat. He regards intemperance as "the monster evil of our time," and describes with considerable power the slow and insidious growth of the enslaving habit. Yet these facts of a wide experience only lead him to this daring and almost abandoned conclusion: he says—"I assert most strongly, and without the slightest hesitation, the lawfulness for a Christian man of the use—as a beverage, and not merely as a medicine—of alcoholic liquors." To support this antiquated assertion, he ventures to quote Christ as authorizing the consumption of intoxicating liquors. "The Lord Jesus Christ (he says) on a certain occasion, and an important one, for it was the introduction to His ministry, turned water into wine—wine which, if it had been consumed in excess, would have had the power of heating the system, and disordering the intellect, and stupefying the senses of those who consumed it." He will not accept the theory that it was unfermented wine which our Lord made, but contemptuously pushes it aside, with the hazardous assertion that "no scholar whose opinion is worth taking into account would say so." After this, it is with some misgivings that we recall one or two names which we had regarded as of some weight in such a controversy, and which we fondly believed convincingly supported that theory—Dr. Lees, Dr. Notts, Bishop Hall, Archbishop Trench, Dean Howson, etc., etc. But even without the aid of scholastic authority, if our author will admit the weight of moral considerations, we submit that a little reflection on the character of Christ (pure and undefiled), the mission of Christ (to save men, not to destroy them), the object of the miracle (the manifestation of Christ's glory), the words in which Christ taught the world to pray ("lead us not into temptation"), and the fact of the nature and effects of alcoholic liquor (insidious and deadly), will not strengthen, but fatally weaken the force of what we consider his unwarranted assumption. Our author, however, further supports his view of what he calls common-sense temperance, by quoting the words of Christ—"John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say he hath a devil. The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners"—as tending to show that our Saviour countenanced the moderate consumption of intoxicating liquors. "Had Christ been himself a total abstainer," he remarks, "it would have been simply impossible that He could have been called a 'wine-bibber.'" . . . "The thing is impossible; because there would have been no foundation for the calumny to be built upon." Now, without multiplying words unnecessarily, we have simply to say that calumny, when it rests on a foundation, is itself much calumniated by such a designation. For ourselves, we regard the life and character of Christ as too holy, too pure, too wise to offer the moderate drinker (who, after all, is in a great number of cases but the first phase and incipient outline of the drunkard) even the shadow of an excuse for his limited indulgence. We are, moreover, convinced that the spirit of our Lord's teaching—which, after all, is the chief matter for the Christian—is entirely and only in favour of total abstinence as a duty, in a country and in times characterized by drunkenness. We dismiss this sermon with wonder. It is years behind the times. It would certainly have been better for its author's reputation that he had accepted the other alternative of which he speaks in the introduction.

FOOD AND FEEDING.*

FIRST NOTICE.

Anything from the pen of Sir Henry Thompson, dealing with any aspect of human welfare, is sure to command attention, and, we venture to believe, is specially worthy of the consideration of temperance reformers. Their movement has been indebted to him oftener than once. In his letter to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, in his correspondence with Lady Jane Ellice, and in his contributions to the Contemporary Review, and in his public speeches, he has thrown the weight of his great knowledge and influence as a medical authority on the side of temperance reform. We turn, therefore, with interest to the volume before us, hoping to find in its pages farther confirmation of our position from so deservedly great an authority on medical questions.

In Food and Feeding Sir Henry is not, however, specially writing on alcoholic liquors and their relation to the healthy human system, but with an earnest desire to reform the abuses connected with our food and our use of it. It is, alas, the general custom, and not, as one would look for, the exception, for the most of people to treat their stomachs as they do their poor relations—with unwarrantable indulgence the one day, and with studied neglect the other. They have not even the Irish pig-feeder's excuse, that he "wanted in the pigs—the craters—a streak of lane and a streak of fat time about." Is it any wonder that they almost never enjoy the latter half of their existence? Others, alas that they are the minority, conscious that their body, at least here and now, is the basis of the manifestations of a healthy mentality, have a laudable desire to treat their stomachs worthily; but from ignorance on the one hand and the pressure of conventionalism on the other, find it a very difficult thing to do. In his treatment of the subject, Sir Henry attempts to warn the one of his folly, and encourage the other in the way in which he should go.

The volume consists of ten chapters. In these are set forth the great sin of improper feeding—the materials of food—foods used by the peasantry—preparation of food by the middle classes—combination of foods at meals—dinners—wine—dinner arrangements—and the public dinner. There is also an appendix on the Pot-au-feu.

It has often filled us with surprise when we have seen with what accuracy mankind can treat of the properties of numbers and the nature and relations of the heavenly bodies, trace out the wonders and unfold the marvels of creation, and yet all these years have made so little progress with the knowledge and management of their own systems. We stand awe-struck and worshipful before the grandeur of the outward world, and are content to writhe instead of live, to endure the horrors of dyspepsia, instead of patiently striving to bring ourselves into harmony with organic laws. Sir Henry says, "For it is certain that an adequate recognition of the value of proper food to the individual in maintaining a high standard of health, in prolonging healthy life, and thus largely promoting cheerful temper, prevalent good nature, and improved moral tone, would achieve almost a revolution in the habits of a large part of the community." Meantime, in consequence of this neglect, the majority of infants are reared on imperfect milk by weak or ill-fed mothers. Almost all the rest, being well to do, are the victims of over-feeding, and it would be some consolation if in after stages some better treatment was in store, but the poor boy must share his father's hard and unsuitable fare and, alas, his beer or gin; the well-to-do boy, on the other hand, is pampered with solid foods and stimulating drinks, which custom and self-indulgence have placed upon the table. Is it wonderful that following on these abnormal feedings we have the "bilious attacks" which in so many mar the enjoyment of life. This is a sad picture, but it grows darker when, "Under such circumstances it often happens, as the youth grows up, that a flagging appetite or a failing digestion habitually demands a dram before or between meals, and that these latter are regarded rather as occasions to indulge in variety of liquor than as repast for nourishing the body; and it is not surprising that the true object of both eating and drinking is entirely lost sight of. . . . So it often comes to pass that at middle age, when man finds himself in the full current of life's occupations, struggling for pre-eminence with his fellows, indigestion has become persistent in some of its numerous forms, shortens his 'staying power,' or spoils his judgment and temper. . . . On the other hand the poor man, advancing in years, shows signs of damage to his constitution from continuous toil with inadequate food, the supply of which is often diminished by his expenditure for beer, which, although not seldom noxious, he regards as the elixir of life, never to be missed when fair occasion for obtaining it is offered. Many of this class become permanent inmates of the parish workhouse or infirmary."

Sir Henry, from such considerations, finds his subject shaping itself. Food must be first regarded in relation to its value for building up and sustaining the human body; the food must be properly selected and fitly prepared; the true exercise of taste in service, and the art of combining foods for a meal, fall lastly under consideration.

In subsequent chapters we find food defined; its two-fold purpose and its assimilation duly set forth. Sir Henry guardedly approves of a vegetarian diet. There is an excellent summary of foods, their geographical limits, their uses by various civilized and uncivilized peoples; and he finds occasion to animadvert on the vice of the age in selecting foods too much concentrated, and in consuming too largely of them.

Our modern dining customs have the special antipathy of Sir Henry. He favours a small select dinner party in preference to the crowd that is generally invited to dine. His scathing denunciation of a fashionable dinner is well-deserved; it stamps discredit upon the age in which we live, and, as contrasted with our culture in other matters, looks very much like swinish in comparison. Equally deserved and pungent are his strictures on the public dinner, and if his observations on our public feeding are laid to heart, it will be of signal benefit to the individual and the country, and, we need not say, will permit of a greater and cheaper diffusion of the materials of food than obtains at the present time.

We have, we hope, said as much as will be sufficient to induce our readers to possess a copy of this work for themselves. It will amply repay perusal. In our next notice we will examine what Sir Henry says about liquors, and why he says it.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE REV. DR. KERR, A.M., DUNSE.—It is our sorrowful duty to place on record the decease of this good minister and true social reformer. He died at Dunse of heart disease on Saturday evening, 17th July, in the 74th year of his age, and 47th year of his ministry. He was the beloved pastor of the South U.P. Congregation for the long period of forty years, and was widely known and greatly esteemed in Dunse and Berwickshire. He heartily co-operated with the other ministers in Dunse in all that regarded the higher interests of their respective flocks, and showed by a bright example what might be done if ministers everywhere were to combine for the overthrow of the wickedness around them. He was a self-made man, a diligent and successful student all his life, an accomplished theologian, classical scholar, and authority on early Oriental History. He ever took a deep interest in all that favoured the promotion of civil and religious liberty; was a member of the School Board, and at last its chairman. A proficient in music, he carried on for many years classes for the extension of this delightful art. As a social reformer, he took a prominent part in movements calculated to elevate the working classes by reducing the temptations to which they are exposed. This led him to be a cordial supporter of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which aims at the suppression of the liquor traffic. He was for some years president of the local auxiliary of this association, and generally presided and took an active part in the meetings. He died, in a word, greatly beloved and sincerely lamented. His remains were interred on Thursday, 22nd July, in the presence of the largest assemblage of mourners ever seen in Dunse. A deputation from the Dunse auxiliary to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association—Messrs. G. Bruce, president; W. Smith, treasurer; D. Paterson, secretary; and J. H. Waterston, district superintendent—attended on the melancholy occasion as a mark of deep and sincere respect to the deceased.

VARIETIES.

Ladies had better be fast asleep than "fast" awake.

ONE WAY.—How to acquire short-hand. Fool around a cutting-machine.

A little fellow was eating some bread and milk, when he turned round to his mother and said, "O, mother, I'm full of glory! There was a sunbeam on my spoon, and I swallowed it."

"If my mind wanders," said a stout Irish invalid, "give me a little out of the black bottle on the table." "But what if you refuse to take it?" said the attendant. "Then bate me, and make me take it," was the reply.

GONE TO THE DOGS.—One of Mr. Yeaman's supporters, early on the polling day at Dundee, got a dog, put a cloth upon him, on which was inscribed, "Vote for Yeaman." One of Mr. Henderson's canvassers seeing this, exclaimed, "What! is Yeaman gone to the dogs already?"

"Don't you want to be my wife?" said a small boy to a smaller girl. With some hesitation, but with a certain firmness of tone, she replied, "Yes, I would." "Then," continued the boy, as he seated himself on the ground, and lifted up his foot, "you must begin by pulling off my boots."

A child from a temperance home, visiting her grand-mama, saw the old lady drinking a glass of beer, and exclaimed, "Why, grandmama, I thought you were good!" The old lady thought it over, and promised the child she would drink no more, adding aside to its mother, "I am sure that I won't forfeit his good opinion for the little I take."

No day should pass without eating a certain proportion of fruit. When fresh fruits are not at hand, or are dear, try Dr. Gull's favourite. Raisins at 4d. per lb. are about equal to grapes at a 1s. Soak them in water all night, stew them gently an hour in the morning, and you have one of the most delicious compotes in the world. Dried figs, heated in the same manner, are delightful.

LOCAL OPTION AND PROHIBITION. STATEMENT OF MR COMMISSIONER MANNING

This interesting and important statement, by J. W. Manning, Esq., of Ontario, was made a few months since to a select audience, in the Mayor's Parlour, Manchester Town Hall. It is now reprinted, by special request, for wide circulation, with a Synopsis of the Canadian Permissive Prohibitory Act (1878), and some important testimonies from Maine.

(From Sir WILFRID LAWSON, Bart., M.P.)

"Thanks for the platform ticket, which I, however, must return, as I could not be with you on the 28th. I hope, however, that you will have a most successful meeting, and one which will be worthy of Scotland, from which country we have received most invaluable support in the struggle for the most pressing reform of the day."

(From Dr. CAMERON, M.P.)

"I should have had great pleasure in attending the meeting had I been in town. It is hardly necessary for me to assure you of my cordial sympathy with the object of your meeting, nor to express my hope that in point of success it may surpass all its predecessors."

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with applause, said his first duty was to congratulate the members on this the 22nd anniversary of their association. Directing their attention to the signs of progress since the last meeting, he said one of these was the fact that the Maine Law was still being enforced, and had been successful for a quarter of a century. At the Maine Republican State Convention, held in Augusta in June, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"Resolved: That experience has demonstrated the wisdom of the policy of prohibition as an auxiliary to temperance reform, and as contributing to the material wealth, happiness, and prosperity of the State, and that we refer with confidence and pride to our undeviating support of the same as one of the cardinal principles of the Republican party in Maine." Then there was the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, of which there were the most gratifying testimonies to the good it was doing. Next, there was the new Temperance Act in New Brunswick; while at a late meeting of the British Medical Association at Cambridge, the temperance question was discussed, and Dr. Kerr made a very bold inroad upon the customs of society. Some temperance friends had great difficulty in attending public dinners, in consequence of the practice of making the tickets the same price to those who did not drink as to those who did. They did not object upon the ground of the money value, but upon that of principle. Dr. Kerr made a motion to the effect that there should be a distinction, and it was carried. Henceforth, with that association, there will be a difference in the price of tickets to abstainers. Another sign of progress was the fact that the wife of the President of the great American Republic would not allow the use of strong liquors at her social gatherings. Further, there was the great meeting in the Exeter Hall on the 16th June last, when eloquent speeches in favour of Local Option were delivered by eminent men. It was the best meeting ever held in that hall on the question. Two days after, the great debate took place in the House of Commons, when Sir Wilfrid Lawson was supported by 229 members and opposed by 203. Just three months before, when Sir Wilfrid moved the same resolution in the Conservative Parliament, he had 136 for and 250 against him. Having read extracts from newspapers in favour of Local Option in order to show the progress made in public opinion, the chairman said they must all rejoice at the great victory of the 18th June—one long to be remembered with another victory, for it was on that day in 1815 that the battle of Waterloo was fought. But the prohibition victory was a bloodless one. It left no maimed bodies and no widows and orphans. But it was one which would for ever tell for good upon all classes of the community. (Applause.) He called upon the secretary, Mr. Robert Mackay, to read the report, which was as follows—

TWENTY-SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

IN presenting this their Twenty-Second Annual Report, your Executive have to congratulate their constituents on the remarkable successes of the past year. It is impossible to look over the period which has elapsed since the last annual meeting of the Association without recognising the solid progress which has been made. The year of which this Report treats is the most memorable in the history of the Association. A general election, covering your opponents with defeat, and assigning to your question a supreme place among political questions; the passage of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local-Option Resolution, embodying the principle of a suppressive veto over the liquor traffic by the ratepayers, and a pledge on the part of the Government to deal with the liquor traffic in harmony with the proposal of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, appear to fully warrant your Executive in believing that a continuance of the same vigorous and united effort, so manifest on the part of Scottish moral and social reformers, will in the immediate future secure for its people legal power to exclude from their respective districts a traffic so alien to the order and progress of their country.

THE AGENCY.

Your Executive are happy to report that all the ordinary operations of the agitation have been maintained with unabated vigour; and they feel persuaded that the aim and object of the Association were never better understood or more widely appreciated than at this moment. They have been surrounded by a number of able and zealous agents, whose continuous labours have been warmly and widely recognised by all who have co-operated with them in promoting the interests of the agitation. There are at present on the staff Messrs. Black, Blackwood, Lossock, Stevenson, and Waterstone. Mr. Blackwood has the Northern district under his care, and your Executive learn with great satisfaction that his labours are meeting with increasing acceptance. Mr. Waterston superintends the Eastern district with great ability and success. Mr. Stevenson has the Western district under his care, where his labour meets much appreciation. It is most gratifying to be able to add, that in the prosecution of their various and manifold labours they continue to receive the very cordial co-operation of a large and increasing number of earnest friends. Mr. Robert Dransfield and Mr. Wm. Kesson continue to render efficient platform services. Mr. Lossock devotes a considerable portion of the year to collection with gratifying success. Mr. Black has given all his time to this branch of the work with singular aptitude, devotion, and success. His efforts have resulted, notwithstanding the prevalent depression, in a large accession to the membership of the Association. The arduous and exacting work of your agency staff, during the year, has been done in a manner satisfactory to your Executive.

The ordinary advocacy has never been equal to the demands of the movement, but your Executive could always rely upon the generous and valuable aid of an ever-widening circle of earnest and devoted friends, to whose abundant and successful advocacy in behalf of the movement your Executive bear a willing and emphatic testimony.

MEETINGS.

During the year your Executive, deeply sensible of the necessity laid upon them, in view of a general election, to create and deepen a sound conviction on the principles and policy of the Scottish prohibitory movement, continued a vigorous agitation by public meetings. These meetings excited great attention in those localities where they took place, and the general election invested many of them with unusual interest, and rendered them more than ordinarily successful.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson addressed eight great meetings in Scotland during the last recess. The night previous to your last annual meeting he was taking part in the Jubilee Temperance meetings in Greenock, and addressed a densely-crowded meeting in the Town Hall. He had a most gratifying reception, and on the following morning met with a number of the leading citizens at breakfast. In the evening he attended your annual public meeting, where he met with a most cordial welcome from the crowded audiences assembled in the Larger and Lesser City Halls. On the 3rd November he appeared in Edinburgh at one of the most imposing demonstrations ever held there on the Temperance question. The Free Church Assembly Hall was crowded, and the Established Church Assembly Hall had to be called into requisition. On the 17th he visited Ayr, and in the evening was introduced to a densely-crowded meeting in the Skating Rink by the Provost, and received the heartiest manifestations of welcome. On the 26th, he visited Dundee, after an absence of eight years, and had an enthusiastic welcome from a crowded audience. He went under the auspices of the Dundee Temperance Hundred, and the Provost presided over the meeting. On the 28th he went to Forfar, and in the Reid Hall, crowded to its utmost capacity, received a most flattering reception. On the 22nd January, in response to an influentialy-signed requisition, he delivered an address, under the auspices of the Edinburgh University Temperance Society, to the students of the Edinburgh University, in the Free Church Assembly Hall. His appearance was greeted by these young men with prolonged cheers, which broke out again and again during the delivery of his address. The next evening he went to Kirkcaldy, to one of the most imposing of the demonstrations in which he had ever taken part in Scotland. The North British Railway Company ran special trains to accommodate those attending the meetings held in the Free and Congregational Churches. The Provost presided on the occasion. It is needless to add that at all these gatherings the utterances of the hon. baronet commanded the sympathy of the vast numbers that crowded to hear him. They were marked by all the freshness, cogency, humour, and significance which so markedly distinguish his addresses, and those that heard them set their seal of approval upon them by their unstinted approbation.

Sir Wilfrid was accompanied at all these meetings by members of your Executive and friends. The following deserve special mention:—Dr. Cameron, M.P.; E. Jenkins, Esq., M.P.; Provost M'Pherson, ex-Bailie Lewis; Revs. J. C. Burns, John Kay, and Hector Hall, Treasurer Hamilton, J.P.; ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; Messrs. R. C. Murray, J. Winning, and J. Steel.

Through the kindness of the United Kingdom Alliance, Mr. John Paton has been at the disposal of your Committee for several months during the year. Mr. Paton has been principally engaged in canvassing the electors, and his labours have, in the opinion of your Executive, had a powerful influence in favour of your principles and policy in many of the election contests. Mr. Paton, they are glad to state, remains in Scotland until the end of October.

In order to meet the numerous demands on your lecturing staff, your Executive engaged Mr. Charles Bent, of Manchester, for two months during the year. He addressed meetings in February and in June over a wide district of country, with the highest credit to himself, and to the gratification of all who had the pleasure of attending his meetings. Your Executive were highly satisfied with his services.

During the year a number of special meetings have taken place, which were addressed by talented friends and members of your Executive. The annual meetings were remarkable for the attendance and the enthusiasm of the audience, and the talent and ability of the platform, and the resolution not to abate one jot of their rightful demand, so manifest on the part of the members and friends. At the crowded meeting in the City Hall there were, along with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the Lord Provost (who presided), Mr. Burt, M.P.; Sir James Bain, Revs. J. C. Burns, G. Cron, J. Brand, and J. Clark, Mr. J. W. Manning, Ontario, Canada; Mr. Gilbert Archer, Treasurer Hamilton, and ex-Bailie Torrens. On the following evening Mr. Manning lectured in Edinburgh on the Canadian Temperance Act. He is a most talented exponent of Prohibitory views, and your Executive regretted that time did not allow of his visiting Scotland and taking part in a number of meetings. On the same date ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., was present as your representative at one of the series of Jubilee Temperance meetings in Greenock, and addressed a densely-crowded meeting in the Town Hall. A large meeting took place at Port-Glasgow on the 20th, in which he took a leading part. Bailie Selkirk represented your Association at a large meeting in Ardrossan on 4th February, along with Rev. J. Kay, Rev. D. Macrae, and others. Next day a large and influential Conference was held in Edinburgh, to offer congratulations to the Earl of Zetland, who had announced his intention to enforce his rights, as Superior of Grangemouth, against the liquor traffic. Among those present were Rev. Dr. Reid (who presided), Principal Cairns, Professor Kirk, Rev. Drs. Adamson and Teape, Rev. J. Kay, ex-Bailie Lewis, and other warm friends of the movement. Your Executive entertain the hope that his Lordship may succeed in his efforts to secure the legal exclusion of the publican from his fens in Grangemouth. Next day, at Stirling, ex-Bailie Torrens and Bailie Selkirk addressed a most enthusiastic meeting in the Town Hall, and were loudly applauded. On the 17th ex-Bailie Torrens, Bailie Selkirk, Mr. James Winning, and your Secretary went to Aberdeen. In the afternoon a Conference Meeting took place, where interesting matters connected with the movement in the north received careful consideration. Your deputation were glad to see how highly appreciated

Mr. Blackwood was by those present, who spoke not merely for themselves, but were accredited to do so for others. In the evening your deputation addressed a most excellent meeting in the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, and had the valuable assistance of Messrs. M'Donald, Adams, Wm. Clark, W. Davidson, J. Paterson, &c. On the 23rd, at Dunse, Rev. Dr. Adamson and Mr. Waterston addressed a large and earnest audience, in the Town Hall there, with great acceptance. On the 26th, at Kinross, ex-Bailie Torrens and Bailie Selkirk addressed, on behalf of the Association, a large attendance, by whom their addresses were loudly cheered. On the 6th inst. a very interesting and influential meeting assembled in the Council Chambers, Edinburgh—the Right Hon. Lord Provost Boyd presiding—to hear a statement of the nature, position, and prospects of the Canadian Temperance Act, by the Hon. Alex. Vidal. His statement made a marked impression on those present, among whom were ex-Bailie Lewis, Councillor Clark, Rev. D. Bruce, Rev. F. L. Armitage, D. Dickson, Esq., &c. Many other places have been visited by your advocates and agents, with the happiest effect upon the prohibitory sentiment more or less manifest in the locality. It is to these meetings that your Executive have to attribute the rapid extension of their principles, and the wide-spread acceptance of their policy. They heartily acknowledge the great services rendered by Bailie Lewis to the prohibitory movement, by his unwearied advocacy of temperance and prohibition, both at week-day and Sabbath meetings.

The open-air advocacy has, during the year, been conspicuously successful. Meetings addressed by your agents were held in almost all the leading towns. Your Executive are convinced that through this branch of your operations a knowledge of the aims and objects of your Association is brought home to those whom otherwise you could not reach, and that the good they do amply justifies the great care and labour bestowed upon them.

The Sabbath meetings on the Green have been unusually successful this year. They were under the devoted superintendence of Mr. R. Dransfield, and have been addressed by ex-Bailie Torrens, James Horn, Esq., Messrs. J. Paton, J. H. Waterston, R. Stevenson, C. Bent, R. Mackay, W. Kesson, D. Moore, and R. Dransfield. The attendance has been most satisfactory, and great interest has been manifested by the audience.

THE NUMBER OF MEETINGS.

During the by-past year the number of lectures delivered by your agents was as follows:—Mr. Waterston, 233; Mr. Stevenson, 206; Mr. Blackwood, 204; Mr. Dransfield, 141; Mr. Bent, 57; Mr. Kesson, 28. Mr. John Paton delivered 32 lectures and your Secretary 65 during the same time. The number of meetings held during the year which were either arranged by the Association or addressed by its representatives was 927—697 ordinary and 230 deputational. At these meetings 1318 addresses were delivered. These figures are not inclusive of the numerous lectures delivered in behalf of the Association by friends throughout the country and of which your Executive regret to state no record is kept or transmitted to them.

Your Executive heartily acknowledge the very valuable assistance which was rendered by the following gentlemen and members to the agitation during the year:—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P.; Thos. Burt, Esq., M.P.; ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P.; Bailie Selkirk, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Rev. John Kay, Rev. H. Hall, Rev. Wm. Crombie, Rev. W. J. Boon, Rev. Wm. Halliday, Captain Brochie, Dr. J. M. McCulloch, Dr. Bowie, ex-Provost Dick, Messrs. R. C. Murray, J. Winning, John Steel, Robert M'Callum, James Horn, W. J. Wood, J. W. Mackay, William Davidson, Robt. Adams, D. Moore, J. Nisbet, Matthew Edwards, &c.

KINDRED ASSOCIATIONS.

Your Executive rejoice to have to state that they have availed themselves of every opportunity that has presented itself for co-operating with the various temperance organisations in Scotland, and that in consequence they continue to maintain the most cordial relations with them all.

Bailie Selkirk, Mr. John Nisbet, and your Secretary represented your Association at the annual meetings of the United Kingdom Alliance in October last. These meetings were in every sense worthy of this grand organisation. Bailie Selkirk was appointed one of the Council Business Committee and addressed the Council meeting. The relations between your Association and the United Kingdom Alliance are of the most cordial character, and that organisation is represented here by W. S. Caine, Esq., M.P., and Mr. Raper. We all rejoice to see Mr. Raper once more amongst us.

Your Executive gladly welcome representatives from the Scottish Temperance League—Rev. John Douglas and Mr. James Johnstone; from the Irish Temperance League—Mr. W. M. Scott; from the British Good Templars—Rev. J. A. Johnston; and from the American Good Templars—Rev. R. Paterson. They are also glad to welcome a large number of delegates representing those societies who subscribe to the Association. They trust that the unity so apparent among all sections of the movement may never be disturbed, and that all will be eager to combine on every occasion for the promotion of any effort which has for its object the advancement of the temperance reformation.

LITERATURE.

As might be anticipated, there has been considerable attention bestowed on your question by the press. As soon as it was apparent that prohibitionists were resolute in their determination to vote for principle, and not merely for party, leading articles and correspondence absorbed much of the space of the ordinary press. On one hand your principle was admitted to be sound but your action was inexpedient; on the other you had been corrupted and had sold yourself to the party in power. Your Executive availed themselves of every opportunity to state the true issue on which they were prepared to fight, and they have little grounds for complaint against any portion of the press for not giving due publicity to their action and the reason for it. The constant notice taken of your policy provoked inquiry into your principles and aims by the intelligent, and the interests of the agitation were largely benefited by the publicity and criticism to which your Association was subjected. The cause is deeply indebted to those gentlemen who so ably defended your course of action in those papers to whose columns they had access. Your Association is specially indebted to the Alliance News, Christian News, The Good Templar, League Journal, Irish League Journal, and Irish Temperance Banner, The Medical Temperance Journal, Church of England Temperance Chronicle, British Temperance Advocate, and Weekly Record, which have all rendered signal services to the movement during the year. Among the representatives of the Scottish press the following deserve honourable mention:—The Daily Review, North British Daily Mail, Alloa Advertiser, Northern Ensign, Orkney Herald, Greenock Telegraph, Paisley Express, and many others. The Scottish Press in general have taken increased notice of Permissive Prohibition, and it may be confidently affirmed that there was scarcely one paper in Scotland who did not, last year, draw the attention of its readers to the electoral aspect of your question.

During the year your Executive have been as liberal in the distribution of literature—book, pamphlet, and tract—as their resources would permit, and have to report that a very liberal distribution has taken place. They have always recognised the value of this branch of their operations, and regret that they have not been enabled to carry it out to the extent that the present position of the movement requires. The Social Reformer continues worthily to represent the Association. It is growing in public favour, and is receiving increased commendation from its contemporaries and the press in general. They earnestly ask members and friends to co-operate with them in getting it more widely circulated by bringing it under the notice of their friends, and thus make it as useful as its conductors would wish.

The New Year's Tract for 1880 was written by the Rev. H. S. Paterson, M.D., of London, and was issued in a most attractive style. Its circulation was injured by the delay in its publication. The Tract for 1881 is written by Rev. Dr. H. Bonar, of Edinburgh, and is entitled "The City of the Plague." It will be issued in the attractive form in which this series appears.

OBITUARY.

During the year your Executive have had to mourn the decease of many devoted friends of the Association and the movement. The agitation has sustained a serious loss by the death of Mr. John Smith, of Fairmount, Bothwell. He was one of the vice-presidents of the Association from its institution, and his large-hearted sympathy, his generous hospitality to deputations visiting the Association, and his full-handed liberality to the funds cheered your Executive in their labours, and the remembrance of his sympathy and liberality cause them to keenly feel his loss. Mr. G. Shirra-Gibbs, J.P., Cults, also a vice-president, was a valued labourer, and did much in the north to further the interests of the Association. Mr. Wm. Gray, Kinning Park, was a steadfast friend, and among the members of the Society of Friends laboured abundantly in the interests of temperance and prohibition. The Rev. D. Kerr, of Dunse, was for many years the president of your auxiliary and was one of the most devoted friends of the cause. The Rev. Francis Johnston, Messrs. David Craig, T. Knox, J.P., J. Craig, M.D., J. Chalmers, and J. Thyne, of Edinburgh; Rev. John Wise, Auchtermuchty; Councillor Sutherland, Dundee; Messrs. T. Biggart, Dalry; R. Rankine, Haddington; W. L. Roy, Alloa; D. Nicol, Blairgowrie; Wm. M. Millan, Avonbridge; Mr. R. Laurie and Eben. Anderson, Glasgow, have all proved themselves the staunch friends of prohibition, and deserve this sorrowful tribute. Mr. Wm. M'Combie, of Tillyfour, when in Parliament did good service at a time when your friends there were few, and after he had relinquished parliamentary honours he rendered the movement great service in West Aberdeenshire. Your Executive have to regret the loss of Mr. E. A. Aitken, who died as we were assembled here last year. He earned the character of an intelligent, faithful, devoted, and successful servant, and, in his sphere, combined great aptitude for business with staunch loyalty to principle. The loss of his services is deeply regretted by friends in various parts of the country who knew his worth and who will join your Executive in this sorrowful tribute to his memory.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

Your Executive, profiting by what took place at the general election of 1874, maintained a vigorous prosecution of the electoral policy of the Association. It was evident on every bye-election that, so far as your Association was concerned, success depended upon whether or not the constituency was intelligent on your policy, had been canvassed for their pledges, or had organised their electoral strength. Your Executive became more and more convinced that upon the electoral organisation of the electors the lasting success of the movement would be found to rest. At such times, and with what resources they could command, and in this respect the value of the electoral action fund can hardly be overestimated, they entered upon the work. They are well aware how imperfectly the work has been overtaken, how defective in the critical judgment it may appear, but they point to its results, and merely add that it has proved that in appealing to the electors upon the permissive suppression of the liquor traffic they were simply appealing to the "Master of Parliament."

Your Executive, in view of the general election, continued to make the fullest preparation in their power for that important event. The friends of the Association co-operated with them in interviewing all new candidates that entered the field, and they themselves published a list of all the votings on the question, by which constituencies might be guided in their choice of candidates, published lists of all the candidates appearing before the electors, and issued an election address. Their agents in their several districts were busy carrying out the instructions of your Executive, imparting information, assisting the friends, and the result of these varied efforts has been a splendid triumph for the cause.

Parliament opened in February with the usual formalities, and it seemed as if there was to be another session still, with the general election to follow in the autumn. On the 9th March, however, a letter from the Earl of Beaconsfield to the Duke of Marlborough proved really an appeal to the constituencies. There was a hurried dispatch of what business remained to be done in Parliament. The House was dissolved on the 24th March and the new Parliament met for the transaction of business on April 29th under, as was evident, strangely altered circumstances.

In the conflict that raged your question assumed a foremost place. Its friends were fully sensible of the value of the opportunity placed within their reach and fully availed themselves of it. Their firm unyielding attitude produced its intended effect, and they reaped a victory at almost every polling booth. As proof of the great interest felt in your question it may be stated that there were 107 candidates for the 60 Scottish seats. Of that number 61 were in favour of local option, 35 opposed it, while 11 declared for neutrality, but the result of the elections was far more favourable than these figures showed. Of the 60 members elected 46, or more than two thirds of the entire representation were in favour of local option, 6 only were against it, and 8 took up, meantime, an attitude of neutrality. Of the 60 members at the general election 11 honourable members relinquished their seats, 11 were rejected by their constituency, 24 were opposed but were returned, 14 were unopposed and 22 were elected for the first time. In the old Parliament your Executive could reckon upon the support of 32, upon the opposition of 7 and on the neutrality of 21; but in the new Parliament there were 46 favourable, 6 opposed, and 8 in favour of neutrality. In the new Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland 248 were pledged to support local option, of this number 100 were new friends. There were also 57 who sympathized with Sir Wilfrid Lawson's aims, so that 305 or a number only 21 less than the half of the full strength of Parliament were in full sympathy with the party of prohibition. This gratifying result of the general election is due to a faithful adherence on the part of the friends to the electoral policy of the movement. They were loyal to their cause and they were rewarded by a success both in the country and in Parliament as memorable and as likely to be enduring as has ever attended the efforts of any body of moral and social reformers.

PARLIAMENT IN SESSION.

Notwithstanding the very general impression that there would be a general election before Parliament met the House assembled as usual in February. On the opening night notices were given of a number of liquor bills. There was the bill of Mr. A. M. Sullivan for early closing—the bill of Mr. J. W. Pease for partial Sunday closing in England—the bill of Mr. Stevenson for total Sunday closing in England—the bill of Mr. Roberts for total Sunday closing in Wales—Dr. Cameron's bill for stopping Sunday liquor traffic on board passenger steamers—Mr. Stanley Hill's bill for dealing with grocer's licenses—and that of Mr. Ritchie dealing with beer licenses. None of these bills survived. On the 6th February Sir Wilfrid secured by ballot Friday, 5th March, for his local option resolution. He also got a first place for it, thus securing the best possible chance for its discussion. Your Executive, highly encouraged by the numbers that voted in its support on the first occasion of its being brought forward, called upon the friends everywhere to press the importance of voting in its favour upon their representatives, and it is to their warm response to the urgent appeal of your Executive that so much success was due. Honourable members frankly confessed upon no other question had they received so many communications from their constituents. Your Executive also asked the co-operation of all sections of the Scottish Temperance Movement, which was most cordially given, and contributed materially to the voting. Your Executive also deputed the following gentlemen to London to see to the interests of the resolution:—ex-Councillor Paterson, Aberdeen; Mr. John Steel, Edinburgh; Messrs. R. C. Murray, T. L. Selkirk, and R. Mackay, Glasgow, who during the brief time at their disposal saw nearly all the honourable members who were in town. These were joined in London by Mr. D. Brown, Glasgow. A special circular was addressed to each Scottish representative directing his attention to the resolution, and asking him to be in his place on the day named for its discussion, and give it his support. On that day in a full house Sir Wilfrid, in a speech of great ability, moved his resolution, which was in the following terms:—"That inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquor is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected—namely, the inhabitants themselves—who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system by some efficient measure of local option." He was seconded by Mr. Burt, whose eloquence greatly moved Mr. Gladstone, who rose and in a brief but telling address expressed his doubts about there being a national unanimity on the principle embodied in the resolution, told the House that he could not vote for the resolution because it meant suppression as well as restriction; he would not vote for things as they are, so he would refrain from voting. Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Rodwell, Mr. Bulwer, Mr. Muntz, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Cross all spoke against the resolution; but Mr. Leatham, Mr. Mark Stewart (the only Scottish M.P. who spoke on the debate), Mr. Colman, right hon. John Bright, and Sir H. Johnston spoke more or less in favour of the resolution. The Marquis of Hartington was against the resolution because it was just the Permissive Bill. After a debate extending to nearly eight hours, the House divided, when 248 voted against and 134 for the resolution, the majority against it was thus 114. The several amendments to the resolution of which notice had been given fell to the ground. The Scotch vote was well maintained. The votes and pairs in its favour equalled the previous vote, while there was a decrease of three against. Every division upon either bill or resolution, even in a publican Parliament, judging by the action of the members of Parliament for Scotland, had told in favour of granting the Scotch people the power of vetoing the liquor traffic. On this occasion the voting was remarkable, 7 county members voted and 2 paired for the resolution, 6 county members voted and 1 paired against, showing a majority of 2 of a county vote for the resolution; 21 burgh members voted or paired for the resolution, and not one voted against; 1 University member voted for it, while the other was silent. The full vote was 29 and 3 pairs for, and 6 and 1 pair against. No Scotch Liberal M.P. voted against the resolution. The voting had no party significance, as both political parties were found voting for it. Five members of the Government—right hon. W. E. Baxter; right hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair; H. Campbell-Banerman, Esq.; M. E. Grant Duff, Esq.; and G. O. Trevelyan, Esq.—representing Scotch constituencies supported it. Taking Scotch county populations into account, there are a larger population in those counties in favour of the resolution than in those against it; the valuation of these counties whose members supported Sir Wilfrid is in excess of those who voted adversely. This was the sixth time that on a division on the Permissive bill and the Local Option resolution Scottish members polled a majority in favour of permissive prohibition. Thus, even in a publican Parliament, there were grounds for great encouragement. The community were becoming year by year more intelligent upon this question, full of increasing sympathy, and more willing to co-operate with the Executive in behalf of their great aim, so that in a moribund and hostile Parliament solid progress was being made, and they could look forward with considerable confidence to the result of the appeal which the Government would at no distant period be compelled to address to the country.

The new Parliament met on the 29th April, and the third notice given was by Sir Wilfrid Lawson of his local option resolution, on the terms of which your Executive have already reported. There were quite a plethora of notices about bills, but they were the same as those already noticed, with the exception of the Church of England Temperance Society's bill, brought in by Sir Harcourt Johnstone and Mr. Birly, which may be fitly termed a licensing board bill. None of them advanced to any extent in their passage through the House, if we except the Welsh Sunday Closing bill, that passed its second reading without a division. Sir Wilfrid, with his usual great good-fortune, secured Friday, 18th June—Waterloo day—for the discussion of his resolution. There was a general impression that there would be a great increase in the voting in its favour, but hardly any believed that the resolution would be so triumphantly carried. The friends of the resolution in Scotland when appealed to responded with the greatest enthusiasm, as the number and urgency of their communications to their representatives could testify. The various temperance organizations cordially co-operated with your Executive, and there was a feeling that the Scotch vote would be overwhelmingly in favour of the resolution. Your Executive looking to the election returns, felt some anxiety as to their being confirmed by the voting about to take place, as it was an open secret that many successful candidates did not think that they would be called upon so soon after their election to divide upon this question. Your Executive appointed a deputation to go to London in the interests of the resolution. That deputation was inclusive of the following:—Rev. Dr. Adamson; Messrs. John Nisbet and J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh; Messrs. Colquhoun, Murray, and Mackay, Glasgow; and Mr. Winning, Paisley. Ex-Bailie Little, Kilmarnock and Councillor Johnstone, Dumfries, joined the deputation in London. Every member for Scotland in town, with one exception, was seen, and those absent communicated with. The efforts of the deputation were supported by letters and memorials from the various constituencies, the acknowledgment of which was a very serious tax upon the time and energies of honourable gentlemen; and by special circulars from the Scottish Temperance League and your own Association. Your Executive have to report that your deputation displayed an ability, tact, and persistency that gave them an immense advantage over their adversaries. On the afternoon previous to the debate they met the Home Secretary by appointment. The right hon. gentleman had agreed to meet with a deputation from the Licensed Victuallers at the same time. Your opponents made an insignificant master on the occasion—there was not one of all their friends in the House who had the courtesy or the courage to lead them into the presence of Sir William Harcourt. This difficulty was got over by one of your deputation inducing Lord Elcho to do them that service. Their interview was brief, and the loud whisper in the lobby was that it was unsatisfactory. Your deputation, on the contrary, awakened the interest and the sympathy of many honourable members, and had the good fortune to be ushered into the presence of the Home Secretary by D. McLaren, Esq., M.P. The deputation was accompanied by General Sir A. Gordon, Sir G. Campbell, Dr. Cameron, Messrs. Williamson, Noel, McLagan, Grant, Middleton, Dick Peddie, and D. Currie—the right hon. the Lord Advocate was also present. Rev. Dr. Adamson and Mr. R. C. Murray spoke for the deputation. The right hon. gentleman made no public statement, but stated that he was convinced that the country had gone with the party represented by the deputation. His views changed in their favour through the progress and passage of the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill. If the people of Scotland showed a similar unanimity to the people of Ireland in their efforts to secure liquor legislation, they would no doubt impress the legislature in their favour. The Government would by the division to-morrow learn the tendency and force of public opinion, and be guided by it if they had in any way to deal with the licensing laws. The right hon. gentleman intimated that the members of the Government were free to vote as they pleased. Mr. R. T. Middleton having thanked the Home Secretary, the deputation much pleased withdrew.

The next evening the House was quite filled to hear Sir Wilfrid, for whom the Government, having resolved on morning sittings on private members' days, felt bound to keep a house. At a few minutes after nine the honourable baronet rose to move his resolution amid loud cheers. There was an unusually large house to greet him. His speech was most excellent, telling, and argumentative, and had the stimulus of the deep attention and evident sympathy of his auditory. He did not speak at such length as he usually does on this question. Mr. Hugh Mason ably seconded the amendment, and was listened to with close attention, and rewarded with hearty cheers. The Prime Minister followed in a speech, every word of which was carefully weighed, showing that he felt the grave importance of the occasion. He concluded his address with the following significant words:—"With regard to the question of my honourable friend, I will only say these two things in conclusion—first, that among the great subjects to which the attention of the Executive Government shall be directed as the pressure of business will allow, will be the task of reforming the licensing laws; secondly, I believe that in the reform which is so loudly called for and favoured by the circumstances in which we now stand, we shall take as an essential principle the motion of my honourable friend." The House loudly cheered these words. Sir R. Cunliffe, Mr. A. Arnold, Mr. W. S. Caine supported the amendment; Captain Aylmer, Lord Elcho, Colonel Barnes, Colonel Burnaby, and Mr. Warton supported the motion. It was evident, as these speakers severally addressed the House, that its sympathies decidedly lay with the prohibitionists. The division was announced at 12.50 A.M. as follows—for supply, 203; for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, 229; majority for Sir Wilfrid, 26. Immediately on the announcement of the figures great cheering took place, even those in the Speaker's gallery joining in them lustily till ordered to desist. Sir Wilfrid, on his appearance in the lobby, received the fervent congratulations of his many friends.

There were 231 votes, inclusive of 2 tellers, and 14 pairs for the resolution, made up as follows—1 English Conservative, 1 Scotch Conservative, and 10 Irish Conservatives, 142 English Liberals, 23 Welsh Liberals, 18 Irish Liberals, 18 Home Rulers, and 42 Scotch Liberals—total for, 245; against—37 English Liberals, 1 Welsh Liberal, 1 Irish Liberal, 12 Home Rulers, and 1 Scotch Liberal, 155 English Conservatives, 1 Welsh Conservative, 7 Irish Conservatives, and 4 Scotch Conservatives—total against, 219, showing a majority of 26 for the Local Option resolution.

The Scotch vote was the most remarkable thing about the division. For the resolution 43 voted and paired, against it only 5, this gave a majority of 38 for the resolution. But the vote shows 8 to 1 in its favour, and also that two-thirds of the parliamentary representation of Scotland is in favour of giving her rate-payers power to veto the traffic in alcoholic liquors. The verdict of the general election was amply confirmed by this division. Of the 46 who pledged during their candidature to vote with Sir Wilfrid, 39 voted; of the other 7, three, Lord C. Campbell, Messrs. Anderson and Ramsay paired. Colonel Muir and Mr. Matheson were absent on sick leave. Mr. Russell had resigned his seat, and the hon. Preston Bruce did not vote. Then, as regards the opposition, it was anticipated that 6 would vote against the resolution—only 5 did so. There was thus 43 in favour, 5 only against, and 12 absent. The following is an analysis of the voting:—

Playfair, Right Hon. M. E. G. Duff, J. W. Barclay, Dr. Cameron, R. T. Middleton, J. Stewart, Sir D. Wedderburn, G. O. Trevelyan, C. Fraser-M'Intosh, J. Dick Peddie, Sir G. Balfour, Sir G. Campbell, Captain Maxwell, Major Hamilton, A. Grant, P. M'Lagan, Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, S. Laing, W. Holms, C. Tennant, D. Currie, C. S. Parker, Hon. A. Elliot, S. Williamson, J. C. Bolton. H. Campbell-Bannerman, J. Pender, and M. J. Stewart—40. Paired for—Lord Colin Campbell, J. Ramsay, G. Anderson—3. Total for, 43.

Absent—Colonel Alexander, Right Hon. W. P. Adam, Hon. E. P. Bruce, D. Cameron, Dr. Campbell, Sir T. E. Colebrooke, R. W. Duff, Sir George Macpherson Grant, A. Mathieson, Colonel Mure, T. Russell, Marquess Stafford—12.

At length after a gallant struggle on the part of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the noble band who have earnestly and faithfully stood by him, often discouraged and disheartened, but ever hopeful and ever aggressive, the British Parliament have affirmed the principle, that the liquor traffic must serve the community without detriment to the public welfare, and that where this cannot be done, it must be subjected to the veto of the ratepayers. And, as if this were not enough, we have the pledge of the Prime Minister, that legislation on the drink system, in harmony with this principle, will in the near future be embodied in statute law.

BYE ELECTIONS.

No sooner was the election over than a great many election returns were challenged, petitioned against, or scrutiny of the voting demanded. In Scotland, Bute-shire, Dumbartonshire and Wigtown burghs were in this position. The petitions against both candidates in Dumbartonshire were, however, withdrawn. The successful candidate for the Wigtown burghs, Mr. John M'Laren, having been appointed Lord Advocate for Scotland, had to appear before his constituents for reelection. He was opposed by Mr. Mark Stewart, the defeated candidate. Your Executive appointed a deputation to wait upon both gentlemen in Stranraer, with the result that they advised the friends to support the Lord Advocate. His Lordship on the polling day, 18th May, was defeated by 656 to 633. The return of Mr. Stewart was petitioned against, and because of the acts of some of his committee exhibiting corruption and such like malpractices, he was unseated. The seat being declared vacant, Mr. G. M'icking was the Liberal, and Sir John D. Hay the Conservative candidate. The former was in sympathy with the aims of your association. Sir John was stubbornly opposed. The polling on the 30th July, was in favour of Sir John, who was returned by 636 votes to 620, and is the only opponent in the Scottish burghs to your policy. The Conservatives did not oppose Mr. Gladstone, who was returned for Mid-Lothian unopposed. Mr. Dalrymple and his friends petitioned against the election of Mr. Russell for Bute-shire, on what turned out to be merely technical grounds. That gentleman resigned his seat, but immediately stood for it in the Liberal interest. Mr. C. Dalrymple was his opponent, and defeated him by 45 votes. This contest did not, like the Wigtown burghs bye election, alter the state of the Scotch vote on local option; as your Executive found both candidates in favour of local option they did not offer their assistance. The right hon. W. P. Adam, M.P., having been gazetted governor of Bombay, a vacancy in the counties of Clackmannan and Kinross is imminent. Whether the Lord Advocate or Mr. J. B. Balfour be elected in the Liberal interest, and it is believed that a Liberal is certain to be returned, your policy will receive their support.

CHURCHES.

There are many cheering indications of progress in regard to temperance and prohibition in the Scottish denominations, although they are far from showing the vigorous action in the direction that might be fairly expected from them. The Congregational Union held its meetings in Glasgow this year, and your Executive are glad to report that a very hearty sentiment on the question of prohibition prevails, as is evidenced by the conference at Edinburgh and the annual meeting at Glasgow forwarding petitions to Parliament in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution.

The United Presbyterian Synod meeting in Edinburgh bestowed considerable attention on the temperance question. At a conference of the Synod on temperance, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown roundly affirmed, that, if not more than one pound sterling, per head, was spent by the members of their church on alcoholic liquor, and that sum were, instead, to be devoted to their funds, the aggregate, £174,000, would lift them out of all their monetary difficulties. Rev. Dr. Wallace drew the attention of the conference to the triumph of local option at the general election. In meeting of Synod, the report on temperance and morals was submitted by Rev. Mr. Rankine, Cupar-Fife, and indicated the healthy progress of the temperance movement by the progress of temperance among the young, in the army, navy, among railway servants and women; the increased testimony of the medical profession in favour of abstinence, and the spread of public houses without the drink. The deliverance of the committee was "that drinking customs at ordinations, inductions and funerals be discouraged; that sermons be preached during the forthcoming December; that the committee petition in favour of any parliamentary bill for the restriction of the liquor traffic, and also petition in favour of the earlier closing of public houses. The public morals committee is to deal in future with the temperance question exclusively, in which case, your Executive anticipate vigorous action on the part of the U. P. Synod and church against the liquor traffic. Bailie Selkirk and Mr. Waterston were your representatives at the breakfast party of the U. P. ministers abstinence society, and were warmly welcomed."

In the Church of Scotland, sympathy with your efforts is very feeble, meantime. But the question of how to deal with the intemperance of our country is, here as every where else, irrepressible, and in the course of the sittings, references to it were neither few nor seldom. With regard to Christian Life and Work, the presbyteries were to be asked,—"How can the efficiency of the church be promoted in developing and utilising within the constitution of the church, the special gifts of ministers, such as aptitude for organisation or power of effective address on missionary, evangelistic, temperance or other subjects." The committee of intemperance gave in their report, pointing out in it many indications of an improved state of the country, through lessened inebriety, adding "this may not, however, arise altogether from changed habits, but from the enforced sobriety of hard times!" The deliverance of the Assembly on the report was, "an injunction to watch over the interests of temperance in the church, to have prayers and conferences in all the church courts, to devise measures to promote temperance, to furnish further information to the Assembly on the subject, to keep parochial temperance registers of parochial societies, and the names of ministers and elders who have joined them, and the numbers of ordinary members; and finally, to preach a temperance sermon on Sabbath, 18th December next." Rev. Mr. Allison "charged the great amount of drunkenness to the labouring classes, praised the working classes for their increasing sobriety, and commended the report because it did not suggest any legislative action. The less the church had to do with legislation the better, it was outside her province, and at best, it was of doubtful value. It was the church's duty to deal with the people religiously and moral, not legislatively." The deliverance was agreed to. We might have expected such reasons against legislation from a dissenting church, but not from a church by law established. We will, however, we believe, find the Established Church, at no distant day, repudiating such a deliverance when it is compelled, in the interests of self-existence, to grapple with the intemperance that is confessedly enfeebling its energies.

The subject of intemperance received great attention from the Free Church Assembly. The report on religion and morals pointed out how, in many districts, the evils of drunkenness was decreasing because of the marked attention bestowed on the evil by ministers. A painful duty was laid upon the Assembly, namely, the deposition of the Rev. A. C. Kay, of Loanhead, for drunkenness. As long, however, as alcoholic liquors are used in the church communion it is absurd to expect that ministers will view it with aversion sufficient to deny themselves indulgence in it in some form or other and on some pretence. The report on intemperance was as usual lengthy and interesting. The convener asked "those in that reverend court who wished to learn what intemperance means in this country to try and get into contact with the people among whom they were living, and in helping them towards higher things they would soon find out what stops the way." The deliverance of the Assembly on the report was "an injunction to preach a sermon in December, to train the young in habits of temperance, to form congregational societies, renew the support to Sir W. Lawson's local option resolution, and to petition in favour of Sunday closing in England and Wales, to press upon Parliament the urgency of a measure conferring power upon the people to efficiently control the liquor traffic, and for the earlier closing of public-houses.

Such are, on the whole, the gratifying indications of progress in the direction of prohibitory effort manifest in the leading church courts. Among the other denominations—the Evangelical Union, the Baptist Union, the Wesleyans, and the Primitive Methodists—there is a hearty and growing sympathy with the aims of this Association. Each and all are rapidly coming under the irresistible sway of that enlightened public opinion against the drink interest which is so palpably permeating all classes of the community. The church and its manifold agencies will, in the near future, be constrained into an energetic co-operation with the prohibitory party, the object of which will be the pulling down of one of the strongest fortresses of wickedness in our country—the traffic in alcoholic beverages.

A PERMISSIVE BILL FOR SCOTLAND.

At last annual meeting of the association your Executive were in a position to lay before you an outline of a bill agreed upon by the Directors of the Scottish Temperance League, the Executive of the Independent Order of Good Templars, and your Executive. The joint Sub-Committee to whom the preparation of it was confided employed a draftsman, but so many difficulties disclosed themselves to him that the framing of the measure made little progress. Members of Parliament were seen upon the subject, and your Executive expect that farther action will be taken with regard to it in the next parliamentary session. They have no apprehension as to the future. They know that so great a change as they aim to bring about cannot be brought about suddenly and yet successfully; they frankly admit that greater progress might have been made with the bill but for the intervention of the general election, the successful passage of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, and the Government promise to deal with the liquor law. But these events will greatly conduce to future success by smoothing away the difficulties that meantime beset this subject, and your Executive are sanguine enough to believe that as in the past, they, with your help, met and mastered whatever difficulties sprang up in the way of getting the House of Commons to affirm the principle for which they have so vigorously contended, so they believe, with the help of the efforts of the Moral and Social Reformers of Scotland, now so happily united upon this matter, the difficulties that lie in the path of the passage of a Scottish prohibitory measure will be successively and speedily overcome.

THE FUNDS.

Your Executive are gratified to be able to report a slight increase in the ordinary funds, although the commercial depression which bore so heavily upon the country has not wholly passed away. They are hopeful that with improved trade the elasticity of their funds will return. The increase in the funds during the year would not have taken place but for the generous kindness of Mr. John Smith, of Glasgow, who, previous to his lamented decease, presented £100 to the funds of the Association. The gift was most acceptable, as the United Kingdom Alliance has again reduced their grant to this Association by £100 sterling. Your Executive have now no special fund wherewith to meet any emergency that may arise, and they earnestly hope that before separating to-day you may devise such measure as will tend to increase the financial resources at their disposal. The demands on the funds of the Association are becoming increasingly urgent, and they rely with confidence that you will show a liberality sufficient to meet them fully and promptly. The question of farther efforts is simply a question of farther means.

CONCLUSION.

In resigning into your hands the trust you have been pleased to repose in them, your Executive are gratified at the progress which has been made. The greatest victory, short of the passage of a law enabling the ratepayers to veto the liquor traffic of their respective districts, has been gallantly won by Sir Wilfrid Lawson. The House of Commons has affirmed the principle of local option, and the Prime Minister, in deference to that affirmation, has promised to embody that principle in law. The prospects of this being done look very hopeful. There is every reason to believe that the Liberal Government will during the present Parliament bring in a general licensing measure. Your Executive have no doubt about this; but unless it contains provisions for enabling the Scottish ratepayers to veto the liquor traffic, by which they are injuriously affected, the claims of Scotland to immunity from the liquor traffic will not be fairly met. Your Executive will heartily acquiesce in whatever further restrictions the Government may see fit to impose upon the drink interest, but they are emphatic in their determination not to accept as a settlement any legislation short of the ratepayers' veto over all traffic in alcoholic liquors. What the Government has in store for Scotland will depend upon what her people continue to demand. The persistent efforts of her moral and social reformers in the past, their unflinching adherence to the principles of permissive prohibition, the resolution with which their electoral action has been carried out, their confidence in the results of an appeal to the people on the evils of the liquor traffic, and, above all, the justice and patriotism of their demand have placed them almost within sight of the end of their labours. Your Executive believe that the inhabitants of Scotland more fully realise what ought to be their attitude to this question, that as they are more intelligent they will become more determined to complete the work you have carried on. Be it yours, then, to see that vigorous and devoted efforts are made by you to increase the power of public opinion in your favour, that your agencies are most efficient, your further organisation of the electoral strength of the country persistent and thorough, and that you are resolved not to yield a jot or tittle of your just demand for a veto over the liquor traffic. The whole agitation furnishes a signal proof of what energy and determination can effect. Let that energy, that determination be continued and increased, and the evil against which we have warred so persistently will sooner or later be overthrown. (Loud applause.)

Mr. M'CALLUM read the treasurer's statement, which showed that the balance of the last year was £57 9s. 6d.; subscriptions inclusive of the special fund, £1,786 17s. 5d.; publications and advertisements, £109 5s.; collections at public meetings, £120 10s.—total, £2,074 1s. 11d. The expenditure left a balance in hand of £59 2s. 0½d. He thanked the members for the support which had been given to the association. They had lost a number of large subscriptions, but these had been made up by the smaller subscriptions—there being £68 more last year than in the year before. (Applause.)

Glasgow, 28th September, 1880.—I have examined the books of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for year ending 27th September, 1880, and compared them with the vouchers produced, and I certify the whole correct—the balance on hand being Fifty-nine pounds two shillings and a halfpenny sterling.
(Signed) JNO. GOURLAY, C.A.

Mr. WM. ROBERTSON, Paisley, in moving the adoption of the secretary's and treasurer's reports, said that the former was a red letter one. It was satisfactory that public opinion upon their question was rapidly changing, there being few men who did not believe that a trade which decreased the national welfare should be prohibited. They did not want to convince people. What was wanted was some power to stir them up. As to the Church, there was not much moving of the waters there. No doubt the various bodies had petitioned in favour of Local Option; but there were other important measures required, and if a prohibitory bill were brought forward, how many of these bodies would help them? He strongly advocated the formation of ladies' associations to forward the movement. Such associations had done good in other directions. Why should they not do good for the promotion of prohibition? (Applause.) Mr. Robertson referred in humorous terms to questions on the subject of temperance which he had put to the moderators of the three great Presbyterian Churches some time ago, and read the replies received to these as indicating, in a measure, the Church's position to the movement. Rev. William France, moderator of the United Presbyterian Synod, replied—"I beg to acknowledge your letter, and remain, yours faithfully, William Fraser." (Laughter.) No answer was received from Dr. Gould, the moderator of the Free Church. The moderator of the Established Church, Dr. Phinn, wrote as follows—"Dr. Phinn presents his compliments to Mr. Robertson, and begs to be excused from expressing any opinions on the questions stated in Mr. Robertson's letter of yesterday."

Mr. JAMES DRYSDALE, Bridge of Allan, in seconding the motion, said they could not fail to feel ashamed at the very little they, as individuals, had done. He felt they had not got half way up the hill, for their hard work was but beginning. He trusted that from the appeals made they would feel a call made upon them to do more in the way of subscriptions and effort; for the misery in the land due to intemperance was such that they should work rigorously while it was day. (Applause.)

Mr. AENEAS MACKAY moved the adoption of a list of office-bearers, Treasurer Hamilton being President.

Mr. HOGG, Arbroath, seconded the motion. He said that the Association had done much work during the past year, and advanced in every direction. There was a hopeful spirit amongst them, and friends in the country had much reason to be thankful for such an excellent list of office-bearers.

The motion was adopted.

EX-COUNCILLOR PATERSON, Aberdeen, moved:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the progress of the agitation during the past year affords room for abundant satisfaction; rejoices at the triumphant results of the general election; hails with the liveliest satisfaction the passage of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution; recommends the Executive to energetically prosecute the agitation by an electoral canvas, public meetings, conferences, and otherwise; and calls earnestly upon friends throughout the country to encourage them by a vigorous and sustained co-operation." They could not, he said, fail to congratulate themselves on the results of the last general election, especially when they contrasted them with the results of the election of 1874. They had no longer to fear the publican's power. That power lay like an incubus during the existence of the last Parliament. Public opinion was now more advanced, and there was in nearly all classes a latent feeling in our favour. But he regretted that amongst themselves there were not a few who by their action did not make it known that they were abstainers, or favourable to prohibition. He hoped such friends would show what side they were upon. (Applause.)

Rev. S. HARDING, Paisley, in seconding the motion, wished the meeting to understand that the clergy were not the church, for there were tens of thousands of lay members prepared to push this question forward, and, if the ministers were not ready, to go on without them. They were carried away by error when they wanted to be always speaking of peace. He had read in the Old Book, "Suppose ye I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you nay, but rather division." This was said by the Lord Jesus Christ. His mission was to cause division, and the mission of the church was to cause division. The mission of all philanthropic and patriotic institutions was to cause division. There were the kingdom of truth and the kingdom of error. Agitation and division there would be until they had succeeded in putting down error, sin, and immorality in every shape and form. (Applause.) Let them agitate till they had turned the liquor traffic upside down; agitate from the Mull of Galloway to John O' Groat's, and then very soon there would be a change in matters. People said they must follow their party however much they sympathised with the prohibitory movement. But there was a grander thing than party, viz., the welfare of the country. (Applause.)

Mr. JAMES MILLER of Monkton, in supporting the resolution, spoke strongly in favour of the electoral canvas. He was struck during last election very much with its importance, having been one of a deputation who waited upon the Liberal candidate for South Ayrshire. The hon. gentleman did not believe in prohibitory legislation, but ended by being convinced. Mr. Miller therefore called upon the members to sustain the Executive by a vigorous co-operation. Operations could not be carried on without funds, and it would be well that in that respect all did their duty. He was willing to contribute so far as he could, and he hoped to live to see the day when the battle should be won, and this iniquitous traffic put under their lawful and righteous control. (Applause.)

Mr. ANDREW SHANKS, Barrhead, moved the fourth resolution:—"That this meeting offers its warmest congratulations, and tenders its most cordial thanks to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., and the 244 honourable members who voted and paired in favour of his Local Option Resolution, embodying the permissive suppression of the liquor traffic, and gratefully acknowledges the valuable co-operation of the various Scottish temperance organisations previous to the divisions which have this year taken place on the resolution." He said that God raised up in every age men to do the work he had in hand. In this case he had raised up Sir Wilfrid Lawson for the regeneration of society. He had been fighting their battle for 30 years, and had earned the gratitude of all temperance reformers. A friend beside the speaker had called a son after the honourable baronet, and there were many little Lawsons over the country, all bearing their parents' testimony of admiration. If they had lived in the ages of mythology, their admiration would have made them give him a niche in the temple of the deities. (Laughter.) When they learned the result of the vote of 18th June, they had not a ceiling high enough to which to throw their hats. (Laughter.) It had been said by a friend that they had not reached the half-way house. But he thought, with all deference, that they had; nay, they had got over the key-stone of the brig. They had nearly won the battle, for the House of Commons and Mr. Gladstone were committed to give a local option measure in some form or other. The only question was what form it should take. (Applause.)

Rev. ROBERT WALLACE, in seconding the resolution, paid a high tribute to Sir Wilfrid Lawson for his long and valuable services, and said that he was so full of wit and good humour that his very opponents could not but admire and listen to him. (Applause.) Mr. Wallace then remarked that except at Oxford, where the roughs threw flour at him and the good Bishop, Sir Wilfrid had received manifestations of the lasting gratitude of the abstainers throughout the kingdom. The organisations in Scotland were now at one upon the question of prohibition. When they used to meet Members of Parliament, the objection made by them was, let temperance people be agreed amongst themselves. Now the Scottish Temperance League, Good Templars, and all sections were agreed. They could therefore bring to bear their united strength upon the legislature.

Rev. Dr. ADAMSON, Edinburgh, in supporting the resolution, said there was no class which had made more progress upon this question than the clergy. In the city of Edinburgh many leading men were on their side, including Principals and Professors of colleges, and leading clergymen, who had joined the ranks within the last five years. That was a matter upon which they had reason to congratulate themselves. But after all, the clergy were always in advance, and should be always in advance. (Laughter.) He believed with Mr. Shanks that they had reached the key-stone of the arch. If they made as much progress in Edinburgh in the future as they had done in the past, and if that progress was in an increasing ratio, they would soon reach the goal of their hopes. He also said that the number who voted for local option was 245, not 244. By and by there would be a Scotch measure. They were better situated for it than England, many of whose population were saturated with beer. He believed that at least half-a-dozen members would endorse a Scotch bill, and if it were got the thin end of the wedge would be driven in, and the temperance jubilee would soon be celebrated. (Applause.)

Mr. SHANKS said more members would have voted for the local option resolution if circumstances had not intervened. For instance, Colonel Mure was too ill to be present at the debate; but, as he would have supported the resolution, he also deserved their thanks. (Applause.)

Mr. PATON, in supporting the resolution, said the men who signed the pledge and converted the Colonel were also deserving of thanks. He did not think that it was a circumstance to be deplored that members voted with Sir Wilfrid Lawson against their will. He wished a great many more would vote with him against their will, for it must be remembered that the House of Commons was a place of compromise, and if the House of Commons made the constituencies as compromising as themselves, then it would be a great compromise altogether, but they had nothing to look for from compromising men. It was rather from men of principle. Every canvassed man who had stood by his gun in the House of Commons should be included in this resolution. It had been said by a friend that the kirk could be converted by the women. Now women were a humanising power, and could bring their influence to bear, because until we sympathised with our brethren upon the broad principle of humanity little progress could be made. A converted kirk and a converted Liberal party—what a power! A canvassing man was a sincere man, and he made the canvassing man sincere. Canvassing to-day was the highest cultivating power which could be put forth. (Applause.) He wanted local option only in one form, namely, power to the people to destroy the curse of drink. Unless they confined themselves to this, they would be playing into the hands of tricky politicians. They had adopted great resolutions; but their talk was apart from them. Let the temperance world of Scotland feel from their earnestness and intelligence they were at the head of the movement, and they would create the man who would take the measure into the House of Commons. Sir Wilfrid Lawson was at the head of the movement in England. Why had they not a man as the outcome of the temperance movement in Scotland? If they were superior to England in intelligence, why were they not equal to that country in having a representative man?

Mr. R. MACKAY said Mr. Paton was mistaken when he said that they had not found the man.

Mr. PATON—I am glad I am mistaken. Who is he?

Mr. MACKAY—I could mention several men who would be willing, although they would not take up the matter as Sir Wilfrid has done. But to say we have no man is to say what is not correct.

The CHAIRMAN—I suppose Mr. Paton means the man has yet to come to the front.

The motion was then carried.

Captain BROTCHE moved the fifth resolution—

"That this meeting, having regard to the avowed intention of the Government to legislate during the present Parliament in harmony with the principles and policy of the prohibitory movement, earnestly calls upon members and friends to co-operate in increasing the funds at the disposal of the Executive, so that they may be amply provided with means for vigorously prosecuting the agitation in the country, and for urging upon the Government the national demand for power to enable the ratepayers by a suppressive veto to effectually protect themselves against the injustice and wrong of having public-houses thrust upon them against their will." The Permissive Bill came to the help of the helpless, for it came down to the rescue of those who could not resist the drink. He did not think the Churches or Parliament could now resist the force which was brought to bear upon them regarding this question. He believed some of them would yet live to see their cause triumphant.

Dr. M'ULLOCH, Dumfries, said the resolution embraced two things—the first was the funds for carrying on the movement, and the second, the measure desired. With regard to the funds, he believed that people who had the means should show the extent of their sympathy by the amount they subscribed. There was a person who had got himself hurt, and a sympathizing crowd had collected. One shrewd fellow took off his hat and sent it round asking how much they sympathized. The members could show their sympathy in this way, for unless it had funds the institution could not be carried on. They were warring against a rich institution—the drink traffic. Unless they canvassed the electors, they would take a long time before the traffic would be prohibited. They could not tell the objections which existed in the mind of any man until they had conversed privately with him and heard those objections. Thus they might meet and convert the man. No man was a Liberal who would not vote down the traffic. If he did not consent to do this, such a man was only a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal, and they had no right to vote for such a man. He never entirely approved of the Local Option resolution, and he said to Sir Wilfrid Lawson that whenever it was fully tested, Mr. Gladstone, Lord Hartington, and Mr. Bright would turn against him. Therefore all he had said was to induce the friends to open their purse strings.

Mr. WINNING, of Paisley, in supporting the motion said that the financial statement showed the balance of their assets at a considerable loss, as compared with that time last year. That is, their income was less and their expenditure was much greater. In the matter of deputation and office expenses, they had spent that year £200 more than they did in the preceding year. Therefore, an urgent call was made upon the friends to be more liberal than they had been in the past. It was said that Paisley people were bumptious. Well, it would be found that they paid 1s. per £ of all the subscriptions, and if the country were taken, the amount would be found to be 2s. 6d. per £, so that taking Paisley and Renfrewshire, they stood, as compared with the rest of Scotland, in a favourable position. He had often said, "What do you people in the country do with your money?" Eight towns gave half of the whole subscriptions, some small and others large, although none was in the position it ought to be. Bailie Selkirk had given them a great lesson in Paisley when he said that progress would be in proportion to the giving. The Association had gone upon the principle that they wanted honestly to pay their way. Unless they put the Executive in possession of larger funds, they would be far behind next year. The enterprise could not have been carried on had it not been for such men as Bailies Selkirk and Torrens, who abandoned their home-comforts to serve the Association. The fact was that the bank account was being overdrawn to keep things square. But if they had funds in hand, there was no saying what could be done. It had been said they had not a man yet to lead them. If they had the funds they would soon evoke a man to take the lead. An appeal was therefore made to them to furnish the Executive with the sinews of war in order to prosecute the movement more vigorously in the future than in the past.

The motion was then adopted.

Mr. W. DAVIDSON proposed the sixth resolution:—"This meeting fully recognising the very satisfactory position which the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory Movement has now attained, more especially since the recent General Election, and being of opinion that a vigorous and united effort should now be made to secure the right of vetoing the sale of alcoholic liquors at the earliest possible moment, in harmony with the advanced public sentiment, recommends the Executive to consider the propriety of arranging for a series of district conferences of the friends of the movement, in order that united political action may be taken in the ensuing session of Parliament."

Mr. JOHN WILLIAMS, Wishaw, seconded the motion. He said some friends were afraid of local option, but he thought Sir Wilfrid Lawson would take care that they obtained a bill something like that for which they were working. They had got much and were hoping for more. He would like the sale of liquor stopped, not only for the sake of the intelligent; but for the sake of the ignorant; for there were thousands of both classes who could not keep the pledge. But as the rich were expected to take care of themselves, he had more interest in the movement for the sake of the poor. It was said they wanted to deprive the working man of his beer. Quite true, because the beer was robbing his wife and children. He went further. He wanted not only to stop the sale, but stop the manufacture.

Mr. RAPER, Manchester, supported the resolution. He was thankful for the advanced position of the movement in Scotland; and he rather thought the nation had not yet realised how advanced the movement was in Scotland. He never saw such a large Scotch vote as took place on the 18th of June, and it did not do for the politicians to cry down the motives of the men who went with them. There was a rude motto in England—"Never cry stinking fish." He would tell them what these 43 men voted for—that it was unjust to force liquor shops upon people against their will. (Applause.) They did not vote for prohibition—they did not vote for permissive prohibition. But when they put that question to them, "Sir, do you think it is right, when parishes don't want liquor shops, that, in spite of their wish, they should have them forced upon them?" "No; do you think I am a dog? Is thy servant a dog that he should do such a thing?" That was the style in which members of Parliament always treated that question. All that they wanted was to make it illegal to force liquor shops upon a community against their will. The members were shut up in a corner. But they would take them further; and the time would come when the bill would be on the statute book, and then they would ask the members to vote in their own parishes that liquor shops should be put out. Scotland was ripe, and he trusted the conferences about to be held would bring about such a state of feeling that a man would be found to inaugurate the bill, and that next session might see it pass. Let that be their aim, whether they secured it or not. (Applause.)

The resolution was unanimously carried.

Mr. REID, Coatbridge, moved an amendment to the effect that an united effort should be made to introduce a Scottish Permissive Bill.

Bailie SELKIRK explained that the resolution had been left open to enable them to support any measure which would give, at the earliest possible moment, the greatest possible power.

After some discussion Mr. Reid withdrew the amendment.

Rev. R. PATERSON moved the seventh resolution—"That this meeting records its satisfaction with the conduct of the Social Reformer, tenders its best thanks to the editor and contributors, expresses its approval of the literature issued during the past year, strongly recommends increased enterprise in this department, and pledges itself to co-operate energetically with the Executive in securing for the magazine and literature of the Association a still wider circulation." The resolution embraces, as you will observe, five particulars. About the first there will be no hesitation, I am sure, that this meeting records its satisfaction with the conduct of the Social Reformer. Your magazine holds no mean position in the field of temperance literature. It stands among those journals that are regarded as maintaining the front rank in the great social reform of the age. Broad and comprehensive in its sweep; fundamental, intelligent, and consistent in its principles; massive in its moral earnestness, permeated with a fine and finely-chastened tone of Christianity, always interesting and fresh in its facts and news, keeping its readers abreast with the development and the progress of our cause; able, and manly, and courageous, and uncompromising in its wielding of its weapons of warfare, it challenges our respect and admiration. We are more than pleased with it. And this meeting, I am sure, will have pleasure in recording its satisfaction with the conduct of the Social Reformer, as well as tendering its best thanks to the editor and contributors. You are also asked to approve of the literature issued during the past year. This item in the resolution will be heartily accepted, I am sure, for that literature is not only first class, but also, for the most part, of the very highest in the first class of true temperance teaching. I have only to mention as specimens, "Why is Trade Depressed?" "Our Production and the Present Stagnation in Trade," by William Hoyle; "A Cloud of Witnesses;" "Success of Prohibition in Maine;" "License Reform Schemes Essentially Inadequate and Unsatisfactory," and "The Duty of Temperance Reformers in relation to Parliamentary Elections," by Bailie Selkirk of Glasgow, &c., &c. The only matter with respect to which probably you will not be able to express entire satisfaction, is the far too limited extent to which those and similar invaluable pamphlets and tracts have been scattered over the land, and among the masses of the people; and then in this case your dissatisfaction (which I hope will be deep and sincere, and followed by fruits meet for repentance), will fall upon your own heads, for no doubt the Executive have done their very best with the scanty means at their disposal. A very favourite expression on the prohibitory law platform is, that "Laws do not make themselves, and when registered on the statute book do not enforce themselves." It is my duty to remind you, if you will kindly bear with me, that in like manner pamphlets and tracts do not print themselves, and publish themselves, and scatter themselves broadcast among men. This brings us up to the point that I would wish to lay emphasis upon, the weighty element, as I regard it, of the resolution—"That this meeting strongly recommends increased enterprise in this department." Trite and commonplace as it is to say that the press is a great power in our modern civilisation, very few of us even who are accustomed to use the phrase think of it as we should, and act in accordance with it. Philosophically viewed, nothing is more certain than the principle that, ultimately viewed, it is thought which governs man. Or, as the Bible in its wisdom puts it, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Men, from head to foot of the body politic, are greatly in need of light as regards the nature and effects of alcohol, and also the evils essentially inherent in the gigantic anomaly and crime of the licensed liquor traffic. A year or so back I remember going to a small town to lecture on the temperance question. Some four or five ministers met in the anteroom before going upon the platform. The chairman, desirous to arrange a programme, said, "Mr. A., you will please to take such a part; Mr. B., you will please to take such another part;" and so on. Without exception, all refused. One, speaking for the rest, said, "Mr. Paterson, as the stranger, the speaking will all fall to your lot this evening;" and he added, in his excessive modesty, "The fact is that we have spoken repeatedly on the subject here, and I myself, on that very platform, have said almost everything that can be said on the question." He was a young man, ladies and gentlemen. My first word, when introduced to the audience was that, in my judgment, instead of having exhausted, we had as yet scarcely pricked the rind of this great subject. When we have mastered the physiological aspect, the chemical aspect, the economical aspect, the social aspect, the political aspect, the moral and spiritual and eternal aspects of this far-reaching, deep-drawing, and many-sided question, we shall have made an approximation to the mastery of it; but how far are even the advanced Temperance reformers in general from this full-orbed and somewhat comprehensive treatment of the case? Leaving the platform aside for the present, I think that one phase of the literature question demands grappling with to-day. Gen. Neal Dow has said, before he gained the Maine Law he "had seeded the State of Maine knee-deep with literature." There may be an innocent exaggeration in the statement, putting a magnifying glass on the matter that it might stand out boldly to the mind; but it contains in essence a most important and loudly clamant truth for us here to-day. What we need very specially, and must set about accomplishing, is to have the great scientific and statistic investigations and results known only to the initiated few popularised, and in short pithy, condensed, yet striking and popular representations circulated in pamphlets, and leaflets by the million among the masses of our fellowmen. The great old Homer rose to a grand conception when he spoke of words as "winged words." They fly, when true and good, hither and thither on the beams of light, penetrating every nook and corner and crevice of the land. And what we desiderate is, that the whole country should be flooded with such "winged words," and thus the mind of the community as a whole, old and young, steeped in the morally compelling facts and ideas of this burning question, not only of Great Britain and Ireland, but of the civilized world at large. Such monthlies as the Social Reformer cannot be dispensed with. No organization in our day can do without its recognised organ. Let everything possible be done to increase and multiply its power, both within and outside the pale of our society. But there are thousands and tens of thousands who will not, in the first instance, read such magazines as the Social Reformer, but who, nevertheless, must be reached if the cause is to triumph, who could be reached by literary efforts such as herein indicated, won to our ranks, and educated up to the point that would make them appreciate the articles and information supplied in the higher periodicals and books. But I must draw to a conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, ere the subject is but barely touched upon. The best brains and hearts, the best energies, the best pens, the most elegant paper and printing, the most beautiful engraving, should all be pressed into the service of this great and holy cause for God and humanity. All these are within our reach, and would be available if only the temperance people were willing to sacrifice themselves somewhat, in their time and money and personal labours of love for Him who loved them and gave Himself for them. Let us devise liberal things, and we shall soon reap even here an abundant reward in the increased prosperity of the cause which lies so close to our hearts, and to the weal, for time and eternity, of our fellowmen. I beg, Mr. Chairman, to move the adoption of the resolution. (Applause.)

The resolution was heartily seconded by Mr. W. R. GIBSON, Kilsyth, and agreed to.

The next resolution was as follows:—

"That this meeting desires to place on record its grateful sense of the valuable services rendered to the movement and the Association during the past year by friends at public meetings, at the general election, and previous to the divisions on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution; and also its high appreciation of the efforts of the agents of the Association."

Rev. WM. CROMBIE, Avonbridge, had great pleasure in moving this resolution. The labours of their friends in behalf of the movement were truly valuable, and involved great self-sacrifice. They had to spend and be spent in the good cause, and deserved our heartiest thanks. The agents, too, were men of great devotedness and energy, and did very meritorious service.

The motion was seconded by Mr. M'LAGGAN in a few words of warm sympathy, and agreed to.

Mr. J. R. M'DIARMID, Dollar, in a few felicitous remarks, moved that "This meeting desires to record its heartfelt thanks to Treasurer Hamilton for so ably filling the chair upon the present occasion," which was heartily seconded by Mr. J. Jamieson, Ayr, and the meeting brought to a successful termination.

THE ANNUAL SOCIAL MEETING

Was held in the City Hall Saloon in the afternoon. The room was quite filled with an audience that apparently fully enjoyed themselves. The chair was occupied by Provost Campbell, of Greenock, who was supported by James Johnstone, Esq., chairman of Executive Scottish Temperance League; ex-Provost Dick, Bailie Selkirk, J. H. Raper, Esq.; R. M'Callum, Esq., Rev. John Douglas, W. M. Scott, Esq., Belfast; Rev. S. Harding, and Mr. R. Mackay. Grace having been said by Rev. Mr. Harding, the guests entered upon the enjoyment of a most ample tea and accompaniments, the providing and serving of which did Mr. Jenkins, the purveyor, great credit. Thanks being offered through the singing of the Hundredth Psalm, the chairman rose, amid hearty applause, and said—"That he hoped that the meeting were as pleased as he was with the progress that was being made. This principle of local option was being more closely looked at, and more and more seen to be the principle which should underlie any legislation that should be framed to remove the liquor traffic. The people, it was felt, should have a right to legally insist that they should not be subjected to the evils arising from the presence of public-houses. (Applause.) Licensed shops were not like butcher or bakers' shops. These supplied a felt want, fed an appetite that came and went, just as the human system was hungry or filled; but before the public-houses were wanted a craving for the drug they vended was set up within the man that never came and went, but always demanded gratification. (Applause.) The influence of those places that dispensed such a drug was always injurious to the neighbourhood where they were; he never could, in view of that fact, support the transfer of a license to sell liquor from one district to a new district, because he felt that, to do so, was just to put down a place which would prove injurious to the neighbourhood. (Applause.) A public-house not only injured the property beside which it was placed, but it deteriorated the people living there, and the little children that were sent by their parents for drink, and he never would consent to be a party to doing so injurious an action. (Cheers.) The publican dealt in a dangerous article, and he pushed his business with all the ardour of the most energetic men of business. He did not blame him for doing so. No man was doing himself justice that was not diligent in his business; but the question was, should there be such a business at all? (Hear.) If such a business was allowed men would push it, and make it far more dangerous, by the very energy they throw into it. He had often been aware of the many occasions on which the working-classes met in a sociable capacity, and he often wondered why, when doing so, they met in premises connected with public-houses, but he found, on inquiry, that these merry gatherings were got up by the publicans, who in this way pushed their business. Look at it how you choose, this was incontestable, that the liquor traffic was never plied in any district without doing great evil to all within its reach, and its neighbours should have the absolute power to veto it when they found that it was really and always a source and occasion of danger to them. (Cheers.) It is true that magistrates can put down public-houses by acquiring the property in which they are; too often they shrink from paying the sum required for the property, the goodwill, and the lease; so they often spread the evil by spreading the public-houses over new districts. They give the publican the choice of a new district, which he soon makes as demoralised as that from which they compelled him to remove. (Applause.) The way to get an entire riddance of the evil is by giving the people the power to say if they are prepared to permit the sale of liquor among them; if they are not, then no public-houses should be allowed. (Applause.) He hoped that means would be taken to introduce a measure for Scotland and carry it next session. Scotland was before other portions of the kingdom. It had the Forbes McKenzie Act many years before it was even spoken of having Sunday closing elsewhere; and it would certainly be well that the legislation asked for was in operation in Scotland. It was quite ripe for a local option law, and he hoped that the leaders of the movement would be able to get such a law on the statute book by the close of the next session. (Loud applause.) Addresses were then delivered by Captain Brodie, Greenock; Mr. James Winning, Paisley; Mr. R. Murray, Edinburgh; Mr. W. Freer, Mr. Isaac Lynas, Mr. Cunningham, and Mr. A. Malcolm, Glasgow; ex-Councillor Paterson, Aberdeen; and Rev. S. Sleath, Bo'ness. A deputation from the Scottish Temperance League was present in the persons of James Johnstone, Esq., Langbank, and Rev. John Douglas, the latter of whom briefly addressed the meeting in fraternal terms. Mr. Wm. M. Scott, Belfast, gave an excellent address, having a genuine Irish flavour and much good sense. Had time permitted, delegates from Edinburgh, Leith, the Western District Lodge American I.O.G.T., would have spoken, but as the meeting was protracted much beyond its usual length, ex-Provost Dick had to move a hearty vote of thanks to Provost Campbell, which was cordially paid, and the meeting closed with the benediction.

MEETING IN CITY HALL.

THE annual public meeting of the Association was held in the evening in the City Hall. There was a crowded attendance. The Hon. the Lord Provost presided; and on the platform were: Mr. W. Shepherd Allen, M.P.; Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P.; Rev. Drs. Adam, Joseph Brown, and Adamson, Edinburgh; Rev. Messrs. S. Harding, J. A. Johnston, Thomas Evans, J. M. Sloan, John Kirk, jun., R. Anderson, G. Gladstone; Provost Campbell, Greenock; Bailie Selkirk, Treasurer Hamilton, ex-Bailie Torrens; Mr. Raper, Manchester; Messrs. John Wilson, W. Quarrier, J. Y. Simpson, R. Mackay, Jas. Finlayson, and W. Johnston, W. W. Turnbull, J. Paton, J. Wilson, &c., &c.

Bailie SELKIRK intimated, on behalf of the Executive, that their esteemed friend, Mr. Middleton, M.P., was unable, through indisposition, to preside at the meeting. In a note, Mr. Middleton said he had, up to the last moment, hoped to be present as he promised. He was still suffering from the fatigue of the last session, and he had been prohibited by his medical adviser from taking part in any public work. Bailie Selkirk then stated that the Lord Provost had kindly consented to take Mr. Middleton's place. (Loud applause.)

The meeting was opened with prayer by Rev. Dr. JOSEPH BROWN.

The LORD PROVOST said: Last year, when I had also the honour to preside at your public meeting, I spoke of the outlook along the whole line of temperance action and enterprise as being of the most hopeful and encouraging character. Our noble Parliamentary leader, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, had, in the previous session, brought forward his now-famous Local Option Resolution, and, even in what was not inaptly described as the Publicans' Parliament, was defeated by only 88 votes. It was also a most significant and suggestive fact that, while the majority included all the members of the Beaconsfield Government who took part in the division, in the minority who voted with Sir Wilfrid were no fewer than 15 members of the previous Liberal Administration, including that noble tribune of the people, John Bright; and Mr. Forster and Mr. Stansfield. (Applause.) Well, ladies and gentlemen, to use Lord Beaconsfield's familiar words, 'Many things have happened since then.' We have had, as his lordship well knows, a general election, resulting in a strong political reaction over the whole country, placing the Liberals again in power by an overwhelming majority, with Mr. Gladstone as Prime Minister. (Applause.) I need not say that, in the great political contest, the publican interest, with few exceptions, was conspicuous in its support of that party which had served it so well by removing the restrictive provisions in the licensing legislation of the previous Government. Parliament had proved most unfriendly to the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, and given Local Option the miserable faction of 14 votes in a total vote of 174. (Applause.) On the other hand, not speaking as a politician but strictly as a temperance reformer, I could not but rejoice in the gratifying fact that the temperance party, in almost every constituency, were true to their principles and the highest interests of the temperance cause, in working for and supporting the party of social and political progress, whose whole policy aims at the legitimate extension of the rights and powers of the people, and is therefore in fullest harmony with our just and reasonable demand for the popular control of the liquor traffic. (Applause.) The result, as you know, apart from the political aspect of the question, was the defeat of a large number of the trade representatives, including the amiable and indefatigable Mr. Wheelhouse, and the return of a majority to the new Parliament pledged to support temperance legislation. The division on the 18th of June showed how thoroughly the temperance party had swept the decks, when, instead of the majority against of 88 votes, by which his motion was lost, in the division just before the dissolution, Sir Wilfrid Lawson carried his Local Option resolution by a majority of 26. In itself this was, indeed, a glorious victory; but its importance was vastly increased by the fact that no fewer than 14 members of the present Government voted with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and in favour of the principle of granting to the people the local power of protecting themselves from the incalculable evils of the liquor traffic. In the division, Scotland again occupied an honourable position; the votes and pairs of our Scotch members being, for Local Option 43, against only 5. From that division we may reasonably anticipate the early introduction of a comprehensive measure of temperance reform by the Government. For this question must now be dealt with as a Government question, as no Government, however powerful, can trifle with the expressed will of the people as given by the votes of their representatives, not only as regards permissive legislation, but also the early settlement of Sunday closing and the extension of the Irish Sunday Act to the large centres of population in the sister country. In this cherished hope for early and satisfactory legislation, temperance reformers are sustained by the declaration of the Prime Minister himself in the course of his able speech on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution. (Applause.) Mr. Gladstone said: "I earnestly hope that, at some not very distant period, it may be found practicable to deal with the licensing laws, and, in dealing with the licensing laws, to include the reasonable and just measure for which my honourable friend pleads." (Applause.) From another quarter we have encouragement in the same direction. The licensed victuallers of Manchester held a conference last week, at which the Government were naturally denounced by the trade; and Mr. Candelet, a man of light and leading among them, felt sure that the Government were preparing a Licensing Bill, and would pass it before they went out of office. You see, my friends, the publicans believe in and tremble at the future action of a Government they so determinedly but so impotently opposed. Another precious morsel fell from a Mr. Stubbs, who said he had studied Mr. Gladstone's career for the last 30 years, and found that he had never been the friend of the licensed victuallers; and now let us hope, at the close of his brilliant and beneficent career, Mr. Gladstone will assume the same attitude towards the trade which flourishes only on the vice and poverty of the people; and that, on the other hand, he will evince an ever-increasing friendliness with the movement with which we are all more or less identified, and in the successful consummation of which are bound up the highest commercial, industrial, social, and religious interests of the nation. (Loud cheering.)

Rev. Mr. HARDING, Paisley, said he had to propose the following resolution:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the traffic in intoxicating liquor tends to increase crime, to waste the national resources, to corrupt the social habits, and to destroy the health and lives of the people, and ought therefore to be prohibited." (Loud applause.) The first part of the resolution contained a terrible indictment against the traffic in intoxicating liquors, but he would confine himself to the last clause of the resolution which referred to prohibition. If they believed that civil government was an ordinance of God established for His glory and for the good of all men, then the rulers stood in the place of God, for by Him kings reign and princes decree justice. (Applause.) And that they might meet their high responsibilities and administer the law justly and righteously, they needed to be men of self-denial and self-control. They ought to protect the people from evil-doers, and sustain the principles of God's moral government. In all conflicts with evil the Governor of the universe never gave licence for a moment. It was always prohibition. (Applause.) But the licensing of a publican was nothing more or less than giving a license to him to sell poison to his weak brother, and bring him down to a drunkard's grave, and yet the publican was protected by the State in his act. (Applause.) It had been said that personal abstinence would destroy the liquor traffic, but that was a serious mistake. Under the glorious crusade led by Father Matthew in Ireland tens of thousands, it might be hundreds of thousands, were led to give up drink, and take the pledge. Where were they now? Where was the great movement that was carried on by Father Matthew now? Where were those who took the pledge? After a time the movement began to wane, the public-houses were kept open all the time, and some of the weak brethren could not resist the strong temptation of the liquor shop, and thus they went back by multitudes. Now, if in connection with that crusade the traffic had been prohibited, Ireland would have been—

Great, glorious, and free,
First flower of the earth,
And first gem of the sea.

(Applause.) In connection with that horrible agrarian crime which happened in Ireland the other day a dark lantern was found near the body, and also a bottle of whisky. Ah! that was it. They might persuade the people; but the publicans, the brewers, and distillers would say, "Leave it to us. While we hold the licenses to keep open our public-houses from eight to eleven o'clock we will gather your children and destroy them as fast as we possibly can." (Loud applause.)

Mr. W. SHEPHERD ALLEN, M.P., in seconding the resolution, said he had some diffidence in standing for the first time before an audience composed of Scotchmen and Scotchwomen, because he knew well the acuteness and subtlety of the Scotch intellect, for the fact was that he had a mother-in-law who was a Scotchwoman—(laughter)—and he could assure them that he never entered into her presence without the most painful sense of his own mental and moral and physical inferiority. (Renewed laughter.) The resolution which had been read was a strong one, and it was for them to say by their votes whether they endorsed the charges it brought against the liquor traffic. (Applause.) For his part he did. (Renewed applause.) His position with respect to the liquor traffic was very similar to that of a gentleman with respect to the United States Government. When that gentleman had resided long enough in the States to obtain what was in England called the privilege of the franchise, he was bothered by men of all parties for his vote. Democrats, Republicans, know-nothings came to him, all asking for his support, and at last, worried to death, he asked, "Is there a Government in this country?" "Oh yes, there is," was the reply. "Then," said the gentleman, "I'm agen it." (Laughter.) That was exactly his own position with respect to the liquor traffic—he was "agen it." The resolution in the first place set forth that the traffic in intoxicating liquor tended to increase crime. He was sure every one in the assembly would endorse that accusation. They could not take up a newspaper, or even look at a Glasgow paper of that day, without reading of some crime caused by the love of intoxicating liquor. Speaking for himself as a magistrate of more than twenty years' standing in a large and populous English county, he could truly say that the vast majority of crimes of violence were undoubtedly caused by the liquor traffic. (Applause.) The second charge was that the liquor traffic tended to waste the national resources. They all knew the vast expenditure in connection with the sale of intoxicating drink; they all knew that the direct and indirect expenditure, including, of course, the loss of labour and things of that kind, amounted to the colossal sum of 270 millions per annum. Now, Scotchmen were generally supposed to be very shrewd on financial questions. They had a proverb in England, but he believed it was a libel, that threepenny bits were invented in order that Scotchmen might subscribe to charitable institutions. (Laughter.) He merely mentioned that in order to show that Scotchmen were supposed to be peculiarly shrewd in all questions relating to money, and that therefore they would be able to grasp the details of any waste in the national resources. The Lord Provost had alluded to the Liberal party. Well, they would all remember that when Lord Beaconsfield was in power, one of the cries of the Liberal party was that the taxation of this country and the expenditure had been increased some ten or twelve millions. As Liberals, let them be consistent; and if they protested against those additional ten or twelve millions, let them protest still more strongly against the 270 millions of self-imposed taxation which was draining away the life-blood of the country. (Applause.) The resolution likewise said that drink tended to destroy the health and lives of the people. Those who were acquainted with details told them that some 60,000 men and women went down every year to untimely graves in consequence of the existence of that traffic. Just think of that long and ghastly procession, and still it did not include the wretched, miserable, half-starved drunkards who went down to their graves as sufferers, nor did it include the poor, wretched, half-naked, starving children who died in their youthful years and were thus made the innocent victims of the drink curse. He would tell them what he said upon a Manchester platform, that sometimes in the low streets of London, when he had looked upon scores of these little dirty children, degraded, ragged, some going to an untimely grave and others growing up to a heritage of crime and sin, he had burst into tears and had felt he would sooner go into a pauper's grave than he would roll in wealth made by the trade in intoxicating liquor. (Applause.) That was not all. He was thinking as he rode this morning from Edinburgh to Glasgow, over the dark catalogue of men he had known, who had fallen victims to this deadly vice of intemperance. There were ministers of the gospel, lawyers, merchants, tradesmen, professional men, as well as working men, all struck down in their manhood's prime, having lost their health and lives. Where were they now? Only within the last two months two gentlemen whom he knew something about, men of position, had died in the prime of life. That was not all. They had left their wives widows and their children orphans, utterly unprovided for. Were the charges against the traffic proved? If so, then followed the logical sequence that the traffic ought to be prohibited. (Applause.) He most thoroughly agreed with the speech of the rev. gentleman who had preceded him that prohibition was the right, sure, and certain remedy. The friends of the Permissive Bill were met by the old stock argument—"You cannot make men sober by Act of Parliament." Whenever men were short of argument, they took refuge in assertion. It saved a great deal of trouble, labour, and thinking. He had listened to the speeches of Mr. Wheelhouse in the House of Commons against Sir Wilfrid Lawson's bill, and the hours so occupied were the most melancholy he had ever spent. (Laughter.) He had suffered pain of different kinds—had had toothache, and the pain of being scolded by his wife—only, however, when he deserved it—(laughter)—but he never felt so wretched as under the infliction of Mr. Wheelhouse's speeches. Mr. Wheelhouse had only two arguments, and he went over them with the most tiresome iteration. One argument was, "You cannot make men sober by Act of Parliament," and the other that "Sir Wilfrid Lawson's followers were all Dissenters, Primitive Methodists, and men of that stamp." Mr. Wheelhouse seemed to show quite as large and extensive a knowledge of the different kinds of Dissenters in these three kingdoms as an old lady who had a great dislike to Nonconformists, and who said there were two classes she regarded with special aversion—namely, Plymouth Brethren and Yarmouth Bloaters. (Laughter.) The question was, What did the friends of temperance want to do? There had been remedies of all kinds proposed. The remedy now asked was a very plain and simple one—it was, trust the people; and if the people were trusted, and had the power to prohibit the liquor traffic, the common-sense of the hard-headed working men of England, Scotland, and Ireland would very soon say to the licensed victuallers, "Gentlemen, you must get a better business." He was thankful to say that, by recent legislation, the people were now trusted much more largely with political power than they used to be. The vast majority of the working men of these three kingdoms were entrusted with votes, and they had the influence and the power to deal with questions affecting the destinies of this great empire; and had not the working men of England and Scotland and Ireland sense enough to say whether they wanted a gin palace in the street in which they lived or not? He believed that all temperance reformers owed a debt of gratitude to the United Kingdom Alliance for the good work it had done. He was there to confess before that large meeting, and acknowledge the debt he for one owed to it. Some 14 years ago, when the United Kingdom Alliance took him up, he was not sound on the liquor question. He thought Sunday closing would be going too far. The Alliance educated him up to that point. Then he was not sound upon the question of local option. The United Kingdom Alliance convinced him that local option was the right thing. He had had two teachers upon the temperance question. One was the United Kingdom Alliance and the other was his own little children. (Applause.) He told fathers and mothers in that hall that when he looked at their bright, joyous, and happy faces, all radiant with innocence and the beauty of youth, when he thought upon their future lives, and when he considered, moreover, that these little children were gifted by the Almighty with the stupendous destiny of immortality, he felt that in his house he dared not place the intoxicating cup. (Applause.) He believed the temperance party were gaining ground steadily but surely. In Scotland for many years the people had possessed the boon of Sunday closing. That boon had been granted to Ireland. In the last session of Parliament an overwhelming majority of Welsh members voted for the extension of Sunday closing to Wales. He believed Wales would soon have Sunday closing, and that a similar bill for England would follow before long. The principle of local option was taking strong hold of the working men of these three kingdoms. He knew very well that the swells did not like it. That did not much matter, because the swells at election times had to come cap in hand to the working men; and it was for working men to see that they sent the right sort of men to represent them in the Commons House of Parliament. Speaking next of the interest taken by ladies in political questions, and their great influence, the hon. member remarked that fifteen years ago, when he was first seeking a seat in Parliament, he called at the house of a voter, and was met at the door by a fine handsome woman, his young wife of about 24 years, who said "Oh, Mr. Allen, my husband would have voted for you, but he died last night." (Laughter.) She further said—"Never mind; I'll have another husband ready to vote for you the next time." (Laughter.) That lady kept her word. (Cheers and laughter.) In 1868, when he called at the same house, there was a husband properly educated in political matters, who voted for him. (Laughter and applause.) The temperance cause was gaining ground, and if the men and women of Scotland,

England, and Ireland did their duty, prohibition would soon be the law of the land. (Applause.) Then we should hardly know the land in which we lived. It would be so happy, so prosperous, so contented, that wherever an Englishman might go his heart would turn back to his native land with longing love, and in the magnificent words of the poet he would be able to say :—

Where'er I go, whatever lands I see,
My heart untravell'd still returns to thee ;
Still to my country turns with ceaseless pain,
And drags at every step a lengthening chain.

(Loud applause.)

The resolution was cordially adopted.

Mr. W. S. CAINE, M.P.—The resolution I have to move is as follows :—“That this meeting regards the proposal to invest the ratepayers with ample power to abolish the liquor traffic in their respective districts as just and practicable: rejoices at the passage of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution in the recent session of Parliament by a majority including pairs of 245 to 219: and in view of the promise of the Government to give effect to this principle in dealing with the licensing laws in the next session, earnestly urges the friends of the movement everywhere to maintain the agitation with unabated energy, so as to secure in any new legislation the fullest recognition of the principle of local option.” Now, with regard to the first section of this resolution, the method by which the prohibition of the liquor traffic is to be secured, is by giving the ratepayers ample power to abolish the liquor traffic in their respective districts, and it states that that is just and practicable. Of its practicability there can be no doubt. We have ample experience upon which to go. We have the experience of the United States, our own colonies, and Canada during the last twenty-five years to show that the method which we propose to secure the prohibition of the liquor traffic is practicable. The question is, being practicable, is it just? We are here to-night to maintain that it is just also. Now, if you take the people of this country, and take their opinion upon the liquor trade, you may divide them very fairly into two sections—those who look upon the public-houses as a public convenience and those who look upon the public-houses as public nuisances. (A laugh.) And whichever view you happen to take of this institution it is just in either case to invest the ratepayers with ample power to abolish the liquor traffic, or, on the other hand, to maintain the liquor traffic. That is clearly what local option means, if it means anything. Now, let us look at it for one moment or two as a public convenience. I know something of the city of Glasgow. It is not the first time I visited it. I know what public spirit you have, and I know well how you manage your own affairs. I know about your gas—the great convenience—by which we are able to see one another to-night. It is controlled by your representatives. I also know about your beautiful water which you all at present enjoy. It is brought here by yourselves, and it is your own property, and under your own control. There are other conveniences. There are your tramways—a very great public convenience indeed. These also belong to the Corporation, and I believe they have leased them to a company who are bound not merely to provide the public with ample convenience, but to hand back the roads in as good condition as when they received them. All these institutions I have named are under the control of the ratepayers, therefore if the friends of the licensing system aver it is a public convenience all we ask is that that convenience, like so many other public conveniences, should be placed in the hands of the ratepayers themselves. (Applause.) Let us look at the other aspect of the question—public-houses as a nuisance. Any person who has given a thought to public matters has paid some attention to, and has looked into, the working of the Public Health Acts. You in Glasgow and elsewhere are under the control of a magnificent Public Health Act, which gives great power to your Corporation to preserve the health of the town. I will undertake to say that if you go through all the back streets and all the back yards in Glasgow you will not find one single man keeping a pig, because the Public Health Act does not permit him. If you do find one party keeping a pig it will be got rid of at once. The keeping of pigs in large towns—in Glasgow at any rate—is prohibited by the representatives of the ratepayers. Any manufacturer who produces articles that are dangerous to public health can be prohibited from so doing under the Health Act. A manufacturer of fire works can be prohibited. The manufacture of anything that produces a foul smell and endangers the health of those who live around can be prohibited under the Public Health Act. All we want is a particular trade, which, in our opinion, works desolation, misery, wretchedness, wounds and diseases the people, causes crime and pauperism, and causes premature deaths, and which trade is looked upon as a nuisance, should also be placed under the control of the ratepayers. I do not hesitate, then, to say that you ought to support the first paragraph of the resolution. (Applause.) The next paragraph reports progress. It tells us that in the recent session of Parliament the local option resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson was carried by 245 to 219, or by a majority of 26. Now, if I recollect rightly, the majority by which it was defeated in the previous session of Parliament was 114, so you see from being defeated by 114, we have improved by carrying it by a majority of 26. Do not let us run away with the notion that this shows a wonderful change during three months. The previous Parliament was elected in 1874. The existing Parliament was elected more than six years afterwards, and that represents the earnest, steady, and persevering work of such organisations as the one that has called us to-night—of the United Kingdom Alliance and all auxiliaries, and Good Templar Lodges, Scottish Temperance League, &c., and the noble men and women up and down the length and breadth of the kingdom who have been bringing pressure to bear upon public opinion. (Applause.) That resolution is the measure of growth during the last six years, but now we come to what I think we were exceedingly grateful to be able to mark such progress. But we must not sit down and think that the work is done. I do not hesitate to say that a great many of the 245 who voted for that resolution took very different views indeed of local option to what are taken on this platform to-night. Local option is a wide word. It may mean little or a great deal. We intend it to mean a great deal. If it is to mean a great deal every one of these 245 members of Parliament must be kept to the line on the question without any mistake whatever. Some members of Parliament are apt to be very enthusiastic immediately after a general election and to pine away somewhat as the Parliament advances. Keep your members up to the mark upon this question. That is what the resolution asks you to do. Among other things, in view of the promise of the Government to give effect to this principle of dealing with the licensing laws in the next session, the resolution earnestly urges the friends of the movement everywhere to maintain the agitation with unabated energy so as to secure in any new legislation the fullest recognition of the principle of local option. That is a greater sign of progress than even the division list. What gratified me that night was the speech of the Prime Minister, in which he stated that it was the intention of the Government to bring in a measure based upon the principle affirmed in Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution. Now the real genuine hard work of the movement begins. The Government are pledged to bring in a measure. It is for the country to let the Government know what that measure is to be. (Applause.) Governments exist to give effect to the will of the people and for no other purpose. Let the Government know what your will is and I undertake they will carry that will out. If you simply in one way or another let them know that you will be content with 2s. 6d. in the £ you will get about 1s. 6d. Tell them you wish 20s. in the £ and you will get it. Do not be content with any measure which does not contain in one clause of it the principle that whatever else may be done the people themselves shall have the power to get rid of the evil altogether. (Applause.) Now then let us instruct the Government. Do it as the resolution says, by urging the friends of the movement everywhere to maintain the agitation with unabated energy, so as to secure in any new legislation the fullest recognition of the principle of local option. I have great pleasure in moving the resolution. (Applause.)

Provost CAMPBELL, Greenock, seconded the motion. In doing so, he said there was a good deal yet to be done by temperance reformers. He recently observed with sorrow that the Lord Provost of Glasgow had stated that the number of cases coming before the Police Courts of the city had increased very much since the return of good trade. That was a sad state of matters, and showed the great necessity there was for legislation of some kind. He had long held, and held very strongly, that the greater the number of public-houses the greater the amount of drunkenness. (Applause.) He knew that some people, and some very influential newspapers, thought differently. They took up the argument that an increased number of houses did not mean an increase of drunkenness. He held that to be a great fallacy, unless they were to believe that those who owned public-houses were different from every other class of people, who generally desired to make as much profit out of their businesses as they could. He trusted that very soon a change would take place on the part of some of the influential Liberal newspapers, which at present were very unsound on this question. Those who had to do with the improvement of towns knew, that in connection with this subject the question of licenses came up very prominently. They knew that when it was found necessary to sweep away wretched old houses, if a public-house happened to be in the property, the publican came to the magistrates and complained of the hardship of being deprived of his licensed house. This never gave him (Provost Campbell) much concern, because if he were to transfer the license to another district, he would feel more for the people resident in that district than for the publican. The fact was, that the proprietors generally got large sums in connection with the houses taken down, and the man who held the license should go and get a share of that money. By putting a public-house in a district, they might increase the rent of the particular property, but they deteriorated the value of the property around; and what was far worse, they deteriorated the character of the tenants. He, therefore, had never felt any difficulty in declining to grant transfers, but he considered that it would be better that the people of the districts should have the power of putting their veto on such transfers. He trusted that, in course of next session, a bill granting this power would be passed. At one time, he feared that it would be necessary to have separate measures for England and Scotland, but he was delighted to hear from the gentleman who preceded him that the question of local option was making so rapid progress in England. He should be glad, therefore, if a bill were introduced for the whole country. If, however, this was not done, he trusted some Scotch member would introduce a bill for Scotland alone, and he was satisfied that he would not only have the support of the majority of the Scotch members, but that the majority of the people of Scotland would be in its favour. (Applause.)

Rev. THOMAS EVANS, Merthyr-Tydvil, supported the resolution, and contended that, if the publicans were, as they maintained, the friends of the workingman, there was all the more reason for the trade being under the control of the working men, who were the ratepayers. It is not possible to give a report of the rev. gentleman's speech, because it is impossible to reproduce the figure, the gesticulations, and the wonderful humour and earnestness of the speaker. The illustrations—the potato and the Colorado beetle—the muzzling of the dogs—the youthful exciseman—and the tigers of India—were all so graphically told. As he was drawing out the analogy of the beetle and the drink, you were reminded of Old Eccles or perhaps more so of Toole, and you enjoyed the unctuous humour displayed without at all losing sight of the great truth involved in the contrast between our terror at a foreign bug and our toleration of native spirits. The earnestness of the speaker was manifest in the powerful eloquence displayed in the closing words of his truly impressive appeal to his enraptured audience.

Rev. JAMES A. JOHNSTON, of Springburn, moved the third resolution as follows:—"That this meeting rejoices at the gratifying progress of the movement in Scotland, as manifested at the recent general election, and by the overwhelming Scotch vote—including pairs 43 to 5—in the division on the Local Option resolution, hereby expresses its warmest thanks to Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his 246 supporters, and pledges itself to assist the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association in its efforts by hearty co-operation and liberal pecuniary support." In supporting the resolution, Mr. Johnston said that Scotland occupied a prominent place in the agitation against the drink traffic. As Scotchmen, they were proud of their country, as they had never withheld their help when some right was to be maintained, or when some wrong was to be redressed. In the general temperance movement, and in the Sunday closing movement, Scotland had taken precedence of her sister countries; and, looking to the general election and the vote of their representatives in Parliament, might he not say that Scotland had declared, as with trumpet voice, that the honourable place which she had hitherto occupied she had no intention whatever to resign. (Applause.) Some of the 43 who had supported local option in the House of Commons had fought the battle for years, but there were others who had been slow to learn the value of local option, and perhaps they had not learned its value and power yet, unless they had experienced what it was at the general election.

Mr. JOHN WILSON said, at that late stage of the evening it would ill become him to take up the time of the meeting, but there had been delegated to him a very pleasant duty. Before proceeding to discharge that duty, he would wish to make a few remarks. He was sure they would all agree with him that they were much indebted to the Lord Provost for his opening remarks. They were all proud of their Lord Provost, not only from the high position which he occupied, as head of the municipal power of this great city, but also for his straightforwardness, honesty, and his readiness to stand forth in the ranks of the temperance cause. (Applause.) They all knew that the reign of the Lord Provost was near at an end. There was a talk of sending him back to the Council. Be that as it might, they had a higher position for the Lord Provost, and he (Mr. Wilson) hoped that at the first vacant seat in Scotland the Lord Provost would stand. (Applause.) He was sure he spoke the minds of the temperance reformers, and it would be the crowning victory of the Lord Provost's life if he were able to carry a prohibitory measure for Scotland. (Great applause.) Mr. Wilson concluded his remarks by asking the meeting to propose a hearty vote of thanks to the speakers who had addressed them that evening. (Applause.)

Bailie TORRENS said he had a very pleasant duty to perform, but, at the same time, he had a great complaint to make. The last speaker, Mr. Wilson, encroached upon his (Bailie Torrens) ground from beginning to end. (Laughter.) Did he know as much about the Lord Provost as he, Bailie Torrens. (Laughter.) Well, he rose to propose a hearty vote of thanks to his Lordship for presiding that night. They were under a great obligation to him that evening, because he came there and occupied the position of chairman at short notice, owing to the indisposition of Mr. R. T. Middleton. (Applause.) Their Lord Provost was quite a champion in the temperance movement, and he (the speaker) did not know any man in Scotland holding the position the Lord Provost did, that had done one-tenth towards the advancement of the temperance cause that he had done. (Applause.)

After the benediction had been pronounced by the Rev. Mr. Harding, the proceedings terminated.

A little boy being asked what the chief end of an editor was, replied, "The end that's got the head on."

THE FUNDS.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, OCTOBER, 1880.

NEW YEAR'S TRACT.

THE Executive are glad to be able thus early to announce their New Year's Tract for 1881. This year it is from the eloquent pen of the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D., Edinburgh, and bears the significant title, "The City of the Plague; or Sights of London in Sixteen Sixty-five." It is illustrated in the finest style of the Art, and may be had at 10s. per 1000, or 1s. per 100—carriage not paid. Societies may have their name and local announcements printed at the top at an extra charge of 1s. 6d. per heading. If heading contains more than 40 words, by special agreement. On all orders of 2000 and upwards no charge is made for heading. Orders should be sent in at once, as there are already indications of it meeting with a very large circulation.

OUR ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE Twenty-second Annual Meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association stand prominently out as the most memorable in its history. Those that have gone before were brilliant from the progress that distinguished them; they showed the rapid outgrowth of the agitation. The meetings of this year are brilliant because of the results obtained, and they bespeak the near fulfilment of anticipations of a crowning triumph.

The Annual Business Meeting was held in the Christian Institute, and was an unqualified success. While the proceedings lacked the undesirable heat of the previous annual meeting, the unflinching earnestness so distinctive of these meetings was apparent all through the course of the proceedings. All present seemed conscious of the very great successes achieved—successes not the result of fitful chance, but of earnest endeavour—and were ready to gird up their loins and go forward to new efforts and still more decisive successes. The chairman's address was an excellent resumé of the progress of the year, implying deep research and close attention to all that was taking place on the question. The report was, as usual, comprehensive, and dealt with the divisions on the Local Option Resolution, and with the General Election and its signal success, in a manner both interesting and stirring. The Treasurer's report might be said to be capable of two quite diverse impressions. In so far as the Executive were able to support two divisions on the Local Option Resolution, endure the strain of a general election, and maintain in vigorous operation the ordinary agencies of the Association, and yet not get into debt, they were deserving of much commendation; yet they could not have done so unless by the generous liberality of the late Mr. Smith. It is matter for regret that notwithstanding all that they have achieved, they should yearly be plunged into financial anxieties, and be left unable to bring those irresistible powers of agitation into the field that might so speedily compel decisive and triumphant results. The important resolutions submitted foreshadowed a year of vigorous effort, and it was gratifying indeed to see with what unanimity they were adopted. If the friends afford that co-operation expected from them, if they are liberal of means and effort, who can doubt but that the year now begun may be marked by events bearing more decidedly upon the liquor traffic of Scotland than has hitherto been the case. The Executive have paltered with no principle, faltered at no action haphazard for its aim the suppression of the liquor traffic; shrunk from no duty, and with the active co-operation of the friends, it may be safely anticipated that they will be found as energetic and as fortunate with the resolutions passed at the meeting, the carrying out of which has been confided to their care, as they have always been.

The Tea Meeting has not been exceeded in interest and enjoyment by any of its predecessors. The provision was excellent in quality and ample in quantity. The guests thronged the City Hall Saloon, and the Provost of Greenock presided over the assembly. Greenock has always been the foremost in her support of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and the Executive deemed themselves honoured by the presence of Provost Campbell. His speech was able and exhaustive. Although he devoted some time to the advocacy of merely restrictive methods of dealing with the liquor traffic, he was sound to the core on the propriety of legally investing the people with power to suppress the liquor traffic that injured them and theirs. We heartily desire that his hope of having a local option law for Scotland on the Statute Book may come rapidly to fruition. We do not remember of hearing better speeches at any similar meeting than those which were given at the tea party. Everyone had something special to report of the town or district he represented, and all were of interest to those present. The time did not permit of all on the programme being called upon, but that is the case with every meeting of the kind. The address of Mr. W. M. Scott, Belfast, was truly valuable, as it showed that Ireland on this matter was as intelligent and resolute as any Scot of us all. The presence of a deputation from the Scottish Temperance League for the first time was a most welcome feature of the proceedings, and the necessarily brief remarks of the Rev. John Douglas indicated the most cordial amity on the part of the national temperance institution on whose behalf he spoke.

The evening meeting was immensely successful. A more intelligent and respectable audience never met on a like occasion. The hall was crowded, and the greatest good order and the most thorough appreciation were visible all through the evening. The Executive's arrangements suffered from a cause which one would have thought was too remote to affect their plans. The long parliamentary session has much to answer for. It prostrated Mr. Middleton, M.P., who had kindly undertaken the duties of the chair, and also Mr. Peddie, M.P., who had agreed to speak to one of the resolutions. Mr. Whitworth, M.P., was at the last moment called away to Ireland, which might be set down as another case of obstruction to lay to the charge of the sister kingdom. There was great disappointment felt at the non-appearance of the chairman, though it was tempered with hearty sympathy with the cause of his absence. The Hon. The Lord Provost was asked to take the place of the popular city member, and it says much in favour of his Lordship's sympathies with the prohibitory aspect of the temperance movement that at so little notice, and amid so many distracting public duties, he did not hesitate to preside over the meeting. His speech under the circumstances was quite a surprise, for all that he said seemed to be as carefully conceived, and was certainly as eloquently delivered, as if he had as many days as he had hours for its preparation. In tone it was thorough, was in style characterised by earnestness and feeling, and was loudly cheered. The Rev. S. Harding delivered a speech of the most thorough-going kind, and carried his audience entirely with him. Mr. Allen, M.P., who for the first time advocated our question in Scotland, did so in a speech of superior excellence. It was pervaded by a profound knowledge of the subject, a vein of sterling humour, affecting pathos, and genuine eloquence. It was greeted with cheers. Mr. Caine, M.P., also on our platform for the first time, met with a hearty welcome. His speech was instructive and telling. The audience were agreeably surprised at the statesman-like ability apparent in all that he said on the subject, and they loudly cheered his remarks. Provost Campbell, Greenock, took up much of the same ground traversed in his afternoon speech. The audience were highly pleased with what he uttered. They felt in having the Provosts of Glasgow and Greenock to address them that the heads of municipal bodies were evidently prepared to divest themselves of what authority over the liquor traffic they possessed, so that the rate-payers themselves might be enabled to veto the liquor traffic that endangered them, and they greeted the speaker's words with hearty approbation. The Rev. Thomas Evans electrified his audience by showing up, in the most convincing manner, the inconsistency of our national and municipal authorities in their attitude to the traffic in strong drink. Nothing could have been happier than his illustrations, especially about the muzzling of dogs, the frantic efforts to keep the Colorado beetle from our shores, and the destruction of a few tigers in India by our rulers, who yet allowed the drink interest to commit the most irreparable ravages among all classes of the community. He was accompanied all through his address by the applause of his auditory, who burst forth at its conclusion into protracted cheering. The Rev. J. A. Johnston made his first appearance on the platform of the Association. Directly he was the representative of the I.O.G.T., indirectly he stood there as one of the founders of the Scottish Temperance League. He expressed a hearty sympathy with prohibition, and his sentiments were loudly applauded. The Rev. Dr. Adamson, with rare self-constraint, simply seconded the motion of Mr. Johnstone. Mr. John Wilson, in moving a vote of thanks to the speakers, delivered a speech in favour of the agitation characterised by unusual fervour. Ex-Bailie Torrens asked the meeting to award its cordial thanks to the chairman. It testified to the eminent popularity of the worthy ex-magistrate that at the late hour he came forward his remarks should have had such attention and appreciation. The meeting closed with the benediction. These series of meetings mark another stage on the path of the agitation. They afforded the highest gratification to all who were privileged to attend them. Looking back they spoke of progress and success, looking forward they pointed to a triumphant issue to the agitation should loyalty to principle and liberality to the funds mark the future of the Association as it has so radiantly distinguished its past. With hope at the prow and energy at the helm the haven of a success at once glowing and decisive cannot now be far ahead.

"RIGHT" OR "EXPEDIENCY?"

On one occasion Jesus asked His disciples, "Whom do men say that I, the Son of man, am?" and they replied pertinently enough, "Some say thou art John the Baptist; some, Elias; others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets." But Jesus meant to prepare them for something he was looking at with a full gaze, but which they did not see even faintly. Accordingly he put this more searching question, "But whom say ye that I am?" How have your thoughts been forming upon this vital question? Is it a head or heart matter with you? What say you? And Simon Peter, the ready and impetuous, answered significantly, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." It was well answered—clear, manly, and noble, and to the point. But let us see. Speaking practically, Was this not fair-weather sailing, and is not that easy sailing? The disciples were meantime comfortable in the presence of their Lord and Teacher, hopeful and buoyant as to the future, expecting popularity and power to their Master and themselves. But the scene suddenly changed. Jesus had been looking earnestly into the future, and very soon began to show unto them that He must go into Jerusalem, and suffer many things, and be killed, and raised again the third day. What a saddening announcement this. What a crushing outlook for the disciples. They thought Jesus must be greatly in error—the victim of some fanatical imaginings—and which really required to be removed, and that at once. Accordingly, Peter proceeded to the hazardous task by taking Him in hand with the purpose of “managing” Him, as the modern electioneering phrase goes. He rebuked Jesus in some fashion or other for picturing such dismal events, and wound up his effort with the words of a real time-serving man—“Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee.” Your prospects are good. In a year or two the chances are national feeling will turn in your favour. The people will in time gladly receive your teaching, and will pay you the honours you deserve, acknowledging you as their Messiah and King. Accommodate a little, humour a little, and who knows what may happen very soon. But what did Jesus say to all this grovelling cajollery? “Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence unto me.” Stand aside; do not venture to cross my holy path or hinder my righteous work. I am no man of expediency. To save mankind came I into this world, to proclaim the eternal righteousness and love of God to mankind, and my soul is straitened till that work be accomplished. “Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men.” Peter’s secret was out. Christ had revealed it. Peter, like every man of poor expediency, did care more for the things of men than for the things of God, for social position more than righteousness, and stood the representative of all “time-serving” followers of the Lamb.

God does not act on lines of “expediency” as we understand the term; neither do the godly act on these lines. The question for them on all matters is—“Is it right in the sight of God?” and they take ample time to settle that question in the light of reason and conscience; if decided to be “right,” then their course is clear. That is the only “policy” they can pursue. It matters not how long time it take to work it out nor how much effort or suffering is required from them; that is the thing to do and no other. In all great reforms affecting the vital life and welfare of the nation—for instance, the abolition of slavery, repeal of the Corn Laws, Parliamentary reform, and our own good cause of temperance—we find a very large number of our “great men” none other than time-serving, shifting men of expediency, ready to catch the passing breeze, and side with the winning horse. “Will it take?” is their continual cry. How will it be received by the public—in a kindly or hostile spirit? Will it not be apt to create personal animosities and provoke unpleasant consequences? Will there be a “row”? Now, what Christ-like man cares for a “row” in the fight for truth and freedom? Whoever saw the devil resigning any of his strongholds without “kicking” up a fearful “row,” and invoking earth and hell to his aid? We know little of his Satanic majesty but what we see embodied in evil men, yet in this way we have seen enough of him to know that he never exhibits grace in any of his forced retreats—they are always void of grace, most ungraceful—but on the contrary, he brings into full play all the bitter developments of his evil nature, and only quits hold when compelled. But the Christian cares not for any of his “rows,” and ever strikes sturdily in behalf of eternal right, knowing that “Virtue may be assail’d but never hurt;

Surprised by unjust force, but not enthral’d;
Yea, even that which mischief meant most harm
Shall in the happy trial prove most for glory.”

POETRY.

GRAIN'S VINDICATION.

I was made to be eaten,
And not to be drunk;
To be thrashed in a barn,
Not soaked in a tank.

I come as a blessing
When put in a mill.
As a blight and a curse
When run through a still.

Make me up into loaves,
And your children are fed;
But if into a drink,
I will starve them instead.

In bread I am servant,
The eater shall rule;
In drink I am master,
The drinker a fool.

Then remember the warning—
My strength I'll employ,
If eaten to strengthen,
If drunk to destroy.

VARIETIES.

A familiar spirit.—Whisky.

“Take care,” says a timid exchange. Yes, but take it in small doses.

“I die content,” said the fly in the baker’s dough.
“Somebody will take me for a currant.”

A QUERY.—What is the difference between a B and a bull’s foot? One yields honey, and the other yields grease. Bravo.

A PARADISE.—One who has “been there” assures us that the straighter a man takes his whisky the crookeder it seems to make him.

Why are corn and potatoes like the idols of old? Because the corn has ears and hear not and the potatoes have eyes and see not.

Editors all unite in asking Edison to invent a style of newspaper column that will enable each separate advertiser to have a space next to the reading matter, and at the top of the page!

Lawsonite (to half-tipsy Irishman, whom he has seen in the same state on several occasions of late)—“What will you take, Pat, to keep sober for a month?” Irishman—“Take no whisky, av coorse.” Lawsonite subsides.

An Arctic explorer, Dr. Rae, gives the following valuable testimony:—“During four winters spent on Arctic service—on two of which we had no fire to warm ourselves—no spirits or wines of any kind were used, not even when sledge hauling, sometimes over very rough ice.”

SUMMER DRINKS.—PEPPERMINT CORDIAL.—1 lb. loaf sugar, 1 pint boiling water, simmer 10 minutes, then stir in 1 tablespoonful of honey; when nearly cold, add 30 drops of the essence of peppermint. Bottle for use. Four tablespoonfuls to a tumbler of hot or cold water makes delicious drink. Essence of ginger can be used in the same way.

An old darkey, who was asked if in his experience prayer had ever been answered, replied:—“Wel, sah, some pras is ansud an some isn’t. Pends on wat you axes fo. Just arter de wah, wen it was mighty hard scratchin fo de cullud breddern, I bsarved dat wen ebber I pway de Lord to sen one o Marse Peyton’s fat turkeys fo de ole man, der was no notice took of de partition; but wen I pway dat he would sen de ole man fo de turkey, de matter was tended to befo sun up nex mornin, dead sartin!”

NOVEMBER, 1880.

THE APPEARANCE OF EVIL.

Our world, and indeed the universe, was once free from evil. But a mysterious testing time came to higher intelligences than man. Some fell and some did not. Man too was made holy, but to him also there came a testing-time, and he fell from his integrity. And when the "Word was made flesh and dwelt among us," the same weird hour of test came to him in the Wilderness. But He withstood the hateful influence. It appears from these facts that the great Governor of the universe will not compel the loving service and obedience of His intelligent creatures, but that having made them free and intelligent beings He lays on themselves the responsibility of choice and action.

We know not, and are not curious to inquire now, in what "form" evil first made its appearance, but we do know that evil has appeared, and now manifests itself in a thousand forms. And in our day and country there is one form of evil, which, like the lean kine of Pharaoh's dream, is all but ready to devour all other forms. Need it be said that this is intemperance. If it be denied that drunkenness or intemperance is an evil, then let us call evidence. Professor Buchanan, Glasgow University—"I am not an abstainer," says the Professor, "but I see that drink ruins thousands every year." Sir William Gull, one of the first of living physicians, says, "I am not a pledged abstainer, yet I would like to say that a very large number of people in society are dying day by day, poisoned by drink." Major Ross, chief constable, Aberdeenshire, depones "that two-thirds of the crime are due to drink." Committee of the House of Lords, after most careful investigation, declares, "When great communities, deeply sensible of the miseries caused by intemperance; witnesses of the crime and pauperism which directly spring from it; conscious of the contamination to which their younger citizens are exposed; watching with grave anxiety the growth of female intemperance on a scale so vast and at a rate of progression so rapid as to constitute a new reproach and danger; believing that not only the morality of their citizens but their commercial prosperity is dependent on the diminution of these evils; seeing also that all that general legislation has hitherto been able to effect has been some improvement in public order, while it has been powerless to produce any perceptible decrease of intemperance, it would seem somewhat hard, when such communities are willing, at their own cost and hazard, to grapple with the difficulty and undertake their own purification, that the legislature should refuse to create for them the necessary machinery, or to intrust them with the requisite powers." God's book says "The drunkard shall come to poverty." "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God."

Now this evidence proves, if the fact needs proof, that intemperance is an evil—our country's sorest evil.

God steps in here and says to me, "Abstain from all appearance of evil." This is my first reason for being an abstainer—God's command. But it may be objected that it is drunkenness, or the abuse of intoxicants, that is the evil to be abstained from. Granted that the abuse is the evil, the ordinary use is the appearance from which God demands that I abstain. The command is not only to abstain from what is essentially evil, but also from what suggests, or induces, or, from its notorious tendency, allures to evil. Common sense comes to my aid and tells me that if the use of alcohol is the appearance of the evil, and the abuse of alcohol the evil, I can avoid the evil infallibly by abstaining from the appearance of it. In other words, I am anxious to avoid the sin of drunkenness—this I can do infallibly and eternally by abstaining from drink.

I have said that my first reason for abstaining is God's command. God has a right to command. I am bound to obey. The Creator's right to command His creature is as clear as His power to give His creature being. I must either obey or disobey God's command. To obey is duty. To disobey is setting my will against God's, which is the sin of sins. I must then either deny myself or defy God. Which? In view of my derived nature, in view of God's claim and command, in view of the grave where I must lie, in view of the judgment where I must appear, which is it to be? To deny myself and abstain, or to defy God and indulge.

This command "abstain," comes to me not only as a responsible creature, but likewise, and more penetratingly and suavely, as a redeemed creature. It comes not only from the unqualified sovereignty of God, but also through the medium of the Cross. Thus am I doubly bound to obey the command, by the tie that binds responsible creature to the sovereign Creator, and by the still more sacred ties of nature and love and blood, that bind believers to the cross of incarnate God.

My second reason for abstaining from the appearance of this evil is my own nature. Here is a soul, a memory, a will and conscience, that I am to keep till the appearing of the "Great God and our Saviour." For every stain these receive, for every blight that by my action or inaction comes to these powers, I must give account. Every sin is loss. Every known sin is shame and loss. Every known sin persisted in is aggravated sin and irreparable loss. If by thoughtlessness, or induced by example and custom, I reach excess in intemperance, and be not roused to repent and dash down the delusive cup, then my life ends in darkness worse than death. If roused haply to repent and abstain, it is to see the ruin I have wrought within, and how I have dwarfed and beggared my God-given nature; it is to see glorious possibilities gone from me beyond recall; to see, it may be, an attractive future, but over its brightness the shadow of the past is flung; to feel my energies enfeebled by the thought of what I might have been but for indulgence in that cruel, cruel cup. Charles Lamb tells his sad experience, as a warning to young men, in the following language:—"The waters have gone over me. But out of the black depths, could I be heard, I would cry to all those who have set a foot in the perilous flood. Could the youth to whom the flavour of the first wine is delicious as the opening scenes of life, or the entering upon some newly discovered paradise, look into my desolation, and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when he shall feel himself going down a precipice with open eyes and passive will; to see his destruction, and have no power to stop it, and yet feel it all the way emanating from himself; to see all godliness emptied out of him, and yet not able to forget a time when it was otherwise; to bear about the piteous spectacle of his own ruin; could he see my fevered eye, feverish with the last night's drinking, and feverish looking for to-night's repetition of my folly; could he but feel the body of the death out of which I cry hourly with feebler outcry to be delivered, it were enough to make him dash the sparkling beverage to the earth in all the pride of its mantling temptation."

My own nature demands abstinence, and very specially demands it in view of what the holy book deposes, "Ye are the temple of the Holy Ghost." Now if He abide in me at all, it must be for purifying purposes. But my nature purified or in process thereof by God's Agent, has, and must have, one all-absorbing reality before it, that is the attainment of complete purity or likeness to God. If this soul-hunger for purity be present as a power within me then I cannot and will not habitually partake of that which darkens the soul and nullifies its purity, and defies the purposes of God.

This nature then, re-modeled at the Cross, hallowed by the Spirit, and loved by the Father, should make continual progress in self-denial, purity, and nobleness; should throw off all merely carnal and unnecessary indulgences. This immortal within, partaking of the nature of angels, and dowered with a salvation love that in its full force even angels never knew, may aspire after an ever-expanding good. This spirit may soar above systems within systems, and worlds beyond worlds, and when these shall be extinguished in eternal darkness—the spirit may become still purer, wiser, nobler, through the years of God, and in its holy ambition and progress it may yet outstrip angel and archangel, until in the vast, vast universe it has no peer and no superior save eternal God, trinity of person in unity of essence.

These are the hopes that cheer my nature and brighten my prospects—shall I then lie down in the drunkard's vomit, and descend to the drunkard's nameless and unknown grave? N. M. P.

"THE PRICE OF BLOOD."

BY REV. SAMUEL HARDING, PAISLEY.

So said the chief priests concerning the thirty pieces of silver that Judas returned after repenting of the act of betraying the Lord Jesus Christ, "It is not lawful to put them into the treasury, it is the price of blood."

Our modern legislators, however, have no scruples of this kind if the recent debate upon the opium traffic be any criterion. With them the blood of souls, death, perdition, are minor matters provided the nation's treasury be well filled. It is saddening, and makes one blush for human nature. Setting aside altogether the higher principles of our holy religion to hear those who are designated statesmen, patriots, philanthropists, and Christians so speak, there must be something radically wrong. We are not surprised that infidelity exists in our midst, our only wonder is that it does not more largely prevail.

What a humiliating confession was that of the Postmaster-General in the British House of Parliament, "Twenty-six millions of money flowing into Britain's treasury annually as revenue from the improvidence and vice of the people occasioned by the liquor traffic." With all the affection we bear to our beloved country, we say, let the rod of her power be broken rather than continue the responsibility of raising revenue by the liquor traffic. Let our army and navy sink into oblivion, let our rivers be choked up with sand, and our merchant ships rot in the harbour, rather than go on hurrying immortal souls to ruin, and raise revenue from the groans, tears, and blood of our fellow-creatures. Better sell the crown of our beloved Queen to raise money, if it cannot be obtained from any other source, than raise revenue on the ruin of souls. Anything is cheap as sacrifice for the redemption of the people from this terrible curse. More than one hundred years ago John Wesley wrote in reference to the liquor traffic, "It is amazing that the preparing or selling this poison should be permitted, I will not say in any Christian country, but in any civilized state. Oh! it brings in a considerable sum of money to government. True! but is it wise to barter men's lives for money? Surely that gold is bought too dear if it is the price of blood. Does not the strength of every country consist in the number of its inhabitants? If so, the lessening of that number is a loss which no money can compensate. So that it is inexcusable ill-husbandry to give the lives of valuable and useful men for any sum of money whatever. Oh! tell it not in Constantinople that the English raise the royal revenue by selling the flesh and blood of their countrymen."

Is the church clear from participation in the price of blood? We feel humiliated as we answer, she is verily guilty in this matter. What are the contributions of those who are engaged in the liquor traffic—they are but "the price of blood." And is not the church receiving a portion of its revenue from this source? And does it not condone the guilt of these men, not only by receiving their ill-gotten gains, but by placing them in high positions as office-bearers in the church?

In one of the Metropolitan cities of the United Kingdom stands a magnificent protestant Cathedral, recently restored and beautified at a cost of one hundred thousand pounds, every penny of which was stained by the dark beverage which leads multitudes down to the drunkard's hell. Not to be left in the back ground, another trafficker in the same city expended fifty thousand pounds in the erection of a sanctuary for the worship of God. The names of these traffickers are emblazoned upon thousands of public-house sign boards throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

Methinks that, while the devotions of the people in these places are going up, there is also ascending to heaven another cry, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" The time is past for silence upon this subject. "Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord." Scotland needs men of God who will dare follow the example of Him who went into the temple of God "and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables, saying unto them, 'It is written, my house is the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves.'" O that the pulpits of Scotland were right upon this question, and all her ministers crying aloud, sparing not, lifting up their voices like a trumpet, showing "the people their transgressions, and the house of Israel their sins!"

Such language as the following would suit the traffickers, and purify the churches of this country from participation in the price of blood. In one of Wesley's sermons he says, "Neither may we gain by hurting our neighbour in his body; therefore we may not sell anything which tends to impair health. Such is eminently all that liquid fire, commonly called drams or spirituous liquors. It is true they may have a place in medicine. They may be of use in some bodily disorders, although there would rarely be occasion for them were it not for the unskilfulness of the practitioner. Men, such as prepare them only for this end, may keep their conscience clear. But who are they? Who prepare them only for this end? Do you know ten such distillers in England? Then excuse these. But all who sell them in the common way, to any that will buy, are poisoners—general. They murder His Majesty's subjects by wholesale; neither do they pity or spare, they drive them to hell like sheep. And what is their gain? Is it not the blood of these men? Who, then, would envy their large estates and sumptuous palaces? A curse is in the midst of them; the curse of God cleaves to the stones, the timber, the furniture of them. The curse of God is on their gardens, their groves—a fire that burns to the nethermost hell! Blood, blood, is there—the foundation, the floor, the walls, the roof, are stained with blood! And canst thou hope, O man of blood, though thou art clothed in scarlet and fine linen, and farest sumptuously every day; canst thou hope to deliver down thy fields of blood to the third generation? Not so, for there is a God in heaven; therefore thy name shall be rooted out like those whom thou hast destroyed, body and soul, thy memorial shall perish with thee."

THE PHILOSOPHY OF FOOD.

BY W. WHITELAW, M.D., KIRKINTILLOCH.

FOOD is to be taken, not for the gratification of the palate merely, but for the maintenance of health and the prolongation of life. In other words, the object of food is the rearing of a fine, healthy, and intelligent race of men and women. In connection with this there are to be considered various points:—

1. The age of the individual. There must be a variation in the nature and quantity of the supply of food at the different periods of growth. Neglect of this primary truth is one of the chief causes of the infantile mortality that disgraces Great Britain. Infants ought to be fed on milk, their mother's milk if possible, till they cut their front teeth; after that, they may be gradually accustomed to fine oatmeal porridge, wheaten meal food, bread in milk, and other similar diet. Their little stomachs should not be crammed with even suitable food, as is often the case—the consequence being vomiting, purging, and general disorder of the system. Happy the baby who is not stuffed to repletion by an indulgent mother, and digests and assimilates all the food that passes into the stomach!

Youths of both sexes should have a plentiful and at the same time simple diet. Overeating undoubtedly injures the health of many of the rising generation. People on this side of the Atlantic can scarcely be blamed for eating very frequently too much pie; but Rev. David Macrae, in his American Notes, seems to consider pie as the cause of the dyspepsia, pale faces, and irritability of young Americans. If attention were paid to the quantity and quality of the food of young persons by their parents, temperate self-denying habits would be cherished more readily hitherto, when the children become men and women. At same time, adults, with their full powers of observation, learning and reasoning, have no excuse for excess in eating and drinking; and when they do eat immoderately and partake of indigestible luxuries and poisonous drinks, they sin against light—the light of their own and general experience.

The late distinguished Dr. Abernethy confesses to once having violated his own pithy hygienic rules, and this is what he says—"I remember once having lived irregularly and taken butter, sauces, and sweatmeats, and things that turned acid and rancid on my stomach. I was seized with pain in my bowels, and had headache and a sore throat. I had a friend and a physician, to look into my throat, and there was a long discussion as to what sort of complaint it was to be. One said one thing; and the second another; but I smiled and said, 'If you do not know what it is, I know what will cure it?' so I took a dose of calomel and jalap, I lived upon toast and water for about ten days, and I got rid of my sore throat and face together."

Diogenes, a more ancient authority than Abernethy, made the remark that as houses well stored with provisions are likely to be full of mice—so the bodies of great eaters are liable to many diseases.

Babies may continue to live in spite of the ignorance and indulgence of mothers and nurses; and young people may revel for a while in the pleasures of the table—the original constitution being strong but the period of old age is not the time to experiment with dainties for the palate, and thus hasten the ever-advancing bodily sorrows. Elderly persons ought to know by experience what is meet for the body, and should avoid all disturbing elements in social life, take food moderately at closer intervals than the robust man, and do their utmost to conserve energy for reflection on the past, and hopeful looking to the future. It is painful to witness some old people cherishing the belief that as long as they can eat the quantities common in their working days, they will be able to hold at defiance the "last enemy."

2. The mode of life. A laborious employment, in which the bodily powers are much taxed, by causing a large expenditure of tissue and energy, necessitates a corresponding amount of good food to repair the loss. For example, a tiller of the soil, or an ironmoulder should have more food than a clerk or weaver. Sedentary idle people do not require heavy meals. In fact, the well-known maxim, "Those who don't work should not eat," has an expressive physiological meaning.

3. Sickness. The appetite is always good in health, and that person is healthiest whom hunger alone reminds that he has a stomach. In many illnesses there is almost no desire for food, a suggestion of nature that the stomach and other organs are to be allowed more than usual rest. In many so-called bilious attacks (often the result of excess at table) abstinence from meat and drink promotes restoration to health.

A king of Persia sent a celebrated physician to one of his provincial commanders, who enquired, on arrival, how his court lived. "We never eat till we are hungry, and always stop when we could eat a little more," said the commander. "Then I may leave this place," said the doctor, "I will have no practice here."

4. The Seasons. Substantial food is specially required in winter, to maintain animal heat and resist cold. In summer, the diet should be cool and diluted, to defray the increased perspiration from the skin. Hence, a "hot joint," like a warm overcoat, is more appropriate in winter than in summer; while in sultry July, a pint of curds and cream, or rice and milk with some fruit, would be preferable to a savoury steak. On account of the increased necessity for keeping up the internal temperature in this generally cold country, more food is required here than in a hotter climate to perform an equal amount of muscular and mental labour.

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

It is reported, my dear Mr. Editor, that a new vine pest, of American origin, has made its appearance in the Canton St. Gall. The disease is similar in its appearance to the potato rot, and the grapes affected by it become putrid. Well, we will not break our hearts about it. With the most of grapes it is a question whether they will be rendered putrid by yeast or putrid by the visitation of God. Let them fall by the hand of God rather than by the hand of a brewer. It will be the better for mankind.

The American papers tell us that Mrs. Annie E. Garrison, of South Bay, Wisconsin, obtained a verdict for 10,000 dollars (£2,000), in a civil damage case, against a liquor dealer who sold her husband liquor, thereby causing his death. Mrs. Garrison is fortunate. How many American widows are there just now whose husbands have not been so glaringly done to death as her departed, and who suffer all the woes that fall to widows through drink! A veto on the liquor sale would prevent the call for a civil damage law, because where no liquor could be sold, no damage could be sustained.

The people of Wick are in an evil case. The town council seem to turn a deaf ear to their prayers for an improved water supply. Five years ago the inhabitants had their water supply analyzed, and with the analysis they got the following note from the analyst:—"I am decidedly of opinion that one and all of the waters are grossly impure, and possess positively unwholesome properties. They are dangerous waters for domestic supply, and should not be employed for drinking, or cooking, or any other dietetic purpose." Such a water supply is provocative of intemperance, for people foolishly imagine that a mixture of strong drink poison with water poisonous enough already, will kill the animalcule supposed to live in such a mess. How stupid! There are things that, when brought together, chemically combine, and produce something that is neither the one thing or the other; but that cannot be said of dirty water and dangerous whisky, for when brought together they will not be clean water or harmless liquid. Let the Wick folk filter their water, boil it well, and agitate for a pure and plentiful supply. We thought they were made of sterner stuff than to knuckle tamely down to the use of dirty water for dietetic use, when they might command their town council to secure for them and their posterity the blessings of health and life-giving water.

Mr. D. Henderson, of Tain, writes you asking for proof of certain statements made about grocers in my last letter to you. I might simply refer him to one of the numbers of the Grocer for June, where I read part of a letter from an Aberdeen grocer, on which I commented. As regards the annoyance felt by the Aberdeen grocers his language is emphatic, and on its accuracy, no doubt is, in my opinion, to be cast. But the publication of the letter is itself a proof of his assertion. The first proof wanted is of licensed grocers being simply publicans. I repeat my statement,—They are, with this difference, that they are expected to sell for consumption off the premises, like some of the English publicans; and of the two (them and taverners, I hold them as the more dangerous on that account, as women, who would sink for shame on being seen in a drinking public-house, have little if any hesitation to enter their premises and traffic with them. The next charge—That they angle for women's liquor custom with the bait of tea, &c.—is involved in the last charge. The third, Is Tea a necessary? Well, my personal opinion is that it is not. But when a person is speaking on a special point, he is hardly justified in opening up knotty questions about terms with various senses; and whether tea is necessary, or the reverse, is not so fully settled as to allow of one departing from the conventional idea of tea being a necessary. Indeed, if one looks around him at the enormous consumption of tea, he might well be excused for thinking it the breath of life. The fifth charge—That licensed grocers are under the stigma of the State—need not be proved by me, when Mr. Henderson understands it in the sense, I suppose, of recognizing that it is just. Now, if Mr. Henderson would procure a copy of the "Royal Commission on Grocers' Licenses," issued a year or two ago, he would find that I put on my kid gloves when I wrote about them. I feel gratified at the compliment paid to you, Sir, by Mr. Henderson, that "if you would kindly prove the statements made, it will be in keeping with the character of the Social Reformer since ever he knew it, and that is a good many years now." May your readers always have this to say of you and the Social Reformer.

It is delightful to observe how the journalists write of the coming good times, and how they point to the abundant harvest as an indication of it. The Economist writes in this gushing manner,— "A good harvest cannot be anything but a great blessing. Especially must it be so at a time when trade, after long depression, has begun to show substantial signs of revival. Such is the uniformity of the testimony among business men, bankers, brokers, merchants, and all who are interested in business, as to the results of the bountiful yield this year. This, we have been taught, is the one thing which has been found lacking to confirm the upward movement in the new cycle of commercial prosperity, and give an absolute guarantee of prosperous times. Cheap bread—the invariable and inevitable effect of bountiful crops—means the assurance of a margin of saving among the multitude of consumers that will divert a larger sum of money to the purchase of superfluities, and thereby impart a sharp stimulus to trade. Hence it is concluded, upon valid and economic grounds, that anything like a bountiful harvest this year must enormously stimulate trade, and make the revival that has been somewhat languid and fitful an indisputable reality." Now, this would only be the truth in a country where the people avail themselves of plenteous harvests to purchase necessaries or save money; but in this country good harvests, like good wages, are a curse. We see this already in the increase of the Excise, in the greater number of cases at the police courts, and in the growing disorder, and view with serious apprehension the fearful excesses that will accompany the cycle of commercial prosperity on which we have undoubtedly entered. What would the noble heroes who fought for free trade say, if they beheld the grain they sought to avert famine with, used to create poverty and pauperism, and being when converted into alcoholic poison the accessory to murder?

THE WANDERER.

By the Author of "Paradise Restored," "Dick Saunter's Error," &c.

CHAPTER III.

MEANTIME Mr. Milbank was in company with Mr. Vernon, going over the Manor House, and looking to the fact of his being so poorly dressed when he met the latter, it was hard on his part to believe in the great change that had taken place in his circumstances. Whatever Mr. Vernon thought about him he did not very well know, but he soon found ere they had gone far that he filled a place in Mr. Vernon's out-door existence that was little else than an aching void. They went over the stables, trotted out the horses, slowly and carefully examined the stud; and while Milbank gave his opinion upon their various points, he felt that either his opinion fell in with that held by Mr. Vernon, or that what he did say was not to be rejected until after very careful consideration. Over the garden, hot-houses, and parterres as carefully as they went over the stables, and here Milbank added to the good impression made at first upon his entertainer. They then went down to the home-farm, and with the same results: a feeling in the mind of the host that his guest was a skilled agriculturist, and one in the mind of his guest that he had never come across a place where the master's eyes did so much and the servants' hands were more productive. But the hour of lunch drew near, and as they returned to the Hall Mr. Vernon remarked that he hoped that on the whole he had the favourable verdict of Mr. Milbank.

"Most certainly, sir. I have seldom seen a place where master and servant have apparently so persistently co-operated to mutual benefit and credit. Everything shows what wise supervision and willing obedience can do to produce a satisfactory result."

"I have always tried, my friend, to look at this matter in the light of morality. I am but the tenant of this great estate. It yields sufficient for abundant wants, and that when I rent portions of it at a figure below what I could easily get, but I could not get good tenants and rack rents at the same time, so I prefer the good tenant to having one who, toiling for me early and late, cannot by any means keep himself from the apprehension of approaching distress, perhaps ruin, should bad years in succession thwart his industry and skill."

"Well then, I should, were I to meet with your tenants, hear you spoken of as a kind and considerate landlord."

"I do think you would, although I do not require to wait upon your report to know. I feel within myself the consciousness of successful efforts in doing my duty. I never have a word with any tenant likely to evoke bad feeling, and at our meetings throughout the year the most independent and resolute of my tenants are loudest in my praise."

"In this you will no doubt be seconded by your son, Mr. Vernon."

"No, I am sorry to say. He has evidently no heart for a country life: no interest in the progress and welfare of the estate. He wants to remain in town, living with other young landlords like himself, and fast becoming one of those whose absenteeism has been so much a bane to their tenantry. Ah, Mr. Milbank, if you could save him from his folly you would confer an obligation which neither myself, son, wife nor daughter would ever think of being able to repay. His sister is trying to induce him to go abroad and travel for a few months, hoping, by his agreeing to her suggestion, that he may far from home see it in a light which, since he left college, it has never yet appeared to him."

In the afternoon a drive was proposed, and Jenkins being still ill Jones was sent for. Milbank did not hear the answer, but guessed it was unfavourable.

"If you don't mind, sir, I will have pleasure in driving you about. My efforts yesterday in more trying circumstances are calculated to inspire confidence in my abilities."

"We shall only be all too glad of your kindness." And, as if to show her confidence, Dora sprang lightly into the machine, her father followed, and away they went at that degree of speed known as a rattling pace. The day was beautiful, the sun was warm and the roads were in capital condition. The horses stepped at a great pace, and the air while cool was not so much so as to be disagreeable.

It was one of those districts of the country which offers so much pleasure to the eye. Milbank was for a stranger evidently aware of its peculiar beauties, and seemed to have a vivid remembrance of all that was worthy of observation. They were soon on the high road on which the accident of the previous day took place, and in a short time were driving through Woodgreen, one of those pretty villages which are, we fear, fast passing away. A river slowly rolled on its winding way to some one of the larger rivers that flow to the western shores. It was beautiful and clear, and threw back with almost intolerable brightness the rays of the sun as they danced on its waters. If we except the gas works there were no factories to soil the river or absorb the labour of Woodgreen. There were plenty of children running about, but when they had got the minimum of education they found their way to the larger centres, where, under the fostering care of some uncle, aunt, or other relative that had migrated as young in years as they were doing, they became the respectable or the residuum of its population. By all accounts, however, Woodgreen youths and maidens were held in good repute, and it became one of the cherished determinations of the denizens of the humble little place to train up the children to be the future merchants or manufacturers of the centre to which so many of their sons and daughters set out to seek and find their fortune. There was quite an air of respectability about the little place. The square, intersected by the great road, had at the angle nearest the river the Queen's Head, a large hotel and posting establishment. The original hotel had been so added to that the building was now a somewhat imposing though somewhat irregular pile. It was, however, in splendid order—on the window-sills there was plenty of flowers, whose glowing colours set off the grey Portland cement of the building. Beautiful dimity curtains lined the windows, and the blinds half drawn down suspended a neat red tassel encased in a white cup of crochet work.

The door was spacious, leading to a large lobby where there was ample accommodation for any amount of umbrellas, coats, hats, and fishing gear. Near by a roomy staircase led to the chief rooms of the house, while on the other side there was an equally roomy passage to the bar. What farther accommodation there might have been we will not stop to describe, as our party did not stop there. But lounging about the door might be seen two or three of those miserable wretches who pass almost all their time in the anticipation that their services would sooner or later be in request, and that they would be rewarded by a glass of Dame Ingram's best home brewed. That lady, a widow, kept the place better than it had been kept for more than fifty years. She had been born in it, brought up in it, was up to everything about it: so that when John Ingram came about the place she was manageress of its whole affairs. John was a farmer's younger son, and a spirited young fellow. The girls all set their cap at him, just as a broom is set at the masthead of a ship to show that a tender would not be rejected without consideration; but he was not in any hurry. He managed one of his father's farms, and did so to that gentleman's satisfaction, although often declaring that farming was by far too slow for him. Such a fine fellow could not always hope to escape the toils of the fair, and the sweet face of Sarah Williams was the sweet toils into which he found himself hopelessly entangled. She was discreet, however, and did not swoop down upon him so swiftly as the eager desire she had to secure him for a lover might have excused. She waited to see if the captive was pleased with his fate, and her discretion was rewarded. Gradually he yielded to love's sweet impulse, and the sequel was that Sarah Williams, while yet only manageress of the Queen's Head, became Mrs. Ingram. Shortly after, the landlord, her father, died, and John Ingram, in right of his wife, succeeded him, and the married life of Mrs. Ingram passed under an eclipse of many years' duration. As a lover no youth in the village was more worthy, as a husband under his father-in-law he was most exemplary, but as a landlord he was only contemptible. Refusing the wise counsel of his wife he allowed himself to lounge at the bar among the villagers, to engage in sports with cleverer rogues than ever he could hope to be. He soon left off attending to business, and choose rather to be at all the great racing events far and near, where he lost considerable sums of money. No remonstrance on the part of his industrious wife could impress him or alter his conduct, and so she toiled early and late, raising the fame of the place to the highest pinnacle of popularity. She saw with growing dismay that her husband was bent upon ruining her as well as himself, and she found after anxious inquiry that she had no redress. One day one of her dear children, to whom she had to be both father and mother, strayed from her nurse, and falling into the river was drowned. This event she hoped would lead to reflection on the part of her husband; but no, and from that hour she never gave him a place in her heart. Gradually the very customers at his own bar declined to associate with him, and with good reason, for if any lingering there assisted the master at one of his drinking bouts he soon learned that neither he nor his money was wanted. By and bye she would not allow any drink to be served in the room after nine o'clock, and it was no novelty for the villagers to find themselves on their road home almost as sober as they were when they entered. This improvement had not been secured without a struggle, indeed the most serious quarrel which ever took place between the ill-assorted couple took place through it. She boldly included him in her interdicted list, and came herself to tell him that none of woman born would be served after the hour prescribed. An angry altercation ensued, and at last, as resolute as ever, she left him. He followed in a fierce passion, and exasperated by her firmness, struck her severely. From that day she was wholly estranged, never taking any interest in his affairs, yet gradually and surely obtaining the mastery. About this time he took a severe cold, yet she nursed him with the most anxious solicitude, and brought him through trouble which was at one time believed to have a fatal termination. Perhaps at this crisis in their histories, if some friend had interposed, a reconciliation might have taken place. With his convalescence the opportunity passed, as it turned out, for ever. He tried to make up matters, but though she did not haughtily repulse him he felt that he had thrown away her affections. It is, however, useless to speculate on what might have been, for not long after this he took a journey upon some matter connected with the business, and as he departed he drew her to him as if to embrace her. Drawing herself away she asked him to desist as the blow he gave her had never healed.

"Nonsense, Sarah, that is a year ago, and the skin was not so much as broken."

"That blow smarts as keenly as on the day I got it, and will do till my dying day."

"Oh! don't say so, forgive me for inflicting it, and forget that ever I forgot myself."

"That blow might have been forgotten, but it was given, and when passion cooled forgiveness was never sought. Days, weeks, and months it has smarted, until now it could not be soothed away with years of expiation."

"Oh, my God! to think that such thoughts should find a lodging in your heart, and having me too for their object; but I will try and win back the old love yet. Kiss me before I go."

As she turned from him he seized her in his arms, kissed her passionately, rushed from the house, and was heard riding off at a rapid pace. He never returned. Just as he was at his destination his horse stumbled, threw him, and a fracture of the skull drove him from this sublunary scene. His remains were brought home, and after those in charge had left the room where they were laid, she quietly took a candle, and silently entered the chamber of death. What passed none knew, for she locked herself in with the dead body. After some time she as quietly returned, and only to those that keenly marked her features did she appear to have been weeping, but none dared to either question or console her—the one she looked on as impertinent, the other as insufferable. From the day when he was committed with some pomp and circumstance to the grave, his name was never mentioned by any in her service. Everything that was associated with his presence was gradually weeded out. His name alone she kept, as she told her minister, because she had made it honourable, so that no more respected name was heard in all the country side. So on she had lived the thorough mistress of her affairs, everything about her like the Queen's yacht, a model of order and discipline. Her stern and wholesome rule about supplying drink to the villagers had never been relaxed, so that there was scarcely a maddened drunkard about the place, and she often has been heard to say that if people did not go elsewhere and buy it from less scrupulous sellers a case of drunkenness might never have been seen in Woodgreen. Still there was plenty of drinking in the village, though it did not exhibit itself grossly, and although she was rigorous in preventing excess she afforded the means of sowing the seeds of intemperance in many a constitution which slowly ripened into a harvest of disease and misery and sin. Like many others her susceptibilities did go out to meet gratification from the glass. She loved to rule: her chief pleasure was derived from having a grand house, lordly guests, a splendid stud, and a busy trade. In the prime of her life, respected, wealthy, vigorous, she felt no weariness nor lassitude. Her only aversion was to anything that savoured of compliment to her, she dreaded any one that presumed to look upon her with feelings akin to admiration. She did not care how much she might be the object of female envy, indeed she rather liked that as it applied admission of her superiority, but she never would again permit her affections to rest upon any of the other sex. She has been heard to declare that one man did deceive her, and only one would ever have the chance. All her affections were liberally bestowed upon her two children, a boy and a girl. If they were right, the day had no cloud, if the least ailment troubled them the brightest day was plunged in gloom. Standing at her best room window she saw Mr. Vernon, Miss Vernon, and Mr. Milbank pass, and the interchange of recognition between them showed that all were on friendly terms. The rest of the square was taken up by the chief shops of the village. There was the draper's with its rude imitation of metropolitan fashions; the baker, who was a personage of great position. He was at once farmer, miller, and baker, and his little bakery was the source of supply to half the country side. Here, too, was the grocer, who did not seem to thrive like his neighbours, and at the opposite angle of the square from the Queen's Head might be seen the prosperous premises of the joiner and undertaker. He could furnish a cradle for the young wife, a coffin for the old man, a chest of drawers for the blushing bride, and a counter for the busy merchant. At the very moment the Vernon equipage passed, he and his man were harnessing the little pony in order to carry "the stretching board" some miles into the country. On the greensward before the school the school children were making the most of their leave of absence, and the air resounded with their cries and shouts, the outburst of their gambols. Here a mother sat at the door with her infant on her knee to suckle it and rest herself. There drooping age sat in the sun in the hope of deriving vigour from his beams. The brr of a wheel was evidential of industry, the clang of a hammer of arduous labour. At length the pretty little place was left behind, and the trilling song of the birds, the many-hued tints of autumn apparent in the forest, the bare surface of the grain-bearing fields, and the russet aspect of the land lately so beautiful with its green, invited silent consideration from them all. Each was busy thinking: Milbank of new resolves and a better life; the old gentleman of his erring son, and his lovely daughter of the pleasure which she would feel were her brother as kind as this stranger.

By and bye her thoughts settled pretty closely down to the task of analyzing all the events of the past two days, and it was quite wonderful how large was the space which Milbank filled in the existence measured by these two days—filled with his bravery, his skill, his manners, papa's esteem for him, her own gratitude,—yes, she felt only gratitude—well, let us too, as yet, say gratitude for his kindness. Where did he come from? He was not vulgar like the peasants of the village, nor brutal like the people of the cities. How long would he stay? she hoped for some time for papa's sake. Papa would be very glad of his company, and she was sure so would mama. As for herself she thought that he was welcome to stay till he—she choose to go. It is somewhat dangerous when a young lady begins to speculate so closely upon the bearing of a young and handsome man, especially when she is content to lay the onus of his leaving her company upon the said young man.

On they went, and, to Vernon's surprise, Milbank never seemed at a loss about the way. He simply drove on over the hill that brought the party to the river, along the bridge that spanned it some miles below the village, and then away up towards Elm-grove the seat of his host. It was not until they were nearing his own lodge that Mr. Vernon remarked—

"Well, we could never have had a better ride even if Pegasus had had the reins, nor have kept the way better, even if Jenkins had been guiding us."

"I felt at first surprised, but merely thought you had given precise instructions to Mr. Milbank before we started. We have been a charming drive. Don't you think so, papa?"

"I do, indeed, Dora. It is so much more pleasant than running away. Oh, Dora, to think that you should have given way to feelings of terror, and as the horses plunged on the road, have done nothing but scream."

"What could I do, papa? I was warned from my earliest years not to jump. I could not get hold of the reins, so I shouted for help, and I must say that it was to my taking your advice and clinging and shouting that we owe the pleasure of my rescue by Mr. Milbank, and your pleasure from intercourse with him since then."

"You are quite right, Dora; always right." As they drew near Jenkins was standing awaiting them, but so poorly that the moment his master saw him he jumped off and ordered him off quite peremptorily home to bed and rest.

"Do, Jenkins, go at once. You are not well, and I want you well, so go to bed and recover there. I am sure Fletcher never gave you permission to rise already?"

"No, sir, but I could not rest when I found none but this stranger to drive you out. So I came to see if I could not go into harness again, but you are right, I am not in trim at all."

"Oh, we are getting on pretty well, Mr. Jenkins. We had as good a drive as you could have given us; of course I mean in your present state of health. So take papa's advice and go indoors, and we will all have the pleasure of seeing you all the sooner that you take care of yourself."

"Bless you, Miss Dora, one always feels sunshine with you. Well, I will just go, but I am downright vexed that Mr. Wentworth would not allow Jones to go out with master."

"Ah it was not a filial action, but we must not judge too harshly. He will come round yet, Jenkins."

"Ah, so he will; so he will," said the faithful fellow as he trudged away.

Milbank had, in the meantime, gone up to dress. As his eye fell on his dressing table he was surprised at seeing a note evidently addressed to him. It was a hasty scrawl, and read thus:—

"Sir,—You had better cut your stick out of this, for there is a plot to mark you if you don't. You may laugh this warning off, but if you do, you will live to repent: remember Wantage Inn.

"The Favorite."

The superscription—Mr. Milbank.

Mr. Milbank gazed at this writing long and earnestly, turning it over and over as if it was juggler's paper, and might show all manner of things by merely turning it up like a box labelled glass with care, but nothing more appeared.

"What can be the meaning of this? Who knows me here? However, it is a warning which I should certainly accept. I shall be on my guard, and before another day closes its career I shall throw myself upon the kindness of Mr. Vernon. Wantage Inn, too, where I had to chastise a scamp. I can't make it out, but I shall be on my guard—on my guard."

FOURTH GENERAL UNION FOR PRAYER

FOR THE ENTIRE AND SPEEDY REMOVAL OF THE TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING DRINKS AND IN OPIUM.

(From the 7th till the 14th November, 1880.)

THE friends of this Union are urged to hold one or more meetings for prayer; to introduce the subject at ordinary prayer meetings. The progress of the temperance movement and the increased attention which the opium question has received during the present year are great encouragements to persevering supplication. The following subjects for prayer are suggested in relation to

THE TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING DRINKS.

Sabbath, 7th November.—That the people may soon have the control of the licensing system, and may rightly use the power when it is obtained. Chapters that may be read:—Isaiah lviii.; Matthew v. 13-20.

Monday, 8th November.—That all who are victims of intemperance may be rescued, and that those who abstain may be faithful to their vows. Psalm cxvi.; Proverbs i.

Tuesday, 9th November.—That those who manufacture or who deal in intoxicating drinks may be led to reflect on the awful results of the traffic, and may be induced to give up all connection with it.—Proverbs xxiii. 29-35; Isaiah xxviii. 1-13.

Wednesday, 10th November.—That those who send out intoxicating drinks to the heathen, often at mission stations, may cease to perpetrate this evil, the guilt of which is peculiarly aggravated. Daniel ix.; Romans xiv. 10-21.

Thursday, 11th November.—That a spirit of prayer may be poured out upon all associations formed for opposing the drink traffic, and that in answer to their petitions they may be more and more guided and blessed in carrying forward the temperance movement to a successful issue, and may thus be instrumental in removing a mighty stumbling block which now obstructs the progress of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Zechariah xii. 10-14; Isaiah lvii. 13-21.

Prayers are also urged to be offered against the opium traffic on the 12th, 13th, and 14th November. We earnestly bespeak the sympathy and prayers of our friends on behalf of the temperance question as indicated by this Union.

A writer in East Kent Gazette says:—Once in my life I took up my abode temporarily in a London coffee house, which happened also to be the head-quarters of a whole army of teetotalers. I had good opportunities for observing their peculiarities, and I noticed that many had only given up one excess for another. Although they had relinquished intoxicating drinks they drank non-intoxicants to a tremendous extent, and as for smoking I could have backed them against any similar number of Dutchmen or Germans. My dormitory was very near their large club-room, and, if I had not taken the precaution to let down the top sash of the window for half the night, I verily believe I should have been suffocated, and my carcass smoked-dried as completely as a well-cured piece of Hampshire bacon. Smoking is as much an artificial practice as inordinate drinking, and those who refrain from contracting such a pernicious and useless habit are to be congratulated.

THE FUNDS.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, NOVEMBER, 1880.

OUR NEW YEAR'S TRACT.

THE Executive are glad to be able to announce the issue of the first twenty thousand of their New Year's Tract for 1881. This year it is from the eloquent pen of the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D., Edinburgh, and bears the significant title, "The City of the Plague; or Sights of London in Sixteen Sixty-five." It is illustrated in the finest style of the art by Pearson of London, and may be had at 10s. per 1000, or 1s. per 100—carriage not paid. Societies may have their name and local announcements printed at the top at an extra charge of 1s. 6d. per heading. If heading contains more than 40 words, by special agreement. On all orders of 2000 and upwards no charge is made for heading. Orders should be sent in at once, as there are already indications of the tract meeting with a very large circulation.

MR. JOHN PATON.

THE Executive are glad to announce that Mr. Paton will return from a three weeks' tour in Ireland on 20th November, and from thence to the end of the year will assist the lecturing agency of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. Applications from Committees desirous to arrange for a visit from him may be sent at once to the Secretary, R. Mackay, Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow, who will endeavour to meet their wishes as far as possible. In dealing with such applications, the Executive will give a preference to those which contain a wish to have Mr. Paton for two or three consecutive nights.

The Social Science Congress has, since we met our readers, been and gone, and we are in the depths of reflection over all that has been said. Society receives the drenching it so liberally bestows with the feeling that it is only once a year, and on the strength of the large outflow and overflow of topic and discussion devotes a very superficial attention to the questions with which the Congress deals. Those immediately benefited are those that are truly aiming and striving to secure some means of ameliorating the condition of mankind. They can next deliberate on and compare whatever suggestions may be brought under the shadow of the great names to lend their influence to its deliberations. This year the Congress has been helpful to the cause of social and political progress: it has been helpful in promoting deeper reflection on the great questions involved in the Temperance Reformation. Permissive Legislation, Parochial Drugging, Local Option, and Specific Temperance Education have formed themes for much interesting and profitable discussion.

The Rev. John Kay of Edinburgh gave a paper on "Temperance in Primary Schools," in which may be found a very exhaustive resumé of the entire rise, progress, position, and prospects of specific education on temperance truth in our primary schools. Education has most influence with the young, just as growth has most influence with the twig, and to form in the plastic mind a doubt or distrust of strong liquors is to forever unsettle the faith of the "coming race" in the virtues of strong drink. It is gladdening to hear that 44 schools in Glasgow, all the schools in Edinburgh, inclusive of Heriot's Hospital, look kindly on the work of educating the young in the principles of temperance. It is interesting to know that the scheme of Robt. Lowe to demand payment by results is also found antagonistic to apathy on the part of the teacher on this matter. Irregular attendance, chiefly arising from the drunkenness of parents, injuriously affects their interests by diminishing their grant. Hence it will be their interest to teach the young under their charge in order that their grant may be maintained. While this education is going on we need still a local option measure to stop the tap, for education may point out the right road, may show that it is the best as well as the right way, but it will not prevent the injury, the mortification, the ruin of thousands so self-indulgent or so trained as to see and approve the better, but follow the worse.

"The Rhetoric of the Recess" will soon be in full flow. Many honourable members are slowly recovering from the exhaustive and prostrating labours of the "Long" session. Others are still roaming over the "Green Isle of the Ocean" in search of light on the Irish land question, and, it may be, are taking a sly kiss of the "Blarney" stone as they meander along. They will soon be giving their constituents their views on the abolition of the malt tax, the duty on beer, and the coming Government Licensing Measure. On some of these points, they will speak an infinite deal of nothing, and will as likely as not too often speak away from the issue. But it is the duty and privilege of our friends to put them right. Indeed, the ignorance or the intelligence of members of Parliament on our question indicates the extent of the education to which the friends of prohibition they represent have subjected them. If they have been lax in laying facts and arguments before them, then that laxity is visible in the crude and undigested views of their representative on the question. If he manifests an intelligent grasp of their proposal to deal with the drink traffic, then that happy result has been brought about all the more happily that it has most intelligent supporters in his own constituency. During the coming session honourable members will be asked if they are to support a special Bill for Scotland. All our friends can during the recess take advantage of their representative's presence amongst them to render an account of his stewardship to prepare his mind for giving his staunch support to a measure conferring upon the people of Scotland the power to abolish the liquor traffic of their respective localities. This is their duty. They did their duty nobly previous to the division of the 18th June. Let them endeavour to discharge it as desired in view of the next session, and a like triumphant result will sooner or later crown their efforts.

One of our contemporaries the other day in having his usual fling at Rev. Dr. Begg, whom he loves as well as he loves Bailie Lewis, quoted Lord Palmerston's famous letter to a certain Edinburgh presbytery which memorialised his lordship to appoint a day of national fasting and humiliation, because of the cholera which was raging. The reply was conclusive. His lordship did "not think under the circumstances such a national fast was desirable or suitable. The Maker of the universe had established certain laws on the observance or neglect of which the weal or woe of mankind depended. One of these laws connects health with the absence of those gaseous exhalations which proceed from overcrowded human dwellings or decomposing substances, and it is the duty of man to attend to those laws of nature and to exert those faculties which Providence had given to man for his own welfare. To stay the cholera it was imperative that he remove the causes and sources of contagion which, if allowed to remain will infallibly breed pestilence and be fruitful in death in spite of all the prayers and fastings of a united but inactive nation. When man has done his utmost for his own safety then is the time to invoke the blessing of Heaven to give effect to his exertions." We could not choose an utterance that would better arraign the folly of those who are continually crying to God to put away the pestilence of intemperance from the land and yet fold their hands and do nothing. One of the laws of our Maker connects the use of liquor with poverty, crime, unsoundness of mind, and national disorder, and until we energetically set about to remove the breweries and distilleries that produce, and the public houses that dispense such baneful liquors, we do not act so as to deserve a gracious answer with the prayers we offer. Godiva prayed the grim earl her lord to remit the tax he just had laid on Coventry, for "if they have to pay they starve:" he turned bluntly upon her and told her she would not let her little finger ache for such as these. But she nobly rejoined she would die, and asked him to prove her sincerity. He did so, and in responding to the severe demand he made upon her womanly sensibilities, she built herself an everlasting name, for the proud earl, moved by her devotion, abolished the tax he would have exacted irrespective of the consequences to Coventry. It is in this spirit we should act when our Maker's laws are violated by our fellow beings. Let us not merely be content with prayers to a beneficent God who is not Benevolence personified but a moral Governor, and let us urge on our fellows the duty of obedience to the law broken through the cupidity of some and the weakness of others, and besides help to render their obedience easier. Men ask God's blessing on our mutual efforts. The abundant blessing will impart irresistible power to our puny efforts, and man be blessed and God truly revered. If in this spirit we were as a nation to act towards the fountain and cause of intemperance in this country, how soon would the one be stopped and the other for ever removed?

The winter is upon us and the work of temperance and prohibitory committees should be during its course energetically carried out. Our temperance and good templar halls should now be crowded with earnest listeners to temperance and prohibitory truths, and our membership lists and our pledge books should be rapidly filling up. From one end of the country to the other such should be the case, and where it is not there is "a screw loose" either in the committee or in its arrangements. Where there is enthusiasm, activity, and success, the society and its committee will be found working on the lines of a rational and stable scheme, and we have only to say that such societies have our earnest cry and prayer for their progress and success. We would earnestly impress upon those others which are struggling and threatening at every meeting "to go under" to examine themselves and their arrangements to see where the real cause of their failure is. To help them in this work we unhesitatingly affirm that it is useless to think that people are madly desirous to adopt their pledge: some have done so often, and as they have had struggles which have ended in their going back to the drink-pots they will fight shy of temperance meetings: others have relatives who are directly engaged in the traffic and they cannot shake off the connection: others have not a relative who abstains and they have not the pluck to be singular: others fear ridicule, and others think that by taking the pledge they are branding themselves drunkards. But for all that there are plenty that only need to have the nature and effects of drink explained to them and the duty of abstaining properly urged upon them to induce them to join the ranks and become noble workers in the cause. It is useless to think that merely hiring a hall badly lighted up, and sitting in it without a fire, will attract people. Nothing tends so much to failure. A cosy fire free to all, a brightly lighted hall, a few pictures on the wall, and a busy committee, are the prime factors of success. Why the temperance movement is aggressive, a fighting movement, a seeking in order to save movement, an effort on the part of its devoted followers to pluck the brands from the burning, and who would bring the wounded or scorched into a dingy hospital ward? If they would not why should committees bring the poor drunkard into a miserable out of the way hall. It is as useless to hire a brilliantly lighted hall, if committees wont arrange to have good speakers, not merely famous speakers, but good, earnest speakers, for although a most excellent fire, sunlights, pictures, vocal and instrumental music are provided, yet if advocates are not present to teach, labours in the neighbourhood, selected for operations will not be profitable or satisfactory. We would not rigidly exclude these adjuncts, but we would certainly subordinate them to sound, healthy, earnest, witty temperance teaching. An advocate is asked to give an address, but he is told to be brief, he is ushered before the audience in terms that show that the committee would dispense with him if they dared, and yet that man is expected to speak so as to charm and instruct. That is the way to make advocates careless in their preparation and careless in their oratory. Encourage them, listen to them, applaud them, thank them, pay their fares or provide a cab, furnish a tea should they appear to need it, and it will be as true as twice six are twelve that they will exhibit a knowledge of their subject or a desire to please that will carry them over the difficulties of their subject, and draw forth the applause and commendation of their audience. If under such encouraging circumstances advocates encumber the platform set them aside: they are sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. If on the other hand committees treat advocates as gentlemen; they will not want those that will be worthy of their best attention. Such are some of the secrets of success deserving of the attention of our temperance committees. If they are made the basis of operations they will bring success that will be at once lasting and satisfactory. The winter has now fairly commenced. Let committees be in earnest in their work; let them strive after unprecedented success; let them secure good sound speakers; let them not merely pledge abstainers to give over drinking, but also enlist voters who will whenever they have the chance veto a system that is at once at war with the will of God, and the true and lofty interests of man. Like them have a mind to work, and victory will in due time perch upon their banners.

A very readable paper on Local Option by the Rev. J. A. Johnston, was submitted to the late meeting of the Social Science Congress. We are glad that in it Mr. Johnston does not speak for us, seeing that he considers local option as an amendment of the Licensing Acts, when its effect would be to destroy their licensing power altogether. The licensing clauses of the Scottish Public House Acts are their exceptional clauses, and these clauses it is the avowed intention of local option to abolish. However, we mean by local option other than Mr. Johnston, namely, the possession and exercise by the people of a given locality, the same licensing control as that of the licensing court. By local option, we mean the power vested in the ratepayers or house-holders, of preventing the issue and continuance of all liquor licenses in their midst. It is that, or it is nothing. Temperance Reformers have been for years supporting a proposal of that thorough going character, and they will be satisfied with nothing less. They don't trouble themselves with the latitude of local option, that is, whether it means to increase, decrease, or extinguish public-houses. They find none, the publicans themselves not excepted, asking for power to increase. Many will be found glad to join in a crusade to decrease, as against a crusade to abolish; it therefore remains for the true Temperance Reformer to concentrate his energy and his influence on getting the option to abolish. Let him see to that. Whatever powers may be sought, let him see that that power is obtained, because it will be most grudgingly given, even by the present Parliament. Once it is granted to the people, a most corrupt element of political and social corruption will be forever lost to Government; it cannot be expected that Parliament can let it go without reluctance. There must be a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull altogether to get our demand, and with this it will be got. In reviewing the threefold optional mode of dealing with the liquor traffic, Mr. Johnston manifests his long standing dislike to the Permissive Bill, and takes the side of Mr. Forster as against Sir Wilfrid Lawson. The Permissive Bill seems to him as well as to Mr. Forster, to have too much Prohibition and too little option, and he forgets in stating Mr. Forster's view, that he seems to be pleading for something less than prohibition. Why should we care for the opinions of moderate drinking, statesmen or modify our views till they harmonize with their aversion to the suppression of the drink traffic. That traffic ought to be suppressed, and in that ought is involved our marching orders. It is a marvel to find Mr. Johnston, whose acumen and subtlety of mind is so apparent, so obtuse on this subject, the more so when we find him admitting the simplicity and effectiveness of the Permissive Bill. He sets it aside, fortunately, not on the grounds of its merits or demerits, but that it is not likely soon to become law. Happily, the publicans differ in toto with him on this point, and we agree with them, and not with Mr. Johnston. The Permissive Bill of Sir Wilfrid Lawson may be withdrawn for ever, but whenever there is a bill before the country, providing for the local suppression of the liquor traffic by the vote of the people, there is a Permissive Bill. Let us not deceive ourselves by names. We, for ourselves, don't care with what name the bill, the measure, or the law may be christened, if its powers are equal to the overthrow of the traffic by the ratepayers. Mr Johnston finds a new name for the partial veto which, for so many years, was the object of his solicitude. He calls it the "direct" veto; but it is scarcely fair to appropriate a name too likely to mislead. The "direct" veto has only partial scope, and aims to suppress any license whose obnoxiousness invites its action. The Permissive Bill, or suppressive veto, or entire veto, will be as direct in its action as the special or partial veto championed by Mr. Johnston; and to call the latter the direct veto brings an element of confusion into prohibitory politics, which so acute a reasoner as Mr. Johnston should have taken care to exclude. Mr. Johnston is meantime entangled in the meshes of the Licensing Board scheme. Our readers know our view of this plan—that it is too like the present administration of the licensing laws to be palatable to all who have observed intelligently the action of the Licensing Courts and Quarter Sessions. We choose to appeal to Cæsar, and not to his deputies; to the people themselves, and not to a committee appointed by them; to a final poll on the subject, and not to the triennial or quinquennial election of a body of men no better than those that license at the present moment. It is significant that Mr. Johnston has to go to Englishmen to bolster up his scheme; to the Church of England Temperance Society—at present in the densest mist on this question; to Joseph Cowen, and his copyist, Mr. Harrison. England has no licensing magistracy in the sense that we have in Scotland, and a licensing magistracy might really improve matters with them. Mr. Johnston only claims for these Boards that they would work better than the present system; and as they are not suppressive, as we understand suppression, we can see that we would, by adopting this scheme, be very little nearer the goal of all our hopes than we are. We are truly sorry to differ from Mr. Johnston, but we cannot help it. He declares himself sound on the prohibition of the traffic. He wants it down, no doubt, some time; but when he is called on to plunge boldly into the fight, he shrinks from the struggle, apparently preferring the inglorious work of reducing the outworks of the enemy to gallantly joining the storming-party—manfully assailing the fortress, and planting the victor's banner triumphantly on the battlements of the citadel.

A banquet was given on the 26th September, to Sir Kenneth M'Kenzie, of Gairloch, Bart., in acknowledgement of his contesting Inverness-shire against Cameron of Lochiel, and only losing by 30 votes. The proceedings were most successful; and Lord Lovat stated that if ever Sir Kenneth saw fit to place his services at the disposal of the Liberals of the County of Inverness, he would be most cordially received. Sir Kenneth would, if returned, vote for the Local Option resolution. Lochiel has always, when present, voted against the Permissive Bill and the Local Option resolution.

INTELLIGENCE.

Drunkenness is said to be largely on the increase in Belgium.

Of the 13,000 cabmen in the Metropolis, 1,000 are abstainers.

The movement for providing Army Coffee Taverns is meeting with generous support.

Coffee taverns are flourishing all over the country. We are sorry to add that the liquor traffic is also flourishing.

It is said that the new Lord Mayor of London will lend the weight of his position to encourage temperance at the civil banquets and elsewhere.

The right of the State to regulate or prohibit the liquor traffic has been frequently affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Rev. C. H. Collyns, M.A., of Wirksworth, has been appointed Secretary of the British Temperance League, in room of Mr. F. Atkin resigned.

SERVE HIM RIGHT.—Thomas Moyes, of the Abbotsford Temperance Hotel, Edinburgh, was found guilty of harbouring women of disreputable character, and fined £10.

The Temperance Society of France offer a prize of 2,000 francs (£80) for the best essay on the question, "Do alcoholic liquors, when introduced into the economy, undergo any modifications?"

J. W. OWEN, the Electoral Agent of the United Kingdom Alliance, died at Manchester, on 12th September. He was a most devoted servant to the movement, and was widely esteemed.

FASHIONABLE FEMALE DRINKING.—The love of strong drink appears to be increasing among the educated women of our day. During the season just past instances of this were so frequent as to lead to the conjecture that a kind of epidemic of drink was pervading those classes of society in which culture, position, and the possession of every comfort of life would appear to be a sufficient guarantee against so degrading a vice.—Truth.

There are 128 Soldiers' Temperance Association Societies in India, with a membership of 9,002 members, and 4,107 honours have been distributed. The increase of membership during the year is 1,355.

It has been resolved to erect a drinking fountain in Glasgow, to cost about £700, as a memorial of the services rendered to the temperance cause by the Hon. Lord Provost Collins, during his term of office as chief magistrate.

MR. F. AITKEN, the secretary of the British Temperance League, has accepted an engagement as Lecturing and Special Agent of the Western Temperance League. We wish him signal success in his resumed career.

Burns' birth-place is at length to be dissociated from the drink that did so much to tarnish his fame. The memorial committee have purchased the "auld clay biggin'," and intend making it into a museum for the relics of the poet.

The first of the seventh winter's series of conversations under the auspices of the Scottish Temperance League was held on the 18th ult., in the Pillar Hall of the Queen's Rooms, Glasgow. The Hon. the Lord Provost presided, and the Rev. J. A. Johnston read a paper on the subject of Local Option.

There is a temperance society in every European regiment commanded by General Sir J. Roberts,—a fact which may largely account for that General's brilliant march from Cabul to Candahar. Drink kills more than the climate in India.

At a conference in Manchester the other week, the Licensed Victuallers expressed serious fear that the Government had in contemplation a measure of the most disastrous kind relating to their trade, and resolved upon organized opposition to it.

FOOD AND DRINK.—On an average £4 3s. is spent yearly by every person, young and old, in the United Kingdom on bread, tea, coffee, cocoa, sugar, and rice. On alcoholic liquors alone the expenditure is £4 7s., or 4s. more than all the other articles put together.

One sign of progress, and a most cheering one, is the large numbers of inquiries made at our offices for information on the question of Prohibition, for use in essays and debates in connection with literary associations. We are always glad to assist those who will seriously study the question.

We have lately been having a Licensed Victuallers' Exhibition—a curious thing in its way, but very incomplete. The intricate and elaborate machinery of our national curse has been on view, but not the length and breadth, the height or depth of that awful curse. It requires two worlds fully to exhibit that.

There has been a decrease in the number of shipwrecks up to the present time this year as compared with the same period last year. We wish we could say the same in regard to the number of man-wrecks, but we can't. The sea has been calmer, no doubt, this year, but strong drink has been raging.

At a meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society held in Exeter Hall, a clergyman thus referred to the expenditure of drink:—"How much do you think has been spent in the last eighty years by all the Protestant Christian missionary societies of the world, and all the Bible societies put together? Not more than England spends every three or four months on drink!"

LIQUOR IN THE UNITED STATES.—That the temperance cause is making steady and certain progress in the United States there is abundant and indisputable evidence, but that it has yet a great task to accomplish is also made obvious by the significant figures of the Internal Revenue Department with reference to the liquor traffic. It is announced that for the last fiscal year, ended June 30, 1880, the revenue from distilled spirits was 61,185,508, dols. 79c., an increase over the previous year of 8,615,224 dols. 10c.; that on fermented liquors also there was an increase of 2,100,486 dols. 12c. It appears also that the revenue from retail liquor dealers' licenses shows an increase of 269,247 dols. 61c. over 1879.

DRUNK AND INSANITY.—In 1860 there were in England and Wales 38,058 insane persons; there was, in 1879, 71,191. The rate of increase of the population was 28 per cent.; of insanity, 87 per cent. Intemperance stands as the first of causes of insanity: 27.5 per cent. of the men were insane through it, and 10 per cent. of the women.

Railway accidents are becoming alarmingly frequent. Of course, as long as human fallibility, over-worked pointsmen, and bad metals exist, we may expect to hear of such accidents; but drink need not be allowed to augment their number. Drink will do more mischief than dynamite. If it gets to be a recognised factor in these smashes, we may fear and dread to take even a five-mile journey.

Here is how the trade view it in America. "Mrs. Hayes' 'No wine at State dinners' may have sounded easy to other people, but it was almost a sound of death to the wine trade. Many is the time we have sold hundreds of boxes to dealers who we knew in turn furnished them to the executive mansion. That trade is entirely gone now. Last winter (in Washington) there was not one case of wine sold where forty were sold even ten years ago."

THE QUEEN'S PARK ESTATE on the Harrow Road, London, belonging to the same committee which erected the Shaftesbury estate, near Clapham Common, London, is almost finished, when it will consist of 8,000 houses and 30,000 persons, all of the working classes. No public-house will be allowed on the estate. We may inform our readers that this population is nearly as large as the populations of Ayr and Dumfries taken together; they will draw some idea of the size of Queen's Park Estate, and some idea of how many households will be relieved from the constant drink temptations to which those in towns studded with public-houses are subjected.

GLASGOW.—On Wednesday, 6th ult., a meeting of St. Luke's Branch, Church of Scotland Temperance Association, was held in the Parish Church, Bain's Square, the area of which was quite crowded by one of the most interested audiences ever brought together. The Rev. Mr. Dick, Pastor of the Church, presided; and the speakers of the evening were Messrs. Stevenson and Mackay, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The addresses met with most hearty applause. The evening's proceedings were agreeably diversified with vocal and instrumental music. There were 36 pledges taken by the audience at the close—4 pledging to be an example of strict personal sobriety, and 32 pledging to thorough personal abstinence. The usual votes of thanks terminated one of the best meetings yet held under the auspices of this branch.

HIS PLEA.—James Brown, of Balgersho, Coupar-Angus, was charged by the Caledonian Railway Company with roughly shaking a lady, a fellow-passenger, and when remonstrated with, cursed and used foul language, and knocking down a gentleman passenger. He was ejected at Lochee, and threatened to throw the station-master over railings into the street below. He denied it, but when evidence condemned him, he expressed sorrow for his conduct, and accounted for it by saying he must have been drunk, as he did not remember anything that occurred. The Sheriff declared that his conduct was disgraceful, and the worst that had come before him. Fined £2, and £2 costs, or thirty days' imprisonment. The liquor dealer escaped scot free, although he was accessory to the shameful conduct of his customer.

"The average English operative is not equal to the average American operative, either physically or intellectually. I notice a lack of physical strength in the workpeople as they leave the factory. They look sallow, and appear haggard and weary. There is a kind of languor, and a lack of buoyancy of spirits among them, quite in contrast to our American operatives on this particular. Then, again, beer drinking and smoking are very common among them, and an enormous amount of money is spent in this way. Beer is the great curse of the poorer classes in England. The contrast in the condition of operatives in England and the United States—in dress, in education, in living, and in the prospects for the future of their families—is most marked indeed. American operatives in their social position, in their school privileges, and in the future possibilities open before them, are a hundredfold better off than the operatives of this country."—Col. Shaw, United States Consul, Manchester.

THE REVENUE for the quarter and the six months show decided improvement. It is melancholy to think, however, that so much of this improvement should be owing to the consumption of strong drink: The Scotsman, the inveterate enemy of the Scottish Prohibitory movement, on this subject of improved revenue, makes the following significant remarks:—"Excise, which was only £40,000 up in the June quarter, is £191,000 up in the quarter just ended. No more conclusive proof of the improving circumstances of the people could be obtained; they are spending more on liquor and luxuries. The fact that one of the first results of returning prosperity is indulgences of this kind may be regretted: but such is the fact." The fact that people cannot meet prosperity without using it to the ruin of their physical, mental, and moral being, might well be regretted if it was inevitable for them to dissipate their means and incur ruin, but when a prohibitory law would save them regret should not be indulged in till the law was tried and failed.

A WOMAN'S CRUSADE.—The Daily News of 19th ult. published the following:—"According to advices received by the last mail from Ohio, Fredericktown is just now a scene of remarkable excitement. The wives of the citizens, being deeply moved on behalf of the temperance cause, met the other morning, summoned by the ringing of a handbell. Falling into procession, they marched to the principal liquor establishment of the place, which they found closely guarded. After some parleying, they proceeded to break open the doors, and, having thus effected an entrance, they turned on the taps of all the barrels that were tapped, staved in others that were not, and broke every bottle in the place. The ladies next visited other stores where liquor was sold, and were at the hour of the latest despatch pursuing their victorious course unchecked. It is clear that the male population of Fredericktown is utterly cowed before this uprising, and the bar-keepers find themselves deserted in the hour of danger by those who have hitherto loyally supported them."

THE WAY TO CONQUER APPETITE.—In the course of an address, in London, Mr. Gough said:—"I knew a man who undertook to give up the use of tobacco. He chewed it—the best cavendish tobacco. (This was in America; they don't chew here, I believe.) He put his hand in his pocket, took out his plug of tobacco, and threw it away, saying as he did so, 'That's the end of it.' But it was the beginning of it. Oh, how he did want it! He would lick his lips; he would chew camomile; he would chew gentian; he would chew toothpicks, quills, anything to keep his jaws going. No use; he suffered intensely. After enduring the craving for thirty-six or forty-eight hours, he made up his mind: 'Now, it's no use suffering for a bit of tobacco; I'll go and get some.' So he went and purchased another plug, and put it in his pocket. 'Now,' he said, 'when I want it awfully, I'll take some.' Well, he did want it awfully; and he said he believed that it was God's good spirit that was striving with him as he held the tobacco in his hand. Looking at it he said, 'I love you. But are you my master, or am I yours? You are a weed, and I am a man. You are a thing, and I am a man. You black devil, I'll master you if I die for it. It shall never be said of me again, 'There is a man mastered by a thing!'' Every time he wanted it he would take it out and talk to it. It was six or eight weeks before he could throw it away and feel easy; but he said the glory of the victory repaid him for all his struggle

Many large temperance meetings have been held during the last month all over England. The North of England Temperance League held their twenty-second annual meeting at Stockton amidst much enthusiasm. In their Report the Executive recommend house to house visitation as the most effective means of enlightening the people. The friends in Leeds with great rejoicings celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the temperance movement in their town. They commenced with sermons on Sunday, and throughout the entire week following they held demonstrations, conferences and public meetings, and systematically deliberated upon all phases of temperance work—the religious, economical, medical and legislative. If every town would copy from Leeds in this, prohibition would be soon an established fact. At Exeter the National Temperance League held a congress with members of the Sanitary Congress, at which the Bishop of Exeter and Dr. Richardson both delivered excellent addresses bearing upon sanitary science in its relation to temperance reform. At Leicester a church congress was held, at which the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Liverpool, and Canon Farrar spoke. Papers were read in support of local option, and discussions took place on that and on the "shattered assertion"—"You can't make men sober by Act of Parliament." In London Cardinal Manning addressed a great meeting of the Catholic Temperance League; and lastly, but not least amongst these great efforts to advance the cause of temperance, we note the United Kingdom Alliance annual meetings, of which we speak at more detail elsewhere.

SIR GARNET WOLSELEY AND TOTAL ABSTINENCE.—Temperance men point with pride to Sir Garnet Wolseley as an abstainer, and Sir Garnet, in a letter, which has been published, informs a Church of England clergyman that there is no one wishes well to the temperance cause more sincerely than he does. All his experience as a soldier makes his conviction the stronger that "the less liquor there is consumed in any army the more efficient is its condition," and he adds, "with the troops under my command recently in South Africa, we had very little spirits. Of my own personal escort the majority were total abstainers, and they were models of what soldiers on service should be. I find that if you give men plenty of tea and sugar, they don't miss their grog after a time. Having no grog with you in a campaign eases your transport very, very considerably, and removes a temptation to steal, which its presence in an army always creates." It has often been said that whatever class of people turns more sober than another, the English agricultural labourers would never discard the home-brewed beer. But the fallacy of this has been proved. A Hampshire farmer has published a letter reporting that an experiment he made of giving a harvest-home supper on temperance principles to his labourers, with their wives and families, numbering in all about seventy, was a decided success. "A very sociable, pleasant evening was spent," he writes, "and all expressed themselves perfectly satisfied. I believe it proved to them that it is quite possible to enjoy a harvest-home without beer. I may add, my head carter went through the harvest without drinking any beer, and that he says he never did his work more comfortably." Besides enjoying better health, the humble carter, of course, also added considerably to his little store of wealth.—Daily Review Correspondent.

The Earl of Zetland has entered into an action of declarator. Messrs. Carmichael and Wilkinson are the respondents. Carmichael, a draper in Falkirk, is the trustee for the owner of the property in which Wilkinson deals in spirits. His Lordship wishes to enforce the prohibition of the feu charters and to get Wilkinson interdicted. The defenders plead that the prohibition in the charters had been waived from time immemorial and that the premises in question had been licensed for fifty years. Also that as the prohibition founded upon being inapplicable to the existing circumstances of Grangemouth is contrary to the spirit of the true meaning and intent of the feu charter and cannot be maintained.

We were sorry to see that by an inadvertent error Rev. Dr. Adamson's name had been omitted from the report of our annual meetings as seconding the third resolution. The Executive esteemed not only the doing of this service highly, but the doing of it formally; the rev. gentleman denying himself of an opportunity in which he might have greatly enhanced the services rendered, by placing his views on the question before a City Hall audience.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, BART., M.P.—At Kirkealdy on the 18th Sir George said—"Mr. Gladstone's great achievement had been the Budget, by which he had electrified and pleased the country. The Budget had been an enormous success. Every one, he thought, now agreed that the transformation of the malt duty into a beer duty was an extraordinarily happy thought. By this enactment Mr. Gladstone had satisfied the farmers and at the same time increased the revenue. He hoped that as another result of the change he would be able to do justice between England on the one side and Scotland and Ireland on the other by the fairer adjustment of the incidence of the duty in regard to beer and whisky. They might also trust that Mr. Gladstone would tackle the great brewing interest—the aristocratic brewers who sat both in the Lords and in the Commons—and increase the beer tax, and in this and otherwise bring about other financial reforms and improvements."

TROY, DONIPHAN CO., KANSAS, U.S.A. — SPIRITED CONDUCT OF LADIES.—"The 24th September was the time set to dispose of the two booth privileges at the Fair, by auction, to the highest bidders. The proprietors of the two saloons in Troy were there to bid; and so sure were they of succeeding, that they had given directions about fixing up the booths, and one of them, at least, had laid in a quantity of provisions and other goods. But when the time came, a number of the ladies of the Temperance organisation were on the ground, to buck against whisky. But they adopted an entirely different plan from that pursued by most women in these temperance contests. They did not try to succeed by praying, and subjecting themselves to ridicule, nor by smashing barrels and bottles, and getting themselves into trouble, but they went at it on regular business principles, and bid against the saloon men for the booths. The bidding was spirited, but the ladies stood it longest, and secured the booths, paying 225 dollars for them, which was almost double the amount they brought on previous years, and was a good thing for the Fair Association. When the sale was awarded, some of the beaten parties contended that the terms were cash, and demanded that the booths be contracted to them, as the ladies could not pay for them, and would not take them. But the ladies hauled out their little cheques, which they filled to the amount of the purchase money, and handed them over to the Association. Their opponents were fairly beaten, and took it in good humour. The ladies have banished the sale of whisky, beer, and wine from the Fair Grounds this year, and in their stead will sell eatables, lemonade, and hot coffee and tea, which will be much better for those who are tired and hungry, and will not produce quarrels and fights. This is a turn not to be regretted, for liquors have never been of any benefit on the Fair grounds." The incident here given is one well worthy of imitation in this country, not only for the good resulting from the action taken, but also as an instance of out-and-out prohibition. All honour, then, to this small, but devoted band of noble ladies for their good work. That this was no spasmodic effort on their part the writer can testify, for, on a recent visit to Troy, he had ample evidence of the strong temperance feeling pervading their small community; and at this distance of place and time, he bears testimony to it and to their desire and effort to keep the drink demon from their doors. What the good ladies of Troy have done could be done by their sisters here; and if the calling of their attention to this leads to similar action at country fairs, shows, &c., our notice will not have been in vain. In the United States a very strong anti-drink feeling is prevalent among the ladies, who, by practice, precept, and teaching, do all in their power to crush the traffic in intoxicants, and banish them from their homes. What benefits result from this may be summarised—quiet and peaceful homes, good example to their offspring, and an elevating tendency of strong moral sentiment, stimulating the waverers to follow their footsteps. A. D.—G.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

A RUN TO U. K. ALLIANCE MEETINGS.

ON Monday 18th, we left the Central Station, Glasgow, in company with the deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The day was very fine and the journey promised to be made under the bracing and pleasant stimulus of a fine October day. As we went south, however, we found the cold, and the gloom of a rainy day combining to diminish our pleasure: added to these was the delay indulged in by the railway authorities whose servants on this occasion never put on "a spurt," but resigned themselves to loss of time with an equanimity with which the passengers they conveyed did not at all share. Manchester was reached forty minutes later than we were led by the railway time-tables to expect. The friends who expected us were taught a lesson in patience, which was not at all visible in the hearty manner in which they received us. Two-thirds of us went off to Ashton, the remainder remaining in Cottonopolis. Ashton was reached after a short ride, and then the residence of Hugh Mason, Esq., M.P., where we received a most hearty welcome. At tea we met Mr. Thos. Burt, M.P., Dr. Lees, and the repast was most enjoyable, seasoned as it was with a diffused and not merely one-sided conversation. On reaching Ashton Town Hall—with a sitting capacity for 1000 of an audience—we found it densely crowded, and many left outside. English meetings are superior to Scotch meetings in respect to the number of women that attend them, whose presence adds greatly to the interest and enthusiasm of the proceedings. Bailie Torrens fully sustained his high reputation and the other member received an indulgent and appreciative hearing. It was a most successful meeting. Next morning found the deputation at the breakfast party in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, provided for by the Alliance Executive. The capacious area of the great hall could not accommodate all that came, but by relays all at length were served. The look at the assembly from the gallery was very fine. The hum of conversation was varied by the boisterous welcome given to some friend who had just put in an appearance. The committee to prepare the business for the general Council were then named, and we learned that Scotland was represented by Bailie Torrens. The Council meeting, the real meeting of the day, though certainly balking less imposingly in the public eye, was held, as is usually the case, in the Friends' Meeting House. Exteriously this differs in no feature from an ordinary kirk, internally it does so very much. You find yourself on entering the church, travelling along a passage which brings you half way up the building; and you are, for all practical purposes, in the church itself. The seating is peculiar, several seats facing the audience occupy the place of the pulpit in ordinary churches, the area is seated parallel to these, but the seating under the galleries rise towards the window the same as those in the gallery. Should the congregation more than suffice for this part of the building, room is got by removing a partition which divides the building and a considerable area is gained by this means of enlargement. The aspect of the edifice is plain, as is the dress and the worship of the Friends. Many of the women are beautiful: their charms—if we can venture to speak of the charms of so demure a beauty as a Friend—are increased by the simplicity of their attire. As usual, the building began to fill as the Free Trade Hall emptied; and it afforded enjoyable pastime to those assembled to watch for the appearance of noted friends of the movement, and welcome them with cheers, some stimulating the welcome with cries of "ge it toonog lads," when there would be another cheer. At ten precisely, the spare, stooping figure of Mr.

Barker, with his keen eye, the intellectual face with its grey hair appeared, closely followed by Sir Wilfrid and the members of the Executive and speakers selected by the business committee. What a hearty English cheer greeted them as they passed up the passage to the platform. We cannot come near it in Scotland. At length all being seated, Sir Wilfrid rose and met with even heartier cheering. His speech was another tribute to his platform ability, years cannot wither, nor repetition stale the varied excellences of his speeches. He is continually harping on one string, but he makes that string give forth all the inexhaustible harmonies of the orchestra. He has one idea, but he clothes it in all the varied charms that beauty can disclose, and the readers of his speeches are charmed by the unfailling freshness and variety of his address. The representative character of the speakers was fairly maintained, though one only for Ireland and one for Scotland was thought enough. The report was read by Mr. Pope, who put in large exercise the art of skipping. It might have been held as read, for all were supplied with a copy of it and of the resolutions. The impression on our mind was that the report had all its interest discounted; we all knew of the victory, and the formal recitation of it had not the power to renew the jubilant feeling which it evoked at the time it took place. The resolutions were nine in number, and the submitting them to the meeting was done in a manner which left nothing to be desired. Birmingham and Burslem friends submitted the annual report, which was carried; Belfast and Brecon submitted the list of office-bearers, the Rev. Johnelones, of Brecon, reminding us that he first gave publicity to local option, and prophesying that Wales would be under Sunday closing by the end of another session. What threatened to be a display of inharmonious feeling was evoked by Mr. Kempster of London, moving the election of Mr. Joseph Malins to a seat on the Executive. He masked his proposal by first moving Mrs. Lucas, sister of Right Hon. John Bright, which would have met with unanimous approval, but the meeting would not stand the gentleman, and so to restore good feeling, the lady and gentleman both were made to walk the plank. The matter will be adjusted next year. It came out that no provision had been made for the admission of ladies on the Council of the U. K. Alliance. The sooner it is made the better—the presence of Mrs. Lucas would be an acquisition even to the Alliance. Gateshead and Glasgow submitted the third resolution, and did it happily. George Charlton is a reformer of the Radical type, and had a glowing account of the north of England to give. Bailie Torrens met with a cordial reception, and gave a telling and therefore impressive speech. Both these veterans cling tenaciously to the central idea of the movement, the abolition of the traffic; and that alone as the real solution of the difficulty. York and Hull laid the next resolution before the meeting—thanks to Sir Wilfrid and his colleagues—in a most effective way. Mr. Balfour followed in a speech marked by a resolute determination to fight to the bitter end. This is the idea, the true idea of the warfare. We are foolish to dictate to ourselves or to others the time of the victory. We are wise to fight till it comes, though we may die fighting for it. Sir Wilfrid Lawson's reply was in the very best spirit—thankful for past support, but as exacting as ever of that support in the future. Studiously clear on what was wanted, studiously averse to say one disparaging word upon any proposal tending in the same direction as his own. What he wanted all men to understand he cared for was, that the power of licensing liquor shops should not be exercised where the people say they don't want it. The statement deserved the vigorous cheering which it received. Mr. Whitworth added a few earnest words, and the vote was cordially passed. Mr. Pope submitted the resolution of the day—calling on the Government to introduce a local option measure in the next session of Parliament. Certainly we did not sympathise with his suggestion that the power we have striven for should be a compound of a licensing board and a veto; we will try the effect of a law directly investing the people with power themselves immediately and directly to abolish the liquor traffic which injures them. In no way can the power for which we contend be more effectually applied. Alderman Tatham made a capital observation in speaking to this resolution. If in the expected Government measure there was no veto, he did not care what its provisions were, it was doomed to failure, and a great cheer spoke the approval of his sentiments by the audience. The next resolution—on finance—was submitted to the Council in the most masterly way by Rev. Charles Garrett. What a power that minister can wield over an audience. His speech was a splendid appeal, and backed by Mr. Watson, the great tract distributor, Mr. Wm. Hoyle, and Abraham Sharman, it had a most munificent response, about £4500 being promised to the funds. The Alliance has done well during the past few years with the allocation of its funds, so far as keeping out of debt is concerned. Its last three balances at the close of the year were £1636, £1598, and £1710. But like the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, its finances would have been below par, but for the legacy of the late lamented Sir W. C. Trevelyan. However, with better times, there will come generous help, and the power that it begets. A call to duty, the Sunday closing measures, and the usual votes of thanks formed the remaining resolutions towards which Councillor Fairish, Chester, Rev. Thomas Hutton (who spoke brilliantly), Mr. Bingham, one of the common folks whose unadorned eloquence stirred the meeting; Dr. Lees, whose bugle note thrilled the audience to the core. Mr. Kempster, who, though sometimes not safe in deliberation, referred to electoral action as essential as ever; Mr. Manning, of Canada, who told the meeting that the appeal of the Dominion publicans to the Privy Council had not been disposed of; Mr. Raper, who gave one of his genially couched and graceful little speeches, a compound of humour and wisdom, in the course of which he took care to show that Scotland had greatly inspired Sir Wilfrid by the position it had won. Then came the Hon. Baronet's closing words, and the Council dissolved.

It is unnecessary to speak of the evening meeting, farther than to say that it was as successful as ever, and you can't say more than that. The overflow meeting was the best we have ever seen. Bailie Torrens presided, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Bingham, Rev. C. Garrett, Mr. Kempster, Dr. F. R. Lees, R. Mackay, W. S. Caine, M.P., A. Pease, M.P., Rev. R. Mitchell, and Rev. W. Reid. The chairman was enthusiastically received, and at the close he had to give another speech, which was even more welcomed than his first. The Scotch element was largely represented at this meeting. At the out-of-doors overflow meeting, the attendance was large and enthusiasm great.

Next day, after an interview with Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the Executive of the U. K. Alliance, the deputation returned to Glasgow with the feeling on their minds that the country on this question was fully abreast of the leaders, so far as sympathy was concerned, but that much hard work was in store and ultimate success, though the exact moment—when it would happen could not be predicted—was nearer than some people would allow themselves to believe. S.

POLITICAL CORRUPTION.

The turning of EVERY stone, at the general election, to oust the Tories, has demoralised the Liberals; and, if it is not repented of, they may settle down—ever ready to sacrifice, even, Liberal principles for victory. This result is already noticeable in constituencies where seats have been lost, or retained by the Tories, through small majorities. And, in the light of this fact, it is not encouraging to reflect that the large liberal majority in the House is the result of small majorities in the constituencies represented by Tories in the last Parliament. Toryism is weak and merely obstructive in this Parliament, but it is strong in the constituencies, and capable of increased force to take back its lost seats.

In the constituencies represented by Tories through small majorities this state of corrupted Liberalism is clearly evident. In these constituencies Liberals who are temperance reformers do not stand by the prohibition of the drink trade, nor by any Liberal principle. They call such crotchets. For if they did they might be restrained from voting party. This is, no doubt, an outcome of publicanism, as the most corrupting power, in alliance with the other voting forces, which support Toryism. The publican as a voter is politically corrupt; and he votes to maintain himself as a privileged trader, against the will of the community in which his trade may be discovered to be a calamity, not merely in impoverishing the people, but in corrupting them morally and politically. The publicans' victims do anything for drink. And publicanism from being the impoverishing and criminalising factor in our social conditions, has become the corrupting political power to drag Liberalism down, through drink, to the level of Toryism. The two now wallow together in one sink of corruption. This is especially so in county constituencies where public-houses are numerous. By the Reform Bill of 1868 county publicans were made voters; their license depends on the voting rent, and while—with a few exceptions—they have given their votes to the Tories, they have impartially distributed their corrupting influence. And while past progress is becoming inoperative, the manifestations of future progress are blighted at their source. Let it not be forgotten that without progress conserved and continued there is no Liberalism. The Liberal candidate who, in declining to prohibit the drink trade, attracts the support of temperance reformers as mere Liberal partisans, divests Liberalism of its progressive character, and conserves the conditions which make Toryism still possible. For the drink trade is revenue derived from material and mental waste; and political freedom lost in the people's drunkenness and inability to stand up for great Liberal principles.

But there are temperance reformers who, while they admit all this, decline to be guided by it, and, in blind stubborn allegiance to party, vote against their convictions and stultify real Liberalism. They are in the crowd, gathered by electioneering tactics, and even thoughtful men, massed in such a crowd, are impelled more by crowd feeling than by conviction and conscience. It is in this relationship they have mostly erred, and sacrificed social and political well-being to party interests. When temperance reformers are reminded of this mistake, they reply that there is not anything to be expected from the Tories. That may be true. But neither are progress, culture, prosperity and freedom to be expected from the Liberals so long as they are afraid to pronounce the doom of the drink trade. Hares, with fixety of tenure, to the farmers, dead Englishmen equally divided between the parsons and dissenting ministers, more voting power to the people, and even permanent peace with the world can never obviate the prevalence of Toryism while the drink trade is retained as the great means of taxation. We must be under the influence of Toryism while it is liable to grow into power; and that liability must continue to loom in the immediate present, while the drink trade is with us as the embodiment of waste, social demoralisation and political corruption.

That Liberalism may not become absorbed in Toryism it must cultivate the suffrages of temperance reformers by adopting a means of taxation in harmony with sobriety, production, culture and progress. This is now the work of Liberalism, and it devolves on temperance reformers, as a numerical and moral power within the party, to unite it and lead it in the undertaking. When they become faithful to their convictions this is their place and mission. They are as responsible for the culture and direction of the Liberal party as they are for the sobriety, moral and social well-being of the nation. For they have been begotten and developed by the national temperance movement to work for the one purpose and the other. And they are in the heart of the Liberal party. The movement thus dominates the party to make it its political instrument. All this is verified in the political and social outcome of the past twenty years. But the future has to reveal this faithfulness to temperance conviction. And, if not, we must remain out of harmony with the periods in the past that have transmitted much of all that is best in the present. TRUE.

LOCAL OPTION.

WHAT does Local Option mean? or what does it propose to effect? According to some men who set themselves up as authorities, it does not mean much; while, according to others, it means a vast deal. It means what is certain to be of permanent and abiding interest to society. Since my connection with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association many years ago, I always recognized that it had a glorious principle to fight for—a principle easily understood by any one who gave a little consideration to the subject; and that principle was a popular vote upon the issue of licenses by the people living within the licensing area. I never could understand how this proposal could be opposed by those who professed to love sobriety, unless it was a kind of pride of opinion, or that the idea did not emanate from their particular quarter. Some people tell us that local option is something very different from the Permissive Bill. That was a measure hated by saints and sinners, but local option is a general favourite. One man says, "I am against the Permissive Bill, but I quite agree with local option." Another says, "I don't believe in prohibition at all, but the principle of local option commends itself to my judgment." I think we should try and disentangle our minds from this state of confusion.

Local option, to be effective and adequate to meet the evil, must confer a full veto power to remove the public-house. Anything short of this will not be in harmony with the requirements of the time. Local option must afford complete protection from the invasions of the liquor dealer. It must arm the ratepayers with a power to exclude the publican from destroying the amenity of their homes. The phrase "local option" has been differently interpreted. Here is a definition of it from a very eminent man, the Right Hon. W. E. Forster. He says that the people "ought not to be allowed, if by chance they might wish to do so, more than a certain maximum of public-houses, and they should not be allowed absolutely to prohibit them." That is the utterance of a statesman. If one were to attempt to dissect it, it would seem to be a sad mixture of effeminate Whiggery and stiff Toryism—the worst kind of mixtures of all! His words want the genuine ring of the reformer, but they are quite in harmony with the spirit of the compromising politician. Forster is bent on resisting the march of the prohibitory movement for a complete veto over the issue of licenses. He fails to realize the issue, or to understand the true needs of the age. He would give power to remove a little of the evil, but he would not give power to remove the whole of it. It is perhaps too much to expect politicians to go before us in this matter. They will be content to follow afar off, and will only be led as prohibitionists are in earnest. We are in danger of being hoodwinked and deceived if we don't look out.

If we are to have local option, it must not be counterfeited; it must be option of the right sort, with as few trammels about it as possible. We want the removal of the public-house. We want a "scientific frontier" of prohibition round the dwellings of working men. This has been the aim of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from the first. Hence we have been advocates of a popular vote as the best means for securing that end.

It is refreshing to see old opponents of the Permissive Bill coming to take a share in this reform; only, it would be a happy circumstance if they would be content to follow Sir Wilfrid, and not attempt to bring forward mangled schemes of their own that may rather hinder than help him. However, this has always been the way. Great reformers have had to be patient, while lesser men aired their projects, and annoyed them by seeking to amend their plans. Buxton's righteous soul was vexed in this way by men who advocated a system of "gradualism" as a preparation for emancipating men from slavery. Rowland Hill experienced exasperating difficulties in carrying out his postal reform because individuals succeeded for a time in mutilating his splendid scheme. Cobden was sadly tried in his efforts to repeal the Corn Laws both by Whigs and Tories. These wanted a sliding scale; those wanted a fixed duty; but his unbending demand for the right thing crowned him with glory and honour. Sir Wilfrid Lawson wants to put into the hands of his suffering countrymen an instrument to enable them to smite the curse of license. This, above all things, is what the country requires at the present moment. Do not let us divert attention from the essential question by merely talking about customs. Bad customs, in this case, are the result of bad laws. The liquor laws are not moral laws. Neither let us suppose that we shall ever rectify this wrong by raging against churches. Let us press on to secure a full power to vote down the public-house, and then both Church and State will immediately feel the beneficial results of the change

SECOND NOTICE.

Sir Henry offers a graphic description of the stomach-burdening process involved in an old-fashioned dinner. First, oyster and turtle soups consomme with punch: fish, salmon or turbot, or both smothered in lobster sauce: sherry: four entrees, oyster patties, mutton or lamb, lamb cutlets: Vol au vent: hock and champagne: this consumes three-quarters of an hour! Then saddle or haunch of mutton, currant jelly, cold vegetables and heavy flabby salad. Boiled fowl and tongue, or a turkey with solid force meat, a slice of ham, and so on up to game. Hot substantial pudding, three or four other sweets, including iced pudding: wines in variety more or less appropriate followed by a pate de foie gras: more salad, biscuits and cheese, again two ices and liqueurs: then an array of decanters, red wine and a prodigious dessert of all things in or out of season. The disappearance of the ladies and the closing in of men with host and reassembling of decanters, age and quality of wine discussed, recommendation of vintages, &c., &c. About two and a half hours lost at dinner.

In contra-distinction to this barbarous mode of dining, barbarous as to its eating and drinking, for it is surely akin to swinish to eat and drink so grossly, Sir Henry offers a scheme for what he calls a perfect dinner party. It should be small, and seated round an oval table, not encumbered with floral ornaments. Eight persons at such a repast is quite enough. Now for the bill of fare or menu: "A perfect consomme, a choice of two fish, a fillet or a chateaubriand, a gigot or a fricandeau: followed by a chaud froid, creme de volaille garni" a roast and salad, and choice vegetable and an iced souffle or charlotte, and in summer a macelaine of fresh fruits in an old family china bowl if there is one; and lastly, a savoury biscuit accompanying vegetables and appropriate wines. This is still high feeding. Now for the liqueurs, one bottle of wine divides well into eight, if therefore the host desires to give with the roast one glass of particularly fine ripe Corton or Pomard, a single bottle is equal to the supply, and so with any other choice specimen of which a single circulation is required; and of course the rule holds equally if the circuit is to be repeated."

Every food reformer will view with approval the improvement, slight as they may esteem it, which Sir Henry would establish upon a meal so important to the constitution as a dinner; for there would be a very great restriction indeed in the consumption of various meats and drinks, a restriction that would tend powerfully in the interests of a stomach on which the old fashioned dinner imposed an injurious and not seldom a pleasure-destroying burden; and in the interests of a hospitality, which, not so severely taxed, would be promotive of greater good feeling and better cheer. Still in the matter of liqueurs, Sir Henry is even yet too generous. He may have, we do not know, but he may have a strong opinion that no stomach would be able to endure the perfect dinner he offers as a substitute for the gross one he would displace, unless its sensations were silenced or modified by wine. There is a great danger often in knowledge, and the knowledge of the strain to which the constitution may be subjected is often acted upon to the permanent injury of its functions. What brandy and soda is to those enervated by alcoholic excess wine may be to the gourmand. He seeks a glut of pleasure to his palate, and regardless of the misery of his stomach irritated by excess in quantity and quality, he drowns its remonstrances with wines of this and the other vintages or brands, quite aware that the penalty for his wrong-doing is inevitable; still wine may at least postpone its exaction to the future. We believe that fermented wine, beer, or spirits should never be used at meals, and as little even of water or coffee, &c., as possible; when there is soup, there should be none at all. The use of liquids on such occasions relaxes the stomach, weakening the concentration of its efforts on the processes of digestion.

Sir Henry, as might have been expected, gives his opinion against the regular use of alcoholic liquors. He says, "I am of opinion that the habitual use of wine, beer, spirits is a dietetic error, say for nineteen persons out of twenty. In other words, the great majority of the people at any age, and of either sex, will enjoy better health both of body and mind, and will live longer without any alcoholic drinks whatever, than with habitual indulgence in their use even although such use is what is popularly understood as moderate." Again, "But I do not aver that any particular harm results from fine pure wine—and rare as this is, I do not think any other is worth consuming—just as any one may occasionally enjoy a particularly nice dish, neither the one or the other being sufficiently innocuous or digestible for frequent much less for habitual use." Again he says, "Then I frankly admit that there are some persons—in the aggregate not a few—who may take small quantities of genuine light wine or beer, with very little if any appreciable injury." We ask our readers to pause here and ask themselves the question, What really can be the real nature of the substance of which Sir Henry Thomson speaks so guardedly? If the vast majority are better without it than with it, if even in its genuine and purest form it can only be used as pastry or shellfish is, by a man on the threshold of old age, very occasionally and very sparingly; if there are those, who, as the extreme exceptions of the human race in its attenuated form, can alone use it in the smallest quantity, and of whom we can say not that they have escaped its perils, but that their injury is not manifest, surely the conclusion is a loud appeal to abstinence from its use on our own part, and a burst of pity and commiseration for those unfortunate and infatuated creatures who use it in its grossest forms and in reckless draughts. The weighty import of these remarks of Sir Henry's simply mean that for thirty-one millions of our people, alcohol is a dangerous drug to use in any quantity; and if they venture upon its habitual use they expose themselves to the most serious peril, whether they are young and strong, old and feeble, man or woman. Drinking by them of even pure and genuine fermented wines and beers of commerce means for them diminished health and shortened life. As for those who can drink without harm, because they do not show it, a wise man will not be lured by their seeming immunity to indulge, even with all the advantages of rare draughts and the genuine article. That the evil is not appreciable may be true, but that it does exist is certain. We cannot approve of such teaching. The very feeling is begotten of evil done and not felt, that some evil may be done and yet defied. Prudence dictates another course—and urges us to beware of not only evil, but its appearance, because evil done is ever the harbinger of a harvest of misery. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they do grind and grind to powder.

Sir Henry lays down a canon admirable but impracticable, for at the very moment when obedience is imperatively required, obedience is impossible. Sir Henry says:—"Relative to those matters every man ought to deal carefully and faithfully with himself, watching regularly the effects of the smallest license on his mental and bodily states, and boldly denying himself the use of a luxurious habit if he finds any signs of harm arising therefrom, and he must perform the difficult task with a profound conviction that his judgment is very prone to a bias on the side of indulgence since a luxurious habit is so agreeable, and to refrain therefrom in relation to himself and to the present opinions of society so difficult." For luxurious habit we should substitute poisonous drug, and for agreeable, seductive. However veiled the use of drink or the habit of drinking is by the mellifluous language of our author, he cannot wholly disguise the danger, might we not say the extreme danger, of taking alcoholic liquors. No wonder, when the power of alcoholic liquors is to generate excess. The use of these liquors is in the inverse ratio to self-control, the greater the use the lesser the control, and a stage is often reached by the growth of appetite when control disappears and the drinker, rudderless and unmanageable, plunges into all the horrors of mental and moral shipwreck. Sir Henry writes that all that he has said in favour of a very restricted and very occasional use is absolutely the best that can be said, and how little in their favour that is our readers can gather for themselves. There is, however, an antagonism to strong and adulterated liquors apparently in all that Sir Henry writes on the subject. Even the occasional use is a matter of risk and doubtful benefit: those who drink with apparent impunity are not scathless, and all who drink can only do so when they have been loyal to the canon Sir Henry lays down. We deeply commiserate the foolishness of those strictly moderate men who will persist in drinking in face of the strong opinion of Sir Henry. They sin against the clearest light and their own soul, and invite that retribution which is always hovering dangerously near the violator of the ordinances of God. It may be that the chain of destiny of such is only being forged at the rate of a link a-day, or even a link a-week; but they may find as the years roll on that it is strong enough to bind them for ever in God's eternal prison-house.

WINE QUESTION.

THE readers of the "Birth days of the Temperance and Total Abstinence Movements in Scotland by James Macnair," are familiar with the early discussion of the wine question; how it began, how it emerged from obscurity into light, the opposition it provoked: but few of these will be aware that Mr. Macnair, who lives and continues to play his part fearlessly in our midst, was the Sabbath-scholar of Thomas Farie, who desired to emulate his teacher; was the son of the president of the Cartsyde Radical Association, known as the Cartsydyke poet. Mr. Macnair has inherited his father's zeal and indomitable perseverance, and was the one that proclaimed total abstinence so early as 1825; the one who caught up Dr. Daniel Richmond's classification of the Bible passages containing the word wine, engaged several Jewish Rabbis, and gave to the public in 1829-30, the various terms in the original Hebrew Bible which are translated wine in our version. This noble work of shedding light on the Bible wine question was continued by him and Dr. Richmond. Mr. Macnair, wherever he went, and whenever an opportunity was afforded, advocated total abstinence, especially spreading light on the wines of the Bible. At first it was as the voice of one crying in the wilderness; but the cry was continued so long, uttered so loud, that it was caught up by others, and wafted over the land. Opportunities were sought out and multiplied for advocating his views in church courts, and before the public. The few enthusiastic ones who joined him in this work drew down upon themselves as he did the hostility of all parties. Onward the light moves, upwards its influence rises, passing through a tempest of fire, until it arrested the attention of one church, causing it to halt and discuss its claims. This gave the wine question a prominence, and placed it on a loftier position than it had ever reached. Mr. Macnair transmitted the following petition through the Session of West Campbell Street Congregation, Glasgow, 5th June, 1836, and through the Reformed Presbytery of Glasgow, 16th August, 1836.

"To the Moderator and Members of the Reformed Presbyterian Synod to meet in Edinburgh, 17th Oct., 1836.

"That your Petitioner, along with many good men, is of opinion that what is called the moderate use of intoxicating liquors, is unnecessary to persons in health, while it necessarily leads to the formation of the drinking appetite, and perpetuates the sin of drunkenness and the manifold evils resulting therefrom to society and the Church of Christ. That your Petitioner is of opinion that abstinence from all intoxicating liquors is the simplest, most consistent and efficient way to prevent intemperance, and alone affords a hope of reclaiming those who are the subjects of that vice, while this remedy appears to your Petitioner in perfect accordance with the principles and precepts of the Holy Scriptures. That considering the enormous evils daily inflicted on society, the temptations to which the members of the church are exposed, the numerous and powerful obstacles opposed to the progress of the Redeemer's kingdom by the use of intoxicating liquors, as well as the value of the immortal souls of those enthralled by the vice of drunkenness, your Petitioner conceives that all who profess love to Christ are under the most solemn obligations to use every means which the Providence of God points out for lessening or preventing the evil of intemperance. That for these reasons your Petitioner humbly but earnestly entreats that his fathers and brethren of this court would give their most serious consideration to the duty of abstaining from all intoxicating liquors, and exert their influence as a Synod and as individuals, endeavouring in the strength of the Lord to persuade every one to abandon their use, and that the spirit of Christ may guide you in this, and in every good word and work is the earnest prayer of your petitioner. (Signed) JAMES MACNAIR."

A most remarkable scene took place on the reading of this petition. There was evidence of great preparation for the fight, the contest seemed an unequal one; on the one side were all the leading divines of that denomination, on the other side was a comparatively young man fresh from the turmoils and activities of business, come to wrestle with men mighty in the Scriptures, as to what the Scriptures taught in reference to the use of wine and strong drink. Such a scene would make a subject for a picture by a master artist. There stood alone a young man, bold for the truth; beside him lay a Hebrew Bible, several Hebrew Lexicons, wine from Palestine, clusters of grapes, preserves made from grape juice, un-intoxicating liquid made from the dried fruit of the vine, identical with that used by the Jews at the Passover, and similar to that used by the Saviour at the institution of the Supper. On being called upon by the Moderator, this young man modestly stepped forward, began to state his case as he warmed to his subject, unfolding the true meaning of Scripture, amid the excitement of his hearers, the shifting restlessness, the animation that pervaded the whole court as he shattered one after the other their cherished theories, and laid before them the passages in which the term Tirosh occurs, demonstrating that Tirosh always meant and only meant the fruit of the vine. He spoke for upwards of two hours, such a two hours' speaking as Synod walls never before reverberated to; with his Rabbinical knowledge he cleared away verbal misinterpretation, wrested the word of God from the hands of those who were using it in support of the use of wine and strong drink. "Nobly he fought and well." In that contest he fought not only for himself and his compeers, but he fought for all future generations of men. He erected a beacon light that has acted as a guide to the nations. The changes that have been wrought out since then, that are being wrought out now all over the civilised world, the outcome of that and other early contests, laden with blessings and deliverance to humanity, exceeds human computation. Mr. Macnair's opponents seemed to triumph over him at the time, and they recorded their victory in the following note which speaks for itself and him:—

"Edinburgh, 24th Oct., 1836.

"The Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Scotland met and was constituted.

"Inter alia, The Petition of a member of the West Campbell Street Congregation, Glasgow, is now separately read, praying that this Court would give their most serious consideration to the duty of abstaining from all intoxicating liquors, and exert their influence as a Synod, and as individuals, endeavouring in the strength of the Lord to persuade every one to abandon their use.

"The Petitioner lays before the Court a number of arguments in support of the Petition, and while the Synod admit the importance of the subject submitted to them, they for want of time are unable to give it particular consideration at this meeting.

To Mr. James Macnair.

"(Signed) JOSEPH HENDERSON, Clerk."

Such was the faint-hearted deliverance of the Reformed Presbyterian Church on this irrepressible question.—Yours &c., AN OLD ABSTAINER.

In days of old, when claret was not considered "shilpit" drink, two neighbouring lairds happened to dine together. When the afternoon was pretty far advanced they were joined by a neighbouring minister, who found them sitting over their wine sobbing like children. "What are ye greetin' for, frien's; what for are ye greetin'?" said the reverend visitor. "We are greetin'," said one of them, and before he could complete his statement, the other said, "We're just greetin', minister, aboot the national debt."

"Courage, brothers! there is nothing
Brave and true men should affright;
Life's a warfare high and holy
For the lofty and the lowly;
God and angels watch the fight;
In the roar, and rush, and rattle,
In the sweat and blood of battle,
Fight as men for fight arrayed.
Whether vanquished or victorious,
Good men's lives and deaths are glorious,
Courage, brothers—who's afraid."

OUR MONTHLY LETTER.

We may mutually rejoice, dear editor, at the success of the new postage-stamp saving scheme. The suggestion that the postmaster-general allow buyers and users of stamps to rule them with a fine drawn ink line would effectually prevent stealing and resetting them, as none would put such stamps on the postal cards. A most excellent means of encouraging the poor would be when "tipping" them for any little service to give them one, two, or more stamps, and see them paste them on their cards forthwith. This would most effectually discourage drinking and encourage a love of self-restraint and of frugality, which would result in many a thriftless creature becoming possessed of something for hard times. All our teetotal friends can be as generous as ever they were: the only sufferers would be the publicans, and as their profits, as we all know, are mis-spent money, their sorrow would be rather enjoyable.

In Miss Bird's delightful book newly out, entitled "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," she gives much curious information about the Ainos, the aborigines of Yezo. These have a tradition that they were in some far-off age a great nation. They are low in the scale of humanity, but not brutal by any means. Their great curse is saké wine, for which they will sell anything save their art treasures. Their chief act of worship is drinking to the god. Drunkenness and religion are thus inseparably associated, as the more saké an Aino drinks the more devout he is and the better pleased are the gods. Yet there are abstainers among them—like Pipichare, the adopted son of the chief—who objects to saké, "because it makes men like dogs." As, however, their religious customs demand the use of saké, abstainers must be practical atheists. It would be gratifying to know whence this belief has arisen amongst these savages. We in this country, with a few exceptions, adhere to the drinking of saké in our highest religious ordinance, but few would venture to call those who will not venture to take saké (bad wine) at the Lord's table atheists. Yet the Yezo aborigine savage can claim equality with his enlightened Christian Briton, in so far as they both worship their respective deities with poisonous drugs. If ever extremes do meet here they are.

In a recent number of House and Home there is a capital story told of Henry VIII. and an abbot. The king had lost his way, and turned up at the abbey. Knowing that the king was in the neighbourhood, the abbot asked him to stay and sup, believing him to be one of the king's guards. As they sat at meat, the king fed like a farmer on some roast beef; the pampered abbot could scarcely eat of anything. "Ah," said he to the king, "I would give £500 if I could but pick as heartily as you do on a piece of beef." Shortly the king took his leave, and shortly he sends for the abbot to the Tower, and there ordains that he be fed on a little bread and small beer and nothing else. This was his diet for a month, when he came to have a good stomach. The keeper, by command, set a good roast of beef before him, when he set to with great relish. The king who, himself unseen, saw his lusty feeding, steps in and asks for his £500. "For," he said, "you said you would give it, and I have performed the cure, and got you a better stomach than all the doctors in England would have done." And so, on payment of the £500, he discharged him. Now, the question arises, Did the king infringe on his subject's liberty? Certainly he did, but look with what beneficial effect. John Stuart Mill declares that we have no right to abridge a man's liberty even to do him good. Yet I question if he could have got the abbot to have approved him. Now, were a few of our drunkards sent into confinement for a month, the good that would be done to them through their enforced abstinence would far outweigh the silly and unsubstantial loss of liberty. For what is their liberty but license? and license is dangerous both to man and to society.

It is always cheering to find proofs in favour of the superiority of temperate over intemperate lives. We don't include that fulness of balanced enjoyments, or that self-directive power which the abstainer peculiarly possesses; but merely join issue as to the length of life. Dr. Ridge, in one of the Lancets of last month, shows that the mortality of the adults from 16 to 70 is 17·24 per thousand—1 in 55; between 16 and 60 is as 1 in 76. In the reports of the Sons of Temperance for 1878-80 the average membership is 14,020, the deaths 97, 120, and 129 respectively, equal to an annual average of 115, or 8·2 per cent. per thousand; or 1 in 121. Dr. Carpenter many years ago showed that the deaths in the Madras army in 1847 were for the intemperate 44·58 per cent. per thousand, of the temperate 23·15 per cent. per thousand, and of the abstainers 11·11 per cent. per thousand. Allowing for the difference in climate, this is parallel with the other instances; it is 1 in 90. Certainly these are most remarkable statistics, but we need not wonder at it, God is not mocked. What men sow, of that they reap. The churchyards of our country are thickly strewn with the narrow cells of those cut down before their time by alcohol.

What a sad fate is that of the child who only gets across the threshold of this world to have its young life cut off by its own mother. But this is the fate of thousands of unhappy babes in our drink-sodden land. The Lancet informs us that "in the course of his inquiries as Coroner of Middlesex, Mr. Wakely discovered grounds for believing that a large proportion of the deaths by "overlaying" were caused by the abuse of alcohol. These "accidents" occur on Saturday nights, following the weekly debauch of the poorer class among whom they happen. The mischief works, Mr. Wakely points out, in two ways—first, there is alcoholic poison through the milk, which tends to stupefy the infants and predispose them to death; and secondly, the semi-intoxication of the mothers throws them into a stupor in which they lie upon and suffocate their children. It is as important as ever that these perils incident to the practice of heavy drinking on Saturday nights should be generally moderated." This murder—for if a woman who has a child drinks herself insensible, and, by depriving the child of its protector, leaves it or helps it to perish, is not a murderess, then language has lost its significance—arises from the abuse of alcohol: ergo Lancet, the use of drink is good. Only the abuse is a farther stage of the use—that is all—and overlain children are usual at that stage. Then what does the writer mean by moderating the perils to children of drinking mothers pressing them to death? Should it not be wiser that these perils be prevented? Are we only to kill less, or are we to kill none at all? Certainly, kill none at all. We cannot believe that child-murder can have the sanction of the Lancet. Poor, dear babes to perish, and by the hand of a drunken, unconscious mother who is for the time like some remorseless machinery, relentless and cruel, deaf to the smothered cry, and insensible to the little stiffening form!

Another theatrical public house has been opened in Glasgow—the Theatre Royal. The play now running is one of the best of Shakespeare's writing, being his delightful pastoral comedy, "As you like it." But as if to prevent excess of pleasure with its sentiments, the management afford an opportunity to playgoers to employ the intervals between the acts in drinking at the bar within the theatre. Unfortunately, too many avail themselves of it, and the good the play would do to them is marred by the evil the drug inflicts upon them, and going to the play is in consequence discredited. One of the weightiest utterances in the play is in favour of that temperance which the management seeks to render impossible. In the third scene of Act II., old Adam, the faithful servant of old Sir Rowland de Boys, and now of his son, Sir Oliver, for the love he has to Orlando, his master's younger brother, determines to fly with him to the Forest of Ardenness, and, that both may do so, offers his young master the thrifty savings from the hire he had from his good father, adding:—

"Let me be your servant,
Tho' I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors to my blood,
Nor did with unbashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility.
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Frosty, but kindly. Let me go with you."

Her Majesty's servants, as the company at the Royal are styled, profess to show the very age and body of the time, its form and pressure, and they seem determined to stereotype its drunkenness by the arrangements they have made for indulgence on the part of the ignorant, the sensual, and the plastic that may patronise them. They not merely show vice her own image, but they serve her by ministering to the evil dispositions of her slaves. Of all hypocrisies, the greatest is that of pretending to increase the culture of the age and at the same time stooping to fill the maddening cup that is so often the cause of crime and misery.

LEMONADE (Another Way).—2½ oz. powdered citric acid, 2 scruples essence of lemon rubbed well together. Take a quart spring water and 4 lb. loaf sugar and boil together; when nearly cold, stir in the acid and lemon, and bottle for use. A tablespoonful in a tumbler of water is a most refreshing drink.

THE JUDGE AND HIS DEMIJOHN.—A good joke is told of Judge Lewis, of New Hampshire. He always kept a demijohn of good Jamaica in his private office for his particular friends. The Judge had noticed for some time past that on Monday morning his Jamaica was considerably lighter than he had left it on Saturday. Another fact had established itself in his mind. His son Sam was missing from the paternal pew in church on Sundays. One Sunday afternoon Sam came in and went up stairs rather heavily, when the Judge put the question pointedly to him—"Sam, where have you been?" "To church, sir," was the prompt reply. "What church, Sam?" "Second Methodist, sir." "Had a good sermon, Sam?" "Very powerful, sir; it quite staggered me." "Ah, I see," said the Judge, "quite powerful—quite powerful!" The next Sunday the son came home rather earlier than usual, and apparently not so much "under the weather." His father hailed him with, "Well, Sam, been to the 'Second Methodist' again to-day?" "Yes, sir." "Good sermon, my boy?" "Fact was, father, that I couldn't get in; the church was shut up and a ticket on the door." "Sorry, Sam; keep going—you may get good by it yet." Sam says that on going to the office for his usual spiritual refreshment, he found the "John" empty, and bearing the following label:—"There will be no service here to-day; the church is temporarily closed."—American Paper.

WORK v. POVERTY.

(From the German of Thekla von Gumpert.)

In a Prussian roadside inn, one hot summer's day, several men were smoking and drinking. The room was dirty and uncared for, and the men, who looked quite in keeping with it, were railing at the way in which Providence did her work, and contrasting the luxury and idleness of the rich with the misery and hardships of the poor.

During the conversation a stranger, a young man, came in to eat his bread and cheese, while his team rested in the shade before the inn. For a time he listened silently to the talk, and then joined in, saying, "You must strike!"

"Strike against what?" asked the peasants.

"Against poverty!" answered the young man, "and the weapon with which to strike is work."

"Well said! Sensibly spoken!" laughed the peasants.

"It would have been well for me had I always been as sensible," continued the stranger, "but I used to be an idle rogue. I was strong and healthy, but I wouldn't work, and if now and then I was obliged to do anything, I was off at once to the alehouse, and like lightning the money was out and the brandy was in. I went from place to place—that means, that everywhere I was turned away, for no master wants a loafer about. I'd soon had enough of farm service, and then I went about to fairs and public-houses as a fiddler. Wherever anyone would hear me, I scraped my violin, but with all my scraping I was never able to get a whole shirt to my back. Soon I grew tired of music, and then tried begging. I went up and down the country, but most doors were shut in my face. People said a healthy young fellow like I was ought to work. That enraged me. I grumbled that God had not made me a rich man, and I was envious of all who were better off than myself. I would have liked to turn the world upside down, that I might have been able to lord it over the rich. One day I went into an inn, sat down in a corner, and began muttering my begging speeches. At a table not far from me sat a gentleman (he is, as I afterwards heard, a writer of books); he kept glancing at me and I kept glancing at him, for I thought he would be sure to give me a good alms, and so he did. I'm spending it still."

"What was it?" asked the men, who had listened attentively.

"He came up to me and asked me about my early life. I told him I had been a farm servant, and sent from place to place—in short, I told him everything. He listened quietly, shook his head, and at last said, 'Show me your hands!' Astonished, I held out my hands; he examined them all over, pushed up my shirt sleeves, and again shook his head.

"What powerful hands! What strength there must be in those arms!" he said. "My lad, you must join in the war."

"In what war?" I asked.

"In a war against your misery!" he exclaimed in a loud voice. "You fool, you imagine you are poor—poor with such hands! What a mad idea! He only is poor who is sick in body or in mind. You are healthy in body and in mind. Good heavens! with such hands, poor! Set your wits to work and reflect upon the treasure God has given you in your strong, healthy limbs. Recover your senses and march forward in the war."

"Bravo! That was very good," laughed the peasants.

"And so I joined in the war," continued the young man. "I looked for a place, and now I am a farm servant as before—nothing better and no richer; but I am content and industrious, and I have served the same master these five years, and shall stay with him until one of us dies."—Fountain.

POETRY.

THE OLD SAD TALE.

So slenderly made with dark brown hair,
 Thus did the newspapers speak to-day,
 And bade her friends if any there were,
 Come quick to the place where her body lay ;
 But no mother came to call her child,
 Nobody called her his poor drown'd wife,
 Nobody knew of her name or home,
 Yet she was fair in the bloom of life.
 They laid her down in a lone churchyard,
 Quietly to rest, untouched by care,
 And only said of this friendless one,
 "So slenderly made with dark brown hair."

But yon bridegroom in his rich attire,
 Who swift to the bridal altar hies,
 Could a tale unfold of blighted hopes,
 Of a broken heart and broken ties,
 Of trust betrayed, of love grown cold,
 Of two lives wreck'd for love of gold ;
 The bride looks on with an anxious gaze,
 As proud to the church her friends repair.
 She marvels to see him look so sad,
 For the bridegroom's brow is pale with care ;
 And oft as the festive night wears on,
 She raises to his her face so fair,
 And though he may smile no word he hears,
 Save—Slenderly made with dark brown hair.

CHAPTER IV.

"OH my ! here's a pretty go. Master's gone and done it this time. He's cut his stick he has, and never left his address. Well, I never experienced sich ingratitude all my days. To think on him going off without his coat dusted, not to speak of his going without a dusting of mine. Well, I shouldn't wonder if there was a earthquake a knocking at the door in five minutes. Oh my !"

"What's to do, Jones, has Master set off again ?"

"I should say so, but he has left me behind, which he has never done before."

"Well, you may thank your stars, for he has not been so affectionate to you by all accounts."

"Dang if I stand it longer, so when the old gentleman has breakfasted I'll ask to enter his service, and if he has no vacancy why I toddle up to Lunnan."

"It may be long, lad, or you get better quarters."

"Right you are, my kindest love, if you mean here, but if you mean with Master in Lunnan or the other places you are out of sight astray. All very fine to have a jolly blow out once a month or a six weeks, in this here strictly regulated place, but to be on the move here and there drinking and gambling night and day, why it is the most outrageous way of killing time as ever I was in. The more I think on't the more I makes up my mind to be done with it this very day."

"Well Jones, we'll change the subject, you are making us too serious. Don't pull so long a face, else we will all be as solemn as mutes at a funeral."

At breakfast Mr. Vernon learning that Walter had left the house was greatly distressed. He could not account for his conduct : even when Jones was sent for nothing of importance was learned. Dora counselled patience and rightly guessed where he would be.

"He will be at Woodgreen, papa, you may be sure. Wentworth never goes from home without his groom and his luggage. He has neither, so he is not far off, he will be at Woodgreen. The housekeeper has some commissions to execute there this forenoon, and she will easily find out his whereabouts."

Wentworth went off early to pay off the grudge which had been fattening during the few days he was confined indoors. He made the journey on foot and duly arrived at the little village, and turned in to the Queen's Head. Mrs. Ingram hastened to receive him, although she would not have been sorry to see him pass her door. She instinctively saw that he was bitten with the fell disease that was so fatal to her husband. He was, however, the son and heir of a widely esteemed landholder, and his presence still added respectability to her house. So she offered her service, showed him into one of her best rooms, provided a most tempting breakfast, sent for some of his friends, and by her quiet but skilful attention raised his spirits, and greatly helped to dispel the gloomy humours that seemed to gather round him. She never allowed the maids to serve him. He was too much of a rake to allow of that, and yet assiduous as was her attentions he indulged in no freedoms with her. When his companions came the maids waited on the company. Contrary to his expectations he found them all opposed to his intended castigation of the editor of the district newspaper. They did not boldly tell him he deserved all that he had got, but he knew that that feeling was in their thoughts. So the five young and thoughtless fellows spent the day in drinking, gaming, and in racing. Hitherto the landlady had scarcely grounds for thwarting their wishes in any way. Deeply immersed in their indoor and outdoor sports they had not gone beyond a very moderate indulgence in liquor, and comparative peace and good order marked the progress of the day. At dinner the first symptoms of indulgence became manifest. On the first signs of it Mrs. Ingram resumed her waiting and kept admirable order until the cloth removed she left them to their conversation and their potatoes. Play soon began to run high, and disputes became frequent. To her great satisfaction two of his companions—the sons of farmers—called early for their horses and set off for home. The pleased hostess saw them to the door, gave them the stirrup cup herself, and bade them good bye. The others, the son of the miller, a partner in the drapery establishment, and a neighbouring laird with whom few cared to associate, were left behind.

Just at nine there was an order given for more drink, but the maid respectfully stated that the bar was closed. Wentworth off his guard, and rather obstreperous, thought he would compel a relaxation of the rule, so he asked the girl to bid her mistress attend. In a moment Mrs. Ingram entered the room. On being told of her servant's impertinence, she calmly said,

"Edith only did her duty, my bar is closed for the night."

"Do you mean to treat me with such insolence ?"

"I have simply said that the bar is closed for the evening."

"And I simply say I'll have more liquor, and at once too."

"It will not be here, Mr. Vernon."

"I say it will. So be off and fetch me brandy."

"I am sorry indeed to see you so forget yourself, but you will get no more liquor to-night from any one in the Queen's Head."

He glared upon her, and it was a study for a keen observer of human nature to see the two : the landlady firm and self-possessed, mistress, in fact, of the situation. There she stood in the very prime of womanhood, with her frank open fair face, her clear open blue eye, and her flowing auburn hair. Although her features were not what might be styled regular, she was a handsome woman. Her figure, plump, not stout, was well-formed, and her movements were lithe and graceful. It was curious that this woman, who might have had a choice of some of the best men in the neighbourhood, was so persistently averse to the attentions of the sterner sex. There would have been little flattery in the compliments paid by gentlemen to her she was so handsome. Wentworth, too, was a good-looking fellow. At Eton he was a good first at boating, and the manly games that do so much to build up the Etonian's physical constitution so effectually. At Oxford he was no less proficient. He was a good shot, and he had been in Scotland deer stalking. But he liked revelry by night, with the fascination of the gaming table, and it was no secret that he was lax in his observance of the relations that should obtain between the sexes. At this moment his dark eye glared, his features were distorted with wounded pride, and his clenched hand showed the gripe that passion had upon him.

Perhaps he had been measuring himself, excited by drink, against her as she stood so firmly and so self-possessed.

"Upon my word, madam, this is scarcely treatment calculated to increase the number of your customers."

"I am sorry to think, Mr. Vernon, that you forget that I have never consulted you in the management of my business. As it is not my custom to bandy words with my guests, you will allow me to retire."

"If we are to continue to be friends, you will see my order fulfilled, Mrs. Ingram."

"I am sorry that you are to make your friendship depend on my deliberate violation of a rule that I have maintained for years and have never yet broken for any one."

"Oh, I remember you would not break it for your husband, and got a good beating for your obstinacy."

Her eye flashed, her whole frame quivered with indignation as she returned to the table, and looking him in the face said,

"Mr. Vernon, you leave my house this very moment, and if ever you set your foot within it I will have you removed by the authorities."

Wentworth felt that he had gone too far and would have eagerly apologised, but she looked in his face and pointed to the opened door.

"I do not choose to leave till I am ready." She went out to the lobby, called upon two of her grooms, and when they appeared asked them to see Mr. Vernon out of doors.

Matters looked extremely serious for Wentworth, and to spare him the humiliation his comrades pleaded with Mrs. Ingram, but she was obdurate.

"When Mr. Vernon conducted himself like a gentleman the best in the house was at his command. When he so far forgets himself as not only violate a wholesome rule, but insults me when maintaining it, he is unworthy of my roof," and turning to him, "Mr. Vernon, if you do not leave this moment I shall have you thrust forth like a dog."

Wentworth called on his friends to stand by him and a fight appeared imminent, but just at this moment Miss Vernon darted into the room. For a moment she looked at her brother and his companions, at Mrs. Ingram and her grooms, and then slowly said,

"Am I rightly informed, Mrs. Ingram, that you are to thrust my brother from your house by force?"

"Miss Vernon, I am sorry to say that your brother has conducted himself so shamefully that no other course is open to me: and but for your appearance he should have been thrust out with ignominy within the next five minutes. For your sake I shall spare him the indignity, but I shall never permit him to enter my house again."

"Oh my brother, do not part with Mrs. Ingram while she labours under the sense of the infliction of any injustice from you. Explain or apologise, and then come home with me."

"How came you here, Dora?"

"I was on my way home with Jones when I heard Mrs. Ingram call for assistance, and I sent Jones in to see what was to do. I was not prepared to learn that you were the aggressor. Come home, dear brother, and papa and I will arrange with her."

Meantime the miller's son was freely giving vent to his opinion of Wentworth down stairs, and Wentworth, who had utterly lost all command of himself, went to the door, heard his name mentioned in anything but complimentary terms, rushed down stairs and demanded an apology.

"Vernon, you need not act the fool with me. I am not the landlady."

The observation was met by a blow from Vernon, which was returned, and a fight commenced, Dora screamed and seemed about to faint, while the bystanders attempted to part the belligerents. At this moment Milbank suddenly appeared and stepped between them, warding off a blow aimed by Haworth, and making him reel and fall heavily against the stairs.

The landlady, who was holding Dora, gave a scream as she saw Milbank, and cried, "Mr. Henry, is it possible." Milbank gave her a meaning look, and as he took Dora from her whispered words in her ear which made her silent, and look on him merely as a stranger. Vernon gave one glance at Milbank, and with a deep curse turned and left the house. Mrs. Ingram took Mr. Haworth into the bar. Outside the door Vernon saw his groom but never stopped, and striding off across the bridge was lost to view.

Dora, who did not faint, soon recovered her usual state of feeling, and turning to Milbank begged him to see her home. While he went out to see that the drag was right, Mrs. Ingram expressed her sense of indignation at the shameful conduct of her brother.

"Oh, don't do anything until my father calls to-morrow. He will be greatly distressed I know, and I am sure that you will forgive and forget all that my wayward brother has done to-night."

"I heartily forgive him for his sister's sake, but I cannot forget it. If he is really a gentleman he will make reparation to-morrow. Good night, Miss Dora."

"Good night, Mrs. Ingram."

As she sat nicely wrapped up in "the trap" Milbank ran into the hotel bar and implored the hostess not to disclose to any one who he was till he should give her leave. This she readily promised, shook him warmly by the hand, and off all three drove into the darkness of the night.

They had not gone far before they met with her brother. Jones hailed him and requested him to take a seat, but the devil had not yet gone out of him.

"Go on," he said, "you don't want me while you have a vagabond to bear you company."

"Miss Vernon needs my company less than she does yours, and I will readily yield my place to let you avail yourself of her sisterly kindness."

Vernon jumped up and attempted to take the reins, but Jones boldly refused to give them up, adding that his master strictly enjoined on him the yielding of them up to no one.

"Mr. Milbank, I am deeply grieved that you should have been so treated. For father's sake follow us. When I arrive I will send my own horse for you. The best room in my father's house is at your command, and if my brother loved me as he ought he would not have been so ungrateful to you."

"I will certainly walk on to your father's, and I forgive the discourtesy of your brother for his father and his sister's sake. I will be all the better of the walk, so do not trouble to send the horse."

Dora never spoke a word to Wentworth Vernon all the way home. When Milbank arrived Mr. Vernon was standing at the hall door ready to welcome him.

"My dear sir," he said, as he shook him heartily by the hand, "you have done me the greatest favour in your power by coming here. I am your friend for life."

SAVING THE FAMILY REPUTATION.—A gentleman asked a little girl how many sisters she had and was answered "three or four." Her mother asked her why she told an untruth. "Why mamma," cried she, "I didn't want him to know you were so poor as only to have one child. Would not he have tho't us dreadfully poor?"

"Did you make the train?" "No, it was made in the car-shops." "I mean did you catch the train?" "Of course, not. It's not infectious." "Well, my Solon, did you arrive at the depot in time?" "No, I arrived in an omnibus." "Yes? and did you then board the cars?" "Alas! I do not keep a boarding-house."

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.

Books, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 18th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, DECEMBER, 1880.

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

WE beg to direct the special attention of our readers to the important resolution adopted by the annual meeting of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. That resolution was in the following terms:—"This meeting fully recognising the very satisfactory position which the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory Movement has now attained, more especially since the recent general election, and being of opinion that a vigorous and united effort should now be made to secure the right of vetoing the sale of alcoholic liquors at the earliest possible moment, in harmony with the advanced public sentiment, recommends the Executive to consider the propriety of arranging for a series of district conferences of the friends of the movement, in order that united political action may be taken in the ensuing session of Parliament." We understand that the Executive are resolved, in view of the early meeting of Parliament, and the prospects of the appearance of a Government licensing measure, to hold a series of conferences and public meetings. We hope to hear that their friends have everywhere cordially and energetically co-operated with the Executive in this important matter. Resolutions calling upon the Government to make provision in their coming measure for an absolute veto on the liquor should be passed at all these conferences and meetings, and the Government should be given clearly to understand that no measure without such a veto can be satisfactory to the Scottish people. It would be well, too, that the power to make trial of such a veto power in Scotland should be asked for. We look forward with a pleasureable anticipation to these meetings, especially as we understand that the Rev. H. H. Pereira, M.A., Rector of Southampton, is expected to be at several of them. Mr. Pereira is an excellent speaker, and his appearance at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, at a recent alliance anniversary meeting, was a great success. All our friends should be prepared to give the heartiest reception to the deputations from the Association.

OUR NEW YEAR'S TRACT.

THE Executive are glad to be able to announce the issue of the first twenty thousand of their New Year's Tract for 1881. This year it is from the eloquent pen of the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D., Edinburgh, and bears the significant title, "The City of the Plague; or, Sights of London in Sixteen Sixty-five." It is illustrated in the finest style of the art by Pearson of London, and may be had at 10s. per 1000, or 1s. per 100—carriage NOT paid. Societies may have their name and local announcements printed at the top, at an extra charge of 1s. 6d. per heading. If heading contains more than 40 words, by special agreement. On all orders of 2000 and upwards no charge is made for heading. Orders should be sent in at once, to allow of the Tract being duly forwarded in time for distribution previous to the New Year. The Executive are to execute orders according to priority of application.

Mr. John Paton has been lecturing in Scotland and Ireland during the month. He has, we learn, been received with great enthusiasm by the Ulster people, who have thoroughly appreciated his earnest and thoughtful advocacy. In Scotland he has been at Brechin and Blairgowrie, Auchterarder and other places. He will address meetings in Kilsyth, Coatbridge, Dollar, Falkirk, Hamilton, Ayr, etc., during the present month, after which he will sojourn some time in England.

The Trade being regarded as a camel, has had its back broken by the last straw—the license duty—put upon it by that enemy of the liquor traffic, William Ewart Gladstone, and the agonized outcries that mark its condition are most harrowing to the feelings of all concerned. It looks upon the recent legislation as "Parliamentary persecution," and calls thus upon "Brother traders! The time for apathy is over, and action—united and vigorous—must take place at once. Every one of you, rich or poor, the big brewer or merchant, and the little innkeeper, must arouse and attend." Nobody outside the "ring" is wanted; they seem to think themselves a host. They want more than this new Inland Revenue impost removed, however; they want Sunday profits to continue, and the magistrates, and not the people, to deal out their letters of marque. Many of our readers may be enlightened by perusing the terms of the liquor dealer's resolution on Local Option. Here it is—"That this meeting condemns utterly and heartily the introduction of Local Option into the licensing system, involving as it must, degradation to the magistracy, diversities in dealing with the thing in different localities, encouragement of agitation, insecurity to licensed and therefore legalized traders, and peril to public liberty generally—impressed with a belief thus set forth, this meeting pledges its support to the defensive organizations of the trade in any effort put forth by them to ward off or minimise the mischief which must necessarily attend and follow the application in any form of a principle so insidiously dangerous." Can our readers imagine any body of men putting such a resolution on record, if they were not in the throes of apprehension, and did not dread some merciless storm in the future, wild enough to founder them? They dread, and that with too much reason, that any appeal to the people on the existence of their interest will result in their ruin, and yet there are people who will persist in believing that it is doubtful if we had a veto if it would be of use. Let such read that resolution intelligently, and their belief will soon change. Legislative protection is the publican's only remaining anchor; if it gives way, he knows his fate, that of being dashed to pieces on the indomitable will of the sovereign people.

The Dundee Advertiser in commenting upon the decision against the action of declarator sought by the Earl of Zetland on behalf of his feu-charter rights, makes an emphatic contrast between his Lordship enforcing the prohibition of the liquor trade in Grangemouth, and the people of Grangemouth themselves doing it. The Editor says:—"If Grangemouth has itself decreed through its licensing authority, that no alcoholic liquors should be sold within its bounds, nobody could have questioned its interest in so deciding. Every community is entitled to speak for itself, but the peer whose interest in a town is only that of a feudal superior has neither claim nor right to meddle in that which concerns only the town itself, and must expect to be checked by law, and snubbed by public opinion, when he sets himself above the ratepayers." That is very clearly put, and although we do not take up Local Option as against his Lordship, we agree with the Advertiser that the drink trade should be unreservedly left to the arbitrament of the vote of the ratepayers, and to them alone.

The Solicitor-General, Mr. J. B. Balfour, when speaking as the Liberal candidate for Clackmannan and Kinross at Culross the other day, very plainly read a lesson to the fearful and the unbelieving on the local option question, which they might wisely lay to heart. The question of the farmer having power to prevent ground game from ravaging his crops was "not alone a farmer's question. It was a question in which the whole country was interested, because he need not say it was not only the farmer who was interested in the land yielding its best fruits in the largest measure: the whole country was interested in the fruits of the earth not being wasted or destroyed—in the food of the people not being injuriously diminished or put away. (Cheers.) That was what was simply done by the excessive number of those wild animals which were maintained, often artificially, in many parts of the country." We could not wish for better terms in which to place our case before any assembly than those in which Mr. Balfour sets them forth. Suppose we try, "This question of the liquor traffic was not alone a prohibitionist's question. It was a question in which the whole country was interested, because he need not say that it was not only the prohibitionist who was interested in the land yielding its best fruits in the largest measure, the whole country was interested in the fruits of the earth not being wasted and destroyed, in the food of the people not being injuriously diminished or put away. That was what was simply done by the excessive number of brewers, and distillers, and publicans, who were legalised by Government in many parts of the country." The question of public houses diminishing food and doing other dreadful things runs on all fours with the question of ground game. And if an act had to be passed to guard the farmer directly and the nation indirectly from the vermin that landlords were bent on keeping for their special interest and sport, why should not a law be passed in the interest of the abstaining prohibitionists directly and the nation indirectly, and thus effectually protect both against the injurious ravages and burdensome exactions to which the liquor traffic subjects them? Education has been defined as the perception of relations. Be it so. The sooner that the Briton perceives his true relations to the drink traffic the better for his pocket and his peace.

Mr. J. B. Balfour, the Solicitor-General for Scotland has, at the request of the Liberals of that country, offered himself as a candidate for the representation vacated by the Right Hon. W. P. Adams, gazetted Governor of Madras. In his published address Mr. Balfour thus refers to the question of the liquor traffic, "I think that the principle of self-government ought to be applied in counties as well as in towns, and that the administration of county affairs should be entrusted to local boards—in the election of which the ratepayers should have a just share. The ratepayers ought, in my view, to have, through such boards, an effective control over (amongst other matters) the administration of the liquor laws, and in this sense and manner I am for giving effect to the principle of local option." As this would even in the counties be a great improvement upon Justice's administration of the law, it is to be heartily accepted. Although it is only for counties, we believe we are right when we state that Mr. Balfour will be found voting for local option.

By the lamented death of Colonel Mure last month, the representation of Renfrewshire became vacant. As usual gossip conjured up a host of candidates and a keen contest. Circumstance, that unscriptural god, ruled in favour of Mr. Crum of Thornliebank securing the seat as the unanimous choice of the Liberal party. Mr. Crum is a prohibitory landlord like his lamented predecessor Colonel Mure, and he is a local optionist in so far as he gave to the frequenters of the club he established for the working men at Thornliebank the option of beer or no beer. At an interview with a deputation from the electors of Renfrewshire, he so expressed himself on the subject as to satisfy those who waited upon him. The prohibitionists in Renfrewshire should see him on the subject, as by their representations he will certainly be guided. Colonel Campbell, the Conservative candidate for the county in 1873, 1874, and 1880, counts discretion the better part of valour and declines a contest. He was a bitter enemy to permissive prohibition.

MR. PARKER, M.P., AND LOCAL OPTION.

MR. PARKER, M.P., for Perth, addressed his constituents last month, and not only gave in an account of his stewardship, but devoted a considerable part of his speech to a forecast of the labours of the coming session. We are glad to find that he voluntarily classed among great reforms "standing not less high in popular favour and not less urgently needed, reform in that particular branch of local government which deals with licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors." We are glad of this avowal from the honourable member, who is somewhat sympathetic and yet far from cordial. He refers at length to the temperance question, and begins by suggesting that the minor reforms recommended by the Grocer's Commission and the Lord's Committee should be taken in hand at once. If the Government, in supposed deference to public opinion, will labour to introduce these petty palliations, why there is no one to hinder them always excepting any attempt to introduce the Gothenburg system. That at least is not a reform at all, but a reaction, and will we doubt not receive the most strenuous opposition of more than the prohibitory party.

Mr. Parker then says—But no doubt there will be disappointment if the Government do not also indicate how they mean to deal with the resolution of the House of Commons in favour of Local Option. Well there is no "also" in the case. Whether they attempt minor reforms or not they are bound, not merely by the understood procedure of the House with resolutions, to deal with that resolution, but by the higher laws of morality and in harmony with the loyalty they owe their leader. It will not be merely disappointment but indignation which will be felt at a promise solemnly made being wantonly broken. We have more faith in Mr. Gladstone however than his friend Mr. Parker, for we never entertained for a moment the probability of such a disappointment taking place. We then are treated to what Mr. Parker calls a little plain speaking. However unpalatable such speaking is, and however like damaging exposure it may look, we think that the honourable member may blush more for it than we need to do. We never represented the local majority of the House as a majority for the Permissive Bill, and we never knew an intelligent friend of the Permissive Bill who did. If Mr. Parker had been asked for proof he would have had great difficulty in leading evidence. That the Local Option Resolution is not the Permissive Bill pure and simple we readily admit, but the Local Option Resolution is inclusive of the Permissive Bill: it is a resolution embodying the principle that the ratepayers shall have the power to veto the liquor traffic, and it will be for the parliamentary committee to provide machinery for carrying out that veto partially or absolutely, to say in short whether that veto shall extend to some or all of the public houses of a licensing area. If this alternative power is vested in the ratepayers, we should like Mr. Parker to point out where the difference will be between the Permissive Bill and the more extensive power of the act which will be the sequence of the Local Option Resolution? And Mr. Parker himself admits that the permissive veto comes within the abstract resolution. The honourable member attempts a distinction between the Permissive Bill and the Local Option Resolution, which finds a place in the mind of Messrs. Foster and Bright, and also himself. The Permissive Bill works by plebiscite, just like that of France, and the Local Option through town councils or licensing boards. Surely that is not a blemish. The Libraries Act, the Lindsay Police Act, and other similar acts are adopted by a plebiscite of the ratepayers, and testify to the strong good sense of the people to whom such a franchise has been committed. In what better way could the opinion of the householders be obtained? It is hardly fair to complain of the best means of eliciting public opinion because it is so direct and does not come from the representatives elected by the people, but from the people themselves. Besides this voting will never override any minor reforms that the people may wish to see applied. It will come into operation only after all legitimate means have been taken to diminish the evils and abuses connected with the public-house system. If minor measures taken can render the traffic tolerable and comparatively harmless, does Mr. Parker really believe that the ratepayers will, out of mere wantonness, suppress public-houses? He cannot, if he has duly considered the matter. Why this great solicitude for the publican, and this great aversion to the Permissive veto? Well, we believe it is just because he and other like-thinking but feeble politicians firmly believe that it will, in many places, come into immediate operation; but he does not see beyond the adoption of the Act the boundless advantages it would confer, and hence he lingers shivering on the bank and fears to launch a way.

Mr. Parker gives a happy definition of Local Option, which is, he says, local as opposed to national control. The present national control of the liquor traffic means simply the prohibition of nineteen and the license of one of every twenty of the population: the ground of the prohibition of the nineteen is public safety. Now, if the licensing of the one out of the twenty is found in any district to threaten public safety and order, we ask that on that being shown the power to suppress that one be applied by the ratepayers, and thus enable them to realise all the advantages that follow prohibition of the liquor traffic. We ask this power vested in the ratepayers, because they know their own circumstances best, and because we believe that they will not doom the liquor anywhere to extinction till it has become a manifest public annoyance: until, in short, its evils are abundant and its benefits more than doubtful. Mr. Parker takes us into his confidence and lets us know that the coming bill will not be a prohibitory bill: but that is merely a guess on his part. The bill may be a regulative bill with a veto clause. If so, we will not quarrel with the weak part of the bill, but will give the Government a loyal support just because of the veto power with which it would arm the ratepayers. Only that veto must be potent enough to purge any district of its liquor nuisance. If it is not Mr. Gladstone will have broken faith with a very considerable portion of his party, and repeated the blunder of 1871 which was followed with such disaster in 1874.

We are sorry to differ so much with so amiable a gentleman as Mr. Parker, whose views on Local Option are so out of harmony with the ingratiating urbanity of his character: and we are as glad that we can agree with him on so much of what is vital. We part with him in cordial harmony on the necessity of union among prohibitory reformers, but then men don't unite on trifles, they are only roused to unity on great national questions and at great national crises. Let the Government embody in its expected licensing bill a veto which may be used against a part or the whole of the liquor traffic, and they will not only secure the unity of the whole temperance party, but they will for ever relieve Parliament of one of the greatest annoyances and obstructions to which it has been subjected, continual and fruitless attempts to deal satisfactorily with the liquor traffic.

INTELLIGENCE.

GREENOCK—CONFERENCE AND PUBLIC MEETING.

ON Monday, 8th inst., a Conference, followed by a public meeting, was held in the Temperance Institute, Greenock. At the Conference, which was well attended, there were present, as a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, Ex-Bailie Torrens, Bailie Selkirk, and Mr. R. Mackay, secy.; Provost Campbell, Greenock; Ex-Provost Morton, Ex-Councillor Lang, Capt. Brochie, Rev. A. Davidson, Rev. Wm. Laughton, Rev. J. Campbell, and other gentlemen. Capt. Brochie was called upon to preside. After tea the chairman gave a brief but impressive address, laudatory of the Association and congratulatory on the position of the Scottish prohibitory movement. Mr. R. Mackay was first called upon, and his remarks bore on the operation of the agencies that had brought about such a satisfactory state of matters, and on the necessity for concentrating all the forces at command upon securing the suppressive veto. Bailie Selkirk followed, stating that it was imperatively necessary that in any Government measure that veto should be recognised. Several gentlemen took part. The question of compensation was brought up by Mr. Simpson, and amid the expression of great variety of opinion the idea was prominent that temperance reformers could easily discuss the terms of surrender when the publican party surrendered. Provost Campbell, in a few remarks on his experience in dealing with the publicans who had to leave properties under the operations of the Greenock Improvement, showed that firmness on the part of the Magistracy was all that was needed to manifest the hollowness of any demand on the part of the drink interest for compensation. The proceedings were most interesting, and after the usual vote of thanks had been warmly awarded, the Conference broke up.

Later on a meeting in support of local option principles in relation to the liquor traffic was held in the large hall of the Institute, which was well filled by an attentive audience. Provost Campbell occupied the chair, and was accompanied to the platform by Mr. James Stewart, M.P.; ex-Provost Morton; Bailie Torrens, Glasgow; Bailie Selkirk, Glasgow; Rev. Wm. Laughton, Free St. Thomas' Church, Greenock; Rev. James Kerr, Reformed Presbyterian Church, Greenock; Rev. Alexander Davidson, E.U. Church, Greenock; Rev. John Campbell, Newark Parish Church, Port-Glasgow; Captain Brochie, Messrs. R. Mackay, Glasgow; Reich, Lang, Simpson, Miller, Fairgrieve, Whitelaw, Buie, etc.

The Chairman intimated letters of apology for absence from ex-Provost Lyle and Bailie Brymner. In the course of his opening remarks, he said he believed that if the town were polled it would be found that the great majority of the people were in favour of giving the inhabitants of each district the right to say that no public-house should be planted there. If he was not wrong, there was a census taken some years ago of the number of parties in Greenock in favour of such a measure, and he thought it was found that the majority were in favour of having a measure of local option. That being so, he thought they should let Parliament know their minds; and held that when Parliament became acquainted with the mind of the people they were entitled to give laws such as they demanded, and no doubt the people would only seek for what was reasonable and just. They had spent a large sum of money upon an Improvement Act, and they had been weeding out wretched localities, and many of the houses taken away were public-houses. And the question had come up, should the magistrates be obliged to give to those men whose houses were in those wretched localities licenses in other parts of the town, whether the people wished it or not? He had always held clearly that they should not. (Applause.) The magistrates must be aware that great evils resulted from having those shops in the localities he referred to, and they could not take them from one locality and place them in another, for the benefit of one individual, and it might be the ruin of a thousand individuals.

He might give compensation for taking away the property, but to plant those public-houses in other localities, or to allow public-houses to be again opened in the same localities, was a thing that he should never be responsible for. (Applause.) He never wavered in his belief that if the temperance reformers continued to exhibit their wonted zeal, the local option principle would be speedily embodied into law. (Applause.)

Ex-Provost MORTON moved the following resolution:—"That in view of the tremendous evils arising from the vice of intemperance, this meeting of inhabitants of Greenock desire most respectfully to urge upon Her Majesty's Government the vital importance of at once dealing as promised with the liquor laws of this country; and specially of dealing with them in the spirit of the Local Option resolution passed by the House of Commons, so that the inhabitants in their respective districts may be intrusted with a direct veto on the issue or renewal of all licences." He said they all knew that the question of local option was brought before the House of Commons by the veteran Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and that he managed to get a substantial majority in favour of the principle—a very great stride in the right direction. He thought the particular object of this meeting and other meetings held throughout the country should be to inform Her Majesty's Government that this measure might be of a very wide character, and might give power to a very large extent to the people of the respective districts to settle the question of licenses. (Applause.) He held that power must be given to the extent of abolition if they saw cause. (Hear, hear.) In a great many places the people would exercise the right to limit the traffic very much, and the limitations might work in such a manner as ultimately to educate the people in the district in the direction of prohibition. It was all nonsense to say that people could not be made sober by Act of Parliament. Measures could be passed by the legislature which might have a very beneficial effect on the population. Temptations could be taken out of the way of men who were liable to fall before them, and so they would have a population freer from evil than they would otherwise have. (Applause.) Some of the evils could not be removed by the legislature, but they could call upon the Government to remove those that it was in their power to remove. He would only add that it was very desirable that this question of local option should be first tested and tried in Scotland, because the people of Scotland were more advanced in this question than were the people of England or Ireland. He concluded by moving the resolution. (Applause.)

MR. STEWART, M.P., said:—Provost Campbell, ladies and gentlemen—from what I have heard I do think that the cause has not perhaps suffered at all, from the fact that the resolution has fallen into such able hands as those of my friend Mr. Morton. (Applause.) Sir, there is no platform which as a public man I feel more consistent with my duty to stand upon than that where I am side by side with the advocates of the temperance cause—(applause)—because I feel that in doing so I am associating myself with men who are aiming at raising their fellow-countrymen from that great scourge of intemperance which has been such a reproach to our country for so long a time. And I think I may congratulate you, friends of temperance, on the favourable circumstances under which we find ourselves placed as advocates of this great and important measure. Some few months ago many of you met here to do honour to Sir Wilfrid Lawson—(applause)—and also to celebrate the jubilee of the temperance movement. Well, I am in great hopes that this jubilee year is to be in more senses than one a jubilee for those who wish to see Scotland raised from the great evils with which she is burdened; because we have now got a Government that has, to a certain extent at all events, promised to deal with this great evil: and I venture to say that as soon as it is possible for them to take up the subject they will effectually deal with it. (Applause.) Now, I do not wish to-night, or at any time in handling this question, to make it one of party—(Rev. John Campbell: "Hear, hear")—and therefore I shall not say one word more than I have said, namely, that we have now a Government and a Parliament which are more sincere, I am sure, than any that has preceded it in their desire and will to deal with this matter. (Applause.) You know that early in the last session of the late Parliament Sir Wilfrid Lawson's motion for local option was rejected by a very decided majority. I think the number was no less than 114. A new Parliament was elected, and Sir Wilfrid was not the man to lose his opportunity. He took the very first opportunity that presented itself to bring forward a notice of motion of a similar kind, and he was successful in getting well placed, so that his motion came on somewhere about June. You know the result of that motion was that Parliament declared in favour of local option by a majority of 26. (Applause.) That is a very good omen to begin with in connection with the jubilee year; and if it is too much to hope that we shall be able to see what we want—a very strong and decisive measure of reform on this subject carried before the termination of the year—still I feel confident that no very long time will elapse before something like progress will be made in temperance legislation. (Applause.) I would just remark in regard to the question of local option itself that some people are disposed to look upon the term—and I think rightly so—as having a very wide application. Now, there is one kind of local option which I do hope any measure introduced by Government will not contain, and that is local option to allow the liquor laws to remain as they are at present. I think that would be a heavy blow and a great discouragement to all those who seek to raise the masses from the state in which they are at present in regard to this great question. But in regard to a direct veto on the issue or renewal of all licenses, there is no doubt, that the friends of temperance will have a very heavy battle to fight in order to obtain such a provision in any measure of legislation; because there cannot be a question that the power of the publican even still is very great indeed, and that there is a large portion of the present members of Parliament who are not disposed to go the length of an actual veto in regard to licenses. But I think that the principle is a sound one, and that we who are sincere temperance reformers ought to insist that such a provision of option ought to be contained in any measure that may be introduced. (Applause.) For my part, if I have the honour of a seat in Parliament when such a measure is brought forward, I shall be disposed to join Sir Wilfrid Lawson in his demand for a provision of that kind. (Applause.)

Baillie SELKIRK, Glasgow, supported the motion in a long address, setting forth some of the principles which appeared to him to be at the foundation of the movement, the fundamental principle being that the traffic in intoxicating drink was antagonistic to the community, and ought to be suppressed by law. He said he was greatly struck many years ago in reading an article by Charles Buxton on "How to stop drunkenness." In that article it was stated that there were in Great Britain about 20 years ago half-a-million of homes where peace was not known owing to drunkenness, and Mr. Buxton urged that the traffic ought to be suppressed by the ratepayers. (Applause.) Now the law had always to a certain extent dealt with this traffic, and the question was simply how far, in the interests of the public, the law should be made to go. All the existing regulations had been put in force in order to prevent the evils of intoxication, but the reason why they had not succeeded was that they had not dealt with the right thing. The mischief was in the drink itself. (Applause.) A publican, it must be remembered, was just a man; he was not an angel—(laughter)—and he had as much a desire to push his business as any other person, and that could not be done without injury to all around him. The Times newspaper many years ago said some very truthful things about the drink traffic, and one of these things was that publicans' profits represented mis-spent money. (Applause.) It had been said that the people must be educated, and it was just because temperance advocates believed in education that they had attended the present demonstration. (Applause.) At present the law established public-houses, and temperance reformers were endeavouring to bring public opinion up to the point of further restriction. All these years they had been endeavouring by meetings, discussions and literature to educate the people, and the consequence now was that, as Mr. Stewart had said, temperance advocacy stood higher in the estimation of Parliament than ever, and he (the speaker) was anxious that the people should have the power to sweep the drink traffic out of the land. (Loud applause.)

The resolution, having been put to the meeting, was enthusiastically carried.

Rev. Mr. LAUGHTON moved the second resolution as follows:—

"That whether the subject be taken up generally or not, this meeting would desire most earnestly to call on Her Majesty's Government to assist in every way the proposed passing of a Scottish Local Option Bill; both public opinion and the laws which are its outcome being in Scotland many years in advance of what they are either in England or Ireland."

He said it had always been perfectly plain to him that the multiplying of public-houses was simply the multiplying of temptations to drunkenness, and unquestionably, as public-houses were reduced, so were the inducements and temptations. (Applause.) With regard to the attitude of the magistracy, he rather thought that the magistrates of Greenock, on the whole, looking back for many years, had been more favourable to the cause of restriction than perhaps in any other town of the same extent in Scotland. (Applause.) But notwithstanding the earnest desire of many magistrates—and many of them in Greenock were thoroughly temperance reformers and total abstinents—their wishes were often thwarted in the object they had in view. He had to point out that, to a certain extent, communities in towns had already a measure of Local Option, because, practically, they could choose their own Councillors, and these Councillors could choose their own magistrates. He further pointed out that if Government could not sanction a general measure of Local Option, they might at least be induced to grant a measure limited to certain localities, in which the principle might be subjected to the test of experiment. At present the Government made experiments in localities before sanctioning the application of general principles to the whole country, and the latest of these experiments had proved so successful in ten counties of Great Britain and Ireland that it had been extended to the whole nation. He referred to the provision whereby people could buy postage stamps with their pence till they amounted in value to a shilling, and could then deposit it in the Post Office Savings Bank. (Applause.) He would accordingly rejoice if Parliament would make an experiment in Greenock with the Local Option measure; and, if that experiment were made, and if Greenock did not tell a different story in the course of a year or two as to the extent of its intemperance, he would be very much disappointed indeed. (Applause.)

The resolution was formally seconded by the Rev. A. DAVIDSON.

Baillie TORRENS, J.P., Glasgow, heartily supported the resolution in a powerful speech, which alternately elicited laughter and applause. Referring to the great change of attitude on the part of Parliament towards the Local Option Bill last session, he said that it was the temperance agitation throughout the country which had effected the change. (Applause.) On the subject of licenses, he held that they were merely granted for a year, and at the end of any year the magistrates had the power of withdrawal. (Loud applause.) He was sure that if the resolutions which had just been carried were forwarded to the proper quarter, they would receive every attention, and that it would be found that Parliament had not been appealed to in vain. (Applause.)

The motion was then put to the meeting, and unanimously adopted.

Rev. JOHN CAMPBELL moved the third resolution—"That the best thanks of the meeting be given to the Honourable the Provost for presiding; and that he be requested to send a copy of the foregoing resolutions, on behalf of the meeting, to the Prime Minister and to the Home Secretary."

Rev. JAMES KERR seconded the motion, and it was agreed to.

The Chairman acknowledged the compliment, and promised to comply with the request contained in the resolution.

On the motion of Captain BROTHIE, a vote of thanks was passed to the deputation from Glasgow.

The Rev. ALEX. DAVIDSON pronounced the benediction, which closed the proceedings.

The rum business has collapsed at Woodstock, New Brunswick. Six fines of fifty dollars each did it, and the temperance cause is rejoicing.

Prince Bismarck, it is reported, is engaged on a magnificent attempt on a wholesale scale to combat drunkenness, by limiting the facilities for the indulgence in that vice.

Last month at Stafford, a man named Crutchley for a wager, drank off a pint of whisky at a draught. He dropped down, was taken to the Infirmary and died there. The 'drop' was not good for him.

A woman was fined for drunkenness at Glasgow last month, and she tried to exculpate herself by saying:—"I get my money once a fortnight, and I aye like to taste the barley brae." Her money thus spent reminds one of the pearls put before swine.

The adulteration of beer seems of late years to have been steadily on the decrease, the percentage of adulterated samples having fallen from 9.3 in 1877, to 5.0 in 1878, and 3.6 in 1879. In a single instance trace of tobacco was found, but salt is oftenest used.

FOOD REFORM IN LONDON.—There are now seven restaurants in London, accommodating a grand total of 1,700 diners. Think of Londoners abandoning the use of roast beef. Who dare say after this that "the world we fool in" is not a world of change.

EDINBURGH T. A. SOCIETY.—We understand that the following are the office-bearers of this society for the present year:—President, James Coultts, Esq., S.S.C.; Vice-presidents, Messrs. John Steel, John Forbes, and James H. Waterston; Treasurer, Mr. R. W. Armour, and Secretary, R. M'Laren, 52 Nicolson Street.

MILNGAVIE.—Mr. Robert Dransfield, one of the agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, delivered a very earnest and telling lecture in the Bridge School here, on the evening of Monday, 8th ult. A general wish was expressed at the close of the meeting, that Mr. Dransfield should be requested to return during the winter.

Mr. R. H. McDonald of San Francisco offers 100,000 dollars towards founding a university in that State. One of the stipulations is that an equal sum be raised by the various evangelical denominations, another is, that no professor, student, or employee, should be addicted to the use of tobacco, opium, or spirituous liquors, in any shape or form.

Mary Ann Mooney, an old woman, was fined at the Edinburgh Police Court 10s. or ten days imprisonment, for being drunk and incapable. She has been one hundred times convicted. If Mary read the newspapers and had a choice in the matter, I think she would hardly feel satisfaction at being branded as a common pest, but she has lost her helm. Poor Mary Ann.

COVE—TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—A lecture was delivered under the auspices of the above society on Saturday evening, 30th October, in the Mission Hall, Cove, by Mr. Blackwood, agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association.—Captain Ross, secretary, N.-E. Coast Mission, presided. The subject of the lecture was, "Facts worth knowing about the drink question," which the lecturer handled in an earnest and practical manner, and was listened to with rapt attention by a large audience of fishermen. After the usual votes of thanks, and the transaction of the society's ordinary weekly business, the meeting terminated.—Aberdeen Daily Free Press.

CONFIRMING COMMITTEES.—We understand that the Confirming Committee for the Burgh of Glasgow will consist of the following gentlemen—Messrs. James Dunlop, W. Kidston, and J. C. Wakefield, Justices of the Peace, and Bailies Laing, M'Onie, and Thomson.

Messrs. Meux & Co., the famed brewers, St. Giles', London, were fined £25 for selling drink on unlicensed premises. The Magistrate expressed his surprise that "such eminent brewers as Messrs. Meux & Co. should break the law in such an open way." Good gracious! how could they help it? Can they be law abiding and sell drink at one and the same time?

Occasional and habitual drunkards will doubtless hail with delight the new order which has just been issued from Scotland Yard, to the effect they are only to be locked up until sober, and then released upon their own recognisances to appear before the magistrate. Should they fail to do so, the cases are to be reported to the commissioner, who will decide the course to adopt. Oh see-saw, see-saw treatment, as foolish as ineffectual.

Mr. Bannerman, as convener of the F.C. Temperance Committee, made a statement on this subject, moving that Presbyteries, in the way of maturing opinion, should consider the suggestions on the local option question which had been sent down to them, and report on them before the meeting of the Committee in December. One of the suggestions was that as Scotland was more ripe on the matter than England, they thought a measure could be carried of a kind which they would all rejoice to see.

DUNDEE TEMPERANCE HUNDRED.—This spirited organisation is taking an important step just now. It is making a strong appeal to the ministers in Dundee to form a temperance organisation in connection with their churches, and offers to send a deputation either to encourage existing societies connected with churches or to assist in establishing an adult or Band of Hope Society in connection with them. We shall be glad to hear of the success of this important effort, and to hear that, moved by their bright example, others in their neighbourhood are doing likewise.

The Session in Kent Road U.P. Church, Glasgow, received a memorial signed by 549 of the congregation, or about 100 more than half of the communicants in the church, praying that unfermented wine be used at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper instead of the usual alcoholic kind. Certain parties in the congregation and in the Session protested against the change as beyond the power of the Session to make, and their protest being unheeded, they appealed to the Presbytery. The question of unfermented communion wine was not before the Presbytery on its merits, and the result is that the whole is sent back to the Session for reconsideration, with a view of restoring unity and peace in the congregation. As a consequence of this discussion a discussion on the "Unfermented Wine Question" has been opened in the Glasgow papers, and no one will deny but the advocates of a pure non-alcoholic wine at the Lord's Supper have the best of it.

EDINBURGH.—Brother Bruce, the Grand Lodge lecturer from Yorkshire, visited Modern Athens last month. On the 12th ult. he addressed a largely attended meeting of the Anchor of Hope Juvenile Lodge 214, in the hall 52 Nicolson Street. Brother Bruce advocated the principles of total abstinence, introducing "The two rain drops," "Good resolutions," and "The sea captain and his boy." A vote of thanks to him was unanimously responded to. At 8 p.m. same evening, he addressed the Anchor of Hope Lodge, 23, in the same place. Brother R. Dick, W.C.T., presided. After the meeting was opened in templar style Brother Bruce delivered an eloquent address. He viewed the temperance question in its dark and in its bright aspects. He gave a few excellent anecdotes, and at the close of his address sang a melody. Addresses were also given by the chairman and Mrs. Fuller, and songs and recitations were given during the evening by brothers and sisters present. The usual votes of thanks were heartily awarded.

THE GRANGEMOUTH FEUS.—As we stated in our last, the Earl of Zetland brought an action of declarator against Messrs. Carmichael and Wilkinson, the proprietor and occupier of a feu under his lordship. On the 5th ult., Lord Rutherford Clarke, judge in the case, gave judgment against his lordship, on the grounds that his lordship has not shown that he has an interest in suing the action, with costs against his lordship. His lordship simply pleads the well-being of the community and his title as superior, and not any interest on his own part. We understand that he has amended his condescence on the subsequent actions, we earnestly trust with a better result.

MR. PARKER, M.P., AT PERTH.—On the 16th ult. the hon. gentleman addressed his constituents, and referred to Local Option in the following terms: He said, As regards the Temperance question, there are many minor reforms suggested by the Lords' Committee, and for Scotland by the Royal Commission on Grocers' Licenses, that might well be taken in hand at once. There is also the Sunday closing question for Wales and England, and for the large towns at present exempted in Ireland. But no doubt there will be disappointment if the Government do not also indicate how they mean to deal with the resolution of the House of Commons in favour of Local Option. On this a little plain speaking beforehand may be useful, for in some quarters a persistent attempt is made to misrepresent the majority for Local Option as a majority for the Permissive Bill. Now, whatever else it is, it certainly is not that. For it includes leading men who vote, speak, and write against the Permissive Bill, and who, in supporting the resolution, said they would oppose the bill again, should it be again brought forward—such men as Mr. Bright and Mr. Forster, whose example, no doubt, guides many others. What then is Local Option? The phrase is fathered by Sir Wilfrid on Mr. Gladstone. I don't think Mr. Gladstone admits the paternity, but at any rate I may give you his explanation of Local Option in Mid-Lothian, gratefully accepted by Sir Wilfrid, though I am not sure it would have passed muster coming from a humbler quarter. The principle, as Mr. Gladstone understands it, is "that within the limits of justice and fairness the local opinion of a particular district may be considered in the particular conditions of those police laws which are to regulate the sale of alcoholic liquor." But what is there in the Permissive Bill that causes Mr. Bright, and Mr. Forster, and Lord Hartington, and I suppose Mr. Gladstone, to reject it? The Permissive Bill gives effect to local public opinion; so far it is one form of Local Option, and fairly comes within the abstract resolution. But it does so, in the first place, not as is usual in this country through responsible administrators, but by popular vote, like the plebiscite in France. And, secondly, almost as a necessary consequence of this, it gives the public no option of controlling the number or the character of licensed houses, or the times of opening and closing, but restricts them to a single option, yes or no, as to total prohibition, just as in France they must say yes or no to war, or to an empire or republic. Now it is not my purpose to-night to argue for or against plebiscite, or for or against total prohibition. What I wish to make clear is this. Local Option in itself means simply local as opposed to national control. In Mr. Gladstone's examples you see local control worked through a private bill, or through a responsible representative body. But in the Permissive Bill you have a local control worked by plebiscite for or against total prohibition. That is what recommends it to the Alliance, of which Sir Wilfrid is chairman, and which exists for the total suppression of the liquor trade; and that is what makes it impossible for the Liberal Cabinet, consistently with their principles, to accept the bill. This is not, as Sir Wilfrid Lawson would have you believe, a question of details; it is a question of principle. He cannot deny that in his bill, over and above the principle of local option, there is the further principle of total prohibition. If he gave way on that principle he knows he could no longer be chairman of the Alliance. I have only to add that, although, as a private member, I voted for the resolution, because I sincerely wish to see more local control, yet I thought Lord Hartington showed good sense in the reason he gave for not supporting it as a leader. His vote was withheld, not because it was an abstract resolution, but because the members speaking for it were not practically agreed. But now, with a Liberal Government in power, and with a House of Commons recommending local option, I think the more practical course is to induce the Government to bring in a bill. And, as their bill would certainly not be a prohibitory bill, my humble and earnest advice to all friends of temperance is to unite their forces, not for a resolution only, but for a bill. Of this they may be sure, without more union no progress will be made.

OUR ANNUAL MEETINGS.

A SCHEME OF PROHIBITORY AGITATION.

As specially belonging to the legislative and prohibitory aims of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, I would, with your permission, merely by way of specimen, indicate a number of subjects that ought to be sown in the popular mind, thick as the most abundant and precious seed, not by means of elaborate papers and essays, but in short and telling leaflets:—That the licensed traffic in intoxicating drinks stands directly in antagonism to the great moral law of God. That it stands in opposition to the mind of God as manifested both in nature and in the divinely inspired oracles. That it is, in principle, an anomaly in legislation. That, as an antidote to intemperance, it has always proved a failure wherever introduced, in every age and every clime. That it is on the part of the Government a gigantic blunder, a complete playing of the fool, swallowing up rather than supplying the State's revenue. That, apart from all peculiar theories of Government, it is the duty of the legislation to protect not a privileged few, but the whole of the people. That the licensed traffic in intoxicating liquors fosters and encourages to a vast extent drinking and drunkenness, thereby creating and perpetuating all the vices, miseries, and burdens of intemperance. That it is the legalizing of this traffic which renders it respectable in the eyes of the world. That it is wrong to drink; if wrong to drink, then it is wrong to sell the drink; if wrong to sell, then it is wrong to license the sale of such drink; if wrong to drink, and sell, and license the sale of such drinks, then it is wrong to manufacture the wretched drug. That if it is wrong for any Government to legalize the sale of intoxicating liquor, it is doubly wrong, a crying sin and a most fatuous proceeding, for any body of constituents, and especially for temperance reformers, to become the ultimate legalizers of that traffic by sending men to Parliament who will vote for drink. That the tinkering of the old kettle is useless and worse than useless. That the river of death must be cut off at the source. That all license laws which do not go the length of giving people power to prohibit the public sale of these drinks in their midst is only a playing at temperance legislation. That maintain and perpetuate the unwise and unrighteous system of license, and the sin, the shame, the sorrow, the degradation, the misery, the violence, the disorder, the pauperism, the lunacy, the crime, the murder, the death temporal and eternal, which are not the accidental, but the legitimate outcome of the system, because essentially inherent in it, will be maintained and perpetuated. That the province, the object, the duty of Government, is not to curtail and regulate, but to prohibit wrongs coming within its sphere, and that on no account whatever, for no end whatever, has it, any more than the individual, the right to do wrong. . . . That for the injuries, the wrongs inflicted upon society up and down and all through and through its relationships, by this gigantic and fiendish iniquity, there is, there can be no redress after the evil is perpetuated, and so, by consequence, the only adequate remedy must be found in that prevention which is not only better than cure, but which is to-day a glorious possibility, whereas cure, if the evil be allowed to go on, will be in millions and myriads of cases, and all through humanity, only a sad despair.

CANADIAN TEMPERANCE NOTES.

Orillia, 15th Sept., 1880.

Dear Sir,—After reading the evidence in the Louth election case, I must say either your election law is much inferior to ours, or Baron Dowse gave the sitting members very large benefit of a very small doubt.—Did you ever hear of a seller of tobacco giving up that trade for conscience sake? Mr. Thomas Dallas, who died here the other day, was a quiet but earnest and useful temperance worker. A number of years ago he was engaged in business as a general merchant. In his stock was tobacco. He listened to a sermon by the minister of the Presbyterian church here—Rev. J. Gray, M.A.—in which the inconsistency of selling tobacco while disapproving of its use was pointed out. Next morning Mr. Dallas carried out all the tobacco he had in his shop, and burned it. He never sold another plug. He was a native of Edinburgh.—Beware of any proposed law containing a compensation clause! If such be enacted, let the whole onus of it rest with the opponents of prohibition. It will fail, as all other temporising measures have failed, and every effort will be made to attribute the failure to the prohibition advocates.—Faithfully yours,

G. H. HALE.

Orillia, 20th Oct., 1880.

Dear Sir,—Do you ever have any drunkards confined in English prisons? A constable of long experience tells me he knows of none here, and the governor of our county goal has never had one in charge. Prisoners being permitted to state to which class they belong, of course never record that they are of the worst. Some even call themselves abstainers on such occasions, though their period of abstinence began with their arrest, and will end with their term of imprisonment. There is in gaol at present a man who has drank up a good property, and is now, as often before, incarcerated for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, who is recorded on the books as a "moderate drinker."—With regard to what the Warrington Guardian terms the anomaly "of a mayor whom Mr. Bright refused to confirm as a permanent magistrate because he is a publican," I may mention that here a publican cannot be a mayor or a councillor.—A medical student attending the matriculation examination at Queen's College, Kingston, last week, drowned himself while suffering from delirium tremens. Is this proof of the efficacy of education as an antidote for drink?—Faithfully yours,

G. H. HALE.

TEMPERANCE ANNUITY FUND.

Sir,—There is a matter about which I have often thought I would beg your readers' consideration. Should there not be in connection with the temperance organisation something in the shape of an annuity fund, so that members of temperance societies of some years' standing might, by paying a weekly sum, be entitled to receive, at the age of say sixty-five, a weekly allowance as a help in their declining years? I feel sure that some such society would be the means of uniting abstainers together far more so than at present; because they would have something at stake and something to look forward to. This would induce them to take a more decided stand in the good cause than they do meantime. The management would not cost much, as local societies could easily remit the money to head-quarters. I would be glad to hear from any of your correspondents the result of their consideration of the feasibility of such a scheme.—I am, &c.,

REAL PHILANTHROPY.

SIR,—I have seldom seen a better mode of mitigating the evils to which country laddies and lassies are subjected when attending school in winter than that explained and enforced by Rev. Mr. Cameron, the parish minister of Farnell. How often have we when young, attending a northern parish school, pitied the boys and especially the girls from the country districts who had nothing but their piece of bread and butter and skim-milk cheese, and often ate it shivering in the bitter cold air, washing it down with a good draught of water. It was all well so far as the hardy loons were concerned, they joined us in our play, and if there was any snow we soon experienced the might that slumbered in a peasant arm, fortified by a barley scone and a whang of a skim-milk kebbuck. But the less robust callants shivered as they looked on at "plays" in which they dared not engage for want of "pith." And the wee lassies covered in the door or the lee of the school, huddling together for warmth, with their hands beneath their slips or with them wrapped in their frock tail. Some of them, too, used the skipping rope or "the beds" to raise their temperature, but to all but the hardiest, winter was a severely trying time. Then there was the walk to and from the school—the roads often blocked with snow or rendered almost impassable with mud, and often all had the blinding rain and the drifting snow to encounter along with the sore fatigue of the lang, lang road. Sometimes

"Ye maist wad think a wee touch langer
And they maun starve o' cauld and hunger,
But how it comes, I never kened yet,
They'r maistly wonderfu' contented,
And buirdly chiels and clever hizzies
Are bred in such a way as this is."

But why expose them so? If their lot can be softened beneficence should succour. To remain indifferent to their hardships is to incur the charge of cruelty.

Mr. Cameron found the same state of matters prevailing in Farnell in 1878 as often invited our sympathy more than forty years ago, and having the power as well as the heart he soon devised a scheme of amelioration which has already, we feel convinced, drawn down the blessing of many a fond mother on his kindly head. He enlisted the sympathies of the Countess of Southesk and, as may be easily believed, the Earl soon built a little wooden edifice, the scheme being to give a warm midday meal to the 100 or thereby of scholars frequenting the school. The building, 24 by 13, forms a washing-house for the schoolmaster and a cooking place for the children. The funds to start were three pounds (the proceeds of a lecture), with which the utensils for cooking and serving were provided. The scholars bring their spoons in their satchels. The dinners are varied and plentiful, consisting of potato, pea, and rice soups, plenty of vegetables, and there is beef distributed once a week, and several haunches of venison have been received from the Countess' larder. The charge is one halfpenny each, and a family is never charged more than a penny. Yet there was a balance to carry forward of 9s. Rich and poor meet together. A young lady—bless her—was the cook the first winter, but the school board has since provided one. The indirect advantages are great. The big lads carry the soup to the teachers who, often assisted by neighbours, serve it out. Half an hour is allowed for dining and half an hour for airing the school. Then the senior girls help to wash and dry the dishes and often get a lesson in cookery for their pains. The health of the scholars and their attendance are both improved, and one parish has already taken a leaf out of the book of this highly creditable experiment in Farnell parish. May every country parish soon be doing likewise.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Longley's Illustrated Annual for 1881. F. E. Longley. London: 59 Warwick Lane, E.C. One penny. Six full-page fine wood engravings, a calendar, and a well-selected number of stories, make a marvellous pennyworth.

The Penny Testament.—We understand that the sale of this, the cheapest edition ever published, has already reached nearly 400,000, and that the publisher, Mr. Elliot Stock, confidently expects that a million copies will be disseminated in the course of twelve months.

House and Home, the organ of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, is giving a series of masterly wood engravings. Pressnitz, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and other celebrities have appeared. Ruskin's famous letter to trade societies appears, besides "Our Retrospective Review," from which we learn that many of the reforms in diet now advocated were anticipated by two centuries by old writers. The House and Home is truly the friend of home and the household.

The Adviser for 1880; a book for young people. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League. One of the most superbly got up books of the season, done in handsome cover, adorned with a charming chromo of somebody's darling on a swing. It is also gold lettered and gilt edged. Of the contents we need not speak; their excellence is affirmed month by month by the many thousands of little folks who feast with avidity upon the Adviser.

Heroes in the Strife.—We understand that Mr. Sherlock's new volume, which is announced for publication by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton at the end of the month, will contain sketches of John Bright, David Livingstone, John Wesley, Abraham Lincoln, John Locke, C. H. Spurgeon, Cardinal Manning, and several other eminent men. Following upon the plan pursued in Illustrious Abstinents, the author will specially treat of the total abstinence testimonies of his several Heroes, so the book will be a useful addition to temperance literature.

Songs and Recitations for Bands of Hope. New and enlarged edition. Paisley: J. & R. Parlange; Edinburgh: Menzies & Co. Twopence. In these 64 pages of songs and recitations, compiled and arranged for the Edinburgh Band of Hope Union, Mr. D. M. Fraser has displayed a taste and adaptation which has enabled him to place a superior collection before the public. The 63 hymns and 15 recitations form a selection that should—when sung or spoken—contribute, in a high degree, to the success of our Bands of Hope meetings, and we very cordially recommend them to those in charge of such meetings.

Onward Reciter, vol. ix. (Manchester: Onward Offices, 18 Mount St., Peter St.). The very fact of this little Reciter having completed its ninth volume will be a strong proof to our readers of the excellent quality of its varied contents, for nothing commonplace can long survive, especially in temperance literature. In the hands of an intelligent reader, this deservedly popular little work may be the means of brightening up and making attractive many an otherwise dull and uninteresting meeting—for there are dull and uninteresting meetings. For the ninth time we have pleasure in commending it to our readers.

Thorn Lodge, or the Wheel of Life; by the author of The Losing Game. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League. Price One Shilling. This is a valuable acquisition to the entertaining literature of the League, being a most interesting and sprightly tale. The author's treatment of his story reminds one of the ebb of the tide, for it seems as if every one of his characters was going to be exterminated through drink, and, in fact, almost all are but the arch-villain, Ben Phyle; and it reminds one too of the flow of the tide, for all but the drink-logged are wafted by temperance to the haven of happiness and peace, Ben dying a horrible death. The scene is laid in a midland Scottish county, and in Glasgow, and the Row, Sautmarket, Briggate, figure prominently in its pages.

Graham's Popular Temperance Dialogues, by John H. Scaife. London: National Temperance Publication Depot, 337 Strand. Sixpence. An admirable series of dialogues, well done, abreast of the latest facts of the temperance and prohibitory question, and fitted to do a power of good where well delivered.

Personal Work among our Blue Jackets, 1879-80. By Agnes E. Weston (Devonport: Sailors' Rest and Institute). This little tract is the simple record of a great and good work carried on among our seamen and marines by Miss Weston during last year. The work afloat consists in the issue and distribution of about 200,000 copies yearly of a monthly letter called The Blue Backs; in the establishment and maintenance of temperance societies on board ship; in the presentation of libraries to small vessels; in the circulation of periodicals and tracts all over the world; and in personal visitation of the lower decks of H.M. ships when in port. We are glad to learn from this tract that almost every ship in the service carries members of the Temperance Society, and that a considerable body of officers are pledged abstainers. The work ashore consists in the carrying on of "Sailors' Rests" in Devonport, Keyham, and Portsmouth; in the beneficent agency of a flower mission in connection with the Royal Naval Hospital; in the maintenance of coffee and reading rooms in Falmouth and Portland; and in the holding of numerous gospel and temperance meetings. During the year 24,191 sailors put up at the "Rest" at Devonport alone; and when we reflect how proverbially loose Jack Tar is ashore, and how frequently he is the easy victim of the prowling "land shark," we must rejoice at the institution of such places as "The Sailor's Rest," and be proud of the work in which Miss Weston is so devotedly engaged. She is the brightest beacon to Jack Tar that ever shone out upon his dangerous tract; and he is not ungrateful. Long may she be spared to work "for the glory of God and the good of the service."

OBITUARY NOTICE.

COL. MURE, M.P.—We regret to have to announce the death on Tuesday, 9th ult., in Hamilton Place, Piccadilly, of Lieut.-Colonel William Mure of Caldwell, Ayrshire, M.P. for Renfrewshire. The deceased who was in the fifty-first year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Col. William Mure, M.P., of Caldwell, formerly Vice-Lieutenant of the County of Renfrew, by his marriage with Laura, daughter of the late Mr William Markham, of Becca Hall, Yorkshire. He was born in the year 1830, and was formerly a Lieut.-Colonel in the Scots Fusilier Guards, from which he retired in 1859. He served with the 60th Rifles in the Kaffir War of 1851-53, for which he received a medal, and he also served with the 79th Highlanders in the Eastern campaign of 1854, being present at the actions of Alma and Balaclava, and the siege of Sebastopol, for which services he received a medal and clasps, and also the Turkish medal; he afterwards joined the Scots Fusilier Guards. Colonel Mure was a deputy-lieutenant for Ayrshire, a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Renfrewshire, and Colonel of the 2nd battalion Renfrew Rifle Volunteers. He contested the county in 1873 in the Liberal interest, but was defeated, greatly owing to his want of sympathy with the Permissive Bill. In 1874 he was returned by a majority of 188, and he was again returned, this year by a large majority; his opponent being on all three occasions Sir Archibald Campbell of Blythswood. He maintained a strict neutrality on the Permissive Bill, but latterly voted in its favour. Being unable through illness to take his seat in the new Parliament, he could neither vote nor pair in favour of the Local Option resolution. Col. Mure married in 1859 the Hon. Constance Elizabeth Wyndham, youngest daughter of George, first Lord Leonfield, and has issue a son and three daughters. His remains were brought to Caldwell House, the family seat, and were interred in the parish churchyard of Neilston on Friday, 12th ult., in the presence of a select circle of mourning friends, his political opponent Sir Archibald Campbell being among the number.

THE Social Reformer.

JANUARY, 1881.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC: THE GREAT
OBSTRUCTIVE OF REFORMS.

A LECTURE BY

J. M. McCulloch, M.D., DUMFRIES.

It has occurred to me that were I to give you a short, and it must be a very short description of the state of our country within my own recollection, with incidental references to previous facts, I might perhaps interest you more, and give you a clearer and more powerful interest in the Temperance Reformation by showing thus its paramount importance to the welfare of the nation.

Let us go back about 53 years. At that time there were great and grievous restrictions upon religious freedom. In England and Ireland more especially, no man could be a Member of Parliament, a Magistrate, a Town Councillor, or indeed hold any public situation, unless he was a member of the Church of England and subscribed his belief in the 39 Articles of its creed. If he was a Roman Catholic not only could he hold no public situation, but he was practically excluded from all political and many social rights; and not very long before my day if a Roman Catholic was riding a valuable horse, worth say £100, and a Protestant offered him say £5 for it, he was obliged by the law to dismount and give it up for that sum. Nay, more and worse still, if one of a Roman Catholic family went before a magistrate and swore that he or she, as the case might be, had become a Protestant, no matter how infamous their character might be, the law gave them the right to take all that belonged to the family, and to turn their father and mother, or sisters and brothers out destitute. In all the three kingdoms there were other religious tyrannies about which I shall not trouble you.

As to political freedom, matters in Scotland more especially were even worse; in fact, it was a "mockery, a delusion, and a snare." Many of the burghs of England and Ireland were as openly sold to the highest bidder as a house or a horse, or as church livings were but lately sold in Scotland, and are sold in England still; a great many, indeed the most of the Parliamentary seats belonged to a few great families, and they put whomsoever they pleased into the House of Commons, no doubt after going through the solemn farce of an election which deceived nobody. Since I came to Dumfries, and just before the first Reform Bill, I saw first one and then another General Election, and there were only five persons in the whole of the five Dumfries burghs had the right to vote, and these five men, of course, returned the member. In the great city of Glasgow there was only one man who had the right to vote for a member of Parliament, and even he could only vote for the fourth or fifth part of that member. The county of Bute had only one voter, and in 1832 he happened to be the sheriff, and when the King's writ came down ordering the election of a member for that county he went up into his place as sheriff and read out the writ, then came down and proposed himself, then seconded himself, and finally went up into his place again and declared himself duly elected! I recollect of the celebrated Lord Jeffrey stating all these facts in the House of Commons, and the other constituencies were little better. I have personally seen decent, respectable men, of good character, hanged, and known of many imprisoned or banished for life for saying or doing politically what now-a-days especially during elections, is said and done by hundreds of thousands without injury to anyone or anything. It would take me many days to tell what even I have seen and known of a like kind, but I have said enough to prove to you that political liberty and the liberty of the subject did not exist in Scotland fifty years ago, and that such words, in Scotland at least, were mere names without any reality whatever.

As to commercial freedom, Free Trade as it is called, we had none of it; everything foreign was taxed to the extent almost of prohibition, the landlords had a monopoly of the food, the manufacturers of the clothes, the shipowners of the carrying trade by sea, &c. The quantity of land in the three kingdoms became too small for the increased population, and as foreign grain and other food were not allowed to be imported until the necessaries of life had risen to famine prices, want and misery were rife, and when a really bad harvest occurred starvation, disease, riots, and bloodshed were sure to occur. And even when such famine occurred and the ports were opened, the navigation laws prevented competition in freights and thus rendered the necessary supply of food dearer to the starving millions. I saw, after I settled in Dumfries, two of these dangerous riots, meal mobs as they were called, and in the manufacturing districts more especially they were much more frequent and dangerous.

Then as to sanitary reform, or sanitary measures of any kind, such things were never thought of, and only occasionally heard of, and then were spoken of as whims. Dirt and dangerous nuisances were rife, the rule and not the exceptions, and fevers and other pestilential diseases were prevalent to a fearful extent accordingly. The death rate was very high, especially in towns, and no wonder, for there was no drainage, the water supply was polluted, and filth of every kind was only removed once a year when the potatoes were set.

As to education, there was some in Scotland, and that was pretty extensively diffused, but in England and Ireland at least 80 out of every 100 persons were as ignorant and scarcely as innocent as savages. I need scarcely tell you that these religious, political, commercial, sanitary, and educational evils were accompanied by a vast mass of pauperism, disease, insanity, sin, vice, crime, and abject misery among the people.

For a long time previous to 1823, the religious classes outside the pale of the Established Churches agitated for and demanded religious freedom, or, in other words, the right, without civil disabilities, to worship God in accordance with their own conscientious belief, and in 1828-9 the agitation, especially in Ireland, became so great and menacing that the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, although they had obstinately and persistently upheld these religious tyrannies all their lives, granted religious liberty to the Nonconformists and other dissenters by abolishing the Test and Corporation Acts, and also granted Catholic Emancipation. The great and good men who originated and sustained that agitation for religious freedom believed that they would not only gain greater purity of faith and morals, but that by such increased purity, pauperism, sin, vice, crime, and social misery would be greatly diminished. No doubt religious freedom, though still imperfect, was a great gain, it emancipated thought and shook tyranny to a certain extent, but pauperism, sin, vice, crime, and social misery were as rampant as ever.

Wise and good men soon saw this, and examined why it was so, and they came to the conclusion that it was because the vast bulk of the people were little better than serfs without any political rights or power, and they said, "Give the people the franchise, let them know and feel that they are really men and have an interest in the laws and welfare of their country, and it will elevate their thoughts, and by so doing give them a nobler idea of their duty to God and man. And they agitated for political emancipation, and that with such vigour that in 1832 we were again on the verge of a revolution; young men all over the three kingdoms were secretly drilling at night, even in Dumfries they were drilling on the Lochar Moss at night, and at Birmingham 100,000 men assembled on New Hall Hill and threatened to march upon London if the Reform Bill was not immediately granted, and the Crown and the Tories became terrified and ceased to oppose that great national measure. We got a still more extensive Reform Bill in 1868, and we only wait for the County Household Franchise Bill in order to attain a sufficiently extended franchise. The advance therefore in political liberty has been very great, especially when I tell you the undoubted fact that just exactly twelve years before I was born slavery was abolished in Scotland—not the slavery of black men, mark you, but the slavery of many Scotch men and Scotch women, who were sold and worked in slavery like horses and cattle. Well, after these great measures of religious and political reforms, have pauperism, insanity, disease, sin, vice, crime, and social misery been diminished? No; the very reverse, for they have steadily increased, and at a very much greater ratio than the increase of the population.

All this was soon seen and felt, and then Villiers, and Cobden, and Bright, and the other Corn Law and Navigation Law repealers arose and declared that all these and many other evils arose from the Corn Laws and other taxes on the people's food, intensified by protection, causing, as they undoubtedly did, periodical starvation and all its attendant miseries. After a long and severe struggle and agitation, Sir Robert Peel again stepped forward and abolished these iniquitous laws, and free trade became the settled policy of Great Britain, bringing with it an extraordinary, I might almost say, a marvellous increase of trade, riches, high wages, in short, a flow of material prosperity greater than any recorded in the history of the world. Have pauperism, disease, insanity, sin, vice, crime and social misery become less? No, they have increased more rapidly and fearfully than ever.

Then the cry got up that it was the ignorance of the people, and the bad houses, and the bad sanitary conditions in which a great many of the people lived, and the education bills and several sanitary bills have been passed to remove these, and though ignorance has been greatly lessened, and cleanliness greatly increased, they have neither stopped nor diminished the rapid increase and extent of these unmitigated curses of the people. Is it true then that all these great and beneficial reforms are and have been of no use, and that the Tories who bitterly opposed them were right after all? So far from that they have been of great benefit to the people, and would be of infinitely greater still if it were not that you, yes you and others refuse, wilfully and deliberately refuse, to give these great reforms anything like fair play, for you uphold the drinking of intoxicating liquors, and thus by habit, custom, and example keep up that pernicious practice, and those of you who are electors will vote for a Whig, a Tory, or a Radical, as the case may be, although you know he will vote to uphold the liquor traffic, or at least, won't vote to put it down. Perhaps you deny that intoxicating liquors are the principal cause of all these evils, and of the comparative inefficiency of all the great reforms I have enumerated and declare that it is the sinfulness of the human heart that is the cause, and that as long as human beings are human beings these evils will prevail. That, no doubt, is partly true, but the truer it is by so much the more is it your bounden duty to give up and put down all those causes which can be removed, easily removed, if you are willing to do your duty to God and man. Those who put forward such excuses as the only cause, do it either ignorantly, of whom it may be said, "They know not what they do or say," or they do so falsely as a cloak for their own selfishness, because they know full well that they, and such as they, uphold and sustain the most prolific cause, or, at the very least, refuse or neglect to give up and put down the two pervading causes which principally originate and foster these clamant national and social evils.

What is the cause? I need scarcely tell you that it is intoxicating drinks and the infamous liquor traffic which fosters and maintains their use. Inquire and then think over what the liquor traffic and the liquor it deals out occasions. No other agent produces such an enormous amount of demoralisation, blasphemy, vice, sin, crime, pauperism, insanity, and social misery of the most appalling kind. No other instrumentality strikes such a deadly blow at the very basis of good government, by rendering our political elections and institutions infamously corrupt, as the present public inquiry into corrupt practices at elections proves, thus corrupting and undermining the very source of our liberties and threatening the very existence of the British Empire. It is by far and away the greatest cause of our pauperism and poverty (for there are vast numbers poor who are not paupers), and no wonder, for our Chancellors of the Exchequer prove every session of Parliament that from £130,000,000 to £150,000,000 sterling are spent by the people of this country for intoxicating drinks, a sum it is even difficult to comprehend and which if it were spent upon the necessaries and comforts of life would increase trade and wages to such an extent as would render us almost independent of foreign customers, and almost drive pauperism and poverty from the land. It is the same curse which, in spite of free trade and cheap food given to us by the Anti-Corn Law repealers and Sir Robert Peel, reduces so many of our population, by the drinking of their bread-winners, to the very verge of starvation, from the want of food, clothes, firing, and proper shelter. It is this pervading evil that checkmates, diminishes, and deteriorates the benefits derived and derivable from education, in short, these great and many other beneficent reforms which we have attained within the last fifty-three years have been shorn of their benefits, and to a great mass of the people rendered useless by this unmitigated curse, thus proving the truth stated by the great and good Matthew Devport Hill, "That whichever way we turn and whatever we do for the welfare and elevation of the people, the drink demon starts up before us and blocks the way."

Now what are the lessons derivable from and proved to be necessary and justifiable from these undeniable facts? The first, is that the liquor traffic is the main and most potent cause of all these lamentable evils. Second, that as long as that traffic is allowed to exist these evils cannot be got rid of. Third, that it can be got rid of only by an Act of Parliament. Fourth, that when a candidate wishes to get into Parliament and asks your vote, but at the same time refuses to promise that he will vote for giving the people the power to veto the granting of licenses to sell intoxicating liquors, when they so mind, or, in other words, prevent the magistrates from forcing the liquor traffic upon any place where the people are unwilling: if he is a Liberal ask him how he dares to profess Liberalism and at the same time maintain an evil that antagonises almost all Liberal measures hitherto passed by Parliament, and which all experience teaches us must ever, whilst it is tolerated, continue to do so, and that, moreover, such a refusal on his part is directly opposed to the principles of Liberalism, these principles being, "Trust in the people, local self-government, reform of all clamant abuses, peace, retrenchment, and reform." The liquor traffic being the most clamant of present abuses, the most common cause of dispeace, one of the most fertile sources of extravagance, the people being entitled to local self-government in this more especially as they drink the drink, pay for the drink, and surely know better whether they want it or not, much better indeed than a set of Justices of the Peace who, in this matter at least, give us neither justice nor peace.

If he is a Conservative ask him how he can reconcile his refusal with Conservative principles, two of the most important of which are, "To uphold order, and put down anarchy," the liquor traffic being the greatest cause of disorder and anarchy known in this country, and finally tell them both, Liberal and Conservative, who shall refuse to vote down this curse, that they are shams, hypocrites, and wolves in sheep's clothing, and that you won't vote for either of them.

Lastly, what is the duty of you electors? Can you, will you continue to be gulled and duped by men calling themselves Liberals or Conservatives but who are really neither the one or the other honestly or consistently, as I have shown you, but time-serving, selfish, unprincipled politicians, who care nothing for either moral principle, or the welfare of the people one bit further than serves their own ends and purposes?

No, if you care for God and your country, you will only vote for those who will put down this iniquity, thus giving fair play to all good measures, and sending plenty, peace, contentment and happiness into the homes of the people.

The General Baptist Association have passed a number of resolutions in favour of temperance legislation—one rejoicing in the adoption by the House of Commons of the Local Option Resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, as opening up a prospect of early legislation by which the intemperance of the country, with its enormous attendant evils, may be greatly diminished.

INDIVIDUAL CONSECRATION.

BY REV. S. HARDING, PAISLEY.

There is no more fitting occasion than the commencement of a new year, for taking a retrospect of the past, and marking out a course for the future. This plan is adopted generally by business men, who take stock, balance their books, and carefully examine into their financial position. Should the results of their examination be unsatisfactory, greater prudence and economy will be observed, and more diligent measures adopted, so that the future may be attended with more satisfactory results.

The same principle holds good in regard to our individual position in its relation to God and to society. We rejoice as we behold the growth of those institutions which are the glory of our age and country, and established for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of suffering humanity, and advancing the glory of God in the world. But if we examine closely into the working of these institutions, the labour is carried on by the few, while the many look on with almost stolid indifference, even though associated by membership with the society. There is not that personal consecration and effort which the urgency of the case demands, nor that strenuous exertion which it might be supposed so momentous a question would call forth.

To be more explicit—Take any one of the great temperance organizations of Scotland, and will any person conversant with its membership dare venture the assertion that all its members are doing their duty to God and to humanity, loyal to their pledge and obligation.

Is there not too much indifference, ease, and selfishness, in our ranks, which interferes with the entire energies of body and soul being given to the work. There are many who think they have done their duty, when they have paid their subscription. But is this all that God and humanity require? Is this all that is demanded of me by the society of which I am an enrolled member? Is there no hardship to be endured, no sacrifice to be made, no obloquy to be encountered, no weariness to be experienced, no self-denial to be exercised, for the sake, and in the cause, of him who did not hesitate to shed his life's blood for sinners, and endured the severest sufferings in order to work out their salvation? That man gives but a poor proof of the genuineness and sincerity of his philanthropy, patriotism, and Christianity, who can view with indifference and unconcern the multitudes enslaved by the liquor traffic, and yet make no personal efforts to save them.

It is sometimes objected that much personal effort will interfere with individual and family duties; but I fear there is too much reason to suspect that the true statement of this objection would be that it interferes too much with personal and family conveniences. If we suppose that we can fulfil our duty to God and our fellow men, and yet experience no inconvenience, and be called upon to make no sacrifice, we are grievously mistaken. The question is not whether the duty is agreeable to us—whether it is congenial or otherwise to flesh and blood,—but whether it is obligatory upon us; and if it be so, surely it ought to silence every objection, and nerve the soul to consecrate its entire powers to the great work of "rescuing the perishing."

Now is the time to start afresh—to turn over a new leaf. Begin the year 1881 with new resolves. It may be the last year you may be permitted to labour in the great work. Make it the best. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, wisdom, knowledge, or device in the grave, whither thou goest."

WOMEN'S APPEAL TO WOMEN.

We commend the following heart-searching and heart-stirring appeal to the women of Paisley, from the Women's Christian and Abstinence Association, Paisley, to our many female sympathisers:—

At the beginning of another year's meetings, we respectfully request those women who are not already members to consider the objects of our association.

We are banded together for the reclamation of drunkards, and the prevention of drunkenness.

The drinking customs of society, and the great number of dram shops in town, render the first exceedingly difficult; and we are convinced that moderate drinking is the source of drunkenness, and the chief support of our 203 dram shops.

For the last few years, the average yearly expenditure on strong drink by every man, woman, and child in the United Kingdom was over £4. Taking the population of Paisley at 50,000, our drink bill amounted annually to over £200,000. We ask you carefully to consider what return we get for this enormous outlay.

Strong drink is the cause of one fourth of our lunacy, three-fourths of our pauperism, and three-fourths of our crime. It enormously increases our taxation, destroys a large portion of our food, sends 60,000 of the population of Great Britain annually into drunkards' premature graves, besides indirectly causing the death of at least as many more.

It is quite plain, therefore, that the sale of an article which can thus so materially decrease the national welfare ought to be prohibited. In fighting this battle, we know we are on the side of right, and right must ultimately prevail; but the very sad struggle may be greatly shortened if women would, from motives of humanity, give up and protest against the use of an article which, although sanctioned by custom, causes more distress and ruin than all other causes put together.

If you saw a person in the water struggling for life, and one on shore with a life buoy in his hand, but refusing to throw it to the drowning man, what would you think of the man so acting? Total abstinence is a life buoy which will preserve from drunkenness—the only one that can restore the drunkard, and, in the interests of humanity, we entreat you to use it.

If you are a mother, surrounded by a rising family, and if you use or offer the fatal cup at the social board, your example may prove a stumbling-block to some of your offspring; and if such should unfortunately be the case, would not your heart be wrung with an agony of bitterness to think that you helped on such a sad catastrophe? If a sister, and in any way countenancing the so-called social glass of your brother, and if he should fall into habits of dissipation (as is too often the case), would you be able to account yourself blameless? In either case, complicity, and consequent responsibility, can only be escaped by setting the safe example of abstinence; for, if in any degree drinking is countenanced, to that extent one is inevitably responsible for the consequences.

We earnestly request you to observe that the very highest scientific and medical authorities now declare, that the habitual use of alcohol, in the very smallest quantities, deteriorates the constitution, by lowering the temperature of the body, increasing nervous sensibility, putting an extra strain on the heart, and paralyzing muscular action.

It is a law of nature that fermentation renders substances unfit for human food or drink; and long and sad experience teaches that grain and grapes are no exception to this law. Alcohol is a product of fermentation, which the highest scientific authority declares to be as potent for evil as powerless for good.

It is a very lamentable fact that intemperance is spreading rapidly amongst women in all grades of society, but, thank God, many of the best and noblest women in the land are now espousing our cause; yet we hail with joy the accession to our ranks of the most humble, for it is amongst them that the ravages of drink prove most disastrous. Picture to yourself that vast and unending procession of 60,000 drink-stricken human beings, staggering into drunkards' graves, and dragging down with them, through a miserable existence into untimely graves, another 60,000 innocent victims (mostly women and children), giving a daily mortality of 328.

We often get for answer, "I'm almost an abstainer—the little I take is neither here nor there." An "almost" position is a very unsatisfactory one on any question of vital importance. But if "almost," why not "altogether"?

In view of such a terrible state of matters, will you consider long whether to stand nobly in the breach, endeavouring to save some, or stand looking on—nay, fighting against us; for, whatever sophists say to the contrary, in the war between good and evil there can be no neutral party. It is now as of old, "He that is not for us is against us."

To you, as Christians, we make a special appeal, because love and self-denial were Christ's motive powers. As He went about continually doing good, His followers ought to remove every obstacle in the way of good. As He proclaimed peace on earth, Christians ought to give no countenance or quarter to this great destroyer of peace. He inculcated brotherly love; and this substance, against which war ought unceasingly to be waged, sets brother against brother, father against son, and husband against wife, thus breaking up or destroying the peace of innumerable homes. Christianity enjoins us to clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and set the captive free; while the drink-demon clothes in rags, deprives of food, and binds his victims, soul and body, in almost hopeless slavery.

Will you not therefore come and join us? The enemy is strong and determined, and we will need all the assistance we can get to help us to sweep away this, the greatest hindrance to the progress of civilization and Christianity. "If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; If thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not; doth not He that pondereth the heart consider it, and He that keepeth thy soul, doth not He know it, and shall not He render to every man according to his works?"

Signed on behalf of the association—Mrs. S. Clark, Kilnside, Hon. President; Mrs. Arthur, Barshaw, Hon. Vice-President; Mrs. Dalziel, Wester Carriagehill, President; Mrs. M'Callum, South Park, Secretary.

OUR DAILY LIFE.

From morn till night, from night till morn,

Our daily life proceeds;

And from the day when we were born,

Till life's fond ties are rudely torn,

The daily burden must be borne,

Of all our mortal needs.

In daylight fair, or darksome night,

We toil by turns, and rest;

And though we love the glorious light,

That makes the summer noon so bright,

The shade brings off a cool delight,

For light and shade are best.

In daily life we are aware

Of oft-recurring changes;

The lightsome heart, the load of care,

Of each we get a mingled share,

And sometimes even dark despair

Our joys awhile estranges.

A chequered scene, like changeful day,

On which the night descends,

Our life, or sorrowful or gay,

Will for a time some force display,

But at the last, against decay

It hopelessly contends.

Our daily duties should be done

With hearts resolved and brave;

For needless weakness is a sin

To him who has the race to run,

Some manful triumphs yet to win,

This side the silent grave.

LODA.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, JANUARY, 1881.

A Happy New Year to all our readers, and many returns. They may have, during the year on whose threshold we now stand, all conceivable happiness, and yet they will be far from exhausting what is contained in our wishes for their happiness. Looking back to the "Year that's awa'," we cannot but have a heartfelt sense of satisfaction at the retrospect. All the striving on platforms, on deputations, canvassing, tract-giving, and interviewing, which we were told was beating the air, or at least working mischief, substantial and widely-spread, has been justified by the fact that, not only have we a majority of supporters in Parliament representing Scottish constituencies, but a majority of the parliamentary representation of Scotland—a Permissive Bill majority, forty out of sixty being in our favour—a vote of eight to one when the Scottish opposition is taken into account. That one fact sums up the arduous labours of years, and justifies all the efforts that have culminated in the gratifying result. The victory of June has ripened the agitation to an inconceivable degree. There is nothing that succeeds like success. The movement that has shown itself powerful enough to compel the support of the imperial legislature, will not long want the homage of society. Turning to the future, what do we see? A great success if the energy which has brought us to our present advanced position continues to exhibit itself as powerfully, or more so, than it has done in the past. The danger that lies before us is the eagerness with which some may spring forward to meet the legislature half-way. In compromise lies our danger. Acquiescing, with the best grace we can command, in what the Government of the day may offer, let us maintain an unquenchable determination to secure the suppressive veto. Let us give the friends of the measure who maintain our cause in parliament our unwavering support, and show to those that are ready to halt that we cannot be trifled with, and victory, later or sooner, more or less complete, will crown our labours. Upon us rests the responsibility of sweeping the liquor traffic from our beloved land. If we waver, none others will stand firm; if we are undaunted and persistent, our attitude will infuse a courage in our representatives that will nerve them to grant us the power which the traffic will totter and finally fall. Let us be... realize our responsibility—let us strenuously use all our strength to compass the end we have in view, and herewith to so shall be our strength. Thus resolved, thus energetic in the dawning year, we shall abundantly realize ere it expires. A happy New Year, then, to all our readers!

The Rev. H. H. Pereira, M.A., Southampton, will be in Scotland about the end of the present month, and will probably address seven meetings as the representative of the United Kingdom Alliance. We ventured to give our opinion of his abilities in our December issue. We have great pleasure in directing our readers to our news column, where they will find a notice of him from the Southern Reformer. He will secure esteem for his character and admiration for his abilities during his sojourn in Scotland.

Mr. John Paton has had a month's excellent lecturing, and has received very favourable notice from the press. The Airdrie Advertiser considers him in the sublimity of his conceptions and his phrasing more a prose poet than a lecturer, and the friends in Dollar who heard him lecture on the Covenant times and also Professor Blackie lecture on the Covenanters, vastly preferred the temperance advocate to the learned professor. Mr. Paton is now in the North of England, whose people have learned to eagerly appreciate his labours. We hope soon to hear of his return to Scotland.

Mr. J. W. Manning, of Ontario, Canada, who is now paying a brief visit to this country will visit Scotland for a week—31st January to 4th February inclusive. We are confident that Mr. Manning will receive a most cordial reception from the friends in the places he will visit. Our friends should see that those distrustful of, or indifferent to, the objects of our agitation, be cordially invited to be present at his meetings. It is not so much ourselves as our neighbours still unenlightened that should hear Mr. Manning; and the duty of our friends is to exhaust every means of bringing such people face to face with him. They will have a proud satisfaction in the result.

One must not condemn "Boycotting" entirely, lest they condemn what may be a most powerful means against sources of evil, if applied justly and on sufficient grounds. We do not sympathise with "Irish boycotting"—intimidating or tabooing people—because it is simply an instrument of tyranny that will yet return to plague the inventors. What will our readers have to say to American "boycotting," of which the following is a recent instance? A man at Buttersville, Indiana, got a license, and opened a saloon. The people there thereupon resolved not to have anything to do with him. They would buy nothing from him, they would sell him nothing, nor notice him in the street; when he went into a store the question was put, "Can the man that sells whisky sell you any goods?" He could not get mails at the post office for any one but himself without a written order. We are prepared to hear, looking at his calling and his company, that "he cursed, and swore, and raved, but only cut off his own nose, and soon closed his saloon, and went into something better than that of making drunkards, and is now a good citizen." Another fellow, equally resolute, opened a saloon, but he was served similarly, and had to quit. As thus applied, what true temperance reformer could condemn "boycotting"? For our part, we should not be sad were it applied to the 14,000 Scotch publicans to-morrow.

The annual report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will be in the hands of the members of that Association before this magazine reaches our readers. It shows that even in a time of depression the Association continues to hold its own and more, so far as its membership is concerned, there being a considerable accession of subscribers. That its funds have not such cheering accounts to offer is due to the fact that "hard times" still continue to press upon the intelligent and thoughtful supporters of the Association. The expenses connected with the electoral canvas, the general election, and with deputations to the leading centres and to Parliament, will sufficiently account for the fact that but for its extraordinary income this year the Association would have been in all probability in debt. Now that trade is undoubtedly reviving, the usual generous support to the funds of the Association may be confidently looked for. No one looking carefully over the report now issued can fail to be impressed by the persistent efforts being made by the agencies of the Association to enlighten the people on the necessity of possessing legal power to suppress the liquor traffic, should such a step be in their judgment demanded in the interests of themselves and those dependent upon them. We heartily commend the annual report to the attentive perusal and careful consideration of all who receive it, and we appeal to them to meet the claims of the Association upon their sympathy and liberality in the spirit of earnest minded, generous hearted, moral and social reformers.

During the past month a number of Scottish parliamentary representatives have addressed their constituents—Right Honourable W. E. Baxter, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Sir John D. Hay, Col. Alexander, Captain Maxwell, and Messrs. G. O. Trevelyan, J. C. Bolton, C. Dalrymple, R. W. Cochran-Patrick, S. Williamson, D. M'Laren, J. Cowan, M. E. Grant Duff, C. Fraser-M'Intosh, and Henry Campbell-Bannerman. The condition of Ireland absorbed the chief portion of their addresses, though Mr. M'Laren and Mr. Grant Duff gave most excellent summaries of the parliamentary session. The question of Local Option received attention from Mr. Baxter, who told "the advocates of farther restriction and representative action that they need not be impatient. They would win the game." Mr. Cochran-Patrick, said that "he took up the position during the election that an abstract resolution was not the way to deal practically with a subject of that kind. Mr. Gladstone had taken up the same position and had voted against the bill." The honourable member is right and wrong. Mr. Gladstone did disapprove of Sir W. Lawson's resolution, on the ground that it was abstract and that he never voted for such, but on the division of the 18th June he, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, voted for supply with regret as against the resolution, and was the only Liberal representing Scotland that did so. We have hope of Mr. Cochran-Patrick, for as he has defended his vote against the resolution by quoting the action of Mr. Gladstone, he will not surely shrink from following that gentleman in voting for the bill with a veto he has promised to introduce during the present parliament? Mr. S. Williamson who said, "He had supported most heartily the resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson in favour of Local Option, in the carrying of which by an unlooked for majority there was evidence alike of the earnestness of the House of Commons in dealing with such a social question, and of the power of the constituencies in imposing their will upon their representatives. He hoped the Government ere long would formulate some adequate measure dealing with the liquor traffic so as to carry out the resolution. He trusted that the friends of temperance would not be discouraged if for a little while legislative action arising out of the resolution were delayed." Mr. Fraser-M'Intosh—in reply to a question—said, "He had always voted for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's bill. He added that he did what he could to keep down the drink traffic about him, for in the few charters on the Drummond and Ballifeary estates there was a prohibition against having a public-house. (Applause.) That being the case it would be inconsistent in him if he did not vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution." Mr. M'Laren, in his eagerness to support the Government, seemed to look with approval on the beer tax as a means of meeting any State emergency—the nation by drinking beer heavily charged with duty could drink itself out of a difficulty. Mr. Cowan saw in the abolition of the malt tax the way clear for the farmers entering more deeply into the cultivation of malt. Our readers will believe with us that these utterances on Local Option are on the whole satisfactory, Mr. Cochran-Patrick's being the only exception; the remarks of the members for Edinburgh were not those of reformers but statesmen. The electors will no doubt treasure up the references to the question of Local Option made during the recess by their members, and be prepared at the proper time to firmly press their wishes for a suppressive veto upon the attention of their representatives.

Good Words for December has an article on Women's Collegiate Life in America. The author of the paper—a lady—begins by saying that "A young country is eminently the place in which women may put forth their best powers;" and pointing to the advanced position of women in America as help-meets to their mates, and as a social force, says, "What they positively effect to these ends is surprising. No English lady can refuse to bear witness to the moral aspect of American society as compared with England's state at this time. If only one remarkable feature be noticed, which is prominent all over the land as the influence of woman, it would be enough to crown the fair sex in that country with the greatest earthly honour. They have banished by their all powerful effort the presence of drink from their tables, and so far have stigmatized drunkenness as abhorrent to them. Hospitality, "without the drink," is the honoured grace of the New World; and this is due to the work of women—not fanatic, superstitious, and unreasonable, but calm, scientific, pious women, resolute in their aim and their action to avoid that which is dangerous to their families, the preservation of which is their special duty." This is truly emphatic testimony in favour of culture for women. What these noble women have done in the New World, British women might be safely expected to do in the "Old Country." And when law assails the public institutions that dispense the poisonous juice in our streets, and women, pious and earnest, sweep it from the hearth and the sanctuary, truly Britain will be in the prosperity of its institutions—in the character of its inhabitants, and the purity of its religious ordinances what Malachi calls a delightful land.

We have often had occasion to deplore the action of ministers generally on what concerns the liquor traffic. With a few brilliant exceptions ministers never seem to think that that traffic at all concerns the welfare of their flocks. They deal gently, too gently, with the erring through strong drink, and often don't deal at all with the tempter. They work alongside some of their office-bearers without remonstrance or discrimination, although they know that among them, side by side by the God-fearing, stands the devil-serving. The brewer, the distiller, and the publican, is in their eyes as good as the school-master, the baker, and the builder. Vile men are not despised by them even although they are specially vile through vending alluring poisonous drugs. They will sign certificates to enable eager aspirants to the publican caste to live an easy and luxurious life by preying upon their fellow-creatures. They will hold public-house property, or if not possessed of any themselves, will sign a requisition to the licensing courts for the licensing of some premises where worse than murders are committed—the ruin and perdition of immortal souls. These men—we dare not call them shepherds—are the hirelings that flee and leave their flocks to be driven away from the quiet waters and the green pastures of the Lord. And the languishing church membership, the abounding ungodliness, and the fearful backsliding speak trumpet tongued against their faithlessness. Their flocks follow them, deceived by their specious hypocrisy on this matter, and like them call good evil and evil good, and so the land mourneth. The churches are not yet on the side of the temperance reformation. Perhaps some of the faithless who may read these words may see themselves better in a foreign mirror. The Portsmouth Weekly, Massachusetts, thus writes on the election of a liquor license governor for that State—"Where were the churches? Where they generally are—on the side of rum and victory. E. Stone was elected over Dr. Irving, a true friend of temperance. Stone declares that rum-selling is as honourable as any business. He has a reputation as a free rum advocate. The Christian churches cannot plead ignorance—they knew, or ought to have known, all about him; but they have shown a contemptible indifference to the temperance cause, because they prefer our party. Behold the 6th district, with its 28 towns, containing 300 churches, more or less, marching up to the polls—clergy, laity, pulpit, and pews—to vote for a man who declares 'the liquor traffic is honourable as any business,' not even excepting the minister or the schoolmaster. Ghosts of the Pilgrim Fathers, how can ye rest in your graves whilst such infernal heresies are thriving in the old Bay State? Yet these ministers and flocks will from now until another election day returns preach long and pray loud for temperance, and then at 'the party call' will do the same as they have just done, and then will have audacity enough to ask the Lord to let his kingdom come. Where? In a rum-shop, we suppose; for if we judge them by their fruits our churches are mighty little better. Shame, shame, shame on such Christianity." We commend these passionate words to every one, whether minister or member, that votes for party to the detriment of temperance, and to the upholding of the liquor traffic.

Our thoughtful readers will naturally turn to the special report of the visit paid to the Lord Advocate last month by the United Executives—League, Prohibitionists, and Templars—to learn the nature of the representation to his lordship which was made by the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. We confidently look for their approval of the sentiments in that statement. It is eminently worthy in our opinion of the Association, and it will go far to satisfy most of the supporters of the Association. We are sorry that we cannot say all, but the leader in The Christian News, immediately after the interview, renders our doing so impossible. The criticism of the writer is, so far as the Association in question is concerned, grossly unfair. The opening sentences are brimful of sneers at the preliminary meeting of these Executives, and a very lame attempt is made to turn an old saw to a bad use with, we delight to say, very indifferent success. We feel a grim pleasure at the forced admission that the communings so contemned had not been so very insignificant as the progeny of the proverbial mountain. The writer blunders on the last four points of the programme when he gives such prominence to its licensing items by calling them its major portion. The suppressive veto was not merely the major, it was the vital point, the pivot upon which the whole negotiations turned. It had the first place assigned it on the programme, just because it was supremely important, and it is on it that the foundations of harmonious co-operation are laid. It says much indeed for the agitation which the Association had led so energetically that the three organizations have come to see eye to eye on this matter; and it says as little for the writer that he has magnified the importance of the licensing clauses that he might gratify a censorious disposition. Is the position of the Scottish prohibitory movement changed one whit for the worse because the leading organizations have agreed upon this programme? We say nay. It is surely better that these Associations should have at last been found united upon a full, pure, radical veto than that one should be prosecuting an agitation in its favour, and the others going for something else or different. The writer calls upon his readers to look at this demand, first asking them however to leave out of view "the reference to the veto power which was general and vague." We refer our readers to the full text of the statement read by Bailie Torrens, and having done so, we decline to accept any conclusion founded on the consideration of the programme with the first point left out. As well attempt the criticism of Shakespeare's play of Hamlet without referring to the Prince of Denmark. Judged as a whole the programme will merit, and we believe will receive the approval of all right thinking men. The Government may or may not introduce a licensing measure during the coming session; but should the suppressive veto be embodied in that measure we opine that very few friends of the cause will waste much consideration on its amendment clauses. The power they seek is there, and they will use every means to keep it there until it is inscribed on the statute book of the kingdom. The writer attempts historical criticism with no better success. He says, "After fifty years of agitation, and the deliverance of the House of Commons last session on local option, it is asked to pass laws to regulate." No! he has become the victim of his own omission of the veto, for the United Executives pressed on the Lord Advocate these points;—power to suppress all, power to suppress any, and power to amend the present law. Why should we feel indignant at publican criticism, often blinded as it is by vested interest, when we find a Christian newspaper, the organ of a denomination which has so earnestly contended for the faith once delivered to the saints, indulging in writing of this sort, and being guilty of such calumny? If it were true that the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association was asking merely for license, then it would be true that it was being managed by traitors or incapables. They must be either the one or the other; but no man besides the writer would be so insane as to make, let alone substantiate, such a charge. These organizations went together to his lordship—and this is the great hope for Scotland—they went and asked for suppression as well as amendment. Instead of feeling humiliated and ashamed at the points urged upon his lordship, the writer ought to feel humiliated and ashamed at his own ungenerous criticism. Having, as he believes no doubt, shown that the suppressive veto was no part of the representation to the Lord Advocate, he sets himself to show what should be done. He says the Government requires to have the veto pressed upon its attention. "There is nothing worth fighting for compared to relegating the whole matter to the ratepayers." Precisely so, and hence every friend desirous of such relegation will be glad to find the entire temperance movement in Scotland making common cause in demanding that power. We heartily agree with the after portion of his letter, which is in harmony with the grand old traditions of the Christian News. The position of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association in the agitation remains unchanged. It has made no retrograde step, and we feel confident it never will. It has secured the advance of the League, and the adherence of the Good Templars to its policy, and it hails their co-operation as an augury of not distant success. The position of the Association is that of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who clings tenaciously to his veto, and yet opposes no one: goes in for "the Bill, the whole Bill, and for everything tending in the direction of the Bill." Whatever legislation the Government is pleased to enact, shall not, if not reactionary, have the opposition of the Association. If such legislation embodies the whole veto, it shall have its most energetic support. And we are very much in error if our views on this matter are not shared by all but a very few friends of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement.

* * * We have been obliged to leave over our story, "The Wanderer," concluding article on "Food and Feeding," and other matter in type; but we hope to overtake arrears next issue.

With the present number we present all readers, as our usual New-Year supplement, a copy of our New-Year Tract for 1881, by Rev. Dr. Bonar, Edinburgh. We will be glad of orders for quantities of this tract, which has been highly appreciated. Price 10s. per 1000, carriage not paid; 1s. per 100, 1s. 5d. per post.

DREADFUL.—Mrs. M'Manus entered a low drinking saloon in Pennsylvania to look after her husband. Frank Carrol deliberately shot her.

INTELLIGENCE.

DEPUTATION TO THE LORD ADVOCATE.

Specially Reported for the Social Reformer.

On Thursday, 2nd ult., a deputation representing the Scottish Temperance League, the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and the Independent Order of Good Templars, waited by appointment on his lordship in his chambers, Parliament House, Edinburgh. Among those present we observed the Revs. Dr. Adamson, J. B. Johnstone, J. Wemyes, M'Donald, Loanhead; Jas. Johnston, Kay, Rose, Barr, Kirk, junr.; G. Gladstone and M. M'Intosh; D. A. MacFie, Esq.; Messrs. J. Hogarth, Kirkcaldy; Williams, Wishaw; Colville, Adair, Tait, D. Grieg, M'Laggan, H. Drummond, Coult, S.S.C.; Sutherland, Steel, Nisbet, Fuller, J. Lamond, J. Pirret, D. Pirret, T. Temple, Archer, Salmond, Gray, Smith, Keppie, Telfer, Miller, Cranston, jun.; Dr. Brodie, D. Anderson, Butters, J. W. Paterson, S.S.C.; Semple, J. Johnstone, Langbank; Bailie Torrens, J.P.; Councillor Johnstone, Dumfries; Messrs. Winning, Paisley; Wm. Johnston, R. Mackay, J. H. Waterston, W. W. Turnbull, and others. His lordship's secretary, Mr. D. Crawford, was also present.

The Rev. J. A. Johnston, G.W.C.T., I.O.G.T. of Scotland, as representing the Scottish Temperance League, first addressed his lordship. He said "That the legislation they had united to secure was not merely in accordance with their own views, but such as would in their opinion be sustained by the general opinion of the country. They were quite aware that on this subject legislation could not go beyond public opinion, and hence all they asked was that the views and wishes prevailing among all classes, and throughout the whole of Scotland, be embodied in law. They thought that there were obvious reasons why Scotland should have a distinctive measure of its own, the most weighty being that the public sentiment in Scotland in relation to the drink traffic was very far in advance of what it was either south of the Tweed or across the Irish Channel. It was understood that they were not opposed, while submitting the points they had agreed on, to other alterations and amendments of the existing laws, provided these in no instance relaxed any of the legal restrictions at present placed upon the traffic in intoxicating drinks." He then unfolded the points in detail upon which the United Executives were agreed.

Ex-Bailie Torrens then read the following statement: My Lord, the Association I have the honour to represent on this occasion is the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. It was instituted in 1858 to co-operate with the United Kingdom Alliance, formed in 1853, with its headquarters in Manchester, for the purpose of procuring the total suppression of the liquor traffic, with special reference, as its title indicates, to the enactment of a Permissive Bill, conferring upon the ratepayers in burghs, parishes, or other districts, the power to prohibit the traffic within their respective boundaries. The Association is based on the principle that the traffic in intoxicating liquor is essentially mischievous. Under no system of restriction can it be satisfactorily regulated, and that as the evils and burdens constantly and universally flowing from it are not confined to one class, but injuriously affect all classes, it is just and reasonable that the whole body of ratepayers should, by having direct and potent voice in the matter, be enabled to protect themselves against the continuance of such a traffic in their midst. The movement, though resting substantially on a temperance basis, is specially a political one. In this respect it is distinguished from that conducted by the Scottish Temperance League, the Independent Order of Good Templars, and other temperance organizations. Working in fullest harmony with them, this Association has addressed itself chiefly to the task of bringing about a change in the laws affecting the liquor traffic. This it has sought to do by educating the public sentiment of the country on the question by the widespread and constant diffusion of literature, by public meetings of every description, and by organising in every constituency electors favourable to the objects of the Association. In addition to this, large numbers of petitions have been presented to the House of Commons, and memorials and other communications have been addressed to hon. members. The progress of the movement is matter of history. Year by year large bodies of the intelligent working men, as well as no inconsiderable section of other classes, have in various forms expressed their cordial approval of the principles of the Association, and have given practical evidence of their convictions. Indeed it is not too much to say that there is no public question at the present moment, either of a social or political kind, that excites equal interest in the country, presenting as it does strong claims on the hearty support of all moral, social, and political reformers, irrespective of party either in Church or State. The principle of total suppression is involved in that of restriction. If the State may interfere at all with the traffic in intoxicating drink, it can only do so on the ground that the public good demands it, and to that consideration everything else, including all private interests, must give way. What then is to determine the limits of such interference? Clearly the public good; and who are most competent and best entitled to determine this point but the whole body of the ratepayers and electors of the country. On any other principle than this, political liberty would be a delusion, and representative government a misnomer. Through the action of landowners, and from other causes, there are upwards of one hundred parishes in Scotland without a single public house. These parishes are exceptionally free from drunkenness and the evils flowing from it. The population not only contrive to live, but to get along contentedly and prosperously, and no one seriously challenges either the competency of the action, or the highly beneficial results, although the popular voice has not been consulted in the matter. If such a state of matters may obtain throughout the country, on what principle can it be seriously maintained that the inhabitants of a parish or district should not be vested with an effective veto power, to be put into operation as soon as they may be prepared to do so. It is perhaps right to state that this Association hails with satisfaction every step taken in the direction of its own special aims, either in or out of Parliament. It believes that its principles are sound and defensible, and it urges its supporters to give immediate and earnest effect to them at the polling booth and in every other constitutional way. It has no idea of success other than what will be secured through the formation of a strong and intelligent public sentiment, acting first on the legislature in order to obtain the passing of the law, and thereafter in each district, to secure its adoption by the people. The leaders of the movement are of opinion that there is a much more general preparedness on the part of the country for the adoption of a local option measure than many are aware of. No legislation on the drink traffic, for Scotland at least, will meet with much favour or support that does not fully recognise direct and thorough control by the ratepayers. "Supreme confidence in the people" is the fundamental principle of local option, as it is of numerous kindred measures that have from time to time been placed on the statute book. Never in the history of the country has a more favourable opportunity presented itself, whether as regards both the House of Commons and the Government, for giving practical effect to the principles for which this part of the kingdom has long been distinguished than the present, and if in any forthcoming liquor legislation the Government will undertake to grapple effectually with the whole subject, they will be cordially supported by the country. As an indication of the progress of the movement in the country and in Parliament, it may be stated that on seven different occasions a majority of the Scotch members of Parliament have supported Sir Wilfrid Lawson. On four of these occasions, namely, 1870, 1871, 1876, and 1878, the support was given to the second reading of the Permissive Bill, and on the last three occasions, namely, 1879, and twice in the present year, the support was given to the Local Option resolution—the Scotch vote on the last division being for the resolution, including pairs, 43; against it, 5.

Rev. Mr. GLADSTONE, Glasgow, spoke on behalf of the Independent Order of Good Templars, which, he said, happened to be the largest association, and had a very large network of agencies for work throughout the country. He, too, advocated the question of giving a power to the ratepayers to veto the liquor traffic, pleading this right specially in the interests of the poorer classes of the population, who must congregate in the centres where public-houses were set down in the greatest abundance. Uneducated as many of them were, the resisting power was of course at the minimum, while the power of temptation was really at the maximum, and they claimed, on the part of those who were the wronged people, the same right as was already secured by richer people of keeping public-houses away from their doors. They looked with eager anticipations, he concluded, for the legislation which was hinted at, and even promised, by responsible members of the Government. They were very anxious that they might be able to help the Government to pass such a measure as might be for the good of the country, and they were very anxious that the Government proposals should be on the lines that would secure hearty co-operation of all the associations represented, and many Christians behind were represented.

The LORD ADVOCATE said—I must begin by thanking the large number of gentlemen who have done me the honour to come here, and show by their presence their interest in this as a public question, and their confidence in the Government, which I have the honour to represent here, as desirous of fairly considering and dealing with their views. Now, gentlemen, I quite assent, of course, to many of the general propositions that have been stated with regard to this subject. I agree with Bailie Torrens that there is no question that may more properly claim the attention of the political, social, and moral reformers at the present time, and I hold also with Mr. Johnston—who introduced the subject to my notice, that after so many years have elapsed since the passing of the last Act for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, Lord Mure's Act, which I think is now more than eighteen years old—that the question may fairly be brought under the review of the Executive, with the view to improvement either in principle or in the various matters of detail which are mentioned in this paper. Of course, it would be impossible for me to indicate more than very generally the views which might possibly be taken of this question by the Government; indeed, I am not any further in possession of these views than you are, although I have certain views of my own regarding the mode of dealing with this question in Scotland, which I should be glad on another occasion to state more fully. I am generally in favour of the principle that has been referred to as "home rule" in dealing with matters of Scottish legislation—(applause)—because there is such a difference, not only in our institutions, but I think also in the degree of progress that has been made in the formation of public opinion between Scotland and England, that we may very often, with great advantage to the public, introduce reforms which the citizens of England, and even the Liberal portion of them, are by no means yet fully decided upon. At the same time, you will see that whenever a question affects the whole United Kingdom, and affects it in the same way, and is supported by large bodies of reformers in both countries, that though you may have separate legislation for the three countries, it is extremely desirable that these measures should be brought in together, and dealt with at the same time as part of one comprehensive scheme. I should, perhaps, not be inclined to go so far with one of my friends who spoke, as to say that the best mode of dealing with the subject would be to begin with a measure for Scotland in anticipation of a more general measure for the whole United Kingdom. I should rather look forward as to the best means of ensuring success, that this subject should be considered with reference to the whole kingdom, but having regard to the local differences that have been recognised by custom and public opinion. Now, when we come to the large subject of a general revision of the licensing system, I think that every Government must take into account the very decided expression of opinion that has been given by the House of Commons on more than one occasion, and especially by the decisive vote of last session in favour of adopting a representative licensing authority in place of what I may call the judicial system under which the regulation of licenses is left in the hands of the justices of the peace. Well, that is undoubtedly the conclusion which the majority of the House of Commons has come to after a great deal of reflection and discussion. And I confess, as an adherent of the popular or representative principle of government, I can see no answer to the claim that the representative principle in our great centres of population ought to be applied and carried out in any future measure dealing with this subject. It has been said that it is undesirable that the licensing authority should be a board that has charge of other matters. That, I confess, is a point that I have not formed an opinion upon, although it is plain enough that a board charged with many different matters, occupying all the leisure that its members are likely to have for public affairs, may be apt to neglect, or at least to give less than its fair share of its attention to, what they might look upon as very much a matter of routine compared with their duties on county matters, which call for the exercise of a good deal of care and attention. It is therefore a very important matter for consideration, whether the boards should be merely licensing boards, or should be separate boards, or whether they should be committees or branches of a board possessing some general powers. It occurs to me, speaking only for myself, and very much from the impression of the moment, that perhaps a mean between the two views might work not unsatisfactorily—I mean that you might have a board elected by a large area, such as a county divided into committees, which would superintend the licensing system in their different parishes, and having a large constituency, there would be a check upon any extreme views that might be held in particular localities either in favour of the entire suppression of drinking, on the one hand, or the granting of indiscriminate licences on the other, which we know is a view that has found many influential supporters. On this subject, however, I do not think it would be right in me to express any opinion as to the precise mode of giving effect to the principle until the matter has been more fully considered by the Government, whose views I may be called upon to assist in carrying out. With regard to some of the other points which you brought under my notice, I should be very glad, apart from any larger measure, to be instrumental in carrying them out—(applause)—and, in particular, I think that the subject of the sale of liquor on Sunday is one that might probably be dealt with without the risk of promoting any opposition during the ensuing session if it were found that the whole question could not, in consequence of demands upon the public time, be then dealt with. With regard to river steamers, also, I may say that a bill was prepared in my office last summer, which we had hoped to introduce, to enable the Excise authorities to regulate that traffic on the same lines as the traffic on land is regulated under the existing Act—that is, prohibiting the traffic on Sunday, and giving to the Excise power to withdraw the certificate on complaint followed by conviction. I am sorry to say it was impossible from want of time to proceed with that measure, but I hope it may be introduced in conjunction with some of these other reforms. With regard to the subject of special licences, I was not aware that inconvenience was found to result from them. These, I think, are the main points to which you have referred. I need not say I will take care to represent to the head of the Government the views which you have been good enough to impress upon me, and to invite the attention of the Government to it with the view to legislation. As you know, the Government are at present considering the measures of the ensuing session, and it is generally understood that those which relate to Ireland will occupy the best, and therefore a considerable part of the session. Therefore,

I should not like to hold out any rash promises as to immediate legislation. All I can do is to take care that your views are fully considered, and that the Government should be made aware that a general desire does exist in the northern part of the island for the improvement of our licensing system. I shall only say, while I myself have never been in favour of the suppression of the liquor traffic, I should be extremely pleased if it were in my power to deal with the subject on the basis of regulation, and to endeavour to make laws more effective for that object which we, and I think every right-thinking person in the community, must have at heart—the promotion of temperance and good order, and the diminution of crime and disorder, which has been so clearly proved to flow in most cases from the abuse of the means of supplying drink to the poor. (Applause.)

Mr. J. JOHNSTON of Langbank having thanked his lordship for granting them an interview, the deputation retired.

The following statement was furnished to his lordship as to the points which the directors of the Scottish Temperance League, and the executives of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and the Grand Lodge of Scotland of the Independent Order of Good Templars, consider to be essential in any legislation affecting the sale of intoxicating liquors in Scotland:—(1) That power be given to the householders of any burgh, parish, or other district, to veto therein all the licences for the common sale of intoxicating drinks; (2) that power be given to the householders of any burgh, parish, or other district, to veto therein any of the licences for the common sale of intoxicating drinks; (3) that all licensed houses be closed at 8 p.m.; (4) that hotels be prohibited from selling intoxicating drink on Sabbath to so-called bona-fide travellers; (5) that powers to grant special licences be abolished; and (6) that no place of amusement, recreation, or instruction, nor any river or short passage steamboat, be licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks.

LOCAL OPTION.

On Monday, 6th ult., a public meeting was held in the Court House, Maxwelltown, to hear addresses on the subject of local option from Mr. R. Mackay, secretary, and Mr. R. Stevenson, lecturer to the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. The audience was small, but the speaking was good, and interest was sustained from first to last.

Dr. McCulloch presided, and explained the object of the meeting in the course of a few characteristically terse remarks. His translation of the term "local option" was simply the Permissive Bill. The one was the other under a different name. (Applause.) They had to ask themselves whether it was right that a set of justices of the peace or a set of magistrates should have the power to thrust the liquor traffic upon a parish or a burgh against the will of the ratepayers? His reply was emphatically that it was not right, and it was not reasonable. (Applause.) A bill that would embody the principle of local option must give to the ratepayers themselves this power—to the people, that is, who pay the poor-rates, the police-rates, the lunacy-rates, all of which were in great part occasioned by the liquor traffic. (Applause.) There was a very curious but well-authenticated fact that he would ask them to take into consideration—namely, that not a single justice or magistrate was ever found to licence a public-house at his own door. (Applause.) Nor was this the whole of it. They would recollect that some years ago in Scotland a great number of toll-keepers and country blacksmiths were licensed to sell intoxicating liquors. But they were not now. The justices of the peace withdrew the certificates from them. Why? Because their servants had often to drive through the tolls, and they were too apt to stop and get drunk when doing so—risking their masters' property. When they went to the blacksmith's with the horse to be shod, it was ten times worse. (Laughter.) Now the question came to be, what right had any man to license or set up a public-house at another man's door when he would not allow it at his own? (Applause.) What right had he to license people, to seduce not only the sons and brothers and fathers, but the breadwinner of other folk, when he would not allow a licence if his own horse was to be put in danger? He would leave them to say whether the vested interest that was represented by a horse, or the vested interest that was represented by sons and daughters, husbands and wives, was the greater? (Applause.) It was this latter vested interest that a measure of local option would enable the community to protect. (Applause.)

Mr. STEVENSON then addressed the meeting, starting with the universal admission that drunkenness is an evil, and bringing his argument down, by cogent reasoning, illustrated and enforced by telling references to facts and figures, to the conclusion that the only effectual remedy for drunkenness is to prohibit the public traffic, and that the best way to effect this would be a measure of local option.

Mr. MACKAY followed with a vigorous and convincing speech in the same direction, dwelling more fully on the question of local option.

Several questions being put and answered, the Chairman moved a vote of thanks to the deputation, which, being seconded by Councillor Johnston, was heartily agreed to.

Both the speakers acknowledged the compliment. Mr. Stevenson expressed the pleasure he felt in having their old friend the Doctor with them, and a hope that he might be spared to witness the Parliamentary triumph of the cause he had so long, so consistently, and so powerfully advocated. Mr. Mackay gave expression to similar sentiments, adding that, from his position in the Permissive Bill Association, he knew that no man in Scotland had done more than the Doctor to make this cause prosper, and that to him was due the suggestion, which had been so successfully acted upon, of a house-to-house canvass, and a systematic dealing with members of Parliament. (Applause.) The meeting then dispersed.—Dunfries and Galloway Standard much abridged.

The following evening the deputation addressed a meeting in the Waterloo Place Church, Rev. Jas. Strachan's. There was a fair attendance. The pastor occupied the chair, and was supported by Dr. McCulloch and Rev. Mr. Tooley. The speakers were briefly but kindly introduced. Mr. R. Mackay took local option for his subject; Mr. R. Stevenson, the claims of prohibition; Dr. McCulloch, special voting, and Rev. Mr. Tooley, encouragements. The proceedings were most interesting, and hearty thanks were paid to the speakers.

At a meeting of the Edinburgh University Temperance Association, Dr. Young, Portobello, said that "medical men were unanimous in believing that alcohol was not required for health, and that it was not food."

A series of successful meetings in Aberdeen were addressed by Mrs. Blaikie and Miss Wigham, Edinburgh, a deputation from the Women's Temperance Association. Mr. W. Blackwood took part in one of the series.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC AND PARTY.—Yes, this accursed business destroys the maker, seller, and the drinker, and brings misery upon thousands of innocent women and children. But, when earnest souls propose to prohibit it, a whole host of "goody-goody" temperance men whisper: "Don't, don't, it will hurt our party!"—Signs of the Times.

One of the most hopeful features of women's temperance work is the formation in the States of seventy-six "Young Ladies' Temperance Unions." I said to a wealthy young lady the other night, "The time will come when young women will not marry young men who drink any intoxicants." "That time has come with many of us," was her reply. When that time comes with most young women, the use of beer, whisky, gin, brandy, and wines, will be beautifully small. Let there be a million of such unions.—Sarah K. Bolton.

Twenty soldiers signed the pledge last month in Aberdeen barracks in the presence of their colonel. They had a lecture on total abstinence by the Rev. J. Gregson.

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The Managing Committee of this organisation have unanimously resolved to issue a monthly organ in Gaelic and English, recording the operations of the League and Highland temperance news generally. It is to appear under the happy title of Fiery Cross, on the 1st of the current month.

KINGUSSIE.—Large and enthusiastic meetings were addressed here by ex-Bailie Ross, of the Highland Temperance League, on the 2nd and 3rd of December. Several members, including the two ministers,—Rev. Messrs. Mackenzie, E.C., and Dewar, F.C.—were added to the League.

In the town of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, with 4,000 inhabitants, where the Local Option Act has been enforced, there has been but four arrests for drunkenness the last six months, to thirty-three arrests for the same offence during six months of license. Local Option, not more faithfully enforced than other laws, never fails.

It is matter for unmingled satisfaction that twelve of the wretches concerned in the traffic in English girls in Brussels have at length met with condign punishment from the laggard authorities there. It is saddening to observe that strong drink greatly aided the callous brutes in their work by stupifying their hapless victims. Many more will have to be arrested, tried, and punished before we hear the last of this dreadful traffic.

WHAT WE WANT TO MAKE SCOTLAND.—Worth County in North-Western Missouri may safely claim the temperance belt. Ex-Governor Farwell, formerly of Wisconsin, now a resident of Grant City in Worth County, some time since instituted a series of temperance meetings, and as a result the taxes have been reduced one third. There are no saloons in the county; there is not one man in the county jail, nor is there one criminal in the State penitentiary in this county. The circuit judge, county judges, county and town officers, and every member of the last grand jury, are all strictly temperate. Every newspaper in the county, be it democratic or republican, is earnestly devoted to the temperance cause, and more than eight-tenths of the voters in the county are for temperance or total abstinence from intoxicating drinks.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

LEADHILLS—HEATHER BELL LODGE, I.O.G.T.—This lodge held a public meeting in the Lodge Hall, on Saturday, 4th ult., Bro. Robert M'Kendrick, W.C.T., presiding, who, in a few remarks introduced the speaker of the evening, Mr. R. Stevenson, agent of the S. P. B. Association, the first agent of the Association that has visited this upland village. He delivered an eloquent and practical address on "Happy Homes: how to get and how to keep them." The lecture was much enlivened by appropriate pieces, which were well rendered by Bros. J. Whitefield, J. Brown, and J. M'Donald. On the motion of the Chairman, Mr. Stevenson received a very cordial vote of thanks for his admirable lecture. A similar compliment having been paid the Chairman, the people separated. On Sabbath evening Mr. Stevenson preached an able temperance sermon to a crowded house. We believe he has left a good impression behind him, and will be welcomed back again. The lodge has emerged from its complicated difficulties, and is now in a flourishing condition.—G. P.

THE REV. H. H. PEREIRA, M.A.—The reverend gentleman whose portrait we (Southern Reformer) present to our readers to-day, is one of the most active, useful, and deservedly esteemed clergymen in the county of Hants. In addition to the usual duties of a minister of religion, Mr. Pereira is an able advocate of the cause of temperance, and helps it forward both by precept and example. He was born in the year 1845. His father was the late Dr. J. Pereira, who for many years resided in Jersey, and his uncle the celebrated physician of the same name, whose work on "Materia Medica" enjoys an European celebrity. He was educated at Victoria College, Jersey, and Trinity College, Dublin, at which University he graduated in first-class honours in 1869, having previously carried off prizes in Hebrew, modern languages, history and composition. He did not proceed to the degree of Master of Arts until 1878. He was ordained by the Archbishop of York just ten years ago, and began his clerical work among the teeming population of the Cleveland iron-stone district. The trying character of the work, and the severity of the climate, broke down his health, and compelled him to come to Southampton, bringing with him a very gratifying memento of his work amongst those rough toilers, in the form of a handsome testimonial with which they presented him on his leaving them. Whilst recruiting his health and strength, he undertook the sole charge of a parish near Stockbridge, where he remained a year, and again on leaving received a most pleasing testimonial from the humble villagers. He was then licensed to the Parish of Holy Trinity in this town, where he remained until appointed by the present Bishop of Winchester to the important post of First Warden of the newly-formed memorial mission to the late Bishop Wilberforce in South London, when he was again presented with a most handsome testimonial. The work which Mr. Pereira was called upon to carry on in London was of a very severe and anxious character, as he had practically four large parishes under his care and supervision, populated by something like 40,000 souls. A large staff of clergy and lay workers laboured under his directions. We believe during the year and a half he remained there Mr. Pereira preached in well nigh every church in South London. The very severe strain to which mind and body were subjected in this new and anxious work had its influence in inducing him to accept the living of St. Laurence in this town, when it was offered him by the then Lord Chancellor in 1876. Mr. Pereira was married to the eldest daughter of Colonel and the Hon. Mrs. Stretton, in 1874, by whom he has three children. Mr. Pereira has advocated the cause of temperance in nearly every large town in the South of England, as well as in the North, and also in Ireland and Scotland. His labours in this great social reform are beyond all praise, and have been crowned with great success. The parishioners of St. Laurence are fortunate in having such an excellent pastor to encourage them in the practice of all good works.—Southern Reformer, November 20.

IRELAND.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

MR. ERROR.—Having been in Ireland recently, with your permission I will give your readers my impression of that distracted and distracting portion of our common country.

Arriving in Belfast on the 2nd, I remained until the 20th, and addressed fourteen meetings under the auspices of the Irish Temperance League. My friends, between joke and earnest, were of opinion that, to avoid being shot, I would require to be most circumspect. Some of them affected concern about my appearance. I was so like a landlord, they said, that it was a tempting of Providence to expose my person to the sharp observation and keen vengeance of Irishmen in their present state of mind. But, if suspicious eyes did survey me, no responsive finger drew a trigger to injure me. I returned as hale and sound as I went.

My friends failed to realise that I was about to visit the part of Ireland which had been planted with Englishmen and Scotchmen over two hundred years ago.

In those days the forefathers of the people I moved among were enabled, by English statesmen, to exterminate the native Irish, or to so reduce their number that the residue became a feeble remnant, powerless to restrain the invaders from dividing the country among themselves. This transaction diffuses its effects to this day. The North, now the country of the Scotified and Englished Irish, is as unsympathetic with the South and its fierce Irish race, as were the Scotch and English who conquered it, and the anti-landlord movement is not permitted to enter from the South. The Northerners are loyal to England, with this divergence, that the progress of legislation should not disturb settlements which were made to secure to themselves social and political dominance. The northern people are, therefore, urgent for the suppression of the land movement, and every movement that would change the present state of things. And, wherever I went, the preponderance of feeling was in favour of direct and arbitrary action to suppress the Land League and convict its leaders. But, while I was thus related, and removed from the suspicious and rifles of the leaguers, now and again I came into contact with those of the pure northern stock, who did not denounce the southern land movement. While they are averse to the violence which emanates from it, they admit that it is a legitimate expression of opinion against a crushing injustice, which results in national impoverishment. These men deem, a peasant proprietary, honestly brought about, a direct approach to the solution of the chronic social and political difficulties. The resources of the country would thus be related to the people, to be developed for their own advantage. With its wealth to themselves, while enterprise and economy would be stimulated, the source of injustice would subside and cease to disturb them in the advancement of practical good. This is the hope entertained by the Liberal and enlightened few; but, in their opinion, this is not the whole remedy. Out of it, they believe, would arise the disposition and the means to emigrate. In the present state of things these are inadequate. It is only with wealth, and the culture which it gives, that men are disposed and enabled to go forth in the world, to still further improve their circumstances; and, while Ireland is almost exclusively agricultural, to maintain itself in moderate comfort it must continue to send forth a continual stream of emigration—a stream, too, that leaps, rushes, and laughingly sparkles on to its ocean of plenty—not a sluggish stagnant puddle that hankers to go on, and would rather return, to go back to its source. I was glad to find in the North this state of mind, for it will become diffused. I accept it as a guarantee of union with the South, to develop the resources of the whole country, and obliterate, in social and political equality, the hard and fast lines of distinction which separate the South from the North, and from England.

But, as I did not go to Ireland to confront, and become familiar with the matters that occasion these alienations and political strife, I must now refer to the object of my visit.

As has already been implied, I went in connection with the temperance movement, to enforce the claims of the temperance reformation. This, as you know, has been my work during the best part of my life, and I have a large experience of the movement in Scotland and in England. I knew that the Irish Temperance League had acquired honourable distinction, from its influence with the constituencies, in returning almost the whole of the northern representation to support Sir Wilfrid, not merely with his resolution, but with his bill while it was not possible to construe it to mean restriction. I knew all this, and was prepared to see in its leaders, strength of conviction and thoroughness; but I did not anticipate that the people who were to compose the meetings that I was to address would be characterised, as they were, with the capacity to listen and weigh the facts and arguments presented to them. I would not have it inferred that a similar earnest deliberativeness does not confront the Scottish and English temperance platforms. Occasionally it is to be met with, especially when (on rare occasions) the speakers are known, or are believed to be distinguished for an earnest thoughtful utterance. Such are generally reserved for great occasions, and they attract thoughtful audiences; but, as a rule in Scotland, temperance audiences do not congregate with a thoughtful purpose. It is for amusement, or, to put it mildly, entertainment; and when they are looked at, the facial expression which anticipates fun, smirks and giggles toward our platforms to encourage the gratifying effort. This description of audience abounds; and although it is out of the public-house, and singing saloon, it craves for the songs, the readings, the chaff, and grimace which are an attraction in these centres of popular entertainment and culture. Temperance, in an earnest teaching sense, is all but discarded. Speaking, at the most of these meetings, is still attempted, but to be listened to with encouraging attention, it has to partake of the comic song and comic reading. This is called a counter attraction to the public-house, and is held to be a practical phase of the temperance movement. The consequence is, however, that the run of our meetings are deserted, alike by earnest listeners and earnest, instructive speakers. I, therefore, with your permission, desire to put on record the delight which I experienced in feeling the thoughtful deliberativeness which pervaded these Irish meetings which I was privileged to address. They were ordinary meetings, for I was not understood to be an attraction. It was this that intensified my delight. Even the children that were present at some of them behaved with the decorum which is begotten by the restraints of a meeting for worship. There was but one exception, and I was sorry to learn that these children were from middle class families, who compose a most respectable cultured church.

I will not attempt to give a reason for the difference between these Irish meetings and our own. It may be that the leaders have declined to cultivate counter-attractions, or it may be that the people will not submit to their culture. But since I have experienced them, the fact that every two Scotsmen drink as much as every three Irishmen has been borne in upon me to beget reflection. This being the case, it is evident that Irishmen are much less the objects of public-house training than Scotsmen. This must go for much; for to be engrossed with the pleasure of intoxication is to be alienated from all that calls out the higher faculties, and to be made responsive to the frivolities of the public-house. It is therefore not to be wondered at that Irishmen are more natural, so to speak, and sincere than Scotsmen, for they are a third less intoxicated, and much less tainted with public-house attractions. To see how sincere Irishmen are they have only to be looked at in the light of their movements. The violence and persistency displayed in these, however much they merit disapproval, are evidence of sincerity operating in sturdy, if misguided manhood. This is the reflection which passed through my mind when I thought of Ireland's comparative sobriety. It may therefore be because of a less degree of drunken debasement, that the rank and file of the temperance movement in Ireland have the degree of mental health and stability which qualify them to have pleasure at temperance meetings, in estimating the value of argument, to strengthen public opinion for the prohibition of the drink trade. However this may be, the people do not come to the ordinary temperance meetings expecting to be entertained with public-house amusements. Temperance meetings in Ireland are not public-houses without the drink. The people attend them to listen to the discussion of the temperance question, and are not disappointed when they are not treated to doses of public-house fun. The movement in Ireland transpires on a mental and moral level; that must be risen to before the prohibition of the drink trade is possible.

It would be invidious to specify one meeting as surpassing the rest, and as your space is limited I will content myself in referring to the one at Bessbrook, as representative of the whole. It was not numerically large, but it was not small in its capacity for thoughtful, sustained attention, and this, in connection with the prohibitory celebrity of Bessbrook, was interesting indeed. Bessbrook has been so often and so fully described that I will, I am sure, be excused when I simply say that it is a model town. It is not to be compared with most Irish, nor, indeed, other towns; it is like a town, imagined in the future, when prohibition has become the basis of real Christian civilisation. Without a public-house, there is not a squalid-looking home in it; while looked at, the absence of poverty and dirt produces a pleasing impression. In this little centre of industry, wisely used for beneficence as well as for profit, sobriety and economy are fostered to make the antipathies of opposing creeds disappear with the crime and pauperism which a licensed drink trade produces. These in Bessbrook are all being exterminated through the rule of prohibition.

Irish hospitality has become proverbial, and my experience confirms the characteristic. From the moment I arrived until I left I was treated with the best in the best spirit.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE NORTH.

To the Editor of Social Reformer.

SIR,—It is now some months since I wrote a letter to the Social Reformer giving you an account as to how matters are progressing in the North. I want to draw your attention to several places which I have not had the pleasure of lecturing in until recently in the district, namely, Bervie, Ballater, and Ellon. Bervie is one of the Montrose Burghs, and is situated on the coast about mid-way between Stonehaven and Montrose. I had two meetings in the town—one in the Free Church and another in the Burgh Hall. The meetings were moderately well attended. I stayed with the Rev. Mr. Small, from whom and his good wife I received no little kindness. A number of friends generously contributed to our funds, and wished us hearty speed in our work. There is no temperance society, however, in Bervie. The little burgh would be all the healthier and all the happier if the liquor traffic were excluded from its precincts. Gourdon is a fishing village about a mile south from Bervie. There is a Good Templar Lodge in it, and I have several times addressed meetings there; and I am free to say that there are a few as earnest men there as you will find in any part of Scotland. They have a sore fight, as all true reformers have who are seeking to combat drunkenness, which is fostered in the interest of revenue, profit, and rent.

I had a very pleasing experience at Ballater. Your readers are aware that this town is 40 miles west of Aberdeen at the terminus of the Deeside Railway, and is 9 miles from Balmoral; it is situated in a narrow plain, and is almost encircled by hills. The Dee sweeps round it at the west side, and then winds along the northern base of the hills which rise abruptly to the south of the village. Ballater is said to be very healthy, and in summer it must be a place of charming beauty. The Established Church stands in a square in the centre of the village, while the Free Church occupies a position to the north and west of it, on the side of the road that leads to Balmoral, and under the shadow of the dark hill which bounds it on the north. There is an excellent Band of Hope in Ballater. My meeting was held in the Free Church—the Rev. Mr. Moir presiding. The audience was composed of a number of thoughtful men and women—just such a meeting as I love to address. I sold two dozen of Social Reformers, and on the following day was highly gratified by the generous response a number of good friends made to our subscription list. I shall not readily forget the warm interest manifested by the temperance men and women of Ballater on my first visit to that delightful locality. Ellon is 16 miles north from Aberdeen, close to the line of the Great North of Scotland Railway; it lies on the north bank of the Yethan, and is 6 miles from the sea. My meeting was held in the U.P. Church, under the auspices of the Temperance Society. The Rev. James Ireland, a temperance veteran of the olden time, occupied the chair. The meeting was well attended, and I sold three dozen of Social Reformers, and got a number of subscriptions.

The friends treated me kindly, paying bills and all the expenses in connection with the meeting. The Ellon Society is in a good state, having weekly meetings, and putting forth vigorous efforts to train the young and to teach the old. Temperance Societies and Templar Lodges cannot estimate the good they might do if they would go at their work in earnest. Let them spread literature, have frequent meetings, study the subject in its varied phases; above all, let them adopt sound temperance politics, for it is on this latter line that the liquor traffic is to be overthrown.

THE SMOKE NUISANCE.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

SIR,—The practice of smoking has increased, is increasing, and ought to be extinguished. It is becoming intolerable to non-smokers and dangerous to smokers. None can properly estimate with certainty the amount of slavery it imposes on its dupes, or the misery it lays up in store for its victims. On every occasion you find its votaries absorbed in indulgence, injuring themselves and annoying their neighbours. The vast expenditure upon this drug few ever really realize. Sixteen millions sterling are spent upon tobacco in its various forms, and the amount consumed ranges as high as twenty-five ounces per head of the population. I am not sure that the consumption has not been higher, but at any rate it is at my estimate frightful, and it threatens to increase. When times again become prosperous twenty-five ounces will reach to thirty, perhaps to thirty-two, but by that time many will have become the victims to tobacco-induced diseases which will in numerous cases have a fatal termination. It is not the loss of wealth but the loss of health and mind and skill and position that is to be deplored. The use of tobacco reduces the animal temperature, induces nervousness and debility, and leads to organic disorder and to structural transformation. It induces mental, functional, and structural derangement. It is universally avoided by the fair sex, who might set up at least an equal claim to its heat-giving, nerve-quieting, and strength-imparting qualities did these exist. They know better. They see how their dear ones are day by day injured by its pernicious quality, and they avoid it as at once a delusion and an impropriety. Almost all our athletics who, in rowing, sailing, bicycling, shooting or running, have taken the highest prizes, or have maintained a foremost place, have eschewed it as a danger. So that smoking is the mark of a man of sensual nature who is deficient in intelligence of its qualities and effects, or being intelligent acts in defiance of reason and conscience; of a man who knows that the use of tobacco cannot be defended, and yet stamps it with the seal of his practice; of a man who chooses to yield himself to slavery for the doubtful pleasure of an indulgence that is injuring him mentally, morally, and physically, and may one day carry him off prematurely to the grave.—

Yours truly,

MELIORA.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Books, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 18th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

Evans' Annual for 1881 is fully up to the level of excellence attained by previous issues. It is to be had at the National Temperance Publication Depot, 337 Strand, London. Price Threepence.

Judging from the January issue of Home Words, we are inclined to wish the readers a glorious volume by the end of 1881. Looking to the pictures, the story—Poetry Sermons—the Adventures of Rob Roy (of canoe fame)—In a Mine,—we should say, if this is the sample the volume will be wonderful. It is one of the Hand and Heart series.

In Hand and Heart for the 3rd ult., Frederick Sherlock tells us that it was he that first read Tennyson's new ballad, "The Northern Cobbler," as a temperance reading. In the article conveying this agreeable information, Mr. Sherlock extols the excellence of the ballad, the main one in the book, and graphically points out the many temperance lessons it conveys.

The Onward Reciter. No. 110. November. One penny. London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row, E.C. This highly popular serial continues to maintain its usual high standard of excellence. The present number is no exception, the fine boy's speech on moderation is excellently conceived, and the publican's invitation to drink brings out the reasons for the hope that is in him on the part of the invited—reasons that we would gladly know animated the breast of every one. We cordially recommend this number.

The Fireside, Jan., 1881. London: Hand and Heart Office, 1 Paternoster Buildings, Paternoster Row. Sixpence. This is a superbly got up serial, in type, engravings, and matter. The variety is striking. While there is a wealth of good things, we have a special appreciation of the article on Temperance Pioneers, by Frederick Sherlock, who selects Mr. Joseph Levesey for treatment by his graphic pen. This excellent article is fitly illustrated by a speaking likeness of "the Patriarch of Teetotalism."

The Children's Sunbeam. Pleasant stories for the young folks. London: F. C. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. One shilling. This is a delightful monthly magazine for the young. It is full of stories, each illustrated with well executed wood engravings. There are also music, sermons, and abundance of little short pieces, just the thing for little children. Then there is a delightful exposition of the Twenty-third Psalm, where Christ as the Good Shepherd is set forth in a manner to make every child that reads it desire to be a follower of the meek and lowly Saviour. The little volume is handsomely got up in cream colour, gilt, and gold lettered, and is worthy of a place among mamma's new year presents.

Seventh Annual Report of the Glasgow Dale Street Total Abstinence Society. This energetic, and in some respects, model society is to be congratulated on the issue of its seventh annual report. From it we learn that 128 pledges have been taken; 40 ordinary, and one social meeting have been held either in or out of doors during the year. The committee memorialized the magistrates on Licensing Sessions to grant no new licenses, and they earnestly prayed the Earl of Zetland to adhere to his resolution to remove all liquor dealers from Grangemouth. They manifest gratitude to all who have assisted them in providing lectures, in addressing meetings, or entertaining them; and the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has a due meed of praise. But a visit to the society's meetings is the best test of the work of the committee. No one who has been present can, we think, come away without a feeling that the Dale Street Society is in conduct and results entitled to a high place among temperance agencies. The receipts have been £22 10s. 0½d, the balance to carry forward £9 18s. 2½d.

Fourth Annual Report of the Paisley Women's Christian and Abstinence Association, 1879-80. We have had occasion to notice previous reports of this indefatigable association, but never with greater pleasure. The committee, believing that the Master is come and calleth for them, hold themselves as ever in the Great Taskmaster's eye. The record of their work is highly creditable to them all. 37 forenoon prayer meetings, a course of Sabbath evening temperance sermons, by the Rev. Drs. Dodds, Joseph Brown, Hutton, Marshall Lang, and Rev. Messrs. M'Ewan and Hector Hall; the promotion of petitions in support of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution, memorials to the local presbyteries of the E., F., and U.P. Churches, and one to the magistrates against licenses. A drawing room meeting and sewing meetings were also held and assistance afforded to the young ladies' branch, and the Anchor branch society. The income was £35 12s. 3d., the balance to carry forward being £1. The society is in connection with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and is in our opinion one of the best female societies existing; a signal proof of what womanly sympathy and courage may accomplish.

Health Studies; By Rev. H. Sinclair Paterson, M.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 27 Paternoster Row. Price 2s. 6d. When we reviewed the previous volumes, of which Health Studies is the third—Studies in Life and The Human Body--we were induced by the learning, science, &c., style manifest in every page, to award them the highest praise. The present volume demands the same tribute at our hands. It is a fitting sequel to its predecessors. There is the same clearness of perception, the same sturdy common sense, the same vigorous treatment visible all through, and we have consequently a book which will impart sound information and healthy instruction, awakening in the reader's mind the feeling that mankind are not merely fearfully and wonderfully made, but that the body is the temple of the spirit, to be kept swept and garnished. These lectures must have set forth clearly to those who heard, or will to those who may read, the relation of the mind to the body, and how necessary to the vigour of the soul that a due obedience to the laws of the body is maintained. Those lectures, which treat of "Food and Appetite," "Exertion," "Worry," "Rest and Sleep," "The Merry Heart," "Rational Principles of Medicine," &c., will be highly valued by every intelligent youth into whose hands they may fall, and we would counsel parents to procure the whole series for their children. No better gift of books from parents to children could be named.

Bonhill T. A. Society's Nineteenth Annual Report, June, 1880. (Bonhill: Mr. Mungo M'Nee, Treasurer, and Mr. G. L. Melville, Secretary). With unfailing regularity this vigorous Society issues its Annual Report, and with commendable attention favors us with a copy. We are always glad to see it lying on our table. Although located in a village the Society works away with vigour and persistency, which we should be glad to see equalled by many societies in our great cities. The Temperance Jubilee Meetings, Band of Hope effort, and Tract and Pamphlet distribution make a most creditable show of work attended to during the year. The Committee are sound at heart on local option, and record their elation at the Parliamentary victory of the present session. The Treasurer's accounts are as usual found with a balance on the right side. The sum received, including balance from last year, was £18 7s. 6½d., leaving a balance of £3 1s. 10½d. with which to begin the work of the year. The subscription list is not lengthy but it is very select, and includes nearly all the landed and trading gentry in the Vale of Leven. This of itself is no mean testimony to the efficiency and influence of the Bonhill T. A. Society.

Books received—Beacon Flashes; Heroes in the Strife; Trust the People; Double Collapse of Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P.; National Temperance Hymnal; Proceedings of the Grand Lodge, I.O.G.T.; State of California; Annual Report Edinburgh T.A. Society; Sunday Closing in Ireland, &c., &c.

An aged coloured man, hastening home from church, was asked why he was in such a hurry. "Oh, nothin' pertiklar, boss," was his answer, "only I jess heard at confrence dat Sam Johnson's fell 'im grace, and I thought I'd get right home 's soon's I could an lock up my chickens. Dat's all."

WHAT'S IN A NAME? Some mischievous boys at a village school, seeing a sign over a grocer's shop which read "Arnold Drinkall," painted out the three first letters, leaving it "Old Drinkall." The sign was soon restored to its former condition, and then the boys, not to be beaten, painted a "D" before the first name, making it "Darnold Drinkall." And then, in utter despair, the grocer painted his name out.

VARIETIES.

JUST LIKE THEM.—Lots of mothers complain that they have not strength to comb their hair, yet they'll hold a seven year old boy over their knees and spank him till his pulse rises to 149 without their feeling at all tired!

A "TRAMP" RIGHT.—A tramp was not long since arrested for disorderly conduct and assault and battery, while under the influence of liquor. On his way to the lock-up, he shouted, "You have arrested the wrong fellow; when I'm sober, my heart is good, when I'm drunk I'm full of the devil. Arrest drink and lock it up, and let me go free." He is right, let us lock up alcohol. Prohibition will do that fast enough.

LEARNING TO DRINK.—A very efficient Sunday-school teacher, who had gathered up a class of boys previously neglected, was one morning, after the regular lesson, talking to them of the great evils of intemperance. Suddenly she said, "Boys, I wonder how people learn to drink?" A bright little fellow, son of a publican, said, "I know: by tasting." Do not forget this. "Touch not, taste not, handle not," and you will never become a drunkard.—Temperance Record.

He left her and stepped out to see a friend between the acts. "Why, Edward," she said when he returned, "you were a very long time gone." "Yes, dear; I regret to say I saw a young man whom I have known for years drinking whisky." "You did?" "Yes, standing right up before me, partaking deeply of the intoxicating glass." There was a little pause, "Edward, don't most bars have mirrors at the back?" Edward flushed a little, and permitted the subject to drop.

FINAL DEFECTIVENESS OF PLEASURE AND PAIN.—Pleasure and pain are feelings which it has always been found impossible to make out to be a satisfactory and worthy description of man's final experience. Every one fails utterly to apply them to the conception of a Supreme Being. In that ultimate hypothetical case, though the lower terms may have perforce to be used, an attempt to reinterpret them with higher significance is always made. Men, too, whom their fellows from secret recognitions of excellence in their character most reverence always have desired purity, holiness, leaving mere delight to take care of itself; and they were willing to be content with sacrifice, that is, smilingly to confront suffering, as the mode of reaching this inexplicable satisfaction which is better than pleasures. By-and-through the renunciation of pleasure the egoistic self-certification of advance in the retrieval of faculty seems to be gained. Certain it is, that the Ego gets its great serious amplification from its actualisation including pain, while even the higher pleasures following on successful penitences and aspirations seem finally to transform into something better—an egoistic serenity, freedom, efficiency, recognised as familiar and native to us.—William Cyples's "Process of Human Experience."

WORK.

What are we set on earth for? Say, to toil;
Nor seek to leave thy tending of the vines,
For all the heat of day, till it declines,
And death's mild curfew shall from work assoil.
God did anoint thee with His odorons oil,
To wrestle, not to reign; and He assigns
All thy tears over, like pure crystallines,
For younger fellow-workers of the soil
To wear for amulets. So others shall Take patience, labour, to their heart and hand,
From thy hand, and thy heart, and thy brave cheer,
And God's grace fructify through thee to all.
The least flower, with a brimming cup, may stand,
And share its dew-drop with another near.

MRS. BROWNING.

A Yankee schoolmistress was teaching temperance and telling the boys to sign the pledge as she had done, and thus become cold water men. A little pupil inquired, "Did you ever get drunk, and fall into the river?" "Why, no, my child," she replied in astonishment, "how came you to think of such a thing?" "'Cos my grandfather did, and that was what made him a cold water man."

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. JAMES GRANT, WEST CALDER.—We deeply regret to announce the decease of this most faithful adherent of the prohibitory movement in Scotland. He was a merchant and a man highly esteemed in his private and public relations. He died suddenly on 17th Nov., and all that remained of him was consigned to the tomb on the 22nd. Mr. Grant and his wife, who predeceased him two or three years, felt pleasure in proffering their sincere hospitality to the wayfaring temperance lecturer. His family, left to mourn their irreparable loss, are cared for by their eldest brother, John, who in looking to their wants is showing himself worthy of the highest commendation.

THE LATE MR. DAVID CARSWELL, PAISLEY.—We deeply regret to have to announce the death of this thorough temperance reformer. Mr. Carswell usually enjoyed vigorous health, but some week or so ago he was seized with a severe attack of cold, to which he succumbed on the 12th ult., at the comparatively early age of 62. As a temperance reformer, he occupied a prominent position in Paisley for many years: and was at the time of his decease treasurer to the Total Abstinence Society, a post he filled for a lengthened period. He liberally supported the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and heartily sympathised with its efforts. Mr. Carswell occupied a highly respectable position in Paisley, his firm (bookbinders) being noted for the excellence of their workmanship and the integrity of their dealings. He was a member of the Philosophical Society, and a Congregationalist. The Paisley Express thus sums up his character:—"In private life Mr. Carswell was a most liberal-minded, candid, and obliging gentleman; and his loss will be much felt by those who fought side by side with him in the battle of moral reform: but most of all by his widow and family, who are bereft of a loving husband and a kindly father."

THE LATE MR. JOHN SHAW, KILSYTH.—Last month there passed away, after a painful illness of about twelve months' duration, borne with singular patience and Christian resignation, Mr. John Shaw, stationer. He had long been far from robust in health, but he had a mind to work, and his mind and heart and deeds went together. On the temperance question he was most decided and pronounced. Having been brought up under strict temperance principles, he had a keen sense of the evils of the drink system; like many others he did not consider temperance work as something distinct from ordinary Christian work, but rather a part of it. By his faithfulness, devotion, and liberality, he did much to further the cause, and everything he did was done with heart and soul. When Good Templarism was introduced into Kilsyth (about ten years ago), our deceased brother at once recognised its superior organisation, and became one of its respected members—and while strength continued there was not a better officer or a more regular and faithful member. He remained to the end a decided and consistent abstainer. Mr. Shaw was a member of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, and also a member of the Scottish Temperance League. He was a respected member of the Free Church, and a Sabbath-school teacher, and maintained a "walk and conversation" becoming the religion he professed. Earnest, respected, and useful during life, he was calm, patient, and resigned in the prospect of death. His end was peace; he died in the blessed hope of a glorious resurrection.—W. R. G.

TAXATION, IMPERIAL AND OTHER.

By the Rev. F. WAGSTAFF, F.R.H.S., editor of the "Lay Preacher" and the "Temperance Worker."

"Know ye of this Taxation,"—Shakespeare.

It will not be long before the political world will be exercised about financial matters. One year the attention of Parliament may be mainly occupied by the Eastern Question; another year by Irish troubles; and another by electoral reform; but "ways and means" furnish a perennial topic for discussion. Whatever else be done or left undone, the BUDGET is among the things inevitable; for does not the old proverb tell us that "there is nothing certain except death and taxes"?

Nor is the annual excitement confined to Parliament. Newspaper writers and platform orators take up the theme; and with spasmodic efforts, thoroughly characteristic of the dear old gentleman, John Bull bestirs himself with a view to secure some diminution of his burdens. "Abolish me some of this taxation!" is his cry. "Ask me not how the revenue of the country is to be obtained! Talk not to me about the necessities of the State! What I want is to be free from these continual attacks on my purse." Poor John Bull! He always grumbles when he has to pay; but how little he concerns himself about the true cause of all this heavy burden of which he so loudly complains. He cries out for economical government, yet will do so little to make economical government possible.

A few years ago a pamphlet was issued by Professor Leone Levi, the interest in which ought not to be allowed altogether to die, inasmuch as it afforded some important information on the subject of taxation. Premising that the statements made by Mr. Levi are not all equally infallible, we must bear in mind that there is probably no higher authority on statistical matters than he.

It would appear that the Imperial taxation of this country has increased something like 17 per cent. since 1842, but at the same time the Professor estimates the gross increase of the income of the people at about 66 per cent. In other words, the tax-bearing power has increased some four times as rapidly as the burden to be borne. Taxation may be broadly divided into four general classes:—1, That which affects wealth and industry; 2, that which affects luxuries; 3, that which affects necessaries; and, 4, that which does not concern either of the other three classes. Professor Levi shows that the re-arrangement of taxation which has gone on of late years has had the effect of increasing the proportion of taxation on "luxuries" by something like 74 per cent., and of diminishing that on what are usually denominated the "necessaries" of life by some 58 per cent. It rests, therefore, very much with the taxpayer himself whether his burden is proportionally high or low. On "necessaries" he must pay some taxation; as to "luxuries," the matter is entirely in his own hands.

Of class 1, namely taxation on wealth and industry, Professor Levi's pamphlet shows that not more than half a million probably falls on the working classes—that is, on those dependent upon weekly wages; while nearly twenty-three millions fall upon the upper and middle classes. The taxes on "luxuries" realise on the whole about £33,000,000, of which the working classes are estimated to pay not less than £21,000,000, or about two-thirds of the whole amount! This arises almost entirely from the perfectly voluntary and unnecessary expenditure by working men on strong drink and tobacco!

A great deal has been said of late years about the burden of "local taxation." Comparatively but a small proportion of this falls upon the working classes; and Professor Levi thus tabulates his estimate of the method in which each pound of taxation is made up by the payments of each class:—

WORKING CLASSES.		MIDDLE AND UPPER CLASSES.
Spirits, ...	£0 7 5	Local Taxes, houses, &c.,	£0 7 8
Malt, ...	0 3 0	Stamps, ...	0 3 3
Tobacco, ...	0 3 0	Income Tax, ...	0 3 0
Local Taxes, houses, &c.,	0 2 9	Malt, ...	0 0 9
Tea, ...	0 1 5	Tobacco, ...	0 0 9
Sugar, ...	0 1 0	Sugar and Tea, ...	0 1 0
Licenses, ...	0 0 9	Wine, ...	0 0 7
Other Taxes, ...	0 0 8	Other Taxes, ...	0 3 0
	£1 0 0		£1 0 0

It is most important for the working classes to look at these figures, and to realize the ugly facts which grow out of them. These facts are that, for every £1 of taxation paid by the working classes, 13s. 5d. arises from drinking and smoking, or if the cost of the licenses be added, then 14s. 2d.; while similar indulgences only swallow up 2s. 1d. of each sovereign of the taxation which falls upon other classes!

Let us see how these facts look when examined in another light. Suppose that all classes should at once cease to live under the slavery of drinking and smoking, the result would be that, while the upper and middle classes would still have to pay 17s. 11d. out of every £1 now paid, the working classes would only have to pay five shillings and twopence. In other words, the latter classes voluntarily and needlessly tax themselves to the tune of fourteen shillings and twopence in the pound!

Working men, in the words of Shakespeare, we ask: "Know ye of this taxation?"

THIS IS FROM RUSKIN.—"You fancy you are sorry for the pain of others. Now I tell you just this, that if the usual course of war, instead of unroofing peasants' houses and ravaging peasants' fields, merely broke the china upon your own drawing-room tables, no war in civilized countries would last a week."

NOTES FROM THE OUTER HEBRIDES.

THE ROUND OF FISHER-CROFTER LIFE.

SINCE the days of Dr. Johnson there have always been tourists who, while making the round of our islands, have travelled notebook in hand, and have given to the reading public their views on life among the islands. As often as not these views have been formed from the impressions made during, at most, a few days' residence in the height of the summer when everything looks at its best. As a result their letters have been imperfect and very often misleading in some vital point, which could not be discovered by the casual observer, but has to be patiently searched after and can only be found out by one who, by long continued residence, has found his way into the deepest recesses of the mind of the native Celts, who are, by the way, a very reticent race. Judging others by my former ignorance, when living in the South, I am inclined to think that there is more known about the inhabitants of Central Africa, than is known concerning the inhabitants of these islands, which form part of the same great group of islands known as Great Britain and Ireland; certainly that was my condition, but then there has not been a Livingstone, or Baker, or Bruce, devoting his life to ascertaining the manners and customs, and everyday life of these islanders, who are now, in these days of steamboats and railways, within easy access of the great cities of the South.

In the following papers I purpose to confine myself to the three following points, leaving for abler pens the discussion of vexed questions which will be only stated. 1st, The round of fisher-crofter life. 2nd, The social habits of the islanders. 3rd, Some reflections on the condition of the people.

1st, The round of fisher-crofter life. Spring, the birth season of the year, forms a natural starting point of which I will avail myself. The first work of a farmer in the South is to get manure carted to the fields, so is it here, with this difference that the manure is sea-weed. A stranger would think that not much need be said about such an unsavoury subject, but he would be wrong. At the cutting of the ware he will find brought into play the patriarchal government of the olden times. Do you think that every crofter is at perfect liberty to cut ware wherever he chooses, or that all the foreshore, ex adverso to his own land, is his property? Not so, what would be the share of those who have no land bordering on the sea? Not much if they were left to the tender mercies of the landholders near it. In this matter there is a perfect community of goods; "All good things are common," is a doctrine that meets with as little favour here as it does in the greater island of Great Britain. This is the only instance of communism that I have been able to find in the village or township government of these islands, so I give it all due prominence as one redeeming feature in what will be a black picture, though a true one.

The week from new to half moon, or the week from full moon to half moon (waning) is the season of the spring harvest of ware, as there is then a greater ebb. All the crofters meet and cast lots for the different bays and low water rocks, after which each hastens to his allotted share, and works with might and main, as he is working against the tide, which waits for no man. The women in this, as every other case here, get the heaviest of the work, that is the carrying of the wet ware from the ebb to a spot above high water mark. When the tide flows, the crofter, if industrious, will get his boat and ferry the ware home to his piece of land: thus leaving the unbroken week during spring tides for the delving of his patches, while his wife and daughters are doing the horses' work in carrying the great heavy creels of now rotten ware from the shore to the land. This is by far the heaviest of the work, and yet these patient creatures plod away from morning to night, crooning some Gaelic melody, quite happy carrying a full hundredweight on their backs in many cases for half a mile. The cutting and securing of the ware is at all times dangerous work, but in a stormy spring this is even more true. The women are then made to cut the ware on the rocks, while the men keep hold of the ropes which are fastened round the waists of the women, ready to lift them up on the approach of a bigger wave than usual. There they work wet, drenched to the skin, for about three hours at a stretch, and even with all its discomforts, they unanimously confess that at this time they are healthier than at any other season of the year. A striking proof of the efficacy of the cold water treatment among a race of people who do not often indulge in the luxury of a bath.

These patches of land are only drained by wide, deep, open drains, which carry off the surface water, leaving the cultivated land cold and damp, but even the drains have their uses, and for a strange purpose, the sides and bottom when dry produce a luxuriant crop of weeds, which is carefully pulled up and carried away to the cow, who is quietly chewing the cud, after a scanty meal of the hardest, driest vegetable fibre, at which a starving Ayrshire would turn up her nose.

After the crops are in the ground, the women are again installed in the office of caretakers, as the men must now attend to the reaping of another harvest from the sea. Nets require to be mended, or barked, buoys made, and the boats must be launched from the beach where they have lain high and dry since last autumn. During the home fishing season every Saturday and Monday is devoted to cutting peats, in which everyone helps his neighbour: thus if a man needs twelve men for a day to cut his yearly supply, he will need to pay back each of these men with a day's work. To this law there is this exception, that those men who by their calling could not be expected to cut peats—ministers, teachers, catechists—get their peats cut for nothing, by giving the men engaged at the work their food for the day. I learned on coming here that alcoholic drinks are food, and had at first a dead set against me for either drink or a line to get it. I as firmly refused and proposed to cut my own peats, when the opposition was at once silenced, as they could not bear the disgrace of that, and since this first stand was taken I have never been troubled with the alcoholic food question. Again after the peats are cut the women do all the rest of the work among the peats, turning them when one side has got dried, putting them up on end when they are firm enough to stand alone, and stacking them when they are thoroughly dried, and, worst job of all, carrying them home in creels on their backs, often during the fiercest storm of winter, having to go out two or three times to the moss over rock and bog for their daily supply, for the average Celt is not provident, and never lays in a supply of anything but only lives from hand to mouth.

After the summer home fishing is finished the men go away to the East Coast fishing, where they get the only money that they see from year to year; all their home fishing is done on the truck system with the merchant. The leave-taking ere setting out for the East Coast is a most heart-rending spectacle. All the women and children flock to the shore, while the parting words are being said all are bathed in tears, indeed the parting is far more demonstrative than that which is seen on the quays of our large seaports when an emigrant ship departs, which separation is often for a lifetime and not as in this case only for at most two months.

While the men are away the women are busy cutting something, which they dignify by calling it hay, which however, would be more correctly named bent, something leathery, heathery, which only the most absolute starvation would compel a cow anywhere else to look at, but which a hardy highland cow will eat and digest, aye, and give the richest milk from. Barley harvest now draws on, this is a time of pulling and not cutting. The oat crop is treated in harvest pretty much in the same way as is done in the south; but the barley is too sacred a grain to be treated in any fashion so common, for a variety of reasons which will shortly appear. Then the staple food of the crofter, the potatoe, has to be lifted. After the last sheaf of grain and the last creel of potatoes have been carried home on the back of the hard-working wife or daughter, the men, having meantime returned, refit their shattered creels and prepare for the lobster fishing. Poor fellows, though lobsters are plenty, very little is now to be got for them, as they are imported in such quantities from America and Norway. When all the young, strong, hardy men are away prosecuting this most dangerous branch of their calling, in one of the many lochs on the West Coast, the shores of which are not peopled, the people having been forced to leave and swell the already densely crowded cities, or go to those wearry colonies, in order that they might make room for deer. Now is the time to see crofter life, in its purity, at its best or worst, in the long winter nights when there is no one at home save a few old men, women, and children. Go into a crofter's house and see how the winter evenings are spent—in the upper room the boys and girls are busily engaged in plucking the heads from the barley straw. This slow and tedious process is still retained in preference to the more expeditious way of thrashing by a flail, for two very opposite reasons: first, in order that the straw may be as little crumpled as possible, so that our crofter may have good thatch for his house, and good straw to plait into the bottom of his chairs, or for the neck-ropes for the creels; and second, in order that he may be able to get his barley conveniently dried over his peat fire, the heads of grain are more easily put into a piece of old herring net (so that the barley may get the proper taste of peat reek, which is so much relished by the lovers of the barley bree) than the single grains would be after the ordinary process of thrashing. Though I have never seen oxen treading in the threshing floor, yet one can easily see here a stranger thing than that, namely, women rubbing with their feet the separate grains from the head, and loosening the chaff, which brings us now to the open air winnowing of the grain, which is so well known a process that I need not describe it. The oats are treated after the following fashion. They are thrashed with the flail, and that part which is to be made into meal is dried in a pot by the side of the fire, which forms a simple but very efficient kiln of a primitive kind. The next stage in the process is the milling, which is also done at home. The grains, just as they came from the ground, without any preparatory dressing to remove the outer husk or shell, are handed over to the female part of the household, who are the millers for the family. The quern, or hand mill, as it is found in the houses here, is a very different thing from one of the many patent home mills which now inundate the market. It is more easily wrought, makes a finer meal, is cheaper, and last, though not least, is that which has been handed down from their fathers. It may not be so cleanly, small particles of grit off the stone may come off among the meal, but these drawbacks are nothing to an Islander as a set off against its many advantages. The cleaning or separating of the coarse husk from the fine meal is as primitive as any of the other stages of this homely life. A calf's skin, from which the hair has been scraped, is stretched over a hoop, so as to resemble one end of a big drum, when the skin is perfectly dry, holes are drilled in it at the proper distances and of a proper size, what passes through this is fit food for men, and what will not go through is only fit for the cows. The next stage is the baking. Suffice it to say on this point, that from meal, whether barley or oat, made in this homely fashion, bread is made which for sweetness will please the most fastidious, and for blackness ought certainly to satisfy the eyes, if not the stomachs, of the leaders in the brown bread movement. I have dwelt so fully on the cropping part of the crofter's life, that I fear I cannot fully enter into a description of the live-stock part of the system. In brief then, all unless the very poorest have at least one cow, while many of them have two, and in some cases three, all giving milk, not counting young beasts. Dairy produce cannot be sold at any price, hence the poorer people who have no cows are pretty liberally supplied by their more fortunate neighbours. The kindness shown in the way of giving fresh warm milk to a sick person, or to a family where there is a child but no cow, by the Islanders is very great. The more remote the island, and the less it is in the route of the tourist, the better is it for the poor and the sojourning stranger. Hens and ducks are found in every house, and eggs are to be had all the year round at a half-penny a-piece. The wool from the sheep is all spun and woven into home-made tweeds, winceys, druggets, which now find a ready market in the cities of the South. Knitting is also a very considerable source of revenue to the female part of the Islanders, for when they are engaged at any work, even carrying creels, where their hands are free, they are busily engaged knitting stockings for some of the large warehouses of your city, who have got agents here and there over all the islands, just as in a former generation they had agents for the giving out and receiving of tambouring and stamped work. Thus you have got a brief description of the occupation of the hardy men and women who inhabit our Western Islands. I hope to take up the other two points mentioned at the beginning of this paper in a future number.

STATE PROTECTION AND HIGH DUTY ON LIQUORS.

(To the Editor of the "Social Reformer.")

Sir,—Whilst fully realizing that the ranks of those who are combating the present drinking traffic and customs of our country should not be divided by individual views, and that the minority should act with the majority in the measures they decide to adopt, you will permit these measures to be fairly criticised in your column. It is a pleasure to admit that the Social Reformer breathes a true religious spirit whilst advocating repressive measures, whose object might be better attained by using religious and moral influences alone against this evil; by agitating to set intoxicating drink entirely free from State connection and control; and by securing that the law of the land shall treat intoxication, in every stage, as a crime.

Instead of wasting our energies on Permissive Bills, temperance men should join shoulder to shoulder to cut the whole traffic adrift from the State. As with the opium trade in India, we should have no interest save to crush it wherever its use was proved, in any degree, inimical to society. The present protective system is most "unfair." In a country that has adopted the simple principle of "free trade" in all things—ubique et ab omnibus—it is inconsistent also. It is "unfair," because it gives privileges to the distillers and the licensed householders, that enrich them by prohibiting competition. By back-door influence with licensing justices and magistrates, one householder gets fifty per cent. better return for his invested capital than his neighbour. It is "inconsistent" to retain protection in the sole case of strong drink. If it be necessary for us, or even a luxury, our people should be able to manufacture or buy without excise regulations. This freedom would, from many causes, lessen the manufacture; but, should it be increased thereby the price of grain, and the profit of the farmer would rise in proportion. He is entitled to the profit of the distiller and the retailer, as much as the gardener in making his cider, or the West Indian sugar grower in having his rum-still on every estate. "Local Option," or whatever measure goes on similar principles or lines is therefore unfair and inconsistent with our legislation.

2. With all this, these measures are doubly objectionable, because they will not cure the evil against which they profess to be directed. Though they may limit the number of public houses, it by no means follows that they will lessen drinking or drunkenness. If there be two houses in a district the abolition of one of them only doubles the drink consumed in the remaining house, and also the income of the publican—abolish both houses, and the custom for drink is only sent to the next parish or the nearest city or village.

Silent drinking and shebeening must inevitably increase; and the public house under the public eye is preferable to corrupting hypocrisy and deceit.

Protection and high duty encourage the present system of adulterating drink with deadly poison, whereby additional gain is secured for the publican's till. "Free trade" would abolish this wholly, and even drunkenness would be less, and less savage than it is in its effects now. A learned sheriff, who has sat on the bench for fifty years, assures the writer that the effects of drink have changed contemporaneously with the raising of the duty on whisky. Within the last twenty years criminals uniformly declare that they have no recollection of their brawls. They remembered taking liquor in a certain house, and their next recollection was on waking in the police cell. Formerly, however drunk, they could generally give some account of themselves. The drink now dethrones reason, and kills memory. Other judges were consulted as to their observation in this matter, with the most serious and startling result, that it is found to be the rule now in the criminal statistics of drink. Legislation should concern itself with this more than has hitherto been done, or seems to be proposed.

3. Excise duty and license are objectionable, as being an attempt to regulate vice and self-indulgence that should be left to regulate themselves through their natural consequences of degradation and ruin. If liquor were freed from State connection and patronage, it would not have the respectability now attaching to it. It would be cheap and vulgar as penny beer. Call this champagne and charge for it 10s., instead of its intrinsic value of one penny, and it will be found adorning the sideboards of the rich and gay.

4. Our present system, however it may be regulated, connects our country with the traffic, and secures profit to it from what is ruining the produce of the country, and producing misery and crime. The hearts of women and children are bleeding, and often from the gibbet the drink-fiend scowls on church and country. Are we to have anything to do with that? The dark, hideous thing there swaying in the morning breeze was great gain to our worthy publican and our parental State. He might come to the same end under "free trade" in drink! If he did, we would have no complicity with him in his self-destruction; and if it happened often—were there no personal interest at stake—the community and the nation would rise in indignation and stamp out or "lynch" the trade. The Government would take strong drink from the people, as it does fire-arms from those who give themselves up to midnight assassination or rebellion. Eventually, to degrade and to repress the whole hideous system, "free trade" seems the true course to be adopted by all temperance men.

5. The question of compensation is one that will give trouble under the present proposed measure. The idea is abhorrent. Compensate a man for stopping his manufactory of crime! Let it not be named among us! "Free trade" cuts at the root of any such claim. No case for compensation could arise any more than by the landlord and the farmer for the abolition of the duty on corn.

These views will be met with the cry as to the loss that would be entailed on the revenue by their adoption. We answer, "that is a small matter compared to the welfare of the people;" and financial genius would prove itself equal to the task of raising money for our country's wants. Taking the matter roughly, the £24,000,000 raised by the Excise could be covered by an income tax of 1s. per £ even levied over its present area. The area might be extended equitably, and the tax otherwise adjusted so that the sum per £ would be much less. Many would gladly pay much more than five per cent. of their incomes to be free from all connection with liquor, and to have the opportunity of fighting it in the open, without any of its present patronage and adventitious respectability. Why should we not support our army and navy by direct taxation? Far better, surely, to do this than to support them, as we do now, off the produce of drink and crime! It would be otherwise beneficial in placing a wholesome check on what the nation might at any time consider a "spirited policy" among the nations.

This subject must come to be dealt with ere long from an economical point of view. As Britain drinks, and becomes, at the same time, pastoral, we must make our liquor from foreign grain; and so we are being gradually drained of the nation's capital. With such laws operating, we must, at the present rate, soon drink ourselves out of house and home.

"Free trade" would not directly remedy this. Indirectly it would. It would set the nation wholly free from what is working ruin to our people, and all the remedial and repressive action, both of religion and the State, would press on the viper until it was crushed beneath its heel.—J. S. MACKENZIE, Manse of Little Dunkeld.

DO PUBLIC HOUSES CONDITION DRUNKENNESS?

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

Ex-Bailie Lewis is reported, in the Scottish Temperance League Journal of December 11th, to have said, that in a ward in Edinburgh, with a population of 22,550, there are 145 licensed houses, and that, in this ward there have been 3,175 drunken arrests. And also that, in another ward, with a population of 12,430, there are 37 licensed houses, while the drunken arrests have only been 75. He is further reported to have said that, in this state of matters there is a fact of immense value to the temperance and social reformers of this country. For, he is made to say, if those facts prove anything they prove this, that the amount of licensed drink shops, to a large extent, conditions the amount of drunkenness. Should he not have used a more explicit phrase than large extent? Why is he not reported to have stated the exact extent? Was it because he did not know and could not say. And if he does not know the extent, why is he reported as having submitted the above facts as of immense value to the temperance and social reformers of the country? I am astonished; for it has been on assumptions of this sort, enforced by misleading phrases, that the licensing system has been maintained for centuries as the means of revenue through drunkenness, assumed to be regulated within manageable limitation. The drink trade is licensed and supervised for the regulation of drunkenness. Sobriety is regulative in and of itself, and does not require supervision. Drunkenness is inseparable from the drink trade, and licensed supervision has been applied as a restraining power without effect. But besides being represented as inexplicit in the phrase (large extent), he is also made to mislead in withholding all information about the people in the wards he is said to refer to. If 22,550 give 3,175 drunken arrests: and if 12,430 give only 75, is it not because the 22,550 are to a large extent composed of degraded drunkards huddled together in circumstances begotten of extreme drunkenness and favourable to arrests; and if the 12,430 give only 75 arrests, is it not because they are composed not of the lapsed masses, but of people who have an aim in life and who live toward it, with the self-command which obviates exposure in helpless drunkenness. All the world knows that there are wards in Edinburgh occupied by the debased through drink, and wards occupied by people who are far above being caught by the police in the state of helpless drunkenness. It is the helplessly drunk who swell the number of drunken arrests; but he is not made to say whether the ward with the most arrests is inhabited by people liable to become helplessly drunk, nor whether the ward with the least arrests is inhabited by people not liable to become helplessly drunk. These are grave omissions. But even though this point had been made clear, it would not have followed that drunken arrests are the measure of drunkenness. If there was no drunkenness except that represented by the arrests of the helplessly drunk we would be a comparatively sober people. The Bailie should have been reported as giving exact information, too, as to the extent to which the police are bribed by respectable people to take them quietly home. All this he has not been made to do, and his facts, disconnected with these circumstances, are not entitled to be estimated at immense value by temperance and social reformers in their enlightened efforts to remove the conditions of drunkenness, which does not consist, as is assumed by the Bailie, as reported in a large number of public houses rather than in a small number. Drunkenness is conditioned by drinking, and by the appetite for drink created by drinking. The whole history of licensed restriction is that it is thus developed and diffused irrespective of the number of houses licensed to sell drink, or of the respectability of their owners, or of the extent of supervision exercised over them by the administration of the licensing laws. While the appetite for drink is cultivated by any number of public houses it grows beyond the power of control, and it is because this is the case that total abstinence is a personal duty and prohibition a national duty. Drunkenness is not to be eliminated and diminished from the sale of drink under any conditions. And the Bailie's statistics, as reported to prove that the amount of licensed drink shops, to a large extent, conditions the amount of drinking and drunkenness, are misleading and fitted to encourage so-called licensing reformers in their efforts for a licensing measure to frustrate temperance reformers in their efforts for prohibition. If the Bailie is correctly reported this is evidently his object. This is what he is made to say. I apprehend that if we put in operation, honestly, the clauses which are to be found within the existing license laws of Scotland, we could do a mighty deal to arrest the progress of drunkenness. The meaning of this is, that the existing licensing laws merely need to be fully administered in order to produce the required amount of sobriety. In the opinion of licensing reformers of the type of Mr. Gladstone and the Lord-Advocate, the Bailie's administration of the existing license laws to mightily arrest the progress of drunkenness, might as mightily obviate the need for any attempts on their part to apply new regulations. The Bailie's arrested drunkenness could well enough be accepted by them as a substitute for their sobriety contemplated in further restriction. He and they by appearance are in one boat, and while he labours to arrest drunkenness mightily by enforcing legalized drinking in the present, they must look to him for help in any additional attempts they may make at legalized drinking in the future. But temperance reformers do not forget that legalized drinking is drunkenness. I could not have imagined an utterance better fitted than this reported in the Bailie's name to encourage Mr. Gladstone to persist in voting against Sir Wilfrid until he abandons the demand for prohibition. This, attributed to the Bailie, is so much opposed to the enlightened, unflinching advocacy that he used to stand up for so manfully, that there is room for suspicion that he has been unfairly reported with a view to misrepresentation. For the sake of prohibition and sobriety, as against license and drunkenness, I hope to hear that such is the case. JOHN PATON.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

Sir,—I am obliged for your courtesy in favouring me with a proof copy of Mr. Paton's criticism of some remarks made by me at a public meeting in Edinburgh upwards of a month ago. Mr. Paton objects to my having said "that the amount of licensed drink-shops to a large extent conditions the amount of drunkenness." This statement, notwithstanding Mr. Paton's denial, is substantially true. It is a truth which was established by a report of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland as far back as 1848, and from which we learn by returns from 478 parishes that drunkenness among the people was very much in proportion to the number of public-houses. In 1869 an exhaustive report was issued by the Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and signed by upwards of 13,000 clergymen of the Church of England. After taking the testimony of "governors and chaplains of prisons, the heads of constabulary throughout Great Britain, the superintendents of lunatic asylums in Wales, the judges, the recorders, the coroners, and the masters of workhouses throughout England and Wales," the Convocation report that "in proportion as the facilities for drinking are reduced intemperance with its manifold evils is restrained." Another report was published in 1874 by the Convocation of the Province of York. After taking extensive testimony from similar authorities as the above, the Convocation reports that the evidence of said witnesses "invariably show that when the facilities for obtaining drink are increased, drunkenness increases also; that when they are lessened, there is a corresponding diminution in intemperance, and this rule seems to operate with all the force of a natural law." So much for Mr. Paton's denial of a palpable truth.

Your correspondent next takes exception to my having stated that in Edinburgh police arrests are most numerous in those districts where licensed houses most abound, and vice versa. It is here noticeable that he ventures neither to deny my statement nor controvert my figures. He prefers to surmise that the people who live in the wards where drunken arrests are few were far above being caught by the police and well skilled in the practice of bribery. In the ward to which I referred where licensed houses and drunkenness are at a minimum, there are thousands of the working classes resident, and where, as has been shown, very few get into the hands of the police. Why is this? Chiefly because in their district there are few public houses. I do not require to inform the readers of the Social Reformer that if liquor shops were forced in upon that district as in the other ward to which I referred, the deterioration of the people issuing in additional drunken arrests would be the inevitable result. Mr. Paton next tells us that "drunkenness is conditioned by drinking and by the appetite for drink created by drinking." Why does he stop here? Why did he not finish the sentence by saying "and the appetite for drinking is conditioned by the licensed facilities and temptations which exist." Surely in writing the above your correspondent did not write to the full extent of his knowledge.

In speaking of drunken arrests, Mr. Paton teaches a doctrine which, from one in his position, I cannot but regard with grave concern. He says, "If there was no drunkenness except that represented by the arrest of the helplessly drunk, we would be a comparatively sober people." Against such a doctrine I must tender my solemn protest. With upwards of a quarter of a million of drunken arrests in the United Kingdom last year, and with upwards of 600 drunken incapables gathered from the streets of Glasgow during the first week of the present year, I presume there are few of your readers who will regard this appalling amount of public drunkenness with such complacency, or believe that it comports with comparative sobriety.

Mr. Paton further objects to my having stated that if the existing licence laws in Scotland were honestly and properly administered a mighty deal could be done to arrest the progress of drunkenness. This statement, however distasteful to Mr. Paton, is nevertheless true. In my remarks at the meeting referred to I called very special attention to one of the most salutary clauses in the Public Houses' Amendment Act which is notoriously disregarded in Edinburgh, and I believe very generally throughout Scotland. It is therein provided that every police superintendent shall, on every Monday morning, supply the procurator-fiscal in his district with a written report of the names of all licensed persons from whose premises drunken persons are seen frequently to issue, and may use the forces at his command for the conviction, and if necessary, apprehension of offenders. It is also provided that the procurator-fiscal shall submit said reports to the magistrates and justices at the Licensing Courts; and that on first conviction the magistrates and justices may cancel the license, and that on the third conviction they shall do so. If this salutary provision were faithfully administered, I believe that about one-half of the public-houses in Edinburgh might be shut within a twelvemonth. Mr. Paton may believe that this would in no degree tend to the diminution of drunkenness, but I presume he will get few who know anything of the aggressive power of the drink traffic to agree with him.

I can sympathise and co-operate with Mr. Paton in sharply criticising the conduct of those who teach that the policy of restriction is essential to the success of the prohibitory agitation, or who insist upon it as a means adapted to secure either the prohibition of the traffic or the attainment of national sobriety. But when I find him denying that drunkenness is abated by the diminution of licensed centres of temptation, or increased by their multiplication, under the plea of advancing either total abstinence or prohibition, I regard him as playing not so much into the hands of Mr. Gladstone as into the hands of the liquor power. The denial of such a palpable and popular truth in the face of overwhelming testimony may retard but it never can by any possibility advance the prohibitory agitation.—I am, truly yours,

Roselea Villa, Grange,
Edinburgh, Jan. 21st, 1881.

FOR CONSCIENCE' SAKE.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

In your December number your correspondent, G. H. Hale, asked the question—"Did you ever hear of a seller of tobacco giving up that trade for conscience' sake?" Yes! Some twenty-four years ago the prosperous town of Bonnybridge was but a mere village. It had then only one shop of a general grocery kind, the keeper of which had to keep tobacco. All this is now changed. Bonnybridge is now a thriving place, and has got a hotel. There are now at least a dozen shops, but the original store still keeps no tobacco. The keeper has been for two generations known as a consistent temperance man, who strongly disapproved of the use of tobacco. The only explanation that ever I heard offered for the change is the following:—One day he was going up from his shop to his works, and in passing through the pend below the canal, he met a little ragged bare-footed urchin coming from the foundry busily engaged in trying to blacken a piece of clay and injure his health at the same time. The merchant put out his hand to take the pipe from the boy's mouth, when he was met with the dreadful words—Let that alane, I bocht it in yer ain shop. This was enough to show the path of duty, which was obeyed. The explanation may not be true, though I have heard it in the place as truth. The merchant was George Turnbull, Esq., Auditor to the Scottish Temperance League.

CORRESPONDENCE ON LOCAL OPTION.

The following copy of correspondence has been sent to us for publication:—

Manchester, January 11, 1881.

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—Absence from the House of Commons on pressing business prevented my hearing Mr. Gladstone's answer given last night to your question as to whether the Government intended to do anything this Session in regard to the drink traffic. I see by the papers that the Prime Minister gives no hope of the Government attempting at present to carry out the view expressed by the House in this matter.

May I ask what course you propose to take under these circumstances?—Yours respectfully,

THOMAS BURT.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON'S REPLY TO MR. BURT.

House of Commons, Jan. 13, 1881.

Dear Mr. Burt,—From Mr. Gladstone's statement, to which you allude, it seems that the Government, under the urgent call made upon them by the state of Ireland, have decided not to attempt dealing with the drink question during the present session.

This will doubtless cause much disappointment, and especially so to those who have worked for many years to obtain for the people the power of protecting themselves and their families from the drink traffic. But, although the present position of affairs is somewhat disappointing, there is nothing in it which ought seriously to discourage or dishearten us.

The threatening and alarming agitation of the Irish Land League naturally quickens the desire of the Government to get the Irish question settled without delay.

We think that we could prove that our question, bearing as it does upon the main cause of crime and pauperism throughout the whole kingdom, is far more important. But those who conduct an agitation in a quiet and constitutional manner have often, in the exigencies of political life, been obliged to see their demands refused; while others preferred in a more exciting manner are being attended to. But we have begun the session this year exceptionally early, and even an Irish question cannot last for ever.

Besides, we have a Government in power, several of whose leading members have spoken weighty and encouraging words on our question.

Mr. Gladstone himself has said that our drinking system brings upon us the accumulated evils of "war, pestilence, and famine." Mr. Bright has adverted to the drink traffickers as those who deal in articles producing "crime, disorder, and even madness." Sir W. Harcourt, the other day, in an admirable address, expressed his earnest desire to do something towards remedying a vice of which, he said, "the whole industry of the country is at the mercy." While Mr. Chamberlain, some years ago, declared that if remedial steps were not urged, "the very stones would cry out."

It seems to me that the duty of the hour is to strengthen the hands of such men, and, if it be possible, to let them see that even the Irish question should not be allowed to stand in the way of the people of England, Scotland, and Wales obtaining the legislation which they desire, and for which a majority of the House of Commons, including an overwhelming majority of the Liberal party, voted last session.

With this view, I have given notice of the following resolution, which I shall move on the earliest suitable opportunity I can secure:—

"That in the opinion of this House the resolution passed by the House on the 18th day of June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic, ought without delay to be embodied in a bill to give effect to the said resolution."

It is possible still to save a year, and before the next licensing session comes round, to have put the public in possession of means enabling those who are so minded to protect themselves and their neighbours from the licensed sources of misery and mischief, over which there is at present no power of popular control.

WILFRID LAWSON.

THE YOUNG SHAVER.—The owner of a bright pair of eyes says the prettiest compliment she ever had received came from a child of four years. The little fellow, after intensely looking at her, enquired naively, "Are your eyes new ones?"

In an article upon the growth of powerful political parties, and the importance of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, the Ripley News says:—"Powerful political parties in their commencement are the offspring of great political questions ignored by existing parties, but cherished in the hearts of the people. The one now looming up in the political horizon is the outgrowth of the greatest question of political economy that has for many years presented itself to the American people. Its aims are higher, its purposes greater and more unselfish, than any other that has been before it, while the principles it advocates are of greater moment than any that have been before the people since the days of the struggle for American Independence. This party merits the support of true political economists because it seeks to check the greatest source of national waste; it meets the views of the philanthropist because it seeks to elevate and ennoble mankind and rescue the perishing."

CHAPTER V.

THEY were fully furnished with all that wealth could procure or elegance suggest. They consisted of sitting, dressing, and bed rooms; but they were comfortable and tasteful in a superlative degree. You had only to see them in the noontide or the setting sun to say so. Just now the light from the fading fire that feebly flickered casting weird shadows across floor and walls and ceiling, and the turned down light of a lamp, were all that lighted up the rooms. Just then the maid trimmed the fire, partly turned the lamp up, and even by night the suite looked beautiful, but its chief grace was its cosiness. Standing on the threshold you saw nothing save a portion of the wall, for a handsome draught screen hid all the rest from view. Coming round by it, however, you stood in a room where everything seemed combined to yield voluptuous ease. Heavy curtains on windows and on door precluded draught. Chairs designed to lull the sense into supreme ease, a couch fitted to banish fatigue, carpets, rugs, and hassocks, to minister ease to the weary or to gratify the indolent, were there. But you could not gather from these the character of her who used them; these may be seen in the rooms of those who never rise higher than the gratifications they afford. Here they were a very subordinate part of the furnishings indeed, though their profusion might at first attract the eye. Close by one of the windows was a table that told of hard literary work; there was quite a pile of sheets closely written. The sheet half written and the pen lying across it showed that the writer had been busily engaged not long ago. A little whatnot with books apparently well used, clearly showed that they were for constant use and not merely for show. Near by was a table of quite a different kind. It was crowded with books, many in elegant bindings. Magazines, engravings, photographs, and some of the finest etchings are in that portfolio that rests on the stand hard by. A piano open with a piece of classic music displayed, also speaks for the musical ability of the fair occupant of this delightful room. In its centre stands a table with a book or two, one or two floral ornaments, and a lamp which casts its shaded light around. Adjoining was the bed-room equally elegant and equally comfortable, from which the rays from the flickering fire streamed out, and blended with fire and lamp light of the room we have sought to describe. You saw some engravings on the walls, and if you at once inferred that their presence there was due to their intrinsic worth you would be right. On the marble chimney piece there were several beautiful bronze figures marked by the severe taste that pervaded all the objects in the room. There were also three photographs exquisitely framed, a young and an old man much alike, whom you guessed and guessed rightly were her father and brother; the other was that of a lady advanced in years, yet still possessed of that beauty which a long career of goodness stamps upon the features and which time is never able to efface. Taste and order ruled all things, and you were more inclined to think that the rooms were got ready for some future occupant than that they were being every day in use by the only daughter of a landed gentleman willing to gratify her every wish, and who was in danger of spoiling her if that could be possible.

Just as we have completed our hasty survey of this lovely place we hear a footstep on the stairs. It is a woman's footstep, and so heavy that we know before we see her that her heart is heavy and her countenance sad. Presently the door opens and a young girl enters the room. Yes, she is sad, the sadness of anxiety and apprehension clouds her brow. As the flickering light plays on her features there is no answering smile. Dora is too downcast for that. She turns up the light which floods the room with its brilliance, heightening in a high degree its beauty, but we look at Dora as she stands by the table looking at something hidden from us, but painfully present to her mind's eye. She was beautiful, not that sickly wax-like beauty which some extremely æsthetic people affect, but the healthy beauty begot of a co-ordinate development of all her powers. She was a finely formed girl with an easy graceful carriage which was as much part of herself as her hair. She was a brunette in complexion, and the blood as it mantled in her cheeks gave her olive complexion the hue of one of those Spanish or Italian women which are to be seen in the masterpieces of Velasquez or Murillo. Her face was a fine oval, and her hair naturally ringletted was as glossy as the raven's wing. Her eyes when animated sparkled as if with fire, but ordinarily their brilliancy was softened by her long eyelashes. Her mouth was exquisitely formed, not Apollo's bow was more graceful in its curvature than the curve of her lips—ruddier than the cherry and set off with most beautiful pearly teeth. Although not rigidly regular, her features were remarkably free from irregularity: and altogether Dora Vernon's face would have taxed the powers of a great portrait painter to embody adequately on the canvas. She was free from that extreme plumpness of form which is the great blemish of women in the middle and higher ranks of life. Her manner was perfectly unconstrained, being not only easy but self-possessed she made those in her company as easy and unconstrained as she herself was. Dora was in short in the fulness of life and spirit, which in itself greatly enhanced her beauty, and she was good. Living with her parents almost always in the country, under the careful training of a governess who had a passionate desire to make her pupil a woman in every sense, she grew in beauty, and sense, and goodness, and was liked if not loved by all who were on terms of friendship or were dependent upon her.

Dora wished as she stood by the table that her governess had not gone away, but she was married and settled about a year ago, more than a hundred miles away. Dora still thought, still stood looking as it were far away. At last she sat down and began to gaze into the fire abstracted and absorbed. She was apparently unable to disentangle the web into which matters at Elmfield had become involved. At last she spoke. The sound of her silvery voice, a voice that offered evidence of the immense care and patience with which it had been trained, startled her, and she half looked round as if others were in the room as well as herself.

"I must get at the bottom of all these disquieting matters. Poor Wentworth is sadly changed since he has gone from home, even changed to me. How kind and good a brother he was to me, the partner on my riding, boating, botanizing excursions, always helpful, always watchful. But since he has gone to college how changed to be sure. Moody, heedless, wilful and given, I fear, to low pleasures. Jones does not like his service, yet Jones has few scruples about anything, and then, what means his deep seated aversion to Mr. Milbank, when quite a contrary feeling should fill his breast. There is some mystery there, which for my own peace and my brother's character I must fathom. Could they have met before? Surely not. Why not? That boy Jones knows very much of my brother's doings, and seems desirous of leaving his service if he has not already done so. Wentworth went off from the hotel with bad words on his tongue, and he behaved very badly to Milbank; can they have met before? If they have, the shame is not on Milbank's side. I am strangely interested in him, and do wish my brother was as much so. How strangely he has come amongst us. It is most wonderful that he should still continue as one of the family, but one need not wonder when his behaviour is taken into account. When he stopped the horses, he drove me home as if he had been my own brother. When he was provided with clothes he appeared a perfect gentleman, and ever since he has acted as one. How kind he is; goes out with my father and feels a deep interest in all around our home: and father wishes that Wentworth was only as practical and sagacious as he is. My mother is much impressed in his favour. He speaks to her of London and London society as if he had moved in it, and to me how kind: gets the piano in order, or reads to me, or makes up a quiet rubber. I am deeply interested in him, and anxious to penetrate all the mystery that hangs over him. Why should I? He must soon leave, for Wentworth has told his father that the same house shall not hold both, and father cannot prefer a stranger to his own son. He will have to go, but I will never forget his bravery and his after kindness, and if he goes he shall not go away empty handed." By this time a tear welled over her eye and fell upon her hand; covering her face with her handkerchief Dora had a good cry, but her tell-tale heart could have roundly affirmed that three tears out of four were for the stranger.

Starting up she touched the bell and passed into her bed-room; when the maid appeared she said,

"Annette, will you send Jones here?"

In a minute she came out refreshed, in another minute Jones appeared.

"Jones, are you still in my brother's service?"

"No, Miss, I am this minute discharged; but I don't leave with Mr. Wentworth. I am to stay till Jenkins is on his pins—I mean, miss, on his legs."

"Is Mr. Wentworth leaving?"

"Yes, to-morrow; I am packing up his toggery; I mean his things."

"Where is he going?"

"Oh my! Excuse me, Miss, the place has such an ugly name, quite a flavour of brimstone."

"Oh, I understand, you need not trouble yourself to name the place. Does father know?"

"Yes, and takes on awfully about it. But Wentworth says quite boldly that he goes because Mr. Milbank stays."

"Jones, you can tell me if ever the gentlemen met before?"

"Oh, yes I can. They have, Miss, and a jolly meeting; I mean, a very unfriendly meeting it was. They met at Wantage, M'am, and Milbank said, 'You sha'n't ill-treat the young woman.'"

"Jones!"

"Oh, I am mum, ah, I mean I am dumb, Miss."

"We'll, they quarrelled?"

"They did, and master got the worst of it by a long way. The other gentleman put a settler on master's mug-trap. Oh, I mean the ruby flowed; no, I mean that by a well planted blow on his bellows's; the fact is master got the worst of it."

"No doubt, Jones! Well, go and attend on Mr. Wentworth; but, Jones, be very discreet and say nothing to anyone about what you have told me."

"Oh, Miss, I will never say a word, and if you and master will only keep me in your service I will serve you night and day."

"Well, well, that is a matter for my father, who will see in a day or two."

Dora wrote on when it was far on in the night, and at last went to her devotions and her bed.

With Milbank it was different. It was the last night that he was to be under that roof which had sheltered him now nearly for a week. He might have left with less regret had he only had the pleasure of another of the delightful evenings he had spent in Elmfield. To leave Miss Dora and wander forth again as the prodigal, whom a father in the public prints was vainly entreating to return: to be compelled to leave the society of so lovely a woman because her brother was an ingrate, and worse, to have to leave his own home because his brother had conspired against his peace and set his parents against him. "Had my brother been able to say as much of me as I could say of Wentworth Vernon there might have been cause for the treatment he bestowed on me. Stay there, Henry, you perhaps charge the old man falsely: be generous to him, let your antipathy against your unnatural brother be as great as he deserves. Well, well, I shall see to-morrow. Mrs. Ingram was glad to see me; I misjudge her if she is not as willing to assist me."

Oh, what an evening that was to Jones. He could not conceal the joy which filled him at the thoughts of getting rid of his master. So little could he hide it that he so whistled and capered while engaged in packing up that Wentworth, who sat moodily by the fire, turned round and said,

"What the deuce are you howling at, one would think you were baying at the moon."

"Ah, sir, if I howled you might tremble at the thoughts of leaving to-morrow."

"None of your superstitious cant."

"Oh, I am dumb."

In a little the old elation struggled to get vent, and Jones was whistling louder than ever.

"Look you here, Jones, stop that noise, or I'll pitch you out of the window."

"Mum's the word," said Jones, with a grimace that Master Wentworth would not have cared to see.

"You are not away yet, sir."

"How do you know that, impudence?"

"'Cos he is going off to-morrow afternoon."

"Is he?"

"Yes, to the great grief of the whole establishment."

Up started Wentworth and tried to get hold of Jones, but he was quite alert and ducked and dived now round, now behind a chair, till Wentworth sat down breathless and glared on him.

Up got Jones on a table, and striking an attitude said,

"Most potent, grave—no, I beg your pardon, but if you will tell me what I have done to offend you, you would do me a favour of the right sort."

"What did you say about great grief, &c., just now."

"What did I say; why, please sir, I said that we all of us are sorry that Mr. Milbank is going away. The real fact, on my soul. Just think he saved Miss Dora, he pleases Master, my Master now, and Misses, he is not stuck up, he never gives trouble, and so we all feel sorry that he's going."

"Come down, you young whelp, and I'll teach you better sense than speak about a vagabond in such terms."

"Oh, I come down at once; here we are on terra-firmer once again, and I'll relieve you of my presence, but if it was the last word I ever said that gentleman is a real gentleman, and all the rest on us would give our 'davy on it."

Jones vanished. In the long night during most of which he sat by the fire with the untasted wine on the table at his elbow, remembrance was busy with the conscience of Wentworth. She held up a mirror that almost seared his eyeballs, for it showed him how foolish, how wicked he had been, and he was almost persuaded to be filial to his father and friendly to the preserver of his sister.

THIRD NOTICE.

In a few final words we will take our leave of this interesting book. We have seen how Sir Henry views the fashionable dinner with its load of dainties, which quite unlike Balaam is invited to bless our stomachs, and instead of that curses it with the evils that excess brings in its train. Against the present public dinner with the magnitude of its display, its dangerous excesses and its evil results Sir Henry firmly protests. He would amend it by reducing its solids and would greatly restrict the dimensions of the flowing bowl by limiting those formidable incentives to deep potations—toasts. Here we have a London physician quite restive under the dozen or two of toasts that clamour to be honoured on such occasions. A few months ago we had a veteran Edinburgh journalist making a similar remonstrance against toasting as a usage more honoured in these days in the breach than in the observance. Are we wrong in our belief that such a relic of gross barbarism is doomed soon to have a place in "the tomb of the Capulets?" We think not, and we are specially pleased with even the mild amendment on our present system of toast-drinking which Sir Henry lays before his readers. "Might it not be better worth trying the experiment of offering fewer dishes, better service, and abolishing half the toasts?" His scheme, if toasting was good in itself, and only abused at present, would do well. But as toasting in itself is only a piece of paganism, we simply approve of his scheme as being less evil than the present absurd and injurious usage. He would give the Queen and Royal Family as the first toast: "Our National Institutions" as the second. This toast would include parliament, its leaders: justice, our judges: military and naval forces, their officers: education, heads of universities and public schools: religion, its ministers: science and art, heads of societies, academies, colleges: literature and press, distinguished writers. The third would be the "Toast of the evening," the real object of the dinner. There might be a fourth toast, that of the committee connected with the object, visitors, &c., &c. When our public dinner toasts are thus restricted and clergy dinners have gone out of fashion, we will have advanced very far indeed on our way to the abolition of the drinking usages.

Sir Henry has a conviction that good, pure, genuine wine is obtainable, but not from those firms that advertise. He would not be sincere if he did not harbour such a conviction. He says distinctly, "Whatever wine is given should be the most sound and unsophisticated of its kind which can be procured. The host had far better produce only a bottle or two of sound bourgeois wine from Bordeaux, than an array of fictitious mixtures with pretentious labels procured from an advertising cheap wine house." This being his conviction and his contempt of flashy wine cellars, we have just to see how he thinks it may be procured. He says, it may be procured in two ways; first, by finding some merchant of long standing and reputation who will do the applicant the favour to furnish them, and the price must be large for quality and age. Such a one will never advertise, for he confers a favour upon his customer by parting with such stock." But Sir Henry advises tipplers to be their own wine merchants, to buy in and bottle wine years before it is to be used. A man's wine cellar becomes in twenty or thirty years a possession of interest and value, and he can produce something curiously fine and free at all events from the deleterious qualities of new and fictitious wines. Of course Sir Henry overlooks, inadvertently, the fact that even all this begging and obligatoriness to a wine merchant, this investment and care upon wine bins, cannot make bad wine good, for we need not say that all that Sir Henry can claim is that such wine is not the worst, and he cannot affirm that it is other than bad after all the wealth and pains expended. Should not the rigid and unsparing in our ranks have some commiseration for the ignorant and foolish that fall by the publican's strong ones, when they see a gentleman like Sir Henry Thompson writing about wine in the strain he adopts in his book? Pure genuine wine free from alcohol is only to be got direct from the grape, not from the vat: it is the juice kept from fermentation not the foaming liquor that seethes, grows turbid, and at last bites like a serpent and stings like an adder. Sir Henry's wine is too dear to be indulged in freely and does less harm, but it prepares the way for those more potent beverages that vitiate the body and ensnare the soul.

Sir Henry has so deeply enchained us that we plunge deeper and deeper into the interesting subject. He unfolds the rule, which has the general gastronomic consent laid down for those who indulge in the luxury of wine. The rule is "to offer pale sherry or dry Sauterne after soup, delicate Rhine wine after fish, a glass of Bordeaux with the joint of mutton, the same or champagne, dry, but with some true vinous character in it (is he afraid of gooseberries?) during the entrees; the best red wine with the game, and—but this ought to suffice even for the exceptional individual who is supposed to be little if at all injured by "moderate potations." With the ice, a glass of full flavoured but matured champagne or a liqueur may be served, but at this point dietetic admonitions are out of place, and we have already sacrificed to luxury. There are no less than six glasses of wine allowed under this gastronomic rule, a quantity sufficient to impel the craving for drink to greater excesses, while at the same time it has almost if not altogether broke from the control of self-restraint. At this most dangerous moment a beneficent genie is near and has only to be invoked to say Canute-like, "This far but no farther." This beneficent genie is—a cigarette. "The value of a cigarette at this moment is that with the first whiff of its fragrance the palate ceases to demand either food or wine; after smoke the power to appreciate good wine is lost." Is it any wonder on reading these words that many will be able to account for the immense amount of bad wines which play such havoc at our private and public dinners. But Sir Henry claims tobacco as an ally of temperance. "A relationship for him"—"the Gourmet"—of the most perfect order is that which subsists between coffee and fragrant smoke. While wine and tobacco are antipathetic, the one affecting injuriously all that is grateful in the other, the aroma of coffee "marries" perfectly with the perfume of the finest leaf. Only by the uncultured classes of Great Britain and other northern nations, who appear to possess the most insensitive palates in Europe, have smoke and alcoholic drinks been closely associated. By such tobacco and spirit have been sought chiefly as drugs, and are mainly taken for their effects on the nervous system—the easy but disastrous means of becoming stupid, besotted, or drunk. People of cultivated tastes on the other hand select their tobacco or their wines, not for their qualities as drugs, but for those subtler attributes of flavour and perfume which exist often in inverse proportion to the injurious narcotic ingredients, which latter are "as much as possible avoided, or are accepted chiefly for the sake of the former." Here again we must take care and not drink these poisonous drugs even with the knowledge Sir Henry imparts that a whiff of a cigarette will at once "draw the fires" of our drink appetite, or that we should proceed to learn the art of coffee drinking and smoking to be a fit and proper person for cultured society and able to withstand the insidious approach of fragrant alcoholic wines. Let us rather choose to avoid the wine glass, the tobacco pipe, and the coffee cup, and fall back on these pleasures that never fail, and which like Barkis are willing to afford us simple delights whenever we desire them.

Through all the mazes—many of them thorny—of this book in which we have followed Sir Henry, we have often dwelt with delight on the pleasant subjects which from time to time have presented themselves. The last of the oases is the best. We again quote Sir Henry—"Before quitting the subject of dining it must be said that after all those who drink water with that meal probably enjoy food more than those who drink wine. They have generally better appetites, and they certainly preserve an appreciative palate longer than the wine drinker. Water is so important an element to them that they are not indifferent to its quality and source. No admixture of wine or spirit counteracts the poison in tainted water and makes it safe to drink, as people often delight to believe, but the simple process of boiling it renders it perfectly harmless: and this result is readily attained in any locality by making weak tea to be taken hot and cold, or in making toast water, barley water, lemonade, &c." Sir Henry recommends seltzer and similar waters, but he tells us that ample slices of water melon are delicious. Let us thank him for suggesting an option as regards water and wine, and thank him for showing us the best aspect in which wine drinking can be presented. We have seen how grave is the responsibility of tampering with these wines, even pure and genuine as Sir Henry thinks them, the extreme care with which pure as they are they must be used, the evils they inflict upon nineteen out of every twenty who drink them, the great freedom from danger which is begot of abstinence from them, the superiority of the appetite of the abstainer over that of the very moderate drinker which Sir Henry desires to see: and we will learn from this volume of "Food and Feeding" to be more rigorous in our aversion to all alcoholic liquors, more loyal in our adherence to the practice of true and delightful temperance, and more anxious to diffuse the knowledge that lies at the basis of the great temperance reformation.

LEMONADE.—Boil 1 lb. sugar in half-pint of water, pour on to half ounce citric or tartaric acid; when cold add 15 drops essence of lemon, boil it, and when wanted mix with water.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, FEBRUARY, 1881.

* * We have been compelled to leave over "Dunse Auxiliary Report," "Midlothian Memorial," and other important items.

On Thursday, 27th ult., the Lord Advocate was elected Member of Parliament for the city of Edinburgh over Mr. E. Jenkins, by a majority of 7,450, the numbers being—for his Lordship, 11,390; for Mr. Jenkins, 3,940. This does not alter the strength of the Scottish Local Option vote, which on the 18th June last stood as follows:—For Local Option, 40 votes and 3 pairs, against 5 only votes, showing 8 to 1 in favour of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution.

In our news column will be found an account of the presentation to Councillor John Hope, W.S., Edinburgh, of an illuminated address and album containing the signatures of between three and four thousand of abstainers in Edinburgh and neighbourhood, who in this happy way gratefully recognise the invaluable services which he has during a long life rendered to the cause of temperance. We rejoice at this presentation, and gladly bear our testimony to Councillor Hope's generous liberality to the movement. On two occasions, by a munificent donation to the funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, Councillor Hope enabled its executive to increase the agencies and extend the operations of the Association. His generous help at the time materially contributed to the energy and progress of the agitation.

One of the most cheering indications of the growing prevalence of temperance sentiment comes from the Glasgow School Board. It has for some time been evident that applicants for licenses have been very desirous of getting premises closely contiguous to schools, so that they might accustom the youthful attenders to the presence of a place for refreshments, even if they did not venture, by unwarrantable inducements, to get scholars to become customers. The School Board of Glasgow, in the interests of the young committed to their care, are asked, by notice of motion, to oppose every application for a license, if sought for premises nearer than two hundred yards to any of the schools under their charge. Of course it might well be successfully argued that if it be bad for the child to have a public house near the school he attends, it must be worse for him to be subjected to the temptations of a public house adjacent to where he lives and plays. Still the School Board has power only over its own schools and their amenity, and if it decides to oppose the presence of public houses near the schools, it will be deserving of the thanks of all right-thinking people. With prevention without, and temperance teaching within the schoolroom, the scholars in Glasgow will enjoy advantages which will in future be very gainful to society.

The Americans—why don't we call them Uncle Jonathan now?—manifest daring in whatever they undertake. During the late political campaign New Hampshire put up as their Democratic candidate Mr. Frank Jones, an extensive brewer of Portsmouth, in that State. A procession in his honour came upon the State prison, and their amazement and their disgust may be faintly imagined when they found a transparency displayed on the prison walls with the very significant inscription, "JONES' BEER BROUGHT US HERE." It was all that the prisoners could say, and it was most effective. Jones did not win. We commend this idea to those who aid discharged prisoners—those who seek to improve the condition of the poor. They could not, in our opinion, do better than appoint a Commission to visit the prisons and poorhouses of their district, and on learning to whose drink the unfortunate inmates owed their incarceration, display the information on the prison wall or the poorhouse gate for the enlightenment of the suffering and burdened rate-payers. Were this done, when the direct veto is on the statute book, there would be a very speedy and proper attempt made not merely to adopt it but to enforce it in the neighbourhood of the prison or the poorhouse affording such significant information.

We believe that many of our readers will be looking forward with some interest to the appearance some months hence of the Revised New Testament. We have been told to expect the disappearance of the three witnesses of 1 John vii. 8, the story of the woman taken in adultery, which will be as ill to bear as the exclusion of the romantic battle of Luncarty from Scottish national history, and to be prepared for a great many other changes in our dearly beloved New Testament. But as temperance reformers we will doubtless be looking for a great many changes vindicatory of our claim for the New Testament as a temperance book. For instance, there are the words self-control and self-restrained, forbearing, sedate, sensible, discreet, abstinent, continent, &c., rendered by temperance, moderation, sobriety (of mind), and sobriety (of body); now temperance, moderation, sobriety, are uniformly rendered by a corresponding English term. Epi-ikees, Epi-ikta though only occurring seven times altogether, is translated by four distinct words, and sophron is also translated in five different ways. If the translators have done their duty conform to their high reputation for wide and accurate scholarship, we shall find that many a difficulty which could only stand on mistranslations has been removed, and that the harmony between our principles and those of the New Testament is more clearly disclosed.

Every friend of temperance and prohibition must have learned with regret of the resignation of Mr. Duncan M'Laren, M.P. for the City of Edinburgh, and must have felt at the same time that their regrets have been shared by the best politicians of all parties. For sixteen years he has faithfully represented the interests of the City of Edinburgh, and done great services besides to his country. As a temperance reformer he can show a record of brilliant services in connection with the Scottish Licensing Act, and the Irish Sunday Closing Act, but more than these the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill and Local Option resolution. No one in the Lobby was more accessible, or more willing to render substantial services to the leaders of the prohibitory movement, promoting the interests of the Bill or Resolution in the lobby of the House of Commons, and no one has so often introduced Scottish deputations of prohibitionists into the presence of Lord Advocates or Home Secretaries. At a moment when weighted with the burden of age he retires from the fierce heat that beats upon the political stage of life, we bear our humble but emphatic testimony to his noble service since his entrance into Parliament to the temperance reformation and to the unflagging support he was so ready to render Sir Wilfrid Lawson on every division that has taken place on his Bill and resolution. May the remainder of his life be passed in the quiet and reverence of family affection, and may the remembrance of what he has been enabled to do for the benefit of his fellow men gild his declining years!

The London Temperance Hospital has now been seven years in existence, and with what blessed results we can easily ascertain. Since it was opened, 9336 patients have been admitted; 942 or 10 per cent. were treated within and the rest outside the Hospital. Two-thirds of the applicants declared themselves abstainers; the others non-abstainers; Only two deaths under the surgeon's hands are recorded, and of the 942 only 40 or 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. died—a mortality much below that of the other London hospitals. The cases in the surgical wards included Cæsarian section, lithotomy, ligature of the carotid artery, excisions of tumours, etc. Nothing could be more gratifying than the results of these cases, or is so fitted to strengthen the convictions of abstainers in the non-alcoholic treatment of disease. It is perhaps not so well known as it deserves to be that, although any of the medical officers can prescribe alcohol, yet it is never done. As a pharmaceutical solvent, for which alcohol is now so largely used, the ordinary alcoholic tinctures have been superseded in the Hospital by tinctures made with a solution of glycerine. These tinctures have proved to be perfectly efficient. Their cost is only one-fifth that of the ordinary alcoholic tinctures, and they are never drunk surreptitiously by people about the dispensary. As an article of diet, alcohol is formally excluded from the Hospital, and alcoholic beverages are never admitted to the meal table. Can any statement be more decisive against the use of alcohol in any form or shape as a drug or as diet? or have we ever had such emphatic testimony as to alcohol being neither food, fuel, or physic? We have not, and our friends, we hope, will not fail to support an institution which by the undeviating courage of its committee, and the eminent ability of its medical officers, has so signally contributed to the final triumph of the great temperance reformation.

The Unfermented Wine Vigilance Committee in London are doing a very necessary piece of service to the temperance movement by publishing the report of Mr. J. Carter Bell, the Salford Burgh Analyst, on unfermented wines. From the report, which appears in extenso in the advertisement columns of the annual report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, Mr. Bell examined eleven samples of wine submitted to the public by seven different parties, and in his report we have an excellent guide to them all. The first three samples belong to the great firm of W. & A. Gilbey, who assert that their wines are unfermented, which is true, but they are not non-alcoholic: two having 14 and one 40 per cent. proof spirits. Messrs. Kinloch & Co.'s sacramental wine is both fermented and alcoholic, having 26 per cent. of proof spirit. Messrs. Kramer & Strauss' "pure and genuine unfermented fruit of the vine" is carelessly prepared and has 2 $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. of proof spirit. Bell & Co. have three samples "unfermented juice of the grape," but they do not contain any juice of the grape, being simply carelessly prepared artificial compounds. Fairlie's new wine is not pure grape juice, and it contains 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of proof spirit. Wyndham & Co.'s purest unfermented wine contains 30 per cent. of proof spirit, showing not only that means have not been taken to remove the spirit as alleged, but that spirits have actually been added. Frank Wright's wine is the eleventh sample. He styles it "unfermented wine, free from alcohol and unintoxicating, preserved in vacuo by Frank Wright, 68 High St., Kensington, W. This wine is prepared from grapes specially imported from Andalusia, Burgundy, and the Medoc, for this purpose. It is guaranteed to be the true fruit of the wine." Mr. Bell, in his report on this sample says, "My examination of this sample confirms the statement made upon the label that it is pure grape juice and free from alcohol. An exhaustive analysis of the ash shows it to be the same in amount and to consist of the same constituents as the ash from grape juice pressed from the fruit by myself. In this respect there is a marked distinction between this and all the other samples referred to." Mr. Bell's exhaustive report is signed on the 25th Sept. last. We have several times in these columns and in the interests of true temperance reform fearlessly exposed the discreditable attempts being made to foist a sham sacramental wine upon the temperance community, and we point to Mr. Bell's report with pleasure as supplying the best information procurable on the subject. After his exposure "surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird."

On the 18th ult. Mr. M'Laren, M.P. for Edinburgh, applied for and accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds. The event was wholly unexpected. His son, the Hon. John M'Laren, Lord-Advocate, immediately sought the suffrages of the electors, and issued his address. To all appearance it seemed as if he were to be returned unopposed, Mr. Trayner generously giving way in his favour. Mr. Edward Jenkins, who, on the last Parliament was one of the members for the burgh of Dundee, and a Liberal, unexpectedly entered the field against his Lordship. He did so, he said, on the grounds that as a citizen of this country he had a perfect right to contest any vacant seat—this right is not denied, it is its judicious exercise at the present time which is in question—and that as a private member he could attend better to the interests of the city than as an official of the Government, who by his position is under reticence or restraint. We are glad that both candidates are in favour of Local Option. Mr. Jenkins has voted both for the Permissive Bill and Local Option resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and spoke in their behalf both in and out of Parliament. His Lordship has repeatedly declared himself in favour of the principle for which the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association contends, and there is every reason to believe that in Parliament he will give that principle his support, and render to the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement as valuable service as his father. Both candidates being agreed on this issue, the battle will be fought out at the poll on other grounds. We hope by delaying the issue of our magazine, to announce to our readers the result of the poll.

Unenviable as are the reputations of the Glasgow music-halls, they are, with one exception, deprived of the power of dispensing alcoholic liquors to their frequenters. That exception is the Royal Music Hall in Dunlop Street, known more particularly as "Davie Brown's." Mr. Brown has recently died, and we observe that the hall, drinking-bar, &c., is to let. Not many years ago, the magistrates of the city had an opportunity of withdrawing the license from this hall, but shrunk from availing themselves of it on the plea of being invidious as regards Mr. Brown, and since that the bar has been left to exercise its dangerous influence upon those who frequented the hall and craved for liquors. The mischief done by the sale of liquors in such places is incalculable, for the ideas of amusement and drinking get inextricably associated in the mind, and intoxicating liquors are held indispensable to all enjoyment. Seeing that the other music-halls in the city are carried on without the adjunct of a drinking bar, and yet are successful, we think our city magistrates should on no account allow of the transfer of the late Mr. Brown's license to a new tenant. They are responsible for the morals as well as the peace of the city, and are bound to remove, as far as is in their power, every source of public corruption; and in our opinion a drinking-bar in a theatre or music-hall is a manifest element of social corruption that should not be tolerated.

The editor of the Christian News replies to the article in our last issue on his criticism on the now famous deputation to the Lord Advocate. We will pass over his opinion of either the style of our article or the status of its writer. It is, we suspect, a matter of indifference to the members of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association who edits the Social Reformer, provided its advocacy and teachings are in harmony with the principles and aims of the Association, and while we maintain that they are, our members are the best judges whether or not such is the case. The real issue between the writer and ourselves lies in this, that he ignores the fact that union on the basis of our full, pure, radical veto between the leading Scottish temperance organisations has been attained. The writer says we have declared in favour of our veto and also in favour of restrictions on the liquor traffic, and because we have done this we have failed in our duty at this time. We on the other hand maintain, and we point to our statement as proof, that we have in no degree resiled from our position, and that we have secured the alliance of the Scottish temperance reformers in a determined legislative effort to secure our veto. Before the Lord Advocate a statement was made by our representative calculated to remove all misconceptions in his Lordship's mind as to our position and our demand, and yet the writer never once judges us by that. We had, we believe, a ground of complaint, and we are sorry to find that in his second article the writer never once refers to that official statement. It is evidently in vain for us to ask to be judged by our own official documents, but notwithstanding we cannot submit to be tried by any other. A generous interpretation of our position would have been given no doubt if the writer had remembered how often we have declared that license was inherently mischievous, and yet that we invariably declined to oppose any restrictions on the liquor traffic which might be imposed. We have resolved, time after time, as an association, that no legislation would be satisfactory that did not embody our veto, and we have declared that we would accept any Government measure not reactionary which did contain the veto we demand. If the licensing clauses in the famous six points were in operation, they would never harm the community nor obstruct the adoption of the veto. Take Glasgow for example: were her public houses closed at 8 p.m. on lawful days there would be a considerable amount of the temptation removed at the time when it was peculiarly formidable; were our theatres and our music hall purged of their drinking bars, a dangerous evil would be removed. Were the 34 hotels prohibited from supplying the 4000 mala-fide travellers that infest Glasgow all the Sabbaths of the year, it would be better for the church and the world. But will any one affirm that the operations of any or all of these licensing clauses would do more than impose a feeble check on the operations of the liquor traffic, or render the adoption of the veto by the citizens of

St. Mungo less of a necessity. The organisation that made these clauses the condition of its support to the veto does not believe that. If the Government brings in a licensing measure embodying our demand, it would, we thoroughly believe, receive the vigorous support of the staunchest friends of prohibition, not on account of the restrictions it would impose, but solely on account of the veto it would contain. We accept the alloy of restriction because of the pure gold of suppression which will be easier to procure. It is not at all probable that all the burghs in Scotland will immediately accept the veto, and it may be in those burghs that are pleased to wait until the veto has been in successful operation elsewhere, that restrictive clauses such as 3, 4, 5 and 6, may limit in some degree the power for evil of the traffic, but we are convinced that all our cities and burghs will never rest satisfied with any remedy that comes short of suppression by the votes of the ratepayers. Hence our belief that in getting the temperance movement united on our demand, we are promoting the best interests of the agitation by showing the Government that the veto we desire is the demand of every section of the movement, and must sooner or later become the law of the country. We have already said that we believed that we had the approval of the best friends of prohibition for the course we have taken, and although we are very desirous of giving earnest heed to what the writer has to say on the matter, we not only see no occasion to alter our opinion, but good grounds for holding it more firmly. Our friends judge us by our statement, the writer excludes it altogether from his consideration. We are not disposed to enter upon a discussion with the writer upon the existence or extinction of the association. Neither we nor he can of ourselves determine either the one way or the other. But we shall certainly never plead for a tolerated existence. We do not care who completes the victory we have fought for, provided that victory is won. We leave the association in the hands of its supporters, whose province it is to determine the nature and length of its existence. Certainly we should not like to see it perish merely because we have displeased the writer while so much remains for it to do. Its work in the warfare against the liquor traffic will bear investigation, and the executive need not shrink from a scrutiny of its efforts, come when it may. The writer fails to perceive the relation of this association to the Scottish permissive prohibitory movement. But for the failure of his perception his judgment would have been in its favour rather than against it. The association sprang into being to combine the power of the Scottish abstainers with all moral reformers (whether abstainers or not) against the liquor traffic, and now that such union has been attained, the writer declares that the desert of the association is extinction. Notwithstanding that it has been unfortunate enough to fall under his displeasure, we believe that it will advance rapidly towards the goal of its efforts, growing in numbers, influence, and power, reaping as it moves success, and when its warfare ends in a decisive final victory we shall welcome its last sigh as joyfully as the bold Free Traders witnessed the obsequies of the Anti-Corn Law League.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

THE Parliamentary session opened on the 6th ult. The proceedings were wholly devoid of State ceremonial. The crowd was smaller than is usually the case. Her Majesty appears certainly far from being impartial as regards the great parties in the State. The Queen's Speech was a lengthy document, but contained no reference to the liquor traffic. On the reassembling of the House of Commons in the afternoon, an immense array of notices of questions and motions were put. Among these were a notice of motion by Sir Henry James as to corrupt practices at elections; the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill, by Mr. Roberts; bill to amend the law relating to the custody and treatment of lunatics, by Mr. Dillwyn; Married Women's Property Bill, Mr. Hinde Palmer; the English Sunday Closing Bill, Mr. Stevenson; Resolution on Local Taxation, Sir B. Leighton; appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the incidence of Local Taxation, Mr. Duckham; bill for the closing of public houses during the hours of Parliamentary polling, an hon. member (Mr. Carbutt); resolution on the opium traffic, Mr. Pease; Married Women's Property Bill (Scotland), Mr. Anderson; question by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, "On Monday next, 10th ult., to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government intend to introduce any measure during the present session for carrying out the resolutions of the House with respect to the licensing system and local option."

On Friday, 7th, Mr. Roberts was successful in balloting for a place, and his Welsh Sunday Closing Bill stands at first order on Wednesday, 4th May, when the second reading will be discussed.

On Saturday morning 8th, Mr. Stevenson's Sunday Closing Bill became the victim of the order of the House, which decrees that opposed motions cannot be taken up after 12:30 A.M. Mr. Callan blocked the way.

On Monday, 10th, Sir Wilfrid Lawson put his question to the Prime Minister. Mr. Gladstone's reply was a negative one. He concluded by saying that he hoped his hon. friend would not be surprised when he (Mr. Gladstone) said that there was no likelihood of the Government being able to deal with the licensing laws. He then sat down amid the perfect silence of the House. During the sitting Mr. Stevenson got Wednesday 6th July for the second reading of the English Sunday Closing Bill.

On Tuesday, 11th, Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice that on the earliest possible day he would move "that in the opinion of this House the resolution passed by the House on the 18th June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic, ought without delay to be embodied by the Government in a bill giving effect to such resolution."

On Wednesday, 12th, Sir Charles Dilke moved for a return of the number of electors in each constituency in the United Kingdom, and Mr. Carbutt's bill for the closing of public houses during polling at Parliamentary elections was read a first time.

On Tuesday, 18th, Mr. Pugh gave notice of a bill to amend the licensing act of 1873, so far as related to the qualification of the licensing justices.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL ON PROHIBITION.—
"The suppression of public-houses solves, in a great measure, the social question of the working man's independence."—"Life of Prince Imperial." Page 260. Griffith & Farran.

DEATH FROM ONE POISON INSTEAD OF ANOTHER.—A young man, Walker, died at Berwick through drinking, on New-Year's day, a glass of vitrol, which he had mistaken for whisky. He died, you see, from not being a teetotaler.

THE GOVERNMENT AND TOTAL ABSTINENCE.—The following members of Government are total abstainers:—Lord Granville, Lord Spencer, Sir C. Dilke, Bart, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Mundella. Of these, three are members of the cabinet.

There are 20,000 total abstainers in the British army—8,000 of them belong to the army in India. 7,000 abstainers are in the navy; 158 of them officers. Of the 4,000 boys in training ships, nearly a-half are abstainers. In the navy it is said the pledged and unpledged abstainers number nearly 10,000.—Times.

The inmates in Falmouth Union number 149. Only one half-pint of beer is consumed there daily, and it is by a man ninety-five years of age. The medical officer for Falmouth town and parish, and also the parish of Budeock, says, no pauper in these places has one drop of intoxicating drink by my order. I prescribe and order milk freely for them.

Joseph Livesey has entered on the fiftieth year of his life of total abstinence. He took his last and his best glass of liquor—whisky and water—in 1831, at M'Kie's in Lune Street. Somehow, it caused him to reflect and vow he would never take another, and he has kept his word. Eternity only will tell how many last glasses have been taken under the influence of his cogent arguments and impressive appeals.

MILK IN SUMMER AND WINTER.—It is well known that milk is now largely sold in glasses, and highly appreciated in summer. To stimulate its sale in winter, some clever person has invented a heating apparatus, so that it may be had warm. Baked 'taters, hot and warm milk, with a piece of bread, should furnish a luxurious meal for cabmen, policemen, porters, and similarly exposed public servants.

The Journal of Applied Science enlightens the nations on the production of beer, number of brewers, and the consumption of beer per head in Europe. We learn that Great Britain has 26,214 breweries, which produce 1,050,000,000 gallons of beer, the consumption of which, by her population, averages 32 gallons a-head. Norway has no breweries, yet she produces 16,500,000 gallons, and consumes 8 gallons a-head. The Belgians consume 38 gallons per head, and are consequently the greatest beer swilling nation in Europe—a most unenviable notoriety.

STRONG DRINK.—The art of distilling was discovered by an Arabian chemist in the ninth or tenth century. Europe and America have been the places where this poison has been the most extensively used, and there it has degraded and ruined millions, and is yearly sweeping tens of thousands unprepared into a wretched eternity. There is no scourge, whether pestilence or war, so fatally destructive of the best interests of man, or any custom so paralysing to all benevolent exertions to train the young in the love and fear of the Lord as the use of distilled and fermented liquors. Through their use thousands of almost broken-hearted mothers, who would delight to send their children to the Sabbath school, are compelled to keep them clothed in rags confined in their squalid homes.—Mimpriss' Gospel Treasury.

"The following is the position I occupied, and the language I used to the American people, at one of the darkest periods known in the conflict with the slave power. Slavery must be overthrown. No matter how formidable the obstacles, or how strong the foes to be vanquished, slavery must cease to pollute the land. No matter whether the event be near or remote, whether the taskmaster willingly or unwillingly relinquish his arbitrary power, whether by a peaceful or a bloody process, slavery must die. No matter though, to effect it, every party should be torn by dissensions, every sect dashed into fragments, the national compact dissolved, the land filled with the horrors of a civil and a servile war, still slavery must be buried in the grave of infamy, beyond the possibility of a resurrection. If the State cannot survive the anti-slavery agitation, let the State perish. If the Church must be cast down by the strugglings of humanity to be free, let the Church fall, nevermore to curse the earth. If the American Union cannot be maintained except by immolating human freedom upon the altar of tyranny, let the American Union be smitten to the dust, and no tear be shed over its ashes. Abolitionists! remember that the foe with whom you are in conflict is 'full of all deceivableness of unrighteousness,' and will resort to every device to make you quit the field. 'Put on the whole armour of God;' so shall you be invincible. The war admits of no parley. No flag of truce must be sent or received by you; you must neither give nor take any quarter. As Samuel hewed Agag in pieces, so with the battle-axe of truth you must cleave the monster Slavery in twain, and thereby purge our guilty land."—WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON. This is a specimen of the faith that can remove mountains, and of which many soldiers in the British army of drink suppressionists would be better of a more ample portion. No wrong could maintain its existence in the face of a stalwart faith like Mr. Garrison's.

PRESENTATION TO COUNCILLOR HOPE, W.S.—A deputation from the committee appointed to draw up and present an address to Councillor John Hope, W.S., from the abstainers of Edinburgh and neighbourhood, waited upon that gentleman at his residence, 31 Moray Place, on Saturday, 15th ult. There were present—Councillor Somerville; Revs. J. Kay, F. L. Armitage; Messrs. J. Steel, S.S.C., J. Coutts, S.S.C.; Messrs. J. Nisbet, J. Armstrong, J. Linkie, W. Laing, J. M. Naughton, and J. H. Waterston. Mr. Waterston, secretary to the committee, and once a boy of the British Temperance League, introduced the deputation, and called on the Rev. J. Kay to make the presentation. Mr. Kay, chairman of the committee, briefly recapitulated the great services which Councillor Hope had rendered to the temperance movement. At a time when the cause of temperance was not so popular as now, Mr. Hope had had the sagacity to perceive that it lay at the foundation of all true social progress, and had held on his way with steadfast purpose, till at last it had been given him to see abundant fruit of his self-denying toil, and such an increase in the ranks of the abstainers from all intoxicants, that the day-dawn of their victory might be said to have arrived. He concluded by asking Councillor Hope's acceptance of an album, in which he would find inscribed the names of between three and four thousand of abstainers, all of whom had gracefully recognised Mr. Hope's eminent services to the temperance reformation. Councillor Hope returned his warmest thanks for the address, and for the kind wishes with which it was accompanied. The address recalled many things to his memory. The first of these was the principles on which the British League was founded. Those who professed abstinence at that time adopted it on the ground of expediency; while the view of the League was that God never intended alcoholic liquor, or tobacco, or opium, as articles of diet or beverage for healthy man. On this principle it was that they trained the children not to drink, just the same as that they were not to tell lies or steal. It was curious to find medical men now affirming this principle on scientific grounds—that alcohol was not a diet or a beverage for healthy man. The League was further founded on the recognition in Scripture of two sorts of wine—fermented and unfermented. They acknowledged both, but they did not acknowledge divine sanction to use the alcoholic wine. He had certainly expected greater results from these long years of work. He had always been told that he had begun at the right end in beginning with the young. One important question for the abstainers of the present day was the communion wine question. Its presence at the Lord's table gave alcohol a great prestige. It must be left to each congregation to act according to its circumstances; but he believed that this thing, which had become so fixed into our religious system, could be gradually removed, though it was not to be done by the sudden operation of a decision in the Church courts. Nothing, however, would give a greater stimulus to the cause of abstinence than the removal of alcohol from the Lord's table. A fearful responsibility attached to those ministers and sessions who forced it on persons so young as to be yet ignorant whether there was in them any hereditary tendency or desire for alcohol. The plea of Christian charity, however, required that provision be made for both parties in the Church. His position was that there should be that provision, that one part of the Church should be served with alcoholic, and the other with unfermented wine at the same communion. It was his opinion, that though they had the Permissive Bill now, they would not be able to carry prohibition generally throughout the country unless they first were able to remove alcoholic liquor from the Lord's table. After a few words from the Rev. Mr. Armitage, St. Leonard's, and Councillor Somerville, the Rev. Mr. Kay thanked Mr. Hope for their reception, and the deputation withdrew. The album was of large-quarto size, and of considerable thickness. It was bound in morocco, with gilt lines and edges, and contained many pages of signatures, following an address beautifully written in illuminated letters, the work of Mr. James Watson, writing master of the Young Ladies' College. It set forth in expressive and appropriate language the varied aspects of the long and faithful work of Mr. Hope in the temperance movement; the institution of the British League of Juvenile Abstainers, and the great educational effort in connection with that famous organization, which placed within the reach of thousands the benefits of a literary, temperance, and religious education. Allusion was made to other spheres in which Councillor Hope has striven to promote the temperance cause, and it was stated that, in carrying on his patriotic and benevolent work, he had not only given freely of his valuable professional time, but spent, ungrudgingly, a large portion of a princely fortune in doing good to his fellow-men, and concluded with the fervent prayers of the signatories that he might abide in grace and strength till the end comes, and be greeted on his entrance to the kingdom of heaven with the welcome, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Books, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

The Right Hand Cut Off: A sermon. By the Rev. Charles Bullock, B.D. London: "Home Words" Publishing Office, 1 Paternoster Buildings. One penny, or 6s. a hundred. Fifth thousand. A most practical sermon, distinguished by sound teaching and impressive appeal. Eminently worthy of the author of "the Temperance Witness Box." It deserves a circulation not of five but of fifty thousand.

The Mother's Prayer; The Cabman's Wife; The Mason's Home. By Mary Brighton. London: Jarrold & Son, 3 Paternoster Row. Twopence each. A delightful series of stories in verse admirably told. None can read these intensely interesting stories without having his or her sympathies with the struggling honest poor greatly enlarged. We are glad to see the first is in its fifteenth thousand and the third in its thirtieth thousand. The second is newly issued, and will enjoy no doubt a large circulation.

A Word about Work. By Mrs. W. Lockhart, Liverpool. London: Jarrold & Son, 3 Paternoster Row. Twopence. This is among the best productions on labour we have yet read from the pen of a lady. She has quite a masculine grasp of her subject, and labour has no more loyal or more trenchant advocate than she. Her remarks on the dignity and the use of labour are invaluable: and her treatment of the freedom of labour is most incisive and telling. We only wish that such views on labour animated the minds of the toiling masses. It would be for the permanent advantage of themselves and their country. It is worth fifty times its cost.

The National Temperance Hymnal. London: National Temperance Publication Depot, 337 Strand, W.C. Parts 14 and 15, 2d. each. These parts bring up the melodies to the number of 427: and we notice among other admired pieces: "The National Anthem;" "Father, Come Home;" "Home, Sweet Home," a very fine version; "Never Forget the Dear Ones." The music is clearly printed, and may be had in the old or new notation. When completed this will truly be the "National Temperance Hymnal."

The National Temperance Year Book for 1881: A Directory of Temperance Work and Workers. Compiled by John Kempster. London: John Kempster & Co. (Limited), 9 and 10 Bride's Avenue, Fleet Street, E.C. Paper covers, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. Mr. Kempster must have set a high ideal before him, else he never could have produced such an admirable volume. There is the usual temperance calendar with echoes of the bye-past year admirably presented by Mr. Wagstaff. "Papers on the Temperance Question;" "Facts and Statistics for Advocates;" "Writings and Sayings of Permanent Value;" "Local Option Division Lists;" and a mass of other valuable information. It is indispensable to every society and every advocate of the temperance enterprise.

Beacon Flashes—Tales to Enforce Temperance. By the Rev. John Thomas, M.I.V. (London: F. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C.) Price 2s. The author in his preface states that his only object was, in writing these stories, "to set forth the evils of drinking and the advantages of true temperance, that some readers might be induced to give up the former and adopt the latter, both in principle and practice." The twenty-six stories which the book contains testify to the ability of the writer, and to the success with which he has followed out the object he set himself to accomplish. We cordially recommend the volume as presenting a first rate collection of simple stories for temperance meetings; all of them fitted to impressively enforce the benefits of total abstinence. The book is so handsomely got up that it would make a suitable present to a young man or woman desirous of forming a temperance library for themselves.

The Right Sort of Papers to Support.—As a general rule we have no kindly welcome for new temperance journals. If we had our own way, more than half of those existing would be formally prohibited, and that too in the highest and best interests of the movement itself. In great part, they are a disgrace to the work, and the only satisfactory thing about them is that none of them pay. If they realized five per cent. on the outlay, it would be a calamity for the temperance movement. Of course, in these remarks, we do not refer to the standard organs of the temperance cause, Journals such as the Alliance News, The Record, The League Journal, The Social Reformer, and Irish League Journal, and others that have a distinct mission and aim. It is to the whole tribe of worthless illiterate rags, edited by nobodies, who have, many of them, to learn the A B C of the movement, that we refer.—Irish Temperance Banner.

Sunday Closing in Ireland. Fact versus Theory. Pamphlet issued by the Irish Association for the Prevention of Intemperance. Dublin: 28 Eustace Street. This is a neat pamphlet, containing an extract from the annual report of the above Association, and a telling extract it is. 1st, It meets the objection to the Act, that during its operation "there would be more drinking than ever," by showing that during the first year of Sunday closing there was a reduction of the consumption of ardent and fermented liquors of not less than £1,576,634; and also that, in the first half of the second year of the operations of the Act, the decrease in the consumption was even greater. There was a reduction of 1,968,696 gallons in the six months. Another objection, that "there would be more arrests for drunkenness" is met by the fact that, in the first fifteen months of the "Act's operation there was a decrease of 12,000 cases; and as regards the day itself, a reduction of 60 per cent. in the arrests. The committee add, "there have been no riots, drinking and drunkenness have been largely diminished, ordinary crime has gone down, and Sunday is quiet. These were precisely the results anticipated from it, and they constitute an overwhelming cause for its renewal and extension." They are right. If a prohibition of one-seventh of a week can, wherever tried, result in so much benefit, the advantage of a prohibition extending over all the seven days of a week, would be incalculable.

Annual Report of the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society. 1880. The present is the forty-fourth annual issue of the society's report, and is a valuable document. The present report is, as usual, full of interest to all temperance reformers. The annual festival, jubilee festival, weekly meetings, open-air meetings, and temperance sermons make up a most creditable amount of work, and the committee are to be heartily congratulated on the result of their efforts during the year. The accounts, too, are most satisfactory. The income, from all sources, is £329 5s. 9d., and there is a balance of fully £23 to carry forward. A very excellent summary of the Parliamentary proceedings connected with local option is embodied in the report, and from it we also learn that during 1879, 1662 males, and 1009 females = 2671 drunk and incapable persons were arrested in Edinburgh—a decrease on the year of 85; and that 4319 males and 2908 females = 7227 persons were arrested for being drunk and disorderly—a decrease on the year of 1344.

Wheat-Meal Bread. By M. Yates, Hon. Sec. Bread Reform League. Jarrold & Son, 3 Paternoster Row, E.C. Twopence. This is without qualification the best pamphlet on wheat-meal bread which we remember to have seen. The writer is thoroughly mistress of her subject, and elucidates her theme in a way that will bring conviction to most of her readers. No housewife should miss having a copy of this little essay. She will find it invaluable from the sound views it enforces and the practical teachings it affords. Our tract distributors would do a world of good in circulating it throughout the households of their districts. We quote a pregnant sentence: "Now, if a man's food sustained him properly he would not require a stimulant, and would never have that sinking feeling which impels many a one to seek in the public house that power which he ignorantly thinks can be there obtained to do his work, when he can secure the real strength in wheat-meal bread at one twentieth the cost: for it will be remembered, that the strength which can be obtained at the bakers for  $4\frac{1}{2}d.$  will cost  $7s. 6d.$  at the public house (?), and without paying the penalty which Dr. Richardson says is done of injuring health and diminishing vital strength and energy by every glass of spirits taken."

Heroes in the Strife; or, the Temperance Testimonies of some eminent men. By Frederick Sherlock, author of "Illustrious Abstainers." London: Hodder & Stoughton, 27 Paternoster Row, E.C. 3s. 6d. Mr. Sherlock has apparently been induced by the great success of his highly prized volume "Illustrious Abstainers," to give the reading public a companion volume on "Heroes in the Strife." The conception is eminently wise, the selection of heroes made most admirable, and the design carried out with rare ability and talent. We believe that this volume will largely increase Mr. Sherlock's literary reputation, for his style is fluent, glowing, and graceful, and his subject brings before his readers the men who have played a noble part in the stage of life. The temperance world owes Mr. Sherlock a deep debt of gratitude for this most valuable contribution to the literature of total abstinence. We should have liked to have seen some heroines in his pleasant pages, but we suppose that that is an agreeable surprise which he has in store for his many friendly readers. This volume is a choice specimen of the bookseller's art, and deserves a conspicuous place in a valued library of temperance literature.

POETRY.

THE WIDOW TO HER HUSBAND'S PORTRAIT.

Painted just as he used to stand,
With a thoughtful face;
His white cheek rests on his slender hand,
With languid grace;

I think I can hear his low, soft voice,
Fall on mine ear.
Whate'er were my sorrows my heart would rejoice
When it's sound I'd hear.

He died ere one year of our wedded life
Had passed away.
Snatch'd from the side of his loving wife
In youth's sweet day.

And my heart grew hard with its dismal load:
I mourned alone.
And many months pass'd ere I'd say to my God,
Thy will be done.

I thought I must die in that fatal hour
When his spirit fled.
For forty long years I have groaned and mourned
My beloved dead.

That he still will be young seems strange to me,
When we meet far away.
And I whom he left so fair to see,
Shall be old and gray.

MARY GRANT.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. ROBERT RUSSELL NICOL, NEW RATRAY.—We deeply regret to have to announce the death of this devoted Christian and thorough temperance reformer. Mr. Nicol was a young man, in the prime of life, at his death. His usual good health was enjoyed up to within a few weeks of the close of the year, when he complained of cold and severe headaches, and as he felt rather worse, he left his work on the 8th December, hoping that a day or two's rest would make him all right, but he gradually got worse, the medical adviser considering him in a very dangerous state with gastric fever, until on New Year's morning his soul passed away. He was very much respected in the village and wherever known. His interest in the temperance cause, especially of the prohibitory aspect of it, remained, like that of his lately deceased father, unabated to the very close of his life. His faithful devotion to the cause of temperance and religion was characteristic of him from childhood. He was a consistent and respected member of the U.P. Church, and took an active part in the Children's Mission Church at Rattray. The children were all present at his funeral, and made a very deep and solemn impression upon all present at the grave, when they sang with their sweet voices, "I love to think of the heavenly land, &c." We rejoice to think that what is loss to us is gain to him, that now he is singing in that happy land the song of Moses and the Lamb. His end was peace. R. S.

The fearful effects of drink were well expressed to his flock by an Irish parish priest the other day. "What is it, me bhoys, that degrades ye to the level of the bastes of the field? Oi tell ye it's dhrink! What is it that deprives ye of your nerve? The dhrink! What is it that makes you shoot at your landlord—and miss him? It's the dhrink, an' nothin' but the dhrink!"

STATE PROTECTION AND HIGH DUTY ON LIQUORS.*

THE very courteous and frank manner in which the Rev. James Mackenzie criticises the objects of the Social Reformer merits an equally courteous and frank rejoinder. He affirms that its objects might be better attained in three ways:—1, By using moral and religious influences alone; 2, by an agitation for free trade in intoxicating drinks; and 3, by compelling the law of the land to treat intoxication in every stage as a crime.

He asks us, in the first place, to abandon the Permissive Bill agitation in favour of a liquor traffic unlicensed and uncontrolled, but with heavy penal consequences on its effects. We should then have no interest in it but to crush it wherever its use was proved in any degree to be inimical to society. The reverend gentleman has no idea of what the liquor traffic would be were it the chartered libertine he desires to see it. And it is not possible at the present moment to point him to any civilized nation where there is Free Trade. There is not a nation in the world a remove or two from barbarism but has been compelled to lay restrictions on the sale of liquors. But there was free trade among them all at one time, yet it answered so ill that they have with greater or less stringency put drink-selling under control. That does not say much for Free Trade. We had Free Trade in England from the reign of Anne till at least the reign of the Second George. Anne's law permitted tradesmen to sell without a license, provided they did not allow tipping in their shops or houses. The 6th of George II. imposes a penalty of £10 on the retail sale of spirits except sold in dwelling-houses, thus virtually making every householder a publican, and as Smollet the historian remarks, "without making any regulation for preventing the excessive use of such liquors." This is quite the opposite result from that expected by the reverend gentleman. Nay, the Parliamentary history of the period (vol. xii., page 1213) records the fact that signs were publicly hoisted, "Drunk for 1d.; dead drunk for 2d.; clean straw for nothing." So much for the great Free Trade experiment of more than one hundred years ago. The same might be said of the Beer Act of 1830 and the great free licensing scheme at Liverpool in 1866. The opportunity to drink was extended in the latter place, and eagerly seized, until 31,227 inhabitants and 123 medical practitioners prayed the Licensing Bench to refuse to grant more licenses. We must really have some evidence of blessing under a Free Trade regime before we abandon our efforts for prohibition or relax our present restrictions on the drink trade, unsatisfactory as they are.

Mr. Mackenzie alleges that the present protective system is most unfair. We quite agree with him, and while he would abolish the drink making and selling monopoly in the interests of Free Trade, we would abolish it by making the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors a felony. He says it is inconsistent to retain protection in the sole case of strong drink. That is a strong phrase which our legislators will not readily accept. The State controls the liquor traffic, and its declared object is to abate the evils attending it. The exercise is a sanction rather than a protection—a control rather than a defence. The authorities intend to make it a public benefit rather than a public bane, and the 400 Acts of Parliament passed for its regulation clearly show that this traffic cannot safely be left to itself. It is not, therefore, inconsistent in dealing stringently with such an avowed source of disorder. It would be more consistent, however, to suppress it. Besides this, liquor, as we have seen, when free, does not benefit as other articles of commerce do. When the duties on articles of legitimate consumption are reduced or removed, increased consumption, with benefit, is the result. The reason is in their nature. The removal of the duty on corn gave plenty to all, but it hardly induced gluttony; the law of supply and demand was operative, and people just sought enough and no more. In the case of liquor it is not so. The more one drinks, the more insatiable his craving for liquors becomes, and if one even tastes there may be a possibility that he may generate a craving for the liquor that will injure and may ruin him. The law of supply and demand is set at defiance. Being exceptional, then, the traffic must be treated exceptionally. Hence when the fetters are being as rapidly as possible struck off the productions of trade and the objects of commerce, public safety requires that they should be more firmly riveted on the liquor traffic. Mr. Mackenzie puts it thus:—"If it be a necessary, or even a luxury, our people should be able to manufacture or buy without restriction." Nay, gunpowder is more a necessary than alcohol, but as it may cause explosions, it is under most stringent legal control, and yet the sale of gunpowder, the necessary, is not so fatal in its results as alcohol, which is not necessary to life or pleasure, else thousands of abstainers to-day would be near death's door from privation. Viewed in regard, then, to the nature and results of the liquor traffic, its legal restriction is not inconsistent with the law of these realms.

Mr. Mackenzie says, "with all this these measures are doubly objectionable, because they will not cure the evil at which they profess to be directed. Though they may limit the number of public houses, it by no means follows that they will lessen drinking or drunkenness. If there be two houses in a district, the abolition of one of them only doubles the drink consumed in the remaining house, and also the income of the publican." This will clearly show that the reverend gentleman fails entirely in his criticism, for one cannot criticise what they don't know; and he does not know the nature of the Permissive law. Where and when that measure is operative there will neither be public-house nor publican; the first will doubtless be turned to better uses, and the last will be liable to, if not under a charge of felony. "Abolish both houses," he says, "and the custom for drink is only sent to the next parish or the nearest city or village." Well, if that proves anything, it certainly proves that the Permissive law is effective in the place so purged, and if the adjoining parishes were infested by immigrants in search of liquor, they could use the remedy that had been so effective in the parish or place whence the thirsty people have come. Now we have a very simple test to put our question to. There are about 140 parishes in Scotland where no sale of liquors takes place. Let the rev. gentleman enquire if in these places all the evils he sums up as the result of suppressing the traffic takes place, and if successful, he will earn the thanks of every enemy of prohibition in this country. He goes on to say, "Protection and high duty cause adulteration of the liquors with deadly poisons. Free trade would abolish this wholly." Now, all investigations into this painful subject conclusively show that none of the poisons are more deleterious than alcohol is itself; that they, being cheaper, are used to enhance the profits of the publican, whose income is threatened by the severe competition with which he has to contend. How Free Trade would diminish this competition he does not tell us; but one thing we know, the Permissive Act would most effectually do so by rendering the sale of liquors penal. Where no sale exists no adulteration could occur. Again he says that excise duty and license are objectionable as being attempts to regulate vice and self-indulgence which should be left to their natural consequences of vice and ruin." We object as strongly to excise duty and license as we do to leaving drinkers to the natural consequences of their acts. We would abolish excise duty and license, and by prohibiting all drink-selling would prevent the drinker from the lacerations and agonies of his self-indulgence. Natural consequences indeed! What cares the drinker for natural consequences? What has he ever cared for consequences? Did not Solomon picture him truly when he says, "thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea. They have stricken me shalt thou say and I was not sick, they have beaten me and I felt it not: when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again." I leave him to settle his difference with Solomon in this matter, and shall not press him to reconcile his views with the general experience of mankind. He says, "If liquor were freed from State control it would not have the respectability now attaching to it. It would be cheap and vulgar." We have seen that when it was easy to get drunk for a penny, drink trampled on respectability. A cask of spirits burst on the street, and a crowd were on their knees laving and lapping it up. They showed how much they valued respectability in the presence of such a chance. Men sell their political birthright for a pot of beer. What comes of their respectability? When drink obtains the mastery, it is like the cuckoo fledging with the eggs it finds in the nest it usurps; all virtues must go overboard to make room for the seven other devils it calls in to the drinker's heart with itself.

But he, under his fourth head, joins issue with himself. We quote—"The dark, hideous thing swaying there [on the gallows] on the morning breeze was a great gain to our publican and our parental State. He might have come to the same end under 'Free Trade' in drink! If he did, we would have no complicity with him in his self-destruction, and if it happened often—were there no personal interest at stake—the community and the nation would rise in indignation and stamp out or 'Lynch' the trade. The Government would take strong drink from the people as it does firearms from those who give themselves up to midnight assassination or rebellion." Loading the gallows is frightfully common. Last month, in Chester Castle, a man who murdered his wife with a red-hot poker was hung, and in the petition asking for a commutation of his sentence the plea was he was drunk. But though common enough under regulation, it would be tenfold more under "Free Trade." And the very drastic lynching he considers necessary would have to be applied. But it was because we had at first Free Trade drinking and its horrors that we have now regulation, and because such regulation is unsatisfactory, impolitic, and immoral that we seek the Permissive Act. Then the essence of that Act is not that Government steps in and treat its subjects like children who were putting their toys to a dangerous use, or as rebels subversive of Government, but simply that the legislature declares the traffic wrong everywhere, and confers powers on the people to suppress it, when a due regard for their welfare urges them to do so. We agree with him that under "Free Trade" there would be no claim for compensation. But we are not to brave its horrors to get rid of compensation. We will rather wait to see what like the claim is before we give ourselves much trouble about it. There will be good reasons for not entertaining any claim the publican may prefer. An Irish publican, on his bankruptcy examination, stated that the Sunday Closing Act had ruined him; and yet when P. J. Smyth, M.P., pleaded for compensation to the 1600 publicans, whose Sunday business was to be extirpated, he was laughed at by "The House." Compensation is, in our opinion, a "bogle" to frighten prohibitionists from their attempts to extinguish the traffic; but seeing the sheet, the turnip, the candle, and the stick, they laugh and press on. Again, we have a proof that the heart of the reverend gentleman is right, if his head be astray on this subject. He says—"As Britain drinks, and becomes at the same time pastoral, she must make her liquor out of foreign grain and be drained of her capital. With such laws operating, we should soon drink ourselves out of house and home." But if the restrictive laws we have can scarcely suffice to restrain us to destroying nearly 70,000,000 bushels of grain, besides sugar and fruits, how shall we be when these restraints are removed, and we have no duty and dirt-cheap liquor? The Middlesex magistrates, when Free Trade prevailed, deliberately affirmed that "the low price of spirituous liquors is the principal inducement to the excessive and pernicious use thereof." And Sydney Smith, witnessing the effect of Free Trade in beer in 1830, wrote—"The sovereign people is in a beastly state, and those not singing are sprawling." We are drinking ourselves out of house and home, with high duty and dear drink, under restriction; we should only the more rapidly do so under "Free" Trade. Under a Permissive Law this thing could not happen, because neither makers nor sellers could produce nor dispense liquors; therefore the people could not buy, and consequently we would have cheaper bread and more wealth. But he says "Free Trade" would not directly remedy our depletion of capital through purchasing grain to make drink from, but indirectly it would. It would set the nation free from what is working ruin to our people. We doubt it, and he offers no proof. The traffic would certainly be free, and we know the consequences. We say the best and the permanent way to free the people is to extinguish the traffic. This is not a theory, but a fact, and one ounce of fact is far better than a bushel of theory. His concluding lines are most suggestive—"All the remedial and repressive action, both of religion and the State, would press on the viper until it was crushed beneath its heel." Precisely so. He has come to our goal at last, if we may take the sense rather than the literal meaning of his words. Indeed, he does so in the opening sentences of his letter. Only repression, with religious action, will not kill, it will only scotch the viper. Suppression with these influences will do. There is all the difference between repression and suppression that there is between restriction and prohibition. We are glad to believe, with him, that the Church and the State, menaced by the liquor traffic, will be compelled in self-defence to not merely arrest and repress, but unite to destroy the traffic.

We cannot abandon our agitation for a Permissive Bill in favour of a doubtful remedy which its pro-pounder himself misapprehends. He confounds restriction with our proposal, and only sees "men as trees walking." Through the evidence of a dire experience, fortified by the cumulative testimony of history, "the liquor traffic stands condemned as essentially mischievous and unchangeably dangerous." The very publicans repudiate Free Trade as a remedial measure, on the one hand, as in 1854 they declare that "to throw open the trade would be to throw open the floodgates of vice and drunkenness;" and, on the other hand, their solicitor Wire (1853) declares before a committee of the House of Commons, in answer to the question 10,190, "If the trade were thrown open?"—"In the end public morals would be outraged. You will find that no publican, no assembly, no large number of Englishmen have asked that the license system be destroyed and the trade thrown open [instead] . . . a person who is licensed as a publican ought to have a district assigned to him which will give him a legitimate trade, as he deals in a dangerous article." The cry for Free Trade is, we believe, hushed for ever; and even sympathy with regulation is fast dying out. "Regulation may repress but cannot extinguish the evil issues of the traffic. It is a traffic implacably hostile to the true interests of society, to moral culture, to industry and independence. Britain has tried—other nations have tried—restriction and regulation. The experiment is a manifest failure." The evil is not in the hours in which, or place where, or the men by whom the traffic is conducted; it is in the drink itself. And the failure in regulation consists in this, that it does not prevent the temptation put forth by the vendor, nor prevent the grossest indulgence on the part of those who buy. Mr. Mackenzie's own eloquent denunciation of restriction should not be forgotten.

We prohibitionists are simply asking Parliament to give the people power to purge their district most effectively of its hateful and dangerous presence. And we have a confident hope that this measure of justice will be granted as freely as the Ten-hours Bill that emancipated labour, as Free Trade that emancipated food, as the Reform Bill that extended the political liberties of the nation. No Government will long venture to resist the righteous demands of a nation for adequate power to quench the sources of its own vices, and none worthy of the name of Scotchmen will hesitate to exercise that power in the interest of their wives, their families, their laws, their institutions, or the country that gave them birth.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

DUNSE AUXILIARY OF THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

To the Nobility, Gentry, Ministers of the Gospel, Moral and Social Reformers in the County of Berwick—

YOUR Committee have never on any former occasion come before you with a deeper conviction of the soundness of their principles, or with such hopeful anticipations of their ultimate adoption as a rule of life by the community at large. The agitation in their favour is ever widening, and promises soon to embrace all ranks and conditions of society. The year now passed away has been distinguished above its predecessors by the marked progress of the movement in all directions—moral, social, and political. The social usages of society have been greatly modified by the diffusion of temperance truth. Commerce and manufactures are finding to their cost that industry, skill, and integrity are incompatible with the gross indulgence of the bottle. The working classes are faintly discerning that bad times will never disappear so long as the public-house is allowed to tempt those in its neighbourhood to spend at "the bar" what should have purchased substantial comforts for "the home." Corporations are becoming increasingly aware of how impossible it is to preserve the peace and good order of a town where public-houses abound, and of the difficulty of carrying out measures for the improvement of the dwellings of the labouring classes while the liquor traffic is allowed to exercise a corrupting and debasing influence. The church is seeing far more clearly that further progress and greater triumphs are almost impossible until the intemperance of the land, fostered as it is by ignorance, fashion, custom, and the public-house is entirely abated. Encouraged by these growing indications of the spread of temperance truth, and the result of their own labours during the year, your Committee gladly submit their usual annual statement.

MEETINGS.—Year by year it has been the conviction of your Committee that deputational meetings should be held in the county during winter, that sermons should be preached as often as opportunities would allow, and that, through out-door meetings during summer, the great mass of the people should be reached. This year they are glad to state that they have been peculiarly fortunate with their arrangements, several deputations having visited the locality, and your Committee have had the eloquent advocacy and valuable testimony of the following temperance reformers:—Rev. William Adamson, D.D., Edinburgh; ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P., Edinburgh; John Steel, Esq., Edinburgh; Messrs. Alexr. Black and J. P. Lossock; and your respected district agent, Mr. J. H. Waterston. The meetings addressed by the deputations were uniformly successful, and the speakers' efforts so cordially appreciated that your Committee believe that the movement has been deepened and extended in the county during the year. Mr. Waterston's sermons are a source of much edification to his hearers, as they admit of the question of temperance being unfolded in its most impressive aspect. Your Committee trust that their successors may be as fortunate in sustaining the highly successful character of the meetings held under the auspices of your Auxiliary.

LITERATURE.—In the formation of public opinion in favour of the temperance enterprise it is impossible to overrate the influence of the press. Mindful of how much of the power of the drink is derived from the ignorance of the people regarding its terrible nature and dreadful consequences, your Committee have always, to the fullest extent their funds would warrant, availed themselves of the advantages obtained from the distribution of a sound and healthy literature. They are glad to state that the literature they have put into circulation this year is calculated to dispel ignorance of the nature of alcoholic liquors, and to enlist sympathy with their efforts to induce every Christian professor and every drinker to abstain from its use. The New-Year's Tract issued by them was written by the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D., of Edinburgh, and cannot fail to solemnly impress those into whose hands it may happily fall. The Alliance News and the Social Reformer are as usual widely circulated, but your Committee are of opinion that their farther circulation would be of immense benefit to the cause. Pamphlets and tracts dealing with the varied aspects of the question have been as widely distributed as the resources at their disposal would permit. When one earnest temperance reformer was asked to account for the sobriety so evident in his neighbourhood, he is said to have exclaimed—"O, I sowed it knee deep with temperance literature." Your Committee have, they believe, an equally vivid sense of the importance of sowing broadcast the productions of the temperance press, and they trust by the increasing liberality of the friends of temperance in the county that their successors will be able to report most favourably upon this important branch of their operations.

While diligently doing the work committed to their care and discharge, your Committee have been greatly encouraged by the rapid advance of the enterprise everywhere. In society, the sobriety of hard times promises to continue, now that better times are beaming on the country—counteractive to the seductions of the public-house are now no longer rare—parochial and church temperance societies are being established in many parishes with the most beneficial results; and were the churches to combine energetically against intemperance and ordination dinners, and to foster the solemnization of marriages, baptisms, and funerals, apart from intoxicating liquors, a most manifest social reform would speedily take place. Your Committee rejoice, too, that the legislature are becoming more deeply interested in the operations of the licensing system, and have declared that some efficient system of Local Option, whereby public-houses should not be forced upon communities averse to their presence, should become the law of the land. There are signs everywhere apparent that moral and social reformers will shortly, in the interests of their country and humanity, combine for the overthrow of the whole drinking system, which is a menace to our liberties and the scourge of our civilization. Your Committee venture to think that their friends might take a still greater interest in the temperance reform in the county when it is borne in mind that the removal of the drinking system, social and legal, is the indispensable condition of a higher and purer state of society, and of a holier religious profession and practice among all classes. Drink, even in moderate quantities, neither gives human nature nor spiritual agencies fair play. "It pollutes and dims the fresh and pure perceptions of youth, poisons the atmosphere of social intercourse, lowers the tone of our moral nature and spiritual life, and tends to depress in all our daily relations of business and pleasure the exercise of high and generous virtues." Your Committee labour to remove this foul agency from the path of human life, that none may fall into its fearful pit, and that those wallowing in it may be saved and restored to the possibilities of a life devoted to their own salvation and the glory of God.

Your Committee heartily tender their heartfelt thanks to all those friends whose sympathy and active help have lightened their labours and contributed to the highly satisfactory progress of the movement during the past year.

They desire to place on record their profound sense of the loss which the Auxiliary has sustained through the removal by death of their late esteemed president—the Rev. Daniel Kerr, A.M. They, in common with all who knew him, feel that his death is a most serious blow to the Auxiliary, and that its effects can only be averted in some degree by the redoubled energy of those friends who are still spared.

They would earnestly recommend the Auxiliary and its labours to all friends of the cause in the county. Final success is simply a question of funds. Every additional subscription will assist in having more meetings, in distributing more literature, in reaching a helping hand to those who have fallen, in preventing those as yet scatheless from becoming the victims of intemperance, and in bringing about the happy time when law shall have utterly suppressed the whole traffic in those liquors which are the stain and bane of our land.

Your continued and, if possible, increased support to the funds of the Auxiliary is earnestly requested by—

GEORGE BRUCE, President.
WM. SMITH, Treasurer.
DAVID PATERSON, Secretary.
J. H. WATERSTON, District Superintendent.

DO PUBLIC HOUSES CONDITION DRUNKENNESS?

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

It is to be regretted that Bailie Lewis is correctly reported in saying that if we put into operation honestly the clauses that are to be found within the existing license laws of Scotland, we could do a mighty deal to arrest the progress of drunkenness. In this sentence he apologises for the drink trade as it is, and accepts it, not in a prohibitive sense, if honestly administered, as the means of sobriety, ready made to our hands. Observe it is only the progress of drunkenness that the Bailie would arrest. That is all, and it is nothing more than has ever been contemplated by the statesmen who have maintained the drink trade for revenue out of regulated drunkenness. The Bailie's arrestment of progressive drunkenness just amounts to regulated drunkenness. He would administer drinking to make drunkenness stationary, while the history of drinking, legally administered, demonstrates developed drunkenness. It is for this that the Bailie would now divert the current of temperance effort from ensuring prohibition. The temperance controversy does not present, in one sentence so short and clear as this, a statement so utterly opposed not only to prohibition, but to all reform of the licensing laws.

Drunkenness, arrested or regulated, is drunkenness cultivated. For it is impossible to maintain the drink trade and restrain it from dispensing drink; and to dispense drink is to cultivate drunkenness. This is obvious, and temperance reformers will have to guard against the appetite so produced when the drink trade is prohibited. Even then the drink craving, intensified by the legal sale, may call into existence an illegal sale. Until the appetite for drink is starved out by prohibition, the temptation to supply it will be responded to at the risk of breaking the prohibitive law. But the Bailie does not contend for the starvation of the drink appetite; he stands up merely for the degree of restraint which should arrest the progress of drunkenness.

After this, astonishment fails to impress; as the Bailie solemnly declares that from 1848 to 1874 it has been a palpable truth that the number of drink shops condition the amount of drunkenness. This palpable truth, he says, must be believed on the authority of a General Assembly's report, so long out of date that it is thirty years of age, and has no more reference to the drink trade as it now remains than if it had been issued from the ark of Noah. And that Scottish ecclesiastical authority may be helped to stamp out well-sifted knowledge, he backs it up with an English ecclesiastical report, which says that when the facilities for obtaining drink are increased drunkenness increases also. But if the facilities here referred to are licensed drink-shops, drunkenness should have been diminished, for the number of drinking places is less, especially in the centres of population, than they were in 1848. At this period the annual drink bill was only £72,000,000; now it is £136,000,000. With public houses diminished in number, while the drink bill increases at this rate, it is a palpable untruth that drunkenness is conditioned by the number of public houses—an untruth not at all to be made a truth by any authority.

The above result demonstrates that the facilities for getting drunk are as prolific in a small number as in a large number of drinking places. And it does not become me to say that the appetite for drink is less or more, according to the number of drinking places, as well as from drinking. How does the Bailie conclude that I should go this length, and ignore increasing drunkenness as it rushes forth from the reduced number of drinking places in which it is thus fostered?

The Bailie is confused about the facilities and temptations to drunkenness. In fact facilities and temptations prevail more in 1800 houses now in Glasgow than they did in 8000 thirty years ago. From the loose way he mixes up drinking facilities with less or more public houses, he may leave the impression that a few attractive, well-supplied houses facilitate drinking LESS than a large number, limited in attraction, accommodation, and supply. This is not the case. Facilities for drinking, with temptations to drink, have increased in proportion as the small, old-fashioned public houses have been swept away to give place to a diminished number of well-appointed houses. The Bailie confounds the facilities to drink with the number of places in which drink is sold. A little close observation might enable him to see that the appetite for drink was created by the supply of drink, and that from its resistless nature it grows to command an increased supply, however the drink trade may be regulated. From the nature of the drink, it is impossible to make honesty to bear on the regulations of the drink trade in arresting drunkenness: and drunkenness has increased in spite of every effort to regulate drinking. Let the Bailie look at this fact, and he must see that I am right when I say that drunkenness is conditioned by drinking and by the appetite for drink created by drinking. Drinking has its source in the drink trade; and while the trade is maintained, the craving for drink must operate to develop the trade. The trade has begotten the appetite, and however the trade is managed, the appetite develops the trade. The appetite for drink is therefore not to be arrested by an increased supply of drink at its own command in a diminished number of large houses, made alluring with increased attractiveness.

Large houses for small ones is the modern form of the drink system; and if the Bailie looks observantly at this form rather than at defunct General Assembly reports, he will no longer counsel its honest administration to arrest the progress of drunkenness. He will rather demand its abrogation, and, in doing so, disseminate sound temperance truth. This would become him rather than to apologise for the licensing system as it is, with the view of encouraging the people to enforce its salutary provisions. All this brings out a new feature in the Bailie's temperance career. It seems as if he were not even a licensing reformer; for he is at war with those who would reform the licensing laws, while they ally their alterations with a veto power in the people to prohibit them altogether. The Bailie is so far on the loose that it is hard to say where he may be next found.

He declares that I have caused him grave concern in saying that if there were no drunkenness except that represented by the arrests of the helplessly drunk, we would be a comparatively sober people. And the gravity of his concern is not enough. He even goes the length of tendering against it his solemn protest. But grave concern and solemn protest are only strong phrases full of weakness, that do not in the least affect the case. It must take more than grave concern and solemn protest to overturn the fact that the helplessly drunk are aught else than a small outcome of the existing license laws, with their salutary provisions, which the Bailie would honestly administer. While these laws hurl one hundred thousand prematurely every year to the grave, they waste our wealth, cultivate our bankruptcies, cripple our industry, fill our poor-houses, people our jails, and benumb the mind of the nation, so that earnest, enlightened, public opinion is in abeyance, and realised and prospective progress are in jeopardy.

All this being the outcome of legalised drinking, the Bailie might have refrained from being so gravely concerned, while he solemnly protested against the helplessly drunk, on their way to the police cells, as being an incalculable distance from illustrating the extent and consequences of our drunkenness.

JOHN PATON.

(To the Editor of the "Social Reformer.")

SIR,—I have again to acknowledge your courtesy in forwarding me proof of Mr. Paton's somewhat rambling communication, which for obvious reasons it will not be expected that I should deal with consecutively. This, however, is the less necessary as I have long since learned that words are only useful in so far as they express ideas. I shall therefore endeavour to extract such ideas as the letter contains, and submit the impression which I derived from its perusal.

1st. It is notable that, for reasons best known to himself, Mr. Paton finds it convenient altogether to overlook the important points established by my former communication, affecting the question of drunken arrests, the effect of forcing additional liquor shops into certain districts, and the advantages which would follow the shutting up of large numbers of public houses by the faithful administration of existing license laws by the magistrates and police. I am therefore entitled to assume that on each of these points your correspondent finds reply to be impossible.

2nd. Your correspondent coolly affirms that those who approve of the enforcement of the existing license laws by compelling magistrates, procurator fiscals, and police officers to discharge their statutory duty, thereby "apologises for the drink trade," and is "opposed not only to prohibition but to all reform of the license laws." This astounding assertion, which brings every temperance reformer with whom I am acquainted under the sweep of Mr. Paton's condemnation, is such transparent nonsense as to render any reply superfluous. The propagation of such a stupid and uncharitable theory by any recognised advocate of the temperance movement is certainly to be deplored, and can only result in creating prejudice in the minds of the intelligent, and in bringing the prohibitory agitation into contempt.

3rd. Another noticeable feature in Mr. Paton's letter is the number of truisms which it contains. Seeing that these truisms will be admitted by every child in our Bands of Hope, I am at a loss to discover what object he could possibly have in importing them into this discussion, unless it be simply to occupy your space.

Let us look at a few of them:—"It is impossible to maintain the drink trade and restrain it from dispensing drink." "To dispense drink is to cultivate drunkenness." "The legal sale may call into existence an illegal sale." "The appetite for drink was created by the supply of drink." "Drunkenness has increased in spite of every effort to regulate drinking." "However the trade is managed, the appetite develops the trade." Wherein consists the relevancy of such self-evident truisms in replying to my former communication, I am utterly at a loss to comprehend. Surely it will not be supposed that either I or any of your readers require to be informed on points so elementary.

4th. Mr. Paton, in dealing with the "English ecclesiastical report" of the province of Canterbury, shows that in whatever quality he may be deficient as a controversialist, it is certainly not in lack of courage. He is not only sufficiently courageous to discard the testimony of upwards of 13,000 clergymen of the Church of England, but also the accumulated official testimony by which it is supported. Seeing that this cloud of witnesses, lay and clerical, has failed to convince Mr. Paton, I am not so self-confident as to believe that anything I can say will be more successful. Your correspondent most ungenerously, as I think, endeavours to throw discredit upon the testimony and report of these 13,000 clergymen. Indeed, he so far forgets himself as to say, "If the facilities referred to in the report are licensed drink shops, . . . it is a palpable untruth that drunkenness is conditioned by the number of public houses,—an untruth not at all made a truth by any authority." I feel pained to think that this unwarranted and grave accusation should have been preferred against such a noble band of Christian temperance reformers by any one associated with the prohibitory agitation. No one knows better than Mr. Paton that the clergymen responsible for publication of said report neither said nor meant to convey the impression that the facilities for drinking and drunkenness were conditioned merely and exclusively by the number of public houses, without regard to the accommodation or temptative power presented by them.

5th. Mr. Paton, says the Bailie, "from the loose way he mixes up drinking facilities with less or more public houses, he may leave the impression that a few attractive, well-supplied houses facilitate drinking less than a large number limited in attraction, accommodation, and supply." Certainly, and why not? In receiving such an "impression," your readers would possibly be right, in the absence of Mr. Paton, in defining what number he meant to be represented by a "few" and what he meant a "large" number to signify. Surely Mr. Paton does not mean to say that two (a few) attractive, well-supplied houses would not facilitate drinking less than five hundred (a large number) limited in attraction, accommodation, and supply. I hope your correspondent will now see the awkward position in which he places himself "from the loose way he mixes up drinking facilities with less or more public houses," while he forgets to explain what he means his undefined numbers to represent. If there is one fallacy more than another which I have laboured assiduously to expose during the last quarter of a century, it is the notion that the mere reduction of the number of public houses is any guarantee for the diminution of drinking and drunkenness, if those that remain are allowed to increase their accommodation, display, and temptative powers.

I scarcely require to repeat in your columns, what I have so often repeated in your hearing and elsewhere, that unless all things are equal, any merely numerical comparison as to the results of public houses must, in the very nature of things, prove fallacious.

I am glad to observe that notwithstanding Mr. Paton's fierce hostility to the reduction of public houses and his opposition to the more honest and faithful administration of our license laws, he appears to recognise in some degree the principle here indicated.

6th. Mr. Paton, in his last, told us that "drunkenness is conditioned by drinking and by the appetite for drink created by drinking." In reply I recommended that he should go a step further and state "why the appetite for drinking?" and I am glad to observe that I have succeeded in inducing him to take that step by his now admitting that "drinking has its source in the drink trade." This is certainly one good result of the discussion.

Finally. Your correspondent is displeased at my protesting against his loose views in regard to public drunkenness, as exhibited in his having stated that "if there was no drunkenness except that represented by the arrests of the helplessly drunk, we would be a comparatively sober people." I have before me the criminal returns of the Glasgow police for 1880, kindly forwarded me by your excellent Superintendent. From that report I find that during last year there were no fewer than 40,772 police apprehensions for simple assaults, drunkenness, &c., in your city. This is nearly 10,000 more than in the former year. Notwithstanding the displeasure of Mr. Paton, I must, in view of these appalling police returns, again tender my solemn protest against the terms of complacency with which he, as an acknowledged temperance advocate, speaks of this startling state of affairs. Such teaching from one in his position cannot fail to exercise a most pernicious influence upon the public mind, and at the same time strengthen the hands and embolden the hearts of those licensed traffickers in our national degradation and dishonour. I feel assured that although there had not been another case of drunkenness in your important city than those referred to in Captain M'Call's most invaluable and saddening report, it would be difficult to find another man in Scotland associated with the temperance reformation—other than Mr. Paton—who would venture to characterise the population of Glasgow as "a comparatively sober people." I am delighted to observe that your honoured ex-Lord Provost Collins teaches a very different doctrine.—I am, truly yours,

DAVID LEWIS.

THE WANDERER.

CHAPTER VI.

There was the usual party at breakfast next morning, and more, for just as the Vernons and Milbank had seated themselves, in walked Wentworth, to the astonishment of them all. Dora ran to him, shook hands warmly, and offered her cheek. Wentworth kissed her fondly, and then the breakfast was resumed. There was at first some constraint, but Dora, discreet, watchful Dora, drew her brother into conversation and into a promise to drive her out that afternoon to see an old friend of the family, whose residence was about half a score miles away, adding Papa would easily drive their guest over to the railway station. This amicable arrangement was barely concluded ere Jones turned up with a message from Mrs. Ingram to Mr. Milbank—"It was very urgent, and must have his immediate attention."

"Never mind us, Mr. Milbank, but attend to it. Mrs. Ingram is very peremptory where business is concerned."

Dora's eye followed Milbank to the window. She saw him open the note, turn pale, drop into a chair, and cover his face with his hands. All rose hastily from their seats, but with an effort Milbank told them not to be alarmed, the news received was really terrible, but it only concerned himself—it was the death by accident in the hunting field of an elder brother, and the news coming so unexpectedly upon him, was for a moment too much for his self control. He was sorry to say that he would have to ask their counsel, and perhaps their assistance; but he would be grateful for the one, and amply repay the other.

"You will kindly excuse me, Mr. Vernon, from family worship this morning, as I have to answer the messenger; and if you would drive me to Woodgreen instead of to the station I can dismiss the messenger at once."

"Certainly, my good sir, I will only be too glad to do that, and anything else in my power."

After the morning devotions were over, Mr. Milbank was returning to the drawing-room to his wondering friends, when he met Wentworth ascending the stairs. They met.

"May I see you for a minute in your room, Mr. Vernon?"

"Certainly; although I cannot see reason for my being honoured with an interview. I hardly deserve it. I fear, Mr. Milbank, I have not done the right thing by you; but I am here to ask your forgiveness, and to ask you to believe me when I say that I feel truly ashamed that I should have been so tardy in showing you how grateful I feel for your brave kindness to my sister."

"You have lifted a load of anxiety from my heart. You are aware of my intention to leave your father's hospitable mansion this day. The message just received increases my eagerness to be gone; but I resolved that, having received the friendship of your father, I should not go until after I had made an effort to ask that of his son. Yesterday, to make such a request might have been, even in my eyes, akin to presumption; to-day, it is a duty due by gentlemen to gentlemen. Shall we say farewell meantime as friends?"

"No, no. I shall see you away, and drive papa and you over to the village or the station whenever you are ready."

"Oh, many, many thanks."

Mr. Milbank, on entering the drawing-room, found his best friends there waiting him. The old man spoke first.

"My dear sir, we were all downcast at the thought of your leaving us to-day. We had up to the moment of your receipt of that mournful message hoped to have been able to induce you to stay, but we cannot press you in your sad circumstances—only, you will allow me to be your banker for any sum your present necessities require, and you must give us a promise that you will return as soon after the settlement of your brother's affairs as possible. We shall be so glad to see you when we find Mr. Wentworth so changed in his feelings towards you."

"I am made glad—extremely glad—by your invitation. I am not, I am glad to say, requiring any pecuniary assistance. If I had, I should not hesitate to accept your proffered kindness. If you will spare me the use of one of your horses to convey me home you will render me a great service."

"With all my heart, with all my heart. When do you require him?"

"Within an hour. But as you will know all about my brother's death within the next twenty-four hours, if you will do me the honour to listen I hope to not merely enjoy your sympathy and kindness, but your friendship."

"Go on, go on—pray believe me we are all attention."

It was true. Mrs. Vernon, however, seemed quite amazed at the turn things had taken that day. Mr. Wentworth staying at home after all and meeting their unknown guest at breakfast; Mrs. Ingram sending a special message to him; then, most mysterious of all, his refusing money, and yet asking a horse—wanting to be driven to the station, and then preferring to leave on horseback. She could not fathom the mystery, so she quietly submitted to its dominion over her. Dora was certainly perplexed. She could not sufficiently realise the sudden change in her brother, nor account for the undecided conduct of her father's guest. She was also somewhat chilled by his refusal of money from her father, when he was so evidently poor. Mr. Milbank, too, had not paid her the attention he had accustomed her to receive from him, and then there was quite an uncertainty about his return. She was painfully thinking over the fast crowding events flitting before her, and as she began to listen as directed it was with a strained attention.

"Well," began Mr. Milbank, "I am, or rather was yesterday, the younger of two sons. My father and mother, and an only sister, younger than myself, are still alive, and no doubt plunged into poignant sorrow by the sad event of yesterday. I grew up as most lads at home do until the time arrived when I was sent to school. I was a favourite pupil and successful student there, but do all I could I could not secure the affection of my brother. I was clever, and instead of recognising this and being my best friend, inciting me to become fitted for a successful professional career, he seemed glad of every opportunity of retarding my progress and drawing upon me the suspicion and the hostility of my play-fellows. Unfortunately for him his disposition to wound and thwart me could no longer be hidden nor tolerated, and at last his conduct provoked retaliation from my school-fellows, and he was driven from the school. When I went home for the holidays, I saw that he had entered with determination upon schemes whose object was to set my parents and my sister against me. My mother he could not sway. Had I been as discreet as I ought to have been I might have frankly exposed his tactics at school, and effectually withstood his attempts to injure me in the estimation of my parents; but I was so offended at my father even hinting his suspicions that I resolved to let him harbour them against me. At length I went to college and entered with great zest into my studies, and passed with credit my early examinations; but my unnatural brother, bent on my ruin, sent home accounts of my conduct which added to the uneasiness of those at home, and brought down upon me the severe rebuke of my father. Still stubborn, I maintained a surly silence; and rushed into dissipation merely to give my brother all the more matter for his malicious reports. About this time a chum suffered heavy gambling losses through, as it afterwards turned out, my own brother. I was not aware of this at the time, and gave my chum all my spare cash, and pledged my credit to a large amount in his behalf. My brother somehow came to know this, and urged my debtors to foreclose my securities. This was done; and I, getting really frightened, wrote my father asking him for money to clear off this debt, and also some of my own. He wrote demanding explanations. I answered, but begged to be excused giving him the name of my chum. My father sent me a cheque, upbraiding me for my taking to low, vicious courses, and saying that he was prepared to hear the most dreadful accounts of my conduct. I went off at once, paid my own and my chum's debts in full, sent home the accounts with a letter couched in the most bitter terms protesting against his so misjudging me, and plainly hinting that my brother was poisoning his feelings against me. I told him that college being now up, I had sent him the reports of my tutors regarding my progress, and adding that from henceforth I was never again to trouble him or my mother and sister. I concluded with the hope that Time's effacing fingers would blot me from his memory.

"With a mere trifle I went to London, and for some time managed to make just a living at literature. I, however, wrought too hard, fell ill with a low fever, and but for a young fellow, a corrector of the press, I verily believe would have died. I recovered slowly; but while doing so my little savings melted away till I had nothing. My clothes were next disposed of; and in the ones you saw me in I was on my way to a friend for assistance, when the peril in which I found Miss Dora afforded me the happy opportunity of making your acquaintance and that of Mrs. and Miss Vernon."

"It was my full intention, with that assistance on which I counted with perfect certainty, to have gone to Australia and somehow or other carved out an honourable existence for myself. I relied on repaying the assistance thus received from the sum I advanced to my chum, who hoped in two years more to fully discharge the debt he owed me, and who never dreamed that my desire to oblige him had cost me so dear, else I am sure he would have flown to my sick-bed. I knew, however, that he would betray my whereabouts to my friends, and I was in no mood to stoop to that. I am happily saved the necessity of being pressed to this extremity by the death of my brother, whose removal so suddenly none do more mourn than I do, will, I hope, pave the way of reconciliation with my father."

The first to break the silence which followed the narrative was Miss Dora, who rose, and, advancing to Mr. Milbank, said,

"Papa, allow me to introduce to you the son of a dear old friend, Mr. Henry Estcourt of the Lea."

"Can it be possible?" said her father; "can it be? My dear sir, allow me to congratulate you on your good fortune, and on the prospect you have of soon being reconciled to my good friend, your father. But my dear, why did you keep the knowledge of the identity of Mr. Milbank with Mr. Estcourt back from me?"

"My dear papa, I only knew that identity as Mr. Estcourt's story unfolded itself. You know the great interest we all took in the mystery surrounding his disappearance from Oxford. Yet it may be a mystery still, for Mr. Estcourt does not resume his name nor renounce the alias."

"Miss Vernon, I pray, pardon me. I was so surprised that you should have so easily penetrated the mystery, that I failed to acknowledge the kind introduction of me under my real name to your papa. I am Henry Estcourt."

"Well, my dear sir, you are, I hope, at the end of all your troubles, and it will give me pleasure to place any of my stud or my carriage at your disposal to enable you to return to the Lea, and great pleasure to see you at any time under my roof. You have placed me under obligations to you which I will, although hopeless of fully discharging them, always be ready to acknowledge and strive in some measure to fulfil."

Later in the afternoon, Henry Estcourt, Mr. and Wentworth Vernon left for the Lea, Mrs. Vernon and her daughter bidding them farewell. Dora did not feel quite sure on which side the obligation of her preservation lay, for while she was earnest in her grateful expressions, Estcourt was fervent in his assurances that he would never forget how much he owed to her, and all the afternoon that problem held steady possession of her mind, but the solution never came.

How Jones did out-herod himself that night in the servants' hall by a rehearsal of the great fight at Wantage Inn between his late master and the "illustrious stranger that had just gone." Falstaff's description of his fight an hour by Shrewsbury clock was nothing to it. One would have thought that they fought in coats of mail, and that the floor was slippery with gore. The delighted audience saw no improbabilities in Jones' glowing story, but incited him to draw the more deeply on his imagination by their "Oh dear!" "Oh my!" "Did you ever?" and "Goodness me!" and many more equally approving and expressive interjections.

"I tell you," says Jones, "that that e're plucky un 'ill be here again in no time. To-night it is the prodigal returned, as our good parson would say, only with a difference. The bad un, the real prodigal, got flung and broke his neck; the real downright good un 'ill get all that the old man has, and he'll be seized with a uncommon desire to get somebody to spend it with him; and I know who, too."

"Oh Jones, do tell."

"Oh my, how blind you are; why, who would it be but Miss Dora? He saved her, and so out of gratitude she will marry him, and they will live happy ever arter." And here Jones set off on a glowing account of his interview with his young lady, enriching his narrative with some confidential touches that moved some of his hearers with envy. Miss Vernon's own maid, not being at all observant, had nothing to add or subtract from the young gentleman's veracious narrative, which was all the more readily believed on that account.

Mr. Estcourt's sorrow at the sudden death of his son and heir was tempered by the joy which he felt at seeing the son he had almost given over for lost restored. He had long ago learned the truth, and was all the more sorrowful that he should have been so severe. He welcomed the Vernons. He found great comfort in the society of Mr. Vernon, whose condolences moderated his great grief at his loss. Amid all the pomp with which wealth can garnish death, the remains of Estcourt were placed in their last low resting-place, but, saving his father and brother, none present shed a tear; and many, as they turned homewards, expressed their satisfaction at an event which had opened the way for the honours of the Lea to fall upon so fine a young man as Henry Estcourt had proved himself to be, notwithstanding his taking to a wandering sort of life. "He will all the better sympathise with the poor and the unfortunate," said they.

On Christmas eve there was a gay and numerous party at Elmfield Hall, and enjoyment was manifest on every face. Stories were told, charades were acted, dancing was continued far into the night. Many a heart was exchanged for another that night. Estcourt was among the number of those who made the happy exchange. He had often seen Dora since he had taken up his residence once more at the Leas, and often Miss Dora had gone over with her father to see Mr. and Mrs. Estcourt. The more the two saw of each, the more their hearts went out to each other. Henry was now his father's right hand, had brought his culture and his dear-bought experience of the world into his conduct of business, and had gained the good opinion of landlord and tenant. Many a door was opened at his approach, and many a lady was proud of a smile from the young master; but Dora Vernon was the object of his longing affection. She had defended him when all were against him. She was more than grateful for his services, and she, he knew, was willing to befriend him then, come what may. Was it any wonder that on that Christmas evening he should whisper in her willing ear his desire to live in future for her alone, and any wonder that she should yield to his ardent wishes, and blushing refer him to her papa? Before the festivities ended, Dora and Henry were plighted lovers, and a lovelier pair was not to be seen in all the countryside, or one on whose future showers of kind good wishes more abundantly fell.

Another Christmas had not quite travelled its round when they were wed, mated,—not merely married. Henry found in her dear society the incitements to resolute exertion and beneficence; and she, by her wise counsel, by her constant affection, nerved him to efforts for the welfare of his tenantry and the benefit of his country that brought honours from a grateful Sovereign and the rich blessing of a nation's gratitude.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION—II.

Jan. 19.—Dr. Cameron's Municipal Franchise Bill (Scotland) was read a second time.

Jan. 20.—Mr. Hugh Mason gave notice of motion to extend the Parliamentary Franchise to women having equal qualifications to men and who vote in municipal affairs.

Jan. 23.—Mr. Baxter gave notice that this day week he would ask the first Lord of the Treasury if it is his intention to make such arrangements as will ensure during some portion of this session, legislation for England and Scotland as well as Ireland. (Hear, hear.)

Jan. 27.—Mr. J. W. Pease gave notice that on this day four weeks he would move his resolution on the Opium Traffic.

Jan. 30.—Mr. Gladstone replied to Mr. Baxter that legislation for England and Scotland "has not escaped our notice—that it is kept carefully in view, and that we shall be prepared to take whatever steps may on the whole seem advisable" (Hear, hear.)

Feb. 4.—Mr. M'Ever gave notice that he should ask the Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he could give any information with regard to the present position of the commercial treaty negotiations between France, Spain, and Portugal, and particularly in regard to the wine duties.

Feb. 7.—Sir B. Leighton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in making the financial arrangements for the coming year as to the beer duty, he would consider the propriety of extending the limit of the £10 house value to £20, seeing it had been found that under the present arrangement the farmer class (who are compelled more than other employers to pay wages in beer), are now charged more than formerly, and as there is a difficulty in assessing a house at a £10 value which would not occur if the assessment followed the house duty. Mr. Gladstone said he could not reply as the matter was a subject for discussion; meantime he was indisposed to reply in the affirmative.

Feb. 9.—The Municipal Franchise (Scotland) Bill. This Bill passed through committee and was reported pro forma without amendment.

Feb. 14.—Mr. Caine gave notice on going into committee of supply on the naval estimate that he would move a resolution to the effect that in the opinion of this House it would promote good conduct and sobriety amongst the men and boys of the Royal Navy if the spirit ration were henceforth discontinued and some equivalent given of the value of the same in the form of improved food and increased wages.

Feb. 15.—Capt. Price gave notice that when the member for Scarborough brought forward his motion for stopping the sailors' grog he would propose an amendment. (Laughter.)

POETRY.

MY RIGHTS.

Yes, God has made me a woman,
And I am content to be
Just what He meant—not reaching out
For other things, since He Who knows me best, and loves me most, has ordered this for me.

A woman, to live my life out
In quiet, womanly ways,
Hearing the far-off battle,
Seeing, as through a haze,
The crowding, struggling world of men, fight through their busy days.

I am not strong nor valiant,
I would not join the fight,
Or jostle with crowds in the highways,
To sully my garments white;
But I have rights as a woman, and here I claim my right.

The right of a rose to bloom
In its own sweet, separate way,
With none to question the perfumed pink,
With none to utter a nay,
If it reaches a root, or points a thorn, as even a rose-tree may.

The right of a lady-birch to grow,
To grow as the Lord shall please,
By never a sturdy oak rebuked,
Denied not sun nor breeze,
For all is pliant slenderness, kin to the stronger trees.

The right to a life of my own—
Not merely a casual bit
Of somebody else's life, flung out
That, taking hold of it,
I may stand as a cipher does after a numeral writ.

The right to gather and glean
What food I need and can,
From the garnered stores of knowledge
Which man has heaped for man,
Taking with free hands freely, and after an ordered plan.

The right—ah, best and sweetest!—
To stand all undismayed,
Whenever sorrow, or want, or sin,
Calls for a woman's aid,
With none to cavil or question, by never a look gainsaid.

I do not ask for a ballot;
Though very life were at stake,
I would beg for the nobler justice
That men, for manhood's sake, Should give ungrudgingly, nor withhold till I must fight and take.

The fleet foot and the feeble foot
Both seek the selfsame goal:
The weakest soldier's name is writ
On the great army roll;
And God who made man's body strong, made, too, the woman's soul.

SUSAN COOLIDGE, in Our Union.

"Whenever I see a man begin a journey by drinking beer, or brandy and water, or whisky, I know that he is not fit to be the travelling companion of any true lover of nature—he will be more or less thrown off his balance, his nerves will be over-excited, he will come in at the end of the day with a headache, and during the journey he will be heavy, lumpy, and stupid. A glass of milk or a cup of tea is all the drink anybody needs when out for a jaunt, and many a time here I walked all day long without getting so much as either, contenting myself with a draught of water at a spring, or even going on without a drink of any kind."—The London Correspondent of the New York World.

THE FUNDS.

** Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, MARCH, 1881.

** Notwithstanding that we give a supplement to the present issue, we are unable to get ahead of our arrears. We have done our best. We have reluctantly abridged our own summaries. If our friends will write briefly and pertinently in the forthcoming volume there will be more space and less arrears. In our next, articles by Rev. W. Tooley, Bailie Selkirk, "Robin Goodfellow," and others, will appear.

Justice Dunken, of the Superior Court of Quebec, who died last month at a ripe age, deserves a passing notice. He was a Conservative. He brought in a Permissive Prohibitory Bill, which went by his name. It was, although not a perfect, still a most effective measure, and produced satisfactory results, especially in country districts. Notwithstanding innumerable allegations of its failure, it has had a powerful educational influence on the Canadian community, who, notwithstanding its admitted inadequacy to cope with all the difficulties of the liquor traffic, never dreaming of returning to the old licensing system previous to 1864, profited by their observation of its working, and enacted the vastly superior Scott Temperance Act of 1878. This is the one great lesson to be learned from legislation on the drink traffic. That under all circumstances the tendency is to greater stringency in the law. If one Act is not so conceived as to suppress the evil the nation is not to draw the conclusion that there shall be no law, or even no legislative progress; but rather, having a profound conviction of the power of law over disorder, its duty is to seek out new methods of invoking that power to render the practice of temperance possible to all under its rule. Justice Dunken, therefore, deserves an honourable place among those who, as pioneers, have initiated great reforms if they have not had the good fortune to inaugurate permanent legislation.

Our admiration of the brave, busy female temperance reformers in the American States deepens every time we hear of them or their doings. Who can read without a fulness of heart of the special notice issued by the superintendent—Mrs. S.

M. J. Henry—National Evangelical Department, Women's National Christian Temperance Union. That notice is issued to every branch of the Union, calling on them to see that prayers be requested in all churches for the Union—for God and home and native land. Prayers for our workers in the field at large and in our own town; prayers for all pledged men and their families; prayers for all drinking men and their families; prayers for young men and women; prayers for all who are in the traffic in strong drink that they may see their sin; and prayers for all men who vote for this traffic that they may see the sin of complicity with this evil. Such a notice marks the fundamental distinction between temperance reformers and their opponents. The voice of prayer may rise from publican's hearths and bars, but of what avail without the clean hands and the forsaking of evil? Of no more avail than are the efforts of a prayerless, self-sufficient temperance reformer. Let all our readers, as they offer their daily orisons, bear the temperance and prohibitory movement in their hearts before the Lord, and that movement shall be not only rapid but invincible in its progress, and should ultimately conquer through the power of the answer to their prayers, which God shall vouchsafe to them for his beloved Son's sake. Women here cannot yet vote, but they can pray; and their prayers, mingling with those sent up to heaven by their sisters across the sea, shall fall in abundant blessing on the noble efforts being put forth by men and women to lift up the prostrate inebriate and compass the entire destruction of that system of temptation before which he has fallen.

It has never fallen to the lot of the Social Reformer to chronicle so many deputation meetings as are in the present issue. Our readers will find no less than eleven meetings reported as fully as our space would allow of. The first series of four were addressed by Mr. J. W. Manning, and included Kilmarnock, Dumbarton, Kirkcaldy, and Galashiels. These meetings were on the whole, and despite the inclemency of the weather, successful—some of them signally so, the Galashiels meeting being the most successful held there for years. We believe that the admirable way in which Mr. Manning stated the question as a theory and as a fact must have largely conduced to deepen the sympathy and evoke the energy of his hearers. The thanks of the members of the Association are due to Mr. Jas Winning, Rev. S. Harding, and Rev. Dr. Adamson for accompanying Mr. Manning and affording him such able support. The Alliance deputation followed Mr. Manning, and consisted of Rev. H. H. Pereira, rector of St. Laurence, Southampton. He laboured under a double disadvantage: he was unknown and he was alone. His tour included Dumfries, Irvine, Montrose, Aberdeen, and Greenock. All the meetings he addressed were largely attended, notwithstanding the severity of the weather. We must except Aberdeen, where the storm raged furiously, and so affected Mr. Pereira that he was unable to go to Linlithgow and Cupar, which were down in his programme. His place was taken at the first named town by Bailie Selkirk, and at Cupar by Mr. D. Fyfe, Dundee. The Association is deeply indebted to Rev. S. Harding, Mr. Winning, Mr. Smith, Balgeordie; Rev. W. J. Boon, and Rev. J. H. Paterson, who represented the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on the deputation. We refer our readers to our intelligence columns for full particulars, and in doing so only wish we were able to present them with equally substantial results of the agitation every time we went to press. Such a movement as ours should have means at its disposal to enable it to do that and more.

With the present number the fifteenth volume of The Social Reformer ends. Its conductors have the proud satisfaction of knowing that those principles and that policy which fifteen years ago it was established to expound and defend have during the currency of the present volume been triumphantly vindicated in the country, at the polling booth and in Parliament; and that at the present moment the Premier stands pledged to embody that policy in the forthcoming Government legislation on the liquor traffic. Scotland stands peculiarly prominent in the agitation: by a vote of two to one her Parliamentary representation, on the 18th June last, affirmed the right of the people to declare whether they are or are not to continue to be affected injuriously by the liquor traffic beside and among them. Not more than one twelfth of her Parliamentary representatives could be got to poll in favour of the publican traffic. Encouraged by this signal and substantial outcome of the agitation to whose interests the Social Reformer has been from the first unswervingly devoted, its conductors will avail themselves of every means within their reach to make it in the future, as in the past, the unflinching advocate of the right of the people to veto the liquor traffic whenever their interests and those of their families render such a veto necessary. At such a moment a word might be said about its circulation. It is finding, though slowly, an increasing circle of readers; is receiving numerous kindly notices from the Press; and many friends now contribute to its pages. We heartily acknowledge our deep indebtedness to all who have spoken a good word in its favour, who have enriched its pages, and have in any way made it worthier of the Association and the movement it represents. May we hope that a number of friends will be found contributing to its pages during the currency of the coming volume, and assisting in securing a larger circulation. By recommending it to the notice of friends, sending a copy when read to a friend, or asking booksellers to keep a supply, paying them for what remains unsold, and posting these to friends, are ways in which substantial helps might be afforded at little cost and trouble. The conductors will feel deeply grateful for any little help in this direction that may be tendered, and be stimulated to be worthy of such generous exertions. They hope to introduce new features in the coming volume, specially aiming at greater excellence. While they bid friends farewell in the present issue, they hope to cordially bid them welcome when they introduce the first number of the new volume to their notice. With that number the index and title page to the present volume will appear.

Recently there was a conference on Local Option in the Fair City of Perth, followed by a public meeting, at which a petition in favour of Licensing Boards was adopted. The petition was presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Parker, the Parliamentary representative, who, as is usually the case, writes, informing the sender—in this case Mr. Robt. Puller—that he had presented it. Mr. Parker does more; he expresses his opinion on the prayer of the petition, and we are, although sorry, not surprised that it is favourable. Mr. Parker rejoices that at a public meeting of his constituents a petition in favour of licensing boards has been resolved upon. He therefore does not want the liquor traffic removed. Indeed we know that he does not, and that in committee he will decidedly vote against power being conferred on his own or any other constituency to suppress the public-house operations of their neighbourhood. We are sorry for the electors of Perth. Their representative would, in the first place, deny them the judgment and ability which Lawson believes that they possess. He would allow them power to institute a licensing board for the perpetuation of a licensing authority in a new name, and so render their children and their children's children liable to all the miseries, wrongs, and burdens that result to themselves from the present magisterial control of the drink system. There is in his case the joy of an ignorant and inexperienced man; for if he knew of the havoc which drink inflicts upon the working classes, and the specious plea put forth for planting drinking premises thickly in their neighbourhood—that of public convenience—he would demand power—imperial powers—to sweep every public house from the land without exception and without delay. It is this inability to discern the true scope and statesmanship of the Permissive Bill and not the want of goodness that makes the member for the city of Perth its avowed enemy; but evil is wrought by want of thought as well as want of heart. We should have been glad to have found Mr. Parker like his predecessor—the Hon. Arthur, now Lord Kinnaid—spending some portion of “the recess” in investigating the various practical proposals to grapple with drunkenness as far as possible in action. Mr. Kinnaid went over to Sweden to see for himself the nature of the Gothenburg scheme, and he returned to publicly declare his deeper sympathy for the Permissive Bill. Mr. Parker seems glad that a number of his constituents have given him a reason, of which he eagerly avails himself, to express a fervid admiration of the licensing board remedy for the liquor traffic, ignorant that in the present magisterial administration of the licensing laws we may see painful failure daily writ large. But should his constituents rest content with the views of their representative on so vitally important a matter to them, however much we may deplore their apathy, we shall not be cast down. The day is now past when a constituency can of itself retard the passage of our proposal; and the stage of the agitation has arrived when it will be no credit to any burgh constituency in Scotland to resist the march of the Permissive Bill through Parliament. By sustaining their representative in offering fruitless opposition, they are libelling themselves, or what is worse, confessing, we believe unconsciously, that they are unworthy to possess the legal power to forever close the chief fountain of their own vices—the liquor traffic. Had Mr. Parker come nobly forward in support of the means to emancipate Perth from the operations of its drink traffic, all good men would have been proud of him; but as he merely seeks a change of jurisdiction over the traffic in strong drink—a change that will not seriously abate the evils of the licensing system—he will fail to earn a reputation as a statesman and will decidedly imperil his claim to be one of the Liberal party. What attitude he will take in the future to the Permissive Bill will entirely depend upon the attitude his constituents will assume towards him. If they endorse his present position, they slander themselves, but if they resolutely give him to know that he must give them a true option, they will, even if unsuccessful, have vindicated themselves and imposed upon him a responsibility which we dare hardly believe he will venture to accept—that of misrepresenting his own constituency by refusing to support the Permissive Bill, one of the worthiest and most urgent reforms of the day. As for his allegations against reformers like ourselves, who insist upon a direct appeal to the ratepayers upon the existence or extinction of the liquor traffic, we have no apology to offer. Permissive Bill reformers don't want licensing boards because they don't believe in them and because they don't want the traffic on any terms. They want that in all future legislation on the traffic a clause be embodied, vesting power in the people to remove the public-house system by which they are affected. That done, these reformers will be content. If the people won't use this power, why then it will rest unused, and no harm will accrue to any one; but if the people cry out by reason of the evil inflictions of the traffic, who is he that will dare say they should not have powers of self-relief? We readily admit that the Permissive Bill never commanded a majority in the British Parliament. England has never yet given a vote in favour of either Local Option or the Permissive Bill, but Scotland has often. Seven times have a majority of her Parliamentary representatives voted for the principle of both, so that if a majority is simply wanted to make the Permissive Bill right, Scotland shows it; and seeing that it is so, why should Mr. Parker punish Scotland by mooring her to beer-besotted England, and inflict upon her electors, who have so often declared for liberty to live uncursed and uninjured by the liquor traffic, the merely restrictive legislation that England, judging her by the voice of her representatives in Parliament, desires to retain? No reasonable answer can be given. We hope none will petition, in Scotland at least, for licensing boards and thus help to strengthen the member for Perth in his misguided course.

INTELLIGENCE.

MR. J. W. MANNING IN SCOTLAND.

KILMARNOCK.

On Monday, 31st January, a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association—Mr. J. W. Manning, Mr. J. Winning, and Mr. R. Mackay, secretary—visited us. At six a tea and conference took place in the Temperance Hotel at which much interesting interchange of sentiment took place. Messrs. Winning, Hart, and Mackay representing the association, while Messrs. Jack, N. B. Cameron, Little, and others of the local friends took part.

PARLIAMENT AND LOCAL OPTION.

A public meeting in connection with the agitation for the promotion of temperance legislation was held in King Street U.P. Church on Monday evening. There was a fair attendance—the Rev. Mr. M'Queen presiding. In introducing the proceedings,

The CHAIRMAN remarked that the time had not long gone by when those who sought to advance the Permissive Bill were looked upon as cherishing an Utopian idea. But things had changed in Scotland. By an overwhelming majority of its representatives in Parliament it had declared in favour of the principles of this bill. Parliament itself had also, by a considerable majority, declared in its favour, and but for that Irish obstruction which was interfering with the whole work of Parliament at present we might have the immediate prospect of seeing the principle of the Permissive Bill more or less embodied in the law of the land. That was not yet, but they had every reason to hope that it would be soon, and it became them to labour to bring it about, so that our country might be delivered from that which had been so long an obstruction in the way of all good and real progress, and a great curse, in every sense, to our fellow-men. (Applause.)

The Rev. A. D. KING moved as follows:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the traffic in alcoholic liquors is the principal cause of the abounding intemperance of the country with its appalling results, and earnestly calls upon the friends of social improvement, moral reform, and religious progress to unite in a national effort to induce her Majesty's Government to grant the ratepayers of Scotland a direct and effective veto on the operations of a traffic so essentially at variance with the best interests of the nation." He said all real friends of reform ought to be banded together so that those in high places might be induced to pass a law whereby the ratepayers would be enabled to abolish the prevailing drunkenness of the country. (Applause.)

Mr. A. D. STEWART seconded the resolution.

Mr. WINNING, Paisley, in supporting the resolution, said the Scottish Permissive Bill Association had arrived at the conclusion that the liquor traffic could only be dealt with by being suppressed. He quoted the testimony of various men of eminence in regard to the evil results of the liquor traffic, and adduced statistics to show the burden it imposed on the ratepayers of the country. The Board of Supervision returns for the last year showed that there were 9805 pauper lunatics—an increase of 2197 in ten years—and he had it on good authority that in 90 out of every 100 of these cases the lunacy had been caused by drink, while every lunatic cost the country £26 a year. It was also shown that 120,000 people died every year, either directly or indirectly, from the excessive use of strong drink: and with regard to crime, the governor of Paisley prison had assured him that of 60,000 persons he had passed through his hands 50,000 or 55,000 owed their incarceration directly to drink. The pauperism of the country, which cost about a million annually, was almost entirely the result of intemperance. Referring to the progress which had been made by the present agitation, the speaker remarked that the traffic had been suppressed already in one-seventh of the entire parishes of Scotland, and no fewer than 43 of the Scottish members of Parliament had voted in favour of the local option resolution, while only 5 voted against it, including the member for North Ayrshire, and 12 were absent. There was not a single Scottish burgh member who voted against the resolution. The resolution, on being put to the meeting, was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. JAMES FULTON moved the second resolution as follows:—"That this meeting rejoices that the House of Commons has, by its acceptance of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution, resolved to deal effectively with the evils of the licensing system, by an efficient measure of Local Option, urges her Majesty's Government to give immediate effect to that resolution, and thereby enable the ratepayers of burghs, parishes, and other districts to prevent public-houses being placed or continued in their midst against their will." He was glad to tell the deputation that the burgh member was in favour of local option not because they wished him to be so but because he was thoroughly convinced that it was right and proper in order to deal effectually with this accursed system. (Applause.)

Bailie LITTLE in seconding the resolution said that during the few days he attended Parliament with the deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill Association in June last, he was told by members of the House that such a vigorously conducted agitation in the lobby had never been witnessed, and its success was most gratifying. (Applause.)

Mr. MANNING after tracing the rise and progress of the temperance reformation and its apparent failure to diminish intemperance, said temperance reformers were bid to look about for the cause of this, which was found to be that in every quarter, almost in every street, house after house was licensed by law to place temptation in the way of weak and erring men; and the conclusion was inevitable that nothing of a permanent nature could be accomplished to remedy the evil until the people had the power of closing these places of temptation. Hence they formed the United Kingdom Alliance and the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. These societies did not declare war with the moral suasion movement, but they set themselves to create a public opinion which would obtain the power of taking away the present hindrances to the progress of temperance. In taking up a position of that kind they were bound to show that it was just in theory and principle, and that it could be successful in application. As to the question of theory, Mr. Manning said that he could rest it on this point, that the traffic in intoxicating liquors increased the pecuniary burdens of the people; and on the good old principle that taxation without representation was tyranny and ought to be resisted, it was just in theory that the people should have the power of determining whether this traffic should be allowed to continue. The theory of the matter simply came to this, that it was the people governing themselves. If there was one claim more than another which was set up by those engaged in the traffic it was this, that they existed for the public convenience. Let licensing boards determine as to the qualifications of publicans and the suitability of public-houses, when it was decided that these should be established; but when the question was whether the public convenience required these houses or not, then let that be decided by the ratepayers—let the applicants be heard on one side and the objectors on the other, and let the public, as an intelligent jury be called upon to decide. But they were told that Local Option, or the Permissive

Bill, while it was all very well in theory, could not be made successful in practice. He would show, however, that it was at present being successfully carried out both in Canada and the United States. The Dominion of Canada is divided into seven provinces, each of which has a legislature for the management of its own particular affairs. In Nova Scotia the people have the power of vetoing the traffic in this way, that unless an applicant obtains the signatures of two-thirds of the ratepayers in support of his application he cannot obtain a license, so that the people are enabled to reduce the number of houses or abolish them altogether, as they might think fit. But supposing a man gets the necessary number of signatures he has to send his application to the Municipal Council, by whom it is remitted to a licensing committee, and a two-thirds majority of that committee is necessary, besides a majority of the Council itself, in order to obtain license. The result of this law is that out of eighteen counties into which the province is divided there are sixteen in which no license is held for the sale of intoxicating liquors. But there is also another local option provided for by legislation of the Dominion as a whole. It only came into operation in March 1879, but already in New Brunswick, where it was applied first, there has been a vote taken in sixteen counties and cities, and in fifteen of these cases the prohibitionists have been victorious. They have also been victorious in four contests embracing the whole province of Prince Edward's Island. Referring to the beneficial results of this prohibition, the speaker remarked that if the liquor traffic is the cause of abounding evils, we have only to put our veto on it to remove that which is injurious to the best interests of the nation. He contended that similar results would follow prohibition in this country, and concluded by impressing upon his hearers the importance of bringing pressure to bear upon Parliament with a view to the speedy and satisfactory solution of this great question. (Applause.)

The resolution was unanimously adopted, as was also the following motion, which was moved by Councillor Cairnie, seconded by Mr. J. Auld, and supported by Mr. Robt. Mackay:—"That this meeting cordially tenders its thanks to Sir Wilfrid Lawson and to the 245 members of Parliament who voted and carried his Local Option Resolution last session, and that copies of the resolutions adopted at this meeting be signed by the chairman, and sent to the members of Parliament for the burgh and county, the Prime Minister, the Lord Advocate, and the Home Secretary." The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the deputation and the chairman on the motion of Mr. A. P. Brown.—Kilmarnock Standard abridged.

DUMBARTON.

On February 1st a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association—Mr. J. Manning, Rev. Samuel Harding, and Mr. R. Mackay—visited this burgh, and was received in the Lennox Temperance Hotel by a numerous party of the leading temperance reformers in the town and neighbourhood. After tea, the meeting resolved itself into a conference, and Bailie Kennedy was called to the chair. Rev. S. Harding opened the proceedings of the conference with an eminently practical address. Several local friends delivered stirring remarks, after which those present adjourned to the Burgh Hall, where a meeting, under the auspices of the Dumbarton Total Abstinence Society, was held to receive the deputation. There was a good attendance of the inhabitants, amongst whom were a goodly number of ladies. Bailie Kennedy presided, and beside him on the platform were:—Revs. Jas. MacBain, J. W. Jones, J. Downie, and J. H. Paterson, Dumbarton; J. Colvin, Renton; and Thomas Collins, Bonhill; ex-Provost Rogerson, ex-Bailie Buchanan, Treasurer Brown, and ex-Dean of Guild Roy, ex-Treasurer Douglas, Mr. John Robertson, J.P., and Messrs. Thomas Campbell, John M'Nidder, A. Brown, R. Stewart, H. Stoddart, and a number of other leaders in the temperance cause here.

The Chairman, in introducing the deputation, expressed the pleasure and pride he had in performing that task.

Ex-Provost Rogerson moved the first resolution, which was similar in terms to those adopted at Kilmarnock. He contended that the resolution contained a simple statement of facts, and as to the means to abate the social evil of drunkenness he agreed with the resolution.

Rev Mr. Colvin seconded the resolution in a few racy sentences.

Rev. Mr. Harding, Paisley, supported it. If the resolution was correct, then he held that a terrible indictment had been made out against the liquor traffic. The resolution had been carefully worded. There had been no hard words introduced; but if they would allow him, he would let them into a secret—at least, he would give them really and truly what the resolution meant. The resolution meant that the liquor traffic as carried on in licensed houses of whatever sort was sinful and demoralising—was a curse to the community, giving rise to pauperism, insanity, immorality, disease, premature death, domestic misery, bad trade, waste and loss of property, bringing in unnecessarily heavy taxation, besides forming one of the greatest hindrances to the moral and religious improvement of society, and to the spread of the everlasting gospel of our blessed God. The resolution meant that, and nothing more and nothing less. These were the necessary and the inevitable and unavoidable results of the liquor traffic. (Applause.) He urged on them to organise, to agitate, and to consecrate themselves to the work, and the victory was certain. (Cheers.)

The resolution was carried.

Ex-Treasurer Douglas moved a resolution urging Government to pass a Local Option law. He held that the people generally should have the same right to do for themselves what the rich had the power to do for themselves. No rich man would allow a public-house at his door, and the public generally should have the same power to say they would not allow a public-house put down at their close mouth. (Applause.)

Treasurer Brown seconded the resolution.

Mr. Manning supported it.

The resolution was carried.

Mr. John M'Nidder proposed—"That this meeting cordially tenders its thanks to Sir Wilfrid Lawson and to the 245 members of Parliament who voted and carried his Local Option Resolution last session, and that copies of the resolutions adopted at this meeting be signed by the Chairman, and sent to the members of Parliament for the burgh and county, the Prime Minister, the Lord Advocate, and the Home Secretary."

Rev. Mr. Paterson seconded the motion.

Mr. R. Mackay supported the motion, which like the others was carried amid applause.

Votes of thanks brought a pleasant meeting to a close.—Lennox Herald abridged.

KIRKCALDY—TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

A public meeting, under the auspices of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, was held on Thursday 3rd ult., in the Congregational Church, Kirkcaldy. There was a good attendance. Provost Swan occupied the chair, and was supported on the platform by Rev. Dr. Adamson, Edinburgh; Rev. Mr. M'Millan, Abbotshall Free Church; Rev. E. J. Boon, E.U. Church, Pathhead; J. W. Manning, Esq., Ontario; J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh; Bailie Speedie, and Messrs. J. Hogarth, A. Beattie, J. Wishart, G. Gillespie, W. J. Galloway, and A. Bennett.

The first resolution was moved by Dr. Adamson. It called on social and moral reformers to combine against the liquor traffic. In speaking to the resolution the Dr. said he was sure that even the magistrates would bear him out in saying that wherever there was a public-house there was drinking, and wherever there was drinking there was crime. Some time ago they had got a Forbes M'Kenzie Act to prevent the drink being sold on the Sabbath. He only wished they had one for every day of the week. In a town like Kirkcaldy there were bakers, tailors, shoemakers, &c. All were producers, and assisted in the general prosperity of the town, but the publican was non-productive. The commodity he trafficked in did no good to the community, but, on the contrary, was prolific of much harm. He could not tell what good the publican might be doing, but he could tell what harm he was doing, and would pray daily that none of his friends might become a publican. (Applause.) He wished only that they had a little more Home Rule, so that the people might say to the magistrates, "You are not to put down a public-house where we do not want one." (Applause.) The people had the election of magistrates in their own hands, and why should they not have the right to put down the licenses? It was singular, perhaps, that public-houses were only put down where the poorer classes lived. In Edinburgh they swarmed in the Cowgate, but in Murray Place or Newington there were none, for the simple reason that the rich did not wish them beside them. He did not doubt that the hands of Sir Wilfrid Lawson would be strengthened by the report of the present meeting, and would do something to influence the Government in the passing of such a measure for Scotland. Then Scotland would become great, and hold up her head to other nations, asking them to follow her in doing away with this great curse. (Applause.)

The Chairman hoped the meeting would have the effect of helping the cause of temperance in petitioning Parliament at once for this power. It would be a good thing for the country, and the people at large. He was invited to the Licensing Court the other day, but did not go, because he did not like to grant these licenses.

The Rev. Mr. M'Millan cordially seconded the resolution.

The second resolution calling on the Government to embody Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution in law was moved by Rev. W. J. Boon. His speech was peculiarly happy and rapturously applauded.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Manning, who delivered an eloquent speech, which was received with unstinted applause.

The third resolution, asking the meeting to instruct the Chairman to forward the resolutions adopted by the meeting to Sir G. Campbell, Bart., Hon. E. P. Bruce, M.P.; Prime Minister, Lord Advocate, was proposed by Mr. Waterston, seconded by Mr. John Hogarth, West Mills, and unanimously agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Jas. Wishart, the deputation were cordially thanked, and on the motion of Mr. A. Beattie a similar compliment was paid to the Chairman, when the meeting then broke up.—Fifehire Advertiser abridged.

GALASHIELS.

PUBLIC MEETING ON THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

—A public meeting, under the auspices of the Galashiels Total Abstinence Association, was held in the Public Hall on Friday, 4th ult., to hear addresses by a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, consisting of Rev. Dr. Adamson, of Edinburgh; Mr. J. W. Manning of Ontario; and Mr. J. H. Waterston, of Edinburgh. The Rev. W. W. Smith, of Galashiels Free Church, presided, and there was a large attendance. On the platform were also—Rev. Mr. Nesbitt, Pastor Alex. Thomson, Bailie Burns, Ex-Bailie Cowan, Treasurer Messer, Mr. F. Lynn, and others. Dr. Adamson opened the meeting with prayer.

The CHAIRMAN, in introducing the proceedings, said he was glad to have an opportunity of hearing so able an observer and reporter as Mr. Manning in reference to prohibition, and so far as the general question was concerned he was completely in favour of the principle of the Permissive Bill. (Applause.)

Bailie BURNS moved the first resolution condemnatory of the liquor traffic, and calling on all good citizens to combine for its overthrow. Rev. Dr. Adamson seconded. He said—The pressing duty of the hour was to continue to urge the question of local option on the attention of Parliament, and if the demand was made firmly and persistently, he felt perfectly sure that no one hearing him would be three years older before the power was granted to the people to put an end to the drink traffic among them if they would. (Cheers.)

The Rev. Mr. NESBITT moved the second resolution to the effect that the Government embody the principle of local option in their promised legislation on the drink traffic.

Mr. MANNING seconded the resolution. He said he had been told since he came into the town that it had a population of about 15,000 persons, and that there were 37 individuals entrusted with the privilege of selling intoxicating liquor. Consequently there were 14,963 people to whom the law said "Thou shalt not sell intoxicating liquor." What he and the other members of the deputation had come to do was to argue for such a change in the law as would enable the 14,963 to say to the 37, "Neither shall you." (Cheers). That was only asking that the enormous majority should be entitled to say that these privileged few should be put on the same footing as themselves. If intemperance, with its train of evils, was to be got rid of, the cause must be removed. While temperance men were engaged in trying to persuade others to become abstainers, other men, under the sanction of the Government, were doing all they could to render their work of no avail; and the time had now come when it was the duty of the country to deal in an effectual manner with the evil. It had often been objected that intemperance could not be put down by law; they could never succeed. He was there to tell them that they had succeeded to a very great extent on the other side of the Atlantic, and what prohibition had done there it was equally powerful to do here. (Applause). Mr. Manning proceeded to sketch the progress of legislation which had led up to the present temperance enactments in Canada. The people of that country had asked the Legislature at different times for a law prohibiting the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquors, because they believed in striking a blow at the root of the evil. (Cheers). In 1874, the Governor-General was empowered to make a commission of inquiry to visit Maine and ascertain the state of affairs. The Governor appointed an anti-prohibitionist and himself to make the inquiry. They received their commission from the Government and told to go where they pleased, get information from whom they pleased, and come back with their report. (Applause). They took evidence from any and every person able to give it, without knowing or asking whether they were for or against prohibition. Amongst the witnesses were governors, ex-governors, secretaries of state, clergymen of all denominations, officers of the army, senators, members of Congress, judges, mayors, overseers of the poor, gaolers, city marshals, editors of newspapers, chiefs of police, employers of labour, and influential citizens. They divided the inquiry into four questions:—(1) What are the provisions of the law in each State? (2) Is the law enforced; and, if not, why not? (3) What has been the result of any change from prohibition to license, or vice versa? (4) What have been the effects of prohibition upon the social and moral condition of the people? Those four questions were thoroughly exhaustive, and formed the basis for their action. They laid the evidence before the Governor-General and Parliament, and it was considered in the subsequent session. In the Senate a report was adopted, of which the following was the concluding clause:—"That the report of the Government Commission shows clearly that the prohibitory law of the States of Maine and Vermont has been well enforced, and has largely diminished crime and pauperism, and that its beneficial effects upon the community have been so fully proved by the experience of over twenty years, that there is now no attempt made to repeal it; while in the other States visited—although the law was not so generally enforced—wherever it was brought into operation, the same result of diminution of crime followed. In cases where the prohibitory law was for a short time repealed, intemperance and crime immediately increased in so marked a degree that prohibition was soon re-enacted. That in view of all these facts and considerations, it appears that the time has now arrived when the attention of the Government should be given to this important question, with a view to the introduction of a bill to prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for mechanical and medicinal purposes, throughout the Dominion, at the earliest date compatible with the public interests." In the House of Commons a resolution was passed declaring that the report afforded incontestable proof that a prohibitory law was the only effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance, and that it was the duty of Government to introduce such a law into Canada. These resolutions were passed in 1876, and were the conclusion of both houses of the Canadian Parliament. His fellow-commissioner, who had been appointed on account of his anti-prohibition proclivities, in giving an account some weeks after his return home at a Young Men's Christian Association meeting of his mission and its results, declared that the investigation fully convinced him that a prohibitory liquor law was desirable for the Dominion of Canada. (Cheers). In conclusion he urged that the people of this country should continue to demand from Parliament a measure which would enable them to deal with the traffic. If the nation was to get its heel on the neck of the liquor traffic, they would inaugurate a new era in the history of the country which had never been seen in the past, and a day would have dawned which would lead to grander, nobler, and greater results than had ever yet been reached. It was the duty of all to see that the advent of that day was not delayed, and might God himself hasten it! (Loud cheers).

Ex-Bailie COWAN moved and Mr. Waterston seconded the sending of the foregoing reasons to the proper quarter. The various reasons were carried by acclamation. On the motion of Mr. F. Lynn, votes of thanks to chairman and speakers were heartily responded to. All the speakers were warmly applauded, and the Galashiels Free Church Band of Hope sang several pieces during the evening.—Southern Reporter abridged.

ALLIANCE DEPUTATION.

DUMFRIES.—LOCAL OPTION MEETING.

A PUBLIC meeting was held on Tuesday, 8th ult., in the Tabernacle, under the auspices of Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union, to hear addresses in support of the Local Option resolution. The night was not a favourable one, but there was a considerable attendance. Dr. M'Culloch presided: and with him on the platform were the Rev. J. D. M'Kinnon, Rev. G. W. Tooley, and Rev. F. Binns, Dumfries; Rev. H. H. Pereira, rector of St. Laurence, Southampton, from the United Kingdom Alliance; and Rev. S. Harding, Paisley, and Mr. Stevenson, from the Scottish Permissive Bill Association.

The CHAIRMAN reminded the meeting that on the 18th June last the House of Commons endorsed Sir Wilfrid Lawson's proposal to give the ratepayers power to control the liquor traffic. That was not, however, an Act of Parliament, but a resolution. The object of this, and of hundreds of other meetings being held over the country was to remind not only the Government but the members for every constituency that we looked to them to do their duty by giving effect to the declared opinion of the House of Commons. (Cheers.)

Rev. Mr. TOOLEY moved the first resolution, which charged the liquor traffic as the principal cause of the abounding intemperance, and asked all good men to unite to stop it. He briefly reviewed some of the arguments commonly brought against the position of abstainers when they traced the evils of intemperance to the public-house as its source, and contended that the presence of large numbers of licensed houses, by presenting an outward temptation, stimulated an inward appetite to an unhealthy degree. He pointed out that the State already interferes with individual liberty in cases where the exercise of that liberty would be prejudicial to the public good, as, for example, when it compelled the owner of a ricketty house to take it down and required that every child should be vaccinated, even if its parents were opposed to vaccination. They only asked that the constitutional principle of government by majorities should be applied by giving to the people power to veto or to sanction the liquor traffic. They asked for the great body of the people, who bore the burden of drink-caused taxation, and who had personal knowledge of the wants of the district, the same right which was at present enjoyed by a few local magistrates. (Cheers.)

Rev. Mr. HARDING supported the resolution. He expressed the pleasure which it afforded him to meet for the first time with Dr. M'Culloch, whom he had long known by report as one of our leading abstaining medical practitioners. (Cheers.) He confessed that he belonged to the radical school of teetotalers. As a member of that school he went on to interpret the resolution as meaning that the liquor traffic, as carried on in licensed houses of whatever kind, was sinful and demoralising, that it was a curse to the community, giving rise to pauperism, crime, insanity, immorality, premature death, and domestic misery, causing bad trade to the community, waste of property, and unnecessarily heavy taxation, besides forming the greatest outward obstacle to the moral and social improvement of society, and to the spread of the gospel throughout the land; and not only so, but that these were the necessary and inevitable consequences of that traffic, as its whole history proved. What then, he asked, should be their attitude in relation to this great and terrible evil? He submitted that the proper attitude was that expressed by the resolution, which called upon the legislature to give to the people power to put a stop to it. (Cheers.) He went on to show that this resolution should commend itself to philanthropists, because the evil at which it aimed lay at the root of the greater part of the miseries which philanthropy sought to mitigate; to patriots, because the liquor traffic was the chief obstacle which prevented the country becoming yet more emphatically great, good, and free; and to Christians, because every Christian man and woman was bound to imitate Christ's example, who went about continually doing good. (Applause.) The resolution was unanimously adopted, by a show of hands.

Rev. Mr. M'KINNON next moved a resolution urging her Majesty's Government to confer suppressive power on the ratepayers over the liquor traffic. He was glad the Government was now waking up to the fact that what had been long legalised was not necessarily right. (Cheers.) He pointed out that in the case of an epidemic, even affecting only our cattle, stringent measures were promptly adopted to prevent its spread, while in intemperance we had a persistent epidemic, which was constantly among us, but which our Government, seared by long familiarity, regarded with apathy. Agitation in Ireland was at once met with special legislation; but the case of the liquor traffic was still more clamant, for while in Ireland the agitators slew their tens, that traffic was annually slaying its tens of thousands. (Cheers.) A local option or prohibitive measure would exercise a great—it might be a slow, but it would be a sure—influence in regenerating society. (Applause.)

Rev. Mr. PEREIRA supported the resolution in an able speech. He came to Scotland, he said, not to teach, but rather to learn, for he remembered that politically we were further advanced than they were in England, having set them the example of Sunday closing, and all the representatives of Scotland in Parliament, except five, being supporters of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution. (Cheers.) Although politically the people of Scotland were far advanced on this subject, he feared from the amount of drunkenness which he had observed during a visit to the country, that many of the people were personally asleep in regard to it. He defied any person to tell him the virtues of alcohol. It would do them no good, but it might do them untold mischief. (Cheers.) He spoke of this question as a Christian one, and expressed his satisfaction that, in face of the great evil of intemperance, members of different religious bodies were losing sight of their differences, and in opposing it those were meeting who had perhaps never before stood together on any common platform. (Applause.) This resolution having also been adopted,

Rev. Mr. BINNS moved the third, which was a request to the chairman to send on the resolution adopted to city and county M.P.'s and officers of the Government. Their gratitude in this case might, he said, be correctly described as a "lively sense of favours expected;" and he asked them to determine to assist, so far as lay in their power, to bring about the realisation of their hopes, reminding them that the British House of Commons was but the reflex of the opinion of the British people. (Cheers.) Mr. R. Stevenson supported this resolution, which was also adopted.

On the motion of the Rev. J. Strachan, seconded by Mr. T. C. Farries, a cordial vote of thanks was given to the members of the deputation; and a similar tribute having been paid to the chairman, on the motion of Mr. Pereira, the proceedings terminated.—Dunfries and Galloway Standard and Advertiser abridged.

IRVINE—GOVERNMENT AND THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

On Wednesday evening, 9th ult., a deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance and Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association addressed a public meeting on the above question in the Good Templars' Hall. J. B. Lindsay, Esq., occupied the chair. The deputation included the Rev. H. H. Pereira, A.M., Rector of St. Laurence, Southampton; J. Winning, Esq., Paisley; and Mr. R. Stevenson, district-superintendent. There were also on the platform the Rev. R. S. Macauley, Capt. Breckenridge, Mr. Geo. Paulin, Mr. William Millar, Mr. Robert Brown, Mr. James Smith, and Mr. William M'Cormick. There was a good attendance.

The Chairman, in the course of his address, said they must look to legislation for a relief of the burden which had been laid upon them by the drink traffic; it rested solely with themselves, and it would require a determined effort to pass the measure in which they were so much interested. The Government, with wars abroad and with the Irish question at home, had enough to do in the meantime; but next in importance was the object in which they were engaged, which required immediate action, and according to Mr. Gladstone it was a matter of life and death. (Applause.)

The Rev. R. S. Macauley, in moving the first resolution, said the movement had his hearty sympathy, and would have his utmost support. He moved the resolution, which pointed to the liquor as a chief cause of the national intemperance, and appealed to moral reformers to unite to put it down. Such a resolution as that did not need one single word in support of it; but, as Mr. Lindsay had said, it must be by continual efforts, and by that we will gain more than we desire. Let the movement be on a broad basis, and gone into by all the friends of social improvement, moral reform, and religious progress. (Applause.) Mr. R. Brown, in seconding the motion, said it was only right that the ratepayers of Scotland should have a voice in the regulation of public-houses. Such a movement had been long in his mind, and he was happy to say it had been gaining popularity every day.

Mr. Winning, in support of the resolution, said the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, whom he represented, existed for the sole purpose of assisting in procuring the suppression of the liquor traffic by the power of the national will, and through the form of a legislative enactment. To attain this consummation so devoutly to be wished for, it has fought through good report and evil report for twenty-two years, and with unswerving purpose and fixity of aim it will go on, he trusted, till the necessity for its existence shall cease to be. (Applause.) In asking the meeting to adopt the resolution, he quoted from Sir Richard Cross, the late Home Secretary: in a speech which he delivered in the debate on Mr. Rodwell's bill, he said no license ought to be granted unless it was the express wish of a neighbourhood that that should be done. Mr. Gladstone, also on the debate, said with the principle itself he was quite friendly, and he earnestly hoped that at some not very distant period it may be found practicable to deal with the licensing laws, and in dealing with the licensing laws to include the reasonable and great measure for which his hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) pleads. After giving the opinion of Lord Hartington, Mr. Bright, the Archbishop of York, Miss Florence Nightingale, and others, who were all favourable to the movement, he said that his friend Mr. Bird, governor of Paisley prison, said he had passed over 60,000 prisoners through his hands, and that 55,000 at least were there through drink. During the last seven years he had had two lawyers, one writer to the signet, four bankers, and three clergymen. One of the latter held a benefice of £600 a year, and was put in prison for selling the blankets off his bed—he and his wife being in lodgings. The interminable Irish question was at present blocking the way of Government in introducing the promised measure, and whilst they were anxious to get it settled, they thought the importance of the liquor traffic could not be overlooked any longer; and by steady, persistent pressure on Government he trusted to see a measure speedily introduced embracing a direct and effective veto on the present licensing liquor laws. (Applause.)

Mr. George Paulin said it would be imprudent for him to detain the meeting for anything he could say, as they were going to hear from one far more competent to speak on the liquor traffic than he was. He begged to submit the second resolution, which rejoiced over the adoption by Parliament of the Local Option resolution, and urged its immediate embodiment into law. Captain Breckenridge seconded the resolution with hearty good-will, merely because he was sure they ought to have a say in a matter which affected their interests.

The Rev. Mr. Pereira, in support of the resolution, in the course of a very eloquent and impressive speech, referred to the action of the Church of England in the matter. He was thankful to be able to say that over 9,000 of the clergymen of the Church of England were already enrolled members of the Church of England Temperance Society. What reason could there be advanced against the principle of Local Option? They were trusted with returning to Parliament a member to deal with the affairs of the State; they were also trusted to elect the School Board, who were to have the governing and educating of their children, and in church matters it is the same. They elected their office-bearers: then what reason is there in the public not having a say as to whether they should have public-houses in their midst or not? How can the magistrates judge the question? It is the working man's question. They can't keep the gin-shop away, and yet the magistrates, who keep them from their own doors, say it is needful for the working man. Now, as the magistrates have made such a great mistake in this direction, the working man should have it in his power to say we don't want these in our midst. But don't let us forget there are some places which would not take advantage of the Local Option when it becomes law, they will still go on as they are, and hug and nourish this poisonous serpent in their breasts; but I am convinced that when we have Local Option the places which will take advantage of it will be the bulk of the nation. (Applause.) In concluding he recommended them to work like men and to pray like Christians, till their great object was accomplished. (Great applause.) The resolution was then put to the meeting, and, like the previous one, was carried with acclamation.

Mr. Miller—The resolution I have to move is one asking the meeting to thank Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his supporters, and also the chairman to send the resolution which it adopts to the parties named in it. I need not say a single sentence in support of this. Sir Wilfrid has fought against great odds, and fought with a courage which is almost superhuman, but no doubt encouraged by the fact that he was fighting in a good cause. The name of Sir Wilfrid Lawson will be immortalised as the greatest friend of the drunkard. (Applause.) Mr. Smith said he had much pleasure in seconding the motion, because Sir Wilfrid was worthy of it. Some years ago he was characterised as the only child of the movement, and now he had 245 children to stand by and support him in the matter. Knowing that the Church had failed so much in the matter, they naturally turned to Parliament, and looked for the hammer of law to come down on it.

Mr. R. Stevenson, in support of the resolution, said, in the course of a very interesting address, that they wanted the member who represented this respected burgh not only to support the bill, but to carry out the Act so as to derive the advantages gained therefrom. There was nothing wrong with the public-house, it was the drink, and the man behind the counter was perhaps as good a man as his certificate entitled him to be. (Great laughter.) They wanted to get rid of the whisky, and sweep away the liquor out of the houses. That is what they wanted to do—not to sweep away the houses, but the liquor. (Applause.) The resolution was put to the meeting, and carried unanimously. On the motion of Mr. John Yuille, seconded by Mr. Paulin, a vote of thanks was accorded to the deputation; and on the motion of Mr. Findlay a similar compliment was paid to the chairman.—Irvine Express abridged.

MONTROSE—TEMPERANCE CONFERENCE AND PUBLIC MEETING.

A public meeting on the temperance question was held in the Guild Hall on 10th ult. Previous to the meeting a conference of the friends of temperance was held in the Council Room, where a large company of the leading temperance reformers in Montrose assembled under the presidency of ex-Bailie Lyall. After partaking of an excellent tea, short addresses were delivered by the chairman and others. The company afterwards adjourned to the public meeting in the Guild Hall. Provost Jaap presided. The first resolution condemning the liquor traffic and calling upon the friends of social order to combine for its suppression, was moved by W. D. Johnstone, seconded by Bailie Hutcheson, and supported by the Rev. Samuel Warding. The Rev. Mr. Ross moved the second resolution, which urged Parliament to legislate in accordance with Sir W. Lawson's resolution. Mr. Jas. Mudie seconded the resolution, and it was supported by the Rev. Mr. Pereira. The third resolution, thanking Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his supporters, and asking the Chairman to forward copies of the resolutions passed at this meeting, was moved by Mr. Mackie, seconded by Dean of Guild Scott, and supported by Mr. R. Stevenson. Rev. S. Harding, Rev. H. H. Pereira, and Mr. R. Stevenson formed a deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance, and the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.—Montrose, Arbroath, and Brechin Review much abridged.

ABERDEEN—LOCAL OPTION MEETING.

A public meeting was held in the hall adjoining the Young Men's Christian Institute, Aberdeen, on Friday, 11th ult., for the purpose of hearing addresses by a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on the subject of temperance as affected by the principle of the Permissive Bill. Mr. A. S. Cook, chairman of the Aberdeen Temperance Society, occupied the chair, and on the platform were Major Ross, Mr. R. Adams, Mr. Wm. Blackwood, Mr. John Clark, Mr. Alex. Badenoch, Mr. James Paterson, draper; Rev. H. H. Pereira, M.A., rector of St. Laurence, Southampton; Rev. Samuel Harding, Paisley; W. Smith, Esq., Balzeordie, &c. Owing to the severe inclemency of the weather, the attendance was not large.

The Chairman, in the course of a few introductory remarks, stated that in Aberdeen there were 410 persons engaged in the liquor traffic. Their engagement in that traffic was restricted by such measures as would naturally lead one to suppose that the progress of crime was not being assisted, but although in 1880 there were 84 fewer licensed houses in Aberdeen than in 1872, in the former year 780 persons were convicted for being drunk and incapable in the Aberdeen Police Court, against 787 in 1872. The conclusion was this, that although in Aberdeen the number of licences was being reduced, the capacity of those licensed places left behind was not lessened; in short, although places for drinking were fewer in Aberdeen in 1880 than in 1872, the facilities for the sale of drink were greater now than they were nine years ago. Mr. Cook referred to the past agitation on the question at issue, remarking that Dr. Webster, member for the city, had voted conscientiously and honestly in favour of Local Option in the House of Commons since his entry to St. Stephens. (Applause.)

Mr. James Paterson moved that the traffic was an active evil, and called upon all good citizens to unite for its suppression.

Rev. Mr. Harding, in seconding the resolution, expressed the hope that the people of Scotland were as firmly united for the purpose of obtaining Local Option as the people in Ireland were in endeavouring to obtain redress in the matter of land laws. He denounced in scathing terms the prevalence of the drink traffic, whether in grand hotel or unattractive public house, remarking that alcohol produced insanity, pauperism, premature death, domestic misery, bad trade, waste and loss of property, unnecessarily heavy taxation—(hear, hear)—besides forming one of the greatest obstacles to the moral and social improvement of society, and the spread and triumph of the gospel. As patriots he asked all Scotchmen to help to wipe out from a blurred escutcheon the horrible blot of intemperance that was spreading havoc and destruction on every side. He begged the friends of the temperance cause to observe (1) a principle that was being closely followed out in Ireland at the present moment, viz., organisation; (2) agitation—agitation such as the Land League were engaging in that country—and by such means, and by providing the sinews of war, they would aid in bringing about temperance. (Applause.)—The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. Paterson having taken the chair in room of Mr. Cook, who had to leave the meeting, Mr. William Blackwood proposed the second resolution, urging the Government to introduce the principle of Local Option into their forthcoming legislation.

Mr. Pereira seconded the resolution, and spoke at some length on the various kinds of "temperance reformers." Speaking of the question of compensation to the publican for his being deprived of the means of making his livelihood, he argued that the establishment in a property of a public-house, the consequent depreciation of surrounding property, along with the rise in value of the property itself, and the immense profits realised in the traffic, rendered the idea of compensation utterly absurd. (Applause.) On being put to the meeting, the resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. John Clark moved the third resolution, which was a request to the Chairman to forward the resolutions agreed to at that meeting to the proper quarter. Mr. Robt. Adams seconded the resolution. Mr. Smith, Balzeordie, also gave a brief address in its support, and on being put to the meeting it was carried with acclamation.

On the motion of Mr. William Davidson, a vote of thanks was accorded to the deputation for their addresses, and a similar compliment having been paid to the chairman, the proceedings terminated.—Daily Free Press, abridged.

GREENOCK—SERMON BY REV. H. H. PEREIRA.—On Sabbath evening, 13th ult., under the auspices of the Greenock Total Abstinence Society, the Rev. H. H. Pereira, M.A., rector of St. Laurence parish, Southampton, and a prominent member of the Church of England Temperance Society, paid a visit to Greenock and preached a discourse on temperance in Free Middle Church. The weather was most unpropitious, but several hundreds waded through the snow and slush to be present. The devotional services were by the assistant minister of the East Church, the Rev. Alex. Young. It was a somewhat unusual sight to see two clergymen—one of the Church of England and the other of the Church of Scotland—occupying as they did at one and the same time the pulpit of one of our most prominent Free Churches. The Rev. Mr. Pereira preached an eloquent sermon from 2nd Samuel xiv. chapter and 14th verse—"For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; neither doth God respect any person; yet doth He devise means that His banished be not expelled from Him." He made an impressive appeal to all Christians of all denominations to come forward to the help of the temperance enterprise. A collection was made, to be handed over to the Greenock Charitable Society.—Greenock Telegraph, abridged.

LINLITHGOW—TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

A temperance demonstration in connection with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association took place in the Town Hall on Monday evening, 14th ult. Ex-Bailie Dougal occupied the chair, and there was a fair attendance. Among the gentlemen on the platform were Rev. Messrs. Ferguson, Dr. Nicolson, Burns, and Rae, Linlithgow; and J. H. Paterson, Dumbarton; Councillor Hutton, Linlithgow; Bailie Selkirk, Glasgow; J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh; and a deputation from Bo'ness.

The Rev. Mr. Ferguson opened the proceedings with prayer.

The first resolution, which denounced the evils of the liquor traffic, and called on reformers to unite for its abolition, was moved by the Rev. Mr. Burns in an able speech, seconded pro forma by Dr. Nicolson, and supported by the Rev. Mr. Paterson.

The Rev. Mr. Rae moved the second resolution, which was to the effect that the meeting rejoiced that Government had adopted the local option, and called on them to fulfil the pledge given to pass a measure embodying such legislation.

Councillor Hutton seconded the motion, and Bailie Selkirk, in a vigorous address, supported it.

The third resolution was moved by Councillor M'Alpine, and seconded by Geo. Dougal, Esq., Lochend Villa, gratefully acknowledging Sir Wilfrid Lawson's efforts, and requesting the chairman to forward the resolutions adopted to prominent members of the Government.

Mr. J. H. Waterston, in supporting the resolution, gave some very interesting and humorous information regarding his dealings with the Members of Parliament and others in the House of Commons.

The Rev. Dr. Nicolson moved a vote of thanks to the gentlemen who had come from a distance to speak at the meeting, and a vote of thanks to the chairman was moved by Mr. James Dymock, Bo'ness. All the motions and resolutions were unanimously agreed to. The Rev. Mr. Paterson closed the meeting with the benediction.—West Lothian Courier, etc., abridged.

CUPAR FIFE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

A public meeting was held under the auspices of the above Association in Union Street Hall on Tuesday, 15th ult.—Mr. D. Stenhouse, manufacturer, in the chair. The usual resolutions were moved by Messrs. Alexander Ramsay, Adamson, and Cooper, and supported by a deputation, consisting of Mr. D. Fyfe, Dundee; the Rev. E. J. Boon, Kirkcaldy; and Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh. Much gratification was expressed in the speeches made at the passing of the local option resolution, and the recognition on the part of the Government of the necessity of legislation on the subject. Satisfaction was also expressed at Mr. Williamson, M.P. for the St. Andrews Burghs, being at his post when the division was taken, and voting with the majority; while Mr. Bruce's (the County Member) absence from the House on the night in question was alluded to as disappointing. Mr. Nicol moved a vote of thanks to the deputation, and a similar compliment to the chairman closed the proceedings.—Fife News.

A DISTILLER'S PROFITS.—Archibald Walker, distiller, 8 Crown Terrace, Downhill, has left by inventory £148,602 0s. 11d.

Mrs. Annie E. Garrison of South Bay, Wis., obtained a verdict for 10,000 dollars in a civil damage suit against a liquor dealer, who sold her husband liquor.

The London Temperance Hospital, 112 Gower Street, has now no in-patients, though outones are being attended to as usual. The establishment is in course of removal to the new hospital in the Hampstead Road, which will be opened by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London and Middlesex in state on Friday, 4th March.

The expenses incurred by J. B. Balfour, M.P., in his uncontested election for Clackmannan and Kinross-shires, amount to £310.

The expenses incurred by Alex. Crum, Esq., M.P., in his uncontested election for the county of Renfrew, were £227 10s., chiefly made up of agents' charges and advertising expenses.

THE SCOTT ACT IN CANADA.—Mr. G. H. Hale, of the Orillia Packet, writing to Mr. R. Mackay, secretary, says, "Our cause is attracting more than usual attention just now, partly because of efforts in various places to secure the adoption of the Scott Act and partly from the efforts of the licenced victuallers to obtain various modifications of the restrictions upon 'the Trade.' There is very little prospect indeed of these efforts of theirs proving successful, as our people appear to be fully aroused."

EVADING THE BEER TAX.—In Boxford, Essex, the sapient authorities have been trying to evade the beer tax. This is how it stands. If the annual value of a house does not exceed £10, there is no tax for beer brewed therein. This is how they try to do it. They have reduced the value of every house to under £10 by isolating the house from its ground, outhouses, &c. It would be a good thing for an abstainer to live there; he would scarcely have anything to pay. We shall be glad to hear of the issue of this transparent trick.

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The first annual social meeting of this League took place in the Christian Institute, Glasgow, on the 2nd ult. Alexander Allan, Esq., of Aros, presided. There was a large attendance. Addresses were delivered during the evening by ex-Lord Provost Collins, Rev. Wm. Ross, ex-Bailie Ross, Revs. G. G. McLeod, D. M. Duncan, Captain Hatfield, Messrs. Robert Stevenson (Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association), R. Simpson, J. Black, &c. The year's report of the League's operation was quite satisfactory.

PUBLICANS' PROFITS.—Some idea may be formed of the profits made by dealers in excisable liquors from the fact that on the 3rd ult., in the Faculty Hall, West George Street, Mr. Edmestone, auctioneer, disposed of the goodwill of the business carried on by the late J. R. Campsie, at corner of Great Wellington Street and Paisley Road, opposite the toll-house on Paisley Road, at the enormous figure of £1765, exclusive of stock or fittings. The purchaser is in business in the same line in Govan district. A shop, also belonging to the same deceased publican, on the opposite side of the road at the Toll, which was afterwards put up, realized £480 for the goodwill alone.—Daily Mail.

HINDRANCES TO CHRISTIAN WORK.—At a conversation in connection with Aberdeen Temperance Society last month, Mr. C. Sheriffs read a paper on "Hindrances to Christian work." There were indifference and unbelief, drinking and drunkenness, money-making and extravagance. Speaking of drinking, he said that if Christian citizens knew the relation of drinking to drunkenness, and the barriers that it put in the way of the good work they had at heart, many of them, he held, would stop their drinking, and that would stop drunkenness by and by. He also stated that he had collected the testimony of a number of Bible-women, which was to the effect that intemperance was one of the chief hindrances to the successful prosecution of their work.—Daily Review.

MONTROSE.—A large and enthusiastic public meeting was held in the E.U. Hall, John Street, on Friday evening, 11th ult., being the anniversary soiree of the "City of Refuge" Lodge, I.O.G.T. Brother George Lamb, W.C.T. presided. After tea, a programme of unusual interest was gone through. Eloquent addresses were given by the chairman, Bro. Rev. G. Wisely, and Bro. R. Stevenson, the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. At intervals vocal and instrumental music and recitations, together with a temperance dialogue, were rendered in a manner which merited and received hearty applause. Additional pleasure was afforded by the address of Brother J. W. Campbell, who, in a speech of marked ability, on behalf of the lodge, presented Bro. A. Mackay, P.W.C.T., with an elegant writing desk as an expression of the esteem and good wishes cherished towards him on the occasion of his leaving Montrose. A handsome tea caddy for Mrs. Mackay was also presented in graceful terms by the chairman. Both gifts were suitably acknowledged by Bro. Mackay. The usual votes of thanks being heartily awarded, the meeting dispersed.

THE PERMISSIVE BILL.—ROTHESAY WORKING MEN'S CLUB PRIZE ESSAYS.—The late Mr. A. B. Stewart of Ascog Hall having offered £20, divided into three prizes, for the three best essays on the Permissive Bill argument, for and against, the judges—viz., Rev. Dr. Williamson, Rev. Messrs. M'Farlane and Thomson—have just given their awards as follows:—First prize (£10), Hugh Thomson, letter carrier; second and third, equal (£5 each), James Fisher, seed merchant's assistant; and John C. Harvey, compositor. We understand that the judges were greatly pleased with the literary merits of the essays, and were much surprised when they came to learn that the authors were bona fide working men.—Daily Mail. [We understand that the conclusions of the essayists are in favour of the Permissive Bill.—Ed. S. R.]

FAILURE OF MASSACHUSETTS LAW AGAINST DRUNKARDS.—The County Commissioners declare the law punishing drunkenness by a dollar fine a failure. It has increased the rates and also drunkenness, and the increased cost of prosecution has not, as anticipated, lessened the jail expenses, for more men have been sent to jail through default of payment than was the case under the old law. The prisoners themselves ridicule the idea of securing sobriety by a dollar fine. If it had been seven dollars they would have had to quit drinking through lack of money, but they stumped up their dollar and still had something with which to get drunk. Massachusetts would have been better with prohibition. As well dam up Niagara with a spade as secure sobriety by fining or confining the drinker. Let them imprison the drink, and their jail expenses will be nil for drunkenness.

MANUFACTURE AND CONSUMPTION OF SPIRITS.—From the report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the year ending March 31st, 1880, it appears the quantity of spirits charged with duty in the United Kingdom was 28,213,721 gallons, being a decrease as compared with the previous year of 1,576,413 gallons. The quantity retained for consumption as beverage in the United Kingdom was 27,286,952 gallons, a decrease as compared with the previous year of 1,647,843 gallons. The quantity consumed per head of the population in 1879 was 0.640 gallons in England, 1.677 in Scotland, and 0.946 in Ireland. In giving these figures, the Commissioners say:—"There are not wanting indications of a growing disposition on the part of many in all classes to reduce if not to discontinue the use of spirits as an ordinary beverage, and probably the decrease in the aggregate consumption is in part due to this cause."

Every great and commanding movement in the annals of the world, is the triumph of some enthusiasm. The victories of the Arabs after Mahomet, who, in a few years from a small and mean beginning, established a larger empire than that of Rome, is an example. They did they knew not what. The naked Derar horsed on an idea was found an overmatch for a troop of Roman cavalry. The women fought like men and conquered the Roman men. They were miserably equipped, miserably fed. They were temperance troops. There was neither brandy nor flesh needed to feed them. They conquered Asia, Africa, and Spain on barley. The caliph Omar's walking-stick struck more terror into those that saw it than another man's sword. His diet was barley bread; his sauce was salt; and ofttimes by way of abstinence he ate his bread without salt. His drink was water. His palace was built of mud, and when he left Medina to go to the conquest of Jerusalem, he rode on a red camel with a wooden platter hanging at his girdle, with a bottle of water and two sacks, one holding barley and the other dried fruits.—Man the Reformer—by Emerson.

FALKIRK TEMPERANCE ELECTORAL UNION AND PERMISSIVE BILL ASSOCIATION.—This union met in Johnston's hotel on Friday 21st Jan.—Mr. Robt. Clark, president in the chair. There was a good attendance. After preliminary remarks congratulatory of the progress of the association, the chairman called upon Mr. John Wallace, the secretary, to read the annual report. We give the following extracts:—In our last report we had to record the sending of a memorial to our Parliamentary representative, Mr. Ramsay, M.P., asking him to support the local option resolution. In this report we have to record that we have done the same thing and although he did not do it to the full extent of our desires, yet the combined action of the temperance and prohibitory movement on the last division was sufficient to secure a pledge from the Government that during the present Parliament they would deal with the licensing laws, and in doing so give power to the ratepayers to protect themselves against the operations of the drink trade. Your committee hope that the Government may soon see its way to work out the ways and means needful to give due effect to our principle. Our next business was of a local nature. Seeing that other towns, large and small, near and far, had not failed to take notice of the intention of Lord Zetland to enforce the prohibition contained in his few charters in Grangemouth, we felt it to be our duty as temperance reformers to recognize his lordship's efforts and to signify our sense of the important step proposed by his lordship. We sent on a memorial which afterwards appeared in the Falkirk Herald. In November we had a visit from Mr. John Paton of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. The meetings he addressed were held in Graham's Road U.P. Hall, but on account of other entertainments in the Town Hall, the attendance was small, and in a pecuniary sense unprofitable. Having thus briefly glanced over our past history, we can survey the great object for which we are banded together as being advanced a step farther in progress, and though we cannot as a body claim the victory of last session, yet we know it was won by united effort, and our little item was not wanting in the great total. Though we do not realize victory as yet, still let us not weary in well-doing, but having set our resolute hearts to the work, we must, like our great champion, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, labour perseveringly through sunshine and cloud and ultimately, over apparently insurmountable difficulties, we will triumph victoriously. Let our motto for the coming year be, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." The report on the motion of Mr. Stewart M'Waters, seconded by Mr. James Rae, was unanimously adopted. Vacancies in the committee were then filled up. During the year a motion was adopted for the enlargement of the committee, and each of the Good Templar lodges was asked to send four representatives, which was heartily complied with. These twelve representatives took their seats at this meeting and will henceforth with the original committee form a compact and strong body. With such a strong, and it is hoped, working committee, the Association may look forward to the work of the coming year with the feeling that it is now somewhat equal to the task. The usual votes of thanks terminated the proceedings.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Half Hour Temperance Readings. First series. By Rev. Charles Courtenay, curate of St. Paul's, Onslow square, London. Jarrold & Sons, 3 Paternoster Buildings. Price One Shilling. We have here one dozen of temperance stories, interesting, exciting, thrilling, and entralling. As temperance stories they could not be surpassed for truthful presentation of the nature and duty of abstinence; they are pervaded by a fine pawky humour and an exquisite sense of what really should constitute a reading of a half hour's duration. Squire Armitage, Dr. Sharp's stories, Betsy Trollope's jug, and John Bowling are each worth the sum charged for the entire book. We cordially recommend them all.

The Martyr's Tree. By Mrs. Sewell. London: Jarrold & Son, 3 Paternoster Buildings. This is a metrical version of the martyrdom of William Hunter at Brentwood, in Queen Mary Tudor's time. It is told with true pathos and with remarkable fidelity to the language and spirit of that age.

The Methodist Temperance Magazine. Vol. xiii., 1880. London: Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row. A volume of abiding interest to all followers of Wesley. It reflects clearly the decided opinions on temperance cherished and expounded by the founder of Methodism. No other evidence of its value and excellence need be offered than this, that it has the Rev. Chas. Garrett for its chief editor.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

The late Mr. Alex. Lamberton, Kilbirnie. We regret to have to record the death of this well-known gentleman after a short illness, on the 4th ult., at the ripe age of 75 years. The immediate cause of death was apoplexy. Born in Kilmaurs he settled here when 35 years, and during the long period of 40 years was known as a schoolmaster and latterly as a merchant. He was an abstainer since his 30th year, and was a staunch supporter of the temperance and prohibitory movements. A widow and grown-up family are left to mourn their irreparable loss.
