THE PERMISSIVE BILL—ARGUMENTS FOR AND AGAINST.

SECOND PRIZE ESSAY, BY MR. JOHN C. HARVEY, ROTHESAY.

It is very amusing to study the reasons which are given by the liquor interest why the Bill should not pass. For example, one party says that the bread would be taken out of the mouths of those engaged in this great industry; while another affirms, that if the Bill were passed to-morrow it would be a dead letter, as no town in the kingdom would take the liberty of putting it into force. If the publicans really believe the latter theory, I am certain their opposition to the passing of it would not be so strong as it is. The majority of them are, however, shrewd enough to see that the people only want the power to rid themselves of the evil. "But," says a voice, "is the question an urgent one?" In defining a question of this nature, I affirm that it should powerfully concern the interests of the community at large, and should be ripe for decision; and what question, I ask, has more right to these characteristics than the treatment of the liquor traffic? The encouragement to drinking given by the State is in a great measure the cause of the drunkenness of the country, and it is the duty of the State to remove the cause. The reasons why the temptations of this traffic have so much power is that they have formed an acquired appetite through social custom. Law is an influential teacher to the great mass of the people, and as the law has raised into power the system of legalised temptation, nothing but the law can destroy it. It is good to preach temperance and to use moral suasion and education, as weapons against drunkenness, but these are only theoretical means; and against them are arrayed throughout the country thousands of seminaries, established by permission of the Government, which practically create drunkards. I cheerfully concur with the opinion expressed by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, that "Government should so legislate as to make it easy to do right and difficult to do wrong." The Right Hon. R. A. Cross expressed the same idea, when he said, "All the Legislature can do will be to place in the hand of the people the means of raising themselves, and to remove all hindrances which exist in present legislation." These gentlemen could scarcely have expressed in better language what the Permissive Bill proposes to do. I firmly believe that any measure of the kind mentioned will have the sympathy and support of the great body of the working classes of the kingdom. Political philosophy should not commend men to rise above their circumstances; it ought rather, by removing temptations which are too strong, to alter the circumstances, and thus gain the desired end. Is it not unworthy of the Government to allow the drunkard to remain bound hand and foot with grave clothes when they can do something to set him free? In the discharge of their duty to God and their brethren, should our Legislature not free the slaves who are yet within her bounds? Richard Cobden said, "Every day's experience tends more and more to convince me that the temperance cause lies at the foundation of all social and political reform."

I shall now submit the principal objections which have been urged against the Permissive Bill, and I will endeavour to show that they do not deserve much serious consideration. Before proceeding, however, I may state that the great bulk of the objections to the Bill are made by those who have a pecuniary interest in the extension of the traffic, and that those who support the Bill can have no other object than the welfare of the people. It is said, "The liquor traffic is an ancient industry, and it employs upwards of 800,000 persons, besides those dependent on them; and the capital inseparably invested in it is not less than £38,000,000." My answer to all this is that an "industry" may be "ancient" without being either legitimate, respectable, or endurable. A tree is known by its fruits, and if the liquor traffic is bad, surely the fact of its being as old as sin does not prove the legitimacy of it; and the fact that 800,000 persons earn their bread by spreading this evil and that £38,000,000 are sunk for the same end, is anything but an argument for upholding the traffic. Not even those engaged in the liquor trade will venture to assert that their business is an unqualified blessing, nor does it furnish employment to nearly so many as the cotton trade, and yet the capital sunk in the cotton trade is by no means so large. The Caledonian Distillery, having a turn-over of £1,500,000 annually, employs 150 men; while the Atlas Iron Works, Sheffield, with the same turn-over, finds employment for 4,000 men! But I will dismiss this objection by asking if it is not an immoral act to prostitute the virtue of the people to the vested interests of the publican? The next argument is scarcely worth noticing, as it would be going over the same ground as I have just traversed. It is, that "the duties and licenses imposed upon the liquor traffic constitute about one-third of the total revenue of the country." As I have said, the money of the people could be more profitably invested in other trades, and even without the increased wealth arising from this source, the ordinary taxation would be quite adequate to meet the diminished expenditure of the country. To connive at dissolute habits, because they are supposed to be the means of recouping an exhausted treasury, is but a miserable expedient for any Government to adopt; because private vices never can prove to be public benefits. No statement has been more persistently made with regard to the Permissive Bill than that it would prevent the poorer classes of society from obtaining those beverages which the rich would still be able to keep in their cellars, while it seeks to close the public-house which is the poor man's wine-cellar. It is affirmed that if this Bill is passed class distinctions will be intensified, and that it will virtually establish one law for the rich and another for the poor. The tap will cease to run, but the cellar will be inviolable; and this, it is said, would be an invasion by the rich on the pleasures of the poor. I need scarcely mention, in a paper written in connection with a working men's club, that social enjoyment can be had elsewhere than in a licensed drink-shop, and I believe that the majority of working men hold the same opinion. The Times recently said "the demand for a settlement of the liquor law is essentially democratic." If the Permissive Bill is a question of rich versus poor, how can the fact be accounted for, that whereas on the first introduction of the Bill, in 1864, before an upper and middle-class Parliament, only 40 members voted for it; while, on its being brought forward in 1871, when the extension of the franchise had made St. Stephen's more of the people's Parliament, 136 voted for the Bill; and without going to the House of Commons, the case of the inhabitants of Grangemouth is an evidence of this assertion. In connection with the notice by the Earl of Zetland that all licensed houses in that town will be closed after Whitsunday first, the local option party took a plebiscite of the town with the result that three-fourths of the inhabitants over sixteen years of age, and four-fifths of the householders, have declared themselves in favour of the withdrawal of the licenses! The people of many other towns have expressed themselves of the same opinion, as the Archbishop of York, who says, that in accordance with all modern legislation and with the feelings of the people in every part of the empire, the proper authority to have the control of the liquor traffic is the people themselves. Cardinal Manning, in the same strain, says, "I look upon the Permissive Bill as no more than giving a legal right and power to the people of this country to protect themselves." Another argument used against the Bill is that it will introduce a principle absolutely new to the constitution—namely, that of giving the majority the power of interfering with the social habits and tastes of the minority. Of course, the inference intended to be drawn is that interference with the liquor traffic would be of this character. Time after time the majority have interfered with the social habits and tastes of those who approve of bull-baiting, cock-fighting, gambling, duelling, and such like. If the majority have no right in this matter, I would ask if the minority have a right to interfere with the majority as exemplified in the cases of the late Prince Consort, Earl Shaftesbury, the Earl of Zetland, and numerous other landlords, who have by their simple fiat decreed that no licensed houses shall exist on their properties. The experience of these noblemen has been of the very happiest description, and entirely disproves the statements made to the effect that illicit traffic and continued attempts to evade the law will result from the passing of the Permissive Bill. The Permissive Bill will be entirely inoperative unless the majority of the people are of opinion that they ought to exercise the powers to be given them in the Act. I again call attention to this fact, because the licensed victuallers are continually making a great outcry about the loss the country would sustain by the removal of inns and hotels. I am perfectly willing to admit that hotel-keepers are a class of great importance, and the loss would be seriously felt by tourists, commercial men, and all who have occasion to leave their homes on business or pleasure. But do my friends the licensed victuallers forget that there is a great difference between common public houses and hotels; that houses for the entertainment of strangers have been, and are, successfully managed without a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and that it is not at all likely that a majority of the people would be in favour of the suppression of inns and hotels as long as they continued to be of utility? I have one general objection to offer to the Permissive Bill, which is that it goes rather far to begin with. Even Sir Wilfrid Lawson has admitted this by forsaking it in the meantime for his Local Option Resolution. I feel certain, however, that if the Resolution had been introduced in 1864, we should now have the Permissive Bill. I think it is a pity that there is no provision made in the Permissive Bill for compensating those liquor dealers who might be disestablished by it. There are, I feel certain, many respectable persons engaged in the traffic, who have expended large sums of money in purchasing their businesses, and it certainly would be a hardship to rob them of their capital and means of livelihood without compensation. This compensation should only, I think, be given to those engaged in the trade prior to the passing of the Act. Even admitting that the traffic is bad, we have a precedent for such a course in the action of our country with regard to the slave trade.

THE DRINK TRAFFIC AND VITAL STATISTICS.

THE influence of the drink traffic on the public health and on the rate of the national mortality has not yet received the amount of attention which it assuredly deserves, and to which it has the highest claims. That there is such a great and powerful influence is all but universally admitted, especially among those who are best able to decide the matter, and has been very generally expressed, though mostly in very vague terms. It is quite common to meet with such expressions as these—"Most of the cases of disease that come under my care owe their origin to or are seriously complicated by, the excessive use of strong drink." Much more than these generalities is required before the public can form any clear and conclusive opinion on the greatness of that influence, and clearer notions are required before the popular mind can be influenced, as we should desire to see it, by these statements. In order to meet this, the Medical Temperance Society has set before itself, as one end to aim at, the collection of statistics bearing on this question. They have as yet, however, only had a very limited time, and the area is but circumscribed. We must, then, make use of such evidence as we can get—and make the best of it. That is of greater importance than many people imagine, and must be gathered from various sources of a character not very promising. It is our object to try and find out the facts, so far as we can reach them, from such evidence as we have been able to collect. The main supply of evidence that we can at present command is derived from the Insurance Companies and Benefit Societies. One of the former has for many years carried on its business, insuring people in one or other of two sections—the temperance section for those who are abstainers, the other, the ordinary section, whose members are not abstainers, though only those are admitted who are very moderate users of alcoholic beverages. As the two sections are kept thoroughly separate, and as the statistics of each are published annually, we have the means of comparing the death-rate of these classes. We have watched the reports for a number of years with great interest, and the results from 1866 to 1880 are now before us; we summarize them thus—

Temperance Section.			Ordinary Section.
Years	Expected	Actual	Expected	Actual
1866-70	549	411	1008	944
71-75	723	511	1268	1330
76-80	933	651	1485	1480
	2205	1573	3761	3754

From this table it will be seen, that the mortality in the temperance section is proportionally much lower than in the ordinary section. The expected deaths in the former for the 15 years ending 1880, were 2205, while only 1573 actually died, or 71.3 per cent. of what was expected. When we turn to the ordinary section we find the expected deaths number 3761, and the actual deaths amount to 3754, or 99.8 per cent. of the expectation. There is thus a wide difference between the two sections—the mortality in the temperance section is 28.5 per cent. less than in the ordinary section. Whence, then, comes this marked difference? It does not come from the one section being from a higher class of society than the other—in this respect they are much alike; no difference has yet been suggested other than this—the one section uses alcohol, the other does not. Here we have abstinence placed in comparison with moderation. Sir James Paget says, when writing on this subject, that no statistics have yet been got which show the comparison between the use in moderation of alcoholic liquors and abstinence—on a sufficiently large basis. He says no true comparison can be made, unless at least 500 of each class are taken, and in similar circumstances. Here we have what Sir James desiderates, provided for a period sufficiently long to eliminate all chances of material error. The comparison here is between at least 20 times the number he requires, for a period not of one year, but for fifteen years. And what is the result of the experiment? The life of the abstainer is one-third better than that of the moderate drinker—or in other words, the death-rate of the former is 28.5 per cent. less than that of the latter. If, then, we suppose the whole population were abstainers, the death-rate would be 28.5 less than it would be were all moderate drinkers; or in other words, the total number of deaths in the Kingdom would be at the least somewhere about 150,000 less than it is at present, which just means that moderate drinking kills 150,000 a year in our population.

This experience is not confined to the United Kingdom Temperance and Provident Society, whose statistics we have just quoted. There are several other Insurance Societies which have lately adopted the same mode of working. Another company has this experience. At the end of seven years, the examination of the condition of the company revealed this state of matters. In the general section, the expected deaths were 1836, and the actual number was 1863 or 27 more than were expected; while in the temperance section, the expected deaths were 1070, while the actual mortality was 745. In the former the ratio of actual to expected deaths, was 101.5 per cent. nearly, while in the latter section the ratio was only 69.7, or a difference in favour of abstainers of 31.8 per cent. The Sceptre Life Association has the following experience. For five years ending December 1850 the expected claims in the general section were 308, and the actual claims were 229, or 75 per cent. of the expectancy. In the temperance section the expected deaths were 99, the actual claims were 44, or 45 per cent. of the expectancy. Two or three other Societies of the same class have a similar experience, but none of these have either the breadth of basis, or length of experience, of the United Kingdom Temperance and Provident Association. But they show that the experience of that company is not isolated, but is confirmed by the other societies which adopt the same plan. Hence we may draw a conclusion from that experience with the most perfect certainty, that the inference will, if correctly drawn, be in accordance with the true state of matters. This inference is that compared with moderate drinking, abstinence would increase the average length of life at least nearly one-third if not more. One may say that the comparison is not a fair one. We admit that some of those who began as moderate drinkers may have become drunkards, or at least not very moderate drinkers. But, on the other hand, we have among the abstainers some who in youth had been addicted to the use of strong drink, and consequently their constitution must have been more or less injured thereby. Thus the comparison is on the whole a very fair one, as between the moderate drinker and the abstainer. But if we take the general population, the comparison would be much more favourable to the abstainers, at least this is the conclusion we would naturally come to, from a survey of the general state of society. That this is true is, we think, shown in the following comparison between the Rechabites and the Odd-Fellows. In the Society of the Rechabites every member is an abstainer. In that of the Odd-Fellows there is no such requirement, but every one is at liberty to use liquor. Indeed, some of them use it freely, while there are among them some who are abstainers. The following gives the result of five years experience—

Rechabites	Number	Odd-Fellows
30,000	500,000
16.16	Sick per cent.	28.75
7.4	Deaths per 1000	12.6
6.14	Average days sick	10.5

Looking just at the death rate, we find that of the Rechabites is 7.4 per thousand, and that of the Odd-Fellows 12.6, in other words the rate of the former is 41.27 per cent. less than that of the latter. This bears out the inference that if the general population were taken, the odds would be much greater in favour of abstinence than the experience of the U.K. Temperance and Provident shows. The Odd-Fellows admit members who use liquor more freely than the Insurance Society does, hence the death rate is higher compared with abstainers than it is in the Temperance and Provident, and if the whole population were compared with abstainers, we have no doubt that the difference would be found to be greater still. But even this is startling enough. It means that only 59 abstainers die for every 100 of the drinkers as represented by the Odd-Fellows. If this proportion be extended to the population above 15 years of age, the drink-caused deaths cannot be less than 140,000 yearly, and if to these we add one-sixth of the children, killed indirectly by the drink, or about 60,000 (by far too low an estimate we believe) we have a total loss to the nation yearly of 200,000. Dr. B. W. Richardson estimates the death rate caused by drink as one-third of the whole, or about 230,000, and the considerations already brought forward pretty strongly confirm his estimate.

Look now at the sickness—among the Odd-Fellows the rate is 28.75 per cent., and among the Rechabites 16.16 per cent., a difference in favour of abstinence of 43.8 per cent. In the whole population the advantage would be greater. It appears that at least two-fifths of all the cases of sickness in the community are drink caused, if we may judge from the experience of those two societies. But look again at the length of the period of sickness—That of the abstainers was 6.14 days, that of the Odd-Fellows was 10.5—the former less than the latter by fully 41 per cent. If we consider that only 57 cases of sickness occur among the abstainers for every 100 among the Odd-Fellows, and these are sick 6.14 days while the Odd-Fellows are 10.5 days sick, we have, as the result, 350 days sickness among abstainers for 1050 days among the Odd-Fellows, or as nearly as possible three times as much sickness among the latter as among the former. This strongly corroborates the statements made by many medical men, that one third of the sickness of the country is caused by the use of alcoholic liquor. This is confirmed by the experience of the Benefit Society established by the Rev. Stenton Eardley of Streatham Common. The result of the first seven years experience, as detailed by the President, is as follows—Average number of members 117, of whom the average number of abstainers was 38. The whole expense of the Society in the way of sick alimnt, &c., was, £705 10s 4d, of this the abstainers received £56 11s, whereas had their sickness been as great as that of the other members they would have received £180 lls. The Society was thus saved no less than £124. In other words, the annual charge on behalf of each member was 16s on an average, but that of the abstainers was only 4s 4d; that is, the amount of sickness was only a little more than one-fourth that of the non-abstainers. Similar is the experience of the army in India. In the 65th Regiment, 1874-5, we have the number of non-abstainers reported 900, and of abstainers 260; the former sent to the hospital 357 or 40 per cent. of their number, the latter sent only 59 or 23 per cent. Dr. Munro of Hull, collected some statistics as to the amount of sickness in Benefit Societies in his neighbourhood, and he found as the result of his examination that the sickness in temperance societies was only  $1\frac{3}{4}$  days yearly, while in these which admitted non-abstainers or consisted chiefly of these, the average sickness was  $11\frac{1}{2}$  days. The death rate he found to be nearly 5 times as great in the latter as in the former.

Such are a few of the facts on which we base our conclusions, some may say that they are far too narrow to build so broad a structure upon. We have seen, however, that from every quarter we get confirmatory evidence, although in itself it may be comparatively of small importance, and this evidence from every quarter, and from every available source all tells the same general tale. In no case that we have ever seen, have we found the sickness or death rate of the abstainers higher than it is among those who drink. The exact proportions may vary, but the preponderance of sickness and deaths is always found among the consumers of alcohol. It is much to be regretted that we have not yet got such a body of evidence collected as would put all doubt on the question out of court; but this too will come before long. We have enough to show that the influence of drink upon health and vitality in this country is a very deadly one. That to drink we owe one-third at least of all our sickness, and consequent loss and expense, and nearly, if not fully one-third of the deaths of the country are due directly or indirectly to strong drink. Truly this is a most important inquiry, and among all the subjects of inquiry under the Legislature we know none more deserving of attention, or more imperatively calling for it than this.

If the facts be, as we think these sources of evidence show that they are, true (we are firmly persuaded they are understated), what are we to do? In the first place we must endeavour to convince the people of the facts, and lead them to adopt such measures as shall compel the Legislature to deal effectually with the cause of all these multifarious evils. Were cholera, or any other epidemic to visit our shores, neither people nor legislature would be satisfied by the adoption of such measures as would reduce the mortality from the plague to one-fourth or one-sixth of the rate, at the same time perpetuating it in a more limited extent, while there was clearly and emphatically pointed out a plain, simple, tried and complete cure, not only for the present evil, but a certain means of preventing the return of the epidemic. Would any M. P. dare to face his constituents and tell them he had resisted the tried and effectual remedy, and had done his best to substitute a palliative which would reduce the mortality, though it certainly would keep it up perpetually in a limited form? Nay, verily! He would soon be given to understand that he must take the tried and effectual remedy, and that if he would not, they would find some one who would. Now, any change in the present License Law would at the very best only limit and confine the evil—would not cure it—but would perpetuate it in some measure, however much it might be limited. License can never cure the evil. Prohibition and that alone can successfully combat the enemy. No place where this has been tried has found it a failure. No people who have given it a fair and full trial have ever had reason to complain that it has not given them the satisfaction they expected. The cause of the evil being removed, the evil itself must also cease. If drink causes all this mischief, remove drink from the land, and the evils so far as they proceed from this cause and so far as they are the fruits thereof must follow in its train. If we are right in our inferences from such facts as we have been able to gather bearing on the question before us, we are safe in asserting, as has been done by many medical men, that drink is the cause of a very large proportion of the disease and death of the country. The experience of many years tells the same tale. From 1861-66 the drinking of the country steadily increased, and so did the death-rate at the rate of 10,000 yearly. In 1867 the cost of the drink consumed fell somewhat less than four millions owing to the dull trade and the straitened circumstances of the people, the death rate also decreased about 39,000. Drinking increases, death-rate increases—when drinking decreases so does the death-rate.

What then is the remedy? Clearly this, and nothing less, nothing more is required. Prohibit the manufacture, importation and traffic in alcoholic liquors, and our national vitality will rise a third. We shall have a third less sickness, and we shall save annually about 200,000 lives which are now offered a sacrifice to Bacchus, a loss to the nation to the disgrace of our humanity and to the dishonour of our Christianity. Let each man who is a true patriot and loves his nation demand of his representative in the people's House of Parliament such a measure as will, as soon as possible, not merely chain the drink traffic—not only draw a few of its claws and teeth, but for ever close its existence, and so set free the slaves carried captive at its will, and liberate the nation from the frightful incubus resting upon it. This is a thing that all can aid in accomplishing. Never can the nation truly flourish, and health and long life be extended to the largest number of our fellow-citizens so long as the deadly upas tree of the drink traffic flourishes among us. Scotland in this matter expects that every man this season should do his duty. Give no rest to the Scottish M.P.'s until a Bill has been passed giving as the minimum the local veto to the people. This is the very least we can accept as a present settlement of the great drink problem.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—II.

MR. S. C. ALLSOPP—TOBACCO CULTURE—DR. CAMERON'S PASSENGER VESSELS (SCOTLAND) BILL—OPIMUM TRAFFIC—DROPPED ORDERS—PURITY OF BEER—HALF YEARLY LICENSES IN IRELAND—LORD COLIN CAMPBELL'S LICENSING (SCOTLAND) BILL—PUBLICANS HAVING ARMS—BREWING LICENSES—BALLOT ACT—CORNWALL SUNDAY CLOSING BILL—DRUNKENNESS IN INDIA—ARMY REFORMS—PAYMENT OF WAGES IN PUBLIC HOUSES—PROHIBITION BILL.

FEB. 20th.—Mr. S. C. Allsopp, the newly elected member for Taunton, amid Conservative cheers, took the oath and his seat. With the Opposition of the day it seems to be an article of belief that beer is essential to the stability of the Throne and the Constitution.

Mr. Gladstone, in reply to the question whether it was in contemplation to authorise the growth for sale of tobacco by the agriculturists, said that the Government would be glad at any time to find that any plan could be devised under which tobacco could be cultivated in the United Kingdom, and especially for Ireland, which appeared to have special qualities for its growth. But no plan of the kind was at present before the Government.

In committee of the whole House, Dr. Cameron obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the traffic in excisable liquors in passenger vessels plying between Scottish ports.

FEB. 21st.—Mr. J. W. Pease that day four weeks would move a resolution and an address to Her Majesty on the subject of the opium trade with China.

Mr. Armitage asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it was true that the Emperor of China had sanctioned, upon the petition of the Viceroy of Nankeen, an increase of the opium import duty to the extent of 140 taels, equal to £40 per chest. Sir Charles Dilke replied that the statement was not correct.

A resolution, moved by Mr. E. Clarke "That it is desirable that the practice of this House should be so amended that the consideration of Bills which have passed a second reading but have not become law, should be resumed in the succeeding session of the same Parliament at the stage of committee," was defeated by 126 to 61 votes. The resolution was successfully opposed on the following grounds—1st, It would require an Act of Parliament; 2nd, All proceedings in Parliament were put an end to by prorogation; 3rd, There would be little time lost in beginning de novo, &c.

Feb. 23.—The Bill for better securing the purity of beer was brought in by Colonel Barne, and read a first time.

Feb. 27th.—Mr. Gladstone, in answer to Mr. Biggar, stated that there was no existing power to issue half-yearly licenses for beer and wine in Ireland under the Licensing Act.

Lord Colin Campbell obtained leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Licensing Laws of Scotland. The Bill was read a first time.

Feb. 28th.—The question which Mr. Pease, M.P., put to Lord Hartington and Sir Charles Dilke on the opium traffic and the Chefoo Convention was delayed till the publication of certain papers bearing on the subject.

The Attorney-General for Ireland, in reply to Mr. Callan, said that no instructions had been issued to the Licensing Magistrates "that there is an objection as a rule to publicans having arms." [If they had liquor and arms they would prove too much for the peace of any country.—Ed. S.R.]

March 2nd.—Mr. Gladstone, in answer to Mr. Beddel, said the number of licenses taken out to brew in the year to the end of September 1881, by persons who did not pay any beer duty was—in England, 83,409, in Scotland, 2285, and in Ireland none.

Mr. Onslow gave notice that on the second reading of the Ballot Act (continuance) Bill, he would move that it was inexpedient to compel local authorities to extend the hours of polling.

Mr. Arthur Vivian obtained leave to bring in a Bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday in Cornwall. The Bill was read a first time.

March 9th.—The Marquis of Hartington stated in answer to Mr. O'Donnell that it was correct that the Excise Revenue of the Punjab for 1880-81 was the largest yet recorded. The gross receipts were 11 lacs 9000 rupees (£110,900), against 10 lacs 94,000 rupees (£109,400) in 1876. The letter of the Rev. Mr. Evans, Monghyr, to Lord Ripon, on the increase of drunkenness in India, and the report of the Bengal Government on it could be laid on the table if the hon. member liked to move for it.

March 13th.—The noble Marquis, replying to Mr. O'Donnell, stated that in the report of the administrator of the Punjab for 1881, Mr. Lyall said there was a growing liking among the natives for rum, now that its price was not very different from that of native liquor, and if the trade were allowed to follow its natural course the consumption would expand rapidly, somewhat to the detriment of the revenue derived from country spirits. The proposal set forth in the question was simply intended to check the practice of those interested in the sale of country spirits who buy up all the rum licenses, not with the view of making a profit by selling rum, but by limiting or preventing its sale, and who, having thus acquired a practical monopoly, prefer to sell country liquor at a higher profit. The Government, therefore, were of opinion that the growing demand for rum which was at least as wholesome as the country spirits should not be discouraged, and approved of Mr. Lyall's proposal.

March 13th.—Mr. Childers, in course of his speech on the Army Estimates said:—"So far as the men are concerned, the first important change which we have introduced relates to canteens. Formerly canteens were often let to contractors, but some years ago they were generally handed over to regimental charge, the profits being devoted to the amusements of the men and their families. Recreation rooms and coffee bars have also been generally established, and shops where groceries and other articles can be got. There have been great varieties in practice, but the shop and often the recreation room has been connected with the canteen. It is proposed to separate altogether the shops and recreation rooms from the canteens and attach the coffee bars to the former. (Hear.) The canteen will be almost exclusively used for the sale of beer at a moderate profit, the coffee bar and the shop being merely self-supporting."

March 15th.—The Licensing Laws (Scotland) Bill issued to-day.

March 16th.—In the House of Lords, on the motion of Earl Stanhope, the Payment of Wages in Public Houses Prohibition Bill was read a first time.

In the House of Commons the Marquis of Hartington again in reply to Mr. O'Donnell, stated that what Sir Ashley Eden said was, that while no doubt there might be increased drinking, it was not among the class who frequented the liquor shops in Calcutta, but among the middle classes who drank at their own homes. He also said that careful inquiry had convinced him that the alleged increase of intemperance was more imaginary than real, and that at any rate any such increase was not due to the multiplication of liquor shops, as the number of shops had been reduced in Calcutta. Nor did Sir Ashley Eden absolutely refuse the prayer of the petitions proceeding from the Mohammedan National Association of Merchants and Bankers of Calcutta, and the Anglican Bishops and Clergy of Calcutta. He said he could not fully comply with it during the term of the current licenses, but he promised to close the shops on Sunday until the renewal of the licenses. Although he (the noble Marquis), had no reason to think that there was no disposition on the part of the Government of India to adopt measures which would be a tendency to promote temperance among the population, he should call their attention to the necessity of exercising strict care on the subject.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

Just at your door,
See if you will how they shiver and shake;
Look but a moment for charity's sake,
I ask no more.

Waifs in the street,
Offspring of sorrow, of sin, and of shame;
Some without shelter, or parents, or name,
Or rest for their feet.

Tattered and torn,
Shoeless and hatless, and loveless and sad,
Likely as not going straight to the bad,
Weary and worn.

Only God knows
The burden of agony they have to bear;
You only tell how they lie, steal, and swear;
What of their woes?

Think of them, pray
Look at your own little innocent boy;
Your darling, I doubt not, your pride and your joy,
Your hope night and day.

The child of your prayers,
Picture him roaming a waif in the street,
To beg in despair from each one he meets,
To steal when he dares.

No mother or home.
Out in the rain, and the chill winter snows,
To suffer the torture of frost-bitten toes,
And perhaps die alone.

That's what they do—
Well, you cannot help it; such things must be.
You turn a deaf ear to their pitiful plea,
'Tis nothing to you.

One ear will hear.
These poor waifs and strays are as dear in God's sight
As the child you have reared in the glad gospel light.
He knows their care.

The glad by-and-by
Will give them the love denied to them here;
A recompense sweet for the sorrows they bear,
And a home in the sky.

THE FUNDS.

* * * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

APRIL, 1882.

* * * We intend to publish another of our valuable tables in our next issue—one showing the number of licences in the Parliamentary Burghs of Scotland, with population, number of electors, present proportion, and proportion contemplated by the bill of Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., &c., &c.

We present with this, the first number of the Seventeenth Volume of the Social Reformer, title page and index to Vol. XVI. In doing so we respectfully recommend the new volume to the continued and increased support of our readers, and ask their aid in extending its circulation.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION AND THE LICENSING LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL OF LORD COLIN CAMPBELL, M.P. —The Executive have, after careful deliberation, adopted the following resolutions:—"The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have carefully considered the provisions of the Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., and while regarding it as an honest and earnest attempt to deal with the evils of the licensing system in Scotland, and believing that certain of its provisions would undoubtedly abate some of these evils, yet feel called upon to express their deep regret that the bill not only fails adequately to recognise the right of the ratepayers in their several districts to prevent by a direct and full veto public-houses being forced upon them or continued in their midst against their will, but provides for compensation to landlord and tenant, for the sale of licenses, for the granting of a ten years' lease, and generally for the continuance, under certain given conditions, of a system that is essentially mischievous in its nature and operations." "Further, the Executive would very earnestly call upon all the friends of temperance and social reform throughout the country immediately to memorialize their Parliamentary representatives to take such steps as will secure to the ratepayers of Scotland a veto on all facilities for the sale of intoxicating liquors."

R. MACKAY, Secy.

During the past month there has been unceasing activity on the part of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. In addition to the ordinary efforts of the Association which knows no pause, meetings, mostly preceded by a conference have been held in Dunse, Denny, Brechin, Greenock, Montrose, Dumfries, Rutherglen, Ayr, Strathmiglo, Aberdeen, Stirling, Arbroath, and Tillicoultry. The conviction and determination on the part of the people which these meetings have revealed have been a source of unmingled satisfaction to the Executive. The only regret attaching to such meetings is that they are drawing to a close, and summer renders more of them impossible. Well, of those that are now memories it has to be said that they have far exceeded expectation in numbers and in enthusiasm. They have brought the Executive face to face with their constituents to the mutual satisfaction of both. And it seems undeniable that they have been productive of great gain to the movement, both throughout the country and in St. Stephen's.

The well-informed editor of the Irish Banner gives a list of abstaining Members of Parliament. According to him they include Sir W. Lawson, Sir Chas. Dilke, Messrs. S. Morley, T. Burt, W. Fowler, A. Pease, Joseph Cowen, W. S. Allen, Hugh Mason, John Bright, D. Davies, S. Howard, W. S. Cane, J. P. Corry, J. N. Richardson, C. H. Meldon, A. O'Connor, J. A. Blake, B. Whitworth, and T. P. O'Connor—twenty for England and Ireland. He puts down no Scotch abstainers, for the good reason that there is only one, Mr. P. M'Lagan, M.P. for Linlithgowshire. Our contemporary suggests the formation of a Parliamentary Temperance Society. Any one acquainted with the precincts of the House, and the habits of honourable members, will agree with him in saying that no more promising field of labour than this can present itself to energetic temperance reformers. Some day the nation will see a government of brewers, distillers, and moderate drinkers enacting a suppressive veto over the traffic, just as our fathers saw a government of landlords and protectionists throwing down the barriers that made bread so dear. It is the people's will that in the long run rules, not the personality of the legislature.

Anyone acquainted with the customs which prevail at our various shipping ports with regard to the employment of labourers, must feel a deep interest in the Bill of Lord Stanhope for the suppression of all payment of wages in public houses. In Liverpool, Hull, Greenock, Glasgow, Leith, and other large ports, the labourers are with few exceptions in a state of the most odious slavery to stevedores and publicans. These interested parties oppress their unfortunate victims in a way which to find a parallel to we must go back to Goshen and Israel under the Pharaohs. In a recent issue we drew attention to the fearful state to which the ballast heavers of London were reduced by their publican and stevedore tyrants. And we showed that by the late Prince Consort's efforts they were restored by law to freedom and sobriety. The object of his lordship being to do the same good office for all similarly circumstanced wherever they are or whatever they do, his Bill deserves the hearty co-operation of every well-wisher of his kind. Let our readers write their parliamentary representatives at once, asking their support and vote to this truly suppressive measure. The passage of this Bill into law would emancipate a very large body of our fellow-citizens, throughout the country, from the tyranny of a detestable custom and a detestable institution, and by giving them the control of the fruits of their own labours restore their manliness, and induce them to increase and foster the great wage fund of the country.

Our contemporary the Christian Leader deserves much credit for the prominence which it gives to the temperance movement in its columns. In a recent issue Mr. James Henderson, one of Her Majesty's Factory Inspectors, very justly drew attention to the great material prosperity of the ship-building trades on the Clyde, and to the unexampled high wages earned by those employed therein. It would seem from his report that the great pays of 1873, '74, and '75 are again reached. No one who is friendly to our working classes would grudge them big pays, nay, but would be glad rather to see them so prosperous, were they themselves to justify their good fortune by saving and reasonable expenditure. In the first case they would be laying the basis for a comfortable old age; in the second they would be using their high wages to ameliorate their condition, as far as that could be done, by surrounding themselves with means of comfort which would add immensely to their happiness. But we fear that their old vice, intemperance, conquers them, and that they give to the liquor traffic what should bring comforts to their home or help to swell their bank-books. It is years ago since a ship-builder informed us that he could easily get his fellow-ship-builders to join him cheerfully in buying up the 35 public-houses that cursed their employees, if by so doing they would cease to exist. His employees did not work steadily—very far from it. To-day Mr. Henderson points to the same sad folly on their part, and now ex-Provost Ferguson of Whiteinch confirms the painful facts. The allegation will not lie against all the workers—far from it—but it lies against a very large number who, though earning large sums, earn them apparently only to squander them with the publican. The Glasgow Trades Council resent Mr. Henderson's good offices in drawing attention to this flagrant mis-expenditure on the part of their class. If he speaks inaccurately, let them show that he does so, but to speak resentfully of the statement made by him in view of the last sentence of his article, we do not hesitate to say, is unmanly. We do not believe that the Trades Council could successfully defend the ship-building employees from the charge laid against them, and, instead of abusing the plaintiff's attorney, and thus showing they have no case, let them act upon the advice so kindly tendered by their true friends, and mission Govan, Partick, Whiteinch, and the lower reaches of the Clyde, and thus show to an admiring world that the Clyde ship-building class are not merely industrially great and skilful, but that through their great wisdom as regards their big pays, they promise to be one of the wealthiest sections of our industrial army.

The press representative of the Scottish publicans crows loudly over the service it would have us believe it has rendered to humanity in Glasgow. It has actually, it says, had its suggestion to take a census of the shebeens of Saint Mungo adopted by Chief Constable M'Call. All the night policemen are to be returning officers for their own beats. This great work has been begun and is being carried on because the Guardian has been up and doing. Merely pausing to remind our readers that in this matter the Mail was up before the Guardian, we are decidedly of opinion that some members of the trade will not thank their Guardian for his trouble. If the shebeen trade be duly exposed, and, as a result, hunted down, many of the publicans will have to face a serious curtailment of their income. One would really think, from the virtuous indignation of the Guardian, that the shebeener was his own brewer and distiller, as well as his own dealer. The fact is different. The shebeener is merely the night shift, and the publican the day shift of the traffic. The shebeener, if forced to tell the source of his supply, would let in a little light upon the publican's dealings, which would hardly square with his great professions of respectability. Where the licensed supply is cut off, the unlicensed traffic also disappears. Men once freed from the allurements of the open sale of liquor do not en masse rush madly to the shebeener. It is when they have been fired up until they are maddened, and then thrust out of the licensed shop, that they plunge recklessly into the fangs of the shebeener to drown their craving in another and yet another bumper of the brain-destroyer. We hasten to congratulate the Guardian on its work, and suggest that it should throw its "bull's eye" on the other disreputable operations of the liquor traffic. Only, don't let it assume that the publican is better than the shebeener. They are both ministrants to vice, only the one is State-protected and the other is not; and it will be a great day for our beloved land when the licensed trafficker is reduced by the suppressive veto to the level of his disreputable brother. Then honest courses or the jail will be the option of both.

At length the Conservatives of Haddingtonshire have got heartily tired of Lord Elcho, M.P. The noble lord cannot, we think, blame us if we say we are pleased that he is so unceremoniously set aside by his constituents. It is true that he has expressed a desire to depart from the position of their representative, and it is none the less true that he has managed to get his son called to the vacant chair. While infected by chagrin through his resignation, he will not be consoled by the recollection that he never did or said a word for the relief of those endangered or enslaved by the liquor traffic. Indeed he championed that traffic, and the records of the Scottish prohibitory movement shows him always the friend of the publicans, and not unseldom their advocate. In 1869, 1870, 1873, 1874, 1876, and 1878, he was silent, because when the divisions of most of these years was called he was abroad on urgent private affairs, but in 1864, 1871, 1875, 1879, 1880, and 1881 he voted against the Permissive Bill, and its equivalent, the Local Option resolution, while in 1880 he led a publican deputation into the presence of the Home Secretary, and that same year he assumed the mantle of Mr. Wheelhouse and vied against the veto. Such is the relation of the noble lord to the greatest social question of the day. From the earliest introduction of the veto to its latest he has been the avowed friend of the most tyrannical system that ever enslaved his country, and in other times we would have found him fraternising with those who were leagued to crush her liberties. In parting, we trust for ever, with his lordship as a commoner, we remember that at no distant time if spared he may be found in "another place." We trust that that "place" may be so overawed by the attitude of a justly indignant people, as to make him feel that in opposing the means of abolishing the licensing system he would be merely assisting to strike the knell of its own unmourned doom. We hope that we will on an early date be able to gladden our readers by announcing that the elected successor of Lord Elcho is an admirer and supporter of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and that the electors of Haddingtonshire have come to the resolution that the candidates who successfully woo their suffrages must be pledged to vote for the veto of the liquor traffic by the ratepayers.

In another column our readers will find a very full analysis of the Licensing Bill of Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., with comments thereon with which we entirely agree. We believe that his lordship, with those with whom he took counsel, had the object in view of carrying a measure which would greatly limit the sale of liquors, and secure to the ratepayers the power of voting against all licenses that affected them; would propitiate the publicans, ousted by the operation of the Bill, by affording compensation, and although in the first instance charging the rates with the expenses involved, would ultimately lessen the police rates by the profits derived from the sale of liquor certificates. The licensing system of Scotland will never have the sympathy of the Scottish people, under whatever administration it may be placed, because it maintains a traffic which the people have been trained by a special education and a painful experience to look upon as an unjustifiable social tyranny, against which they have no present means of redress. It is a despotism sustained by the law of the land, and they know well that the Government shrink from placing that traffic within the power of the ratepayers' ballot, because it would be certain to be voted down. Had his lordship followed the lines on which Sir Wilfrid Lawson moves, and set himself to interpret the wishes of the Scottish people as he interpreted the spirit of the great prohibitory meeting in the City Hall last September, over which he was called to preside, he would have left the regulation and restriction of that system alone, and placing himself at the head of the temperance and social reformers of Scotland, might have led them in a victorious demand from the Government for a suppressive veto over the licensing system of Scotland. That he has not done so is a matter of disappointment and deep regret, not to us only, but to many who with us are ardently desirous of having legal powers on the statute book for the people to apply to ridding themselves of the baneful traffic in operation in the community where they live. We give him credit for an honest and earnest intention to grapple with the evils of the licensing system. We believe, however, he has found out, with ourselves, that no legislation will be satisfactory to the people of Scotland that does not embody the suppression of all facilities for the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors by the ratepayers. Already the ominous sounds of opposition are heard, both from the temperance party and the publicans, and we have reason to believe that to their assaults the Bill must succumb.

Mr. William Hoyle sends to the Times an estimate gathered from the Excise returns of the expenditure upon intoxicating liquors during the year 1881, which we summarise. The quantity of beer consumed in 1881 was 970,788,564 gallons, the value of which, at 1s. 6d. a gallon, is £72,809,142, against £67,881,673 in 1880. The consumption of British wines and spirits was 28,730,719 gallons, which at 20s. a gallon, amounts to £28,730,719, against £28,457,486. In foreign spirits the figures are 8,295,265 gallons at 24s., amounting to £9,954,318, against £10,173,014 in 1880. For wine the figures are 15,644,757 gallons, at 18s., amounting to £14,080,281, against £14,267,102 in 1880; while the consumption of British wines is estimated at 15,000,000 gallons, amounting, at 2s. per gallon, to £1,500,000, the same sum as in 1880. The total for 1881 is £127,074,460, against £122,279,275, an increase of £4,795,185. The consumption of beer shows an increase of 7.3 per cent., and British spirits 0.96 per cent., while foreign spirits show a decrease of 2.1 per cent., and wine 1.3 per cent. Taking the percentage of the total, it gives an aggregate increase of 3.9 per cent. With regard to the consumption of beer, however, Mr. Hoyle finds, by the avowal of the brewing interest itself, that the old computation of its liabilities to the Excise for the malt it used was delusive. Malt was taxed as if a quantity produced fifty-five barrels which in truth produced sixty, and accordingly the real increase in the drink bill is only 0.8 instead of 3.9 per cent.

Mr. Hoyle shows that we have been spending on an average £143,600,000 a year—a daily expenditure of £393,424 sterling. While we contemplate the enormous magnitude of these figures, the debates by the working classes on the civil list, the consolidated fund and their own wage fund, and the Parliamentary discussions on voting the national supplies dwarf into mere insignificance. Britain is, through her liquor traffic, bleeding to death. Her industries are being starved, her homes are being drained to an extent that defies calculation and mocks estimate. Oh, that the nation were wise enough to adopt the wise suggestion of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and stop the leak and staunch the flow.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE LICENSING LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

THIS boldly conceived and courageous measure, the eighty-sixth bill of the present session, has been introduced, as we have already informed our readers, by Lord Colin Campbell, M.P. for Argyllshire. It is backed by the available members of Parliament for Glasgow, Dr. Cameron and Mr. Anderson; by the member for Renfrewshire, Mr. Crum; the member for Stirlingshire, Mr. Bolton; the member for the Inverness district of burghs, Mr. M'Intosh; the member for South Lanarkshire, Major Hamilton; the member for Greenock, Mr. Stewart; and the member for the St. Andrews district of burghs, Mr. Williamson. Leave was obtained on the 27th February for its introduction and the draft underwent many alterations during its passage through the press. It extends to thirty-nine pages, three of which contain table of contents, twenty-six the fifty-eight clauses of the Bill, and ten the thirteen schedules forming the appendices to the bill. Its main divisions are six in number:—1st, Preliminary; 2nd, the Polling; 3rd, the Granting and Regulating of Licenses; 4th, Compensation to License-holders; 5th, Financial arrangements; and 6th, the Licensing Commission.

The preamble of the bill is as follows:—"Whereas it is expedient that the laws at present in force, whereby the right of granting certificates of license for the sale of excisable liquors, vested in the magistrates of burghs, and in the justices of the peace for counties, should be placed more directly under the control of the ratepayers in such burghs and counties; and that certain alterations and amendments should be made on the laws applicable to licenses for the sale of such liquors, for the more effectual suppression of intoxication, and for other purposes relating thereto. Be it therefore enacted, &c."

The reason for the bill is threefold. Firstly, to give the ratepayers more control over the right of granting licenses; Secondly, that the present laws should be altered and amended to more effectually suppress intoxication; and Thirdly, and for other purposes. As ratepayers the people have no contention with his lordship on the matter of granting licenses, their contention is that they ought to be vested with the right of refusing all applications for the privilege of supplying liquors to them, should necessity for such refusal arise. The granting of licenses "for their good" has in their experience been so manifestly to their injury or their annoyance that the time has come when it ought to be in their power to say whether and when the publican should stay or go. We should have been glad to have a better preamble. The suppression of intoxication depends upon the suppression of the facilities to it. His lordship offers to suppress the effect, we should have preferred that he had seen his way to aim at the suppression of the cause—the traffic in the means of intoxication. We can no more believe that the suppression of intoxication can result from the regulation or improvement of the supply of the intoxicating substance alcohol, than that the opium eater's vice should cease because twenty shops instead of forty places remain to minister to his craving. The suppression of the facilities is the true way to the suppression of the drinker's indulgence.

The first clause declares that the Act may be cited as the "Licensing (Scotland) Act 1882," and may be construed with the unrepealed portions of the Acts at present in force, and these Acts may be cited together as the "Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1828-1882." The second clause confines the Act to Scotland, and the third provides for its operation to begin at the date of its passage into law, and for its application to all licenses on the first day of November after it becomes law.

The fourth clause repeals the Home Drummond Act 1828, sections 2, 5, 7, 14, 20, 30, 32, 35, and 36. These concern burgh licensing courts and quarter sessions, licensing districts, granting yearly certificates, lodging of applications, keeping lists of yearly applications, the exclusion of brewers, distillers, and publicans from the administration of the law, abolishes right of appeal on renewals and transfers and also old transfer schedules, the penalties presently in force, and the saving clause about repeal. It also repeals of the Forbes M'Kenzie Act, 1853, sections 1, 2, 4, 7, 11 and 12. These concern the separation of spirits and groceries, grocer's power of retail, separate licenses for wine and spirits and for beer, the inspection of premises clause, the debarring of tacksmen, blacksmiths, &c., from being licensed, the clauses making certificates necessary, about certificate forms and fraudulent certificates. It also repeals of the Public houses Acts, sections 1, 5, 7, 10, 22 and 33. These deal with the time and the form of certificates, the distinction between beer licenses and spirit licenses, abolishing all certificates but those under the Act, making beer sellers responsible, form of application, form of applicant's character, mala-fide travellers, &c. By it the whole of the Cameron Act of 1876 is repealed. A glance at this clause and its schedule will show how great the changes are in the licensing system of Scotland which his lordship contemplates.

In the Fifth or Interpretation Clause it is set down that "Burgh" means Parliamentary burghs, so that the bill will deal with the traffic of the 79 Parliamentary burghs, in whole or by the wards in these burghs; all other areas will be called "licensing districts," and shall be the same as a School Board district. Ratepayers shall mean every ratepayer, male or female, qualified to vote for members of a School Board. This is a most important clause, and one which we gladly welcome. We so fully believe that women will, on the whole, decide against the liquor traffic, that we will await the first exercise of their power to vote on the question with perfect confidence. Throughout the agitation, the objection of our opponents to the ratepayers having the power to determine this question has been met by our declaration that we prefer to leave it to the widest franchise to decide, and our declaration will, we firmly believe, be justified by the event.

The Sixth Clause provided for the preparation for a poll on the basis of the census returns.

The Seventh Clause is as follows:—"The maximum number of certificates for license to be fixed by the licensing authority as corresponding to the population shall not in any burgh, ward, or district be more than in the proportion of one license to every five hundred complete of the inhabitants of such burgh, ward, or district, as shown by the last census returns: Provided that in fixing the same number the licensing authority may if it thinks fit make any addition to the number, based on census returns, which in view of the requirements of any ward or district in respect of licenses for hotels or inns shall appear to the licensing authority to be required, and provided that such addition be duly notified to the ratepayers at the time and in the manner required by sections fourteen and fifteen of this Act; and should the inhabitants of any burgh, ward, or district exceed one hundred persons, and not amount to five hundred, the licensing authority may if they see fit fix upon one certificate for license for such burgh, ward, or district, to be voted upon as after mentioned, declaring that none of the existing licenses, which may be continued for a limited period, as provided by section forty hereof, or licenses granted to dealers in ship stores as after mentioned, shall be included in the calculation as to the maximum number of licenses to be fixed upon as aforesaid as applicable to any burgh, ward, or district."

This is a most singular provision. Here we have a clause determining the maximum of licenses as one in five hundred. Now this is a most material reduction, as we may see by a glance at the position of the eight principal towns of Scotland—Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Greenock, Leith, Paisley, and Perth. These towns have an aggregate population of 1,197,567, inclusive of 142,458 electors. They have amongst them 165 hotels, 2726 public houses, and 1512 groceries, or a grand total of liquor shops of 4393. This is one public house to every 273 of the population. The bill under consideration would reduce the liquor shops from 4393 to 2395, a reduction of 1998, or within 2 of 2000 sources of public temptation and corruption. This would be a most material reduction if those left were not allowed to extend their capacity of accommodation or of service, but we find no provision against that; and yet it deserves consideration, for if the publican extend his premises to meet the demands certain to be made upon him, it will not much matter making a maximum at all; if his premises cannot be extended, then more sobriety may ensue. The Act will make it more difficult to procure liquor, but not at all impossible. The danger will continue. Within the limits to which it has been compressed it will continue to injure and burden all in its neighbourhood, and the owners and occupiers around it will have no more means of effective relief from its ravages than before. Then the licensing authority can increase the traffic if it see fit. This discretionary power, will, we fear, be liable to great abuse for such places as the watering places on the Clyde. Oban, Portobello, Bridge of Allan, when crowded with summer visitors, may have additional facilities to conviviality, and be all the more dangerous to pleasure seekers. Then all ship stores, and all publicans who accept the option of working out their lease are exempted from the maximum. So that after all the clause may merely keep the promise to the letter and break it as regards the reality. A very serious blot on this clause is the discretionary power which it confers to thrust public houses on those places which now are free from them. Any place having one hundred residents or twenty families may be menaced by this Act with a liquor shop. We have a very serious apprehension that many of those parishes which at present have no public houses, may have them thrust upon them and continued in them for ten years at least. To many of these places there could be no greater calamity, for they are places of refuge to numbers who, in the presence of public houses, are sure to become the victims of intemperate habits. The bill, in this light, instead of being a blessing to Scotland, would be its bane, and such reactionary legislation should meet with firm and uncompromising opposition.

The eighth clause provides for the election of a burgh licensing authority every ten years, on the same day on which the municipal elections occur. The number will be equal to the number of the Town Council in the burgh; the tenure of office one year; then the administration of the Act will, for the next nine years, be the duty of the Town Council.

The ninth clause has respect to the appointment and proceedings of the county licensing authority. But this is merely a temporary arrangement: for whenever a county government is set up, it will act as the licensing authority, and the authority created by this Act is to cease. This appears to foreshadow the establishment of a county board with licensing powers. Such a proposal must be resolutely opposed, because it would be a retrogressive step. Under all such authority the administration of the licensing laws has been an admitted failure, and it is time that the people themselves should be able to decide whether there should be any licensing system whatever to administer.

The tenth clause confers on licensing authorities absolute power to determine areas, rearrange them, &c. The eleventh clause is just an adaptation of the thirteenth clause of the Home Drummond Act to suit this Act. By the eleventh clause no brewer, distiller, maltster, or dealer or retailer, should act on the licensing authority, or if in the Town Council take part in carrying out this act, nor take an appointment under it, nor sign the requisition or notice of objection, nor grant any certificate under a penalty of fifty pounds for each offence. The penalty may be recovered before the sheriff within six months, and when recovered to go to the license fund.

The twelfth clause determines the quorum as one-third of the whole number: and vests the chairman with a deliberative and a casting vote. The thirteenth clause defines the business at the first meeting of the burgh and county licensing authority: 1st, to decide on the maximum number of licenses in either burgh or wards, if any, and in licensing districts; 2nd, to appoint a chairman; 3rd, a returning officer who may be the chairman; 4th, fix the time of polling; and 5th, draw out regulations for polling. In the fourteenth clause the duties of the burgh returning officer are defined, 1st, to issue the usual polling intimations and advertisements within a month of his appointment. To see that these shall specify the maximum number of licenses, the polling place or places, and the polling day on which ratepayers may vote for the number of licenses, if any, they may prefer. The notice of the polling must be issued at least eight days previously. Clause fifteenth appoints similar duties as are named in the fourteenth clause to the county returning officer, who must also give eight days' notice. The sixteenth clause declares that the Valuation Roll should be conclusive evidence of the qualification of the voter, and copies should be furnished at the undernoted prices:—1000 names 1s., up to 2999 2s. 6d., up to 5999 5s., up to 8999 7s. 6d., and 9000 10s. No prices quoted for a larger number of names, but if on the same scale the roll would not be procurable in Glasgow, its cost being £5 16s.—a very costly roll indeed.

Clause seventeenth we give entire. "The voting should take place in every burgh, ward, and district at the times and places fixed by the returning officer, and should be in accordance with the provisions of the Ballot Act which may then be in force for the election of a member of Parliament, the provisions of which Act except so far as is inconsistent with this Act shall be held as incorporated herewith, [and the reader is referred to schedule C for the form of the ballot paper.] Every ratepayer shall be entitled to mark the number of licenses, not exceeding the maximum allowed by this Act, he or she considers to be required in the burgh, ward, or district respectively within which the ratepayer is entitled to vote, or if the ratepayer considers that none are required in such burgh, ward, or district, the voting paper shall be marked accordingly by the said ratepayer." The first portion of this clause is really good. The Permissive Bill of Sir Wilfrid Lawson provided for the sense of the ratepayers on the existence of the liquor traffic being taken by schedules, but voting by ballot is certainly to be preferred. We highly approve of the provision which gives power to the voter to decline to vote for any licenses, and we share the deep and widespread regret that his lordship did not see his way to fully arm ratepayers with an effective veto over the liquor traffic of their district. With the voting for any number of licenses we have no sympathy, because such a mode of voting can scarcely ever be worked by the voter for the advantage of prohibition.

Take the city of Edinburgh with its 29,000 electors and its 850 liquor shops. Its maximum by the Act would be 456. Now, we shall suppose that the ratepayers vote on these 456 licenses in the proportion of 1, 2, and 5. Then 3,625 would vote for the maximum number or 1,653,000 licenses; 7,250 for 100 licenses or 725,000; together for 2,378,000 licenses; but 18,125 vote against having any. Yet on striking the average, three-fifths of the voters would fix eighty-two public houses on Edinburgh for the next ten years, an instance of the grossest possible tyranny. It is probable that the publicans, publican landlords, and tradesmen dependent on the traffic, and hard drinkers, not to say drun-kards, would always vote for the maximum number. If only they form an eighth part of the electorate it can be easily seen how much their vote will contribute to the maintenance of public houses; then the moderate drinkers—say polling two-fifths of the votes—would consider one-eighth of the former number of public houses enough, or say one-fifth of the maximum number, and would in conjunction with those interested in the traffic permanently maintain it in any place, even if five-eighths of the voters voted solidly for prohibition! We are heartily averse to such anti-suppressive liquor legislation as this. In no other department of social life have we met with a proposal that more effectually leaves the majority in the power of the minority, and in power of the minority in this bill means to be the thrall of the publican, his landlord, the moderate drinker, and perhaps drunkards.

The eighteenth clause gives effect to this undesirable mode of voting, by declaring that the average number arrived at by this process should be the number in the place striking it, for the next ten years.

The next three clauses we also print entire.

“On the expiry of not less than eight days after the declaration of the result of the poll, the licensing authority shall meet and shall divide the number of licenses declared as applicable to the burgh, ward, or district respectively, into three classes, viz., inns or hotels, public-houses, and grocers' licenses, and, taking into consideration the circumstances of the burgh, ward, or district, shall allocate so many of all or any of such kind of licenses according to the total number of licenses voted for to a particular locality in each burgh, ward, or district, that is to say, if the burgh is divided into wards, so many to each ward, or if not so divided into wards, so many to each part of the burgh to be described according to the best known description, and if in a district as defined by this act, so many to each parish composing the district, but in any case it shall not be necessary to give one or more of each kind of license to every ward, part, or parish.

“If on the summation of the votes in any burgh or district, or any ward of such burgh if the same is divided into wards, as provided by section eighteen, it is found that the total number of licenses voted is less than the number of ratepayers who have voted, the result shall be deemed to be a vote in favour of the total suppression of licenses in such burgh, ward, or district, and the returning officer shall declare the result of the poll accordingly, and advertise the same in the foresaid newspapers: Provided always, that if, within seven days from the date of the publication of the result of the poll, a notice of objection in the form of Schedule D annexed hereto, signed by not fewer than fifty of the ratepayers entered on the register on which the voting for such burgh, ward, or district has taken place, is lodged with the clerk of the licensing authority, the licensing authority shall meet as provided in section nineteen hereof, and adjourn their meeting for the space of fourteen days, and give public intimation in the foresaid newspapers of the time and place of such adjourned meeting. And every ratepayer in such burgh, ward, or district, dissatisfied with the decision of the majority of the ratepayers as before declared, may sign a notice and requisition in the form of Schedule E to this act annexed, which form of notice shall in burghs lie for signature in the office of the clerk of the licensing authority, or such other place as the licensing authority may appoint, and in districts in such places as the licensing authority may appoint, and the same shall be lodged with the clerk of the licensing authority not later than on the day preceding said adjourned meeting. Every ratepayer signing the said notice of objection and notice and requisition respectively shall do so with his own hand, and if from any cause he is unable to write, the same shall be signed by any justice of the peace, notary public, or minister of the gospel whom he may authorise for that purpose, and any person adhibiting the name of any ratepayer to the said notice of objection or notice and requisition respectively, except as before provided, shall be guilty of an offence under this Act, and shall be liable, on summary conviction before the sheriff of the county, to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding three calendar months.

“At the adjourned meeting of the licensing authority provided for by the preceding section, the notice and requisition shall be laid before the meeting, along with copy of the register on which the voting in regard to licenses took place, and the names on the said notice and requisition shall be there and then checked with the register, and the licensing authority, if in burghs, shall thereupon authorise the granting of a license in the proportion of one to every three hundred complete of the ratepayers of the burgh, or if divided into wards, of the ward who have signed the notice and requisition; but should the total number who have signed such notice and requisition not amount to three hundred, then the licensing authority shall have no power to authorise the granting of a license, unless it has been signed by not less than one hundred ratepayers of such burgh, or, if divided into wards, of the ward in which it is to take effect. And, in regard to districts which comprise several parishes, the licensing authority, on receiving such notice and requisition, shall grant one license in the proportion of one to every two hundred ratepayers complete resident in each parish forming the district who have signed such notice and requisition, and in no case shall they authorise the granting of a license in any parish unless the notice and requisition is signed by not less than one hundred ratepayers resident therein, and in fixing the kind of license to be granted in terms of such notice and requisition in burghs, wards, or parishes, the licensing authority shall give effect to the desire of the majority of ratepayers of such burgh, ward, or parish signing the same as expressed therein.”

In the first of the foregoing clauses power is given to the licensing authority to allocate the liquor shops which clause seventeenth thrusts upon the community. This authority, like the licensing bench it supersedes, plants the liquor temptations where it pleases, even where the people do not choose. May we hope that some may be placed in Burntsfield Links, Moray Place, Northumberland Place, Randolph Cliff in Edinburgh, as well as in Potterrow, Canongate and Cowgate? or in Blythswood Terrace, Park Circus or Lansdowne Crescent, Glasgow, as well as in the Saltmarket, the High Street or Garscube Road? If this impartial course were taken we believe that the ranks of the prohibitionists would be largely and influentially reinforced by those who themselves at present, freed from the public house contaminations, sneer at or stand aloof from the well meant efforts of the temperance party, who are striving to expel the oppressor and let the oppressed go free.

The twentieth clause deals with the majority voting suppression. This is the most glaringly objectionable clause in the whole bill. It keeps the promise to the ear, but as certainly breaks it to the hope. We know hardly any of the burghs in Scotland where prohibition by striking the average would take place and where there would be a lesser number of licenses voted than there would be voters. No doubt we may be told that by the growth of temperance sentiment this objection would daily be losing its force, but we want practical relief now and we say that to place insurmountable difficulties in the path of the people aspiring to be better is an injustice. Still, even if this could be done as regards the voting, we find ourselves face to face with a proviso one could not be blamed if one asserted that it was expressly framed in the interests of intemperance. No sooner has prohibition, as the result of the voting, been declared in a place than 50 ratepayers can within seven days thereafter give notice that they wish the traffic reinstated. It will hardly be contended, we think, that as many fellows of the baser sort may easily be found in almost all our Scottish burghs to arrest the action of the majority. And for every complete 300 signing a licensed shop is to be provided, and even should these people fail to get three hundred, if only a hundred of them be found, a temptation is established directly against the wishes of the majority, for ten years. We wonder where this aggression will be tolerated. We, at least, believe that it would be very difficult in many places to maintain such a source of danger in the teeth of the decided vote of the majority. Some years ago, Mr. George Anderson, the present senior member of Parliament for Glasgow, introduced a bill giving power to the Sheriffs to determine the number of licenses for the counties and burghs of Scotland. This reactionary legislation was opposed by none more strongly than the sheriffs themselves; but his lordship would by this bill vest the power of forcing and maintaining licenses on a community in the hands of a hundred ratepayers we will say from the Saltmarket of Glasgow, the Cowgate of Edinburgh, the Scouringburn of Dundee, and the Vennel of Greenock. The injustice of such a provision is so conspicuous that we believe no committee of the House of Commons would be found to accept it.

With regard to the twenty-first clause it is fair to say that it places a barrier in the way of the respectable drinkers who might otherwise ballot secretly for a very limited public supply of liquor. They must, by that clause, go to the licensing authority's office and sign a requisition to that end. We believe that not many of our reputable citizens will be found leaving their signatures on such a sheet or in such a place. Your minister, that never had a good word to say in favour of sobriety, your medical man that prescribes liquors freely to young wives and fevered patients, your elder, your man of reputation, all will carefully abstain from countenancing this public and indefensible course of action, and it will be left to be done by those who care no more for public opinion than for their own self-respect. To put an instrument in the hands of such to the injury and annoyance of their neighbour, might be simply arming the worst classes in society with unlimited power to injure.

Clauses twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four provide for the landlords' applications for a license to their property, for the selection of premises, and for applications for certificates. Were landlords to find by this bill that they can no longer shelter themselves behind their factor's name, and that they have to subject their applications to the discretion of the licensing authority, they would pause and reflect whether they might not, by keeping their premises free from a liquor shop, have a better property and better tenants, and after all greater returns. But their factor represents them as before. In the selection of premises we find none are to be chosen which do not enter directly from a thoroughfare, or which communicate with a dwelling house, or are occupied by a tacksman, blacksmith, or as a post office, unless these last are six miles from any public house. This exclusion is an old one, but it is none the less inconsistent. By it servants are debarred from loitering as they might do at such places, if licensed, on the pretence that they were paying toll, or getting their horse shod, or posting a letter, or waiting till the letters were sorted. But their horses and their masters' time is equally wasted by their standing at public house doors anywhere, so that the reason given for the exclusion of the three places in the bill is cogent enough to include every liquor shop in the country. The next clause determines the nature of the liquor seller's application, the day and hour of the auction, the notices to license holders, and the lodgement of applications. The applicant must get a magistrate or justice of the peace to sign a certificate of character and of qualification. It used to be ministers whose testimonials weighed down the scale in the applicant's favour, and they made many an error. Will justices and magistrates succeed better? They will not take kindly to the duty imposed on them by the Act when they read the form of the certificate they have to give. It is as follows:—"I, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for _____, or one of the Magistrates of the Burgh of _____, certify, after careful inquiry, that _____, designed in the foregoing application, is [here state result of inquiry touching applicant's character and qualification].

J. P., or Magistrate."

It is to be earnestly hoped that they may show more sense than the clergyman who testified that "A. B. was a member of his church and teacher in his Sabbath School, and therefore, in his opinion, admirably qualified to sell intoxicating liquors." The questions to which answers must be truly given by the applicants are as follows:—Whether is it a renewal of transferred certificate or a new certificate which is wanted? Is the applicant twenty-one? Is he bred to the trade, or, if not, what other trade or business? Does he carry on, or intend to carry on any other trade or business? Does he hold a license, and if so, where? Has he an interest in any other licensed business, if so, where is it? If for a renewal, state the actual rent and the name and designation of the factor or proprietor.

The twenty-fifth clause provides that the licensing authority should meet in burghs on the second Tuesday of April, and the third Tuesday of October, and in counties on the third Tuesday of April and last Tuesday of October, each year.

The twenty-sixth clause provides for the auction of certificates, and the highest bidder should have them on paying the price and becoming bound to fulfil the conditions imposed. If not sold, certificate will remain vacant till next general meeting, or will be sold by private bargain. Nothing is said as to the upset price, but only one certificate is to be given to one bidder, rather a serious matter to those who, as in Glasgow and elsewhere, hold so many. But these will have, it is assumed, more time to look after their business, and perhaps to keep clear of violating the law. If any of the offerers are guilty of collusion, certificates so gained are forfeited, and a fifty pound fine or three months' hard labour is the penalty imposed. Penalty if recovered to go to the sinking fund and to the informer.

The twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirtieth clauses have regard to the issue, the forfeiture, the conditions, and the production of certificates. The license-holder must be prepared to pay ready money. Certificates not taken up or forfeited are, in the discretion of the authority, to be either dropped or advertised for sale. The certificates are to be in force for ten years, and the conditions on which they are granted may be altered on a week's notice as the authority may see fit. The hours of opening and closing are slightly better than in the Forbes M'Kenzie and Public Houses Acts; for while these have declared that publicans cannot open earlier than six nor later than eight o'clock in the morning, nor close earlier than nine nor later than eleven o'clock at night, it is in the power of the authority to close at eight at night. Any alterations are to be endorsed on the certificate. Certificate-holders require to take out their license yearly as usual, so that it is their certificate of good character which they buy, and in the event of misconduct it is the certificate which is endorsed. A very serious matter arises here. We find by the bill that compensation is to be awarded immediately the Act comes into operation. But if you propose to compensate a man to whom you only give a yearly privilege, on what grounds can you withhold it from him whose certificate is bought and paid for and is property of the buyer. And if you do not in such circumstances give him compensation, on what grounds can you tax the ratepayers to compensate the present holders because you withdraw a privilege from them? This question cannot be answered so as to justify the compensation of the bill.

Clause thirty-one provides for the permanent operation of the Act, the same procedure having every ten years to be repeated; and clause thirty-two deals with ship's stores, which must have a grocer's license and be under the licensing authority.

The thirty-third clause refers to transfer of certificates, which are to be dealt with as in former statutes; part of the clause is directed against any trafficking in these transfers.

The thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-sixth clauses have regard to offences which will be as severely punished as hitherto. The thirty-seventh clause is peculiar, containing within itself the preamble and provisions of a steamboat licensing bill. This is one of the few provisions in the bill which all who travel by ordinary passenger steamer can heartily approve.

The next ten clauses relate to the compensation to publicans proposed by the bill. The leading idea in the bill is that those publicans shall be compensated which this bill deprives of license. That to compensate them licenses shall be let by auction to the highest bidder; that from this auction, and, if necessary, a local rate, the compensation shall be paid, and if a loan is necessary it shall be repaid within fifty years, and that thereafter all sums from licenses shall go to the police fund. It is never intended by the Act to buy up the traffic—never; when the present license-holders are compensated the traffic continues with the buyers, and the proceeds of the sale of certificates will in the distant future lighten the rates! Such a way out of the difficulty will not answer, because the trade may develop under the new system as it has under the old, and our children's children may be as greatly injured and burdened by the traffic as their great-grandfathers are. It matters little then to us what is the amount of compensation when it does not settle the difficulty. We dispute the right of any privilege-holder to receive money because his privilege is to cease. We should be not more surprised if one of our friends who had placed his country house at the disposal of his friend for a year had to meet a clause for compensation because he intimated that he was to occupy his own house himself. One would, we think, be satisfied for profiting so much through the permission to stay in the house for a year. The excise grants licenses for one year, the licensing authorities existing at present grant certificates for one year, and should the latter refuse to certify we can hardly believe that a claim could be sustained in any court for damages. It is opposed to wise statesmanlike policy for this bill to create the right to compensation. Its glory would have been to give the ratepayers power to render the capital of brewers, distillers, and dealers inoperative for mischief, rather than frame a measure by which they are to continue among the permanent institutions of the country, diminishing her glory and adding to her shame. Not only the license-holder is to be compensated but even his landlord is to be so. This is one of the most singular proposals we have met. The landlord has derived an increased rent for putting his property to the base use of a liquor shop, and yet when it is proposed to allocate public-houses and no longer license his premises, he is to be compensated, and at the same time he may continue to let his premises. It is unjust to allow one man the privilege to realise enormous rents by debasing his premises and deteriorating adjoining property, and while his neighbours suffer through his course, yet propose to compensate him and not them; just as it is unfair to compensate all who profit by the traffic without taking the claims of all who have suffered through its essentially mischievous operations into consideration. An objection is made by the publicans to the amount of the compensation, but when it is considered that sums over three hundred pounds may be awarded, and that there are nearly eight thousand publicans in Scotland to compensate, it will be seen that the interests of the taxpayers, as well as that of the publicans, are worthy of consideration. We will suppose that there are eight thousand license-holders in Scotland put out of employment through the operation of this Act, and as many landlords. Then let us say these on an average substantiate a claim for £200 each, why that represents £3,200,000. Yet the publicans demur to compensation. Never a word is said by them about compensation to their servants—barmaids, waiters, bottlers, and the like. These may go and get work where they can. Well, we say the same to their master and his landlord. They have been well warned of their fate. When it overtakes them, and they are liberated to follow better courses, it will be at their own peril if they are not fully prepared for the change. Clause thirty-eight provides that all license certificates shall lapse at Whitsunday, 1883, and declares that all license holders and owners of licensed premises shall be entitled to compensation. Clause thirty-nine sets forth the conditions under which the claims are lodged: (a) They must be lodged on or before 1st January, 1883, stating the amount of claim; (b) details of fittings, utensils, &c., used in their business, and unfit for other business; (c) stating the manner in which they wish their claims adjudicated. Clause forty determines the manner in which the claims are to be settled. Licenses under yearly tenancy, or in the last year of a lease, shall have one year's profits, as shown by the average of three years' income tax returns. License-holders having more than one year's lease, and not exceeding three years, are to receive one and one-half year's nett profits, or in lieu of this may continue to hold their certificate to sell until their lease expires. At the end of that time such will have no claim to compensation. License holders having more than a three years' lease to run, may receive one year and one-half year's nett profits, or run their premises for not more than three years, or they may quit on getting proportion of goodwill paid by them for their place. All leases granted after February last shall be considered yearly tenancies, unless it is proved at law that the negotiations were concluded before 1st February, 1882. Those publicans who have not been in business for three years will be compensated at the discretion of the Court. In the case of grocers and hotel keepers only on one-half of their average income will their claim to compensation be based; and they will require to prove, should their income tax paper show returns from other sources, the sum actually received from their liquor selling business. Should the license holder be a bankrupt or die, his legal representatives shall take his place. License holders contravening their certificates shall suffer a deduction from their claims, and none will be awarded to holders of forfeited certificates. Should there be no bidders for a certificate, and it fall to the man that previously held it, his claim to compensation shall be extinguished. If a man compensated already shall, after six months, get a license in the same district, he will set off his compensation against the purchase price, and either pay or receive from the license fund. This last case strengthens the proof that the compensation in this bill is not intended to buy up the publicans, for here is a provision giving an already compensated publican liberty to get a license in the very same district in which he once ministered to the acquired appetites of his customers. The income tax commissioners have to hand the income tax returns of claimants for compensation to the licensing authority. Not only is the license holder to be by this bill entitled to compensation for license, but also for fittings. The fittings shall be valued by two valuers, and an oversman may be called in. The fittings, when paid for, shall belong to the licensing authority. The officers of the licensing authority shall take the fittings in charge and roup them, or dispose of them, and hand the proceeds to the licensing fund's treasurer. Then, in clause forty-six, we have determined the nature and amount of compensation to proprietors of licensed premises. If let from year to year, one year's rent. If under lease executed prior to 1st February, 1882, and extending more than a year from Whitsunday, 1883, two years' rent. The Court will fix the proportion of rent compensation from grocers and hotels. In case the tenant elects to run till the lease expires, the landlord shall have no compensation. If the tenant shall be convicted of contravening his certificate, the landlord's compensation shall be lessened. Should the licensing authority select the landlord's premises, under this bill his claim for compensation will be extinguished. If the landlord be a tenant, he shall be compensated as tenants are. If the claim for compensation does not exceed £300, it is to be determined either by the sheriff, whose decision shall be final, or by the licensing commission. If above that sum, then the claimant can require his claim to be determined by a jury or by the licensing commission. The person whose claim to compensation has been sustained has to present an extract of the decree of the Court. This procures a certificate from the clerk of the licensing authority, and the treasurer of a burgh or clerk of supply in a county, will, on getting certificate and receipt, pay his claim in full.

We now come to the finance arrangements of the bill. These take up clauses 49-53. The forty-ninth clause makes provision for defraying the polling and all other expenses connected with the bill by a licensing fund, and if there be any deficiency the commissioners of police and clerk of supply respectively must levy a rate to defray it, and the rate will be imposed as required when other assessments are. By clause fifty all sums received for the sale of certificates in burghs or districts are to be accounted for to the burgh treasurer and clerk of supply respectively, and the fund shall be termed "Licensing Fund Account." The fifty-first clause confers borrowing powers on the police commissioners and clerk of supply, who may spread the expenses incurred in paying off compensation claims over several years, not exceeding fifty. The licensing fund and licensing rate are to be the security. The authority may repay the sum borrowed in equal annual instalments not exceeding fifty, or they shall set aside one-fiftieth of the borrowed sum annually as a sinking fund. The Public Works Loan Commissioners may lend any money required, such loan to be repaid in fifty years, and to bear interest at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum. The fifty-second clause gives power to impose a local rate, and clause fifty-three determines that after the compensation debt is cleared off the special assessment shall cease, and the amount received from the sale of certificates shall be applied to the police purposes of burgh and county.

Clauses 54-58 have respect to a licensing commission, its constitution, tenure of office, its place of meeting, its officials, and its powers. Clause fifty-four provides for the commission, but no number is suggested. It is to hear and determine all matters whether of law or fact relating to compensation, and whose claims have not been settled by sheriff by jury, and its decision is to be final. It can enforce the attendance and examination of witnesses, the production of books, papers, &c.; can issue any commission for the examination of witnesses, can punish persons who refuse to give evidence or produce documents, or may be guilty of contempt, and it can make or enforce any order whatever, and shall have all rights, powers, &c., for the full carrying out of the Act. By clause fifty-five it is to hold office for a year or longer at the discretion of the Home Secretary, and its expenses are to be charged to Parliament. By clause fifty-six, its head-quarters shall be in Edinburgh, but it will proceed to burghs and licensing districts to determine cases, and shall meet in the court houses there. The fifty-seventh respects the appointment and removal of its officials and the appointment of a sub-commission; and the fifty-eighth clause regards the rules which it may from time to time make and enforce for the carrying out of the Act.

There are many good points in this remarkable bill; for instance, the reduction of licenses to one in 500, which might reduce the licenses in Scotland by nearly one half; the only allowing one license to one man; the taking in the widest possible franchise to poll on the traffic by ballot; allowing the people to vote for no license whatever; and by the provision that all who require public houses shall publicly sign a requisition for them. But these good points are entirely overborne by the other provisions of the bill; such as instituting a licensing authority or commission; in the powers given to the first-named to establish the liquor traffic in places at present free from them; in giving a minority of fifty power to arrest the vote of the majority in favour of suppression; in enabling any number of three hundred of the ratepayers to reinstate the liquor traffic; and in conferring power on one hundred ratepayers to have a license in their district; in that it creates a private traffic in certificates, and has power to plant liquor shops in any part of a burgh or district; in that it can certify to a person's character for the long period of ten years; in that it can compensate the publican for his license and his fittings, and yet he may resume business in the same district; in that it can compensate the landlord of licensed premises, who may then let his property for other purposes and get as high a rent as his neighbouring proprietors; in that the publican, by purchase of a certificate, may be vested with proprietary rights which might entitle him to compensation; and in that even although compensation is awarded the liquor traffic shall not cease.

We rise from the investigation of this bill with a stronger conviction than ever that it is impossible to satisfactorily regulate the liquor traffic, and we regret that his lordship did not address himself to the task of suppressing it by a veto vested in the ratepayers. Had he attempted to do this he might not have succeeded without a hard fight. The liquor traffic will die hard; but in the fight he would have been supported by the combined strength of the temperance party in Scotland, by the churches and the great body of moral and social reformers, and would, by his success, dignify the ancient and illustrious house to which he belongs by the great services which such a measure would have conferred upon all classes in his suffering country.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION IN ABERDEEN.—CONFERENCE ON TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.—A conference of temperance reformers took place on Monday, 20th ult., in the Upper Room, St. Katharine's Hall, Aberdeen, when there was a large attendance. Mr. William Davidson, president, local branch of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, occupied the chair. The meeting having been opened with prayer by the Rev. A. Stewart, an excellent tea was served. Thereafter, the chairman, in opening the proceedings, made appropriate reference to the death of the late Mr. John Macdonald, who had done much to promote the interests of the temperance cause in the city, and then proceeded to state the object for which they had met, viz., to consider the question of temperance legislation for Scotland. He said the temperance question was getting more and more important, and also more and more popular, but yet they felt it had not reached that step of progress which they would all like to see it attain. He concluded by calling on Mr. A. S. Cook to open the discussion. Mr. Cook then in a paper gave an excellent summary of the "Licensing Laws (Scotland) Bill," and was loudly applauded at the close. A discussion followed, which was taken part in by the members of the deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, viz.:—Messrs. Raper, London; W. Smith, Balzeordie; R. Mackay, Glasgow; Rev. A. Stewart, Messrs. James Paterson, George Kemp, A. Murray, W. Stevenson, John Leith, and James Craig. At the close of the discussion, Mr. A. S. Cook proposed the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Badenoch, and carried unanimously:—"That the conference, on considering the Licensing Liquors (Scotland) Bill, unanimously request the members of Parliament for the city and county of Aberdeen to use their influence to get the twentieth and twenty-first clauses of that bill substituted by the following:—'That if a majority of the voters vote for no license, then the licensing authority shall declare the suppression of the liquor traffic in the district so voting, and that no compensation be given to either liquor sellers or proprietors of licensed houses; and that in no case should licenses extend beyond the tenure now existing; and that copies of the resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister, Lord Rosebery, the Lord Advocate, Lord Colin Campbell, and other gentlemen whose names are on the back of the bill.'"—In the evening a public meeting was held in St. Katharine's Hall, Shiprow. There was a good attendance. Mr. James Paterson, president of the Aberdeen Temperance Society, presided. The chairman said that they were met that night to receive a deputation from the Scottish Permissive Bill Association—Mr. Smith and Mr. Mackay—and Mr. Raper, from the United Kingdom Alliance—(applause). The temperance question had now become one of the practical political questions of the day—(applause)—and must be considered by every candidate who came forward to solicit the suffrages of the people—(applause). Mr. Alexander Esslemont moved the first resolution, which was—"That this meeting deplores the evils inflicted upon society by the liquor traffic; views with serious apprehension the consequent social and moral debasement of so many of Her Majesty's subjects through its baneful operations; regards the vast expenditure of money as obstructive of the material prosperity of the country; and therefore calls upon all good citizens to promote the spread of temperance principles in the community." Mr. Smith, Balzeordie, seconded, and Mr. Mackay, Glasgow, supported the resolution, which was unanimously adopted. Mr. George Kemp moved the second resolution, which was similar to the conference resolution. Mr. Raper seconded the resolution. He did not wish to discuss Lord Colin Campbell's bill. He rather regarded that bill as the reflection of some considerable agitation in Scotland, and as supplying to the Scottish people a topic for discussing in a concrete form the various proposals that had been before the country for some time. As a temperance reformer, he was very grateful for the bill. He regarded the effort made by Lord Colin Campbell and those who were co-operating with him as a sincere honest effort to help their countrymen into a better position—(applause). He was one of the party in the British nation, however, who had long since entirely separated himself from the idea of licensing ever being satisfactory—(hear, hear). He had studied the licensing system on the Continent very largely, and he had never seen a licensing system which he thought right—(laughter and applause). Mr. Raper then referred to the Maine and Kansas laws, and said that in the latter State a clause had been incorporated in the Constitution prohibiting the drink traffic for ever. The resolution was adopted unanimously. Mr. A. S. Cook moved the transmission of the resolution to Parliamentary representatives. Mr. Stevenson heartily supported the resolution, and it was agreed to unanimously. On the motion of the chairman, the thanks of the meeting were awarded to the gentlemen from a distance. On the motion of Mr. R. Mackay, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the chairman for presiding, and the Rev. John Duncan having pronounced the benediction, the meeting ended.

BRECHIN TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.—A largely attended public meeting under the auspices of the Total Abstinence Society was held in the Temperance Hall on Wednesday, 22nd ult.—Mr. Joseph Gillam presiding. Addresses of an exceedingly interesting and practical nature were delivered by Rev. Hugh Aird, City Road U.P. Church; Rev. E. J. Boon, Kirkcaldy; Messrs. W. Smith, Balzeordie; Mackay and Stevenson, Glasgow. Rev. Mr. Boon said the great matter was to put the licensing question in the hands of the people. He had faith in the instincts of the people, and he for one would be quite satisfied with their decision as to whether the drink traffic was to exist or not. Let the question be put fairly and clearly—license or no license—making exception of no one, and it would say all the less for them as temperance men, and for the principles they contended for, if they were not able to spread the truth and cultivate temperance sentiment that the people would vote in the right direction. The paper by Mr. Mackay was able and convincing. It gave a synopsis of the principles of Local Option, and he urged on all to bring their influence, by petition and otherwise, to bear on the subject, and secure a place for it on the Statute Book. Mr. Stevenson said the Permissive Bill wished to invest the ratepayers with the power of closing all the public-houses. The resolution called Local Option was neither more nor less, according to their meaning, than the Permissive Bill minus its details. Mr. Aird, in an able speech, moved a resolution embodying the principle of Local Option. In the course of his remarks he stated that he was one of the earliest supporters of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, and he would go forward with Local Option in the one hand and the Gospel Temperance Union in the other. The resolution was supported by Mr. Smith in his usual eloquent and thoroughly practical style, and unanimously agreed to. Regarding the question of public-houses in our neighbouring parishes, Mr. Smith stated that a petition went round to get a license restored to a house in Menmuir, and only two voted in favour of it—the applicant and the proprietor. The Rev. A. Mitchell moved that the resolution be forwarded to the local M.P.'s and the Earl of Rosebery. At the close, Mr. James Bell, billposter, in moving a vote of thanks to the speakers, said that he was now convinced that Local Option was "the right thing."

He never was convinced before, he was a new convert, and he hoped all the speakers would get a hearty vote of thanks for "enlightenin' him." Mr. Willocks, in a neat speech, seconded, and the thanks of the meeting were heartily awarded.—Brechin Advertiser.

KEMNEY—LECTURE.—A lecture on the "Great Reforms of the Present Century" was delivered in the Public Hall on Thursday evening, 23rd ult., by Mr. William Blackwood, Aberdeen. The speaker reviewed the principal reforms since the passing of the first Reform Bill down to the present time, showing in a clear and forcible manner how every subsequent measure tended to increase the power and extend the influence of the working classes. Speaking of the reforms yet to come, but lying in the near future, he quoted the words of Mr. Gladstone relating to the extension of the county franchise, and urged his hearers as working men to rise to the dignity of their position, to realise the power which was theirs, and to use it aright in the work of reforming and purifying social abuses. An eloquent peroration in favour of temperance reform brought an interesting and instructive lecture to a close. There was a fair attendance, and from beginning to end the lecture was listened to with marked attention, the many excellent points of the speaker being keenly caught up and greeted with warm applause. Mr. H. M'Combie, Milton, occupied the chair, and moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Blackwood, which was very heartily responded to. A like compliment being paid to the chairman at the request of Mr. Blackwood, the meeting broke up.—Aberdeen Free Press.

DUMFRIES—TEMPERANCE MEETING.—A public meeting, to hear addresses on the temperance question by Mr. Bennet, Dysart, and Mr. R. Mackay, secretary of the Permissive Bill Association, was held in Greyfriars' Hall, Dumfries, on Tuesday night, 13th ult. There was a good attendance. Dr. M'ulloch presided at the earlier part of the meeting, and opened the proceedings with a few pointed remarks, his place being afterwards taken by Rev. Mr. Strachan. Mr. Bennett, in a closely reasoned and interesting address, arraigned the liquor traffic as the most prolific source of evil we have to contend with in modern times, and pleaded that a legal power should be conferred on the people to overthrow it by a prohibitive veto. The traffic had grown up and developed under the sanction and protection of the law, and what the law had built up the law was quite entitled to pull down. He urged that temperance reformers should unite and bring their political influence to bear upon the Government. Mr. Mackay replied to the argument against prohibition based on the loss of revenue. He urged working men to set themselves against the traffic on the grounds of political economy, and to organise their political power for the purpose of securing a thorough-going measure for Scotland. A vote of thanks was heartily awarded to the deputation, on the motion of Mr. Farries.—Dumfries Standard.

UNFERMENTED WINE guaranteed to be the true fruit of the vine and un-intoxicating, imported direct from the vineyard by Frank Wright, 27 Merton Road, Kensington, London. We have so often had occasion to write in terms of admiration of Mr. Wright's Unfermented Wine that it is difficult to add anything to what we have previously said in its praise. His wines have answered every test to which they have been subjected; have met trade jealousy, ecclesiastical hostility, medical investigation with the most triumphant results. It is now the only wine which temperance men can confidently accept, and is in use in nearly fifteen hundred churches. We are glad to see that Mr. Matthew Waddell, of the City Dining Rooms, 60 Union Street and 42 Argyle Street, Glasgow, is the agent for Glasgow and the West of Scotland, as his well known enterprise should bring this grateful beverage before a larger portion of the community.

THOMPSON'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE; A CONCENTRATED EXTRACT OF COCOA.—Cocoa has deservedly found increased favour with the British public, as much from the skilful modes of preparation as from the grateful character of the article itself. Mr. Thompson, the chemist of 17 Gordon Street, Glasgow, offers a preparation which merits a foremost place. For purity, strength, and flavour it excels, and is one of the very best cocoa essences at present before the public. Easy of preparation, it may, with the needful cream and sugar, be instantaneously made, and it proves a luxurious addition to the breakfast table. It is said to be suitable equally to the strong as to the weak. We can only speak for the strong, but if it should be found to adapt itself to the weak as it has certainly done to the other, Mr. Thompson is to be congratulated on his success, and his delicious preparation will only need to be known to be largely patronized.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

The Christian Commonwealth. London: S. W. Partridge & Co. A number of this journal, devoted to "the advocacy of good and right and truth throughout the world," is before us, and contains many interesting and instructive articles kindred to its object, which ought to command a large circle of readers.

Onward and Onward Reciter for March are also before us, and both are as attractive and interesting as usual. The Reciter contains the full text of "The Beautiful Snow," as it first appeared in the Galaxy for July, 1869, together with an account of the real circumstances upon which the poem was founded.

The Welcome for March is as attractive as ever. Under the heading "Men and Women of Mark," we are favoured with short sketches and excellent portraits of those champions of the prohibitory movement, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., and J. H. Raper, Esq. Besides the usual wealth of illustration, this excellent monthly contains a serial story of eastern life, an account of life and adventure in Japan, short readings upon the miracles of Christ, and a great variety of other interesting matter.

The British Temperance Advocate is quite a model temperance paper, and is a favourite with us. The number for March contains many interesting articles on the question, and is replete with temperance intelligence. The veteran prohibitionist, Dr. F. R. Lees, begins the first of what appears to be a series of letters on "The New Testament in relation to Intemperance," which, like everything coming from his fertile pen, is worthy of careful perusal.

House and Home for March begins a new, and, to our minds, improved series of that most instructive magazine. Several new features, calculated to increase its popularity are introduced, and writers of first-rate ability on the various subjects embraced in its programme are announced amongst its contributors. For ourselves we must say that we are very favourably impressed with the rich permanent nature of the contents of the number before us, and we can safely predict for it an appreciative circulation amongst the thoughtful members of society.

Alcohol and Health, from a Woman's Point of View. Read at the Annual Council of the Scottish Christian Union, Edinburgh, 30th Nov., 1881. By Mrs. Helen Kirk. This is a truly excellent paper, and, on the subject of which it treats, most exhaustive. The lady proceeds to analyse "stimulants," which she does most thoroughly into alcohol, and shows that that substance is neither a stimulant nor an irritant, but a sedative. Treating of its mistaken application to the head, to the brain, to throat and lungs, to the great nerve centre—the solar plexus—and to the periodical disturbances and other disorders of women, she shows most conclusively its fell power to benumb and enslave, and she in an admirable manner contrasts its operations with a course of treatment by hydropathic applications much more innocent and yet effectual, having unlike alcoholic indulgence no injurious after effects. This little paper should be circulated widely and constantly by Women's Temperance Prayer Unions, and will be found worth its weight in gold as a means of counteracting the traditional and medical application of alcohol to those diseases peculiar to the gentle sex.

Reggie's Boast and other Stories.—By F. M. Holmes. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price, one shilling. Mr. Holmes' indefatigable pen presents the reading world with six effective Temperance Stories. They are all of even excellence, and are admirably told. Cleverly constructed, they vividly portray the dangers of intemperance. The book is handsomely bound, artistically illustrated, and will, we confidently believe, be hailed with delight by those who have been already under the spell of Mr. Holmes' fiction.

Every Day Stories.—By Emilie Searchfield, author of Christmas Chimes, etc., etc. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price, three shillings and sixpence. We have from the diligent and practised pen of Miss Searchfield twenty-four short tales, which, for variety and conception, could hardly be excelled. In "Frits," we have the old man becoming a wanderer that his youthful friend may take his place and marry pretty Elsbeth. In "Her Christmas Joy," we find that true love clings to a lover who sacrificed her beauty in nursing a dependent. In "A Chain of Events," we have a well-told instance of restitution. "An April Day" shows the unfortunate consequences of an elopement. "Auld Robin Gray" is simply a Welsh paraphrase on the delightful Scotch original. "Home Sweet Home" shows how a hollow marriage became one of tender and lifelong affection; and so on with the whole. A healthy tone pervades them all. All are most effective in treatment, skilfully constructed, and evidently aimed to convey a moral lesson. We can testify that the perusal of the book has afforded us the liveliest pleasure, and we cordially recommend it to all who may be wondering what to purchase as a present for a young friend. It is profusely illustrated and hand handsomely bound.

Onward: A Band of Hope and Temperance Magazine. Vol. XVI., 1881. London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row. Cloth, two shillings; extra gilt, three shillings. Post free. As usual Onward in its volume form charms the eye in its garb of green and gold, while its contents captivate the attention of its youthful and delighted readers. Full of delightful stories, charming music and poetry, interesting and instructive essays and dialogues, and lovely illustrations, it offers a great literary feast to its numerous readers. The present excels all previous volumes, and ought to have place on the drawing-room table. It will form a handsome prize for either Sabbath School or Band of Hope gatherings.

Annual Report of the Newcastle and Gateshead Auxiliary to the United Kingdom Alliance for 1881-82. Newcastle: 21 Northumberland Court. This is a healthy report, a record of vigorous work. The Auxiliary is superintended by a committee that are proud to work with all kindred organisations and to avail themselves of all opportunities. The report is enthusiastic on the Blue Ribbon movement in Newcastle, and bears emphatic evidence to the good which through it has been done. Very truly it adds after the record of what has been done: "The end, however, is not yet. We have only entered upon another stage of our work. We have only got really face to face with the enemy. The enormous vested interest will not be easily overcome. The traffic will die hard, but die it must, if the people are to prosper. The traffic cannot continue to co-exist in the midst of a prosperous nation; one or the other must eventually be crushed; we do rejoice to believe that the signs of the times are in favour of the best interests of the people triumphing." There are eulogistic notices of the visits of Mr. Pator and Mr. Waterston to the Newcastle district, where they appear to have evoked much deserved enthusiasm. The accounts are reported as slightly favourable.

UGHT THE TRAFFIC IN ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS TO BE PROHIBITED?

THE traffic in alcoholic liquors is peculiarly exceptional. In any other trade we find the demand regulating the supply, but in this one that law is to a great extent reversed—the supply of alcoholic liquors stimulating a demand for them. This is owing “to the passion for indulging in them which these liquors awaken in a large proportion of our fellow-men.” The evils flowing from this over-indulgence have from time immemorial been so great that the Government of almost every civilized country has been compelled to regulate and restrict the traffic in which these evils have their rise. The laws passed in our own country for the regulation of the traffic have gradually been becoming more stringent, and the results proportionately more satisfactory. Notwithstanding this, however, the ends desired are at best so far from being attained that it must be patent to everyone who has bestowed any study on the question at all that not restriction but prohibition can solve the problem.

I shall now give your readers a very brief sketch of the history of past legislation in regard to the traffic in Scotland and Ireland. We are informed by one of the early Scotch historians that in the year 860 A.D. the sellers of mead were looked on as public enemies, so much so that at this early period they themselves were banished by the King, their goods confiscated, and their houses destroyed. Constantine II., on the revival of the evil, re-enacted the law in 861, adding the penalty of death to such as should not comply with it. In the middle ages beer and French wines took the place of mead, and regarding the sale of these a law was passed in 1436 by which the penalty of imprisonment was inflicted on any one found in a house for the sale of drink after the tolling of the curfew. In the 16th century the trade was open, and the country consequently crowded with inebriates. At this time the discovery of the mode of distilling whisky made matters worse. In 1625 the religious reformation of the time did much to stem the evil. The people now said “the Government was so strict they had not liberty to sin,” and the taverners now complained “their trade was broken, the people were become so sober.” Unfortunately matters did not long so remain. In 1698 the country was in as bad a state as ever. In 1750 we find no improvement. Drunkenness appears now to have been more prevalent than at any other time. In 1812 the quantity of spirits entered for home consumption amounted to less than 9 of a gallon per head of the population. In 1821, with a reduced duty, it rose to fully a gallon per head. In 1840, the duty being further reduced by a half, the quantity reached was two and a half gallons. Within the next ten years the increase nearly quadrupled the increase of population. Comparing seven years ending 1863 with other seven ending 1878, we find, while the population of the United Kingdom had in that time increased 15 per cent., the consumption of intoxicating liquors had increased to the alarming extent of 55 per cent. This is the result of the many Acts which have been passed within the last few centuries for the restriction of the traffic.

Turning to Ireland, we find there, in the middle of the 16th century, a state of affairs as deplorable as characterised Scotland at that time, the cause of which was the use of usquebaugh. This fact was impressed on the mind of the Lord-Deputy, Sir John Perrot, who even at that period had but too good cause to regret the wholesale destruction of corn for purposes of distillation. He it was who suggested that whisky, instead of being called “aqua vitæ” ought rather to be termed “aqua mortis,” which I think we must all agree would certainly be a more appropriate designation. The Government suppressed the traffic in the reign of Philip and Mary. Ireland now remained in a satisfactory state until, in the reign of Anne and the first Georges, Government, under the mistaken idea of encouraging tillage, and increasing the revenue, once more permitted the manufacture of spirits. The consumption rapidly grew. From 1729 to 1795 the population only doubled, while the quantity of liquors sold increased eleven-fold. The natural result was the decay of manufactures, the degeneracy of the people, innumerable murders and constantly-recurring brawls; indeed, things had come to such a pass that we find even the Corporation of Brewers complaining that “the consumption of spirituous liquors has been daily increasing, beyond all conception or belief, to the infinite prejudice of trade and manufacture; the health, sobriety, and morals of the people.” Petitions against this state of affairs kept pouring into Parliament. Nothing of importance was, however, tried in the way of remedy until in the year 1791 Acts were passed restricting the sale of spirits, and giving the brewers unprecedented privileges. Improvement followed; it proved, however, of a transitory nature. Foreign affairs shortly afterwards engaging the attention of Government, the beneficent Acts, instead of being rigorously enforced, were allowed to fall gradually into abeyance. In 1809-10 and 1812-13, owing to the scarcity of corn, the distilleries were stopped, and the results proved most satisfactory.

Space will not permit of our entering on the consideration of the history of English legislation bearing on the traffic; suffice it to say that the results were similar to those shown in the two countries we have just been referring to. The only Act that calls for special notice is the Beer Act of William IV., under which anyone could obtain a license to sell beer on payment of two guineas. This Act, notwithstanding others of a remedial nature, which followed shortly after, has proved a great curse to England, increasing as it did the houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks from 8830 to 123,306, which meant a proportionate increase of crime, poverty, disease, and consequent taxation.

So much for the history of the liquor traffic, some of the particular phases of which we shall now consider in their social and commercial bearing.

I.—Socially, what are the fruits of the traffic? In a general way we may classify them under Disease and Premature Death, Poverty, Insanity, and Crime.

1. Disease and Premature Death. It is a well-known fact that total abstainers as a class are much more exempt from disease than any other class in society. It has been ascertained that while the death rate amongst total abstainers is at the rate of 1 per cent., that of the moderate drinkers and the intemperate stands at the rate of 2 and 4 per cent. respectively, a fact surely sufficiently appalling in itself to make thoughtful people seriously consider the advisability of doing away altogether with this most deadly traffic. Dr. Norman Kerr of London, anxious to demonstrate the truth or falsity of the assertion that 60,000 drunkards died every year in the United Kingdom, lately instituted an inquiry for this purpose. Here we have an avowed sceptic going into the matter for the purpose of satisfying himself, and what does he make of it? I shall give you his own words:—"I was compelled," says Dr. Kerr, "to admit that at least 120,000 of our population annually lost their lives through alcoholic excess, 40,500 dying from their own intemperance, and 79,500 from accident, violence, poverty, or disease, arising from the intemperance of others." Dr. Richardson says if Britain were converted to abstinence the vitality of the nation would be increased one-third in value. His estimate of the deaths from drinking is 227,000, which is almost one-third of the entire national mortality. Regarding disease, as an example of which let us take cholera—watch the ravages of this most terrible of epidemics wherever it has got a hold; note how it passes the abstainer, lays hold of the moderate drinker, and almost without exception deals to the drunkard his death-blow. Take, for instance, that visitation of cholera in Guernsey in 1849 as proof of this. Dr. Collinette, who was then a medical practitioner there, informs us that "a very large proportion of the then drunkards were swept away; many respectable and moderate drinkers likewise became its victims, but the teetotalers to a man were spared." Your readers will probably ask how it is that in ordinary bills of mortality intemperance is so seldom specified as the cause of death? I answer that it is simply because medical men as a rule, in order to avoid hurting the feelings of friends of deceased inebriates, give the approximate instead of the real cause of death. Dr. Hardwicke, a recent coroner for Central Middlesex, informs us that he found very few deaths attributed to alcohol; when he ascertained the truth, however, he found that between the ages of 25 and 50, something like 30 to 50 per cent. were really killed by alcohol. Truly did Milton say, "Intemperance on the earth shall bring diseases dire, of which a monstrous crew before thee shall appear."

2. Poverty. I feel certain that I am under the mark when I state that the liquor traffic is responsible for the creation of 75 per cent. of our paupers now on the roll. Some years ago there was a return made to Parliament from the different parishes in Scotland, containing, among other matter, information regarding the drinking facilities and amount of the poors-rates in each. From these reports we find that at that time there were 34 parishes in the country without a public-house, and in none of them had the parishioners a single penny of poors-rates to pay. One parish, which had once experienced the same happiness, had five public-houses planted in its midst, and the consequence was that instead of having nothing to pay, the parishioners were soon burdened with a poors-rate of 1s. 8d. on the pound. From the return referred to, it is evident that the amount of poors-rates is in proportion to the drinking facilities of each parish. I think we have a right to object to pay a tax a great proportion of which finally finds its way into the pockets of publicans, and this is undoubtedly the case with the poors-rates. I refer you to any honest publican for the authenticity of my statement. One man in Glasgow some years ago could always rely on drawing £10 more on the pay-day of the poor than any other day in the week. This shows us that money is powerless in promoting the welfare of the poor, unless backed up by some means of preventing its expenditure on liquor, and the only way in which this can be accomplished is by prohibiting the traffic.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

MR. MOODY'S TEMPERANCE EFFORTS IN GLASGOW.

"DRINKING baffles us, confounds us, shames us, and mocks us at every point. It outwits alike the teacher, the man of business, the patriot, the legislator. Every other institution flounders in hopeless difficulties; the public house holds its triumphant course. . . . The huge mischief in one way or other confounds us all, and may, for we cannot be sure, crush and ruin any one of us." This is not teetotal rant, it is extracted from a leader of the Times. Probably such sentiments have arisen in the mind of the great American revivalist, Mr. Moody. Be that as it may, he has felt it to be his duty to say that he has seen more drunkenness in one night in Glasgow, than in any other city he has visited. He has felt, no doubt, that there are thousands, tens of thousands, in Glasgow, who might hear the gospel's joyful sound only for their indulgence in strong drink.

So, after thirty-five Bible readings in St. Andrews Hall, and other meetings which no man can number, he gave out his intention of making a grand assault on the intemperance of the city. He was to begin in Newsome's Circus, which stands at the junction of Ingram and High Streets. A preliminary meeting was held there on the afternoon of Friday, 14th ult., and a few minutes after two o'clock we found ourselves in that famed abode of equestrianism.

Newsome's Circus is just a huge wooden shed done up in the usual garish style of such places of entertainment. The prevailing colours of the decorations are red and white; the roof being a gigantic striped blind in these colours. At the west end of the building—the pit—the platform is erected, and is most luxuriously fitted up. Looking to the audience you have on your right a numerous choir, conducted by Mr. William Moodie, Miss Bonar presiding at a finely-toned harmonium. On your left the ministers and other friends to whom the chief seats are reserved. At your back you have a large inscription, "Seek ye the Lord," and on one side, "None righteous," on the other "The blood cleanseth." The roof is supported on twelve pillars, on these are banners bearing little flags of all nations. On these banners, beginning on the right of the platform, there are such inscriptions as "Lord help me," "Call on Me," "Praise the Lord," "Look unto Me," "Jesus only," "God is love." On the left we find "All have sinned," "Save me," "I am the way," "Watch and pray," "Trust in the Lord," and "Come unto Me." On the wall at the east end, that is, opposite the platform, there are "Follow Jesus," "Look and live," "Why will ye die," and "He will save you." The place, as daylight struggled with the lowered gaslight, looked a tawdry enough place. One could hardly believe that here the grand combat of Ivanhoe, the famous ride of Turpin, the imposing carnival of Venice, could have taken place. He might have remembered, however, that within the compass of Shakespeare's "Wooden O" at Blackfriars were presented the glorious achievements of the Black Prince and Harry the Fifth in France. Stealing in, in twos and threes, came people eager to hear what was to be said. The audience ranged from the poor to the affluent, and was for the most part of the leisure classes. The merchant, professional men, ministers, and women. We knew the most of them. We saw many of the active temperance workers, city philanthropists, the supporters of religious efforts, all mingled together. By this time, 2.45, the platform, pit, promenade, and ring were getting filled. The gas was raised, and from the grand chandelier and from the rods before the pillars a flood of brilliancy lighted up the place. Mr. William Moodie led the choir, who began, to relieve the tedium of waiting, by singing several of the beautiful hymns in the new collection of sacred songs and solos. By three the building was nearly filled. At that hour Mr. Moody moved on to the platform, on which on his left might have been seen the Revs. Dr. Lang, Brown, and Wallace, Revs. Messrs. H. Hall, Renfrew, Douglas, M'Dougall, Edgar, Mackay, Lawrie, Somerville, M'Lean, and others; Bailies Dickson and Selkirk, ex-Bailie Torrens; Messrs. A. Allan, W. Govan, J. C. White, Gray, R. C. Morgan, B. Scott, Quarrier, and many others. Mr. Moody immediately on coming forward gave out the favourite hymn, "Rescue the perishing," which was fervently sung, and Rev. Dr. Brown offered up an impressive prayer only audible to those around him. Silent prayer was asked for while Mr. Scroggie read out requests for prayer. These formed a melancholy list. Prayer was sought on behalf of sisters, brothers, only brothers, father, a family in great affliction in consequence of the intemperance of some of its members. For a drunkard, that God may compel him to come in and be saved; for a father and mother who have promised to come to the evening meeting, for a woman who has often pledged but cannot keep it, for a husband, for a woman in prison on account of drunkenness. After a short interval of silent prayer we had prayer again offered, but some expressions grated on our ear, such as "Will you put forth thy power that thousands may be saved and that we may call thee blessed?" The 117th hymn was sung and then Mr. Moody read a portion of Mark ix, 14, after which he offered up prayer. "We pray for those persons who are in the requests which are before thee. Son of God, look with pity on them. May they seek thee as their only deliverer. May they come to thee, and thou wilt raise them up. We pray that thy blessing may rest on every one here that names the name of Christ. Help us to be of one mind as they were on the day of Pentecost. We want resurrection power to speak to the hearts and consciences of these dead people that they may, a great multitude of them, although drunkards, be rescued from death. Amen." The 14th hymn was then sung. Mr. Moody then said, "There's one clause in the portion read to which I wish to draw attention, and that is, 'Bring him to me.' The disciples had failed, Satan had his own way as he often has. The people stood around laughing and jeering, the scribes questioning just as such people do now. If we bring dear friends who have gone astray to him, we shall have a great glory. It is as easy for God to save the drunkard as any other. When the woman went to Elisha to come and give her back her child, she would not go without the master. When he sent Gehazi to lay his staff on the dead child's face, she did not go with him. She did not believe in the staff but in the master. Then by prayer bring the Master with you, and you will see the breaking and snapping of fetters all around." The speaker gave the substance of a letter from a sister who long prayed for her wandering prodigal brother, but at length God found him in a Chicago meeting, impelled him to the inquiry room and took away his appetite, and now he is free. "You, too, may have prayed long and often, but trust in the Lord. Pray on, keep on praying, and God will answer your prayer." Rev. Dr. Wallace was called and gave the well known story of Willie Torrance of Shotts. Prayer was then offered up, and Rev. Dr. Marshall Lang was the next speaker. He said, "I thank God for this meeting. St. Andrew's Halls have had their full share and Newsome's Circus is now the centre of attraction. I am glad that specific dealing with the root of bitterness which is such a sad ingredient in our life in this city is now decided upon. The action begun to-day is hopeful, united, successful action. We are all of one accord in this place. (Hallelujah). Brethren, this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting. If we believe this let us show it by our action. Such fasting as self-control, self-constraint, and that measure of true abstinence as shall prove our earnestness in the work. (Hallelujah and applause, which was hushed). We are a hopeful band of brothers and we are united, and we must succeed. The evil is not unassailable. We are told that heredity cannot be saved. But all things are possible through prayer to God, who out of chaos made the world of beauty in which we dwell, and surely if it was possible for him to give us beauty out of chaos it is as possible for him to bring a new birth and life out of the drunkard. (Yes, yes). We will take the whole armour of God and we hear our great Captain saying, Go on, there is victory ahead. I baptised a man lately who for many years had been greatly under the power of drunkenness, and if one man can be saved why should we doubt about the salvation of any other." (Applause). Mr. Moody then said—"If we are to do anything we must visit these people at their homes and get them to love God and leave off drinking. (Amen). You must all work hard. These people don't need to be taught, for they know that they are slaves and will be glad to be saved. Many of these sort of people will be here to-night, and you must give them a good seat, a front seat; you will relinquish the best seats for them; if you have to go to the back seats or even outside, you can go and pray for them as you stand there. (A laugh). You must not wait to be introduced to those you wish to save. If I saw a man struggling in the Clyde do you think I should wait till introduced to him. Oh, no; I should save him and then we should know and rejoice together in praising God. I am greatly cheered by this meeting and seeing so many present so early in the afternoon. How many of you would like to come here every afternoon at three o'clock?" Almost all the audience held up their hands. He then briefly prayed for the movement in this city. "May the shout of the King be heard in our camp, and may work be done which shall be heard of in heaven." The choir then commenced to sing and the large gathering dwindled away.

In the evening when we turned up before seven we found a considerable number already seated. All parts of the building kept filling up, and at 7.5, Mr. Moody, whose motto might well have been "Ready, aye ready," appeared in front of the platform. The choir were already in their place and Miss Bonar at the harmonium. He asked some of those in front to say what hymn they wished to hear. One ready response was 391, which was sung at once by the choir; then 166, 363, 297, and 304. The pleasure evident in the tone and faces of the audience could not be mistaken. By this time the building was crowded in every part and presented a brilliant appearance. During the singing Mr. Moody occasionally interrupted by declaring the people were not singing loud enough. "Sing louder; now we'll have the women, now the men." This course was followed with great good nature on the part of the audience, and it was amusing to see him leading in the hymn 304, "Come, great Deliverer, come!" It was at this stage intimated that there was an overflow meeting in the Albion Hall, and Mr. Richard Hill left to conduct it. While 401 was being sung we glanced over the platform, on which we observed Revs. Drs. Wallace and Dobbie, Revs. Messrs. Hall, Pirret, Sloan, Stewart, and others. Sir William Collins, Bailie Dickson, Messrs. Wm. Govan, J. C. White, A. Allan, Gray, Simpson, and others. We looked over the audience and it was a most magnificent sight, intelligent, respectable, orderly, and devout. Of all ranks in life, and all animated by the highest sentiments which can actuate the human breast, it was a sight to linger long in the memory and in many memories it will abide for ever. There was an exception—inebriates who called forth the remark of Mr. Moody that their friends should place them near the entrance so that when they did break out they might be taken out and made better by the fresh air. (Laughter). Miss Bonar here sang the beautiful idyllic hymn 302, accompanying herself on the harmonium, the audience assisting her with the chorus. This was a most charming contribution to the singing of the evening and was hailed with evident delight by the entranced audience. Mr. Moody asked the meeting to engage in silent prayer while Mr. Scroggie read out the requests for prayer. The number of these was so great that to save time they were classified as follows:—three sons, three brothers, a sister, a husband, a wife, two women given to strong drink, eight men, some of them present, a friend, two mothers, a brother-in-law, a father, and a young mother. The following farther summary will show more clearly what these requests are like:—prayer is requested for a young mother given to drink, for the mother of a large family almost ruined in body and soul by the use of strong drink, for an elderly woman who cannot resist the craving for liquor, also for a young and an elderly woman who have given way to drink but are at present struggling against the desire, that grace may be given them to abstain altogether from the intoxicating cup. After a brief interval of silent prayer the Rev. Mr. Paton led the prayers of the large assembly, after which No. 49 was sung by the choir. Mr. Moody himself offered up a most practical prayer supplicating the blessing of God on the efforts that might be made here and elsewhere so that a great number of drunkards might be saved. May the Son of God, he prayed, go from heart to heart touching them that we may be all able to give him glory for a great salvation. Mrs. Hector Hall, who now presided at the harmonium with signal ability, gave us a solo, hymn 399, with deep feeling. Meetings were given out at this stage; Mr. Moody remarking that the drunkard had many friends here who would give him what assistance lay in their power. He then read from 5th Mark referring to the cures which Jesus wrought recorded in the chapter on the demoniac, the diseased woman and the dead child. He then said,—

“Now, the question that evening to be answered was whether a drunkard could be saved or not. He had no more doubt of that than he had of his existence. He believed it was as easy for Jesus Christ to save a drunkard as it was for anyone present to lift up his own hand; and if they looked to him and expected him to do the work, and gave up trying to save themselves, only casting themselves upon him for aid, they would not be disappointed. In that same chapter we read of a man possessed with a legion of devils, and it is said of him that an effort was made to chain him down, but failure was the result. Like Samson he broke his fetters and escaped. So when Christ met him he was out in the tombs among the dead, trying to find stones that he might mar that temple in which the Holy Ghost loved to dwell. The man cried out—“Thou Son of the most high God, hast thou come to torment me before my time?” He thought Christ was his enemy. That was the belief of drunkards. They also thought Christ was their enemy. Now, there was no greater lie ever told by the devil than that. There was no drunk man or woman in the city but might have a friend in Christ if he or she only knew it. He had the power to cast out the strong man armed, and could give them victory over their appetite—over their terrible sin—which had been binding them down for many years. This was not a myth; this was not a fiction. It was a living fact that Christ had power to overcome and save the drunkard. All that the drunkard wanted was to believe that Christ had that supernatural power. Further, we read of a woman coming to him. She had suffered many things without getting any remedy; in fact, she was a thorough incurable, and if there had been institutions for such persons in those days, no doubt she would have been an inmate. But she believed that Christ was able to cure her, and that is true. He has in himself more medicine than was in all the doctor's shops in the East. The medicine-men had got all her money, just as the publicans have got yours. Hearing that he was in her neighbourhood, she went up to him. She could not dress to go, she was now poor in means but rich in faith. Rough men pushed her back, and tried to keep her away from Christ, but she struggled into his presence, and the result of her marvellous faith was that the Master cured her. Christ put the question, Who touched me? and the people smiled at him putting such a question. They could not distinguish between the touch of matter and the touch of faith, and it is so now. If Jesus could cure her he could keep her; if he could heal her he could save every drunkard here. We should remember that Christ had power over devils, disease, and death, and that the vilest drunkard that reeled through the streets of Glasgow could be saved. We must not limit the power of the Holy One of Israel. When he (Mr. Moody) was preaching eight years ago in Newcastle, a lady said, “Mr. Moody, I am going to have my nephew at your meeting. I am the only one left who takes an interest in him. He has promised to attend in order to gratify me. If he is not reached to-night, probably he never will be.” Mr. Moody said, “Am I God that can kill and make alive?” But he preached as well as he could, and when the meeting was over he pushed through the crowd, and saw the lady coming to him. Her nephew managed to slip away and disappeared. But notice. A year afterwards that young man, who was a graduate of Cambridge, and a solicitor, whose practice, however, was going from him, was sitting one night in his London lodgings, his pipe in his mouth, when the thought came into his mind that he ought to be a different man, and that he should stop drinking. But he was afraid he could not, his appetite having got the mastery over him. He had tried many times, but it was impossible. Then the thought came into his mind that with God everything was possible. That thought laid hold of him; and, removing the pipe from his mouth, he got down upon his knees and called upon God to help him. He then went out and tried to seek for a minister, but could not find one. He was afraid to go to bed, fearful lest he should sleep off his good resolution, and be at the drink in the morning. But finally he asked God to make him bad next morning, because he believed that if he felt bad God would not have done with him. We have often heard of people asking God to make them good, but this man wanted to be made bad, and when he rose bad he felt that God's spirit was still striving to save him. This took place seven years last November, and from that night he had not tasted one drop of liquor. Such was the result of the thought taking hold of the man that with God all things were possible. If he could create a world he could save the drunkard. He had a long arm; it would reach down to the deepest pit, lay hold of the vilest drunkard, and put a new song in his mouth. The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, says the Holy One, because he has sent me to give liberty to the captives, to set at liberty them that are bound. Pray then to him that he may loosen your bonds and set you free, but never allow the idea room in your minds that you cannot be saved.” Mrs. Hector Hall rendered with exquisite grace and feeling, “She only touched the hem of his garment,” No. 293. Mr. Moody then called upon several men who came forward and in a simple, homely way gave their experience of how they relinquished drinking. Mr. Turnbull said he had been an abstainer for five years, and he thanked God who had delivered him from the power of strong drink. He liked to dwell upon the difference between saving one's self and being saved by Jesus. Since he had found him he had had great delight in being an abstainer. Mr. Moody asked him if he had as great delight in being a Christian as he had in the public houses when he went to them. Mr. Turnbull's answer was eminently wise:—There is a pleasure in drinking, but I would not give one five minutes of the love of Christ for all the jollity I ever had in drinking. Now, Mr. Turnbull, go you over to the Albion Hall and give similar testimony. Mr.

Moody, turning to the audience, said, Do you believe testimony? Yes, yes, came from all parts of the house. The next gentleman said he was born in 1851, and born again in January, 1882. Christ brought me to the knowledge of him after a drunken spree. Rising in the night to get some water the thought of God and Christ came into my mind. I had a good mother and sister who earnestly and long prayed for me. Next day God's power drew me to the mission meeting I had often despised, and led me to rely on the work of his Son. I never thought I could speak before such an audience as this, but it is not I but the Spirit of God which strengthens me. From the moment I found Christ I have not let the liquor ever pass my lips, and I have never even desired it. Mr. Moody asked, Have you been troubled with the appetite? No; I have lost all the desire. My home is happy, and I try to teach them there to live to God, and my wife is also accepted and saved. Another man stood up and said that he had been an abstainer for five months only. The Lord had laid hold on him and placed him on a rock. It is not a half salvation he gives. Only believe and he will save you body and soul. If you accept Christ you have no need of strong drink. It is not prohibition it is a substitution; Christ for drink! I am rejoicing at my deliverance, and my mother is rejoicing too. I went and wrote out a pledge, "I hereby promise to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as beverages." I offered up prayer, and have kept the pledge till now. I was not converted, however, and felt anxious to hear Mr. Moody. His text was, "God is not mocked," and it made me very anxious about my soul. He wanted all who were anxious for their soul to stand up, but the devil had me, and I continued to sit. But on the following Monday I went to get peace, and thanks to God I found it. Although I spoke of not keeping abstinence through temperance lodges or temperance societies I am not against them; join them, but only don't trust entirely to them, ask God to help and bless you. Dr. Wallace then offered up prayer for those who had given their testimony to them that evening, and that God would bless their families. Well may they say the Lord hath done great things for us whereof we are glad. We thank thee, O God, that all over Scotland prayer of a similar nature is being offered up to thee. Lord, there are many in this meeting who could give similar testimony. O thou who stood at the grave of Lazarus and said, Loose him and let him go, O Spirit of the living God, do not allow us to separate till thou hast brought many trophies.

Mr. Moody then asked those who had given testimonies in favour of abstinence to stand. A large number did so, whom he asked to keep standing. He then asked those who desired to be free to stand up. A great many stood up in all parts of the building, and as he urged, others rose, until a fourth of the audience were standing. Those who had given oral testimony left during the singing of hymn 361 to the overflow meetings in the Albion and Argyll Halls; and as 274 was being sung, Mr. Moody calling on his workers dashed in among the audience, urging the people seeking freedom from intemperance to go into one or other of the numerous adjoining rooms. Closing our note-book and buttoning ourselves up against the inroads of the raw, gusty rainy night, we left the circus with the words

Bringing in the sheaves!
We shall come rejoicing,

ringing melodiously in our ears.

CLEVER TO IMPUDENCE.—The other day an American sewing girl went to her mistress and said; "I fear that I will not be able to work much longer." "Why? you seem to get along excellently with your work?" "Yes but I can no longer see any meat on my plate at dinner." Next day the girls were served with very large but very thin slices of meat. "What happiness" said our girl, "my sight has now come back. I can now see better than ever." "Why? how can that be?" said her mistress. "Why at this moment I can see the plate through the meat."

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

Whisky left in a cask seven years will lose its poisonous fusel oil. A cask left in a printing office about as many days will lose both poison and whisky.

WE WON'T GO HOME TILL MORNING.—Young lady (starting)—“My goodness!” Young gent (a late stayer), “What is the matter?” Young lady (glancing at the clock), “Nothing. I thought I heard the milkman!”

THRIFT.—Two men from a neighbouring village were hurrying through the Lang Toon o' Kirkcaldy to the railway station, when, passing a druggist's shop, James said to his neighbour, “Wait a minit, Davie, till I get a poother for the bairn.” “Weel, Jamie, what did you pay for your poother?” asked Davie. “Oh a penny, of course, an' a gey sma' morsel it is; but poothers are a' penny pies wi' thae gentry.” “Man, Jamie, I see ye canna buy poothers for bairns; I wud 'a' gotten twa as big as yours for a penny.” “Ay,” says Jamie, “hoo wud you manage that?” “Weel, I'll tell ye. He wud spier hoo auld the bairn wus?” “Ay, of course, an' I tell't him it wus six weeks auld.” “Weel, if it had been me, you see, I wud 'a' said six months, an' I wud 'a' gotten ane as big again, and then devided it in twa.” “Man, Davie, that thocht never struck me,” answered Jamie, “or I wud 'a' soucht it for its mither.”

A NIGHT SCENE.

The night breeze is so still, you scarcely hear
A rustle 'mong the ancient forest trees,
The river wanders on in quiet ease,
And all is calm. A cot is standing near,
Whose lighted windows give a cheerful gleam,
And like tall ghosts the hoary oak trees stand,
Their shaggy limbs spread out, and all the land
Seems lonely at this hour. A pensive dream
Comes o'er me, and I listen for a sound,
And gaze intently on the darkened sky.
It has no cloud. There is no star on high,
But the moon travels on its nightly round,
And like a burning globe it darts its beams
On darkling woods and fairy-haunted streams.

THE WISE STATESMAN!

Hark to the publican's till!
With its clink, clink, clink;
Hark to the drunkard's will!
Give me drink, drink, drink.

Hark to the statesman wise,
As he gathers the license fee!
What though the soul eternally dies,
What does it matter to me?

What are statistics of crime?
What is the pauper's long roll?
What in the annals of time
Is the endless death of the soul?

Hark to the statesman wise,
As he gathers the license fee!
What though the soul eternally dies,
What does it matter to me?

What are the drunkard's rags?
What is the orphan's plea?
So long as I fill up my money-bags,
What does it matter to me?

What is the ruined health?
What is the early bier?
What is the squandered wealth?
Or what is the widow's tear?

What is each blighted hope
To filthy lucre and gain?
What is even the hangman's rope?
Or what is the shattered brain?

What are all these to me,
Saith the crafty statesman and wise,
For I still gather my license fee,
Though the soul eternally dies?

Oh that the Lord would come,
And take to Himself the power!
But what will it be to some,
The judgment's decisive hour?

To hear the sad word “depart,”
Pronounced on each unclean soul,
What will it be to each blackened heart
While eternal ages roll?

Then, alas, for each statesman wise,
As they gather their last great fee!
Each ruined soul that eternally dies,
Will their scourge in eternity be!

A woman who carried round milk in Paris said a naive thing the other day. One of the cooks to whom she brought milk, looked into the can and remarked with surprise, “Why, there is actually nothing there but water!” The woman leisurely looked into the can, and said: “Well, if I didn't forget to put in the milk.”—Figaro.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

MAY, 1882.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Offices—112 Bath Street,
Glasgow, April 1882.

DEAR FRIEND,—We are desired by the Executive of this Association to respectfully remind you that Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., intends on Wednesday, 10th May, to move the second reading of the "Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill."

We beg to lay before you the Executive's deliverance on that Bill, which is as follows:—

"The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have carefully considered the provisions of the 'Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill,' introduced into the House of Commons by Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., and while regarding it as an honest and earnest attempt to deal with the evils of the licensing system in Scotland, and believing that certain of its provisions would undoubtedly abate some of these evils, yet feel called upon to express their deep regret that the Bill not only fails adequately to recognise the right of the ratepayers in their several districts to prevent by a direct and full veto public-houses being forced upon them or continued in their midst against their will, but provides for compensation to landlord and tenant, for the sale of licenses, for the granting of a ten years' lease, and generally for the continuance, under certain given conditions, of a system that is essentially mischievous in its nature and operations. Further, the Executive would very earnestly call upon all friends of temperance and social reform throughout the country immediately to memorialise their Parliamentary representatives to take such steps as will secure to the ratepayers of Scotland a veto on all facilities for the sale of intoxicating liquors."

They regret that the Bill fails to interpret the convictions of the people of Scotland on the evils of the liquor traffic, and the necessity for its immediate removal. Instead of giving effect to their evident desire to have a veto to protect themselves, it proposes to enable a minority, swayed by interest and appetite, to override the decision of a majority, who in the interests of trade and commerce, education, morality, and religion, have voted for the suppression of that system, with its gross evils and excessive burdens. They feel that they cannot, as prohibitionists or citizens, ask their friends to give to this measure in its present objectionable shape either countenance or support.

On the other hand, its discussion next month affords all desirous of the local suppression of the liquor traffic an excellent opportunity of laying clearly before their Parliamentary representatives the urgent claim of the ratepayers and householders to an effective protection against such a traffic. Besides, the Government may, in the immediate future, introduce their County Government Licensing Bill. By availing themselves of the approaching discussion on the Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill, the Permissive Prohibitionists may enlist the intelligence and sympathy of their Parliamentary representatives, who can judge for themselves the value of their reasonable demand for a suppressive veto, as contrasted with the merely restrictive measure which will on the 10th May be brought under their consideration.

At the present advanced stage of the agitation, no scheme proposing to deal with the liquor traffic, which does not embody an absolute veto, should be entertained. Licensing in any form or degree is so clearly opposed to national welfare, that the strongest representations to Parliamentary representatives, and also to the Government, should be made by every elector having the welfare of his country at heart. Those so addressed might then be constrained to come to a clear understanding with the electoral body on this great national question, and a measure adequate to its final settlement embodied into law.

Seeing what has been done to advance the interests of the Permissive Prohibitory agitation in Scotland—that Churches, Town Councils, Poor Law Boards, and other public bodies have declared in favour of its object; that numerous conferences have been held to advance the passage of a veto into law; that petitions and memorials have been presented in its behalf; that personal representations, by deputation and by letter, have been made in its favour; that bye-elections have been fought out upon veto or no veto; that at the general election it was the paramount issue in almost every contest deciding the possession of many a seat; that no question having respect to Scottish affairs in Parliament has received such an overwhelming vote as it has done—the Executive trust you will, on receipt of this communication, in courteous and earnest terms, press upon your representative the necessity of urging on the attention of Government the fact that the people of Scotland have no faith in legislation to merely abate the evils of the liquor traffic; that their desire is to be entrusted with power to absolutely veto all traffic in alcoholic liquors within their licensing areas.

Your ready compliance with this request will not only promote the interests of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory agitation, but may exert a most beneficial influence on the forthcoming licensing proposals of the Government.—We are, yours sincerely,

JAMES HAMILTON, J.P., President.

JAMES TORRENS, J.P., Chairman of Executive.

THOMAS DICK, Vice-Chairman of Executive.

JAMES L. SELKIRK, J.P., Hon. Secretary.

WILLIAM SMITH, Treasurer.

ROBERT MACKAY, Secretary.

This is in course of issue to the country.

Whatever opinion of the merits of Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Bill may be entertained, there can be no doubt that it has fairly put the aiders and abettors of licensing to flight. Instead of finding favour with a certain section of the temperance party as would have been the case three years, nay, one year ago, it is clear that throughout all the temperance ranks that Bill does not seem as if it had a friend. Its mission is to abate the evils of the licensing system. The evident desire of the country is to abolish that system, and that mission and this desire can no more blend than the blue ether and the small dust in the balance. "Abate" means the continued existence of the liquor traffic, but nothing is so manifest as the loathing with which a farther term of licensing is viewed on all hands, and the impetus which has been given to the conviction that "abolish" and that only should be the rallying cry of temperance and social reformers. We hope that those prominent in the movement who had other leanings will lay the lesson of this revolution in public sentiment to heart, and that dismissing the licensing system and its amendment from their farther consideration, they may be found devoting their efforts to exalt the absolute veto over that system into the realm of legislative fact. With licensing so thoroughly discredited as it has been during the discussion on Lord Campbell's Bill, the way is clearer than before for a union of effort in favour of such a veto, and in the near future there ought to be an unbroken unanimity of sentiment and action in the ranks of the Scottish temperance movement with this object solely in view. This gratifying revolution in the conviction and aim of the temperance movement in Scotland has been long in preparation, and is the outgrowth of that vigorous prosecution of the work so zealously supported by the Scottish prohibitionists. They are beginning to realize the fruits of their labours: they pledged their votes for a veto; they registered their electoral strength on its behalf; they have been in successful conflict with their "natural enemies," the publicans, at the polling booth; they made a gallant stand at the general election, and they are rewarded by the advanced position taken up by the country on the futility of licensing and the necessity of suppression. Their efforts which have brought about so salutary a change on the country are by no means spent; they have discredited license but they must secure abolition; their sphere will change now from the country to the House of Commons. While the licensing system had its supporters in the country Parliamentary representatives waited for the appearance of some preference on the part of temperance men. Now that they will perceive a strong national preference for an absolute veto over the drink traffic, it is easy to see how their attitude to permissive prohibition must change and in what direction. The difficulty of getting them interested in the advanced legislation we aim to secure was very great, but that difficulty will doubtless be found a vanishing one, no longer adding to our Parliamentary complications, and the hour of prohibition and the man to get it enacted may gladden the immediate future. The hope of every true prohibitionist should derive increased buoyancy, and their energies encouragement from this change. Doomed like so many with grievances to wait for redress from a Parliament encumbered by work and enfeebled by obstruction, they must not be inactive, but with their loins girt and their lamps burning be ready at any moment to make a decisive advance against the colossal drink iniquity of our country now tottering to its ruin.

We stop the press to record our gratification at the admission made by Mr. Gladstone in his Budget speech that the altered habits of the people in the direction of temperance and frugality are really telling on the revenue from alcoholic liquors. The people are, in consequence of these altered habits, learning the road to the savings' banks now instead of loitering in the losing banks which are licensed by the State to dispense seductive liquors; and are drinking tea, coffee, cocoa and such like harmless beverages, instead of alcoholic poison. The income of the country, depending not on their virtue but on the law-fostered intemperance of the nation, does not advance by leaps and bounds. The prosperity of the country can never be stable while based on the drinking habits and prodigality of that community. It is real and progressive when it rests on their skill, diligence, and frugality. It seems as if we were no longer to swell our budgets with the fruits of our drink taxation, and we will not when statesmen learn this weighty truth that the "revenue can never suffer from the enrichment and elevation of a people." Never! Let us pray God that alcohol may soon be discarded as a factor of our national income.

Devoted to special education—the exposure of the great drink lie—we most heartily rejoice at the progress of national education in Scotland, in which she is far ahead of the sister kingdoms. How proud we should be when Mr. Mundella feels constrained to say of us, "The figures for England, although they showed a general steady advance, compared unfavourably with Scotland! The average attendance in England was 71, in Scotland 75.2. The percentage of passes in England was 81.82, in Scotland 88.33. The percentage of scholars examined in Standard IV. was in England 26.83, in Scotland it was 33.13; so that, at least, there were 10 per cent. more children over 14 in Scotland than England. In Scotland they were sending out increasing numbers to the Universities of Scotland. The rate of progress shown last year would seem to indicate that the School Boards there had pretty well gathered in all the children; they only increased last year by 11,000. They had completed nearly the whole supply of accommodation to the population. It was impossible to close his remarks without saying that Scotland had done wonders under the Education Act. Her progress had been much more marked than that of England." What a grand nation Scotland might be in a few years, were her people, with their developed brain power, wise enough to shut off the liquor taps! On the other hand, of what avail to develop a massive brain power only to soak it with beer, or inflame it with spirits! With their great brain power, their strong wills, their clear understanding, their large self-control, and their moral strength uncontaminated by strong drink in any form, the sons of Scotland might take the front seats on the high places of the earth.

When we used to read in the prints objecting to the adoption of the Permissive Liquor Act, about the drinkers' dissatisfaction, their veiled rebellion and breaches of the peace, the calling out of the force, the special constables, and the military, and of the consequent "garments rolled in blood," we used to feel our hair rising on end, and our tongues cleaving to our mouth's roof, and our mind trying to think of who would flinch or who would fight. But it was always the mort-head turnip of our youthful terror, with its gorgon face, the waving sheet, and the dark night. True, saucy doubts and fears did sometimes assail us, but joy always came in the morning. Evidences came trooping fast in of places where, if liquor taps were set aflowing, the rioting might be on the other side. We have Kansas, for instance—one of the American border States, where lawless, cruel, reckless men, utterly out-with all order or constraint, once made life a terror. Yet, under constitutional prohibition, this region affords to the whole English-speaking race a noble example of the success of legislation with a moral end. The Topeka Capital—one of the best dailies in the State—in a recent editorial writes, "If the question of prohibition were submitted again tomorrow, the verdict of last November would be repeated with the emphasis of a largely increased majority. The conduct of those who have sought to nullify the new law, and bring it into contempt, has made thousands of converts to prohibition among those who hesitated to indorse it a year ago, when the issue was yet an open one. This prohibitory doctrine of temperance is the settled policy of Kansas, and it will be enforced, never fear." We don't fear. Wherever communities taste of the sweets of prohibition—see for themselves the quiet, safe streets, the lessened crime, decreased poverty, with the positive blessings of peace, plenty, prosperity, and happiness, and at the same time see interested, unscrupulous, reckless men among them aiming to restore the old days of maddened indulgence, riot, and wickedness, you will see them standing staunchly and stedfastly for prohibition, with its social blessings, its good order, its widening and deepening civilization, and its national progress. Instead of mankind resisting the removal of the liquor traffic, they will hereafter be found combining to hurl it out of society.

We have from time to time drawn attention to the burgh of Campbeltown. Through having so many parties interested in the liquor trade in the Town Council its control of the liquor traffic is lost. The friends of temperance there, however, have never lost heart. They have availed themselves of all means within their power to keep the question before the people. Observing that on the 19th March last only 2,925 persons went to all the churches, or 38 per cent. of the population, they inferred that there would have been certainly a better attendance if so many had not been to the 35 public houses on the previous day and evening.

But like wise people, they resolved to put this inference to the test, and accordingly 42 young men were told off to take the census of the public-house traffic of Campbeltown on Saturday, 8th April. The results are as startling as deplorable. The time employed was from 8 o'clock to 11 o'clock p.m. We give the result:—

	Men	Women	Children	Total
8 to 9	647	201	128	976
9 to 10	627	253	118	998
10 to 11	595	306	131	1032

or 39 per cent. of the population. We are willing to admit that all these visitors might not have been separate persons, but while doing so we have a solemn conviction that that number has been largely increased by the drink carried home, so that if we could have added to those going to the shop the numbers drinking in private houses the census would have been appalling in the magnitude of its figures when the population is taken into account. The law says that the publican shall not sell to intoxicated persons, and that the police officers shall note all that issue from public houses intoxicated. Has the law in these respects been duly observed. The law says that boys or girls shall not be supplied with liquor unless an understanding with the publican has been come to by the parents. Is this observed? If so what a dreadful amount of private drinking goes on in Campbeltown, and what an amount of guilty knowledge of private intemperance the publicans must possess. We hope other temperance reformers may emulate the temperance reformers of Campbeltown, for we have long been of the opinion that if on one day a census of all visits paid to liquor shops of every kind in Scotland were taken, the results would be so startling that the nation would not rest till the evil was suppressed. Even the justices at Campbeltown felt constrained to refuse every application, a widow's for a transfer excepted, and on the ground, as one of them said, of the frightful state of the burgh, when they were confronted with the fact that 3000 of the inhabitants went into public houses, there was a clamant call on them to do all that they could to restrict the accommodation. We congratulate the temperance reformers of Campbeltown on their zeal and success.

We present, as we promised, a table giving the population, the electorate, and the number of liquor shops in the seventy-nine Parliamentary Burghs of Scotland. After careful observation of the conduct of the licensing magistrates and justices last month, we believe our table will be scarcely if at all affected by their action. It offers to our readers and friends a clearer estimate of the magnitude of the aggression of the liquor traffic on the amenities of these burghs than has hitherto been possible. Notwithstanding the administration of the Scottish licensing system by magistrates and justices whose character and integrity are above suspicion, burghers are here and now having their interests menaced by 7000 liquor taps for ever dribbling out their base contents to the injury of all within the range of their deadly influence. These drink institutions neither spare age nor sex, the gray hairs of the sire nor the life of the only son of his mother; the earnings of the husband or the capital of his master. The drug they so diligently dispense five-eighths of every lawful day regardless of the consequences to the weak and the wicked which the law is of course supposed to accept. As soon as its physiological effects become apparent it disturbs the divine harmonies of the individual and the ordered progress of the race. But for the law, whose heavy gripe has some deterrent force, these institutions would engulf every interest of man for time or for eternity. As it is, notwithstanding that they are cribbed, cabined, and confined, they are undermining the very foundations of humanity and society. Allowing only two victims to each of these snares, certainly within the mark, and we find a great army of 14,000 human souls passing onward to the great sad premature hereafter. Yet when we look at their numbers and at those of the electorate, we see a minority that, on every occasion in which they have come into conflict with good citizens, have with ease been overthrown. Admit that these publicans are able to bring 70,000 votes to the poll, the electors could bring in that number and have more than 100,000 votes to spare, and in a few years will have double the numbers. Such a survey of the field of agitation as that table shows should nerve every one who has a vote to consecrate it first of all to the abolition of this iniquitous system, which is unable to stand like the baker, the butcher, or the builder on the ground alone of its usefulness to society, and leans heavily upon a law which is a deep disgrace to the British Statute Book, a law which, were the constituencies wise, would cease to protect the publican in his essentially mischievous calling, and declare it felony hereafter for any person who would coolly devote his capital to stimulating the vile propensities of his fellows, be deaf to all remonstrances, and with unparalleled audacity demand a compensation because he is debarred from farther carrying havoc to every interest but his own.

In our sketch book our readers will find an account of a visit paid to the first of the series of temperance meetings held last month by Mr. Moody, the great American revivalist in Glasgow. From that they should, we think, obtain a clear idea of the attitude he has taken up on the temperance question. We were delighted with the account of the visit paid. The importance of temperance as a social lever was duly recognised by the leading sympathisers with all religion and philanthropic effort in the city. Ministers of all denominations, evangelists, rulers, and merchant princes, with Lydias and Dorcases were there. Temperance was on the high places of the earth, and drunkenness was to be deprived of her power over mankind. The services were most attractive, short prayers eminently practical, hymns beautiful in sentiment and exquisitely sung, together with addresses fervent, reaching to and stirring up the heart. The pledge also is most appropriate to the work. It reads, "I hereby promise, by Divine assistance, to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and to try to induce others to do the same." We rejoice to find the chief men and women of Glasgow trooping forth to rescue the perishing, to pluck the brands from the fire. It is true that all that this movement aimed at was simply the rescue of the perishing, for as to that of preventing by legal prohibition all danger of perishing they gave no sign. None. There stood the drunkard, but the drunkard maker was never once taken into account. Quite true; but shall we look coldly on their effort because it stops far short of the necessity, or shall we oppose it because it does not seek just now to stop the evil at its source? Nay, rather let us, relieved by their efforts from trying to diminish the awful effects of intemperance so painfully evident, address ourselves the more energetically to our work of legal prevention, so that when our friends realise as clearly the power of the public house as at present they do the sad condition of its victims, we shall find them shoulder to shoulder with us, not merely striving to pluck the brands from the burning but to put out the fire. They may not have the unction of the intelligent prohibitionists, but "he who is not against us is on our part," and it is often by a painfully slow experience that men are led to advanced positions. Knowledge comes but wisdom lingers; so our friends, though they only seek the salvation of the drunkard now, may become so appalled by the havoc done upon him by the liquor traffic, as to be stirred as we are to abolish utterly that debasing licensing system that is the greatest outward obstacle to the progress of the everlasting gospel.

We have added a column to our table—the last one—to show what would be the effect on the reduction of the number of licenses through, let us suppose, the operation of Lord Colin Campbell's Bill. At present we have 7003; under the seventh clause of the Bill, we are promised only 3330. This may seem a real restriction, but it is only an apparent one. We have long dealt with our licenses as landlords have dealt with their lands. They throw in small crofts in to large farms, to the undoubted increase of their productive power; just so with justices and magistrates: they sweep away "wee" drink shops in favour of palatial liquor shops: and counting doors, they say see how we have reduced the power of the traffic for evil. We who have had a painful experience of the whole case know the deplorable fallacy of reducing the number of licenses and not their capacities as well. These 3330 public houses, expanding during ten years as they have done the last twenty-five, would supply as much liquor as the 7006 did. If our table should meet the eye of some liquor tap restrictionist, it may enlighten him upon the futility of expecting any tangible benefit from the operation of the Bill, even although it apparently and so sweepingly cuts off nearly one-half of the numbers. In the old public houses the facilities for distribution and consumption were of the most primitive order: "a but and a ben," generally only the kitchen, was all the resources of accommodation. Our modern liquor taps are palatial structures, and a man bent on gross indulgence can go to them when they open, get breakfast, dinner, and tea, drinking all the time until, forced by the law, they are compelled to let him go. The liquor trap of the future will as fully develop its capacities. It is not the number of premises but the amount of facilities for the sale and consumption of liquor, which, all things being equal, generate the intemperance of a people, and where there is to be sobriety there must not be even one public house to tempt the weak or the unwary one to the fatal paths of intemperance.

We are glad to learn from our American contemporaries that ex-Governor Dingley of Maine is going right on for the removal of one of the greatest obstructions to the Maine law which it has had to meet. It makes one almost despair of progress when he sees the American government so insensible to the signally beneficent results of the liquor law in Maine, as to still insist on granting liquor licenses for that State. The deplorable spectacle may be witnessed of the State constabulary hunting down ruffians licensed by the Federal government to sell alcoholic liquors. The brave citizens of the Diredgo State, animated by their success in spite of this censurable conduct, have now determined to beat off this interference of the Federal government. Mr. Dingley, of Lewiston, Maine, has introduced into the House of Representatives "a bill to subject the sale of imported alcoholic liquors to the same laws that control the sale of domestic liquors. Be it enacted, &c., that the payment of any duty imposed by the laws of the United States on imported, distilled, and fermented liquors, should not be held to authorise the sale of such liquors in any State, contrary to the laws of such State, or in places where such sale is prohibited by municipal laws." Maine has all but crushed out the sale of liquors; there is not a distillery in all her borders, and if she succeeds in placing the barrier of law against all importation, she will stand before the world as having solved the whole problem of prohibition through her experience, and clearly shown that only by suppression vigilantly and vigorously enforced, can prohibition be truly attained.

A glance at America just now is important. Notwithstanding every effort being made by women's temperance unions, by blue ribbon and red ribbon clubs, and by numerous State temperance organizations on behalf of total abstinence, the consumption of liquor continues to grow at a formidable pace. We give the Bureau of Statistics figures for 1879 and 1881. In the former year the consumpt of distilled spirits was 54,278,475 gallons; of wines 20,000,000 gallons; of malt liquors 345,076,118 gallons. Total, 419,354,593 gallons. In 1881, the consumpt was—of spirits 70,507,081 gallons; of wines 20,000,000 gallons; of malt liquors 444,806,373 gallons; total 538,413,454 gallons. These are deplorable figures; but it is "estimated that ten per cent. of spirits and malt liquors produced escape taxation." Then the figures for 1881 only represent ninety per cent. of the consumption of liquors in America last year. Can we wonder at the persistent efforts being made to change the laws that protect a vicious section of the population in flooding the brains of the American people with such an enormous amount of deadly poison? We cannot; and we are glad to find that Maine and Kansas stand out conspicuous through their prohibitory laws as comparatively free from the appalling results that must of necessity come from such gross alcoholic indulgence as disgraces and debases the other of the United States.

The editor, Irish Temperance Banner, has been induced, by the marked absence from Mr. Murphy's Gospel Temperance meetings at Dublin of the clergy of all denominations, to take stock of their abstinence. There are 163 ministers in Dublin, and of these 50 Irish clergymen, 7 Presbyterians ministers, 15 Methodist preachers, and 4 of other denominations, abstain—this gives 78 out of the whole number. They hardly countenanced the late Blue Ribbon crusade; they only acted, however, as their brethren everywhere have acted—stayed away in their studies, paid visits, quietly ignoring in fact, the whole affair. We gladly except the gallant few who did their duty like brave men and Christian ministers. But we fear that the ministers who abstain are in the minority nearly everywhere, and since our temperance friends are oftentimes perplexed and disheartened by the stolid indifference of their pastors to the cause of sobriety, let them take a census of the ministers in their own community, distinguishing the abstainer from his non-abstaining brother. In our opinion, the census would do more to open the eyes of the flock to the convivial leanings of the shepherd than all that has been attempted, besides enabling us to see, so far as temperance and prohibition are concerned, whose hearts are perfect in this matter.

There are quite a number of croaking people just now who sneer at the idea of our women going to the polls. Only think, they say, of our darlings going among rude excited men to cast their ballots! Of course, this is hardly complimentary to the men. But, without waiting to repel this—an unjust reflection on our own sex in general, and ourselves in particular—we wish to point to Mrs. Goldsmith's polling experiences at Lowell, Massachusetts. She says, "In company with my husband, I entered for the first time crowded ward rooms, the policemen clearing the passage, and notwithstanding I was the only woman in the room, I heard no comment, and it is far more safe to go to the polls than to our post office." She naively adds, "I did so want to cast a ballot for 'no license,' and I am more than ever convinced that we shall never crush the rum traffic until women vote it down." Thanks on behalf of all good men for the compliment paid them by you, Mrs. Goldsmith, and though we cannot promise the company of husbands to female voters in this country, we can, we think, promise them chivalrous conduct at the poll. Oh that our sisters who are voters would, like Mrs. Goldsmith, so want to vote "no license." They would find that a poll apart from drink and its grossness, is as free from annoyance as a church; and we who have borne the burden of the fight hitherto would be proud to stand shoulder to shoulder with them, sternly and implacably casting our votes, as the Israelites did their stones, with the same result—the death of the doomed object of our just indignation, and of our strict impartial justice.

Amid the vagaries of the Quarter Sessions and the Licensing Bench, it is pleasing to come athwart gleams of great good sense. A notable gleam shines on us from Dunbar. Mr. Adam Swinton had entered on the purchase of the Commercial Hotel there, and made the usual formal application for a certificate, but the Fates frowned on Adam. There were four magistrates; one of the four, however, was disqualified through being the lessee of a hotel. Of the remaining three the Provost was strongly in Adam's favour; but alas for him! the other two were credited with being abstainers, and the certificate was lost. Undaunted, Mr. Swinton appealed to the Justices, but alas! with equal ill fortune, for his appeal was dismissed. The chairman, Sir Hew Dalrymple, said to all whom it concerned, that he "thought it very invidious that the Session should interfere with the business of Dunbar. He was of opinion that they should manage their own business. He was sure they would agree with him that they would do much better if they left it to the gentlemen of Dunbar to settle it among themselves. He was very glad to hear that there was so much temperance in Dunbar." There spoke a discerning Justice—one who recognises clearly the attitude which when the Justices are wise they will assume towards the liquor traffic. Instead of being accessory to the aggressions of the publicans on the amenities of the people, Sir Hew Dalrymple, and all adhering to him, would stand aside and let the Licensing Bench deal with the liquor bar as it deserves. We are glad of this episode in the monotonous round of licensing, not that we know anything of Adam Swinton, but that at least one chairman of Quarter Sessions has placed it on record that while the licensing system continues, it should be administered by Magistrates indirectly accountable to the people, rather than by those who have often neither part nor lot in the community on whom they are pleased to saddle public houses. The next step will be to leave it to the people themselves.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—III.

MAR. 20th.—Mr. Redmond asked Mr. Forster whether it was a fact that Michael Slattery was arrested in Clonmell on 16th January at 5 a.m., conveyed to Naas jail, where he arrived at 2 p.m., and that he did not get any food all that time; and whether in future he would give general instructions that refreshments should be supplied to suspects on their way to prison. Mr. Forster said Slattery was offered breakfast at Limerick, but refused to take it. He took a quart of ale, however. [Silly Slattery, to prefer a quart of ale to a breakfast. Ed. S. R.]

In reply to Mr. Whitely, Lord F. Cavendish said that as malt might now be roasted without any payment of duty the revenue would be endangered if a mixture of malt and coffee were allowed to be sold as coffee.

Dr. Cameron's bill to extend the female franchise to police burghs in Scotland passed through Committee without amendment, and the third reading fixed for the 27th current.

MAR. 21st.—In his speech on electoral reform the Hon. A. D. Elliott said that "the questions affecting social legislation, liquor laws, education, artisan's dwellings—such matters would be much better dealt with if the constituencies were larger."

MAR. 24th.—The Irish Attorney-General, in reply to a question by Mr. Metge, said his attention had been called to the case of a sub-constable of the Kells police force convicted and fined in October last for being drunk, and that the court had examined several witnesses, and found the charge proven, and the finding had been confirmed by the Inspector-General. Two medical men had given evidence on the case; one who saw the man one hour and twenty-five minutes after the charge said the man was sober; the other, who saw him two hours after the charge, said that the swaggering gait and swaying motion were due to "ear vertigo."

MAR. 28th.—Mr. Gladstone referred Mr. R. Power to his answer to a question put by Mr. Biggar on March 29th, 1881, regarding the license duty paid by beer retailers, which was £1 5s., in addition to which they have to pay a sum of £3 6s. 1½d.

MAR. 29th.—Dr. Cameron obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867.

APRIL 3rd.—Mr. Biggar, having stated that grocers in Ireland under £20 had to pay for off licenses for selling beer, spirits, and wine £16 4s. 7d., while a publican's license under the same rateable value was £8, and whether he (Mr. Gladstone) was prepared, in his forthcoming budget, to alter this. Mr. Gladstone said these licenses were peculiar to Ireland, and he would have no objection to their reduction on the score of revenue. The spirit grocers were not under the jurisdiction of the magistrates in the same way as the publicans. It was a matter, however, with which he could not deal.

April 4th.—The House adjourned to-day for the Easter holidays, to meet on Monday 17th current for business.

April 17th.—The House resumed after the Easter holidays.

Sir George Campbell, M.P., has forwarded the handsome donation of £20 for the new hall fund, Pathhead.

It is currently reported that John Leng, Esq., of the Dundee Advertiser, is likely to be brought forward as a candidate for the representation of the burghs at next election.—Kirkcaldy Free Press.

Bailie Cranston of Edinburgh has been the honoured recipient last month of several addresses from his fellow citizens. The addresses are quite eulogistic and show that the Bailie is held in high esteem.

RENFREWSHIRE.—Among the gentlemen recently placed on the commission of the peace for this county we are glad to see Stewart Clark, Esq., Kilnside; John Clark, Gateside of Paisley; Provost Campbell, of Greenock; Abram Lyle, Esq., Greenock; and Bailie M'Onie, Glasgow.

A SCOTCH TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE INVITED TO AMERICA.—We understand that to Mr J. H. Waterston, of Edinburgh, has been forwarded a very pressing invitation from America asking him to pay a visit to that country during the present year, and to take a lecturing tour extending for three months.—Daily Review.

REPRESENTATION OF KIRKCALDY BURGHS.—Sir George Campbell's hold of the Kirkcaldy Burghs—his letter of apology and explanation notwithstanding—would appear to be gone. Two new candidates for the seat, as soon as Sir George makes up his mind to retire, are spoken of. They are both Liberal, and both wealthy, one young and one old; but it is understood that the crucial question between them will be Disestablishment.—Cupar News.

TWENTY-THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, 112 BATH STREET, GLASGOW.—An able report, giving a well-written account of battles fought and conquests won. In 1879-80 the association counted 5,483 subscribers, with 122 societies, contributing to it £1,686 17s. 5d., and a special donation of £100 was given besides. In 1880-81 the subscribers were 5,695, the societies contributing 135, and the money contributed £1,854 6s. May funds increase year by year. The work, we know, will be faithfully done.—The British Temperance Advocate.

WHAT BEER DOES.—A writer in the Boston Advertiser says that "while spirits stimulate to violence and lust, beer produces merely sound somnolence (sleep)." But we know a man who for twelve years has never used any liquor save beer. He comes home from his elegant store, behind his handsome pair of horses and makes home a terror. He runs after his wife with an axe, and makes a beast of himself in a thousand ways. Is that somnolence? We know another man who uses beer only who has beaten his wife so as to make her helpless for days; was dead drunk with beer when the neighbours helped to bury his infant son; and has repeatedly knocked down and beaten his girl of eight and boy of five. Is that somnolence? We never heard it called by that name before.—Congregationalist.

Dr. Buckie, Medical Superintendent of the Asylum for the Insane, at London, Ontario, reports, after another year's experience, that he is more than ever convinced of the non-necessity of alcohol in the treatment of those under his care. He says, that as he has given up the use of alcohol, he has needed and used less morphia and chloral; and as he discontinued the use of all three, there has been less need for seclusion or restraint. After carefully watching the effect, he is morally certain that the alcohol which he did use during last year in the treatment of those under his care, did no good. The Medical Superintendent of the Asylum at Kingston says there have been no alcoholic liquors used in that asylum for the last ten years, and he has every reason to be satisfied with the result. This is valuable testimony.—Yours faithfully, G. H. HALE.

ABBAY CHURCH BAND OF HOPE.—The first musical demonstration of this association was held on Saturday night in the Abbey Parish Church, Abbeyhill—the Rev. Robert Milne in the chair, who in his remarks sketched the origin and progress of the Band of Hope, and mentioned that, although, only three months in existence, there was a membership of 300. He attributed its success mainly to the energy of the superintendent Mr Smith, the ability of the music conductor Mr Morrison, and the hearty co-operation of office-bearers and members of the church. He also pointed out the advantages of such an association as being not only beneficial to the children, but of the utmost importance to the church, and earnestly invited parents to give the movement their hearty support. The programme, which consisted largely of sacred pieces, was gone through with much spirit by an adult and a juvenile choir of 40 and 250 voices respectively. Perhaps the most successful effort of the juvenile choir was in a part song entitled "Work away with all your might;" while the adult choir gave a very good rendering of an anthem entitled "Look not upon the wine." A solo entitled "Guardian Angel," was well sung by Miss Marshall; and the singing of a duet entitled "O Lovely Peace," by two boys with very good voices, was also well received. Mr. George Morrison officiated as conductor, and Mr. Woods presided at the organ.

The School Board Elections are now about over, and although, with the exception of Edinburgh, temperance in schools does not appear to have been an issue, we are glad to see many of our friends elected or returned to their respective Boards. The Rev. James Stewart, Peterhead; Mr. R. Smith, Mr. R. Donald, Aberdeen; Rev. Dr. Adamson, G. H. Watt, Esq., and Mrs. Nicholas, Edinburgh; Messrs. Somerville and Anderson, Leith; Provost M'Pherson, Grangemouth; Thomas Hope, Esq., J.P., Bo'ness; General Grant, Corstorphine; Adam Brown, Falkirk; Rev. J. Murray, Dairsie; Rev. J. Brown, Lochgelly; Rev. W. Affleck, Auchtermuchty; Mr. James Brown, Anstruther; Alex. A. Lawson, Kingskettle; Rev. S. Currie, Peebles; Rev. J. Kilgour, Tranent; Rev. J. Maekay, Prestonpans; Rev. Mr. M'Kerrow, Penicuik; Rev. Drs. M. Lang and F. Ferguson; Messrs. Cuthbertson, Pyfe, and Kidston, Glasgow; Provost Moneur, Rev. D. Macrae and W. Hamilton, and W. Doig, Dundee; Mr. J. P. Fairgrieve, Greenock; Messrs. John Moncrieff and C. A. Hunt, Perth; Bailie M'Lelland and Mr. H. T. Rayburn, Kilmarnock; Ex-Bailie Buchanan, Messrs. A. Brown and D. Rogerson, Dumbarton; Provost Binnie, Gourack; Mr. Joseph Russell, Port-Glasgow; Rev. Dr. Russell, Campbelltown; Mr. D. Paton, Largs; Rev. G. Sherwood, Stranraer; Mr. A. M'Clymont, Maybole; Mr. James Wyllie, Troon; Bailie Kennedy, Moffat; Mr. J. P. Wilson, Prestwick; Provost Wyllie, Stewarton; M. E. M'Ewen, Mauchline; Mr. J. P. West, Terrydeer, Montrose; Mr. D. G. Simpson, Kilwinning, and others.

IRISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The anniversary meetings of this Association were held in Belfast last month. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association was represented at them by Rev. John M'Queen, M.A., Kilmarnock, and Ex-Provost Dick, Kinning Park. The opening soiree on Wednesday, 19th, was a grand affair—thirty-three ladies providing tables for guests; and the band of the 2nd battalion West Yorkshire Regiment provided the music. The spacious Horticultural Hall, Royal Botanic Gardens, looked magnificent during the proceedings. Rev. John M'Queen was included in the programme. The next day the annual business meeting took place. Mr. Dalway, ex-M.P., in the chair. The report was read and unanimously adopted. It showed well for the year and bristled with statistical information on the Sunday closing question. The balance of funds to carry forward amounted to £51 12s. 3d. At this meeting, Ex-Provost Dick was asked to support the fourth resolution, which we give entire:—"That the forcing public houses upon the people against the people's will is a gross and intolerable injustice, rendered doubly inexcusable by the twice-repeated acknowledgment by Parliament of the people's right to a legal power of preventing it. In view, therefore, of this crying wrong, of the fearful evils still flowing from the liquor traffic, of two decisions of the House of Commons in favour of a popular control over licenses, and of the promise of the Prime Minister to deal early with the licensing laws on the principle of local option, this meeting would respectfully urge upon her Majesty's Government the duty of introducing as one of their very first measures a Bill enabling local communities to effectually protect themselves from a trade so obnoxious and so hurtful." In the afternoon of the same day, a public dinner was held at which Ex-Provost Dick responded to the sentiment of The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and in the evening the public meeting was held in the Horticultural Hall, which was crowded. The Rev. John M'Queen, M.A., seconded a similar resolution to that supported by his colleague at the business meeting. The whole proceedings were signally successful, and the Executive of the League know how keenly the Executive of the Scottish Association sympathise with them in their labours, and how gladly they share in the hearty congratulations they are meeting with on this year's success.

THE BLUE-RIBBON MOVEMENT AT PERTH.—We were glad to learn that Mr. Murphy, so long expected, paid his promised visit to the fair city last month. The friends took the sensible course of preparing the way by heartily engaging in special efforts to gather in the fallen. Councillor Russell, at the meeting on Friday, 14th ult., told the audience which met to welcome Mr. Murphy in the City Hall that "during the last two months they had held seventeen meetings, each with an average attendance of 1,800 people. At these meetings 2,400 persons had taken the pledge, and 10,000 had donned the little badge of blue. They heartily rejoiced at the impetus given to the movement, which they hoped would move on until it had moved the drink completely out of their beloved Scotland." This information was received with loud plaudits and many expressions of rejoicing. Addresses followed from Messrs. Murphy, Willson, J. Allingham (the Dublin publican), Daniells, and Mrs. Willson. There was also fine singing by Mr. and Mrs. Willson, and then the practical work—210 persons signing the pledge at the close. On Saturday afternoon another crowded meeting took place in the Tay Street Hall, conducted by Mr. Murphy in his well known manner. In the evening a crowded meeting was held in the City Hall, over which Councillor Campbell presided. Spirited addresses from the chairman, Mr. Murphy, and many others, followed, interspersed with the singing of appropriate hymns. At the close, among those who took the pledge were George Fenton, a boatman, a convicted criminal through drink alone; and John Graham, licensed grocer, Crieff. These are certainly great trophies of the movement. As the result of both meetings, 240 took the pledge, and 800 donned the blue ribbon. On Sunday, at the Fechny Institution, an interesting service was held, during which the Rev. Mr. Daniells, and Mr. T. E. Methven, of Dundee, addressed the meeting, at the close of which all the boys signed the pledge, and donned the blue ribbon. The farewell meeting took place in the City Hall, on Sabbath evening, which was densely packed an hour before the time announced. The Rev. D. D. Bannerman presided, and welcomed the movement and Mr. Murphy, because they placed total abstinence and the blue ribbon in its right place—as the handmaid of the gospel, and not as a substitute for it. There were numerous hymns sung, and the speakers included Mr. Murphy, Bailie Moncur of Forfar, Messrs. Allingham and Methven. At the close, 644 took the pledge, bringing up the number of pledges during his visit to 1,064. Mr. Murphy then took an affectionate farewell of his audience, shaking hands with all within reach as he was leaving the hall. There was an overflow meeting in the Middle Parish Church, which was also densely packed, and where similar singing and speaking was listened to. The friends deserve much credit for their arrangements, and are to be heartily congratulated on their well-deserved success.

THE LICENSING ACTS (SCOTLAND) BILL is meeting with strenuous opposition in Scotland. 1st, From public bodies, i.e., the Conference of Temperance Reformers on the Bill at Edinburgh; from the Convention of Royal Burghs; from the Dumfries and Maxwellton Temperance Union; the Edinburgh Town Council, &c. 2nd, From the publicans at all their meetings. The Glasgow Wine, Beer and Spirit Trade Association condemned it as "a most cruel, unjust, and oppressive measure, and if passed into law would sanction the confiscation of our honestly (?) acquired property;" and they resolved to reject it in toto. The licensed grocers of Edinburgh and Leith strenuously oppose it. The Dublin Vintners' Association are desirous of combining with the English Publican Association to assist the Scotch publicans in their opposition to the Bill. At all their annual dinners and banquets it is coming in for a scathing animadversion. They sent a deputation to Lord Rosebery too, so that the Bill is, defective though it be as a settlement of the liquor difficulty, "fluttering the Volscians in their camp." 3rd, From the leading temperance organizations in Scotland, the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association with its deliverance, then the Grand Lodge of Scotland, and lastly, the Scottish Temperance League and others. All these condemn it in more or less qualified terms. 4th, Then the idea of having a national declaration to Parliament apart from any Association originated in Edinburgh, and has been largely taken up. It is as follows:—"Declaration of Scottish Parliamentary Electors anent proposed Temperance Legislation for Scotland. We, the undersigned Parliamentary electors in Scotland, hereby declare that no legislative measure affecting the liquor traffic can be approved or accepted by us which would give power to grant or renew licenses for a longer period than one year; which would give power to levy a public tax for the purpose of providing compensation to the liquor sellers and the proprietors of licensed premises; or which refuses to confer upon a majority of the ratepayers the full legal power to prohibit the drink traffic in their respective localities." It will, we hope, be largely signed throughout the country, and it will be a significant proof of the national conviction and the national desire on the suppressive veto of all traffic in Scotland in alcoholic liquors. Mr. S. Williamson, M.P. for St. Andrews district of burghs, says—"Although his name is on the back of the Bill this endorsement is simply meant to guarantee the bona fides of his Lordship's effort to grapple with a difficult question." He does not approve of all its clauses—several of these he believes are defective. He thinks the Bill may serve a useful purpose by affording a basis for discussion in the country, but more than this he does not expect from its introduction. The Christian Reader says—It is pretty evident that Mr. Williamson has here hit the mark.

A COOKERY EXHIBIT.—On Wednesday, the 19th ult., we visited one of the most interesting little exhibits it has been ever our pleasure to see. The Glasgow Abstainers' Union have been for years engaging, through their Bible-women, the attention of those among whom they labour to the improvement of their cookery. In this phase of their efforts they have met with encouraging success, and to stimulate a wider attention to this essential feature of a happy home they announced a competition in household cookery on the part of the wives and daughters of working men. On the date above-named we went to see the result, and unfeigned admiration at its success filled our breasts. The City Hall Saloon was elegantly arranged—plants and shrubs making, with the snowy tablecloths, and the tasteful array of dishes and foods, a most inviting display. Tables were placed round the Saloon, and in the middle of the floor, affording ample room and verge enough for visitors. On the south table there was a most interesting variety of scones, and on the east table this exhibit was continued for two-thirds of its whole length. On the whole the variety and preparation of these is highly creditable to the bakers; then we had on the same table, preparation of corn-flour for invalids; and a better answer to the questioning wonder of what the poor sick do when unwell could not be given than let them have a few dishes like what we saw, and they will be "in clover." On the north table we had puddings, rhubarb, scrap and rice, the prize puddings being "dainty dishes to place before a king." On the west table, heated by gas, we had porridge, soups, mince, liver, etc., all hot, hot, hot. On the long centre table we had outcake in an immense variety of manufacture, and on nine kitchen tables, placed east and west, a set dinner for the working man. This to us was the great sight of the day, for we have been so often told of the utter want of ability to cook, to make market, to, in fact, discharge the duties of a housewife, on the part of a working man's wife that we had come to believe that they would shrink from showing off in such a competition. Ah, if we had had their detractors alongside on that day we should have "reddened their faces" for them by showing them over this delightful cookery exhibit; and we would have asked them to apologise to Sarah Nicol, Calton, who is a prize-taker in three departments, and the first prize-woman for the workman's dinner; and also to the other deserving women who contended for the honours of housewifery. There were 110 entries, and 17 first prizes of £1, 17 second of 10s., and 17 third of 5s. The judges were ladies from the West End, Pollokshields, Crosshill, and Dennistoun, and deserve no small amount of credit, for they seemed to please by their findings not only the visitors, but even the competitors themselves. During the day the inclement weather diminished the number of visitors, but during the evening the working classes and their sympathisers mustered in force. Altogether, the Glasgow Abstainers' Union ought to be greatly encouraged by this, their first attempt to popularize an interest in working class cookery, and we hope that they will soon score another success on the same lines. "Robin Goodfellow" has promised to draw attention to this matter next month.

A polite scoundrel is brought up before the police court. Just as the presiding magistrate is to begin his questioning, the prisoner says affably to the policeman, "Wears his years well, the judge does,—doesn't look a day older than he did when we were introduced to each other ten years ago."

FASHION'S FAULTS.—Near Prospect Street she dropped a little red bow with a golden pin attached, and it fluttered to the edge of the sidewalk. She stopped and looked at it. It might as well have fluttered to the edge of the universe and dropped over for anything that she could do to get it. She walked around it two or three times, gazed sadly at it, and then walked a block to Bolivar Street, got a small boy and paid him 10 cents to come back and pick up that bow. As the boy rejoined his companions he remarked—"Darned if I ever seen a woman so proud. She wouldn't pick up her own things from the sidewalk." But it wasn't pride.—Cleveland Herald.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Dioghlucean 'S na h-Achaidh, le Seoras Beuton. Edinburgh: Maclachlan and Stewart, 1881. This is a thoroughly praiseworthy effort to record and preserve a phase of spiritual life and experience almost peculiar to the Scottish Highlands. The book is unique in Gaelic literature. It is a pity the author did not give us the names of the speakers instead of initials. We hope that in a second edition he will do so. We cordially commend his little book to our Gaelic readers.

The Foster Brother's Story, with other Tales and Sketches.—By James Yeames. With illustrations. London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. Price, one shilling. We are glad to meet again with Mr. Yeames in the character of a story teller. He can wear it so gracefully. His Foster Brother is well done, and is most pleasantly told. The foster brother is jealous for the honour of his high-born brother, and seeing him evidently bent on the ruin of a country girl, sets off to save the maiden and restore the erring man to his father. The plot is skilfully carried on, and we get quite enlisted in sympathy with the foster brother's determination, and so will our readers. Dollie and Dottie is a little gem of a tale, reminding one of Dickens' Christmas Stories. The others—Mother and Sister, The Little Cripple, and How the Sailor won his Bride—are full of interest. We shall be glad to see Mr. Yeames taking a longer and higher flight. His Foster Brother will make others as well as us desire a novel from his skilful hand. The illustrations are capital in conception and execution, and altogether the volume should find a host of admiring readers.

Forty-fourth Annual Report of the Dundee Temperance Society, 1881-82. Dundee: 19 High Street. This report is as may be expected an elaborate document crowded with the events of a year's vigorous work. The Blue Ribbon agitation, which secured the pledges of 36,000 persons—meetings, conferences, public prayer and mission, are all briefly referred to, legislative and literary effort has received much attention, and the agent's report is a meritorious document. The income is £169 6s. 4d., leaving a small balance of £3 17s. 3d. in the treasurer's hand. We heartily congratulate the committee on the progress of their work.

Home: its Duties and Privileges. A New Year's Address. By Rev. Archie M'Kinlay, Belfast. Belfast: W. E. Mayne, 1 Donegal Square. We don't know why this little book should be called a new year's address, unless because it was published at that time. It is such an admirable book for home that we don't know when it would be out of season. We certainly would include it in a little knot of books with which we would furnish every new home. Full of grave counsel pressed home with vigorous emphasis, it is worthy of the careful perusal and practical application of all who would increase the training power and consequent joy and gladness of our homes.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE COUNCILLOR W. BROWN, GLASGOW.—It is our melancholy duty to record the death of this widely-known and highly-esteemed citizen of Glasgow, who was cut off somewhat suddenly, on Saturday 15th ult., in his 74th year. He was seized while in his counting-room, on the Wednesday previous, and succumbed in a few days' illness to pleurisy. He was an eminent example of a successful Glasgow merchant, having left his native town, Paisley, long ago, and started in business in Glasgow along with his friend the late Mr. Thomas Downes. The well-known firm extended and expanded into a large and flourishing concern, and to its special object added paper manufacturing at Overton, Greenock, and Dalmarnock, Glasgow. Councillor Brown gave twelve years' service, at different times, to the Town Council, and at the time of his death was one of the representatives of the first ward. He was an office-bearer in his brother's church—Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown,—an active philanthropist, taking a special interest in the blind, and in every good work. He was a subscriber to the funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, although inclined at times to remonstrate against the attitude maintained in the suppression of the liquor traffic. His somewhat lithe, tall presence, silvered hair, and mild, thoughtful face, will be known no more; but in him a worthy man has passed away, regretted by a large circle of sorrowing friends.

SHOULD THE TRAFFIC IN ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS TO BE PROHIBITED?

II.

3. Insanity—one half of which is caused by excessive drinking. Lord Shaftesbury, after having acted as a Commissioner of Lunacy for 20 years, and as chairman of the Commission for 16 years, informs us that "six-tenths of all the cases of insanity to be found in these realms and in America arise from no other cause than from the habits of intemperance in which the people have indulged." It has been ascertained that "insanity in every country corresponds in the main to the use of intoxicating drinks." Some years since there was in the State of Cairo 1 lunatic in every 30,714 of the population, in a portion of Normandy 1 in 700, in Sweden 1 in 710, and in Ireland 1 in 500. In the first instance cited abstinence from intoxicating liquors is an article of religion with the inhabitants, whilst in the other cases the alcohol consumed per head averaged 5, 5, and 3 gallons respectively.

4. Crime. Drinking facilities gauge crime. Take Ireland for instance at two different points of its history, viz., 7 years prior to 1839 and other 7 prior to 1845. Within the former period, when there were distilled 7,100,000 gallons with much illicit distillation, convictions for assaults stood at 26,000; in the latter, with a reduced distillation of 4,500,000 gallons, the number of convictions only amounted to 13,000. Under this division a great deal might be said. It is, however, I think unnecessary to pursue it very far, as we must all more or less have considerable acquaintance with the connection between the liquor traffic and its offspring crime. Judges are constantly reminding us that were it not for this most iniquitous traffic their office would be a sinecure and so on. There is just one other point I would remind your readers of here, and that is the connection between intemperance and immorality. The two are to a great extent inseparable. I need not enlarge on this important phase of the question; the mere suggestion will call to your recollection all the evils flowing from that strong undercurrent of immorality which permeates society, enervating the nation, and breaking up the domestic peace and happiness of thousands. This is an evil which has existed from the earliest times, and which probably will exist so long as the world lasts. It cannot be rooted out, but it might be lessened; yes, I hold that it might be reduced to one fourth of its present magnitude. There is, however, only one way of doing so, and that is by the abolition of the liquor traffic.

Let us now consider the liquor traffic from its commercial point of view. In 1878 the amount spent on drink was £142,188,900. The grain destroyed would have produced 12,000,000 4lb. loaves, a sufficient quantity to have maintained the entire population of the United Kingdom for four months.

Much better, not perhaps for the farmer, but for the nation, that the corn should rot in the field than that it should be devoted to the manufacture of what has been aptly termed the devil in solution. Suppose a man neglects a corn crop value £100 until it is utterly useless, the consequence is that man is £100 poorer than he might have been; instead of doing this, however, had he sold the corn to a distiller or brewer, and afterwards repurchased it in its new form at a price say of £500, he is infinitely worse than he was before. And this is what is being done every day—men, instead of spending money as it ought to be spent, viz, on goods for their own support or happiness, or in utensils for the tillage of their ground, or some kindred purpose, throw it away on drink, by which means they make themselves more liable to the attacks of disease; in many cases it causes them to neglect their work one day in the week, which means no inconsiderable loss to the nation, besides which, as we have already seen, it reduces the producing power of the country by premature death, disease, and pauperism, and still farther by necessitating the maintenance of a police force between 30,000 and 40,000 strong. Again, if the vast capital now locked up in the traffic was let loose on the development of commerce of a rightful nature, it would, by increasing the demand for labour to an enormous extent remove totally a class of whom we have of late heard so much, viz., the unemployed. For instance, take the Caledonian Distillery Co. in Edinburgh. Not long ago they had a turn-over of £1,500,000 and employed 150 men. Now suppose this money was spent on cotton goods, cutlery, or furniture, it would give employment to 8,000 or 10,000 men. We can get an idea of the benefits which would flow from a commercial point of view from the abolition of the traffic by comparing Ireland when the distilleries were in full swing with that period when they were stopped. Dr. Lees says, "On reference to the table of imports into Ireland, and a comparison of the years of the stoppage of the distilleries and the consequent comparative sobriety of the nation with the years when they were in full activity, destroying food and demoralizing the nation, we arrive at the startling anomaly that a year of scarcity with prohibition is better than a year of plenty without it."

Now let us consider what would be the beneficial results of the abolition of the traffic commercially and socially. It would, as I have said, incalculably further the development of trade in the country by unlocking the enormous capital now withheld. It would enable men to work steadily six days in the week, thereby increasing the productive power of the country on an average one-sixth. It would add further to this power by greatly reducing the 1,250,000 of paupers mainly made by the traffic whom we have now to support, and by permitting the reduction of the police force and customs and excise establishments. Socially considered the advantages would be innumerable. We can only specify a few of them. The abolition of the traffic would add greatly to the comfort of the poorer classes as a whole by the larger wages which a more prosperous trade would insure, while the houses of that portion now desolated by drink would soon become worthy of the name, and millions now sunk in poverty and vice would through time be raised to a degree of comfort and prosperity equal to their peers. The vitality of the nation would be enhanced to a very great extent. Immorality and crime would dwindle down to insignificance on the removal of that which, by kindling the passions, engenders both, and sinks mankind to a condition of bestiality which has no parallel amongst the lower animals.

From the sketch given of the history of legislation bearing on the subject, I think it will be agreed that all that can be done in the way of restriction to remedy the state of affairs we so much deplore has been tried and has utterly failed to accomplish the ends in view. We can look for no satisfactory results from further legislation, until it is directed to the root of the evil, in prohibiting entirely the brewing and distilling of home liquors and the importation of foreign wines and spirits. If we are agreed with Bentham that "the sole object of Government ought to be the greatest happiness of the greatest possible number of the community," in the face of facts so well known of which I have here given a few, no one surely could object to a step which must prove decisive on the old pretext of its interfering with the liberty of the subject; and a nation that willingly lost a loan of £20,000,000 for the emancipation of the slaves, could not object to amply compensate those engaged in the liquor traffic, thereby emancipating in as true a sense of the word millions of their fellow-men. In order to show your readers that this idea of abolition is by no means utopian, allow me briefly to specify a few instances in which it is now more or less in force. In 1877 there were in Scotland 151 parishes without a public house, one of which contained a population of 5,880. In 1869 there were in the province of Canterbury 1,400 parishes in the same condition. We have self-imposed prohibition in a portion of Tyrone County, Ireland, inhabited by nearly 10,000 people. In Bessbrook, a factory town in Ireland of 3,000 inhabitants, we have it also, and there, we are told, "there is no quarrelling, no theft, no crime, no infanticide, in short the operatives are models of sobriety and good order." Saltaire is in the same condition. Prohibition is in force in Norfolk Island, and of it the Daily Telegraph, although no friend of the measure, speaks in the most laudatory terms. Referring to the inhabitants it says, "They live in a state of innocence, the golden age brought back. They have no taxes, no police, no courts of law. Their condition is enough to tempt gentlemen with fixed incomes to remove to an island where collectors cease from troubling, and householders are at rest." In America we have many instances, such as the State of Maine; there, however, things are not in such a satisfactory condition as they might be, owing to the fact of the States' laws being antagonistic to the measure, that is to say, while Maine prohibits, the Union sanctions and grants licenses. The State can and does prevent the manufacture of liquor, but it cannot prevent importation. Notwithstanding this anomaly, however, public opinion is so far advanced that in this particular instance a more satisfactory state of affairs need hardly be desired.

In conclusion I shall give your readers a brief sketch of Vineland as an example of what prohibition can do. Vineland is a district in the State of New Jersey covering 50 square miles. This tract of land was purchased by Mr. Landis in 1861 with a view to colonization. Similar attempts had been made before in the district, however, without success. Mr. Landis, a shrewd lawyer, although not an advocate of temperance principles, seeing in alcohol the cause of previous failure, determined to prevent its introduction into the new colony. The way he went about it was this—he would point out to those who wanted to purchase land from him the evils which would certainly accrue from the introduction of public houses. On having the matter placed before them in the clear and business-like way which the proprietor adopted, they, without exception, willingly pledged themselves to aid him to their utmost in preventing the sale of liquors in their midst. By-and-bye a liquor seller came from Michigan and commenced the sale of porter and ale. A public meeting was called, and the result was that the stranger departed by the first train next morning, in consequence of advice he received, and in order to avoid the humiliation of a public ejection. For the purpose of preventing such occurrences in the future, a law of a prohibitory nature was passed. Vineland is a success, having surpassed the expectations of the sanguine proprietor. The population, originally consisting of four families, had increased in 1874 to 11,000 individuals. Police taxes and poor-rates are almost nominal. Commerce flourishes, and health, wealth, and happiness reign supreme.

I have endeavoured to show that the traffic in alcoholic liquors acts as a drag on Great Britain, preventing that moral and commercial improvement which alone could enable it to maintain the distinguished position it has so long held amongst the nations of the world. I have shown how restriction in the multitudinous forms in which it has been tried has miserably failed in the accomplishment of the end in view, and in closing I would just remind your readers that the evils already referred to are as rampant as they ever were, and this notwithstanding all the restriction now bearing down on the traffic which gives them birth, and the fact, too, that the traffic is at this present time in the hands of men than whom as a class there are none more respectable engaged in any other branch of commerce. I have no doubt that most of those engaged in the trade agree with the philanthropic brewer Sir F. F. Buxton, in deploring the evils of which we complain; but I trust there are some who, recognizing alcohol as the fountainhead of these evils, are willing to go even further, and sinking personal interest before the claims of humanity give all their support to the suppression of the liquor traffic.

J. R. DALRYMPLE.

THE WORKING MAN'S BILL OF FARE.

WHEN that aspiring gentleman Claude Melnotte got stung to the quick by the rejection of his poetical offering to the Beauty of Lyons, he passionately apostrophised his order in the well-known words, "Oh that we—we, the hewers of wood and drawers of water—were swept away, that the rich might know what the world would be without us." It can't be done. The working classes, happily for those above them, won't go; so the rich are spared the agony and indignity of helping themselves. But they know that the working classes feel the inevitable and irksome drudgery of their lot, and that they only want an opportunity of being free to avail themselves of it, and these rich people are so sensible as to believe that this freedom would be a calamity to them. Hence their pervading interest in many schemes that affect the wellbeing of the working classes, and their generous support to many movements maintained to render their condition less miserable. In passing, we may add that there are many, though their name may not be legion, who heartily sympathise with the working man because he is a man and a brother. They seek to soften the rigour of his toil, to enlighten his mind, rebuke his intemperance, restrain his improvidence, and substitute the living principles of the gospel for the irreligion that adds so directly to his folly and subtracts so largely from the sum of his happiness. The first, from fear, interest themselves; the second, inspired by benevolence, are his truest friends. Whether through fear or affection, much is attempted and much is done for the working man. Not so long ago his patrons thought they did their duty by providing abundance of gross pleasures for him—sports, races, prize fights, dog fights, and the means of intemperate excess; but now this questionable kind of beneficence has been abandoned, and, in hearty alliance, the purse-proud, ostentatious giver and the sound-hearted philanthropist may lay no inconsiderable claim to be the benefactors of the working man.

There is a fundamental difference, however, in the way in which this beneficence presents itself. The one class seek, by dealing with the circumstances that surround him, to elevate the object of their efforts in the scale of being; the other, by dealing with the man himself, endeavour to render him superior to the vicissitudes and chances of his lot. The first have won many a triumph on account of their schemes for the improvement of the dwellings of the working class, for public parks, for museums, public-houses without the drink, and cocoa shops. The latter class may as proudly point to their efforts at day and Sabbath school instruction, at mechanics' institutes, public libraries, schools of art, popular lectures, public baths, and penny and savings banks. Both have their supporters; both deserve praise; for whether we affect a man directly by enlarging his capacities for improvement, or indirectly through his circumstances, we cannot fail to make an indifferent man good and a good man better.

The Glasgow Abstiners' Union deals directly with the man. They get up high-class concerts and charm him by the vocal and instrumental efforts of the chief artists of the present day; they provide him a refuge by their public-houses; they improve his nature by their social reforms; and they point out to him the folly of sin and the wisdom of preparation for meeting the solemn realities of another world. To those afflicted by loss of health or vigour, they offer a short sojourn at "the coast"; so that altogether this Union presents as substantial benefits to the working people, male and female, as are within their reach.

But we are to restrict ourselves to one phase of the Union's efforts, and that is its cookery classes. Through its mission agencies among the poor, it has doubtless been made acquainted with the sadly defective condition of the means of food-preparation. There is nothing half so deplorable in its results as the want of a knowledge of cookery among the poor. Many a pretty girl enters thoughtlessly into the marriage state as little fitted for its varied duties as the ring on her finger that symbolizes her entrance. She looks upon the exactions of her new state at first with a smile, next with bewilderment, and alas, too often with disgust. She at length lets things drift until she sinks into the condition of a sloven, without the knowledge and without the hope of doing better. A small number, startled by the frightful disorganization around them, make a bold and determined effort to be free. In the struggle they break down, and becoming thoroughly discouraged they yield to what they deem their fate, relinquishing all desire to better their unhappy state. Only a few of themselves ever emerge out of the household chaos, and, moved by their own sad experience, and their affection for their daughters, begin to train them for a life far different from that which marked so many of the years of their own married life. We believe that it is not to be denied that the best housewife is she who has had the benefit of the intelligence, the sound sense, the wide experience, and the careful training of a good mother. This may be fully admitted without allowing it in any degree to justify those not so trained from resting in the deplorable condition of a wife at once senseless, shiftless, and handless. These unhappy women may hardly hope to reach the excellence of the housewife trained from her youth, but they yet may become so expert in their household duties as to merit all the praise a worthy husband is willing to bestow. Now, the Abstiners' Union steps in to enable such an unhappy woman to improve her position, and to prevent the young untaught girl from meeting with a married experience so dire. The difficulties which beset their cookery scheme on its first appearance were enough to discourage a saint, but their resolution was greater than the obstructions which met it, and their perseverance was followed by an amount of success known only to those whose duty it was to conduct the cookery lessons. The Directors felt, however, that the scheme would not answer their purpose by being known only to those benefited; it required the breeze of popular interest and applause to give an impetus to the scheme. Hence their resolution to have the cookery exhibit which was lately so successful. The chief interest at that exhibit centred in the display of workmen's dinners, nine women (unmarried and married) competing for the coveted prizes. Each of the friendly rivals merely provided one dinner, but drew up a bill of fare for other six days, thus actually giving one whole week's dinners with an actual specimen of what they were able to serve. The Directors have from the nine dinner schemes drafted a bill of fare of their own for general circulation among the poor; and many a good-hearted, ignorant, well-meaning housewife will be found turning it to good account. We give it entire:—

BILL OF FARE

For seven days' dinners, suitable for a family of six, with a change each day, and cost of same.

No. 1.—Pie, Potatoes, and Pudding.

Pot or Sea Pie.— $\frac{3}{4}$  lb. scrap meat,  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d.; onion, carrot, turnip, 1d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. flour, 1d.; 2 oz. suet, 1d.; salt, pepper, baking powder,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—8d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  stone potatoes, 3d.

Pudding.— $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. rice,  $\frac{3}{4}$ d.;  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lb. rhubarb,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.;  $\frac{3}{4}$  lb. sugar,  $1\frac{1}{4}$ d.— $3\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Total cost, 1s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

No. 2.—Harricot Bean Soup, Potatoe Pie, Pudding.

Soup.—1 lb. beans,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.; onion, carrot, parsley,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.—3d.

Pie.— $\frac{1}{2}$  stone potatoes,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 2 oz. tapioca,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 2 oz. dripping, 1d.; onions,  $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; 1 lb. flour, 2d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. dripping, 2d.; baking powder, salt, pepper, and sage,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—8d.

Pudding.— $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. hominy, 1d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. treacle,  $\frac{3}{4}$ d.— $1\frac{3}{4}$ d.

Total cost, 1s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

No. 3.—Pie, Potatoes, and Pudding.

Pie.— $\frac{3}{4}$  lb. scrap meat,  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. liver, 1d.;  $\frac{3}{4}$  lb. flour,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 3 oz. dripping,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.; onion, baking powder, salt, pepper,  $\frac{3}{4}$ d.—9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  stone potatoes, 3d.

Pudding, 2 lb. rhubarb, 2d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. sugar,  $1\frac{1}{4}$ d.— $3\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Total cost, 1s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

No. 4.—Broth, Beef, and Potatoes.

Broth.—1 lb. beef, 8d.;  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. barley, 1d.; cabbage, leeks, carrot, turnip, parsley, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Potatoes.— $\frac{1}{2}$  stone potatoes, 3d.; pepper and salt,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Total cost, 1s. 2d.

No. 5.—Lentil Soup, Stewed Mutton, and Potatoes.

Soup.—1 lb. lentils, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 2 oz. barley meal,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; onions, turnip, carrot, and celery, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—3d.

Stewed Mutton.— $\frac{3}{4}$  lb. flank mutton, 6d.; onions, carrots, turnips, 1d.; flour, salt, and pepper,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Potatoes.— $\frac{1}{2}$  stone, 3d.

Total cost, 1s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

No. 6.—Fish, Potatoes, and Pudding.

Fish.—2 lbs. fish, 5d.; 2 oz. dripping, 1d.; pepper, salt, bread crumbs,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Potatoes.— $\frac{1}{2}$  stone, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Pudding.—1 lb. flour, 2d.;  $\frac{1}{4}$  lb. suet, 2d.;  $\frac{1}{4}$  lb. currants, 1d.; sugar, baking powder, and rice, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Total cost, 1s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

No. 7.—Pea Soup, Potatoes, and Scrap Bread Pudding.

Pea Soup.—1 lb. split peas, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 1 lb. bacon, 6d.; leeks, celery, parsnip, carrot, turnip, spearmint, pepper, and salt, 2d.—9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Potatoes.— $\frac{1}{2}$  stone 3d.; cabbage, 1d.—4d.

Scrap Bread Pudding.—Scrap bread,  $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; skim milk,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; sugar,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; currants and nutmeg,  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.—2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Total cost, 1s. 4d.

Prices may vary a little in different localities and at different seasons.

A set of dinners at cheaper rates might be quoted, but it is thought the above will best serve the purpose intended, which is not economy alone, but also the providing of wholesome and substantial dinners, at a cost suited to small incomes.

This bill of fare may be objected to on several grounds. First, many a working man's wife will ask how she could be expected to expend 8s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a week on dinners, and feed, clothe, and shelter six on 30s. a week. This is a very common form of an objection to all suggestions for the improvement of the household cookery, not merely of the working man, but even of his master and others similarly favoured by fortune. It by no means follows that those for whom this table is prepared are not to exercise their own judgment or the power of adaptation. This dinner scheme is merely a rough and ready scheme, capable of being adjusted to meet the varying circumstances of those to whom it is submitted. One with less than a husband and four children can have less quantity and better quality, while another, with husband and as many children as Mrs. Ginx, may shape a savoury meal by its friendly hints. We think that in the mind of a sensible woman this objection may easily be obviated. Another objection presents itself, founded upon the cost. Some of the women will assuredly firmly deny the possibility of buying some of the items at the cost set down. Well, perhaps it may be that in a working class quarter and in working class shops the articles may be readily supplied at the prices named. If they are clean and wholesome, it will be to the greater praise of the guidwife that she can, by her care and skill, make a savoury and grateful mess out of what may be thought inferior materials. She who can "make old things look almost as good as new" will surely not fail here. It is in this very matter that a comparison between British and French women, not always to the advantage of the former, is often made. What, then, avails her skill if she cannot show that dishes formed of second-rate ingredients are not superior to first-class ones spoiled in the cooking? But another answer may be given—that is, that working men's wives should learn to purchase their food at wholesale rates. In this way they might easily possess themselves of the finest qualities of food materials at prices little if any above what they pay for inferior goods to merchants with whom they have a pass book. There is still another objection to this bill of fare, and that is that there are many articles which they, or some one or other of the household, don't like. Well, first, if we are bent on pleasing the palate rather than satisfying the stomach, this may be true, but it shows that we have spoiled our appetite by dainty, costly, and inappropriate feeding; and if homely food, skilfully prepared, combined with a little resolution for the change, will not win us back to the simple desires of nature, we must not blame the cook. Nature is easily satisfied, and the man who has obeyed her will gratefully enjoy the little he needs all the more that it owes much to the proficient hand of his careful wife. Second, again we reiterate that the bill of fare is not absolute as to what one is to eat any more than it is as to what it will cost. The housewife can replace the item to which she or her household may be averse by something equally moderate in price, but more agreeable. There are those who have devoted years of observation to this matter who tell us that six hundred different dishes can be prepared from the animal and vegetable worlds. Yet out of that immense variety, provided by a bountiful Maker, only two classes of food are found—the flesh-formers and the heat-givers. When we find so many kinds, which can be largely increased by skilful combination, it is a waste of time to urge an objection on account of the exact items in the bill of fare.

But our space is exhausted. We may in your next issue contrast it with another bill of fare, based on the teachings of the Bread Reform Society.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

A GIGANTIC ALCOHOLIC FACTORY.

How often have good but ignorant men pleaded for liberty to "liquor up" on the ground that the alcoholic drugs they eagerly, insanely desired was a good creature of God. Their foolish hearts were darkened by the veil of appetite, and they could not, or would not try whether the liquors that were stealing away their brains were, indeed, bad creatures of man's invention. Any one that has doubt of the earthly origin of the liquor has only to read for himself what we transcribe and condense about the Allsop ale from our cotemporary the National Trade Guardian.

Situated in the very bosom of the valley of the Trent stands the ancient and well-known town of Burton. Take away its breweries, and Burton at once subsides into the quietest and most unpretending of country towns; with them it becomes the centre round which the brewing world revolves. As the English are the best brewers in the world, so true it is that the best pale ale England produces is made at Burton. The secret of its waters being specially adapted for brewing was first discovered by some monks of Wetmore. It is evident from this that teetotal ideas met with no encouragement from the mediæval church. The modern advance of the trade towards its present colossal proportions dates from 1825.

The water for brewing is obtained from enormous wells yielding a never-failing supply. The property that commends them consists of sulphite of lime and is derived from the gypsous deposits contained in the keuper marls of the district. The water contains nearly 19 grains of sulphate and 15 grains of carbonate of lime to the imperial gallon, besides sulphate of potassa and magnesia, while the freedom from organic matter is very advantageous to the brewer. These wells have a depth of 40 feet on an average, but one well has a depth of 120 feet. Six wells are 20 feet in diameter, one is 46 feet in diameter, the others are on the American or tube principle. There are 11 of them and they yield 100,000 gallons an hour. The new brewery covers a space of 50 acres and was built in 1862. The firm have four great malting establishments—Burton, Shobnall, Beccles, and Grantham, and ten small places at Burton, but they have also to buy malt from firms of repute. One of the secrets of good beer is the using of good materials in brewing it, and the firm spare no expense in providing their brewers with the best hops and the best malt that money can procure. No matter what the fluctuation of the market, nothing but first-class materials are allowed to be received into the brewery, cost in such matters being quite a secondary consideration to maintaining the high credit which the firm enjoys for the production of one uniform quality of ale. Malt is simply barley steeped and dried. The barley first screened and dressed is steeped for three days in water and then spread out upon a floor of the malt-house to germinate, and when it has sprouted to a certain length is transferred from the floor to the kiln and dried. In the process of drying the radicles or sprouts are broken off and the grain resumes its ordinary appearance. In the process of malting the starch contained in the barley is transformed to soluble gum and sugar, which is extracted in the process of brewing. The firm use 200,000 qrs. per annum and 3,000,000 lbs. hops of the most delicate growths, the result being an unvarying and superior quality of ale. The malt after being again screened and sifted is crushed by powerful machinery at the rate of 200 bushels per hour per mill. There are eight enormous mash tuns, each capable of mashing 60 qrs. of malt in eight hours—the working capacity of these tuns is something like 3,400 qrs. per week. This is at the new brewery. At the old Brewery an additional 2500 qrs. per week are mashed, making a grand total of 5900 qrs. per week.

The process of mashing consists in mixing malt together with water heated to a temperature of from 150 to 180 degrees. Enormous coppers supply water at the rate of 1,000,000 gallons per week. The water carefully tempered and the malt flow into the mash tub together, and so delicate is the process that during its going on you must not speak to the brewer. They are thoroughly mixed together by machinery with rotating bearers in from 30 to 40 minutes. Then follows the sparging, that is dosing the mash with a shower of hot water. Afterwards it stands for 3 to 4 hours to take out all the saccharine matter. The liquid now named wort is run off into gigantic coppers where the wort is boiled with the hops in ten enormous vessels capable of boiling 90 barrels or 3250 gallons per copper. After due boiling the wort is run off into hopbacks, a large receptacle with a perforated or false bottom. Here the liquors drain from the hops and ascend by pipes to the coolers at the top of the building. These are shallow troughs, and in them the worts remain for about an hour and a-half when it is run over the refrigerator for final cooling. The hops are, after being pressed by hydraulic presses, sold as manure. There are twelve hydraulic presses used in this way. The wort leaves the refrigerators for the fermenting rounds below, of which there are 241. Of these 142 can ferment 12 barrels at a time, the remaining 99, 70 barrels, making a grand total of 9000 barrels. The principle involved in fermentation is the conversion of the saccharine matter in the wort into carbonic acid gas and alcohol, the fermentation being produced by the addition of yeast to the wort after it has been collected into the rounds. The process lasts on an average from 2½ to 3 days, the old ales taking a longer time than the mild and bitter descriptions. One of the principal features in connection with the Burton brewery is that the fermentation is not completed in the rounds. The wort is run into the casks in the "union" rooms, and over these casks there are wooden troughs and through "swan necks" or syphons the yeasts rises to these troughs. This process occupies from 4 to 7 days when the ale is racked off into the casks into which it goes forth to the world. Such is the destructive process of converting good barley into brain-maddening liquor, according to the National Trade Guardian.

PUBLIC PRESS.

A CLERGYMAN AMONG THE PUBLICANS.—It is nothing new to find a clergyman certifying that an individual is a fit and proper person to be entrusted with a license to sell intoxicating liquors. Indeed, that is a very common experience at all licensing courts. And when we find a clergyman replying at a publicans' banquet to the toast of "The Clergy of all denominations," which had just been drunk with a "hip, hip, hurrah!" we naturally expect something of the same kind. The Rev. D. Miller, M.A., minister of St. John's parish, Glasgow, distinguished himself in this direction last week. Mr. Miller was put forward not only as the representative of the Established Church but to reply for "all denominations," the clergy of which were conspicuous by their absence, and he is reported to have said that, "as a clergyman of twenty years' experience, he could safely say that his experience of those engaged in the trade was that their personal character and Christian liberality proved them to be at least equal to the rest of the public." We would not for one moment suggest that Mr. Miller's twenty years' ministerial experience must have been a very limited and peculiar one, because he has found the public generally with whom he is acquainted do not in these respects equal or surpass the publicans he knows; but we do say that the trade in which they are engaged is one which destroys the personal character, and hinders the Christian liberality of every one of the public who frequents their premises. The almost universal testimony of clergymen and city missionaries is that the drink trade is the greatest hindrance to the progress of Christianity. He said also that "so long as the trade was well conducted it was a legitimate one, and had a right to be let alone." He seems to have forgotten that it is the one trade which cannot be "let alone." Parliament has ever to be taking a special care of it, passing laws intended to "regulate" it; licensing courts, and other courts are constantly paying special attention to it, and yet it seems impossible to have it "well conducted." The articles dealt in are poisonous, and a terrible host of evils is entailed by their use. We have the testimony of the Prime Minister himself to the fact that they produce more evils in the community than war, pestilence, and famine. But like Balaam of old the Glasgow prophet disappointed his friends; only Mr. Miller had come to bless, and lo! he cursed them altogether. He said, "There are some people who would abolish this trade altogether, and I believe these people are entitled to have the right of their convictions. . . . If anything is to be done in the way of abolition, the only effective move would be to abolish the manufacture of the article." There can be no doubt that Mr. Miller's prescription would be as effective as the Yankee's cure for hydrophobia—viz., cutting off the dog's tail close behind his ears.—The Christian Leader.

Student under the examination. "What planets were known to the ancients?" Well, sir, there were Venus and Jupiter and—after a pause—the Earth, but I am not quite sure."

JUNE.

It is the leafy month of June, when flowers
Are thickly scattered over wood and lea;
Sweet rosy June, parent of golden hours,
When earth is full of love and melody.
By poets often sung, bright rosy June,
How sweet it is when hearts are young and strong
To wander gaily in the golden noon,
To roam in woods and vales the live day long.
Wild as a schoolboy on a holiday,
O'er the smooth grass to trip with merry feet,
To roam in gladness o'er the woodland way,
Or sit beside the laughing brooklet sweet,
While sunshine smiles on earth and sea and sky,
And nought but beauty meets the ear and eye.

THE FUNDS.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

JUNE, 1882.

\* "Notes on Lunacy," "Surface Work," our "Book Shelf," "Report on the Free Church Assembly," Poetry, and other interesting matter have been crushed out by our long Parliamentary report. These will receive attention next month.*

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

112 BATH STREET,
GLASGOW.

Last month we gave the results of the census taken of the customers of the public houses in Campbeltown. That return was slightly incorrect. From the revised return we present the following figures:—There are 34 public houses into which, on the 8th of April, there entered between the hours of 8 and 11 p.m. 1,910 men, 752 women, and 371 children—a total of 3,033. A curious feature of the census was the extent of the patronage bestowed: it ranged from 2 to 315 visitors. Five liquor shops had less than 25; seven, 50 and under; five, less than 75; six, less than 100; eight, less than 200; two had 206 and 297 respectively; while one only had 315 customers. Yet, supposing that these 3,033 customers only spent one shilling each on an average, and that is putting it at a low figure when some were drinking for Saturday, and some also providing for Sunday, no less than £151 13s. perished in the questionable liquor transactions of that night. It would be hardly possible to find a parallel to this miserable misexpenditure. Throwing the sum into the loch would be better, for not only is the money spent in liquor wasted, but in the process there may be many and grievous evils entailed upon the spenders which will exact, some time or other, an unsparing retribution.

MR. ANDREW BENNET.

We have the pleasure to announce that this gentleman has joined the agency staff of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. He comes highly recommended to the Executive. He has been an unwearied and disinterested worker in the cause of temperance and prohibition, and he appears likely to prove a decided acquisition to the Scottish prohibitory movement. His sphere of effort will lie in the south of Scotland, and his residence will meantime be in Dumfries. The committee of the Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union have signified their intention to afford him a cordial and vigorous support; and the leading friends in that district are prepared to offer him an encouraging welcome and efficient assistance. Under such very hopeful auspices Mr. Bennett has entered upon his labours, and we have every reason to believe that he will justify his appointment by his enthusiastic, intrepid, and devoted labours in the service of the association, and on behalf of the Scottish Permissive prohibitory agitation. As we go to press, we learn that he entered upon his duties on the 22nd ult., on the evening of which day he was cordially welcomed at a largely-attended social meeting in Dumfries, over which Dr. McCulloch presided, at which many ministers were present, and where Mr. Winning and Mr. R. Mackay represented the Executive.

The most energetic activity has been shown last month by the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association and its friends. The peculiar line of that activity has been open-air meetings, of which there has been an unusual number so early in the season. Many of the towns have awakened to the necessity of placing sound information on their demand for a special veto before the people. Mr. Waterston has been engaged with several of his constituencies where change, as in East Lothian, is desirable; in Kirkcaldy, where rumoured opposition is threatened; and in the Border Burghs, where a re-election was rendered necessary through the honour conferred on Mr. Trevelyan of the Chief Secretaryship of Ireland. There will be an electoral campaign at once in East Lothian, the Hon. Hugo Charteris, eldest son of Lord Elcho, aspiring to represent the Tories and the publicans, and Mr. Findlay, who is the Liberal candidate, who has very much to learn on our question, and who has a long way to come before he reaches our position. The feeling in the Kirkcaldy Burghs for the present appears to have subsided; and as all who know the cordial relations between Mr. Trevelyan and his constituents would have expected, that gentleman has been returned unopposed. Mr. Blackwood was in the far north on a lecturing tour. He traversed Ross-shire, Cromartyshire, Skye, Caithness-shire, Orkney, and Shetland, and was gratified with the amount and tone of the sentiment everywhere manifested. Mr. Stevenson has been labouring in the west of Scotland, where also Messrs. Dransfield and Kesson have been labouring. The demands on the Association for open-air lectures this season are so numerous as to threaten to absorb all the available open-air agency of the Association. The appointments for the present month largely exceed those of last year. Educate the people, and then you will have an intelligent vote, is the belief of the Association.

Scotland is being meantime honeycombed with the Blue Ribbon mission. Singularly enough the mission appears to go of itself. It is no ways indebted to organisation, but here, there, and everywhere, one might say, it is moving on more or less successfully. Some follow Mr. Noble; others—the greater portion—Mr. Murphy. The north-east and north are still the most ardent fields of the crusade. Forfar, Dundee, Montrose, Arbroath, Brechin, Stirling, and Perth, have been overtaken, and in these the impetus given by Mr. Murphy still continues. While we write, Aberdeen offers a striking manifestation of the power of that gentleman; nearly 12,000 having in the Granite City taken from him “the badge of blue.” Dunfermline, Kirkcaldy, Irvine, Paisley, Callander, and many other places, are all working away, being set in motion by impulses from the great mission centres. We are heartily glad to see this movement diffusing itself all over our country. Great good will, on the lowest calculation, result from it to the prohibitory cause. In the first place, many who join will remain faithful all their days, perhaps becoming themselves able and zealous reformers; in the second place, “outsiders” will soon perceive the immense benefits which flow from the multitude of abstentions in prosperous trade, in the increase of religious feeling, in the better attendance on religious duties, and in social and moral reform; and, in the third place, in the desire that these advantages should be rendered permanent by the suppressive veto over the liquor traffic. Let our friends assist it as much as lies in their power. It is extremely popular. Lord Mount-Temple, the Countess Dowager of Aberdeen, Canon Wilberforce, and the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, are all displaying its modest symbol; so that, if we add to its own intrinsic merits the element of popularity, we have, we believe, sufficiently commended it to the large-hearted sympathy and the earnest support of all who labour for temperance in the love of it, especially in the West of Scotland.

Since the Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill became a dropped order we have been asked to set forth, as briefly as we can, the idea of a Bill which we would like to see introduced into Parliament by a Scotch representative. There is nothing formidable in the task set before us. It seems to us so easy that although with diffidence we submit the following to our readers as to what should, in our opinion, fully meet all the necessities of the case. “That on any lawful day previous to the first of March in any year, the Provost or Sheriff, as the case may be, shall, on receipt of a requisition from not less than a tenth part of the registered electors of any burgh, parish, or district, in Scotland, making request for a poll to determine the continuance or discontinuance of the traffic in intoxicating liquors therein, appoint a poll to be held in said burgh, parish, or district, within seven clear days from the presentation of said requisition, when all electors duly qualified to vote at municipal or school board elections respectively, can vote on the question, ‘Shall the liquor traffic exist in said burgh, parish, or district?’ If those voting ‘no’ be a clear majority of those voting, then all traffic in intoxicating liquors therein shall cease on the 28th May next ensuing. If the majority vote ‘aye,’ then the question can only be raised by another requisition, but said requisition cannot be received by any Provost or Sheriff until an interval of two years has elapsed from the date of the presentation of the previous requisition.’ There in a nutshell is the suppressive or absolute veto or Scottish Permissive Bill. That bill or clause could be run with any bill or run alone. It clearly sets forth the simple plan we Scottish Permissive Prohibitionists have for the extermination of the liquor traffic, and we leave it to the careful consideration of our readers. They will, we hope, as vividly conceive as we have, the just, practical, and expedient measure which we would fain see embodied in legislation and applied by the people everywhere to the liquor traffic, that bane of our country, and the cause of the misery and suffering that makes so many of our people mourn.

In our sketch book will be found a short notice of Allsop's alcoholic factory. The buildings, the space occupied, the skill manifested, the capital devoted to the production of Allsop's ale are enormous. The money and plant may be measured by millions pounds sterling, and the “out-put” simply dwarfs calculation. One could dwell with rapture on the account of the water, the processes, and machinery, if he could put out of view the harrowing fact that he is reading of the stupendous manufacture of a pernicious and seductive poison which drives so many of those who consume it into madness, poverty, crime, and the grave. He is here being initiated into the mystery of “a glass of ale.” But he cannot shut his eyes to the after consequences of that glass of ale. It flows on through society, kindling the natures it touches into the flames of lust and hate, untruthfulness and impiety even, till they burn to the nethermost hell. And he shudders as he reads of a business so dangerous and deadly being permitted by a Christian state. The foundation of that glass of ale, for which Allsop is so famed, is good grain and good sugar. Look at the boast made that no expense is spared to get the best malt that money can procure; so that we sober people not only have to pay the burden entailed upon us by the law that forces the traffic in this drug upon us, but have to wait till the brewer and the distiller have had the first offer of the grain on which our lives depend. No matter what fluctuations there may be in the market, none but first-class food materials are destroyed to make Allsop's ale, cost being with him a secondary consideration. Well done, "Fool's" pence which procures the finest grain, transforms it into the poison that makes your earners lean, lazy, lustful, and loathsome, and leaves for their wives and their neighbours inferior grain for food. It is not merely waste, it is worse than waste, it is the turning of the greatest good of man, the God-sent grain, to the deadliest poison. What says the writer of that sketch? Listen. "The principle involved in fermentation is the conversion of the saccharine matter in the wort into carbonic acid and alcohol." The one, he might have said, the deadliest of gases, the other, the most mortal of poisons. Yet, in this enlightened age, to quote the glib remark on many a tongue, men are so much under the spell of appetite, habit, and custom, that the process and the poison have not only their apologists among the intelligent, and let us even say, the virtuous, but their commendators. This factory is only one of thousands all engaged in the privileged destruction of our grain. Men, like wisdom, cry aloud in the gate, warning the poison drinkers; they play to entice them from its use, they preach to them of its horrors, they lead their prayers to be delivered from its effects, they pledge them to abstinence from its use; but after all it is the few that are saved, the many that are injured beyond remedy. So long as the vast interest which is measured by millions of profit lies on the side of the poison maker, it is idle, it is foolish, it is wicked to hope for the end of his infamous business, unless the law is invoked to put forth its all-powerful arm and overwhelm that business with destruction.

We present a very full report of the discussion on Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill, in the House of Commons on the 10th of last month. That report, to any observant mind, is full of meaning as to the position of the movement in Scotland. Lord Campbell was evidently as much astonished at the result of the ascent of his pilot balloon as anyone could be, for it showed him that the current of popular opinion had set strongly in in favour of the suppressive veto. Nothing, therefore, he was able to offer in the way of restriction was worth the acceptance of the Scottish social and moral reformers. The discussion will do more than this, it will fix the attention of those that uphold prohibition on the weak points of the agitation. The Lord-Advocate touched one of the most glaring of them. He said that there was a want of a consensus of opinion in Scotland on the remedy required for the removal of the evils of the liquor traffic. Nothing could be more true, but nothing is easier of amendment. The advanced opinion now held, that that remedy must be applied by the people for the people, is the result of a vigorous, national education on the evils of the liquor traffic in affording facilities for the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors, and on the necessity for its exclusion from any locality affected by it by the vote of a majority of the owners and occupiers of property therein. But this vigorous education was not confined to teaching merely, it included the electoral canvass. People had not only pointed out to them the nature, extent, and consequences of the licensing system, but they were taught to see that to vote for license and not for suppression was political suicide, destroying by their vote what they had achieved by their agitation. At this time the licensing proposal of Lord Campbell came before the country. At first, it appeared in harmony with the spirit of the agitation. It gave every elector power to vote down all traffic, but it so hedged that power as to make its exercise impracticable, and this veto on a veto was fatal to the Bill. The discussion showed us how much more has still to be done. The education so vigorously carried on in the past must be maintained and increased. Scotland should be sown knee-deep in literature. The traffic must be completely exposed. The people must be roused to their danger from the evil, and their duty to abolish it; while it lives they have no immunity from its dire effects. Only in this way can the country become unanimous in its demand for protection from the fearful havoc inflicted upon the people by the drink traffic. Once unanimous, how long will their representatives exhibit such a diversity of opinion as was so painful to contemplate on the 10th ult. Their school is their candidature and the polling booth. Their education has not been so efficient on the whole as that of the country, hence many of them appeared as at once favourable to the principle that the ratepayers should have power over the existence of the drink traffic, and at the same time opposed to that principle in operation being wholly suppressive of the traffic. To expect a leader to lead a movement in Parliament for the Scottish Permissive Bill, when the representation is itself so divided, is to expect grapes from thistles, or harmony from discord. We must have the Scotch vote as unequivocal for suppression as it is for local option. How? By being true to our convictions on all occasions when the election of a Parliamentary representative is in progress, especially at the polling booth. Unanimous there on a candidate earnestly resolved to secure the settlement of our demand, the unanimity of the Scottish members of Parliament is certain to follow. It is not conceivable that in such eminently favourable circumstances a leader will not be forthcoming. Under far less favourable circumstances, a cause, not more noble than ours, has been championed to victory. But such a unanimity on the part of the country will be fatal to the continued inaction of the Government. It will be constrained to deal with the traffic; not by licensing boards, restrictive vetoes, or other equally questionable schemes, but by granting the people the absolute power and right of determining its existence for themselves. They will have to settle this question in this way if they would finally settle it, or they will be in real danger of wrecking their administration. A people united on the final redress of a great grievance cannot with impunity be trifled with by any Government. With the suppressive veto on the Statute Book, its adoption by the people is merely a matter of course. The fiery cross did not evoke more enthusiasm, call forth more speedily the choicest spirits of the time for offence or defence, nor more rapidly bring together a great army than will the Permissive veto summon the aid of good citizens to inaugurate its operations in the burghs, parishes, and districts of our country. The moving power to compel such glorious results is in the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory movement; but the conditions of its success must be complied with. These, we repeat, are the unanimity of social and moral reformers on the suppressive veto as the most just, practical, and feasible remedy for the evils of the licensing system; on the unanimity of the representatives they vote into Parliament; on the consequent introduction of the bill so supported; on a leader who will have their single aim to fight for; on the consequent vigorous action on the part of the Government and the triumphant passage of the veto. Let them heartily support the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association which is conducting the agitation on these lines; in order that morally and financially it may be able the more earnestly, if that were possible, more frequently, if that were possible, to direct and rivet the attention of the community on their objects and aims. There is no man nor body of men who can strike at the root of the great evil with which we war but legislation. That that legislation may be speedy, efficient, and invincible, let them enlist the pulpit, the press, the platform, and the polling booth on their side, ask God to bless their efforts, and then and then only will a great and a decisive success crown their unwearied labours.

THE OPIUM TRAFFIC—PAYMENT OF PENSIONS—THE BUDGET—CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL—THE MALT TAX—THE BUDGET—PROOF SPIRITS—SUNDAY CLOSING IN YORKSHIRE—SIR WILFRID LAWSON'S QUESTION—MR. GLADSTONE'S ANSWER—SIR WILFRID'S NOTICE OF RESOLUTION ON LOCAL OPTION—SPANISH WINE DUTIES—EXCLUDING SOLDIERS FROM PUBLIC HOUSES—IRISH PUBLICAN'S MISTAKE—OPIUM TRAFFIC—SPIRITS IN BOND BILL—LICENSING ACTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

APRIL 24.—Sir Charles Dilke, in reply to Mr. Puleston, said her Majesty's government had long been in communication with the Chinese government on the subject of the condition of the trade in opium between India and China. Negotiations upon that subject had been suspended in consequence of the receipt of a new proposal from the Chinese government which had to be considered here. Sir Thomas Wade's report on this matter was expected immediately.

Mr. Childers, replying to Mr. Gorst, said that the pensions due on 1st April had all been paid. The delay which arose through the Exchequer and the ending of the financial year, would not occur again. In reply to Mr. Puleston, he said that the reasons why pensions were sent out by post-office orders was that it was found that pensioners on getting payment personally spent much of their money in public houses.

Mr. Gladstone on rising to make his annual speech on the Budget was loudly cheered. Referring to the liquor traffic aspect of it, he said the differential charge arising from a readjustment of the foreign spirits was estimated to produce £180,000. It has produced that amount. The estimate I gave last year for the beer duty was £8,800,000, and this is the first complete year in which we had to deal with that duty. The levying of the duty has been perfectly satisfactory. The change has worked favourably and well in regard to the practice of private brewing. It has not extinguished the practice. The number of licenses taken out is very large; no less than £46,000 has been received from those licenses, the enormous majority of which is taken at 6s. a-piece, so that the Committee will see what a large number avail themselves of the practice. The estimate of the beer duty was taken rather high in deference to gentlemen connected with the trade. The estimate was for £8,800,000, the actual yield £8,580,000, that is £220,000 short of the estimate. If we compare the yield with the malt duty, which yielded £7,737,000, we seem to have gained £843,000. That comparison is entirely fallacious, for the harvest was bad and trade depressed, affording no proper comparison. Take the six years of malt duty, from 1873 to 1879, and the average is £8,672,000, so that the malt duty produced yearly on an average £92,000 more than we have got from the beer duty. Obviously, as I have admitted, we get nearly 2s. a-quarter on the beer duty as compared with the old malt duty, and as I have also shown that notwithstanding the increase of population our receipt from beer duty is less by £90,000 than the average receipt from the old malt duty in the prosperous years of 1873-1879. I represent a state of facts in which there must be a collapse somewhere. Is that collapse due to any alteration in the habits and practices of the people? (Hear, hear.) The Board of Inland Revenue officers, whom I consider to be good authorities on the subject, do not exclude that supposition, but they do not look to it as the main cause. They say that although employment in the country is general, yet wages have not yet reached the full average level, and undoubtedly have not reached anything like the level which they reached in the years of prosperity between 1873 and 1879. They also observe, and I have no doubt there is something in this, that last year in the cider counties there was a very great abundance of fruit, and a very large consumption of cider. Then comes another fact—the great increase of coffee-houses and clubs, which lead to the supposition that the more temperate habits of the people are at the root of this deficiency in the revenue. (Cheers.) I think the House will deem it quite worth their while to spend a few minutes in endeavouring to get as accurate information as we can upon this subject and to put ourselves in a position to estimate fairly the influences which are at work. We have a group of simultaneous facts, which, taken together, are very curious, and do not all run quite in the same direction. In the first place, there is a very decided decline of the drink revenues proper. I hope my hon. friend the member for Carlisle approves of the term I use. (Hear, hear.) It is something disparaging, and that I am sure will be agreeable to his feelings. (Laughter.) I have got here a statement of the revenue derived from spirits, wine, malt, and beer, with the attendant license duties and so forth at three separate periods. I have taken 1867-68, which was before the great rise in price; 1874-75, when that rise of price and wages was still on the whole in operation; and 1881-2, the last financial year. The entire revenue from these sources in 1867-68 was £23,001,000. In 1874-5 the revenue had sprung to £31,029,000. The total of these revenues fell from £31,029,000 to about £28,500,000, or roundly about one-eighth; but the duty on wine fell from £1,719,000 to £1,366,000, or by more than one-fifth. However, there is the fact that there is a great diminution, notwithstanding the large increase of population between 1867 and 1881,—an increase in the population which could not be less than 4,000,000 people. The gross revenue from these sources which had risen to £31,029,000 in 1874, fell by more than £2,500,000, with an increase of population between 1874-75 and 1881-82 of considerably over 2,000,000 people. It is also rather curious to take the proportion in which we have been dependent on this source of the revenue of the country, and in order to show that I have compared the liquor-taxation of the country, as I would call it, with the non-liquor taxation, I put on one side the taxation derived from alcoholic liquors and on the other side the taxes derived from all other sources except the income-tax. Taking the percentages on that basis, they stand as follow. In the six years from 1859 to 1865 we levied 37½ per cent. on our taxation from alcoholic liquors, and 62 from non-alcoholic sources. Since then came the reaction. I have carried you thus far down to the year 1879-80, when we may say that one-half our taxes came from alcoholic drinks and the other half from other sources. But during the last three years a reaction had begun. Alcohol had gone down to 47½ per cent. and non-alcohol had risen to 53 per cent. But then, you may say, "If this diminution of consumption is going on, and you have shown it to be so considerable, and if a main cause of this diminution is the foundation of those valuable and useful institutions known all over the country as coffee and cocoa houses, we ought to see a large increase of revenue, at least, from other sources." But that increase we do not find. That is a curious fact. I am not going to include tea, because tea, after all, is not much used in these public places. ("Yes.") The revenue derived in 1867-8 jointly—I will not give all the details—from chicory, cocoa, and coffee, was £523,000. The revenue derived from the same sources in 1874-5 had fallen to £310,000, but the joint yield of these three articles, which in 1874 was £310,000, was only £306,000 in 1881. When we turn to tea, the case is very different. There it is not in the cocoa houses, but the domestic use of tea that is advancing at such a rate that there you have a powerful champion able to encounter alcoholic drink in a fair field and to throw it in fair fight. The revenue on tea, which in 1867 was £3,350,000, had risen in 1874 to £3,875,000, and in 1881 to £4,200,000. The increase in the population during that period of fourteen years was 4,900,000. But there was no corresponding augmentation in the revenue from coffee and chicory. One other circumstance in connection with this state of facts and with the great diminution in alcoholic drinks I have ventured to lay before the committee; for certainly I do not hesitate to say that I think the committee will agree with me that we can trace the operation of this diminution in the use of alcoholic drinks precisely where we should wish to trace it—that is, in the augmented savings of the people. I look first to the old savings banks. In 1846 their deposits were 31½ millions. In 1861 they had risen to 41½ millions; in 1867, owing to the competition of the Post-office savings banks, which paid a considerably lower rate of interest, they had fallen to 36½ millions. Since that time they have been advancing, not rapidly, but steadily. In 1874 they were 41½ millions; in 1881 they were £44,175,000, showing an annual increment of about £350,000. The Post-office savings banks, as the committee are aware, were founded in 1861. They have advanced on the whole very steadily. Even the most unfavourable state of circumstances among the labouring classes has never done more than reduce, not inconsiderably, but still not vitally, not the amount of the deposits, but the yearly increment of the deposits. The ordinary increment of the deposits in the Post-office savings banks has been from £1,600,000 to £1,800,000. In the first decade the lowest amount for any year is £1,533,000, and the highest £1,926,000. The lowest year in the second decade was 1879, when there was great distress and want of employment; but even in that year the deposits were £1,600,000. In the highest of the prosperity years—1872—the savings were £2,293,000, but there is no doubt that the wages of the labouring classes are much lower at this moment than they were in 1872. And yet, though wages are much lower, the deposits in the Post-office savings banks have risen even higher than they were then. I reckon that I may take them thus. The deposits made there and remaining there are £2,449,000, nearly 2½ millions, and, besides that, we have invested for the depositors £750,000, so that the whole sum placed in our hands by depositors—although a portion has passed into the funds—for 1881-2, with a great diminution of means on the part of the labouring population, has risen to £3,189,000. (Hear, hear.) I think that shows that, whatever other effects this diminution of the duty on spirits is producing, it is clearly associated with the gradual extension of more saving habits among the people.

Mr. Wills said that to continue the fourpenny duty on tobacco would cause great inconvenience to the working classes. The high duty lowered the quality.

Mr. Chaplain admitted that the repeal of the malt duty was a great boon to farmers. It however enabled the brewer to use maize and rice with barley, to the deterioration of the quality of beer. It also depreciated the price of barley.

Mr. Arnold pointed out that there was one part of the Budget of 1880 which the right hon. gentleman had not reviewed. He referred to the increase in the spirit licences then imposed. At present, if a man occupied a house rated at £50 a year, he had to pay 50 per cent. for his licence. If his house was rated at £100, he paid 30 per cent.; if at £400 he paid 10 per cent.; and if at £1000, 6 per cent. Now, there could be no doubt that, in consequence of the extension of clubs, the trade of those licensed houses had largely diminished. That was a reason against the heavy increase in the spirit licenses, especially in the case of houses rated at from £50 to £150 a year.

Mr. A. Cross remarked that the increase of £800,000 from the change from the malt to the beer duty came out of the pockets of the wage-earning class, and was equivalent to an income-tax of 1d. per £.

Mr. Carbutt moved as an amendment to the Corrupt Practices Bill, that no bill would meet the wants of the country unless it had a clause in it providing that all public houses should be closed on the day of election. He did not intend to move that as a resolution, because he understood that if he carried it it would have the effect of throwing out the Attorney-General's bill. He did not wish to do so, but he hoped when the bill went into committee they should have an opportunity of discussing the necessity for introducing a clause to the effect he had indicated. Mr. E. Clarke said when the proposition to close public houses on election days came before the house he should oppose it. He thought the bill as it stood at present was unfair to the licensed victuallers, who would be attacked by that resolution. The Attorney-General said the closing of public houses on the polling day was matter for very grave consideration, and on which a great deal might be said on both sides. A great mass of corrupt practices took place in public houses. Not only corrupt treating, but the bribery that took place would be found to be taking place in the public houses, and he believed that if practically this measure could be carried with the closing of public houses on the polling day they should get rid of a vast amount of the corruption which took place. The argument was used that this would be pressing heavily on licensed victuallers and the trade. He did not think that would be the view that would be accepted by the respectable licensed victuallers who wished to conduct their business properly. He was not at all sure that when the matter came to be discussed it would not be found to be better for the publican that his house should be closed on the polling day.

25th April.—Mr. Chaplain gave notice that on the motion for the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill he should call attention to the fact that the repeal of the malt tax, by encouraging the use of rice, maize, and other articles, as substitutes for malt in brewing, had operated injuriously instead of beneficially to the interests of the farmer, and he should move a resolution the terms of which he should place on the paper.

Sir Wm. Barttelot (the budget being under discussion) said:—"With regard to the repeal of the malt tax the result of the right hon. gentleman's scheme had been to lower the price of barley."—[Mr. Gladstone—Hear, hear—(laughter).] Sir William, continuing—"It was true all the same, because the small brewers used other substances than barley for making beer. The hon. member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) wished that people would drink only water—(laughter)—but the people still liked their beer, and good beer. The malt tax had not been the boon which so many expected." Mr. Earp gave it as his opinion that the falling off in the price of barley was due to the depressed state of the brewing trade, and he had no doubt that with the recovery of that trade they would very soon see, not only a restitution of the old price of barley, but higher prices for the cereal. Mr. M'Iver remarked that so long as so large a revenue was derived from exciseable liquors, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whoever he was, would be under temptation to stimulate rather than discourage intemperance. Mr. Duckham attributed the fall of barley to a bad season and deficiency in quality. Mr. A. J. Balfour had no doubt the motive of the Prime Minister in abolishing the malt tax and substituting a duty on beer was to enable brewers to use other materials than barley. That being so, the price of barley must fall. The British farmer then was exposed to the double competition of foreign barley and foreign ingredients in the manufacture of beer. Mr. Caine observed that if the hon. baronet (Sir Wm. Barttelot) would study the statement of the Prime Minister with reference to the falling off of the revenue derived from alcoholic liquors he would find that the depression was caused by the great increase in society of those who, like himself, believed it was better to drink wholesome water than unwholesome beer. (Laughter.)

April 26.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice of his question to the Prime Minister on local option.

April 27.—On the motion of Mr. Boord, a return was ordered showing the number of gallons of proof spirits distilled in England, Scotland, Ireland, and the United Kingdom; the gallons delivered, duty paid, from distillers' stocks, and the gallons put into bond in the year ended 31st Dec., 1881, and other details.

On the adjourned debate on the Corrupt Practices Bill, Mr. Biggar said he approved of the clause which prohibited having committee meetings in public houses.

April 28.—Mr. Wilson gave notice that on Monday next he should ask leave to introduce a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday in the county of York, the city of York, and in the county of the town of Kingston-on-Hull.

Sir W. Lawson asked the first Lord of the Treasury with reference to the announcement in his budget that the county government bill would not be proceeded with at present, whether the Government contemplated the introduction of any other legislation during the present session for giving effect to the resolution which this house had already twice passed in favour of giving localities control over the liquor traffic by some efficient measure of local option. Mr. Gladstone—It is certainly quite true that we contemplated legislation in connection with the subject of County Boards, which would indirectly but materially have borne upon the question in which my hon. friend takes so great an interest—the question of local option. But being compelled reluctantly to abandon the plan of a County Boards Bill for the present session, I do not see that we have any means of making any proposal to the House upon that subject during the session. Later on Sir W. Lawson said in consequence of the answer of the Prime Minister he should on the earliest opportunity move—"In view of the great and grievous evils arising from the liquor traffic, this house is of opinion that the power to remove the cause of these evils by some efficient measure of local option should be entrusted to local communities at the earliest opportunity." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Warton gave notice of his intention to oppose the application for leave to bring in a bill for closing public houses on Sunday in the county of York, city of York, and Kingston-on-Hull.

May 1st.—Sir C. Dilke in answer to Earl Percy said that the matter of the duty on Spanish Wine had been and was still under the consideration of Government.

May 2nd.—On the motion of Mr. Richardson leave was given to bring in a bill to renew and amend the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act. The bill was read a first time.

May 4th.—Mr. M'Iver wished to postpone his question on the Spanish wine duties for a few days. Sir C. Dilke could not see why he should do so, and allow a misapprehension of facts to remain on the paper. The subject was still under consideration.

May 5th.—Sir W. Harcourt replying to Mr. Milne Home said it would not be proper or legal on the part of an inn-keeper to exclude any person from his hotel. The exercise of that exclusion against a man who had the honour to wear the Queen's uniform seemed to him to be extremely improper. (Cheers.) So far from being regarded as a person to be looked down upon and excluded he ought to be looked upon as a person to be especially honoured. (Cheers.)

May 5th.—The Attorney-General for Ireland in reply to Mr. O'Sullivan said that he was not aware that the person whom Mr. J. R. O'Gorman, publican, refused to serve was an emergency man, but he knew that he had brought two actions against O'Gorman, and in one of them had been awarded heavy damages.

May 9th.—Mr. J. Pease postponed till this day four weeks his motion on the opium question.

May 9th.—Mr. O'Sullivan moved the second reading of the spirits in bond, but as there was no responsible person on the Treasury bench, the motion was after some discussion adjourned.

LICENSING LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

May 10th.—Lord Colin Campbell, in moving the second reading of this Bill, admitted that there was a disposition, at least on this side of the House, to regard this as a question which must very soon engage the practical attention of Parliament. He was one of those who regretted that the Government did not find itself able to introduce a measure which would give effect to the clearly expressed opinion of the House as twice declared. It was impossible to conceive either that they had the time or opportunity to deal with this question, but looking to the state of public business he thought he should not be challenged, if he ventured to send up what he might call a pilot balloon to demonstrate those peculiar currents of opinion which had been set up by the hon. baronet (Sir W. Lawson), and which had already—he spoke of the temperance feeling in Scotland—made shipwreck of this Bill. Why should Scotland not have exceptional legislation? The Prime Minister in 1880, speaking on this question, said, "This is eminently a question in which the feeling of one great section of the country, when thoroughly ascertained and tested by experience for some length of time, ought to command the greatest attention and the willing assent of the House." He was sure Scottish members would testify to the strength of the feeling throughout the country, and to the fact that the feeling of Scotland in favour of reform had been a very strong one. From his own recollection he had no hesitation in saying that it was very urgently desired in Scotland that there should be some legislation upon this question, and he should point to the authority of the predecessor of the Lord-Advocate. In Dec., 1880, the right hon. gentleman said he would make it his duty to inform the Government that a general desire existed in the northern part of the island for an improvement of the licensing system. He would also like to take the vote of Scottish members during the last two years. On the first occasion the vote was 8 to 1 in favour of the hon. baronet's proposal, and on the second occasion the vote was still farther increased. Scotland had for more than a quarter of a century led the way in the matter of Sunday closing. He did not think that by introducing a measure which in any degree resembled the Permissive Bill he should have done anything to advance the question in the slightest. The Permissive Bill was nine times considered by the House of Commons and he believed by three separate Parliaments, and the lines of that measure had if not abandoned at least been despaired of by the hon. baronet (Sir W. Lawson—"no, no"). The hon. baronet said "No," but he should like to ask him why he did not introduce a Bill clearly defining what he meant by that ambiguous phrase "Local Option." He (Lord Colin) had ventured to give his definition, and he would like to say why. He had another reason for not introducing a measure which might remind hon. members of the Bill of the hon. baronet. The reason simply was that he was not himself a believer in the justice and in the expediency of the Permissive Bill, in the first place because it proposed to subject the rights of individuals and minorities to the arbitrary power of majorities, and in the second place because it proposed to sweep away a trade which, whatever might be said of its effects on the happiness and prosperity of the people, was at least a trade which had enormous and most extensive vested rights. There were two points in this Bill which had aroused opposition. The first was to protect the rights of minorities, and the second was to give trade compensation for the changes which might result from the exercise of the popular vote. These seemed to him to be at the foundation of social liberty and social justice. He could not help thinking that it would deprive minorities of personal and private rights in the abstract by depriving them of the reasonable means of exercising them as they had done under the sanction of legislation. The twentieth clause aimed at protecting them by giving them what he called a veto on a veto. That was to say, that whenever, by the operation of the machinery of the Bill, the popular vote resulted in total prohibition, the minority should have power to put a veto in the form of a requisition, which should require the licensing authority to grant one license in the proportion of 200 or 300 ratepayers who had signed the requisition. This proposal had been met in Scotland with those who had made themselves prominent in the agitation with unqualified condemnation. He sincerely trusted the hon. baronet would not consider it necessary to lend his powerful voice to swell the chorus of disapprobation which that proposal had aroused, otherwise he should feel even more completely than he had done what a rash thing he had done in taking the hon. baronet's advice in introducing a bill dealing with the licensing question in Scotland. The principle of compensation was just and expedient, but it was a subject of great difficulty and perplexity. Two questions arose under this head, the basis of compensation and the means of making it. If the Bill came into committee, of which he was not very hopeful (laughter), the clause could be amended. He thought that if they found compensation the locality relieved of the liquor traffic should bear the cost. The present licensing system was arbitrary enough. His lordship quoted figures to show this (a glance at the table in last month's Social Reformer shows this clearly). It was admitted by the publicans that the magistrates all over the country were endeavouring to reduce licenses; but what was that but an admission that the licensing system had worked badly in the past. He thought the magistrates were endeavouring to act on an entirely true principle. They were now brought to see that licenses should only be granted in strict accordance with the requirements of the people. Still the magistrates had shown an excessive liberality to the trade, and the consequence was that a vast amount of capital had been sunk in the trade, and magistrates had, as they had seen, been telling deputations waiting on them to get licenses reduced, that however willing they were to get licenses reduced they could not confiscate lawfully acquired property. He regretted the attitude of some of the temperance associations in Scotland. They seemed to him to fail to recognize what he believed was an undoubted fact, that if Parliament was to take up this question the locality should bear the cost and burden of the change. He hoped that they would not take the course of saying that the trade in which the publican was engaged was a trade abhorrent to the morality of the country. Parliament should, he thought, take the course it took on the question of slavery. The House did not say to those engaged in the slave-trade, "You are engaged in trade which is repugnant to the well-being of the country. You have no claim to compensation. You should rather disgorge your ill-gotten claims." No; it said it was true that this trade was contrary to the spirit of British law. It was repugnant to every principle of philanthropy, but it was an institution which had flourished with the encouragement and under the sanction of the legislature, and therefore it said that when they changed the law they should recognise their claim to compensation. In the slave-trade matter loss was only supposed to take place here; they might be sure that loss would accrue to the liquor sellers. The Bill made no change in the fiscal arrangements; the licenses would require to be got every year, but the certificate might only be purchased for ten years, and it would have a considerable value. As to allegation that a vested right would be created, he should like to point out that, under the existing system, the license had a greater claim to be considered a vested right, for it was the fact that a publican who conformed strictly to the terms of his certificate was absolutely certain of having it renewed annually until he got it for something like fifteen or twenty years. He did not believe it was possible to effect a sudden and violent revolution in our existing licensing system. It was necessary for Parliament to provide for a transitional state of things, and because he believed that this Bill, however crude and faulty, might afford an indication of the change in the law which Parliament might be willing to sanction, he ventured to move the second reading of the measure. (Hear, hear.) Sir Herbert Maxwell, in moving its rejection, affirmed his belief that the Bill was fitted to cause a disturbance of the social system. The subject should not be dealt with by a private member, but by a responsible minister of the Crown. He admitted that the licensing system of Scotland was capable of amelioration, not compulsorily but gradually. The Bill proposed to reduce the licenses from 6810 to 3252. That would give the House a sense of the magnitude of the reduction proposed by the Bill. He called it confiscation. The compensation proposed was merely nominal. The existing licensing authority, if time was given it, would, at no very distant period, bring about the results the noble lord had in view. The population of the Parliamentary burghs had in ten years increased by 175,490, while the licenses therein had decreased by 237. This showed that the magistrates had at heart proper regulations and control of the liquor traffic. Sir John Hay reminded him that in his parish in his youth there was nineteen public houses, but now there were only five. He believed that was only part of what had been going on all over Scotland. These burghs had practical local option. The ratepayers elected those that granted the licenses, and he believed the magistrates as a body had most carefully and to a certain extent most successfully endeavoured to control and keep within due limits this liquor traffic. By this Bill twenty burghs would at once lose all licenses. Lord Colin Campbell pointed out that by the Bill the licensing authority had power to grant licenses to places they thought insufficiently supplied. Sir Herbert continuing said, he would remind the noble lord that temperance, like other virtues, should begin at home. The population of Inverary was 902 in 1871, and 863 in 1881, and last year the number of licensed houses was eight. The maximum number under the Bill would be one. He should like to know if the noble lord approved of laying the burden of compensating the seven licensed victuallers on that town who would be deprived of their licenses. He could not imagine anything more trifling and illusory than the compensation that was offered. He thought that before the Bill was accepted by the House it should be shown that the existing authority had failed. Perhaps the most dangerous effect of the Bill would be the encouragement of illicit distillation and spurious clabs. The truest remedy for the evils of intemperance would be found to be our State education; this would be more effectual than any artificial legislation such as is proposed. He moved that the Bill be read that day six months. Mr. Anderson agreed with many of the proposals of the noble lord, but not of everything in the Bill by any means. He had always opposed the Permissive Bill, but supported the Local Option resolution. He thought that the Bill was a fair and honest attempt to give expression to the meaning of the House when it declared in favour of Local Option. (No, no.) He would ask those who said No to bring forward their views that the House might see if they could produce a more satisfactory measure. The magistrates were only indirectly elected by the ratepayers, and he did not think it would be a good thing for the municipal elections to hinge upon the drink question. He thought one of the great points of the Bill was that there should in no case be an absolute veto, and he did not think that in any place there would be a total absence of public houses under this Bill, and so total and complete prohibition would be prevented. He would refer the Bill to a select committee. Mr. Dalrymple regretted that the mover of the Bill did not show more hopefulness. The question was one from which party should be excluded, and yet there were nine names on the back of the Bill all drawn from the other side of the House. The proposal to limit public houses to a certain number of the population was one familiar to the House; it was a leading part of Sir Robert Anstruther's bill, of which it was a valuable provision. He considered clause 11th as very offensive, for he did not see why a man, because he was in the traffic, should be deprived of the rights of his citizenship. Compensation in any bill dealing with the liquor traffic must be contemplated, although he was ready to admit that there was a difficulty as to where the means was to come from. He wanted to hear the opinion of the Government not only on this Bill but on the question of Local Option, because it had attracted great interest in Scotland, and because it had, along with many of its supporters, supported Local Option. He would not oppose the second reading of the Bill. Mr. Williamson supported the Bill, first, because it was a laudable effort on the part of his lordship to deal with a difficult subject; second, because it tended to still farther restrict a most injurious traffic; third, it presented a basis for the discussion of the licensing question. If this Bill fell he hoped that the noble lord would next session bring in one of a more perfect nature, or that the discussion had paved the way for the Government doing so. The present licensing system had failed, and he was sure the Scottish people would not rest satisfied unless a remedy was sooner or later found. Having said that much, he hoped that if not this session, at least very soon, a measure dealing with this most dangerous traffic would be carried through the House. Sir Wilfrid Lawson sympathised with the noble lord, because it appeared he was attacked from both sides. He was afraid that if the noble lord had got into any trouble on this matter it was partly at his instigation, because he had suggested at a meeting at which the noble lord was present he would be a very fit and proper person to bring in a Local Option Bill confining it to Scotland. He never asked his lordship to bring in a licensing Bill. The noble lord had erred in excess of zeal. He had tried to combine licensing with the popular veto. What he would have liked his lordship to confine himself to was to give the people of Scotland a popular veto on the issue of licenses, and to allow them to protect themselves where they did not please to have licenses forced upon them. He thought he was justified in suggesting that, because the members for Scotland, by a majority of 8 to 1, had on more than one occasion declared in that House that it was a right to which the people of this country were entitled. If that had been all that had been in the Bill of his noble friend it would not only have had his hearty support and co-operation, but would have secured, he believed, support throughout all Scotland. He was sorry to see that his lordship had incurred opposition, but he hoped he would not be discouraged in his excellent work. There was one thing in favour of the Bill, and that was the fury of the publicans against it. He saw that in the Parliamentary burghs of Scotland the places for the sale of drink would be by the Bill reduced by one half. If that was not a bill to do something to promote temperance, he failed to see what bill would really do any good. The hon. baronet referred to compensation, showing that the proposal to compensate the Irish Sunday closing publicans was absolutely laughed out of the House. Yet the noble lord proposed to actually compensate the publicans of Scotland. When he brought forward his Bill on this subject hon. members had always insisted on discussing the details as well as the principles, so, in order to get his principle adopted he had reduced his Bill to a mere preamble, and in that form it had twice been adopted by the House. The Government would be obliged to take up this question before very long—he told the Government very distinctly—if they wished to retain the confidence of the country which placed them in power. Hon. members laughed, but they did not know so well as he did what was going on in the country. He knew what he was speaking about, and he knew there was no question about which the people of this country were so determined as that they would have the power of protecting themselves from this liquor traffic which was bringing ruin and desolation into our country. That being the case his noble friend had gone on the right direction, whatever the details of his bill might be. Scotch members by giving it their support would simply say that Scotland was determined that the liquor traffic ought to be diminished, and that they were ready and willing to take the lead in this matter, if not in the exact method proposed in the Bill yet in some other measure conferring the control of the traffic on the ratepayers. Sir John Hay opposed the Bill. He concurred with the sentiments of the hon. member for Wigtownshire (Sir H. Maxwell). To what better source than to the magistracy of this country could they look for the regulation of this traffic? To give the ratepayers power would militate very much against the peace of a district. The magistracy would be more capable of determining wisely the necessities of their district than the breath of public opinion. Mr. O'Sullivan said if this Bill were carried for Scotland it would be sure to be proposed for Ireland next. Mr. Stewart wished to see the Bill referred to a select committee. Dr. Cameron said they were told that the Government should have brought forward a bill of the magnitude of the present bill. He would like to see one introduced by the Government; but if the Government were unable meantime to do so, that it was hardly fair when a private member made an attempt to lay a scheme before the House he should be met with such an objection. A Scotch member could hardly attend a political meeting without being asked questions on this subject—so great was the general interest on this question. He therefore trusted the Government would take the matter out of the hands of the noble lord, who, he felt confident, would be very happy to relinquish it into their hands. He thought the suggestion by his hon. colleague (Mr. Anderson) an eminently practical one. He believed if the Bill were referred to a select committee they would receive a very valuable report. Sir T. E. Colebrooke had no objection to the discussion raised by the Bill, nor to a select committee to consider the whole question. He defended the existing licensing authorities, who in his opinion justified the confidence of the country. He would only go with the Bill so far as to giving greater popular control over licenses. Mr. C. S. Parker intended to support the second reading, as he was in favour of the main principle of the Bill. He attacked Sir W. Lawson in his well known manner. He advocated licensing boards. He would vote as understanding Local Option and the Permissive Bill as different, and that the Bill was based on the former and not at all on the latter. Mr. T. R. Buchanan spoke in favour of the Bill. Mr. Orr Ewing hoped the Government would oppose the Bill until they brought forward a general measure. The Lord-Advocate said, I am sure that we are all indebted to my noble friend, the member for Argyllshire, for having brought this large and important question before them in the shape of the Bill now on the table. There is no part of the United Kingdom where its importance is more recognised than in Scotland, nor is there any place where a larger and more widespread interest is felt than in that country: and it is very significant that the votes last year on the Local Option resolution were in the proportion of 8 to 1. That I think must be taken as expressing very clearly that north of the Tweed there is a strong feeling in favour of confiding to local bodies the large power of regulating and controlling the traffic. He thought, however, that the discussion to-day, as well as the many petitions which had been received, must have shown that there is not at present such a consensus of opinion as to the precise modes of giving effect to that resolution as would make it expedient for the noble lord to press his bill farther on this season. Mr. Warton talked out the Bill, which became a dropped order.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER, VOL. XVI, GLASGOW, 112 BATH STREET, 1882.—Of The Social Reformer we have often spoken before, and in another portion of this present issue we have said a word about it. This is its 16th volume. Those who file it, as we do, will have volumes full of interest and instruction, and this 16th volume will be in no way behind its many able predecessors. . . . We can truly say that amongst our very numerous exchanges, none is more welcome to us than The Social Reformer.—The British Temperance Advocate.

IRVINE.—With exemplary spirit, the enterprising social reformers of this burgh agreed to introduce the Blue Ribbon mission to the community. On the 8th ult. the first of a series of meetings was held with that object, in the West U.P. Church, when the Rev. S. Harding, of Paisley, preached on the words of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (Gen. iv. 9.) The meetings were continued for a fortnight, when several of the well-known temperance advocates addressed the audiences. Messrs. Simpson and Hamilton, Rev. J. Blackie, and Rev. J. M'Queen, Kilmarnock. Ex-Provost Dick, Messrs. J. Winning, R. Mackay, and R. Dransfield, of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, took part in the meetings. At our last advices more than 300 had donned the blue ribbon, and it was admitted that never had so great an interest been shown in temperance enterprise by the people of Irvine. The committee are jubilant, and well they may. They deserve much credit for their efforts.

"THE SOCIAL REFORMER," VOL. XVI.—Temperance orators will find the new volume of The Social Reformer equal to any of its predecessors as a storehouse whence to draw arguments, incidents, facts, figures, sallies of wit, or stanzas fitted to aid in the work of converting the world to teetotalism. It contains all the memorable orations of the year in the cause of temperance. Newspaper snippings favourable to the teetotal creed, taken from most diverse prints, are without number. The editor's ingenuity and alertness in scenting the iniquities which result from drink are admirable. An old toper is said to have soliloquised that "man wants but little here below, yet wants that little strong," and apparently this is the belief of the supporters of The Social Reformer. It confines itself entirely to advocating the absolute disuse of spirituous liquors, and its advocacy is marked by extreme pertinacity and resolution.—Dundee Advertiser.

CONGREGATIONAL UNION OF SCOTLAND.—This body met this year in the Augustine Church, Edinburgh, on the 25th April. On the afternoon of that day the annual meeting of the Total Abstinence Society in connection with the Union was held in the hall of the Augustine Church, under the presidency of the Rev. Robert Auchterlonie. There was a large attendance. After a service of tea, and an address had been given by the chairman, the Rev. Mr. M'Lean, secretary, gave some account of the progress of the society since its formation fifteen years ago, and stated that the number who had paid subscriptions for the present year was 270. Last year all the students in the Theological Hall were abstainers. (Applause.) Dr. Wylie, secretary of the Baptist Temperance Society, gave an account of the progress of that association, and stated that, so far as he knew, about one-half of the ministers of the Baptist Church were total abstainers. In reply to a gentleman present, Mr. M'Lean said he thought about 75 per cent. of the ministers in connection with the Union were total abstainers. Dr. Adamson (Evangelical Union), who also gave an address, said that 100 per cent. of the Evangelical Union ministers were temperance men. (Applause.) He referred with satisfaction to the decrease of receipts for excisable liquors, as set forth in the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday night, and trusted that Mr. Gladstone would be spared to see a far greater decrease and until he would have to come forward and say that he would require to raise 20 millions on account of the drink traffic having totally gone down. (Applause.)

GLASGOW ABSTAINERS' UNION.—The annual meeting of the members of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union was held on the 4th ult., in the Religious Institution Rooms—Mr. John Lindsay in the chair. The twenty-eighth annual report, which was read by Mr. Airlie, the secretary, contained a detailed statement of the work of the Union during the year. Reference was made to the domestic mission, in connection with which it was stated that the penny savings banks had been pretty freely taken advantage of, the transactions numbering 1541, and the amount deposited £49 13s. 2d. The cookery classes held by the Union, and the recent exhibition and competition of plain household cookery, were also referred to; and it was stated that the public-houses without the drink continued to be pretty largely taken advantage of, although not to such an extent in the evenings as could be desired. The weekly visits to the Calton house had averaged 1075, making a total for the year of 55,900; while the average weekly visits to the Stobcross Street house had been 2757, giving a yearly total of 143,364. In both houses 1136 persons had taken the abstinence pledge. The Saturday evening concerts were dealt with in the report at some length, and with reference to the Kilmun Sea-Side Home it was stated that 962 persons had enjoyed its benefits during the year. Of these, 691 were restored to health, 179 were improved, 90 were reported "no better," and 2, it was stated, died. The subscriptions for the maintenance of the Home, including a legacy of £100, amounted to £1175 1s. 8d. The amount required annually to maintain the Home efficiently was stated to be about £1300. The report concluded with the statement that the finances of the Union were in a satisfactory position. The subscriptions, &c., for the general purposes of the society amounted to £575 10s. 6d. The treasurer's report was also read. Mr. Westlands moved that the reports be adopted, and printed, and circulated, and this was seconded by Mr. Coghill and agreed to. The directors for the year having been elected, the meeting was terminated with the usual votes of thanks.

THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The anniversary meetings of the Scottish Temperance League were held on the last days of April, and the first days of May. The series include the Band of Hope demonstration, the delivery of a large number of sermons, the annual sermon by some eminent divine, the public meeting, the business meeting, the breakfast party, and the closing soiree. These meetings were carried through with conspicuous success. The sermon by Canon Wilberforce was unusually eloquent, and stirred the heart's core of the vast audience who heard it. The public meeting was the best attended the League has yet had; a fact due to the eminent reputation of Canon Wilberforce, and to the curiosity to see the founder of the Blue Ribbon Army. The speaking was, both in its temperance and prohibitory aspects, singularly advanced, and went home to the hearts of the hearers with demonstration and power. Dr. Marshall Lang and Mr. James Guthrie, J.P., Brechin, took part in the meeting, over which Sir W. Collins, Knight, presided. The breakfast party was as usual a very enjoyable meeting. At this meeting the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association was represented by ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., and Mr. John Forrester. The annual business meeting was lively, considerable interest being manifest throughout the proceedings. The annual report was as usual lengthy and interesting. The introduction made claim to the League being the source of all the moral suasion effort now so active in Scotland. A deserved eulogy is awarded to the memory of the late Mr. John M'Gavin. The publication department is as usual vigorous, 50,000 volumes being issued, and 440,000 tracts being put into circulation. Reference is made to the withdrawal of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from the Joint Executives' deliberation, but the reason of the separation is withheld. References are made to the legal and political efforts of the League, to the Suspensory Bill, Sunday Closing, Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, and Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Bill. The funds are not, we are sorry to observe, so gratifying as previously, but they amount to £3861 7s. 1d., and with publication income £3907 19s. 4d., to a total of £7769 6s. 5d., the balance to carry forward being £10 9s. 0½d. The business done at this meeting was of the usual character, and a most enjoyable tea meeting brought a most interesting anniversary to a close.

U.P. SYNOD.—The Synod met in Edinburgh on the 8th ult. The Rev. Dr. Young, Glasgow, was elected Moderator. On Tuesday Dr. Scott presented the statistics of the church. There was a small increase in the membership, and an increase of £765 to the funds. He said that the increase of the stipends was 34·666 per cent. greater than 1868. Dr. Mair, reporting on the Scholarships Committee, said that the applications for examination were 115, being a decrease of 8 as compared with 1880, and of 27 as compared with 1879. The students numbered 103. The scholarship payments were £485; for special scholarships, £295. A number enter as students, but do not continue to the end, going into other denominations. Mr. Slight showed that the total income of the Synod was £98,641, 14s. 11d. This amount had only been once exceeded—namely, in 1876. The Finance Committee reported that there was a decrease on the income of £6,489, 10s. 3d., and an increase in the expenditure of £434, 0s. 5d. Dr. Wood reported on the attendance of members at the Synod, which was 743—447 ministers and 296 elders—an increase over last year. Dr. Blair laid before the Synod the report on Temperance. It referred to the Blue Ribbon movement. Forty Bands of Hope had been formed, either in the mission station or congregation, or in both. The committee had waited on Lord Rosebery to urge the necessity of Local Option for Scotland. It was agreed by the Synod that the committee petition for the earlier closing of public-houses, and for a control over the liquor traffic by ratepayers. Dr. Blair moved the Synod to urge its members and the membership of the Church to discourage all social drinking usages. Dr. Hutton seconded. He advocated the withdrawal of intoxicating liquors from the table and the home. They might do what they liked about public-houses, &c., but unless they worked within the dwelling, and unless they educated the young and rising generation in the home that these usages were dangerous, and that the liquors themselves were poisonous, their endeavours would be unavailing. If they wanted to evangelise the masses, they would have to take hold of them through the temperance reformation. (Applause.) The debate was adjourned until the evening on the motion of Principal Cairns. In the evening Principal Cairns said that he should not have moved the adjournment of the debate if he had not thought there was need for, and likewise a call by Providence for a somewhat more lengthened discussion than the report of the committee seemed likely to receive. Divergent as the convictions of the members of the Synod were—composed, as the court was, of abstainers and non-abstainers, might not they, with all clearness of conscience and unity of human feeling, recommend to the members to take into favourable consideration the question, in the special circumstances of the country, whether, amid the agitation which this temperance question was awakening, the Synod might not see it to be their duty, not only to discourage generally drinking usages, but personally to discontinue the use of intoxicating liquors. (Applause.) He was sure that the Synod was prepared to take a step in advance. If he could carry this point, he would then ask the membership to consider how far it was their duty to personally discontinue the use of intoxicating beverages. Was the Church, he asked, to be outstripped by any Salvation Army, or by any agency in the field? Was the regular army of the Church of Christ, with their regular organisation, not to take a lead in this all-important question? Were they to stand there as Christian brethren to stretch out to the erring and the fallen, who were in danger, the hand of fellowship, the hand of protection, the hand of safety? Instead of saying, "Take the step, and take it alone," rather let them cast the arm of Christian love around them, saying, "Come with us, come with this Synod, and we will do you good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." (Applause.) Dr. George Jeffrey said he had been a total abstainer for forty-six years, but now he was more strongly convinced than ever that at present there was a loud call for the Church to do what they could in this direction. The great bar to the cause of Christ was intoxicating drink, and had they not that to deal with, they would have little to do in regard to their sessional discipline. Principal Cairns then moved, "That the Synod discourage all public drinking usages, and recommend the membership of the Church sincerely and earnestly to consider how far it might be their duty to discontinue the personal use of intoxicating liquors." Dr. George Jeffrey seconded the motion. The discussion was continued by Rev. Dr. Wallace, Rev. Mr. Clark, and Dr. Brown, Paisley, who said he thought it clear that no greater error could be committed than to outrun the sympathy and the opinion of the Church on this general question. The most objectionable of drinking usages were not social but private usages. There was a difference of opinion with regard to Christian duty in this matter. There were some of their members who felt it to be their duty, in view of the acknowledged evils of the drinking system, that while the world standeth they would drink no wine that would cause their brother to offend—(loud applause)—and there were others of their brethren—and he would be a bold man to say they were less devout, less earnest, or less self-sacrificing—who deemed that they could promote the cause of temperance better without laying down the rule for themselves of entire abstinence, and by striving conscientiously, in all circumstances, by giving an example of temperance and sobriety. He moved, "That the Synod, as in former years, discourage all drinking usages connected with ordinances, inductions, and funerals, and earnestly recommend all the members of the Church to consider prayerfully how they could best promote the cause of temperance, and put an end to the evil of drunkenness among them." There was an exciting discussion, the Synod applauding Mr. Coghill for expressing the hope that the time was not far distant when all the ministers of the U.P. Church would be total abstainers. Rev. Mr. Sharp, Rev. Mr. Rennie (Glasgow), Rev. Mr. Corbett (Glasgow), and Rev. Dr. Drummond (Glasgow) supported Dr. Brown. Rev. Dr. Mair suggested an arrangement, but it was not adopted. The elders were in favour of the Rev. Principal. On the vote, 84 voted with Principal Cairns, and 74 with Dr. Brown. A number then intimated their intention to lodge reasons for their dissent, which later on was done, and their reasons answered by Principal Cairns.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER, VOL. XVI.—When the minds of a large section of the community are being stirred—as they are at the present time—with regard to total abstinence, and when large numbers are being enlisted in its ranks, the yearly volume of the Social Reformer in being issued now makes its appearance very opportunely. Filled as its pages are with interesting articles which give forth no uncertain sound on the total abstinence question, the book is one which would prove of great value to those who are not fully persuaded as to the advisability of crossing to the total abstinence side of the line, as well as in strengthening and encouraging those who may but recently have crossed, it may be, from a life of wretchedness to the peace and happiness which follow in the train of total abstinence. Temperance organisations would benefit largely from the circulation of the work, which breathes forth a spirit of fervent love to fallen humanity.—Stirling Observer.

THE BOY SMOKER.

DEAR SIR,—Accept a parent's best thanks for the review of the Smokers' Guide in a recent Social Reformer. I calculate you will not be called upon for some time to come to review another of the tobacco trade's literary productions. You will not regret it when you find that you have been able to expose the great evil of smoking. This evil of smoking by boys is growing every day. You cannot pass along the street at any time without meeting with a little fellow puffing away at his pipe with an earnestness that shows to me that the vice is already hugging him closely. Sometimes it is wonderful to see his companions looking up to him, with a kind of admiration, as he holds his pipe just like a man! Or, perhaps, they may be awaiting with eager desire their turn to have a puff of his pipe when he is done. At such times I wonder if the parent of the smoking boy is a smoker. If he is, then it is useless to hope for the reformation of the boy till the man reforms. It is not what the father says, but what he does, that moves the son. "If the pipe is good for my father it can't be bad for me." It is not the nature of the thing itself that is looked to, but does anybody use it that rules this truly detestable practice, which is fostered by parents or tolerated by them, and stimulated by all the costly apparatus in tobacconists' shops. If those parents who eschewed smoking were to resolutely compel their children to break up the vile habit much less smoking would prevail. A glance at the consequences they are allowing their children to bring on themselves would be sufficient to urge them to set about a vigorous reformation in their household, and maintain a constant watchfulness, lest in future the habit might be formed or resumed. Professor Parkes, the great hygienist, says—"When a boy takes to smoking he frequently becomes pale, and he has an unhealthy skin. Moreover, boys who smoke much are less disposed to bodily exertion. Smoking interferes with appetite, impairs bodily activity, and in some way must damage the circulation or the composition of the blood." The Lord Bishop of Manchester says—"The habit of tobacco smoking among young boys is an evil, and it seems to me a growing one which I have often observed and deplored. Whatever may be thought of the habit of smoking generally, I believe that medical authorities are universally agreed that it is physically most mischievous to young people under the age of eighteen. The moral effects consequent on the too frequent association of this habit with others of a pernicious tendency, are not less hurtful to the character. It has often been a matter both of surprise and regret to me that parents seem so indifferent to both these classes of consequences to their sons." I will not strain your courtesy by quoting more. I have written enough, I hope, to convince the indifferent and to induce the thoughtful to do what they can to expose this practice to all within their reach. It is a matter of deep gratification that women, if we except a few old women who smoke by medical orders, or who are vagrants or bondagers, never smoke. True, I have heard that "fast young ladies" smoke cigarettes; but these vicious young women are already straying from virtue and from goodness, and clothing themselves with the filthy rags and habits of sin and shame. The real ladies, whether high or lowly born, studiously avoid contaminating themselves through the practice of this vice. Long may they do so, and may they be found frowning it down in their husbands, or others, and us. MELIORA.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE THOMAS IVORY, ESQ., EDINBURGH.—It is with feelings of unusual regret that we record the sudden death of this much esteemed gentleman on the 6th ult. Mr. Ivory was a son of the late Lord Ivory, one of the Lords of Session. Although bred to the bar he devoted his time to philanthropy, the temperance reform and evangelistic effort. He had nearest his heart the amelioration of the condition of the poor and their conversion to a vital Christianity. An elder in the Free Church he entered with all the energy of his large-souled nature into the revival movement, and it is believed that his devotion to such work hastened his death. He was the lessee of the Chalmers Institute, Ponton Street, using it for the regular carrying on of mission work. Working so much and so intelligently among the working classes and those beneath them, he saw to what a deplorable extent drink was their bane, and he approved highly of the means advocated by the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for their permanent relief from the evils of intemperance by an absolute veto over the liquor traffic.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE ARTHUR, FORFAR.—We feel a keen sorrow in recording this staunch adherent of temperance among our departed friends. He passed away on the 13th ult. at the venerable age of 76. Mr. Arthur's death was sudden, although not quite unexpected. He died in his chair while his daughter was reading to him. He was an unwearied friend of temperance, ever willing and always ready to render help for its advancement. He was given to hospitality to the lecturer, on whom he had always a word of welcome and of encouragement to bestow; and he was not so proud as to shrink from taking his place at the Cross to cheer the speakers advocating temperance and prohibition. He was, in short, a man every inch of him, clear, intelligent, and persuaded of the truths that underlie the great temperance reformation. So far from speaking of it with bated breath, he might have been said to have gloried in his total abstinence, for on all occasions he most heartily avowed it. For many years he filled the office of Inspector of Poor with fidelity and honour. He deeply sympathised with the efforts of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and longed for its success; which like many other of its staunch friends he has not been permitted to see. We tender our sincere condolence to those he has left mourning his loss, and acknowledge with pleasing recollection the signal worth of the departed.—S.

THE LATE MR. J. NEWBIGGING, DUNSE.—We regret to have to record the somewhat sudden decease of this worthy gentleman, who died on Monday, 15th ult., in the 67th year of his age. His friends were concerned at the evident failure of his health. Still, no serious apprehensions were entertained regarding it, but only a few days illness carried him off. He was liberal in politics, voluntary in his religious opinions, and an ardent advocate of temperance. He entered largely into public life, being a commissioner of the burgh, a member of the School Board, and an elder of the West U.P. Church, but the temperance movement absorbed by far the greater portion of his efforts. During much of the last forty years he spent much of his time in addressing meetings and in other ways in behalf of the temperance enterprise. Few temperance reformers wrought more earnestly or at more self-sacrifice, and his removal will be mourned throughout temperance circles in the county of Berwickshire. Strongly attached to the moral suasion aspect of the temperance question, he at first withheld his sympathy from the legal aspect of it, but, latterly, he was in hearty accord with the permissive prohibitionists, who often were indebted to him as chairman of their local meetings. His funeral was the largest seen in the town of Dunse for many years, representatives of Temperance organization being present from the various districts of the county. Temperance friends carried his remains to their last resting-place, and the shops in town were closed out of respect to his memory. Mr. J. H. Waterston represented the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on the melancholy occasion.

SURFACE WORK.

BY REV. S. HARDING, PAISLEY.

We are not insensible to the fact that a vast amount of work has been accomplished in the temperance cause, and that the present state of public opinion is mainly due to the agitation which has been carried on during the past half century. At no period of the movement has there been so much effort put forth, and such a diversity of methods adopted as at the present time. We have armies bearing the diversified colours of red, white, and blue; leagues formed on the most improved principles; alliances embracing all ranks, professions, creeds, and politics; brotherhoods claiming the world as their field of operation, and knowing no distinction of colour, race, or sex. All the phases of the movement are fully represented by able and distinguished advocates. The platform, the pulpit, and the press are lending their valuable aid. Patriots, philanthropists, and Christians are propounding schemes for the amelioration of suffering humanity, each believing his plan to be "the missing link," the panacea for degradation, suffering, and woe. Our hospitals, asylums, houses of refuge, reformatories, prisons, poor-houses, orphan homes, ragged schools, free breakfasts, sanitary and political reforms, are the outcome of earnest, loving, sympathizing, honest hearts. The Church has departed somewhat from her old landmarks, and, by its evangelistic agency, made inroads into the kingdom of darkness. "The lapsed masses" and outcasts are sought after, novel and unique measures are adopted to ensure success. And yet with all these agencies at work, how little has been done, how few have been rescued from the destroyer!

To save the fallen is a grand work, but to prevent them "from falling into the snares of the tempter" is a grander, a nobler achievement.

Were it not for the liquor traffic there would be less need for infirmaries, lunatic asylums, houses of refuge for the outcast, reformatories for the fallen, poorhouses for the destitute. There would be fewer orphans cast forth upon the world improvident. Free breakfasts would be superseded by every family having its own happy fireside; ragged schools be only remembered as a disgrace to our civilization. Instead of the people waiting for the extension of the franchise they would extend it themselves, and improve their own position in society. Were it not for intemperance "the lapsed masses" would be found to a very large extent attending our sanctuaries clothed, sitting at the feet of Jesus, in their right mind. The efforts put forth by most of the agencies referred to are only in the direction of lopping off some of the branches of the "great upas" tree in our midst. There are far more paupers, lunatics, criminals, and street arabs manufactured by the liquor traffic than are saved by the united efforts of patriots, philanthropists, and Christians.

The agencies for evil are far more numerous and powerful than those put forth for good.

Our patriots, philanthropists, and Christians, have failed to a large extent to apprehend the real secret of overcoming evil. They have only realized one part of the mission of Christ into the world. That is "to save sinners." This he came to do, and has done, and is doing. The enemies of Christ passed the highest eulogium on his name and character when they said, "This man receiveth sinners."

But is this all he came to do? Verily no! This is only a small part of his mission into the world, and this is only a small portion of the gospel! His great work is thus set forth, "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." Here we have a solution of the question how to overcome the liquor traffic, and the secret why so little success has attended the efforts put forth by the various agencies. The Church and the State are afraid to attack this stronghold of the devil. The revenue derived from the traffic silences the statesman, and the traffickers in the church gag the watchman of Israel. The Saviour gives a practical illustration how to deal with offenders against morality and religion, by overturning the tables of the money changers, and the seats of them that sold doves (harmless creatures), and driving them out of the temple, lashing them with a whip of cords, saying, "It is written, my house shall be called a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves."

The teaching of the Baptist, the forerunner of the Saviour, is orthodox, and indicates the only legitimate method of overthrowing this great evil, "And now the axe is laid at the root of the trees; therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire."

Let our politicians, philanthropists, and Christians bring their axes, and get down to the roots of this terrible upas tree of iniquity and sever them. Then not only will the effects cease, but the cause of intemperance will be removed. This prolific source being dried up, there will be nothing left in this direction to "hurt nor destroy in all God's holy mountain."

THE WORKING MAN'S BILL OF FARE.

FOLLOWING out the intention expressed in our last paper we will now look at this subject in the light of the Food Reform Society. That Society is not necessarily vegetarian but merely aims to secure a better selection and preparation of food. They hold that working people might make a great change for the better in the direction of excellence and economy by cleaving to a farinaceous rather than to a flesh diet. They would have a better expenditure of their wages and a diet more in harmony with the demands made by their exertions upon their system; and they point with considerable force to the agricultural servants of Scotland who, up to a time not yet remote, lived almost upon grain, vegetables, and milk, rarely or ever tasting animal food from year's end to year's end. Dr. Johnson to close a discussion taunted his opponent, a Scotchman, by declaring that the beggarly Scots were content to feed on the oats the Englishmen gave to their horses, but met with the severe query—Ah, where can one see such horses or such men? We have been long familiar with the porters of the Levant living on a few grains of food and yet bearing enormous loads with ease. The question, we think, scarcely admits of contention or dispute. We merely allude to the horse, the ox, the elephant, to show what labour may be performed, what quality produced, or what bulk sustained without animal food. Now, our contention is not the excellency of the vegetist's dietary or its superiority over the carnivorists mode of feeding. We bring it to the front for the purpose of testing whether it will yield more vigour at the same cost or yield the same vigour at a lesser cost.

For our purpose we submit a bill of fare where animal food is rigorously excluded (butter and milk excepted) in order that a just comparison may be made between a granivorous and a carnivorous dinner. This, then, is our promised

BILL OF FARE

For seven days' dinners, suitable for a family of six, with a change each day, and cost of same.

No. 1.—Lentil Soup, Bread Pudding.

Haricot bean pie.—1 lb. beans, 2d.; 5 oz. tapioca, 1d.; wheat meal or flour for crust, 1½d.; butter and salt, 2d.—5½d. Serve with onion sauce made with milk, 1d.; flour and onion and salt, ½d.—1½d.

Stewed rhubarb.—Rhubarb, 1d.; sugar, 1d.—2d.

Total cost, 9½d.

No. 3.—Stewed Vegetables, Lemon Pudding.

Stewed vegetables.—¼ stone potatoes, 1½d.; carrot, turnip, onion, etc., 3d.; butter, pepper, and salt, 2d.—6½d.

Lemon pudding.—1½ lb. bread crumbs, 1d.; 6 oz. flour, ¾d.; sugar, ¾d.; 1½ oz. butter, 1½d.; milk, ¾d.; Lemon, 1d.—5½d.

Total cost, 1s.

No. 4.—Cabbage Potatoes, Milk, Mush.

Cabbage and milk.—Cabbage, 3d.; milk, 1½d.; ½ stone potatoes, 3d.—7½d.

Mush or crushed wheat.—Mush, 2d.; currants, ½d.; sweet milk, 1d.; sugar, ¾d.—4½d.

Total cost, 11½d.

No. 5.—Haricot Beans, Rice Pudding.

Haricot beans.—1½ lb. beans (with onion sauce) 3d.; milk, 1d.; flour and parsley, ½d.—4½d.

Rice pudding.—Rice, 1d.; milk, 3d.; sugar, cinnamon, etc., 1d.—5d.

Total cost, 9½d.

No. 6.—Peas and Potatoes, Hominy.

Peas and Potatoes.—1 lb. pease, 2d.; ½ stone potatoes, 3d.; served with parsley or onion sauce with a little mustard or with butter, 3d.—5d.

Hominy pudding.—Hominy, 1½d.; milk, sugar, etc., 2½d.—4d.

Total cost, 1s.

No. 7.—Lentils, Potatoes, Corn Flour.

Stewed lentils.—Split lentils, 1d.; carrot, turnip, onions, celery, etc., 3d.; ¼ stone potatoes, 1½d.—5½d. To be served with white sauce (milk, 1d.; flour and salt, ½d.—1½d.)

Moulded corn flour.—Corn flour, 1½d.; skim milk, 1½d.; sugar with half a lemon to flavour, 1d.; stewed rhubarb, 1½d.—5½d.

Total cost, 1s. ½d.

It will be seen that this bill of fare is more economical than the one presented in our last. Its cost being 6s. 3½d. as against 8s. 3½d. the cost of the other, thus showing a clear difference of £5, 4s. a-year, a very substantial gain indeed to an artisan's family. It will also be admitted that such a set of dinners must be more pleasant to the taste. The pleasure of eating is certainly on the side of the granivorous foods. The young especially delight in these preparations, and it can hardly be disputed that soups made with the materials in our second bill of fare are the most nutritive which can be procured. The superiority of French over our average English cookery, lies in the delicious and substantial soups which the French women can so economically prepare. The objection which an Englishman might advance that our bill of fare is simply horse and hen food with nothing in it, arises from the fact that he can hardly appreciate anything but solid beef or mutton. The roast beef he prides himself so much upon will not compare in feeding value, cost for cost with that on the table we present. His meal is wasteful and coarse when contrasted with such a meal as any of the seven days' would supply.

We anticipate another objection, and that is, that the amount of the ration must be very small and consequently unsatisfactory. This is a very plausible objection but not very forcible. We have been in this country accustomed to regard the quantity rather than the quality of our food, and to eat rather to avert supposed privation than with intelligence. Once fully educated upon the matter of what and how much to eat, we will just be in the habit of taking enough and no more of what is needed for repair and for needful energy. When the true relation between our wants and supplies is once recognized, we shall enjoy our food in quantity and quality in a manner that will leave nothing to be desired.

It is not to be denied that there is too much gross eating prevalent among all classes. Sir Henry Thompson gives an excellent description of an old-fashioned dinner such as is not even yet discarded, we fear, by plutocrats. To begin with, the guests had oysters, turtle soups, punch, salmon, turbot with lobster sauce, sherry, oyster patties, mutton or lamb cutlets, hock and champagne, saddle of mutton, currant jelly, cold vegetables, flabby salad, boiled fowl and tongue or turkey with force meat, game and slice of ham, hot pudding, other sweets, iced pudding, wines in variety, etc., etc., biscuits and cheese. The agony of a stomach attempting self-control under such circumstances is only, we think, exceeded by that of one which suffers from indulgence in so vast a dinner. No doubt this is an extreme instance, and that we are very much improved in our habits of feeding, but both in society and at home we eat by far too much, and find that we are haunted in our several employments with that sense of uneasiness which has its source in advanced indigestion. To the working man gross feeding either in quantity or in quality is a serious thing. Foods which are unsuitable to his daily needs or which are far too costly for his income should be replaced by those which are fit and proper, and also easily within his means. Now tea, beef, mutton, new bread are dear and inappropriate, and should, if not relinquished, be most sparingly used, while he should rely as much as possible upon that nourishment which the table we submit would instruct him to supply.

The table is, however, far from niggardly, we think, in its provision. Taking three diets per day as the average and assuming that these are about equal, our table marks an expenditure of 2d. per head of our supposed family. This, looking to what our food consists of, and to the fact that the children are ten years and under, is a very generous provision. We might have sought out a table far more sparsely provided than the one we have printed here. For it is beyond debate that men of a very studious disposition have lived upon almost nothing, for instance, there is Chrysostom the golden-tongued father who ate but one meal of dinner and herbs a day, and St. Anuphrates who only ate a little bread after sunset. Between these meals and either of those on our tables there is a great gulf. We readily admit our only purpose in adducing samples of a very large body of evidence is to cut the idea up by the root that large eating and vigorous labour go together. The reverse will, on enquiry, be found to be the case. It is demonstrated that only as much gastric juice is secreted by the stomach, and as much saliva by the salivary glands as will make up what the condition of the system requires. Any one impressed with a sublime sense of the design by which all our bodies are perfected can well believe that this is a true state of the case. Hence it is said that when the stomach finds superfluous food present it sets up a fermentive or putrifaactive process in order to get rid of the excess.

The lessons then of our two papers will, we hope, be self-evident that there should be a more careful attention paid to our food, both as regards quantity and quality; that this attention, if wisely paid, will be found in the line of a simpler and less costly diet: that grains and fruits, on the whole, contain more flesh-forming and heat-giving food than flesh; and hence it is the bounden duty of the working-classes to reduce their consumption of flesh and increase the vegetable and cereal portion of their diet.

We may be able in another article to present some bills of fare even more interesting than those before our readers.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

THE PROHIBITION MOVEMENT IN THE NORTH.

READERS of the Social Reformer are generally pleased to get a little information regarding the progress of the cause. As I have spent several weeks in the northern counties, I crave a portion of your space to lay before your readers a few thoughts which may be of interest to them. One of the first places I visited in my tour was the burgh of Fortrose. A number of active friends had made arrangements for a meeting in the Drill Hall, and having secured the services of James Fletcher, Esq., of Rosehaugh, to take the chair, they were gratified by seeing a good turn-out. This was the first time that I had visited this little burgh, and it was a matter of no small importance to me to get acquainted with so many true friends. I stayed with Mr. A. McKenzie, of Courthill, a veteran of great repute in the temperance ranks. After this I went to Inverness, where I addressed an open-air meeting. My next meeting was held at Beaulieu. Here there is a Good Templar lodge supported by a few loyal friends. There is also a good Band of Hope in the village, conducted by Mr. A. MacLennan. Dingwall was the next town I visited. The Good Templars have built a splendid hall which will enable them to carry on the work with more vigour than they have done, if that be possible. I had a most excellent meeting, and the temperance men in the burgh gave me a kindly reception. Cromarty is one of the northern burghs which is not flourishing commercially, but it is a place of great interest, and one cannot visit it without having his mind stirred by many pleasing associations. Every place round about it is hallowed by the genius of Hugh Miller. His monument stands on a rising ground above the town. It consists of a tall round column set upon a square base, on the top of which stands a figure of the geologist looking at a piece of stone, while a number of books lie at his feet. The monument occupies the spot where Mr. Miller often stood when he was a boy watching his father's sloops coming in between the Sutors. The house in which he was born, and the woods and walks where he meditated are all familiar to the good folks in Cromarty. I addressed a temperance meeting in the Free Church on the Sabbath evening. I was very hospitably entertained during my stay in the Black Isle by Mr. James A. Gordon of Udale, and Mr. T. Middleton of Farness.

Both these gentlemen interested themselves in getting up a meeting at Newhall in the School House, which was well attended, and a number took the pledge at the close. I addressed an open-air meeting at Invergordon, then I took train to Dingwall, thence to Garve, on the Skye line. From the latter station there is a mail gig to Ullapool. A drive of twenty-five miles brings you to the head of Lochbroom. By a previous invitation I was requested to pass a night with Mr. Murdo Maclay, the schoolmaster of Lochbroom. Mr. Maclay is a fine type of a Highlander, open-hearted, kind, and intelligent. His conversation is alternately humorous and instructive. He is well acquainted with Highland character, and his intimate knowledge of the "big strath" and all that part of the Highlands, rendered him a most excellent and worthy host. His supper table was replenished with the good things of this life, and that never fails to afford consolation to the weary and jaded traveller. Being an ardent Good Templar he gave me information which impressed me much regarding the influence of the temperance movement round about him. He had been instrumental in getting all the men at the top of Lochbroom to go and join the lodge at Ullapool, seven miles distant. When enthusiasm was high they walked along the loch side to the lodge, but, alas! for the power of the liquor shops in Ullapool. They proved stronger as a corrupting power than the lodge did as a social purifying influence, and the Ullapool lodge is no mean one, for it has as good men in it as any lodge in the order has. All broke their pledges either before they went into the lodge or after they came out of it. They were safer seven miles up the valley where there was no public house and no lodge, than they were in Ullapool in a lodge and beset before and behind with temptations to drink. The lesson of course to be learned from this is that the law should be changed, and a suppressive veto placed in the hands of the people to enable them to shut the doors of the drink shops. Thousands who cannot withstand the fascinating attractions of the liquor, would in their best moments, when the opportunity was given them, vote away out of their sight those places which have proved a curse to them and theirs. I will not readily forget the pleasant night I spent with the "Dominie" of Lochbroom. A gentleman kindly gave us a drive on the following day to Ullapool. Here I addressed two meetings under the auspices of the Good Templars, and experienced much pleasure in my visit to Ullapool. The Good Templars are aiming at erecting a new hall. It is a brave attempt, and who would not wish them success? May the good men in Ullapool yet be able to conquer the dire enemy of their interesting town—strong drink. From Ullapool it is about 60 miles across the Minch to Stornoway. It is always an inspiration to go to the capital of the Outer Hebrides. Here one meets with a class of temperance men who are an honour to the temperance movement. Loyal to it in all its phases, and thoroughly ready for the popular vote, they would inspire faltering and timid men who tell our countrymen in half-despairing tones that we are not ready to prohibit the liquor traffic. Let such go to Stornoway, and the reformers there will tell them a different tale. This doctrine that is frequently taught is pernicious to the temperance enterprise. What would a farmer think if a lugubrious fellow were to go to him when he was preparing for harvest and tell him that all the farm was not ready? The wise farmer would say, "I know, but I intend to cut down the fields and the portions of fields which are ready, and I shall wait till the sun ripens the others." This is what the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association was formed to teach and enforce. It says "Give the ratepayers or the people the power by law to put in the prohibition sickle whenever their burghs, or parishes, or licensing areas are ripe for prohibition, and let them gather the harvest, and then we shall bring the sun of public opinion, and the power of our prohibitory agitation to bear upon districts which have been more exposed to the chilling blasts of the liquor traffic." The idea of waiting till all the country was ready is a hallucination that never entered into their minds. If the farmer did not reap his field when it was ripe he would soon lose it, and so when we have no power in law to reap prohibition in districts when public sentiment is in our favour, we lose it, for it is the nature of the drink institution to drag down public sentiment to its own level. The Stornoway reformers know this well. The sentiment there is above the level of the liquor traffic, hence they were able to defeat a number of licences, at last term, which were sought to be placed among them. This was due to the action of the Good Templars, aided by a number of the best men in the town whose sympathies are all in the lines of the temperance reformation. The Good Templars in Stornoway deserve credit for this advance in public opinion. Having created it, they wish to sustain it, hence their eagerness for a popular vote to enable them to smite the system of licence, and to usher in the day of complete emancipation from the drink bondage. I addressed meetings each evening of the week I stayed there, and during the day I had many pleasing interviews with all classes of the community. One interesting fact may be noted, that when the Duke of Edinburgh was in Stornoway in January last, at the request of Lady Matheson all the hotels were closed for 24 hours, and order and sobriety reigned supreme. The passage across the Minch to Ullapool is accomplished in 5 hours. Standing on the deck of the steamer, about the middle of the Minch, and looking eastward, a magnificent prospect meets the eye. It is a "Parliament of mountains." Some rise in gigantic ridges, others shoot their conical peaks up among the clouds, while others, like huge round boulders, tower to an immense height, and bear upon their ample foreheads patches of virgin snow. Those mountain ranges stretch along the west coasts of Sutherland, Ross, and Inverness-shires, and their bold and majestic forms cannot fail to impress every lover of nature with the sublimity of the scene. It is 100 miles from Stornoway to Dingwall, and all the way the traveller can enjoy some of the grandest scenery of the Western Highlands. The next place I visited was Tain. Here a special effort was made to get a good meeting, and the friends were successful. People just estimate the temperance movement in a town as it is estimated by those local men who guide the cause. Councillor M'Tavish presided, and gave a good tone to the meeting, which was well attended. I have no hesitation in saying that the drink trade in Tain would fall by the popular vote. There is an excellent Good Templar Lodge, and a temperance society with reformers in it of substantial character. My meeting in Golspie was small, but I received encouragement from the kindly reception I got from the temperance men of the town, and their words of sympathy and aid cheered me as I went on my way. I hope to have good meetings yet in Golspie. I had arranged before leaving Aberdeen to meet with the Rev. W. A. Farquhar of Lerwick at Wick in order to go with him to the Shetlands. We had a beautiful passage. I was a fortnight in Shetland, and during that time I addressed a series of interesting meetings held chiefly in the open air. There are two Good Templar Lodges in Lerwick and a Juvenile Lodge. The town is rising, and at the present time there is a great demand for house accommodation. Active, enterprising, and intelligent, the people of Lerwick are certain to win their way to a greater commercial prosperity than that to which they have already attained. A splendid Town Hall is in course of erection. They have an Educational Institution, whose pupils, for their intellectual acquirements, stand amongst the first in the kingdom. The Rector, Mr. John Allardyce, takes a great pride in his distinguished pupils. The fishing is being rapidly developed at Lerwick, and from all sources of information, I learned that there is a superabundance of wealth in the sea around Shetland. This wealth will be utilised by-and-by, for a larger class of boats are now being used by Shetland fishermen, and they are sure to reap a better harvest for their toil. Lerwick Bay, at this season, often presents a fascinating picture. The numerous ships lying at anchor, the fishing boats sailing out and in to the bay, the small pleasure crafts gliding through the water with their white sails spread to the breeze, while the sea-fowls soar overhead or bathe their plumage in the rippling waves, all combine to make the scene gay and attractive. I have not met with more pronounced prohibitionists anywhere than I have met with in Lerwick. Submit, say they, the question of license to the people themselves, and let the system stand or fall by the veto. This thought was caught by the old reformers in Lerwick at the time of the formation of the United Kingdom Alliance, and was held tenaciously by them at a critical moment, when short-sighted temperance men in more favoured circles would have snuffed out that noble organization—all honour then to the men of Lerwick. I stayed for a fortnight under the hospitable roof tree of the Rev. Mr. Farquhar, of the Congregational Church, Lerwick. I will not soon forget the kindness shown to me by him, and also by his excellent wife. To Mr. Farquhar and to Mr. Hector Morrison and other noble workers, the cause owes much. Their unflinching devotion to it is well known. Coming to Orkney, I addressed three meetings in Kirkwall and two in Stromness. There are two Good Templar lodges in Kirkwall and a temperance society. Efforts are being made in Stromness to resuscitate the temperance society. There is no reason why there should not be a good society in Stromness, for there are sound temperance men there. They only need cohesion. I had a good meeting in Thurso. The Temperance Society has regular meetings, and in that way the interest is maintained. Helmsdale has a model society, with constant meetings. The Rev. D. M. Macrae, of the Free Church, makes an admirable leader, and is a stern and uncompromising reformer. They always turn out large meetings in Helmsdale, for they try to do it. I addressed a fine meeting in Brora, and then ran to Aberdeen. I might have said much more regarding the latter places I have mentioned, but I must not weary your readers. Suffice it to say that during the seven weeks I was in the far north, I received many tokens of kindness, and the association which I represented was frequently wished God-speed in its mission.

NOON.

'Tis noon, and on the pleasant lea,
The light is bright as it could be,
The sun in its meridian height
Has filled the earth with ruddy light.

The summer hills are tinged with gold,
The glowing meads beneath are rolled,
And golden-tipped the rivers run,
Rejoicing in the summer sun.

Now is the hour, the glorious hour,
For man and for man's sport and power,
Now hand and brain with toil are fraught,
The soul has now its fullest draught.

Man in his labour stands supreme,
Pursues the object of his dream,
And onward toils with power and might,
Still mindful of the coming night.

And standing on this pleasant lea,
This thought comes still to you and me,
How in past ages men have thought,
And what great marvellous things they wrought.

They laboured in the world of mind,
And left a legacy behind,
The wise, heroic, and the witty,
O think of Newton, Burns, and Goethe.

Now time is ours to work and play,
Or to cast idly all away;
We all have something still to do,
Some useful object to pursue.

The golden radiance of the noon,
Will pass away, alas, too soon,
And when the night comes on we close
Our eyes and hasten to repose.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

JULY, 1882.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE Twenty-fourth Annual Meetings of this Association will be held (D.V.) in Glasgow on Tuesday, 26th September, 1882.

The Executive confidently hope that the friends of the movement will make arrangements to be present, as most important business will be brought under their consideration.

Particulars will be given in future issues of this magazine, and otherwise.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS RESOLUTION.

AFTER persistent ballotting for a place, Sir Wilfrid Lawson has secured a first place on Tuesday 18th inst., in which to move his resolution, which is in the following terms:—

“That in view of the great and grievous evils which the nation suffers from the Liquor Traffic, this House is of opinion that the power of removing the cause of these evils by some efficient measure of local option, as recommended by the resolutions of this House of June 18th, 1880, and June 14th, 1881, be entrusted to local communities at the earliest practicable opportunity.”

The Executive have resolved to afford the resolution active support, and hope to largely swell the British majority in its favour. They have already asked the co-operation of the Scottish Temperance League, The Independent Order of Good Templars, both sections, the Sons of Temperance, the Rechabites, the United Temperance Association, the Women's Christian Union, &c., and their own members and friends. The Blue Ribbon and Gospel Temperance movements are at present so active that it may be said some fifty or sixty thousand in Scotland have taken the pledge and donned “the bit of blue.” Let us see the political power of this new and welcome accession to the temperance forces exhibited in an increased vote on Tuesday the 18th inst. If the public-houses are suffering by the great drain on the publican's custom, we cherish no undue anticipation when we say we expect that honourable members will hear from these rescued friends urging them to secure power to them to vote away those public-houses which have been a curse to them, and may be as great, or even greater danger to their children. We rely on other staunch friends to stand by Sir Wilfrid Lawson as they have done so nobly and so often, and another great success is assured.

It will gratify our readers to know that we continue in increasing measure to receive the substantial sympathy of the ministers of all denominations in Scotland. In our last annual report there were fully seven hundred ministers, and up to the present time that number has been increased to eight hundred and fifty. It may enhance our readers' gratification to know in what proportion that support is afforded. The Free Church is at the head of the list with 308 subscribers, followed by the U.P. body with 222, the Established Church with 125, the Evangelical Unionists with 56, the Congregationalists with 41, the Baptists with 20, the Methodists with 16, the Episcopalians with 10, the Original Secessionists with 8, the Roman Catholics with 4, and the Independents with 2; while 36 subscriptions are received from those not in charges or whose denomination is not known, making a grand total of 850. This is a signal proof of the progress of the Association, and of the sympathy being extended by all the churches to its efforts to secure for the Scottish communities the power to suppress all traffic in alcoholic liquors. When the victory it aims to secure is decisively achieved, none will have greater cause for rejoicing than the churches in Scotland. That fervent piety once so characteristic of the Scottish people will once more glow in the church and in the household, and the wail so often heard over the lapsed mass and the fearful degeneracy of the times will cease to be heard. God hasten it.

During the joyous “outing” season now in full swing, with its excursions, picnics, garden parties, and delightful boatings, many dangers lurk in the way of the inexperienced and unsophisticated abstainer. It often seems proved that people appear to feel a fiendish pleasure in getting those to whom strong drink is really a temptation to break their recently formed vow of abstinence, and fall back into the odious slavery from which they have been but newly rescued. But the inexperienced, if obliged to consort with moderate drinkers, should exercise an unrelaxing and vigilant guard against all the wiles to which they may at one time or another be subjected. A firm and frank avowal of their resolution to adhere to the practice of abstinence most effectually puts the tempter to the rout; and this course we most heartily recommend. Where this is not made, the enemy must be met in detail. The request to drink a health should be parried; the proffer of liquor at dinner, or lunch, or repast, declined; the hinted badness of the water through sewage or organisms defied; the suggestion that liquor is the true remedy for fatigue should be met by withdrawal for repose; in every circumstance they should courteously resist the allurements of alcoholic hospitality. The evidence in favour of abstinence in travel or "Change" is overwhelming. People have made the "grand" tour, passed their holidays in distant lands or on the boundless deep, or in solitudes remote, and fortified by their abstinence from strong drink have keenly enjoyed all the pleasure they sought after, and have returned to their usual avocations fully recreated and with abundant energy to carry them through their labours until sweet summer returns. The "staying" power of the tourist or the holiday-seeker should be found in water—honest water, too weak to be a sinner.

When Neal Dow was asked to what he chiefly owed the intelligent appreciation of his proposed liquor law, he is said to have answered, "To having sown Maine knee-deep with literature." In our own country the most graphically told of all Joseph Livesey's efforts for the promotion of temperance is his week's run through Lancashire, with his colleagues, his car, his temperance flag, and his 9500 tracts. Whenever a halt was made to announce, by bell or drum, that a meeting was to be held, we are unfailingly told that tracts were showered upon the crowds. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association decided to have an unusually large supply of leaflets for their present summer open-air campaign. They printed a very large quantity, which is being rapidly exhausted. They have sold more than fifteen hundred Social Reformers for June at their open-air meetings. All this has been done with little or any help from the societies or from the great body of their friends. It seems as if these have been as yet unable to realize the immense importance of tract and literature distribution; but this apathy should be shaken off, and a hearty co-operation take its place. We should be able to keep a press continually in operation throwing off the most impressive, the most salient, the most telling facts and illustrations of our movement. We need add no more, but ask the attention of our readers to our advertisement in this issue of the excellent leaflets on sale at our offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow.

If, Asmodeus-like, we could peep into the chest that is being packed by many an emigrant bent on a departure to the land of the setting sun, we should have occasion, many times, for the outflow and overflow of our emotions. Among the more substantial portion of the providing, we should no doubt find a sprig of forget-me-not from the wimpling burnie's side, a sod from a baby's grave, or a daisy from the last low resting-place of a lost love, a lock of hair, part of the fair tresses of her who will never return, a leaf of the posey that Jamie ga'e me, a ribbon he bought to tie up my bonnie brown hair, a locket in which his likeness and mine are enshrined. How often are the wee flowers and the green sod watered with tears! How oft the ribbon and the jewel pressed almost convulsively to the quivering lip! Even stalwart, determined men have their little mementoes to be taken across the ocean wave. The mavis, that it may sing in their far-off land of an unforgettable home; the "bairdly" thistle, "Scotia's darling emblem," has often been transplanted, that it might wave as proudly over the prairie as it did over the lea. Alas for the patriotic intention that took it to bloom beyond the sea, for instead of being a glory it has become a pest. Wafted by the breeze, its down has sped over the land, struck its roots deep into the soil, and successfully absorbed the moisture and the sun that should have ripened the farmer's harvest. It has been found hardly possible to eradicate it, and consideration for the emotion of patriotism it sustains has been thrown aside, and the communities of British Canada came to an understanding to have a permissive law for its extinction. But it appears that these communities have been found slow to wage an exterminating war on a symbol so dear, and it is now made compulsory on them to have all thistles in their boundaries cut down by the 25th of June each year. So, in obedience to district necessities, the thistle dies. What matters the manly thoughts, proud national feelings, the historical associations inseparably entwined with its name, and its still grander motto—the people, acting on the stern old law that private feelings must give way to national necessities, have resolved that it shall no longer cumber the ground or usurp the soil. We forbear to paint Scotland "greetin' o'er her thistle," but rather ask, if Canadian townships are constrained to enter upon a war of extermination against the proud emblem of Scotland upon the ground of its rapacious usurpations, why does not a greater reason impel us to assail an interest doing a million times more evil than the thistle can do; which baffles our philanthropists, and flourishes in spite of all we have power meantime to do? The Canadians are consistent; they prefer the honest, sober citizen to the citizen embruted by drink, and they are suppressing the drinking saloon. They prefer barley, rye, maple, sugar, and apples to the thistle, even with its proud associations, and they are uprooting the emblem. Let us make our choice. Let us also continue to declare that we prefer the welfare of our own kith and kin to that of the publican. Let us make no mistake. Let not the associations inseparable from the traffic, its hollow pleasures, its boasted claims upon the revenue, blind us to its dreadful nature and its deplorable consequences, but rather quicken our zeal, invigorate our energies, and strengthen our resolves till we successfully combine our political power in an invincible effort for its overthrow by the power of the national will and through the form of a rate-payers' veto.

A few months back we drew attention to the proposed constitution of a "Home Colonist" party in a remote settlement of the United States. The constitution showed that these colonists were returning to that true simplicity of life which we generally associate with the golden age. We pointed this colony out, not as a sample, and in fact not as solitary, but as a specimen of many similar communities to be found on the surface of the earth. Last month we see from a paper read before the French Geographical Society by Dr. Le Bon, that away in the remote regions of the Carpathian mountains in Gallacia, there dwells a most primitive and unsophisticated community. There are several thousands in it, and all rejoice in the name of 'Podhalians.' Riches have no charms for them. They neither use strong drink nor eat animal food. Though poor they are content, and though their diet is spare and monotonous, they enjoy perfect health and live long lives. Their food is principally oats made in cakes, and for five months in the year they live, while in the mountain pastures, on goat milk whey. What is the character of this mountain race? They are remarkable for their vigour and energy, and are incontestably superior, physically and intellectually, to the neighbouring population. Their physique is remarkably pure; they are quick of apprehension and frank in manner. Their way of life is easy and tranquil—not because they have abundance, but because their needs are few, and they are free from the craving of stimulants, which is the curse of working people in other parts of Europe! They are poets and musicians, and their poetry is tender and artless in sentiment, generous and elevated in style—qualities which Dr. Le Bon attributes to natures that know neither violent passions nor unnatural excitements. It is hardly possible to conceive a greater contrast to the feverish civilization of to-day than that presented by this mountain tribe, or to imagine a more severe rebuke to its love of wealth, its manifold cravings, and its restless existence, than these simple people give by their unsophisticated lives. Love of wealth, love of feasting, love of excitement, have no charms for them. Yet these are the very errors to which the present members of so-called educated and cultured society are most prone, and through which they so deeply suffer. The race for wealth, the lust of feeding, and the alcoholic drink craving find no place in the desires of the Podhalians, and physically, morally, and emotionally, they tower above their neighbours. Their poetry, their song, their music, the dance, complete their round of recreations, and simple diet and abstinence from alcoholic liquors make up their joyous alimentary desires. Compare their life, in its linked sweetness long drawn out, with the people of our own land, and who will be so bold as to say that it does not immeasurably transcend that want of satisfaction, that fierce struggle for existence, that abnormal nervous drink excitement, that enfeebled constitution, and that doubtful future which is so eminently characteristic of so many of the people of our highly civilised society.

In prospect of a vacancy in East Lothian, by the resignation of Lord Elcho, or because of his succession to the Earldom of Wemyss, Mr. R. B. Finlay, of London, has been making the tour of the county giving expression to his views on the great questions of the day. On some of these much division of opinion exists, the Scotsman—ominous sign—being elated with him. On the question of prohibition he is nearly as bad as Lord Elcho, for he openly prefers licensing control through that political fraud, a Board specially elected by the ratepayers, and invested with plenary powers! We have nothing but opposition to such candidatures, and we expect that by and by they will be tossed aside as too shallow and ignorant for a robust prohibitory constituency anywhere in Scotland. The time is approaching rapidly when the franchise will be extended, and the new accession will be in no humour even to listen to a man that thinks he has solved the great drink difficulty, by proposing to deal with the liquor traffic effectively by an administrative Board rather than by an absolute veto; by a medicine that prolongs its sickly days rather than by a blow that stills its iniquities for ever. On the liquor question there must be no trimming. What help would such a candidate really be to Sir Wilfrid Lawson? He might be pressed to vote for the second reading of his bill, but in committee would be found defeating his object by voting for the old state of things under a new name. The candidate who pledges himself to support the absolute veto, through all its stages, is alone worth the working for, and alone worthy of support.

"S." the indefatigable correspondent of the Alliance News, says very wisely,—“The natural impatience felt by the friends of the Alliance at the parliamentary block should be no stop, but rather a spur to increased activity on behalf of prohibition. The manufacture and storage of force is always in season, and the application of it in the two forms—of getting an Act, and putting the Act into operation—will be proportioned to the amount of this power. It is in this way that hindrances and reverses may be “blessings in disguise.” Till Parliament can be acted on, let every temperance reformer give himself to the hopeful task of making those round him informed as to the character of the reform required, and interested in its promotion. This will make Sir Wilfrid all the stronger when he does get a hearing, and it will shape any Government measure into more complete conformity with our wishes.

Success, decisive and progressive, waits obsequiously upon the United Kingdom General Provident Institution. The last annual report is signally satisfactory. We have often drawn attention to its position, but rarely with such pleasure as we do now. There are two sections, one composed of very occasional or, as they like to style themselves, moderate drinkers: the other total abstainers. It is hardly to be conceived that there should be much difference between these two classes, but there is very much. A few years ago, the auditor, Mr. Hardy, grimly explained the reason of the difference; “the drinkers die so fast.” The effect of these repeated disclosures of the immense superiority of the temperance section over that of the general one, has had an educative effect of great importance, the members of the general section adopting abstinence that they might be qualified for the abstinence section. There were 533 expected claims on the Institution during the year, the actual claims were 421. In the general section the expected were 320, value, £68,664, the actual, 290, value, £61,055, only a difference of 30 claims: a close shave. This showed that for every 20 deaths expected 18 took place. Now look at the temperance section. There the expected claims were 213, value £46,987, the actual were 131 for £25,249, a difference in claims of 82. A very large difference. For every 20 deaths in the temperance section there were not quite 13 deaths, or 27% of a gain. Nothing can equal the significance of these figures; they eloquently speak of the great benefit of temperance, and show clearly how it contributes to length of days.

The Earl of Zetland is to be congratulated on the success of his appeal to the House of Lords. His gain, and it is an important one, is this. He is perfectly within his rights to make a stipulation in his leases or feus which excludes the liquor traffic from his property in all time coming. This is a most important deliverance, for it will vindicate the wisdom of those landlords who have in like manner excluded the liquor traffic from the soil they own by a proviso in their feu charters. And this judgment is not limited by any after proceedings in the Grangemouth case. If his lordship, as we heartily hope not, has proved to have been too dilatory in enforcing his rights and the publicans swarm in that busy port in spite of him, he may rely on the inhabitants availing themselves as soon as they may of the absolute veto and applying it without compunction and without compensation to their publican tyrants. We hope confidently that the evidence will be found overwhelmingly in favour of his lordship's contentions. Meantime it is a pleasure to read the public comments on the subject from the Duke of Argyll to the Anonymas of the press. His Grace may have strong leanings to feudal right, but his views on the evils of the public house are clear and forcible, and his advocacy of feuars and landlords' rights, deteriorated too often by the presence of liquor shops, are eminently cogent and convincing. But the Grangemouth case has a broader field of view. Citizens can rejoice at it. True, they may not be landlords but they are certainly electors, and they are themselves always in danger from, and but too often injured by, the sale of alcoholic drinks. They can alter and modify the order of existence in which they find themselves. They have done so times without number and for reasons not nearly so strong as those which should urge them to emulate Lord Zetland and enforce a righteous prohibitory law against the publicans who infest our centres, and having first squatted by sufferance demand to remain unmolested and secure.

During the past month the activity of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has been intense; and what is unusual, a number of friends who felt unable to assist the Association, out of doors have had numerous opportunities through the Blue Ribbon agitation to create and direct a sound prohibitory conviction, of which they have largely availed themselves. But the great strain of the work has fallen upon the open-air speakers. Mr. Blackwood speaks for himself in another part of this magazine. Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Waterstone, and Mr. A. Bennet find honourable mention in our intelligence columns. Mr. Waterstone has had a candidature, that of East Lothian on his hands, and for the future gain of the agitation it is to be regretted that he had not better candidates upon whom to exercise his electioneering abilities. Mr. Stevenson has had a signally successful series of meetings in the north. Mr. A. Bennet is rapidly ingratiating himself with the friends in the south of Scotland; while Rev. Samuel Harding, Mr. James Scrymgeour, Dundee, Messrs. Dransfield, Mackay, and Kesson have been earning golden opinions through their labours around Glasgow. They are all needed, for conjoined with the great movements in Scotland there is a great deal of zeal without knowledge. Like every other propaganda the Scottish prohibitory movement is shut out from parliamentary effort, but it does not fold its hands in either discouragement or despair. It continues its appeals to the people in the confidence and in the patience of a hope that when an opportunity does appear the friends it has made will be all the stronger to bend that opportunity to the great purpose of securing power to overthrow the liquor traffic.

It is deplorable that the Government will not be more vigorous in their dealings with the liquor traffic; but where they fail in vigour the temperance forces fail in unity, thus giving a Government averse to effective action the excuse that the country has not made up its mind, and therefore they must wait a little. Now the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association never has deviated from its conception of the evil, nor ever interpreted local option as other than entrusting communities with the power to abolish all liquor traffic injuriously affecting them. But other temperance reformers, instead of supporting the enactment of a law so eminently practical and just, are promoting schemes which are not prohibitory and never can be used for prohibition. We find that a large and most respectable body of United Presbyterians are busily engaged getting signatures to a document which sets forth "that local option is urgently demanded; that it should be vested in local boards elected by the ratepayers for the one specific purpose of dealing with the drink traffic, and that these boards should possess the same legal powers to refuse, grant, or renew licenses as possessed by the licensing courts under the existing law." Now this is simply to have a different authority with the same powers, and these powers are exclusive of the power to suppress. The friends of prohibition must repudiate such a scheme, which every publican and publican organisation will hail with delight; for under it the traffic will flourish in spite of all attempts these boards may make for its control. There are not more than the signatures of three licensing magistrates or justices at this declaration, the rest being ministers and heads of colleges. Now what we would like to see would be these ministers formed into a board of liquor control. They would be in a relation to the traffic near enough to see it in all its horrors, and we should soon see them as warm friends of the veto over the traffic, as they seem to be of a board for its regulation.

The Blue Ribbon movement continues to produce wondrous results wherever the friends combine their money and their efforts to achieve success. Aberdeen and Paisley have been the centres where Mr. Murphy and his friends have been bringing in the reclaimed from the drink swamps of our land. Fifteen thousand from Aberdeen, and nineteen thousand from Paisley, as accessions to the Blue Ribbon Army, speak with great power of the desire of the people to be freed from the drink bondage. It makes effectual answer to that silly objection that the people will not enforce prohibition when they have it in their power. Indeed! If they are so eager to lay aside the habit of drinking, is it to be believed that they will hesitate to banish temptation to drinking when they have it in their power? In Stewarton, Johnstone, Denny, Leith, and many other places, this aspect of the agitation finds great favour. The Scottish Permissive Bill Association rejoices at this work, even although its immediate result may not be prohibition. Every one won from the power of the drinking customs weakens the traffic, and strengthens prohibitory convictions. Hence its advocates and agents have gladly thrown themselves into the work, at the same time convinced that, great and urgent as the work of making abstainers is, it is greater and more urgent to stop the public-house, and thus stop the making of drinkers whom the good and the sober will have to attempt to rescue, and yet have their hearts wrung with sorrow, that notwithstanding all their efforts, so many will perish in their debasing sin. The greatest lesson which this mission presents is that an effort in favour of prohibition on the same scale as is now being made in favour of total abstinence, would bring prohibition into actual operation over Scotland nearer by years. We rejoice to think that this thought is finding a place in the minds of many friends. May it deepen and strengthen day by day!

PAYMENT OF WAGES IN PUBLIC HOUSES—OPENING OF MUSEUMS—ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS—SUNDAY CLOSING (ENGLAND)—PETERHEAD LICENSING CASE—CORK RACES—DRUNKENNESS IN THE ARMY—SPANISH WINES—PETERHEAD LICENSING CASE.

May 19.—The payment of wages in Public-Houses' Prevention Bill was read a third time and passed in the House of Lords.

— in the House of Commons Mr. G. Howard moved in favour of the opening of all museums and picture galleries supported by national funds. In course of his speech he said, "As things were at present, the only place any one had to go to was the public-house. (Cheers.) The churches were shut many hours of the Sunday. (Hear, hear.) If the local option majority were in earnest they would support this resolution—(hear, hear)—which, though it did not deal directly with the temperance question, provided an attraction for the people on the day when temptations to intemperance were the greatest. (Hear, hear.) Some might say the right way was to shut up the public-houses altogether on Sundays. He was one of these people, but if they did shut up the public-houses the demand for opening up some other places would be far stronger than now. Mr. Burt said that in the working men's clubs, working men had thrown aside the idle and the frivolous, though innocent amusements, in which they indulged in on other days and devoted their time to the listening to lectures and solid methods of improvement. His impression was that public opinion was going entirely and very fast ripening in the direction of closing altogether the beer shops and gin palaces on Sunday—(cheers)—and, at the same time in the direction of throwing open these purer and more healthy places of recreation as a substitute for the demoralizing influence of the public-houses. (Cheers.) Mr. Alex. Arthur said while he did not think the opening of these institutions would wean the people from the public-houses he believed they would draw them away from the Sunday schools which had done so much to elevate the people of this country. He also believed that it would increase the consumption of ardent spirits, because wherever they had these places open they must have refreshment bars. Mr. Cairne said his amendment that these places do not open before one o'clock had been accepted by the mover of the resolution. With regard to the extraordinary statement of the honourable member for Leicester (Mr. M'Arthur) that the opening of museums and innocent places of amusement on Sunday would produce a larger consumption of ardent spirits, he desired to remind the House that it had twice affirmed the desirability of entire Sunday closing of public-houses, while it had not once expressed an affirmative opinion on the question now under consideration, so that they were more likely to have legislation first on the former subject than on the latter. Mr. Onslow believed that nothing would fill the public-houses more than the opening of these places. How would hon. members like to be on their legs in the National Gallery or in the Crystal Palace for three hours without getting some refreshment, and where could people go but to the public-houses. (Cheers.) Do not let any one suppose he was in favour of closing public-houses. (Ironical cheers.) Still to be consistent he must tell hon. members opposite that if they carried out their views nothing more would tend to fill the public-houses than the opening of these places of amusement. Sir W. Lawson said the hon. member for Guilford (Mr. Onslow) was one of the strongest advocates for opening public-houses and yet he would shut museums. (Laughter.) It seemed to him as if the established religion of this country was the worship of Bacchus—(laughter)—and the hon. member shuddered lest the power of Bacchus should be diminished if this motion were adopted. (Laughter, and hear, hear.) He did not believe that going to see stuffed monkeys—(laughter)—would elevate a man to the highest pitch. (Renewed laughter.) All he said was that it was much better to go there than to these abominable places which the law opened for them to go at present. (Cheers.) The motion was lost by 208 to 83 votes. The result was loudly cheered.

May 22.—On the motion of Mr. Corry a return was ordered giving the number of arrests for drunkenness within the metropolitan district of Dublin, the cities of Cork, Limerick and Waterford, and the town of Belfast on Sundays between the 1st day of May, 1881, and the 30th day of April, 1882, both days inclusive, the arrests being given from 8 a.m. on Sundays until 8 a.m. on Mondays.

May 24.—Mr. Stevenson obtained leave to bring in a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday.

June 5.—In reply to Dr. Cameron the Lord Advocate said that he had made careful inquiry in the case at Peterhead to which the hon. member had referred. At the joint Confirmation Licensing Committee on 15th May applications were presented for the confirmation of three licenses which had been unanimously granted by the magistrates. Two of these were for porter and ale licenses which had expired that day. There was not a quorum present, only three out of six being present. Those present made the following deliverance—"The Confirming Committee confirm, so far as they have power to confirm (a quorum not being present), the above three certificates subject to the parties taking the risk of the Court not being complete, and, in respect of no one appearing to oppose the application, and, further, that the magistrates unanimously granted the licenses at the Licensing Court." If the whole committee had attended the confirmation would have been assured. The remark of the provost that he did not think that "there was much fear of them, and if it were him he would take the risk and give a fellow the drink he wanted" was merely spoken in jest, and they were so understood by those addressed. The applicants have been selling liquors since that date, and the Excise have accepted the duty on deposit till a Confirmation Court is held. He would not say if the confirmations were legal or not. Dr. Cameron said that he would give notice to ask the secretary of the treasury whether it was not the case that the Excise had accepted these confirmations, and if so, under what statute they had power to do so.

— Mr. Trevelyan, in reply to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, said it was true that a meeting of the Cork city magistrates was held on 28th May, at which it was resolved not to grant any occasional licenses for the races there on 7th June, and that one magistrate had attempted to defeat this resolution by signing the necessary certificates for such licenses, but as the magistrates who were themselves responsible for the peace and good order of the city had not complained, the Executive did not see their way to interfere.

June 12.—Mr. Caine gave notice that he would ask the Judge Advocate-General this day week how many punishments for drunkenness, either summary or by court-martial, had been inflicted on officers and men in the army during 1880 and 1881, and whether a circular had been issued by the War Office in which it was stated that special advantages were offered to soldiers for obtaining beer in the canteens.

June 13.—Mr. Courtenay, replying to Dr. Cameron, who gave notice of his question on 15th, said,—“The Excise had not granted any of the three licenses at Peterhead, but, in accordance with their usual practice and not in contravention of any Act of Parliament, they informed the applicants that if they thought, subject to the license duty to sell on their own responsibility pending full confirmation, they would not be interfered with so far as the Excise was concerned. Dr. Cameron gave notice that he would, on Thursday, ask whether the Act did not prevent the granting of licenses on new certificates until full confirmation had taken place.

June 15.—Sir Chas. Dilke, in answer to Mr. H. Lea said, that the Government were not in a position to explain the nature of the negotiations on Spanish wine.

— Mr. Courtenay, in answer to Dr. Cameron, said, that the Board of Inland Revenue were alone responsible for the course taken by their officer at Peterhead in allowing the three parties who were selling liquors there to sell liquors without having such licenses confirmed, and they would not take action against any of their own officers. The Board did not grant licenses. The Justices' clerk said that a meeting would be held about the middle of this month. The taking action on the applicants would be unjust to them who, but for the non-attendance of the Confirmation Court, would have had their licenses granted or refused, but if they or any other person chose they could proceed against them for selling liquor without a license.

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—The venerable Assembly was opened on Thursday, 25th ult., by the Earl of Aberdeen, the High Commissioner, with the usual formalities. On the 3rd curt., Rev. G. Wilson, of Cramond, gave in the report of the Committee on Intemperance, which stated that much effective work had been done during the year. The report showed that from every part of Scotland ministers, elders, and members were striving against the evils of drunkenness with deeper interest, more earnest zeal, and more direct agency. Intemperance is more frequently referred to in sermons, and the annual sermon enjoined by the Assembly is more effective in its influence. The number of temperance associations throughout the Church is increasing, their management is becoming more successful, and their influence more apparent, and their conferences more frequent. The Blue Ribbon movement is favourably noticed, the churches showing sympathy and giving aid. The most popular agency in behalf of temperance is Bands of Hope, which have sprung up in all directions. The University temperance societies are flourishing. The ladies' association has got under way in a most auspicious manner, and counteractive agencies are growing. The committee call attention to (1) That magistrates should be more strict in granting licenses; (2) That chief constables should make a systematic report of persons seen leaving public-houses intoxicated; (3) More strict and careful enforcement of the law relating to transfers should be attended to. The committee would like to see (1) Public-houses earlier closed, because there is more drunkenness produced after 10 o'clock, and on Saturday they might be closed earlier than 10 p.m.; (2) Roadside inns should be reduced to taverns so that the bona fide traveller might be abolished; (3) There should be a radical change in the law relating to grocers' licenses; (4) The age at which boys and girls should get liquor should be raised. The committee, pointing out the measures which had been before Parliament—Free Licensing, Permissive Bill, Gothenburg System, the Chamberlain System, and Lord Campbell's Bill—say that this fact shows that the next bill which passes into law will give effect to a restrictive policy. Mr. J. N. Cuthbertson, Glasgow (elder), moved the following deliverance:—“The Assembly approve of the report, reappoint the committee, with Rev. George Wilson, convener. The Assembly, deploring the intemperance prevalent in Scotland, and recognising that it is one of the greatest hindrances to the prosperity of the Church and the welfare of the country, strongly recommend all members of the Church to give earnest attention to this important subject, and to promote, by personal example and every lawful effort, the observance of temperance throughout the Church; and instruct the committee to promote, wherever practicable, organisations with a total abstinence and general section, and to further the formation of juvenile branches, that the Church may be united in her strength against the evils of drunkenness. The Assembly learn with satisfaction that a Church of Scotland Ladies' Temperance Association has been formed, and warmly commend it to the sympathy and support of the women throughout the Church. The Assembly commend to the consideration of the inferior courts of the Church the statement in the report concerning the statutes regulating the liquor traffic, with the suggestions thereon. The Assembly, believing that much good would result from a reduction in the number of licensed houses and the earlier closing of public-houses, would hail with satisfaction legislation in this direction, and instruct the committee to watch over any measure coming before the Legislature that affects the temperance interests of the Church. The Assembly recommend ministers frequently to direct and exhort their congregations from the pulpit on the subject of intemperance, and specially to do this on Sunday, 17th December next.” He said that no agencies could succeed unless the Church took its proper place in the matter. The committee was not a total abstinence committee but one for the suppression of intemperance, and he thought the Church was within its duty in condemning intemperance. He asked the Church to strengthen the rising temperance opinion in the country, which it had the power to do, and all should cordially cooperate in this matter. Mr. M'Kenzie, Little Dunkeld, said it was noticeable that wherever the ministers of the Church of Scotland gave countenance to the Blue Ribbon movement it had succeeded beyond expectation, but where they had merely given their sympathy and refused their cooperation it did not meet with the success which had attended it in other places. Rev. Dr. F. L. Robertson, Glasgow, said that although ministers held different opinions on this matter, all should cooperate. He had thorough and cordial sympathy with the work done by the committee. He was not himself personally a teetotaler, nor imagined it likely that he ever would be one, but thought the Church was bound to the enterprise for the sake of the men engaged in the trade. Large numbers of the trade were in their churches, and as was sometimes done, they ought not to discourage these from becoming members of their churches. So long as a man engaged in a lawful trade, and carried it on with integrity, faithfulness, and purity of life, he was entitled to be a member of the Church. They should protect these men from the evils of the trade, and in any efforts in favour of wholesome legislation they were neglecting what might prove a very potent and valuable ally in not endeavouring to gather round them the better spirited members of the trade. When they held up a particular calling, whether lawful or not, to contempt, and heaped contumely upon it, they thereby tended to degrade in their own self-respect all the men engaged in it, and he did not think that the Church was warranted in doing so with respect to what was after all undoubtedly a legal calling. He knew of no calling requiring greater faithfulness, greater strength of character and will than that of the liquor traffic. If a bold effort was made to induce the legislature to insist that public-houses should not be opened before eight or nine in the morning and should be closed at nine at night, the question would be practically settled for a generation; about nine-tenths of the evil would vanish, and surely twelve hours a-day afforded ample opportunity for a man to get drunk if he was determined to get drunk. He did not think that closing public-houses as he proposed would be any interference with the liberty of the subject, and he was certain it would produce a most beneficial revolution, at all events among certain classes of society. Rev. Mr. Gunn, Dollar, urged personal abstinence as the most powerful of all influences in the matter of temperance reform. Rev. Dr. Lees, Edinburgh, said that he had the most intense sympathy with all movements in the direction of promoting temperance. He sympathised with Mr. Gunn to a very considerable extent, though he did not, like that gentleman, see his way to become an abstainer, because he believed he should have less influence in his present position by becoming an abstainer than he had by cultivating what he ventured to call temperance and showing, as he hoped he did, moderation in this as in other things. He believed the true remedy for this fearful curse was to be found in moral and spiritual influences. He had not the same faith that some good men had in restrictive measures, and, so far as external remedies were concerned, he went rather for counter-acting agencies, and should like to see a great deal more done in the way of promoting sound amusement for the people. So long as human nature was what it was, it must have, and would have, amusement; if a man did not get it in one place he would go and find it in another; and he believed there was nothing in a city like Edinburgh that tended so much to hinder the cause of temperance as the fact that the working man often had no place for recreation and for unbending himself after the toils of the day except the public-house. (Hear, hear.) He had travelled in many countries of Europe, and had often watched with admiration the working man and his family sitting out in the evening in beautiful gardens, and listening to beautiful music; and he should like to see more facilities in that direction given in this country. It was often said our climate was against it. That was true; but in Holland and in Sweden he had seen large palaces to which, if the weather was inclement, people could repair, and where, amid beautiful flowers and plants, they could listen to music and have coffee or some light refreshment, and go home none the worse; and, in a city like Edinburgh or Glasgow, no man could confer a greater benefit on the community than in erecting a large glass palace, where working people and others could go and spend an evening free from the temptations of the kind they were considering. After suggesting that ministers might do good by getting medical men to deliver lectures, such as were given in Edinburgh during the winter, on the diseases caused by intemperance, Dr. Lees went on to say he believed there was a great deal of fearful intemperance caused by the vile stuff often sold to the working classes under the name of drink. In Paisley, he had heard men coming out of a foundry saying, "Let's have a glass of spell the wa'"—"spell the wa'" being a fearful stimulant of vitriolic character, which so maddened them that they felt inclined to climb any wall they came in contact with. He believed a great deal would be done, in the way of promoting the objects they had in view, if some steps could be taken to stop the sale of the most fearful poisonous stuff that was often sold to the working classes under the name of liquor.

Professor CHARTERIS suggested that the Assembly should recognise the service which had been rendered by the committee in presenting a connected view of licensing legislation.

Words to this effect were accordingly inserted in the deliverance, which, after a few remarks from Mr. Wilson, expressive of satisfaction with the spirit of the discussion, was unanimously adopted.

Mr. MACINTOSH, secretary to the Glasgow Working

Men's and West of Scotland Sabbath Protection Association, was introduced by Dr. Campbell, M.P., and submitted a memorial setting forth the grave abuses attending the sale of alcoholic liquors on board Sunday steamers. Dr. Campbell moved the Assembly to remit the memorial to the Committee on Intemperance with powers. Mr. Campbell Swinton, seconding, expressed his surprise that this matter had not been more persistently pressed upon their attention, and by them upon the legislature. He knew what a monstrous and crying evil it was, and it was impossible for the committee to take too speedy means of bringing it before Parliament. The motion was agreed to, and the association and its representative, Mr. Macintosh, awarded a vote of thanks.

THE FREE CHURCH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—This Assembly met at Edinburgh on Thursday, 18th ult., Rev. Dr. M'Donald, moderator. On the 19th Rev. Alex. M'Kenzie brought up the report on religion and morals, which bore that Sabbath-breaking was on the increase, that discipline is exercised principally for ante-nuptial fornication and drunkenness, that there is much reading of profane literature on Sundays; indifference and irreligion too often characterise the farm servants who, as a class, do not attend the Free Church. There is much to be thankful for however, and the visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey is favourably referred to. The convener said that there was no mention of the Salvation Army in the report. There were different reports and different judgments on it. Their modes of procedure in conducting their work were not what as a Church they to a large extent approve. Perhaps the evil did counterbalance the good, and while the good might be more evanescent the evil might be more permanent. He felt a difficulty in whether or not classifying these workers under the class which our Lord referred to. "He that is not against us is for us." With all that was doing outside the Church the question might be asked, "What was the Church itself doing?" And when he spoke of the Church he meant not its ministers only but its members. What was the power of the Church in this light on the evils of the world in correcting and subduing them? The last census of church attendance brought out a sad state of religious indifference, and it was to be feared that this defective attendance on divine ordinances was not to be laid at the door of one class only but of all classes. Dr. Adams, in speaking to the report, deplored the weakened reverence for the Sabbath, the increased facilities for Sabbath travelling, and the institution of the Sunday Society. Rev. Dr. A. Bonar deprecated the Salvation Army and praised the movement conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. The rest of the discussion afforded nothing of interest. The Church is evidently far from seeing the means of holding her own and making progress. On the 20th the Assembly dealt with a reference from the Presbytery of Glasgow in the case of Rev. W. J. Thomson, junr., minister of Bridge-ton Free Church. Mr. Thomson had confessed that as a member of an Irish presbytery he had been guilty of intoxication, and in his late charge he had also been intoxicated. He tendered his resignation, the which the Presbytery declined, suspending him, however. Although summoned five times he had failed to appear, and was deposed, but finally resolved to report to the General Assembly. The Assembly was moved to depose, and after prayer the moderator in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ solemnly deposed W. J. Thomson from the office of the ministry. On Monday there was a conference on temperance for two hours. The first speaker was Rev. J. Scott, B.Sc., Glasgow, who gave an account of the gospel temperance and evangelical movement in Glasgow, carried on under the auspices of the United Evangelistic Association. Mr. Moody had kept them so hard at work that they had not been able to make up their annual report, but they had the previous year pledged 6,000. The crowded meetings in the Circus had been very successful, and the testimonies given by converted drunkards had induced others to take the pledge. Hundreds of men had been converted to Christ. Mr. Moody gave a most characteristic speech. In course of it he frankly admitted that he had not given the subject of Bible temperance sufficient attention. It seemed to him that the Church of God should look at this question. It was time she did when one out of every eleven of the inhabitants of Britain was either in the madhouse or in the penitentiary, or a pauper or a drunkard. Pointing to God's prohibition of drinking by the priests, he said, Had not the time come in Scotland when the ministers were putting it away. (Applause.) He did not come to censure or condemn, God forbid. He wished all the drink in the Atlantic Ocean and all the brewers and distillers in the kingdom of God. (Applause.) What were they going to do with these men that were taking drink, for if they did not reach out a hand to them they would lapse and become worse than ever. Could they honestly advise a man to go to a church the minister of which was a moderate drinker. Here they had got hundreds of these men and some of them had not been sober on a Sabbath for a year, but now they were struggling into liberty, coming out of captivity, getting their feet set upon a rock, and God was putting a new song into their mouth. Would they put them under moderate-drinking ministers and thus tempt the men? If these men were nursed and looked after by the Church he believed they would stand. The Rev. Dr. Gordon, of Boston, admitted into his church twenty-six confirmed drunkards. A few months ago the speaker wrote asking for results. The answer was that twenty-three had stood for the four years—(applause)—one had died, one had a slip but was again reclaimed, and one only had fallen out of the whole. (Applause.) He believed if the church of God arose at this present time and reached out a helping hand to these men that were struggling to be free, it would be the grandest day Scotland had ever seen. (Applause.) He was amazed to see how these men wished the temptation put out of their way—they said it would be all right if it were not for the public-houses. (Applause.) Referring to the extraordinary immigration to Kansas, he said that he believed the working classes were going away from their old homes to be out of the way of temptation. He was told that the moderate use was a higher ground than teetotalism, but he could not see how a man could get any higher than putting away a thing for Christ's sake. (Applause.) Nation after nation had gone down on account of it, and he could not see how this nation could stand it much longer. The time, he thought, had come when every Christian man should put it away and set an example. It was hard work when they had godly men advocating moderate drinking. When he met a godly man—a man they looked up to, a man seemingly living in communion with God—defending drink, it was pretty hard work to go and tell these men in the gutter to give up drinking. He used to think and say, Preach the gospel and do not take the pledge, and to-day he would keep holding up Christ's gospel, but at the same time let a man take the pledge and stand firm to it. (Applause.) If they brought him to Christ and let him hear that moderate drinking was not very bad, he might fall and bring scandal on the cause of Jesus Christ. After referring to the Israelites, Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist, he continued, he could do as much work as most men—(laughter and applause)—and that without stimulants. He did not believe the world was to be reached by drinking ministers. He was talking to a publican who had four shops in Glasgow, and to his amazement the publican took up some of the arguments he had heard from ministers advocating that it was one of God's great mercies. Now, he said, "Look here, my friend, pray over the matter. If it is right, let us go down to your shop to-morrow morning, and let us open it with prayer if you say your business is honourable." A distiller in Campbellton where he had visited said, "If you can show me my business is not according to the Word of God I will give it up." He (Mr. Moody) said—"Look at it this way—Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink or whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God. Now, do you distil your whisky to the glory of God?" (Applause.) He would like to see a distiller go down beside a barrel of whisky to pray to God, "Send out this whisky and let it be a blessing to my fellow-men." (Loud applause). Mr. J. C. White, Glasgow, next addressed the Assembly, narrating how he had been induced in December last, after dealing with a victim of intemperance at the close of an evangelistic meeting, to become an abstainer, because he felt that his influence would be powerless in the work of reclaiming the intemperate unless he, for their sake, abstained from the use of all intoxicating drinks. He now felt strongly that, unless they made up their minds, for Christ's sake, to give up the use of intoxicating drink, they would not have the power over the class of intemperate men that they otherwise would have. Six months ago he could not have endorsed what Mr. Moody had just said; but from his experience in evangelistic work amongst the intemperate, he felt satisfied that if a minister wished to hold up Christ to sinners so as to rescue them from the power of this prevailing sin, he must have his own hands clear of the drinking customs. (Applause.) Rev. Dr. Andrew Bonar concurred. Mr. Howie, Govan, said that at one time, by medical advice, he took bitter beer; but he soon found that if he had the smell of beer he would lose his influence over the people. He had been for seventeen or eighteen years a teetotaler, and he wished that all his brethren in the ministry would think of the influence they might exercise over others by being abstainers. Mr. Bannerman said he had received a letter from Mr. J. H. Martin, the secretary of the Dundee Temperance Society, intimating that Provost Moncur had abolished the cake-and-wine banquet usually held on the Queen's birthday, and to show that total abstainers were not lacking in loyalty he had issued invitations for a temperance luncheon that day. Upwards of 30,000 names had been enrolled in connection with the blue ribbon movement in Dundee, and of these the visitors found that comparatively few had lapsed, and these were more than made up for by those who joined in connection with the visitation. (Applause.) On Thursday the annual meeting of the Temperance Society was held in the Bible Society's rooms. Rev. J. C. Burns presided. The report was submitted by Rev. W. Ross, secretary. He said that there are fully 500 abstaining ministers in the Free Church. Great progress had been made in some quarters, and during the past eighteen months 80 Highland ministers had adhered to their principles. The chairman was of opinion that the conference was the best he ever remembered to have seen. Rev. R. Milligan reported on the marvellous progress of the cause in Dundee. The movement there had begun to tell upon the revenue to an alarming extent. (Applause.) The revenue from liquor was decreasing at the rate of £1000 per week. Mr. J. Guthrie, J.P., Brechin, gave a humorous address, and through his appeal 40 of those present put on the blue ribbon. Provost Campbell, Greenock, and other gentlemen addressed the meeting, and several new members were enrolled at the close. The same evening the Assembly resumed the consideration of the committee's report on temperance. As regards local option, a deputation from the Free Church and U.P. Church had had an interview with Lord Rosebery and the Lord Advocate; and 16 Presbyteries and 2 Synods had petitioned in favour of a local option measure for Scotland. The subject was discussed at presbyterial conferences; and the declaration in favour of licensing boards had been widely signed by ministers and others of the F.C. The report referred to the Gospel Temperance and Blue Ribbon missions in favourable terms. It had been successful where its founder and his coadjutors had never been. Several presbyteries had petitioned in favour of Dr. Cameron's bill. The committee was engaged with the consideration of Lord Campbell's Licensing Bill, which had been strongly opposed by both publicans and teetotalers. The committee, though glad that a youthful member of Parliament should give his attention to this matter, looked upon his bill as unworkable. The committee recommended a special conference on local option and gospel temperance, and that the Assembly again petition in favour of local option. Rev. D. D. Bannerman, in submitting the report, said there was a rising interest in the temperance cause, and a wave of moral quickening passing over the country of the most remarkable and hopeful kind. He remembered getting three rules from Rev. Dr. Fairbairn of Newhaven for such a time as this. Whenever you are brought into contact with any spiritual movement such as that amongst us, first sympathise, second superintend, third supplement. He specially commended the gospel temperance movement to the sympathy of the younger members of the Church. In regard to local option for Scotland, to which this committee had devoted during the past year a great deal of consideration and a great deal of effort, he hoped the brethren would consider carefully what was said in the report. Mr. Guthrie, J.P., Brechin, moved the deliverance of the Assembly, thanking the committee for its labours; renewing the injunction to preach a sermon on temperance on third Sabbath of December; rejoicing in the encouraging statements in the report; exhorting ministers and office-bearers to show sympathy with such movements as those promoted by Messrs. Moody, Murphy, and others, and to use the opportunities presented to them by such movements for the restoration of the fallen; expressing their sympathy with the declaration of the Glasgow conference; instructing the committee to take all steps to further the object of the declaration, and to petition in favour of a local option measure for Scotland. Mr. Guthrie said that he considered the Church countenanced drinking, and it remained with the Church to cure drunkenness. He hoped to live to see the time when all Christian ministers would be total abstainers. (Applause.) Rev. Lewis Davidson, St. Andrews, in seconding the motion, said the temperance question was now in the forefront. In its behalf there had been an awakening of sympathy, conscience, and intelligence, and though the battle was not won, there was an opportunity offered for brave men stepping in and obtaining the victory. (Applause.) Were they to follow or were they to lead in this movement? That question addressed itself to every minister in the Church. He should not only give his sympathy, but he should step down into the arena and take his place in the fight. The young ministers in the Church were ready to take their part in the fight. (Applause.) Rev. Mr. Martin, Stornoway, referred to the importance of cutting off the supply of drink as the best means of curing intemperance. Major Ross, Aberdeen, said that the tide of temperance was rising and it would rise till it had submerged this abominable traffic in drink. One great hope he had in Mr. Murphy's movement was that it was taking such a hold of the young. This drink traffic with which they had been tampering and trifling these years past was destroying all around, and they refused to deny themselves a little luxury that this accursed thing might be swept out of their country. (Applause.) Rev. Mr. M'Kinnon, from Canada, detailed the working of the Scott Act. In Georgetown they had abolished the public-houses. The result is that drunkenness has disappeared. (Applause.) The county jail of the town, where there was a considerable number of people always, was emptied, so that several times when the court sat there were no criminals to try, and the jailor said they were thinking of turning the prison into a hydropathic. (Laughter.) It was true the Act had not entirely abolished the sale and the drinking, but it had sent the sale into the category of crime, and the illicit sale was confined to the very lowest classes. All the ministers and most of the elders were teetotalers. (Applause.) Rev. Dr. Nicholson, Linlithgow, a born teetotaler, said that toast-drinking had been abolished at ordinations in the Presbytery of Linlithgow. (Applause.) Bailie Dickson, Glasgow, said that the last time he sat on the bench, out of 95 cases brought before him, 85 cases sprang directly from drink. Rev. J. G. Cunningham remarked on the largeness of the meeting. He was glad that the testimony of the Church at this time was so largely in favour of personal abstinence and local option. (Applause.) Those in favour of the traffic dared not speak in its behalf, and there was a mighty power in public opinion that might be brought to bear on this traffic to an extent unprecedented. The deliverance was adopted. The committee, on the application of Rev. A. C. Kay to be reponed, could not recommend that he be so just now. The Assembly left his case to the Commission, with powers.

The Weekly Tract Society, which issues excellent narrative tracts in large type for working people, every week, is for a short time making one-third price grants of the tracts issued by the society. Thus for 5s., 15s. worth of useful tracts can be obtained. As the quantity set apart for distribution on these conditions is very limited, early application should be made to the secretary, Mr. Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

DUNDEE—GOSPEL TEMPERANCE UNION.—Last night (4th ult.) a great open-air meeting of the Union was held in the Barrack Park. Notwithstanding the threatening character of the weather, from 1600 to 2000 persons were congregated. The Rev. Andrew Inglis presided. Mr. Robert Stevenson, of Glasgow, made a powerful appeal in favour of the general adoption of abstinence from intoxicating liquors. Messrs. James Scrymgeour and John Carter also delivered telling addresses. Upwards of 2000 tracts and leaflets were distributed, and a considerable number of persons took the pledge, and donned the blue ribbon at the close of the meeting.—Dundee Courier and Argus.

DUNDEE—OPEN-AIR TEMPERANCE MEETING.—The last of the present series of open-air meetings for the advocacy of the Permissive Bill and local option principles was held at the High School Gate on 8th ult. In the absence of Councillor Smith, the chair was occupied by Mr. John Carter, agent of the Dundee Temperance Society. There was a large attendance, with a mixture of all classes, and all were apparently interested in the proceedings. Stirring addresses were delivered by the chairman, Mr. James Scrymgeour, and Mr. Robert Stevenson, agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. Many hundreds of temperance tracts were distributed, and at the close a good many names were registered in the blue ribbon roll.—Dundee Advertiser.

TEMPERANCE SHIP LAUNCH.—At ship launches it has hitherto been the custom to use, in the christening ceremony, a bottle of wine; it is, however, satisfactory to record that at the yard of Messrs. Edward Withy & Co., Hartlepool, water is used instead. On the 2nd ult., a fine large steamer, about 3,100 tons burthen, was launched for Mr. F. Herskind, of West Hartlepool, the senior partner in the firm of shipbuilders, Mr. Edward Withy, wearing "the ribbon of blue," leading Mrs. J. J. Woods to a raised platform to perform the ceremony of christening the vessel, the "Hypatia." Probably this is the first steamer launched under the combined auspices of the Good Templar and Blue Ribbon movements.—Cor. [It is a common occurrence on the Clyde to launch with water instead of wine. We can't see why ships should be christened with wine any more than babies.—Ed. S.R.]

Sunday School teachers will be glad to know that by a liberal arrangement, made by the publisher, the annual volume of the Teachers' Storehouse and Treasury, will be supplied to them, for a limited period, at half price, viz., one shilling, or post free for one shilling and fourpence; as the work is a perfect "storehouse" of useful material for the teacher's use, we advise our readers to apply for the book to Mr. Elliot Stock, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

PERMISSIVE BILL MEETING IN THE WEST PORT.—Last night (5th ult.) a large open-air meeting on behalf of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association was held in the West Port. Mr. Alexander Ewan, bookseller, presided. The Chairman opened the proceedings in a short address, setting forth the principle of the people having the right of declaring whether they will have publichouses or not. Mr. James Scrymgeour followed with an address, showing that the true patriots and reformers of a country were those who reformed themselves and their own homes. Mr. Robert Stevenson, from Glasgow, the agent of the Association, demonstrated the necessity of right action in putting down the liquor traffic, and explained the doctrine of local option. Several thousand tracts were distributed among the audience, and a number of fresh adherents to the Blue Ribbon Union enrolled.—Dundee Courier and Argus.

TEMPERANCE MEETINGS.—Addresses on temperance were delivered by Mr. Andrew Bennet, agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, in front of the Town Hall, Annan, on Monday and Tuesday evenings, 12th and 13th ult. The Rev. E. Young presided on Monday evening, and the Rev. J. Ronald on Tuesday evening. Mr. Bennet has just taken up his residence in Dumfries, having been appointed by the above-mentioned Society to superintend their operations in the three south-western counties. He argued strongly in favour of the legislative prohibition of the liquor traffic, and was listened to with much attention. Adjournment was made on Tuesday evening to the Independent Chapel, where, after further address from Mr. Bennet, it was urged that the temperance friends in Annan should rally more strongly than heretofore round the local Society.—Annandale Observer.

GROCERS' LICENSES.—Friends of temperance, is it right to buy your provisions at a licensed grocer's? Can there be fair competition in trade where one person is granted a license, and another, equally good, is refused? Ought those persons to receive your favour who year by year beg leave from the magistrates to sell maddening poison, which debases your fellow-creatures; which causes so large a part of your taxation; and which makes many a house no home, but a hell? Do you know what is the use to the licensed grocers of the darkened windows, and the walls of boxes, &c., inside their shops? or do you know what goes on in the hidden corners? Have you marked the late hours many of them keep open? Be consistent, and avoid buying in drink shops. Encourage those tradespeople who suffer for conscience sake—who will not touch profits from such a desolating traffic.—Poster circulated in Ayr.

KIRKWALL—LECTURE.—Mr. W. Blackwood, District Agent, Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, delivered a lecture on British Political Parties, in the Good Templar's Hall, on 3rd ult. Mr. T. Smith Peace presided. The lecturer traced the rise of partizanship during the reign of Charles the Second, and dilated upon the principal political struggles which characterised the reigns of the Prince of Orange, Queen Anne, and the Georges. The civil war between the Cavaliers and the Roundheads, the origin of Whig and Tory, the union between Scotland and England, and other important crises in the nation's history were commented upon. Looking at the condition of parties at the present time in connection with social and political reform, the lecturer showed the necessity of temperance reformers urging their claims in preference to all others upon the different parties, and concluded by showing that the suppression of the drink traffic would conduce to the diffusion of national wealth, and to the great betterment of societies. The usual votes of thanks terminated the meeting.—Orkney and Shetland Telegraph.

NOTE FROM STORNOWAY.—Mr. William Blackwood, of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, concluded his series of open air lectures on Saturday last. The weather being stormy last week, and the fishermen being consequently on shore, the lecturer on each occasion had large and attentive audiences, and they seemed very much impressed by the admirable and pointed addresses of Mr. Blackwood. It is to be hoped that they will be productive of much good. There has not yet been quite so much uproar, &c., about the public-houses as there was last year, and for two or three years previously. Still, there are threatening signs, and the rowdy element is rather well represented about some places already. However, let us hope that the disgraceful scenes of last year will not be repeated. Let the paid preservers of the peace practise more vigilance than they have hitherto done, and let the disturbers of the peace understand that they are in the midst of respectable and order-loving people, while those who traffic in the "element of discord" should also be made to understand that the public are watching their conduct, and they should also bear in mind that when the people have obtained "Local Option" they will know how to use it.—Inverness Advertiser.

KELSO.—TEMPERANCE ADDRESSES.—On Thursday, 15th ult., Mr. Lossock and Mr. Waterston, agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, addressed a meeting in front of the Town Hall. Mr. Lossock denounced the public-house traffic, and pointed out that all who considered their own interest and that of their families could not do otherwise than join the movement which God in his love to man had inaugurated in the country. Mr. Waterston, in the course of a humorous address, gave three reasons why he was a total abstainer. First, because he was a Scotchman, and liked to get the most value for his money. This could not be got in whisky, the best class of which was worth on an average about 5s. per gallon, and when retailed in gills, and "crystal nips," cost from 24s. to 32s. An ordinary gill of whisky in Kelso would cost 7d., and the purchaser only got one pennyworth; the distiller and publican got 3d.; and the Government got 3d. for allowing them to carry on the swindle. The second reason was that every man engaged in a trade ought to be proud of what he made, but he pointed out that the publican was ashamed of his drunken customer. His third reason was because the publican refused to "porter" his goods. He also stated that half of the crime in Roxburghshire was associated with drink, and that if the magistrates would do as much to protect the public from ale, porter, and whisky as they did to pounce on the poachers for taking salmon it would be a blessing to the country. Some "sharp shooting" was indulged in between Mr. Waterston and the onlookers during the delivery of the address. An adjournment was then made to the Foresters' Hall, where the large room was pretty well filled. Mr. Hogarth occupied the chair, and introduced the speakers. Mr. Lossock first addressed the meeting, and referred to the evils, especially of a religious kind, resulting from the use of intoxicating liquor. Mr. Waterston followed, urging three reasons for abandoning drink, such as the destruction of grain, the high price of house rents, and the misappropriation of public money, and urged upon his hearers the desirability of helping on total abstinence for the safety of the individual and prohibition for the welfare of the nation. Having pointed out the great desirability of granting the people the power of effectively dealing with the liquor traffic in their midst as the only means of producing a sober nation, the meeting was concluded with the usual votes of thanks.—Kelso Chronicle.

KANSAS.—When the new law went into force in Kansas last May, the San Francisco Rescue called for fifty first-class liars to employ their talent in proving the failure of prohibition there, and pointed out their various fields of industry. It is with a feeling of no ordinary degree of gratitude and appreciation that this journal publicly recognizes the alacrity and courtesy and self-sacrificing devotion with which the whole fifty have responded to the call, and have thrown themselves heart and soul into that heroic labour of love. They have proved everything demanded and more. Headed by Ex-Governor Robinson, who, with a consistency and devotion worthy of the martyr's stake, if not the martyr's crown, they declare has always been an earnest temperance worker from "prohibitory Boston." They have proved (1) that drunkenness in Kansas has increased to an appalling extent; (2) That much more liquor is sold now than formerly; (3) That a doctor cannot buy a drop of liquor in the State for a dying consumptive patient; (4) That a shocking injustice is done to the churches who cannot get a drop of intoxicating liquor for communion; (5) That the liquor business was never so prosperous as now in Kansas;

6) That since all sales of liquor have ceased in the State, 40,000 people have emigrated from it; (7) That owing to the largely increased sale of liquor crime has become terribly rampant; (8) That because there is not even a glass of beer to be purchased for love or money in Kansas, the German immigrants don't go there any more; (9) That Missouri is getting rich selling whisky all over Kansas; (10) That it is no use sending an agent to Kansas from Missouri to sell liquor, for they won't buy a drop, and that has killed business there dead; (11) Saloons doing a capital business all over the State; (12) Business dead since all the saloons closed up; (13) Prohibition is an utter failure all over Kansas and don't at all stop the sale of liquor; (14) The prohibitory law is so injurious to somebody that the liquor dealers and brewers are willing to spend five or ten million dollars of their own money to have it repealed, and keep people from getting so abominably drunken on that prohibitory law. And they are five million dollars afraid it will pass in Iowa too. Good, kind, liberal, devoted, noble rumsellers! Kind, obliging, artistic, heroic, aesthetic, double-turreted, three-decker, hundred-tongued lie-peddlers!!! Try again, keep it up.—Delaware Signal.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TEETOTALISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of Social Reformer.

SIR,—In the Trades' Guardian, the Scotch drink interest organ, I met with a letter of such importance as to merit a congratulatory leader in that print. The letter is founded on a catechism, which, as I have not seen it, I will pass over. But the letter itself affords such a signal instance of dense ignorance on our question, prevalent among professedly religious people, that I will, with your permission, look at it for a moment. The writer recognises the sin and horror of intemperance, but holds that we only sin when we drink deeply. Now he calls himself a Christian, and as such should feel a peculiar horror of the very inception of sin, for Christ called his followers to be pure in thought, because pure at its source the fountain flows purely. The writer who calls himself "Christian," utterly ignoring this fact, would deal with intemperance, not in aversion or antagonism, but by indulgence in, of course, a moderate degree. He considers it absurd for the church to debar makers of strong drink from membership, but the church when it is in true relations with its Lord deals with the overt act immediately it is perceived, and the minister, the elder, as well as the member, have been excommunicated for intemperance. A true church knows that if it does not subject offenders to discipline it shares the sin of the sinner. I believe that the churches now, alas, demoralised on this matter will yet be impelled to banish the intemperate, and those that produce them and sympathise with them—the brewer, distiller, and importer—before she can really make progress. The ignorance of "Christian" is as deplorable as his morals, and is fitted to provoke a smile if it were not so serious for him. He ought to know his Bible and rise to its level, rather than bring its teachings down to fit in with his beliefs and actions. He is ignorant that there are two sorts of wine in the Bible, and exhibits Christ choosing the worse in presence of the better when he charges him with making alcoholic liquors at Cana. He forgets that Christ, as the divine Logos, made the world and all things therein, and, of course, wine in the cluster, but at Cana, as God manifest in the flesh, "Christian" believes he changed his mind and made liquor which makes men fiends. The Spirit, through Solomon, declares wine to be a mocker, yet at Cana, says "Christian," Christ makes the mocker, and becomes the patron saint of brewer and distillers, and the exemplar to all that seek pleasure in liquor. "Christian," but for his ignorance, might stand aghast at these inferences from his reckless statement. He knows so little of the Bible that he believes intoxicating liquor was used by Christ at the last Supper. He may not know that all Jews, at the Passover season, purged their houses of everything connected with leaven or ferment; and might not, in ignorance of that act, find it difficult to show why they could have intoxicating liquors, but, as one who has sat at the Lord's table commemorating his dying love, he ought to know that the word "wine" does not occur in all the accounts of the institution of the supper. The word or phrase is fruit of the vine; and he must be worse than ignorant if he believes that fruit of the vine is identical with Messrs. Gilbey's "Rota Tent Wine, with just as much alcohol as will make it keep." He knows so little of scriptural interpretation that he sets up Jotham's parable as if it bore the brand of Thus saith the Lord. He might quote the eleventh verse of the last chapter of Revelation—"He that is filthy let him be filthy still," and preach against all sanitary improvement. The letter killeth, it is the spirit that giveth life. He actually imagines Christ at a modern feast drinking alcoholic liquors, and asks the teetotaler what he would do in that case, and suggests that he must either give up his beliefs or reject Christ. I cannot permit myself to form so vile a fancy as to imagine anything of the sort. It is inconceivable to me that Christ could do anything of the kind; indeed, there could be no greater reason for his rejection than the fact of his disciples labouring now to save the intemperate, he himself siding with the distiller, brewer, and publican. The state of mind of "Christian" offers two mighty lessons:—1st, We should act like the noble Bereans and first make ourselves acquainted with the knowledge of the Bible temperance question; and 2nd, We should strengthen our teaching agencies until the ideas that prevail on drink being good in any degree or under any circumstances are dislodged from the minds of our people.—I am, etc.,

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

Onward and Onward Reciter for June fully maintain their justly earned reputation as excellent Band of Hope and temperance monthlies. The former is full of short and interesting stories, and the latter, in addition to its usual variety of well-selected pieces, contains a dialogue written by Wm. Hoyle, Esq., entitled "Professor Barcup's Troubles."

The Temperance Worker has always a hearty welcome from us. Its pages from month to month exhibit a fullness and freshness which reflects great credit on its indefatigable editor, the Rev. F. Wagstaff, F.R.H.S. Lecturers, conductors, and superintendents of Bands of Hope and Juvenile Temples, &c., must find it of great assistance to them in the work.

Hand and Heart for May may be called a wedding number. It devotes much of its space to the recent royal marriage. Excellent portraits are given of the Queen, Prince Albert, Duke of Albany, and Princess Helen of Waldeck, and the articles of special importance have all a special reference to ordinance of marriage in general and royal marriages in particular.

Sharpened Saws. By the Rev. John Thomas. (London: F. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C.) This is a neat little addition to our proverbial literature. The ability and renown of its author is sufficient guarantee of its excellence. The twelve short articles which compose it illustrate very aptly some of our familiar proverbs, and give them a practical turn and application.

Local Option—Local Control. By Canon Ellison, (London: Church of England Temperance Publication Depot). This tract aims at accomplishing two objects. (1) To give a short history of the Church of England temperance society's legislative operations; and (2) to show wherein Local Option differs from and is inferior to Local Control as a policy for temperance men. In the first of these objects it is successful, but in our opinion it fails in the second. We admit that it shows a decided difference existing between Local Option and Local Control, but we cannot admit that it demonstrates even faintly the superior claims of the latter over the former. Local Control, as explained by the writer, is the application to licensing of the principle of local self-government through a licensing board specially appointed. Local Option, as understood by us, is the application of the same principle directly by the people themselves. The one provides for the continuance of the traffic, the other may dispense with it at once.

The Welcome: for July, S. W. Partridge, London, has already reached us, and is altogether superb. There are thirty-five illustrations, most of them of unusual, and many of them of surpassing excellence. We hardly ever have seen more diversified subjects, portraits of Carlyle, Dr. John Brown, ("Rab and his friends"), Joseph Livesey, Garibaldi and his daughter, Midhat Pasha, Thos. Cook the excursionist, besides a tinted plate illustration of Lawson the Sculptor. The letterpress is equally excellent and varied. The poetry and music are a most attractive feature, so that our friends, whether at home or abroad, whether by sea or on shore, should secure this delightful monthly part. We cannot conceive of a greater pleasure than looking over its pages under some shady tree, where the birds warble, and the waters near whimper, and the leaves rustle bass to the delightful melody.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. R. ADAMS, ABERDEEN.—It is with painful regret that we record the death of Mr. Adams at Aberdeen on the 13th ult., in the 68th year of his age, after a few weeks illness. He was a meat salesman all his life, and yet none among his fellows were held in higher esteem than he was, possessing as he did all those high qualities which go to make up a truly excellent business man. It is, however, as a citizen that we feel a melancholy pleasure in dwelling upon his memory. For the last forty years he has exerted a power for good over the working people which was not excelled by any in his native city. In the trade to which he belonged he laboured to elevate both salesmen and slaughtermen, and to diminish the long hours which was the custom of the trade. After a great struggle this was accomplished, and a holiday secured besides. In political movements his steady perseverance and good sense were conspicuous. In the Chartist movement he held to the constitutional side—the side which achieved all the good which flowed from that agitation. At parliamentary elections the working men felt that in him they had a sagacious councillor. In the struggle for further reform he laboured with ability and success, and had the pleasure of seeing his fellows entering on the exercise of political power for which he had striven for so many years. It was during his labours as a political reformer that he saw how much evil was being done to the interest of his class through their unhappy addiction to strong liquors, and he early threw himself into the work of temperance reform. He was soon elected to a seat in the direction of the Aberdeen Temperance Society, but there was nothing institutional about him; the principle and the merits of a matter were to him the first consequence, the form he often declared was shaped by circumstances, so he was willing to labour side by side with any one. In the Band of Hope movement he was exemplary in his attendance, and most assiduous in instilling into the youthful minds under his care those principles which underlie the great temperance reformation. Mr. Adams hailed the formation of the United Kingdom Alliance, and with his usual zeal entered heartily into the propagation of its principles in Aberdeen. Much opposition was encountered, and to his ability and experience the efforts made on its behalf were very deeply indebted.

Mr. Adams continued his labours among the young, and at one time might be found trying to take the man from the drink, and at another, labouring to take the drink from the man. On the introduction of Good Templarism into Aberdeen, Mr. Adams immediately joined it. He attached himself to the Bon Accord Lodge, and was as might have been expected speedily elected worthy chief, a post which he held uninterruptedly for ten years—an unprecedented term. He was ably seconded in his labours in connection with the order by Mrs. Adams, who was equally zealous in the cause as himself. Their labours were not confined to the lodge room, but embraced every phase of the work. Several times the members of the lodge testified to their warm appreciation of Mr. Adams' ability and labours by the presentation of substantial testimonials of their loving regard. It was only in February last that he was presented with an illuminated address on the occasion of his sixty-eighth birthday, testifying to his praiseworthy conduct in the chair, and to efficient labours in connection with the lodge. At that time few could have dreamed that the powers of nature were to fail so suddenly. Some months ago his condition gave occasion for concern to his wife, and almost imperceptibly from that time his frame yielded to the encroachments of dissolution. Calmly he awaited the solemn summons with a mind clear and a faith strong in the goodness of God, and the mercy and the merits of his Saviour. Surrounded by his sorrowful family he passed within the dark valley fearing no ill, accompanied by the heavenly radiance of redeeming love. Our eye grows dim with tears as we think that on earth we shall see his face no more; but hope springs exultant on triumphant wings and whispers we may meet to part no more and still together be. Mr. Adams was a most sociable, agreeable and lovable companion, full of genuine humour. He could be angry but never vindictive. He knew the good and cleaved to it and heartily abhorred whatever was mean and base. He was honest and sincere in all his dealings: and ever ready to believe in the uprightness of others. He never despaired of any man and poured the spirit of hope into the ears of the truly penitent, and the balm of consolation into the grieved and wounded ear. He was remarkable for self control, indeed, his equanimity of disposition was often misconstrued. He was at the same time firm and immovable where principle was concerned, and persistent to a degree in a course which had commanded itself to his sense of right. He was largely read, especially in political, Temperance, and religious literature, and his stores were heartily at the service of all who sought them. His mind was clear and the expression of his thoughts were an evidence that he had formed them after a thorough logical method. When he spoke, which was but seldom, it was felt he might have been a most impressive speaker had he turned his attention to oratory: his great talents felt pleasure in the department of organization and arrangement, and in the conduct of the business of agitation. No man could have been more highly respected than Mr. Adams, and it says much for him, that during so long a period of life, he never lost a friend or made an enemy. In his family relations he endeared himself to his wife and family, and people felt their better nature stirred by observing the conjugal tenderness so manifest in Mr. and Mrs. Adams. He is survived by his second wife by whom he has no surviving issue, and by two daughters who have been happily married. He had a public funeral which was largely representative of local associations. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, of which he had long been an honorary director, was represented by W. Davidson, Esq., Mr. W. Blackwood, district agent, and Mr. R. Mackay, Secretary, the latter enjoying the friendship of Mr. Adams for nearly thirty years. The Executive of the Association have recorded their high appreciation of his character and services to the cause of Temperance and prohibition, and the local auxiliary has also done so.

Green be the turf above thee,

None knew thee but to love thee
Or named thee but to praise.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

By ANNIE S. SWAN.

Author of "Shadowed Lives," "Thankful Rest," "Fruits," &c.

CHAPTER I.—A SHADOWED HOME.

It was Saturday afternoon. An intense black frost held the earth with a band of iron, and the great loch at Strathglide was a sheet of smooth glittering ice, alive with skaters. The hum of gay voices, the echoes of merry laughter, and the ring of skates sounded through the frosty air. Even those who did not join in the sport enjoyed the busy scene. As the afternoon wore on the north wind whistled more shrilly through the leafless trees, and the low-hanging sullen sky gave promises of the first snows of the season.

From the study windows of the manse, the minister of Strathglide watched the skaters, at least his eyes looked towards them, his thoughts were elsewhere. Upon the table lay an open Bible, and a sheet of paper beside it bore the words, from which it was his intention to speak to his people on the morrow,—“God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.”

These words of sweet assurance gave no comfort to the minister of Strathglide that day; his heart was sick within him. The lamp of faith was burning very dimly, it seemed to him that his refuge and strength had deserted him in his time of trouble. Who among us have not such hours of doubt and despair when we feel inclined to cry in bitterness of spirit, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?”

In years the minister was still in his prime, but his hair was grey, and his brow furrowed deep with the lines of care. It was a fine face; the mouth was tender and mobile as a woman's, but its expression sad beyond description.

Four o'clock chimed from the timepiece on the mantel, and the minister turned from the window with a start, and sat down to his work. It was a cheerless, comfortless place that study, and though the afternoon was bitterly cold, there were but a few red embers smouldering in the dirty grate.

Outside, the sere leaves lay thickly on the grass-grown footpaths of the old-fashioned garden, and the gate swung to and fro on its hinges with a dreary creaking. From the nursery overhead came the noise and shouts of the children at their play; in their careless glee they had no thought of the weary brain which would have given a world for rest. The minister read his text mechanically, then rose and crossed the lobby into the room on the opposite side.

It was the drawing-room of the house, and though a fire burned brightly there it had the same air of neglect which characterised the study. On a comfortable-looking lounge drawn up on the hearth, a lady reclined, attired in a handsome dressing-gown, a dainty lace cap rested on her jet black hair, and she held an open novel in her plump white hand.

“Margaret, is it quite impossible to keep the children quiet,” said the minister gently. “The noise is simply deafening. Is Laura with them?”

“Laura!” was the sharp retort. “She went to the town to do an errand for me, and she has been gone quite two hours. Just like her to linger on the way. She doesn't care what is happening at home if she gets her pleasure.”

“Hush!” said the minister sternly. “It would be well indeed if we were all as faithful as that dear child.”

“I wish you would sit down, Mr. Tennant, if you mean to remain here,” said his wife petulantly. “It makes one ill to see your restless walking.”

He paused. “My study is very cold,” he said, glancing at the fire. “Will you send Jane with some coals?”

The minister bit his lip, and went back to his own room. He drew the embers together in the grate, and resuming his seat at the desk, lifted his pen. It dropped from his fingers before he had written many words, and he hid his face in his hands. God only knew what were his thoughts. He did not hear the door open softly, nor the light footfall that crossed the floor, and he started when a gentle hand fell on his bowed head, and the voice dearest to him on earth said anxiously, “Dear papa, what is it? Does your head ache again?”

The speaker was a young girl, clad in a well-worn walking-suit, which could not hide the lithe, graceful figure. Her sunny brown hair lay in ripples on an open white brow, and long lashes shaded eyes full of gentlest feeling. She was not beautiful, but her face was one of the sweetest eyes could rest on. Her father seemed to find it so, for his eyes brightened as they looked. She stooped and laid her cheek to his, but neither spoke. The love existing between these two needed no words, but it was stronger than death.

“How cold it is here,” said Laura, glancing round with a slight shiver. “Did Jane bring your tea, papa?”

“No, dear, I daresay she forgot. She has plenty to do.”

Laura looked distressed. “It is past four, papa, and you have not written a dozen words,” she said. “Have the children been noisy?”

“Rather, but you will quiet them.”

“In two minutes they will be as quiet as mice, and I'll be back to attend to you,” said she with a sunny smile, and she left the room, and ran lightly upstairs. Entering the nursery, she beheld the chairs turned upside down, and her four brothers and sisters playing menagerie.

“How could you do it, children, when I asked you to be good and quiet for poor papa's sake?” she said quickly. “Lottie, I thought I might have trusted you,” she said, turning to a tall slip of a girl whose pinafore was a mass of rents and her hair a perfect tangle. Lottie hung her head, and pinched little Daisy till she screamed. The boys, Tom and Frank, rose from all-fours with shame-stricken faces.

“Well, look here, Laura,” cried Frank, who though the younger was always spokesman, “It was so poky playing quiet games. Mamma would not let us out. We'll be good now; and, oh, did you bring the toffee?”

“Yes, but I cannot give you it to-day as you broke your promise,” said the elder sister gravely. “Lottie, put on a clean pinafore, and wash Daisy's face. Boys, make yourselves fit to be seen while I go and attend to papa: he is not well. If you are very good you shall have tea half-an-hour earlier and a story after it."

In inexpressible delight the penitents proceeded to do their sister's bidding, while she went to her own little room, took off her jacket and hat, and tying on a huge white apron, ran downstairs to the kitchen, where Jean was busily engaged in her weekly "redd up," as she termed it.

"You forgot papa's tea, Jean, though I told you so often," said the young lady gently. "Is there any boiling water?"

The girl looked really distressed. "I clean forgot, Miss Laura, ye see I've ha'en tae answer the mistress's bell gey often, an' it gied oot o' my heid. I'm sair vext, but the kettle's just on the sing, it'll be ready in a crack o' time."

She left her scrubbing and applied the poker vigorously to the fire, while Laura, satisfied that Jean would do her best, went back to her father. A few pieces of stick converted the dull embers into a brisk flame, and she drew the easy chair close to it.

"Now, papa, come and take a rest while I talk to you," said she, "your tea will be here directly."

"This is nice, Laura," said the minister, leaning back on the cushions. "You are the very sunshine of my heart, my love."

The sweet face flushed. "Hush, papa, I wish I could do more for you, it is such a pleasure." She leaned her head on his knee, and fixed her eyes upon the fire.

"I have had such a happy walk," she continued after a moment's pause. "I ran in for a few minutes to see poor old Mrs. Scott, she was so pleased, only she is in great distress about George. He has been drinking for a week back, and Mr. Gillespie refuses to allow him to come back to the mill."

"Poor boy, poor lad, how foolish. He is so easily led. I shall see what can be done."

"Papa, I am afraid the Half-way House is doing harm in Strathglide already. From what I heard to-day I gather that it is leading very many astray."

The minister made no reply, perhaps none was needed. Presently Jean entered with the tea-tray, and Laura rose reluctantly.

"I should like to stay with you, papa, but I must go and look after my family upstairs. If I had not been so annoyed at them disturbing you, I should have laughed to see them. Lottie was playing kangaroo, and Frank a leopard ready to spring at her. Will that girl ever learn to be proper? She ought to have been a boy."

"She will have to take your place by and by, my darling," said her father with a half smile. "We cannot keep you always."

Laura blushed, and fled to the nursery. There the clamorous tongues were hushed into unusual silence. A shiny-faced boy sat on either end of the fender, while Lottie, attired in a clean pinafore, was soberly brushing Daisy's elfin locks. Laura drew out the table, laid the cloth, and directed Lottie to set the cups. Cracked and chipped all of them were, and scarcely two to match, and the knives and spoons were battered out of all shape. The boys toasted the bread while Laura made the tea.

There was a wild scramble for seats, during which Daisy upset the milk-jug, and intimated the fact by a piteous scream. A look of utter weariness and sickness of heart crossed the elder sister's face, yet she spoke very gently.

"Boys, do be quiet. Frank, give Tom that seat, dear, he is the elder you know. Lottie, don't lie on the table like that. Daisy, darling, I trust there is plenty more milk for you."

The door opened and somebody came in. Laura looked up suddenly; she looked away as suddenly and turned her face to the fire.

The children sprang to the intruder heedless of the half-finished meal.

"Oh, Mr. Walter, come away, let us have some fun, Laura's so cross."

"Cross, you little sinners," said the young man with a smile. "An angel would fling her patience to the winds. How are you all? How are you, Laura?"

The emphasis made her downcast face burn, and she gave him her hand without looking up.

"I am a little tired," she said quietly. "Have you come straight from Barossa?"

He nodded, and the unruly members having gulped down the remainder of their tea, now surrounded the young man, clamouring for his attention.

"Oh, I say, Mr. Walter, that old boat you made me went out into the middle of the loch on Tuesday, and it's got jammed in the ice. If I get it out I'll call it the Erebus and Terror, cos it's jammed ever so tight like they were in the Arctic regions," said Frank in great glee. "Here make us another." He produced a broken-bladed knife from his pocket, and a knotty log from under the cabinet, and held them out.

"It's my turn," broke in Tom. "Mend my kite, Mr. Walter. The tail blew away, and it won't go up."

The young man laughed. "Run down to the garden all of you, and take a race. See, the sun is just setting. Don't make too much noise, and I'll do anything for you when you come in."

The unsuspecting quartette disappeared instanter, and Walter closed the door behind them. Then he came back to the hearthrug, and drew the slender figure standing there very close to him.

"Laura, my dearest, you must come to me one of these days and let me take care of you," he whispered. "This constant worry is killing you."

"Nonsense, Walter," but she hid her eyes so that he might not see how dim they were.

"I am quite well, only I get so tired sometimes. I don't think I am so strong as I used to be." She drew closer to him and hid her face.

"Walter!"

The voice was very low, almost inaudible.

"Yes, my darling."

"Mamma was ill again this morning; it is becoming an every-day occurrence. If it were not for papa and the children I think I should die. It is breaking papa's heart. I can see it every day. I cannot keep it from the children any longer. To-day Lottie asked me why mamma talked so much nonsense. I—I—" She broke down, and there was a brief silence.

"Walter!"

"Yes, my darling."

"Does Mr. Gillespie know I am your promised wife?"

"Not yet. How many days have you been so. Why, I have not even asked your father yet. It is so sweet to keep it to ourselves for a little. It will be public property soon enough."

"Papa knows, though he has not heard it in so many words. Walter, do you think it likely your father will approve your choice?"

"Why should he not?"

Laura remained silent, thinking of the gloomy, proud master of Barossa, the great mill-owner, whom many feared and few loved. Was it likely that he should approve of his only son and heir taking for a wife the daughter of a poor parish minister.

"I am a man now, Laura, and I claim a man's right to choose my wife. Here she stands, if she will have me, if not I shall have none other," said Walter.

She loved him, and could not listen to such words unmoved. For the time her heart was at rest.

"Come down and see mamma for a minute or two," said Laura by and by. "Papa is very busy. Saturday night you know."

Walter assented, and they repaired to the drawing-room. Whenever Laura opened the door, they were greeted by a strong odour of spirits, and she sprang to her mother's side.

"Oh, mamma!" was all she could say.

"Well, mamma, what!" repeated Mrs. Tennant crossly. "Ah, Mr. Walter, how are you? Laura, why did you stay so long down town? These dreadful children were like to bring the house down."

"I was as quick as I could be, mamma," said the girl in a low voice. "I am sorry if you were disturbed."

"Much you care," was the reply, followed by a burst of childish weeping. "It is a dreadful thing, Mr. Walter, to toil and bring up ungrateful children who think their ailing mother a burden."

Every vestige of colour died from Laura's face. They say we can grow accustomed to anything in this world, but, my friends, it is not true. There are things which repetition only makes harder to bear. This was one of them.

Walter Gillespie understood the mute appeal in Laura's eyes, and they left the room together. At the outer door they paused, and watched for a moment through the glass door the children flying round the garden—the last rays of the red sunset gleaming on their bare heads and happy faces. As yet the shadow which darkened their home could not darken their hearts. God be thanked that there is a childhood. We who have faced life and borne its burdens wonder at the light-heartedness of childhood. Looking back upon our own, we find memory dim.

"Walter," said Laura through her pale lips, "since the Half-way House was opened at the toll, mamma is never without it. It is brought to her somehow or another."

Walter was silent. His father had opened the first public-house in Strathglide, and on its opening day, not a week ago, he, Walter, had made a speech approving of it, and had drunk success to it in a glass of the landlord's whisky. Here was its first condemnation, touching him in his tenderest part.

"Drink in moderation," he had said to the men. "Grow social and cheerful over your ale, but don't abuse it. Don't embrate yourselves. I should like it to be said of you all that you would be ashamed to be seen drunk." And much more to the same effect, which had been loudly applauded by his listeners. With that wreck of womanhood in the room he had just left, with Laura's saddened face and shadowed eyes uplifted to his own, do you wonder if he remembered his words with shame?

CAUSES AND CURE OF INTEMPERANCE.*

SYSTEMATIC inquiries into the extent, causes, and results of intemperance, prosecuted during a period of half a century, and certain tentative experiments for the repression of this serious evil, have apparently brought the bulk of temperance reformers to a number of definite conclusions. It is these, with some of the facts and reasons from whence they are deduced, which we desire to lay very briefly before our readers for their consideration, not merely to excite to thought and elicit opinion, but, so far as is possible, to evoke sympathy towards practical measures for the material diminution of an evil which is a reproach to the intelligence and civilization of which Britons are so apt to boast. To dwell on the frightful extent of drunkenness, public and private, would be worse than to repeat a thrice-told tale. It is universally conceded that we are, in this respect, in a very unsatisfactory condition. In Liverpool, for example, the police report records, under the head of drunk and disorderly, that 7,000 males and nearly 5,000 females are annually taken up in the streets. The daily and weekly papers teem with the most shocking illustrations of this vice and its effects, iterated to the point of disgust. Every day proves, says a recent number of The Press, that drunkenness is the monster evil of the age in England. Its effects make themselves felt in all departments of social life. The colonel of a crack regiment wages ineffectual war against the drunkenness which so often deprives him of the services of his best men. The master of the household strives in vain against the potations of the servants' hall, or the still more dangerous attractions of the neighbouring "public," which have proved the ruin of so many a good servant. Men who appear a concentrated epitome of all other virtues, who for honesty, steadiness, and willingness to oblige are alike irreproachable, cannot bear the application of the test of sobriety. The causes of this widespread and deeply-seated national vice are what should first be ascertained by a true social science, since the knowledge of the cause is the only correct indicator of the effectual remedy. Physiology has distinctly proclaimed the nature of that habitual craving for strong liquors which, being gratified, ends in drunkenness. It is an abnormal state of the nerves and brain, engendered by the persistent use of the stimulant of alcohol, under the operation of a law which finds its analogue in the instance of opium, hashish, tobacco, and other narcotics. All such drugs, without exception, it is alleged, operate through the subtle machinery of the nervous structure, and tend by necessary law to the creation of an appetite which grows by what it feeds on.* While the original quantity, by repetition, loses its power to reproduce its first pleasing effect, it is found to leave a craving void behind. Thus, the sensual nature demands an increase of the stimulant, both in time and measure, and at the same time the moral-resisting power is either partially weakened or absolutely annulled. Such is the theory of the history and genesis of all the actual excess which temperance reformers deprecate and deplore. The love of pleasure on the one hand, ever mounting to a transient crisis, and on the other, an aversion to pain, are the twin forces whereby the fetters of an insatiable lust are imperceptibly but surely riveted upon the intemperate man.† In this state of vassalage, and in the midst of his misery, the drinker exclaims, "I will seek it yet again!" Universal history, it is affirmed, attests and verifies this dictum of physiological science. It records no single example, amidst the multifarious conditions of social life, where these seductive intoxicants, once introduced, have not been widely abused; or where their use has remained stationary at some fixed point of desiderated moderation. The old Egyptian, the pagan Arab, the favoured Jew, the refined and cultured Greek, the strong Roman, the wild Scythian, and the ancient German, all in turn passed through the experience which has been repeated amongst the civilized Celts, and the Christianized Anglo-Saxons of modern times. No matter what other social conditions prevail, of poverty or plenty, of knowledge or ignorance, of barbarism or refinement, of religion or irreligion, the use of intoxicants always spreads and increases. The passion for narcotics, once engendered, never dies out, never ceases—nay, it is for ever enlarging itself with the supply. Not only has the extent of surface over which the use reigned become greater by * Huc, the intelligent traveller in China, declares that, save with some exceptional organizations, opium smoking in moderation leads with fearful certainty and speed to excess; and excess to crime and a frightful mortality. Mr. De Quincey, more than sixty years ago (1821) in his celebrated "Confessions of an Opium Eater," noticed the gradual increase in the consumption of that perilous narcotic, and traces it to a law which we have seen since illustrated in the augmented frequency of tobacco-smoking in Britain, with its £8,000,000 of profligate waste. I do not believe that any man, having once tasted the divine luxuries of opium, will afterwards descend to the gross and mortal enjoyment of alcohol. I take it for granted, time, but wherever special efforts, including abstinence and prohibition, have been neglected for the repression of the evil, the vice has grown more intense in its power, and has most surely augmented in the number of its votaries and victims. Where special abstinence is inculcated, as amongst the ancient Jews, the later Mahomedans, and the modern teetotalers, we have an example of an empire, within an empire, governed by special laws. This is a case where individuals have, so to speak, withdrawn themselves from the operation of the law in question. Hence, in estimating the prevalence of intemperance amongst a general population, we should first of all exclude the members of temperance societies, as not fairly coming within the circle of the influence which we are investigating. Weak beverages, and mild narcotics amongst those who use them, become stepping-stones to stronger and more potent agents of inebriation. Tobacco prepares for opium, beer for gin, and light wines for French brandy. Thus has human nature, in its infatuated search after false and forbidden pleasure, passed through the discordant gamut of a bad and bitter experience, until, in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, to adopt the language of the great historian Michelet, we have reached an age in which the progressive invasion of spirits and narcotics is an invincible fact, bringing with it results varying according to the population, here obscuring the mind and barbarizing beyond recovery; there fatally penetrating the foundations of the physical life, and attainting the race itself. Dr. Morel, in his great work "On the Causes of Physical Degeneracy," founded on an extensive survey of the social condition of the people of Germany and France, places the universal use of alcoholics and narcotics amongst the chief causes of that decay in the physical existence of the people, which is unerringly indicated by their diminution of stature and weight, by the abridged duration of adult life, and, above all, by an increased proclivity to mental disorder. Having, from the nature and quality of the drink proximately explained the phenomena of drunkenness, as a subjective state, the temperance philosopher goes back a step to account for the drinking itself. Ignoring the few reckless debauchees who resort of set purpose to the use of alcoholics as a means of exciting sensuous pleasure, and who must be placed on the same moral level with the Hindoo or Chinese smoker of opium, he asks why people in general first begin the use of strong liquor. Two chief grounds may be indicated. First, men drink because they have faith in the traditional virtues of the beverage consumed, be it home-brewed, pale ale, or crusted port. Opinion always governs practice to a certain extent, but especially in pleasant things. Appetite is credulous of all assertions which jump with it. The wish is patron to the thought. While the popular opinion of the excellency of alcoholics prevails, men at large may be expected to continue drinking whence will follow the old sad sequences as before. This belief, therefore, must be weakened or dissipated by the diffusion of sound physiological knowledge, which is the business of the educator and the temperance reformer. The experience of teetotalers everywhere shows that, as compared with drinkers, they possess a singular immunity from sickness. Extensive statistics demonstrate the fact, that a body of abstainers will, placed under even less favourable circumstances than careful drinkers, only be subject to one-half the disease, and for less than half the time; whilst the highest teachers of physiological science, as Lehmann, Moleschott, Liebig, and Carpenter, coincide in casting alcoholics from their usurped place in the ranks of food, and in remitting them, for exceptional use, to the category of medical stimulants. That alcohol is a very dangerous and tricky spirit, needing the (supernatural) power of a Prospero to make it obedient,* is the admission of its ablest and subtlest champion. The introduction and common use of such an article within our family circle can hardly be recommended on any sound principle of ethical philosophy. It is, in fact, a brain poison.

That those eat now who never ate before;
And those who always ate, now eat the more.

† Mr. De Quincey long since pointed out the fact that, in this respect, wine was more of a deceiver even than opium. Mr. Thackeray too, in his "Virginians," has declared the truth "in the face of all the pumps," and he is an excellent authority on such a point:—"There is a moment in a bout of good wine, at which, if a man could but remain, wit, wisdom, courage, generosity, eloquence, happiness, were his; but the moment passes, and that other glass somehow spoils the state of beatitude." Mr. De Quincey has a similar observation:—"The pleasure given by wine is always mounting, and tending to a crisis, after which it as rapidly declines. There is a crowning point in the movement upwards, which, once attained, cannot be renewed; and it is the blind, unconscious, but always unsuccessful effort of the obstinate drinker to restore this supreme attitude of enjoyment which tempts him into excesses that become dangerous."

*G. H. Lewis in "Westminster Review," and Physiology of Common Life.

A second cause of drinking, which is perhaps still more potent with the multitude, is custom. It is in vain that men inculcate moral theories, so long as the practical atmosphere of social life antagonizes them. Ideas are powerless against institutions, interests, and temptations. People may proclaim the uselessness or the harmfulness of liquor, the danger of drinking, the evil example set to the young, the unwary, or the weak, and enlogize the excellence of abstinence—no matter if Fashion, the true queen of the world, decrees to drink, and Interest, its strongest king, commands to create and tempt, men will continue to do so. It may be a practice more honoured in the breach than the observance, but what is that to

Monster custom, that all sense
Doth eat, of habits—Devil?

All that we teach, dietetically or ethically, will come to naught, unless our social institutions, our daily customs and environments, are in harmony with it. As Lord Bacon declares, "The bravery of words must be corroborate by custom." This is the philosophy of temperance pledges and organizations, which furnish needful aids to the isolated virtue of individual example, giving a collective sanction to a novel or neglected protest, which shall neutralize the ignorant despotism of custom, since that which is impossible to be done alone is very easily achieved in association. As it is not to be expected that a people will rise above their circumstances by any sudden impulse, it therefore becomes the duty and business of the social philosopher, with whom the idea is an actual potency, to inaugurate new conditions of a more harmonious and genial kind, out of which the germ of an improved social life may spring up into fruitful development.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

SAM TAYLOR'S ELECTIONEERING.

BY THE REV. F. WAGSTAFF, F.R.H.S.

DID you ever hear how Sam Taylor got on electioneering the first year after he set up housekeeping? I don't know that ever I told you, and as all this hubbub about the dissolution of Parliament and the general election have brought it to my mind, I may as well tell you now, especially as we've a quiet hour to spare. By the way, though, what was that I heard Mr. Wilson talking about to-day? I heard him and Lawyer Flint having a confab as I passed out of the yard; and Mr. Wilson, he said, says he, just as I went by, "I'll tell you what it is, Lawyer Flint," says he, "this here general election what has come upon us so sudden like is all owing to that cooked 'tater o' Gladstone's—that's what it is."

[The speaker was a worthy old gentleman of our acquaintance, with whom we have had many a pleasant chat; and the time was January, 1874. We need scarcely say that the puzzling remark of Mr. Wilson's had nothing whatever to do with the Prime Minister's potatoes, whether cooked or raw; but, being no political admirer of the Premier, he had formed, and was expressing to the lawyer, an opinion that the sudden dissolution of Parliament was a coup d'état. We explained this as well as we could to our old friend, who, after a due pause to digest the new idea and the foreign phrase, proceeded with his story of Sam Taylor's electioneering, as near as may be in the words that follow.]

Ah, well, I've been thinking all day that 'twas a mighty queer thing for Gladstone to have anything to do with cooked 'taters; or, supposing he had, that they could have had anything to do with this here electioneering move. However, that's neither here nor there; what I've got to tell you happened about four years since, when old Colonel Jones died, and there had to be a fresh election for Lansingborough. Colonel Jones always was a Liberal, but for my part, when I've read his speeches in the Lansingborough Trumpet, I never could make out much difference between them and the speeches which Sir Henry Brookes used to make at the Conservative dinners. But when the old Colonel died, the Liberal Committee brought out a clever chap they called Mr. Astley, from London, who said we must vote for him, or else the country would be ruined by taxes, and war, and jobbery, and all that sort of thing. Well, the Conservatives they brought down a man too, and his name was Croft, who went about canvassing and speech-making like one o'clock. He says, says he, "Now all you people must just vote for me, or else the country will be ruined by taxes, and war, and jobbery, and all that sort o' thing."

Yes; you may well laugh. I did, I know, at the time. Lor! it were as good as a play to hear they two gentlemen a-telling all on us that the country would be ruined if we didn't vote for them. It seemed to me like as if 'twere to be ruined whichever way things went. But I must get on with my tale, if you can have patience with an old fellow like me.

[We assured our venerable friend that in the matter of patience we were fit to serve as a model for Job himself, and that we were never better pleased than to hear him tell his stories in his own way.]

Thank 'ee kindly, sir, and I'll try and get on; but where was I? Oh, about Mr. Croft and Mr. Astley both going to save the country from ruin. Well, just afore all this Sam Taylor had got married and took a house all to himself, instead o' lodgings, as most young fellows in his line used to do; and of course he got his name on the register and was a voter for the burgh, just like any one of the great folks. I remember well saying to him, "Sam, says I, "however can you afford to have a house all to yourself, when Tom Saunders—that works at your place, and gets 5s. a-week more wages than you—can only live in two miserable rooms?" And Sam, he makes answer, says he, "The reason is that Tom Saunders drinks and smokes, and I don't." That's how it is too, sir, with scores on 'em.

Well Sam being a voter, and on the register, had the candidates round after him in a brace o' shakes, asking for his vote and interest. Though why they always want interest when nobody don't owe 'em anything is what I can't make out.

[We quietly interposed an explanation of this orthodox electioneering phrase, which we trust was satisfactory to our venerable friend.]

Oh, I see, sir; 'twas another blunder o' mine, as bad as Gladstone's 'taters; but then, you see, I was never much of a scholar. Mr. Croft he was round first, and says he hopes he'd have the honour of Mr. Taylor's vote and interest. Sam says at once as how he were a Liberal; what were Mr. Croft? Mr. Croft said he was a Conservative; but, of course, a Liberal-Conservative, and, as everybody knew, he and his party had always been the working men's friends, and so on. To all this Sam says, says he, "How about the Permissive Bill?" The question in a manner took Mr. Croft aback. He said he hardly knew how to answer the question, upon which Sam says, "Well, I votes for nobody who won't vote for the Permissive Bill; so good morning." And that ended the matter for that time.

Mr. Croft and his friends had scarcely got out o' the street before up comes Mr. Astley and a troop o' his folks. "Good morning, Mr. Taylor," says one o' the party; and "Good morning, sir, to you," says Sam. "We've come to ask for your vote and interest," says Mr. Astley, with a bow, as if Sam were a master tradesman and he a poor chap after a job. "What'll you vote for?" says Sam, as much as if he'd been a master a-trying to find out what sort o' work Mr. Astley could do.

"Oh," said Mr. Astley right away, "I'm a thorough Liberal, and of course shall support Mr. Gladstone and Liberal measures."

"What Liberal measures?" was Sam's natural inquiry.

"Oh, 'trenchment and reform—taking off the taxes, and improving the condition of the country," was what Mr. Astley said for answer.

"All very well," says Sam, "and seein' as how I'm a Liberal, I'd like to see them things done pretty quick."

"Them sentiments does you credit, Mr. Taylor," says Mr. Astley, whipping a little book out of his pocket, and beginning to put down Sam's vote and interest like fun.

"Not so fast," says Sam; "there's one question I should like to ask first."

"Certainly, Mr. Taylor," says Mr. Astley, with another bow; "I'd be happy, I'm sure, to answer any question from so intelligent a voter."

"What about the Permissive Bill?" was Sam's question, and you should have seen how Mr. Astley started and coloured up like a turkey-cock, for, don't you see, he'd got the chairman of his committee with him, as well as several others; and the chairman was a brewer and owned several public-houses round. Besides this, he was principal deacon at one of the chapels, and had wonderful influence with all the religious people in the place. So, you see, it didn't please Mr. Astley to hear anything said about the Permissive Bill. However, in a bit he says to Sam as how of course he couldn't support that measure, which was so extreme, and would never work, and which the people would never stand, and a lot more to the same effect.

"It may be extreme," says Sam; "but there's such a mortal lot o' mischief done by the drink that we must have extreme remedies for the extreme evil." Them was Sam's very words.

"Well, my good sir," said Mr. Astley again, "I hate drunkenness as much as you do, and would gladly see a wise and well-considered bill brought in to diminish intemperance." You must remember this was just before Mr. Bruce brought in the Licensing Bill. "You must know," he goes on, "that the Government have promised to deal with this subject next session, and of course if I am elected, I shall feel it to be my duty to give my best consideration to their bill."

"That's all very well," Sam goes on to say—"that's all very well, sir; but I hold that the people ought to have a voice in this matter, instead o' letting the magistrates do as they please. I am resolved not to vote for any one except he'll vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Bill."

"But, my good friend," said Mr. Astley, "if you do that, you'll let the Tories in."

"Can't help that," says Sam.

"Why, I thought you said just now you was a Liberal," said the candidate.

"So I am," says Sam.

"Well, as a Liberal, you must, of course, wish to see carried all the other things I was just now talking about," said Mr. Astley.

Sam nodded his head, and says, "Certainly I should."

"Well," says the candidate again—and he says "well" so many times that I think he must ha' been a well-digger—excuse an old man's joke. "Well, don't you think, Mr. Taylor, that it is your duty as a Liberal to sink minor differences, and go with your party, to keep the Tories out?"

"What's a minor difference?" was Sam's question on the nail.

"Oh, this Permissive Bill of yours, even suppose it could ever be carried, is a minor question compared with these others."

"That's a matter of opinion," says Sam. "I think it is the question just now."

"But you ought to support your party," says Mr. Astley.

"I want to ask two more questions," says Sam. "You talk about the Liberals; hasn't it always been their boast that they think for themselves, and don't bind themselves down to old ways? Didn't I hear you say at your meeting the other night that the Liberals had done everything for the country, because they'd been men that dared to think for themselves?"

Mr. Astley said yes; he believed he did say so.

"And didn't you say, too, sir, that the Tories were people that only did and voted as they were told by their party?"

Mr. Astley was obliged to confess that he had said so.

"Now," Sam goes on, "you say that I must vote with my party even though they oppose the Permissive Bill. If I am told I must vote with my party, that, according to your own showing, is to be a Tory; but I'm a Liberal, and mean to vote according to my opinions, and I'll not vote for any one who will not vote for the Permissive Bill."

They didn't stop with Sam long after that, I can tell you. The brewer got as savage as a bear, and Mr. Astley warn't half so polite when he went away as he was when he came. I believe he said "Good morning," but he forgot to say "sir" or "Mr. Taylor," and never touched his hat any more.

And Sam kept to his word like a man, and so did a lot of others in the town. They tried all sorts o' hard words and abuse, did the committee and canvassers, and called Sam and his mates "fools" and "fanatics," and worse; but they held fast. Mr. Croft tried his hand again with Sam, and got coached up—I think they call it—about the Permissive Bill, so as to understand a little better than he did at first what it meant. He would never promise to vote with Sir Wilfrid; but he said as how he wouldn't vote against the bill, which was all that could be got out o' him.

Mr. Astley stuck to it that he would vote against the bill, and Sam and his mates also stuck to it that they wouldn't vote at all. So the long and short of it was that the Liberals lost the election, and Sam and his friends were told again and again that they had let the Tory in.

Sam never seemed to mind that, but always says he cannot understand how any reasonable man can expect him to vote for a candidate who is opposed to what he believes to be right and just. At anyrate, as he says often, if they—meaning himself and a few other Liberals—had voted for party, instead of standing aloof for principle, there would have been one more vote in the House of Commons against the Permissive Bill, sent there by the very friends of the Bill.

And that's the story about Sam's electioneering. I only wish there were scores and hundreds more like him.

[Need we say that we agree with our old friend in his wish?]

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, from 16th April to 15th July, 1882 inclusive. During that period 338 meetings were held, 147 being deputational, and 191 ordinary. At these meetings 488 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited St. Monance, Buckhaven, Dysart, Pathhead, Edinburgh, Grangemouth, Freuchie, Duns, Broxburn, Bo'ness, Lathons, Lorgow, Largo, Leith, Cockenzie, Hawick, Jedburgh, Kelso, Glasgow, Kirkcaldy, and Cupar, and addressed 84 meetings.

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Govan, Troon, Glasgow, Nitshill, Partick, Prestwick, Balfron, Bonhill, Alexandria, Kilmarnock, Perth, Dundee, Montrose, Ferryden, Forfar, Kirriemuir, Greenock, Campbeltown, Denny, Tarbert, Kilmalcolm, Johnstone, Aitkenhead, Mauchline, Stewarton, Renfrew, and Stirling, and addressed 71 meetings.

Mr. Wm. Blackwood has visited Woodside, Aberdeen, Campbeltown, Fortrose, Beauly, Inverness, Dingwall, Cromarty, Invergordon, Alness, Davidson, Newhall, Ullapool, Stornoway, Tain, Golspie, Lerwick, Unst, Kirkwall, Stromness, Thurso, Helmsdale, Brora, Peterhead, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Hamilton, Perth, and Stonehaven, and addressed 64 meetings.

Mr. R. Drausfield has visited Partick, Govan, Glasgow, Greenock, Irvine, Ayr, Dumbarton, Bonhill, Kilmalcolm, Kilsyth, Hamilton, Barrhead, Mauchline, Stewarton, Renfrew, and Denny, and addressed 41 meetings.

Mr. A. Bennet has visited Pathhead, Dumfries, Dalbeattie, Annan, Ecclefechan, Maxwellton, Moffat, and Lockerbie, and addressed 36 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Glasgow, Pollokshaws, Govan, Irvine, Rothesay, Dumfries, Paisley, Dalbeattie, Largs, Greenock, Kilmalcolm, Port-Glasgow, Moffat, and Hamilton, and addressed 32 meetings.

Rev. S. Harding has visited Rothesay, Kilmarnock, Partick, Pollokshaws, Ayr, Dumbarton, Port-Glasgow, Largs, Kilsyth, Campbeltown, Barrhead, Johnstone, Denny, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, and addressed 28 meetings.

Mr. W. Kesson has visited Pollokshaws, Glasgow, Greenock, Hamilton, and Stirling, and addressed 20 meetings.

Mr. J. Scrymgeour has addressed 12 meetings in Dundee, Montrose, Forfar, and Kirriemuir.

Rev. J. Strachan has addressed 8 meetings in Dumfries.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has addressed 7 meetings in Leith, Hawick, Jedburgh, Kelso, Kirkcaldy, and Cupar.

Ex-Provost Dick has addressed 5 meetings in Belfast, Glasgow, Irvine, and Govan.

Mr. J. Winning has addressed 5 meetings in Irvine, Paisley, Dumfries, Govan, and West Kilbride.

Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., has addressed 4 meetings in Glasgow, Govan, Paisley, and West Kilbride.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 4 meetings in Edinburgh, Broxburn, Pathhead, and Leith.

Mr. H. Hobkirk has addressed 4 meetings in Glasgow, Kilmalcolm, and Johnstone.

Rev. G. W. Tooty has addressed 3 meetings in Dumfries.

Rev. Dr. Adamson has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh.

Rev. J. M'Queen has addressed 2 meetings in Belfast.

Rev. D. J. Martin has addressed 2 meetings in Stornoway.

Rev. J. Cooper has addressed 2 meetings in Dumfries.

Rev. F. Binns has addressed 2 meetings in Dumfries.

Miss Johnston has addressed 2 meetings in Dumfries and Maxwellton.

Captain M'Lean has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow and Govan.

Mr. R. M'Callum has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow and Denny.

Mr. T. Clapperton has addressed 2 meetings in Dumfries.

The following gentlemen have each taken part in the proceedings of meetings in the places which follow their names:—Revs. J. J. Mackay, Buckhaven; J. Pollock, Buckhaven; W. M'Ghie, Buckhaven; N. M'Leod, Freuchie; W. L. Craig, Freuchie; J. G. Train, Freuchie; J. Primrose, Broxburn; S. Sleath, Bo'ness; G. Weir, Dumfries; D. Galbraith, Montrose; J. Baxter, Montrose; J. Chalmers, Denny; D. Pirret, Govan; J. D. M'Kinnon, Dumfries, and H. Jones, Cockenzie; Bailie Selkirk, J.P., Nitshill; Ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P., Carnwath; Councillor Campbell, Dundee; Drs. M'Culloch, Dumfries, and Smith, Govan; Messrs. Smart, Grangemouth; G. A. Barclay, Edinburgh; W. J. Wood, Glasgow; James Horn, Glasgow; Mudie, Pathhead; A. Sinclair, Pathhead; J. Balfour, Pathhead; G. Reekie, Pathhead; D. Stark, Dumfries; T. Barclay, Blackford; J. Longmore, Dumfries; A. Nicolson, Leith; R. Hermon, Montrose; J. Ripely, Edinburgh; J. Villiers, Dumfries; J. H. Gray, Glasgow; J. Butters, Edinburgh; Hardie, Edinburgh; Lee, Edinburgh; D. Ramsay, Edinburgh; J. Wylie, Dumfries; and H. M'Laren, Glasgow.

"It is true" said an old philosopher, "that two heads are usually better than one, but it never could be thus with two heads on the same pin."

We give the following as we received it:—A teetotaller, who never adorns his table with wicked wine, gave his servant a homeopathic dose of whisky to clean the plate with. The girl, however, was troubled with a "sair tooth," and "necessity's sharp pinch" prompted her to drink the whisky and blow her breath on the spoons!

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

AUGUST, 1882.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH Annual Meetings of this Association will be held in Glasgow, on Tuesday 26th September, 1882.

The members and friends will meet for BUSINESS in the Christian Institute, 70 Bothwell Street, at Ten o'clock A.M. Treasurer Hamilton, J.P., president of the Association, will occupy the chair. The annual report and treasurer's statement will be laid before the meeting; office-bearers elected in the room of those retiring; and important business brought under consideration.

The ANNUAL TEA PARTY will take place in the City Hall Saloon, Candleriggs, at 3.30 P.M. precisely. Representatives from the various Temperance Associations in Scotland have been invited to this meeting, and addresses from delegates and representatives will be delivered. Tickets one shilling each, for which early application is necessary.

The ANNUAL PUBLIC MEETING will be held in the City Hall in the evening at half-past seven o'clock.

Fuller particulars will appear in the next issue of the Social Reformer. The early notice given will allow the friends ample time to shape their arrangements so as to enable them to be present. The Executive rely with confidence on a large and enthusiastic attendance at all the meetings.

R. MACKAY, Secy.

With feelings of regret and mortification as keen as our own, the friends sympathising with the earnest efforts of the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory Movement must have learned that, after all his efforts to move the House and the Government, Sir Wilfrid Lawson was on Tuesday, 18th ult., denied a hearing for his Resolution. It may be true or false that the publicans did their very best to prevent his resolution coming on—the fact that they are so widely blamed, does not speak much for their reputation when their own pernicious interests are at stake. The fact, the mortifying fact, remains that Sir Wilfrid was not heard. We refer our readers to his letter to the Daily Press, published in another portion of our magazine. Of the letter this much may be freely admitted, that he takes his repulse with an admirable temper, and that his gay wisdom has not deserted him. Never in all the divisions on the Bill has he been similarly repulsed as he was last month. True, in 1872 there was no division taken, but that arose from a desire on the part of Sir Frederick Heygate that the debate should be adjourned, and he moved accordingly. He was defeated, but immediately, by the rules of the House, the debate stood adjourned. That same year an attempt was made again to bring on the Bill but it failed. In 1877 Sir Wilfrid gave way that Ireland might get her Sunday Closing Bill passed into law. At every other time, and twice in 1880, Sir Wilfrid had his innings. Well, we in Scotland have done our best to assist him. We have petitioned for his Bill till we resolved to relinquish petitions and send men to support him. We memorialised on behalf of his Bill and his resolution. Every election in Scotland has found the Association stirring up the electors, even as the eagle stirreth up her nest. Deputation after deputation have gone to London and laboured earnestly and persistently in his support. With what result it is for our readers rather than the Executive to say. But of what avail the pressure. It is undoubtedly great and singularly worthy of the agitation, but it is evidently not enough for the purpose. The Association must appeal to the country and ask it to increase the force and pressure of its demand. That Government should longer evade satisfying the just claims of the Scottish people is not to be tolerated. The pressure already exerted has told powerfully upon Scottish Parliamentary representatives, as may be easily divined from their voting upon the question whenever the calling of a division has presented them with an opportunity, but it is the Government that loiters and delays. Mr. Gladstone made a confession the other day hardly creditable to the strong Government of which he is the head. He is reported to have said, he thought that the arrangements at present in force, if any arrangements can be said to be in force for the transaction of Scotch business, which it seems to him is never transacted at all, are so unsatisfactory that the imperative duty of the Government must be to endeavour to make better provision in future. There is an opportunity for the Scottish people to get their numerous and weighty grievances redressed. Let them avail themselves of it. The Association is, we believe, bent upon a vigorous attempt to get special legislation for Scotland, upon which, we hope, it will concentrate all future efforts. If the Government will make provision for the transaction of Scotch business to the extent of that provision, its labours may be lightened, but its main reliance is upon its own supporters. Let them afford it the needful pressure, let them combine and enable the Executive to impress upon the Government the conviction that the liquor traffic of Scotland must be grappled with at once if the support of the Scottish people is to be longer counted upon, and there need be no fear that the relief demanded will be gracefully and speedily afforded.

During the past months the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have been hard pressed through their earnest desire to meet the growing demands of the agitation. Their agents and advocates have been having an incessantly busy time, and have been greatly encouraged by the reception everywhere accorded to them. A week's meetings—two meetings nightly—were held in Glasgow with the greatest success. Mr. Bennet excepted, the whole staff of the Association took part in these, and great good will, we believe, follow the efforts made. A week's meetings in Dumfries, Paisley, Greenock, in and around Inverness, and a fortnight's meetings in Edinburgh, add to the ordinary work of the Association, not to speak of those gatherings which were on a less extensive scale. So far as our information goes the audience cheered the advanced sentiments of the speakers, and those who are incredulous as to state of public feeling on the principles and policy of the Association, should just go with the agents on a week's tour. They will return without even a shred of unbelief as to the country's wish for an absolute veto. Wherever the agents of the Association take up their stand they impeach the traffic in alcoholic liquors, whether licensed or furtive, as the blackest source of corruption that ever menaced the liberties or the virtue of any country, and to their proposal that its fate should be finally determined by the ratepayers there, is always the hearty amen of a large and sympathetic audience.

The British Temperance League Conference was this year held at Preston, so indelibly associated with the rise and progress of the Temperance Reformation. It is claimed for it, and justly we believe, that it was the best Conference ever held. A most noteworthy incident of the proceedings was the visit of Mr. Joseph Livesey to the Conference meeting on the 4th ult. Frail in body, yet with the old spirit—clear and sensible, the veteran met the audience hushed at his request into respectful and reverent silence, and passed along leaning on the arms of Mr. William and Mrs. Livesey. He paced twice the length of the room shaking hands with Mr. John Sergeant, his dear friend, and another. Arriving at the entrance he turned and said: "God bless you all. If I was not so feeble I would have spoken to you," and passed out amid the tearful regards of beating hearts. It is more than fifty years since this indomitable champion of personal abstinence began his manifold labours on behalf of temperance, and his labours have commended themselves to two generations. He has fought a good fight and kept his faith in the principles of teetotal-ism, brightened by constant use. We have often regretted that he never saw his way to support the Permissive Bill, but we have never forgotten his wise words, "While the public houses exist the main obstacle to the temperance reformation remains unmoved." The difference between us is merely one of means and not of principle. With him all is well. The tabernacle of clay in which so much worth has for so long been enshrined is slowly but surely crumbling to decay, but the soul that conceived the work and gave so liberally for carrying it on need have little to fear. Dissolution sooner or later will release it from this vale of tears, and through the Saviour's merit will waft it into life that shall never end.

Canon Hopkins in several of this year's issues of The Church of England Temperance Chronicle treats in an exhaustive and impressive manner the barmaid question. This is a question which always crops up, and it is not long since we brought before our readers the opinion of an American lady on this sad phase of our present day civilization. The Rev. Canon was led to make his inquiry owing to the barmaid of the Criterion destroying herself because of the heartless cruelty of a naval officer. Barmaids at railway stations are not nearly so dangerously beset nor afflict such mischievous consequences upon their customers as those in the bar-rooms of our cities. These latter only answer their end when they induce their customers to a gross indulgence in their master's hurtful wares. He very fairly puts on record the grievances of this class as stated by themselves. The story may be easily guessed—it is one of long hours and short pay—the market is over-supplied and there are more aspirants for their position than would twice overfill their places. Thoughtless girls devoid of moral training or discrimination, as beautiful as them, looking in and seeing them dressed like ladies, flirting with young men with better clothes than brains, are prepared to make any risk to be barmaids. The glitter is what is seen, the loss of self-respect, of virtue, is not seen. The barmaids themselves cannot relinquish their position, they cannot step down to virtue and a crust, and they cling to vice and its hollow pleasures, shutting their eyes to the goal—intemperance, gay life, the streets, or the early and dishonoured grave. Canon Hopkins also allows the literary friends of the barmaids to advocate their case. But after all that they can say they have to admit that the most serious dangers to health of body and purity of soul are inseparable from her calling. In his last article he quotes a fearful account from the Christian of the mode pursued by French barmaids. These unfortunate creatures, to induce their visitors to drink, drink with them, and the result is fearful in the extreme. In Glasgow this custom has already begun, although it is confined, as yet, to one place of resort. Still things bad begun make strong themselves by ill. This barmaid question is one of the most alarming in connection with the drink traffic. Everywhere charming and beautiful women are being pressed into the publican's service, they exert a powerful fascination over their customers which is always to their injury, and they themselves, in the generality of cases, sooner or later, stripped of all the purity and excellence which go to form the truly amiable, virtuous, and lovable woman, sink into wretchedness and misery: the "good things" they once enjoyed adding by their remembrance to the horrors or the hardships of their unhappy lot.

Not long ago we exposed a sacramental wine for temperance people as a great fraud, for which we were soundly bullied by the makers of it. Subsequently we published an analysis of wine for temperance people, which analysis was furnished by the Unfermented Wine Vigilance Company and showed that they were all, with the exception of the famous wine of Mr. Frank Wright, loaded with alcohol. We have lying before us a statement by Mr. Malins of Birmingham about Good Templar champagne. This liquor contains 19½ per cent. of proof spirit, nearly four times the strength of ordinary Edinburgh ale or London porter. The agents for it admit in their price lists that it contains 9 per cent. of alcohol and yet vend it for the special use of Good Templars. Appeals to their conscience are vain it appears. We should not be surprised if they should be offended that their audacious cleverness in making a dash at the very designation of the noble order is not heartily acknowledged. Mr. Malins directs attention to the so-called "sacramental wines." The "Ruby" wine has 11.2 per cent. of absolute alcohol or 24.3 per cent. of proof spirit. "Rota tent," the wine recommended at one of the Wesleyan Conferences for sacramental purposes, is as intoxicating as "Ruby tent." Next of the disclosures is that of "Hop Bitters." It contains 12 per cent. of alcohol and costs 4s. 6d. per bottle. Bavarian, Danish, and Lager beer are all intoxicating liquors. The absurd idea that man must drink something lies at the bottom of this credulity on the part of abstainers, and at the success of such commercial swindling. There are men of a deciduous nature who content themselves with the water in their food and fruits, and they never feel the want of draughts of tea, milk, or soup. The proportion of liquids in food and fruits is their standard and they loyally adhere to it. Others confine themselves to milk and tea or coffee, avoiding all other artificial drinks. Those who crave such beverages as are now advertised are in the path of danger and should at once seek safety in an abstinence which excludes all such dubious liquors.

One of the importations which is finding favour with the bibulous in our land is lager beer. Of course its virtues (!) are loudly trumpeted by the interested, and in consequence quantities of it are being increasingly swilled by beer drinkers. That fearful nemesis of beer—Bright's disease—does not pass by the drinkers of lager beer. An eminent American physician observes that "the man who habitually drinks beer is sure to have Bright's disease. Beer in large quantities is one of the worst things a man can ruin his stomach and organs with. In Germany where the students drink a great deal of beer their kidneys and bladders are always affected." So along with this insidious liquor will come a proportionate amount of misery and suffering—all the sadder that it might be so easily averted, and having a fatal termination in numerous cases. Addison brings before his readers a problem of the schoolmen. Supposing the whole body of the earth were a mass of the finest sand and that a single grain of it were annihilated every thousand years, and supposing one had it in his choice to be happy all the while this prodigious mass of sand was being consumed on condition that he was to be miserable ever after, or supposing that he was to be miserable during the slow process of its destruction on condition of being happy ever after, what would be his choice? The gentle moralist expresses a fear that many having a greater imagination than reason would sink under the consideration of such a length of time of misery and give themselves up to the happiness of the hour considering that it would be so near and last so very long. We fear that Addison must have had liquor drinkers in his mind's eye, at least he would have made no mistake if he had, for while we think of the extreme folly of those who will, despite warning and in deliberate ignorance, indulge in strong liquors, we cannot help associating them with those unhappy beings who will sacrifice the happiness of length of days and a blissful future to the fleeting pleasures of a few short years.

It always affords us pleasure to find that the number of honourable members in Parliament who are total abstainers shows a steady increase. The number is now thirty-two—twenty-five English representatives—Lord E. Fitzmaurice (Calne), Sir W. V. Harcourt, Bart. (Derby), Sir C. Dilke, Bart. (Chelsea), Sir W. Lawson, Bart. (Carlisle), Messrs. W. S. Allen (Newcastle under Lyne), John Bright (Birmingham), T. Burt (Morpeth), W. S. Caine (Scarbro'), H. C. E. Childers (Pontefract), Joseph Cowen (Newcastle), D. Davies (Cardigan), R. Davies (Anglesey), W. Fowler (Cambridge), Theo. Fry (Darlington), E. S. Howard (East Cumberland), Alfred Illingworth (Broadford), C. B. M'Laren (Stafford), H. Mason (Ashton under Line), S. Morley (Bristol), George Palmer (Reading), Arthur Pease (Whitby), H. B. Saunderson (Frome), J. C. Stevenson (South Shields), C. T. Thompson (Durham), and Professor Bryce (Tower Hamlets). Six Irish representatives: J. A. Blake (Waterford County), J. P. Corry (Belfast), C. H. Meldon (Kildare), Arthur O'Connor (Queen's County), J. R. Richardson (Armagh)

County), and Benjamin Whitworth (Drogheda). One Scotch representative: Mr. P. M'Lagan (Linthgow). We indulge the hope that Scotland will, after next election, have a larger number of abstaining representatives. In this matter she should not hold a bottom place.

We have again to remind our readers of their duty towards the Electoral Register. This is a very imperative matter at the present moment; for there never was a time when the urgency of crowding it with the friends of prohibition was so evident. We do not write to needlessly alarm our friends, but really they cannot, any more than we ourselves, feel easy about the political future. Kings and crowns are proverbially unstable, but in our age the same has to be said of governments, a breath can make them as a breath has made, and a word has kindled up the fiercest elements of parliamentary strife and driven a government into the chill shades of the Opposition. This may be the fate of the Government of the day: it is threatened with the destructive vote of those which it has done most for, it is menaced by its inveterate foes the Opposition, and there is open disaffection among its own supporters. At such a perilous moment it is the bounden duty of the prohibitionist to see that the Electoral Register is all right—that he is prepared for any eventuality. No doubt greater attention is bestowed upon the Roll now than ever was the case, but year by year friend after friend departs and the gap left by their decease should be filled by one as friendly to the cause. How many men are there in every locality who should be there and are even thought to be there who, when the struggle arises, are found among the absentees? This may arise from ignorance of their right and their duty, but the committee cannot be absolved from censure, for they ought to know and should have enrolled all such. They should never forget that Providence is on the side of the strongest battalions. There are also the lodgers. They must be looked after year by year, and many a majority might be made overwhelming if they were duly mustered. This year the Electoral Rolls of our burghs will be largely augmented by the registration of female ratepayers. This new accession cannot but strengthen the hands of Prohibitionists, and render the struggle more decisive for them. We heartily welcome them: they have been a source of political strength wherever virtue has needed help at the polling booth, and we will we believe have to thank God more heartily that our triumph over the publicans has been swelled through their voting. We leave this matter in the hands of our friends. They know how much our present progress owes to their attention to the Electoral Register hitherto, and we leave them to maintain, by their vigilant care of it, the proud Parliamentary position we possess. We remind them that in burghs, ratepayers who have paid their rates due at 20th June are qualified, and their names should appear on the register. The roll has to be completed by the 15th September, when it will be exhibited publicly for examination by the inhabitants. It should be narrowly scrutinized lest the names of friends should have been omitted or wrongly entered. Lodgers must be entered every year. Local committees should have plenty of blank forms in which to enter those omitted or not entered. If the party omitted is a Liberal the Liberal committee will gladly see after him; if a Conservative that party will do likewise. But in any case let our friends look to this important matter and make it their supreme care to do it all needful justice: their satisfaction will be felt through the knowledge that they are prepared for any eventuality, their triumph will come with the great success they may have earned through their vigilance in the Registration Court. "LET ALL FRIENDS OF AN ABSOLUTE VETO OVER THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC ATTEND TO THE ELECTORAL REGISTER."

The Clubs (working men's and other) have been so very persistently decried as being little else than "shebeens" that we are glad to know that the working men's Liberal Club at Salisbury voted last month on drink or no drink to members. On the vote being taken (by ballot) it was found that 271 had voted—237 no, 30 yes, and neutral 4. This is what we should expect to be the result of a vote in any club instituted by working men for self improvement. And when the national issue, liquor traffic or voluntary prohibition, is put to them their vote will, we anticipate, show that their order is overwhelmingly in favour of the suppression of the liquor traffic. Their rulers believe this also—why do they decline to give them the opportunity of voting on this issue? When, however, the working class awaken to the fact that their rulers cannot forego the twenty-three millions sterling accruing from the debasing indulgence into which so many of their order are entrapped, they will know what use to put their votes to—the destruction of the liquor traffic as the main cause of the enforced idleness, the meagre pay, the unfrugality, the irreligion which is such a sad reflection on the toiling millions, and which goes so far to obscure their hardy virtues.

Notwithstanding the Sunday Closing Act which is bound to operate in Wales speedily, and the many restrictions on their business which the publicans complain of having to endure, the eye is arrested by advertisements in publican newspapers which ought to fix the serious attention of moral and social reformers. We are offered by a licensed valuer in Wales, seventeen years' lease of premises, perfectly free, and asserted to be the best paying and easiest conducted trade in the town. The money required is twelve hundred pounds, and the concern, we are told, is a certain fortune to a business man. The devil hardly ever put forth a more tempting bait than that. He tempts us all, but to some minds the alluring bait of a fortune for twelve hundred pounds invested in the best paying and easiest conducted trade in a busy, manufacturing, mining, and shipping port will be irresistible. Golden as the bait is, the price to be paid for it will be found much more than the sum that passes between the buyer and the offerer. To be a sound business publican means skill in the doctoring of liquors, blending them more to bring out their capacity of saturation than to increase their quality, tact and push as seen in the beauty of the barmaid, the artistic splendour of the fittings, the knowledge of the night side of human nature, that callousness which is impervious to moral consideration, and that deference to the exactions of self-interest which quietly puts aside all sympathy for those who fall by the power of his "strong ones." Such a man will kill four customers every year by his liquors besides shortening the lives and diminishing the happiness of hundred others. He will be cursed by his customers and will never have the blessing of those who are ready to perish. Like a "switcher" on the railway line he will stand on the road that leads from the cradle to the grave, and turning the points for many an unsuspecting youth and maiden, hurl them into those fearful swamps in which they will sink to rise no more—and sinking wish that they might sink beyond the reach of the Archangel's trump. No, we do not share the belief of the license valuer. The man who runs the drink selling business will find it is a losing business and one that can only be best conducted in the absence of all the better qualities of humanity. The money earned by such a fearful trade may form the fearful links of the galling chain that will confine him to those dismal shades where hope never comes.

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—VI.

June 19.—Mr. R. W. Duff, M.P. for Banffshire, on his re-election as a junior Lord of the Treasury, took the oath and his seat amid cheers.

— Mr. Osborne Morgan, in reply to Mr. Caine, said, The number of punishments for drunkenness in the army during 1881 was 43,606, and the total number of men so punished was 23,365. He was sorry to say that these figures were slightly in excess of those for the previous year, but much less than the average for the last ten years. In regard to the number of punishments for crimes arising out of drunkenness, he was sorry he could not give the figures as there was no separate record, and it would be difficult to make out one, but a very large proportion of the crimes of violence and insubordination committed by the soldiers were committed by them when under the influence of drink. It was quite true that the purchase of beer, tobacco, &c., from the regimental canteen at low rates, together with other privileges such as the use of the library, recreation rooms, and gymnasium, were offered as inducements by the circular issued through the post office to recruits to enlist, but he might say that the beer so supplied was of a very wholesome nature. (Laughter and cheers.) Cases of drunkenness arising from its use were exceedingly rare. He thought he might almost say that they were unknown, but he might add that no spirits were sold at these canteens. He thought he might say the real cause of drunkenness in the army was certainly not the beer sold in the canteens, but the abominable stuff which soldiers obtained under the name of spirits in low public houses in the neighbourhood of their barracks, and for which this beer is intended so far as possible to be a substitute.

June 20.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice that he should move a resolution in favour of local option that day month.

Mr. Dobson, in reply to Mr. Macfarlane, stated that it was open to any purchaser to take proceedings with regard to the sale of an adulterated article. If a shopkeeper sold an article as cheese which contained foreign ingredients and the purchaser was prejudiced thereby, the shopkeeper could be proceeded against for penalties under the sale of Food and Drugs Act. The shopkeeper could protect himself by informing the purchaser at the time of the sale that the article was mixed.

— Mr. Caine asked the Judge Advocate-General if it was his intention to introduce any bill dealing with "those low public-houses" to which he ascribed the lamentable fact that 23,255 men out of a total of 180,000, constituting the British Army, had received 43,656 punishments for drunkenness in a single year, besides many other punishments for crime and insubordination committed under the influence of liquor. Mr. O. Morgan said that however desirable it might be to interfere with low public houses in which adulterated spirits were sold to soldiers and other people, he was not aware that it was any part of his duty to bring in a bill for that purpose. He was afraid therefore that he must leave that task to his honourable friend and to those who thought it part of their parliamentary mission to interfere with that class of property. Mr. Caine gave notice that at the earliest possible date he should call the attention of the house to the national injury and disgrace resulting from the increased intemperance of the army in consequence of the low public houses in garrison towns and move a resolution.

June 29.—Mr. Gladstone, in reply to Mr. Barclay, said that the Government have signified to the Government of Spain that the finances of this country do not permit of any reduction in the duties on Spanish wines in the meantime, while they have signified that they are not at all unwilling to approach the question in a more favourable condition of finance.

July 4.—Sir W. Harcourt, in reply to Mr. Lloyd, said it was incorrect that a knowledge of the English language was a necessary qualification of a publican in Wales.

July 9.—Sir H. Maxwell gave notice that on Monday, on the second reading of the Licensing Laws (Scotland) amendment Bill, he would move that order be read and discharged.

July 10.—On the motion of the Lord-Advocate, leave was given to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to licenses to retail intoxicating liquors on passenger vessels in Scotland. The Bill was read a first time.

July 11.—Mr. Stevenson presented a huge petition signed by 159,327 wives, mothers, and daughters in England and Scotland, including the county of Aberdeen, against the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday. The petition, which formed a roll as large as a barrel, bound up with broad bands of blue ribbon, was carried up to the table by the honourable member and Mr. Broadhurst, and deposited at the Speaker's feet amid laughter and cheers.

Mr. Onslow presented a petition on behalf of the Licensed Victuallers Protection Society against the closing of public houses on Sunday, and moved that it be read by the clerk at the table, which was done.

July 12.—The Beer Dealers' Retail Licenses Act (1880) amendment Bill as amended, was considered and read a third time.

July 13.—Mr. Courtenay moved the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, the object being that the Bill might be reprinted, so that the full financial proposals of the Government should be brought before the House. The discussion, it was proposed, should take place on the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair. Mr. Harcourt opposed the motion, and moved, that in the opinion of the House, the financial arrangements comprised in the Bill will not be satisfactory unless provision is therein made for giving immediate relief to the ratepayers from the incidence of the rates levied for the maintenance of main roads in England. (Opposition cheers.) Mr. M'Iver moved that the debate be now adjourned, but the honourable member finding no seconder the motion fell to the ground. Mr. Courtenay complained that the motion of the honourable member for Oxfordshire was unexpectedly sprung upon the Government, and that to discuss it was very inconvenient in the absence of the Prime Minister. The discussion was continued by Sir Stafford Northcote, Lord Hartington, and Mr. Reives. The House then divided. For amendment 131 against 149—majority against 18. The Bill was then read a second time.

July 14.—The House went into committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, when amendments were introduced, and the Bill ordered to be reported.

July 17.—Mr. Stewart asked the Prime Minister whether in view of the dissatisfaction caused by the manner in which the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill had been dealt with, and the additional proof thereby afforded of the necessity which existed for securing the proper conduct of Scotch business in Parliament—(cheers)—he would consider the advisability of seizing the opportunity the present vacancy in the Cabinet afforded to obtain that object by merging the sinecure office of the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster in that of a Secretary of State for Scotland? (Cheers.)

Mr. Gladstone—I trust my honourable friend will not believe, from the unfavourable tenor of the answer I shall give to his inquiry, that I at all differ from him in regard to the preamble to the question. I think the arrangements at present in force for the transaction of Scotch business, which it seems to me is never transacted at all—(cheers)—are very unsatisfactory—and I deem it an imperative part of the duty of the Government in the measures they have immediately in contemplation to endeavour to make better provision for this purpose.

— In reply to a question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson stated that he intended to bring in his Local Option Resolution to-morrow night, if he possibly could, and he appealed to the Government to state to the House what facilities he might expect. Mr. Gladstone pointed out that if a committee on the Arrears Bill were finished before to-morrow evening, then the honourable baronet would be able to bring on his motion.

July 18.—Mr. Stewart Wortley presented two petitions from Sheffield, one being a quarter of a mile in length, and containing the signatures of 30,000 adult males of the population of Sheffield against the Sunday closing of public houses.

July 19.—Mr. Stevenson moved the second reading of his Sunday Closing (England) Bill in a brief speech. Mr. C. N. Warton moved its rejection. In favour the following spoke—Sir J. W. Pease, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Hibbert. Against were—Sir H. Selwin Ibbetson, Mr. Phipps, Mr. Gibson, Mr. J. G. Talbot, and Colonel Makins. Mr. Callan talked until at 5.45 the Bill became a dropped order. The discussion of this day was of some value.

THE LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION.

As our readers are aware, the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association immediately that Sir Wilfrid Lawson had apparently secured Tuesday, 18th ult., on which to move his resolution, asked the esteemed co-operation of every temperance organisation in Scotland; and communicated with their immediate friends and supporters through the country, and specially with the eight hundred and fifty ministers of the Gospel who substantially sympathise with the Association. They appointed the following gentlemen to represent them in London:—Ex-Provost Dick; J. Williams, Esq., J.P.; Messrs. Forrester, Selkirk, Winning, and Mackay.

The labours of their deputation were arduous. Notwithstanding the adverse fate which overtook the resolution, they were enabled to serve the interests of the Scottish Permissive prohibitory movement in many ways. They had interviews with fifty-two hon. members, and were gratified to find that the approach was never so cordial, nor the results more satisfactory. A marked and gratifying change has come over the minds of Scottish parliamentary representatives which will appear in greater progress in the House of Commons. Special interviews were obtained with the Right Hon. the Lord-Advocate, the Solicitor-General, Lord Colin Campbell, and the Right Hon. the Earl of Aberdeen. These, we are informed, were all of a most encouraging nature, and, on the whole, the deputation were able to report in gratifying terms of their efforts. They fully expected that, if the resolution had come up for discussion and division, there would have been a larger vote for Scotland; at the same time, the adverse vote would not have been less, nor, they believe, otherwise; their expectations were securely based, and it is matter for no little regret that the Arrears Bill should not have been out of the way of the resolution. There was an impression prevalent in the Lobby that the publicans were pulling the wires in order to shunt the resolution. Nothing else could have been expected; but they have been doing so on every occasion and all along, yet with little retarding effect on the progress of the agitation. There is reason to believe that the fate of the resolution will tell as much in our favour as it would have done had it been divided upon. It was not the discussion of a principle but a cry for the application of a principle which the House has already emphatically endorsed, and the fact that the cry is raised for urgency cannot be set aside by a refusal, in consequence of a prior engagement, to listen to it. The Executive are prepared to take the sense of a Parliament in another way—a way that will approve itself to the country, and will vindicate itself to all who earnestly desire the relief of their country and kindred from the intolerable tyranny of the drink system.

The last duty of the deputation was to meet with kindred spirits in the offices of the United Kingdom Alliance, Parliament Street, London, on Wednesday, 19th ult. There was a pretty large gathering of kindred spirits by no means downcast, rather, we should say, too resolute and enthusiastic for dismay. We missed the genial presence of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who was quite absorbed in Egyptian affairs.

The gentlemen taking part in the proceedings were—Ex-Provost Dick, Glasgow; Messrs. Adams and Hussey, Birmingham; Mr. Wilkinson, Belfast; ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P., Edinburgh; Mr. Mackay, Glasgow; Mr. Schofield, Cardiff; Messrs. Raper, Kempster, Wall, and Fithian, Hilton, the Rev. Dawson Burns, London; Mr. Whitwell, Kendal; Mr. Davidson, Leeds; Mr. Brambley, Cambridge; Mr. Hibbert, Bradford.

The following resolutions were adopted:—

I. "That this meeting of temperance reformers from various parts of the country deeply regrets that the exigencies of business, contrary to the expressed hopes of Mr. Gladstone on Monday last, precluded Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the House of Commons from again urging on the Government, by a resolution, the importance of passing an efficient local option law; at the same time this meeting rejoices in the manifold evidences of a rapidly maturing public opinion, which will render it impossible to much longer delay the enactment of a measure giving a popular veto on the liquor traffic, which is more urgent than any other question of domestic legislation."

II. "That having regard to the widespread ruin and demoralisation which are entailed upon the nation by the traffic in intoxicating liquors and the fearful obstacles it presents to all material, moral, and social progress, this meeting strongly urges upon the constituencies of the United Kingdom the paramount duty of pressing upon their representatives in Parliament the great urgency which exists for promptly and effectively dealing with a system which is fraught with such universal disaster to all that is valuable in the community."

Scotland was ably represented on the occasion by ex-Provost Dick, and ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P. The eloquent fervour of the ex-Bailie made a most marked impression on his hearers. This last, but not the least interesting of their duties discharged, the deputation separated, enjoying the solid satisfaction that they had done their best for the interests of the Association and the movement they had the honour to represent, and cherishing a confident anticipation of substantial results following their labours in the not at all remote future.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON ON HIS RESOLUTION.

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR,—In some comments which have been published on recent proceedings in the House of Commons, it has been suggested that an intentional prolongation of debate on the Arrears Bill, and other questions, was promoted in order to exclude my resolution in favour of Local Option from the consideration which it was hoped it might have obtained yesterday evening.

I know not whether a prolonged debate was or was not carried on, but appearances were suspicious. But as it is most unlikely that this session will afford me another opportunity of bringing forward my motion, I should like shortly to explain how the question of Local Option now stands, and the reason why I was desirous to debate and to divide on the resolution of which I had given notice. You will remember, sir, that in the year 1880, soon after the assembling of the new Parliament, I succeeded in carrying through the House the following resolution:—

That, inasmuch as the ancient and avowed object of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquor is to supply a supposed public want, without detriment to the public welfare, this House is of opinion that a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested and affected—namely, the inhabitants themselves—who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system by some efficient measure of Local Option.

This resolution simply declares the impolicy and injustice of licensing authorities being permitted to force licenses for the sale of drink on localities the dwellers in which decidedly object to having places for the sale of intoxicating liquors among them.

The House of Commons the following session reaffirmed this resolution by an increased majority, and those who warmly supported the proposed change in the Liquor Laws were in hopes that the Government would be able, at any rate during the present session, to introduce legislation on the lines of the resolution which I have mentioned.

You know, sir, how they have been disappointed, and how the exigencies of Ireland have retarded the enactment of almost all domestic reforms in other portions of the United Kingdom.

The object which I had in view in asking the House of Commons once more to declare its approval of a popular veto on the issue of licenses, was to ensure that there should be no further unnecessary delay in dealing with the matter, and so prove to the Government that they would receive parliamentary and popular support in legislating to provide efficient local control over the Liquor Traffic.

I am perfectly convinced (and I speak with some experience in the matter), that there is no public question which at present excites so much interest among the masses of the people, as does this question of Local Option.

It is no wonder that this is so, when we remember that the Prime Minister himself has declared "that our drinking habits bring on the country the accumulated evils of war, pestilence, and famine."

Thanking you for affording me space for this letter, I will only add that the friends of Local Option need not be disheartened at the temporary disappointment of last night, as I am not sure it will not supply a greater stimulus to the growth of a vigorous public opinion against the liquor traffic, out of doors, than would have been provided had I been allowed to bring on the debate in the House.—I remain, sir, your obedient servant, WILFRID LAWSON.

A circular, of which the following is a copy, was forwarded to every Scotch representative in view of the 18th ult.:—"Intoxicating Liquors Resolution. House of Commons, Tuesday, 18th July, 1882. Right Honourable and Honourable Members are respectfully reminded that on Tuesday next the following Resolution will be moved by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart.:—"That in view of the great and grievous evils which the nation suffers from the Liquor Traffic, this House is of opinion that the power of removing the cause of these evils by some efficient measure of local option, as recommended by the resolutions of this House of June 18th, 1880, and June 14th, 1881, be entrusted to local communities at the earliest practicable opportunity." The House of Commons has already, on three several occasions, divided on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Resolution. The Scotch vote, on each occasion, has been as follows:—On 5th March, 1880, votes and pairs, for 32, against 7; on 18th June, 1880, votes and pairs, for 43, against 5; on 14th June, 1881, votes and pairs, for 43, against 5. In renewing, in this form, the appeal to the Scottish Representatives to support Sir Wilfrid Lawson, it is deemed advisable to repeat in substance, and with, if possible, greater emphasis, the terms of the statement of the case made last year, namely, that on no public question of practical and pressing importance is there such substantial unanimity of opinion in Scotland as on this, the votes referred to being a significant and indisputable proof of it; and, further, that a widespread impatience has been manifested throughout the country at the delay in giving effect to the Resolution. While the state of public business may be pleaded, on the part of the Government, as a reason for inaction in reference to this question, it is earnestly hoped that nothing will now prevent it being dealt with 'at the earliest practicable opportunity.' Right Honourable and Honourable Members are earnestly requested to be in their places on Tuesday next, and to support the Resolution, in order to strengthen the hands of the Government in giving effect, without delay, to the decision of the House. James Hamilton, J.P., President; James Torrens, J.P., Chairman of Executive; Thos. Dick, Vice-Chairman; James L. Selkirk, J.P., Honorary Secretary; William Smith, Treasurer; Robert Mackay, Secretary.—Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. Offices: 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, 14th July, 1882.

THE MOVEMENT IN THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—Kindly allow me a short space in your columns while I give those of your readers who may be interested an idea of the feeling in the southern district so far as I have been able to ascertain it. Brevity being a point to be kept in view in correspondence of this kind my survey of the situation will be given in as few sentences as possible. From the enthusiastic reception given me on 22nd May, when I began work in Dumfries town, I was led to form a very favourable impression of the sentiment prevalent in the neighbourhood, and the results obtained since then have fully justified my expectations. The friends render a willing assistance, and the public always accord a good reception. We have just concluded a week's meetings in Dumfries and we are told that the success attending these, considering that the burden has been borne entirely by the local friends, is almost unprecedented. Sound prohibitory principles were advocated at all the meetings. The officials of the Dumfries and Maxwellton Union are, I am glad to say, succeeding in securing the united co-operation of all the lodges and societies in town, and much effective work will yet be accomplished. Of the other places I have visited I cannot speak so favourably as of Dumfries. For the greater part they stand greatly in need of stirring up. In some places the main difficulty is to find some one sufficiently interested to cooperate with the visitor. In other places want of faith seems to me to be the great drawback. Persons who have laboured long in connection with the movement have succumbed to the sickening influences of hope deferred, and retired from the conflict. A little pressure, however, may induce them to renew their efforts and ensure their co-operation.

In this district as elsewhere throughout the country, we come in contact and have to contend with the opposition of some teetotalers who take exception to our principles and policy. Some of these are vigorous enough in their denunciation of the drink traffic, but they either can't or won't understand the necessity of agitating for its total suppression. The Licensing Bill of Lord Colin Campbell has found no favour in this district so far as I can ascertain, in feeling most of the friends I have met are totally opposed to it, and there are few who take an interest in the question and understand the position of the prohibitory movement who regard the measure with any amount of favour.

While the general condition of the district so far as I have seen it is not by any means encouraging, yet with the assistance and counsel of the few tried friends who are prepared to stand by me in most of the places, I expect in course of time to succeed in creating a deeper interest in the question and enlisting not only the sympathy but the co-operation of many who are yet without the pale of the movement. The tide of temperance revival which has been sweeping over the north and east, and now in the west, is coming in our direction, and come when it will we shall take it at the flood and in conjunction with the others strike an effective blow at the system so dishonouring to God and hurtful to man.

The American Congress forbids liquors to be used in its own dining room.

Sergeant Lawrence, Dumbarton, the winner of the much-coveted Queen's Prize at Wimbledon this year, is an abstainer.

A "Green Ribbon" Army, composed of members of Roman Catholic temperance organisations throughout the United Kingdom, is about to be formed.

Mr. F. Murphy concluded on 30th June a week's meetings at Alloa. During the week 900 took the Blue Ribbon pledge, and 700 donned the Blue Ribbon.

The Mizpah Band—a society mainly composed of those rescued from the power of liquor during Mr. Moody's visit to Glasgow—numbering, with wives and families, about 500, had a most enjoyable excursion into the country on Glasgow Fair Saturday.

Quite a number of temperance reformers are, even yet, as inconsistent as the old farmer who prayed in Dutch and swore in English. These men pray to God on behalf of the temperance reformation, but they vote with the devil in support of the liquor traffic.—Our Union.

LICENSE AND PROHIBITION.—Taking an average for the six years ending 1880, we find that Ontario has five times the crime and more than five times the drunkenness of Maine; and in proportion to population nearly twice the crime and drunkenness. Maine has suppression, Ontario has license.

When a national religion totally forbids the use of intoxicating drugs, vigilance in the State is less needful; opinion, or even show of disgust and violence effectively stifles the evil. But if the national religion does not forbid the use but solely enjoins moderation (a word which every one interprets for himself) a far heavier task falls upon the State.—Prof. NEWMAN.

The Licensed Victuallers Guardian in reply to a correspondent says—"Minding our P's and Q's" undoubtedly originated in the tavern practice of checking or scoring debts by customers, the P's signifying pints and the Q's quarts. It was the practice of obtaining credit for intoxicating liquors which led to the passing of the 'Tippling Act' in the reign of George II. when gin was sold in pennyworths at the corner of streets in London."

A correspondent in the Echo gives the following as Wallace Ross's opinion of English scullers:—"Boyd was the best of English oarsmen, but in Canada there were plenty of men who would beat any of the present English scullers. Since the days of Renforth they had been steadily declining. In his opinion they drank too much beer."

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.—This nobleman has, since we last went to press, written an admirable letter to the Scotsman on the Grangemouth case, and at the opening of the Kilerregan and Cove Waterworks last month expressed his determination to on no account allow public-houses on these portions of his estate. This is an example which we would be glad to see followed by all landlords.

REV. SAMUEL HARDING.—A complimentary soiree was given to the above gentleman on Monday, 17th ult., on the occasion of his leaving Paisley for Glasgow. During the evening the guest was presented with a purse of sovereigns to mark the givers' grateful sense of Mr. Harding's manifold labours in the temperance cause. A presentation to Miss Harding was made at the same time. The rev. gentleman feelingly replied for himself and Miss Harding.

ANCIENT COUNSEL.—If thou workest at that which is before thee, following right reason seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee but keeping thy divine part pure as if thou shouldst be bound to give it back immediately. If thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy presumed activity according to nature, and with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy. And there is no man who is able to prevent this.—MARCUS AURELIUS.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT FROM A MEDICAL POINT OF VIEW.—Our readers who have possessed themselves of a copy of this pamphlet of which Dr. McCulloch of Dumfries is the author will be glad to hear that it is appearing in a shorthand dress (the reporting style) in the Phonetic Journal. Shorthand writers and readers will, we have no doubt, enjoy the reading of it very much in shorthand. As nearly fourteen thousand copies of the Phonetic Journal are circulated weekly this admirable lecture will meet with a still larger class of thoughtful, and we fully believe, appreciative readers.

What is alcohol? It is an irritant narcotic poison admitted by the highest authority on wine growth and manufacture to be a poison even in small doses. We find in whisky, one pint, no less than 10½ ozs., and in a pint of brandy the same, and in rum 15 ozs.—a large amount, you see, of the poison. Port and sherry contain 4 ozs., spirit champagne, 3 ozs.; claret, 2 ozs.; London stout, 1½ ozs.; pale ale, 2½ ozs.; cyder, 1 oz. to the pint. Half an ounce of alcohol having been known to kill a child four years old, it follows that there is as much in a pint of Trent as will prove fatal to a child of this age and half kill another, and as much in a pint of rum as would kill thirty.—Alcohol and its Uses in Medical Temperance Journal.

DUMFRIES—THE BLUE RIBBON UNION.—The "week of special effort"—in the form of open-air meetings—which this society has been conducting in Dumfries, has now been brought to a close, and has proved a most successful campaign. On Saturday night, 15th ult., an evidence of the enthusiasm that has been aroused in the movement was shown in the large procession of teetotalers that marched through the streets with banner flying to the music of a volunteer brass band. The meeting that night on the Dock was addressed again by Mr. Wylie, the ex-publican from Govan, and Mr. A. Bennet; and the singing was accompanied on the harmonium by Miss Emma Johnstone. On Sabbath evening there was again a large meeting on the Dock, and vigorous addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Strachan and Mr. Bennet. The last of the series took place on Monday, when Mr. Wylie again spoke for a short time. The number of new pledges taken up to Monday evening was 1927.—Dumfries and Galloway Standard.

"Couldn't help it, wife. I hunted for this street all night, but in vain. They had changed its name, so I could not find it."

The Lord Advocate has brought in a Bill wholly abolishing the sale of liquors on board passenger steamboats plying on Sunday on Scotch waters with pleasure excursionists. Mr. Callan has meantime blocked it.

LANGHOLM—TEMPERANCE MEETINGS.—Mr. A. Bennet, agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill Association, visited Langholm and held meetings on the evenings of Monday and Tuesday, 17th and 18th inst. On Monday evening a very large open-air meeting was held in the market place, the Rev. W. Watson presiding. The weather was very unfavourable, nevertheless the meeting was carried on, and Mr. Bennet gave an address which was listened to with great attention during a heavy fall of rain. On Tuesday a short open-air service was held at the same place, the weather proving unfavourable the company adjourned to the Infant School Room, where Mr. Watson (chairman) made a few remarks and Mr. Bennet gave an address on the "Blue Ribbon Army." Rev. J. Pantou also spoke. A number of pledges were taken and several put on the Blue Ribbon before the close of the meeting. After votes of thanks to the chairman and Mr. Bennett for his address and labours here, the meeting was closed with prayer.—Communicated.

THE WORK OF FIFTY YEARS.—A close computation of the number of adult abstainers total or all but total, from the use of ardent spirits, beer, and wine as beverages in this country at the present time, it would not be easy to arrive at. Great numbers would have to be reckoned in who have taken no abstinence pledge and are registered members of no association. One million of husbands and one million of wives would represent as many families, and a population of more than five millions who have completely discarded alcoholic drinks. The complete muster roll of the practical temperance people of the United Kingdom would, we trust, far exceed that number, which would leave nearly thirty millions still to be delivered from the dangerous custom of taking that kind of drink. That the degrading vice of excessive drinking is unknown in as many as two millions of families representing ten millions of the British population of all ages we should like to be able to conclude. The labours of temperance advocates for fifty years would have yielded a splendid harvest if as many as ten millions of the Queen's subjects in the mother country had been released from the moral slavery of a fatal indulgence. They would have secured a firm foothold and an inestimable advantage ground for operating systematically and vigorously upon the remaining twenty-five millions.—Preston Guardian.

TEMPERANCE HOME FOR WOMEN, PEEBLESHIRE.—We have pleasure in directing the attention of all whom it may concern to this valuable institution which is only five miles from the town of Peebles. It is only for those women who, being addicted to the habit of intemperance, are sincerely desirous of breaking it up and willing to undergo restraint until the habit is fairly broken. As there is no hope of reform where the liquor is accessible this retreat offers to all sincerely penitent the privacy and solitude so essential to their relinquishment of so odious a practice as drinking is to women. After six months of restraint they should be reformed, but in most cases more time is required. Women whose minds are affected, or who are immoral, or who frequent places of evil repute, or who have serious disease are inadmissible. A reference to a doctor or a minister is a pre-requisite to admission. This secures respectable society. There are stringent rules, but to the earnest longer for freedom they ought to be by no means irksome, and the work of the house should furnish suitable employment and engage the thoughts of the inmates fully and wisely too. The board is seven shillings per week, a sum which should bring the merits of the home under the attention of those of moderate incomes. Mrs. Wallace, Minden, Peebles, will afford all information necessary, and we hope that all who require such an institution will not be backward to enquire at her.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

Temperance Lecture. By Mr. Samuel Cavan, Kirkcudbright: M. E. Maxwell. We are glad that the friends in Kirkcudbright have published this interesting lecture by our good friend Mr. Cavan. It is eminently worthy of a wider publicity than the limited precincts of their Mackenzie Hall, in which it was originally delivered, can afford, and deserves to be largely read and earnestly pondered by others than those inside the Burgh of Kirkcudbright. In accurate and forcible language it deals with the financial, physical, and social aspects of the drink question, and, what is a special and commendable feature of it, it in some instances localizes the evils arising from the liquor traffic, so that they might have a direct and special bearing upon those to whom it was first addressed.

The Foothold of Abstinence in the New Testament Law. By the Rev. J. P. Lilley, M.A. Arbroath: John Broadie. This is an able and eloquent lecture. It deals principally with the current objections to the religious and scriptural aspects of the temperance question, and passes in review the old arguments with which mistaken or insincere opponents have from time to time, with marvellous persistency, attempted to oppose the steady march of our great enterprise. These the lecturer groups into three classes—(1) those directed against the lawfulness of abstinence; (2) those urged against its propriety; and (3) those set against its scriptural foundation and social necessity. Of course to the intelligent temperance reformer there may be nothing very new in either the objections themselves or the convincing replies which they receive; still he will be grateful to Mr. Lilley for the clear, concise, and logical statement of the question which his lecture in a high degree exhibits.

Parliamentary Providence of Compensation.—By Edward Pearson, (Manchester: United Kingdom Alliance). This interesting, and we shall add, masterly pamphlet, deals with the abstract principle of compensation, laying down clearly and distinctly the legitimate and just bases upon which it must rest its reasonable claims: and also by apt historical reference it seeks to show the application of that principle to prominent legislative enactments in the past. Compensation is the bug-bear of modern statesmanship. An unjust monopoly or a dangerous traffic cannot be proposed to be legislatively dealt with, without evoking from those interested, the clamorous cry for compensation: and if to this cry you express the least dubiety, you will be confidently referred to the twenty million vote to the Colonies in 1833, as affording the one full and adequate precedent for any claim which may have been advanced. Mr. Pearson devotes a considerable part of his pamphlet to the consideration of this vote, and insists on regarding it as given, not as a matter of principle, but solely on the questionable ground of expediency. In regard to the publican's claim for compensation, the writer admits that they have a right to make such a claim, but he holds with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and against Mr. Gladstone, that we "must wait on the claim to be raised," and meanwhile protests that legislation on the main question at issue shall not be delayed by what must be regarded as a very minor consideration by all lovers of their country. The tract throughout displays an acquaintance with the parliamentary providence of compensation which renders it an invaluable document to every true reformer. We sincerely wish it, what it deserves, a large circulation.

The Right and Duty of every State to enforce Sobriety upon its own Citizens. By Professor Newman, M.R.A.S. Nottingham: Stevenson, Bailey & Smith. Everything on the Prohibitory question from the pen of Professor Newman is entitled to the most thoughtful consideration. He has done great and valued service to the movement. Latterly he has become politic and is aiming, as in this tract, after a common ground on which the abstaining and the drinking politician may meet. But we are unable to agree with him on the provisions of a measure which stops short of the prohibition to which we have made vehement and formidable claim. Professor Newman accepts the drunkard as inevitable and desires a veto on him or her, whether procurable by husband, brother, wife, or daughter: he looks favourably upon the civil damage act: he anticipates from the stringency with which the Permissive Bill of Sir Wilfrid Lawson would be enforced an outcry from local medical men, chemists, etc., and believes that the highest form of legislation to meet these points is county boards, or their best substitutes local elective boards. To our mind a more effective objection to such boards than this tract of the learned professor could not be imagined. He demands in principle suppression, but as he is as yet unable to conceive of a suppression which would leave the moderate drinker high and dry on a voluntary mainland, he suits his sails to the passing gale. We, on the other hand, wish to veto the whole system—never contemplate anything other than that—and we believe that we will give a good account of a veto on drunkards, on the civil damage law and on the thirst of the moderate drinker, by simply suppressing all traffic and obviating all such evils as those for which he would have to make legal provision to the crack of doom.

Intemperance: its bearing upon Agriculture. By John Abbey. London: National Temperance Publication Depot. Price 6d.; 100, £1; 1,000 £5 10s. British agriculture is, and has been for some time, the subject of earnest solicitude by every lover of his country. From every quarter the cry has arisen that farmers cannot now make farming pay; that they are being beaten on their own ground by the enterprising Yankee, and that, as a consequence, they have had seriously to consider the advisability of quitting their native soil for "fresh fields and pastures new." A return to protection or a reform of the land laws have been the two rival remedies advocated as most likely to give the desired relief. Mr. Abbey, in the pamphlet before us, has, however, sounded the depths of true wisdom in ascribing to our alarming national intemperance a principal share in our agricultural depression. He shows by facts and figures "which winna ding and daurna be disputed," how this great inbred evil most seriously affects the landlord—in the increase of his rates and taxes and in a variety of other ways; how it affects the tenant in the loss of time, capital, and mental power; in the increased rates and taxes; trouble, accidents, neglect, inferior labour, and other losses; how it affects the market and prevents the farmer meeting with a ready sale for his produce; how it affects the farm labourer and his family, and gives him "a wet groat instead of a dry shilling" during harvest and other times. The author also gives an elaborate appendix, which contains many testimonies from landlords, farmers, labourers, and travellers of a most conclusive and convincing nature. Altogether we have had much pleasure in perusing the pages of this pamphlet which shows an amount of research and labour truly astounding. We heartily acquiesce in the conclusion at which he arrives, viz., "That landlords should endeavour to prohibit public-houses on their property; that tenants and labourers should abstain from the liquors sold in them; and that the Church and the clergy should take up the question in earnest and assist to carry it to a successful and happy issue."

"Why men drink is what staggers us," said a lady at a temperance meeting. "What men drink staggers them," said a listener.

Drink is the best stalking horse the devil has got. He gets within reach of many a soul by the help of a drink that he would not be able to bring to ruin in any other way.—Archbishop of York.

THE RULING PASSION.—Dr. D. has a bright little girl about four years of age who is very fond of dolls, and he buys a new one for her nearly every day. He bought a new one the other evening, but it did not impart the usual pleasure. "What!" he said, "don't you like the nice new doll?" "No; I've tired of stuff dolls. I want a real meat baby," she earnestly replied.

POETRY.

A "BLUE RIBBON" HAMLET.

To spree, or not to spree, that is the question :—
Whether 'tis nobler in a man to suffer
The pangs of agonising thirst in silence,
Resolved that he'll keep sober, or to get
Most gloriously drunk? You drink—get drunk—
No more; and by this simple means forget
The heartache, and in jovial mood can laugh
At unpaid bills and angry creditors. 'Tis a consummation Devoutly to be wished. You call for beer—you drink—
You drink—perchance get drunk; ay, there's the rub;
For in that drunken state what dreams may come,
When you have shuffled out the thronging pub.,
Must give us pause. There's the respect
That makes sobriety desirable;
For who would bear the racking thoughts of debt,
The shrill reproaches of a shrewish landlady,
The haunting shadows of one's creditors,
The seedy raiment, and the consciousness
Of hopeless impecuniosity
When he himself might all his troubles drown
In foaming bitter? Who would sober keep
To chafe and scowl in deep despondency,
But that the dread of waking from a "burst"—
That wretched moment and that splitting head
No reveller escapes—frightens us still,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know well of.

LOST LOVES.

The summer though beauteous
No joy can impart;
Cold and dead lies the love
That once glowed in my heart.
The sunshine brings memories
That crowd on my brain,
And fill my sad bosom
With anguish and pain.

At e'en when I wander
Alone through the dells,
I miss the dear fingers
That pluck'd the bluebells.
I long for the voices
That whispered to me,
As gaily we sang
By the beautiful sea.

When I bask in the warmth
Of the sun's glowing breath,
I weep for those sleeping
The chill sleep of death.
I think that Sol's brightness
Should e'en death's fetters part,
And bring back my lost ones
Again to my heart.

While the happy birds sing
And the fair flowers wave,
I think that my dear ones
Should rise from the grave.
I shed scarce a tear
When the winter winds blew,
And hid the green graves
Of my lov'd ones from view.

Yet, as vain was my weeping,
For the friends lying low
Sleep not the less soundly
Though clad by the snow.
But there's comfort to me
In the winter's cold breath,
When all things lie shrouded
In coldness and death.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

BY ANNIE S. SWAN.

Author of "Shadowed Lives," "Thankful Rest," "Fruits," &c.

CHAPTER II.—MANY SORROWS.

THE inhabitants of Strathglide called it a town; at which city folks who happened to visit it smiled in amusement. It had a High Street, with a few minor streets branching off it; a Parish Kirk, and a Presbyterian one; a prosperous school, and a Town Hall, presented to the place by Mr. Gillespie, the millowner. A great pile of works at the west end of Strathglide belonged to him, and papermaking was the industry of the place. His residence, Barossa, was a fine solid mansion on the eastern confines of the loch.

Strathglide possessed one medical man, of whom it had been justly proud, for his skill was spoken of far beyond the limits of the little place where his lot was cast. "Had been proud," I say, because of late there had been whisperings abroad that the young doctor's character was not altogether without blemish.

"He is only a little wild, as many young men are," his devoted admirers said excusingly. "Wild oats must be sown some time." But there were others who shook their heads, and said the reaping would be a bitter one.

Dr. Hislop occupied a roomy villa between the east end of the High Street and the toll on the manse road. His sister kept house for him, and all Strathglide spoke well of Miss Hislop. The two were orphans, and might have been all the world to each other, but there was not much in common between them. One afternoon in the last week of December Laura Tennant tied on her hat, and ran up to Strathview for half-an-hour's chat with Miss Hislop. They were warm friends; at one time Laura had hoped to call her by a nearer name, but that was past.

She was at home, and alone, the servant said, so Laura without ceremony opened the sitting-room door and went in. Lizzie was sewing by the fire in the fading light, and rose to greet her friend. She was a slight insignificant-looking little creature, with a grave sweet face, a firm, determined mouth, and large, earnest grey eyes. A continual shadow lay in their depths. You do see such eyes sometimes. I often wonder what tragedies have been enacted behind the scenes to make them look so. She was not a timid, shrinking thing this girl, she looked like a woman who had learned to think and act for herself. In later years also she had learned to bear and make no sign.

The girls shook hands warmly. They were not the kind of women who could kiss and make a great fuss over each other. They loved each other well, but not with the flimsy surface love which finds its chief delight in caresses and endearing words.

Laura removed her hat, declining her friend's offer to go upstairs, then she knelt down on the hearthrug and stretched out her hands to the blaze.

"Are you quite well, Lizzie?" she asked, thinking her friend paler than her wont.

"Yes, I have been sitting here, Laura, trying to solve the problem of a woman's life," said Lizzie, in an odd, abrupt way. "We go on taking care of people all our lives, with, God knows, little enough joy to help us through. What recompense have we?"

"At the end Mary's part," said Laura softly, then there was a little silence.

"Lizzie, our talk is different from that of other girls, there seems to be some new trouble every day."

Lizzie dropped her work, and looked up suddenly.

"What is new to-day?" she asked.

"Arthur is coming home."

Very low bent Lizzie's head upon her breast, and again there was a silence.

"I came to tell you, Lizzie, because I believed you ought to be prepared. Here are the letters."

Lizzie held out her hand, took the letters, and opened them. The first was addressed to Mr. Tennant, and ran as follows:—

ST. VINCENT ST., GLASGOW, Dec. 15th, 18—.

Dear Sir,—We regret to inform you that we have been obliged to dismiss Mr. Arthur Tennant from our service, as his conduct for some time past has been the reverse of satisfactory.

For your sake we might have borne with him a little longer, but his influence among the rest of the clerks is deteriorating to our interests.

With best regards and sympathy, we remain, yours faithfully, DRUMMOND & GRAHAM.

"It is carefully worded, Lizzie," said Laura, as she replaced it in its covering. "But it is easy to guess how much lies hid beneath these guarded phrases. These gentlemen wish to spare papa as much as possible."

Lizzie, without speaking, opened the other letter and read:—

GLASGOW, Dec. 20th, 18—.

Dear Laura,—I shall likely be home the day before Christmas, as I have got the sack from the upright governors. They will probably notify you of the same. Smooth things up for me down there, and don't let a fellow's first visit for six months be spoiled by sour looks and sourer words. I hope you are as pretty as ever.—Yours,
A. TENNANT.

"I am glad you told me, Laura," said Lizzie, in a strange, dry voice, wrung from a sorely troubled heart.

"Papa is at a meeting at Claybridge, Lizzie, and this awaits his home-coming. We were beginning to feel a little easier about Arthur. There have been no complaints of late."

"Having had so much experience of the curse," said Lizzie, in the same slow, dry way, "I did not think you could have lulled your heart with such frail hopes."

"Arthur was very penitent when he left home, and seemed bent on atoning for the past, and trying to win you yet. He did love you, Lizzie."

"Yes, but not so well as drink. I know exactly how the case stands," said Lizzie; then she added passionately, "This drink demon has no mercy on us, Laura. It will have our all, even the last drop of our heart's blood. It has stolen my brother from me, and my husband that might have been. My poor Laura, it has given you many a heart agony. You look shocked—well, perhaps I am vehement; who would not be? I have a heart, and it will cry out sometimes, though they call me a most self-possessed young woman." She rose to her feet, her cheeks burning, her eyes gleaming with intense emotion, and began a restless walking up and down the floor. "God gives frail women heavy burdens to bear, Laura," she said by-and-bye, "physically and mentally we are unfit to bear and live; so we die before our time, and are laid in unremembered graves. I do not know what may come after. I have strange doubtings sometimes which you in your sweet faith could not understand. I cannot say with you it is all good."

"In your inmost heart I believe your faith is more perfect than mine," answered Laura, struggling with the tears she could not keep back. "Your life proclaims it. Many wonder at your saintly patience, your—"

"Hush, hush!" said Lizzie, "you know me better than that. You have seen me rebel now, for instance. Like other women, I have cravings for the love which is perfected in a happy home; but, like some women, I do not proclaim my sorrows on the house-top. What will you do with Arthur?" she broke off suddenly.

Laura shook her head. "I have scarcely faced it yet. Oh, Lizzie, Lizzie, when I look back on what he was, when I remember the promise of his early manhood, his college career, his talents, his bright winning way, and manly heart, and think of him now, my heart is like to break."

She put her hands before her face, and rocked herself to and fro, sobbing; but Lizzie continued her restless walking to and fro.

"There's Tom, Laura. Get up and dry your eyes, or we shall have him sifting us like wheat," said Miss Hislop suddenly; and Laura rose at once and began to tie on her bonnet. In her present mood she had no desire for a conversation with Dr. Hislop. On her way out she met him in the lobby. He shook hands with her, nodded to his sister in his careless way, and passed into the dining room. Evidently he was not in a mood for talking either.

Lizzie accompanied her friend to the gate, and they parted there, Laura to go home and prepare herself for the task of breaking the news to her father; and Lizzie to steel herself anew for a meeting with Arthur Tennant. She loved him, as you know, but that was the beginning and the end. There must never be a closer relationship than mere acquaintanceship between them, for Lizzie Hislop was no believer in the doctrine that a woman can reform her husband if his habits before marriage have been objectionable. That is a quicksand upon which many a woman's heart has been wrecked.

It was half-past ten before Mr. Tennant reached home that night. Claybridge was the market town, five miles distant, and there had been no conveyance provided for him. Laura sat up for him alone, keeping the study fire burning brightly, and watching for him out of the window. When she heard the garden-gate creak on its hinges, she ran to the door to meet him, and helped him off with his overcoat.

"Are you very tired, papa?"

"Yes, my love; I spoke for an hour and a half at Claybridge, and it is a long walk home."

"Your coffee is hot, papa, and there is a nice fire in the study."

The minister smiled, and followed his daughter into the study.

"Was it a good meeting, papa?"

"Very good, my dear. Has your mother gone to bed?"

"Yes, papa."

Her voice was very low, and, looking at her more closely, the minister saw traces of recent tears upon her cheek.

"You have been crying, Laura."

"Oh, papa," cried the girl in a great burst of sorrow, "Arthur is coming home. Two letters came to-day. I read them. There they are."

Her father took them in his trembling hands, and scanned them hastily. Then his head drooped on his breast, and a stifled cry went up from the depths of his stricken heart.

Laura rose then, and laid her arms about his neck, trying to comfort him.

"God will help us, dear papa, there is no sorrow so great but He can heal it," she sobbed. "Let us ask Him. He is our only help."

God heard the prayer which followed, and father and daughter parted for the night, heavy of heart indeed, but not despairing, for

"Earth hath no sorrow Which Heaven cannot heal."

CHAPTER III.—LOWERING DOWN.

On the afternoon of New Year's Day, a young man came up the road from the Manse, towards Strathview. Tall and well-proportioned, with a grand head and finely featured face, lighted by keen black eyes, he was undeniably a handsome man. He was the only child of the house of Tennants closely resembling the mother. He was her living image. He walked leisurely with his hands in his pockets, and paused at the Half-way House, as the new tavern was called, to chat a moment with the landlord at the door. That worthy pressed him to come in and have "something," but being bent upon an errand, Arthur Tennant declined the offer.

After a few common-place remarks, he sauntered on again, quickening his pace when he came within range of the windows of Strathview. There was no one looking out, or possibly he might not have gained such prompt admittance when he knocked. The girl, a stranger to the place, ushered in the gentleman to her mistress's presence without announcement.

Sitting at her piano, with her back to the door, Miss Hislop was unaware of his entrance till she heard it shut behind him. Then she rose, pale to the lips, and, facing him, spoke in tones as cold as ice.

"Laura told me you were coming home," she said, "but I am unable to understand why you have sought me so soon." She hardly dare meet those eyes which in days gone had looked upon her with such tenderness that she had thought herself the most blessed of women.

"Lizzie, Lizzie, have you not a word for me?" he said, and took a step towards her.

"No, no," she cried, putting up her hand as if to keep him from her. "Oh, Arthur, if you have any pity, leave me now, and never let me look upon your face again!"

"I expected a warmer welcome than this, Lizzie," he said, coming nearer still. "You cannot have forgotten what has been between us." Listening to these loved tones, for one moment the girl's heart failed her—only for a moment.

"No, I have not forgotten," she said passionately. "But surely you, Arthur, have forgotten what I said to you the last time we stood in this room together. You have broken, times without number, the promises you made to me, almost on your knees. You said that if I would give you another chance you would conquer the curse which shadows your home, and is ruining you. I do not believe you have even tried to do it. And now, dismissed from your office in disgrace, and knowing how faithless you have been, you come to me here, asking me to welcome you. I am a woman, Arthur Tennant, and I love you, but I am not so weak as you deem me."

The unutterable scorn in the clear voice brought a flush to her listener's face. He moved to the window and stood there. For five minutes there was silence between them.

"Lizzie, will you listen to me for a moment?"

"I am listening," she said coldly, without lifting her head.

"Your words have stung me more than you have the least idea of. I have tried to give it up, Lizzie, but the demon is too strong for me to fight alone. If I swear to you never to touch another drop, will you go with me to Australia as my wife, and help me to keep my resolution?"

She raised her eyes to his face. There was sincerity written there, and his eyes were full of passionate pleading. For one brief moment the impulse was strong upon her to go to him, saying she was willing to go, if need be, to the ends of the earth with him. But the memory of the past, with its long list of broken promises and bitter disappointments, came before her and forced her answer.

"Too late for that now, Arthur," she said sadly but firmly. "I know something of the misery of life with those who sin as you have done. What help could I give you with my influence with you is apparently so slight." He winced at the implied reproach. "But Arthur, for your own sake, for the sake of those to whom you are very dear, try again. God can and will help you, and my prayers are always with you. Good-bye."

"It costs you little to give me up," he said bitterly. "Women are all alike, fickle as the wind."

Without waiting to answer him, she glided from the room, and there was nothing for Arthur Tennant but to leave the house, which he did and took the road home. But at the Half-way House, he paused a moment, and after a second's consideration turned in and asked a glass of brandy.

"Laura, where is Arthur? Papa was asking a minute ago," asked Charlie Tennant coming to his sister in the drawing-room.

"At Dr. Hislop's, I think; he will likely be home soon," she replied cheerfully, but she glanced nervously at the clock, which pointed to eight, and he had been absent since dinner.

Charlie conveyed the information to his father, and returned to Laura. He was nearly four years younger than she, but they were seldom apart. Of all her brothers and sisters, Laura loved this one the best. They drew their chairs close to the fire, and watched in silence the flickering fire.

"Is mamma better to-night, Laura?"

"A little," Laura answered.

Just then they were startled by a violent ringing of a bell upstairs. "Mamma's bell," cried Laura, and springing to her feet, she hurried up to her mother's room. Mrs. Tennant had been confined to bed for three days, consequent upon a drinking fit. Where she had got it remained a mystery to them. Possibly Mr. Sutherland could have solved it. Laura turned the handle of the door, and went in. The lamp was turned to its full light, and her mother was out of bed, sitting in her night dress. Her eyes were gleaming with an unnatural brilliancy, and her hands were clenched together on her knees.

"Mamma, what is it? Why are you up?" cried the girl, half afraid.

"I must have something to drink, Laura," said she in a low hurried voice. "Only a mouthful, but I must have it,—must, I tell you, there is something tearing my very heart out? Oh, I have had such horrid dreams, and that would clear my head and send me to sleep. Is there none in the house? Send Jean to Sutherland's."

"It is too late now," said Laura soothingly. "Come, mamma, let me help you into bed, and I will sit beside you till you fall asleep."

"I can't, I tell you," she said, half fiercely. "I must have it to still the gnawing at my heart. It is eating my life out; it is killing me; only a mouthful to satisfy the craving; I must get it."

"Stay here, then," said Laura, and, turning from the room, she hurried down to the study. Mr. Tennant was there writing.

"I wish you would come upstairs, papa," she said. "I don't know what to do with mamma; I think she is worse."

He rose at once and went up, while Laura went back to the drawing-room, but it was empty; Charlie had gone to bed. She flung herself on the sofa, burying her face among the cushions, and lay thus for nearly an hour. All was quiet upstairs till she heard her father's footstep on the landing. She rose and went out.

"She has gone to sleep now," he said, drawing his hand across his haggard brow. "Oh, Laura, Laura, where is this to end?"

She did not answer him, not knowing what to say.

"Is Arthur home?" was his next question.

"No, papa."

"Then I must go and seek him," he said, taking down his coat and hat. "It will soon be eleven o'clock." She helped him on with them, and before he went out he stooped and kissed her.

"Go to bed, my darling, and try and sleep; your waking hours are not so happy that you should seek to prolong them."

"As long as I have you, papa," she sobbed, clinging to him for a moment; "As long as I have you, I can bear anything." Then she went back to the deserted drawing-room to watch and wait. Sleep was out of the question.

Nearly an hour afterwards she heard heavy footsteps on the gravel outside, and in another moment the front door was opened, and she heard them come in. They passed the drawing-room door, and she knew her father was guiding Arthur's unsteady steps up to his own room. Not daring to meet him again, she blew out the lamp, and hurrying to her room she shut the door.

The moonlight lay white across the floor and on the bed, where Daisy lay asleep. She went to the bedside and looked at the lovely childish face, with its flushed cheeks and rosy lips, parted in a happy smile. The golden hair clustered on the pillow, and one dimpled hand lay outside the coverlet. Laura knelt down and laid her tired head for a moment beside the golden one, with a sick dead feeling of misery at her heart which could not find relief in tears. The shadows were gathering and deepening round her home, and, looking into the future, she could see not one gleam of light; and in her heart was the same cry which rose from the room below, "Lord, help, or we perish!"

CAUSES AND CURE OF INTEMPERANCE.

(Concluded from our last.)

This is emphatically true of a third cause of drinking, the social temptations presented by the gin-palace, the beer shop and the tavern. The author does not select any section of the traffic for special reprobation, and assuredly we do not believe that the 40,000 beer-shops inflict more injury than the 60,000 public-houses. It is quite desirable, indeed, that the laws on this subject should be assimilated and codified into one system, and referred to one executive authority; but it is contrary to history and experience to suppose that an authority which has never yet controlled the old public houses effectually, will be able to repress the abuses of a system which will be extended by the assignment of so many beer-shops to their jurisdiction. It is also a delusion to suppose that more crime springs from the beer-shop—the public-house of the poor man—than from the tavern. Taking an average of many towns, it will be found that 10 per cent. of robberies from the person take place in the magisterially-licensed house, against less than 3 per cent. in the excise licensed beer-shop. At the origin of beer-shops, absurd and exaggerated expectations were formed of their benefits (in utter ignorance of the physical law which determines that drunkenness increases in exact ratio with the consumption of strong drink); we ought not now to fall into the opposite blunder of painting these shops in darker colours than the truth warrants, and thus indirectly turn away the attention of the public mind from the cognate and more chronic evils of public-houses. It will be a great gain to destroy the beer-shops, but the suppression of the dram-shops and taverns would be a greater. The whole system must socially and logically stand or fall together. The traffic is sustained morally, and protected legally, by the authority of the law. As a political institution, raised into power and privilege by Parliament, it can only be suppressed, directly or indirectly, by the same power, whether by positive decree or delegated permission matters not. This is a question which it behoves every citizen to consider, and to decide according to the evidence. What, then, are the results of this system? Drunkenness and disorder, beggary, madness, suicide, and murder. Crime is so completely traceable to the perversion of drinking and the temptations and accessories of the public-house and beer-shop that the presiding judge at the Worcester summer assizes for 1859, declared, from a survey of the calendar, that had there been no drinking-houses, there would apparently have been no crime in that county. Since drunkenness, disease, depravity, and crime—evils, the reduction of which to a minimum is amongst the first and last objects of the social union—are the continual fruitage of the three classes of drinking houses, it would seem but a principle of common justice, that the authority of deciding for or against their existence in any neighbourhood, should be remitted to the judgment of the inhabitants for the supply of whose wants, as it is alleged, these houses are allowed to carry on their business. Who more likely to judge aright than those who constantly live around such houses, and who are to be affected, in person, property and purse, by the "curse," or the "convenience" of this peculiar trade? Statistics bring out the old truth that drinking is the existing cause of at least three-fourths of serious crime; they also furnish a conjoint measure of the drunkenness and crime, by revealing "the cause of the cause." In fine, the measure of the public traffic is the general measure of the drunkenness and the disorder. Public-houses are the great factor in the causation of crime, at once neutralizing good agencies, and adding virulence to evil ones. As the traffic expands or collapses, other things remaining the same, so do drunkenness and violence. The public-house is the tangible cause, the fons et origo of our social mischief. Appealing to a preformed desire for intoxicants, it spreads the temptation and the snare; it suggests by signs and associations the forbidden and dangerous pleasure; it supplies the facilities; it hides the beginning, and profits by the excess of the evil, and, to crown and complete the whole, it carries on the process of the seduction and ruin under the sanction and blazonry of law. Can we wonder when such colleges of crime and nurseries of sensualism are thickly planted in the midst of the homes and workshops of the labouring classes, that mechanics' institutes languish in debt and difficulty; or that temperance societies themselves are but a series of spasmodic efforts, composed of alternate successes and relapses. It is the rankness of public-houses in the centres of industry, not the denseness of population—for that is a mere abstraction—which accounts for the prevalence of crime. So it is the number of temptations in any district, and not the fact of education or ignorance, that measures the drunkenness and violence. Compté d'Augeville has shown that six of the best educated provinces of France are among the most criminal, while seven of the worst educated are the least criminal.*

The solution is easy, for in the six we find the most, and in the seven the fewest, drinking facilities. Ireland supplies a similar illustration. Ignorant, dirty, and neglected Connaught is far less criminal than educated Leinster and Munster. Why? Because there are forty-two drinking-houses fewer to every 100,000 of the population than in any other province, and the percentage of drunkenness is less than one-half the average. As observed by Mr. Moncrieff Wilson, "the sale of intoxicating liquor has, perhaps, as powerful an effect upon crime in increasing it, as education and occupation combined have in lessening it." In Sweden and many parts of Scotland, again, we find an excess of religious and secular instruction co-existing with great drunkenness, much crime, and an amount of illegitimacy which equals the worst cities of Europe. In other words, drinking facilities counteract the tendencies of instruction, both secular and religious. In Baden, Württemberg, and other states of educated Germany, as attested by the inquiries of Mr. Recorder Hill, criminals are brought to prison, not by negative ignorance, but because they have become, there as here, the victims of beer and wine drinking. M. Quetelet, referring to the fact that "of 2,297 murders committed in France during four years, 446 were in consequence of quarrels and contentions in taverns," observes that "Man is not driven to crime because he is poor, but more generally because of an inadequacy to supply the artificial wants he has created." The statistics of English counties enforce the same conclusions. The unvarying correspondent of the crime is the public-house. If public-houses are beneath or above the average, so is crime. Crime, in short, dogs the steps of the traffic. Take six counties having fewest, and six having most drinking-shops, the following result appears:—With the public-house to 235 persons we have the criminal to 762. With the public-house to 109 persons we have the criminal to 591. Cornwall and Monmouth have nearly the same average of worship, yet Cornwall is the least, and Monmouth the most, criminal of our counties.† In the first we have 1 drink-shop to 304 persons, in the second, 1 to every 118. Save one, all remedies for intemperance in modern times, either from inadequacy or defect, have failed satisfactorily to abate the evil. Improved sanitary conditions and social privileges have not prevented its ravages. Full employment and high wages have been perverted to prodigate uses. Liberty has run into intemperate license, and shamed our political suffrages. Recreations, at home and abroad, unless dissociated from drink, have degenerated into riot. National education and normal schools, pale cider and light wines, have co-existed with a continued increase of drunkenness both in America and in Germany. The approach to free trade in cheap beer, and the beer bill at home, have failed worst of all; and the proposal to extend this principle a little further can be regarded simply as the despair of philanthropy. Even temperance societies, while accomplishing a necessary work, and achieving an unquestioned good, are quite inadequate to cope with that "throne of iniquity," which, under the license of law, is perpetually laying waste the fields of social beauty which moral suasion had reclaimed. The suppression of public-houses, however, has always succeeded to the extent to which it has been tried. The removal of the cause cannot fail to abate the effect. Actual facts confirm and illustrate the axiom. There are districts on the continent (Kornthall is one) where, the traffic suppressed, the entire social and moral condition of the people has undergone surprising change for the better. There are villages and parishes in England and Wales (as Scorton, † Dinorwick, and some Devon parishes) in which,

* Difference of employment and of race will not affect the argument, since formerly Cornwall was much more criminal; while the people of Monmouth and South Wales when the proprietors remove the drink-shops out of the way, as they have recently done in several localities, become as sober and law-observing as any other.

† In the village of Scorton, near Lancaster, there are but about two families who do not regularly attend the Wesleyan Chapel. The late George Fishwick, Esq. (a man of great wealth and influence, a perfect gentleman and Christian), had a great abhorrence of liquor-shops, and conducted his own house on strictly temperance principles. He encouraged the working people to abstain from spending their "money for that which is not bread"; allowing many of them to keep each a milk cow on his farm, on easy terms, so that each family had a good supply of milk and butter. As the village was not wholly in his hands two attempts were made to establish a public-house; but the people would neither go nor send to it; so it was soon closed and the village is free from the nuisance to this day. Now, what is the state of this village. Pauperism is almost unknown. There has been only one case before the magistrates for twenty years, and then the whole village felt itself disgraced, though the breaker of the law was a stranger among them. If a policeman happens to pass through the village the children run out to look at him as a curiosity. There is a Wesleyan day-school, of which the people make good use, and a large and well-conducted Sunday-school. The chapel is filled with devout and attentive hearers, their easy circumstances being over a series of years, the removal of the public-house has been followed by the almost utter absence of drunkenness and pauperism, and the extinction of crime. In Scotland, there are about 150 parishes without a public-house, and in many of these no serious crime has been committed for years, poor-rates have become unnecessary, and drunkenness is "a strange thing." If prohibition at the mere will of proprietors or magistrates works so beneficially, we need hardly anticipate the failure of the same principle when sanctioned by the popular vote. After the first novelty has passed, the law will resolve itself gradually into the fixed habits of the people, and the amazing benefits of its operation must surely guarantee its permanence. If we have, then, any clear and true perception of the nature and causes of intemperance; if we apprehend the fact aright, that it is not only a vice and crime in itself, but one which is concatenated with evils which are rife and most ruinous in our midst, and which stand in the path of a juster civilization; if we regard it as an effect of our own social habits, having its causes in false opinions and mistaken laws; if we believe that we can make powerful at home, a remedy which is potent in Massachusetts and Maine, where it has become the settled policy of the people, winning year by year increasing majorities by the unerring logic of its marvellous consequences; if we sincerely desire to behold the unimpeded triumph of our educational agencies of various kinds,—is it too much to hope that our country will, at no distant day, rise to the dignity of a patriotic surrender of those habits and institutions which weigh down her divinest energies, that tarnish the character of her people, that introduce elements of disturbance into every sphere of social life, and which frustrate the chief ends and highest aims of Government itself?

THE RETREAT OF THE 70,000.

SPEECH OF GOVERNOR J. P. ST. JOHN, DELIVERED AT SEYMOUR, JULY, 1882.

MR. PRESIDENT AND CITIZENS,—In the beginning God said, "Let there be light, and there was light." (A voice, "Amen.") And God intended the light that burst forth upon the world in the beginning should be for the benefit of man. He intended that we should use it in giving to the world a grander, a better, a purer civilization, as one age followed another; and any subject under discussion to-day that will not bear the fullest rays of God's light, is unworthy the support of any true American citizen. (Applause.) I believe, further, that while a man may be in favour of temperance and not be a Christian, I am equally firm in the belief that no citizen can be a Christian and be opposed to temperance. (Applause.) I would like to speak to the Republicans of Indiana, and say, Be brave, step to the front, call upon God to vindicate your acts, raise the battle-axe for prohibition against the whisky traffic, and say to the cohorts to come on—we are ready to meet you face to face (applause); and in a great warfare like this, who shall there be in this broad land that can stand against us? The legislature of Kansas submitted to the people to be passed upon by them at the ballot-box in November, in 1880, the proposition to amend the Constitution of the State, by which it was proposed to for ever prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in that State, except for medicinal, scientific, and mechanical purposes. When the people reached this proposition at the ballot-box in November, 1880, by their votes, they crowned it with 8,000 majority. (Applause.) Brought to bear against us in the fight was the combined money power of the whisky ring of this nation. After we had adopted prohibition—after our legislature had passed the law, what has been the result? Are the politicians all against us to-day? No! When we demonstrated the power of the people—that the great majority were in favour of prohibition—the politicians tumbled off plainly manifest in their clothing and general appearance. What Seorton is without a public-house, thousands of villages will soon become when we get the Permissive Bill.

the log on the right side, as the little turtles tumble off the logs along the sloughs here in Indiana at the approach of danger. (Applause and laughter.) Now, the whisky ring of this country—and I charge it home to it, and have no fear of contradiction—it never tells the truth, because there is no truth on its side—(applause);—and I propose here to-day, in the discussion of this question, as to the relation of the success of prohibition in Kansas, out of its own mouth to convict it of falsehood. (Applause.) I hold here in my hands a pamphlet entitled "Prohibition in Missouri, is it Practicable or Desirable?" This pamphlet was issued by the brewers of St. Louis, and signed by Jacob Lemp, and I don't know how many more "distinguished statesmen" of that State. They flooded Iowa with this pamphlet before the vote there on the 27th of last month. They are sending them broadcast over Kansas, and I desire no better prohibition document than this pamphlet, issued by the brewers of Missouri. I said they never told the truth. I will read to you from page 11. In speaking of the bad effects of prohibition in Kansas, it says:—

"That hundreds of thousands of dollars annually derived from the licenses went into the fund for the support of the common schools."

That is true in part. But I am prouder of Kansas to-day than ever before in my life, to stand here and to be able to say to you that Kansas no longer suffers the disgrace of educating the children of the State at the expense of licensed dram-shops. (Applause.) Now, then, mark you the additional language here.

"But this is not all. These sums, now, instead of going to the school fund, go into the pocket of the saloon-keeper, who continues to sell just as much, and just as bad intoxicating liquors as ever before. The law has turned a tide of emigration from the State. It is estimated that no less than 70,000 people have left the State since the passage of that obnoxious law, to make their homes in other States and territories where right and liberty are better assured to them than in this misgoverned commonwealth, and multitudes more will follow just as soon as they are able to dispose of their property."

What inconsistency! Selling more whisky now than ever before, and yet 70,000 people leaving the State because they cannot get a drop! (Applause.) That is the kind of logic—that is the kind of argument, that the brewers, and distillers, and saloon-keepers, and whisky ring in this country try to force upon an intelligent people in the States of Indiana, Missouri, Iowa, and Kansas. Now, what will become of these 70,000 people? Did you ever think of that? Why, says one, go right over into south-west Missouri. Why, God bless you, Missouri, out of 114 counties in the State, prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors in 33 of them—(applause),—and Missouri, to-day, is moving on to prohibition as surely as the sun is to go down in the west this afternoon. (Applause.) So it is only a question of time, until they will have to pack their knapsacks and get out of Missouri. Why, says another, they can pass down into Arkansas. They cannot go to Arkansas, and why? Because they have a law there by which the people can prohibit a dram-shop at any point within three miles of a school-house or a church. Now, since that law has passed, the State of Arkansas has become literally dotted with churches and school-houses. How is that? says one. Why, whenever in any community a saloon is opened, the better element get together and build a school-house alongside the saloon—(laughter and applause),—and therefore, under the law, the saloon is compelled to go. So they will not go to Arkansas. (Cheers.) Yes, but, says one, go to Illinois. Well, while Illinois is the banner whisky State of this nation, yet out of 848 towns in Illinois, some three years ago, I remember there were 632 of them that refused licenses to dram-shops in that State. (Applause.) Why, they say, let them go to Iowa. Recently, by the voice of the people, with 30,000 majority, it condemned the traffic, and they cannot go to Iowa. Why, says one, if they can't go to Iowa, they can cross over into Nebraska, and I guess they will stay there. No, they won't; because those people have pending an Amendment to the State Constitution, by which the people at the election next November, propose to put the ballot in the hands of the women in Nebraska—(applause),—and whenever you put the wives, mothers, and sisters behind the power of the ballot, the whisky traffic cannot live a single year. (Applause.) Let me tell you, if the wives and mothers of Indiana could vote to-day, the resolution of the party at Indianapolis yesterday never would have been adopted. (Applause.) Well, says a fellow, I know where they can go? They can go right across into the Cherokee nation, among the Indians. Now, he is surely mistaken about that, because I have a letter here from the Indian Chief, D. W. Bushyhead, of the Cherokee nation, that tells me, the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicants, under the laws of the nation, is absolutely prohibited. (Applause.) I have also with me a copy of the law that makes it a finable offence—50 dollars fine and six months imprisonment in the national prison for violating the law. It makes it the duty of the sheriffs and constables to seize and destroy every drop of intoxicating liquor found within the Indian territory. It don't stop there. If a man is once convicted, and persists in violating the law, the second time, the same law confers powers upon the fathers and mothers, and upon the people, to band themselves together and utterly destroy the evil place of business, and make such disposition of the evil-doer as, in the judgment of the people, will be calculated to rid them of his presence. (Applause.) So you see they cannot go down among the Indians. What can we do with them? You older men remember that we used to pass around the hat many years ago at religious meetings, and take up collections to aid in sending missionaries down among the Indians to teach them a higher civilization, and to point them to Christ; and we taught them better than we knew; and it seems to me it would be proper, and it would be just and right now, for these Cherokee Indians—remembering our kindness to them in the past—to send a few Cherokee Indian missionaries among the 70,000 that left Kansas on account of prohibition. I know of no other means of salvation for them. (Applause.)

Now, is there any truth in the assertion of these brewers, that 70,000 people have left the State of Kansas on account of prohibition? No! scarcely a word of it; and I will tell you why. I have some means of knowing. I undertake to say here to-day that, outside of a few distillers, and brewers, and saloon-keepers, we have lost no population on account of prohibition. I undertake to say to-day that the people of that State, without regard to condition, race, colour, religion, or politics, will verify my statement. I have talked during the past ninety days to no less, perhaps, than thirty or forty thousand Kansans, and I have put this question to them, If you know of a single individual engaged in a legitimate business who has left Kansas on account of prohibition, hold up your hands. I have yet to see the first hand to go up, among the vast crowds I have talked to in that State. (Applause.) On the other hand, I have propounded this question: If your citizens know of any one who has come to Kansas on account of prohibition, hold up your hands. And from a dozen to as high as 200 or 300 hands go up in every audience I have addressed in Kansas. Have you anything to fortify this further? Let us see. We compare the census of 1881 with 1882, and with what result? We find that we have gained a little over 26,000 during the past year. Now, suppose we act upon the statement of the whisky ring, that 70,000 have left the State on account of prohibition, then, in order to have made an aggregate gain of 26,000 during the past year, you would have to have emigration enough first to make up this 70,000 that left the State, and then 26,000 to make the aggregate increase which, according to the figures of the whisky ring, would give us an immigration of 96,000 in a single year. (Applause.) Now, I don't claim that I said the whisky ring never told the truth. They love and they make a lie. We are not only gaining in population, but it is an intelligent, bright, and honourable population, unsurpassed by that received by another State in this nation—men that help to build churches, school-houses, business blocks, and railroads, and help to make a State worthy of the admiration of mankind. (Cheers.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE USE OF DRUNKENNESS.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I opened my eyes widely on seeing an article in Knowledge with the above title. I am yet unable to satisfy myself with any good reason why it should have appeared in that scientific magazine, or what the editor should have seen in it to induce him to transfer it from The Gentleman's Magazine to his own columns. There are things "no fellah can understand," and this is without doubt one of them. The author, Mr. Williams, begins by admitting that he has been already worsted in a previous conflict with temperance reformers. Opponents like himself often used to think that they settled the non-alcoholists by their assertion that "these things were sent for our use," and that therefore it was flying in the face of providence to refuse a social glass. He, however, acknowledges that his arguments were overturned by the abstainers who have been "unquestionably victorious all along the line, especially since Dr. Richardson has become their commander-in-chief." Much can be forgiven the man that makes an admission of this kind, for it will meet the eye of very many to whom temperance periodicals are as little known as the "ever-circulators" of the Japanese.

He seems one of the class that never knows when it is beaten, and reminds one of Satan trying to get within the guard of the angelic hosts. Notwithstanding his beating he has forged a new weapon from material supplied by the late Dr. Darwin. His newly begotten thesis is that the drunkenness which prevails at the present day is promoting civilization and the general forward progress of the human race. This, according to the views promulgated by the Social Reformer, must be doing evil that good may follow with a vengeance. It exalts the whole fraternity of publicans, brewers, and distillers into the ranks of agents of civilization, and their machinery unto the high level of co-operative factors in the onward and upward progress of the race. The publican, the teacher, the pastor, these are the forces of advancement. The publican kills off the irreclaimable, unsalvageable, unfittest portion; the teacher trains the mental, and the pastor the moral part of the fittest who survive. After all there may be something in the cry, "Beer and the Bible"—beer being the negative and the Bible the positive force appointed for the elevation of humanity.

Going upon the Malthusian theory, revived in our day in the interests of lust, Mr. Williams states that that theory attempted to prove that increasing numbers and decreasing food led to poverty and degradation, but that Dr. Darwin, with the same belief, inferred that the over-population led to a struggle in which the weakest necessarily went to the wall; that this arrangement resulted in the superior class which struggling as before resulted in the emergence of the fittest. It is when Mr. Williams seeks to apply his theory that he entirely fails either to show the evolution he praises or the use of drunkenness he desires. He paints the earlier civilizations as brought about by brute force, that being needful for the physical struggles necessary through the surroundings of the earlier races. But how limited his survey when it excludes from consideration those great monarchies on the shores of the Mediterranean, Assyria, Egypt, Greece, and Rome. None can, we think, maintain that brutal or physical energies were the be-all and end-all of these. The very Pyramids themselves in their construction, the laws of Moses, the grand tour of the Grecian philosophers, embracing the Eastern nationalities, all disprove the assumption of Mr. Williams that the brutal and physical were the dominant characteristics of the early civilizations. The later and Western civilizations have much to learn before they can claim any superiority over those great gray fathers of the past. But if we understand Mr. Williams he leaves the evolution of the brutal and physical and comes to that sort of development which distinguishes the present age. True, he leaves a gap which he does not stop to fill. The brutal and physical ideal is abandoned, and science and mental ability become the dominant powers in use. At what time this change came about Mr. Williams fails to inform us, but we must take what he likes to give, and it is quite sufficient to enable us to infer that the change is not evolution whatever it be. Mr. Williams may not admit that the modern progress of the race owes its supremacy to the diffusion of Christianity, but we can find in its power a truer solution than any which Mr. Williams has laid before us.

Of course Mr. Williams finds in the higher civilization under which we move that the old positive checks of Malthus are gradually giving way—that famine and the ague no longer eat us up, and that war is in its last phase—a merely chastening force. Despairing of the world largely using the preventive checks of Malthus, he looks around for a new positive one, and finds it in drunkenness. This vice is a heaven-sent means of pruning society, cutting off unworthy growths, and purging the population of its grosser fruits. The sober are alone the excellent of the earth, and from them and them alone will spring that high culmination of humanity, the saints on earth. He meets revulsion of feeling at this fearful view by informing us that it is desirable that this self-extinction of the coarse and brutal specimens of humanity should be performed by themselves, and if they enjoy the process all the objections that humanity might suggest are removed. He is careful to exclude from his consideration a number of hereditary victims of this sad vice, and then he pours the vial of his invective on the others. He has only such appellations for them as so coarse, brutal, gross, that the excitement of alcoholic stimulation is to them a delicious delirium, a wild saturnalia of animal exultation, and just as drink swept away the Red Indian this beneficent agent, if allowed to do its natural work, will similarly remove the savage elements that still remain as impediments to the onward progress of the more crowded communities of the old world. With him the drunkard is concurrently a criminal, prudent, but still a criminal. Drinkers do not require their courage stimulated, but drink to remove this prudence that they may be criminal without restraint and without disguise. The general conclusion of Mr. Williams is brief if not convincing. All human beings desirous to be among the fittest should avoid intoxicating liquors, provided no artificial pressure of absurd drinking customs is applied to them, while those who are incapable of the general self-restraint demanded by advancing civilization, and cannot share its moral and intellectual refinements, are provided with alcohol as a means of "happy despatch."

Looking over this view we are struck by the utter failure of the author to in any sense appreciate humanity. With him it is not a whit higher than the long train of brutal existences which form the first links of the evolutionary chain. The drunkard is as worthless as the fox or the rabbit, and failing to answer expectation is without compunction sent to his own place. That he should have any of the elements of a fine character is too great a stretch of imagination, or be tempted and fall from a higher and nobler existence, is never taken into account. That, reclaimed from his vice, he might be restored to society and redeem the time, never seems to have entered into the conceptions of the theorist, or that he has a soul to be saved would be as great a surprise to Mr. Williams as it is the fact that stimulates the benevolence of all who love their brother because they love their Lord. Every attribute of man is eliminated from the drunkard, and every attribute of Deity from the theory, and we have to thank God that facts are against this view. In Maine Law localities there are so few unfit for this working day world that the costly and cruel machinery of the liquor traffic to sift the bad from the good is not required, and when crowded old world towns are wise enough to dispense with drink facilities they will find as Charles Mackay sang, that

"The meanest wretch that ever trod,
The deepest sunk in sin and sorrow,
Will stand erect in self-respect
Before God's teeming earth to-morrow."

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

REST AND REWARD.

Not the thick and torpid pool
Which lies dull, and slow, and full,
Which is never stirred to strife,
Seeming without force or life,
Is the image of true rest,
Such as makes men calmly blest.

But on ocean when the wind
Roars no more, and leaves behind
Quiet slumber on the deep;
When the ocean lies asleep
There is rest, the sweetest calm,
Quiet as a healing balm.

And the soul that never felt Passion's force can never melt
Into ecstasies of peace;
When the battle's noises cease,
Then the warriors feel a glow
Such as others never know.

After battle rest is sweet;
He who ne'er stood battle's heat,
Never fought and never won,
Cannot put fresh laurels on;
But the victor's brow shall wear
Precious wreaths of laurel fair.

APHORISMS.

Written specially for the "Social Reformer."

1. When principle reigns within prosperity reigns without.
2. Temperance is the friend of few vices; intemperance of fewer virtues.
3. Temperance is safer than intemperance; but abstinence is the absolute safety.
4. The soul and intellect of the intemperate man are in the foul grip of his passions.
5. The drunkard is at war with virtue, and is not at peace with vice. For vice is the very soul of dis-peace.
6. A drunkard's house is not a home.

A SONNET.

Had I but known that thou, my restless heart
Would seek to play this foolish, trifling part,
I should have made thy swinging portal fast,
And barred thy windows with the greatest care:
If not for aye, at least till this was past,
And then 'twould not have seemed so hard to bear.
What though the lock grow rusty—weeds grow rank?
'Twere better far than what I now behold,
A ruthless waste, a desolation blank,
Envy and scorn and misery unfold.
Bright sun, thou seem'st to mock me in my woe,
O birdies, hush that merry roundelay,
For I must hush those tears that fain would flow,
And strive to act my part in seeming gay.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1882.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

SEPTEMBER, 1882.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION—ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE twenty-fourth annual meeting of this Association will be held in Glasgow on Tuesday, 26th September, 1882.

The business meeting will be held in the Christian Institute, 70 Bothwell Street, at half past ten o'clock a.m. Treasurer Hamilton, J.P., President of the Association, will preside. The annual reports will be submitted, office-bearers elected, and business of vital importance brought under consideration.

The social tea-party of members and their friends will be held in the saloon of the City Hall, Candle-riggs, at half-past three o'clock p.m. Provost Macpherson, Grangemouth, will preside. Addresses will be delivered by delegates, representatives of kindred associations, and others. Tickets, one shilling each, early application for which will avert disappointment. These may be had at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, or will be sent to any address; applications to contain stamped addressed envelope.

The public meeting will take place in the City Hall in the evening at half-past seven o'clock.

JAMES STEWART, Esq., M.P., will preside.

The following gentlemen are expected to be present.

DR. CHAS. CAMERON, M.P., Glasgow.

C. H. MELDON, Esq., M.P., Q.C., LL.D., Kildare County, Ireland.

J. M. RAPER, Esq., U.K. Alliance.

REV. J. M'DERMOTT, M.A., Belfast, Irish Temperance League.

REV. G. GLADSTONE, I.O.G.T., Scotland.

Other speakers will be duly announced in future advertisements.

The Executive anticipate with confidence a large gathering of members and friends at all the meetings. It is most important that there should be a very large attendance at the business meeting; and that in view of the satisfactory state of the agitation and the consequent growing desire for special legislation for Scotland, measures be devised for a vigorous agitation both in the country and in Parliament through which such legislation may be obtained.

Members and friends are respectfully reminded that the treasurer's book must close on Wednesday, 20th inst., to allow of an abstract of accounts being prepared for the business meeting. It is hoped that they will kindly remit to the Secretary by that date.

R. MACKAY, Secy.

A very thorough temperance reformer is the Mayor of Leeds—Mayor Tatham. He has been greatly interested in the good English game of cricket, and accepted recently an invitation to a match. At its close he candidly told his hearers that "he was dissatisfied with the result of so many matches with the Australians and his fellow-countrymen; and he believed that the failure of the English could be prevented. Our English cricketers did well in the morning, but after lunch, champagne and cigars, they fell away. The Australians were all abstemious, seven or eight actually abstainers. So long as the difference lay there the Englishmen would have to take a second place. If they wanted to win they must give up drink and tobacco." The worthy mayor's statement can be easily verified or disproved, but when Hanlon, Pearson, Trickett, Cameron, in short all who have in river or road or at target won supreme honours were abstainers, and felt that they had not steadiness of nerve unless they were, it is somewhat exceptional to believe that victory is to fall to the cricketers who imbibe and smoke rather than to their more sober if not altogether sober opponents. Very slowly we are free to admit, but certainly, we believe, the people are wakening up to the unassailable truth that in all things victory is his who, all things being equal, is sober rather than not.

A resignation which will create a wide-spread feeling of regret in temperance circles, will take effect this month. Mr. Thomas Wallace Russel, the secretary of the Irish Society for the Prevention of Intemperance, on the 30th inst. retires from that post. Although he will continue to labour in the good cause as health will permit, yet, to all intents and purposes, he will be no longer "the man at the wheel," and in this view his resignation is a loss to the Irish temperance movement. Mr. Russel has held his present position for nearly twenty years, and it is to his energy and perseverance that the passage of the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act is mainly due. Although but forty years of age, his health is far from robust, and he feels that it will be best for him, and it may be best for the future of the movement, which he will never desert, that he should seek a long rest. We hope that he will be long spared to labour, as he intends, in the temperance ranks, freed from the trammels of office, and that by his release from its duties he may gather health and strength to last him for many years.

The temperance movement in Scotland, and the movement in Aberdeen particularly, has lost a sound prohibitionist, an able writer, and an eloquent platform advocate, in Mr. William Clark, of Rosemount, Aberdeen, who last month left our shores for Port Elizabeth, South Africa. Mr. Clark was one of the most fully informed on the Total Abstinence question we know; possessed of sound prohibitory views, which he was ever eager to maintain and defend, both on the platform and in the press. He was an esteemed contributor to this magazine, where many of his papers have appeared, and were eagerly read by its numerous readers. The Executive Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and publisher, and editor of the Social Reformer, join in wishing him every success in his chosen settlement, and trust that many there will appreciate him as heartily as he was everywhere appreciated in the North of Scotland. The Aberdeen Temperance Society did honour to him and honour to themselves in recognising his merits by the presentation of a laudatory address.

The American Insurance Societies are taking a leaf out of the books of the British ones. Finding that with increased membership came an increased ratio of losses, the Ancient Order of United Workmen made an investigation. They found that they must exclude the "daily" drinker and the saloon keeper. The supreme medical examiner says in his report, "A man who drinks liquor as a beverage daily or habitually, if not actually intemperate, in the ordinary meaning of the word, is at least putting such a trammel on the physiological functions of his system as to render him a hazardous risk in an insurance sense." The occupation of the saloon keeper is "undoubtedly the most extra-hazardous of any business generally indulged in." Other evidence was adduced, to the effect that their statistics show a marked difference in mortality between beer-drinking and temperance communities; that, in proportion to membership, the mortality is vastly greater in the beer-drinking States than others. "This," says the National Temperance Advocate, "is the significant testimony, not of temperance fanatics, but of the business managers of a provident institution." Let all true hearts work more energetically, and pray more fervently for success, when they see so great a prospect of the crime-creating, pauper-inducing, death-hastening liquor traffic, within measurable distance of being commercially condemned and outlawed.

In the Financial Reformer for August prominence is given to an extract from a tract on the "Profits from Drink," by Mr. Warren, who writes strongly on his subject. He shows that from the Customs the import duty on liquors yields the revenue £5,482,274, and that from the Excise on home-made drinks the revenue derives £24,642,322, or a total of £30,124,596 sterling; and he remarks,—“The nation's profit on 'Drink,' which means its gain in money by the wretchedness and ruin of many millions of its members.” He adds significantly, “But the strange thing is that, enormous and disgraceful as this gain is, the making of it, and that only, is the cause of an equally enormous and disgraceful profit by the individuals who distribute it to these wretched and ruined millions.” He backs his assertion by a truth that should make people who secretly favour the drink system ashamed of themselves. A publican buys a cask of rum  $36\frac{1}{2}$  gallons, at 4s. 6d. per gallon—the price in bond = £8 4s. 6d. The duty is 10s. 2d. per proof gallon = £24 8s. = £32 12s. 6d. But the seller adds 19 gallons of water, making  $55\frac{1}{2}$  “drinkable” gallons, which supply 3,522 glasses at 4d. each, equal to £59 4s., or a profit of £26 11s. 6d., or 81.5 per cent. Mr. Warren's contention is not for the suppression of such a huge and injurious traffic, but merely for the abolition of the duty, as he holds that if the glass could be got for a penny drinking would cease! We cannot admit the soundness of this view, but rather wish to bring the case before our readers, that they may see what an amount of wealth is being squandered on a pleasure that poisons him that drinks it, and, besides the sum it costs, drains the physical, mental, and moral vigour of the consumer, until, like the ruined gambler, he awakens from his delirium, to find himself bereft of means, the advantages of time, and the hopes associated with a happy future.

By and bye we will be found in this country urgently imploring our drunken relatives to enlist in the army and get drafted on active service. Sir Garnet Wolesley knows that precious little honour will rebound to the British army if drink gets inside the soldiers; and he very properly warns the natives of Alexandria and Ismailia and other places in Egypt not to sell to the troops any liquors, for if they will he will close their premises. Nothing else could be expected from the author of the Soldier's Book and the hero of the Red River Expedition, Abyssinia, and Ashantee. It does provoke reflection to think that a Briton at home engaged in the arts of peace should be exposed by his Government to the dangers and temptations of the public-house, while Britons abroad engaged in war should be so sedulously protected from the solicitations of the grog or arrack shop. A drunken artizan is a matter of indifference, a drunken soldier cannot be tolerated in the tented field. We are engaged fighting for civil and religious equality, but it is more our interest to have equality with our warriors and be abreast of them in our freedom from the curse and snare of drink. Pity it is the interest of our Government to keep our feet ever on the brink of such legalised pitfalls to inebriety. The day is on the wing that will constrain our rulers to leave the liquor traffic in our hands. On that day the British artizans will be as our gallant soldiers are to-day, no longer menaced and enslaved by the abomination that maketh desolate—the drink system of Britain.

Last month Sir David Wedderburn, Bart., M.P., resigned his seat for the Haddington Burghs to which he was elected in 1879. We deeply sympathise with him, and are very sorry, indeed, that the Scottish Permissive Prohibitory Movement will lose meantime his valuable support. Our best wishes go with him in his search of health, and we trust to see him soon in Parliament again reinvigorated for the service of his country.

Mr. Alex. Craig-Sellar is now member for the Haddington Burghs. He has seen how strong the tide in the group of burghs he is to represent flows in favour of a people's veto, and we are glad to hear that he believes he is in hearty accord with the best electors in the constituency in taking up an advanced position on the ratepayers' veto over all traffic in alcoholic liquors. Where were the publicans during this struggle? They were evidently like the editor of the Trades Guardian, the Scotch organ of the drink interest, snarling at a success they could neither control nor prevent.

At the meeting of the British Medical Association, that indefatigable advocate of temperance, Dr. N. S. Kerr, submitted in a masterly paper the results of his inquiries into alcohol as a cause of death, proportion of sickness and death caused by alcohol, the mortality from intemperance, the use of stimulants in workhouses, habitual inebriety and the increased consumption of non-alcoholic drinks. The talented paper was followed by a discussion which leaned far more to unstinted praise of the views of Dr. Kerr than objections to what was advanced. The medical profession are leaving the ranks of the drink interest and with them will disappear the last great support of our public house system.

We have pleasure in announcing a further issue of leaflets by the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. This will make a quarter of a million of these most useful little messengers this season. They have been eagerly read by the great out-door audiences addressed by the advocates and agents of the Association. Our friends have found them invaluable for indoor meetings as being only printed on one side, the other side can have the local meeting intimation printed thereon, and circulated by the local tract distributors. Our friends should try them—they will find them a superior means of spreading temperance and prohibitionist truth. Specimens can be had at the Offices or will be sent to any address by Mr. R. Mackay, Secretary, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow.

Canon Basil Wilberforce, stung by the knowledge that the National Church is the largest owner of the property on which the public-houses of the country stand, has written to the Archbishop of Canterbury on the subject. His case is invincible. He holds that the Established Church exists as an institution for the purification of the national life, while the drink interest is the chief source of social degradation and debasement. The Canon points to the shameful facts published in the Sword and Trowel, and asks his Grace either to contradict the statements in his letter, or, if they are true, to sweep away a condition of things which is morally as discreditable, as it is politically short-sighted; or prevent such a state of things for the future. He himself is doing what he can to reduce this frightful anomaly by refusing absolutely to sign any lease without having inserted therein a clause prohibiting the use of the land under his control for any purpose of building or occupation for distillery, brewery or publican purposes. He implored his Grace to do the same, and, if possible, to get a law restraining the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from implicating the Established Church in such a baneful trade. We should wait patiently for his Grace's reply, and we hope for the interests, first of the country and then of the Church itself, that means will be devised by her followers to wipe away a reproach which will not only diminish the lustre of her reputation but will threaten her very existence.

The twenty-third day of June was a red letter day for the Canadian Prohibitionists. On that day the English Privy Council delivered a judgment on an appeal made against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, sustaining the legality of the Canada Temperance Act. As our readers are aware, in 1867 a strong agitation commenced for a general prohibitory Act for the whole Dominion. This was induced by the fact that many places were already under prohibition in one way or other: but it was thought that a uniform Act would be best. In 1873-4 petitions with half a million signatures were sent to the Canadian Parliament praying for such a law. In 1874 Parliament authorized the appointment of two Commissioners to make a thorough investigation into the working prohibitory laws of the States. The Commissioners, one of whom was Mr. J. W. Manning of Ontario, well known to many of our readers, brought back a report so favourable to such legislation that, in 1878, the Scott Act was introduced and adopted, and is now law in 24 of the 25 constituencies to which it has been submitted, being adopted by an average majority of three to one. It has been opposed and its validity challenged more than once, but its legality was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada, one judge only dissenting, and it is an appeal from the Court to the English Privy Council on which the Council's judgment has been delivered. The judgment reviews three objections to the legality of the Act—First, that it injuriously affects the revenue and thus contravenes the North British America Act. This is met by the proof that it is not a fiscal law, but a law for promoting the peace, good order, and good government of Canada. The second objection, that it affected property and civil rights is met by the statement that it does not affect property or rights per se, but has regard primarily to public order and safety, and although in that case it may affect property, its interference with it is only so far as such interests as the public order and safety demands; then, as to rights, it was surely not intended by the North British America Act to prevent and enact that certain uses of property and certain Acts in relation to property, were sinful. Laws make it criminal for a man to set fire to his own house, on the ground that such an act endangers the public safety, although the law affects the property so used and its owner's right to do what he likes with his own. Laws of this nature designed for the promotion of public order, safety, or morals, and which subject those who contravene them to criminal procedure and punishment, belong to the subject of public wrongs rather than that of civil rights. The third objection, that the Act was in force in some places and not in others is aptly repelled. Their Lordships remarked that as soon as the Act was passed it might have been adopted anywhere and everywhere,—“Its object was to promote temperance by means of a uniform law throughout the Dominion." The legislation is clearly meant to apply a remedy to an evil assumed to exist throughout the Dominion, and the local option no more localizes the subject and scope of the Act than a provision in an Act for the prevention of contagious disease, that a public officer should proclaim in what districts it should come into effect, would make the statute a mere local Act for the places proclaimed. In statutes of this kind the legislation is general, and the provision for the special application of it to particular places does not alter its character. This great deliverance shows first that the peace, good order and safety of the people, is greater than the revenue, and that these are not to be endangered that the revenue may be swelled: it shows that it is not a civil right to sell liquor but a public wrong: it is the drink interest that is the great aggressor against the peace and good order of humanity, and a law is competent that deprives any one of the right to use his or her property to wrong their neighbours; and, lastly, it shows that local option means neither more nor less than the local application of a general or impartial law by the electors, who by it are enabled to arm themselves effectually against the intolerable source of the wrongs inflicted on them by the drink interest. We congratulate Canada on this judgment, and now that the law is declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, and that declaration sustained by judicial authority at home, we trust to hear that all the Dominion is rapidly putting itself under the benign protection of the Canada Temperance Law.

THE BRAND AND THE BRANCH.

No human biography has ever been fully written. Men's actions may be recorded, a portion of their thoughts expressed, but how these thoughts and actions are influenced by the ministering spirits of salvation or by the powers of darkness that move unseen around the life of each, has never been recorded by pen of mortal man. Only in the book of God is disclosed the solemnity of life, the spirits that surround us and the eternity that stretches before us in gloom or glory endless.

In the third chapter of Zechariah's prophecy we obtain a glimpse of a fact that is too little thought of. We see the Lord and Satan with the sinner between. What an interest is shown in the sinner's life. The Prince of Peace, heaven's representative, the Prince of Darkness, hell's representative, bidding for man's life.

What an ugly name the Lord gives to Joshua—a Brand, yet how befitting. That brand was in the fire—else it could not be taken out—the fire was in the brand, burning its very heart and making it black, useless, and unsightly. Such is the state of the unsaved soul. Christ longs for it, Satan bids for it. That fire is sin and its guilt, and in this element the soul slumbers; but this element slumbers not but rages in the soul, marring it and charring it. So must that brand, that soul abide for ever, if some one outside that circle of fire, some one free from sin and guilt plunge not a divine-human hand into the burning mass and seizing the brand pluck it out of the fire. Oh Christ! thou only couldst love a brand, a red, burning brand, thou only couldst rescue it, and in rescuing, wound thyself.

The brand plucked out of the fire is still a brand. And though the flame seems all gone, how easily and naturally it may catch fire again, even from the flying spark. So with the sinner saved if he do not watch and pray. Sins once abjured may come back, passions thought to be dead and buried may prove to have been only buried alive, and may reassert themselves with a demoniacal power, constraining the unwatchful one to cry in the bitterness of his soul, 'Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?'

But that black, charred brand plucked out at such pains from the fire, of what use is it to God or man? Behold the brand in the hand of the great husbandman, with marvellous skill he engrafts it into the true vine, and by degrees the charred brand takes on a verdure, sends out its twigs, is beautified with blossoms and bends under the weight of its ripening fruit, after the manner of my "servant the branch." What a mystery of grace is here! "Herein," saith the master gardener, "herein is my Father glorified that ye"—the brands plucked from the fire—"bear much fruit, so shall ye be my disciples."

Better be the charred but plucked and engrafted brand than the green bay tree—better be the poorest wretch united to Christ than the purest apart from him. So engrafted, the unsightly brand becomes a thing of beauty; instead of fire and death within and around it, it has now fertility and life.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—VIII.

SUNDAY CLOSING (ENGLAND) BILL—SUNDAY CLOSING (IRELAND) BILL—DRUNKENNESS IN THE ARMY—BEER DEALERS' LICENSES ACT AMENDMENT BILL—REPEAL OF THE MALT TAX—IMPORT OF WINES—SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE DRUNKENNESS OF THE ARMY—WRIT FOR HADDINGTON DISTRICT OF BURGHS—THE PASSENGER VESSELS LICENSES (SCOTLAND) BILL—CORNWALL SUNDAY CLOSING BILL—SPANISH WINE DUTIES—COUNTY ELECTORAL RETURN—RETURN OF CONVICTIONS FOR SUNDAY DRINKING (SCOTLAND) AND ARREST OF SUNDAY DRUNKARDS (SCOTLAND) BILL—PAYMENT OF WAGES IN PUBLIC-HOUSES PROHIBITION BILL—RETURN OF LIQUOR CONSUMPTION IN WORK HOUSES (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—ADJOURNMENT OF BOTH HOUSES.

July 19.—Mr. Stevenson, in moving the Sunday Closing (England) Bill, said that its object was to provide for the total closing of public houses in England on Sunday. It was now twenty-eight years since a Sunday Closing Bill was passed for Scotland, and upon a searching enquiry into its working a Sunday Bill for Ireland was passed. Public opinion was strongly in favour of the Bill, and he submitted that the House ought to have regard to this opinion and remove from the working men the temptations to spend their wages on the only day on which they could spend them. It was also desirable in the interest of three or four thousand barmaids and barmen that the anomaly of a long day's work on Sunday should be removed. He moved the second reading of the Bill. Mr. Warton moved the rejection of the Bill, because it would shut up public houses altogether. He could not understand the high principle that would exempt the bona fide traveller. This Bill was a piece of radical tyranny. (Laughter.) Some people never saw anybody but themselves. He hoped for the time when all would moderately indulge and none excessively. It was all very well for well-dressed, well-fed, radical members to aim at depriving the working man of his rational enjoyment of a Sunday. It was very likely that in the Reform Club over a glass of whisky and water on a Sunday, that this Bill was drawn up to deprive the poor man of his beer. (Ironical cheers.) He moved that the Bill be read that day three months. The Bill was supported by Sir Joseph M. Pease, Mr. Ewart, and Mr. Gibson, and opposed by Sir Selwin Ibbetson, and Sir C. Phipps. Mr. Herbert, although not speaking officially, spoke favourably of Sunday closing, which he declared the people desired. He thought that there would be greater difficulties in the south than in the north, and that if Cornwall wanted a Bill she should have it; for it was very much a matter of local feeling. Mr. Talbot moved the adjournment of the debate. Colonel Makins seconded and Mr. Callan talked out the Bill.

July 20.—Mr. Gladstone, in reply to Mr. Richardson said, he was afraid that he could afford no facilities for the passage of the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill.

July 21.—The Beer Dealers Licenses Act (1880) Amendment Bill was read a second time in the House of Lords.

July 24.—Mr. Osborne Morgan, in answer to Mr. Caine, stated that the average number of men stationed at Aldershot, in 1881, was 11,639, which was about the usual average. He was unable to state the number of punishments either for drunkenness or other offences inflicted on these men during that period. Some of the regiments stationed at Aldershot last year were at present abroad, and he supposed the authorities to whom he applied for the information had their hands full of other matters at present. (Mr. Warton—Hear, hear.) The total number of licensed public-houses in the two parishes of Aldershot and Farnborough was 49, beer-houses licensed to sell on the premises 51, beer-houses licensed to sell off the premises 28, grocers and confectioners licensed to sell intoxicating liquor 9, canteen licenses 19, making a total of 156. During 1881 not a single licensed person was brought before the magistrates charged with permitting of drunkenness or supplying liquor to drunken persons.

July 28th.—Mr. Chaplin, in Committee on the Customs and Revenue (recommitted) Bill, moved the following resolution:—"That no financial scheme will be satisfactory which does not amend the law with regard to the use of ingredients other than sugar, malt, and hops, in the brewing of beer for sale." He argued that the repeal of the malt tax, by encouraging the use of rice, maize, and other articles as substitutes for malt in brewing, had proved to be injurious instead of beneficial to the farmer, and that the manufacture of beer of inferior quality from such articles was contrary to the public welfare, as well as detrimental to the interests of agriculture. He asked the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to entertain this amendment, with a view to making the repeal of the malt tax correspond with the object for which it was intended—namely, to confer a benefit, and not an injury, on the agricultural community of this country. The amendment was not placed on the paper in a spirit of hostility to the financial proposals of the right hon. gentleman, but to enable him (Mr. Chaplin) to state the views of a great many who were interested in the question, and in order to enable him to make this appeal to the right hon. gentleman. Colonel Barne concurred. Mr. Gladstone deprecated bringing the resolution forward at the present juncture. The terms of the motion cast a disagreeable light on a policy which has been steadily pursued for over a quarter of a century. The party with which Mr. Chaplin is connected have represented the repeal of the malt tax as the grand specific for all agricultural woes and grievances. (Hear, hear.) The uniform strain in which the recommendations for the repeal of the malt tax were supported was by invoking the goddess of freedom. It was the removal of restraint, it was liberating the hands of producers, and now that that has been done, the hon. member says:—Oh yes, liberate the hands of a particular description of producers, but tie up the hands of another class of producers. But, sir, it is an extremely painful circumstance to me that the unfortunate farmer of this country should for fifty years have been taught by those who unquestionably believed themselves the best friends the farmer had, and who often say they are his only friends, to place his hope and reliance on a remedy of which the hon. gentleman now deliberately declares that the disadvantages greatly outweigh the advantages. Now the Government had set the trade wholly free and was leaving everybody to judge what kind of beer they would like. It is a sad fact that the repeal of this tax, of which the Tory Government spoke so much, should be a sad failure. So far, however, as a mischievous article is produced by the use of certain ingredients in the making of beer is not a matter of finance at all, but a question of adulteration. It is not a subject which the financial department can entertain. I do not think the hon. gentleman could expect the House of Commons to proscribe the use of articles other than malt, hops, and sugar in the making of beer, because the introduction of them tends to reduce the price of barley. The motion, on that point of view, strikes at the very root of all progress and advance in the industry of the country. (Cheers.) My firm belief is, that the admission of all these articles will be beneficial to the public, because this is a trade that depends upon the use of bulky commodities; and the more free we are to purchase these bulky commodities, the larger will be the use of them. To give an absolute free choice of material, setting aside the question of adulteration, to the producers of this country, is absolutely the first and most necessary condition of progress in industry and manufactures. If you do not do that, you will undo the whole legislation of the last century, which has tended to set British industry free, and begin again to manufacture the fetters which formerly bound up the energies, the industry, the skill, and the capital of this country, and carry it back to the condition of comparative poverty and disgrace in which it lay before those operations began. I could not with honesty pretend to be prepared to entertain in any way the question of restricting the use of any materials in the production of beer which are not obnoxious, and on the ground of their sanitary effects. This is no question of finance. I wish the hon. member every kind of success in an operation of this kind, but I think it is rather hard when we come forward with our Tax Bill to supply the absolute wants of the country, at a period when the House is much exhausted with the labours of a lengthened session, to bring upon the Tax Bill a question of that kind. The result is, that it is now in the last days of July, when we have been obliged to give up the very best of our important legislative measures for the year; and I think the hon. member will find that it would not be desirable that we should enter at large into the question of elementary principles, or make in the very smallest degree concessions which would strike at the root of the legislation which has done so much to render this country more powerful and contented. (Cheers.) Mr. Fowler was going into the consideration of the finances of the country, when Mr. W. H. Smith successfully implored him to allow the motion to be discussed. Sir W. Bartolot admitted that it would be difficult to restrict the ingredients of which beer might be composed. But the repeal of the tax had reduced the price of barley and had enabled brewers to use ingredients not beneficial to the consumers. Mr. James Howard held that no attempt had been made to prove the deleteriousness of the ingredients used by brewers, nor that the abolition of the tax had caused a decline in the price of barley. Why, in 1881 the price of barley was 10s. per quarter dearer than in 1880. (Cheers.) He was free to confess that immediately after the repeal of the malt tax, there was a considerable decline in the price of barley. He was somewhat astonished at that result, and on inquiring the cause at one of the largest malsters, he was told it was due to the stock of malt left over. Not satisfied with that statement, he went to the largest brewers, who said that malt could be got almost on their own terms. Hon. members were bound to show the necessity for the change they advocated, and he maintained no such proof had been given. After Sir B. Leighton and Sir G. Balfour had spoken, the House divided. For the motion 52, against it 125; majority against 73. The motion was therefore lost.

July 31.—Mr. Norwood wanted Mr. Gladstone to lay on the table a statement showing the quantity of wine imported into the United Kingdom in 1881, and also its degrees of strength. Mr. Gladstone said that this return could only be got at great labour and expense. He recommended his hon. friend to apply to the Customs for information.

August 8.—Mr. Stevenson moved that the order of the day for the Sunday Closing (England) Bill be discharged. The bill therefore became a dropped order.

— Mr. Osborne Morgan in reply to Mr. Caine, stated that he was not able to give precise information, but the number of individual men punished for drunkenness in the army during 1880-1 was 120 or 130 per thousand. He thought Aldershot would compare favourably with regiments stationed on the outskirts of large towns. Making allowance for those soldiers who were constantly punished for drunkenness he must admit that the list was a very bad one. The Secretary of State for War and himself were fully persuaded of the importance of the subject, and whatever the military authorities could do would be done to diminish the evil.

August 9.—The order for the Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill was discharged. It is a dropped order.

August 10.—Mr. Caine gave notice that early next session he would move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into cause of drunkenness in the army, and the remedies necessary for its removal.

August 11.—A new writ was, on the motion of Lord R. Grosvenor, issued for the Haddington district of burghs, in room of Sir David Wedderburn, Bart., who, since his election, had accepted the office of Steward of the Manor of North Stead.

— The Passenger Vessels Licenses (Scotland) Bill passed through committee without amendment, and on the motion of the Lord Advocate was read a third time.

August 12.—Mr. A. P. Vivian moved the second reading of the "Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Cornwall) Bill," the object of which was to forbid the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday in the county of Cornwall. The feeling of the county was, he stated, decidedly in favour of the bill; 11 out of the 13 members representing the county being in favour of it. Mr. Warton at great length strongly opposed the bill. He objected to the bill as intended to restrain public liberty. It displayed one of the worst features of modern democracy. The Radical of the present day, when compounded with the teetotaler, was one of the grossest forms of tyrants. Sir W. Harcourt said that if anything was wanting to commend the bill to the House it was observations of the character of those which the hon. member had just made. (Cheers.) A more wanton and unjustifiable waste of time he had never observed. (Cheers.) He thought that was an opinion which the majority of the House would entirely share in. (Cheers.) The hon. member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) did not care for the opinions of the people of Cornwall, but the hon. member was not always indifferent to those opinions. The block which he had placed against the bill disappeared when there came to be an election for the county of Cornwall, because it was not thought convenient that a block to the bill should appear from the Conservative benches. The block reappeared, however, in the name of the hon. member for Louth (Mr. Callan), who had just attempted to count out the House. That was the character of the opposition to this bill; and the manner in which the feelings of the people of Cornwall were dealt with by those who called themselves the Independent Opposition. This question of dealing with public houses was essentially a local question, and questions of that kind ought to be governed by the opinion of the locality. Parliament had acted upon that principle with regard to Sunday closing in Ireland and in Wales, and that principle was acted upon at an earlier period in Scotland. If the whole county of Cornwall was really unanimous on the subject, all that had to be done was just to ask what reason there was to refuse the demand. If there were any reasons, they had not been supplied in the speech of the hon. member for Bridport. He did not think they could find a decent man in Cornwall to say a word against the bill. Lord Elcho said that the question of regulating public houses was a question of the majority interfering with the minority—that was to say, the majority who could not control their own appetites coming to Parliament for legislation to enable them to do so, and to prevent those who were able to control their appetite from getting a glass of beer when they wanted it. On that point the Home Secretary once made a speech in a very different tone from that which he had now made. What he maintained was, that the suppression of drunkenness ought not to be brought about by Acts of this kind, but by elevating the people, so that they should look upon drunkenness with horror. It was the police who ought to deal with this matter. If a man was found drunk in the streets let them take him before a magistrate, but do not let them deal with the question in this way. They dared not bring in a Sunday Closing Bill for the whole of England, including the metropolis, and that showed the worthlessness of their principle. In London there would be such a row if they attempted to close all the public houses on Sundays that they dare not do it. Why was that? Because a large number of the people of London felt that they had a right, if they chose, on a Sunday to get a glass of beer, and here they were going to allow the majority to tyrannise over the minority. It was because he did not believe the working men of England, or anything like the majority of them, were drunkards, that he opposed this bill, and protested against the majority being allowed to tyrannise over the minority, and he should certainly divide the House against the bill. Mr. Onslow said that, from the fact that there were only two Cornish members in the House, he was justified in saying that the Cornish members did not care two straws for this bill. They had it on the authority of Mr. Parnell that the Irish Sunday Closing Bill had not done any good, while they knew that Scotland, which had also Sunday closing, was a more drunken place than any other in Her Majesty's dominions. Mr. Callan, after some observations on the bill, again attempted a count out, which, however, proved unsuccessful. Mr. Round, Mr. Cavendish-Bentinck, and Mr. Daly having spoken, the House divided, when there voted—

For the second reading,	41
Against,	8
Majority for,	33

The bill was then read a second time.

Aug. 14.—Mr. Gladstone, in reply to Mr. O'Donnell, stated that there were no prohibitory duties on British goods in Spain, but Spain had been making a legislative change which had the effect of making an enormous difference of duty on most British commodities. That Government had strongly complained of our invidious distinction in wine duties, on the difference of duty on French and Spanish wine. He could not at present alter that duty because it would involve a loss to the revenue of hundreds of thousands of pounds, but Spain knew whenever we were in a position to do so that the question would have the best consideration.

Aug. 15.—The Earl of Rosebery in the House of Lords in moving the second reading of the Passenger Vessels Licenses (Scotland) Bill, said that the measure was unanimously approved by the public of Scotland. The bill was intended to regulate the granting of licenses for the consumption of strong liquors on board of passenger vessels. These licenses were now granted by the Board of Inland Revenue, who were not the ordinary licensing authority, and under these licenses scenes of great scandal and disorder had taken place on board Sunday steamers. It was proposed that the Inland Revenue have power to prevent the selling of liquor on Sunday under these circumstances. The bill was read a second time, and on a division it was resolved not to send it to Committee.

— In the Commons, Mr. Buchanan moved a return for the year 1881 of the number of electors on the register of each county in England and Wales, exhibiting the several qualifications, and similar returns for Scotland and Ireland (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 342 of Session 1872).

Aug. 16.—The Passenger Vessels Licenses (Scotland) Bill was, on the motion of Earl Rosebery, read a third time in the Upper House and passed.

— In the Lower House, Mr. Warton, in the absence of Mr. Montague Scott, moved for a return of all convictions since the 29th day of September, 1876, to the 29th September, 1882, of all persons arrested for drunkenness on Sunday in Scotland, indicating the number in each particular county or burgh, and the population of each such county or burgh.

Aug. 17.—On the order of the second reading of the Payment of Wages in Public Houses Prohibition Bill, an unsuccessful attempt to count out the House was made by Mr. Warton. Mr. Broadhurst then moved that the bill be read a second time, Mr. Warton moved that it be read a second time that day six months. No hon. member would second the amendment, and the second reading was agreed to.

— Mr Whitworth moved a return showing the amount of spirits, wine, and malt liquors consumed in each workhouse in England and Wales in the year ending the 31st December, 1881, together with the expenditure in each workhouse of each such kind of intoxicating liquor for the same period; also stating the daily average number of inmates in each workhouse during the said term. Mr. Callan attempted to count out the House, but the Speaker declared the motion for the return agreed to.

Aug. 18.—The Royal assent was given in the House of Lords to the Passenger Vessels License Amendment (Scotland) Bill, which is now law.

Parliament with the usual formalities adjourned until Tuesday, 24th October, 1882.

It is said that a certain old gentleman in Edinburgh is so rigid a teetotaler that he refuses to take milk from a cow that is fed on the draff of a brewery.

Since Mr. Noble's branch of the Blue Ribbon was established in this country, 470,000 pledge cards have been despatched to various parts of the country. When we read this don't let our thoughts dwell on the many who have fallen, but on the number that have kept their ribbon unstained by liquor.

F. G. in an interesting article on Cricket, in Time, speaking of the Australian eleven says:—"Money may have made the mare to go; but training not only in cricket, but in diet, and above all drink, has done more." "Merlin," in the Evening News, in regard to the above says:—"That the men who play the most consistently good cricket are the men who take care of themselves. And, in connection with this matter, I rejoice that you can get tea as well as beer and spirits at most cricket grounds. Let each of my readers ask himself honestly and candidly, whether he does not know who has failed, and whose failure is distinctly due to drink."

The Social Reformer (Glasgow: Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, 112 Bath Street) contains the first instalment of a temperance tale by Annie Swan, entitled "An Enemy in the Mouth," and "The Causes and Cure of Intemperance," the latter a pithy article sure to commend itself to any unbiassed mind. "Sam Taylor's Electioneering," by the Rev. F. Wagstaff, is in that gentleman's usual racy style, while a number of interesting paragraphs, Parliamentary and other intelligence, go towards making up a good number.—Stirling Observer.

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE IN BLACKFORD.—Three years ago a meeting convened by Mr. T. Barclay, Middleton House, in the Board Schoolroom of this village, attended by upwards of 200 of an audience, was addressed by ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P. The year following another meeting was convened and addressed by Messrs. Stevenson and Dransfield, lecturers of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which was also well attended, the result of which was the formation of a society under the Order of Good Templarism, the membership of which now amounts to a twelfth part of the inhabitants of this village, and has been attended with great good to the members and pecuniary loss to the taverns.

"THE DRINK PROBLEM AND ITS SOLUTION."—This is the title of a book of great value, the author of which is David Lewis, J.P., of Edinburgh, Scotland. It opens with an able discussion of the province of civil government in its relation to the liquor traffic, considers the effect of the traffic upon labour and commerce, its social results, and the remedial measures—religious, moral, and legislative. Its treatment of the subjects of "permissive" and "imperial" prohibition, and the "objections to prohibition" will be of great interest to all thoughtful students of the liquor problem on both sides of the Atlantic. It is one of the best books ever published on the other side of the Atlantic, and we have imported a few copies which will be sent post paid to any address for one dollar fifty cents (6s. 3d.)—National Temperance Advocate (America).

There is a great organisation rising in America called the Knights of Labour. It is to settle differences between employers and employed, to avoid strikes if possible, but if impossible, to strike as one man. WINES, ANY OR MANY—AN HONEST MAN.—When we got back to the hotel King Arthur's round table was ready for us in its white drapery, and the head waiter and his first assistant, in swallow tails and white cravats, brought in the soup and the hot plates at once. Mr. X. had ordered the dinner, and when the wine came on he picked up a bottle, glanced at the label, and then turned to the grave, the melancholy, the sepulchral head waiter, and said it was not the sort of wine he had asked for. The head waiter picked up the bottle, cast his undertaker-eye on it and said, "It is true; I beg pardon." Then he turned on his subordinate and calmly said, "Bring another label!" At the same time he slid the present label off with his hand and laid it aside—it had been newly put on, its paste was still wet. When the new label came he put it on—our French wine being now turned into German wine, according to desire. The head waiter went blandly about his other duties as if the working of this sort of miracle was a common and easy thing to him. Mr. X. said he had not known before that there were people honest enough to do this miracle in public, but he was aware that thousands upon thousands of labels were imported into America from Europe every year to enable dealers to furnish to their customers in a quiet and inexpensive way all the different kinds of foreign wines they might require.—Mark Twain's Tramp Abroad, chap. xii.

In the 'Records of Later Life,' by Fanny Kemble, just published, there is a reference to her experiences with farm labourers in America. In Vol. I. we read:—I have spoken of the semi-disapprobation with which my Quaker farmer declined the wine and beer offered him at my 4th July festival. Some years after, when I found the men employed in mowing a meadow of mine at Lenox with no refreshment but "water from the well," I sent in much distress a considerable distance for a barrel of beer, which seemed to me an indispensable adjunct to such labour under the fervid heat of that summer sky, and was most seriously expostulated with by my admirable friend, Mr. Charles Sedgwick, as introducing among the labourers of Lenox a mischievous need and deleterious habit till then utterly unknown there, and setting a pernicious example to both employers and employed throughout the whole neighbourhood—in short, my poor barrel of beer was an offence to the manners and morals of the community I lived in, and my meadow was mowed upon "cold water from the well;" of which, indeed, the water was so delicious that I often longed for it as King David did for that which, after all, he would not drink because his three mighty men had risked their lives in procuring it for him. The use of either wine or beer at the tables of the Philadelphians, when I first lived among them, was quite exceptional; and the usual custom of the best society at the early three o'clock dinner was water-drinking. Nor had the immense increase of the German population then flooded Philadelphia with perennial streams from innumerable cellars and saloons; the universal rule at the time when these letters were written was absolute temperance, the exception to it a rare occasional case of absolute intemperance. . . . I need not say that, under the above state of things, no provision was made for what I should call domestic or household drunkenness in American families. Beer or beer-money was not found necessary to sustain the strength of footmen driving about town on a coach-box for an hour or two of an afternoon, or valets laying out their master's boots and cravats for dinner, or ladies' maids pinning caps on their mistresses' heads, or even young housemaids condemned to the exhausting labour of making beds and dusting furniture. The deplorable practice of swilling malt liquor two or three times a day begun in early boy and girlhood, among English servants, had not in America, as I am convinced it has with us, laid the foundation for later habits of drinking in a whole class of the community, among whom a pernicious inherited necessity for the indulgence is one of its consequences; while another and more lamentable one is the wide-spread immorality, to remedy (and, if possible, prevent) which is the object of the institution of the G.F.S. and similar benevolent institutions; none of which, I am persuaded, will effectually fulfil their object until the vicious propensity to drink ceases to be fostered in the kitchens and servants' halls of our most respectable people.—Church of England Temperance Chronicle.

HADDINGTON BURGHS ELECTION.—A change in the representation of the Haddington district of Burghs took place last month. As our readers are no doubt aware, these burghs have been loyal to the principles and policy of prohibition. Sir Henry F. Davie was one of the ten Scotch members who, in 1864, supported Mr., now Sir, W. Lawson when he introduced his Permissive Bill for the first time; and with two exceptions—absence in 1870 and 1874—he was always in the lobby with his leader. Sir David Wedderburn in 1876 succeeded Sir Henry, and never was absent from a division on the bill or resolution. Sir David, quite unexpectedly on the 1st ult., resigned his seat. The Liberal constituency, without a moment's loss of time, appointed delegates to meet at Edinburgh on the 4th to choose a successor. They, at that meeting, expressed their regret at the loss of Sir David's services, and chose Mr. A. Craig-Sellar as their candidate. Mr. Sellar issued his address on the 7th, and in it thus refers to the licensing question:—"On the licensing question I entertain the view that the ratepayers should have the control of the licenses; and I think that the present system, which, in the counties, gives the control to the justices—nominees of the Crown—ought to be altered by substituting for them some agency freely elected by the voice of the people." That same day, a deputation of Local Optionists met him to tell him that his views were not the views of his constituency, and that they wanted absolute power over the traffic to be directly vested in ratepayers. The interview resulted in the candidate showing some progress. On the 10th at Jedburgh, he referred to the licensing question, when he told his audience that the system of licensing which gave justices control over the traffic was indefensible—the administration of justice and the distribution of licenses should not be entrusted to the same persons. This was the opinion of Lord John Russell. He should not like to commit himself that night. He did think it inexpedient that Special Boards should be elected for licensing, but rather thought the power should be vested in a majority of the Town Councils, and he anticipated that, as both parties in the State thought that something should be done, they might rely on some measure soon being introduced which would give the control of licenses to the people. After meeting in every burgh in the group with a deputation Mr. Sellar said that he was prepared to vote for directly investing the people with a veto over the liquor traffic. Mr. W. Scott Seton Karr, almost at the last moment, entered the field in the Conservative interest. He, too, was interviewed in the interests of local prohibition. He was prepared to vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, without pledging himself to details. He could not say what licensing authority he would prefer if the magistrates could no longer license; but the people should have some voice in the matter. After fairly weighing the views of the two gentlemen the temperance electors resolved to give their united support to Mr. Sellar. The contest was most exciting, but the result was never doubtful. The polling took place on the 22nd, and the poll was declared the next day. The numbers were—Mr. Sellar, 833; Mr. Seton Karr, 544; majority, 289.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MRS. M'CUCCLOCH OF DUMFRIES.—It is with deep regret that we record the decease of this most estimable lady who died at Hereford on the 4th ult. in her 71st year. She left Dumfries some time ago with her daughter and son-in-law—the latter being seriously indisposed—and it was on her way home, which, alas, she never reached, that she caught that chill which has had so fatal and grievous a termination. In her last moments she had the sedulous and affectionate care of her beloved daughter Mrs. M'Kinnel, and passed so peacefully away that the exact moment of her decease will never be known—the hour was about 10 a.m. Mrs. M'Cuclloch was of a noble Huguenot family who, like so many others, had to take refuge on our shores from the relentless persecutions to which they were subjected. The family finally settled down in Lancashire where her father, the late Samuel Lafone, Esq., was a Liverpool merchant. Her brothers have also acquired distinction in the commercial world. She was brought up in the Baptist Communion and was a most devout believer in the truths of Christianity. Nearly fifty years ago she was united in marriage to Dr. James Murray M'Cuclloch of Dumfries, a gentleman who has endeared himself to all true reformers in the south of Scotland. The union was exuberant in the tender affection and regard for each other manifest on the part of both husband and wife. She was a true yoke-fellow, and it is to her affectionate care and attention that, apart from his acknowledged skill, Dr. M'Cuclloch has been able to attain to that distinguished position in his profession which he holds to-day. In her own place she was remarkable for her kindness of disposition. She was easily accessible by the poor, the needy and distressed, and ready to lend assistance to any scheme "that had the reward of individual merit, the redress of individual misery, the overthrow of a great evil, or the furtherance of the public weal for its end and object." She strongly advocated the rights of women and has lived long enough to find that question entering upon its final phases. She was equally enthusiastic upon the question of temperance, and felt the liveliest interest in all that concerned the progress of the Scottish prohibitory movement. To all the natural graces of a high-born lady she added the great advantage of a wide and deep culture. At her own table it was a pleasure of no ordinary kind to listen to her discourse, and one felt in her presence the power of female influence in its loftiest phase. For solid wealth of thought clothed in the easy grace of a charming style, she was unexcelled, and all her stores were freely at the command of her friends. Her departure to the silent land leaves an aching void in her sorrowing husband's heart which time will never fill: the society and affection of his daughter, who is her mother's second self, must, we believe, greatly assuage his sore affliction, and he may rest assured that not only in Dumfries but wherever he or she is known, a very sincere and heartfelt sympathy is felt for them on the death of a lady so gifted, so loving, and so good as Mary Ellison Lafone M'Cuclloch. The following resolution was adopted by the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on the melancholy event,—“That this executive have learned with unfeigned regret of the decease of Mrs. M'Cuclloch, Dumfries, whose life was conspicuous for the highest domestic virtues, for tender sympathy with suffering and down-trodden humanity, for untiring efforts for the freedom and elevation of her own sex, for the amelioration of the lot of the poor, and for an unceasing solicitude for the progress and triumph of the temperance reformation: records their profound sorrow at her decease: offers their sincere and mournful condolences to Dr. M'Cuclloch and her bereaved family, on the irreparable loss which they have sustained by her death. That a copy of this resolution be sent to Dr. M'Cuclloch, and to his and her daughter, Mrs. M'Kinnel.” The funeral took place on Thursday, 10th ult. The remains of the deceased were followed to their last resting place by a large body of citizens, by their number and their demeanour testifying to the high regard and estimation in which the deceased was held. The churchyard, St. Mary's, was crowded by hundreds whose sad and tearful faces showed that they had lost a friend. The coffin was heaped with immortelles. Messrs. A. Bennet and R. Mackay specially represented the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on the melancholy occasion.

THE LATE MR. D. M. SIMPSON, GREENOCK.—We regret to record the death of this gentleman, who died at the comparatively early age of 44 years. He was early devoted to the temperance cause, and was among the first to join the Good Templar order, and was a devoted friend of prohibition. He was highly gratified with the last annual meeting of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and was, up till the spring of this year, full of hope in the expectation of again enjoying the pleasure of being present at our approaching annual gathering. But God has called him up higher to the enjoyments of that better land where sin and sorrow are unknown, and where there is nothing to hurt or destroy. He has left a mourning widow and three children, for whom much sympathy is felt in Greenock.—S.

THE LATE JAMES PATON, ESQ., J. P., TILlicOUNTRY.—After an illness extending over two years, this highly respected gentleman has gone the way of all living. He peacefully expired on Wednesday, 9th ult., in his 85th year. Born in Alloa, he went to Tillicoultry fifty-seven years ago, and with his brother commenced business as a firm which has, for its fabrics, become world famed: the enterprise of the firm brought to the village of Tillicoultry a very large measure of the prosperity it has enjoyed. The deceased gentleman took an active part in all schemes for the benefit and the advancement of the people. He was one of the Church's most munificent supporters—superintended a Sabbath School; maintained an energetic missionary; gifted a British Workman Public House to the village; and the Christian Fellowship Rooms has, for years, been maintained by him for the diffusion of religious truth. To the poor “he had a tear for pity, and a hand open as day for melting charity.” He was an esteemed vice-president of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which had his hearty sympathy and liberal support. He leaves a widow who was a faithful wife and loving helpmate, and found her highest pleasure in sharing his many labours for the good of his fellowmen. His remains were followed to the grave with every demonstration of respect and sorrow by the largest following ever witnessed in the village.

THE LATE WILLIAM MITCHELL, ESQ., J. P., MONTROSE.—Great gloom overspread this burgh when it became known that this much respected citizen had died somewhat suddenly at Dalnally, on the 18th ult., in his 66th year. He had, for the past few years, been in a declining state of health, and was on his way to Oban for its restoration. On the journey he took seriously ill, and lingering at the Dalnally Hotel for four days, there passed away. He was a native of Lasswade, but came to Montrose when young, where he has built himself a reputation for business qualities and commercial honour such as few of his fellow-citizens can boast. He entered the council in 1864, and became provost in 1872. Was first chairman of the School Board; member of the Harbour Board, Asylum Board; Director of the local railway, etc., etc. He was a most benevolent giver to local necessities, and was deeply and widely esteemed. He sympathised with the Scottish prohibitory movement, which enjoyed his liberal support. In religious activity he was untiring, and felt great happiness in assisting all efforts for the spread of pure and undefiled religion. His life was crowded with duties bravely done, and his memory will be long cherished by a community which knew and revered his worth.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Last month may fairly claim to be a memorable one in the history of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The twenty-fourth annual meetings of the Association were such a signal success. The position of the Association was never so satisfactory; in no year were the results of the agitation more abundant, its prospects more hopeful, nor its friends and supporters more satisfied as to its progress, more hopeful of its future. The attitude of the publicans must soon change. They used to smile superciliously at its attempts to arouse the public mind to the real nature of the business to which they cling, and by which they live, but they cannot avert the feelings of dismay. They see indications of triumph which no shrugs or sneers will dissipate, and such as no sensible man will despise. As one of the speakers said, they of all men can best testify to the growing power and the coming triumph of the resolute body of reformers who, by their sympathy, their devotion, and their liberality have made the Association the formidable prohibitory power which it so evidently is to-day.

The marked feature of the business meeting was the numerous attendance of ladies and gentlemen, whose demeanour was of that quiet business-like character which goes so far to impress the observer with a sense of their unwavering fidelity to principles and of their resolute determination to uphold and advance the great interests which have drawn them together. The blessing of the Almighty was reverently invoked, and then the business proceeded with celerity, unanimity, and despatch. The Annual Report dealt with the varied operations of the year briefly and clearly, and it is not possible to produce in all the past record of endeavour so much of successful effort as was crowded within its compass. The Treasurer's account showed the great elasticity of the funds, and the sound financial condition of the Association. We were glad to note that the Executive has been materially strengthened by the addition of new members, and that conferences are again to be the feature of what will doubtless be a busy year. The fourth resolution was significant of coming parliamentary action, and from the evident enthusiasm which attended its adoption, we augur that the Executive are entering upon what we cannot otherwise regard than as the decisive struggle of the agitation. The resolution on finance was heartily adopted, and we were glad to see that this matter was so frequently referred to throughout the day. Mr. John Williams deserves honourable mention for expressing his intention to raise his generous subscription of £25 to double that amount, and may be certain that his doing so will have the effect of stimulating other generous supporters to give more liberally, in order to bring heavier artillery into the field of conflict. We were glad to listen to the many kind words of appreciation spoken in favour of the Social Reformer. We are more than proud of them, and we shall at least endeavour to justify these kind expressions by our future conduct of the magazine. "Tis not in mortals to command success," but it is in our power to endeavour to deserve it. We rejoice at the whole proceedings of this meeting, and regard it as in every way the most satisfactory ever held during the existence of the Association.

The City Hall Saloon was in the afternoon filled by the most influential assemblage we have ever seen sit down to tea at the invitation of the Association. A glance at the platform recognised the presence of representatives of the Blue Ribbon Mission, the Women's Temperance Association, the Scottish Temperance League, the Irish Temperance League, the United Kingdom Alliance, and the Imperial Parliament. A glance at the large and influential gathering must have convinced every one present that on no previous occasion have they observed such a widespread representation of the movement as was then before them. The tea service was, as regards viands and service of supreme excellence. The chairman—the Provost of Grangemouth—was certainly the right man in the right place. The picture of most enjoyable health, with a reputation of most unwavering fidelity to the movement and the Association, whose efforts in the town whose destinies he guides are marked by earnestness and devotion; a better choice could not have been made, and his speech was eminently worthy of the man; it glowed with fervour, and deservedly merited the cheers by which it was so heartily greeted. The addresses were conspicuous for their excellence, and the cordial reception awarded to them. But time interposed, and many delegates were prevented from contributing to the great enjoyment of the afternoon.

The evening meeting was a thorough success. True, it lacked the great attraction of the previous annual meeting, but no one could mistake the impression the meeting conveyed of their warm sympathy and their glowing enthusiasm. As the chairman, Mr. Stewart, M.P., and the speakers filed on the platform, they were met with deafening cheers, again and again renewed. Quietness restored, and the proceedings constituted by a most appropriate prayer from Rev. Mr. Paton, the minister of St. Paul's, the chairman rose amid cordial cheers to address the meeting. What was wanting in his oratory was fully compensated for in his matter. His speech was most encouraging to those who consider the time come for a decisive parliamentary struggle. The Rev. Mr. M'Dermott, from Ireland, gave a speech that stirred the deeper sympathies of our nature, and was a great success. Mr. Meldon's speech was full of facts and arguments, and thoroughly enlisted the judgment of his delighted hearers. Dr. Cameron's reception was most enthusiastic, and deservedly so. When first he came before the citizens of Glasgow it was to challenge the strength of the Temperance party, and through him that party have gained a position they have ever since maintained. He has made several important amendments on the licensing law, and through him prohibition reigns triumphant over our Sunday steamers' liquor bars. These things were not forgotten, but appeared in the great cordiality of his reception. His speech was singularly able, upheld temperance truth, and clearly set forth the justice of our claims to a veto power which must be vested in the ratepayers. Rev. Mr. Gladstone soared to the loftiest heights of oratory. It is now fifteen years since he was invited by the Association to step to the front, and his career since that time as an orator has amply justified the Executive in their selection of the youthful minister at Sanquhar as one of their speakers at their annual meeting of 1867. On this occasion he fairly carried away his audience who applauded him to the very echo that doth applaud again. Mr. Brown, J.P., had not the opportunity he deserved, but the few words he did say were highly appreciated, and when he does again appear his position on the programme will be to his advantage. The worthy President of the Association exercised great judgment in seconding the last resolution without remark, as Mr. Wilson, J.P., had time to pay a most graceful compliment to the chairman and the speakers when moving the thanks of the meeting to them. We are again on the forward march, and we believe that these meetings have stimulated all who have attended them, and that the great space which the press has given to the reports of them has stimulated many more. The past, with its crowded record of effort, is pleasant to look back upon, but to our mind the future, teeming as it does with great possibilities, with hopeful prospects, with the growing certainty of coming triumph, is to our mind far better. Let all of us address ourselves earnestly and faithfully to the great patriotic work that lies before us and we shall, like the joyous reapers in the reforms of all ages, return rejoicing bringing the sheaves of triumph and blessing with us.

ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING.

THE twenty-fourth annual business meeting of this Association took place in the Christian Institute, Bothwell Street, Glasgow, on Tuesday, 26th ult. There was a very large attendance. James Hamilton, Esq., J.P., President of the Association, was called to the chair. He was supported by Ex-Provost Dick, Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., Messrs. John Williams, J.P., J. Winning, and R. Mackay. Present during the day we observed the following ladies and gentlemen:—

Provost Macpherson, Grangemouth; Bailie Selkirk, J.P., Glasgow; Bailie Colquhoun, Bothwell; Bailie Dickson, Glasgow; Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., Glasgow; Councillor Russell, Perth; James Hamilton, J.P., Glasgow; John Williams, J.P., Wishaw; Andw. Mackay, do.; David G. Findlay, do.; John M'Allister, Langbank; Peter Ferguson, Glasgow; Robert Risk, Paisley; James Semple, Glasgow; Robert Young, Pollokshaws; Robert Cross, Hamilton; Andrew F. Shanks, Barrhead; Mrs. J. Smith, Bothwell; Mrs. Jas. Rae, Falkirk; Mrs. Hill, Edinburgh; Mrs. Robertson, Paisley; Mrs. M'Adam, Edinburgh; Mrs. Williams, Wishaw; Mrs. Lossock; Peebles; Mrs. Adamson, Edinburgh; Mrs.

Ainslie, do.; Miss A. D. Hill, do.; Miss J. K. Hill, do.; Miss Robertson, Paisley; Miss Henderson, Edinburgh.

The Chairman called on Mr. Mackay to read the Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which was as follows:—

Your Executive have again the pleasing duty of submitting to you a rapid survey of the work and progress of the bye-past year. On no occasion have they felt more abundant satisfaction than they feel to-day. They were never more convinced of the soundness of their principles, and of the policy which they are doing what they can to get the country to believe, support, and finally adopt: nor have they ever entertained a more confident anticipation of success. All other proposals dealing with the liquor traffic enjoy equal opportunities of discussion to theirs, yet consideration in the case of these sooner or later proves them to be awaiting in the element which can alone offer a final settlement of the question we all have so much at heart. The people are rapidly coming to recognise that their hopes of permanent relief from the evils of the licensing system centre in your agitation, and your Executive believe that in the near future they will be found resolutely and earnestly co-operating with you at the polling booth in the return of men who will accept the duty of introducing or supporting a measure, enabling those localities who adopt it to abolish their natural enemy the Public House. There are increasing signs of progress in the ventilation of the subject of our national intemperance and its remedy in and out of Parliament, at church and evangelistic meetings and conferences, in the columns of the press, on the public platform, with an intensity of interest, and with such an appreciation of the important issues involved as confirms your Executive in their conviction that the movement has advanced far towards the stage of practical legislative recognition.

THE AGENCY.

They have pleasure in referring to the condition of the Agency, which was never so efficient as at the present time. On the staff there are at present Messrs. Bennet, Black, Blackwood, Dransfield, Kesson, Lossock, Stevenson, and Waterston: all of whom perform their arduous duties to your Executive's satisfaction. Mr. Waterston continues to superintend the Eastern district of your operations with singular ability. Mr. W. Blackwood has the Northern district under his care, and it bears ample testimony to his energetic superintendence. Mr. Stevenson now superintends the Western or Midland district, which has his careful and judicious supervision. His district up to May last was far too extended for such efficient superintendence as your Executive desired, and at last Annual Meeting they suggested the addition of another agent to the staff. This suggestion did not fall to the ground, for during the year they have been able to enter upon an arrangement with the friends in the three Southern counties, under which they have appointed Mr. Andrew Bennet to the post of Southern District Superintendent, with residence meantime in Dumfries. He entered upon his duties in May, and they have great cause for satisfaction already with this arrangement, for Mr. Bennet gives promise of being a faithful standard bearer of the movement in that part of Scotland. Mr. Stevenson will in future have Glasgow and the Midland counties under his care, and will be able to work these more effectively. Messrs. Lossock and Black devote themselves wholly to the treasurer's department, and more faithful and devoted financial agents it would be hard to find. Messrs. Dransfield and Kesson are partially engaged, and have earned for themselves a merited reputation as able and eloquent exponents and defenders of the principles and the policy of the Association. Mr. John Paton was placed at the disposal of your Executive from the Annual Meeting until 20th December last, and he will be at the disposal of your successors from 1st October to 16th or thereby of December. The Rev. Mr. Harding has been at your Executive's disposal a great part of the year, and they deem his services a great acquisition to the advocacy. It is due to your district superintendents to say of them that they are a hard working body of men. The collection of funds and the delivery of lectures are but a small portion of their very onerous duties. They have to see to the organisation of their districts, watch over municipal, Parliamentary, and bye-elections, see to the distribution of literature, and discharge these duties with great credit to themselves and benefit to the movement.

It may interest you to know your Agents' platform appearances during the year. Mr. Waterston, 275; Mr. Stevenson, 256; Mr. Blackwood, 234; Mr. Dransfield, 118; Mr. Bennet, 88; and Mr. Kessen, 48. Mr. Paton delivered 62 lectures, Rev. Samuel Harding 54, and Mr. Mackay, your Secretary, 101.

MEETINGS.

During the year your Executive have vigorously prosecuted the agitation with the Agencies and means at their disposal: being cheered by the conviction that the people are becoming increasingly sympathetic, and more deeply interested in their efforts. Were the means at your Executive's disposal augmented, the meetings might be multiplied to any extent. They are stirring the country to a thorough consideration of the licensing question, and the time is rapidly approaching when that system will appear to the people of this country, as it appears to you and your Executive, as a system which from its nature and operations must be entirely overthrown.

The meetings of the year were unusually varied. They consisted of Demonstrative, Alliance, outdoor, and conference meetings. The number held during the year was 1,148. Of these 672 were ordinary and 476 deputational. At them 1,904 addresses were delivered. These figures show a very large increase of meetings and addresses as compared with last year. These figures, however, give no adequate summation of the number of meetings held throughout Scotland at which the principles and policy of the Association are expounded and enforced. Temperance meetings in this part of the kingdom scarcely possess an iota of interest apart from the advocacy of the suppression of the liquor traffic by the veto of the ratepayers; and it gives your Executive pleasure to report that their efforts to create and direct an enlightened public opinion on the evils of the liquor traffic are gladly shared by the most steadfast friends of the temperance movement throughout the country. Whatever is proposed other or less than what you propose is merely put forth as an expedient to reduce the present virulence of the social disorder arising from the liquor traffic, and this is done with a frank admission that a permanent solution of the drink problem will only be found possible on the lines of the just and constitutional proposal of this Association.

Your last annual public meeting was densely crowded. The chair was filled on the occasion by Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., and the speakers included Sir W. Lawson, Bart., M.P.; Provost Macpherson, Grangemouth; Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; John Wilson, Esq., J.P.; Rev. Dr. Nicolson; Rev. R. J. Lynde; Rev. R. Wallace; and Mr. W. Noble. The proceedings were most enthusiastic, much of it being evoked by the chairman's promising to assist to introduce a bill into Parliament for Scotland. The next important gathering was held in Edinburgh in December, when T. R. Buchanan, Esq., one of the M.P.'s for the city, occupied the chair. The speakers on this occasion included Sir W. Lawson, Bart., M.P., Sheriff Guthrie Smith, Rev. Principal Cairns, Rev. Professor Blaikie, Revs. Drs. Adamson, Kay, and Gray, Revs. R. J. Lynde, and Young, John Wilson, Esq., J.P., and other gentlemen. This was looked upon as the most influential, important, and enthusiastic meeting ever held in Edinburgh on the temperance question; and its influence in advancing our objects in Edinburgh is not yet spent. The Jubilee public meeting in Paisley with Provost M'Kean in the chair, was addressed by Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., your representative, and the same evening an excellent meeting in the Christian Institute, Grangemouth, presided over by Provost Macpherson, was addressed by your deputation, Rev. S. Harding, John Steel, Esq., and Mr. Waterston. At Peebles a very enthusiastic meeting was addressed by your deputation, Rev. E. J. Boon, J. Coutts, Esq., S.S.C., Messrs. J. P. Lossock, Waterston and Mackay. An excellent meeting at Kirkcaldy deserves mention; it was presided over by Bailie Speedie and addressed by Rev. E. J. Boon, Messrs. Steel, Bennet, and Mackay. A splendid district social meeting at Lesmahagow was addressed by Ex-Provost Dick, your deputy, and also by Ex-Bailie Lewis and Rev. John M'Queen. A very interesting Gospel temperance meeting at Uddingston was addressed by Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., and Bailie Selkirk, J.P. At Brechin a large and enthusiastic Blue Ribbon meeting was addressed by Rev. S. Harding, and Messrs. Mackay and Stevenson; James Guthrie, Esq., J.P., one of your vice-presidents, occupying the chair. After a short interval another large and effective meeting there was addressed by Rev. E. J. Boon and Messrs. Mackay and Stevenson. A highly successful meeting took place in Greenock over which Provost Campbell presided, and was addressed by Ex-Bailie Torrens, Ex-Provost Dick, and leading local gentlemen. At Montrose a crowded meeting was held in the Guild Hall, which was addressed by Rev. E. J. Boon and Messrs. Stevenson and Mackay. At Hawick an excellent meeting was convened to hear addresses from your deputation, Rev. Dr. Adamson and Mr. Waterston; and at St. Andrews Rev. M. M'Gregor and Mr. Waterston as your deputation, addressed a highly successful meeting. A largely attended meeting was held in Rutherglen, which was addressed by Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., and Bailie Selkirk J.P., Sir W. Collins occupying the chair. A meeting, excellent in tone and attendance, was held in Dumfries, at which Dr. M'Culloch presided, the object of which was to welcome Mr. A. Bennet to Dumfries, as superintendent of the counties of Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, and Wigtown. Messrs. Winning and Mackay, along with Mr. Bennet, represented the Association, and quite a host of friends addressing the meeting heartily welcomed Mr. Bennet to this sphere of his labours. At Paisley, ex-Bailie Torrens addressed one of the Murphy Blue Ribbon audiences, of nearly three thousand persons. A very excellent Gospel temperance meeting was held at West Kilbride, the chairman being J. S. Napier, Esq., and the speakers Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., and Mr. J. Winning. Many other meetings deserve mention such as those of Renfrew, Barrhead, Hamilton, Irvine, Linlithgow, Galashiels, Maybole, Earlston, Whithorn, Kelso, Cupar, Anstruther, Dunse, Strathmiglo, Tillicoultry, Bo'ness, Inverness, &c., &c.

OPEN AIR MEETINGS.

The recent summer season was one of the most active in out-door work which your Executive have ever had, and at no stage of their operations do they believe that so much good has been done. Their advocates and agents have visited every town of importance from Lerwick in the far north to Annan on the borders, from Dunbar on the east to Campbellton on the west, and have everywhere been hailed as reformers with a thorough-going remedy for the dire evils flowing from the liquor traffic. They visited some places more than once, and your Executive have been greatly encouraged by their favourable reports. The only drawback to their gratification was the feeling that they could have prosecuted the season's campaign even more vigorously had they had means of defraying the expense. They hope, however, that by another year they may be able to enter upon the out-door advocacy of their question with augmented means and agencies. No mode yet devised of getting at the mass of the people excels these open-air gatherings, and none has helped your Executive more to gain the ear and the sympathy of the common people. A special feature of the year has been the number of series meetings. Edinburgh ranks first in this respect, open-air meetings being held on alternate weeks extending from June 19th to August 11th. The brunt of the speaking this year fell upon Mr. Waterston and the local friends. Your Executive had, however, the pleasure to secure Rev. Mr. Harding for a week. Greenock has had a series of meetings on alternate Mondays throughout the season besides a week's meetings from 31st July to August 5th. Interesting series took place in Stevenston, Saltcoats, and Ardrossan, from 31st July to August 4th, and were very successful indeed. A very excellent series was held in Aberdeen, remarkable for the co-operation manifest on the part of all the local organizations. In no locality does harmonious co-operation among the various sections of the movement prevail to the same extent as in Aberdeen. The series in Glasgow was more than ordinarily successful. Two meetings every evening for a week were held at various points, all your available open-air advocacy being engaged. The meetings in Dundee, Perth, and adjacent towns, were worked by a deputation, including Mr. James Scrymgeour (of Dundee), and Mr. Stevenson, with the happiest results. In Dumfries a most satisfactory series has taken place, Mr. Bennet being well supported by local friends, one of them (Miss Johnstone) deserving special mention for her zealous co-operation. Your Executive believe that in no former season have they derived more encouragement or satisfaction from their open-air meetings than in that now passed, all having largely contributed to that national enlightenment on the object of the Association which will one day be backed by the national executive power, and hurl the traffic into merited oblivion.

The open-air Sabbath meetings on Glasgow Green have been a great success this year. At first it looked as if they were to fail owing to having to be removed from where they have been held for the last fifty years to a different part of the Green. But in numbers, in interest, and in success they have proved as good as could have been expected, and your Executive hope that they will be allowed the use of their old position by another year. They are still under the genial, skilful, and popular conduct of Mr. R. Dransfield, who has been assisted by ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., Rev. Samuel Harding, Messrs. James Horn, R. Stevenson, J. H. Waterston, W. Blackwood, A. Bennet, R. Mackay, W. Hobkirk, W. Kesson, and other gentlemen. The services of these gentlemen have been most praiseworthy. Gospel temperance for more than fifty years has been the staple of the many heart-searching and soul-stirring addresses delivered at these meetings on summer Sabbath evenings, and many a one has had reason on earth to bless the efforts there put forth, and because of them many a soul is now rejoicing among the redeemed in heaven.

These various meetings have been of the greatest service to the agitation, attracting the notice and obtaining the aid of the leading friends in the localities in which they took place. Your Executive feel pleasure in acknowledging the valuable services at these meetings during the year of the following gentlemen:—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P.; P. M'Lagan, Esq., M.P.; Sheriff G. Smith; ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P.; John Wilson, Esq., J.P.; Rev. Principal Cairns, Rev. Professor Blaikie, Rev. Professor Kirk, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Rev. Dr. Stewart, Rev. William Barker, Rev. R. J. Lynde, Rev. John M'Queen, A.M., Rev. W. C. M'Dougal, Rev. M. Macgregor, Rev. E. J. Boon, Rev. A. Wilson, Rev. Samuel Harding, Rev. G. W. Tooley, Rev. J. Cooper, Rev. F. Binns, Rev. J. Strachan, Dr. Whitelaw, Dr. J. M. M'Culloch, Captain Brochie, Greenock; James H. Raper, Esq.; J. Coutts, Esq., S.S.C.; Messrs. W. Smith, A. S. Cook, D. Ramsay, John Butters, T. Robinson, Matt. Edwards, H. Hobkirk, J. W. Mackay, Miss Johnston, and many others. The following members of Executive have rendered valuable aid to the advocacy during the year:—Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; Bailie Selkirk, J.P.; ex-Provost Dick; Messrs. J. Winning, John Steel, R. M'Callum, and R. Mackay.

ALLIANCE DEPUTATIONS.

A series of interesting meetings, marked by uniform success, were those addressed by deputations from the United Kingdom Alliance. The first series began at Dumfries, where Dr. M'Culloch presided over an excellent meeting, which was addressed by Rev. W. Barker, Rector of West Cowes, now of Marylebone, London;

Messrs. Winning and Mackay. Next evening at Port-Glasgow, Robt. Duncan, Esq., presiding, the speakers were, Rev. W. Barker, Capt. Brochie, Messrs. Winning and Stevenson. Next evening at Perth, with Councillor Russel in the chair, the speakers were the Rev. Mr. Barker, ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., Bailie Selkirk, J. P., and Mr. R. Mackay. The last of this series was held at Portobello, where the meeting was under the presidency of John Telfor, Esq., and addresses were delivered by the Rev. Mr. Barker, Captain Brochie, and Messrs. Lossock and Waterston. These meetings were all excellent in tone and attendance, the audiences enthusiastic, and have had a marked effect upon the opinion of the respective localities in which they took place. In March your Executive had the pleasure of arranging for another series, Mr. J. H. Raper on this occasion representing the United Kingdom Alliance in his usual felicitous manner. The first of the series was held in Ayr, where Mr. Raper was supported by Bailie Selkirk, J.P., Messrs. Winning and Mackay. Major Oldham presided, and the proceedings were characterised by marked enthusiasm and success. The next meeting was at Aberdeen, James Paterson, Esq., presiding. Mr. Raper had the support of Wm. Smith, Esq., Brechin, Mr. R. Mackay, and local friends. This was a most important if not so well attended a meeting as is usually the case in Aberdeen, for it took a statesman-like view of Lord Colin Campbell's Bill. The last of the series was held at Stirling, Provost Anderson occupying the chair. The speakers included ex-Provost Dick, Messrs. Raper, and R. Mackay, as well as several staunch local friends, and a most successful meeting rewarded the labours of the local committee. With one exception both series of meetings were preceded by unexceptionally successful conferences, marked by a happy and profitable interchange of sentiment.

CONFERENCE MEETINGS.

Vigorously following up the recommendation of the last annual meeting, your Executive held a large number of conferences during the winter season. These conferences have afforded the most striking and encouraging signs of the progress of the year. The interchange of sentiment which took place was in the highest degree gratifying, and calculated to give an impetus to the movement in the localities visited, which will continue to exert itself long after the occasion which called it forth is forgotten. These conferences wherever practicable were followed by public meetings. They were held in Edinburgh, Renfrew, Barrhead, Hamilton, Irvine, Portobello, Paisley, Grangemouth, Linlithgow, Peebles, Galashiels, Maybole, Earlston, Whithorn, Kirkcaldy, Jedburgh, Kelso, Hawick, St. Andrews, Cupar, Denny, Montrose, Strathmiglo, Arbroath, Aberdeen, Bo'ness, Inverness, Dunse, Broxburn, &c., &c. It was exceedingly gratifying to your Executive to learn from their representatives at the various conferences that their own convictions were in so much accord with those of their friends throughout the country, and at the same time to know that whenever a farther advance in the direction of Parliamentary effort is deemed advisable that they would have the sustained support and co-operation of the friends whom they are so glad to find, approve so highly of these opportunities of meeting the representatives of the Association face to face. Your Executive will in the future gladly avail themselves as often as possible of this truly excellent means of strengthening and deepening the sentiments of mutual good-will on the part of the supporters of the Association and themselves.

There are other meetings which merit notice. Your Executive engaged Mr. R. Semple, of Paisley, to accompany Mr. Blackwood on a short tour in the northern district. The arrangements were carried out in a manner reflecting great credit on both. Mr. Semple proved a most indefatigable worker, and his advocacy was worthy of praise. A series of meetings took place at Irvine in the interests of blue-ribbonism, in which your advocates and agent took a prominent part. At Denny, where a persistent gospel temperance campaign has stirred the hearts of all in that town, your Executive has co-operated repeatedly with the workers by sending on speakers. At Hamilton, during the summer, your advocates and agents have responded to repeated invitations. Several visits to Port-Glasgow, Govan, Partick, and Pollokshaws have marked at once the desire of the friends to arrange meetings for your representatives, and at the same time the desire of your Executive to favourably entertain as far as lies in their power every application made to them for assistance.

Your Executive, having in view the injunctions of the U. P. Synod, the General Assemblies of the Church of Scotland and Free Church to ministers to preach a sermon in view of the Christmas and New Year festivities, resolved to invite the Rev. R. J. Lynde of Belfast to preach in Glasgow in December. Mr. Lynde heartily accepted the invitation, and delivered a most eloquent and impressive discourse to a large audience in St. George's Free Church from Isaiah xi. 9—"They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain."

DEPUTATION TO LORD ROSEBERY.

Your Executive, accompanied by leading friends from Glasgow, Edinburgh, and other Scottish towns, had an interview with the Right Hon. Lord Rosebery, in the Lord-Advocate's Chambers, Edinburgh, in October last. His lordship was attended by D. Crawford, Esq., secretary to the Lord-Advocate. Mr. John Wilson, J.P., Hillhead, introduced the business of the deputation by reading a statement to his lordship, embodying reasons why the Government should fulfil its promise, as regards Scotland at least, of vesting in the ratepayers the power of suppressing the liquor traffic by a majority of their number. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Adamson, Edinburgh; ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., Glasgow; and ex-Provost Dick, Glasgow. His lordship listened with evident interest and attention to the statement and also to the observations that followed. He expressed his great satisfaction at the manner in which the deputation had stated the case of the Association and the movement, and intimated that he would have pleasure in favourably representing the views so ably laid before him to the Government.

On the occasion of his lordship's visit to Greenock in December, the temperance reformers there asked his lordship to grant them an interview. To his lordship's regret, this was not possible. He agreed to the subsequent request that a statement should be laid before him. Mr. Stevenson's services were called in to get the statement duly signed, and in the course of a few days the able document had the signatures of Provost Campbell, ex-Provosts Morton and Lyle, Magistrates, Town Councillors, Police Commissioners, nearly all the ministers of the gospel, the leading gentlemen in town, and the President and the Committee of the Greenock Total Abstinence Society, as well as members of the Committee of the Cartdyke Total Abstinence Society. His lordship received the document with pleasure, and intimated his intention to give it his most careful consideration.

LITERATURE.

During the past year an increased issue of temperance and prohibitory literature on all phases of the question has taken place. The production of temperance literature in this country has become an industry of magnitude. The general press is now a great channel for the communication of information on all that concerns the temperance reformation, and leading articles on arguments or opinions adduced by its advocates are of everyday occurrence. The agitation cannot yet congratulate itself on having wholly won over the press to its side, but its friends are bound to feel pleasure in seeing to what an extent the public press really serves the movement.

The movement continues to derive great assistance from The Alliance News, The Temperance Record, The Church of England Temperance Chronicle, The Christian News, The Scottish Temperance League Journal, Irish Temperance League Journal, Irish Temperance Banner, and British Temperance Advocate, which, in their several ways and spheres, render invaluable service to the movement. The Social Reformer continues to meet with increasing appreciation. At last annual meeting some excellent suggestions for its better circulation were thrown out, and as the result its circulation this year has been the largest it has yet enjoyed. The editor has been fortunate in meeting with a number of co-workers who have materially contributed to the approval with which it has been received. While your Executive cannot but be gratified at this, their convictions are deepening regarding the fact that the agitation is fast outgrowing the usefulness of The Social Reformer. Published only once a month it is unable to do justice to the extended operations and the weekly progress of the movement in Scotland. Were the friends of the Association to resolve on publishing it week by week instead of monthly, as at present, they would find it become one of the most efficient of their agencies; a fearless exponent and a dauntless defender at all times of their principles and policy. Your Executive leave this matter in your hands to determine, and they hope that you may be guided to do what is for the best interests of the cause. Were they once assured of your support, a weekly organ worthy of the Association, reflecting week by week the progress of the movement, would soon be found among the favourite journals of the day.

During the year your Executive have issued a series of leaflets to the extent of a quarter of a million copies, and have found them of the greatest service in the spread of brief, incisive, and interesting information on the varied aspects of the question. Were their merits more fully known their circulation would be ten-fold greater than it is. Your committee are gratified at the success these tiny messengers have met with, and they will continue to supply the demand for them as it may arise.

The New Year tract for 1882 was entitled National Poverty, and was the production of the Rev. Professor Kirk, Edinburgh. It had a larger circulation than any of these tracts for years, owing to the acknowledged merit and deserved fame of the writer. The tract for 1883 will, it is hoped, be equally excellent and meet with equal appreciation.

KINDRED ORGANIZATIONS.

Your Executive have uniformly had the pleasure to report that they are on terms of cordiality with all kindred Associations, and this year is no exception to the rule.

Their relations with the United Kingdom Alliance continue of the most cordial character, and they expect to have the pleasure of welcoming to-day Mr. Whitworth, M.P., and Mr. J. H. Eaper as the representatives of that powerful national organization. Ex-Provost Dick, Mr. J. Nisbet, and your Secretary represented this Association at their annual meetings in October last, and were of the opinion that these meetings conclusively showed that time was on the side of the "Grand" Alliance.

Ex-Provost Dick and Rev. John M'Queen, A.M., Kilmarnock, represented your Association at the annual meetings of the Irish Temperance League in April last, and on their return reported that nothing could exceed the power and influence which the League wielded in Ireland. You will be glad to know that the Rev. J. M'Dermott, M.A., represents the League at your meetings to-day.

Ex-Bailie Torrens and John Forrester, Esq., represented this Association at the breakfast party of the Scottish Temperance League, and to-day that national institution is to be represented at your annual social meeting by Messrs. A. M'Dougall and David Fortune.

Councillor Campbell of Perth, one of your esteemed vice-presidents, was your representative at the Grand sessions of the Independent Order of Good Templars, Scotland at Dundee, and has stated that the proceedings at that gathering afforded reason for the heartiest congratulation. The Rev. Geo. Gladstone represents that Order here to-day.

It is within your remembrance that your Executive have had a great many conference meetings with the Directors of the Scottish Temperance League and the I.O.G.T. Executive, and your Executive cherished the hope that these might yet lead to cordial unanimity of action. On the principle that the ratepayers should have a direct veto on the liquor traffic there was no difference whatever, but while your Executive insisted that the yea or nay of the poll should determine the issue between the ratepayers and the drink interest, the Scottish Temperance League was no less firm in declaring that the matter should be determined by plebiscite, admitting a three-fold choice on the part of the voter—1st to put down all traffic; 2nd, to put down part of it; and 3rd, to oppose all new licenses. The Good Templar Executive, on the other hand, expressed a decided preference for Local Licensing Boards, specially elected for the purpose of dealing solely with the traffic. When on the 11th October last, a conference was summoned for the consideration of these last methods, your Executive respectfully expressed its resolution to withdraw from these conferences, as it could not entertain either of the proposals to be then submitted. There and then the parting took place, but it was accompanied by such expressions of mutual goodwill as removed all elements of dissatisfaction, and your Executive are hopeful that they will secure from both organizations most hearty co-operation whenever they may be in a position to require it.

Your Executive are glad to have to report that the British Women's Temperance Association is to-day represented at your social party by Mrs. Helen Kirk, Miss Robertson, and Miss Grieve, and they hope that in the time to come they will find this Association among their strongest allies.

The Executive anticipate a representation from every leading organization in Scotland at one or other of the meetings to-day—a proof, in their opinion, how thoroughly all sections of the temperance movement share with them the conviction that the liquor traffic should be suppressed by the veto of the ratepayers.

THE CHURCHES.

One of the most cheering indications of the progress being made on all the lines of the temperance movement in Scotland is to be found in the rapidly changing attitude of the churches of Scotland towards intemperance and the liquor traffic. These are being brought face to face with the evils of intemperance in a manner hitherto unknown. The use of strong drink has always been gross in its nature, and dreadful in its consequences, but the Church, like the world, looked upon alcoholic liquor as a good thing liable to be abused unless men were endowed with sufficient restraining grace. This state of matters no longer exists. The Church is arousing itself, and now the question never can rest until the legalised facilities to intemperance have been excluded from society. In the U. P. Synod a most important discussion took place on the occasion of the committee on temperance presenting their report. The report referred to the Blue Ribbon movement, to the formation of Bands of Hope, to the committee's deputation to Lord Rosebery on Local Option; and it was agreed by the Synod that the committee petition for the earlier closing of public houses, and for control over the liquor traffic by ratepayers. The Rev. Dr. Blair initiated a debate on the discouragement of all social drinking usages in which the leading members of the Synod took part, and a motion by the Rev. Principal Cairns was ultimately carried. The motion was in the following terms:—"That the Synod discourage all public drinking usages, and recommend the membership of the Church sincerely and earnestly to consider how far it might be their duty to discontinue the personal use of intoxicating liquors." Your committee hail this result; as whenever ministers find that alcoholic liquors are not useful they will be easier induced to throw their influence and their efforts into the scale against the whole drink system. The Assembly of the Free Church met at Edinburgh on the 18th May. The Report on Religion and Morals declared that discipline was exercised principally for immorality and drunkenness. The conference on temperance lasted two hours. Rev. Jas. Scott stated that 6,000 persons had been pledged through the efforts of the Evangelistic Association in one year in Glasgow. Mr. Moody's Glasgow Mizpah Band meetings were referred to. Hundreds of drunkards had been converted to Christ. At this conference, Mr. Moody gave a remarkable speech in course of which he frankly confessed that he had not given the subject of Bible temperance sufficient attention. He thought that the Church of God should look at this question. "Had not the time come when the ministers should be putting the drink away? What were they going to do with those men who were drinking; for if they did not stretch out a hand to them they would lapse and become worse than ever? Could they honestly advise a man to go to any church, the pulpit of which was filled by a moderate drinker? He believed that if the Church of God arose at this present time and reached out a helping hand to those struggling to be free, it would be the grandest day that Scotland had ever seen." The committee's report on temperance directed attention to the combined U.P. and F.C. deputation to Lord Rosebery on Local Option, and that 16 Presbyteries and 2 Synods had petitioned in favour of a Local Option measure for Scotland. The declaration in favour of licensing boards had been largely signed by ministers and others in the Church. The report referred to the Gospel Temperance and Blue Ribbon missions in favourable terms. Several presbyteries had petitioned in favour of Dr. Cameron's Passenger Vessel Licenses (Scotland) Bill; and looked upon Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Bill as unworkable. The report concluded by recommending a special conference on Local Option and Gospel Temperance, and that the Assembly again petition in favour of Local Option. Mr. Guthrie, J.P., moved the deliverance of the Assembly, "thanking the committee for their labours, renewing the injunction to preach a temperance sermon on third Sabbath of December, rejoicing in the encouraging statements of the report, exhorting ministers and office-bearers to show sympathy with the movements promoted by Messrs. Moody and Murphy and use these for the restoration of the fallen, expressing their sympathy with the declaration of the Glasgow Conference, instructing the committee to take all steps to further the objects of the declaration and to petition in favour of a Local Option measure for Scotland." After quite a cloud of witnesses in favour of total abstinence and prohibition had spoken, the deliverance became the deliverance of the Assembly. During its sittings, the Assembly had to depose the Rev. W. J. Thomson, of Glasgow, for intoxication, and to refuse meantime to repon the Rev. A. C. Kay, who, for the same offence, had been deposed from the ministry. His case was, however, left to the Commission with powers.

The venerable Assembly of the Established Church met at Edinburgh on the 25th May; and on the 3rd June the committee on temperance gave in their report which stated that much good work had been effected during the year. The moral agencies at the disposal of the Church had been energetic and progressive. The most popular of them all were Bands of Hope. The references to the Licensing Law were made in more sombre language. The committee expressed the hope, 1st, that the magistrates should be more strict in granting licenses; 2nd, that chief constables should make a systematic report of persons seen leaving public houses in an intoxicated condition; 3rd, that more strict and careful enforcement of the law relating to transfers should be attended to. The committee stated 1st, that they would like to see the public houses earlier closed because there is more drunkenness produced after ten o'clock, and on Saturdays they might be closed earlier than ten o'clock p.m.; 2nd, roadside inns should be reduced to taverns, so that the bona fide traveller might be abolished; 3rd, that a radical change in the law should be made as regards grocers' licenses; 4th, the age at which boys and girls can get liquor should be raised. The committee after pointing out the measures then before Parliament—Free Licensing, Permissive Bill, Gothenburg system, the Chamberlain system, and Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Bill—say that this fact shows that the next bill which passes into law will give effect to a restrictive policy. Mr. Cuthbertson, of Glasgow, moved the following as the deliverance of the Assembly—"The Assembly approve of the report, reappoint the committee, with Rev. G. Wilson convener. The Assembly deploring the intemperance prevailing in Scotland, and recognising it as one of the greatest hindrances to the prosperity of the Church and the welfare of the country, strongly recommends all members of the Church to give earnest attention to this important subject, and to promote by personal example and every lawful effort the observance of temperance throughout the Church, and to instruct the committee to promote wherever practicable organisation with a total abstinence and general section, and to further the formation of juvenile branches that the Church may be united in her strength against the evils of drunkenness. The Assembly learn with satisfaction that a Church of Scotland Ladies' Temperance Association has been formed, and warmly commend it to the sympathy and support of the women throughout the Church. The Assembly commend to the consideration of the inferior courts of the Church the statement in the report concerning the statutes regulating the liquor traffic with the suggestions thereanent. The Assembly believing that much good would result from the reduction in the number of licensed houses, and the earlier closing of public houses, would hail with satisfaction legislation in this direction, and instruct the committee to watch over any measure coming before the legislature that affects the interests of the Church. The Assembly recommend ministers frequently to direct and exhort their congregations from the pulpit on the subject of intemperance, and specially to do this on Sunday, 17th December next." After a very animated discussion in which those holding advanced views on temperance and prohibition had by far the best of it, the deliverance proposed became the deliverance of the Assembly. It is matter for thankfulness that the Assembly manifests undoubted progress in the direction of prohibition.

The Evangelical Union, the Congregational Union, the Baptist Union, and other religious bodies, have during the year given earnest heed to the important subject of temperance, and have more or less shown a growing sympathy in favour of a legislative recognition of the principles for which your Association contends. It will be a great day for the country we love so well when the Churches of Scotland, "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners," in one united phalanx march forth bent on the removal of the licensing system.

PARLIAMENT IN SESSION.

Your Executive for the first time find themselves called upon to report on their tenure of office during an adjournment of the Parliamentary session, and not as usual during its recess. So far as the session has gone, it has been one of the most disappointing to temperance reformers. It had been thought that as the Government had given almost entirely two former sessions to the consideration of Irish questions, this one would be marked by the transaction of business in which Great Britain was chiefly and deeply interested; but the Parliamentary sky was soon overcast and a session passed on to adjournment with the most barren result conceivable as regards British domestic legislation.

Under such discouraging circumstances liquor traffic abolitionists did not lose heart, but manfully endeavoured in the face of singular vicissitudes, party wranglings, and unparalleled obstruction, to secure for their ardently desired measure full legislative recognition.

The House met on the 7th February. In the Queen's Speech there was no reference to the licensing question. A very large number of notices of questions and bills relating indirectly or directly to liquor legislation were given notice of on the opening day. Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice of a question asking if the Government contemplated any alteration in the licensing laws; Mr. Pease of another on the opium traffic; then Mr. Warton gave notice of a bill to amend the Sunday Closing near there were ominous head-shakings and grave doubts, freely expressed, of Sir Wilfrid being able to move his resolution. So long as Sir Wilfrid continued hopeful your Deputation put forth their energies on his behalf. When the House met it was evident that hope was crushed, the publican sympathisers lending their aid to the party of obstruction. The Arrears Bill dragged its slow, wearisome progress over the precious hours on which Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his supporters should have been discussing and dividing on the principle of efficient local option. The feeling of disappointment at the moment was very great, but as all on the side of the resolution had done their duty by it the feeling soon subsided. Your Deputation had many an interesting interview with the representatives waited upon, and believe that the time has come when a determined struggle for special liquor legislation for Scotland might be entered upon with some hopes of progress. They are not insensible to the difficulties that surround such an attempt—Parliament utterly unable to control itself: a Government unwilling to burn the boats or cut down the bridges that are supposed to attach it to the liquor interest: an almost omnipotent Premier who has loaded the liquor traffic with taxation, and cannot at present devise other means for yielding equal revenue, and who went in wholly unpledged on this matter: an Opposition many of whom glory in the harmonious relations existing between it and "the trade," over whose banquets they have a fondness for presiding. But all these difficulties must yield to the fiat of the sovereign people, and it is on them that the leaders of the movement rely. With a restricted franchise unexampled progress has been made in Scotland. When that franchise includes the enfranchised classes in the counties, the supporters of your principles will be largely reinforced. It has been pointed out that there are only 60 Scotch Members, and that any bill for Scotland will have the combined vote of the publican interest of England against it, which would be overwhelming. To that there is but one reply: in that case it will be for Scotland to say whether she means to maintain her local self-government, or whether she is indifferent on the subject. Your Executive cannot and will not believe that if her representatives show an almost unbroken unanimity in favour of her ratepayers having the power to remove the liquor traffic, that she will tamely submit to the dictation of the English Members when they say "her ratepayers shall not." Such an objection, formidable though it appears, will not deter them from using every legitimate effort in their power to enlist the sympathy of the constituencies and their representatives in favour of such desirable justice to Scotland, and it will be for you and all who yearn for deliverance from the direful results of the liquor traffic to determine how near or how far the time is when such justice to Scotland shall be meted out through the Imperial Parliament entrusting Scottish ratepayers with a veto over the liquor traffic of their respective localities.

Whatever has taken place in Parliament bearing in any way on liquor legislation has been so fully recorded in the Social Reformer that it is unnecessary to encumber the report with details. Your Committee, however, cannot exempt from consideration two measures for Scotland, the one Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Acts Amendment Bill, and the other Dr. Cameron's Passenger Steamers' Licenses (Scotland) Bill. At the last Annual Public Meeting of the Association his Lordship said "if after consultation with other members of Parliament it may seem wise and expedient—it may seem wise to take a separate line of action for Scotland, I shall be glad indeed, and I should esteem it a great honour to put my name on the back of a bill which should give the people of Scotland that for which they have pronounced in the most unmistakable terms." Your Executive were favoured by hearing the Bill in draft read, and saw in the twentieth clause an important concession to their demand, fettered, however, by a proviso which they believed might be easily got rid of in Committee. They were then fully prepared to recommend their friends everywhere to support that clause. When the Bill appeared they found that a double proviso had been added to the clause, as if the noble author of the Bill himself believed that everywhere the bill when passed into law would be adopted, and that the interests of the minority demanded that special provision should be made for their indulgence. Your Executive, after earnest consideration of the Bill, gave their deliverance as follows:—

"The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have carefully considered the provisions of the Licensing Acts (Scotland) Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., and while regarding it as an honest and earnest attempt to deal with the evils of the licensing system in Scotland, and believing that certain of its provisions would undoubtedly abate some of these evils, yet feel called upon to express their deep regret that the bill not only fails adequately to recognise the right of the ratepayers in their several districts to prevent by a direct and full veto public-houses being forced upon them or continued in their midst against their will, but provides for compensation to landlord and tenant, for the sale of licenses, for the granting of a ten years' lease, and generally for the continuance, under certain given conditions, of a system that is essentially mischievous in its nature and operations."

The bill was not acceptable to any section of the movement in Scotland, and indeed did not secure the approval of any class of social reformers. Lord Colin Campbell, by attempting too great changes in the licensing laws, making unwarrantable concessions to the drink interest, and at the same time shrinking from the only course which will yield success, leading the advanced prohibitory sentiment of Scotland in Parliament, has unfortunately done nothing to redress the grievances inflicted by the liquor traffic on our suffering country. His lordship has not altogether failed, however; he has showed that the great bulk of the people view with chilling apathy merely palliative schemes, and your Executive regret that all the trouble his lordship has taken and the undoubted genius he has shown, should have been rendered abortive through his lordship's belief in a phantom—the rights of the minority. Had he been as eager in favour of the rights of the suffering majority as of the imbibing and interested minority, the movement might have been, under the shadow of his illustrious name, reaching forward to a great and decisive victory over the liquor traffic.

Dr. Cameron introduced his Passenger Licenses Bill during the session. The Right Hon. the Lord-Advocate, however, took it in hand, and carried it through all its stages in the Commons, and the Earl of Rosebery did the same office for it in the House of Lords; and on the 18th August the Royal assent was given to the bill, which is now law. It is too early yet to ascertain its effect on the evils against which it is directed, but Dr. Cameron is to be congratulated on getting another slice of prohibitory legislation for the country.

A very large number of interesting questions relative to the malt tax question were put and answered during the session. It appears that after all, the disinclination to repeal the tax was to prevent the lowering of the price of barley and the use of other than bere, bigg, and barley in the manufacture of beer. The reduction of the duty on sugar facilitated the use of sugar and molasses in the manufacture of liquor, and now the repeal of the malt tax has induced brewers to produce beer from maize, rice, and other substances. Beer, the hypothetical poor man's strengthener, is no longer juice of malt, but a fermented compound which produces more bodily diseases than has ever been laid to the account of malt liquors.

The question of intemperance in the army and navy has been often brought under the notice of the House by Mr. Caine, M.P. Notwithstanding that much reform on this matter has taken place much more is required, and we believe that great good to soldier, sailor, and marine, will follow the consideration on the subject which has been forced upon "the House."

The Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act has not been improved as had been expected by the repeal of the exemptory clauses which would have put Dublin, Waterford, Limerick, Cork and Belfast, under Sunday closing. The Act is continued, and by another year we may hope for the fuller measure for Sunday closing to take effect, for which Ireland is willing and ready.

The Sunday Closing (Cornwall) Bill passed its second reading, and it may, it is to be hoped, be passed before Parliament separates for the recess.

BYE-ELECTIONS.

There has only been one bye-election in Scotland since your Executive submitted their last annual report. Sir David Wedderburn, Bart., M.P. for the Haddington Burghs somewhat suddenly resigned his seat owing to ill-health, which your Executive regret has had a fatal termination. Sir David Wedderburn, all the time he sat in Parliament, was a firm supporter of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and heartily supported the Permissive Bill at a time when few ventured to do so. He presided at one of the annual public meetings of this Association. Immediately on his resignation Mr. A. C. Sellar entered the field in the Liberal interest. He was at once chosen by the Liberal party of the Burghs as their champion, but a few days before the election he was opposed in the Conservative interest by Mr. Seton-Karr. Mr. Sellar looked upon the question of permissive prohibition as quite a subordinate matter until your district superintendent, Mr. Waterston, brought him face to face with its friends in all the burghs. The result was that he promised to vote for a suppressive veto over the liquor traffic. Mr. Seton-Karr found it necessary also from his knowledge of the sentiments of the electors to promise that he would vote for the Local Option resolution which the House of Commons have twice affirmed, but he would reserve power to amend details in committee. The friends, after a careful consideration of the claims of both candidates, unhesitatingly gave their votes and influence to Mr. A. C. Sellar, who is now member of Parliament, by the large majority of 289; the numbers being—Mr. Craig Sellar, 833, Mr. Seton-Karr, 544. This leaves the Scotch voting for permissive prohibition unchanged, but the contest affords additional evidence that no candidate need bring his claim before any Scottish burgh constituency with hopes of success unless he is sound upon the policy of a suppressive veto over the liquor traffic to be applied by the ratepayers.

GENERAL PROGRESS.

Scotland has been stirred to enthusiasm by Americans, one promoting the Blue Ribbon Mission and the other gospel temperance. Mr. Francis Murphy entered upon a lengthened campaign in Scotland at Forfar, which enthusiastically responded to the call to don the blue ribbon, Dundee followed, then came the other northern towns, Arbroath, Brechin, Perth, followed by Aberdeen, and then Paisley, Stirling, &c. In many places the mission went on although never visited by Mr. Murphy. One cheering fact deserves mention. In previous "revivals" the surest way to create interest was to deprecate prohibition, but to-day the most actively engaged in this phase of the agitation believe most firmly in the necessity and urgency of suppression. At Dundee on the 24th January, an all-day conference of the friends of this agitation took place. Provost Moncur, Dundee, presided. On the motion of Mr. A. S. Cook, Aberdeen, the following resolution was adopted:—"As the liquor traffic ostensibly exists for the public convenience, this conference believes that the time has now come when power should be given to the people to veto the traffic when and where they are disposed." It was supported by Rev. Dr. Adamson, Edinburgh, your representative, and was adopted by the entire conference rising to their feet. A signal proof of the feeling on the motion which actuated the assemblage.

The gospel temperance mission, believing that a person who drinks will when converted lose all desire or appetite for strong liquors, does not put much faith in the power of the law. However much this may be regretted—because there is really no antagonism between gospel temperance, truly so called, and prohibition—your Executive have availed themselves of every opportunity to assist this movement, and to correct the views of those who lightly esteem the power of law to serve the gospel, by abolishing its greatest outward obstacle.

The School Board elections this year resulted in the return of almost all the steadfast friends of temperance and prohibition, and in the election of others, so that the number of members favouring temperance on these boards has slightly increased.

Canon Wilberforce lately startled the temperance world by the publication of a letter which he addressed to His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. In it he drew attention to the conduct of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in letting and feuing so much of the Church lands under their care to the makers and sellers of intoxicating liquors. He asks His Grace either to deny the existence of a state of things which might properly be termed scandalous, or if he cannot do that, to put an end to them at once. The rev. Canon says proudly that he will not allow the Church property under his care to be put to any such use, and so soon as leases fall in in the property feued, they will not be used by the liquor traffickers on any pretence whatever. We shall hear more of this, and hope that the Church may shake herself entirely free from any commercial connection with the modern Belial.

Mr. Gladstone, in his Budget speech, accounted for the decrease of revenue from the liquor traffic by attributing it to growing habits of sobriety among the people, and their growing habit of saving. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue in their latest report confirmed this statement. They say, "this deficiency [in the revenue from liquor] may be accounted for in several ways, but principally, we think, by the improved habits of the people. Temperance principles seem to be influencing certain classes of the population largely, the past year having been apparently one of unusual progress in this direction." Who would have dreamed of finding Government among the crowd of witnesses testifying on behalf of the temperance reformation?

The British Privy Council have in a remarkably able document affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada sustaining the legality of the Canada Temperance Act. The grounds of the judgment of the Privy Council is that the law is a law promoting the peace, good order, and good government of Canada; that it only affects property so far as such interests as the public order and safety demand; that laws like the Scott Act belong to the class of public wrongs rather than civil rights. With regard to the optional powers of the Act the Council declares that the Act is intended to promote temperance by means of a uniform law throughout the Dominion—the fact is, the law is general, and although local in its application, the mode of applying it does not alter its character. This most important judgment is of great importance to everyone in this country as giving the legal bearings of the legislation which Associations like yours aim to secure.

DEPARTED FRIENDS.

Since you assembled here your Executive have had to deplore the decease of many warm friends of the movement. In no year have so many passed on to the land of silence. Many of them were the steadfast, unwavering friends of the Association from its beginning, and recognised that the principles for which it has so strenuously contended were eminently constitutional, reasonable, and just. By his retiral from Parliament and his early death, the movement has lost in Sir David Wedderburn one of the best of friends and supporters. The decease of Mr. Duncan Smith marks a real loss to the movement; he laboured so persistently in the distribution of literature, and his cheerful encouragement was at all times highly valued. Mr. John Buchanan, of Dumbuck, was an ardent supporter of the cause, and an unwavering believer in the crowning success of your agitation. Another vice-president, Mr. James Paton, J.P., of Lethangie, has passed away. While he lived, he gave a generous support to the agitation. Mr. Edward Howat, of Dundee, was one of your warmest and most generous friends. He held office in your Executive till he left Glasgow, and was a vice-president up to the time of his death. He was a most zealous supporter of the Association, and through his efforts many have become attached to the movement. Mr. Robert Adams, of Aberdeen, an honorary director, is no more to be numbered among your co-workers, but while he lived he was true to the core, and was one of four to whom the prohibitory movement in Aberdeen stands deeply indebted. Mr. Wm. Clark, of Aberdeen, a vice-president, has also passed away. He rendered great service to your Association both in the press and on the platform. Honourable and mournful mention may be made of Mr. James Walls, Kirkwall; Mr. Lockhart Dobbie, J.P., Rothesay; Bailie Cuthbertson, Renfrew; Councillor Brown, Glasgow; Provost Mitchell, Montrose; Messrs. George Arthur, Forfar; James Newbigging, Dunse; James Morrison, Bo'ness; Andrew Steven, Bothwell; G. M'Farlane, Glasgow; R. Lorimer, Dundee; Thos. Ivory, Edinburgh; D. M. Simpson, Greenock; and Ex-Bailie Eaglesham, Paisley. Among those departed, your Executive regret to have to number Rev. D. Croom, Edinburgh, a helpful and attached friend; Rev. J. Robertson, Gatehouse; Rev. D. Cooper, Burntisland; Rev. Dr. Robertson, Edinburgh; Rev. J. M'Dermid, Glasgow; Rev. D. Mitchell, Bridge-of-Allan; and Rev. G. Kerr, Glasgow. They have also been called upon to mourn the departure of Mrs. M'ulloch, a lady who was one of the most truly devoted friends the Association or the movement ever had. Mrs. Williamson, Anstruther; Mrs. Dougall, Ratho; Miss A. Mitchell, Montrose; Miss Salmond, of Kirkcaldy, and very many more. All these have obtained a good report, having contributed in various degrees but with unanimity of will to the onward progress of the agitation. They have, by their ready co-operation, their liberality, and steadfastness, inspired the energies, renewed the hopes, and sustained the efforts of those immediately entrusted with the conduct of the movement, and it is for those that remain a little longer than they on the stage of time to emulate their intelligence, their active efforts, and their generous aid to the good cause.

THE FUNDS.

The funds claim special attention, for upon them the power and capacity of the agitation essentially depend. Your Executive may propose; it is the members and subscribers who dispose. Your Executive have had to forego many plans and lose many opportunities for promoting the interests of the Association, simply on the ground that they had no funds with which to carry out the one or avail themselves of the other. They cherish a deep sense of the confidence you repose in them as measured by the resources you from time to time place at their disposal. Hitherto these have been sufficient for the work they have overtaken, but they are not so for any extraordinary work of an electoral or Parliamentary nature, such as must arise from the substantial and natural progress of the agitation. They are glad to have to report a considerable increase in the number of subscribers. There is one most cheering fact connected therewith. They found, on a recent examination of their subscription list, that there are thereon 850 ministers of the gospel in Scotland who subscribe to the funds. It may interest you to know the denominational proportions of this grand total. Of the Free Church there are 308, of the U.P. Church 222, of the Established Church 125, the Evangelical Unionists 56, the Congregationalists 41, the Baptists 20, the Methodists 16, the Episcopalians 10, the Original Secessionists 8, the Roman Catholics 4, the Independents 2; while of those not in charges, or whose denomination is unknown, there are 36. Your Executive expect that next year this number may exceed a thousand. There have been no special efforts made to enlist these influential citizens, and your Executive view such a large and growing accession as a signal proof of the progress your question is making in the Church. In the immediate future that progress will be greatly accelerated by the powerful impetus which these welcome adherents will exert in favour of the objects and operations of your Association. The income also shows an increase, the amount received, exclusive of balance, being £2,196 7s. 9½d., an increase of £124 12s. 8½d. over last year; but any increase has been nearly absorbed by the expenditure entailed on the funds through the numerous conferences which, on your instruction, have been held throughout the country during the year. The amount expended during the year is £2192 11s. 9½d, leaving a balance over slightly larger than that of the last two years.

During the year two most important bequests have been received. Miss Nicol of Blairgowrie paid into your funds, in memory of her father and brothers, the sum of £40 stg., a most handsome recognition of the usefulness of the Association, and a merited and affectionate tribute to her father and brothers, who were in their lifetime among the most steadfast friends of the movement. The second was a like sum paid in by your respected treasurer, Mr. Wm. Smith, on behalf of the executors of the late Duncan Smith, Esq., one of your vice-presidents. Your Executive had in the late Mr. Smith a warm and steadfast friend and one who was a most generous distributor of the literature of the movement. Your Executive earnestly recommend the example of Miss Nicol and the executors of the late Mr. Smith to all their friends.

Your Executive were so encouraged by the generous response to their letter last year, asking the friends to indicate the extent to which your Executive might rely on their support during the coming year, that they have ventured to issue another letter of the same import. Already they are happy to be able to state that the response is equally gratifying, so that their successors will be able to enter upon their labours with a knowledge of the probable extent and scale on which they may plan and carry out the duties entrusted to their discharge.

Still, in view of the parliamentary and electoral work of the year, they feel that a very urgent appeal will have to be made to their friends for resources adequate to such arduous and costly work. It is very discouraging to have, in emergencies, to enter upon the question of finance, or to feel how much more might be attained if there were a special fund available for such extraordinary demands. Some years ago your Executive induced the friends to place special funds at their disposal, and the result of their generous liberality was seen in the electoral efforts of the Association, whose fruits at the general election were so manifold and so gratifying. Many friends have not yet given this important matter their serious consideration, but it is to the honour of numerous others that, so far from being satisfied with what they give, they have intimated their resolve to increase their generous contributions. Your Executive need not add one word as to what would be the effect on the public mind or on the leaders of the agitation, were all its supporters to be actuated by such generous and praiseworthy sentiments. The agitation would proceed by leaps and bounds.

CONCLUSION.

In bringing their report to a conclusion, your Executive have to congratulate you upon the position and prospects of the Association. Its agencies are efficient, its resources elastic, its membership showing a steady increase, its principles and policy fast becoming the dominant policy of the Temperance reformation. It is what its friends are making it—a growing power to compel the removal of the liquor traffic from the community; and just as the friends of which it is composed devote themselves to liberally augmenting its resources and earnestly co-operating in its labours, will it the more speedily accomplish the object at which it aims. On the lines of moral suasion the people are viewing with desire the advantages of personal abstinence, and evangelists and ministers are being led to the conviction that Temperance is truly the hand-maid to the Gospel. The multiplying facilities for recreation and enjoyment are fast improving the habits of the people, and making easy that order of a higher social and moral existence which your association and similar organisations are labouring so devotedly to obtain and maintain. On the other hand, the triumphs of law over the evils of intemperance are manifesting themselves all over the world, and effecting a revolution in men's thoughts regarding the nature of the drink traffic. In our country the people are clamouring for power to reduce the evils inherent in that traffic, which are everywhere becoming intolerable. Principalities, counties, and even burgh committees are approaching Government, asking special powers of protection against "the common enemy," and Parliament has been urged again and again to give effect to its twice affirmed resolution in favour of communities having efficient local option for this purpose. At such a moment it appears to your Executive that a decisive struggle to get special veto power to the ratepayers of Scotland should be vigorously entered upon. The magnitude, determination, and rapidity of that struggle lie solely in your own hands. The Government [will take nothing on trust. Be it yours then to be prepared when they challenge the strength of your agitation to show by the power and fervour of your appeal to the constituencies that the people of Scotland are entirely with you, that you have not underrated the direction nor the power of the public desire to be relieved from the aggressions of the liquor traffic and its foul brood of monstrous evils, and you may rest assured that Parliament never did give more emphatic sanction to those great legislative measures which have swept away the evils of slavery and protection than it will to a measure investing the community with power to stop the fountain of suffering and misery flowing from the liquor traffic.

Mr. MACKAY, after reading a letter from Mr. William Smith, treasurer, in which he stated that he was unable, from severe illness, to be present, submitted the following

Glasgow, 25th September, 1882.—I have examined the books of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for the year ending 23rd September, 1882, and compared them with the vouchers produced, and I certify the whole to be correct—the cash on hand being Sixty-eight pounds thirteen shillings and twopence sterling.
(Signed) JOHN GOURLAY, C.A.,
Auditor.

The CHAIRMAN felt it to be his first duty, at this the twenty-fourth annual meeting, to congratulate the members on their present favourable position. He was glad to see a number of the old faces who were in the habit of attending from year to year. All their labours were as much required as ever. In due time they would reap if they fainted not. Their work was not yet done. The day before a city magistrate said to him that it was distressing that so many men so soon as they began to get an addition to their wages were sure to begin to drink; and that when they were in poverty they were generally in good health; but when they had plenty of money they soon lost their health by hard drinking. The report had referred to Parliamentary measures. Certainly a great number of references had been made in Parliament in connection with the drink question. It was well known, from the obstructions which took place in Parliament, that many Temperance measures were not considered. Of course they were glad that Dr. Cameron's bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in Sunday steamers had become law. (Applause.) Further, there was reason for congratulation because of the great scientific progress which had been made on the temperance question. This showed that the medical profession, who could understand these things thoroughly, had got very much light on the subject. In fact, they did not now require to ask individuals to support the temperance movement for the good of their neighbours alone, or for the good of the Church alone, or for the good of the community alone; but they were now in a position to ask every individual to adopt the abstinence principle for his own good, because alcohol was not a good creature of God. There was still great ignorance on the subject, and it was surprising to what small trifles those who were in the habit of taking a little drop did cling. Some time ago eminent chemists had discovered alcohol in everything. Of course this discovery was very satisfactory to the drinkers, and they said every creature of God was good, but forgot that alcohol was not good for everything. In one of our Saviour's parables we were told that he ordered the net to be cast into the sea. A number of fish were enclosed. He then told the fishermen to separate the good from the bad. It was to be supposed that all the fish were creatures of God which had gone into the net, but it was left to the discretion of the fishermen to make a selection of the good. So it was with regard to alcohol or any creature of God. (Applause.) He was glad that the Church was taking an active interest in the temperance movement. No doubt it had been a stumbling-block in the way of the temperance reformation, but, happily, great changes had taken place. He hoped that the proceedings to-day would be as gratifying as ever they had been. He would say he hoped that they would be better than they had ever been. (Applause.)

Mr. ANDREW BROWN, J.P., moved the first resolution—"That the report be approved, printed, and widely circulated." It was a pleasure, he said, to read a report of such earnest work. He hoped every member would make it his business to read it carefully, because they could never be interested in the work of the Association unless they knew what was being done in all parts of the country. Let them not only read it for themselves, but also hand it to others, in order to interest them in the question and induce them to take part in the temperance reformation. Of course the report was not altogether satisfactory. It was not pleasant that the Executive should tell them that if they had funds at their disposal they would have done much work which they had to leave undone. He hoped there would be a suggestion to remedy this evil, because if they got funds for a year or two the end would be sooner. It was also disappointing that they had been able to do so little in the House of Commons. Notwithstanding the vigilance of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, obstruction had succeeded, but there was some encouragement even in that feature of the case. The agitation would be like a pent-up stream, the waters of which would burst and sweep away all obstruction. (Applause.) Some years ago the licensed victuallers would not have given themselves the trouble to obstruct, but now they were so afraid of the temperance party that they tried to arrest temperance legislation at the very threshold of the House of Commons. (Applause.)

Rev. J. M'QUEEN, Kilmarnock, in seconding the motion, said that the circumstances under which they received the report of their work were encouraging, there being everything to lead them to put forth greater energy than before. The time was when their aims were treated as Utopian. That period had almost passed away. Total abstainers were found in every sphere of life and in every calling save one, in which, of course, it was not desired to see them. (Laughter.) There was reason to be thankful because of the decisions given in their favour in Parliament. Though they had not obtained all they desired, much had, however, been done. But to him the greatest encouragement of all came from the fact that the religious life of Scotland had been awakened to take an interest in the temperance movement. The time was when many good people looked upon total abstinence with suspicion and doubt, regarding it as in opposition to the gospel, and even seeking to supplement it. There never was any greater mistake; but now such an opinion was utterly untenable. The greatest evangelists now give an important part of their work to the enforcement of total abstinence. A victory had also been achieved upon the physical side of the question, the doctors now being with them. Further, a victory had been achieved on the political side, for many members of Parliament had gone in for prohibition, and we had only to look around to see that the Blue Ribbon was extensively worn by religious people, indicating that temperance went hand in hand with the gospel. It was said that the Association was hampered in its work for want of means, but he hoped that steps would be taken to obtain the necessary funds. Over the land the temperance wave was spreading, and it would be melancholy if the Association could not take advantage of the flood which would carry them to fortune. (Applause.)

The motion was then put to the meeting and adopted.

Mr. J. MILLAR, of Monkton, moved a list of office-bearers.

That the following gentlemen be Vice-Presidents of the Association in room of those that retire:—Rev. J. S. Mackenzie, Little Dunkeld; Thos. Robinson, Esq., Hurler; A. Ritchie, Esq., Edinburgh; A. Buchanan, Esq., Glasgow; G. Gray, Esq., do.; J. Colquhoun, Esq., do.; W. Stewart, Esq., do.; J. Howieson, Esq., Uddingston.

That the following gentlemen be Honorary Directors of the Association in room of those that retire:—Mr. R. Drysdale, Dollar; Mr. A. Williamson, West Calder; Mr. J. Dymock, Bo'ness; Mr. P. B. M'Kill, Dumfries.

That the following gentlemen be members of Executive in room of those that retire:—Glasgow—T. Dick, J. N. M'Allister, Dr. M. Cameron, W. Primrose, and N. MacLean. Country Members—W. Hart, Kilsyth; J. Nisbet, Edinburgh; John Steel, Edinburgh; and A. Brown, Kerse. (Applause.)

[The full list is held over.]

Captain BROTCHE, in seconding the motion, said he did not know any movement in the world so effective for dealing with the temperance question as that of the Permissive Bill Association. It could include all branches of the movement. Its agents had been hearty in these branches. No doubt this was due to the fact that the Executive gave them every encouragement to exercise their liberty.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS, J.P., Wishaw, moved the third resolution—"That this meeting is of opinion that the progress of the movement during the past year has been most satisfactory, recognises the signal advantages accruing from the numerous conferences of last season, strongly recommends the Executive to continue the agitation with persistent vigour, and pledges its hearty assistance in promoting large and effective public meetings and conferences throughout the country." He said that if the progress had not been quite satisfactory it had been very encouraging. Though not so much had been done in the House of Commons as they would wish, still something had been done. A Sunday Closing Bill was debated and passed; and several measures bearing forcibly upon the question were submitted. So far as Scotland was concerned, he thought they were waiting a little too long upon England. Scotland should obtain a local Veto Act for herself, because she could get one much quicker than could England. If they had obtained one for this country it would have been more easy to pass a measure for the sister country. Therefore, it was their duty to do what they could to support and encourage the Executive to persevere in this great work. It was always true that intoxicating liquors were not necessary to health. He was going to say they were not necessary for pleasure, but some members of the Social Science Congress might say he was wrong. But what did Paul say. If intoxicating liquors caused his brother to offend, he would not take them. He did not expect the members of the Congress to come up to the standard of Paul, but it would be well for them and the community that they should take a little more of the views of the great apostle. In the Salvation Army there was not much learning, but so far as temperance was concerned they saw further than the ministers of the Church of England who recommended moderation. The members of the Social Science Congress might laugh at the Salvation Army, but they knew more of the doctrine of abstinence than they. In fact he held there was no hope of any civilised society which did not get rid of intoxicating liquors. How was this to be accomplished? Many had broken their pledges. It was, therefore, necessary that they should be protected by prohibition. A great deal had been said against radical tyrants in connection with this matter. But it was men who bore that name who accomplished the abolition of the Corn Laws and of slavery. (Applause.) Therefore temperance reformers need not be ashamed if they were called "radical tyrants." His wife and he had been talking over the question in what way they could advance the movement, and she said the best way was that he should double his subscription. He agreed to do so. (Loud applause.) He was all the more encouraged to do so because the members of the Executive were very careful of the funds entrusted to their charge. (Applause.)

Mr. JOSEPH MORRIS, of Broxburn, said that he supported the motion because it looked like business.

Rev. ALEXANDER DAVIDSON, Greenock, said that in entering the room he looked round and found that there was only one man who had not changed in appearance since the movement was begun in 1858, and that man was Captain Brotschie. His head was white then, and it was white still. But with all the others the change was marked; they had grown grey in the movement. They had cause, however, to be gratified at the progress of the Permissive Bill agitation. He would conclude with an illustration of what they should do. Three boys were propelling a barrow in Dundee, one drawing and the two others pushing. By and bye the latter began to argue and ceased pushing. The fellow in the trams felt that the draught was getting heavy, and, looking around, he called out, "Stop talking and push." So let the temperance friends push. (Applause.)

Mr. WINNING, Paisley, said that on Saturday he was struck with two phrases. The one occurred in the United Kingdom Alliance News, and was, "Don't be too sanguine, but gird up your loins for serious work." The other was in the Glasgow Herald, which said that "the Glasgow Permissive Bill Association are going to have their annual saturnalia of loose talk." He thought if the editor of the Glasgow Herald were present he would form a very different opinion. Referring to the wisdom of deputational visits, he said that an agent was wanted in the south, and after a conference one was appointed, all which showed that deputational visitation was not in vain. A shrewd man, who had made a large fortune in business, said that his success was due to the fact that he made it a point to traverse once a year all the ground gone over by his travellers, in order to see that his customers had no complaint to make, or desire to express. This was the principle adopted by the deputations. They saw the friends face to face, and in that way also made the work of the agent all the easier. Referring to the policy of enlisting the sympathy of women, he said that in Paisley a fifth had been added to the municipal constituency by the female franchise. He had no doubt the women would support social reform; but he hoped that special attention would be given to them in the way of securing their support for temperance legislation. (Applause.)

The motion was unanimously adopted.

Provost MACPHERSON, of Grangemouth, moved the fourth resolution as follows:—"That as it is manifest that the convictions of the people of Scotland are so matured upon the appalling evils of the liquor traffic, and on the urgent necessity for its suppression, as to justify Parliament in entrusting the ratepayers with a suppressive veto, this meeting hereby recommends the Executive to take action with the view of inducing the Government and the Scottish Parliamentary representatives to promote the passage of a liquor traffic local veto Act for Scotland, and in view of this calls upon the friends of the movement in the various constituencies to organise their electoral strength, and pledges its hearty co-operation." There was, he said, good reason why the Executive should take this step. Scotland had had a Sunday Closing Act for 25 years, and Ireland partially and Wales wholly had lately obtained a similar blessing, whilst England was longing to enjoy it. It was also manifest that the convictions of the Scottish people were maturing in the way of prohibition. Indeed, he had seen during the last few months more progress than in any period of the thirty years he had been connected with the movement. In Forfar, Perth, Dundee, Paisley, and other towns, tens of thousands had donned the blue ribbon, and he was much gratified to observe at the recent British Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations almost every delegate wore the blue ribbon. The fact was all the more significant that they were all representative men. (Applause.)

Councillor RUSSELL, Perth, in seconding the resolution, said it spoke of the appalling evils of intemperance. They were all convinced of them, and therefore should endeavour to promote the suppression of the liquor traffic. From his experience of publicans, he thought the sooner they were got rid of the better. Last week a man took the blue ribbon who used to imbibe his pint of beer every forenoon. Sometime before, his family had fallen into starvation, and Mr. Russell asked a publican for a subscription for the starving family. The publican said, "Let the man help himself," notwithstanding he had received most of the man's earnings. He (Mr. Russell) could not help thinking that as a class publicans were the most disreputable of traders. (Applause.)

Mr. BLACKWOOD liked the resolution because it proposed to entrust the ratepayers with the veto. Notwithstanding that Mr. Murphy had taken five thousand pledges in Forfar, the magistrates gave the same number of licenses, thus neutralising the efforts of the temperance party. Then in Dundee forty thousand pledges were obtained, but the magistrates granted one more license, the result being that a vast number of these pledges had been broken in these towns, in consequence of the licensed temptations. A man said to a publican at Montrose, he would bring Murphy to him. The publican replied he did not care; he could stand behind his counter doing nothing, because he was confident that in nine months there would be a reaction; and he would send the blue ribbons where he had sent the Good Templars' regalia.

Mr. CONCHAR proposed an amendment embodying the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. The resolution would have done five years ago, but such an amendment was necessary. The recent progress of the movement called for such a change. All who joined the Salvation Army prayed to be freed from the temptation of the liquor traffic.

There was no seconder, however.

Mr. RAPER, of Manchester, said he would not be sorry if the meeting had adopted the amendment. The agitation of recent years had been for prohibition, and the only question was how to attain that end most speedily. There was no controversy as to the end; there was a slight difference of opinion as to the most rapid road to reach that end. There were several routes from Manchester to London; the fare was the same although some were longer than the other, the longest being by the historic town of Oxford; but those who wanted to get to the end soonest took the quickest route. So it was with the various branches of the temperance party. But what he thought they should do was to adopt the shortest route, and keep their flag as high as possible. Therefore, he was in favour of strong demands. He did not think that Mr. Conchar made his suggestion in a spirit hostile to the resolution. He would like that the phrase, "total prohibition," should be used in Scotland, so that the Scotch members should support it. They should ask their members in the City Hall meeting what they proposed to do for Scotland next session; and they would have to tell them they would require to do more than they had done, because it was a perfect scandal before heaven that there should be forty thousand pulpits, with a free press and a free platform, and yet there should be spent the sum of £127,000,000 for liquor annually. He had seen—(applause)—the Parnellites in the House of Commons, and he wished the temperance party had men like them, working so persistently for the end in view. If the Scotch members had some of their perseverance, there was no reason why more should not be done for Scotland. (Applause.) In fact, the Scotch members were too gentlemanly—(laughter)—and too easily set aside. The Lord-Advocate and Lord Rosebery came and persuaded them to give up their just claims. He desired it to be published abroad that there were men placed in their graves who should not now be there, and that if the people had the power they would soon stop this dreadful mortality due to the drink curse. (Applause.) Mr. Raper then concluded by referring to the great progress made in prohibition in several States in America.

Rev. Mr. MACDERMOTT, representative of the Irish Temperance League, said he was instructed by the secretary of the League that day that they were never doing better work in that country than now. They were anxious to obtain the assistance of the Scotch people when the Sunday Bill came up for re-enactment, and they desired that the cities which had been exempt should no longer be so. If this could not be done in Dublin, he did not see why it should not be done in Belfast. The fact of large cities in Ireland being exempt neutralised to a large extent the efforts of temperance reformers.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. JOHN WILSON proposed the fifth resolution:—"That in view of the marked progress attending the agitation, this meeting pledges its best efforts to give stability and expansion to the financial resources of the Association, in order that the Executive may effectually meet the growing national demand for a more extended agitation, and thorough-going electoral and Parliamentary action." The resolution, he said, commended itself to their very serious consideration. It was of the very greatest importance that the resolution should be acted upon, because the Executive could not proceed without the necessary funds. We could not have sent our navy and our soldiers to Egypt unless we had a revenue to fall back upon, so neither could the Executive proceed in their various operations unless they were provided with the sinews of war. The resolution spoke of the marked progress which had been made. When he looked back for twenty or thirty years, he found that the tendency of public opinion in favour of temperance had been marvellous. The reform was allied to every human interest, and where it was not adopted the effect was blighting. There was every reason to be encouraged by the success which had attended the labours of the Scottish Temperance League, the Blue Ribbon Army, and the Evangelistic Associations, in the war of temperance reform. The outcome of it all was that the Churches were more alive to the question, and were making temperance a matter of principle for their members. He trusted that in the course of a few years no pulpit would be occupied by any other man than a total abstainer. (Applause.) But while they looked at the progress, they must also look at the gigantic distance between them and the goal of their ambition. They could not forget the enormous capital invested in the trade—more indeed than in any other industry. He did not blame those engaged in this diabolical business so much, because they were carrying out laws that the citizens had made; but it was for them to alter these laws and put it out of the power of men to engage in a traffic which honest men should abhor. A practical politician would say it was all very well to abolish the traffic; but where was the revenue to be got to carry on the business of the country. Politicians should be educated and shown that if the drink traffic were abolished there would be such an increase in all other industries, and such a decrease in crime and misery that the necessary revenue would be raised with comparative ease. (Applause.)

Mr. WILLIAM HART, Kilsyth, in seconding the motion, said—It will be quite unnecessary, Mr. Chairman, that I should occupy the time of this meeting, more especially after what has been said, and so well spoken by Mr. Wilson. You will excuse me, however, for briefly expressing my approval of the object this resolution has in view, namely, “the more energetic and effectual development of the finances in view of the political aspect of this great question.” I am sure that none of us who have devoted a large portion of the surplus time of our past lives to the spread of temperance truth, and the reclamation of the poor victims of the traffic, but must be longing for the time when we will be able to strike its death blow in our respective localities, and thereby the more effectually secure the complete and lasting reformation of men and women, with whom we have pled, and for whom we have prayed, that they might be preserved from being again allured by the many whisky shops which continued temptingly to invite, and which have, alas! in so many cases, succeeded in again drawing them back into its power and under its curse. I have no doubt but that like myself you will have witnessed again and again the noble and heroic efforts tremblingly put forth by one and another such victims struggling to overcome the all but irresistible craving, and as you have seen them going into one of these pitfalls, you must have felt that it was absolutely imperative (if we are not to be doomed to perpetual disappointment and grief) that the electors of this country should be educated to vote only for those men who will vote for their having the power put into their hands, of suppressing the sale of this enemy of God and man. If this be so the question naturally arises, and is involved in this resolution, “How best can we set about increasing the financial resources of the Association,” because if increased energy and effort is to be put forth, this will necessarily entail an increased expenditure. Suffer me, then, in a word or two, to state how, in my opinion, this could easily be accomplished. In the first place, I think we ought to ask ourselves whether, conscientiously, we are giving as the Lord has enabled us, whether we are not able to give more for the redemption of our countrymen and women from this worse than Egyptian slavery. And, keeping in view the great ransom price which our blessed Saviour paid down for our redemption, let us strive to be like-minded, and asking the question, Lord, what wilt thou have me to give? we will not be long without an answer; and having ascertained the will of the Lord, let us resolve to do it. This done, the question then arises, what else can we do to still further “secure the stability and expansion of the Association’s funds?” I would suggest a plan which I have often adopted, and often proved successful, and that is to accompany the agent when he comes into my district to collect the subscriptions, and introduce him to one or two gentlemen in the neighbourhood whom I knew were more or less interested in our question. Your presence will serve as a guarantee that the Association is worthy. You are known to the lady or gentleman as a consistent, earnest worker or advocate of the temperance cause, one having the welfare of the town or village at heart, and this is often enough to secure a contribution to the Association in whose interests you are calling. They will give because you called, and they have faith in your practice. Mr. President, it has given me unfeigned pleasure in speaking to this resolution, not only because I have the consciousness of having in a humble way tested what I have commended, but also because I have an unwavering confidence in the wisdom and speedy success and accomplishment of our grand and Godlike aim, if this Association devotes her powers and influence in persuading the people to vote straight at the polling booths. (Applause.)

Mr. HUNTER, Denny, moved the sixth resolution, which was as follows:—“That this meeting regards with appreciation the issue and distribution of literature so evident during the year, records its continued approval of the Social Reformer, awards to the Editor and contributors its warmest thanks, and resolves to co-operate with the Executive in promoting its circulation, as well as of effective temperance and prohibitory literature.” It was of great importance that the community should be educated up to the point of total prohibition. This was done by the excellent literature issued by their Association, and they had circulated it widely and broadcast over the country, enlightening the people and bringing their views in harmony with the views which the Association holds upon this question. (Applause.) An excellent means towards this was the circulation of the Social Reformer. He highly approved of that paper, and whenever it appeared off went the cover and he eagerly perused its contents. (Hear, hear.) He had known many who had been largely benefited by the perusal of the Social Reformer. He used to bind it in volumes, but latterly he had sent it hither and thither, and much had been thought of it, and much good done by it. (Applause.) He had one fault to find with it, namely, that it only appeared once a month. If they could have it once a week he believed that great benefit would result to the movement by the increased enlightenment which would be thrown upon our question. (Applause.) They were all much indebted to the editor for his trouble, and to those who co-operate with him, and he hoped that that portion of the resolution would be heartily adopted. (Applause.) Then as for the tract and other literature they were all bound to do their best to get these extensively circulated, that the time of their triumph might be hastened. (Applause.)

Mr. SIMPSON, Gornock, in seconding the motion, thought they were gaining power in the land by the circulation of temperance literature. The excellent articles in the Social Reformer called for their best thanks.

Mr. JEFFREY, Edinburgh, said that there was no periodical which came into his house that he read with greater zest. He used to lay them aside to get them bound, but he had dropped that practice, and he read them immediately, handing round afterwards.

Mr. DRANSFIELD also thought it would be well if the Social Reformer came out once a week. He was satisfied it was one of the best temperance periodicals. (Applause.)

Mr. SEMPLE moved the seventh resolution—“That this meeting records its grateful sense of its indebtedness to those friends by whose able and disinterested advocacy the movement has been so largely assisted during the byepast year, tenders to them its warmest thanks for their welcome aid, and regards with continued and hearty appreciation the efforts of the agents of the Association.” He thought more might be done in the way of helping the agents, such as by getting them up splendid meetings, because nothing chilled an agent so much as to find a small audience awaiting him. Desirable as it was to impress Members of Parliament, it was also desirable that the people should be enlightened upon the temperance question, and this could not be done unless they were spoken to and received temperance literature. He had served some time ago the Irish Temperance League, and had travelled from Port Rush to Cork. During all that time he had only once to enter a hotel, so great was the hospitality which he received. (Laughter and hear.)

Mr. TORRENS said that in his early days he often travelled till three o’clock in the morning, and nobody asked him whether he required a bed or would take a cup of coffee. It was thus seen that matters, as regards the travelling comforts of their agents, had greatly changed. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. JOHN STEWART did not think there was any other organisation which could produce so many disinterested men as those who promoted the temperance question. We talked of our churches and our trades unions. Would any one of them spend two days at a conference, and travel a great distance without fee or reward? He did not know any agents who were so thoroughly up to the mark as the agents of the Association. There were no half measures talked of by them, and they deserved a cordial vote of thanks. Thanks should be also given to the Secretary, who he believed, from true modesty, had not included himself, in the resolution. (Applause.)

Mrs. ROBERTSON simply moved by reading the eighth resolution, which was as follows:—"That this meeting being of opinion that the influence of women is largely exerted in favour of those social agencies working out the progress of mankind, heartily welcomes them into the exercise of the municipal franchise, and confidently relies upon their aid being always available for the promotion of the interests of the Scottish prohibitory movement."

Provost DICK, in seconding the motion, said that they were largely indebted to the ladies in the prohibitory movement. No better illustration could be given than the fact stated by Mr. Williams that his good lady had suggested that the best way to serve the movement was to double his subscription. He had no doubt that a similar suggestion had been offered to Mr. John Wilson with a similar result. Then, in the newest phase of the movement—the blue ribbon—Mrs. Robertson and others had taken an active part. No doubt the ladies, now that they had got the municipal franchise, would exercise it in favour of the temperance cause. Mrs. M'Laren the other day had shown in her excellent manifesto what good women could do in any benevolent cause. (Applause.)

Mr. JAMES M'ADAM, Edinburgh, had always thought that they would never succeed unless they had the Church and the women on their side. Now that they had got both, success could not be far away. At the same time he had heard ladies appeal to the Edinburgh licensing bench in a way that led all to think something would be done, but to his amazement the magistrates afterwards freely granted licenses.

Mr. JOHN M'DERMID, Dollar, held that it was right women should support the temperance cause in as much as they were the principal sufferers from intemperance. Never had they such an opportunity of helping the cause as they had now. For besides exercising their great influence in their own homes, they could now bring it to bear by means of the municipal franchise.

On the motion of Mr. JAMIESON, Ayr, seconded by Mr. KIRK, Paisley, a vote of thanks to the chairman, heartily awarded, concluded the proceedings.

THE TEA PARTY.

At half-past three o'clock a large party of ladies and gentlemen sat down to tea in the City Hall Saloon under the genial presidency of Hugh Macpherson, Esq., Provost of Grangemouth. He was accompanied to the platform by C. H. Meldon, M.P., Rev. J. Kirk, junr., Rev. Mr. M'Dermott, Mrs. Helen Kirk, Miss Grieve, Mrs. Jas. Smith, Bailie Colquhoun, Messrs. J. H. Raper, David Fortune, A. M'Dougall, and R. Mackay. After grace had been said by Rev. Mr. M'Queen, the company entered upon the enjoyment of a most excellent tea, purveyed in admirable style by the eminent restaurateur, Mr. Matthew Waddell, of the Glasgow City Dining Rooms. After tea, the audience, led by Mr. Temple, returned thanks by singing the two first verses of the Hundredth Psalm.

The CHAIRMAN rose amid loud cheers and said:—"I understand this is the 24th anniversary of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. I question if at any previous gathering we have had so much to cheer and encourage us as the progress made during the past year in the cause we have so much at heart, and which in the interests of our fellowmen we desire to promote. The press, the pulpit, the medical profession, and the people are making rapid advances on the side of temperance, and the Times during the past year has been veering round and giving some excellent leading articles.

The prince of preachers recently said when presiding at a Blue Ribbon meeting in the Metropolitan Tabernacle which was densely crowded, that nine-tenths of the poverty of London comes from drunkenness. He did not see any other plan that was at all feasible for the great bulk of the people but to turn the cup upside down and have done with the drink. (Laughter and applause.) Mr. Spurgeon is a total abstainer and the other day donned the Ribbon of Blue. (Applause.)

Then again, we have the medical profession of the highest standing and in large numbers testifying that intoxicating drinks are injurious to the system. Just the other day two thousand physicians signed a declaration stating that all spirits were no part of the wholesome food of any man, that the use of these stimulants was a source of misery, sin, crime, wretchedness, shame, and degradation to our country. This exactly bears out what the Prime Minister has said, that the drink traffic is a curse, the evils of which are greater than the accumulated evils of war, pestilence, and famine. (Applause.) He then referred to the magnitude of pauperism, crime, and lunacy, and 70 per cent. of this amount arose solely from drink. Yet in the face of such terrible results to our country, Government will not legislate for the removal of that which is causing such misery, desolation and death in our land. Ladies and gentlemen, if such a dark, black catalogue as this was to arise in connection with some epidemic breaking out, or some wholesale adulteration or poisoning of the people's food or drink, or even rinderpest or murrain amongst our cattle, Parliament would at once be summoned, urgency demanded for dealing with the matter; local authorities would be instructed to use every possible means to remove the cause and stamp out the disease. (Applause.) This very afternoon in almost every city, town, and village in our land, our fellow-creatures are being drugged and poisoned by the devil in solution. In the name of God and for the sake of our common humanity, we demand that Government give the people the power in their own localities to put down if they so wish this terrible of all plagues. (Applause.) Hear what Dr. Chalmers said—"Before God and man, before the Church and the world, I charge intemperance with the murder of innumerable souls. I do, in my conscience, believe, that these intoxicating stimulants have sent into perdition more men and women than found a grave in the Deluge, of which but eight were saved." (Applause.) After referring to the rallying cry of Mr. Herbert Gladstone and to the progress made by the Blue Ribbon mission during the year and its marvellous accessions, he continued—"I met a Glasgow lady yesterday who told me she had just returned from Sheffield, that 11,000 in that town had taken the Blue Ribbon. As the result of a visit paid by Mr. Murphy to the town of Norwich upwards of 10,000 have come over to Christ and temperance.

As I mentioned this forenoon, at the British Conference held in this city in the beginning of this month, there were representative men present from almost every town in Scotland and England, and nearly every one wore the badge of loyalty to the temperance cause. (Applause.) The recent campaign in Egypt has been carried through on temperance lines; the soldiers were instructed to fill their water bottles what with, do you think? Not with rum and spirits but with tea. (Hear, hear.) The result has been a grand and glorious victory won by a General who is a total abstainer—Sir Garnet Wolseley. Just such a man as Sir Garnet we require in Scotland to lead us on to triumph and to victory in fighting against such an enemy. I sincerely trust that when we meet this time next year to celebrate the semi-jubilee of the Association it may also be to celebrate the passing of a local Veto Act for Scotland. (Loud applause.)

Addresses followed from delegates representing the following towns—Mr. Jeffrey, Edinburgh; Mr. W. Paterson, Partick; Mr. Ronald, Gourcock; Mrs. Helen Kirk, British Women's Temperance Association, Scottish Temperance Union; Mr. Kirk, Paisley; Messrs. M'Dougall and Fortune, Scottish Temperance League; Mr. Miller, Greenock; Rev. John Kirk, junr., Edinburgh; J. H. Raper, Esq., United Kingdom Alliance; Mr. J. F. Shorey, New York; Mr. Wyatt, Glasgow. The proceedings were brought to a close by Rev. Mr. M'Queen pronouncing the benediction.

MEETING IN CITY HALL.

THE annual public meeting took place at night in the City Hall. There was a very large attendance. Mr. James Stewart, M.P., presided, and on the platform were Mr. C. H. Meldon, M.P.; Dr. Cameron, M.P.; Rev. W. C. Dougall, Rev. James Paton, B.A.; Rev. S. Harding, Rev. J. M'Dermott, A.M., Belfast; Rev. George Gladstone, Rev. Robert Hall, Rev. J. M'Queen, A.M., Kilmarnock; Rev. George Cron, Belfast; Rev. E. J. Boon, Kirkcaldy; Rev. Mr. Welsh, Glasgow; Rev. Wm. Barras, Glasgow; Rev. John Goold, M.A., Glasgow; Bailie Colquhoun; ex-Bailie Lamberton, J.P.; Bailie Selkirk, J.P.; ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P.; Provost Macpherson, Grangemouth; ex-Provost Dick, ex-Provost Cameron, Pollokshaws; ex-Councillor Bryce, ex-Councillor Wellstood, Edinburgh; Councillor Gray, Councillor Lang, Messrs. J. Y. Simpson, Largs; Jas. Winning, Paisley; T. L. Selkirk, Thomas Barclay, R. M'Callum, Andrew Wallace, W. W. Turnbull, Archibald M'Kinnon; Joseph Morris, Broxburn; Jas. Horn, Lanark; John Hill, Edinburgh; W. Johnstone, Glasgow; John Moncrieff, Perth; John Howieson, Uddingstone; J. Airlie, Glasgow; R. Mackay, Glasgow; R. Storey, Dunbar; Jas. Miller, Shaw; A. Brown, J.P., Kerse; James Hamilton, J.P.; John Wilson, J.P.; Jas. M'Call, J.P., Caitloch; D. Fortune, H. Wallace; Dr. Wilson, Coatbridge; Captain Brochie, Greenock; Major Edmonds, Glasgow; &c., &c.

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with cheers, said—My first duty here to-night is to offer my congratulations to the Executive Committee of your Association for the honour they have done me in asking me to preside on this occasion. (Cheers.) This is not the first time that they have paid me a similar honour, but I was unable on former occasions to accept of it, and when their request that I should preside to-night reached me I felt that I could not allow any engagement to stand in the way, because I could not brook the thought that I might seem, even in any degree, to be lukewarm in my support of that great cause which we have all so much at heart. (Cheers.) I am deeply conscious of my many deficiencies adequately to fill the post which has been assigned to me, rightly to fill this chair. As to being a platform orator I regret to say I can lay no sort of claim, so I must ask you to take me with all my imperfections; but I feel that I shall not without acceptance ask your indulgence, and receive your indulgence, when I tell you that all my life I am able to say I have been a warm advocate of the reform of our licensing laws, and still more when I tell you that I represent a community which was foremost in those days when temperance reform was very young, and which numbers at this time a strong phalanx of earnest workers. (Cheers.) This is the twenty-fourth anniversary meeting of your Association, and I propose to offer you to-night a few words of congratulation on the work which you have already accomplished, and of encouragement in the work which lies before us. If we recollect the state of public opinion twenty years ago upon the question of temperance, and compare it with what it is at the present day, surely we have abundant cause for the liveliest satisfaction. (Cheers.) But what a change has taken place in public opinion and in the state of matters since then. At the general election of 1868 the temperance party first asserted itself as a political organisation, and made candidates feel that they could no longer be trifled with, and that henceforward they were a force which, at every contested election, would have to be reckoned with at the poll. (Cheers.) Since that time your Association, and other kindred Associations, have flooded the country with literature upon the temperance question; the people have been educated up to a standard which has brought about results of the most satisfactory kind, until at last it came to a climax at the general election of 1880, when the temperance cause returned to the new Parliament a majority of members of Parliament pledged to Local Option. (Cheers.) This was a great victory for the friends of temperance, and to show its completeness I would like to mention that when Sir Wilfrid Lawson's motion—(cheers)—for local option was last put in the old Parliament—that was in the month of March, 1880—it was defeated by no less a majority than 114. When, however, the new Parliament met, and Sir Wilfrid again put his motion before Parliament, he was able to carry it by a majority of no less than 26—(cheers)—and when the motion was put in the following session, in 1881, that majority was increased to 42. (Cheers.) It was also a significant fact that out of that 42 no less than 20, I believe, were members of the present Administration. (Cheers.) These are results which I think we may well congratulate ourselves upon and take encouragement, especially from the fact which I have just stated of the great preponderance of members of the Administration who are pledged now to the principle of local option. We have not had much time—Parliament has not had much time—to take up general questions of legislation. You are all aware how much the time and thought of Parliament has required to be expended upon the state of Irish affairs. But nevertheless we are able to point to some satisfactory measures which have been carried in the new Parliament in the interest of temperance. I refer first of all to the Sunday Closing Act which was carried for Ireland in 1878—(cheers)—and last year a similar Act for the Principality of Wales was passed; giving to those countries those great advantages of a quiet and peaceful Sunday which we in Scotland have so long enjoyed. (Cheers.) And although Mr. Stevenson, the member for South Shields—who is, I believe, a citizen of Glasgow—(cheers)—has unsuccessfully brought forward a measure for the closing of public houses in England on Sunday—still I think there are indications that if this next session he re-introduces his bill in the shape of a Permissive Bill, he will be most likely to get over the difficulties which he has hitherto had to encounter. I have been interested to notice that although those who opposed Mr. Stevenson's bill have stated that the social habits of the people of England differ so much from ours that they could not be expected to accept a bill for Sunday closing, the Town Council of Sunderland have disapproved that assertion so far as their case is concerned; for during the last week they carried a proposal to apply to Parliament for power to close all the public houses within their municipality on Sunday, and carried it by no fewer than 35 votes to 2. (Cheers.) Then our present Lord Advocate, Mr. Balfour, you will be glad to know, succeeded last session in carrying an Act by which the sale of intoxicating liquors in passenger steamboats plying on Sunday should be stopped—(cheers)—and so, we trust, an end will be put to those disgraceful scenes which those steamers have been exhibiting for several years. (Cheers.) I would like briefly to refer to the bill which Lord Colin Campbell introduced into the House of Commons for dealing with the Licensing Laws of Scotland. It was a bold and serious attempt to put things right, and there was this, perhaps, to be said in its favour, at least in favour of its moderation, that extreme men on each side of this temperance question—those who were opposed to the present law, and those who wished to see the law remain as it is—seemed equally to assail this bill. I myself think there was much that was good in the bill, and I supported the proposal of one of your members, Mr. Anderson, who wished to see it referred to a select committee; for I believe it was quite possible that it might have come out of that committee in an amended shape, and in such a shape as might have been satisfactory to the mass of the temperance reformers. Lord Colin is not yet an experienced Parliamentary tactician, and in the course of the able speech with which he proposed the motion for the second reading of his bill, he took the heart out of the discussion by declaring his utter hopelessness that the House would accept of his proposal. (Cheers.) However, the result was that the bill was talked out, and Parliament had not the opportunity of declaring its opinion regarding it. I do not know if it is the intention of Lord Colin Campbell to re-introduce his bill. Possibly your Executive Committee might with advantage induce him to amend it in such a way as would make it more satisfactory to the temperance party. But, be that as it may, I hope that your Executive will at least take care that a comprehensive measure of reform is introduced for Scotland during the next session. (Cheers.) It is perfectly plain that public opinion with us on this temperance subject is very much in advance of that of England; and why should Scotland suffer longer the evils which our present system entails upon us simply because England is not yet able to move side by side with us in the matter? (Cheers.) Failing Lord Colin Campbell going into this matter and continuing to take it up, I would counsel your Executive to go straight to the fountainhead, and apply to Lord Rosebery and the Lord Advocate to take in hand the question on the part of the Government, and to deal with it effectively for Scotland. (Cheers.) I have a strong opinion that with so many members of the present administration committed to our cause, and also with Lord Rosebery and the Lord Advocate sympathising with it, I do hope that your Executive in such a case would find no difficulty in inducing them to take the measure in hand. We have also hope from this other cause. He here referred to the good prospects in Ireland and the coming discussion on procedure. We shall then, I hope, be able to turn our attention to such matters of legislation as the temperance question. No other national question, in my opinion, can compare in importance with this question of putting right the licensing system. (Cheers.) The evils which it entails are gigantic. It saps at the very foundation of the nation's prosperity in a thousand ways. It is appalling to think that the drink bill of the nation amounts to no less a sum than £136,000,000 annually, and that the revenue derived from the consumption of alcohol yearly amounts to something like £30,000,000 of money. But appalling as these figures are, there is another consideration which is equally appalling—in fact I may say still more so, and which cannot be reckoned by any money value—that is the cost which the nation has to sustain in the crimes, the pauperism, the misery, and death for which the vice of intemperance is directly responsible. These facts require to be kept prominently before the public mind. I cannot think how any thoughtful man who considers these facts can for a moment hesitate as to the side upon which he will throw the weight of his influence. (Cheers.) It seems strange that in this country of ours, which boasts of its enlightened legislation, that we should so long have allowed an evil of this kind to exist in our midst. Our colonies have shown us an example. (Hear, hear.) They have advanced far beyond what we have, and also many of the countries of Europe can show much more effective work than we can in regard to temperance reform. I noticed very recently that Belgium has revised its licensing laws, and I also observe that statesmen in Russia are anxiously inquiring how they may be able to put a stop to the evils which they say exist from this cause. Surely it will be strange if England, which suffers more, perhaps, than any other country, should be behindhand in attempting to strike at the root of all these miseries. Our boasted civilisation must be a sham if we go on as we have been doing. Our reputation for enlightened and progressive reform will be tarnished as long as we allow this system of law to remain upon the statute book, and surely you temperance reformers who have so well carried on the fight, and who have obtained so very important a victory, will not fail to carry forward the legitimate fruits of your victory, and not relax your energies one iota until we see the people of this country emancipated from the thralldom of drink. (Cheers.)

Rev. Mr. M'DERMOTT, Ulster, moved the first resolution as follows:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the traffic in alcoholic liquors fosters numerous social and moral evils, entails excessive burdens on the community, and deteriorates the physical vigour, mental power and moral character of the people, earnestly calls for such an exercise of philanthropy, patriotism, and Christian zeal, as shall result in the abolition of a traffic so disastrous in its consequences to the nation." He said he was not going to say how much social disorder, how much moral evil was due to the presence of the drink traffic in the community. It was seething up all around them, weltering into our literature, filling, he might say, our streets, and if they took any particular portion of this horrible seething mass which lay all around them, and sought to ascertain the cause of it, five out of six men whom they met—abstainers or non-abstainers—will conjecture that drink had something to do with it. (Cheers.) From his special standpoint, looking at this question of intemperance in all its horribleness, there was worst of all—he did not believe that statistics had ever told half the sad story of intemperance—there were many people in each district who kept their sorrow from the public gaze. (Hear, hear.) Could they blame them? Intemperance had struck its fangs into the heart of the community in a hundred ways that were shrouded over, covered over, with most sensitive care. As proving that man's physical condition was in no way injured, but the very reverse, by total abstinence, he remarked that Hanlan, the great American oarsman, attributed much of his success to his being a teetotaler. Even for a successful cricket season total abstinence was almost necessary. How rapidly English wickets fell after luncheon had taken place. (Laughter.) Furthermore, when the honour of England had to be sustained, not on the cricket sward in mimic conflict with Australia, but on the burning sands of Africa in the death grip of war, that commander of whom we were all proud passed on his own authority a prohibitory liquor bill. (He did not think total abstinence on the march moderated in the least degree the dash with which our Highlanders as of yore gathered themselves shoulder to shoulder and flung themselves upon the foe. (Cheers.) It became all in the temperance ranks as philanthropists, as patriots, as Christian men and women to do everything in their power to resist, to diminish, and to overthrow the traffic in drink; that was the practical conclusion of the whole matter. (Applause.) In concluding he said he was there on the part of the Irish Temperance League to offer those present their warmest sympathies and to convey their fraternal greeting. (Cheers.)

Mr. C. H. MELDON, M.P.—I wish first to express my hearty thanks to your Executive for having given me the opportunity of appearing amongst you and hearing your views on this great question. I wish also to express gratitude to the Scottish friends for the assistance they have given to temperance reformers in all parts of my country. I was also anxious to be amongst those who had caused the Forbes Mackenzie Act to be passed, and to meet those who had successfully worked it. Further, I desired to see what class of people they were who had returned at last general election 46 out of 60 members pledged to the temperance reformation. (Applause.) I was also induced to come because the compliment was paid to me by the United Kingdom Alliance when they asked me and my friend Mr. Raper to appear as their representatives to-night. (Cheers.) I know the name of that association is received in Glasgow as it is throughout the country. It is a proud thing to represent the greatest of political associations—that association which I venture to say has done more for the peace, welfare, and interest of this country than any political association ever did before. When Father Matthew—(cheers)—was on his death bed the news reached him that this association had been formed. He was scarcely able to articulate, but he was able to say, "Thank God, the victory is won." (Applause.) Well, has that association done its work up to the present? You all know the great strides the temperance movement has made through its exertions. I can remember the day when it was an epithet of scorn to be told that you were a total abstainer. You were called a fanatic if you suggested the prohibition of the drink traffic. How are things changed? Look at the election of 1868 when there was returned to Parliament the "whisky ring." We were nearly being beaten. If it was not for this association, do you think we would ever have returned so large a majority of temperance reformers as we returned at the last general election? Now, the resolution about which I am called to speak needs no words of mine to commend it. A knowledge of the facts there stated is that which has brought us together. We have come here to express the strong opinion that the drink traffic is not only injurious to the best interests of this country, but deteriorates the physical vigour, mental power, and moral character of the people. I have been told that Parliament does this and Parliament does that, but my opinion is that its function is to register the decrees of its constituents when those decrees have been distinctly pronounced. (Cheers.) The strife in this great matter of temperance reform is not over, but the battle is not to be fought in Parliament. (Cheers.) It is to be fought outside, and it is to be fought here, and we are fighting it now at this moment. (Cheers.) We have been told by the Prime Minister that the function of a Government is not to make it easy to do good, but to make it difficult to do what is evil. In their action towards the liquor traffic they have belied their words. (Cheers.) Of course, I speak of every Government we have had, and I say, what did they do to render drunkenness difficult? So far as they were concerned, drunkenness, instead of being made difficult, has been made easy. (Cheers.) Is this the way things ought to be, and, if it is not, how is a different state of affairs to be brought about? It is by each one of us putting our shoulder to the wheel that this state of affairs must be altered. The people have always had their way, and we shall have it in this. (Cheers.) The great issue is between that rich class whose wealth and riches have been taken out of the pockets of the poor man, whose riches have been acquired by means of the misfortunes, the crime, and desperate condition of the great mass of the people. It is with them we have to fight; but I am sorry to say that there is a sleeping partner in this traffic we cannot lose sight of, and that we must deal with the Government, who are so interested in this traffic that they will do nothing to assist the movement so long as a revenue of twenty-nine or thirty millions is drawn every year from this wretched traffic. (Cheers.) It is an argument often used on the other side that you cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament, and if you will allow I will quote a few figures in reply to this argument. I said before that if once the will of the people is expressed neither the Parliament nor Government can refuse to listen to it. This was exemplified in the last Parliament by the passing of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. The last Parliament was pledged to anything but temperance, and I took the liberty of calling it almost "a whisky ring"—(laughter)—but a Parliament less inclined to take any steps in the way of temperance reform never was brought together. And see what we were able to do in Parliament notwithstanding. The Irish people were so firm and determined about the Sunday Closing Bill that we wrung from a hostile Parliament a measure that has done incalculable service to that country. (Cheers.) Now I mention this for two purposes. In the first place I mean it to be an argument why a great deal more should be done by the present Parliament. (Cheers.) If it was possible to wring such measures from our opponents, what should be done by our friends in the present Parliament, which owes its majority in a great extent to the agitation of temperance reformers. In the next place, I want to refute the argument that you cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament. If you cannot make them sober, you can do a great deal towards it. The Irish Sunday Closing Bill came into operation in Oct., 1878. He quoted the highly favourable statistical evidence of the Government in behalf of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. Now, I think I have answered the argument that you cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament. I have shown you what we did in Ireland by merely expressing our will and determination to have a Sunday Closing Act. I have shown you how we extorted that Act for Ireland. And if it was done in Ireland, why should it not be done in Scotland and England? We know from the speeches of ministers, and from the speeches of the present Prime Minister, that it was in consequence of the determined attitude of temperance reformers in Ireland that the Bill was passed at all. When that was done with a hostile Government, I say deliberately it is our own fault if we don't get what we want on this matter of temperance reform. As I have quoted a few figures, perhaps you will allow me to go a little further and quote some others. You have heard—I think it was from the chairman—that the Russian Government were taking up the question of temperance reform to a certain extent, because Russia needed it badly. We have been told that Russia is one of the most drunken countries on the face of the globe. That has caused me to look into the matter, and by a very able paper written to one of the recent reviews, I find that Russia is not to be compared in point of drunkenness with this country. He then quoted from the Nineteenth Century magazine figures about temperance reform in Russia. May I ask your attention for two or three minutes to a few cases where what you advocate has been tried? Has it been successful? I was looking recently into a few statistics, and I notice that a place called Toxteth Park is divided into three districts. In the first there are 25,000 inhabitants, and they have the privilege of 100 public houses, and we find the number of paupers—I do not mean poor people, but absolutely paupers—at 1,000. In the next division there are 45,000 inhabitants, the number of public houses is still 100, and the number of paupers, 600. The third division has a population of 50,000, but I am glad to say there is not a public house in the locality, and we find only 45 paupers out of the entire population of 50,000. (Cheers.) So far as Liverpool is concerned, I have seen it stated that wherever public houses do not exist there is a rush of people to that place, and in it you will find the most crowded population, and the most respectable people, while where public houses do exist you find the respectable people much fewer, and you find people trying to get out of that district if they can. In the north of Ireland there is a small town where the proprietors have fortunately retained complete control of all the land, and the sight of a policeman in the district is almost unknown, there is no such thing as a gaol, and pauperism is simply nil. (Cheers.) Well, when we find that wherever total prohibition has been tried it has been successful; that wherever repressive legislation has been tried it has been successful; that the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland has worked splendidly; and when we find the tide setting in now in favour of temperance reform, and drunkenness really what it ought to be, a detested and detestable thing, why should Government not foster our efforts and allow us what we want—total prohibition? (Cheers.) I will just conclude with one observation—namely, that we cannot of ourselves shut the doors of the public house. Legislation and the assistance of Parliament and Government are required, and we can do much by personal example. But no matter how much we labour in this direction and build up the temperance reform, we will never be right until all temptation is kept out of the way of the reformed drunkard and the sober man. We must build up and pull down. We must collar the drink traffic and all interests connected with it, and show Parliament our determination never to rest satisfied until prohibition becomes the law of the land. Then, and not till then, will temperance reformers have their wish and be contented. (Cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN said—I have been requested to state to the meeting that a telegram has been received from Mr. Arthur Pease, M.P., chairman of the North of England Temperance League Council, sitting to-day, conveying their hearty congratulations and deep sympathy with us in our glorious work of redeeming our country from the curse of drink. I think a reply should go from this meeting thanking the Conference for their sympathy. (Cheers.) The following reply was sent off at once:—"Annual Public Meeting cordially reciprocate your kind congratulations, and pledges itself to unabated exertions for securing a speedy triumph of our principles."

DR. CAMERON, M.P.—The resolution which I have been asked to propose is as follows:—"That this meeting rejoices in every effort calculated to mitigate the prevalent evils of intemperance, declares its conviction that no legislation will be satisfactory to the people of Scotland which does not provide them with the power of protection against the operations of the liquor traffic, and pledges itself to earnest and determined efforts to secure for the Scottish ratepayers legal power to prevent public-houses being forced upon them against their will." The resolution begins by declaring that this meeting rejoices in every effort calculated to mitigate the prevalent evils of intemperance. Happily the persistent efforts of the advocates of temperance have been rewarded by such an amount of success as leaves us something to rejoice at. Thanks to their reiteration of the fact from a thousand platforms, it has at length been brought home to the more intelligent intellects of the community that alcohol, in whatever form, is not a food but a drug; that less nutriment is contained in a barrel of beer, a gallon of whisky, or a dozen of wine, than is to be found in a loaf of bread, or a pound of meat. (Cheers.) The statistics of our life assurance companies have proved—and the proof has been repeated till at length a dim perception of it has penetrated widely through the nation—that so far is the moderate consumption of alcoholic stimulants from promoting health and conducing to long life that the death rate even among moderate drinkers is much higher than it is among those who abstain altogether. Practical experiments have repeatedly shown—and the fact of the demonstration is being gradually realised throughout the country—that men called on to submit to extraordinary exertions, whether under extreme cold, as in Arctic exploration, in temperate latitudes like our own, or in the torrid climates of the south, can perform more work with less fatigue if altogether deprived of alcohol than if allowed to use it. (Cheers.) Finally it has dawned upon the world that a huge proportion of the madness, crime, disease, and poverty which afflict mankind is due to the use of this strong drink, from which no single tangible advantage is derived. All this is realised far more generally nowadays than was the case ten or twenty years ago, and the effort to disseminate such knowledge is an effort eminently calculated to promote the cause of temperance, and an effort at the success of which this meeting has great cause to rejoice. In legislation, too, all parties are now agreed in admitting the necessity of doing all that can be done to promote temperance. They are, it is true, by no means in accord as to how that can best be achieved; but we have cause to rejoice that a decided majority of the present Parliament take our view of the subject, and believe that what is wanted can be best accomplished by the enactment of Local Option. (Cheers.) Meanwhile, something substantial, if not all we could desire, has been accomplished in the way of actual legislation. It has been carried by fits and starts, without any definite guiding principle, but it has been in the right direction. I remember a story of a northern farmer wending his way homeward from a market, where he had been betrayed into rather more conviviality than was good for him. Making very slow progress along the road, lurching about from one side to the other, he was met by a neighbour who asked him if he was going home. The farmer looked up with great gravity, balanced himself carefully, and answered "Whiles." (Laughter.) And so with our temperance legislation. If it has not been very comprehensive and continuous, we have at least progressed in the right direction—"whiles." (Cheers.) Within the last few years we have seen Sunday closing enacted for Ireland and Wales, we have seen burghal communities in Scotland entrusted with a veto power on new licenses; we have seen the granting of table-beer licenses taken out of the hands of a Government Department and placed in those of the local authorities, with the result in our own city that this whole class of licenses, the favourite cover under which shebeens plied their trade, has been swept out of existence at a single stroke of the pen. (Cheers.) And lastly, we have had an end put to that fertile source of drunkenness, the sale of drink on board our Sunday excursion steamers. (Cheers.) All this affords us substantial ground for encouragement and rejoicing. But if anyone imagines that we have done more than deal with the fringe of the subject let him read the charges of our judges, the statements of our clergymen, doctors, magistrates, poor-law administrators, and lunacy commissioners, and he will see that with one voice they still cry out that our national drunkenness is even now the cause of three-fourths of our national crime, lunacy, pauperism, and disease. If you are inclined to consider this an exaggeration, I refer you to our national drink bill, which shows that every six years a sum exceeding the entire amount of the National Debt is wasted on drink. More money is spent by our population on drink each year than is spent on bread, milk, tea, and coffee combined. As much money each year goes in drink as is spent on house rent and clothing. As much is wasted on drink as would pay all the rents of all the land and houses in the kingdom. If you are still inclined to doubt the extent of the liquor traffic, look at the state of things in our own midst—refer to the pages of the Glasgow Directory, and learn for yourselves that in this very city five times as many names are set down as wine and spirit merchants as are to be found in the list of bakers, and that while the number of fleshers falls short by a score of three hundred members, that of the wine and spirit trade includes between twelve and thirteen hundred. Now, how is this immense business regulated? How are the relations between this immense trade, which so enormously surpasses the humble purveyors of food and clothing in wealth and numbers—how are the relations between it and the community regulated? On a principle which, if it were now to be adopted for the first time, would be scouted as unconstitutional and despotic in the extreme—a principle which was intelligible enough when found in combination with a system of government by close corporations and an unreformed Parliament, but which, now that these institutions have for half a century given way to better things, is exactly half-a-century behind the age. (Hear, hear.) The law of the country forbids the common sale of liquors, and allows only such persons to sell them as shall have received a special license for that purpose. The speaker here reviewed the previous and present state of the licensing law, which justified the taking of power to grant licenses out of the hands of the Justices. The facts I have cited and the growth of public opinion, on the other hand, clearly show that the settlement of the basis on which our liquor traffic is to be carried on is one of such urgency that it will not brook delay. (Hear, hear.) Accordingly Sir Wilfrid Lawson, as a practical man, has proposed a simple expedient by which, without disturbing our existing laws or introducing any novel principle, the essentials of local control can be engrafted on the existing licensing law. What he proposes is simply that the existing law forbidding the common sale of intoxicating liquors should remain as it is, that the machinery for granting licenses should remain as it is, but that when the ratepayers in any locality object to the action of the authorities in thrusting licenses upon them they should be provided with the means of formally intimating their dissent, and that such intimation as to their own requirements by the ratepayers themselves should be held as decisive in preventing the authorities from granting licenses. (Cheers.) There is no reason why the veto-power thus proposed should not be restrictive as well as absolute; there is no reason why it should not be allowed to take shape in the direction of decreeing the early closing of public-houses in any locality as well as in the diminution or extinction of licenses. There is nothing new in principle in what we ask. The landlord of a district is already given the most ample powers to protect his property and his surroundings against the caprices of the licensing authorities. He can in feuing his ground prohibit the opening of licensed houses within it for all time; or on purchasing an estate he may at the first Licensing Sessions put an end to every license held by a tenant-at-will upon his property. What we ask for the ratepayers is simply the same powers of self-protection for their homes and their surroundings which the law has all along placed in the hands of the landowner. (Cheers.) The resolution which I am about to move specially points to the feelings of the people of Scotland upon the subject. It does so with good reason, for the people of Scotland have enjoyed and enjoy greater powers of self-government than are known south of the Tweed, where in the great Metropolis itself the introduction of municipal government as practised among us is yet a thing to come. Self-reliant and trained in the management of their own affairs, the people of Scotland in the selection of their representatives in Parliament have given voice to their dissatisfaction with the existing state of things, and have returned a large majority pledged to support the adoption of the system of Local Option to which I will ask this meeting to pledge itself. (Cheers.) And if the people of Scotland have felt strongly and at the polling-booth have expressed themselves strongly upon this most momentous question, Heaven knows, and every one who loves Scotland must admit, it has not been without grave cause. (Cheers.)

Rev. GEO. GLADSTONE, in seconding the resolution, said—Possibly it was from ministerial habit that I felt disposed to look at this resolution under three heads. Happily the heads of discourse supplied in the resolution before us are such as to commend themselves to all who have brains to think and hearts to feel. Whilst, therefore, having no sermon to preach, I yet avail myself of a minister's privilege and ask you to declare—(1) Your gratification in every effort calculated to mitigate the prevalent evils of intemperance. (2) Your conviction that no legislation will be satisfactory to the people of Scotland which does not provide them with the power of protection against the operations of the liquor traffic. And (3) To pledge yourselves to earnest and determined efforts to secure for the Scottish ratepayers legal power to prevent public-houses being forced upon them against their will. (Cheers.) Relative to the first of these heads, I venture to remark that there is not a little in view of which we may justly be glad. Our cause speeds on its way as by leaps and bounds, and we should verily be guilty if we did not note the progress made, and take to ourselves encouragement, and above all give thanks to the God of all blessing and victory. The jubilee of teetotalism was celebrated but the other day, and during these thirty years what wonders have been wrought. The reform, like many others, was cradled amidst misunderstanding and misrepresentation. All honour to those who in the early days—though few in number, and for the most part lowly in station—saw the truth and followed it whithersoever it led, and who set themselves resolutely and prayerfully to fight evil appetite and evil custom, and evil moneyed interest. They were heroic men. (Cheers.) They have for the most part passed away, but their work abides. At every side we see the yellow grain springing from the seed they sowed in tears and faith, and as the ripe grain falls to our sickle, and as we bind it into sheaves and return with it rejoicing, there enters into our joy a large element of gratitude for the noble deeds of the men of former days. (Cheers.) Notwithstanding the false prophets of those days the cause triumphs all along the line. He referred to medical progress, to the altered tone of the press, and to the determined efforts of the traffickers to withstand our invincible advance. (Cheers.) Above all there was the altered attitude of the Church. The Church had been slow to wake, but it was waking now, and a roused Church of Christ boded ill to the liquor traffic. (Loud cheers.) Referring to the progress within the ranks of temperance, in the Temperance League, the old societies, and to the forty and odd thousands of Good Templars in Scotland he was honoured to represent—(cheers)—he eulogised the marvellous progress of the Blue Ribbon Movement. The “bit of blue” means much. Rightly employed it is, and to a greater extent yet he hoped it would become, like some of the smaller forces in nature that yet effect the mightiest results. It is indeed nothing in itself, but worn in witness bearing for Christ it is a badge of glory and the earnest of a crown. (Cheers.) Then there was the Salvation Army. (Loud cheers.) He knew little of their tactics, and might not altogether agree with them, but this he knew, that they are winning men from the public-house and sin to sit at the feet of the Son of God, and if any say, as some have said, they do it by fiddling, his answer was, in God’s name fiddle away, if only the people may be saved. Wherein they and others do good we rejoice, yea and will rejoice. (Loud cheers.) These, sir, and other movements that I may not stay to name, are signs of progress. They represent forces that are calculated to mitigate, and that as a matter of fact do mitigate the evils of intemperance. We summon them and their results before us to-night, and as we look upon earnest thought stirred, upon blighted hopes restored, upon wasted lives reclaimed, upon darkened homes made bright, upon wives and children made glad, upon public-houses forsaken, and the church frequented by many, we declare our joy. We look on the advance that is being made from day to day, on the forces that gather themselves on the side of temperance, on the triumphs that are being achieved, and with brightening, glistening eyes, and throbbing, swelling hearts we thank God and take courage.

“The long night dies; the welcome gray of dawn we see, Speed up the heavens thy perfect day, God of the free.”

(Great cheering.) (2) This resolution asks you to declare it to be your conviction that no legislation will be satisfactory to the people of Scotland which does not provide them with the powers of protection against the operations of the liquor traffic. In the presence of respected M.P.’s, there must needs be care as to what is said of the House of Commons. But even the M.P.’s present will allow us to say that we could be better pleased with the national Parliament than we are. We seek, and we believe we shall get from it, vastly more effective service in relation to the drink traffic. We are glad indeed that what has been lately done has been on the right side. Let me, solely in temperance interests, refer to our Premier and the Sunday Closing Act for Wales. When the Bill proposed by Mr. Roberts was being hotly opposed and threatened by Mr. Warton and a few like minded, Mr. Gladstone spoke to Mr. Roberts, and this was what he said, “Persevere with your Bill, Mr. Roberts.” And so encouraged Mr. Roberts did persevere, and the result is a quiet Sunday throughout Wales. All honour to our Premier who thus spoke, and who otherwise helped to secure so great a boon. (Cheers.) I hope he will say something to the same effect to Dr. Cameron, or Lord Colin Campbell, or some other member who may bring in a thorough prohibitory Bill for Scotland. But sir, whilst we are grateful for the endorsement of the principle of local option, for the passing of the Wales Sunday Closing Act, for the continuance of the Irish Act, and for the Scottish measure prohibiting the sale of liquor on board Sunday steamers, we desiderate yet more. Gratitude has been cynically defined as “a lively expectation of favours to come,” and that is pretty much the kind of gratitude we have for the House of Commons. Sometimes M.P.’s who have taken part in passing helpful measures, have spoken as if we should be satisfied at least for a time. On such a point it is well there should be no mistake, and all therefore had better understand that we shall never be satisfied till the whole drink traffic is swept away. Pass an Act closing the public-house, say at 8 p.m., and we shall take it, but we shall not be satisfied. Pass an Act restricting the public-houses to one for every 1000 of the population, and we shall take it, but we shall not be satisfied. These are but skirmishings. The Tel-el-Kebir against which our assault is mainly directed is the common sale of strong drink. Yes, sir, and God helping us we shall carry that stronghold of evil as surely as our brave troops gallantly assaulted and captured at the bayonet’s point Tel-el-Kebir in Egypt the week before last. (Loud cheers.) Till then we are set for war—for war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt, that our land may be free. The evils of drinking may be palliated by measures that come short of the abolition of the entire drink traffic. But we are not prepared to endure even palliated evils. Of two evils it is sometimes said, “Choose the least.” A wiser way is to choose neither. And that is our attitude relative to the evils of the liquor traffic. We are set against them either as severe or modified. Such evils should not be tolerated. But endured they must be if the traffic is tolerated, and hence we claim as a right the power of self-protection. We demand in the name of justice, in the name of our right to be freed from the wrongs and burdens under which we now unrighteously suffer, in the name of a wronged humanity and an outraged Christianity, power not simply to limit or modify, but to destroy and bury without hope of resurrection the entire evil liquor traffic. (Loud cheering.) I add but a word on the third point—our pledge to earnest and determined efforts to secure for the Scottish ratepayers legal power to prevent public-houses being forced upon them against their will. It is well to note the obvious reasonableness of our demand. We do not ask that this question shall be determined by teetotalers. Sometimes temperance men are spoken of as if they thought that the power to close public-houses should be delegated to them exclusively. All we ask is that the power should be conferred on the ratepayers—on those who have to pay at present to maintain the drink system and its results. We are frequently told that the public-houses are for the good of the public. But if so, surely the public may be empowered to say that they will not have them. Shall we be satisfied with less than this? We cannot. And hence the practical point of this resolution, the pledge to earnest and de-terminated efforts. Such efforts are needed, and needed too at our hands. The victory is coming, but it will be hastened or delayed according as we quit us like men, or cringe as cowards. Every lofty consideration calls us to pass through renewed conflict to assured victory. When the soldiers of Frederick the Great returned home flushed with triumphs, they were stayed at the gates of the city, whilst a herald demanded, "By what right do you enter here?" In response they waved the banners they had carried in the face of the enemy and shouted the names of the battlefields on which they had fought and conquered for their king and country. And then the gates were flung wide and they marched in to be welcomed by their sovereign. And so it is for us nobly to fill our place in the battle, that we may gladly share in the victory. Oh, this is not a matter of demonstrating, of applauding, or of being applauded. It is a matter of saving the lost, and preserving the yet unfallen, of brightening human lives, and lightening human woes, of destroying the chief hindrance of the gospel of Christ. It is work that an angel might envy. Look at it, see its importance and its nobleness, its need and glory, and afresh give yourselves to it. Heed not the difficulties, care not for those that oppose. The call is to each of us. It is for each of us in Christ's name and in Christ's spirit to give himself to the work, and as we step on and up to say—

"I will go forth 'mong men, not mailed in scorn,
But in the armour of a pure intent,
Great duties are before me, and great songs,
And, whether crowned or crownless when I fall
It matters not, so that God's work be done."

Great cheering.)

Mr. RAPER said that the resolution had been moved by their own representative, and seconded by one of their distinguished ministers. What did they think of that resolution? Was it not that it should be carried out by Dr. Cameron and the Chairman. (Cheers.) He believed that if there had been a division upon Lord Colin Campbell's bill, short as it was, there would have been a large majority of Scotch members in its favour. Certainly they would not have dared to come home again if they had voted against any temperance measure. (Cheers.) If Dr. Cameron were strong enough, and as well as he had seen him—for he had been worn down a little by his bills in Parliament—he should ask him to accept the responsibility of a measure until the Government relieved him of it, as they did last session. The credit of the passing of the Passenger Vessels Licensing (Scotland) Bill was given to the Lord Advocate, but Dr. Cameron was the man to whom all credit was due. (Cheers.) Mr. Raper concluded by advising the friends in Scotland to go on until they had got a prohibitory enactment on the statute book, and then they would be the praise of the earth. (Cheers.)

Mr. A. BROWN, J.P., Kerse, then rose to move—"That this meeting views with hearty satisfaction the substantial progress of the movement in Scotland in favour of entrusting the ratepayers with a veto on the liquor traffic, records its deep conviction that future progress, especially in Parliament, will largely depend upon efficient electoral organization, approves of the efforts of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and renews its determination to aid the Association in accomplishing the work for which it was organized." This resolution requires little to commend it to your favour. (Hear, hear.) It consists of four parts. We are asked, first of all, to view with satisfaction the substantial progress of the movement in Scotland. That there has been great progress, no one with eyes to see and ears to hear can doubt. I know a section of the community who has been watching the movement as closely as any of us—a class who, I suppose, has not sent many representatives here this evening—I mean the licensed victuallers. (A laugh.) They have no doubt about our progress. (Applause.) If proofs were needed, I might instance two. First, we are acting on the knowledge, that if we are to be successful in storming the fort of Mr. Drink, we cannot afford to be divided, we must march in solid phalanx to the attack. The other is a stronger proof of our progress. The licensed victuallers are no longer sneering and laughing at our proposal, but are contesting every inch of our advance with energy and determination. When we are banded together with like energy and determination, the days of the traffic in Scotland will certainly be numbered. (Cheers.) Then, as to effectual electoral organisation. We deprecate the question being made one of party politics. We have yet to learn that strong drink respects the person or politics of any man. No. Be he Liberal or Conservative, the man who drains the cup must abide the curse, and his friends must share the shame. Then let Whig and Tory both unite to wage against our common enemy an unsparing and implacable warfare. (Cheers.) We are asked to signify our approval of the efforts of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. We are here from every part of the country to testify to our high approval of their efforts, and to wish the Association and the Executive God speed in their noble enterprise. (Cheers.) We are asked to renew our determination to secure power to the people. Let it not be said that we show our sympathy in mere words, but let us do so by our means and energies, for, depend upon it, the hotter the war the sooner peace. Sir Garnet Wolseley—(cheers)—wired home the other day, "The war in Egypt is over!" When shall we be able to telegraph the world over, that our fight is done, that the monstrous evil lies in its grave, never to see a resurrection? Whenever Scotland makes up her mind that the liquor traffic must go. God hasten the day! (Cheers.)

JAMES HAMILTON, Esq., J.P., seconded the resolution. All the resolutions were carried by acclamation.

Mr. JOHN WILSON said—The duty I have to discharge will commend itself to you all. We have heard very admirable addresses this evening, and to the several speakers we owe our warmest thanks. (Applause.) The town of Greenock has been long famed for good and noble men, and our worthy chairman, who has succeeded to be the member for that illustrious town, I know will not tarnish it by what he will do. Greenock gave us the great James Watt—(applause)—a household name in the civilised world; wherever the power of the steam engine is felt the gratitude of the people will rise up to the name of Watt. (Applause.) Next we have one of the first members and first organisers of a temperance society in Scotland, the predecessor of our worthy chairman, the late Mr. Dunlop, the member for Greenock—(applause)—and we have in the present Provost of Greenock one of the most earnest temperance reformers that this country has at the present day. (Applause.) To crown all, we have in the President of this Association—the Scottish Permissive Bill Association—a worthy man who is no less than a Greenock man—(Applause)—and Lord Colin Campbell's Bill was drafted by a Greenock lawyer I hope that our worthy chairman will take advantage of the fact and avail himself of the services of that worthy lawyer, and bring in a bill for Scotland. (Applause.) If we had a Scottish Parliament the local option measure would have been ere this on the statute book of Scotland. I hope the education of this evening to the four members of Parliament, and our esteemed Dr. Cameron, whom we all admire—(applause)—and our worthy chairman, will not be lost. (Applause.) I now come to the practical part of my speech, and that is to thank the speakers who have come representing the sister Isle, and those who have come here representing what is south of the Tweed, for the trouble they have taken in speaking to us on this great question. I am sure I speak the sentiments of all in this great meeting when I say that those who have so worthily addressed us deserve in the name of Scotland our best thanks. (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN thanked the meeting on behalf of the speakers for the hearty vote, and the proceedings concluded by Rev. E. J. Boon pronouncing the benediction.

QUITE TRUE.—"Why printers drink is what staggers us," says a contemporary. What printers drink is what staggers them!

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

OCTOBER, 1882.

* * * Our ordinary space and a supplement of eight pages having been almost entirely absorbed by the report of the annual meetings of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, we are constrained to leave over our "Literary Matter," "Summaries," "Intelligence," "Bookshelf," &c., &c. We hope in next issue to deal fully with all these matters.

Still the traffic moves on. The consumption of liquor in the United Kingdom is stated on the by no means weak authority of Rev. Dr. Burns of London, to be 1,026,409,180 gallons of which 70,857,197 gallons are alcohol. The cost of this enormous quantity is £115,376,315, which is equal to £13,170 a day, or £219 10s. an hour, or £3 13s. each moment of time. All we can do at present is scarcely making an impression upon this dreadful and deplorable traffic. Let us labour the more earnestly for a suppressive veto, and quench it altogether. It has lived long enough by the law, let it perish by the law.

We are informed that public-houses are diminishing in value, scarcely any realizing for goodwill the fabulous prices of the last ten years. The improved habits of the people together with the imminent changes in the law looming in the distance, which nothing the trade can do will avert, are rousing the apprehensions of capitalists that as a profitable speculation public-house property is below par. At this consummation every one who sincerely loves God and his fellow-men will rejoice. We do because the overthrow of the public belief in the virtue of liquor is certain to make resistance to the veto we seek a half-hearted matter to the drinker. When his customer not only falls away from him, but actually takes sides against him, it is time for the over-powered publican to lower his flag and sue for terms.

Another blow to the liquor traffic has been struck. This time passenger steamboats plying between Scotch ports on Sundays are the victims of a beneficent prohibitory law. Drink-selling and drinking became so scandalous in "Sunday breakers" on the Friths of Forth and Clyde that good people, grieved beyond endurance, resolved that it should cease. Dr. Cameron, M.P., took up the matter and pressed it on until Government discerning the maturity of public opinion for a change took up the matter. Dr. Cameron was relieved of the duty but not of the honour by the Lord Advocate in the Commons and Lord Roseberry in the Lords pressing the bill into law, and by the Royal assent our sovereign has put an effectual prohibition on Sunday steamer's liquor bars.

The municipal elections will be memorable this year. The sterner sex will be reinforced by the gentler sex if they mean progress, if they mean stagnation, or what is even worse, retrogression, they will find the women such a drag that their chariots like Pharaoh's will drive heavily. We perceive that there will be a singular struggle in Greenock this year. The new improvement Act necessitates a new election of the council, as on the 1st of November the present council will be dissolved. Not less than five-and-twenty seats may be contested. Our temperance friends are acting with vigilance and promptitude, and we have no doubt of their success in putting in a majority of the council. We expect that they may do more. We hope to be able to point out at the proper time that the men most capable of administering the affairs of the burgh of Greenock have ranged themselves on the side of the temperance and female electors. It would be to their honour that they sat in the council in possession of the confidence and the support of sober men and God-fearing women, rather than of publicans and their infatuated and alas! too often their embroiled customers. The temperance flag of Greenock has never yet trailed in the dust. Let it be next month borne triumphantly far above all others.

Now that the winter has overtaken us let us push on the agitation indoors as vigorously as has been done out of doors. Many committees think that holding many meetings is overdoing it, and they quietly decline speakers offered to them on the ground that they are getting up a soiree about six weeks hence, or that they have had a speaker about a month ago. Let them take a lesson from the Blue Ribbon movement and increase the number of their meetings and re-double their efforts to gather an audience. The efforts of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are directed to the rapid and solid progress of the agitation, and friends when offered an advocate or agent of that institution should never say nay, but ask him to come for three nights, or a week, or some such term. This is the way to sow seed, not in grains but in showers. Providence we are told is on the side of the strongest battalions: the recruiting sergeants recruit for the army every day. Let all our friends then resolve to hold meetings on behalf of the people having a veto on the liquor trade, and the country enlightened by our advocacy will intelligently compel the Government to entrust them with the veto power they desire.

One comes occasionally upon "an amusin' cuss" with a temperance remedy in his brain, and laughs not with him but at him. We have "a cuss" saying License the drinker: then another says, Brand the uncontrollable tippler: another, Let the publican poison the husband, but give his widow and orphan children the power to sue him at law for damages. And thusly these fellows "fool" around. The "amusin' cuss" we have before us is Mr. G. Baden Powell, M.A., who figured with a paper at the Social Science Congress last month. Mr. Baden Powell divides his paper into three heads, and they are heavy, we had almost said leaden heads, as we believe they will sink his paper. One of his cardinal principles is that temperance comes from within. That may be, but intemperance or intoxication comes from without, and once it is in, the education, the growth of manliness, etc., which he lauds is arrested till the fit of intoxication is over. The evil is not altogether in the heart, and he has only half studied the question when he affirms it. It is in the stomach and in the brain, and the work which alcohol at once proceeds to do is to subvert those high qualities upon which Mr. Baden Powell depends for the growth and extension of temperance. Then his remedies are as follows:—1st, heavy taxation on the drink, which means that Government should fleece the wife and family more; 2nd, heavy punishment for adulteration, which means that he wants pure alcohol, under which the drinker dies faster than by any other means; and 3rd, heavy punishment for the drinker, which means impunity to the drugging publican. He is an amusin' cuss. We want something to stay the temptation. He would increase the cost, intensify the power of the poison, and then punish the victim. Where is the waste-paper basket? There!

CHAPTER IV.—A RAY OF LIGHT.

Down the road from Barossa to the manse one evening in early spring strode Walter Gillespie in a strange state of mind. He had just had a strong interview with his father regarding Laura Tennant. To relate what passed would not aid the purpose of this brief history, suffice to say that the mill-owner gave his son two alternatives, renouncing Laura or disinheritance. And Walter, after the hot-blooded manner of youth, had flung the alternatives back in his father's teeth, and walked out of the house. Mr. Gillespie, cool and sarcastic, had smiled at the young man's impetuosity, and had no doubt of what the issue would be. That any man should give up a princely heritage like Barossa for a woman was not within the limits of Mr. Gillespie's comprehension. He had lived to see what stuff his one son was made of. Walter found Laura by a happy chance alone in the drawing-room, and took her in his arms without ceremony.

"Walter, what is it?" she asked, quick to surmise something was wrong.

"It must be told, my darling," he said in his impetuous boyish way. "I have had a frightful row with my father about you. He says I must choose between you and him, and I of course have chosen you. I'm off to catch the eight train for Glasgow, to get the night mail for London, where I mean to work for my wife."

Little wonder so many startling announcements took Laura's breath away.

"You will be true to me, Laura?" he said, lifting her face, and looking into it with long earnest gaze.

"I hardly comprehend, Walter," faltered Laura. "You must not let me part your father and you. You can't give up so much for me, it would not be right. I am quite willing to give you up, Walter, dearly as I love you."

"Oh, indeed, much obliged!" said Walter, in much humility. "But, my darling, you are pledged to me, therefore have no say in the matter. Can you trust me to make a home for you, Laura?"

"Trust you!" Laura looked up into the true manly face with eyes which almost smiled.

"That's right. Now, where's your father? I should like a word with him."

"He is in the town, you will meet him likely if you are going. I cannot realise it yet."

"You will to-morrow morning when you miss my nod as I go down to the mill," he said, teasingly. "Well, good bye, my darling. I am a poor man now, these hands are my sum and substance, Laura, and I can't afford any time for love-making."

A few minutes later Walter was hurrying up to Strathglide, and Laura sat down by the window to try and realise what all this meant. Presently Arthur lounged into the room, and threw himself on the couch.

"Was that Gillespie? Desperate hurry, surely," he said.

"Yes," answered Laura, and her eyes filled when she looked upon him. How he was changed! These four months idle dissipation at home had told upon him. His handsome face was bleared and discoloured, the eyes which had first won Lizzie Hislop's heart were dim and blood-shot, and the masses of dark hair hung loosely over the brow on which vice had set her mark. He was the brother whose future she had been wont to picture to herself with fond sisterly pride, which had long since died and left shame and loathing in its place.

He was a constant companion of Doctor Hislop, and the two were oftener in Sutherland's Half-Way-House than anywhere else. That of course hurt the doctor's practice, but of that more anon. Arthur had no money, but Tom was generous enough to share his ample means with him, and did it, though Mr. Tennant had remonstrated with him on the subject. Suddenly Arthur buried his face in the cushions, and said, in smothered tones, "Laura, Laura, I wish I was dead!"

The girl rose and crept to his side, laying her head close beside him, never shrinking, though she felt the odour of the thing she hated in his breath.

"Dear Arthur!" At that moment all the old sisterly love filled her heart, chasing all other thoughts away.

"Go away," he said fiercely, shaking her off and sitting up suddenly. "Why don't you curse me instead of talking to me like that, you make me feel a thousand times more keenly what a devil I am; and can I help myself? I tell you, Laura, I have tried with the whole strength I have to fight the craving which possesses me, and I have failed. Do you suppose I don't know I am drinking myself to death," he said, with a strange low laugh. "I feel it, and I can't help myself, Laura; I think I am going mad."

"Arthur, Arthur!" She pressed her hands to her temples and tottered to a seat. "Is there no hope? can't you conquer it? I have heard of people who did."

"Not when they are as bad as I am," he said gloomily. "It is the curse of my birth, Laura. Why did my mother ever marry?"

No answer.

"We are a nice pair, mother and son," he said bitterly, rising and pacing restlessly up and down the floor. "The world would be well rid of us both. Laura, do you hate me?"

No need to ask that with her arms about his neck and her head on his breast, "Oh Arthur, Arthur!"

"Don't speak to me like that I tell you," he said hoarsely. "Do you know that I am going along to that place to get drunk again to-night. I must do it, though I know the misery it is to you all. I can't help myself."

"Oh Arthur, don't go, don't go," cried Laura, crying to him. "Not to-night, Arthur."

He broke from her, and the next moment was gone. Not daring to give way to the agony of her heart, she hurried upstairs to her mother's room.

Mrs. Tennant was never in the drawing-room now, she was not able to leave her own room. She was lying on the sofa. Looking at her, Laura knew that she had been taking liquor; where it had been got was a mystery.

She shut the door and came in.

"Is that you?" enquired Mrs. Tennant, looking up vacantly. "Is Arthur in?"

"No, mama."

"Has he been drinking to-day again?"

"I don't know, mama," was the low reply.

"Can nobody keep it from him?" she asked generously. "It is a dreadful thing to hear of one's own son drinking himself into the grave without a helping hand being offered to save him. I wish God would raise me from my sick-bed to—"

"Oh mama, hush," interrupted Laura, in a low shocked voice. "You forget what you are saying. Let me arrange your pillows and try to go to sleep. Mrs. Tennant burst into a fit of maudlin tears and reproaches. Knowing she was best left alone thus, Laura hurried downstairs to the kitchen. Jean was there washing tea-cups. "Jean, mama has got it somewhere to-night. Where can it come from."

"I'll tell ye, Miss Laura," said the faithful soul sorrowfully. "An hour ago Tom cam in and telt me he saw Sutherland's laddie climbin' up the yew tree i' the corner o' the kirkyard; ye ken its branches brush the mistress's window. That's hoo she's gotten'd. The Lord forgie Andrew Sutherland."

"It's no use us trying to keep it from her when that happens, Jean," said Laura hopelessly. "When mama goes to sleep I shall be obliged to search the room for it. Don't tell papa."

Half an hour later Mrs. Tennant fell into a heavy sleep, and Laura began her search. She turned out the wardrobe and the press, and felt beneath the mattress of the bed. There she found a bottle almost empty. She put it in her pocket, and was about to leave the room, when something peculiar about the cushions of the rocking-chair caught her eye. She passed her hand over it and felt something hard, but there was no opening where a bottle could have been inserted. Turning it to the window she saw that at one side the binding had evidently been removed and replaced again. Taking the scissors from the toilet drawer she ripped up the seam, and found two bottles hidden among the stuffing. She took them downstairs to Jean, who indignantly emptied their contents in the backyard and broke the bottles into a thousand pieces.

Between nine and ten, having seen the little ones safely to bed, Laura sat down by the drawing-room window with a book. But already the spring twilight was deepening, and the shadows from the yew trees lay dark upon the page; she let it drop from her hands, and leaning her arm on the sill, allowed her thoughts for a moment to flee to Walter. When the timepiece chimed the half hour after nine, a quick step trod the path outside, and she heard Arthur's voice humming a scrap of the tune she had been playing early in the evening. He pushed open the drawing-room door, and seeing her alone came in. She looked up anxiously, and saw an undefinable change in his face. His eye was clear and met her glance steadily, and there was an expression almost of happiness on his face. He dropped on one knee at her side, and looked up at her with a smile on his lips.

"Where have you been, Arthur?" she asked with some anxiety. "I am thankful to see you in so early."

"You will be better pleased when I tell you what I have been doing, Laura," he said gravely. "I am going to turn over a new leaf. When I went out three hours ago, on my way to Strathglide, I met Mr. Lindsay. He had come up from Claybridge purposely to see me. He made me turn and we walked up and down the Barossa Road for an hour. I can't tell you half he said, Laura, but the long and the short of it is that he offered and I accepted a seat in his office at a hundred a year to begin with."

"Oh, Arthur, how good of him."

"Yes, and I have you to thank for that as for many another thing; he told me it was for your sake he gave me a chance to begin a new life. I am to stay in his house and come home if I please on Saturday."

"But, Arthur, what can you know of the work in a lawyer's office. Surely the salary he offers is more than your service is worth."

"I should say it is; but he would not hear a word against it; but I mean to show him that I can be grateful when I like. I'll work for the money, never fear."

Laura drew a sigh of relief, and let her head fall on her brother's shoulder. There was a long silence.

"Laura!"

"Yes, Arthur."

"After Lindsay left me I went straight to Lizzie."

Laura started and raised her head. "I told her what passed between us, and asked her to give me another chance."

"Well?" asked Laura, with intense anxiety.

"She said that if I came to her six months hence with the promises of my amendment fulfilled she would put my ring on her finger again. Oh, Laura, with her and you to love me and help me to conquer I ought to conquer."

"With God's help also, dear Arthur, you can conquer."

Again there was a long silence. And the trembling moonbeams stole into the quiet room, and rested on the girl's sweet face shining with a happiness that had been long absent from it. Arthur's face was hidden, but when he rose his sister saw that it was pale with intense emotion, and in it also shone something of the noble hopes and aspirations that had characterised his boyhood. May God give you strength, dear Arthur, to keep these vows in the spirit and in the letter to your dying day!

There is no spirits sold nearer the Siberian mines than twelve miles. If there were no drink to be got in Great Britain, Ireland, and the isles around, nearer than twelve miles, our country would lick creation in wealth, health, and happiness.

"I don't believe in these secret societies," said one Brooklyn lady to another. "That's very singular," replied the other; "your husband is a Forester, a Knight of Pythias, and a Knight of Honour, and you will have at least 1000 dols. when he dies." "But what good does all that do to me," was the tearful response, "when he never dies?" And the poor soul burst into tears!

THE HARVEST.—There is something exceedingly irritating in the fact that a great harvest raised in infinite care and pains, instead of adding to the national wealth and bringing rich returns, is poured in the shape of liquid fire down the throats of the nation that produced it, and instead of leaving them wiser and happier tends to impoverish them by vicious and debilitating indulgence.—American Paper.

The Licensing Act in New South Wales appears to be working most beneficially. The arrests for drunkenness in the first two months of its operation show a decrease in Sydney of 568 when compared with the two corresponding months of the previous year. On the Sundays of February and March, 1881, the arrests for drunkenness were 361, during the same period this year they fell to 72. A Sydney paper says:—"There is no use in saying people cannot be made sober by Acts of Parliament after this! If the Licensing Act has kept people from getting drunk by depriving them of facilities for getting drink, is not the community being made sober by Act of Parliament? It is just as well to say that people are not made honest by Act of Parliament, when the whole world knows that but for our laws our lives and properties would not be safe for a moment."

AULD LANG SYNE.—In Saddle Monastery, Cantyre, there is a tombstone bearing the figure of a warrior. It is said to be that of Mackay, to whom Robert the Bruce assigned the lands of Ugdale and Arneile in Cantyre, for giving him shelter when a fugitive. Bruce had wandered to Mackay's farm-house, where he was entertaining some friends, and at first declined the hospitality, but Mackay compelled him to accept it, saying, "I am king in my ain house." The next morning after breakfast Mackay took Bruce to the top of the mountain of Beinn-an-tuire to show him the western coast, whither Bruce wished to go. Bruce then disclosed himself, and said that he would give Mackay what he wished when he had regained his throne. Mackay asked for the two farms of Ugdale and Arneile; and they separated at the spot now marked by a stone called crois mhic caidh, or the Cross of Mackay. After the battle of Bannockburn, Mackay went to Edinburgh, where the king gave him the title-deeds of the two farms, and when Mackay declined the goblet of wine that he offered him, Bruce in his turn said, "You must drink it, for I am now king in my ain house."—Chambers's Journal.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

BY ANNIE S. SWAN.

CHAPTER V.—A WOMAN'S LOVE.

Mr. Gillespie, senior, was an astonished man. Walter had taken him at his word, and departed, penniless, to seek his fortune in London, rather than give up the girl he loved. Casting his memory back, Mr. Gillespie could not recall any period in his life when he would have made such a fool of himself. He bided his time, thinking that when the headstrong boy had tasted the husks, he would come back penitent to seek the fatted calf again. Walter had not sent a line or a sign to his father, in which he erred. Time slipped away; spring lengthened into summer days; June roses bloomed and faded too; and the old man lived his solitary life in the grand house, eating his heart out for his boy. But he was too proud a man to show it, or depart from the letter of his word.

On a Saturday afternoon Laura Tennant, returning from her weekly shopping in Strathglide, encountered Mr. Gillespie on his horse. She was hurrying past with down-bent head, when to her amazement he drew rein, and she was obliged to stand. His critical eye took her in keenly from top to toe. She was an ordinary-looking girl enough, but there was something wonderfully sweet and loveable about her.

"What a fine afternoon, Miss Tennant."

"Yes, sir," said Laura, regaining her self-possession, and meeting his gaze with eyes which never faltered.

"I suppose you will hear sometimes from my son," he said, in his coldest tones.

"Yes, sir."

"What is he doing, and where is he?" he asked.

Laura guessed what an effort the question cost him, and guessed what lay beneath the grim exterior.

"He is quite well, sir," said Laura quietly. "In London, staying with his uncle, Mr. Hunter, and learning his business. Has he not written to you?"

"Of course not," said Mr. Gillespie. "He has chosen his way. It lies apart from mine. I was only curious to see how he fared after making such a fool of himself."

Laura Tennant drew herself up.

"I wish to tell you, Mr. Gillespie, that I had no hand in this. I offered him his freedom, nay, pressed it upon him. He has given up too much for me, but he would not accept it."

Having thus justified herself, Laura wished him good afternoon, and passed on. Mr. Gillespie smiled drily, and gave his horse the rein. For the present he was satisfied. But he felt no small indignation against his brother-in-law for aiding and abetting Walter's wilfulness. Matthew Hunter was a rich and childless man, so Walter was not likely to taste the husks after all.

The summer sped without bringing any material change to our friends in Strathglide. Arthur Tennant was still doing well in Claybridge, and had proved himself worthy of the confidence Mr. Lindsay reposed in him. But for the wife and mother of the house of Tennant, the Manse would have been a happy home. There was no amendment for her—no lifting of the burden of grief and shame from the hearts of her husband and family.

Charlie was in Glasgow attending College. He was a son of whom any man might have been proud. A splendid intellect, combined with an iron resolution to make the best and noblest use of it, made the lad's University course, even from its commencement, a perfect success. He was the idol of his father's heart, and of Laura's. In after years it was their boast that he had never given them one moment's anxiety, or even the shadow of a heartache during the years he spent away from home. But it was an awful pain to the boy's loving, sensitive heart that his mother could not be proud over his success, that there was no mother's warm, tender kiss and proud thankful words to greet him when he brought his laurels home. She was incapable of understanding even the simplest matter now; it would have been better for her, for them all, if she had been laid in her grave in the earlier years of her married life, before the curse of her race had conquered her.

But I am digressing. As I have said, Arthur Tennant was doing well in Claybridge, and at Christmas he came to Strathglide on a special mission. On Christmas Eve Lizzie Hislop was alone in the house. Tom was at a dinner party up the country somewhere, and would not be home till late. Between seven and eight she was sitting at the fire, dreaming over a piece of sewing. She was thinking of Arthur, and wondering when he would come to redeem her promise. She had not seen him for a month.

As if in answer to her thought, there came a familiar tap at the door, and in a minute the maid ushered in Arthur.

She rose from her chair, and her sewing dropped from her hands.

Arthur shut the door and faced her, and her eyes fell beneath his gaze. It was full of such passionate love, that she could not meet it. She held out her hand to him, but he did not offer to take it.

"I have come, Lizzie, as I promised. Will you listen to me for a minute?"

"Yes, Arthur."

She did not resume her seat, but the small, slight figure leaned a little against the chair, and her grave, beautiful eyes dwelt steadily on his face.

"If ever man fought a fierce battle and won, Lizzie, I am that man," he said in low, earnest tones. "And but for you, I believe I could not have held out as I have done. Lindsay has behaved to me as if I had been his own son, and helped me against myself. For the first week or two, Lizzie, I thought I must go mad or die. I tell you that the very memory of the agony it was to me to fight the craving within me makes me shudder, but it soon passed off, and for six months I have never felt the least inclination to touch the thing I once loved better than anything else on earth. Yesterday Lindsay offered me a share in the business; so, Lizzie, I can offer you a home worthy of you now. My darling, will you give yourself to me some day soon, and let me show you by a life of devotion to you how I love and bless you for what you have done for me? You will not send me away, my darling, now?"

The girl lifted her hand to her head with a sudden quick gesture, and there was a brief moment's silence. Whatever may have been her thoughts in that moment, they were never uttered. She went to him, and gave him both her hands; in that action she gave herself to him also, wholly and entirely, as such women do.

He drew her to his heart in a passionate embrace, and his words of love fell upon her ear and heart like sweetest melody. How happy these two were that night, and what visions of the future filled their hearts only happy love can know.

Oh that so many of our sweetest dreams should have such sad fulfilment!

Four months later, in the first blush of the summer time, they were married. It was to be a very quiet affair, and they were to go away for a week together to the Western Highlands to taste there something of the bliss which dwelt in Eden. The coming responsibility was not without its effect upon Arthur. Everybody spoke well of him now as a sedate, well-behaved young man, evidently resolved, by the uprightness of his life, to atone for the past. It was little wonder, I think, if, as the time drew near, Lizzie grew graver and quieter, and more thoughtful than ever. For oh, my friends, remember that by marriage a woman makes or mars her life. It is the irrevocable step which secures her happiness or misery on earth.

The night before the wedding the bride-elect had many visitors. Miss Cameron was the last to leave, and then Laura ran up for a few minutes for the last time.

Lizzie received her with a smile, and then conveyed her up to her room to see the simple preparations for the morrow. There was to be no fuss, no gay dresses, or wreaths of orange blossoms. Miss Hislop's wedding dress was the dainty, soft, grey cashmere she was to travel in. Laura examined it without remark, and then, as she turned to leave the room, she caught Lizzie in her arms and kissed her for the first time in her life.

"Don't, Laura; you'll make a baby of me," cried Lizzie, hiding her face a moment on her friend's shoulder; "and remember I'll need all my fortitude to-morrow."

Tom Hislop was not sorely troubled over his sister's marriage. He supposed he would miss her a little, but after all one woman could mind the house as well as another. So he reasoned; and Lizzie had a way of making him feel uncomfortable sometimes, though she never said much. Certainly there would be more freedom for him when she was gone.

Ah but, Tom, that is exactly what should be denied you and others like you!

He was lounging on the dining-room sofa, pipe in mouth, when his sister came in from parting with Laura at the gate.

"Well, Liz," he called out in his off-hand way. "Come here, old woman, and tell me how you feel about to-morrow. Do you think you'll make a scene in church?"

She came to him, and dropped on the floor at his side. Her face was grave and serious, so was her voice when she spoke.

"Put away your pipe, Tom; I want to speak to you."

"I'm in for it," said Tom mentally, and he put his pipe in his pocket, and turned an attentive face to his sister.

"Have I done my duty to you, Tom?" she asked half wistfully. "Have I been to you what a good sister ought to be to an only brother?"

"Of course you have," he said, letting his hand fall in careless caressingness on her head. "You've been a jewel. If you treat your husband half so well, he'll be spoiled in no time."

"Tom, do you care anything for me?" she asked in the same wistful tone, "or are you glad I'm going away?"

"Care for you! Of course I do," he said, but neither the tone nor the words conveyed what his listener's heart was hungering for. "I don't know what I'll do without you. I suppose the house will go to ruin."

She sighed and rose to her feet. "One thing I want to say to you, Tom. I have one request to make. You will not refuse it when to-morrow is my wedding-day."

"No; go on," he said; but there was a ring of uneasiness in his tone.

"I want you to promise me this, Tom," she said, laying her hand in his to enforce her words. "That after I am away from Strathglide you will give up these drinking habits which have grown so upon you of late. Give me your word of honour, Tom, that after to-morrow you will be an abstainer."

It was her last appeal. Would it succeed?

"That's a good deal to expect of a fellow all at once," he said moodily. "I can't promise, but I'll try. I'll begin gradually."

"It won't do, Tom," answered Lizzie decidedly. "It must be altogether, or not at all. And after all check is removed, what will the end be?"

Tom found the discussion unpleasant, and left the room.

It was close on ten o'clock, and it had been a fatiguing day for Lizzie Hislop. She lowered the gas in the dining-room, and went slowly up to her own room. Passing the study door on her way up, she heard her brother moving within, and wished him good night. But he did not open the door, nor answer her words. When she reached her own room, she locked the door, and throwing open the casement, knelt down beside it.

It was a still, sultry evening, and the air was heavy with the breath of flowers. Above the trees of Barossa the new moon had risen, and a soft light crept in and touched the girl's head, bowed in weariness on the sill. Her heart was filled with a strange commingling of hopes and fears, of happiness and sorrow, and above all a great loneliness, which brought a mist before her eyes. She raised her head after a time, and looked to the summer sky, shining with its myriad stars. Something of the peace and beauty there soothed her spirit, and brought with it a sense of restful happiness, and from her heart and lips went up one fervent prayer that her mother's God would be with her through life, and guide and sustain her in all its changes. Then she closed her window and went to bed.

THE WORKING MAN'S BILL OF FARE—III.

It is unfortunately the case that many among us look upon wealth as a means not of doing good or of culture and refinement but as the means whereby they may to the utmost extent gratify their lower natures. We see people by some happy stroke of fortune lifted almost instantaneously to the level of affluence, and a glance shows them decking their homes, their tables, and themselves with all the material splendours, and indulging in all the costliest dainties and raiment which their newly acquired wealth has enabled them to procure. With them the art of life is to out-distance their neighbours in the magnificence of their residence, in the rarity and richness of their entertainments, and in the adornment of their persons. This ostentation is what is seen by the world, but its failure to satisfy is carefully concealed. Then the moments for the full parade of this display are so few, and are beset with such uncertainties, and often followed by such misfortune, as to suggest, alas, too often, that life in this sense, like the apples of Sodom, turns, alas, to ashes. The unthinking, credulous community, however, cherish this as their high ideal of life, and if they cannot have such gaudy splendour, try what they can to pamper their appetites and their persons with things that are not merely at variance with their position, but quite unfitted in themselves to impart true enjoyment.

Some of our readers have done us the honour of trying our bills of fare, and have satisfied themselves by one trial only that our dietary tables are a failure. They ask us, with some triumph, to try for ourselves, and we will learn by the sad feeling of starvation which will accompany our endeavour, what they felt when they attempted to profit by our lessons. No! they are satisfied that such new-fangled plans are not the thing for them, and that it has not been left to us to discover that the good old way of feeding by rule of thumb is wrong.

We cannot agree with them. Our attempt to convince them that the community indulges too grossly in feeding, both as respects quality and quantity of food, may have been in vain, but we will not admit that one instance is enough to determine the matter. There must be some time given in which a comparison may be instituted between the previous and present feeding before the judgment is in a position to decide. Years and years of the feeding now so common cannot be properly contrasted by a scheme of feeding which has been tried only once. Were our critics in earnest to be impartial, they would first of all take stock of one month's present mode of living, and that done, for another month enter upon the course we urged upon them. If before they did so they had themselves weighed, and then weighed themselves during the continuance of the experiment, they would possess an easy and conclusive means of ascertaining its scientific value. We believe that they might suffer a slight loss of weight in the early stages of the experiment, but only for a short time, and if they attended diligently to the result they would find that it was a relief to the system to have been able to cast off some of the grosser accumulations by which its working was encumbered.

It is just five years ago on the 5th of this present month that Dr. Nichols, of "Food of Health," "Sanitary Soap," "Portable Bath," and "Fairy Pillow" fame, resolved on an experiment to determine not only "How to Live on Sixpence a-day," but upon how little a human being could live. If we remember rightly he is a man six feet high and twelve stones weight. He is an early riser, at five we believe; has breakfast at nine, and dinner more. Not a strict vegetarian at all times, but rarely touching animal food, fish excepted. He feeds on bread, grains, milk, butter, cheese, fruits, vegetables, sometimes an egg, and sometimes fish. He takes no stimulants, no tea, no coffee, no chocolate, no cocoa, no alcohol nor tobacco in any form. Now during the first week he took things much as they came, living as he usually did on two diets a day, and his food weighed in dry weight, i.e., exclusive of its water, three pounds nine and a-half ounces, or eight and a-half ounces a-day, the cost amounting to 3s. 1½d., or 5½d. per day. The second week's rations were bread, milk, and fruit, "The Food of Health" serving as bread and porridge. He considered this week more the quality than the cost. Well, he consumed three pounds fourteen ounces and a-half of dry food, costing 3s. 1½d., or nearly nine ounces a-day, costing about 5½d. a-day. He weighed himself at the end of the second week at the Charing Cross district station; and his weight was exactly what it was a month before at Scarbro', 12 stones 2 lbs., or 170 lbs. weight. The third week he resolved to go in for economy, but it was only the last five days of that week on which he was able to do that. In the first two days he lived as before, the amount being nine ounces and six ounces of food respectively, the cost 3½d. each day. The diet for the third week weighed three pounds two ounces, and cost 1s. 9d., an average of 7½ ounces at a cost of 3d. a-day. Weighed again at Charing Cross on his way home from giving a lecture, he was just as before 170 lbs. in weight. At the end of this week he sums up the experiment in something like these words. He was in better health than when he began, his weight was undiminished, his labour power had increased, and he had lived on less than one quarter of the food which physiologists had declared to be necessary. During the fourth week he resolved to go in for a vegetarian diet, excluding milk, butter, cheese, eggs and vegetables, living simply on bread and fruit. The first day his food weighed six ounces, the second four ounces, the third four and a-half ounces, the cost 1½d. a-day. The amount for this week of food consumed was three pounds eight and a-half ounces, or eight ounces a-day, at a cost of 1s. 2½d. a-week, or a fraction over 2d. a-day. His weight was 168 lbs., or a loss of two pounds, with better health, and great capacity for labour, followed by less fatigue. I cannot expect room in the Social Reformer for his twenty-eight days' dietary, but I will give that for the 11th, 18th, and 25th November, and 2nd December, these being the last days of each week. I might have just as easily given any other dates. Those I give will show, what I have pleaded for all along in these papers, that it is possible to improve the quality while decreasing the quantity of our food, with incomparable advantage to the health and the labour power of our constitution and the true enjoyment of our existence.

November 11th.—Breakfast—oatmeal, milk, apple; two and a-half ounces; 2d. Dinner—baked potato, cauliflower, bread, fruit pudding; three and a-half ounces; 3d. Total weight, six ounces; cost, 5d.

November 18th.—Bread, milk, and fruit only; seven ounces; cost, 4½d.

November 25th.—Breakfast—wheat porridge and milk; four ounces; cost, 1d. Dinner—potato, cabbage, and pudding; three ounces; cost, 1½d. For the day, seven ounces; cost, 2½d.

December 2nd.—Breakfast—oatmeal and fruit; four ounces; cost, 2d. Dinner—bread, bean soup, and fruit; four and a-half ounces; cost, 1½d. Total, eight and a-half ounces; cost, 2d.

And farther, we present Dr. Nichols' summary of the whole matter;—

The total solid or dry weight of food for four weeks, ... ..	14 lbs. 6 ozs.
The cost for four weeks, ... ..	9s. 8½d.
Average weight per week, ... ..	3 lbs. 9½ ozs.
Average weight per day, ... ..	8½ ozs.
Average cost per week, ... ..	2s. 5d.
Average cost per day, ... ..	4½d.

No one can get rid of the conclusion of this experience by sirrugs and sneers. The only way of exhausting its force is by entering upon a similar course of diet with an honest intention to get at the truth just as Dr. Nichols did. What should we think of the Doctor just having lived the last week of his experiment and then declared the thing impossible? We should have thought him far from wise, nay, should most likely laughed at him. Instead of that he not only tried it for a month, but resolved, as the consequence of his satisfaction with it, to continue it under more careful observation and experiment. This is the true way of determining a matter of such importance to the constitution as the quantity and quality of our food, and when those objecting to our first and second dietary tables have gone and done likewise we shall very seriously, and as bound by truth, reconsider our opinions.

We will in our future papers look at this subject of improved diet as brought about by the constraints of poverty, pauperism, and crime, a condition of life in which the will of the feeder has little or nothing to do.

THE NATURE OF THE CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

By PROFESSOR G. E. FOSTER.

It is a local option prohibitory measure and can be applied to any city or county upon the majority vote of the electors. As such it possesses many advantages.

1.—It is "government by the people and for the people." A county or city to a large extent administers its own affairs and bears its own expenses. Nothing touches its interests so closely as the traffic in liquors within its borders. This traffic burdens it with pauperism, taxes it for crime, degrades it by dissipation, curses it with idleness and vice, and disturbs, to a greater or less extent, every department of its industry and activity. With regard to such a potent factor it is but fair that the county or city should have the right to either condemn or approve it. If the people think that licensed bars should not be allowed in their midst, and that their families should not be exposed to these ruinous influences, who shall say that, as the ones most nearly interested, they should be deprived of the right of saying so? And on what principle of popular government can it be contended that a small minority of sellers financially interested in the profits of their sale, shall be allowed to force their traffic on a majority whose homes and best interests are exposed to constant risk? The Canadian Legislature recognised the right of a community to protect itself and embodied it in this Act. The principle in itself is sound. It asks nothing more than that the wishes of the majority of legal voters, as expressed at the ballot box, shall be respected, and so is free from all charge of fanaticism.

II.—It is non-partisan.

It takes the whole question out of the range of party politics. The issue is simply "prohibition," or "license," free from any complications of men or measures. In no other way can so pure and fair an expression of opinion be gained from the electorate. Any one who has watched the course of temperance legislation in the United States knows that its greatest bane has been the partyism that has been mingled with it, either in its enactment or its enforcement. The Canada Temperance Act has happily avoided this rock of peril, and in its inception as well as its methods of working is as fully removed from the distractions of party as it possibly can be.

III.—It carries with it a majority sentiment.

It has the advantage of thorough discussion before the electorate. It is canvassed in all its bearings. The public mind is awakened and the matter is thoroughly considered. A conclusion thus reached and made authoritative at the poll stands the best chance for full and effective enforcement. Those who vote for it will not be likely to permit its violation. The law goes into effect as an expression of the best, and newest, and strongest thought upon the question in the county or city where it is to be worked.

IV.—It meets the question of revenue in the easiest possible manner.

A general prohibitory law would oblige the Finance Minister of the Dominion to make good an immediate yearly deficit of from £800,000 to £1,000,000 sterling. This would to very many minds be an almost insuperable difficulty, and would certainly decrease the chances of obtaining such a law. But in this, the revenue gradually diminishes as constituency after constituency stops the sale and decreases the consumption of alcoholic liquors, and thus gradually adapts itself to the changed conditions. Increased thrift and saving result in increased consumption of dutiable goods, and increased accumulation of wealth and resources. This gradual process, extended over a series of years, will be found to solve the problem of revenue, without detriment to the government, and with incalculable improvement to the country.

V.—It best meets the objection as to manufacturing interests.

A total prohibitory law would render the breweries and distilleries useless, and throw large investments of funds back upon the hands of their owners, and the cry of "vested interests" would at once be raised. The present mode of procedure does not directly interfere with these. It gives the people of the municipality a right to say, not whether the product of the brewery and distillery shall be consumed, but whether it shall be sold or not in their limits; and so merely constrains the manufacturer to find other markets, and to measure his production by the volume of demand. It leaves to him the outside market, and gradually diminishes the home demand. And surely if a community comes to the conclusion that it is best for it not to trade in the wares of the manufacturer, it ought to have the right to say so, and the manufacturer must take his products where he can find unrestricted sale. In this way the property of the brewer and distiller is not rendered useless to him at once—it is only made a little less profitable to him each year—and when it becomes profitless he can change it for some other as business men have to do the world over. No prohibition act could deal more gently with the makers of liquors.

VI.—It is reasonable with the dealers themselves.

An opportunity is given them in each community to demonstrate the necessity and usefulness of their occupation, and if they can succeed in proving this to the satisfaction of the electorate they are secured in their traffic. But, if they fail to do this, the arbitration of the people, after a full discussion, ought surely to be allowed. Even then the sellers are given full time to unload their stocks and prepare for the change. In no case can the Act go into operation in less than five months after its adoption, and generally it is a full year or more. No licenses are revoked or annulled. The dealers get all they have paid for under terms of their licenses, and are simply advertised by the community that when their present licenses expire they will not be renewed, and that no further contracts will be made. It deals wholly with the public sale for beverage purposes—does not forbid or interfere with the rights of individuals to use liquors.

VII.—It deals fairly with the community

It does not deny the sale of alcohol for necessary purposes—for medicine, for mechanical or chemical purposes, or for sacramental use. No disease shall go without alcohol for a remedy if the physicians deem it requisite. No art or part of the world's work shall be hampered by being deprived of it. If Christian churches wish to use alcoholic wine at the communion they can readily obtain it. It goes into no person's home and dictates to him what he shall use upon his table. It allows him to buy and use what liquor he wants, and as he wants it. It simply says to him:—"Sir, the public sale of drink in the dram shop is fraught with vast evil to our community, and is full of temptation to drunkenness and crime. If you wish to use liquor you may do so; but in deference to the best interests of the community we ask you to be kind enough to put up with the inconvenience of buying it somewhere outside of our community. And surely no reasonable man can object to that, when he considers, on the other hand, the ruin of many which must inevitably result, if he is successful in his demand for having public sale in the community, and thus retaining the temptation."

VIII.—It is a constant means of education.

A general prohibitory law would be settled by one campaign, or given without a popular vote by the Legislature. This takes up county by county, city by city, and so keeps the subject constantly before the country. In this continual agitation the best and newest thoughts come into play, fresh decisions of intelligent electorates give voice to the popular feeling, and apathy becomes impossible. As a means of education and interest, the Act is a double blessing.

"NEBRASKA NOTES" AND PROHIBITION
IN AMERICA.

To the Editor of the Aberdeen Daily Free Press.

SIR,—It is a curious circumstance in connection with the temperance movement that there are some men in favour of temperance, but who are firmly opposed to prohibitory laws. Such seems to be the attitude of your correspondent who hails from the other side of the Atlantic. He is wishful to support something which he calls "personal temperance," but wields his pen to uphold the continuance of the legalised liquor traffic. He does not seem to have read the letters of Mr. Hepworth Dixon, written from St. Johnsbury, the Workman's Paradise in Vermont, nor to be acquainted with the reports of the Canadian Commissioners, who were sent to Maine to inquire into the working of the Maine Liquor Law. Those are testimonies from disinterested authorities, which cannot fail to carry conviction to all unbiassed minds as to the blessings derived from prohibition. Your correspondent, although living in one of the States, and writing upon the question of prohibition, appears to be utterly unaware of their existence. It is too much to expect that men can be furnished with every item of information, but surely when one writes upon a subject involving the prosperity and happiness of millions, it may be reasonably hoped that he would give some attention to the flood of evidence which is opposed to what he says. We do not require, however, to go across the Atlantic to attest the success of prohibition. We see its success at home. It is of no use for a writer three thousand miles away to tell us of the failure of prohibition unless he wants us to take a quiet laugh at the absurdity of his statements. The common sale of drink is legally prohibited in 150 parishes in Scotland, with 100,000 inhabitants. It is also stopped in a number of interesting villages and in several populous islands round our coasts. Few drinkers complain of this state of things; many of them are glad at heart that they are rid of the places which have injured them. Those who cry out are proprietary monopolists, and others who want to make profit from the traffic in drink.

The other day an Irish Landlord wrote a letter to Mr. Gladstone, stating that where there was least rent paid in Ireland most whisky was drunk; and he urged the illustrious statesman to add to his brilliant catalogue of public services by enacting a prohibitory liquor law to save the country from the burdens entailed upon it by the liquor traffic. This landlord sits in a community of 4500 people in the north of Ireland, free from crime, and where we are told there are no paupers, no policemen, and no publicans. What would James C. Scorgie say about prohibition "not moving the shadow on the dial forward one degree" in this case? If he could be got to open his eyes, he would see that it had moved forward round all the dial, and had accomplished what was wanted. I have beside me a cutting from the Free Press containing a speech of the Duke of Argyle on prohibition when opening waterworks recently for some of the beautiful rows of houses on the shores of the Clyde. The Duke said "he had been so anxious for the amenity of the burgh, so anxious for the comfort and convenience and quiet of the neighbourhood, that he made it a stipulation, as many others did, that there should be no public-house or whisky shop erected on that shore." Glasgow merchants and gentlemen from different parts of the country, who want to lead a quiet, useful, and happy life, regard it as a privilege to live there beyond the reach of the whisky shop. They know that prohibition will free them from witnessing those scenes which unhappily those communities are subjected to where men are physically and mentally deranged by the public house. As common-sense, practical business men, they have looked into the matter for themselves, and conscious of the security which the shield of prohibition will afford them, they sit content amidst their blooming bowers, and doubtless would smile at the simplicity of this anti-prohibitionist from beyond the sea.—I am, &c.,

ON TRACT CIRCULATION.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I am very highly pleased with the very excellent series of leaflets issued by your association. They are attractive, both in matter and get-up; and besides they are so very cheap, that I think temperance friends all over the country should circulate them by thousands. No better way could be devised for promulgating the important and prominent truths of our glorious movement: and I hold that unless temperance men, whether in an associated capacity, or as individuals, endeavour to spread these truths as opportunity offers, they are not worthy of the great cause they profess to favour. I would suggest, that as there are twelve kinds of these leaflets, a quantity of one of them should be circulated every month throughout the year in the various districts of Scotland. Local societies could have, for a little extra cost, their local announcements printed on the back of them month by month. By such a means societies would not only be accomplishing in a measure the object for which they exist—spreading the truths of the temperance reformation—but I am sure they would largely add to their friends and adherents in their various districts. A temperance society must not only exist, it must also work, and work wisely and well if the end of its labours is to be attained. For £100 a million of these pithy and pregnant leaflets could be scattered over Scotland, and who could doubt the beneficent effect of such an enterprise. If every one did their duty we would not stop even at a million. Hoping I will not have written this letter in vain—I am, etc.,

DIET AND DRINK.

SIR,—I am sure it will surprise and will be helpful to not a few of your readers to know that the cause of the "crave" for intoxicating liquors is often really due not so much to the weakness of our moral nature as to the unhealthy condition of the body. Doctors who study this special phase of the great question—how to keep our people sober—agree that the terrible "crave" arises from the bowels getting into a slow, sluggish state, that is, the alimentary canal loses the contractile activity so necessary for the passage of the food, and so the "stomach" cries for something strong and irritating sufficient to excite it into action. This little known fact is strongly supported in the following testimony from Dr. Jackson, Danville, New York, who says, after twenty-seven years careful study of the question:—"I have made extensive inquiries (my opportunities having been unusually large) and I never found a man who was in the habit of becoming intoxicated who did not own that he was more or less a glutton, nor have I ever heard of a man who was a drunkard who was careful in his dietetic habits. All historical facts confirm this view. Wherever men drank they feasted gluttonously. There have been under my care not less than a hundred habitual drunkards, some of them with such a strong continued desire that if they could get liquor they would keep drunk all the time, others having periodic turns of drunkenness. Every one of these persons was so far gone as to have lost self-respect, character, and position, and many of them fine estates. In only two instances have I failed to give back good health and sobriety where these individuals have been under my personal management and direction; and of all the agencies that have been brought to bear upon them, save the psychological, none have proved so effective as those of diet and bathing." Drink does not master the will in a day, and if cases personally known to us are but watched, it will soon be found that what we have advanced is clearly borne out as to the very close and intimate connection between diet and drink.

It is vexing to see so many faces bearing on them the melancholy depressed look of the dyspeptic, when with some knowledge of "The human furnace and its fuel," all might enjoy a fair appetite and a good digestion, and so be assisted materially to preserve amid the troubles of life a bright and cheerful countenance.

As the "Scottish Food Reform Society" thus strikes a strong blow at the root of intemperance, we will be glad to assist any Temperance Society by supplying free interesting lectures, essays, and tracts on the subject of diet, digestion, wheat meal bread, &c.—Yours, &c.,

WM. BUCHANAN, Hon. Secy.

NEED OF PROMPT ACTION.

To the Editor of the Social Reformer.

"Now's the day, and now's the hour;
See the front of battle lower;
See around fell drinkdom's power;
Chains and slavery."

DEAR SIR,—Yes! the battle is at hand in which the temperance cause must do their best to overthrow the thralldom of the drink traffic. The foe is strong, and strongly posted. His entrenchments are well made, and stoutly defended. He is not, however, invincible. He has many supporters, and many who are ready to fight in behalf of the cause. But "right is might," and greater and more powerful are the forces on the side of justice and truth than all that can be arrayed against them. True, there may be reverses, but time and God on the side of right there can be no fear of what shall be the ultimate result of this great and important struggle.

When the present Government came into power it was promised that, as soon as it could be reached, the liquor question should receive the attention of the Ministry. In 1880, a resolution in favour of local option was carried by a majority of 26, and in the following year the resolution was reaffirmed with the further point that the Government ought to deal with the question as soon as it could, with a majority of 42. Circumstances have hitherto prevented Governmental action, but there are grounds for believing that next session of Parliament will be called on to deal with the license laws in some form or other. A short time ago, a Blue Book was issued with reports from most of our colonies embodying the mode in which this question has been dealt with in these. It is said that reports have been got from various States of the American Union, with accounts of the nature of the legislation in force there, and the results of that legislation. It is also stated that correspondence has been going on with men of mark acquainted with the subject at home. Everything, in fact, seems to indicate that the hour of battle approaches and will soon be upon us. In these circumstances it is of prime importance that our forces be all ready, and our preparations all made, to make a bold, determined, and successful attack on the great ramparts of the fort of liquorism. We know we shall meet with a sturdy and determined resistance, and that the fortress will not be surrendered until every means of defending it has proved unavailing. Every effort must therefore be put forth on the part of the friends of temperance and morality to storm the fort and plant the flag of prohibition on the ramparts, and secure for the people the means of freedom and self-defence.

But, why this cry for action? Have we not had a good majority in the House on two several occasions, and the last a largely-increased majority. Yes, we have had two victories, substantial ones too, but from these very victories it is to be feared that some degree of injury to the cause may follow. The resolution was in favour of local option, but this term is not confined to one point; does not refer to only one mode of dealing with the question. It has been interpreted in various ways. Some who voted for local option have expressed their opinion that it means that when a license is applied for, the majority of the residents living in the neighbourhood may oppose the granting of the license, and it shall not be granted against their wishes: but no provision is made for refusal of renewals on the same grounds. Others have said that they understand by local option that the licensing power shall be put into the hands of Town Councils and County Courts to be elected somehow, but the mode has not yet been made known, on the ground that the Board is one elected by the people. Others, again, define local option as meaning that the licensing shall be put into the hands of a board elected for the special purpose by the ratepayers of burghs and counties or parishes, with all the powers of the present licensing boards. Others, besides supporting a locally-elected board for the special object, would give them the power of dealing with the whole subject, introducing the Gothenburg system or any other plan they may deem most suitable for settling the question for their own particular locality. Various persons who agree to local option would only support that on the plea of granting compensation to the parties deprived of license through local veto. Sir Wilfrid Lawson goes in for, and will be satisfied with nothing less than local veto, pure and simple; and this, what temperance men generally demand, is the smallest measure they can recognise as a present settlement of the question. Now, suppose the members who voted for local option, who interpret it in the various ways we have indicated, decline to support the local veto clauses, if introduced by the Government, or if not embodied in the draft Bill when proposed as an amendment upon the Bill, there is some fear that the majority may be converted into a minority. This is all the more likely to be the case if the Government do not embody this principle in their Bill, as a score of the supporters of the resolution are members of the Government, and they can scarcely be expected to vote against the Government Bill. In these circumstances the question arises—What is to be done? If the battle comes on and the end be not gained, but only some patching and tinkering of the present system, there is reason to fear that not only will there be disappointment, but that a feeling of despondency will result which may throw the matter back for years. Men may then say, "It is of no use fighting any longer," or "Let us see how the new system will work." The matter lies, not so much in the hands of the Government, or even of the House of Commons, as it lies in the hands of the people. To the people, therefore, the appeal must be made, and the sooner this is done, and the more generally it is made, the more reasonable expectation may be entertained of success. Members are squeezable.

The first thing to be done is to hold large and influential meetings all over the country, in every town and parish if possible, at which the principle aimed at shall be fully and carefully expounded and enforced. At these meetings resolutions should be passed affirming the principle of local veto. These resolutions should be sent to every member in the country whether county or burgh members, to the Premier and the Home-Secretary, to the minister for Scotland and the Lord-Advocate, all of whom should be earnestly pressed to support the plan indicated in the resolutions. This should be followed by a full and complete canvass of the burgh or parish. Petitions should everywhere be got, praying for local veto, not local option as that is ambiguous. Canvassers should each carry three sheets—one to be signed by electors only, the second by heads of houses not electors, and the third by as many as possible of the inhabitants not in these other lists above 16 years of age, male and female; in every case the address to be added to the name, else it is of no use. When this has been fully done the whole of the first sheets should be placed together; next, the second sheets; and after these, the third sheets. The number of signatures under each head should be counted, and when the petition is ready it should be sent to the member for the place, and a note sent to all the members connected with the county requesting their support to the prayer of the petition, and informing them of the number of signatures in each class.

Should it turn out that a majority of the electors sign the petition, it must have a potent influence on the member, who, if wavering in his opinions, will very likely be thereby induced to support the demand of the people. If hostile, it may at least induce him to abstain from voting against, if he cannot see his way to vote for, the local veto. Those who are lukewarm may be rendered more decided. Members who see this expression of feeling will see in it that opposition to, or neglect of, the expressed wishes of their constituents, may place their seats in jeopardy when a new election comes round. At least it will tend materially to open the eyes of members to the public opinion on the matter, and help them to vote aright when the question comes before them in the House.

There can be no doubt that this is a very important matter, and must have a potent influence on the success of the great warfare. It is of prime importance that the views of the people should be clearly and fully set forth in view of the Legislature. The common remark is that it is only a few fanatical abstainers who wish to force every one to be as they are, whereas, it is well known that thousands who are not in this category are as anxious to see local veto in force as are the abstainers themselves; yea, even a large number of men who are the victims of King Alcohol.

Great care must be taken to make the demand of the people unambiguous. The term local option is so; therefore we urge that the term local veto, or local prohibition, or some expression that cannot be misunderstood, be everywhere and always used, in every resolution and petition. If this plan be fully and energetically carried out, there are good hopes that success will crown the efforts of the friends of temperance in their efforts to secure for the people the power of protecting themselves against the deadliest foe of the country. A word is enough to the wise.

ON THE WING.

The Home Secretary has expressed his opinion that the temperance question must before long occupy the attention of Parliament.—A safe opinion, Sir William.

We are glad to observe among the list of subjects which form the attractive syllabus of the present winter's course of health lectures organised by the Glasgow Young Men's Christian Association, that "Alcohol and its influence on body and mind," is to be treated by our friend Dr. Neil Carmichael.

Mr. Spurgeon the other day told a meeting of ragged school teachers that society was improving since the days of cock-fighting and bear-baiting and hard drinking, and most of it was owing to Sunday and ragged schools. The publican's trade, he said, was declining, and the end would come as sure as death.

At the Annual Conference of the English Anti-Tobacco Society, held in Manchester last month, resolutions were passed strongly condemning tobacco smoking, calling the attention of Christian people especially to its evils, and urging Blue Ribbon and other temperance organizations to offer the additional safeguard of a pledge against tobacco.

England is evidently in earnest about Sunday closing, and means to have it, even if it be by the more tedious method of piecemeal. Following Cornwall's example, Somerset has set about agitating for a Closing Act for itself. We wonder what county in England will earn the odious notoriety of being the last to fling aside the galling chains that bind it to a liquor Sunday!

We merely quote the following paragraph from the Morning Advertiser in order to say how utterly we discredit the opinion it contains—"There cannot be a more wholesome or strengthening meal than the English workman's beef and beer. . . . They have produced the most powerful populace in the world." We hardly think the writer is aware of the existence of the hardy Scotch peasant and his oatmeal diet.

What is known as "The Brewer's Exhibition," was held last month at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, and for anything that we know to the contrary, passed off quite satisfactorily. It probably had only one defect, and that was its incompleteness. The various items of plant and machinery were certainly there, all interesting and ingenious no doubt; but the evidences of the terrible havoc which the brewer's business is inflicting in the homes of the people was nowhere visible. A brewer's exhibition to be complete must lay bare the social misery and domestic wretchedness, the individual ruin and national degradation which directly and unceasingly spring from his blighting traffic.

The French used to call us a nation of mere shopkeepers. That dreadful stigma, however, seems in a fair way of being completely removed. The martial spirit is abroad, and has even taken hold of the organizers of recent moral and religious movements. The tendency just now is to multiply movements, and to form them on the model of the army. Hence we have the Salvation Army, the Blue, Green, and Orange Armies; and now the Mizpah Band—a reformed drunkard's society, formed by Mr. Moody when recently in Glasgow—has gone in for military drill and marching. Is there not a danger of playing at soldiers and omitting the weightier matters of the campaign?

A writer in Truth lately ventilated his cure for the curse of drunkenness in the following terms:—"A country is sober or the reverse in proportion to the strength of the liquor in general use. In the wine-drinking districts of France there is hardly any drunkenness; whereas in French towns where, unfortunately, the people are acquiring the habit of drinking heady spirits, drunkenness is gradually becoming more frequent. So again in Germany, wherever, as in Bavaria, German beer is the prevailing beverage, there is no drunkenness, for the very plain reason that German beer increases the flow of animal spirits, but cannot, no matter how much is consumed, produce intoxication. With these facts as our guide, it is clear that if gin palaces were suppressed, and if German beer were to become the national beverage, we should put an end to drunkenness." This is not truth but quackery—nothing but quackery.

POETRY.

SONNET—IN THE BAY.

DARK is the woodland, and beneath I see
The lighted windows of the quiet town,
The stars with their benignant light shine down
On town and woodland—magic scenery
It seems. The brilliant light of lamps and stars Mingling together. On the sea so vast
The lamps and stars have their reflection cast,
The light and darkness strive in fitful wars.
Along the placid bay the sea lies deep
In quiet rest, the ocean is asleep,
And the still town that nestles on the shore,
Bathed in the splendour of the moonlight glow,
Seems like a host of spectres couching low
Beside the ocean's vastness evermore.

ANDREW M. LANG.

MARK IV. 35-41.

HE walked upon the shore
With his disciples at the eventide,
And unto them he said, "Let us pass o'er Unto the other side."

And as they sailed, behold!
A storm arose. The wind a roaring made,
The seething waves in fury round them rolled,
And they were sore afraid.

"Master, arise and save,"
They cry aloud, for he was fast asleep,
"Dost thou not care if we should find a grave Within the angry deep?"

To aid them he drew near,
Saying, "Ye winds and waters, Peace! Be still!
O ye of little faith! Why didst thou fear
To trust my power and will?"

And lo! the storm was stayed,
And they were filled with wonderment and awe,
"What man is this? One who is thus obeyed Before we never saw!"

O weary, struggling soul!
Upon life's ocean tossed with doubt and fear,
What matter that the billows round thee roll,
If Christ be near!

If he is at the helm,
And in the hollow of his hand doth hold
The angry waves—they cannot overwhelm
When by his power controlled.

Perchance it seems to thee
As though the Master slept, and thou alone
Art left to battle with thy misery,
With many a tear and moan.

Thy faith he needs must prove,
Trust all to him and wait his gracious will,
Thou'rt not forgot, for he afflicts in love,
And whispers, "Peace! Be still!"

Thou'lt reach "the other side,"
Where the fierce waves of trouble all will cease,
The voyage o'er, thy barque shall safely glide
Into the port of peace!

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

NOVEMBER, 1882.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION'S NEW YEAR TRACT.

THIS tract bears the significant title of "Turn the Battle to the Gate," and is written by J. L. Selkirk, J.P. It is illustrated by the same artist who has so skilfully illustrated those of previous years. The tract may be had at 10s. per 1000, or 1s. per 100—carriage not paid. Societies may have their name and the night and hour of their meeting printed upon it at an extra charge of 1s. 6d. on orders of not less than 500. On orders of 2000 and upward there will be no charge for heading. If more than 40 words are wanted in heading, will be charged by special agreement. The price post free will be 1s. 5d. per 100. Orders should be sent in without delay as the tract is certain to be in great demand.

The movement for entrusting the people with a veto over the drink traffic marches along. The Lancet, which not so many years ago was one of our sturdiest opponents, is now boldly suggesting that the principle of local option should be applied to grocers' licenses; and points out that in Burnley the householders were invited to give expression to their opinion on this particular issue. It is a pity we have not a census of the town, but we now know that 7,776 of its inhabitants went against having any licensed grocers in the town; 508 was all that could be mustered in favour of them, and 387 did not care whether they were licensed or not. Now, what is the use of a licensed grocer? Well, the answer of experience is that their use is to pollute households and corrupt and seduce women into habits of intemperance. We wonder if there is much drinking among the women of Burnley. It looks as if there were when the drug grocers are condemned so sweepingly. The Lancet is ready to halt, and won't go to suggest that all traffic should be ostracised. We will be glad if the licensed grocers are cleared out by a veto exercised by the ratepayers. We will suppose they have been swept out of existence. We may ask what then? Why, a most effective blow has been struck at female intemperance, but not at the intemperance of the town. Men can still frequent the taverns, and children can still go to the "public" for their parents' dinner and supper beer. Women too may transfer their custom to the "Dragon," so that the publicans would have a greater monopoly of drink supply. Indeed, we should not wonder if among the large number who gave their vote against the licensed grocers many a publican would have been found. The supply would not be stopped, its mode would be only changed, and hence we do not sympathise so fully as we desire to do with the Lancet, because its policy is limitation not suppression, and because we have no faith in anything effective being done short of the legal destruction of the whole liquor system. Still we hail this suggestion of the Lancet as indicative of what we are fast marching onwards to—the abolition of the licensing system in the interests of our country's order, improvement, and progress.

The Bishop of Peterborough has been again hit. At least we think so from the outcry he has made. Not long ago his grace favoured us with his views on freedom and sobriety, and the freedom was without law, and the sobriety without discrimination; but the epigram served the enemies of temperance with a text, and the health of the Bishop became the standing toast in many a tavern parlour. He has joined the colossal Church of England Temperance Society, where temperance means at once moderate drinking and abstinence. In that society the abstemious drinker of liquor must have hard lines for his self-control, while indulging in a glass is evil spoken of. His moderation entitles him to no approval, and his want of the grace of abstinence renders him liable to unsparing censure. The Bishop feels this keenly, and vigorously protests against his being viewed as one of those one or two glass of wine a-day men who are the beacons that lure the drink-stricken to their destruction. But he has no case, for if the liquor is fit for the holy bishop it cannot be wrong for the layman; if the bishop can take it or want it, why not his flock? And if some of the flock in their eagerness to follow their spiritual shepherd cannot stop within the limits of safety, it is no defence for him to say that he can carry his glass without discredit to his constitution or disgrace to his cloth. He is there to allure his flock to heaven and show the way, and if an obstacle to heavenly progress is planted in their way in the shape of seductive liquors—an obstacle having the good Bishop's approval, he is like the pharisee, laying on the pilgrims he has in charge burdens too grievous to be borne, and won't at the same time touch them with his fingers. Moderate drinkers are decidedly those who more than any one cause their brethren to offend. They could not get a class to minister to their drink appetites with profit were it not that a large number of them develop into full-blown drunkards; and publicans and the press also plead for the continuance of the deplorable traffic in strong drink, not to satisfy the insatiable appetite of the drunkard but the less clamant demands of the moderate drinker. The moderate drinker is a false beacon to the drunkard, and a reason for the existence of the liquor traffic. Is this a position for any Christian, not to speak of his grace of Peterborough, to hold? Nay verily, and we would not for a hundred Sees of Peterborough be in the skin of the Bishop when the Judge of all the earth lays righteousness to the line and judgment to the plummet.

Last month Pollokshaws, a Burgh of Barony, was called to elect a Council, including Bailie and Provost. Great interest was taken in the election. The temperance party took a conspicuous position in the labours involved, and were rewarded with a signal triumph. The publican party were smitten hip and thigh, and the Council Chamber that has known them too long knows their presence no more. The Provost, Dr. Ritchie, is an abstainer, and the majority of his Council are abstainers. It has been a great victory, for in the memory of that antediluvian "the oldest inhabitant," the publican has been constantly at the Council Board. It is said that the Provost is the first total abstainer who has occupied the civic chair. If this be true, all the more glory to the temperance hosts. They are praiseworthy, but Sanquhar has a Council of Provost, Bailies, and Councillors, all abstainers; let Pollokshaws and every other burgh, whether of Police, of Barony, or Regality, or of Parliament, make it their solemn duty to sweep their Councils, their Parochial Boards and their churches of the publican, the distiller, and the brewer, so that it may be impossible to find a vestige of them in any post of honour with which the burghers of Scotland have to do.

Just as we go to press Parliament goes to work. The beginning of this adjourned session was marked by a passage of oratory between the Rupert of the Fourth Party, Lord "Random" Churchill, and the Prime Minister. We admire the courage of the noble lord, but were we permitted to give him advice it would certainly be to let fall his shafts on a more vulnerable crest than that of the old wood-cutter. We envied those that were present at the little mill, for the noble lord certainly met more than his match. We want these procedure rules passed, and our sympathies are therefore with the Government. We want them passed so that the question of a veto for Scotland may have that grave attention and treatment which its importance demands, and if we are fortunate in our venture at this time we shall we hope be freed from the pestilent obstruction to business which has so discredited the House of Commons, and so greatly retarded the redress of grievances which have become intolerable. We hope long before our next issue that the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association may be in a position to communicate to its supporters the news that a member has undertaken to bring in a bill vesting the prohibition of the liquor traffic in a majority of the ratepayers. May we hope that the receipt of the communication finds them ready to afford such a measure a vigorous support.

Edinburgh is again in the throes of a Parliamentary election. By the retiral of Mr. James Cowan a contest is quite unexpectedly brought on. Notwithstanding that this vacancy might have been easily foreseen, no preparations for it were made by any party, if we except the temperance party. They, however, were on the alert, and it says much in their favour that they have maintained that thorough independence which more than anything else will procure them the respect of all political parties. Their unity at the present crisis is remarkable, and a credit to the leaders of the various sections of the temperance movement in the city. Conscious of their power to influence the election, they met on Saturday, the 21st ult., and after exhaustively deliberating on the prospects of the contest came to the resolution that a question in the following terms should be put to all gentlemen appearing as candidates for the suffrages of the electors:—"In the event of a measure being introduced into Parliament conferring upon a majority of the ratepayers of Scotland the unconditional legal power to prohibit the liquor traffic in their several localities, will you, by your vote and influence, support the same?" And they appointed the Rev. Dr. Adamson, ex-Bailie Lewis, Councillor M'Lauchlan, Messrs. Ramsay, Nisbet, M'Lagan, and Miller, with Mr. Waterston as secretary, as a standing committee to watch events. The deputation have their work before them. They have seen Mr. Renton, whose answers were not quite satisfactory; Mr. M'Laren was frank and straightforward, and would most likely have had their recommendation to the electors but for the fact that the number of candidates entering the field or desiring to be invited as candidates is increasing daily. Mr. Waddy, one of the present Parliamentary members for Sheffield; Mr. John Morley, the distinguished journalist; Mr. S. Buxton; Mr. Duncan M'Laren, formerly M.P. for the city; Sir U. K. Shuttleworth, and others, have all expressed their willingness to place their services at the disposal of the electors. In any event we are confident the seat is safe for an advanced temperance reformer. The committee representing the interests of the temperance electors are too experienced and too vigilant, besides having too formidable support from the leading citizens, to allow of the election of one who is not prepared to support the passage of a bill entrusting the ratepayers with a suppressive veto over the traffic that injuriously affects them. Our regret is that we are constrained to go to press before the issue of the writ, the selection of a candidate, or what we would have rejoiced in, before joining in the congratulations which will be offered to the temperance party on the triumphant issue of their labours.

Our quizzical contemporary "Quiz" strayed on the wrong tack the other day when it took up cudgels in defence of the Glasgow billiard room keepers. Here is its plea—these people are poor, the trade is poor, and their hope at best is for a poor living. Shut the doors at eleven at night and you ruin them; and close the only available place of resort after that hour. Now we cannot allow such a plea to pass without some question. These billiard rooms are the resort of gamblers incipient and full blown. They harbour the idler, the devil's easiest prey, and the sharper, the devil's best decoy. They offer at first a pleasing excitement, and seemingly invite to a game of skill, but emulation and avarice join their forces, and the frequenters, almost always, become ensnared. The pleasure becomes a passion, the passion uncontrollable. Liquor adds its fatal fire to the excitement, and night is longed for that the passion may be gratified. The once promising youth becomes careless at business, heartless at home. Masters have to find fault, mothers and wives have to endure all the agonies of late hours and the dread of deepening dissipation. There are numbers expiating in misery at home or on foreign strands the follies of the billiard saloons, and the evil has become so marked and so intolerable that the attention of the authorities has been called to the matter. They have resolved that the billiard saloon keepers of the city shall be licensed—surely Quiz cannot object to a respectable man rather than an adventurer—that the hours of such places shall be from eight a.m. to eleven p.m. It may be all very well for Quiz to stand up for the interest of the keepers of these questionable places because he never plays at public billiard tables, and because he is not the victim of the gambler's fever; but the Act is not made for him or such as him. It is made in the interests of the wives, the families, the parents, and relatives of those youths and men extremely susceptible of excitement without that self-directive power so needful to stop short within due limits of its gratification, and while the billiard saloon keeper chooses to earn his crust in a course so questionable, we are glad that the law is to declare that he shall not profit by affording unlimited opportunities to the weak and vicious for the indulgence of the fearful passion for gaming which he without doubt creates and fosters.

Another staunch friend of the temperance cause in Parliament has been obliged to relinquish his seat in Parliament, Mr. James Cowan, the senior Member of Parliament for the city of Edinburgh. This gentleman has sat for the Scottish capital since 1874. He unseated Mr. John Miller of Leithen, a tried friend, and on the first division after his entrance into Parliament he reversed Mr. Miller's vote, by giving his own to the enemy. In 1875, however, he changed sides, and since then on every division he has voted steadily with Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Had the House divided during the present year the hon. baronet would have been deprived of the pleasure of his support through the illness that has deprived Edinburgh of his valuable services. We have our best wishes for him in his retirement, where away from the excitement and turmoil of a parliamentary life, he will speedily regain in a great measure his usual health and vigour, and enjoy a well earned rest from the anxieties and duties of public life.

It is astonishing to what an extent people are the slaves of habit and custom with regard to the purchase and consumption of strong drink, and how fixed is the idea that such habit and custom are like the Median and Persian law—unalterable. Their conduct in this most important matter is in direct contrast to their conduct in other walks of life. In the latter case, how eagerly do we find the telephone, gas-cooking, and similar marks of improvement, adopted, but when we propose to alter the circumstances of the drinker, so as to afford free play for his better nature, a hundred objections to such a palpable benefit leap from the mind, to arrest the sympathies and chill the first faint indications of co-operation on the part of those to whom we appeal on the drink slave's behalf. Knowledge comes, but truly wisdom lingers. Yet when Sir Garnet Wolseley, by his last order before the attack of Tel-el-Kebir, asked his soldiers to fill their bottles with tea instead of rum, we see how admirable is his wisdom, and we cheerfully attribute a great deal of the success of the storming of that place to the sobriety enjoined upon the British troops. The great lesson is learned for all time, that the might that slumbers in the arm of our gallant soldiers, sailors, and marines, so far from being diminished by abstinence is increased. If a soldier in the tented field is benefited by the want of liquor, how much more those who live at home—the producers and the merchants of the world. They can produce, they do buy and sell better by being really sober, than by a process of "pegging up," blunting their skill, and acumen, and resolution. Once realise this truth, and the habit and custom dies.

Since its recent annual meeting the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has, in consonance with the third resolution then adopted, been prosecuting the agitation with unabated vigour. All connected with it are working hard to indoctrinate the people they have met face to face with the imperative necessity of supporting the demand they have made to Parliament for the redress of the wrongs being inflicted by the liquor traffic on their suffering countrymen and women. The Government of the day is quite well aware that such a demand finds favour in Scotland, but they may resort to the device of asking proof of that, and it will depend upon the proof afforded by the people whether they will see their way or not to grant the reasonable power to protect themselves which the people of Scotland claim. To urge the constituencies to be ready to meet this demand for national unanimity in favour of a veto, the Executive are making every effort to bring their policy before the country, and rejoice at their progress and success. Mr. Waterston has been giving the blue ribbon mission in Edinburgh his valuable assistance, and besides has been, in conjunction with his directors and the Temperance Electoral Committee, engaged in the contest for the representation of the city of Edinburgh. Mr. Blackwood has been visiting the north-eastern fishing villages, and never in his experience has he met with a heartier reception anywhere than from these simple-minded, God-fearing fisher people. Mr. Bennet has had a vigorous campaign in his district, where for three weeks he has had the invaluable assistance of Mr. John Paton. Mr. Stevenson has been busily engaged during the month, and is preparing for a month's vigorous effort in Glasgow. Numerous calls have been made on members of the Executive, and meetings have been addressed by ex-Bailie Torrens, Bailie Selkirk, ex-Provost Dick, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Dr. Cameron, Messrs. M'Callum, Steel, Winning, Mackay, and others. When at length the decisive struggle in Parliament for a Scotch suppressive veto begins the Executive shall have the satisfaction of believing that no means within their compass has been spared to enlighten the country on their principles and policy, and that they may rely with confidence on the support of a community which has ever responded with enthusiasm to their impeachment of the liquor traffic, and greeted their proposal for its suppression with reiterated acclamations.

Mr. John Paton is at present labouring in Scotland, where he will be until 8th December. He will visit New Cumnock, Castle Douglas, Glasgow, Galston, Kilmarnock, Mauchline, Kilbarchan, Maybole, Beith, Dalry, Coatbridge, Kilsyth, Helensburgh, Dunoon, Pollokshaws, and Paisley. In many places he will give a series of lectures; in Paisley he is to be a whole week.

The Duke of Westminster, in one week of the last month, refused to renew the licenses of seven public-houses on his Grace's estates in the neighbourhood of St. George's, Hanover Square, and one public-house in Robert Street, Grosvenor Square, whose lease had expired, was handed over to the incumbent of Hanover Church, to be made into a Club-room, Mission Hall, or some such place, for the benefit of the poor. His Grace's coronet will derive its noblest lustre from such praiseworthy deeds as these.

A BEAM IN THE EYE.

REV. S. HARDING, GLASGOW.

WHAT a lesson the Zulu King taught the deputation from the National Temperance League the other day, who waited upon him to urge him to discourage the use of intoxicating liquors among his people. To the astonishment of the gentlemen forming the deputation, they were informed that there was an order or proclamation issued by him, that spirits should not be allowed to enter his country, and the proclamation would certainly be renewed on his return. "I think, however," added Cetewayo, "that the right place to shut the door is the side from which the spirits are to come. It is no good shutting the door on my side, for I have no distilleries, and I think the proper way would be for you to tell the Government to assist my placing restrictions upon the introduction of spirituous liquors into my country, because border people may transgress and disregard the law without my knowledge. Really the proper place of restriction is at the boundary of my territory."

The foregoing noble utterance does credit to the head and heart of the African monarch, and contains in it the application of the truth taught by the world's great Reformer, "First cast out the beam of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

What a humiliating spectacle! An untutored savage teaching Christian philanthropists the first principles of all social, political, and spiritual reform. Beginning at home. Physician heal thyself.

The question of suppressing intemperance has forced itself upon all ranks and conditions of society, and in every direction we hear drunkenness denounced as the crying sin of the age.

The Church has become alarmed, and in her anxiety and zeal to arrest this mighty evil, has instituted temperance societies, formed Bands of Hope, Blue Ribbon Unions, hoping thereby to counteract this terrible evil, forgetting that these agencies only deal with the outposts of the enemy, while they leave the strongholds of the liquor traffic untouched.

From many pulpits drunkenness is denounced as a fearful sin, and yet in the same churches the drunkard maker is admitted a member, and in many cases appointed an office-bearer. Public-houses are exhibited as places of immorality, and yet there are churches in our midst erected by the liquor traffickers themselves, from the blood-money wrung out of the victims of the traffic. Total abstinence is enjoined upon the individual, and the heads of families are urged to banish the intoxicating cup from their own table, and yet the Church places upon the Lord's Table "the mocker," as an emblem of the blood of him who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. Strange procedure! Amazing inconsistency! While Christians hang down their heads with shame at such an unholy alliance, outsiders sneeringly exclaim, "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye (the Church), and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote (the lesser thing) out of thy brother's eye."

Magistrates must be labouring under a strange delusion, which can only be accounted for by supposing that they have a beam in the eye, or they would see clearly that so long as they grant licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors so long will the people get intoxicated, and the police courts be filled with the victims of intemperance. Fines, imprisonments, extra police, suitable houses and respectable publicans cannot control the traffic, the evil is in the drink, and nothing but its annihilation can cause its terrible consequences to cease. This truth was clearly put to the magistrates not long since by a tramp who had been arrested for disorderly conduct, combined with assault and battery, while under the influence of drink. On his way to the cell, he shouted, "You have arrested the wrong fellow; when I'm sober, my heart is good, when I'm drunk, I'm full of the devil, arrest drink and let me go free." He was right, and unless our magistrates are purblind, or interested in the traffic, they would see that the only way to cure drunkenness as far as they are concerned, is to remove the temptations to drink out of the way of the people. Philanthropists to a very large extent are expending their energies and means in healing the wounds of suffering humanity, instead of enquiring into the cause or seeking their removal. Unless for a beam in the eye they would see clearly that the prolific source of poverty, crime, and depravity which exists is drink and that it is only wasting time to improve a miasma, the only radical cure being its removal. Members of Parliament who are loud in their denunciation of the liquor traffic, and yet vote in opposition to temperance reformers, surely cannot see the anomalous position in which they stand. Unless there was a beam in the eye of one of the greatest living statesmen, he never would have uttered the following, "The evils of the liquor traffic are far greater than the accumulated evils of war, pestilence, and famine," and when the time came in Parliament for the passing of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution, giving the people power to prohibit the liquor traffic in their own localities, he gave his vote against them. Citizens of every shade of politics would discover, if the beam was taken out of their eye that they have been labouring under a strong infatuation by putting party before principles, and measures before men, the welfare of a class before the welfare of the entire community. That party only deserves well of its country which is actuated by the principles of righteousness, truth, justice, the welfare of the people, and the honour and glory of God. Temperance men would also benefit largely by undergoing the operation of having the beam extracted from their eyes, they would then see clearly that a portion of the community, with vested interests, are not likely to be influenced by moral suasion, and that nothing less than the legislative enactment of a law by which the people, who have to bear the burdens and pay the taxes occasioned by the liquor traffic shall have the power to veto that traffic when a majority so desire and determine, will finally root out that system of iniquity.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.

THE Twenty-ninth Annual Meetings of this great political organization were held in Manchester last month, and were eminently successful. The first of the series was a breakfast. The guests filled the great area of the Free Trade Hall. At this meeting the only utterances are the grace before meat and the audible appointment of a committee to arrange business for the Council meeting. We were glad to see that ex-Bailie Torrens' name was the first submitted to the meeting. The Council assembled in the Friends' Meeting House at ten o'clock, by which hour there was a large and enthusiastic gathering of friends from all parts of England, Ireland, and Wales, besides a number from Scotland. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., accompanied by members of the Council Committee, influential friends, members of Executive, and the officials of the Alliance, entered amid a vigorous and protracted outburst of enthusiasm. Sir Wilfrid looked remarkably well, and Mr. Barker, the Secretary, who had been constrained by overwork to go abroad in search of health, was there, apparently quite recovered from his illness. After an interval for silent prayer, the Chairman rose amid loud cheers to address the Council, and did so in a speech marked by all the excellencies which characterize his public addresses. He gave an admirable summary of the situation. While we were humiliated at having accomplished so little, yet we had made progress notwithstanding the formidable obstacles with which we have had to contend. The movement was now respectable—medical men are ranging themselves on our side. The great organizations—Blue Ribbon Associations, Salvation Armies, and good men of all sorts had this cardinal point in their creed—down with the liquor traffic. Judges are more emphatically condemning the traffic. Everybody seems to rejoice that the expenditure on drink is lessening so much. The publicans are frightened out of their wits. Wales has got her Sunday Closing Bill—Cornwall will get it—all these measures are in our direction. Lancashire is ready, Yorkshire is ready, and Cumberland, where I come from, is I think ready. You see when Parliament give Local Option for Sunday they are just granting us what we wish. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I just give you these things to encourage you. Then I look forward also with some hope to what we are going to do next session. You know we are to get Parliament into working order, going to clean our boilers, and oil our machinery, and set everything right. In view of the future then, your main duty is to make your voice heard above all the other demands for reform, so that the Government shall attend to our question, and that without delay.—(Loud cheers.)—The annual report was as usual an able and comprehensive report. In it there are many important references to Scotland, first to Lord Colin Campbell's Licensing Amendment Bill which it characterizes as undoubtedly a very suggestive attempt to deal with the evils of the licensing system of Scotland in the interests of temperance and social progress; and the Alliance took "the attitude of watchful and sympathetic observation," believing that the bill was simply a pilot balloon; second, to the Sunday Steamers Bars Closure Law, now happily in operation; third, to the Haddington Burghs bye-election; to the fortieth Conference of the Evangelical Union, where recognition is made of the importance of imparting a sound Temperance education to the young; and to admit none to membership of the Union unless they are abstainers; and to the Grangemouth appeal case. The following paragraph is under the general operations of the Alliance, and speaks for itself—

The movement in Scotland under the direction of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association continues to exhibit solid and satisfactory progress. During the year a vigorous agitation has been maintained by public demonstrations, which have met with an increasing amount of public sympathy and favour. Conferences, followed by public meetings, have been a conspicuous feature of the work of the year. They have been uniformly successful, and have shown that the temperance party are unanimous upon the imperative necessity for special liquor legislation for Scotland, and also that any action in Parliament having this for its object may depend upon a wide-spread and hearty public support. The various ecclesiastical bodies in Scotland are becoming more decided in their approval of legislative action against the licensing system. The Free Church Assembly and United Presbyterian Synod have petitioned in favour of Local Option legislation for Scotland. During the year the executive organised a deputation to the Earl of Rosebery, and presented a statement on the position of the movement in the country and in Parliament, which evidently impressed his lordship, who agreed to lay the subject before the Government. In furtherance of this object another deputation had a very satisfactory interview with the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for Scotland in London. The movement in Scotland is in a most hopeful condition.

The financial statement showed an income of £12,946 10s. 10d. from subscriptions, £3,874 7s. for Alliance News, and £511 8s. 10d. miscellaneous, being a total of £19,034 19s. 2d., leaving a balance of £1,556 16s. 1d. to carry over. The reports were adopted on the motion of Rev. Dr. M'Fadyen in a speech of great power, followed by an excellent one by Councillor Altham, Burnley. Bailie Torrens in moving the election of office-bearers said—It was very pleasant for him to look upon the scene of that morning. He could look a considerable way back on this movement, when there was no such organization in existence. He remembered very well the early stages of the movement, when they had something to contend for. Now it was quite an easy matter. They had only to say they were teetotalers, and nobody objected to their being so. (Applause.) The day was when a teetotaler was a fool. He remembered very well about 45 years ago, at the early stages of the movement, when a company of gents was standing in the square, and as he passed, "That poor fellow," said one of them "has a slate off." (Much laughter.) Notwithstanding all the cruel things that were said about Sir Wilfrid Lawson, did anybody ever think he had a slate off? (Laughter.) It was very different days now. The working men of the country were beginning to see and feel the value of this great movement, and when the working men discovered that it was for their benefit they would exercise a power which no Government in the country would be able to resist. He did not exactly approve of some of the measures which had been suggested, such as licensing boards. He could not see anything in that. He had been too long a borough magistrate in a licensing court not to know what licensing boards would do. (Hear, hear.) Let the whole thing be handed over to the people. (Loud cheers.) Let them neither have borough magistrates nor licensing boards to do anything with regard to licenses. He did not exactly understand the mode of action in England regarding licensing courts; but he could tell them that one of the years that he was a senior magistrate they refused renewals and new applications to the number of thirty. Then there was an appeal to the justices, who, good gentlemen, came from all parts of the country, and knew no more about the city of Glasgow than if they had never been in it, and did not understand the evils that followed from the conducting of this business, and who granted the thirty licenses over the heads of the magistrates. (Shame.) This had been done away with to a great extent. Dr. Cameron's was a good bill, which provided that where magistrates refused a new applicant it was final, and there was no appeal against it; but if they refused a renewal they could still appeal from it. Dr. Cameron got another bill passed, that intoxicating liquors could not now be sold on those steamboats that plied for hire on the river on Sabbath day. The Lord Advocate gained the credit of this bill, but Sir Wilfrid Lawson would know as well as any man that it was Dr. Cameron's bill. They were moving on, but move on they must. (Hear, hear.) He could not see for the life of him how any reasonable man could reject their Local Option proposition. It was as simple as simplicity could make anything. If they did not want the public-house why did they put it there? If they did want it, the public-house would be there. If he was a publican he would like very much to be put under this regulation; he should be the most free man in the neighbourhood when he got his license, because the population had said, "you ought to have a place for the consumption of liquor;" he would be perfectly independent because it was the appointment of the people, and not the appointment of any single justice or individual. Therefore, give them Local Option, and see how it would work. The Sabbath in Scotland was a very different thing from what it used to be a good many years ago, and he attributed that very much to the closing of public-houses on the Sabbath day. He was glad to see such a revival as the Blue Ribbon and Salvation Armies. To every one we said, "Come along, boys, and do what you possibly can." (Cheers and laughter.) When men began to enjoy the pleasures brought about by the abandonment of drink, they would be the first to remove those places altogether and not bring themselves again into this infernal temptation. (Cheers.) All those different associations were contributing to the grand work by which Great Britain, not merely England, was to be cleared of this terrible curse, and the condition of the people to be ameliorated, and every good object and desire promoted, and if this were successfully done, they would not be able in a short time to know themselves. (Cheers.)

The liveliest possible discussion at an Alliance meeting within our remembrance was that on the speech of

Mr. Alex. Balfour, Liverpool, who wanted licensing boards to control the traffic while fully believing in the sweeping power of prohibition. His speech was followed by Rev. Mr. Lundie, whose experience of the licensing bench only led him to perfect its functions somewhat, giving it functions of regulation, diminution, and extinction. He expressly wished licensing boards, as if we only centred our demand on total prohibition he feared they would have to wait a long time. Both speeches were out of harmony with the sentiments of the Council. The Chairman called upon Mr. Raper to speak, and he did so with effect, his vigorous advocacy of the demand for veto powers being vested in the rate-payers met with loud approbation. Mr. Kempster of London, followed in one of the most trenchant denunciations of a lesser policy we ever heard, and was cheered again and again. Mayor Whittaker following in the same elevated strain, and fairly prostrated the licensing board proposal. Excellent speeches from Mr. Pope, Mr. Thomkinson (in proposing the Council's memorial to the Prime Minister), Dr. F. R. Lees, and other gentlemen kept the audience in the most pleasurable excitement till at four o'clock a hearty vote of thanks to the president, accompanied by three cheers, brought the protracted proceedings to a close.

The evening meeting was an exceedingly gratifying demonstration in every respect. Long before the proceedings began the spacious hall was crowded, about four thousand paying for their seats. As the noble Chairman and speakers filed on to the platform the outburst of cheers and waving of hats made up a most striking scene. The chairman made a most excellent speech, and then Sir Wilfrid spoke. His address deserves a first place among all those that he has delivered, and their name is legion. The audience fairly gave themselves up to the power of the speaker, and bestowed unstinted applause upon him. The speaking was worthy of the occasion, but the speech of the Rev. Dr. Wyllie, Coleraine, next after that of Sir Wilfrid's, was the one which met with the greatest favour. It was a grand speech: less could not with any show of justice be said. There was an overflow meeting which ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., was invited to attend. The worthy magistrate was, as soon as he appeared, invited to the chair, which Mr. Watson, of Rochdale, had to vacate, and did its duties with dignity and wisdom. The speakers at this meeting included Rev. Thomas Hullon, Messrs. J. H. Raper, H. Hibbert, Robert Mackay, Glasgow, and James Whyte. In winding up the proceedings the Chairman met with an enthusiastic reception, which was continued on Mr. Bingham submitting a motion awarding him a vote of thanks.

At the Baptist Union autumnal meeting at Liverpool last month, the Rev. W. Stott, London, seconded by Rev. Mr. Anderson, Liverpool, moved "that grocers' licenses for selling intoxicating liquors are adverse to temperance in our land." The motion was first discussed and then adopted.

DENNY.—A public meeting was held in the Odd-fellows Hall, on Thursday, 19th ult., in connection with the Gospel Temperance Union. Councillor Hunter presided, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather the hall was filled. Mr. J. H. Waterston delivered a very stirring address and there was a choir in attendance which discoursed excellent music. At the close a considerable number signed the pledge and donned the blue ribbon.—Daily Review.

THE BLUE RIBBON IN KIRKCUDBRIGHT.—Mr. A. Bennet, the agent for the Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union, delivered a lecture on temperance, and described the rise and progress of the Blue Ribbon movement, in the Mackenzie Hall, here, on Thursday evening, 5th ult. Councillor Rogerson occupied the chair. There was a fair attendance at the lecture, and Mr. M'Ewan, Kirkcudbright, has consented to receive the names of intending abstainers.—Dumfries and Galloway Standard.—[Mr. A. Bennet is the southern district agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.—Ed. S. R.]

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.—On Sabbath evening last, 1st ult., under the auspices of the "Pride of the Forth" Good Templar lodge, Mr. William Blackwood, Aberdeen (late of Alloa), delivered a temperance sermon in the New Church, Greenfield Place. There was a large attendance, and Mr. Blackwood with his usual fervour and eloquence handled the Temperance question in a way that is seldom equalled in Alloa.—Alloa Advertiser.

TEMPERANCE IN SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES.—Under commission of Mr. Joseph Malins of Birmingham, Mr. L. Balle, G.W.C.T., of the Flourishing Grand Lodge of Norway, has just visited Denmark, organised additional subordinate Lodges and established for them a Grand Lodge of Denmark. This was done at Copenhagen on August 28th, and Mr. W. H. Selmer of Copenhagen was elected G.W.C.T. Mr. Balle was very ably assisted by Captain Reynolds, S.D., Norway. The Rev. E. Garland, of Manchester, has also been visiting the Good Templars of Sweden. He finds 22 Lodges working in the capital—Stockholm—with a membership of 11,000 under a Grand Lodge of Sweden, instituted by Mr. Malins about two years ago.

MILNGAVIE TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.—The second fortnightly meeting for the season of the above society was held in the West End Hall on the evening of Thursday, 12th inst. Mr. John Adams in the chair. The meeting was addressed by Rev. William Young, honorary president, and also by Mr. John Sinclair, who became a member of the society when it was first instituted in the spring of 1830 and has ever since remained devotedly attached to its principles. A few words were also spoken by Miss Mitchell, who joined the society about the same time and is still well known as one of the most active temperance workers in the district. The attendance and the interest exhibited afford the hope that good work will be done in the district during the winter.

American Medical Association adopted the following resolutions:—1st, "Resolved, that in view of the alarming prevalence and ill effects of intemperance with which none are so familiar as the medical profession, and which has called forth from eminent British physicians the voice of warning to the people of Great Britain concerning the use of alcoholic beverages, we, the undersigned, members of the medical profession of the United States, unite in the declaration that we believe alcohol should be classed with other powerful drugs, that when prescribed medicinally it should be done with conscientious caution and a sense of great responsibility. 2nd, Resolved, that we are of the opinion that the use of alcoholic liquors, as a beverage, is productive of a large amount of physical and mental disease; that it entails diseased appetites and enfeebled constitutions upon offspring, and that it is the cause of a large percentage of the crime and pauperism of our cities and country."—Our Union.

EDINBURGH—THE MURPHY MEETINGS.—Mr. Murphy has now been in this city for three weeks and during that time has been in various halls. From the commencement of his meetings all have been crowded and sometimes two meetings in one night. He has had the able support of our leading men—Rev. Principal Cairns, Rev. Principal Rainy, Revs. Dr. Adamson, Kay, and Wilson, Ex-Bailie Lewis, Rev. Messrs. Campbell, Cunningham, &c., besides a number of our warm friends as well as members of the Executive, and Mr. Waterston, the district superintendent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, have rendered great assistance at the meetings. The proceedings have evoked great enthusiasm. Mrs. Richards, Mr. Murphy's daughter, and a beautiful singer, has been of great assistance and is a general favourite. Mr. Murphy, the central figure in this upheaval, in his speaking is simplicity itself. He is of a very lovable disposition and has a wonderful power over his audiences. On several occasions he has come boldly out on prohibition, and intimated that his great desire is to create public sentiment in favour of the ratepayers having the power to prohibit the liquor traffic, and the night previous to the meeting of the temperance party to declare their attitude to all candidates for the representation of the city; he referred to the Parliamentary contest and urged all to unite in aiding us to get the right man returned. The local advocates of the temperance question in the city have also come out at his meetings nobly on the prohibition question, and the mission has been, in consequence of its prohibitory aspect, a great success. Certainly there never has been greater in the permissive prohibitory movement here than on this occasion. During the three weeks now gone, 7,000 have signed the pledge and over 13,000 have donned the blue ribbon. The hand of the Lord seems really in the work, and he is signally blessing the city not merely in advancing the great temperance and prohibitory movement but above and beyond that is making it the means of salvation to many souls.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

THE following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 16th July to 14th October, 1882, inclusive. During that period 323 meetings were held, 143 being deputational, and 180 ordinary. At these meetings 483 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Paisley, Alloa, Tillycultry, Hamilton, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Port-Glasgow, Greenock, Saltcoats, Stevenston, Ardrossan, Strathaven, Stonehouse, Coatbridge, Motherwell, Larkhall, Carlisle, Lanark, Biggar, Pollokshaws, Aberdeen, Fraserburgh, Addiewell, West Calder, Beith, Gateside, and Partick, and addressed 73 meetings.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Gordon, Duns, Selkirk, Galashiels, Peebles, Edinburgh, Forres, Nairn, Elgin, Lossiemouth, Inverness, Fort-William, Largo, Portobello, Nenthorn, Penicuik, Dalkeith, Tranent, Avonbridge, Bo'ness, Culter, Kettle, Pitlossie, Falkland, Ceres, West Calder, Glasgow, Addiewell, Dunbar, Leslie, and Leith, and addressed 71 meetings.

Mr. Andrew Bennet has visited Langholm, Dumfries, Eaglesfield, Ruthwell, Old Cumnock, New Cumnock, Kilmarnock, Glasgow, Saltcoats, Galston, Greenock, Dalbeattie, Strathaven, Coatbridge, Motherwell, Larkhall, Carlisle, Lanark, Biggar, Newton-Stewart, Maxwellton, Sanquhar, Holywood, Castle-Douglas, and Kirkcudbright, and addressed 62 meetings.

Mr. William Blackwood has visited Forres, Macduff, Nairn, Elgin, Lossiemouth, Inverness, Fort-William, Ellon, Aberdeen, Keith, Huntly, Fraserburgh, Grantown, Dufftown, Aberlour, Buckie, Cullen, Gourdon, Tillycultry, Glasgow, and Alloa, and addressed 55 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has visited Paisley, Glasgow, Alloa, Pollokshaws, New Cumnock, Saltcoats, Greenock, Galston, Ardrossan, Kilbarchan, Hamilton, Stonehouse, Coatbridge, Bonhill, Airdrie, and Aitkenhead, and addressed 39 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Old Cumnock, Kilmarnock, Stevenston, Denny, Glasgow, Greenock, Kilwinning, Pollokshaws, Lochgoilhead, Dumfries, Broxburn, and Peebles, and addressed 20 meetings.

Bailie Selkirk, J.P., has visited Lochgoilhead, Glasgow, Alexandria, and Greenock, and addressed 17 meetings.

Mr. William Kesson has visited Glasgow, Paisley, Pollokshaws, Bonhill, Greenock, Kilbarchan, Kilwinning, Hamilton, and Govan, and addressed 17 meetings.

Rev. S. Harding has visited Paisley, Glasgow, Saltcoats, Dalry, Greenock, Port-Glasgow, Bonhill, and Airdrie, and addressed 14 meetings.

Mr. John Paton has addressed 9 meetings in Dumfries, Maxwellton, Castle-Douglas, and Dalbeattie.

Mr. James Winning has addressed 6 meetings in Dalry, Paisley, Mearns, Glasgow, and Lochgoilhead.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has addressed 5 meetings in Duns, Selkirk, Galashiels, Peebles, and Edinburgh.

Rev. J. Strachan has addressed 4 meetings in Dumfries.

Ex-Provost Dick has addressed 4 meetings in Glasgow.

Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., has addressed 3 meetings in Lochgoilhead, Glasgow, and Falkirk.

Mr. J. H. Raper has addressed 3 meetings in Greenock, and Glasgow.

Captain Brochie has addressed 3 meetings in Greenock, Glasgow, and Falkirk.

Rev. Dr. Adamson has addressed 2 meetings in Elgin, and Glasgow.

Rev. John M'Queen has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Rev. J. M'Dermott has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Rev. A. Davidson has addressed 2 meetings in Greenock, and Glasgow.

A. Brown, Esq., J.P., has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

John Wilson, Esq., J.P., has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

James Hamilton, J.P., has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Dr. M. Cameron has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow, and Kilsyth.

Mr. D. Ramsay has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh, and Dalkeith.

Mr. R. Risk has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Miss Johnston has addressed a meeting in Maxwellton.

Mrs. Robertson has addressed a meeting in Glasgow.

Mrs. Helen Kirk has addressed a meeting in Glasgow.

The following gentlemen have each taken part in the proceedings of meetings in the places which follow their names:—C. H. Meldon, Esq. Q.C., M.P., Glasgow; Dr. Cameron, M.P., Glasgow; Rev. Dr. Hutton, Paisley; W. Harrison, Edinburgh; R. Primrose, Glasgow; O. Dryer, Sanquhar; P. Thomson, Greenock; J. Kirk, jun., Glasgow; James Paton, Glasgow; G. Gladstone, Glasgow; E. J. Boon, Glasgow; J. D. Grant, West Calder; D. Taylor, West Calder; P. M'Laren, West Calder; M. Dickson, Leith; J. Dickson, Leith; and J. P. Clark, Leith; Provost Macpherson, Glasgow; Ex-Bailie Lewis, J. P., Dumfries; Councillors Lang, Greenock, and Russell, Perth; J. Williams, Esq., J.P., Glasgow; Messrs. John Steel, Dalkeith; T. Barclay, Glasgow; R. M'Callum, Glasgow; J. C. M'Donald, Saltcoats; J. Butters, Edinburgh; M. Edwards, Aberdeen; H. Hobekirk, Glasgow; A. Williamson, West Calder; James Paul, Elgin; M'Pherson, Elgin; J. Carson, Maxwellton; J. Miller, Glasgow; J. Morris, Glasgow; J. Conchar, Glasgow; W. Hart, Glasgow; W. W. Hunter, Glasgow; R. Simpson, Glasgow; R. Semple, Glasgow; J. Stewart, Glasgow; Jas. M'Adam, Glasgow; J. M'Dermid, Glasgow; J. Jamieson, Glasgow; J. Jeffrey, Glasgow; R. Miller, Glasgow; H. Wyatt, Glasgow; J. Ronald, Glasgow; D. Fortune, Glasgow; A. M'Dougall, Glasgow; J. Stark, Dumfries; J. Copeland, Glasgow; J. Hume, Dumfries; C. Thomson, Dumfries; W. May, Maxwellton, and H. Chalmers, Glasgow.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

The Crusade. Devoted to the Promotion of the great Temperance Reform. July and August, 1882. Offices, New Bridge Street, Ludgate Circus, London, E.E. One penny monthly. This magazine is worthy of a foremost place among our monthly temperance journals. Well printed, liberally filled with freshly gathered matter, abreast of the latest discoveries in alcohols and their results, it will be found worthy of the patronage of the thoughtful temperance reformer, to whom it will, after the perusal of a few numbers, become indispensable. We always welcome it with pleasure.

My Neighbours' Windows. By Emilie Searchfield. London: T. E. Longley, 39 Warwick Lane, E.C. This very handsome volume contains five stories whom pensiveness has clearly marked for her own. They all point a moral very often neglected in these days. The first warns us against waiting till mother dies for marital bliss—the second against false lovers and consequent marriages with other mates that we do not really love—the third against slackness in wooing and the flimsy romantic in love—the fourth against insincerity in sisters where the lover loves the one sister and is loved by the other, and submitting to a woman's indecision—and the fifth that all our love may come to nought, even when deserved, but that that need be no calamity. It is a great treat to see as you read how all these ideas are gradually wrought out. If one is sad here he may learn that others are equally sad through love, and embrace the consolation—if one is happy here, he can as in a mirror contrast one's felicity with that of those characters Emilie Searchfield brings before the reader, and rejoice. To our mind the love of a lifetime is the best of the whole, but we cordially recommend this new fruit of the author's experienced and elegant writing to all who prefer a story to the elaborated three volume novel.

The present position of the Communion Wine Question.—By John Hope. Edinburgh: British League Office. Bearing this title we have three distinct tracts under one cover, all however dealing with the communion wine question. The first of these gives a resume of progress and present state of the question, suggests special communion services as a remedy for the persistent refusal of supplying unfermented wine at the communion, supplies a summary of the latest Assembly decisions upon the question, and gives suggestions for the future. The second tract deals with the "Heredity of alcohol" and gives in full Dr. Norman Kerr's paper on that subject which was read at the International Congress for the study of alcoholism held in August, 1880, at Brussels. The third tract treats of how best to preserve the peace of the church on the unfermented wine question, which it illustrates by lengthy reference to the debate in the U.P. Presbytery of Glasgow on the Kent Road case. Taken as a whole, the publication before us is remarkable for clearness of statement, fullness of detail, and fervour of utterance. Those, who, like ourselves, fully sympathise with this important, and, we shall add, triumphing movement, will find in Mr. Hope's tracts excellent suggestions as to the best means for securing the ultimate triumph of their opinions in the various churches of our land; and those who at present occupy the unfortunate position of being opposed or indifferent to the movement will find in those pages abundant argument why they should alter their present attitude towards it.

Curious Notions, etc.—Belfast: Allan and Johnston. Probably a more appropriate title for this readable little work, would have been "Anti-humbug notions;" for certainly anti-humbug is the prominent characteristic of every paragraph it contains. The writer is possessed of considerable humour, good sense, and forcible expression. These notions jotted down at odd times are throughout unmerciful attacks and scornful delineations of drinking, smoking, gluttony, workman's strikes and laziness, luxurious living, extravagant dressing, and other manifestations of human depravity. Here is how our author writes of the general disjointedness of things:—"Let us now set about doing something—putting wrongs to right; let us get rid of unnecessary curses, sweeping them away as dirt; let us act like reasonable beings; let us practise more common-sense and honesty in all our industries and trade; let competent men be put forward to guide public opinion and the State, and our clouds will vanish, our prospects brighten, and our sunshine will be interrupted by fewer spots." This is his view of the Bible wine question:—"It has never yet been proved by any philosopher, theologian, or divine that it was intoxicating liquor, or fermented wine, which was used at the institution of the Lord's Supper, and it is simply unreasonable, ignorant, and blasphemous to teach that it was." We don't know if this is history or not, but it is worth quoting as another sample of our author's notions—"An unfortunate mosquito out West bit a Good Tippler, and died soon after of delirium tremens."

We are glad to observe that in Messrs. Ward and Lock's "Epochs and Episodes of History" a number of which lies before us, the Temperance movement finds a fitting place. This we regard not only as an indication of the enlightened editorship of that highly interesting work, but also as a deserved compliment to a movement which De Quincey, nearly forty years ago, termed "the most remarkable instance of a combined movement in Society." The writer, in the necessarily limited space assigned to him, has produced a pretty accurate and certainly an interesting account of not only the ancient "watermarks" of the movement, but also of its modern ramification and operations.

The now familiar scarlet and gilt binding of the Onward Reciter peeping through the papers on our table reminds us that we must say a good word about that useful little publication. This is the eleventh volume, lying before us, and it is pleasing to learn, what indeed from the varied and excellent nature of the contents we might have readily expected, that it has been even more successful than any of its predecessors. It must be found very useful to conductors of young folk's meetings of whatever sort, as it contains a great many original readings and dialogues. We are glad at the Reciter's success in the past and we heartily wish it a continuance of that success in the future.

Speaking of the Reciter reminds us of Onward itself, with its beautiful pictures, its interesting stories, and its instructive little articles. This periodical, devoted more particularly to the Band of Hope movement, has improved by leaps and bounds until now it is as delightful a little magazine as one could wish. Our sympathies are always with its promoters.

But we have another favourite magazine, which comes to us month by month, and finds a hearty welcome, we mean The Temperance Worker. Volume ten, which we have just received, presents a treasure house of rich and varied material which cannot fail to be of immense assistance especially to budding temperance advocates, who have generally but little time to prepare for the work they have possibly ardently undertaken.

We are reminded of the silent yet all too rapid flight of the year by the arrival of the People's Almanack for 1883. This almanack is issued by the Religious Tract Society, and like all the publications of that excellent society, it is very acceptable. Its contents embrace motto texts for each day of the coming year, many useful receipts and hints, suitable for the household, interesting anecdotes and an abundance of superior illustrations. We have little doubt but that the solid worth of its contents will secure for it a very large circulation.

The Mountain Stream: a record of the Temperance Movement in the Scottish Highlands. The Highland Temperance League, Oban. This is an interim report of the League: and it is not so much a record of work in the Highlands as it is of work among Highlanders, for Aberdeen, Perth, and London are certainly not in the Highlands, and these centres have been wrought by the League. There is a blemish in the report, namely, when it is affirmed "that the work of the League is a gospel mission: the pledge is a gospel temperance pledge; the lecturers place the gospel first and temperance follows: this is the backbone of the success which by God's blessing has attended the work of the League." Now these statements are an answer to some persons who doubt the gospel teaching of the League or they imply an undue subservience to the prevailing sentiments of the hour. The League should be generous, it can afford to be so. All kindred Temperance Associations in Scotland are fighting the common enemy on gospel lines just as the League is doing. They plead with the drinkers that they should cease to do evil—to expel the demon that has dominated their lives too long, and they point them to the cross as the place whence to receive that grace which will be the source of their effective resistance to the seductions of intemperance. It would have been graceful in the League to have acknowledged this and not by implication of its own superiority in this matter condemned all other associations. Having said this we have much gratification in noting the work done by the League. Financially it is getting out of debt, having secured £182 in London, Liverpool, and Manchester, the committee have reduced the debt existing at the end of the year from £94 to £26, and see their way to extinguish it altogether. By the efforts of their agents, Messrs. Ross and Robertson, 991 have joined during the first seven months of the present year. They have held 297 meetings, 40 of them in Gaelic, formed 23 local branches of the League, and enlisted the sympathy of 87 Highlanders in London and Liverpool, while 3,515 have signed the pledge. At this rate of progress it may be anticipated that the Highlands of Scotland will soon be all adherents of temperance. Well, whether or not the anticipation is realised the League deserves praise, and has our best God speed in its noble work.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. W. CLARK, ABERDEEN.—It is but yesterday that in our pages we noted the departure of this staunch friend of the movement to the distant shores of Africa, whither he was bound in search of health, and now, alas, we have to record his decease, which occurred at Aberdeen, from apoplexy, on the 4th September at the early age of 56 years. Mr. Clark in early life "whistled at the plough," but by earnest study he soon rose above his lowly birth and iron fortune. He left the furrows of the soil to educate himself to upcast the furrows of the human mind, enabling them to receive the seeds of wisdom and the dew of grace and so be fruitful as Kedar and Sharon. He at one time aimed at the ministry and studied under Rev. Professor Morison, D.D., for some time. He accepted a temporary engagement in the Broad Street Academy, Aberdeen, but he remained there for many years until, indeed, he was compelled to relinquish through ill-health the most congenial work he ever had. After being with the railway company and superintending the work of Mr. Marshall for years, he finally became the manager of the Clayhills, latterly the Rosemount Provision Works. Of his personal character we cannot speak too highly. He was a man of exalted worth, full of the milk of human kindness, his whole being pervaded by active virtue. He exerted a powerful influence over young people and delighted in his young men's Bible class. With kindred spirits he was in his element, and having maintained his studious habits throughout life he was as formidable in controversy as he was instructive, expressive, and valued by those privileged to listen to the outpourings of his highly-cultured mind. He sympathised with the progressive movements of the day, but wisely preferred those of education and temperance to all others. He lived to see the question of education far advanced into the region of a final settlement and that of temperance on the borders of a decisive triumph. His labours in behalf of temperance were legion. He had bottomed that question. He vigorously remonstrated against the use of teetotalism as a synonym for temperance and we found ourselves in hearty accord with his arguments. He early saw the true relation between temperance and prohibition, and unsparingly exposed the growing fallacy that made his less intelligent and weaker colleagues stumble at restriction. It was better that there should be 200 thieves in the country than 2,000, but until thieves were extirpated property was unsafe; so it is better that we have 6,000 public-houses in Scotland than double the number as at present, but we shall never see the triumph of the temperance reformation until the people are entrusted with a power of veto sufficient to sweep all of them away. As a preacher, lecturer, and public speaker his services were ever in demand, and the news of his untimely decease will grieve many who have owned in their altered life the power of his appeal to the wicked to forsake his way and the unrighteous his thoughts and turn to the Lord. His funeral was largely attended by mourning friends and his remains consigned to their kindred dust with every mark of sorrowful regard and regret.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

By ANNIE S. SWAN.

Author of "Shadowed Lives," "Thankful Rest," "Fruits," &c.

CHAPTER VI.—REPENTANCE.

Before Lizzie came back from her honeymoon, Tom Hislop had conveniently forgotten his half-made promise to his sister, and visited Andrew Sutherland's oftener than ever. What liquor he consumed in the house nobody guessed.

Doctor Hislop's popularity was waning in Strathglide. You would not care about calling into your house a medical man who was often the worse of liquor, neither did the people in Strathglide, and it was whispered that now his sister was married, he would go to the dogs as fast as possible.

Late in the autumn an incident occurred, which destroyed faith in him almost entirely.

A child of Andrew Sutherland's, a delicate thing, barely a year old, was suffering from a low fever.

He called in Doctor Hislop, much against his wife's will, but it would not pay the landlord of the Half-Way House to offend one of his best customers.

One evening the doctor was standing in the bar of the Half-Way House chatting to the landlord, and leisurely sipping his brandy, when Mrs. Sutherland looked in and asked him to come and see the child, it seemed to be worse. He went up, felt the child's pulse, looked at his tongue and departed, saying he would send down the boy with some medicine, and look in in the morning. The medicine came in due time, and was administered according to the directions written on the phial. Before seven o'clock the next morning a messenger was sent in hot haste for the doctor, they feared the child was dying. Before he reached the house their fears were realised, the child died apparently in great pain. Doctor Hislop was astounded, though he did not say so. He strode to the mantel, took the phial in his hand, and examined the contents. Mrs. Sutherland was busy at the bed, but she was watching him closely, and she saw his face change to a livid hue, and his lips compress tightly, as if under the influence of some strong feeling; and so he was. He had prepared the medicine when his brain was in a muddled state, when he was no more fit to touch such dangerous things than his own stable boy. He had given the child a dose sufficient to kill a strong man. He left the house hurriedly, only saying in a brief confused way, that the fever had taken an unexpected turn, but he would not have thought the result would have been so rapidly fatal. He had to say something, you know. What would you have said in the like circumstances?

From that hour that woman hated him, and she did his reputation irreparable injury in the place. The report got abroad that he had poisoned Sutherland's baby when he was drunk, and people began to think it wiser to send to Claybridge for medical advice. So things were not looking very bright for Tom Hislop, and his prospects were the only dark spots in his sister's sky. Of her happiness I cannot write, because my words are so weak. That little home in Claybridge was all that a home ought to be, all that a home is when there is a woman like Lizzie in it. One evening about a month after the death of Sutherland's baby, Doctor Hislop was coming home from a long ride across the country. He chose a near cut across the fields, a dangerous thing to do on a dark night, especially with a timid restless horse. He was riding slowly with the reins lying loosely on the saddle, and his hat drawn over his brows. The path was narrow and uneven; a hedge skirted one side, and on the other was a deep ditch; one false step and he would be thrown. As he turned his horse's head round a sudden curve the animal's foot slipped on the wet ground and he slid into the ditch with his rider beneath him. There was no human aid nearer than the town, nearly two miles off; but the fall rendered the poor young man unconscious. The animal managed to extricate himself, and set off home at a leisurely pace. Save for a scratch or two on the knees he was unhurt. Some farm labourers lounging home after spending an hour in Sutherland's tavern, met the animal and guessed what had happened. They procured a lantern and set off to try and trace by the horse's hoofs which way he had come. It was not a difficult matter, for a heavy shower had obliterated all marks of the day's traffic from the dusty road. In half an hour they found the injured man still insensible. When they lifted him he uttered a groan and partially opened his eyes, but almost immediately relapsed into unconsciousness. They carried him home, and a conveyance was despatched to Claybridge for his sister and a doctor. For days Tom Hislop lay in that darkened room, with Lizzie watching by his bedside for the first spark of returning consciousness. The stupor was succeeded by a brain fever, beneath which he almost succumbed. But he had an iron constitution to help him in the struggle, and at length, in the grey dawn of a chill November morning, he opened his eyes and looked straight into Lizzie's, and she knew that he was saved. A poor thin shadow of his former self he was, as a man must be who has been face to face with death; but time and care would remedy that. He seldom spoke even to his sister, though she never left him. He would lie for hours looking through the window at the bare tree tops and the grey sky above them; she sometimes wondered what were his thoughts. Towards the close of the last day of November Lizzie was sitting on a low chair at the hearth in the sick room sewing, and thinking of her husband. The very thought of him brought a smile to her lips, so sweet and tender that it beautified her whole face. These six months of married life had been to Arthur Tennant's wife months of unalloyed happiness. The firelight danced and played about her feet, and fell too with a subdued glow on her brother's white face, lying on the pillow looking still at the trees and the sky. By and bye he turned his gaze to his sister's face, and contemplated it for a long time in silence. At length he spoke.

"Lizzie."

She was by his side in a moment.

"I've been near death's door this turn, haven't I?"

"Yes, Tom."

She spoke gravely, as befitted the subject.

"If I had died as I was, Lizzie, where do you suppose I would have been now?"

She shivered slightly and answered nothing.

"When a fellow has to lie here day after day, Liz," he said, half dreamily, "he gets thinking about things which used to be far enough from his mind." "If I live," he added, with great earnestness, "it will be to show you that these days have done me good. From this day, Liz, the old life is done away with and a new and a better one begun. I have been a poor brother to you, my dear," he said, caressing her head with his poor weak fingers. "But you will forgive me, I know, won't you, and help me on?"

She knelt down by him and drew his head to her breast, and cried over him as a mother might have done over her child. She was years older than he in thought and feeling, and the words she spoke to him there showed that she felt it strongly at that moment.

There was a long silence then, yet there did not seem to be any need of words.

"What I mean to do is this, Lizzie," went on Tom with great humility. "When I am strong again, I'll seek my fortune across the seas. I think I could do better away from this place."

It flashed through Lizzie's mind that it would be the manlier course to show the strength of his resolution, and the earnestness of his repentance, to build the new life on the old site, and practise it among those who had known him at the worst. But she did not say so. She shrank from casting even a fleeting shadow on this hour of real repentance and new formed resolutions for a nobler future. Her prayers that night were all for Tom. It seemed to her heart that the shadows were all fleeing away, that God had lightened the burdens and given the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. It was only the calm before the storm, a green oasis in life's desert, a golden time of peace before the great tumult.

Why is it, I wonder, that such as Lizzie Tennant are chosen to go through the deepest waters of affliction. Perhaps because the heavenliness within sustains them where weaker ones would fail. And after all, it is through much tribulation on earth that the brightness of our eternal crown is gained above.

CHAPTER VII.—LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION.

The year was three weeks old before Tom Hislop set foot out of doors. Lizzie had gone home to Claybridge a week before Christmas, happier in heart about her brother than she had ever been in her life; but only time would test his new-born resolutions.

It soon became known in Strathglide that he intended giving up his practice in the place, and seeking his fortune elsewhere. Towards the close of February these rumours received confirmation, for a new medical man took up his abode in Strathview, and Dr. Hislop went to Claybridge to his sister's house, to await the advent of more genial weather to take the long sea voyage which lay between him and his new home. Queensland was the place he had fixed upon.

When the good people of Strathglide actually found that Doctor Hislop was really going from their midst, they became loud in their expressions of regret. All his faults were forgotten, and they spoke of him only as he had been in the earlier part of his life among them, so he found the last weeks of his stay in Scotland pleasanter than he had anticipated. Several of his more ardent admirers, anxious to give tangible expressions of their opinions, got up a testimonial, and asked him to a complimentary supper to receive it.

It was to be held in the Eagle Hotel in Claybridge on the night of the 23rd of March. By this time it was fixed that he should sail for Queensland in the second week of April.

An invitation to the supper was of course sent to his brother-in-law, Arthur Tennant, but Arthur did not care to accept. He was not afraid of himself now, but it was the wiser plan to avoid all temptations like poison. And at those complimentary suppers, my friends, you know how many toasts are to be drunk, and how freely the wine cup is circulated round the table.

After tea on the afternoon of the 23rd, Arthur Tennant and his wife were together in the dining-room of their house in Claybridge. It was not exactly in Claybridge, for it was a pretty cottage, standing in a roomy garden at the outskirts of the town. Lizzie was sitting in the window sewing, and all her womanly hopes and tears followed every stitch of the wonderful little garments; a new experience was at hand for her. Arthur was leaning up against the mantel talking of Tom. Lizzie glanced at him now and then, thinking he was a husband of whom any woman might have been proud. And so he was; for in those happy months, all the old manly beauty had come back to his face, and the peace of an upright life shone upon it.

"Tom still thinks you are going to the supper, Arthur," said his wife, by and by.

"I have scarcely spoken to him about it," answered Arthur. "It seems odd to refuse, but don't you think it better for me to stay at home?"

"Yes, Arthur, I do think so."

She spoke very quietly, but there was earnest conviction in her voice.

"Then of course I will," he said. "Besides, I could not leave you so long alone, it would not be right."

She smiled a little, in a pleased happy way, though she spoke nothing of her thoughts.

Arthur looked at her for a moment, at the brown head and the sweet face bent over her work, and the busy fingers plying the needles, till something made him go to her and throw an arm round her.

"Liz," he said, raising her face in both his hands, and looking into it with long loving gaze. "Have you never regretted having married me?"

"Regretted! Oh, Arthur!"

She leaned her face on his hand, and he felt a tear upon it; it was a question he need not have asked.

"To-day when I was coming home, my wife," he said fondly, "I wondered why God had been so good to me in giving me yourself and your love. Your heart is mine, isn't it, Lizzie?"

She lifted her face to his, blushing like a school girl, her eyes brimming with the love she could not utter. Just then they heard Tom's steps in the lobby, and the stolen moment was over. He came into the room in his noisy blustering way, bringing with him a whiff of the keen March air from without.

"Well, Arthur," he said, flinging himself on the sofa, "You'll be going up to the Eagle with me to-night to see this great ceremonial?"

"No, Tom, I think not."

Tom sat up in amazement. "In the name of wonder, why not?"

"I have several reasons," said Arthur briefly; "and they won't miss me."

Tom's face clouded.

"You don't really mean it, Arthur," he said, pettishly. "What on earth am I to say when they ask me where you are. Come, Liz, use your influence, or are you keeping him at home?"

"Arthur is not anxious to go, Tom," she answered quietly. "He will never be missed."

"Well, if he won't come I'll be absent too. Where's the use of going if one's own kith and kin set their faces against it?" cried Tom, with the air of an ill-used school boy. "It's too bad of you, Arthur, you might go to oblige me if for nothing else, and it's the last thing of the kind you'll be asked to do for me. Come, think better of it; your absence won't look well."

He lounged out of the room as he spoke, and the husband and wife were left again alone.

"Well, Lizzie, I didn't think he would have taken my absence so much to heart," said Arthur. "Hadn't I better go for an hour to please him, as he says it will be the last time?"

"Do you want to go, Arthur?"

"I should like it well enough," he answered. "And you know I need not touch anything. They all know I am a rigid abstainer, and besides, I have no fear now. What's the use of my self-control if I can't stand temptation for an hour?"

She sighed, and the shadow of a great fear gathered in her eyes. Plainly Arthur's heart was set on going, and he seemed to have no fear for himself. Perhaps she was foolish, but—"If you would like to go, Arthur," she said slowly, "do so; but oh! is it wise? Do you think there is no danger?"

"Oh, no danger at all," he said lightly, and he drew himself up in the pride of his assurance. "Well, I'll tell Tom I'll go with him for an hour. It will please him, and poor fellow he is going far enough away, it may be the last time I may have the opportunity."

So the matter was settled, and Lizzie said no more. She was not one of those women who say much, as you know, but her heart was full. At half past seven the two left the house. While Tom was putting on his overcoat in the lobby, Arthur went into the dining-room for a word with Lizzie.

She went close to him, clinging to him with strange earnestness, and her eyes were full of an unspoken dread.

"Oh, Arthur," she said, low and hurriedly, "remember. Take care, don't be tempted. Perhaps I am foolish, but I can't forget."

He drew her within his sheltering arms, his heart touched with remorse.

"Don't fear, my darling," he said. "Good God! do you think I could so far forget myself and you. Don't fret, I shall be home before ten, and we shall have a quiet chat before Tom comes."

She hid her face a moment, his words had no power to dispel her dread.

Tom was calling him in the lobby, and Arthur stooped to his wife and kissed her compassionately.

"My darling, I wish I wasn't going for your sake. Don't fret, Lizzie, I won't be long away."

She smiled, and drawing herself from his embrace, she went to the lobby and touched her brother's arm.

"Tom," she said, in a low voice, "take care of Arthur to-night; remember he is all I have after you are gone."

Then she went back to her lonely hearth and listened to their footsteps till they died away in the stillness. She had taken up her sewing again, but it fell from her listless fingers; she folded it up and took a book from the table, but she read without comprehending a word. She opened the piano then, and ran her fingers over the keys, but such a wild unrest possessed her that she struck only broken chords.

Finally she threw herself on the sofa, and drawing the tiger skin over her tried to sleep; it was the quickest way to pass the time.

She fell into a light slumber, and when she awoke the clock hands pointed to eleven, and Arthur had not come home. She sprang up and touched the bell.

"I came in to set the supper, ma'am, at half-past nine," said the servant, when she appeared. "But you were sleeping so well that I was frightened to disturb you. Shall I bring the tray now?"

"Yes, Mary."

The girl brought the tray and left it on the table. Her mistress poured out a cup of chocolate and drank it feverishly, but ate nothing.

"You may go to bed now, Mary," she said, when she had finished. "You must be tired, I have had a rest, and can easily wait for the gentlemen."

"Very well, ma'am," replied the girl, nothing loth.

So in a few minutes Lizzie was the only watch in the quiet house, and she sat shivering before the blazing fire, her heart breaking with fear. The minutes sped. It was close on midnight when she heard the garden gate swing upon its hinges. It was followed by footsteps on the gravelled path, and she rose to her feet, pressing her hand to her heart to still its wild throbbing. She heard the outer door flung open, and in a moment Arthur burst into the room. Oh my God! to look at him there, at the change those hours had wrought, might have made the strongest shudder. His hat was gone, and his black locks matted with the rain and dishevelled with the night wind. His face was pale, and his teeth clenched. And his blood-shot eyes were rolling in a drunken frenzy—the demon had entered in once more and conquered.

Lizzie Tennant's heart died within her at that moment, and she stood as if turned to stone. He turned his flaming eyes on her face, and spoke in hoarse, fierce tones.

"Is there anything in the house, whisky, brandy, anything? get me it quick."

Then a wild cry broke from her lips, but he did not seem to hear it.

"You got some when you were ill," he went on. "Where is it, get me it quick, or I'll do you harm?"

He tore open the sideboard doors, and began rummaging for it. She knew there was a bottle of spirits scarcely touched in one of the recesses. She sprang to him, trying to keep him back.

"Rise, Arthur, there is none; don't touch it."

She wretched her arms about him, trying to draw him from it. But his greedy eyes had caught sight of it, and he would not be kept from it. He tried to shake her off, but she managed to close the doors, and set herself against it. The fury of a demon raged in his breast and he raised his hand, yes, against the woman he loved ten thousand times better than himself. It fell upon her breast with a cruel stroke, she reeled from him and fell heavily to the ground.

Outside the night wind moaned drearily over the wreck of human happiness the evil thing had wrought, and the rain fell with a mournful dripping on the leaves.

In the chill March dawn, after hours of desperate agony, a son was born to Arthur Tennant, but it was dead. As the skilled physician had surmised, there was no hope of the mother's life. She died, with none but strange faces round her bed, but of that and of all else she was utterly unconscious. In the room below her husband was sleeping off the effects of the night's carouse with the empty bottles broken on the floor beside him.

In the window sat Tom Hislop heart-sick with remorse and pain, dreading his awakening. When the morning came, and they told Arthur Tennant what the dawn had brought, he was like a madman in his agony.

But on that hour I have neither the heart nor the power to dwell. Let me pass on.

PRIVATE VICES PUBLIC BENEFITS.

An Old Story with an older and still existing parallel.

IN the month of July, 1723, the Grand Jury of Middlesex "presented as injurious to morality" a book entitled, "The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits, with an Essay on Charity and Charity Schools, and a search into the nature of Society." The Grand Jury complained "that books and pamphlets are published almost every week, which affirm fate, deny a Divine Providence, and recommend luxury, avarice, pride, and all kinds of vices, as being necessary to the public welfare." The "Fable" was also severely animadverted upon in "A letter to the Right Honourable Lord C.," printed in The London Journal for 27th July, 1723. The author vindicated himself from the aspersions contained in this letter and the presentment of the Grand Jury, in an article published in The London Journal for the 10th August following. These denunciations were followed by several printed exposures of the "dreadful tendency" of the "Fable." One of these was written by Dr. Fiddes, an eminent metaphysical divine of the period; a second by John Denny, whose performance was entitled "Vice and Luxury Public Mischief"; a third by William Law, author of the "Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life," whose work, entitled "Remarks on the Fable of the Bees," has been pronounced by a writer in the last published volume of the new edition of the "Britannica" to be "a gem." It is to be found in the second volume of his collected works, published in 1762, and has been reprinted a few years ago under the editorial supervision of the late Professor Maurice. The "Fable" was also reviewed in Bluet's "Enquiry whether the general practice of virtue tends to the wealth or poverty, benefit or disadvantage of a people. In which the pleas offered by the author of the 'Fable of the Bees' for the usefulness of vice and roguery are considered, with some thoughts concerning a toleration of public stews." The last clause of this title refers to another work by the author of the "Fable," "recommending," to quote the statement of a writer in the English Cyclopædia, "the public licensing of stews, the matter and manner of which are, certainly, exceptionable, though it must, at the same time, be stated that Mandeville earnestly, and with seeming sincerity, recommends his plan as a means of diminishing immorality, and that he endeavoured, so far as lay in his power, by fixing a high price, and in other ways, to prevent the work from having a general circulation." Mandeville's plan and Mandeville's motives are similar in all essential respects to the plan and the motives adopted and avowed by the advocates of the licensing system, which has been proved to be the organising centre and sustaining energy of stews, and every other social abomination. They also profess to have the interests of morality at heart, they seek to diminish drunkenness and its attendant evils, and endeavour, so far as lies in their power, by fixing a high price on the article, to prevent it from having a general circulation, forgetting all the time that, as license sanctions what is licensed, it is a most paradoxical way to denounce the whole of a vice by first sanctioning a part of it. Verily, the advocates of license are not in a position to cast even a pebble at Mandeville. The day will assuredly come when posterity will look back with as much horror upon the law's licensing intoxicants, as we look upon the licensed toleration of brothels. Let us now resume our sketch of the literary conflict concerning the "Fable." Two Scotch professors (Hutcheson of Glasgow, and Campbell of St. Andrews) also joined in the fray, and the final assault was delivered so late as 1732, by the famous George Berkeley, bishop of Cloyne, who devoted the second dialogue of his "Alciphion" to the demonstration of the thesis that private vices can never become public benefits. The author of the work assailed replied in a letter to Dion, occasioned by his book called "Alciphion."

The writer of the book which created all this uproar and keen controversial war was a Dutch doctor, named Bernard Mandeville, born at Dort, about the year 1670, who came to London within the first decade of the next century. Having little or no practice in his profession, he lived partly by his pen, and partly from a pension bestowed on him by some Dutch merchants. Sir John Hawkins records that "he was said to be coarse and overbearing in his manners where he durst be so, yet a great flatterer of some vulgar Dutch merchants, who allowed him a pension." He seems to have had the art of ingratiating himself with the upper ten; for it is related that he was patronised by the first Earl of Macclesfield, "at whose table he was a frequent guest." In 1709 he published his first work "on a coarse subject, written in a coarse style," which it is no part of our vocation to name. Another of his productions is, however, both per se, and, as lying in our line, more worthy of mention. The consumption of gin was then something enormous, and was causing proportionate mischief. The moralist who affirmed private vices to be public benefits was prepared to show the reasonableness of this consumption, and to demonstrate that the nation could not prosper without it. Mandeville defended the distillers in a series of articles printed in The London Journal. Sir John Hawkins states that "he sometimes employed his talents for hire, and, in particular, wrote letters in The London Journal in favour of spirituous liquors, for which he was paid by the distillers." These letters were also censured by the Middlesex Grand Jury. In 1714, appeared "The Grumbling Hive, or Rogues turned Honest"—a poem comprised in about four hundred octo-syllable lines. This work was afterwards published as "The Fable of the Bees," with the addition of prose dissertations and notes in 1723, and again, 1728, with additional supplementary matter, in two volumes. Mandeville died in January, 1733, the year after his reply to Berkeley.

Mandeville inculcates through the medium of his fable of the grumbling hive that national prosperity depends on the prevailing operation of luxury and fraud. He endows his bees with dispositions and powers similar to those of men. He portrays how they try to overreach each other in their various avocations, and explains how the riches amassed by means of these sins lead, on the principle that "it's an ill wind that blows nobody good," to the advantage of others, who, in their turn, practise the same tricks upon the wealthy. He then lays down that this wealth, which, according to him, cannot be got without fraud, is the only criterion of a nation's greatness. Wealth, being now generally diffused among the bees of this imaginary hive, they all become jealous of this universal swindling, and resolve to put a stop to it, and to act honestly with each other for the future, a resolution which is soon followed by the ruin of their community. In the "Enquiry into the Origin of Moral Distinctions," appended to "The Fable of the Bees," virtue and vice, moral approbation and disapprobation, are alleged to have been implanted in the minds of their subjects by their respective governments, with the view of preserving their own authority, and conserving society. The writer in the English Cyclopædia already quoted, remarks, "Incredible as it seems that such a proposition as this should be seriously put forth, it is yet more so that it should come from one whose professed object was, however strange the way in which he set about it, to promote good morals, for there is nothing in Mandeville's writings to warrant the belief that he sought to encourage vice." There is a modicum of truth in this paradoxical proposition. Our ingenious theorist is seldom, if ever, absolutely wrong, and Mandeville, at least, is not one of the exceptions to this rule. The atom of truth lying concealed in the mud of the Dutch doctor's paradox in this, that law is a creator and a regulator of ethical sentiment. A principle protected by its sanction becomes, for that very reason, recommended to the notice and obtains the assent of the numerous and unreflecting class who accept authority for reason. A questionable doctrine may thus, by a large number, be regarded as a dictate of the moral faculty, or, if not exactly that, as something which, though not inculcated by, is not opposed to it. Legislation is the leading agent in the formation of this image of morals. Custom, and, to a still greater degree, legislation supporting and sanctioning custom, are able to create and to sustain an overwhelming amount of what passes for moral sentiment. But though, when properly directed, they can assuredly strengthen, neither of these agencies can call into being a single axiom or lay the foundation of a single law pertaining to morality. Morality does not derive its sanction from law, but law derives its sanction from morality. Falsehood, theft, and murder are not wrong because law forbids them, but they are forbidden by law because they are wrong. The commentary of Archbishop Whately on the proverb that honesty is the best policy, brings out this distinction clearly. The man, he contends, who is honest merely because it is the best policy, is honest on a dishonest principle. He is not honest on a moral principle. To be so a man must be actuated by the conviction that it is right to be honest. Moral agency is founded on the moral agent's conviction that it is his duty to act or not to act. No human institution can create this idea of duty. Legislation cannot establish morality—it can only establish positive precepts, and institute forms which regulate the conduct of moral agents. Keeping in view, then, the rule that human law is, at its best, not morality, but a system of positive commands and precise forms directing the actions and guiding the conduct of moral agents, we can at once tell where the one begins and the other ends. The law that finds its binding sanction with the morally disposed, in the idea of duty, is to be regarded as a forensic expression of moral duty, but the law which the morally-disposed obey, simply because it is the law of the land, cannot be viewed as the statement of, though it may not be opposed to, any ethical principle. The truth that law is not morals but a system of precepts and positive injunctions affecting morals, imposes on us the duty of testing all human institutions by the rule of equity, and confers on us the right to demand that what is clearly opposed to rectitude should cease to exist.

It may surprise many to be informed that at one time it had been openly maintained that "private vices are public benefits," that "moral virtues are the political offspring which flattery begat upon pride," and that "evil, as well moral as natural, is the sole basis, the life and support of all trades and employments without exception, that there we must look for the true origin of all arts and sciences, and that the moment evil ceases the society must be spoiled, if not dissolved." Mandeville's contemporaries, though much less squeamish than the present generation, with all its shortcomings happens to be, were shocked at the iniquity of his principles and scandalised by the extravagance of his conclusions. The historical and biographical literature of the last century, down to its close, is constantly presenting incidental proofs that this feeling of abhorrence was both deep-seated and lasting. Mark how Stephen Jones denounces the "Fable" in the third edition of his "New Biographical Dictionary," printed in 1799. "The dreadful tendency of this work seems to arise principally from the author's description of human nature, which is everywhere represented as low and vicious; for nothing contributes more to extinguish virtue in the breast of man than degrading and odious pictures of the species."

One should not, however, be too hard on poor Mandeville, for a closer inspection discloses the fact that his system is the outcome of sentiments that had been universally practised in, and as universally upheld by society long before he was born. The world had for ages exerted itself to produce "degrading and odious pictures of the species." It had, on the specious plea of promoting the good of the State, fostered impurity, gambling, and intemperance. It had licensed brothels, set up lotteries, and established the public house. It had done all this on the tacit assumption of the principle boldly proclaimed by Mandeville, that "private vices are public benefits." Society itself is, therefore, clearly responsible for laying the foundation of Mandeville's system. It only left two things for him to do, and these were (1) to proclaim the doctrine that had been secretly practised, and (2) to generalise it—to apply it to every man and to every undertaking. Extravagant and reprehensible as the system is, we are, nevertheless, disposed to contend that, on the principles laid down by modern restrictionists, it is logically unassailable. No one can have a right to select one vice as a subject for State regulation and regard another as a matter for State prohibition. The reason for this different treatment must be sought for in the plea that the regulated vice leads, when regulated, to the advantage of the State, for, if it does not, it is not a subject for regulation. This plea is identical with the exploded doctrine of Mandeville that "private vices are public benefits." The politician who, lamenting the evils of the intemperance which is the fruit of the licensed system, yet defends it on the ground that the excise duties extorted from it cannot be replaced, advances this reprehensible view and lays himself open to the inference that in his eyes, the adjustment of the income to the expenditure of the State is of greater moment than the physical well-being, and the moral improvement of the people.

THE WORKING MAN'S BILL OF FARE—IV.

We believe that we have shaken the belief of a great many of our readers in what has been styled a generous diet, but what may be with more precision called an excessive style of feeding. We eat to live if we eat rightly, but, alas! too many live to eat. The firmament, the sea, the forest, and the field are all ransacked for the most luxurious messes to the Epicurean palate, without one brief thought about the unfortunate stomach, which after all should be the chief concern of the eater. If there be unveiled rebellion in that region, a draught of wine or a piece of ice is thrown down to reduce the temperature or silence complaints, and after much eruption, eructation, and fermentation the mess is cleared away, merely to make room for a farther supply—not of needful matter, to form flesh, promote growth, and maintain heat—but to please the pampered palate let the adaptation of the food to the wants of the system be as it may. It would be well for many who are dying daily, poisoned by the superabundant food they swallow, which in its excess is poisonous, that they were sent as the spaniel was to some shrewd knave who, by a course of rigorous fasting rigidly enforced on them, would bring back their system to that delightful condition when oatmeal, pease stuffs, grains, and fruits are welcomed as ambrosial food, and milk and water hailed as the nectar of the gods.

It is sad to have to think that while the affluent have more than enough there are thousands among the sons of toil who can barely get along in the matter of living at all. They must have a house to shelter them, food to sustain and strengthen them, and clothes to keep them warm and decent. If they have married, and the usual interesting consequences follow, why, the supply of food, clothes, and shelter is multiplied to an extent too often beyond the utmost power of supply the husband and even the wife may possess. In good times he is on the strain to meet daily necessities, and when bad times overtake him he generally finds himself not far from the region of destitution. His whole efforts are then concentrated on finding food for those depending upon him; and if he is learned enough to know the best kind of food, and courageous enough to retrench, it is wonderful how well he can bear the icy pressure of evil times, and how little scathed he is by the privations he has had to endure. We do not for a moment believe that want leaves no trace of its presence on its victims, because many never entirely regain the condition of health they enjoyed before they had to suffer; but we do say that those who have knowledge and tact to trim their sails to the tempest will afterwards come easier round to their usual sailing trim when the storm has spent itself. It is a pity that often the lesson of adversity as regards the quality and amount of food should be so easily forgotten when the sun of prosperity bathes them in its radiance. Were it remembered as it ought to be, the toilers would have enough and to spare, and the hunger which stimulates the appetite and is so easily appeased, would alone be felt by the working classes.

The cotton famine revealed an amount of privation endured by the labouring classes, which is hardly conceivable by any not used to mission work. As their resources failed, and they were driven to a still more inadequate diet, their sufferings became extreme; and the hearts of those above them were stirred to aid them through kitchens, where food rations were issued at merely nominal prices. The sufferings inflicted by famine upon the Irish peasantry were terrible, even when alleviated by the numerous attempts made to supply them with nutritious and inexpensive food. The experiments of Count Rumford, too, went to show that in straitened times the people might easily be fed on good dietary at the cheapest conceivable rates. Mr. Edward Smith, at the instance of the Government, and in consequence of the cotton famine, made an elaborate investigation into the diet of the labouring population. The interesting results were published in 1864, and almost all writers on dietary refer to them as the standard work on the subject. He says: "On the whole, there was the most nutriment, the least sum spent on food, the least variety of food, the greatest economy in the selection, the most breadstuffs and milk, the least sugars, fats, meats, cheese, and tea in Ireland. There was the least amount of nutriment, the greatest variety of foods, the most costly selection of foods, the least quantity of breadstuffs and milk, the greatest quantity of sugars, fats, and meats in England. The average cost per head of this food was—in England, 2s. 11½d.; in Wales, 3s. 5½d.; in Scotland, 3s. 3½d.; and in Ireland, 1s. 9½d per week."

Mr Smith sets down a model daily dietary for a labourer in the country:—2½ pints of skim milk (½d. per pint), 1½ lb. of bread, 1 lb. of vegetables, ¼ lb. of bits of meat or 2 oz. of meat, 2 oz. of bacon, 2 oz. of cheese, 2 oz. of oatmeal, ¼ lb. of flour or its equivalent in rice or pease, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. of fat. The cost will be 6½d. per day, or 3s. 8d. per week, excluding vegetables, which being grown by him may be here omitted. We will now give the dietary of single women in the season of the Lancashire distress:—Bread, 8 lb.; oatmeal, 1½ lb.; treacle, 1 lb.; bacon,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; meat,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; skimmed milk, 2 pints; and coffee, 1 oz. The subject of this obtained meat or bacon daily, oatmeal porridge and treacle, or hasty pudding and treacle, and bread and coffee sweetened with treacle. Total weekly cost, 2s. 0½d. We will give another, just because of the comment Mr Smith makes upon it:—Bread, 8 lb.; oatmeal, 2 lb.; peas, 1 pint; sugar,  $\frac{1}{4}$  lb.; treacle,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; butter, 2 oz.; 4 herrings; bacon,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; liver,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; skimmed milk, 6 pints; coffee, 1 oz.; and vegetables, 2 lb. This, says Mr. Smith, is an excessive dietary, and particularly in nitrogen. Yet its cost was but 2s. 6d. weekly.

Last month we presented the experiment by Dr. Nichol, who was occupied in mental work. We here give the diet of a labourer working in the open air, and alongside of him we place a factory worker who is confined to a mill all day; and even under the pressure of hard times they lived well on the pittance which their food cost. Moreover, they lived sustained and strengthened on this moderate style of feeding. In the last case we give, Mr. Smith tells us the dietary was excessive, and yet it only cost 2s. 6d.

These moderate dietaries of the poor must startle many who are of opinion that large quantities of food are necessary to life. The young lady was not so far in her ignorance from the general ignorance of the mass, who when she heard that the poor had not bread enough to eat suggested cheese cakes. Nor was the young man so very far astray from the general intelligence when on his getting an enormous salary he chose short bread and whisky as his cream of the cream of a diet. So many of those who read these papers, and they are largely read, subordinate the quality—the feeding power—to the quantity. They do not see that the poor live on a diet which they could hardly contemplate without a shudder, and manage to live and pull through with their bairns upon a lower in hard times. Why could not all the working classes be induced to restrict themselves to a similar or slightly augmented diet, and have better health and greater savings? Supposing that they were to save two shillings a-week by such a wholesome dietary, the independence that the £5 yearly thereby saved would confer on them after a term of years would be very great. No trade dispute, no commercial failure, no depression of trade, would be a calamity to them while their children would, like themselves, improve in health and strength and wisdom. Even if the money could not be saved for investment, it might be used for other important domestic purposes, for which the amount of such an expenditure was desirable. This readjustment of their earnings would be of the highest importance to their welfare, and its far-reaching consequences transcends conception. With reverential thankfulness they might at the close of life say, "Truly he hath given me all things richly to enjoy."

In our next, and we hope last, paper we will look at the pauper and criminal dietaries, from which many important lessons will arise. ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

MAKE THEM PAY.

AN article worth 1s. 3d. being charged with 10s. of so-called duty presents us with an instance of extortion such as could not be endured in any ordinary trade for a day; yet this is the duty charged on a gallon of alcoholic liquor, the full commercial value of which is 1s. 3d. When other charges make the price of this 1s. 3d. worth as high as 24s. 6d. to the shivering wretch who is parting with his shirt to procure it, the transaction is incredible.

The publican says, "If people will drink, the only way to stop intemperance is to make them pay for the drink." He does not mean that the Excise are to increase their demands upon him, but that he is virtuous in making the poor dupes buy their drinks at the very highest rate. Oh, yes, say some social reformers, "I agree, make them pay." Is it possible that this extortion can be justified? It is not the drink chiefly that makes the drinker poor, it is rather what he pays for the drink. He is made to pay some £200 for £16 of stuff, and this is sufficient to bring him "down in the world" even if he has a considerable income. Is it not a mistake, and a very serious one, on the part of temperance men, to stand up for this frightful robbery. To me it looks like fortifying the Government against giving us the veto power of legal prohibition regarding the liquor traffic.

You say, "Raise the duty," that is, take a larger sum from the poor wretches of drinkers than that you are now taking. The Government respond. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has a "California" in the liquor business. You ask him and his colleagues to shut up the mines or to allow the people to veto the licenses. It looks somewhat like making a stick to break our own head in trying to make this business so vast a source of revenue.

Is not this Government interest a greater barrier in our way for getting local prohibition than all other interests put together. This system must be broken up by bringing gospel light to shine on the foul and greedy wrong. Some are clamorous for licensing boards; I have not much faith in this. I would rather have every ratepayer served with a voting paper asking the question, "License or no license," and asking him or her to record their answer. I have a time and place named on said paper where it is to be deposited. This, I think, could be done more effectually, with less trouble and expense, than the choosing of a licensing board. It is easier to vote for a principle than for men. Voters could more easily consider the matter free from any undue influence or excitement, and in the midst of their home surroundings could tamely view the sad ravages of the drink curse and its possibilities to them and theirs should it be left in full swing. Voting on this matter is a personal duty which should not be delegated to any man or class of men. We do already almost infinitely too much by proxy. It looks like hastening to get all power concentrated and self-government all but annihilated. It is a good element in this local prohibition movement that it tends to check this evil. Those who believe in the many scheme men will go on confusing the public mind and stupefying the politicians. The battle must be sharp and decisive. The popular veto must be direct and complete. I believe the people of Scotland are waiting for a local prohibitory measure with the veto power; does not their representation in the House of Parliament speak loudly for this? Would the people of Scotland part with the seventh portion of prohibition as given in the Forbes Mackenzie Act? Never! This goes far in speaking loudly for the veto power over the drink curse. Is there any place within the last forty years that has had more temperance legislative truth sown broadcast amongst its people than Scotland has? Surely it is time we were reaping the fruit. Let us go to our rulers as Christians, with an honest common-sense plan, and ask frankly and bluntly the power for the people of Scotland to veto this drink curse. Such a measure is right and reasonable and contains in it the elements of Christian justice and truth, and they must, they will, grant our request.

'Tis coming up the steep of time,
And this old world is growing brighter,
We may not see its dawn sublime,
Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter.
We may be sleeping in the ground
When it awakes the world in wonder,
But we have felt it gathering round,
And heard its voice of living thunder.

ROUGH ON THE EDITOR.—A contemporary editor had his hat stolen the other day, and the penitent thief brought it back next day begging to be forgiven. You can't think what a lot of queer things I've had running through my head since I wore your hat.

PUBLIC PRESS.

AMERICA.—The political party that to-day takes sides with whisky and beer is inviting its early destruction. The political party that will make and administer laws against the rum curse so as to dry up the tears from the faces of innocent children and broken-hearted wives is the only party that has an assured future. Ere long the parties confronting each other in the United States will be the whisky and no-whisky parties. To this consummation all things are drifting.—Southern Templar, Atlanta, Georgia.

UNITED STATES.—The prohibition of the liquor traffic in the United States is of vastly greater importance to the people, even in a secular point of view, than any other issue claiming their attention, but when considered in its moral aspect, prominent among which is the criminality of the government, both state and national involved in the license system, it seems almost incredible that there should be found among Christians and moral citizens a single one willing that the iniquitous business should be longer tolerated by law.—Star of Hope.

MISSISSIPPI.—The following resolutions were adopted at the Marshall County Prohibition Convention, and as we would like to see Scotland doing likewise, we present them to our readers.

“Resolved, That we appeal to our wives, mothers, daughters, and sisters, to give to the cause of prohibition their individual, united, and hearty support, and especially by precept and example to discountenance the use of all kinds of liquors, whether malt, vinous, or spirituous, in their domestic circle, and on social and festive occasions. Resolved, That the State of Maine, as the pioneer of the great cause of State Prohibition, is entitled to the profoundest thanks of every Christian philanthropist and patriot, and the States of Kansas and Iowa in following the example of Maine and engrafting upon their organic law—their constitution—the principle of prohibition, has done much to encourage and cheer the friends of prohibition and total abstinence the world over.

What Hugh Stowell Brown says:—To sum up—I was nearly three months on the American Continent. I travelled northward as far as Montreal, southward as far as Richmond, eastward as far as St John, New Brunswick, westward as far as Salt Lake City. I visited many of the chief centres of population; I stayed sometimes with friends, sometimes at hotels; I went about the streets days and nights; I witnessed several scenes of strong political excitement; I saw thousands of people out on their holiday excursions; and I met five men and not one woman in a state of intoxication, and with hardly a score of people whose dress and general appearance indicated intemperate habits. If an American, who has had equal opportunities of seeing our people in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, can bear similar testimony I should be most thankful to hear it; but I greatly fear that such testimony is more than I can expect.—Comparisons are odious.

A MODERN BARDOLPH.—“Mrs. Cooley was tellin’ my old woman that some of them fellers rubbed Cooley’s nose the other night with phosphorous while he was asleep down at the tavern: and when he went home it ‘peared’ ’s if he had a locomotive headlight in front of him.” “A very extraordinary proceeding, judge.” “Well, sir, when he got into the hall it was dark, an’ he ketched a sight o’ that nose in the looking-glass on the hat rack, an’ he thought Mrs. Cooley had left the gas burnin’. Then he tried to turn it off, an’ after fumblin’ around among the umbrellars an’ hat pegs for a while for the stop-cock he concluded the light must come down from a candle, an’ he nearly busted his lungs tryin’ to blow it out. Then he grabbed his hat, an’ tried to jam her down over that candle; an’ when he couldn’t he got mad, picked up an umbrella, and hit a whack at it, which broke the lookin’ glass all to flinders; an’ there was Mrs. Cooley a-watchin’ that old lunatic all the time, an’ afraid to tell him it was his own nose. . . This yer rum drinkin’ is a fearful thing any way you take it.”—Max Adeler.

“ . . . You know I jined the Temperance Society a couple o’ months ago, not because I was much afear’d o’ gettin’ drunk aften, but just to please the old woman. You know how women are—kinder insane on the subject of drinkin’. Well, my cow had a way o’ jumpin’ the fence, an’ I couldn’t do nothin’ to stop her. She was the ornariest critter that way that I ever saw. So at last I got a blind-board an’ hung it on her horns. That stopped her. But you know she used to come jam up agin the fence, an’ stand here for hours; an’ one day one o’ them vagabone advertisin’ agents came along—one o’ them fellers that daubs signs all over the face of natur’—and as soon as he sees that blind-board he went for it.” “A patent-medicine man, I suppose?” “No; he was advertisin’ some kind o’ stomach bitters; an’ he painted on that board the followin’:—‘Take Brown’s Bitters for your stomach’s sake; they make the best cocktails.’” “The Temperance Society didn’t like that of course?” “No, sir! The secretary happen’d to see it, and he brought out the board of directors; and the first thing I knowed, they hauld me up and wanted to expel me for circulatin’ around cow’s information respectin’ bitters an’ cocktails.” “That was very unjust!” “Well, sir, I had the hardest time to make them fellers understand that I was innocent, an’ to get ‘em to let up on me. But they did. Then I turned the blind-board over; and now the first man I ketch placin’ any revolutionary sentiments on the frontispiece of that cow, why, down goes his house. I’ll knock the stuffin’ out o’ him, now mind me!”—Max Adeler.

SING TO THE SEA.

SING to the sea, thou joyous young maiden,
Sing of the lover that’s coming to thee;
Sing of the tears that flow’d at thy parting,
Sing of the meeting that gladsome shall be;
Sing of the bridal-wreath, sing of the altar,
Sing of the day when a wife thou shalt be;
Sing of a life-path all sunshine and flowers;
Sing of a sky that no cloudlet shall see.
Sing to the sea, the beautiful sea,
That never grows weary of singing to thee.

Sing to the sea, young wife, in love’s morning,
Sing while thy little ones climb on thy knee—
Softly they’ll murmur a prayer by the billows,
A hymn to the angels that watch by the sea.
See no pale phantom-ship glide o’er the waters
To bring thee dark tidings of death and the grave;
Hear love’s sweet voice in each low mellow murmur,
And see love’s bright smile in each crystal-eyed wave.
Sing to the sea, the beautiful sea,
That never grows weary of singing to thee.

Sing to the sea, thou lonely and widowed one,
Sing of thy heart’s love that sleeps ‘neath the wave.
Tell the light fairies that glide o’er the waters
To scatter sweet flowers o’er his bright coral grave.
Sing of the day when the sea yields its dead,
When thou shalt be clasp’d to thy loving one’s heart—
Safe in affection that knoweth no waning,
Join’d in love’s bands that not death e’en can part.
Sing to the sea, the beautiful sea,
That never grows weary of singing to thee.

Sing to the sea, thou mother whose darling
Roameth an exile from home and from thee;
Dream that he sends thee affection’s soft message,
Borne on the zephyrs that sigh o’er the sea.
Oh! who could believe that a monarch so beauteous
Dark visions of death in his bosom could hold—
With a form so majestic, an eye of such crystal,
And garments all crimson and purple and gold.
Ne’er let the angel of hope from thy bosom,
Whate’er be thy anguish uncherished depart.
Hope trusted, rewardeth the one who confideth,
By bringing bright joys to the poor broken heart.
Sing to the sea, the beautiful sea,
That never grows weary of singing to thee.

THE FUNDS.

* * * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1883.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

DECEMBER, 1882.

* * * We have been obliged to leave over a number of interesting items, but we will endeavour to overtake them next issue.

Mr. John Paton has been fully engaged all the past month. He has been at Sanquhar, New Cumnock, Glasgow, Galston, Kilmarnock, Mauchline, Kilbarchan, Irvine, Maybole, Prestwick, Beith, Castle Douglas (return visit), Dalry, Coatbridge, Pollokshaws, Helensburgh, Dunoon, Bonhill, and Ayr.

The Temperance Hundred in Perth have taken a step which required some courage, but one which we believe will be followed by no regrets. Mr. Treasurer Bridges, one of the vice-presidents of the hundred, had up till the recent municipal election the reputation of being one of the staunchest temperance reformers in the fair city. He addressed meetings; he took an active part in temperance effort; he wrote papers and sent contributions to the press advocating the principles he espoused. No man in short had greater reason to be grateful to total abstinence than he; no man seemed to be animated by a sincerer desire to show his gratitude to it on all occasions. The temperance electors in the city were not slow to reward his faithfulness, for they elected him to the Town Council, the treasurership of which he holds by their efforts in his behalf. He did run well—what has hindered him? The desire to stand well with the liquor section of the council. There is a public-house at the shore which brings in the insignificant amount of £38 to the coffers of the Corporation by the facilities it offers to sailors and shore labourers to fritter away their hard-earned pay in drams, morning, noon and night. That public house differs in no degree from the thirteen thousand public-houses that are the bane and stain of Scotland, and against which Treasurer Bridges fulminated whenever he had the chance. Councillor Russel resolved to move the Council to refuse to continue its license after Whitsunday next, and moved accordingly. To the surprise and just indignation of the temperance party, Treasurer Bridges, the man their former efforts raised, went over to the enemy, on the plea that if there had been a change of tenancy he might have voted otherwise. But if the present proprietor dies the law allows his heirs to follow him in the baneful trade, and Mr. Bridges simply meant by his voice and vote to perpetuate that social snare. He also pleads that it was better to keep this place than close it up or give it to Mr. Fenton who might build upon it, and in the new premises have a public-house. Mr. Fenton can make any conditions in his offer he may please, but the Corporation can accept or reject them, and they could have easily refused the offer of Mr. Fenton clogged by such a hateful condition. Alas, however, the motion was lost; and another attempt against the shore snare will have to be made. The Temperance Hundred could not alter the vote, but they could show their sense of Councillor Bridges' treasonable conduct, and they did so in a way which will have a salutary effect far beyond the city of Perth. They decided that he no longer be one of the vice-presidents of the Perth Temperance Hundred. We are truly sorry that Mr. Bridges should have put himself into this very humiliating position at a moment when, by a manful adherence to his party, he might have added lustre to his office in the Council. But even he must admit that no party can tamely suffer such conduct as that of which he has been guilty. If they did it would be easy to show that they were equally unworthy of their position as he has proved to be. He might have easily conciliated them by a manly explanation and by withdrawing his contumelious speech in Council. He has chosen his present attitude, and it is neither dignified nor just. We are glad that the Temperance Hundred have taken up an attitude which every true temperance reformer must heartily approve. We are certain that their fellow-citizens will respect them all the better that they have shown so worthily that they truly respect themselves.

Before this issue of the Social Reformer is in the hands of our readers, we have been given to understand that the annual report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will be in the hands of all the subscribers to the Association. We welcome this annual report with exceeding pleasure. Having already carefully perused the report in the pages of this magazine we turn with considerable interest to the list of subscribers. We see at a glance that there is a decrease of a few societies in connection with the Association—well, so much the worse for the societies. It is not creditable to them to see an Association which is so vigorously and resolutely striving to secure power to the ratepayers to veto their own greatest enemy—for few can realize how many societies are blighted by the public-house—and yet withhold the very small sum which would secure a place to them on its subscription list, and effective speakers to their platform several times a year, not by gift or offer, but by right. Having thus dismissed the one fly in the great big pot of ointment we turn with much satisfaction to the membership list, which is the true test of the public favour the Association has obtained. We note that it is supported by—1st, the usual subsidy from the United Kingdom Alliance; 2nd, by 6,261 subscribers and 127 societies. The income from subscriptions alone is £1955 17s. 3d., equal to £162 19s. 9½d. a month, £5 7s. 6d. per day. In the previous year the monthly income was equal to £154 10s. 6d., there is therefore an increase of £8 9s. 3½d. per month, and an increased income of 5s. 11d. per day. This is substantial financial progress which must be gratifying to the Executive and all staunch friends of the Association: one to be truly thankful for. We hope in the interests of the cause that its friends everywhere will realize their duty and privilege to get their friends to connect themselves with the Association, so that the power and influence it already wields may be deeply and widely extended, and the voting power of the opponents of the drink system so augmented, that the drink supporters may feel themselves unable to cope successfully therewith.

Those friends who believe more in efforts by temperance reformers to draw the drinker from the drink than in those having for their object taking the drink from the man, may do much worse than ponder a sentence or two from the interesting statement submitted at the first meeting this winter of the London Lambeth Bath Temperance Society, by the founder of these meetings twenty years ago—Rev. G. M. Murphy. He said that during the past twenty winters two-and-a-quarter millions had attended these excellently conducted meetings, some twenty-four thousand had signed the pledge of total abstinence, and the same band, excepting those who had gone to their reward, had all along aided the good work. This institution may be equalled, but is certainly not surpassed by any other London temperance association. It yearly brings twelve hundred persons forward to the pledge table to take the pledge, and we have reason to believe that those so pledged have in the main firmly adhered to their pledge. Yet it has been doing this for twenty years, and God granting length of life to him we may find Rev. G. M. Murphy twenty years hence stating that not twenty-four thousand but sixty thousand have taken the pledge. Now supposing that twenty years ago prohibition had seized the whole traffic in Lambeth and the south of London and strangled it right off, what might have been the fate of thousands in that part of London? Why there would have been a populace so long under the educative power of law as to be born, reared and matured without any liquor temptations at all. Lives, valuable precious lives, already wasted and mouldering in unhonoured and nameless graves would have been saved; thousands would have had their fathers, their mothers, their sisters and brothers to-day only for the ravaging power of the drink system. Wealth, education, morality, religion, would have been abundant. Instead of this consummation so devoutly to be wished, we have only these glorious twelve hundred abstainers added every year to the abstainers' ranks in Lambeth, and a multitude whom no man can number still outside the temperance fold. We rejoice that the philanthropist is coming to see more and more clearly that much, very much, indeed we may fearlessly assert the most of his great good holy work is undone by the liquor power. We rejoice that experience is impressively reading him this important lesson, and we look forward hopefully to an early future, when all who earnestly desire the rescue of their fellows from the bondage of intemperance will unite with the prohibitionists in securing from Government the power to all ratepayers which will enable them to directly veto that great source of intemperance, the liquor traffic.

We have pleasure in submitting the following figures respecting arrests for drunkenness in Ireland. They are gleaned from approved returns. Through the operation of the Sunday Closing Act the arrests in Leicester province decreased from 36,945 in 1877 to 24,151 in 1881, decrease 12,794. In Munster province in 1877 there were 29,775 arrests, in 1881, 19,287, decrease 10,488. In Ulster province there were in 1877, 34,284 arrests, in 1881, 26,166, decrease 8,118; in the province of Connaught in 1877 there were 9,899 arrests, while in 1881 there were 8,969, decrease 930. In the whole of Ireland in 1877 there were 110,903 arrests, but in 1881 only 78,573, showing a decrease of 32,330. That shows well for a one day prohibition. Sabbath prohibition is less effective than all week prohibition, because people have time to go from home and also means to spend, so that they can get liquor abroad if legally denied at their own doors. They can store up on Saturday for Sabbath indulgence, so that they can greatly abridge the severity of Sabbath prohibition. Then there are five cities whose traffic is not similarly interfered with. Yet with all these drawbacks the power of prohibition for one day is bringing innumerable blessings to Ireland. Once she had the power of closing and never opening her public houses, we shall find her growing in her love of industry, providence, and peace.

All who wish well to our gallant tars and to those who go down to the great waters either on business or pleasure, will rejoice to hear that the Cunard Steamship Company have resolved that the grog ration of the sailors in that grand fleet is to be stopped and its place to be supplied by coffee. We do not know the reason for this vigorous but beneficial suppression. The crews in this famous line are models of the highest discipline, and it cannot be that this suppression follows on some outburst of drinking with subsequent danger to one or other of the magnificent fleet. We rather incline to the belief that the benefits to masters and owners of vessels in ceasing to issue a grog ration to the crews in their employment are becoming so well recognized, and that the late revelations of the advantage of abstinence in the fearful strain of conflict in the field are so evident and so heralded abroad that no really sensible shipowners desirous of the highest efficiency in their fleet can overlook them. We are glad that Mr. John Burns has taken such a noble stand in a matter so vital to the interest, the comfort, the effectiveness of his crews, and we trust that all shipowners may follow his example. When once it is found that on ocean, battlefield, and in all cases of the wear and tear of human life, strong drinks are mischievous in their nature, we will find employers of labour combining with the prohibitionists to secure a law which will protect the worker from becoming a total wreck through drink.

From a letter in our correspondence column our readers will observe that we have unwittingly been giving currency to a false report in crediting Sanquhar with an abstaining Council. We are sorry for it. Our correspondent writes as if we were doing injury to the truth. He should rather feel that it is no credit to the temperance reformers in Sanquhar or any other burgh in Scotland to have non-abstainers in the Town Council, the Poor Law Board, the School Board, the Session, or any other public office whatever. The men who drink are not brain-whole enough to manage their own affairs let alone those of other people. We believe that the time is coming when it will look so very foolish, not to say wicked, to soak one's brains with beer or inflame them with spirituous liquors, that the mere fact of a man having the reputation of doing so will be enough to disqualify him from having any office in Society, or Church or State. The community will feel as employers are feeling, that it is not wise to commit their important interests into the hands of such.

We are gratified at being able to present to our readers an article on the condition of Ohio. When we first heard that temperance had suffered a reverse in that American state we were apprehensive of evil coming to the good cause that had so signally triumphed in Maine, Kansas, and Iowa. Still, we looked for fuller information and it has come. It is not temperance that has failed but the trimmers, the politicians, the partizans. Temperance has triumphed by showing the political parties in America that without the temperance vote they can not and will not win. Like the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association the prohibitionists of Ohio have subordinated their party to their principles, and we rejoice to know with good effect already on the party managers. The party that wishes to succeed without prohibitionists or with the publicans ought in the first instance to be made to feel how little it can do without their support, and in the second instance, that the publicans so far from being a help are a milestone about its neck to sink it in the dismal swamp of opposition. Republicanism with the rum power can never be an advantage to Ohio—never. And now that it sees that the prohibitionists are no longer to be trifled with, it will likely do as it has done in Maine, go in for temperance, and be like Maine republicans at the top of the poll. The temperance man who votes for his party and the publican is inviting failure to every effort for the good of his country.

Making an analysis of the annual report of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association we find that the sum subscribed by its 6,261 subscribers averages a fraction under 5s. 2d. each. There are 4 subscribers who give £20 and upwards, 10 from £10 to £20 each, 23 from £5 to £10 each, 62 from £2 to £5 each, 260 from £1 to £2 each, 285 from 10s. to £1 each, 816 from 5s. to 10s. each, 2,173 from 2s. 6d. to 5s. each, 2,628 from 1s. to 2s. 6d. being a total of 6,261 subscribers contributing to the funds of the Association. We note also that 778 have paid 5s. each, 2,037 2s. 6d., and 1,706 1s. These three classes number 4,521. 127 societies subscribed the sum of £80 4s. In previous years we have expressed the hope that our friends might make an effort to rise from the lower to the higher class of subscribers. There are many of its warm friends whom God has blessed with much wealth since they joined the Association. It is surely not too much to ask them to encourage its funds by giving to them a more liberal share of their increase. Many, we are gratified to note, do not fail to remember the wants of the movement, and have from time to time increased their contributions. We believe that they are not in any way the poorer but rather richer in the best sense, that namely of good works. Many, because the Association is not a benevolent association subordinate its claims to that of those charitable institutions which seek to ameliorate the condition of the sick and the destitute. But such societies are begotten by the liquor traffic in almost every case, and with the suppression of the drink system they will disappear. Again, people tell us that their nearest duty is to give to the church. We don't wish to diminish the usefulness of the church by the attainment of our object. When there are no public-houses, no sale of alcoholic liquors, no consumption of them, how will it stand with the churches of our land? Why, a little consideration will show that they will then flourish, they will then make progress, they will then fill. Vital godliness will then prevail; the agencies of the church will then become equal to the task of largely subduing the sinful tendencies of the age. The treasury of the Lord's house will not then be so bare, nor will there be on foot as at present so many doubtful schemes to maintain the finances of the Sanctuary. The triumph of this Association will not be gained at the expense of any good society, while its triumphs will render all the agencies for curbing intemperance unnecessary, and God's poor will no longer pine with hunger nor shiver with cold. We believe that if people could realise the condition of our country freed from the liquor traffic that those would give who never gave before, and those who now give would give the more. We heartily rejoice at the issue of this report, and we trust that the Association may have an amount of support such as will justify it in putting forth increased efforts through increased agencies and thus bringing nearer the day when it will be powerful enough to constrain a Parliament to grant the people the veto power it is so ardently labouring to secure for them.

THE LESSON OF OHIO.

THE distillers, brewers, and liquor-sellers of Ohio are jubilant. They have won, in alliance with the Democratic party, what they account a great victory. They have telegraphed their rejoicing to their organised liquor allies of New York, exhorting them to "go and do likewise." That temporarily they are masters of the situation in Ohio there is no doubt. But in this they have won nothing new. In legislation concerning the liquor-traffic and in the practical politics of that State they have been for a long time a controlling factor. Their "great victory" will enable them to hold out a little longer against the rising tide of adverse public opinion, but in the end will also hasten their own destruction.

To the Republicans of Ohio and of other States there is a lesson involved in the result of the recent election too important to be overlooked or neglected. It is that the party which would henceforth hold its own and insure its supremacy over the allied liquor forces cannot afford to pursue a temporizing policy. The Republican leaders of Ohio, such as Governor Foster and Senator Sherman, while endorsing Sunday closing, which prohibitionists also heartily concur in, took pains, especially in the cities, to let it be known that they were not in favour of prohibition. They thus alienated the Germans and other beer and whisky constituents while they forfeited the confidence and lost the co-operation of the uncompromising opponents of the liquor-traffic.

It is announced as a significant feature of the election returns that, large as was the increase of the Democratic vote from the liquor alliance with that party, the prohibition gain was relatively larger still. To Governor Foster and his Republican associates, who have attempted the difficult feat of carrying beer on one shoulder and water on the other, the late election is a severe defeat, and deservedly so. It is a defeat over which the friends of temperance in Ohio or elsewhere need not grieve. It had apparently become a necessity to clear the way for something better. Sunday closing was good as far as it went, but it included one day only of the seven. The effort in and out of the legislature for liquor taxation was worse than futile—in effect a revival of the license system under another name. It ought not to succeed, and it is cause for rejoicing that it will probably now be abandoned. With the ominous precedents of Kansas and Iowa, where, by constitutional proviso, the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating beverages is rendered unlawful, the liquor-makers and vendors are aroused as never before, and will henceforth spare no man who favours any sort of restrictive legislation, whether it be Sunday closing or high-license taxation. Hence their bitter and victorious fight against Foster, Sherman, & Co. in Ohio, as intense as if the latter had championed instead absolute prohibition.

It is to be hoped that now a vigorous and united movement on the part of all opponents of the liquor-traffic in Ohio will be inaugurated, and at no distant day consummated, to so amend the constitution of the State as not only to prohibit liquor-license as at present, but to prohibit, without room for equivocation or doubt, the liquor-traffic itself. Such a movement, non-partisan in character, but earnest and aggressive, will put the liquor forces on the defensive, with their opponents in an attitude very different from that of the recent campaign. Right dealing with the liquor-traffic is the only possible way by which the Republicans of Ohio can hope again to win popular confidence to a degree sufficient to enable them to resume the control of the affairs of the State. To this end the temporising, double-faced managers must be put aside and better and wiser leaders brought to the front. But the weakness is not all with the leaders. The whole people must be appealed to, enlightened, and quickened until every citizen, every voter especially, shall have a clear and positive conviction on the subject of alcohol and against its use in any form as a beverage. With such a condition achieved victory for the right would be in no sense doubtful, either as to securing prohibition, constitutional and statutory, or as to its subsequent enforcement.

There is no royal road for the opponents of the liquor-traffic. It is a mighty force with which they have to contend. It is, on the whole, no cause for regret that the liquor alliance in Ohio has at this time demonstrated so signally its power. It should teach temperance people of all kinds, not alone in Ohio but throughout our country, that only through self-sacrificing work will it suffice to win a complete and an abiding victory over the drink-enemy. In this work the press is a most potent agency, and literature, even beyond the living voice, is a most effective agent to prepare and rightly educate the masses for the pending conflict. "Agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom" is especially true in connection with the temperance reform. Induce the people to read and think, and it will no longer be possible for "blind leaders," as in the Ohio campaign, to lead blind followers to degradation and defeat.—National Temperance Advocate, New York.

INTELLIGENCE.

MR. FRANCIS MURPHY'S MISSION, GLASGOW.

THIS celebrated missionary after most interesting and successful labours in the east and north of Scotland, became desirous of making Glasgow the scene of his labours. Negotiations between him and the Evangelistic Association were entered into, but they failed in securing mutual co-operation, with the most painful consequences to the temperance cause in Glasgow. On the 6th ult. Mr. Murphy met a number of friends interested in his mission and others in the Christian Institute, but little ultimately came of it, for not one dozen of the two hundred clergymen in the city ever came near to aid him. On the 12th he began his meetings in the Trades' Hall, Glassford Street. The place was crowded to suffocation, and had the friends of the lapsed masses done their duty a series of meetings gigantic in their proportions might have been begun, whose influence would have drawn the lowest strata of humanity in the city with an abiding influence such as would have gladdened the hearts of all whose heart's desire and prayers to God are that the lost sheep of the kingdom might yet be gathered into the fold. Rev. Dr. Somerville presided, and addresses were delivered by Mr. Murphy, John Wilson, Esq., J.P., ex-Bailie Torrens, and other gentlemen. The proceedings were enthusiastic in the extreme. To in some degree soothe the disappointment of the large crowds outside the hall, which would have filled it many times over, a meeting was held outside the platform being the balcony of the hall. Mr. Murphy, Rev. W. C. M'Dougall, Messrs. R. MacKay, Stevenson, and Freer carried it on notwithstanding the cold. The large audience, after hearing the founder of the blue ribbon movement twice, dispersed. During the week the meetings continued to be held with marked success. Mr. Murphy being supported chiefly by the Good Templar and Permissive Bill organizations. Thursday was a great night. The meeting was addressed by Mr. R. Dransfield, Bailie Selkirk and ex-Bailie Torrens, with their usual thoroughgoing advocacy and impressive eloquence. On Sabbath the 19th the meetings were transferred to the Gospel Free Church in Charlotte Street. The church was crowded, and an overflow meeting was also held in Trinity Free Church adjoining. Mr. Murphy, jun., just come from St. Helens, along with Mr. Riley, a lawyer there, addressed the meetings. During the week the meetings were fairly attended, great numbers being attracted by the excellent singing, the numerous and varied speeches, and the genial and indefinable magnetism of Mr. Murphy. Mrs. Richards was unfortunately laid aside by illness, but a well-trained choir largely contributed to the success of the meetings. It was with much regret that we heard of Mr. Murphy's resolution to close his mission in Glasgow. The work done was in the circumstances highly creditable, but he had too many calls to labour outside the city to remain battling with the unchristian indifference to his labours so manifest within it. He has often publicly acknowledged his obligations to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for the valuable services he received from those connected with it. John Wilson, Esq., J.P., ex-Bailie Torrens, Bailie Selkirk, Messrs. MacKay, Stevenson, Dransfield, and Black have all taken an effective part in the proceedings, and Mr. Stevenson has devoted much time and labour to the mission. The Good Templars also have given Mr. Murphy much assistance in his arrangements. Several ministers in the city—Rev. Dr. Wallace, Rev. Dr. Ferguson, Revs. W. C. M'Dougall, J. A. Johnstone, J. Glendinning, J. Cumming, G. Stewart, M. Pinkerton, Harding, Gladstone and others have from time to time aided him, but the painful fact remains that the ministers and evangelists of the city as a rule have stayed away. Of the results of the mission under these untoward circumstances we cannot speak too highly. The number of pledges taken were 1,600, and the number of blue ribbons donned nearly 3,000. This speaks well for the vigour of the mission, and some time hence we may hope to see Mr. Murphy returning to this scene of his labours to continue his mission which he has been obliged unfortunately for the large number of drinkers and drunkards amongst us to relinquish.

IRISH DRINKING.—The Irish people are growing increasingly temperate by law. This desirable condition is owing to the operation of the Sunday Closing Act. The Irish drink bill was in 1877 £12,169,915, in 1881 it stood at £10,305,473 a decrease of £1,864,442 sterling. This decrease applies to the whole of the "Green Isle." Sligo and Galway excepted; there unhappily there was a slight increase.

The Edinburgh Pleasance Society held its nineteenth annual meeting on the 22nd. The report was A1. It showed that meetings had been held every week throughout the year, that 500 pledges had been taken, tracts had been scattered around, and a good balance was to carry over to next year. Messrs. Waterston, Lossock, and A. G. Murray, addressed the meeting. The votes of thanks to all concerned were most cordial.

EDINBURGH BAND OF HOPE UNION.—We are glad to observe the substantial progress of this Union. Formed less than seven years ago it has already 113 affiliated Bands of Hope and Temperance Societies, having a membership of between 11,000 and 12,000. This is a wonderful success. Its vigour is increasing. Not only does it supply a speaker monthly to all societies connected with it, but is prepared to supply all requisites—declaration papers, attendance cards, hymn books, publications, medals, &c. It affiliates societies for the ridiculously small fee of half a crown. Its programme for the winter means vigorous effort. It has a large number of district demonstrations in view, as well as the issue of a quarterly magazine. It asks from those societies in union with it a Christmas and free-will offering, and if those making this appeal on the behalf of the directors make an effective representation to the young people amongst whom they labour, a pile of bank cheques, postal and money orders should gladden the eyes of the treasurer on the morning of Christmas and the New Year day.

REV. DAVID MACRAE IN PERTH.—Referring to the agitation for local option and prohibition, Rev. David Macrae said it was not a war against the publicans. The best friends of the publicans were those who wished them clear of a bad business—a business which tended to make good men bad and bad men worse. It was not a war against public-houses. They wanted houses that would supply better than whisky shops, because free from their dangers, the need for places of refreshment and resort. This war, on its legislative side, was simply against the traffic in intoxicating drink. Some people argued that the public had no right to interfere with the liberty of those who wanted to buy a glass of whisky. But the public had a right to interfere with any trade that was doing public injury. The public have rights as well as the man who wants to buy a glass of whisky. And these rights were recognised. The law which prohibits gambling-houses and houses of ill-fame interferes with the liberty of people who would like to open or frequent such places. But society endorses that interference as wise and needful. The law against obscene prints is another law that recognises the right of the people to protect themselves from the demoralisation that results from the selling and buying of such things. The Education Act of 1870 with its compulsory clause is an Act that recognises the right of the public to interfere with the liberty of people who would take advantage of that liberty to bring up their children in ignorance, to the cruel injury of the children, and the danger of society. Many, however, who admit that this principle applies equally to the liquor traffic are fond of saying that in this case it will not work—that you cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament. It might as well be said that you cannot make people honest by Act of Parliament; yet it is found a help to make stealing illegal, and to attach a severe penalty to its commission. It might also be said that people cannot be made pure by Act of Parliament, yet by making the sale of immoral publications and obscene prints illegal it is recognised that the cause of purity and public morality is very decidedly assisted. The removal of facilities and temptations to drink always diminishes drinking and drunkenness, and the evils flowing therefrom. The closing of our public-houses at eleven at night during the week and all day on Sunday had proved this abundantly in Scotland, and was proving it in Ireland. The same position was established still more conclusively by the experience of places like Saltaire (London), where no public-houses were allowed at all. He (Mr Macrae) had travelled over great districts in America where prohibitory law, backed by the convictions of the people, had wiped out the whole drink traffic and all its evils with it. Even in Boston—a city twice the size of Edinburgh—he had gone from end to end of it, and not a single dramshop was anywhere to be seen. So enormous were the evils brought upon the public by the traffic in drink, and so vast the public benefits resulting from its prohibition, that the great State of Kansas, not content with a prohibitory law, had now imbedded prohibition in the constitution of the State, and other States were moving in the same direction. The movement was slowly but steadily advancing in our own country, and was bound to advance with the spread of intelligence and the recognition of the rights of the people.—On the Liquor Traffic, by Rev. D. Macrae, Dundee.

The municipal elections in Scotland this year continue to evidence the earnest endeavour of our friends to uphold the dignity of the Town Council by returning as often as possible temperance men. In Edinburgh only two wards were contested; of the 15 retiring 10 were against and 5 in favour of the views of temperance reformers; 9 were elected favourable and 6 unfavourable, the gain to temperance being 4 seats. We regret to have to write the defeat of Mr. David Graig, who gallantly but unsuccessfully contested St. Leonards' Ward. He would have been an honour to the Town Council. On the other hand, Bailie M'Intosh, in Leith, secured for his party a gallant victory, and in Musselburgh, Treasurer M'Kinlay has attained to the honours of the magistracy. In Grangemouth we regret the loss of Mr. Leishman, whose return was successfully opposed by Mr. H. Burrell. It has been the custom in this burgh at the municipal elections for the ballot boxes to be taken on the close of the poll from the town hall to a hotel where the returning officer, presiding officer, and other officials dined, and the boxes were then reconveyed to the town hall and the counting gone on with. The returning officer, Provost Macpherson, as might have been expected, instructed that the boxes be conveyed to the burgh chambers where all concerned enjoyed a most excellent repast, without any intoxicating liquors. This is one of those sterling local reforms which deserves the highest praise, and we cannot sufficiently admire the wisdom and courage of the worthy Provost in bringing about so praiseworthy a change in the election procedure of the burgh over which he so worthily presides. We hope that other returning officers will go and do likewise. It needs no new Act of Parliament but merely the authority of this high office, the exercise of which can confer such a substantial benefit on the community, and presents so cogent an argument in favour of public dinners uncontaminated by alcoholic liquors. In Glasgow we deplore the defeat of Ex-Bailie Lamberton, a worthy supporter of temperance reform. His opponent is an abstainer. Mr. Malcolm Campbell was elected, Bailie Ure and Bailie Richmond returned. All manifest a hearty sympathy with temperance aims. At Rutherglen we have the pleasure of stating that Bailie Dick fills the Provost's chair, and has the honour of being the first abstainer that ever was elected Provost of the ancient burgh. We regret that Provost Campbell, of Greenock, was not re-elected to the Provostship. We fear that our friends are in a minority meantime in the Council but we rejoice to find that once more Mr. John Lang has been elected to the Council, and that Mr. Thomas M'Intyre is now a councillor. In Rothesay our old and faithful friend John M'Kinlay has been invested with the chain and is now a Bailie. Mr. P. B. Ferguson we are glad to see has been elected to the Council here. In Perth we regret that Councillor Campbell should have relinquished his seat at the Council, but trust soon to see him at the Council board again. Our friends in Perth are to be congratulated on the growth of their municipal representation, they are within two or three members of having a majority in the Council. In Campbeltown the temperance party have been victorious and rejoice that Messrs. R. Mackay and W. G. C. Paul are now members of its Council. This slight notice will afford our readers some idea of the state of feeling on temperance current in the Scottish municipal elections, which must be admitted is full of joyful satisfaction. Being the first time that females have been responsible voters, we are glad to find that on the whole our elections show so well as regards temperance reform, and we should look forward with confident hope to the results of their voting on future occasions.

EDINBURGH.—On the 7th ult., ex-Bailie Lewis delivered the first of a course of lectures, arranged for by the Edinburgh Temperance Society. His subject was "Temperance legislation, an essential element in the political programme of Reform." He treated his subject with all his accustomed vigour. We give his reference to the question of compensation. By the recent election—in Edinburgh—the voice of the temperance electors of Edinburgh has been formally pronounced upon the subject of compensation so prominently raised by the Licensing Bill of Lord Colin Campbell in the last session of Parliament. The proposal to tax the ratepayers for fifty years to compensate licence-holders and their landlords has, we feel proud to say, been unanimously rejected; and the claims of compensation have also been repudiated by the unanimous resolution of a large and influential public meeting of temperance electors. When the terms of the certificate of licence-holders is considered, and the fact that the traffic contributes not to the benefit but to the injury of the commonwealth, the resolution of the Edinburgh temperance reformers will surprise no one. The proposal to grant compensation is not only unfair and unreasonable, but the amount required would be so enormous as to impose a burden upon the nation altogether insupportable. It is desirable that the advocates of compensation should look this fact fairly in the face. We learn from the Daily Review that recently in London five taverns were exposed for sale at the upset price of £347,000, and that the owners would not dispose of them for less. The amount required, even upon the principle indicated in Lord Colin Campbell's bill, to compensate 175,000 liquor-sellers and their landlords in the United Kingdom would require at least £350,000,000 sterling, being nearly half the amount of the national debt. This, be it observed, does not include the claims of malsters, brewers, and distillers, which, if recognised in any degree, would require an amount of money altogether fabulous. Keeping in view that the annual national expenditure of the United Kingdom amounts to upwards of £83,000,000 sterling—being nearly £2 10s per head for every man, woman, and child in the community—it will appear manifest that the taxpayers are in all conscience sufficiently burdened. This, be it understood, is altogether irrespective of local taxation, which in Edinburgh alone annually amounts to upwards of £100,000. Moreover, the claim for compensation, in so far as Scotland is concerned, is altogether without a precedent. In so far as it applies to the landlords of licensed premises the supreme courts in Scotland have unanimously declared that there is no claim. Neal Dow, in speaking on this subject, says:—"I have not been able to see what claim to compensation disestablished publicans can possibly have in law, equity, or common sense—near or remote. In some of our States we have prohibition pure and simple. The liquor traffic is forbidden over a region of country many times larger than Great Britain, and there has never been even a suggestion that the trade suppressed had a claim to compensation." (Cheers.) The Times, writing upon this subject, put it thus:—"Publicans' profits represent misspent money. The publicans desire to keep their trade, but do they really believe that their claims can be permanently sustained? They have everything against them except the vicious propensities of nature. . . . To put the case in half-a-dozen words, the profits in which the liquor-sellers now claim a vested interest are realised to a vast extent at the cost of popular degradation, vice, and misery; and the question is simply whether the Legislature of a country is not justified in placing with due consideration the welfare of the people above the gains of a trade." (Cheers.) A few years ago the Queen of Madagascar, grieved and indignant at the havoc wrought among her people by drink, prohibited its sale. Shortly after the edict had gone forth a deputation of French rum sellers waited upon Her Majesty, and urged their claims for compensation. The Queen patiently heard all they had to say, and then addressed them thus.—"Go home and summon together those who sent you here. Go and consult among yourselves, consider the wrongs which you have done my people; and after you have compensated them for the injury and ruin inflicted upon them, come back to me, and we will then talk of compensation." (Cheers.) We commend the utterances of these testimonies to the consideration of all who differ from us on this question of liquor traffic compensation. (Loud cheers.) A vote of thanks was cordially awarded to the speaker for his admirable lecture, and another to the president of the society—Mr. R. Cameron—who ably presided.

Vote right. This is just the time to vote as you may, provided you pray for the overthrow of the liquor traffic.

EDINBURGH ELECTION.—The contest for the representation of the city of Edinburgh in Parliament has terminated in the election of Samuel D. Waddy, Esq., Q.C., M.P., as the junior member for the city. The vacancy was created by the retirement of Mr. James Cowan through continued ill-health. He was a steady supporter of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his Permissive Bill and Local Option resolution. On his acceptance of the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, Mr. James Hall Renton, Mr. D. M'Laren, and Mr. S. D. Waddy took the field; a great many other names of eminence were spoken of, but their owners did not appear. The temperance party were found thoroughly united in the determination to have a good man. They met and adopted the following question by acclamation:—"In the event of a measure being introduced into Parliament conferring upon a majority of the rate-payers of Scotland the unconditional legal power to prohibit the liquor traffic in their several localities, will you by your vote and influence support the same?" They at the same time appointed the following gentlemen as a standing committee to wait upon all candidates immediately they appeared and put this question to them:—Rev. Dr. Adamson, ex-Bailie Lewis, J.P., Councillor M'Lauchlin, Messrs. Ramsay, Nisbet, M'Lagan, and Miller, Mr. J. H. Waterston acting as secretary. Mr. M'Laren and Mr. Renton answered the question heartily in the affirmative, as also did Mr. Waddy, although he objected to the word "unconditional." "He had voted in the House of Commons," he said, "in support of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's bill, and he was prepared to do so still." The committee had to report that the candidates' attitude to the question was so much alike that practically it did not matter by whom their views were represented. The temperance reformers then agreed to leave the question of supporting the candidates to the temperance electors themselves. Ultimately the contest lay solely between Messrs. Renton and Waddy, and at the close of the poll it was found that Mr. Waddy was elected by a majority of 737 votes. This practically leaves the representation of Scotland as it was. The result confers great credit on the friends in Edinburgh. By their union, their harmony, their independence, intelligence, and energy they have secured an able representative of their views, and made it more manifest to all aspirants for Parliamentary honours that on the threshold of all Parliamentary contests they will have to reckon with the temperance party. Looking back on the last twenty-four bye-elections in Scotland, the temperance party have reason for much congratulation. Eighteen of these have resulted in the election of candidates favourable to their views; four in the return of candidates undecided; and in the return of two only—Mr. Gladstone for Midlothian, and Sir John Hay for the Wigtown Burghs—who vote against the resolution of the House of Commons affirming the justice and reasonableness of leaving the communities free to suppress the liquor traffic.—Alliance News.

MR. MURPHY IN EDINBURGH.—On Saturday, the 25th inst., Mr. Murphy held his farewell meeting in Edinburgh. The proceedings were exceedingly successful. Mr. Coutts stated that 14,088 had taken the pledge, and that the work was to be carried on. Addresses were delivered by Professor Kirk, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Revs. J. Robertson and A. Inglis, and Mr. John Laing. Mr. Murphy said he was sorry that his visit to Edinburgh was come to a close. He had enjoyed great kindness at the hands of all concerned. He begged to return his thanks to the committee and the two secretaries (Messrs. Brown and Coutts) for all their attention, and he could say honestly that they had never had together a jarring word. (Applause.) To the choir he was also much indebted. The ministers of the city had also stood nobly by him, and he could not too heartily return his heartfelt thanks to the many ladies and gentlemen who had been workers throughout the hall. He expressed his deep debt of gratitude to Mr. J. H. Waterston, who had acted as his private secretary. He had conducted his correspondence and attended to his book, which contained a record of the gospel temperance work. He felt bound to thank him publicly for his great kindness, courtesy, and forbearance, and expressed the hope that he might long be spared to prosecute, as he had done, the good work. (Applause.) He said the press had been very kind to him, and especially the Daily Review, for which he asked three cheers, a request which met with a cordial response. At the close, on the motion of the Rev. James Robertson, a hearty vote of thanks was proposed to Mr. Murphy, which was given by the entire audience standing and waving their handkerchiefs. As Mr. Murphy left the building a large crowd heartily cheered him. The result of these meetings is that 16,000 pledges and 22,000 blue ribbons have been accepted. At a meeting held after this meeting it was resolved to continue the work, and Messrs. W. Brown, J. H. Waterston, and J. Darling were appointed a committee to arrange meetings. We are glad to observe that meetings are being held in Canongate, Westport, and Blackfriars. About 500 persons are pledging at these meetings weekly.

THE MITCHELL MONUMENT.—Just twelve months ago we informed our readers that an inscription in memory of Mrs Mitchell, the wife of the late Mr James Mitchell, who died in 1862, had been placed on the monument to his memory, which stands in the Southern Necropolis, Glasgow. We incidentally stated that the stone of the monument was wasting, and that unless it was seen to at once it would suffer injury. We asked surviving friends of Mr Mitchell to contribute a trifle each to pay for the preservation of the monument; but we feel ashamed to record that not one has paid the slightest attention to our appeal for help. The work has been done, however; and we have been requested to lay a statement of the Mitchell Monument Fund before our readers. We had hopes that the Treasurer would have had funds to have tidied up the grass around the hallowed resting-place of this noble labourer, but he has not enough, and the work is suspended.

The monument is now preserved for many years to come; and if the ground around was duly attended to, the resting-place of our lamented friend would be pleasant to look upon.

THE SILVER STAR BRIGADE.—This is one of those little organisations framed for the young which are doing a noble work in moulding and disciplining the "coming race." That their Brigade is worthy of our good wishes and our prayers will, we think, appear to all who read the "five points" of the Silver Star Brigade. (1) I promise, by God's help, to strive to be good and useful, and to try to spread happiness around men. (2) I will try to help others, especially the weak, the poor, the sick, and the sorrowful. (3) I will abstain from all intoxicating liquors, from tobacco, swearing, bad words, and gambling. (4) I will be kind to animals, and try to save them from cruelty. (5) I will strive to be loving, pure, and true in thought, word, and deed.

The Chicago Tribune says "It can scarcely be a crime to drink so long as the church continues the use of wine at the Communion Table."

"Why are you late, Miss?" She hung her head and said, "We got a baby at our house this morning." "Don't let it happen again," said he, fiercely. "No, sir," said she and took her seat. If he had seen the titter on the big scholars' faces, he would have gone mad.

SANQUHAR TOWN COUNCIL.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I see in your issue for November in your remarks about Pollokshaws Town Council you mention that Sanquhar has Provost, Bailies, and Councillors all abstainers. Now as this has appeared in different papers in Scotland, I take this opportunity to give it an unqualified denial, for, I am sorry to say, such is not the case. Herewith I give a list of the Council and their position in regard to temperance. Hoping you will give this the same publicity as you have given to the report in the November number of your magazine, I am yours respectfully.

THE W.C.T. OF THE SANQUHAR LODGE I.O.G.T.

[We find from the Worthy Chief's list of the Council that the Provost, the Treasurer, and two Councillors are abstainers; the two Bailies, the Dean, and two of the Councillors are non-abstainers. Our friend Jack Falstaff used to say, "Lord, how the world is given to lying."—Ed. S.R.]

SIR,—Hanlan's testimony as to the benefits of abstinence from intoxicating liquors and tobacco is all the more valuable from the fact that he is not only the son of a tavern-keeper, but is also himself a licensed vendor of strong drink. Trickett, also, is a tavern-keeper, and a personal abstainer. It is rather surprising, after the testimony of Mr Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote, that raising the revenue from a sober people would not present difficulties either of them could not readily overcome, to find Mr M'Iver, M.P., raising the revenue bogey again. Our present Canadian Minister of Finance, Sir Leonard Dilly, has repeatedly declared his readiness to devise sources of revenue if the liquor traffic should be prohibited. The fact is, no more wasteful source of revenue than the liquor traffic could well be found.—Yours faithfully,
G. H. HALE.

FOOD REFORM.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I read the articles of "Robin Goodfellow" on diet with considerable interest. I believe that his position is sound, but I await the appearance of all his articles before I come to a conclusion. I write to state that I was a guest at the recent Food Reform Society Dinner in the city of Glasgow. The Rev. Professor Kirk was one of the speakers. He spoke of the delusion under which people rested regarding the quantity and quality of their food. We need some principle to guide us regarding the quantity of food we require. The supply of food is unlimited, but the power to assimilate it is limited. In eating and drinking we too often pass into a state the reverse of beneficial. He illustrated his position here by the use of food in illness. In this condition the power of digestion is entirely suspended, and he himself lay in bed with fever for eight days without taking any food, and made a more rapid cure just because he had not food in his system to fight against. But I pause meantime.—Yours, ASTRON.

GOOD AND BAD.

ONE day little Robert's father saw him playing with some boys who were rude and unmannerly. He had observed for sometime a change for the worse in his son, and now he knew the cause. He was very sorry, but he said nothing to Robert at the time.

In the evening he brought from the garden six beautiful rosy-cheeked apples, put them on a plate, and presented them to Robert.

He was much pleased at his father's kindness, and thanked him.

"You must lay them aside for a few days, that they may become mellow," said the father; and Robert cheerfully placed the plate with the apples in his mother's storeroom.

Just as he was putting them aside, his father laid on his plate a seventh apple, which was quite rotten, and desired him to allow it to remain there.

"But, father," said Robert, "the rotten apple will spoil all the others."

"Do you think so? Why should not the fresh apples rather make the rotten one fresh?" said his father. And with these words he shut the door of the room.

Some days afterwards he asked his son to open the storeroom door and take out the apples. But what a sight presented itself! the six apples which had been so round and rosy-cheeked were now quite rotten, and spread a bad smell through the room.

"O papa!" cried he, "did I not tell you that the rotten apple would spoil the good ones? yet you did not listen to me."

"My boy," said his father, "have I not told you often that the company of bad children will make you bad? yet you do not listen to me. See in the condition of the apples that which will happen to you if you keep company with bad boys."

Robert did not forget the lesson. When any of his former doubtful play-fellows asked him to join in their sports, he thought of the rotten apples, and kept himself apart from them.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

THE WORKS OF DR. F. R. LEES.—We understand that Dr. F. R. Lees is willing to issue a collected edition of his works in ten volumes, provided that he receives orders enough to justify him going on with their publication. The first volume is to be the famous "Text Book on Temperance." If sufficient encouragement is given the volumes will be published quarterly, at half-a-crown each to subscribers only. Those who send in orders for six copies of any volume are entitled to a seventh copy gratis. We surely do not need to urge our friends to subscribe to the issue of works which embody such a wealth of research, learning, argument, and criticism. In no other way can they obtain such a valuable library of temperance literature. We do most earnestly commend this proposal to the prompt and liberal consideration of all our readers. They should send in their names and addresses at once, to Dr. F. R. Lees, Meanwood, Leeds.

The Son of Temperance. London: Daniel & Smithers, 120 Newington Butts; published at 337 Strand. One penny monthly. This organ has nearly run out its first volume. It is an admirable exponent of the division whose interests it was instituted to promote. Its conductors display a deep insight into all that concerns the advantages of the Society of the Sons of Temperance. We learn from the annual report the interesting record of the starting of the magazine. 4,000 was ordered of No. 1, but the cry was for more. The second, owing to an admirable paper on the valuation of the London division, reached 8,000. In the first half year of its existence the circulation has attained to 27,500 copies, a very gratifying proof of the necessity of such an organ to the division, and of the satisfactory way in which that felt necessity has been met. In a spirit of quiet sarcasm the editor places his own complaints against those of some candid critic. Here are his complaints, (a) many divisions don't advertize, (b) four-fifths of the members don't buy the paper, (c) half the grand scribes do not report grand division meetings, (d) half the grand divisions do not see that coffee taverns, reading rooms and libraries are freely supplied with the magazine, (e) subordinate divisions do not report festivals, and special efforts, and (f) some of the brethren who do report wait till the very last moment, or even prefer to see their news two months old. He is getting on excellently notwithstanding. We trust that he will show a splendid result next year. He has our best wishes.

The Two Mothers.—By Rev. Alex. M'Leod, D.D. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League. This is a very fine series of stories and told with delightful simplicity. As a prize book for the lower Sabbath school forms, or for Band of Hope children it is just the one to buy. It is a wonderful penny's worth.

The Adviser for 1882. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League. Price 1s. Enclosed in charming covers, with an elegant coloured plate of a lovely girl under the mistletoe the Adviser presents itself to our admiring gaze. Containing well selected as well as original matter, lavishly illustrated in the best style by skilled artists, with music and words, and spirited, sparkling poetry for the young, we may just say of the Adviser that "age cannot wither, nor custom stale the infinite variety" to be found in this, the most delightful children's magazine.

Drink and Strong Drink: a series of readings.—By Dr. W. B. Richardson. London and Glasgow: William Collins, Sons & Co. One shilling. This is a jewel of a temperance book. It has all the precision of science, and all the charm of rhetoric. We believe a more delightful introduction to the grand principles of the great temperance reformation is not to be found in the English language. The parents that ingrain the lessons of this most excellent text book into the minds of their children are awakening in their little hearts and intellects an un fading interest in the temperance cause. We hope to hear of its reaching an enormous circulation: anything less would be short of its deserts.

In the Western Temperance Herald for November there is an exceedingly interesting article from the pen of the Rev. J. S. Balmer, of Blackpool. Mr. Balmer voluntarily adopted the pledge of abstinence in Carlisle, wrought by day, and advocated abstinence from strong drink by night. He was at length invited to labour for temperance, and was engaged by the Ayrshire Temperance Union as their first agent. After labouring some time with great success in various portions of the temperance field, he entered the ministry in 1861, in which he has since laboured for the Master. He feels no difficulty in advocating temperance, while fulfilling his ministerial duties, nor in clearing the table of the Lord of polluting alcoholic liquors; and he has a glowing steadfast confidence that the day of the triumph of the temperance reformation is at hand. Our friends in Ayrshire will be glad to hear that their old and highly esteemed agent Mr. Balmer is so nobly fulfilling the promise of his early years.

West Thorpe.—By Alice O'Hanlon. Glasgow: Scottish Temperance League. Cloth 2s, paper covers 1s. A very powerfully written story is West Thorpe. Down into the loathsome abyss sink not a few of its characters—rich, educated, agreeable, pleasing, and loveable: up rise some who once on the brink of perdition through drink abstain from it with determination and do more than regain the position they forfeited, though, alas, they feel that it would have been better, far better that they had never fallen, since they never can forget. The story is laid chiefly among the "well to do": the very slight episode of Day and White being all that has to do with the working man. Your rector, manufacturer, your business firm, and your heir to wealth and idleness show clearly the lesson that among "our betters" the drink demon reaps as fruitful harvests as among the "sons of toil." Miss Hanlon has drawn with a firm hand a skilful plot, and a few good characters in language eminently clear and forcible, and produced a tale which all will read with interest and feeling, and not a few with eyes suffused with tears.

Thirty-first Annual Report of the Cartsdyeke Working Men's Total Abstinence Society. Greenock: Temperance Hall, 6 Cartsburn Street. Secretary, R. Smith, 42 St. Lawrence Street. The committee present an admirable report, condensed yet substantial. They inform us that 190 members have been enrolled during the year, and the heavy balance of £18 14s 2d to carry over. They had arranged for 43 lectures, etc., and held 12 in the House of Refuge. The mission work of the society is highly successful. There is a Sabbath school, a Sabbath evening meeting, and two meetings weekly, while tracts are systematically delivered, and after all the sum of £6 0s 6½d remains in the Treasurer's hands. Free tea is among the means used to reach the poor, and, besides, more than twenty families have been helped with food, fuel, and clothing, and they add significantly, "But had our instructions extended only to abstainers, or been limited to religious persuasions, our report of relief would have been nil, and your charitable fund untouched." Ah, "Godliness is profitable"! The conclusion of the tract is worthy of quotation. We wish the committee great success in their praiseworthy labours.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE REV. DR. BRUCE.—We deeply regret to have the melancholy duty of recording the decease of this revered minister at Bridge of Allan, on Wednesday, 15th ult., aged seventy-one years, forty-five of which he had spent in the ministry of the Master. He was truly a worthy man, beloved of his people, and an excellent preacher, with no small share of the vision and faculty divine, two of his hymns finding a place in the U.P. Hymnal. He had a strong sympathy with the temperance reformation, especially in its prohibitory aspect, and had his health permitted would have rendered personal assistance in its advocacy. He was interred, with the greatest show of mournful respect, in the Grange Cemetery, Edinburgh, in which city he had been the minister, and lately the senior minister, of Infirmary Street U.P. Church.

THE LATE MR. ADAM DRYDEN, EDINBURGH.—It is with much regret that we have to announce the death of Mr. Adam Dryden, who died at his residence, Craigie Terrace, Edinburgh, on 20th ult. Mr. Dryden belonged to one of the Border Counties, and settled in Edinburgh upwards of twenty years ago. He belonged to that school of quiet thinkers who naturally penetrate beneath the mere surface of those currents which agitate society, and who are slow to commit themselves to any movement until its principles and objects are clearly apprehended. Hence, when he associated himself with any public question he was ever warm and loyal in his attachment to the cause which he had espoused. While of a retiring, unobtrusive nature, he possessed in no small degree the qualities of an earnest and aggressive social, political, and temperance reformer. From an early period in the prohibitory agitation against the drink traffic, there were few who more clearly understood all the bearings of the question, and was more consistent and liberal in its support. He was a respected Vice-President of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for many years. Although never prominent on public platforms, his influence, and unflinching testimony in the cause of temperance, and kindred subjects will be much missed. As a successful business man, and a Christian gentleman he was honoured and respected by all who knew him, and much sympathy is felt for his widow and family. His funeral took place on Thursday the 23rd ult., in Newington Cemetery, which was largely attended, there being present a number of distinguished citizens, including the Rev. Principal Cairns, Rev. Mr. Riach, Mr. Duncan M'Laren, late Member for the City, Dr. Menzies, and many others who are well known in the cause of social and temperance reform. Councillor Lossock, Peebles, and Mr. J. H. Waterston represented the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association on the melancholy occasion.—L.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

BY ANNIE S. SWAN.

Author of "Shadowed Lives," "Thankful Rest," "Fruits," &c.

CHAPTER VIII.—THE MISSION IN PIPER'S ALLEY.

I cannot linger over the days which followed—over the desolation of that ruined house; over the mourning at the manse, where Lizzie had been loved as a dear daughter of the house.

Three days later she was buried with her baby at her breast in the churchyard at Strathglide. Arthur followed her to the grave, and these few days had changed him from the vigour of splendid manhood to the feeble appearance of age. He stood beside the open grave and listened to the faltering words of his father's prayer without a muscle of his set face moving. Some among them said it was a shame to see how indifferent he was, but others knew that the fires of Gehenna burned under that calm exterior. That day he disappeared without a word of warning or farewell to kith or kin. It was only known that he took train at Claybridge for Glasgow, thither it was useless to follow him.

In the second week of April Tom Hislop sailed for Queensland, and all trace of the Hislops departed from Strathglide.

But it would be long before they were forgotten in the place.

During all this time, Andrew Sutherland's business had been steadily increasing. Ay, the Half Way House, like others of its kind, was eminently a paying concern. There is no risk you see in the sale of liquor, the longer it is kept the more valuable it becomes, and then look at the profit the retailers take! And the shameful adulteration alcoholic drinks are subjected to goes a long way towards increasing these profits; it is a very dishonourable thing, I doubt not, but can you expect to find a spirit of honour among those who traffic in the ruin and wreck of their fellow-men, body and soul? Strong language, my friends, but no stronger than the subject warrants. This evil is not one which can be dealt with gently, or spoken of in light condemnation. The day has long gone for such measures.

Strange to say, Walter Gillespie and his father were still apart. Neither would give in, for in spite of his amiability Walter had an iron will of his own. He was doing well in London, and was his uncle's right hand. Possibly, if he had not been doing so well, he would have sacrificed his pride ere this. In the autumn following Lizzie's death, Laura accepted an invitation from Mrs. Hunter, and went to London to spend a few weeks. Walter had not seen her for nearly two years. Letters passed regularly, but what are letters compared to the real and living presence of our dear ones? These were weeks of unalloyed happiness for both. The Hunter's abode at Richmond was a beautiful home of the wife's choosing. A sweet, frank, loveable woman was Matthew Hunter's wife, although there was a gravity about her which the loss of three lovely children had left behind. Her childless heart had warmed to Walter, and she was ready, you may be sure, to accord a true welcome to his promised wife. Seeing her, she ceased to wonder at what she had secretly thought Walter's folly. London was a great revelation to the country girl, and the Hunters were good entertainers. Nothing worth seeing was left unseen. "I have to attend a social meeting of our mission to-night, Laura," said Mr. Hunter one evening at the dinner table; "Have you any curiosity to see one of the saddest and yet most interesting sights in all London?"

"I should like it," answered Laura. "What kind of a mission is it?"

"It is among the lowest and most degraded class in the East end," answered Mr. Hunter. "We have a service once a week, and a tea meeting occasionally. There is a Dorcas Society too, upheld by the ladies interested in the work; my wife is its principal. It is uphill work, she will tell you, but we have just enough success to encourage us to go on."

"It is a noble work," said Laura, warmly.

"It is," assented Mrs. Hunter. Before I was married, Laura, I would have crossed to the other side of the street to evade one of these poor creatures who are my friends now. My husband taught me that they have souls and feelings just as we have, and he has imbued me with some of his enthusiasm."

"She is invaluable in the worst cases, my dear," smiled Mr. Hunter, "A woman can do so much more than a man sometimes. They all love her. You will see evidence of it to-night. You will accompany us, Walter."

"Yes, uncle."

"All right. It is time we were off, the meeting begins at seven, it is past five now. Will you cut some flowers for the tables, ladies?"

The city clocks were chiming seven when the party drove through the city.

"You have five minutes walk through the slums before you reach the place, Laura," said Mrs. Hunter, when the carriage stopped in one of the poorest quarters of the mighty city. "We can't take the horses down; it wouldn't be safe."

Laura nodded, and they turned down a narrow squalid lane, literally swarming with people. Children of all ages and sizes sprawled in the gutters, in company with the lean and hungry curs which are ever plentiful in the quarters of the poor. Even in this place Laura was amazed to see the number of gin-shops on either side. Every few yards there was a flaming sign and a wide doorway giving a tempting glimpse of the interior. Depend upon it, my friends, these rum-sellers know the frailty of human nature. Do you suppose they don't know that the poorest of their customers love creature comforts if they can but procure them? Coming from these foul, cheerless, squalid dens called homes, though God knows the name is but a mockery, do you wonder that a man enters a gin palace with a sense of pleasure? They look so comfortable inside, with their glancing gas-lights, polished counter, and glittering glass and pewter, if you will believe it these things have often as much to do with a man spending his time there as the mere drink.

Make your homes more attractive, and strip off the gilt, and glitter, and light, from your taverns, and there will be a great step gained in the right direction.

At Richmond on that fair June evening, it had seemed a very pleasure to be alive. Every breath of the summer wind was laden with the perfume of a thousand blossoms, every tree and hedge was clothed with the green freshness of the glorious summer time, but here, lo, what a change! The hot stifling air was reeking with foul fumes and poisonous breaths, the narrow strip of sky above the towering roof-trees was obscured by the mists and vapours of the city: no wonder that Laura Tennant drew her skirts closely about her as she carefully picked her way in the centre of the lane, and asked compassionately, "How on earth do these wretched creatures live?" They don't live, my friends, they drag out a wretched existence in which there is not a ray of hope or light. Look at their faces if you should chance to find yourself in some of these vile places. There is not a spark of intelligence beyond a low cunning in their faces. You may look in vain for one trace of noble manhood or womanhood among them.

The meeting-place in Piper's Alley was a brick structure, plain and substantially built. The interior fitted up with strong wooden benches, and tables of the same description. These were set out for tea. There was an abundance of plain solid food, such as the majority of the poor souls never tasted except within these walls. The hall was packed, and as our friends made their way through the centre to the platform, a kind of cheer was raised. Laura and Walter were provided with seats near the front, and from thence watched the proceedings with intense interest.

There might be three or four hundred on the benches of all ages and sexes, each one a more pitiful-looking object than his neighbour.

Bent, feeble, old men and aged crones, scarcely able to sustain their tottering weight, strong, villanous-looking fellows of the type which fills our gaols and penitentiaries, fierce, repulsive women from whom all grace of womanhood had long since fled, girls in their teens with faces already seared by the hand of vice, and little children, God help them, who, reared in a nursery of crime, never knew the guileless innocence of childhood; these were the people on whom Laura Tennant looked in pitiful amazement. There were several ladies busy at the tables, pouring out tea, and cutting huge slices of bread. Mrs. Hunter went from one bench to another, offering a flower here and a kind word, or perhaps only a smile there, and Laura saw in that the evidence Mr. Hunter had promised her. Yes, Edith Hunter had a hold upon these hearts.

A choir of young ladies and gentlemen sang hymns during the progress of the meal; many paused to listen, and Laura fancied she saw tears in some eyes as the sweet strains of Jesus' redeeming love rang through the hall.

"Well, my dear," said Matthew Hunter, finding himself for a moment near Laura, "what do you think of our meeting?"

"I can't express my feelings, sir," said Laura. "It seems to me something awful to think of the life these people must lead to cause them to look like that. See, Walter, what would you say that was there at the end of the bench next the wall?"

Walter turned his head and looked in the direction indicated. On the extreme edge of the bench was a figure small and stunted, habited in one ragged shirt and a man's old coat. Destitute of linen the creature's breast and neck was visible through the rents and fissures of the garment. Set upon a bony neck was a head with a shock of matted black hair which hung wildly over the low narrow forehead; a pair of small black eyes gleamed from beneath the shaggy brows, and the lower part of the face was coarse and heavy. And stamped upon that face was a look of dogged misery, enough to make a heart bleed.

"That is Shuffling Ben, as he is called among them," explained Matthew Hunter. "His mother is a hopeless drunkard, and the boy, he is a boy, cousin, though I grant you might be puzzled to guess it, picks up a living anywhere. Steals enough one day perhaps to last him the next, and starves the rest of the week. He has never been in jail yet, he is as sharp as a fox, they can't get at him; he never comes here unless positively starving."

Laura shuddered.

At that moment she saw Mrs. Hunter go up to the lad and lay her hand on his shoulder. They were near enough to catch his words.

"Well Ben, my boy," she said, and her voice was as soft and tender as if she had been speaking to one of her own little ones; "I am glad to see you here to-night. Have you had a good tea?"

Ben replied by a kind of jerk, but his face preserved its stolidity.

"I have missed you for a few weeks, what has come over you?"

"Dunno."

"Could not you manage to bring your mother with you next time, Ben; do try?"

Ben raised his head and looked at her with a look of matchless cunning and amusement in his eyes. "Bring 'er here, oh my, wot a lark it ud be."

"We're going to have some nice music and a word or two from Mr. Hunter now, Ben," she said not noticing his last remark, "you'll stay."

"Ef you want me to," said Ben, his face relapsing into its hapless stolidity, "I'll bide."

"Of course I want you, Ben, or do you think I should have come here to ask you," and with a smile Mrs. Hunter left him and came to the platform.

Mr. Hunter stood up and raised his hand for silence, you would have wondered to see how his sign was obeyed. You could have heard a pin drop. I need not write down what he said to these people, because to you it would sound very poor and weak; simple words mean much in their utterance, but they lose their force when they are written. He did not speak above ten minutes, and what he said came straight from his heart, and was simple enough to be understood by the youngest among them. It was only the story he had told in that place scores of times before, the record of that holy, loving, unselfish life of the Saviour who lived on earth in order that the poorest, vilest wretches might have life eternal. To some in that hall that life was a joyful reality, and the Saviour a near and precious friend, but the majority of them had heard the story before, and listened to it now as the inevitable winding up of the tea meeting; they could not get the one without the other. I question if the half of them listened to the speaker's words, yet all kept quiet. Then a hymn was given out, simple words set to a simple tune made familiar by repetition.

Mr. Hunter requested the audience to join, which they did with a will. And oh, what a chorus it was! Words fail me to describe it. There was no harmony in it, and yet the tears ran like rain down Laura Tennant's cheeks as she listened.

Ten minutes afterwards the hall was cleared, and only the workers remained on the platform.

"Well, Laura," said Mrs. Hunter, speaking for the first time, "Do you think you could undertake work like this? Do you see sufficient to interest you?"

"Interest," repeated Laura, "I think it would be a life-work to reform one of them. I never saw such a collection in my life. If you had described them to me I would never have believed that the world held so many wrecks of humanity. What do you think of it, Walter?"

"I don't know," replied Walter briefly, and from his manner Laura guessed how deeply he was moved.

"They were wonderfully orderly to-night," said Matthew Hunter. "One night I had to send Edith home, there was something like a free fight in the hall."

"And it's cause?" asked Laura.

"Drink," replied Matthew Hunter briefly. "Without it there would be a faint hope of reclaiming these masses; with it the thing is an impossibility. They are demons when the drink is in them."

"If their reclamation is an impossibility, uncle," said Walter impulsively, "why continue the work? Is it not so much waste of time and labour?"

"If one of these immortal souls can be brought safely home, it is worth it, my boy," said the elder man with kindling face. "And, thank God, it has been our glorious privilege to see the restoration of more than one!"

THE WORKING MAN'S BILL OF FARE—V.

THE "coming race," if they are to progress at all in proportion to their means and opportunities, must be able to live so as to have life in society as it is in say our prisons, with a mortality never exceeding eleven per thousand, instead of the mean of double that mortality as at present. We cannot see why there should be such a reckless eagerness to take all out of life we can if it were known that we can only live up to a certain measure, which we may maintain but cannot increase, and can certainly decrease by our wanton extravagance. They will require to be better up in the economy of life than we, their forefathers and foremothers. If they can realise that life is more than meat, they will endeavour to proportion their food to the healthy wants of their system. If their system can assimilate three diets, then three diets will not be waste of food for them; while if two diets are all that their system demands, three diets must be excess. Excess to them as to us is the loss of that food which is in excess of their requirements and loss of assimilative power, which means the premature failure of their system to extract from the food supplies presented to it enough and no more for the healthy wants of their organism. These losses simply mean early decay of the vital powers, which is untimely death. The enjoyment of the gourmand is purchased at a fearful cost, when the purchase money is the abridgment of life with all its elevated pleasures. By the side of the pampered appetite may alas too often be found the enfeebled will, the sluggish intellect, the prostrate reason: the system is inverted, the lower nature becomes of supreme importance to the man, and disorder and slavery ensue. The loss of means through bad feeding is greatly to be deplored; but the loss of satisfaction derived by the mind from literature, from art, from science, and from travel, is a loss which is irreparable. Every one, therefore, has a deep interest in a proper bill of fare. The mere fact that we must eat is not enough, we must learn to eat with a proper regard both for the quantity and quality of our food. When we have fully realised what is meant in this propriety, we shall eat more like rational beings and less, we would say never, with a view to the mere animal enjoyments of the table.

A distinction with regard to food is often overlooked—the distinction as to the requirements of the system in idleness and activity. We find the idler indulging in an amount of food utterly out of proportion to his quiescent existence, and being languid, indolent, and apathetic in consequence. His system is burdened with food which it cannot absorb, and, without the active exertion which would enable it to use it to some purpose, sinks under the strain to which the system is subjected, and plethora very soon makes its appearance with its deplorable results of functional and structural disorder. On "active service" persons fully intelligent on their relation to food would increase their rations in exact proportion to their increased expenditure of force, and save for natural fatigue, which induces natural repose so agreeable and so recuperative, they would not be sensible of increased exertion. If it is said that a great portion of our time would be taken up by the attention demanded by such niceties respecting our food, we answer we should after a while fall as surely into the right mode as we have now fallen into the wrong mode. That power of adaptation by which we so easily disentangle the perplexities of our life would not desert us here, and we should soon be as sensitive to any deviation from the right path of life in our diet as we are of any aberration from good conduct by our conscience.

Another distinction should be made between the food of the sedentary and the active. The sedentary too often neglect or forego exercise; and if there is little waste through little muscular exertion or exercise the system should not be clogged by food. If the fire has no strong draught, it should not be overlaid with coals. In this case it burns too low to be either useful or cheerful: so the constitution of the sedentary suffers when a low activity is conjoined with diet more fitted for strenuous exertion than for sedentary occupation.

Still another distinction requires notice, that between people working indoors and out of doors. The exposure to cold is productive of increased demands on the system, of which the indoor worker knows nothing. The indoor worker may work vigorously—the air he breathes be far less pure than that out of doors—he may be warmer, and hence less heat-forming food may be wanted. The evils of diminished oxygen and unnatural warmth, if aggravated by gross feeding, will speak trumpet-tongued to him of his folly, and a lasting breakdown of the outraged system may be threatened or result.

We see then that if ever there was a necessity for applying the sententious aphorism of the Greek sage, "Know thyself," it is to the food we eat and enjoy. Here is a sphere of enquiry upon which our utmost mental energy may be exerted greatly to our advantage, and to the increased enjoyment of existence. The knowledge of our physical frame, and its relation to air, food, and water, is worthy of a diligent pursuit; and no man who has ever realised the great truths, that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," and that "we are fearfully and wonderfully made," and the relation which God has established between these truths, will ever grudge at giving time to what he should and what he should not eat.

In continuation of our observations on various dietaries, we now take up the dietary of our workhouses. We have before us the "rules and regulations for the management of poorhouses, prepared and sanctioned by the Board of Supervision for the Relief of the Poor," dated 1877. We have felt a great interest in our examination of this brief manual of the treatment of the poor. In the first place, the rules are not absolute, for any deviation from them may be permitted by the Board provided that cogent reasons are adduced for it. The relief afforded to the poor is now looked upon as a legal obligation binding upon every ratepayer. Formerly the poorhouses of our country were looked upon as huge almshouses, where the truly poor—the aged, infirm, friendless—destitute, and unable to support themselves were maintained; and these had much freedom, had even a little levee occasionally, and received presents. The feelings of the poor with respect to poorhouse relief are sadly altered, that proud independence which scorned the stigma of pauperism has well nigh disappeared, and men and women talk loudly of their legal title to relief. Hence the discipline of the poorhouse has altered greatly to the discomfort of the really necessitous poor, because the other class must be made to feel that such discipline must be more irksome than labour would be, and they are they for whom work, confinement, and discipline have to be provided. The governor, matron, and medical officer have a most anxious time of it in carrying out the rules of the Board, modified by the local board, so as to administer them properly, without offence to the house committee, and without giving occasion to the pauper of the doubtful class to air his grievances before the sheriff.

Only the other day, however, a man who, through paralysis, had been obliged to accept parochial relief called on the Inspector of the Poor at Rutherglen to inform him that, through his wife, he had got a little money, and would no longer require relief. And the first use he made of the little "windfa'" was to pay up to the last farthing the amount he had received as relief. A house factor in Glasgow some years ago repaid to a country parochial board the sum which his parents had received as relief. It is to be regretted that such instances of real manly independence should be so rare.

Bearing these points in mind, let us look at the dietary provided for our paupers in our poorhouses. This dietary comes under the immediate cognisance of the visiting committee, who once a week at least "should satisfy themselves as to the quantity and quality of the provisions issued to the inmates;" and they must give an answer in writing to the 9th query in the house committee's book, which is, "Is the established dietary duly observed, and are the hours of meals regularly adhered to?" and also query 11th, which is as follows: "Is any complaint made by any of the inmates against any official, or in respect of the provisions?" The house governor is to receive all provisions, with which he is to compare the bill of delivery, to see that they are in terms of contract; and he is to issue them to the matron or other as directed by the rules, and also to see that they are properly applied. Moreover, he is to keep a daily diet book and a sick diet book; and our opinion is, that if these books be kept according to the rules, the dietary of the poor-houses cannot differ much from the wishes of the Board of Supervision. It is carefully provided that he or another says grace at every meal! The matron who, in his absence, performs his duties is also called upon to make diet roll of the inmates, to receive the articles from the governor for the day's consumption, to see that the food is properly cooked and properly served to the healthy inmates, and also to such as are sick. The medical officer is to give all necessary directions about the diet of the sick, the insane, and the children. He is to report any defect in the dietary of the house. Then the rules determine that the healthy inmates should eat their meals in the dining hall, and in no other place. The punishment of the disorderly inmate is to include withholding his milk or butter milk or such other portion of his diet for a period not longer than three days, unless with the medical officer's sanction. The refractory pauper is in like manner to be punished. Insubordinates are not to have their diet altered if under twelve, or pregnant, or giving suck, unless the medical officer believes that no harm will follow such deprivation.

We can now look into the dietary of our poor with greater interest after all these formidable precautions about its nature, service, and regularity are taken into account. There are seven classes—A, the aged inmate who is not working; B (a), adults who are not aged and do not work, (b) children between 8 and 15 years; C, adults working; D, infirm; E, children from 5 to 8 years; F, children of from 2 to 5 years; and G, infants not 2 years of age. It will be seen that we are interested chiefly in classes A, B, and C. To each of these classes three meals a day are allowed:—

Class A. Breakfast—Meal, 3 oz.; milk,  $\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint. Dinner—Bread, 6 oz.; broth,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint. Supper—Meal, 3 oz.; milk,  $\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint.

Class B. Breakfast—Meal, 4 oz.; milk,  $\frac{2}{3}$  imp. pint. Dinner—Bread, 8 oz.; broth,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint. Supper—Meal, 4 oz.; milk,  $\frac{2}{3}$  imp. pint.

Class C. Breakfast—Meal, 4 oz.; milk,  $\frac{2}{3}$  imp. pint. Dinner—Bread, 8 oz.; broth,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint; boiled meat, 4 oz. Supper—Meal, 4 oz.; milk,  $\frac{2}{3}$  imp. pint.

Such is the dietary of the aged healthy, the non-working adult, and boy, and the working pauper. It bears out the distinction between the inactive and the active eater, the difference being 2 ozs. bread added in the case of the adult, and of 4 oz. meat, 2 ozs. meal, 2 ozs. bread, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint of milk a day in the case of the working inmate. We are told that "no article of diet which is not of good quality and in a wholesome state should be issued, prepared for, or given to any inmate." The meal may be Scotch or Indian meal, or a mixture of the two; the milk butter milk, or new or skimmed milk. The bread the same as is eaten by the labouring poor outside the house; the broth made with 2 ozs. of boneless meat, 2 ozs. barley,  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. pease,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  ozs. carrots, turnips, or other vegetables, and salt for each ration of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  imp. pint. This, however, would be a monotonous diet were it continued from day to day, but it is happily varied. Three times a week instead of the broth the inmates may get pea soup, the ration being made with 2 ozs. of whole or split peas,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  ozs. of peasflour, 1 oz. vegetables, and salt and pepper. Once a week 3 ozs. of skim-milk cheese may be substituted for the broth alone,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  ozs. for broth and meat together. Yet, again, classes A and B may have, not more than twice a week, instead of broth 8 ozs. whitefish; and class C 12 ozs. whitefish instead of their broth and meat. Once more, class A may have, not more than twice a week, instead of the broth and bread  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. boiled potatoes with  $\frac{2}{3}$  imp. pint of skimmed milk; and classes B and C 2 lbs. boiled potatoes with  $\frac{2}{3}$  imp. pint of skimmed milk; and class C can have instead of bread, broth, and meat 3 lbs. boiled potatoes and 1 imp.

pint of skimmed milk. And, as if this option was not enough, the medical officer has a large discretion when the scarcity of any article, the season of the year, &c., may justify a farther change. We also observe that article VI. of the appendix is devoted to the "diet of inmates." In this circular we are told that it is in the power, and it is the duty, of the medical officer to order solid meat to be given daily, or at stated intervals, in addition to broth, or to order any other deviation from the prescribed diet in the case of any inmate whose state of health renders such deviation necessary. Then it is not intended that solid meat should be in the broth given to any inmate only the 4 ozs. issued to class C; but here the medical officer can increase or diminish the ration as he may see fit. And we have the following impressive words: "Poorhouse authorities should bear in mind that while their first duty in the matter unquestionably is to endeavour to maintain as far as possible the health of the inmates, it is also highly important that no unnecessary expenditure should be incurred, and that the diet of the healthy inmates should not be raised above that of the labouring population of the country."

Now, a glance is sufficient to show that the dietary of the inmates of our poorhouses is superior in many respects to the dietary of the working classes. It is of superior quality, which theirs too often is not; it is in general better cooked, a quality in which theirs is too often sadly deficient, and it is varied: changes in their dietary occurring far too seldom. It is graduated to the state of health of the individual, which we cannot say of many of the working men's food supply, the can of boiled tea and the slice of ham and white bread we often see them taking to their labour bears witness to this. When pay night comes there is with such too often quite a "burst," and on the first two or three days of the week "cookie shines" take place, with the unfortunate result that by the end of the week the table is supplied upon credit, or if credit is not to be had, then resource is had to the pawn shop. Even in the matter of quantity we are not sure but that the poorhouse dietary has the advantage over that of many of our labouring classes. In that case, however, we want a change for the better rather than to point to extravagance in the dietary of the pauper. We feel sure, however, that every heart will go out in sympathy to the struggling household who, notwithstanding all the father can do—what with want of work, change of masters, and other painful vicissitudes—he is unable to place on his table a diet equal to that served out to the pauper every day.

We think, however, that the pauper is a good witness in establishing our case, that on the whole our working men spend on foods a larger percentage than their income warrants or their system demands. If there were any serious reduction below the poorhouse standard in the paupers' diet, or any serious deviation taking place through mismanagement, we are certain that the Board of Supervision would not tolerate it; and if it did, the pressure of public opinion would make it even do justice to the poorhouse inmates under its care; and even these inmates have a right to the interference of the law. Indeed, we find that the first petition presented to the Board of Supervision was from a male inmate, complaining that his weekly pocket money was unreasonably small! On the whole, we believe that the paupers in the poorhouses are well treated as to diet, that their dietary is adopted to preserve them in health notwithstanding the depressing circumstances of their lot, and that the amount of their food is worthy of the attention of every working man desirous of food reform.

We will next look at our prison dietary, from which we hope to derive as much support as from the poorhouse dietary which has passed under our consideration.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

"Ah! compositor, my watch has lost half an hour—I never knew it to do such a thing all the seven years I've carried it. I wonder what the dickens ails it?" Printer's devil—"Oh, it's served an apprenticeship, you know, and it's now out of it's time."

TURNING OVER A NEW LEAF.

THERE are not many persons but have at one period or other of their lives given utterance to the homely expression at the head of our paper.

The curious would like to be put into possession of the particulars which prompted such a desire to turn over a new leaf.

The utterances in most cases are the outcome of a struggle within. It may be the individual has become involved in financial difficulties by living beyond his income, and upon consideration of his position there seems only one hope for the future, and that is to turn over a new leaf and live within his income. Or a consciousness of wrong-doing has wrung out from that guilty soul a resolution "To cease to do evil and learn to do well." Or a sight of the guilt and misery around him has so overwhelmed that man of God, and so aroused him to feel his personal responsibility, that his turning over a new leaf means his entire consecration to the service of the Master; and his life work shall be to rescue the perishing around him.

From whatever cause, or in whatever direction, a desire for improvement and reformation comes, there is abundant cause for thankfulness.

There is so much that is stereotyped, perfunctionary and conservative, in the ways and doings of the generality of mankind that it affords ground for hope when the ordinary routine is broken, and the man wakes up from his mechanical existence and throws his whole energy into the work, either for himself, his fellow, his country, or his Saviour.

Men's lives and works are like tradesmen's books—imperfect. (We are offering no apology for imperfection, but only stating a fact.)

There is not a trader in this great city whose books do not reveal mistakes made, losses sustained, errors committed, and unwise speculations ventured upon. And in many cases when the time for stock-taking comes, either from choice or necessity, very great and important changes have to be made in the conduct of the business for the future, nothing more or less than "Turning over a new leaf in the management."

That man has yet to be born who will be able to lay his hand upon his heart and look up to God and say, "I have never made a mistake, I have never lost an opportunity of doing good to my fellowmen, I have never erred in judgment, I have never ventured upon an undertaking in my own strength and failed. There is no necessity for improvement in my case, I am perfect."

Ordinary mortals, the best of them as well as the worst, when viewing their own doings in the light of eternity, and the claims of society and their Saviour, confess themselves to be but "unprofitable servants." In turning over a new leaf at the beginning of the year 1883, as temperance reformers, let us copy from the right subject, the perfect example, the model teacher—"the man Christ Jesus."

His school is open to all, and his invitation is "Learn of me."

No mistakes will be made if we follow his example, no failures if we take hold on his strength, no imperfections if we say "not my will but thy will be done." His was a life of self-denial, self-sacrifice, consuming zeal, consecrated labour, and unparalleled success. "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day, the night cometh when no man can work," was the outcome of his noble mission on earth. His biography is written in one brief sentence, "Who went about doing good."

The most dangerous theological teaching of the present day is that which ignores human agency in removing evil, and throws the entire responsibility of the regeneration of mankind upon the Lord himself.

"We are labourers together with God" is the teaching of the New Testament. "Son, go work to-day in my vineyard" is the command of the Master. "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" is the inquiry of the Lord himself.

The great desideratum in connection with all our philanthropic and Christian societies is workmen—labourers. There are plenty of lookers on ever ready to suggest their own peculiar method for carrying on the work. Their peculiar forte is to direct the work of others. They see and deplore the ruin caused by the liquor traffic, but never lift their voice or give any material assistance towards saving the fallen or restoring order and beauty where desolation and degradation prevails.

If the fallen are to be saved, we must work for that object. If the young are to be secured from the seductive power of the traffic, we must not waste our time in raising a breakwater to afford shelter to the poor wrecks of humanity left.

"Dry up the source from whence it flows,
Destroy the fountain-head,
Then dire intemperance, with its woes,
Shall no more our land o'erspread."

To do this effectually, every temperance man and woman must be at their post, and do their duty.

Work is the order of the day. None are excused. No person can delegate his work to another. The man of low station must do his duty as well as the man who occupies a more exalted position in society. The responsibility is the same in each case.

Work with energy. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might. Throw your whole being into the work. To attain an eminence in science, to become renowned in literature, to win laurels on the battlefield, all the powers of body and mind are concentrated. The aspirants work, study, and fight with all their might. Ours is a nobler work, a higher aim, a more glorious warfare. We are working for eternity. Our aim is to save precious souls, our battle is against the liquor traffic, and our sworn resolve is its overthrow.

Do you work promptly? "The night cometh when no man can work." Our opportunities for working will have soon passed away. We shall soon be in the grave. There is no work to be done there for suffering humanity. No wisdom there to devise schemes for the amelioration of human woe. No knowledge there to apply our plans so as to benefit our fellowmen.

The work of destruction is going on. From the moment the clock announces the arrival of the New Year until its close the traffickers have arranged (having the law on their side) to carry on their work.

Let every reader of this paper resolve to turn over a new leaf, and commence working in real earnest for the overthrow of the liquor traffic; and with united action and God's blessing we shall yet "Turn the battle to the gate."

THE ROAD TO HEAVEN.—Some years since, on a Sunday afternoon, a Wesleyan local preacher inquired of a pitman, standing at a roadside corner, the way to a certain square. The man had evidently been indulging a little at the public-house, and was disposed to cultivate a conversation: for instead of directing the inquirer, he replied, "Aa warrant thoo's gan to preach thar?" The modest answer was, "I am going to try," to which Geordie thus responded, "Thoo's a bonny man to show the folks the way to heaven, an' dissent knaa the road to ——— Square!"

THE FUNDS.

* * * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1883.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

JANUARY, 1883.

* * * We have been obliged to leave over several interesting papers, among them being "Science and Scripture and Alcohol;" also poetry, reviews, &c. We hope to find more room next month.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL OUR READERS AND

NEW YEAR'S TRACT, 1883.

With this number of the Social Reformer we present as a Supplement, a copy of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association's New Year Tract for 1883, entitled, "Turn the Battle to the Gate." It is written by Bailie Selkirk, J.P., Glasgow. Friends should send in their orders for copies to the offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow, without delay. The price is 10s. per thousand, exclusive of carriage; 1s. per hundred, or 1s. 5d. per hundred post free. They might provide themselves with a liberal supply, and gift copies to the mission districts around them, or for enclosure in their letters to friends near or far away.

SHALL WE LOWER OUR FLAG?

THIS question is forced upon our attention in view of proposals put forward by temperance reformers for "improving" the licensing system. We do not hesitate to say that, however well meant they are, they ought to have no support from temperance reformers, as they are a distinct lowering of the temperance flag on the part of those whose first duty ought ever to be to maintain it unflinchingly in the face of every temptation to the contrary.

What have the leaders of the temperance movement got to do with any tinkering of the licensing system? They know and teach that intoxicating drinks are in their nature hurtful and wasteful, and that total abstinence from them is the only wise and safe course to follow. If, as a result of such advocacy, many are induced to curtail their drinking, though they do not entirely abstain, it is always matter for congratulation. But they never dream of advocating anything else than entire abstinence. They have a clear and intelligible principle to maintain, and however unwilling the community are to adopt the principle in its entirety; and however disposed to prefer some less sweeping alternative, their attitude on the matter never alters one iota. But all this is changed when the legislative aspect of the question comes to be considered. No doubt it is maintained as a principle that it is the right and duty of the State to prohibit the entire liquor traffic, and that the people should be empowered to suppress all sale of intoxicating liquor within their respective districts. But, on the temporizing and unsatisfactory plea that the country is not yet ready for such a measure, and that Parliament won't grant it, leaders of the temperance movement come forward and unblushingly invite their constituents and the country generally to join with them in asking Parliament to change the licensing authority, and otherwise reform and improve the present system. This we unhesitatingly pronounce to be a lowering of the true temperance flag, indicative of, we do not say an absolute want of faith in principle, but of an unworthy impatience of the success of the agitation on the only solid, safe, and defensible lines. It is, moreover, misleading to a serious degree, inasmuch as it not only suggests that fresh terms may consistently and advantageously be made with the traffickers under which their business may continue to be conducted, but that, on certain concessions being granted, further agitation by temperance reformers will, for at least some time to come, be suspended.

It seems to us that these leaders have allowed their zeal for something "practical" being done by Parliament, to outrun their sense of what is due to the fundamental principles of the temperance reformation to which they undoubtedly are attached. They seem to forget the lessons taught by the history of other great movements that it is shortsighted policy to deviate one hair's breadth from a position that is impregnable, and that must sooner or later be conceded in its entirety; and that compromises, dictated as they usually are from motives of expediency, invariably suggest false issues, weaken popular agitation, and postpone the final settlement of the cause. Let it be remembered that in every national movement there are always those who, failing to realize its essential and radical importance, make compromise in some form their ultimate goal. And there are many such in this crusade. We appreciate their standpoint and acknowledge their influence, and we consider that with them alone should be left the work and the responsibility of all minor proposals. And the reason is that difficulties and anomalies will be found inseparable from these in any form.

Of course it will be urged that the entire suppression of the liquor traffic, either by an imperial enactment or by the vote of the ratepayers, is quite Utopian so long as the consumption of intoxicating liquors is so general and so great. It may be so, and yet it may be none the less the duty of temperance reformers to advocate prohibition. That a community is not prepared to accept an Act upon a great and vital principle can never be a reason for remaining silent in regard to it, but is the strongest possible reason for proclaiming it. If a certain condition of things is wrong, the truth must be spoken whether it is received or not. It may be quite true, as many temperance reformers firmly believe, that the liquor traffic will never be entirely prohibited, except by degrees, restriction following restriction in gradual sequence, but surely that can never be pled as a reason for conducting the movement on other than strictly logical, intelligible, and defensible lines. It is our profound conviction that even restrictive measures will be more easily and rapidly passed when the advocacy is thorough-going than when it is not so. Besides, temperance reformers in standing by their principles while concessions are being made will preserve their independence and consistency, and are free to continue the agitation with unabated energy. We feel constrained very earnestly to appeal to all true-hearted temperance reformers to stand firmly by their principles, and refuse to be drawn away by any specious license reform schemes which, however well-meant, are unworthy the advocacy of the leaders of the temperance movement, and should be left to those who, in promoting them, admit that they aim at nothing more than raising the character of the traffic by limiting it to persons who will conduct the business in a respectable way, during reasonable hours, and to the advantage of the community!

It is good to stand out and have a look at a matter in which you are interested. The liquor traffickers of Illinois put in a claim for being true temperance men. This is what they say, "The Liquor-Dealers' and Manufacturers' State Protective Association of Illinois is now acknowledged to be the most systematic and efficient organization of the kind in the United States, but its great mission is yet to be performed; the great battles are still to be fought! To be successful in the future we must convince the good people of the State that we are the friends and not the foes of true temperance; that we are not engaged in waging war against society, against law and order and public morals, but that on the contrary we are in favour of a proper system of licensing, and such a method of regulating the traffic that its abuses will be abolished, while the respectable trade is fully protected." When publicans talk of regulating the liquor traffic, they are not very far from being on the same lines upon which so many temperance reformers delight to travel. These publicans would like to see a proper system of licensing, and good people toiling till their health fails, keeping their liquor business in order, devoting themselves to abolishing the abuses of the traffic! How the publicans would cheer on such reformers who are trying to make their trade so respectable that scandal would not dare to name it! Whenever we see a temperance reformer eager to have the trade regulated by a Board or such like authority, we will always think how proud the publicans of Illinois would be of him, and wish that he was over there.

We observe that the Wigan election has terminated in the return of the Hon. A. Egerton, who has promised to support local option on the lines laid down by the Church of England Temperance Society, and also for the Sunday closing of public-houses, on condition that clubs be closed by the same law, and in the rejection of Mr. Wren, who promised to support Sir Wilfrid Lawson in his temperance legislation. The return of Mr. Egerton is considered a clear gain to temperance reformers, but unfortunately this conclusion does not arise from comparing Mr. Wren with Mr. Egerton, but Mr. Egerton with Mr. Powell, unseated on petition, and also with Lord Lindsay (now Earl of Crawford.) We cannot endorse the statement. Mr. Egerton is, as regards the true issue, a broken reed. The fact is that he and Mr. Wren are, on this question, in different camps. The Church of England does not contemplate prohibitory legislation—does not at present believe the traffic can be prohibited. The election of Mr. Egerton may assist in securing a better regulation of the liquor traffic, but he will not take the fangs from the social serpent, nor the sting from the social adder. People will continue to be enthralled by the drink system, and the usual inevitable calamitous consequences will follow as surely as the setting does the rising sun. Mr. Wren, on the other hand, wished to enable the people to legally withstand the aggressions of the liquor traffic—a very different matter indeed. We may like to see, we would gladly see, the virulence of the liquor traffic reduced; but we have always held that as the traffic cannot be regulated nor controlled satisfactorily, it is idle to return men to Parliament pledged to support restrictions. England has failed as yet to give a majority for prohibition, and she never will, though she should return all her four hundred and ninety-four representatives, with views in harmony with those of Mr. Egerton. We in Scotland have, by painful experience, attained to clearer views on this matter. We have found that merely local option candidates are bogus supporters, as they "keep the promise to the ear but break it to the hope." We rejoice to see the electors of Scotland resolute on giving their support only to those candidates who will undertake, without equivocation or without reservation, to veto the drink system. And they will require in the future to take care that those representing them in Parliament do their duty by voting for the suppressive veto. Then, but not till then, the return of candidates will be a clear gain to the movement.

Our readers will observe from our news columns that Mr. Noel, M.P. for the Dumfries burghs had to meet with about fifty of the electors of Dumfries at about midday, and that it was only when he declared his intention to vote for the suppressive veto that their visit was in their eyes satisfactory. All our friends should improve the passing moment by arranging interviews with their parliamentary representatives while they are moving in and out amongst them. Two minutes' talk with an honourable member is worth more than a largely signed memorial and any amount of letters without meeting him face to face. We trust that the fifty-nine Scotch members will not be allowed to go to their duties in the House without feeling that the hearts of those they represent are set upon being vested with a direct veto over the traffic that menaces their dearest interests. This is the work of the electors during the recess, and of far more importance to the interests of their country than any other work that could be conceived, named, or done.

At the Glasgow School Board meeting last month the painful fact was admitted that there were, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Board, from four to five thousand school children that ought to be, and yet are not at school. It appears, on the other hand, that many children complete their education when twelve years of age that they may go to labour, and they cannot get till thirteen. The Board every fortnight have defaulting parents brought before them, and by this means know of the misconduct, misery, and sorrow, existing in the city. Of these defaulters from all parts of the city some are as greatly interested as the Board itself, others manifest hardened indifference. The misconduct referred to arises largely from intemperance of parents, and only the reclamation of these can insure the welfare of their children. The Rev. Dr. Ferguson thought that "looking to the great number of children kept from school through the drunkenness of their parents the Board should petition Parliament for the passing of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's permissive bill. He observed that Town Councils had done so, and he did not see why the School Board of Glasgow should not do it, especially seeing that they were brought more immediately into contact with this national vice." This very wise idea will not be lost sight of, it was by far the most practical suggestion made at the meeting. There were proposals to give free education and to cheapen education. Well, we must heartily wish that the struggling widow should have her children educated free; but if her husband has been cut off through his intemperance, is it not time to put an end to widowhood hereafter from such a cause?

and when men are prevented from entering on a baneful career we believe that they will have great a desire that their boys and girls should be educationally equipped for a favourable position in life as the Board itself. All honours then to Ferguson for suggesting to the Board a way so for getting out of the Board's diffilthy cause intemperance. When the time arrives, and it is approaching, the School Board of Glasgow will hope, as willingly petition Government for a suppressive veto over the traffic as it recently petitioned magistrates to refuse licenses for the sale of liquor in the immediate neighbourhood of schools.

Last month we had the pleasure of noting Mr. John Burns of the Cunard Steamship Co. intimating the resolution of that Co. to replace grog ration issued to the crews of its ships by a ration of coffee on and after the 1st ult. In an interesting speech delivered by him on the 11th in Glasgow, a portion of which appeared in our columns, Mr. Burns informs us that the Cunard lines, Inman, Anchor, State, and White Star, have already replaced the grog ration of coffee, and now the Cunard line has the noble list. There appears to be no objection in the matter, the appetite being subordinated to the interests of the crew. Mr. Burns has no qualms on the subject, as he says the grog was bad, a sufficient justification for its disuse—and that disuse was effected by the Cunard Steamship Co. was wheeling into the line of human improvement. More to be said in favour of the magnificent City owned by Messrs. George Smith & Co., Glasgow. That fleet is sailed on strictly temperate principles and this laudable course has the stamp of two years' success upon it. In stating the terms of passage to Calcutta, Messrs. Smith informs the public that the sum "includes every requisite except wines and liquors." Again they inform us that "the rate of passage money does not include wine or spirits, and passengers will please observe that none can be had on board." Passengers particularly requested to take charge of their own wines, and on no account to offer any officers' crew." When from time to time we read of appalling accounts of voyages aboard ocean-going ships where bars are open night and day, and the indiscriminate sale of liquors without limitation without reserve is as a matter of course followed by the most disgraceful scenes and misconduct, we turn with deep pleasure to the state discipline regards the crews and sobriety as regards passengers which obtains on board the City Line steamships. We regard the course taken by the owners of the Indian Line as eminently wise for all concerned, and we hope that, as it has answered so well on board this magnificent fleet it has only to be known to be adopted by every ship-owning firm in the British Empire.

We should submit with great joy to a resolution which would place all on shore on the same sober conditions as prevail on board the Liners.

reference to the record of meetings in the Alliance of 16th ultimo, and a perusal of "Progress of the Work" in this issue of our magazine, should convince us, we think, to any one how effectively the cause is connected with the Scottish permissive movement, under the conduct of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association continues to be carried on. The Association is making the most strenuous exertions in view of the severe Parliamentary struggle, and is satisfied that when the time comes that the country will be found prepared to give an effective support to the demand of the ratepayers of Scotland, to be met with a veto which will abolish all traffic in distilling liquors in their respective localities. They face the dilemma of the publicans. If the trade is good, let it be free; if bad, let it be abolished; if the horn of the dilemma they prefer is abolition.

It is not to their thinking a distillery, a brewery, or a place of sale which deserves exemption from general doom, which the whole traffic deserves, they make no provision for sparing any portion. We believe that there are no men in the world who will change the complexion of the liquor traffic for a better, hence they go for a measure to veto the same rather than for men to control and perpetuate it. We are glad to find in doing so they bring to remembrance a long and old political recollection of "measures not to be touched." They are bound to win, for we believe that success is on the lines on which alone success is possible.

Governor St. John of Kansas, whose gallant conduct in connection with the adoption of the constitutional amendment in that State endeared him to his people and himself to every staunch prohibitionist, is for a "third time" as Governor of the State. We are sorry to state that he has been defeated by the voters. The causes of this defeat are, first, the opposition in the States to "third terms;" next, the vicious and unscrupulous efforts of the whisky dealers who send large sums of money to Kansas State to cure his defeat; then there was the disgust of the Republican party, with its proposal to legalize and tax the drink traffic. But Governor St. John has neither been dishonoured nor whipped, what is of higher moment still, the cause of prohibition is no rendered the less sacred. The people of Kansas are not tired of prohibition. A temporary reverse should dishearten no one. It has not disheartened Governor St. John, who still declares that prohibition will win in Kansas, as it will win anywhere. Professor Stearns of Topeka writes: "Of nothing all friends of prohibition may rest assured, the result is not a defeat of prohibition." Again: "I feel safe in calmly pledging that liberty-loving industrious Kansas will not only keep prohibition in her constitution, but persist in her efforts to stop illegal sales, even to a successful issue." So much for Governor St. John. We must glance at the Kansas State prison for a moment. Prohibition began in Kansas on December 22, 1880. Since then there has been a gradual decrease. On that date there were 725. On October 16th the number was 671. Of these, 20 are boarders from New Mexico; leaving 651, or a reduction of 74, or at the rate of 40 yearly. While the State population has increased by 50,000, we have this great reduction; and without the prohibition the number would have been 808 instead of 651. This is the way to test whether Kansas is benefitting by prohibition or not; and this is quite enough to console those who, with Governor St. John, have suffered a reverse; nay, more, this is sufficient to encourage them to strive persistently, undauntedly, until the liquor saloon, the prison, the penitentiary, and the poorhouse have disappeared from Kansas, and prohibition has become a glory to the State.

Heaven help the drinker! A fellow in America, with an ingenuity which has a close affinity with the bottomless pit, has discovered a way of producing whisky which enables the slave of intemperance to carry a solid piece in his vest pocket, which, on being put into water, dissolves and becomes whisky, exhilarating but scentless! Only think of the claims which coopers, bottlemakers, and earthenware manufacturers will prefer against that solid whisky maker. It is dreadful to think of. Poor fellow; he should pause before he patents his discovery. But that is not all; the drinker is menaced by the brewer. The old ways of producing beer are voted obsolete; new ideas are waking up in the brewer's mind, and he is seeking to fabricate his wares in more profitable and seductive forms, for he is not to stand by the good old malt! "The new Beer Act has conferred on him the liberty of using other articles than barley malt, and this liberty is largely exercised by the brewers, as we are told those behind the scenes well know. It has been the custom of Germany and America for years past to use rice and maize, and capital beer they can brew from them. We are informed that there are many ways of treating these meals "to prepare" them for the mash tun; "for neither of these substances can be added to the malt without undergoing certain preparatory treatment. A process of gelatinisation has been met with most favour by the trade, and is largely now in use. Chemicals are often used with the cereals to prepare them for treatment with what is called a converter; and yet another plan is adopted—the rice or maize is "popped." The question of brewing with rice or maize is only yet in its infancy"! We should think that we have heard for the last time on the brewers' side of the house about "robbing a poor man of his beer." The brewers are doing that for us themselves. "The juice of malt," "prime October," and all the rest of the cherished names conferred on beers are fast disappearing, and we shall have the poison from rice and maize to disorder the brains and destroy the constitution of the unhappy drinker. We are getting quite accustomed to spirituous blends; we must now accustom ourselves to fermented liquor blends! The ingenuity which contrives, and the gullibility which consumes, these abominable decoctions are playing havoc with our race and rendering it a prey to physical disease, mental hallucination, and moral declension, which is inviting that retribution that will overwhelm drinker and abstainer in national disaster, if both have no longer wisdom enough left to combine for the overthrow of all traffic in strong drink by the emphatic ballot of the ratepayers.

A very significant paragraph in the Queen's Speech at the close of the session has been exercising the pens of the press of the country. Here is the passage, "After a succession of unfavourable seasons in the greater portion of the United Kingdom the produce of the land has during the present year been for the most part abundant, and trade is moderately active. The growth of the revenue is however sensibly retarded by a cause which must itself be contemplated with satisfaction, I refer to the diminution in the receipts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer from the duties on intoxicating liquors." These are most singular words to come from our Queen. They show that an average harvest and a moderately good trade has not increased the revenue, and that the failure of the most abundant source of our national income is a cause for satisfaction to her. Certainly this is not complimentary to the revenue from the Excise, for the reference is couched in very different words indeed from what she would have used if we derived a greater income from our harvest, and our trade and commerce. If we were a sober people and had no drink tax, we should have had an income of which we should have felt proud. We, however, derive a large portion of our income from intemperance, and we are becoming more temperate every day, spending less on these useless and harmful liquors, which in turn yield less to the National Treasury. But the money thus saved does not get lost. It enters other channels, and will by and by yield enough for all national needs. Sir Stafford Northcote's wise words are worthy of remembrance at this moment. He said, "Under what circumstances could it be expected that the consumption of spirits in this country would fall off to such an extent as seriously to injure the revenue? Either from the general failure of the consuming power of the people—want of ability, their will being the same—or from some great change in the habits of the people inducing them to abandon the use of such enormous quantities of liquors. If from the first, it would tell equally on all the sources of revenue. If from the other—a material and considerable change in their habits, and from increasing habits of temperance and abstinence—I venture to say that the amount of wealth such a change would bring to the nation would utterly throw into the shade the amount of revenue that is now derived from the spirit duty: and we should see with satisfaction the diminution of revenue from such a cause." The revenue has diminished only to the extent of what may be called a hair's breadth and yet our Sovereign lady is expressing satisfaction. May she soon have to tell us in one of her speeches to her faithful Commons that the national revenue is not now raised from the misery and destruction of her people, and how glad, how joyful she feels at being permitted to see it. The Times told us some years ago that "the revenue would never suffer from the enrichment and elevation of the people," and here we find our Sovereign prepared to meet and welcome that fall of the revenue from intoxicants, which will bring the people of this country to contemplate the possibility of the abolition of such a questionable source of income, and lead them to see beyond its removal a stage of civilization where virtue and sobriety scatter plenty o'er a smiling land, and reads its history in the nation's eyes; and the satisfaction is the more intense that it is indicative of that flow of the national temperance and prohibitory sentiment which will one day consummate all our struggles for the suppression of the liquor traffic by vesting a power of veto in the ratepayers.

INTELLIGENCE.

The Countess of Ellesmere wears the blue ribbon.

The capital employed in America in making beer alone is £30,600,000.

In Illinois there are 267 license and 260 no-license towns. She is marching along.

Coffee taverns have on an average returned dividends varying from 2 per cent. to 20 per cent., averaging 8½ per cent.

There are 800,000 whisky slaves in the United States. When that number increases to a million and a half, America will go in for a new slavery war.

A singular fact in connection with the Liverpool bye-election was the entire absence of drunkenness, no committee meetings being held in a public-house on either side.

A very excellent leader appeared in the Christian News of the 16th ult., in which we think we discern the force and fervour of one of the most popular and successful prohibitory advocates in the north.

The Leek Board of Guardians were drawing up an advertisement at £20 a year, and rations and £3 in lieu of beer. A lively discussion on this matter was entered upon, resulting in a motion by Mr. Shufflebothe, that no alcoholic liquors whatever be allowed in the house, as the guardians knew quite well that alcohol is not food.

It is a significant fact, remarks a contemporary, that 7 hospitals, out of 37 in the colony, have spent little or nothing on stimulant drinks; and four out of these—Arrowtown, Charleston, Cromwell, and Reefton—show a total credit of £847 to the good. Four out of seven other hospitals—Auckland, Greymouth, Nelson, and Hokitika—which have spent the largest amount in intoxicating liquors, have, on the other hand, a total deficit of £3000. Westland Hospital disbursed £150 for drink during the year.—Dunedin Morning Herald, New Zealand.

ABSTAINERS AND INSURANCE.—Since Dr. Richardson became a director of the Briton Life Association (Limited) abstainers are offered an immediate benefit by the reduction of 10 per cent. from the annual premium on all insurances, effected under, of course, equitable restrictions, for once an abstainer does not mean always an abstainer.

EDINBURGH.—We are glad to learn that Bailie Clark has been elected to the magistracy in room of Bailie Colston; and Mr. R. Miller, C.E., has, on requisition, been elected to fill the vacancy in Newington Ward, caused by the resignation of Bailie Colston. By these changes the attitude of the Council to the temperance movement is improved.

A NOVEL CENSUS.—On the 26th November the Temperance Council, Kilburn, took a public-house and public-worship census of Kilburn. There are thirty-five places of worship, at which that evening 5591 persons attended. There are twenty-five public-houses, and on the same evening they were frequented by 5570. Majority in favour of the church, 21.

DUNFERMLINE.—We are glad to learn that representatives of the Total Abstinence Society, The British Women's Temperance Association, and the Blue Ribbon Army met in conference—Rev. James Foote in the chair—to work together in getting up meetings, and, in short, reorganising the temperance and prohibitory movement in the town. They have our hearty wishes, for stagnation in effort is death to the cause and despair to the drinker.

Mr. A. B. Trench, High Street, Guildford, succeeded to a grocer's business of 34 years standing, and publicly announced that "strongly sympathising with the temperance movement, he does not intend to continue the sale of any British or foreign wines, and trusts that this sacrifice will be no detriment to the business." This is a manly resolve on the part of Mr. Trench, and we hope that he will be able soon to say, that he has been greatly successful in consequence.

AUCHINCLOCH — TEMPERANCE LECTURE.—Mr. Andrew Bennet, Dumfries, agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, gave a lecture on "The Temperance Movement—Sensible, Scientific, and Scriptural," in the Free Church School, on Monday last, 11th ult. The address was greatly appreciated, and at the close a hearty vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. Bennet on the motion of Mr. M'Lean, teacher. Mr. Joseph Heughan occupied the chair.—Dumfries and Galloway Standard.

THE BLUE RIBBON MOVEMENT.—Mr. R. T. Booth states that experience has demonstrated that eighty per cent. of those who take the Blue Ribbon pledge keep it. The Blue Ribbon Gazette says the temperance movement is making gigantic progress in the Church of England. In twenty dioceses there are over 220,000 in the temperance associations connected with the Church, with upwards of 3000 abstaining clergy, including 5 bishops and 7 of the Queen's chaplains. The Wesleyan Methodists have 800 abstaining ministers; the Congregationalists, 730; the Baptists, 520; the Established Church of Scotland, 200; the Free Church, 300; and the United Presbyterians, 220.

GLASGOW ABSTAINERS' UNION—PRESENTATION TO MR. AIRLIE.—At a social meeting held in the Cockburn Hotel, Bath Street, on Thursday evening, 14th ult., Mr. Airlie, the valued secretary of the Union, was presented with a handsome dining-room timepiece with marble and bronze vases en suite, subscribed for by the directors in token of their appreciation of his zeal and ability in promoting the interests of the Union during the past 25 years. Mr. Lindsay, the president, made the presentation in name of the directors, and in doing so passed a high eulogium on Mr. Airlie for his devotion and marked ability in conducting the various agencies of the Union. [A tribute most deservedly merited—Ed. S. R.] who has had the nut analysed, says it contains caffeine in greater proportions than the best coffee, also the same active principles as cocoa, with less fatty matter. It is extensively used in Africa, where it is said to "support the strength, allay inordinate appetite, assuage thirst, and promote digestion, and to render those using it capable of prolonged fatigue." In Jamaica it is used as a cure for drunkenness, and a single nut made into a paste, with water or spirit, removes all trace of intoxication in half an hour. It is stated that the craving for drink, which is a strong incentive to drunkenness, may be subdued by the use of this valuable stimulant and tonic, as after chewing kola great disinclination is felt to all forms of alcohol.

TEETOTAL PROVOSTS IN SCOTLAND.—The following provosts in Scotland are abstainers: Provost Donaldson, Alva; Provost Strachan, Burntisland; Provost Watson, Cellerdyke; Provost Moncur, Dundee; Provost Duncan, Dunoon; Provost Helme, Dalbeattie; Provost Reid, Forfar; Provost Macpherson, Grange-mouth; Provost Tait, Inverkeithing; Provost Johnstone, Lochmaben; Provost Morris, Largs; Provost M'Ewen, Newton-Stewart; Provost Clark, Paisley; Provost Ritchie, M.D., Pollokshaws; Provost Dick, Rutherglen; Provost M'Queen, Sanquhar; Provost Wyllie, Stewarton; Provost Anderson, Wishaw. We hope that our friends knowing of any other provosts who abstain from alcoholic liquors will kindly send us their names. There are many provosts who although not abstainers yet warmly support the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

THORNHILL ABSTAINERS' UNION AND BLUE RIBBON ARMY.—A lecture, under the auspices of this society, was delivered in the Infant Schoolroom, on the evening of 4th ult. by Mr. A. Bennet, temperance agent for the southern counties, who took for his subject, "Blue Ribbonism." The society having lately adopted the badge, the lecture was of course specially appreciated. On the evening of the 6th ult., the society's annual tea soiree was held in the Freemason's Hall—Rev. R. D. Mitchell, president, in the chair—when addresses were given by the following gentlemen—Mr. A. Bennet, Rev. Mr. Tooley, Dumfries; Rev. Mr. Dickie, Sanquhar; Rev. Mr. Wishart, Thornhill. On the evening of the 11th ult., Mr. Waterston, temperance agent from Edinburgh, delivered an excellent lecture in the Freemasons' Hall, when, owing to the severe weather, there was a small attendance.—Dumfries and Galloway Standard.

PRESENTATION TO MR. T. W. RUSSEL, DUBLIN.—On Saturday, the 25th November, a very pleasant gathering took place in Russel's Hotel, 102 St. Stephen's Green, Dublin, to mark the occasion of Mr. Russel's resignation as the paid secretary of the Irish Association for the prevention of intemperance, and his assumption of the office of hon. secretary of the Association. While he is now no longer paid for his services he intends to work as hard as ever for the cause. Mr. Pim, J.P., who presided, paid a merited eulogium on Mr. Russel, which all who know the man and his labour can most heartily subscribe to. He had raised the temperance cause in Ireland to a position of commanding national importance, and, with the exception of Dublin, Waterford, Cork, Limerick, and Belfast had very materially helped to secure for Ireland the blessings of Sunday closing. Mr. Pim read an address, and presented a magnificent library of books to Mr. Russel containing 300 volumes, embracing the works of Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, Lubbock, Emerson, Froude, Lecky, Smiles, Helps, Mill, Buckle, Spencer, Morley, M'Carthy, &c. A number of friends—one of them Miss Edmundson—added the expression of their opinion of Mr. Russel's worth, who, in a well-conceived address, concluded by stating that "he by no means took his hand from the plough: on the contrary, he would continue to work even harder in the future, if that were possible, than he had done in the past." We believe him, and heartily congratulate him on the reception of this splendid tribute to his great services in the temperance cause.

PRESENTATION TO MR. J. H. WATERSTON, EDINBURGH.—The Blue Ribbon Association of West Calder have presented this well-known labourer in the Scottish prohibitory movement with a splendid copy of Bagster's Bible, similar to that used by Mr. D. L. Moody, and a full copy of Sankey's hymns. The Bible bore the following inscription: "Presented to J. H. Waterston, Esq., from the members of the West Calder Gospel Temperance Association as a small expression of their esteem and regard. Nov. 7th, 1882." These were presented by Mr. Terris, who said that they were given to Mr. Waterston as tokens of esteem for the gratuitous and invaluable services he had rendered to the Association. His addresses had in a great measure led to the existence and success of the Association. Mr. Waterston, in his reply, said that the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which he had the honour to represent, were most willing to aid in every possible way the adoption of personal abstinence for the individual, and prohibition by the will of the people for the country. Addresses were delivered by Rev. D. Wardrop and Mr. Weir, missionary, both of whom testified to Mr. Waterston's ability and tact. At the close of the interesting proceedings, Mr. Drummond presented Mr. Williamson, Addiewell, chairman of the Association, with a handsome copy of Sankey's hymns and also an ink stand as a token of their appreciation of his services on behalf of the movement.

SABBATH EVENINGS IN GLASGOW.—The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association finding that a very general desire existed for Bible Temperance Meetings on Sabbath evenings, was prepared to hold a series if arrangements could be made for them. Ex-Bailie Pinkerton, pastor of the gospel church in which Mr. Murphy carried on his meetings, was equally desirous to place his church at the disposal of any association. The Association accordingly availed themselves of Mr. Pinkerton's generous offer of his church and choir. On the 3rd ult. the first of these meetings took place, with a most encouraging attendance. Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., presided, conducting the opening services. Rev. W. D. Glendinning, Rev. G. L. Walker, and John Wilson, Esq., J.P., delivered addresses excellently suited to the occasion. On the 10th, Bailie Selkirk, J.P., presided, and the speakers included Rev. John Hanson, A.M., and Rev. Robert Wallace. The addresses of all three were highly appreciated by a very good attendance. On the 17th ex-Provost Dick occupied the chair, and the Rev. John Murray, Rev. Dr. F. Ferguson, and ex-Bailie Torrens addressed the deeply-sympathetic audience. We understand that the meeting of the 24th will be under the presidency of John Wilson, Esq., J.P., and that the speakers will be Rev. James Brown, Rev. W. Arnot, and Mr. R. Mackay; and that ex-Bailie Pinkerton will occupy the chair on the last meeting of the series. A number of pledges have been taken, and blue ribbons in large numbers given away. It would be only fair to the choir to state that their services with regard to the praise have greatly contributed to the pleasure of these meetings.

DUNDEE.—On Tuesday, 19th ult., meetings of the Gospel Temperance and Blue Ribbon Union and the Dundee Temperance Society were held. At the first, over which Provost Moncur presided, Mr. J. H. Martin submitted a report, detailing the steps taken for the amalgamation of the Union with the Society. The report was heartily adopted. The mutual pledge reads as follows: "I, the undersigned, do promise, God helping me, that I will abstain from all intoxicating liquors as beverages; that I will, by all honourable means, encourage others to abstain; and that I will discourage all the causes and practices of intemperance." Resolutions approving of the amalgamation were passed at both meetings; and we join in the hope that the union of both societies will be a blessing to Dundee.

COMMUNION WINE.—A meeting was held in Edinburgh in March last to celebrate the Communion on temperance principles. On the 17th ult. another meeting was convened of members of the three leading denominations to celebrate the Communion. It was held in Queen Street Hall, and was presided over by Dr. Young, Portobello. About 250 persons attended, among whom were Dr. Lowe, Edinburgh, medical missionary; Rev. D. Pirret, Glasgow; Rev. Mr. Caie, Forfar; Rev. William Innes, Skene, and others. Addresses bearing on this important phase of the movement were delivered by the chairman and the above-named gentlemen, on the manifest and admitted evils of the liquor traffic, and on the necessity of rousing the Church to help in putting away from the country this great sin of drinking and drink-selling, and banishing from the table of the Lord the intoxicating cup. On Monday, 19th ult., a large audience filled the hall; and after engaging in devotional exercises, partook of the Communion in unfermented wine.

DUMFRIES, DEPUTATION TO MR. NOEL, M.P.—Taking advantage of the visit of Mr. Noel to the constituency during the third week of December, the temperance electors in Dumfries waited upon the hon. member in the Commercial Hotel on Friday, 15th ult. Although the hour was unsuitable for most of the electors—1.30 P.M.—the deputation numbered fifty. Mr. Bennet, agent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, who arranged for the interview, introduced the deputation. Dr. McCulloch first spoke on behalf of the deputation, and set forth the main arguments in favour of the ratepayers having the power to prohibit the entire traffic in their respective localities, alluded to the probability of special legislation for Scotland, and set forth very fully the objection against providing compensation to publicans or others who might be affected by legislation of the kind proposed. Rev. G. W. Tooley also spoke on behalf of the deputation and temperance electors in the constituency. He dwelt upon the subject as a matter of absolute right on the part of the ratepayers to suppress the traffic, as they were burdened with its results in the shape of increased taxation, deterioration of property, and other things which pressed heavily upon them. Mr. Noel, after thanking the deputation for the frank and courteous way in which they expressed their views, said, he would be equally frank with them. He could not go all the length they had gone, but his sympathy and convictions were largely with them. He did not intend to enter into the question of compensation. He, however, was in favour, and had always voted for, the ratepayers having full control of the traffic, and power to prohibit it entirely if they were so disposed. He thought the temperance reformers should not insist on having a law which made it imperative either to vote down all licenses or none at all, but a measure that would admit of having either a certain number or the whole as the people may determine. In answer to Mr. Waterston, Mr. Noel said he would do his utmost to secure for the people of Scotland the power to prohibit the entire traffic in any legislation that might be introduced into Parliament. Mr. T. C. Farries, in name of the deputation, thanked Mr. Noel for the courteous way he had received them, and his decided answer to their views.

CASTLE-DOUGLAS—SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL ASSOCIATION.—Delegates from this Association addressed a meeting in the Macmillan Free Church on Wednesday evening, 13th ult. The Rev. George Laurie presided, and after praise and prayer, said he would simply introduce the gentlemen who had come from a distance to address them on the claims of 'Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic.' He had first to introduce Mr. R. Mackay, the Secretary to the Permissive Bill Association. Mr. Mackay addressed the meeting at considerable length. He wished the meeting to approve of prohibition, and to say what they wished in their own locality. Their great idea was to suppress the source of temptation, and declare they would endeavour to secure a law to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors. He said that wherever facility was given for their sale crime had increased, and that Albert the Good, Lord Palmerston, and other noblemen, had taken up the idea, had abolished them on their estates, and had found crime decrease. The abolition of public-houses had the same effect on crime as uprooting on a farm, by keeping it clear of weeds. An increase of public-houses always increased the number of drunkards. Justices of the Peace were the men who granted the licenses, and their object apparently was to get men of good character to sell drink, whether it was 'speil the wa', or from Bladnoch distillery. No matter where it was got, if the poison got into the body, it as surely affected the brain. The speaker then gave some statistics of the numbers who had been brought before the Police Courts, and mentioned several illustrations showing that property, health, and morals were injured by the open sale of drink. The chairman next introduced Mr. Bennet, agent in the south of Scotland for the Scottish Permissive Bill Association. He dwelt at length on moral influence versus legislative interference. He touched on the drink demon, and then on the system which continued its perpetration, and reflected briefly on the Government of the country receiving so much from the licensed public-houses. (Applause.) The next speaker was Mr. Waterston, Edinburgh, who was received with applause. He did not like to call himself a temperance reformer, but he had been much obliged to the public press for calling him so. He then gave a stirring address, taking as his text, 'Drink, or John Barleycorn,' and gave a description of what he had seen in Edinburgh and elsewhere from the effects of the poison. He urged upon those present to do their utmost to secure local option in the matter of the sale of liquor, so as to prevent the opening of public-houses in districts where they were not required, and thus keep weak brethren out of the way of temptation. The chairman then moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Waterston, Mr. Mackay, and Mr. Bennet, for their excellent addresses. For himself he was in favour of local option, and thought the people should have the power of saying whether they wished public-houses to exist in their midst or not. He also intimated that if there was any present who wished to take the 'Blue Ribbon,' it would be given them at the close of the meeting. At their two previous temperance meetings, 94 had taken the pledge—60 the first night and 34 the second night. He regretted the small attendance that evening, which probably arose from the unpopular nature of the subject, and the hard frost outside. Mr. Waterston having acknowledged the vote of thanks, the meeting broke up.

GLASGOW SEAMAN'S FRIEND'S SOCIETY.—On the 11th ult., a conversazione of this Society was held in the Queen's Rooms, Mr. John Burns, chairman of the Cunard Line, occupying the chair. In the course of a most interesting address, the chairman said—"The chief-constable of a great city told him that from his experience—and that experience was a long one—there were two classes of criminals in the city. The one was a class who sought out vice for themselves—whether it was drink or other vices—and were determined to have it. That was the incorrigible class, or the class most difficult to deal with. But, said he, the greater class was the class who would not naturally go into vice but for vice—especially drink—being brought to their very doors. If these men, said he, had not the vice brought to them, not the inducement and the encouragement to drink and indulge in other species of vice, they would not go into it of their own free will. Now, so it was with the sailors of all our ports. His belief was this, that when they took from them the inducements to vice, and especially the drink, they would find that the sailors themselves would reciprocate their efforts, and do what they could to meet the best wishes of the society." After referring to the absolute necessity of providing suitable amusements and literature for the seamen, who, in the absence of these, might seek out baneful pleasures for themselves, he continued: "There was one other point which he wished to touch upon, and he was sure he would have the sympathy, not only of that meeting but of all right-minded men, whether they took the more ultra view of teetotalism, or the more moderate view of temperance, and that was the question of providing drink for men on board ship. He wished Mr. Allan had been there to hear what he had now to state, and that was that the Cunard Company, of which he (Mr. Burns) was chairman, had adopted, since the 1st of this month, what Messrs. Geo. Smith & Sons, the Allan Line, the White Star Line, the Inman Line, and the Anchor and State Lines on the Atlantic had already done—namely, the principle of giving no grog or beverages of that description on board their ships, and in substitution thereof giving coffee unlimited in quantity. He thought that the next best to the imitating of a good thing was to follow a good example. So, from the 1st December last, on board the Cunard fleet no grog had been served out to the men, and none would be in the future, but as much coffee as they could drink. When he told them that last year they engaged and discharged 40,000 men, it would be seen that in great maritime enterprises vast influence could be exercised if leaders would only do that which was right between man and man. What had been the effect of the change? Mr. Ismay, of the White Star Line, and Mr. Inman, of the Inman Line, had told him, and he knew from his own experience that there had not only been no complaint on the part of the men, but they were well satisfied with the change. There were men—old-fashioned sailors—who thought that they still should have their grog, but the generality of the men were pleased at the removal of the temptation. One of the strong motives which he thought should dictate to them, in making a move of this kind, was the fact that on board those large steamers on the Atlantic there were a number of young men, who came into the service, who had not been accustomed to have spirits served out to them, and by the old-fashioned principle this grog was served out whether they liked it or not, and if they did not like it, some old salt said, "I'll take it for you." (Laughter.) In any circumstances, the principle was bad; and he was glad to think as we grow older in this world things were vastly improving, not only among the sailors but all classes of the community."

OUR PULPIT.

THE DOOM OF THE BEAST.

The Rev. M. E. Cady preached at the Michigan Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church upon Prohibition, taking as his text—"And he shook the beast into the fire."—Acts xxvii., 5.

He had taken this passage, not as a text for exposition, but as a motto, an expression of our determination to shake the beast that was ravaging our homes, consuming our children, and desolating our society, into the everlasting fire.

After showing that legal measures alone were potent to check the rum-seller in his fiendish work, showing that his business was to get customers, regardless of what sex they were, from what home they came, or what name they bore, and that they added all other enormities to those of the robber and outlaw—the speaker said:—

If some mighty angel should reach down, this Sabbath evening, and draw aside the screen so as that all could see the terrible interiors of this vast array of saloons, many a wife would gasp and faint, and many a mother would shriek with horror at the sights revealed. And if the years should bring no abatement of this curse, which he trusted to God they would, many groups of children to-day untainted would be in the circle of vice, and many a heart now indifferent would be alive to the terrors of the traffic. The saloon keeper had the best of the battle with the fathers of these children, for he had the municipal government, represented by the Mayor of our city, on his side. The forces of the law were in his pay, its manipulation at his dictation.

A question of great moral significance was striding to the front—the question of the domination and tyranny of the rum power in our land. It was the whisky traffic, arrayed against law, and school, and church. On one or the other side of this conflict every man must sooner or later take his stand. It was not to be dallied with, but must be settled effectually and forever. It was not a breeze created by fanatics, that would expend itself in raising a cloud of dust. The question had come to stay until it was answered. It was the paramount and commanding issue for him and all to settle. He asked his hearers, Where are you going to stand? How are you going to vote? Are you going to vote as you pray, as your Bible teaches, as your conscience dictates; or are you going to cringe beneath the party lash, and repudiate principle?

There were times when a protest was as good as a victory; when the defeat of an honest few is the "Buiker Hill" of a revolution. He would vote a prohibition ticket or none. The speaker continued—"In remembering that we have been Republicans or Democrats, do not let us forget that we are men, and that we are not fighting the battles of yesterday, but the battles of to-day; that our faces are not set towards the old years, but the new. And whatever have been our differences, let us now unite our hands around our altars and hearthstones, to defend them against this merciless and blood-thirsty foe. It was fearful odds when Horatius stood at the head of the bridge, facing the Tuscan army, but his stand saved Rome, and Rome slew the invaders. It was fearful odds when Arnold Winkelreid rushed against the Austrian spears, and gathered them in his bosom. He died, but in dying he gave freedom to Switzerland. So the little company that will stand at the polls this year for purity and sobriety, is matched against great odds, but its courage and its God, and nought else, will save Chicago." The speaker closed with the impressive words, "He could see a reason for Hell. Oh that its gates might be opened wide, and that this present generation might rise as one man and lay hold of this reptile, and, bearing him to the mouth of the pit, shake the beast into the fire."

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

The following meetings have been addressed by the advocates and agents of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association from 15th October to 16th December, 1882, inclusive:—

During that period 309 meetings were held, 81 being deputational, and 228 ordinary.

At these meetings 384 addresses were given. The following is a summary of each speaker's work:—

Mr. Andrew Bennet has visited Moffat, Sanquhar, New Cumnock, Kirkpatrick, Dumfries, Holywood, Moniaive, Glasgow, Milngavie, Govan, Kirkcaldy, Roslin, Penicuik, Tranent, Lathones, Dalkeith, Boness, Avonbridge, Linlithgow, Thornhill, Closeburn, Auchencairn, Castle Douglas, and Dalbeattie, and addressed 57 meetings.

Mr. J. H. Waterston has visited Falkirk, Bathgate, Denny, West Linton, Grangemouth, Edinburgh, Leith, West Calder, Greenock, Portobello, Markinch, Largo, Largoward, Linlithgow, Pathhead, Tranent, Cockenzie, Prestonpans, Dumfries, Thornhill, Castle Douglas, and Dalbeattie, and addressed 50 meetings.

Mr. R. Stevenson has visited Braehead, Forth, Glasgow, Perth, Gourrock, Greenock, Whiteinch, Parkhead, Dairsie, Dura Den, Ceres, Strathmiglo, Falkland, Addiewell, Dunfermline, Motherwell, and Pollokshaws, and addressed 47 meetings.

Mr. John Paton has visited Maxwelltown, Moffat, Sanquhar, New Cumnock, Glasgow, Galston, Kilmarnock, Mauchline, Kilbarchan, Irvine, Maybole, Prestwick, Beith, Castle Douglas, Dalry, Coatbridge, Kilsyth, Alexandria, Pollokshaws, Helensburgh, Dunoon, Ayr, and Paisley, and addressed 41 meetings.

Mr. William Blackwood has visited Lonmay, St.

Combs, Inverallochy, Broadsea, Roseheart, Inverurie, Inch, Huntly, New Leeds, Aberdeen, Laurencekirk, Marykirk, Port Gordon, Port Essie, Peterhead, Buckhaven, Fyvie, Aberchirder, Buxburn, Fettercairn, Woodside, Pitullie, Rothies, and New Deer, and addressed 36 meetings.

Mr. R. Dransfield has visited Irvine, Glasgow, Carlisle, Wishaw, Grangemouth, Kilsyth, Govan, Bonhill, and Hamilton, and addressed 24 meetings.

Mr. R. Mackay has visited Withington, Manchester, Grangemouth, Coatbridge, Glasgow, Dumbarton, Cambuslang, Peebles, Govan, Pollokshields, Castle Douglas, and Aitkenhead, and addressed 22 meetings.

Baillie Selkirk, J.P., has addressed 18 meetings in Glasgow, Wishaw, and Grangemouth.

Mr. William Kesson has addressed 10 meetings in Glasgow, Govan, and Milngavie.

Ex-Baillie Torrens, J.P., has addressed 9 meetings in Warrington, Manchester, Grangemouth, Kilsyth, and Glasgow.

Rev. S. Harding has addressed 6 meetings in Govan, Glasgow, Cambuslang, and Coatbridge.

Ex-Baillie Lewis, J.P., has addressed 4 meetings in Falkirk and Edinburgh.

Rev. W. C. M'Dougall has addressed 3 meetings in Glasgow and Helensburgh.

Dr. M. Cameron has addressed 3 meetings in Glasgow and Wishaw.

Rev. W. D. Glendinning has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Rev. J. Strachan has addressed 2 meetings in Dumfries.

Rev. G. W. Tooley has addressed 2 meetings in Dumfries.

Andrew Brown, Esq., J.P., has addressed 2 meetings in Grangemouth.

Captain Hatfield has addressed 2 meetings in Glasgow.

Mr. John Steel has addressed 2 meetings in Clarkston and West Calder.

Mr. J. P. Lossock has addressed 2 meetings in Edinburgh and Peebles.

The following gentlemen have each taken part in the proceedings of meetings in the places which follow their names:—Rev. Drs. Brown, Falkirk; Wardrop, West Calder; Ferguson, Glasgow; and Adamson, Edinburgh; Revs. G. L. Carstairs, Glasgow; F. Ferguson, Glasgow; C. A. M'Kenzie, Govan; R. M. Gibson, Govan; J. M'Queen, Hamilton; J. M. Kinloch, West Linton; W. Cochrane, Edinburgh; G. L. Walker, Glasgow; J. Hanson, A.M., Glasgow; and R. Wallace, Glasgow; T. Hope, Esq., J.P., Grangemouth; John Wilson, Esq., J.P., Glasgow; Councillors M'Lachlan, Edinburgh; and Miller, Glasgow; Dr. Smith, Govan; Messrs. James Winning, Withington; A. M'Dougall, Glasgow; A. Murdoch, Hamilton; G. Tait, Edinburgh; J. Sutherland, Edinburgh; D. Ramsay, Edinburgh; J. Nisbet, Edinburgh; J. Hyslop, Grangemouth; James M'Call, Moniaive; R. Proudfoot, Moniaive; H. ### PUBLIC PRESS.

The Illinois liquor-dealers wail because in Iowa "for years the Goddess of Liberty will be there wounded and ruthlessly trampled upon by a lot of fanatical fools and cunning zealots." Well, the dear old goddess has been dragged around by Gambrinus for years, tied to a cider keg, smoked in saloons, soured with brewery slops, and had her head butted time and again; and we imagine she will be glad of a change of treatment, and that she won't object to having her "wounds" cleaned with soap and water. She needs a rest and a new dress and cap, and her hair crumped.—Ex.

WOMEN'S INFLUENCE.—Governments need nothing so much as the humanizing tendency of woman's influence. Between her and the exercise of this influence there stands one insuperable impediment—the use of intoxicating drink. Everything that dehumanizes, everything that brutalizes, is at war with her, and must forever remain so. No wonder women hate the liquor traffic; it is the incentive to every effort that antagonizes her and degrades her for her true position, socially and politically. Destroy this foe, and its victims must awake to a comprehension of the moral worth and intelligence of women, whom at present, in their ignorance and brutality, men maltreat and despise.—Exchange.

THE DRUNKARD.—"A drunkard is the most selfish being in the universe. He has no sense of modesty, shame, or disgrace; he has no sense of duty or sympathy of affection with his father or mother, his brother or sister, his friend or neighbour, his wife or children; no reverence for his God; no sense of futurity in this world or the other—all is swallowed up in the mad selfish joy of the moment. Is it not humiliating that Mahomedans and Hindoos would put to shame the whole Christian world by their superior examples of temperance? Is it not degrading to Englishmen and Americans that they are so infinitely exceeded by the French in this cardinal virtue? And is it not mortifying beyond all expression that we Americans should exceed all other eight millions of people on the globe, as I verily believe we do, in this degrading, beastly vice of intemperance?"—John Adams, late President United States, America.

ON THE WING.

It appears that French wines, so much relied upon for their dietetic and curative qualities, are often vilely adulterated with such useful substances as red lead, lime, alum, logwood, and arsenic. We suppose, however, it does not very much matter what we are poisoned with, if we are poisoned—and wine drinkers are poisoned.

A vote has been taken in the various municipalities throughout Victoria, excluding Melbourne and Geelong, upon the question whether the number of public houses should be increased, with the result that 38,017 have voted against increase, and only 10,537 in favour of it. Taking the cities only, the vote was 5,404 against, and 882 for increase.

From almost all the Wesleyan pulpits over the country attention was specially called to the subject of temperance on Sabbath, the 10th ult. It is to be deeply regretted that this vitally important subject finds so little favour or utterance in so many of the pulpits of our own country. Posterity will greatly wonder at this, and so would we if we were not blinded by pernicious custom.

The Globe is very hopeful of the success of the English Sunday Closing Movement, as will be seen from the following cutting:—"Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, has each its Sunday Closing Act, and now England is to have hers. It is to be done by the introduction next session of forty bills, each dealing with a separate district. One can hardly see if Cornwall obtains its Act what argument can be used against the Devonshire Bill, for instance, becoming law. Sir Wilfrid Lawson may live to see his theories realized, and, like Mr. Gladstone, to behold his own monument in brass."

OUR BOOK SHELF.

We are glad to see that another edition of Mr. F. Sherlock's "More than Conquerors" has been called for.

A new weekly named the Gospel Temperance Advocate and Blue Ribbon Banner has been issued in Glasgow. Its source is the Temperance Newspaper published by Messrs. Cassel, Petter & Galpin under the editorship of Rev. F. Wagstaff, the well-known temperance journalist. The local editor is the Rev. Alexander Andrew, Glasgow. We hope that the venture will prove a great success.

Nearly Lost, but Dearly Won. By Rev. T. P. Wilson. Manchester: Onward Offices, 18 Mount Street. London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row. Price two shillings. We have before us a very handsome edition of this highly popular tale, which has now run through so many editions. Itself a most excellent story, it is presented in all the splendour of book-binding and get-up in a form certain to attract all who are desirous of placing in the hands of their young friends a volume certain to deepen their love of fine art.

The Bird Angel. By Miss M. A. Paul. Manchester: Onward offices. London: S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row. Price two shillings. This is one of Miss Paul's most delightful stories. We are delighted to miss "the villain of the piece," which ever haunts story books. We have the youthful cousins, the benevolent wife of a banker, Granny Whiddon, and the youthful Arnold; the trials of deserted orphanhood; the vicissitudes of commerce, and love, of course. Right triumphs, and all goes as merry as a marriage bell. In substance, in up-get, in appearance, this is one of the handsomest of the Onward series.

Uncle Ben's Little Stories for Little Folks. By the Rev. Joseph Johnson. London: S. W. Partridge & Co. Price half a crown. A peep at the attractive contents of this elegantly got-up volume will, we fancy, be sufficiently tempting to ensure for it a large sale, and a closer inspection only increases our admiration. The stories have all that fascination, beauty, and point which cannot fail to make them extremely popular with the children; and there is quite an abundance of beautiful pictures scattered throughout their well-printed pages. We can confidently predict for this volume a hearty reception from many besides our little folks.

Onward for 1882. London: S. W. Partridge & Co. This is the yearly volume of our favourite Band of Hope magazine, and a really beautiful and interesting volume it is. Looking over it it is in itself a pleasure, and we are charmed with the wealth of its contents and the beauty of its numerous illustrations. It is a thorough-going upholder of prohibitory principles, and we like it all the more on that account. Amongst its contents are to be found a great many interesting articles on various topics—quite a flood of poetry, several interesting stories, and twelve pieces of music. We heartily commend this beautiful volume to the attention of our many readers who may be contemplating a present to their "young folks."

Popular Tracts for the People. London: Church of England Temperance Publishing Depot. We have received a copy of three of these tracts. They treat of various aspects of the liquor question, and are brief and pithy appeals to personal abstinence. No. 1 treats of "The Physical Dangers of Strong Drink," and is from the pen of Dr. Norman Kerr. No. 2 is written by the same gentleman, and is entitled "Strong Drink not Food." These two tracts together give a brief but able summary of the negative and positive evils of alcohol, from a medical standpoint. No. 3 is in the form of a letter to bricklayers and others, by the Rev. Canon Ellison, and is entitled, "The Drink did it." It aims to show that drink is one of those evil spirits that lead mankind captive at their will, and whose head is Satan. The writer emphasizes two things as needful to preserve a man from its ravages—(a), union with the Holy Spirit of God in the inner life, and (b), giving up the drink.

Books, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 112 Bath Street.

PSALM XXIII.

- 1 THE Lord my Shepherd is, therefore
My wants He'll satisfy.
2 He leads me by the waters calm,
Unfailing in supply ;
And in the pastures, fair and green,
He causeth me to lie.
- 3 To quietude and peace again
He doth restore my soul,
Clothing me, for His dear name's sake,
In garments clean and whole ;
And, walking in His righteous paths,
He doth my ways control.
- 4 Yea, though unto the vale of Death
My faltering steps be led,
I need not fear for any ill,
He is with me where I tread ;
And by His rod and staff I am
For ever comforted.
- 5 A table furnished before
Mine en'mies He didst cast ;
And with the oil of gladness He
My head anointed hast :
So that my cup with gratitude
And joy o'erfloweth fast.
- 6 Then surely, while my life doth last,
God's goodness and His love
Shall follow me my journey through,
Where'er my footsteps rove,
Until the Lord calls me to dwell
Within His house above.

THE WONDERLAND.

Beyond this world so fair and grand,
There lies a glorious wonderland,
White its gleaming towers arise,
Proud and glorious to the eyes.

As the youth goes journeying on,
Searching for that land unknown,
Suddenly its towers appear,
Bright and radiant, tall and clear.

Scenes not dull or commonplace,
Bright with a celestial grace,
Forms that have a brighter glow
Than poor weary mortals know.

Valleys gleaming in the light,
Streams that gush in sunshine bright,
Songs whose melody so blest
Soothe into a quiet rest.

Then the youth in rapture wild,
Laughs to see such glory piled
In such majesty serene,
And he sees what none have seen.

Roams he all about the land,
Everything is wild and grand,
All the glory he surveys,
Gazes he with eager gaze.

But as still he gazes on Straight that vision bright is gone,
And the same dull world again
Travels he in toil and pain.

Still the recollection fair
Comes and fills him with despair
But no more his feet will stand,
In that glorious wonderland.

VARIETIES.

"Joe, child, here is a powder for you ; just snap it up, will you." "Mother, I aint a gun."

A little boy had been sent to dry a towel before a nursery fire. "Mamma, is it done when it is brown?" he inquired.

I often hear affectionate husbands call their wives "My duck." I wonder if this ain't a sly allusion to their long bills.

A Spanish proverb says :—"The man who on his wedding-day starts as a lieutenant in the family will never get promoted."

A charming young lady who attends evening church service regularly is called the "vesper belle" by the distracted youth of the parish.

Barry Cornwall and Charles Lamb were once making up a dinner party, and refused to include a mutual friend, as "he would cast a damper on a funeral."

"Are putatshon," says Josh Billings, "once broken, may possibly be repaired, but the world will always keep their eyes on that spot where the krack was."

HER RESOLUTION.—Spriggs' wife woke him up at three o'clock in the morning to say that she had decided, on the whole, to have a dark green suit and a green velvet bonnet this winter.

POSTPONING THE EVIL DAY.—"Mrs. Henry," said John to his wife the other morning, "if you give me a Christmas present this year, please arrange it so that the bill won't come in till the next month. It's just as well to keep up the illusion for a short time."

BROTHERLY ADVICE.—Fred (just returned from a long journey to his brother who has got married)—"I say, Jack, what in the world did you marry that frightfully ugly woman for?" Jack—"I did not look at her exterior, it was for her inward beauty that I married her." Fred—"For goodness sake, Jack, turn her inside out."

A heart-rending accident to a poor printer was lately reported. He came home drunk, told his wife he would kick her to death, and while making the first rush preparatory to scattering her brains lost his balance, fell down stairs and broke his neck. Some of the most innocent recreations are often bought with the greatest danger to life and limb. Requiescat in pace. The widow piously says amen to that.

Some years ago a Glasgow minister was called in to see a man who was very ill. After finishing his visit, as he was leaving the house, he said to the man's wife, "My good woman, do you not go to any church at all?" "Oh yes, sir! we gang to the Barony Kirk." "Then why in the world did you send for me? Why didn't you send for Dr. Macleod?" "Na, na, sir, deed no; we wadna risk him. Do ye no ken it's a dangerous case o' typhus?"

FOND OF A JOKE.—Few people enjoyed a joke better than Bishop Morley. On one occasion, his footman happening to be out of the way, he ordered the coachman to fetch some water from the well. Jehu objected on the ground that his business was to drive, not to run errands. "Well, then," retorted the Bishop, "bring out the coach-and-four, set the pitcher inside, and drive to the well." A service he was obliged to repeat several times, to the great amusement of the villagers.

OVERCOME BY FEMALE ATTRACTIONS.—An unfortunate landlord lately advertised for a barmaid. I call the landlord unfortunate advisedly, because by 10 o'clock of the morning on which the advertisement appeared he had been interviewed by no fewer than fifty-three ladies of surpassing loveliness and exquisite taste in dress. The agglomeration of female perfection was too much for the advertiser, who, finding at 11 o'clock that there were still twenty young ladies waiting to see him, got out of the house by the back doors, and went visiting at other hotels whilst he deputed the work of choosing a barmaid to a friend quite insensible to female attractions.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

By ANNIE S. SWAN,

Author of "Shadows Lives," "Thankful Rest," "Fruits," &c.

CHAPTER IX.—A DARK DEATH-BED.

Walter Gillespie and Laura Tennant were to be married in the second week of February. The day before the wedding Walter came to Claybridge, and took rooms at the Eagle. In the evening he walked over to the manse of Strathglide. The bride's preparations were all made, and there was only one shadow on her sky—the thought of the lonely old father up at Barossa. Mr. Tennant greeted the young man warmly, and retained him a moment in the study. "Your father is aware of what takes place to-morrow, Walter," he said interrogatively.

"Yes, sir; I wrote to him nearly a month ago," answered Walter frankly, "asking his forgiveness for my hasty words and for my too long silence, and informing him of to-morrow's event. It was unanswered, and I wrote again last week, and my letter was returned unopened."

"I do not know whether I am wise in giving my daughter to you in the circumstances," said the minister doubtfully.

"Pardon me, sir," said Walter with a sunny smile. "Like Jacob I have laboured for her, and have honourably won my wife. Surely the labourer is worthy of his hire."

An answering smile stole to the minister's lips, and he had no words wherewith to confute such an argument.

Walter then sought his way to the drawing-room where Laura awaited him. No need to tell what their meeting was, nor how glad and hopeful was their talk of the future.

"We cannot expect Mr. Gillespie, I suppose, to-morrow," said Laura by and by.

"No," answered Walter briefly.

"Walter, I am going to ask something from you," she said half wistfully. "You will not refuse?"

"What is mine is thine, sweetheart," said Walter lightly.

"I want you to take me up to Barossa."

Walter started.

"When?"

"Now," answered Laura. "I am off for my hat."

In five minutes she was back, dressed for her walk.

Walter, in a bewildered manner, followed her out into the lobby, and put on his overcoat.

"And what are you going to do when you are at Barossa?" he asked when they were walking up the quiet road to the lodge gates.

"You will see," she answered. "I could not be happy, Walter, to-morrow, unless I tried to reconcile you to your father. I am not afraid of him."

Walter was silent. But for his promise to Laura, he would have turned back at the very door. It is a powerful thing this pride, my friends, and is a stumbling block in the way of a great deal of happiness.

The servant who admitted them stared in genuine amazement. In fact, he was too much amazed to speak. "The master is in the library, Mr. Walter," he said, the old familiar name slipping out quite glibly.

"All right, James," said Walter, with his sunny smile; "you needn't mind, I know the way."

Although Laura had been so brave outside, she trembled from head to foot when Walter laid his hand upon the door. He opened it very softly, and both stood a moment on the threshold. The great room was dimly lighted, and seemed full of gloomy shadows. At the table sat the master with his face buried on his folded arms. Asleep, was he? or only dreaming of by-gone days?

Suddenly Laura went swiftly across the room, and knelt down by him clasping her hands on his knee. Mr. Gillespie flung up his head and looked at her and at the figure beyond with dumbfounded eyes.

"Oh, sir," faltered the girl's sweet voice, and the earnest eyes uplifted to his face were wet with tears. "Won't you forgive us, Walter and me, and say a kind word; forgive us, and give us a blessing? To-morrow I am to be Walter's wife, and I could not rest till I saw you and begged you to forgive me for having unwillingly parted you so long."

"To-morrow," repeated Mr. Gillespie dreamily. "Ay, yes, to-morrow, so he said in his letter, but I didn't answer it. I wanted to, but pride wouldn't let me."

"Walter is here, sir. Come in, Walter," said Laura. "Oh sir, don't look so sternly at us. We have done no wrong. We only love each other dearly. I will be a good daughter to you if you will let me."

"I have only to repeat what my letter said, father," said Walter's manly tones. "I have done wrong in waiting so long to say it. Forgive me, and, as Laura says, give us your blessing for to-morrow. It will not be complete without it."

A strange tremor ran over Mr. Gillespie's stern face, and there seemed to be a mist in his eyes.

He put one arm about the slender figure by his side, and drew it very close to him, and bent his grey head down till it touched the golden one. Two words only he spoke but they were sufficient—"My daughter."

Then he extended his other hand, and it met Walter's in a grip of iron.

There was nothing said.

Deep emotion is not noisy. I think the most exquisite moments in all our lives are silent ones. What say you?

So, greatly to the surprise of gossipy Strathglide, Mr. Gillespie was present at his son's wedding, and kissed the bride as if she had been his own child. It sufficed the busybodies for weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Gillespie went to spend their honeymoon in a pleasant chateau on the banks of that Swiss Lake, inseparably associated with the names of Bonnivard, Rousseau, Madame de Stael, and a score of others as illustrious. But I question if these two young people ever gave a thought to the famous dead who have made the place immortal; to them it was a blissful Eden, holding as of yore one man and woman all in all to each other.

For a few months before Laura's marriage Mrs. Tennant had been confined in a temperance home in the vicinity of Glasgow. It was the last resource, and one which, for many reasons, Mr. Tennant shrank from applying. But her outbreaks had become so frequent and terrible that, for his children's sake, he was compelled to remove her from the manse. Drink could not be kept from her. Those happily exempt from all contact with intemperate people would be dumbfounded by the ingenuity and cunning they display in finding ways and means to procure drink. Mrs. Tennant bribed message-boys, packmen, and even tramps. No means were beneath her, nothing too degrading for her to do, to satisfy the fearful craving which possessed her. All self-respect had long ago been sacrificed.

One evening a few days after the wedding Lottie was sitting in the drawing-room, sewing busily. Poor Lottie! At fourteen, the entire care of her father's house was laid upon her shoulders. The mad-cap was sobered now, and she had registered a mental vow to follow in her dear sister's steps, and fill, as far as lay in her power, the blank her absence must make in the home. Spring was drawing on apace. Though February was still young, green buds and tiny blades were peeping out, encouraged by the gentle air and the genial sun. A yellow sunset gilded the western sky, and a golden light lay on the old-fashioned garden, and creeping in at the window touched Lottie's dark head with a tenderness all its own. A pair of swallows home hunting in the churchyard twittered on the yew-boughs till Lottie raised her head with a smile to watch them.

"See, Daisy, there's the swallows—lovely white-breasted things," she said, "Lay down your book and come and see them."

"There's a beggar coming down the road, Lot," said Daisy, pointing to a figure a few yards out beyond the gate. "She hasn't a bonnet nor anything; oh, she's coming in here."

The garden gate creaked, and Lottie flung up her head, and the ruddy colour died from lip and cheek leaving them pale as ashes.

The woman coming slowly up the path nodded to them, and smiled a maudlin smile. Her dress, a fine dark cashmere, was rent in many places, and soaked and sodden with the rain. Her shawl, also soiled and discoloured, was pulled negligently round her, one corner being drawn over her head in lieu of a bonnet.

"Lot, it's mamma!" screamed Daisy, and clung to her sister's skirts trembling from head to foot.

"Stay here, Daisy darling," said Lottie with desperate calmness. "Just till I get papa. I won't stay a minute."

She put the child from her and fled to the study. Her father and Charles were there enjoying one of the long talks in which both delighted. It was Friday night and Charlie was freed from College till Monday.

"Papa," gasped Lottie, "mamma's at the door. I am afraid to open it."

Both sprang to their feet and ran to the door. Ay, there she stood upon the step, poor wreck of womanhood as she was, polluting the stillness of the evening air with the odour of the vile thing which had been her ruin.

"I'm home," she said with a triumphant grin. "They were very clever but they couldn't keep me in. No, I was too smart for them. Can't I come into my own house, Mr. Tennant," she broke off fiercely, and brushing past them forced her way into the drawing-room. With a scream of horror Daisy rushed out of the room, and fled to the kitchen to faithful Jean.

Why should I linger here? It is not so pleasant a theme that I should greatly care to expatiate upon it. God help us that it should have its parallel in so many homes throughout our land.

By and by, with Jean's assistance, they got her to bed, and then the "horrors" came on her. To speak correctly, she was attacked by delirium tremens. Mr. Tennant and Charlie had to watch by her, sometimes they had to call Jean to help them to keep her in bed.

"There's another!" she screamed once, fixing her glaring eyes on a particular corner of the room. "The room is full of them. Take them away! Shut out their eyes, they are burning into my very soul. Keep their fearful hands off me! Oh! my God, there is Arthur!"

So deep was the conviction with which she spoke, that involuntarily they glanced round almost expecting to see him there.

"He is coming to help them to tear me to pieces," she raved. "He says I taught him to drink; I, who loved him so I would have died for him. Don't let him come, Charlie!" she said, wistfully turning her eyes to her husband's drawn face. "You used to love me, won't you shut them out? If you knew how they burn me you would. Look," she said in a fearful whisper, "There he is again. Arthur! Arthur!" Scream after scream broke from her lips, and in the drawing-room below Lottie held Daisy closely in her arms trying to allay the terror which was no greater than her own. She was only a child yet, scarcely able to bear such things.

By and by the doctor came. She had fallen into a light uneasy sleep. He made a brief examination and shook his head.

"Another such paroxysm, sir," he said in his grave, candid way, "will snap the thread. Her heart is frightfully weak. In this case we are powerless."

The minister bowed his head; he had no word to say.

The doctor's surmise was correct. Ere daybreak she was seized with another paroxysm, during which the frail, overtaxed heart ceased to beat. So she died. Do you wonder that it should overwhelm the minister.

"Oh, dear Charlie!" he groaned giving way utterly. "What a death! Not a moment given for repentance. What hope have we for her future? This is harder to bear than all the rest. Let your mother's death-bed be a lesson to you my son, and avoid the evil thing as you would a deadly poison."

Charlie went close to the bowed figure, and laid his strong young arm about the drooping shoulders, his face shining with the earnestness of a noble purpose.

"Not only that, father, but before God I swear to do what one man can to sweep this awful evil from our land."

That vow would be fulfilled in the spirit and in the letter in days to come.

SCIENCE AND SCRIPTURE OF ALCOHOL.

I.

God is one, and truth is one. Truth must be one, because all truth comes from God who is infinite in knowledge, wisdom, and purity. Truth comes to us through two channels from the one God. One of these is the works of nature, the other the Word of God or Revelation. The means whereby we reach truth from the former is observation, experiment, and experience. The means for reaching truth from revelation is study, the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and experience. Since both of these revelations come from the same God who is truth, and who cannot contradict himself or deceive, there must be the most perfect harmony between the two. No discrepancy can by any possibility exist between the two, and if there appears to be any it must proceed from some mistake as to the meaning of one or other, or it may be of both. If the popular interpretation of the Word is at variance with the facts of science properly understood, then we require to find some mode of harmonizing the two without doing violence to either the one or the other. Before however that we admit the teaching of science, we must have the most clear and unmistakable evidence that such is truth. Each of these divine revelations has its own peculiar sphere. The teachings of the works of nature refer to man's position as a creature like any other animal—to his body and its requirements, and to the arts and sciences wherewith he deals. The teachings of the Bible have reference to man's position as connected with God, and as a responsible being. It deals with morality, and the spiritual concerns of the soul. The former concerns the present life, the latter deals with matters which more concern the world to come. It is only in the incidental teachings of the Word, or where these deal with matters which also affect the present life, and the affairs of man as a social being, that we find the two records dealing with the same subjects, and where consequently we may expect to find the one confirming or explaining the other, and where, therefore, we can find harmony. To this harmony on the question of strong drink or alcoholic liquors we purpose calling attention, being persuaded that where this comes clearly out, we shall find there one of the strongest arguments for abstinence and prohibition.

Whatever is declared to be duty, by its form, is admitted by all. But many who will at once admit the obligation of a "Thou shalt," or "Thou shalt not" are not so ready to allow that a duty may be found expressed under the form of a simple statement of truth. But this is very common in scripture, and it is universal so far as the laws of nature are concerned. In nature we have no commands, but we have facts, and as these are discovered they become, or ought to become, rules of action. It has been discovered to be a law of nature that bodies when unsupported fall to the ground. Hence we derive a rule for our conduct, we come to the wise conclusion that if we would avoid the consequences of a fall we must secure a firm footing. We learn from the study of the action of certain agents upon the human organism that certain substances taken into the system so act upon certain organs as to injure or to destroy their power of acting, and thus produce disorder or death as the case may be. This affords us the lesson that such substances are to be carefully avoided, else we must pay the penalty either by suffering disorder in the bodily system, or by losing life altogether. If we are wise we will give good heed to these warnings derived from the teachings of nature. These are learned by experience and from experiment. These lessons so learned are as much the commands of God as if they had been revealed to us in the form of "Thou shalt," or "Thou shalt not." There is, however, a marked and very material difference between the commands revealed in the Bible for our guidance in morality, and the injunctions implied in the laws of nature for the management of those matters which concern the body simply as such, and not as it is the instrument of the soul. In the case of the moral law there is room for, and the promise of, forgiveness when true repentance follows the commission of sin. In the case of natural law there is neither promise of nor room for repentance, but every violation of this code of natural law is followed inevitably, and with absolute certainty, by its natural punishment. There cannot be, and there never is, any pardon here. The greatest sinner, who has longest rebelled against his God, and who has been guilty of every kind of iniquity and sin, and who has been the most hardened in his course of opposition to God and his law, if he lay down the weapons of his rebellion, and in true penitence comes and casts himself upon the mercy of God in Christ, all his sins are forgiven, the penalty is remitted in full, and he is received into full favour and love of God. God forgives freely and fully all moral guilt, and not one single sin is counted against the repentant sinner. He has absolute and complete forgiveness, is restored fully to favour, is made partaker of all the happiness and bliss of which he is capable. But it is not so with regard to the violation of the laws of nature. Here God never forgives, here there is no pardon, here the full penalty is ever exacted and must be paid to the utmost. Let us clearly understand this distinction. Here is a man who in the course of his life has become one of the vilest and most degraded of men, a sinner of the deepest dye. In his course of sin he has not only broken the moral law, but he has gone into a life of dissipation, he has broken the laws of nature, and now he begins to suffer the effects. In the midst of his sufferings he is brought to see how he stands in relation to his God. His eyes are opened, his heart is affected, his conscience is awakened, and in his trouble he is brought to feel his need of a Saviour, and is made willing to receive the great gift of eternal life. He humbles himself under the sense of guilt, he casts himself down at the feet of Christ, and in true repentance cries out "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner." He is not cast off, his cry is heard, his sin is forgiven, he feels that he has been pardoned, and with joyful heart and grateful spirit he cries out "Abba, father." Now he rejoices in the light of God's countenance; now he sings of grace and love; now he sees God as reconciled, and all his mountains of sin washed away in the fountain opened for sin. He has now no fear of meeting with God, he rather longs to go to enjoy his presence and to be happy for ever. But what about this body of his? His sin against the natural law has laid it under disease and on the road to dissolution. Has his repentance cured the body as it has renewed the soul? Nay. The penalty of the broken natural law must be paid, paid to the last farthing. Not one jot or tittle of this law will be allowed to be unavenged. The body is doomed to pay the penalty of death; the soul has escaped and is free. Offences against the moral law have all been blotted out; those against the natural laws have, and must have their full penalty. These laws are the revelation of the will of God to man in reference to the things of this life, just as surely and as certainly as the moral laws are His revelation of His will in regard to the matters of the soul and its interests. And it is as much our duty to give obedience to the one set of laws as it is to give attention to the other. And it is our interest to do this. For if we violate the laws of nature we are sure to have to pay the penalty of all disobedience to those of nature. We may violate the laws of grace and we may have forgiveness, and we must have the most solemn obligations on us to obey these. It is therefore a very notable point that wherever the one revelation comes into contact with that of the other we find, or at least we ought to find, the most perfect harmony. This harmony really exists and if any appearance of discrepancy comes into view it must be owing to some misunderstanding of one or other, or it may be of both the records.

What has all this to do with the question of total abstinence or of prohibition? Let us see.

There are certain truths, or what are believed to be truths, drawn from the study of nature or physical science, and there are certain truths which we believe, or at least many believe, to be revealed in the Word of God in reference to drink. These are believed to be in harmony with each other on these points, and consequently these are believed to be the basis on which may be founded a plea of duty. That duty is total abstinence from all intoxicants as beverages.

I. It has been deduced from the study of physics that alcohol is a poison. Alcohol is the active ingredient in all such beverages as wine, beer, cider, perry, gin, rum, brandy, and whisky. The proportion or percentage of alcohol in these varies very much, but it is found in them all, and it is on account of its presence that they are drunk. That alcohol, the active element in these liquors, is a poison is generally admitted by all the ablest and most learned men of the medical profession. There is no writer on Toxicology who does not class alcohol among the poisons. Orfila, Christison, and a whole crowd of writers so class it. But the question arises with some, What is a poison? Our answer is, A poison is some substance which taken into the system so acts upon one or more organs as to disorder, derange, or destroy their functions, and so produces disease or it may be death. It is "a substance, which, brought into contact with the skin, mucous surfaces, nerves, blood cells, or other organs of man, disturbs their normal state, by virtue of some special inherent quality." A poison does not necessarily in every dose kill, or even when that takes place does it do so suddenly. Some poisons act comparatively slowly, others very speedily. Some produce disease and disorder which run on to fatal results, while others act almost instantaneously by suddenly stopping the action of some vital part. Now, science, or the study of the laws of physical nature, has declared as the result of experiment, of experience, and of careful investigation, that alcohol ranks among the most potent and virulent of poisons. This fact is popularly recognised as a truth beyond question by the very name given to such liquors as contain this ingredient. They are commonly known as intoxicating liquors or intoxicants. This word comes from the root toxicum, poison. Intoxicating, therefore, just means poisoning, and when we say of a man that he is intoxicated we just assert that he is under the influence of a poison. This is so generally admitted that it is useless to quote authorities on the point to any extent, although it would be easy to multiply such quotations. We shall content ourselves with one or two as samples. Dr. Wilson writes, "All these diversified proofs have pointed unchallengeably to the conclusion that alcohol is the most widely and intensely destructive of poisons. In large and concentrated doses there are few which are more promptly and inevitably fatal." Dr. Michel Levy in "Hygiene" writes thus, "The influence of alcohol upon the nervous system, and particularly upon the brain, is manifest by a progressive and consistent series of symptoms, which, in different degrees of intensity, are reproduced in all individuals. These constitute a true poisoning, and this morbid state is exhibited under three phases, (1) sur-excitation, (2) perturbation, (3) abolition of the cerebro-spinal functions." But we have given enough. Where there is really among men of science no diversity of opinion, nature, the science of physics, gives the verdict that "alcohol is a poison."

Let us now see what is the verdict of scripture, if it gives any information on the subject. We must not look for the same precision of scientific description that we find in books of science, for the Bible does not teach science, only now and then statements are made which bear upon these and such like questions. We may find the matter referred to in a passing way as an illustration, or as a concrete statement, but not in the abstract form. In the Old Testament two words are used which have been translated poison or venom. The first of these is chemah, or khamah. The literal meaning of the word seems to be inflaming heat such as is produced by the action of many poisons, and hence the poison itself. It is used to symbolize rage, fury, anger. The word poison occurs in eight passages in the English Bible. In five of these the word in the Hebrew is khamah.

Deut. xxxii. 24. With the poison (khamah) of serpents.

Job vi. 4. The poison (khamah) whereof drinketh up my spirit.

Psalms lxxviii. Their poison (khamah) is like the poison (khamah) of serpents.

Psalms cxl. 5. Adder's poison (khamah) is under their lips.

The word rosh is also used in a similar sense. The word seems to refer primarily to some bitter and poisonous vegetable such as poppy.

Job xx. 16. He shall suck the poison (rosh) of asps.

Psalms lxix. 22. They gave me gall (rosh) for my meat.

Jer. viii. 14. Given us water of gall (rosh) to drink.

These are the two words used to indicate poison in the Hebrew and it is worthy of note that the rosh which occurs several times as the name of some plant always seems to indicate a poisonous action. It has been translated hemlock, and is coupled with wormwood. Both of these terms are employed in describing the action of alcoholic wine. In Deut. xxxii. 33. "For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: their grapes are grapes of gall (rosh), their clusters are bitter." 34. "Their wine is the poison (khamah) of dragons, and the cruel venom (rosh) of asps." Thus it is seen that both the words translated poison are employed here to characterize wine, alcoholized wine. For it can never be said of pure fresh grape juice that it is like poison, as it is one of the most nutritive substances we can get. But when the process of fermentation has taken place, all the elements which rendered the juice a valuable food have disappeared, and in their place we have an agent which is here described as resembling the serpent's poison. But this is not the only passage that gives a hint as to the nature of alcohol. Habakkuk ii. 15 has these words, "Woe to him that giveth his neighbour drink; that putteth thy bottle (khamah = poison) to him, etc." And Hosea vii. 5 writes, "They made him sick with bottles (khamah = poison) of wine." Jeremiah xxv. 15, has "Take the wine cup of this fury at my hand," the wine producing fury (khamah). And in Isaiah li. 17, "Thou hast drunk...the cup of his fury (khamah)." These latter passages indicate tropically the effects produced by alcoholic wine, and they are of such a nature as to leave no doubt as to the physical properties of the substance. Clearly and unmistakably the divine record indicates that this agent is of a poisonous character, and thus the teachings so given are in perfect accord with those derived from physical science, and we may, therefore, pretty certainly draw the conclusion that we have got at truth, since from two separate and independent sources we have the same lessons taught, and that in no doubtful or ambiguous form. Alcohol then is a poison, declared to be so by divine revelation in the Word, and in the works of God.

What then are we to learn from this fact?

If alcohol be a poisonous substance then all those beverages of which it forms an important element must be poisonous in their effects upon the users thereof. This effect is admitted in the very use of the term intoxicated.

If alcohol be a poison then it cannot be a proper substance to be used as a food. All food must nourish the body, but if it contains an element whose action is irritating or disturbing to the functions of the various organs it cannot be a proper food. No substance usually employed as a food has this property. Fruits, vegetables, flesh do not disturb or disorder the functions of the organs of the body. If they did they would at once be rejected as such and others employed in their place. If alcohol is to be reckoned, as some would like to do, as a food, it forms a solitary exception to the general rule. Neither can it be regarded, and for the same reason, as a good drink. Water, the natural drink, is entirely neutral in its action; it does not inflame or disturb normal action in any organ.

The laws of physical science demand that we regulate our diet by their guidance, that we use only such articles of food and drink as are consistent in their operation and effects upon the various organs of the body, with the enjoyment of comfort and health. This is also required as a duty by the moral law, that of the sixth commandment in particular. Poisonous substances do injury to the frame, and consequently we are called upon by natural as well as by moral law to avoid them. Alcohol is such a substance, and hence we come to the conclusion, founded alike on the laws of our physical frame, and on the moral law as revealed in the Word of God, that it is our duty to avoid and abstain from the ordinary use of all such beverages as contain this poisonous ingredient. The two records are at one in this matter, and, since it is our duty to obey both of them, the duty is imperative, is binding upon all men as organized creatures, and as subjects of the King of kings.

GLASGOW COOKERY EXHIBIT.

THE directors of the Abstainers' Union, in holding their second cookery exhibit during the new year holidays, took a very wise step indeed, and added one of the most interesting, important, and practical of exhibits to the many attractions of the season. Theirs was a great advance upon the previous one in every way. The place was more spacious, attractive, and more accessible. It was besides more influential and much more successful as regards the cookery and setting out. The place was the Crown Halls, Sauchiehall Street, which was gaily decorated for the occasion. There was a platform at the north end on which stood a grand piano, which gave out music at intervals during the day, yet leaving room for the chairman and the various speakers. On the west side there was a most interesting exhibition of gas heating and cooking apparatus from the Argyll Works of Mr. Matthew Waddell. A hot plate belonging to this gentleman was employed for the making of bannocks and pastry during the entire day. Adjoining was the soups, &c., kept warm with gas. Still farther on we had vegetarian cookery. Then on the south there was an excellent little collection of bottles, each lot showing the constituents of  $\frac{1}{2}$  pint of wine,  $\frac{1}{2}$  pint of porter,  $\frac{1}{2}$  pint of milk,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. of steak,  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. of pease meal, and so on. One phial gave the water, another the starch, the next the fatty matter, and the next the salts. This group attracted many visitors. On the east side we had a refreshment stall, where Mr. Waddell had provided very excellent tea, coffee, and bread of various kinds, cooked on the premises. There was also some fruit. The entrance was on this side, beyond which we saw fardels and scones made of oatmeal, flour, maize, &c. Immediately in front of the platform space was reserved for the audience at the lectures. The rest of the floor space available was taken up with the display of the Bread Reform Society and with the working women's competition of a week's dinners, vegetarian and mixed. A glance at the whole was sufficient to impress the visitor with a high opinion of the competition. Looking to the walls we observed a large number of tabular diagrams showing the constituents of food in figures, and it seemed to us to go to show the marked superiority of a fruit and farinaceous diet over an animal and even a mixed diet. A very large number of persons patronized the exhibit throughout the day, but we should have liked to have seen more of those for whose particular benefit and advantage all the trouble was taken. At twelve o'clock noon the exhibition was opened, and two very interesting contests took place. The first was setting tables in presence of the judges, who included a number of ladies whose kindly sympathies and efforts the directors had the good fortune to enlist. The competition was very keen, and some considerable difficulty was felt by the judges in coming to a decision. The other was an essay in cooking in presence of the judges. This was a very spirited affair. Eliza M'Kenzie was first, Mrs. Ewan second, and Minnie Barlow third. At the advertised time Mr. Lindsay, chairman of the Union, accompanied by Professor M'Kendrick and Mr. William Smith, ascended the platform, where the learned professor proceeded to deliver a lecture on food. He was listened to with deep interest, for a most admirable lecture was delivered. He showed very cogently that a proper dietary should contain those articles found in the living body itself, and that these different substances should be prepared in proper proportions. This was illustrated by a reference to an excellent diagram. He stated that from 23 to 24 oz. of solid substances was a daily supply. We cannot always be weighing our foods, but we can always approximate, preparing them as properly as we can. Food can only be nutritious when it can be properly cooked and perfectly absorbed. With our food there should be a certain amount of relish or sapidity; this would stimulate the system and make the work of absorption easier. During its delivery he laid great stress upon the advantage of porridge and milk, and expressed deep regret that many of the working classes had excused their neglect of it because they could not get milk of good quality cheap, could they do so they would continue to use porridge. He also declared his conviction that through mothers giving infants, no doubt with kind intentions, a bit of what they were taking themselves, i. e., starchy and fatty foods beyond the infants' power of digestion, many serious and often fatal diseases occurred. The lecture was received with loud applause. M. Connal, Esq., chairman of the School Board of Glasgow, in moving a vote of thanks to the learned professor, indicated a warm interest in good cookery, for the want of which he thought the working classes were greatly to be pitied. At eight o'clock the lecturer was Rev. Dr. Robertson, of St. Andrews Established Church, and chairman of the Glasgow School of Cookery. Introductory to his address he paid a high compliment to the Abstainers' Union and to Mr. Airlie, its indefatigable secretary. The Union sought the removal of temptations to drinking, but they did not rest there. They sought to institute counteractives to the public house temptations, and their concerts had for the last twenty years done a great deal of good in elevating the tastes of the people, and in spreading abroad a love for musical improvement. They had now gone a step farther, and were trying to make a man's fireside better and happier. Towards this consummation nothing could in his opinion contribute so much as good cookery. They evidently were trying to get the man to feed well and so keep him from intemperance. When a man's system is so depressed by excessive labour that it craves for some stimulant, nothing would so meet this craving as a man's being able to partake of thoroughly well cooked food. (Applause.) A great many men have been drawn into the cheery parlour of the public house by the slatternly and untidy condition of their homes. He knew how hard it was for a wife with a large family to get through her household work. But if it is considered how enormous is the gain of having a home of an attractive character, they would put forth a strong effort to make their homes as bright and attractive as they could. A very large amount of money was wasted in sheer ignorance of the value and preparation of food. The secret was to buy at the right time. The pass-book should be discarded and food bought with ready money. He would make bold to say that by acting upon this principle there would be a saving at the end of the year equivalent to a large rise on the wages of a working man. This was the custom in his young days. People then "hained" their money at the beginning of winter and secured large supplies of food. This led to a great amount of frugality in every department. The speaker concluded with a few excellent hints on the respective value of butter, eggs, and fish, as contrasted with sheep's heads and a haggis, and by wishing the Union much success. The chairman at nine o'clock proceeded to distribute the prizes. This was a very interesting feature of the day. He said that a great many parties had entered into competition, but it was impossible that all of them could succeed. It was better, however, to have competed and lost than not to have competed at all. (Applause.) Perhaps those who had competed and lost will, on seeing how near they have been to a prize, try again and win. (Applause.) He then gave out the prizes, the audience cheering the winners as they marched to and from the platform. Many of them were youthful, a large number single women. A Mrs. Smith, of Oxford Street, seemed extremely fortunate, she having three first, three second, and one third prize. Votes of thanks were awarded on the motion of Mr. Lindsay, to Mr. Airlie, who is to be complimented very much on the success attending the arrangements, and to Miss Gordon. Mr. Airlie in replying acknowledged the services of Misses Gibbs and Baillie—the lady judges—the lecturers, Mr. M. Waddell, all of whom were heartily applauded, and a vote of thanks to the chairman concluded this very excellent exhibition.

HEATHER.

'Tis hard tae dee sae far fae hame
 Frae love an' friens' an' a' thegither,
 Without the soun' o' ae kent voice,
 Or ae glimpse o' my native heather.
 Oh! had I ne'er for love of gold;
 Been o'er the ocean forced to roam,
 I ne'er had known a broken heart,
 Earth had no friends save love and home.
 They've brought me flowers I cannot name,
 Frae foreign climes o' cloudless ether,
 Though fair their hue and sweet their smell,
 They're no tae me like purple heather.
 An' when I'm dead, 'twill no be lang,
 I'm weary heart and brain thegither,
 Just row me in my tartan plaid;
 And on my breast a sprig o' heather.

MARY GRANT.

HOW HE GOT SHOT.—A little girl said to her mamma, "Mamma, have you heard of the man that got shot?" "No, child, how did he get shot?" asked mamma. "Oh," said young precocious, "he bought 'em."

DONALD WAS A JACOBITE.—"Donald," said the Duke, "will you drink my health?" Donald eagerly "O ay, O ay." "Now, Donald, let us pledge the King." "Fat King?" "Oh King George." "Weel, weel," with an expressive shrug, "Gif that be the King that's to be understood Tonal's no dry."

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1883.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER
FEBRUARY, 1883.

We hope next month to indicate the leading features of our new volume, which commences with the April issue.

In consequence of the crowded state of our news columns, we are compelled to leave over the concluding article on "Workman's Bill of Fare," "Book-shelf," and other interesting matter; but we will endeavour to find room for all these next month.

Next to the Premier's, the utterances of Lord Hartington will be most carefully considered by the country. His lordship has, of all the Liberal Cabinet ministers, shown an ability and patriotism of the highest order. When his party was in opposition, it was admirably led by him. When the time came for Mr. Gladstone to resume the leadership, his lordship fell back to the post of lieutenant without a murmur; and although the Duke of Argyll, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Bright, for one reason or another, left the Cabinet, the Marquis of Hartington, while having equally good reason to theirs, stood loyally by his chief, so that when addressing his constituents recently, he spoke with the authority of an eminent member of the Government. He made a lengthy reference to the drink question, which might be summed up shortly. He believed it was perfectly possible for the present Parliament to deal with the licensing laws. In his opinion the movement with that object had made considerable progress. Two things with regard to the traffic had occurred—first, the great diminution in the revenue from the traffic, through the increasing temperate habits of the people. It might have been at this time 34 millions, stg.; it was only 28½ millions; there was an actual decrease of 3½ millions. Now, this reduction might be treated in two ways. People could go on abstaining without any assistance from legislation whatever; yet this ardent desire to give up drinking should strengthen their demand for legislation. His lordship's view is wise. If law is the expression of virtue, surely it should support virtue; if a nation is desirous to abandon intemperance, the law should not be found arrayed against its desire; if it is bent on sobriety, it should no longer be allowed to struggle against temptations to intemperance than the Government is able to remove the bad law and establish legislation which will render it easier for its subjects to show a steadfast fidelity to sobriety than to fall into habits of inebriety: We heartily welcome the Marquis's opinions, and augur much from them when the consideration of the licensing laws engages the close attention of the Cabinet. His lordship went on to refer to the great Darwen decision in favour of the contention of temperance reformers that the meaning of the law was that licenses were only granted for one year. He seemed to look upon that decision with favour, and thought it might bring the licensed victuallers to terms. He had never, he said, voted for local option, but he was not disposed to deny the need for farther legislation, and that in the direction of popular control. This might be afforded in connection with the County Government Bill, or by the magistrates, who might have their hands strengthened in the exercise of what would no doubt be an unpopular duty by the expression in some shape or other of a popular opinion in their district that a reduction of licenses was required. The noble Marquis said the question was not in his department, but emphatically ended by stating that this was quite a possible question, and if possible it was desirable that this Parliament should deal with it before it ceases to exist. The audience heartily cheered their noble representative, and we should have vigorously joined them, for his lordship has advanced rapidly to the position he holds. If his words point to anything, they point to regulation, but he is quite open to consideration, and if a Board, subordinate to the veto of the ratepayers, was appointed the licensing authority, no doubt it should have his lordship's support. For our own part, we want the veto without the Board, and we believe all true hearts, while glad that legislation on the liquor traffic is so imminent, will strive to be entrusted with the veto rather than be cursed with a Board.

The National Trade Guardian—the Scotch publicans' organ—has a Commissioner who writes up sensational copy for his paper. This is how he writes about the Central Police Court at Glasgow:—"Hogarth could conceive of nothing which exceeded in brutality and degradation the effects of whisky and gin as exhibited in some of the slums of our great cities; Cruickshank, the prince of caricaturists, pictorially sketched the career of the Bacchanalian from the cradle to the grave, but it is questionable if it were in the power of either of these masters of the art of chalcography to depict in the wildest sweep of their imagination anything to surpass many of the scenes which are daily witnessed in the Central Police Court." After painting the surroundings of the Court, "where burglar, incendiary, garrotter, and assassin meet face to face," he points to the "narrow courts which strike off the Trongate, inhabited mainly by shebeeners, and the initiated in the mysteries of this infernal traffic can point you out any night" shebeen watchers and peripatetic shebeeners. It is from such quarters that the majority of the cases at the "Central" are taken for adjudication. In what more scathing terms could a Temperance reformer speak or write of the "Central" than the Publicans' Commissioner? He exhausts denunciation, and if he were just somewhat more truthful he might take the part of a Temperance advocate any day. "The Central" is a dreadful place because, according to him, it is thronged with the victims of the illegal traffic in strong drinks. Supposing that it is so, where is the illegal traffic supplied? From the legal supply of course, where else? Rarely do we hear of smuggling, still more rarely of "secret still" production. The shebeener must get his supply, and from whom? From his more wholesome brother in the eye of the law, who frowns on shebeeners as he does upon grocers, but deals with both for all that. Reduce your respectable publican by the suppressive veto to the ranks of the shebeener and both would disappear, and the Commissioner of the National Trade Guardian would then be able to serve the public in a less questionable capacity than in trying to whitewash the liquor trade, and only succeeding in putting the saddle on the wrong horse.

Although from the nature of the Association we represent we feel ourselves precluded from discussing political questions outside of temperance and social reform, we are deeply interested in the methods by which political reformers attempt to gain their ends. At a meeting at Old Meldrum recently, addressed by General Sir Alexander Gordon, M.P., Mr. Hay, Little Ythsie, said, "electors should record their votes only for men who were 'sound' on the land question and will do all in their power to bring it under the notice of Government." Now whether this Association in its electoral efforts at the election of General Gordon have been the tutors of Mr. Hay, or whether that gentleman went to the school of Dame Experience and was taught, we are glad to see him advocating a principle which, when supported and enforced by us, was held to be fanatical and dangerous in the extreme. Highly satisfactory as exclusive voting has proved through our friends' application of it at all general and bye elections, we expect that it will be still more successful in the future when once our parliamentary struggle begins for special veto powers over the liquor traffic to the ratepayers of Scotland. The parliamentary candidate who is unable to discern the signs of the times on our great question is hopelessly incompetent for the post to which he aspires.

At the last moment Dr. Andrew Clarke stepped in and put his veto on the visit of the Premier to Midlothian. The disappointment to the admirers of Mr. Gladstone all over Scotland was great, and it says much for his hold on their affections that they so readily acquiesced in the event. Our friends were resolved to approach Mr. Gladstone by deputation, but were told, as every other interest had been, that he could not grant an interview to them. They then resolved to hold a meeting in their respective districts and invited the valuable assistance of Mr. Waterston, the district superintendent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association for Edinburgh and the east. Meetings were held in Currie, West Calder and Dalkeith, at which resolutions expressive of great sympathy with the honourable representative, Mr. Gladstone, were adopted, as was also a resolution calling upon the Government to introduce, at the earliest moment, a bill enabling the ratepayers to veto all liquor traffic in their localities. These resolutions were duly forwarded. We rejoice to know that the Midlothian meetings are not abandoned but only postponed, and look forward to Mr. Gladstone finding time to meet with our tried friends in his constituency.

It is devoutly to be wished that the newspaper press saw as clearly as the Times did last month the present terrible condition of the Swiss Cantons through free trade in drink. Its correspondent reports that there is absolute freedom of trade in drink with the usual appalling consequences, and the Times is horrified to think that the Swiss are far more drunken than the people of the United Kingdom. It perceives that this arises from the fact that we have some legal checks on the drinking system and the Swiss have none. Without hesitation the Times jumps into our boat—offers to abate this state of matters by our remedies. "Rude and rough an agency as restrictive legislation may be thought, the liquor traffic once established has hitherto yielded to no other." "If the Swiss people is to be preserved from imminent ruin the legislature must pass a new licensing law, or restore the right of local option to the Cantons." "Any Canton which preferred to leave dissoluteness unchecked might figure as it pleased as the drunken Helot of the confederation. Each is large enough to govern itself in these matters and is accustomed to the task. No fear need be felt in Swiss Cantons that a majority would trample on the reasonable likings of a minority. The change would simply invest the several divisions of the Swiss people with the right to protect themselves and their weaker citizens from riot and temptation, and fasten upon those who might not choose to use it the responsibility for their own misery and disorder." The Times has had given to it an account of evil done abroad and it delivers an opinion which exactly tallies with the views of the most eminent temperance reformers, and propounds a remedy almost running on all fours with theirs. And how sensible is the opinion. A nation keeps a liquor shop to nearly every thirty families: every tenement contains a drinking place: you have drunkenness and crime, poverty and impending national ruin. This arises not from greater ube-lief, from larger numbers forsaking the king's highway, but from an erroneous interpretation of the constitution and entire abrogation of the legal checks on the sale of liquors. The Times believes, no doubt as firmly as the most sainted Christian among us that evangelistic agencies, however excellent, so far as they go, cannot subdue the liquor traffic, and it wisely declares that rough and ready as restriction is, the liquor traffic yields to no other; and it does not hesitate to state that the power of local option should be restored to the Cantons, that they thus protect themselves and their weaker citizens from riot and temptation. We rejoice at this decisive opinion from the Times, and hope at no distant day to have it exerting its powerful and continuous influence in favour of a protective, not merely restrictive, local option for the United Kingdom, and especially for that part of it called Scotland.

We shall never, we believe, forget the feeling that possessed us on the day when Alexandria was to be bombarded by the British fleet. Our allies, the French, had coolly steamed away: the Powers of Europe had left us to be the arbiter of the fate of Egypt. We had metal enough wherewith to destroy every fort in the doomed city, but military traditions did not speak hopefully of the result of a contest between fleets and forts to the fleet. As we scanned the faces of those among whom we moved we saw hope and fear mingling in every countenance, and an attention so strained that it seemed as if all were listening to catch the echo of the gun which first opened fire on the foe. The friends of temperance are, with regard to the ensuing session of Parliament, in the same state of strained suspense, with, unfortunately, this difference, that they are not all of one mind as those were who manned our ships on the memorable day in June. Many of them think that change is reform; they seem as if what they wanted was simply a change in the Licensing Authority, and not a permanent settlement of the liquor difficulty. A licensing board with its controlling, its leases, its staff, its borrowing powers, and its consequent perpetuation of the evil in a new and perhaps slightly improved form, seems to be the ambition which inspires and moves them to action. While they will certainly justify those responsible for legislation on the liquor traffic, in offering a concession and not a settlement, the people that trusts them would find, when too late, that it has been led by blind guides, and has fallen into the ditch of compromise. Then, if we may put any faith in rumours and forecasts on the session, Government interference with the liquor traffic is to take the form of a County Government Bill with licensing powers. This will mean for the burghs of Scotland the statu quo; for the burghers elect a Board to manage all their affairs, and a portion of them as magistrates do presently administer the licensing laws. These magistrates have clearly shown that under the most advanced system of liquor legislation their control of that system has been a painful and conspicuous failure. To impose a similar system of control on our Scottish counties is an insult to the common sense of those who reside in them which we hope will be very properly resented. The liquor traffic cannot be controlled either by a licensing board of the best of men or by any law that can be conceived short of prohibition. But these licensing proposals might be embodied in law were it not that there is in Scotland a dominant party of prohibitionists averse to licensing on any grounds, who are pressing the Government for a just settlement of the people's demand for self-protection from the appalling evils of the liquor traffic. They do not believe in new machinery for licensing, controlling, regulating, not to speak of maintaining the liquor traffic. All they desire is the simple machinery of a poll to enable them to register their opinion as to whether the traffic should continue to injure them and those near and dear to them or not, with the certainty that that registration shall be legally binding on them and their neighbours. That is their simple issue, and we believe that Scottish Parliamentary representatives are of opinion that no other legislation on the licensing system will afford permanent satisfaction to the Scottish people. We even indulge the hope that some of these honourable gentlemen will be found prepared to afford an opportunity to the people of Scotland of indicating their preference for such a simple means of dealing with the liquor traffic, and that under their leadership the social and moral reformers of Scotland will be found, in the immediate future, rallying for a decisive Parliamentary conflict with the great drink interest. But to be able to inflict irretrievable defeat upon that interest entrenched in an iniquitous law, their forces must be united as their opponents are. We hope all our friends are looking forward to such an eventuality as this. We believe we can answer for the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. Its Executive are maintaining a vigilant attitude and resolved to avail themselves of every opportunity that may present itself in Parliament, to offer needful assistance and advice to all determined to combine to secure from the legislature a suppressive local veto over all liquor licenses whatever. They have no fears as to the ultimate issue of all the efforts put forth by Scotland to purge herself of the fearful evils of intemperance, if her people be deaf to those who are aiming at merely temporary successes. Let her moral and social reformers work earnestly and unitedly for the suppressive veto, and whether victory now or in the remoter future crowns their labours—as crown these she will—they will have for ever freed their country from the calamities and contaminations of the drink traffic of Scotland.

It is not so long ago since the Licensed Victualler Guardian gave it out as an article of its belief that those who drank "earned their money like horses and spent it like asses." Last month we showed that this might be truer now than when the Guardian expressed it, seeing that the grand old national beverage, Beer, was yielding to the inroads of maize and rice which, since the repeal of the malt duty, were the favourite materials of beer and stout manufacture. Additional proof is afforded by the revelations of the American Consul at Rochelle, France. He has exposed the horrors attending Wine production, and the Times is giving currency to his reports. He declares that the juice of the grape is the least used in the production of wine, which is artificial. Besides it is adulterated with logwood, molasses, tartaric, acetic, or tannic acids, lime, alum, bitter almonds, leaves of the cherry, laurel, syrup of fecula, juniper berries, fresh rye bread, litharge, Brazil and Campeachy wood, beet juice, fuchsine, aniline salts, arsenic, elder berries, cochineal, &c. The Wine Trade Review tries hard to disparage the Consul's report by imputing immense skill and unwearied energy to the analysts of this country, but where the latter give certificates in favour of alcohol and characterise intoxicating liquors as wholesome, genuine and so on, we may be excused from expecting from them meantime a verdict in accordance with the evidence or the facts. It is hard to give 36s. a dozen for stuff when it is the artificial preparation the Consul describes, and it is in the deepest sense wicked to cheat poor invalids by administering such deleterious liquors as cordials intended to make them better, but which alas must have quite a contrary effect. But even in this business on the part of the wine growers and dealers there is a lower depth still. The Consul we have quoted affords us an insight into what he calls the falsification of Brandies. Brandy is only brandy now in name, so completely have the processes of deceit in its production been matured during the past three years. The greater portion is now prepared from alcohol of grain, potatoes and beet. Even the brandy merchants are unable to detect the genuine from the false, so clever have the wine growers, who are all distillers, become in the manipulation of the alcohols and the accompanying drugs, and they deliberately make a brandy of any required year or quality! The increasing importation of German potato and beet alcohols into the Charente ports is an additional proof that the less brandy that is consumed the better for the health and intellect of consumers." The Consul goes on in forcible terms to speak of the awful consequences of using such liquids—He says: "Apart from the unsatisfactory purchase of a brandy which is not a brandy, drinkers should seriously consider what are the properties of the liquid they are so complacently imbibing. It is simply an active poison, imported alcohol which is known to the trade as "trios-six", being of 90 deg. strength, and sold at a little less than two shillings and sixpence a gallon. Its characteristic effect is to produce an intoxication in which the patient is specially inclined to rage and physical violence, while insanity of an obstinate and almost hopeless form is the inevitable consequence of a prolonged use of it. It is said that the great increase of violent and brutal crimes in France may be traced to the drinking of this brandy and absinthe. Not only in France but in other countries, and even in the United States, these liquors are producing a condition of alcoholism of the worst kind, far beyond the ordinary drunkenness arising from unadulterated intoxicants." Our opponent The Wine Trade Review may with some show of reason evade the point of the Consul's remark as to the adulteration of wine, and as loudly assert as we might that it is a shame, in fact criminal, to make alcoholic wine worse by the horrible admixture named in his letter and still have room left to declare that good merchants can serve their customers with sound alcoholic wines. He can, however, have no serious excuse for the deliberate swindling alleged against the wine growers in the Charente districts of "La Belle France." They manipulate beet juice and potato alcohols into a liquor called by them cognac or brandy, which they call of some favourite year's vintage, and they do so, so skilfully as to cheat the importers and thus prey upon those who have the misfortune to possess an acquired or hereditary desire for brandy. When the terrible nature of this alcohol is taken into consideration no language can be too strong with which to characterise the wickedness of their conduct. We trust that the fact of such damaging exposures of beer and wine and brandy will not be forgotten by our friends, but will rather stimulate them in their efforts to suppress a traffic which has now become so eminently mischievous and destructive to mankind.

The death of the Earl of Wemyss, and the consequent elevation of Lord Elcho to the peerage, has created a vacancy in the representation of East Lothian. We are exceedingly gratified that the House of Commons that has known his Lordship so long will know him no more. His enforced departure to another place is another sore discouragement to the drink trade, but a great gain to the prohibitory movement. The contest for the seat so far is exceedingly severe, and has produced a deal of bad feeling in the county. The Tory and publican candidate is the present Lord Elcho, who is no friend to temperance although he loudly asserts so. The Liberal and prohibitory candidate is Mr. Finlay, a member of the English bar. Lord Elcho in his address ignores the liquor traffic. Mr. Finlay refers to it in the following terms:—"The cause of temperance will be promoted by me by every means in my power, and I am in favour of such a reform in the licensing laws as will place the regulation and control of licenses in the hands of bodies properly representing the inhabitants." Lord Elcho when asked what views he held offered no hope of his supporting the suppressive veto; Mr. Finlay, on the other hand, has shown a marked growth on that matter, for his views are gliding rapidly into harmony with those aiming at the suppression of the liquor traffic by the ratepayers. Mr. Waterston is engrossed by the contest, and is sanguine that if Mr. Finlay is returned a Scotch veto bill will have his hearty support. We hope, therefore, that the election will turn decisively in Mr. Finlay's favour.

LOCAL OPTION DEMONSTRATION IN EDINBURGH.

A LARGE and enthusiastic meeting was held on the 15th ult., in the Assembly Hall, in favour of local option. The hall was filled in every part, and for the accommodation of those who could not gain admission, St. John's Established Church, Victoria Street, had been secured. In the Assembly Hall, while the audience were assembling, the choir of the Blind Asylum, under the leadership of Mr. J. Campbell Grant, sung a number of sacred pieces, and another choir, led by Mr. William Brown, of the gospel temperance movement, rendered a number of hymns. The singing of both choirs was much appreciated. The chair was taken by Mr. S. D. Waddy, M.P., and among those present were Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P.; Principal Rainy, Professors Calderwood and Blaikie, Provost Pringle, Leith; Sheriff Guthrie Smith, Rev. Dr. Kay, Rev. Dr. Adamson, ex-Bailie Lewis, J. Dick Peddie, M.P.; Sir George Campbell, M.P.; Dr. Moir, Rev. Mr. Lawrie, Tulliallan; Mr. James Sime, Craigmount; Mr. James Balfour, W.S.; Councillors Tait, Ritchie, Walcot, and Turnbull; ex-Bailie Torrens, Glasgow; Colonel Davidson, Captain Mackenzie, Mr. Charles Scott, advocate; Mr. Wm. Martin, and Rev. Dr. Moir Porteous, &c.

The proceedings having been opened with prayer, offered by Professor Blaikie,

Mr. J. H. WATERSTON intimated a number of apologies for absence.

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with loud applause, said he had so many opportunities very lately of making known his views upon the great question of temperance, and upon the particular branch the question of local option, that it became almost unnecessary for him to express his views and opinions upon the subject. He supposed that there could be no doubt that not only the overwhelming majority, but the whole of them present, had the strongest possible opinions in regard to the desirability of spreading temperance and temperance views through the whole of the country. (Loud applause.) The aspect they had to take to-night, to a great extent at all events, limited itself, as he understood it, to the question of local option. Although it was impossible to consider the one question of local option and keep temperance entirely on the one side, yet local option alone appeared to be the object of the resolutions which had brought them there. Now, that was not a moral question alone; it was a political question, and as it was a political question that was mainly why he was there interested in it and concerned in it. In the first place, if they were to consider it fairly, logically, and politically, they must consider it in all its changes—increasing, maintaining, diminishing, abolishing. (Applause.) Now, whatever might be the result of local option, that was a matter which mainly called for political action. The question was, Was the principle they advocated right? Never mind where it would lead them; he was never afraid of following out a right principle. (Applause.) They were there to say this was a matter demanding political action, and that no Government could legislate contrary to the public feeling, sentiment, or demand. When they came to this question of political economy they could not say they were wrong, for they could not forget that they had already taken this very traffic—this liquor or licensing traffic—into their own hands. They had already dealt with it on exceptional principles; and, therefore, it was too late to say that they were warring against the principles of political economy. It was too late to say they must relegate this to the ordinary traffic of trades. Let the people say they demanded these shops; that was all they asked, then supply them, but not until. (Applause.) What he was complaining of was this, that they should give to anybody—any man, or any set of men—the power to supply them before they demanded it, and to compel them to have places whilst they did not demand them. (Applause.) That was just the line which he wanted to take; that was just the line which he was bound to take, and which, if they took it, was impossible for them to be beaten upon. He held they were entitled as an act of principle and justice to this local option. The question came to be simply this, ought the people or ought they not to have the power to deal with this great question of the liquor traffic with regard to licensed houses? Did they want it? (Cries of "Yes.") That was the answer. (Loud applause and laughter.) Having got the power, Mr. Waddy concluded by pointing out the great principle they had to consider whether a particular neighbourhood required public-houses or not? (Applause.) The result, he hoped, would be the suppression of the drink traffic, and when they had brought about that conclusion he considered it would go a long way, indeed, to promote the peace and prosperity of the nation, the happiness of man, and the glory of God. (Loud applause.)

Rev. JOHN CAMPBELL, Buccleuch Parish Church, moved—"That this meeting is of opinion that the traffic in alcoholic liquors entails excessive burdens on the community, and deteriorates the mental power and moral character of the people, and while rejoicing in every effort calculated to mitigate the prevalent evils of intemperance, earnestly calls for such exercises of philanthropic patriotism and Christian zeal as shall result in the removal of a traffic disastrous in its consequences to the nation." Having remarked that if the chairman happened to be one of the citizens of Edinburgh and had their taxes to pay, he would know something about the burdens to the community, Mr. Campbell proceeded to contend that nothing short of the removal of the drink traffic would be the logical end of the present agitation. (Applause.) They were not in this matter trying an experiment. They had begun the movement already, and they must either acknowledge that they were altogether wrong in this matter or they must move on. (Applause.)

EX-BAILIE TORRENS seconded the motion. He was, he said, a little in doubt when the Chairman said that this was purely a political question. He thought it was a moral question as well as a political. (Cheers.) He did not care a snuff about the politics. (Laughter.) The thing was simplicity itself. They had only to bring common sense to bear on the whole question; and he did not know any logic that was worth consideration if it was not common sense. (Cheers.) Local option had been variously defined, but he was persuaded in his mind that, if the Scottish nation were canvassed to-morrow, the local option in a very large number of districts in Scotland would be total prohibition. (Cheers.)

Sir WILFRID LAWSON, who was received with loud cheers, supported the resolution. He appeared at rather an awkward period, because this was the week to which Edinburgh and all the country had looked forward for a long while; and he knew how disappointed they were that the Prime Minister was unfortunately, by indisposition, prevented from coming to Mid-Lothian. (Cheers.) He was sure he expressed the opinion of this meeting, and of the public, when he said that they hoped the Prime Minister's health would soon be re-established. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) They had hoped that the Prime Minister would have been here to tell them what he thought about public events and public policy; they could reverse the process, and tell the Premier what they thought of public policy. And he was sure there was no man who more than Mr. Gladstone would freely confess that that was a duty quite as important as the other. He (Sir Wilfrid) was sure there was no question in the whole range of politics so important as the one which had drawn together this immense meeting. (Cheers.) He was very happy to think that the importance of this question was now more largely recognised than ever it had been in this country. He was happy to say that at last they had had a downright temperance sentence put into the Speech from the Throne. (Cheers.) Of course, the Queen there spoke as expressing the opinions of her Ministers; but they knew that the Queen did take an interest in this herself, for she had long been the patroness of the Church of England Temperance Society. (Cheers.) He believed it was the only instance they could find where a Sovereign of this country gave her sanction to any political association; because every association which had for its object the altering of the laws of the land was more or less a political association. When he heard the sentence to which he had alluded read in the speech as he sat in the House of Lords, a member behind him gave him a great punch in the back—(laughter)—and when he was walking back to the House of Commons the members kept talking at him, and saying, "Why, Lawson, that was put in for you." (Laughter.) What he heard was this—"The growth of the revenue, however, was sensibly retarded by a cause which must in itself be contemplated with satisfaction. I refer to the diminution in the receipts of the Exchequer from the duties on intoxicating liquors." (Cheers.) It was a very remarkable thing to put into a Queen's Speech—rejoicing that a certain trade had been depressed. Was ever such a thing heard before? (Laughter.) Supposing she had said, "I am happy to say that the cotton trade has been in a very depressed condition for the last six months," why, the Radical members from all the great towns would have made a noise which would have turned the Government out. (Laughter.) Or, "I rejoice to tell you that the landed interest and the farmers have suffered dreadfully." (Laughter.) He did not think the Throne itself would have been worth half a year's purchase—the great landlords would have made a revolution. But every one seemed quite pleased to hear that the poor publicans had been making less money than ever they had done before. (Cheers.) Did not that show them what strides they were making in this matter? Why, it was only in 1874 that those estimable gentlemen, the publicans, were supreme. They returned a House of Commons of their own. (Laughter.) How are the mighty fallen! (Cheers and laughter.) Was there one there who did not feel sure that the temperance reformers were now marching on the Queen's highway to victory. (Cheers.) But, after all, the diminution to which he had alluded was very small. He saw, indeed, that the sentence in the Queen's Speech, to which he had referred, had been explained away in a letter in the publicans' organ, the Morning Advertiser, in this way, that the people had not been drinking less, but that the publicans had been adulterating the liquor. (Laughter.) The newspapers were bringing this matter more distinctly and clearly before the public than ever they did before, and he thanked the Scotsman for doing good service in telling the truth about the matter. He did not care a straw what a newspaper wrote, so long as it gave them facts. Sir Wilfrid went on to refer, amid cheers, to the fact that under an Act passed last session for doing away with "off" licenses in England, the Judges had declared authoritatively that a publican had no interest whatever in his license at the expiration of the time for which he was licensed—namely, one year; and remarked that they did not propose to rob any of them of their property, but when at the end of the year the publican came to get his license renewed, let the people say whether it was to be granted or not. (Cheers.) Their demand was the very essence of simplicity. On that subject he had read a speech the other day by the present Lord Elcho, who, they knew, was aspiring to a seat in the House of Commons. (Hisses.) Well, they had nothing to do with his politics—(laughter)—only with his views on local option. He was heckled on this the other day, and Lord Elcho said he would do everything he could to forward the views of Rev. Mr. Jones (that was the questioner on the temperance question, so long as he did not wish him to interfere with the liberty of the subject. But (said Sir Wilfrid) they did not want to interfere with the liberty of the subject; they wanted to interfere with the licence of the subject—(laughter)—which was a different thing. Lord Elcho went on to say that he could not go with Sir Wilfrid Lawson to allow the people in any place to vote upon the licences, because he said, "Look here, you might have a parish or district where half the men were rich"—and Lord Elcho described a rich man who filled his cellars with beer, rum, and whisky. (Laughter.) That was his idea of happiness and riches. (Renewed laughter.) The other half of the parish might be poor, and would it be right, Lord Elcho asked, to allow the rich men to outvote the poor men to prevent their getting a glass of whisky toddy—(laughter)—and when Lord Elcho referred to that, the Scotsman—he (Sir Wilfrid) always quoted the Scotsman—(laughter)—said it was received with uproarious cheers. Well, now, he was going to make a proposition to his lordship, and if he accepted it, they would perhaps agree better than he thought. Lord Elcho did not want rich men to vote; well, let him bring in a bill to disfranchise the rich men—(laughter)—say, that nobody should vote for having public-houses in the district who had £100 a year. He (Sir Wilfrid) would get on much better than they did now. (Cheers.) The public-houses would be soon swept away. It was only the rich people—very few else—who wished to keep up this drinking system. If Lord Elcho would vote for a measure of that kind, local option men might make up their minds to support him, for he was not far from the kingdom. (Laughter.) He thought from what Lord Elcho had said in a subsequent speech that if ever his lordship got to the House of Commons—"No, no," and "Yes, yes"—he thought he would be a little improvement on his excellent father, upon whom, as they knew, the mantle of Mr. Wheelhouse fell when that gentleman left the House of Commons. (Laughter.) In the latter part of his speech, Sir Wilfrid pointed out that the principle of Local Option was already established in reference to other matters, and expressed pleasure that Edinburgh had elected Mr. Waddy, who had been a tried friend of the movement when it was not so popular as it was now, and referred to the progress which the question had made as shown by the votes in the House of Commons. On the last division they had, he reminded them that forty-one Scotch Liberals voted in his favour, and only one against him. That one was a Scotch member, but he was not a Scotchman. He had a shrewd suspicion that there were a good many of his constituents there; and it would hurt them very much to think that, though they could trust him with their interests, he could not trust them with such a little power as to say whether they would have public-houses in their neighbourhoods or not. (Slight hissing.) He further expressed regret at the uncertain sound given by Lord Derby the other day on this question, and asked if this greatest of reforms was to stand over until it suited the convenience of insincere honourable gentlemen and indifferent noble lords? (Hisses and cheers.) In conclusion, Sir Wilfrid said everything was in their favour, both in Parliament and out of it. For a time they had managed to stop people killing one another in Ireland, and for a time we had stopped ourselves from killing people in Egypt. Besides the House of Commons had put its house in order. They had set to work, and they intended to do business in a business-like way. And what business could they do better than an attack upon the great drink interest. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, speaking in Scotland the other day, said about drink, "it was for the Legislature now to do its part." He (Sir Wilfrid) was of the same opinion, that the temperance reformers had the first claim upon Parliament and the Government. There was no question that was so much supported out of doors as their question; and he wanted to ask this—Was the Government going to teach this horrible lesson, that everything shall be conceded to violence, to agitation, and to outrage, and that nothing shall be conceded to the people when they demanded it in an orderly and constitutional manner? (Loud applause.)

The motion, having been put to the meeting, was carried by acclamation.

Rev. Dr. ADAMSON moved—"That this meeting is convinced that, owing to the advanced public sentiment on liquor legislation in Scotland, no measure will be satisfactory which does not confer on the ratepayers the entire control of the liquor traffic in their respective localities; and pledges itself to obtain from Parliament at the earliest possible moment the power to prevent liquor shops being forced on unwilling communities." Wishing to bring matters to a practical conclusion, he would request the chairman and his companion in arms, Mr. Buchanan, and other members of Parliament, to embody this resolution in a bill to be introduced into Parliament for Scotland in the ensuing session. In his opinion if that were done the moral, religious, and educational part not only of Edinburgh, but of the whole country of Scotland would be found behind them, brave men and whole hearts, who would not go back from the charge until they had carried the question. The time for talk was over, and they must now have action. Scotland, he held, was governed by Churches, and there was not a Presbytery, Synod, or Assembly that had not in one form or other petitioned Parliament or expressed their mind on local option. (Applause.)

Sheriff GUTHRIE SMITH, in seconding the resolution, pointed out that the Court of Queen's Bench had recently decided that the magistrates had the power of taking away a man's license for no other reason than that his premises were no longer wanted in his locality. He believed both country and town magistrates would be quite disposed to surrender their existing authority and hand it over to the community. As to the objection with regard to the multiplication of the number of local boards, he had faith that his fellow-citizens would not neglect a duty which would so deeply affect the national prosperity as the promotion of national sobriety. No law ever effected its object which was in advance of the popular sentiment; and it was by reforming the licensing laws, acting more rigidly in the reduction of the number of public-houses, that they hoped to bring into play that general consensus of opinion by which the extinction of public-houses would be effected.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. JAMES ROBERTSON, Bread Street United Presbyterian Church, moved—"That copies of the foregoing resolutions be signed by the chairman, and forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Lord Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and the Scotch members of Parliament; and that it be remitted to the committee who arranged for this meeting to take such steps as they think necessary to press the claims of this movement upon the Government and others interested." Referring to what he called young Lord Elcho's lisping about the rights of working men, as if these would be invaded by temperance legislation, the rev. gentleman said they were just seeking to bring about those very rights to working men, so that no influence of a few monied men should be able to establish drunkenness. (Cheers.)

Mr. CHARLES SCOTT, advocate, seconded the motion, remarking that he believed with one slight exception it would be as great a pleasure for those named in the last resolution to receive the resolutions as it was for the meeting to send them.

Principal RAINY moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, this being seconded by Provost ANDERSON, St. Andrews, who corroborated Sheriff Smith's statement as to the feeling of the magistrates in this matter. He said one of the most painful positions he occupied was the bench of the Licensing Court, and he would be delighted when the power was taken out of his hands altogether.

The motion was carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN (who had returned after addressing the overflow meeting, reported below, his place in the chair being taken in the interval by Mr. Buchanan, M.P.), in replying to the compliment, said he was delighted to think that his first appearance as member for Edinburgh before an Edinburgh audience was on behalf of a cause so good as this. It would greatly strengthen his hands in anything he might say or do on behalf of local option in the House of Commons to have the memory green in his heart of such a meeting.

The hon. gentleman on leaving the meeting to catch the night train for Newcastle, was cheered by the assemblage.

On the motion of Provost MACPHERSON, Grangemouth, seconded by the Rev. Dr. KAY, a vote of thanks was given to the Committee of Arrangements.

The Rev. Mr. MEREDITH then pronounced the benediction, and the meeting terminated.

OVERFLOW MEETING IN ST. JOHN'S PARISH CHURCH.

St. John's Established Church, Victoria Street, had been secured for the emergency which occurred, that of an overcrowded meeting in the Assembly Hall, and the overflow began to occupy the church soon after seven o'clock, by which time the area of the church and gallery were well occupied. A choir of ladies and gentlemen sang with much appreciation a variety of sacred and temperance melodies, a solo by a lady being loudly applauded. Miss Burton, Mr. Buchanan, M.P., and Mr. Waterston were recognised and cordially received; the Rev. Mr. Jones, Tranent, Bailie Selkirk and Mr. R. Mackay, Glasgow, being also present. Mr. Buchanan took the chair, and the Rev. Mr. Jones opened the meeting with prayer.

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with cheers, said one of the most pleasant duties the member for a constituency had to perform was to take the chair at such a meeting as this. If this temperance movement went on in succeeding years with the strides it had been going on in the past years, they might require three instead of two meetings, and give another argument for Edinburgh having a third member to preside. (Laughter and applause.) The temperance cause had made greater strides the last few years than it had ever done before. They found evidence of it in the Queen's Speech and in the taxation returns. At last it turned out that the work they had been engaged in was beginning to tell actually upon the consumption of drink in the country. (Applause.) He did not wonder at the advance of the temperance cause, or that those who had borne the heat of the battle should be much elated with the success of their efforts. They could all join with them and sympathise with them, now that they were marching forward to greater triumphs which were doubtless in store for them. Yet it would not do to shut their eyes and think there was nothing more to be done. It was not far from this meeting place where the veil was drawn aside to see that drink and drunkenness was still as powerful and debasing as ever it was. That very morning, in the newspapers, they would have seen the account of a most interesting paper read at the Workmen's Institute by his friend, Miss Burton. (Applause.) They had there a most graphic account by one who had devoted herself to actual intercourse with those who were the greatest slaves of drink in the city. He could not help looking at this subject from a legislative point of view. He should like to point out to them and to all the ardent supporters of this cause, that the present Parliament is growing old. It had been more favourable to the temperance cause than any other—(applause)—but, notwithstanding that, it had not done very much. They had affirmed twice by large majorities what was known as the local option resolution, a very excellent thing, but it was as yet nothing more than what had been described by another statesman as "a pious opinion." He hoped they should get something out of the present Parliament. He did not wish to counsel them to repose solely upon the Government. He thought they ought, but he did not think that there was very much prospect of the Government immediately taking up this question; but if they in Scotland could present any proposition that the Government would look at and say they would not oppose, then they might be very sure it would be carried through Parliament, because he thought he might say this on behalf of the Liberal Scotch members, that there would be no downright opposition from them as long as they were sure the Government would not oppose such a bill, and if it received the support of the temperance reformers throughout the country. (Applause.)

Mr. WATERSTON moved the first resolution in regard to the evils of the liquor traffic, and pointed to the fact that insurance companies looked now upon the life of a teetotaler as twelve years longer than those who were not. They would not insure the lives of drunkards. Referring to the police, prison, and parochial assessments, he maintained that if they had to pay the piper they should have the power to say who the piper was to be, where he was to stand, and what he had to play. (Laughter and applause.)

Baillie SELKIRK, J.P., Glasgow, who was well received, seconded, and advised moral suasion to the individual, but, in dealing with any evil, they must see they were applying suitable remedies, and these could only be obtained by legislation. If two tradesmen were to meet on business, he had no wish and no right to interfere unless their business affected him, and then he had a right to interfere. Now, the publican and his customers could not meet and do business long without involving ruin in the consequences of their transactions. (Applause.) The legislation that he wanted was not licensing or restrictive or regulative, it was suppressive. (Applause.) He would vest the power of excluding the liquor traffic in the ratepayers, and thus honour their judgment and ability. The suppression of the liquor traffic would inaugurate an era of happiness and prosperity unparalleled in the history of the country. (Applause.)

Mr. WADDY, M.P., who had entered the hall and taken the chair vacated by Mr Buchanan, M.P., put the resolution to the meeting. On a show of hands, he declared that there was only one against it. "Among the faithful, faithless only he." (Laughter.) As far as his (Mr. Waddy's) experience went that night, Edinburgh wanted one public-house for one man. (Laughter.) He thought it according to the commonest principle of political economy that they should have this local option legislation; and if the working classes were ever to be what they hoped to make them, this must be obtained for the whole country, and put an end to drunkenness. (Applause.)

The Rev. JOHN CAMPBELL moved the second resolution, that no measure would be satisfactory that did not confer upon the ratepayers the entire control of the liquor traffic.

Miss BURTON, who was received with applause, seconded the resolution. She referred to her experiences among the lower classes in the city debased by drunkenness, and to the fact of their earning wages that might keep them and their families comfortably. These people were thrown upon their bounty; workmen with no better wages were taxed to support them, and therefore it was they claimed a right to interfere and object to public-houses. (Applause.) She knew of one man spending £10 in a drinking bout, and she told of having gone to see another paid his wages, and she escorted him home to give them to his wife. But one could not escort every weak man home to save his wages from the public-house. (Laughter and applause.) It was said that the rich man had his wine cellar and sideboard. Quite true: but he kept them very strictly under lock and key. (Laughter.) The liquors sold by the publican were left open for every passer-by. (Applause.) Mr Waddy had said that he believed if the women had their will the traffic would soon cease. Unfortunately wives and daughters went to the public-house, but she believed that if women had some voice in the Legislature it would be a great help to the temperance cause. (Applause.)

Sir WILFRID LAWSON having entered, amidst loud cheering, briefly supported the resolution, and pointing to the Sunday Closing Bills of Ireland and Wales, said he did not see why Scotland should not take the lead with a measure of local option. He would support it, and go on agitating till they got it for the whole country. (Applause.)

The resolution was adopted, and the meeting agreed to their being sent to the Premier, the Lord Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and the Scotch members. A vote of thanks to Mr. Buchanan, on the motion of Mr. R. Mackay, for presiding terminated the proceedings shortly after ten o'clock.

Sir Walter Scott in giving a cardriver a shilling when the fare was only sixpence said "Remember you owe me sixpence." "May your honour live till I pay you."

THE PARLIAMENTARY RECESS.

James Stewart, Esq., M.P., speaking at Greenock on 26th December, on the measures affecting Scotland passed last session, said, "Among the measures passed was the Passengers Vessels Licensing Bill, which he hoped would put an end to the brutal and disgraceful scenes which have been witnessed too often on board of some of the river steamboats." (Cheers.)

The Lord Advocate, addressing his constituents at Alloa on 28th December, said, "There was the bill which was directed to put down a great evil—the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday on board passenger steamers on the rivers and estuaries of Scotland. (Cheers.) They had all heard of the scandalous scenes which used to occur, chiefly on the Clyde, on that day. It was almost a national disgrace that such a state of things should go on unchecked, and accordingly a bill was introduced and carried, providing that the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue should have power to endorse upon the license of river steamers a prohibition against trading on the Sunday. (Cheers.) Some people put the question why a bill was not framed in the form of an absolute and unequivocal prohibition of all selling of drink upon any steamer either leaving or arriving at Scotland on Sunday. There was a very plain and practical reason which led them to adopt the form of bill they did. There were many steamers, sea-going and otherwise, which left and arrived at Scotland on that day, and there were others—not excursion steamers but traders—going long voyages, like those running between Leith and Orkneys, which by accident might be obliged to put in, or from some other cause might have come within the scope of an absolute prohibition, while they did not at all fall within the range of the mischief which was intended to be put down. (Hear, hear.) And accordingly he hoped and believed that by another summer, the fair estuaries and firths which surround our coasts, would not be disgraced, as he was sorry to say they had been in the past, in this matter. (Cheers.)

On the 30th December his lordship, addressing his constituents at Alva, said with regard to the temperance question, Undoubtedly the action of those who were moving in the direction of introducing habits of greater temperance, was already producing fruit, and that in the most marked and unmistakable way—he meant prosaic but very conclusive evidence of the public acts. After quoting figures given by Mr. Gladstone, showing that the revenue had decreased from 51 per cent. in 1874-5 to 46½ per cent. in 1881-2, he continued with reference to the question of farther legislation on the matter. They knew that on at least two occasions there had been, in general terms, a very emphatic affirmation by the present Parliament of the principle known by the name of local option, but they must keep in view the fact that under the general resolution there existed a very great difference of opinion as to the precise methods of giving effect to what was involved in it. He ventured to say that it would be very desirable if those who had been taking an active part in temperance affairs, would endeavour to come to perhaps a more practical agreement than at present existed among many of them, as to the particular measure which they would desire or expect Parliament to pass, because they had seen that when particular measures, the general principles of which had been adopted, were attempted to be put into the form of a bill, very wide differences at once appeared. He thought that the form in which the measure should be introduced by those interested in that matter, should be expressed and made the subject of consideration and discussion, because at present there was rather a prevalent feeling in many quarters—in Parliament and elsewhere—that if any bill which was likely to secure an amount of support which would probably make it become law were introduced, it would not meet with the approval, but probably with the opposition, of those who took a more decided or advanced view on that subject. They very well knew that in this world, but particularly in the legislative world, what was to be considered was, in the first instance, what is practicable.

Captain Maxwell Heron, M.P., addressed a meeting of his constituents at Dalbeattie, on the 18th ult. He referred to the temperance question as follows:—He hoped that we would soon have a County Roads Bill, under which the government of counties would be entrusted to representative bodies. Such a bill would afford a very good opportunity for embodying in it a new principle of licensing. He knew there were a great many gentlemen in Dalbeattie very much interested in the temperance movement, and he was bound to say that he sympathised very much with their views. He considered it most unfortunate that so much suffering and so much loss should be occasioned in this country by the excessive use of intoxicating drink. (Cheers.) We had reason to congratulate ourselves that the revenue derived from excisable liquors had very much fallen off this last year. (Cheers.) After alluding to intemperance and its fruits, lunacy and poverty, he said there was no doubt that legislation upon the subject was called for. Therefore, when this County Government Bill came before the House of Commons there would be, he hoped, a provision dealing with the licensing laws, and embodying the principle of local option. (Cheers.) That principle had been affirmed by the House of Commons on several occasions, and they must legislate upon it. (Cheers.)—Dumfries and Galloway Standard.

Messrs. P. B. McKill and A. Bennet, of Dumfries, addressed the Band of Hope soiree at Kirkmahoe, on Thursday, 18th ult., the Rev W. Anderson presiding.

Rev. Dr. Adamson and Rev. John Pirie, and Messrs. J. Darling and G. A. Barclay, addressed the annual soiree of the Roslin Total Abstinence Society, on Monday, 22nd ult.

An American writer states as the result of inquiry into the point, that all the Baptist, Methodist, and Congregational churches in Chicago use unfermented wine in the Lord's supper.

It is not often we find ourselves in the same boat with the publicans, but, like us, they are exposing the swindling practices of those who are selling alcoholic liquors under temperance names.

The Paisley Magistrates have made public intimation that they intend to instruct their police to report public-houses whence drunk men issue, with a view to convict such publicans of a violation of their certificate.

A SAD STATEMENT.—Dr. Danford Thomas remarked at an inquest on a woman who died from drinking, that, judging from the number of cases that came before him, the evil of secret drinking among women was on the increase.

Greenock has become notorious for the number of her shebeens. Well, there would be no shebeens if the publicans were allowed to sell all night; and there would be no drinking if the publican and the shebeener could sell neither night nor day.

Professor Coates, the Glasgow phrenologist, is giving at present a course of lectures on health and character, every Friday night in his Rooms, Royalty Buildings, 62 Sauchiehall Street. Temperance—to use an American phrase is one of the planks in his platform of principles.

Mr. W. Blackwood, the northern superintendent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, has an excellent letter in the Aberdeen Daily Free Press on the remarks made by the Earl of Aberdeen on local option at a meeting of the Junior Liberal Association, held in Aberdeen last month.

From a Parliamentary return issued on 5th ult., it appears that the total number of electors on the registers of the counties of England and Wales in 1881 was 932,643; of Scotland 98,448; and of Ireland 168,207; the total number of county electors in the United Kingdom thus being 1,199,298.

Mr. Andrew Glendinning of the Apple Tree Vegetarian Restaurant, 24 London Wall, who along with Mr. T. I. White was the first to start a Juvenile Temperance Society in Glasgow, held his annual soiree of employees last month. Mr. Glendinning was long and favourably known in the West of Scotland, and many friends in Port-Glasgow will be glad to hear so favourably of their old friend.

A FILTER.—A cheap and simple filter may be made by taking a large common flower pot, thoroughly soaking it in clean water first, and then filling it up in the following way:—Plug the hole at the bottom with a piece of sponge, not too tightly; put on this a layer of animal charcoal, then a layer of clean sand, and on the top a layer of coarse clean gravel. It will require careful looking after, and that it will be always a clean and a good filter.

The price of porter is to be raised by the Messrs. Guinness, the Dublin brewers. The trade in Belfast believing that they had no reason for charging 4s. 6d. on a barrel of their porter, when the increase of hops was not 3d. or certainly not 6d. a barrel, resolved to charge their porter 2½d., while selling Belfast porter at the old price of 2d. These publicans are of opinion that porter is food, and if the price is raised, there will be a famine in Belfast!

ARBROATH—GOSPEL TEMPERANCE UNION.—This union held its annual business meeting on Tuesday, 2nd ult. The attendance numbered nearly 700. There are 6,529 abstainers on the roll. The income is £132 15s. 4d., the balance to carry forward £2 7s. 2d. After a number of congratulatory speeches a new committee of forty was elected, Mr. William Briggs being chairman, and Rev. D. Galbraith, secretary. [The number on the Roll makes just 30 per cent. of the population; it outnumbers all the inhabited houses in the burgh, and is double the parliamentary and municipal constituency.—Ed. S.R.]

A DRACONIAN LAW AGAINST DRINK.—The Danes are conducting a vigorous war against drunkenness in their capital, Copenhagen. The number of public-houses is to be reduced from 1350 to 300. No showily-dressed girl is to be allowed to stand behind a drinking bar to fascinate youth of the other sex. Landlords are forbidden to serve out drink to any person under 18 years of age, male or female, or to any one already under the influence of drink. A drunken person is to be conveyed to his own dwelling in a cab or covered carriage at the expense of the landlord in whose house he took the last glass.

EAST LOTHIAN ELECTION.—This electoral contest promises to be of the keenest character, and there can be no question which of the two candidates, Mr. Finlay or Lord Elcho, is most deserving of support. The former is hand-and-glove with the local optionists and extreme teetotal fanatics, pledged to do their bidding and aid the schemes of injustice and oppression which these parties promulgate, the end and aim of which is simply the abolition of the spirit trade of the kingdom. On the other hand, Lord Elcho is opposed to any such destruction of the property and vested interests of the trade, and will, like his father before him, assist in preserving these rights which the trade have for centuries possessed. The issue before the electors on this particular point is therefore plain and unmistakable; and we trust that a unanimous vote on the polling by our friends, in favour of Lord Elcho, will be equally so.—National Liquor Trades Guardian.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.—A temperance demonstration was held in the Institute Hall on New Year's night under the auspices of the Grangemouth Branch of the Blue Ribbon Army. The hall was completely filled—the gathering, perhaps, being the largest that has been ever seen in Grangemouth on such an occasion. The decorations in the way of evergreens, flags, &c., in which the hall was robed, were finely executed, and really reflected great credit on those who had carried them out. Hugh Macpherson, Esq., Chief Magistrate, was in the chair, and after a fine tea, provided by Mr. M'Hardie, had been disposed of, the Chairman addressed the meeting on the evils resulting from the drinking customs of the liquor traffic, and on the great progress made by the temperance cause during the year, and in connection especially with the Gospel Temperance movement. After noticing, as one of the most cheering signs of progress, the disuse of intoxicating liquors in the leading lines of ocean steamers, Mr. Macpherson concluded by expressing his earnest hope that the practical outcome of their meeting that night would be a decided advance in the temperance cause in Grangemouth. Addresses in connection with temperance were subsequently delivered by Rev. Mr. Cumming, Grangemouth; Mr. Paul, Falkirk; Mr. George Davies, merchant, Edinburgh; and Mr. D. Melvin, evangelist. During the evening Miss Cowan, Miss Wright, and Captain Reid sang solos, and Miss Yeats tastefully presided at the harmonium. The soiree was brought to a close with the usual votes of thanks.—Falkirk Herald.

A CLERGYMAN ON DRINK AT ELECTIONS.—Speaking at a temperance meeting held in Stirling on Monday evening, the Rev. John M'Queen, M.A., of Free St. Andrew's, Kilmarnock, after comparing the condition of a "slave of strong drink" with that of the African when in slavery, went on to say that if you wished the approval of such a one you must appeal, not to his reason, not to his heart, not to his conscience, but to his love of strong drink. Was it not a terrible thing, he asked, that in our municipal and parliamentary elections success so much depends on the use of strong drink. It was not the arguments a man could bring forward, it was not the record he could show, it was not the promises he could give, but oftentimes the number of public houses he could open that would make him succeed. He who would win Scotchmen to his will must not appeal, as he had said, to their reason, heart, or conscience, nor to their love of country, but to their eager craving for drink. Drink settled all controversy, drink won the day.—Daily Review.

HIGHLAND TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.—The annual business meeting of the directors of the Highland Temperance League was held at Oban yesterday—Mr. Allan of Aros, president, in the chair. The report for the year 1882 was highly satisfactory. The income for the year was £676, and the expenditure £680, which includes £110 of an old debt. During the year the lecturers gave the blue ribbon to 8,948 persons. The actual members of the League numbers, with affiliated societies, 7,500. The League employs three regular lecturers working both in Gaelic and English throughout the Highlands. The annual meeting of the members of the League was fixed to take place at Inverness, on Wednesday August, 1st.—Daily Review.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND TEMPERANCE SOCIETY—GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND BRANCH.—A conference and public meeting at the instance of this branch took place on the 22nd December, just as we went to press with our January issue. The conference occupied three hours, and but for the length of the time consumed in opening up the subject a greater interchange of sentiment would have taken place. The first was devoted to woman's work, and Rev. Mr. Wilson gave an admirable address. The second hour was occupied with the Church's duty to the temperance movement. The subject was treated very mildly indeed by Rev. Dr. Elder Cumming and Mr. Maughan. Mr. R. Mackay gave it as his opinion that the Church should, in the spirit of the report of the Venerable Assembly of 1849, take up the matter as they did their missions, and send deputations to all churches; that ministers should frown down drinking at baptisms, marriages, funerals, and ordination dinners, introduce unfermented wine at the Communion—(hear and hisses)—increase the stringency of their sessional discipline for drunkenness, as those offending if checked in an early stage would be easier enlisted into ranks of the abstainers. He believed that such a course of action on the part of the Church would accelerate the progress of the cause and hasten the time when the Church would effectually combine its forces against the drink system. (Applause.) The third hour was devoted to the consideration of parochial organisations. The proceedings were most encouraging; and a Woman's Temperance Association, it is expected, will be formed immediately.—In the evening a fairly-attended public meeting was held like the conference in the Christian Institute, and was addressed by, amongst others, Dr. Campbell, M.P., Mr. Dalrymple, M.P., Mr. Cochran-Patrick, M.P., Mr. J. N. Cutherbertson, Rev. Dr. Lang, &c. The resolutions were more strongly drawn than the speeches in their support. Mr. J. N. Cutherbertson gave the only decided expression of conviction in favour of a direct veto on the liquor traffic. We will have much more decided advocacy of suppression for the liquor traffic before the Church takes hold of her flocks in the west. At present the pew is more advanced than the pulpit.

MOFFAT.—A meeting of the Blue Ribbon Army was held in the Baths Assembly Hall on Tuesday, 16th ult. Mr. Kennedy, president of the Society, occupied the chair, and briefly introduced Mr. Bennett, Dumfries, and Mr. Chick, of the Scottish Temperance League, who addressed the meeting. In the course of his remarks Mr. Bennett said the cause had, all over the country, made greater progress during the past eighteen months than in any similar period since the commencement of the temperance reform agitation, and that many men of position were now joining the cause. He reminded them of the fact of the revenue derived from alcoholic drinks having decreased to such a large extent during the past year that the subject had been noticed in the Queen's Speech at the close of the last session of Parliament. With reference to the cry that is now being raised in certain quarters, What is to become of the revenue if temperance goes on increasing? he would remind them that the larger portion of crime and pauperism is caused by drink, and therefore if the cause is lessened so will the effects, and less taxes will be required. A large portion of the revenue of the country was derived from intoxicating drinks, but this was not the only source of revenue; and stamps, income-tax, and the post-office had all been yielding more revenue of late years than ever they had done before. A number of the Terminable Annuities would terminate in 1885, and Mr. Gladstone had promised not to renew them, so that there seemed to be no fear of raising the revenue if total abstinence were much more common than it was at present. The termination of these annuities would be the saving of six millions per annum. In another ten years he thought the drink traffic would be reduced by more than one half. Many towns were now prepared to vote for the total abolition of the traffic. Mr. Chick afterwards addressed the meeting, but not in such hopeful terms as Mr. Bennett. The usual votes of thanks terminated the proceedings.—Moffat Times (abridged.)

TRYING TO GET OUT OF A DIFFICULTY.—A man who was being examined for a school teacher in Maine, after stumbling through some simple arithmetical problem, was asked where Boston is. He answered, "I know all about it, probably as well as you do; have heard of the place several times, but can't, somehow or other, seem to locate it." With a view to helping him out, the committeeman said, "It is the capital of some State, is it not?" "Yes, I believe it is." "What State?" "Well, I know, probably, as well as you do, what State Boston is the capital of, but you see I haven't got the flow of language to express it."

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. R. DARROCH, GLASGOW.—It is with no ordinary regret that we learned that this staunch prohibitionist has departed this life. He died on the 16th ult, aged 58 years. Mr. Darroch was as true as steel, and as ardent as the most ardent for the abolition of the drink system, and we are sincerely sorry to think that we shall see his face and hear his voice no more.

THE LATE DR. ALEXANDER MUNRO, SOUTH DEVON.—One of the best beloved of men is lost to humanity and the world in the person of this widely known philanthropist. Dr. Munro died at South Devon on Old New Year's Day, at the ripe old age of 73 years. He felt so well, that he remarked he saw no reason why he should not live to be an hundred and then die of euthanasia; but the cord snapped suddenly, the bowl was broken in an instant, and the good old man passed peacefully behind the veil. His life was devoted to healing the body and the soul. At Blackhills he soothed the pains and averted the sorrows of his little flock. At Aberdeen he entered more prominently into the practice of hydropathy, and his institution at Lochhead became famous. He went to Forres, and the place at Aberdeen gave way to the well-known hydropathic establishment at Clunyhill, Forres, and the famed establishment at Strathearn, Crieff. At the Waverley, Melrose, he was stationed for some time, and went again to Clunyhill, then he was at an establishment in South Devon, where his decease has taken place. Dr. Munro has more than any man popularised hydropathy in Scotland, and his professional advice on this subject and on health have endeared him to thousands to whom his services have proved a blessing. He has seen many water cure establishments erected, but still he was reaching out to secure some means for a cheaper system than such costly resorts which are quite beyond the reach of the suffering poor. As a temperance reformer few excelled him; he gave the movement his assistance in its early days, and by his clear and lucid treatment of the subject in its personal, social, and political bearings, he hastened its progress and contributed greatly to draw the attention of those among whom he moved to its advantages and expectations. He has for long been a vice-president of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and gave it his liberal support and his service many times during the course of his long and useful life.

THE LATE MRS. J. J. COOPER, CORWEN, MERIONETH, WALES.—We were truly sorry to hear of the death of this estimable lady, who died on the 23rd Dec. While in Scotland she devoted herself to the advancement of the temperance cause, and was ready to spend and be spent in its behalf. Her husband, Rev. J. J. Cooper, a devoted advocate of the cause, found in her a true yoke-fellow, and we deeply sympathize with him in his sorrow, for the loss of one so earnest in a work that lay so near to his heart. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association was under deep obligation to her many times for her valued co-operation and her kindness at all times to its representatives.

THE LATE MR. WM. HOPE, CARSTAIRS.—Through the death of Mr. William Hope the temperance reformation has lost a steadfast friend. For the past twenty years it has had his assistance and his prayers. He took an abiding interest in its affairs, and being a man of excellent Christian character he recommended it by his example and life to all around him. He suffered from that fell disease bronchitis, to which he eventually succumbed. His death before he had reached his 50th year will be a loss to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, to whom from the first he was warmly attached, and also to the district around Carstairs where he has long resided, and by the people of which he is deeply regretted.

THE LATE MRS. JOHNSTONE, PERTH.—A warm and attached friend of the temperance reformation has passed away in the person of Mrs. Johnstone of Perth. Like her bereaved husband, she was always ready to aid the cause in every possible way. She was one of the women who understood and appreciated the efforts of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. Recognising the necessity for a popular vote, she hailed the political temperance movement as the precursor of the doom of the liquor traffic. Personal abstinence was practised by her as a matter of right and duty; her sympathies, however, did not rest here, for she pressed its claims with great earnestness upon others. While doing this she ever felt that as long as the system of license was sanctioned, and upheld by the State, national sobriety could not be attained. Mrs. Johnstone's political doctrine was that with the removal of the drink traffic, other valuable reforms would be speedily secured. Well could she meet an opponent of the Permissive Bill and shatter his arguments with her plain common sense. Vulgar songs in connection with temperance meetings roused her indignation, and we have seen her reproofs sometimes not taken in the best way, but she never failed to show that only healthy music and sound teaching could be of value to the temperance movement. Prohibition would be hastened if her mantle would fall on the temperance women of Scotland.

THE LATE ROBERT HAY, ESQ., PERTH.—Death has removed from our midst one of the most sterling of temperance reformers in the person of Mr. Hay. He died at the ripe age of 75 years. About a year ago he was prostrated by a paralytic seizure and never rallied, death relieving him from his sufferings on the 26th Dec. last. When twenty years ago we first met him, he had no saucy doubts and fears about the result of the efforts then being made in behalf of the temperance and prohibitory movement. With the light now shed on the question, and with all the progress made by it, there are few in our day who are more sanguine of success than Mr. Hay was then, and continued to be until the advance of age abated his interests in public affairs. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association deeply sympathise with his family in their bereavement.

THE LATE MR. JOHN MELROSE, EDINBURGH.—This much respected citizen died at his residence, Churchhill, on the 10th ult. at the age of 68. He has left a widow to mourn her heavy loss. Mr. Melrose, through not being robust, seldom took part in public life, but he did much good in a generous unobtrusive manner. He believed in the dissemination of religious and pure literature and supported the colporteur system unstintedly. He strongly sympathised with the temperance movement in its prohibitory aspect, and in him moral and religious movements have lost a friend.

THE LATE MR. JAMES WILKINSON, GLASGOW.—On the 18th December this highly esteemed temperance reformer passed away. He had long been in failing health, and was but 60 years of age at his decease. Mr. Wilkinson was one of the most popular advocates of temperance in the city up till a few years ago, when he was constrained by his waning energy to give up his genial labours in the good work. In Spruel's Court, in Bedford Street, at the meetings of the Commercial T. A. Society, meeting in Stockwell Street, he was always a prominent favourite. He was for a long time connected with the Abstainers' Union, over whose directorate he presided with ability and discretion. For some time he was a member of the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, which had his generous support. Latterly he withdrew from the Executive, and even from the membership of the Association, on the ground of its policy to vote for no man, be his politics what they may, who would not vote for the Permissive Bill. The Executive, though they regretted this step on his part, felt that it must have cost him much to take it, and respected him for his consistency. In common with numbers they deeply regret his comparatively early death.

THE LATE MR. THOMAS BLAIR, HOPRIGG MAINS, TRANENT.—It is with no ordinary regret that we have to record the death of this genuine temperance reformer, who died on the 10th ult., after having reached the allotted span of human life, 70 years. He was the last of three brothers and a sister who were unwearied in their efforts to advance the interests of temperance and prohibition. In Arbroath, Couisland, or Tranent his ear was open at all times to the records and claims of temperance, and he readily entered into any effort having for its object its promotion. He was of opinion that the people ought to be entrusted with power to exclude the liquor traffic, and heartily supported the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, whose representative, Mr. J. P. Lossock, attended, and with the sorrowing relatives of the deceased paid the last offices of humanity to his remains.

AN ENEMY IN THE MOUTH:

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

BY ANNIE S. SWAN,

Author of "Shadowed Lives," "Thankful Rest," "Fruits," &c.

CHAPTER X.—WRECKED.

THE city clocks were chiming the hour of eight.

The night was one of January's dreariest mood. A drizzling shower of sleet fell from leaden skies, and whirled in the bitter northern blast. Few who had the shelter of a home, and no urgent call to be abroad, felt inclined to leave their hearths.

But there were hundreds on the streets of the great city, hundreds of these unhappy creatures, whom we speak of pitifully as the homeless.

As the last stroke of the hour pealed from a hundred bells, there came slowly across Waterloo Bridge, the slouched and drooping figure of a man, clad in garments almost torn to rags, and soaked and sodden with the rain.

He walked listlessly with his hands thrust into his pockets, and his hat drawn so far over his brows that his face could not be seen.

When half way over he paused, and leaning against the parapet looked down into the flowing tide beneath. The light from the lamp beside him, cast its pale flickering light upon his bowed head, and a faint reflection shone on the breast of the river, just a light sufficient to show the blackness and the swiftness of its current.

"O God, that I were beneath it," he muttered to himself. "The struggle would be but momentary, but I dare not, I dare not."

He turned his face towards the light a moment, and pushed his hat from his brows. It would have been impossible to tell whether the face was old or young, it was so strangely haggard and drawn, and so pitifully marked by the hand of vice. He looked about him, and there was not a living creature near, and for one brief moment the impulse was strong upon him to clear the bridge, and seek peace beneath the tide. His hand was on the parapet, but instead he laid his head hurriedly down on the cold wet stone, and muttered in hoarse and broken tones,

"Lizzie, Lizzie!"

The utterance of that name, to whomsoever it belonged, seemed to bring with it a flood of memory, making the wanderer oblivious of time, place, everything, till a heavy hand fell upon his shoulder, and the light of a policeman's lantern was flashed full upon him.

"Move on," said the owner of the lantern gruffly, and the wanderer turned sullenly from him, and resumed his slouching walk across the bridge.

He wandered on and on, through countless lanes and byeways, until he found himself in Piper's Alley. At the far end he saw the windows of the mission hall brightly lit, and moved by an impulse to seek at least half an hour's rest and shelter, he went on till he reached the door.

It was a social night, but tea was over, and the audience were singing a hymn. He slipped in unobserved, and crouching in the darkest corner, leaned his arms on his knees, and hid his face.

The hymn finished, a gentleman rose to speak, and at the first word, the wanderer flung up his head as if he had been shot, and fixed his eyes upon the platform.

The speaker was a bent old man, with white hair, and a noble saint-like face, close beside him was a younger man, with frank blue eyes and sunny hair, and close beside him again was a young lady, with a sweet lovable face, so like the speaker's, that it was easy to divine the relationship between them.

There were others beside them, but at these three only the wanderer gazed for the space of a second, then stifling the groan of agony breaking from his lips he rose and fled the place. Out into the night like a hunted thing, a mighty storm of memory, of passionate longings, of deep and unquenchable human affection, convulsing the heart beneath his tattered coat. On, and on, and on, through the city's mazes and the winter storm, anywhere, to escape from that place and the faces there.

And while at the close of the meeting, Mr. Tennant prayed for all homeless and wandering, with a passionate, yearning tenderness, born of the fear that a son of his own might be one of them, that son was crouching in the shelter of a corner archway, miles from Piper's Alley, covering his haggard face with his hands, to keep back the tears, every one of which was wrung from a broken heart.

In a dainty bijou of a house at Richmond, scarcely a stone's throw from the more pretentious abode of the head of the firm, dwelt Walter Gillespie and his wife.

There Laura's father was ever an honoured and welcome guest. He came to London to spend with them the first Christmas of their married life, and though January was wearing to its close he lingered with them, loth to leave a home where all was peace and sunniest happiness. Walter took an active part now in Mr. Hunter's philanthropic labours, and was one of the most zealous and useful members of that faithful band, who did what they could to relieve and assist, as well as to benefit, their poorer brothers and sisters.

Mr. Tennant had accompanied them several times to the mission in Piper's Alley; his heart and sympathies went with every good work. On the last night in January, another social meeting was held, at which all our friends were present. Before tea was over there came into the hall the familiar figure of Shuffling Ben. They had missed him for a week or two, and Edith smiled to him from the platform, and nodded to him to come to the tables. But Ben stood near the door, watching till Walter Gillespie caught sight of him, then he made his way to where that gentleman was, and touched his arm.

"Well, Ben, my lad, have you turned up again?" said Walter, cheerily. "Sit down and have some tea."

"No, sir, I want to see you partickler for a minit, Will ye come outside?"

Walter looked at the odd figure curiously, wondering if the lad meant to play a trick on him. But there was eager sincerity for once in the depths of the cunning black eyes.

"I've something to show you, sir, I expect will bring ye with me fast enough. Come."

He darted from the hall, and Walter followed him out to the lobby. There Ben stood, holding something tightly clasped in both his hands.

"There's a poor chap took bad in Grinder's Court, sir," said Ben. "He's been there a good spell but he's goin' to die now, so he says, and my! he looks like it. I've known him a good bit, and cadged vittles for him since he's been bad, though he won't eat 'em. He says to me terday, 'Ben, do you know the mission in Piper's Alley?' 'Yes, Bill, I do.' He told me to call 'im Bill, sir, and he says, 'Go there as fast's you can, an' give this to Mister Gillespie if he's there.' I didn't know as he knows the mission, or you, sir, an' this is what I was to give you, sir, an' I was to bring you along of me to see 'im if you'd come."

Ben paused breathless, and offered something rolled in paper into Walter's hands. He tore off the paper, and found within a tiny morocco case with a silver clasp. He touched the spring, and in the dim light of the lobby lamp he saw within the picture of a grave sweet woman's face with wondrous eyes, and a sad drooping mouth. The face of a woman he had known and loved almost as a sister.

He looked at it for a brief moment only, and then thrusting it into his vest pocket turned to Ben.

"Shew me the way to Grinder's Court as quick as you can." Ben was off like shot.

With some difficulty Walter managed to keep the strange uncouth figure in sight, and after threading what seemed to be an endless maze of lanes, Ben waited for him under a dingy lamp at the entrance to a narrow archway.

"This is it, sir, up this stair; keep close after me, 'cos its awful dark."

It was dark, sure enough, and Walter stumbled more than once on the broken stairway, though Ben's nimble feet escaped without a slip. He pushed open what seemed to be a door somewhere, and Walter caught the gleam of a candle, which guided him to the spot.

"I've brought the gentleman, Bill," he heard his guide say. "He came right away."

He heard a muttering sound from the interior, and the next minute he stood upon the threshold and saw the room and its occupant. On a straw pallet in one corner of a perfectly bare apartment was the figure of a man in a half sitting posture. He was worn and wasted to the last degree, and his eyes, far sunken in his pallid, haggard face, gleamed with a fierce unnatural brilliancy.

For a moment Walter stood, looking at him, unable to utter a word. Could that be Arthur Tennant, Oh, never; but the doubt was dispelled, for the sick man turned his head, with a smile more awful to see than the wildest burst of tears, and said,

"Walter, don't you know Arthur Tennant?"

Then Walter came to the side of the rude bed, and kneeling down there, his quiet feelings overpowering him, he cried like a woman,

"I am dying, Walter, or I would not have sent for you," Arthur said after a while. "Look up and listen to what I have to tell you. It won't take me long. After, after Lizzie died," he said, shuddering still at the memory of that awful night, "there was no rest for me on earth night or day. I killed her, you know, though nobody said it. That blow I gave her in my madness killed her as surely as if I had shot her through the heart. I went away to Glasgow and stayed there a while trying to keep sober, for her sake too, but Walter, there was a devil within me urging me to drink and forget all. I fought against it for a time, and then fell. From that day I have gone down, and down, and down, till you see me here one of the veriest wretches in all London. I scraped up enough to bring me here. I was safest far away from you all, and since then I have lived I don't know how. Every copper I could make was spent on drink, and when I couldn't get it I would have bartered my soul for drink. I have been so hungry, Walter, I have eaten the refuse of the street, which a dog would not have touched. I would have put an end to myself long ago, but whenever I went near the river I saw her face in the water, and her eyes beseeching me not to do that sin to my soul's burden. O Walter, I have cursed the day I was born, and sin though it was, I have cursed my Maker for letting me live to become what I am. Walter, is my father in London yet?"

The fierce eagerness with which the words were spoken startled Walter, his previous words had been so weak and faint.

"Could he come here to see me before I die. I should like to see him again, and we will not meet in another world. There is no place there for such as I."

"Though your sins be as scarlet," whispered Walter, as he rose to go, "God forgives till seventy times seven. He knows, Arthur, I would willingly give twenty years of my life if I could save your life for repentance, but I see it is too late."

"Yes, yes, I am thankful," muttered Arthur. "Better to die, but too late, too late."

"Nay," corrected Walter again. "Even at the eleventh hour you may lay hold of Christ. O Arthur, believe it."

Arthur shook his head.

"Are you married to Laura?" he asked suddenly.

"Yes, Laura is my wife."

"And you are happy. I see from your face how you love her. Laura was a good girl; but go, go and fetch my father. I am going fast."

Before an hour had gone Walter returned and the old man with him. On the way he had broken the news to him, but till now he had spoken no word. At the door of that wretched chamber Walter paused and the old man entered alone. It was better so. Leaving faithful Ben to keep watch at the closed door, Walter crept softly downstairs and hurried back to Laura.

The meeting was over, and they awaited his coming anxiously.

"Your father will come by and by, Laura. He is with a dying man who wished to see a clergyman. I must take you home now, and come back for him."

They drove home with the Hunters, and Walter did his best to join in the conversation with his usual cheerfulness. But when he reached his own home, and Laura paused in the hall to remove her outer wraps, he turned and caught her in a close embrace.

"You believe, my darling wife, that I would keep everything from you that would pain you?" he whispered, bending his face to her.

"Yes, Walter, I know you would."

"Then when your father comes home don't question him about where he has been. Laura, will you promise me?"

She looked at him wonderingly, yet her eyes full of perfect trust.

"Yes, Walter, I promise."

Not till years after, when time had blunted the edge of her sorrow about Arthur, did Laura know how and when he died.

They buried him in a corner of an obscure London graveyard, and left him in a nameless grave. It had been his wish, and perhaps such a resting place best befitted one who had made such shipwreck of his life. It had opened with as fair a promise as any man could wish, and its close was one of the saddest I have ever known.

It is a bitter grief to lay a loved one in the grave, even in the sure and certain hope that we shall meet again, by and by; but oh, my friends, I pray that you may be spared the agony of looking in the dead face of one near and dear to you, not knowing whither the spirit has fled. We can but humbly pray

"That of the living whole,
No life may fail beyond the grave."

Walter Gillespie and his wife abide in London still, for the great shipbuilding concern of Hunter & Co. has passed into his hands. Life in the great city possessed so strong a charm for him, and afforded such wide scope for his young energy, that he preferred it rather than Strathgilde. His father, hale and hearty, good for business for many years, in all probability forbore to press him. But there is a little Walter growing up, and for him his grandfather is building up a princely heritage. And in the summertime when Walter's children come to Barossa to visit grandpa, the old house is a pleasant thing to see. It rings with childish feet and childish voices from morning till night. Nothing they do is wrong in grandpa's eyes, and he will turn sometimes and say to the fair and gentle lady whom they call "mamma,"

"It does me good, my daughter, it does me good."

Always, "my daughter," and to Laura the words are very precious. The manse is now a happy home, but sadly thinned. Lottie is married, and Tom has gone to New York to manage there a branch of the mercantile office to which he belongs. Frank is a student at Glasgow, Daisy is a golden-haired girl, her father's housekeeper and earthly stay.

Charlie is a city minister, one of those for whom we have reason to thank God every day. The good resulting from his labours is incalculable. The day will declare it. Need I say, he is one of the pillars of the temperance cause?

In Queensland Tom Hislop lives a useful, honourable life, and has attained a high place in his profession.

He has never married. Many wonder at his unflinching, increasing labour to further the cause of temperance. He never prescribes drink as a medicine, but speaks and writes against it continually.

We, who know his past, who remember a grave beneath the yew trees in the churchyard of Strathglide, do not wonder. Out of the bitterness of his experience Tom Hislop has learned his lesson. Now, I have done.

Some who read this may think it gloomy, and exaggerated. I have taken my threads from life, and if the web be dark, I am not to blame. It is not exaggerated.

Look around you.

In the broad light of day such things are happening everywhere. It is not exaggeration.

It is truth.

SCIENCE AND SCRIPTURE OF ALCOHOL.

II.

II. We note another point of harmony—both the Records declare in unmistakable terms that alcohol is a narcotic and consequently a seductive, ensnaring agent. It is narcotic—that is, it acts as a depressant upon the nervous system—it tends to produce insensibility and sleepiness. This effect of alcohol is well known and generally recognized. Why is that man lying in the cold and the wet there? He is drunk and is unconscious alike of both the cold and the wet. He knows not where he is nor what he does. He has been thoroughly narcotized by the action of the alcohol in the drink he has consumed. Alcohol is not alone in this power. Opium also has this effect as is well known, and hence the Chinese use it largely as we do alcoholic liquor, and for the same reason. Chloroform and sulphuric ether act on the frame as narcotics, and so do many other substances. Accordingly writers such as Christison and others all place the substance alcohol among the narcotic poisons—while at the same time it produces inflammatory action. It is therefore called a double poison narcotic and acrid or narcotico-acrid. One characteristic feature of all narcotics is that they create an appetite for themselves by the use thereof. This appetite or craving comes as a consequence of the use of the narcotic. For instance, the man who for a time uses opium finds that he cannot give up the use thereof without a struggle; there has been created in his system a craving for the agent and this is not easily satisfied. The same thing is true of the person who uses tobacco. There is gradually formed a craving for the weed, and this craving becomes stronger as the use is more protracted. Such is the action of alcohol. It is a narcotic, and as such, creates an appetite and craving for itself. This sometimes becomes exceedingly strong, so much is this the case that in order to satisfy the craving man is prepared to sacrifice everything usually held dear, even life itself and the prospects and hopes of eternal happiness. This craving becomes a veritable tyrant and one of the most exacting. This quality or property of narcotics is general and common to them all. And this forms one of the best reasons for the plan of abstinence, because by that plan alone can anyone escape the seductive influence of the narcotic. This seductive power is extraordinary in its influence. It can lead men to sacrifice everything at the shrine of appetite. Men will undergo any suffering, will perform any action however mean or degrading, will give up health, wealth, life, and eternal happiness for the gratification of this morbid craving. This feature of alcoholic wine is to be found in the sacred record. Solomon in describing the drunkard (Prov. xxxi. 35) gives us this as one characteristic, "They have beaten me, and I felt it not;" "When shall I awake, I will seek it yet again." Here we have first the narcotic effect. Though beaten and wounded there is no feeling—all is unfelt as if it had not been. And secondly we have the seductive power. Though he has suffered, though he has been bitten, though he has been sorely grieved and suffered woe and sorrow, yet he goes back to his tormentor, he seeks again the agent at whose hands he has suffered. "I will seek it yet again." Truly this marks the seductive power of drink. Notwithstanding all the ill drink has done him, in spite of all that he has endured, he will still go back and seek again the cup which so sadly injures him. The appetite created demands the repetition of the dose, and demands it in the most uncompromising manner. Science and Revelation on this point are in perfect harmony, and both alike teach the danger of meddling with narcotics as these are very seductive and produce danger to the users. Common sense, therefore, and reason, the interpreters of natural law, tell us to abstain, and the command of God as given in the scripture reiterates the counsel. It says through the pen of the wisest of men, Look not on the wine, and experience and common sense tell us that no other or simpler plan is open to us. Abstain from wine and every alcoholic beverage, for if you do not there will be a drink crave created which may become uncontrollable. This is the natural tendency of all narcotics, and this seductive power is very insidious, it grows stronger but arouses no suspicion and excites no feeling of danger. Solomon saw the risk and raised the warning signal of danger. Temperance men are only repeating in other form and with more iteration the same old cry—Danger ahead! Halt while yet it is time.

III. Another point which deserves notice is that alcohol is a brain poison. Most poisons have a local action—one acts upon one organ and another upon another; alcohol acts on the nerves and nerve centres. The great centre of nerve power is the brain, and here its power is most felt. As the brain is the instrument through which the soul works upon and directs the motions and actions of the body, anything that disturbs, inflames, or benumbs the brain does fearful injury. Experience and scientific investigation have shown that alcohol so acts upon the brain as to pervert the judgment, produce forgetfulness and negligence of duty, weakness of will, induce rashness in action, render the man fit for the commission of crime, loosen the tongue, and rouse all the merely animal passions and lusts. "One of the first effects of alcohol upon the nervous system . . . is shown in loss of memory. . . . It is followed by loss of volitional power. . . . All the higher faculties of mind and will are powerless."—Dr. B. W. Richardson On Alcohol. Abundance of medical evidence might be quoted proving this point, but it is so very well known and so easily seen by anyone who will use his eyes that it is not deemed necessary to do so. Instances of neglect of duty, rashness and carelessness are, alas, too common as our shipping news and our railway management too often show. The results are frequently such as to call very special attention to the point. Often we find ships lost or trains wrecked through such rashness or carelessness induced by drink. And who can tell the blunders made by medical men, by merchants, and business men of all kinds through this cause? These things are of daily occurrence and are generally known and admitted. Experience tells us this, and science explains the reason. The alcohol acts as a brain poison and destroys or benumbs those faculties which are required for the due performance of duty.

Scripture tells us the same story in its own way. It tells us that priests and prophets have erred through strong drink, and have gone out of the way. It tells of Nadab and Abihu struck down in consequence of carelessness and forgetfulness caused by drink. In Proverbs we read that it is not for princes to drink wine and strong drink, lest they pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted. Here we have the clearest indication of the important truth that the use of alcohol has the effect of disturbing the mental faculties and rendering men forgetful and careless in the performance of duty. The story of Lot's sad fall, too, leads us to see the danger to morality of all such indulgence. In this case we have one of the saints of his time led into grievous sin on two separate occasions through the agency of strong drink. This experience proclaims in tones of clear and unmistakable character the danger of tampering with a drink so decidedly dangerous to the moral and mental qualities of the man. In the case of the Israelites as a nation, we find the prophet Isaiah condemning them for their drinking habits and tracing a large proportion of the sins which led to the captivity to this source. "Wine is a mocker," is the dictum of Solomon, and he was well able to judge both from personal experience and from observation. The inference from these facts and from the statements of Solomon clearly is as expressed by himself in the twenty-first chapter of his Proverbs. Look not, that is, desire not, the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup . . . at last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. Avoid it, pass it by, and pass away.

IV. Another point which appears in scripture and is testified to by modern science is that, for hard work or great exertion, for good health or long life, in short for bodily vigour, alcohol is not in any degree required. These points have been sufficiently proved by modern experience and science has confirmed that experience as the natural result of the course adopted. Dr. Beddoes, half a century ago, put the question to the most severe scientific test—by employing two sets of men as nearly alike in everything as he could get them. He put the one set on abstinence regimen and allowed the other to use in moderation, under his superintendence, alcoholics. After a prolonged trial the tables were turned—the abstinence division began to use the alcohol and the alcohol-using company became the abstaining one and the result was the same—the abstainers were the victors by a good deal in both cases. The matter of good health and long life has also been determined by the experience of insurance and benefit societies. From the results of the experience of these we find that abstainers have much better health and longer life than those who use alcoholics even in what is commonly regarded as moderation. The matter has recently received a good deal of attention, and Dr. B. W. Richardson, an eminent physician and a high authority, declares that one-third of all the deaths of the country are due directly or indirectly to drink. All experience confirms the general truth, and science comes in and explains the reason. The reason is, that alcohol taken into the system being a poison produces disorder, and when regularly indulged in produces disease and renders the system less able to resist the attacks of active disease.

Scripture in its own peculiar manner teaches us the same truths. It never states them in the abstract, but gives us what ought to prove quite as instructive—examples. Israel went through all the hardships of the wilderness journey fed on manna and water. When God would raise up a man supereminent for strength, he was to be a Nazarite or so far as wine was concerned a life abstainer—as was also his mother—a hint to us that the effects of drink are transmitted to our children. When witnesses of sterling firmness of moral courage were required by divine authority, sons of the prophets were collected and educated and these were under the Nazarite vow. Samuel, the greatest of all the judges of Israel, was an abstainer—as were Daniel and his three brethren. The Rechabites were a temperance society, and they had the special honour of having the blessing of God and his approval conveyed to them by Jeremiah, and a gracious promise affixed to the blessing. The Nazarites were described in the figurative language of the prophet as purer than snow, whiter than milk, more ruddy in body than rubies, and their polishing as sapphire. Nothing can be clearer than the teaching of Scripture on this point. It clearly shows that health, vigour, and long life are not only compatible with, but are promoted by abstinence from all alcoholic liquor. Here we have another point of coincidence between the teaching of science on the one hand and the teaching of the record of the divine will on the other. Both alike teach the same truth, and both of them proclaim in language that is as easily understood as language can be,—Abstain from all that can intoxicate, for it shortens life, and renders more liable to disease, it weakens for work and renders less fit for exertion.

Such are a few of the more prominent points in which the testimony of science corroborates and confirms the testimony of revelation, and in which there is a perfect harmony between the lessons taught by both alike. The very fact that the two agree indicates that we have reached the truth in reading both when we interpret them as we do. What then is the great lesson taught by both in reference to wine and strong drink? Clearly and unmistakably this—Abstain from it, avoid it as ye would your most deadly and treacherous enemy. It is a tricky spirit, it leads men imperceptibly on from one step to another on the way to ruin, and all the while like the vampire lulls him to sleep so that he has no suspicion of his danger till he finds himself the bond-slave of the destroyer, it may be, too late to vindicate and regain his freedom from the fetters that bind him. Solomon is clear and emphatic in his counsel on this point. He would have all not to look even upon the wine, lest the look lead to the desire for it and the indulgence in it. Temperance men re-echo the sentiment and press it upon those whom they come into contact with, and organize associations for the purpose of promoting the practice of abstinence as a duty incumbent upon all. They use substantially the same arguments that Solomon used, and they have scarcely any new ones to offer. He, as they, found their appeal upon the nature and effects of alcohol, and these are arguments sufficient for the purpose.

But if it is, as we think has been shown, the duty of the individual to abstain from alcohol, it is clear that it must be wrong on the part of anyone, whether a person or the State, to place temptations in the way of the people and thereby induce them to do what duty forbids them to do. What would be said were the State to tempt by any means the subjects to gamble and bet and at the same time punish severely those who did so? Yet this substantially is the course of action followed in reference to drink. The State grants licenses to make and sell to all these liquors, and that too in no stinted measure, and when men have drunk freely and by physical necessity have become drunk the State steps in and punishes them for the effects of its own actions. The only course open to the State consistent with its own best interests and the welfare and happiness of the subjects is to prohibit all traffic in such dangerous and destructive beverages. Drunkenness as a national sin and shame can never be banished from the land by any measures of restriction or regulation, by any curtailment of the number of licenses or shortening of hours, or by any regulations of any kind short of absolute prohibition. The words of Alderman Wise, solicitor for the Licensed Victuallers Association, in his evidence before a Parliamentary Committee, are striking. He said, "If you were to abolish the traffic, as they have done in Maine, you might have a sober population; but if you restrict it I do not think you would." He is right. Nothing short of abolition of the traffic will ever make the nation a sober nation. This is and ever ought to be our great aim. It is wise to learn even from an enemy—and here we have a lesson from a source not tainted, as many think abstainers' opinions are, by prejudice. Let us take the hint and act upon it until we see the Dagon of drink down in the dust and sobriety crowning all our citizens with its golden gifts and great blessings.

WORKING MAN'S BILL OF FARE.—VI.

We will now look at this subject from the retrospective point of view. We have given an amount of evidence sufficient to convince sensible people that the age of improvement could reap a rich harvest from improving the dietary of the common people. We enforced our views by adducing the respective dietaries of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union, the Glasgow Food Reform Society, the great experiment of Dr. Nichols, the famous report of Mr. Edward Smith as Government Commissioner on the food of the people, and lastly the dietary of our Scottish poorhouses. Our object is not to abridge unduly the dietary of the working man but merely to improve its quality and to decrease its quantity to that level where the loss of bodily waste could be repaired within twenty-four hours of its having taken place.

Now what is the actual estimate by competent authorities of the food required by a grown man? The late Dr. Parkes of Netley says that 22 or 23 ounces of dry food is required; this with water in the food will weigh about 42 to 46 ounces of solid food daily. In addition about 40 ounces of water are required. It appears from him that the constituents of a man's food should be first  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 ounces of nitrogenous food; 2 to 3 ounces fatty food, and 14 to 15 ounces of starchy food with some saline substances. Dr. Parkes gives us an interesting illustration—that of a ploughman's dietary. "In some parts of Scotland the farm labourers, who work very hard and are fine strong men, still live on oatmeal and milk, and a ploughman's allowance is daily 2½ lbs. oatmeal and one pint of milk. Taking the cost of oatmeal at 2d per lb. and of milk at 2d a pint, the daily cost would be 7d. In one of my experiments on diet I kept a strong soldier, thirty years of age and weighing 10½ stone and doing hard work, on oatmeal and milk alone and found that he was kept in perfect health, and at a constant weight by 1½ lbs. oatmeal and 2 pints of milk. The cost was 3½d for the meal and 4d for the milk, 7½d a-day or 4s. 4½d a week. The man himself was very sorry to return to his soldier's rations of bread, butter, meat and potatoes." We often forget that so vast a number of our fellow-beings over the face of the earth live as simply and as well. Dr. Parkes says again: "Formerly throughout the north of England and Scotland, there were successive generations of some of the finest men in the world who lived on oatmeal and milk, and literally men would live out their lifetime without taking anything more except it may be occasionally fruits and green vegetables. On the opposite side of the globe we find the splendid races of northern India living on barley, millet, wheat, and rice as their staple nitrogenous food; or in southern India we have millions of healthy men living on beans, and peas and rice. In Africa the negro often attains a gigantic size on his millet and other vegetable foods. The Roman gladiator trained on barley, and the Roman soldier in campaigns when meat could not be got carried corn which he ground in hand mills and then boiled in water and made a strong vegetable soup, something like the old English fermenty. On this food he marched and conquered as no other race has done." Our Scottish ploughman whose case is cited is living on the lines of the hardiest races that have ever lived. The South Kensington Museum's handbook on foods affords us very interesting information on a day's ration. The average daily diet for an adult should according to it contain in 100 parts, water, 81.5; flesh formers, 3.9; starch, sugar, &c., 10.6; fat, 3.0; salt, 0.7; phosphates, potash, &c., 0.3, equal to 100. Or to put it in another way, he should consume 5 lb. 8 ounces 320 grains of water; 4 ounces 110 grains flesh formers; 11 ounces 178 grains starch, sugar, &c.; 3 ounces 337 grains fat; 325 grains common salt and 170 grains of other salts, showing a total daily ration of 6 lbs. 13 ounces, 128 grains. Of this amount 1 lb. 4 ounces 245 grains is actual dry food substance, the remainder being water of which there are 5½ lbs. Now, looking at our ration again, we should have 18 ounces bread, 1 ounce butter, 4 ounces milk, 2 ounces bacon, 8 ounces potatoes, 6 ounces cabbage, 3½ ounces cheese, 1 ounce sugar, ¾ ounce salt, and 66½ ounces water. This gives us 1 lb. 5¼ ounces or 21¼ ounces dry food and the rest water. The dry food amount is slightly less than that proposed by Dr. Parkes and markedly confirms his estimate. Yet our careful readers will observe it is nearly three times more than what Dr. Nichols consumed in his famous experiment, and it is nearly double what he thinks needful for the daily sustenance of an adult. How greatly less it is however than the workman dietary of to-day, and how more happy, wise, and wealthy would he be if he made an endeavour to conform to a diet far less than he is at present accustomed to, and yet sufficiently ample for all his needs.

The handbook enables us to contrast the dietary of a workman with moderate exercise with that of a hard working artisan. The moderately exercised workman requires 4 ounces 94 grains of albuminoids, 1 ounce 174 grains of fats, 11 ounces 302 grains starch, and 312 grains salts—total, 18 ounces nearly: the hard working artisan requires 5 ounces 35 grains of albuminoids, 2 ounces 400 grains fat, 22 ounces 96 grains starch, and 408 grains of salt—total, 30 ounces nearly. The soldier in the Dutch service finds an immense difference in his peace and war dietary. In war he has what gives him great energy, in peace what never brings him up to a fighting condition! The difference between the pauper at rest and the working man at work is also great, and should teach a valuable lesson to all of us that when we are idle we should reduce our food to the level of the peace establishment, so that we may cut short our loss and at the same time conserve the powers of our system for future efforts.

I had a hope that I should have been able to show from our prison dietaries that a man may be kept in prison at work with moderate exercise, plenty sleep and regular hours, on a very spare diet. My hope is not fulfilled, for I have been unable to reconcile the dietary of our prisons with any estimate of food I have seen. I see that the prisoner is allowed 8 ounces oatmeal for breakfast. Now I live well on 1 ounce oatmeal for breakfast, and I am not able to conceive where the prisoner can "stow away" 8 ounces of oatmeal made into porridge and eaten with ¾ pint of milk. But I may be able to find it out and other things by research.

Well, Mr. Editor, I stop here. I have found a great amount of pleasure from my researches so far. I have above all convinced myself that an abstemious and carefully regulated diet is the best thing for my fellow working men and myself. If they would bestow proper attention to their dietary, buy their food wholesale and induce their good wives to cook it properly; if they would always be sensitive to the feeling of satiety for their stomach's sake, and eat enough and no more; if they would recognise the necessity and importance of giving their stomach the same equal amount of rest as they take to themselves; if they would increase their diet when they work hard or when they feel cold, and decrease it when they are idle, they would keep themselves in true relation with their systems and their food supplies, have better health, more content, larger savings, longer life and almost no disease. They would in a sentence use the world as not abusing it, seeing that the passion of it passeth away.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

LADIES' RING LAWS.—With the fair sex, the "laws of the ring" are:—A plain or chased gold ring on the little finger of the right hand implies "not engaged," or, in plainer words, "ready for proposals, sealed or otherwise." When engaged, the ring passes to the first finger of the left hand. When married, the third finger receives it. If the fair one proposes to defy all siege to her heart, she places the rings on her first and fourth finger, one on each, like two charms to keep away the tempter. It is somewhat singular that this disposition of rings is rare.

THE FUNDS.

* * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1883.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

MARCH, 1883.

The Executive have now a large and varied stock of publications on sale at the offices of the Association. These include some of the best standard works on the temperance reformation. The early and esteemed orders of members and friends are respectfully solicited.

* * We have been again obliged to leave over "Bookshelf," "Correspondence," "Varieties," &c. We will, we hope, find a place for them all in the first issue of our new volume.

An index and title page to the volume now closed will appear next month.

SOLD OUT.

We have had several times the pleasure of being within a dozen or thereby Social Reformers of being "sold out." We are entirely "sold out" of the January number, so that our friends desirous of keeping sets will require to wait on their booksellers at once.

We would be very glad were we able to inform our readers that we were "sold out" with double the number we issue at present, and we believe that if they were desirous that their friends should have the same pleasure as they themselves have had in reading our magazine, we would have the pleasure of doubling our circulation in a month or two, and even then of getting "sold out."

Are we cherishing a delusive expectation by entertaining the hope that our friends will henceforth make an effort to largely increase the circulation of

THEIR OWN MAGAZINE?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON'S URGENCY RESOLUTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON has given notice that on an early day he would "call attention to the urgency of the demand for legislation, giving effect to the local option resolution already passed by the House, and move a resolution." We are sorry that we cannot inform our readers of the date in this issue, but so soon as it is fixed we believe that their vigorous support and that of the country to the resolution will be earnestly requested by the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, and that they will, as eagerly as ever, cordially and heartily co-operate with the Association in increasing the Scotch majority in its favour.

We learn that the amount of paper used for the British Census of 1881 amounted to 57 tons 13 cwts., comprising 7,500,000 householders' schedules. How we should like to see the temperance hosts set about distributing 57 tons 13 cwts. of paper, on which there might be seen the pithiest arguments, and the most heart searching appeals in favour of the Local Option Veto (Scotland) Bill. If the Scottish people who value prohibition, and sincerely desire to see it legally established, were to flood the House of Commons to this extent for the coming session they would be relieved of the liquor traffic and its burdens for ever.

Casting our eyes over the excellently conducted British Temperance Advocate, we find that an admirable practice obtains in England with regard to the meetings addressed by the ordinary lecturers of the British Temperance League. There are five agents in its employment. Mr. Gregson is engaged up to nearly May next, and this is how. He is to be five days in one place, six days in another, the next five days in another, and the whole of March he will work away in London. In April he is appointed seven days in Sheffield, five days in Kendal, and so on. Of his brother advocates the same has to be said. Now looking to the superior lecturing ability of the prohibitory advocates, their deep and wide knowledge of the temperance question, their platform excellence, we have often wondered at the want of enterprise shown by the Scotch temperance committees with regard to lecturers. The custom is to get up a meeting simply for one night; the advocate wishing to avail himself fully of the time allotted crowds his lecture with facts and arguments, and "crams" his audience as teachers do children in schools. But were our committees to arrange for five days, or say six, a Sabbath and the five following days, and ask the visitor to tell them all that was in his heart, there would be a greatly increased interest in his visit, numerous audiences, and the growth of an enthusiasm which would inspire him with heart-thrilling eloquence, and constrain his hearers to engage with re-doubled vigour in the good work. The cause of prohibition in Scotland would move by leaps and bounds were a similar mode of advocacy favoured on this side the border.

If the subject were not so grave one might be excused from smiling at the result of certain recent enquiries into the mortality from intemperance smiling at the unexpected results sceptical enquirers meet with. For many years the temperance advocate made the confident assertion that 60,000 persons died directly or indirectly through intemperance. Dr. Norman S. Kerr, sceptical on this matter, resolved to test it, and the effect of his investigations was to prove beyond cavil and contradiction that double that number were sacrificed to the drink Moloch of our dear country. A physician in extensive practice put Dr. Kerr's figures to a crucial test. He said that there are 17,500 medical practitioners in the United Kingdom, and supposing that they had merely on an average six cases in the whole year in which the patient dies indirectly or directly through intemperance, the numbers would be 105,000, which strikingly confirms Dr. Kerr's investigations. Now, we have the Harveian Medical Society of London conducting a searching inquiry into this subject. The 10,000 deaths embraced in the report laid before the Society, showed that alcohol had some causation in 1,402 or 14 per cent. This would be 5,870 deaths in London, 38,971 for England and Wales, or 49,731 for the United Kingdom. Dr. Kerr's estimate was 40,500. This direct result of intemperance may well be called appalling. The 120,000 have passed over the stage of time for 1882, and before this sheet meets the eye of all our readers 20,000 victims, cut off this year already, will be before God's judgment seat. It is time this liquor traffic was destroyed.

The Scottish publicans' organ is careful to inform us that "Mr. Gladstone's health is affording indications that the supreme controlling power which he exercises over that heterogeneous mass called the 'Liberal Party,' is soon to terminate, in which case the disunited sects will sever, and an election will see the return of the Conservative party to power. The license trade will vote 'Tory' to a man in self-defence, and the present monopoly of seats in Scotland by local option legislators will be shattered." Smallest favours thankfully received and gratefully acknowledged, Mr. Guardian. We shall be yet better prepared for the next general election than for the last one. But we hope that the Liberal Government, in harmony with their promises and the twice affirmed resolution of the House of Commons, may, by a vigorous attempt to grant the people power to be rid of this irrepressible liquor question, completely frustrate the knavish tricks of a class who would bind the Government by their votes to maintain a traffic which is disastrous to every interest of their country but their own. May we hope that the Conservative party will be patriotic enough to decline a further unholy alliance with the beer interest after their painful experience at the last general election, and that our Liberal friends will be able to answer the drink interest according to its presumption and wickedness. For our part, no man, whatever his politics, will get our vote who will not vote for our veto.

One more judgment adverse to the temperance movement has been registered in the Court of Session. We do not remember an instance where the senators of the college of justice decided otherwise. The Act says the publican shall not supply boys and girls under sixteen with liquor. The court rules that the publicans can sell to boys and girls much under that age any quantity of liquor if their parent or parents know. Policemen can enter a public house and purchase liquor, so can abandoned women; and now Lord Young delivers judgment to the effect that any one if invited by a lodger in a hotel can sit with the lodger and drink after the hotel keeper has been constrained by law to close his doors. We need not advert to the Rothesay and Grangemouth cases, there is little fear of them being forgotten, they show too great a blot on the law to readily be so. Can the people really respect a law which lawyers interpret always in the sinister interests of the publican? We know that they cannot; it would show more than human nature in them if they did. But if we were asked to point to a proof bearing on the evil nature of the law, we should not hesitate to direct the enquirer's attention to the judgment of Lord Young, and not to it only, but to all those judgments which, by rendering the law of less and less effect, in effect encourage the publican interest and sanction evils which the law was expressly enacted to remove.

With this issue the seventeenth volume is brought to a close; and with a larger circulation than the magazine has yet enjoyed. It has been noticed with increased appreciation by the public press, and numerous kindly references to it are to be found in the correspondence of the Association it represents. The Editor has been exceedingly gratified by the success of the year. This is due to the invaluable assistance he has received from many able and esteemed contributors. The principles and policy of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have been upheld, and none can charge the Social Reformer with an uncertain sound upon either the one or the other. The principle is that Government has no right whatever to sanction the liquor traffic, and the policy, that communities should be invested with the power by a majority to effectually remove such a source of corruption and burdens from such communities. As in the past the Editor hopes that its special duty in expounding this principle and this policy will be most efficiently discharged. Subordinate to this aim he has enlisted the pen of fiction, humour, poetry, and social reform, but only as conducive to making the magazine more acceptable at the fireside. This course he means to pursue. He might easily have presented his arrangements for the new volume, showing an array of well known names and some new candidates for his readers' favour; but he thinks otherwise. He wishes to remain free to avail himself, as far as possible, of every opportunity, of every view, of every writer, by which the usefulness of the magazine may be promoted and sustained. He believes that this course will in the end be more appreciated by his readers than any merely cut-and-dried arrangement. While he is to devote himself to making their magazine worthy in every sense of the Scottish prohibitory movement, what are his readers and the friends of the Association to do? He ventures to think that it is time that they in a greater degree should try to realize their responsibility and set about strengthening his hands and encouraging his heart by a really energetic effort to increase the circulation of their own magazine. Their wealthy neighbour or the moral and social reformers of their neighbourhood may never have seen the Social Reformer. Whose fault may that be? If theirs, let them see to it at once. Their friends at a distance may be lukewarm on the suppression of the traffic. Why? Because they have never recommended the literature of the movement to their earnest consideration. Let us not, however, look back, nor indulge in censure. For the future we shall cherish the hope that its readers and friends will take a still greater interest in the Social Reformer, until we are able to announce that its circulation exceeds that of most temperance papers. In that case who will gain? Why, the agitation. Can we offer a stronger motive to induce them to increase that circulation? We cannot.

Once more the Legislature of our country has met, and once more permission has been asked on the first day of the session for a shower of bills dealing with the liquor traffic in various ways. Speculation is already rife as to the fate of these. We are no prophet, so will content ourselves in wishing each and all of them the happy fate those having them in charge desire. Our interest centres in the forthcoming proposals of the Government, in the urgency resolution of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and in special liquor legislation for Scotland. Whatever may be the nature of County Government, we believe that it will supersede our Quarter Sessions; and if the Government honestly interpret (and we have no reason for anticipating that they will do otherwise) the promise by the Prime Minister, they will embody the prohibitive veto in their forthcoming measure. In his speech on Waterloo day, 1881, Mr. Gladstone declared that the Government had resolved to legislate on the liquor traffic, and that in their legislative proposals they would take as an essential the motion of his right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). If they do so, they may confidently rely on the energetic support of the social and moral reformers of the empire. We look forward with a hopeful confidence to the appearance of their measure. Then we have the urgency resolution of our leader. He claims the immediate fulfilment of that promise, and in preference to re-introducing his own bill meantime wishes the House to constrain the Government to deal with the liquor traffic agreeably to the resolution twice affirmed by the House. He is fully warranted, we think, in drawing attention to the fact that the Government has as yet done nothing to embody that principle in legislation. Every one cognizant of the facts will heartily support Sir Wilfrid in his course of inducing the Government to delay no longer to invest the people with legal power to protect themselves against the operations of the drink interest. We feel a special interest, however, in what the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association may succeed in getting brought before Parliament for Scotland. The Association is clear and distinct on its demand. They aim to secure for the ratepayers of Scotland a direct veto by which they will be enabled to effectively grapple with the evils of the liquor traffic that concern them. The traffic in alcoholic liquors should be totally prohibited. All temperance reformers are agreed upon this. Their veto will give the ratepayers power to do that within their respective boundaries. The traffic should be immediately removed, the very moment the people may be found willing to do so. The veto being on the statute book, any delay in applying would be with the people themselves. The more the simplicity and directness of the veto is looked at, the more its fairness to both traffic and people is seen. Besides, it is in conflict with no proposal dealing with the evil; the remedy desired by the Association is in conflict with no Licensing Board scheme, but is the true complement to them all. If Scottish moral and social reformers, notwithstanding that we have already licensing boards in Scotland, will aim to improve the licensing system by means which include new licensing boards, notwithstanding the dire experience of the signal failure of those which already exist, the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will not oppose these efforts, but will bend their energies to obtain legal power to abolish the liquor traffic as the only permanent settlement of the difficulty. Their proposal is the only one at present before the country having a permanent settlement in view. What result may follow their efforts to induce hon. members to prepare and introduce such a bill we are not yet in a position to say, but we believe that the Association is looking forward to an early appeal to the Scottish constituencies for vigorous support to a measure for Scotland having their hearty approval. They are confident the people of Scotland are with them, and will rally around and justify their conduct in making an energetic struggle to secure from the Imperial Parliament the power to every burgh, parish, and district to effectually purge their area of the traffic in alcoholic liquors if they be so disposed. It may be thought that the Scottish people are not united on this just and reasonable proposal because of some diverse proposals which are being talked about; but such proposals have not the widespread and hearty approval of the community. Once a bill embodying the direct veto comes before the people, lesser proposals will be subordinated to their just, righteous and consistent demand for a legal veto by which the liquor traffic may be overthrown.

In our news columns our readers may have read an extract from an address by the Rev. James Scott of the Evangelistic Association. The rev. gentleman's remarks deserve the earnest attention of all engaged in temperance work. Mr. Scott refers to the Mizpah Band formed by Mr. D. L. Moody, which is being trained so as to endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. But they are never safe—they have embraced Jesus Christ as offered in the gospel, but they are only his when they retain their temperance faith and practice. Even as their Master refused to leap from the temple's pinnacle, as it would be perverting the grace of God, so the disciples of the Master must not enter into temptation and then expect God's grace to avert the consequences of their folly and wickedness. Rightly Mr. Scott urges abstinence at the start of the Christian life, but he recommends it all through, for no man can recommence indulgence in alcoholic liquor and stand. In effect, he says, in the region of temperance the grace of God is never found. What is the logical consequence of such doctrine? Why that such a temptation being no way conducive to the strength of the Christian character, and at the same time preventible, the law should be invoked to uproot it as a system of public corruption which solicits men and women to a course of evil too often beyond their strength to resist or refrain from.

INTELLIGENCE.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, M.P., AT FALKIRK.

ON Wednesday, 7th ult., a public meeting was held in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the United Kingdom Alliance and Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The hall was filled to overflowing, many being unable to obtain admission. Among the gentlemen on the platform were—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P.; T. Livingstone Learmonth, Esq., J.P., of Parkhall, who presided; Hugh Macpherson, Esq., Chief Magistrate, Grangemouth; Andrew Brown, Esq., J.P., Kerse; Rev. Dr. Ogilvie, Rev. Messrs. Burns, Linlithgow; Wade, Aitchison, Mair, Anderson, Falkirk; and Cumming, Grangemouth; Mr. W. W. Hunter, Denny; Mr. J. Scroggie, evangelist; ex-Bailie Gentleman, Councillor Young, Falkirk; Messrs. W. Donaldson, J. Johnston, S. M'Waters, H. Walker, of Falkirk; Messrs. D. A. M'Laren, W. J. Cupples, and M. Gavin, of Grangemouth; Mr. J. Dymock, of Bo'ness; ex-Bailie Dougal, Councillors Hutton, M'Alpine, of Linlithgow; Rev. Messrs. M'Millan and Crombie, Avonbridge; Mr. Agnew, Stenhousemuir; Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh; P. B. Mitchell, Bo'ness, and many others. During the time the audience was assembling, a large choir, under the leadership of Mr. Law, sang several appropriate hymns. On entering the hall Sir Wilfrid Lawson was loudly cheered, the audience rising to their feet and waving their hats.

Mr. J. H. WATERSTON, Edinburgh, intimated that numerous apologies had been received.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the meeting, said he owed the privilege of presiding over them that evening to the unavoidable absence of their tried friend and respected townsman, Mr. James Wilson of Bantaskine. He was sorry he was not with them that evening. At the same time he might say that, as they were aware, he took a deep interest in temperance not only in Stirlingshire, but in other parts of the kingdom as well. (Applause.) There were some who believed that they would attain their object as temperance reformers by putting down those houses in which intoxicating drink was sold—(hear, hear)—and others objected to that course because it would interfere with the liberty of the subject. Those people appeared to have great fears for the liberty of the subject, but he might say that while he would yield to no one in preserving the liberty of the subject, he did not agree with these people, and could not see why a small minority should place a public-house in a locality in opposition to the wishes of a large majority. (Cheers.) In order to bring out what he meant he would refer to a case that had happened recently in the town of Grangemouth. That town had prospered greatly in recent years, and they had built an entirely new suburb. There were some people who desired to place a public-house in that suburb. He had learned that there were 350 rate-payers in that part of Grangemouth, and of these 253 signed a memorial against the public-house, 32 were at sea, 48 abstained from expressing their opinion, and there were only 17 in favour of the public-house. Now, he did not think that it was preserving the liberty of the subject when 17 people forced 253 to submit to a public-house when they did not desire it. (Applause.) If those who were so afraid of the liberty of the subject being endangered approved of this, he had nothing further to say to them. (Applause.)

Rev. D. BURNS, Linlithgow, moved the first resolution, as follows:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the traffic in alcoholic liquors entails excessive burdens on the community, and deteriorates the physical vigour, mental power, and moral character of the people; and, while rejoicing in every effort calculated to mitigate the prevalent evils of intemperance, earnestly calls for such an exercise of philanthropic patriotism and Christian zeal as shall result in the removal of a traffic so disastrous in its consequences to the nation." In moving the resolution, Mr. Burns said, in this land of theirs, seldom would they hear of destitute homes and children without bread if it were not for drunkenness. All those brutal scenes of domestic strife, all those mad brawls among friends that they read of every morning, would be unknown if temperance prevailed. Crime, pauperism, and insanity, in so far as they were due to the drink traffic, would disappear. He concluded by insisting on the necessity of promoting the temperance movement as the remedy for these evils. Mr. J. M. Scroggie, evangelist, in seconding the resolution, appealed to all present to assist in the work of banishing the evil from the country. The chairman then called on Sir Wilfrid Lawson to support the resolution.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, who was received with loud and prolonged cheering, said—Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, this meeting is much larger than I expected to find in a town of the size of Falkirk. (Loud applause.) I am very glad to see this large meeting, because it shows the interest you are taking in this very large question. There was a time, about a generation ago, when the question of slavery in the United States was called "the irrepressible question of politics," and we are not exaggerating when we say that now in England the drink question is the irrepressible question of the day. (Applause.) It is an irrepressible question, and perhaps some of you would say that I am the irrepressible agitator of the question. (Laughter and applause.) I don't know that I can do better than agitate this question, because I am only humbly following the footsteps of much better, wiser, and benevolent men who have gone before me. You know it is a common thing in the House of Commons, where they are not so intelligent as you are here—(laughter and cheers)—when anybody gets up to denounce intemperance, for some wise man to say, "Mr. Speaker, there is intemperance in other things besides drink." But if you think we are speaking too strongly, and making too much of this question, let me give you the words of one who, I believe, is more respected at this moment throughout England, Scotland, and even I believe in Ireland, than any public man of our day—the words of the Prime Minister himself. (Loud cheers.) I heard him say in the House of Commons that “the drinking of this country was bringing upon it the accumulated evils of war, pestilence, and famine,” and I am here to-night to say that in all the meetings I have attended I never heard any one bringing a stronger indictment against drink than was brought on that occasion by the Prime Minister. (Cheers.) I have said that we have been attacking it for fifty years. You have had old temperance societies, which did not exactly take hold of the people, although they tried to get people to abstain from spirits and not take a great deal of beer. (Laughter.) They tried what is called moderation, which is a thing every one has his own definition of. One of the best definitions ever I heard was in the House of Commons by Major O’Gorman—(laughter and cheers)—a celebrated Irish member. He said “Moderation was just as much as a man could walk away with.” (Much laughter.) These old temperance societies were very good for the day in which they lived—the day of small things, but if we succeed we must go the whole “hog”—(laughter)—and the best thing you can do is to give up drinking altogether; and if the people of this country had followed that advice, we would not have been here to-night, and Mr. Gladstone would not have brought the indictment he did. Then you have had the Good Templars doing a great deal of good, but I think the most influential development of the temperance movement in our day is the grand Blue Ribbon Army. (Loud applause.) I daresay there are some good soldiers of the Blue Ribbon Army here to-night, although the place is not sufficiently well lighted for me to see their colours. (Laughter.) I know some who carry the blue ribbon in the pocket. (Renewed laughter.) The Licensed Victuallers’ Guardian said:—“It is useless to scoff at the folly of the Blue Ribbonites. It is futile to rail against the tyranny of the teetotallers, &c. The time for all this is past, and, except as minor operations in a great scheme, wholly inefficacious. It is now necessary to look matters fairly in the face, and to recognise the fact that—at all events for a time—it is fashionable to be, or to pretend to be, a teetotaller, and that it is a fashion which not only permeates every class of society, but that the Blue Ribbon Army is gaining popularity every day everywhere, and is, indeed, an institution which, in point of members and respectability, is foolish, no doubt, but formidable.” If that is not encouraging from the mouth of an enemy, I don’t know what is encouraging, and you foolish and formidable people may take courage and go on with your battle. (Applause.) Judge Mack said in Carlisle some time ago, “The crimes that are committed are not committed so much by drunken men, but by men who are drinking and not recognised to be drunk.” You never heard of a teetotaller being up for these crimes. I remember one of my friends disputing this. I said, “Did you ever hear of a teetotaller being up before the Magistrates?” “Yes,” he said. “What was it for?” I asked. “For being drunk and disorderly,” he said. (Great laughter.) You have heard a great deal about corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections. I believe that it is drink that causes most of the corruption, and were the public-houses shut up there would be very little use of the Corrupt Practices Bill. (Applause.) Argumentative men may say that they believe in free trade. Why we have tried free trade over and over again. In England they gave us free trade in beer—you were too shrewd to allow it to be tried upon you in Scotland. But they tried it in England, and what was the result? Sydney Smith said:—“The Beer Act has begun to work; everybody who is not singing is sprawling; the sovereign people are in a beastly state.” (Laughter.) Then free trade in drink has been tried in Switzerland. The people there said that drink ought to be sold, according to the constitution of the country, as freely as any other article. All restrictions were taken away, and for the last eight years they have had free trade in Switzerland. And what is the result? What did the correspondent of the Times say about a month ago in writing home? He said:—“The country is going rapidly to ruin. It will soon be in a state of universal bankruptcy. Everybody is at their wits’ end, and now they talk about the traffic in drink, and the only way will be to give the cantons option, and allow them to get rid of the drink.” So you see when the Times newspaper has come round to cry for local option for Switzerland, it won’t be very long till it turns round and unites in favour of the local option which Sir Wilfrid Lawson wants for Scotland, England, and Ireland. (Loud cheers.) I can fancy an argumentative man saying, “I don’t like permissive legislation. I like it to be imperial.” Quite right, I would go in for a Maine law to-morrow for the whole kingdom if I could carry it. (Cheers.) There is the rub—(laughter and cheers)—and I think it is always better to work on in a practical way with the means you have at hand. And your present system is permissive. There is no Imperial enactment that there shall be public-houses here or there, or that there shall not be such houses here or there. The whole thing is left to certain people. We have magistrates in England—I think you call them bailies here. I believe they are the same sort of creature. (Laughter.) The Bailies, who grant licenses, are appointed by the Town Council, and the Town Council is appointed by the ratepayers. You see that, although somewhat circuitously, you have a licensing board in Scotland already. These people select or elect the publicans. I am not going to find fault with Bailies, publicans, or anybody else. They are all doing their best—bad is their best—(laughter and cheers)—but they are doing their best. I don’t suppose any of them wish to promote drunkenness; I am sure the Bailies don’t; and I am sure the publicans don’t want drunkenness either. If they could sell as much drink without drunkenness they would be very happy. (Laughter and cheers.) Oh, yes, they have a good deal to say for themselves. I saw the other day, they said, “These local optionists are getting so strong we must have lectures to counteract them.” I understand they are organising a scheme to get lecturers to show the benefits of drink. (Laughter.) I am always happy to help the publicans—(laughter)—and I would suggest that when they go round lecturing they should take illustrations with them. (Laughter and cheers.) I see you all understand that. You know we had an illustration in the gallery a little time ago. (Laughter.) All I have to say is I wish the publicans all success in their lecturing tour. They are trying to put down drunkenness, as we are—only they take the wrong way to do it—(cheers)—and if they don’t convince the people, then they ought not to be allowed to set up their shops and carry on their businesses in the places where the people do not want them. (Cheers.) That is the whole of my policy—if I may call it so without egotism—the whole of my policy for which I have been abused up hill and down dale for the last twenty years or so. Let each district have the choice of whether they will have public houses in the district or whether they will not. That is local option. (Cheers.) Now, how does it work? My friend, Mr. Caine, the member for Scarborough, was going through a small town in Wales, and he saw a procession and a band of music, with flags, and a gentleman being carried on the shoulders of the people. When he asked what it meant, he was told, “That is the pig man.” Then he saw another band of music and procession, and another man hoisted shoulder high, and he was told that was “the anti pig man.” (Laughter.) He found on further inquiry that the people had a bye-law empowering them to vote on the question whether pigs should be allowed to be kept in pig-styes near the streets—(laughter)—and he believed the anti-pig men carried the day, and the pigs had to be removed. The people there had local option—local option as to pigs. (Laughter and cheers.) Now, if it be right, just, and constitutional for the ratepayers in Wales to have local option as to pigs, is it not right, just, and constitutional that the men of Falkirk should have local option as to publicans? (Cheers.) You have the option sometimes not exercised by the people, but by individuals. You have heard of individuals who have done away with public houses where they have existed, and where the people have been thankful to them for having done so. And you have heard of the noble struggle which has been made by Lord Zetland and Mr. Brown, who have tried to get rid of the public houses in Grangemouth. (Cheers.) They are doing their best to relieve the town of an injury. They do not succeed so well as I could wish; and perhaps some of you may say it is rather hard that Lord Zetland should take away these privileges from the people by his single voice. Well, I should be glad if he did it, because I believe he is doing good; but I would much rather, and I believe Mr. Brown would much rather, that the people of Grangemouth themselves had the right to say whether the public houses should be amongst them. (Cheers.) I am not wanting to compel you to do anything. Those people who like to have public houses have only to hold their tongues and not vote against them, and the magistrates would go on as before. "Let him that is filthy be filthy still." (Laughter and cheers.) You may like to have what the Liverpool newspaper advertisements call "a good drinking neighbourhood." That means a very busy neighbourhood, full of people bustling about, great activity, a great many policemen, tax-gatherers, pawnbrokers, and jailers, and the hangman. That is "a good drinking neighbourhood" which a good many people like; and if you like it, then it would remain so. All I say is that if there be people who want "a good sober neighbourhood" instead of "a good drinking neighbourhood," it is only right and just that they should have an opportunity of saying so and getting rid of the cause of the evils to which I have referred. (Cheers.) Some people may say "It is all very well to try to get rid of public houses; but the people won't do it." Well, then, under local option they will be no worse than now. (Cheers.) Nobody is a prophet. Nobody can tell what the people would do. (Cheers.) I believe that if they had this power, and if all the ministers of the gospel brought home to them the responsibility of this power, you would find great results where you expected the very least. (Cheers.) But there are other people who go for much more. They say, "We must have power to the people to regulate the traffic, to decide who will have the licenses, and who will not have them, and which houses will be licensed, and how many hours they will be open, and when they will be shut." All these people go a great deal further than me. I am not an extreme man. (Laughter.) Far from it. I am one of the most moderate slow-going chaps you can conceive of. (Laughter.) What is called a good and safe man I am. (Cheers.) My plan is simple. No great man likes simple things. The clever men in the House of Commons don't like a simple scheme. There is no scope for their ingenuity and argument. They are like Naaman the Syrian, who, when he was told to go and wash in the Jordan, said, "What, go and wash in a dirty little stream?—I will have nothing to do with it." He wanted some large and comprehensive measure. (Laughter and cheers.) All I want is the simple power to the people to clear out the drink shops, if they wish to do so. (Cheers.) People suppose that the Alliance goes in for a kind of new licensing scheme. No. It simply wants to give the people the power, when public opinion is ripe for it, to get rid of the whole nuisance once for all. I saw it stated in a Scotch newspaper writing about East Lothian, where some little misfortune happened to somebody or other—(laughter)—that one of the candidates had promised not to vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's bill. Now I have no bill. I am not clever enough for bills. (Laughter.) I used to have a bill, but clever men said it was not right, so I have dropped the bill, and I have now only the principle of the bill, and when the principle is carried you shall carry the bill. The local option resolution was passed on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo in 1880, and it simply declares that "this House is of opinion that the legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of licenses should be placed in the hands of the persons most deeply interested, namely, the inhabitants themselves, who are entitled to protection from the injurious consequences of the present system by some efficient measure of local option." That resolution is clear enough; yet in the House of Commons it was argued that it meant this, and it might mean that, and ought to mean some other thing, and might be twisted to mean something else. (Laughter.) I was perfectly delighted to hear such an exercise of human ingenuity as those speeches displayed. But I explained that the resolution means what it says, that the people should have "power to restrain the issue or renewal of licences"—that is, of stopping altogether the trade. (Cheers.) I daresay it means a great many other things, because a great many statesmen said it did so, but it means this one thing, and that is the one thing I ask you to stick to. As the auctioneer said, "We will ask no more, and we will take no less." (Cheers.) But don't suppose that we are dogmatic—we will take no less, but as much more as they will give us. (Laughter.) We will take all these grand schemes about Licensing Boards, but we must have the popular veto. (Cheers.) That is our pound of flesh. That we ask in justice, and that we mean to have. (Cheers.) This is a favourable time. We have got the House of Commons into working order, we have greased the wheels, oiled the springs, and set the old coach on its legs again. (Laughter and cheers.) I think we had better work. The newspapers talk of the programme of the coming session when they have nothing else to write about, and they say there is bankruptcy reform. Let us stop the cause of these bankruptcies. (Cheers.) There is local government—a good thing, but first give us power to govern the drink traffic. (Cheers.) The corporation of London is to be reformed—a good thing to get aldermen to eat less and work more—(laughter)—and govern better—still there are only three millions in London, and there are thirty-five millions of people who would be benefited by local option. (Cheers.) Then there is to be a great measure for the prevention of floods. The prevention of floods of drink would do far more good than the prevention of floods of water. (Cheers.) Legislators will defer dealing with this question as long as they can. Statesmen are only tide-waiters. They sit on the bank till the tide runs strong enough, and then they launch their bark; and they would rather sit still than if they could. (Laughter.) Why so? Because there is a great vested interest at the back of the drink trade. Louis Napoleon said that "a vested interest is organised—the nation is unorganised." We come here to try and organise the nation against a vested interest, and I don't think I come to a place where the soil is likely to be barren, because Scotland has already done nobly in this great struggle. (Cheers.) The Scotch members went into the lobby with me for local option in the majority of 8 to 1 who went in for the publican. (Cheers.) I said, "Well done, Scotland." (Cheers.) But I say now, since Scotland has done so well, don't let it slacken its efforts now, and the day cannot be long distant when the people of this country will gain for themselves the possession of a weapon with which they will be able, if they are so minded, to overthrow the drink trade, which is the greatest obstacle still remaining to the success of that temperance reformation which years ago Mr. Cobden declared lay at the foundation of every social and political reform. (Sir Wilfrid Lawson resumed his seat amidst loud and prolonged cheers.) The resolution was carried by acclamation.

Mr. ANDREW BROWN, Kerse, moved the second resolution as follows:—"That this meeting is convinced that, owing to the advanced public sentiment on liquor legislation in Scotland, no measure will be satisfactory which does not confer on the ratepayers the entire control of the liquor traffic in their respective localities; and pledges itself to obtain from Parliament, at the earliest possible moment, the power to prevent liquor shops being forced on unwilling communities." In supporting the resolution, Mr. Brown referred to the great change which had taken place in the public mind on the question of temperance, maintained that the advocates of temperance would continue determined in the prosecution of their great work, and expressed his confidence that the day was not far distant when they would hurl the drink traffic from the land. (Cheers.) Mr. W. W. Hunter, Denny, in seconding the resolution, said that the gigantic legalised foe of the drink traffic barred their path in every way—its temptations being too strong for many to be able to resist. He called upon the meeting to unite in support of the great movement on behalf of which they were met that evening. Mr. J. H. Waterston, Edinburgh, supported the resolution in a vigorous and lively speech, in which he contended that the whole tax-paying community were injured by the existence of the drink traffic, and were therefore entitled to have a voice in deciding the question whether it ought to be continued in their midst. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Provost MACPHERSON, Grangemouth, proposed the third resolution as follows:—"That copies of the foregoing resolutions be signed by the chairman, and forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Lord Advocate, Lord Rosebery, and the Scotch Members of Parliament; and that it be remitted to the Committee who arranged for this meeting, to take such steps as they think necessary to press the claims of this movement upon the Government and others interested." Councillor Young, Falkirk, seconded the resolution, remarking that he appeared there to show his sympathy with the temperance movement, and he was sure they had heard that night what would do them all good, whether or not they were teetotalers. (Applause.) The Rev. Mr. Wade moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, which was acknowledged by Sir Wilfrid Lawson. A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought to a close the proceedings of perhaps the largest and most enthusiastic meeting that has ever been held in Falkirk in connection with the temperance movement.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—No. 1.

NOTICES OF MOTION: PROHIBITION OF THE PAYMENT OF WAGES IN PUBLIC-HOUSES: SUNDAY CLOSING FOR ISLE OF WIGHT: SIR W. LAWSON AND THE HOME SECRETARY: LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION: DISTILLERS AND THE EXCISE.

The fourth session of the present Parliament was opened without ceremonial on Thursday, 15th ult. As last year, there was no mention of the liquor question in the address, but, as has been the case for these many years, a number of notices of resolutions and of bills relative to the liquor question were given on the first day of the session. Amongst these were the following:—The Attorney-General intimated his intention to bring in a bill for the better prevention of corrupt and illegal practices at Parliamentary elections (cheers); Mr. Fry, to-morrow, to bring in a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays in the county of Durham (oh, oh, and laughter); Mr. Fry, to-morrow, to move in committee of the whole House for leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the granting of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors; Mr. Carbutt, to-morrow, to bring in a bill for the closing of public-houses on Sunday in the county of Monmouth (oh, oh, and laughter); Mr. O. Sullivan to bring in a bill to prevent spirits leaving bond in less than a month; Sir Joseph Pease to bring in a bill dealing with the question of Sunday closing for England and Wales (oh and cheers); Mr. Meldon to bring in a bill to shorten the hours during which public-houses in Ireland are open on Saturday (oh and cheers); Mr. Stevenson to introduce a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday (oh and cheers); and Mr. Richardson to bring in a bill to renew and amend the Irish Sunday Closing Act.

February 16th.—In the House of Lords, Earl Stanhope presented a bill to prohibit the payment of wages in public-houses. The noble Earl observed that the bill was precisely similar to that which passed their Lordships' House last year.

February 19th.—In the House of Commons, Sir W. Harcourt, in answer to Sir R. Cross, stated that Mr. Evelyn Ashley, in introducing a Sunday Closing Bill for the Isle of Wight, had done so as member for that constituency, and not as a member of the Government. The Government, however, did not object to piecemeal legislation on the subject. It was a question, no doubt, of areas, but the Government had always held it was essentially one on which localities ought to judge for themselves.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government proposed to take for giving effect to the resolution which had been adopted and reaffirmed by this House, to the effect that the inhabitants of localities should be empowered to restrain the issue or renewal of licenses in their respective districts?

Sir W. Harcourt—I think my hon. friend, the member for Carlisle, wants to know a little too much a little too soon. The only answer I can give him on this subject is, that when the Government bring forward measures with reference to local government, they propose to deal with the question of licensing as a question of local government.

Sir W. Lawson—Does the right hon. gentleman refer to the bill for London, or to a bill for the country in general?

Sir W. Harcourt—It is rather premature to refer to the bill for London; but I have said generally that the bill for London is part of the proposals which the Government have to make on the subject of local government, and all I can tell him is, that the Government do regard this question of licensing essentially as a question of local government.

February 20th.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice that on the earliest possible day he would call attention to the urgent demand for legislation, giving effect to the local option resolution already passed by this House, and move a resolution. (Cheers.)

Mr. Courteney, in reply to Mr. Meldon, said a distiller was allowed to give his workmen a dram once or twice a day without restriction as to the age of the person supplied, or as to the quality. The excise authorities had no knowledge as to the amount so consumed, as it was included in the waste. In the case of beer no such privilege was granted, as beer was not locked up during the process of manufacture. The Board of Inland Revenue would withdraw this privilege were it not for fear that a worse evil might arise from the workmen tampering with the spirits.

THE DISASTROUS RESULTS OF SOBRIETY.

DEAR SIR,—I don't know if you have read a pretentious paper by Mr. A. J. Wilson under the above heading. If you have, you must have been amazed that any man of his pretensions should venture to publish such a paper. He makes a hit at the Premier for venturing to insert the well-known paragraph on the decrease of revenue from drink in the Queen's Speech. He then proceeds to point out that we derive 30 millions of revenue from that source, and to tell at length what it does for us. But he says if the decrease continues for a length of time, and comes to a total of five millions, where is the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get it? He proceeds to notice a variety of sources only to declare that increase from these is impossible, except it may be a trifle from Income-tax. He declares that the drinker, and specially the hard drinker, must be a patriot of the most deserving kind. His throat and stomach are sacrificed, as well as his purse for his country's good. If he closes his mouth, where is to be found the means of paying the interest of the National debt, or how are the Army and Navy to be provided for? No doubt a sudden and immediate cessation of the £30,000,000 would cause no little inconvenience, but that is not to be looked for. If time is allowed there should be no difficulty in making good the deficit. The nation spends 130 millions in the price of the drink, and losses as much more. Now if the drink traffic were stopped this would be saved, and if so there could surely be no difficulty in getting 30 millions for the Exchequer. But I am not purposing to deal with this at present, but to look at a part of the subject which Mr. Wilson never hints at, and which, so far as his paper shows, he does not think worthy of notice. Is it not possible to get our revenue at too high a price? What have we to pay for these millions of revenue? Let us reflect on this point.

1. We get these millions at the price of tens of thousands of our fellow-citizens being pauperised every year. We have about one million paupers constantly among us, at a very heavy cost, and three-fourths of these are drink produced. But Government ought to prevent this as far as possible.

2. We have as another part of the price of these 30 millions, a heavy list of criminals—fully 400,000 such are drink made every year. This also involves heavy loss—loss from the harm done to property, loss of wealth in supporting police, in maintaining the means of trying the criminals and in punishing them, besides various other consequent losses—Government ought to minimise these, not to encourage them.

3. These millions cost us a large number of lunatics every year, for a large proportion of these are the result of drinking.

4. These millions are got at an annual cost of tens of thousands of our daughters, who are by drink ruined for time and eternity, and made a curse and disgrace to our land. We have at least 200,000 fallen women—and most of these are made such by drink, and they cost the nation in money alone not less than 15 millions a year, besides myriads of broken hearts of parents, brothers, sisters, and relatives.

5. The millions are the price of an enormous amount of sickness and suffering and consequent loss. One-third of the sickness of the nation is said to be due directly or indirectly to the use of intoxicants. Some of our ablest medical men place the estimate at that proportion, and all the available evidence bears out their testimony. What this causes the nation to lose annually it is impossible to tell, but the sum must be very large.

6. These millions are got at the cost of blood and life. It has been estimated that the deaths caused by drink are at least 120,000, the direct or indirect fruit of the drinking habits of society. Dr. B. W. Richardson rates this loss at one-third of the total deaths or 230,000. Assuming, however, that the loss is 120,000, what does it mean? It means that the nation to get its revenue sacrifices these lives yearly or sells them at £250 each! After this talk of slavery, speak of the cruelties of the tribes of Central Africa. What are these compared with a nation professing Christianity annually sacrificing 120,000 of its subjects to death in order that it may derive a revenue from their vices which lead to their deaths.

Such are the most serious items of the price paid for these 30 millions. And I ask you in all seriousness if we are not paying too dear for our money. If it is from the destruction and demoralisation of the people that the revenue comes, it is got at too great a price. We commend the remarks of the Malagasy Ambassadors to the Alliance deputation to our readers' consideration, and we ask if our rulers might not learn a lesson of government from these sable politicians. I think, sir, you would do well to expound this subject to your readers. It would not be difficult to see a means of meeting the demands of the Exchequer. I might venture to say something on this point, but space will not allow. Meanwhile I am, yours, &c.

SCRUTATOR.

The General Post Office has a total abstinence society with a membership 300 strong.

It has been ascertained that only six per cent. of the converts of the Blue Ribbon Mission at Richmond have fallen from their pledge.

We are glad to see that Mr. J. H. Raper has been elected one of the Directors of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Providential Institution.

Professor Calderwood, of Edinburgh, became an abstainer during the first year of his attendance at the university, and he had adhered to his pledge ever since.

There is little difference between 1881 and 1882 in the number of drinkers in the army who were fined for drunkenness. They number 23,000 odds in both years.

The Canada Casket reprints the whole of the new tract written by Bailie Selkirk, J.P., in its issue of January, 18th, but it forgets to acknowledge its authorship.

Lord Elcho, now Earl of Wemyss, is desirous of resigning the post of president of the Liberty and Property Defence League in favour of some one having a seat in the House of Commons.

We were glad to see that Mr. William Blackwood, the northern District Superintendent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, has had his admirable lecture, on the "Land and the People," fully reported in the Montrose Review last month. The Alloa Advertiser, which cherishes a high appreciation of him, gives considerable space to a report of the same truly excellent lecture.

In the year ending 31st March last there were 193,213 licenses in England, 25,181 in Scotland, and 24,785 in Ireland—being 243,179 from which the Inland Revenue derived a revenue of £1,871,968.

A veteran printer erected a plain tomb stone for himself, on which might have been seen after his death:—"L. H. R——, printer. A worn and battered form gone to be recast more beautiful and perfect."

Mr. Andrew Bennet, District Superintendent of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, delivered a very edifying lecture before the Corsock Mutual Improvement Society on "Practical hints to practical men."

"It is humbug for an officer to lecture men about drinking, advising them against the use of spirits, and then go to his tent to be merry over a bottle of sherry." So says Lord Wolseley, but the gallant General joins a club to get wine at wholesale prices! He nobly sees his error, and unhesitatingly withdraws.

The Irish Temperance League intends to hold its annual meetings on Thursday, 19th, Friday, 20th, and Saturday, 21st April next. A great feature of the forthcoming anniversary will be a Blue Ribbon Mission. The Mission is to be continued from the 8th to the 22nd April.

The men who wield the shears:—

"The pen indeed is mighty, but the men
Who wield the shining shears with skill and taste,
And then so carefully apply the paste,
Are cognisant of things beyond the ken
Of those who only use the pungent pen."

In answer to Rev. John Whyte, Moyness, Sir G. M'Pherson Grant, M.P., at Nairn, said he had voted for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's local option resolution, and would cordially support any bill the Government brought in giving the people of the district a more direct vote in the matter of licensing.

An idiotic proposal floating in Chicago is to increase the police force to five hundred men, and compel the saloons to support them. 100 dollars from each saloon keeper would be sufficient. If they were to abolish the saloon, they would prevent many a policeman from losing his character through public-house corruption.

Professor Coates' health and character lectures are still continued at his rooms, 62 Sanchiehall Street, each week. Tuesday evening, at 8 P.M., admission free by ticket. But at the Friday night lectures a small charge will be made for admission to prevent overcrowding. The course will be to men only—on Chastity, Temperance, and Social Purity.

A good Methodist once went to a blue ribbon mission meeting and signed the pledge. He then turned to the audience and said:—"This is not a rash step. I have a grocer's license, and it has long troubled me. I thank my friends for their past orders, but I can serve them no longer with drink." Rev. G. W. M'Ree believes the grocer slept soundly that same night.

Mr. Clarke Aspinall, coroner for Liverpool, said that it was now a twelve month since he came to the conclusion that it was doubtful if logic or argument ever would convince a chronic drinker, and of the opinion that precept was a grand thing, but example a much more effectual thing. He resolved to give up alcohol absolutely and entirely, so that whereas before he said to working and other folks, "Do as I say," so now he could say to them, "Do as I do."

Mr. Cameron of Lochiel, M.P. for Inverness-shire, will probably retire from the House of Commons at the dissolution, although the most desperate efforts have been made to induce him to reconsider his decision, as the Tories of Inverness-shire are well aware that they cannot hope to obtain so strong a candidate in his place. The Mackintosh is understood to be "the coming man" of his party. The seat will, of course, be contested by the Liberals, and with every prospect of success.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON AT LEICESTER.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson addressed a large meeting at Leicester, and said that having had three Irish sessions it was time Parliament turned its attention to England, Scotland, and Wales. They had given the legislative machine a complete overhauling, and expected to run an express train. One measure should be levelled against the drinking customs of the country. The law at present was against temperance, and it was necessary that it should be amended. This Parliament was returned to legislate on the drink question, and the Government should deal with it by giving power to the people to vote licenses.

Some time ago a discussion took place in these columns between the Rev. Mr. M'Kenzie and our staunch contributor Robin Goodfellow. We remember that the latter asserted that every civilized nation on the face of the earth had abandoned free trade in drink. It might have been said that Switzerland was an exception, but not fairly. For the deplorable free trade there is the result of a judgment which cannot be said to be in harmony with equity. Free trading is an article in the Swiss constitution, yet on the assumption that even free trading must be in harmony with just trading, the various authorities "fenced off" the liquor traffic with great stringency. For example, it was decreed that no public-house in excess of the supposed needs of the population could be permitted, and publicans had to give security for the proper conduct of their houses; they had to be men of good character, women not being allowed to keep such places: public-houses nearly everywhere could not be placed near churches, schools, orphanages, poorhouses, or like institutions. The tenure of licenses was limited; no drink could be sold to young persons, nor were these allowed to frequent public-houses, which closed at night and nearly all Sundays. This was the condition of the liquor traffic in Switzerland previous to 1874. Switzerland was neither better nor worse than the nations of Europe cursed so mightily as they are by the operations of the liquor traffic. In that year the 31st article of the constitution was interpreted to mean that every citizen had a right to trade, and unfortunately the sellers of alcoholic beverages were held to come under the class thus declared lawful free traders. The number of public-houses rose from 17,807 in 1870, to 21,738 in 1880. The population increased by 6 per cent. in that time, the public-houses by 22 per cent., or nearly fourfold. This gives 1 to every 130 inhabitants, or 1 to every 26 families, and there are more public-houses than all other shops together. The usual fruits have followed—there is a marked increase of drunkenness and crime, 40 to 60 per cent. of the crimes in Bâle can be traced to drink. Economically, the evil is of fearful magnitude. The amount spent equals £10 per head of the population, and a bottle of brandy only costs 8d.; to spend £10, therefore, the drinkers would require to consume 300 bottles of brandy each, or one for nearly every working day. Now we have here free trade in drink on a pretty large scale, and just as everywhere the Swiss nation as a whole is finding that the drunkenness of the Cantons are in proportion to the facilities for procuring intoxicating liquors; that as the public-houses increase the drunkenness, crime, and poverty, of the people increase; that the traffic will not surrender finally to appeals or to the gospel, but only to the law, and they are crying loudly for its interference.

GOSPEL TEMPERANCE BLUE RIBBON ARMY.—The usual weekly meeting of the Govan (east end) section of the above army was held in the Portland Hall on Tuesday evening, 13th ult. Mr. Gibson presided, and Mr. Robert Mackay of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association delivered an address, in which he endeavoured to prove that temperance, i.e., total abstinence, was one of the manifest fruits of the gospel. The lecture was characterised by great fervency of spirit and clearness of delivery, and was listened to attentively by those who were privileged to hear it.—Govan Press.

THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.—This Company is proposed to be incorporated for the purpose of carrying on all descriptions of life and accident assurance, endowment and annuity business, and such other incidental business as is usually carried on in connection therewith or analogous thereto. The prospectus states that "the special feature of this company will be the insurance of lives of total abstainers at reduced premiums. Experience has now clearly demonstrated that the lives of total abstainers, as a class, are better than those of non-abstainers." "It is thought that the time has now arrived when the fact of total abstainers enjoying greater longevity should be fully and fairly acknowledged, and that this can best be done by accepting the insurance of such lives at premiums so reduced as to fairly meet the risk involved." We understand the share list is filling up and will close on an early date.

The Rev. James Scott, of the Evangelistic Association, Glasgow, speaking last month at Greenock on the work of the Association said—The permanency of the work may be seen in another way. At Mr. Moody's suggestion, working men who had been given to drink, but had abandoned its use on accepting Christ, were formed into what was called the "Mizpah Band." Fully 800 were thus united. They are being well watched over, and it is found that only about six per cent. have lapsed; and we have still good hope of not a few of those who, for the time being, have gone back. Further, some of the very best workers we have were once slaves to strong drink. I believe I am within the mark in saying that we have in the ranks of our earnest steady gospel workers hundreds who were at one time heavy drinkers. Having all through my remarks magnified the keeping power of Christ, I should, perhaps, as a caution, say that I do not believe this power will avail for the reclaimed drunkard if he ceases to abstain. In his case abstinence is the test of faith, and it would be nothing short of mockery for such an one to trifle with drink, and then ask the Lord to keep him. Even when a man testifies that the desire for drink is entirely gone, we still warn him that this is only true so long as he continues to abstain. Believing this, we not only urge abstinence at the start of the Christian life, but we recommend it as a Christian duty all through, and urge those who have taken the pledge to press it on others. For we know that much of their own safety will be found in their efforts to save others. This is not matter of theory. In all my experience I never knew a reclaimed man who ventured to taste strong drink and did not fall thereby. (Applause.)

DEPUTATION OF "SOCIAL AND MORAL REFORMERS" TO DR. CAMERON, M.P.—On Monday, 12th ult., this gentleman met, by appointment, a number of "moral and social reformers" in the Christian Institute, Glasgow. Their purpose was to arrange with the honourable member for the early introduction into the House of Commons of a bill giving effect to local option by means of local representative boards. The circular was signed principally by members and supporters of the Scottish Temperance League. Sir William Collins, Knt., presided, and there was a good attendance. The chairman read the circular convening the meeting: held all present committed to licensing boards; deprecated licensing functions being conferred on county boards; preferred special boards; viewed a local veto as opposed to the genius and policy of our legislation, and claimed local boards as the more workable scheme of carrying out local option; held that the direct veto was just the Permissive Bill back again; and was of opinion that that veto would not effect a reduction in the number of licenses. He closed by a question: "He could imagine the mind of the constituency favourable to reducing the number of public-houses by one half, but could this be done by a plebiscite?" The Rev. J. A. Johnston, Springburn, moved a resolution, asking Dr. Cameron to introduce into Parliament a bill on the lines of the circular (boards superseding licensing courts would have full power to refuse all new applications and transfers and renewals of licenses). The rev. gentleman's remarks were just an echo of those of Sir William Collins. Ex-Provost Campbell, Greenock, believed that if licenses were dealt with by local boards they would be better managed than at present. Dr. Cameron, M.P., in his reply, approved of licensing boards as a material step in the right direction. He supported Mr. Cowen's and Mr. J. F. Harrison's licensing boards bills, placing his name on the back of the latter one. He objected to the object of the meeting, as being for arranging with him rather than having as its object to submit reasons for his undertaking the introduction of such a bill, as he never in any way pledged himself on a subject. He knew the merits of such a proposal thoroughly well, and had committed himself to it more than once, for the simple reason that, as a temperance reformer himself, he had always gone to the fullest extent, and for everything short of the fullest extent which would ameliorate the present deplorable state of things. Magistrates had no final power—the final power of decision lying with Quarter Sessions. Now, if local boards such as they desired were instituted, they must face the contingency of a possible increase of licenses. If they, however, had all the powers of the present boards together, with the power of Quarter Sessions, their licensing boards would constitute an immense improvement on the present system. (Applause.) But, after all is said, the fact of the matter is he liked, when introducing bills, to introduce those he thought that he should be able to carry. He thought it desirable to know whether there was any consensus or divergence of opinion, and to seek that information from headquarters. He requested the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association to give him their views frankly, simply for his guidance as a politician in this matter. He read part of the resolution they had sent. It was as follows: "That the Executive is of opinion that the time has fully come when the moral and social reformers of Scotland, setting aside as in their nature insufficient and unsatisfactory all merely restrictive schemes such as licensing boards, should unite in a national effort to secure a direct and full ratepayers' veto on the liquor traffic, as the only adequate and permanent solution of the question of temperance reform." He fully understood the view of the question adopted by the Association. His name had been on the back of Sir W. Lawson's Permissive Bill; and he had been on too many platforms not to know thoroughly well the position he takes up—a position which is perfectly logical and intelligible. He thought there was no use blinking the fact—any effective measure would meet with the most vigorous and energetic opposition at the hands of publicans and their friends. But opposition from within their own camp was a much more serious matter, and greatly compromises the chance of success. For though a private member might be unable to carry it, yet he might advance it so far as to get the Government to take the subject up—provided the whole temperance party were unanimous concerning it. Government would only be too glad if they saw disunion to refuse to put aside other measures and deal with theirs. He should not like to pledge himself to undertake the charge of a bill which might cause unfriendliness between different sections of the temperance cause. He understood the Permissive Bill Association were going to bring in a measure, and he had consented to put his name on the back of it. Whatever happened he should continue to do his best, as he had always hitherto done, to promote the cause of temperance in Scotland whenever and in whatever way it seemed to him it could be most effectively assisted forward. (Applause.) Sir W. Collins thought the Permissive Bill Association were fully committed to support a local boards bill. Rev. Mr. Johnston thought their Permissive Bill friends were misrepresenting their views. Their bill would do all that the Permissive Bill would do and more. (Applause.) On the motion of Mr. A. Allan, the following committee were appointed:—Sir W. Collins, Rev. J. A. Johnston, ex-Provost Campbell, ex-Bailie Lamberton, Mr. Wm. Borland, Mr. A. Cross, and ex-Bailie Buchanan—to confer with the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. Dr. Cameron encouraged the audience by stating that if unanimity were secured he was willing to take charge of the bill. A vote of thanks to Sir W. Collins for presiding terminated the interview.

PUBLIC PRESS.

WHISKY PROFITS.—The profit on the sale of whisky by retail is enormous. There are in a barrel of whisky 31 gallons. At retail there are 64 drinks in a gallon, and 1,984 drinks in a barrel. Cost per gallon, say, 10s. 5d. This makes the cost of 31 gallons £16 2s. 11d., and 1,984 drinks at 2½d. per drink are £41 6s. 8d. Deduct the cost, £16 2s. 11d., and it leaves of profit for one barrel of whisky, £25 3s. 9d. If a saloon keeper can sell four barrels a month he receives £100 19s. 2d., and for the year, £1211 10s. Take out for expenses £312 10s. and it leaves a nett profit of £899. For a barrel of ale of 31 gallons the cost is about £1 13s. 4d. In a gallon the drinks will average 18; at 2½d. a drink this is 3s. 9d. a gallon, or £5 16s. 3d. a barrel. Deduct the cost of beer, £1 13s. 4d., and it leaves of profit £4 2s. 11d. a barrel, or on the 11,000,000 of barrels, at 2½d. a glass for beer and ale, £57,291,666 13s. 4d. The cost to the people of the United States for distilled and fermented liquors must be some £166,666,666 13s. 4d. a year. This is an enormous sum for drink! And not a dollar of this vast expenditure adds anything to the physical, mental, or moral well-being of our family, but creates misery and evil beyond the power of any pen to describe or any imagination to conceive.—The Prohibitionist.

PUTTING THE CUP TO THE NEIGHBOUR'S LIPS.—Where is all the religion—teachings of the Bible—the Christianity that allows professing Christians to see drunkenness going on unmolested by law? Where are the millions of Christian voters—who annually vote for Congressmen and legislators—that cast never a vote to prohibit the curse of drunkenness? If all the Christians and sober men who annually vote for political principles would also vote for temperance and against liquor traffic, we should see drunkenness as rare as arson and stealing; we should soon see intemperance as much an outcast by public opinion, as gambling and robbery now are; soon the sale of liquor would be as effectually prohibited as are lottery tickets. What say you Christian voters?—Anvil.

THE LOVE OF DRINK.—When this vice has taken fast hold of a man, farewell industry, farewell emulation, farewell attention to things worthy of attention, farewell love of virtuous society, farewell decency of manners, and farewell to even an attention to person; every thing is sunk by this predominant and brutal appetite. In how many instances do we see men who have begun life with the brightest prospects before them, and who have closed it without one ray of comfort and consolation! Young men with good fortunes, good talents, good tempers, good hearts, and sound constitutions, only by being drawn into the vortex of the drunkard, have become by degrees the most loathsome and despicable of mankind. In the house of the drunkard there is no happiness for any one. All is uncertainty and anxiety. He is not the same man for one day at a time. No one knows anything of his outgoings or his incomings. When he will rise, or when he will lie down to rest, is wholly a matter of chance. That which he swallows for what he calls pleasure, brings pain, as surely as the night brings the morning. Poverty and misery are in the train.—Ec.

Local option has not only been elevated to a place among practical politics, but the Home Secretary intimates that it is to take front rank. Answering Sir Wilfrid Lawson in the House of Commons recently, who inquired when and how Government meant to deal with this question, Sir William Harcourt, after suggesting that the hon. member for Carlisle would never die for want of information if it could be got for the asking, intimated that "Government proposed to deal with the question of licensing as a matter of local government when they brought forward their measure on that subject."—N. B. Daily Mail.

I hear that one of the provisions which will be contained in the bill for the municipal reform of the metropolis will give powers to the ratepayers to exercise the principle of local option in the matter of public-house licensing. This is, of course, a proposal which will at once create a formidable array of new opponents to the reforming zeal of the Home Secretary, but no doubt local option in the metropolis would afford a splendid opportunity for testing the merits of a novel principle in licensing legislation.—Glasgow Herald, 16th Feb.

Now as to the interpretation of the accepted principle of local option, it seems to us a clear case of misdirection to assume that the institution of licensing boards is in any way a fulfilment of that principle; any intermediate authority placed between the direct expression of the ratepayers, and the intended result of that expression is in opposition to the terms and spirit of local option. If the time ever comes that the community will be called upon to vote in the election of a licensing board, in giving that vote, that community will have parted with all control over the purpose they intended to carry, and they will then find that local option, so far as licensing boards are concerned, is a local delusion and a snare. A thousand times wiser, to take the simpler and more logical course of putting the whole traffic on one level; and, by a comprehensive measure, invest the people with the privilege of suppressing the whole "trade," so that no member of the fraternity could urge the plea that he had been invidiously dealt with. To those who have hitherto led the crusade against the public-house we would say, don't allow yourselves to be shunted by tenuous counsel on to any line of action that does not lead clear on to the entire suppression of the traffic. Don't let us swerve in our loyalty to our recognised chief, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and depend upon it our victory is nearer than we apprehend.—The Temperance Register for Perth and Perthshire.

HOW A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT WAS EDUCATED.—At a blue ribbon meeting held recently in Poole, Mr. W. Shepherd Allen, M.P., said he would give them the story of his own conversion on the temperance question. Seventeen years ago, when he first entered Parliament, he thought, like many others, that the evils caused by drink were much exaggerated. He thought that teetotallers and Alliance men, and all such, were, to use a mild term, fanatics. But when he entered Parliament the United Kingdom

Alliance sent him their publications, their agents interviewed him, and led him to think on the subject. He thought, as they said such and such things about the drink, it was his duty, as a Member of Parliament, to see for himself if those evils really existed. His next step was to visit a large number of gin palaces and public houses in the worst part of London, Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, just to see if the evils caused by drink were as great as he was told they were, and after visiting some 400 or 500 of these places he was thoroughly convinced that the evils of the drink traffic had not been exaggerated, and that it was impossible to exaggerate them. Having learnt his lesson he was then educated up to the point of voting for Sunday closing and for local option. But his education was not complete, for he was not a total abstainer. He was a very moderate drinker, and even in his most drinking days he took no more than a glass of wine in a week. How was it he became a total abstainer? He was a married man and had a family, and he soon found out that children were very observant. When he took a glass of wine his children wanted some as well, and he felt that would not do. He felt that he must not teach them by his example to raise the intoxicating cup to their lips, when he knew it was causing such terrible misery to tens of thousands of his countrymen. Therefore, he became a total abstainer. He still, however, had it in his house and gave it to his friends, but his wife said they must banish it altogether from the house. The next thing was that he heard of the blue ribbon movement, and it struck him that it was one of the grandest movements of modern times. He put on the blue ribbon, his wife, his eldest boy and girl following his example, but as yet they could not persuade the second boy to don it. He was one of those lads who thought for themselves, but depend upon it if he ever did put it on he would keep it on. Out of eight servants in his house six wore the blue ribbon, and he thought they were now about the correct thing so far as the drink question was concerned. The evils of the liquor traffic could not be overstated. He went to the police-courts of England, and of those who were accused he found the bulk were through drink. He went to the gaols of England and asked what brought two-thirds of the inmates there—drink. He went to the workhouses and inquired what brought the crowds of paupers there. He found that in two cases out of three drink was the cause, either directly or indirectly. He went to the wretched homes of England where he found half-starved wives and children, the very picture of want, wretchedness, and misery. Again he asked the cause and he found it was the drink. Before he came into that room he was thinking of the number of men he had known who had fallen by drink. They included clergymen, ministers of the gospel, barristers, lawyers, doctors, bankers, merchants, tradesmen, as well as poor hard working labouring men—all cut down in their manhood's prime and in the flower of their strength, having lost their strength and their lives, and worse than all, having lost heaven. And if such a terrible evil was rampant in the land, what should they do as Englishmen, as Christians, as men who believed in the great day of final accounts, that the Master would render to all according to their works? Should they by example teach men to believe that this was a good and a blessed thing, or should they teach them to believe that it was an evil and a curse. The influence of women in this matter could not be exaggerated. He believed if the ladies in that room would band themselves together in the cause of temperance they might revolutionise the town. Therefore he earnestly exhorted every woman present to take up this temperance cause; and let each man and woman do what they could by their example and in every other way to sweep away this awful curse from the land. O! let them live worthy of their manhood and worthy of their Christianity, so that when the great Master should come they might expect to hear him say, "Well, done."—The Temperance Record.

It just takes three to keep a secret properly, but two of the three must be dead.

If the way to heaven be narrow, it is not long; and if the gate be strait, it opens to endless life.

"Vil you dake sumding?" said a German teetotaler to a friend at a tavern door. "I don't care if I do," was the reply. "Vell den let us dake a walk!"

AND DIDN'T SHE!—A lady once said to Turner, when he was painting, "Why do you put such extravagant colours into your pictures? I never see anything like them in nature." "Don't you wish you did, madam?" rejoined he.

POETRY.

A SUMMER BIRD.

SHE was a lady from the town,
And he a simple country lad;
But on his suit she did not frown,
And, ah, poor soul! his heart was glad.

She came when summer birds were singing
Herself a bird, ah, none so fair!
All light and joy and music bringing
Into the sober country air.

He saw her first, one rosy morn
Beside a sweet brier, sore distressed,
For, oh, a keen and cruel thorn
Deep in her tender palm was pressed.

With skilful hand the thorn he drew,
And bound the wound with kerchief fast,
Ah, simple lad! he little knew
The thorn into his soul had passed!

For when into her heavenly eyes,
With tears suffused, he shyly glanced,
His thought flew upward to the skies,
With sudden, rapturous hope entranced.

But she—oh cruel lady—smiled
As o'er him flamed the sudden joy;
For many a heart had she beguiled,
To spura it, like a broken toy.

Now, day by day, through meadows fair,
And o'er the hill-sides, verdure-clad,
They idly roamed, a happy pair,
For she was kind and he was glad.

But swift the blissful hours flew by;
The summer ripened to decay;
The chill autumnal days drew nigh;
The birds sang low their parting lay;

And she—oh, bird of beauty rare:
Sang sweetly, too, her parting song;
And on the sober country air
The tender music lingered long.

Then, in the deepening twilight gray,
His tale of love again he told;
With mocking smile she turned away,
And left him 'mid the shadows cold.

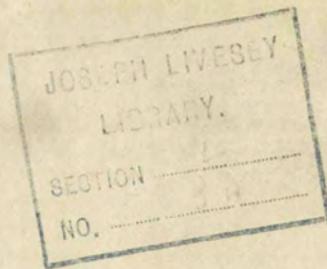

Ah, summer songsters come and go,
And years fade slowly into years,
But still at twilight, sweet and low,
Her tender parting song he hears.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. ARCHIBALD WALKER, PORT-GLASGOW.—We have the, to us truly sorrowful, duty of placing the name of this worthy temperance reformer on the list of departed friends. He died on the 29th January, having passed by one year the term allotted by the Psalmist to human life. He was a public-spirited man; and a number of his friends wished to see him in the Town Council, but they failed in their patriotic intention. He was a leal-hearted abstainer and prohibitionist; and often at the Quay-head he was to be found supporting the advocates of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, who at all times he was eagerly pleased to assist. His life was one of vicissitudes common to staunch reformers who live ahead of their time, and political imprisonment was one of these, but he lived respected and died lamented by a wide circle of true friends.

THE Social Reformer.

APRIL, 1881.

OBSTRUCTIONISTS.

BY REV. S. HARDING, PAISLEY.

WE are not about to refer in this paper to the organized obstruction which has lately prevailed in the British Parliament, nor to the tactics pursued by the party which has earned for itself an unenviable notoriety in opposing the Government measures for Ireland. Their indomitable perseverance, love of country, and self-abnegation, has for the time being given them a name among their countrymen.

Unfortunately obstructionists are not confined to the party referred to, but they are found in connection with the various societies, and organizations, of the present day. They are a slippery, crotchety, critical, crooked, dissatisfied party, that breed distrust, create dissension, and cause obstruction wherever they go.

The temperance party has been hampered, and its progress retarded by these persons. We are not referring to the liquor traffickers. It is their duty to oppose, and obstruct, in every possible way those who are seeking the overthrow of their traffic. We might as reasonably expect Satan to have sympathy with holiness, as for the liquor traffickers to have any sympathy with the work of temperance reformers. The interests of the traffickers and abstainers are directly opposed to each other. It is not with these that we have to deal now. There are obstructionists more powerful for evil, because found in our own ranks, wearing our uniform, and having their names on our roll. They are most difficult to manage. They bend and twist, ascend and descend, some of them are attired in a reversible coat that can be worn in all kinds of weather, and meet the varied circumstances of social and political life. Their consciences are very accommodating. Instead of being seared "as with a hot iron" they are very susceptible and possess a wonderful elasticity, so as to become "all things to all men." They are divided into several classes, each performing its own work in obstructing the temperance movement. We do not mean to insinuate that this is done designedly, but the tactics adopted practically interfere with the onward progress of our movement. Let us for a moment listen to the TALKERS. Speech-making is a wonderful faculty. On great occasions, such as conferences, conversations, and annual meetings, what a display of talent in this department. If one could credit these brethren, their whole being is surcharged with a message of love, and sympathy, to their fellow-men, and that henceforth their entire being will be consecrated to the great work of driving intemperance from the land. Alas! their sympathies are in many instances like "the morning cloud and early dew." In the days of conflict and toil, they leave others to fight the enemy and bear the burden and heat of the day, while they quietly attend to their own business, and take care of number one. Their indifference has a damaging effect upon those who look up to them as examples of self-denial, and earnestness, but are bitterly disappointed when they discover inactivity and selfishness; they cannot come to any other conclusion save that their connection with the movement amounts to little more than talk.

TRIMMERS. These form a very select party. They belong to the secret service department of the movement. They have graduated at the school of the town-clerk at Ephesus, and their policy is based upon the maxim, "Do nothing rashly." They have not an unkind word to say against those in the trade, and are very much offended when they hear others doing so. They profess great zeal in the temperance cause, but when the time comes for decisive action they hesitate, become time-servers, lower the standard, compromise the movement, and are prepared to receive any instalment offered, instead of the entire removal of the drink curse. Just imagine Wilberforce, in the Anti-Slavery agitation, and Cobden and Bright in the Free Trade struggle adopting such tactics as theirs. These had one object before them, the abolition of Slavery and the Corn Laws. There could be no half-measures. No instalments. No compromise. They persisted in their agitation, and slavery received its death blow, and free trade in the people's food became the law of the land. Surely after half-a-century the time has fully come for temperance men to demand a suspension of "the standing orders," and bring in the "cloture," so that these trimming obstructionists may be shunted out of the way.

TRIFLERS.—These form a numerous party, having many admirers and a numerous following. They issue an attractive programme, the object of which is to popularize the temperance movement. The most attractive portion of the programme is comic singing, clog dancing, and negro comedy.

Our fathers fought the drink curse with facts and arguments drawn from every-day life, and produced illustrations ("living epistles") of the beneficial results of total abstinence. In those days reclaimed drunkards occasionally related their experience at the meetings, and many a coat sleeve, and apron, testified to the power of the truth as it was raised to wipe away the tear, while a higher assembly was interested in the meetings, and saw cause for rejoicing over sinners repenting.

There was singing also in those days. It was full of sympathy and compassion for the perishing.

The poor drunkard was thus described:—

"A nation's curse, a slave to sin,
Despised without, reproached within;
Then help us, Lord, in thy great name
The sinful drunkard to reclaim."

There was a spell thrown over the people who attended the meetings, and in many instances the results justified the singing—

“The Ethiop’s white, the lion’s tamed,
The wretched drunkard is reclaimed.”

Alongside the pioneers of the movement, who did exploits in the Master’s service, those triflers are only as “reeds shaken with the wind.” The sooner they are blown out of the way by a temperance hurricane the better for the movement.

GRUMBLERS.—Grumbling is an inexpensive habit, and can be indulged in for a considerable time without affecting the purse. Neither does it require a large amount of intelligence to become a member of the grumbling fraternity. This party exists in our ranks for no other purpose than fault-finding, and taking exception to certain phases of our movement, because they are not in keeping with their peculiar ideas. They believe themselves infallible. Were they intrusted with power every organization would be a grand success. Had they been consulted no mistakes would have been committed, no embarrassment taken place, no failures have been recorded. We could tolerate such persons were it not, that when the tug of war comes, and every man is expected to do his duty, these hydropathists appear with their wet sheet to damp the movement for aggressive action against the enemy. Happy would it be for the cause, if an emigration scheme could be devised for the shipment of the entire party to some distant island, where they would have full scope for their grumbling proclivities.

DOUBTERS.—This party always look at the dark side of the picture, as they gaze upon the fearful ravages of intemperance and behold the stronghold of liquorism, they are overwhelmed with fear and unbelief, and reiterate the old cry, “We be not able to go up against this people, for they are stronger than we. And we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants, and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.” What a humiliating sight—what a cowardly confession. Not more so than is often presented in connection with our movement. When the entire overthrow of the liquor traffic is proposed, and legal measures be adopted, these doubting ones rush in among the people and say the thing is Utopian, and impossible. Those who talk about the impossibility of overthrowing the liquor traffic, are doing their very best to prevent its overthrow by their unbelief. It is a lack of faith in God, and in the power of the truth, that makes men speak of impossibility in connection with the temperance movement.

“Faith, mighty faith, the promise sees,
And looks to that alone,
Laughs at impossibilities,
And cries it shall be done.”

Unless these doubting rush-lights of the movement cast away their uncertain illumination, “urgency” must be demanded, and an extinguisher invented that will put the quietus on them for the future.

TRAITORS.—If we accept the definition of a traitor as “one who violates his allegiance or trust, and betrays his country or cause,” we shall have little, or no difficulty in pointing out that such are, unfortunately, to be found in the temperance ranks. If our principles are paramount, and the issues at stake be far above and beyond any question of the day, then we are bound by our connection with the movement to be loyal to those principles at all times, and under all circumstances, or, why belong to the cause at all? The old proverb, “Actions speaking louder than words,” has often been verified in the case of temperance men—who, during election times have not only forgotten their principles and deserted the cause, but for political purposes have actually worked side by side with the traffickers themselves. If a soldier of Her Majesty was taken red-handed, in company with the enemy he would be summarily dealt with, and there would be no hesitation in calling him by his right name, TRAITOR! And we hope the time is not far distant, when such as desert our flag and collude with the enemy will be designated by the same inglorious name, and either “bring forth fruits meet for repentance,” or be ignominiously drummed out of the regiment.

BITTER REAPING.

MANY years ago there stood within an old-fashioned garden on the banks of the Thames at Richmond, a cottage, occupied by a widow lady named Blake. She had come there with her only child, a boy ten years of age, and even the curious failed to discover who she was and whence she came. She was unmistakably a lady, and had evidently passed through much trouble, for her hair was prematurely grey and her brow marked with the lines of care. They lived in strict seclusion, and the boy received his education from the vicar, who with his wife were the only visitors admitted to the cottage. When Tom Blake left his boyhood behind, and stood on the threshold of manhood, the good vicar procured for him a clerk’s situation in the firm of Ballantyne & Co., German merchants, Eastgate Street, City. It was gratefully accepted, for the widow’s means were slender, and in due time the young man repaired to London to enter on his new life. He was to reside there, coming home only at stated intervals. In these days travelling even a short distance was not so easy a matter as a long journey is now. Tom Blake was a clever, energetic, young man, but he lacked the steady principles and unwavering decision so needful in the battle of life.

“A jolly good fellow,” his friends called him, and the words were characteristic of him to whom they were applied.

On a certain summer morning the postboy left a letter at the cottage. It was addressed to Mrs. Blake in a formal business hand, and the envelope bore the monogram of the head of her son’s firm. She was just sitting down to breakfast when it came, and she broke the seal with some anxiety, hoping for good news yet fearing all was not right. This was the letter:—

Eastgate Street,
City, June ... 18...

Dear Madam,—It is my painful duty to inform you that your son has grievously disappointed our expectations. The energy and attention with which he applied himself to business on first entering our house has given place to unpardonable idleness and carelessness. On several occasions he has occasioned us great inconvenience and annoyance, but in consideration for you we have hitherto refrained from complaint, where in ordinary circumstances we should have dispensed with his services at once. For your sake we are willing to give him another chance. But we think it incumbent upon us to inform you that he has formed a circle of acquaintances, and contracted habits which will surely pave the road to ruin. No later than yesterday morning he came into our office in a state of intoxication.

Perhaps a word from you might benefit him.

Believe me, yours truly,

JAMES BALLANTYNE,

Mrs. Blake rose from the breakfast table and went to the window. It was open, and the summer sunbeams played on the half-blown buds on the rose trees. She did not cry, she had come through the tribulation which dries up all tears, but her lips grew very white and quivered pitifully.

"It has come at last," she half whispered, "the curse of the Blakes has passed from father to son once more. God help my poor boy, and, O God, sustain me!"

The breakfast stood long untouched upon the table, till the widow removed the things with hurried hands, and then began to make preparations for a journey. She was going to London by the mid-day boat.

The steamer left punctually at the hour, carrying but a handful of passengers. In the heat of summer tide the cool shades of Richmond were infinitely preferable to the noise and din of the city.

When Tom Blake came home to his lodgings at five o'clock that night, he found his mother waiting for him, and for the first time in his life wished himself many miles from her presence. His greeting was constrained, for he easily surmised what had brought her.

She scanned his face (so like her own) with keen and loving eyes, and as she looked a great shadow filled them.

"What's up, mother?" Tom asked at length, flushing beneath her steady gaze. "Are you ill?"

"I have come in consequence of a letter I received from Mr. Ballantyne this morning," she said. "Oh my boy, my heart will break!"

Conscience-stricken he turned to the window, and stood drumming his fingers on the pane. "They needn't have gone worrying you," he said at last. "I haven't done anything worth making a row about."

"It has gone far indeed before Mr. Ballantyne would write such a letter," was the sad reply, "and I am afraid he has not told me the worst."

"One must see life some time or other," said the young man impatiently. "I'm no worse than my neighbours, not half so bad as some of them."

An old excuse that, my friends, which has found utterance millions of times since the world began.

There was a short silence. "Tom," said the widow suddenly, "I'm coming to live in London."

"To live in London," re-echoed the young man blankly, "It would kill you in a week; I have often heard you say so."

"Not so surely nor so cruelly as bearing suspense at home," replied she, "I ought to have come at first, but I thought I could trust you."

The implied reproach stung him to the quick, and it was well that she did not see the look that darkened his fine face.

In something less than a month the quiet nest at Richmond was given up, and Mrs. Blake came to a small dingy house in a quiet by-street in London. For a few weeks thereafter Tom's conduct was exemplary. Mr. Ballantyne expressed his satisfaction at the change for the better, and the anxious mother's heart began to be at rest. But by-and-by the restraint wore off, and the tempter once more asserted his sway over the young man's weak and yielding mind. Habits long formed are not easily broken off. His boon companions, friends he called them, were clamorous for his company at the club-room, the theatre, and the bar of the public house. They missed the gay speech, witty repartee, and merry jesting ways, which made him so popular. So night after night he was absent, and the lonely mother lived again the misery she had endured during the last ten years of her husband's life. The son was but too surely following in his father's footsteps.

Her small annuity was sufficient only for her own simple needs, and Tom's earnings were spent to the last farthing on himself, ay, more, he sank deep in debt without the shadow of a hope that he could ever extricate himself.

One morning in the early spring he happened to be left alone in Mr. Ballantyne's private room. Both the principals were absent, and Tom was supposed to be busy with some work his clever head was best able to master. In reality he was leaning his arms on the table, scanning with gloomy eyes an open letter before him. It was a gentle reminder from a creditor that he owed the sum of forty pounds, and requesting immediate payment, or . . . Tom did not turn the sheet, knowing too well what followed. "I must get him shut up somehow," he muttered in a savage undertone. "Life's not worth having at the price. No end of bother for ever at a fellow's heels."

He crushed up the letter in his hand, mentally wishing it was its author, and began to pace restlessly up and down the floor. It did not occur to him that he was stealing his employers' time. Suddenly a cashbox arrested his eye, and he stopped short before it. It was locked, but the key had been left carelessly on the lid. No suspicion of Blake's honesty had ever crossed the minds of Ballantyne & Co. Tom looked at it for a second or two, and then resumed his walk till again he found himself in front of it.

A wild thought flashed through his brain, but he put it resolutely from him, and drawing his neglected work towards him, began to write for dear life. But his restless eyes wandered again and again to the unconscious box, and finally he threw down his pen, fitted the key in the lock, and raised the lid. It was a great temptation. There was enough, ay more than enough, to satisfy all his claims, and it might not be missed. Ballantyne & Co. were sometimes careless with loose money, sometimes, but not often. He fingered the banknotes lovingly, some of them were clean and crisp, others limp and discoloured. He let the lid drop, then raised it and looked again. Ah, Tom! Tom! you did not know what lifelong misery that second look was to cost you! He took in his hand two notes, each for twenty pounds, slipped them into his vest pocket, locked the box, and replaced the key, and went back to make up the arrears of his work.

For a week he heard nothing and grew light of heart. But one morning the heads of the firm were together in the private room, and this is what passed. Mr. Ballantyne was examining the cashbox, and checking from a slip of paper the number of each note. It was not a usual thing for him to do, but unfortunately for young Blake, every note in the box had been carefully numbered. "There are two notes missing, Gresham," said Mr. Ballantyne, addressing his partner. "Do you know anything of them?" No, Mr. Gresham knew nothing of them, he had not looked into the cashbox for a few days. There followed, of course, a diligent search and a questioning of the clerks all round. Suspicion fell not on Tom, but on one of the senior clerks whom the firm had reason to distrust. That individual smiled when he saw the principal's dubious looks, and requested a few minutes' private conversation. It was granted, and he related what he had seen through a small side window that morning Tom Blake occupied the private room alone. He had held his peace then, and bided his time.

Mr. Ballantyne was shocked, surprised, and grieved, for he had a strong liking for Tom Blake, and determined to obtain more proof before bringing an accusation against him. His informant had not been idle, he found out what Tom had done with the money. Mr. Ballantyne went to the individual in question, compared numbers with the notes Tom had given and found them to be the same.

So that night when Tom was sitting with his mother in her little parlour, she, poor soul, rejoicing at having her boy beside her for an evening, a knock came to the door, and before Tom could turn his head a heavy hand was laid upon his shoulder, and a rough voice said, "You are my prisoner."—The charge was found proven, and the sentence nine months' imprisonment. At the time of which I write our prisons were not what they are to-day. There was neither distinction nor classification of the prisoners. Old hardened offenders were allowed to mix freely with those who were confined for merely nominal offences. The system was one of the worst on record, and so the gaols and bridewells became the veriest hotbeds and nurseries of crime, and many who had entered scarcely tainted by vice, left old in the ways of wickedness. Fortunately, Tom Blake escaped the contagion. He held himself utterly aloof from them, doing the task allotted to him in silence. His mother was allowed to see him sometimes. Ah, dear friends, I cannot try to tell you what these meetings were like, no pen on earth can adequately describe a tithe of a mother's love. The hot and sultry summer sped, autumn waned and died, and the day before Christmas Tom was set free. The prison gates closed upon a miserable man, broken down in health and spirits; these nine months had done what twenty years of ordinary life could not have done at all. His mother waited for him, more loving, more tender than before. The whole world might point the finger of scorn at him, she was his mother still. They went home together, not to the London house, nor to Richmond, but to a little village on the Cornish coast, where they and their story were unknown. Mrs. Blake was ailing, but no complaint passed her lips and he did not see it. He roamed about the wild shore in the bleak wintry weather, seeming to find some strange companionship in the winds and the roar of the sea as it spent its strength against the cliffs. Mrs. Blake thought long and earnestly, praying ever for guidance from above, and then she spoke. He must go abroad, she said, to Australia, where he could begin life anew, free from the old influences, and where the blot upon his name would never be known. She would remain behind, she was old and frail, she said smiling sadly, and should but hamper his movements. She remained firm, and he went alone. On a wild and boisterous March evening they stood together on the deck of an outward-bound vessel. The bell rang for the strangers to depart. She put her arms about him and kissed him for the last time, knowing that on earth they should meet no more.

The struggling moonbeams crept out that night upon the sea, and touched the bowed head of the exile, as if trying to lighten the bitterness of death within his soul. The moonbeams rested too, on a poor white head, bowed in prayer, in a lonely cottage home, and God heard and sent comfort.

There is in Melbourne at the present time a large and influential mercantile firm, known as Blake & Co. Blake is a very old man now, and his connection with the house merely nominal. He is married but is childless. But the wealth which has accumulated in his coffers is consecrated to the Lord's work, and bears a rich harvest. The old man has a peculiar interest in young men, and has done many a one in calculable good.

Once only, soon after his marriage, Tom Blake and his wife visited Europe. They went first to the rude churchyard of the wild seacoast village, where a heart sorely rent and riven by the world's tempests finds a peaceful resting place at last.

They cut a square of daisied turf from the little mound, and carried it back to their beautiful Australian home. It is Tom Blake's only relic of his mother. One day the old man hopes to meet her where all sorrows are unknown.

THE SOCIAL ASPECT OF THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

Read before the monthly meeting of the Dumfries Abstainers' Union by REV. G. W. TOOLEY.

ONE of the most famous books ten years ago was Buckle's History of Civilisation in Europe. It went upon the supposition that man, like oak trees, or vegetable marrows, or turnips, was a creature of law, and went upwards and downwards according to the position he was placed in. Put a tribe on the hill-sides of Switzerland, and they became a hardy, liberty-loving, honest, and single-hearted race. They would not tolerate a monarchical government, and 'despotism would not be borne without a fierce battle that would last till the despot was driven away. The oxygenised air, the hard conditions of their physical life, made them what they were in bodily and spiritual nature. The inaccessible nature of their country made them politically free. Put another tribe, originally of the same stock, on the wide plains of Hindostan, where no mountain ranges intervene, where tropical heat constantly prevails, where the food of life grows easily and abundantly; and you will find them in course of time what the Hindoos are, an enervated, if not slavish race, a people ready to the hand of any despotic genius, and open to the worse than political tyranny, the most fearful form of religious and priestly rule.

By a number of carefully compiled statistics, Mr. Buckle tried to prove his point that the human race is what it is, in every clime and land, by the action of outside circumstances, political laws, religious habits, and social customs.

It is on this assumption that the science of our day is going. Its error lies in its partiality and onesidedness. It is true as far as it goes. But even the clear-sighted Professor Huxley begins to admit that man's free-will and spontaneity of action in all ages must be taken for something. While I firmly maintain man's free-will or spontaneity, or originality of action, I fully admit the other side of human progress, its influence of circumstances. To a very large extent, we are what our environment makes us. Had I been born in Zululand some forty years ago, I might have turned out a Cetewayo instead of a Baptist minister in Dumfries. Had you been born in the Arctic zone, you might have been to-day a short, stuffy Esquimaux, dining with gusto upon your 6 lbs. of grease and fat, and worshipping a fetish instead of a supreme God who fills all things. The science of our day is more and more proving that the way of man's advance lies in improved conditions and more perfect surroundings. Remove temptations to vice; drill and instruct the human mind by wise laws; clear out of your cities all close alleys and courts; educate the whole people; and you remove from human nature that which kept it down. It will then spring upward to the Infinite, as the balloon shoots into the awful firmament above it when every cord that bound it to earth is severed.

Our position is that the social state of a people in any age is the index of the truth and perfection of the surroundings which its Government has placed around it, and likewise of the ability and free action of its nobler spirits conquering their surroundings or the customary ideas of their age, by their keen intellect, spontaneous action, and daring will.

It is not easy to give an accurate picture of the social condition of the British Isles as affected by the drinking customs of our time. It is so apparent that alcohol is operating as a fearful weight upon the nation that its very apparence makes it difficult to understand vividly. It would be a grand aid to all social and political reformers—aye, and theological reformers too—if one could transport their opponents for an hour to the vantage ground of the angels, and see their false ideas at work as the angels see them.

“O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as others see us!
It wad frae mony a blunder free us,

But I propose investigating this subject by a careful study of the statistics of a particular district, the city of London. That will be a very fair gauge by which to measure the rest of the realm.

I. Alcohol and Family Life.—And the first thing I would get from these figures is the influence of alcoholic drinking upon the family life.

In 1878 in London there were 35,408 apprehensions for drunkenness. I may safely more than double that number, and say in round figures there were, in a particular year, 1878, 80,000 families in the city of London being foully desecrated by the drinking system. Of course, this is immensely below the mark; but let us see what it means. 80,000 persons out of a population of four and a half millions gives a percentage of 1 in every 55. It means that 1 person in every 55 of the city of London has, through drink, been in or near to a criminal jail. Take these 35,408 persons, and say that a family averages four persons only, and you have one of every 30 families being demoralised and saddened by drunkenness. This is not the effect of moderate drinking, but that one in every 30 families in London at least is being outraged, desecrated by drunken riots, and one of its members periodically in the gaol and police courts. It is in the home that human life is made. It is there that boys and girls are cultured for the citizenship of the nation, and for the duties of parents, husbands, and wives. It is there that the soul's noblest sentiments are either ennobled and expanded or depressed and distorted. Now, think of the future of a people where in one out of every 30 of its schools of future home and national life you have the scene that drunkenness records. The family environment is demoralised to the greatest extent. Boys and girls are born with vitiated blood because born of drunken parents; they are vitiated mentally because their finer susceptibilities are hurt and corrupted every day by those who live in bestial pleasures; they are vitiated morally because there is no more appalling devilry than a home with a habitual raving drunkard at its head. You must picture 35,000 homes at least in that teeming city, with trembling wives, with cowering children, with frenzied scenes. One Saturday night I entered a home where a man was seizing a pot of boiling water on the fire, ready to hurl it at his wife, who was dishevelled and bloody from blows; and underneath a table, screaming in frantic fear, were five children, the oldest not more than ten. And a similar scene to that went on every week. You must multiply that by 35,000, and you get some faint idea of the kind of family life made by the public-house traffic in one city only!

Now, the soul, the inward life, is the real one. The greatest battles go on in that unseen sphere of a man's mind or a woman's heart. I saw the great Tooley Street fire that raged for weeks, and destroyed £30,000,000 of property; I have stood on the great battle-fields of British history, and thought of the amount of life destroyed; I remember the thrilling account of the battle of Gravelotte in the Franco-German war in 1870, when 15,000 men were laid in death's cold gore beneath the cannon and sword blades of ruthless Germany; I have read of 2,000,000 of Hindoos dying with starvation on the plains of Orissa; I have heard of thousands of families widowed, orphaned by one single storm upon the Atlantic; but is there anything so persistent in its warfare, so deadly in its destructive power, so subtle and far-reaching, as this greatest of all invaders—alcohol, entering 35,000 homes in one city, week by week, month by month, year by year, generation by generation, and destroying the fond hopes of 35,000 trusting wives, blasting the highest happiness of 35,000 husbands, and withering at its very source the promising life of 200,000 children. And that war goes on with its terrible cannonading with as persistent a regularity as the motion of the earth round the sun. The sun rises every day on London's 35,000 drunken homes; the moon looks nightly on 35,000 frenzied madmen; and so it will go on till the nation rises in its strength, puts its hand upon the originating force, and, by stopping that, hushes the tumult and stays the soul and body bloodshed of the most ghastly war this earth has ever seen upon its war-stained bosom.

II. Drink and Woman.—Secondly: Looking at these figures, I notice another serious effect upon social life. If the home be the preparatory school of the nation, the woman in the home is the presiding and inspiring genius. Napoleon once said, “Show me the mothers of a nation, and I can tell you what the future of that nation will be.” The glory of the ancient republic of Rome was undoubtedly owing, not to the muscular strength of its men, or to their splendid discipline, but to the soul put into them by the wives and mothers of their homes. When the wives and mothers of Augustan Rome had lost the pride of womanly virtue, the decay of Rome had begun in spite of all its seeming splendour. And the most terrible sign of the drinking traffic is the increase of female drunkenness; and, especially, since the time of grocers' licenses. Now, in 1877, in London, 7,561 out of 15,492 drunken cases, were women—one half; and 7,796 out of 16,877 drunk and disorderly cases—a total of 15,357 females out of 32,269 cases, only 827 below the half. God only knows what this means. Even nations at war are not bad enough to poison each other's streams, even when at the highest devilry of a campaign. And yet in Christian England, in proud and cultured London, in 1877, 15,357 women, nearly all wives and mothers, stood at the docks of its police courts, arraigned there for drunkenness, the synonym for the state lower than beastliness. And these figures are but a modicum of the actual fact. Here you have scenes such as you must go into the vile slums, as I have, on Saturday night, to witness. 15,000 women with babies at the breast drinking gin; 15,000 women, wives and mothers, shrieking obscenity in the open street that would shame the devil; 15,000 women, impregnated, bestialized, demoralized, devilled, giving birth to children, the future fathers and mothers of the English nation!

What is there more beautiful than a woman's nature? Who of us is not softened by the thought of a mother, wife, sister, or lover? To think of a woman's soul, with its fine feelings, its beautiful organisation, its sublime capacities—to think of that being entered by the foulness of alcoholic drunkenness is like thinking of heaven being entered by an army of unclean spirits. And it is not a creation of my fancy; it is there in London, in all England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, a solid, awful fact.

My pen is baffled in its descriptive power by the awful width and depth of the facts. It means badly-kept homes, badly-cooked food, and wasted earnings. Who would think of rearing families amid the darkness and gloom of a coal-pit? We think we are wise because our laws forbid that. Yet the actual fact is that in London there are to-day, 1881, A.D., 15,000 wives and mothers rearing children in places that can only find their parallels in the abodes of Satan's hell. For one of the most lamentable facts of our civilised life is the insensibility of nearly all to what affects the highest, the soul-nature of our people. We can understand arguments that appeal to our bodily senses, but it is awfully hard to get even our purest and loftiest minds, let alone the mass of the population, to see facts as they affect the real being of man, his soul-nature. That which destroys the body is palpable, men say; but, to a clear insight, the most palpable of all facts is the destruction of mind and heart and conscience, and with them of happiness and human progress that such figures as these make clear.

III. Drink and Children.—Equally lurid is the aspect when we view it in relation to children. Statistics here as to the after consequences will help us greatly. Chaplains to gaols are unanimous in saying that nine out of ten prisoners have passed through our Sabbath schools in England. I take that fact in England as a better index to the real state of matters than it would be in Scotland, because scarcely a child in England and Wales but spends some years in the Sunday school, whereas in Scotland that is not so universally true. Now, here we have nine out of ten gaol prisoners once Sabbath school scholars. What has effected the change in these Sunday school children? Let statistics answer. Eight out of these nine scholars have got there through drink. Lord Coleridge and Justice Brett, and nearly all the court judges, are agreed in saying, as the result of their experience, that nine-tenths of the crime that comes before them is through drink. Now, in that vast criminal class that crowd a palatial-looking prison in every county and corporation town, you see the outcome of that drunken home, and that drunken wife-and-mother system we have been investigating. Our criminals are not made in criminal training shops, after they become men and women, they are made in the homes where drink reigns as a domestic god. I have known hundreds of cases personally where the Sunday school child has gone straight from the school to the home where twelve hours before there was a Saturday night row between father and mother, and where, on that Sunday afternoon, the father has got out of bed after sleeping off the debauch of Saturday, and is beginning the Sunday tittle to end in the quieter Sunday night drink, and possibly, and generally, preliminary to a Monday's "on the spree," to commence work on Tuesday morning after breakfast. It is in homes like that that our criminal and depraved classes are bred. Their education as gaol-birds or paupers begins at a gin-drinking mother's breast—ay, before, if I dare go into that—and is improved, or worsened, by those home scenes.

Now, a human soul well-developed, morally and mentally, is a beautiful object—it is divine. When you see a lark soaring in the morning air, and carolling as it goes, you have a sense of the rightness and joyousness of things. When, on the other hand, you enter those vast American caves, filled with bats flying about in darkness, totally blind, there creeps over you a feeling of horror. When we find human beings growingly sensitive to moral truth, and advancing in its perfection, we feel all is well. But to know that thousands of our boys and girls are growing up in such a pestiferous atmosphere so reeking with alcoholic fumes that they grow callous to moral distinctions, can jump on prostrate and pregnant women, as I have seen them do, can starve children to feed coursing dogs, can see nothing in the relation of men and women but what the beast sees; a trade which stunts, deforms, dislocates human souls like that, is a terrible social fact. The fault is not in the soul as it comes from God, the fault is in the environment which we—we, as a nation—have surrounded it from its birth to its manhood and the grave. The fault is in the 700 miles long of public houses, licensed to sell drink, with which we have bedizened our streets with garish light, as if with similar lights to those with which Nero lit Rome, when he sewed up the Christians in tarred sacks to light the night darkness of the seven-hilled city.

IV. Drink and Public Amusements.—I would also allude to another phase of social life. People will amuse themselves, and rightly so. And here the drink demon reigns supreme as elsewhere. All acquainted with London life will be familiar with its music halls, its penny gaffs, its public house sung songs, and smoke rooms, and its theatres. In the billiard rooms and smoke saloons behold the places where the more respectable young men are being bewitched with the fatal glass. I allude to this in order that I may urge on temperance reformers the mode by which to work. It is that which I have for years urged on churches with but little success so far—to take hold of the world's life, and instead of banning the life, ban the mode in which it is lived. We want public houses, but public houses without alcohol; we want billiard rooms, and smoke rooms, and sing songs, and music halls, and theatres, but all without alcohol. The devil gains the people by mixing the good with the evil. Entire evil is never offered by the subtle tempter to any being.

Smoke rooms where men can meet, chat politics, do business, and enjoy a quiet hour's social converse; billiard rooms, where a harmless game can be played without the excitant of brandy and whisky; and sing songs where our fine old Scotch and English and Irish ballads can be sung without the obscenity and mad foolery brought in by hot toddy and sparkling ale. I have seen as much of that life as most men, and my deep-rooted opinion is that a true reformation requires only the abolition of alcohol. Some years ago I often visited the music halls and theatres of London. Take such a place as the Canterbury, or the Pavillion, or the Metropolitan Music Hall; vast places, splendidly furnished and decorated, and supplied with the best entertainments of their kind that money can procure. Look at these places up to two hours after the performance begins; all is quiet and harmless merriment. But see them from ten o'clock to closing time, when brandy, whisky, and ale have done their work. It is now a vast crowd of drunken, lustful men and women, who leave the hall of drink and music for scenes I will not dare to depict.

The penny gaff of London is a lower place still. Go into these places, crowded mostly with boys and girls, and you will find there juvenile pleasurelings drinking their "four-penny" and "half-and-half," and of both sexes talking language of the foulest description. Another outcome of the drunken social circle. Take what I have seen in such theatres as the old Marylebone, or the Victoria (the latter is now just opened as a temperance music hall), and there in the pit and the gallery I have seen working men, their wives and children, looking at Hamlet badly acted, or admiring the defeat of some villain or a libertine on the stage, and solacing themselves with vigorous drinks from a big gallon stone bottle, full of "fourpenny" ale, or perhaps specially for the occasion "sixpenny." That is how three out of every four persons in the lower masses of London life amuse themselves; and it is about the average of England and Scotland, and Wales.

Drink reformers must do what church ministers and members have not been sagacious enough to do—take hold of the world's life, its amusements and its business, and transfigure it with righteousness, and beauty, and truth, and, if they do, they will see as great a wonder as the apostles did on the mountain top when Jesus was transfigured before them. I have often wished that for one moment all of us should have the seeing power of God, so as to see, not only what actually is, but what might be, if certain things were done. Use makes us bear almost anything. It is wondrous what human nature can bear by use. When one reads the history of France for 100 years prior to the Revolution of 1789, one is amazed that the French people bore their grievance so long. We wonder as we read Uncle Tom's Cabin that only 20 years ago millions of human beings were enduring that cruel slave life without revolt. As we read Livingstone's account of the slave press gangs of Africa, with their hideous slaughter, our blood curdles in our veins. It is a pity though that we cannot keep these scenes and contrast them with the after times, when they have been swept away in a better state of affairs. Would that for one moment England or Scotland could see herself as she would be—minus one thing, only one thing lacking, alcohol. That one factor in our national affairs works our ruin. The simple mechanism of the telegraph and steam engine has remodelled the world. Columbus never brought a new world so completely to view as did Morse and Stephenson by their practical genius. In 1827 the world started a new career. And as we from our standpoint of eight-day trips to New York, of Atlantic cables, look upon that old life our forefathers led we may well feel wonder-stricken. But what if we can hand down to our children the new world of comparatively purified social life, by the annihilation, not simply abolition of our drinking system. Some day, perhaps, we, or our children, shall see the ruins of county prisons and lunatic asylums, and orphanages, and homes, and as our children ask us what they were we shall reply, "They were built out of the nation's greatest folly; they swarmed at one time with men, women and children; they have sunk into decay since the Act of Parliament that made it penal to sell alcohol within these realms." Heaven is described to us by negatives, not by positives. There will be no tears there, no death, no disastrous sea, and when we describe the result of this temperance social reform, it means that there will be scarcely any poor houses, lunatic asylums, orphanages, or prisons.

And there is one more thing we must remember. One of the most brilliant discoveries of modern science is the truth of the conservation of energy. There is just as much force in the universe to-day as there was a billion of years ago, not one particle has wasted. It has varied its manifestation, but it has remained the same. Now a nation consists of so many individuals, and of so much collective human force. It expends that energy for so much good or so much evil. Act upon that nation by wise laws and discreet discipline, and you set free its strength to work the more good by subtracting the national energy that otherwise would have worked for evil. Just as 25 voters taken from one party and given to another count 50, so, so much energy taken from national evil and put on to national good, counts double, and, indeed, increases more and more as the ages roll by.

With one more point I close this paper. I look upon the coffee house system as all but a failure considered as a rival to the public house, and mainly through bad management. In all these places in Glasgow, Birmingham, London, and other places, that I have entered, there has been an absence of the convivial element, that is the chief feature of alcoholic public. Teetotal places and dullness as a rule go together. I do not see why it should be so. We must insist on these places being attractive. Harmless singing and abundance of amusements should fill all these places. And still more there should be good coffee, tea, and other drinks and eatables. Everything should be of the best. I went into one of the leading places at Glasgow a short time ago, and the coffee I ordered was execrable, and the surroundings dingy and repulsive. It would not have been worse in the vilest shebeen I could have entered. If we are to compete successfully with our great rivals it must be in outdoing them in everything but making men and women drunk. The children of light must be wiser in their methods than the children of darkness.

I would suggest that as temperance reformers we consolidate our scattered forces; that we throw ourselves unitedly upon the town, and by public meetings, still more by individual effort, and by providing counter attractions to the public house, accelerate the cause dear to all of us.

PUBLIC PRESS.

"I no more think of drinking wine than a horse does: the wine on the table is no more for me than for the dog under the table."—Dr. S. Johnson.

The fundamental principles of our glorious temperance reformation may be briefly announced under four heads:—1, The liquor traffic is essentially pernicious and immoral; 2, All alcoholic drinks are poisonous and unwholesome; 3, Alcoholic medication is unnecessary, and generally, if not always, injurious; 4, The Bible contains no divine sanction for the use of alcoholic drinks, but much warning and instruction against it.—Pyper.

TEMPERATE BY LAW.—"You can't make men temperate by law," cried the rum-seller. Well, you can't set broken legs by law; but you pass laws requiring streets and side-walks to be passable without danger, in order that no legs may be broken; and by throwing this protection around her citizens, the State does a better service than she could by erecting an hospital in which to mend broken bones. The prohibitory law makes the streets safe. Whether the State will license or prohibit temptation is the question which has been carried into politics. That question can only be settled at the ballot-box, because laws are made by men elected by votes.—Exchange.

A WIFE'S TESTIMONY.—A FACT.—"You cannot tell how happy I am. Our Jack has signed the temperance pledge, and now he comes home sober, and brings me all his brass; sits by the cheerful fire, begins to say his prayers, and talks of serving God and going to heaven. We're like new married folk. Thank God for temperance."

Another thing that teetotalers are slow to learn is the importance of sustaining the Temperance Press. How many of our best periodicals have lingered and died for lack of support! When the Temperance Worker was started, nine years ago, many of our friends prognosticated a short career. "I hope you will be able to produce the numbers to make a volume," wrote one worthy friend to us; "but I fear you will have to abandon it before the end of the year." It has not been so bad as that with us, happily; but the eight complete volumes of sound and useful material, for the use of temperance advocates, have not been produced without a heavy outlay of money and labour on the part of both editor and publisher. The results of our labours remain. For years to come, labourers in the grand old cause will find the material supplied in these eight volumes of the Temperance Worker invaluable to them in their advocacy, and thus the movement at large will be benefited. All that the editor and publisher have for their reward is the consciousness of having toiled hard and sacrificed much. In this experience we do not stand alone; but how much more might we, and other literary servants of the good cause, have accomplished had we been more liberally supported and encouraged by temperance men.—The Temperance Worker.

POETRY.

SING, MY BIRDIE.

Do not droop thy head so sadly,
Foid not thus thy golden wing;
Look up, darling—brightly, gladly
Sing, my bonny birdie, sing.
Through the winter I have tended
E'en the lightest wish of thine.
To my prayer thou still art silent—
Thou'rt ungrateful, birdie mine.
Suddenly the sullen silence
With a sigh my birdie broke;
Turning with a pensive murmur,
Thus to me my birdie spoke:—
"I am but a little captive,
Pining here from day to day;
Unselfish ears would sure have heard
A wail of sorrow in my lay.
"And loving eyes could never fail
My bitter, bitter grief to see;
When other birds flit through the air,
Or gaily glide from tree to tree.
"I've tried to burst my prison bars,
And from thy presence forth to flee;
And never more thy face behold—
A tyrant cruel thou seem'st to me.
"Oh, lady, if thou would'st be kind,
And set thy little captive free;
I'd come and sing my sweetest songs
Of love, and joy, and liberty."
I let him forth, and high he soared,
Against the summer's sky so blue;
I watch'd him with a tearful eye,
And softly sighed "Adieu, adieu."
Now, true unto his word he comes,
And sings his evening hymn to me;
He loves me, and can ne'er forget—
But still he must, he must be free.
Thus learn 'tis better far to grant
A heart's best wish, and keep its love,
Than thwart that wish—creating hate,
And causing life a wreck to prove.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, APRIL, 1881.

* * We have been obliged, notwithstanding that we publish a supplement to the present number, to leave over important matter: "Discussion on State Protection," "Kansas," Reviews, Presentation, &c. Several capital papers are reserved.

REMOVAL OF THE OFFICES OF THE ASSOCIATION.

WE are desired to announce that the offices of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association now at 30 Hope Street, will be removed to 112 Bath Street. The change is rendered necessary by the overcrowded and inconvenient condition of the present premises. Arrangements are being made for an early removal. We hope to announce in our next issue that the Executive have finally taken possession of their new and handsome premises.

Mr. John Paton of Barrhead will be at the disposal of this Association for two months from 16th May. Applications for his services may be sent to Mr. Mackay, secretary, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow, who is instructed to give a preference to those applications desiring him for a series of meetings. Terms and subjects can be learned from the secretary.

Our readers will see from our diary of the parliamentary session that not much has been done or said on prohibition during the present peculiar session. But the very peculiarity of parliamentary proceedings offers a full explanation. Little or nothing outside the Irish and Governmental questions has been done for any question, and of that little prohibition can claim more than an insignificant share. Looking to the future the prospects begin to brighten. The Budget will be submitted on the 4th inst., and on the 8th we will see the introduction of the Land Bill. After the usual Easter holidays Parliament refreshed will no doubt give due consideration to the long-expected measure, and it may be that there yet may be time for laying before the House pretty strong reasons for the immediate fulfilment of the pledge Mr. Gladstone felt constrained to give last session. Meantime we are glad that our friends in the various districts of the country are keeping this question so steadily before their representatives. This is the best way of educating them in the principles and policy of prohibition, and ultimately gaining their sympathies and support. An opportunity will be afforded to many of our friends of meeting with their members during the Easter recess, of which we trust that they will be eager to avail themselves, and use it in the best interests of the suppressive veto on the liquor traffic. They are really responsible for the votes of their representatives on this question, and if they, fully realizing that responsibility, will wait upon their representatives, they will, we feel assured, neither find the approach difficult nor the interview unsatisfactory. We have a confident hope that the present session will not be altogether barren and unfruitful in temperance legislation.

Many of our readers are no doubt amazed at the eccentricities of philanthropy. So eager are the public to give dinners, teas, trips, and other things to the poor, and even to the apparently poor, that any amount of money may be tapped from the pockets of the benevolent for such merry alleviations. Unfortunately it is not spent as wisely as it is heartily given, much of it finding "waste" channels. Our readers know of these nice little meals, called "Robin" dinners. The Rev. Charles Bullock, London, started them in this admirable way. Collect, said he, money in your own neighbourhood, and have your own local Robin dinners. These now bid fair to become an institution. The Vegetarian Society of Manchester dined 500 "Ragged" Robins in the rooms of the Manchester Young Men's Christian Association, at about 2d. a head, and the fare was pease-soup, wheaten bread, and plum pudding. At Hull, 80 Robins got a capital supper of sweet pottage and substantial slices of wholemeal bread. Cost eleven shillings and sixpence. Three hundred aged people of Exeter got a wasteful Christmas dinner. There were 4 cwts. beef, besides mutton, geese, fowls, plum puddings, and mince pies provided; also, four barrels of beer and 40 bottles of spirits, with tobacco for the men and snuff for the women! Picture out, if possible, the dreadful waste which was permitted. Not to speak of the drink, which was cruel extravagance, as much must have been expended on these 300 aged poor as would have fed besides fully 1,200 Ragged Robins on a reformed diet. We say by all means help the poor, but do it economically. When wasteful ostentation feeds them, it forgets that it revives visions of plenty long since gone, because abused, and it prevents the giver from imparting happiness to a larger number of the truly deserving poor folks who are his near neighbours. The more discriminative as to the guests, and the more economical as to the food, such Lord and Lady Bountifuls are, the more good they will do, and the less temptation to mendicancy will they place in the way of those to whom beggary and vagabondage is less irksome than honest toil.

So the Earl of Zetland has got worsted in the Second Division of the Court of Session in his appeal against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. He had nothing else really to expect. Every judgment given in the august Court for a length of time past has been adverse to the temperance reformation. There was the East End case, the Stockbridge case, the Rothesay case, not to speak of minor ones, and now there is the Grangemouth Feu Charter case. Their lordships give such an extremely broad interpretation to the various Licensing Acts, or they interpret the issue before them (that of his lordship) upon principles that we fearlessly assert do not obtain in ordinary life. They say that the conditions which his lordship sought to enforce are inconsistent with the rights of property, and repugnant to public policy. Whose rights, my lords? Not his lordship's, nor those of the sober portion of Grangemouth, nor those of the overwhelming number of petitioners. Not the publican's, because his rights and those of his customers are identical with those of Grangemouth. My lords mean that these conditions are inconsistent with the privileges of the publican and his landlord—a judgment that may be legal in the corrupt state of the licensing law, but which certainly is not in harmony with human rights, which are superior to the privileges of a class or the precedents of the law. We have cause for deep thankfulness that although his lordship may accept the ruling of their lordships, the agitation, having for its aim and end the extermination of public facilities for strong drink selling, is rather stimulated than discouraged thereby. Sensible men will learn by this decision how utterly unworthy of a place on the statute book the licensing system is, and they will take a deeper interest, show a profounder sympathy, and give more liberally, in order that their lordships may have better laws dealing with the drink traffic to interpret, and that the people may no longer have their liberties and amenities outraged, and their attempts to free themselves baffled by the liquor traffic.

Birmingham is the premier radical burgh of Great Britain. Education, art, republicanism, in their advanced aspects, all have a firm hold there. An attempt has been long in hand to make it the scene of an experiment in corporation dram selling. Mr. Chamberlain, recently its republican Mayor, and now its junior parliamentary representative, has long cherished the desire to solve the liquor difficulty by transferring the lucrative traffic in strong drink from the publicans, who fatten upon it, to the corporation who would also fatten on it by receiving profits from it transcending those derived from city manure or gas. He aired the scheme in "the House," but received so little support—even Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who voted for it, forcibly exposing its inexpediency, its cruelty, and its incompatibility with a true scheme of temperance reform—that he relinquished his attempts for its promotion. It has, however, revived in Birmingham through the operations of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, in accordance with which the corporation are demolishing property to secure sites for improved workmen's houses. This necessitates the removal of public houses, and instead of granting those publicans whose houses have been removed licenses to degrade new neighbourhoods as has been the practice of the Glasgow Licensing Authorities, the Birmingham Town Council to retain these licenses, resolved to set up a central hotel and cafe, which they were to manage as a corporation. The people of Birmingham, we are glad to write, would not stand this. Tempting as was the financial prospects of the undertaking, they declined to embark in a speculation so ruinous to the community. The publicans, seeing their craft in danger, decided on a strenuous opposition, and the authorities, foreseeing that the power thus combined would be invincible, wisely abandoned the scheme. This event is fitted to stimulate temperance reformers to unabated vigour in the work and demand for prohibition. Birmingham has been specially educated on the points of the Gothenburg scheme, have had dangled before their eyes the possibilities of enormous profits, out of which would come the expense of public parks and institutions, and reduced taxation. They saw, however, the degradation of being involved in a business so dangerous and debasing, and they had the wisdom to resist even the trial of a central cafe, which doubtless would have succeeded and have been the herald of corporation drunkeries throughout the land.

We do not hesitate to characterise the opinion that all drunkards are weak, wilfully vicious, and debased, as false. It is not that we can merely point to the proverb that "the drinker is nobody's enemy but his own," but that we have known many drunkards whose character might have stood—except for the one vice that had overmastered them—on a level even higher than those that decried them. There are drunkards who have earned by their frequent appearances before the police courts the unenviable reputation of incorrigibles, yet who when known in their lucid moments were capable of inspiring feelings far different to those of censure and aversion. Even looking to average cases of drunkenness, one is amazed to find how often a frequent panel at police courts is guilty of no other misdemeanour than that of being drunk and incapable or drunk and disorderly. There is, what we have no doubt will be called a public pest, in Edinburgh thirty-one years of age, who has been since she was twenty-two almost always in the hands of the police. During that period of nine years she has been one hundred and thirty-six times before the court, and has been subjected to fine and imprisonment varying from one day to sixty days. We have looked carefully over the list of her convictions, and find that the charges against her are prostitution and drunkenness, the latter varied by incapability and disorderliness—not a case of theft alleged against her. We are not to excuse her wantonness one degree; but knowing how much drink has to do with the ruin of young women, and how often it makes its victims riotous or reel into insensibility, we do ask the question would that poor unfortunate—honest although debased—have been gliding so fearfully and so rapidly to a dreadful death, and a still more dreadful judgment, in a Maine Law parish or state? Here in Christian Britain, with her twenty thousand ministers of the Gospel, messengers of grace to guilty souls, such a case as that to which we refer is so common that it is not too much to say that there is not a day on which some poor wanton, honest but intemperate, is not breathing her last, without hope and without the last consolations of the dying, because looked upon as reprobate, while all the time she is a victim of a legalised system of drink-selling that is exerting the most malignant influence upon the destinies of this great country. At the bar of God there will be found in her case "extenuating circumstances"—a Christian nation tolerating a Moloch which is devouring the bodies and souls of its people, and the churches will not combine to stand, Eliezer like, between the living and the dead, and stay the dreadful plague.

Hung be the temperance heavens with black; turn day to night, for a Mr. Muntz, a chemist of note, has discovered that this circumambient world is one huge spirit-cellar, and that all creation is saturated with fiery alcohol! We breathe it, we swallow it, we bathe in it. Of what avail our pledge to abstinence when we cannot escape from the surrounding contamination of the "devil in solution"? Oh, where shall we turn or whither shall we fly from the maddening cup when earth and air is but a huge poisoned chalice, which is being continually held to our unwilling lips? How blind we have been! We thought we knew all about the common enemy of man, who is Prince of the Power of the Air, but we never dreamed that he had infected all things with his favourite demon, alcohol, the only demon in a liquid form of which we stood in awe. This discovery has far-reaching consequences. We used to wonder at the sudden eccentricities of our friends. Why wonder longer? They must have been simply airily drunk. When science, through Dr. Richardson, told us that we had a still in our insides, we reverently believed him, and with undeviating regularity increased the saccharine constituents of our diet in order to assist nature in her delightful brew. But alas! we have been wrong. Dr. Richardson's inquiries have not gone far enough, and we have been for years, it seems, needlessly adding to the exhilaration which nature has provided for the children of men. Mourn, ye temperance lecturers, for your occupation's gone—gone with its great emoluments, its fields of ease and its Arcadian joys! A pledge as large as a bill-poster and as strong as a blister will not avail against a liquor that falls gently on us in snow, showers upon us in rain, envelopes us in mist, steals in upon us in our tea, and flows along our alimentary canal in our milk. Let us make a mournful submission to the inevitable; for why, after all, should we play the Roman fool, and die upon our—pen? The publican, reinforced by nature, is a foe to whom it is no demerit to submit. Let us hear no more of that fancy sketch of there being no alcohol in nature; about there having been none in the garden of Eden, in the rills dashing down the mountain's grassy slopes, or of there being none in the unfathomable ocean. All is but as a tale that is told—as wind in a bladder, which science has pricked with her Ithuriel's spear, and lo it hisses as it disperses into the alcohol-laden atmosphere. Oh Muntz, Muntz! you might have softened the heavy blow! But science has no bowels, no compassion for the temperance lecturer's small wife and large family, but will, without remorse or anything approaching it, see him and his drifting astern with crinolines, the tinder-boxes, the stage-coaches, and the chignons of exploded fashion. Still, before we break up our camp and march to solitudes remote, let us be sure that Mr. Muntz has not found a mare's nest. What has he discovered? Alcohol as one of the primary elements either of gaseous, liquid, or solid matter? Not a bit. He has simply discovered alcohol in rain-water, in the soil, in the air, and in organic matter. Well, there is nothing to startle an intelligent temperance reformer in that; the wonder would be if there were. The fact is, we cannot but expect that, in the cycle of changes going on around us, grains and fruits in their decay should evolve alcohol. The steeped grain left to germinate and then decay will easily produce it; the grape burst on the stalk and exposed to the air will rot, and in its rottenness produce it. Yet this evil can be borne as we endure those exhalations that pass from us to undergo those changes that bring in their train life and health. Because alcohol is found in nature, should it therefore be found in man in such a degree as to degrade him? Does nature take delight in the inebriation of the world? Does she not so diffuse alcohol as to confer on mankind an immunity for its effects? Are we therefore to be startled? No; surely not. Rather are we to be confirmed in our aversion to a substance that savours of the charnel-house of nature. The most extreme discoveries of science will be found on the side of truth, and this one of Mr. Muntz only adds but another to the long roll of warnings to mankind to beware of that insidious potion which steals the heart, makes the reason and the understanding reel, is the shroud of the soul, and amply justifies the most strenuous efforts for the suppression of the artificial production of alcohol for beverage purposes when, à la Muntz, nature has it in such profuse abundance.

When a boy was called to account for fishing on Sunday he said, "I know I do, but then before the fish began to bite I always sang one of Moody and Sankey's hymns." He had as good an excuse as many drinkers have who know all about the devil in solution, and yet take it.

THE DRINK SELLER.—(1) Supplies nothing useful; (2) Supplies nothing necessary to health, happiness, or prosperity; (3) Is not a patron or encourager of labour; (4) Supplies no food or stimulus for mental improvement; (5) Adds no moral impulse or spiritual force to the community. Let him step down, then, from the company of honest toilers. He has no place among manufacturers, traders, shop-keepers, mechanics, teachers, or preachers. All of them would do better work if he were not, and each of them meets in him an obstacle to their full success.—Scott Act Leaflet.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EDITOR TO HIS CONTRIBUTORS.

THE Editor has great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of many contributions during the past month, some of them of considerable merit. He will be able, he trusts, to make use of most of them. Those who have favoured him will know that their papers are approved by their receipt of proof for correction.

He hopes that during the currency of the volume, of which the present issue is the first number, he will continue to receive similar literary assistance in the way of articles and correspondence from the friends of the movement and the association.

Correspondents and contributors are requested to be brief, pithy, and sparkling. Long articles are in danger of being laid aside in favour of those that do no more than fill a page of the magazine. The writing should be legible; bad writing means with the printers bad copy. It is more desirable to pay for a good article, clearly written, than have to pay the compositor for setting bad up. Such badly-written articles drift perilously near to the waste-basket. Contributors should always write under a sense of these canons of the Press—"An article is always improved by condensation," and "More articles, however valuable in their subject matter, are rejected through bad caligraphy than through either bad thinking or indifferent style."

DO PUBLIC HOUSES CONDITION DRUNKENNESS?

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I deal only with the English ecclesiastical report as it is quoted by Bailie Lewis himself. He teaches that, if the license laws of Scotland were honestly put into operation we could do a mighty deal to arrest the progress of drunkenness, by merely diminishing the number of public-houses. And to support himself in his demand for arrested drunkenness, through thus administrating the drink trade, he tells us that the English ecclesiastical report affirms that when the facilities for obtaining drink are increased, drunkenness increases also. This is what the Bailie gives of this report to impress his readers that the facilities referred to consist in the number of public-houses; but the Bailie is not warranted in putting this meaning on these words. And my reply is, that if these facilities are drink-shops, drunkenness should have been diminished; but it is not diminished; for since 1848, with the diminution of drink-shops, our drink bill has risen from £72 to £136,000,000 annually. This is not arrested, but increased drunkenness; and it is a palpable untruth, and not a palpable truth, as the Bailie affirms, that drunkenness is conditioned by the number of public-houses. But even if it could be shown that the English ecclesiastical report did support the Bailie's notion about the mere number of public-houses constituting the facilities for obtaining drink, it would still be untrue that drunkenness has diminished with the diminution of public-houses.

Not even the authority of an English ecclesiastical report can set aside the fact that forty years ago, with 290,000 of a population, Glasgow had 3,000 public-houses, and less drunkenness than she now has, with 600,000 of a population, and only 1,800 public-houses, and their back doors all built up, too. This is as obvious as that one and one are two. Yet the Bailie exclaims that in stating it I ungenerously throw discredit on the testimony of 13,000 clergymen. I do nothing of the sort. I neither credit nor discredit them. It is the Bailie that I discredit for unwarrantably inferring from their report that the number of public-houses constitutes drinking facilities.

It is remarkable to see Bailie Lewis hiding behind the representatives of authoritative respectability, whom he has misrepresented, as he himself admits, in order to make it appear that my strictures on his misrepresentations are aimed at them, and not at himself. Who could have believed that the Bailie would have run away and attempted to hide himself in this manner from the consequences of his own inconsiderate words?

In his letter of January the 21st, to justify his assertion that the amount of licensed drink-shops conditions the amount of drunkenness, he represents these 13,000 clergymen as having said so; for he gave what they call facilities as equivalent to drink-shops. In his letters of January 21st he thus makes his drink-shops and the clergymen's facilities to mean one and the same thing. But now, in his letter of February the 18th, he says that these clergymen's facilities do not merely mean the number of public-houses, without regard to the accommodation and tempting power presented by them. What a muddle the Bailie has got into. Who could have concluded that his intellectual right hand could have so lost its cunning as to miss its aim in this way, if it is accommodation and tempting power in public-houses that are the facilities to drinking; and if it has been the case that they increase as the number of public-houses diminish, how should the Bailie exclaim that I forget myself when I say that if the facilities referred to in the clerical report are merely drink-shops, it is untrue that drunkenness has diminished as they have been reduced in number? To say so would certainly be an untruth. The facts that I have given prove it to be untrue. And the Bailie is in a deplorable state as he stands behind his representatives of authoritative respectability, feeling pained that because he is behind them I should not have generously deferred to their authority, and declined to expose his inconsiderate, contradictory statements as to what is their meaning in what they have said.

The Bailie is so confused and contradictory in what he has written that if it is not looked into discriminately he may breed confusion in others. In his letter of January the 21st he says:—"Mr. Paton objects to my having said that the amount of licensed drink-shops to a large extent conditions the amount of drunkenness. This statement, notwithstanding Mr. Paton's denial, is substantially true." In another part of the same letter he continues:—"Mr. Paton may believe that this would in no degree tend to the diminution of drunkenness, but I presume he will get few who know of the aggressive nature of the drink trade to agree with him." But in his letter of February the 18th he writes:—"If there is one fallacy more than another which I have laboured assiduously to expose during the last quarter of a century, it is the notion that the mere reduction of the number of public-houses is any guarantee for the diminution of drinking and drunkenness, if those that remain are allowed to increase their accommodation and tempting powers." On January the 21st he writes that "the number of public-houses conditions drunkenness;" and on February the 18th he declares that this is a fallacy—"that a reduced number of drink-shops is not a guarantee for diminished drinking." The Bailie admits that it is fallacious to expect diminished drunkenness by merely diminishing the number of houses for the sale of drink; but he continues to argue in support of the fallacy, as he did before he made the admission. It is an astonishing performance.

If the Bailie had laid down the principle involved in his statement of February the 18th as the basis of his speech at Edinburgh on December the 11th, he would have saved me the trouble of asking him to explain, and himself the trouble of admitting its soundness, after having controverted it in the manner which has appeared in the Social Reformer. But, after all, the Bailie now admits, although with a contradiction that takes the graciousness from the concession, that a diminished number of public-houses is not the conditions of sobriety, if those that are left are not kept from growing large and temptingly attractive.

If it ever had happened that a diminished number of public-houses had been reduced to none, or to the Bailie's infinitesimal number, two, in the process of salutary restriction, or had become less in accommodation and attractive power, temperance reformers might have hope that, by reduction, the conditions of sobriety would become established—not in prohibition, but in the Bailie's salutary, restricted sale of drink. But there can be no hope that this is ever to take place, for the trade in drink being a monopoly, and the cultivator of the drink craving, while it necessarily falls into the hands of the rich and powerful, it develops the desire for drink, and grows in extent to diffuse attraction; you might as well think to have a small crop of turnips by thinning them, as a limited drink trade by weeding out of it the poor and the powerless that the rich and powerful may have scope to extend operations, and grow more rich and more powerful. It has never taken place, and never can.

The Bailie's letter of February 18th is a remarkable mental manifestation. While he admits that it is a fallacy to expect a diminished number of public-houses as a guarantee for diminished drinking, he still arguingly flounders to show that a few attractive houses facilitate drinking less than a large number limited in accommodation, attraction, and supply. And he exclaims, surely Mr. Paton does not mean to say that two attractive, well-supplied houses would not facilitate drinking less than 500 limited in accommodation and supply. It is obvious that the Bailie, when he wrote this, was off on the wings of imagination, and in his flight had got to the region of the impossible. But when imagination carries a man there to settle a matter reasonably, according to the facts of the case, he loses his head and fails to be practical. I will therefore, if I can, restore the Bailie to the region of the possible, by reminding him that there is not an instance on record in the history of licensing in which restriction has been carried so far as he indicates in his two illustrative houses. While the trade has been maintained to arrest drunkenness, it has increased. And if the Bailie could apply his salutary clauses to the arresting process, he, too, would meet increased drunkenness, for the stuff sold intoxicates, and, as it does so, cultivates the desire for greater intoxication—which is drunkenness on the increase.

Therefore, while the drink trade is in any manner maintained, it cannot take place that there can either be only two houses in any considerable place, or free trade in all places. Wherever the number of houses has been reduced, as in Glasgow, until more drink was sold in the reduced number than in the number that preceded them, the reduced number has fallen to the level on which the rich have the opportunity of taking them up, and making them pay by working them with their money power. In Glasgow the rich have in this way got the trade into their hands, and further reduction is stopped. It is their interest to stop further reduction, and they have the power to secure their interests. This is so evident that I am astonished at the Bailie's imaginary flight all the way to two mythical houses in the region of the impossible. Let the Bailie speak, and work steadily for prohibition and sobriety, and not for the enforcement of salutary provisions in the license laws to arrest drunkenness, and imagination will not carry him out of the way to breed confusion, for clearness, in discussing the temperance question.

The Bailie persists, in the solemn protesting mood, to misrepresent me as looking complacently upon drunken arrests. He can imagine what is impossible, and see what does not exist. I have not written or spoken complacently, approvingly, or disapprovingly of any arrests whatever. I have merely said that if there was no drunkenness except that represented by the arrests of the helplessly drunk, we would be comparatively a sober people. All the world knows that the helplessly drunk are at an incalculable distance from illustrating the extent and consequences of our drunkenness; and until the Bailie really denies this fact there cannot be much solemnity in his solemn protesting. While in this solemn mood he had, it seems, before him the criminal returns for Glasgow, and he has found that during last year 40,772 apprehensions had taken place for assault, drunkenness, etc., and posing in great solemnity he hurls all this crime at my head, as he denounces me for being complacent about it. Now, while I have written, as quoted above, about the helplessly drunk, I have not referred at all to criminals and their arrests, drunk or sober. But while I am not responsible for the criminals of Glasgow, nor complacently indifferent about them, it is easy to see they have no connection with the merely helplessly drunk. A child could comprehend that criminals in Glasgow or elsewhere, either drunk or sober, can have no connection with the helplessly drunk in Edinburgh, whom the Bailie has arrayed to illustrate the extent to which a large number of drink-shops in one ward as against a small number in another ward conditions drinking and drunkenness. This is the matter to be cleared up; but the Bailie runs away from it, and writes about Glasgow criminals. He is asked if the ward with the least houses and the least arrests is not inhabited by people least liable to be caught helplessly drunk. This truthful answer would settle the matter, but on this head he does not utter a word.

There is nothing in this correspondence that seems to interest the Bailie so much as to avoid the matter which occasioned it. He even goes out of his way to lug in ex-Provost Collins, that he may present him as deploring the drunkenness and crime of Glasgow in contrast with the depraved complacency which he insists in attributing to myself in its contemplation. Surely it cannot be fairly supposed that there is a virtuous man in Scotland who does not deplore the whole of its drunkenness and crime. It must, therefore, be worse than meaningless in the Bailie thus ostentatiously to name your honoured ex-Provost for doing no more than is done by everybody. In this respect the ex-Provost is not greater and better than ordinary people, and the Bailie has no advantage in taking him from the multitude to stand up beside him, unless it be that in doing so he may avoid to grapple fairly with the matter in hand.—Yours, etc.,

JOHN PATON.

To the Editor of Social Reformer.

SIR,—There are few things more repugnant to an honourable mind than to find a man who, worsted in discussion, betakes himself to the raising of false issues, and then by misrepresenting his opponent attempts to throw upon him the result of his own delinquency. This is precisely the attitude assumed by Mr. Paton in his last communication—a copy of which you have kindly forwarded me. Instead of dealing with the well attested facts in my former letters he finds it more convenient to state what, in his own polite language, is a "palpable untruth," and then impudently attributes to me the responsibility of having uttered it. Let me prove this grave impeachment.

On referring back to my letter which appeared in your February number, he says, "On January 21 he (the Bailie) writes that the number of public houses conditions drunkenness." I scarcely require to inform your readers that my letter of the 21st contains no such statement, it being a pure invention of your correspondent. The statement I made, and to which Mr. Paton was foolish enough to take exception, was, that "the amount of licensed drink shops to a large extent conditions the amount of drunkenness." It will thus be seen that Mr. Paton has suppressed the words which I have italicised, and having done so he puts his counterfeit sentence in inverted comas, and then charges me with having written it. Your correspondent has thus committed a threefold offence. 1st, He has grossly misrepresented my statement, which he formerly denied, but signally failed to disprove. 2nd, He has sought to mislead your readers in his attempt to convert a proposition so palpable and popular as scarcely to admit of discussion; and 3rd, He has imposed upon himself by evidently believing that his subterfuge would not be detected.

Your correspondent by adopting the policy of suppression, and getting quit of the qualifying terms in my statement, involving the necessary consideration of other conditions, then proceeds to occupy your space with an irrelevant criticism of the spurious statement which he is personally responsible for having coined and put in circulation. Under these circumstances it will not be expected that I should follow him through his inextricable maze of irrelevancy extending over two and a half columns of your journal. I must, however, be allowed to bring him back to the real question under discussion, viz., Does the number of licensed drink shops to a large extent condition the amount of drunkenness? This I have answered in the affirmative, and have demonstrated its accuracy by the testimony of governors and chaplains of prisons, the heads of constabulary throughout the country, the superintendents of lunatic asylums in Wales, judges, recorders, coroners, and masters of workhouses throughout England and Wales, and by ecclesiastical reports attested by hundreds of Scottish clergymen, and by thousands of clergymen of the Church of England.

Mr. Paton has denied, but signally failed to disprove the proposition in question. It is of no avail that he contrasts the Drink Bill of 1848 with that of 1880. No man knows better than he that, altogether irrespective of the great increase in population, the entire conditions of the respective periods are changed, and that by higher wages and more leisure greater facilities for drinking and drunkenness exist in 1880 than existed in 1848. It is of no avail that he contrasts the number of public houses in Glasgow 40 years ago with those which now exist. Did I not previously call his attention to the fact that public houses although fewer in number than they were 40 years ago, possess now enormously increased accommodation, and are infinitely more powerful in display and attractive influence than at the former period. That all cavil under this head may be set at rest, I may state, that while the total rental of licensed premises in Glasgow in 1858 was £66,205, it is now £191,602. The task Mr. Paton has in hand is not to compare the number of public houses now existing with the facilities for drinking with those which existed several generations ago. It is for him to point to towns or districts in the country where—all things being equal—a smaller number of public houses produce a maximum amount of drunkenness, or where a larger number of public houses produces a minimum amount of drunkenness. Failing to do this let him point us to certain towns or districts in the country where, under the same conditions, public houses have undergone a decided diminution in number, without a diminution in drunkenness as the result. Or, what would be to the same purpose, let him point us to towns and districts where, all things being equal, public houses have been largely increased in number, without their having produced an increase of drunkenness and its concomitant evils. There is only one other way of escape from the awkward dilemma in which by his rashness he has placed himself—that is, by his proving to the satisfaction of your readers that every public-house is not a centre of temptation, and that every publican is not a centre of influence in producing drunkenness in the circle of his associates. Let me supply your correspondent with an additional illustration of what I mean and which will at the same time contribute another to the number of my unanswered and, I may add, unanswerable facts. In October, 1865, the number of licensed liquor shops in Gothenburg was reduced at one stroke from forty to twenty-three, or nearly by one half. What was the result of this reduction? Not as Mr. Paton would have us believe—no diminution in drunkenness—on the contrary the number of drunken cases proved by the police returns fell within the twelve months from 2,070 to 1,424. This is not all. During the next year there was no further reduction in the number of the liquor shops, and, as was to be expected, there was no diminution in the number of drunken cases worth mentioning. Let it here be noted, that during the latter year there was no change either in the population or in their external conditions, or in the administration of the law. We commend this additional fact to Mr. Paton, in the hope that after he has disposed of those previously given him he will reconcile this Gothenburg experience with that theory, of which, so far as I know he has the honour to be, the sole apostle. I submit that if the licensed liquor shops in Glasgow, or in any town in the kingdom, were to be reduced by one half, and the facilities and temptations to drinking thus lessened, and the accommodation of the remainder not increased, there would be a reduction in the commitments for drunkenness corresponding with the above.

There is one relevant point in Mr. Paton's letter, wherein he tries to argue, and which, were I to fail to notice, he would have just cause of complaint. While now admitting the accuracy of my figures, proving that in those wards where public-houses are most numerous, there is the greatest amount of drunkenness, and vice versa, he asks if the wards with few public-houses are not inhabited by an improved class of people. By admitting that they are so, your correspondent evidently does not see that he is proving my position. The comparative absence of public-houses in those wards, by a law as certain as that of gravitation, NECESSITATES the improved condition of the people, just as certainly as the presence of large numbers in other wards necessarily deteriorates those resident therein. Strange that Mr. Paton did not see this!

There are some men who can apprehend a principle so soon as it is stated, but, as we have seen, this is not always so. I believe, however, that in order to get the most obtuse to comprehend the application of any principle we have only to push our illustration to the extreme. Let me try this experiment in the present case. There are at present 1,799 licensed liquor shops in Glasgow. In the event of their number being reduced say to 17, am I not right in assuming that it would then become manifest either to the meanest capacity or the most prejudiced mind, that as a necessary and natural result there would be a great diminution in drunkenness.

If, in this discussion, the object of Mr. Paton has been to demonstrate his fierce hostility to the reduction in the number of the licensed liquor shops, and to bring discredit on the prohibitory agitation by branding as apologists of the drink trade, and as enemies of prohibition, those who approve of the enforcement of the Forbes Mackenzie and Public Houses Acts, then I must congratulate him on his success. If, on the contrary, his object has been to prove that the number of public houses does not, to a large extent, condition the amount of drunkenness, then I submit that he has signally and miserably failed.—I am, yours etc., DAVID LEWIS.

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—III.

Feb. 21.—The Lords had a debate on the opening of museums, &c., on Sunday. The noble Lord (Dunraven) who introduced the bill pleaded for the opening of these places because the poor have wretched homes, because they have nowhere but the public-house to go to. Hence the idea of rest had been now so much associated with drink that holiday and intemperance were synonymous terms. He objected to an Act of Parliament making the public-house the only open place on Sundays. He wanted the poor man to have an alternative. In the petitions he presented were to be found the signatures of many members of Parliament, of many chief magistrates, 93 Church of England clergymen, 173 Nonconformists, and 266 ministers of various denominations. If they could trust a man with a vote, why not trust him going to a museum. He would surely distinguish between it and a dancing saloon. The Earl of Shaftesbury followed. He would support opening these places during the week evenings. He disputed the statement that thousands of British men were desirous of having museums, &c., opened on Sunday, and he had petitions signed by 26,000 in their neighbourhood, praying that they should be closed, and recently 24,000 petitioned against the farther opening of the Kensal Green Museum. At first it was argued that the taverns and public-houses would be emptied as soon as such places were opened. In his opinion, if the galleries and museums were opened, they would not find one single person leave the gin shops for the sake of the pictures, statues, &c. If they opened these places, they would multiply the number of persons who would have to toil on the Sunday—cabmen, tramway-car men, omnibus men, railwaymen, and others. The amount of additional labour would be frightful, and it would be incurred in the interests of mere pleasure. Then they could not stop at museums; they would be compelled to open aquariums and even the theatre as an acknowledged source of intellectual instruction. Then other more questionable places would demand to follow in the wake of these. Their lordships ought to encourage the feeling of reverence for the Sunday so manifest. The debate was continued by Duke of Somerset, Earl of Rosebery, Earl Granville, and Lord Thurlow in favour of the motion, and by Archbishop of Canterbury, Earl Cairns, and Duke of Argyll against it. The result was that the motion was lost by 34 to 41.

Feb. 22.—Sir John Lubbock moved the second reading of the Free Libraries Bill, but, owing to opposition, had to withdraw it.

Feb. 24.—The Earl of Dalhousie's Local Rates (Scotland) Bill was read a first time.

Sir H. D. Wolff postponed the motion on the duties on tobacco.

Feb. 25.—The Lord-Advocate, in reply to Sir G. Balfour, said a bill had been introduced for obtaining an annual report on the Local Taxation of Scotland, similar to that obtained for England and Ireland.

Feb. 28.—Lord Dalhousie moved the second reading of the Local Taxation (Scotland) Bill, to which the Lord-Advocate had referred on the 25th, and the bill was read a second time.

March 1.—The Local Taxation (Scotland) Bill passed through the Lords' Committee.

March 3.—The report of amendment on the Local Taxation Returns (Scotland) Bill was considered in the Lords.

Mr. Baxter gave notice of the following question:—Whether, seeing that the business of the House has been stopped, and the national safety imperilled, Her Majesty's Government intend to propose such measures as will effectually put an end to obstruction, and at the same time vindicate the dignity and restore the legislative powers of Parliament?

March 4.—On the motion of Lord Ramsay, the Local Taxation (Scotland) Bill was read in the House of Lords the third time.

March 7.—Mr. Gladstone, replying to Lord R. Churchill, said the only license the licensed victuallers of Oxford had to pay for the sale of wine was £2 10s. The matter was one between them and the University authorities rather than between them and the State.

March 8.—Replying to Mr. Russell, Mr. Fawcett said that some weeks ago he had cordially consented that a clerk from the Post Office Savings Bank should twice weekly conduct a branch at the brewery of Messrs. Bass & Co., Burton. He would, if other firms made similar proposals, send clerks to them, as far as the resources of the local Post Offices would permit.

—Replying to Mr. Rodwell, Sir H. James said "that eight royal elections commissions were issued on September last. Four of the reports—Canterbury, Boston, Knaresbro', and Sandwick—had been in the hands of the members. He began to be apprehensive that the evidence would not be completed so as to allow him to read the evidence. As to the remaining reports, if they could not be presented in time, they would be placed on the table of the House in manuscript form." No proceedings can be instituted after the expiry of twelve months after the alleged offence; hence the anxiety of hon. members to have a printed copy of the reports.

—Mr. Hardcastle asked the Home Secretary whether there was any truth in the statement which appeared in the Standard of that morning? That statement was as follows:—"A correspondent informs us that, by an accident, a printed draft of the Government measure for regulating the trade of the licensed victuallers has got abroad, and the following is a summary outline of the provisions of the bill. It is founded upon the lines recommended in the report of the Lords' Committee on Intemperance. It proposes to regulate public-houses both as to the hours of opening and closing, and the whole subject of the liquor traffic. Its main provisions are absolutely free-trade in licenses, and that any person of good character may keep a public-house on the condition of paying the stipulated licensing duty, equivalent to so much in the pound on the rateable value of the premises. The bill does not propose to give any compensation to the existing license-holders no matter whatever they have paid for their houses. In regard to the opening and closing of houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, it provides that in London public-houses on week-days are not to be opened until seven o'clock in the morning, and are to be closed at eleven o'clock at night. On Sundays they are to be opened from one to three o'clock, as at present, but simply for sale off the premises. No one is to be allowed to consume drink on the premises, and no spirits are to be sold between the hours of one and three on Sundays; but on Sunday nights the public-houses are to be opened from seven to ten o'clock for sale of intoxicating liquors either off or on the premises. In the provinces the houses are to be opened on week-days from seven to ten o'clock, and on Sundays for a short time only, and then only for the purpose of selling intoxicating liquors for consumption off the premises. It is not expected that the Government will bring in the measure this session."

Sir W. V. Harcourt said—Of late years a great many printed drafts of a great many subjects have by accident got abroad; but I can confidently state that no printed draft of a Government measure for regulating the trade of licensed victuallers has got abroad, and for this reason, that there never has been such a draft, and it never has been printed. (Laughter.)

March 18.—Mr. Trevelyan, in moving the Navy Estimates, said that "the Admiralty had a bill on the table for the abolition of flogging, and they had asked themselves if there were not means by which they could lessen the temptations to drink. (Cheers.)

EDINBURGH BAND OF HOPE UNION.

The annual business meeting of the Edinburgh Band of Hope Union, was held on Monday evening, 7th ult., in Darling's Hotel, Waterloo Place. There was a large and representative attendance of ladies and gentlemen, most of whom are actively engaged in the work of the Union. Mr. John Vallance, president of the Union, occupied the chair, and among others present were the Rev. John Kay, the Rev. Mr. Wylie, Rev. R. B. Blyth, the Rev. Mr. Kilgour, Cockenzie; ex-Bailie Lewis, Messrs. James Darling, R. Somerville, Dalkeith; J. Telfor, George Tait, J. Coutts, W. J. Brander, secretary; S. M'Glashan, treasurer, &c. After tea, the Secretary read the fifth annual report, showing that, from a small beginning five years ago, there were now 96 Bands of Hope with a membership estimated at 10,000. Within the last twelve months 26 new Bands of Hope had been added to the union roll, while 11 had been deleted, giving a net increase of 15. The report went on to give an interesting account of the work done by the union, the visitations of districts by deputations, the musical demonstrations, and so on; and the directors expressed their special thanks to Miss Guthrie and her lady friends for their services as collectors. The Treasurer submitted his report, which showed that the subscriptions amounted to £48 and the total income to £135, but the liabilities exceeded the assets by £4 13s., and he hoped the contributors would keep this in mind when called upon for contributions.

The Rev. Mr. WYLIE moved the adoption of the reports. They were a record that the operations of the union had been carried on during the past year with a large amount of vigour and success. One of the special designs of Bands of Hope was to create a temperance conscience. Not so long ago Christian people did not think it wrong to ask God's blessing on a glass of whisky; but by the enlightening influences of such associations as this that had been largely done away with. He believed they would ultimately get the Permissive Bill, but our legislators had their hands very full at present, so that they would not be able to devote their attention for a time to the liquor question. It was, therefore, all the more necessary for every Christian to endeavour to secure the success of the temperance movement; and if the union and other temperance associations joined themselves with other Christian workers they were sure of ultimate success. Mr. J. S. Gibb seconded the motion. In Edinburgh there was spent last year a million of money on drink indulgence; and as a nation we spend a million every day of the year on drink and its connections, while the Government derived £33,000,000 annually of revenue from this vice. He urged them to continue forming public opinion on this question, and expressed his belief that Bands of Hope, by beginning with the young, were beginning at the right end. Ex-Bailie Lewis in moving the election of the new directors, said they had a right to expect that much work should be done by the union in the coming year, because they got hold of the children, and had the chance of making the first impression on their youthful mind, and there was much in that. If they had Christian parents, and if they watched the first movements of the infant minds, and inculcated right principles, provident habits, truthfulness, loyalty to duty, and sound principles of morality, and if they were careful to see that these principles were developed along with the natural development of the child, it would be nearly as difficult for these children to abandon these good habits as for those who had grown up in evil habits to leave off their evil habits. As to the political position of the movement they had been told by their honoured Prime Minister that there was no time to deal with this question, because their hands were full of more important matters. He (Mr. Lewis) apprehended that there was no question at the present hour, momentous as these times were, more important than this one of temperance. He was aware of the difficulties the Government had to deal with in Ireland and their foreign wars, and while he would leave them to try to get over these troubles, he maintained that they were entitled to have this great question of liquor reform introduced even in a secondary place into the programme of the Government. Mr. R. Lockhart, the Rev. Messrs. Blyth and Kilgour, and Mr. Henry then addressed the meeting.

The Rev. John Kay said that the most interesting aspect of the temperance question was that in connection with which they had now met—the impressing upon the young the danger connected with strong drink, and endeavouring to instil into them sound principles in reference to that and other social questions that they would afterwards have to deal with as citizens. It was very important this point of educating the young, for they were the hope of the future. He thought, too, the Christian Church was bound to come to the help of a society like this, which would do tenfold more and tenfold better work if the whole Church of Christ in the country were taking up the Band of Hope movement. It was delightful to find that in many congregations in Scotland there was a movement in that direction, and he wished to see it become universal. Clergymen and office-bearers of churches should alike be interested in the temperance education of the young, and then they would be induced to take a deeper interest in rescuing those of maturer years from the temptations of drink. The two ought to go hand in hand, and he knew of many encouraging instances in which the giving of oneself to Band of Hope work had led to a deepened interest in the larger question of temperance in relation to its political and social aspects. The injury done morally and spiritually to the Church of Christ through the drinking habits of the day was a thing that weighed like a heavy load upon the soul of every man who was anxious for the perfecting of the Church. Her beauty was obscured, her power weakened, her ministers, probationers, and office-bearers, in not a few cases, brought low, degraded, and disgraced by the terrible vice. Surely, then, the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, must rise and gird their loins for the contest, and go forth to battle against the evil that was ruining so many of their fellow-men, in hope and confidence that God would strengthen and enable them to work till the victory was gained.

Messrs. George Wilson, Leith, Jas. Coutts, A. R. Williamson, W. Small, J. Bauchope, George Tait, and others, subsequently addressed the meeting. After the usual votes of thanks the meeting was closed with the benediction.

On the 24th ult., a signally successful Soiree Conference was held in New Waverley Hall, Edinburgh, to advance the interests of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, in the capital and east of Scotland. Ex-Bailie Torrens, J.P., presided; and addresses were delivered by Rev. Drs. Blackie and Adamson, Revs. J. Kay and Cunningham, Bailie Selkirk, Provost Dick, Messrs. Tait, Winning, Coutts, Steel, and Dr. Bowie, Mrs. Kirk, and Miss Wigham. An efficient choir was in attendance.

OUR BOOK SHELF.

BOOKS, &c., for Review, and communications for the Editor, should be forwarded, not later than the 12th of each month, and as much earlier as possible, to the Offices, 30 Hope Street.

Annual Register, 1880, Penicuik Total Abstinence Society. Corresponding secretary, John H. Howden, Wilson Square, Penicuik. The annual report of this society is one of the best of its kind as regards "get-up." We have list of office-bearers, of committee, of all members in "good standing," and of the books in the society's temperance library. Then we have the abstract of treasurer's accounts which show with balance brought forward an income of £53, 1s. 3½d., and a balance to carry forward to next year of £5, 1s. 10½d. The report itself is the forty-second issued by the society, and it is full of interesting matter. Among the speakers who have lectured under the auspices of the society we find the names of ex-Bailie Lewis, and our eastern district superintendent, Mr. Waterston. We are sorry to find with all the energy of the committee, that the membership has slightly decreased since the issue of last report, and that some of the staunch friends of the movement and locality have passed away. We learn that two separate attempts have been made during the year to inflict a porter and ale license upon the Fieldsend and Shottstown district, but the committee gladly report the non-success of both attempts. We heartily congratulate the society on its position, and they have our heartiest wishes for its welfare and progress.

The Scottish Congregational Society's Occasional Paper, No II. Glasgow: Macnaughton & Sinclair, 93 St. Vincent Street. The committee has rendered a real service to the Congregational body by the publication of this valuable paper by their worthy secretary, Rev. Mr. M'Lean. None could have done the subject more ample justice. The paper is thickly studded with sentences which should be engraved deeply on the hearts of all desirous of seeing the church grappling effectively with the intemperance of our day. We cordially agree with the following sentence—"If Christ's church is unequal to the task of grappling with popular sins then let her retire from the field and confess her failure. But the church is equal to the task if she but carry out the principles of her Divine Leader and do all the work He has committed to her. There is not a single moral precept she should not teach—not a sin she should not have a remedy for—not a wholesome example needed which she is not able to practice." Again, "The churches as churches have not presented the bold and decisive front to this enemy of morality and religion which many of their pastors and members have done. The churches have not been centres of aggression on the intemperance of the country. They have suffered from it, but they have not applied to it the drastic treatment which it deserves and which it should receive at their hands." The whole paper is an eloquent and practical plea in behalf of Congregational churches having as part of their machinery a well equipped, well managed temperance society, and the hints given for the institution of these societies are only four in number, but they are quite sufficient. We incidentally learn that there is not a publican in connection with the Congregational Union, and there does not appear to be more than half a dozen of wine merchants and licensed grocers. About 70 per cent. of the pastors and a large percentage of the members of the churches in the Union are abstainers.

Poor Law Reform.—A new solution, embracing the criminal, the vagrant, and want of employment problems. By D. Low, member of council of the University of St. Andrews, Cupar-Fife. A. Westwood & Son. Price 2d. This is a remarkable production. To many readers its views must savour of the extreme. Its solution of the poor law problem is force. It wishes to remedy the poor law system—a remedy is urgent—as the present means of dealing with the poor is inadequate and unsatisfactory. Mr. Low sees clearly the evil of not discriminating between the unfortunate and the vicious poor, and he insists, and we think properly, on the charities mortifications being sufficient for those who have seen better days, or who never have been endowed with the capacity to earn their own living. The others he would show no mercy to. He would deprive them of their liberty, and, as it were, would break them in as we break in youthful criminals in our training ships and reformatories to abiding habits of industry. If they did acquire a willingness to work, why then, they could claim their emancipation, their surplus earnings, and their discharge. On a relapse they were liable to enforced slavery. We confess we look upon this idea with considerable favour, because it is imposing that training upon the social nomad which the industrious classes have been subjected to with the best results. Society would be a gainer negatively; there would not be the same demands on her charitable resources, and positively in the accession of men at once producers and consumers. Improvidence and idleness being antisocial acts which should be branded as crimes, the classes of the lapsed might be expected to disappear. Mr. Low is no less thoroughgoing in dealing with the victims, through want of employment, of enforced idleness. He would ask Government to establish a labour exchange, using the post-office, telegraph, railways, and such-like, to equalise labour by bringing those willing to work and the work waiting the worker together. He puts his case forcibly when he says—"The great function of government is to protect life, liberty, and property, and what is the difference betwixt falling a prey to the invaders' bullets, bayonets, or bombshells, and succumbing to famine or being enslaved by hopeless penury?" The State might employ such a class, but would require to give a pay graduated to meet the necessities of the worker and his family. He advocates this view on the ground that misery, penury, destitution breed dangerous distempers—such as infidelity, drunkenness, and similar evils. The main proposal which Mr. Low firmly presses on our attention is that of registration. All who are able to maintain themselves, or though able have no work, and all vicious poor are to be registered. The first to show that they can help themselves, the second that they desire employment, and the third that they are the serfs either of an employer or the State until they work themselves into the class of workers who can earn their own and family's living. He instances the registration adopted in the army, navy, civil-service, among chemists, &c. In short, compulsory well-doing would be the rule with all classes, and the State would employ its energies in stamping out its social leprosy. The book demands careful consideration, and offers much food for thought. We heartily approve of his remedies for the vigorous excision from society of the idle and improvident poor. We believe with him that our present charities' income, if properly managed, should be sufficient for all those who through orphanage, disability, senility, require aid. We cannot see our way to give an equal approval to the labour exchange or general registration scheme, as we believe, were society freed from its wasters and its social vermin, the industrious virtuous workers in society might very easily be left "to paddle their own canoe." Mr. Low does not ignore drunkenness and its causes and remedies, but he only speaks of them with a rather "bated breath;" and he thinks they might be antagonised by education, industry, and wealth. We have become the richest people through free trade on the face of the earth, but because government has, on revenue grounds, continued to protect the liquor traffic, the wealth and industry of millions of working men has been to them a positively bitter curse.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. R. BLAIR, LASSWADE.—We are deeply sorry to have to record the decease of this staunch temperance reformer and estimable gentleman on the 21st ult. His departure, through disease of the heart, was sudden. He was 58 years of age. He will be greatly missed. As a public man no one had an equal reputation for sound judgment or business energy. He delighted in forwarding the progress, the prosperity, and the salubrity of the place. He did his best as member of the Parochial Board to alleviate poverty, as one of the School Board he did what he could to advance the education of the rising generation, and on the management of the Water Supply Company no one was more active in his efforts to promote health and banish uncleanness. All these duties, and others which it is not our province to discuss, he discharged with ability and success, and all the better because he was a total abstainer and prohibitionist, steadfast, energetic, and consistent. Of him, in this phase of his busy life, it is on record that his "efforts were unwearied, and from his extensive reading and well-stored memory, his addresses on this subject, abounding as they did in argument, anecdote, and pathos, combined with a gift of natural oratory of extraordinary power, were telling, effective, greatly sought after, and as readily granted." He made a stand with other electors against the Earl of Dalkeith as an enemy of local option, and was unsparing in his efforts to change the representation of Edinburghshire. He has left behind him a reputation for active and unostentatious good as merited as it is rare, and to know the esteem in which he was held one had to witness the tearful tribute paid to his worth when on the 24th ult. he was interred amid a manifestation of sorrow which only rare merit is able to evoke. Mr. Blair held prohibitory opinions tenaciously and intelligently, was a hearty supporter of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association of which he was so long an honorary director. He was a staunch ally when the superintendent of the Association was labouring in his district. He was always ready and willing to appear in Edinburgh at a critical moment, or when a demonstration to promote its objects was found to be necessary. He leaves a widow and family behind him, who have the sincere condolence of all who had seen for themselves our departed friend's signal worth.

THE LATE REV. ALEXANDER THOMSON, PEEBLES.—We deeply regret to have to record the death of this most esteemed minister of the gospel on Sunday, the 13th ult. He has been in failing health for some time and passed peacefully away in the 81st year of his age and the 52nd year of his ministry. He was the senior pastor of the West U.P. Church, and was highly respected not merely by his own congregation but by those belonging to other denominations, and by the community generally, for he was always ready and willing to aid any movement which he thought calculated to promote the physical, social, and religious welfare of the town and neighbourhood. We bear our testimony to this, for often has the Revd. gentleman presided over the meetings in Peebles held to promote the objects of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, or taken part in the proceedings. He has obtained a good report and leaves behind him a memory fragrant with good deeds. On the completion of the 40th year of his ministry he was presented with a handsome testimonial eagerly subscribed for by all classes, and on the occasion of his jubilee he was presented with a silver salver and a purse of gold amounting to £264. This sum he handed to the Synod's funds for assisting aged and infirm ministers.

ADMIRATION.—There is a wide difference between admiration and love. The sublime, which is the cause of the former, always dwells on great objects, and terrible; the latter on small ones, and pleasing; we submit to what we admire, but we love what submits to us: in one case we are forced, in the other we are flattered, into compliance.—Burke.

MAY, 1881.

HOW TO CONDUCT A BAND OF HOPE.

A paper read at a meeting of workers in Aberdeen, January, 1881.

We read in history of many famous bands. In the days of ancient Greece the Macedonian band was held in the highest repute, as it resisted and subdued the repeated attacks of the bravest and most courageous of its country's enemies. The Lycian band also was highly esteemed, no less for its sobriety than its skill in archery. You have heard of the brave band of three hundred Spartans who at the head of the Pass of Thermopylae withstood for three days the best and bravest of the Persian army, and of the no less gallant band of Switzers, who in the rugged Morgarten Pass hurled down great rocks, and then rushing from the heights beat down the Austrian chivalry with pikes and iron-shod clubs. When it was thought that a French force might at any moment be landed on our shores, our noble volunteer bands were enrolled as an army of defence. For many years a terrible foe has enslaved us, under a more galling bondage than Israel ever endured at the hands of Pharaoh, or our own brave ancestors at the hands of English lordlings. That foe is intemperance, and to fight it thousands of our countrymen have banded themselves into abstinence societies, but best and most hopeful sign of all, tens of thousands of children also are enrolled in Bands of Hope to do battle with this giant foe.

The cause which enlists the young cannot fail of success. History has loved to celebrate how Hannibal when a boy was led to the altar and made swear eternal vengeance on the Romans for the cruel wrongs they had inflicted on Carthage, and how in his manhood he crossed the Alps at the head of his legions and crushed the oppressors. The plaudits of the children of Jerusalem as they poured forth the joyous cry "Hosanna to the Son of David," struck dismay into the hearts of the envious Pharisees. When Luther in his darkest hour heard that children were praying for him he took fresh courage, and ever after presented an unwavering front to his enemies. To make a good soldier we must begin with the boy. To rear a genuine British tar he must be rocked to sleep by the murmur of the waves. To excel in a profession, to be proficient in science or skilled in art, one must begin early. Lycurgus, the great Spartan lawgiver, wisely directed his chief efforts to the training of the young, with a view to the future greatness of the state, and hence, whatever we would put into the life of a people must first be put into its youth. Give me, said the great Syracusan, a lever long enough and strong enough, and a fulcrum on which to rest it, and I will move the world. But give me the children and I will break the "Devil's chain" of intemperance that enslaves half a million of my fellow subjects; give me the children and I will saturate the land with the clear sparkling principles of sobriety; give me the children and I will heave overboard every cask and flask and bottle that would sink the state, so that our noble Britain shall press on to victories of justice, temperance, and truth; give me the children and "as arrows are in the hand of a mighty man," with them I will smite the hydra of intemperance that has been so long nourished and caressed in the bosom of my country.

Than innocent children, who have suffered more from the drink fiend? Talk of Moloch—"horrid king!" More children have been immolated on Bacchus' altar than ever burned in his brazen arms, and therefore their right to aid in overthrowing the "system" is indisputable. For His dear sake who said "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," we, like watchful shepherds, will guard the fold that no destroyer shall enter; like trusty guides we will beat the track for them, we will shield them, we will launch them out on the sea of life with safe compass and chart, and by God's grace lay the foundation on which a glorious superstructure will yet be reared and endure forever.

How best to accomplish this is the object of this paper, and when we consider the mighty issues involved, say is it not a work worthy of our best services, and worth making prayerful efforts to carry on and perfect?

In conducting a primary school, or in fact any educational association, three things are essential, viz.:—organization, discipline, and method; and though a Band of Hope differs from a school inasmuch as membership is voluntary, yet to be permanently beneficial the same points must be steadily adhered to.

I. Organization. This has reference to all the mechanical arrangements, appliances, and artifices whereby the business of a society is facilitated and promoted. It includes such subjects as (1) The officers and their duties; (2) Apparatus; (3) Registration; and (4) Routine and programmes.

The officers are—

Superintendent, or conductor, whose duties are similar to those of a Sabbath school superintendent.

A secretary, on whose tact and business capacity very much of the success of a society depends.

Monitors, who should be selected for general intelligence and good behaviour.

A staff of visitors, to keep members steadfast.

A librarian to issue books and keep for sale a supply of temperance literature.

A president, whose social position is such as will secure the moral support of the community.

There are many societies, however, doing splendid work where one or two willing individuals discharge any or all of these offices on account of an insufficient number of ready helpers to form a working staff. Let such take courage—

"In life's earnest battle, they only prevail
Who daily march onwards, and never say fail."

For the encouragement of the ladies, let me say that Band of Hope work is a kind for which they are specially adapted, for who can so win the affections of a child? Who can so sweep its heart strings as woman? There is none of the offices I have mentioned in connection with a Band of Hope that ladies would not adorn, not excepting that even of superintendent.

II. Apparatus, i.e., the requisites for a Band of Hope. A full list would include—

1. Sets of books for Bands of Hope, e.g., minute book, treasurer's book, pledge book, attendance register.

2. A set of rules or a constitution for the general management of the society, also pledge cards, which should clearly express the thing agreed to. For children it is thought that the "short pledge" is best, because it is of such a nature that they can perfectly understand; and as Bands of Hope are meant to be feeders to adult societies, the children will be in a position to understand the obligations of what is known as the "long pledge," when they are of age to pass from the one to the other.

3. Band of Hope melodies, which should be cheap and free from objectionable sentiments of any kind. Poetry linked to music is a powerful aid in cultivating the moral feelings, and instilling ennobling emotions into the mind. "If you wish to impress on the heart of a people some beautiful thought or vital principle, enshrine it in a poem—the charm of poetry will win a place for it in a thousand hearts; if you wish every heart of that thousand to repeat it often, to live upon its thoughts with quiet and unceasing delight, then embalm it in a song."

4. Books of dialogues and recitations. They are to be had in great variety and very cheap, prepared specially for Bands of Hope. Only those children who have overcome the mechanical difficulties of reading, should be asked to take part in this exercise, and only after private preparation. When a passage is well read or recited it has a powerful effect in awakening the feelings, and in inculcating sentiment—important agents in the formation of character.

5. Illustrations or pictures. The love of pictures is universal. Little children never weary of them, and even savages receive delight from them, however simple. Their mission is twofold, first to please, and second to instruct. To exhibit such pictures as "The Bottle," "The Sermon on Malt," "The Gin Trap," "The Gin Juggernaut," "The Gin Shop," or "The Worship of Bacchus," all by Cruickshank, which have been published at a cheap rate in handy form, will exert a great influence for good, and teach the children to love virtue for virtue's sake. The plain and coloured illustrated wall papers, over 100 in number, and costing 1d. each, issued by the publishers of the "British Workman," are by first-class artists, and are invaluable as passive moral trainers. Portraits of the great and good who have by precept and example been eminent abstainers as e.g., Joseph Levesey of Preston, the father of the temperance movement; J. B. Gough; Sir Wilfrid Lawson; John Bright; Father Mathew; Dr. Richardson; David Livingstone; Dr. Guthrie; Sir John Ross; Elihu Burritt; Commodore Goodenough; and Generals Napier, Havelock, Wolesley, and Roberts, &c., would stimulate the children to give similar brave testimonies for the same good cause. Precept is good, pattern is better, but pattern and precept best of all. Illuminated Scripture texts, e.g., "Wine is a mocker," "Thou God seest me," "Watch and pray," "Keep thyself pure," "Hold fast that which is good," &c., or illuminated sayings of the wise and good, as e.g., "Prevention is better than cure," "There are more drowned in the wine cup than in the sea," "Wine is a turncoat, first a friend, then an enemy, "Drunkenness makes some men fools, some beasts, some devils," &c., will stick to children to their dying day, keep them from the path of vice, and be a strong impulse to goodness and truth.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE EXCEPTIONAL TRAFFIC.

WE live under Free Trade, and have done so for some thirty-four years. Back to old protection is out of the question. Some parties, smarting under such embarrassing or embarrassed circumstances, utter faint whispers in praise of protection; but it won't do. The opinion of the nation, of the people, was fully made up on this point ere the barriers of "protection" were burst, and, once for all, shattered to atoms, and there is no use attempting to reconstruct these atoms again.

"Humpty-Dumpty sat on a wall;
Humpty-Dumpty had a great fall:
Not all the king's horses and all the king's men, Could set Humpty-Dumpty up again."

This is the inevitable fate of all exploded monopolies. Public opinion is long in making up its mind, but its decision once arrived at, the result is final—there is no appeal. The Corn Laws can no more be re-imposed in Britain than can slavery be re-introduced. The time was when no open and avowed hostility was shown either to slavery or to the Corn Laws. The one had long existed, being a supposed source of wealth, and as such was clung to and defended; but the wise and good had their attention turned to the injustice, oppression, and cruelty of slavery. Through the press and the platform the heart and conscience of the nation were appealed to. Ignorance was displaced, prejudice gave way, and the anti-slavery agitation was crowned with complete success. Soon, thereafter, the attention of the nation was turned towards the iniquitous Corn Laws, whose operation had kept food at famine prices, hampered manufacture, trade, and commerce. Public meetings were held, lectures were delivered, pamphlets were issued, a weekly newspaper was started. Thought produced feeling, and feeling led to action; after a stout and determined struggle the obnoxious and unjust Corn Laws passed away, fell off like a withered leaf before the swelling bud of a new life. The history of these struggles, so stoutly fought and so manfully won, are well fitted to encourage and cheer us in our longer and, in many respects, more difficult struggle against a greater wrong than either slavery or the Corn Laws. Victory awaits us, it beckons us on; that we have not won the day is just this—we have not reached the point where victory stands, but we are journeying thither and reach that point we shall. The General Election of April, 1880, has, both directly and indirectly, given us an immense lift thitherwards. There is not a doubt about it. The long-continued depression of trade is speaking loudly to us, had we ears to hear. Overproduction, as an explanation of continued depression in trade, is a lame, limping, hollow thing which, alongside of the thousands of ill-fed and ill-clad to be met with in our cities, towns, villages, and rural districts, will not hold water. There are plenty of backs to cover, bellies to fill, and houses to furnish; and sufficient funds to purchase were it not for the plundering, thieving fingers of the intoxicating drink traffic. Waterlogged with this vile business, how can the vessel of the State get gallantly along? Every dram-shop is a factory for the manufacture of paupers and criminals. Intoxicating drink intoxicates. This is the secret of the mischief. It matters not when, where, nor by whom sold, intoxicating drink intoxicates; and intoxication means poisoning. Toxicum, the Latin root from which intoxication comes, means poison the world over. Partial intoxication means partial poisoning; and what wise man or woman would willingly choose to be, or would allow his or her children to be even partially poisoned? Despite greed of pelf, and gratification of appetite, we must get rid of this intoxicating drink curse.

"STATE PROTECTION, AND HIGH DUTIES ON LIQUOR."

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I am quite willing to leave my letter, and "Robin Goodfellow's" criticism to speak for themselves as fair representations of the two remedies proposed. My sole desire is that they should be thoroughly weighed and canvassed. There are only the two courses open to us—Total Suppression or Free Trade, with stringent legislation against intoxication. My objection to the Permissive Bill is that it does not go far enough. It removes one public house to benefit another. Whatever may be said of individual parishes having no public house (their sobriety has not been proved out of their favoured localities, or in their homes, and among their children), the sad fact remains that the excise revenue from drink is always increasing, especially with good trade and wages. This points to towns and not to country parishes. How will the proposed measures limit drinking in these? The distance from one ward without publicans to the other where they are permitted cannot be great, and the vultures will gather to the carrion. Make the measure not Permissive but universally Prohibitive, and I withdraw my objections.

Still, I ask, is this complimentary to our religion, our civilization, and the age in which we live? It is humiliating in the extreme. "Free Trade" should not scare us—though drink should run in the gutter, and the swine should swill it. We abhor it with all its effects and belongings; and greater intoxication would only confirm our detestation. I quote Robin Goodfellow's own letter against himself in the words of the publicans' solicitor who repudiates "Free Trade" in their name. "To throw open the trade would be to throw open the floodgates of vice and drunkenness. No publican, no assembly, &c., have asked that the trade be thrown open." Of course not! Their monopoly and their adventitious respectability would be destroyed and gone.

"Free Trade," or Free Licensing have not been tried in conjunction with the stern legislation against drinking with which it must be accompanied. It is unfair to omit all reference to the latter as is generally done, and as "Robin Goodfellow" does also. He leaves Hamlet out of the play. Six months' State labour on the complaint of a wife or child or neighbour will work miracles of reformation. It does so in Australia—within my knowledge. It would also form strong public opinion against the traffic and the indulgence it fosters and lives by. At present, Church and State smile on the traffic, and they both deal gingerly with the poor victims.

With strong faith in our religion, and the sterling sense of our people, let the floodgates be opened—despite the objections of the publicans—those guardians of the public morals—save the mark!—as the surest way to get a measure to stem the sweeping torrents, and wholly forbid the manufacture of alcohol.

I conclude, with reference to the State-connection, in the words of the Emperor Tan Kiang to Sir Henry Pottinger, in 1842, regarding the opium forced into his country:—"Gain-seeking and corrupt men will for profit, and sensuality, defeat my wishes; but nothing will induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people." Though his son and successor is said to have fallen a victim to this terrible drug, the Emperor's position was a noble one compared to that of our State, and its gain (degrading loss?) from the State-control and patronage of drink.

"Free Trade" and Prohibition may both be impracticable. It comes therefore to this, that the only true remedy for drunkenness is not to touch drink—to fortify within. This is a fortress against which neither floodgates nor hostile forces can prevail.

With unbroken ranks we must use all means speedily to deliver our country from the ruin impending through our present criminal indulgence in intoxicants.—I am, &c.

JA. S. MACKENZIE.

Manse of Little Dunkeld.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

SIR,—I appreciate your kindness in affording me an opportunity of replying to the Rev. Mr. M'Kenzie. I am as willing to leave my review of his letter and this rejoinder to his second letter to your readers as he can be. He says there are two courses open to us:—Total suppression or free trade, with stringent legislation against intoxication. I maintain that rightly there is only one—Total suppression. His objection that the Permissive Bill does not go far enough will not stand in the face of the 10th section of that Bill:—From and after the time limited for the commencement of this Act in any burgh or parish, no license whatever shall be granted or renewed for the sale of alcoholic liquors within such burgh or parish; and any person selling or disposing of any alcoholic liquor within such burgh or parish shall be dealt with as selling without license, and shall be subject to all the penalties provided for such offence under any Act or Acts of Parliament regulating the sale of alcoholic liquors which may be in force at the time of the adoption of this Act." I leave it to the rev. gentleman to reconcile his statement that the Permissive Bill removes one public house to benefit another with that quotation. The Bill, when law, will be unsparing in its action on every public house, and on every shebeen, and on every vendor of these detestable liquors. If Mr. M'Kenzie still doubts my interpretation of the intention of the Bill, I beg to refer him to the opinion of the liquor traffickers. They evidently labour under no uncertainty in the matter, and I believe unless the energetic temperance reformers of Scotland, like myself, had been convinced the Bill was rigidly suppressive, they would not have so much as lifted a little finger in its behalf. The measure is not intended for wards in towns, but as the text bears will include the burgh, the parish, or the district which adopts it in its enforcement. Make the measure universally prohibitive, he says, and I withdraw my objection. I answer that the adoption of the Permissive Act in any district will be equal to the area of an imperial Act in the same locality, with this advantage, that the adoption of the Permissive Act, being the Act of the people themselves, will be more faithfully enforced, hence the Permissive Bill when passed into law would have the advantage of an imperial law. The reason we seek a Permissive as contrasted with an imperial Act is to back the public opinion of any district against the continuance of the liquor traffic therein by the requisite Executive power. It does seem hard that such a district, anxious to be relieved from the temptation and evil results of the liquor traffic, should have to wait till there was a universally prohibitive sentiment in the country. The rev. gentleman may not know that Greenock has been canvassed on this question, when the result was overwhelmingly in favour of a local prohibitory Act, that it has every conceivable machinery in aid of temperance in operation, and that its parliamentary representatives have voted on every division on the Permissive Bill or local option resolution which has taken place: now Greenock surely makes out a good case for getting special powers to put away her licensed drunkeries: under a Permissive Act she could immediately take a vote for or against her public house system and act accordingly, but if she had to wait till all Scotland was in the same advanced position as herself, she might have still to mourn for years over thousands of her citizens, yearly slain by drink. We adhere to our demand that the ratepayers have the sole power to decide the continuance or the suppression of the liquor traffic that affects them.

He says free trade should not scare us; well, he does his best to make it too frightful a responsibility to incur. Bad as matters are among us, I for one do so unfeignedly believe that they would be so much worse under free trade that I would resist any relaxation of the law. To bring back the disgusting accompaniments of the traffic, so visible a little more than a century ago, in order to cure drunkenness would be as wicked as it would be vain. The drinker, whether alone or part of a multitude, goes steadily from bad to worse, for satiety never comes to put a stop to the downward course. I adhere to the scope and import of the publicans' testimony that to open the traffic would be to open the flood-gates of vice and drunkenness, and I should never be the one that would make the dread venture to enter upon such a cruel policy that good may come, even were I sure that the reaction would be suppression.

He tells us that free trade or free licensing has not been tried in conjunction with the stern legislation against drinking, with which it must be accompanied. Well, I have given him evidence enough of the free trade, and I request him to afford me information where in Australia free trade with stern legislation operates better than prohibition does in the districts where it is enforced. He has to show that his scheme would render my proposal unnecessary, and show that his plan would dwarf mine by the superior sobriety it would create and sustain. Till he does so, I beg leave to doubt the success anywhere of free trade in drink with heavy penalties on the drink seller,

He says, with a strong faith in our religion, let the flood-gates be opened as the surest way to get a measure to stem the sweeping torrents, and wholly forbid the manufacture. Why not show our faith in our religion by dispensing with law and the policeman altogether as the best means of bringing about a state of society where evil should not be found at all. Abrogate our laws and trust to our religion only, and soon we should find ourselves in the bosom of Old Chaos. The rev. gentleman has stepped beyond the words of truth and soberness in penning this paragraph. I heartily agree with him in his laudations at the wisdom of Tan Kiang, yet cannot allow it to apply to prohibition. Prohibition locally or imperially applied would certainly not conserve the drink revenue, but by abolishing the traffic for ever abolish the revenue from it. Mr. M'Kenzie is replying here to some other one than me.

Curiously enough he shows so little faith in his scheme that he entirely abandons it for pure total abstinence. He declares that free trade and prohibition may be both impracticable. This is treating free trade and prohibition as mere theories. We are unable to agree with him. Free trade has been tried and has so ignominiously failed, that there is not a civilized nation but has abandoned it. Prohibition—State or Imperial and local—has been tried by Supreme Government, ratepayers, and landlords, and a more glorious record of the beneficent results of law as a social leverage for the elevation of humankind nowhere can be pointed out. It is not a theory, it is a great social fact and a great social force. Shall we therefore give it up and persuade men to give up drink while allowing drink-selling to continue? We would be the greatest enemies of total abstinence were we to do so. We hold total abstinence to be the remedy for intemperance, but we cannot secure the successful application of the remedy, simply because of the constant legal supply of liquor producing the disease against which that remedy is directed. To make total abstinence possible, we want the power to apply prohibition. Hence the earnest striving on the part of temperance men to secure for themselves, their heirs and successors for ever, a Permissive Prohibitory Act suppressing every public-house wherever its powers are adopted. During my short life I have encountered thousands who, steeped in intemperance and its concomitant evils, yet in their lucid moments hied to the temperance hall and took the pledge; their knowledge of its benefits was clear and unshakeable, and they never doubted its efficacy did it only get fair play. Prohibition would make it possible to them and all who like them are the victims of a craving created and fostered by the liquor traffic.

Unless Mr. M'Kenzie can show cases in which free trade, with heavy penalties on the drink-seller, is superior to prohibition, we trust that he will throw in his lot with us and work for abstinence for the individual, and for prohibition as the duty of the State.—Yours truly,
ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

THE NATION'S DRINK BILL FOR 1880.

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR,—During the last few weeks the mind of the nation has been so engrossed by the Irish question at home, and by wars and tumults abroad, that there has been little chance of obtaining a hearing for other questions, however important. During the last few days there has been somewhat of a lull in the storm, and I venture to take advantage of it to call attention to a subject which is of great interest to a large and growing section of the community. I refer to the expenditure upon intoxicating liquors. The publication of the Excise returns in the early part of the present month enables us to arrive at this expenditure for the year 1880.

Owing to the abolition of the malt tax, and the substitution in lieu thereof of a tax upon beer, the data from which the amount of intoxicating liquors consumed during 1880 is derived is more varied than usual. During the first nine months of the year the amount of beer consumed is derived from the returns of malt and sugar used for brewing; whilst for the last three months—that is, from October 1st to December 31st—it is taken from a return which gives the number of barrels of beer upon which duty was paid.

The quantity of malt used in brewing during the nine months ending September 30, 1880, was 31,787,518 bushels, and of sugar 1,019,466 cwts, which was equal to 4,349,721 bushels of malt; adding the two together, we get a total of 36,137,239 bushels; and taking the Excise standard of two bushels of malt as brewing one barrel of beer, it gives a total of 650,470,302 gallons of beer as brewed from January 1st to September 30th. On the 1st of October the malt duty was abolished, and in place thereof a tax was put upon beer. The returns for the last three months of the year are given in beer, and they show that during that period there were 7,072,741 barrels, or 254,618,676 gallons of beer consumed, or a total for the year of 905,088,978 gallons. The returns for spirits and wine are issued in the same form as formerly.

The following table gives particulars of the quantities used, together with the money expended thereon. To enable a comparison to be made, I append the expenditure for 1879:—

	1880.	1879.
Beer consumed. . . . .	905,088,978 galls. at 1/6	£67,881,673	£73,567,660
British Spirits do. . . . .	28,457,480 „ at 20/0	28,457,480	27,936,650
Foreign Spirits do. . . . .	8,477,512 „ at 24/0	10,173,014	11,449,021
Wine. . . . .	15,852,335 „ at 18/0	14,267,102	13,450,583
Brit. Wines, &c. (est.)	15,000,000 „ at 2/0	1,500,000	1,750,000
		£122,279,275	£128,143,863

Showing a decrease in consumption as compared with 1879 of £5,864,588, or 4·6 per cent.

Twenty years ago, in 1860, the drink bill was £86,897,683. Year by year, with two or three trifling exceptions, it continued to grow, until in 1876 it reached the enormous total of £147,288,760. In 1877 it fell to £142,000,231. In 1878 it rose a little, being £142,188,900; since 1878 it has fallen as the table I have given shows.

If the figures relating to the consumption of beer for the last three months of the year be compared with those for the previous nine months, it will be seen that there is a considerable increase shown. Those, however, who followed the Budget debates during July of last year will see reason to ascribe this increase not wholly to an increased consumption, but partly to the fact that the new method of collecting the duty from beer instead of from the malt, registers more correctly the actual consumption, and that in former years the beer which was brewed and sold was considerably more than the returns of malt indicated.

I have said that prior to October 1st of last year, the tax which is now upon beer was charged upon malt. At that time a drawback was allowed upon all beer which was exported, which drawback was calculated to be equal in amount to the tax paid upon the malt. The amount of drawback allowed was reckoned according to the specific gravity of the beer; and the principle upon which it was taken was, that beer brewed on the basis of two bushels to the barrel would give a liquor of the specific gravity of 55 deg. Upon this basis during the 18 years ending 1879, Mr. Gladstone stated that the brewers had been paid drawback upon exported beer to the amount of £3,125,000.

In reply to a question put to him by Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Gladstone said that the estimated quantity of malt which has been used in beer exported has been 23,027,000 bushels, and the drawback paid upon it had been £3,125,000. Had the standard, instead of being 55 degrees been 60 degrees, as Mr. Watney proposed, the estimated quantity of malt used in beer exported would have been 21,117,000 bushels, and the drawback upon it would have been £2,865,500, or less by about £260,000 than the sum which had been paid to the brewers. Or to put it in other words, the brewers paid £2,865,000 of tax upon malt, and got back in drawback upon beer exported £3,125,000, and thus they pocketed the handsome sum of £260,000 during the years named.

I refer to these facts because, although there can be no doubt that with the improved trade towards the end of last year, the returns showed an increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquors, especially of beer, yet the beer increase was not wholly due to larger consumption, but partly to the more accurate measuring of the manufacture secured by Mr. Gladstone's transfer of the tax from malt to beer; still there is enough to cause the fear that if trade and commerce should fully revive there would be some considerable increase in the intemperance of the nation, unless there be some change in the law so as to reduce the temptations to intemperance which so widely prevail.

(To the Editor of the "Social Reformer.")

Orillia, March 1, 1881.

SIR,—You perhaps remember that last year Mr. Boulton (who in the Canadian Parliament occupies a similar position, as champion of the trade, to that of Mr. Wheelhouse in the late Imperial House) succeeded in carrying through the House of Commons an amendment to the Scott Act, requiring a majority of all registered voters in any constituency to adopt it. This amendment the Senate refused to ratify. This time Mr. Boulton has failed to get it read a second time in the Lower House, the majority against him being 28. On the 28th of February, a motion, introduced by Mr. Longley, directing the Speaker to issue an order prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the precincts of the House, was defeated by an amendment directing that the "bar" within the House be closed. The majority for the amendment was 10. It is significant that the motion was not voted down directly. Mr. Boulton took the motion as a personal insult, but this did not seem to trouble the House. Sir Leonard Tilly voted in the minority. Sir Charles Tupper was ill.—Faithfully yours,

W. H. HALE.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

HOW TO ENJOY HOLIDAYS.

THE first thing about holidays is for those that desire them to emulate the immortal Mrs. Glass, whose recipe for hare soup began with, "first catch your hare," and first secure their holiday. The pleasure of that good time greatly depends on whether it is secured for May, June, July, or August. We have always looked on May for holidays as women look upon it for weddings—with aversion. Nature is not at her best. The fields have not quitted their russet appearance, the leaves but barely clothe the trees, the wind as it sails by makes one feel as if it had not yet parted from its winter's chill. The nights are lengthening, but they are not genial: one is often in doubt whether it is only late spring or if we have already reached early autumn. Altogether May is not the month for the only holidays all the year that the pleasure-seeker can command. Our affections centre on leafy, lovely June, when the fields are green with braird studded with butter-cups and daisies, the field-pea and meadow sweet; the hedge-rows radiant with wild-flowers, and the forest in loveliest verdure clad. The warblers of the grove make it vocal with their song, the haymakers fill the scene with animation, the shepherd shears his fleecy charge, the sun is not too hot, and the day is not too warm. In July and August the temperature exhausts and enervates, so, all things considered, we greatly prefer the merry month of June.

The question of the season for a holiday being decisively settled in favour of June, the question where shall we go, may be expected next to arise. Nay, the question is, are we in training for our holiday? To merely rise from our labours and to rush into the midst of holiday enjoyment is impossible to the most of people, we incline to think of all. Then the kind of holiday of which the pleasure-seeker is capable should earnestly engage his attention. Shall it be placid, soothing, resting? Shall it be active, somewhat boisterous? If he has been toiling and moiling with his mental and muscular faculties on the strain, and hardly able to bear up against fatigue, the country with its fresh air and its peaceful rest is the place for him. There he will find in its remote solitude and not laborious pleasure, rest for nerve and muscle, brain and hand. Plodding along its shady lanes and sunny highways, he will find nature in all her bloom. Her flora and fauna will yield him specimens enough to tax all his powers of arrangement when winter rules again. If he is an angler, its lochs and streams invite his piscatorial efforts. There beneath the umbrageous shade of some wide-spreading denizen of the wood, let time flit unheeded by. How much of restful pleasure can he imbibe who roams by glassy river's side, alternate gazing at the beauties around him, the glories of the sky above him, and the reflected grandeur of nature in the waters beneath him? Then there is the companionship of a book, materials for sketching, or botanical or geological investigation. In such quietude how pleasant passes the time, so pleasant that one no longer wonders at the joys of the golden age. Health returns to the jaded frame, colour to the faded cheek, nerve power to the brain, and vigour to the hand, and the whole tone of the holiday-seeker is raised to the high level of a happy because recreated existence.

If, on the other hand, the strain has been on the mind, while the body has been cribbed, cabined, and confined, while constant mental activity has worn the mind, and want of exercise has lowered the system, the pleasure-seeker feels that an active holiday is the truest medicine for him. But if he has not attempted to train for such a vigorous holiday, he is quite unfit for such a season of relaxation. To go on an active furlough without previous and appropriate drill, is to invite evil consequences instead of beneficial results, just as if a regiment lying in one of our home depots in masterly inactivity was, without preliminary drill, to go on active service. Its first brush with the foe in such a limp condition would simply be courting disaster. Precisely similar would be the experience of the pleasure-seeker if he left his quiescence and rushed into a condition of volcanic energy. His duty is the use of the dumb-bells, the skipping-rope, or a run of a mile or two on foot after hours, or if he has tried to maintain a healthy state by these means at all times, he has only to increase his muscular exercises a slight degree to be in the best form for the holiday he longs for. It is by the overlooking these preliminaries that so many of our tired-out toilers in the professions fail so often to recuperate through their holiday relaxations.

The question where shall he go is the next to face him. But he must consult his own tastes: he will, however, undoubtedly err if he, as the saying is, goes off at a tangent. He may go off as fancy points, and in following her cover a large space of ground, but he will live to regret it. His holiday has been merely fragmentary, for he has simply exercised his legs and deferred to that will-of-the-wisp his fancy; while all, head, heart, body, cried aloud for recreation, and cried out in vain, hence failure deep and unmistakeable will be the result.

Let our holiday-seeker carefully lay down a route. This is indispensable. He has a great variety of choice. Let us say that he chooses the route from Perth to Braemar, by way of the Spittal of Glenshee. Well, in that grand pedestrian route he will find inexhaustible pleasure. The beautiful and the sublime will arrest his eye and fill his memory with unfading images, the mere recalling of which will be in itself a culture. The varied aspects of nature will add to the joy of his tour, and he will be able to more fully appreciate the grandeur and loveliness of the Deeside Highlands. Or let him take the journey from Stirling to Balloch by Callander and the Trossachs. Leaving Snowdown's height behind him, passing Kildeanford on his left, and Abbey Craig, Sheriffmuir, Bridge-of-Allan, and Dunblane on his right hand, he soon arrives at Doune with its famous though ruined castle. Going ahead he soon reaches Callander, where, after resting, he continues his journey to the far-famed, justly famed Trossachs. On his right is the pass of Lenny and Ben Ledi, on his left the water of the Teith, Coilantogleford, the waters of Vennachar and Auchry and all the beautiful scenery immortalized by Scott. Marching through the Trossachs, one vast mass of foliage, the traveller arrives at the landing stage of the Loch Katrine steamers. Proceeding on board, he sails around Ellen's Isle, glides by the Silver Strand on his right, and Benvenue and the Glasgow Aqueduct on his left; and is soon moored at Stronachlachar. Here he may proceed up the glen or across to Inversnaid. Supposing that he rests, he may next morning resume his journey to Arrochar or Tarbet by Ardlui. In the one case he may traverse Loch Lomond side until he reaches Balloch, whence a train will take him to Stirling, or he may go down Loch Long by steamer to the Clyde. Or leaving Callander he may train it to Lochearnhead, then wend along Lochearn to St. Fillans, Comrie, Creiff, and Perth. Taking the train to Aberfeldy, he walks through Kenmore on to Killin, and on by Dalmally to Oban. He may prefer a pilgrimage to a tour, and he does right in making such a preference. Let us suppose that he arranges to make a pilgrimage to the land of Scott or that of Robert Burns. Suppose the latter; what pleasures await him! How delightful to saunter to Ayr, Mount Oliphant, Tarbolton, Kirkoswald, Irvine, Mossgiel, Mauchline, Ellisland, and Dumfries, "the queen of the south." What a procession of women will flit across his vision. The bonnie sweet sonesie lassie, Nelly Kirkpatrick, that first wakened the love of Burns, Ellison Begbie, Jean Armour, the Bonnie Lass of Ballochmyle, Poesie Nansie, Mary Campbell, Mrs. Riddell, and Mrs. Dunlop: of men, the sainted father, his teacher Murdoch, Gavin Hamilton, Robert Aitken, Holy Willie, Tam Samson, Graham of Fintry, Davie Lapraik, Capt. Matthew Henderson, Tam o' Shanter, and Capt. Grose; there then are the glorious groups—The Jolly Beggars, The Cottars' Saturday Night, The Holy Fair, Death and Dr. Hornbook, The Two Dogs, and Twa Brigs. To saunter on and trace the footprints of Burns' genius is the highest of pleasures: to weep where he swerved, to laugh where he castigated the vices and follies of his time, and to applaud where his moral insight of nature and mankind was keenest and brightest, is to luxuriate in hero worship. Holidays so spent will leave a lasting impression on the heart and mind for good, and will in the course of years afford an amount of joy which in no other way can be obtained.

It will deepen the joy of anticipation if the holiday-seeker then will make out a tour scheme: if he sketches a map of where he intends to go: if he strictly times himself to daily progress. This pre-attention will avert the disappointment of unfulfilled arrangements, and will contribute undoubtedly to success. Allowance for rainy days and peaceful Sabbaths should be made: and also time, if a journal is kept, to keep it abreast of his wanderings. The holiday so spent will be rich in material for storing the mind and heart, rich in culture, and rich in the more truthful and sounder views which he will entertain regarding the Ayrshire Bard.

One word of advice: let him enter upon no elaborate personal preparations—no wrist-bands or other similar impediments. A stout stick, double-soled shoes, dress for ordinary wear, two shirts, a night and day one; and a pair of socks is sufficient for his kit. Burns' works, note-book, stylograph pen, a few post cards to keep up communications with home; a few visiting cards with full address, and by which, in case of disaster, he may be identified; a piece of stout cord, and a woodcock's feather to dust his shoes ere he passes through the towns and hamlets that lie in the line of his pilgrimage; a few needles, thread, and buttons, and a stout knife which can cut bread or anything, are all most essential to comfort. Daily washing all over, or if that is not possible, washing the feet is indispensable. On putting on socks he should rub them on the inner side with a little soap, and blisters will never appear. Let his food be of the simplest, not forgetting good well-boiled porridge in the morning, which gives vigour to walk for miles; some bread and fruit will suffice for lunch, and a moderate meal at the close of the day will answer all the rightful demands of appetite. Let water be his only drink, and let him avoid alcohol, because it is poison. Temperance in walking, eating, drinking is the very backbone of his pilgrimage—the man who can wander in the footsteps of Burns and be intemperate is insensible to the claims of true manhood. If he lives through his holidays as travellers in other lands are forced to do—as near nature as he can—he will shed her choicest blessings on his expedition.

Such, we believe, is the way to truly enjoy a holiday. One may sometimes lie down tired and footsore from the wanderings of the day, but if he keeps in the spirit of the advice offered to him he will soon come to learn that he is taking the best means to make himself healthy, wise, and happy.

I need not allude to holidays with sweethearts or wives and families. Such a kind of trip is outwith the scope of this paper. If the guidwife, however, is sweet, sensible, and loving, she will make the holidays overflow with pleasure; if she is not, she will be as insensible to my advice as she will have proved insensible to her husband's claim upon her affection and devotion.

PUBLIC PRESS.

THE "TIMES" ON MR. HOYLE'S LETTER.

Godly discipline is not so wholly forgotten in this country but that once a year, in the season of Lent, the British nation is put to open penance for the most notorious of its many sins. This wholesome ceremony is the casting up and publication of the national drink bill. That for the year 1880 is out, and will be found in a letter from our old correspondent Mr. William Hoyle, which we commend to our readers. The total expenditure under all heads of strong drink for the whole population is £122,279,272, which is less by £5,864,588, or 4·6 per cent., than it was in the previous year, 1879. It would be pleasant to believe that this difference is wholly or mainly owing to improved habits and increased command over appetite. That would be something to say for our elementary public schools, for various recent outbursts of religious zeal, and specially for the meritorious work of the Temperance Association. But the tongue or the pen that would gladly score this success finds itself restrained by a sad misgiving that the ups and downs of our drinking expenditure simply represent the ups and downs of prosperity, employment, and wages. To go back twenty years, in 1860 the drink bill was £86,897,683. After sixteen years, that is in the year 1876, when the general prosperity was such as to establish a rise in wages varying from 10 to 30 per cent., the drink bill reached the enormous figure of £147,288,760, indicating that on the average everybody was drinking considerably more than half as much again as he had been content with in 1860. The climax thus suddenly reached did not sustain itself. The next year showed a drop of more than five millions, the next year a short rest in the descent, and the year 1878 another sudden drop. But we have only to recall the story of our agriculture, our manufactures and trade, and of our Irish difficulties during the last four years to know too well the true account of these figures. All classes have been poor, tenants, labourers, landlords, tradesmen, employers, artisans, and, not least, those supposed to be in the receipt of professional or independent incomes. All have had to stint themselves somewhat in their favourite stimulus or beverage. It has been a prudential, if not enforced, abstinence. One may justly tremble to think of the possible rebound in the event of returning prosperity. We have known people watch the hungry, cadaverous face of the dipsomaniac, restrained by strong oath, or stronger penury, from the satisfaction of his raging and still aggravated thirst. They have watched him to the point when they could say it was only a question of opportunity, and when the relapse would be worse than ever, probably irrecoverable. Suppose an unexpected visitation of unexampled prosperity. How high would the total stand in the last year of the century? If there be any probability one way or the other, it is that the year 1900 will be as much above 1880 as that is above 1860, and that the drink bill will then be £246,000,000.

Mr Hoyle compares the Irish share of this expenditure with that rent which is the grievance of Ireland, and which the world believes to be intolerably oppressive. The rental of agricultural land there he computes at £11,518,392, but as Ireland, in the average of ten years ending 1879, spent £13,823,102 annually in intoxicating liquors, it follows she spent £2,304,710 more in drink than in rent. . . . Many other comparisons might be made equally edifying, or equally mortifying, common to both islands, for Ireland does not spend more than her share in drink; nay, she spends considerably less than her share, and, by comparison with the English and the Scotch, the Irish may be called a remarkably temperate people. For the whole population of these isles the average expenditure in drink is more than £3 a head for every man, woman, and child, and more than £15 for each family. It is vastly more than the public revenue; vastly more than the most inflated and extraordinary expenditure we have had for twenty years. It is more than ten times as much as is spent in relief of the poor, watched by economists with such jealous eyes. . . . Parliament would like to provide parks—that is, fresh air—to the metropolis, but has to plead poverty. How much would even 1 per cent. of the drink bill—that is, half a week's drinking—do in this direction! But there are comparisons that come more home to us. The working man grudges a few pence for the education of his children, and spends often as many shillings in drink. He will not lay by as much as a shilling a week to provide for probable sickness and inevitable old age, but he spends, perhaps, ten times that sum in beer and spirits. But he is not the greatest sinner; far from it. His betters, lay, spiritual, professional, or trading, are generally far worse than he is. The gentleman in the pulpit who delivers weekly diatribes against drunkenness and improvidence, and who counts up a new charge against the poor ploughman every time he sees him a little overcome or at the public-house, often spends ten times as much, though he really wants it less. It is a very ordinary thing for the wine and beer bills to amount to £50 out of a total expenditure of £500. How much can be done with £50 a year, and how often does a clergyman or his family come to want it most grievously! It will make all the difference between a good and a bad village school. It will maintain six or eight orphans on the economical rural scale. It will keep in repair, warm, and light almost any village church. It will pay the costs of a village room, properly warmed, lighted, and tended. It will keep two promising boys or girls at good middle schools. It will buy a very good library in a few years, and so people the literary desolation which is the worst feature of most parsonages. Last of all, how often will the saving of such a sum prevent the pitiable scandal of a public subscription to find, no longer wine or other delicacy, but bread and decent clothing for the clergyman's family cast on the outer world. . . . With regard to the main question, the national drink bill, and the prevalence of excessive and extravagant drinking, unnecessary if not worse, every Englishman must feel sore and anxious about it. Drinking baffles us, confounds us, shames us, and mocks us at every point. It outwits alike the teacher, the man of business, the patriot, and the legislator. Every other institution flounders in hopeless difficulties; the public-house holds its triumphant course. The administrators of public and private charity are told that alms and obligations go with rates, doles, and pensions to the all-absorbing bar of the public-house. But the worst remains. Not a year passes in either town or village without some unexpected and hideous scandal, the outcome of habitual indulgence, often small and innocent in its origin. Some poor creature, long and deservedly high in the respect, perhaps reverence of the neighbourhood, makes a sudden shipwreck of character. Under the accumulating influence of alcohol, aggravated, perhaps, by other still more powerful, still more treacherous agencies, the honest man turns knave, the respectable man suddenly loses principle and self-respect, the wise man is utterly foolish, the rigidly moral man forgets his mask and his code and takes a plunge into libertinism. It then turns out, what possibly some have suspected, that drink is at the bottom of it, and that some poor wife or other friend has long been doing the best that could be done to check, to cure, and at all events to hide, till the truth would be out. Of course, on such occasions rivals and competitors in the race of life are not to be denied their paltry triumph. It would be much more to the purpose to take the warning, and do something towards staying the huge mischief which, in one way or another, confounds us all, and may, for we cannot be sure, crush and ruin any one of us. —

RECREATION.—It is the want of better mental culture and better opportunity of rational amusement which often leaves a worker to provide a sensation for a holiday in drink. Nature craves a change, and a man without other resources has only to turn up his little finger often enough in his own room or in the public-house, in order presently to find himself provided with fresh influences however disastrous. This is sometimes especially the case where he has been long engaged on monotonous work in perhaps the constant repetition of some process which requires intelligence and skill. His brain thus becomes wearied as well as his hand, and the thirst for change is thus sometimes so fierce and suddenly importunate that it takes the shape of thirst for stimulating drink. It is no doubt very true that drunkenness produces in many an emptiness of mind, lets the man down to a lower level of life, in which he ceases to take interest in objects or pursuits worthy of man, and thus becomes degraded. But we must recollect that the real degradation, the lower state which is associated with an aimless existence or contracted range of pursuits, is in itself a serious promoter of excess in drink. Thus a great hope of extended and liberal education lies not only in the provision of more skill to work, but in the pursuit of intelligent recreation when the work is done.—Rev. Harry Jones, A.M., in Good Words.

THE FUNDS.

\* Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 30 Hope Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.*

\** Several excellent papers and reviews are in hand, and several literary notices have been crushed out. A notice of the Spring Licensing Courts is held over, as these had not all risen when we had to go to press.

Those friends who have kindly sent in newspapers containing matters of interest to the movement are heartily thanked, and similar favours are requested from friends in all parts of the country. Cutting the paper at the place to which our attention is desired will enhance the value of these highly-appreciated gifts.

On many occasions our readers have had submitted to them ample details of the Canada Permissive Bill—the Scott Act, 1878. Numerous have been the attempts on the parts of the traffic to get it injured. They tried to make it out an unconstitutional measure and ignominiously failed. They have been at it again: this time to load the electorate so that it will not work well. They want it declared that instead of a majority of these voting there shall be a majority of all registered as voters before it can be adopted in any district! This undisguised attempt to vitiate the Act was defeated by 82 to 54 votes. Another attempt to exempt from its provisions almost the whole class of fermented liquors was also carried, but in the House of Commons it could not be discussed, and now at the end of another session the Act remains intact. Every year will tend to the stability of this famous measure, every year its blessings will be more evident; its educative influence will deepen and widen in the near future, till it will be as easy for the liquor traffic to upset the constitution as to overturn the Scott Act in the old Dominion.

On one of the last days of the last year a Maori Tuhi suffered the last penalty of the law, for the murder of Miss Dobie, Opunake, New Zealand. The unfortunate wretch addressed a letter to His Excellency in the following terms:—"I have heard that I am to be put to death on Wednesday, and I am willing to die on that day; but I have a word to say to you. As I am to die, let spirits die also. Don't leave anything of its kind in the world. Let it be destroyed from the face of this earth, lest it should remain to cause trouble to men. Man would then be answerable for his own troubles. If it was destroyed all would be well. Man would then seek his own troubles. Then it would be well, for there would be no cause for trouble. That is all from Tuhi." To think of this poor drunken savage so clearly and profoundly fathoming the relation of drink to crime—so clearly pointing out the remedy! It is not too much to think, that if some who talk about drink so glibly, were face to face with death, as was the wretched Tuhi, they would give a better deliverance on the question. They would find that death has the faculty of making more than savages speak up, speak out, and speak square.

That tried friend of prohibition, ex-Governor Dingley, shows up the unscrupulous tactics of the drink sellers. They have often said that crime would increase under prohibition, and we believed them. The effect of a prohibitory law was to harmonize the human statute with the divine law against putting one's bottle to his neighbour's lips. Those who had an interest in still doing so, and a courage to brave the law in doing so, could not but expect to incur its penalties and go to prison. But every law properly enforced increases crime in the same sense. Are we, therefore, to be deterred from passing and maintaining laws because their penalties mean the branding of some violaters as criminals? nay, ex-Governor Dingley conclusively shows that in thirteen years, 1867 to 1880, there have been no less than 602 shebeeners in the State prisons and local gaols of the State of Maine. Surely the fact that these criminals have been punished is not to be deplored or made an occasion to work out a repeal of the law? Mr. Dingley shows that in Massachusetts, a license State, there are three times as many prisoners as in prohibitory Maine. Nay more, that Maine has a less proportion of crime than any other State of the Union. Give the truth fair currency and we'll back it against the world.

One day last month we came upon the following testimonial in a family grocer's window:—"I have carefully analyzed and examined a sample of whisky from the stock of — —, Glasgow, and I find that it is free from adulteration and of excellent quality. It is one of the best malt whiskies I have ever examined, and it has been well aged. (Signed) R. R. Tatlock, consulting and analytical chemist, City Analyst's Office, 138 Bath Street, Glasgow." The italics are our analyst's. Now, what does Mr. Tatlock mean? Not that it is good, but that it is not adulterated, and that it is of excellent quality as a whisky, and free, we presume, from fusel oil. It is simply an excellent sample of the product of the fermentation and distillation of malted grain. This and nothing more. He does not dare say it is good for drinking, but he leaves the silly public who drink it to infer that it is an excellent beverage, when they ought to infer that it is a subtle poison. How lame and impotent is his testimonial when placed side by side with the certificate of character that King Solomon unsolicitedly, of course, gave the liquor:—"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its bubble in the cup, when it moveth itself strangely. At last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thy heart shall utter perverse things"! This is a character of strong drink, whether fermented only, like wine, or fermented and distilled, like whisky, penned under the guidance of unerring wisdom. It is penned to induce men to avoid the very sight of wine, and not to induce them, by dubious phraseology, to buy what is injurious to the body and the mind.

On the 5th ult., the Convention of Royal Burghs took place in Edinburgh, for the consideration of an amazing variety of subjects. The irrepressible liquor question was amongst the number. The Convention has a Standing Committee on Local Option, and its report was submitted to the meeting. It is worthy of preservation. It ran as follows:—1. That Town Councils should, in burghs, be the licensing authorities. 2. That power of appeal and the Confirmation Courts should be abolished. 3. That no applications for new licenses should be entertained, if the application is objected to by a majority of the ratepayers within a certain radius of the premises sought to be licensed. 4. That an annual payment, additional to the amount of license paid to Government, should be levied from the owners of the licensed property, and applied to the police and other assessments. 5. Public-houses should be closed earlier than at present. This report furnishes evidence of how deeply and strongly the current of temperance sentiment is setting in against the liquor traffic. Compared with the mode of administration pursued with regard to the licensing of the liquor traffic twenty years ago, the first three points in the report exhibit a vast improvement, and were we as hopeful on the amendment of that system as some temperance reformers, we would be disposed to congratulate the members of the Convention on their progress. Holding as we do by the right of the people to power enabling them to sweep away the traffic from their doors, we see in the Convention's report another evidence of the inability or indisposition of Boards or Committees or Conventions to deal with the liquor traffic in view of the permanent welfare of the people. The onus that might lie on people should not be in protesting against every license sought for premises beside them, but rather that no license whatever should be entertained unless an accredited petition in its favour from the people the license was likely to affect was be presented. With all the emphasis of language we brand No. 4 as an outrage upon communities, involving them, as it proposes, in the crime and degradation of liquor-selling. Ex-Bailie Lewis endeavoured to give a practical turn to the Convention by asking it to petition Her Majesty's Government to give effect to Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, adopted by the House of Commons on 18th June last. The discussion on this amendment, which was seconded by the Provost of Greenock, was in accord with its letter and spirit, but the vote was in favour of the report by 53 to 5. The Convention is pledged to a phantom, for neither Boards, whether composed of magistrates, or citizens only, or of Town Councils, will ever settle the drink difficulty. The people, and the people alone, will in the near future assume the responsibility of having or excluding public-houses in their respective localities, and we have no fear whatever but they will act in view of that sacred trust as other communities similarly empowered, have done, and sweep the liquor system for ever away.

Professor Ramsay, of the University of Glasgow, and Mrs. Ramsay, desirous of, as the lady herself finely said, of supplying the wants and brightening the lives of the people of Alyth, instituted a coffee-house there in March last. Viewing these coffee-houses as counteractives to the public-house, as a refuge to the men and youths with ill-kept or unkept houses, and to youths in uncongenial lodgings, we were prepared to rejoice over this addition to the philanthropic agencies of Alyth. But our joy received a check when we found the learned Professor taking advantage of his position and his circumstances to assail the temperance movement in unmeasured terms and with untruthful weapons. After stating that foreign people set up abundant facilities for eating and drinking, for those of them that went abroad, he went on to say—

"In Britain the idea had seemed to be that man was a drinking animal only—principally a spirit-drinking animal—(laughter and applause)—and that while he might want to drink, he could never want to eat his ordinary food except in his own house. As to the drinking of alcoholic liquors, he wished to say at once that he felt no kind of antagonism whatever to the wine and spirit trade. It was as legitimate a trade as any other in the country. It was founded upon natural wants and natural desires. If it was undoubtedly liable to abuse, he believed that no interest suffered more damage from its abuse than the trade itself. (Applause.) He regarded the total abstinence movement, when preached as a creed of duty, to be as extreme and unnatural as was the evil of excess. (Applause.) Temperance was not abstinence. It consisted in the reasonable and moderate use, within proper limits, of all the good things which God had given us. Indeed, he was not sure the total abstinence cry had not been got up by some insidious publican for the express benefit of the trade, as every unnatural extreme leads necessarily to reaction. (Laughter.) In illustration of this, he might quote what happened on the Clyde last summer, the steamers on which were not remarkable as a rule for the practice of abstinence principles. Last summer a 'temperance' steamer (the Ivanhoe) was started. The moment the ship landed anywhere every one rushed to the nearest public-house. At the end of the summer all the publicans on the banks of the Clyde petitioned that the 'temperance' steamer might be continued. (Laughter and applause.) He hoped, then, no one connected with hotels or public-houses would feel any jealousy of the coffee-house.

Now while the Professor compares the manners of nations he should never while doing so make his comparisons unnecessarily odious. It has been the proud boast of the Briton that he more than almost any nationality realized that there was no place like home. With Continental nations the reverse is the case; the Frenchman and German dine, and tea, and drink oftener away from home than in it. The wisest of those engaged in this coffee palace movement would deplore their efforts if they rendered a good home less attractive than before to any of their customers. And with all our sympathy for the coffee palaces throughout the land, we would infinitely prefer a movement that by making our bad homes comfortable would render outward attractions to the working man unnecessary. As it is the working man with a bad home goes out in sheer desperation to find a refuge. The 'public' hitherto was the only alternative that offered, and having of course to spend something for the good of the house, too often contracted the vice of intemperance and became lost to himself and society. We hold in the presence of the liquor traffic that the coffee palace is instituted as a counteractive, as an enemy to public houses, and that if it is not this it is not either a philanthropic or a temperance agency. If it does not educate men into the conviction that the public house can be done without, and stimulate the working man to get rid of public houses, then it is a mockery, delusion, and a snare—a mere philanthropic sham. We deny in toto that the liquor traffic is as legitimate a trade as any other in the country: and that it is founded on natural wants and desires. The custom of the people and the legislation of the government cannot legitimize this traffic any more than slave dealing and slave-holding protected by law rendered the slave traffic legitimate, or than a long course of injustice enabled masters to declare that they were right in over-working their hands. The liquor traffic would be legitimate were it to promote the welfare of its customers as is the case with other trades whose legitimacy is never questioned, but when the dealer in drink flourishes in proportion as his customers are blighted it is a perversion of language to say that his trade is legitimate. Equally illogical was it to say that it was founded upon natural wants and natural desires. But we need not argue this point with the learned Professor. The whole of the intelligent portion of the medical profession is against him. He regarded the total abstinence movement to be as extreme and unnatural as the evil of excess. Of course to be consistent he must believe this when his definition of temperance is looked at—which is that temperance consists in the reasonable moderate use of all the good things which God hath given us. Now when the truth is that alcohol is not a good thing to drink and that God never gave it to us, his definition is not much credit to him. He says temperance is not abstinence. But his definition simply includes all good things which God has given. If so what then becomes of the bad things which he has not given? Shall we not abstain from them? A Jew looking at the definition would eat corn, wine and oil as the good things of which he was to make a reasonable and moderate use, and he would say that his temperance which included these excluded pork and shell-fish. If Professor Ramsay had only given his reason fair play he might have given us such a definition as this—temperance is the rational use of things beneficial and the entire abandonment of things pernicious, to which all thoughtful Christians could heartily subscribe. Nothing he can say farther need detain us since we have shown that he does not know what temperance means: and we have nothing to fear from such an utterly baseless attack. But we have to prefer a serious charge against him. Affirming that total abstinence is merely a cry got up by the trade itself for its own benefit, and of course that by consequence we total abstainers are in collusion with the liquor traffic, he alludes to the temperance steamer "Ivanhoe" as an illustration and perhaps proof of his assertion. "The moment the ship landed anywhere every one rushed to the nearest public house." Again, "At the end of the summer all the publicans on the banks of the Clyde petitioned that the temperance steamer might be continued." Not to point out the absurdity of people voluntarily going on board a temperance boat merely to endure two hours thirst for strong drink when scores of boats with drinking saloons were at their service, we most emphatically deny that the allegation applies to a more than a mere moiety of the passengers of the "Ivanhoe," and that moiety was largely made up of publicans who preferred a voyage down the water away from the taste and smell of a whisky bar. The owners of the "Ivanhoe," we are in a position to say, never received a petition from the publicans on the banks of the Clyde, so that if Professor Ramsay is imposed upon, it says little for his good sense, and if he makes the assertion recklessly it says as little for his veracity. A more unwarrantable and baseless attack on a movement which has effected such a beneficial change in society it has not been our lot to meet. It is matter for thankfulness that his ill-judged remarks recoil most heavily on himself.

The summer is now upon us, and the people are moving about. Among other gatherings which attract them are well conducted temperance meetings. These kind of meetings never have in our experience failed. The committee that selects a good site, invites speakers full of their subject and having the art of setting it forth effectively, secures a good choir, appoints a well-known and approved chairman, have their meetings well advertised, will score many successes before the summer on which we have entered is at an end. Were some committees only to look around and see how carefully even a nigger concert is arranged for, and would take the lesson faithfully to heart, showing an enterprising discrimination and tact, they would find hundreds, in some cases thousands, of pledges added to their society roll books. The Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association will gladly co-operate with such committees.

Now that the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association has got through a most arduous amount of winter work, we believe that we will be doing it a service by bringing forward its claims upon the liberality of all who are sincerely desirous of legally suppressing the drink traffic. This Association was supported last year by (1st) a subsidy from the United Kingdom Alliance, (2nd) by 5,483 subscribers, (3rd) by 122 societies, and (4th) by a special subscription of £100 sterling received from the late Mr. John Smith, Fairmount, Bothwell. The total sum received amounted (exclusive of balance from last year, sums received from publications and collections) to £1,786 17s. 5d., or at the rate of £148 18s. 1d. per calendar month, or nearly £4 17s. 8d. per day. Looking to the nature and the amount of work done by it, and through it, not forgetting the helpful aid otherwise of its members and friends, nor the gratifying co-operation it received from all sections of the movement, such a daily income is insignificant in the extreme. Not one in view of these figures dare say that the Association received last year the support to which, looking at the results of its efforts, it was fairly entitled.

The subscription list of the Association is also well worth study. Three friends gave subscriptions of £20 and upwards; 7 from £10 to £20; 20 from £5 to £10; 61 from £2 to £5; 215 from £1 to £2; 224 from 10s. to £1; 670 from 5s. to 10s.; 1,820 from 2s. 6d. to 5s.; 2,463 from 1s. to 2s. 6d. We find from the same information supplied to us that 635 subscribers paid 5s.; 1,708, 2s. 6d.; and 1,653, 1s. Thirty per cent. of the subscribers gave one shilling only to the funds, and nearly other thirty-three per cent. subscribed half-a-crown. Of course many of them, having a perfect knowledge of the vigorous energy and success characteristic of the operations of the Association, might say—"Well, if such vigour and efficiency can be maintained for such a trifling sum why pay more?" To such we would say, "Allow us to amend your remark and say if such a petty sum has done so much let us give more liberally in order to secure progress and success in proportion." No business company we know of but would, in the face of the ratio of the significant results of the agitation, increase its capital greatly and find many willing to invest in a concern that offered the same ratio of returns as this Association has given, not only last year, but all through the years of its existence.

Let any warm friend who remembers the condition of the permissive prohibitory movement in Scotland when this Association was instituted compare the then with the now, and he will have as little difficulty as we have in coming to the conclusion that the financial support received by the Association hitherto has not been in proportion to its merits, or to the growth and progress of the agitation which it has so persistently led. The Executive, although often appealing to the members and friends, were ready, however, to allow for the feeble response to their call for increased resources on the ground that then the movement was so very much a matter of faith, that many no doubt preferred to give to objects much less worthy, because visible, rather than embark their charity on what might turn out after all a peradventure. But no one can now urge such a reason. The Association has revolutionised the temperance sentiment of Scotland, and the result is that the Permissive Bill movement has in it no equal and no superior. Under such circumstances the Executive would not, we think, ask too much were they to ask that, with returning prosperity, there should be a serious consideration on the part of all members and friends of the movement as to what ought to be the amount of their future support to the funds. Let them assign the first place on their private subscription list to the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association and they will neither regret their doing so nor really pinch any other good object they feel disposed to support. It is not the amount for which, on behalf of this Association, we plead, it is the spirit of giving we so earnestly desire. Let every true man and woman sympathising with the efforts of the Association deal faithfully with him or herself, and as they give to God in holy things they will give as cheerfully to the funds of this Association. Each of the 1,653 one shilling subscribers might, in the light of this self-searching consideration, resolve to give two shillings, raise their subscription from one farthing to one halfpenny a week, and in like manner those 1,708 paying 2s. 6d. could resolve prayerfully to give 5s., which, after all, is little more than one penny a week as their contribution to bring about the abolition of the liquor traffic. We feel that we have perhaps asked far too little, but should any friend feel any difficulty as to the amount he or she should devote, let them refer this matter to conscience, and by its dictates let them faithfully abide.

Dr. Emmons met a pantheistical physician at the house of a sick parishioner. Says the pantheist, "Dr. Emmons, how old are you?" "Sixty, sir—and how old are you?" "As old as creation, was the triumphant response." "Then you are of the same age as Adam and Eve." "Certainly, I was in the garden when they were." "I have always heard that there was a third party in the garden with them, but I never knew before that it was you."

INTELLIGENCE.

DUMBARTON LOCAL PARLIAMENT.

On Friday, 25th March, this body met to discuss the second reading of the Local Option Liquor Bill.

The Member for Finsbury (L) began the debate in a speech which showed considerable acquaintance with the temperance question. Dealing with alcoholic drinks, he held there was not more than a pennyworth of food in a gallon of beer, and all the food in a glass of wine could be held on a threepenny piece.

The Member for Stroud (C) held that the real purpose of the Bill was to diminish the powers of the ratepayers in the regulation of the drink traffic. He admitted that the use of drink was hurtful, but the people had Local Option at present, and had only to choose teetotal magistrates to have the traffic extinguished.

The Member for Leeds (L) made by far the most important speech of the evening. He said—The laws which we have at present for the regulation and distribution of drink amongst the people of this country are not perfect laws. They might be improved. As an improvement, sometimes people talk about free trade, but that is almost an exploded idea. After quoting lengthily from Robin Goodfellow's article in March Social Reformer, he went on to say—It must be acknowledged that because free trade has failed, and because we cannot allow it to be sold as other commodities, that we have had to resort to the present system of restriction, which some people term a regular monopoly. Our present licensing system cannot be said to be a success. Its object is to control the traffic in intoxicating liquor, and allow the people to have drink without drunkenness, and without public disorder. According to the existing law, drunkenness is illegal. Any person who is found in a public place under the influence of drink is liable to arrest. And more, the publican who supplied him with the drink has subjected himself to a fine of from £10 to £20. Well, what do we find when looking at the statistics of drunkenness? In one town in the north of England (Liverpool) there were, in 1879, 15,705 arrests for drunkenness, and 1166 for other offences while in a state of intoxication. But I need not take one place into account. It is a fact that a year or two ago, in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, there were 350,000 persons dealt with for drunkenness. Can any legislative measure be a more complete failure than our present licensing system when tested by these statistics? We have throughout our land thousands of arrests for drunkenness, and, strange to say, we hear of very few of the parties who are licensed to supply the drink being arrested. It is therefore clear that if such great numbers are arrested for being drunk, the law must have been violated by those who sell it. Seeing, then, the present law has failed to achieve the end for which it was intended, we have thought fit to bring in this bill. The sale of intoxicating liquor, as stated in the preamble, involves Her Majesty's subjects in the terrible calamities of poverty and crime. Why, in the United Kingdom we have 1,300,000 paupers—nine-tenths of this pauperism caused by drink. In 1879, Scotland alone, with a population of 3,000,000, had 97,676 paupers. Drink is the cause of 100,000 of the 140,000 criminals annually in our jails. In 1879 there were 22,675 drunk and incapables in Scotland. Then, it depresses trade and commerce. If the money spent on drink by us as a nation was spent in building houses, in reclaiming and draining waste lands (such as we have in Ireland), or in other useful ways, we could give employment to one million and a half more persons than are at present engaged. It therefore injures our labour market. It injures our trade and commerce by abstracting money out of our country. Were it not for the grain which is destroyed in the manufacture of strong drink we would require little or none of that which is imported, and the money which is sent to foreign countries would therefore be available for home use. By degrading our population to paupers and criminals, it necessarily throws great numbers out of employment, and thereby greatly diminishes the productive power of our industries, while at the same time very materially increasing our local taxation, it being a well-known fact that in those parishes in the United Kingdom where drink is prohibited the taxes are not more than a fourth of what they are where licensing exists. To show that it endangers the safety and welfare of the community, I have only to state that to drink is ascribed many of our railway collisions, colliery accidents, boiler explosions, cases of personal violence, insanity, murder, and premature death. The object of Local Option is to allow the people to say whether they want public houses placed in their midst or not. The ratepayers are at present trusted with returning a member to Parliament to deal with the affairs of the State. They are trusted to elect the School Board, who have the governing and educating of their children; and in church matters they elect their office-bearers. Surely, then, they ought to have a say as to whether this gigantic evil shall continue or not. At present the magistrates decide the question, but in most cases how can they judge it? They, who keep them from their own door, and say they are needful for the working man. They who sit at their dinner tables, with their port wine and champagne before them, and say, as they fill glass after glass, "Alas, these poor fellows don't know when they have got enough," and further maintain "it would be a pity to rob the poor man of his beer." It is therefore, I think, the working man's question. Let the poor man say whether it shall be taken from him or not. This traffic was created for the public good, and therefore I think the public should be consulted so as to make sure that no injustice is done. The fact which is indisputable, that wherever localities have been freed from the liquor traffic they have been satisfied with this condition, and have benefited by it in every respect, is the strongest reason why, on this local question, the locality should be enabled by Parliament to declare its wishes and act for itself. I am sure that hon. gentlemen on the other side and on the cross benches who agree with me in heart, will feel sad if, at the bidding of party spirit, they go into the lobby to refuse their fellow-countrymen means of protecting themselves (a most interesting discussion, which we summarize, followed). The member for Glasgow was called to order for his abuse of abstainers. He believed Local Option would be evaded. Drink would be easily procured when alcohol was found to be in water. (Laughter.) Cardiff, alive to the evils of drink, believed where the Act would be most required it would be inoperative. Salford held that alcoholic drinks were good and useful—in fact, efficacious in cases of extremity. He argued for compensation, and denounced it for not having provisions to that effect. The leader of the Opposition (Conservative) opposed the second reading. If there be only as much food in wine as will go on to a threepenny piece, and he had a choice, he would take the wine, as it was better to take something than nothing. The bill did not go far enough. Drinking, he believed, was on the decrease, and the more education and other refining influences prevailed there would be less drinking. Reading and Isle of Wight both spoke against the bill. Shrewsbury preferred licensing boards, and Argyll got maudlin over the late assertion about there being alcohol everywhere. On the other hand, Devonport contended that the people should have the right to deal with the drink traffic. The publican was called the poor man's butler. Well, the poor man should have the right to dismiss his butler when he chose. Peebles and Selkirk insisted that the people should have power to veto the liquor traffic. Brecknockshire argued eloquently in favour of the bill. The Prime Minister said it was a delusion to say that the people had Local Option, when the whole land was honeycombed with drink-shops. The great idea of legislation was to make virtue easy and vice difficult, and this could be best done by the removal of these places. It was a misstatement, too, to say that the people had Local Option in the choice of Town Councils, for Magistrates were bound to license. They would not prohibit the traffic in any place. That had been put beyond doubt, too, by a decision of the Supreme Court, where the Lord President held Lord Zetland could not make even his own property a temperance sphere. He joined issue with the leader of the Opposition in his idea that education was a cure for intemperance, and held that amongst the educated classes there were as many victims to intemperance—according to numbers—as amongst the unlearned. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ably spoke in favour of the bill, and was followed by the Home Secretary. The House divided:—

For the second reading,	66
Against,	45

Majority for second reading, 21

The numbers were received with cheers.

Twenty-two members altogether took part in the debate, and of those who opposed it at least four were closely connected by business or relationship with the drink trade. Hereafter we may give the text and comment upon the bill.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—IV.

March 17.—In reply to a question about the decision of Mr. Prentice with respect to the last municipal election in Liverpool, on which occasion the constitutional association incited voters having a qualification in more than one ward to vote accordingly, the Attorney General for England said that, "as his own judgment had been specifically asked, he had to say that it appeared to him that no elector who had voted in one ward had any right to vote in a second ward; and he would be much surprised if any counsel had given any such opinion." He learned that when the constitutional association issued their circulars, one Liberal did issue a circular of the same tenor. He would not, therefore, ask for a return, nor would he advise legal proceedings to be taken. It appeared to him that the publicity which this matter had attracted would perhaps prevent its recurrence."

March 18.—In moving the second reading of the Local Taxation (Scotland) Bill, the Lord Advocate said that it was necessary to get Parliamentary powers to compel clerks to the Commissioners to furnish local taxation returns. It was particularly desirable that the information called for by this Bill should be obtained. The amount of income from taxation and its expenditure was a material element in the consideration of any measure for the reform of Scotch Country Government.

March 21.—Mr. Harcourt asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government contemplated more stringent legislation in view of the constant failure of benefit societies; and whether Government would impose greater restrictions on public-house benefit societies. Lord F. Cavendish said it was not intended to alter the Act of 1879 yet. The failure of these societies was not more frequent than was those of other societies. In many places no place of meeting but the public-house was available. It might be interesting to state that the bulk of the societies of one hundred years and upwards met in public-houses.

March 21.—The Local Taxation (Scotland) Bill passed through Committee.

March 22.—The above Bill was read a third time.

March 23.—The Municipal Franchise (Scotland) Bill passed through Committee.

March 24.—In reply to Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who wished to know if his attention had been called to a whisky wapenschaw for the benefit of Elgin Town Hall, the Lord Advocate said that, although he had made every enquiry he had failed to ascertain what a whisky wapenschaw is, (loud laughter)—or whether in that kind of competition the prize is given to the producer of the best quality, or to the consumer of the greatest quantity—(laughter). I have, however, asked the Procurator Fiscal to inform the parties that if a lottery is intended they will render themselves liable to a public prosecution—(cheers).

March 24.—On the motion of Dr. Cameron, the Municipal Franchise (Scotland) Bill was read a third time.

March 25.—The above Bill was read in the House of Lords for the first time.

March 29.—Mr. Gladstone, replying to Mr. Biggar, said beer retailers in Ireland were required to take out a beer dealer's license at an additional duty of £3, 6s. 1½d., a requirement not enforced upon similar traders in England. By conferring similar powers on Irish Justices to that enjoyed by English Justices, the anomaly might disappear.

March 30.—Mr. Carbutt, in moving the second reading of the Elections (Closing of Public Houses) Bill said, his object was the purification of elections. He did not know that he would have the support of brewers and distillers, but he believed the better class of publicans would rather be in favour of this Bill than against it. The public-houses in the town of Newport were closed on the occasion of the last election, and the town furnished a marked contrast to former elections, when riots took place and damage was done to person and property. He did not think public-houses should be closed on the days of municipal elections. He exempted railway-bars and, much against his will, the City of London. Mr. Litton generally approved of the Bill. The tendency of modern legislation in the direction of temperance justified the introduction of this Bill. He was not at all sure that the publicans would oppose the Bill, because it might naturally occur to the licensed victuallers that there were risks to be incurred by the sale of intoxicating liquors on the day of polling, and they might consider it would be to their ultimate advantage to give up the right they now possessed of having their public-houses open on the days in question. In order to give them time for further discussion, he moved the adjournment of the debate. He was seconded by Baron De Ferrieres. Mr. Morgan Lloyd objected to the adjournment of the debate if that meant the merely getting rid of it. Mr. Gregory objected to the Bill. The Attorney General said every one would agree on the necessity for this Bill. (Hear hear.) The practice of corrupt treating at elections was an evil and a growing one. The fault rested not only on the person in the trade who supplied the means of treating but on those who provided the money for treating, and on those who encouraged the treating. It would, he thought, be a great evil if they were, while attempting to check the practice of corrupt treating, to proceed in a spirit of hostility to a trade, and inflict punishment on them alone. He did not believe for one moment the supporters of this Bill had such an object, but it could be well understood that if a measure of prohibition, severe in its consequences, and removing, of course, a legitimate trade from a portion of the community, was to be carried into effect, the responsibility of so doing ought to be borne by a majority of this house, and above all, by the opinion of the public in its favour. He believed that a right method of prohibition would meet with considerable support from those persons principally affected by it. When the corrupt practices discussion came on he would say that would be to offer the freest opportunity of voting on the question involved in this Bill. He begged the mover of the motion to agree to the adjournment of the debate. Sir R. Cross also asked the mover to adjourn. There were three sets of persons who would be affected by this Bill, 1st, the publicans. As far as they were concerned all that he would say at the present moment was that, if for the general benefit of the country the closing of public-houses was proved to be necessary, although it might affect the trade, the trade must give way to public opinion. (Hear, hear.) But then it must be proved to their satisfaction that such a step was absolutely necessary. Then there were business people who would think elections a nuisance if they interfered with their business. The Bill would do harm to such a class. Then there were the candidates who certainly needed protection, for, notwithstanding their resolution to have a pure contest, some indiscreet friend invalidated the election. Mr. Dick Peddie, while agreeing that the matter should be discussed on a general bill, thought the opinions of the House should be taken. He believed Scotland would be found all but unanimous on this matter. (Hear, hear.) He objected to the Bill that it did not close public-houses during the entire day; for often when the election was over people adjourned to public-houses, and riot and disorder too often followed. Mr. Caine, while deprecating a division, said it would be a good thing on the whole for a borough, and a general convenience to the community if public-houses were entirely closed on the polling day. Major Nolan spoke. Sir Wilfrid Lawson said that he should be very glad if the Bill intended to shut up public-houses from one election to the next. (Laughter.) He urged the going to a division. Mr. Warton said a few words, and then Mr. Carbutt withdrew the Bill.

March 30.—Mr. W. H. Fowler moved the second reading of the Municipal Corporation Act 1859 (Amendment) Bills, whose object was to give power for the re-arrangement of wards without incurring the trouble and expense of a private bill. The Government consented to the second reading, when, therefore, it was agreed to.

March 31.—Mr. Morgan Lloyd, in reply to Mr. Caine, replied that the number of court-martial punishments in the army in the year 1870 was 14,750; 4,421 courts-martial were held on cases of drunkenness, the cases on duty being 895. The total amount of drunkenness was more clearly shown by the number of fines imposed. These latter figures gave a proportion of 236 fines to every 1000 soldiers—the total number of men fined being 23,316. This might seem an exceedingly large amount, and no doubt it was very large, but he was happy to say that the figures had been steadily decreasing for the last nine or ten years. (Cheers.) As to how many of other crimes resulted from drunkenness he might say from his own experience it was probably three-fourths of the whole.

March 31.—In committee on the Army Discipline and Regulation (annual) Bill, Mr. Caine moved to insert the following clause after clause 3:—“On and after the commencement of this act, the sale of all intoxicating liquors in canteens and other places of refreshment in garrisons should be prohibited, and the supply of liquors on the march should be discontinued.” Mr. Caine said that he proposed this clause through hearing the Judge Advocate General (Mr. O. Morgan) say “That if on the one hand the British soldier could be powerfully influenced for evil, on the other hand he could be powerfully influenced for good. How was that to be carried out? They would not do it by the lash, but they would do it by raising the character and morale of the soldier by removing the temptation to drunkenness which was his greatest curse.” When he heard these words he thought that the War Office fully intended to take some steps for the removal of this temptation, but he found nothing about this in the bill. He therefore proposed this clause as the best means known to him for securing these desirable results, and making some change in the awful and deplorable state of things. The Secretary of War has told us that drunkenness and crime resulting from drunkenness make up nearly the whole crime of the British army. What he wanted to do, if he could get this clause inserted in the Bill, was to prevent that crime—at least what of it arose from drunkenness. Mr. Caine then quoted from Sir Garnet Wolseley's soldier's pocket book, a standard authority in the army. Sir Garnet said—Give your men as little spirits as possible: tea and coffee are more sustaining and are more portable. That giving is good is just an old superstition. It was a well ascertained fact that alcohol reduces temperature; and that medical officers of the Polar expeditions condemn it as preventative against cold. Neither the trappers, lumbermen, nor voyageurs in Hudson Bay company drink spirits, tea being their constant beverage, and none do harder work. No men ever did harder work than was performed by the troops that were employed on the Red River expedition. No spirits was issued to them, they had plenty of tea, and illness was unknown amongst them.” This was the testimony of Sir Garnet in 1868, and in 1880 he said, “that his experience had proved to him that the less liquor there is consumed in any army the more efficient is its condition. With the troops under his command in South Africa they had very little spirits. Of his own personal escort the majority were total abstainers and they were models of what soldiers on service should be. Having no grog on a campaign eases the transport service very considerably, and removes a temptation to steal which its presence always creates.” Colonel Dennison, Sir Frederick Roberts who said that the absence of crime amongst the total abstainers in the army was almost incredible, and that drink was a great incentive to crime in the army. Lord Napier of Magdala, who said that the aggregate percentage of crime among teetotalers in the army was 0.12, while among the non-abstainers it was forty times as numerous. Lieutenant-General Norman, Lieutenant-General Stavelly, Sir Richard Temple, Colonel Blewett, the Marquis of Salisbury, Sir Hugh Rose, and a host of medical opinion were quoted by Mr. Caine, all tending to the condemnation of drinking in the army, and lauding the good done by its absence. Mr. Caine could not understand how the House could go against these opinions unless it is, as has happened before, that the leading and active agents of the army count little or nothing as against that other influence which sometimes prevails in that particular branch of the service. The Government admitted the evil, they expressed their intention to do some thing or other but they did not do it. He now gave them an opportunity by their acceptance of his clause to get rid of these cases of drunkenness which they themselves provided. Mr. O. Morgan opposed the clause, because spirits were forbidden on home stations, and if the soldier could not get beer in the canteen he would go for the gin and spirits outside. The drunkenness complained of does not arise in canteens but outside of them. Drunkenness is decreasing. There are 25 per cent. of the British army abstainers. No liquors can be got in canteens before noon, after tattoo, during divine service, or by apparently intoxicated persons. Then the clause could not be conveniently inserted in a Mutiny Bill. Dr. Kinnear believed that if Government would allow soldiers 2d. each per day in lieu of beer 50 per cent. of them would accept it. Captain Maxwell spoke against the clause as having a tendency to drive the soldiers from the canteen to the public-house. He thought that magistrates should diminish the number of public-houses near garrisons and large camps—that was the true method on which to proceed. Colonel Stanley opposed the clause for the same reasons as Captain Maxwell; he did not believe the bounds of sobriety were exceeded in canteens. We would not get better men in the service if such a clause were passed. He would extend the army coffee taverns, and hoped the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) would support these. Colonel Colthurst also opposed the clause. He thought that soldiers who desired spirits in the canteens should be able to get them, their drunkenness sprang from their getting bad liquors outside. Mr. A. M. Sullivan was glad to find that the late and present ministers for war had a sincere desire to assist the soldier in a policy of sobriety. The mover was untenable, or he was right. If the soldier should have good drink in the canteen, why withhold whiskies and brandies. He believed that the soldier first got primed in the canteen and then went outside and got drunk, so that the public-houses only finished the work the canteens had begun. They had gone already in the direction the clause went, let them make up their minds and go farther. Mr. Illingsworth thought that the Committee owed the Hon. Member for Scarborough a debt for bringing the question under the notice of the House. The control of the canteens as at present maintained had done good. This, however, had conclusively shown that if no intoxicants were supplied they would have everything they desired in making the British army the model army of the world. If the publican made the British soldier drunk why not punish him? That is no new doctrine, but the law is never put in force. The clause should have his support. Sir W. Barttelot sneered at the last speaker as seeking to do by Act of Parliament what could be better done otherwise. He thought that the object of this clause was simply to drive the soldier from where he could get good beer to where he could only get bad liquor. Let them look at the improved state of the army and let well alone. Sir. W. Lawson said, the previous speaker had a strange idea of "well," when he considered in the face of 23,000 cases of drunkenness the army was well! but this Hon. friend was as staunch as ever in standing up for drink and flogging in the army. Let the House look at the matter. Evil, great evil exists and yet nothing has been proposed for its removal. The only one proposing anything was the hon. Member for Scarborough. He did not believe that a stronger case than that of his hon. friend could be made out. Sir Garnet Wolseley had said that intoxicating drinks are bad before, during, and after a march: surely that means that they are bad for them during the whole of their lives. He hoped the House would divide to let them see who were the soldiers' true friends. Major O'Beirne opposed the clause, as recruiting could not go on without drinking. The army was recruited from the lowest classes of society, those who frequented public-houses: if canteens were closed recruiting would come to a stand still. Mr. Labouchere said that Sir Wilfrid Lawson was inconsistent in advocating this clause. He should give the soldiers an option in the matter. Sir Alexander Gordon said that if the House were anxious to teach soldiers the folly of drinking, they should dispense with the liquor bar in the House. He could not support the clause. Mr. W. Fowler would be delighted to see the sale of liquors stopped at the bar of the house. He never used any. The point was, was it good for the soldiers to have an opportunity of buying liquors in the canteens. If it was not they should close them. If a soldier went outside in consequence, were they to be held responsible; but he believed he would not. He should vote for the clause as he saw no reason for selling liquors in the canteens. Mr. Childers opposed the clause as the army was becoming increasingly temperate, so that such a drastic measure as was sought was unnecessary. The clause would not touch the case of the Indian Army as the Mutiny Bill did not deal with it; but he would do all in his power to reduce and discourage the issue of liquors to the soldiers in India. But he would protest against the doctrine that it was wrong to use a glass of beer. After advocating the soundness and harmlessness of good (?) beer, he went on, that he would not be a party to deprive the soldier of a glass of beer. He would discourage drinking, encourage means for securing wholesome cocoa and coffee in barracks. Sir R. Cunliffe also opposed the clause, though his hon. friend knew that he was not out of sympathy with temperance. Mr. Ramsay would vote for the clause if it were modified to prohibiting liquors to soldiers on the march. Mr. Caine replied, and after a protest against the clause by Major Vaughan.

The Committee then divided, and the result was:—

For the clause,	34
Against,	156

Majority against the clause, 122

The five following Scotch Members voted in the minority:—Sir J. T. G. Sinclair, Bart., Dr. Cameron, Messrs. Noel, Peddie, and Williamson. The following voted in the majority:—Sir G. Balfour, Sir Alexander Gordon, Sir H. H. Maxwell, Right Hon. M. G. Duff, Right Hon. John Hay, Hon. Preston Bruce, Hon. A. Elliot, Colonel Alexander, J. B. Balfour, H. Campbell Bannerman, A. Crum, D. Currie, C. Dalrymple, A. O. Ewing, P. M'Lagan, J. M'Laren (Lord Advocate), J. Heron Maxwell, C. S. Parker, R. W. Cochran-Partick, and J. Ramsay.

April 4.—Mr Gladstone submitted his Budget. His references to the liquor were, if not always happy or apt, ample enough. His proposals were as follows:—A duty of 26s. on every 36 gallons of mum, spruce or black beer which before fermentation has a specific gravity of 1215 degrees; exceeding that gravity 30s. 6d., and upon every 36 gallons of any other kind of beer, which before fermentation, has a specific gravity of 1057 degrees, 6s. 6d. and so on in proportion, with the statutory drawback on beer imported or exported, or shipped as ship's stores. All who brew privately, whose rent is above £10 and under £15, must take out a license costing 9s. Upon every gallon of foreign spirits the duty should be 10s. 4d.; upon every gallon of perfumed spirits 16s. 6d., and so on. Upon every gallon of liqueur or cordials whose strength is untested 14s., and so on; and that the surtax on foreign spirits should be 4d. The penny put on to enable him to repeal the malt duty is to be taken off. It will be seen that his references are far from being so favourable to temperance as were those of Right Hon. Robert Lowe and Sir Stafford Northcote.

Mr Childers proposed an insertion of a clause into the Army and Navy Discipline Bill to enable courts-martial to punish by personal restraint or hard labour rather than by flogging. He said that the present clause proposed to punish the man guilty of drunkenness on the line of march or on active service by other means than flogging. After some discussion utterly devoid of interest the clause was agreed to.

April 8.—The House adjourned to-day for the Easter Holidays and was to assemble on the 25th ult.

The election of the Lord Advocate as a member of Parliament for the city of Edinburgh cost him £1181; the attempt of Mr. Jenkins to secure the seat cost that gentleman £981.

A bust and tablet to the memory of George Cruickshank is to be deposited in the crypt of St. Paul's shortly. It is "placed within this sacred fane by her who loved him best, his widowed wife." Oh woman, honour be thine, so abused yet so forgiving.

POLLOKSHAW.—Mr. John M'Dougall delivered a lecture in the Tontine Hall here on the 8th ult. Ex-Provost Cameron presided. In opening the proceedings the chairman said that great injustice was being done to abstainers owing to using communion wine on sacramental occasions. He would suggest provision of a few seats and some unfermented wine for abstainers, and expressed the sorrow he felt that his family should for the first time taste alcoholic liquors at the Lord's Table. Mr. M'Dougall then gave his lecture on the Communion Elements. It was much enjoyed by the audience, who, though not large, was highly appreciative.

PRESENTATION TO MR. AND MRS. J. H. WATERSTON.—The annual entertainment in connection with No. 16 (Abstainers') Company of the Q.E.R.V.B. took place in the Free New North Hall, Marshall Street, Edinburgh. There was a large attendance. Captain Waterston occupied the chair, and among those present were Captain Bryce, Captain Grant, Captain Dickson, Captain Ivory, Lieutenant Hamilton, Captain Hawley, Firemaster Wilkins, Mr. T. Linton, Procurator-Fiscal; Mr. John Cameron, S.S.C.; Bailie Colston, Rev. Dr. Adamson, Captain Thompson, and Lieutenant Jamieson. Apologies for absence were also received from a number of other gentlemen. After tea, the Chairman said that No. 16 Company was one of the first formed when the Volunteer movement was originated, and, therefore, he pointed out, they had passed their twenty-first year. The number of members in connection with the company last year was 87, of whom only one was non-efficient. As to the financial state of the company in April last, they had £120 to their credit, in addition to a capitation grant of £150, which brought their total revenue up to nearly £300. In the course of the evening Captain Waterston was presented by the members of the company and their friends with a silver tea service, along with an address, which stated that Mr. Waterston's life-long devotion to the Volunteer movement was sufficiently attested by the fact of his being one of the veterans of the force, having joined as a private in 1859, and having, by untiring attention to duty, no less than by amiable personal qualities, raised himself up to his present honourable position in the service. Along with the tea service there was also presented a brooch for Mrs. Waterston. The Rev. Dr. Adamson and Bailie Colston also addressed the meeting, which was enlivened during the evening by the rendering of a number of songs by Mr. James Lumsden, Miss Effie Goodwin, and others.—Daily Review, Every lover of temperance will be glad to see that Her Majesty has appointed her "right trusty and well-beloved cousin, John Campbell Hamilton Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen," to be her Commissioner to the ensuing General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

The cost of the General Election of 1880 was £1,737,300. Four hundred and eighty Conservative candidates spent £951,000; while four hundred and eighty-eight Liberals was £771,540. This is the acknowledged expenditure, the unacknowledged, finds no record.

THE RECHABITES.—This body is showing a good deal of activity just now. The Dumfries and Kirkcudbright District Tent had its annual meeting in Dalbeattie. The annual report showed a slow but steady progress in the locality. The funeral fund has £208 8s. 9d. of income, and a balance to carry forward of £188 8s. 9d. Four Juvenile Tents have a balance in their favour of £50 13s. It was agreed to propose at the moveable Conference that some of the levy contributed by the Tent be retained for extension purposes in Scotland. A new Tent has been opened in Ayr with prospects of great success. The Glasgow District Tent has held its annual meeting. The proceedings were interesting and successful. The idea of an extension fund to spread a knowledge of this order is of vital importance to its future.

THE SUBJECTION OF WOMEN.—One of the inspectors of factories in the Midlands drew attention in a recent report to some features of a saddening character regarding the women "nailers" of these parts—to the gradual hardening to coarseness and grossness of the women to the physical evils, to the unmanliness of the men, in words too strong to be placed here. Suffice it that his opinion was that "Day by day I am convinced that this women's labour is the bane of the place," for whilst the "ought-to-be bread winner is luxuriating in some public-house at his ease, training his whiffet for some future running on beef-steaks and the best of good fare," the wife, and possibly the children, are at work "for any price any crafty knave of a master chooses to offer." When you see the women working, too often the men are at the tap-room or congregating at coursing or sporting matches, or with the pigeons in their little boxes carrying them out into the green lanes. The men are too often loungers at the race course or loiterers at the public-house corner while womanly hands wield the hammer.—The Graphic.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.—Mr. W. Blackwood, the northern district agent of the above Association, has, during the past ten days, addressed several public meetings in the Congregational Chapel. The subject of the first lecture was Father Mathew, the moral regenerator of Ireland. He gave a very graphic and interesting sketch of the life and labours of the great reformer. The subject of the second lecture was a survey of the present century reforms. Mr. Blackwood's third lecture was on the Triumphs of Prohibition, in which he showed its beneficent results to those communities where there are no public-houses. The meetings were moderately well attended. He also officiated at both diets of worship in the Congregational Chapel on Sunday last, and at eight o'clock preached an exceedingly able and impressive sermon on "King Josiah as a Reformer." His illustrations were exceedingly happy and telling. The large audience listened attentively. We learn that Mr. Blackwood has received considerable encouragement from the Good Templars and other citizens of Lerwick.—The Shetland Times (slightly abridged).

THE RATEPAYERS OF DUMFRIES AND THE LICENSING QUESTION.—A very interesting return, showing the opinion of the ratepayers of Dumfries on the licensing question, has just been obtained through the instrumentality of the Dumfries and Maxwelltown Temperance Union. Several weeks ago circulars were issued to the ratepayers of the town, male and female, bringing under their notice the fact that the number of licensed houses in their midst is in something like the proportion of one to 147 of the population, and requesting them to express their opinion on this state of matters by filling up an accompanying schedule. The schedule contained three columns. A signature in the first indicated that the person making the return was satisfied with things as they are; in the second, that he would approve of a considerable reduction in the number of public houses as suitable opportunities occur; and in the third, that he desired to see the liquor traffic prohibited. Of 2037 schedules delivered 1374 have been returned, the number of signatures in the various columns being as follows:—Satisfied, 128; in favour of a reduction, 622; in favour of prohibition, 624. Although the number who have failed to make a return (663) may appear large, the promoters of the plebiscite are quite satisfied with the manner in which their request has been responded to, having regard to the apathy which is generally displayed when any subject is submitted even by the municipal authorities to the decision of a popular vote, and to the fact that the number who voted at the last School Board election, after a keen canvass, was only 200 more than have filled up the schedules. The result is the more gratifying as the expression of opinion may be regarded as quite spontaneous. While members of temperance societies undertook the work of collecting the schedules they abstained from any attempt to persuade persons to sign in one column in preference to another, desiring simply to procure authentic information as to the real sentiments of the community. It is known that many who declined for various reasons to sign the schedules are favourable to a considerable change in the licensing laws, and the manner of administering them; but admitting that they might all be classed with those who wish no change, there is still a majority of 455 who are not satisfied with the existing state of matters. The holders of licenses, 85 in number, were excluded from the canvass on the same ground on which the Legislature incapacitates a publican who is a magistrate from sitting in judgment on matters affecting his trade; but supposing these to be added to the number opposed to change, there would still be on the most unfavourable calculation, a majority of 370 "non-contents." A deputation which included the Rev. R. W. Weir, president of the Union, and several other clergymen, attended at the annual licensing court, and laid before the magistrates the result of the plebiscite. As the result of the court, the number of licensed houses was reduced by two.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. WM. SHANKS, BRIDGE OF WEIR.—We deeply regret to have to record the death of this well known and highly esteemed gentleman, on the morning of the 2nd ult., at the ripe age of seventy-nine years. His death was, we are sorry to say, accelerated by his having to undergo an operation on the previous Thursday. Mr. Shanks was the founder of the thread industry at Gryff Grove Mills, that thriving concern owing very much to his untiring industry and bold enterprise. He had sympathy with all good works and he not only gave to the prohibitory agitation but was an example to his family, who are liberal supporters of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association.

TOUCHING INCIDENT.—A touching incident is reported from Chattanooga:—An utter stranger called on a respectable farmer last week, and asked him if his house had not been robbed during the war. The farmer replied that it had. "I," said the stranger, "was one of a marauding party that did it. I took a little silver locket." "That locket," said the farmer, bursting into tears, "had been worn by my dear dead child." "Here it is," replied the stranger, visibly affected; "I am rich; let me make restitution; here are 20 dollars for your little son." He gave the farmer a 50 dollar bill, and received 30 dollars in exchange. He then wrung the farmer's hand warmly and left. The farmer has since dried his tears and loaded his shot-gun. The 50 dollar bill was bad.

A BOOK TO BE AVOIDED.*

THIS is a book to be avoided by all mothers who are desirous of living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present evil world, and by all in true sympathy with the aims of the great temperance reformation. Whatever is worthy of preservation in the book can be easily got from medical works whose authors are in hearty sympathy with efforts being vigorously made to exclude alcohol wholly from society. We can do quite well without the advice which Dr. Ellis has to offer when we cannot take it without danger. There is an inconsistency in the book well fitted either to beget indignation or doubts of skill and intelligence on the part of Dr. Ellis. He begins thus:—"Those who would be blessed with healthy children must themselves be healthy, and living in obedience to the laws of nature and morality. It is certain that the children of individuals in a state of good physical health, and of highly cultivated moral and intellectual power, start from the highest vantage ground of humanity, and inherit tendencies of the best and noblest kind. The converse is equally true, and the children of the debilitated, the drunken, and the debased start their life heavily handicapped with innate tendencies alike to physical ailments and moral depravities." There is not an intelligent enquirer into the nature and foundations of temperance but must applaud these sentiments to the echo, and they would naturally expect that Dr. Ellis has ranged himself with that rapidly growing band of medical worthies who are earnestly striving to exclude alcohol from the pharmacopœia. They could never anticipate that one who makes such a fundamental distinction between the virtuous and the vicious would ever view alcohol with other than feelings of positive diversion. Let us see. At page 16 he says:—"When a woman finds herself pregnant, she should remember that she has a future life depending upon her wisdom or folly, prudence or imprudence. Let her then live simply, rising early, enjoying free ablution, eating good, plain wholesome food; occupying herself cheerfully, getting daily exercise; avoiding stimulants, beyond a glass or two of beer, or two of wine, if used to such; avoiding late hours, balls, excitements, over-fatigue of every kind," &c. The contrast between the first sentence in the extract we give is as great as "yes" from "no"; and the fault which we venture to think may be justly found with the sanction to drinking given is all the more to be deplored when the progress of the drink appetite is considered. We all know that people begin with weak or diluted strong liquors, with beers and grogs; but, as the appetite grows, stronger liquors, at lesser intervals and in larger quantities, succeed. Hence, for many women who have already entered upon a course of drinking, consequent on marriage responsibilities, such an observation as that of Dr. Ellis will appear as a sanction to them continuing their daily indulgence, which they will readily do until an appetite is formed strong enough to hurry them on to what they themselves must admit to be excess. In view of this seductive property of liquors, which must be known to Dr. Ellis, what can we think of his advice? That it is wicked, and calculated to work far more evil

to the readers of his little book than all the good advice it contains can benefit. Our readers may easily divine his relation to the temperance movement, and be at no loss to believe that he is profuse with his advice in favour of intoxicating liquors, and liberal with his cautions against "too much." Vain warning! Fagin the Jew, after rousing the murderous propensities of Bill Sykes till they became uncontrollable, tried to curb the brutal ruffian within such limits as would permit of Nancy being slain, and yet allow both villains to go at large. But Nancy was murdered. It is wicked to give a general advice to drink, knowing well that many people will follow it slavishly. This Dr. Ellis does, as we have seen; and being a member of an honourable profession, trusted in the most momentous junctures of existence, his advice acquires the force of a command which it will be thought suicidal to disobey. We unhesitatingly say that when that advice is to continue drinking, or to begin it, it is pernicious in the extreme, even although it is not always followed by drunkenness. But his sanction in this case is to pregnant women, and it is sheer mockery to expect that their offspring will be healthy, and capable of living in obedience to the higher laws of their being, when their mother is, by her indulgence, injuring her health, as well as that of her unborn child. Men do not expect "grapes of thistles." Allow a woman in such a condition to contaminate herself with these alluring poisons, and you poison and pollute the child to which she is to give birth. On page 21 he speaks of the child being put to the breast when he says—"The sweet pure milk is there in abundance." We solemnly affirm that sweet pure milk from a mother or nurse in the daily habit of taking alcohol in any form is an impossibility; and in penning such a line Dr. Ellis has allowed his fancy to lead captive his judgment, for it has been proved that children have, in taking milk from a mother under the influence of liquor, become heavy, sleepy, narcotized, or, if the dose taken by the parent has been large, have exhibited all the symptoms of alcoholic poisoning. So much for Dr. Ellis's treatment of the mother before and after the birth of the child. Let us glance at his treatment in the nursing stage. He recommends to nurses or to mothers, while suckling—"Generous diet, but an avoidance of rich and well-made dishes, plenty of milk and eggs, good beef and mutton, chicken and fish, a glass of good (?) stout twice a day (no other stimulant), fresh air, cleanliness, and moderate exercise, will generally keep up a fine healthy flow of rich, nourishing milk." He goes the whole length; no hesitancy with him. Most doctors now-a-days with a reputation would pause before allowing liquor so freely. Many of them would shrink from giving it at all to the growing unborn child, or to it as it nestles at the breast. As he is at the beginning, so is he all through and at the close of the nursing stage. On page 43, in a note, he submits a list of things to be excluded from a child's dietary. In that list liquor does not find a place! In the dietary table itself, in the Column headed "Low and Ordinary," we are thankful to find no liquors prescribed; but in that headed "Extra" we find:—"Stimulants: ordinary sound hock or claret, bitter ale, stout: extraordinary; port-wine, brandy, champagne." On page 44 we are told—"At the end of the first year it is time enough to commence more solid and general diet; then beef and gravy, mashed potato and gravy; and by-and-bye, as the child gets teeth, small pieces of meat cut fine and mixed with potato and gravy; and general diet, which will be indicated on the preceding table." Now, let us see what advice he gives as to the preparation of food. On page 127, No. 27, this is his recipe for arrow-root-wine jelly—"One cup of boiling water, two teaspoonsful of arrow-root and same of white sugar, one dessert spoonful of brandy or three of wine . . . stir all the time, and then add the wine or brandy." We believe that in a household where drink is profusely used drugging children will certainly happen, and when remonstrances are made, these will be met with the ipse dixit of such medical men as Dr. Ellis. Can any one wonder whence spring our drunkards when myriads of them, from the very beginning of their existence, are daily being drugged with alcoholic liquors? Before they know their right hand from their left, they have an appetite for alcohol implanted that cannot be bound; and we charge such men as Dr. Ellis with being the great occasion of this dread physical scourge that blights the happiness of countless families, and is fraught with such danger to society. Equally is the book to be avoided when its treatment of "dwining" children is considered. Not staying to do more than point out that such wasting children are generally to be found among families prone to conviviality, we will look for a moment at the way Dr. Ellis deals with them. Speaking of the failure to get a wet nurse, or to get the child to use cow's or condensed milk, he says—"I have found chicken broth, barley water, Russia isinglass, with, say, two teaspoonsful of old brandy distributed in five-drop doses over twenty-four hours, a useful rest to the stomach for days." Not a rest, Doctor, but a sedative of the worst kind. Again:—"An effort must be made to get back to milk. Here white wine whey often comes in well. A tablespoonful of excellent (?) sherry should be added to four or five tablespoonfuls of boiling milk. The brandy, of which children soon sicken, may be replaced in this way." What a startling admission, that children soon sicken of brandy! Yet (bless their little hearts!) Dr. Ellis cannot think of letting them alone. When they won't take fiery brandy, he plies them with doubtful sherry. He is vehement in his denunciation of quack medicines. He reminds us of what Dr. Carpenter said once—"that the alcoholic assumptions of the faculty exhibit the grossest quackery either in or out of the profession." Dr. Smith, in his "Practical Dietary," says that "alcohols are largely used by many persons in the belief that they support the system, and maintain a supply of milk for the infant; but I am convinced that this is a serious error, and is not an infrequent cause of fits and emaciation in the child." Among those many persons who fall into this serious error, we class Dr. Ellis, and we are doing what we can to warn our readers against being drawn into it by him. On page 102 he professes to give a list of "other remedies generally kept in all houses, and of use in emergencies." At the head of this list alcohol is placed. We can say for ourselves that it is not generally kept in our house, but that it is specially excluded, and there have been emergencies there to grapple with too. Yet we are not to affirm that at no time, nor under any circumstances, is alcohol of use, but simply that it is always so unsafe a remedy, and never without a distinctly injurious after-effect, that we are clear on never sanctioning its self-prescription by women in the delicate circumstances under consideration, when they are specially under the domination of habit and feeling. There is, then, the danger of this extraordinary remedy becoming ordinary, and then habitual, till the vitality of the parent, or of the child, is undermined. When we take into account the utmost benefits which can be affirmed of alcohol, the risk outweighs them all, and leaves a heavy balance of evil in favour of the drug. At page 104 we have a list of simple prescriptions—when not otherwise specified, suitable to children about three years old. First we have blood restorers. On page 105 we are told that cod-liver oil (which previously he terms a sheet anchor of medicine in debility, &c.) is a blood restorer.

"Burgundy or claret makes good vehicles for cod-liver oil, or it may be given, sandwich fashion, in a little brandy and water—that is, pouring a little brandy and water at the bottom of the glass, then floating the oil, wetting the side of the glass with brandy and water, and finally, pouring a little rather stronger over the top of the oil will make it slip down tastelessly." In giving milk and suet (an imitation of goat's milk, which is liable to derange the youthful stomach) a little old brandy, or a teaspoonful of "La grande chartreuse," is to be administered as a corrective! Rice-cream has, as one of its ingredients, a wineglassful of Madeira; and rice-water is to be made useful in diarrhoea by dispensing with flavouring, and adding a little cognac. Wine may be added to the infant's chicken soup, and arrow-root jelly has, as an item, one dessert-spoonful of brandy, or three of wine. A nutritious enemata is composed of six ounces of beef, one of cream, half an ounce, or less, of brandy, or an ounce of port-wine. This quantity will make three enemata. Always dosing—heavy, constant dosing. Let any one sit down and calmly consider the progress of the being, from the cell germ to manhood, with such "a guide, philosopher, and friend" as Dr. Ellis ever at his side with one form or another of alcohol ready at hand to administer. Or ever it sees the light of day, it has had to undergo months of drugging through its mother, and afterwards in its nurse's arms. It is being drugged through its milk, drugged in its first food, drugged all through its nursery days; drugged, if healthy, with bitter ale or good sound (?) stout; if ill and wasting, drugged and drugged. Is it any wonder that we have millions among us as steadily trained to drink as others are steadily trained in "the nurture and admonition of the Lord"?—not by a cruel, remorseless villain, but by a licensed physician, in conjunction with an ignorant, credulous, and, we can easily believe, a doting mother. As Wesley said, they are going to hell like sheep that are being drugged with strong drink in this fashion by Dr. Ellis and others like him. Could any one believe that Dr. Ellis penned the opening sentences of his book which we quoted? and also, on page 126, the following:—"Regarding the use of alcoholic stimulants for children, I can only say that in health the less the better, and that even in disease their use is to be guarded, and strictly medicinal. 'Sipping from papa's glass' is a foolish and even dangerous custom, and may lay the foundation of craving for their immoderate use." Why the less the better? Why not advise that none at all is the best? Why speak of the danger of "papa's glass" and yet urge mamma to fill her breasts with these seductive but poisonous liquors? It is cruel to stab the child through its mother, and make that mother the one to deal the blow under the guise of the tenderest affection. Again, he says—"I have often, when an out-patients' physician in crowded London districts, shuddered to hear of the 'drop of brandy' and 'drop of gin' which some unhappy little one had been compelled to swallow 'to do it good.'" Yet here he is, with all the high authority of his profession, deliberately laying down advice which, if followed, will always injure, and not seldom ruin, the mother and child confiding in his skill and care. He seems to us to be, or to have been at one time, closely connected with the great "drink" interest; his knowledge of liquor of all kinds is so extensive, and, we may admit, profound. He recommends, more or less heartily, bitter ale or good sound (?) porter. These are his daily drinks. By-the-bye, we had almost forgot that "he has seen good results from the old-fashioned plan of allowing delicate young persons a glass of rum and milk early in the morning—say at least an hour, but better two hours, before breakfast." Then there are Hungarian, French, Greek, and Australian wines recommended, diluted with water. 'Champagne is the wine for a sick stomach, whether from sea-sickness or what not; it is light, diffusible, easily absorbed, and transitory in its effects'—so is the hurricane, but what about its traces? He has known patients recovering from exhausting illnesses remark that their glass of Burgundy seemed to "give them life." Oh, how anxious he is that the liquors be good, sound, genuine old, and so forth! What a hatred he has at quackery, and yet he is himself the most prone to the vice he condemns, for he often tells his readers of a good substitute for alcohol, and that the drug might be easily let alone. It is not, you see, indispensable; but the secret of his method is clearly revealed on page 118. Quoting a remark of Dr. King Chambers, that "Laputa never devised anything more preposterous than Liebeg's food for infants," and concurring in it, he adds, "Nevertheless, let those use it who admire it." That sentence affords us the key to his method, which we truly characterise as destitute of intelligence, responsibility, or magnanimity—a heartless method, that panders to the prejudices and ignorance of his patients instead of standing firmly up for a treatment entirely exclusive of so extremely dangerous a drug as alcohol.

While we can heartily rejoice that Dr. Ellis has left this country, our joy is modified by the consideration that he is among our own kith and kin in New Zealand. Better that wild beasts had landed on its shores, for they might have been extirpated. Dr. Ellis will, within the reach of the influence of his book over the world, sow in the frame of myriads the seeds of an appetite that will fill premature graves, or burst out into the appalling forms of crime and misery. We, at least, have attempted to expose the pernicious nature of the book, and we trust that it will, by other pens as well as ours, be branded as a book deservedly to be avoided.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

ENGLAND AND THE ENGLISH.

I PROMISED that I would communicate to the Social Reformer the impressions that might be made on my mind as during this time I came in contact with the English people. Every one, I am sure, who has been received by Englishmen at home will readily admit that they are constituted to give a welcome which removes all misgiving as to the heartiness of their hospitable intentions. This has been my experience during fifteen years, the greater part of which I have been across the border; and if any one expressed an adverse opinion in my hearing, I would conclude that he had misconducted himself, and that from himself had come the influence which had kept him from participating of the goodness natural to the English people. Englishmen are not more hospitable than Scotsmen, but they give it with an inviting demonstrativeness which impresses the guest that he is conferring a favour by entering into the enjoyment of all before him and around him. And this attitude is not acting; it is natural, and as it is felt to be so, the entertained are permeated with a sense of freedom and security which make home. I do not know that this pleasing English manner wears longer than our restrained and, to appearance, repellent Scottish manner; very likely it does not. To the Scottish heart Scottish kindness is well known, and fully trusted for its endurance. When it operates in silent stealthiness that it may not be altogether seen, we feel the whole force of its presence like a divine influence; but I think it must be admitted that Englishmen might not be able to say this of Scotsmen until they are as well acquainted with us as we are with each other. A Scotsman, when he is for the first time received in England, must by the manner be made expectant of the immediate realisation of all that is implied in the words, "Peace on earth and good will towards men." Perhaps an Englishman, out of his temperament, offers more than it is in his power to give; and Scotsmen know that their countrymen offer less than they are prepared to give. Englishmen must therefore be unfavourably impressed with Scotsmen when for the first time they meet them at home. We are constituted to win our way in the world, but not to receive a ready entrance into the stranger's heart when he meets us all of a sudden at home, enveloped in our reserve that we may see through and through him without being seen. A Scotsman is a "brither Scot" as well as a Scotsman, and in Scotland more than in England it seems that "blood is thicker than water." The idea of "kith and kin" does not go to make up an Englishman to the extent that it goes to make up a Scotsman. A Scotsman's feelings do therefore, I think, run more strongly in the groove of family and race than an Englishman's. A Scotsman must become acquainted before he can open up demonstratively and receive strangers as friends.

The above may not be altogether true. I have hurriedly written it as it fell into my pen from experience that may not be well digested; but it is from experience, and let it remain with all that may be accurate or inaccurate about it.

Well, I am with this English people again, as has often been the case. I went in among them at Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 4th April, and now, on the 5th of May, I look forward to Friday the 13th as the entrance into two days' rest at home before I fall into the guidance of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. The temperance movement in Newcastle is tenacious of life, and, whether in halls or on the street, it continues to command a hearing. Its best-heard out-door utterances are on the Sandhill on Sundays, after mid-day and in the evening. Meetings at these times on Sunday may be said to be held the year round. Many teetotal heroes have been their chairmen. At present the post is filled by my friend Mr. Veitch. If ever you are in Newcastle on a Sunday, go to the Sandhill mid-day meeting (it is near to the quay), and there you will see Mr. Veitch on a waggon, surrounded by an audience of nearly six hundred; and as you look at him you will conclude that the meeting and the cause it represents are safe in his hands. The gravity that shines out of his intelligent face, made expressive with the force of conviction, must strike you as in harmony with his large symmetrical head, leaning slightly forward over his broad chest, standing erect on limbs which give the physical proportion in harmony with the quiet, strong, clear, convinced manhood of the man. Mr. Veitch works with his hands for his living. I mention this that you may see nothing of flattery in my delineation. Burns says somewhere, "Who would humbly serve the poor." Such is Mr. Veitch, and although I do not refer to his predecessors in office, I can say of them that they were worthy of the cause, and that it grew by their influence. Men of Veitch type are the outcome of the temperance movement, to grow by them. This is the evidence that it is another impetus from the heart of the people to secure to the nation growth and progress for all. On a Sunday a week or two ago over a hundred pledges were taken at this meeting. Newcastle is the centre of a mental force which does not expend itself in industrialism, and the temperance movement is a power in all the towns within the scope of its influence.

It was in these towns that I co-operated with Councillor Swan, the district agent, from the 4th of April to the 25th, and, although our meetings were small, they were acceptable, for they were composed of developed temperance reformers, of men who know to their sorrow that the teetotal movement must perish if the trade in drink is perpetuated in any system of closing and opening. Closing without opening can alone secure teetotalism from extinction. Teetotalism is not, to the men we addressed in these towns, the means of accomplishing the temperance reformation. It is merely a limited personal sobriety, practically protesting against the drink traffic. That is all, for the traffic is attracting increased expenditure as far and farther than means allow, and it is followed by all the consequences of an overwhelming drunkenness, which threatens to destroy national vitality. It was a pleasure to speak at many of the meetings in these towns, for the people, to secure general sobriety, national wealth, and national worth, have resolved to have closing without any opening whatever. Sunday closing and Monday opening does not satisfy them. They do not see in that closing and opening aught else than the means of national drunkenness, national waste, and national worthlessness. Of course you know that the Parliamentary representatives for this district are almost to a man with Sir Wilfrid. I could not give better evidence than this of its culture and preparedness.

On April the 25th I arrived at Derby, which is the centre of Mr. Mart's district, to address meetings with him for a week. They took place at Ripley, Nottingham, Sleaford, Bourne, and Leicester. Ripley is in Derbyshire; Sleaford and Bourne in Lincolnshire. They are small places, and little can be said of them except that they are delightfully rural after the English midland type. We met a few temperance friends in each of them, less or more pronounced for total closing, as they labour to snatch a brand now and again from the great drink conflagration. I expected to find in Nottingham and Leicester that the total closing idea was well and firmly held in a strong political grasp, but if it is so, I failed to observe the symptoms. We had two meetings in Nottingham. The first was in a suburb, and it was good as to numbers and character. The process of getting it up had evidently been well attended to. The Vicar was in the chair, and he expressed thankfulness for the manner in which the resolutions that were carried were supported, as in the facts and arguments he was helped to see the total closing of the traffic in a light more satisfactory than he had seen it before. When I think of this meeting, I am reminded that it is incumbent and safe to put the truth as to every-day closing clearly. The people are ready to receive it and liable to grow by it. The other meeting was got up by the Nottingham Temperance Society, and in the process aught that was seen was ordinary teetotal effort. The attempt was made to recruit it from the street by talking to the people as they passed, but the pre-occupied passed on, and the idle and the indifferent lingered and strolled away. But it turned out a better meeting than I anticipated. It was not held on the ordinary entertainment night. That was in its favour, and it was evident, as it filled up and settled down, that it was not composed of those who are driven about with the craving for entertainment. There might be 80 less or more present, and as they were talked to in sustained attention, they revealed that they were of the thoughtful who stand by the temperance movement as the means of national sobriety. I was pleased to feel that it was so, for while the temperance movement is merely kept up as an entertaining counter-attraction to the drink trade, the trade must drive it before it like wrack by the tide.

The meeting in Leicester was on a Saturday, and mainly composed of those who are attracted, as Saturday comes round, to be entertained in sober circumstances. For the room in which it was held, it was large as such meetings are liable to be.

I am now in the Potteries, with Birmingham as my centre, taking up a fortnight's out-door meetings with Mr. Bingham, who is the district agent, and I am well supported by his efficient arrangements and able personal co-operation. So far as they have gone, they have been good. Crowds have been attracted, and less or more their attention has been sustained. Out-door meetings should be cultivated. I mean by cultivated that they should be well advertised and personally countenanced by leading temperance men—as well countenanced at least as in-door meetings that are felt to be respectable. Respectable meetings don't reach the multitude as out-door meetings do, and out-door meetings should have the countenance and sanction which would attract those prepared to listen. Indeed, it would be better not to have such meetings at all than to hold them, as is too often the case, apart from the sanction which the best effort of the movement alone can give. Divested of this sanction and effort, they are presented to the public as low and despicable. It has often happened that speakers without the least countenance have been ordered to go to the corner of a street and begin, and that a crowd would soon collect. A crowd is wanted, but it must be favourably impressed and ready to listen respectfully; and this is not to be realised at out-door meetings until they are launched with all the authority of our movement.

JOHN PATON.

"What's your business?" asked the counsel. "I am a retailer of wet goods." "What's that?" said the judge. "Liquors, your honour." And yet people are always asking, "What's in a name?"

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

LITTLE CHARLIE.

It was winter, one of the hardest that had been known in Glasgow for years. Work was scarce, food dear, and the weather bitterly cold. Keen easterly winds were prevalent, and chill drizzling rains fell almost continuously from leaden-hued skies. The thousands of wretched and homeless waifs shivered in the lanes and byways of the great city.

The bars of the public-houses in the lower parts of the city were daily crowded with gaunt, hollow-eyed beings, who found the warmth and brilliance there an agreeable contrast to the damp and cold and wretchedness of the streets. Every stray copper found its way there, and was bartered for the poison they imagined kept out the cold, and made them forget for a little that there were such things as misery and want in the world.

In the attic flat of a tall tenement, in one of the many filthy alleys opening off the Gallowgate, there was a little, low-ceiled room, if such it could be called, utterly destitute of the barest necessities of life. The floor was broken in many places, and the plaster had been gradually falling from the walls, until only the bare discoloured stones were left. There was scarcely a whole pane in the small window, and here and there a piece of rag had been stuffed in to keep out the cold. There had been a spark of fire in the grate in the earlier part of the day, but it was now black, and the chill wind swept through the window and played unheeded with the dark hair of a woman, half lying, half sitting on the little flock-bed which was the only article of furniture in that wretched place. Her face was hidden, and she lay quite motionless.

There was something else on the bed—a baby—or rather one of these poor, pitiful little atoms of humanity who are never babies and who know no childhood. Among the class of people of which I write there are no babies. It was a boy, and could not be more than two years old; and there was a worn, aged expression on the tiny face, sad to see on older faces, but, in a young child's, one of the most pitiful sights on earth. The little lips were blue and pinched, but the lashes of the closed eyes lay on the cheeks, and there was a shadow of a smile lingering about the mouth as if the little one were sleeping in a happy dream.

Ah! that happy restful look comes only after death. The child was beyond all the miseries and ills of the life to which it was born. It had gone home. Only one scanty coverlet enveloped the wasted little form, and the mother's dress was a mass of rags. The child had died early in the evening, and since then the mother had not moved. The noise and shouting in the streets fell on unheeding ears. She seemed to be in a kind of stupor.

When the bell from the Tron rang eleven, she moved, and finally rose. A few faint moonbeams had struggled through the flying clouds, and, penetrating the garret, rested on her face, a very young face, and (Oh God! help her) one of the saddest eyes could rest on. There were still the remains of beauty lingering there, but the cruel hands of woe and want had too surely been at work upon it. She passed her hand wearily across her brow, as if trying to remember something, and then tottered across the floor to the window.

They were putting the shutters on the windows of the whisky palaces at the corners, and turning their drunken frequenters by dozens into the streets. A bitter smile wreathed Agnes Grant's lips as she watched them.

"My husband is there spending his last sixpence, and our boy has starved to death," she muttered with intense bitterness. "Oh God, forgive him, for I never can."

Then she turned and flung herself on the floor with an exceeding bitter cry, like Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted. "My poor little Charlie, my angel boy, the last of all my bairns!" she moaned between her sobs; "Come back to me, come back and let us die together."

Ah, well indeed the sleeper was far beyond the sorrow of that agonised cry. Suddenly drying her tears, she rose and slipped from the place, drawing the door behind her. Hurrying down the long staircase like a hunted thing, she went out into the bustle of the street. The moon was hidden again, and the rain was beginning to fall in torrents, while the sharp wind pierced her scanty clothing; but she saw nothing and felt nothing. She was bent upon a purpose. Speeding with fleet step along the Gallowgate and into Argyle Street, she never paused until she reached Jamaica Bridge. There were few passengers; the tramp of the policeman on his beat was the only sound mingling with the wail of the wind. She crouched close to the parapet, and fixed her eyes on the black waters of the Clyde flowing sluggishly on their way. The steady drip, drip of the rain drops as they met the river exercised a soothing influence over the wretched creature kneeling there. "It's black and cold, but it would soon be over, and there's at least rest beneath it," she said to herself; "and I may as well die by drowning as by starvation—they say it's easier." She laughed then a laugh sadder than any tears. "When the clock strikes twelve, I'll do it," she said with a kind of desperate resolution; "God knows I've been driven to it."

She drew her ragged shawl closer round her, and looked far down into the rushing water. Then the present seemed strangely to fade away from her, and in the dark depths she saw faces long ago loved and lost, and read the memories of bygone happy days. Life had been fair to her once, as it is fair to us all sometimes; yet now she was ready to fling it from her, a burden too heavy for her to bear. It was the old story. A young couple had set up in life, happy in the present and careless for the future. They had enjoyed a year or two of prosperity, and then had come a dark time of trial and adversity. They had buried an only and dear child, and sickness had stricken down the husband for many a weary week. When he recovered, he found his situation filled up, and no prospect of finding another. They lived from hand to mouth for a time, and, disheartened by the long struggle, Jim Grant turned for oblivion to the liquor which has brought ruin to so many homes. After that the descent was quick and sure, and now he was scarcely ever sober, and the wife was left to die of a broken heart at home. Another child had been laid to rest scarcely a year ago, and after his death had come promises of amendment, made only to be broken. Agnes Grant was a gentle, loving woman, who, loving much, could forgive much, but the limit of endurance had been reached at last. With the death of her last child, her last spark of interest in life had fled.

She had risen now, and was leaning with her arms on the wet parapet, looking still into the river. "I might give him another chance; this may sober him," she said to herself with a sob. "Poor Jim! he was good to me once, and he loves me yet, if he would only keep from that cursed drink."

Tears were falling from her eyes now, and mingling with heaven's rain-drops. The bell began to ring. One—two—three. She half turned away as undecided.

Four—five—six. She looked again into the water. It was quiet and still, and there was sure rest beneath. At home there was only a drunken husband and a dead baby.

Seven—eight—nine. Her foot was on the stone. The last three strokes were ringing out clear and solemn, but before the echoes died away through the stillness, moved by an uncontrollable impulse, she turned away once more, and sped swiftly through the deserted streets.

Scarcely ten minutes after his wife left the house, Jim Grant staggered up the rickety staircase, and pushed open the door of the place he called home. No light there, no fire, no wife, nothing but the little low bed, and the quiet sleeper lying there. "Ag, I say, where are you?" he queried in a thick, unsteady whisper. "Don't fool me. Strike a light. Ag, where are you?"

No answer.

"Ag!"

No answer.

He staggered over to the bed. There was light enough for him to see that the baby was there alone, and something in the stillness around him partly sobered him. He had no light, but he put out a shaking hand, and laid it on the child's breast. It was still. Then the man fell on his knees with a great sob. He had sunk low, but the heart was not yet quite dead within him. The child was dead, killed by him, and he knew it. And where was its mother! "In the river, I'll be bound," he said to himself in a fearful whisper; "and I've killed her too."

Just then there was a light footfall on the stair, and in another moment his wife was in the room. He felt her presence, but dared not move or lift his head. For the first time in his life he was afraid to look her in the face.

"Jim, is that you?"

She had not spoken so gently to him for years, but he dared not answer. She came to his side, and touched his shoulder. "Speak to me, Jim, I am here," she said; and something in the voice reminded him of the happy days before the curse had fallen upon them.

"Don't touch me; keep back from me," he said hoarsely. "I've killed the boy; I'm a murderer. I might have saved him, and I didn't. Don't look at me."

She came nearer to him, and laid her hand upon his shoulder. "Listen to me, Jim," she said in a low, distinct voice. "I went to the river to drown myself to-night; my heart was broken. But something came to me there—a voice, I think, of the past happy years, bidding me take comfort and come back to you, and give you another chance. Oh Jim, don't say I have come back in vain. Promise me here, by the side of our baby, the last of them all—promise that you will give drink up for good. Let us begin a new life together, husband, and let us bury the past. If you will, no word of reproach shall ever cross my lips. I will be to you as I have been always, and, with God's help, we shall be happy yet. Jim, don't say me nay."

Still kneeling at her feet, he grasped her hands in a grasp of iron. "Agnes, wife, you are an angel," he said brokenly. "Before God I swear no drop of drink shall cross my lips as long as I live. You have saved me!"

That promise, so sacredly made, was sacredly kept, and there came a time when Agnes Grant could say, with a chastened, tranquil heart,

"Ah Jim, surely our little Charlie did not die in vain!"

A CANADIAN REPULSE.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

Packet Office, Orillia, April 26.

DEAR SIR,—As I anticipated in the letter you quoted in the March Reformer, the efforts of the licensed victuallers to obtain legislative modifications of the restrictions upon their "trade" proved futile. But they have succeeded in preventing the adoption of the Scott Act in two of the Ontario constituencies—the city of Hamilton and the county of Wentworth. The almost superhuman efforts put forth by the traffickers and their friends account for this, and the only cause for surprise is that the county of Hamilton, in the same part of the province, gave a favourable verdict on the law. In the other provinces, our victories much more than counterbalance these reverses; and the effect of the latter is likely to be similar to a defeat or two at the outset of a war upon our nation. It has been said that Great Britain never enters heartily into a contest until she has sustained a defeat or two. The discussion of the question, and the manner in which public attention has been directed to it, will be of service in future operations, and I look for better organisation among the prohibition party. Faith without works is dead; and temperance people have been too ready to rest content with the assurance that God is on our side, forgetting that he honours his people by permitting and requiring them to be co-workers in this cause.—I am, with confidence, yours faithfully,

G. H. HALE.

To the Editor of Social Reformer.

SIR,—I have recently completed a tour in the far north, and a few words as to what is going on there in connection with our movement may not be without interest to your readers. I may say that the steamers which run between Aberdeen, Orkney, and Shetland are strong and powerful vessels. Passengers have full reliance in the ships and confidence in the captains, and the stewards are a most amiable and obliging class of men, ever ready to assist and succour those voyagers who sicken by the rolling of the steamer. I landed in Lerwick about the end of March, and stayed ten days. During that time I addressed a number of meetings, and met with very gratifying success. I was entertained, while I stayed in Lerwick, under the hospitable roof of the Rev. W. A. Farquhar, who is a reformer on all the lines of progress. The movement is well sustained in Lerwick by two efficient Good Templar Lodges, and I found a number of prohibitionists who are not in connection with the order, but who gave their support to the association which I had the pleasure of representing. Mr Hector Morrison, District Deputy of Shetland, very kindly co-operated with me, and I was much indebted to him for his sympathy and help. I sailed from Lerwick to Kirkwall, the capital of Orkney, with very pleasing reminiscences of my second visit to the former town. Kirkwall is well represented by an intelligent class of temperance reformers. There are two Good Templar Lodges and a Temperance Society, and I am greatly mistaken if the cause languishes in their hands. I found good reason for being cheered at Stromness. The managers of the United Presbyterian Church very generously granted me the use of the Church for my meeting. From interviews that I had with electors, I found they were deeply impressed with the necessity for our political temperance agitation, and that it was every day becoming more apparent that the question of licence must be referred to the decision of the people. Apart from this, the temperance movement will be an interminable agitation. We must be something else than an ambulance corps, carrying off the liquormen's wounded. "Saving the fallen" is a very fine phrase, and those who push them down have no serious objections that we should lift them up again. There should be a downright honest effort to change the law, so as to make prohibition a possible thing. Very much of the talk that we hear is not directed to this end at all. I found the air around Wick and Thurso aglow with the fame of Mr John Lamond. Hundreds in both towns had taken the pledge through his persuasive eloquence. This is a matter for profound thankfulness, and one heartily wishes that the good done might be permanent. I addressed two meetings in each town, and left with very pleasurable feelings. I only regret that the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association is not able to overtake more frequently many of those northern towns. I visit many places where I have no manner of doubt that a popular vote would issue in the suppression of the system of licence. I have sometimes to administer that old rebuke, "O thou of little faith," even to my friends who are temperance agents, because of their want of confidence in the people. It is not the best recommendation to our teaching if we have no reliance on the people whom we teach. You can only know what the people will do by giving them an opportunity to register their convictions by a vote. The best education for the use of a right is in the exercise of the right itself. I addressed meetings in Helms-dale, Brora, and Golspie. There is a Temperance Association in Helmsdale, ably conducted by the Rev. D. Macrae, and a staff of men "who know what Israel ought to do" with regard to the liquor traffic. I addressed my first open-air meeting for the season in Brora. My meeting in Golspie was small, but this arose in great measure from the shortness of the time that the friends had to make arrangements. I spent a night in the burgh of Tain, and visited the Templar Lodge. The town is beautifully situated on the slope of a hill, on the southern shore of the Dornoch Firth. I found the temperance men here, as they had often been represented to me, old and faithful abstainers, broad and generous in their sympathies, and thoroughly earnest in the movement. Some of them candidly confessed to me that permissive prohibitory principles had seldom been publicly advocated in the burgh. I found, however, one reader of the Social Reformer in Tain, an ardent prohibitionist, known and read of all men. I am glad to say that Tain will be represented in our subscription list next year. Besides the Good Templar Lodge there is a Temperance Society in Tain. I learned that the lodge is not so numerous as it once was, but judging from the stamp and quality of the members, the St. Duthus Lodge cannot fail to wield a mighty influence for good in the burgh. I have noticed one thing during my tour that has encouraged me very much, that is that there is a growing conviction in the minds of men that the licensing system is thoroughly corrupt, and nothing but a radical change can be of vital benefit to the temperance movement.—I am, &c.

W. BLACKWOOD.

To the Editor of "Social Reformer."

SIR,—Your plea in last number of the Social Reformer on behalf of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association is not too strong. My opinion is that much more might be advanced on its behalf, calculated to draw out personal sympathy and pecuniary aid not only of abstainers, but of many right thinking and well-disposed citizens. It is sad to think of an association organized and sustained "to assist in procuring the suppression of the liquor traffic by the power of the national will and through the form of a legislative enactment," receiving the sum of £1,765 per annum to accomplish its patriotic and Christ-like purpose, and that, too, in a country where vast sums are yearly expended in feeding the hungry, and in the too frequently unsuccessful attempts to cure the disease, to reform the crime, and to alleviate the poverty and misery directly resulting from the liquor traffic. Society is not only ignorant, but, we fear, inconsiderate, when it continues to lavish so much on palliatives and so little on the prevention of the drink system. Every commercial man affords a lesson to those sympathising with the objects of the Association. When anything abstracts or opposes their business, they will either remove it entirely or attempt to at once bridge it over. Hell's-gate at the mouth of New York harbour is an instance of the one, and the Tay bridge an instance of the other. The liquor traffic cannot be bridged over, but it can be removed. Ship-masters will not sail a leaky ship, strengthening the pumps in a vain attempt to keep her afloat, when they might at once beach her or dock her, and stop the leak. No physician would continue to imperil the lives of a community under his care by curing the plague-stricken, and yet all the time neglecting the source of the plague. Society, when it sees the liquor traffic is scuttling society, and that it is the worst of social plagues, will more fully avail itself of the services of the above energetic Association, that it may stop the leak and remove the plague spot. It has often appeared to me that people would readily believe that the Association is seeking after the distant and doing nothing for the immediate. There could not be a greater error. True, it is seeking legal power enabling the ratepayers to protect themselves from the public houses, but it is also doing much to disseminate sound temperance truth; and temperance societies can testify to the work of the Association in this way. It has rendered services in Parliamentary and municipal contests, availed itself of pulpits, mission platforms, instructed Foundry Boys' and Band of Hope meetings, never pausing in its efforts at creating an aversion in the public mind to the continuance of the drink system, and in turning multitudes from the beaten road of drunkenness to the paths of sobriety. I would suggest that all the members of the Association not only fall in with the suggestions given last month, but that they would look at the matter thus:—were they told that by bringing greater agencies into the field, the agitation would in proportion be brought more speedily to an end, they would, I believe, give much more liberally. If the income were raised to six-fold its present amount, the Association would in that proportion increase the power of the agitation. Let all wise friends take counsel on this matter; subscribe as much over their present amount as is possible, and ask their friends to subscribe, and the movement would advance by leaps and bounds. ### "THE WIFIE OWRE-BYE."

They said she was thriftless, a faithless bit body,
For on her puir back there was hardly a duddy;
She was aye toilin' inside and aye trottin' oot,
In the worst o' a' weathers aye wan'rin' aboot,
At the late oors o' nicht fin folk cheapest can buy:
An' the neebers aye ca'd her "The Wifie Owre-bye."

An' sair did they pity the gweed honest man,
That cam hame sae straucht wi' his pay in his han',
Fa ne'er fae the kirk on a Sunday was seen:
An' the puir raggit bairnies withoot hose or sheen.
"There's something wrang there," folk wad dimly cry—
They were sure she was drunken, the wifie owre-bye.

True the drink was at wark, but the wifie got nane—
'Twas the guid honest man—but he drank it alane;
It was hardly the thing for an elder, ye see,
Tae be seen at the public and honest spree.
But wi' mony a black curse and ill-shaipit name
The puir wifie was ordered tae bring the drink hame;
Then he'd drink himsel' fu' though his bairns wanted bread,
An' baith them an' their mither gied foodless tae bed;
In a moment o' kindness death steppit in bye,
An' ended the wrangs of the wifie owre-bye.

Fin her slender bit coffin they bore through the snaw,
A' the neeber-wives cried, "Sirs, it's weel she's awa'!"

The ill-used honest man noo might get a bit meat,
An' the puir raggit bairns nae wander the street;
An' as true as they said—nae mair raggit and fule,
But tidy an' trim, gied the bairns to the skule;
A stern maiden sister, wi' proud head an' high,
Held the place since weel filled by the wifie owre-bye.

Fin he'd cry for the drink amid anger an' strife, Sae quately she'd whisper, "Min' ye, I'm no yer wife!"

If ye try but ae inch o' hame duty tae shirk,
I'll tell oot what ye are, word for word i' the kirk."
Sin' he daurna tak' drink, he improved in his dress,
An' at hame there was nae sign o' want or distress;
But the peer outraged wifie lay cauld i' the clay:
Nane wad ken a' she bore till the great Judgment-day.
Fin they mark'd the great change a' the neebers wad
cry—

"Weel for them when she deet, yon wifie owre-bye!"

"Oh! where is God's justice?" we're tempted to cry,
Fin we think on the wrangs o' the wifie owre-bye.
Oh! fu' dinna the green turfs that hap her grey head
Cry oot tae the wail' a' the wrangs o' the dead?
But 'tis sinfu' to question the Maker on High—He'll avenge a' the wrangs o' the wifie owre-bye.

VARIETIES.

Why is a selfish friend like the letter "p"?—Because though the first in pity, he is the last in help.

A policeman who was kicked down stairs the other day said he felt as if his seat had been contested.

When people are ignorant, reckless, and prone to vicious indulgences, high wages are certainly not a blessing. In such cases, "sweet are the uses of adversity."

School Teacher (reprovingly) "Boys, boys, do you know what day this is?" Street boy, "Hi' fellers, here a cove as don't know what day this is; he must 'ave been on the spree."

THE SERVANT QUESTION.—"Followers" have always been a difficulty. We imagine there are faults on both sides. Ladies often show themselves as "unreasonable" as their female domestics. For example, although very solicitous for the settlement of their own daughters in life, they often do not give sufficient opportunities for their maid-servants to find husbands. A girl in service is quite as anxious to get a husband as her young mistresses, and, indeed, it is of much more consequence for her to do so. She sees her youth slipping away from her in a place where no "followers" are allowed, and it is no wonder that she "wants a change." She has a right to have her holidays and her "Sundays out," and it is the mistress's duty not only to grant them, but to make some inquiry as to how she spends them. Many ladies never take the smallest interest in the moral conduct of those to whom they stand, morally if not legally, in loco parentis, and who may, perhaps, have no other adviser.

MIDLOTHIAN AND LOCAL OPTION.—The deputation appointed some time ago at a meeting of prohibitory electors in this county were in London last month endeavouring to bring the claims of local option before the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, the county member. To the request made on behalf of the deputation by Mr. J. H. Waterston, secretary to the meeting, Mr. Gladstone sent a reply regretfully declining, on account of business engagements, to receive the deputation, but promising to give attention to any written communication from them. The deputation, relying on having an interview, had already gone to London. A memorial to the right honourable gentleman was, however, at once drawn up, referring to a memorial presented to him in November, 1879, hailing with satisfaction the evidences of his sympathy with their aims; representing that the opinion in Scotland in favour of local option was fully matured for legislation; and hoping that the injustice perpetrated on the Tyne-castle electors in November 1880, as brought before his notice in January last, would not be repeated. The memorial had the signatures of twenty electors, and was presented at Downing Street to Mr. W. H. and Mr. H. Gladstone, the sons of the Premier, who had been deputed to receive it, and to convey their father's assurance that it would have his best consideration. The deputation also endeavoured while in London to get the question of local option brought before the meeting of Scotch members, convened to discuss the question of local government and taxation, on the 12th ult., and had secured the support of several Scotch members in favour of its consideration at that meeting; but an unexpected turn in the proceedings at that meeting prevented this, so that for the present this matter is in abeyance. Although the deputation has not succeeded at this time, they have certainly not failed, seeing that they have been able to bring the matter of the local suppression of the liquor traffic before the Premier, the Lord Advocate, and a number of the Scotch members.

THE FUNDS.

* * * Members, friends, and Societies subscribing to the Funds of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are respectfully informed that Subscriptions to the Association, if not already paid, are now due, and will be gladly received by the Agents and at the Offices, 112 Bath Street, Glasgow. The demands upon the Association are increasing, and it would materially assist the Executive in promptly meeting these, were subscriptions paid in the former rather than the latter part of the financial year, which will close on 20th September, 1881.

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, JUNE, 1881.

* * * We are compelled, notwithstanding that we issue a supplement, to leave over our notices of the "Scottish Temperance League," "Glasgow Abstiners' Union," "Book Shelf," "How to conduct a Band of Hope," and much other interesting matter. Our literary contributors will, we hope, kindly possess their souls in patience, and we will overtake arrears by and by.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON'S NEW RESOLUTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, Bart., M.P., has given notice that on the 14th inst. he will move as first order of the day the following resolution:—

"That in the opinion of this House the resolution passed by this House on the 18th day of June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operations of the liquor traffic ought without delay to be embodied by the Government in a bill giving effect to the said resolution."

This resolution requires no words from us to recommend it heartily to our readers. Hitherto the friends of local option in Scotland have been foremost in the energy and determination of their support to Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Now when he presses the Government to redeem a promise which the feeling of Parliament constrained the Premier to make last year, we feel sure that they will redouble their efforts to increase the number of his supporters from Scotland. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association make in our columns a powerful appeal to the friends of the bill throughout the country. To that appeal we refer them. If they act as it suggests, the vote from Scotland will exceed the all but unanimous vote given by its representatives on the 18th June, last year. They cannot do less. We believe that they will do more.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Offices—112 Bath Street, Glasgow, May, 1881.

DEAR SIR,—We are desired by the Executive of this Association to respectfully remind you that Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M.P., intends to move in the House of Commons, on Tuesday, 14th June, a Resolution which is in the following terms:—

"That in the opinion of this House, the Resolution passed by the House on the 18th day of June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being entrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic, ought, without delay, to be embodied by the Government in a bill giving effect to the said Resolution."

That this step on the part of the Hon. Baronet is necessary is beyond doubt. Since the House adopted the Local Option Resolution not quite a year ago, more than one hundred and twenty millions sterling have been spent on alcoholic liquors, and more than one hundred and twenty thousand lives have been sacrificed. All the other evils which spring from that traffic continue to mark its devastating progress. Legislation for Ireland has reached an advanced stage, so that there is no visible reason for farther delay on the part of the Government to redeem their promise and deal with the liquor traffic on the lines of local option. To favorably impress the Government, an increased vote for Scotland is absolutely necessary. If the friends of a suppressive veto act on the forthcoming division as they have acted on similar occasions, an increased vote from Scotland is assured. With a grateful sense of your hearty co-operation in times past, they have earnestly to request your assistance at this time, in any or all of the following ways—

1st.—By forming one of a deputation to your representative, should he visit his constituency during the Whitsuntide holidays.

2nd.—By promoting Memorials from Church Courts, Temperance organizations, and other public bodies to Mr. Gladstone, the Home Secretary, and the Lord Advocate, and (if he is indifferent or opposed) to your own representative. It is important that these Members of the Government should know that there exists on the part of the community a positive determination to have the power to protect themselves against the operations of the licensing system.

3rd.—By convening District Conferences at which influential citizen Memorials might be adopted. The importance of this course is obvious.

4th.—By personally writing your representative (or representatives). Pointing out in courteous but forcible language the pressing necessity for legislation, and asking him to be in his place on Tuesday, 14th June, to vote with Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

In the opinion of the Executive—and their opinion is shared by every member of the House of Commons—this is by far the most effective way of supporting our champion; and if between this and the date of the division, every member of Parliament, especially those indifferent or opposed, were to hear from the larger portion of the electors they represent, it is believed that they themselves would combine to constrain the Government to redeem their promise in the immediate future.

You may rest assured that the publicans will exert themselves to the utmost to intimidate honourable members in order to diminish the voting on the 14th, and thus furnish the Government with an excuse for the tardy fulfilment of their promise. Their characteristic tactics can only be frustrated by the vigorous action of the friends of the resolution. To be of real service, your assistance must be prompt, and your letter to your representative be despatched by as early a post as possible after the receipt of this circular. Please address him—"House of Commons, London, S.W." As it has been necessary to send a deputation to London on the eve of divisions, one has been appointed to go to London next month. It will be satisfactory to you to know that the prohibitory deputations from Scotland have earned a reputation in the House for their ability, vigilance, and energy. Should you be in London between the 8th and 14th June, you are earnestly requested to join the one now appointed. Its headquarters will be at the Offices of the United Kingdom Alliance, 52 Parliament Street, Westminster, London, S.W. The Secretary, Mr. Mackay, will afford you all needful information. The efforts of the deputation will be strengthened, and their influence over your representative increased if you will kindly let the secretary know that you have written your member in view of the 14th, and especially if you also let him know the nature of the reply your member has sent to your communication.

They rely upon your vigorous promptitude and co-operation.

We are, dear sir, your obedient servants,

JAMES HAMILTON, J.P., President.
 JAMES TORRENS, J.P., Chairman of Executive.
 THOS. DICK, Vice-Chairman of Executive.
 JAMES L. SELKIRK, J.P., Hon. Secretary.
 ROBERT M'CALLUM, Treasurer.
 ROBERT MACKAY, Secretary.

It has been decided by the Home Office that there are to be additional Circuit Courts in Scotland. Very sorry to hear it. But when we get our Permissive Bill passed into law, there will be three "maiden" courts out of every four. Cases of serious crime, apart from drinking, are rare in Scotland.

"The Temperance Reformation from a Medical Point of View." By James Murray M'Culloch, M.D., Dumfries.—We cordially welcome this talented exposition of our question. Our readers have here a pamphlet of 20 pages dealing with those advanced views advocated by Dr. M'Culloch at a time when few of the medical profession could be found who were not decidedly opposed to them. This pamphlet will meet now with a genial welcome from great numbers of the medical profession. Dr. M'Culloch founds, on the medical point of view, the soundest of all arguments for the prohibition of the liquor traffic. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are prepared to sell them in quantities of 50 for 3s., 100 for 6s., and so on, carriage unpaid; or at one penny each; six copies for sixpence; twelve copies for one shilling, post free. Orders should be sent in at once to prevent disappointment. Our friends will render valuable service by taking a number of copies for distribution.

Of the numerous developments of publican concussion so manifest in the present day, that of the tribe located in Sarnia, Ontario, Canada, is most entitled to be called frantically stupid. These have struck against the Scott Act. Home Secretary Bruce tried to impose certain legal restrictions on the London "cabbies," but they, knowing the vast inertia inherent and acquired in human nature, struck, and effectively threw off the legal yoke. Bakers, menacing the enjoyment which Killing Pace finds in his morning rolls, have before now extorted an extra shilling a week from their distracted employers trembling lest Killing Pace should withdraw his custom. Domestic servants in Dundee struck, hoisted their "flags" as indicative of their determination to be "even with their misses," secured a night out for themselves, and access for eager followers ever so often a-week. These and other strikes have put human nature into extremes, and compelled surrender. Can the publicans really expect to do that? Perhaps so with those who have been trained whisky tasters all through life, but with how many more? Eight and forty hours' abstinence will conquer the drink appetite raging in the bosoms of the most of drink-enthralled people, and it will be one of the sweetest moments of their life when they find themselves surviving the strike of the unscrupulous dram-seller. Fancy a town without gas, and you may have a vivid conception of discomfort, or a city deprived of honest water, and you may realize the worth of the water now that the well is dry, but when you fancy a town with the publicans on strike or suppressed, you can only conceive a sense of intense relief, the reviving hopes of a bright future, and a joy over all, such as emancipation afforded to liberated slaves. 'The meanest wretches that ever trod, the deepest sunk in want and sorrow, would stand erect in self-respect before God's teeming earth,' after the publicans' three-days' strike. We hope that the Sarnia publicans' example may be infectious, and that the prohibitionists there may be watchful and vigilant, urging the tremulous sot to hold on, and the strike will be the making of him. Other strikes may mar the party struck at, but this strike will make him. It will make him sober! What a satisfaction to the tippler to realize total abstinence, with all the permanent blessings of which it is the abundant source! It is having joy, doing well, and being good.

It is one of the most hopeful indications of the near approach of the final and decisive issue of the Permissive Prohibitory agitation that the women in the United States, Canada, Great Britain, and Ireland, are manifesting so great an interest in and so warm a sympathy with the efforts put forth in its behalf. Every woman who is concerned about the eternal interests of her erring and sinful sisters is forced to the conviction, that until the law puts its iron heel on the neck of the liquor traffic the most of Christian effort to save the fallen will be like water spilt upon the ground. As fast as they can rescue the fallen, a new race arises to be tempted, through our drinking customs and our public houses, to fall, to wallow in the mire of folly and sin, to be rescued again and again, and yet many of them, after all, to fall back finally into the fearful pit, and become embedded in the miry clay. Miss White, the secretary of the Glasgow Prayer Union Branch of the British Women's Temperance Association, whose efforts in connection with intemperance are beyond praise, wrote a letter to the papers, which we gladly reproduce, as it so clearly shows how the victims and those who devote themselves to their rescue realize the countervailing power of the liquor traffic to all moral reform. She says:—

"A deputation of eight ladies were appointed by the Women's Temperance Prayer Union to present a memorial to the Magistrates against granting any new licenses, but the Lord Provost having kindly offered to present the memorial and to support its prayer, they do not appear with the other deputations in the Council Chambers to-day. Recently, when so many Christians in Glasgow were partaking of the bread and wine in remembrance of the Saviour's dying love, I went into the cells of our great Female Prison to tell them that the love of Christ reached even to them, and that Jesus was both able and willing to save them from their sins. As I climbed the long staircase, passing flat after flat of dreary cells, the wail of the poor little babies, sharing the imprisonment of their drunken mothers, fell sadly on my ears. I saw thirteen prisoners, twelve of whom told me they were there 'for being drunk.' One woman said she had been often there; she felt it a great disgrace the first time, but now she did not mind it—going to prison just hardened them. 'Why do the Magistrates,' she said, 'license so many whisky shops? They're at every corner, and we can't pass them.' I did not attempt to answer her question. It would have puzzled wiser heads than mine to have made her comprehend why our Magistrates and Justices grant nearly 2000 licenses to a trade which crowds our prison cells with hopeless, degraded men and women, to be kept at the public expense. So I said, 'Would you like if every whisky shop in Glasgow were shut up to-morrow?' 'Yes, I would,' she replied, and the other women said the same. 'But,' I said, 'if they were all shut, you would seek out some hole-and-corner place to get the drink.' 'No, we would not,' the woman said; 'we don't care for the drink here; we care for a cup of tea, but it's the temptations of the whisky shops we can't stand.' I left the prison sad at heart. In the name of the women of Glasgow, who are such sufferers from the licensed drink traffic, I ask how long is the present state of things to last. Has Christianity no remedy?"

We answer, without hesitation, that the only remedy that Christianity has, and can effectively apply to the evils of the liquor traffic, is its exclusion from burghs, parishes, and districts, by a majority vote of the rate-payers; we say the only remedy, because it is God's remedy of Prohibition voluntarily applied, and further, we affirm our unwavering belief, which all good Christians yet will share, that the Church will never do the will of her great Head, nor, as the heavenly Jerusalem, appear on earth until that traffic—the enemy of all godliness—is for ever banished from her table.

The revised edition of the New Testament seems to be meeting with much adverse criticism from parties at issue on other points. The one thinks that it is too Conservative; the other too much disposed to change. Neither are pleased. It would have been better that the revisers on many points had shown less timidity and better scholarship. What is generally alleged against them as regards their treatment of the whole text applies with equal force to their treatment of those texts which refer to the temperance question. Generally they have improved the text, and specially many new renderings bring out more fully the harmony of temperance with the New Testament. We were a little startled to find one of the texts referring to our blessed Saviour on the cross. Matthew had it, when offered vinegar, "He received it not." The reviewers changed vinegar to wine, which seemed as if the revision was to be reactionary; but a moment's thought on the subject showed that Mark was right and Matthew in error. Christ refused in his last hours the deceitful support of liquor. And both statements harmonize. He knows that "wine is a mocker." We have, "Neither do men put new wine into old wineskins, else the skins burst, the wine is spilled, and the skins perish." Again we have, "Woe unto the world because of occasions of stumbling, for it must needs be that occasions come, but woe unto that man through whom the occasion cometh." The Passover passages, in which it is said Christ commemorated his last supper with "the fruit of the vine," are all retained. The miracle at Cana of Galilee is duly recorded, but "well drunk" is replaced by "drunk freely," a better rendering. "Let your moderation be known to all men" has disappeared, and in its stead we have "Let your forbearance be known to all men." "Avoid all appearance of evil" is now "Abstain from every form of evil." "Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess," is now "wherein is riot." "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake," reads now "Be no longer a drinker of water," etc. All these are decided gains. The text, "That the aged men be sober, grave, temperate, etc.," stands now "that the aged men be temperate, grave, sober-minded, etc." "That the aged women may train the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children," is now "to be sober-minded, etc." For the time past of your life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles when we walked in . . . excess of wine, revellings, banquettings," is now "wine-bibbings, revellings, carousings." "They think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you," is retained, but on the margin we have, "flood of riot." "The end of all things is at hand, be ye therefore sober," is now "the end of all things is at hand, be ye therefore of sound mind, and be sober unto prayer," "Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion walketh about," stands "be sober, be watchful, etc." There is great cause for rejoicing even in this hasty survey of those passages over which, for so many years, the champions of temperance have contended so manfully with the sons of night and darkness. The revision, although we do not think it by any means so good as it might have been, or as it will yet be, rejects many loose renderings, replacing them with emendations that lend additional support to the temperance cause. There are yet texts which we expected would have appeared so glaringly in need of revision allowed to stand as they were; but they have lost the support of some of the most famous passages on which the convivialists relied. Dr. Lees, Rev. D. Burns, Dr. Mudge, James M'Nair, and many others who have earnestly contended for a faithful translation, must rejoice to find that their contentions have been so generally allowed to be right. To all the temperance reformers the appearance of this version is fitted to be a stimulus in the good work of bringing about a sober world, and should beget, in their minds, the conviction that farther research and farther light can only result in greater harmony between the conclusions from the works, and those from the word of God; and in their hearts a deeper and stronger love for that manner of life which is marked by the rational use of things beneficial, and the entire abandonment of things pernicious.

In the small hours of the morning of Saturday, 14th ult., a most mischievous proposal was recommended for Parliamentary sanction. That proposal was one to turn by the mere consent of the Inland Revenue authorities all our railway carriages into liquor bars and drinking boxes. No such proposal giving similar facilities to drunkenness and disorder has been laid before Parliament during the last fifty years. The Beer Bill that so widely opened the floodgates of intemperance did not contemplate the invasion of home by the beer seller, or compel the soberminded to visit the beer vault. The Wine Bill which has, in the other parts of the empire, played havoc with the constitution and character of women did not compel the soberly disposed to consort with them, nor condemn them to have their feelings outraged by the sight of the dreadful excesses which have ruined so many of their fair sisters. This proposal was so artfully conceived that it could have been no longer possible to avoid being a witness, however unwilling, of drinking and drunkenness in every stage, during long or short distance journeys. The operation of the clauses embodied in this proposal practically annul in railways the line of demarcation between the drinker and the abstainer. Its effects upon the life and habits of those that too easily yield to the allurements of strong drink can hardly be measured; that they would be injurious cannot be gainsaid; that they would be often fatal cannot be doubted. We rejoice that a proposal which would have had the tendency to debase many of the travelling public, and outrage the feelings of so many more, has had to be so promptly withdrawn because of the menaces of the temperance and prohibitory reformers, reinforced by the general sentiments of the country. It is satisfactory to find that there is opinion in the country strong enough to resist any reactionary legislation on the drink traffic or drinking customs. Of one thing we are now assured, that the community will not permit of the farther extension of the already too ample legalized facilities to intemperance. But we do not share the feelings of those who think that we have seen the last of this proposal. We know that the mainstay of the national taxation is the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquors. We know too that through the enforced sobriety of hard times the revenue from that source has greatly diminished: and we know that there are many who are more anxious that the revenue should advance by leaps and bounds than about the source from which it is derived. There is therefore as many temptations to increase the revenue by tapping the traffic through new methods, hence there is no hope of resting and being thankful so long as the dreadful traffic is felt to be necessary to the prosperity of the country. We certainly would have been better pleased if the Premier had, in withdrawing his proposal, rather shown his aversion to it than merely thrown it overboard for want of time. He seems to have yielded to the pressure of the public most ungracefully, and bows to the inevitable rather than to the right. We cannot but feel sorry at this, but at the same time we believe that we speak the sentiments of every true friend of his country when we say that let that proposal revive and it will meet from the moral and social reformers of this country the most uncompromising opposition. We are not yet unanimous on putting down liquor selling in this land entirely, but we are unanimous in this, that publicans in the guise of railway shareholders and excise officers shall not transform our railway carriages into liquor bars and drinking boxes.

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—V.

April 25.—Mr. Cowen asked the Home Secretary whether it was true that the owner of a public-house in the neighbourhood of King's Cross, where a Radical Club had advertised lectures to take place, had been threatened with the loss of its license should these lectures continue. The Home Secretary would enquire. He never heard of this before.

26.—Mr. Clark gave notice that that day four weeks he would move that Bills which had passed their second reading but had not become law in one session should the next session be resumed at the stage of committee.

27.—Col. Barne introduced a Bill, which was read a first time, for the better security of the purity of beer. (Laughter.)

28.—Mr. Courtenay, replying to Mr. Coan, said that when the attention of the Government had been called to the alleged traffic in English girls, between this country and the Continent, Mr. Slagg had been deputed to Brussels to watch proceedings and make inquiries, with the result that several prosecutions had taken place and five notorious persons had been imprisoned. One of the principal delinquents had escaped to France, but he was to be tried there, and Mr. Slagg would be present on behalf of this Government at the trial.

29.—Mr. Hugh Mason gave notice that that day four weeks he would move that the Parliamentary franchise should be extended to women who possess the qualifications of men, and who in all matters of local government have the right of voting.

—Sir Charles Dilke, in reply to Mr. Pease, said that the views of Sir Thomas Watson on the subject of opium taxation had not been received.

THE OPIUM TRAFFIC DEBATE.

—Mr. J. W. Pease moved the following resolution:—"That, in the opinion of this House, the opium trade, as now carried on between India and China, is opposed alike to Christian and international morality, and is instrumental in effecting the physical and moral degradation of thousands of Chinese, and ought not to be continued in the manner in which it is at present conducted; that, while believing that the careful development of the resources of India, combined with economy in expenditure, would provide for any gradual loss of revenue which the adoption of the policy indicated in the foregoing resolution might entail, nevertheless this House is prepared to give such aid to the Government of India as, in the opinion of this House, may be requisite; that, in the opinion of this House, it is due to the Government of China that the 3rd clause of the 3rd section of the Convention signed by his Excellency Sir Thomas Wade at Chefoo, on September 13, 1876, should be ratified by the Government of Her Majesty without demanding from the Government of China modifications of its original terms." In doing so, he said he desired, when negotiations were going on between this Government and that of China, to draw attention to this matter, and pointed out the Prime Minister's expressed anxiety about taking steps to withdraw gradually from all connection with the opium traffic. He also pointed to the petitions which during the last four weeks poured in from all parts against the continuance of this traffic. It was only a generation ago that our forefathers had put their hands into their pockets and paid £20,000,000 to slaveholders because they looked on the slave traffic as immoral. Another country, which had not found itself able to take so bold a line on the question of slavery, had at length found itself obliged to face difficulty, which cost it £700,000,000 or £800,000,000 and the loss of thousands of lives. If we were unable to do away with the immoral opium trade, a day of retribution would certainly come. It was said that opium was a very useful drug. So it was, but it could not be long used with impunity, nor could it be sold in this country without a register being kept of each sale. He was surprised at the reasoning of the Postmaster-General, reasoning unworthy of so candid and straightforward a mind. His right hon. friend said he could see no difference between the revenue raised in this country from the drink traffic and that raised in India from opium. The difference lay in this that the consumption of drink was by our fellow-countrymen and that of opium by foreigners. By far the greatest portion of the revenue from drink was paid by those who used it as a harmless luxury. As to the argument that if the trade were stopped smuggling would begin, that was a question for the Chinese Government. Then we were told that if we did not export it, someone else would. This reminded him of the fellow that continued to rob rather than that another should do it, while all the while he pitied his victim. After submitting evidence of the deleterious character of the drug, he pointed out how the Government had suppressed 41 out of 68 opium shops in Burmah; and he had to ask how the traffic, which was so detrimental in Burmah, could be a blessing in China? After narrating the origin of the traffic, he said only last year a treaty was entered upon between America and China. One of the articles of that treaty was that all traffic in opium was forbidden, and also that no American ship could become an opium trader—a fact that showed that the Chinese were sincere in their desire to put an end to the opium traffic. (Hear, hear.) He had to ask the House, once again, why the treaty entered into by Sir Thomas Wade was not ratified, seeing that one of its stipulations was that the Chinese might impose the li-kin duties, which would in effect put an end to the traffic? Yet, after the lapse of five years, that treaty was never ratified. The question was one of revenue, and that alone. It was not a question of acquiring a revenue, but of the manner of acquiring it, and, being acquired at the expense of the debauchery of a nation, must be condemned by all right-minded people. (Hear, hear.) It was not a safe revenue they got from the traffic; it was, indeed, very precarious. The Chinese Government might some morning put an end to this foul trade, and if they did so he felt sure that they would gain the sympathy not only of the English people, but of the Government and people of every civilized country in the world. He believed that the ordinary sources of Indian revenue would be sufficient, if economically managed, for the requirements of the country. (Hear, hear.) He would now move his resolution.

Sir J. Kennaway believed that by a gradual process, in which if they were assisted heartily by the Chinese, the evil could be put an end to. Every consideration of justice, honour, morality, and expediency required them to look this question in the face. They were bound to retrace their steps and reverse their policy, if they were satisfied that it was a wrong policy. In this way he was sure they would relieve the national conscience from a stain which was increasingly felt every year. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Onslow believed that even to attempt the gradual extinction of the opium traffic would be fatal to the revenues of India. Those who advised such a policy were the same persons who wished to do away with the use of alcoholic liquors, the smoking of tobacco, and vaccination—in one word, the crotchet-mongers of the country, who were impressed with the Exeter Hall ideas of Christian morality. (Hear, hear.) If the Government of India did so, it could not stop there. It would also have to do away with the duty on salt, as it was contrary to Christian morality to tax a necessary of life. If these two sources of revenue were dried up, he could not see where the Government could recoup itself for the loss so as to be able to carry out the great public works which were essential to the civilisation of India. (Hear, hear.) What assurance had they that the Chinese would give up the use of the drug, seeing that the growth of it was on the increase in China itself? In fact, though the Chinese Government publicly protested against it, they secretly encouraged it, and that was a convincing proof that it was not so deleterious as it was alleged to be. He cared very little for the petitions on the subject, as the signatories knew nothing whatever of the subject. Supposing, however, there was the least tinge of immorality in the trade, yet, considering that all the revenue derived from it was devoted to the amelioration of the people of India, they should prefer their advantage to the morality of the Chinese, who did not appear to be physically deteriorated by the use of it for generations past. On the contrary, it enabled them to increase the population. (Laughter.) They were skilled mechanics and strong labourers, and might turn round and say, if you wish to put an end to immorality, begin at home and put down the liquor traffic. (Hear, hear.) He did not say that he was in favour of that crotchet. The revenue of England could not bear the loss of the excise duties, neither could the revenue of India bear the loss of the opium tax, and he only mentioned this to show how far a regard to these crotchets would lead them.

Mr. Laing said that the total suppression of the opium traffic would mean the absolute and entire financial ruin of India. The average net revenue from the opium traffic was six and a half millions a year. The use of opium was voluntary, and the Chinese were not compelled to smoke it any more than the people of Scotland were obliged to drink whisky. The hon. member who brought forward this matter wanted the House to be moral and charitable at the expense of the poor Indian taxpayers.

Dr. Cameron fully admitted that the people of India did not desire the suppression of the opium traffic, because they did not desire the imposition of farther taxation. The product of the tax did not go to relieve Indian population, but had been devoted to the Afghan war. What he complained of was not that opium was introduced into China, but that it was forced upon the Chinese, who, however, manifested so great a repugnance to the trade as to alarm those responsible for the finances of India. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. O'Donnell said that he was satisfied that Indian financiers would soon have to do without the opium revenue; for if the Chinese Government were to declare to-morrow that they would not allow the trade to be forced upon them again, they might do it with the moral certainty that the English people would not enter upon another opium war.

The Marquis of Hartington said that from a revenue point of view the revenue from opium was of immense importance. They were bound to recollect, moreover, the liability of India to famine, and that every famine involved this country in a greatly increased expenditure. Was that expenditure always to take the form of a permanent increase to our debt, or were we in prosperous years to make provision for it? (Hear, hear.) This was a revenue which the people of India might be found in favour of retaining, and though this might not be held to be a conclusive argument in favour of its retention, it could not be safely disregarded. It might be the lot of the House to consider a vote towards the relief of India, and it would be a serious matter to find that, without having at all improved the condition of China, they had damaged the resources of India by relinquishing this trade. If the revenue from opium was an immoral one, no doubt the feeling in this country would be increasingly in favour of some change, and it would be necessary for those who were responsible for the government of India to see whether the revenue could not be derived from other sources. It would, in the first place, be necessary, however, that clear and conclusive proof was given that the revenue was an immoral one, and that the abandonment of the existing system would do any good to China at all. It would be necessary to show, further, that the Chinese desired it, and that their Government was able to suppress the opium traffic which arose in China itself, and that it was only our arrangements that prevented its total abolition in China. Lord Hartington quoted several authorities to show that the use of opium was not only not always deleterious, but that often it had a beneficial effect. The revenue derived from opium was undoubtedly precarious, and the subject was one which from time to time had been brought under the notice of the Government of India. He certainly thought the time had come when the matter ought to be considered, and the present Finance Minister of India was fully alive to the importance of it. It should be recollected, however, that the object of the Government of India had always been to restrict the sale of the drug amongst their own population as much as possible, whereas, if they no longer manufactured it, but left it in the hands of private firms, whose object it was to push their business as much as possible, the evil would necessarily be increased rather than diminished, while, at the same time, the revenue would suffer very seriously. The time had come when, unquestionably, the whole subject was worthy of reconsideration, and some change not only possible, but even desirable.

Alderman Fowler said—The noble Marquis asked how those who wished to see the abolition of the revenue derived in India from opium proposed to make good the consequent loss. That was an argument of which he fully appreciated the force. He felt, however, that the conduct of this country in connection with the opium trade was the greatest blot upon the escutcheon of the English people. By the fault partly of our forefathers and partly by our own fault, our position was this, that it was very difficult for India to do without the opium revenue. The only way to act was to imitate our conduct at the time of the abolition of slavery, and to make a sacrifice for the purpose of getting rid of a national evil. The House had voted millions to get rid of slavery, and would be prepared to make a substantial sacrifice to be rid of any complicity in the evils that resulted from the consumption of opium. In conclusion, he would remind the House that the East India Company had put on record their views in these words:—"If it were possible to put an end to the use of the drug altogether, except for medical purposes, we would gladly do it in compassion to mankind."—(Hear, hear.)

After Sir G. Campbell and Mr. Storer had addressed the House, the motion was, by leave, withdrawn.

—Mr. Gladstone, on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, replying to Mr. Storer, could hold out no hope for amending the bill so as to give relief to the labourer who complained that when he brewed only two bushels for harvest, he was subjected to a higher duty or licence than he paid under the malt tax, but suggested that the proper time for raising the question would be when the bill got into committee. The bill was then read a second time.

May 2.—Mr. Gladstone, in answer to Capt. Aylmer, said it would not be more correct to estimate the probable profit from the alteration of the differential tax—if he might so call it—upon spirits at a million rather than £180,000, as he had estimated it in the Budget. He had no hesitation in saying that it would be most grossly incorrect. Capt. Aylmer suggested half a million. Mr. Gladstone—In our opinion, that would be still grossly inaccurate.

WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL.

May 4.—Mr. Roberts moved the second reading of this bill. He said that an earnest and almost universal desire had been manifested for Sunday closing in Wales. Petitions, with 267,000 signatures, had been presented on behalf of the bill, being equal to more than a third of the entire adult population of Wales. Town Councils, Local Boards, School Boards, Boards of Guardians, and religious associations had also petitioned in its favour. In 1879-80 there was a complete canvass of the whole of North Wales, and though 44 parishes were silent, about four-fifths of the whole number of ratepayers in North Wales voted. Out of 78,435 voters, 75,510 were in favour of Sunday closing, 989 were against it, and 1936 neutral, or 76 to 1 were for Sunday closing. These returns have never been seriously challenged. In Wrexham, a town which is supposed to be very much in the interest of the brewers, there voted 1161 for and only 119 against closing. The opinion of the whole body of publicans was strongly in favour of the bill. Out of 1173 who offered an opinion, 792 were favourable, 152 against, and 229 neutral; so that five-sixths of the publicans of Wales are themselves in favour of this measure. All the work of canvassing was carried out with the expenditure of very little money and without the employment of one paid official. Now, what is the opinion of the members for Wales? To that test he could appeal with the greatest confidence. (Cheers.) The Welsh members number 30, and of the 28 who sit on this (the Liberal) side of the House, all, without a single exception, are in favour of the bill. (Cheers.) Of the Conservatives, we have the support of the half of them. (Laughter.) The Government supported the Irish Sunday Closing Bill because the support it received was three to one; the support which this bill receives is twenty-nine to one. (Cheers.) Then let me appeal to the House, and especially to the Government, to help the Welsh members to pass this bill into law during the present session. (Cheers.) Legislation on the subject for England must sooner or later take place, and whenever it does take place, it must be of advantage to the Government to have the experience of the working of this measure in Wales. The passing of the bill will give great satisfaction to the people of Wales. None of them wishing any of the large towns exempted from the operation of the bill, it will secure a much-needed day's rest to the publicans and those whom they employ, and will tend to check drunkenness and promote peace and order on the Sabbath day. He begged to move that the bill be now read a second time. (Cheers.)

Mr. Warton said if the overwhelming feeling of the people of Wales and the publicans of Wales was favourable to Sunday closing—if the Welsh would not drink and the Welsh publicans would not sell—how was it that the public-houses were so prosperous? Why could the publicans not take out six-day licenses? He asked the public-houses to be kept open on Sundays for the sake of those tourists who came to see the beautiful scenery in Wales. They would be cheating the tourists by shutting up the public-houses of Wales. The attempt to legislate separately for a section of the country was a dangerous principle.

Mr. Rathbone referred to the great unanimity manifested on this question in Wales, and said when we had the experience of two other large parts of Her Majesty's dominions—Scotland and Ireland—that legislation in favour of Sunday closing had been eminently successful, and when we see that every argument which led the House to adopt the measures for Scotland and Ireland applies with still greater force and is still more unanswerable in the case of Wales, and that there are fewer difficulties and dangers to encounter, surely we have made out an unassailable case for granting to Wales the boon we now ask for her. (Cheers.) It is not possible to find a single Scotch member, after the long experience they have had of the working of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, voting against this bill. The House knows very well that there is no part of Her Majesty's dominions—I believe there is no part of the world—in which religion has such an abiding and powerful influence over the habits and life of the people as in Wales. That being so, it is clear that you will have the whole force of the feeling as well as of the opinion of the Welsh people in support of the law. It is impossible, taking all that has been said and done into account, to have a more conclusive case than that which has been made out on behalf of Wales.

Mr. Carbutt spoke in favour of the bill.

Mr. Daly, after a taunt at the Welsh members for voting against Home Rule, said—But if the great preponderance was in favour of Sunday closing, it was a dangerous principle to allow the majority to exercise a tyrannical influence over the minority. It would be better for the publicans wishing the bill to pass to close voluntarily, and of the people who petition to abstain, than to override the wishes of those who only desired a reasonable use of the public-house.

Mr. M. Lloyd supported the bill, and said that tourists would not suffer for a little enforced abstinence. The law was necessary, as one publican could refuse to take out a six-days' license, and thus attempt to secure the whole trade of his district.

Mr. Onslow thought the Welsh were entitled to get credit for their general temperance, but he saw no resemblance between a Welsh and an Irish Sunday Closing Bill. The Irish bill was wanted because of the drunkenness that prevailed, but the Welsh were a sober people. The bill was merely a Sabbatarian one. He believed it lay on the lines of mere sentimental legislation, and if he could get any one to join him he would certainly divide the House against the bill.

Mr. O. Morgan, after maintaining the distinct nationality of Wales, and referred to an hon. member calling the Welsh ignorant, and barbarous as compared with the English, said he would sooner have a sober barbarian than a civilised sot. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion, he would ask the House not to be influenced in coming to a decision on this subject, by gentlemen who can know nothing of the merits of the case. He would ask them to give the people of Wales a boon which is demanded by nearly the whole of the inhabitants, and which is supported by every Welsh member but one, in the House.

Mr. James said that South Wales, like North Wales, was practically unanimous on this bill. As to the refreshment question, the local railways were not used on Sundays, and the feeling was decidedly against Sunday travelling, so the question need not trouble any hon. member. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. O'Sullivan, in voting against, did so as it was class legislation. It was unfair to close the public houses one day in seven, but if they were to be allowed to open a little, he would not oppose the reading. This was a working man's question and not a publican or a members' question. The interest of hon. members was sentimental and not practical; but as it was wrong that working men should be deprived of the public house on Sunday, he should vote against the bill.

Mr. Blake referred at great length to the benefits which accrued from Sunday closing in Ireland and prohibition in the north-west territory in Canada, and said that the inhabitants in the latter would never repeal the law. He cordially congratulated the members for Wales upon their unanimity on this matter. He was happy to see there was every prospect of the passing of the promoters' bill. Seeing that there was such an amount of unanimity among the Welsh members, and that they were supported by the strong feeling of their constituents, he trusted that the present measure would prove to be only the forerunner of total closing in Wales, and which he hoped for the sake of the morality, happiness, and progress of the people, would soon be the case in the whole of the three kingdoms. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Kinnear lauded the operations of the Sunday Closing Act in Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone remarked that those who spoke against the bill did not represent Wales, and they have said nothing effective against it nor moved its rejection. The closing of public houses is a matter to be decided not by individual preferences. This is a matter in which the opinion of the country has been sufficiently tested. It has not been in the past the habit of Parliament to look to Welsh opinion or interests as an independent factor in the constitution of this country as has been done with reference to Ireland. Where there is, however, a distinctly Welsh opinion, as in the present case, involving no inconvenience or danger to the Empire, I know no reason why there should not be respectful regard shown to it, and the desire of the Welsh people, when it is perfectly universal, should be kindly entered into by Parliament. (Hear, hear.) This is simply a question of police, and police regulations varied in the different parts of the kingdom. There is in this House an energetic party who propose that the regulation and control of the sale of spirituous liquors should be placed in the hands of the parish or local community; and those who do not go so far as my hon. friend the member for Carlisle, admit that this ought to be done to a considerable extent. This is a question in which, within due limits, local option may be safely allowed to have very considerable weight, and if so we may join with that modest claim on the part of Wales; and I think that the House would do well to give kindly attention to the wishes of the people of Wales in this matter. Don't let those who are alarmed in England at the adoption of such a bill be afraid that it will decide one way or another any such proposal for this country, or in any way sensibly influence it. Any proposal made with regard to England will have to be decided according to the public opinion of the country. I give no opinion upon the question with respect to England, and I do not think that hon. members will act wisely if they consider that it will be likely to affect England, because it is quite clear that my hon. friend (Mr. Stevenson) will not propose such a bill as this for England, unless public opinion is with him. But in Wales this question of Sunday closing has reached such maturity as to leave no doubt as to the opinion with regard to it. I cannot conceive any assertion of any kind that can be made safely with regard to Wales if we may not make the assertion that it is the earnest desire of the people of Wales, in the interest of the country, in the interest of the population, and in the interest of the fathers of families in Wales, that this bill should be passed. The Welsh, so far as I have ever had the means of judging, are, upon the whole, and especially as you come among the poor Welsh, a very sober people. You may say that if they are a very sober people, they are the less in need of this bill. Yes, that may be true. But is that a reason why the bill should not be passed? Is there no such thing as the temptation to drunkenness? If the condition of the people with regard to the use of spirituous liquors has been improved up to such a point that the people almost without exception are desirous to set aside this temptation, would it not be a cruel thing on the part of Parliament if we, on the invitation of members who do not represent Wales, and have no title to speak on its behalf, were to refuse to set that temptation aside? I hope that this bill may proceed to its second reading without division. If there were a division, I feel confident it would be accepted by an overwhelming majority of the House, and I further hope that after it has passed the second reading, there will be no disposition on the part of any hon. members who may object to the bill, to seek opportunities of obstructing its progress through the forms of the House in the present state of public business, and that they will honourably and kindly allow it to pass forward to take its place in the Statute Book. (Ministerial cheers.)

Mr. Hussy Vivian said after what had fallen from the Prime Minister, he felt that the Government should give assistance in passing the bill through this session. He hoped in the case of obstruction that they would receive the assistance of the Government.

Mr. P. A. Taylor challenged a division. The object of this bill is to allow a majority to trample on a minority. The tyranny of the individual is to be replaced by the tyranny of the majority. We are now come to a condition of things in which we are told what a man should not eat and what he should not drink, and on what scale he should drink, and I do not know why we should not allow the majority to decide how he should be clothed. The question is not a local but a national one—a question of individual freedom. I offer my humble protest against this and all similar bills.

Col. Makens said with reference to the appeal just made by the Prime Minister, that if the Conservatives abstained from taking a division on this bill, they were not to be understood as admitting the principle as applied to England. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Shaw admitted the benefits of the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act, but thought philanthropists were overdoing the thing. The remedy for drinking was to be found in other channels. If the philanthropists used their money in endeavouring to raise the moral and social position of the people, they would begin to find their objects realised.

Sir E. Reed said that he was perfectly astonished at the enormous preponderance of public sentiment in favour of this measure. The movement was not simply a religious movement only, but had the warm support of the people as a whole. Not less than 82 per cent. of the people of Cardiff were in favour of the measure, and only about 4 per cent. were found prepared to declare against it. He hoped that the bill would be allowed to pass all its stages without opposition. The House then divided, and there voted:—

For the second reading, ...	163
Against, ... ..	17
Majority, ... ..	146

The bill was then read a second time.

The following Scotch members voted for the bill,—G. Anderson, G. Armistead, J. B. Balfour, J. C. Bolton, Hon. Preston Bruce, Dr. Cameron, Dr. J. A. Campbell, Major Campbell, J. Cowan, A. O. Ewing, Dr. Farquharson, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Sir A. H. Gordon, A. Grant, Major Hamilton, F. Henderson, W. Holms, C. F. McIntosh, P. M'Lagan, E. Noel, C. S. Parker, R. W. C. Patrick, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, C. Tennent, G. O. Trevelyan, Dr. Webster, S. Williamson—27.

Not one Scotch representative voted against it.

May 6.—The Earl of Camperdown moved the second reading of the Municipal Franchise (Scotland) Bill in the House of Lords, and it was at once read a second time.

In the House of Commons, Lord F. Cavendish in reply to Mr. Elliot, said that the practice of Excise officials employed in breweries soliciting orders for sacharometers and the like, was distinctly prohibited by their instructions. The Government were not aware of any case having occurred, and an instance, if known, would be visited with severe displeasure.

May 12.—In the House of Lords, the Earl of Camperdown brought up the report of the amendments on the Municipal Franchise (Scotland) Bill, which were agreed to.

May 13.—This bill was read a third time.

May 14.—In the list of resolutions in "Committee of Ways and Means" adopted this day, stands the following,—“Resolved, that there shall be charged and paid upon every license for the sale of intoxicating liquors and tobacco in any carriage used for the conveyance of passengers on any railway, the excise duty of £5.

Mr. Wm. Fowler gave notice to move in going into Committee on the Customs, etc., bill,—“That any system of grant of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors in railway carriages will be injurious to the public.

May 16.—These resolutions duly reported to the House and agreed to, with instructions to the Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill that they had power to make provisions therein pursuant to the said resolutions.

CONFISCATION AND COMPENSATION.

May 16.—Mr. Gladstone speaking on the Irish Land Bill said—“Before I speak on this bill, the second reading of which we are now considering, I wish to refer to two words which we have often repeated during the course of this debate—the word ‘confiscation,’ and the word ‘compensation.’ They are words that are in close association together, for I should certainly be very slow to deny that where confiscation can be proved, compensation ought to follow. But I must say that these words are used too frequently and too soon, they are almost stock expressions—(Cheers)—on debate on certain classes of questions. They have been repeatedly again and again been urged and with the greatest confidence where in some cases no proof has been shown, and where in other cases disproof has been abundant. I need not remind them how this charge of confiscation was raised, upon the repeal of the Corn Laws, and how it was raised last year upon the very terrible, but useful measure introduced by my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, with respect to ground game. (Laughter.) It is more to the purpose that I should remind them how freely it was used when the Land Bill was under discussion in 1870. (Hear, hear.) Lord Salisbury described that bill as bribing one class by plundering another. Lord Cairns used much the same language. He said, “You allow me first the option to purchase my property,” and he quoted with praise a statement that there should be no settlement of the Land Question without confiscation. Confiscation was the word applied to leading enactments of the Land Act of 1870. Did the Land Act when it became law confiscate the property of the landlords? (Ministerial cheers.) Did it injure the property of the landlords? (Oh, oh.) We are informed on the contrary on evidence that it improved the property of the landlords. Rents have increased under the operation of the Land Act upon the larger rentals, a longer number of years' purchase has been obtained. (Cheers.) That has been the end of the charge of confiscation against the Land Act. (Cheers).

May 17.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson gave notice of his resolution to be moved on Tuesday, June 14th.

Mr Wm. Lawrence gave notice that on Thursday he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to whom it was intended that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue should grant licenses at £5 per annum to sell wine, beers, and spirits and tobacco in travelling public-house railway cars, and whether such cars could be authorised to supply first, second, and third class passengers with what liquor they might require—(laughter)—and whether the railway companies would be permitted to attach such travelling taverns they might think advisable, whether express, excursionist, or parliamentary, and travelling any distance whether short or long. (Laughter.)

May 19.—Mr. Gladstone stated his intention to reply to the question of Mr. Lawrence in committee.

May 23.—Replying to Sir John Kennaway, Mr. Gladstone withdrew his proposal to license railway carriages for the sale of alcoholic liquors. (Cheers.)

849 petitions with 53,068 signatures were presented to Parliament up to 10th May in favour of the suppression of the opium traffic.

TEMPERANCE CONFERENCE IN DUNDEE.

A SOCIAL conference, under the auspices of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, for the purpose of considering the position and prospects of the temperance movement, was held on Friday, 29th April, in the large hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, which was well filled. Bailie Selkirk, Glasgow, presided, and amongst those present were Rev. Andw. Inglis, Rev. Thomas Dickson, Rev. D. Macrae, Bailie A. H. Moncur, Mr. Thomas Smith, Mr. C. C. Maxwell, Mr. E. Howat, Mr. W. Philip, ex-Bailie Robertson, Mr. William Scrymgeour (Newport), Mr. Winning (Paisley), Mr. Rutherford (Forfar), Mr. A. Cobb (Montrose), Mr. W. Briggs (Arbroath), Mr. R. Mackay, secretary, and Stevenson, agent of the Association, &c. After a service of tea,

Rev. DAVID MACRAE delivered a stirring temperance address. He said that the question of the present day was, whether was the majority to have public-houses inflicted upon them, with riot, crime, dissipation, and taxes, or was the minority, that insisted upon having public-houses, to be obliged to give up intoxicating drink, or else to get that drink in a way that would not injure the community. (Applause.) He hoped that the meeting might have a stimulating influence in connection with the movement, and that these friends who were working in the cause might unite themselves and awaken public attention, and keep the people ready for voting when the voting time came. (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN afterwards addressed the meeting, and at the outset explained that ex-Bailie Torrens, who was to have presided that night, was unable, through illness, to be present. He then said that from the time the Association was instituted, twenty years since, it had steadily kept in view all through, the principle with which it set out—namely, that strong drink was essentially mischievous to the individual and to the State, and that it was the duty of individuals to abstain from strong drink, and the duty of the State to prohibit the sale of strong drink. (Applause.) The Association had sought to change the customs and the laws in regard to liquor by effecting a change in public opinion in a constitutional way, and the fact that last year 40 Scotch Members voted in favour of and only 5 against Sir Wilfrid's resolutions, as against 10 for his Permissive Bill in 1864, indicated, he thought, the progress of public opinion, especially in Scotland, on the subject. (Applause.) From the progress which had been made they thought it was desirable that a local option measure ought now to be passed for Scotland, although England might take years to come to this point. (Applause.) The difficulty, however, was in getting Members to put their names on the back of such a Bill, but they had to press forward the work all the same. (Applause.) In his speech last session on Sir Wilfrid's resolution, Mr. Gladstone plainly indicated that among other amendments in the licensing system he would introduce clauses giving effect to the principle for which Sir Wilfrid Lawson contended, and it would be for Scotland to express itself that Mr. Gladstone might be induced to give them the utmost possible power in dealing with the liquor traffic. (Applause.) All shades of temperance sentiment should unite as much as possible upon this point, and concentrate their energies to secure the attainment of this great object. (Applause.)

BAILIE MONCOUR said he was sure they were glad to see their friends from Glasgow, and confer with them on the present position and prospects of the Permissive Bill movement. By what he had seen in America he had been made a stronger temperance man than before. He thought that in Scotland they were ready for a veto Act, giving majorities in localities the power to prevent public-houses being opened. (Applause.)

Mr. JAMES WINNING, Paisley, gave details of the organization of the Association he represented, its agencies, and the manner in which its operations were carried on. He said they had 5,600 subscribers, 4,080 of whom only subscribed 2s. 6d. and under, and 88 gave £2 and upwards. He made an earnest appeal to the people of Dundee to give greater support to the Association.

Rev. Mr. DICKSON said that, as a Christian minister, he could cast himself with his whole soul into every phase of the temperance movement, be it moral suasion or prohibition. (Great applause.) He hoped the time would soon come when Christian people would not tolerate a minister who was not a total abstainer—(applause)—and that the Christian Church would see to it that she at least must cleanse her skirts of the foul stain of intemperance.

Addresses in support of the Permissive Bill movement were also delivered by ex-Bailie Maxwell, Messrs. W. Scrymgeour, ex-Councillor Rutherford, Forfar, and Mr. W. Briggs, Arbroath. Ex-Bailie Maxwell, in the course of his remarks, stated his experience as a licensing magistrate, and advocated the necessity for some change in the machinery for granting licenses. He thought that an improvement would be to have the Licensing Court elected by the whole community. (Applause.)

During the evening Mr. J. G. Whitelaw rendered several stirring temperance pieces in a telling manner, and was greatly applauded. The usual votes of thanks were cordially awarded, and the audience dispersed.

GRANGEMOUTH—TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

ON Wednesday, 4th ult., a very large and enthusiastic meeting was held in the Young Men's Christian Institute Hall, at which Chief Commissioner Hugh Macpherson presided. There were also present on the platform, Rev. J. H. Paterson, Dumbarton; Bailie Selkirk, Glasgow; Rev. Mr. Anderson, Falkirk; Andrew Brown, Esq., Kerse; Rev. G. W. Cumming; Messrs. R. M. Geddes, M. Gavin, D. A. M'Laren, P. Hastie, T. Wallace, G. Gillespie, Grangemouth, and Captain J. H. Waterston. The hall was filled almost to crowding. After singing a hymn, the meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Cumming, when Captain Waterston produced letters of apology from a number of gentlemen who were unavoidably absent. The chairman on rising said—Ladies and gentlemen, it gives me very great pleasure to see such a large turn-out to-night; at such a time I think it just shows us that there is a deepening interest in the cause of temperance. It affords me great pleasure to preside at such a meeting, more especially one of so wide and representative a character. We have delegates present from seven different organizations, viz., the Old Town Total Abstinence Society, the New Town Total Abstinence Society, the Zetland Lodge of Good Templars, the Anchor Lodge of Good Templars, the British Women's Temperance Association, the Old Town Band of Hope, and the New Town Band of Hope. These have a total membership of something like 875; 515 being adults, and 360 juveniles. The objects and aims of each and all of these different societies are one—the prevention and suppression of the sin of intemperance, and thereby promoting the social and moral well-being of their fellow-men, and the prosperity of the community. The results flowing from the drink traffic are altogether appalling, carrying in their train misery, destitution, crime, and death, draining the pockets of the people, and sucking the life-blood of the nation. At one of the recent meetings of the Social Science Congress, from carefully got up statistics, it was stated that directly and indirectly 121,000 of our fellow creatures die annually from the effects of strong drink. Now, it occurs to me if this were 121,000 horses, sheep, or cattle, the whole country would rise as one man, and demand a special Commission to go into the matter, and if need be that the strongest measures be used in stamping out the disease from the country. Only the other day there was a great outcry of a milk epidemic in the city of Aberdeen. A number of its inhabitants had been laid down through drinking infected milk. Dr. Littlejohn and a Commissioner from Edinburgh went to Aberdeen to make investigations. The milk supply was stopped, and justly so, because it was injuring the people. In the city of Glasgow and the town of Grangemouth, from Loch Katrine and Millhall, the inhabitants get splendid, pure, and wholesome water sent direct from nature's distillery, by a wise and bountiful Creator. But unfortunately a large quantity of this pure aqua vita gets mixed and infected with liquid poison, which, when taken into the system lays men and women in the gutter, depriving them of reason, and, under its influence, acting more like fiends than human beings. When such is the case, should the people not have power to demand, just as well as in milk epidemics, that the infected supplies coming from these alcoholic dairies should be stopped when they are the cause of so much misery and crime? (Applause.) Intoxicating drinks, instead of being beneficial are hurtful, and therefore unnecessary. I sincerely trust the practical result of this large meeting will be, that we will unite together, not only as Good Templars and temperance reformers, but as citizens and patriots, to do everything in our power to wipe away our nation's sin, and our nation's reproach, and in so doing we will do much to further the social and moral well-being of our fellowmen. (Applause.) Mr. R. M. Geddes, as a delegate from the British Women's Temperance Association (being the husband of a member, and therefore deputed), moved the first resolution as follows:—"That this meeting is of opinion that the traffic in alcoholic liquors is the principal cause of the abounding intemperance of the country with its appalling results, and earnestly calls upon the friends of social improvement, moral reform, and religious progress to unite in a national effort to induce Her Majesty's Government to grant the ratepayers of Scotland a direct and effective veto on the operations of a traffic so essentially at variance with the best interests of the nation." He considered, however, that the people themselves ought to have the power to say whether this should or should not be. (Applause.) Mr. A. Brown had very great pleasure in seconding the motion. He was very gratified to see such a large audience, and he hoped he was right in supposing they had come to realise with their wives and families that so long as these nuisances—the public-houses—existed, it was time for them to fight, as long as they had breath, till the last one was done away with. (Applause.) The public houses were practically opposed to the best interests of the community, and if you do not kill them they will kill you. It was time to tell the brewer, the distiller, and the public-house keeper to stop this nefarious traffic. (Applause.) He concluded by expressing his pleasure in seconding the resolution. Rev. Mr. Paterson, Dumbarton, rose to support the resolution, and gave an eloquent address of some length. He expressed his pleasure in being permitted to take part in the demonstration. As a subject of the British crown, as a Christian minister of the everlasting gospel, and as a man with social, moral and religious principles, he had always been proud to identify himself with the cause of temperance. (Applause.) To some it might appear an insignificant boast, but he considered it a boast of some consequence. Was it not something to aid those men who are seeking the liberty of the people against those evils which spring from intemperance, and which oppose the best interests of common humanity? (Loud applause.) The chairman then put the resolution to the meeting, when almost every hand was held up in favour of it, and it was accordingly declared to be unanimously carried. Mr. M. Gavin moved the second resolution as under:—"That this meeting rejoices that the House of Commons, has by its acceptance of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution, resolved to deal effectually with the evils of the licensing system, by an efficient measure of Local Option; urges Her Majesty's Government to give immediate effect to that resolution, and thereby enable the ratepayers of burghs, parishes, or other districts, to prevent public houses being placed or continued in their midst against their will." Mr. D. A. M'Laren seconded in a few words. Bailie Selkirk expressed the pleasure he had, from his deep interest in the subject, in supporting the resolution, and said he should endeavour to do so by referring to some of the arguments which it seemed to him they should submit in support of the movement with which they were identified. They should distinguish between moral suasion and the political aspect of the question. He was prepared on every suitable occasion to advocate moral suasion. He was there to say he was a life teetotaler—(applause)—and he did not think it had disagreed with him. (Laughter.) He said the time was come when the liquor traffic of this country must be called on to restate the reasons for its existence. (Applause.) In this free country they were entitled to discuss this question at open meetings. He would ask why was it that individuals required permission to sell strong drink? They were allowed to open any other kind of a shop for selling milk and butter and such like without being interfered with. The reason was that we get a large revenue from the strong drink traffic. If every one were allowed to sell, they would have no revenue. He would bring no railing accusation against individuals, but against the system of the drink traffic, and he would say that individuals must give way to the public good, where the public demands it. Although they had 400 Acts of Parliament on this subject, had they succeeded in the interests of the public? The prevalence of crimes, murders, and miseries would answer that. The law regulates the character of the man, and the hours he keeps, but never once deals with the liquor; consequently the law will always fail to the extent that it does not deal with the liquor. It is the duty of every man to push his business as legitimately as he can, and provide for his family, but the law is unable to enforce him to try not to sell too much, or only to certain individuals, and consequently it deserves to be changed. What they asked the law to be changed to, was, that the people should be entitled to object to liquor shops being forced upon them against their will. (Applause.) Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution had been carried last year by a majority of 26, and he considered it the duty of the public to strengthen the hands of the Government to promote the welfare and interest of the community by this resolution. In conclusion, he urged them to work earnestly to win the golden age again. The resolution was unanimously carried by the meeting. Mr. P. Hastie moved that the resolutions adopted be forwarded to the county member, the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, and the Lord Advocate. Being seconded by Rev. J. Anderson, Falkirk, and supported by Capt. Waterston in a highly appreciated speech, the motion was agreed to. A choir led by Mr. Kerr contributed to the pleasure of the evening. The usual votes of thanks terminated the proceedings.—Falkirk Express, much abridged.

LICENSES FOR RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

On Saturday, 14th May in the House of Commons in Committee on Ways and Means, several resolutions were reported upon preliminary to being embodied as clauses in the Customs and Inland Revenue Bills. One was in the following terms:—Resolved—"That there shall be charged and paid upon every license for the sale of intoxicating liquors and tobacco in any carriage used for the conveyance of passengers on any railway the excise duty of £5." In the resolution of which he gave notice, Mr. Gladstone was to move that the Inland Revenue Commissioners were to be the sole licensing authorities: and in another that the license would be for one year and no longer.

Immediately on this notice being given several members of Parliament, notably Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Fowler, and Mr. Caine in conjunction with Sir Wilfrid Lawson, offered strenuous opposition to the proposal. The Executives of the United Kingdom Alliance, the Scottish Temperance League, the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association, the I.O.G.T. (Scotland and America), and a large number of temperance organizations throughout the country with vigorous promptitude framed memorials to the Premier from their respective organizations, and called upon all under their jurisdiction or influence to do likewise. Letters to members of Parliament from their constituents poured in by every post. Meantime honourable members of all sections in the House met over this matter, and it was resolved that a meeting of members of the House should be held early in the week to consider what steps were necessary to compel the withdrawal of such an odious proposal. Happily the state of feeling thus manifested warned the Premier of the danger of submitting these clauses to Parliament, so that on Monday, in reply to Sir John Kennaway, the right hon. gentleman said that "this proposal to allow spirituous liquors to be retailed in Pulman cars was viewed, I believe, by the railway companies who made the application, and the Board of Inland Revenue, as a simple matter of administrative arrangement, and they were not at all prepared to anticipate that it would be regarded as a proposal of a revolutionary character. I would say that the proposal is effectually killed by the menace to which it has been exposed." (Cheers.)

The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association are highly gratified by the amount of co-operation received from the friends throughout the country against the proposal. The following memorial was drawn up and despatched by them to the Premier, and a copy of it with a letter was sent to every Member of Parliament for Scotland, and to the Home Secretary:—

To the Right Honourable W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P., First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Memorial of the Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association,

Sheweth—

That your Memorialists have learned with the gravest concern and alarm that you, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, intend to propose the introduction of clauses into the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill which will empower the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to issue licenses to the proprietors of railway carriages for the sale of intoxicating liquors in such carriages.

That your Memorialists believe that the granting of such facilities to intemperance will prove destructive of the comfort and pleasure of railway travelling, seriously impair the efficiency of railway servants, add unnecessarily to the hazard of railway journeys, and lead on the part of passengers themselves to that dissipation which inevitably attends the sale of strong drink away from the immediate and vigilant supervision of the police authorities.

That your Memorialists are convinced that the tendency of public opinion in Scotland, as evidenced by the voting of its parliamentary representatives on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution in June last, is in favour of the suppression of the liquor traffic, and that, therefore, the proposal to license railway carriages as liquor bars is at variance with the sentiments of the Scottish people.

Your Memorialists therefore most earnestly pray you to relinquish your intention of moving the aforesaid clauses, the operation of which would be so antagonistic to the interests of the travelling public and the community at large.

And your Memorialists will ever pray.

JAMES TORRENS, J.P., Chairman of Executive.
THOS. DICK, Vice-Chairman of Executive.
ROBERT M'CALLUM, Treasurer.
JAMES L. SELKIRK, J.P., Hon. Secretary.
ROBERT MACKAY, Secretary.

112 Bath Street, Glasgow, 21st May, 1881.

Two Italians, with a black bear, got drunk at Schnevus. The bear kept sober, and made for the woods. Good for the bear.

"Emma R." asks—"Do you think it right for a girl to sit on a young man's lap, even if she is engaged to him?" And we say—"if it was our girl on our lap, yes; if it was another girl on our lap, yes; but if it was our girl and another fellow's lap, never."

The preacher was talking to the Sunday School on the virtue of a devoted attendance on church. "Is there anything to which the people would throng on Sunday or weekday as they did to Church." "Yeth, thir, a thircus would ketch them every pop if they could get in free as they do into Church." The bitten preacher thought it was time to sing.

THE BRITISH TAR, PAST AND PRESENT.—The Royal Navy has ever been England's pride, and is most surely England's real defence; and the blue jackets that man the iron castles that we call ships of war, are cast in the same mould as those in old days who fought and won our battles. But thank God, although the brave heart is still there, the man is wonderfully changed, the old days of frightful drinking and swearing have passed, and with them the saying, "the worse man the better sailor." Now temperance work, Bible-classes, prayer meetings, and much beside unknown to the outside world, goes on on board our ships of war, while on shore our men crowd to temperance and gospel meetings or group together to sing Sankey's hymns, not only with the voice but "with the understanding also."

PUBLIC PRESS.

THE CAUSE AND THE CURE.—Everybody has heard of the pills and ointment that cured the mythical Lord Alborough's sore leg (and ham) of forty years' standing! And what leg would not be sore after such a trial? Now the Professor assures us that his "pills and ointment are compounded so as to act harmoniously. No doubt of it, they sell together, they work together—and here is one little truth about the taking of them which saves them from being an "entire sell." "Five pills night and morning. Ointment, well rubbed over the affected parts in gout, lumbago, &c. Abstain from all intoxicating drinks, and the most desperate cases will, with a little perseverance, completely yield to this treatment." A man curious in reasons, however, will be apt to say—Here are three antecedents—"pills, grease, and teetotalism;" how am I to know which did the cure? Well, on the one hand, myriads of temperance men can testify that abstinence alone has cured them of gout, rheumatism, &c. On the other hand, we see that drinking alone produces gout, rheumatism, &c. While, in the third place, we have the confession of the pill-vendor himself that pill and ointment cannot succeed with drink. Who is so dull as not to see the fallacy of ascribing the cure to the physic rather than to the cessation of the disease's cause.—Dr. F. R. Lees.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. JOHN JOHNSTON, DUMFRIES.—We deeply regret to have to intimate the decease of this estimable temperance reformer at Beyrout, Syria, on Good Friday, of fever, aged 49 years. Mr. Johnston was one of the best known and esteemed of the friends of temperance in the south of Scotland, where for many years he has laboured indefatigably on behalf of temperance and prohibition. He was also an unwearied labourer in evangelistic effort, and had a kindly word and a helping hand to every good work. It is, however, with him as a staunch prohibitionist that we have to deal, and few have exceeded him in his devotion to the good cause. We have met him at the annual meetings of the United Kingdom Alliance and the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association. He was a vice-president of the Scottish Association for many years; and it was only last June that he generously went up to London to strengthen the deputation that was, previous to the division of the 18th, waiting upon Scotch Parliamentary representatives. His decease is a decided loss to the movement. He was in Palestine fulfilling a long cherished desire of his heart to see "those holy fields over whose acres walked those blessed feet which eighteen hundred years ago were nailed for our advantage to the bitter cross;" and the heart becomes overcharged as the eye runs over the letters of different friends, who all bear testimony to the eager longings with which he lifted up his eyes upon the ineffable traces of the Redeemer. He had crossed from Damascus to Beyrout through the Hermon range, and it is supposed that the intense cold experienced there, after the extreme heat of the Holy Land, had enfeebled his constitution so much that when Syrian fever seized him he succumbed to its attack, and on Good Friday breathed his last. He lies till the resurrection morn in the Protestant churchyard near Beyrout, and it is consoling to know that Christian sympathy and attention mitigated the hardship of dying in a foreign land afar from wife, children, and friends. He leaves a wife and four of a family to mourn his early and sad decease. The Executive of the Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association marked their sense of his worth by adopting a resolution of condolence—a copy of which was sent to Mrs. Johnston and family.

PATRICK.—"And Bidly, darlint, they've been telling us there's too many of us in the world. Now, if you and me git the Praste to make us two wan, trath then won't there be wan the less?"

PROGRESS OF THE WORK.

On the 18th June, 1880, the Scotch vote on the Local Option resolution in the House of Commons was 40 (and 3 pairs) in favour, and 5 votes against. No Burgh or University Member voted against the measure; of the 5, 4 were Conservatives, and 1 (Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.) was a Liberal.

The number of convictions for being drunk on Sundays in England and Wales average 15,800 per annum. Liverpool and Manchester have unusual prominence. In Liverpool, with its population of 493,405, there were 4,721, of which 4,381 were bona fide residents. In Manchester, with a population of 351,189, there were 3,282 convictions, 3,000 being bona fide residents. Sunday drinking is much more in these towns than London, Birmingham, or Sheffield. In the latter town with a population of 239,946, there were but 175 convictions.

HEALTH, STRENGTH, AND ENERGY.

PLEASANT TO THE TASTE.

Freeman's Syrup of Phosphorus is immediate and permanent in its effects, giving new life to the languid and exhausted, and curing Nervous Debility, Heart Disease, Incipient Consumption, Functional Derangement, Stomach and Liver Complaint, Nervous Fancies, Want of Tone, and all the Forms of Ill Health, arising from a morbid condition of the system.

Freeman's Syrup of Phosphorus is the greatest Blood Purifier known, quickly supplying the system with a new, rich, and pure blood, and thereby expelling disease. It thoroughly revitalises the human frame, and builds up a new constitution even in the most enfeebled.

Freeman's Syrup of Phosphorus contains all the mineral elements of nutrition, is a pleasant and efficient substitute for Cod Liver Oil, is easy of digestion, and can be taken by the most delicate patient. A certain remedy for Consumption, Scrofula, Loss of Flesh, Debility, Bronchitis, Asthma—a General Tonic.

Freeman's Syrup of Phosphorus restores the failing functions of life, and imparts strength and energy. The first dose will prove its value, by giving immediate relief, while a little perseverance will accomplish a thorough and lasting cure.

Freeman's Syrup of Phosphorus cures Nervous Exhaustion.

General Weakness,
Shortness of Breath,
Impoverished Blood,
Noises in the Head and Ears,
Impaired Sight and Memory,

HOW TO CONDUCT A BAND OF HOPE.

But without enlarging let me rapidly detail what is still farther needful towards the complete equipment of a Band of Hope. A black board, where diagrams and expositions should be distinctly sketched. Thus we can bring eye-gate as well as ear-gate to our help, and hope by both to win the heart. Good instructive recreation also is supplied by the magic lantern, which could be had on hire, or better still, belong to the Band of Hope Union, for the use of all the societies affiliated therewith. An instrumental band with a set of banners, &c., is very attractive, but expensive; and a library, which may not only be a blessing to the children in keeping them at home and occupying their spare moments, and form a bond of attachment between them and the society, but be a blessing to the home circle, and bring both parents and children into contact with the minds of the best, the wisest, the bravest, and the purest that adorn humanity. Now in the comparative infancy of the Band of Hope movement in the North such appliances as I have just indicated may appear Utopian, but we must remember that education is steadily advancing, and is becoming more skilful and more scientific. Dr. Channing exclaims, "There should be no economy in education; money should never be weighed against the soul of a child; it should be poured out like water for the child's intellectual and moral life." Our Band of Hope movement is second to none, and parsimony in its inception would be moral starvation.

III. Registration, i.e., marking the attendances of every child. Nothing will so conduce to secure regularity and punctuality, and though to the unaccustomed it may seem a troublesome process, yet it is not so when methodically gone about. From the system of registration common to our public schools and in many of our best Sabbath schools, the children will naturally conceive that it is an essential part also of the Band of Hope system. Ladies or senior members could be appointed to visit absentees, which would bring them into friendly relationship with the parents, and report at next meeting, and thus no member would be lost sight of, for one of the chief causes of the success of a society is the careful and individual supervision of its members. A few members, if carefully admitted and well looked after, and trained in temperance principles, will yield good fruit not only in the present generation, but in the next, and the next.

IV. Time tables and programmes or routines. It is found from experience that the regularly recurring weekly meeting is best for the Band of Hope—if oftener, the interest cannot be sustained; if at longer intervals, the interest is lost. At whatever interval meetings are held they should be held with positive regularity. Seven o'clock is a good hour, and the meeting should not continue more than an hour, or an hour and a half, and each alternate week may be devoted to the theory and practice of music. As the same time table will not suit every day school, so Band of Hope conductors will learn by experience what distribution of time is best suited to their own particular circumstances. The following observations, however, will apply to all time tables:—

1. All meetings opened and closed with prayer. We need an Almighty arm to help us, and much Divine wisdom to guide us.

2. Let the superintendent have all the hymns and songs fixed before the meeting.

3. Children should repeat simultaneously the scripture text that forms basis of a short opening address. When the address is long forgotten they will remember the text. "My word shall not return unto me void," &c.

4. No single address should exceed 15 or 20 minutes, unless the speaker be specially gifted, or illustrating by experiments.

5. It is better for the same person to give two short speeches than to make one long one.

6. It is well to give children as much work as possible to do themselves, hence the introduction of recitations, dialogues, &c., in time table.

7. In every time table provision should be made for reviewing or revising the instruction given. To instruct is to cast the ore into the crucible, but to review is to draw out of the children the threads of pure gold.

8. As children tire of monotony it is wise to secure as frequently as possible the aid of friends to give the address.

By programmes or routines is meant the fixed provision made for the systematic instruction of the members, and the order in which the subjects are to be taken. For example, a superintendent, or committee, or union, resolves that in the course of a year the children of the Band of Hope shall receive definite instruction in the following subjects:—Physiology—The manufacture of intoxicating drinks—Lives of eminent abstainers—The Bible and temperance—The influence of alcohol—Narcotics—Economy—The effects of intemperance, &c. Would it not be advisable so to distribute the various branches of these or any other subjects over the session as to secure unity and variety, and at the same time provide a well arranged scheme of systematic instruction. Arrangements could be made in towns by which some minister might give a set of addresses on the Bible and temperance, a medical man might be willing to take the physiological series, a Sabbath school or day school teacher another, and the conductor himself the others, and by a well-arranged "Speaker's plan," every Band of Hope in the town and neighbourhood could be benefited.

II. DISCIPLINE.—This means not the maintaining of order merely, but the maintaining of healthy working order. It would be easy for a conductor, by the threat of punishment, or by shaking the rod over the children, to keep such order that you might hear a pin fall, but precious little work, in the way of instruction, would he be able to accomplish. If he managed, however, to keep them actively employed in acquiring knowledge, and at the same time in good order, that would be discipline. Now, though this point is very important, like organization, it is not the most important in Band of Hope, or, in fact, in School work. Order and neatness in a garden are most desirable and commendable, yet fruit is the main thing. But as weeds and disorder may spoil much precious fruit, so want of discipline may hinder much good in a class, therefore, as a means to an end, every superintendent and staff of workers should seek to attain it, both for the sake of progress in learning, and as a valuable moral training. The skilful seaman, by the steady eye, by firmness and calmness, can guide his bark through the stormy sea, and in the same way can the experienced superintendent control the most undisciplined band that falls to his lot.

1st. The Eye.—There is great power in the human eye. To a trained dog even, his master's eye is enough. It is the captain's eye upon him that causes the soldier to be steady and brave in the hour of danger; and so the eye of the superintendent, or the nod of his head, or the uplifting of his finger, should control the behaviour of each and all of the children.

2nd. Firmness also, combined with love, will go a great way in maintaining authority. There is nothing stands so much in the way of efficient discipline as want of firmness; but firmness must be allied to love; love begets love; and if the conductor loves the children, they will love him in return—they will try to please him, and avoid doing anything that would be calculated to give him pain. More wasps are caught by honey than by vinegar, and thus many boys who would not otherwise be governed fall before the power of love, and turn out "jewels," just as the troublesome grain of sand in the oyster produces the valuable pearl.

But 3rd. A calm and earnest manner on the part of the superintendent will beget a quiet demeanour on the part of the children. To do as others do is the impulse of childhood's earliest years, and a child's conduct and character depends as much on the character of those he comes in contact with, as any mental or moral quality which he possesses. Calmness and self-control, combined with an earnest enforcement of moral, social, religious, and scientific truth about temperance, will so absorb the attention of the children that peace and order will reign while the good seed is being sown in their hearts.

We come now to the third and most important part of our subject—viz, THE METHOD OF INSTRUCTION.

It is universally acknowledged that, for children, the synthetic, or inductive mode of teaching—by which we ascend from the known to the unknown, from the simple to the complex—is best adapted. As the builder lays stone upon stone till he rears a vast and beautiful structure, so we must give line upon line, precept upon precept, of progressive, systematic instruction, re-iterated again and again, until it be understood and retained. Teaching does no good unless it be comprehended; therefore, not only must it be exceedingly plain, but clothed in simple language, and free from all difficult words and technical terms which have not been previously explained.

Happy illustration will often win a child, and throw a flood of light into the chambers of its mind, as the throwing back of a shutter in a dark room. To do all this will entail a measure of home preparation on the part of the conductor; but this is indispensable to success to the statesman before he enters the arena of debate, to the lawyer before he can obtain for his client a favourable verdict, to the minister of truth before he enters the pulpit, to the lecturer before he enters the academic hall, to the orator before he mounts the platform, and to the teacher before he meets his scholars. True, there are some minds so logical and comprehensive as to be able to seize a subject at a glance, but with the ordinary run of mortals it is a matter of patient study. But we must grudge no labour however arduous and no study however much a weariness of the flesh, for it is noble to seek the truth and beautiful to find it. The more varied our knowledge is the better fitted will we be for our work. Therefore let us make ourselves conversant not only with every detail of the temperance question, with history, biography, science, statistics, social problems, and the Word of God, but with the youthful mind and the best method of adapting instruction to it. Only in this way can our Bands of Hope be both interesting and instructive—otherwise when the first impulse has passed away they will droop and linger out a spiritless existence. Mere exhortation will soon nauseate—to picture in glowing terms the blessings of sobriety will soon pale on the sight. There must be mental stimulus, else the most important part of the work will be left undone. It is a burning question in connection with our Sabbath Schools, "How to retain our senior scholars," and it may soon come to the front in connection with Band of Hope work. The wise man says, "A threefold cord is not easily broken," so if we fling over them the threefold cord of truth, love, and earnestness, they shall not soon drift away from under our care. Band of Hope conductors will find most valuable helps in preparing their work in such periodicals as The Band of Hope Chronicle, and Temperance Worker, where amid a miscellaneous collection of temperance matter will be found admirable outline lessons, specially adapted for juvenile instruction. [At this stage the writer gave a specimen lesson on, "Is Alcohol Food?" in illustration of the method laid down, on the principle that "an ounce of practice is worth a bushel of theory;" but as it would unduly extend this paper to give it at present, it may be given separately in some future issue of the Social Reformer.]

But dear co-workers, I have wearied you, and must draw to a close. Let me in conclusion re-iterate again that the success of the Band of Hope movement lies, not in the music, nor the recitations, nor the games, nor the pic-nics, but in the sound education of the intellect, the conscience, and the heart as to the true nature of alcohol, and the evil of the whole drink system. At the root of every movement that reforms error and emancipates truth, lies moral principle and sound intelligence. It was this that made Cromwell's Ironsides so terrible to the licentious troops of King Charles I., that made the British soldiers, especially the men with the kilts, so fearful to the intoxicated Russians on the heights of Inkerman, and that made Havelock's saints so dreadful to the Sepoys of Lucknow and Cawnpore. It was this that baffled the most determined efforts of Napoleon on the field of Waterloo, when Europe was delivered from despotism; and peace, security and independence were restored to the world. It was this that burst the shackles of Rome at the glorious era of the Reformation, that struck the chains from every slave in the British dominions, and that is destined to liberate the world from the tyranny of alcoholic drink.

Send forth into the world a youth untaught in the evils of intemperance, and he may drift helplessly on to the reefs of misery, or strand upon the rocks of woe. But educate him in temperance principles, and you put a good blade into his hand wherewith to hew his way to victory.

This century has done much for civilisation, science and art, but, alas, how much of the good has been neutralized by the drinking habits of our country and of the world. During the two decades of it yet to run let us arise and do all we can to wipe out the foul stigma, so that the children of the next century, when tempted to sin may answer as did Jonadab—"Our fathers commanded us saying, ye shall drink no wine, neither you nor your sons for ever."

We have perhaps erred in the past in having taken up our minds too much with the cure, and too little with the prevention of the evil. There are half a million of drunkards in the land tramping on incessantly with hollow tread to premature graves, of whose reclamation the most sanguine sometimes despair, and there are an innumerable multitude of moderate drinkers whose only temperance teaching consists of a sermon or two annually; but there are five millions of children in the country, now in the dew of their youth, who are born abstainers, and they are the nation's hope. The temperance movement seeks to improve the present generation, but the Band of Hope seeks to rescue the next by sealing up the poisoned fountain, and thus it is the true panacea for drink and is destined to bless the world. All trained in the Band of Hope may not stand true, some will desert the colours, but a vast proportion will remain steadfast, and like the gallant Melville and Coghill, on the banks of the Buffalo, will be ready to die in their defence. Among the boys will be Samsons, temperate, brave, and full of manly courage—Daniels, greatly beloved who will not bow to the image of Bacchus—Davids who, with sling and stone, will smite the giant of intemperance. Among the girls will be Jaels, who will smite to the earth their country's enemy—Deborahs who will awake and free their country from the scathing, degrading, and despicable evil. Each of them will live.

"For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the future in the distance,
For the good that they can do."

With the Temperance Reformation let us seek to carry the spiritual. God's grace will be our children's truest safeguard, so that though "Temptation sing, they will not turn aside," but touched by God's renewing hand they will never seek inspiration from the wine cup "wherein is excess," but will seek daily to be "filled with the spirit."

THE MIRACLE OF CANA.

THE miracle performed by our Lord at Cana is the most interesting of all the miracles that, from time to time, he performed. It is interesting, not only from the fact that it was the first miracle which he wrought, but also from the fact that it involves a very serious question in morals. The question is, did Jesus sanction the use of intoxicating liquors? Many reply to this question in the affirmative, but as there are very serious points involved in the question before us, a mere assertion is of no consequence; we must have proof. On carefully considering the question, we have come to a negative conclusion on the point, and we lay before the reader for his own inspection our reasons for holding that the wine which was miraculously produced by Jesus at the marriage feast was not fermented wine,

I. We must take into account the fact that the Greek word oinos is a general term, and includes all kinds of wine, so that unless a particular kind of wine is mentioned, we must judge how it is spoken of, or what effect it had on those who partook of it.

The effects of ordinary wine are so well known to all that they do not require to be explained here. Now as we can draw from the account given in John, the guests had already consumed a quantity of wine, but nothing of a kind approaching to disorder was apparent.

We cannot of course tell how much of the wine made by Jesus was drawn from the water-pots, but it is entirely opposed to the teaching of Christ to suppose that he countenanced a scene of debauchery, as the natural results of intoxication are either irritation or stupefaction.

II. Because all the miracles performed by Christ were for the satisfying of natural, not unnatural appetites; such as the miracle of the loaves and fishes, or for the alleviation of pain and suffering, as the woman with the issue of blood, and others. Now had Christ used his power on this occasion to create what was injurious to health and reason, or, what might result in serious consequences to the recipient either here or hereafter, he would not only have seriously invalidated his own teaching, but have gone direct in the face of his mission to the world.

Taking the above into account the only logical conclusion we can come to is, that the wine made by Christ on this occasion was not capable of producing injurious effects, and therefore must have been non-intoxicating.

III. But further. It has been proved by the best medical authorities that alcohol, taken either in large or small quantities, produces a stimulated action of the vital organisms of the body, which in plain language means, that to partake of alcohol, either habitually or casually, is simply to shorten one's life in proportion to the amount of stimulation produced.

If these premises are granted, then the inference is simply this—That those who take alcohol habitually actually commit self-destruction; and that any-one who causes others to fall by alcohol is clearly chargeable with homicide.

IV. As Christ everywhere taught the greatest reverence for life, and constantly inculcated a strict regard to the sixth commandment, we cannot suppose that his works would tend in a contrary direction to his words. Now taking our last argument into account, we finally conclude that as Christ always exerted his power only for the good of mankind without the possibility of their suffering thereby, the miracle wrought by Christ on this occasion must have been free from the possibility of any injurious effects. And further, as the effects of alcohol on the human race is one of the great sources of the misery and poverty in the world, the wine which Christ supplied to the marriage guests at Cana cannot have contained alcohol, and so was not fermented wine.

Much more might be said in favour of the above arguments, but we deem them sufficient to prove that Christ did not on this occasion countenance the use of fermented wine. ROBERT F. GARDINER.

HARD WORK IN HOT WEATHER WITHOUT INTOXICATING DRINK.—The Rev. Thomas Snow, Underbarrow Parsonage, Milnthorpe, will be happy to forward to the readers of the Social Reformer, on application, a copy of his collection of testimonies, showing that hard work in the fields and foundries in hot weather can best be done without intoxicating drinks.

OUR SKETCH BOOK.

WHAT MR. GREY TOOK.

BY ANNETTE LUGILLE NOBLE.

THERE are a great many gloomier places than an orphan asylum. Such a place seems sometimes like a little heaven to poor abused children. Perhaps it was because Margie Grey had never been abused, or the asylum where she went may not have been the best of its kind; at any rate she never likened it to heaven. Her mother had worked from daylight until dark to keep their own little home neat, and to earn something to buy their food. Two or three times a week a drunken man tumbled into their home and demanded "something to eat and a dollar." He would devour their last crust; but, alas! Mrs. Grey earned her money by cents, and no dollar came forth from a place where no dollars were. At last Mrs. Grey took a terrible cold, then had a fever. She was carried by friends to a church hospital, and Margie was taken out of town to an asylum. She was not an orphan, but for any help, care, or love her father bestowed upon her she might as well have been. A manager of the institution arranged for her stay there throughout the winter. Margie was obedient and amiable; but she was a sensitive, peculiar child. When, in after-years, she became a well-known artist, people understood how passionately she loved colour, grace, and beauty, even as a little child. She used to say she felt in the asylum like "a pin stuck fast in a long paper full of others just like her." Every morning she dressed herself in an ugly cotton dress and a long brown apron, and joined seventy or more little ones, not to be told apart except with close study of noses or eyes. They had the same tasks, the same dull exercises meant for play, but no books or toys of their own. How terribly homesick Margie was, crying herself to sleep every night for weeks! Her work was not meant to be hard—it was to dust the wood-work daily down three pairs of stairs. But the halls were dark and cold; it took her a long time, and she always reached the bottom with a streaked little face, for she had wiped away tears on her dusting-cloth. She imagined her mother would die and she herself live to be an old woman, perhaps ninety years old, but spending all her life in the drab dress, dusting these same dark stairs. Nothing pleasant happened for months; to be sure the lady who brought her there told her one day that her father had taken a "pledge." She reflected that her father was always taking something, and it was probably some unusually bad sort of a drink. She was only eight years old and not very wise about words.

But better days were coming for Margie. One sunny morning in early spring she was called down-stairs by somebody who knew her from the other "pins in the paper," and dressed in a bright new suit of clothes. She was told her mother was well, she was going home, and she had a "new father." She was put on the cars in charge of the conductor and safely delivered to her father. He did indeed seem to have been made over. His coat was whole and clean, his face pale and pleasant. He kissed her over and over, and took her, dancing along the pavement, to a better house in a better street than that she remembered. She feared every moment to rub her eyes and wake up to see eighty small beds with a cropped-haired little girl in each, or something almost as tiresome. No, it was her own mother looking so happy, a flower-pot in the window, and a table all ready for the dinner which smelt so excessively good the moment they opened the door. Such a dinner for a mush-eating little asylum child—soft new rolls, chicken, and the very pudding Margie liked better than ice-cream! After dinner out came a doll, big, red-checked, and with it a dress made to come on and off. Now, best of all, the nice home, the "new" father, the plentiful good food, were not for one bright day only but for all the days that followed. Her mother could rest now if she was tired or ill again; her father's wages were excellent. He stayed with them now on evenings. He took them to the seashore on holidays, and in due course of time Margie understood that "taking the pledge" was a very different thing from "taking a drink," and so were its effects. The drink broke up the home and scattered the family. The pledge made a new home and brought all together again in happiness.—National Temp. Advocate.

THE CANADIAN CHURCHES.

To the Editor of the "Social Reformer."

SIR,—At the May meeting of the Presbyterian Synod of Toronto and Kingston the Committee on Temperance, in its report, "strongly deplored the prevalence of drunkenness in the country, and hoped that all would encourage total abstinence. It specially urged that treating in all its forms, and the use of intoxicating liquors at public dinners, etc., should be discouraged." A recommendation which urged that congregational total abstinence societies be formed was struck out. The Synod instructed "its Temperance Committee to watch over all attempts to make such amendments to the Canada Temperance Act as may be calculated to neutralize its efficiency, and by petition, deputation, or otherwise, to use all suitable means to avert the same." Circulars are to be sent to all sessions to fill up and return to the Committee on Temperance; a pastoral letter to be issued on the subject; the sessions are requested to give all diligence to promote temperance, especially among the young. Attention was drawn to the recommendation of last year, "that ministers and church courts should urge upon their people the practice of total abstinence as a matter of Christian expediency under the circumstances under which we are placed, and that every effort should be made to bring about, as soon as possible, the entire prohibition of the liquor traffic." Principal Grant said he had never read the Scott Act—he had more important things to read; but the Synod was not to be deterred from endorsing it even by this fact.—
Yours truly,
G. H. HALE.

PROFESSOR RAMSAY'S EXPLANATION.

(To the Editor of the "Social Reformer.")

Messina, May 22.

SIR,—I have just seen your issue for May. I am very sorry that an imperfect report of some off-hand remarks which I made at the opening of the Altho Coffee House should have led you to suppose that I meant to make an attack on the temperance movement in any form, or on the "Ivanhoe." For the purpose in hand, I drew a distinction between temperance and total abstinence; and, purely as a joke, illustrated a paradoxical view of the distinction by reference to an absurd story about the "Ivanhoe," too extravagant to be taken seriously by any of those present. But nothing was further from my intention than to make an attack on temperance reformers. We aim at the same ends, though we may differ as to the best means to attain them. I have very great sympathy with the aims of the promoters of the "Ivanhoe," and I cordially wish her success in her battle with intemperance on the Clyde.—I am, yours obediently,

G. G. RAMSAY.

PUBLIC PRESS.

THE MISSING SAW-MILL.—A few days ago T. G. met an old friend, who was formerly a prosperous young lumberman up north, but whose bad habits of drinking resulted as they often do, though he has since reformed and is trying to do better. "How are you?"

said T. G. "Pretty well, thank you; but I've just been to a doctor to have him look at my throat." "What's the matter?" "Well, the doctor couldn't give me any encouragement. At least he couldn't find what I wanted him to find." "What did you expect him to find?" "I asked him to look down my throat for the saw-mill and farm that had gone down there." "And did he see anything of it?" "No; but he advised me if I ever got another mill, to run it by water."

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—This organization base their bill on the following principles:—(a) The liquor traffic cannot properly be prohibited; (b) It is the duty of the State to regulate and control it; (c) The license to sell—being a monopoly—should be disposed of for its fair value; (d) The sale, being for the accommodation of the people, the people themselves should have a potential voice in defining the limits of the traffic. The Society differs very decidedly from the United Kingdom Alliance. That organization, whose labours cannot be too highly estimated, has as its object the total and immediate legislative suppression of the traffic in all intoxicating liquors, because it believes that it is neither right nor politic for the State to afford legal protection and sanction to any traffic or system that tends to increase crime, to waste the national resources, to corrupt the social habits, and to destroy the health and lives of the people. With an equal hatred of intemperance, the object of the Church of England Temperance Society is restriction rather than prohibition.—Explanation of the proposed Licensing Boards Bill of the C.E.T.S., by the Rev. J. Robert O. West.

STORNOWAY RIPE FOR LOCAL OPTION.—The visitor to Stornoway is not merely impressed with the stir and excitement consequent on the herring fishing, but he sees much to gratify his taste and to please his fancy. Some of the modern shops would compare favourably with many elegant shops of the same description in not a few of our provincial towns. The streets are well laid out, and most of the houses are two storeys. There are two Free Churches, a United Presbyterian Church, a Parish Church, and an Ecclesiastical Chapel. Stornoway is a town of merchants. It is the chief centre of supply for the whole island, and the thousands who frequent it during the herring fishing leave behind them a portion of the wealth acquired. Stornoway Castle is an object of imposing grandeur. It is situated at the head of the bay, a short distance from the town. The trees are not high by which it is surrounded, but at this season they are beautifully green, and impart to one side of the bay a picturesque appearance. Perhaps I might be allowed to say a word which would interest your temperance readers, of whom there is no mean contingent in Clackmannanshire. Nearly all the merchants in Stornoway are abstainers, and those who are not are in close sympathy with the temperance movement. The Good Templars are numerically strong and socially powerful. Some think that they can speak nothing but Gaelic. This is a mistake. They are good English speakers, and are equally at home in the Gaelic language. They are great admirers of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and one of them has recently called his house "Brayton House," after Brayton Hall, in Cumberland, the seat of the hon. member for Carlisle. There is also a strong religious feeling in the town. The intoxicating interest is not influential, so that the social and moral reformers feel that by a popular vote like that which Sir Wilfrid Lawson proposes to give to the people, they could easily make the whole traffic in drink go down like rotten trees before a hurricane. Two steamers ply regularly every week between Glasgow and Stornoway. A mail steamer crosses the Minch daily (Tuesdays and Sundays excepted) to bring the mails from Ullapool, from which place they are also despatched to the south. No one can visit the capital of the Long Island without coming away with favourable impressions both of the people and of the place.—WILLIAM BLACKWOOD in Alloa Advertiser.

AN ILLUSTRATION FROM "THE FAIR MAID OF

PERTH."—Catherine Glover (the fair maid), speaking to Henry Gow, her valentine, says:—"Fling from thee the accursed weapons, to the fatal and murderous use of which thou art so easily tempted." "You speak to me in vain, Catherine," returned the armourer. "I may indeed turn monk and retire from the world, but while I live in it I must practise my trade; and while I form armour and weapons for others, I cannot withstand the temptation of using them. You would not reproach me as you do if you knew how inseparably the means by which I gain my bread are connected with that war-like spirit which you impute to me as a fault, though it is the consequence of inevitable necessity. While I strengthen the shield or corslet to withstand wounds, must I not have constantly in remembrance the manner and strength with which they may be dealt? and when I forge the sword and temper it for war, is it practicable for me to forget the recollection of its use?" "Then throw from you, my dear Henry," said the enthusiastic girl, "cast from you, I say, the art which is a snare to you. Abjure the fabrication of weapons which can only be useful to abridge human life, already too short for repentance; or to encourage with a feeling of safety those whom fear might otherwise prevent from risking themselves in peril. The art of forming arms, whether offensive or defensive, is alike sinful in one to whose violent and ever vehement disposition the very working upon them proves a sin and a snare. Resign utterly the manufacture of weapons of every description, and deserve the forgiveness of Heaven by renouncing all that can lead to the sin which does so easily beset you." "And what," murmured the armourer, "am I to do for my livelihood when I have given over the art of forging arms, for which Henry of Perth is known from the Tay to the Thames?" "Your art itself," said Catherine, "has innocent and laudable resources. If you renounce the forging of swords and bucklers, there remains to you the task of forging the harmless spade and the honourable as well as useful ploughshare—of those implements which contribute to the support of life or its comfort. Thou canst frame locks and bars to defend the property of the weak against the stout-rieff and oppression of the strong. Men will still resort to thee, and repay thy honest industry." Her argument, however, interfered with her father's views, when he heard her enlarge upon the necessity of his designed son-in-law resigning a trade that brought in more ready income than any at that time practised in Scotland, and more profit to Henry of Perth—good Hal of the Wynd—in particular than to any armourer in the nation. So he ordered her to hold her peace and to go out of his sight.

ALCOHOL ALPHABETICALLY CONSIDERED.—Alcohol Allures from the path of duty; Banishes domestic happiness; Creates unnatural thirst; Deranges the intellect; Fills premature graves; Generates malevolent passions; Hinders the gospel; Inflames vicious desires; Kindles family strife;Laughs at sin; Maddens the brain; Nerves the murderer's arm; Oppresses the poor and needy; Poisons the soul; Quenches the Holy Spirit; Racks the mind with remorse; Scoffs at piety; Torments before the time; Urges to lust and crime; Vitiates the blood; Works mischief everywhere; Yields the most debasing results; Zealous is for the ruin of drinkers.

A FAIR ANSWER TO A FAIR QUESTION.—Several years ago there lived in a parish not 100 miles from the capital of Strathspey a horse-dealer named W. S., who was considered not to be too scrupulous in his assertions when selling his animals. An unsophisticated small Highland farmer, who had reason to feel this to his cost, was one day at a diet of catechising held in the parish alluded to, but to all the questions asked by the catechist, the answers, if any, were far from satisfactory. At last he was asked what kind of man Adam was, when he at once replied, with a characteristic grin, "Weel, so far as I ken, he was na unlike our ain horse-jockey; very few gained by him, but many a one lost by him."

THE SOCIAL REFORMER

GLASGOW, JULY, 1881.

THE SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION AND THE DEBATE AND DIVISION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC RESOLUTION, JUNE 14, 1881.

THE following resolutions have been unanimously adopted by the Executive of the Association, June 21st, 1881:—

I. The Executive desire to record their intense satisfaction at—

(1) The adoption, on the 14th June, curt., of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Local Option Resolution by the House of Commons, for the second time in the present Parliament, by the encouraging majority of 42 (the vote being 196 to 154), the majority last session being 26.

(2) The maintenance of the truly splendid Scotch vote—it being the same as that of last year, namely, votes and pairs for 43 against 5.

(3) The cordial and energetic co-operation of the Scottish Temperance League and other organizations; the effective exertions of the Scotch deputation to London; and the hearty and general response of friends throughout the country to the appeal made to communicate with their Parliamentary representatives.

II. The Executive confidently anticipate that, as the result of this re-affirmation by the House of Commons of the principle of local option, the Government will recognise it to be their duty, at the earliest possible moment, to give practical effect to this decision by introducing a bill embodying this principle.

III. The Executive, in view of the probable action of the Government on this matter in the next session of Parliament, would very earnestly call upon all friends of temperance and social reform throughout the country to embrace every opportunity of furthering the movement at this important juncture by public meetings and otherwise, and of keeping the Prime Minister and the Government, as well as their Parliamentary representatives, fully and constantly informed regarding every expression of public opinion and the progress of the agitation generally.

SCOTTISH PERMISSIVE BILL AND TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The twenty-third annual meetings of this Association—business, social and public—will be held (D. V.) on Tuesday, 27th September, 1881.

The Executive trust that the friends of the movement throughout the country will arrange to be present, as business of great importance to the movement will be submitted to them on that day. Particulars will be given in future issues of this magazine.

R. MACKAY, Secy.

We confess we cannot quite understand the conduct of the Home-Rulers in Parliament. They profess to be the saviours of their, we will say, bleeding country, and the destroying angels of the landlords. But there are landlords and landlords in Ireland. Towards the lords of broad acres their rancorous hostility is evident, but to the lords of the public-house they seem to be rather on friendly terms. Yet the Land Question, about which we are so solicitous, involves only £11,000,000 sterling, while the drink bill of Ireland is about £13,000,000 sterling yearly. With these facts before them these patriots assisted the enemies of early closing of the public-houses in Ireland to defeat Mr. Meldoun's attempt on behalf of that measure of reform; for we are told that the rejection of his resolution was received with Home-Rule cheers! Little more than three weeks from that time the same party voted on Sir Wilfrid Lawson's resolution, which would give the people of Ireland the power to abolish public-house landlordism—to every sensible man's thinking Ireland's worst foe—but again these self-styled friends of Ireland, by a majority, declared their hostility to Sir Wilfrid's resolution. What can we think? Are we not entitled to believe that those that so act believe that with a sober people outrage in Ireland would be impossible?

That indefatigable Clerkenwell chaplain, Mr. Horsley, has thrown a ghastly light on intemperance in relation to suicide. From 300 cases of suicide he draws some inferences that should startle society. He says that the women are the greatest sinners, there being 183 of them to 117 men; that self-murder oftenest happens at twenty-two; 182 were attributable to drink; 145 to simple drunkenness; 27 due to combination with a quarrel or other disturbing cause; but it is never dreamed that every drinker is a suicide; the man who takes poison under medical order may be acting in good faith with himself, the drug may be necessary to counteract some morbid condition of his body; but the man who, for the pleasure it is supposed to give, daily uses alcohol is just as surely shortening his life as if say with a constitution fitted to last him 57 years he died by his own hand at 50. And it is curious to think what might have been the nature of his lot during these years of which he may have deprived himself.

On the worldly side a blameless reputation, a life of business ease, of active goodness, of suitable preparation for that solemn change which is the inevitable lot of man; the seeing around him his children growing daily wise and worthy, his children's children following hard on wisdom's heels. Contrast this with a life of fitful effort, of failure marred by the harvest of vice, of profligacy, of dying under the consciousness that one might have been better, more honoured, more regretted. Surely, here must be the very bitterness of death.

The fortieth report of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Providential Institution is before us, and exhibits truly wonderful success. The Directors completed 2198 policies, assuring the sum of £587,061 sterling. The present capital of the institution is £2,838,081, 5s. 10d. The portion of the report of most interest to our readers is in the comparison of the general section, composed of extremely temperate lives, with the temperate section composed of abstaining lives. There were in the general section 1485 expected claims involving a sum of £311,326; but the actual claims were 1480, involving £322,644 sterling, leaving a very small margin, indeed, between the expectation and reality as regards numbers, there being only a difference of 5 in the claims, while the sum paid exceeded expectation by £21,318. In the temperance section the claims expected were in number 933, in amount £193,748; the actual claims numbered 651, the amount reached £126,122, showing a very great difference in favour of the temperance supporters of the institution, the number being 282 less than the actual claims, the amount £67,606 less than expectation. Nothing could, in our opinion, show more clearly the value of a total abstinence life than the yearly reports of this institution. When we further inform our readers that the reversionary bonus in the temperance section ranges from 41 to 135 per cent., while on the general section it ranges from 26 to 83 per cent., we think we have said enough to induce them to do two things—stand fast by abstinence, and insure in this admirable institution.

It is curious to consider the appropriation of names as "Trade Mark" signboards by publicans. They have desecrated the name of almost every man of eminence, whether warrior, statesman, poet, or other. It seems as if Macbeth had them in view when he said, "our monuments are the maws of kites." Sometimes there is a manifest incongruity between some of these appropriations, as, for instance, when the "Angel," or the "Good Intent," the "Home of Friendship," or the "Jolly Boys," and so on, is used, because the ideas which these set forth are never found in the parlour of "mine host." Men who have been the benefactors of their race, statesmen who have raised their country to a high pitch of civilization: Earl Grey, Wilberforce; warriors who have defended her: Wellington, Nelson, Rodney; poets who in immortal strains sang of national worth and duty: Robert Burns, Walter Scott, Shakespeare, rare Ben Jonson, have all been glaringly conspicuous over portals that lead to vice and profligacy. Sometimes, however, there is a consistency shown in this respect, that, were the people wise, would be a lesson to them for ever. Some houses are called "the Dive," "the Gridiron," "the Vaults," and "the Shades." What so truly suggestive of plunging into a sea of profligacy, of being inflamed by public house liquors, and public house hangers-on, of having all virtues buried up, and at last of being doomed to dwell in the dread domain of an accusing conscience where hope never comes that comes to all. The ancients that have so exhaustively fathomed the here and hereafter of our lives, depict the abode of the departed—named by them the Shades—in colours that impress themselves upon the mind in all the characters of ceaseless despair. Happy, ten thousand times happy, are they that see behind all names in currency by publicans that the way through the public house is the way to the abodes of eternal despair; that leave its unblest pleasures for ever behind them; that dash its vessels with their baneful contents to the thirsty earth; and that labour on, fervently hoping that the day is dawning whose sun will shine upon our land for ever freed from public houses that now tempt and taint humanity.

On the 14th ult. Scotland, in the House of Commons, maintained the splendid vote given by her parliamentary representatives on the 18th June on behalf of the Local Option resolution; but she might have done more. Had the honourable members who voted favourably last year been able to return from their Whitsuntide holidays in time to support Sir Wilfrid, she would have had three-fourths of the Scottish parliamentary representation voting in favour of that resolution. The vote stands to-day almost the same as last year, namely, forty-three votes and pairs in favour, and only five votes against. The difference, we believe, is that there is one vote less and one pair more in favour of the resolution. This is truly remarkable. Last year that number supported Sir Wilfrid on the principle that the ratepayers should have a direct veto on the liquor traffic, this year they have, by an equally large vote, declared that it was expedient that that principle should be embodied in Government legislation. On principle and expediency the vote was almost identical. But had it been possible to have got four hon. members to pair against the resolution, the number for Scotland would have been 47 for, and only 5 against. We wish to know how much nearer unanimity Scotland requires to be before the Government of the day will feel itself justified in granting her ratepayers and householders a direct veto on the issue or continuance of licenses for trafficking in alcoholic liquors. This we can say, that on no other Scottish question can anything like such a decided expression of opinion be shown; and no other part of the United Kingdom offers an area better fitted for a trial of the Permissive Prohibitory legislation we so ardently desire. We rejoice to think that the present vote of Scottish parliamentary representatives is arresting the attention of Scotch members, and leading them to feel that it is not in the interests of Scotland that a question which receives such parliamentary support should continue to be overshadowed by the other parts of the kingdom, far behind it in the maturity of their convictions on the suppression of the traffic. Our friends have only to maintain and increase their efforts to deepen this feeling, growing in the minds of their representatives, and they may speedily expect to find themselves in the proud position of having constrained the Government into granting them the power of expelling the liquor traffic altogether from Scotland.

It is with sorrow we observe that, founding on the passage of the Local Option resolution in 1880, and on its re-affirmation in 1881, Mr. Caine, M.P., proposes a resolution asking the House of Commons to entrust the administration of the licensing laws "to Boards specially elected by the ratepayers." No doubt, like all Englishmen, Mr. Caine is dissatisfied with the present administration of these laws by irresponsible Justices of the Peace, and has a laudable anxiety to change the system which at present prevails in England. He has no doubt evidence to show that English Justices have, neither with dignity nor credit to themselves, nor advantage to those within their jurisdiction, administered these laws. But can any body of men properly regulate the liquor traffic? We say most distinctly no. For the most part of a century now Scotland has had a stringent licensing system, for the most part under the control of magistrates elected by the ratepayers, and we affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that their administration has increased rather than appeased the widespread dissatisfaction with the licensing system of Scotland. Many of these licensing magistrates were returned to Town Councils expressly to maintain a most stringent control over the liquor traffic. Many of them were abstainers. And yet it cannot be denied that they have failed to "regulate" the licensing system. We believe that no body of men are to be found capable, while maintaining the licensing system, of so regulating it as to render it tolerable. To-day, because of it, thousands are living in a condition worse than savagery; thousands are dying slowly but surely because of its operation; thousands are, in consequence of it, oscillating between the street, the prison, or the poor-house, and 120,000 miserable beings drop year by year into untimely graves. We cannot, in the face of these painful facts, look to licensing by men elected specially by the ratepayers with any more hopeful anticipations. The liquor traffic cannot be controlled. No body of men amongst us can be found to regulate the action of the liquor itself, they cannot prevent the drinker from getting liquor to an odious excess, and they cannot hinder the seller of it from selling as much as he can within legal limits, nor from supplying midnight traders with the vilest kinds of alcoholic liquors. Mr. Caine's motion is another of the many schemes brought forward to simply change the licensing authority—but he has evidently no intention of superseding it. In Liverpool he found the present system so unsatisfactory that he may well believe that a board such as he aims at may improve the drink traffic. We need not say that we agree with him, but so regulated it will still have baneful and widespread results. He may seek to prevent men having a large number of public-houses; he may make every publican directly responsible for the conduct of his premises; he may punish for selling to intoxicated persons, and frame other provisions for the regulation of "the trade." His aim is "to clearly define the principles and conditions that are to regulate the trade," and to leave to the ordinary tribunals of justice, as at present, the infliction of penalties incurred by the breaches of the law. We have been careful to look narrowly into all the licensing schemes laid before the country, especially Licensing Board proposals, and suppression never is contemplated by any one of them—they are all purely licensing schemes and utterly alien to the objects of the Scottish prohibitory agitation—the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic by the Votes of the Ratepayers. Genuine Prohibitionists do not want powers of administration, they want the power of suppression, and they want that power invested in the ratepayers or householders of the country. They want to have nothing to do with boards, nothing to do with regulation, nothing to do with penalties for selling; they seek the unconditional surrender and destruction of the drink traffic, and doing so and labouring for this desirable consummation, they can neither give cordial sympathy nor wish God-speed to the resolution of Mr. Caine.

On the 14th ult. the prohibitionists made another substantial advance in the House of Commons. Sir Wilfrid Lawson brought forward his resolution affirming the desirability of giving effect to the local option resolution adopted by the House a year ago. While Sir Wilfrid's speech was a most valuable contribution to the discussion, there was an evident disinclination to hear much on the subject, either as regards the evil or the remedy. Hon. members felt that all that was needful had been already said on the subject, and that action, and not discussion, was now required. Considerable anxiety was manifest to hear what the Government had to say, and whom they would put up to say it. Many members were out of sympathy with Sir Wilfrid Lawson for bringing forward his motion, the discussion of which at the present time would at least, they thought, embarrass the Government. Others, again, awed by the magnitude of the Land Bill, were of opinion that many would abstain from voting owing to their utter disbelief in the introduction of any Government measure this session. But when the division bell rang, and members flocked into the respective lobbies, it was seen that 354 divided on the resolution, 198 voters and tellers voting aye, and only 154 voters and tellers voting no—giving a majority of 42 votes for the hon. baronet's resolution. This is 16 more of a majority than last year, and yet 82 fewer members voted. Nothing could be more significant of the growth of the question in the constituencies than this increase in the face of the perplexities in which both the Government and the House are involved. It certainly augurs a not distant settlement of the question. But it is saddening to find Mr. Gladstone in the opposition again. Last year he had an ample excuse for his adverse vote; this year we have endeavoured in vain to find an excuse for him. He may have acted quite conscientiously in giving his vote against the resolution, but he cannot justify it. He is the only Liberal in Scotland voting against the measure, and, in his opposition he is deserted by the majority of the House, the majority of the members of his Government, and in his own Cabinet finds himself in a minority of one! We hope that he will be led by his position on this question, one hardly creditable to him, to give serious consideration to the question and show himself, by the measure he devises for the relief of his country from the evils of the liquor traffic, as worthy of similar admiration to that which he has evoked for great services done to his country. It is not an honourable position in which he stands at present—far from it. Little men and interested members of the trade may find some excuse for arraying themselves in opposition to the movement for the overthrow of the liquor traffic, but for the Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the friend of Italian and Bulgarian freedom, the friend of Ireland, to befriend the traffic in alcoholic liquor is to stain a bright fame and cloud a transcendent reputation. To have his name hailed in pot houses by noisy revellers with three times three because he voted for the publicans is enough to make angels weep and to plunge all true lovers of their country into sorrow and shame. The speech of Mr. Bright was one of the saddest ever delivered on this question on the floor of the House of Commons. Personally, it was in such painful contrast to the speeches of the hon. gentleman before he assumed the responsibilities of office. We did not always see our way to approve of all that Mr. Bright said or did, but we often admired his blunt outspokenness, his courage, and his eloquence. His speech on this occasion brought vividly, by painful contrast, to those who heard him, these eloquent efforts of his early years, when he was, like Sir Wilfrid, rousing his fellow countrymen to deal with a great wrong. No one could see in the abject apologist for a timid Government, the fearless agitator of other times. In his speech he condemned the Permissive Bill as pernicious, and was at no pains to hide the pleasure he felt at getting Sir Wilfrid to substitute his resolution for the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill; repudiated any moral obligation as resting on the Government to embody, in the immediate future, the resolution of last year in a comprehensive licensing measure; afforded no hope of the present Government dealing effectively with the liquor traffic, and relegated the duty of dealing with that traffic to some future administration. What a spectacle it must have been to his friends to have seen him balancing four measures to see which of them was of most importance to the interests of his country. Comparing the liquor traffic with the assimilation of the burgh and county franchise, with the land laws (of the United Kingdom), with the redistribution of Parliamentary seats, and with the municipal misgovernment of London! Such a speech is deplorable, and makes it only too manifest that the Government will require to be educated to clearer views on the drink traffic, and pressed into more vigorous and speedy action on this signally urgent question. In our observations on the vote of last year we earnestly warned our readers against reposing too great confidence in the Government, and against leaving, with easy credulity, the settlement of our question in their hands. Events have since then given point and force to that warning, and greatly diminished the confidence of the Prohibitory party in the sincerity of the intentions of the Government of the day to grapple effectually with the evils of the licensing system. The Government is the creature of the people, and can only enjoy public confidence so long as it is deserved. The duty of all interested in this question is to constrain that Government to grant power to the ratepayers and householders to protect themselves against the operations of the drink traffic. Already it is virtually disobedient to the wishes of the House; the Land Bill will not occupy its attention longer than the present session. During the recess it has time to frame a measure calculated to satisfy the reasonable and just demands of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his followers. If it is sincere we shall soon see the introduction of a wise and statesmanlike scheme which all staunch Prohibitionists can approve; if insincere, the best efforts of its friends will be ineffectual for shielding it from the justly-incurred disapprobation of all earnest Temperance Reformers.

LICENSE AT THE BAR OF GOD.—“Yes,” said the Rev. John Pierrepoint, “you have a license, and that is your plea; I adjure you to keep it. Lock it up among your choicest jewels—guard it as the apple of your eye—and when you die and are laid out in your coffin be sure that the precious document is placed between your cold and clammy fingers, so that when you are called upon to confront your victims before God you may be ready to show your plea of justification, and to boldly lay down your license at the bar of your Judge. Yes, my friend, keep it; you will want your license signed by the proper parties against that dread day.”

INTELLIGENCE.

PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—VI.

DR. CAMERON'S FREE EDUCATION—POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK—MALT DRAWBACK—EARLY CLOSING OF LIQUOR SHOPS IN IRELAND—FOREIGN BEER DUTY—DUTY OF THE POLICE AT PUBLIC MEETINGS—LICENSING OF RAILWAY CARRIAGES—POWERS OF IRISH MAGISTRATES—LOCAL OPTION DEBATE AND DIVISION—ANALYSIS OF THE VOTING—WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL.

May 18.—Dr. Cameron moved the second reading of the Free Education (Scotland) Bill, which, he said, was approved with practical unanimity in Scotland. Its object was to enable parents who could not afford to pay school fees to apply to School Boards, instead of the Parochial Boards, to pay the fees on their behalf, thus removing what the Lord-Advocate termed a blot on the Scotch Education Bill. After a lengthy discussion, Mr. Mundella counselled the withdrawal of the bill, as the Government hoped to be able to carry through their Educational Endowment Bill this session, and the bill would in that case prove a serious obstruction to the progress of education in Scotland. The motion was therefore negatived without a division.

May 19.—Mr. Fawcett, replying to Mr. Buxton, said the Government stocks Savings Bank scheme came into operation on 22nd November, and on 14th May, less than six months, the amount invested through the Trustee Savings Bank was £68,400, and through the Post Office Savings Bank £455,800. £177,500 was transferred from the Depositor's Account, and £278,300 was specially deposited for investment. Notwithstanding the withdrawal, the amount of savings had increased by £1,010,360, and the number of depositors by 331,795.

—Mr. Gladstone, in answer to Col. Barne, said that it was not the case that the malt drawback was allowed to some London brewers on the quantity as shown by their books, and not as gauged by the revenue officers.

May 20.—Mr. Meldon moved that, in view of the many and serious evils arising from drunkenness on Saturday nights in Ireland, and having regard to the evidence given before the Select Committees of 1868 and 1877, and the recommendation of the Lords' Report on Intemperance of 1878, this House is of opinion that the hours during which intoxicating liquors may be sold on Saturdays in the large cities and towns having a population exceeding 10,000, should be materially and immediately shortened. Mr. Forster, Mr. Daly, and Mr. M. Brooks opposed and Mr. A. M. Sullivan and Mr. Ewart supported the resolution. The House divided, when there voted for the resolution 33; against, 49; majority against, 16. The result was received with Home Rule cheers.

May 23.—On the House going into committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, Mr. Hicks moved, on clause 3, that the duty on foreign beer should remain at 8s. for the 36 gallons, instead of being lowered to 6s. 6d. Mr. Gladstone pointed out that the hon. gentleman's motion really involved an increase of duty, and could not be entertained. Captain Aylmer objected to the option given to test the quantity of alcohol in spirits by means of Sykes' hydrometer, by distillation, or otherwise, and moved the omission of the words "or otherwise." Mr. Gladstone explained that as the object of having these words was to prevent the Excise from being precluded from using a better method should such be discovered, he hoped that they would be retained. The motion was withdrawn.

May 26.—Sir William Harcourt, in reply to Mr. Labouchere, said that he conceived, in the interests of free discussion in this country, it was the duty of the police to see that people calling a public meeting should be supported in holding that meeting tranquilly—(cheers)—and should not be interfered with by those who might desire to commit disorder. At the meeting referred to by his hon. friend, the police were ordered to clear the platform, and, in doing so, used no greater force than was necessary. They performed a difficult duty with moderation and good temper.

May 26.—The proposed clauses as to the sale of intoxicating liquors, &c., in railway carriages were abandoned.

June 13.—The Attorney-General, replying to Sir W. Lawson, said that the Irish magistrates had powers, as English magistrates had, to order the closing of public-houses when they had reason to apprehend a riot. These powers the Irish magistrates commonly used when necessity called for their exercise.

LOCAL OPTION RESOLUTION.

June 14.—The House resumed at nine o'clock, when Sir Wilfrid Lawson rose to move, "That in the opinion of this House it is desirable to give legislative effect to the resolution passed on the 18th day of June, 1880, which affirms the justice of local communities being intrusted with the power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic." The hon. baronet began by remarking that this was a most unfortunate session for anybody to bring forward almost any subject, because for the time the attention of the country was directed almost exclusively to the important Government measure relating to the tenure of land in Ireland. Nevertheless, as the population of these islands was about 35,000,000 of people, it would not be out of place to call attention to a question which interested all of them. He had altered the resolution which had stood on the paper in his name for a long time. He gave notice of it at the end of last session, and he had hoped to deal with it if the Government did not intend to deal this year with the liquor question; but circumstances had changed since then, and it would now be folly to call upon the Government to bring in a great legislative scheme in reference to the liquor traffic, while they had the heavy Irish Land Bill on their hands. After taking counsel with some friends, he thought it would be better to move a resolution simply stating that this matter ought to be dealt with at the earliest possible opportunity. His resolution and the subject which called them there that evening dealt with a very great grievance. The grievance was that there was a law in this country by which irresponsible authorities were enabled to license places for the sale of intoxicating drink whenever they pleased to do so, and that having this power they exercised it to a very large extent. No doubt they exercised it with the very best intentions, but the result was not satisfactory. It would not be denied that the drinking habits of the people were the main cause of the pauperism which existed in this wealthy country. He observed with delight the efforts of the Postmaster-General to encourage saving habits among the people, but he often thought that it was very hard upon his right hon. friend that while he was doing all he could to establish savings-banks, all his attempts should be neutralised by the State allowing 150,000 men to take the money of the poor people by selling them drink in their licensed premises. Another evil which arose from drinking was the crime of the country. On this point he need not quote many authorities, but he should like to show to the House that this was not a new grievance which he and his friends had discovered, but that it was more than 200 years old. Sir Matthew Hale said, in 1670: "The places of judicature which I have held in this kingdom have given me an opportunity to observe the original cause of most of the enormities that have been committed for the space of nearly 20 years; and, by due observation, I have found that if the murders and manslaughters, the burglaries and robberies, the riots and tumults, the outrages and other enormities which have happened in that time were divided into five parts—four of them have been the issue and product of excessive drinking, of tavern or ale-house drinking." And Chief Baron Kelly, a few years ago, said that "two-thirds of the crimes that came before the courts of law of this country are occasioned chiefly by intemperance." He thought he had proved that pauperism and crime arose from drinking, and he might add that lunacy was occasioned more by the drinking habits of the people than by any other cause. There was another evil which he might mention. A bill was now before the House for dealing with electoral corruption, of which, as everybody knew, there would be very little if it were not for the drinking shops. (Hear.) The Committee which sat in the years 1853-54, and which was presided over by his right hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, said in its report—"Numerous committees of your honourable House bear unvarying testimony both to the general intemperance of criminals and the increase and diminution of crime in direct ratio with the increased and diminished consumption of intoxicating drinks." Again, his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster once said that the liquor dealers dealt in "articles which produced crime, disorder, and even madness." The right hon. gentleman's colleague, the President of the Board of Trade, said a few years ago that if something were not done, "the very stones would cry out." And the Home Secretary, speaking a few months ago, said:—"The character of the evil is of that sort which increases rather than diminishes with the prosperity of the people. . . . The whole industry of the country is at the mercy of this unhappy vice. . . . He was most deeply anxious to see if anything could be done to remedy it." Moreover, the Prime Minister himself remarked:—"It has been said that greater calamities are inflicted on mankind by intemperance than by the three great historical scourges—war, pestilence, and famine. That is true for us, and it is the measure of our discredit and disgrace." (Hear.) When a vice produced all the accumulated evils of crime, disorder, and madness, it was almost impossible to exaggerate its magnitude or mischievousness. Moderate men spoke on that subject sometimes in language that astonished many people. The hon. member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), who, the House knew, was not a fanatic or an enthusiast, once said that alcohol was "the devil in solution." (Laughter.) He would not deny that drink was delicious stuff. (Hear.) The hon. member who cheered agreed at least in that remark. (A laugh.) Knowing how largely it was consumed, and how many poor men gave up their honour, fame, health, happiness, and all that made life worth having, for the sake of consuming that drink, it would be absurd to deny that it was fascinating. The State knew that it was a very dangerous article, and endeavoured to minimise the danger. In a speech made by the noble lord, the Secretary of State for India last year, the noble lord said they had given to a certain body of traders, the licensed victuallers, a monopoly of the sale of intoxicating liquors on the implied condition that the moderate consumption of those articles should be permitted, and that the immoderate use of them should be restricted and forbidden; but he added that the existing system was not one which worked satisfactorily, and that the implied condition on which that valuable monopoly was granted to them was not observed by that body of traders. (Hear, hear.) The State had considered carefully the how, the when, and the where that drink was to be sold. It took the greatest pains to inquire into the character of those who sold it, and if any one wanted to know what the many virtues of the licensed victuallers were he had only to go to one of their dinners, presided over by the hon. member for Guildford. (Laughter.) He agreed with what had once been said by the right hon. member for Birmingham—namely, that great harm had been done by running down the character of the licensed victuallers. His own conscience was clear on that point. He had always said they were the finest body of men in the world. (Laughter.) That was his case. If anybody proved that they were disreputable, the answer would be easy: Let fresh men be put into the drinking-houses. But he said they were good men; that they had done their best, and that it was not the men but the system which had broken down. The President of the Board of Trade knew that, and had said on one occasion that if he thought that by putting on an apron and going behind a counter he could carry on that trade better than was now done, he would deem it to be a most religious and patriotic act. But the right hon. gentleman had never done that—(a laugh)—and why? Because the licensed victuallers were as good men as he. The State took great trouble as to the days and the hours at which the drinking-houses should be opened and shut; it also carefully arranged what sort of places they should be, and the magistrates were expected to look into the requirements of the district. But with all those minute precautions as to how the trade was to be carried on, the whole thing, as the noble marquis said, had been nothing more than a ghastly failure. (Hear, hear.) The working men of this country said that the licensing system did them a great deal of harm; and on the other hand, they found that there were many places where there were no drink-shops, and that they derived great benefit from their absence. He would take the case of Liverpool, which might be called the head-quarters of alcohol. There, however, the working men saw that there were large districts—one of which, he believed, belonged to Lord Sefton—where the landlord prohibited the opening of any drink-shop. Those districts might be called oases in the desert of drink in Liverpool; and the working men took houses in them in order to be away from contamination. Again, in London, there was the Shaftesbury-park estate, carried on by a company, one of the cardinal rules of which was that drink-shops should not be set up there. There were also many parishes where the landlords had prohibited drink-shops, and the result was that the people there were happy and comfortable, and thanked the beneficent landlords who had kept a great nuisance out of the place. Mr. T. Hughes, formerly a member of that House, had established a model colony in America, formed of the best-educated persons he could find. In his programme Mr. Hughes said that was a free country, where everybody did as he liked, but nobody was to sell any drink. (Laughter.) Our magistrates took care not to allow any drinking-shops to be opened next door to their own houses. When an application was about to be made for a license next door to him, the magistrate immediately wrote to his friends on the bench, urging them to be in their places to hear the application; there was a "whip" up, and the license was of course refused. Why was the poor man not to have the same means of protecting himself as the rich man enjoyed? He did not know whether the Government had faith in the whole people of the country availing themselves of this privilege which he sought to obtain for them; but of this he was certain—that a vast majority of the working people would avail themselves of it, and, as Dr. Guthrie had said, would sweep away the drinking-shops from among them. (Hear, hear.) He had more than once explained to the House of Commons the policy on this question which he wished them to adopt, and more than once had been defeated; but a change had since his last defeat been effected in their views. The election of 1880 was a remarkable one—he meant a remarkably good one. (A laugh.) When he looked at its result, he saw that the great publican bubble had been burst. (Hear, and a laugh.) The election decided that war should be made against the spirit traffic at home. (Hear, hear.) He moved his present resolution with all the more confidence that last year his resolution in favour of an efficient local option was adopted. It meant that no irresponsible body should be empowered to authorise the opening of drink-shops in neighbourhoods unwilling to have them, and that motion was founded on a resolution arrived at by Convocation itself. (Hear, hear.) If hon. members analyzed the vote of the House, they would see that while Ireland gave him a very considerable majority—nearly two to one—Scotland gave him a majority of eight to one in favour of local option, and Wales gave him a majority of twelve. No fewer than four members of Her Majesty's Government voted with him—he would not say how many members of the Government voted against him. (Laughter.) He was bound in honesty to say that the Prime Minister had voted against him, but the vote of the right hon. gentleman was counterbalanced by his speech, in which he said that he earnestly hoped the day was not far distant when the licensing laws would be dealt with "on the just principle to which his hon. friend had pointed ;" and that he regarded as worth twenty votes in favour of his resolution. (Hear, hear.) Well, twelve months had gone by, and the grievance had still remained unredressed. And what had the country suffered in consequence? Why, the newspapers had been filled with accounts of crimes and outrages committed in all parts of the country, and he believed that in one week there were in the United Kingdom more crimes and outrages committed through the influence of drink than were committed in six months in Ireland. (Hear, hear, and No, no.) To show the evil which resulted from the present system, he might mention a case which had occurred in times not very remote. Tynecastle was a district largely occupied by working men, and was situate just beyond the Edinburgh municipal boundary. A license was sought for a corner house, and 80 per cent. of the adult inhabitants of the district petitioned against it. Notwithstanding this, the court granted the license, and when the question came before the Confirmation Court, the license was confirmed, notwithstanding the fact that out of 71 householders within 60 yards of the premises, 61 had signed a petition against the granting of the license. It might be said that he ought to proceed by means of a bill, but it was well known that in these times it was almost impossible for a private and independent member to get a bill of any kind through Parliament, and therefore he had proceeded by means of a resolution, and ventured to urge that the time had come when the Ministry should take up the question and deal with it, for he could not admit that even the question of Ireland was more important than that which dealt with the evils which the drink traffic was inflicting on the people of this country. He could not, of course, expect that the Government would in the present state of public business bring in a bill to deal with this question, but he hoped there would be given to the House an assurance that there was an intention to deal with the matter or to support some members of the House who had an intention to do so in a legislative sense. In conclusion, the hon. baronet moved his resolution. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BERR, in seconding the resolution, testified to the interest which was taken in the evils resulting from the drinking customs of the country by the working classes and the public generally, and expressed a hope that the Government would give some assurance that they were prepared to grapple with it in such a way as that the inhabitants of localities should have a voice in the matter. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. DALY, in opposing the motion, said before the House adopted this proposal, the hon. baronet was bound to show that the drunkenness they all deplored resulted from the present licensing system. The hon. baronet had failed to prove that. But further he was bound to prove that the system he proposed to substitute for the present would decrease intemperance. To neither of these questions had the hon. baronet directed attention. (Hear, hear.) If they were to be governed at all by majorities, it should be by majorities of persons who actually used public-houses. (A laugh.) It was not fair to deprive a man of his liberties by the votes of those who, in taking away those liberties, themselves had nothing to lose. He objected to the scheme as totally unworkable. It would require the whole intellect of the present Cabinet to bring the resolution into a working scheme. A license was a really good, substantial property. He had frequently assisted in adjudicating on licensing questions, and he knew that it was next to impossible to procure a new license in or the transfer of an old license to a locality where the actual requirements were already supplied. The hon. baronet had slurred over the question of compensation, but the principle that it must be given had been affirmed over and over again, and notably in Dublin in 1877. The present Recorder refused to grant the renewal of a license on the ground that there were already licenses enough in the locality. The decision was appealed against and reversed in the Court of Queen's Bench, Lord Chief Justice May stating that existing vested interests should not be extinguished, even with a legitimate object, without compensation.

The hon. baronet spoke of the magistrates as an irresponsible body which had the power of forcing drink-shops on localities, but that was a wild flight of the imagination considering the points on which magistrates were bound to be satisfied, and the power of objecting inhabitants to appear before them. The existence of licensed victuallers' associations was a safeguard against an undue increase in the number of public-houses. The licensed victuallers possessed a monopoly, and it was their interest to keep others outside the ring. (Hear, hear.) If drink was to be sold, it was better for them it should be sold by 11 than by 12. In this fact there was some protection against drink being forced on localities and licenses being granted recklessly. The amount of property involved was 30 or 40 millions, and one-third of that granted a few years ago to Ireland would have made that country a Garden of Eden. (Laughter.) It would be premature and unwise in the House or the Government to hold out the shadow of a promise that the principle of the resolution should be embodied in a bill.

Captain AYLMER said the resolution contemplated local communities taking the place of the magistrates of the land, but the hon. member had not shown what was to be the formation of the body that was to take the place of the magistrates.

Sir W. LAWSON explained that he only proposed a veto which would be exercised by not licensing, not by licensing.

Captain AYLMER continued that it had not been shown how local communities were to exercise the veto—whether the power would be vested in all the residents, whether the veto would depend on manhood suffrage, or whether the women would have a voice. Anyhow, those who were most likely to have the interests of temperance at heart would be most likely to absent themselves from the poll; they would not go to the poll to meet the rowdies and the roughs opposed to temperance. (Laughter and cheers.) The decision would not be arrived at independently, for the public-house people would get at those who had votes, and would use every means to secure their votes for the renewal of licenses. It was possible that in some little gardens of Eden a majority might decide to do without drinking-shops. But it was not certain that other places would not take the opposite course of increasing their drinking-shops. He presumed that by local option those people would have the right to vote for an increase as well as a decrease. What did the resolution mean? It seemed to him that it meant the Permissive Bill pure and simple. (Hear.) It was very certain that if the State found that the sale of spirituous liquors was injurious to the State, it would be the duty of the Government at once to suppress, not only the sale, but the manufacture of those liquors. (Hear.) He did not think that it was the duty of the State to put down altogether the manufacture of spirits, beer, and such like things because a few people used drink to excess. If, then, it was admitted that the manufacture of these things was to go on, on what ground could it be said that the sale of them was not to be permitted. To him it seemed to be utter nonsense to say that a man might manufacture an article but must not sell it. He was as much in favour of temperance as the hon. baronet was in favour of doing away with the fearful effects of intemperance in this country, but he was sure the hon. baronet was not going the right way. The right way was to educate the people as to the vice of intemperance. By making public-houses large, more would be done to promote temperance than could be done by means of the resolution. (Hear, and laughter.) He opposed the resolution because it did not define the mode by which the hon. baronet proposed to do away with the vice of intemperance. The principle of local option was altogether wrong, however applied. After all, it was nothing but tyranny—the tyrannizing of a majority over a minority. (Hear.)

Mr. H. SAMUELSON had never voted for the Permissive Bill, but he had long thought it was necessary to stop what he believed to be a great evil. There was not one word in the speech of the hon. baronet about the Permissive Bill. He understood that the hon. baronet had for the present altogether thrown aside the Permissive Bill, leaving it to the Government to decide what measures should be introduced. The onus of deciding the nature of the constituency that was to have the power of limiting the number of publichouses should be thrown upon the Government. He would never support any measure which the Government might bring forward unless it provided for the compensation of those whose interests would be affected by it, such compensation to come, not out of the funds of the country, but out of those of the particular locality. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) There was a strong and a growing feeling that some determined effort should be made by the Legislature to put a stop to the evil of drunkenness. For the reasons he had given he should have great pleasure in supporting the resolution. (Hear.)

Mr. HICKS remarked that it appeared that the hon. baronet thought that after so many hours of the day had been devoted to land, the evening should be appropriated to water. (Hear, and a laugh.) He was not there to deny the evils of drunkenness, but, while he was prepared to support any reasonable measure that would contribute to the sobriety of the country, he was not prepared to sanction any bill that was founded upon the principle of total abstinence. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BRIGHT.—The question before the House is one, Sir, of great importance, and is one in which both sides take a great interest, and can be discussed without heat and without passion. We have nothing to gain by making any mistake as to the question to be submitted to the House. Hon. members who have spoken on the other side of the House have, I think, not dealt fairly with the resolution of the hon. member for Carlisle. They have tried it as if it had contained the same grievous and almost poisoned elements which some believe the Permissive Bill to have embodied, and not the simple resolution which I think we all can understand. The hon. member for Cork has drawn rather a fearful picture of the consequence of allowing minorities to tyrannise over majorities. The hon. member for Maidstone has drawn a picture in rather darker colours, and the hon. member for Cambridgeshire has said that he would not set his seal on any project having total abstinence for its object. Well, I would say that these observations have no real reference to the resolution before the House. The resolution does not go further than to refer to the mode of granting licences, and to say that that mode ought to be in accordance with the wishes and wants of the people. (Hear, hear.) It binds the House to nothing more than that the present system of granting licences is not the best system that can be adopted. I myself took that view when the question was less discussed than it now is. I was always of opinion that the Permissive Bill was a main obstacle to licensing law reform—that it contained a principle which the House of Commons was not likely in our time to adopt, and I did what I could to secure that that Bill should be withdrawn. (Hear, hear.) The proposal now submitted to the House is one which every hon. member should support who believes that anything can be done by the House of Commons to discourage intemperance and get rid of that which is a great disgrace to the nation. (Hear, hear.) We have now arrived at this point. The House last year agreed that the present system was not a good one—at least, was not the best that might be adopted. Public opinion, it was said, was in favour of some change in reference to licensing for the sale of intoxicating liquors. My experience in political agitation leads me to think that it is no great charity towards those who are leaders in a great political agitation to think that they are right in believing it to be necessary and desirable to seize every legitimate opportunity to promote, by open discussion, the growth and development of public opinion on the particular question they have in hand. (Hear, hear.) Therefore I do not object at all to the course taken by the hon. member in asking us to re-affirm the proposition submitted to the House last year. I am sure that his purpose is not to ask us to agree to anything like the Permissive Bill, but it is to compel the Government—I do not use the word in
