Teachers go back to University to encourage students

The University of Central Lancashire has been selected to take part in an innovative scheme allowing teachers to spend time back at University, looking at ways of encouraging their own students to come into higher education.

Excellence Fellowship Awards will be offered to teachers in areas where there is traditionally a low take-up in university places, in the hope of giving teachers the opportunity to spend a term away from their school or further education college, working on projects that will encourage pupils to aim higher and go to university.

The Government's message is that, by the year 2010, 50 percent of young people should be entering higher education, and this new initiative will complement much of the current work being done by the University in knocking down barriers and increasing access to pupils from low participation neighbourhoods. Over the past four years the University has worked, with local colleges, in partnership with Education Action Zones in Cumbria on projects such as the U-Can@UCLan summer school, aimed at 12-16 year olds, and on the employment of students from the University to go into local schools and to act as role models to help raise the aspirations of the pupils.

The University has received £60,000 to operate the pilot scheme over the next two years and is the only University in Cumbria and Lancashire to be selected to participate by the Department of Education and Skills. Teachers chosen for the award will be expected to share the benefits of their fellowships with schools and colleges in their local area.

Director for Cumbria Professor Norman Burrow said, "This is great news for Cumbria. Participation in higher education by young people in Cumbria is lower than almost anywhere in the country, even though there is quite a lot of opportunity in the county, particularly at our Cumbria Campus at Newton Rigg. This initiative will help us to reach young people in a very positive way through their teachers."
