

POSSIBILITIES AND PROBABILITIES.

BY EVAN JONES.

READERS! To each and all we wish a happy new year! May it dawn upon you like the smile of heaven, and assure you of many of the richest blessings of a merciful God! May it find you engaged, heart and soul, in doing good, so that each successive day, may witness on your part a firmer resolve to serve our Master who is in Heaven. We take it for granted that you are anxious to serve your generation according to the will of God, and, therefore, offer no apology for introducing Abstinence to your notice, as a cause wanting, and worthy of, your best energies. We have it in our heart to tell you what the Temperance movement may accomplish, and what under present circumstances it is likely to effect. In short, we intend to beg your attention to the Possibilities and the Probabilities of the case.

There are many things possible, which are not probable, but there is nothing probable which is not possible. In labouring for the spread of a good cause, we should not rest satisfied with the possible and probable; it should be our never failing aim to reach the actual. The Temperance cause unfolds before us a land rich in beauty and loveliness; and if we be true to God and man, we may enter and take possession. It will be our own fault if the possible is not reduced to the probable, and the probable converted into the actual. Therefore, let us be "up and doing."

It is delightful to know that one's labours have not been in vain. No confidence is so strong as that which arises from experience. Here we are on firm ground. We deal not in phantasies, but we have before us sober realities. Teetotalism has done much good, and what it is still calculated to do, is not at all problematical. Its mystery has long been solved. Thousands of living witnesses proclaim aloud its value. Thousands upon thousands live, move, and have their being of happiness under its influences, and but for its timely appearance, the portals of the grave would have closed upon them long ago. They would have been lost to all the enjoyments of life, and their destiny would have realized to its fullest extent, the meaning of those awful and soul-rending words—"without hope, and without God in the world."

It is a melancholy but undeniable truth, that our drinking usages are the bane of England's prosperity. From them arises intemperance and its fearful train of evils. Sixty thousand are annually sacrificed to this man-eating Moloch of our land. All our philanthropic, social, moral and religious institutions have their benevolent operations paralyzed by the foul destroyer. We bend beneath its curse, and there is no health in us. This mill-stone is tied round our necks, and we sink in the deadly waves. Unless we speedily bestir ourselves with a giant's strength, the beauty of our fast-anchored isle will be numbered among the things of the past. No Atlas in creation can long sustain a community so oppressed by intemperate habits as is ours. We must have a giant Thor to drink the river, or it will deluge the whole land; but all communication between river and ocean must be cut off, or it will exhaust the inexhaustible Thor himself.

The Temperance reformation aims at abolishing intemperance by promoting the universal disuse of intoxicating drinks. Here then we commence our list of possibilities. It is possible to abolish intemperance, and quite possible to do so by promoting the universal disuse of those pernicious liquids by which intemperance is created. Intemperance is an evil—a violation of physical and moral laws, and all evil is to be conquered by truth. The ultimate victory of truth is not only probable, but certain, for which we "thank God and take courage." So it is in this case; there is a great work before us, but one in which we are aided by moral and physical laws, whose sanction is unreservedly given to our undertaking. In every step we advance, and in every eminence we gain, we are constitutionally right; then we are sure to be morally so, as all the laws of the human economy are in perfect unison with all the eternal and immutable principles of morality. Men are under no physical necessity to drink, and assuredly, no moral necessity exists. When they abstain, they neither offend God nor man; neither earth nor heaven will frown upon them. It is, therefore, possible to carry on the principles of Teetotalism to their fullest extent. We know that men have no need of intoxicating drinks. They can do without them; and millions do actually exist without tasting them; and that without losing any single particle of the constituent elements of true happiness. It is, therefore possible to banish intemperance from the land.

If it is possible to remove the cause, then, of course, it is within our power to do away with the effects. Friends and foes of temperance, behold what manner of country our own would be, were that the case! Who can divine the horrible effects of our drinking usages? Who is he that will undertake to solve the moral problems connected with the statistics of intemperance? Can its moral wastes be reduced in dimensions within the bounds of finite comprehension. In truth, the task is not easily done! The highest and best medical authority in the world has proclaimed "that a very large portion of human misery, including poverty, disease and crime, is induced by the use of alcoholic or fermented liquors as beverages." All this may be safely and effectually removed by the agency of Teetotalism. Human misery—disease, poverty, and crime, how numerous their victims! Have we any fellow-feeling for our brother man? If we have, assuredly we cannot lend the sanction of our example to any practice that would engulf him in poverty, rack him with disease, steep him in crime, and surround him with misery. Yet men,—our very flesh and blood,—are thus rendered miserable here and hereafter, and they are so rendered by the drinking usages of Christian England! The Temperance movement aims at destroying these usages, and seeks to release the captives of misery, and would fain fill their mouths with "songs of deliverance." It is possible;—shall it be done?

The drinking usages of England have been "perniciously wrought up and composed into a scheme of extraordinary regularity, detriment, and malignity." They besiege our path from the cradle to the grave. Like an everlasting incubus, they oppress all our energies, and deprive us of all rational joys. Each day of our existence, our chains become more firmly rivetted. The river of death swells higher and higher, and the hope and pride of our land are swept to destruction by the rushing torrent. But the compact phalanx may be broken, the besiegers may be scattered, the incubus may be driven away, the chains may be broken, and the sweeping torrents may be rolled back, if the principles of Teetotalism are accepted and practiced.

Think how this mighty system of pollution and death is upheld in our land. Not less than 100,000 public houses are constantly open for the sale of these destroying beverages. Not less therefore than 100,000 families directly subsist on the wages of iniquity, and the produce of accursed depravity. All branches of the traffic are extended and sustained, by an energy as untiring as it is infernal. All charms, blandishments and sanctions are invoked for its honour. It seeks to league itself with all provident, benevolent, moral and religious organizations. With a gory sacrilegious hand, it lays hold on Bible authority for its horrid, matchless crimes. With daring impiety and unrivalled blasphemy, it aims at engraving the autograph of divinity on its death warrants! According to the last Annual Report of the National Temperance Society, it seems that from 1801 to 1846 inclusive, the spirits' stream of these United Kingdoms amounted to no less than 1,029,628,668 gallons; of these there were 552,039,743 imperial gallons of alcohol,—“a subtle poison at war with the physical, intellectual, social, and religious interests of man,—a perpetual fountain of disease, poverty, crime, temporal and spiritual death; never needful to men in health, in any clime or any employment.” This river of death has made England the most drunken country in the world. During the period, and for the quantity above referred to, the enormous sum of £666,651,600, was expended in the purchase of Spirits, and the result is poverty, disease, crime and immorality, in almost every imaginable and possible form. Mr. Wakley, the Coroner for West Middlesex, has stated,—“Gin causes me to have annually 1000 more inquests than I should otherwise hold;” and the statement that 60,000 individuals are annually poisoned by intoxicating drinks rests upon indubitable evidence. In Oldham we find that from 1841 to 1846, 3000 petty offences directly traceable to intemperance were committed, and that 50 violent deaths had taken place. At Sunderland in nine public houses visited by a deputation, 450 individuals, chiefly young persons, both male and female, from 15 to 20 years of age, were found, exhibiting the most disgusting immorality and debauchery. At Bristol £300,000 are annually spent for strong drinks. The returns of the money spent in Glasgow for intoxicating drinks, from May 1845 to May 1846, was £1,200,000. Mr. Chadwick calculates that nearly as much is spent on these pernicious beverages annually, as the accumulated savings in the whole of the savings banks during 18 years that they have been in existence, and it is not improbable but that double the amount is annually spent, as Mr. Chadwick's estimate is confessedly low, scarcely half that given by the Parliamentary Committee on Drunkenness. The enormous sum of £47,806, 8s. is annually spent by the inhabitants of Redcliffe and Pilkington in intoxicating drinks, whilst during the same period, not more than £3,700 (not one-twelfth of the offerings to Bacchus) is raised for the support of all places of worship, sabbath and day schools, bible, missionary and tract societies, and all other benevolent institutions; and in fine, for every pound raised in Great Britain for the support of the Gospel, FIFTY POUNDS are paid for strong drinks!

Such is a faint outline of our condition. Haunted by poverty, ravaged by crime, pestered with disease, and surrounded by all that is horrible and godless, our country poises on the brink of ruin! Shall it fall headlong to the abyss of destruction, or shall it regain its balance and return to the paths of sobriety? Are we prepared to part with our idolatry and to abandon our curse? Shall the plague be stayed? Total Abstinence is pointed out by a long-suffering and merciful God, as a “way of escape” from the grievous bondage in which we are held, and if embraced it is possible for our country to rise in power, influence and religion, and become the glory of the whole earth!

We hope that this is PROBABLE. But in our estimate of the probable, we must always endeavour to form a correct view of the agencies that are employed. It is true, that it is not within the power of mortals to command success, yet they may deserve it. Give us the suitable agency, and we have no reason to fear that the divine blessing shall be withheld. We are of opinion that at no period of its history has the Temperance cause been so promising as at present. There may be fewer societies well organized,—many may have fallen off,—perhaps less agency is employed, and, it maybe, the current is not so strong and sweeping; yet, assuredly, we have deep waters. The bearings of the question begin to be better understood, the connexion of drunkenness with poverty, crime, and disease, excites more attention,—the prodigal waste of human food speaks, in a small still voice, words of severe rebuke to the benevolent and humane,—a spirit of self-respect and moral elevation is abroad,—an earnest longing for the dignity of men is awakened,—education imparts its refined influences, medical prejudice is lessened,—ancient but fallacious notions are exploded, and a respectful hearing is generally conceded to the Temperance principle.

We conceive that the four elements we must principally wield, in order to ensure success, are the agency of the Lecturer, the agency of the medical man, the agency of the Press, and the agency of the Pulpit. A few words on each separately may not be amiss.

Our first want is an agency adapted to meet the conditions of all classes; and we think it may be found in the division we have given. In order to reach the masses, no agency will be so effectual as that of the living voice. The multitude will best understand men of like passions with themselves. To our agents, in an especial manner, belongs the department of popular illustration. Homely incidents, and every day facts are at their command. No other class of agencies can reach the mass with so much effect, and address their business and bosoms with so much success. Punch has described the home of the rick-burner: the Temperance agent is the appropriate person to paint the home of the drunkard. There are many who are unable to read; their perceptions have been blunted to such a degree as to make written language almost unintelligible to them. They are beyond the reach of the doctor, the press, and the pulpit. The mild tones of the human voice alone can reach them so as to speak compassion in their despairing ears. The improvement and extension of our agency must on no account be neglected. The Missionaries of Temperance must be increased, if we wish to restore the masses of abject prodigals by which we are surrounded.

Medical Agency is much needed, and must be obtained, before we can hope to succeed with moderate drinkers. At present Wine and Porter are amongst our most successful antagonists. In our own person we have suffered a kind of annoyance, almost constituting a living martyrdom, from the partizans of these pernicious liquors. Certain we are, that many have been frightened out of their Teetotalism, if not of their wits, by the dint of perseverance and lamentations of the Wine-Porter fraternity. An opinion is prevalent among the majority of people, that Wine and Porter possess some wonderful strengthening qualities; and too often we find this absurd prejudice sanctioned by medical men. In order to obtain suitable medical agency, medical men must be themselves instructed. To them, by right and by courtesy, belongs the privilege of pronouncing on the wholesome or unhealthy qualities of different agents. The creation of sound medical opinion on the properties of intoxicating drinks is essential to our complete success. As a whole, the medical profession is eminently benevolent and humane; and the misery produced by social drinking will not long escape condemnation from a class so universally and deservedly respected. But our Temperance brethren must bestir themselves. Every town and village ought to have its special fund for the distribution of knowledge. Let medical men be well and regularly supplied with Temperance literature;—let medical certificates be obtained in our provincial towns and rural districts, and the influence of medical men will soon flow into the right channel.

The Agency of the Press is highly important. The unassuming tract will find its way to quarters where our agents would be unwelcome. We must not content ourselves merely by the creation and improvement of Temperance literature, but must seek admission to the pages of our religious periodicals. In the respect with which our claims are treated we behold an encouraging omen. Our right to be heard is now almost universally conceded. Our friends must watch the proceedings of Coroner's Inquests, in order that "true and faithful verdicts" may be returned, which is not always the case, as publicans in many localities, form a kind of stereotyped jury, whose stock of verdicts amount to no more than "Accidental death" and "died by the visitation of death." Let the deeds of Alcohol be faithfully represented to the conductors of our local journals, and let no means be lost of circulating far and wide, in thousands and tens of thousands, such appeals as will have tendency to enlighten, to impress, and to persuade. By illustration, by persuasion, by argument, and by earnest and unceasing intreaty, let us be instant in season and out of season, to teach the true principle of temperance.

In England we have not received the support we might reasonably expect from the agency of the Pulpit. It is strange and humiliating that the pulpit, in a land eminent for its reputed orthodoxy and zeal for God's glory, should be almost the last agency to be enlisted in behalf of Temperance. In Wales and America, ministers have more generally given their support, and we need not stay to specify the happy results. It must be our aim to enlist the sympathies of the rising ministry, and from its earnestness we have more to hope, perhaps, than from their fathers. The approaching ministerial conference at MANCHESTER is destined, we trust, to exercise much influence for good. Let there be an effective gathering of brethren, and let England and the world know, that these men of God are fully alive to the necessity and adaptation of the Temperance Movement. The day is not distant when our cause will command an imposing array of the most influential ministers of the land. Would that their mighty influence were soon thrown in favour of a remedy which seeks to annihilate the great curse of the English race?

We have thus briefly hinted at the various measures which we believe it would be wise in the temperance body to adopt under present circumstances. We think, too, that it is highly probable our cause will make a considerable progress in the course of this year, in each of the departments we have specified. But we must not "be weary in well doing." Our patience must not be exhausted. Our faith must remain undisturbed; our labour of love must proceed, and God will "establish the work of our hands." Then shall we see the possible reduced to the probable, and the probable to the actual. That day will be a happy epoch in the history of man, and angels will rejoice over a consummation in every way so desirable.

CONSCIENCE VERSUS TEETOTALISM.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

COURTEOUS READER:—

A NEW YEAR has now dawned, and we most cordially pray that it may be one of the best years of your life. We need not tell you that it can and ought to be so. Not that we mean, that you are able to avert every ill that may encounter you in your path. We cannot assure you, or ourselves, against every disease, against crosses, losses or death; but we can do better, we can, by divine aid, turn every affliction into a blessing, so that we shall be constrained to attest that "it was good to be afflicted." Our lot on earth is not so dreary as many suppose. God has not forsaken us; the Saviour has not left us orphans. There is far more happiness and security at our disposal than we generally imagine. A large portion of our misery arises from our own folly. We either create the sorrow, or refuse to have our tears wiped away. We not unfrequently inflict the wound, and then wilfully reject the cure.

Yes! though the path may be thorny, or the hill rugged, yet the traveller may cheer himself with a song. Yonder poor disciple, with hardly a penny a day to live upon, is enjoying his hard fare, and sings over the meal which faith and gratitude have turned into a sacrament. That bedridden widow, who has not left her sick chamber for seven years, is happier than the queen. The floor of that mean apartment, rarely visited by the wealthy, is trodden by angels. Jacob's ladder is there, celestial visitants are constantly ascending and descending, and the Patriarch's God stands above it. In a word, that humble dwelling is "the house of God, and the gate of heaven."

You may say we are writing too religiously; but that is impossible. Man was made to be religious, every human being must be religious every moment of his life. Every free action is a moral action, and every moral action is a religious action. 'Tis true the religion may be a bad one, but then every moral agent has some rule of conduct, and that rule is his religious directory. There may be as many standards of religion as there are persons in the world, but still each one of them, is, to its pos-essor, a monitor and guide. It is not a question whether you shall be religious, you must have some moral code,—however low or base:—the question is, shall your religion be true or false, right or wrong? Nor need you be long in deciding which religion is correct and which is not. That creed which teaches you to avoid every thing that is wrong, and to do every thing that is right, is the true creed; and the only system of faith and practice which is thus pure, just and benevolent, is CHRISTIANITY.

Now to be right and to do what is right, is one of the purest sources of felicity. The guilty cannot be truly happy. CONSCIENCE is an essential attribute of soul, from which no human being can flee. It may be blinded or stupified, but you cannot destroy it without destroying the soul. Its very slumbers are ominous, for it will gather strength from repose, and by and bye awake with the vigour of a giant, and the rage of a fiend. Conscience is the arbiter of our happiness or misery. We may address it as Balak did Balaam.—“I wot that he whom thou bleesest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed.” Cain was a “fugitive and a vagabond.” How far he fled! how widely he wandered! but no where could he escape from Cain the murderer. The hand that slew his brother, and the heart that devised the deed, slept where he slept, rose where he rose, and sojourned where he sojourned. The place where he at last fixed his abode, was justly called the “land of Nod,” “the land of the fugitive,” who had laboured in vain to fly from himself. Eternity affords no asylum in which the sinner can take refuge from his conscience.

We have said, courteous reader, that we cordially wish you a happy new year, and that its whole duration and close may be as propitious as its dawn; but to wish you a happy year, is to desire that you may have a good conscience. You might wear a crown, but a guilty conscience would line it with thorns; you might roll in wealth, but an accusing conscience would haunt you like a demon: you may launch into the pleasures of the world, but conscience will register every deed, and foretell a day of reckoning. Milton has put the deepest philosophy into the mouth of the Arch-fiend when he exclaims.

Can make a hell of heaven, a heaven of hell.”

We all seem rather to inhabit ourselves, than dwell anywhere else. The world within is our home and constant abode. Our thoughts are our mansion, our food, our wealth and inheritance. Everything is viewed through the medium of thought. Here the present world, the world to come, ourselves, our friends, our foes, and even the Deity, are reflected, surveyed and contemplated, and hence, to have peace within is heaven. When all is tranquil around, the mind may be like the troubled sea; and, on the contrary, the last thunder may roar, the earth quake, and the heavens dissolve and melt with fervent heat, and yet the soul, far from feeling the least alarm, may exult and sing. Nor need we wait for our happiness till death has unlocked the portals of bliss. Why not be happy now? To walk by faith, and serve our generation according to the will of God, will enable us to realise no small amount of blessedness.

The day in which we live is the most important that has ever dawned on the world. Better ages are in reversion for our children, but the present period has no parallel in the history of our forefathers. Many prophets and righteous men desired to see these days, but died without realising their wishes. We can do good without end, societies for the physical, the social, the intellectual and spiritual welfare of mankind, greet us everywhere, and we have full liberty to join the ranks of any or all the philanthropists by whom they are conducted. If we stand “idle all the day long,” we cannot plead as an excuse that “no one was willing to hire us.” All our societies are calling for agents. Ten times the good might be done if we had more funds and more hands. The fields are “white unto harvest;” “the harvest is great, but the labourers are few.” The precious grain is actually perishing for want of reapers. But to enumerate our various societies would almost exhaust our paper, and therefore we will only mention one, and need not add that we are about to commend to your notice THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT is of comparative late origin, but has already astounded both friend and foes by its marvellous growth. Like the gospel, it is good for all. And it not only would benefit every individual who adopts its principles, but would also become an auxiliary to every other useful and benevolent society in the country. ‘Tis true it cannot be worked without funds, but then a mere fraction of what is saved by giving up the use of intoxicating liquor, would be sufficient to spread temperance throughout the world. One twentieth of what is spent, or rather wasted, by drinking, would more than double the income of all our religious and philanthropic institutions put together. So that here we have the Great AUXILIARY Society to all other Benevolent Societies in the world. Now, respected reader, we want you to join this noble benefactor to the human family, this glorious help meet of philanthropy. The highest luxury is that of doing good. This is the only thing for which we were born, the only object worth living for. Life is death without it. To exist merely to eat, to drink, to decorate our persons, gratify our appetites, or accumulate riches, is nothing more than spiritual death. Better to have been carried from the cradle to the tomb, than thus to waste our days, and incur the indignation of heaven.

SIXTY THOUSANDS of drunkards are said to die annually, and in a state of intoxication to pass from earth to the great tribunal. Only think of the soul waking from the stupidity of debauch, and finding itself in the presence of God. Language cannot express, thought cannot conceive, the horror of such a lost spirit. Who would not die a thousand deaths to rescue one such miserable being from so dreadful a destiny? But for the salvation of such, our death is not wanting. The Saviour has already “died for our sins, and risen again for our justification.” Our work is to give up the cup that poisons and stupifies the minds of our fellow creatures. Strong drink is one of the greatest barriers to christianity. Every good institution is plundered and weakened by it. It robs the treasury of benevolence and religion; it makes the heart hard, and dries up every fountain of natural affection. It can change the father into a demon, and render the tender-hearted mother more cruel than the tigress or the vulture. It can superannuate the minister of the sanctuary, or, like the dragon of the Apocalypse, draw the stars from heaven, and cast them into outer darkness. Would that we had a list of the members lost to the church last year by strong drink, and of the sunday scholars ruined by the same fatal cup. What a tale would be told. Or, on the other hand, could we narrate what Temperance has already done, what a glorious result would be unfolded. The Report of Total Abstinence has not yet been written, and in fact never can be written. Only eternity can reveal its distinguished achievements. The great seal of heaven has already pre-eminently stamped its deeds.

READER, we want you to join our ranks; or if you belong to our bands, to exert yourself to the utmost for the triumph of our principles. Can you have a good conscience if you use a liquor which injures your own body and mind, and is drowning others in perdition? Will you encourage a practice which more than any other stays the march of benevolence, truth, liberty and religion? Where is your conscience, if it allows you to be an enemy to yourself and your species? Work with us in this good cause, that you may have the smile of the Eternal, an approving heart, a heaven within, a happy year, a useful life, a peaceful death, and a glorious end.

A FEW PENCILINGS FROM OUR NOTE BOOK.

"Here a little, there a little."

I. IGNORANCE OF THE MASSES ON TEETOTALISM.

It is most deeply to be regretted, that, at the present enlightened period, after all the information which has been furnished, and all the scientific inquiries which have been pursued, great ignorance, and also great delusion, prevail, with regard to the real nature and tendency of alcoholic drinks. There are, we are persuaded, even now, multitudes who are perfectly unacquainted with the subject. They consider that these drinks are nutritious; that they are desirable, and even necessary, for the human system, to maintain its tone, and to keep up its energy. Those of us who are philosophically, medically, scientifically acquainted with the subject, must endeavour, in our respective circles to dispel this ignorance—to correct these delusions; and, if we do not act in this manner, we are not discharging our duty to our fellow men, who are injuring themselves, and, perhaps, irretrievably injuring their families, by the habits which they have formed during the whole of their past lives, and to which they still cling with so much tenacity. Never let us be unwilling, or afraid, to speak out plainly and boldly, for we have the light of science to illumine us, and to pour on others, and recent medical discoveries are most convincing and decisive.

II. THOUGHTS ON THE SUBJECT OF TEETOTALISM.

We wish, most devoutly, we could induce the community to reflect, long and deeply, on the claims of Teetotalism. We wish they would inquire, calmly, deliberately, profoundly, inquire on this transcendently important subject. We should cherish hope immediately; we are persuaded that they could not resist the evidence which is furnished, that they could not dispute, much less rebut, the facts which are produced, the evidence is so clear, so philosophical, so decisive—the facts are so numerous, so startling, so overwhelming.

III. THE STATISTICS OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

The statistics which can be produced, to illustrate the benefits, the invaluable benefits of the great Temperance Reformation, are not yet complete; still, so far as they extend, they are very satisfactory and impressive. A few years ago, we had no statistics, we were unable to refer specifically, on a large scale, to the positive advantages of Teetotalism; but now, our tables are accurate and extensive—our statistics are ample and continually increasing; and their precision and minuteness must strike every person of calm and intelligent reflection. We can now positively state, that what we advance is not mere theory, but based on experience,—confirmed, triumphantly confirmed, by fact. We can make our appeal to numbers, and an almost boundless variety of cases, in all parts of the empire and the world, and we can say, unflatteringly, and with lively gratitude to God, "Look at these!" Here are figures which cannot be shown to be inaccurate; here are calculations which cannot be disproved!"

IV. THE DIFFICULTIES OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

In connection with the Temperance Movement, how many difficulties are there to grapple with, and overcome; how accumulated and peculiar are the discouragements against which we have to contend; and patiently, yet vigorously, endeavor to remove. Ignorance—apathy—prejudice—custom—are four of the most formidable, the giant obstacles in our way; and they are always presented. Still, these, and many others, will yield to the light of evidence, and the force of truth. Besides, the very difficulties we have to encounter will only render us more cautious—more wary—more decided—more firm—more energetic—more persevering. What good cause is free from difficulties? What good cause is exempt from opponents? and the better it is, the more numerous and determined, frequently, they are. Still, what good cause will not eventually triumph, that is advocated with wisdom, maintained with energy, and in reliance on the divine blessing and regard?

V. THE REVOLUTIONS WHICH MIGHT BE PRODUCED BY THE WIDE DIFFUSION OF TEETOTALISM.

Wondrous results would be accomplished, if those who profess to value and love christianity, and to be anxious, most anxious for its diffusion, would give up their drinking habits; in other words, would become abstainers. All classes, all ages, might be instructed; the entire country might soon be evangelised; indeed, even the globe might speedily be illuminated with the light of life: and all might be done with the utmost facility, without the slightest injury to health, or personal and domestic comfort; in truth, that health would be materially improved, that comfort would be incalculably augmented.

VI. THE SPIRIT OF A CONSISTENT TEETOTALER.

A man, to be devoted and unswerving in a cause which he espouses, should be more attached to the truth, than anxious for the concurrence and immediate acquiescence of his fellow citizens, or of his countrymen generally. Will not this strikingly apply to the cause of Teetotalism?—for no cause has been more shied, ridiculed, ignorantly and wantonly derided. Teetotalers, you are to love and sustain Teetotalism for the Truth's sake. That must be your spirit.

VII. TEETOTALISM AND INFIDELITY.

A Teetotaler may be an infidel: that we admit;—still, if Teetotalism is taken up on right grounds, from the love of truth—from a desire to be useful to others—from an anxiety to honor God, and, after calm, dispassionate, and serious inquiry, the very means are employed, and the very spirit is cultivated, by which Infidelity will be checked and destroyed. Infidels, generally, are not men of sober, dispassionate, thorough reflection. There is much about them that is dogmatic, impetuous, and one-sided. Let a man sit down to the careful, philosophical, and enlightened study of Teetotalism, and he will find any sceptical tendencies which he might have entertained, in relation to scriptural subjects, materially checked.

The idea of there being any connection between Teetotalism and Infidelity, is most ignorant, most preposterous, most insane. Teetotalism is the friend of every thing that is dignified and noble. Infidelity, of every thing that is mean and sordid; Teetotalism is the patron of every thing that is benevolent, amiable and holy. Infidelity disregards these great principles. Teetotalism is allied to Heaven, it is identified with sentiments, dispositions, habits, and conduct, which Heaven will approve, which God will bless; but Infidelity is associated with Hell—it is the child of Sin—it is one of the monstrous brood of the Devil.

ZETA.

TEETOTALISM and CHOLERA.

Again is the CHOLERA stalking forth on the Continent of Europe, and before its Simoom-like breath, men are falling, and yielding up the ghost. Russia in particular is experiencing its destructive ravages. From town to town this “destroying angel” is winging its flight, and by the potency of its touch, wives are made widows and children orphans. One town, we learn from the public journals, flying in the direction of its course has been passed by, not one victim having fallen, as though the Almighty had said, “Touch not mine anointed.” It was so too during the last memorable visit of the cholera. That place so highly favoured is a settlement of Moravian brethren who are remarkable for their strict sobriety and cleanliness!

Now looking at this striking circumstance, to what rational conclusion must every physiologist come? Why, that this event is owing to the TEMPERATE habits of the inhabitants. Far be it from us to say that Teetotalism will preserve a man from the attacks of cholera. But this we may boldly affirm that of three classes of persons, the drunkard, the moderate drinker, and the teetotaler, the chances of escape or recovery are vastly in favour of the latter.

It may not be uninteresting if a few facts are here strung together, which were collected during the last ravages of this fearful plague, as they will tend to confirm the view I have taken. Let us commence with

INDIA.—In the army under the command of the Marquis of Hastings, in India, consisting of eighteen thousand men, more than half of the men died in the first twelve days. The free use of intoxicating liquors in a hot climate, will assist in explaining this extraordinary mortality. On the contrary, Ramohun Fingee, a native physician, declares that “people who do not take spirits or opium do not catch the disorder, even when they are with those who have it.”

CHINA.—According to Dr. Reiche, “the disease selected its victims from among such of the people as lived in filth and intemperance.”

RUSSIA.—Mr. Huber who saw 2160 perish in twenty five days, in one town in Russia, says, “It is a most remarkable circumstance, that persons given to drinking have been swept away like flies. In Tiflis, containing 20,000 inhabitants, every drunkard has fallen! all are dead—not one remains.”

POLAND.—A Physician of Warsaw says, “that the disease spared all those who led regular lives, and resided in healthy situations; whereas they whose constitutions had been broken down by excess and dissipation, were invariably attacked. Out of one hundred individuals destroyed by cholera, it was proved that ninety had been addicted to the free use of ardent spirits.”

FRANCE.—In Paris, of the 30,000 persons destroyed by cholera, it is said that a great proportion were intemperate or profligate.

ENGLAND.—It has been computed that “five-sixths of all who have fallen in England by the disease, were from the rank of the intemperate and dissolute.”

AMERICA.—Dr. Rhinelander, who visited Montreal, during the prevalence of the cholera there, in the summer of 1832, says, “that the victims of the disease are the intemperate—it invariably cuts them off.” In that city, after there had been twelve hundred cases of the malady, a Montreal journal states, that “not a drunkard who had been attacked has recovered, and almost all the victims have been at least moderate drinkers.”

Dr. Sewall, of Washington city, while on a visit to the cholera hospitals in the city of New York, the same season, writes to a friend, that “of 204 cases of cholera in the Park Hospital, there were only six temperate persons, and that those had recovered, while 122 of the others, when he wrote, had died, and that the facts were similar in all the other hospitals.”

In Albany, the same season, cholera prevailed for several weeks, attended with a severe mortality; and it is a remarkable fact, that during the whole period it is not known that more than two individuals out of the five thousand members of Temperance Societies in that city became its victims.

These are unquestionably solemn facts, which ought to convince every thinking mind that water is the natural and proper drink of man. Well indeed would be if the six hundred thousand drunkards in the country—aye, the countless myriads of moderate drinkers too, could read them, for surely if aught can make an impression on the human mind it must be in the sight of death. I am no alarmist—I wish not to sound the note of alarm. But is it not probable that the cholera may shortly visit us again? “A man forewarned is forearmed.” Let us then, by habits of strict TEMPERANCE and CLEANLINESS be in some measure prepared to resist its attacks should it once more visit our shores. Y.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

WITH one exception, which we will presently name, a conviction of the utility and importance of the teetotal movement is evidently gaining ground in the Christian church. A luminous compendium of the whole question was laid before the ministers and delegates of the Congregational Union, at their recent assembly in York, in the form of an address from the Temperance Society of that city. The address was respectfully received, and the following resolution was unanimously passed:—“That this Union cordially acknowledges the respectful address presented to them by the committee of the York Temperance Society, and commends the very important subject to which it refers to the attentive and prayerful consideration of their members.”

We confidently hope that the next step taken by this most influential Union will be, not merely the reception of a respectful address from the committee of a Temperance Society, but the origination of some decided and comprehensive resolution, or, which would be still better, of a pastoral address, urging the whole question of total abstinence upon the serious and prayerful consideration of the Congregational body. Such a movement would, we are sure, greatly promote the prosperity and efficiency of the Union. It would remove one chief hindrance to the success of Christian ministers, and it would most materially promote the purity and increase of the churches of which they have the oversight.

The churches of America, of all denominations, are, in this respect, greatly in advance of the churches of Great Britain. We rarely receive papers from America without being furnished with some pleasing proof of this. A few weeks ago we received the report of the Temperance Committee of the Baptist Convention of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. After stating that the exertions made to promote the cause of total abstinence had been followed by hopeful and salutary results, the committee recommend “That the Convocation consider the temperance cause an auxiliary among other moral institutions towards the advancement of the great cause of redemption, as well as the alleviation of human suffering; and in order to carry out this glorious moral reform, your committee further recommend that this Convocation do advise, as the duty of all Baptist churches and Baptist ministers in connexion herewith, to listen to the cries of suffering humanity, and aid in saving from that awful, yet common death—the death of the drunkard, their fellow human beings.”

Last week we received a document, every sentence of which demands the deep and solemn consideration of every professed follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. We have not often found, in so short a compass, such a compendious summary of the evils resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks, and of the duty of Christians to discountenance the use, manufacture, and sale of such drinks. But the document shall speak for itself:—

PASTORAL LETTER.

THE CLASSIS OF NEW BRUNSWICK, TO THE CHURCHES UNDER THEIR CARE.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Permit us to address you on a subject intimately connected with the temporal and the eternal welfare of men—the use of intoxicating liquors as a common drink.

The General Synod has at various times called the attention of the ministers, Consistories, and members of the Reformed Dutch Church, to this important subject, and strenuously urged every Christian to activity and zeal in the promotion of the cause of the temperance reformation. That there is a call upon the Church to use her influence in this matter, is manifest from the evils which inevitably result from the use of intoxicating drinks. These evils affect individuals, families, neighbourhoods, the State and the Church.

Intoxicating drink destroys bodily health, impairs the mind, blunts the moral sensibilities, debases the character and finally consigns the body to a premature grave, and the soul to eternal perdition.

Intoxicating drink breaks the peace of families, converts happy homes into the abodes of grief, want and wretchedness.

Intoxicating drink spreads vice and immorality in neighbourhoods; produces idleness, disorder, profanity and Sabbath-breaking.

Intoxicating drink causes a large proportion of the crimes which demand the action of the civil courts, and furnishes the inmates of the State prison. It is the immediate origin of pauperism (as abounding statistics prove), fills our poor houses, and burdens our townships with the wrecks of men, and their beggared families. Intoxicating drink therefore, is the prolific source of taxation upon every community.

Nor does the Church escape its baneful influence. It not only occasions the desecration of the Sabbath and negligence of the house of worship, but sears the conscience, hardens the heart, stupefies the soul, and thus prevents the success of the gospel. There is another lamentable fact. Those disciples of Christ who indulge in the use of intoxicating liquors, sooner or later bring reproach on his name. The Spirit of God and the love of alcohol cannot long dwell together in the same breast. He who invites and encourages the latter, will soon lose the holy influence of the former. Hence, as our church records show, intoxicating liquor, to a sad extent, has multiplied the subjects of discipline. What humiliating monuments are found in every church of Christ, erected by the hand of this destroying power, upon which God, by the discipline of his house, has written the warning of his Word: "Wo unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink." These ruined disciples stand a mournful admonition to every professing follower of Jesus, illustrating that inspired caution: "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging." Beware!

With these facts glaring upon us, shall Christians sit still, indifferent and unconcerned, and thus lend their influence to strengthen the dominion of this fatal power? Does it not become every disciple of Jesus to consider the startling ruin which inevitably accompanies the use of intoxicating drinks, to take a firm stand, and decided action against them.

In view of this wide-spreading destruction—so well known, so familiar, that it ceases to move the heart—we most earnestly exhort you, Christian brethren, the elders, the deacons, and each member of the household of God, to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, discountenance the manufacture and traffic of them, and, in a word, by your example and by personal effort, strive to stay this tide of disease, crime, pauperism, misery, wickedness and death.

The above was adopted by the Classis, July 26th, 1847, was ordered to be published in the Christian Intelligencer, and recommended to be read from the pulpit by the pastors in the Classis, on the Sabbath after its reception.

D. D. DEMAREST, Stated Clerk.

New Brunswick, Aug. 2nd, 1847.

We hope soon to see the day when a similar Pastoral Letter shall be issued from the heads and representatives of every denomination of Christians. Why should the churches of Great Britain be behind the churches of America in any work of Christian benevolence—in any movement which may conduce to the welfare of man or the glory of God?

We are not aware that any distinct resolution in favour of the temperance movement has ever been passed by the Baptist denomination in England, though resolutions to that effect have been passed by local associations; and we recollect at least one instance in which the annual address of a large association in the midland counties was devoted entirely to this subject. We believe however, that the total abstinence societies number among their members many of the members of Baptist churches.

We spoke of an exception; and we blush to own that the exception is to be found in the religious body to which we are ourselves attached, and the best interests of which we are most anxious to promote. It is with deep and sincere sorrow we state that the WESLEYAN METHODIST CONNEXION is far behind other Denominations in reference to the temperance movement. We refer to what, for the sake of distinction, we call the Old Conference body. The other sections or branches of the Wesleyan family—to their honour be it spoken—have, in some form or other, declared their attachment to the total abstinence cause. In the Methodist New Connexion—in the Wesleyan Association—among the Primitive Methodists and the Bible Christians, that cause has many zealous adherents and able and efficient advocates. But how stands the case in the Old Connexion? Are addresses from temperance societies presented to the Conference at its sittings? They are either not read at all, or they are read to men—to Christian teachers—who listen to them with impatience, or in sullen silence, or with contemptuous mutterings, ironical cheers, or declarations that "the valuable time of the Conference ought not to be wasted on any such nonsense." When such addresses are read, no more is heard of them, nor does any record of their having been presented appear on the minutes. Or if ever resolutions are passed in reference to the temperance movement, they are resolutions to close the doors of Wesleyan chapels against the entrance of teetotal doctrines, and to prevent, if possible, any preacher who has felt it his duty to become a teetotaler, from advocating the practice, at least out of his own particular circuit. And why is all this? It is because, upon careful examination, it is found to be opposed to the spirit and genius of Christianity? Or because it is discountenanced by the writings, and practice, and advice of the venerable founder of Methodism? Or because no mischief has ever resulted to Methodist societies, either at home or abroad, from the use of intoxicating drinks? Or because no preacher has ever been suspended, or "dropped," or expelled, because of his love of strong drink? Or because no local preacher, or leader, or steward, or private member, has ever suffered from the same cause? Alas! alas! the journal of Conference—the minutes of district meetings, "minor" as well as annual; and of leaders' meetings, "special" as well as regular—all testify that numbers, "prophets" as well as people, "have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way." We cannot account for this indomitable dislike to teetotalism on any principle that ought to actuate a Wesleyan Minister. In some, we have reason to believe, it proceeds from predilection for the drink. Some are biased by prejudice, by custom, by family associations and connexions. Some feel confident that however foolishly others may have acted, they shall never fall. Not a few, perhaps, refuse to promote the temperance movement because they did originate it. At a future period we shall probably examine some of these pleas; though we believe that very few oppose the temperance movement from ignorance either of its merits or of its necessity.

There are honourable exceptions. In the Wesleyan body are men who are well versed in the temperance question; who maintain its practice consistently and perseveringly and who advocate it intelligently, and zealously, and successfully. The teetotal body has in its ranks a few Wesleyan ministers, and a goodly number of private members. Some of these sanguine enough to hope that the time may yet come when total abstinence from the use, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors will become as much a rule of society—a condition of membership—as total abstinence from Sabbath breaking, or from any other sin; as much a rule and condition of membership now, as it was when the rules were first issued, pure and stringent by their venerable founder. We fear it will be some time before their anticipations are realized. Their advocacy of "the truth in love" may certainly hasten it. Of this we are sure, that should the total abstinence principle prevail, even generally, preachers and people would become more spiritually-minded, more zealous and more useful. Congregations and societies would be enlarged; class meetings and prayer meetings would be better attended; back-slidings would be more rare; the funds of our important institutions would be amply replenished, and Wesleyan instrumentality would prove admirably efficient for the revival and spread of pure and undefiled religion.

[The foregoing article is taken from the columns of the Wesleyan newspaper, of December 9th. The Wesleyan represents the opinions of a large majority of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion, especially the opinions of what may be termed the liberal portion of that important and influential Religious community. We understand that it has recently been placed under a new management, and that it is becoming increasingly popular. It proposes, amongst other important objects, to uphold the various philanthropic movements of the age, not forgetting the Total Abstinence Movement. For this, as well as on account of its general contents, we recommend it most cordially to the patronage of our readers. As it contains every week important articles on the Temperance question, every Teetotal committee ought to take a copy regularly.]

SICK CLUBS.

In the report of the Bury Abstinence Society, we find the following statistical account. "In a comparison of eight general sick clubs with three whose members were teetotalers in the town of Preston, it appears that among the drinkers 233 out of every 1,000 were annually sick; among the abstainers only 139. The drinkers on the average were seven weeks and four days sick each; the teetotalers only three weeks and two days. The drinking clubs had to pay £2: 16s. 1d. to each of their 233 members. The reprobates were taxed only to the amount of £1: 9s. 2d. for each of their 139 members. Therefore the total expense per 1,000 on the teetotal system would be £202: 14s. 2d. On the drinking system £673: 7s. 4d. If the drinkers had paid as much to their members as the teetotalers did, their expenses would have been £802: 9s. 9d. or nearly four times as much as that of the teetotalers. Moreover, the 1,000 teetotalers had to endure 458 weeks of sickness; while the drinkers had to suffer 1,770 weeks, or nearly four times the amount. These acts speak for themselves."

EXCITING DRINKS.—All that can be said in favour of their use is, that they raise, or inflame, for a time, the imagination, and depress the judgment, while imperceptibly they incapacitate for all the duties of life, by enfeebling the physical powers, and producing a suspension of all the intellectual energies of man. Instead of clearing and strengthening the faculties, they confuse and weaken memory.—J. Young.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

ROSS, HEREFORDSHIRE.

The cause of Teetotalism is low in this neighbourhood at present. We had at one time a flourishing Society, but, owing to the covetousness and inactivity of the majority of members, it has sadly declined. Some of the veterans, however, remain firm, and at our occasional meetings a few persons sign the pledge. The neighbourhood of Ross has long been notorious for drunkenness; but the little exertion we have made has effected a decided improvement. An awful instance of the sad effects of intemperance occurred last week, about half a mile out of the town. A farm waggoner, while in a state of drunkenness, fell under a waggon load of coals, which he was bringing from the Forest of Dean, and was killed upon the spot! Accidents frequently occur when farm servants are hawking coals from the Forest, in consequence of a dishonest custom which prevails of sending from two to four gallons of cider to give to those engaged in loading the waggons, in the hope of getting a better load of coals;—an act of gross dishonesty towards the employers, and which causes a number of accidents and deaths. Most sincerely do we hope that the day is at hand when farmers and others will be careful how they supply their servants with drink. A reform in this matter would reflect credit on employers, and promote the interests of the employed.

J. W. F. COUNSELL.

BURY.

From the report of the Bury Abstinence Society, just published, we find that meetings have been held weekly, conducted, chiefly, by native talent. A deep impression has been produced by the lectures and addresses of the Rev. R. GRAY MASON. Mrs. Carlile, of Dublin; the Rev. W. Wight; and the Hon. Judge Marshall, had also rendered valuable services. The friends of Temperance in Bury number about 600. A library has been formed, and in consequence of the system of early hours becoming general, the books have been much in request. The Committee have distributed, gratuitously, 100 copies of the Teetotal Essayist for seven months, and 50 copies of the same for four months, in quarters where it was desirable the principles of the Society should be known. Besides these, a large quantity of tracts, including the recent Medical Certificate, have been distributed. An address to shopkeepers, dissuading them from the practice of giving their customers Christmas or new year's gifts in the form of intoxicating drinks, was circulated, and with considerable success.—The Report abounds with interesting facts.

BRIDPORT, DORSET.

The Bridport Teetotal Society has lately been re-organised. The Rev. T. WALLACE, has become the president; the Rev. C. SHARMAN, vice-president, and treasurer, and Mr. NORTHMORE, secretary. Dr. GRINDROD lately visited Bridport, and delivered in the Town Hall, several very philosophical, and admirably illustrated lectures, which were most numerously attended, and which produced a deep impression. In expressing the gratitude of the respectable audience, the Rev. T. Wallace dilated with peculiar pleasure, on the urbane and gentlemanly, as well as christian spirit, discovered by the accomplished and eloquent lecturer.

PADIHAM, LANCASHIRE.

A teetotal festival was held in this town in October last. About 350 persons partook of tea in the Oddfellows Hall. The members went in procession through the town, headed by the brass band. Mrs. M. JACKSON gave three excellent lectures to a very numerous assembly which gave general satisfaction. At the festival a young man, a teetotaler, being married, presented 90 of his fellow workman with a ticket to the tea party. Since that time 150 persons have joined the Society. The Committee have engaged the Oddfellows Hall for six months to hold regular weekly meetings, and have also furnished the Sunday School Teachers of different denominations with Mr. CASSELL'S prize tracts, which is thought to be an excellent means of doing good to the Temperance Cause. Nov. 3rd.—A Church of England Temperance Society was formed in the National School Room, when excellent addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. C. ADAMSON, Incumbent of Padiham, and several others, on the evils attending Intoxicating Drinks. The assembly was large, and 90 persons signed the pledge. The Society is now increased to about 200 members.

PAISLEY.

On the evening of Saturday s'ennight a lecture on the Temperance question was given here, by the celebrated Oriental traveller, J. S. Buckingham, Esq.—Dr. Richmond, president of the Total Abstinence Society, in the chair, who stated that the lecture about to be delivered was at the request of the Paisley Society, and the proceeds would be devoted to the erection of a temperance hall in London. The learned lecturer gave a very interesting account of a great number of countries through which he had travelled, and stated that during three years' travels in foreign countries, he had seen only six intoxicated persons—that he had gone 1500 miles up the river Nile, on the banks of which there are 2,000,000 people, yet among all these he had never seen an intoxicated person. The constant use of intoxicating liquors was the shame and disgrace of Great Britain. He stated that the annual expense of strong drink to this country, including the value of lost time, and results of intemperance, was, in round numbers, £200,000,000, while the ordinary taxation was only one-fourth of that sum, namely, £50,000,000. He showed, in most convincing terms, that it was the duty of every christian to discountenance the drinking customs and practices of the present day. At the present time, when so many people were starving in this town, he would put it to every humane person if it was right or proper that people should continue to use a useless article at great expense while 6,000 people wanted food to sustain life—and not only useless, but most decidedly hurtful to every person in health. He was satisfied that if the inhabitants would all discountenance the use of intoxicating liquors, and devote the money for the use of the poor, a sufficient fund would be raised to sustain the people, without a shilling of extra subscription. He urged this point by a number of powerful arguments, and concluded with great applause.

WARRINGTON.

The thirteenth anniversary Tea party of the Warrington Temperance Society, was held Dec. 13, in the Wesleyan School room. There was a large and respectable attendance of Members and friends. W. BEAUMONT, Esq., Mayor, occupied the Chair, and in an effective speech shewed the evils of intemperance, and the advantages arising from the total disuse of intoxicating liquors, concluding with a persuasive appeal to the ladies present.—L. HEYWORTH, Esq., enlarged on the degradation and misery of which drunkenness is productive in times of difficulty and pressure such as the present. He referred to the testimony given by 1,400 medical men to the fact that alcoholic drinks are not only unnecessary, but positively injurious to the health of men; also, to the testimony of judges as to the connexion between intemperance and crime.

The Rev. W. Mc. KERROW, of Manchester, delivered a powerful address. He took it for granted that all were familiar, by observation and knowledge, with the evils of drunkenness. What was to be done to prevent or cure these evils? There must be both precept and example. It would not do to testify against intemperance, and yet continue those drinking usages which nullified all remonstrance and advice. It argued a low state of Christian attainment, when professors of religion were reluctant to deny themselves an unnecessary indulgence that they might have greater means and opportunities of doing good. Efforts on behalf of education and the spread of the Gospel, were rendered to a large extent abortive by the counteractive drinking usages of society. He concluded an argumentative and earnest appeal, by urging those who had not signed the pledge at once to do so.

The Rev. W. ROAF, of Wigan, shewed that alcoholic drinks merely gave stimulus and not strength, and demonstrated that the question belonged especially to the poor and working men, being one of economy, health, increase of trade, &c.—Thanks were then voted to the Mayor and other speakers, and duly acknowledged.

SAFFRON WALDON, ESSEX.

Twelve months ago 4 or 5 persons at Langley, in Essex, pledged one another to the entire abstinence from all intoxicating drinks for six months, one of these was the baptist minister of the place who signed in order to assist in the reformation of another who was a notorious drunkard, but who is now, thanks to the cause of Temperance, a reformed, respectable and worthy man, this act was done in so quiet a way that scarcely any one knew of it but the parties themselves. As weeks passed on, their convictions gradually strengthened in the correctness of those principles which they had sanctioned at first only for example. The Teetotal Times was taken by this little faithful band, and they eagerly read other works on the subject. The six months at length expired, but unwilling to relinquish the good work they had so quietly but resolutely begun, they grew bolder and bolder, till ultimately they determined to become public advocates of the Teetotal cause. For this purpose they resolved to establish a society in the place, and to invite over from Saffron Walden one or two friends who should address, on an appointed evening, an audience to be convened for the occasion in the chapel and thus set the machinery in motion. Mr. Marten, a Baptist minister, and Mr. J. W. Bitten, the secretary of the Temperance Society, accordingly went over on Thursday last and addressed a large meeting of very attentive hearers in the baptist chapel, the respected minister presiding. At the close of the meeting the minister (Rev. C. Player) was the first to renew his pledge and he was followed by a dozen others. Thus it is hoped the foundation is laid of a useful society under whose genial auspices, by the blessing of our heavenly Father, many an erring brother may have reason to rejoice.

WAINFLEET.

Monday, Dec. 13th, a Meeting was held in the Temperance Rooms, which were well filled by attentive hearers Mr. MANNING, late of Leamington, occupied the Chair, and rather startled the meeting, by asserting that the Christian Church in this country had it in its power to make us a nation of Teetotalers within the short space of ten years. This sentiment was so well sustained and illustrated by the succeeding speakers, Mr. BORMOND, and the Rev. W. ROSE, of Alford, that the majority of the hearers went away fully convinced of the importance of this great truth. Mr. Bormond completely annihilated the objection of professors of religion who charge the advocates of Teetotalism with making it superior to the gospel, clearly showing that though it was a part of the gospel, it was a part much neglected by those who ought not to shun to declare "the whole truth;" so much so, indeed, that the very stones (drunkards) began to cry out against them.—Mr. Rose related some affecting instances of awful and sudden deaths which had lately taken place in his own immediate neighbourhood. One man, a barber by trade, went a few miles from home on business; when last seen, he was leaving a public house, at 10 at night, next morning his wife was anxiously waiting his arrival—no husband. The second morning no husband! The fourth day, a schoolmaster in the neighbourhood gave his boys liberty to scour the fields and dykes in search of the poor barber; his body was soon found in the corner of a large dyke which he had to pass, and he was taken out a lifeless corpse, the result of intemperance. Another man got upon his horse in a fit of intoxication, said "he would ride to hell!" he had not gone far before his horse fell, and he was taken up dead. And another poor man in a state of stupor from drink, lay down by the side of a lime-kiln, and awoke only to find himself just alive from its burning effects,—he crawled a few yards from the place and died.

Mr. Rose preached an excellent sermon in the afternoon, after which a numerous company sat down to Tea.

CIRENCESTER.

We held the first anniversary of the opening of our Temperance Hall on Wednesday the 15th; we had a good meeting, addressed by Thos. Hudson and Thos. Whittaker, from the National Temperance Society; and on Thursday a Tea Festival. The Hall was tastefully decorated with Festoons of evergreens and flowers, by the ladies, to whose kind exertions we are indebted for a capitally arranged tea. This over, the Hall was opened to the public, and soon crammed full, to hear the lectures delivered by Thos. Hudson, S. Bowly, and Thos. Whittaker; and we never had more sensible, sound, and truthful addresses in our Hall. The interest excited by these meetings, and the attention given, lead us to believe, as stated by one of our speakers, that "There is a good time coming, boys,"

"A good time coming."

And we who are teetotally banded together in this locality, will, we trust, be up and doing.—Christopher Bowly occupied the chair on both evenings.

On Friday, the ladies gave a Tea to about 200 Teetotal children; after Tea the meeting was thrown open to their companions; a few words from the Secretary introduced a long tried friend of the cause, Isaac Pitt, who in a very close appeal to the children and their parents, urged their withstanding temptation. About 47 gave in their names at the close.

A series of dissolving views, painted by an artist of the town, delineating English History, added much to the enjoyment of the evening.

GUERNSEY.

We live in a most unfavourable spot for the growth and development of Temperance principles. In the first place, spirituous liquors are sold at 5d. per pint, and wines from 3d. upwards the bottle. Who can wonder if they be much in use?—Secondly, our Society is so interwoven by links of relationship, that a large number of the inhabitants are related to those who are interested in the traffic. Thus a prejudice in favour of the trade, and against the advocacy of temperance, is created.—Thirdly, there is much apathy and indifference among religious professors. In some cases this amounts to such a prejudice against strict sobriety, that when a member of a Christian Church becomes an abstainer, he is accounted weak, superstitious and righteous overmuch. And instances are not wanting in which persons have thus been driven back to their former habits of drinking. Notwithstanding these difficulties, we have made some progress in the Temperance Cause. We have been visited by the Rev. Mr. GLYDE, of the Home Mission Society, and by Mr. WILLIAMSON, from London. In consequence of the lectures and addresses delivered by these gentlemen, numerous additions have been made to our Society; a spirit of enquiry is abroad; and we are, I trust, inspired with fresh zeal in our noble cause.

J. HILL, Secretary.

SUBSTITUTES FOR ALCOHOL AS MEDICINE.

"I believe on examination it will be found that substitutes for alcohol are readily found as aids to digestion, and lactation, and in fever. I have not prescribed alcohol as a medicine for the last fourteen years; and before that time I scarcely ever used it, except in extreme hæmorrhage, which I subsequently found worse than nothing as a remedy."—Extract from a letter recently addressed to H. Mudge, Esq., of Bodmin, by J. Higginbottom, Esq., Surgeon, of Nottingham.

THE TWO "JOHN'S."

The following cases have lately come under the notice of the Secretary of a Temperance Society in the county of Sussex.

John L.—some few years ago was the keeper of a beershop. His character was not good; in fact, he was addicted to drunkenness and its attendant evils. He became very ill, and was frequently visited by pious Christian friends. Their labours were not in vain, for on John's recovery he gave proofs of sincere repentance. John became a member of a Christian Church, and walked consistently for some time. But alas! those who visited him during his illness did not charge him to abstain from that which had produced so much of his former misery. It was whispered in some quarters that John had been overtaken, but at last it was seen by one of his fellow members. Shortly after, John attended a Temperance meeting, and after the address he publicly stated that he intended to sign the pledge. About a fortnight after, he did sign, but kept his pledge only a few weeks, as abstinence from poison so weakened him that he was not able to perform his work:—So he said!

The Sabbath after he had violated the pledge, he (on his road to Chapel) overtook Mr.—the Deacon. John laid the case before him, who promptly replied, he had precisely the same feelings if he abstained, and he believed that half a pint of beer was, if not absolutely necessary, at least beneficial. Since that time, vain have been the attempts to induce John again to return to the paths of true sobriety.

We will now turn to the other John. John F.—was once a beershop keeper. To his house resorted the lowest of the low. He was a degraded drunkard. An abstaining Deacon had some conversation with him respecting his soul. John thought himself as good as the Deacon. The Deacon saw him again: John thought differently. He was however induced to be an abstainer, and conscience speedily induced him to relinquish the "Traveller's rest." Having taken Temperance in one hand, he soon took Religion in the other. He joined a Church, and sat at the table of the Lord. Somehow or other, the example of the good moderation people captivated him. He thought after so long abstinence he could now drink a little—he attempted it, but paid dearly for the indulgence.

Early one Sabbath morning, a man was observed walking up and down the High Street. He at length entered the house of the Teetotal Secretary, and asked permission to sign the pledge. He did so, writing against his signature—"for life." That man was John F.—, and the last the writer heard respecting him was, that he felt himself unworthy to approach the Lord's Table, having so disgraced his profession of religion.

Let us learn from these cases.

The Havoc strong drink is making in the Church of Christ. See it in both John L. and John F.

The influence (either for good or evil) which Christians possess. Had the Deacon to whom John L. spoke been an abstainer, he could have warned him, instead of sanctioning his drinking propensity; and had the Deacon John F. spoke with, been a non-abstainer, is it not more than probable his efforts would have been nullified?

The salutary effects of total abstinence. Behold it especially in John F. When will good men cease by precept and example to oppose the Temperance movement?

PUBLIC SENTIMENT.—With just as much certainty can the public sentiment be formed and put in motion, as the waves can be moved by the breath of heaven, or the massy rock, balanced on the precipice, can be pushed from its centre of motion: and when public sentiment once begins to move, its march will be as resistless as the same rock thundering down the precipice. Let no man think or say, therefore, that nothing can be done.—Dr. Beecher.

ON TOBACCO.

BY DR. BEMAN.

A man might just as well use any other poison, till his organic instincts are changed by habit. Smoking, chewing and snuffing all belong to one category. Bad digestion, head-ache, nervous derangement, palpitation of the heart, and the decay and loss of teeth are among the ordinary effects, and are almost as sure to follow the use, as the habit is to be formed and practised.—‘We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen.’

I have witnessed the most deplorable effects produced by the use of Tobacco among students in college. It often proves fatal to health and I believe to life. At an early period, and under the influence of sedentary habits, the constitution often sinks under it. I should rejoice if its use, in every form, were prohibited in every college in our land. It is a vice which should be exterminated by the operation of law, from schools of learning. The hand of discipline should be applied with rigor to this evil.

I have known many cases of dyspepsia, evidently caused by smoking and chewing. Indeed this is a common and every day effect. In the course of my ministry, I have known two cases in my own congregation, of death in which I fully believe, the use of tobacco had much to do. One was the case of a lady, who was an inveterate snuffer. I know a man now in the prime of life, who is probably an incurable paralytic, whose disease, in the opinion of his friends, was either caused, or greatly aggravated, by the excessive use of tobacco.

But cases are endless. I wonder physicians keep silent as they do. The American community is full of the victims of tobacco. It is hardly less fatal than its grand associate, rum. They are true work-fellows in poisoning the instincts, destroying the health and degrading the nature of man. Tobacco, in every form, ought to be excluded from the Church, and banished from good society. I hope your labors will do much to hasten such a reformation. I confess that for one, I am sick of seeing a smoking or tobacco chewing, as I am a wine-drinking minister of the gospel. I am utterly disgusted with those little boys and fops who are endeavouring to make rapid strides to gentility and manhood, by distending their cheeks with tobacco, and puffing their cigars at the corners of all the streets. These are the forlorn hopes of the rising generation. Save us from a race of tobacco worms!

HEAR THIS, CHRISTIAN TEACHERS!

At the Temperance Anniversary recently celebrated in Warrington, the following anecdote was related by the Rev. W. ROAF. There was a man whose wife's mother had induced them to break their pledge, on the occasion of the birth of their first child, by telling them that ministers of the Gospel saw no harm in taking a social glass on particular occasions, and that her own minister, a most pious man, did it. They yielded—the man became a drunkard, and once said to Mr. Roaf, when referring to the name and authority of the minister, whose opinion and example had been quoted to his ruin,—‘I'll curse that man when I am in hell.’

THE DRUNKARD AND HIS CHILD.

A drunkard's daughter came home from school crying one day, and the father asked her what she was crying for; she said she did not like to tell him. ‘Oh yes, tell me, I must know what ails you. Are you sick?’ ‘No, father, but the girls call me a drunkard's daughter, and laugh at me, and I can't help crying.’ It was too much for the poor father; he went with his child to the next temperance meeting, signed the pledge, and got drunk no more.

“I WAS NEVER DRUNK BUT ONCE!

WARNING TO YOUTH.

The following touching narrative should be pondered by every Sunday scholar in England. It speaks trumpet-tongued of the evil effects of intoxication, and points with a finger of fire to the awful moment when “five minutes” will usher us into the presence of God.

“You have only five minutes to live,” said the sheriff to a young man condemned to die.

The sheriff took out his watch and said, “If you have anything to say, speak now, for you have only five minutes to live.” The young man burst into tears, and said, “I have to die. I had one little brother; he had beautiful blue eyes and flaxen hair, and I loved him; but one day I got drunk, for the first time in my life, and coming home, I found my little brother gathering berries in the garden, and I became angry without a cause, and killed him with one blow with a rake. I did not know anything about it until the next morning, when I awoke from sleep and found myself tied and guarded, and was told that when my little brother was found, his hair was clotted with blood and brains, and he was dead. Whiskey has done it. It has ruined me. I never was drunk but once. I have only one word more to say, and then I am going to my final judge. I say it to young people—never! never! NEVER! touch anything that can intoxicate!” As he pronounced these words, he sprang from the box, and was launched into an endless eternity.

I was melted to tears at the recital and the awful spectacle. My little heart seemed as if it would burst, and break from my aching bosom, so intolerable were my feelings of grief. And there, in that carriage, while on that cushioned seat, looking with streaming eyes on the body of that unfortunate young man, as it hung writhing between heaven and earth, as unfit for either place, there it was that I took the pledge never to touch the hurtful poison! Long years have passed away. White hairs have thickened around these temples, then so ruddy and so young, but I have never forgotten the last words of that young man. And I have never violated the pledge. When the tempter has offered me the sparkling goblet, the words of that young man have seemed to sound in my ears again.

THE TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.—“The fate of a child is always the work of the mother,” was the profound remark of the penetrating usurper of France. How sad then when that mother is a lover of strong drink!

A DEVOTE.—“My dear, where is my Morning and Evening Devotion?” said Mr. Paul Partington, meaning a small book with that title. “Here it is,” said Mrs. Partington, producing a dark bottle from the closet.

INCONVERTIBLE DEBENTURES.—Creditor: “Sir, you are drunk now! You have wasted your substance with tipping, and have turned every thing that belonged to you into liquor.” Debtor: “Pardon me, sir, every thing except my debts, which I regret for your sake as well as my own—I see no prospect of being able to liquidate.”

A GLASS OF WATER is the fittest drink for all ages and temperaments, and of all the productions of nature or art; comes nearest to that universal remedy so much sought after by mankind, and never hitherto discovered.—Hoffman.

UNION—in a good cause is like the noiseless and invisible action of the dew by night and the sunbeam by day, on the vegetable fibre, unfolding itself in beauty to the eye, and grateful fruit for the palate. Just such, in multitudes of instances, have been the results of the united efforts of the rapidly increasing host of philanthropists, designated Teetotalers.—R. Abraham.

UNION—in a bad cause, is like the irresistible avalanche, which buries the doomed village before the horror-struck inhabitants have had time to exclaim, "We are lost!" Just such is the union of manufacturers, sellers, and consumers of intoxicating liquor.—R. Tabraham.

DRUNKEN DUCKS.—A man broke a large stone jar of gin the other day, at Roystone, and the liquor was retained in a puddle hole. Some intemperate ducks discovered the treasure, and jabbered and drank till they were so drunk that they could not waddle steadily, but frequently fell sideways and tipped tail over head, to the great amusement of the spectators.—[We have frequently seen human beings present on such an occasion, stooping down and sipping the liquor, mud and all, from the kennel; and instances are on record of persons, who after thus sipping have paid the forfeit of their lives!]

A SALUTARY CAUTION.—Guard against the use of strong drinks. The least degree unfits the soul for communion with God. And this may be the case when its effects cannot be perceived by man.—W. Dawson.

THE YOUNG.—How happy they, who introduced early to Teetotal Societies, remain strangers to that habit so destructive and difficult to be overcome. Their unvitiated constitution is the subtraction of health, physical and moral. Their pledge, while they keep it, is a specific against many diseases which to others have proved fatal.—Dr. Ritchie.

DRUNKARDS IN DANGER.—A drunken man is like a ship without sail or rudder, exposed to the dangers of a merciless ocean. As he sails across the sea of time, he is exposed to tempests, shoals, and whirlwinds;—every moment he may dash against the rock of death, and lose his all;—he may be engulfed in the whirlpool of despair, and sink to the region of eternal woe!—D. Thompson.

HEALTH AND VIGOUR.—The flow of animal spirits—the fire and vigour of the imagination—the fulness and power of feeling—the comprehension and grasp of thought—the fire of the eye—the tones of the voice—and the electrical energy of utterance—all depend upon the healthful and vigorous tone of the animal system; and by whatever means the body is unstrung, the spirit will feel and display the languor-begetting influence.—J. Young.

DRUNKARDS SHORTLIVED.—Sir Richard Steel says, "Three-and-thirty is the grand climacteric of drunkards!" Perhaps a lower figure might be set down now, and yet no incorrect statement be made.

PUBLIC HOUSES versus CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION.—In the town of Bury there are 124 places where intoxicating drinks are sold, besides 14 places where British wines may be bought. 122 of these places are open on Sabbath day for the sale of intoxicating drinks, while there are only 18 places open as Sabbath Schools, and 19 places of public worship. 122 synagogues of Satan open on the Lord's day—places of worship under 20!

EVERY RECLAIMED INEBRIATE—adds a vast moral force to the Teetotal Principle. He is not merely an individual rescued from the grasp of the destroyer, but an advocate whose example, as well as his addresses, guides others into the way of safety.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The Rev. EVAN JONES, of Tredegar, whose name must have become familiar to the readers of the Essayist, has been unanimously elected to the office of Secretary to the above Institution, rendered vacant by the resignation of Mr. THOMAS BEGGS. He is expected to enter on the duties of his office about the latter end of the present month. His numerous friends in the Principality do not part with him without deep regret. We sincerely wish him health and strength for the discharge of his important duties.

"THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT: its past history—present position—future prospects and connexion with other great movements of the age:—is the subject of the Essay contained in No. 12 of the TEETOTAL ESSAYIST, which is now ready. The Proprietor regrets that he was not able to publish it on the 15th ult., as announced. Mr. THOMAS BEGGS, the writer of the Essay, was anxious to render it as complete as possible, but was prevented from furnishing the manuscript in due time, in consequence of very numerous and indispensable engagements in connexion with the Health of Towns Association, of which he has recently become the Secretary. The Essay will be found replete with interest.

The Teetotal Times and Essayist will appear regularly on the first day of every month. It will possess the privilege of free postage, so that Societies or individuals will have the means of circulating the successive numbers at a trifling cost.

During the past year, many thousand copies of the Teetotal Times and the Essayist have been sent gratuitously to Ministers of Religion, Magistrates, Sunday School Teachers and others, to whom, but for this cheap and effectual medium, information as to the principle and operations of Teetotalism, would not have been communicated. Great good has resulted from this circulation; and Societies or individuals anxious to spread such information, cannot adopt a more easy and efficient mode of doing so, than is thus afforded them through the medium of the Teetotal Times and Essayist. They may be supplied for this purpose at 6s. per hundred, which will be sent to them in parcels, post free. Single copies will be sent regularly to individuals, on the payment of One Shilling per annum in advance. Orders, with the amount in Post Office Orders or Stamps, to be addressed to Mr. JOHN CASSELL, Budge Row, London.

TEMPERANCE PUBLICATIONS.

LITTLE TRACTS FOR LITTLE FOLK ON TEMPERANCE.
B. L. Green, Paternoster Row, London.

We have before us twenty-four of the Tracts of this very pretty series. The subjects are well chosen, being either short and simple narratives, or plain facts and arguments, the truth and force of which may be easily comprehended. They are very neatly printed on tinted papers, and are likely to prove an acceptable present to the "little folk" for whose instruction and edification they are designed. Larger "folk" will do well to take a packet of these tracts with them, as often as they visit circles where "little folk" are to be found. They will be sure to find customers, and much good may thus be done; and as packets containing 100 may be had for 6d., it will not be a very expensive concern.

THE ADVISER. London, Houlston, Paternoster Row.

Another halfpenny monthly, under the auspices of the Scottish Temperance League, commenced in November last. The numbers before us contain articles of sterling merit. It is the best halfpenny periodical we have seen, and deserves to be supported by every Temperance Society.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL AND YOUTH'S TEMPERANCE JOURNAL. London: B. Green, Paternoster Row.

This new halfpenny monthly is issued by the Committee of the British Temperance Association, in pursuance of a resolution passed at the last Conference of the Association, and with a view of directing attention to the importance of inoculating the minds of the rising generation with the principles of the Temperance Reformation. With the co-operation of the teachers of Sabbath and other Schools, this periodical may prove the means of very extensive usefulness.

DICAL AND ANTI-USAGE MOVEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

DEAR SIR:—Allow me to direct the special attention of your readers, particularly those who are members and office bearers of Total Abstinence Societies, to a few important particulars in connection with the Medical and Anti-Usage Movements.

In reference to the subject of the TEMPERANCE MEDICAL CERTIFICATE. I am much impressed with the opinion that this matter ought to be pressed forward into a regular and systematic movement and should not be confined to obtaining a limited number of signatures to the document.

In the course of much conference and correspondence on this subject for several years, it has forced itself on my observation, that vast numbers of the medical profession, in their successful examination of various other departments of their business, have almost entirely omitted an accurate knowledge of the medical properties of alcohol; and that their ignorance has been the pregnant source of prodigious evil among our inhabitants. On the other hand, sound views on this subject would prove a blessing of general benefit, and the Temperance cause would profit to a large amount thereby. By the prosecution of the subscription of the certificate, medical men will have their attention strongly drawn to the subject. They cannot but remark that the leaders in the profession have of late taken a new stand, unwontedly favourable to our cause: but it cannot be, but that a change of the most pernicious nature would ensue on the whole Faculty, if the matter were now judiciously, but firmly pressed by friends of temperance. And if the opinion and favourable alteration in medical opinion were to widen and increase among professional men throughout the whole kingdom, it cannot be doubted that a favourable change of general sentiment through all ranks would ensue.

We have ever found, that next to the obstacles sent to Teetotalism by the Drinking usages, there has stood more opposed to the advance of the cause, than the ill-founded but inveterate notion that a moderate amount of alcoholic drink was necessary by day proper for the human frame; and that therefore the demand upon all classes to abstain totally, was a requirement at once unreasonable, dangerous and preposterous. What a boon therefore to our operations and exertions would the removal of such a universal and effective impediment prove?

But, Sir, this auspicious consummation, now appears, in the leading of Providence, within our reach, we would only exert common diligence. The multitude of facts evolved by Teetotalism, and the steadfastness of its advocates and professors, and the successful issue of its birth and progress, have merited the respectful observation of the leaders in medical science. These learned practitioners have been examined and scrutinized on all sides, they have found them inept and erroneous, and seem prepared in a great measure to repudiate former errors, and to enter on a course quite favourable to our own sentiments. How desirable is it that this salutary reform should be expanded among the seventy thousand medical practitioners, in Great Britain, who yet, for the most part, stand in a measure, hostile to our positions: and that the improved sentiment should thence pervade the millions of the population who are at present environed with infinite danger by their sheer ignorance of this important subject.

Now, what I plead for, and I hope it shall not be in vain, is, that leading Teetotalers should, without abandoning valuable local objects, consider a general scheme of this nature as possessing paramount claims upon their attention and labours.

A few medical men employed to itinerate and lecture on the medical question, and simultaneously to draw the notice of local practitioners to the subject, and to procure their signatures to the certificate; would stimulate our cause, and effect a mighty progress and advancement throughout. Under such a general change of opinion as this procedure would operate, the Teetotaler would no longer require to be perpetually on the defensive, and to be content with mere toleration. As it stands, we are put continually to justify our teetotal practice in every company we enter. If the new medical views were better understood, we should be in a different position.—Then the moderate drinkers of alcohol would be put on the defensive; they would endeavour to protect their practice from blame, if this were possible.

What I would urge upon the leading friends of Temperance is, not to let go the inferior departments of Teetotalism, but by all means to search and scrutinize individually into such subjects as the Medical and Anti-usage movements, and use the most diffusive and energetic measures towards their progress. And doubtless the four general Temperance Unions seem more particularly called upon to support and cherish the general schemes.

Many districts of England and Scotland have as yet procured no signatures to the certificate; the subject has not been agitated in these quarters, and no interest seems to be felt. But the greatest encouragement presents itself to exertion on this point. The more scientific and honoured members of the medical profession are all declaring themselves professionally in our favour. This morning only, I have received the adhesion of a party of great and deserved eminence, who felt dubious of our position some time ago. In short, nothing is wanting, under Providence, but the continued attention of the friends of Temperance to the subject, and their willing and zealous co-operation in the movement.

II. With respect to the system of ARTIFICIAL and COMPULSORY DRINKING USAGE, almost peculiar to our own country.

At the commencement of the Temperance movement in 1823, I earnestly advocated direct steps being taken for the abrogation; and during more than nineteen years have not ceased in calling attention to the subject, with no great measure of success hitherto. But I have no doubt that Teetotalers throughout will at last perceive that this step must be taken, and that it cannot be shunned or passed by.

I think I am prepared to shew, by the evidence of Working men and Temperance Missionaries, that the principal obstacle in our country, though not elsewhere, to the taking of the teetotal pledge, is the system of compulsory drinking usage; and that the great breaker of the pledge after it has been taken, is the same imperative system.

I know that persons in the richer classes do not perceive this, and are greatly ignorant on the subject; but most working men know it excellently well, for "the iron" of this despotism has "entered their soul." I deprecate, therefore, being judged in this matter by gentlemen; I appeal to the working myriads for the truth of the practice, and the philosophy of this arbitrary system.

Again; if proper measures were taken to abrogate the usages, we should obtain the assistance in this object, of thousands of influential men who are not teetotalers. I need not argue with you on the ignorant fallacy of refusing assistance from this large class of fellow citizens. Multitudes of masters in every trade would assist in prudent measures for the suppression of the usages—for there is no source of loss and detriment to masters and employers so great as the drunkenness of workmen.

My friends in the National Society have kindly printed in their periodical the following testimonial, to be signed by masters: and you will recognize in its terms, matter which I submitted to yourself some time ago, and on which you suggested some very important alterations, viz:—

"We believe that the drinking usages of the factories and workshops, such as compulsory drink-fines and footings, lead to extensive evil.

"That their imperious character is contrary to all true liberty.

"That such an extensive system of cruelty and injustice is not kept up, so far as we know, in the social Customs of any other Nation.

"That by means of this Compulsory or Artificial system, young men are often, in a manner, forced to become drunkards.

"That Drunkards who would wish to reform, are by these domineering and arbitrary Customs, prevented from putting their good resolutions in force.

"That hereby a dangerous and mischievous tax of many millions a year, is imposed by workmen on one another, without consent of the parties paying.

"We consider the following penalties, instituted to keep up the drinking and paying of fines and footings, to be of the most revolting and oppressive description, viz., sending men to Coventry; putting them out of the pale of good-will and friendship, and kind assistance of brother workmen; inhumanly refusing to teach apprentices work, their drink footings being unpaid; constraining starving men, who from sickness or otherwise have been out of work, or indeed any parties whatever, to pay journeyman's drink footings, by threats and other means; secreting men's clothes, and dirtying, tarring, cutting, and destroying them; gapping, notching, and otherwise injuring tools, or sending both to the Pawn-broker's shop, and in a felonious manner pledging them for the regulation drink-fines; forming conspiracies to force out of workshops and factories, men who decline to pay footings; maltreating respectable individuals on this account, by taunts, mockings, a variety of insults, blows, and other injuries.

"We further express our disapprobation of any pecuniary connexion between the foremen of factories and workshops, and individuals who keep public-houses, or foremen keeping public-houses themselves; and all bribing of foremen and others by drink, to bestow work.

"We object to payment of wages in public-houses, as of the most extensively ruinous tendency; and also to linking or grouping men together with large bank notes or gold, leaving them to procure change where they can. And, in conclusion, we bear testimony from our constant and painful experience, to the injurious consequences of the ceaseless and unmeaning connexion that has been constituted in this country between business and strong drink, in a variety of ways, far too multifarious to be enumerated."

It is probable that in commencing with a general request to employers to sign this paperer, it may draw their attention determinately to a subject so important to their own interests. Many of them are themselves, as yet, ignorant of the details of particulars of the drinking usages of their workmen, and yet would strenuously assist in the abrogation, if informed on the subject.

The National Society has also had the kindness to insert in their periodical the following short plan of procedure in the abrogation of the usages.

"It is recommended, that after getting the employer opinion signed as extensively as possible, the Temperance Committees divide themselves into sections of two persons each; giving each section the charge of several workshops or factories. These sections will apply to employers and masters in a prudent and respectful manner, explain the dangerous nature of the drinking-usages, and obtain their leave to speak with, and address them on the subject. They will then find out a few among the men of peculiar good sense and conduct. I explain to them the oppressive and deleterious character of the "usages;" suggest their abrogation; disseminate anti-usage tracts among them; procure their promise to talk quietly and judiciously to the men, in private, on the subject; suggest that instead of spending to drink any fine that it may be expedient to keep up in workshops and elsewhere, it would be preferable to institute a fund for library, benefit club, or other useful purpose.

"After the matter has been quietly agitated for a certain time, a meeting of the men to be called, and abrogation of the drink footings and other usages to be proposed with the assistance of the master to this effect, being also in judicious and prudent manner requested.

"Many workshops and factories have abandoned the "Drinking Usages" under procedure of this kind: although total abstinence was not at the time made an part of the proposal, a great barrier to it was thus removed: and many non-teetotalers would give assistance in this department of teetotalism, if requested to do so.

"Care must be taken not to offend, and not to cause any undue dictation on the part of the master that might hurt the proceedings. Employers might be requested to avoid paying wages in public-houses; and friendly societies committees to hold meetings there."

I conceive, under correction, the MEDICAL MOVEMENT and the ANTI-USAGE SCHEME, to be the two grand pillars of Teetotalism; if these two plans are not carried into effect and fully accomplished, the Temperance Reformation never can be complete in this country.

It will probably be necessary to this end, that Teetotalers resume their ancient, daily, individual labour and toil. They must contend against erroneous medical opinions and drinking customs, as they contended for their cause at the commencement. At present, they have too much given into a luxurious and supine method of doing business. Private individuals have ceased to agitate and strive in the cause: it is thrown upon public agent to do so, and on a very few noble-minded men of each district, who are oppressed with the work. A public meeting, with a salaried agent to address once a month, is good: but this is not all that the case still demands:—the usages must be driven out of the holes and caverns of business and trade; they must be searched for, hunted out and exterminated. Every one must work towards this effort in his own sphere.

Meanwhile there is encouragement. The National Society have commenced to procure the signatures of Employers to the above testimony against the usages. The Scottish League have taken the field against the funeral usages of North Britain. The Midland and British Associations are, I venture to say, preparing themselves for a war upon the Compulsory Customs, which will not be needlessly terminated.

I am, Dear Sir,

Your's respectfully,

JOHN DUNLOP.

* * We are glad to receive this communication from our respected friend and coadjutor; and request the serious attention of its details to all our readers. Even those who do not at present sustain office in total abstinence Societies may have it in their power to render essential service in this matter. By the circulation of this paper—by conversation with employers and the employed—and by various other means, they may assist to further the designs contemplated in the above article, to banish from our beloved country customs and usages which have for ages been its disgrace, and which are among the chief barriers to its true prosperity.

IS TOTAL ABSTINENCE FROM ALL STRONG DRINKS SCRIPTURAL ?

BY THOMAS SMEETON.

This is a question which demands a thoughtful consideration and a serious answer. All who revere the Old and New Testament as a revelation of the Divine will, must, in all consistency, feel deeply anxious to ascertain whether the Sacred writings commend or condemn the popular movement to which we have adverted, and to which their adhesion and co-operation are invited. We will endeavour to furnish enquiries, with a suitable reply to the query with which this paper is commenced, and solicit the calm and fixed attention of our christian readers, while we submit to their notice a few simple preliminary propositions.

I.—Tectotalism is not named in the Scriptures. The practice of "Total Abstinence" which it represents by a quaint and modern appellation, is mentioned in the inspired records, and whilst it is often named with divine approbation respecting it, either expressed or implied, it is never, as a habit practised from right motives, directly or indirectly spoken of in terms of divine disapprobation. Still, as the watchword of an associated body, as the distinguishing badge of a confederated band of Moral Reformers it is not named in the Bible any more than Missionary Societies—Sunday Schools—Bible Societies and many other useful and laudable institutions.

II.—Total abstinence from intoxicating drinks is not expressly commanded in the Scriptures. No part of the decalogue says "thou shalt not drink alcoholic liquors." No precept of the Prophetic or Apostolic writings requires us to abstain from such drinks. Neither do the Scriptures specifically charge us to abstain from smoking opium, with the Chinese, or chewing it with the Turks.

III.—The moderate use of strong drink is not enjoined in the Scriptures. We cannot discover a Bible precept which bids us to drink spirituous liquors in moderation. If, therefore, we are not to act in these dietetic matters in conformity with the dictates of our own judgments, and may not draw our conclusion from observation and experience touching this matter—if we must wait for a Bible command for our guidance—we are in an absurd dilemma—for as the Scriptures make neither abstinence nor drinking imperative—we must neither drink intoxi- cating beverages nor abstain from them. The doctrines of a Divine command, therefore, leading, as it does, to manifest absurdity, is evidently untenable and unsound.

IV.—BUT THE PRINCIPLES of the holy writings form the solid groundwork upon which the structure of Total Abstinence is securely based. Here the Christian friend of the Temperance Reformation can take his stand and maintain his position. Here he may calmly, but dauntlessly, meet all objectional opposition. If the leading Principles of the Scriptures support and justify him in his practice, he can afford to bear, with firm and unmovable patience, the misplaced opprobrium which a wicked world and a misguided church may concur in casting upon him.

The remaining portion of this paper will be occupied with a reference (as brief as possible) to some of the maxims and tenets with which the doctrine and habit of Total Abstinence from strong drink are strictly accordant.

Matt. 7. 12. "Therefore all things whatever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the Prophets." The principle involved in this "golden rule" does not teach us to do that which is morally unlawful with a view of aiding our neighbour. By "all things" therefore we must understand all allowable and useful and compassionate "things," by which we can benefit and bless our brother man. If we see a man conveyed to prison, by the justly exerted power of the law, on account of his commission of some flagrant offence, we could not with propriety unite in an attempt to break down the door of the dungeon in which the criminal is confined—on the ground of the principle involved in this text; simply because if we were deservedly punished by imprisonment we could not justly expect or desire that our neighbour would act on our behalf in the manner just described. Therefore unless Total Abstinence "be allowable, useful and compassionate"—and unless the intemperate portion of our fellow creatures can without injustice demand the practice of "Total Abstinence" at our hands, as a restoring example—we, as christians are not called upon—by this rule to become Total Abstainers. But the system is permissible, for it is not forbidden—it is useful, for it has checked vice and suffering wherever it has prevailed—it is compassionate, for it has dried up many tears—bound up many broken hearts, and raised many of the downfallen victims of appetite and custom. Neither, if we were in the miserable state to which the sin and folly of the inebriate has brought him—should we act wrongly in wishing that the sober part of the community would combine in attempting to release us from the bondage and wretchedness of Intemperance. In this view of the case, it is clearly incumbent upon the christian to unite in the promotion and advancement of the interests of the Temperance Enterprise.

Romans 14. 13. "Judge this, rather, that no man put a stumbling block, OR AN OCCASION TO FALL, in his brother's way." Although this injunction referred primarily to the consumption of meat which had been offered to Idols, it contains a lesson of "Instruction in righteousness" in common with "all scripture," (2 Tim. 3. 16.) and is consequently applicable to all cases, now, in which the follower of him who "went about doing good" can avoid flinging "a stumbling block" in the way of his fellow-man. Should we succeed in proving that the moderate use of strong drink, in the present day, and in the present circumstances of society—is, on the part of the christian, tantamount to casting "a stumbling block" in the way of his weaker brethren, he will of course see the propriety of ceasing to consume intoxicating beverages. It is quite possible to show, from many deplorable cases, that the use of strong drink on the part of professing christians has hindered many miserable drunkards from being reclaimed. In many instances such unhappy characters have clung to their cups with terrible tenacity, because of the sanction bestowed upon the drinking customs by the more sober and highly reputable persons who form the bulk of our christian churches. Let ministers and church members try to escape from the force of truth as they may, and do, they cannot neutralize the force of the following facts. 1st. As long as many thousands of men drink strong drink at all they will be drunkards. 2nd. As long as they see ministers of the gospel, and the professing church generally, hold back from the Total Abstinence Society, then drunken multitudes will refuse to abstain and will continue intemperate. 3rd. As long as professing christians continue to drink strong liquors in moderation, they will foster and perpetuate the sin of Drunkenness.

Again, many members of Christian churches, to whom, from physical constitution, strong drink is peculiarly alluring and dangerous—are hindered from abstaining through the moderate drinking practice of their pastors and fellow members. How many of the members of our various religious bodies are expelled from membership through excessive drinking—but they would not fall into excess if they would abstain, and they would abstain if their pastors and deacons and fellow-members would. But then "Fathers in Israel" seem to prefer "sitting" in the temple of the Idol, strong drink, in their own selfish safety—and being the means of ensnaring their "weak brother" for whom "Christ died"—and of casting him out as evil—to the "Paul-like," and Christ-like—act of self-denial, which, as an example, might preserve their brother, from a grievous and disgraceful fall!!

But many who have been reclaimed by Total Abstinence, have found the moderate drinking of Christians "a stumbling block" in the way, and "an occasion to fall." A wretched sot became, a few years ago, a sober man, through his adoption of Total Abstinence. His domestic peace—his bodily health, and his social character were signally and, it was hoped, permanently regained. But, to use his own words, he had "to fight hard against the opposition of the wicked, and harder still against the opposition of the good!" Professing christians strove to convince the poor fellow that Teetotalism was wrong, and at length succeeded in persuading him to "drink a little." This broke down the barriers of safety which Teetotalism had built around him—his old appetite was aroused with redoubled intensity—he became a drunkard again—his family were again reduced to rags and ruin—his last end was worse than his first, and he died drunk with blasphemous imprecations upon his expiring lips! while professing christians around wondered and lamented—strangely forgetting that they by their example and inducements had put "an occasion to fall" in the sinner's way, and had been, in fact, his TEMPTERS AND DESTROYERS!!

1 Peter 2. 11. "Abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the Soul." By "lusts" in this passage, are we not to understand indulgences of the appetites, which are found to act injuriously to the peace and prosperity of the Soul? If so, as soon as the practicability of "Total Abstinence" from strong drink is ascertained in connection with a discourse of the hurtfulness of the drinking customs (as a whole) as regards the well being of our souls; is it not clearly becoming on the part of christians to cease to uphold such injurious usages in any degree? To this opinion many of the good and wise in the present day have been brought as the result of sincere and patient investigation, and they earnestly and affectionately invite the co-operation of all who are led to see that the appetite for strong drink which so commonly obtains is at the best but a "fleshly lust," and in many cases has been found to "war against the soul."

James 4. 17. Therefore to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin. Here is a principle which sanctions the adoption of "Total Abstinence" on the part of such as are brought to perceive that they will, by subserving its interests, be made instrumental, to a great and gratifying extent, in "doing good." The great head of the church went about "doing good," and just in proportion to the reigning power of his grace in the hearts of his people, they will be seeking for opportunities of "doing good" amongst their suffering fellow-men. It will not be their enquiry how much self-denial can I evade? How many sacrifices can I avoid? How near can I go to sinful indulgence without falling into it? But rather where can I deny myself more—what further sacrifices can I make, and how far can I go from the appearance of evil"—so as more fully to promote the best interests of my race, and make manifest the glory of my God? If such desires are rising in your heart, kind and Christian reader, reflect upon the following statements.

The system of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks has been the means of "DOING GOOD"—during the past few years—beyond all other benevolent institutions combined—excepting the glorious gospel.—This statement must, of course, be taken to signify more good proportionably—considering the money expended and the means used.

1. It has done a vast amount of PHYSICAL GOOD—Many thousands of drinkers, of all grades from the sipper to the sacker, have been materially benefited in their health through the disuse of alcoholic beverages.

2. MENTAL and MORAL good. Myriads of the human family have been swallowed by the whirlpool of Intemperance, but multitudes of men are now witnesses, to testify that "Total Abstinence," in the hand of the most HIGH, has snatched them from their dreadful proximity to the vortex of moral and mental ruin.

3. DOMESTIC AND SOCIAL GOOD. The tongue of an angel would fail to describe the glad and hearty gratitude which has been excited in many homes and social circles, through the benign influence of Total Abstinence upon such as were "ready to perish;" but are now reclaimed—recovered—and restored.

READER! need we go on? does not your bosom glow with generous emulation? are you not ready to exclaim—"It is enough—I perceive that the principles of the scriptures harmonize with the doctrine of "Total Abstinence"—in these intemperate days, to say the least, and I will now unite with the promoters of the Temperance Movement—praying that my relinquishment of strong drink may be blessed to the good of the human family, and to the praise of my "Father who is in Heaven."

A FEW PENCILINGS FROM OUR NOTE BOOK.

No. II.

BY THE REV. T. WALLACE.

THE AFFECTING INTERVIEW.

SOME years ago, having been discharging occasional ministerial duties, in a large town in Nottinghamshire. I was requested to call, prior to leaving the neighbourhood, on a respectable woman, who much wished to see me. I at once consented. I remember the morning well, when I entered an elegantly furnished parlour, and introduced myself to a fine looking and genteel female, in the prime of life. I observed, however, in a moment, that her countenance was wan and dejected, and she appeared altogether exceedingly unhappy. "You wished to have an interview with me, madam," I remarked, "before I left this vicinity." "I did, Sir," she rejoined; "indeed I did; but I know not now what to say, or what to do." "You appear to be distressed. It is not for me, as a stranger to cherish any desire to pry into your sorrow, but, as a minister of the Gospel, and of the kind and compassionate Saviour, I will endeavour to impart to you the consolations of Christianity, and that precious balm which the Redeemer only can communicate and apply." She immediately burst into tears, and sobbed, as well as she was able, "you are very kind to an unhappy stranger, my case is a miserable one. I have nothing but sorrow. I may say with Paul—"I am troubled on every side;" and, then, she wept more profusely and bitterly than ever. "Calm yourself, I beseech you, madam :—this excessive grief will only render your condition more wretched and disconsolate. I am glad to find that you referred to the Apostle Paul. You know something of that precious book, the New Testament. There is nothing like that divine volume, especially, in the hour of heavy and peculiar trouble. Be composed, then; be composed!" Some period, however, elapsed, before comparative tranquillity was restored to her. She wept again and again, and several times, I thought she would go off in strong convulsions.

I saw that I must be judicious, kind, yet decisive, in my procedure. I talked to her, as well, and as seasonably, as I was able, and when she regained her composure, I remarked, "you have something, have you not, resting, and pressing on your mind; tell me your case, and I will endeavor, by the help of God, to relieve you. What occasions your intense sorrow? Have you committed any grievous sin? or have you been plunged into any domestic calamity?" "I do, indeed feel," was the reply, "that I have been, and am a great-transgressor, but, I hope, I shall find mercy through that compassionate Saviour, who died that sinners might live. My sorrow does not spring from myself," and she wept again. "Does it arise from losses of a pecuniary kind, or from any unexpected bereaving dispensations of Divine Providence?" "No, Sir, I have no pecuniary anxiety. I have an elegant house and garden, and every internal convenience and comfort, but there is one thing that blights all—that ruins all—that withers all my joys—that undermines my health—that makes me feel old before I am forty—that breaks my heart!" "and what is that?" I quickly inquired. In a moment, she cried out, and almost convulsively exclaimed, "Drunkenness! Drunkenness!" I nearly started from my chair, and, looking at her earnestly, I said, "Well, but my dear madam, you do not mean to tell me that you are addicted to drunkenness. I waited most impatiently for her answer, fearing that I was addressing a poor, miserable drunkard, conscience stricken, and almost in a state of madness. "Oh no," said she, "thank God! thank God! with all my sins against heaven, I am no degraded, wretched drunkard. I know that "wine is a mocker—that strong drink is raging—and I know this by most painful and bitter experience." "Have you, then, a child, or children, given up to intemperance?" "No, thank God, I am childless. If I had children now, they might be a curse rather than a blessing."

Who, then, occasions all your poignant, your agonising sorrow? Tell me, I entreat you, and the secret, if you request it, shall remain with me." "O, unhappily, it is no secret, all here know it—though you are ignorant of the cause of my grief, which will soon bring me to my grave: but it is MY HUSBAND—my poor, deluded, miserable Husband! How I have remonstrated with him! How I have watched over him, in the time of dangerous illness, occasioned by his intemperance! How I have prayed to God for his soul! How I do pity him!—but, I fear, there is no hope. He is killing himself by his intemperance, and, even now, he has delirium tremens, and requires to be narrowly watched both night and day. "My dear madam," I involuntarily exclaimed, "I do, indeed, pity you—and commiserate your cause from my very heart: but, is there no hope of your husband? can we do nothing for him? Is he too far gone to be rescued?" "I fear he is! O my poor deluded husband!—and she wept bitterly again, so that I could not refrain from weeping too.

When her grief had somewhat subsided, I observed, "what kind of drink has occasioned your husband's present awful condition? Wines, or raw spirits?" She sadly replied—"O Brandy! Brandy! nothing but Brandy. He has ruined his body—spent half of his property—and, I fear, lost his soul; and, for what?—to gain Brandy!" "How long has he formed these wretched and soul-destroying habits?" "Nearly eight years." Before that period, I was as happy as I could possibly be in this world, but he went out of an evening for an hour, to take a glass of brandy and water—the habit was fixed—the hour was increased to two or three—often and often, he has not returned till midnight. He wanted strong brandy and water at home, two or three times during the day, until, in the course of twelve months, he began taking clear brandy—one wine glass full at a time, and he proceeded from step to step, till he drank in this way, half a Bottle, and at length a whole Bottle of Brandy a day. I appealed to him. I remonstrated with him. I told him of his sin, of his folly, of his danger. I wept over him—night after night I bathed my pillow with my tears; but all was unavailing. I got others to speak to him, in the most pointed manner. I requested some medical men to see him and warn him of the consequences of his habits, still he persevered, no advice, however intelligent, or affectionately given, was heeded by him. He continued to drink his usual amount of brandy, until delirium tremens seized him, and his case was one of great danger. He recovered, owing to his possessing a most vigorous constitution, but on recovering, he returned, to my bitter sorrow, to his old habits. Indeed, he drank more Brandy than ever. His situation was most perilous. In the course of time, he had another dreadful attack, through his passion for Brandy. He was saved, under God, by a most eminent physician: but the remark was made to him—"Beware of the third attack! give up Brandy at once, and for ever, else, you are a dead man." He did refrain for some months, still, there was a hankering after it. He said he had a craving which must be removed, and that he must take a little brandy. He recommenced, and I am confident, he has often emptied a bottle of the best Brandy, in the course of a day. I conjured him to cast it from him. I fell down on my knees often and often, and told him if he had no concern for himself, if he had any love for me, to relinquish the use of these destructive drinks. He promised faintly, but in a day or two, said, "I cannot live without my Brandy." He ate nothing. He was seldom at home. His love for me seemed to have vanished. His appearance altered much for the worse. He had the well-known aspect of the confirmed and excessive spirit drinker.

"About a fortnight ago, I thought his conduct very singular, and, before he went to bed, he said he should like to put his razor under his pillow. You may conceive my alarm and horror. I saw that Brandy had again affected the Brain. I sent, at once, for our medical attendant, and so soon as he saw him, he ordered him to have two persons with him, by night and by day, and to be watched in the most vigilant manner, lest he might inflict injury on himself, or others. He is now labouring under delirium tremens, for the third time; he is—O my poor husband, "she ejaculated," may God pity you!—he is sinking fast—and I am not permitted to enter his chamber. Can you wonder, then, Sir, at my sorrow. My heart is broken—my heart is broken! I have sent for you, to ask you to pray for me, and especially to present fervent supplications, for my poor, dying Husband."

I knelt down with her, overwhelmed with sorrow, as she was, and, if ever I prayed to God earnestly for a dying man, and his afflicted and heart-broken wife, I lifted up my soul to Heaven then.

Three days after this affecting interview, which will never be forgotten, the poor, miserable victim of Brandy died, and expired in a manner too appalling to be described!

My readers, and especially my young readers, BEWARE, I conjure you, of the use of Brandy, or of any inebriating Liquors! You do not require them. The dangerous and destructive habit is soon formed, and you know not into what sin, misery, and danger it may plunge you, therefore, be always on your guard! Be loudly warned by the above simple and true narration.

CRIME AND DRUNKENNESS.—At the Middlesex Quarter Sessions held in January, one of the Magistrates on the bench remarked, that it was through strong drink that at least three fourths of the occupants of the prisons of the metropolis were led into the commission of crime.

MODERN BELIEVERS IN MIRACLES.

BY D. G. PAINE.

WITH almost all orthodox Christians in the present day, it is an avowed belief, that the Age of Miracles has long since passed away; that all the laws of Nature run on in due course, subject to no interruption of the physical dependence of cause upon effect; that the mighty and mysterious displays of special and supernatural intervention, which in other ages of the world were witnessed, have now entirely ceased; and that, whatever proofs there may be of Providential dispensations, it is not the time to look about for miracles.

Indeed, so settled are the public generally, in this sober belief, that miracle-mongers, now a days, can make but slow progress in the propagation of their views. Joanna Southcote, Prince Hohenloe, Edward Irving, Joe Smith, the Earl of Shrewsbury, &c., &c., &c., have, indeed, made a little bustle in the world, and people have stood gaping in astonishment at the wondrous tales, of profound revelations, and notable cures, which have got into circulation; but after all, the only miracle that the multitude believed in, was, that persons of common sense should put faith in such assertions!

Nevertheless, it is a fact, that with all this avowed and notorious scepticism, a very large majority of the people, professors of religion included, are implicit believers in the existence of miracles at the present day. Not more credulously does the Hindoo repose faith in the virtues of the Ganges; not more blindly did the followers of Thom, of Canterbury, trust to their invulnerability to bullets and bayonets; than do tens of thousands, of the shrewd, intelligent, educated men and women of the nineteenth century, believe in the continued existence, and constant operation, of an absolute miraculous agency.

"Nay, nay!" some very learned and respectable divines may exclaim, one who perhaps has elaborately and logically proved from the pulpit, that the power of miracles ceased when the last contemporary of the Apostles died, "you are jesting." Not at all! and it is very likely that the reverend and sagacious gentleman may, in spite of his own ably supported theory, be himself found amongst the modern believers of miracles.

The question of course arises, What is a miracle? and it may be briefly and satisfactorily answered, it is a suspension or interruption of natural laws, for the accomplishment or prevention of certain results; or, popularly and intelligibly, it is, an effect produced without a natural cause; or, a cause operating, without the production of its own positive effects.

When, therefore, we ascertain that particular things uniformly lead on to particular consequences; that certain combinations, lead on as a matter of necessity to certain effects; the failure of these definite results,—the disconnection of the causes and consequences, which Nature's established rules bind up together, must be a display of miraculous interposition.

Now Science,—and the voice of Science is but the enumeration of the latent truths of Nature,—has declared, that ALCOHOL,—which exists in every description of Intoxicating Liquor is a POISON; essentially and uniformly a poison, not by any figurative employment of terms; but using the word in its literal and strictest signification. True it is used in so many weakened forms, those who take it more freely than others, have habituated themselves by such early, and gradual stages, that its activity is very much subdued, and its power for a long time withstood; but its real character is never changed. Either Medical and Chemical Science has published to the world a Lie, or ALCOHOL is a POISON.

In strict accordance with this fact, is the opinion generally expressed by medical men. The Testimonial recently signed by twelve hundred practitioners, is, of course, familiar to all the readers of the Teetotal periodicals; and many of them in their more circumstantial statements, detail with interesting minuteness, the precise manner in which it has been known to act on the human system; leaving its morbid traces—as unerring indications of its deleterious nature.

And be it observed, that Medical opinions on this point, are but the more authoritative and definite expression of public sentiment on the same question. Who ever felt astonished at hearing that one had shattered his constitution by Drink, another dropped down in a fit of apoplexy, another swelled out with dropsy, another perpetually panting and gasping for breath, another shrivelled nearly to a skeleton, and another blotched over with sores from the same cause? Accounts of such cases we have all heard, without any very great wonderment that they should be the fruits of drink. But if we had been told, that these or any of them, had been produced by the use of bread and butter, or potatoes, or mutton, or tea or coffee, or any other article of ordinary consumption, we should have started with surprise; or, which is most likely, should have laughed at the idea as utterly ridiculous. Now this shows, that we have always been accustomed to place Alcoholic Drinks in a separate category; we have insensibly regarded them as possessing the seeds of disease; and thus, there has been in the popular estimate, a far nearer approach to the scientific truth, than would be at first supposed.

Then Alcohol is a poison, and all Intoxicating Drink being Alcoholic, is to a degree poisonous, and if introduced into the system, must operate accordingly. The laws of Nature, and the law of Necessity bind it so to act, the unevitable dependence of Cause and Effect, leave no alternative; it is simply natural, that it should do so. Fire must burn, water must moisten, because it is their nature so to do; and if we admit that as a truth, which Science has enunciated respecting Alcohol, all Intoxicating Liquors must—we lay especial stress upon this imperative—they MUST act injuriously:—

—UNLESS—and here is the only exception,—NATURE'S LAWS ARE SUSPENDED. The consequences, if they do not ensue, are prevented by a supernatural interposition only; in fact, there is the performance of a Miracle.

Now there are tens of thousands of good, pious, sensible, well meaning people; lots of shrewd, clear headed, metaphysical theologians; men who can perhaps shape a proposition, or draw a corollary, or define a miracle, more philosophically than ourselves; who are constantly taking in Alcoholic beverages, with the settled belief that none of the natural consequences will befall them. They swallow it down, and they smack their lips, and they roll their tongues with ineffable complacency, and feel perfectly assured, that to their favoured insides, the article which early and modern science pronounces a poison, will prove as harmless as unsophisticated water. If they were to take a sudorific, and not perspire; if they were to take a strong aperient, and not be purged; if they were to take antimony wine, and not vomit; if they were to take morphine, and have no stupor; they would say, "Why, dear me, how very strange, I cannot possibly account for it, is it not marvellous?" But they take Intoxicating Liquor, expecting that a miracle will be wrought to prevent its matter-of-course operations: that the laws of Nature will be reined in on their behalf; and that the healthiness of their own highly favoured brain, and blood, and lungs, and liver, will be fenced round by an authoritative command to the Drink, that when it has tickled the palate, and gratified the taste; it will lay aside its deleterious character, and gurgled down their throats, a perfectly innocuous fluid.

It is true that the faith of these Believers in Miracles, is often times severely tried. Many a one is frequently found clapping his hand convulsively to his forehead, and exclaiming: "Oh dear! dear! dear me! what shall I do? how dreadfully my head aches!" Many a one sees in the glass a peculiar enlargement at the end of his nose, and certain little crimson pimples, which threaten to mar the beauty of the countenance; many a one feels a shakiness of frame, and a growing tremor in the limbs, for which neither age nor hardships can satisfactorily account; many a one whoops, and labours, and groans, while the lungs emit a painful cough, which is almost always born in the Bottle: but nevertheless, though their faith is thus tried, it does not fail, they still hold it fast as ever, and with a martyr's firmness, they part it only with their life!

We leave it to polemical divines, to determine whether miracles have really ceased or not; that is no part of our business to debate; but it appears tolerably clear, that there is a goodly troop of moderns, who still believe that they have not. True, they may shake their heads, and talk of the credulity of other people, and call them "poor things;" but if they "strain at a gnat," they are certainly "swallowing a camel;" and if this short article does not convict them, we will extend the argument in a future number.

A WARNING TO YOUNG MEN.*

YOUNG MEN OF ENGLAND! the inspired penman has declared, "strong drink is raging." Have you never known the forcible expression literally verified? We shall give you a striking instance.

A Wesleyan Sunday School, in a northern county of England, numbered amongst its scholars a young man of great promise. He was docile—gentle—orderly—well-behaved; and his teacher cherished pleasing hopes that he would become a useful and exemplary member of society. Alas! that hopes which rose so bright should set so soon. He left the Sunday School, and chose for his companions the profligate and intemperate. He joined in their convivialities, and soon became a drunkard. For a few years he pursued the way "which leadeth to destruction;" and every step he took plunged him deeper and deeper into the yawning gulph of intemperance, which was shortly to swallow him up. On Christmas-day last he was thoroughly intoxicated; and aloud his vain boastings were heard that he would be drunk every day of the new year! He was taken ill shortly after—he continued to get worse—brain fever ensued—medical aid was of no avail—the minister of religion stood by his bedside to point him to the Saviour, but alas! he was insensible, and the day before the morning of the new year had dawned, his spirit had left the earth to stand before the tribunal of God. Thus at the early age of 23 he has found a drunkard's grave!

"Strong drink is raging!" Our tale is not yet concluded. One new year's day, that young man was bound in his grave clothes, and his late home was "the house of mourning." But what do we say? the house of mourning? Ah! "strong drink" will cause a mother to "forget her sucking child"—a father his favourite son; it is "raging." At the foot of the corpse sat the father in a state of—what shall we call it—bestly intoxication!

Young Men of England! we implore you to take warning—we beseech you to abstain. None are safe who tamper with strong drink—it is raging. Shun it then as you would do an adder. Hate it with a perfect hatred. Let the firm resolve be yours,—

O take it back! I'd rather have
You plunge a dagger in my breast;
This would but lay me in the grave—
That rob me of eternal rest.

Y.

A LICENSED VICTUALLER—named Drew, who has been six times bankrupt, was refused further protection in the London Bankruptcy Court, about a fortnight since, by Mr. Commissioner Shepherd. He had been six times bankrupt in eleven years, and on five occasions had not paid a farthing in the pound.

CRUEL PARENT!—A boy aged four years and nine months, died, a short time since, in Manchester, in consequence of having drank a glass of strong whiskey and water, which his father had left on the table.

TEETOTAL GLEANINGS.

IN the course of our attendance at meetings held in the metropolis and suburbs during the Christmas season, we have picked up several little narratives worthy of preservation. The following are among them.

STRONG DRINK IN VESTRIES.

At the anniversary meeting of the Finsbury and Hoxton Ladies' Temperance Association, held in the School room adjoining Dr. Campbell's Tabernacle, Mr. LEA, of Shadwell, detailed the circumstances under which he became a lover of strong drink, and lost his standing in a Christian church, and injured himself greatly in "mind, body, and estate." He formed a resolution to abstain for two years, and drew up his resolution on paper. On submitting it to his pastor it was laughed at and tossed up in contempt. Soon after, being induced to take "just one glass," he was overseen, and two officers of the church were sent to administer reproof and counsel him. These two officers staid with him, and partook of refreshments, till they also were overseen, [and left his house in a very so-so state! And what became of the pastor and congregation? The congregation was one of the largest in London; the pastor was a fine athletic man, the picture of health and strength. But that pastor gradually became bloated and sickly and unsightly; his church and congregation were frittered away, and both pastor and people were scattered and lost! Such was the result of introducing strong drink into vestries; for the vestry of the place to which he referred often smelt like a spirit shop! And such, too, was one result of reviling teetotalism! He (Mr. Lea) now rejoiced in the practice of that system, not only as it had been a source of unspeakable blessings to him, but as it had furnished him with a valuable instrumentality for usefulness. He congratulated the society in having such men with them as Dr. Campbell—men by whose precepts and example they would be guided into the way of sobriety, peace and righteousness.

IMPORTANCE OF TEETOTALISM TO LITERARY MEN.

At the Harp Alley Anniversary, S. C. HALL, Esq., made some interesting references to his own experience. He lived, he said, by the labour of his brain; and he could testify that since he had become a teetotaler he had an increase of intellectual power, so that what he sent out to the public never came trickling through a disturbed and disordered medium. And as to endurance of fatigue, he was able to work three times longer than ever he could while he indulged even moderately in the use of strong drinks. He was better in body, in mind, in home, in every comfort, and he felt proud therefore of the pledge he had taken to abide by the practice of entire abstinence. And he was not ashamed to testify to that practice on public occasions. At a dinner he recently attended, a friend observing him take water, said privately, "Put a little wine in your glass for appearance sake." He replied that he should do no such thing, and then stated his reasons for abstaining. He could not forget that within a hundred yards of the place where they were then meeting, men of transcendent talents, of powerful minds, of brilliant genius, men capable of astonishing and instructing the world, had been accustomed to meet, for, what were termed, convivial purposes. How many of them had gone down to a drunkard's grave at an early age! Biography was history teaching by example. Look at those two men Shakspeare and Campbell; the latter by his intemperance threw himself into the grave long before his time, humanly speaking; and Shakspeare at the age of 53 died of a fever caught after a casual debauch. He (Mr. Hall) would do his utmost to persuade men of his own class that teetotalism is a solemn duty which they owe to themselves, both as it regards time and eternity.

TEETOTALISM AND WAGES.

At the same meeting, J. AINSWORTH, Esq., of Oldham, instituted an interesting comparison between the value of teetotal and non-teetotal workmen, both as to the amount of labour and as to the quality of that labour. Total abstainers, generally speaking, were active, industrious, intelligent, and persevering; and as far as his experience and observation went, which was somewhat extensive, he regarded a teetotal workman as worth, at least, one and a half non-teetotal workman. A man who became sober and paid due attention to the cultivation of his mind, might soon be placed in circumstances of respectability and comfort.

Mr. Hall also said that some time ago, he remarked to a large employer, "Why you ought to pay your teetotal workmen more than you pay the others." "I do so," was the reply; "most of them work piece work, and the teetotalers do half as much again as the others, and they generally do it better." So that every teetotal workman was worth one and a half non-teetotalers to say nothing of the superior comforts he enjoyed.

TEETOTALISM versus INTEMPERANCE.

R. HICKS, Esq., Surgeon, said that a circumstance had recently occurred, which convinced him more than ever of the importance of teetotalism, as a preservative of character and comfort. About a fortnight ago a man knocked at his door whose appearance astonished him. A man who started in life with himself, of first-rate talents, and able to command any situation. He was without a penny in his pocket, and altogether in a most wretched condition. Drink and dissipation had ruined him. He (Mr. Hicks) thought that but for teetotalism he might have been in a similar state. And cases of that description were continually coming to view, and some of them so affecting, that even if he felt he were injuring himself by abstaining, he should deem it his duty to abstain. He would, however, assure them that by abstaining he had greatly increased his bodily, intellectual, moral, and religious enjoyment. He could fully corroborate the statement made by Mr. Hall, both from his own experience and from the reason of things. He could study or visit continuously without taking his regular meals, or his regular rest. A glass of precious water refreshed him at all times; though much engaged through the day, and often called out of bed at night, he stood the fatigue far, far better than his brethren who took wine and often dined out. It stood to reason that it should be so; the brain was the organ through which the mind acted, but nothing produced such confusion of the brain as the use of strong drink.

NATURAL BEVERAGES.

Mr. HICKS said, God had provided two beverages for the use of man; water and milk, and in proportion as he adhered to these he would be healthy and happy. If every gin shop in this land were converted into a milk shop it would contribute greatly to the health and morals of the country. Milk contained all the great staminal principles of nourishment. It was intended for the especial nourishment of infant babes, and the mother who took alcohol into her frame while tending her infant did herself and the babe much mischief. He and a medical friend had recently been engaged in examining minutely the milk of teetotal and non-teetotal mothers, and found that the milk of teetotalers contained far more nourishment than that of those who used any portion of strong drinks.

A SHORT, BUT INTERESTING STORY.

At the Horsly Down festival, a young advocate, Mr. G. CAMPBELL, greatly interested a crowded audience by the following narrative:—A few years ago, as some poor men were sitting by a poor fire, all being dark and gloomy around them, one of them went suddenly to the door, when he saw a little child, who, in tender accents sued for admission. At first he was about to thrust it away, but he determined to introduce it to his companions. They disliked the appearance of the child, yet they could not put it away, and at length they began to love it. People seemed greatly surprised that a child of such mean appearance should be so beloved; but as the child gradually grew into a strong and healthy lad, many of the neighbours began to love the lad, and to take care of him; and seemed anxious to introduce him to their acquaintance. And having taken care of this child, they soon found that they had something to do, and something worth living for. The lad visited various parts of England, explored the lanes of its towns, and the huts of the villages, and in almost every place found some to notice and to favour him. He visited London, and even there, immersed as the inhabitants were in business, and bent as they were on sensual enjoyment, he found some to entertain and patronize him. East, west, north, and south, friends increased, and many wise and good men looked upon him with approbation, and encouraged him with the hope that he should one day be a great man. He determined to travel; he did so, found many friends, and at length came back, and found that he was able to establish himself in the good opinion of the world. Sometimes he got into the Houses of Parliament, and obtained a short hearing; he visited some of the mansions of the great and the residences of nobles; and, in process of time, he contrived to gain admission to the royal palace. He (Mr. Campbell) had long had the honour of his acquaintance, and the more he knew of him, and heard of his doings, the better he liked him. It was usual to commence a tale with the name of the hero, but he (Mr. Campbell) had thought proper to give his story first. If, however, any present were curious to know the name of the youth of whom he had spoken, he would inform them that it was Teetotalism. What the youth had hitherto done had been accomplished with very slender means; but having accomplished so much, in obtaining a hearing in Parliamentary committees, in abolishing drinking canteens, in introducing rations of sober drinks into the navy, in providing teetotalers for the Polar expedition, and in other important matters connected with the health and prosperity of the nation,—there was every reason to believe that he would, before long, find his way into the cottage of every labouring man, the workshop of every mechanic, and every splendid mansion, till he and his principles obtained a triumph over the whole world.

THOUGHTS FOR THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

WELL! 1847 has passed away, and the recording angel has made a fair entry in the book out of which God will judge all men, of the acts of each. Who does not tremble at the thought of the judgment day, at the secrets of his heart being judged, and at the perfect and divine character of the judge? Who does not feel his need of pardon? And who would not sacrifice even life to purchase this inestimable blessing? Why not then possess this unclouded good. Repent—believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and be saved? Well! some would, if they could only be persuaded to lay aside strong drink, their easily besetting sin. But they drink on, and cannot find mercy. It would be strange if they could, for God is holy, true and just, as well as merciful, and drink is sin to them, whatever it may be to others. How many confess this, but persist in the evil way? Would to God they could be persuaded to quarrel with their enemy! Ah, and how many who, on the whole, mean well, tamper and fall, and rise, and fall again; and, alas! indicate the tremendous probability that they will fall eventually to rise no more. Would it not be better that the last drop of alcohol had been absorbed by the passing stream, and the art of producing another eternally forgotten, than that one soul perish through strong drink?

What shrieks of horror have rung on demon ears during the past year, as souls from 60,000 murdered bodies, murdered, mostly by their own voluntary and wilful act, through drink, have passed from our sea-laved, and sin-cursed isles, to toss on the fire and brimstone waves of the lake of woe? And shall 1848 add thousands more? God forbid! He does forbid! The mystery of his incarnation, the merit of his death, the strivings of his Spirit, the precepts of his word, the joys of heaven, the misery of hell—all, all forbid! He has raised up millions of Teetotalers, to proclaim this prohibition, put the press to work to print millions of pages to plead his authority, sent forth hundreds of advocates to teach his will, opened the mouths of thousands of parents and teachers to declare his mind, and last but not least, has commanded the pulpit to give a certain sound on the matter. God does forbid. He all but forces men to abstain. This He will never do. Heaven with all its purity, earth with all its science, morals, religion, and hell in all the groans of the lost, with one undying and intelligible voice cry, God does forbid. Man do thyself no harm! Abstain from all appearance of evil! Love is the fulfilling of the law. To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, it is sin. God does forbid! But men say we will drink. Well then drink on, and there will be plenty to manufacture, to sell, to adulterate, to help you to the asylum, the poor house, the prison, the place of execution, the grave, and the burning lake, and they will follow you fast that you may eternally "curse" them "in hell." Drink on, and you will soon be there. But oh! if you have one thought left, about an eternity of woe, for yourselves, for your partners, for your children, let that thought be spent upon your folly and danger in plunging into the burning lake! Turn rather than burn, repent rather than perish, believe and be saved, rather than remain unbelievers and be lost for ever. Ask mercy of God through the death of Christ. It is in his heart for you; even for you. Ask and live. Put away your enemy drink, and go to God your everlasting friend. He can, He will save you. Let 1848 be the year of your redemption. The year of grace to both body and soul. God grant that it may be such to multitudes!

Can any parent, teacher, master, minister, christian, fail to see that the world would be immeasurably better if such scenes as transpired in 1847 were not repeated in 1848? But drink was the cause of possibly nine-tenths of the whole. Then remove drink from the land, or in other words let each abstain, and take man as he is, a sinful creature, always inclined to evil, and by the blessing of God, the evil if not nine-tenths less, will be so greatly reduced as to fill many hearts with joy, and every tongue with praise. Yea, the very dregs of the worshippers of Bacchus will again prove that they are men and women, and will be ready to kiss the hand and wash the feet, of those who were honoured of God to remove from the land the last drop of this fiery liquid,

All hail then ye noble band of abstaining men, women, and youths! With your meetings, sermons, domestic visitations, tracts, periodicals, and larger books, ye prove yourselves the friends of all and the enemies of none. Ye have done good, and in the strength of Jesus ye will do much more. Our heart has been with you in the past, nor shall any earthly nor demon power separate us from you in the future, till we pass to that world where we hope to "range the sweet banks of the river, and sing of salvation for ever and ever." From thence, if God so permitted, we would aid you in your friendship to the world, and your passage to the skies. Go on, and may Jehovah, the conqueror go before you, and be on your right hand and on your left! Let the past encourage you! What hath God wrought! Teetotalism from the devil! Then satan is divided against satan, and his kingdom must fall. All hail! Let it fall! and the knowledge of the Lord cover the earth, and none hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain. Put on charity, brethren, which is the bond of perfectness, and all shall be well. Smile at opposition, and burn it up by the fire of love fetched from the altar near the throne. Truth in the form of Abstinence shall be universal. Adam's wine shall become the universal beverage. Look to God and work with Him, and He will accomplish it. Amen?

Clitheroe, January 15th, 1848.

R. TABRAHAM.

VITAL STATISTICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST.

SIR.—The Teetotal Times and Essayist for January, contains an extract from the Report of the Bury Abstinence Society, which gives a statistical account of the rate of sickness amongst the members of eight general sick clubs, and of three sick societies whose members were Teetotalers in this town, and which statistics are founded on the Report of the Rev. J. Clay on the Sanatory condition of Preston. As the Teetotal Security Tent No 121, I. O. R. is one of the three Teetotal sick clubs referred to in those Reports, I take the liberty of sending you the following statistics of that Tent for the year ending 25th December last.

Average No. of members during the year.	Members who received the sick gift during the year.	Average period of sickness in weeks.	Average payment to each sick member.	Total amount of sick fund.
62	No.	1. 9	s. d.	137. 2. 4½
	11		17. 7

It is worthy of remark that though the Teetotal Security Tent has now been established for nearly six years and a half, it has not lost a single member by death. These facts speak for themselves, and I think it is very desirable that Abstainers should give every encouragement to those Benefit Societies, the members of which are required to be Teetotalers.

Your's respectfully,

J. SMITH PYE,

Secretary of the Teetotal Security Tent.

Preston, January 15, 1848.

GOOD NEWS FROM SCOTLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST.

SIR,—Please send me the "New Series of the Teetotal Times" from its commencement. I am happy you adopt the present size, it will make the work permanently useful. The cause is steadily progressing here, our agents are faithful, and enterprising. Where whisky is so plentiful, and the common drink of the masses, it is a wonder we are able to stand, and much more so that we are able to get ahead. You stated lately that The Wesleyan, is the only religious paper devoted to the Temperance cause, or something to that effect. The Christian News which is published in Glasgow, has, since its commencement, advocated Total Abstinence nobly, and the articles of late on the subject are excellent. I believe every minister of the religious body to whom it belongs is a total abstainer.

Our annual soirée in the Music Hall this year, was splendid in every respect. Food, speeches, music, people, feeling, applause. We had our gloomy forebodings, but they were more than useless. Hope you will keep an eye on Scotland's movements—we need your sympathy, we need encouragement. Some of the best men in the land are on our side, but we have prejudices to overcome, and difficulties to surmount you know little of farther south. Our movement is evidently creating a host of kindred benevolent exertions, and I trust the day is dawning when the influence they shall exert when brought into motion will scatter the combined influences of evil into their native pit, and annihilate all the springs of moral pollution from our blood-stained earth.

Labour on, sacrifice more. I trust you will be well rewarded even here, doubtless your victor's brow will be heavy laden when the final day of reward arrives.

Your's affectionately,

Edinburgh, January 13, 1847. JAMES PALMER.

IMPORTANT STATISTICAL ENQUIRIES.

THE State Central Committee of Pennsylvania have called a State Temperance Convention to meet at Harrisburg on the 19th inst. They have requested full answers to the following inquiries.

How many individuals since the first of January, 1847, have been prosecuted in your courts for crimes, whose origin can be traced to the influence of intoxicating liquors, either directly or indirectly?

How many individuals were confined in your jails or penitentiaries during the past year? and how many were brought there through intemperance, either directly or indirectly?

How many murders have been committed in your county? and in how many cases can their cause be traced to the influence of intoxicating liquors, either directly or indirectly?

What is the number of paupers in your district or county? and how many were made so by intemperance either directly or indirectly?

What is the number of drunkards in your district or county? and how many have died during the past year?

What is the state of the cause of temperance in your county, the number of its friends, its obstacles and prospects? and what is the general sentiment in regard to a law prohibiting the traffic in liquors?

It would greatly assist in the promotion of the Temperance cause in England, if the Committees of various Temperance Societies would institute similar enquiries in their respective localities.

A DEGRADED WOMAN.

SOME eighteen years ago, near the place of our nativity, a woman was seen to emerge from a dark narrow alley. It was yet early on a foggy morning. The woman looked haggard, pale and filthy. She wore an old pelisse; shoes she had none, her bonnet was dirty and shapeless. It was obvious she had spent a night on the hard stones in that secluded lane.

With uneven steps this poor creature hurried to a neighboring gin shop. Her bony hand laid fourpence on the bar, while her tongue muttered "gin." She drank, and leaving the gin den, walked up the street towards the suburbs of the town.

She reached the poor house, knocked, and was admitted. Before night she was duly enrolled among the paupers.

But who was this degraded woman? How came she so fallen? Whose influence made her a pauper? Was she a child of poverty from her birth? Had irresistible misfortune driven her to the cup of desperation, or was she once a fair daughter of virtue, denuded of womanly excellences by the un pitying hand of vice?

Reader, that loathsome pauper was once a beautiful, accomplished and virtuous young lady! She had been the mistress over the most flourishing ladies' school in the country. As a teacher of youth she was deemed unsurpassed. In personal beauty she had few equals. Her society was courted, and her friendship valued.

Whence then the vast change? It proceeded from the dread power that has destroyed millions. The wine cup was her enemy.

She learned to love wine through the custom of her age. The wine cup was fashionable then, and none blamed her for doing what all did, until she crossed the line of propriety, and one day staggered in her school-room, drunk.

Then the world that had taught her to drink, lifted up false hands and hypocritical eyes. It affected to pity and to wonder, but it also forsook her.

Despised and forsaken, she wandered away from her native village. Whither she went none cared, and but few inquired. Her degradation was complete. From the fashionable moderate drinker, she had become the unfashionable drunkard; one step lower, and she was the public harlot; one more, and she was the diseased, dying pauper.

A pauper's funeral closes this brief story. She sleeps in an unhonoured grave. No stone marks where they laid her. They don't write epitaphs for paupers; and to-day, most likely, her name and grave are both forgotten in the place where she once shone a star of beauty, a centre of powerful attraction.

Thank God! that accursed drinking fashion which ruined her and millions more, is passing away! But it is not wholly gone. It lingers yet, even in high places. The cup still flashes its light in beauty's face; it yet touches female lips; it still drags down its victims to the grave. Its mystic power still throws its spell over millions. The temple of Bacchus is still frequented even by woman! Woman is even now degraded; her virtue often falls before the wine cup, and her name drops unhonoured to the dust. Then let woman rise to the rescue of her sex. Let woman speak, and from the social hearth-side, at least, the wine cup shall be banished for ever.

JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM, ESQ.

WE perceive from the Scottish papers, that this zealous and enterprising philanthropist has visited the principal towns in Scotland and delivered Lectures on Palestine, the Holy Land, Egypt, &c., to large and delighted audiences. In addition to these onerous labours, he has attended several large meetings for the purpose of advocating those great and important principles to the promotion of which he has devoted a portion of his useful life, namely Peace, Temperance, Universal Freedom, and Social reform. These same papers bear testimony to the ability with which he has discussed these topics, and to the great satisfaction and delight with which he was listened to. They state, also, that in consequence of the interest his visit has excited, and his inability at present to accept the numerous invitations he has received from other parts of Scotland, he intends to return thither on the summer, for the purpose of visiting the Highlands.

It may not be known to some of our readers that the friends of Mr. Buckingham have conceived the project of forming a TESTIMONIAL FUND for the purpose of building a PUBLIC LECTURE ROOM, in London, for the advocacy of TEMPERANCE, EDUCATION, BENEVOLENCE, and PEACE. This Fund is now in the course of collection. At the head of the list is His Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Duke of Cambridge, the Earl of Devon, the Earl of Harrowby, the Lord Bishop of St. Davids, and a considerable number of Nobility, Clergy, Professional and other gentlemen. The Earl of Devon has consented to be Treasurer. We hail this undertaking with delight, and augur unspeakable benefit from its accomplishment. It is the most delicate, and at the same time, the most appropriate Testimonial which could be presented to Mr. Buckingham; and, as far as we know that gentleman, one which will prove the most grateful to his own feelings. We trust that every true philanthropist—all who desire the promotion of Education—Temperance—Peace—and universal Benevolence—will contribute his or her mite without delay, that Mr. Buckingham may at once proceed on his benevolent career. We call especially, through this medium, upon the thousands of Teetotalers of Great Britain, to aid this truly National enterprise.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

HINCKLEY.

On Friday, January 7th, the members of the Society in this place were honored with the attendance of the Rev. ROBERT GRAY MASON. The chair was taken by the curate of the parish, the Rev. THEODORE JOHN AVARD, who delivered a most suitable address. Mr. MASON after a short introductory speech, launched forth into the wide fields of Temperance, now drawing tears and then producing smiles and laughter. Conviction carried itself to the hearts of many present, who attached their names to the Temperance Pledge. Others thought it would be better to wait a day, but the next morning saw them wending their way to the residence of the Secretary, saying, "We'll give it up." "We'll give it up," and they also recorded their names. At the conclusion of the lecture 24 signed the pledge, amongst whom was our worthy Chairman—thus openly declaring himself to be on the side of Abstinence, and setting an example which ought, and it is hoped will be, followed by every inhabitant of Hinckley.

SAMUEL PRESTON, Jun., Secretary.

ASHBORNE.

The Temperance Society held a tea party on Tuesday the 11th January last, in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, when about 80 partook of the refreshments provided. After the tables were removed, a public meeting was held, S. BRADLEY, Esq., in the chair. Several earnest and powerful addresses were delivered by Messrs. THORNTON, PEACH, WILLIAMS, BULLOCK, and ESTCOURT, on the importance of Temperance. The meeting closed about 9 o'clock, and the friends dispersed highly pleased with the evening's entertainments.

BRIDPORT, DORSET.

Mr. JABEZ INWARDS has just visited this town, and has been very kindly and cordially received. On Friday evening, January 7th, he delivered an able address, at the Literary Institution, on the connection between Temperance Principles, and the intellectual and moral improvement of the people. The Rev. T. WALLACE presided. On Sunday afternoon, January 9th, Mr. INWARDS delivered a very affectionate and interesting address to Sunday School Teachers and children in Salem Chapel, (Mr. Wallace's). The chapel was crowded. On Monday and Tuesday evening, he delivered at the Town Hall, two ingenious and powerful lectures, to respectable and crowded audiences. The Rev. C. SHARMAN presided on Monday, and the Rev. T. WALLACE on Tuesday. A deep impression was produced by Mr. INWARDS eloquent appeals.

The Rev. T. WALLACE could not refrain from expressing his pleasure, in seeing so many young persons present, and his full conviction that the ministers of the Gospel must come prominently forward, and not only sanction by their presence, but sustain by their advocacy, the great Temperance Movement.

Ministers of three denominations were present at the last Lecture.

TAVISTOCK.

On the evenings of the 24th, 25th, 29th, and 31st December 1847, Dr. GRINDROD delivered a course of Physiological Lectures to crowded audiences, at the Assembly Rooms, Bedford Hotel. The chairmen on these occasions, were the Rev. THOS. GIBBONS, B. A., JOHN BENSON, T. B. HAMISS, M. D., (Portreeve of the Borough of Tavistock), and JOHN RUNDLE, Esquires. The lecturer was asked a few questions at the close of the three first lectures, but at the fourth a friendly discussion took place between T. B. HAMISS, Esq., M. D., and the Rev. THOS. GIBBONS, B. A., and the learned lecturer, which lasted about three hours, and ended in the defeat of both of the learned gentlemen. Dr. GRINDROD gave an able exposition and noble defence of our principles, and throughout the discussion behaved in a very gentlemanly manner to his learned opponents. On the afternoon of Wednesday, the 30th December, Dr. GRINDROD delivered a free lecture to about 400 juveniles, at the Wesleyan Chapel, and on the morning of Saturday the 1st January 1848, he delivered a lecture to a large and respectable assembly of females, at the Independent Chapel. The number of pledges that have been obtained through his visit here have amounted to upwards of 300.

G. H. SMITH, Secretary.

KETERING.

The half-yearly tea meeting, was held at the school room belonging to the Baptist Chapel, Dec. 28. About 150 took tea, when a public meeting was held, Mr. HARLOCK, of Finedon, presiding. Mr. HALL, a reclaimed drunkard, having spoken,—Mr. DYER addressed the meeting with considerable effect, on the physiological truths involved in the question of Total Abstinence from strong drink. We feel assured that the results of this meeting will long be visible.

RISBOROUGH.

A good meeting was held in the National School Room, on Thursday, the 13th ult. The Rev. SPENCER THORNTON, vicar of Wendover, presided. He stated that he had been a Teetotaler upwards of six years, and earnestly intreated all in that crowded assembly to follow his example. The Rev. J. DAWSON, Baptist minister, of this place, said he had been a Teetotaler seven years, and was then making his first teetotal speech; which proved to be an excellent one. The Rev. ISAAC DOXSEY, of Thorne, delivered an amusing and instructive speech. Mr. R. GAMBLE, of Berkhamstead, who has been labouring in the good cause for the last ten years, delivered a very useful and impressive speech.—The meeting, notwithstanding the unbecoming conduct of some present, passed off in a pleasant and instructive manner.

J. DARVILL.

HARROGATE.

On Thursday, Jan. 14, the anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society was celebrated by a public soiree held in the Victoria Room, Low Harrogate. In the afternoon a procession was formed near to the Dragon hotel, preceded by several equestrians, members of the society, and accompanied by the Bramley teetotal band. A splendid banner was displayed, which has just been prepared and presented to the Society by Messrs. Place and Ellis, builders, Harrogate; it bears the following inscription very tastefully executed, viz,—“Harrogate Total Abstinence Society—Temperance—Health—Peace—Plenty—Happiness!!!” The company began to assemble at four o'clock, and the entertainments of the evening commenced by the band playing a variety of airs, while the company were assembling, and during the time the stewards were serving the tea and coffee, a voluntary was played on the piano-forte by Mr. J. Whitley, leader of the band.

The Hon. Judge MARSHALL who presided, said he felt great pleasure in meeting on this interesting occasion in a place so celebrated. He supposed that Temperance reform was needed here—indeed where could we go where it was not needed—for alcohol was a great enemy wherever it was found. After having presided in courts of justice for 18 years, and practised at the bar for 15 years previously, he could assert that nine cases out of ten of the crimes upon which he had been called to adjudicate, resulted from strong drink, the use of which was an increasing evil—a downward course from bad to worse. Only total abstainers stood on safe ground. There was a reason for teetotalers to be more strenuous than ever in this great work—to go forward with increased energy, for strong drink was the great stumbling block in the way of the gospel. He considered that all ought to identify themselves with this great and good work, especially Christians: the duty was more apparent now than ever, and therefore those were more inexcusable who did not engage in it. We all possessed some influence with those by whom we are surrounded; and we should seek to exert it in order to arrest the progress of that which was evil, and that continually.

The Rev. B. PARSONS, of Ebley, said that he thought that he could prove that the people of this country are mad. When dogs are mad they are said to have the hydrophobia, which means dread of water; so, many persons appeared to have a dread of water. They had a wine conscience, but none respecting water. The reason was they liked the wine. Those who used intoxicating liquors drink dirty water, or water spoiled, but the teetotalers preferred drinking clean water. What was the design of drinking at all? It was to send a stream through the body. Water would do no mischief, would not disturb the nerves. Spirit did both; it had a bad effect on any part of the system, especially on the brain;—it had a paralyzing influence upon all the functions of the frame of man. He (Mr. Parsons) could speak from experience of the beneficial effects to be derived from total abstinence, as since the adoption of the principle he had been enabled to accomplish more in ten or eleven years than he had done for forty previous years. He rejoiced in the elevation of the working classes; that was his hobby, and he liked this society, because he believed it to be beneficial to the labouring man. The poor man must make use of his intellect and character if he would rise in the world. It was through the popular feeling that all great reforms were accomplished. He urged working-men to take up this great cause and resolve to elevate themselves. Let them put themselves in that position that they would not want charity. The Rev. Gentleman then made some excellent remarks upon the duties and influence of woman in the temperance movement, and advised those females who were present to sign the pledge, especially advising those who were single not to marry a man until he had been a teetotaler for seven years, urging that early marriages too often brought poverty and wretchedness upon those who contracted them, as well as upon their families. The following rules were given as a means of promoting health: Never drink but when you are thirsty, and then only water; eat plain food; eat and drink no more than you want; do not drink with your meals. Several times during the Rev. Gentleman's address he was loudly cheered by the audience.

Some verses were then sung by the assembly, accompanied by the band, after which the company separated, apparently highly delighted with the whole of the proceedings.

THE MODEL PARISH.

A large meeting, convened for the purpose of explaining and recommending the formation of a Model Parish to be formed exclusively on Teetotal principles was held last week in the Town Hall, Birmingham, when it is supposed 3,500 persons were present. BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., the Rev. JOHN ANGELL JAMES, and others, made admirable speeches; they think the project an excellent advertisement for the Temperance Cause, and likely to prove a great promoter of it. Similar meetings have been held in other parts of the kingdom, and others are announced.

DR. CARR, OF BIRMINGHAM.

THIS gentleman has recently delivered three lectures in the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle Street, under the direction of the Committee of the National Temperance Society, on the Physiological truths involved in the practice of Total Abstinence from strong drinks. The lectures were numerous attended, and were received with very marked satisfaction. Dr. CARR has also lectured in Dr. Oxley's room, Hackney; and is engaged to lecture at Harp Alley, and other places in the Metropolis, till about the middle of February, when he is engaged by the Midland Counties Association.

ONE OF A THOUSAND.

When the advocates of teetotalism warn the moderate drinkers of strong drink of the danger to which their practices expose them, they try to evade the force of such warnings by pointing to some hale, hearty, red faced old sinner, who has arrived at the age of threescore, though he has been known to drink hard every day for a long series of years. "You state that a man cannot take strong drink into his system without injuring his health and shortening his days; what say you to the case of old Harry Hardy? "What say we to it?" why, we say that 'tis one case out of a thousand. What has become of Harry Hardy's drinking companions? How many of those who commenced their drinking career with him are now to be found in as good health and strength as he? Because a vessel of iron or brass will stand knocks and rubs without injury, does it therefore follow that every vessel, that vessels made of glass or of clay, may be knocked about with impunity? Take care. Listen!

In the beginning of January 1848, a man in a state of intoxication walked over St. George's Pier, Liverpool, at the broad steps. He fell to the beach below, a depth of about thirty feet. He immediately rose and ascended the steps, not having received the least injury. We have not heard that this circumstance induced one person to take a similar walk; nor would any man in his senses ever think of making the experiment, merely because one drunken fool luckily, or rather providentially, escaped injury. This man was one of a thousand, or may we not rather say, one of ten thousand. Beware how you plead the case of such a man while you are walking continually on the very edge of a crumbling precipice, over which many wiser and stronger than you have fallen. Beware! again, we say, beware! While you quote the case of Harry Hardy with so much glee, and continue to swallow down the poisonous drink; take care that you are not, suddenly and in a moment, numbered with Harry Hardy's dead companions. "Look not on the wine—for, at the last, it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

NEW PUBLICATION.

BELGIUM, THE RHINE, SWITZERLAND, AND HOLLAND. —An Autumnal Tour. By J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq. Two volumes 8vo. with large steel engravings. London: Jackson, Fisher and Co.

THE resources of this writer appear to be inexhaustible. Wherever he goes, he looks around him with an observant eye and a feeling heart, and communicates the results of his observations with a ready pen or an eloquent tongue, as his opportunities may serve. Next to the faculty of minute and comprehensive observation and reflection, is that of a clear and intelligible, and, at the same time, entertaining and instructive mode of communication,—and Mr. Buckingham possesses and exercises these faculties in a very remarkable degree. He comes behind no tourist in the correctness and brilliancy of his descriptions; he far exceeds the majority of this class of writers, as to the practical utility of his communications. In addition to lively and interesting sketches of the various scenes through which he passed, the volumes before us abound with profound reflections on men and manners, and assertions of the noble principles to the enunciation of which Mr. Buckingham has devoted half a century of his useful life, more especially Temperance, Peace, Popular Liberty, and Social Reform; on each of which subjects the advocates of those principles will find much to inform and encourage them. Not the least interesting parts of these handsome volumes, are the preface and the appendix; the former containing a brief memoir of Mr. Buckingham's chequered and adventurous life, and the latter a detail of the circumstances connected with the formation and the dissolution of the British and Foreign Institute. We cordially recommend these volumes as replete with interest and instruction.

THE ACTUAL.

BY EVAN JONES.

IN a recent number we have offered a few remarks on the POSSIBILITIES AND PROBABILITIES of Teetotalism, or what the system is capable of effecting, and what under present circumstances it is likely to effect. Our task at present is to offer some observations on the ACTUAL state of the cause, with the view of explaining, why it has not been more successful. We have described the temperance system as being perfectly adapted for the suppression of drunkenness and the promotion of sobriety; and perhaps, it is natural that some of our sanguine friends should ask, or some of our opponents taunt us with the inquiry, if the system is so excellent, why has it not been more successful? To this question it is our intention to reply in this paper.

We begin by referring to the ANTIQUITY OF THE SYSTEM WE OPPOSE. The influence of antiquity is powerful. How many customs, rites, ceremonies and theories owe their existence to the fact that their origin is lost in the annals of time? If we needed evidence on this subject beyond what is supplied by the testimonies furnished by missionaries of the difficulties they encounter in introducing the religion of Jesus, instead of the bloody rites and cruel impositions of heathenism. But we have a witness within ourselves. In visiting a very ancient episcopal edifice we have been filled with a kind of sacred awe. We stood in a building that had withstood many of the convulsions of time. Around us were the monuments of the dead, and beneath our feet were the dust of ages. We have visited the battle-field, the monastery, the ruined castle, and the abandoned fortress, and have always felt, notwithstanding our hatred of the objects with which they were connected, that a strange influence stole over our heart, persuading us to deal gently with the remains of bygone generations. Intoxicating drinks claim high antiquity. Their history is traceable to, if not beyond, the flood. They have flowed down in an uninterrupted stream from age to age, and from generation to generation. Hence people are convulsed at the idea of giving them up, and think because they can call as their own the days of antiquity, that any proposal to abandon them must be madness. The temperance reformation has had to contend with these delusions in some quarters, and its progress, in consequence, has been to some extent impeded. But old age is no conclusive proof of moral worth, neither does antiquity carry with it irrefragable evidence of lawfulness. If this mode of distinguishing between right and wrong had been ever admitted, and always universally adopted from the deluge to this time, the Mosaic and Christian religions would not have existed. If "what ever is, is right," then most of the heathen religions of our world, all sinful principles and ungodly habits, may lawfully claim exemption from the attacks of the friends of virtue and religion. But man must judge for himself, and ascertain that every principle to which he gives his support is in perfect accordance with divine truth. That alone is the standard by which we ought to "prove all things." Every advance we make in science, civilization, commerce and morality, is accomplished by abandoning the popular notions of antiquity.

IGNORANCE may claim no small praise for retarding our progress. The rage for education just now is terrific: it is to do anything and every thing on the face of this vast globe. We are no believers in a panacea,—we have no faith in an universal remedy,—and we disclaim the idea of finding a pill to cure all secular and moral diseases; but we do believe that no enlightened man can recommend intoxicating drinks as common beverages. Science has settled the question, and he who recommends you to make a habit of swallowing certain or uncertain quantities of these drinks daily, must do so at the risk of proclaiming open war against all scientific authority. Science has conclusively demonstrated that Alcohol is a poison, and no well-informed man will recommend a fellow-being to use poison as a common beverage. Every praise of Intoxicating drinks must be set down as arising from wilful ignorance. The farmers are ignorant of the properties of their favourite beverage. The ruined health of one, the embarrassed circumstances of another, the untimely death of the third, and the ultimate apoplexy of the fourth do not open their eyes. Though their "home brewed" is not so deleterious as the mixtures imposed upon town-folks, yet "at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Persons, whose brains never suffered in their life-time from the unwelcome intrusion of a single idea, assume to themselves an incredible amount of information on the subject, are decided friends of the cup. The spirit that is in it, they know not. Whence it cometh, or whither it goeth, are matters about which they remain in a state of blissful ignorance. Now and then, a hard-headed Biblical student, covered with the dust of Greek and Hebrew, comes forth, and make an indescribable effort to utter ineffable wisdom, about "wine, which maketh glad the heart of man," and the conversion of water into wine at the marriage feast of Cana. And often in the promiscuous crowd we notice a medical gentleman, whose prejudice is as tenacious as a deep January snow on the top of Snowdon, assisting in the dance of death. All these actors have influence in their respective spheres; delusion is protected and promoted, and the progress of true sobriety is delayed.

PREJUDICE must not be forgotten in our enumeration of difficulties. How many of our fallen race are entirely led by their preconceived opinions. Men follow names, and neglect things. When we first joined the Temperance Society, we had not a little trouble with a neighbour of ours, who sternly pleaded that the strong drink of scripture was identical with the beer sold at the Dolgelly public houses. We do not think he has yet been convinced of his mistake. We remember on another occasion that a fellow-student of ours was going to order a newspaper, but an article in the paper referring to the deadly deeds of alcohol in the town, made him alter his mind. Some are offended because the movement did not originate with them,—others have "a thorn in the flesh"—and we may appropriately add, "a messenger of Satan to buffet them,"—because they were not consulted. Many a divine is wroth because the lecturer intruded into the province of morality, and not a few are distracted because of our going on without their help. Some isolated beings are probably at variance with the whole system as being an American invention. We wish they could bring themselves to believe, what we heard an old Welsh deacon exclaiming on one occasion—"this society is the best flower of America!" We assure them no harm would follow their conversion. To prejudge any system or opinion, is weak, unmanly and unchristian. We cannot hide ourselves from the view of others by merely closing our eyes. God has given us reason that we may distinguish good and evil. To maintain a dogged adherence to our own opinion, is not the way to turn it into proper account. A christian ought always to be ready to furnish a reason of the hope that is in him; but to believe what we have first heard without any examination of its truth, gives evidence of no christian disposition. Nevertheless, such is poor human nature, and the Temperance movement has to do battle with its manifold imperfections.

We cannot close our list without adverting to SELF-INTEREST, and an innumerable host of other selfs. How ruinous has self been to us! It cost us at first the paradise of God, sinless purity, and personal converse with the Eternal Spirit. The legions of evil which have ever afflicted our world, have all been sent by this destructive principle. In regard to Temperance, the self-love of one, the self-esteem of the second, and the self-conceit of the third, have degraded the understanding from its high office, and the vilest passion of our nature being enthroned in its stead, the righteous claims of sobriety have been contemptuously discarded. Self-interest actuates a large class. The farmer, the malster, the brewer, the distiller, the apple grower, the publican, the innkeeper, the wine and spirit merchant, the proprietors of public houses and proprietors of land, are leagued together to uphold our fatal drinking usages for the sake of self! Pecuniary profit and worldly comfort, they regard as the chief goods of life, forgetting that "the things which are seen are temporal." Morality, and spiritual good are sacrificed for vile profit, and many seem to believe that if they can live respectably, it matters not how that livelihood may be obtained. Oh! that the different traders in strong drink could count the diseases they have inflicted, the poverty they have induced, the mournful sighs they wring daily from many a tender heart, the bitter tears they cause to flow, the crimes to which they have been accessories, the graves which they have filled, and the immortal souls they have ruined. If a panorama of their deeds of darkness were presented to their view, would not their courage fail, and their hearts exceedingly fear? And yet the result of the traffic cannot be supposed to be entirely escaping their observation. They must see, year after year, how many of their customers become embarrassed in circumstances, unhealthy in their bodies, and diseased in their minds. It is no secret to them that from their houses the thief, the seducer, the murderer, and midnight assassin, proceed to accomplish their deeds of mischief and blood. Strange, that for the sake of miserable pelf, human hearts are become so hardened. So they are, however; "the root of all evil," the "love of money," maintains its triumphant sway, and opposes its giant strength to the cause of Sobriety.

We have now pointed to a few of the mighty obstacles we have to contend with. We have not yet done; but lest we should overtask the patience of our readers, we defer until another opportunity, our remarks on the remaining obstacles. We conclude by expressing our fervent hope, that the consideration of these obstacles will inspire our friends with renewed vigour, and determination to pursue the great work which is before them. Let not our hearts grow faint at the contemplation of difficulties, because if there were no enemies there would be no contest, and if there were no contest, there would be no triumph.

SUICIDES, MURDERS & STRONG DRINK.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

Not long since, in a locality where I was staying, a very highly respected gentleman terminated his existence with his own hand. As not only himself but his family and relations were much esteemed, a general gloom came over the neighbourhood. Every countenance you met was downcast. Those who had no intimacy with him, and had never spoken to him in their lives, were deeply pained at his melancholy end. Every one asked, "Why did he destroy himself?" He was in affluent circumstances. He was not in trade, and he had sustained no losses. He had a happy home. His wife was an affectionate companion and much esteemed for her charities, and his children were promising. Of himself every one spoke well. He was not a gay or dissipated man, nor had he exhibited any kind of mental aberration so as to alarm his friends. He therefore seemed to run away from life without any cause or any warning. The text, "Died Abner as a fool dieth?" seemed almost spontaneously to drop from your lips; and yet the respect you felt for the deceased, and the sorrow that so estimable a man should have rushed so thoughtlessly into the presence of his Judge, prevented you from uttering it; but still the question returned, "Why did he destroy himself?"

Of course, conjecture was rife. It was said that he had lately disposed of a kind of hobby which had afforded him employment and amusement; but then the matter was so trifling, few could scarcely believe that for such a frivolous matter any sensible man had plunged into eternity. Of course, too, the doctors were consulted, and his medical attendant gave it as his opinion, that the dreadful act arose from a sudden rush of the blood to his head, and that under such a circumstance he would have been as likely to have destroyed his dearest friend as himself. He further intimated that if the matter could have been foreseen, and a portion of blood had been timely taken from his body, his life would have been saved. This statement was generally believed, and, if correct, must suggest to us a few thoughts.

It seems to be admitted that a sudden flow of the blood to the head may so completely deprive the sufferer of reason, self-control, and humanity, that he may instantly destroy himself or the dearest of his affections. In violent rage, persons generally become red in the face. The blood-vessels in the forehead are distended, and an awful demonstration is afforded that the animal has conquered the man, and that, according to the old adage, "Anger is short madness." Every person who has been overcome by passion has felt this oppression on the brain, accompanied with an excess of heat. Hence we often hear of burning anger. "The whole course of nature is set on fire." Under such excitement, every principle of love seems to be destroyed, and if, as phrenologists assert, we have organs of "destructiveness," they appear at such a time to be especially active. Paroxysms of anger have led to cruelties at which savages or savage beasts might blush; and if physiologists are right, we may trace no small portion of this inhumanity to the sudden and impetuous flow of blood to the brain.

But these facts suggest others of very grave importance. Nothing is so soon affected by alcoholic drinks as the brain. I have known ladies whose faces, from taking only one glass of beer or wine, became so red, and, as they expressed it, so burning hot, that they generally abstained. The inconvenience they felt, and the unnatural complexion it gave them, constrained them to abandon the glass. Several persons addicted to drink have died of apoplexy; and a post mortem examination has detected alcohol in their brains as the cause of their death. It is unnecessary, however, to be tedious on this point. Every physiologist admits, and every moderate drinker knows from experience, that strong drinks, whether beer, cider, wine, or spirits, immediately affect the head, and this is done by the sudden flow of blood to that part of the body. Dr. FARR, in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons on Drunkenness, asserted, that it had long been questioned whether the membrane that invests the brain was single or double, but the matter was settled on investigating the brain of a person who had died from apoplexy brought on by drinking. In this case the flow of blood had been so large and violent, as actually to divide the membrane. Not long since, we saw, in nearly all the newspapers, the account of an inquest held before Mr. WAKLEY, on the body of a gentleman who died from the effects of strong drink; and it was stated to the jury, that alcohol had actually been extracted from his brain, and that, on being set on fire, it emitted the usual smell and blue flame of spirits of wine. Thus then we have ample proof that the florid countenance and heated sensation in the head, which those who use intoxicating liquors feel, is occasioned by the amazing influence which these poisons have over the nerves and blood vessels. This baneful foe at once seeks the citadel of the mind, and immediately profanes that temple of thought and feeling. As a consequence, the soul is inflamed, reason is dethroned, and passion usurps its sceptre.

Here then we have two important truths brought to light:—First, that a sudden flow of blood to the head may render an individual cruel, ungovernable and mad; and, Secondly, that intoxicating drinks invariably cause a determination of blood to that organ. Indeed it is to this cerebral influence that men owe the exhilarating power of alcoholic liquors. But then the person who uses them is always trifling, not only with his health, but with his mind and morals. The liquor that so elates, when the jest is going round, and while everything is agreeable to his wishes, may make him more cruel than the tiger, more destructive and ungovernable than the savage. Hence we have a physical reason for the evil passions that are excited, the rage that is often manifested, and the barbarities that are frequently practised, by the drinkers of these maddening beverages.

That husband and father was once an amiable tempered man; but now it is dangerous to speak to him. If you thwart him, or tell him of his faults, his oaths are tremendous. You dare not correct him, or he will foam with rage. Yonder monster beats his wife, starves and ill-treats his children, his dependants, his horses, and even his dogs; and yet there was a time when he was one of the most kind-hearted and affectionate of mortals. But ALCOHOL has rendered him cruel, and he not unfrequently endangers the lives of his nearest friends, and resolves to lay violent hands on himself.

Almost every murderer knows the potency of a moderate glass to inspire him to deeds of blood. Should he drink nothing, he has no courage for the brutal act. His organ of destructiveness must be excited, and the moderate cup is the most efficient auxiliary. Should he drink too much, he would be unfit for the savage work, and therefore he finds moderation essential to his intended murder. Strong drink, therefore, is not merely a destroyer in poisoning the body, but it actually fits the mind for deeds of destruction. It is worthy of remark, that many of the amusements of drinkers are chiefly distinguished for their cruelty. Horse-racing, bull-baiting, dog-fighting, cock-fighting, boxing, and prize-fighting, are favorite amusements. The thirst for liquor is thus almost identified with the thirst for blood.

Could we only induce men to give up intoxicating stimulants, it is allowed by all that by far the greater part of the quarelling, fighting, swearing, impetuous rage, debauchery, murders and suicides would cease. Whatever excites is followed by depression, hence no drinker of stimulants is ever in a natural state. Now he is too high, and now too low. He is prompted to drink, not merely from a burning fever and unnatural thirst, but from mental depression. He is enslaved by appetite, by nervous debility and low spirits. The chains that encircle him are of his own manufacture, and no common effort is necessary to break their worse than magic spell. He is often called upon, by every nerve and muscle in his body, and every faculty of his soul to fly again to the glass. Even conscience is debauched, and persuades him that it is necessary to drink for the preservation of his health or life, and his religion, that ought to be his salvation, becomes his destroyer.

Here then we have a master vice, which often originates every description of crime. Its influence is physical and moral, and therefore it completely unmans the man. He who uses strong drink, did he only examine the subject, would stand shocked at himself as one of the most awful triflers. He not only wastes Divine bounty to produce a poison, and tramples on the day of sacred rest to obtain his favorite beverage, but he shortens his days; and ere he has accomplished this object, he produces in himself the most unnatural appetites, passions and propensities.

We have reason to believe that murders and suicides are on the increase in our country. We scarcely take up a newspaper, but we have one or more of these tales of death. All the dearest and tenderest relations of life are violated, and not only men, but women become cruel and savage! What sight on earth so appalling as that of a wife, or mother, raising her delicate hand against the partner of her joys and sorrows, or the offspring that she has warmed and nourished in her own bosom? Tigresses, she-bears, or scorpions are not chargeable with such want of feeling or such barbarity towards their young. And when the fatal knife is not resorted to, the cruelty is often even more unnatural. Instead of striking the fatal blow at once, the child by a slow process is starved and famished. Its frame is a skeleton, its cries day and night are heart-rending, and yet its grief and anguish are unutterable. We boast of the annihilation of the inquisition, but, alas! we have among us deeds which throw its horrors into the shade; and, what is worse, in thousands of instances, women, and even mothers, whose hearts were made to be the reflexion of divine love and compassion, are the guilty agents. And all this inhumanity can be traced to the barbarising influence of ALCOHOLIC DRINKS. The Kirton murder arose from drink; but it would be tedious to specify cases: there are few murders or suicides but can be traced directly or indirectly to this source. And the effect of these fire-waters is the same all over the world. An Indian chief tells us, that he has seen the father, under the maddening power of rum, take his child by the heels and dash out its brains against the wall; and yet the man when sober was a kind hearted man, and shed floods of tears the next day when informed of what he had done. We have lately heard in our own country of a father who actually roasted his child alive, and remained deaf to its cries, so perfectly had these poisons dried up every feeling of humanity.

Many destroy themselves when intoxicated, but a still greater number commit this rash act when labouring under the depression of mind which follows unnatural stimulation. For a while this material demon has elated them, but like the evil spirit in the Gospel, when he departs, he leaves them half dead, and in their despair, they become cruel to themselves. In a word, Cruelty, CRUELTY, CRUELTY, is the Alpha and Omega of the history of Alcoholic Liquors, and this, as we have stated at the commencement, arises from physical causes. The brain is unnaturally wrought upon, and the mind, as a consequence, is bereft of reason to the same degree that it is inspired. The excitement is not intellectual, but material, senseless and inhuman, and every species of barbarity is the result. Religious influence is mental, rational, sanctifying, and calls forth the finer feelings of our nature; and when its loftier emotions may subside, leaves us refreshed, and inspired with hope; but intoxicating drinks only work on the animal and baser part of our nature, and equally curse, while they inspire us and when their excitement is gone.

When! when! will the CHRISTIAN WORLD open its eyes to the magnitude of this plague, or allow its sympathies to embrace the victims of the bottle and the tankard? Without a sacrifice, without a penny's cost, we can exorcise the world of this evil spirit, and thus save mankind from more suffering and cruelty than has ever been inflicted by plague, pestilence, famine or war. Only Abstain and the work of benevolence is done.

SIX CARDINAL PLEASURES.

BY DALMOCAND.

Who has ever handled pleasure, or taken its dimensions? Yet although something unseen, this does not render it a thing unknown, unfelt. All agree that pleasure means gratification or delight, but differ widely in determining wherein it should be sought; some maintaining that it is worthy and possible of attainment in one particular way, others in another. It is obvious, however, since opinions are so plenteous, and all cannot be right, that it behoves every possessor of a reflective mind or rational nature to guard against mistake, and diligently to enquire what he should pursue and what avoid.

To assist in this enquiry, we must keep in constant view the human constitution—a soul and body mystically joined. To uphold in vigour this double organization, man must employ the means enjoined; for in proportion to the observance of this duty will the amount and character of his enjoyment be—as he sows so he reaps. That man's nobler part may yield by cultivation a delight more excellent than can the baser, few will in words deny—well, how fares it often with the mind? The Indian traversing the desert, with his leathern girdle and his scanty gum, seeks in vain the approval of a contented stomach; so a mind swathed in bands of ignorance, and fed on casual husks, confers but meagre satisfaction.

It being admitted that man is a pleasure-loving animal, let us, with a practical intent, bring some of those delights commonly engaged into the touchstone of philosophy. Though adopting this gigantic word, let none suspect I am about to enter on a dry, musty dissertation; the term simply means a love of wisdom, and by wisdom let us at present understand, common-sense holding in her hand the torch of Scripture.

In the first place, men take pleasure in the FLOWING BOWL. But where is the philosophy of drinking? True, wine makes the limbs nimble, and the tongue to send forth eloquence in profusion; it makes, too, the eye to flash and sparkle like a lighthouse's revolving light: but thereafter, how often does the carriage become ungainly, the organ of speech come to a halting, and the eyeball fixed and filmy?—yea, how frequently do the small wits of the homeward-bound reveller utterly forsake him, and he reclines comsedly upon the highway! “Far hence be Bacchus' gift!” exclaims the Trojan knight; and ought not we to echo the renoucement? We read of an ancient monarch who in extremity proffered his sceptre for a cup of water; alas, how many barter that which outvalues many kingdoms for a cup of POISON! On a careful examination of the great facts adduced from time to time, all may see that dram-drinking has no connexion with philosophy save as its extinguisher.

Then comes DANCING. I remember that in childhood I had a few weeks' instruction, and even yet I might execute a jig or two, after a fashion—but where, I ask, is the philosophy of dancing? When we hear of the benighted heathen performing strange courses of devotion before his wooden deity, we sigh; nor can we refrain smiling at the merry infant bobbing to his shadow; but what are we to think of young men and maidens in this Christian land, without any imaginable reason, leaping up and down as if they were bewitched, and spinning like ‘teetotums’? What a parody on Paul's injunction—“Redeem the time!” Peradventure some one murmurs, ‘Was not King David a dancer?’ Oh, yes, David danced; and we learn also before WHOM it was he did so: but can dancing, as generally conducted in these days, in a tainted atmosphere, in the trappings of vain-glory, and with blood-firing potions, be accounted a religious or rational exercise? I trow not.

Again, many take delight in SMOKING. It is really an interesting spectacle to behold the patron of the clay-tube, with a foot on each side of the fireplace, gazing intently into the glowing embers as if searching for a salamander, and emitting clouds of vapour like a miniature volcano or steam-engine. Were we to consider for a minute the structure of the mouth, we might arrive at an intelligent conclusion respecting this matter. All within the cheeks there are numerous glands or small bladders for the secretion or production of saliva, which, mixing with the food, prepares it for the stomach; it keeps also the machinery of the mouth cool, moist, and in working order. The smoker, however, disregarding this, vitiates and throws away this precious fluid—we cannot therefore wonder that such individuals are frequently tormented with indigestion and with drought. Then as to moral effects, smoking squanders time, fosters indolence, and surrounds the mind with a perpetual fog.

But others prefer CHEWING. If we remember that tobacco is a poison—indeed one of the strongest and most nauseous—we can easily fathom the philosophy of quid-practice. Over the surface of the tongue there lie various protuberances called nervous papillæ, and by these we perceive the taste of any thing; but as strong things overpower weak things, it is evident that the frequency with which this loathsome weed comes in contact with the tongue and palate, weakens the sense of tasting in a great degree, while the acrimonious juice passing into the digestive organs perpetrates havoc there. On the injury occasioned by lost saliva I have remarked already. In fact, if we view the subject closely, we shall find that this habit has nothing to recommend it, and that it seems merely an imitation of the lower animals, for is it not in chewing that some of these occupy their leisure?

A number larger still revel in NOSE-POWDER. Snuff, on analysis, has been found to comprise tobacco-dust, ground glass, sal-ammoniac, and sometimes even guano! Let us now consider the olfactory organ. Minute particles flying off from different substances, conducted by the outer covering, on striking the inner and higher surface of the nose, give the idea of smell. Consequently this part of the nasal apparatus, called the pituitary membrane, would, for the efficient performance of its functions, require to suffer no obstruction from without. But the snuff-indulger, heedless of results, by the systematic introduction of his dark compost so stifles the sense of smelling, that at length he becomes well-nigh unable to discriminate betwixt the perfume of a rose and that of a cabbage. Hence we perceive that such a person leaves himself but four senses unimpaired; if a chewer in addition, only three; while the alcoholic debauchee, with hand more reckless still, denudes himself of all. Calm reflexion will convince us that these animal stimuli are but sorry pass-time, barely excusable in an age of rudeness, or perhaps a few centuries bygone, when stores of religious and instructive literature were inaccessible.

Now look at the EXPENSE of these indulgences. Even three half-pence daily make £2: 5s. 7½d. in the year. We read that the gold and silver are not ours, yet what unnecessary outlay have we here! Half or the whole of this sum paid to an Assurance Office, would secure at death, as a help to dear relinquished ones, £50 or £100. Mr. WILLIAMS, in his Missionary Narrative, informs us that the wild children of the South-Sea Islands, among whom the customary form of manifesting friendship, and exciting an agreeable sensation, was mutual nose-rubbing, did, on their embracing the lotu, or the Christian religion, at once abandon this unseemly salutation, though it cost them nothing. And when a love of ardent spirits began to show itself, an Abstinence Society instituted by the Missionaries speedily removed the danger. Let not Britain stagger in the rear of Polynesia.

The last item I shall touch on is CARD-PLAYING. We find that this employment was originally designed for the amusement of a crack-brained king—for sane and insane to recreate alike, looks rather marvellous. It is, however, when a money-game, that cards assume their most objectional aspect. No matter whether the stake be brown or yellow, the same anxious, avaricious feelings are engendered; whether rich or poor, the hazard affects equally. Of gambling's evils none can plead ignorance. From sharp Scottish matrons a pack of cards has received the emphatic appellation of "The Devil's Buik."

Having thus with brevity discussed SIX CARDINAL PLEASURES, the catalogue might easily admit extension, though not now. In conclusion, let each kindred pleasure be treated in a kindred manner, and let men vindicate their rationality by acting in accordance with their findings: grovelling delight assorts not well with immortality.

RAISING THE RENT.—"How do you contrive to raise your rent?" said a lazy tavern lounger to an industrious thriving farmer.—"Why, sir," said the latter, "I put my plough into the ground, and after it is well broken up I drop seed, and then I raise potatoes, wheat, corn, cabbages, parsnips, and the—RENT."

A MODEL CHRISTMAS PARTY.

UPON most occasions, when the people of this country wish to obtain more than an ordinary amount of pleasure, they seem to think it necessary that intoxicating drinks should be used to secure it. A greater delusion never existed. It ought to be considered a gross insult for one man to offer drinks to another, which he must see are producing fearful consequences around him. He that seeks pleasure in sensuality, rather than in intellectual enjoyments, pursues a phantom that will reward him with bitter disappointment.

Being in Carlisle on Christmas eve, I found that J. D. CARR and Co.'s workmen, who are all teetotalers, were that evening holding their annual Soirée in the Athenæum. I felt much interested to see how this heroic band would enjoy themselves. When I entered the room the party, about 140 in number, about half of which were ladies, including the Messrs. Carr and Sisters, was at tea, each tray was presided over by a "fair ladie."

Who dealt out with generous hand
The cheering herb of another land."

After tea, an appropriate address was presented to Messrs. Carr, signed by the workmen, expressive of their gratitude for the many valued privileges they enjoy, asking for a continuance thereof, and assuring their employers that they would endeavour in every way to render themselves worthy recipients. The Messrs. Carr assured them that they took no credit to themselves for the steps they had taken to improve the condition of those around them, and that they considered it nothing more than their duty. After glancing retrospectively at the haunts and habits of their workmen previous to the time of their becoming teetotalers, they placed in juxtaposition the debasing delights of the public-house with the high-toned pleasures they there enjoyed; stamping them as men of moral dignity, that had become better and happier through strict sobriety; contending that the same advantages would result wherever it was practiced. Many edifying addresses were delivered by the workmen, most of them evincing an amount of talent which proved that the position of the sons of toil is not unfavourable for acquiring knowledge. After this the company engaged in various amusements until a late hour.

The respectable and healthful appearance of the party, the harmony that existed, and the absence of everything that was rude and vulgar, compelled me to come to the conclusion, that the first step to be taken by those who wish to heighten their pleasures and improve their position in society, is to forego the use of intoxicating liquors. W. S.

ANCIENT TEETOTALERS.

The Nervii, as we may learn from Cæsar, were Teetotalers. "Quorum de natura moribusque Cæsar cum quaereret, sic reperiebat: nihil pati vini reliquiarumque rerum ad luxuriam pertinentium inferri, quod iis rebus relanguescere animos eorum, et remitti virtutem existimarent. Esse homines magnæ virtutis." By the Nervii and their allies Cæsar was almost overthrown. The Treviri were so certain of Cæsar's defeat that they returned to their homes, and informed their state. "Romanos pulsos superatosque, castris impedimentisque eorum hostes potitos." Cæsar by his presence and courage rallied the legions. Still those ancient Teetotalers fought bravely, (see chapter 27, second book of the Gallic war.) Of 60,000 men there were only 500 left, and of 600 senators there survived only 3. If they had possessed the discipline of the Romans, Cæsar on that day might have been ruined, and we might have never read in history of a Brutus, a Cassius, nor of the battle of Pharsalia. The Suevi, according to Cæsar, were the greatest and most warlike of all the German nations, and they too were rigid abstainers. "Vinum ad se omnino importari non sinunt, quod ea re ad laborem ferendum remollescere homines, atque effeminari arbitrantur."

TESTIMONIAL TO JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM, ESQ.

We stated in our last, that the friends of Mr. Buckingham had conceived the project of forming a TESTIMONIAL FUND, for the purpose of building a PUBLIC LECTURE ROOM in London, for the advocacy of TEMPERANCE, EDUCATION, BENEVOLENCE and PEACE: We rejoice to find that the project meets the approval of the most distinguished Philanthropists of the country, and we repeat our anticipations of unspeakable benefit to the community as the result of its accomplishment. It is the most delicate, and at the same time, the most appropriate Testimonial which could be presented to Mr. Buckingham, and, as far as we know that gentleman, one which would prove highly gratifying to his own feelings. We repeat, also, our hope, that every true philanthropist—all who desire to have an enlightened and efficient advocacy of Temperance—Education—Peace—and Universal Benevolence—will contribute his or her mite without delay, that Mr. Buckingham may without delay commence his benevolent career.

It is scarcely necessary for us to remind the friends of Temperance, how deeply that cause is indebted to this distinguished advocate. They will not forget that he stood nearly alone in the House of Commons, in the year 1834, that, notwithstanding the difficulties by which he was surrounded, he succeeded in obtaining a Parliamentary Enquiry, and that, as the fruits of that Enquiry, and the report presented thereon, a Volume was published, to which every Temperance advocate has referred, as the richest repository extant of facts demonstrative of the effects of the drinking customs of this country upon the health, the intelligence, the comfort, and the morals of the community. Nor can it be forgotten, that, since that period, Mr. Buckingham has devoted much of his time to the gratuitous advocacy of the Teetotal Movement; not only in various parts of Great Britain, but on the Continent, in the United States of America, and in British Canada. And it is evident, from the scheme now proposed, that he is still devoted to that cause, and unremitting in his exertions to promote it among every class of the community.

We call, especially therefore upon the thousands of TEETOTALERS in the United Kingdom to aid this truly National enterprise. We would recommend that immediate steps be taken, by every Temperance Society, to organize a SPECIAL COMMITTEE for the purpose. An excellent commencement would be, the holding a PUBLIC MEETING, at which might be stated the grounds of Mr. Buckingham's claims to the support of all who take an interest in the Temperance Reformation. Collectors might then be appointed, under the authority of the Committee, to wait on the inhabitants, and solicit their aid to the object proposed. The amount of the subscription when closed to be remitted by the Treasurer to the Bank of Messrs. Ransom and Co., Pall Mall East, London, as the "Contribution of the Temperance Society to the Buckingham Testimonial Fund," in the name of the EARL OF DEVON, the Treasurer of the same.

We stated in our last that the Fund was in the course of collection. A list of the contributors, headed by His ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT, the DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE, the EARL OF DEVON, &c., will be found on another page, to which we request the particular attention of our readers.

We perceive from the public prints that Mr. Buckingham having delivered his popular lectures on Palestine, Egypt, &c., in Edinburgh, and many of the principal towns in Scotland, is now fulfilling similar engagements at Liverpool and Manchester; on the completion of which he intends returning to London.

VALUABLE SUGGESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST.

SIR:—Who has not had this question put to him when advocating the Teetotal Principles,—“If beer and wine are injurious to health, why do the doctors so often recommend the use of those drinks?” Others say, “It may do very well for many persons, but some constitutions require these things.” Now Teetotalers are aware that alcoholic drinks are injurious even when taken in small quantities, but yet there are thousands who still believe that the moderate use of them is beneficial.

The most powerful answer that could be given to all such persons would be found in the Medical Testimonial as published in the ESSAYIST for 1847. Would it not advance our cause if that testimony were printed on sheets and circulated as much as possible? I should like to have a copy fixed on some conspicuous place in every cottage in the kingdom. There it would meet the eye of the Minister, or the Doctor, and of visitors, and would be a standing answer to all doubters, and I think this plan would be likely to lead many persons to think more favourably of our cause when they see it sanctioned by such high medical authorities. I would suggest that a person in every town and village be invited to ask permission to place a copy on the walls of cottages among the many papers and prints that now adorn them.

I am, Sir,

One who was led to think favourably of Teetotalism by a chance sight of a copy of the Teetotal Times.

THE RATTLESNAKE BITE.

Dr. WAINWRIGHT, of Crosby street, recently received from a friend at a distance a present of a live rattlesnake, safely enclosed in a box. He afterwards let it out upon the floor, and in attempting to seize it to return it to its box, was bitten in one of the fingers of the left hand with such violence, that the blood spirted from the wound several feet. The flesh was at once removed from the bitten place, but in vain. The arm swelled gradually from the hand to the shoulder, and in a few hours the unfortunate man died.

The case excited deep sympathy. And yet there are hundreds and thousands in our land, bitten by a serpent, and stung by an adder of another description, and whose death, though not so rapid, follows with as unerring certainty, and even more terror, amid raving madness and horrid delirium; and yet little is thought of it. Men are warned to beware, but the warning is unheeded. If a present of a dozen is sent to a friend, it is gratefully received, and placed upon his table, and offered to his family and guests. Yea, men are licensed to keep it, and expose it in their shops and their windows. Government becomes its patron; and patriots and philanthropists hold their peace. And yet not a man in the nation will say he had not rather his son should be bitten by the serpent that killed Dr. Wainwright, than by this horrid viper that sparkles in the cup.

LOVE TO SIN.—If thou thinkest thou hatest drunkenness, or a jolly vain life, and yet wilt be thrusting in among those that are such, never talk of hating the sin. If thou fear them not, if thou shun not the temptation, thou lovest the sin.—Old Writer.

CAN ALCOHOL AID DIGESTION ?

BY H. MUDGE, BODMIN.

ERROR, we know, takes numberless forms, and when fairly exploded under one shape, will oftentimes assume another, and so endeavour to retain its position and influence. There was a time, and not long since, when it was confidently asserted that the smith could not endure the heat of the forge, the whaler the cold of the arctic regions, the tailor the confinement of the shop, or the ploughman the changes of the weather, with impunity, if they dared to abstain from Alcoholic beverages: we know better now, for Teetotalism has heaped occupation on occupation, and multitude on multitude in the practice of abstinence, till the experience of millions cannot be denied, and Truth affirms Teetotalism to be a wise and righteous law of Providence. But now the stubborn foe takes up another position. Man is exposed to so many adverse and depressing influences, that some counteracting stimulus is required to save him from dying from exhaustion; and Alcohol being at hand, what else can it be sent for?

Here we at once suspect a cheat; for may it not be fairly presumed that when the allwise Creator sentenced man to labour and sorrow, he apportioned to him that power to resist ordinary adverse forces, and to repair ordinary injuries, which he must have foreseen would befall him in the discharge of his allotted task? Assuredly it may, and yet many practitioners of medicine are trying to make us believe, that the wear and tear of life can only be successfully combated with Alcoholic drinks. 'Tis the old erroneous doctrine in a more insidious form, and speaking with a more authoritative voice. Doctors of Physic, are pronouncing from the chair that nurses require porter, and authors are circulating that "the question of teetotalism in its attempted general application to all ranks and conditions of the people, must show itself to be unbased on sound theory or just practical inferences."*

For the present I shall leave the practical Teetotalers to accumulate their own kind of evidence, while I examine into theory, which I will do by the aid of Dr. Prout's essay on digestion, found in Vol. viii. of the far-famed Bridgwater Treatises.

Dr. Prout discourses of the functions of the digestive organs under three heads; 1. their reducing; 2. their converting; 3. their vitalising power: let us regard each in turn.

1. The reducing power, he thinks, mainly consists in bringing water into intimate combination with the food swallowed; so that all the articles taken into the stomach are reduced by this means into a semifluid and weak (as to chemical affinity) mixture. This is effected partly by the saliva, the fluid of the mouth, but chiefly by the gastric juice, the fluid of the stomach. Hence we have this question, Does the mixture of Alcohol with the food make easier the reduction of that food by water? So far from it, that Alcohol is commonly used to protect substances from the effects of combination with water, as is seen in every museum in the kingdom, where articles are preserved in spirits. Alcohol has a strong attraction for water, and hence draws it off and hinders its dissolving properties from being exerted on the food, so rapidly as they otherwise would be.

A close attention to morbid anatomy reveals that many cases of indigestion owe their origin to an inflamed state of the inner surface of the stomach, such a state being adverse to the secretion of the gastric juice, and so to the reduction of the food. Now the use of Alcohol puts the stomach into a similar state of congestion, which is usually attended with more than ordinary dryness, instead of the moisture which is wanted for dissolving solid food.

Dr. Prout thinks that the reduction of the food is helped on by the evolution of Chlorine (derived from the decomposition of the Muriates of the gastric juice by a power similar to electricity,) well, if so, a dry and injected mucous membrane is not so powerful for the positive pole of the battery, where the acids would be collected, as a moist and natural condition of the membrane would be; so that in this particular, also, Alcohol hinders the reducing power of the stomach.

2. The converting power, which brings a similar fluid, the chyle, out of very dissimilar articles of diet as meat, bread, turnip, cheese, &c. The elements are arranged with ease and dispatch in the new compound, the chyle, in proportion to their weakness in their old form, in consequence of their reduction by water; 'tis clear then that any thing which hinders reduction, hinders conversion too, hence the inutility of Alcoholic drinks. If we follow the food from the stomach into the intestines, and suppose that Alcohol gets to the liver, and is decomposed there, then we shall find it hindering the converting process of digestion thus: the bile is made up principally of water and certain compounds of Carbon with Hydrogen, now these compounds are, and ought to be, supplied from the body itself in order to health; Alcohol contains large proportions of Carbon and Hydrogen, and if those are artificially supplied, the natural supply will be left untouched; the liver will not separate what it ought from the blood, and so Carbon and Hydrogen remaining in the body, the drinker becomes fat, dropsical, and weak.

3. The vitalising power is known too little of to make it worth while to dwell on it; we may however remark that digestion being a process to prepare dead matter to live, we may well conceive that a bad, morbid, inefficient preparation will lead to a low state of vitality, and hence we have tens of thousands through the drinking of Alcohol, half dead while they live. Alas, poor creatures, would that they knew where their listlessness and their weakness come from! "The dyspeptic [alcoholised] being passes half his days in misery; his offspring inherit their parents' constitution; and if they persist in a like course of slow poison, after a few generations the race becomes extinct,—his name even is cut off from among men!" Providence has gifted man with reason; to his reason, therefore, is left the choice of his food and drink, and not to instinct as among the lower animals: it thus becomes his duty to apply his reason to the regulation of his diet; to shun excess in quantity, and what is noxious in quality; to adhere in short to the simple and the natural; among which the bounty of his Maker has afforded him an ample selection; and beyond which if he deviates, sooner or later he will suffer the penalty." Such is the eloquent warning of the learned author to whose work I have been referring.

SPEECH OF AN INDIAN CHIEF.

KAH-GE-GAH-BAWH, a young Indian Chief, of the Objebwah Nation, is now in the city of Washington, and has been introduced to the temperance platform. From a long and eloquent speech of his, we make the following extract:

My own people—I might talk of them a long while; tell of their noble character, speak of my ancestors; yes, many, perhaps, who slumber under the ground on which we are now congregated. Oh! yes, we were happy before the white man came among them with the fire-water. They claimed the land on which they dwelt—it was an extensive park in which they hunted the buffalo and the deer. Heaven beautified the earth with herbage, and fruits spontaneous were afforded. They acknowledged no master but the Great Spirit. They claimed the hills as their thrones; for they were the monarchs of the continent. The smoke of the wigwam curled upward to the bright blue heaven, as though pointing to the source when they had received so many blessings. All was peace, joy and happiness. But, alas! the dark way of intemperance rolled upon them, into every habitation, carrying sorrow, disease and death. (The speaker was much affected here, and wiped away tears from his eyes.) Oh! it pierces my very heart with pain, to think of the time when fire-water was introduced among my people. When I was a little boy, I remember running away from my father. He was a good father when he was sober; but no sooner did he become drunk, that he would exhibit feelings of unkindness; and often have I hid in the bushes until the danger was over. I have seen our people, under the effects of liquor, take their little children by the heels, and dash their brains out against the trees. This was after the trader came among them. And they would sometimes stab to the heart their children; and, when they became sober, being informed of what they had done, they would weep and lament over their cruel and wicked folly. Some of them would deny that they had thus acted; but their own knives were thrown to them, and they were pointed to their own bloody hands! And I have seen them stab themselves with the knives yet wet with the blood of their offspring! And they would set fire to their wigwams, and dance like demons around the flames. (Much sympathy was expressed by the audience)—Oh! I have sometimes thought that alcohol was the only blessing the white man had given us.

But I shall not complain that our lands are gone—take them—let them go—but I tell you, friends, life is dearer to every man than these; give us the bible instead of the barrels of liquor; the missionary instead of the trader. Oh! give us the religion of Jesus Christ! for intemperance has been the first and last of our ruin!

In the Far West, a few years ago there was a circumstance full of painful interest. I was pointed, by a trader, to two burning wigwams on the prairie. "Rum," he said, "did that, but I didn't sell it."—Now, my friends, he was the very man who did it. And what were the facts? There were eight men in two wigwams. The trader had sold them drink, which stimulated them to hostilities. They had fought until but one lived; there being nobody to kill him. I went to the ruins the next day, and there learned the sad story. The bodies were buried, and at every grave there was a mourner! "He is dead," said one—and then the agonising scream would burst from the afflicted wife.

A little child remarked, "Mother, who will get my venison? Who will hunt for us?" Oh! to see the poor, helpless widows and orphans—it makes the heart bleed. What has done this? It was fire water—it was rum!

THE TOLL GATE OF LIFE.

WE are all on our journey. The world through which we are passing is in some respects like a turnpike—all along which, Vice and Folly have erected toll-gates for the accommodation of those who choose to call as they go—and there are very few of all the host of travellers who do not occasionally stop a little at some one or another of them—and consequently pay more or less to the toll-gatherers. Pay more or less, I say, because there is a great variety as well in the amount, as in the kind of toll exacted at these different stopping places.

Pride and Fashion take heavy tolls of the purse—many a man has become a beggar by paying at their gates—the ordinary rates they charge are heavy, and the road that way, is none of the best.

Pleasure offers a very smooth, delightful road in the outset; she tempts the traveller with many fair promises and wins thousands—but she takes without mercy; like an artful robber, she allures till she gets her victim in her power, and then strips him of health and money and turns him off, a miserable object, into the worst and most rugged road of life.

Intemperance plays the part of a sturdy villain. He's the very worst toll-gatherer on the road, for he not only gets from his customers their money and health, but he robs them of their very brains. The men you meet in the road, ragged and ruined in frame and fortune are his visitors.

And so I might go on enumerating many others who gather toll of the unwary. Accidents sometimes happen it is true, along the road, but those who do not get through at least tolerably well, you may be sure have been stopping by the way at some of those places. The plain common-sense men, who travel straight forward get through the journey without much difficulty.

This being the state of things, it becomes every one, in the outset, if he intends to make a comfortable journey, to take care what kind of company he keeps in with. We are all apt to do a great deal as companions do—stop where they stop, and pay toll where they pay. Then the chances are one to ten, but our choice in this particular decides our fate.

Having paid due regard to a choice of companions, the next important thing is closely to observe how other manage; to mark the good or evil that is produced by every course of life—see how those do who manage well—by those means you learn.

Be careful of your habits. These make the man. And they require long and careful culture, ere they grow to a second nature. Good habits I speak of. Bad ones are more easily acquired—they are spontaneous weeds that flourish rapidly and rankly, without care or culture.

FEMALE REFORMERS.

FEMALE influence, now so happily exerting itself in systematic and numberless well organized efforts to reform the world, is also the most direct and powerful agency in forming the world—the world of humanity, we mean. It is woman that gives the impress, never to be entirely effaced, to the character, fortune and destiny of every inhabitant of earth. She, far more than man, forms moulds and fashions the infant being, develops its inherent powers, and gives them an impulse felt more or less through all the length, and operating, to some extent through all the varying vicissitudes of life. A mother's smiles, and kind words, and counsels, and admonitions are never wholly lost. Whatever good or ill may betide the future man, to whatever rank of honor he may rise or to what depth of infamy he may fall, he will not, he can not entirely eradicate from his heart and soul the first impressions planted there by a maternal hand. Let female then, mothers especially, study well to form mankind. Bring up the rising generation in wisdom's ways, and the future generations will scarcely need a reformatory work.

"What a bright and beautiful sisterhood are the Reforms!" said an eminent divine in a recent discourse and if any thing can add brightness and beauty to the intrinsic loveliness, it is the associations of our mother sisters and daughters, rapidly extending over our country, as bands of angel reformers, leagued against the vices of the day, and gradually and surely bringing about a better humanity. Experience in the work of reformation will soon teach them how to labor most successfully in the work of formation. While they are driving the protean evil of intemperance from the land, they are laying the foundations of a glorious plan for the general amelioration of the human family, in forming the character of men in the principles of virtue and benevolence. Reforming the present, and forming the future generations of our race, will usher in the advent of that millennial period on earth, which inspired men have foretold and sages have predicted, of which poets have sung, and for which all should work and pray.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

THE METROPOLIS.

SEVERAL very interesting and effective meetings have recently been held in the metropolis and suburbs. Here and there is to be found some "croaker," or "earnest" individual, declaring that the cause is "going down," and that the meetings are "unusually flat," and so on; but the true friends of the cause have not failed to discern a number of healthy signs, not only among teetotalers themselves, but in the community generally. The effect of the numerous large gatherings which took place during the Christmas holidays, has evidently been to awaken a more energetic feeling in the members of the Societies, and, as the result, we find an improved attendance at the public meetings, and an important addition of pledged members.

Dr. CARR, of Birmingham, has delivered his very instructive lectures at a number of places, and has, generally, been well attended, and, in every instance, cordially cheered. His lectures are at once intelligent and intelligible; they convey much information, and are delivered in as amusing a style as the serious nature of his topics will allow. We are glad to hear that his engagements, as a lecturer on the physiological truths involved in teetotalism, are numerous.

Not the least important of the recent meetings, was that held on the last night of January, in the Rev. ARTHUR TIDMAN'S Chapel, Barbican. Several respectable young men, members of the church and congregation assembling in that place, had formed themselves into a small Society, and having taken into union with them a few of the more aged and experienced members of neighbouring Societies, have succeeded to obtain the use of a commodious School Room adjoining the Chapel, for regular fortnightly meetings, under the express sanction of the Pastor and Deacons. We know of but one other instance in which a Teetotal Society has been formed under such circumstances in the metropolis, namely, that at Enon Chapel, under the sanction of Dr. J. BURNS. We are not, however, without the hope that other Pastors and Deacons will see the propriety of adopting a similar course. We will venture to predict an enlargement of their congregations and churches, as one sure result of such a movement.

Though the weather was very unfavourable for the occasion, the Chapel was well filled by a most respectable audience; many of the persons composing which, we have reason to believe, had not been in the habit of attending meetings for the advocacy of teetotalism. The Chair was ably occupied by the Rev. H. TOWNLEY, who directed attention to the objects contemplated by the Society—to the nature of its constitution—and to the means it proposed to employ.—Mr. J. W. GREEN furnished a very brief sketch of the origin, progress, and results of total abstinence operations.—The Rev. W. LUCY, of Greenwich, considered the obstacles presented by the drinking customs to the advancement of true religion.—The Rev. Dr. BURNS shewed the importance of Congregational Temperance Societies.—R. HICKS, Esq., Surgeon, addressed the audience on the physical importance of the temperance question, especially to females and nursing mothers.—Mr. HURST, of Oldham, pointed out some of the obstructions presented by the use of strong drinks to the operations of benevolent and religious institutions.—Mr. BUCKLE assigned some reasons why the young especially should adopt the teetotal principle.—Some signatures to the pledge were obtained, among which was that of Mr. J. SARD, one of the Deacons of the Church. The general aspect and tone of the meeting was considered highly encouraging. The Society is formed on decidedly Christian principles, and the Committee seem confident of success.

LEEDS.

The third monthly meeting for the present season of the Leeds Temperance Society, was held in the Music Hall, Albion Street. F. HALL, Esq., Surgeon, of Leeds, was called to the chair. He stated that he and his wife were Teetotalers, and that they had become attached to the principle from a full knowledge and assurance of its intrinsic value, and, indeed, its necessity.

Mr. H. BROWN, a reformed drunkard, and a working man, said he had three reasons for presenting himself before the meeting, gratitude to God for his goodness—gratitude to the Leeds committee for their indefatigable zeal—and an anxiety to benefit his fellow creatures. He found himself prospering in worldly goods and increasing in happiness.

The Rev. NEWMAN HALL, B.A., of Hull, spoke of the difficulties presented in the way of moral reformers by the mistakes of their predecessors. It was clearly demonstrated that strong drink turned man into a beast—destroyed large portions of wholesome food—turned human affections into rudeness and ruffianly habits—and drove immortal souls into a drunkard's hell. Men should eschew strong drink as they did the plague. And it should be remembered that the thinning of the drunkards ranks, to the amount of about 50,000 a year, received the full amount of recruits from the moderate drinkers. Teetotalere were accused of mixing with infidels and bad characters—but which had the most infidels and bad characters enlisted in their ranks—teetotalers or drunkards? Mr. HALL proceeded, with much earnestness, to enforce the great benefits of the principle of teetotalism in leading men not only to habits of temperance, but spiritual regeneration; and he contended that it was the duty of every Christian and lover of his species, to enforce the principle amongst his fellow-men and to adopt it himself. It was the Christian minister's duty, it was the duty of those of rank and station to unite in this great cause.

W. GORDON, Esq., M. D., F.L.S., said it was now beginning to be acknowledged that the end and aim of man's existence are enjoyment, peace and love. Unhappily, by human ignorance and selfishness, thousands were clad in rags, lodged hard and ill-fared; and most of these evils were generated and perpetuated by the use of strong drink. Every man was liable to three laws, the physical, the organic, and the moral law, and he who deviated from one of them brought disease, misery, and death upon himself. He hoped to be able to show that no man could take alcohol with any more reason for hoping to escape premature death, than a man could tie a millstone round his neck, and hope to escape drowning. The human body consists of fat, albumen, fibrin, and bone; and the daily avocations of life waste all these parts. Alcohol does not contain one of these constituents; and therefore alcohol has no power of regenerating the wasted body. The stomach has no more power to convert alcohol into muscle, bone, &c., than the human hand has power to convert sand into wool. Alcohol, when it comes into contact with the internal surface of the stomach, produces the discharge, not of gastric juice (necessary for the conversion of the food into chyle, prior to its ultimate conversion into blood), but of that juice which is provided by Providence for the carrying off of anything which may come into the stomach of a dangerous and injurious tendency. It impedes, also, the digestion of the food. It inflamed the blood; it disordered the functions of the heart; it carried disarrangement into every fibre, and ultimately it brought death to the imbibor. Bodily heat was produced by the oxygen of the atmosphere becoming combined with the carbon of the blood. Alcohol, by permeating the blood-vessels, and mixing its subtle poison with the blood, dissolves the globules of the blood; the result is, that the drunkard gives out too much carbon to the air, and cold, not heat, is the result of the drunkard's potations. It was, therefore, absurd to talk of alcohol keeping up the temperature of the body (applause.) Not only did alcohol injure the corporeal powers; it was equally pernicious to the mental faculties. Insanity, idiocy, the delirium tremens, apoplexy, and the thousand other ills and casualties of daily occurrence bore sad testimony to this truth. Intoxication never stopped its deadly, its devastating career: war was only occasional—intoxication was perennial. Dr. Gordon concluded with a powerful address to the labouring classes. He called upon them to disenthral themselves from their hideous bondage. They had raised up the gigantic fabric of human greatness and human happiness, and the nation's wealth; and he conjured them to tolerate their slavery no longer—to reform themselves, and demand a fair share of their own produce. Let them cast aside their slavery to debasing drinks—raise themselves to the character of refined and dignified men, and take alcohol no more. The victory was in their own hands—the cause was one of truth, and truth was invincible and omnipotent.

Votes of thanks were recorded to the speakers and chairman; and the meeting broke up.

HUDDERSFIELD.

The third monthly meeting of the Temperance Society was held in the Philosophical Hall, on Wednesday 19th January 1848. SAMUEL BOOTH, Esq., Surgeon, took the chair. He said that the objects of this Institution were deeply interesting to his own heart. As a medical man, he was often called to witness scenes of wretchedness and woe, and in too many instances he could detect the effects of an evil, which they were met that evening to endeavour to remedy. This Society had for its object, not only the reclaiming of the drunkard, but promoting the practice of entire abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, which is calculated to banish disease, poverty, crime, and misery from our land. He had been a Teetotaler nearly five years, he esteemed it an honour and a great privilege to be in any way connected with this Philanthropic Institution. He regarded Total Abstinence Societies as one of the grand moral movements of these eventful times; they are an invaluable handmaid to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. He had known many persons saved from an untimely grave by the adoption of these principles. He said when he looked at the Moral, Social, Religious and Physical benefits arising from Teetotalism, he was led to pray that every Christian man might be induced to co-operate in carrying out these glorious principles. He asked what is the object at which this Society aims? The prevention and cure of drunkenness. By what instrumentality do we seek to accomplish this object? By the diffusion of knowledge and the force of truth, through the medium of Public Temperance Meetings, and Temperance Publications. And what are the motives that should urge us to persevere until every difficulty be overcome, and every obstacle surmounted? Self-interest, the love of our neighbour, and the glory of God. The Scripture commands us "to love our neighbour as ourselves," and "to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Then he asked, who was the true Christian and Philanthropist? He that loves his neighbour as himself, and endeavours in every possible way to promote his temporal and spiritual welfare. He trusted that the day was not far distant, when we shall have one bond of Universal Brotherhood, and a true Temperance Alliance of every Minister of the Gospel and gentlemen of all Christian Denominations, advocating this noble cause, not only from the platform, but from the Pulpit, until

"From this land, the foe is driven,
"Disown'd of earth, and curs'd of Heaven."

He said his own experience had long convinced him, that strong drink was not necessary to qualify men for any physical and mental labour. The testimony of nearly 2,000 medical gentlemen is in accordance with the teachings of experience, and thus we find the principles of Total Abstinence fortified on every side. He then read the Medical Testimony drawn up by J. DUNLOP, Esq., and signed by about 1,400 Medical Gentlemen.

WM. GORDON, Esq., M.D., F.L.S., of Hull, delivered a very able and effective speech on the medical and physiological question of Temperance. He proved that alcohol did not enter into the vital processes of forming either albumen, fibre or bone, neither could the vital forces convert alcohol into either muscular fibre, or afford any nourishment to the blood. He showed that alcohol could not give strength to the human system, try a number of men making bricks, water drinkers, and beer drinkers; the water drinkers made more bricks than the beer drinkers. He proved that digestion was hindered and the gastric juice vitiated by alcohol being taken into the stomach. He instanced the experiments of Dr. BEAUMONT, of America, on St. Martin, a Canadian; also the experiments of Dr. BEDDOES upon two dogs. He then gave a beautiful description of the circulation of the blood showing how animal heat was produced by the oxygen of the air uniting with the carbon of the blood, and forming carbonic acid gas. He proved from the experiments of Dr. PROUT that alcohol did not increase the animal heat, and that it invariably hinders the formation of pure blood, which is the cause in many instances of the brain, lungs, and liver becoming congested. He showed that the brain was injured by drinking, and that persons had delirium tremens and insanity in consequence. He showed that man had a very large cerebellum, and that he loses his balance and reels about from the action of alcohol upon it. Alcohol cannot unite with the food, for the purposes of nutrition; it is therefore taken up by the veins and absorbents, and acts upon the nervous fibrilla of the brain. He made a noble appeal to the working men of Huddersfield, referring to the cause of the evils of drunkenness. He said, begin by reforming yourselves, then we shall have public order, and domestic peace purified by religion.

The REV. NEWMAN HALL, B.A., of Hull, spoke nearly an hour, and to an attentive audience in an impassioned manner. He said we had often to undo what other people had done, it was so with all ancient customs, it was so with the Temperance Reformation. He dwelt on the famine or scarcity of food, that there was as much grain destroyed last year as would have fed all the people of Ireland. He adverted to the statistics in the Economist newspaper respecting the consumption of grain by a large brewery in London, and to the increase of price of provisions. And then we must have a national fast on account of the famine, called "a visitation from the Almighty," when the grain was in reality destroyed by the Maltsters, Distillers and Brewers, to the amount of 6,000,000 quarters. He made a noble appeal to moderate drinkers, he showed how the ranks of the drunkards who die to the amount of 60,000 every year were made up from the moderate drinkers. He said we talk of philanthropy, but we must be up and doing, we all can do a little, he instanced the single flake of snow, falling upon the edge of a rock, another and another flake, until it gathered one mass, then it fell upon the Avalanche beneath, and gathered weight as it fell until it desolated the villages below. We all can do a little, and as Christians we ought to try and do something every day to reform the drunkard and save his soul from hell. He appealed to Christians, moderate drinkers and young men. He called upon them as they valued character virtue, and their souls, to shun wicked and gay company. Many a young man's prospects had been blasted, his character ruined for life through drinking. He recommended them to pledge that evening; it would be safeguard through life. His appeals produced an electric effect upon the meeting—no doubt many Christians and young men will be induced to sign the pledge, and increase the ranks of the Temperance Society.

The thanks of the meeting were given to the Rev. Newman Hall, Dr. Wm. Gordon, and the chairman. It was one of the most delightful meetings we have had in Huddersfield, and very numerously attended.

ROKEHAMPTON.

On Thursday and Friday, January 20th and 21st, we had two Lectures from Dr. GRINDROD. The Town Hall was literally crowded on both occasions by very attentive audiences.

On the Thursday evening the chair was taken by the Mayor, JOHN CROUCH, Esq. This gentleman is the principal Innkeeper of the Town, but notwithstanding this, his gentlemanly and philanthropic feeling enabled him to merge his interests as an Innkeeper in his more honourable office of Chief Magistrate, as also to give his countenance and support to the Temperance cause. At the close of the first Lecture, the chairman put several questions to the Lecturer, which elicited much that was interesting and useful to the cause of truth. Thanks were voted to the chairman with acclamations, who in reply stated that as an old man he was apprehensive Teetotalism might be injurious to him, but he could not too forcibly impress upon the minds of the young the importance of being members of this Society.

At the second Lecture the chair was ably filled by A. W. McLEOD, Esq., Surgeon. This Lecture was listened to with deep interest, and will doubtless leave a lasting impression on the minds of those who heard it. It had reference principally to the effect of alcohol on the stomach, &c., which had been found in cases of dissection; and as the Lecturer stated he could show, by a portion of a stomach which had lately been sent to him by letter through the Post Office. At the close of this Lecture, the chairman, as a Surgeon, joined in a lengthened discussion, and made some very useful and important observations. He said he was not a Teetotaler, but was very happy that he had consented to take the chair on that occasion, and could not refrain from personally thanking the Lecturer for his very able Lectures, and more especially as they had been delivered with so much eloquence, and in such a Christian and gentlemanly spirit. He further said that he did not like to make hasty determinations, but as it seemed from the Lecturer's remarks that he sometimes received some strange things through the medium of the Post, he did not think it would be long hence before the Lecturer received from him, through the same medium, his declaration, and adhesion to the cause of Teetotalism, and enrolling himself as a member of the Society.

We have been informed that the worthy chairman has since joined the Society.

CORNWALL.

DR. GRINDROD, after lecturing at the important stations of Devonport and Plymouth, commenced his labours in Cornwall, about the middle of January, at Liskeard, the borough which returns to Parliament, C. Buller, Esq., the new Poor-law commissioner, whose office might be made pretty much of a sinecure, were the views of Dr. G., and kindred philanthropists universally acted upon; five addresses were delivered, the audience increasing at each. Bodmin was next visited, where the Revd. J. Wallis, the vicar, presided on each occasion; handsomely proposing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, which was ably and feelingly seconded by the Rev. A. Taylor, the curate. Some respectable inhabitants signed the "Declaration," and about 280 juveniles were enrolled. Truro, the chief business town of the County, followed Bodmin, and here the Dr.'s exhibition and advocacy so triumphed as to call forth the following resolution, since advertised in the local newspapers:

Feb. 2nd, 1848, Truro Town Hall.

Moved by Humphrey Williams, Esq., seconded by

E. Turner, Esq., M.P., supported by H. Stokes, Esq., Solicitor, President of the Truro Literary Institute, and resolved unanimously:

"That this meeting presents to Dr. Grindrod, hearty and sincere acknowledgments for the able, impartial, lucid, and simple, but impressive manner in which he has delivered his course of Lectures; fully appreciating the soundness of the principles he advocates, the extraordinary power of talent he displays, and the vast amount of information he communicates in a cause of such vital importance as connected with the moral and physical improvement of man."

Thus we have the Dr. fairly launched in Cornwall, and we think with every prospect of doing great good. The advocacy of such men as Teare and Sherer awakened the consciences of tens of thousands in this County, many joined the Teetotal ranks, but hung back, now these will be further instructed, and thus we expect both an awakened conscience, and an enlightened judgment, and thus the victory! God send it! The only fear entertained here on account of Dr. Grindrod is, lest he deal too exclusively with the understanding, and so allow his hearers to go off with knowing their duty, but not doing it.

SUNDERLAND.

The Annual Tea Meeting of the Temperance Society of this Town, took place on Wednesday evening, Feb. 2nd, in the Polytechnic Hall Athenæum, when a highly respectable company of about 500 sat down to an excellent repast, provided gratuitously by the friends of the movement. John Hills very ably occupied the Chair. The whole aspect of the meeting spoke well of the onward progress and augured much for the final triumph of this important movement. After tea many of the company retired to inspect the curiosities in the Museum; the Curator was kind enough to attend and explain whatever was rare and curious. The large Hall and Gallery being well filled, the company then proceeded to listen to addresses from J. W. Miatt, H. Hebron, G. Dodd, G. Charleton, T. B. Thompson, and the Hon. Judge Marshall, from Nova Scotia. This gentleman, who has acted as Judge for 18 years in Nova Scotia and been a member of the legislature for 11 years, spoke to the general evils of Intemperance, giving it as his opinion that nine-tenths of the causes that had come before him were connected with drinking, and that of the murders that had been committed in that Colony for a course of years 8 out of 10 arose from this cause. He also read sundry resolutions of religious bodies in America renouncing all church fellowship with those who countenanced the drinking customs.—A striking fact was stated by G. Dodds, that in the village of Bedlington, containing a population of about 7000, the amount annually spent in these drinks was upwards of £3,500, and that the men employed at the Iron works at that place, wasted of their earnings the large sum of £800 per annum in the purchase of these deleterious articles. The proceedings were occasionally enlivened with a Temperance melody.

JOS. FOSTER.

On New Year's Day a Social Tea Meeting was held by the members and friends of the "Sunderland Temperance Intellectual Improvement Society," when addresses were delivered by the following persons, with great spirit, viz:—Mr. R. Madgwick, Education. Mr. J. Madgwick, the Road to Misery. Mr. J. Chapman, the Temperance Reformation. Mr. Jas. Chapman, Progress of the Society. Mr. O. Thompson, Signs of the Times. Mr. W. Bates, Phrenology. Mr. T. Thompson, the Moral Obligation of the Temperance Question. This Society has only been formed four months, and commenced with only six members, but is now increasing in number every day, and bids fair to be a very useful Society. Its objects are the annihilation of the drinking customs of this country, by training its members for the Advocacy of Temperance, that the time may speedily arrive, when drunkenness shall no more blot the face of this Earth.

THOMAS THOMPSON, Secretary.

LEWES.

On January 19, a most impressive discourse, founded upon Matthew xxii, 39, was delivered by the Rev. B. FARRINGTON, of Ramsgate, in the Chapel, Eastgate. He secured the attention of a numerous auditory; and we think all were left without excuse, who did not at once renounce their connexion with their accustomed drinking usages.

On the same evening, B. GODLEE, Esq., delivered a Lecture on Organic Chemistry, to a numerous and respectable audience, in the Mechanics' Institute. Towards the close of his Lecture he introduced some remarks in favour of total abstinence from alcoholic liquors, stating his conviction, that ignorance prevented many from adopting the principle. He concluded by recommending attention to the subject, and begged the acceptance of fifty copies of Dr. GRINDROD'S discussion at Dunmow, and fifty copies of the pamphlet entitled "Temperance and Teetotalism considered medically;" which were immediately distributed, and in many instances pleasantly received.

[If our scientific and wealthy friends in every town would imitate the noble example thus set by Mr. Godlee, a great and beneficial change would, we have no doubt, be speedily effected as to the drinking customs of our country. Are not all who possess the talents of intelligence, wealth and influence are left without excuse, if they do not actively employ those talents for the benefit of their race?—Eds.]

ISLAND OF KAWAU.

DEAR SIR,—Out of respect to yourself, and the Total Abstinence Societies at home, I feel it my duty to let you know what we are doing in the great Temperance Cause on this side of the world, and I cannot perhaps better do so, than by furnishing you with the first Annual Report of the existence of a Total Abstinence amongst us on this Island.

A public Tea party was held in the School house, Miner's Bay, Kawau, on the afternoon of Saturday the 19th of June, to celebrate the first Anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society, when about 120 persons partook of the good things provided for the occasion. In the evening a public meeting was held in the same place, and the Chair was occupied by Captain Ninnies, the Manager of the Companies Mine. The Secretary read the following ## REPORT.

Twelve months having elapsed since the formation of a Total Abstinence Society on the Island of Kawau, the Secretary begs to present the following statistical account for the information of this meeting and the community:

Total number of persons who have signed the pledge.....	104
Members since left the Island.....	19
Persons who have broken the pledge.....	17
Leaving good on the books.....	68

In taking a review of the progress of the society, the second half year exhibits by far the most gratifying results, as out of 37 who have signed the pledge, only one is known to have broken it, and even that one has rejoined; whereas in the first half year a much larger number forfeited their pledges, and relapsed again into a miserable state of intemperance. The Kawau Total Abstinence Society on its first establishment met with considerable opposition, and was regarded with jealousy by a majority of its inhabitants, in consequence of the tendency of its principles to overthrow the drinking customs so long prevalent on Kawau. In spite of prejudices and oppositions, by no means trivial, the Society has attained the first year of its existence, and much gratitude to God exists, that its principles have met so decided an approval, and adoption by a large portion of the inhabitants of this Island.

The beneficial effects arising from the introduction and establishment of the society in Kawau, are but too obvious to require much proof in this report; numbers have been snatched from the miseries which a long course of intemperance was intailing upon them; families have been benefitted both temporally and spiritually, through their heads having abandoned the use of intoxicating drinks; the house of God, once so thinly attended, now becomes filled; the voice of prayer, once so rarely heard in Kawau, is now known to ascend from many a family altar; the sabbath, which once dawned upon scenes of drunkenness, riot and debauchery, is now better respected and holier kept; and where formerly contention, quarrelling, and ill-will (the usual attendants on intemperance) were prevalent, peace, harmony, friendship, and concord now reign. The society has been visited during the past half year, by the Lord Bishop of New-Zealand, and the Rev. G. Daniel, Wesleyan missionary, who has ably advocated the cause of the society, and strongly urged the adoption of its principles on the inhabitants, pointing out the temporal and spiritual blessings which result from a strict adherence to temperance. There is indeed much cause for rejoicing in the fact that a large portion of our rising generation are found in the ranks of temperance, and the gratification is considerably heightened on considering the vast amount of temptation and pernicious example which beset them. In conclusion, an appeal is made to all, to exert their influence in the great cause of Total Abstinence, to abandon all connection with those who pursue the paths of drunkenness, and to become firm, warm, and thorough going advocates of the Temperance reformation. Young men are especially appealed to, to give their patronage to this cause, and this appeal is made to them, by their hopes of happiness, by their desire of property and health, by their prospects and long life, by their wish for reputation, and by the fact that by abstinence, strict abstinence alone, are they safe from the misery, loathsomeness and grave of the drunkard.

Finally, this appeal is made to every sober man, woman, and child, in Kawau, to raise their voices, their hearts, and their hands in this sacred cause, and never hold their peace, never cease their prayers, never stay their exertions, till intemperance shall be banished not only from the Island of Kawau, but also from the whole world.

The secretaries, Messrs. EVANS and ROWE, then addressed the meeting, on the pernicious effects of intoxicating drinks, and the latter speaker, to whose untiring exertions in the cause of Total Abstinence, the success of society is mainly attributed, delivered a powerful and effective address, suiting the subject admirably to the capacity of his mining hearers, by descending with them into the rich shafts and levels of the Total Abstinence mine, and also taking a survey of the poor miserable bottoms of the old mine of drunkenness, which many of them had refused to work in. Mr. Rowe concluded his address by calling on those who had not yet taken shares in the Teetotal mine, to do so without delay, as the value of the scrips was rapidly increasing. After some few remarks from the chairman, who expressed his delight on the sight he had that day witnessed, the meeting was concluded with prayer, when the parties retired to their respective homes, highly pleased with the transactions of the day, which will be long remembered by both old and young in Kawau."

THE CHRISTIAN RECORD—is among the very cheapest publications of the present day; and we can say of it, what we are sorry we cannot say of much of our cheap literature, that all its pages are devoted to the promotion of the interests of benevolence, morality, and religion. Sixteen closely printed folio pages are given for two pence; and as it is published at Jersey, it enjoys the privilege of free postage. It contains a number of original and well written articles, the subject of Total Abstinence not being forgotten.

AN ARGUMENT FOR THE LEGAL ABOLITION OF THE SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINK.

BY DAWSON BURNS.

THE object of this argument is to show the desirableness of using undivided and resolute efforts in procuring the legislative suppression of Sunday trading in intoxicating liquors; and the reasons upon which we ground the propriety of such a measure, cannot be more fitly introduced, than by stating, and endeavouring to refute, two objections which are directly opposite in their character, but either of which, if sustained, would be fatal to the proposal we advocate.

PART I.

THE OBJECTION AGAINST ANY LEGISLATIVE INTERFERENCE STATED.

This first objection may be expressed in the following terms:—

“1. If the endeavour to obtain a legal enactment for even the partial suppression of the traffic were successful, the temperance cause itself would sustain deep and permanent injury. A contact with political faction and rancour would tarnish its purity. Its worth and efficiency also, would be called in question; for men might justly ask, ‘Why does it require the support of the law if it is based on the unchangeable principles of Truth,—of truth which must finally become triumphant?’

“2. If the traffic ever become extinguished, it must be so by moral persuasion alone. Attempts made, in former times, to repress intemperance by legal means have failed, and they cannot do else than fail in this age and land of freedom. Conviction, and not Acts of Parliament, must instil sobriety, as well as every other virtue, into the public mind.”

THE OBJECTION REFUTED.

This plausible double-statement, has, we believe, much weight with a large class of persons well disposed to the Temperance Movement; but in our judgment, its delusiveness is equal to its plausibility.

1. It conceals the true state of the question; omitting all mention of the following truths:—that the manufacture of intoxicating drinks involves the destruction of an enormous quantity of precious grain, and the misdirection of an incalculable amount of capital and labour; that alcoholic liquors are physically and mentally, personally and socially detrimental, and have, moreover, a natural tendency to induce a craving appetite for them, which leads to an excessive use of them called Intemperance; that Intemperance is the principal cause of our nation's moral debasement, social wretchedness, and criminal degradation; AND YET, that in the British Islands there are more than 80,000 persons permitted and licensed by the Legislature to sell them. We might justly ask, then, Is the Legislature justified in granting such permission and authority? Does it discharge its functions aright by thus acting? What are its functions, if one and the chief of them is not the preservation of the people from evils, analogous in kind to those which are perpetually being excited by the sale of inebriating fluids?

2. The Temperance principle, as such, is in no way affected by the License question. Its truth or falseness will remain what they are whether the Strong Drink Traffic be abolished or not; and would continue so were there not a single abstainer in the world. And it is foolish to object that the passing of a legal enactment against the sale of Intoxicating Drinks would be incompatible with moral persuasion, or show a want of power in the Total Abstinence principle to make progress unaided except by its intrinsic worth. Is the inculcation by moral means of the principles of honesty, and a reverence for human life, or the belief that those principles will eventually become universal, inconsistent with the legal prohibition of dishonesty and murder? Do the laws against perjury and forgery supersede the necessity for impressing the importance of truth on the minds of men? How absurd, then, to talk of the purity of temperance being tarnished because of its connection with political faction: it can have no connection with faction, but it may have with political measures; and that connection would no more tarnish its purity, than the purity of other virtues is sullied by the interdiction and punishment of their opposite vices. If all men were influenced by simple persuasion from the commission of offences injurious to society, legislative enactments would be uncalled for: and if those engaged in the traffic could be prevailed upon to relinquish it en masse; and if we were sure that no others would arise to fill their places—all legislative labour towards removing the ‘rock of offence’ might well be spared. But no one in his wildest flights of fancy can suppose, that moral persuasion will effect the first supposition, or render the second either possible or probable. Yet while the traffic continues, all the multiplied woes which necessarily result from it, will abound and spread.

3. Laws enacted for enforcing national sobriety, have, it is true, frequently failed to bestow much lasting good; and they have failed first, because generally they have not been dictated by a wise and judicious policy, but adopted as mere political expedients, or to serve some temporary purpose, as the mitigation of famine, &c. And secondly, they have scarcely ever resulted from, or been associated with, an enlightened public opinion; while in some instances they have been bound with other measures which have neutralised their effect and rendered their failure inevitable. Our own licence system is an example; for the Government while attaching to drunkenness a paltry money fine, legalizes 80,000 traders in the drinks which do, and will, and can alone produce it. When grapes grow on thorns, and thistles yield figs, legislation of this kind will diffuse sobriety.

4. The insinuation contained in the objection, that legislative interference would be an infringement upon the liberty we enjoy, originates in a misconception of the legislature as a power unconnected with the people; whereas the precise contrary is true. The government under which we live is constitutional and popular, and does, or is understood to, represent the opinions of at least, a majority of the people. Now no one doubts the right of the people to suppress public grievances; and how do they—how can they with safety exercise this right except through their representatives? The imagined grievance may indeed be discovered to have been no grievance at all, but a benefit; yet the committal of an error of judgment does not destroy or diminish the inherent right which society has of self-protection from injury. A number of years ago, the people were convinced—false-ly some said—that the Slave-trade and Slavery were grievances; and through their representatives they abolished, first the one and then the other: and who disputed their right to do so? Suppose then, that fifty years hence they should arrive at the conviction, that the traffic in strong drink is inimical to the public good, and should, through their representatives, abolish it also, who will be able reasonably to dispute their right thus to act? If such conduct be arbitrary and tyrannical, then all legislation is and must be so; and the only alternative left is no government at all—a total disruption of social bonds—a return to ultra-savagism.

If, however, the objection we have been examining is fallacious, not less fallacious is the other which we are now about to state; and the fallacy in this latter instance arises even more than in the former one, from an overlooking of the reciprocal relation, which, in kingdoms like our own, is sustained between the governors and the governed.

THE OBJECTION AGAINST PARTIAL LEGISLATION STATED.

"We maintain," say the second class of objectors, "that the Traffic in Strong Drink being obnoxious to the nation's best interests, should be forthwith abolished by an act of the Legislature. The measure you propose is good as far as it goes, but that is not very far; and it would at most only prevent a seventh part of the mischief. But the evil is so monstrous that nothing short of its entire suppression deserves attempting; all else is compromise. Look at the amazing success which has crowned the exertions of the friends of Temperance on the License Question in the United States of America; success so great as to make it appear not improbable, that in a quarter of a century from the present time, the traffic will not be licensed within the boundaries of that flourishing Republic, even should those boundaries extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Oregon to the isthmus of Panama. And it behoves us to imitate the praiseworthy, noble example thus presented."

THE OBJECTION ANSWERED.

In reply, we prefatorily remark,

1. The ground of debate is not, whether the Traffic deserves to be suppressed.

2. Nor is it disputed, that its legal prohibition would be the most efficient way of preventing the unceasing perpetuation of the evils which arise from it naturally and certainly.

3. But the controversy is on this point:—Should we, in the present state of popular opinion—which is adverse to us—seek to obtain the total suppression of the traffic by a Parliamentary enactment?

We answer, No: because,

1. Such an attempt would be a flagrant insult to our representative form of Government. From whom does Parliament derive its power of making laws, but from the people, or from that portion of them possessing the franchise? And would all, or a majority, or even a considerable minority, of the electoral body, be favourable to a law of the character supposed? They would not: so that were the Legislature courageous enough to pass such a bill, they would act in contravention to the wishes of their constituents, virtually annul the British Constitution, and be assuming to themselves powers, which monarchical and oligarchical des-potisms alone have the hardihood to claim, but which they are politic enough not frequently to exercise. Therefore, it is clear, that in the present state of public opinion, (setting private interests aside,) no government could be prevailed upon to support, and no Parliament to enact, a law entirely suppressing the Traffic; and that all efforts for the attainment of this end would be futile, and therefore mis-spent.

2. Supposing a law of this nature to pass both Houses of Parliament, and to receive the Royal assent, it would quickly pass into utter oblivion, as far as its enforcement was concerned. Laws intimately bearing upon the habits and manners of a whole nation, (as would be the case with the one in question), must, in order to their effectiveness, be to a considerable extent accordant with the national sentiments. The mightiest conquerors, and ablest statesmen, have oftentimes been baffled in their attempts to change by coercion the long cherished—though it might be, pernicious—customs of enslaved and feeble countries. We may judge then, of the likelihood of success that would attend a similar endeavour made upon an independent and powerful people like the British, who have not forgotten, and we trust never will forget, the costly price which has been paid for their civil, as well as for their religious freedom.

3. Such a course of action running counter to the public mind, and being linked with what would appear to millions the most daring oppression, would defeat our own object, by depriving us of that popular sympathy and co-operation, without which any attempt to suppress the Traffic by legal means must, as we have shewn, be absolutely nugatory. Men would not look at the good we sought to do them,—(they regard as evil what we esteem to be good,) but at the arbitrary measures we adopted; and the general indignation and hatred to which from this cause the Temperance Movement would be exposed, would cripple its energies and retard its advance for many coming years.

4. The case of America cited by the objectors, is not for, but against, their recommendation. In the States of New York, Connecticut, Vermont, Illinois, &c., the question of "License," or "No License," has been decided for the respective towns by their own inhabitants; and where the State Legislatures have passed laws in relation to it, they have done so with the fullest assurance, that they were but embodying the will of the "sovereign people."

5. We totally dissent from the theory, that because we cannot attain all, we should attempt nothing; or that to take the smaller benefit when the greater is unobtainable, is an unworthy compromise. The General who refused to occupy the outworks of a fortress because he could not at once become master of the citadel, would not be commended for his military discretion; especially, if in consequence of his refusal, many brave soldiers should be slain. Or, imagine a Christian Missionary in a land where human beings are offered in sacrifice to sanguinary gods; and he urges upon the king the immediate and total abolition of this odious practice. The king replies that the feelings of his subjects will not allow him safely to accede to the whole of the request; but, he offers to reduce the number of the victims one-seventh;—would that Missionary be fulfilling his high and merciful vocation, if he petulantly refused to save ten men from immolation, because he could not likewise save the other sixty?

When Wilberforce, Clarkson and their associates, began their crusade of mercy on behalf of the suffering slave, did they say to Parliament—'We will reject every measure except one for the annihilation of slavery in the British dominions?' Far from this,—they first sought to achieve what was possible,—the legal interdiction of the slave-trade; and in process of time they witnessed the accomplishment of the other and more acceptable boon,—the suppression of slavery throughout the colonies and dependencies of our Empire. And as in the natural world, morning precedes noon, so every great moral undertaking has degrees of progress. Let our first step towards the legal suppression of the Traffic be, the closing of public houses on the Sabbath. The advantages this measure will confer, will attract public attention; and as the people become gradually enlightened on the evils leagued with the manufacture and sale of strong drink, there will be a gradual increase of power to the Temperance Reform, by which the Traffic in all its branches will at last be utterly destroyed.

PART II.

Now, we advocate the legislative suppression of the Sunday Traffic at all, because it would be highly beneficial; and we recommend the use of strenuous endeavours to secure that object only, at present, because we believe its attainment is practicable; while, as we have shewn, efforts to obtain something beyond, could not but terminate in a signal and injurious defeat.

I.—The legislative suppression of the Sunday Traffic would be highly beneficial.—A simple process of calculation would prove that some decrease of drunkenness would follow such a law; and though in the absence of well founded data, the amount of that decrease must be to some degree conjectural, yet we are in possession of statistical information which enables us to arrive at a more accurate judgment, than we could otherwise have formed.

Parliamentary Returns give us full particulars of the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness by the Metropolitan Police, and the number of them summarily convicted. The subjoined statistical tables have been compiled from the returns and are worthy of attentive examination:

Years.	No. taken into custody.			Of whom were summarily convicted.
	Men.	Women.	Total.	Men.	Women.	Total.
1837	14,021	7,405	21,426	6,931	2,414	9,345

In 1838 there was, therefore, a decrease as compared with 1837, of 189 in the number taken into custody, but an increase of convictions to the number of 572.

But in 1839, the "Metropolitan Improvement Act" was passed, one clause of which ordains the closing of all public houses in the Metropolis from 12 o'clock on Saturday night, to 1 o'clock on Sunday afternoon: and the good effect of this clause was soon made evident; for although the Metropolitan district was in that year extended to 135 additional parishes, including a population of 267,000 souls, the number of both committals and convictions rapidly declined.

Years.	No. taken into custody.			Of whom were summarily convicted.
	Men.	Women.	Total.	Men.	Women.	Total.
1843	6,752	4,138	10,890	2,275	888	3,163

Now, the simple fact, that the closing of the public houses of the Metropolis, on the forenoon of the Lord's day, did, in the course of four years reduce the number of persons yearly taken into custody for drunkenness, 50 per cent, and the convictions 70 per cent;—while it is a pleasing index of an improvement in public morals, incontestably shews, that an enormous amount of the intemperance existing prior to 1839, which had come under the cognizance of the police, was Sunday intemperance, and Sunday intemperance originating in the public house.*

Encouraging testimony of a similar character has likewise been borne by the chief constable of Manchester. He has remarked (in reply to inquiries addressed to the Mayor of that town)—"There is certainly less intemperance taking place than was the case formerly, especially on Sundays; and this is no doubt attributable to the provision in the Municipal Act which prohibits the owners of public houses and beer shops from having their shops open, and selling drink, between the hours of 12 o'clock on Saturday night and 12 o'clock on Sunday, or during the hours of Divine service on Sunday afternoons. Streets which formerly were disorderly on a Sunday morning from the drunken people who were turned out of the public houses, are now quiet and orderly." And at the World's Temperance Convention, Rev. W. Wright, A.M., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, said, "So beneficial has the closing of public houses until 1 o'clock on the Sabbath been, that instead of forty persons being taken up on that day, the number is not more than eight. The magistrates have publicly expressed their satisfaction at the improvement."

From these facts we draw the inference,—that the closing of all public houses in the kingdoms during the whole of the Lord's day would cause a decrease of drunkenness correspondent to that which has followed the closing of public houses in London, Manchester, and Newcastle during a part of the Sabbath: and if this inference be valid—as we see no reason to doubt that it is—we have a motive which in itself is surely adequate to lead all who honestly mourn over the existence of our national vice, to give their warmest support to the measure we recommend.

But the decrease of one evil, Intemperance would not be the sole benefit resulting from its adoption: for drunkenness is not only in itself an evil, but it involves other evils even more accursed—the commission of enormities of which brutes are incapable, and of acts of folly which fallen angels would disdain to perform. There is no exaggeration in saying, that it excites to "All that the mind would shrink from of excesses;

All that the body perpetrates of bad;
All that we read, hear, dream, of man's distresses;
All that the devil would do if run stark mad;
All that defies the worst that fear expresses;
All by which hell is peopled."

If then, the suppression of the Sunday Traffic in strong drink would reduce our national intemperance to one half, one third, or only one seventh of its present amount, are we not warranted in affirming, the almost moral certainty in such a case, of a large, if not proportionate, reduction of national disease, immorality, crime, and irreligion? * And public health and morality are not trifles. They are not so considered by the cold hearted politician who seldom thinks and speaks of the mass of human kind but as animals capable by a given amount of labour of producing a given amount of wealth: how then can they be thus regarded by those, who righteously impressed with the dignity of Man, behold in him a being formed by his beneficent Creator for the enjoyment of every species of happiness in a temporal and eternal state?

* The number of persons found drunk by the Metropolitan Police, between the hours of 12 o'clock on Saturday night and 12 o'clock on Sunday night, was in 1838—5,765, and in 1844—2,893, a decrease of 2,893, or of nearly 50 per cent. At the Bow Street Station alone, there was a decrease from 755 in 1837 to 311 in 1845.

2. The measure we propose is practicable.—Thousands would hail with delight a limited plan of this description who would at present shrink alarmed from, or inveterately oppose, one more comprehensive. If we have not very much erred in discerning the signs of the times, it would commend itself to the public regard, and encounter little opposition save from those whose pecuniary interests it would affect.

If then, the trial of one day be practicable, Sunday, we farther observe, should be that day; for without entering upon the religious motives which might influence its selection from among the other days of the week, all we think will see the particular advantages attending its primary adoption. The successful enforcement of the partial measure on that day; the legal regulations already in force to prevent trading on the Sabbath; and the sanctity attached to it by the Christian Church, are circumstances which favour its selection; while the fact, that being a day of general relaxation from ordinary labour, it affords more than usual opportunities, and offers more than usual temptations, for the indulgence of intemperate habits—may be assigned as a strong and sufficient reason, why on it, above all other days, the traffic in intoxicating liquors should be legally suppressed.

APPEAL TO TOTAL ABSTAINERS.

Our object has been to present, in the foregoing statements, a concise undeclamatory argument in behalf of the exertions made by some Temperance Organisations to procure the enactment of a law, extending to the whole Sabbath and to the whole nation a provision which has been inserted in several local municipal acts. Is it necessary, in conclusion, that we press upon the friends of Temperance Reform, an interest in this matter? An opportunity is here presented for arresting, in no small degree, the evils of drunkenness, of which we in our conscience believe they are bound to avail themselves. Whatever ignorance others may profess as to the nature and effects of intoxicating drinks, they can make no such plea. And can they, with the knowledge they possess, consistently allow the perpetration of a monster evil, which they may aid, in the manner pointed out, in partially destroying? Will they permit any false 'liberalism,' or absurder bigotry, to hinder them assisting to close 80,000 fountains of intemperance, and consequent sorrow, pauperism, and crime,—one day in every seven—fifty-two days in every year?

* In a letter to the writer of this, the Mayor of Liverpool assigns "the good working of the publican's clause which compels that body to close their houses during the earlier part of the Sabbath day," as one reason why "crime has not increased in Liverpool during the last two or three years."

THE ASSISTANCE OF OTHERS DESIRED.

With the conviction also that the benefits we have enumerated would succeed the legal suppression of the Sunday Strong Drink Traffic, we feel ourselves able to solicit the non-abstaining part of the community to grant us their earnest co-operation in striving to attain an end—the tendency of which, and the means sought to procure which, will we believe on mature reflection commend themselves to every man's conscience as in the sight of God. We invite their assistance as persons who love their country, and whose anxiety for its real advantage makes them worthy of the name of Patriot in that appellation's purest sense; and especially do we seek the friendly, hearty co-operation, of all who endeavour with godly simplicity, daily to practice the holy precepts of love towards all men, which their Master and Redeemer enunciated, and which as the Greatest Philanthropist that ever has existed in our world, he illustrated in the highest perfection by his own sacred example.

THE SABBATH TRAFFIC IN STRONG DRINKS.

The Committee of the British Association for the promotion of Temperance, recommend the following Petition. We think those who read the foregoing Essay, will cordially promote this object. No time should be lost.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The Petition of the Undersigned Inhabitants of the Town of _____ in the County of _____

SH EWETH,

That Intemperance, the prolific source of crime, demoralization, and evil of every kind, prevails to an alarming extent in this Kingdom, especially on the Sabbath Day.

That Intemperance is commensurate with the facilities afforded for obtaining intoxicating liquors; and the lamentable amount of drunkenness prevalent on Sunday is occasioned by Licensed Victuallers and Beer-shop Keepers being legally permitted to pursue their ordinary occupations on that day, when the greater leisure of the industrious classes and their recent receipt of wages lead them to greater excess.

That since the introduction of the Metropolitan Improvement Act in 1839, which enforces the closing of public-houses from midnight on Saturday until one o'clock in the following afternoon, there has been a decrease in the convictions for drunkenness occurring in London on Sundays, of nearly 50 per cent; and the beneficial results of similar regulations, adopted at Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, justifies the conclusion that such benefit might be made general by the Legislature.

That the various and continued efforts made by Ministers of the Gospel, and by benevolent persons of all parties to diminish the vice of Intemperance have been greatly impeded by the Sunday Traffic, and will prove in a great degree unsuccessful so long as that traffic remains legalized.

Your Petitioners therefore earnestly pray that your Right Honourable House will be pleased to enact a law, greatly restricting or entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays.

And your Petitioners will ever pray, &c., &c.

The Petition to the House of Commons must be headed as follows, and in the Petition the word RIGHT before Honourable House must be omitted:—"To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled."

N.B. Petitions not weighing 2lbs. will go free by Post when addressed to a Member of the House of Commons or to a Peer of the Realm. The parcel must be open at the ends.

It has frequently been inquired if Females are to sign the Petitions? We reply, it is legal, but not usual for them to do so. Also, At what Age persons are to sign? Answer, Above Fourteen Years.

MR. JAMES TEARE.

DEAR SIR:—I take the liberty of informing my Temperance friends through your paper, that as my health has not been good for several months, during the last year, I feel it my duty to retire from my labours, at least for a while, until I regain my strength.

During the time that I have been engaged in spreading the principle of our great and glorious cause, I have generally enjoyed good health, but last summer I had so many out-door meetings for weeks together, that I have never been thoroughly well since. All public speakers know how trying out-door speaking is to the constitution and perhaps no one has had a greater share of it than I have had.

If I should be spared till next May, I shall have been a Teetotaler in principle and in practice, sixteen years, during which time I have been holding meetings almost every day in different parts of the Kingdom, and not a few of them in the open air, the indoor meetings too have been very crowded, and the air very impure. But, thank God, I have had extraordinary success, and I feel that if I should not hold another meeting, I have done my duty towards my country.

I remain, Dear Sir,

Yours truly,

Manchester.

JAMES TEARE.

TEETOTAL GLEANINGS.

THE FIRST DROP.

When the Temperance principle was introduced into England, total abstinence from distilled spirits was enjoined, but the moderate use of wine and malt liquors was allowed. It had not been sufficiently considered that the first drop led to the second, and that there was danger at the very outset. There seemed a great distance between one and a hundred, or one and a thousand, and but very little between nothing and one: yet the one was the first step from nothing; it led gradually to the second, and from that slowly (in some cases alas! rapidly) to the hundred and the thousand. The starting point, therefore, was of the greatest importance; persons were drawn on by little and little, till they became fond of drink, and descended from one step to another, till they became sots, and terminated a wretched existence by a premature death.—Rev. H. TOWNLEY.

THE MORAL BARBICAN.

A Barbican was a tower, or small fortress, attached to a city wall, from which darts, arrows, and other missiles, were cast forth at an enemy. Now the missiles cast forth from those ancient barbicans, dealt destruction to the foe and the invader; but in the present Barbican, every thing that was injurious to body or soul was renounced, and chiefly that prolific source of injury, strong drink; while the missiles sent forth were only those of charity and love. Let them ascend to the top of their high tower, sending forth their volleys, and, relying on Divine aid, they might rest assured of success.—Rev. H. TOWNLEY, at Barbican Chapel.

DRINKING CUSTOMS versus RELIGION.

Powerful obstacles were presented to the advancement of true religion by the drinking customs of the country. First, in reference to the converted. They produced indifference to the ordinances and observances of religion, —to the various means of grace. Also, indifference to, and unfitness for, the private exercises of religion; such as meditation, prayer, self-examination and communion with God.—Further, they exerted an injurious influence on the general temper, spirit and conduct; and, finally, they were injurious to the growth of piety, and caused many to continue dwarfs, who would otherwise be strong, vigorous, and valiant for the truth.—He did not refer to positive intoxication, but to the effect of yielding to friendly invitations, and of following out the usual social, and even dietary customs.—Secondly, in reference to the unconverted. The influence of the drinking customs was to prevent thoughtfulness as to the best things; to render reading of the Bible and good books distasteful and unprofitable; to induce absence from the public ordinances of religion, or to cause those ordinances to become unconstructive and unoperative. The house of God was open, and his people were worshipping, but large numbers were wending their way to those places where strong drink, and the company who loved it, was the chief attraction. And even, in cases where an impression that was good had been made, these customs and practices operated to stifle conviction.—Rev. W. LUCY.

CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETIES.

There were several reasons why it was desirable that total abstinence Societies should be formed in connexion with Christian Congregations. First, as it regarded pecuniary matters. He supposed that about two pounds per annum was spent on strong drink by most respectable persons; then if there were 250 such persons in a congregation, £500 was spent which might be devoted to the purposes of humanity and religion. How much more consistent for Christians to lay that sum on the altar of the Redeemer than on the altar of Bacchus! Secondly, for the prevention of apostasy in Christian churches. The instances were numerous in which good persons had been ensnared, injured and excommunicated, in consequence of the temptations to use strong drink, to which those who were not abstainers were continually exposed; and it often happened that those thus ensnared were the most generous, open-hearted, noble-minded persons in the congregation to which they belonged. Thirdly, to counteract the direct and indirect influence of the use of strong drink by respectable persons. Their example often proved pernicious, where the example of a regular drunkard would disgust. Fourthly, in reference to the rising generation, who were the chief hope of the advocates of temperance. Especially the children in Day and Sabbath Schools, many of whom went astray because they were not impressed with the important truths of strict sobriety. And finally, for the sake of consistency; that those who bore the Christian name might avoid even the appearance of evil.—For these and similar reasons was it desirable that every Christian congregation should have its Temperance Society.—Dr. JABEZ BURNS.

BEAUTY PRESERVED.

If mothers would but give up the barbarous notion that strong drinks were necessary, and would take simple nourishing fluids, such as milk, barley-water, gruel, &c., they would cease to injure their graceful figures and pretty faces, and would have the happiness and honour of rearing a healthy and vigorous progeny.—R. HICKS, Esq., Surgeon.

WHAT ONE POOR MAN CAN DO.

A RECLAIMED DRUNKARD made the following statements a few evenings ago. He had opened a room for the advocacy of Teetotalism, in a very low and degraded neighbourhood in the district of Holloway, near London. Many attended; about 300 had signed the pledge, 40 of whom were reclaimed from habitual drunkenness. He had been the means, also, of putting into circulation about 4000 tracts. He had established a Sabbath School, into which about 250 children had been admitted, a Day School, the average attendance at which was 120; and an evening School for adults, in which were several persons now able to read a chapter in the Testament. Further, he had founded a Saving's bank for the children's half pence and farthings; £15 had been paid in, which instead of being wasted in sweet-meats and fruit, bought on the Sabbath, was expended last Christmas in shoes, frocks, jackets, and other useful articles. Nor was this all: many had been brought to hear the Gospel preached, and some of those who at first molested the preacher, were now the most ready to protect and to assist him. All this was done by one reclaimed man, a working gardener, in the course of twelve months.

TONIC MEDICINES.

BY H. MUDGE, SURGEON.

The intention of the writer is to inquire and to state, how far Alcoholic medicines can be regarded as Tonics. It will be useful to select some eminent author as a guide, and the words of Dr. ANTHONY TODD THOMPSON, one of the Professors in University College, London, entitled "Elements of Materia Medica, and Therapeutics," is selected for this purpose. It is easy to make an author speak for or against a given treatment by detaching sentences of his writings from their context, and quoting them in support of a favourite opinion; as thus,—“the temperate use of wine,” says Dr. T., “instead of interrupting digestion, tends to promote it, by stimulating moderately the nerves and the muscular coat of the stomach, thus favouring the proper secretion of the gastric juice as far as regards both its quantity and quality.” A little further on we meet with these words,—“In a dietetical point of view, wine should be taken before dinner, or at some period of the day when chymification is not in progress. A question however here presents itself—is it at all requisite in a healthy condition? I reply—no: and even when it is demanded, the number of cases of dyspepsia (indigestion) depending on mere want of tone in the stomach are few; and it is in such cases only that wine, or alcohol in any form, can be properly prescribed.”

A Teetotaler might quote the latter, and an anti-teetotaler the former extract, from the same work of the same author; and thus each unfairly seek support for his own views. I have said thus much to show that I do not rely on any single sentence or expression of Dr. Thompson's for showing that Alcoholic drinks are not tonic, but rather on the general tenor of his writings, coinciding as I know these do with the writings of other standard Authorities.

“The operation of Tonics is gradual; there is no sudden alteration of the pulse after their administration; they neither call forth nor repress arterial action; nor is the energy which they afford to the frame followed by any proportional languor or collapse: they operate without any evident phenomena of immediate excitement productive of depression, such as follow the administration of stimulants or of immediate depression, as produced by sedatives: hence they differ essentially from both these groups of Medicines. But it is chiefly the Excitant and the Tonic which are frequently confounded together. From what has been said, however, the distinction is obvious. If a Medicine introduced into the living body, be followed by a sudden or high state of action, and this be as rapidly changed to a state of depression or collapse, and both states be obvious, the substance is an Excitant. If, on the contrary, the action be scarcely perceptible, and very slowly produced, and no consequent exhaustion nor depression takes place; and if, by continuing the medicine, at intervals not so long as to allow the dissipation of the impression, the body gradually acquires a greater degree of power, and approaches nearer to the condition of health than was the case when the medicine was first administered, and continues so, this is a Tonic.”

This quotation is undoubtedly long, but if it give the reader a clear understanding of what a Tonic is, it will go a great way to deprive Alcoholic liquors of their favourite characters of being strengthening: for now let us notice the properties of Alcoholic drinks;—

1, They quickly and perceptibly give a greater sensitiveness to the nerves;—2, they instantaneously increase the action in the moving fibres;—3, they very soon quicken the pulse, and augment its force;—4, they raise the temperature of the body for a season (only).—In these four respects they may be supposed as opposed to Tonics; not to mention fifthly, their use is invariably followed by depression! And these five particulars will be found those which Dr. Thomson assigns to the class of substances termed Excitants, or more commonly Stimulants.

Now then comes the question,—may not Excitants be made Tonics by reducing their dose, and repeating the medicine? The answer is—no; except under particular circumstances which belong to an essay on disease to explain, rather than to a popular paper on dietary tonics. Hear again Dr. Thompson;—“The distinction between Tonics and Excitants must be kept in view. The more healthy and vigorous the organs are, the more readily, decidedly, and energetically, stimulants act upon them; on the contrary, the more healthy and vigorous the body is, the less susceptible it is of the influence of Tonics.—It is of the utmost consequence to be aware that Tonics, strictly so called, are not stimulants: in producing strength they do not call forth action; for tone is not action, and action is not strength.” Hence we see at a glance that though alcoholic liquors increase the action, they do not promote the tone or strength of the body, nor of any particular organs they may act on.

It is curious, yet melancholy, that this common false estimate as to intoxicating wines being tonics should be countenanced and propagated by the Church of England in her catechism and her ordinances; where the (brandied) wine of the Communion is set forth as a fit emblem of the Saviour's blood, the benefits to be derived from the ordinance being described as “the strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine.” This is bearing witness to a palpable error, which will have to be corrected at no remote a day by the substitution of a wholesome tonic liquor, for the adulterated and dangerous article now in common use. TRUTH is spreading and reform will come. It may be stated, in conclusion, that on looking over Dr. Thomson's list of Tonics among sixty-eight things therein enumerated, Alcoholic liquors are not found; while in his list of Excitants they occupy a prominent place.

TEMPERANCE—puts wood on the fire, meal in the barrel, flour in the tub, money in the purse, credit in the country, contentment in the house, clothes on the bairns, vigour in the body, intelligence in the brain, and spirit in the whole constitution.—British Banner.

A FEW PENCILINGS FROM OUR NOTE BOOK.

No. II.

BY THE REV. T. WALLACE.

"Ours are a few flings,
May they be of silver if not of gold."

I. TEETOTALISM MUST ORIGINATE FROM PRINCIPLE.

It is always gratifying when we find persons acting from principle—enlightened and commanding principle; when their conduct, in any given instance, or in relation to any system, or any cause, springs from sound and intelligent views—from dispassionate and mature contemplation—from a determination to act, not from mere impulse, which is fitful and fluctuating as an April day, but from those sentiments and convictions, of whose excellence and importance they are as firmly persuaded, as of their own existence. When persons act in this manner they do not act rashly. They do not move blindly, or without an adequate reason, and, when once decided, they are not to be shaken—much less overthrown. They have tested their views. They are well acquainted with the solidity of that ground on which they stand. They feel that they are built upon a rock. Now, this is how we wish persons everywhere to act, in relation to the Temperance question. It must be gravely pondered. They must examine the subject in all its bearings. They must do nothing precipitately, and, sure we are, in the majority of cases, if they act in this manner, we shall have them with us, and they will cordially and heartily join us. They will be convinced of the rationality and wisdom of our cause—of the power of our arguments—of the magnitude and benevolence of our undertaking—and of the vast importance of multitudes enlisting on our side. This is the way in which we would make Teetotalers. These are the adherents we want. These are the thoughtful and well-furnished men we require to unite with us, to labour with us, and to be our continual helpers in this vast undertaking. One person acting from principle, is worth a hundred acting from mere emotion: on the one we can rely, on the hundred, we can place no dependence whatever.

II. RELUCTANCE TO MAKE SACRIFICES.

There are few persons who are noble-minded and heroic enough to make sacrifices. While every thing is calm, sunny, and cheerful, they are pleased, and happy, too. They cannot, however, brave boisterous weather—face the storm—ride upon the tumultuous waves. This is very obvious in regard to Teetotalism. The spirit and conduct of numbers who shy the cause, or who stoutly oppose it, loudly proclaim one thing—"we will not make the sacrifice." Your views may be sound and good, but they are not pleasant to us,—there is sacrifice necessary. We think, many of your sentiments are very excellent, and would be very beneficial to the Drunkard, but they are too stringent for us, we do not deem it expedient to make the sacrifice."

How often we meet with these complainers—with these persons who are always quibbling, always starting objections!—They are afraid to advance because of the sacrifice.

"To what will this Temperance Reformation eventually come! what shall we not be required to abandon at last? In the first instance, we were only called to give up ardent spirits. Those we did abandon, and enjoyed our health without their regular use, as for so many years, we had been wont to do. Then, we were required to give up wine. But that we found very hard to abandon. It was tremendous self-denial. Then, Porter, Beer, Cider, we were called to give up,—and we ask—what next?"

These persons are continually unhappy, in being required to give up so much, and so much that they like. They would surrender a little, but, by no means, would they abandon all.

There is, however, no real principle at bottom—no self-sacrifice—no regard for the best interests of others. The good that is to be accomplished does not enter their minds at all. The reclamation of one poor drunkard—the salvation of one degraded miserable being—the happiness of one disconsolate and broken hearted wife—the education, clothing, comfort, and probably, eternal felicity, of one neglected and wretched family—are thoughts to which they never recur, considerations on which they never dwell; because they vividly present before their minds, what they would have to give up—to sacrifice—were they to come over to the ranks of Teetotalism. They cannot bear to give up any thing which they love, though it may be needless and injurious to them, as well as ruinous to others. They are always disturbed and annoyed by the movements and efforts of those noble-minded men—those true moral heroes—who are determined and unceasing in their exertions to search out, and, if possible, remove the core of the evil. What are such persons worth in connection with any great cause? Literally, nothing. They are valueless.

III. WEIGHING ARGUMENTS AGAINST TEETOTALISM.

"I am opposed to you on the Temperance question—decidedly opposed,"—said a gentleman to the writer one day. "I have a number of arguments to adduce, and they are, I think, good and conclusive." "Indeed! well, Sir, let us have them; will you sit down and write them out, and after you have penned your reasons against Teetotalism, I will produce mine in its favour, and let an enlightened judgment, and a sound and honest, and especially, a christian heart decide." He sat down. He wrote out a numerous list of arguments against Teetotalism. The array appeared to be imposing and even formidable. He expressed great confidence that he was right, and that the writer of this article was wrong. "Now," said he, "look here, what a catalogue! answer it if you can." "Stop a moment, Sir, if you please, we are not quite confounded yet. There are a few strong reasons on the other side. Let us think of them. Let me have a sheet of paper, and they shall be written out, or at least, the most important. The list was commenced; and when the writer arrived at the twelfth argument, in favour of the great Temperance Reformation, he exclaimed, "I want no more, I cannot resist the force of evidence, I shall oppose the cause no longer. The arguments that Intemperance

Starves our poor,
Starves our schools,
Starves our churches, are quite enough for me."

If persons would only weigh the arguments which they allege against Teetotalism, they would not oppose us. Those arguments are unphilosophical, baseless, and, we think, at variance with the spirit and requirements of the word of God.

IV. THE ULTRAISM, WITH MANY, OF THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

The remark is often made to us, with regard to the Temperance cause,—“ We should be happy to go with you, if you did not go so far; your sentiments are too strong, too startling, too unqualified. You are, in relation to this question, decidedly ultra, and we are afraid, and unwilling, to move with you.” In reply to this, we would observe, that we consider there is more unwillingness than fear. With regard to the ultraism of our proceedings, we aver that the charge is invalid—is groundless. The question is, are our plans rational and wise? are our principles in unison with christianity? are our arrangements and proceedings calculated to minister to the elevation and happiness of man? Is our cause essential to the safety—the tranquillity—the domestic comfort—the education—the moral and religious improvement of multitudes? If so, why should we be termed ultras—or our cause, that of ultraism? we maintain, that, in advocating our principles, and in diffusing our spirit, we are acting with true christian wisdom—we are grappling with a gigantic evil, and we are endeavouring to reach its seat, we are aiming to destroy it at the core. Milder means have been employed; they have been fruitless: moderation has been maintained: that has been inefficacious: therefore, we ascend to the fountain-head; our motto is, We will abstain from inebriating liquors, to do good to our fellowmen—to lessen a fearful evil, which is entailing misery on millions—which is the bane of our country—a curse to the young, and the fell destroyer of hundreds of thousands of souls. These are our views—these are our sentiments—these our objects. Why, then, should we be pronounced ultras? The charge is unfounded—unjust—still, we are willing to bear it, if we can reclaim the drunkard—render his wife happy—and improve the condition and elevate the character of his neglected and wretched children.

V. FORMING PUBLIC SENTIMENT ON TEETOTALISM.

This has been done, unquestionably, to some extent, already; but, by no means, to the extent which we could desire, and which is absolutely necessary. We want the masses to think, and act with us. We are anxious that Society, in its various parts and ramifications, should entertain our sentiments, and be prepared to plan, to labour, and struggle with us. Comparatively little will be done without this. This general movement is of unspeakable importance. This formation and development of the popular sentiment, we regard as matters of surpassing moment.

Great things, in the Temperance cause, have been done already:—still, we want much more to be effected. This public sentiment is, yet, a desideratum. It is, even now, in a great degree, to be formed. We want public opinion to bear more directly in favour of the Temperance movement. We want the masses to be heart and soul with us—and, not only the masses, but the more educated, opulent, and influential. It has been observed, and, we think, soundly and philosophically, that “the real question has not yet been fully tried.” It has been, by no means, adequately tested. The popular mind has not appreciated—not felt it, in any degree in which it ought to be estimated, and its importance to be realised.

There are multitudes we cannot move, and they are not to be influenced by any arguments, or by any powers of persuasion. They are waiting for others. They are keeping back, because their employers—their ministers—their parents—their preceptors are in the rear. If they moved forward, then, they would advance; and because many men with whom they are acquainted, or whose names are high in estimation, shy teetotalism, they, forsooth, must shy it too; because they repudiate it, they consider it must be repudiated by them also. How ardently we long for a general and most decided movement—an intelligent and determined combination of the friends of humanity—education—and christianity against intemperance in all situations—all places—all circumstances;—then, what a change should we speedily witness—what a wondrous moral revolution would be accomplished! How would the national character be elevated! How would the national happiness be promoted! What beauty and splendour would be imparted to the national crown!

May this holy confederacy be soon formed! May multitudes soon step forward, and let most decisive public sentiment be everywhere expressed. We want the millions.

A CASE OF DEEP IMPORTANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

DEAR SIR:—Having been for eleven years a total abstainer I have in that time read several total abstinence works. But it has never fallen to my lot to meet with an article relating to a certain matter, about which I am very anxious to obtain correct information. As a minister of the gospel, I have too frequently observed that ministerial brethren and others, who had acted on Total Abstinence principles, have abandoned those principles by earnestly pressed medical advice. These individuals have, in most cases, had a tendency to bilious complaints. While living as Teetotalers this tendency has generally been less powerful. But then, in lieu thereof, a painful weakness has been experienced, for the removal of which, almost invariably, porter has been recommended. Now what I am VERY desirous to know is whether there is not something far more suitable for such persons to take in these circumstances. Will any medical friend kindly give the much desired intelligence? As a Teetotaler, as a Minister, as connected with suffering relatives, and as a friend to the human race, I shall feel greatly obliged to any individual or individuals who will furnish a few plain directions on this subject.

In reference to myself, I may just add, that I believe I am much indebted to Total Abstinence. I know nothing of a headache from study. Exhaustion from preaching. I have not yet felt, and although my bodily constitution is far from strong, and although my labours for about seven years have, I believe, been quite up to the average of my brethren: my Sabbath duties during part of the time having comprised two prayer meetings, two chapel services, one out-door service and sometimes an address to a Sabbath School. Such is my own conviction of the universal good resulting from Teetotalism that, writing deliberately, though some will court it folly, I would rather die from disease or weakness than abandon my Total Abstinence practice. For the sake of others, however, I greatly wish for the information I seek, since all are not equally determined, and since with them, as well as with others they may influence, I am anxious the Total Abstinence cause may maintain its ground.

Wishing you great success in the noble work in which you have with so much spirit embarked,

I remain, very truly yours,
W. A. P.

Feb. 15th, 1848.

* * We are fully aware of the deep importance of the enquiry proposed by our respected Correspondent, and shall be glad to receive a satisfactory reply from some of our Medical friends.

PIG FED ON APPLES, OR PORK VERSUS CIDER.

In page 62 of Anti-Bacchus, it is stated that on Dec. 28, 1837, the Teetotalers of Ebley dined on the flesh of a pig that had been fed on apples. The owner of the animal, Mr. THOS. NEATE, of Dudbridge, in the Borough of Stroud, had read of the Americans feeding horses, sheep, &c. upon apples, and found it more profitable than converting them into cider. Mr. N. resolved to make the experiment, and nothing could have succeeded better. But some friends have since doubted the result, and therefore last year Mr. Neate made another trial. In October, 1847, he took a pig which weighed about five score, and was worth £2. He fed it for 14 weeks on apples and meal. The apples were chiefly blight and wind-falls; some of them were rotten, they cost £1 : 14. They were boiled, but of course required less time than potatoes. With the apples the pig consumed one sack of meal, which cost £1 : 10. The animal increased at the rate of ten pounds a week, and when killed, weighed, twelve score, and was worth £6. The leaf weighed 15lbs, which is three pounds above the average. To commemorate this result, a number of friends, teetotalers and others, dined together off the flesh of the animal, in Ebley school room on Wednesday Jan 19, 1848, about 70 persons were present. The meat was delicious, some almost thought the applesauce was in the pork. Barley and plum-pudding, fruit, &c. were the accompaniments. The Ebley Teetotal Brass band attended. In the evening a Teetotal meeting was held in the large School room, HENRY GALE, Esq, of Malmesbury, presided. Mr. Thos. Neate gave the history of the Teetotal pig. Mr. Gale made a stirring speech. The fact he narrated respecting Total Abstinence and Hydropathy carried conviction to every heart. The Revs. Mr. HILL and B. PARSONS, also spoke. The room was crowded, and nearly thirty persons signed the pledge. The cause of Temperance has thus received a new impulse in the neighbourhood. Several meetings have since been held, all well attended, and we have reason to believe that if the Teetotalers continue active, the work will hereafter prosper beyond their most sanguine expectations.

THE TAPROOM AND TEETOTAL MEETING.

On Tuesday, January 11th, a Temperance meeting was held in the taproom of the Black Horse Inn, Dudbridge, in the Borough of Stroud. Before the meeting the room was filled with a number of persons smoking and drinking, but at seven o'clock Mr. Frederick Nurse, the landlord, entered, and requested the company to put away their cups and pipes. He was immediately obeyed. The table was removed, and benches arranged for the Teetotalers, and the place was crowded. The meeting was opened by one of our staunch friends, Mr. S. Brooks, giving out a hymn and engaging in prayer. The chairman, Mr. Thos. Neate, and several working men, addressed the audience very effectively. One especially told his own tale of woe as a drunkard, and the blessedness of giving up the use of intoxicating drinks. Mr. S. Brooks spoke at some length on the stupefying influence of these liquors, which he illustrated by the following anecdote:—He said that he had heard of a man who had the hair shaved from one side of his head when he was drunk, and had the bald part smeared over with soot and grease by his pot companions. He was dead asleep while they did it. When he awoke, he found it was not all right with his head, and exclaimed, "Is this I? I am sure it's not I. If it's I, I've two shillings in my pocket." He put his hand into his pocket, but the two shillings were gone, and he again exclaimed, "I thought it was 'nt I, but I'll look in the glass then I shall know if it's I." He went to the glass, and on seeing himself, he said, "Now I am sure tee'ant I. If it's I, I have a wife at home, I'll go and ask if it's I." He left the beer shop, and staggered to find his house; he knocked at the door, and when his wife opened it, he asked, "Am I thy husband?" "Noo-ah, that thee bissent,"—said his wife, and instantly closed the door. Just as Mr. Brooks made this statement, a drunken man rose, and said, "I am the person referred to," and another man who was sitting by, affirmed that the narrative was every word true. The meeting broke up about 10 o'clock, and several persons have since signed the pledge.

ATTEND TEMPERANCE MEETINGS.

It does me good to attend the Temperance Meeting.

It opens to me a new chapter of human misery, of personal and domestic sorrow, of human reformation and of the power that saves; and I am humbled, I wonder and adore.

It teaches me condescension. I labour for the loathsome. I stoop to pluck, indeed, a diamond, but it is from the gutter; and I gain something of the spirit of HIM who came "to seek and to save that which was lost."

It strengthens my resolutions of self-denial and self-control. As men relate their experience, I see that I too have been on the brink of ruin; that I must "keep under my body if I would not be a castaway;" and that there is a reward for perfect decision and firmness, to be weighed in no scales, and estimated by no price; and I sing in praise of "bright water!"

It awakens gratitude, rich, deep, eternal; for why was I not too a drunkard?

I more highly prize the Gospel. In this alone is found compassion for the erring, pity for the wretched, strength for the weak, redemption for the lost.

I see something of what it will be to be finally saved. There is, comparatively, little joy over the sound moralist reaching heaven, but great over the prodigal son. When the poor drunkard stands up a sober man, a happy man, a useful man, glorifying God; I see something of what it will be for a poor sinner to be clothed in white, and to stand among the redeemed in heaven.

I feel encouraged and excited to labour to bring all men, intoxicated by sin, back to God. The Temperance effort is one, amongst others, to reclaim and save the world. Success in this, perhaps the lowest, yet most difficult, warrants me to look for success in every other. My heart is enlarged, my spirit emboldened, my courage increased; and I say, Satan shall be dethroned in every heart, and put under my Saviour's feet.

"Temperance! tell the listening world
What thine advocates have done:—
—Hearken! now the tyrants' hurl'd
From his high and cruel throne."

I know not how it is with others; but it does me good to attend a Temperance meeting.—N. Y. Evangelist.

YOUTH DRAWN ASIDE.

An intelligent young man, the Superintendent of a Sabbath School, was intent upon improving himself, and had from his savings got together an excellent scientific and religious library. But he was drawn aside to use strong drink, entirely by the customs of social life among respectable people. He became a drunkard, and, as one means of gratifying his love for strong drink, he parted with his excellent library, which became exposed for sale on a bookseller's stall!

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

GREAT EVENTS are generally foretold by some important phenomena:—they come not unawares, nor, to a reflecting and observant mind, unlooked for. Trace back the annals of nations, to some of those great and important changes in their government which shed a lustrous lightness on the age in which they transpired, and we shall find they were generally foretold by a chain of anterior circumstances, the issue of which would be a renovation of some general custom, law, or practice; which would serve the interests of the people and enhance their political or commercial prosperity. There also have been involved in important events, some primary principle, which if carried out to its fullest extent, would cause a revolution in the aspect of affairs of no ordinary character—would strike a pulse in the national heart which had not beat before—which has been like the giving of wings to the human frame—lifting the people into a new element—giving them a new faculty, and laying open a career to whose loftiness, vastness, and splendour—the world had not seen its equal.

Thus has the future success of the TEMPERANCE Reformation been foretold, and it is rapidly approaching its consummation. When we saw the degradation into which our country was sunk, notwithstanding all her privileges, politically, morally, and religiously—when we felt as Englishmen the stigma which was cast upon our beloved Isle—when we contemplated the crime that rolled through our land as a mighty torrent—when we viewed the misery which had engulfed thousands of our fellow countrymen, and the debasement of beings formed by DEITY—and all this amount of wrong caused by the destruction of the bounties of Providence, which had been converted into a stream of liquid fire, of which tens of thousands eagerly drank, again and again, until they glided gradually into the vortex of INTEMPERANCE:—were not these circumstances which foretold some important change in the habits of the people?—surely they were.—Had its course not been stemmed—ruin must have been inevitable.—The attention of our Legislature was arrested; they enacted Laws, which they deemed in their wisdom the most suitable to counteract its influence—these, however, proved inefficient, and why? Drunkenness and the use of intoxicating liquors had been so deeply rooted by custom—it had waved its magic wand over the people for such a length of time, and weaved its meshes around their very existence—that they would rather subject themselves to the penalty of the law (which was very seldom exacted) than forego the fancied enjoyment to be derived from their use.

This having failed—what must now be done? was eagerly inquired. Some well meaning persons established a Moderation Society—this also was ineffectual—inasmuch as the commencement of Intemperance is the moderate use of alcoholic liquors—This is not too harsh a remark—there never was an inebriate, but began his career with moderately partaking of the intoxicating draught—this created an appetite, which the immoderate use could not satisfy. Now hope had apparently fled—but there was nourished and cultured in the minds of a few humble individuals—a principle, which if practiced would, they believed, answer the end which those societies above mentioned had wished to accomplish.—It was practically carried out by those few persons, it effected sobriety in their own individual cases; and then was brought to light in England the principle of Abstinence from that which caused Intemperance. Its very simplicity astonished many, rendered others suspicious and doubtful of success, and raised a strong opposition against its advocates.

But when the people found that their emancipation from Intemperance rested with themselves—then that power which had so long lain dormant was roused; their curiosity was awakened; their senses revived; their energies quickened; and they adopted the principle in the full belief of its truth,—and found it efficient in restoring them to sobriety. The result is now well known:—thousands of Drunkards have been restored to happiness and sobriety:—thousands of families from whose hearth the comforts and endearments of home had fled—have been blessed by this messenger of good—with peace, sobriety, and felicity. It has, indeed, touched a chord which had never been touched before;—that chord has vibrated through many bosoms: it has revived dormant hopes—the people have been thrown into a new element—one of calmness and quiet serenity. It has opened a career, in whose loftiness our noblest powers may soar—in whose vastness our highest intellectual capacities will have ample scope, and whose splendour we behold unclouded vision. Onward may its progress be—till its ultimatum shall be enjoyed! Then will ENGLAND be a happy nation, and her people a happy people.

TEETOTAL LABOURS.

The Rev. ROBERT TABRAHAM has recently assisted at temperance meetings, or preached on the subject, at Accrington, in the School room belonging to the Baptist Chapel, on the opening of the Temperance room; when a deeply attentive auditory listened to his earnest appeals in favour of abstinence.—At Barrowford, in the clean and spacious Temperance Hall, where an interesting assembly found the Saturday night service a preparation for the holy Sabbath.—At Huddersfield, in the Philosophical Hall, at the opening meeting of the monthly series for the winter season. Mr. Winterbottom, of Leeds joined in the service, and greatly entertained the meeting.—At Padiham, in the Odd Fellow's Hall; a large and attentive auditory.—At Bashall Eaves, a serious congregation.—At Stopper Lane, by special request, a large and well pleased congregation assembled on a short notice. And at Clietheroe, a Sermon on the Wine Question, to a large and favourably impressed assembly in the Wesleyan Chapel, and at the usual hour of service. Some good, it is believed, has resulted from these exercises.

THE DRUNKARD'S DEATH.—William Chadwick, a young man of the labouring class, who had scarcely attained his 23rd year, after a continual round of intoxication for three days, was at the Seven Stars, Dock-street, Leeds, in a state of intoxication. There he shook hands with all the company, and proceeded down Bowman-lane, towards the river Aire. In the lane he met a person to whom he said—"Here, lad, let's have a wag of thy hand. Here's my hand, and here's my heart." To another man, whom he subsequently met, he said—"Good night; I'm going to lose my soul." He then coolly proceeded to the river, and actually leaped in, and was drowned. The jury returned a verdict of felo-de-se; and the wretched suicide was interred on Tuesday night, in the Cemetery of Burmadofts. He was a married man, but he has been for four years separated from his wife.—Leeds Times.

CONFERENCE OF MINISTERS OF RELIGION.

CONVENED BY THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.

It has already been extensively announced that at the Conference of the British Association, held at Bolton in July last, it was unanimously resolved to invite all the Ministers of Religion, in the United Kingdom who abstain from intoxicating liquors, to meet in Manchester, during the month of April 1848, 1st To devise means for aiding the effort to obtain the prohibition of the Sunday Traffic; and 2nd, To adopt measures for securing the co-operation of Christians generally on behalf of the Temperance Reformation.

As the time for the meeting of this Conference approaches, the subject becomes exciting; and who will be there?—what will be done? are queries which have been pertinently put by many who, a short time ago, were sceptics to the feasibility of such a conference. It is now quite certain, if no untoward circumstance intervenes, that there will be a large assembly of ministers on the occasion, from whose deliberations, great good may be expected. The preparations for this Conference have shown that supineness and apathy are not characteristic of Ministers of the Gospel. They have discernment, benevolence, and active desires to do the greatest amount of good; but their way is not clear to them, and we may expect as a result of this assembly, that the crooked paths of many will be made straight, and teetotalism will enter into many churches, from which it has hitherto been excluded.

The preliminary arrangements for the Conference are progressing rapidly, and the committees engaged in the multifarious business, have much cause of gratification.

The steam-ship companies have kindly consented to convey Ministers from Glasgow to Liverpool and back for one fare,—to return at their own convenience. It is hoped that some of the railway companies will grant the same privilege. They are being corresponded with; and every thing possible is being done, to make the means of transit economic and comfortable. The arrangements already decided upon are as follows:—

On Sunday, April 9th, Sermons to be preached by Teetotal Ministers, in as many places of worship as can be made available. The committee are confident that a goodly number can be obtained; and that Teetotalism, as a Gospel truth, will be preached to some of the most influential congregations in the city.

On Monday evening, Temperance meetings will be held, in various parts of the city and surrounding districts. This will be a favourable opportunity of addressing professing Christians, and especially Sabbath School Teachers, upon the importance of the movement, and upon their great responsibility in training up youth in the way they should go.

On Tuesday, the 11th, the committee for arranging the business of Conference, will meet at two o'clock, p. m., when various resolutions and subjects of papers to be read, will be submitted to them. The duties of this committee are of a very onerous character; and, in order that they may perform their duties efficiently, it is desirable that resolutions intended to be proposed, subjects of papers to be read, or of propositions to be discussed, should be in the hands of the Secretaries not later than Saturday the 8th of April. Several eminent Ministers in connection with the movement, are preparing documents, which, from the acknowledged talent of the writers, there is reason to believe will prove valuable additions to our Standard Temperance Literature.

On Wednesday, the 12th, the Conference will assemble at nine o'clock in the morning, for the transaction of business. The place of meeting is yet undecided; but it will be announced sufficiently early to prevent inconvenience. To the meetings of Conference, it is proposed, that Teetotalers shall be admitted by ticket, to witness, but not to take part in the proceedings. The important character of the Conference will, no doubt, cause numbers to avail themselves of this privilege.

A great demonstration will be held in the Free Trade Hall:—a building which has become connected with the history of our country and its commerce; and is now used to promote almost every object connected with moral progress, and the best interests of mankind. As the building is popular, and will comfortably accommodate several thousands, a great gathering may be anticipated.

A soirée will be given in the Corn Exchange, on Friday 14th, the audience to be addressed by various Ministers. In connection with the public meetings, several eminent personages have been proposed to preside. They have been written to, and their replies are anxiously waited for. These are the arrangements so far as completed. Others are in progress, which, when perfected, will make this Conference one of the most interesting and important ever held.

It is evident this business will be attended with great expense, and the sympathy and co-operation of all societies and persons friendly to the great Temperance Movement, is earnestly but respectfully solicited.

VALUABLE SUGGESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES, &c.
DEAR SIR: I wish to form a fund for supplying the Literary Institutions, and Coffee Houses, &c., of London, with the Teetotal Times, and send enclosed 2s. 6d. to begin with. They could be distributed through the local societies.

March 15, 1848.

Faithfully yours,

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

A Public Meeting was held on Tuesday, Jan. 30th, 1848, in the Town Hall. J. Bourne, Esq., of Reading, presided. The Rev. Isaac Dozey, Mr. Wheeler, of Thame, and other gentlemen, addressed the meeting in a fluent and excellent manner. The Hall was crowded to excess, and at the close of the meeting 20 members were added to the Society.

Jan. 24th, 1848. A public meeting was held in the Large Assembly Room. The Room was densely crowded. Mr. A. A. Parsons was called to the chair, Mr. H. Shrimpton, one of the Secretaries of the Society, was then called on to speak. He commenced advocating the excellent principles of Total Abstinence from Intoxicating Drinks, but was much interrupted by several individuals connected with the Bacchanalian tribe. The Rev. J. W. Brown, of Pheasants Hill, proved the happy results, from facts which came under his notice, of persons adopting Teetotal principles. The chairman concluded by calling upon all, especially Christians, to help on the Temperance movement. Although the meeting was disturbed, the efforts used to spread the principles of Total Abstinence were not in vain. 27 signed the pledge. This Society was formed in Nov. 1847, by five persons only; not more than six then could be found in the town adopting the principles of Teetotalism, but we now number upwards of eighty. Onward, is our motto.

H. SHRIMPTON, Secretary.

LEWES, SUSSEX.

Mr. T. WHITTAKER has recently visited this place. He addressed the Members of the Mechanics' Institution on the subject of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and was listened to with great interest by a respectable and influential audience. He also dressed a large number of children at the same place, who were much delighted, while with simplicity he endeavoured to impress upon their minds the importance of Teetotalism. In the evening, he addressed an adult audience, treating the subject in a manner well calculated to carry conviction to the minds of all. We have seldom beheld a larger audience in the Institution, and have reason to believe that many persons in Lewes have learned much as to the principles of Temperance. A grateful mention is due of B. GODLEE, Esq., to whose zeal and liberality we are indebted for this delightful meeting.

KEIGHLEY.

Mr. J. C. BOOTH has been labouring in this neighbourhood with great success. He had visited most of the houses in the town and conversed with their occupants, who were generally candid and free of access, and many of whom, though not pledged Teetotalers, are acting on the principle. He has also visited about fifty worsted mills, Woolcombers joiners, and other workshops. The masters received him with kindness, and he entered into short discussions with the workmen. He has addressed the scholars in several week day and Sabbath schools; and has addressed 49 public meetings. 2,500 tracts have been circulated. Nearly 500 persons, male and female, have signed the pledge, besides a great number of juveniles. In many houses, where oaths and curses were formerly heard, and where hunger and misery prevailed, there are now words of kindness and praise, and comparative comfort.

At our annual festival, addressed were delivered by the Rev. J. Thompson, Wesleyan Association Minister, of Bradford, and other speakers, who excited deep interest; as did also Dr. Lees, who gave a lecture, on the accordance of teetotalism with the arrangement of nature and the Divine Law. The Hall on that occasion was filled with a very respectable audience, who listened with marked attention.

J. RHODES, SECRETARY.

HUDDERSFIELD.

A series of meetings have recently been held in the Philosophical Hall of the above town, under the directions of the Committee of the Total Abstinence Society; the Chairmen were, Messrs. J. Booth; H. Edwards; H. Burnett; the Rev. R. Skinner, and the Rev. T. Greener; each of whom delivered appropriate introductory addresses. Lectures were delivered by Mr. Hood on the rationale of the temperance movement—its character—and its claims on society. The Hall was crowded on each occasion; and if a judgment may be formed from the interest taken, and the numbers attending, it may be concluded that the temperance movement in Huddersfield is greatly influencing the public mind, and that it will eventually win a glorious victory.

SHERIFF HUTTON, YORKSHIRE.

A delightful movement towards temperance has recently been made in this place. Some of the leading Wesleyans there, had their attention solemnly called to the importance of the total abstinence principle. Mr. W. Linton, the Circuit Steward, though not at the time a teetotaler, circulated about 2,000 temperance tracts, thus preparing the minds of the people for a public meeting. Mr. Robert Gray Mason was invited to spend a few days in the place, the Wesleyan Chapel being cheerfully placed at his service. Mr. Mason preached two sermons on the Sabbath, and on the Monday and Tuesday evenings delivered two temperance lectures. The chapel was crowded to excess each night, Mr. Linton presiding on the Monday, and Mr. Dale, Surgeon, on the Tuesday. The lectures resulted in the adoption of the total abstinence pledge by no fewer than 167 persons, including the Circuit Steward, the Wesleyan Surgeon, five class leaders, four local preachers, several Sunday School teachers, and, in fact, the principal Wesleyans in the village and neighbourhood. It is hoped that the example thus set by Sheriff Hutton will be followed by the Wesleyans throughout the country. The withering influence of intoxicating liquors, not only upon the world, but upon the Christian church, calls loudly upon those who sincerely pray "Thy kingdom come!" to banish from their tables—their sideboards—their houses—their vestries—those liquids which have so lamentably prevented the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom.

KENDAL.

The second Annual Meeting of the Kendal Juvenile Temperance Society, was held in the New Street Sunday School Room. About 150 children were present, besides many adults. Mr. Robert French opened the meeting by a few remarks on the Temperance cause; after which Messrs. Richard Rawes, Andrew Low, Thomas Jackson Earl, and Edward Whittwell, Esq., addressed the meeting. During the evening, the children sang a song called "The Drunkard," composed expressly for the Society, by Mr. Hill. After the meeting, 21 signatures were obtained. There are now upwards of 800 members upon the Books, 700 of whom have firmly adhered to the pledge.

T. J. EARL, Secretary.

JERSEY.

Mrs. STAMP delivered a series of lectures on Total Abstinence, in February last, which were well attended. Two lectures were also delivered exclusively to females, at the first of which, a "Ladies' Total Abstinence Society" was formed. Mrs. Stamp has since delivered a second series. Meetings have been held on the Government works at St. Catherine's bay, in rooms lent by Messrs. Lord and Dickson, the managers, which were well attended by the "Navies" employed thereon; great attention was paid to the lectures, and their orderly behaviour was highly creditable. About 30 of them signed the pledge.

On the 21st ult., a Tea Soirée was held in the Temperance Hall, when the company was numerous, and highly respectable. The Revs. Williamson and Taplin, Admiral Giffard and Mrs. Stamp, addressed the audience.

A "Temperance Loan Tract Society," in connection with the "Ladies' Association," has also been established. Mrs. Stamp has been presented with a handsome present, as a token of respect and esteem from the subscribers, for her exertions to promote the well-being of all classes, both temporally and spiritually, during her stay in the Island.

AMERICA.

From the numerous temperance periodicals which have recently reached us, we perceive that the friends of the temperance movement have held large meetings in almost every part of the United States, at each of which very strong opinions have been expressed in reference to the licensing of the traffic in strong drinks, and strong resolutions founded thereupon, have been unanimously passed. The following, passed at a convention of nearly 600 persons assembled at Syracuse last month, may serve as a specimen of many:—

"That government fails to perform its most important functions, when it only punishes crime, without striving to prevent it—when it imposes taxes, without attempting, so far as possible, the cause of taxation—when it provides for the public support of the poor, without considering the causes of pauperism—when it seeks to educate, without removing the obstacles that oppose its efforts in almost every school district in the State.

"That we call on the Legislature for legislation, which shall, by the terms of its requirements, and by its adequate penalties, absolutely prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage."

A memorial, breathing sentiments in accordance with these resolutions, has also been presented to the Legislature of the State of New York.

A WHISPER OF TRUTH, TO THE FRIENDS OF FREEDOM.

BY D. G. PAINE.

THE stirring and momentous events, which have agitated EUROPE during the last few weeks, and made tyranny tremble in its seat, where it had long laughed in security; have, like the undulations of a storm, spread their influence beyond the theatre of their transaction, and quickened to greater energy, the political animus of other States. Hence in this country,—although happily the Genius of Freedom has leavened our institutions too extensively to allow Despotism to lift its rod,—there has been more than wonted vigour infused into the cry for further reform; and those who compose what is termed the ultra-liberal section of our political society, have raised their voices more confidently than ever, in demanding the rights of citizenship for their unrepresented countrymen.

At this crisis, therefore, we may very opportunely attempt to draw attention to the political influence of TEETOTALISM; not indeed in all its bearings, for that would court us into a field of matter much too wide for present purposes; but as it stands more immediately connected with the one question of an extended franchise.

The avowal of a political creed, at least so far as it may include points of public dispute, and which separate the great parties of the day, is very justly forbidden in the pages of a Temperance periodical; and it will be an omen for evil to the noble cause of human progress, when the neutral ground of Teetotalism, is made the tolerated arena for either Conservative or Chartist debate. I write not as a political partisan; but simply to show, that if certain principles now popular and spreading, are right, there can be no consistency,—deep, thorough, sterling consistency,—in those who hold them, so long as they sanction, or, in fact, so long as they neglect strenuously to oppose, the use of Intoxicating Liquors.

In all the applications which have been made to men in power for the grant of Electoral rights, there has been one answer. No matter whether the petition or demand has been made to a Whig or a Tory government, the response has always been of the same character. Official bluntness or suavity, may have varied the tone or style, but the burden of the practical reply has uniformly been, the moral and intellectual incapacity of the population. More urbane language than that of “swinish multitude” has been employed, but the same idea has been but ill-concealed. The claims of millions to exercise a voice in the formation of the laws by which they were to be governed, have uniformly been regarded, by the elevated and influential part of society, as preposterous; simply because of the depressed tone of intelligence, condition, and morals, among the aggregate of our working population.

Without waiting to discuss the constitutional soundness of this inference, which, whether strictly just or not, will never fail to regulate the minds of thousands, let us ascertain,—which we can by a mere glance,—the correctness of the data; and then enquire how far the drinking practices of the day tend to produce a state of things so deplorable.

To attempt to prove the existence of much external wretchedness, invested with all the signs of uncultured minds, and depraved morals; would be something like an attempt to prove the existence of the sun. It is one of the palpable realities of society: one of those facts which mock all efforts to controvert it. The ragged, dissolute and pauperised, form a heavy per centage of the population of every town. As every house which may have its parlour and drawing room, has also its coal-hole and dust-bin; so every town which may shew forth smart streets, and respectable terraces, has also nests of concentrated human filth. There are, to use a somewhat vulgar term, “the back slums,” always to be found if we look for them; places of which St. Katherine’s and St. Giles’s used to be the type, before metropolitan improvements in part annihilated them; and from these can always be evoked, at a quarter of an hour’s notice, whole troops, who on a befitting occasion will present as glorious an exhibition of the majesty of the mob, as any pseudo-patriot can possibly desire. The reports so often conveyed to the public of West-end frolics and vagaries, such as the ringing of bells, wrenching off knockers, and publicly treating degraded females, may cause a poor man to doubt the superiority of the aristocracy, either in intellect or morality; but lords and gentlemen can readily return the compliment, by declaiming against the humbler classes, on the score of their “low character” and “grovelling propensities.”

To assert a natural or primary difference of MENTAL POWER, between various sections of society, an inferiority of one class to another, is quite out of question. It was a private notion of the supporters of Slavery, that the Coloured races had not an equality of reasoning faculty with the Whites. Humanity was shocked at the thought, and experience overwhelmingly confuted it. There is even less probability of the truth of such an assertion, when applied to sections of the same race artificially separated. Various degrees of mental precocity do indeed exist; every Academy has its brilliant pupils, and stupid ones. But then, this difference flies tangent to all the rules of caste which the conventional distinctions of men have laid down; and mocks the absurdity of this idea. The Halls and Colleges of our Universities exhibit an imposing array of classic learning, and scientific truth, thronged as they are by the sons of our nobles and squires; but why should we fancy, that if Oxford and Cambridge were peopled by the sons of artisans, instead of the aristocracy, their fame would be diminished! He who has given to Man that wonderful mind, which stamps upon him the greatness of Human Nature, did not bestow superlative genius upon the nobles, and inferior excellency on their serfs. To the lords of the soil, and those who do at their bidding, and tremble at their nod, are given minds formed alike in the same matchless mould of grandeur. But with the same natural capacity, there is an evident inferiority of attainment, on the part of the lower ranks of the populace. This declaration may be distasteful to many, but it is in vain to deny it. And this fact, constituting as it does one ground for rejecting the suit of the operative classes, we propose to explain, and account for.

The explanation of a large proportion of this inferiority, is given in one word—Drunkennes. Than this, Ignorance has no mightier auxiliary to rivet its fetters; and the scholmaster no antagonist more effective. They are the children of the Drunkard, from whom are withheld the most unpretending means of instruction; These often grow up with no more instruction than the mere animal of instinct. They pick up the knowledge of certain duties and things of necessary performance, they become fishermen, or miners, or ploughmen, or something else, in much the same way that a dog becomes a skilful sheep-keeper, or rat-hunter; and, except by this process, in which mind has nothing to do, they attain no knowledge at all. Their latent faculties have never been drawn out. Reigning drunkenness, the drunkenness of their class or circle, utterly and effectually forbid it. Nor does the agency of drunkenness end here, appalling as its power would be, were it circumscribed to this mode of operation. Thousands of those whom education has reached, who have had the benefit of the preparatory stages of ordinary tuition, are caught by the fangs of this all-grasping demon; and what they learned at the school proves to be the ultimatum of all they ever attain. There is no thirsting at the well of knowledge; no panting of a quickened intellect; no glorious, ennobling aspiration for higher flights; but the highborn, priceless, immortal gift of heaven, settles down in disgraceful inactivity, and is made to accommodate itself to the sensual, disgusting cravings of the being to whom it was given as his crown of dignity; and is stupified in a flood of Drunkenness.

Nor does the influence of Drink, in fixing this feature of uncultured intellect, confine itself to the families of Drunkards only. Society seems to have been given up to strong delusion to believe a lie respecting it. And therefore the working man has deemed his BEER to be almost as needful as his food; and as its virtues have been supposed especially calculated to support in labour, so the necessity for its use has increased, in proportion as pecuniary ability has diminished. Because it will certainly hold good, as a general rule, that the harder the work, the lower the wages. Thus where there have been no vicious habits indulged, no sottish cravings gratified, there has been a constant drain upon the slender purse, in order to procure, what we know to be useless, but what they imagined, and what the world proclaimed to be, essential to support the frame. Under such circumstances, no sooner was a child old enough to secure itself from tumbling into a ditch, that it was sent to pull up weeds, scare away birds, or anything else which either factory or rural life could adapt to its puny powers. There were no school hours, and until the time when it grew up a hardy lad, or a strapping wench, there was no season when the seeds of mental improvement could be deposited in the soil.

The great bulk of the POVERTY which prevails, or at least that stark, repulsive poverty, which frowns around us, is produced by Drink. Far be it from me, to speak or write one syllable to stifle sympathy for the poor. But Truth is never unkind. Mr. Chambers, one of the metropolitan police magistrates, when examined before the Parliamentary Committee, was asked; "What effect do you find produced upon the state of society generally, by this increased habit of drinking?" He said; "First great Poverty, and the great increase of poor's rates."—Mr. Mott, contractor for the support of the poor in several large parishes near London, said, that he once investigated the causes of pauperism in the case of the paupers then under his charge; and the range of the investigation extended over 300 cases, and was conducted for some months, including also every new case which came under his knowledge; and he found, in nine cases out of ten, that the cause of pauperism was the ungovernable inclination for fermented liquors.—Mr. Chadwick, one of the Commissioners for enquiring into the operation of the old Poor law, in reply to this question; "Of all the causes that lead to Pauperism, do you think that Drink is the principal cause?" replied; "The witnesses almost universally, throughout the town parishes, represent the main cause to be, the reckless improvidence, which is chiefly manifested in excessive indulgence in Drink."—Mr. Ruell, the late Chaplain to the Prison in Cold Bath fields, when asked by the Committee whether his observation led him to believe that Poverty was the cause or effect of Drunkenness, declared it to be the former.

Now these and similar testimonies are valuable, not because they throw any additional light into the minds of thoughtful and observant men, who have never been able to doubt the fact they establish; but because the official positions which the witnesses occupy, and the peculiar opportunities they have had of forming a judgment, render all attempt at contradiction a hopeless task.

There is one thing in connection with poverty, or rather the apparent tokens of poverty, to which we will direct attention. In general, among those who live on a scale of decency and comfort all proportioned to their means, the sum paid for rent, forms an important item of expenditure; and probably, as nearly as a rule can apply, about one sixth of the income is required for this purpose. Then on this principle, every man earning four-and-twenty shillings a week, and living in a parliamentary borough, ought to be a voter. But it is notorious, that many of our best workmen, whose wages far exceed that, or would do so if they worked all the time they might, are living in miserable garrets or cellars; thus precluding themselves, by their own voluntary shifts, from that privilege, for which they, and others on their behalf, so loudly clamour. It needs no Act of Parliament, it needs no clause of a People's Charter, to confer votes by hundreds in the metropolitan boroughs; but they are swallowed down, unthought of, and then the popularity-seeking apostles of universal freedom, convene their tabern meetings; and while they tell how the arm of power withholds from their auditors their rights of citizenship, they ever and anon pause to wet their thirsty throats, with the liquor which aggravates the tyranny they so deprecate!

But there is another formidable consequence of Drunkenness which must not be overlooked,—that is CRIME. Not merely that depravity of morals, which floods a neighbourhood with social vices, and makes the homes of families so many sinks and centres of incipient and matured blackguardism. This alone would be a matter for grave concern to the advocate of popular rights; because from it, the chief arguments in support of the moral inaptitude of the people, are derived. But I am contemplating crime of a more overt character; those acts which constitute not only a breach of moral, but statute-law; those which it is the province of the magistrate to notice, and for the punishment of which the sword of civil authority is wielded. From whence spring the countless offences against person and property, which render necessary so vast a machinery of executive power as we have in constant operation? hear the answer, and remember that it is returned from sources where the information is undoubted, and the veracity unimpeached:—

Mr. Alexander Campbell, who for 32 years held the office of Sub-Sheriff of Renfrewshire, says;—"In the most ordinary class of crime, that is theft, and breaches of the peace, that come under my cognizance, my impression is, that there is scarcely more than one in a hundred that does not begin and end in dram-drinking. I am referring to commitments and trials. . . . In Paisley and Glasgow, and other large towns, I have reason to believe that not less than two-thirds of the offences arise out of absolute intoxication."

Mr. Poynder, formerly Under-Sheriff for London and Middlesex, says; "As to theft—all other habits of vice being either created or increased by drinking, (and commonly both,) and all vice being expensive, if a man has not himself the means of gratifying this and other indulgences, and is still determined to have them, he must resort to the substance of his neighbour for a supply; hence the violation of property; and numerous criminals have accordingly assured me, that drinking was the origin of that vicious course, which it afterwards kept up, until the offended law at last required its victim. As to the violent and atrocious crimes, I have as repeatedly heard these referred to the effect of drams."

Mr. Justice Wightman, at the Summer Assizes at York last year, remarked; "that the calendar was unusually heavy, both in the number of prisoners to be tried, and in the nature of the cases . . . . . the depositions showed that Public Houses and Beer Shops were the places where most of the crimes originated, and the present calendar was a terrible instance of the effects of Intemperance."

Mr. Baron,—no, stop! we shall have to quote all the judges on the bench, for almost with one voice do they bear testimony to this fact, that it is Drink which furnishes them with employment.

This truth, that Intoxicating Liquors lead to overt crime, must not pass without directing attention to one particular bearing which it has, or may have, on the question of the Elective franchise. The limitations which the supports of the Charter would assign to the suffrage, are expressed thus;—"the right of voting shall extend to every man of sane mind, who is of mature age, and unconvicted of crime." Then how vast would be the inroad made on the numerical constituency, by the agency of Intemperance! The Old Bailey Sessions, only one of several criminal courts in London, occur every six weeks; and it is by no means unusual to have three hundred prisoners there for trial. Take, if you can get it, the annual aggregate of convictions at all the assizes and sessions throughout the kingdom; deduct the female prisoners, and make due allowance for repeated arraignments or the same individuals; and you will have a result, that ought to set every advocate of universal suffrage almost mad with rage against Strong Drink. Indeed, although it may often make a man rant about patriotism in a pot-house, and storm in favour of the people's liberties, it is after all the most fearful foe to the people's rights which the march of progress has suffered to remain.

Thus we see, that the most prominent features presented by the unrepresented class of people, those features which are triumphantly and scornfully dilated on, whenever the demand is pressed for electoral rights, are to be attributed to Intoxicating Drinks, in far greater proportion than to any other assignable cause. And there is really so much that is plausible, in refusing to extend political power to those who are accessory to their own ignorance, destitution and recklessness, that such arguments will never fail to make converts of many, and stagger the ultra liberalism of more. At the present, every great demonstration which does not include the bulk of the middle class, is looked upon with suspicion; it cannot have credit given it to the amount of its worth, because it incorporates so much of what is disreputable and worthless; so much of what Drink has made the sediment and dregs of society. You may denounce the conclusion as unfair; you may tell us that your array includes the intelligence, the sobriety, the industry, the integrity, of the working classes; perhaps it does; but their might is destroyed, by the association of ideas which the habits of millions introduce. The notorious, the unquestionable degradation and turpitude, existing among the humble ranks of society, and which we see are mainly traceable to strong drinks, must, and I will even say ought, to weigh, most powerfully, in canvassing the great political questions of the age.

To ask that the Elective franchise shall be granted to the thoughtless crowds of sots, who feed every lustful passion, and quicken every vile principle, in the beer shop, the public house, or the gin palace; is like asking that a jewel may be placed in a swine's snout, or a lawful weapon in the hands of one, who will surely use it as an instrument of oppression against the common weal. Doubtless the time is coming, when throughout the civilized world, the sovereignty of the people shall be proclaimed, and the last link of feudal despotism, and the last fetter of arrogated power shall be broken: and it may be, that the cry of liberty now ringing through EUROPE, is the prelude thereof. Thrones will shake, tyranny will tremble, the crown will tumble from every monarch, who reigns otherwise than in the affections of his subjects, and every antique cord of social bondage, and every venerable maxim of unconstitutional authority, shall be flung to the winds. But if in the parturient throes of freedom, we would have revolution without convulsion; agitation without anarchy; all the blessings of common privileges, without an attendant storm and tempest of confusion and bloodshed; we must go deep into the subsoil of society. Where there are now the elements of licentiousness; where there is now nothing but a blind wish for some upheaving in the political world, without regard to the eternal principles of right; where there is an impetuous denunciation of existing institutions, resting on no defined rules of civil justice; there is little to quicken the hope of the patriot for the spread of genuine freedom; but much to alarm him, lest the sacred cause of liberty should be profaned by the ravages of a plundering mob, or the torch of a murderous incendiary. We are not yet sufficiently advanced, to relinquish the humble and laborious task of pioneering. Ignorance, and all that abet it, among which Intemperance stands supreme; open, reckless Depravity, and all that feed it, of which Intemperance is chief; Social barbarism, and all that strengthens it, in which work Intemperance is most powerful; must be met and overcome; and then, and not till then, may we justly hope, that Human Progress will near the goal of its attainable perfection, and stand forth to an admiring world, all glorious in the blaze of prosperity, plenty, and peace. And then, the time will have arrived which shall leave no wish of the best friends of man unfulfilled, except the crowning consummation of that period, when RELIGION herself shall endorse the great Charter of Human felicity, and THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE LORD SHALL COVER THE EARTH AS THE WATERS COVER THE SEA."

TOTAL ABSTINENCE SCRIPTURAL.

In support of the principle and practice of total abstinence from strong drink, he would advert, 1, to the practice of an Evangelist.—Timothy was a water drinker. When on a certain occasion his bodily frame was somewhat out of order, he was advised by Paul, according to the medical opinion of that age, to take wine; but he was only to take "a little," and that only for his "stomach's sake," and not for his palate's sake.—He would refer, 2., to the declaration of an Apostle.—"it is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." It was evident from that passage, that, for the sake of doing good to others, we were at liberty to renounce our own rights; and, further, that if by our so doing we could bring a fellow creature from the error of his ways, and attract him to the cross, we ought to do it.—Then, 3., he would refer to the command of an angel, or, rather to the command of the God of angels; speaking of John the Baptist, the heavenly messenger said, "Many shall rejoice at his birth; and he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall neither drink wine nor strong drink, and shall be filled with the Holy Ghost." Evidently therefore, no stigma was attached by the Almighty to the practice of entire abstinence. As no one would desire to be little "in the sight of the Lord," or to be a cause of sorrow "to many," let them be willing, yea, let them rejoice, to walk by the side of the Baptist.—REV. H. TOWNLEY.

A MERRY DAY.—The bones and dust of thousands lie now in the grave, that have tasted many a sweet cup and morsel, and have had many a merry, wanton day. And are they now any the better for it? In heaven they are abhorred; in hell they are turned into tormenting flames. There are gluttons, but no more good cheer; there are drunkards, but no more drink; there are fornicators, but no more lustful pleasures! Can the ungodly be merry, when their consciences tell them that they are not sure of being out of hell one hour, nor of holding out their mirth to the end of their present game?—Old tract.

HYDROPHOBIA, OR THE DREAD OF WATER.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

WE hear a great deal about MADHOUSES and LUNATIC-ASYLUMS, and we very deeply pity the poor creatures who are doomed to be the inmates of these abodes of insanity. Yet, perhaps, a little reflection would shew us that there is more madness without than within the walls of St. Luke's or Bedlam. It is almost certain that we have never seen a person of a perfectly sane mind. There are few men and women who are not occasionally mad. Indeed we may congratulate those who are only seized at the full and change of the moon. The interval of a fortnight would be a vast period to those whose lucid periods are daily, if not hourly interrupted. There are few diseases that do not, to a certain extent, influence the mind. The nerves and brain are the especial organs of thought, and as these are greatly affected by indigestion, liver affections, and all the other complaints that swell the pages of the nosologist, "a healthy soul in a healthy body" is a rare spectacle in our world. Until the inhabitants shall no more say, "I am sick," we shall in vain look for perfect mental sanity.

Were the commissioners of lunacy to investigate every case in the country, they would have more work than all the other commissioners put together. We have plenty of madness in eating and drinking; madness in clothing, sleeping and waking. Some are so frantic as to turn night into day, and day into night. Not a few, lace, bandage, or starve themselves to death. Some are mad with prodigality, and others with parsimony, and more die of plethora than of actual want. We have conjugal, filial, and parental madness. Thousands of friendships originate and are cemented by madness. We have commercial, political, literary, and religious madness. Some are mad about horses, and others about hounds; and if a law were made to shut up or muzzle mad people as well as mad dogs, we should have few persons without a chain or a respirator.

But of all forms of phrensy, that which is called HYDROPHOBIA is the most prevalent. The literal meaning of Hydrophobia is, "Dread of Water," and this may be said to be the most general and fatal disease of our day. Almost every one is afflicted with this "dread of water," and yet pure water is the only pure and perfect drink. You may make it nicer, but you cannot render it better. The virtues of WATER have never yet been told. Should some cold-water poet arise to sing its wonders, we should have Homer and Milton thrown into the shade. Two thirds of the globe are covered with water, and the whole expanse above us is a vast reservoir. Rivers, canals, seas and oceans, are the highways of commerce and of nations, and the steam-ship owes to the flood with which it is contending, the energy which enables it to bid defiance to its angry waves. The power that on our railways outstrips the wind, is borrowed from water. The zephyr owes its cooling breath to this best of nature's gifts; but for this every wind would scorch with its heat or wither with its cold. Every plant, from "the hyssop that grows on the wall to the cedar of Lebanon," is indebted for its verdancy, its vigor, its strength, and its beauty to water. Without water, the rose and the lily would fade. All the tints of an oriental paradise, or of Eden in its first estate, and all the odors with which "Araby the blest" embalms the air, are dependant upon water. They all absorb the juice of the earth, or drink the dews of heaven. The innocent forget-me-not, the modest violet, and the towering sturdy oak, pledge each other in water. The juice of the grape, the apple, the fig, the citron, the tamarind, the orange, the melon, the pome-granate, is nothing more than aromatic water, and borrows all its fluidity from this source alone. The icicle and iceberg, in reflecting the splendors of a thousand gems, and glittering with myriads of rainbows, obtain all their glory from crystalized water.

In the animal world we have the same stupendous display of the wonders of this beverage. Every animal is a water drinker. Man is the only creature that rejects this divine nectar, and how dearly he pays for his folly, let the long catalogue of diseases and premature deaths, speak. Water gives hardihood and courage to the lion; immense power to the elephant; strength to the ox and the horse; fleetness to the hare, the antelope and the stag. With water, the rein-deer braves the cold of the north, and the camel the burning sands of the south. Cheered with this beverage, the feathered tribes render the groves vocal with their melodies, and the eagles soar to meet the sun. The vast family of the Creator has never yet been numbered. Here figures would fail, and yet they all, in some form or other, live upon water. Animalculæ, insects, fishes, reptiles, beasts and birds, would die without this provision of our Father. The liquid part of the juices of every animal creature is water; the saliva, the gastric juice, the bile, the blood, the perspiration, in a word all the secretions and exertions of every body, owes its fluidity to water.

Again:—the nations most renowned for vigour, strength and courage, have been drinkers of this beverage. The children of Israel, in their best estate, drank nothing but water. When they made bricks for Pharaoh, traversed the desert with Moses, or fought under the banners of Joshua, they used this drink alone. The men that built the pyramids were teetotalers. The Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Britons, the Saracens, the Goths, the Turks, were all, in the days of their glory, drinkers of water. The first draught of intoxicating liquor they quaffed was the first step in the history of their ruin. To render the skin healthful, the blood pure, the secretions and excretions regular and perfect, the spirits buoyant, the nerves firm, and the muscles strong and vigorous, there can be no liquid equal to water.

And yet we have more than half the nation afraid of water! Of all forms of Hydrophobia, this is the most fatal. Every kind of trick is played with this exquisite drink to suit the madness of the nation. It is boiled, dashed, tintured, and compounded with all sorts of drugs, aromatics, sweets, and even poisons; or else the diseased appetites of the day would not drink it.

Here then we have HYDROPHOBIA on a large and deadly scale. It is the death, the everlasting destruction of thousands; and to cure this madness is one of the most effectual and glorious achievements of TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

WHERE SHALL WE BEGIN?

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WAYSIDE FLOWERS."

"When once the labourer seeks and loves the light, Tyrants shall dread our Albion's moral might."

THERE is a coldness that is inimical to the soul of patriotism, which falls with a death-like influence upon the vitality of any popular movement for great and universal good. There is again a fiery and wrathful disposition that mars most cruelly the very object of its fond solicitude, and thus consuming in its progress the very elements of what it professes to erect as a standard principle. But, steering between the two, let not our words be muffled or disguised; it has now become the duty of every one interested in the welfare of his country, to use every expedient in obtaining a removal of abuses in the present corrupt system of society. This is not to be accomplished by indolence, there is, for each and for all, something to do in a work of national redemption.

It is not sufficient that we contemplate with regret the continuance of evils and indolently sigh for their removal; the strength of this country must be in that truly christian and patriotic feeling, which shall be alone powerful enough to interest every individual of every rank and grade, in the public cause as if it were his own. A habit of looking on the welfare of our country, or at the general portrait of mankind with side glances and secondary considerations, afford no symptoms of the beauty of individual character, or of the rising greatness and independence of a people; on the contrary, the ruin of states, has been frequently laid, in a relaxation of the true national spirit, in defending ALL TRUTH. To the rightly constituted mind, all existing abuses, whether local or national, are sought to be corrected by peaceful means. Every negative resistance is applied for to act upon the social evil, which love dictates, in preference to physical force, and given to the world, by men who have added to the wild and exciting nature of such things, the still more maddening and enthraling influence of strong drinks. There is an expansion in the moral nature of social man, that must go forward; there is an advancing period of strength gathered from all the various developments of human perfectibility, that will, in spite of every obstacle, erect its standard of high and virtuous principles; the wise will reap the glorious fruits of its blessed harvest;—but, in every age, under every kind of government, the vicious and the dissolute must be the dark shadows, that fill up the pictorial calender of human history. The poor of this country, are, considering the vast amount of voluntary labour and otherwise to instruct them, at this moment, (when the cry is more loud than ever for an extension of the franchise) lamentably ignorant, and besotted in their long standing vices. It is true the temperance society has done eternal good in bringing them forward from their dark paths to see the light of soberness, but there is yet around them the toils of slavery, the iron bondage of their own sunken habits,—the mighty mass are yet far from cleanliness; nor can they be aroused, without persevering and strenuous exertions, to see with clear sight the filth they so delight to wallow in. When we witness the congregating together of vast numbers of the working classes to make a public demonstration for political rights,—after a sympathy for their forlorn condition, and an ardent wish is created for their emancipation from wretchedness, the thought forces its way upon us, that a great amount of their sufferings are the result of immoral conduct and self-degraded character. How often has the true patriot to sigh over the lamentable truth, that "millions rob themselves of RIGHT." Do we feel interested in a great question of national importance,—do we long for a greater equality in political privilege, that the hard toiling artisan may be heard in the nation as well as his more wealthy neighbour; how are we pained to find that those who stand forward as our opponents fight us with our own weapons; "you are aware," they cry, "that the working classes of this country are morally unfit for any extension of political privilege." Then our attention is directed to the revelations of an election,—to drunken bribery; to besotted ravings, on matters that demanded a calm and noble deportment. At present, the crippled state of our commerce, arouses the working man to listen attentively to every demagogue who makes it his duty to weave a mysterious web for all the dupes he can catch. Thus the ignorant and unwary are led into broils for which their reward is the penalty of the law. If a meeting is called for "the benefit of the working classes,"—perhaps it is in the evening, in order that those who are employed in the mills may be able to attend. Very well, so far. The hour arrives, on their way to the place of rendez-vous whole groups of them call at the tavern, to regale with the landlord, who has so often robbed them of what little comfort they might have had under existing circumstances;—few of them have read anything respecting the object of the meeting, they have an indistinct notion of labouring under grievous oppression, and after drinking deeply at the tavern, they go uproariously to the exciting subject that is unsparingly dealt out for them, (too often with misguided zeal); and no wonder that on such occasions we hear that the public peace is broken without any definite aim further than "wanton mischief, and misguided notions of destruction," and the poor victims are thrown into prison,—their wives and families are taken to the poor house, and the great cause, is as far off as ever. The events which have transpired on the Continent of Europe within the last two months, ought to lead us into a more regular and organised system of instructing the ignorant, and building up the feeble-minded. It is impossible that anything great can be accomplished for the million, without the aid of Knowledge, Truth, and Love. With these, Religion and Temperance will walk hand in hand, "Wisdom comes by the inspiration of God." In an attempt to REGENERATE; the question arises, where shall we begin? We may be told, that already the country teems with talented lecturers; that our Mechanics' Institutes are flourishing; Mutual Improvement Societies are springing up in remote villages;—the press pours forth its mighty influence upon the humblest cottager;—we have model lodging houses established for the accommodation of the destitute stranger;—we have benevolent associations for the protection of females out of place;—we have a peer of the realm instituting and promoting Ragged Schools;—we have shortened the hours of labour in factories;—we are extending our Sunday school exertions;—we are interesting ourselves for early shop closing;—we are petitioning against Sunday trading;—we are promoting the furtherance of a bill for enquiring into the health of towns;—all this, and much more is doing for the welfare of this great empire, still in the warmth of our brotherly affection, we feel desirous, that wherever there is a spiritual decay; wherever the gross and sensual herd are to be found feasting upon filthy things;—that there shall not be wanting, those who will “go out into the high-ways,” and bring them in. As one of the first landmarks of true civilization, TEMPERANCE stands like a fair angel, inviting us to the field of exertion, and it is with her assistance we must begin. There is not one of the great wants of the people that can be accomplished without this leading principle. Give them an extension of the franchise, give them more labour, and better wages; free them from taxation and give them plenty to roll in, you could not by making them rich, at the same time make them great, without the aid of Temperance! There was in ancient Rome, a pillar, called the millearium, from whom all the roads took their standard measurement. The milleary column in our progressive measurement for human happiness, must be Christianity and Temperance. Let us go steadily but perseveringly on, with a loftiness of purpose and an absence of self-love: it is by so doing that we may look forward, and confidently anticipate the arrival of a time, when every agency at our controul, will no longer be laid aside,—but when man will awake to higher aspirations, and the swarthy artisan will be in every thing a man “in the good time coming.” Then will the human family be bound in one harmonious knot of “universal brotherhood” to promote good works.”

“WHAT GOOD HAS TEETOTALISM DONE?”

This is a question often asked,—and though we can point to many, and say,—“These men were drunkards, they are now sober persons: they were. many of them, sabbath breakers and scoffers of religion, they are now to be seen in the public places of worship and anxiously enquiring,—“What can we do to be saved?”—Though we can point to many such, yet it is impossible to give a full answer to the question at the head of this paper.

If TEETOTALISM, like a mighty magician, could wave a wand, and at once give health to all who are now on the brink of the grave and gasping for their last breath;—if it could in a moment raise from the deep the ships that have gone down with their valuable cargoes, and their move valuable sailors, now buried among coral rocks, and at once cause these noble vessels to proceed on their voyages with hope and gladness:—If it could in an instant make whole the shattered limb;—restore to their right minds those who are now raving in mad-houses;—bring wealth to all those applying for parochial relief;—release the debtors—wash the blood-stain from the murderers hand;—cause peace and plenty to smile on the hearts of the heartbroken and desolate:—if Teetotalism could in a moment accomplish all this,—Who is there who would not with heart and hand join the ranks of the abstainers?—and yet, comparatively, how few we are.

To all who have not joined our army and yet ask, “What good has Teetotalism done?” we may say in the words of the old adage,—“Prevention is better than cure.”—And had it not been for “THE PLEDGE,” are we presuming too much in supposing that some, yea, that many, of our members would have been at this time in the silent grave, and gone to that grave suddenly? May we not reasonably believe that some of us would have been at this time in the madhouse?—some in the jails—some in the workhouses—some in our homes, listening to the cries of starving children, or quarreling with those who now meet us with pleasure, and love us much? and that many who are now seen in places of public worship, joining in prayer and praise to God, would have been walking in the way of the wicked, or sitting in the seat of the scorner?—May we not suppose thus much?

Reflect—answer these questions, and then ask,—“WHAT GOOD HAS TEETOTALISM DONE?”

TRUTHS FOR THE YOUNG.

Some time since, whilst visiting in a very deprived locality, I was requested by a housebreaker, and some other bad characters, to visit and pray with a companion who was represented as dying in one of the hospitals. It was evening when the request was made, and on arriving at the hospital, a few glimmering candles made, as it were, “darkness visible,” and the patients were taking their rest.

Just as I entered the ward, I heard screams and shrieks proceeding from an adjoining ward; however, I proceeded to the bedside of the dying thief I had been requested to visit, who was, at the early age of twenty, rotting to death! and died soon after. I may mention that his last end was one of the most horrible I ever witnessed: he died a victim to debauchery, and it seemed as if the power of Satan was concentrated within him. Up to the time of his death, he blasphemed and swore so appallingly, that an intention was expressed of sending him away, as his excesses destroyed the needful quietude of the place. If it was delirium, I never knew such delirium before or since, for whilst I was reading to him of what Christ has done for sinners, and praying with him during my frequent visits, he would be perfectly composed, and express his delight at the reading and the prayers; but he appeared conscious that when I went, some horrible influence overshadowed him, and I had the utmost difficulty, after remaining with him for hours, to be allowed to leave him, begging and praying of me not to go. Immediately on my leaving, the sister of the ward informed me, he would commence conduct and language such as they never witnessed before, thus he died.

On this, the occasion of my first visit to him, on reaching his bedside, the shrieks and screams to which I have alluded suddenly ceased, and the sister of the ward came to pray with me beside this dying thief’s couch. Before going on her knees, she said to me, “We have had a very shocking case, Sir, just as you entered; a poor man was brought in with delirium tremens, caused by his drunken habits; we found it necessary to strap him to a bed, where he made the noise you heard for a few minutes, and then fell back a corpse!”

Remember, my dear young readers, that a holy man of old, speaking by the Holy Ghost, declares it to be the will of the Lord that whether we eat or drink, we should do all to the glory of God. 1 Cor. x, 31; and in the observance of this rule in all you do, lays your safety. Beer, wines, and spirits are not necessary for health, how then can we, who need them not, ask the Lord’s blessing if we drink them?

V.

PERSEVERE.—The great duty of temperance men is to persevere. The genius of Temperance has smote the rock, and set a stream running which will go on irrigating, refreshing, advancing man; man here, man every where; and will never dry up, but continue to run along with the stream of time, as long as summer and winter, seed time and harvest, continue their beautiful and merciful alternations.—A. Stewart, of Philadelphia.

MR GOUGH—the celebrated Temperance advocate in America, says,—“I find, on consulting my record, that I have during the last year, spoken 240 times, besides addresses to children;—travelled 7,313 miles;—obtained 10,836 names to the pledge, besides children;—and have visited 162 cities, towns or villages.

CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIAN MINISTERS AT MANCHESTER,

TO PROMOTE THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

The arrangements connected with this important Conference were made by the Committee of the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance, in conjunction with the Committee of the Manchester Temperance Association. Mr. F. HOPWOOD, of York, and Mr. R. JONES, of Manchester, were associated in the Secretaryship of the Conference, and sent invitations to those Ministers throughout the United Kingdom who were known to take an interest in the Temperance Movement. It appears that about 200 complied with the invitation.

TUESDAY, APRIL 11.

The first meeting in connection with the conference was held in the Lecture Room of the Athernum. Such of the Ministers as had arrived in town were present, and the Rev. Walter Scott, president of Airedale Independent College, Bradford, was unanimously called to preside. The object of this preliminary meeting was to make arrangements for the proper conduct of the business of the conference. On the motion of Mr. William Morris, the Rev. William M'Kerrow and the Rev. John Gutteridge, Wesleyan Association minister, Salford, were united with Mr. Jones and Mr. Hopwood as hon. secretaries to the conference. A standing committee of nine, by whom all reports should be prepared, and by whom all resolutions to be brought before the meeting should first be sanctioned, was then appointed, consisting of the Rev. Walter Scott, of Airedale College, the Rev. Benjamin Parsons, of Ebley, the Rev. Dr. Ritchie, of Edinburgh, the Rev. Dr. Burns, of London, the Rev. Mr. Solly, of Cheltenham, the Rev. Franklin Howarth, of Eury, the Rev. Mr. Martin, of Beckmondwike, the Rev. R. Tabraham, of Clitheroe, and the Rev. Joshua Priestly of Worth. It was proposed to have two sittings each day, and that a new chairman should be appointed for each meeting. The Rev. Dr. Ritchie was appointed chairman of the first morning meeting, and the Rev. W. Scott of the first evening meeting. After the arrangement of some other matters the meeting broke up, and the committee proceeded with its business labours.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12.

The meeting opened with devotional services. The chair having been taken by the Rev. Dr. RITCHIE according to previous arrangement, a letter in favour of the movement from the Rev. W. Jay, of Bath, was read, and Mr. HOPWOOD said that he had received 350 letters in all—all of a cheering character; and he was glad to inform the meeting that it was now quite certain the number of ministers, who were total abstainers, throughout the kingdom, was much greater than was anticipated. He himself had received the names of 1,200 such, and he was led to believe, from subsequent information, that in Great Britain and Wales there were nearly 2,000 abstaining ministers. He wished to state these facts, knowing that they would be very cheering to the gentlemen present. Mr. Jay's letter was in the following terms:—

Bath, Percy Place, April 7th, 1848.

To the Secretary of the Manchester Temperance Meeting, to be holden April 12.

Dear Sir,—I herewith transmit a five pound note, to be applied towards discharging any expenses arising from your convocation, but from attending it I must be excused; my engagements and age forbid much journeying.

I am within a month of seventy-eight. Fifty-seven of these years I have been pastor in this place, where (though now I have received assistance) I have had hitherto all the duty of the relation to perform alone (as well as extra services abroad), and my labours continue acceptable, and I hope useful. One reason why I mention this, is, because I owe much to the cause which you are pleading. I was a teetotaler before your institution commenced, and have perseveringly adhered to the practice, with few and slight exceptions, and these of a medicinal recommendation, always submitted to with only a half conviction, but resigned with a full one.

I sincerely lament that many of my ministerial brethren, in our several denominations, feel so little interest in this subject, especially as they know, or easily may know,—

First: the immensity of evil of every kind arising from the use of these liquors, and counteracting every means of doing good.

Secondly: That the entire abstraction alone can preserve the mass from the malady and the curse.

Thirdly: That their own example would have an extensive and powerful influence, in their moral admonitions, to sway others, and that influence is a talent for which we are responsible.

Fourthly: That self-denial, for the sake of usefulness, is a species of benevolence the most noble, heroic, and Christian, enforced by him who said, "If eating meat will make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth;" and, above all, by Him who "pleased not Himself, but, when rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might be rich." What! cannot we watch with him one hour?

Fifthly: That though we cannot, and do not, deem this practice a substitute for religion, it amazingly promotes the temporal welfare of man, personally and socially. And, as to religion, it is a preparation for it, and aids it in numberless ways, which must be obvious to every reflecting mind. I have not time to enlarge.—In haste, and wishing you encouragement and success, believe me, dear sir, respectfully yours,
WILLIAM JAY.

The reading of this letter drew forth strong expressions of satisfaction and delight.

The CHAIRMAN then expressed his pleasure in the holding of such a meeting. It would have the effect, he believed, of wiping away the stigma which had attached to the cause of total abstinence on both sides of the Tweed. His heart was and had been in this cause for many a year.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT, of Airedale College, moved the first resolution, and made a few observations in support of it. He knew the conference did not want any information from him on the subject of total abstinence. It was the happiness of many of them that they did not know from experience the miseries of the drinking system. His own habit had been just to take such a quantity as he thought was useful to him. He had now, however, for ten years been a total abstainer, and consequently had the means of comparing his experience previous to and since his giving up the use of intoxicating drinks, and it was his decided opinion that he had never derived any advantage whatever from their moderate use. In many instances he believed their use had been positively injurious to him. Their use might be considered perhaps somewhat cheering when a man was entertaining a friend; but there always came after that sinking and depression, which more than counterbalanced any previous advantage or temporary elevation of spirits. As regarded bodily health and mental power, he would say, from experience, that the moderate use of alcoholic drinks was not beneficial, but otherwise. He was quite agreed in the opinion he had heard expressed by the chairman, that it would be less injurious to a man to be thoroughly intoxicated once a month and a total abstainer for the remainder, than to be every day, to a certain extent, partaking of intoxicating liquors. The speaker then referred to the alienation and declension from religion which the system of indulging in intoxicating drinks produced in many who had had a religious education. No practice was more degrading to human nature, and introduced more moral degradation and misery into society, than that to which the use of intoxicating liquors had given rise. It was the fruitful source of murder, robbery, impurity, and violence, in all its forms. It had been calculated that nine-tenths of the crimes which debase society had been owing to this practice. Three-fourths of the prostitution, and the same proportion of the insanity of the country, were owing to the same cause. These facts called on all the friends of humanity to make efforts for the extinction of the evil. Drunkenness had well been described as the putting of an enemy into one's mouth to steal away the brains. It deprived man of the reason which placed him above the animal creation, deprived him of those rational faculties which enabled man to soar to heaven, and to rise to the view of the glories of the Divine Being, and so made the knowledge of his character bear an influence on the heart. It reduced men to the state of idiots and demoniaes, every glass helping to drag the victim into the hands of his enemies; and when the victory over him was complete, he was robbed of his character, his property, and his peace of conscience; and, unless the grace of God interfered in his behalf, robbed also of his eternal happiness. In every sense the system was one of the greatest enemies of human nature. Dr. Scott moved, "That the mischiefs and the miseries arising from the use of intoxicating liquors are of such appalling magnitude, as to call for all the efforts of the friends of humanity for their extinction."—Mr. HARRIS seconded the motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN PARSONS, of Ebley, agreed with the proposal of the conference affirming a few useful propositions such as this which had just been moved. The business committee, he begged to say, were anxious that any of the brethren present might have an opportunity of speaking to such motions, and had not on that account appointed any seconders of the resolutions.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT MARTIN, of Heckmondwike, said, the longer he was a teetotaler the more he approved of the principle, and the more he was convinced of the truth of the practice. He cordially supported the resolution put into his hand to propose, as it embraced a sentiment which had always been a great favourite with him. It was, "That science has now demonstrated that intoxicating liquors are not only unnecessary for persons in a state of health, but also contain properties which are essentially injurious to the human system." It was desirable to know what these drinks were when they were rightly made. When made without the rascality which too often belonged to them, ardent spirits were but a mixture of water and poison; so was wine, and the different kinds of fermented liquors. He never had any conviction that these drinks had been beneficial to him; and since he became a teetotaler he was convinced that he was best when he had taken least of them. He was certain of one thing, that he was now free from the headaches which previously accompanied their use. These articles were generally of the most noxious and abominable kind, which, if people only knew, they would keep for ever out of their mouths for the sake of their health. It was a matter yet to be accomplished by scientific men, viz. a complete statement of the substances, liquid and solid, which best agreed with the elements and action of the human system. He believed that when the people of England looked intelligently into this matter, spirituous liquors would stand a very poor chance indeed. He denied that they were part of bounties either of providence or of God. He could not insult providence by entertaining such a thought. A hundred millions a year were spent on these liquors in this country. Were they worth all that sum? He did not estimate them at the worth of a hundred pence. He was glad that medical science had demonstrated them not to be necessary. That was enough for him, and the sooner that human beings abandoned their use the better.

Mr. SHREWSBURY, Wesleyan Minister, seconded the motion. They were all convinced that there was nothing in intoxicating liquors which was useful, but, on the contrary, positively injurious. One passage of scripture had been brought to bear to prove the usefulness of these drinks. That was the passage describing the treatment of the man who fell amongst thieves by the good Samaritan, who gave him wine. An excellent illustration, however, he had once heard of the meaning of that passage, by a sea captain, at a meeting in Bradford. The captain was describing the mode he had seen adopted in some parts of Spain to heal wounds, which was nothing else than the application externally of a mixture of wine and oil. This practice may have been the same as that described in the New Testament, and may have been handed down to the countries where it is still adopted from these remote times.

Mr. MATHEWS, of Boston, hoped the conference was not committed to every sentiment uttered by all the speakers. He felt constrained to object to the language of Mr. Martin, as to intoxicating drinks not being a creature of God.

The CHAIRMAN said the conference, as such, would only be committed by the resolutions and declarations it put forth. The members of conference spoke their individual sentiments, for which they alone were responsible.

Dr. BURNS said they could not suppose that any member was precluded from contradicting any sentiments uttered by another member with which they did not agree.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. HENRY SOLLY, of Cheltenham, moved the next resolution:—"That entire and universal abstinence from intoxicating liquors is proved to be, in the opinion of this conference, the only effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance, and that this conference believes it to be incumbent on Christian professors, not only to give up the personal use of them, but also to employ all legitimate means to effect their universal abandonment."—This resolution was very important and went at once to answer the unjust and unmeaning cry of infidelity which had been urged against their principle. It was, he thought, the duty of the conference to lay down the grounds on which they felt bound to advocate this cause, and the principles which they believed to be the highest and the strongest; and while they eschewed anything like bigotry and intolerance, they were bound to take up this principle and to act upon it. The Christian should take his place on this, as on all practical matters of reformation, and might they not therefore clearly and explicitly lay down, as Christian professors, this principle, that they felt themselves bound not only to abandon the use of these drinks, but also to dissuade others from the use of them? They were there brought together on the common ground of love to God, and obedience to the Saviour. They felt that though they differed on some points and some subjects, they could unite on this question with much good. As Christian men, whose religion was founded on a sacrifice, they thought that they could put this question before men on the ground of self-sacrifice, and tell the world that, in so putting it, they were simply carrying out the soul and spirit of the Christian religion. If the practice of using intoxicating drinks was injurious and dangerous to individual members of the Christian church, it of course would be injurious to the church at large. What they needed to do was, to show to men that far more blessed and happier associations could be gathered around the practice of total abstinence, than were believed to be connected with the drinking system. In this case as in all others, self-sacrifice led to self-blessedness; and they could show that here the sacrifice was one that promoted the individual happiness of those who adopted the principle.

Mr. F. SKINNER, of Blackburn, rejoiced in being one of the ministers present to promote this good cause. If they could convince the Christian public that Christian ministers generally were in favour of the principle of total abstinence, its progress would be much more rapid than it had been. When he looked on some of those present who had long practised total abstinence, and when he pointed to the chairman, and thought of what he had done in the cause in connection with other societies, it only showed him what an individual was able to do. The language of the resolution was very strong, but it was just what should come from the conference. Entire and total abstinence was the only remedy. All other remedies had been found to be totally ineffectual. He was not going to say that total abstinence should be put in the room of the gospel, but he did say that it was the means of opening the minds of many to listen to the Gospel, who would not otherwise have been brought to a knowledge of it. He related a remarkable instance of this in his own experience. It was seventeen years since he had abandoned the use of spirituous liquors.

Mr. HUGH BURN, of Burslem, read a paper which he had drawn up. Its argument went to rebut the charge of infidelity made at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance. The quaintness of the style of reasoning gave rise to no little laughter in the conference.

Mr. P. BUCHAN, of Holme, justified the interference of the Christian church in this matter, on the principle that it had been induced to interfere in behalf of the slave for the breaking of his bonds. They had in the victims of this vicious system a worse kind of slaves, and it was their duty to bring the influence of the gospel to bear upon their fellow-men lying under this bondage.

Mr. W. PATTERSON, of Liverpool, advocated the conducting of this movement on Christian principles, as the most likely to lead to success. He most cordially approved of the system and would carry it out wherever he went.

The proposition was carried by acclamation.

Mr. R. TABRAHAM, of Clitheroe, moved the next proposition. Thirty-three years ago he became the advocate of total abstinence in a certain way, and for the last twenty years of his life he had been a complete total abstainer, and had advocated the principle from the pulpit and the platform. The movement would still have the benefit of his advocacy, such as it was, but he rejoiced that it had now the benefit of the services of abler and better men than himself. The resolution was, "That the use of any kind of intoxicating drink, in business, or in social intercourse, but especially at marriages, births, baptisms, and funerals, and at ordinations, and all other meetings of ministers, is a great evil, which has, in multitudes of cases, ensnared the unsuspecting, encouraged dishonest bargains, desecrated and embittered the most endearing relationships and solemn events, and exposed even sacred acts to reproach as well as suspicion, and, therefore, should be religiously avoided by all."—It was a very common practice in his part of the country for parties at auctions to be provided with abundance of drink, by which many were entrapped into giving a much larger price for articles than they were really worth. He had heard of such cases where the excess of price paid by one purchaser would clear the whole expense of the liquor and refreshments. He hoped they would go forth from this conference with renewed zeal in the cause to which they professed to adhere.

Mr. FRANKLIN, of Coventry, said that both he and his wife had for many years been long pledged teetotalers, and although in the 76th year of his age and the 50th of his ministry, he was able to preach three times every Sunday, and take his week day amount of labour in the villages in his neighbourhood. Intoxicating drink might gratify the taste for a short time, but in a few minutes the somniferous, or, to use a more vulgar phrase, the "muddling" effect was produced which disabled from all active exertion. He had been subject sometimes to extreme depression of spirits, even to a state approaching to insanity, and when in this state he was visited by horrible imaginations, and during his sleep to dreadful dreams. He had tried the abandonment of the moderate use of fermented liquors as a means of escape from these torments, and the result was an entire absence of these unpleasant sensations, and old as he was he never felt excessively fatigued. He was even in better spirits than ever, and last Lord's Day he was able to preach three times. They had 800 pledged teetotalers in Coventry, and their meetings were attended by large audiences. These cheerful meetings were sometimes aided by Mr. Octavius Winslow and Dr. Marsh; and at a late ordination dinner at which he was present, no liquid was introduced except cold water. He stated his own experience to be, that the worst persons to deal with on the question of total abstinence were ministers. The members, too, of churches screened themselves in this matter under the example of their ministers. His experience enabled him to say, that nine out of every ten exclusions from their churches was owing to their drinking customs. The influence of the Christian ministry in this respect was next in power and value to the gospel.

Mr. W. ROAF, of Wigan, seconded the resolution, and said the meeting would be happy to know that in Canada, in the Independent denomination, there were neither ministers nor students, in either of the provinces, who were not total abstainers. This news had appeared to him, when he first heard it, to be too good to be true, but his brother, who was superintendent of the mission, had since assured him that such was the fact, that there was not a single minister nor student who had not joined the total abstinence cause. This news was most pleasant. He concluded by relating an instance of the effects of giving way to the family customs referred to in the resolution.

Mr. M. ELLIS, a minister from America, said he had lived 23 years in the United States, and during that time he had seen not a few laid under the clods of the valley; but at none of the hundreds of funerals he had been present did he ever see any intoxicating liquors introduced.

Dr. JABEZ BURNS said that this was a most important resolution, as it had reference to ministerial practices. They felt the time had come when the system must be rebuked. He reminded the conference that many ministers were subjected to much persecution in connection with this thing. He gave an instance in which an ordination service was blazoned forth in the newspapers, with full particulars as to the wines at the dinner being furnished by Mr. So and So. What was the result in that case? In less than two years the minister and the deacon (the latter the person who furnished the wines) were both miserable apostates. He trusted that every brother, whether at evangelical alliances, missionary, or ordination services or meetings, would be prepared to deliver his soul on such occasions, and feel it his solemn duty in the presence of God to insist that intoxicating liquors should be banished from such places. How could they expect the presence of the Holy Spirit in such circumstances as they sometimes had heard of in connection with meetings of this description? He sincerely trusted that they would go from this conference with strength and courage to act in this matter for the cause of Christ, and for the sake of a perishing world.

Mr. A. S. MUIR, of Paisley, mentioned that in addition to the congregational ministers of Canada, as stated by Mr. Roaf, a large number of the Free church ministers in the colony had given in their adherence to the cause of total abstinence. Dr. Burns now in Canada had, since he left Scotland, himself signed the pledge, and when he (the speaker) went to Canada, as he expected soon to do, he would carry with him the sympathies of this meeting towards those who had adhered to the principle. The new world seemed in this respect to be giving a pattern and example to the old.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT mentioned two instances of ministers having been compelled to sign the pledge, in self-defence, by which means they saved their congregations from the ruin which was threatening them.

Mr. G. B. SCOTT, of Shelley, hoped the young ministers would be able to act on this principle in the time to come, in the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. J. STEADMAN, Stirling, said that of the 500 ministers of the United Presbyterian Church to which he belonged, 100 were pledged total abstinence men; and of the eldership, it was understood there were 600 pledged in connection with one society. There were no doubt others pledged in connection with other societies.

Mr. J. TOWNEND, Rochdale, rejoiced that the question of ministerial duty in this matter had been so distinctly brought before them. The necessity for it he too well knew.

Mr. A. HANNAY, Dundee, said they must all feel the subject was a delicate one, and he felt that the allusions to those ministerial brethren who did not agree with them was somewhat too broad. It might have the effect of raising up against themselves an amount of angry feeling which would do the cause more injury than good.

The CHAIRMAN said, that Mr. Hannay should remember that the public knew these things as well as they. They were no secret, and he (the chairman) felt the time was come when he, for one, would shake off the responsibility for the existence of the present state of things.

Mr. JACOB, Swansea, spoke of the encouraging aspect of public opinion in his district, which had been so strong that almost all the ministers had joined the movement.

The resolution passed unanimously.

Mr. BENJAMIN PARSONS, of Ebley, moved to the following effect:—"That the gift and use of these intoxicating drinks at the elections of parochial, municipal, and other officers, and especially at the elections of members of parliament, is calculated to demoralize the British public and to destroy patriotism; to encourage the traffic, and to rivet the fetters, of the licensing system, and to continue the bondage of the nation to those dangerous beverages, and therefore, it is a solemn duty of all to shun these public evils."—The speaker said that elections were generally exciting occasions, and if ever they were to be conducted properly, Christian men must take a greater part in them than they had done hitherto. There was no reason why professing Christians should not come forward, and throw moral and religious influence into all public meetings and concerns. The resolution referred to the demoralisation by elections, and the drinking they encouraged. He begged to say that, as far as he had seen, demoralization had not been confined to the masses of the people. He had seen more of it among the higher classes on these occasions than among the lower classes, and that entirely from the use of intoxicating drinks. He had seen ministers demoralised, and members of churches, and they would never put an end to such scenes until they had put an end to the drinking system. Only think of the numbers of votes bought by the strong drink! The time had come when they must not be squeamish on this subject. The faults of professing Christians in this matter were much greater than those of persons who did not know so much, and were not so well able to discern between the good and the evil. The patriotism of the country was fast being undermined by the use of intoxicating liquors. Let them only think of having their elections conducted on total abstinence principles.

Mr. F. HOWARTH, Bury, seconded the resolution. He said the man was the best patriot who promoted the virtue of the people. By that they would best cherish the principle of patriotism. The security of a country was not in the amount of its army and navy armaments, but in the dignity, the moral virtue, and sobriety of its people. If they looked into the state of any religious institution, they would find how much intemperance was doing to undermine their prosperity. Britain was the most drunken nation on the face of the earth, and this unenviable notoriety was maintained solely by the drinking usages of the country. It brought great pain to his mind to notice how important questions were often treated in the House of Commons; the laughter and the ridicule on the most serious matters was truly painful. But what could they expect if the House of Commons were the representative of the beer barrel? He believed that house would always be the representative of the general average intelligence and morality of the country, and that to raise its character, the character and morals of the people must first be raised. Mr. Howarth then detailed the circumstances connected with Mr. Lawrence Heyworth's being a candidate for Stafford at the last election. He knew his success was certain, if, as his friends told him, he would only consent to treat the electors in the public-houses, as had been the regular custom at elections there. He asked time to think over the matter; his son came upon him in his time of thoughtful reflection, and urged him in the most pressing way to give his sanction to the required condition; but Mr. Heyworth, who had prayerfully thought of the subject, continued firm, and replied to his son's entreaties, "I have thought over the subject deeply and prayerfully, and I have come to the determination that I cannot, and will not sanction the giving of anything." His committee then told him his election was lost, Mr. Heyworth ordered his carriage and left the town. Mr. Heyworth had since confessed to him

(the speaker) that of all the experiences of conscience in the whole course of his life, he had never experienced a better and a sweeter state of feeling than he did at that moment. He (Mr. Howarth) was sorry to have to say that teetotallers did not scruple at election times to fall into this custom of giving voters drink. It was their duty to urge on their congregations at such seasons the solemn duty of giving no sanction to such doings.

Mr. T. W. MATHEWS stated how he had struggled to introduce temperance customs into the local bodies of Boston, particularly the board of guardians. At the last general election too they had conducted their canvass of the liberal members on the same principle much to the gratification of the liberal member returned.

The resolution was carried.

Dr. BURNS moved "That the recent declaration by the six hundred medical men against the use of intoxicating liquors, should guard the medical profession against the dangerous and too common practice of advising its use, especially to ministers and others whose exhausting duties may generally overtax their physical powers." Dr. Burns said that they owed this declaration to John Dunlop, Esq., the founder of the temperance movement in this country, who was still labouring in this field.

The motion, after some remarks, was carried by acclamation, and the forenoon sederunt was brought to a close.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

The Rev. WALTER SCOTT presided, and at length urged the importance of the temperance movement. He had joined the cause from religious motives and for religious objects.

Mr. H. SOLLY, of Cheltenham, read an address to members of parliament on the subjects of the Sunday traffic in intoxicating liquors. It referred to the state of the people from the degrading practice of allowing Sunday drinking on the latter part of that day. The prohibition of that traffic was urged as only an extended application of the principle already acted on by parliament, and also on the ground that as all other classes of traders were prohibited from Sunday trading, there could be no objection, on the ground of injustice, to apply the principle to the publican. The testimony of judges, police officers, and newspaper conductors, was appealed to as proving that a larger proportion of crime was committed on Sunday, from the opening of public-houses, than during any other day of the week. In the metropolitan districts, by the enactment of a more stringent law prohibiting Sunday morning drinking, the evidence of parliamentary papers went to show an immense reduction in the convictions for drunkenness, clearly proving that an increased stringency would tend further to the raising of the character of the population.

Mr. W. J. SHREWSBURY moved the address, to which was added an approval of the efforts of the committee of the British Association to obtain the prohibition of Sunday trading in intoxicating liquors; and pledging the conference to promote congregational petitions during the present session, and declaring their resolution to send the address to all members of parliament, in order to the furthering of the great object in view. Mr. Shrewsbury said they maintained that no special reasons existed for the privilege of the publicans, why they should have, more than other traders, a privilege to conduct their business on the day of rest. If the conference succeeded in impressing this view, they would do much to promote that righteousness which exalteth a nation.

Mr. D. DAVIDS, of Swansea, seconded the motion. He said the conference should be very careful as to what they asked parliament to do. They had all their objections to parliament legislating in matters of morals; and he only consented to go to parliament on this question, because a premium was given to this particular trade, for the detriment of the morals of the public, which was denied to all other traders whatever. The publican had more liberty, and more privilege than other classes of traders; but there were circumstances for that state of things, for which he accounted by several things which he had seen going on in his own part of the country. The practice of having the public room of an inn for a place for preaching in, was one of the prominent causes he referred to, and through it, he assured them, cases of drunkenness had been brought into their churches and among their ministers. He said the trade of the publican was an infamous one. He said so of the trade, not of the persons engaged in it. Their war was with things, not with individuals. It was full time to call things by their names, and he said this with all the emphasis he could give it.

Mr. J. STEADMAN wished to know what were the sanctions which government extended to the publicans to sell on the Sabbath. Was there any compulsion on the publicans to sell on the Sabbath day?

Mr. W. M'KERRON said they all knew that the law prohibited the opening of places of business. With regard to the publicans, they had a law which allowed them to open on that day which was not given to others.

Mr. STEADMAN replied that the thing wanted by the conference was, then, not so much a withdrawal of countenance as an extension of compulsion, so as to include the publicans as well as other traders.

Dr. RITCHIE related the case, that in Edinburgh more drinking was brought before the magistrates on a Monday morning than during any other day in the week; and the publicans said that if they could not sell on the Lord's day they might as well not be open at all, because they made more than on all the other days of the week put together. His views were clear in favour of the address, and the object it sought to attain.

The CHAIRMAN saw Mr. Steadman's difficulty, that it was against the legislating in regard to religion. He sympathised with that, and hoped the address would put the matter of prohibition more on social than religious grounds.

Mr. W. LINDSAY, of Perth, said the removal of the prohibition of the publican selling at particular hours would place him on the same footing as any other trade; he would be then amenable to the ordinary law the same as all other kinds of business. It was the one prohibition against selling at particular hours at night and morning, which created the privilege to sell on the Sabbath; and if the prohibition were withdrawn, the privilege would cease at once.

After remarks by the Rev. Dr. Burn, and Mr. Morris, of Morley, Mr. Guthrie, of Kendal, and others, Mr. M'KERRON, to settle the question, moved that the address should be sent to a committee to revise it and bring it up at a future sitting. This was ultimately agreed to, no action to follow on the subject unless the members could agree, the Rev. Mr. Bardsley, of Burnley and the Rev. Mr. Morgan, of Bradford, members of the Established Church, being named on it.—Mr. BARDSLEY said that, while he would not object to anything forming part of the report which interfered with the scruples of dissenters in regard to legislation on religious matters, he would equally object to anything in it in regard to the Sabbath which directly militated against his views and those of the church on that question.

The proposal having been agreed to, the meeting was adjourned.

THURSDAY.

The morning sitting was opened at the usual hour (nine o'clock); the Rev. W. J. SHREWSBURY, of Retford presiding.

MINISTERIAL TOTAL ABSTINENCE CERTIFICATE.

The business committee brought up a draft of a ministerial certificate to be sent out in the same way, and to much the same effect as the medical certificate lately issued. The certificate was read by Dr. Burns, and the terms of it gave rise to considerable discussion, particularly in reference to the question of Sabbath profanation, in which Dr. Ritchie, Mr. Steadman, Mr. M'Kerrow, Mr. Buchan, Dr. Burns, and others, took part. Dr. Burns agreed to the addition of certain words having reference to the Sabbath in the body of the certificate, and the motion having been put with this proviso from the chair, was carried by a large majority.

ADDRESS ON TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

Dr. BURNS then read the address to the ministers of the United Kingdom. It is an ably-written and powerfully argumentative statement of the evils it deploras and the benefit to society, morally, socially, educationally, and religiously, that would result from the banishment of the drinking customs of the country.

The Rev. Mr. BARDSLEY, of Burnley, said it was an admirable document, and his duty in moving it was simple. There was nothing in it that could cause discussion, and he believed that it would be revised, and its wording altered in a few points, which would give it the character of a document issuing from the Christian church generally, and addressed to the Christian church generally. He wished the conference to avoid all subjects on which useless discussion might be introduced. He came there determined to sacrifice every personal feeling and to yield on all points of difference not involving his own convictions of truth; and he believed they could discuss the important bearings of this question without reference to any matters now much discussed out of doors. He considered the total abstinence cause second to none in the kingdom,—not even to the Sunday-school education of the young, and he rejoiced to think that the moral results of this conference would be permanently visible in the advancement of the cause of temperance. He cordially moved the adoption of the address moved by Dr. Burns.

Mr. G. LAMB, of Hull, in seconding the motion, gave several particulars of his course in advocating the total abstinence cause.

Mr. Bolton, Dr. Ritchie, Mr. Solly, and others made some remarks on the wording of the paper, which was at length carried unanimously.

Dr. RITCHIE then moved a resolution in favour of congregational societies. The motion recommended their institution in all religious societies wherever practicable. If these societies were good for the grown up, they were also good for the young. The young of a congregation the minister regarded as the hope of his flock, and it was his duty to instil right principles and habits into the minds of the children under him, as well as that they should be educated in the knowledge of the Bible. The Sunday school was a creation to supply the want of family religious education by the parents, and on the same principle total abstinence might be immensely beneficial. If such a united movement on the part of ministers of congregations were tried it would do good; if it were not a simultaneous effort, the benefit would not be one to recommend. It would be powerless for the object sought, and might introduce jealousies, and be prejudicial in certain instances, for reasons they could all comprehend.

Mr. M'KERRON seconded the motion. His own congregation had had a total abstinence society for five years he having been from the first convinced that religious influence should be brought to bear on the temperance movement, if any good was to be done, and that a congregational influence should be brought into action for the benefit of those who were the objects of the society's anxiety. He related the circumstances under which his congregational society was brought into existence: not only the young men in his congregation, but a large proportion of the entire number under his ministry, had most zealously identified themselves with the cause. 175 adult members of the congregation had joined, and were now members of the society. The Juvenile and Sunday School Society, afterwards formed, had now 350 members. Their chapel was situated in a working class district of the town, and they had pledged no less than 1,100 working people in the neighbourhood, who were perhaps not all staunch to the cause, but their branch society numbered 500 pledged members, all consistent total abstainers of the working classes. A second branch society had now 200 members, which made the entire number of members 1,225 connected with their congregational society. This society was doing much good morally, socially, and religiously, and he rejoiced that many had been drawn from the vortex of degradation and ruin by its means. The formation of such societies put aside the charge of infidelity which had very uncharitably been brought against them. He gave these details as the result of his experience to show them what could be done by a united effort in the direction the motive indicated.

Mr. R. SLATE, of Preston, had established a similar society in his congregation; and although he could not speak of results such as those Mr M'Kerrow had given, he was happy to think that it promised the best results. The young were particularly zealous in joining the society, and their example must have a happy effect on the parents. To be efficient, such societies, must be superintended actively by the minister of the congregation.

Mr. W. LEA, of Newcastle, gave similar instances of successful total abstinence societies in connection with congregations and Sunday schools in the circuits in which he was now located. The young men and children were the strength of these societies; the difficulties in the way had, as far as he is concerned, been easily surmounted.

Mr. B. SHIMWELL, of Monkwearmouth, said that a society in connection with his congregation had been the means of restoring the most abandoned and notorious drunkards in the district. So many of these had joined the congregation, and such other additions had been made, mainly through the efforts of that society, that the place was far too small for the accommodation of those who attended.

Dr. BURNS gave similar testimony in regard to the society in connection with his own congregation. He urged these societies, in order to blot out the blemish which had hitherto attached to total abstinence societies, and the objectionable mode of advocating the cause, which had kept many right-minded persons from heartily joining in the temperance movement.

Mr. J. TOWERS took the same view, on the ground that every congregation ought to be the promoter of every good work. The Total Abstinence Congregational Society would be a "safety" society, to which they could invite the objects of their benevolent effort.

Mr. STEADMAN and Mr. TABRAHAM supported the motion—the latter, as a Wesleyan minister, stating his belief that there was no difficulty in his denomination to prevent their formation.

Mr. BARDSLEY gave the result of his experience in Burnley. For some years he had been divorced from the society, because of the injurious and reckless advocacy of certain parties, members of the society; but he had been compelled by the degradation in which several of the scholars in his Sunday schools had fallen through drinking, to come out, about two years ago, and with the consent of his incumbent, to form a Church Congregational Society, which had been the means of preserving many young men, scholars, from falling into a condition of degradation and intemperance. They had remained firm to church-going habits, and this he attributed solely to the formation of the society. Other five societies of the same kind had been formed in the town, as the result of his example.

Mr. W. HODGSON, of Colne, also a member of the Established Church, gave some cheering accounts of the progress of similar societies in his neighbourhood.

Mr. MATHEWS, of Boston, and the chairman, made a few remarks, and the motion was put to the vote, and carried unanimously.

Mr. TABRAHAM then read the address to Sunday school teachers, which he had himself drawn up, after which the forenoon sitting was brought to a close.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

Dr. BURNS was in the chair, and took occasion to correct a mistake which evidently existed as to the Evangelical Alliance. Reference had been made oftentimes during the sittings of the conference to the fact, that the total abstinence movement had been supposed to be connected with infidelity, and that charges to that effect had come from high authority. Particular reference had been made to the meeting of the alliance held in Edinburgh last June. He was present, and heard all that occurred. At previous meetings of the alliance it had been arranged that certain important topics should be taken into consideration by the committees in Scotland, in the North of England, and in London. The committee in Scotland was to engage and employ itself in obtaining information upon the subject of infidelity. Mr. Bickersteth was deputed to get all the information he could upon this subject, and at that meeting read his report. It went on to say that he thought it desirable to obtain all the information he could on the connection of infidelity with the literature and sciences of the day, and also with reference to its connection with benevolent institutions and teetotalism. As soon as Mr. Bickersteth had finished his report, he (the chairman) expressed himself as exceedingly anxious that teetotalism should not appear upon the report. Mr. Bickersteth's school room was open to teetotal lectures; he (the chairman) had lectured there himself, and moreover, a practical teetotaler and subscriber to the temperance society, and, on his (the chairman's) recommendation, Mr. Bickersteth at once agreed to the suggestion. But that was how the impression had got abroad, and it had been suggested to him that it was necessary to disabuse the minds of those who certainly entertained some misconception upon the subject.

The discussion upon the essay read in the meeting then commenced. Mr. M'Dowall, Mr. Shrewsbury, Mr. Watson, Mr. Steadman, Mr. B. Parsons (Ebley), Mr. D. Davis (Swansea), Mr. H. Burn, Mr. Francis Bishop (Liverpool), took part in it, and ultimately a resolution was come to that the address should be adopted, printed, and circulated throughout the kingdom.

It was then proposed by the chairman that the brethren individually should state the progress of the teetotal movement in their own immediate localities, and it was agreed that five minutes only should be allowed to each speaker. The suggestion was at once acted upon, and much gratifying and valuable information was communicated by Mr. Winterbottom, Barton-upon-Hull; Mr. Robert Parks, Leicester; Mr. Lindsay, Perth; Mr. Harley, Whitby; Mr. Guthrie, Kent; Mr. Scott, Glasgow; Mr. Howarth, Bury; Mr. Towers, Edinburgh; Mr. E. Davis, Haverford West; Mr. Davis, Swansea; and Mr. Ellis, Methodist episcopalian minister of the state of New York. In corroboration of the latter gentleman's remarks, Dr. Burns observed that during a three years and a half tour in the United States, he had only been in company with one minister who partook of intoxicating drink, and he was newly imported from this country. He expressed also great fear that the constant emigration going on from this country to America would cause considerable mischief to the working of teetotalism, unless great activity were manifested in the diffusion of its principles amongst the people of this country, as early as possible.—The conference terminated at five o'clock.

FRIDAY.

Mr. SHIMWELL, of Monkwearmouth, was in the chair. After the usual devotional services, Mr. PARSONS, of Ebley, read a paper to the vendors of intoxicating drinks. The paper gave rise to a short discussion, in the course of which Mr. EDWARDS, seconded by Mr. WATSON, moved that the paper should also contain some reference to the wholesale vendors of these drinks, as they did not come so much in contact with the many evil features of the system.—The motion was unanimously adopted.

Mr. STEADMAN moved "that the members of conference are unanimously of opinion that the Sabbath traffic in intoxicating drinks is productive of a great and incalculable amount of evil, and that of a greatly aggravated nature; and strongly sympathise with the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance, in their aim to obtain the cessation of the traffic in these liquors on every day, and especially on the Lord's day,—that day affording greater facilities for intemperance than any other day; and urge upon the total abstinence to follow that course of procedure for the attainment of this end which his conscience dictates."—Mr. Steadman said this resolution had been adopted after a very friendly discussion, to avoid the debatable points to which the question had on a former occasion given rise.—After some discussion, the motion was carried, Mr. STANSFIELD, of Oldham, objecting. He thought the motion was not a decided affirmative support of the efforts of the British Association. He did not think the question had been discussed sufficiently, and moved an amendment that the discussion be reopened, which was met by a counter motion by Mr. M'KERROW, that the question be not again discussed, which was carried by a large majority.

Mr. PARSONS moved, and Mr. J. PRIESTLEY seconded a motion—"That the meeting have learned that many members of the society have been induced to abandon our principles from the injudicious advice of medical men, and therefore deems it of great importance that all their friends, and ministerial brethren especially, should make themselves well acquainted with the physiological arguments in favour of temperance, that they may preserve themselves and protect others from the seductive influence of science (falsely so called), and would particularly recommend to their attention the medical testimony above alluded to."

Mr. WILLIAM JONES, Oldham, supported the motion, as did Mr. FARMER, of Romsey, and Mr. OWEN, of Swansea.—Carried.

Mr. R. PARKS, Leicester, moved a resolution, urging on Females the necessity of refraining from offering intoxicating drinks by way of hospitality.—Seconded by Mr. SAMUEL ANTLIFFE, of Rotherham, and agreed to.

After some discussion regarding the publication of the report,

Mr. M'DOWALL, Alloa, moved a cordial vote of thanks to those members of families who had so kindly entertained the members of conference. Many of them, he believed, had formed friendships which would continue through life.—Mr. WATSON seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. M'KERROW moved votes of thanks to Mr. Solly, Mr. Shrewsbury, and Mr. Priestly, for their papers, which had been committed to the publication committee. Mr. GUTTRIDGE seconded the resolution.—Agreed to.

Mr. M'KERROW at some length condemned the practice of obtaining commercial orders, which prevailed largely in Manchester, by treating parties who were connected with the establishments with which they wished to do business. These practices were extremely demoralising to the young men connected with many of their manufacturing establishments, and often led to that deterioration of character which made them lose their situations, and cast them upon the world, ruined in their character and prospects. He thought they should insist, with Christian men, that they should conduct their business in a Christian manner.

Mr. SCOTT, of Glasgow, said that he knew cases of commercial travellers who had joined the temperance society and were immediately dismissed from their situations.

Other gentlemen gave instances of the evil effects of drinking in connection with business, especially in the case of parties seeking orders for commercial and manufacturing houses. The matter was ultimately remitted to a small committee, and a motion on the subject was afterwards agreed to.

After passing several other resolutions, and completing the business matters which remained to be disposed of, the conference broke up, at half-past one o'clock.

MEETING AT THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.

In connection with the temperance convention there took place two public meetings, the first of which was held Wednesday evening in the lecture room of the Mechanics' Institution. There were present a large number of ministers who attended the convention, together with a body of highly respectable persons, male and female, belonging to Manchester and the neighbouring towns.

The Rev. W. M'KERROW, the chairman, said, that to him it had been quite refreshing to think that upwards of 200 ministers had been gathered together to bring forward reasons why all men interested in the welfare of their fellow-creatures, the glory of God, and the furtherance of the concerns of religion, should be decided with respect to the total abstinence movement, should cast in their lot with those carrying on that movement, and should do what they could, by public identification with the principle involved in it, to hasten the time when intemperance should be unknown from one end of the land to the other. They had all witnessed instances of intellectual degradation, moral debasement, temporal wretchedness, and spiritual ruin, arising from the use of intoxicating drinks. They were all familiar with the influence of intemperance on the social circumstances of men, and they had all read in that book to which they had given their faith as the Book of God, that "the drunkard shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven;" and the question, therefore, with which he had specially to deal at that time was, "What is the source in which those evils have originated?" They proceeded, he contended, from the usages of society. No man was born a drunkard, or designed to be one; but, in consequence of partaking of intoxicating drinks on those occasions on which they were usually introduced, a liking for them was formed; the man found his appetite for them becoming stronger and stronger, and, before he was aware that he was placed in danger, he became a drunkard, a being ruined for time and eternity. There was no one who was safe from this danger. Nearly all the finest intellects of our country had been prostrated and ruined by intemperance. Not a few ministers of the gospel had fallen, like stars from the firmament of heaven, in consequence of those drinking usages, with which they had been familiarised by means of the intercourse they were obliged to maintain with the people of their charge, and with those with whom their fellowships were kept up. The course of intemperance was like that of the stone rolling down a declivity, the motion of which was at first gentle and slow, but which marched forward with accelerated speed until it hurried down the mountain side, and was lost in the lake at the foot. It was like fire, which acquired strength and power in proportion to the fuel with which it was fed, and to the time which it burnt. It was like the course of a river, which, far above the rapids, was gentle, slow, scarcely perceptible, but which, moving more and more swiftly as it rolled onwards, at last plunged over the fall, bearing to destruction everything on its bosom. Such was the course of intemperance; and if they would wish to avoid its evils, it became them to abstain from those things by means of which intemperance was produced. There were various reasons why they, who called themselves Christians, and more especially why those of them who were Christian ministers, should be total abstainers. The first reason was, that they were bound by their principles to be concerned for the glory of God and the happiness of their fellow-men. Now, drunkenness was one of the greatest evils on the earth, by which God was dishonoured, man was injured, and souls were ruined; and surely, then, it was incumbent on them to do all they could to arrest the progress and prevent the evils of intemperance. He could not understand how any one calling on the name of Christ could be indifferent to the total abstinence cause. Another reason why they should be total abstainers was, that they were required, as professing Christians, to do what they could to remove out of the way those things which hindered benevolent and religious efforts. It was considered to be a duty to support the preaching of the gospel, to communicate a knowledge of the gospel to those with whom they were connected, or by whom they were surrounded—to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, enlighten the ignorant, and save the perishing; but did they not frequently find that there were circumstances which hindered the accomplishment of their designs, which frustrated all the efforts which they put forth in connection with the cause of religion and humanity, and that therefore there was something more to be done, in order that their duty might be effectually discharged? The soil must be prepared for the seed of the sower. The fallow ground must be broken up; it must be made open, bare, and tender, in order that the seed cast into it may take root, and may experience the beneficial influences of the dew, and the rain, and the sunshine of heaven; and just so, he contented, it was with the hearts and habits of men. The briars and thorns must be uprooted, the hardness must be taken away, certain feelings and usages must be removed, in order that the efforts which they made on behalf of God and of humanity might be crowned with abundant success. He was not aware of any greater hindrance to the cause of religion, and the improvement of mankind, than intemperance; and he could not imagine how we could build any superstructure of moral and religious improvement that would stand satisfactorily, unless that superstructure was founded on the basis of complete abstinence from intoxicating liquors. There were many things in which the ministers of the gospel were peculiarly interested—benevolent and religious societies, for instance, connected with their congregations. There were the clothing societies. A number of ladies met together to make clothes for the poor children attending the Sunday schools; and did not this provision become necessary just in proportion to the intemperate habits of the parents of those children? Then they had their Bible societies, to send the word of God into the homes of the poor and ignorant; and was it not a lamentable fact, that intemperance prevented multitudes of those to whom the word of God was sent paying any attention to the great truths it promulgated? It could not be denied, that in not a few instances they found the Bibles which they had given in the pawn-shop or on the book-stall. These were times in which many took a deep interest in education—in the secular instruction of the young and the rising generation; but he could not understand how the efforts put forth in this direction were likely to be productive of any great amount of good, unless they were able to put down those drinking usages by which the young were ensnared, and virtuous efforts were neutralised. Education was not enough to keep our children from intemperance. Four out of every ten educated in Sunday schools were to be found, in after life, displaying the utmost indifference to religious truth—in fact, displaying habits of intemperance. Then missionaries were sent to the farthest ends of the earth to proclaim the glad tidings of the gospel; but who did not know that intemperance, wherever it existed, was the greatest obstacle to the success of the missionary cause? He could not understand, therefore, why so many ministers of the gospel appeared on platforms, and advocated the missionary cause, while, by their unwillingness to deny themselves, they countenanced that evil which prevented the spread of the gospel. The fact was, that they must be consistent; and he had almost made up his mind to give nothing to Bible or missionary societies unless he had a better guarantee than he commonly had that the money would be rightly applied, and would be likely, with the divine blessing, to accomplish the purpose in view. Unless the directors of public societies looked to this matter, and sent out men who were total abstainers, they (the subscribers) were spending their strength in naught and their labour in vain. These were some of the reasons which had induced him to become a total abstainer; he thought they were good reasons, and if some of his brethren would calmly reflect on them, they would see that there was very much to be said in favour of the cause, and very little indeed to say against it.

The Rev. W. PATTERSON, of Liverpool, of the Wesleyan Association, said that he had been a total abstainer for many years, in order that he might not afford a bad example to others. He was strongly convicted that every one would derive physical, as well as moral and religious advantages, from an abandonment of intoxicating beverages. He had witnessed the progress of total abstinence in many places, and had seen it, not as the handmaid, but as the pioneer of religion, going before, and preparing the people for the Lord. Having given one or two remarkable instances in proof of this, he proceeded to call attention to a most mournful case, in which a minister of the gospel had gradually become a degraded drunkard, was ejected from his pulpit, sank into the deepest poverty and wretchedness, but who now had become a teetotaler, and was willing to lecture upon it, though he had no hope that he should ever stand where he had stood before. The speaker also narrated a striking instance of cure of fever effected by cold water, and affirmed an opinion that in sickness, no more than in health, was alcohol beneficial. He argued against moderation, on the ground that it had never been settled where the line of moderation was to be drawn, and moreover, that it could not give the perfect security which total abstinence gave.

The Rev. WALTER SCOTT, principal of Airedale College, Bradford, said that the principles of patriotism, benevolence, and piety would alone justify him in being a total abstainer. As a patriot, could he induce all his fellow-countrymen to abstain from spirituous liquors, he should confer a greater benefit on them than could be secured by many of those improvements and ameliorations which they were so anxious to obtain. As far as he could understand the principal of general benevolence, they were consonant with total abstinence, and therefore, if total abstinence could be diffused throughout the world, it would contribute much to secure the happiness of the human race. As far, too, as he understood the principle of piety, he thought he might be led by them to advocate the cause of total abstinence. It had often been observed, and he had cause to join his testimony to the observation, that there had been more confusion introduced into Christian churches, there had been more cases of expulsion, through the influence of spirituous liquors, than almost all other causes besides. And more and worse than this, he had been acquainted with several ministers of the gospel—men of ability, some of them men of fine imagination, men of reputed piety, and he should hope of piety—who, through the influence of spirituous liquors had been brought to an untimely grave. Perhaps there were very few in that large assembly who had not had to mourn over some relative or friend brought to a premature grave by strong drink. He would recommend all to study the subject well; the better they would like it, and the more prepared they would be to advocate it. Let all be careful not to advance arguments which would not bear investigation: for they must remember that the eyes of many learned, critical, and intelligent persons were fixed upon them, and that unsound arguments would only strengthen opposition. He would also recommend to the abstainers to be thoroughly consistent.

The Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS (Lady Huntingdon's connection), of Ebley, near Stroud, and author of "Anti-Bacchus," said that he looked upon "Anti Bacchus" as a miracle. Not long before he wrote that book, he was given up by the medical men. Two physicians told him that his was a clerical disease; that he must give up reading, writing, preaching, thinking; that he must almost give up eating, and drink a little brandy and cold water. His nervous system was thoroughly shaken. Well, he adopted total abstinence, and by and by he found that all his complaints disappeared. Twelve years had passed since then, and they had been twelve of the most active years of his life. "Anti-Bacchus" was produced shortly after his change. He had then to preach or lecture sometimes six times a week; he kept a classical school for young gentlemen; and he only commenced reading to write that work in October, and he had entirely finished it by Christmas-day. That a dying man should have been able to write that book, in such a time, seemed to have been a miracle. Some people were afraid to drink cold water; they shivered at the very thought of it. They said it was cold. No such thing. If he were shivering with cold, he said, if he wished to warm himself, take, above all things in the world, a glass of cold water. It was not the water, but the imagination that was wrong. If there was anything in the world that could be compared to the nectar of the gods, for the thirsty man, it was water. The advantage of it was, that he could do all kinds of work on it without being tired. The brain is the organ of the mind. Drink stimulants, and they keep the mind in a constant state of excitement; but if you drank nothing but water, there was no stimulant but that of thinking, talking, or writing, which he found healthful rather than otherwise. Even though he was lame, he could walk as far as some people who were not lame, and who partook of what they called the "good creature." The speaker sketched powerfully some of the evils and miseries produced by intoxicating drinks, and exhorted all to do something for the cause of total abstinence. He strongly contended that missionaries of the gospel should be total abstainers, and said that the great cause of the diseases which obliged missionaries to return home was not climate, but the alcoholic drinks which they had used. The reindeer and the camel were made for a particular climate; but man, the noblest of God's creatures, being intended for a missionary of truth, had given to him a constitution which would not shrink from heat or cold. He concluded by showing that total abstinence was the cause which was, unlike most others, productive of a saving, and by the expression of a hope that the meetings held in this city would be productive of good in every part of the country.

The Rev. Dr. RITCHIE, of the United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, remarked that some people might ask, "How in the world have you managed to gather together so many ministers of the gospel on so contemptible a subject?" Contemptible! How could that be a contemptible, a trivial, or unimportant case, which was the adjunct of all other good causes? Whoever thought of applying the drunkard for assistance in any good cause? The chairman had remarked that total abstinence was charged with being allied with infidelity. Now, if total abstinence were infidelity, drunkenness must be Christianity; the greatest drunkard must be the best Christian, and those who died of drunkenness must be held as martyrs. Then it was said, "Well, but you unchristianise all the ministers who are not teetotalers." His answer was "No; but we say that they unchristianise themselves." They (total abstainers) sought to save drowning men; and he was not a man who, if he could swim, would not plunge in to save a drowning person. He trusted that it was now quite as unnecessary to preach to ministers of the gospel in favour of total abstinence, as it would be to preach against human sacrifices in Britain. It was not always so, however. He looked on it as a disgrace to a door-keeper in the house of the Lord not to be a total abstainer; but it was a thousand times more disgraceful to a minister. In Britain, teetotalism had been amazingly slow in its progress, whilst in America it had been astonishingly rapid in its progress. This was to be accounted for from the fact, that the ministers in America were the first to take the field in favour of teetotalism, whilst the ministers in Britain were the last. They (the latter) were very obstinate; they would not allow conviction to reach them. Some of them clothed their ignorance and inhumanity in a religious garb. He would strip them of it. He wanted the wolf to appear in his own skin, and not in sheep's clothing; and though he might perhaps know the wolf in his sheep's clothing, his wife or daughter might not, and therefore he would strip him of it. The minister who, at this time of day, was an enemy to teetotalism, or said he was in doubt about it, could not be regarded by him as trustworthy in other things. If, in a common place thing like this a minister was in doubt and difficulty, how could he trust him in still greater things? How many persons shielded themselves behind the example of the minister? Let him pledge, and they would follow his example. The speaker went on, with mingled humour, logic, and anecdote, to combat some of the objections urged against teetotalism, continually eliciting from his auditory bursts of laughter or cheering, or both combined. One objection was, "There is nothing about teetotalism in the New Testament, and therefore you claim to be wiser than your Lord and Master." No; and there was nothing said in the New Testament about printing-presses for printing Bibles, nor about steam-boats for conveying missionaries from place to place, nor about Bible societies, nor about many other things of which the Christian world availed itself; but did it therefore follow that those things were not good and ought to be abandoned? Teetotalism was a moral reform as great as the physical reform produced by railways; but must both be condemned and abandoned because they had only been heard of for a few years? He next proceeded to point out the obstacles that a minister has to encounter in having to preach to men, many of whom had been drunk over-night. One person had said to him, "Why, if I were to preach as you do, I should not have any congregation soon." Very well; empty the church, then. It was better that a few congregations should be diminished, or lost altogether, if the whole of the others could be thereby purified. It was not numbers that made a Christian congregation. He hoped that every minister, on going home from that conference, would resolve to become a total abstinence apostle, and to preach it, not only in but around their churches. Some men were wishful to do this; but they dared not. They were afraid of this man who was a brewer, of that who was a distiller, or of one who was a wine merchant, and dreaded lest they should drive the rich men away. He said, drive them away; clear the house of them, and show their earnestness in the work of recovering the lost sinner.

The meeting then terminated.

TEMPERANCE SOIREE, FREE-TRADE HALL.

The closing meeting in connection with the conference of ministers was held in the Free-trade Hall, on Friday evening. Nearly fifteen hundred sat down to tea. Others came in when the repast was concluded.—WILLIAM MORRIS, Esq., Salford, presided.

The Rev. Dr. BURNS, General Baptist minister, of London, said he had been a teetotaler for twelve years. During that time he had worked with the head, the hands, the feet, and his whole system. Since he had been a teetotaler he had been better able to work, had had better spirits, a more cheerful state of mind, and been more fit, in every sense of the word, he believed, for the discharge of the onerous and important duties devolving upon him as a Christian minister. He became a teetotaler without reference to personal considerations, as to whether it would agree with his health or not, but because he felt the conviction that as a Christian minister he was bound to be in the front rank of this important movement—and that it would reflect great disgrace upon him if his members and deacons should themselves take the lead. He was not aware of any institution or society which had made such rapid progress as had the cause of teetotalism. He believed there was not a country in the world where British influence extended where teetotalism did not exist. It exists happily in our own country, and in the sister country the great happiness and delightful results consequent on the labours of Father Mathew were well known. The cause was extensively spreading in Scotland, in Wales, and in some parts of our own kingdom. The Church of God had received great and constant accessions from the ranks of the teetotalers. In the East and West Indies, in Australia, and South Africa, the cause was progressing, and in the East Indies not a few of our soldiers had been saved from an early grave through its influence. He had been exceedingly delighted during a recent tour of 3,000 miles in America, to notice the sobriety of the people, the manifest absence of pauperism. He only saw two beggars in his whole tour. He was pleased to observe the religious equality which exists there—and to notice the extension of the franchise—and if that country would only wash her hands of slavery—she would take the highest position among the nations of the day. The Rev. Dr. Sharpe, of Boston, who had been a minister there for 48 years, said the greatest possible contrast existed between that country and our own. He had seen 40,000 or 50,000 persons assembled there for political purposes under circumstances of great excitement, hear speeches for hours in succession, and separate as orderly and as quietly as though they had left a place of worship. He could not say so much for England. By the blessing of God, however, upon the cause in this country, we might expect that the time was not far distant when we may have immense meetings here, and when teetotal principles shall predominate, and when our own land shall be as distinguished for sobriety as that to which reference had been made.

The Rev. P. McDOWALL, of Alloa, Scotland, United Presbyterian minister, said that he wished to have a few moments of downright serious talk with the meeting. The ministers had not assembled for the purpose of amusing them, but of inviting them to go along with this movement, to get good for themselves, to help the ministers in doing good to themselves, and doing good to others. He had no doubt very many of the people of God were present, and to those he would address himself, particularly those who were not abstainers. Speaking to the selfish part of the question, in his opinion all Christian men ought to abstain from intoxicating drinks for their own sakes, if only to prevent others from following their example, should his advise not be followed. It was no answer to say, "I am a Christian; I am safe; let drunkards, as they ought, take the pledge;" for numerous and lamentable were the instances of a deplorable fall, through not bearing in mind the apostolic injunction, "Take heed lest ye fall." There was a dark, deep gulf of intemperance, which all of them had to pass. The total abstainers had built a strong bridge over it, with a sure foundation, and parapet walls on the one side and on the other. Why should we venture on to the narrow, trembling plank, which "Moderation" had thrown over a little lower down. In attempting to cross over that we might fall; go along with the abstainers over the bridge, and they never, never could. But Christians should abstain on another ground—to promote their own spiritual prosperity. Suppose they for once only committed the sin of intemperance; what benefit did they derive from the use of intoxicating drinks? Was not all the imaginary benefit they derived a bodily benefit—a little temporary exhilaration, to be followed very speedily by a corresponding depression and collapse. Had they by the use of intoxicating drinks brought themselves nearer to God, or increased their love for him, or quickened their zeal for his service? No, no; all the results gained from intoxicating drinks must be put down, not on the side of profit, but on the side of loss. Had they not a tendency to bring them further and further downwards towards this evil world, and to make them exclaim with the psalmist, "My soul cleaveth to the dust?" A word upon the benevolent aspect of the question. Christians should abstain for the sake of others as well as themselves. The Total Abstinence Society could not do without them. He would tell them why. If it was not the duty of Christians to come and join them, it must be the duty of Christians already in the society to abandon it, and then down it would go as a matter of course. It was said that it was not necessary for them to join; that drunkards might adhere to it, but Christians should stand aloof. How could a society be expected to exist which made it one of its terms of fellowship that it was to consist in enmity to God? Should a Bible society consist of those who never heard of a Bible? Should a missionary society be composed of those who never heard of our Saviour and his gospel? No, no; if their Christian friends left them, the society must go down. To be sure, a dozen drunkards might be found in Scotland, and two dozen in England, who might form a society of this description as abstainers, but where was the individual with the remnant of a character to lose who would think of joining them? Not one. It was well known that there were hundreds of thousands of persons, by no means drunkards, but who, it was feared, were on the way to become such, and whose only safety lay in joining the society, but who, under the circumstances he had referred to, would never consent to do so. If Christians kept away from the society, Christians must leave it, and who could think with satisfaction and delight upon the dissolution of the abstinence society? Some of the members who had been reclaimed from the lowest depths of degradation, were now sober, industrious, happy supporters of the Christian societies in many places. Were they to be sent back to all their former habits, and left to their former degradation and wretchedness? Heaven forbid it! it must not be; but it must be if all followed the example of those Christian brethren who kept aloof from the Total Abstinence Society.

The Rev. Mr. HENRY SOLLY, Unitarian minister, of Cheltenham, next addressed the assembly. He said the vast gathering of that evening formed a very suitable conclusion to the series of delightful meetings held that week. They met, as they had hitherto done, on common ground, and it was a great privilege and blessing to his mind that they could find such ground on which to meet; where men of piety and most irreproachable character, esteemed in their various churches, whose names had gone forth throughout Europe, and who felt in their inmost heart, that by giving the right hand of fellowship to their brethren, they did not compromise one jot of those religious principles they held so dear. He apprehended that this cause was to be supported by an appeal to benevolence, not only by benevolence in the ordinary sense of the term, but on a higher ground. It appeared to him that Christianity was bound to take up this cause, because it was to be advocated, not merely for the sake of humanity, but for the sake of Christ. He hoped that Christianity would prove itself equal to the cause. It was the duty of Christian ministers to lift the drunkard out of the degradation into which he had fallen; they should rejoice that it is their privilege to lead the van in reforming the world, and he hoped they would, in season and out of season, determinedly take up this matter in a truly Christian spirit.

The Rev. W. J. SHREWSBURY, Wesleyan minister, of Redford, addressed to the meeting some excellent practical observations on the benefits resulting from taking the pledge, and even making it a rule that all children should be induced early to take it too. From experience in connection with his own children, he had proved the beneficial results of what he recommended. He considered that the very calling of a Christian minister required him to be ready on all proper occasions to advocate the cause of total abstinence, and promote it to the utmost of his power. He should remember what was the principal which influenced our Divine Redeemer, who "came to save that which was lost." Were not poor drunkards in this deplorable condition, and should not Christian ministers go forth to seek, that they might have those who were lost?

The Rev. GEORGE LAMB, Primitive Methodist minister, Hull, said, having been a total abstainer for the space of twelve years, he was able to bear testimony as to the effect it had produced upon himself, and he was happy to state that he had seen its beneficial influence upon vast numbers of his fellow-men. Those present were assembled to endeavour to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-creatures, and raise them from a state of misery to the enjoyment of high and holy blessings in the present world, and also in the world to come. It had been said that teetotalers spoke harshly against those who manufactured and sold strong drinks. They might speak strongly because they felt that, as these people prospered by their traffic, those who supported them were made miserable. But teetotalers were not the only men who made use of strong language with regard to them, for the Rev. John Wesley spoke much in his day, and used strong language against them. Fifty millions of money were spent every year in this country in intoxicating drinks, and 60,000 persons died every year from their effects. Now he would not say that British Christians were drunkards, or that British Christians love a great deal of intoxicating drink, but he would say that British Christians drank intoxicating drinks, and that as long as they did so, the drinking custom would be respectable, and, consequently, until the church would come forth to help the cause, intemperance could not by any means be removed from the land in which we live. A minister whom he talked with a number of years ago, said, that a man who could not drink a gill without drinking a gallon, ought to be a teetotaler, and thought he settled the question at once. But it should not be forgotten that that very minister had had a son driven from the pulpit because of his intemperance, and sank down degraded thereby. He agreed certainly with that gentleman in the sentiment he had uttered, but how could they induce the gallon man to become a teetotaler? The answer he should give him was, "I shall abstain myself." They ought to abstain for the sake of example."

The Rev. DANIEL DAVIS, Baptist minister, of Swansea, said that the cause which was advocated there was dear to his heart, because it was calculated to provide his countrymen with greater abundance of bread; but valuable as he deemed that cause, much as he rejoiced in its success, and much as he prized and valued the name of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, and others associated with them in the Anti-corn-law League—he must express his firm conviction that the cause in which they were that night engaged, the cause which had convened them together from different countries, was more divine, more noble, and would ultimately tell with greater effect upon the character of our fellow-subjects in reference both to time and to eternity. Every one would admit that intemperance was an evil, and that it was desirable to remedy that evil; but which was the most effectual way of doing it? What were the means to be employed? The answer was teetotalism, abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. Some said, "No; drink in moderation; do not drink to excess." But what was moderation? He would give them his definition of it. Moderation was this: the use of all things that are beneficial in moderation, but totally to abstain from all that were injurious. He considered intoxicating drinks totally unnecessary: that had been frequently debated, but he went further than to say they were unnecessary—they were positively injurious to all those in the habit of using them. This was proved by physicians by men of science. Sometimes, to be sure, they told us intoxicating drinks were necessary for the state in which we lived. But if that was the case, let us change our mode of living, and see if we could not learn to live without the use of them. There was something alarming in the insinuation that the teetotal society tended to infidelity. We were met with the scriptures, which were said to sanction the use of wine, while total abstainers condemned it in toto. Suppose it to say so; for every one passage that seemed to countenance the taking of wine, he was able to find two which spoke of it in condemnatory language. These things must be understood. We must not be allowed to explain away the favourable expressions by the unfavourable.

The Rev. JAMES BARDSLEY, of Burnley, minister of the Church of England contended, as a practical abstainer, that men could follow all kinds of trades, erect houses, wield a great hammer, and do all kinds of hard labour without the use of intoxicating drinks, and said that for thirteen years this had been his solemn conviction. He did not mean to say that strong drinks did not stimulate, but we had learned to distinguish between stimulating and strengthening, between fire and food; in short, 1,600 medical men, at the summit of their profession, had declared that intoxicating liquors were injurious.

The Rev. WM. PATTERSON, Wesleyan Association minister, Liverpool, spoke of the beneficial effects he had experienced from total abstinence, and said, with fifty millions expended in their purchase in this country, he found by a calculation that he could pension off 40,000 persons engaged in the traffic, at £100 per annum each. The poor rate in 1830 was eight millions. He could appropriate twenty millions to the relief of the poor, purchase 200,000 Bibles per day for every working day in the year, at 1s. each; support 40,000 foreign missionaries, at £100 each, employ 10,000 missionaries at home, all at £100 per year; erect 80,000 schools, and give £100 a year to each; give £80,000 for reading rooms and libraries; and after all have something like £12,220,000 to spare to lay out for other benevolent purposes.

The Rev. WM. M'KERRON, after delivering a few appropriate remarks, moved "That the thanks of this meeting be given to the reverend gentlemen by whom the addresses of the evening have been given, and to the ministers of religion by whom the conference held in this city has been attended."—Mr. WM. BOULTON, evangelical friend, seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously and with acclamation.—The Rev. ROBERT GRAY MASON returned thanks.—The thanks of the meeting, on the motion of Mr. William Brooks, seconded by Mr. Whitaker, were cordially awarded to the chairman, who having responded, the meeting terminated about half-past ten o'clock.

We understand that the Committee intend publishing the report of the proceedings of the Conference, and some other documents, including addresses, to ministers of religion, by the Rev. Jabez Burns, D.D.; to Sunday School Teachers, by Rev. R. Tabraham; to the makers and venders of strong drinks, by Rev. B. Parsons; &c. These are to be published as Supplements to the National Temperance Advocate, issued from the Isle of Man.

Our Readers will perceive that we have, at a considerable cost to ourselves, given eight extra pages with the view of furnishing as full a report as possible of the very interesting and important proceedings at Manchester. We hope they will avail themselves of this opportunity, of placing the report in the hands of as many Christian Ministers, and members of Christian churches, as possible.

How HAPPY!—I say, Jem! ye cannot tell how happy I am. Our Jock has signed Teetotal, comes home sob every night, brings me all his brass, sits by our cheert fire, begins to say his prayers, is so good natured, tal about sarving God, and going to heaven! We are li new married folks. Thank God for Teetotal!

SUCCESSFUL EFFORT.

may be in the recollection of many our readers, that, about three months ago, we proposed to send gratuitously a number of packets, to Ministers of religion, and principal office-bearers in Christian churches, containing the Rev. W. R. Baker's Essay, "Intemperance, the Idolatry of Britain;" a copy of the Medical testimony, signed by about 100 medical practitioners; testimonies to the infidel influence of teetotalism, &c. This was done to a considerable extent; and that it was not in vain, we have received several assurances. The following may be taken as a specimen:—

Witley, 30th of March, 1848.

DEAR SIR,—Indisposition has prevented my perusing the Temperance papers you kindly left for me sometime back at the Star, until very lately, and I send you this note with the view of thanking you for your obliging attention, than to offer any remarks upon the interesting subject matter of their contents. One observation pray me to make, but which is known, more especially those in the Commission of the Peace, that intoxication is not only the cause of crime, but that it is advanced as palliative—for example, I have now a charge before me of a young man who has committed the grossest personal outrage, and the justification offered, "He had been drinking," thus justifying one crime by the commission of another. One other word—Infidelity and Intemperance from Alcoholic drinks appear to me to be as much in alliance as oil and vinegar, and I think we may come to this conclusion, that whatever a man does in obedience to the will of God, through Christ Jesus, must be religious and moral, unless he takes a most perverted view of Holy Writ.

Believe me, dear Sir,

Your's sincerely,

Samuel Darke, Worcester. THOS. PARSONS.

This is highly encouraging. Those Societies or individuals who have not as yet availed themselves of this mode of communicating important information, are respectfully recommended to do so without delay.

STRONG DRINK VERSUS REVIVALS.

It appears from the statements of some of the American Religious Periodicals, that beer and spirit sellers have become so great a nuisance at Camp-Meetings and Big Meetings, that announcements such as the following become necessary:—

We extract the following from the Boston Adventist, the organ of the Adventists, a very spiritual people believe.

TENT CAMP MEETING.—Note. We want no peddlers, beer shops, or anything of the kind, on or near the ground. We wish all such persons to understand that they will not have our consent to come on the ground at all. If they do so, they will have to settle the matter with the authorities who give us protection. We do not get up public meetings to support beer-shops and speculators. We call all the friends in each of the places where we are to hold meetings stand with us in this matter, and we shall have no trouble. We design this note to apply to all the meetings which we contemplate for the season. We intend to have good order if God permit."

Stringent regulations like these concerning meetings held for the revival of religion, may seem strange, but it appears that the evil produced has been very great. Large numbers of idle, dissolute, and irreligious persons attend these revival meetings from motives of curiosity, and with the view of drinking alcoholic drinks, have so disturbed the services as to necessitate the enforcement of these regulations. At some of the large gatherings of the American churches, the sabbath, by the presence of ungodly restaurateurs and beer and spirit tents, has been converted into a shocking scene of gluttony and excess. Grand dinners being cooked, and the most unnecessary disturbance of the Lords day taking place. This is indeed an artful scheme of the arch one."

ONE HUNDRED GUINEAS PRIZE ESSAY.

A well known friend of the total abstinence movement, has offered A PRIZE of ONE HUNDRED GUINEAS for the best Essay on the use of Alcoholic Liquors in Health and Disease. The Essay is to contain answers to the following questions:—1st.—What are the effects, corporeal and mental, of Alcoholic Liquors on the healthy human system? 2nd.—Does physiology or experience teach us, that Alcoholic Liquors should form part of the ordinary sustenance of man, particularly under circumstances of exposure to severe labour or to extremes of temperature? Or, on the other hand, is there reason for believing that such use of them is not sanctioned by the principles of science, or the results of practical observation? 3rd.—Are there any special modification of the bodily or mental condition of man, short of actual disease, in which the occasional or habitual use of Alcoholic Liquors may be necessary or beneficial? 4th.—Is the employment of Alcoholic Liquors necessary in the practice of Medicine? If so, in what diseases, or in what forms and stages of disease, is the use of them necessary or beneficial? It is proposed that the Essay should not extend beyond 250, nor fall short of 120, pages of print of medium size in octavo.

The Gentlemen of the first literary and scientific talent, to act as Adjudicators, will be shortly announced.

Dr. FORBES, and Dr. GUY, are announced as two of the Adjudicators. Particulars may be obtained of Mr. Charles Gilpin, 5, Bishopsgate Street Without, London.

THE LAST DOLLAR.—An American paper acknowledges the receipt of a one dollar note on the Farmer's bank at Canton, Ohio, on the back of which is written in a plain hand the following:—"Friends, take warning. This is the last dollar which I possess, of a fortune of 30,000 dollars. The cause is, whiskey and gin."

JURORS MUST NOT DRINK STRONG DRINKS.—On a motion for a new trial, in the Circuit Court of Yazoo, Miss., recently, it was proved to the Court that some of the jurors during their deliberations partook of spirituous liquors; upon which the Judge set the verdict aside, granted the prisoner a new trial, and fined each juror who partook of the spirits fifty dollars.

"A SHORT LIFE AND A MERRY ONE!"—Yes! in rags, filth, scorn, disease; in the jail, the workhouse or the madhouse, the plague upon the family, the nuisance of the locality, the terror of the decent, the laugh of the foolish, the trouble of the police, the tormenter of the magistrate, the associate of the base, a feast for worms, the sport of demons, and a dweller with devouring fire and everlasting burnings.—R. Tabraham.

TEETOTALISM IS RIGHT.—Well, after all, this odd thing, Teetotalism, is right. It keeps a fellow sober; it puts a coat upon his back, bread into his cupboard, fire into his grate, a smile upon the wife's face, joy into the bairn's hearts, a trifle into the schoolmaster's hand, a bit of charity into any good cause, and credit upon the working classes. It lays up something for a rainy day; and, if we will, leads the way to religion and heaven. Come, my hearties, I shall sign the pledge and keep it; will ye? Leave the smiling landlady to smile on others, we will now smile on ourselves.

ATTEMPTING TO WALK.—"See how wrong you are to drink," said some one to a man who was drunk; "wine causes you to stumble at every step." "It is not so," answered the drunkard; "I do not err in drinking, but in attempting to walk when I am drunk."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

BIRMINGHAM.

A visit has recently been paid to the Total Abstinence Society of this town, by J. G. MARSHALL, Esq., who for eighteen years occupied the station of Judge in the Superior Courts of Nova Scotia, and who has recently given up his time and talents to the furtherance of the total abstinence reform. On the occasion referred to, he preached three sermons on the Sabbath; in the morning at Livery Street Chapel; in the afternoon at "the Church of our Saviour," (Mr. G. Dawson's); and at night, at Legge Street Chapel. He founded each of his discourses on the same passage of Scripture—namely: 3 John, verse 11; "Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good."

He endeavoured to show:—

1. That there is no Scriptural authority for the use of intoxicating liquors.
2. That the wine commended in the Scripture was not an intoxicating liquor, and therefore not to be confounded with the spirituous liquors in use at the present day.
3. That the drinking of any of the spirituous liquors now in use in Great Britain, may properly be termed, the gratification of a "worldly lust," and, as such, is denounced in the Scriptures.
4. That such use of liquors is quite inconsistent with the injunction to "live soberly, righteously and godly," and to exhibit a peculiarity from the people of this world, and may therefore be justly denominated a sinful practice.
5. That as innumerable good effects of every description have resulted from the total abstinence reform, it is the imperative duty of christian ministers, and other religious professors, to abstain altogether from intoxicating liquors, and to sanction, and zealously to assist, the operations of total abstinence societies.

These several points were argued by the learned preacher in a clear, logical and impressive manner, to the great satisfaction of the total abstainers present, and apparently, to the satisfaction of the whole of his hearers.

On the following evening, Judge Marshall delivered a lecture in Livery street Chapel, Dr. GOURLAY occupying the Chair. The Lecturer stated that for forty years he had made minute observations on the drinking customs, both in North America, during the exercise of his office, and since his residence in Scotland, and his visits to other parts of this country; and he could testify to the evils resulting from the use of strong drinks. The majority of cases in which he had to adjudicate, resulted from that cause, Nine-tenths of the breaches of the peace, thefts, and other crimes, were traced to the same source. The majority of murders were under the influence of strong drink. Numerous cases of drowning, suffocation, suicide, and other modes of death, proceeded from the like cause. In Scotland, in a population of from 250,000 to 300,000, at least 4,000 persons died annually, in consequence of their use of intoxicating drinks. Other populations gave the same proportions. Surely that fact was quite enough to stimulate all persons to increased exertions to promote the practice of total abstinence, and so to save the bodies and the souls also, of MILLIONS! The lecturer then expounded the danger resulting from the moderate use of strong drinks, as well as some of its alleged advantages; and concluded with an earnest and eloquent appeal in behalf of Total Abstinence Societies.

A vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. Marshall for his kindness, which was suitably acknowledged, after which the meeting broke up.—From the "WESLEYAN."

HINCKLEY.

The cause of Teetotalism continues progressively. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, April 4th and 5th

Mr. Edwards, delivered two addresses, one on "Temperance," and the other on "the Beauty and blessing of peace, and universal Brotherhood." His appeals made a deep impression on the hearers. The Rev. T. J. Acard, took the Chair on both occasions, and his remarks were calculated to do much good. Several ministers of the Town, i.e., the Revs. W. Salt, J. C. Lunn and J. Clark, took part in the proceedings. The pastor of the Independent Congregation, Mr. Salt, made a very telling speech, which was well received. The meeting closed shortly before ten, and all seemed highly delighted with the evenings entertainment.

SAMUEL PRESTON, JUN., Sec.

GRENDALE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.

EXTRAORDINARY MEETING.

A stirring lecture on Teetotalism was delivered on Friday evening, April 6th, by Mr. Bramley, of Yardley Hastings. The audience was large, and remarkably attentive. The Lecturer giving an epitome of the History of the Temperance Reformation—clearly evinced the inadequacy of anything less than total abstinence to the removal of the Curse of Britain—shewed from abundant medical testimony that alcoholic drinks are inimical to the health of the human organism—briefly remarked upon the pestiferous fruits of the drinking customs, and concluded by calling earnestly upon professors of Christianity to abandon them. An excellent impression was produced. The above meeting was held in a Malting, kindly allowed us by Mr. Laughton, Malster, retailer of beer, &c. Mr. L. furnished the lecturer with an empty barrel to stand upon; he attended the lecturer, and put the extinguisher of his influence upon two or three incipient disturbances; he refused to sell a drop of beer during the lecture, and after a unanimous vote of thanks to him for granting us the use of the Malting, he acceded to the request that we might have it again for the same purpose. After the meeting we were invited to partake of solids, to keep up the "equilibrium between waste and supply," as Liebig has it. Such liberality will find but few parallels. I have been wondering whether the malting will long have to "serve two masters." May its exclusive title soon be "The Grendon Temperance Hall."

CHARLES SIBLEY.

LEAMINGTON.

On Tuesday, the 11th April, a Lecture on the principles of Total Abstinence was delivered in the Temperance Hall, by the Rev. Henry Batchelor, Minister of the Congregational Church, Clemens Street. The Chair was taken by Mr. PUTTICK, who, after a few brief observations, introduced the rev. gentleman to the meeting. He commenced by a description of alcohol; and the injuries inflicted by its use. He reprobated the habit and custom of the aristocracy and others, in giving away large quantities of intoxicating drinks to persons in their employ. After quoting a variety of statistics of grain, &c., he proved that there was an increase of crime, and maintained that the whole social system was endangered and marred by strong drink. The lecturer proceeded to impress upon the minds of his audience, especially Christians,—the importance of giving up this abominable and nefarious system. The lecture was very numerous and respectfully attended, and listened to with the deepest attention. Owing to the hour growing late, the chair man, with the unanimous wish of the meeting, requested the Rev. gentleman to defer the physiological part of his address till a future period, to which he readily acceded. The teetotalers of Leamington appear highly pleased at the addition of the above minister to their ranks, and are sanguine of glorious results from his able and powerful advocacy.

HOW TO MAKE UP THE DEFICIENCIES IN THE REVENUES OF OUR VARIOUS RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

OUR MAY MEETINGS may justly be said to be the glory of our land. A period is coming when "the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the things that are therein, shall be burnt up." Eternity will receive none of the monuments of our inventions and arts. The last fire will spare neither the pyramid, nor any of the beautiful or stupendous works of the architect. Paintings, statuary, poetry, and all the stores of literature, will be entirely consumed. The thousand wonders effected by machinery will utterly perish in the final conflagration. But there is one being who will survive all. MAN, the miniature deity of this lower world, is destined to live for ever. It is decreed that he shall see the world, on which he centred so many hopes, for which he braved so many dangers, and which was to him the source of so many sorrows, woes and fears, pass away. No place shall be found for it, for it shall be seen no more; but man himself, after all this wreck, shall remain untouched, and the consciousness of what he did on earth shall be his solace or his torment for ever. Memory, like the palimpsest, will reveal all that had been obliterated. There will be no weak or treacherous memories in eternity. One of the books open at the day of doom, and which we shall read with the deepest interest, will be the record of our own deeds. These lines, conscience had engraved with an indelible pen. Every human being writes his own biography on his own heart. Tablets of marble or of brass shall become illegible and perish, but these "fleshy tables" of the soul shall be our everlasting study, amidst the glorious light of paradise, or the horrific glare of tophet.

And not only our consciousness, but many of our deeds shall live. As we have said, the works of art shall perish; we cannot write a book which shall be read beyond the grave; we cannot erect a monument which shall defy the last fire. Could we dig to the centre of the globe, and there lay the foundation of our column, and could we build, and build, and build, until its summit reached the stars, one blast of the archangel's trumpet would bury all in ruins. But though our operations on matter are doomed to destruction, yet we can inscribe our own minds, and the minds of others, with characters, and mould them into forms, which shall be as imperishable as the immortal substance on which we wrought. Every word, every action of ours may be, and probably is, a die, which produces an impression destined to exist for ever. Tyrants, despots, false philosophers, false prophets, and false teachers, tattooed and deformed the souls of their fellows, with lines which are now read with tears of blood. The ugly and disgusting forms and features which idolaters have given to their gods, are only the material symbols of the minds of their votaries. Revelation tells us of "the mark," the charagma, the impression, or character, "of the beast." The stamp, or engraving, was rather spiritual than bodily, and, in too many cases, disfigured the soul for ever. Such men as Enoch, Abraham, Isaiah, the apostle Paul, and others, lived not in vain. They, literally and truly, painted and modelled for eternity. It is in allusion to this fact, that one of the chiefs of the patriarchs is called the "Father of the faithful." These men erected "pillars for the temple of God which shall go no more out." They, in deed and in truth, built columns for the new Jerusalem. Their spiritual statuary, and the thousand wonders of their divine art, are preserved in the museum of the King of kings, and shall be revealed when the "Holy City shall come down from God, to the new heaven and the new earth," which shall be especially created for their reception. What choice specimens of spiritual artizanship, which cost such men as your WHITFIELDS and WESLEYS days and nights of toil, self-denial, and tears, will then be brought to light! That will be the time to compare or rather contrast your Gibbons, and Humes, and *Voltaire*s, and *Tom Paine*s, on the one hand; with your Knoxes and Luthers, and Whitfields and Wesleys, on the other.

To prepare works for this Heavenly Repository is the grand object of the various RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES whose anniversaries add such a charm to the lovely month of May. They all work for Eternity. 'Tis true that "godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come." The benefits that the Gospel confers upon man as a sojourner on earth cannot be told, but still these are few and insignificant, compared with the eternal joys which are secured to believers beyond the grave. Time is only an infinitesimal portion of eternity; and the life of any one human being, however prolonged, is only a small fraction of that incalculably short period; and therefore the good that christianity does on earth is small indeed compared with its everlasting blessings in the world to come. We must pass the dark valley of the shadow of death, we must hear the last trumpet, must see the dead raised, the wicked and the righteous judged, and take a full survey of the new heaven, the new earth," and "the new Jerusalem," before we shall be able to form any perfect idea of what human instrumentality, accompanied with the grace of God, can effect.

To prepare citizens for that full development of the Divine Glory, is the grand object of all our Evangelical Societies, whether Tract, Bible, Sunday School, or Missionary Institutions. And will it then be believed that any one of these philanthropic corporations can now be languishing for want of funds? Especially in a christian land, where luxury and extravagance reign to a degree almost unparalleled in the history of prodigality. Were the reports of pecuniary deficiency read in Exeter Hall in this May of 1848, to be re-produced and re-read a thousand years hence, these awful, these shameful facts, would appear as fabulous as the trident of Neptune or the harp of Apollo. What! in that age of philanthropy, of devotion, of spirituality, and unbounded charity, will it be believed, that there ever existed a race of mortals with human hands and human hearts, wearing the same bodily form as the son of God, and with his Gospel in their hand, who nevertheless wasted their talents in idleness or frivolity, who spent a large portion of their money in poisons, and looked with apathy on a perishing world, or made no small degree of their sympathy to consist in praying, that heaven would miraculously interfere to rescue these dying souls from perdition?

than its creation or preservation, and therefore the greatest enterprise in which man can engage. Probably we should not trespass beyond the limits of that reverence which is due to the Deity, if we said, that the salvation of the world is the noblest and sublimest work of the eternal mind. Ambition cannot ask for a more glorious field of effort than that which is presented to us by the Gospel. Here we are invited to associate ourselves with the son of God, in rescuing his brethren and ours from destruction. And what is the result of this divine proposition to awaken our sympathies and immortalize our deeds? Let the missionary reports of 1848 answer the question.

Passing by all other items of luxury and extravagance, we here only refer to the fearful and heartless waste occasioned by the use of INTOXICATING DRINKS. It has been said, that our voluntarily offerings for the various societies instituted for the salvation of our perishing brethren, do not amount to three millions a year! while we lavish on beverages which destroy our health, impair our mental powers, corrupt our offspring, propagate domestic misery, promote the profanation of the Sabbath, debauchery, blaspheming, premature death, and, finally, bury immortal souls in perdition—on a liquor which produces all these tremendous effects, we actually waste from sixty to a hundred millions a year!! Is it too much to ask the pious men who sigh over the abominations of the land, and especially those who bewail the decrease in our missionary revenues, to look seriously and prayerfully at these calculations? THREE MILLIONS to save the world!! and ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS in the British Empire alone, wasted on the direst pest that ever in the form of a luxury cursed mankind!!

Could our voice be heard—but alas the mention of Total Abstinence would disturb the benches and platforms of Exeter Hall, when our great philanthropists are assembled to seek the salvation of man—or else, could our voice be heard, we would say, “Ladies and Gentlemen, you may replenish your treasury; you may expand your sympathies; you may enlarge as far as needed your enterprize; and even dry your tears if you will unite with us in driving the demon of strong drink from the land. Only abstain for the sake of Him who died in your stead; put away that expensive, that accursed poisonous bowl; for the sake of a dying world practice the self-denial of the Gospel, and give up the tankard, the decanter, and the spirit-stand, and devote the sums you thus waste, to the treasury of the Gospel, and on the return of your religious festivals next May, your incomes shall be doubled or tripled. Look at those perishing souls, look at that bleeding cross, look at the glory of saving one immortal from death, and then look at that cup of poison, and ask whether it would not reflect even upon a dæmon, to allow so malignant a draught to come between himself and the salvation of his species? Again we ask you to abstain. If you love the Saviour or love the world, abstain, and your revenues shall be all you wish, and your success infinitely beyond your most sanguine hopes.”

ACTION keeps the soul in constant health, but idleness corrupts and rusts the mind.

RELIGION would have no enemies, if it were not an enemy to vice. It will avail nothing to change your religion, if your religion do not change you.

THE REVOLUTION.—A DIALOGUE.

BY D. G. PAINE.

“Well, Bill, you’re a bit of a politician; these is rum times, ain’t they? I’ve been a thinking that I wish the fellers as tried to get up a row here had done it. A revolution ’ud be no bad thing. It could’nt make it wus for working men, I’m sure.”

“Why, Jack, I think a revolution among the working men, is jest wot’s wanted.”

“Then can’t we jine in getting up one? let’s go to the open air meetings, and holler out for O’Conner and liberty, and so on.”

“No, Jack, I won’t do that, it don’t seem to me to be jest the plan.”

“Wot’s your way then, Bill?”

“Why, when I walks through the court where I lives, I sees the doors of the houses open, and if I looks in, there’s the rooms with no furniture hardly; the young ’uns, poor little things, most half starved, and all in rags; the mothers and fathers pr’aps quite as miserable; and nothing but poverty to be seen up stairs or down. They seems all of a piece. Now I mean to say, Jack, that our rooms, wot we pays for by the week, is as much our home as the man’s wot pays his rent by the year, or the queen’s wot lives in her palace for nothing; and you and me ought to have comfort in our little home, as much as any man living, and we ought’nt to be easy till we gets it.”

“That’s jest wot I think, and that’s why I wants a row.”

“Stop a minute, Jack, don’t go on too fast. I’ll tell you a secret. You know when you lived agin me, my house was jest as I’ve said, and my wife and young ’uns too; and I could’nt stand it no longer; and so there’s a revolution begun, and I’m in it.”

“Indeed! first I’ve heard on it, Bill! how long has it been on the move?”

“O, not long with me, two or three months. I’ll tell you how it was, for I should like to get you into it. One night, when I was a sitting at the White Horse, we began to talk about government affairs, though ’twas afore the French broke out, and at last we began about a revolution, and I got my head so full on it I could’nt sleep hardly all night, but kept thinking about revolutions, and wot awful willains Lord John Russell, and Sir Robert Peel, and all the rest on ’em must be; for my children could’nt get supper enough, and was obliged to lay on the floor, without a bedstead, and was a growing up all in rags and misery; and my wife no better hardly; and I got quite savage, thinking about the fellers, and I almost wished one on ’em was there, that I might knock him down for the cruel taxes. And when I sed the word taxes to myself, says I, let’s see how many taxes I pays. They talked about the income tax, I don’t pay that, to be sure; nor yet the window tax; nor yet none for horses nor dogs; but there’s tea though, I pays on that, not much, howsumever, for the old ’oman can’t buy much tea; well there’s a little on soap; but there’s none on candles, nor bread, nor butter, nor meat, nor bacon, nor cheese, nor yet on clothes, though wot I buys is mostly at the rag shop; and I began to feel cross that I could’nt find out where I paid any taxes hardly. But at last I says to myself, O says I, there’s the gin, and beer, and backer.”

“I wonder you did’nt think of them afore, Bill.”

“Well, then I calkerlated that most of the taxes as I paid was for these.”

“You’re right there, Bill, and a shame it is too; and it comes precious hard on us working men.”

“Hear me out, Jack, if you please. Thinking about the taxes as I paid in that way, made me call Ned Drinkwood to mind, who sticks so close to teetotalling; and thinks I, well, Ned gets off all this; then I’m blessed if he pays any taxes at all hardly; let me see how much does he save that way? So I tried to reckon, and I was a going to add up the Publican’s price, and then take the duty off in a lump; let's see, there's a pot of beer, and half a quarter of gin, reglar every day, that's sippence ha'penny a day, three an tuppence ha'penny a week; and the old 'oman has a pint, that's fourteen pence more, then I know she has a glass of gin now and then, to make it up eighteenpence for her lot; and then there's my extra drops, they come's to not less than a shilling; and the baker, that's eightpence; why there's more than six shillings; and then, for I forgot the tax part of it, sometimes I loses a day, and once or twice they fined me five shillings for being drunk. Well, thinks I, these is werry expensive things, take 'em altogether surely, and I could'nt get it out of my mind all day, nor the next night either. So I makes up my mind, and I goes up to Ned, and I says, 'Ned,' says I, 'when's your teetotal meeting, for I shall go jest once I think for a lark; and so he told me and we agreed to go together. Well, who do you think I seee there as soon as I got in?'

"I can't say, Bill."

"Well, 'twas Joe Summerse's wife, she as fell down with her babby when she was drunk, and the poor little thing died soon arter; she looked as clean and steady as a woman could look. However, Jack, to cut it short, I signed the pledge that werry night, and that was my revolution; my wife did the same arterwards, and afore long I pitched my pipe into the dust hole, and ain't smoked since. So there's more than six shillings saved as once. You jest come to my house some day, next Sunday if you like, and you'll see what sort of revolution I've made at home; it's a thorough one, I can tell you."

"Ah, but Bill, I should'nt like a revolution to rob a man of his lush."

"Now, Jack, that ain't common sense. You would'nt mind having a revolution to kill the sogers, as they did in France, and break open the prisons, and burn the parliament house, and send the queen and all her young'uns adrift; and you might get your head smashed, or your legs shot off in the row yourself; and yet arter all, you're not sure of having an extra penny to bless yourself with. But if you'll jine our revolution, there's no blood, no murder, no fires, no fear of you're own limbs, and you're downright sure to be a richer and a happier man."

"But how should I be able to do my work?"

"Why I ain't tried it long to be sure; but I do know that since I have, I'm quite as well; and there's Ned Drinkwood has been a Teetotaler seven years, and he's the best feller for work as our master's got about the place. You try it Jack, for it's all stuff about beer being good."

"I're a good mind to; at all events, Bill, I'll come to your next meeting."

SONG OF THE TEMPERANCE ARMY.

AIE.—"With a helmet on his brow,"

With Temperance for his sword,
And Patience for his shield,
The advocate goes forth to fight,
In Drink's wide battle field.
His cause sweet Mercy owns,
The good of all his race;
His zealous, ardent labours still Glad crowning triumphs grace.
Loud Temperance praises sound,
Our palms now brightly beam;
Teetotalers their pledge must keep,
Till Death that pledge redeem.

For the onset all are girt,
To fight each in his sphere
Vying in zeal if not in palm,
With Matthew, Gough and Teare;
An Eaton, Charleton, Cox,
Shall lead our gallant throng;
Nor will we cease our conquering,
Till tyrant Drink's o'er thrown.

Loud Temperance praises sound,
Our palms now brightly beam;
Teetotalers their pledge will keep,
Till Death that pledge redeem.

HUGH M. SMITHSON.

THE BAND OF HOPE.

BY W. A. PALLISTER.

About the close of last summer, Mrs. CARLISLE, of Dublin, visited the town of Leeds on a Temperance mission, chiefly to the young.

The well-known character of this venerable lady obtained for her an easy access to many Day and Sunday schools; while her simple addresses were well suited to her young auditors.

Much interest was excited amongst them in favour of temperance, a considerable number signed the pledge on cards supplied by Mrs. C.

It was thought desirable by the friends of temperance in Leeds to immediately follow out this favourable opening for the more direct and regular furtherance of the principle among the young. Accordingly the Rev. J. TUNNICLIFF, and a number of ladies, met Mrs. Carlisle by appointment, at the house of Mrs. Hotham, a member of the Society of friends. A committee of ladies was formed; having a lady Secretary and a male (the Rev. J. Tunncliff) President. This committee was duly recognised by the Parent committee of the Leeds Temperance Society; and the infant association was appropriately designated, the "Band of Hope."

It was resolved to hold a meeting for children on the first Wednesday in each month—Wednesday being a half holiday at the day schools;—to commence at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and to conclude at 7. To secure for the intended meetings the greatest possible publicity, printed forms are issued, stating the place where and the time when. On the week before the proposed meeting, these are sent round to the day and Sunday schools willing to receive them, and are read out to the children.

As was to be expected, in so novel an undertaking and with such excitable materials, some little difficulty occurred at the beginning, as to the best mode of securing order and attention. These are now overcome. One great difficulty arose from the large demand for pledges, and, also, for Cards of membership at the same time; which imposed more labour than the secretary could well discharge, and occasioned also a good deal of confusion. The undue labour and confusion arising out of these otherwise agreeable circumstances, is obviated by the expedient of holding two meetings in the month, at one of which pledges alone are distributed.

The pledge is as follows:—"I do agree that I will not use intoxicating liquors as a beverage."—The pledge is printed on slips, with lines for name, date and residence.

At the close of the next meeting, the pledges of the new members are received, and in exchange for them a yearly card is given, with some suitable book (commonly the beautiful little books got up by R. D. ALEXANDER, Esq., of Ipswich) for which one halfpenny is expected to be paid by each member. The committee have adopted this course from a conviction that a value is thereby impressed upon the card in the mind of the child. Having paid for it, he is the more likely to regard it with proper care. Cards of membership are also insisted upon as moral agents towards securing unity and steadfastness. In furtherance of these great objects occasional tea parties are held, and the young teetotaler who can produce his card of membership is entitled to all the good things then provided for threepence; should he not be armed with this important document, he must, like the little non-teetotalers, pay sixpence for his treat. The difference in favour of the little member who is in possession of his card is 100 per cent, besides the additional honor which he can see fairly belongs to him.

When cards have been exchanged for printed pledges, the transaction, to speak commercially, is complete, and the name is transferred to the Register. The recruit is admitted into full regimentals, and may claim all the privileges of his rank.

In order to complete the proofs of replacing pledges by cards with the least confusion and loss of time, those who have pledges to deliver are placed in seats nearest the platform—the girls first, then the boys.

Some adult person takes charge of each row, to preserve order, and transfer the pledges to the secretary or other person, and receive cards for the children in return,—a sort of official merchant, acting between the Givers of pledges and the issuer of cards. In this way the business is transacted with comparative quiet and dispatch. Pledges are not issued at meetings only, but may be had at certain appointed places, and cards in exchange for them of the President and Registrar.

This movement has been in operation now for several months with most gratifying encouragement. Rapidly increasing numbers, and considerations of distance, have induced the committee to diverge from one centre, and form district "Bands of Hope." The central and district "Bands" are under the direction and control of one and the same committee.

Some trusty person is appointed in each district as Superintendent, whose business is to see that a place of meeting is secured—that the requisite notices are given, and that all other needful arrangements are completed.

The 'Band of Hope' already includes some 1000 children of both sexes—to be the living actors on this busy stage of existence when we are no more—the fathers and mothers of a new generation. If the adoption of temperance principles be important to us, how much more to them.

We may fairly anticipate large accessions to this noble band, as exertions are continued and time wears on; nor is it unreasonable to expect that a large proportion will abide through life, faithful to the pledges of their early days. How unspeakably important is this movement in this light! and how desirable that similar 'Bands of Hope' should be formed from among the millions of the rising race of England!

These meetings of the young have a twofold advantage, inasmuch as the parents or guardians of the children, are likely to be for the first time, more deeply interested in the temperance movement.

It is hard to conceive how any adult person can look upon the array of happy faces beaming with gratification, or hear their sweet voices heartily blending in some popular melody in the praise of temperance, and the aims and hopes which it inspires, without having his feelings strongly interested and drawn towards so good a work. It may fairly be expected to accomplish more than it proposes.

To afford a more graphic idea of these gatherings of the 'Band of Hope,' let us suppose ourselves present at one of them:—

The front seats are filled with neatly dressed girls, with printed pledges in their hands; next are the fine lads, also displaying their pledges; the seats behind these are occupied with goodly rows of full members, or non teetotalers of both sexes, intermixed with their parents or friends. At the head of each form stands the person who is to take the pledges, and hand back the elegant card of membership. The good-humoured President is in the chair, supported by the Ladies of the Committee. Silence being obtained, the President rises to congratulate them on their coming together, commends their neat appearance, exhorts them to order and attention, hopes their voices are in good condition, and concludes by proposing they sing a melody by the Rev. J. Tunnicliffe, entitled 'The Temperance Band of Hope.' The song is sung in right good earnest—the chorus with especial gusto.

The chairman next calls upon some gentleman gifted with speech, to entertain the little people with 'grave and gay';—with anecdote or exhortation. The short and pointed address being concluded, the President calls for pledges. Now all hands, eyes and tongues, are at work. The Lady Secretaries draw their chairs to the desk; fill up cards as the pledges are given in row by row; the cards, with the little book, are handed over by some one on the platform to the persons in charge of the several forms, who in return hands the pence to another who is appointed Receiver General for the occasion. This exciting part of the business over, and while the new members are eagerly scrutinizing the tokens of their complete enrolment, pledges are being distributed amongst others who desire them. This being completed, the President calls for order and attention; he exhorts all to perseverance, consistency and watchfulness; he invites them to sing another piece by Mr. Tunnicliffe, 'Love shall be the Conqueror.' This excellent refresher is sung in capital style; and now another gentleman essays his powers of speech to interest the assembly, who never fail to testify their hearty approbation when anything is smartly said. As the hour for separating is at hand, the President or another person, reads, clause by clause, the 'Young Teetotaler's Catechism,' repeating the answers twice; the second time the children join in with their "most sweet voices." And now comes the end. The President calls for another melody which is responded to by singing:—

God bless our little band,
O may we firmly stand,
True to our pledge;
May we united be,
Strong in consistency,
Zeal, truth, and charity,
Courage and love.

May we for drunkards feel,
Labour with constant zeal,
God bless our work!
And we His aid invoke
To save all little folk
From the poor drunkards yoke
And misery.

May England's children stand
A noble temperance band.
Their Country's hope!
And may our cause extend Until all peoples blend
And one great shout ascend,
"The world is free!"

This brief outline of how matters are conducted at LEEDS, is given that the movement may attract the attention of the friends of the cause elsewhere, and in the hope that it may lead to similar efforts; and also, to serve as a guide to those who only wish to know in what way to set about the good work in order to begin. The manner of procedure at Leeds may not suit all localities, and may admit of improvements; and is only given, as just stated, as hints towards the great object of training the rising generation to habits of true sobriety. Beyond all question the young are our BAND OF HOPE OR FEAR.

* * * "Bands of Hope" have been formed in Westminster, and other parts of the Metropolis; and Mrs. Carlisle, assisted by friends of the young, is still engaged in the formation of Bands in various parts of the kingdom.]

RUDIMENTS OF ACTION.

BY DALMOGAND.

My TEXT is comprised in a single word—it is WHY? A small word truly; yet wielding a signal influence on human destiny. What deeds of noble daring has it not recorded in the book of time! Let us subject this monosyllable to a cursory review.

Causality or reason, ranks, at least should rank, among the chief characteristics of humanity. But, alas! it is often lightly prized—the treasury of providence, or the garniture of nature, presents to the mere animal beholder no inviting theme of admiration and inquiry. To this preponderance of matter over mind may be traced the vast amount of ignorance, prejudice, and superstition, luxuriating in every age. To a spirit of investigation, on the other hand, must be ascribed the elucidation of those majestic truths so fraught with benefit to man, so indicative of that infinite wisdom which devised this universal harmony. In confirmation, let us recall to mind Sir Isaac

Newton, that Herculean demolitionist of crude and undigested theory. What, save contemplative research, led him step by step, from his fervent ejaculation on perceiving an apple falling at his feet, to the demonstration of that brilliant philosophy which bears his name? What, again, was the watch word of intrepid Luther in his contentings with the delusion—was it not WHY?

On strict examination it will be found, that WHY? has ever been the palladium, or defence, of liberty, and the forerunner of reform. Without enquiry, how can the propriety of action be discerned?—and how can claim be laid to rationality, if reason's counsel be unsought or disregarded? Yet, ah, how many wander up and down this earth as if their reasoning faculties were banished or purloined!

Broad is the line of demarcation, great the dissimilarity, betwixt the man who acts from principle and him who yields himself captive to credulity and passion. Without discrimination or intelligent conviction, the latter bends reed-like before every gale—truth and error having been with equal indifference adopted, are with equal indifference discarded, should the maintenance of either involve aught dangerous or inconvenient. Whilst the former, with deliberative caution, embraces what seems truth and duty undismayed, and cleaves thereto unshaken. From the one class there may with ease be summoned up a piebald host of weaklings and apostates: from the other, or reflecting class, an illustrious band of valiant, energetic, faithful men, to whom persecution, suffering, martyrdom were preferable to recantation. While stake and gibbet have ceased from being current logic in our day, still all ought to sift, and weigh, and scan, in order that falsehood may be thrust aside, and right opposed to might in every form and circumstance—the final testing process being REVELATION. Names of celebrity, friends, relatives, may demand attention and esteem, but TRUTH has higher claims. Yea, though an angel from the land of glory were to gainsay the Word of God—Paul would have exclaimed "Anathema!" So were a herald from the dark abyss to re-echo some God-spoken truth, that could afford no cause for truth's abandonment.

The solemn fact of individual obligation appears sadly overlooked and misconceived. To its better understanding, let us consider that principle in the soul called conscience, or the moral faculty. It may be defined, that natural or original power by which we are impressed that this is right—that, wrong; obedience, or intended obedience, to its dictates being accompanied with an approving feeling of integrity, and disobedience with a condemnatory feeling of demerit, and an inward blush of shame. We find that its development is gradual, and a vigorous state of action dependent on culture and enlightenment. But what infatuated treatment does conscience often undergo! A mournful instance is the victim of intemperance. Advancing to the board of revelry, a whispering voice remonstrates thus:—"Think, O man, of duty to thyself, thy neighbour, thy God—bethink thee of the Judgment! but, anon, conscience falls over, rigid and corpse-like, and her demoniac silence reels forth a thrice imbruted man.

Men oftentimes make profession of being actuated by conscience, and claim consequent exemption from all blame. Now while we may blame none for listening to its monition, still we may and must condemn for not endeavouring after all available instruction. Conscience must be aided; and in accordance with the measure of its knowledge, so far, most part, will be the justness of decision. Some men make conscience of idolatry, some of self-immolation, some of murder. Are they excusable in these things?—Ah, no! Did the heathen simply reason: "Why render homage to a stock or stone—can it aid me or itself?—Why fall before the crushing ear of Juggernaut, and offer up my life to that which hath none?"—Why should I exceed the brute in cruelty?—might the Hindu mother cry, when about to cast her clinging infant to the rolling Ganges.

What the eye is to the body, such, in several points, is conscience to the soul—the former being placed as ruler in the realm of matter; the latter in the realm of mind. The visual organ, we are aware, until corrected by experience and information, arrives at strange conclusions with respect to distance, magnitude, relation. While the tutored eye will estimate aright, and promptly too, the untutored eye will blunder on without suspicion of illusion. Stands not so the case with conscience? Glance again at Saul of Tarsus for an illustration. Behold him, from a sense of duty, haling men and women to the prison's gloomy cell, scattering in his path dismay and lamentation—but, lo! a ray from the throne of the Eternal enters, and the ravening wolf expires; what once he laboured to destroy, henceforth he perils life and all things to maintain.

In a land of civil and religious privilege, it surely behoves all to attempt possessing in conscience a more prudent counsellor and trust-worthy guide. We have seen that when unaided by reason and revelation, the moral faculty proves but a corrupt judge and an insufficient leader. It is only when attended by the exercise of reason, and by the prayerful study of the Written Word, that conscience can, in any great degree, form, as it were, a telegraphic line from heaven to earth—betwixt the soul and the Creator.

Let us therefore seek rightly to employ those powers which God has given, and in reliance on His grace, struggle to emerge from the mephitic atmosphere of prejudices and error. Thinking by proxy will not do—digestion cannot be dispensed with by the body, nor can meditation by the mind. Each individual should cultivate a spirit of patient and profound enquiry, esteeming the acquisition of an enlightened conscience superior in value to a golden mine. And whilst the various topics of the age severally pass under a close analysis and calm survey, let not our country's drinking customs and statistics be slurred over. These confessedly exhibit a melancholy index of the nation's morbid state, whether as to economics, morals, or religion. How matters should have come to this humiliating pass, gives an important query, and suggests another whose satisfactory solution is incumbent upon each; it is, WHY withhold from combating this evil to the utmost? "As ye have opportunity, to do good unto all men!" is the command of Scripture—Reader, can you show exemption? It cannot be affirmed that ACTION is uncalled for; lack of influence can be urged by none.

DRUNKENNESS AND DISHONESTY are allies, not merely in so far as the drunkard mismanages his affairs and injures his creditors, but as directly entailing expense on his more honourable and upright neighbour; and the man who encourages him in his crime, and ministers to his vice, may well be regarded as a partaker in his sin, his very gains necessarily increasing the taxes and the crimes of the community.

FOUL SPIRITS!—In the year ending Jan. 5, 1848, the quantity of spirits manufactured was—in England, 5,356,794 gallons; Ireland, 5,737,687; Scotland, 8,542,219:—total 19,636,690.—The above return refers only to the quantity which upon Duties have been paid—how many millions of contraband spirits have been manufactured, no one can state.

BIGAMY.—A young couple were sitting together, in some romantic spot, when the following conversation ensued:—"My dear, if the sacrifice of my life would please thee, most gladly would I lay it down at thy feet." "Oh, sir, you are too kind! But it just reminds me that I wish you would gratify me by discontinuing the use of tobacco." "Can't think of it. It's a habit to which I am wedded." "Very well, sir; since this is the way in which you sacrifice your life for me, and as you are already wedded to tobacco, I'll take care that you are never wedded to me also, as it would be bigamy!"

CONVALESCENCE.

BY H. MUDGE.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS apply the term CONVALESCENCE to the state of body that intervenes between the subsidence or cessation of a disease and the full restoration of health: thus a drunkard has delirium tremens, cold water is dashed on his head till he falls asleep, he snores and snoozes for twelve or twenty hours, when he wakes up in his senses once more; the disease has been stopped, but the patient continues weak and nervous for three weeks longer; now those three weeks are the time of convalescence. The sick man is a subject, throughout this period, of great interest and solicitude to his medical attendant: science and art have brought the frail vessel through the stormy winds and waves in safety; but yet she has to be piloted into the harbour, and a knowledge of the particular coast has to be added here to expert seamanship.

RELAPSE, that sunken and oftentimes fatal rock, has to be steered clear of, or even now all may be lost. The period of Convalescence is generally proportioned to the severity of the disease and the treatment; cases, for example, treated with large bleedings and mercurial salivation are always tedious in recovering; and to force on such, and with a view of re-establishing health, Alcoholic stimulants are very commonly administered. The temporary relief afforded by the stimulant is gratifying to the invalid, who can hardly afterwards divest his mind of the notion that wine or porter is peculiarly strengthening: here is danger of laying the foundation for a drunkard's appetite. Medical men are therefore bound to be very cautious in prescribing alcoholic liquors; and yet how inconsiderately do many of them act. A friend of mine related to me the following case, (which is one of such exceeding folly, that it is hard to believe it occurred under medical advice,) Y Z, a young man, became the subject of Lumbar Abscess, which pointed in his back; instead of evacuating the matter at intervals as is usually done, his surgeon made an incision and let it out at once; and after this there went on, under his direction, a rare method of treatment; the patient was ordered beefsteaks with port-wine and porter to his liking. The animal diet commenced at five in the morning and was repeated at intervals of three or four hours during the day, while the intoxicating drink increased till it became one bottle of port-wine, and from four to eight pints of porter daily: not content with this internal use of stimulants the abscess was frequently injected with port-wine. The man became a curiosity to his neighbours, but ultimately died in spite of his omnivorous appetite. I wish to put in contrast with the above a case from Dr. GULLY given in his work,—“The simple Treatment of Disease”:—the subject was the manager of a wine and spirit business, whose nerves were maintained in a constant state of unnatural excitement by the stimulants in which he traded. This man was brought through the Typhus Fever to the stage of Convalescence, when the Doctor thought a stimulus would do him good. What then did he order? Porter by the pint, or wine by the bottle or the glass? No, but a wineglass of unboiled arrowroot, containing a teaspoonful of port-wine, to be taken every two hours! After six or seven doses of this the patient rallied, and it was not found necessary to give wine for more than forty-eight hours; after which the aliment rose gradually from liquid to solid farinaceous, and from these to animal. The patient steadily recovered!

We here have a beautiful example of the superiority of science to quackery, and have evidence (which we might add to without limit if space permitted,) that in cases where alcoholic stimulants are judged by some practitioners to be indispensable, a small quantity, and that administered for no very long time, will have the desired effect, if it will avail at all.

I proceed to advance a few reasons why we may well try to dispense with intoxicating liquors during the Convalescent state.

1. In most cases of severe acute disease the desire for them subsides as soon as the patient begins to recover.—This is a well-known fact: during the severity of disease the sufferer is often heard to describe his feelings as “fainting away,” “dying with weakness,” &c., but relief cannot be obtained from stimulants, inasmuch as the symptoms are those of prostration from disease, and not those of direct debility; the physician who knows his profession never yields to the desire for wine at this stage, and as soon as the disease is overcome the anxiety gives place to more or less of cheerfulness, and the sufferer gets contented without wine, that is if he is not interfered with by officious meddling friends; and as recovery progresses, confidence and care bring the re-establishment of health.

2. The administration of intoxicating liquors generally induces irregularity of function in one or more of the vital organs.—This is specially the case with the brain: most convalescent patients sleep much; and during those periods of repose Nature rapidly recruits; Alcohol excites the brain, and thus leads to a feverish, dreamy, restless state, which puts off the day of complete restoration. Sometimes the irregular action is set up in the extremities of the body, and then we hear of what is vulgarly called the disease “settling:” thus the fever “settles” in the leg, the inflammation “settles” in the eyes; and the consequence is the sufferer has to endure a “bad leg” or a “weak eye” as long as he lives! A poor recompense for a short indulgence.

3. The internal parts cannot be safely stimulated to do hard work, any more than the external ones.—For the sake of illustration take the case of a weak arm; suppose you wish it to work, the proper course to take is to appoint it work which is suitable to its weak condition, and not to irritate and excite its muscles with a pin or a rod to bring it up to work which is unsuitable: it is just so with the digestive organs, the food must be reduced to a weak and easily digestible form and consistence; and the thorough assimilation of this weak food will strengthen and prepare the way for more substantial aliment, as was seen in Dr. Gully's case. It is a lamentable mistake to load a weak stomach with concentrated strong food, as jellies, rich pastry, beef, and eggs, and then to seek to aid digestion with stimulants. The protracted and terrific sufferings that I have seen occasioned by such maltreatment have made me ever watchful to reduce the food, and to aid its digestion, by pure water rather than by alcoholic stimulants. Suppose you were to set about grinding pebbles in a coffee mill, by putting more strength to the handle, what could you expect but to jar, break, and spoil the machine? Suppose again you take a piece of glue or of wax into your mouth, your very jaws will ache before you have reduced it by chewing; neither can the stomach easily dispose of it; but glue (gelatine) and wax too can be put into a more elementary and mixed form and then readily digested. I have attended with anxiety for hours at the bedside of a patient whose stomach was writhing with spasms from the presence of a bit of indigestible food no bigger than a pea, and who has enjoyed instant ease from the expulsion of that food by vomiting; while all kinds of stimulants had been administered in vain.

4. Find Convalescence promoted and secured as well without Alcohol as with it.—A few minutes spent in giving instruction about quietude, clothing, diet, washing, air, and light are well employed; and certainly benefit the patient, if they do not remunerate the Doctor; having therefore pretty nearly attained to an independence of Alcohol, I feel no disposition to court the acquaintance of such a dangerous companion.

5. In those cases of Convalescence which seem to require a stimulant internally, I can generally find a suitable one amongst the aromatics of the vegetable kingdom: and ere long the light of Science will show, I am persuaded, that the sick as well as the healthy would be infinite gainers by the Teetotal annihilation of ALCOHOL.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF DRINKING.

As the good man has had a laugh at the expense of his wife's washing propensities, it is only right we should turn the tables, and let her have the retaliation of seeing the hole in his coat, for intemperance is lamentably too often the besetting sin of the husband. I believe that good wives very often make good husbands but I am sure that the odds are very much the other way, and that many bad husbands turn good wives into bad ones; and that the root, the great root, of the evil is the demon intemperance. It is very far from my province or my intention to read a homily on the sin and danger of drunkenness. Moral philosophy has raised its voice over and over again on this subject, and it has succeeded in working a reformation of which our times have only seen the first fruits—the richest of the harvests are, it is to be hoped, yet in store. I do not however intend to appeal to morality for my arguments; but adhering to the plan I have followed in treating of other subjects during this lecture, I shall endeavour to show you the physiology, the nature of intemperance.

In the first place, bear in mind that the blood, during circulation, becomes converted from red to blue—from vital to poisonous—it becomes in other words loaded with carbon. Next, remember that the great operation of your system is to throw off this carbon. Now all liquors (and the stronger they are the more they become so) are rich in carbon, in fact are almost made up of carbon. What, therefore, is the result of using them? It must be clear to you, they necessarily add to the amount of carbon in the blood; they impose, moreover on the lungs the labour of casting off this large quantity of carbon. To do this, the heart has to circulate the blood more rapidly—it becomes hurried in its action; the lungs increase their action, the respiration becomes hurried, yet still, do all they can, they cannot relieve the blood of its poisonous qualities. The brain being supplied with poisoned blood becomes oppressed—insensibility follows, and thus nature kindly interposes to check the mischief, by rendering the individual incapable of following his suicidal course. He can drink no longer, and he sleeps for some hours; during this sleep nature relieves herself. The excess of carbon is gradually got rid of, and the morning sees the shaking, nervous, debauchee slowly recover from his half-poisoned condition.

I have as yet intentionally omitted to state, that there is another instrument beside the lung whose office it is to decarbonize the blood; I mean the liver. Through this organ the blood, the blue blood of the viscera, the bowels, and other organs, passes in its course to the heart, and is partially decarbonized; the carbon, thus removed from the blood, being used for the formation of bile. Let us apply this to the condition of the drunkard. Is he not generally sallow, bilious, and very often subject to disease of the liver? You now see the reason. The blood of the drunkard, loaded with carbon, is passed to a liver which does all it can to remedy the evil. It works inordinately, secretes an excess of bile, becomes itself diseased with over action, and in its efforts to remove an evil creates another, by throwing an excess of bile into the system. Now this is the philosophy of drinking. I need say no more on the matter, for if such arguments fail in going home to you, the remonstrances of moral preaching would be speaking to the "blind lightning or the deaf sea."

Before I leave this subject, I will give a strong illustration that the arguments on which we operate are true. In high northern latitudes you know the air is very cold, and it is consequently condensed. For the sake of illustration we will put it thus—two pints of air are reduced in bulk so as to occupy one pint only. The Greenlanders, consequently, where we consume one pint of oxygen consumes two pints; he can therefore dispose of double the quantity of carbon which we can do—and what is the result—he seeks for things rich in carbon; he finds it in blubber and seal oil, and these he enjoys, because it is an appetite implanted by the natural conditions which surround him. The European under like circumstances, I mean consuming a double quantity of oxygen either from exposure to cold or by the action of exercise, can also dispose of a double quantity of carbon; and he also accommodates himself to surrounding circumstances by consuming a larger quantity. I might also point out how in hot climates, the exact reverse is the case, and how disease is readily generated by excesses in diet and drink. Here the quantity of oxygen is reduced, we will say to one half; we can consequently dispose of only one half the quantity of carbon.

In addition to the other hurtful properties of strong drinks, it may be stated that Alcohol, the intoxicating ingredient in those drinks is a powerful, irritating, narcotico-acrid poison, and often soon seriously injures a stomach, brain, liver, kidneys, and other organs—when taken even in small quantities, it renders the blood less capable of absorbing oxygen, and it was found by Dr. Prout, that a smaller quantity of carbonic acid gas is thrown off the system. When taken in large quantities, as is so commonly the case, this effect is much increased, while at the same time an enormous quantity of carbon is introduced into the system. Again, the evil is further greatly augmented by the more rapid circulation of the blood, owing to the stimulation of the drink; which does not, like healthful exercise in the open air, occasion at the same time a corresponding acceleration of respiration—hence the blood passes through the lungs with a very inadequate supply of oxygen, and with a proportionably diminished capacity for adding increased vitality to the animal fibre throughout the frame. Altogether, the evils consequent on the use of alcoholic drinks can hardly be over estimated.

* * * The foregoing is extracted from "a Lecture delivered at the Police Court, Sunderland, By REGINALD ORTON," in connection with the "Sunderland Working Men's Health Association." It is entitled,—"On the Influence of Cleanliness, Ventilation, Temperance, and Exercise, in Promoting Health and Happiness." It has been reprinted at Bristol, in a cheap form, (sixteen closely printed pages for one penny). It may be had of C. Gilpin, London; and deserves to be very extensively circulated.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE.

BY THOMAS WHITTAKER.

If ever thou hast felt another's pain,
If ever when he sigh'd hast sigh'd again,
If ever on thy eyelid stood the tear
That pity had engender'd, drop one here.

SOME few weeks ago, when attending a large and exceedingly interesting Temperance festival in a fashionable town in the west of England, I was put in possession of the following fact. Mr. S., who, twelve months previously, was a local preacher in the Wesleyan Society, and who had filled every office that a lay member could fill in that Society, frequently occupying the principal pulpits in the Circuit, a respectable and respected tradesman; was nine months ago, suspended as a preacher on account of drunkenness; three months ago he was turned out of society altogether, for the same sin; and whilst I was engaged exhorting the people to escape from the snares of the public house, and guard against the dangerous habit of moderate drinking, he lay a murdered drunkard; his disconsolate wife a widow, and his large and interesting family overwhelmed in grief and shame. A few days before the meeting, he had been seen in a public house in company with some disreputable people, quite drunk; he left the public house for his own house, some few miles distant; on his way he fell or was thrown from his gig, and received injuries of which he died the same night. The affliction drove his eldest daughter mad, and cast a general gloom over the town in which he had long lived in great respect, having formerly administered to the moral welfare and temporal comfort of many of its inhabitants.

On the day succeeding the meeting, when urging a minister of the same Church to become a Teetotaler; as a justification for standing aloof from the Temperance Cause, he said that some few years ago when stationed in the neighbourhood, he had espoused the cause, and given his consent for the Chapel to be opened for meetings; which was repeatedly done, until a set of Infidels came down from Manchester and preached their infidel doctrines from his pulpit; then, said he, I felt called upon to close the Chapel against the meetings, and withdraw from the society."

Supposing all this to be true, what does it prove? Simply that none are so bad as not to have a redeeming trait, while none are so good but they might be mended. An infidel becomes a Teetotaler, and this good man leaves Teetotalism. A Christian, and a Christian Minister too, becomes a drunkard, yet he feels no disposition to abstain. Here is an individual at whose house this same Minister has repeatedly ate and drank; at whose family altar he has oft bowed; in whose supplications to the throne of high heaven he has felt privileged to join; with whose family he has again and again taken sweet counsel, and gone joyfully to the house of God, slain at his feet—sacrificed in the meridian of life by strong drink; the wife smitten, stricken, bruised and crushed, a weeping testimony against the iniquitous system; the eldest daughter raving mad, and refusing to be comforted; the family scathed by the destroyer; the town appalled and struck dumb by the affliction; religion brought into contempt, and Christ put to an open shame. Yet this minister who sometimes sings,—

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine, Demands my soul, my life, my all!"

feels no calls from heaven above, nor moanings from the pit beneath, to stand, like Aaron of old, "between the living and the dead, that this plague may be stayed."

An infidel becomes a Teetotaler, and this Christian felt bound to withdraw from the society, lest he should patronize evil and partake of other men's sins. A Christian becomes a drunkard, and, as such, he is suddenly called to the bar of God, and yet the bottle is in the vestry, and on the Lord's table, and his own breath smells of liquor!

Surely the words of the prophet are applicable now, "they are all dumb dogs which cannot bark." Infidels preach an important branch of morality! What then? It is high time for Christians to bestir themselves, when infidels take the lead in moral reform. One would think that the man who was so fearful of letting in evil, when in the neighbourhood of Manchester, would, when made acquainted with such a case as that to which I am referring, and which came under his observation in the west of England;—surely he ought, on the first sabbath succeeding it, from the pulpit of the largest chapel he had access to, solemnly call upon the congregation to "escape for their lives," and not tarry in the streams of moderate drinking, lest they, like their poor lost brother, whose voice they had so repeatedly heard from the same pulpit, should be lost in the Ocean of Intemperance! But, no! he is shorn of his strength. The Philistines, moderate drinkers, bind him hand and foot, put out his eyes, and he goes out groping for the wall at noon day.

We have heard a great deal of the infidel cry of late; but when such as the gentleman to whom I am now referring, join in it, we are reminded of the man who, when pursued by the mob, in order to put strangers on the wrong scent, joins in the cry, of "Stop thief!" I believe it is quite as common for drunkards to preach religion, as it is for infidels to preach Teetotalism. But shall we, because of that, in the one case neglect religion, or in the other despise Teetotalism? What is this infidel cry but a repetition of the conduct of Christ's disciples, when they said, "Lord, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbade him." Teetotalism never made an infidel; but the conduct of Christians towards Teetotalism has made many. "It must needs be that offences come, but woe unto him by whom they come." Let a Teetotaler demur to the use of intoxicating wine at the Lord's Table, and he will be put down as a sower of discord and a schismatic; but let a hundred be driven from the table of the Church by strong drink, and they will be buried "in sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection," and the vestry will still stink of liquors, and the social meetings of the members be disgraced by smoking and drinking. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is the grand distinguishing mark of unerring wisdom. We have been too long preaching people into heaven, as it were, to the neglect of that "righteousness," which "exalteth a nation." Let the people be taught how to live here, and let the teachers set such examples as the people may with safety follow, and we shall not any longer have to satisfy ourselves with talking merely about the promises of Religion, but shall be permitted to possess and witness its power.

"Sighing and smiling as he takes his glass,
Which they that woo preferment rarely pass,
Fallible man, the church bred youth replies,
Is still found fallible, however wise,
And differing judgments serve but to declare
That truth lies somewhere, if we knew but where."

COWPER.

So said Cowper, in his day, and thus do men in our day trifle with truth, and withhold that assistance which is essential to the well being of our country.

THE DRUNKARD A SUICIDE.—The drunkard is a murderer both of soul and body—his habits prostrate the intellect, however splendid, and ruin the constitution, however firmly knit; and having wrecked the noble powers of the one, and palsied the living energies of the other, consign both to an unenvied, a dishonoured, and a premature sepulchre.

TESTIMONY REJECTED.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times and Essayist.

"Contempt prior to examination, however comfortable to the mind which entertains it, or however natural to great parts, is extremely dangerous, and more apt than almost any other disposition to produce erroneous judgments of persons and opinions."
—PALEY.

When the great Apostle Paul preached at Ephesus, an outcry was raised by persons who had an interest in what he condemned: the whole city was moved—not to investigate into the merits of the Eternal Truths which the teacher was commanded by his Divine Master to expound—but in answer to the cry—"great is Diana of the Ephesians." The goddess was "great" to the copper-smiths, and to those who worked in adorning false altars—and the gain thereby secured appears to have eclipsed their vision. Let a truth be presented now, and do we not find that the disturbance at Ephesus is an illustration of human nature?—and is it not seen that "contempt prior to examination" is attended with many lamentable consequences respecting the progress of right views and opinions?

I am led to make the above remarks in consequence of having had their truthful application experienced, in the rejection of a medical man by the Committee of "The Town Hospital" of Guernsey, because he entertained strict Temperance views. Dr. Collette has been refused the appointment, and the plea urged for such rejection was, that if elected he would be the means of destroying the inmates, by suddenly and at once cutting the patients off from the use of the accustomed beverages. The Doctor in reply maintains that abstinence would benefit, and in proof of the position brings forward strong "testimonies," which are of the first importance as connected with the Temperance Reformation, viz:—Mr. Barbet, the Governor of the prison, says that "24 out of 25 persons are brought under his care through the effects of alcoholic stimulation; that when they enter they are immediately cut off from the use of intoxicating liquors, and no evil results therefrom." Mr. Purdon, the Governor of "the Richmond Penitentiary," says, after 20 years experience, that "out of 20,000 prisoners a great portion committed through drunkenness, he never knew an individual suffer from being at once cut off from anything stronger than milk."—Dr. Carrick, of Bristol, says, "during 40 years experience he never knew any injury arise from immediately leaving off intoxicating beverages."—Sir A. Carlisle, of London, says "he is convinced of the safety of sudden transition from strong drink to water, and that in the most inveterate habits."—Dr. Collette informs us that "the Town Hospital" spends £200 per year in intoxicating liquors—and even allowing that alcohol may be useful under certain circumstances, £20 per annum is sufficient for that purpose."

Here we have a case of the rejection of a Medical man upon false premises, because he has borne his TESTIMONY against drinking usages and habits; and the directors of a public charity violate the physical laws which regulate our being, and persist in their refusal of a person who would vindicate the adaptation of these laws to patients. This is a second edition of the Ephesian cry; and it is imagined, that as in the case of the workmen at the altars of the false deity—interest giving birth to prejudice—is at the bottom. Such is the price paid by the Doctor for his "TESTIMONY;" and as long as evil remains—when a "TESTIMONY" is to be borne, the advocates must sit down and count the cost—waiting patiently until the soundness of their position is discovered.

We have proved as above that £180 per annum is thrown away, leaving out of our calculation the sad seeds of future evils which such an expenditure in drink produces. The £180 might be much better employed in something like the following manner; viz.,

Three schoolmasters at £40 per year each, for educating 100 children.....	£120
Cost of a Circulating Library.....	30
Cost Temperance publications for distribution	30

which would be a permanent benefit—enlightening minds—training moral sentiments—and advancing the human race in improvement, but drink! drink! is attended to before instruction; "The Bottle" presides over the Assembly, and what is the result? why ignorance and a sad moral waste, where light and fertility might reign.

The greatest advance which Medical Science has made of late years—perhaps for a Century—is the recognition of the fact that intoxicating liquors are unnecessary;—and when the influence of the opinions of Medical men is known—their falling in with "the Temperance Reformation" must be deemed of the first importance.—Mr. Collette deserves the thanks of the abstainers throughout the Empire for the manner in which he has brought the question before those Committees who manage public institutions.

I close with the language of "the Bard of Avon," who did not fail to discover the fact in his day, that partiality puts merit aside, and that ignorance backed by interest pushes its way to power and authority:—

"Oh! that estates, degrees and offices,
Were not derived corruptedly, and that dear honour
Were purchased by the merit of the wearer:—
How many then would cover that stand bare?
How many be commanded that command?
How much low peasantry would then be gleaned
From the true seed of honour!—and how much honour
Picked from the chaff and ruin of the times,
To be new varnished!"

Truly yours,
WM. HEWETT.

Fowey, May, 1848.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

SEVERAL very interesting meetings were held in the metropolis and suburbs during the Easter Week; and, as the result, a number of persons signed the pledge of Total Abstinence. We find that at most of these meetings some of the oldest and most influential advocates addressed themselves, chiefly, to the members of the Societies, and, in a tone of reproach, complained that the zeal and activity of the majority of the members was by no means in proportion to the urgency of the case, nor in accordance with the stirring and active spirit of the present times. They reminded the members of the great personal obligations they were under to the principle of teetotalism, and admonished them, as they valued their own character for consistency and gratitude, and as they desired to promote the real welfare of the community, to zealous and persevering exertion. It is evident, from a variety of circumstances, that the public mind is in a more prepared state for the reception of teetotal doctrines than at any previous period; and the intimate connexion of the Temperance movement with the success of other great movements, whether Educational, Sanitary, Political, or Religious, will leave teetotalers altogether without excuse if they do not manifest corresponding activity.

The Hon. JUDGE MARSHALL, from Nova Scotia, has delivered several impressive and instructive lectures, during his short stay in the metropolis.

HUNGERFORD, BERKS.

On Easter Monday, the Society in this town held its accustomed annual festival, which was celebrated by a Tea Meeting in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, and a Public Meeting in the Town Hall. It was regarded as a proof of the good feeling of the authorities towards the Cause of Teetotalism, that the use of the latter commodious place was at once granted free of all charge, such never having been the case before. Mr. R. Osmond, of Linkenholt, farmer, presided; and after a few judicious observations, called upon Mr. Harrison, Independent Minister, of Ramsbury, who supported the claims of the Society; after which Mr. D. G. Paine, of Deptford, delivered an address, embracing the most prominent features of the Temperance question, but especially combating the opinion that Total Abstinence, either as a practice, or a principle of duty, is unscriptural. The audience, which was more numerous than at any previous meeting for a considerable time past, paid the most gratifying attention to the statements made; and although Mr. Paine, by permission of the Charman, gave an unqualified invitation to any one present, to point out a flaw in the reasoning which led to the final inference,—that every Christian was bound to discontinue the use of Intoxicating Drinks,—none availed themselves of the liberty. Eight signatures were obtained to the pledge.

The Society here, though once very flourishing, has from circumstances which are certainly peculiar to this vicinity, declined in its prosperity; but it has among its friends several who are far too staunch and steady to yield, and they are looking hopefully forward, to see the cause of Total Abstinence once more influential in the little town of Hungerford.

BATH JUVENILE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Two very interesting meetings in connection with our Society, have recently been held in the Society's Room, Walcot street. Subject—Cruikshank's plates of the Bottle.

At the first meeting Mr. K. Matcham, was called to the chair, who after delivering an interesting address, called on Messrs. T. Martin, W. Dowling, F. Hilyer, and J. Cogswell, members of the committee, to deliver addresses on the five first plates of the bottle, showing the progress of intemperance in its various stages. The young present seemed much interested in the proceedings, and 23 signatures were obtained at the close of the meeting.

At the second meeting, Thomas Martin, secretary to the Society, presided, who, after a short address, called on Mr. Willeday, (late of Bristol,) who delivered a most interesting address. Mr. Matcham reviewed with much interest the eight plates of the "Bottle," introducing facts and arguments enough to convince the most prejudiced; also practical experiments on the contents of the articles generally contained in the "Bottle," showing that alcohol in whatever shape, was not only useless, but injurious to the human system, and strongly appealing to christians and philanthropists, to assist in the noble enterprise of banishing strong drink from our beloved country. Nine signatures were obtained.

THOS. MARTIN, Sec.

DORCHESTER.

Mrs. Stamp was engaged by the Dorchester Total Abstinence Society, to give two lectures on the moral and social evils of intemperance, in the Shire Hall, which was kindly granted by the Mayor for the occasion. On Monday and Tuesday the 24th and 25th of April, there was a large and respectable attendance, and the lectures were able and impressive, and it was manifest that the attention of the meeting was deeply arrested. The second night we had a larger audience, and the same excitement manifest on the part of the hearers. 30 signatures were obtained in the two evenings.

The Society made a second engagement with Mrs. Stamp. On Monday the 1st of May, a Public Tea was held in the New Corn Exchange, near the Town Hall, which was lighted up with gas on the occasion for the first time. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, the Shire Hall was granted by the renewed kindness of the Mayor. On Tuesday evening, a lecture was delivered to a meeting of Females, on "Woman's mission;" and on Wednesday night, Mrs. Stamp closed by an impressive address which was listened to with the greatest attention. 25 signatures to the Society's pledge were the result of the three evening's addresses.

SCRUTON, NEAR NORTHALLERTON.

The Anniversary of the Teetotal Society was held here on Good Friday; a Tea meeting was held at the House of Mr. Marshall (who is a warm friend to the Temperance movement), at which a goodly number partook of the beverage which refreshes but not inebriates; after Tea a Public meeting was held in a large barn, and the meeting was addressed by the Revd. Mr. Savage, Wesleyan (Bedale), and Messrs. Browne, Lundie and Sale, of Northallerton, when strong appeals were made to the "little drop men," after which several signed the pledge.

It is pleasing to know that a mighty change for the better has been wrought in this village through the influence of the Temperance Society.

W. LUNDIE, Secretary.

PRESTON, LANCASHIRE.

In the week commencing 16th April, a Tea Party and meetings were held in connection with the Parent Society, and Grimshaw Street Sabbath School and Congregational Temperance Society, as follows:—On Sunday the 16th the Rev. R. G. Mason preached three excellent discourses; in the morning and afternoon in the Independent Chapel, Grimshaw Street, and in the evening in the Theatre. All the services were well attended, particularly the one in the Theatre. On the Monday evening, a respectable meeting was held in Grimshaw Street School, the Revd. R. Slate in the Chair, and an excellent address was delivered by Rev. R. G. Mason. On Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday Evenings, Meetings were held in the Theatre. His worshipful the Mayor, J. Birchall, Esq., presided on Tuesday, and excellent addresses were given by G. S. Kenrick, Esq., of West Bromwich, Rev. R. G. Mason, and Mr. T. Whittaker, of London. On Wednesday Mr. Lowe, silversmith, was in the Chair, and the meeting was addressed by the Revs. R. Tabraham, of Clitheroe, R. G. Mason, Rev. R. Slate and Mr. T. Whittaker. On Thursday the 16th annual meeting of the parent society was held, Mr. G. Cartwright presided, Revs. R. G. Mason, Jobling, Mr. J. Whittaker, and others, spoke. On Friday Evening a Tea Party was held in Grimshaw Street School. After Tea the first annual meeting of Grimshaw Street Branch Society was held, the President, the Rev. R. Slate occupied the Chair. After the Report, which was of a cheering character, was read, and the officers for the ensuing year appointed, the meeting was addressed by the Chairman, the Revd. R. G. Mason, Messrs. Swindlehurst, Howarth, Compton, Simpson, and others. On the Saturday Evening, a Washingtonian meeting was held in the Theatre, His Majesty, Mr. Swindlehurst, presided, and several of his loyal and dutiful subjects related the benefits they had received through becoming abstainers.

ULVERSTON.

The Second Annual meeting of the Ulverston Total Abstinence Society, took place on the evening of Easter Monday. The respected ex-president of the Society, Mr. Edwin Stirling, occupied the Chair, and opened the proceedings by an excellent and appropriate address. After which Mr. J. Malcolmson, the Secretary, read an interesting report, in which were detailed the operations of this flourishing Society during the past year. It appears that there are now 226 members good on the book, a clear increase of 117 members since Easter Monday 1847. The money received by the Society during the year amounted to £47. 18s. 10d., leaving a balance of £5 9s. in the Treasurer's hands. A committee for the ensuing year was appointed, and the officers of the society re-elected.

WATLINGTON, OXFORDSHIRE.

The cause of Temperance has revived in this town. Two meetings have lately been held in the Town Hall, and between 20 and 30 signatures obtained. The Rev. J. Downey, of Thume, and others, in a convincing and affectionate manner advocated the principles of Total abstinence before crowded audiences. Considering the amount of practical opposition which prevails here, they were well received, and there is reason to hope that the subject will be thought of and examined by many who have hitherto, through fear or prejudice, never given it their attention.

GLOSSOP, DERBYSHIRE.

The Friends and members of the Glossop Dale Total Abstinence Society, held their seventh annual Festival on Good Friday, April 21. The members of the Independent order of Rechabites, and the Teetotals met in front of the Town Hall formed themselves in a procession and went to the Independent Chapel, Little Moor, when the Rev. Thomas Alkin preached a very impressive sermon from the 5th Chapter of Ephesians, 18th verse—"And be not drunk with wine wherein is excess;" in the course of which he strongly urged parents not to set their children drinking examples. After the service they proceeded to the Town Hall, where about 600 persons partook of the refreshing beverage, Tea. The company then increased to upwards of 800, who were very highly entertained with appropriate Recitations, &c. and after a few closing remarks from the chairman, the meeting separated very much edified.

J. OLDFANE, Secretary.

HASTINGS.

A Public Tea Meeting was held in this place, on Wednesday 17th May. Upwards of 100 took Tea together and the meeting was a good one. Mr. J. Rock, Senior, presided, and addresses were delivered by F. Beck, Secretary, Rev. J. T. Willmore (of Rye), J. D. Bassett, of Leighton Buzzard.—Mr. A. Morris, Jun., (of Lewes), and lastly by that excellent and powerful Advocate T. Wittaker, who, in a speech of great force, displayed the numberless benefits which would result to individual families, and the Nation, &c., from the general adoption of Temperance Principles—9 signatures were added to the Pledge Book.

JAMAICA.

The Kingston Morning Journal contains a detailed account of a large meeting held in the Baptist Chapel, in East Queen Street, Kingston. The Chair was taken by the managing director of the Kingston Railway, William Smith, Esq., on the occasion of that gentleman, his brother, and a large body of English railway labourers being desirous of uniting themselves to the Kingston Total Abstinence Society. A great number of merchants and other influential citizens attended the meeting; and at the close, 112 persons signed the pledge, amongst whom were most of the clerks, engineers, and apprentices connected with the railway establishment. The following day the Secretary of the Society (the Rev. G. Rouse) visited the Railway Station, and the pledge was there administered to 32 more; and it is said that nearly every person connected with the railway are pledged teetotalers.

An incident occurred of an unusual and highly interesting character. The Rev. S. Oughton had to move a resolution:—

"That this meeting rejoices in witnessing respectable and influential persons, with others of the working classes, pledging themselves to abstain from alcoholic drinks, and would fervently and affectionately commend them to the care of Almighty God."

But on rising he addressed the Chair as follows:

"Mr. Chairman and Christian friends—I can scarcely imagine for what purpose the resolution which I hold in my hand was committed to my care. It is a resolution of congratulation to those who have come to this meeting for the purpose of signing the total abstinence pledge, and, of course, in order to be consistent, ought only to be moved by one who had himself set the example. I can only, therefore, regard my situation, as the mover, as a sort of conspiracy; for it is well known that although I have for the last seven years entirely abstained from the habitual use of alcoholic liquors, that still I have not signed the pledge. I have not done so for two reasons—first I entertained a high value for that which I considered my liberty, and regarded the pledge as savouring too much of the yoke of bondage to feel very willing to become entangled with it; and, secondly, I entertained an opinion that, whilst wine was altogether unnecessary on ordinary occasions, there were circumstances in which its use was both proper and necessary, and I regarded my severe exertions on the Sabbath day as one of these. On those accounts, as well as for several other reasons which it is not necessary to recite, I have hitherto refused to take the pledge. But a few minutes before I ascended this platform, a gentleman (to whom wine and strong drinking have been for years a dreadful snare) asked me whether I could say that I never took wine, and how long it was since I drank the last glass. This question was to me a stunning blow. I remembered that last Sabbath when exhausted, and streaming with perspiration, I entered my house from the pulpit, well knowing that in a little more than two hours I should be obliged to return to my anxious and arduous labours, I drank a glass of port; I took it conscientiously believing that it was under such circumstances justifiable; but I then saw that that single glass of wine had robbed me of my strength in fighting the battles of temperance; that that single glass of wine, in my case excusable if not absolutely indispensable, might be employed in order to justify the excessive and sinful use of the same intoxicating drug; it was a new light suddenly bursting on my mind, and brought to recollection subjects of the most painful interest. I thought to myself, how important was the position which I occupied; I am placed in the providence of God over a church and congregation, consisting of twelve deacons, thirty-three leaders, and three thousand people, to whom I am not only to teach the truths of the everlasting gospel, but to present a pattern of all holy conversation and godliness. And ought I to indulge in any thing by which my ministry might, by any possibility, be hindered? ought I to consider any sacrifice too great, if by it the torrents of vice and drunkenness which are overwhelming our land, may be arrested, and the temporal good, and everlasting interests of precious souls advanced? I felt that I ought not. I was ashamed and confounded, because, for one poor glass of wine a-week, I had lost an opportunity of doing good to one who greatly needed it, and given an excuse to many for the indulgence of a debasing and destructive vice. On this account Mr. Chairman, I feel that this resolution ought not to have been placed in my hands. I am not fit to congratulate others for signing, when I have abstained from signing myself: but it shall be so no longer. I return to you, Mr. Chairman, the resolution which I cannot move, because I have made up my mind to place myself amongst the number of those who are the honoured objects of its congratulations and its prayer. I will sign the pledge myself. (Great excitement and loud cheers.)

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The Temperance Societies of Hamakua embrace all the churches and all the schools. The pledge precludes the use of tobacco, as well as intoxicating liquors. The Missionary Herald states that Mr. Lyons found that few comparatively had violated their engagement, and most of these renewed their pledges.

BARBADOS.

We have received a file of the West Indian, a paper which devotes a portion of its space to Temperance operations and advocacy. We find that some of the best articles are taken from the Teetotal Times and Essayist; to this we have not the least objection, but we do think it due to us that the editor should acknowledge the source from whence he obtained them. The number for March 6, contains a report, occupying nearly seven columns, of the first anniversary meeting of the Total Abstinence Association. It was held in the Moravian Chapel, in Roebuck Street, which large building was filled at an early hour, and the space round it crowded with an attentive auditory. The HON. HAY MAC DOWALL GRANT, delivered an address of considerable length, embracing the most important points involved in the temperance question. In the course of it he stated that all the rum made in the Island was consumed in it, and that 40,000 gallons in addition had been imported during the year; making together 760,000 gallons consumed by 130,000 inhabitants—equal to six gallons, or thirty bottles, to each individual, a consumption almost incredible. The value of the rum alone thus made use of, might be estimated at £60,000 sterling; a sum of money annually expended in doing evil to the inhabitants of the island.

The report stated, that during the past year the number of members enrolled amounted to 447, exclusive of those who were known to have broken their pledge. Some few had gone back to their former habits of intemperance; but the number was by no means as large as that of individuals excluded from any section of the Christian Church, for the offences of which such Church might take cognizance. Honourable mention is made of the Teetotal Essayist, and especially of those numbers in which Testimonies were published, to the Anti-infidel tendency of the Teetotal movement.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The South African Commercial Advertiser occasionally advocates the cause of total abstinence from strong drinks. In some numbers now before us, the evils of the canteen system are depicted in gloomy colours. The Society at Fort Napier is in a prosperous condition, though at the time of writing, the members were lamenting the removal of Sergeant William Leighton, who had gone to England to be discharged, he having completed his service in the army. As Mr. Leighton is now in England, and may probably appear at some of our meetings, we take this opportunity of annexing a copy of a Testimonial, the original of which, a beautiful piece of penmanship, is now before us.

FORT NAPIER TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY, Founded 24th May, 1844.

Sir,—We, the undersigned, on behalf of the members of the above society, beg leave to express our sincere regret at your departure from amongst us, and to request you will accept this acknowledgement of our unaffected gratitude and esteem for the praiseworthy and untiring zeal with which you advocated, by precept and example, the cause of temperance for a series of years, but more especially during your sojourn at this station; and we earnestly hope that you may be long enabled to advocate the same philanthropic principles; and that, in revisiting once more your native land, you may long continue to enjoy the comfort and happiness of that system which you so unweariedly and to so much purpose advocated amongst your brother soldiers (in the land of Africa) in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope.

Given at Fort Napier, 16th October, 1847.

Signed, &c.

To William Leighton, Sergt. 1st Battn., 45th Regt.

VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.

From some numbers of the Van Dieman's Land Temperance Herald just received, we find that the principle of Total Abstinence is making progress in that important colony. The Tasmanian Teetotal Society had held several interesting meetings, one of the chief speakers being Mrs. Dalgarão, well known to our friends in London, especially in the eastern portion of the metropolis. At Launceston, Evandale, Perth, and Longford, also, good meetings have been held. The harmony has, on some occasions been disturbed by "lewd fellows of the baser sort," set on by men connected with the traffic in strong drink; but order has soon been restored, and numerous additions have been made to the Societies.

The Ship Lock-na-gar, at the port of Launceston, affords another addition to the mass of evidence already supplied, that the use of intoxicating drinks is not required, even during the most arduous labour on land or at sea. The officers and crew of this ship were engaged to navigate her, on the express understanding that no such drinks would be used. The vessel experienced very heavy weather from the Cape of Good Hope, and off the entrance to Bass's Straits was for some time in imminent danger; but none of her men used strong drinks, although exposed to be very unusual fatigue. Coffee was occasionally supplied when the cold and wet rendered a stimulant necessary; and the men themselves testify that the substitute was, in every respect, better for them than rum.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

CHRISTIAN CAMPAIGNS, under the GREAT CAPTAIN: descriptive of enlisting, drilling, garrison duty, marchings, encampments, skirmishings, battles, sieges, bombardments, cannonadings, stormings, cantonments, &c. By a CHRISTIAN SOLDIER.—London: B. L. Green, Paternoster Row.

This little volume contains an interesting and instructive Allegory, the object of which is to explain and illustrate some of the most important circumstances connected with the Christian's life, from his first enlistment in the army of Christ, to his triumphant admission to everlasting glory. It is from the pen of a Wesleyan local preacher, and a very warm Temperance Advocate, and can scarcely fail to interest and profit the old campaigner or the young recruit.

THE CHRISTIAN ASPECT OF TEETOTALISM. A Lecture by SAMUEL C. GREEN, B.A., of Taunton.—B. L. Green, Paternoster Row.

Having listened to the delivery of this Lecture with much pleasure, we rejoice to see it in print, as we think it calculated for great usefulness, especially among professors of the Christian religion. Mr. Green recommends Teetotalism, as a means of cure—as a safeguard—and as an example; and founds upon this threefold aspect an affectionate and energetic exhortation to its general adoption. We wish the Lecture a wide circulation.

REPORTS OF TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

1. First Annual Report of the Borough of Greenwich Temperance Association. Greenwich; Seaward, London Street.

2. Fourteenth Annual Report of the Bolton Temperance Society.—Bolton; Bridge, Bradshawgate.

3. Eleventh Report of the Belfast Total Abstinence Association.—Belfast, Mullen, Ann Street.

Single copies of the TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST will be sent regularly, post free, to every Subscriber of ONE SHILLING, per annum, in advance. Societies and individuals desirous of availing themselves of this very economical and efficient mode of advocating Teetotalism will be supplied with copies at 6s. per hundred, which will be sent to them free, either in parcels, or in single copies, to persons whose name may be furnished. Thus a subscription of three shillings will ensure the sending of important information to fifty individuals, or to one hundred, if six shillings be subscribed.

TO POSTMASTERS.

This Journal is privileged to be sent postage free to every part of the United Kingdom, and we have the authority of the Secretary of the General Post Office for stating "that Agents may be employed in Great Britain and Ireland, for the sale of JERSEY Newspapers; and that such Newspapers may be forwarded by Post to any extent, either singly, or in parcels, provided the parcel is open at the ends. They may afterwards be re-posted for any part of the United Kingdom, free of Postage, and for such of the Colonies to which there are Mail Packets, but in the latter case the re-posting must take place within seven days after the date of publication of the Newspaper."

EXAMINE AND INQUIRE.

BY THE REV. ARCHDEACON JEFFERYS, BOMBAY.

Mr. A. Pray were you at the anniversary of the Temperance Society last night?

Mr. B. No, I do not approve of Temperance Societies.

A. As you have made up your mind, and thought it unnecessary to attend the annual meeting for reformation, I conclude that you have already taken the utmost pains to inform yourself upon the subject. Have you read the Report of the British House of Commons on the Extent, Causes and Evils of Drunkenness?

B. No.

A. Of course you have read the Reports of the American Temperance Society, now collected into a most valuable volume, entitled, "Permanent Documents?"

B. I have read none of these.

A. You surely then have read the writings of those authors, who have devoted their attention to the subject in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and especially the Reports of the new British and Foreign Temperance Society?

B. No, I cannot say I have.

A. Nor the various tracts published by the last named Society?

B. No, I say I have no time to read these things.

A. Whence, then, did you derive your information, since you seem to have decidedly formed your opinion on the subject?

B. Oh, I know all about it; it is all contained in a nutshell.

A. The clear-hearted and perspicuous Paley, has the following instructive observation. "If we would inquire why the Roman Governors, Statesmen and Philosophers, men of sense and education on other matters, were so grossly ignorant of the nature and tenets of Christianity, though it was professed by thousands before their eyes, and was fast becoming the religion of the Roman people, the answer is resolvable into a principle which is a bar against all information, which is proof against all arguments, and which cannot fail to keep a man in everlasting ignorance. This principle is Contempt prior to examination."—First, hear and examine, and then judge of a cause, is one of the plainest maxims of justice, sense, and reason. It is a violation of all these, to prejudge either a person, or subject, and condemn them without a fair hearing. Some persons, it is true, argue that they already know all that can be said upon a subject, and all the arguments that can be offered in its support, when they must be conscious that they have taken no pains to obtain the necessary information, nor read the arguments of others who have bestowed upon it their time and attention. Thus, they take up their own crude notions and say, "I think so and so," and dismiss the subject. Now this is precisely the way in which you have treated the subject of Temperance Societies; you fancy that you already know all that can be said about them: but where did you obtain your information? If, indeed, you had read the numerous valuable works already alluded to, and then made up your mind that you are master of the subject, there would be some sense in that, but if not, let us pause a while, and soberly consider the matter. Hundreds of men delegated from every state, town, and district of America; men chosen on account of their superior talents; professors of the university of Great Britain and Ireland; able statesmen and divines of England; have spent years in diligent and laborious examination of the subject; have expended upon it the whole strength of mind and ability that it has pleased God to give them; they have made statistical returns, embracing almost millions of facts; they have spared no pains, no labour, in collecting the result and publishing it to the world; and yet you think that you know more about the subject than all these men, who have bestowed upon it their united wisdom, and the labour and devotion of years. Let me advise you, my good friend, not to condemn yourself to perpetual ignorance on any one important subject, for I doubt not, but there are many upon which you are a sensible man, and why should you not be so upon all? Why should you remain wilfully ignorant upon so important a subject as this, involving, as it does, the happiness of millions of your fellow-creatures?

B. You talk thus, but you will find a difficulty in bringing many to your way of thinking.—I believe that Temperance Societies are foolish and mischievous institutions.

A. I am far from requiring you to be of my way of thinking. I only ask you first to inquire and then judge for yourself. To form an opinion of his own is the right of every rational being. If after patient enquiry, and seeking information from those sources whence information is to be obtained, you still come to the conclusion, that Temperance Societies are foolish, or mischievous institutions, or that there are no existing evils in the country of a sufficient magnitude to call for their operation, you have an undoubted right to form these opinions; and the sincerity of your inquiry is an affair between you and that Being, who gave you the gift of reason that you might use it. But you have no right to make up your mind upon the subject, until after diligent and sincere inquiry; neither have you any right to dismiss the subject, without inquiring into it with all the powers of mind that God has given you.

B. Why am I bound to enquire into it at all?

A. Because it has been proved by the evidence of witnesses, examined before the British House of Commons, by the evidence of the keepers of all the penitentiaries and jails, of England, and Scotland, and Ireland; by the testimony of the judges of the land, the Magistrates, the heads of the police department, and the physicians of our public hospitals, it has been proved I say, by the united testimony of all these, that intemperance among the lower orders, the chief cause of which, we must admit, is the use of fermented liquor as a beverage, is, directly or remotely, the cause of one-half of the disease; two thirds of all the poverty; and more than three-fourths of all the crime of England. It has been proved by the best statistical returns, that more than five hundred souls die weekly the death of the drunkard and enter the drunkard's eternity—that the amount of misery endured by the fathers, mothers, sisters, wives and children, of these wretched beings, exceeds all calculation—that intemperance sends the drunkard home to abuse, and in many instances, to murder his helpless wife, and starves her children. Now unless you can believe that all these witnesses have entered into a conspiracy, without any assignable reason, to deceive the public, and that all such statements are false, when a remedy is proposed, and especially a remedy that cannot fail, if universally adopted, to secure a sober population, you are bound to give it, at least your candid and serious attention. But these evils, great as they are, are not to be mentioned in comparison with the moral desolation, the wreck and ruin of all moral principle produced by intemperance. It is found by incontestible experience, that intemperance sears the conscience, corrupts the heart, and brings a blight upon every moral, every religious, every social and domestic feeling, and renders a man a nuisance to society, a sorrow and curse to his family, and a suicide to himself, in so dreadful a sense of the word, that it were good for him, that he had never been born.

Now the origin and the growth of intemperance have been ably traced to the mistaken customs of the age, and a remedy is proposed, which has wrought wonders in America, beyond all that could have been conceived possible, and has already done immense good in this and other countries of Europe: and which promises to become one of the greatest blessings to mankind.

B. I admit all the evils you have described, but I do not believe that Temperance Societies will cure them.

A. You have taken the best possible course to insure that they never shall, and if every body follows your example, of dismissing their claims without examination, and not even giving them a fair hearing, they certainly never will. But my good sir, I say again, you have no right to form your opinion on this subject, which involves the happiness, temporal and eternal, of millions and millions of your fellow-creatures, (and you know not for how many generations yet to come) without bestowing upon it the most diligent examination and all the thinking powers that God has given you.

Do, pray, come out of this absurd position, and read what the champions of the cause, and the geniuses of England and America have written upon the subject, and then form your opinion. If the cause were ten thousand times more valuable than it is, contempt prior to examination, would leave you still ignorant of its value.

In you, it may be thoughtlessness; but there are some subjects upon which thoughtlessness is crime. Intemperance is making shipwreck of the happiness, corrupting the morals and destroying the souls of your fellow-creatures by millions, and if not arrested, the destroying flood will roll on to future generations. A remedy is now proposed to arrest the march of the destroyer; and to refuse to weigh and examine its claims is to incur guilt in the sight of Heaven. By all the ties of country; by all the claims of humanity; by the spirit, and the commands of the holy and benevolent religion of Christ; you are called upon to examine and inquire.

ARSENIC.—To give a bead to whiskey, small quantities of arsenic are now added by some manufacturer to make the liquor appear of a higher proof than it is. Arsenic and alcohol may both be useful for certain purposes; but we would submit the question to the common sense of the community, whether arsenic and alcohol united are healthful mixtures to be deposited in the human stomach. No one drinking wine or distilled liquors at the present day is safe from a poisonous drug, or from a little arsenic.—New York Organ.

HOW TO ADD "DRUNKENNESS TO THIRST."

Deut. xxix. 19.

BY B. PARSONS.

God made and still makes "every thing good." Hence all the appetites and passions of man as far as they are the work of the Creator are "very good." Nothing that is wicked or polluted in the Universe can be traced to our Heavenly Father. Sin is sinning, it is not a substance but an action, a particular kind of action, consisting in doing wrong instead of doing right. If people could not sin it would be impossible for them to be holy, because they would have no liberty; they would be religious from necessity and not from choice, and therefore not religious at all. A very large class of sins consists in abusing, or misusing God's mercies. Barley is "very good," so are grapes, apples and grain, and yet man can convert these divine creatures into poisons, and with them ruin the health, stupefy the intellect, madden the passions, harden the heart and destroy the souls of his species. My Christian Brother, those drinks which alternately invigorate and unnerve your body and mind, and, unless you abstain, will without fail take you to the bar of God before your time, have sent hecatombs of bodies prematurely to the grave, and hecatombs of souls to the bottomless pit; yet there is no sin in the barley or the vine, the guilty agents are the manufacturers, the vendors, the dispensers and the drinkers. So in the appetites of man there is nothing evil or depraved. Hunger is good, thirst is good, and every other natural desire is good also; nor is their any sin in their proper use. Reason was given us to control our appetites; God's word was written to guide us to the extent of self indulgence and self denial; and the Holy Spirit is promised to impart unto us divine courage to rule our passions. Hunger may degenerate into gluttony. We can add gluttony to hunger. All sorts of expedients may be tried and used to create an unnatural appetite. The gourmand resorts to hundreds of tricks to provoke hunger. Cookery is now becoming a most complicated art: some looking at the complication of diseases and the myriads of deaths, it has produced, call it the "black art." The culinary and the medical professions are intimately related, and the latter ought to be very liberal to the former, as their best and greatest benefactor. How many we have seen drop, years before their time, into the grave, literally killed by the cook! They fell like unripe fruit. Gluttony suffered neither body nor mind to arrive at maturity. From indulgence in eating I have known a valuable and popular minister of religion cut short his days and die in agony. His frame was a mass of living putrescence, and his pains all but intolerable. The bloated countenance, the ulcerated limbs, the fever in his brain and the rottenness in his bones had all been produced by high living. He was much esteemed, his lips had fed many, and hundreds bewailed his fall, but his appetite was his ruin, and yet there was no sin in the desire for food which God created; it was the man that pampered hunger until it ended in gluttony.

The same may be said of thirst. The desire for liquids is natural, and this appetite is also very good. Nineteenths of healthy blood is water. Evaporation and secretion are constantly going on, and were we not to drink, our bodies would soon become as dry as an Egyptian mummy. We must therefore drink or die, and we read or rather feel the goodness and tender mercy of our creator in causing us to feel the sensation of thirst and the consequent exquisite gratification of satisfying it. To the thirsty man a cup of cold water is as delightful as nectar. Wordsworth in his "Old Oaken Bucket," beautifully painted this pleasurable emotion of the water drinker:—

"How sweet from the green mossy rim to receive it,
As poised on the curb it inclined to my lips,
Not a full blushing goblet would tempt me to leave it, Though filled with the nectar that Jupiter sips."

Bucket.

We might have been created incapable of deriving any pleasure from drinking, or might have absorbed liquids with as little sensation of what is going on, as we are of the secretion of saliva, bile, or gastric juice. It is because God loves us that he made us susceptible of thirst. In every sense this appetite in its natural state, is good; there is no sin or imperfection as it comes from God, and it cannot be vitiated, but by human agency. Not a few fathers and especially mothers spend a large portion of their time, and study in corrupting the appetites of their offspring. No pains or expense are spared to produce unnatural hunger and unnatural thirst, and afterwards in attempting to glut and satiate the cravings they have called into existence. Hunger is not merely supplied but gorged, and the appetite for drink is not simply satisfied but literally drenched, and thus "drunkenness is added to thirst." Thousands of parents, by these arts, write themselves childless, or scourge themselves with a family, weak in body, and imbecile in mind.

The text in Deuteronomy which originated this paper deserves particular attention. The word rendered, "drunkenness," means "to soak or drench," and thus the idea is the same as that suggested by the English term "drunk;" for "a drunken person," is the simple designation of an individual who is drenched with liquor. "To add drunkenness to thirst," is therefore to add drenching to thirst. Thirst demands drinking, but does not require that we should drench ourselves or become sots, any more than hunger renders it imperative that we should degenerate into epicures. The history of drunkenness is perhaps one of the most remarkable instances of human folly in abusing and perverting the goodness of God. We all know that to allay thirst is exceedingly grateful, but because it is thus pleasurable mankind have wished to prolong the luxury, and therefore have invented a variety of drinks calculated rather to excite than remove thirst. The wish of the Indian that "his throat was a mile long" that he might to an equal extent enjoy the taste of rum, contains a tolerably good description of the origin of more than half the drunkenness of the world. Men strive to be sensualists, and, to accomplish their object, abuse the choicest mercies and gifts of heaven. Pliny tells us that it made him blush to record the various schemes of the drunkards of his day to produce thirst. They exhausted themselves in baths, they ate various substances likely to have this effect, and mixed their liquors with numerous drugs calculated to incite their appetite. Here you have with a witness "drunkenness added to thirst." Historians inform us that the Hebrews were addicted to similar practices that they might become "mighty to drink wine and men of strength to mingle strong drink." How many also in our day are equally guilty. Multitudes drink not because they are thirsty, but because the liquors taste deliciously. Water is the only thing that can quench thirst. Other substances that may be mixed with it cannot accomplish this object. In the case of milk, the stomach curds the solid part, the absorbents drain off the water, and then the cheesy material is digested. Those who take milk make a dairy of their digestive organs, instead of having the churning and cheese making done before hand. The stomach of an infant is the finest dairy in the world. In soups, &c., the liquids are filtered, the water goes into the blood, and the solid parts remain for digestion. Of course, spirit, which is lighter and more subtle than water, is absorbed and both corrupts the blood, and produces a thousand injuries on the nerves and brain. As a beverage therefore, man wants nothing but water, and the numerous drinks which are invented are compounded for the purpose of tickling the palate, increasing thirst and inducing people to drink more than nature demands, and inundate their arteries and veins with liquors that the most imperative, physical, intellectual, and religious motives call upon us to avoid.

Were men to eat bread or beef that produced hunger every one would laugh at their folly or condemn their extravagance, and yet this kind of insanity is continually practised by those who use intoxicating drinks. The spirit, for whose sake, these beverages are taken is a liquid fire and produces heat, fever, inflammation and thirst. Hence the end of drinking is contravened, and the appetite instead of being satisfied is quickened. Pot after pot, and glass after glass are swallowed, and still the poor deluded victim is always thirsty. He has a clammy tongue, a feverish skin, a burning stomach, inflamed intestines or diseased liver. What quantities of medicine he takes, and yet the doctors cannot cure him! His complaints are chronic, and at last he is exhorted to make his will. Health in this world, he is told, is out of the question. The only physic on earth that can cure him is cold water, but of that he has a greater horror than the poor maniac who has been bitten by a mad dog.

But the worst fact of all is, that this use of a beverage which increases thirst so often leads to drunkenness. What so natural, so reasonable, yea so moral as to quench thirst? Does not nature teach and religion dictate this duty? And why not do so with a warm, comforting, pleasing liquor? Who in these days would be monks or ascetics? "Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die." How vain to add, "Be not deceived," "God is not mocked." These poor deluded victims of a false appetite are determined to deceive themselves. A deceitful lust of their own creation hath turned them aside so that they will not say, "Is there not a lie in my right hand?" That tankard, that glass, that decanter is a deadly falsehood, it promises life, and while it does so, inflicts death; it proposes to allay thirst but instead of this it increases it. With the Horse leech's daughter, it perpetually cries, "give give!" and becomes the incentive to intoxication and every vice. Every draught creates the desire for more, until drinking becomes drenching, and the poor slave exclaims, "I shall have peace, though I walk after the imagination of my heart, and add drunkenness to thirst." For all this delusion, disease, woe and ruin, how simple the remedy, "Do thyself no harm," abstain from fire waters, drink God's own beverage, and thou wilt never "add drunkenness to thirst."

RATIONAL ENJOYMENT.

Why do the masses of the people when they seek enjoyment almost invariably indulge in sensuality? We have no hesitation in replying—because by their conforming with the drinking customs of the country all their finer perceptions are deadened. There is no other reason why working men have no higher taste for enjoyment than that of breathing the polluted atmosphere of a filthy public house, and their purchasing their own debasement. No sooner do men shake off the authority of these demoralising customs, than they immediately rise in the social scale, and prove that by their improved habits and tastes, they derive pleasure only from the lovely and the beautiful.

The city of Edinburgh was visited a few days ago by the workmen of J. D. Carr and Co., Carlisle. For several years past Messrs. Carr have, with a liberality which does them the highest credit, given those in their employ an annual pleasure trip. Newcastle on Lyne, Whitehaven, Windermere, the most interesting places in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, have from time to time been visited, and every succeeding excursion seems to be more enjoyed than its predecessor. All employed are abstainers, else these excursions could neither be afforded nor enjoyed. Would that mankind would abstain from intoxicating drinks, and lay hold of those higher and nobler pleasures, which are so bountifully provided for them, & which, but for their sensuality they would know how to appreciate. And would that all employers could see it to be their duty to give up their Wine after dinner, and thus be the means of rolling that stumbling block the Beer barrel out of the way of those they employ, and thus wipe away the stain that disgraces our national character, that we are the most drunken people in the world.

THE WINE QUESTION.

THE following is the principal portion of a letter addressed to the Corresponding Secretary of the American Temperance Union, by L. M. SARGENT, Esq., the well known author of "Temperance Tales," and other works on the Total Abstinence question. The letter contains an acknowledgement of the receipt of some learned dissertations on ancient wines, and a comparative defence of the right to drink genuine wine, and the possibility of obtaining wines that will not make drunk, &c., &c. As those dissertations were written by Professor Stuart, Dr. Nott, and other learned men, they, of course, contained numerous references to the languages in which the Scriptures were written, and many quotations in HEBREW, and other learned languages. Mr. Sargent questions the utility of such dissertations. He says "If temperate men desire success, they will keep clear of Greek and Hebrew, and consult no oracle but common sense." And, again:—"For the adjustment of plain, practical questions, a head full of Hebrew, is one of the very worst heads in the world." He then proceeds as follows:—

"We desire to relieve the world of the evils of drunkenness, in the best possible manner. There is surely nothing in our blessed bible, to prevent our joint and several pledge, that we will avoid the use of alcohol, in every form and quantity. What is it to us, that Paul advised Timothy to take a little? The Corinthians, doubtless, took Paul at his word, and they took a little. Paul thought they took too much, because they got drunk at the Lord's Supper. Noah got drunk, patriarch as he was, doubtless by mistaking yayin for tirosk. Now, Sir, it seems to me that, as the temperance reformation is a republican institution, and, in no sense, an oligarchy, the very best course for every individual, will be, hereafter, to trouble his head, as little as possible, with such terms as tirosk and yayin, and to go straight forward in the work of reform, in plain English, practically adopting and enforcing the principle of total abstinence. Let no man, who values consistency or sincerity, consult an oracle. Men of uncommon sense, and secluded lives, and deep in Hebrew, are, in no respect, the most able advisers, when the matter in issue directly concerns the business of life. One granula of common sense is better, on such occasions, than any imaginable amount of the uncommon kind. I would say to the friends of the reformation, throughout the world, the freedom and energy of whose action has been frequently impeded, and whose valuable time has been consumed, by biblical disquisition—I would say to them, in the masculine language of the prologue to Addison's Cato,

'DARE TO HAVE SENSE YOURSELVES.'

"Strong common sense and earnest philanthropy are able to carry forward the reformation to the utmost. Its progress, in my humble opinion, has been too often retarded, by certain patrons, who, like the patron of Dr. Johnson, have overburdened it with help. One gentleman finds, or thinks he has found, a distinction, and he delights to repeat it, that fermentation is God's work, and distillation is man's work; while most temperance men are thoroughly convinced, that both are, too frequently, the Devil's work. Another finds a distinction, which never existed, except in the degree of fermentation, between two kinds of wine. Upon this distinction there arises a theory, that the good wine may be used with propriety, by total abstinence men, though it contains a little alcohol, if it does not intoxicate. Well, Sir, such friends of temperance, as have never been afflicted with Hebrew, about twenty thousand to one, clearly perceive, that the vitality of this glorious enterprise is to be destroyed, by a thrust between the joints of the harness. They fly to the rescue, but are earnestly importuned to suffer the distinction to pass unchallenged. The writer's feelings will be wounded—he is advanced in years—Professors are awakened and urged to ransack the Hebrew mine and set the forge in blast, for the purpose of framing protective armor—the suit is forthcoming, and with a facility greatly surpassing that of Vulcan, another is provided for the opposite party—and, with a truly oracular readiness, yet another, for him, who first applied—with the motto on the corset "Sero redeat in calum." It has been said of Mirabeau, that, when his parents quarreled, and determined on divorce, he was the privy counsellor of both.

"If we are really in earnest, when we style ourselves cold-water-men, it is quite superfluous for us to discuss the difference, between the wines of olden or of modern times, with any view to the regulation of our own practice. It is enough for us to know, that the yayin and tirosk of the Hebrews became, somehow or other, so confounded—the labels got upon the wrong bottles, no doubt—that the poor Jews could not distinguish the curse from the blessing; and became, at last, such intolerable drunkards, that God's curse was denounced upon all Jerusalem. If we had a store of genuine tirosk approved by Dr. Nott and Professor Stuart, I sincerely believe we should be as badly off as the Jews. We should still have our yayin, and terrible mistakes would continue to be made, as of old.

"The impediments cast in the way of our progress, by the production of these verbal subtleties, reminds me of an applicable anecdote, which you will undoubtedly remember. A Roman admiral was in pursuit of a Carthaginian fleet. As they drew nearer every moment, and a battle became unavoidable, the haruspex, who always accompanied the Admiral, and who was in alarm, came on deck, and informed him, that the sacred pullets would not eat. This was a bad omen. The Admiral ordered them on deck. "They will not eat?"—"No sir," repeated the haruspex. "Well," said the Admiral, kicking them overboard, cage and all, "let 'em drink, then." He now overtook the Carthaginians, and obtained a signal victory. Such would not have been the results, had he lowered his sails, and come to anchor, and wasted his time in a long argument with the augur, on the subject of the sacred pullets.

"Now sir, I do not propose to kick anything overboard, which is entitled to respect. But I fully believe these long and labored discussions to be exceedingly stale and unprofitable, so far as they have any bearing upon the matter in hand, and I am therefore for kicking them overboard. Very interesting, doubtless, they are to certain Hebrew scholars. Surely drunkenness was not more effectually prevented, in former days, than it is at present. Surely it cannot be so certainly prevented, by drinking any kind of wine as by drinking water. We have avowed our object, let us enforce the most simple and effectual means for its attainment. Let us then adhere to our purpose, in all simplicity, and purity, and godly sincerity, and be more in love with the cause than with ourselves, and more eager to advance it than our own reputation for superior talent or learning. For I greatly fear, that, if our attempts to promote this great enterprise are to be retarded at short intervals, by these biblical constructions, and if we are to be interfered with, in our efforts to persuade mankind to drink water, by intimations from reverend presidents and professors, that wine of any sort is a very biblical beverage—infidels will come to the conclusion, that the reformation would make greater progress, without the bible and these learned expositors, than with them."

GIN versus WATER.—"Can there be said to be an absolute want of power to pay for water, while you have displayed before you in your streets such a jower of spending upon gin?"—"I am quite willing to express the tendency to spend money upon a luxury of that sort, as they consider it, when they would not spend it upon water."—Report of Sanitary Commission.

BOB BURLEY.

A TRUE STORY.

By the Author of "Spring Leaves of Prose and Poetry," &c.

WE find, that some parties who are wishful to claim particular attention, from certain classes, have a method of adapting ways and means to attract the eye and ear, in such a manner that the bait is generally successful. Look, for instance, at the display showered into one of our draper's windows—the women go, hot-foot, and are so delighted with the gaudy colours and rich fabric of this or that; who can wonder that, after they are thus wrought upon in a quarter where their vanities are so profusely administered to, they become frequent visitors, often at the cost of domestic economy, perhaps of honesty. Yet, we cannot blame the draper, he seeks out the very best means for insuring their notice and patronage.

The itinerant player, or sleight of hand juggler, owes a great portion of his success to the large and startling bills which he posts at every street corner, to fill with amazement and curiosity such portions of the community, as have nothing better to waste their time upon. He has a peculiar class to serve; we care little for his pretensions when he puffs about "the British public;" he owes his fluctuating prosperity to one portion only of the public. Who has not seen the tavern keeper swelling in the sun like a June porpoise, with a few of his dirty slaves about him, hanging up the new bridle on his sign post, to gather the swilltubs of the neighbourhood together to talk about the donkey race? Or, if he plays for higher game, we find him occasionally patronising a printer; he gets up a very pretty looking bill, announcing "a splendid picnic party, — a few tickets may yet be had by early application,"—for several days you may observe Boniface making himself busy in the neighbourhood, nodding and bowing to such of the middle classes as have yet money and precious time to spare for gluttony and folly, nor care for tampering with character and constitution. The landlord knows his dupes; he offers his spice for the full grown children,—he spreads his net, and the "pretty fly walks into his parlour."

It is not, however, to be doubted, that whatever his profession and character, every one who administers to the million, considers that he has a legitimate right to use every means within his limits to engage their attention. Now, we may fairly presume that it has often been a question of great importance to the author who seeks for genuine food for the mental table, to know the best and readiest way of claiming the attention of those for whom he feels interested.

Perhaps, in our endeavour to awaken the notice of the working classes, to see their present position, we cannot present them with a picture more suited to their capacity, than one which we can draw from actual life, and where there is no need of fiction to give force or colouring to the delineation.

Let us then take our present sketch in the vicinity of the factory. Certain it is, that we have only to become intimately acquainted with the ingoings and the outgoings of those living masses, whose occupation is in the factory; and the various lights and shadows present themselves in truthful order, for the descriptive crayon of the painter. Then to our tale—

Everybody in our neighbourhood knew BOB BURLEY. In his boyhood, he was the leader of a tear-down, noisy, and mischievous tribe of youngsters, who, after their day in the mill, spent their evenings in rioting at the street corners, and annoying every passer by. It is true that Bob had learnt to read and write; at the Sunday school he had been considered a fine sharp boy; but it is a sad thing to know, that in too many instances, as in the case of Bob Burley, the knowledge so benevolently given, is turned towards the debasement of themselves, and all within the sphere of their influence. Was there a song of odious and obscene character; our factory boy, Bob, was sure to know it. He delighted in torturing dumb animals; and, to their shame be it said, the men of the factory took occasional joy and fierce pleasure in seeing him maltreat, and mercilessly use, any strange boy that might pass the factory during a meal hour. Like many of the boys employed in mills, he soon began to presume upon the importance of his weekly earnings; his parents might be said to have little or no controul over his conduct. If there was a redeeming trait in his character, it might be this: he never sought the company of those youths who had the character of being light fingered. Notwithstanding his reckless and boisterous demeanour, he seemed to be preserved from mating with felons, though nothing were easier and more likely. Bob was a daring, uproarious street-brawler; but strictly honest.

We must now be allowed to pass over a few years spent in the factory, during which time nothing had been done towards elevating his mind. Everything to debase and brutalise, but nothing to enlighten and refine. If he was ever found reading, it was a playbill, some obscene song, or the announcement of an alehouse ball. In person he was athletic and manly, but the noblest part being utterly neglected, what a pity it seemed to us to call such a clever-looking young man, "an ignorant brute." It would, indeed, be an untruth, to say that his mind had never received any impressions, for it had been moulded by the associations with which it had ever been most familiar, to a great amount of depravity and low cunning.

The small beer houses offer great opportunity for every species of juvenile wickedness. Gaming, prostitution, thieving, and every filthy thing that disgraces the annals of the working classes, and fills our prison calendars, may be traced directly home to those haunts of the devil!

In a house of this description, it was now Bob's delight to be considered a lion, ready for anything. He had arrived at man's estate—he still wrought his day-work in the factory; but the greater part of his nights, he passed in the beer house. Such conduct was certain ruin in the face of it; but the ignorant mind rests at ease beneath the veil of its own making, and is blind alike to cause as to effect. Brutal sports are the pastimes of such characters, not only are their week day hours of leisure misspent, but their sabbaths are devoted to the most revolting acquirements.

Very frequently, large numbers of the factory operatives of a commercial town may be seen coming out in groups, unshaven, unwashed, from their narrow streets, proceeding in the most disorderly way towards the suburbs.

The sun shines upon them, the birds sing around them, and the very breeze that fans their unwashed cheeks seems to whisper them a kind invitation to peacefulness and virtue. But what calls them forth into the fields? is it, that having been imprisoned within thick walls for a long and toilsome week, the mind seeks for a holiday in revelling among the green world of nature's beauty?

Is it, that finding their health impaired by having to spend the greatest portion of their lives in a most injurious atmosphere, they come out to the wood and glen, wooing the genial breath that would invigorate and bless? Ah no, we must speak the truth;—it is the time of all others—that blessedly glorious and beautiful sabbath morn, that is the very period they have fixed upon for some debasing spectacle; some pugilistic encounter, some dog fight, cock fight, or other degrading amusements of sabbath-breaking notoriety. Among such a group, Bob Burley was quite at home. He was generally very conspicuous among the clique to which he attached himself. With a short black pipe in his mouth, and his hideous-looking bull-dog at his heels, there was our hero! You would hear him profusely thundering out (with a voice hoarse and unpleasant from his Saturday night's debauch), fearful oaths! breaking the serenity, and awfully disregarding the solemnity of that morn of rest.

As it is the object of the writer to give a recital of facts, the lovers of fiction may be disappointed in not finding anything of a very romantic character in the true history of Bob Burley. We are wishful to show that as the boy—had been neglected in early years, and left to the sad training he received at the street corners, and in the beer house: so, as the man—developed those grown and fully matured vices, he was a desperate character—a pest to society—and a true production of what we may ever look for, from all who have been surrounded and actually nurtured, among the dark elements of brutality and ignorance.

It was one beautiful morning in the autumn of 18— that we saw our hero, figuring among a wedding party, and then on his way from the parish church, where he had just been performing the part of "old father," (giving away the bride) to a fellow worker in the same factory. The whole party seemed to have been indulging at the tavern.

There is a practice too common among the working classes generally, of stepping into a public house, the moment they get out of the church. Perhaps we may be told that some of the more respectable classes drive off immediately to a distant town; and there the bride is ushered into her nuptial chamber, by the landlady, with her carbuncled nose—redolent of tap droppings—this, friends, is too true. It is a disgrace to the better educated—the polite—the superior class in our country. Still, there is a marked difference in the two cases, though both are socially wrong. The artisan spends his honeymoon at home; and why indulge in riotous and boisterous exhibition? Will the years of connubial bliss he looks for, compose a sweeter domestic picture, because the drunken wedding party figures in the foreground? Can he say hopefully,

Bright be the coronal of bliss,
That future days shall date from this!

Is there ought of the delicacy of the young bride, or the usefulness of the future mother, mixed up in the besotted lessons of the pot house "wedding spree?" Young factory workers, reason answers—NO. On this occasion, they were evidently touched at an early hour with what they had been drinking. Such scenes are quite common in large mercantile towns, and as an usual sight we passed it by.

However, on the following morning, rumour had a thousand versions concerning a murder that had taken place during the night: and all seemed to include the name of Bob Burley! Having so often witnessed the daring and heartless conduct of the man implicated, we walked down to the Town Hall, and there saw the bridegroom standing at the bar of justice, about to be committed to take his trial at the county assizes, for the manslaughter of Bob Burley! The story of the night's debauch would not benefit any one, nor have we any desire to emulate some of the filthy caterers for the public mind by either Mysteries or realities, that foul and debase the bright source of sense and virtue, publications, which ought to be brought forth and publicly burnt, seeing that they are a darkly disgusting exhibition of all that demoralizes mankind! Humanity weeps to see such trash in the hands of the toiling artisan. But to our too true tale. Of course our wedding party were principally from the same factory, had all been acquainted from early years.

The sense of delicacy with many of those females is utterly lost sight of. They interchange their loves in the mill so many times, that it would be a difficult thing to know who was the affianced one in most cases. Now, it seemed, that the young woman just married, was, for some time courted by Bob Burley. He, however, at the time of the wedding, had another, to whom he was shortly to be married: and they all danced and drank together until midnight; when, in the midst of their drunken freaks, Bob staggered towards the bride, and, in the wild delirium of his drunken fancy, declared his sorrow for allowing any one else to marry her, as he had always intended having her himself! This, too, was accompanied by an actual demonstration of his fervency: he was embracing and otherwise showing his familiarity with the bride, when a blow from the husband changed the scene. They were both acknowledged to be pugilists, both strong and young,—the contest was terrible,—but Bob "was the worse for liquor," and he fell dead on the floor!

It is impossible that we can gain admission into the factory, or have an opportunity of reasoning daily with the millworkers upon the necessity of their striving to come out from the filthy haunts of sin, and learn to think and read; to honor the spiritual, and leave the earthly; to cultivate an acquaintance with high moral principles, to know a proper self dignity; with love to God and love to man, which shall enable them to enjoy peace: We cannot be allowed to dictate to them as to what they shall do with their earnings; or how they shall dispose of their leisure hours; but, surely, we can hold up to their view living pictures, which must claim their attention, being faithful transcripts of their own life and manners.

How shall we better serve them, than by showing them the results of a certain line of conduct, terrible in its form and expansion, and awful in its end! Again, the pleasant path of rectitude must be laid out before them; nor must we fail to tell them that one road is rude and thorny, abounding with savages more rude than the untamed beasts of the forest; and that the other is frequented by the wise and good of all countries.

The fate of poor Burley was no uncommon case, save in the instance of the wedding. Parties quarrel on their way home from the tavern, and we frequently hear of men receiving lifelong ailments, received at those times. Seldom do we read the assize news of any large county, but we are apprised of the fact, that intemperance has been at work in some brutal assault or other; sometimes upon unprotected females:—and too often as in Bob Burley's case, DEATH has ensued from the blows of an associate, under the maddening influence of strong drink! Reason and love depart when the monster drunkenness makes his début, and it is impossible that any pen shall draw the dark limits of what may be the horrors of such a life. It almost seems impossible to describe the loathsomeness of the inebriate,—now, when the trees are budding, and the fields smiling in their vernal dresses around us; we feel that it is a going back into dreary winter,—that ten thousand thunders open their voices in the dark midnight of sorrow, at which humanity recoils and shudders!

At this period, when the million are more than urgent for an extension of their political rights; it is of the greatest importance that they duly consider the necessity of raising themselves in the estimation of government. It is quite evident, there is a prevailing opinion in high quarters, that, until a disposition is manifested by the operative of using his senses as befits a MAN, there is already as much citizenship allotted to him, as he is worthy of. The improvidence that necessarily accompanies drinking indulgences, robs the people of their independence; throws the glance downwards to the earth, that ought look proud defiance to the oppressor,—ignorance and insolent bullying, is all that the besotted brute brings forward, as his argument against lordly wrong; he is treated as a worthless nonentity by his rich and more forfortunate fellow mortal; Avarice thinks him to be just a slave moulded for slavery; and the political tyrant wields over him the sword of wrath, so the brute tamers awe the wild beasts of a travelling menagerie! Artisans of England, think, oh think!

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this society was held on Thursday evening last, in Exeter-hall, which was filled in every part. The chair was taken by W. CASH, Esq., who commenced the proceedings by remarking on the enormous expenditure occasioned by the use of strong drinks, and on the evils which resulted from their use; and by expressing his belief that if the practice of total abstinence was more generally adopted, it would greatly promote the intelligence, the morality, and the comfort of the working classes, and indeed, benefit, more or less, every class of the community. As to education, he believed that if the parents among the labouring classes were strictly sober, they would not rest till their children were provided with a good education, which they might receive for twopence or threepence a week; and many of them spent three, four, or five shillings a week in strong drink.

Mr. HUDSON read the report, and JOHN MEREDITH, Esq., submitted the cash account. It appeared that the income for the year was £1,303 17s. 2d., the disbursements were some few pounds less.

The following letter has been received from Father Mathew:—

“Cork, 23rd May, 1848.

“My dear Friend,—I regret that recent severe illness has prevented me from sooner acknowledging the receipt of your letter. Your annual meeting will, I confidently trust, be attended with its usual beneficial results. It will cheer the friends of temperance to hear that our sacred society is still pursuing its onward progress, and has come forth from our late tribulation purified like gold from the furnace. We have fallen, it is true, on perilous times; yet, taking Ireland as a whole, not one in five hundred has been found base enough to violate his most solemn pledge. The whole of the rising generation is being enrolled under our spotless banner, and the result of the late Special Commission in Clare, Limerick, and Tipperary, lead us to expect, with the divine assistance, that our dear afflicted country will be soon one of the most moral on the face of the earth. Not one faithful teetotaler has been found guilty of being implicated in the outrages that have brought so many to an untimely end. Whisky has ever been the fatal source of crime in unhappy Ireland. It is also true that the pestilence that has ravaged our country has passed lightly over the teetotalers; there have been but very few who did not recover from that fatal disease. Like the cholera, the intemperate were its victims. These facts, more powerfully than the tongues of the most eloquent, demonstrate the blessedness of total abstinence. With sincere wishes for complete success of your and my dear friends' exertions, I am, with high respect, dear Mr. Hudson, yours devotedly,
“THEOBALD MATHEW.”

The Rev. J. KENNEDY, A.M., of Stepney, moved the first resolution, recognizing with gratitude to God, the success of the operations of the society as detailed in the report. If the advocates of total abstinence could not say as he of old, “I came—I saw—I conquered,” yet the day was breaking, and there was hope that such a time might come. The facts which could be adduced contained a fountain of argument; and the motives to exertion could not soon be exhausted. It was a fact, that in the course of one year eight or nine million quarters of precious grain were destroyed in the manufacture of strong drinks, which grain would, if not so destroyed, furnish as many millions of persons with wholesome and nutritious bread. And yet, while seasons of comparative famine visited the land, very few thought upon that fact. Let them bring that one fact before statesmen, patriots, and Christians; and dwell upon it till it told upon the country at large. There was another important fact,—the disproportion between the amount raised by various benevolent and religious societies, and that spent on intoxicating drinks. For the former, about £700,000 were raised; on the latter, upwards of £50,000,000 were spent. Those societies were often said to be the salvation of the country, the glory of the age. But if so, what must be said of the age and of the country, when against the £700,000 raised for those societies, upwards of £50,000,000 must be placed, raised for what was a chief instrument of mischief and ruin? If those societies were justly said to be the means of averting the wrath of the Almighty, what must be said of the habits upon the indulgence of which so large a sum was expended? If the God of heaven were not a God of mercy, how fearful would be our prospects! But that was not the worst, not only was so large a sum consumed in the use of strong drinks, but those noble institutions were greatly neutralized in their effects by the drinking customs. And yet those practices were sanctioned by the wise, by the religious, by men reputed good and holy,—practices which did far more harm than all the good which are done by any or by all those institutions. At every corner of our streets gin palaces and public houses were seen, into which thousands entered to their ruin. And what was done by the benevolent and Christian to counteract the mighty evil? Why in some obscure street or alley a small “Ragged School” was opened, and a few other institutions of that class? Compare the evil with the remedy provided, and then ask: what can we expect while these powerful instruments of evil are sanctioned and supported by the very persons, among others, who seek to undo the mischief they have been, in great part, the means of producing? It was said that teetotalism was an extreme remedy: granted, but was not the evil also extreme? What else could remedy the evil? It was generally admitted that for the drunkard, no other remedy would avail. But it was in the nature of strong drink to deceive, and he who would avoid the mischief must be careful not to take the first glass. Nothing short of total abstinence would succeed to put down the drinking usages of this country, or liberate the working classes from the intolerable bondage in which they were held by those usages. But if it was a good remedy, was it a lawful one? Even admitting for a moment, that it was lawful to use strong drink, was it unlawful to abstain? Many admitted that it was expedient to abstain, but that which was expedient was lawful, and those who admitted it to be expedient were bound to abstain, and he called upon them, for the honour of God, for the sake of their country and their kind, at once to abstain from the use of that which was ruining thousands and millions. There might be difficulties in the way, but, as Peter the hermit said when the difficulties in the way of the crusade were pointed out, “It is the will of God! It is the will of God!” so he (Mr. Kennedy) would say, in the sight of every difficulty, “It is the will of God!” On that ground he would urge his countrymen to go on steadily with their work, in the full assurance that they should ultimately succeed.

Mr. SPENCER JACKSON, a Hertfordshire farmer, in seconding the resolution, related his own experience, and the success of many experiments he had made as a teetotal farmer. People often said, “what is to become of the barley if all persons turn teetotalers?” He was determined that no barley grown by him should be made into malt; and, therefore, instead of employing men to break the Sabbath by making his barley into malt, he employed men on the week days to grind it into meal, and with that meal he fattened pigs, bullocks and sheep, and produced beasts which were the admiration of the market, and far more profitable to him than if he had fed them upon oil cake, or in the usual way. He thought that was a far better way of using the barley than throwing it into hot water, and then giving the substantial portion to pigs and cows, and the wash to human beings.

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., proposed a resolution expressive of satisfaction at the accessions which had been made during the past year, of ministers at religion and medical practitioners, &c. No nation on earth, he remarked, was so proud of its character as Great Britain; yet it was a fact that those things upon which the country most prided itself were fast diminishing. Take worth, for instance. Why, if the country were really rich the labouring classes would surely have a little laid by to which to resort in time of need; but the fact was, that before Saturday night came their money was generally gone, and if sickness or want of employ came upon them, nothing but misery stared them in the face. They had not a penny to help themselves, and they were cast upon the parish or upon the casual bounty of the benevolent. How was it that thousands in constant employ had nothing to fall back upon in seasons of exigency? Why, the money which should purchase the necessaries and comforts of life, and provide for contingencies, was spent in drinking, in smoking, and snuffing; in what was not only unnecessary but highly injurious. If the fifty or sixty millions annually spent on strong drink were rightly spent, men need not mind being out of employ for a few days, or even for a few weeks. The money which should enrich them, was given to enrich brewers, distillers, and the vendors of strong drinks, and griping pawnbrokers. That was a reproach and not an honour to Great Britain. Then, again, England was proud of her endeavours to spread the Gospel, and large subscriptions were raised for that purpose every year. But what did we hear every now and then? The Gospel was given with one hand, and intoxicating drinks with the other; and the result, was that many heathens were actually taught to drink, and became drunkards, who before the introduction of the Gospel were perfectly sober. The time was come when all persons who subscribed to missions ought to demand that missionaries should be altogether free from such practices. In this respect, also, England was rapidly losing its reputation, and, in the east especially, Christian converts were known by their addiction to the use of strong drinks. Then, again, Great Britain was proud of the excellency of her marines, her seamen, &c. Here, also, the use of strong drink by that important class of men had brought great disgrace upon the nation. It had been demonstrated again and again that strong drink was the cause of the principal portion of the mischiefs which ensued both as to life and property. English ships were by that means greatly deteriorated in the estimation of foreigners; and the American, Swedish, and other ships could obtain freights before the English, solely on account of the crews of those vessels being sober men. If a change did not speedily take place in all these respects, the glory of England could be neither increased nor sustained.

Dr. Jabez BURNS seconded the resolution. He remarked on the altered position of the teetotal movement since its introduction fifteen years ago. The theory had been fully tested during that period, and hundreds of thousands had profited by it in body, in mind, and in estate. It had greatly promoted the physical well-being, the mental elevation, and the moral improvement of man. Dr. Burns gave a brief account of his recent visit to America, and testified to the remarkable and delightful prevalence of temperate habits among the people of that vast country. The drinking usages were deemed disreputable among all denominations of Christians. He saw no strong drink on the table of any minister, except in one instance, namely—that of a minister who had recently arrived at Montreal from England! He wished resolutions such as had been passed in the Conferences in America, could be passed in the Methodist Conference of England, and in other denominations of Christians. They ought certainly to insist upon missionaries being teetotalers; but then, to be consistent, they must have the decanters removed from their own tables. Dr. Burns referred to the anniversaries of various institutions which had recently been held in that hall, and expressed his belief that one-half of those institutions would be rendered unnecessary if total abstinence prevailed, while for the other half adequate funds would be provided. He had no hesitation in saying that teetotal societies had done more good than all those other societies put together, at the same time that they had proved valuable auxiliaries to those noble institutions. They had taught men to improve their own condition—to befriended themselves—to raise themselves—to benefit themselves in every sense of the word. Only suppose that 100,000 drunkards had been reclaimed by the operations of such societies, and that 200,000 more had been prevented from becoming drunkards, why, who could estimate the value of such success? The foundations of the society were firmly laid: its machinery had been worked in every part of the country; and the results had proved most gratifying. Missionaries were still going to and fro; lectures were being delivered and meetings held. The Press, too, that mighty engine, was at work, and at work to promote the practice of total abstinence from strong drink. The cause was greatly indebted to The Wesleyan, to the Universe, to the Banner, and other papers; and now a newspaper was about to be started, in the columns of which Teetotalism would be advocated—namely, the Standard of Freedom. Dr. Burns referred, in conclusion, to the liberal contributions made by several gentlemen present and others, though he thought that the time had now come when such an institution ought to support itself, and allow those generous men to give their money to other excellent institutions, which he felt quite sure they would rejoice to do.

The collection was then made, which amounted to upwards of £40.

JOSEPH STURGE, Esq., said that he had now served an apprenticeship of about twenty-one years to total abstinence; and the longer he lived, the more he was convinced of its importance and excellence. He hoped increasing efforts would be made to interest the young.

SAMUEL BOWLY, Esq., of Gloucester, said that the question might be asked why the members of that society adopted practices and customs different from those to which they and their ancestors had been used. The fact was, he felt that he could not now consistently with the dictates of his conscience set before his children those drinks which he used to set before them, without regarding it as a sin. He would ask those present who were not teetotalers: *who had given them a license to stand still, and see souls and bodies perishing, while they made no effort, lent no aid, to save them? Had religion given them that licence? Certainly not? He was not afraid to trust his children to witness the sight of a degraded drunkard, for that would disgust them, and put them out of love with the drink which so degraded men: but he was afraid of their being drawn aside by benevolent, virtuous, good men who used those drinks, and who did not appear to be debased by that use. Or, was their license to stand still endorsed by medical practitioners? Why, they had that day been told of a testimony signed by four teen hundred medical gentlemen. Besides many present had refused to listen to the advice of medical men; and the time had arrived when it had become necessary for the members of that society to teach medical men. The fact was that medical men gave advice pretty much as the case was drawn, and when it was understood that alcoholic drinks would be refused, substitutes were readily found. But did patriotism endorse the license to stand still? Why all the political reforms which were so vehemently urged would not do one-fourth of the good which would result from the universal, or even general adoption of the practice of total abstinence. He had mingled much with the working classes; and he had no notion of the honesty or sincerity of men who talked so flippantly of abuses, and clamoured so loudly for liberty and freedom in the state, and yet had not the moral power to break off from the bonds by which* they were held captive through their own sensual indulgence. No; no man could claim a license to be idle on any of the grounds he had stated. That which chiefly endorsed the license was appetite and fashion. But he rejoiced to find that such customs were gradually giving way. Mr. Bowly then stated that the members of his society (the Friends) were then meeting to consider various matters respecting the particular Church to which he belonged. He was sorry to say that their borders were not clear from the evil. They had instances of transgression. And why? Because the members continued the moderate use of strong drinks. That society had very great advantages, and if with those advantages mischief had ensued, there was reason to conclude that there was no class or society in the world that had not suffered from similar results. Mr. Bowly then referred to some recent railway accidents, and loss of life, &c.; and observed that it was next to impossible that accidents should not happen while men accustomed to the use of strong drink were allowed to be employed. But it was almost impossible to have teetotal engineers or conductors, while clerks, and superintendents, and directors use strong drinks. Gentlemen often talked about the degradation of drunkenness, and of joining a society for the reclamation of such degraded beings; but they forgot that some of those very persons learned to drink by standing behind their masters' chairs. More temperance was needed in the upper classes—more temperance was needed in the House of Commons. The question was debated: what was the proper qualification for voting out of the house? he thought it was time to ask: what was the proper qualification for voting in the house?

Mr. E. FRY, of Plymouth, urged the adoption of the total abstinence principle upon all present, chiefly on two grounds, first, on account of the great distress which prevailed in most large towns, funds for the relief of which would be ample, but for the money wasted in the purchase of injurious drinks; and secondly, because of the great danger to which all were exposed who used any portion whatever of those insidious beverages.

Mr. J. CLARKE, of Southampton, dwelt for a short time on the great responsibility which rested on parents in connexion with the drinking usages of society.

Rev. J. T. MESSER, of Hull, drew a parallel between the slavery of the African negroes in the West Indies and that of the drunkard, very greatly to the disadvantage of the latter. He compared also, the eager zeal manifested by Christian professors for the emancipation of black slaves, with the coolness of those who, when the claims of the white slaves of strong drink were urged upon them, coolly gathered their cloaks around them and made no effort in their behalf. He could not, he said, reconcile this great pity in the one case with the total want of it in the other.

Rev. B. PARSONS, of Ebley, seconded a resolution approving of the conduct of the Government in reference to the canteen system, and in reference to the allowing seamen to take rations of coffee instead of rum, &c. Having been for twenty-four years a member of the Peace Society, he believed that soldiers and marines were altogether unnecessary. He believed, also, that a period would arrive when "swords would be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks." While, however, such classes of men were in existence, it was desirable to have them sober, and one way to secure their sobriety was to lessen the temptation to intemperance. Having addressed the females present, and congratulated them on their healthy and respectable appearance, Mr. Parsons concluded by relating his experience as a teetotaler for fourteen years. Though he had to labour hard, he had greatly improved in health and strength.

Mr. COMPTON, Esq., moved, and ROBERT CHARLETON, Esq., seconded a resolution of thanks to the Chairman; after which the meeting, the interest of which was well sustained to the last, separated.

THE DRUNKARD'S VISION.

A man stood in the street one New Year's morning. The cold was intense, the river was frozen, and large icicles depended from the eaves of the houses. The man was wretchedly clad. His rags fluttered in the wind that blew keenly from the north. The blood languidly circulated through the veins of his pinched limbs. He was a picture of misery and want.

As the throng of beings passed him, in the pursuit of business (for no one went abroad on pleasure on that bitter day) he scanned their faces with eager glances. But no one seemed to know or care for him. He wrung his hands in the intensity of his anguish. No one pitied him. He wept scalding tears of remorse. He raised his hands in entreaty towards Heaven, and prayed for death to end his sufferings.

An old man, too, for the lines engraven in his battered sodden countenance, tell his age as legibly as any formal register of birth.

Guess his age. Threescore and ten.

You are wrong; that man, so haggard and decrepid that his body bends with the apparent infirmities of age, has seen but forty three years of natural life. In vice, debauchery, crime,—in care, disappointment, and shame, in self-reproach, in all the ruin of a seared and wasted life, he is as old as you please, a very patriarch.

A vision of his youth passes before him. He is once more a boy. Yes that is the old home,—the old garden—the seat in the orchard—there are his sisters at play. The old home! His parents are beneath that roof. He is happy, very happy. He has just won a splendid prize at school—a pair of twelve inch globes. His father strokes his head, and says with pride that he will pursue a bright and honourable career through life. The old home!—the old home! He raises his withered hands to hide the tears that stream from his eyes, but they burst through his fingers and freeze as they fall upon the pavement.

No one heeds him, no one pities him.

He sees—in vision still, or rather in mental retrospect—the mercantile house, in which he began the career, which his father told him, would lead to fame and fortune. He sees this desk at which he sat, he looks in the faces of his fellow clerks. He remembers the old hopes, the bright prospects—all the old thoughts and affections come crowding back,—his legs sink under him.—But for the grasp of that passenger he would have fallen to the earth.

Yet again. He is a man now, and those are his wife and children. (His friends and former school-fellows are married, and so is he.) He will romp with his youngest child, and when the hour has arrived for them to be sent to bed, he will read to his wife the latest new book he has obtained from the library. He is prosperous in worldly affairs, happy in domestic circumstances, beloved by his relations, respected by his friends.

Ragged, disgraced, forsaken, hungry, cold—a vagabond, and an outcast....

He raises his hand to his head, his brain reels, he fears that he will go mad.

What has wrought the change? How did he fall from a position so honourable, so useful, so prosperous?

The old tale—the old vice, drunkenness. 'One glass,' a friend told him, 'can do no harm,' but the first glass led to the second, the second to the third—and in the course of time, he became a confirmed and hardened drunkard. That was not all. A man is never a drunkard without being also demoralised in other respects. He forfeited the confidence of his friends—he was no longer prosperous, Ruin seized him like an armed man.

Ragged, disgraced, forsaken, hungry, cold, a vagabond and an outcast. No one heeds him, no one pities him, "O days of my youth, return again, days of my innocence return." So, in frenzied tones, he entreats the Past to restore him the opportunity of redeeming the dreadful errors of his manhood.

But the past is irrefragable—the years that are spent are beyond recall.

"O days of my youth, return again."

So, he continued to exclaim, invoking Heaven with earnest, supplicating gesture. "Days of my youth, return—days of my youth, return, that I may act otherwise than I have acted."

And his youth returned, for he had only dreamed upon this New Year's day. He was still a youth. He awoke, and with a shudder, fell upon his knees in gratitude that he was yet able to choose the wise path in life.

Reader, who art a youth, do you so likewise determine. Otherwise, the day will come, when you will cry, in bitter anguish. "Come again days of my youth," and they will not come again.

EQUALIZATION OF TAXATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEEETOTAL TIMES.

DEAR SIR,—We have much talk in the present day about the equalization of taxation. While lately reflecting upon the businesses of the spirit merchant, malster, brewer, and publican, it occurred to me that as they are known through the influence of their traffic to be the producers of threefourths of the crime, insanity, and poverty, which now affect society, it would be but just were they obliged to pay their relative proportion of taxes for the punishment of criminals, the maintenance of the insane, and the sustenance of paupers. I do not see why one small portion of the community should be allowed to engage in a traffic which increases to the extent of seventy-five per cent. the amount of taxation borne by the remainder. I would, therefore, suggest that the friends of temperance and justice throughout the united kingdom, petition Parliament for an enquiry into the evils accruing to society in consequence of the present sale and use of intoxicating drinks; and, after such an inquiry has been obtained, and it has shown that a large proportion of our present taxation is occasioned by the expense incurred in the support of gaols, poorhouses, &c., &c., then petition that those who live by the sale of intoxicating drinks, the consequences of which is the increase of crime and pauperism, be at least taxed in proportion to the amount of evil which they inflict.

If the Government refuse to appoint such a committee of inquiry, then I suppose that we assume what we know to be true, viz., that the major part of our national crime, lunacy, and poverty, is occasioned by the sale and use of intoxicating drinks, and pour in petitions from every town and village in the country, praying for an equalization of taxation, and demanding that the manufacturers and sellers of intoxicating drinks be taxed according to the proportions above stated.

Would it not be well to form a committee of the friends of Temperance, to make arrangements for carrying into effect the above named project, and if the object be not attained, the movement will at least direct public attention to the subject, and be the means of largely promoting the Glorious Temperance Reformation.

Newcastle on Tyne,

Yours, respectfully,

May 12, 1848.

J. P. BARKAS.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR BRAINS!—The brain is the organ of the mind, drink-stimulants, and they keep the mind in a state of constant excitement: but if you drink nothing but water, there is no stimulant but that of thinking, talking, and writing, which would be found healthful rather than otherwise.—Rev. B. Parsons.

MORAL AND LEGAL SUASION.

There are two ways by which God governs man. The one is a government of motives presented to the mind in the way of moral suasion, the other a government of law and force externally applied. The one leads, and the other drives where leading will not do. The one shows him the right way and intreats him to walk in it, and if he will not, the other restrains and controls.

The nature of these two kinds of government is beautifully exhibited in the thirty second Psalm. There God makes a proposition of these two kinds of government to the wicked, and lets them choose by which they will be governed. "I will instruct thee and teach thee, in the way thou shalt go, I will guide thee with mine eye. Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which has no understanding; whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, less they come near unto thee." Here he proposes first to instruct and teach, and thus to lead them in the way they should go, by motives addressed to the understanding. Here he proposes to have his eye upon them, tenderly to guide and encourage. If they yield to instruction, and suffer themselves to be led, well and good; but if they have no understanding, and prove stubborn like the mule or the horse, then he must restrain, direct, and control by putting the bit and bridle into his mouth. The restraints of the law must curb that which gentle means could not. When the wrath of man becomes troublesome and will not be stayed by motives, God will do to him as he does to old Ocean when he lays upon his mane, and says, thus far shalt thou go, but no farther. "The wrath of man shall praise him, the remainder of wrath will he restrain."

In the same manner as God has two ways to govern men, so men have two ways to govern each other. The one by motives, the other by law, applied by superior power. The one which proposes motives to the understanding is the first to which we must resort. We say first to them who deal in strong drink to the injury of society—I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go. We treat them as men having understanding. We reason with them. We try to convince them by argument that they are engaged in an unjust and sinful business. We appeal to their human feelings—we appeal to their patriotic feelings. We try to show them how they are violating faith between man and man, between man and his country, between man and God. We ring in their ears the law of the land—the law of God, "wo unto him that giveth his neighbour drink." We echo into their conscience the cries of orphans which are worse than orphans, and of widows that are more than widows. We show them as fruits of their business, homes which are not homes—husbands which are not husbands—vows recorded in heaven, trampled upon and broken—affections once warm, forever ended—hopes which lived as bright as a dew drop on the bridal day, withered—heart broken! And what more! We tell of sighs that end not, and of tears that always fall! but can wring no mercy from the steeled heart of the dram-seller! And what more? Shall I speak of Suicide! Murder!! Madness!!! All fruits of his business! Nay, it is enough! If these appeals to the understandings, feelings, and consciences of men will not avail, must we give it up? If arguments like these will not persuade, if facts like these will not convince, if truths like these will not instruct and teach men in the way they should go, must we give it up? Must we look quietly on while a few unprincipled men are dealing damnation and death around them? Must the great mass of society be thrown in defenceless among a few who have no consciences, no feelings; whose interest is to sell the peace of families, the widow's house, and the orphan's bread, yea, even the souls of men, for dollars and cents?

~ MODERATION.—Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl chain of all virtue.

APPEAL TO MODERATE DRINKERS.

Know ye not that the little boy who smokes his pipe, and joins his coppers with his juvenile companions over a gill of spirits or a pint of ale, would plead as his apology were he charged with doing wrong, that his father and his companions were doing the same thing? And know you not that the drunken tradesman, who spends his hard earned money in the tap-room, and beats his wife and beggars his children, finds his apology in the glass of his rich and moderate drinking employer? And that the female servant, overcome by the free use of liquors from her mistress's press, finds her apology in the practices round her master's table? And that the church member, charged with drinking, finds his apology in the respectable moderate drinking of his elder or minister. The ragged, emaciated, blaspheming drunkard, stands out as a beacon to warn, rather than as an example to allure. But respectable, moderate drinking men,—men and women who can sip their glass, and long for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, at the very moment they are staying its progress; these send forth an unseen, yet most powerful influence, which gives sanction and life to a degree of most sinful indulgence, which but for the protection of their high character, must wither and perish before the light shining around.—Scottish Temperance Review.

AFFECTING SCENE.

A gentleman writing to the Star of Temperance relates the following affecting tale. Early, upon one of the bright mornings with which heaven hath blessed us this winter, a little girl, of eleven years of age, was seen hurrying from a grog-shop, to her home with a bottle of whisky. In a short time she was again seen travelling the same course, and again, and again, and again, did she carry to her home the destroying cup, till another morning dawned and death had taken from this beautiful and interesting girl her Mother. An inquest was held over the body, and the little girl with her eyes full of tears, and her soul pouring out its grief, gush after gush, stated before the coroner's jury, that she had carried ten pints of whisky the former day and that night, to her parents, who drank nearly the whole, and from the effects of which, the jury decided her Mother died. When the dead body of the little girl's Mother was laid out for burial by the public officer, her Father was suffering with delirium tremens. And, though the sad remnant of her whom he once promised to love and cherish in sickness and in health, the mother of his child, he cursed and swore whilst his brain was crazed by the influence of the destroyer, so as to make the hardest heart present shrink back with astonishment and horror; and in this state, I am informed, he too on the next day paid the last demand of nature, leaving his child in the worst part of our city without a friend; and, unless the protection of some one, moved by a just sense of duty shall be yielded to her, to become an early prey to the licentious and the cruelly wicked. Our people are not easily moved by such transactions, for they are too common. The public mind has become so accustomed to such scenes that it is not disturbed by their occurrences. It submits to the worst wrongs and grossest outrages upon humanity with as much apparent unconcern as the poor slave, whose back has been scarred and lacerated times without number, does to his condition. God speed the day, when like the trump of an awakening angel, the condition of our people shall arouse them to action.

MODERATE DRINKING TEACHERS.—We have but little faith in them. We know a number of male teachers in Scotland, who have consumed as much whiskey as would poison almost the whole of the fish in the magnificent Lochlomond! Such men, however high their intellectual abilities, ought not, on any account, to be entrusted with the instruction of the rising generation.—W. Logan.

THE WILD DARK STORM;

OR, THE DRUNKARD'S DAUGHTER.

BY M. A. DENISON.

O! tie the casement father, the snow falls on my bed;
And tie the casement father, for it rattles o'er my head;
Don't sleep so sound, my father, I am very numb and chill,
And I cannot bear to listen, with the room so black and still.

The drunkard heard no plaintive voice,
For death enwrapt his form.

Nor the poor child's moan, "I'm all alone,
In the wild dark storm."

The blast roared down the chimney, and shook the fragile wall,

And the casement rattled louder, at the shrieking, angry call;

The child in agony arose, and swayed her wasted form,
As she whispered, "I am all, all alone,
In the wild, dark storm."

A light shone in upon her, her heart bet quick with fear;
She could see no form around her, no voice, no foot-fall hear;

But a whisper came unto her, as a zephyr's tone might be,
And its melody breathed fairy-like, "my child, come home to me."

"There's snow upon my bed, mother, my heart is freezing fast;

And shadows from the corner, are fitting swiftly past;
I'll come to you, dear mother, if you'll make me very warm,

For oh! I'm cold; and all alone,
In the wild, dark storm."

The little snow drifts grew; and so lovingly they slept,
Upon the ragged coverlid, the child no longer wept;

She said, there must be warmth in them, and thrust within her hand,

And drew it forth, encircled with a pale and icy band—
Then shrieked, as wild, and frantic, she shook the drunkard form,

"I'm dying! father—dying,
In the wild, dark storm."

Poor child! her head sank backward, her eyes grew dark and dim,

Her voice grew stronger in despair—she could not waken him;

With red and frozen fingers joined, she breathed in anguish low,

"Where mother sleeps, where mother lies,
'Tis there I want to go."

The dawn looked in upon her,

Stiff, motionless, and cold;

The snow laid all around her,

And dimmed her locks of gold;

Beside that wretched father,

She drew her quivering breath,

And there the two slept silently,

Within the arms of death.

Poor babe! no more she murmurs,

"O! mother make me warm:"

'Twas best the drunkard's child should die,

In the wild, dark storm.

WHAT IS RUM?

I asked an aged man, a man of cares,
Wrinkled, and curved, and white with hoary hairs;
Rum is the Tyrant of the soul, he said,
Ye young and fair, take warning from the dead.

I asked a dying drunkard, ere the stroke
Of ruthless death life's golden bowl had broke;
I asked him, What is Rum? Rum, he replied,
The curse of earth—MY RUIN!—and he died.

I asked a weeping wife; she raised her eye,
All filled with tears, and this was her reply:
Rum dashed from me fond hopes of earthly bliss,
And made this life a cup of bitterness.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

ASHBOURNE.

The Temperance Society of this Town, held their Annual Tea Meeting on Whit Monday. After the cloth was removed, addresses were delivered. The chair was occupied by S. Bradley, Esq. The audience appeared instructed and entertained by the orations of Messrs. Stevens, Pateman, Avery, Haythorn, Thornton, and Estcourt.

BATH.

The Bath Juvenile Temperance Society celebrated their 10th Anniversary on Whit-Monday, when the members accompanied by the Rechabite Tent, walked in procession through the principal streets to Walcot Church, where a sermon was delivered by the Rev. G. W. Newham, M. A., of Coombe Down. The procession created some excitement, the healthy appearance, orderly conduct and superior clothing of the members, presenting a striking contrast to the general appearance of the other holiday walkers in the city. On quitting the Church the members proceeded to the Temperance Hall where about 160 partook of tea and other refreshment, after which J. H. Cottrell, Esq., (Treasurer of the Bath Temperance Association) delivered an impressive address. On Wednesday evening the usual anniversary meeting was held at the Guildhall.

BRIDPORT.

The anniversary of the Bridport Juvenile Temperance Society, was held on Tuesday, June 13th. The young people connected with the "Band of Hope" assembled at the Town Hall, in the afternoon, where refreshments were most amply provided for them. In the evening the Rev. T. Wallace, president of the Bridport Temperance Auxillary, addressed the meeting on the value of the Temperance Reformation to the youth of our country. The president was much gratified in observing, that nearly all the juvenile members present were connected with Sabbath schools.

Several Temperance meetings held in the Town Hall, within the last few months, have been most numerous and respectably attended. Indeed, it has sometimes been difficult to accommodate the audience within the Building, and the adhesion of Christian Ministers is seen to be most important.

DEEPIING, ST. JAMES. LINCOLNSHIRE.

The Temperance cause lately started at Deeping, St. James, continues to progress, and a sensible diminution in the use of ale and porter is experienced in the neighbourhood, which has induced the publicans to complain. Mr. Passmore Edwards has lately favoured us with a lecture, when the Rev. J. George, vicar of the parish, presided. Several signatures were obtained, and a good impression was produced upon the minds of a number of railway labourers who were present. Mr. Gutteridge has held two meetings at Maxey and the adjacent villages. Several farmers in the neighbourhood, although they are not at present teetotalers, have offered money instead of beer, to those among their men who desire to practice total abstinence. This is we think, a good example.

IDLE, YORKSHIRE.

The sixth Annual Meeting took place on Whit-Tuesday, June 13th, in the Wesleyan school room, Idle, when upwards of 300 were assembled. After the cloth was removed a public meeting was held in the same place. The chair was taken by Mr. B. Bland, Jun., of Idle, when addresses were delivered by Mr. W. Booth, of Idle, Mr. W. Fenton, of Eccleshill, Mr. Job Walmsley, of Clatonhight, Mr. T. B. Thompson, agent to the British Association for the Promotion of Temperance, and Mr. J. C. Booth, of Bradford.

KILLEARN, SCOTLAND.

The eight annual meeting of the Killearn Total Abstinence Society was held on Thursday evening, 8th

June 1848, when a respectable company sat down to tea. Mr. James Fairlie, President of the Society occupied the chair. Interesting addresses were delivered by the chairman, Rev. John Fairlie, Mr. Peter Mackie, Mr. A. Buchanan and others, several pieces of sacred music, &c., were sung during the evening. A committee for the ensuing year was appointed and the Office Bearers of the Society re-elected. The party separated at half past eleven o'clock, highly delighted with the whole proceedings.

The operations of this society during the past year may be comprized as follows, 26 Fortnight Meetings for debate and mutual improvement, and 5 social Tea Meetings have been held.

The Society was favoured with visits from the Honorable Judge Marshall, Rev. Mr. Wallace, Alexandria, and Mr Logan who respectively delivered interesting addresses on these occasions, chiefly beating on the Total Abstinence movement.

A Juvenile class was formed in November 1847, which is doing well. The attendance is good and regular, and the progress made by the children is manifest.

ST. BUDEAUX.

The friends of Total Abstinence in the villages of St. Budeaux and Tamerton, held their first annual Festival on June 5th, on the bowling green of the former village. After the tea a public meeting was held, presided over by the Rev. Mr. Webster, Baptist Minister of Stonehouse. Addresses were delivered by the Revd. J. Rogers, Dr. Pearce, of Plymouth, Messrs Baker and Jones, of Devonport, and Mr Curtis of St. Budeaux. Notwithstanding the prediction that "Teetotalism would die a natural death in this neighbourhood," ten persons (adults) have since signed the pledge. May God give them grace to keep it.

GIN versus COMFORTABLE DWELLINGS.—"Have you any gin palaces in Bethnal Green?"—"Several." "Have you any notion of the expenditure in gin at Bethnal Green?"—"No." "Can you infer it from the sizes and the magnificence of the palaces?" "I should think it very considerable." "Supposing that expenditure upon gin palaces were expended in their own houses, would it not lead to a very considerable improvement in them, and increase of comfort as well as economy?"—"No doubt about it."—Report of Sanitary Commission.

A CHALLENGE.—It is somewhere said that the Rev. John Pierpont, the well known and eloquent advocate of the cause of Temperance, once said, on rising to address an immense concourse of people.—"If there be an individual, a single one—man, woman, or child—in this vast assembly, who has not suffered either directly or indirectly from intemperance, oh let that person stand up, that I may feast my eyes on the first one I have ever seen who has escaped." He paused and looked around him, but no one stirred. An expressive silence confessed that all felt the smart of this universal scourge.—Utica Advocate.

CHRISTIANS TOLERATE DRUNKENNESS! — Strange and humiliating it is that drunkenness should be the prevailing vice in a land of bibles and sabbaths; that with the holy precepts of that blessed book in general circulation, there should not be merely the absence of an universal loathing at customs and practices that feed pauperism and crime, but a toleration for them such as would have disgraced a heathen clime. Ancient paganism denounced intemperance, though it encouraged it by the example of the gods. Mahomedanism refuses the wine cup to its followers. Eastern idolatry reckons drunkenness one of the five enormous sins. And shall Christianity be less indignant in her denunciation of this offence, or less uncertain in the note of warning or alarm which she heralds forth? Surely the Christian pulpit and press must speak out.

"TEETOTALISM" NOT A BARBAROUS WORD.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

THE DOCTRINE OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE has now taken such deep root in the public mind, and has been so well supported by irrefragable argument, that our opponents feel themselves rather non-plussed in their determination to stand out against us. They flew to the Scriptures,—and both old and new testament, said we were right. Away they hied to Science,—but alas! their success was no better. Chemistry told them that Alcohol, far from being a nutritious substance, is a poison; and instead of deserving the dignified appellation of a "good creature of God," ought to be branded as a bad creature of man. Physiology has been equally ungracious to our adversaries, for it has attested, by a thousand facts, that the direst material demon that can infest the body or mind is the spirit of the still, the wine-vat or the mash-tub; and upwards of one thousand medical men have declared that total abstinence is not only compatible with perfect health, but eminently conducive to it.—History, also, is in our favor, for the strongest men of antiquity were Total Abstiners, and in modern times the same truth is demonstrated by thousands of living examples. Thus not only the victims of drunkenness, but the advocates of moderation, are driven from every strong hold in which they have entrenched themselves. From the first their weapons were feeble, and now seem to be altogether wanting.

Hence, as they find it difficult to assail the thing, they wage war with the "name." We neither belong to the Nominalists or Realists of a former age, for we believe both in things or realities, and also in names. To us a rose is a thing, a beautiful reality, and we have some suspicion that it would smell as sweet though called by another name. The same may be said of many other things; and yet there are not a few names which we would contend for, if society were about to commit them to oblivion. And while we would always attach more importance to the thing than the name, to the reality, than to any syllable or collocation of syllables, still there are hundreds of instances in which we would struggle for the name and the thing.

Now this is just our predicament in reference to "TEETOTALISM." Of late, this invaluable term has been most unmercifully, not to say, unmeaningly, beset. Our principle is admitted to be good. We are no longer to be laughed at nor outlawed. It is granted, that a man or woman may be an abstainer without danger to christianity or the sacred volume. We have hardly a person left who is bold enough to avow in the hearing of any, except sciolists, that before he can give up wine, or beer, or brandy he must have a new Bible! It is allowed that our agents and advocacy are improved, nay, that we have done some good in certain quarters, and might perhaps be tolerated, or have a passport given us, were it not for that abominable word,—"TEETOTALISM." Some tell us that they would actually give up poisoning themselves and others, but for this "barbarous name!" Only think what a deal there is in a name, when a sensible man to avoid it, will actually risk his own health and peace, and the present and eternal welfare of thousands of his fellow immortals!

We have often heard this poor, innocent, and as we think, classical, word assailed, and therefore offer a few remarks upon it; especially as we fear that, after all, it is the thing rather than the appellation that is thus covertly assailed. Indeed some of our opponents are determined that we shall be nameless. If we call our institution the "Temperance Society," then we are instantly rebuked for assuming a cognomen which it is said belongs to another, and a far more respectable Society. The only Temperance people on earth, they tell us, are those who give up the use of spirits in the form of gin, rum, and brandy, &c., &c., but retain it in wine, cider, ale and porter! Tis true there are more persons who destroy themselves by the latter beverages than the former, but still for all that, you are not a true Temperance disciple unless you take a little of the poisons. It seems now to be laid down as an axiom, quite as valid and self-evident as any truth in Euclid, that no man who totally abstains from intoxicating beverages can be a real and genuine temperate person. We always thought that true temperance meant the moderate use of what will do us no harm, and entire abstinence from everything that will injure us; but these thoughts, forsooth, are very antiquated, for according to modern conventionalism, you cannot be really temperate unless you take at indefinite times an indefinite portion of alcoholic poison!!

What then are we poor Teetotalers to do? If we call our Institution a "Temperance Society," the whole world seems ready to stone us for assuming a name which belongs entirely and exclusively to the drinkers of a venomous beverage.

To say we are Total Abstainers, is also treated with equal condemnation. Totally to abstain, taken literally, means to abstain from every thing, meat as well as drink. A Total Abstainer, say they, would neither eat nor drink, and therefore people who drink water and eat meat and vegetables, bread, plumb-cake and plumb-pudding, cannot, without the grossest inconsistency, be termed Total Abstainers. Here, again, they try to rob us of a name. We fear there is some depth in all this. Every Institution must have a name. No principle can live and act unless it can be enunciated. Things are propagated by words. By means of a word, you can carry a truth to the ends of the earth, and there make it popular and triumphant. A word can pierce the heart, and turn a soul from perdition to glory. Take away words, and the soul and truth are dumb, and science and religion would stand still. It may also be mentioned, that many names are arbitrary. A perfect philologist might show that more than half our mother tongue is improper and fanciful, if not barbarous, quite as much so as the term "Teetotalism." Indeed it will be no difficult matter to show that this epithet is far more appropriate, accurate, and classical, than numbers that have received the imprimatur of usage or the schools.

It is said that Teetotalism originated in the imperfect enunciation of a man who stuttered, and many a Temperance toper, with his decanter or tankard before him, has illuminated and amused his auditors with the tale, that at a public meeting, one of the water-drinking fraternity asserted that he would "T—T—T—totally abstain," and that the rabble in the pitiable assembly resolved from that time to be "Teetotalers." Cannot you see, gentle reader, how the laugh and glass go round as this narrative ends? "Ridicule," my Lord Shaftsbury tells us, "is the test of truth." Make a thing laughable, and who does not see that it is absurd? For few of the laughing throng, especially when the glass or pot are doing their work, are disposed to separate the trick of the jester from the unpalatable fact which the hearers are concerned to banish from society.

For this much abused epithet, "Teetotalism," then, we have a few words to say, and trust that we can prove that it is as expressive as any in our language. In many parts of our country there is a variety of superlatives. I have heard the words "terrible," "vast," "thundering," &c., &c., &c., thus used. A coachman talks of the "thundering jaws" of his hard mouthed horse. I have heard a lovely infant called a "terrible pretty child," and a small place of worship, a "vastly small chapel!" In each of these instances the adjectives or adverbs are used as superlatives. So in many localities, while "Total" signifies entirely or altogether, and therefore precludes any degree of comparison, the syllable "Te," or "Tee," is added, to express the highest and noblest kind of entireness or Totality. For a person to be Teetotally blest, or Teetotally lost, or undone, conveys to those people who are unaccustomed to this usage, the idea of the highest possible kind of happiness, or the most utter wretchedness. Now, every scholar knows that this syllabic prefix, this repetition of the letter with which the word begins, is very ancient. It was common to the Hebrews, Saxons, and others, and the Greeks especially employed it to express their perfect tense. School boys hardly ever forget "Present, tupto, future, tupsio, perfect, tetupha," &c., &c. Why, then, should we be called barbarians, because we adopt a custom of our mother tongue, sanctioned by the most natural, ancient and classical languages in the world? The supposition that "Tee-total" is "Tea-total," and derived from Tea drinking, only betrays the ignorance of those who indulge it.

"Teetotalism," then, is a genuine classical word, especially expressive of the noblest kind of abstinence. There have been men who have abstained from meat, from bread, from vegetables, &c., &c., but theirs was not the highest kind of abstinence. Bread, animal food, vegetables, or fruit, never rob men of their senses, nor render them cruel and hard-hearted. When did beef or veal induce a parent to starve his children, a husband to maltreat his wife, or become a thief, a Sabbath breaker, a blasphemer, or a murderer? But there is not a crime that has blackened human character, peopled poor-houses and jails, or sent souls to perdition, but has been perpetrated under the influence of alcohol; and consequently he who abandons this accursed beverage, is an abstainer of the highest and noblest description; for were intoxicating liquors driven from the earth, society would instantly, as if by magic, assume a new character; and personal improvement, domestic happiness, rational reform, and pure religion, would soon bless the world, and therefore while we hold fast by the thing and the word, the principle and the name, we daily and hourly exclaim, "THANK GOD FOR TEETOTALISM!"

VOICES FROM THE BENCH.—Baron Alderson and Justice Coleridge, both entreat young men, if they wish to avoid crime, to avoid the public-house.

THE UNKNOWN TEMPERANCE AGENT.

"Well, the sun is fast descending behind the western hills, and I am still twenty miles from the place of my appointment. These short November days, muddy roads, and impassable mountains, are not very comfortable things in one's way who is eager to get forward. But must give it up; I could not foresee these difficulties when I went on my appointment to — county. Impossible to reach there to-night. But who can tell but what my delay may be the means of accomplishing some good in this mountainous region?" Thus mused Mr. C., a temperance agent, as he passed along through a gorge of the mountain, and emerged into an open, cultivated valley.

Just as the last rays of the setting sun were gilding the tops of the lofty hills, he reached a decent looking farm house, with a tavern sign swinging at the corner.

His jaded beast immediately showed a strong inclination to haul up, and seek for provender and rest. To this inclination the master yielded, and called for a night's entertainment. In the bar room was a company of loafers, pretty mellow, and much excited about some thing. While the agent was taking his supper, he heard through the open door remarks like the following: "Now that temperance meeting in the school house to-night ought to be broken up." "So it ought, and it shall be." "I wish that people knew enough to mind their own business." "Well, I'll not be caught by them, I can assure you." "I'll never sign away my liberty." "If I should take the pledge, I should want to drink ten times more than I do now." "Yes; that is the way they all do, only these temperance folks get behind the door!" "I hate hypocrisy; come, landlord, give us a bumper." "Now, let us all go down to the meeting, and give them a blowing up." "That's right!" exclaimed the landlord "I'll treat you for that." "Who will be our speaker!"

At this juncture the agent, having finished his repast entered the bar room. "What's the excitement among you, landlord?" said he.

"O, those teetotalers, as they are called, who are turning the world upside down, have got into our neighbourhood, and they are going to have a confounded meeting to-night, right under my nose; and I verily believe that they would rob me of all my custom if they could. We talk of going down to give them a blowing up; only want some one who can talk fast to be our speaker." "Well, sir, I am the very man for you. I have seen a great deal of these temperance folks, and I can talk as fast as any of them, I assure you. Just appoint me your speaker, and let us all go down, and I'll give it to them I tell you." "Good, good," cried a dozen voices "Now, let us all go, and we will have a rare time of it." "I guess some of them will look blue before the meeting is over," said the landlord. "I guess so too," replied the unknown.

Matters being settled, all started from the school house singing and bawling as they went. The whole welk rang with obstreperous noise. "Come, come," said the stranger, "let us get a little more quiet, or they will be the door against us."

So saying, he took the landlord by the arm, and walked on; the next fell in behind, two and two, and in this orderly manner they entered the house. A whole set was vacated for them, and down they sat. They listened attentively to a young man, who was reading a address, thinking that their turn would come next. A length the speaker sat down, and the chairman gave an opportunity for any others to address the meeting. The eyes of the whole drinking gang were now turned to the speaker; and the loud whisper, "Get up, get up quick," burst from every lip; and the landlord, who sat next to him, applied his elbow to his side with so much force, that it quickly brought him to his feet.

"Mr. President," said he, "we hold that all men are th friends of temperance; but with regard to total abstinence and these temperance societies, there are many different opinions, we can assure you; and against taking the pledge many strong objections can be urged. Shall we deny ourselves the temperate use of the good things which a kind Providence has bestowed upon us? Shall an independent man be called upon to sign away his liberty? And you know, Mr. President, that the stronger a man binds himself, the greater inclination he will have to do the very thing which he has bound himself not to do. And these societies, whenever they succeed, infringe upon the lawful rights of the licensed tavern keeper. I have known some completely thrown out of business, just by these temperance reformers, and these Washingtonian societies, as they are called. Why do they call them Washingtonians, I wonder? Did not General Washington drink spirits temperately? And shall we undertake to be better than he was? And shall we wrong the poor tavern keepers out of their honest dues?

"Look at this man by my side. For the accommodation of this neighbourhood, he has paid for a license, fitted up a bar, filled it with liquors, and has hung out his sign. Now, should you get all this community to sign the temperance pledge, he is down, I can tell you. All the travellers who pass this road will not drink enough to pay for his license. And what right have you, sir, or this meeting, to interfere with your neighbour's lawful business?" "Stick to the landlord," cried one, "Three cheers for the landlord!" shouted the whole crew; and the whole house rang again! When the uproar had ceased, the unknown agent saw evident signs that he would soon be waited upon to the door with his whole company. "Bear with me, Mr. President, a moment longer. I am an entire stranger to these people and to yourself. And I knew nothing of this meeting till I put up, a lone traveller, at the tavern. There I learnt about this meeting, and heard this company proposing to attend, provided they could find some one to speak for them. I volunteered my service, and you have heard my speech in their behalf. Now, sir, permit me to tell you, that I am a temperance man, a teetotaler. I know the dreadful evils of intemperance; and I know, also, the safety and the blessedness of the pledge.

"Sign away my liberty! No, sir; by taking the pledge I broke the cruel chains of slavery, by which I had been bound many years, and I became a freeman—as free as the water-brooks which course down your hills, or the winds that whistle round your mountain tops! Be more inclined to drink after signing the pledge! No, sir; it is a safeguard. It has a wonderful charm in soothing the troubled soul, and in quelling the craving appetite. A well talk of the signing of a note on a bond inclining men to dishonesty; or of the marriage vow inclining the husband to unfaithfulness!!

"Look again at this landlord. Was it necessary for him to open a tavern, in order to get a living? Has he a good farm? and is he not already beginning to neglect that farm? Is the neighbourhood any more industrious, peaceful, and happy, since that sign was hung out?

"Look at the company around him here to-night. These are his dupes. I never saw them before; but I could tell you much of their history. That tavern has lured them from their houses and their business; and that flaming bar is fast consuming their property, and drinking up their life-blood. Their families are even now suffering at home for the necessities of life. And deeper and more awful sufferings are in reserve for them, unless these men quickly forsake that den of dragons! And the landlord is none the better off, but rather worse. He is even now beginning to drink with his customers; is on the very brink of ruin! If he keeps up that tavern sign a little longer, he will work out his own destruction. It will be a mercy to him to destroy his custom, and a blessing to his family. O that I could be the means of rescuing these my fellow-men from that awful gulf to which they are rapidly hastening! Come, my friends, I have come here to speak for you to-night, and for your good I will plead.

"I know your trials—your craving appetite, your horrible nights, your gloomy days, and all your long train of sorrows! I pity you. I can sympathise with you. I speak as a friend. Come, take the teetotal pledge, and be free. The galling chains of slavery shall fall from your limbs; your horrors shall flee away; peace shall return to your dwellings, prosperity to your business, and joy to your souls!

"Feel yourselves once more to be men, and walk up with me boldly to that stand, and take the pledge. I shall esteem it an honour to be a member of this total abstinence society; and it will be an honour to you. Come, here's my heart, and here's my hand."

So saying, he took one, and another by the hand, with tears in his eyes, compassion in his look, and tenderness on his tongue. They could not resist; they were all melted down, and one by one went up and took the pledge. Many others in the house followed their example. The landlord was confounded, and looked blue. A new impulse was given to the cause; and the reformation went on with increasing interest and power in the neighbourhood.

The meeting closed, and the agent was advised not to venture himself again at the tavern. But he was not the man to be afraid. Taking his host again by the arm, he returned to his lodgings, and immediately retired. The next morning, as he called for his bill, the landlord said, "Sir, if you will go on your way, and never return here again, you are welcome to all you have now had." "That, sir, I shall not promise. Here is your money. But remember, if you continue your present business, you are planting thorns in your own pillow, and you are furnishing fuel for that flame that shall ere long burn in your bosom with quenchless anguish."

The agent went on his way, and in one year he received letters from three of the men whom he led up to the stand, and persuaded to take the pledge, stating that all he had told them had proved to be true, and more also. They had forsaken their evil ways, and had returned unto the Lord, who had had mercy on them, and to our God, who had abundantly pardoned. They felt themselves to be justified by faith, and were rejoicing in hope of the glory of God. "Thanks be unto the Lord," said the agent, as he told me the story, "for the privilege of spending that night in the valley of the mountains."—Canada Temperance Advocate.

KEEP AWAY FROM THE WHEELS.—Little Charles Williams lived near a manufactory, and he was very fond of going in among the workmen and the young people that were at work there. The foreman would say to him "Keep away from the wheels, Charley."

Charley did not mind, and would often say, "I can take care of myself." Often he would go nigh, and the wind of the wheels would almost suck him in; and two or three times he grew so dizzy that he scarce knew which way to go.

At length, one day, he staggered while amid the wheels, and fell the wrong way against the wheel; the band caught his little coat and drew him in, and he was dreadfully mangled. So is it, boys, when you go into a grog shop. You may think you can take care of yourselves, and keep clear of the wheels. But O, you may find yourselves dreadfully mistaken. Before you are aware of it, the band may catch you, and nothing can save you

O, keep away from the wheels!

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE.

BY THOMAS WHITTAKER.

The CONFERENCE OF TEETOTAL MINISTERS held in Manchester a few weeks ago, was an incident noted down in my log book. I was one of the lookers-on at that Conference. The meeting was in many respects encouraging, and yet I confess I felt a little disappointed. We had not quite 200 Ministers assembled, though, by letters and other means, we were given to understand we had not much less than 2,000 pledged Teetotal Ministers. As I travel to and fro in the country, I hope to meet them, for I submit that two thousand ministers is an army strong enough to shake the strong drink citadel to its very foundations. Let these men "endure hardness like good soldiers," and there is no power on earth can resist them.

Most of the ministers assembled were strangers to me, men of whom I had heard nothing before, and though it gratified me to meet so many strange Teetotalers, I was annoyed by the absence of old and familiar faces. The Rev. W. Scott, of Aire Dale College; the Rev. W. Morgan, clergyman, Bradford; Dr. Ritchie, Edinburgh; the Revs. R. Tabraham, Wesleyan, Clitheroe; F. Howarth, Unitarian, Bury; Kerrow, Presbyterian, Manchester; Peters, Wesleyan Association, Do. Hugh Bowen, Burslem; B. Parsons, Ebley; W. Roof, Wigan; and Dr. Burns, London, with others that might be named, were at their posts. These names have long been familiar to Teetotal ears; but with respect to many, we might have adopted the language of the despairing Arab, when he exclaimed, "The friends of my youth, where are they? And an echo answered where?" Not a single minister from the metropolis, except Dr. Burns; and Liverpool, Leeds, Sheffield, Birmingham, Bristol, Hull, and Newcastle, almost without a representative! I am aware excuses may be made for many, but there are others for whom no excuse can be made. The ministerial office has suffered as much from the drinking customs, as any respectable profession with which I am acquainted. On the principle of self-preservation, they would find Teetotalism useful. Temperance advocates often meet with those who have been shorn of their strength by this tempter. Teetotalism needs their help, and they, as well as the rest of mankind, need Teetotalism.

* Cry aloud, thou that sittest in the dust,
Cry to the proud, the cruel, and unjust,
Knock at the gates of nations, rouse their fears,
Say, Wrath is coming, and the storm appears;
But raise the shrillest cry in British ears."

The principal object the Committee had in view in calling this Conference, was the petitioning Parliament for the suppression of the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath; and though there was but one opinion as to the desirability of shutting up these places, there was a very great difference of opinion as to the means to be adopted for bringing it about. You will judge of my surprise when I heard one of the speakers state, at the Free-Trade Hall, and reiterate the same statement in Exeter Hall, at the annual meeting of the National Temperance Society, that all the resolutions passed unanimously. Nevertheless, considering the sections of the Church represented, (for we had from the High Church to the humble Primitive,) and the constitutions and national characteristics of the men assembled, there was sufficient harmony to convince us that we were one in desire. It was quite amusing, after we had all been made hot by some Welsh fire, to see how we should be cooled down by some iced cream, handed round by some cautious Scotchman; and then, as it were, to prevent our prospects of the Sunday traffic being blighted by the cool minds from the far north, up jumped some son of the "First flower of the earth,

First gem of the sea," shouting for a total Repeal of the Union between Government and strong drink. And then John Bull, who understands how to do nothing while he is appearing to do everything, better than anybody I know, saved us from going to the wall, by appointing a Sub-Committee to revise the resolution. That Sub-Committee did say enough to justify the British Association in their efforts to put down the Sunday traffic, though they came short of what was due to the Committee; and I rejoice to see the Teetotalers throughout the country moving in the matter. I believe the traffic is wrong on any day, and would like to go for an entire prohibition of the system; but that at present would not be entertained. But because we cannot get all we want, shall we refuse what we can get? I am aware we shall be met with the cry which was rung in our ears at the Conference,—“Let us rely on moral means, and ask the Legislature for nothing.” This is mere “sounding brass,” and is misleading the people. We are not asking the Legislature to help us; we are only asking them to give us a fair field, and to give over helping the publicans. Let the Government of this country cease to legalize the violation of what they admit to be the law of God—and then we shall, perhaps, cease to complain. Those people who refuse to join in the petition movement because it is not enough, remind of those very good people who object to Teetotalism because it is not everything. But what would you think of a man who has got on a very bad pair of boots, the soles of which are all but dropping off. He is walking through the mud in a very uncomfortable plight. He puts his hand into his pocket and takes out all the money he has got, which happens to be 3s. 6d. “Three shillings and sixpence,” says he, “that would mend my boots nicely! Dear me, what a state I am in; but then 3s. 6d. won’t buy a new pair, mended boots are not new boots—I won’t have them mended!” What would you think of him? Why you would think him very foolish, and yet he would be as wise as those who won’t have what they can get, because they can’t have what they want.

But the Conference itself was, upon the whole, satisfactory, and if nothing more than the letter from the Venerable W. Jay, of Bath, had been the result, the toil of the Committee, and especially the Secretaries, would have been well repaid. Every Minister of Christ ought to be put in possession of that letter, and the Committee furnished with means to publish it.

Whenever any individual or society takes a step in the right direction, let every Teetotaler in the community help according to their means. Much good must result from the closing of public-houses one day in seven, and if we cannot at once plant our standard on the walls of the citadel, let us throw a bridge across the broad moat that surrounds and protects it. And if we once set our foot within the territories of the licence system, we will continue the cry of—“The sword of the Lord, and the armies of Abstinence!” till the Citadel of Intemperance is rased to the ground, and they no more hurt nor destroy in all the Lord’s holy mountain.

LEAVING OFF GRADUALLY.—The S. C. Advocate relates an amusing anecdote which occurred between a couple of Dutchmen, one of whom was much devoted to “schnaps.” His friend was eloquently persuading him to “jine der dempranche,” and to obviate the terrors of coming to pure water “all of a sudden,” suggested the following expedient:—

“Vell, den, Honnes, I dell you how you do. You go und puy un parrel viskey, und take it home, und put a foshet in it, und vhenefur you vant un schnap, go und traw it, und slust so much viskey ash you traw off of der foshet, slust so much vater you pour into der parrel; den you see you haf always a full parrel viskey, only, d’rectly af ther a vile, it coome veaker und veaker, und at lasht you haf notting put un parrel of vater; den you vant no more use vor viskey, und you jine der dempranche.”

HOPS.—There are no less than 52,327 acres of land devoted to the growth of hops.

A PLEA FOR THE DRUNKARD ;

A VOICE FROM THE GRAVE.

"No man careth for my soul."
 "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground."

Loud roll the thunders,
 The lightnings keen flash ;
 The wind and rain fiercely
 'Gainst you cottage dash.
 But the storm is far fiercer
 That rages within,
 Where a poor wretch expires,
 All leprous with sin.

'Tis the cot of a drunkard,
 Envelop'd in gloom ;
 There a hardened inebriate
 Sinks fast to his doom.
 His health he has ruined,
 Has wasted his time,
 Has spent his life's manhood,
 In folly and crime.

No Christian is nigh
 To relieve his distress,
 Or point him to HIM
 Who can pardon and bless.
 His wife and his children
 Their sad vigils keep ;
 Despairing and hoping,
 They weep, pray, and weep.

Contrition, repentance,
 Faith, hope and love ;
 And every blessing
 That comes from above ;—
 Alas ! these are absent ;
 And fiendish despair,
 And anguish unspeakable,
 All triumph there.

Foul spirits accurst
 Seem to crowd his abode ;
 He starts, and raves wildly,—
 "Save, save me, O God !"
 His heart strings are cracking ;
 "None will save me !" he cries ;
 Then he shrieks and he curses,
 And cursing he dies !

All bloated and swoollen,
 He is stretched on the bier,
 A sight most disgusting :
 But his soul is—O where ?
 He died as a drunkard,
 Of whom it is written,—
 "None such can inherit
 The kingdom of heaven !"

Room for the pauper, there,
 Borne to his grave ;
 Room there, ye thoughtless,
 Who ne'er tried to save :
 Room, haughty Pharisee,
 Boasting in pride,
 Thou art better than he
 Who a drunkard hath died :—

Room, careless Christian,
 Allowing to perish
 A soul for whose welfare
 Warm zeal thou should'st cherish.
 Room, room for the coffin,
 See it placed in the grave ;
 And think of his death-word,
 "None cared me to save !"

In pauper style buried,
 His corpse is laid low ;
 And the widow crawls back
 To her chamber of woe.
 There meekly she bows her,
 And offers this prayer,—
 "Dispose Christian men
 For drunkards to care !"

Yes ! another poor drunkard
 Has gone to the grave,
 Shrieking in anguish,—
 "None cared me to save !"
 Yes ! and thousands such yearly
 Go down to the grave,
 Whom none care to pity,
 To rescue, or save !

Ye Philanthropists, Patriots,
 Ye Christians in name ;
 Hear this cry repeated,
 Alas ! to your shame.
 Hear, ponder, and tremble,
 Lest again it be said,
 A drunkard hath perished,
 You had power to aid.

Go, go to the drunkard,
 In sympathy go ;
 Reveal to him clearly
 The cause of his woe :
 From the drunkard's resort
 O bid him refrain ;
 From gin, and the beer cup,
 Urge him quick to abstain.

Abandon thine own cup,
 Wine, spirits, and beer ;
 And thus, by example,
 Thy precept make clear.
 Thou'lt advantage thyself
 While concerned for another ;
 And, O the rich pleasure
 Of saving a brother !

Relieve his wants earthly,
 Thus prove thou'rt his friend ;
 But still regard chiefly
 The life without end.
 His body will perish,
 In the grave it must lie,
 But his soul is immortal
 And never can die !

Ply him with intreaties,
 And watch him with care ;
 Encourage his hope
 And forbid his despair.
 To the House of Instruction
 Direct him the way ;
 And give him a Bible,
 And teach him to pray.

Point him to Calvary
 Streaming with blood ;
 Tell him who died there,
 To bring him to God.
 His faith seek to strengthen
 In each promise of love ;
 And bid him ask humbly
 All grace from above.

Hear, Christians, and ponder
 This voice from the grave ;
 Be watchful and zealous,
 Poor drunkards to save.
 Who thus labour for God
 Shall not labour in vain ;
 So the promise assures you
 Which firm shall remain.

JUVENILE CRIME AND DESTITUTION.

The following facts, proving that intemperance is a prime cause and incentive to crime, are extracted from an able article in the second number of the "Standard of Freedom," entitled, "LORD ASHLEY AND JUVENILE DESTITUTION" :—

"In 1843 Lord Ashley quoted a letter from the chaplain of a country gaol, in which the writer said, "I am within the mark in saying that three-fourths of the crime committed is the result of intemperance." In the last report of the Inspector of Prisons, equally strong testimony is borne to the fact that our national sin of drinking is the fountain of crime. The most powerful testimony that was ever borne to the evils of our beershops was by Lord Ashley in the speech referred to. He clearly made them out to be the great sinks of iniquity, and the resorts of the abandoned of both sexes. This may be an evil with which it is difficult to contend ; but when it is seen that our drinking system is after all the most influential cause of that depravation of morals we see around us on all hands—when we see that a vast number of those wandering outcasts of the street, who sleep in filthy sties, under bridges and gateways, and who live by mendicancy, vagabondry, and petty theft, are the children of drunken and debauched parents, ought there not to be a close and earnest attention paid to this the greatest of all sources of depravity and destitution ? Is this not a subject grave enough for parliamentary inquiry ? It is clear that so long as our drinking habits remain to curse the population, our best efforts can only relieve—they cannot cure. It has been proved that in a great number of cases the children who are brought to our police offices are sent out into the streets to beg or steal, in order that the proceeds may be devoted to gin or beer. The report of our city missionaries and temperance agents record many instances of youth of both sexes being seduced and debauched at singing and dancing saloons, and other entertainments, licensed by law to be held where drink is sold, and which amusements are only humble copies of many of those patronised by the aristocracy. In Scotland, it is stated by the inspector of prisons, that in Edinburgh, "In the localities where 73 per cent. of the crime is committed, more than 50 per cent of the spirit licenses are held ; and it may be safely assumed that not less than 60 per cent. of the drinking houses, properly so called, are in these very localities." It is not necessary to multiply evidence. The intimate connection betwixt crime and drink is a matter of familiar knowledge, and we urge it upon the consideration of those who have the conduct of youth as a preliminary inquiry of vast importance. We may establish schools, and endeavour to rescue from the multitude some few of the more hopeful or less abandoned, but if we intend to grapple, as men and Christians, with the evil in all its force and malignancy, we must look at it in every aspect, and endeavour to cut off the sources from whence the great fountain is supplied. Whenever that inquiry is fairly made, it is quite clear that the drinking system must have a share of attention."

DRUNKARDS ENEMIES TO OTHERS.—A drunken neighbour overturned the cart in which S. was riding. She fell under the wheels of a loaded waggon, and was so severely injured as to become helpless during the remaining four years of her life.—R. Tabraham.

CASES OF CONSULTATION; OR, THE PREACHER AND THE SMITH.

BY H. MUDGE.

VERY many are the applications that are made to me for advice. To the short and general statement commonly sent, of course a general answer can be returned. Under vague terms as "weakness," "spasms," &c., very dissimilar diseases are grouped together; and there is not much chance of a correct diagnosis, where the physician has not the opportunity of examining the patient for himself. Yet general advice based on scientific principles may be good as far as it goes; and it is under this conviction I shall consider the following cases, which have been forwarded to me by parties resident in a distant county.

CASE I.

"A. B. is a Teetotaler and a popular preacher. He is zealous and persevering, both in study and in general labour; 'instant in season, out of season.' Constant labour induces debility, sinking, depression, &c., &c. He applies to a medical acquaintance who advises wine, stout, or bitter ales; or, it may be, a leetle brandy. A. B. replies, 'I am a teetotaler, and would rather not take such things.' But the weakness increases, and he applies to a second medical acquaintance, who advises the same course, and remonstrates with him for his reluctance in complying with the advice. Now A. B. has not long been a Teetotaler, and he must have more confidence in the new system than he has in the opinion of two eminent medical men, or he will be sure to take intoxicating drinks."

CASE II.

"The superintendent of a Sunday school with which I am connected as a junior teacher, and who is likewise a deacon in the church, greatly respected and possessing much influence, and who is alive to the importance and necessity of the Temperance movement, is kept from the practice of abstinence by being troubled with indigestion and flatulence, from which he can only find relief by taking about two spoonfuls of brandy. He has intimated to me that if any one will inform him of another remedy, he would cheerfully renounce that drink, and adopt the Teetotal principle. He is rather advanced in years, and engaged in the laborious employment of a smith."

These are fair average cases: let us canvass each.

I. The first step in THE PREACHER'S CASE is to find out whether there is in reality any ailment present. Man is a machine of a limited capacity; it is of the utmost consequence to determine the extent of its healthy ability to work; for beyond that, Nature, or rather God speaking through natural laws, commands us not to go; the feelings of sinking and depression may be regarded as warnings that the machine is overwrought, and, if they are not attended by some breakage or other disorder, will, ere long, interrupt the work: if any exciting means (alcoholic stimulants or any other) be used to force on the system, periods, sometimes long ones, of interruption in the form of disease will assuredly be sought after by Nature, as her mode of resistance to unjust demands. Thus if the whole of life be not shortened, the aggregate of the working time will be very materially diminished. Try this assertion by the value of slave life, where the stimulus was that of the whip, and its truth will be instantly apparent; and the reader will have no difficulty in making the necessary transition, from an external to an internal excitant, to obtain sufficient proof that if the preacher persists in the use of wine, stout, or ale, he will do at the risk of his continuous health: in plain words the man is a slave, and slavery is hostile to both usefulness and longevity.

I must not omit here to mention that experience has convinced hundreds of ministers, suffering as the one whose case is related above, that they were under a delusion when they thought themselves assisted by alcoholic drinks; and cases where Mondayishness has been cured by Teetotalism may be found recorded in any of the Temperance publications. I know from my own observation (for I have been consulted in many cases,) that the patient frequently deceives himself: I have most carefully examined the state and working of every organ of the body, and could detect nothing amiss, except a morbid sensibility to fatigue, manifested by the expression of great fear that something terrible would certainly happen on adopting the practice of water drinking!

I should say then to the preacher:—eat moderately of plain food, don't drink any liquid more than warm, assist your lungs and stomach by daily washing and rubbing your skin, get the places you preach in well ventilated if possible, and be content to do as much work as regularity, punctuality, and perseverance will accomplish without impairing your health; and remember fatigue is to be overcome with repose, and not to be thrust aside by stimulants. A good lady once assured me that her husband came home sometimes so exhausted that he threw himself on the carpet, and she felt as if she were afraid to speak to him lest he should expire on the spot! This was of course a pathetic appeal to my sympathy to sanction her administering a glass of wine; but I was hardhearted enough not to weep with her who wept, and could only express my regret that the good man was so bewildered as to believe that his preternatural exertion was doing God service.

My correspondent says, the preacher must have more confidence in the new system than he has in the opinions of two eminent medical men; but we do not ask for faith in abstinence, a negative virtue, but for faith in certain fundamental and established laws of Nature: Superstition believes in Alcohol, Truth confides in Water. Granting however that A. B. is suffering from disease, and that the effect of debility remains after the removal of the cause, I then submit that stimulation by Alcohol is not the way of return to strength; it is a mere palliative, and after continuing such treatment for years, the patient is no better prepared to do without the medicine than when he began to take it. I should advise Tonics (not stimulants) and the preparations of Iron, Bismuth, Quinine, and Strychnine will succeed far better than spirituous compounds of any kind.

II.—In speaking of the second case, I may observe that THE SMITH should attend to the same general rules of cleanliness, ventilation, and diet as the preacher. Eructation proceeds, in nine cases out of ten, from improper food; let the articles which induce it be abstained from, and there will be no need of attempting to cure a less evil by a greater one, for brandy-drinking is worse than flatulence. In all probability the state of the stomach which prevents it from digesting the food was brought on by the spirit in the first onset, and it will never leave till the irritant is abandoned, and even then only by degrees. Cold, fresh, unboiled water, guardedly taken, is its natural remedy, and will be found almost a specific in these cases, provided the stomach is not scalded with drinks in the shape of hot tea, coffee and such like. If a little medicine be wanted to assist Nature, in these cases relief will be found by taking, just before the food, a pill containing a few grains of rhubarb or one grain each of sulphate of iron and Barbadoes Aloes made of a proper consistence with water.

The sick man's motto must be "PERSEVERANCE," and that too for twelve months at least, to have the benefit of uninterrupted abstinence through all the seasons of the year.

But now, allowing the cases above cited to require the medicinal use of Alcohol, how ought such a dangerous article to be used? An answer to this question would lead me too far at present, I will return to it however at a future day.

SERIOUS THOUGHTS FOR SERIOUS PEOPLE.

OCCASIONAL INTEMPERANCE SINFUL.—The idea is entertained that occasional intemperance is compatible with the hopes and prospects of a blessed Christianity: whereas it is just as opposed to them as occasional impurity, occasional idolatry, or occasional murder. It is high time that this delusion was brought to an end, and that the truth was sacredly enunciated, that one act of vice stamps upon the person a character, and leaves upon the soul a stain, which nothing can alter or efface but the grace of the Holy Spirit, and the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus.

DISHONESTY OF INTEMPERANCE.—Drunkenness and dishonesty are allies, not merely in so far as the drunkard mismanages his affairs and injures his creditors, but as directly entailing expense on his more honourable and upright neighbour; and the man who encourages him in his crime, and ministers to his vice, may well be regarded as a partaker in his sin, his very gains necessarily increasing the taxes and the crimes of the community.

INTEMPERANCE SUICIDAL.—The drunkard is a murderer of both soul and body. His habits prostrate the intellect, however splendid, and ruin the constitution, however firmly knit; and having wrecked the noble powers of the one, and palsied the living energies of the other, consign both to an unenvied, a dishonoured, and a premature sepulchre.

INTEMPERANCE EXPOSES TO MANY TEMPTATIONS, AND IS THE CAUSE OF MANY CRIMES.—"Who hath woe, who hath sorrow, who hath contentions, who hath wounds without cause, who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine." Stimulating and exciting all the irregular passions of our nature, inflaming the malice and anger of the unrenewed soul, this vice has banished peace and contentment from many a quiet home, and entailed misery and infamy on many a happy fireside. It would be easy to picture the change which it makes on the domestic economy, eating like a canker into all natural affection, irritating the temper, and often giving a character of almost fiendish malignity to a heart that seemed once touched with the greatest and softest emotions of our nature. Its history needs no painter's art, no power of fancy, no effort of imagination—it is written in the history of crime, secret and detected; and the tales of brutality, of quarrellings, of fightings, of seductions, of murders, that stain our calendars of crime, are the records of the fruits of this debasing vice.

INTEMPERANCE A SOCIAL CRIME.—There are, no doubt, many cases of solitary drinking; but generally the more hideous aspect of the evil is obscured by the charms and attractions of a vitiated companionship. The drunkard is thus but too often a local pestilence, contaminating by his wretched example, and continually luring others into the same gulph of misery and iniquity, in which he himself is sinking; not, it may be, desiring their wretchedness, but inviting, cajoling, plotting for their presence and countenance, till they are insensibly imbued with tastes, and made the subject of desires and appetites, that destroy their property and health, and ruin their happiness and salvation.

INTEMPERANCE DESTROYS THE SOUL.—It is of vast moment to observe the solemn, the unequivocal sentence of Eternal Truth pronounced against this sin, "Drunkards shall not inherit the Kingdom of God." Nor is it at all difficult to justify this terrific threatening. When we mark how this vice impoisons society, stifles affection, scandalizes morals and religion, defies the authority of the Great Lawgiver, and openly violates his holy laws, can we wonder that such a penalty should be attached to this peculiar wickedness? Or, if we look at the history and procedure of the intemperate, there is no difficulty in discovering how his habits disqualify and unfit him for a kingdom of holiness, as they necessarily shut him out from the very means and instrumentality by which he might be prepared for the presence, the judgment, and the glory of the Lord. What can a drunkard discharge of commanded Christian duty? What can he be expected to feel of the power of precious revealed truth? Can he pray for pardon, for grace, for life? His prayers would be but the babblings of impurity, and with such prayers a holy God can have no communion. Is he likely to appreciate the offices of redeeming love in Christ Jesus, or yield to the suasive influences of the Holy Spirit? Alas! no. Without limiting the Holy One, we must not conceal it, that his usual course, even where the influences of early education have been at the side of the Bible, is, first, occasionally to neglect the stated instructions of the sanctuary, to remit the private exercises of devotion, then to become dissatisfied with the overstrictness of the doctrines and precepts that are inculcated in the House of God; then to sneer at ministers, and cavil at sacred things, and eventually, if he does not become an open scoffer, he lapses into an utter neglect of means and ordinances altogether. His time rolls on; his habits strengthen, his boon companions drop one after another into an unhallowed grave, and, at length, the sentence goes forth, "Thy soul is required of thee!" The cup, to which even on a death bed he resorted for a miserable consolation, drops from his nerveless grasp; his silver cord is loosed; and the spirit, doomed to immortality, is swept on to judgment, unpardoned, unsanctified, unsaved!

INTEMPERANCE A DISGRACE TO A CHRISTIAN COUNTRY.—Strange and humiliating it is that intemperance should be the prevailing vice in a land of Bibles and Sabbaths; that, with the holy precepts of that blessed book in circulation, there should not be merely the absence of an universal loathing at customs and practices that feed pauperism and crime, but a toleration for them, such as would have disgraced a heathen clime. Ancient paganism denounced intemperance, though it encouraged it by the example of the gods. Mahomedanism refuses the wine cup to its followers. Eastern idolatry reckons drunkenness one of the five enormous sins. And shall Christianity be less indignant in her denunciation of this offence, or less uncertain in the note of warning and alarm which she heralds forth? The pulpit and the press must now speak out. Patriotism, philanthropy, religion demand it; and their united voice, in the full majesty of truth, regarding the drunkard's habits and ways be this—"THE END OF THESE THINGS IS DEATH!"

TESTIMONY OF A LARGE BREWER.—The use of stimulating liquors is often the cause, and always the concomitant of crime.—Sir T. F. Burston.

TRUTHS FOR THE YOUNG.

May you never, my dear young friends, have bitter experience of the power which the habit of drinking acquires over the mind, of the manner in which it leads captive the strongest understandings! The following incident, which I have met with in perusing the Tenth Report of the Inspectors of Prisons, illustrates the matter most forcibly and affectingly. Here is a man of intelligence and property, desiring confinement and restraint in a common Goal, feeling himself powerless under the influence of this vice when at liberty.

The Government Inspector, speaking of the Preston Penitentiary says:—"Since my inspection I have received the following extraordinary letter from the Governor, purporting to be from an individual wishing to be received into the House of Correction, and kept there as a voluntary prisoner:

"DEAR SIR,—I hope you will excuse the liberty I take as a stranger in writing these few lines to you. I read an account of the New Penitentiary at Preston a short time ago in Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, and my reason for writing this is that I wish to subject myself to the discipline of the prison for twelve months without committing any crime.—I am a young man of very respectable family, my friends are wealthy, and I am myself possessed of a good property, money is not an object to me comparatively speaking, but I have unfortunately within the last two years got into a habit of drinking too freely to my very great injury and distress to my friends, and I am convinced the only plan to break myself is to cut myself off entirely from it, but unfortunately I have not resolution enough so long as I am at liberty, and I have therefore made up my mind to shut myself up. I wish to be in a separate cell and have a hand-loom to weave at, which I understand, having learned it a few years ago for my own pastime; and I intend to pursue the cold bathing system with the water supplied to the cell and the drinking of cold water also as recommended by the Hydropathic establishment now in use in England and on the Continent. I feel very anxious about it and as I said before, money is not an object. I am willing to pay down £20 as soon as I am admitted, which will insure the Institution from any loss but I do hope you will take nothing into consideration, and let me have a favourable answer soon. I hope you will not refuse me suddenly, but if you think a personal interview with any of the inspectors or managers of the prison could further my views, I would come over to Preston on purpose to make an arrangement as I am certain nothing can lure me from my purpose though I should be sorry to have to commit a crime for the purpose of getting in, as it would so much distress my friends. I am 23 years of age, have a good constitution, and have never suffered sickness at all; so that I am certain my bodily health would be good, and I should give no trouble, but stick steadily to my work. I shall feel very grateful if you will be kind enough to drop me a line by return of post and as I am a stranger in Preston, please send me word how I can be admitted to the interior of a prison, and whether you would have some conversation with me yourself if I was to come over in the course of a week. I shall be very anxious for a favourable answer, as soon as you can make it convenient.

And I remain, Sir,

Your's truly,

"To the Governor of the New Penitentiary on the Separate System, Preston, Lancashire."

The application was referred to the Visiting Trustees, but we are not informed in the Report as to its disposal. We suppose the applicant's request was refused.

In reading such a case how thankful ought one to be who has escaped the contagion of strong drink, whose blood is not fired by this furor for alcohol! How blessed the condition of those who bow before God with a cool head and a placid heart, and obtain mercy through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

TO THE PROPRIETOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

"Go little sheet from this thy solitude
I cast thee on the waters, go thy ways."

Settlement of Natal, 24 February 1845.

SIR,—As an individual, I am desirous of publicly acknowledging the pleasure and profitable instruction which I have derived from the monthly perusal of the Teetotal Times. I consider its extensive circulation highly beneficial, not only to pledged abstainers, but to all lovers of truth. In the distant and isolated region from which I write, and owing to the paucity of Temperance Lectures here, I have frequently found your paper a most useful assistant to, and substitute for the "orator," by reading therefrom select pieces—"Jack Steers," for instance—at many of our monthly meetings. Choice Articles from the column designated the "Teetotalers Budget," have also been listened to with marked attention.

It is with unfeigned delight I observe your attention occasionally directed towards the army. I do hope you will persevere in this direction, for on no class of erring humanity is total abstinence capable of exerting so much influence for good, as on those employed in H. M. Service. From the natural goodness of many Commanding Officers, Temperance Societies are permitted in their Regiments, but we want encouragement to carry out our vice-destroying principles.

Considerable experience in the Service enables me—fearless of contradiction—to state that, our military offences are, with few exceptions, committed under the influence, or in circumstances resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks. I fear I have occupied too much space and shall only mention my conviction that much good would result from your sending monthly & gratuitously a Teetotal Times to the Editor of the —, he is a strong advocate for all that can conduce to the introduction of temperate habits into the Army.—His influence is potent, his periodical being almost universally read by the Naval and Military branches of the Service.

I shall take an early opportunity of transmitting a donation in aid of your gratuitous circulation Fund, and am,

Most respectfully yours,

A. M.

THE MORE WE DO THE MORE WE MAY.—One step makes room for another. In ascending a hill, the first glorious prospect encourages us to proceed, until the summit is reached. A good act performed to-day, opens the way for another to-morrow. If we heal one broken heart, we shall have the pleasure of healing another. A dinner given to the poor to-day, will make us doubly anxious to give a couple to-morrow. If we take one step in virtue, the second will appear more glorious, and on we shall proceed. It is thus in everything. The more we do the more we may. By being stationary we are confined in narrow limits; we cannot see an inch beyond us; but continued progress opens to us new views and new beauties, and we are anxious and determined to proceed. A sterling character is always astonished at his progress. Let your motto be onward. Do all you can—keep doing, and the rust of pleasure and folly will never corrode your heart.

IS FRANCE A SOBER NATION?—It appears that the annual consumption of wine in France is 746,571,429 gallons; of brandy, 9,245,425; spirits, 2,250,000; cider 221,705,450; beer, 74,021,550. In this aggregate consumption of 1,053,797,854 gallons, there is 137,298,767 gallons of pure alcohol, giving to each of the thirty-two millions of people no less than 4½ gallons of alcohol annually; considerably exceeding the amount of alcohol used by any other nation. There is more, far more of drunkenness or unnatural excitement from the use of intoxicating liquors in France than the world are usually acquainted with.

TEMPERANCE MEETING AT ALBANY, U.S.

ADDRESS TO PARENTS.

The following account of a meeting held in the Methodist Episcopal Church, extracted from a letter addressed by the Rev. JAMES CAUGHEY to the Editor of the Wesleyan, will, we think, be read with interest:—

"The Temperance meeting passed off with splendid effect. My colleague on the platform was the Rev. M. Pohlman, D.D. When we entered the church we were surprised to find the body seats entirely empty. Very soon the Temperance troops came pouring in. The sons of Temperance, ay! and the daughters of Temperance, according to their Orders, entered the church in a formidable and imposing array,—some dressed in a white satin collar, others had on a scarlet collar, with ornaments. These occupied the reserve seats. One of the city physicians, Dr. Staats, was called to the chair. Dr. Pohlman was the first speaker. His theme was a parallel between Washington and the Temperance reformation. The conflicts and victories, the sublimity, patriotism, philanthropy, self-denial, purity, physical, intellectual, moral and religious elevation, which accompany and crown the cause of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, were ingeniously illustrated by incidents in the career of Washington.

"Your correspondent was next announced. The principal part of my address consisted in an appeal to parents in behalf of their children. The Lord graciously assisted me to plead the cause of the rising generation; their exposure to bad example; the possible effects of intoxicating drinks upon their destiny in time and eternity. I insisted that every parent should be notified, that if the race of drunkards is to be sustained and perpetuated as a class, they must be recruited from the youthful generation springing up around them; that race of wretched beings who hoot and yell in our streets; babble in the grog shops, mourn in the workhouse, pine in the state prison, groan in the malefactor's cell, and dangle from the gallows;—if the ranks of these are to be sustained, the supply must be obtained from those bright-eyed little fellows who lift up their gleeful voices around us. I begged of every parent one favour, that, on his return home, he and his wife should go into the sleeping apartment of the children God had given them; and, while gazing upon their precious charge, to ask themselves the following questions: When the genius of intemperance is making a draught to replenish the ranks of his ruined sots, which of these little fellows shall we consent to surrender to the demon? which of these daughters shall we give up to be the wife of the drunkard? where is the father or the mother that could bear the terrible thought? The bare possibility is too horrible to be entertained for a moment. And yet such a fatal demand, such an appalling catastrophe, is within the limit of possibilities with regard to the children of all the parents in this assembly! How is it possible, then, that heads of families can stand aloof from the glorious cause in which we are engaged? How can they look up to Heaven with confidence, or look forward to Providence in trust, while they treat the Total Abstinence Society with cold indifference? Is it not the paladium of your children's safety? and your carriage towards it may leave upon the minds of your children an indelible impression for good or evil. We would have you look upon every liquor shop as the mortal foe of your household; as the probable instrument in the ruin of some of your little ones—present and eternal ruin. We would urge upon you to entertain no notions of security, even should you join the Teetotal ranks, so long as one of these infernal dens remain open in this city. We would entreat you to lend your influence with the legislature of this State, and pray also that the time may speedily come when public opinion shall unite with the strong hand of the law, in sweeping away these nuisances from a jeopardized community.

"At this point of my discourse I insisted that the cause in which we are engaged should be made a 'common cause'; that the aid of all classes, saint and sinner, Christian and infidel, should be enlisted against the destroyer, because the peril is deeply interesting to all.

"The Chairman, Dr. Staats, made some excellent remarks, and gave the result of his own observation as a medical practitioner in Albany; a mournful and desolate picture.

"Pledges were circulated; the number of signatures I did not learn. While they were soliciting signatures, a little man appeared on the platform, and said that he had a song to sing, that he forgot not that the place was holy ground, but the work in which we were engaged was holy, just, and good, and that therefore he would sing nothing out of character with either. The poetry was his own, and as for the tune they might judge for themselves. His voice was remarkable for sweetness and compass; the poetry, I can hardly give you a description of it—half comic, half serious—wit and genius played their parts with alacrity, and satire—keen as a razor—all to the honour and defence of Teetotalism. Each verse finished off with a chorus,—'Let us go on reforming;' and with such a peculiar modulation of voice as added an indescribable effect to the performance."

IMPORTANT TESTIMONY.

Extract from a letter containing an order for the Teetotal Times, from the Rev. JOHN CLARKE, Missionary from Africa:—

"I am happy to bear testimony to the salutary effects of Temperance principles in Western Africa and in the West Indies. Since 1839 I have been connected with the Teetotal interest, and previous to that with the Temperance movements. Two Societies are still in operation in Africa; one in the island of Fernando Po, and the other at Bimbia, on the Continent. The good effected has been considerable, and many of the Africans are total abstainers, even from palm wine, which though simple as it comes from the tree, is, by keeping, rendered intoxicating and injurious. To avoid giving encouragement to the drinking of intoxicating palm wine, every sort of this beverage is refused by those who have joined this Society.

"In the West Indies, by way of which I returned from Africa, the cause of Temperance seems progressing. Most of the Missionaries are Teetotalers; and those who are not, do not, generally, oppose in words. Still, much remains to be done there; for the sin of drunkenness, with many of the people, has an overwhelming power."

THE CHURCH STILL BEHINDHAND.—At the recent anniversary of Cheshunt College, Alderman Challis, the Chairman after a "plentiful supply of cold meats, &c, &c," proposed the health of the Queen, which, it is stated, was drunk with enthusiastic applause. Some Teetotal Ministers and Members were present; whether they protested against this, as "a custom more honoured in the breach than the observance," we are not informed; but it is a proof that the Church is not yet purged from the foul abomination, when at the anniversary of an Institution founded for the express purpose of training young men to preach the Gospel, the Treasurer is cheered on his introduction of one of the customs, the observance of which, more than any other cause, renders the preaching of that Gospel "of none effect to thousands and tens of thousands.

DRINK is to the thirsty the supply of Nature's want—the remover of uneasiness—the cheerer of human emotions—and the precursor of effort;—but it must be unalcoholic, for alcoholic drinks increase thirst, sorrow, and indisposition for effort.—R. Tabraham.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

NEWCASTLE ON TYNE.

FROM the first report of the Young Men's Temperance Association, just published, we learn that this Association, which was instituted last November, has laboured with encouraging success. A number of Sabbath Schools have been visited by deputations, who were most cordially and affectionately received, and listened to with marked attention by teachers, scholars, and friends. 37 meetings were held during the first five months of the existence of the Association, at Stations, Sunday Schools and Villages. These meetings have been attended by 6,770 persons, including 1,390 children of Sunday Schools. 132 addresses have been delivered, and 2,060 tracts circulated. 350 members have been enrolled, independent of members of School Societies. 14 Branch Societies have been established at Sunday Schools, in which 784 of the scholars and 191 of the teachers are pledged teetotalers. Others have formed Societies not identified with the Association.

NEWCASTLE ON TYNE.

Various efforts have been made here to counteract the evil influence of the Race-course, but all of so insignificant a character as to fail in producing an impression on the Town. This year a few friends of sabbath schools and of the Temperance cause, impressed with the desirableness of a countermovement to that of the Races, suggested, to a meeting or the Committees of the various Temperance Societies, a plan on a scale worthy the cause they represented;—the matter, which was cordially entertained, was entered upon in right good earnest, and resulted in a triumphant demonstration—a gathering of happy smiling countenances, far exceeding in number the most sanguine expectations of the promoters, and such as has not been witnessed here before. The movement was designated, "REFORM IN THE RACE WEEK FESTIVITIES;" the co-operation of Ministers, members of churches, and congregations, Day and Sabbath School Teachers, and Moral Reformers was solicited. The end in view was to procure a field where a practical proof might be given that there are amusements unconnected with vice, in which the friends of good order and sobriety may engage, consistently with the noble principles they hold.

The demonstration took place on June 20, 21 and 22, in a large field a little out of the town, which was liberally granted by RICHARD GRAINGER, Esq. The scholars with their Teachers assembled each day at a quarter to 2 o'clock, at the Corn Exchange, where processions were formed, and headed by a band of music, proceeded to the field. Each school having a flag or banner, and the procession extending about half a mile in length, through the streets thronged with spectators, a scene was presented at which many warm-hearted friends of Sabbath Schools could scarcely repress the tear of joy.

On arriving at the field, children under 14 years of age paid a halfpenny, and were presented with an orange and a bun, and the adults 1d. for admission. The buns and oranges having disappeared, a large supply of handballs and shuttlecocks were distributed, which afforded considerable enjoyment to adults as well as children,—a swing was erected and kept going, carrying more "inside than law allows." Other amusements were engaged in by men and women of all statures, ages, and creeds. The lovers of music were also attended to; the band paraded the field, and the sweet voices of the children in some of their beautiful hymns added to the pleasures of the visitors. The intellectual part of man received attention; Mr. THOS. WHITTAKER, of London, and other friends, delivered short lectures on Temperance, and other important subjects, and to add comfort to the pleasures, a commodious tent graced the field, in which Tea, Coffee, Lemonade, and other refreshments were obtainable.

No adequate conception can be conveyed of the scene, as viewed from an adjoining building; it was one of the most delightful that could be gazed upon. To add still more to the pleasures of the Festival, the nursery grounds and conservatory of Mr. J. Wilcke (a well tried friend of the Temperance cause) were opened to the visitors of the field, and though hundreds of children availed themselves of the treat, it is gratifying to learn from the kind Proprietor, that not a plant or shrub, to his knowledge, has been injured. Each day at  $\frac{1}{2}$  to 7 o'clock the sports were terminated by the Band playing "The National Anthem," which was the signal for the schools to assemble under their respective banners, when they were marched to town and dispersed.

During the three afternoons, not less than 18,000 children, and 7,000 adults were present; several ministers and influential gentlemen were noticed, amongst whom was the sheriff of Newcastle, who gave an handsome donation towards the expenses of the movement.

The opinion entertained of the movement by the most respectable of our townsmen is, that it has, in a great measure, accomplished the end desired, and produced an impression that will not soon be forgotten; and that it should only be the first of a series of efforts to substitute harmless recreation for that which is degrading, vicious, and a disgrace to the age in which we live.

Public meetings were held for the promotion of Temperance. On Monday evening Mr. E. P. HOOD lectured on behalf of the "Young Men's Temperance Association," and on the three following evenings, Mr. WHITTAKER lectured on behalf of the Parent Society. The large Temperance Hall was crowded each evening with attentive audiences; many names were enrolled.

LANCASHIRE.

RADCLIFFE CLOSE.—The Teetotalers celebrated their first Juvenile festival in the Wesleyan school-room, when 200 individuals partook of an excellent tea. Some friends from the "Go A Head" society, Manchester, were present. A happy change has taken place in our village; formerly there was not a Teetotaler in the parish; now we have 260 pledged abstainers, including some who were the most abandoned characters in the village, but who are now brought under the sound of the gospel, and some have joined Wesleyan and other Churches. After tea, a public meeting was held; Mr. Brazier, of Manchester, presided; excellent addresses were delivered by Mr. J. Rider, of Radcliffe; Mr. Capper, of Manchester, Mr. Williams, Mr. Hindle, Mr. R. Lomas; Mr. Thomas, Mr. Cramshaw, Mr. Hewit, Mr. Thompson, and others. Nearly all in the sabbath-school are abstainers; at the close of the meeting 14 persons signed the pledge.

JOHN HAMER, Secretary.

HINCKLEY.

Onward, Onward, we will cry
Victory! on our banners fly.
Onward, Onward, we will go,
Till death enshrouds our deadly foe.

On Thursday evening, the 22nd ult., Mr. Tweedie delivered a very earnest address in the Friend's Chapel, in this town, to a highly respectable and attentive audience. Mr. Tweedie's style of address was well calculated to raise him in the estimation of those present. We hope his labors may be crowned with abundant success. Fifteen signatures were added to the pledge of our Society, and many left the meeting much more favorable to our views than on their first entrance.

SAMUEL PRESTON, Jun., Secretary.

GLOUCESTER.

The annual meeting of the Total Abstinence Society was celebrated July 11, on Mr. Sam. Bowly's farm, where an elegant pavilion was erected in a meadow. Upwards of 500 persons, including juveniles, were present. After tea, the company amused themselves in the adjoining fields till 7 o'clock, when the gates were thrown open to the public. The tent was completely filled with a compact audience, who listened with deep interest to the different speakers. After a hymn, given out by the Rev. F. G. White, had been sung, SAMUEL BOWLY, Esq., addressed the meeting. He dwelt on the value of social gatherings such as the present, as illustrating the true nature of equality. Equality, in the common acceptation of the word, he said, was not liberty. Equality, in that sense would bring the idle, dissolute and drinkers, to be supported at the expense of the thrifty, industrious, and economical. The hard earnings of the industrious, hard-working man, ought not to be so swallowed up. Mr. Bowly remarked on the general spread of the teetotal principle, and of the good results of that spread as it regarded education, and the general welfare of the community.

The Rev. Dr. JABEZ BURNS, then addressed the meeting at considerable length, on the following leading principles.—He said that he advocated teetotalism, first, as a system identified with the physical health and vigour of mankind.—Secondly, on account of its inseparable connexion with soundness of mind, and the advancement of education.—Thirdly, on grounds of prudence and sound economy.—Fourthly, as the grand remedy for England's greatest crime.—Fifthly, as connected with the glorious Gospel of the blessed God.—Each of these points the rev. gentleman illustrated with facts. He was greatly applauded.

The Rev. F. G. White, Mr. Bowly and Mr. Chivers, briefly addressed the meeting. A considerable number of persons signed the teetotal pledge. Mr. Bowly stated that since the last Annual Meeting, 250 additional names had been received, and he hoped that at the next meeting they would be able to report the acquisition of 500 more.

CHORLEY, LANCASHIRE.

From a report of the Total Abstinence Society of this place, we find that during the past year 117 persons have joined the Society, making a total of nearly 1,900 enrolled members. "Upwards of fifty public meetings have been held, during the year; at which, lectures and addresses have been delivered by various gentlemen who kindly gave their services gratuitously. Tracts, illustrative of Total Abstinence principles, have been circulated; and in addition, through the kindness of Mr. John Cassell of London, the Committee have been enabled to gratuitously furnish the Clergy of all denominations with the "Medical Certificate," "Baker's Idolatry of Britain, and "The Teetotal Essayist." During the current year, the Committee hope to be able to supply the Magistrates and Guardians of the Poor with such statistical documents as will, at a glance, satisfy those gentlemen respecting the appalling amount of crime and pauperism which annually results from the sale and use of intoxicating drink."

RISBOROUGH.

The Teetotal cause in this place is neither dead nor dying, notwithstanding the great depression of trade, and political agitation. We held a meeting on the 4th of July, when Mr. John Edmonds, Deacon of the Baptist Church, delivered a pathetic address. Mr. W. Tomkins, a London City Missionary, told us some of the doings of strong drink in the metropolis. We were interrupted by a newly formed band of music employed to play opposite the meeting, for the purpose of drowning the voices of the speakers. Two of the Committee waited on the Rev. C. E. Gray, the clergyman and magistrate of the place, who, after hearing them patiently, kindly granted them the use of the National School. To this place we repaired, and continued our meeting till after 9 o'clock. When Mr. Tomkins retired from the meeting, he was escorted through the town by the band of music, with as much pomp as if he had been an M.P.—This meeting has done the cause of Temperance much good.

JOHN DARVILL.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

TAPPING SPIRITS.—Two sailors tapped a cask of spirits, and having drunk till satisfied, allowed the remainder to run till the cask was emptied. Fearing detection, they left the vessel, and one of them engaged in the slave-trade. Years after he lost a leg by a cannon shot, became a fisherman, would sell his fish on the Sabbath morning, and get intoxicated with the produce. When ill, he was afraid to die, for a guilty conscience racked him with its terrors. Being converted, he became "a living epistle, known and read of all men," and died with a glorious hope of heaven.

THE OYSTER MAN.—There he goes, a ragged, starved, miserable sot, to sell a few oysters in those places of ruin, where he has lost all but the mere wreck of humanity. Even the basket and its contents are the property of a kind-hearted fisherman, who compassionately furnished them to save him from speedy death. But this degraded man was once pious, a member of the Church of Christ, and an attractive preacher of the word of life. Alas! how fallen. Who among the pious can fail to tremble, if the poisoned water ever passes their lips?—R. Tobraham.

LISTEN, MOTHERS.—All drinks containing spirits, such as wine, caudle, ales, porter, &c., must impregnate the milk; and the digestive organs of the babe must be quickly injured by them. Physicians who have prescribed a diet for nursing mothers, have not sufficiently attended to the hurtful effects of wine and malt liquors. Porter is generally permitted in large quantities on these occasions; a beverage highly improper and dangerous.—Dr. Trotter.

DRUNKEN REVOLUTIONISTS.—Most of the prisoners taken in the late sanguinary insurrection in Paris, were in a state of drunkenness. Who will say that strong drink is not "raging?"

THE SMOKER is the drunkard's younger brother—the habits are twin giants—they are both alike detestable—alike degrading—both have the same tendencies. They are soul deceivers—mind murderers—conscience scarers—time wasters—health destroyers—misery producers—money squanderers, and the sooner both are scouted into oblivion the better.—Mechanics' Organ.

WORLDLY CONTAMINATION.—The Penfield (Ga.) Banner, gives an account of an ingenious expedient to avoid "mixing with the world!" entertained by certain professing Christians who were rather given to the lusts of depraved appetites:—

The writer, referring to the prevalent use of intoxicating drinks among Church members, says that one good Baptist brother complained to him, some time since, about his brethren drinking so much, and proposed a plan for a Baptist grocery, where his brethren might drink without being mixed with the people of the world (as they would drink), and that the proceeds of the grocery be applied to paying the expenses of the Church, and for other benevolent objects. He thought such a plan would procure the pastor a liberal support, and raise a handsome sum for the cause of missions, and save the Church from the reproach of commingling with the world!

IMPORTANT!

At the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of America, recently held at Pittsburgh, the subject of Temperance, and of Mr. Wesley's rules respecting it, gave rise to an animated discussion. The result was that a change was made in the rule of discipline on Temperance, by which all drinking and selling, and, by consequence, all manufacturing of intoxicating liquors, is forbidden in the Methodist Episcopal Church. "This," says the Northern Christian Advocate, is a point we have been labouring after for many years. And now that we have reached it, we would congratulate the friends of Temperance everywhere, in the accession to their ranks of a body of Ministers six thousand strong, and a Membership of six hundred thousand, ALL PLEDGED TO TOTAL ABSTINENCE."

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE DRUNKARD'S CHILDREN: a Sequel to "The Bottle." In Eight plates. By GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. London: Bogue, Fleet Street.

Before this Number of the Teetotal Times reaches the reader, these plates will, no doubt, have been seen, like those of "the Bottle," in every town in the United Kingdom; and those who have seen them will not require to have them described or eulogized by us. Yet it is due to this distinguished artist to say, that the fearful, but faithful pictures which he has now furnished of the sad effects of parental example—of the fatal consequences of youthful dissipation—while they afford fresh proof of his skill, read a most telling lecture both to parents and children. The last plate of "the Bottle" left room for fearful forebodings as to the future course and destiny of the two children who are there represented as gazing with listless unconcern on their maniac father:—the eight plates now before us furnish frightful details of their career and end; details so true to nature that they are at once seen to be cause and effect.

Plate 1.—Represents the interior of a ginshop. "The children, neglected by their parents, educated only in the streets, and falling into the hands of wretches who live upon the vices of others, are led to the Gin shop, to drink at that fountain which nourishes every species of crime."

Plate 2.—Exhibits the inside of a low gambling room, or beer shop, where nearly half the company are playing those foolish tricks which none but drunkards can play.—"Between the fine flaring gin palace, and the low dirty beer-shop, the Boy thief squanders and gambles away his ill-gotten gains."

Plate 3.—The inside of a low dancing room, or "Casino."—"From the gin shop to the dancing rooms, from the dancing rooms to the gin shop, the poor Girl is driven on in that course which ends in misery."

Plate 4.—"The chamber of a cheap lodging house." Urged on by his ruffian companions, and excited by drink, he (the Boy, commits a desperate robbery.—He is taken by the Police at a threepenny lodging house."

Plate 5.—"The Dock of the Old Bailey; the Boy and Girl at the bar. "From the bar of the Ginshop to the bar of the Old Bailey, it is but one step."

Plate 6.—"The Visitor's room in Newgate. "The Drunkard's Son is sentenced to transportation for life: the Daughter, suspected of participation, is acquitted.—The Brother and Sister part for ever in this world."

Plate 7.—"The sick ward of a convict hulk. "Early dissipation has destroyed the neglected boy.—The wretched convict droops and dies."

Plate 8.—"Section of the parapet and arch of London Bridge.—"The maniac Father and the convict Brother are gone.—The poor girl, homeless, friendless, deserted, destitute, and gin mad, commits self-murder."

We question whether there be another artist in the kingdom who could so faithfully portray these scenes as George Cruikshank. His sketches are, evidently ad vivum. There is a truthfulness about every figure which makes one involuntarily shudder. Never were the debasing effects of strong drink, the associations and practices to which it leads, so faithfully and so powerfully delineated. We know that great good has resulted from the publication of Mr. Cruikshank's plates of "the Bottle," and the lectures and addresses to which they have given rise: we trust results equally beneficial will follow the publication of these plates of "The Drunkard's Children."

We have one pleasing and important fact to communicate. Till within the few last weeks we were not quite sure whether Mr. Cruikshank was himself an abstainer from the drinks the fearful consequences of using which he portrayed so admirably, or whether he had merely published "The Bottle"—in "the way of business." We are no longer in doubt on this point. At a meeting held in the new Teetotal Hall, Welsted Street, Somers Town, on the evening of July 3rd, GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq., presided. We were prevented from being present by extreme illness, but a friend informs us that Mr. Cruikshank then and there avowed himself a Teetotaler. He stated that though he had often presided at convivial meetings, that was his first appearance as president of a Temperance meeting. With characteristic feeling and energy, he avowed his hearty sympathy with the Temperance movement, and testified to the decided personal advantages he had derived from ten months practical adherence to the teetotal principle.

As to the plates before us, as well as those of "The Bottle," we earnestly hope that they will be exhibited in every suitable place, that both parents and children may be warned against the fatal consequences of tampering with that, which, though it may be tempting to the eye and grateful to the taste, will, "at the last, bite like a serpent and sting like an adder."

COME TO JESUS. By NEWMAN HALL. London: Snow, Paternoster-row.

This faithful and affectionate series of exhortations, from the pen of an able Teetotal Minister of the Gospel, deserves to be circulated extensively. There are two editions, one, very elegant, at 6d., the other, very neat, at 4d.; but we earnestly recommend a penny edition, which would encourage the well-disposed to circulate it by thousands.

THE MECHANIC'S ORGAN. Third Quarterly Part. London: B. Green, Paternoster-row, London.

This monthly periodical deserves to be in the hands of every mechanic. It is said to be edited by "An Everyday Working Man." Be he who he may, he is evidently the friend of the working classes. He manifests a most laudable anxiety to root out bad habits and implant good ones; and we earnestly pray that his labours may be successful. We are the more pleased with him, perhaps, as Teetotalers, because he denounces "pipes and glasses"—"strong drink and tobacco," as "active agents of the devil in despatching victims to people his infernal dominions."

A BROTHER'S RESPECTFUL APPEAL. By RICHARD TABRAHAM, Wesleyan Minister.

This Appeal forms an extra Number of "The Sunday School and Youths' Temperance Journal," published in the Isle of Man. It is not only "respectful," but clear, pointed, faithful and energetic. We have heard that a copy of this Appeal, in another form, has been sent to every Wesleyan Minister. It is a valuable synopsis of the Total Abstinence system—of its necessity, its requirements, its advantages, and its accordance with the spirit and genius of the Gospel, as well as of Methodism. We court not fellowship with those who can withstand such an Appeal, much less with those who can deride it! As it is now printed in this very cheap form, we hope that it will be circulated by thousands.

Single copies of the TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST will be sent regularly, post free, to every Subscriber of ONE SHILLING, per annum, in advance. Societies and individuals desirous of availing themselves of this very economical and efficient mode of advocating Teetotalism will be supplied with copies at 6s. per hundred, which will be sent to them free, either in parcels, or in single copies, to persons whose name may be furnished. Thus a subscription of three shillings will ensure the sending of important information to fifty individuals, or to one hundred, if six shillings be subscribed.

TO POSTMASTERS.

This Journal is privileged to be sent postage free to every part of the United Kingdom, and we have the authority of the Secretary of the General Post Office for stating "that Agents may be employed in Great Britain and Ireland, for the sale of JERSEY Newspapers; and that such Newspapers may be forwarded by Post to any extent, either singly, or in parcels, provided the parcel is open at the ends. They may afterwards be reposted for any part of the United Kingdom, free of Postage, and for such of the Colonies to which there are Mail Packets, but in the latter case there posting must take place within seven days after the date of publication of the Newspaper."

MODERATION, ERYSIPELAS, AND DR. HAMILTON.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

The early and premature death of Dr. HAMILTON brings very forcibly to our minds the words of David, "Know ye not that a prince and a great man is this day fallen in Israel?" We utter no undue eulogy when we say, that the world or the Church has rarely sustained a greater loss. Taking him for all in all, we believe that this eminent Christian, scholar, philanthropist, and minister, has left few, if any, equals. He was eminently pious, without any affectation or sanctimoniousness. His religion was not a garb, but a spiritual development. In the language of the schools, all its resources were "ab intra." In his heart there was the "well of living water bubbling up into life everlasting." Like the rose and the vine, its flowers and clusters were the product of some mysterious and divine internal principle. His morals accorded with his devotion. He never "strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel." He did not "tithe the mint, anise and cummin," but pass over "the weigh tier matters of the law." He could truly say—

"Homo sum, humani nil a me alienum puto."

Hence the decalogue which he obeyed embraced all the duties obligatory on man. Righteousness with him, like the "Tsedek" of the Hebrew Scriptures, included justice, benevolence and mercy. He was therefore a Christian patriot, and sympathized with human rights in every shape and form. Political duties were with him as sacred as those which are more spiritual or ecclesiastical. Hence every real philanthropist, lover of his country, or lover of universal man, might always before hand calculate on the co-operation of Dr. HAMILTON. His soul travailed in birth for the millennium of liberty, literature, and christianity.

In learning, Dr. HAMILTON was a giant. We never heard his equal. He seemed almost as familiar with classical lore as with his mother tongue. Some thought that he was more so, and that his deep acquaintance with Latin and Greek had proved fatal to his English. Hence the critics at first did not understand him. He was too learned for them, and they sent after him a doleful hue and cry. His words, they said, were as long as one's finger. Alas! he did not speak Saxon, but was wicked enough to invent a new word as often as he felt the poverty of our language to express the multiplied beauties of thought. There was at one time a determination to put him down, and, but for his own inflexible and invincible determination, the Reviewers would have added another victim "to the heap upon heaps" that they have slain, and, not unfrequently, with the same implement that proved so fatal in the hands of Samson. The most beautiful, pithy, and witty sentiments of the best philosophers, poets, and orators of ancient and modern times, dropped as spontaneously from his lips as the commonest phrases from the mouths of other men. The age, as a consequence, did not know him; he was at least a century in advance of his time, and there were few capable of gauging his mental or moral capacity.

Dr. HAMILTON was as eloquent as he was learned. Scholars, literary men, and philosophers are proverbially dry and uninteresting. Many persons feel drowsy at the mention of a sermon or speech by a doctor of divinity, and too often attribute the native lethargy of the man to his learned lore. Much learning in our day has the repute, or disrepute of making men, not ecstatic and mad, but plegmatic and somniferous. It was one of the high behests of Dr. Hamilton to roll away the reproach from the schools. If he was one of the most learned, so he was also one of the most eloquent men of our day. He had the divine art of inspiring every one who heard him. He touched the hearts of his hearers, whether clowns or scholars, with the same ease that David swept his lyre; and what was more than all, he brought this divine skill from the schools. His skill in mental music which enabled him to play with equal ease on all kinds of instruments, had been taught him by the muses. He had been nursed in Parnassus and Zion. He had sat at the feet of Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, Homer, Euripides, Horace, Demosthenes, and many more of like fame; he had deeply studied in the school of Moses and the Prophets; and then finished his education at the foot of Calvary. He was thus inspired by an afflatus borrowed from all, and as we heard him speak, we felt that he had the magician power of recalling from all ages and countries the illustrious dead, who, through him, stood before us, and gave their testimony to the truth. When HAMILTON addressed us a "whole cloud of witnesses" came forth to sustain and verify his declarations. Divinity, learning, religion, in him were not skeletons or dry bones, but living, animated, symmetrical proportions, all clothed with sinews and flesh, and instinct with the breath of heaven. The schools had justly attached their D.D. and LL.D. to his name, for he was really and truly a "Doctor of Laws and Doctor of Divinity."

We repeat again, that as we contemplate his learning, his philosophy, his eloquence, his wit, his patriotism, his philanthropy, his piety and devotion, we have a deep conviction that his like, or equal, is not left in this or any other country. And as he was not the production of the age or the schools, but of an internal, if not innate, energy, we fear that we shall not soon see his resemblance. Not a few of our distinguished personages remind one of the ancient barrows, or pyramids, which owe their eminence solely to the accumulations that had been heaped upon the dead, and therefore form a perfect contrast to our rocks and mountains, which have risen from the vale by an internal power that nothing could resist. Many of these, of course, are rough and rugged, but this by no means takes from their sublimity. Who would wish to see Lebanon shaped into a pyramid, or Mount Blanc into a sepulchral tumulus? Too many of our modern schools, instead of inspiring, mould and fashion genius into all sorts of shapes that the caprice or timidity of the age may dictate, and hence we have an artificial and factitious generation. HAMILTON would have been a common man if he had allowed the critics and the colleges to shave his locks.

It may be asked, what has all this to do with TEETOTALISM? Our reply is brief. Dr. HAMILTON is dead;—is dead twenty, if not thirty, years before his time, and he died of erysipelas. It is likewise well known that the Doctor was no Teetotaler, and further that there is nothing more favourable to erysipelas than alcoholic drinks. I am not about to charge our departed friend with any excess. He was probably as piously moderate as any Christian in the land. Nor was he one of our virulent opponents. His treatment of Teetotalers was in exact accordance with his urbanity as a gentleman, a scholar, and a Christian. The Temperance Reformation had his benediction, if not his example; and it is highly probable, that but for the injudicious advice of medical men and others, combined with the slavery of custom and habit, he would long ago have joined our ranks, and thus have saved himself from a premature grave.

Should any reader think the sentiment we have thus expressed an unwarrantable assumption, we must beg him to study the causes of disease, and the facts which history has recorded. The old word for erysipelas was "St. Anthony's Fire." The term was adopted because it was an inflammatory or fiery disease, which that Saint was supposed to cure. Now every work on nosology speaks of alcoholic drinks as one of the exciting causes of this ailment; and living history abundantly attests the correctness of this sentiment. Long before total abstinence was thought of, I have known persons who became rigid teetotalers from the dread of erysipelas. They had learned by experience that a very small portion of wine, beer, cider, or spirits, would bring on an attack. I have before me now an individual whose head I have several times seen swollen to almost double its size, by erysipelas brought on by the use of intoxicating liquors. His legs, also, from the same cause, are twice their original dimensions; and he is obliged, contrary to his wishes, to abstain, otherwise he is well aware that death would be the consequence. He never indulges without being laid aside. He was once one of the healthiest men in the village, and now his only disease is erysipelas, and that has been induced by alcoholic drinks. Examples almost without number could be advanced to show that one of the great causes of erysipelas is the use of intoxicating beverages.

It may be said that TEETOTALERS have died of erysipelas: granted; but this does not disprove our assertion. We do not lay it down as an axiom that alcohol is the only cause of this inflammatory disease. It may be brought on by free living. A person who eats too much is very likely to feel its ravages. I knew for example a teetotaler who died of this very complaint; but then the cause was evident to all who were acquainted with his life. As soon as he became a total abstainer, he paid a high compliment to intoxicating liquor by eating as a substitute large quantities of eggs, animal food, &c. Sometimes, independent of a sumptuous dinner, he would consume an enormous portion of beef steaks for breakfast and supper, and because his stomach protested against such cruelty, he washed them down with prodigious draughts of tea, coffee, &c., &c. The consequence was he became a mass of inflammation and died of erysipelas. I saw his body in the coffin, red with the fiery disease which luxurious living had generated, and which even the cold hand of death had not extinguished.

In most instances,* you might write the natural history of erysipelas and other diseases. The laws of our animal economy are as fixed as those of gravitation or electricity, and JEHOVAH does not reverse them even in the case of good or talented men. Prussic acid pays no more deference to a Saint than a Sinner. It would as speedily slay a Howard as a Nero. And so we may affirm of other deleterious articles of food or drink. The fact is, all the laws of nature are based on the profoundest philanthropy, and to violate them to gratify the taste or accommodate the caprice or ignorance of a Whitfield or Wilberforce, would be cruelly and not kindness. If a Doctor HAMILTON introduces to his frame what will produce erysipelas, gout, or dropsy, he must take the consequence. Heaven will not interpose miracles to please and foster the follies, fancies, or appetites of its spoilt, wayward, or erring children. As he who transgresses the moral law in one point is guilty, so he who violates but one physiological decree, endangers his health and life. The laws of Nature are as much the laws of God as the ten commandments; and no one can set them at defiance without suffering the penalty. And for this Sin there is rarely any atonement. "There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good, and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good so is the sinner; and he that sweareth as he that feareth an oath."

* "In most instances." Certainly not in all instances. We have before us at this moment the case of a friend who was always abstemious, and who has been a rigid teetotaler for nearly twelve years. He is just recovering from a very violent attack of erysipelas. In his case it was induced by sudden exposure to a draught of cold air, fater sitting in a hall heated by the presence of thousands.

There are certain physiological transgressions with which good men may be chargeable and which may prove fatal to their lives. We may not for one moment doubt their talent, their learning, their philanthropy, or piety; but then, arsenic, alcohol, or luxury, pay no deference to these gifts, virtues, or excellencies. It is to be feared that some have hoped that the grace of God would be a shield against the natural effects of sumptuous living; but they have been grievously disappointed. We are not to tempt God by violating his immutable laws of health, any more than we are to throw ourselves from a pinnacle of the temple, because the angels are our ministering spirits. We believe that one of the greatest men of our age has been prematurely laid in the tomb, in consequence of the use of intoxicating liquors. In saying this much, we reflect not on his piety or talent, although we shed a tear, that the choicest and best of our race should thus be slain; and duty compels us to publish the fact that others may take warning.

To the MINISTERS OF RELIGION we say, gentlemen you must abstain or take the consequence. Alcohol will pay no more deference to you than would oxalic or prucid acid. In drinking beer, porter, wine, or spirits, you are using a poison which will most assuredly take you to the bar of God, before your Judge calls or your work is done. And, more sad still, your example before the awful time arrives, may seduce many to drink to their own destruction. You, of all men on earth ought to have moral courage to abstain, especially after the awful fact that HAMILTON is dead.

DEACONS AND MEMBERS OF CHURCHES, you too often destroy the health and usefulness of the man you most esteem. We know that hospitality an affection in perhaps every case prompts you to administer the fatal draught. But your kindness is cruel, and the christian love from which it flows is powerless to neutralise its mistaken and misguided benevolence. I have heard of a deacon driving from his door the sorry drunkard who was once his spiritual guide, and who had been seduced by wine, no small portion of which had been administered by the very individual who now spurned him from his threshold. And where drunkenness has not been induced, disease and death have done their work, and the lips which fed many have been sealed by the persons who most deeply bewailed this awful tragedy. Banish then the baneful liquor from your dwelling, and never again employ its influence to quench the stars of the sanctuary or cause them to fall from their spheres.

MEDICAL MEN, yours is a deeply responsible position. You have, to a great extent, the lives, the talent, the morals, and usefulness of thousands in your hands. It is now become a general belief that mistaken medical treatment has slain myriads of patients. An age is coming which will pass a bitter sentence on your commendation of alcoholic drinks. Until the people took up the cause, the majority of your profession protested against Total Abstinence! Experiment has given its verdict against you. Some of us can attest that had we listened to your advice you would have laid us aside from domestic comfort and public usefulness. You would have sent us prematurely to our grave. We never knew the sweets of life until, contrary to your direction, we laid aside the fatal cup. As we reflect on the mischiefs that alcohol, by your sanction, has done, and can yet do, we entreat you to abstain, nor ever more by a medical prescription contribute to the degradation and desolation of your species.

TEETOTALERS, we have a new argument to prompt us to perseverance and activity. One of the brightest luminaries is set before noon. We very believe that alcohol has been the chief agent in this catastrophe. Again the cup has divined, and warned us of that undefined and undefinable thing, MODERATION. It may be deemed rash, but still, after much investigation and deliberation, it is our firm conviction that if drunkenness slays its thousands, MODERATION slays its ten of thousands. And what is worse, it too often does its mischief in the garb of religion. It conceals its deadly power under the name of dropsy, palsy, paralysis, apoplexy, erysipelas, &c., &c.; and thus, with the benediction of the priest and the seal of the physician, hurries from our earth the best of its scholars, patriots, philanthropists and Christians. DR. HAMILTON is dead! Let this one calamity awaken us with more resolution than ever to vow eternal enmity to this foe of God, our country, the church and the world.

LET WELL ALONE!—In one of the southern districts of Australia, a fine soda spring was discovered, and, on the strength of this, a bush inn was erected in the vicinity, its owner speculating on the probability of its bringing him a quick sale of spirits by admixture of its water with acid alcohol. In this he was disappointed, for it soon became a favourite beverage with his customers, until the following characteristic incident took place.—It entered the head of a party of carousers at the inn, that a great deal of time and trouble might be saved by converting the whole well into one large effervescent draught; and for this purpose they collected a great quantity of spirit, sugar, and acid; and having showered them down into the water and stirred it about with a pole, they awaited the mighty result. This, the story goes on to say, proved unsatisfactory: little besides mud came to the top, and the spring never recovered the outrage.

THE LITTLE DROP, OR MODERATE DRINKING.

Dr. Alcott, in some admirable pieces he is sending to the Massachusetts Patriot, says:—

When an individual drinks a quart or more of spirits a day, the stomach recognizes that a foe is present,—nay, the whole system recognizes it. Hence a reaction takes place, and the foe is speedily expelled. Sometimes vomiting or catharsis follows: sometimes the alcohol passes off speedily through the lungs, skin, &c. But divide a quart of rum into 20 or 30 doses, and take one of them each day, and what follows!—Why the quantity is so small that it seems to steal its way into every part of the system, poisoning wherever it goes. The consequence is that though the individual may not appear to suffer at the time, but may, in fact, appear to be benefited, he is, in the long run, a greater sufferer than he who gets drunk by drinking his quart or two once in two months.

Do you ask for proof? It is found first, in analogy. Alcohol is, in every form—whether that of rum, brandy, wine, cider, ale, porter, or small beer—a medicine, a most active and powerful medicine, too. Now it is a law with most active medicines, than in order to poison the system with them, most certainly and effectually, they must be given in very small doses, and these small doses must be continued for some time. Give them in larger doses, and they will be partly or wholly thrown off. Take calomel for example. Give a man twenty or even fifty grains of it at once, and it will produce a local effect; but probably nothing more. On the contrary, divide the mass into portions of one grain each, and give him one of these small doses daily, and his gums and teeth and salivary glands will soon testify that he is poisoned. Somewhat so with alcohol.

But we have proof, secondly, in facts which exist. These occasional drinkers—foreigners for example, will outlive by far the small drinkers. Of one hundred of them you will find twice the number who reach seventy years of age. This statement might be verified by going no farther than the Green Mountain range in New England. They who sip a little cider from day to day, and from year to year, and who become as the saying is, palsy, are no sooner seized with epidemic or other disease than they wither at once, while the occasional drinker will often recover. The children of the former, too, will have scrofula, while those of the latter may escape. I might illustrate the position I have taken by a thousand examples; but the above are sufficient. The doctrine I wish to inculcate and establish is simply this, that however injurious occasional larger doses of alcoholic drinks are, small dosing is still worse. To take a common case. The habitual use of small beer is worse than the occasional use of rum; not so much because the small drinking leads to the larger sort, but because it poisons the system more certainly and effectually. Observe, however, that when I say this, I mean other things being equal. I do not mean that a teaspoonful will poison a man more than half a gill, or half a gill more than a quart, but only that the small dose will do more harm than the large dose in proportion to its quantity.

WARNING TO PROFESSORS.—In one of the most flourishing seaports of the United Kingdom, there lived a man who gave strong proof of personal holiness, and fitness for office in the Church of God. But he fell from grace, became a slave to intemperance, was separated from the church, and though frequently admonished, continued in evil doing. One dark night, while in a state of intoxication, he had crossed a deep and rapid river; but he soon staggered, missed his path, fell over the pier, and was carried away by the current. His lifeless corpse was found, but eternity must answer the question, what became of his soul? How much wiser would he have been had he never tasted intoxicating liquor! And with such a scene before him, can any professor swallow the liquid fire, the cause of death and perdition again? N.

A VINDICATION.

BY DALMOCAND.

How frequently is the zealous advocate, while busily engaged in general enlightenment, greeted by his brethren with the rising murmur—"Something new!" Such fretfulness must bear the stigma of unwisdom, as we should remember that although the truths of Abstinence may present less novelty to those who have embraced the scheme, yet their repeated proclamation serves the double purpose of proselytizing and confirming.

To begin.—TEETOTALISM is not in a physical point of view, injurious to man; for it neither inflicts disease upon his members, nor impedes the action of his organism. The daily experience of thousands shows the contrary. Yea, numerous representatives of every grade assert that the teetotal system agrees with their bodily system wonderfully well, that it enables them by cheerful labour to procure the necessaries of life, and to enjoy them; health, in fact, flourishing far better under a teetotal regimen than under an empiric "moistening."

But many fancifully suppose that though the principle does well enough with others, there exists some drawback to its thorough adaptation to their own case. The other year, I came in contact with a fisherman who had evidently been paying his respects to Bacchus. On teetotalism being introduced, this individual enquired what I could find in Scripture to countenance my views. I chanced to instance Samson as one staunch teetotaler. With a triumphant chuckle, the fisherman rejoined—"Ay that may be all very true, but Samson never gied a-fishing!" Now these class excuses are exceedingly absurd, seeing that teetotalism has approved itself the friend of man in every avocation and in every clime.

On the other hand, the use of alcoholic liquors proves physically dangerous, even in moderation—but "moderation" is a word of doubtful import; abstemious folk defining it a single glass, while "seasoned casks," or toppers, apprehend a single bottle. The deleterious effects of alcohol on the brain and other organs has notoriously ranked it among powerful poisons. Dr. Christison, of Edinburgh, in a late work, attests:—"Its frequent abuse acts injuriously by developing certain diseases, by bringing to a head certain dispositions to disease, by rendering diseases at large comparatively intractable, and by rendering the constitution unable to withstand the active treatment required for many acute diseases. It is chiefly in the last two modes this habit influences the general mortality."

I read the other day about an African, who on his approaching the British shore, and going on deck one frosty morning, saw something like smoke issuing from his mouth. This to him unusual appearance filled him with alarm, and he ran below with all speed, shouting—"Fire, fire!" The idea of a man on fire, although odd-sounding, seems not far distant from the mark. What, for example, does the tippler at each successive draught, but add, as it were, another shovelful of fuel to the furnace which consumes him? Should a house take fire, every one is in motion, each anxious to render some assistance: when we behold our fellowmen in jeopardy, are we to manifest less feeling, and not stretch forth a helping finger? Nay; we must convince men that spirituous liquors are unnecessary, that strong drink is delusion.

Again, TEETOTALISM is not in an intellectual or social point of view injurious to man; for it neither impairs his mental faculties, nor prohibits his being a good member of society. Abstinence from Alcoholic beverages accords exactly with the voice of instinct and of reason. They are unnatural productions, and unnatural are the doings of those who use them. Baneful indeed has been their influence upon the mind as on the body. Happy would it have been for many lofty sons of genius had they never tasted the inebriating bowl, or prized the bottle as their wit elixir. Ho, ye potentates in speech and song! where are ye now?—what, mayhap, but stump-orators and troubadours in Pandemonium. Happy would it be for every human creature were alcoholic potions at once and evermore foregone; then might society be more united, and one of Satan's nets would be destroyed.

One pleasing incident in connexion with the present, is the eagerness displayed by several juveniles to enlist in the teetotal army. It is mainly to the rising generation we must look. The avoiding of an evil habit proves far easier than its forsaking, and for the commencement of every good course youth appears the proper season. Many parents, however, act very mysteriously towards their offspring. For instance, should any of these little gentry be observed showing any liking for a "rhimbleful," the parents shake their heads and threaten, declaring it is not good for them—strangely forgetful of the natural inference that if dram-drinking be a duty or a virtue, the sooner these Lilliputians begin the better. Fathers and mothers, be consistent—first renounce the polluting beverage yourselves: then enjoin your progeny to follow your example.

It would assuredly be a gratifying matter were influential parties to devote their talents in a larger measure to the diffusion of much-needed information. A glorious thing it would be to hear our judges, physicians, and divines affirming in one loud chorus, that the drinking system engenders a multiplicity of evils, and requires subversion. We read in Tytler's History of Scotland, that, some hundred years ago, there overspread that land a grievous famine. One man, however, named from the iron hook he carried, Christie of the Cleek, fared sumptuously every day. His mode of procuring sustenance was to pounce on the unsuspecting traveller, bear him to his cavern, and devour him. But do not expend all your detestation on this monster of a bygone age; for the present hour reserve a portion. Does not ALCOHOL, too, sit at the mouth of his dark den to entrap the unwary?—over those who pass by at a distance of course he has no power; but on him who enters his domain he commences operations. He cleeks away his money, cleeks away his health, cleeks away his sense of morality, and in the long run, too often, hurls him into the lake of endless wailing. The former slew perhaps his tens, but Alcohol has slain his millions. Even in this realm how many thousands annually depart for the drunkard's grave and doom!

It surely cannot be affirmed that as storms are necessary for purifying the physical atmosphere, so drunken brawls purify the social. Surely none imagines that were the millions squandered on intoxicating liquors saved, men would become too wealthy—at a loss how to lay out their substance. Surely none will argue that were the nutritious grain destroyed put to its proper use, our countrymen would wax too fat and lazy. A large proportion of the iniquities perpetrated amongst us originated, as all allow, in the using of these beverages, it surely will not be avowed by any—"We love to have it so." Away then with the mistiness which veils this question!—a mistiness thereto nowise pertaining.

Lastly, TEETOTALISM is not in a religious point of view injurious to man; for it neither unfits him for glorifying and loving God, nor puts any barrier in the way to his showing love and kindness to his neighbour. If abstinence does not militate against these two royal laws of Scripture, how can it be sinful?—and if sinless, why should it not be cherished? "Abstinence," says Dr. JOHNSON, "is easier than moderation." "Can a man be blamed," asks RICHARD BAXTER, "for keeping as far as possible from the brink of hell?" Seldom can alcohol in any of its various guises be indulged in long, till the truth of Solomon's saying be experienced:—"At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stiugeth like an adder." Professors of religion pray—

"Into temptation lead us not!"
And forthwith grasp the foaming pot!

Some men harp unceasingly that we place Teetotalism on a level with the Gospel, yea above it, but they err: we hold that whilst abstinence will carry none to heaven, it will debar none from it. Teetotalism, we also think, in addition to its general profiting, may prove an humble means of spreading wide the offer of salvation; for by its epousal drunkards may be brought within the Gospel's silver sound, and thereby, through grace, aliens made sons.

I have also heard it urged that the Temperance cause is sometimes advocated rashly—admitted; and what cause is not? But does that supply sufficient reason for refusing? Let us suppose a company of firemen called out to extinguish an alarming conflagration. Engine after engine plays on the devouring flames, but one section stand with arms akimbo, and assist not. The reason asked, "Oh!" plead they, "some of you send the water too high, others too low, therefore however proper the attempt to quench the fire, we won't help you." A complaint preferred by certain persons is, that some Teetotalers declare that any individual who does not join our ranks cannot be a Christian. Such rude impeachment injures; for who possesses liberty to judge a brother's heart? But abstainers can with certainty aver, that whosoever becomes convinced that abstinence is a matter of Christian expediency, and therefore duty, yet sips away, brands himself "blameworthy";—"to him who knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is SIN." Non-abstainer, ponder the reason of thy halting.

Abstinence, like the kaleidoscope, gladdens the eye with countless beauties, while spirituous indulgence pains it with combinations hideous. But space pinches, and I close with a simple canzonet for youthful throats:—

Why weepst thou, Britannia?
 Why garmented with woe?
 Why heaves thy fluttering bosom?
 Prompt succour I'd bestow.

Ah! son, mine anguish lies not hid,
 Need I reveal it thee?
 Bethink thee for a little space
 Name now my misery.

Do war's alarms affrighten thee?
 Do plagues around thee shriek?
 Doth famine's cry appal thy heart?
 I long to hear thee speak.

Such things, alas! I've oftimes borne,
 For tears they've furnished cause;
 But more destroying is the fiend
 That now my children gnaws.

I see! 'tis foul Intemperance
 Who makes thee sadly rave;
 But yonder angel comes to pour
 Oil on the crested wave.

Bless thee, my son; thou hast begun
 To light affliction's rod—
 Patriot, Christian, seek to serve Thy country and thy God.

DRINKING HABITS IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

Crossing the Nepean as before in the punt, we took up our quarters again at the Ferry Inn, and early the next day continued our journey. Seeing a tolerably large house by the roadside with stacks, cows, pigs, and other farm like things about, and a tall sign post, or what appeared such, in front, we alighted to see if we could procure a glass of milk, and entered a room evidently in the "public" line of business, smelling dreadfully of rum and tobacco, and garnished with pipe-ashes, dirty glasses, and empty bottles in abundance. A continuance of loud knocking brought a stupid, dirty, half dressed, slip-shod woman from an inner room, in which, as she had left the door open, I could see several messy, unmade beds, soiled clothes all about the floor, and three or four more women of different ages, and of as displeasing aspect as the one who had obeyed my summons, and who, after some delay, brought me a jug of nice sweet milk, and a dirty glass to pour it into, seeming to me as if she had ably assisted in the bottle emptying of the preceding evening. This universal addiction to drink, and the consequent neglect of all industry and decency, is truly shocking. Here was a substantial farm house, (sometimes performing in another character it is true), with the female inmates half drunk, and scarcely out of bed at ten o'clock on a summer's morning; rooms unswept, beds unmade, and the whole establishment telling of plenty, sloth, and drunkenness.—New South Wales. Murray's Home and Colonial Library, No. xiii.

The prevailing vice of drunkenness among the lower orders, is perhaps more resolutely practised at Christmas than at any other season. I have heard of a Christmas day party being assembled, and awaiting the announcement of dinner as long as patience would endure; then ringing the bell, but without reply, and on the hostess proceeding to the kitchen, finding every servant either gone out, or rendered incapable of moving; the intended feast being meantime burnt to ashes; nor is this by any means a rare occurrence.—Ibid.

Wine, or strong liquor of any kind, is never safely left accessible to servants. The unlimited allowance of beer, common in English households, is here scarcely credited; nor could such a custom be practised, for not a soul on the establishment would quit the barrel so long as any liquor remained in it.—Ibid.

"I am, Sir, yours truly,
 J. W. Coom."

"BEASTLY INTOXICATION.—If the animals, called dumb by mankind, had newspapers of their own, they would indignantly protest against the way in which the word "beastly" is used by Christian writers, who generally ascribe the delinquencies of their species to "a beastly appetite for strong drink." He was found in a state of beastly intoxication," &c. This is an injury to the brute creation which should be atoned for by writing always hereafter "manly," or "womanly," intoxication, &c., as the case may be.

THE MEDICAL USE OF ALCOHOL.

BY H. MUDGE.

It seems desirable to proceed at once to the fulfilment of the promise with which I closed my last. We shall allow that Alcohol is in some cases indispensable as a medicine. We allow this only however for argument sake at present;—as far as trial has been made there is a good evidence that Alcohol may be dispensed with entirely and for ever—and proceed to inquire how this drug ought to be used, if used at all.

Experience only can prove an article to be dangerous; and tried by this test Alcohol is not merely dangerous, but pre-eminently destructive. Let the voice of authority be heard speaking on this point through the far-famed "Medical Certificate," which says, "a very large portion of human misery, including poverty, DISEASE, and crime, is induced by the use of alcoholic or fermented liquors, as beverages." Here there is a call on every practitioner of the healing art to take sides: will you be with those two thousand or nearly, of the elite of the profession who have signed their names to the above assertion, or with those who still continue to treat alcoholic or fermented liquors as if they were innocuous beverages? Chloroform has not been used to produce insensibility to pain for twelve months as yet, but about ten cases having proved fatal under its influence, already is the Medical Times (the leading journal in the medical world,) calling out for its discontinuance! What are the misfortunes through Chloroform to the miseries extant through Alcohol?

An objector may urge; Nay, but you are speaking against Alcohol as a beverage, why do so, when Alcohol as a medicine is the subject?

True, and to that I am coming: but I wish first carefully to note what the danger is, to which Alcohol, drunk either dietetically or medicinally, exposes the consumer of it. I define the danger as a bodily disease accompanied with a depraved appetite, the gratification of which leads to that mixture of foolery, passion, misery, incapacity, and wickedness commonly designated drunkenness.

To thoroughly comprehend this is important, because if we are not clear on this point we shall stop short of a perfect cure; contenting ourselves by merely combating some of the more prominent symptoms, as those of staggering, quarrelling, swearing, lewdness, &c., which are the symptoms of the disease rather than the disease itself.

Our question then is this, seeing we have to do with a drug, which, through a pernicious fascinating power, has already got into general use, thereby causing incalculable misery, how are we to prescribe it and to use it medicinally, so that it may as little as possible tend to the formation of a drunken appetite? I believe the following rules can be proved to be morally binding on those who prescribe Alcohol as a medicine.

1.—It should not be administered in a form to please the palate.—Having in itself an inseparable dangerous tendency, the sense of taste may well be laid hold of as a slight barrier at first against its consumption. Nauseous medicines are sooner laid aside than agreeable ones.

2.—It should not be recommended as a daily beverage.—However nauseous the taste may be, habit soon reconciles the drinker to it, if stimulation be known to follow. The idea of taking wine, porter, or spirits by the glass or the pint daily, for years outright as medicines, is supremely ridiculous. No man seriously believes in such egregious nonsense. For example, A. B. consults Dr. Tims who advises Port Wine and Sarsaparilla; the patient after a month's trial is no better, and consults Dr. Sob, who says, "You must leave off the Wine and the Sarsaparilla and take what I will order and drink water." A. B. says not one word against the change of what he considers to be a drug, but gravely inquires if he must give up his wine! Why? because he regards the wine as an article of diet, respecting which he may to a certain extent exercise his own discretion. Now the placing of Alcohol in such a position as this is giving it an undue influence; and the duty of the physician is to bring it to the level of a mere drug, which he may prescribe, or not as voluntarily as any other medicinal substance.

3.—It should not be ordered for any but short periods, which should be specified.—When Dr. MUSSEY was at the World's Convention, I had a long conversation with him on the subject, and he informed me that his rule was, Never to lose sight of a patient while taking intoxicating liquor by his direction; and to discontinue its use as soon as he considered it safe for the sick person to abstain. I could not but admire the caution of the good man, and contrast it with the heedlessness of those who dismiss their sick with unconcern, simply recommending brandy, or wine, or bitter (!) ale, without laying down any limits to either quantity or time. Dangerous drugs are given with caution; for example, Arsenic is prescribed in very minute doses, and when there are symptoms of its accumulating in the system, it is at once discontinued; why not Alcohol as well as Arsenic, and scores of medicines besides, which are cumulative in their effects? Alcoholic disease arises slowly, and creeps on with very insidious steps, till it takes a fast, if not an incurable, hold; it may be well said against it,

—Principiis obsta: sero medicina paratur,
Cum mala per longas invaluere moras.

4.—It should not be given to inebriates without dire necessity (if such can be).—Yet yielding to fashion and to fear, many practitioners of the healing (?) art recommend them most freely to persons of this description. Regarding the drunken appetite as a specific disease, its continuance amongst us says but little for the perfection of medical science; and sure I am that thousands of reformed characters who have been made drunkards again by their advice, is a sore reflection on the character of the medical profession. To illustrate this; suppose tens of thousands of deaths from Small Pox were recorded annually, all attributable to an imperfect performance of Vaccination, what reproof and reproach would not be heaped upon the heads and characters of the Vaccine inoculators! Think of the Prince Regent being taken off from this cause,—which way would public opinion tend to then? Where there is a predisposition to intoxication, a very little of the poison will pervade the system and kindle the disease; 'tis a high gratification to a rightly constituted mind to have it within reach to warn and to save creatures exposed to degradation and perdition.

5.—Alcohol should not be administered at all, till other medicines have been tried and failed.—There ever is a fashion in the practice of physie as well as in other callings. Opinion as to certain drugs has often changed. Mercury, and Opium, and Bark (Cinchona,) have been sometimes praised, and afterwards laid aside; so it may be with Alcohol. It has been cried up, but, on trial, other preparations are found more efficacious. Thus the list of diseases said to require Alcoholic stimulants is very much curtailed to what it was some ten years ago. Ailments known as "Spasms," "Wind in the Stomach," "Bile," "Hysterics," "Sinking," and I know not how many nondescripts besides, are now pronounced curable without Alcohol: and more formidable cases such as those of Hemorrhage, Lumbar Abscess, Typhus, &c., are following on in the same track; and as science and experiment progress, will be emancipated from the Alcoholic bondage too. Medical Practitioners should not condemn non-alcoholic treatment without trial.

If the above directions are followed, we believe that the Medical Profession will greatly aid the Temperance Reformation: but the takers, as well as the prescribers of Alcohol medicinally have duties to perform. Let them not take their physic inconsiderately.—But here I prefer to quote a paragraph from the pamphlet entitled "Rescued Texts:"

"Some persons take intoxicating liquors medicinally, and say they are justified by Timothy's case. Allowing that they do no harm to themselves by their drinking, yet they do oftentimes wrong to their neighbours. The medicinal use of Alcoholic wines is not to be allowed to recommend and to sanction their dietetic use. If dangerous articles must be dealt with, precaution should be taken. When a man sits and drinks wine with his family, or with a party of friends, who knows that he is then taking his physic? If he would not act as a decoy let him hoist a signal of distress,—put on a red nightcap I suggest,—that may explain what he is doing. Surely he should take his medicine as if he wished to forego the necessity; and should not convert his place of common resort into an idol's temple, and habitually sit at meat in the presence of the image. The enemies of sobriety are thus taught to triumph if not to blaspheme.—"

Not very long since business took me to a neighbourhood where a very good and influential minister of the Gospel had been just advocating the Missionary cause; he was an author too, who had advised money to be applied towards the conversion of the world, instead of being spent in strong drink; yet he was remarked on as he went through his appointments as the drinker of intoxicating wine! Medicinally; of course; yet at the tables where the friends were assembled for hospitable (not hospital), purposes!

I have written enough for this time, but I have not exhausted this subject.

WESLEYAN MOVEMENT IN REFERENCE TO STRONG DRINKS.

At the ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the Wesleyan Methodists, recently held at Hull, some conversation ensued on the subject of Sabbath Desecration. The sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sabbath, of course was adverted to, as one grand cause of that desecration. The result of this portion of the conversation was a resolution, proposed by Dr. Jabez Bunting, seconded by Dr. Joseph Beaumont, and carried unanimously, that a petition should be sent by the Conference to Parliament in support of the Bill for preventing the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sabbath day. In the course of the conversation, it appears that "respectful mention was made of the zealous efforts which the teetotalers had made to prevent the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sabbath day." It was strongly urged, that "the chief care of ministers should be to go to the source of the evil," and this was said to be, "the depravity of the human heart." This, it was insisted, must be "preached down." "The chief care of Ministers," it was added, "should be, to begin at the right end, by preaching the Gospel and converting souls."

As this is a movement in the right direction, we are not disposed to cavil; otherwise there are several points connected with it upon which we might remark. We suppose Teetotalers will hardly thank the Conference for the "respectful mention" made of their "zealous efforts" in this one particular and confined direction, while that same body refuses all acknowledgment of the importance of the abstinence principle, and all recognition of their general efforts to prevent and cure Intemperance. It is said that "the chief care of ministers should be to go to the source of the evil;" that "they must not begin at the wrong end, but must preach down the depravity of the heart, by preaching the Gospel and converting souls." Now the source of the evil of which they complain is the love of strong drink, a desire and determination to gratify an unnatural appetite, an appetite created by the use of strong drink, and increased "by what it feeds on." The cause of this is not depravity of heart, for there are many depraved persons who use no strong drink and never go to public houses on the Sabbath; and there are, also, many Wesleyan Methodists, (whom we suppose the Conference would hardly accuse of having depraved hearts) who use strong drinks, and who, if they do not visit public houses on the Sabbath for the purpose of sitting there to drink, yet go there for the purpose of purchasing drink, or send their servants or children there to fetch it. Teetotalers will not, we are sure, be disposed to admit that they are "beginning at the wrong end," while they are zealously endeavouring, both by precept and example, to dissuade men and women from the use of strong drink. Let their efforts be crowned with success, and the public houses would soon be closed, not only on the Sabbath, but on every day in the week, so far as the sale of strong drinks is concerned. And the efforts of Teetotalers would be crowned with far greater success if the Wesleyan Conference would but lend them a helping hand.

These learned theologians seem to forget that drunkenness is a physical disease as well as a moral disease. Our blessed Lord, who certainly well understood his own Gospel, and the character and design of his own mission, did not, in every case, first preach the Gospel. He first healed the physical diseases of those who applied to him for cure, then he forgave their sins and bade them go in peace and sin no more, or follow him as his disciples. The Gadarene demoniac was first dispossessed of the evil spirit, and afterwards he was found "sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind."

But we will not enlarge. Let Wesleyan preachers succeed in getting the public houses closed on the Sabbath, and, also, in getting those who cannot enter the public houses to attend Methodist Chapels; and then let them "preach the Gospel and convert souls:"—then let them "preach down the depravity of the heart." Should they, after all, find that "old Adam is too strong for young Melancton;" perhaps, in addition to preaching the Gospel, they will feel the necessity of recommending the disuse of those drinks which prove a chief agent in fostering and maturing the depravity of the human heart.

THE WESLEYANS AND TEETOTALISM.

Extract from the Address of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, to the British Wesleyan Conference of 1848:—

"We have been gratified to observe that the cause of Temperance, on the principle of Total Abstinence from intoxicating liquors, is attracting attention in England; and we respectfully ask your attention to it, and your kind consideration of it, as intimately connected with the best interests of Society in general, and greatly conducive to the success of the Gospel. Such is our experience in America, particularly when the Church enters heartily into the Cause." Watchman, Aug. 16, 1848.

SNUFFING AND SMOKING.

Both snuffing and smoking, if they were to burst upon us as novelties in some distant country, among a horde of wild savages, would be put down at once as the natural result of that absence of civilization we are apt so much to deplore. To see a man, for the first time, stuffing his nose full of black dust, or pulling and puffing, and making all sorts of unaccountable faces at, to all appearance, a dirty piece of stick, would be a sight worthy of being set down among the savage fancies of the race, rather than as the practice and recreation of poets and philosophers. Self-gratification is not the great rule of life; whilst a part of society, we should endeavour to arrange all our pleasures in harmony with those around us, otherwise the sooner we retire to the woods and let our nails grow the better. Snuffing and smoking are anything but agreeable to one half of those with whom we associate; both are unwholesome, both apt to engender a taste for other and even worse indulgence. It is an early habit of smoking amongst the young people of the working classes that leads to the more brutalizing habit of drinking. A dry parched mouth, and a hard, dry skin, are among the first promptings to the gin palace,—among the higher grades of society, the most frequent stimulants to further excess. But in addition to all this, they are no slight item in the household expenses of both rich and poor; and, worse than all, great abettors of a false revenue system, and a large share of the payment of savage war, with all its horrors and its bloodshed. Free traders and peace lovers should, above all others, abjure the wicked weed.

To a well-regulated mind, that has passed into the perception of the value of well-regulated health, all physical excitement will wisely be avoided. Thanks to a rapidly-improved and improving state of society, the wine bottle and the spirit decanter, the boisterous assemblage that was wont "to set the table on a roar," the host that could lock the door and put the key in his pocket, that called every three minutes for "bumpers and no daylight,"—and the guest that found a difficulty in staggering into the drawing room, are all fast becoming traditional,—dreams or stories of a past life not to be recognized or acknowledged in their grossness by the generation now springing into the world and marching in the world's way. Let us hope that these other features of a rude life—for rude they are, however their many pleasant advocates and disciples may think to the contrary—may pass also into the usages that have been; that they will be laughed at as freely as we now laugh at the hooped petticoats and painted and patched faces of our great grandmothers, or the Indian squaws of those uncultivated but peaceable races which Christianity, in its love or its hypocrisy, is rapidly exterminating from the face of their own and God's beautiful earth. Try the experiment of abstinence for a time, to ascertain if other and wiser means of happiness and social pastime may not be acquired, and if the world cannot go on, and your own wits be kept in full exercise and vigour, without the necessary motive power of a puff or a pinch.—Manchester Times.

INIQUITY OF THE LICENSING SYSTEM.

Thousands of lives are sacrificed every year by the gin palaces; while lunatic asylums, prisons, and hospitals, are fed by these haunts of iniquity. They lead to more waste of money, destruction of health, ruin of character, commission of crime, increase of prostitution and pauperism, in England, than all other causes put together. And yet, the professedly religious and moral Government of England license these houses to sell the poisonous and demoralizing drink without stint or hindrance, at all hours, in any quantities, and even on the Sabbath, when all other trades are interdicted; and all this for the sake of the revenue derived from its sale, and from the license to kill and destroy, which the keepers of these gin shops freely exercise. The Government have begun to abolish the canteens for soldiers, because these, being the tools or instruments with which certain duties are to be performed, they cannot afford to have them spoiled. But what is bad for the soldier cannot be good for the poor artizan. Until the Government of England therefore relinquishes the ill-gotten gain from the granting of licenses to sell poisonous drinks, they must be held to be either blind, if they are ignorant of the consequences, or criminal, if, knowing them, they wilfully shut their eyes, and do nothing to abate them.—From "Belgium, the Rhine, Switzerland, and Holland;" by J. S. BUCKINGHAM."

THE CRISIS.

What a panic has seized thousands of hearts within the last twelve months! How many have been unable to bear up under the terrible pressure, and have passed to their account! What multitudes now stand in painfully altered circumstances! But who is aware of any considerable diminution of the production, sale and consumption of fiery liquids, of the licensed pathways to rapid ruin where they are sold seven days in the week, and 365 days in the year; or of the pauperism, immorality, crime, disease and death, of which they are the prolific source! How far this worse than waste of 65 millions sterling in the United Kingdom, and the concomitant loss of 69 millions more in the same ruinous course, may have hastened on or aggravated "the crisis," we shall not stop to enquire, or we might a tale unfold which would make the hair stand erect. Let all who pretend to wisdom, escape at once from ten thousand ills by never tasting liquid fire. Then may they rationally hope that "the crisis" will be far from them.—R. Tabraham.

HEREDITARY DISEASES.—It is remarkable that all the diseases from drinking spirituous or fermented liquors are liable to become hereditary, even to the third generation; and gradually to increase, if the curse be continued till the family becomes extinct.—Dr. Darwin.

SHOCKING WASTE.—It is stated in the Jersey Commercial Advertiser, that £50,000 are spent annually upon strong drink.—As strong drinks are obtainable at a very low price in the Channel Islands, the quantity consumed must be great.

HARD DRINKERS.—Should drink soft water—abstain from spirited discussions—always distrust inn-temperance—and get high only as far as high water mark.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

CUMBERLAND.

Mr. R. GRAY MASON has recently made a tour through this county. He has visited Carlisle, Whitehaven, Workington, Cockermouth, Maryport, and Allonby, in which places fifteen of the largest chapels were thrown open to him; he preached in them on the Sabbaths, to large audiences, preparatory to his delivering Lectures during the week. His lectures have been attended by overflowing congregations. At Whitehaven, the Theatre was crowded every night; and in the other towns the largest places were selected, which were, in almost every instance, filled with respectable and attentive hearers. These lectures have been instrumental in arousing the principal friends of the Total Abstinence cause, to a deeper sense of the importance of the great work: to many they have proved the blessing of emancipation from the bondage of intemperance; while others have been convinced of the necessity of refraining from strong drink, as a duty devolving upon professing Christians, and have come forward to swell the ranks of the Society.

W. FISHBURN.

BOLTON.

The fifteenth anniversary of the Bolton Temperance Society has recently been celebrated. Open air meetings were held on different evenings in various parts of the town, which were addressed by Mr. James Teare, of Preston and others. A tea party, held in the Temperance Hall, was attended by 400 persons. An interesting procession was formed after tea, headed by an open vehicle, termed the Founder's Carriage, and containing amongst others, Messrs. Livesey, Swindlehurst, Teare, Sowden, Wright, Bramwell. The procession, which had a gay and animated appearance, contained nearly 1,500 persons. After perambulating the town it arrived at the Temperance Hall, where a public meeting was held, over which Mr. Swindlehurst presided. Mr. Cunliffe furnished a very brief account of the origin and progress of the society; after which the audience was addressed by the chairman, and Messrs. J. Livesey, J. Teare, Sowden, Orrell, and others. The Chairman said that in his experience as a Poor Law Guardian of Preston, he had, during the recent depressed times, observed millwrights, engineers, and others (who, when trade was good, earned 36s. or 40s. a week) coming to ask for two or three days work amongst the potatoe fields at 1s. per day; but not one man who had been a teetotaler for the last seven years had been troublesome in seeking parochial relief. Mr. Livesey spoke for some time on the blessings which had arisen, and were calculated to arise, from teetotalism, and the duty of every one to promote the spread of the cause. Mr. J. Teare delivered one of his spirited and energetic addresses, in the course of which he entered into a series of calculations, respecting the evils arising from the use of grain for the manufacture of intoxicating drinks. A vote of thanks was moved to the founders of the society, to which several of them responded. Other meetings were held in the course of the week, which were numerously attended. The Bolton Temperance Harmonic Band was in attendance.

DARWEN.

Last month the members of the Darwen temperance society celebrated their 14th anniversary. The proceedings commenced by a series of Lectures by Mr. James Teare, in William Street School, the property of Messrs. E. Shorrocks & Co. On the Thursday evening a number of the members met in the public street, for the purpose of creating in the minds of the people a desire to attend the meetings, by singing a few Temperance Hymns and announcing that Mr. Teare, one of the Heroes of the movement, would be in attendance to discuss the principle. This mode of procedure had its effect in augmenting the number at our meetings, and thus affording encouragement to the speaker. The Lectures of Mr. Teare were full of argument, truth, reason, and encouragement, and went off to the satisfaction and approbation of his audiences.

July 29th the annual Tea party was held in the above place. After Tea a Public Meeting was held, when Mr. Sutherland presided. The Secretary read the report, which was one of a pleasing character. The Committee had secured the services of Mr. James Teare, Mr. Luke Seddon, and Mrs. Jackson, who have done credit to the cause of Temperance. The Committee through their exertions have succeeded in introducing into various sabbath schools in this locality, 230 copies of the Sunday School Temperance Journal monthly; they have circulated 37 copies of the National Temperance Advocate monthly, amongst the wealthier classes and ministers of a large quantity of the Teetotal Times have been distributed and many other circulars and publications, making in the total not less than 4500. After the report was read the meeting was addressed by Messrs. J. Lightboun, Wm. Walsh, W. Preston, W. Snope, H. Green, Wm. Lightboun, D. Graham, and Jas. Teare, who wound up the meeting by a powerful Speech.

GEORGE DOXON.

CORNWALL.

A CONVENTION, originated by Dr. Grindrod, who has been eight months labouring in this County, was held at Truro lately. The chief business was a preparation for Agency Work during the coming winter. A large committee was appointed, and the different sections have since met. The Revd. R. G. Mason will be on the ground in October. Teetotalism fluctuates here as everywhere; many societies hold on their way steadily, and consequently triumph, others get disorganised, languish, and die. Teetotalers, however, are as abundant as ever, though Union is not kept up, and United Society efforts are much needed. Public opinion is coming round to abstinence from alcohol, and many a one is now ashamed of his cups, and as a sure sign that he is wounded, has begun to be offended with parties who solicit his signature. In due time we shall reap if we faint not. Harvest is onward, and many fields have no alcohol in them!

BODMIN.

On Monday evening, August 7, a public meeting was held in the Guildhall, where addresses were delivered explanatory of the use of Bread corn, without the rejection of any of its component parts; together with the mode of preparing it without leaven. The theory, based on chemical and physiological laws was explained by H. MUDGE, Esq., Surgeon; and J. D. MARTYN, Esq., spoke of the practice. J. ELLIOTT, Esq., of Liskeard presided. The meeting came off well, and several converts were made.

NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME.

A Public Tea Party was recently held in the Town Hall, when upwards of two hundred sat down to enjoy the social meal. After Tea a Public Meeting was held and addresses delivered by the Rev. L. Panting, M.A., Mr. W. Warham, Rev. J. D. Carey, Wesleyan Minister, Mr. R. Horn, and Mr. Brown. Mr. Z. Hill, Presided, and the Hall was crowded to excess, the party broke up about 10 o'clock much delighted with their evening's enjoyment. And the two following evenings, Tuesday and Wednesday, Mr. W. Warham, Surgeon, of Newcastle, delivered two Lectures, in the Hall, on the Physiological truths, involved in the practice of Total Abstinence from strong drinks;—Illustrated by upwards of 200 beautiful and expensive drawings, forming a Picture Gallery of Science, Health and Disease. During both evenings the Doctor was listened to by a numerous audience, who testified their pleasure. On the conclusion of the exceedingly interesting lecture, on Wednesday evening, a vote of thanks to the Lecturer was proposed and carried amidst great applause.

YARDLEY HASTINGS, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.

On Monday, July 31, the Teetotalers of this place opened a commodious room, (formerly a small barn,) situate on Mr. Bramley's premises, for the advocacy of the abandonment of all inebriating drinks. The meeting was preceded by a public tea, which was attended by a goodly number of respectably attired healthy looking abstainers. After tea the majority of those who were present trod the verdant carpet of an adjoining field, and engaged in a variety of games. At 7 o'clock commenced the "feast of reason." The room was crowded, Mr. Bearn, of Wellingbro' presided. He opened the meeting by an excellent, practical, and appropriate speech, after which Mr. Bramley narrated the circumstances that had led them to have a room of their own. Mr. Nichols, of Hackleton, showed that Total Abstinence for the good of our brethren, was in accordance with the precepts and therefore the practice of Jesus; and the Rev. T. Lord, of Brigstock, treated the assembly with a speech composed of powerful argument, and thrilling appeal. At the close of the meeting several signed the pledge.

CHAS. SIBLEY.

LEICESTER.

The Temperance cause in Leicester has been well sustained during the last twelve months: the advocacy has proved more successful than at any former period, more than 1400 members have been enrolled. Two meetings a week are regularly held in the Town-hall, and scarcely a month passes without a visit from one or other of the first lecturers on the movement. A town Missionary is regularly employed, Mr. John Ripley, by whose faithful performance of his duties the machinery of the society is kept in constant use. The anniversary is to be held in the middle of September, when the Rev. R. G. Mason is engaged to spend a fortnight in the town.

BATH.

The Bath Juvenile Temperance Society held a rural Fête at Sydney Gardens, on Monday, August 7, when a large number of friends assembled to enjoy a day's rational recreation. A public Tea was held, and also a public Meeting; when Mr. E. Saunders, (Chairman); Rev. T. Spencer, M.A.; Mr. J. Brooks, of Nailsea, and other friends, advocated the cause of Total Abstinence. The result of their advocacy was the addition of several names to the pledge, and the result of the Fête was an increase to our funds.

J. COGSWELL, Secretary.

EDINBURGH.

The Total Abstinence Society held its weekly meeting on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., in the Rev. Mr. Wight's Chapel, Richmond Place. Mr. J. Anderson occupied the chair, and pressed the claims of the cause upon the audience, detailing also several cases of female degradation, of which he was cognizant. Mr. Davidson powerfully combated the objections of professors of Christianity, and exposed the numerous loop holes through which they seek to evade the question. Mr. Ronald instituted a comparison between the horrors of negro slavery and the tenfold greater slavery which not unfrequently overtook the self-immolated victim of intemperance. Mr. Flinn, from Dublin, said that twelve years ago he was one of the pests of Dublin, going about shoeless and shirtless, having a broken-hearted wife and family, with an aged mother, the victims of his heartless cruelty. So great were his uproarious misdemeanours that when joining the Society, he had no alternative but the lock-up as his place of abode, having in reality, when under a roup, no other; and even to that abode has he been sent for his outrageous conduct at Teetotal meetings. At their first introduction in Dublin at one of these meetings, after a release from confinement, he was induced, through the kind intreaties of one of the members, to join the Society, and though unable to read or write, being at the time only able to attach his mark. Now it was otherwise, as he and several other married men betook themselves to the night school, and he could now both read and write for himself. Tears were perceptible on the faces of not a few unaccustomed to weep, as he poured from his richly-treasured mind a strain of glowing language, which will not be soon effaced from the recollections of those that heard it. At the conclusion forty-seven joined the Society.

August 15. Mr. N. McNeil presided. He said, it was a source of deep regret to the adherents of abstinence that such apathy was displayed towards it by the press generally; among the few honourable exceptions was one he held in his hand, the "Protestant Dissenters' Almanack for 1848." The proprietor of which was Mr. JOHN CASSELL, of London. The compiler of that useful manual had shown his attachment to this principle by inserting an article in its defence, of such ability, and so uncompromising in its nature, that he deeply regretted their time would only admit his reading a very short extract; for the article at length, he would refer them to the publication already mentioned. Mr. Russell, student of divinity, addressed the meeting in a masterly speech on the physiological view of the question: detailing the various stages and processes through which our ordinary food went in its passage through the human system—showing the fearful havoc which alcohol must of necessity make, being altogether foreign to the building up and repairing the wasted energies of man's physical structure. The most marked applause greeted the speaker. Captain Ward, Secretary of the Liverpool Marine Abstinence Society, dwelt on the great benefits which had been derived by many of his seafaring brethren by the adoption of the abstinence principle; he had been an adherent of the cause for the last eleven years, and during that time he had been in every climate on the face of the globe, and had never been under the necessity of having recourse to intoxicating drinks. His experience enabled him to bear out the advocates of this question in their assertion, that these drinks were injurious rather than beneficial under the prosecution of arduous and laborious toil. Mr. Flinn closed the discussion of the evening in a speech of great humour, blended with touching pathos and sound philosophy.

GREAT GRIMSBY.

A grand Temperance demonstration has recently been made in this district, under the especial patronage of the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Yarborough. A grand rendez-vous took place on Monday, August 14, at Thornton College, in the East Lincolnshire, and Sheffield, and Grimsby lines. About eleven o'clock, thirty-four carriages started from Grimsby, ten of which had come from Louth, all well filled with passengers. On their arrival at Thornton, every avenue leading to the ancient College was crowded with orderly and well-dressed excursionists. Three bands of music were in attendance. After strolling about for some time in the adjoining grounds, the area surrounding the College presented a very animated scene. The Teetotalers with their advocates, banners and music, occupying certain elevated positions, while numerous pic-nic groups, beneath umbrageous trees, and in other rural and somewhat romantic positions, assembled to partake of a friendly cup of tea, &c. Another part might be seen groups of young and old, led by violinists enjoying the animating exercise of country dances and other diversions. Notwithstanding the vast numbers of persons thus congregated, amounting with the excursionists from Hull, to something like 2,000 or more, everything was conducted harmoniously, and exhibited admirably the true characteristics of temperance—peace and good will to men. Besides the parties who came by train, great numbers arrived in all sorts of vehicles. The conduct of the railway officials, calls for unqualified approbation. The day was propitious throughout.

A short meeting was commenced about twelve o'clock, after the fashion of the camp meetings of the Primitive Methodists; the speakers were Mr. Bottrill, from Grimsby, Mr. Clapperton, of Barton, Mr. Shepherd, from Waltham near Grimsby, and others. About half-past two, a train of twenty-seven carriages, containing the Hull, New Holland, Goxhill, &c. teetotalers, arrived at Thornton, whither the visitants had repaired to give their Yorkshire friends a hearty greeting. A lengthy procession went forward to the ruins of the abbey, headed by the bands, and accompanied by banners, &c. The monster meeting commenced about three o'clock, it being calculated, far, we believe, within bounds, that there were no fewer than 4,000 persons present, upwards of 3,200 of these having arrived per the various trains, regular and special, and the number of gigs and other private conveyances being very great.

The Rev. J. M. Holt, of Fulstow, was called to the chair, and addressed the audience in a very humorous speech. Addresses were delivered also by Messrs. C. Parker, Clapperton, Shepherd, Bottrill, &c. Thanks were voted to the Earl of Yarborough, for his kindness in permitting them to visit his grounds. The conduct of the vast assembly did great credit to the principles of abstinence, and many of the pleasure takers attached their signatures to the pledge.

SUNDERLAND.

Mr. T. Oliver, architect, is the successful competitor for the Temperance Hall, the committee having unanimously awarded him the premium. The proposed hall is intended to be built, according to the prospectus, "in one of the most central parts of the borough." In style it is what is technically called Venetian-Italian. The hall will be built of stone; and the south flank, which will be open to the street, is in a corresponding style with the principal front. Accommodation, we understand, is provided for upwards of 1,500 persons; and the most careful attention has been paid to the proper and efficient ventilation of the hall. For the satisfaction of the shareholders, as well as to bring the object prominently before the public, Mr. Oliver is authorized to prepare a perspective, a lithograph of which will be published as soon as the requisite arrangements can be made.

GATESHEAD.

On Wednesday evening, the 16th ult., a numerous meeting was held in the Wesleyan school-room, High-street, (Mr. John Hopper in the chair). When the chairman and Mr. W. H. Buchanan had made a few appropriate remarks, the Rev. William Cocker, minister of the New Connection, Newcastle, delivered an eloquent discourse on the evils of intemperance, and pointed out in glowing language the benefits the rising generation were likely to derive from Temperance Associations. At the close Mr. E. Robson delighted the audience with several Temperance melodies.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

A Conference of Sunday-school teachers was held in the Friend's School-room, Pilgrim-street, on the evenings of Tuesday, August 1, Tuesday, August 8, and Wednesday, August 9. This was convened by the Committee of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Youngster's Temperance Association, for the purpose of considering the claim of the Temperance movement on Sabbath-schools. The addresses were highly interesting and important. We propose to furnish copious extracts in our next from the report, which reached us too late for more particular notice this month.

DRIFFIELD.

The annual soirée of the Driffield Temperance Society took place in the Corn-Exchange Rooms, on Tuesday the 15th ult. Nearly two hundred persons sat down to an excellent tea. The company was highly respectable, and the arrangements gave entire satisfaction. A first-rate band from Leeds, during the tea played a variety of popular pieces. At seven o'clock the meeting took place. M. Domanski, the president of the society opened the meeting with an energetic and patriotic address. Mr. Pickering, of Bridlington Quay, gave a very amusing and encouraging address, illustrating from actual occurrences what an amount of good might be accomplished by the zeal of the friends of the temperance cause. Mr. T. B. Thompson, agent to the British Temperance Society, delivered an eloquent address on the grand principles under which the temperance reformation is progressing. The Rev. R. G. Mason, another agent to the British Temperance Society, was the next speaker. His spirit-moving address, in which he depicted the melting scenes of domestic woe and joy—how children had reclaimed parents—and what the law of kindness had accomplished—and illustrated with characteristic anecdotes, told with great pathos and sincerity—riveted the attention of the audience, and caused numbers to "wipe away a tear." Mr. Potter, of Bridlington, followed. His address was striking and well-timed. Amongst other anecdotes related, he mentioned having once waited on Sir George Strickland, M.P., at Boynton Hall, to solicit a donation on behalf of the Bridlington Temperance Society. Sir George was just starting on his journey to contest the election at Preston; yet he most cordially received the deputation; presented them with a handsome sum, and said he had been a teetotaler for thirty years. Mr. Potter concluded by moving a vote of thanks to the ladies for having presided at the trays, which was seconded by Mr. Goodhind, of Scarborough. The meeting concluded with the band playing the National Anthem, and the audience joining in full chorus. The room was crowded during the evening with a highly respectable company, who seemed to be much interested with the intellectual treat. On Sunday Mr. Mason preached twice in the Baptist Chapel, and once in the Wesleyan Chapel, and on Monday evening he lectured at Nafferton. On the evenings of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, he lectured in the Driffield Temperance lecture-room.

TEMPERANCE HYMN.

A glorious light has burst around us,
Joyful day! Joyful day!
We signed, and broke the chain that bound us,
Joyful day! Joyful day!
No more the sparkling cup we crave:
'Tis thus the ills of life we crave,
We drink the fountain's chrysal wave,
Joyful day! Joyful day!

Young Children strew the path before us,
Joyful day! Joyful day!
We sing with Woman smiling o'er us,
Joyful day! Joyful day!

A firm and dauntless host we stand,
While Truth commands our glorious band,
And shouts our conquest o'er the land,
Joyful day! Joyful day!

The rich and poor come forth to hear us,
Joyful day! Joyful day!
And isles across the ocean bear us,
Joyful day! Joyful day!
We'll spread the truth where man is found,
Bear it to earth's remotest bound,
Till every wind shall catch the sound,
Joyful day! Joyful day!

The above Hymn has been set to music by Mr. THOMAS JARMAN. It was first sung at the Royal Leamington Temperance Festival. The style of the music is simple, harmonious and popular. We have heard it sung with considerable effect at some of our London Festivals, and cordially recommend its introduction on suitable occasions. It may be had, in London, at Hart's, Hatton Garden.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE TEA FESTIVAL.—Lines inscribed to the Fitzroy Teetotal Association.—By JOHN O'NEILL.

These lines, descriptive of what usually takes place at a "Tea Festival" were written on the occasion of a meeting held in the Teetotal Hall, Little Portland Street, Marylebone, on Good Friday last. They are by Mr. O'Neill, the author of a popular poem, entitled "The Drunkard, or the blessings of Temperance," which is said to have suggested to Mr. George Cruikshank the idea of his celebrated plates of "The Bottle." The lines now before us are published at one penny; the proceeds to be given to the Author, who is nearly seventy years old, and is gradually losing his sight. It may be had of Mr. J. P. Draper, Great-Tichfield Street, Oxford Street; or at the Fitzroy Temperance Hall, any Tuesday evening.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE, EXTRA NUMBER, I. II. Douglas, Isle of Man; W. Robinson.

We seriously and cordially recommend the purchase and attentive perusal of the very interesting and important documents contained in these two extra numbers of the National Temperance Advocate. As they may be obtained for twopence each, post free, they are within the purchase of every Teetotaler, either for his own reading, or for sending to any professing Christian whom he is anxious to interest in the Temperance movement. The first number contains an authorized report of the proceedings of the Conference of Ministers of various religious denominations, held at Manchester, last April, for the purpose of considering the best means of promoting the Temperance Reformation. The second number contains, first, An Address to the Ministers of the Gospel, by the Rev. JABEZ BURNS, D.D.; calling upon them without delay, "to abstain from the use of all intoxicating drinks,—to exhibit their decided and resolute pledged adherence to the cause,—to use their efforts in their spheres influence, according to their judgment and conscientious conviction, to banish them from the community and from the world at large." To this very compendious and impressive document is appended the Ministerial certificate, with signatures of Ministers who had signed it up to the time of publication, to the number of nearly 600. Secondly, An Address to Sunday School Teachers, by the Rev. RICHARD TABRAHAM, Wesleyan Minister. This address is pious, affectionate and urgent. Thirdly, An Address to the Manufacturers and Venders of Intoxicating Liquors, by the Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS. This is every way worthy the author of "Anti Bacchus," and can hardly fail to touch the consciences of those engaged in the traffic who will read it. Fourthly, An Essay on the connexion of Total Abstinence with the Progress of Christianity, by the Rev. WILLIAM J. SHREWSBURY, Wesleyan Minister. This is of some length; solid, serious, and argumentative. It is a most important document; clearly proving that every man who professes to desire the spread of pure and undefiled religion, is left without excuse if he does not render all possible assistance to the Total Abstinence Reformation. It is well worthy of a place by the side of the Prize Essays to which we have given such extensive circulation.

WHAT WASTE!—The amount of hard cash paid for intoxicating drinks in the metropolis alone is £3,000,000 sterling per annum. This sum, if spent in sewers, would afford upwards of 1,700 miles at 6s. 8d. per foot run, and of ample capacity for the largest thoroughfare if the supply of water were good. If the City of London were thoroughly drained it would require about 50 miles of sewerage. It follows, therefore, that we spend in London yearly, in intoxicating drinks, a sum which would pay for the effectual drainage of thirty-four such places as the ancient City.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

OPPORTUNITIES.—Some of our Teetotalers complain that they have no opportunities for advocating their principles. Lord Bacon says, "A wise man maketh more opportunities than he finds." A willingness to make and to improve opportunities seldom or never fails of success.

AN ORNAMENT FOR YOUTH.—Temperance is one of the brightest graces which adorn the young man; and that Temperance consists in Total Abstinence from all that can intoxicate.—Governor Briggs.

DREADFUL!—Dr. Tyng, in a Temperance lecture recently delivered, said,—“It annually costs this country (America) one hundred millions of dollars to destroy the fairest and best of our sons. Query—Will not this apply to England?”

ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS strengthen the animal, deprave the moral, and enfeeble the intellectual powers of man. Ought such liquors to be sanctioned? Ought any human being to make, sell, or use them?

RATHER FAR-FETCHED.—Well, my boy, do you know what syn-fac means? (said a schoolmaster to the child of a teetotaler,) "Iss, sir; the dooty upon sperrils."

FIRE DAMP is a dreadful enemy to the collier, and when it is prevalent in a coal-pit no man is safe for a day, unless every collier in the pit possesses a safety lamp, and makes use of it; yet it has been proved that colliers will sell or pawn these safety lamps for beer.

IRISH TEMPERANCE.—The spirits manufactured in Ireland, and entered for home consumption in the year ending 5th April, 1847, were 7,392,365 gallons; in the year ending 5th April, 1848, 6,415,145; decrease 977,145 gallons. The duty received in 1847 was £985,648 13s. 4d., and in 1848, £855,362 13s. 4d.; decrease, £130,286.

MENDING BAD HABITS.—A dressmaker said that she would much rather make a new dress, than alter and re-fit an old one. If this be true of clothing for the body, how far truer is it of habits of the mind. And how much easier is it to commence life a sober youth, than to be reclaimed from drunkenness after the habit has been confirmed by many years' practice.

KEEP DRINK FROM THE DRUNKARD.—The drunkard's folly is exceedingly great. He is mad, on one point, as any lunatic in Bedlam; he will curse himself through eternity, making himself a beast, and then a devil. He is resolved on suicide; and he says of the drink, "I will seek it yet again." And will you furnish him with the instrument of self destruction? You may "seek it," poor fellow; but, as far as I am concerned, you shall not find it. God forbid that in my house, on my table, or in my cupboard, there should be found the mischief maker that you seek. No, no; while insanity abounds, and maniacs are at large, edge tools must be kept out of the way. Which of you will assist the drunkard onwards in the broad and downward road? Which will take the responsibility of his untimely end? or, must rest somewhere. How is he to escape if the means of hurrying to the gates of death are provided for him in every house, and presented to him by professors of religion!—H. Mudge.

TEETOTAL MUSIC.—A reformed drunkard said he never heard his wife sing in his life, until after he had signed the pledge: and now he scarcely ever goes home but what she is singing like a canary.

TEMPERANCE SHIP AND CREW.—The New York Organ says, "There is now lying in one of our docks a Dutch ship which has excited no little interest among our citizens. It is called, The Amsterdam Temperance Society. We are informed that it was built by teetotalers, for a wealthy firm in Amsterdam, who wished to honour the Temperance cause. The captain and crew are also Teetotalers. This is another evidence of the spread of Total Abstinence principles over the world.

"FREIGHTS ARE UNCOMMON LOW," as the poor fellow said when he had got so much drink aboard that he pitched into the gutter.

TEETOTAL SYMPATHY;

A TOUR IN DEVONSHIRE.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

WE are creatures of sympathy, and are greatly influenced by the conduct of others, especially when engaged in the same good work with ourselves. It is said that Mahomet felt himself strong when he could boast of ONE convert. He had then one person to sympathise with him. Paradise was a dreary place, so long as Adam had no one to co-operate with him in dressing and keeping the garden. What an addition was Eve. He must be a man of giant nerve, brain, and soul, who can long stand single-handed and alone by a principle. Sympathy seems not only to strengthen us, but even to add firmness to truth; and the more energetic the co-operation, the more our own zeal and the zeal of others is enkindled. In London, what a spell there is in the word "FIRE." At whatever time it may be uttered, what multitudes are aroused by its thrill. Hundreds at midnight rise from their beds. The energy with which all run and enquire, like the force of a flood, draws every thing into its stream. All that we want in any good cause is earnestness and energy: where these are found the common law of sympathy will attract others to unite with us.

Would that our Teetotal Friends paid more attention to this truth. I have heard it lamented that Total Abstinence is going down. But this can never be except through the lukewarmness of its disciples. Nothing that is based in truth and benevolence can decline, unless its professed adherents become careless. Even error can do wonders when vigorously propagated. A falsehood stoutly and perseveringly maintained may make converts, and at length pass for a verity. Success must be merited before it can be had. Teetotalers must not expect prosperity to drop like rain from the clouds. The showers and the sun, without the labour of the husbandman, would never produce a harvest. The Temperance principle must succeed as soon as its members resolve that it shall be triumphant. Here, nothing but persevering effort is needed.

These thoughts were suggested by a tour that I lately took through a part of DEVONSHIRE. I was invited by Mr. W. PEARSE, of Sticklepath, near Oakhampton, to attend the Temperance Festival in that village. The Teetotal Friends around having heard of my visit, sent me several pressing solicitations to address them, some of which I accepted, and was highly delighted to find so much zeal in our noble cause. I felt cheered and strengthened, and have written the following facts to encourage our friends in other parts of the country to go on. We are not alone, but have thousands who sympathise with us and are our fellow labourers, so that we may "thank God and take courage." No society, considering its unpopularity, has ever prospered more extensively. Who, considering the inveterate taste of the English for strong drinks, could have thought or dared to hope that in a few short years such numbers would have been found to mortify their appetites and join our ranks? We may justly say, "What has God wrought!" for though some may brand our movement as an irreligious one, we have most abundant living proofs of God's blessing.

On Monday, August 14, I left home for Exeter. In the evening of that day we had a full meeting in the Athenæum. The Rev. Mr. FORD, a clergyman of the Established Church, presided, and opened the meeting with a stirring speech full of Total Abstinence, piety, and christian charity. I spoke for nearly two hours to an enthusiastic audience. In this city, Mr. Fox, surgeon-dentist, has long laboured hard to propagate our principles, and has been eminently successful. There are several instances of the most notorious and abandoned drunkards having been rescued from degradation, and who are now on the road to heaven. "Are not these brands plucked out of the fire?"

The next morning a kind friend who was once a drunkard, but is now a Teetotaler and the member of a christian church, had come twenty miles to drive me to Sticklepath. During part of the road the rain fell in torrents, but being well supplied with cold water within, we were not frightened at the shower bath without. By the time we arrived at our destination, the sun shone out, and we had a fine evening. Here, under a capacious tent in one of the wild glens of the Dartmoor, we sat down to tea. The village contains but a handful of inhabitants, and yet three hundred seats were occupied. A spirited teetotal band cheered us during the repast. After the refreshment, we wandered in the glen and on the moor, until the meeting commenced. The chair was taken by Mr. MACLOUD, a surgeon of Oakhampton, who has for some time been a pledged member, and who very nobly advocated our principles. On re-assembling, the tent was crowded. Several of us addressed the meeting, and about half-past eight the people departed, highly delighted with principles which afforded them so much innocent pleasure and domestic comfort. This society is very prosperous because it is well looked after by Mr. Pearse and his venerable father, who, as woollen manufacturers, employ a large portion of the population. What a blessing all masters might be if they would only countenance our principle by their example, effort, and pecuniary resources, and how amply they would be repaid in the benefits of a Teetotal community. They would in every instance receive a hundred-fold.

On the following day, Wednesday, I lectured at Tavistock. JOHN RUNDLE, Esq., formerly M.P., was in the chair. He is a Teetotaler, and is not ashamed to avow it. There is a good society at Tavistock, but the meeting was thinly attended. Our friends had made a mistake. The wealthy people had complained that the usual place of assembly was not respectable, and to please them, the Ball Room was rented, and a charge made for admittance. The sum demanded kept the poor people away, and the rich did not come, nor was enough taken at the doors to cover expences. I have long seen that it is of little use to attend to the crotchets of objectors. Men who love a principle, can assemble any where to hear it advocated. The principle gives respectability to the place, and not the place to the principle. We should have had a full house, and immense good would have been done that night in Tavistock, had not our meeting been injured by those who concealed their dislike to Temperance under a specious objection to the place in which our friends usually assemble. It is well to remember our chief mission is with the masses, let us convert these, and the wealthy will be sure to follow.

On Friday, the 18th, we had a good meeting in Stonehouse, and on the following Monday in Devonport. Here our friends had not used all their influence, or we should have had to adjourn to a larger building. The Rev. JAMES SHERMAN, of Surrey Chapel, was supplying Princes' Street Chapel, and if a notice had been sent to him, would have announced it to the fifteen hundred people who listened to him on the sabbath evening. I heard Mr. S. in the vestry complain to the deacons that our Temperance meeting was not published, and their excuse was that they had received no information on the subject. I once lectured in the spacious Town Hall, in Devonport, when every nook was crowded. If this excitement is not kept up, Teetotalers are to blame.

On Tuesday, the 22nd, we had the Town Hall at Torrington crowded. The large room at Bideford was overflowing on the following evening. Here too our meeting would have been greatly increased, had notice been sent to the chapel. A very kind note was received from Mr. BEATON, the Independent minister, regretting that he had not been informed of the lecture, as he would have given up his service on that evening. One of his deacons met me the next day, and expressed a wish that they had been informed of our meeting. At Bideford and Torrington, tea meetings well conducted and well attended, preceded the public lecture. On Thursday, the Town Hall at Barnstaple was filled with an attentive and well conducted audience. Several at most of these meetings signed the pledge.

On Friday, I travelled to Combe Park, near Lynmouth, the hospitable mansion of one of our staunchest and most active friends, W. COLLARD, Esq. This gentleman had invited me to take up my abode at his house, and arranged for me to lecture at Minehead festival, at Exford, and Lynton. Monday morning we left Combe Park for Minehead. The ride through glens, over moors, and through scenery the most enchanting, was not a little exhilarating. Our ponies brought us to our destination about one o'clock. The procession commenced its march about two. The Lynton Teetotal Band gave its services gratuitously, and had travelled about twenty miles to aid the good cause. These noble-minded men returned home after the meeting. The room was not large enough to contain the parties who came to the tea, and the ladies who kindly presided had to receive the friends in succession. For the public meeting, we had to adjourn to the Market house, and there were as many in the street as within the walls. The opening speech was by a zealous lady belonging to the Bible Christians, which produced a deep impression. I followed after. Upwards of 60 signed the pledge.

The next day we rode to the heights of Dunkery, and then on to Exford. Here we had a tea meeting, and the Methodist chapel crowded in the evening. Many signed. On Wednesday morning we returned to Combe Park. Our zealous friend Mr. Collard accompanied me in these Teetotal excursions. In the evening we had a full meeting at Lynton, Col. RAWDON, M.P. for Armagh, in the chair. The Rev. Mr. HAYES, a clergyman from Bath, commenced with an effective speech. I then spoke for a considerable time. We had many of the Elite of the neighbourhood present, and several assured us on the following day that they would have signed, only no one of them seemed to like to lead the van. This society is in a flourishing condition, through the energetic efforts of Mr. Collard, who, together with the Rev. Mr. Hayes, bears the whole expence of working it. Lynmouth may perhaps be said to be the Alps of England. It is hardly possible to imagine anything more wild, grand and sublime than its deep glens, with their ever murmuring cataracts, its overhanging cliffs, and especially its valley of Rocks. One is lost in wonder as we look down on the roaring sea several hundred feet below, or gaze upward on the terrific ivy clad towers which nature has lifted to immense heights above. Compared with these bulwarks and citidels of nature, the citadels and cathedrals which man erects, however costly or splendid, only appear like toys which infants amuse themselves with in the nursery.

For a whole week, though no dreamer of dreams, I dreamt of these scenes. I found that speaking, travelling, and admiring God's works had raised my pulse from their usual tone nearly twenty beats a minute, but as the excitement was not alcoholic but healthful, I suffered no inconvenience. He who abandons stimulants is not taxed with depression of spirits. But I must say no more. I have just scribbled these few lines to encourage our Teetotal friends to persevere, by letting them know that they have sympathy and co-operation to a far greater extent than many imagine.

A LEAF FROM THE JOURNAL OF A "TRAVELLING TEMPERANCE MAN."

Arrived in Middleborough, and attended a temperance meeting. A working man rose for the purpose of "telling his experience." It was the first time he had stood before the public as a "speaker."

I had frequently heard the same thoughts given forth, nearly the same words had repeatedly fallen on my ear. And yet those "old hackney'd words" fell from this man upon me, as though I and he had stood alone in a new cycle of being, and he had uttered those wondrous sounds for the first time.

They entered into my very soul, and produced a delicious, satisfying, and refreshing feeling, somewhat similar to what we might suppose a man would have, who, nearly dying of parching thirst in the midst of a burning sandy desert, had a goblet of sparkling dew-drops handed to him! How was this? From whence came that telling effect? There was no scientific disquisition on the philosophy of temperance, no elaborate argument, no artistic rhetorical display, no finely sounded periods, no—nothing, but a simple unadorned narrative of that working man's experience.

"Then how was it," ask you, "whence that mysterious charm, whence that magnetic power?" I will tell you.

It was thus, it was his own experience, and not the re-echoed echo of his fellows.

His own sufferings and rejoicings, his woe, and his gladness, his degradation and his elevation; his wife's mournings and her rejoicings, her tears and her smiles, her love for him then, her love for him now. Excellent woman! she had cherished no hate? His misery was her misery, their happiness was now mutual.

These were the "heads" of his "experience," his discourse—nay, say his oration; for it was one, simple, natural, and sublime! Simple from its being a true transcript of the man's feelings; natural from its unaffected simplicity; and sublime because it was simple and natural!

THE LICENSING SYSTEM.

THE friends of Temperance in various parts of the country, have recently interfered with success, to prevent the increase of houses licensed for the sale of those drinks, by the use of which so many thousands injure their health, their character, and their comforts. In few places has this stand been made more successfully than at BOLTON. From a report of the proceedings of the Annual Licensing day for that Borough, sent to us by a friend, we shall make some extracts. After several applications for new licenses had been made, Mr. TAYLOR, the Coroner for the Borough, addressed the Court at considerable length.

He had, he said, a memorial to present—one which, he thought, would have its due weight with the magistrates when they looked at the signatures. These commenced with the name of the Vicar, and included, he believed, the names of all the clergymen of the established church, and, with one or two exceptions, those of the clergymen of every other denomination in the borough; also the names of a number of professional men, tradesmen, gentlemen, and others, who, he believed, had at heart the interest and welfare of the population at large. Before presenting that petition, however, he would refer the court to statistics respecting crime and other matters, from which the magistrates might be able to judge whether more licenses ought to be granted. In the first place there were 96 inns in Great Bolton, and in Little Bolton 20: there were also beerhouses in Great Bolton, 125; in Little Bolton, 66: in addition to these there were in the two townships, 11 houses at which beer was sold off the premises: total of licensed houses at which ale and spirits were sold, 318. There was a drinking place for every 25 houses, or one for every 200 souls, including men, women, and children, total abstainers, and those who would not, could not, or durst not drink; and if it was said that persons came to the market who got drunk, it might, on the other hand, be said that those who did not drink might be taken as a set-off against them. Such were the present resources for selling drink, or poison—some called it by one name—some by the other. Of 12 of the inns of which he had spoken; the occupiers had this year been fined or reprimanded for offences committed on the Sabbath; eight were notorious as places at which gaming was permitted; at twelve (not to speak of the vaults) prostitutes were permitted to assemble. Then, there were five beerhouses at which gaming was permitted, and eight beerhouses where prostitutes were permitted to assemble, some of them being no better than brothels. The total number of prisoners apprehended for the last year (ending August) was 2,541. He had arrived at this aggregate by taking from the police accounts the number apprehended during the first eleven months, and adding the average for another month. 2,541 had been apprehended for all offences, civil and criminal; but he would analyse them. 367 of the number were males, who were found by the police drunk and incapable of taking care of themselves; 62 females were found under similar circumstances; for being drunk and disorderly, 317 males and 60 females; and, the disorderly characters, resorting to low ale houses and beerhouses who were taken into custody, amounted to 244. The disorderly prostitutes apprehended were 117: making a total of 1,167. Now, let them see how many were apprehended for being disorderly whilst sober, for by that means, the cause of disorder, crime, and prostitution might be ascertained. 93 men and 28 women—in all, 121 were the number thus taken into custody; or, in other words, one-tenth of the number that were apprehended, for being drunk or under the influence of drink: so that this, at all events, bore out the impression of judges, magistrates, keepers of prisons, and others, that nine-tenths of the crime of the country was chargeable upon drinking usages and customs. He had not taken into account the felonies that were committed; and he would leave the magistrates who attended that court and the quarter sessions, to say whether the same ratio did not shew itself, in respect to those offences. He wished, however, to offer some evidence to prove the influence, which increased facilities for drinking had upon the conduct of the people. In order to do this, he would draw a comparison of the offences of this and the last 3 years, and also of the number of alehouses in those periods. In 1846, there were 317 ale and beerhouses, and 1169 persons of the character previously described, being under the influence of drink, were apprehended. In 1837, the number of ale and beerhouses was 341, or an increase of 25 beerhouses upon 1846; and that increase produced an increase of prisoners apprehended under the influence of drink, of 193; which showed beyond all doubt, the relation that existed between the drinking system and crime. In the present year there were 318 ale and beerhouses; and, as he before stated, 1,167 persons of the character spoken of had been apprehended; so that the increase of 193, in 1847, had fallen down again to within 2 of the number of 1846, while the ale and beerhouses had also diminished till they were merely one over what they were in that year. Now these statements could be proved to be true, on inquiry being made at the source whence they were derived. And, after hearing them he would ask, could any disinterested mind fail to see the relation to which he had alluded? if so, he presumed, the magistrates would consider, before they afforded increased facilities for the procuring of drink.

Next Mr. Taylor begged to give an account of the inquests held in the borough during the past year. He had no other opportunity of giving an account of his stewardship, and should be very happy in availing himself of the opportunity now afforded of doing so. There had been 68 inquests in the year ending August. Of the persons on whom these were held, 21 were infants, or under 21 years of age; and it therefore could not be expected that they were influenced by drinking, though, incidentally they might have died through the misconduct of their parents in that respect. That number deducted from the whole, 47 remained, the end of twenty-three of which he would give them. He went through the 23 cases, leaving out names, but briefly stating the circumstances of death,—proving that there were 23, or half of the grown-up persons on whom inquests had been held, whose deaths were directly attributable to, or connected with, the “use,” or “abuse,” as people might think fit to call it, of drink. This was his experience as coroner for one year. What, therefore, might they consider had been the experience of all the coroners in England for the last twenty years? It must be shocking to think of the disease, suffering, cruelty, madness, murder, and suicides that must have taken place from drink. We had been alarmed at the approach of cholera; and it was certainly well to look about us and try to make arrangements to meet it. But the pestilence of cholera was nothing compared to the pestilence of drinking; taking, as an instance, the last visit of the cholera to this town. On that occasion, all the fatal cholera cases that could be found were 17; but it was not at all improbable that 100 died in the same year whose deaths arose directly or indirectly, from drinking. Now, what was the effect of drinking usages upon the poor rates? Great Bolton had paid £17,000 during the last year; and was no proportion of the sum attributable to the misconduct of paupers? was it not found that scores of children were left to be maintained by the parish in consequence of the drunken habits of their parents? And for the demoralizing effects of drinking, let them look to the last election. Let them look also at the desecration of the Sabbath that took place. And here, he would observe, he felt obliged to the gentleman who exerted himself to promote the observance of the Sabbath. One remarkable feature of the effects of drinking was the idioty that it produced. In Paris, out of 1,200 idiots, 1,100 had drunken parents. Mr. Taylor then referred to the last year's report of the Rev. J. Clay, chaplain to the Preston House of Correction, from which he read several extracts, shewing the connexion between drinking and crime.

Mr. Taylor next referred to evidence given before a committee of the House of Commons in 1834, to prove the nature of alcohol, the distribution of which, he observed, the applicants for new licenses sought to increase, and thereby do more mischief: Dr. Dod stated that "Writers on medical jurisprudence rank alcohol among narcotico-acrid poisons;" and he added that "small quantities, if repeated, always prove more or less injurious;" and that "the morbid appearances seen after death, occasioned by ardent spirits, exactly agree with those which result from poisoning, caused by any other substance ranked in the same class." Sir Astley Cooper had declared, "No person has a greater hostility to dram drinking than myself, inasmuch that I never suffer any ardent spirits in my house, thinking them 'evil spirits;' and if the poor could witness the white livers, the dropsies, the shattered nervous systems, which I have seen, as the consequences of drinking, they would be aware that spirits and poisons are synonymous terms." Mr. Taylor next produced a plan, about 5 feet square, of the town of Great Bolton, shewing, in black marks, the public houses already licensed; in red, the beerhouses; and by stars, the houses for which licenses were sought. There were from 90 to 100 already licensed; but he could find thirty within the space of 300 yards, and within that distance of the Parish Church, too. Churchgate was one black mass.

In addition to the memorial from the clergy and tradesmen, Mr. Taylor produced a memorial from the Sunday School Teachers, signed by 484 male teachers, representing 9,000 children, praying that no additional licenses might be granted. He ridiculed the idea of Mr. Richardson, (one of the advocates for the granting of more licenses) that to increase the number of public houses would promote morality. He referred to a law definition of an inn or hostel, as being a place where such persons as travellers and wayfarers were to refresh themselves and their horses, &c.; nothing being said about bar, tap room, or smoking rooms for neighbours to spend their time in; and he argued that it was not legal to license houses for the purpose to which they were put. In conclusion, he asked the bench to take the two memorials he had to present against an increase of licenses, and to consider the motives of those who had signed them, as well as the motives of those who sought new licences. The clergy, the Sunday School teachers, the Temperance Society, and the public had done their duty, and he should like the magistrates on that day to do their duty also. He simply asked them to weigh over the evidence laid before them, and to exercise their judgment upon it, trusting they would see the propriety of refusing to grant any new licences, and thus to give encouragement to a system which blighted the morals of the population, destroyed the peace of man, woman and child here, and endangered their hope of happiness to all eternity. He was earnest on the subject, which was a practical—a social—a religious one; and he begged to say that, if the applications were refused, the whole town would rejoice at the circumstance.

The CHAIRMAN thought the Bench were indebted to Mr. Taylor for the statements he had laid before them.—As the result, three old licenses were suspended, and NO NEW LICENSES WERE GRANTED.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A TEMPERANCE ADVOCATE.

BY THOMAS WHITTAKER.

PASSING through a street in the town of S—ton the other day, a friend said to me, "You see those two cottages between the public house and the pawn shop."—"Yes."—"Two years ago a young lady, twenty-one years of age, had put into her possession £700 in hard cash, with other property. She purchased those two cottages, and came to reside in one of them. The other day she died in the greatest wretchedness, having gone through, or been robbed of, the whole of her property. The publican in whose house she spent a great portion of her time, and from which she was repeatedly turned out in a beastly state of intoxication, now possesses one of them, and the pawn-broker, to whom she as repeatedly went for assistance, the other. When she died, she had scarcely clothes to cover her nakedness, and was literally being eaten up of vermin! A few days before her death she was turned out of her house by the pawn-broker, who took possession and to the present holds it. After enduring misery and shame in the streets, she went into the public house, in which she had often been encouraged in her ruinous course. The landlady, fearing she might die on her hands, sent her in an Omnibus to a poor and distant relation a little way out of the town, where she died in a few days, penniless and unpitied, not twenty-three years of age, having gone through £700 and other effects in less than two years. An inquest was held on her body, and she died, of course, "by the visitation of God" and was buried. The publican supplied the drink, the pawn-broker the bread, and a young man, the son of another publican who had contributed much towards the ruin of this poor creature, the other necessaries, for her interment. The earth has closed upon her sins, and she will sleep till the trump of God shall call her and all men to his bar."

Oh! how my heart bled at the recital of this short but affecting history. In her life there was no arm to protect; in her death there was no eye to pity. She is gone, and they who contributed to her ruin, and now inherit her property, live; and while looking honest men in the face, go forth to contaminate and destroy. While

"The rich, and they that have an arm to check
The license of the lowest in degree,
Desert their office, and, themselves intent
On pleasure, haunt the capital, and thus
To all the violence of lawless hands Resign the scenes their presence might protect."

In the World's Temperance Convention, I ventured to express a wish that some decided steps should be taken in order to induce coroners and jurymen to return a verdict more in accordance with facts than is generally the case. I have no hesitation in saying that one half of the inquests held in this country are complete farces. There are hundreds, yes, hundreds, MURDERED every year in this country by publicans. Our sons and brothers, aye, and our daughters too, are offered up in open day to their iniquitous system. And the coroners and jurors in solemn mockery tell the world, and the God of love and mercy, that they died by HIS visitation.

"Oh 'ts a fearful spectacle to see So many maniacs dancing in their chains."

And are we to shut our eyes to these glaring facts; to be dumb dogs in the midst of such abominations, and from false delicacy keep back the truth? When GOD was the Magistrate, such men did not go unpunished. If a man had an ox that was wont to gore with its horns, and the master of the ox, knowing its propensity to kill, suffered it to go out, and it killed a man, then the ox and the owner, by the direction of the Almighty, were to be put to death. The owner was held responsible, and justly so too. Men are not now required or permitted to execute the law, as they were when God was the Magistrate. Yet the reason of the law remains: it is founded in justice, and is eternal.

Surely the nation will not sleep much longer? Is there no prophet in Israel who will lift up his voice like a trumpet, and show the house of Jacob their sins? God may say of this nation as he said of the Jews, "In vain have I smitten your children, they received no correction. Your own sword hath devoured your prophets like a destroying lion.—In thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents; I have not found it by secret search, but upon all these. A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land." Is it not so? "The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and the people love to have it so!"

From this same public-house, not long ago, a poor sailor was turned out in the night, drunk, and the next morning he was found dead in the street: this passed as a matter of course. But the immortal Cowper was right when he said,—

"Vain the attempt
To advertise in verse a public pest,
That, like the filth with which the peasant feeds
His hungry acres, stinks, and is of use."

Men are licensed for so much gold, and under the authority of State, deal out death to all who visit these houses. They commit their conscience to the safe keeping of the statute-book, and say, "peace" to their souls, from the patronage they receive from the so-called wise and good? What a generation of vipers! How full of all uncleanness! How our world is cursed with black spots, instead of being blessed with lights. But the day has dawned, and those dark deeds shall be brought to light, and that which worketh an abomination or a lie shall perish.

TO A MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—I address you on a very important subject, namely, TEETOTALISM; and I do so for two weighty reasons. First, because I believe it to be the imperative duty of the christian minister to lend his aid to every institution that tends to benefit man, physically, morally, or religiously; and, Secondly, because I know that Teetotalism requires that aid. In most places where the ministers of the gospel have lent their influence and example to the Temperance movement, a powerful impetus has been given, not only to temperance, but also to religion; whilst, on the other hand, where the pastor has stood aloof from this great moral reformation, drunkenness has been rampant, and the cause of religion generally at a low ebb. Should you not then be careful that your influence is thrown into the right side of the scale, and "lest haply you may be found even to fight against God!"

Teetotalism is evidently of God; it bears his impress.—Look at its origin: a few plain working men, filled with love to God and man, banded themselves together to try the untried plan of reclaiming the drunkard, giving up what they once considered a necessary article, because it became a cause of stumbling to their weaker brethren. Look, again, at its fruits:—are they not similar to those which the gospel produces? The swearer has learnt to pray, and the blasphemer has ceased to blaspheme. And what wonder? Does not Teetotalism arise out of the Gospel? nay, is it not part and parcel of it? Allow me then to ask you, with all affection, have you ever given Teetotalism that prayerful consideration which it demands? Have you ever thought that 600,000 drunkards are to be found in this country? That they beset our every path, that they are to be found in our cities, our towns, and our hamlets; and that 60,000 of these unhappy beings die annually with the awful curse of God resting on their devoted heads, "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." And reflect, Sir, that you cannot by any means shake off the relationship which subsists between yourself and every human being. No; soar as high as heaven, still you are bound, by ties which cannot be broken, to the most grovelling of the sons of men. Get as near the throne of the INFINITE as earth-born man can, while he tabernacles below, and you are still allied to the drunkard by a heaven ordained brotherhood. Yes! man, however fallen, is still thy brother. That besotted drunkard, lying by the wayside, or staggering beneath the influence of Alcohol, stood once erect, was created in the very image of God. Have you ever thought of this, and did the possibility of their being reclaimed ever occur to your mind? or have you supposed them to be beyond the reach of hope! If you believe that their case is not hopeless, what efforts have you put forth to save them?

Talk you of your preaching the Gospel as the only way you know of to evangelize the world! Ah, Sir, something more must be done than mere preaching as is commonly understood. The christian church has been robbed of thousands of her members through strong drink, who have sat weekly beneath the sound of the Gospel. And not only so, the pulpit, also, has lost many of its brightest ornaments through the subtlety of the same insidious monster; "the priest and the people have erred through strong drink." Or, perhaps, you say, you have given to the world a good example in addition to your precepts, and that if all had followed that example we should never have heard of teetotalism. This, I grant, but then it was, in part, the attempting to follow your example which caused them to err. You by your example, said, "drink moderately," but you have not stated, even as a general rule, what is moderation; in fact, the very word seems to me to have thrown around itself a mystery which has never been explored. Moderation in the teetotaler's vocabulary means "rising proper things temperately."

Seeing then that drunkenness has increased, notwithstanding all your preaching and good example, does it not behove you to bring some SPECIAL efforts to bear on the drunkard's case? Preaching has not done it. You preach on the Sunday, but the drunkard is drinking in the public house; he does not attend to hear the word; or, if he does, his mind is so beclouded from the Saturday night's debauch, that it is utterly impossible for him to be benefited.

Here, Sir, the teetotaler comes to the rescue, and says to the man who has often and often tried to be a moderate drinker, but has signally failed in every attempt: "TOUCH NOT the first glass, and you can never get drunk;" and the precept from such an one comes with double force, because it is backed by the mighty power of example.

Now, Sir, it is an example of this description we wish you to set before the drunkard; one which there is not the least danger of his going too far in following out; one which cannot be misunderstood. This is the ground on which principally, at present, we ask you to sign the pledge of abstinence, viz., because intoxicating drinks make your brother to offend. This should be a sufficient reason for your doing so; it would, no doubt, have been sufficient for Paul; it would have been (shall I say) sufficient for your Lord and Master. Surely you will not say with the first murderer, "Am I my brother's keeper?" You are your brother's keeper; and if he be lost because you would not relinquish an unnecessary luxury, will not his blood be required at your (the watchman's) hands?

I am, Reverend and dear Sir,

Yours, truly,

Pembrokeshire, Sept. 15, 1848.

A. LAYMAN.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.

The fourteenth Annual Conference of this Association held its sittings in the Music Hall, Leeds, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of July. The number of delegates present was about equal to that of former years, and the societies represented included some of the most important in the North, as well as other parts of England. Several important resolutions were passed; those which received the warmest support of the Conference were those relating to a more perfect organization of district and county Associations—the formation of "Bands of Hope"—the more extensive circulation of a higher Temperance Literature, and the necessity for legislative aid for lessening the number and power of the drink agencies which so sadly tempt, deprave, and destroy mankind in this country. The report contains much interesting matter, and is printed for circulation. The Conference is to be held next year in the city of LINCOLN.

BARRACK CANTEENS.

THE regular readers of the Teetotal Times will, no doubt, recollect that we have devoted some space, at various periods, to an exposure of the fearful evils resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks, and from the arrangements of garrisons and barracks, both as regards the social comfort, the mental improvement, and the moral elevation of the soldier. We furnished the evidence of competent witnesses in proof of our statements. And when, in September 1847, we found that, in consequence of having the subject again and again urged upon their consideration, the government had resolved to prohibit for the future the sale of spirituous liquors in the Canteens, we congratulated our readers on this step in the right direction, anticipating from that resolution a considerable improvement in the comforts and conduct of the military. We spoke, indeed, of the change as but one step towards the improvement desired, and suggested that "when the means of degradation were thus taken away, their place ought at once to be filled up by something of a more salutary kind;" and that "Reading Rooms, suitably provided with the means of instruction and amusement, would form a most wholesome as well as acceptable addition to the new Canteens."

The subject has again been brought fully before us, by the appearance in the newspapers throughout the kingdom, of advertisements, dated from the Office of Ordnance, announcing the letting of the Barrack Canteens throughout England, Scotland, and the Channel Islands, from October 1848 to September 1851. In these advertisements the following paragraph is very conspicuous. In the copy now before us it is printed in Italics, thus:—"Persons forwarding proposals will clearly understand that the sale of ardent or spirituous liquors, hitherto allowed in barrack canteens, will in future be strictly prohibited."

Teetotalers have rejoiced greatly at this announcement, and at several public meetings where teetotal advocates have quoted the paragraph, it has been received with hearty cheers. But, while we attach some importance to this movement, let us not "Hurrah!" till we are fairly "out of the wood." Perhaps, upon mature consideration, the abstract value of this prohibition may be less than, at first sight, it appears to be. It may turn out that when the soldier who is, unhappily, fond of drink, finds that he cannot obtain it within the barracks, he may determine to get it without the barracks. Denied strong drinks under the comparative protection of the old canteen system, he may obtain it, of a still more poisonous quality, at a still more exorbitant price, in drinking shops of the lowest class, where licentiousness meets with far less restraints than in the Canteens. Far be it from us to speak lightly of any measure which is intended for good, merely because it does not fully square with our notions. But, to use language employed by the Editor of the Morning Herald, in an able article on this subject, from which we quote largely,—"It is only as an auxiliary measure that we can recognize its importance."

What then do we desire, in addition to this prohibition of the sale of spirituous liquors in barrack canteens? To this question the Herald furnishes a reply so admirable, that we gladly avail ourselves of it:—

"It is right that government should endeavour to remove the temptation from the very doors of the soldier—that nothing should be done by the authorities directly to foster the growth of evil habits among its servants. But it must not stop here—it must not content itself with simply ceasing to authorise the sale of ardent spirits on its own premises. To change the rum-shop into the beer-shop is a step, but not a very forward one, along the path of reform. The canteen must be rendered something better still. "I see no good reason," said the SECRETARY AT WAR, last year, in the House of Commons, "why the canteen might not be converted into a reading-room, in which the soldier might profitably engage his 'leisure hours.'" Here, at least, we have an official recognition of a principle that cannot be too urgently insisted upon by all military reformers. It is not by selling, or refusing to sell, this or that description of liquor in our barrack canteens that we can destroy the existence, or even diminish the amount of intemperance in the army. We must remove the temptation, not as though it were a material, but a moral removal that we are about to accomplish. We must look at the causes of this general abasement, and not content ourselves with merely taking away what is evil, but must substitute for it that which is good. The soldier goes to the canteen or to the drinking-shop because he has nothing better to do. He is miserable in his comfortless barracks. He has not the means of amusing himself or employing himself off parade. He is treated for the most part as a machine—of regular motions, of clockwork punctuality, obedient to the hand of the master. His outer life is all we care to regard—his outer life of erect carriage of steady movement, of regulation costume, of cleanliness and precision. About his inner life we think little or not at all. And therefore it is that DRUNKENNESS is the colossal vice of the army. Only think what is the soldier's home—"if home it can be called that home is none"—of the utter absence of all privacy, of all comfort of everything that can make a man rejoice that he has a roof over his head; and then say whether it is strange, that the soldier fies to the canteen or the drinking-shop, ready to coin his very life-blood for the purchase of the ever-appreciable luxury of the dram. The wonder is not that there is so much drunkenness in the army, but that there is so little. "Herding in these wretched barrack-rooms," says the writer of an article in the North British Review, "the soldier is compelled, if he would stay at home at all, to spend his time off parade. What sort of enjoyment has he? The best friend in all human probability, which he can find there is sleep; but even that is denied to him. There are a half-a-dozen men in the room talking together—boisterously you may be sure—blasphemously and indecently it is more than probable. Reading is out of the question. There is too much noise—too much practical joking going on. He is in an atmosphere of disquiet; he can do nothing. Day follows day, and still the same weariness—still the same idle efforts to kill time. All his faculties run to waste—all his moral sensibilities are blunted; the vicious are there to tempt him, and he is tempted; he finds a home in the canteen or in worse places, and in spite of the best resolutions at starting soon stumbles into the pit." Nothing can be more true than this. We may prohibit the sale of spirits in our barrack canteens, but so long as there is nothing better to be found in our barracks than in this over-true picture of barrack life, our soldiers will go in search of intoxicating liquors; and if they cannot get them from the canteen serjeant, they will get them from more unscrupulous persons, who will charge them higher and serve them worse.—Improved barrack-accommodation, with such accessories as will afford to the soldier off parade the means of healthful recreation and useful employment, may render the new canteen system sufficiently salutary—but whilst the only “comfortable cordial” permitted to the soldier is a drum, whilst the greatest luxury within his reach is temporary oblivion of his sorrows, whilst the most miserable refuge which he can find is his own over-crowded barrack-room, we may feel certain that any regulations we may pass, about the sale of liquors in barracks will be of no sort of use—will in no degree check the growth of drunkenness, and in no wise improve the condition of the soldier.”

We will not weaken the force of these excellent remarks by adding any of our own; except to remind our teetotal readers that, with all its imperfections, we may regard this new regulation as an instalment—as an acknowledgment made to the value of temperance, and as an encouragement to persevering exertions to promote a practice which we well know to be essentially connected with the social, mental, and moral elevation of all classes of the community.

INTEMPERANCE AND RAGGED SCHOOLS.

WE have been somewhere told of a farmer who year after year employed a number of labourers, at the cost of a large sum of money, in plucking up the weeds and rushes growing upon a marshy tract of land. The conditions always remaining upon which they depended for subsistence, every year they appeared again, demanding the same expenditure of money and labour. The successor of this agriculturist, by draining the land, deprived the weeds of the moisture which nourished them; they then disappeared, and gave place for a more wholesome vegetation. This is a brief history of what society has done with its moral evils. They have been suffered to grow up to great magnitude. Like the ignorant husbandman, great means have been expended to palliate their severity, or lessen their virulence. The great causes—the conditions upon which poverty, crime, and disease depend have been allowed to remain. We have no lack of charitable feeling, but it has been content to look at the surface and treat the symptoms rather than the disease. This policy has led to lamentable results. It has consisted in mere remedial agencies: means that, if employed in preventive measures would have removed much of the evil which offends the eye at every turn. A loaf and a cup of water may relieve the hungry and athirst, but in the order of nature the appetite will return. It is necessary that the Samaritan's heart should be regulated by knowledge, and that the actions of good men should be wise to secure a desirable and appropriate reward.

We are driven to this reasoning by the various attempts at education now making, more especially by our new and popular institutions, Ragged Schools. We rejoice at the establishment of such institutions. We hail every attempt to improve the people. We see in this effort a recognition of the claims of the neglected and the ill-used; an admission that wrong has been done them; and an intimation that there is a disposition to atone for the past by the conduct of the future. Ragged Schools will snatch some few from the wretched and outcast lot to which thousands in this Christian country are doomed; it will exhibit to those who have few opportunities of observation, the actual condition of the thousands who crawl from the light of day into loathsome dens, and generate in misery, recklessness, and crime; leaving a progeny still more debased to fill the workhouse and the gaol. Let us not be misapprehended. Ragged schools will not remove the festering sores afflicting the social body. They constitute another class of palliatives, less objectionable than some, as they cannot be fairly said to reproduce the very evils they seek to remove. But we must not forget in all these appliances that the true philosophy is to call out, arouse, and strengthen the responsibility of the parents. The great majority of the children sent to early toil; or left to ramble among vile associates in the street; or driven to beggary or fraud, are the offspring of intemperate parents. While this is the case we cannot see what asylums can do, but make our parents more reckless, and our children more wretched.

There are many orphans and deserted children to whom this will not apply, but we speak of the mass. We cannot see what education is to effect upon the thousands who are prowling about our streets, learning in their wretched homes the petty vices which in the world harden into daring crimes. We cannot hope any great change so long as parents are the slaves to the most selfish of all vices. Besides the education of the school, there is the education of the home; and what fruit can be expected from those homes where drunkenness riots—where one or both parents are indulging to excess, and exhibiting before their children the passions and vices which for an hour or two a-day at school they may be taught by a pious teacher to abhor? Daily familiarity with all the miseries of a drunkard's home will not only embroil the mind, but feed every evil propensity and suggest every evil thought.

We would fain recommend to the promoters of Ragged Schools considerations of this kind. What soil have they to cultivate! What obstacles oppose their success! We were about giving some extracts from the last report of the Inspector of Prisons, when arrested by the facts contained in the reports of the Ragged School Union. Scattered through these documents we have ample evidence of the effects of our drinking system. In the report of the Hopkins-street Ragged School we find it stated, “Many of these children have lost their parents, and others have been deserted by them; no small number are the offspring of parents themselves so abandoned to vicious pursuits as to be utterly indifferent to their welfare; they are growing up in ignorance both of the elements of education, and of their duties as members of society. They are ragged, dirty, and forlorn, without regular employment; they wander about, seeking by begging or thieving to supply their need.” The report of the South London Schools states:—“These schools are established in a locality usually inhabited by costermongers, scavengers, vendors of matches and other cheap commodities, who live up to the full amount of their earnings, and leave their offsprings totally neglected, suffering them to roam through the streets in filth and wretchedness.” Not to multiply extracts, we may give the following case from the second report of the Ragged School Union:—“One of the girls who had been the cause of most trouble to her teachers, was at length on the eve of being ruined by the brutal conduct of her own father. He had one daughter who was living an abandoned life, and allowing him a share of her ill-gotten gain; he insisted that the younger should do the same. She declared she would die before she would do this, and in consequence of her refusal, was severely beaten by her father and sister." These are not solitary cases. Those who are familiar with the reports of prisons, home missions, and penitentiaries, know that it is but an example of many, very many, cases of similar depravity and ruffian feeling. Mothers living upon the wages of sin of their unhappy daughters, and boys sent out to pilfer from stalls to pander to the appetites of a drunken parent.

Believing that education is one of the great remedial agencies of the time, we are admonished by the evidence of teachers and pastors—showing how the fruits of their exertions have been blasted by drinking habits—not to expect from it a corrective for all ignorance and crime. Whenever depravity has been spoken of in certain quarters, there has always been an impulse to build schools: it would be more philosophical to inquire why those already built are not filled—why those educated in Sabbath Schools are so often ensnared and ruined, becoming vicious and abandoned. The secret, is that our drinking system has never been examined in all its varieties of enticement, in all its forms of evil. We can have no hope for the young, unless the cause of their degradation is removed. It will ere long have to be met in a spirit of fair inquiry and of honest determination. Christian ministers, and others, will be shamed from the attitude of hostility they have assumed in relation to the temperance cause.

There are weighty considerations inviting us. If we go into the bye-ways and alleys of London we see crowds of vagrant children—the "seed-plot of all the crime of the metropolis." It is not only that 30,000 of these Arabs of the metropolis are prowling about, but they possess a power of reproduction. They are the fathers and mothers of another generation. Deteriorated physically and morally, they transmit the consequences of their vices to posterity; however low and debased, the brute instincts remain. We may point to the gin-shops flourishing in the midst of this demoralized population, as one of the great causes of the degradation perpetuated from father to children, and increasing as it descends. But houses for the sale of drink are the mere fruits of the drinking system. We cannot hope to see them materially reduced in number, so long as strong drink is used as an article of diet, and a symbol of hospitality by the good, the pious, and the wise. If the minister deems a glass of wine necessary to recruit his energies after an evening sermon, surely he cannot reprove the washerwoman for refreshing herself with a glass of gin. Our lectures against excess are worse than useless so long as we countenance the use. We cannot hope our reproof of the drunkard to have the desired effect if it is administered with the odour of strong drink upon the breath. It is high time for reflection—for effort. We are surrounded by many evils threatening the peace and repose of society. None are more inveterate or more malignant than those arising from our drinking habits. This fearful barrier to education, to prosperity, to advancement—this mighty agent of evil, must meet with attention before long. The discussion cannot be delayed but at great risk.—Standard of Freedom.

THE CHOLERA.

The gentlemen appointed by the Poor Law Commissioners to examine the condition of the London Poor Houses, have made the following suggestions in reference to the anticipated arrival of the cholera:—1. We would urge the necessity, in all cases of cholera, of an instant recourse to medical aid, and also under every form and variety of indisposition; for during the prevalence of this epidemic, all disorders are found to merge in the dominant disease.—2. Let immediate relief be sought under disorder of the bowels especially, however slight.—3. The invasion of cholera may thus be readily and at once prevented. Let every impurity, animal and vegetable, be quickly removed from the habitations; such as slaughter houses, pigsties, cesspools, necessaries, and all other domestic nuisances.—4. Let all uncovered drains be carefully and frequently cleansed.—5. Let the grounds in and around the habitations be drained, so as effectually to carry off moisture of every kind.—6. Let all partitions be removed from within and without habitations, which unnecessarily impede ventilation.—7. Let every room be daily thrown open for the admission of fresh air; and this should be done about noon, when the atmosphere is most likely to be dry.—8. Let dry scrubbing be used in domestic cleansing, in place of water cleaning.—9. Let excessive fatigue and exposure to damp and cold, especially during the night be avoided.—10. Let the use of cold drinks and acid liquors, especially under fatigue, be avoided, or when the body is heated.—11. Let the use of cold acid fruits and vegetables be avoided.—12. Let the use of ardent and fermented liquors, and tobacco, be avoided.—13. Let a poor diet, and the use of impure water in cooking be avoided.—14. Let the wearing of wet and insufficient clothing be avoided.—15. Let a flannel or woollen belt be worn round the belly. [This has been found serviceable in checking the tendency to bowel complaint so common during the prevalence of cholera. The disease has, in this country, been always found to commence with a looseness in the bowels, and in this stage is very tractable. It should, however, be noticed that the looseness is frequently unattended by pain or uneasiness, and fatal delay has often occurred from the notion that cholera must be attended by cramps. In the earlier stage here referred to, there is often no gripping or cramp, and it is at this period that the disease can be most easily arrested.]—16. Let personal cleanliness be carefully observed.—17. Let every cause tending to depress the moral and physical energies be carefully avoided; let exposure to extremes of heat and cold be avoided.—18. Let crowding of persons within houses and apartments be avoided.—19. Let sleeping in low and damp rooms be avoided.—20. Let fires be kept up during the night in sleeping or adjoining apartments, the night being the period of most danger from attack, especially under exposure to cold or damp.—21. Let all bedding and clothing be daily exposed during winter and spring to the fire, and in summer to the heat of the sun.—22. Let the dead be buried in places remote from the habitations of the living.—By the timely adoption of simple means such as these, cholera or any other epidemic will be made to lose its venom; so true is it that "internal sanitary arrangements, and not quarantine and sanitary lines, are the safeguards of nations."

[It may be well to add, that the disease, when least prevalent in England according to the experience of Dr. Elliston, was very fatal amongst spirit-drinkers; and it is now a well-known fact, that that portion of the lower orders who had everything calculated to keep them in good health, but who indulged in spirit-drinking, were sure to suffer; and, however well persons may be off, if they enfeeble their bodies by dissipation, they are rendered increasingly liable to attacks of cholera.]

A TEETOTAL TOUR.

I HAVE completed a tour through Staffordshire, Nottinghamshire, and localities; the special object for which I visited those counties were—first, to deliver lectures on the great truths of our hallowed cause; and, secondly, to investigate the condition of the working classes. This has been accomplished; the statistical returns I received from various towns is truly astonishing. In the town of Leicester, from a population of 60,000, there are 12,000 out-of-door paupers, at the same time the poor-rates, &c., were 16s. 6d. in the pound. The average amount of wages is from 4s. 3d. to 5s. 9d. per week, and the amount expended for strong drink is £1400 per week.

Birmingham, the workshop of England, spends its £200,000 annually, in strong drink. In the week ending 5th August, 1848, the number of paupers in the workshop was 67, and the number of out-door paupers 8373; in that week £566 were paid for out-door relief.

The miners of Bilston spend £50,000 annually, in strong drink, and the statistics of this evil are increasing. Meetings have been held in the various localities, for the purpose of demonstrating the value and efficiency of total abstinence from strong drinks to the working classes. One of these meetings was held in Birmingham, and was addressed by myself. At the close of the meeting, 63 persons signed the pledge. In addition to these meetings, the press gives forth its encouragement, and successful efforts are making to pull down the strong holds of the drinking system.

Working classes of Great Britain! the cause is yours; arm yourselves with it, and the world will confess that you are irresistible. All the courage, all the perseverance, all the skill and energy which have reflected lustre on Great Britain, and made her the Queen of nations and the wonder of the world, is owing to the development of virtues and abilities, kindred to those which lie dormant or subdued in yourselves. There are in you the resources of mighty intellect, the untried powers of great energy and expansive vigour, which, when unfettered, can display amazing elasticity; yet they are bound in comparative feebleness, by causes completely under your own control, but which have had their strength considerably augmented by the insidious influence of strong drink. Whilst others in their day of philanthropic enterprise are zealously striving for your improvement and happiness, BESTIR YOURSELVES. Repudiate your archfoe. Hail the principle of total abstinence, as the essential preparative and accompaniment of your onward work; and with all your energy and zeal rest assured that the world shall see that it is associated with your physical, social, moral, and religious elevation.

CHARLES EDEVAIN.

STRIKING CONTRAST.—He that produces a bushel of grain adds something to the means of human life, and confers a blessing on his race, while he who converts this grain into alcohol, to be drunk, becomes an efficient coadjutor of the enemy of all goodness.

A TAVERN is a true picture of human infirmity; in history we find only one side of the age exhibited to our view; but in the account of a tavern we see every age equally absurd and equally vicious.—Goldsmith.

NOVEL MOTIVE FOR MARRYING.—An old toper was overheard, the other day, advising a youngster to get married, "because then, my boy," said he, "you'll have somebody to pull off your boots for you when you go home drunk."

"THE WORST FRIEND TO HIMSELF, POOR FELLOW."

So we have often heard it said of the drunkard, "the worst friend to himself," said a little boy one day (after he had seen his father come into the house drunk.) "Mother, they say father is the worst friend to himself; and he comes in drunk, breaks all the tea things, upsets the table, strikes at you, and knocks me down, when we were not saying a single word—WORST FRIEND TO HIMSELF, INDEED!"

Those who use such language in reference to the drunkard, either willingly or ignorantly, lose sight of some very important facts. How frequently does it happen that drunkards bring misery, wretchedness and ruin, not only on themselves, but on their wives and children! The industrious tradesman is frequently a serious sufferer by the intemperance of his customers. Look at those living pictures by Cruickshanks, ("The Bottle," and "The Sequel,") and then surely no one will say, "he is the worst friend to himself, poor fellow."

W. LUNDIE.

Northallerton, Sept. 1848.

EASY WAY OF GAINING OR LOSING FIVE YEARS OF LIFE.—Early rising has been often extolled, and extolled in vain; for people think that an hour's additional sleep is very comfortable, and can make very little difference after all. But an hour gained or wasted every day, makes a great difference in the length of our lives, which we may see by a very simple calculation. First, we will say that the average of mankind spend sixteen hours of every twenty-four awake and employed, and eight in bed. Now, each year having 365 days, if a diligent person abstract from sleep one hour daily, he lengthens his year 365 hours or twenty-three days of sixteen hours each, the length of a waking day, which is what we call a day in these calculations. We will take a period of forty years, and see how it may be decreased or added to by sloth or energy. A person sleeping eight hours a day has his full average of 365 days in the year, and may therefore be said to enjoy complete his 40 years. Let him take nine hours' sleep and his year has but 342 days, so that he lives only 37½ years; with ten hours in bed, he has 319 days, and his life is 35. In like manner if the sleep is limited to seven hours, our year has 388 days, and, instead of 40, we live 42½; and if six hours is our allowance of slumber, we have 411 days in the year, and live 45. By this we see that in 40 years, two hours daily occasion either a loss or gain of five years! How much might be done in this space! What would we not give at the close of life for another lease of five years! And how bitter the reflection would be at such a time, if we reflected at all, that we had wilfully given up this portion of our existence merely that we might lie a little longer in bed in the morning!—Chambers' Journal.

SUNDAY SCHOLARS BECOME DRUNKARDS.—A teacher states that a short time ago he visited York Castle, and in one of the wards he met with fourteen young convicts. He found that no fewer than thirteen out of the fourteen had been Sunday scholars; and ten of them stated that it was under the influence of intoxicating drink that they had been led to commit the crimes which had brought them there!

AGAIN.—In a report lately read at a meeting of the Total Abstinence Society in a Sabbath-school at Pilkington, near Manchester, it was stated that one of the committee, anxious to know how far intemperance had already gone in the school, selected eight scripture classes, containing eighty-one boys, when he found that every third boy had been drunk!—Sunday School Magazine.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

MEETINGS OF CONSIDERABLE INTEREST have recently been held in various parts of the Metropolis and suburbs. The attendance at some of these has been large; and we are pleased to find that several committees are on the alert, and seemed prepared to carry on the winter campaign against intemperance with vigour and energy. Drs. Carr and Gourley, and the Hon. Judge Marshall have rendered valuable assistance. A new society, called the "London Temperance League," has been formed, and of its first public meeting a report, of as great length as our space allowed, is given underneath. In addition to the societies which are regularly organized, we are constantly meeting with practical abstainers who do not, for reasons best known to themselves, unite with any society.

The first public meeting of a new Association, the London Temperance League, was held in the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street, Monday evening, Sept. 18. The Hall was crowded. In the absence of LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.P., who had been announced, the chair was occupied by D. GOURLEY, Esq., M.D., of Birmingham.

The Secretary read a brief statement of the object of the Association, namely, to promote the cause of teetotalism in the metropolis, by means of lectures, public meetings, &c.

MR. J. ANDREWS, of Leeds, said that the conviction formed in his mind fourteen years ago as to the evils resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks, still existed in all their force, and were confirmed more and more by every day's observation and experience. The earlier advocates of the total abstinence principle had to contend against ancient notions, long cherished opinions, and established customs; while those whom they had hoped would be foremost in their favour, either regarded them with apathy, or placed difficulties in their way. Such conduct could only be accounted for from the force of custom and prejudice, and the want of due examination. And that was the great secret of the dislike to the total abstinence principle which prevailed throughout all classes of the community. Habits were insensibly formed, and there they grew, till that which was at first hated came to be admired and cherished. Hence the importance of care on the part of those who had the guidance of youth. But so much light had been shed upon the subjects of the drinking usages of this country since the question was first mooted, that he had now no hesitation in pronouncing those usages immoral and sinful. Intemperance was a fearful evil. It rested as an incubus on the commerce of the country—debased the mental and moral powers of thousands—blighted genius—rendered home a hell upon earth—entered even the sanctuary and took victims from the pulpit and the church. The drinking customs stood also in the way of almost all usefulness. It was painful to see so many temples erected to Bacchus in the metropolis, and so many snares set to entrap the weak and unwary. Still, however, the advocates of the total abstinence principle did not despond. It was necessary still to sound the tocsin of alarm, and to sound it more loudly than they had ever yet done. Let a vigorous and united effort be made, and final success was certain.

MR. R. GRAY MASON remarked, that "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," was at once the philosophy and the philanthropy of the total abstinence movement. He knew that strong drink would injure him—that God never yet made a human stomach capable of receiving them into it without mischief—that they injured the whole man—that the custom of using them was insidious as it was unsafe;—that, therefore, he did not use them himself; and, for the same reasons he refused to give them to others, and was anxious to dissuade all persons from any use of them. He had himself abstained from them for nearly twelve years; and though his labours were constant and arduous, he had been well able to perform them. Mr. Mason furnished several pleasing instances of good which had resulted to individuals and families from the adoption of the total abstinence practice, and exhorted all present to exert themselves for the promotion of that excellent system. He believed that there was vigour enough in that room, to leave the whole of London with their principles, if it were but properly diffused. If they refused to aim at rescuing the drunkard from the destruction to which he was hastening, might not his blood be required at their hands. Christians ought to be zealously employed in that work, but if they refused it would be done without them.

MR. CLAPP, from America, adverted to an objection frequently urged against teetotalism, namely, that the majority of its advocates greatly overrated it. They might, he admitted, sometimes overrate the number of drunkards and the number of the reclaimed—they might do this unwittingly), but as to the real nature, probability, and beneficial results of the system generally, it was impossible to overrate, or even give a just idea of them. It was objected, too, that teetotalism was put in the place of Christianity—and that if a person were reclaimed from habits of intemperance, it was the same thing in the estimation of teetotalers, as if he were not only transformed but transfigured. Now he declared that he had never heard any such statement made by the advocates of teetotalism, nor had he ever read a line to that effect in any temperance publication. But he had often heard, and he believed, that inasmuch as temperance was a virtue, it was a part of Christianity; and that if any man took it away from his christianity, it would go far to render his profession null and void. Such objectors seemed strangely to forget that self-denial, and self-denial for the good of others, was a leading principle of Christianity. The danger in the present day was not of too much self-denial, but of too much self-indulgence. It was also said that there was none of the learning of the country on the side of total abstinence; true, they had neither Oxford nor Cambridge on their side; they had few bishops or archbishops, and but Lord Mayors; but still they were destitute of learned men in their body. Persons who made such objections sometimes intimated their intention of joining the society at some future period. But when? perhaps in the period of the millennium, when the evil of intemperance, as well as other evils, would cease from the earth. In plain English, they would join the society when their presence and their assistance were no longer needed. They should recollect that dead bodies could go with the current, while those that had life and energy could alone go against it. To sail with wind and tide required little effort; but a skilful mariner would guide his vessel as to proceed against both. Let them keep their eye steadily fixed on the star which would guide them into the harbour of safety. Mr. Clapp assured the audience that the cause was advancing in America, and there was a growing disposition among the more respectable classes to give the temperance movement countenance and support. On the occasion of a festival recently given in Boston, after the funeral of the lamented John Quincy Adams, the Mayor of the city refused to preside if intoxicating drinks were introduced. He was happy to find that, by a curious coincidence, the Mayor of Boston, in England, (Mr. J. Noble) did a similar thing. Thus the two cities shook hands, as it were, across the Atlantic. The cause was progressing, and if carried on in the spirit of truth and love, it would be successful.

MR. F. GROSJEAN, of London, urged the great importance of engaging females, in the movement; as if the Society succeeded to obtain their co-operation the cause could hardly fail of success. He was not aware of the exact course intended to be pursued by the Committee, but he suggested that the best mode of advocating the cause would be to engage the attention of the young, and to indoctrinate them in the principles of the system. For that purpose schools should be visited, both Day, Sunday and Ragged Schools. He was far from being indifferent to the reclamations of drunkards, and believed that they would, in general, prove the best advocates. He thought that Societies were generally too anxious to get rich men at their Committees, to the neglect of working men, who were most likely to push the cause forward. However there was plenty of work for persons of all classes; and if they advocated the cause with simplicity and in love, success would surely attend them.

Mr. Mc. CURRIE stated that he had been a teetotaler for nearly eleven years, and had been raised by the system from the lowest state of degradation, poverty, and misery to circumstances of comfort, respectability and usefulness. The cause of total abstinence was therefore very dear to his heart, and he regretted that there was so much apathy among teetotalers, and that so few meetings to promote it were held in the metropolis.

The terms in which Mr. Mc. Currie stated his regret gave occasion to some murmurs from a few individuals present, and caused some confusion. This was renewed at the close of the meeting, the several disputants stoutly maintaining their own opinions.

The Rev. H. ROBINSON, of Hackney, said that he had been an abstainer for upwards of eight years. He had read the pages of creation, of Providence, and of revelation, in reference to the use of intoxicating beverages; and he found that their United testimony amounted to this,—that the manufacture, the sale, and the use—any use—of them was an immorality and a sin! He deeply regretted the sanction given to the drinking customs by the world, but more deeply still did he regret the sanction given to those customs by the professing Christian world. He had prayed, with many tears, to have a remedy revealed to him that would lay the axe to the root of the evil, and the answer to his prayers was, that remedy is total abstinence. And that answer at the same time revealed to him his duty, namely, to have no fellowship with the evil but to reprove it. Hence he had expelled it from his house, and from his vestry; he had refused his pulpit to any who used it; he had resigned the pastoral care of a church that had in it members who used it; and he refused to give the right hand of fellowship to any man, be he who he might, who used it. He had joined that league, because he confidently believed such to be its principles, and because he believed they would give the right hand of fellowship to men who had the moral courage to denounce the using of strong drinks as an immorality and a sin. While they did so, they should have his services and his prayers.

Mr. CULVERWELL, said that, without committing himself or the Society to all that had been advanced by Mr. Robinson, it must be manifest to all observers, that a far more efficient and energetic system of advocacy than had of late prevailed was necessary for the metropolis, and for that purpose the league was called into existence.

Mr. CLARIDGE expressed himself strongly, in opposition to some statements made by Mr. Currie, and other speakers, as did also Messrs. Reidall and Hart. Mr. Sims explained, and others were about to speak, when the chairman declared the meeting at an end. Several donations and subscriptions were announced.

HUDDERSFIELD.

The Huddersfield Temperance Society commenced their fifteenth anniversary on Sunday, Sept. 10th, 1848, with a public prayer meeting, in the Philosophical Hall, at eight o'clock, p. m., when the Rev. Richard Skinner, Minister of the Independent Church, Ramsden-street, presided. Sept. 11th,—A public temperance meeting was held in the same place at seven o'clock, p. m.

SAMUEL BOOTH, Esq., Surgeon, presided. He said, that he was in principle and practice a teetotaler, and had been happier and more vigorous since he adopted the principle. As a medical man, he had witnessed many cases of disease, poverty, misery, and even sudden death, from the indulgence of intoxicating drinks. He said, that the object of this Philanthropic Institution was to reclaim the poor drunkard, and to help him to get back his position in Society; and not only so, but to lead him to reflection, and to Jesus Christ, the Saviour of Sinners. Many cases of reformation had occurred. He then read the following extracts from a letter received from the Rev. J. Caughey, of America:—

"We must not merely stand on the defensive, and in this attitude allow our fellowmen to perish. Aggression should be the motto of all temperance men. This will require time, labour, and money; but if our savings from teetotalism are what we boast, we can well afford these. Temperance publications must be liberally sustained. Lectures must be employed and paid. Public meetings held also, and no expense spared to render them attractive. Temperance men must put on a formidable front, open and disclosed to the world. "Total extermination of all drinks employed by the devil to make drunkards," should be written on our banners in letters of flame. We cannot cope with this invidious and powerful enemy without this sort of public demonstration. Hostility to this dreadful foe of man must be public, as the influence of alcoholic drinks is extensive and ruinous. The narrow and selfish policy of an income in time of sickness must not be the only ruling principle of temperance effort. We must "look aloft." "Thou God seest me." We must look around and abroad upon our fellow men, and upon the havoc occasioned by this monster of monsters. We must sympathize with the peril of those who are exposed, and yearn over the victims of its power. The living coals of eternal truth must be thrown into the palaces of death—those human butcheries, and scattered over the character and conscience of every death-dealer in our land. There should be no rest given to our temperance troops till every dealer in intoxicating liquors is stripped of the last particle of influence and respect in the community. The trade must be dishonoured, and held in universal execration. Over the mouth of him who sips the intoxicating beverages, be he minister or what he may, public sentiment must be made to write what the turnpike man wrote over his gate, "NO TRUST." This is the terrible and scorching commission of the temperance cause against all evil doers. The evil must cease. The doom of alcohol has issued from the throne of God, for man must be saved, and this is one of the greatest impediments to his salvation. This is not the time for our temperance troops to go into winter quarters. We should be "during war men," or during life men in this noble cause of humanity. The temperance banners must float on the breezes of heaven, in the open field of conflict, till every man, woman, and child of the entire population is brought to rally around the standard of teetotalism. I am sorry, that I did not give more of my energies to this cause while in England; but what is past cannot be recalled."

It gives me, continued Mr. Booth, great pleasure, as a Wesleyan Methodist, in being able to give to this meeting the sentiments of the Wesleyan Conference on the temperance question; also the views of the American Methodist Episcopal Church to the British Conference. The address of the Methodist Episcopal American Church says to the Wesleyan Conference, "We have been gratified to observe that the cause of temperance on the principle of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors is attracting attention in England, and we respectfully ask your attention to it, and your kind consideration of it, as intimately connected with the best interest of society in general, and greatly conducive to the success of the Gospel. Such is our experience in America, particularly when the Church enters heartily into the cause." Many temperance addresses were presented to the Wesleyan Conference during their sitting in Hull, to all of which, respectful answers were officially returned. He gave the answer to the Hull Wesleyan Total Abstinence Society as a specimen of the whole.

"Dear Brethren,—We have received an address from the members of the Hull Wesleyan Total Abstinence Society, signed by yourselves and other officers of that society, and have given it an attentive consideration.

"In reply thereto, we beg to say that, we have always felt, and do still feel, a deep interest as ministers and pastors of the Church of Christ, in the vigorous application and successful results of all scriptural efforts to reclaim the victims of intemperance from their sin, and its consequent miseries, as well as to prevent others from falling into the destructive snare of Satan; and indulge hopes that all such efforts may be crowned with increasing proofs of the divine co-operation and blessing.

We are, dear brethren, on behalf of the Conference,
Yours, faithfully,

ROBERT NEWTON, President.
JOSEPH FOWLER, Secretary.

This address is a move in the right direction, our motto is "Onwards, onwards." He said, he hoped the time would soon come when every Methodist in the land would be a teetotaler. For the furtherance of this object a branch of the Wesleyan Total Abstinence Society was formed in Huddersfield, in July 1848, and he had to state that they had enrolled 68 members.

Rev. C. H. Bateman, Independent Minister, of Hopton, addressed the meeting in a pleasing manner, which gained the attention of the audience.

Mr. Isaac Marsden, Methodist Local Preacher, from Doncaster, gave some interesting cases of reclaimed drunkards, that he had met with in his journeyings.

Mr. T. Thompson, of Leeds, (one of the agents of the British Association for the promotion of Temperance,) in a very effective manner, showed the necessity of union in this noble cause; he compared the doings of strong drink, and the doings of total abstinence; it told well on the audience, and had a very practical effect.

On Tuesday evening, Sept. 12, a Public Temperance Meeting was held in the Philosophical Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. Thos. Firth, Jun., of Huddersfield, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Jabez Inwards, of London, in a powerful speech—also by Mr. T. B. Thompson, of Leeds.

On Wednesday evening, Sept. 13th, another Public Temperance Meeting was held in the Philosophical Hall. Benj. Wilson, Esq., of Mirfield, occupied the chair.—He stated that he had been a Teetotaler for 8 years, and had been much benefited by it. Mr. Jabez Inwards, of London, addressed the Meeting with great effect.

Mr. Edward Grubb, from Preston, delivered an address which was conclusive in argument and full of wit and good humour.

On Thursday, Sept. 14th, a Public Tea Party was held in the Philosophical Hall, at which 5 or 600 took tea together, the entertainment was provided gratuitously by the ladies—after which the Annual Meeting of the Huddersfield Temperance Society was held, the Rev. Rich. Skinner, Independent Minister presided. The report for the last year was read by Mr. Thomas Dawson, Secretary. Several hundred essays adopted to particular classes, viz. Ministers, Sabbath School Teachers, Manufacturers and Vendors of Intoxicating drinks had been disposed of during the year.

The Wesleyan Union of Total Abstiners was formed in the vestry of Queen Street Chapel, on the 29th day of July 1848.—The object of the union, was to obtain the active co-operation of those Wesleyans who recognise the principles of Total Abstinence, as a powerful Auxiliary to the gospel.

A Congregational Society had also been formed in connexion with Ramson Street Chapel, the numbers who had taken the pledge amounted to 400 during the year.

The present total is about 2,550, after allowing a considerable number for those who, through the power of temptation, or the force of habit, have cowardlike deserted their colours. About 233 acknowledge themselves to have been under the bondage of strong drink, and are now released from that heavy yoke, and constitute the trophies of the society. The society has six pledged ministers. The indirect consequences of total abstinence were incalculable.

Various resolutions were moved and seconded by Messrs. Grubb, Firth, Jun., Walmsley, Rev. George Lamb, Joseph Lees, Rev. Wm. Leigh, and Eli Stolt.

The crowds that attended each evening, and more especially at the annual Meeting, showed that the Temperance Society was gaining ground on the public mind. The numbers who enrolled themselves among the temperance ranks were from fifty to sixty.

*.* Our limits have compelled us considerably to abridge a very interesting report.

KENDAL.

The Juvenile Temperance Society in this Town continues to prosper. A meeting was held last month in the Independent Chapel School room, New Street. The Room was crowded to excess. Mr. John Foster addressed the children on the Temperance Cause, after which they sung that beautiful Reclaimed Drunkard's Song, entitled, "In the days we went to sign the pledge, a long time ago." After which Mr. Wilson and Mr. Earl, and Mr. Thomas Whittaker, from London, addressed the Meeting, and created the liveliest impression. At the close 31 signed the pledge.

T. J. EARL, Secretary.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

INTEMPERANCE THE PESTILENCE OF THE AGE; and the duties of the Christian Citizen of the world in the midst of this pestilence. London: C. Gilpin.

This valuable tract is written by the Secretary of the Carlisle Temperance Society. It contains a compendious summary of the evils resulting from the use of strong drinks—and of the insidious manner in which the "pestilence" spreads throughout all classes of the community. The responsibility of the "Christian citizens of the world, are pointed out with great fidelity, as well as the mischievous tendency of "moderate drinking." The principle of total abstinence is recommended and urged, in terms of more than usual eloquence, as "the only means for the social regeneration of the world, and the intellectual advancement of humanity"—"as involving the acceleration of Christianity, and the extension of the kingdom of Christ in the world"—and "as evolving the germ of that universal Brotherhood, which will one day, we trust, be acknowledged by the races of humanity, and promote peace on earth, good will to men!" We earnestly desire for this excellent pamphlet a very wide circulation.

AN APPEAL TO THE PIOUS IN FAVOUR OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE. By R. TABRAHAM. London: Houlston and Stobeman.

The pious author in this appeal insists that "love to man is a powerful motive to abstain from the use—gift—sale, and manufacture of all kinds of intoxicating drinks." Though, as a Wesleyan Minister, he has addressed himself more particularly to the members of his own community, his appeal is equally forcible in reference to every professor of the christian religion. We rejoice to find that this excellent tract has reached the tenth thousand, because we can hardly suppose that it can have circulated so extensively without doing much good. We desire on this occasion to express our deep sympathy with our respected friend in the painful and repeated domestic bereavements by which he has been visited.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS FATAL TO
"EARNESTNESS" IN RELIGION.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

LOUD and DEEP, for some time past, have been the complaints uttered respecting the state of RELIGION in our country. For notwithstanding all our advantages for spreading the gospel, the relative proportion of the church to the world is actually decreasing every year. We have fewer conversions than births in England, and if other lands were included, the amazing increase of the kingdom of Satan must be truly appalling. Numerically considered, the empire of the prince of darkness, even in Britain, is much greater this year than it was last. We are therefore, not only, not maintaining our standing, but comparatively going back. I need not say, that every child born is converted, or unconverted, and consequently, if the spiritual births do not keep pace with the physical, then the dominion of CHRIST, as far as numbers are concerned, is annually weaker, and the kingdom of the old serpent, stronger. Some of our denominations are losing ground, and their last census proclaims an alarming diminution of members. ROBERT OWEN, and other persons opposed to the religion of Jesus Christ, must greatly exult at this intelligence; and surely it becomes every christian to inquire, "Is there not a cause?"

We know that there is no want of conversions from any defect in the gospel. Nothing could be more adapted for this end than evangelical truth. "All scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, and thoroughly furnished to every good work." And the Divine Psalmist has told us, that, "The law of the Lord is perfect converting the soul." Who can look at the scheme of salvation with attention, without having the conviction that a plan more adapted to renovate the world cannot be conceived. The commands, the threatenings, the invitations, the examples, the promises of scripture, if heeded, must transform man into the image of his Creator, and make him holy, benevolent, and happy. So perfect is the gospel, that no individual has ever as yet opposed it. The man is not born, and we believe it might be affirmed, that the man never will be born, who will be bold enough to say one word against it. Neither Voltaire, Gibbon, nor Hume, understood it. What they rejected was a vile caricature of christianity, which they were perfectly justified in denouncing. How far the Church is guilty in not making its heavenly doctrines so plain as that no enemy shall be able to mistake them, I will not stay to determine; but I do believe that the clear apprehension of what the gospel really is, would overpower the unbelief of the most inveterate sceptic. There is,—we all admit,—no want of adaptation to convert souls in the plan of salvation revealed in the scriptures; and yet, awful to tell, our conversions do not keep pace with the increase of population.

We know further, that our heavenly Father wishes the conversion of souls. He has sworn by himself, that he has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked that he should die." The Lord Jesus came from heaven to die in the stead of the guilty, and therefore he must feel deeply interested in their salvation. The Holy Spirit also strives with men, and God has promised to pour his Spirit upon all flesh. The Angels, too, take a deep interest in the conversion of souls, for, there is joy in the presence of the Angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. We have then all the facilities, aids, and sympathies that we can ask or require to render our churches numerically and spiritually prosperous; and, consequently, if we do not succeed, the cause is to be found solely and exclusively in the religious people of these realms, and ought to occasion "great searchings of heart."

Mr. JAMES, of Birmingham, in his volume entitled "The Earnest Church," has entered largely into this subject. In his chapter on "The causes that repress earnestness in religion," he has enumerated several: such as "Easy access to Church Fellowship;" "Mixed Marriages;" "The taste for Amusement;" "The Spirit of Trade;" "Political Excitement;" &c., &c. Doubtless there will be a diversity of opinion as to the weight that may be legitimately attached to any, or all of these influences: but many of our friends have been pained that the use of intoxicating liquors has not been mentioned with more prominence and emphasis. 'Tis true we have a foot note on this subject, page 198. Still we are deeply impressed that this bane of our churches ought to have had much more of Mr. James' eloquence. The use of intoxicating liquors by the members of christian communities, and their indifference or active opposition to Temperance Movements, are among the most crying evils of the day, and must be most offensive to the King of kings.

I. THE PHYSICAL EFFECT OF THESE DRINKS IS MOST BANEFUL.—The tale of the ills of what is called "moderation" has not yet been told. We have heard much of the sad influence of these liquors on drunkards; and the facts are tremendous, but we are convinced, that if all the sad consequences of these poisons upon the health and usefulness of our friends who call themselves moderate, were to be faithfully narrated, they would very far surpass any thing that has yet been recorded concerning the intemperate. We grant that the vice here may not appear so gross, or disgusting, but, on that very account, the cup is more extensively destructive. He who gives politeness or respectability to a crime, does ten thousand times more for its propagation, than all the more scandalous, or depraved offenders. Even Satan likes respectable sinners; and propriety, order, and regularity in iniquity. It works far more for his empire than boisterous or gross ungodliness. The tankard in the hand of a saint or a minister of religion, can do far more mischief than in the hands of a hundred abandoned drunkards. But the example is not all. We have a large portion of talent that ought to be consecrated to the cross, paralysed by these poisons. All mental and muscular strength depends upon the nerves, and he who takes stimulants, labors hard to impair both. The nerves of a man who drinks beer, wine, or spirits, are never healthful. He knows this from woeful experience, hence he cannot get on without his accustomed draught or drain. That sense of exhaustion is an awful proof that the poison has taken effect. That tremulous hand, that swimming of the head, that ringing in the ears, that irritable temper, and impatient spirit, are all symptoms that the nerves and brain have been subject to foul play. Then those head-aches, those bilious attacks, liver diseases, heart palpitations, irregular pulsations, flatulent and spasmodic seizures, that dryness of the tongue—are sad demonstrations that the laws of nature have been violated. And what is worse, the dæmon that has done all this mischief is become the greatest favorite the poor victim has, and every thing is sacrificed to his caprice! How many of our professors, solely from the moderate indulgence in strong drinks, have either curtailed more than half their usefulness, or rendered themselves of little worth to the cause of God. Many of them cannot become earnest men and women in the cause of God, their health is so completely undermined, their nerves and brain so shaken; their mind and muscles so smitten that they can do little to obey the injunctions of their Lord, to seek the prosperity of Zion, or the salvation of the world. Our friends may write the most eloquent books, or an angel from heaven might address us in seraphic accents, but these people could not be moved. The nerves of the Church are too much shaken by stimulants to allow it to come up to Mr. James' idea of "earnestness." They are prematurely ill and aged. The wrinkles of eighty years sit on their brows at forty, and in these precocious decays of nature, which they have labored hard to produce, they find an excuse for the indolence in which they indulge.

This is a view not often taken of the subject; but there is not a physiologist in the Country who will not agree with us, that mental and muscular power depend on the nerves and brain, and that stimulants must in the end weaken these important organs of the human constitution. Whatever power is borrowed by intoxicating liquor has to be refunded with a fearful rate of interest. The prodigal who, for years, will have to pay the usurer 50 or 60 per cent for the sums that he is now wasting on his pleasures, is lightly mulcted, compared with the man who obtains mental or physical power from the bottle or the tankard. The havoc among our professors and ministers of religion from this source are frightful. Men and women with the talents of Seraphs, are actually laid by, or carried to a premature grave, in consequence of the moderate glass. There was a period when these errors might be called "sins of ignorance," and "the times of this ignorance," God looked over, but now "he commands all men everywhere to repent." To talk about "earnestness" in religion, or to pray for the conversion of the world, when we waste our wealth on a poison that impairs our physical and moral power, is a crime which will no longer pass unheeded by the King of kings. Nor will there be an extensive outpouring of the SPIRIT, until we prove by our self-denial and activity that we are ready to be energetic agents of such a divine impulse. The people that said, "God be merciful to us, and bless us, and cause his face to shine upon us;" could add, "that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations." They were ready to be missionaries, to make any sacrifice for the salvation of the world, and did not ask for grace under false pretences. God will not pour out his SPIRIT upon drones. We must stir up the gift of God that is in us, and show that we are ready to work, aye, and that we are at work, before we can expect copious showers of grace. "DENY THYSELF," is the first step in religion; and he who will not obey this divine injunction, especially when a bleeding perishing world calls upon him to do so, will never have that power from above which will make him "earnest" in working out his own salvation or the salvation of others.

II. The drinking habits of the members of our churches are not only fatal to the health and vigor of thousands, but they have a MOST BANEFUL INFLUENCE ON THE FULL DEVELOPMENT OF THEIR RELIGION.—What weakens the nerves, as all stimulants do, must affect the intellectual power. I shall here be told of Sheridan, and others, who, by means of stimulants, performed extraordinary feats of mental prowess; or of students, who by such unnatural means carried all the literary prizes. In every case the result has been most unhappy. He that borrows talent from the bottle, or any other material excitant, can lay little claim to original mental vigor, and goes the readiest way to impair that which he has. No one will boast of the intellectual power of our day. "*Novels or fictions are sought with avidity; flimsy, sentimental preaching is the most popular; for "short," "simple" sermons there is a large demand. Profound books, or discourses will not do. We have not an age of mind sufficiently strong to hear them. And then, further, the temper of the age is irritable, and not a little of the charity of which we hear so much is demanded, because hundreds have neither argument nor good humour enough to meet an opponent, and calmly discuss a point on which they may differ. The nerves of the nation, the nerves of the Church, are shaken by stimulants, and we shall never have greater "earnestness" in religion until we have deeper thought, and this cannot be anticipated until we have brains and minds freed from the baneful influence of unnatural stimulants. All souls are of the same material; aye and our bodies also are similarly formed. "There is one kind of flesh of men." God has "made of one blood, all nations of men." All spirits came from above, and are of the same ethereal substance, and therefore the men and women of this age, if we consider their advantages, ought to be more vigorous in body and more robust in mind than those of the preceding age. But instead of this, we are weaker. Every one is ill. Nearly all take medicine, or "dinner pills." Physic is looked upon by myriads as almost as essential as food. Indeed the two go together. And then in mind we are still worse. The profound works of the profound thinkers of former years are superseded by modern tales and romance. How few have read through that simplest and sublimest of all books, the Bible, and fewer still have studied it. Namby-Pambyism is the most popular ism of the age, both in literature, politics, and religion. And all this may be traced to stimulants shaking the nerves, and weakening the mind.*

Nor is there the least hope of a change until we abandon the use of these deleterious drinks. "Earnestness" can only arise from deep thought. Before we can put it forth we must feel "the powers of the world to come." Doubtless the name is "LEGION" that now preys upon the piety of the Church; but among this mighty host of evil spirits there is none so extensively destructive as STRONG DRINK. Nor do we believe that any great revival of religion will take place among us, until christian professors shall resolve to abandon a drink which is so extensively fatal.

We have many other facts to advance on this point, but we shall preserve them for our next article. We shall show their effects in producing levity or stupidity, and thus hindering conversion: Their influence in raising up a new generation of drinkers and drunkards, and leading to backsliding on so large a scale: The guilt involved in wasting so much food and wealth, and in so extensively encouraging sabbath breaking, and, in fact, in keeping among us an evil which is burying so many in ruin here and hereafter.

CAN CHURCHES BE IN "EARNEST," SO LONG AS THEY ENCOURAGE SO FOUL A DESOLATOR OF ZION AND THE WORLD?

THE RUINED ARTIZAN.

There is not, perhaps, a more painful spectacle in this world, than to behold an intelligent, active, skilful workman, in any department of labour, able to turn himself to almost any species of work, capable of earning high wages, maintaining a respectable position, yet constantly in beggary from the vile habit of drinking whenever the favorite beverage can be got. The pain in witnessing such a spectacle is all the more increased when we have made personal sacrifices, and done what we could to place such a workman again and again in a fair way of doing. In such a case there is the pain arising from disappointment and ingratitude blended together.

These remarks have been suggested by many instances that we have known of the most clever and skilful workmen, deplorably given to the habit of drinking—men that might have been an ornament to their country by their powers of invention and their skill and facility in execution, and yet their sobriety could never be depended upon for a single day; and a small job, though begun, might be frequently interrupted, till useless for purpose by fits of intemperance.

Is it not truly painful to witness a skilful artizan, clever, original, managing, in everything but the one thing of taking care of his money and himself? And yet it is not very long ago since the feeling was quite common, at least in a part of the country well known to ourselves, that the only clever workmen were really those who were most frequently drunk. The man who could drink was, ten to one, the man who could himself most readily and ingeniously turn his hand to every kind of job. The same idea was also entertained regarding those who attempted poetry. All those who presumed to climb Parnassus, or drink of the waters of Helicon, must first souse themselves in the muddy contents of the beer barrel if they could afford nothing stronger, or, if they could, they must first quaff inspiration from the mountain dew. Such ideas are not yet exploded; there are many who still labour under the delusion, that any great mental effort whether in art or literature, requires to be begun and conducted under the influence of strong stimulants. We believe this is a very erroneous impression, and we have no hesitation in saying that the most vigorous, and pure, and manly sentiments of Burns were composed when his intellect was clear, and neither clouded nor excited by intoxicating draughts. The natural fervour of his soul did not require them.

But it was our intention, in these few remarks, principally to depict the effects of drinking on skilful, talented, but infatuated artizans. Why is it that many of them are so deplorably intemperate? Their cleverness, their skill, their adaptation for almost every job, are certainly not the result of their drinking, but their drinking habits have been entailed upon them, indirectly, on account of the superior facilities which they possess in doing almost anything. We say indirectly, for their talents are certainly not to be blamed for making them drunkards, else we see to the talented and skilful workman. But their talents and skill have, unfortunately, in such a country as this, been the means of bringing them more than they would have been brought, under the influence of the drinking customs of the country. It is with the talented workman as it is with the punster and the wit, or the man that can tell a good story, or pass a capital joke, or keep the whole table in a roar. Such a man is frequently invited to parties for the sake of his pleasing companionship, and then he must drink. And such a workman is frequently presented with extra jobs for which drink is the only payment. Nothing can be more pernicious to the workmen than such false kindness—yea, rather let us call it deliberate cruelty—nothing is more ruinous than such payment. It is a lamentable state of things, and it speaks volumes against such a practice, when a clever workman, on account of the very talents he possesses, in connection with the drinking customs of the country, is most exposed to danger. We have known many such workmen, and few if any of them were sober men.

One of those (he died a drunkard) we yet remember well, for many a little ship he rigged for us, and many a kite he made, and many a rabbit-house he built, and many a large top he turned for the boys of the village. He could turn his hand to almost everything. There was not a clock in the village went wrong, but John put it all to rights. He was a millwright by trade. But it was hard to say what trade he belonged to. The repairing of clocks and watches, the painting of sign-boards, or bell hanging, or cutting and lettering gravestones, came as ready to him as the setting up of threshing-machines, which was certainly his forte.—And yet John was the poorest man in the parish; for, he was unfortunately, just as clever at turning up his little finger, as he was at turning any fancy piece of work. He was, certainly, a genius; but like almost every other genius, he was simple, too simple; and his drinking habits, latterly came to destroy the remaining force of any little principle he had ever possessed. His simple nature and obliging disposition, led him to proffer his services on any occasion when he could be of use; and the usual payment made on such occasions was a free circulation of the bottle.—If any little job was to be done requiring expertise or taste, John was sure to be sent for it at his bye hours. He had great pleasure in doing of any little "nick nack." Of course his kindness could not pass unrewarded, and as John was too generous to accept money for every little job, the bottle paid for all, and thus John acquired the habit of drinking. Like every other genius, John was susceptible, at an early period, of the tender passion. He loved, and that most tenderly, an orphan young woman, who supported herself by her needle. Their passion was mutual, but she was guided by sound sober sense; and when she beheld, much to her grief, her lover gradually falling into the habit of drinking, she resolved she would never enter into the marriage relation with a man who was given to such a habit. Often did she remonstrate with tears, and often did the better feelings of his nature rise within him, and he would make many solemn promises to give up the habit for her sake. But the next extra job brought an extra glass. He was pressed to partake, and the simple mechanic yielded as before. He could sing a good song, tell a good story, and his company was courted. Faithful were the warnings, and urgent the entreaties of Mary Mathie, his lady love, and these left a salutary impression for a time. He began however to neglect his business, and was oftener found in the public-house than in the workshop. His regular trade declined, and latterly went from him altogether. Mary though tenderly loving him, stood true to her resolution, never to marry till he became a reformed man. Weary of the restraints of his native place, he went to Glasgow, found work for a time, promised to do better—fell again, and took up with a worthless woman who completed his ruin. On asking John, a little before his death, what he regretted most in his past life, "Oh," said he, "if I could but have kept from drink, I would have done well; but I was a poor simple soul. The first thing that made me a drunkard was those eternal drams for the little extra jobs I had the kindness to perform. They were given in kindness, but they have ruined me. They made me a drunkard, and they have blasted my prospects for time and for eternity. Mary Mathie might have been my wife; I might have had a comfortable home, and a flourishing business; but I am lost—I am damned for ever!" As he said these words, he stood before me, in an agony of remorse and despair; and to every word of hope, I uttered, "I am damned—I am a ruined man!" His brain evidently turned; and in a few days I heard, in a distant part of the country, whither I had gone on business, that he had died of brain fever.

What might John Hislop not have been, as a successful and talented artizan, but for the pernicious drinking custom to which we have referred? May his fate be a warning to employers who give drink as payment for the performance of any piece of labour, and to workmen who are tempted often to take it as such!

A TEMPERANCE SERMON.

Addressed to Children.

BY ARTHUR MORRIS, JUNE.

"A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on, and are punished."—Prov. xxii. 3, and xxvii. 12.

As this verse is found twice in the word of God, we may be sure it is one of great importance.

Our present purpose is to think of it, as it refers to the use of intoxicating liquors and teetotalism.

Give me your attention, children; look at the text, and we shall see in it—

A specimen of WISDOM, and a specimen of FOLLY.

I need not tell you, that the specimen of wisdom is that which is contained in the first part of the verse: "A prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself;" and as we have to turn this to some teetotal account, I will notice—

1st. Strong drink produces a great deal of evil.

What is it that fills our prisons, our hospitals, our lunatic asylums, our poor-houses? what is it that gives us a standing army of 600,000 drunkards, to pollute our soil and contaminate our people? what is it that sends 60,000 drunkards every year to the bar of Him into whose kingdom drunkards cannot enter? what is it that robs little boys and girls of a good education, and gives them a bad one? what is it which deprives many a child of clothes and comforts? what is it (in short) which makes men far worse than brutes? The answer to one and all of these questions must be—STRONG DRINK.

2nd. A prudent man foresees this evil.

I have no occasion to tell you, that the meaning of the word foresee is to look before. This is what we wish you to do before you use strong drink. You may be pressed to drink by father, mother, brother, or sister, but always look before. It may be pleasant to drink; but the question is, may this habit (which is not necessary) lead me into evil? This is looking before; and the boy or girl who does this, gives a proof of wisdom.

3rd. A prudent man foresees this evil, and HIDES HIMSELF.

The meaning of 'hide' is, to get out of the way. Some of the doings of drink have already been noticed. Now it is not enough to foresee these evils; you must also get out of the way. How? Simply by using no strong drink. That is the only safe plan: and many every child who reads this immediately determine to have no more to do with that destroying enemy.

But I have said, the text also contains a specimen of folly "the simple pass on, and are punished."

1st. A foolish man runs into evil.

Again call to mind the evils of which I have spoken. Now what does the simple man do? He runs into evil; he does not look before. No, whatever dangers may be in his path, he passes on heedless of them all. And that is the simple man. That is the simple boy who knows what strong drink can do for him, and yet drinks it.

2nd. A foolish man runs into evil and is punished.

Now, how is the indulger in strong drink punished? He loses his health, his money, his happiness; and, if he does not reform, he loses his soul. A policeman, the other day, was about to take up a young man who, maddened by drink, had created a disturbance in the street, when a woman started from the crowd, and meeting me, said, 'Sir, that is my son.' If that young man had foreseen the evil, and hid himself, he would have saved his mother and himself all that pain; but he was one of the simple ones, who passed on, and was punished. Where is the child who is willing to continue to drink, knowing the dreadful probability of his meeting with severe punishment?

Learn—1st. A boy that foresees what drink may do for him, and gets out of its way, is a prudent boy.

2nd. A boy that uses strong drink is a simple boy.

PORT WINE!

The following extracts are made from a pamphlet entitled, "A word or two on Port Wine, by JOSEPH JAMES FORRESTER." Mr. Forrester, is, we believe, a wine grower himself, and he exposes many of the adulterations practised in Oporto, before the wines are shipped for England. He says:—

"Of the Port sent to England, a very large proportion hardly deserves to be called wine at all, and still less Port wine."—Page 11.

"Persons of refinement, whose palates were not hardened, or made incapable of judging of the nature of wine, and whose stomachs were not proof against such mixtures, as will hereafter be described, naturally abandoned the use of what is called "Port," which they, reasonably enough, understand to mean a nauseous fiery compound of sweets, colours and alcohol." Page 11.

"When the wine is about half fermented, it is transferred from the vat to tunnels; and brandy several degrees above proof, is thrown in, in the proportion of twelve to twenty-four gallons to the pipe of must, by which the fermentation is greatly checked." Page 14.

"About two months afterwards, this mixture is coloured thus: a quantity of dried elder berries is put into coarse bags; these are placed in vats, and a part of the wine to be coloured being thrown over them; they are trodden by men, till the whole of the colouring matter is expressed; from twenty-eight to fifty-six pounds of dried elder berries being used to the pipe of wine! Another addition of brandy of from four to six gallons per pipe, is now made to the mixture which is then allowed to rest for about two months." "At the end of this time it is, if sold,—which it is tolerably sure to be after such judicious treatment!—transferred to Oporto, where it is sacked two or three times and receives, probably, two gallons more brandy per pipe; and it is then considered fit to be shipped to England, is being about nine months old; and, at the time of shipment, one gallon more of brandy is usually added to each pipe. The WINE! thus having received at least twenty-six gallons of brandy per pipe, is considered by the merchant sufficiently strong—an opinion which the writer, at least, is not prepared to dispute."—Page 15.

We commend the above to the serious consideration of those who solemnly abjure "ardent spirits," or "distilled liquors," and yet drink glass after glass of "PORT WINE" without any remorse of conscience. It may furnish a useful hint, also, to the sticklers for "WINE" at the sacramental table.

CURE FOR RESTLESSNESS.—An imprudent mother in Ayreshire lately gave her child, three years old, half a glass of whisky, as a cure for restlessness. The dose was effectual, for the child fell asleep and never again woke.

ON WATER DRINKING.

BY ALBERT BARNES.

"Drink no longer water," 1 TIM. v. 23.

THERE has been much difficulty felt in regard to the connection which this advice has with what precedes and what follows. Many have considered the difficulty to be so great, that they have supposed that this verse has been displaced, and that it should be introduced in some other connection. The true connection and reason for the introduction of the counsel here seems to me to be this: Paul appears to have been suddenly impressed with the thought—a thought which is very likely to come over a man who is writing on the duties of the ministry—of the arduous nature of the ministerial office. He was giving counsels in regard to an office which required a great amount of labour, care, and anxiety. The labours enjoined were such as to demand all the time; the care and anxiety incident to such a charge would be very likely to prostrate the frame and injure the health. Then he remembered that Timothy was yet but a youth; he recalled his feebleness of constitution and his frequent attacks of illness; he recollected the very abstemious habits which he had prescribed for himself; and in this connection he urges him to a careful regard for his health, and prescribes the use of a small quantity of wine, mingled with water, as a suitable medicine in his case. Thus considered, this direction is as worthy to be given by an inspired teacher as it is to counsel a man to pay a proper regard to his health, and not needlessly to throw away his life (Compare Matt. x. 23.) The phrase, "Drink no longer water," is equivalent to "Drink not water only." The Greek word here used does not elsewhere occur in the New Testament.

"But use a little wine," mingled with water—the common method of drinking wine in the East—"for thy stomachs' sake." It was not for the pleasure to be derived from the use of wine, or because it would produce hilarity or excitement, but solely because it was regarded as necessary for the promotion of health, that is, as a medicine. "And thine often infirmities,"—weakness or sicknesses. The word would include all infirmities of the body, but seems to refer here to some attacks of sickness to which Timothy was liable, or some feebleness of constitution; but beyond this we have no information with regard to the nature of his maladies. In view of this passage, and as a further explanation of it, we may make the following remarks:

1. The use of wine and of all intoxicating drinks was solemnly forbidden to the priests under the Mosaic law, when engaged in the performance of their sacred duties, Lev. x. 9, 10. The same was the case among the Egyptian priests. It is not improbable that the same thing would be regarded as proper among those who ministered in holy things under the Christian dispensation: the natural feeling would be, and not improperly, that a Christian minister should not be less holy than a Jewish priest, and especially when it was remembered that the reason of the Jewish law remained the same—"that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, clean and unclean."

2. It is evident from this passage that Timothy usually drank water only, or that, in modern language, he was a "Teetotaler." He was evidently not in the habit of drinking wine, or he could not have been exhorted to do it.

3. He must have been a remarkably temperate youth to have required the authority of an apostle to induce him to drink even "a little wine." There are few young men so temperate as to require such an authority to induce them to do it.

4. The exhortation extended only to a very moderate use of wine. It was not to drink it freely; it was not to drink it at the tables of the rich and great, or in the social circle; it was not even to drink it by itself; it was to use "a little," mingled with water—for this was the usual method.

5. It was not as a common drink; but the exhortation or command extends only to its use as a medicine. All the use which can be legitimately made of this injunction—whatever conclusion may be drawn from other precepts—is, that it is proper to use a small quantity of wine for medicinal purposes.

6. There are many ministers of the gospel now, alas! to whom, under no circumstances whatever, could an apostle apply this exhortation—"Drink no longer water only." They would ask with surprise what he meant? whether he intended it for irony or banter?—for they need no apostolic command to drink wine. Or, if he should address to them the exhortation, "Use a little wine," they could regard it only as a reproof for their usual habit of drinking much. To many the exhortation would be appropriate, if they ought to use wine at all, only because they are in the habit of using so much that it would be proper to restrict them to a much smaller quantity.

7. This whole passage is one of great value to the cause of Temperance. Timothy was undoubtedly in the habit of abstaining wholly from the use of wine. Paul knew this, and did not reprove him for it; he manifestly favoured the general habit, and only asked him to depart, in some small degree, from it, in order that he might restore and preserve his health.

APPEAL TO THE CHURCH.

(From "The Church in Earnest.")

BY J. ANGELL JAMES.

WHEN will the ministers and members of our churches begin generally to inquire, whether it is not expedient for them, if not for their own sakes, yet for the sake of the community, to discontinue altogether the use of intoxicating liquors? When it is considered that one half of the insanity; two thirds of the abject poverty; and three-fourths of the crime of our country, are to be traced up to drunkenness—that more than £60,000,000 are annually expended in destructive beverages—that myriads annually die the drunkard's death, and descend still lower than the drunkard's grave—that thousands of church members are every year cut off from christian fellowship for inebriety—that every minister of the gospel has to complain of the hindrance to his usefulness from this cause—and that more ministers are disgraced by this than by any other habit—than in short more misery and more crime flow over society from this source than from any other, war and slavery not excepted—and that by the highest medical authorities these intoxicating drinks are reduced as diet, from the rank of necessities to luxuries—it surely does become every professor of religion to ask whether it is not incumbent upon him, both for his own safety and for the good of his fellow-creatures to abstain from this pernicious indulgence. On the authority of Mr. Sheriff Alison, it is stated that in the year 1840, there were in Glasgow, amongst about 30,000 inhabited houses, no fewer than 3010 appropriated to the sale of intoxicating drinks. The same gentleman declared that the consumption of ardent spirits in that city, amounted to 1,800,000 gallons yearly, the value of which is £1,350,000. No fewer than 30,000 persons there, go to bed drunk every Saturday night: 25,000 commitments are annually made on account of drunkenness, of which 10,000 are females. Is Glasgow worse than many other places? Professors of religion! ponder this: and will you not, by abstaining from a luxury, lend the aid of your example to discountenance this monster crime, and monster misery? It is in the power, and therefore is it not the duty, of the Christian church to do much to stop this evil, which sends more persons to the madhouse—the jail—the hulks—and the gallows—more bodies to the grave—and more souls to perdition, than any other that can be mentioned? CAN THE CHURCH BE IN EARNEST TILL IT IS PREPARED TO MAKE THIS SACRIFICE?

DRUNKENNESS, AN ILLUSTRATION.

BY H. MUDGE.

You are passing along a principal street in a provincial town, and see a house remarkable for its eccentricity: every part of it seems to be off its proper centre. The wall is tottering; the stacks of chimnies are overhanging; the windows of various sizes and patterns; the shutters for water are inclining the wrong way; while chinks and cracks daubed with untempered mortar admit the wet in all quarters. Stopping for a moment and looking up at it, you very naturally exclaim, "Surely, the fellows were drunk, when they built that house!"

Just so it is with the body of a drunkard! The house he lives in! The workmen building it are drunk, and so they are doing their work miserably, and putting things into a confused heap, where there ought to be a scientific arrangement of materials.

Let me explain. Through the body is flowing a river of blood, kept in motion by a wonderful forcing pump, the heart, which commenced its strokes under the direction of the great God at the earliest period of life, and will not cease them till the same Almighty Architect takes back the breath he gave. Along the banks of this river, (that is at the sides of the arteries and veins through which the blood runs,) there are stationed millions of little workmen, whose business it is to take out of the vital current the materials for building up the body, and to set them in regular order in their respective places. Yes, the whole material fabric of the body is fished, ready for use, out of the blood! There they are at work for years, and years, and years, without weariness, though at it night and day; and if they could be left to themselves they would go on in uninterrupted harmony. Some are making eyes, some skin, some bones, some sinews, some brain, some liver, some lungs, and so on! "O LORD, how marvellous are thy works; in wisdom has thou formed them all!"

The waste of the materials from the blood is made good from the food we eat and drink; that digested forms blood; and from the blood is formed (as stated) all other parts.

Now see what happens when alcohol is drank; it goes into the vessels and mixes with the blood, and the consequence is, the little workmen we have spoken of get affected by it and are made drunk; when of course the order and propriety of their work are interfered with. For example, those at work on the eye are blinded so that they select red blood and deposit it where there ought only to be white, hence redness of eyes: those on the nose instead of keeping a rounded comely ornament heap up materials of flesh, and blood and skin, till we have a most unsightly carbuncled protuberance: those in the liver form tubercles, hence dropsy: those in the kidneys another kind of tubercles, hence consumption: those employed about the joints forget the oil, so these hinges grate and stiffen: some, perhaps stationed in the finger, upset a hod of lime just by the joint, instead of carrying it in to make bone of, and we actually see it working out through the skin in the shape of a chalk-stone!

In this way we can account for a host of diseases that afflict the drinkers of alcohol; from the sensation of sinking, which annoys the delicate lady in the forenoon, to the oppression of insensibility which apoplexy brings after a debauch! Nor has any one a right to expect better things: suppose a mason picked up in his work a red hot brick, would he coolly set it with its proper bearing? Or a carpenter handling his wood found it studded with the prickles of the thorn, would he steadily fit it to its fellow? Impossible: so if on taking up a particle of bone, or flesh, or nail, or skin, the Natural Builder is stung to the very quick by a particle of alcohol, the work is hurriedly thrust onward. Drinkers of alcohol in any quantity thus annoy Nature more or less. But worse remains. Drunken men become forgetful as well as irritable: they allow heaps of rubbish to lie about in all directions. So is it in the alcoholised system; the refuse is not ejected. Carbonic acid, a poisonous substance, is disregarded, and suffered to accumulate by the stupefied attendants; until the bright crimson arterial blood, loaded with it, is rendered unfit for the purposes of life. This blood, black-red or purple instead of crimson, circulated through the system, gradually brings insensibility over every organ; the brain affected, the patient sleeps,—the lungs, he snores,—the heart, he dies! He wakes no more until the blast of the last great trumpet, blown, not by man heralding salvation, but by the angel of God, loud enough to wake the drunk-dead who wish they could for ever sleep, and to gather them together to that judgment, one righteous rule of which is already known,—"NO DRUNKARD SHALL INHERIT THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN."

What words can describe the recklessness, what imagination can picture the danger of that irrational creature who introduces ALCOHOL into his otherwise healthy body!

ON "GIVING STRONG DRINKS TO OTHERS."
TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR:—I find that some of my friends differ with me in opinion on the subject contained in the following question—Is it right for a teetotaler to place intoxicating drinks before his visitors? My opinion is decidedly that he ought not to do so, and I will state some of my reasons for thinking so.

I consider such a practice to be inconsistent. When a person voluntarily abstains from intoxicating liquors, I assume that he does it conscientiously; and that he either adopts the practice because he has been led into intemperance himself, or from a consideration of the manifold evils which the drinking customs entail on his fellow men, and a desire to use his example and influence against them. In either of these cases, how utterly inconsistent is it for the total abstainer to set before his non-teetotal friends that very article the use of which he considers so great an evil! In the former case, this drink has perhaps been a curse to him, it may have well nigh ruined his constitution, reduced him from affluence to poverty, destroyed his comfort and his happiness, while the refraining from its use may have brought him these blessings back again, and yet he offers it to those who do not abstain from its use, as if it were a beneficial and a nourishing thing! In the latter case, the teetotaler believes the use of intoxicating drinks to have been the destroyer of the bodies and souls of thousands of his fellow-creatures, and he feels its evils to such an extent, that he is induced to give it up himself, that he may help to destroy the custom by his influence. And yet these persons both say in effect, "Here, my friends, is a liquor which has been a source of misery and ruin to me, or my friends, a curse to mankind, and a destroyer of the human race, but I offer it to you with much pleasure, and I hope you will enjoy it."

I also think the custom to which I have referred to be dangerous. Would any who read this, willingly be the instrument of their friend's destruction? Would they point those who were dear to them to a road which led to a precipice, and say, "Take that road, it will probably end in your death, but I will not refrain from shewing it to you, because I do not like compulsion." I would say to them,—If you set intoxicating drinks before your friends, because you dislike compulsion, you act the same part. Have you had a dear friend or relation ruined by intemperance? and can you lead others into the same path? Suppose your friend becomes intoxicated with the drink you give him, and while in such a state commits some crime, would you calmly look on your part in the transaction—would you acquit yourself of all blame? Or suppose he acquired a liking for the habit at your house, and was led by its alluring influence to the very pit of degradation, would the reflection please you, that you were an instrument of his downfall? Forsake then, this dangerous custom of providing these drinks for your friends.

Again; I object to the practice because it is according to fashion. This may seem a strange motive, but is it not the fact, that fashion is one of the greatest and most powerful opponents to the spread of Temperance principles? I have met with young men who have acknowledged that they were as well without intoxicating drinks, but they continued in the use of them, because it was the fashion. If this is the reason why many continue the custom to which this letter relates, be it theirs no longer to dwell under the arbitrary rule of fashion, but let it be their noble part to be the first to break the chains and trammels of this imperious phantom, and destroy its sway over society.

I have been led to make these remarks from the conviction that the practice of Teetotalers setting liquors before their friends is very prevalent in the country*, and I believe many who do so, would give as a reason, that "they object to measures of compulsion." I am no advocate for such measures, on the contrary, I am entirely opposed to them, but I see a wide difference between coercion on the one hand, and the refraining from leading others in what we believe to be an evil on the other.

Perhaps it would not be uninteresting, if some of your correspondents would give your readers their ideas upon the subject.

I am Sir, yours faithfully,

St. Ives, Hunts. A TOTAL ABSTAINER.

* Can this be true? We sincerely hope not.—Eds.

INTERESTING DISCUSSION.

The friends of Temperance at Pittsburg, U. S., have adopted an excellent plan for awakening an increased interest in the cause, in the discussion of important topics connected with the progress of reform. At a late meeting the question was debated, whether the time had arrived when all manufacturers and venders of intoxicating drinks should be excluded from the communion of the church. The affirmative was maintained by Rev. Mr. West, and Rev. Dr. Rogers, and the negative by Rev. Messrs. Preston, and McLaren; the latter gentlemen, however, took this position for the sake of the arguments, not as speaking their own sentiments.

The affirmative laid down the following texts, by which to try whether the traffic was lawful, and consistent with the Christian character. We would rejoice to see every church and every religious association in the land applying such tests to themselves:—

1. Is it such that it can be followed with an eye to the glory of God, and can you ask his blessing upon it?

2. Can it be followed with the sincere and prevailing desire to do good to your fellow men?

3. Is it such that will recommend your christian character in the estimation of mankind?

4. Is it such that it will contribute to aid you in your progress to Heaven?—New York Organ.

RICHARD HICKS, ESQ.

It is with unfeigned sorrow that we record the death of this gentleman, well known to many of our readers. The following appeared in the Wesleyan newspaper of October 12th.

"DIED, on Saturday, October 7, at midnight, Richard Hicks, Esq., of Argyle Square, King's Cross, London, Surgeon, aged 36; leaving a widow and four young children. Besides sustaining the important office of leader in the King's Cross (Wesleyan) Society, the deceased was also Secretary of the Missionary Society, and Sunday School Society of that place; and was well known as the very talented advocate of the Temperance cause. His bland and christian manners, and eminent piety, endeared him to all classes, but especially the poor; and his comparatively sudden removal has been quite a shock, which has only been sustained by the complete assurance which all seem to have of his everlasting happiness. "He was a good man."

Having long enjoyed a personal intimacy with Mr. Hicks, we can testify not only to the general excellence of his character, as a gentleman and a christian, but also to his professional eminence, and to his admirable mode of advocating the total abstinence principle. Large audiences, in the metropolis especially, have often listened with delight to his very intelligent and instructive addresses; and the christian portion especially rejoiced to find that he rarely addressed an audience, without reminding all present of the absolute necessity of adding to temperance "godliness"—vital and experimental religion. We sympathise deeply with the bereaved family, and trust they will receive those consolations, which HE alone can impart, who is "a father to the fatherless and the Judge of the widow."—And to those Rechabite and other Total Abstinence Societies, with which he was connected, we would say in conclusion,—"Withhold not good from those to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it. Say not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give, when thou hast it by thee."—"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest."—"YE KNOW NOT WHAT SHALL BE ON THE MORROW."

THE SOCIAL PRINCIPLE ILLUSTRATED.

BY ELIHU BURRITT.

Look at the development of social principle as exhibited in the recent World's Temperance Convention. How inevitable and natural in man the desire to associate himself with his fellow, not only in sinning and suffering, but also in repentance and salvation! Here are two individuals, living, perhaps, in a dark lane, in some populous town or city. Their hovels stand side by side. They have reached the nadir of human wretchedness, by habits of beastly intemperance. Even the dogs bark and the cattle bellow at them, in remonstrance against their voluntary brutality. Their families are drinking to the dregs the hemlock of squalid misery. They first tasted the intoxicating cup together. They sinned together; they fell together; and together they tread the winepress of their own shame and the world's contempt. A lucid moment of painful remembrance comes over them with the unfortunate end of their association. Says one to his companion, "Come, let us arise from our wallowing, and sign the pledge together never to taste more any thing that can intoxicate." The social principle re-acts for their salvation. Together they sign the pledge, and constitute the centre and source of a society, whose attraction increases with every new associate. From the gutter, the reformed inebriates adjourn to "a little upper room," thence to a vestry of a church, thence to the town hall, where the great fact of a city temperance society is announced to the world. In the next town the social principle has operated in the same fashion and to the same issue. By this same law of attraction the two societies associate; and, in the course of a year or two, a county temperance society is announced, embracing twenty or thirty town societies.

The social principle follows the law of gravity in all the conditions of attraction. It has already associated a score of these little orbs into a kind of solar system, called a county society. The principle works on, and the next year that little solar system, with its greater and lesser lights, is absorbed into one of the larger disk, and becomes a satellite to another sun and centre, under the appellation of a state society. The principle works on by an intense ratio of progression. State societies are attracted into another orbit, and revolve, in unbroken harmony, around another centre, a national temperance society. What next? Does the circumferential line of this great solar system bound the attractive force of the social principle? No; far from it. It still operates unseen, but not unfelt. Almost without concert, a World's temperance convention is announced in London, which place, somehow or other, comes to be deemed the centre of the system of human societies. A world's convention! what means that? How came it about. It came about of itself, or by that great law of centripetal attraction which pervades the whole orbit of humanity. It came by the resistless working of the social principle, which has been busy in France, Germany, Sweden, Russia, and other hyperborean regions. A couple of inebriates, speaking French, Dutch, Danish, or Slavonic, did just what the two half-sobered Americans did—they signed the pledge together; and the social principle worked among the incongruous nations to the issue of a world's convention; which is but the preliminary meeting, or rather involuntary organization, of a world's society, for the promotion of temperance, which shall never be dissolved. Hundreds who attended this convention from different parts of the world, may have been unconscious of participating in such an organisation; but that fact will be realized, like facts of the prophecies, in its fulfilment.

DISCUSSION AT WORTHING.

ON Thursday, Oct. 5, Mr. D. G. Paine, of Deptford, delivered a lecture on Teetotalism, in the Town Hall of Worthing, and, as we believe, is customary with him, invited the candid statement of any objections which might be entertained. This was responded to by a gentleman named Phillips, formerly a schoolmaster in the neighbourhood, who began in terms most complimentary to the subject, but ended in denouncing it as a curst system. Now as there happened to be some present who were indebted for all the comfort they possessed to Total Abstinence, this sounded rather too paradoxical for their patience, and a volunteer host, both male and female, rose to protest against, and disprove the charge, which their testimony did most effectually. But Mr. Phillips having taken up the gauntlet, did not like the idea of being nonplussed quite so soon, and proposed a more regular discussion on a future evening. Mr. Paine was appealed to; and as the following Saturday was the only day he could appropriate, the meeting adjourned till then.

Discussions are always attractive. The place was filled. Numbers were present who, probably, never attended a temperance meeting before, and the greatest interest prevailed. Thos. Compton, Esq., of Sompting Abbots, presided, and opened the proceedings in a brief speech, stating that, although his views on the subject were no secret, he should endeavour to act with the strictest impartiality. He then called on Mr. Paine, who by previous arrangement was to open the debate. He went rapidly over the most obvious reasons in favour of teetotalism, and being by the courtesy of his opponent, allowed ten minutes in addition to the half hour to which he was entitled, anticipated the objections which it was most probable would be advanced.

Mr. Phillips, who evidently was far less at home in a public meeting than his antagonist, then entered upon a train of remarks which seemed to have neither head nor tail, and were about as relevant to the belts of Jupiter, as to the merits of Teetotalism. There was a pathetic whine over the people's miseries; a half Cuffey-like denunciation of those who allowed them; something about England for the English, and a little of much beside, which notes could hardly convey, and memory cannot possibly retain. It would seem a queer speech if taken down verbatim.

Mr. Paine, on rising a second time, regretted that the speech they had listened to had not furnished him with something to do; the bulk of it was beyond his comprehension, and what he could not understand, of course it was impossible for him to answer; and the small portions in which he did detect a meaning, had not the most remote application to the matter in hand. He felt, therefore, that the most convenient course for him to pursue, was to resume his arguments in favour of teetotalism, until something a little more tangible was presented to him, either by Mr. Phillips or some one else.

This failure on the part of their champion, roused the ire of some of the abettors of drink, and they seemed determined to supply, in noise, what he had lacked in argument. Their attempts, however, to drown the voice of the speaker were ineffectual; he told them that since he had ceased to be a novice, he had never yet been put down at a public meeting, and he was fully resolved not to be then; to fair argument he would yield, to mere clamour he would not.

At length a Mr. Milton, who said he could talk for an hour on the errors of teetotalism (a privilege which was instantly offered him, but very prudently declined) advanced the favorite ground for cavil, drawn from the miracle at Cana, in Galilee, and upon which, religious and profane alike found their most confident objections. All hopes of victory, it is needless to say, were soon overturned on this score, and the countenance of the auditors told plainly that they appreciated the reply as far more valid than the objection. Mr. Milton was proceeding to fish up something else, when the inadvertent acknowledgment that he was the father of a brewer, enabled Mr. Paine to show him forth in a character so inconsistent that he shrunk from any further controversy.

Messrs. Phillips and Milton being both unhorsed; a gentleman, evidently more skilled in platform displays than either of his coadjutors, advanced to try his skill. He complained that so much time had been wasted by the gentleman who provoked the discussion, and who was evidently incompetent to the under-taking; since there could be no doubt that, up to that stage of the proceedings, the adversaries of teetotalism had failed to maintain their ground. He then, with great caution and address, endeavoured to prejudice the meeting against the course which he alleged temperance advocates generally pursued in their appeals; and said, that, in consequence, their success had been chiefly among the illiterate, the vulgar, and the unthinking. Men of science, those who could discriminate between truth and error, the educated, and the philosophical, had not been addressed, and had not been proselyted by them; but teetotal societies were mainly composed of those who were too thick-headed to see a medium between abstinence and excess; he and such as he could go and take their wine in moderation, and knew very well when to leave off.

Mr. Paine congratulated himself and the meeting, that at last they had got one, who, if he could not bring forward very valid arguments, at least, knew how to make the best use of those he did employ, and could put them forward in something of a tangible shape. He then addressed himself to the objections which had been stated, and first, supposing it to be true in fact, he repudiated it as a ground of censure. "It is," he said "precisely the same reproach which was urged against christianity in the days of its founder; they were not the princes of Judah, but the simple fishermen of Galilee whom Jesus called as his disciples. The proud Jews spoke the same language as my opponent, when they asked, 'have any of the Pharisees believed in him? are there any of the noble, any of the mighty, any of the learned, any of the doctors of the law, any of the scribes, any of the honorable among his followers? no, it is only the common people who hear him gladly, and therefore it is a code of doctrines beneath our notice.' But, Sir, does he say that our converts are from the dissipated, the licentious, the profligate, those whom law could not tame, nor morals subdue? we admit it, does he make this a ground of reproach? we glory in it. Is it nothing to have restored the lost; to have reclaimed the hopeless; to have made the wild untamed blackguard, a sober, tractable, steady man? Sir, we want no higher praise than this, we want no encomium more honorable,—and if in this we be vile, I hope we shall be viler still." He next attacked the objection on the ground of its inaccuracy; it was neither true that the advocates of Total Abstinence addressed themselves exclusively to the drunkard or the illiterate, nor that the Societies were mainly composed of such; nor was it true that clever reasoners, and philosophical thinkers, like that gentleman, could take their wine with the impunity which he described; and whilst he might after that meeting be complacently sipping his glass, it would be well if the warning words of Scripture rung in his memory, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

No further disposition to address the meeting being displayed by the adverse party, the chairman took a show of hands for and against the merits of teetotalism, which resulted in a majority in its favour.

At the close a great many appeared desirous of signing the pledge, and grouped round the table for that purpose, but as we left immediately, we did not ascertain the number enrolled.

BENEFITS OF TEMPERANCE.—At a recent Temperance demonstration, Mr. Cornelius Parker, of Grimsby, descanted on the acknowledged benefits of the principles which he had now adopted. He had been forty-three times in quod—fifty three times brought before his superiors, had paid upwards of £110 in fines and police fees, had had his head broken eight times in affrays with the constables, and he dare almost challenge the Queen of the British realms to produce a man who bore so many scars for the service of his country, as he had obtained for the service of King Alcohol. He had been long clothed in rags, literally covered with them, but now he was clad with a suit of clothes, one of eight suits he possessed. He intended, whilst his tongue remained active, to advocate principles, the adoption of which had realised him so much tangible benefit.

EPITAPH IN THETFORD CHURCHYARD.

My grandfather was buried here,
My cousin Jane, and two uncles dear.
My father perished with a mortification in his thighs.
My sister dropt down dead in the Minories.
But the reason why I'm here interr'd to my thinking,
Is owing to my good living and hard drinking.
If, therefore, good Christian, you wish to live long,
Beware of drinking brandy, gin, or anything strong.

A WORD TO PARENTS.

If no argument is of force enough to induce you to practice abstinence personally, do be intreated to train up your children in its practice. If in spite of the demonstrations of science and the testimony of the first medical men in the community, you still think a little stimulating liquor needful for yourselves, you do not, we presume, think it needful for them. By no means then, suffer them to have it. Let the taste for it never be acquired—or if already acquired, instantly do your utmost to correct it. Thousands of parent's hearts have been bowed down with grief—thousands have been broken through the intemperate habits of their offspring. And if one of your children should be induced to love these stimulants, and ultimately become a drunkard, would not your self-upbraidings be most painful and severe? For your children's sake, then, never bring these drinks upon the table—trample on the direful usage which makes these liquors an expression of hospitality—lose no favourable opportunity of pointing out the dangers of their use as beverages—encourage your children to read suitable publications on the subject, and to identify themselves with the cause of total abstinence. God and men will henceforth join in lifting up a voice of strong condemnation against those parents who train dear children to walk along the precipice, down which sixty thousand drunkards have long been annually plunging—Rev. Joshua Priestley.

A GOOD TIME COMING.

There is a good time coming,
Though we cannot fix the date;
But yet 'tis surely on the way
At telegraphic rate:
What though the dram shops still increase
And pauper taxes too;
We should not let our efforts cease,
While there's so much to do.
O, my country!
Sweet land of liberty!
We'll boldly face and strike the foe
Who seeks to injure thee.

There is a good time coming,
And we wish it now were here;
When men all strong drink shunning,
Will sip the water clear:
When half starved wives with pallid cheeks,
And children filled with fear,
And drunkard's idiotic freaks,
Shall never more appear!
O, my country!
Sweet land of liberty!
We'll boldly face and strike the foe
Who seeks to injure thee.

And for this good time coming,
Let us sing, and work, and pray,
When tipping shops and taverns
Will no longer lead astray;
When grain no more to poison's made
By passing through the still,
And all mankind avoid that trade
Which doth their nature's kill.
O, my country!
Sweet land of liberty!
We'll boldly face and strike the foe
Who seeks to injure thee.

EXPENSIVE WICKEDNESS.—It is calculated that the London pleasure-takers spend on Sundays throughout the year in the adjacent villages, the enormous sum of one million three hundred thousand pounds; and the one million of this sum is expended in strong drinks and cigars. This is what many Londoners call, "getting a whiff of fresh air!"

THE CHOLERA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR:—Having been employed during the epidemic of cholera whilst it prevailed in Ireland in the year 1832, I am desirous of offering a few remarks on the subject for the benefit of our temperance friends. You will perceive by the accompanying letter that my treatment of cases during that formidable epidemic was very successful owing to my attention being early directed to the looseness of the bowels which I generally found precede an attack, and which if checked in its commencement was easily cured, whereas if allowed to proceed to the second stage or that of collapse became, in the vast majority of cases, unmanageable; feeling this, I early impressed it on the minds of those who were committed to my care, and wherever my advice was attended to, I never failed of arresting its progress. I would therefore earnestly urge immediate attention to bowel complaint, as it is in its first stage that cholera is manageable. As all medical men understand the treatment of diarrhoea I feel I need not in this place specify remedies.

I would, however, strongly urge the necessity of our Total abstaining friends not to be led away by the vulgar prejudice that exists, namely, that intoxicating drinks are safeguards against the disease; they don't deserve to be ranked as such, and I am persuaded from experience, that they often produce bowel complaint, and even cholera; and in every case their injudicious administration will aggravate the symptoms of both. Attention to diet generally, and to drinks particularly (which in no case should be of an intoxicating nature), warm clothing, especially flannel next the skin, so as to protect the chest and stomach which contain most important vital organs, must not be neglected.

It is now generally admitted by medical men that cholera is not infectious, so that we need not fear to render any assistance to our friends and neighbours in case they should be seized with it.

I would in conclusion repeat what I have said before, namely, that the first symptom of cholera is looseness of the bowels, and that intoxicating drinks in my opinion are neither preservative, nor curative.

I am, Sir,
Your faithful servant,

Walthamstow, R. L. PINCHING,
Oct. 23, 1848. Surgeon.

The letter to which Mr. Pinching refers is as follows:—

“Townley Hall, Drogheda, Sept. 26, 1832.

“My dear Sir,—As we are providentially delivered from cholera, Mr. Pinching whom you recommended returns to Dublin. It is but justice to him and to your recommendation to say that he has given very general satisfaction, both in respect of his attention and humanity as well as of his success which has been very great, as you will see by comparing the number of cases with the mortality.

“I am, my dear sir, your faithful servant,

“B. BALFOUR.

“The Surgeon General, Merrion Square, Dublin.”

STANDARDS OF REPUTATION.—At the last assizes in Newcastle, the keeper of a lodging-house, a woman, who had put some thievish men and women in bed together, told Mr. Dundas that “she did not think they were bad characters: she would not have any bad characters in her house.” “Bad characters,” observed Judge Erle, “with such persons as the witness, means people who do not pay for their lodgings.” In another case, the landlord of the Beeswing was asked to define the condition of a foolish old man, who had been robbed while he was tipsy, and replied, “He had had drink, but was qualified to call for liquor, and PAY FOR IT;” which, said Mr. Otter, was a landlord's criterion of sobriety.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

MR. EDWARD GRUBB has recently delivered several very effective Lectures and addresses in the metropolis and suburbs. The attendance has been large, and the impression made appears to have been good. Among the stations thus occupied, were, the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle Street, S. C. Hall, Esq., in the Chair; Bishopsgate Chapel, W. Janson, Esq., in the Chair; the spacious school room adjoining the Stepney meeting, Rev. J. Kennedy, A. M. in the Chair; the large British School room, Great George Street, Lambeth, Mr. T. Whitaker in the Chair; and the Temperance Halls at Tottenham and Hackney.

Some excellent meetings have been held during the last month in various parts of the metropolis; and there appear to be a determination on the part of the several Committees to make more active exertions to promote the practice of Total Abstinence than of late. The numerous and frightful instances of destitution, crime, and individual and domestic misery resulting from the use of strong drinks, which have occurred during the last few weeks, has roused many teetotalers from their apathy, and they now feel that it is high time they should be on the alert, and endeavour, by an higher class of instrumentality, to arrest the progress of the fearful evil. To this, also, the apprehended visitation of cholera may have greatly contributed.

ROYSTON.

The Annual Festival of the Total Abstinence Society, was held in the British School room, on Tuesday, Oct. 10, when upwards of seventy friends and members of the cause sat down to Tea. The tables removed, a Public meeting was held, the Rev. T. Dury, M.A., of Westmill, occupied the Chair. A report of the past operations of the Society was read by the Secretary, from which it appears the principles of Temperance were introduced into this Town about nine years since, at which time a public meeting was held, when two converts were made,—soon after this a Society was formed, which has been gradually increasing up to the present time. Since the last public Festival, the Society has had fifteen public Lectures, (besides numerous readings and addresses, at the private meetings of the members,) and have expended a sum of nearly £50 in promoting the cause of sobriety in this town.

The chairman then related some cases of Intemperance which he had been an eye witness, he furnished some interesting statistical evidence, and enlivened the audience with several anecdotes, concluding with powerful arguments in favour of the system. The Rev. J. Mirams, of Chishill, V. Beldam, Esq., and Mr. W. J. Simons, addressed the meeting, after which a vote of thanks was given to the chairman, and the audience separated apparently highly satisfied.

ALEX. SWARD, Jun., Secretary.

MARKET DRAYTON.

The Independent Order of Rechabites, of the Shrewsbury District, have recently held their annual meeting, in the Primitive Methodist Chapel. After the business was closed, about 300 persons (including 186 children) sat down to tea in the National School. The children had been in procession through the town. After tea, Mr. Barratt was called to the Chair, when Mr. Mogg, of Dawley, gave an appropriate address to the children. Mr. Peir, of Broseley; Mr. Smith, of Shrewsbury; &c., also addressed the meeting. A female from Manchester, stated that for seven years she had lived in a cellar, into which the sun never shone; the windows were stuffed with rags; and what furniture and clothing could be pawned was pawned for drink. Scores of times she and her husband had gone to the factories, half naked, and three parts stupid with drink; but they had become Teetotalers, and had now a comfortable house well furnished, good food and clothing, and money out at interest. The chairman upon this affectionately urged persons to sign the teetotal pledge, and in the course of about twelve minutes, 21 did so. Mr. Mogg further addressed the meeting, when twelve more signed. On the following Tuesday evening 9 more signed; on Wednesday 20 more. On Friday evening Mr. Richardson, of Liverpool, delivered a religious temperance lecture, and at the conclusion 22 more signed, making a total of 84 in four nights, and 106 since August 16. In the Primitive Methodist Sunday School here, about three months back we mustered 86 scholars, 76 of whom were pledged teetotalers. Since the above tea party our school has increased to about 100, and 92 of them are teetotalers. A short time ago some of the children were so unruly that we were about to expel them; they have become teetotalers; and some of them are now useful teachers, and consistent members our church.

J. BARRATT.

LOWER CRUMPSALL, LANCASHIRE.

From a report, just published, we learn that the T. A. Abstinance Society of this place is in a healthy, prosperous state, adding to its numbers regularly every week. The majority of the members are anxious to improve their minds and as well as their circumstances; they have a news room and library, and have formed an association called "The Mutual Improvement Society." The Rechabite tent prosper financially, and no calls have recently been made upon it for sickness or death.

BOSTON.

The Temperance cause in this ancient Borough is going a-head nicely. Extensive works are in progress connected with Drainage and Railways, in which many hundreds of men are employed, among whom the Temperance movement has been introduced with the happiest effect. Some copies of the report of the Society having been sent to the smiths' shops, one of them was nailed up over a box, in which the men deposited more than 12s. as a token of their approval of the society. One athletic and very clever workman who had long been addicted to intoxication, signed the pledge, the good effects of which soon became visible in the increased comforts of his habitation and his improved constitution every way. One week, the works on the Railway being urgent, this son of Vulcan performed six days' and six night's work in one week—exclaiming at its close, "There, I could not have done this on strong drink." The superintendent of this department of the works has powerfully aided the cause among these men, having proved the efficacy of Teetotalism in the Polar seas, and in various parts of the world. He stated recently, that so great is the change for the better among railway artificers, that where 3s. are now expended in strong drink, £10 was expended a short time since. At a public meeting held recently in the Town Hall, the Mayor in the chair, a railway sawyer read his very interesting teetotal history, which we are glad to hear will be published as a tract.

The Boston Teetotal Society is powerfully aided by its excellent secretary, the Rev. T. W. MATHEWS, whose labours are incessant; and it receives the cordial support of almost all ranks and classes. One gentleman observed to a collector who called for his subscription,—"I think your society is doing good—I will give you double this year."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Sabbath School Temperance Movement.

At the Sabbath School Teachers Temperance Conference held in this town in August last, a notice of which appeared in the "Teetotal Times," it was clearly demonstrated that the best mode of exciting and keeping up an interest in the minds of the young in reference to the Temperance movement was to blend Amusement with instruction by Pictorial and other illustrative Lectures or Exhibition of works of Art, &c.

During the Month of September the truthfulness of this proposition has been tested and the efforts crowned with success.

The first effort was a visit to the Polytechnic Exhibition made under the Auspices of the Newcastle Young Men's Temperance Association. A deputation waited on the managers and solicited them to admit Sabbath-school children at 1d. each, to which they most cordially agreed. The Temperance committee then invited by circular, the attendance of all schools, and made arrangements so that not more than 300 children were admitted at one time, and each company remained two hours in the exhibition. From August 28 till September 8, upwards of 4000 children, accompanied by their teachers, availed themselves of visiting this magnificent exhibition, comprising one of the choicest collections of works of art, paintings, sculptures, and antiquities, together with sets of beautiful desolving views, a powerful microscope magic lantern, &c., with the exhibition of which, the latter especially, they were highly delighted.

In reference to the behaviour of the scholars the committee have much pleasure in stating that a communication has been received from the secretary of the exhibition, in which he states,—“Their general conduct was satisfactory, two or three schools were much to be commended, and I trust it will not be deemed invidious in making an especial remark respecting what is termed the ragged-school, their conduct and deportment deserve every praise. It is exceedingly gratifying to me to be able to make such a statement.”

This testimony, it is hoped, will have a tendency to remove much of the prejudice existing against children visiting exhibitions of this nature. The ragged-school referred to has been little more than twelvemonth's in existence, and is composed of boys from the most degraded parts of our town; this fact reflects great credit on the conductors of the school.

The next effort was a pictorial exhibition. Messrs. Cruikshank and McCarthy being in town, exhibiting a series of cartoons of the "Bottle," as large as life. It occurred to the friends of the Sunday school movement that an exhibition of these truth-speaking pictures with addresses by Sabbath school teachers would be beneficial. The exhibition accordingly took place in Nelson Street Chapel, on Friday, Sept. 15th. Children were admitted at 1d., and teachers, 2d. each. 800 children and 200 teachers were present. Simple and instructive lectures were delivered by Messrs. Benson, Whitehead, Rewcastle, and Barkas, in which were embodied many facts which had come under the observation of the speakers corroborative of the plates. Mr. T. Emley also took part in the meeting. From the interest displayed by the children, it is trusted, impressions were produced which will never be effaced.

In these efforts the object sought to be gained was to excite the attention of Sabbath schools to the temperance movement. The committee, to carry out still further their desires, determined to have a Sabbath School Teacher's great Temperance Meeting, and arrangements were made to combine with it a Musical Festival. This meeting took place on Tuesday evening, the 26th Sept., in Salem Chapel. The attendance was respectable and numerous; upwards of 800 teachers and friends of Sabbath schools being present. The meeting having been opened by singing "From all that dwell below the skies." Mr. Emley was called to the chair and alluded, in an appropriate address, to the successful efforts of "The Young Men's Temperance Association" in Sabbath Schools.

After which the following Sabbath school teachers delivered addresses.—1. The claims of Total Abstinence on christian parents, by Mr. Gibson.—2. Progression, by Mr. Ward.—3. The duties of the christian church to the temperance movement, by Mr. Campbell.—4. Dangers of moderate drinking, Mr. Weir.

The singing was conducted by an efficient choir, under the direction of Mr. Pyburn, and embraced a choice selection of pieces, among which were "The Marvellous Work," "Judge me O Lord," "I will give thanks," &c., from Haydn, Mozart, &c. The combination of lectures and singing being of recent origin here, some were doubtful of its effects. On this occasion much satisfaction and pleasure were derived. After singing the Austrian Hymn to "Lord of Heaven, and Earth, and Ocean." Votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Pyburn and the choir, for their efficient services, and to Mr. Emley for presiding over the meeting which then terminated.

Besides these efforts to disseminate the principles of total abstinence, the general operations of the society have been continued with assiduity and great success. On Monday evening, Sept. 4, the committee were favoured with the gratuitous services of Mr. T. Reid, a member of the executive committee of the Scottish Temperance League, who, in the Temperance Hall, Nelson Street, in an able manner, defended the temperance movement from the objections of its opponents. Mr. John Benson presided, and also addressed the meeting. Several popular melodies were sung with effect, by Mr. Robson, of Gateshead.

After a vote of thanks had been passed to Mr. Reid, several names were added to the list of members.

THOMAS BOAG, Secretary.

EDINBURGH.

I am happy to inform you that the cause of Total Abstinence is making encouraging progress in Edinburgh. During the last twelve months more than 300 have been added to the parent Society, and its funds, though we have two missionaries employed, are more than sufficient to meet its outlay. The society never was in such a healthy, flourishing state as at this time. Union, affection, zeal, characterise all its members and active agents. Our weekly meetings are always well attended, and sometimes crowded. Not infrequently while passing along our densely populated streets—the stentorian voice of one of our voluntary advocates is heard explaining and enforcing our principles. A Christian Teetotal Society has been formed and is doing wonders. The movement among the juveniles, supported by Mr. Hope, and under the fostering care of Mr. P. Sinclair, and his assistants, prospers; and we anticipate from the recent measures adopted for prohibiting the sale of deleterious drinks during part of the sabbath-day, a vast accession to our ranks during the winter, and a paralización of the degrading influence of the lower classes of the tippling haunts which abound in the city, which has been so long unjustly praised for its spiritual wisdom and superior morality. That your efforts to benefit the race of man may be increasingly blessed is the prayer of yours, affectionately,

J. P.

MACCLESFIELD.

The Young Men's Independent Temperance Society held their tea party, on Monday, October 2nd (Wakes Monday,) in their room, (Duke Street Temperance Room.) When the tea was over and the tables removed, John Howard, Esq., Silk Manufacturer, took the chair. After an amusing and intelligent speech, Mr. Robert Wordoff, the Temperance reciter, addressed the meeting. The meeting was enlivened at intervals by a variety of recitations by Messrs. Wordoff, Nyton, J. Thornley, Coltman, and a gentleman from Manchester, and singing by Mr. George Wardle, and a lady, formerly belonging to the choir of St. Michael's. The meeting was crowded, so that many were sent back without being admitted, and we believe all present went home highly satisfied, and anxiously wishing for the return of the festive season.

SIXTH REPORT of the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

This is a valuable document; not merely as furnishing an abstract of the proceedings of this particular Society, but as it contains some useful statistics, and a sketch of the proceedings of kindred societies, in the metropolis, and in various parts of the kingdom; and the world. The receipts of the Society, from May 11, 1847 to May 15, 1848, were £1863. 17s. 2d.; and the expenditure £1451. 1s. 8d.; leaving a balance in hand of £412. 15s. 6d. Of the above Expenditure £735. 10s. 11d. was for Salaries of Officers and Agents, and nearly £100 for various publications circulated gratuitously.

TEMPERANCE, or MISSIONARY, COLLECTING BOX.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES, of York, has recently published a very handsome cover for Boxes, printed in gold, so as to form an ornament for the parlour or mantle shelf, and calculated to draw attention to the Box, and to its object, by its very appearance. As the title on these covers is "TEMPERANCE SOCIETY," they are available for any part of the country; but we understand that if fifty be ordered by any Society, the name of that particular Society will be printed without any extra charge. The covers are sent, post free, 6s. 6d. per dozen. We have before us a small box fitted up with one of the above covers and varnished, which would not disgrace the mansion of a nobleman, or the palace of Queen Victoria.

TEETOTAL BUDGET.

WAY TO THE WORKHOUSE.—John Reeve, the comedian, was once accosted in the Kensington Road by an elderly female, with a small bottle of gin in her hand. "Pray Sir, I beg your pardon, is this the way to the workhouse?" John gave her a look of clerical dignity, and, pointing to the bottle, gravely said, "No, ma'am; but that is."

FLURRIED IN MIND.—"Does the Court understand you to say, Mr. Jones, that you saw the editor of the Augur of Freedom intoxicated?" "Not at all, sir; I merely said that I have seen him frequently soflurried in his mind that he would undertake to cut out copy with the snuffers—that's all.—New York Harbinger."

A TEMPERATE RETORT.—A tourist, who had "put an enemy into his mouth that stole away his legs," tumbled from the deck of a barge into the Crinan canal, and, being fished out, quarrelled with the captain for not having a rail round the craft. The skipper turned the laugh upon him by retorting that he should have had a rail round his mouth.

DRUNKENNESS AND IDIOCY.—Governor Briggs, at a temperance meeting lately held in Faneuil hall, Boston, U.S., stated that the report of the committee, appointed to inquire in regard to the idiots in the commonwealth, shewed that there were from 1200 to 1300 of that unfortunate class, and also the astonishing fact, that 1100 to 1200 of them were born of drunken parents.

NEW USE FOR ARDENT SPIRITS.—A correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator says, that a little alcohol, or almost any kind of ardent spirits, placed on the bottom boards, around and under a piece of belligerent bees, will allay their fury, and cause them to cease fighting. If an article which sets the human race by the ears will produce peace and harmony in a hive of bees, the fact is certainly anomalous.

"WITHOUT NATURAL AFFECTION."—A little boy related, at a temperance meeting in Manchester, that he was earning 4s. a week, and that his father is a drunkard, and that his father had waited at a certain place on Saturday night to catch him before he reached home, and insisted upon his giving him the whole part of his wages, which he went and spent at the beer shops.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS FATAL TO

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

IN the "TEETOTAL TIMES" for November, when treating on this subject, we showed that the moderate use of Intoxicating Liquors is exceedingly baneful to the physical health and religious exertions of professing Christians. Indeed the latter may be said to be a natural effect of the former. Christianity is pre-eminently a spiritual religion. Its temple is the mind. Here alone it takes up its abode. The thoughts and affections of the heart are its only subjects and ministers, and it is through these alone that it can, in any way, influence the body. The nerves and the brains are the especial organs of the mind, and the only medium of intercourse with the outward world. But this union of matter and spirit is so close, that whatever affects the one, must also act upon the other. If the mind is diseased, the body feels it; and if the body is unhealthy, the mind, of necessity, sympathizes; and therefore, it is clear to a demonstration, that Christianity cannot develop itself, if the nervous system is in a deranged state. But stimulants always produce this effect, and, consequently, our spirituality and activity must be affected and injured by such deleterious beverages. Unnatural excitement is always followed by unnatural depression; and hence, persons who use intoxicating drinks never can be in a healthy state. At one time they are in a fever, but when the effect of the poison is gone, their pulse is languid, and their spirits low.

There is not a moderate drinker upon the face of the earth who is not thus diseased. Look at his eye before and after the glass. Observe his cheek, feel his pulse, and mark his speech or his actions; and every symptom tells you that he is doing violence to his physical and mental constitution. Some can bear this ill-treatment for a longer series of years than others, but the men or women have never yet been born that could be guilty of this folly, and live out all their days. As years increase, the truth unfolds itself in the palsied hand, the tremulous gait, the bilious, sallow, pale, bloated, swollen, or reddened features, and the diseased stomach, liver, or intestines. We have seen men at forty, more feeble than they ought to have been at eighty, and all through what is conventionally termed, Moderation.

This lavish waste of human health, and sacrifice of intellectual power, can never be favorable to the revival and growth of religion. So vast and extensive is the evil, that in entering on this subject we touch an almost endless theme. If medical men would tell us what they have seen and known on this point, we query whether there is a moderate drinker in the land, but would instantly dash the glass from his lips and sign the pledge. In addition to the two hindrances to the prosperity of religion arising from the moderate drinking of professing christians, which we noticed in our last paper, it may be remarked, further,

That INTOXICATING DRINKS PRODUCE LEVITY OR INSENSIBILITY.—I have known the holiest men sleep under sermons that seemed almost calculated to arouse the dead; aye, and have been thus periodically overcome, after having devoted hours to special prayer; that the REDEEMER would interfere and save them from this painful and soul-starving drowsiness. As usual in those days, the matter was placed in the category of Mysteries! or perhaps Divine sovereignty was arraigned as the sole cause!

And yet there was no enigma in the case. These pious gentlemen ate very heartily, drank their regular quantity of beer or porter, and thus threw themselves into a deep sleep, from which nothing but a miracle, as much requiring divine agency as the resurrection of Lazarus, could rescue them. The hop in the liquor is a soporific, and joined to a full meal was as fine a prescription to produce slumber in the House of God as Morpheus himself could devise. Only think of the presumption of the man who should take laudanum, or syrup of poppies, and then pray for a miracle to be wrought to keep him awake! Give to any number of hearers a pint of ale or porter each before going to the House of God, and satan would not dread the conversion of one of them, though Michael, the Archangel, were the preacher. It is the testimony of hundreds who have signed the Total Abstinence pledge, and since joined the Church, that the stupidity occasioned by beer and porter prevented their attending to the word which they heard, and thus deferred their faith and repentance; but as soon as they abandoned their soporific drinks, their heads became clear, and they "heard and feared and turned to the Lord."

Would that the ministers of the sanctuary would reflect that in using and commending the intoxicating cup, they are encouraging their hearers to take a draught which, more than any other impediment, defeats the object which the preaching of the Gospel contemplates, and thus drowns men in perdition. Millions of moderate ale and porter drinkers owe their ruin to the fatal cup.

But strange as it may appear, LEVITY may arise from using intoxicating beverages. This effect is not new; for Solomon tells us that there was, in his day, one kind of "strong drink" which would make persons rage, and another which produced drowsiness, and a forgetfulness of the law. Beer and ale are drugged with hops, and often with what is worse, eminently adapted to produce mental obtuseness. Other liquors are exhilarating, and from their influence, the recipient treats all subjects with levity. He laughs at every thing, and, perhaps, especially at religion. You rarely find him in a serious mood, and never, perhaps, earnest, except in the pursuit of pleasure. We have known not only Christianity, but business and intellectual pursuits neglected by these triflers. Many a parent has seen his own, or his son's name in the Gazette, solely from that thoughtfulness and carelessness which alcohol had generated. The taste for light reading in our age, and which is so fatal to all deep study, may be traced to the same cause. Our most popular literature is written for the drinkers of stimulants, who must have something to make them laugh. Idle and foolish mirth is the most active passion of the day. And this spirit is become so prevalent, that even the solemn realities of Christianity have but little power to awaken reflection. The votaries of the bottle or the barrel are too merry to be the serious worshippers of God. They enter, and leave the sanctuary with levity. They laugh at every thing. The grandeurs or solemnities of the gospel create in them no "searchings of heart." The most seraphic devotedness, or the deepest depravity, are subjects of merriment.

We are no advocates of asceticism, or moroseness in religion; we do not ask for sighs and "a sad countenance," as evidences of grace. Christianity is a gladsome faith; it fills the heart with love, and cheers it with the sense of divine favour, and the joy of the HOLY GHOST. But then the cheerfulness that it imparts is as far from levity as light from darkness. Man is the only creature in this world that laughs, hence he has been called the "laughing animal." The gift is intellectual and divine, but then, like every other talent, it may be perverted or abused. There is the laugh of the maniac, of the vacant, the thoughtless, the trifler, the mocker, the sarcastic, and the scoffer: and there is also the laugh of pure pleasure, satisfaction, and rational mirth. Many of our moderate drinkers laugh involuntarily. The liquor they take plays upon their nerves and muscles, and, very often, the act is rather sardonic, or convulsive, than arising from any definite motive. But the practice at length becomes an inveterate habit, and to sport with everything sacred and profane is their daily custom. Thousands of these triflers every Sabbath day attend the sanctuary. We have Ministers, who, in the name of every thing sacred and awful, warn them to be thoughtful and serious, and yet these very heralds of mercy bless and dispense the cup that makes their hearers trifle with salvation and eternity! We have parents wrestling with God to awaken their children to be devout, and then recommending the liquor which renders them careless and indifferent. "I never became serious," said a young man when about to join our church, "until I abandoned strong drink. The liquor I used before the service made me sleep or trifle, and what I took after caused me to laugh and sport with the most awful truths. But when I signed the pledge I began to think, and my religious convictions followed me until I gave myself to the Saviour."

Such examples as these might be produced by the hundred. Multitudes, because they drink moderately, are at this moment sporting on the verge of perdition, and on the other hand, numbers are on the way to heaven who have become thoughtful since they have been Teetotalers. There is therefore an awful amount of guilt at the door of those persons who still continue to use and recommend these pestilential beverages. An earnest man is always consistent. His heart is set on one object, and he does all in his power to accomplish it. The wrestler, the hunter, the racer, the gambler, are all earnest men, and act accordingly. Whoever heard of any one of these ardent minds labouring to defeat the purpose on which his heart is set? The apostle alludes to this when he says, "He who striveth is temperate in all things." Every thing is done that can forward his desire, and all things avoided that would be likely to defeat his wishes. And earnestness in religion is not different in character from fervour in other pursuits; and consequently it does not confine itself to devout aspirations or passionate harangues. If these alone could have moved heaven and earth, we should have had the world converted long ago. Paroxysms of fervour for the salvation of mankind have not been uncommon. We have had "anxious seats," and "revival meetings," in great numbers, but still our object has not been obtained. It is not unusual to set this solemn fact down to the mysteries of providence, or divine sovereignty; but there is no need of this folly or presumption. The natural history of our want of success in religion could as easily be written, as the failure of the atmospheric railway. We are not really IN EARNEST. We do not bring all things, and all times to bear on this point. We undo more than we do, and in nothing more effectually than by the use of strong drink. We dose our children or friends with a liquor that paralyses them with drowsiness, or stultifies them with levity, and then we read the Scriptures, go to prayer, or take them to the house of God! Were the votaries of the turf to administer sporifrics to their steeds before they brought them out to run, or the gambler to take large quantities of laudanum before sitting down to his table, such folly would only be a parallel to ours in professing to seek the salvation of souls, while we madly recommend, and perhaps administer, to them a beverage, which unfits them for seriousness and thoughtfulness in religion.

We must show our earnestness for the salvation of the world or the prosperity of the Church, as we do our faith. "Works," and "works" alone, are the only satisfactory evidence of sincerity, and among these, self-denial and Total Abstinence must be prominent.

So many important considerations arise out of this subject, that we feel it our duty to resume it at an early period.

TEMPERANCE AMONG THE GERMANS.

Though it has been found very difficult to bring the German population of this country (America) under the influence of the temperance reform, yet there are some gratifying exceptions to the general remark, especially in the reformed Church of Pennsylvania. The following resolutions were adopted by the highest court in that church, the Synod at Greencastle:—

"Whereas the Synod regards the influence of intemperance, as a lamentable obstacle to the progress of the Gospel, and equally injurious to the temporal and eternal interests of men, therefore.

"Resolved—That we will not only ourselves abstain from the use of spirituous liquors, but also as much lays in our power, promote the cause of temperance by our influence in our congregations.

"Resolved—That in view of the light furnished by experience of the evil results of intemperance, the Synod regards the manufacture, the sale, and use of spirituous liquors as an evil which ought to be banished from the church."

It will be observed that ardent spirits only are embraced in this prohibition. At a meeting of the Susquehanna classis, held at Freeburg, the whole ground of total abstinence was taken, as appears by the following resolution:—

"Resolved—That inasmuch as intemperance in the use of strong drink is such a great evil in the world, and whereas it appears, from the reports of the different ministers of classis that this evil is everywhere in our bounds on the increase, rather than decrease, that we consider that those who are engaged in the sale of strong drink as a beverage, commit a great sin in the sight of God—that they stand in the way of the progress of Christ's Kingdom, and make themselves partakers of the sins of others. We therefore solemnly and earnestly warn such against continuing in such business, and we enjoy it upon every Consistory in our bounds to bring this testimony to bear in love and faith, upon all who may be engaged in this business within their bounds."

SERMON TO TEETOTALERS.

On Tuesday evening, the 7th. ult., the Rev. JAMES SHERMAN preached his Annual Temperance Sermon, in Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars Road, London. He selected for his text Galatians vi. 9. "Let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—elfishness, the preacher observed, was the leading principle of action in human nature; and the grand object of the Christian religion was to pluck up that principle by the roots, and to inspire the soul with a principle of love, inducing the possessor to practice self-denial for the good of others. There were many things in the world which were contrary to the Gospel, and hindrances to the progress of religion, and it should be the object of every Christian to remove those hindrances, so that "the word of the Lord might have free course and be glorified." One of the most prolific sources of evil—one of the chief hindrances to the spread of religion—was the use of INTOXICATING DRINKS among all classes of the community: and Temperance men were leagued together to abolish their use: they were engaged, therefore, in a good work, or in "well doing." To constitute any work "Good," it must be regulated by a good rule—it must be formed on a good principle—it must be influenced by a good motive—it must be performed in a good manner—it must be directed to a good end. These elements were all to be found in the zealous and enlightened advocacy of Total Abstinence from strong drink: it was therefore a good work, or "well doing." But human nature was apt to grow "weary" and to "faint," and he had reason to fear that was but too much the case with teetotalers. Some of them had been discouraged by difficulties, others had sunk into a state of supineness, and some had adopted practices which either made them idle, or marred their usefulness. Teetotalism, like religion, needed occasional revivals, and its members needed stirring up. He considered the exhortation in the text, therefore, to be suitable and necessary at the present moment, when Teetotal zeal certainly appeared to be declining. He proposed to consider.

I. THE CAUSES OF WEARIENESS IN WELL-DOING.

1. Difficulties. These might arise from the nature of the work itself, or from the conscious insufficiency of the advocates. As to the work itself, it had to encounter ignorance, prejudice, early formed habits, old rooted opinions, the authority of parents and friends. Wives, and Doctors, and Ministers, and old companions, all protested against an attack on ancient opinions and customs: hence weariness in the advocacy. But why grow weary at that account? Did not difficulties surround every good and noble work? And why should a Christian faint at the sight of them? What were difficulties before Omnipotence? Then, as to the difficulties arising from personal insufficiency. "I am a poor weak creature"—"I have no talent;" and other excuses for want of exertion were made, which such persons would not allow in reference to the transaction of their worldly affairs. Such excuses had often been pleaded, even by prophets and other good men; but they were always ill founded, and had been instantly rebuked. True, no man was sufficient for any great work of himself, but at his sufficiency was of God, he ought to apply himself diligently to his work. God accomplished his designs by means of the weakest instruments.

2. The troubles to which the work exposes. The misrepresentations of friends, and the aspersions of enemies. The advocates are charged with innovation, enthusiasm, fanaticism, &c. But how strange for a man who had been reclaimed by the practice of Total Abstinence to complain of troubles! Let him call to mind the troubles he experienced when a drunkard; his comfortless habitation, his miserable family, his impoverished circumstances. Let him contrast with these his present comforts, and be ashamed to allege troubles as a reason for his weariness in well doing. Let the Christian, especially, think on the trials and sufferings Christ endured for his sake, and no longer be weary or negligent. Nothing good or great was ever accomplished without trouble.

3. Want of success. We must remember that success is the reward and not the rule of labour. Besides, we cannot always ascertain our success: when the right time comes, we shall have plenty of success. Christ laboured for thirty-three years, and his success was comparatively small: but he persevered, and Christians must copy his example.

II. THE NECESSITY OF PERSEVERANCE IN WELL DOING.

1. There was never a period so well prepared for exertion on behalf of Temperance as the present moment.—The early advocates found opposition at every step—in every house. That men could be healthy, vigorous, and comfortable without a little strong drink, was thought absurd and ridiculous. There were but a few stray opinions in favour of abstinence. But how different the case now! Judges, one after the other, declared that but for intemperance they would have little or nothing to do. Magistrates implored the aid of teetotalers. Hundreds of ships sailed, in dangerous and hot climates, without spirits on board, and did well. Millions in Ireland and in this country, and in various parts of the world, were rejoicing in the numerous blessings of Total Abstinence. Publications, full of intelligence and argument, were circulating in all directions. Prejudices were fast giving way, and thousands were driven to the necessity of saying, "Well, the fact is, I like it, and I will take it." A long line of medical men, to the number of fifteen hundred, from the physicians of the Court to the practitioners in the parish Unions, bore testimony to the value of the principle. And was the present a time to be weary? Most of the barricades were taken, and the citadel itself would soon surrender, if teetotalers were but sufficiently impressed with the importance of their principles, and sufficiently in earnest in their propagation.

2. The peculiar aspect of the present times seems to urge to perseverance. It is a time of much trouble, and troubles often drove men to drink. There was a stagnation of commerce: labour was obtained with difficulty, and wages were low. Men's hearts were failing them for fear, and each seemed to say, "What will befall us next? These were certainly times in which men ought to have clear heads—heads free from the influence of strong drinks. It was not a time to grow weary, or to rest on their oars, but rather to ply them more lustily. Providence was presenting one great cause of sorrow, which demanded the exertions of Teetotalers for the mitigation and cure. A fatal disease was in the country; many had been attacked, and some had died. Without wishing to excite alarm, it could not be concealed that it had reached our country, and our metropolis. Bad dwellings, want of cleanliness, and due ventilation, were predisposing causes, but it was notorious that drunkenness was the chief cause, or the greatest aggravation. It had been demonstrated that its most malignant attacks were upon drunkards, while Teetotalers were rarely attacked, and almost invariably recovered. It was the testimony of eminent medical men, in this country and in America, that even the moderate use of intoxicating liquors predisposed for Cholera. Drunkards were carried off at once, but moderate drinkers became easy victims. From the "American Documents" it appeared after minute examination, that while one in sixty of the drunkards who were attacked died, only one in two thousand five hundred of the Teetotalers who were attacked died. The enemy was in the land, and therefore the present was not a time to grow "weary" or to "faint."

3. The gratitude which Teetotalers owed for the personal benefits they had derived from the practice of Total Abstinence, should urge them to exertion. Was it true that some who owed much to Teetotalism had become weary of its propagation? Had some merely exchanged the public-house for the coffee shop, indulging in cards, in bagatelle, in gambling, and in those abominations of modern times, "Sweepstakes;" changing nothing but the mere drink? Had any ceased to be Secretaries of Temperance Societies, because they had a betting book or a lottery to attend to? O let them think on the benefits they had derived in former days from the practice of Total Abstinence, and be very zealous to carry on the work, remembering the shortness of time and the uncertainty of life.

4. The misery of multitudes and the numerous facilities which presented themselves for the prosecution of the work, should urge to diligence. Let them reflect how many victims of intemperance died in the course of one year. Let them reflect on the state of the bodies, the minds, the circumstances of drunkards. (Mr. Sherman here read a note requesting the prayers of the audience in behalf of a poor widow, whose husband had hung himself after a fit of drunkenness; and also, part of a letter from a Missionary to China, relating the very narrow escape from total destruction, by fire, of the vessel and crew, in consequence of one of the sailors setting fire to some spirits which were on board.) He then called upon Teetotalers to look into workhouses and prisons, and mark the numerous inmates brought thither by intemperance. It may be said of many of these that they seemed happy, and that it was a pity to disturb them; but their happiness was unreal and transitory; they were really in danger, and it was the duty of Christians to arouse them, and instruct them in the way of safety and true happiness. As the evil was working daily and extensively, it became their duty to work zealously with the remedy. IN CONCLUSION, the preacher urged his audience to various duties in connexion with his subject.

1. To some he would say, Begin well doing. If any were not Teetotalers, he would urge them to become such, and without delay: it would improve their health, their character, their temper, their usefulness, and would give them no cause for regret. And let them become Teetotalers for the good of others. He feared, with respect to many, that it was not arguments they wanted, but inclination. Let them sign the pledge at once, and aim to be useful.

2. Let them be liberal to the associations in their locality. He feared that many Societies were declining for want of funds. Let them remember what they owed to the cause, and by cheerful and regular contributions aid the great work.

3. Let them remember that faith in Christ alone can save their souls. Religion was the one thing needful. Christ was the great Physician of souls, and his blood was the only effectual remedy for the diseases of human nature. Let them be sober and useful, but let them, above all things, secure the salvation of their souls.

The spacious chapel was well filled; and many persons took the advice given them by the preacher, and signed the pledge of Total Abstinence.

STRONG DRINKS.

Written by a Negro Boy in the Normal School, Berbice, West Indies.

They say, 'tis pleasant on the lip,
And merry on the brain;
They say it stirs the sluggish blood,
And dulls the tooth of pain.
Ay—but within its glowing deeps
A stinging serpent unseen sleeps.

Its rosy lights will turn to fire;
Its coolness change to thirst;
And, by its mirth, within the brain
A sleepless worm is nurst:
There's not a bubble at the brim
That does not carry food for him.

THE DRUNKARD'S CHILDREN.

BY J. N. STONE.

HERE is a tale for the juveniles: a short story. Bless their little hearts, we would not give them a long one, lest they should leave it half read, and go and ride their hobbies, and never have patience to read it again.

There was once a boy—now don't cry yet; for there has been once a boy and twice a boy; but this we would have you to know, was a certain boy that lived in a certain place—we are not permitted to tell where. His mother became a woman of sorrow and died. That grieves us, but truth must be told. He and a little sister were left alone—alone, for their father was a drunkard.—Hand in hand they went forth into the street, and sat down upon a marble carriage-step, fronting a large brick dwelling. The cold stone seat struck another chill to their desolate little hearts; they looked into the windows of the rich mansion, and saw young faces bright and happy there, glowing in the sunshine of health and plenty; and they wept. It made them feel more keenly their own hopeless condition.

And there they sat—without covering to their heads or shoes to their feet, and their thin garments all "tattered and torn." A cold October wind blew upon them. They shivered and sat closer, and put their little feet together to keep them warm. As the stranger passed, they instinctively covered their pale faces to conceal their tears. At length a gentleman addressed them.

"Children, run home," said he; "why do you sit here and freeze?"

"Our mother has gone and left us," replied the boy.

"There is no one left but my dear little sister and me, we looked at her old rocking chair, and saw it empty; and it made us cry and feel lonesome."

"And did she send you out to beg while she was gone?" asked the stranger.

"Oh, no," returned the boy, "dear mother taught us never to beg. Besides, she will never come back any more; for they put her into a coffin, and took her away, and told us she was dead." And their tears ran afresh.

"But your father," queried the stranger, "where is he?"

The children shuddered perceptibly, but shook their heads, and made no reply. Their little hearts swelled with pride, and choked their utterance. They could not speak the words, "Our father is a drunkard!"

The stranger who had seemed rough and coarse in his manner, was touched. He quickly surmized the truth, and asked of the boy—

"What are your names, my little lad?"

"Mary and James Wilford," he quickly replied.

"The children of William Milford?" muttered the stranger with evident emotion, in a tone of half enquiry, as if to satisfy a suddenly recurring idea.

"Yes, sir!" responded the boy and at this moment the rude wind played roughly with their bare heads, and pierced their thin garments; he boy drew his sister still closer to his side; and the stranger was gone. In a few minutes after, a lady with a kind benevolent face, and we trust a warm heart, came and took them by the hand and led them away.

A short time after this we attended a Temperance meeting. One of the speakers, in the course of his remarks, related as follows:

"For many years I kept a dram shop. I heard of temperance doings in divers ways, and ridiculed them; I went to their meetings and made sport. I beheld the moderate drinker commence his course and sink into the rot. I heard of wives being murdered, and children beggared through the influence of strong drink, and was unmoved. All argument assailed me in vain, for I was hardened in my course. One cold windy day I walked into the street, and saw a little boy and girl half naked and shivering, sitting on a stone step. They were a drunkard's children. Their father had begun his drinking course and squandered much of his property at my bar. His wife, a young and lovely woman, and once happy and joyous, had sunk into the grave, sorrowing and broken hearted. The sight of these motherless children so suffering and innocent—too noble to beg—too proud to own their father was a drunkard—accomplished what every other argument had failed to do. And I felt within my breast the sting of a murderer. From that day I never sold a drop of liquor. I took the children into my own family, and they shall never want while I have a dollar to divide."—It was James and Mary.

He paused. At this moment the pledge went round, and was spread upon the table. A man in ragged and filthy garb came forward and subscribed his name. It was WILLIAM MILFORD.

My dear young readers, this is one little sketch, snatched from the myriad of facts around us. If it interest you, the writer may one day give you another.—New York Organ.

INCONSISTENT TEETOTALERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—I have read No. 11 of your Periodical with much pleasure, I think it one of the best. In it there appears a letter on a subject which I have more than once thought to address you upon, viz.: "On giving strong drinks to others." As I expect it will elicit remarks from others who will be better able to do good service to the cause, I shall satisfy myself with offering fewer than I otherwise should. I agree fully with your correspondent when he says that it is both inconsistent and dangerous to do so; but inconsistent and dangerous as it is, I know there are those who themselves are total abstainers, who, in this way, place temptation before others; and I believe they do it often with the most sincere hope that the temptation will not prove powerful enough. I have been asked to take intoxicating drinks at the table of a teetotaler, and when I have avowed my principles, I have heard the word of approval, while another by my side has taken of the poison as though he feared it would be rebuking his teetotal host too severely if he refused his provision of good cheer. In my own mind I hardly know which feeling prevailed, surprise or regret. I believe, however, (and I can only draw my conclusions from what I have observed), that these provisions have been made, either on account of a superabundance of kindness in the natural disposition, or from the fear lest the charge of an ungenerous parsimony should be laid by the visitor against the host, or from the notion that non-provision will be construed into a declaration that the friend who is entertained is destitute of the power of self-government, or likely to become a drunkard. But I would ask, can I be a total abstainer from principle, and violate my principles at every turn? Can there be a love of kindness which requires it? Can there be a love of hospitality which requires it? I think, Sir, we have but to act from principle, and we shall find no difficulty in keeping from giving any sanction to any evil custom. I have been a total abstainer for some years, I have seen much harm done to the temperance cause by a want of decision on this point; at whatever risk, therefore, I have resolved not to provide for others what I could not conscientiously take myself, and all I have had to bear for my resolution has been a passing joke, or, sometimes, perhaps rather a severe sarcasm. But I believe I have reason on my side, I believe I have principle on my side, and I am too well shielded by these to feel the wounds of the weapons which are lifted against me; or if I feel for a moment the sting, I find I have always a remedy at hand in an approving conscience. Let us act from principle,—that is the motto I would give.

Hoping that others will take up this subject, I will not now trouble you further.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,

IOTA.

LICENSED SIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—I have just read the following in a penny periodical:—

"A French company of gamblers pays to the Grand Duke of Hesse Domstaadt, for the privilege of keeping three gambling tables at Hamburg, the sum of 180,000 florins annually; besides giving the grand duke the freehold of a magnificent palace, and a right to all it contains at the expiration of ten years."

Now I wish to be informed why our Government do not also raise a revenue in a similar manner, by selling licenses to gambling houses. I believe they do derive a revenue from stamps on cards and dice—the gambling tools—and thus they countenance their use; but, curiously enough, the law prohibits their use, except perhaps in private families. Now it is evident, from the above extract, that if the licensing system were adopted here, in gambling as it is in DRINK—and it could not possibly do more harm—there might be a very handsome sum thus raised for the purposes of our government who need it much at present; so much so indeed that they cannot just now conveniently engage in any war in any part of the world! Is not this a melancholy fact? If we had licensed "Hells" for GAMBLING on the same liberal scale that we now enjoy in GIN PALACES, groggeries, hotels, and beer houses, it would enable us to "spread the gospel in foreign lands" on a much more extended scale, in our accustomed mode,—by fire and sword!

Surely it cannot be objected to this suggestion, that gambling is immoral, when we see our Christian parliament—so very Christian as to deny admittance to Jews—postpone the business of the nation, the other day, to attend a horse race—the very essence of which is gambling.

Lotteries formerly yielded a large sum, and why they were put down I never could guess, (it was said that "they encouraged gambling"); but I am inclined to think that the granting of licenses for "Hells" all over the country, would be immeasurably more productive. The magistrates, who so wisely exercise the power conferred on them of granting licenses to respectable persons for the sale of wines, spirits and malt liquors, would, no doubt, consult the public weal, equally well, in this choice of hell-keepers. The gambling and the drinking licenses might, or might not, be taken out by the same respectable individuals! but if I might presume to hazard an opinion on such a delicate question of Morals, I would recommend their union, believing they would reciprocally aid each other prodigiously; but I leave this point to the tender mercies of the House of Lords, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day, whenever this mighty Reform is brought forward. I do not anticipate any opposition from the Spiritual Peers, seeing that they say "content" to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, and seeing that gambling is an "Institution" as much to be revered, and as ancient, as that of drinking; and if men will only use them both in Moderation, they will find them EQUALLY harmless and salubrious!

In fine; the army and navy must be kept to the present standard, at the very least; and what care we that nearly two thousand medical men have given their opinion;—"That total and universal abstinence from alcoholic liquors and intoxicating beverages of all sorts, would greatly contribute to the health, the prosperity, the morality, and the happiness of the human race."

Sincerely your friend,

EBENEZER SHACKLETON.

THE "TEARE TESTIMONIAL."

We are requested by WILLIAM JANSON, Esq., to acknowledge the receipt of £16 7s., from a few friends at Penzance, by Mr. JOHN ORGAN.

AN URGENT CALL TO SUPPLY A GREAT WANT.

INSTEAD of writing on some point of medical treatment, allow me to suggest a plan, this month, to be started with the new year.

The great thing to weigh with Medical Practitioners is EXPERIENCE. They are accustomed to treat diseases after a certain known method; and into most of our methods Alcohol enters as a supposed remedy. The question is, how can we get to know the results of non-alcoholic treatment? A case here, and another there, in private practice will occupy years (I was going to write centuries,) in accumulating the necessary amount of evidence. I propose then to open Dispensaries in a few of our large towns, for the express purpose of treating patients without one drop of alcohol, either as medicine or as diet. Let a careful record of cases be kept and published, and then let us note the results.

I should think £100 would do for one Dispensary for a year: say £60 for drugs and appliances, £20 for rent of a suitable room, and £20 for one who would act as dispenser and clerk. About six (out-)patients could be treated for each pound, so in one year (not a long time to wait,) according to the above plan 360 cases might be reported upon. Now if the drinking usages and the doctors' prescriptions are, as Mr. DUNLOP says, the two pillars of drunkenness, here is a feasible plan for undermining at least one of them!

I allow nothing for physicians' and surgeons' remuneration; they attend other Dispensaries gratuitously, and surely might assist in this most interesting and magnificent experiment. I contend not for gratuitous labour in general, but surely, if ever excusable it would be here.

A Dispensary would provide only for out-patients, but then if the report was favourable to Teetotal practice (as I doubt not it would be), I think it would have weight enough to prevail on some one or more of our great hospital Physicians and Surgeons to try the non-alcoholic plan in some of their wards for twelve months.

Let me recommend this to the notice of Teetotal editors.

Could not three places try, so as to get 1000 cases? Say London, Leeds, and Manchester. I shall be happy to head the first subscription list that opens, with a promise of £5.

H. MUDGE.

Bodmin, Cornwall, Nov. 13, 1848.

REV. MICHAEL CASTLEDEN.

DIED, suddenly, on Sunday, Nov. 5th, at the house of his grandson, Mr. M. J. Castleden, Cottage Grove, Mile End Road, the Rev. M. Castleden, of Woburn (Beds), in the 79th year of his age. We understand that he had engaged to preach at Coverdale Chapel on that day. On the preceding Saturday night he retired to rest in his usual health. On the morning he was found in bed in a state of insensibility, and shortly after expired! His sudden death is attributed to disease of the heart.

Nov. 11th, the remains of the deceased were interred in the burial ground, connected with the Independent Chapel, at Woburn. The procession left the house about twenty minutes past noon.

Lord C. J. F. Russell, out of respect to the departed,—having intimated a wish to be allowed to accompany the remains to the grave,—walked first, supported by the Rev. J. Andrews on the right, and the Rev. H. Hutton, A.M., Rector of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, London, on the left.—The Rev. T. P. Bull, of Newport Pagnell, and the Rev. J. Jukes, of Bedford, next:—after these, the three deacons of the church, Messrs. Hill, Osborn, and Wright, and Mr. Geo. Gascoyen, of Birchmoor. Then was carried the corpse, borne by six members of the Church; the pall being supported by the Revs. Edward Adey, of Leighton Buzzard, J. K. Brooks, of Kidgmount, Josiah Bull, A.M., of Newport, W. C. Robinson, of Amphill, J. Sleight, of Hockliffe, and Charles Mears, Esq., of London. The two sons, grandson, and three nephews of the departed, were chief mourners, followed by many members of the Church and congregation, over whom he had presided for forty eight years; also by many of the respectable inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood, and by representatives of the Woburn and Apsley-guise Temperance Society, with which the departed had long been connected, and by whose members he was greatly beloved.

As soon as the cortège arrived at the Chapel, the remains were carried within. After singing the hymn—"Hear what the voice from heaven proclaims, &c.," the Rev. T. P. Bull read part of the 15th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, and offered prayer. The Rev. J. Andrews, of Woburn, successor of the deceased, pronounced the funeral oration, and gave out a hymn. The remains were then carried to the grave, and having been deposited, the Rev. J. Jukes made a few remarks to the spectators, and concluded with prayer. A large concourse of people attended, and but for the services of the Police, the chapel and grounds would have been most inconveniently thronged.

SPECIAL MEETING AT EXETER HALL.

A MEETING, expected to be one of considerable interest, is announced to take place in EXETER HALL, on the evening of Monday, December the 18th. The Chair is to be occupied by Mr. JOHN CASSELL, and specific topics are allotted to various well-known Advocates, as follows:—

The Claims of the Temperance Reformation; by JABEZ INWARDS.

Illustrations of Moderate Drinking; by THOMAS HUDSON.

Teetotalism and the Constitution; by THOMAS WHITTAKER.

Immorality of the Traffic; by JAMES TEARE.

Popular fallacies respecting Strong Drinks; by THOMAS ALLEN SMITH.

The Chair is announced to be taken at SIX o'clock. The doors are to be opened at FIVE o'clock, and as the speakers are popular, and the topics interesting, a crowded Hall may be expected. We therefore advise all who wish to enjoy the treat, to be there early.

STATISTICS OF DISTILLERIES.—It is estimated that the present number of distilleries in the United States is 10,500; the number of gallons of liquor distilled annually is 41,502,709; which, if sold at 20 cents per gallon, would produce 80,000,000,000 of quarrels, half a million of assaults and batteries; 100,000 thefts; 800 suicides, and about 100 murders.

ELEMENTS OF SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

BY DALMOCAND.

MAN is a being progressive and immortal. True, the body crumbles into dissolution, but the body is not the man—the living soul removes to an unending world, and, at the final restitution, returns but to claim its former tenement. The lower creation, after advancing to a certain point, come to a stand, their instinctive and docile powers will carry them no farther; while man, the 'lord of the creation,' being endowed with superior faculties and facilities, is rendered capable of rising higher and higher above infantine ignorance and feebleness. Keeping these realities before us, it may not prove unreasonable to turn our attention for a little to the topic above indicated, namely, SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

I take for granted that this is something which we all, without exception, need. Well, improvement's best auxiliary seems self-acquaintance. For this end, we must take cognizance of what we have and want; or, in other words, find what we are and are not. To know ourselves is the grand precept both of philosophy and inspiration; yet self-ignorance appears the most prevailing feature of mankind. Multitudes, from hearsay and inspection, become familiar with their respective names and outward forms, but the agency of meditation and of Scripture to scan the peculiarities of the inner man, they seldom use; as with the lisping child excusably, so happens it, without excuse, with many "children of a larger growth."

Self-study, although arduous, especially at first, must be persevered in. It is a sure stepping-stone to knowledge; and knowledge must be accounted the producer of power, and assistant to virtue and happiness in an eminent degree; yea, without knowledge happiness would be delirium; virtue, a non-entity; and power, weakness. Pleasant as turns out the path of wisdom, and bounteous as is the return of pleasurable profit which her patient wooing yields, few, relatively speaking, walk heartily therein.

To illustrate the blessings which general knowledge is calculated to confer on any land, let us compare the present condition of our country with what it was some centuries back. The contrast will reveal horrid deeds of superstition, ferocity, and crime, as peculiar to an age of darkness, while only incidental in an age of light. Britain, by Science and the Gospel, has effected much in every way, but much remains undone—bestir thyself likewise, O Erin!—dim truth is God's life-lamp in thy midst. Seeing that it is progression in the individual which leads to progression in the mass, each entrusted with a single talent rests under obligation to press onward. Men may inherit titles, wealth, and lands which they can assume and hold without exertion, but none can inherit a mind replete with varied knowledge. So far as the acquisition of the latter is concerned, there must be harboured no unseemly sloth—in the intellectual field each aspirant to success must till, and sow, and reap. He that employs aright the means of elevation placed within his reach, obeys what interest and duty mark: he that wanders with content amid the groves of ignorance, heedful only of his body, shows himself a mere animal, distinguishable chiefly by speech, posture, and habiliments, from the thistle-munching ranger of the meadow.

If a desire for self-improvement actuates thee, reader, (as the lending of thine eye may testify!) then the path lies open. Numberless were the obstacles and trials which the pursuit of intellectual excellence entailed in former times, ingenious the resources which grim necessity compelled the child of genius and poverty to plan. Imagine, for instance, Gifford, for lack of paper, solving problems on a piece of leather with his awl—problems secretly extracted from another's treatise at the midnight watch; Duval, searching the heavens through a reed; Ferguson, the shepherd boy, taking the position of the stars simply with a thread of beads; or the carver's son, the embryo

Sir Humphrey Davy, experimenting with rude chemical apparatus in the garret of his startled master. But these discouragements need not now be said to have existence: implements of philosophy may be easily found, and books on every theme in numbers throw themselves before us, warbling with enchanting voice of cheapness—"Come and use me!" Every town, and almost every hamlet, contains its circulating store of learning, which for a trifling sum flies open to the self-improver.

Yet, amid the facilities for improvement afforded by the present age, who has not to upbraid himself with some measure of remissness in one or more particulars?—how few can say that the utmost diligence has been excited! Loiterers, triflers, and tavern ornaments in these days abound. The science of potation seems surpassingly in vogue, as the still numerous attended class-rooms of Professor Boniface, under whose forming hand, man—reason-gifted man—becomes a spirit-lamp, may witness. Particles of time must not be looked upon as nearly valueless, minutes make the hour, and ere now fragments have been husbanded for noble execution. One Frenchman in particular, whose name escapes me, by snatching ten minutes daily penned a voluminous and useful work. Then with what propriety might not the feeding hours of certain circles be abridged? Says the proverb, "Time is an estate"—if true, wherefore so profusely squandered?

So advantageously placed, let each with energy endeavour to improve. In every investigation, let truth—the pure truth—be our aim. To assist advancement, every antipathy or predilection should, as much as possible, be cast aside, and calm comprehensive judgment taken as our telescope—with it let mind and matter, self inclusive, be pried into and studied. At first, things will appear dim and uncertain, but as we get better light, and to the proper focus, distinctness will gradually succeed, and truth, though often shadowed with a passing cloud, will be observed in much of its famed symmetry and beauty. None therefore should neglect his intellectual powers, or deem proficiency in knowledge undeserving of some care.

In our reading, some degree of system must be followed. It will not do to take the butterfly's journal for our textbook: everlasting roaming will not greatly profit. When a production of acknowledged merit, but demanding earnest thought, is presented to our notice, and with which we resolve to make acquaintance, the common error of commencing with such intimacy as to produce surfeit must be shunned. Books of value would less frequently be laid aside unmastered, were moderate portions read at stated intervals: systematic effort only, be it remembered, will scale or tunnel mountains, and it alone can envelop study with triumphal robes. When gems of lustre meet the eye, let them be connover over, and transferred to memory's 'strong box': when filth or demoury (now-a-days how rampant!) unexpectedly obtrude, let the corrupting agent be dismissed—who can dally with defilement undefiled? What and how we read, are points essential to healthful progress. Certain viands are possessed of bulk but little nutriment—fish for example—yet, speaking by analogy, thousands with respect to intellectual matters observe unbroken Lent.

If any make age a plea for inactivity, I'll quote the fact that many of our intellectual great ones displayed but little brilliancy in early years—nay, were considered dull and common-place. Thus stood the case with Shakspeare, Walter Scott, Adam Clarke, and others. Moreover, when we look into the chronicles of literature, we find some individuals at sixty vigorously commencing the study of a foreign language, and others also advanced in life just entering on the alphabet. Who, then, within the circuit of my readers can tell but that there lies smouldering in his breast a spark of genuine fire, waiting only to be fanned to burst forth into flame! Let all unite in busy emulation, and let none despair.

In addition, MORAL improvement, or heart-work, must never be lost sight of: it should continually occupy the larger portion of our thoughts, for assuredly its prosecution demands no little application. Egregiously wicked and deceitful is the heart—what man can fathom it! Yet, notwithstanding, each will consult his highest interest in attempting to explore this chamber of dark imagery, and to root out every idol. Men, forgetful of the sufficiency of work at home, sometimes desire to look into a neighbour's heart; but it is only in self scrutiny we are called upon to labour and to cherish hope, for who, save one's own spirit, can know with any certainty its own intricacies? Although men have held out to them a promise of superior aid while thus engaged, the heart, for most part, remains, like the dreary wastes of Africa, a region UNEXPLORED.

But sluggishness and things sensual must be strenuously resisted when one determines to press forward to perfection's goal. Each should discover his peculiar or besetting sins—for all err, though not in the same way. Satan, bent on the destruction of our race, and eager to succeed by pleasing, supplies articles of inconceivable variety and charm, for which the sons of men, in orders large or small, give him custom hourly. Does it not then concern us to seek with earnestness for grace, that we may leave this swindler and his wares alone, and confine our dealings to that honest Merchant who in his circular, the "Book of Books," makes proclamation of his terms? Well may the student of improvement sing:—

Oh! why with rebels should I band,
In ruin's highway dreaming go,
When Jesus beckons with his hand,
And bids me his salvation know?

Man at creation was not vile,
Within him truth unsullied reigned;
But sin allured him with its smile,
And moral blight an entrance gained.

Each fleeting moment carries hence
Its countless slain to bliss or woe—
Kind Jesus! be thou my defence,
Before thee I would contrite bow.

Lord, from corruption set me free,
Let blessing, love, and grace descend,
That I, through life, may cling to thee
As Father, Counsellor, and Friend.

How much more befitting must such breathings be regarded than irrational oblivion of manhood and of Deity! Why should men unman themselves?—causing the apostate angels to exult, and the steadfast to deplore. Let humanity but look from out his clayey dwelling to the pavilion of light above, and to the penitentiary of gloom beneath, then reflect for whether of the twain he is preparing. Can the guileful or the wrathful, the lustful or the drinkful, contentedly ejaculate—"Am not I improving!" and mark no dragon at his elbow grinning acquiescence? Unrepentant child of labour! cryest thou "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work?"—so, of a truth, it shall be: SIN'S WAGE IS DEATH. Unthinking child of affluence! wouldst thou enact the tragedy of Dives?

Thus far theory, and now practice; for knowledge though possessed, if not obeyed, is destitute of use and fraught with condemnation.

AN OBJECTION CONSIDERED.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A TRAVELING TEMPERANCE MAN.

One argument used by the opponents of Sobriety, is, that "it is of no use persuading people to abstain from Alcohol, for to abstain is impossible, as Alcohol exists in everything."

When they say that "Alcohol is in everything," they wish us to understand,—that alcohol is a constituent part of nature,—that it exists in that on which we exist, that it is in our food in a natural chemical affinity,—that it exists in relation to our bodies, as other natural chemical compounds do, which by their combination make up that which we live upon;—They say, that as it exists, it must have a determined purpose in Creation,—it must be,—useful and good,—and as a good they or we are justified in using it.

Some professors of Christianity have said,—"that as alcohol exists, it must exist for a purpose,—and reasoning from one of the attributes of God,—viz., his wisdom—that purpose must be a good one;—it must be therefore one of the good creatures of God,—and we cannot be far wrong in partaking of what he has thus provided for us." This argument is built upon an assumption; a very bad foundation, though many thoughtlessly build thereon. Assumption is a material easily obtained,—hence many seize hold of it, and rear upon it their showy fabrics.

In my regular peregrinations, I have found many who pride themselves in having puzzled and unsettled the sober but uncultivated minds of their fellowmen with these and such like sophistical objections.

They reason upon the assumption that,—"Alcohol exists in nature." But if it do not exist in nature, then their assumption is false,—and their conclusions, likewise, must be false and injurious.

But suppose we allow the assumption to pass as a truth; we then say that if it is true, if Alcohol does really exist in nature; that it not only does not sanction the drinking customs of the present day,—but that it speaks with a powerful though silent voice against them.

This may be shown in a few words.

There are various things, which are known to be constituent parts of nature, and which are required to make up certain parts of our bodies; they enter into our bodies as compounds prepared in the Laboratory of nature to effect a certain purpose, which purpose is effected, by that particular compound of nature's preparing. But when this purpose is effected, surely no man in his senses would set about preparing and taking into his system another compound to effect that purpose which nature's compound has ALREADY effected! This would be madness!

Let me illustrate.—A certain compound is required to manufacture and keep in repair that part of our bodies known by the name of the bony structure. To build up and keep in repair this structure, we require a peculiar compound made up, according to Berzelius, Fourcroy, Vanquelin, Cooper, and others, of the following compounds variously proportioned:—

Cartilage .....	34 · 17.
Phosphate of Lime .....	51 · 04.
Phosphate of Magnesia .....	1 · 16.
Fluate of Lime .....	2 · 00.
Carbonate of Lime .....	11 · 30.
Soda, Muriate of Soda and Water .....	1 · 20.

Now I would ask,—who would be so foolish as to set about making an artificial compound to assist nature to manufacture and keep in repair the bones, when she has prepared a compound capable of doing the work and doing it well?

But for a man to make artificial Alcohol and take it into his system, because Alcohol is a constituent part of nature, and enters into the composition of his body—would be just as wise, or rather just as foolish, as to make artificial Cartilage, artificial Lime, artificial Magnesia, or Soda—and take them regularly because each of those ingredients enters into the composition of his body!—But do they—will they do this!—No! foolish as they are, they will not sacrifice the little common sense, and common taste they have, upon the altar of nature to what she evidently sanctions as much as the other!—How is this!—To be consistent they should do so!—But it is evident that they listen more to the unnatural cravings of unnatural appetite, than to the silent, solemn sanctions of NATURE! They love taste, better than Truth; low gratification is their God, and it they sacrifice to, and adore!

But if Alcohol exists in nature, it exists there for a purpose, and that purpose, according to their own reasoning a wise one, but how can it be a wise one if it does not answer the required end?—and if it does,—what do we want with any other compound? Nature, (according to their assumption)—has provided one for us,—in her Wisdom she has compounded it in proper proportions! Why then should man try to infringe on her domain,—and doubt as it were her Wisdom, by making and taking an artificial one! And is not the "Fact" of nature containing it, a sufficient,—a demonstrable,—though silent proof,—that she did not require nor intend man to make it?

THE ROYAL FAMILY AT A DISTILLERY.

Every public house and gin-shop rings with the story of the QUEEN'S visit to the Lochnagar Distillery; but no scribe has yet published all the facts of that visit. It is quite true that in the course of their rambles, the Royal family stumbled on this distillery, and also that they were each offered a glass of spirits: but, it is true also, that when Prince ALBERT was about to take a second mouthful, the QUEEN, taking hold of his arm, asked, "Do you know what you're drinking, ALBERT?" On which he laid down the "accursed thing." When the Prince of WALES tasted the whiskey, he instantly spluttered it out of his mouth as if he had drunk poison, emphatically inquiring, "What's that, Mamma?" while no persuasion could induce the Princess Royal to taste the liquid fire. The QUEEN put the glass to her lips: but, after all, the friends of morality and virtue will ever look upon this visit as an error in judgment committed by the QUEEN.

THE GUILTY TRAFFIC.

In a revival of great interest and power in a commercial town, a merchant, doing large business, was seen regularly in the enquiry meeting, and appeared to be deeply concerned to know what he should do to be saved. The ministers of Christ conversed with him kindly, and directed him to the Lamb of God for pardon. Week after week rolled away, but he found no peace in believing. One evening, a minister from abroad, who had come to assist in this laborious work, and had frequently conversed with this merchant, wishing, if possible, to detect the lurking sin which prevented him from embracing the Saviour, held with him, in substance, the following conversation. "What, sir, is your employment?" "I am a merchant." "What do you sell?" "Groceries, sir." "Do you sell ardent spirit?" "I do." "What quantity have you now in your store?" "Twenty hogsheads." "And can you expect to be pardoned, while thus sinning against God?" "Do you think it sinful, sir, to sell ardent spirit?" "Indeed I do, for human consumption; it is not only sinful, but monstrous. You must relinquish this guilty business, or lie down unpardoned in endless sorrow."

The merchant looked sad, and went home in distress. It was indeed a trying moment. He reflected, he prayed, and then concluded that his soul was infinitely more valuable than gold that perisheth. In view of his final account at the bar of God, he decided manfully to relinquish that part of his business, and deal no more in the blood of souls. He soon cleared his store of the dreadful poison, sacrificed a large sum of money, shortly after experienced a hope in Christ, came into the visible church in due time, and went on his way rejoicing.—From Kimball's "Holy Spirit resisted."

SELF-IMPOSED BURDENS.

BY THE REV. JAMES HAMILTON, LONDON.

There is something very appalling in the thought, that Britain expends, every year, fifty millions of money on intoxicating drink. We often complain of our high taxation, and we often grow nervous at the thought of our enormous national debt. But here is a tax for which we cannot blame our rulers—a tax self-imposed and self-levied—a tax for which we can only blame ourselves—a tax which would pay the interest of our national debt twice over—and a tax as large as the revenue of these United Kingdoms. We thought it a great sum to pay in order to give the slave his freedom—we thought the twenty millions given to the West India proprietors a mighty sacrifice: and certainly it was the noblest tribute any nation ever paid to the cause of philanthropy;—but large as it looks, half a year of national abstinence would have paid it all. We rather grudge the eight millions which Ireland got last year, seeing it has failed to set our neighbours on their feet; but it was eight millions given to save a famishing people; and large as the grant to Ireland sounds, two months of national abstinence would have paid the whole of it. But tremendous as are the fifty millions which as a people we yearly engulf in strong drink, the thought which afflicts and appals us is, that this terrible impost is mainly a tax on the working man. The lamentation is, that many a working man will spend in liquor as much money as, had he saved it, would this year have furnished a room, and next year would have bought a beautiful library; as much money as would secure a splendid education for every child, or in a few years would have made him a landlord instead of a tenant. Why, my friends, it would set our blood a boiling if we heard that the Turkish Sultan taxed his subjects in the style that our British workmen tax themselves. It would bring the days of Wat Tyler back again; nay, it would create another Hamden, and conjure a second Cromwell, did the Exchequer try to raise the impost, which our publicans levy, and our labourers and artisans cheerfully pay. But is it not a fearful infatuation? Is it not our national madness, to spend so much wealth in shattering our nerves, and exploding our characters, and in ruining our souls? Many workmen, I rejoice to know, have been reclaimed by teetotalism, and many have been preserved by timely religion. In whatever way a man is saved from that horrible vice, which is at once the destruction of the body and damnation of the soul, therein do I rejoice, and will rejoice. Only you cannot be a Christian without being a sober man, and the more of God's grace you get, the easier you will find it to vanquish this most terrible of the working man's temptations.

WHEN IS THE TIME TO SIGN?

I asked the blooming sportive Boy,
 'Say—will you come and sign?
 Health beams within thy glistening eye;
Now is the golden time!
 But 'No,' he cried, and shook his head;
 'Now is the time for play;
 I cannot, will not, yet,' he said,
 And bounded on his way.
 I asked him when a Youth, but then
 He stopped me with alarm—
 'Nay, leave the pledge for grave old men;
 A drop can do no harm;
 Youth is the time for mirth and joy,
 I'll live thus while I can;
 Your sober scheme perchance I'll try
 When I am quite a man.'
 I asked a man of middle age;
 —How gleamed his firey eye!
 Such fearful signs his frame betrayed,
 They gave a full reply:
 For many years had firmly fixed
 The tyrant's iron chain.
 His all for drink he'd madly risked;
 'To ask him now was vain.
 I questioned next an Aged Man—
 A miserable form:
 His course of life had nearly ran,
 Each short-lived pleasure gone.
 'Alas!' he cried, in accents wild,
 With anguish on his brow;
 'Would I had signed it when a child;
 I cannot do it now.'

WASTE NOT A MOMENT.

There is no time, in any clime,
That should be unemployed;
An active mind, will ever find
There's nothing dull and void.
All things that live, some charms will give,
If sought without delay;
From year to year, I seem to hear
The truthful voice of wisdom say,
Waste not a moment!

The singing birds, in simple words,
An ever truthful lesson tell,
That indolence, by no pretence,
Can fill our earthly mission well.
Go, watch them work, they never lurk
In idleness about;
Throughout the day you'll find that they
While the light of day is out,
Waste not a moment!

If you at ease, your mind would please,
Let not the time be wasted,
But take a book, and through it look,
And when its sweets you've tasted,
Peruse it well, and on it dwell,
And find some truthful lay
To feed your mind, and then you'll find
The voice of Holy Truth will say,
Waste not a moment!

Heed not mankind, who are so blind
To look but at the covers,
Like maidens fair, who only care
For the appearance of their lovers;
But search for truth, aspiring youth,
" 'Tis always worth your finding."
My plain advice is small in price—
You'll find it 'neath the binding—
Waste not a moment!

In every hour we have the power,
To do some little good;
If we a neighbour help to labour,
'Tis doing what we should;
For we were sent, with that intent
Upon this fertile laud.
Man and brother, help one another,
For 'tis our God's command.
Waste not a moment!

MEDICAL TESTIMONIES.

From the Bombay Temperance Advocate we find that the signatures of EIGHTY-FOUR medical practitioners of India have been affixed to the celebrated medical certificate sent out by JOHN DUNLOP, Esq., to which upwards of fifteen hundred signatures have been attached in this country. Some of the Gentlemen have appended opinions and remarks to their signatures. Among those appended by medical officers and practitioners in the Bombay Presidency, we find the following:—

"In recording my entire concurrence in the foregoing opinions, I may add that an experience of thirty years service—chiefly with Europeans—convinces me, that if our European soldiery in this country could be persuaded to abandon the use of intoxicating liquors, we should not witness a fiftieth part of the serious illnesses with which our Military hospitals are crowded—nor be called on to record the fatal termination of diseases arising from the pernicious and debasing habit of dram drinking, at present so freely indulged."

Another:—"A residence in India of upwards of twenty years in medical charge of troops, European and native, by sea and land, in the field and in the garrison, has afforded me many opportunities of witnessing the evil effects of indulgence in the use of alcoholic and fermented liquors? I do most cordially agree in the medical opinion as given above. All should unite in the grand effort to eradicate this greatest of all incentives to crime from the land."

Another:—"I have no hesitation in saying that alcoholic liquors directly destroy one tenth of the soldiers in India, and indirectly as many more. It is difficult to estimate the mischief effected in an insidious manner by spirituous drinks in destroying or weakening the conservative powers of life, so much required to resist the deleterious agencies that periodically or erratically exist in the atmosphere of hot climates, and especially of India. The sympathy between the digestive functions and the mind is strangely but prominently developed in man, and at once affords an explanation of the lamentable perversion of the intellectual powers and moral principles caused by inebriety and intemperance, and also of the utter annihilation of the natural affections, and the pure pleasures that spring from them."

Again:—"What a horrid catalogue of evils have I known to arise from this cause! In one case the mother maddened by liquor dashed her child at the head of her equally brutal husband; the infant lived to be a crippled object and a drag on its heartless parents. Another monster proposed to her to poison the helpless victim of her passion, that they might both be able to go out to follow the polluted path too generally pursued as a means of getting more drink. I could add many examples of the moral degradation caused by intemperance."

Other testimonies, similar in their import, are furnished; the above may suffice as specimens.

A WARNING TO PROFESSORS.

Recently at a Religious Meeting, in the writer's presence, a friend made the following warning statement:—"A few days since I was deeply affected when I met the people returning from the funeral of one who some years since was a member of the same religious society, with whom I was well acquainted, and who I had heard speak at hand meetings and love feasts, and pray in the prayer meetings with great zeal and effect. He had left the Society, began to tittle, and then got drunk. On the Sunday night before his death he was found lying on the road drunk, with his face cut in several places. On the Friday he died; and alas! without any marks of repentance, had to appear before the just and Holy God. Who would not tremble and guard against the first glass!

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

Some persons who abstain are greatly tempted to let wine, &c., upon the table for visitors. Such may learn a good lesson from the following fact. While attending the late Wesleyan Conference at Hull, I was invited to meet six or eight brother ministers at the hospitable table of a respectable Wesleyan Teetotaler, twice. The table was well, though not extravagantly supplied. Immediately after dinner some excellent coffee was presented. The hospitable head of the table said, "Gentlemen, I and my wife are teetotalers, and have been such for some years. What we do not use, we cannot give. We hope, however, a cup of coffee will be an agreeable substitute for the old-fashioned, but as we think, injurious beverage. Some years since when we saw it our duty to remove wine from our table, we waited on all our Ministers who were accustomed to visit us, stated our reason for our new course, and renewed our invitation. We are happy to say none of them made this the smallest difficulty, nor have we at any time found our new plan the least inconvenient." Several expressed themselves highly gratified, and we think it would be well if such a prudent example became universal. We violate no rules of privacy by giving the utmost publicity to the above, as the intention to make a public use of so good an example was intimated to the gentleman. We beg the favour of the Teetotal Press making the above extensively known.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

Several large and influential meetings have recently been held in the metropolis. Among these may be noticed the anniversary meeting of the WALWORTH and CAMBERWELL Total Abstinence Society, held in the large School Room, Newington Butts, over which W. JANSON, Esq., presided. The speakers were Dr. Oxley, Messrs. J. W. Green, Hudson, Buckle, Dunlop, Whittaker, Freemantle and Sears. The speech of Mr. T. Whittaker, in which he related his experience in reference to the influence of the drinking usages in promoting intemperance, and the marvellous inconsistency of Christian professors in countenancing those usages, produced a thrilling effect upon the audience.

On Monday, Nov. 7th, the anniversary of the FITZROY and MARYLEBONE Total Abstinence was celebrated in the Society's Hall, Little Portland Street, Marylebone. The Chair was occupied first by BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county of Middlesex, and afterwards by Mr. J. W. GREEN. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Burns, Messrs. Roberts, Grosjean, Davies, Beeston, Draper and Moody. Mr. ROTCH interested the meeting greatly, for about an hour, by the relation of a number of facts with which he had become acquainted in the discharge of his duty as a magistrate, illustrative and confirmatory of the mischief done to individuals and families by the use of strong drink. Mr. Rotch stated, also, the success of some exertions he had made to introduce Teetotals as Wardens and Subwardens into the Prison at Cold Bath fields.

The eleventh anniversary of the FARRINGDON Total Abstinence Society was celebrated in the British School room, Harp Alley, Fleet Street, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 14th, when the Chair was occupied by the Rev. W. WOOLHOUSE ROBINSON, A.M., Incumbent of Christchurch, Chelsea. After singing, prayer, and reading a portion of Scripture, he delivered a very impressive address. A report of the proceedings of the Committee during the past year was read by Mr. J. W. GREEN: the report excited much interest, and was greatly applauded at the close. Various resolutions were moved and seconded by W. Janson, Esq.; Dr. Oxley; Messrs. D. G. Paine; T. Hudson;—Rowe, C. Taylor, and H. N. Rickman.

The Teetotalers of the Metropolis are evidently on the alert.

PORTLAND TOWN.

A meeting was held in the Hall, Henry Street, on Monday evening, Nov. 6th; the object of which was the clearing off a debt remaining on the Hall, and establishing a library in connexion therewith. After tea, a public meeting was held, over which Mr. Moorhouse presided. After he had delivered an impressive speech, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Thomas Whittaker. Dr. BEAUMONT, Wesleyan Minister, also addressed the meeting. He remarked, "that men and women who loved gin seemed to be very fond of drinking it in palaces: those palaces belonged to others and not to them; he would have those present anxious to get palaces for themselves, rather than support those of the publican." The proceedings were highly encouraging.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

The good cause of Teetotalism has taken root at length in this town, which, at one time appeared to be determined to resist every effort made to introduce the principle. The Society, formed some eleven months ago, although not large, is healthy; in it are some good men and true, who are determined to occupy the ground they have taken and to turn the battle to the gate." On Tuesday evening the 7th ult. a public meeting was held in the Large Assembly Room, Bell Street, Mr. Bourne, jun., of Reading, presided, and after some appropriate remarks, called upon Mr. Kidgell, the secretary to the Reading Temperance Society, who was followed by Mr. Edwards, of London: the speech of this gentleman was replete with facts, and the interest was kept up to the close. The Room was crowded, and perfect order was maintained. At the close 13 persons signed the pledge.

The Committee propose to follow up the attack thus made, as far as their funds will allow.

A. A. PARSONS, Secretary.

ST. IVES, HUNTS.

It being the fair, the committee of the St. Ives Temperance Society held a festival in the large and splendid room recently erected, in order that a counteracting influence might be brought to bear upon the immoral tendencies arising from the drinking practices of society on those occasions; therefore, on Thursday, the 12th ult., a tea meeting was held, when nearly 200 sat down. A public meeting was afterwards held, when the Rev. E. Davis, Baptist Minister, and president of the society, opened the meeting with a few suitable observations. Mr. Harcourt, of Houghton, then addressing himself to his christian brethren, urged them to lay aside their prejudices, and study the temperance question, remembering the sacred injunction, "prove all things, hold fast that which is good." Mr. Hood then delivered an eloquent speech, which occupied more than two hours, and seemed to make a deep impression upon the audience. On Friday evening the 13th, a second meeting was held when J. L. Ekins, Esq., of Woodhurst, presided. After a few remarks, Mr. Hood delivered a lecture on the social and political bearing of the temperance argument. He was listened to with attention by the majority, though he had to complain of some interruption. On the whole the festival surpassed the most sanguine expectations of the committee who confidently hope that lasting benefit will accrue from the demonstration thus made in favour of temperance principles. R. L.

CHORLTON UPON MEDLOCK.

From the Thirteenth Annual Report of the Temperance Society of this place, just published, we find that much success has attended the efforts of the society during the past year, to promote the social and moral elevation of man. Notwithstanding great commercial gloom, they have been enabled to do more for the advancement of temperance principles than in any former year. In addition to 10 lectures, and 147 general addresses, upwards of 4000 various temperance publications have been circulated. About 200 persons have signed the pledge, and many who were already abstainers, have been confirmed and encouraged. Twelve societies are actively engaged in promoting temperance in this part of Manchester.

LANCASTER.

R. B. Armstrong and Thos. Greene, Esqs., the members for the borough, have each contributed two guineas, in furtherance of the principles of the Lancaster Total Abstinence Society.

NORTH MEOLS.

We have recently celebrated our twelfth anniversary. The tea party was held in the Independent School Room, and the Public Meeting in the National School, the Rev. C. Hesketh, Rector of North Meols, president; Mr. Frankland delivered a powerful speech, and several others assisted. 212 sat down to tea, and about 400 attended the meeting. We are 250 in Society, 58 who signed the pledge at our commencement in 1836, continue consistent Teetotalers; and by their exertions and faithful adherence, and the blessing of HIM who is the Author of all Good, the cause has a bright prospect, and our numbers are gradually increasing.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

1.—SPARKS FROM THE ANVIL: 2.—VOICE FROM THE FORGE.—By ELIHU BURRITT. London: C. GILPIN, Bishopsgate-street Without.

"Sparks" bright and glowing; a "Voice" sweet and sonorous: "Sparks" full of light and heat, well calculated to instruct and animate; a "Voice," persuasive and convincing, which ought to be listened to with deference by all ranks in all countries. The subjects of these two little books are various, but they have all an important bearing on the true welfare of the human race. Peace, temperance, and brotherly kindness, are the prevailing topics; and these are treated with a pathos and eloquence almost peculiar to "the learned black-smith."

THE PROTESTANT DISSENTER'S ALMANACK FOR 1849. London: SNOW, Paternoster Row.

The first impression of this Almanack (for 1848) met with a ready sale of thirty-five thousand: that for the ensuing year is a great improvement on the last, and will, there is every reason to believe, circulate still more extensively. While to Nonconformists it will prove peculiarly acceptable, it will also be valuable to the public generally, as containing regular expositions of the principles held by Nonconformists, and a larger body of statistical information than can be found in any publication extant. The materials both for the calendar and the statistics have been collected and arranged with much care. It is, also, surprizingly cheap.

THE EMIGRANT'S ALMANACK AND DIRECTORY FOR 1849. London: C. Gilpin, Bishopsgate Street.

The interest now felt by thousands on the subject of Emigration, will render this Almanack a most acceptable and useful publication. No publication, that we are aware of, however expensive, contains so great a mass of really useful—nay, necessary information, to all who desire information on the subject. It is published at a price which places it within the reach of all classes, and will, no doubt, obtain a very extensive circulation.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Those of our readers whose annual subscriptions terminate with the present month, are respectfully requested to renew their subscriptions without delay, as some time is required to make out and transmit the list of orders. We thank them sincerely for past favours, and trust to merit a continuance. We are happy to state that during the past year, many thousand copies of the Teetotal Times and Essayist have been sent gratuitously to Ministers of Religion, Magistrates, Sunday School Teachers and others, to whom, but for this cheap and effectual medium, information as to the principle and operations of Teetotalism, would not have been communicated. Great good has resulted from this circulation; and Societies or individuals anxious to spread such information, cannot adopt a more easy and efficient mode of doing so, than is thus afforded them. They may be supplied for this purpose at 6s. per hundred, which will be sent to them in parcels, post free. Single copies will be sent regularly to individuals, on the payment of One Shilling per annum in advance.

Mr. B. L. GREEN, Paternoster Row, is appointed the London Agent for the sale of the Teetotal Times and Essayist. But all communications for the Editor, together with orders for the ensuing year with the amount in stamps or Post Office orders, are to be addressed to Mr. JOHN CASSELL, 22, Abchurch Lane.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

VERY RESPECTABLE!—"Mother," said an urchin, "why does father drink rum?" "I know not, my child; why do you ask?" "Because I heard the squire say he was once a respectable, well dressed man." "And do you mean to imply that your father is not respectable?" asked the mother. The lad was silent.

CONUNDRUMS.—Why is a rum shop like a grindstone? Because it sharpens daggers.—Why is it like a dark lantern? Because it lights the incendiaries' torch.—Why is it like a grave digger? Because its prosperity is evidence of increasing death.

THE POISONOUS SNAKE.—It is stated in an American paper that two gentlemen found a drunken man lying in one of the streets of New Orleans with a snake coiled round his neck. Query! had he not a more terrible one coiled round his heart?

A GOOD ANSWER.—"What shall I do," said a liquor seller, to a temperance lecturer, "if I quit selling rum?" "Go into the poor-house," said the lecturer, "and be supported there, and let the poor you have made paupers come out."

LOOKING FOR THE POOR-HOUSE.—"Tom," said a drunkard to his friend, "where shall I find the poor-house? I should like to see it." "My dear friend, continue in your present course a short time longer, and you will not need to ask the question,"—was the pointed reply.

MODERATE DRINKING.—The devil's railroad, with a steep downward grade to the depot of destruction.

CHRISTIANITY versus PHILANTHROPY! A person who had been reclaimed from intemperance, was visiting a Christian friend, and was prevailed upon by him to take a glass of wine—one glass only, it was stated. His pledge, of course, was broken; his desire for the stimulating liquor was excited; he yielded to its gratification; and, to the grief of his friends, became a degraded drunkard again. And—"tell it not in Gath!"—Christianity was thus exhibited to the world as the antagonist of Philanthropy!—Rev. Joshua Priestley.

AN IRISHMAN'S MISTAKE.—One Sunday evening, an Irishman, who had gone to bed drunk on Saturday night, woke up, and, putting his head out of the window, accosted a passer-by, asking him, "What o'clock it is?" "Six o'clock," was the answer. Pat popped on his clothes, and was shortly after seen, in the outskirts of Gateshead, mixing his mortar, and otherwise busily occupied about a new house which was in the course of erection. The good wife of the gentleman for whom it was being built—a regular chapel-going matron—was shocked to find the man breaking the Sabbath, and asked him what he meant. He told her he was getting on with his work, and was surprised that none of the masons had cast up, for it was past six o'clock. "Why," said she, "you would not have them come to work on a Sunday night?" "Sunday night!" echoed the mason's clerk, (the light breaking in upon him,) "faix! an' it was Monday morning I thought it was!"

LADIES WHO DRINK!—The following singular advertisement recently appeared in the Times:—A married gentleman, having made every effort to rescue his fair partner from the frightful malady of drunkenness, now proposes to others similarly situated, to take a house and grounds, wherein the ladies will find every amusement, but no drink, except by order of the medical man. A liberal table will be kept. Each married couple to pay £140 a year, to include everything. Single ladies £80. The advertiser will take all responsibility. Address, Y Z, &c., Park Terrace, Regent's Park."

BEWARE OF WHISKEY.—Last week, a boy, seven years old, left in charge of a spirit dealer's shop in Glasgow for a few minutes, drank so much whisky that he became drunk and insensible, was left to sleep it off, and died a few minutes afterwards.

AND ESSAYIST.

TEETOTALISM RETROSPECTIVE AND PROSPECTIVE.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

PRESENT, PAST and FUTURE, are words of constant recurrence, and especially with grammarians, metaphysicians and moralists. To express them we have all the variations of verbs. Wonderful disquisitions on duration, time and eternity, have been written by philosophers, while the virtues or follies of the past, the responsibilities of the present, and the uncertainties of the future, afford topics of thrilling interest to ministers of religion. Some have said that we never live in the present, and others that we are always confined to it; while there are those who maintain that both these propositions are true. Our bodies certainly are never past or future, but always present. By these, as by a chain of adamant, we are confined to one perpetual Now. As they cannot be in two regions of space at the same instant, so they cannot fill two different points of duration at any one given moment. But almost the very reverse is true of the soul. It delights to range through past scenes or future anticipations; the present is often forgotten and never satisfying. We thus in some measure resemble the polypus, which though fixed to a base, extends every way its tentaculæ in search of food and satisfaction.

To spirits so ambitious as ours, this chain that confines us to earth is rather galling. We would fain range through all space and duration. We are voyagers and travellers by nature—"the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing." All the rivers may run to the sea, and yet the sea is not full. The body of man is an atom of an atom world, environed by time and space as by walls of brass or bands of iron, but the soul sends its thoughts and aspirations through all worlds and periods, and often forgets the present now in these reveries of fancy, recollections of memory, or anticipations of faith.

These conditions of our existence are not without their use to such natures as ours. We feel that we are bound, and yet that we can be free, and our fetters render the thought of liberty still more thrilling and exquisite. Intellectual and spiritual emancipation is the desire of all. Every rational creature "groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, waiting to be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." A blessed future is what all persons sigh for. But then we are the builders of our own destiny, and hence the past associates itself with what is to come. The former is the cause, the latter the effect; and anticipation generally leads to retrospection.

These reflections are not out of place to us as TEETOTALERS, and are especially appropriate at the commencement of a NEW YEAR. Temperance has brought many of us into a new world, and invested the past and the future with a peculiar interest; and we cannot help contemplating both. Twenty years ago, the writer was a moderate drinker, enduring all the ills of that great scourge and delusion. The doctors held out to him no hope. The ministry was to be abandoned, study of every kind given up, and a life of inanity and uselessness enjoined. To an ardent temperament, bent on activity, and hoping not to live in vain, these tidings were very gloomy, but he was told that there was no remedy. His disease was "clerical," and consequently he must be resigned, and more than one distinguished medical adviser gave the same opinion on his case. But what was future then is past now, and, thanks to total abstinence, every prediction of the physician has proved incorrect. No sooner was the moderate, the very moderate glass abandoned, than his ailments fled, and now he can look back on fourteen of the most pleasurable and useful years of his existence. He has read more, written more, preached more, and lectured more during this teetotal period, than in all the other forty years of his life; and, what is a further matter of gratitude, all has been done, not only without fatigue, but with unspeakable delight and pleasure.

Now the writer is not alone in these grateful reflections. Many of his readers have had all the conditions of their existence gloriously changed by this same much-reviled Teetotalism. Perhaps you who now are reading these words, were a few years ago an abandoned drunkard. The mother that bore you blushed at the mention of your name, and your father may have spurned you from his threshold. The wife of your bosom dreaded your footstep, and your children fled at the announcement of your return home. You were clothed in rags, your furniture was worth nothing, and famine, of your own creation, was consuming the vitals of your household. Oh! what a heartless creature you then were. No language of ours can depict the miseries you then suffered, inflicted, and anticipated. You felt yourself prematurely lost. You were tormented before your time; you were your own tormentor, and had no hope of deliverance. Dismal beyond Egyptian darkness was the cloud that hung over you and your family. You had no pleasurable expectation here or hereafter!

But how different is the scene which the dawn of 1849 presents! You are now placed on a Pisgah, and can behold the promised land, with the prospect of entering thither. Here your Moses and Joshua have been the teetotalers. Everyone else had deserted you. The brewer and the publican took your money, anathematized you as a sot, and drove you from their door. The ministers of religion had given you up for lost, and even the "charity that never faileth," had forsaken you, having discovered that you wasted its bounty in destroying yourself, and therefore that to be kind to you was the greatest cruelty. But amidst this general desertion there was a body of men who had hope in your latter end. They recognised you "as a man and a brother," although you were a slave. Your very rags and wickedness exhibited the wrecks of a noble nature. Beasts could not, and devils would not, sink so low. Your viciousness was awfully, tremendously sublime; for none can be profoundly wicked but those who are capable of being pre-eminently good, and thus your degradation afforded the dawn of a better day. Your ruling sin was strong drink. Only dash the bowl from your lips, and sign the pledge never to taste again, and you might yet be saved; and the thought of rescuing you sent a divine glow to their hearts. You could yet be a child of which your father would be proud, and whom your mother would press to her bosom with greater pleasure than when your first smile rendered her ecstatic. Under your shade, as a reclaimed and regenerate man, your wife might yet be as "a fruitful vine by the sides of your house, and your children like olive branches round about your table. This fanatical teetotalism might write, in a far nobler sense than Cæsar, "VENI, VIDI, VICI," "I came, I saw, I conquered!" The temperance tract was put into your hands; reasons the most cogent and affectionate were employed; you were invited to the teetotal meeting; you went, were convinced, signed the pledge, and by that one act restored all your lost hopes, lost friends, and lost pleasures.

And further;—you are now perhaps, not merely a reclaimed individual, but, by means of the Gospel, on the road to heaven. When you left the ale-house and its bad company, you bent your feet to the sanctuary, and the word reached your heart, so that the signing of the pledge was to you as the ratification of a covenant of mercy, containing all that heart could wish. You have literally passed from death to life. Not that you put temperance in the place of the Gospel, but temperance has been the handmaid that has led you to the House of God, where you have heard and believed "the word of eternal life." Thousands are the hearts which on this NEW YEAR'S DAY beat with ecstasy as they look at the gulf from which temperance has rescued them, and at the celestial height to which they are now advanced. Here Retrospection exhibits a thousand motives for gratitude: we were dead but we are alive again, we were lost but are found.

Oh! that ministers and professing Christians would but lay these things to heart! Many to whom former new years were periods of joy and congratulation, are now in despair, and the commencement of a new period of time affords them no pleasure. The moderate glass of parents, ministers, deacons and others beguiled them. "These men," they said, "drink without harm, why should not we?" "They made the experiment, but the liquor beguiled them. The taste was pleasing, the look fascinating, for "it moved aright in the cup," the feeling it inspired was thrilling, and, if followed by depression, an additional draught removed the languor. Alas! they drank, and now they are worse than dead to their families, to society and the church. If they perish in their sin, their blood must lie at the doors of those who manufactured, who sold, who dispensed, who recommended, who drank the poison. A whole host of culprits will stand at the bar of heaven, charged with the ruin of this single drunkard. Often in this world the assize has condemned a numerous body of criminals as implicated in the murder of the same individual, so at the great day, scarcely a soul will be lost whose destruction will not be work of many offenders.

The retrospect for the moderate drinker is truly awful. Many a valuable life has fallen during the past year, in consequence of, what has been called, the temperate use of these poisons. The loss to the Church is incalculable. The illustrious men and women who have sunk in the midst of their usefulness into the grave; the hopeful characters whom these vile beverages have seduced from the paths of religion, and the members which the church has had to expel through drinking, would fill a large roll with lamentation and weeping. And yet we fear that these solemn thoughts will be unheeded by many, and that instead of forsaking the fatal cup and example, they will still continue to injure themselves and plunge others in perdition. The most awful spectacle on earth is the ambassador of the skies, pointing with one hand to the cross, and with the other hurling his hearers and perhaps his own children to destruction, and all to gratify an unnatural and vicious appetite.

We might, in our retrospective meditations, also consider what we have done in this noble cause. From having visited many parts of the country, the writer believes that 1848 has been the most triumphant year for Teetotalism that it ever knew. A multitude of new societies have been formed, and fresh life and vigour have been poured into many that were drooping. Still much remains to be done. If temperance is a plant, like every other object that grows, it must increase from itself. The energy that carries the elm, or oak, or cedar to maturity is from within. "The seed is in itself." The teetotalers must do the work. If they are energetic our cause will go on, if they fail or flag, our society will decline. Our enemies are mighty, powerful, and active. What an array of manufacturers, venders and consumers are pledged to resist our efforts! How proud Bacchus must be of the multitudes of "reverend" gentlemen who quaff his bowl! How awfully the Church is polluted with this bane! The destroying angel is lodged in the sanctuary, and receives the benediction of consecrated lips. Our work, therefore, is still an arduous one. But past success may give us spirit. Our prosperity has been stupendous. In almost every parish we have living witnesses of the beneficial working of our principles. The great seal of heaven has stamped our labours, and as we look at the past, we will "thank God and take courage."

As to the PROSPECTIVE part of our efforts, it is sufficient to say, that 1849 will be JUST WHAT WE MAKE IT. Miracles we have no right to expect. Our impotence will not pander to human indolence. The Eternal will not descend to do our work. Prayer for his blessing is not only a duty but a privilege. Without JEHOVAH'S direction and aid nothing can prosper. God must work with us, or we labour in vain. But then we must "work together with him." It is an honour he has conferred upon us,—an honour which angels might envy,—to employ us in doing good. Our mission on earth is to bless the world. For this we were created, and to this day have been fed, clothed and preserved. It was for this the Saviour died, the Spirit is promised, the word of revelation is put into our hands, and our liberties have been providentially enlarged. We are now so free that whensoever we will we can do good. Philanthropic societies greet us everywhere, and ask our co-operation. As teetotalers, we wish them all "God speed," and never more so than by forwarding the cause of temperance. Millions of property are annually wasted on poisonous drinks, and talents that might convert the world are paralysed by this accursed bane. We must, therefore, be up and doing, and work while it is called to-day.

Before 1849 shall close, many will pass to their account. Thousands this year will be slain by this desolating scourge. It is ours to do something to stay the plague, and if we labour as we ought, complete triumph shall ere long crown our exertions.

WATER IS BEST.

Water is best for the man of health,
'Twill keep his strength secure;
Water is best for the man of wealth,
'Twill keep his riches sure.

Water is best for the feeble man,
'Twill make his health improve;
Water is best for the poor, I ken,
'Twill make his wants remove.

Water for those who are growing old,
'Twill keep them hale and strong;
Water is best for the young and bold,
'Twill make their moments long.

Water is best for the man of toil,
'Twill make his labour light;
Water is best for "loafers," who toil
Not a hand from morning till night.

Water is best for the man of strife,
'Twill make his anger slow;
And for him who leads a peaceful life
'Tis the very best drink I know.

Water is best for the man of state,
'Twill make his judgment true;
Water is best for those who wait
His high commands to do.

Water, pure water's the drink for man,
Its fountains are full and free!
Others may drink "fire-water" who can,
Pure water's the nectar for me!

Water is best in cold or heat,
At morn, or noon, or night!
'Tis the only drink that "can't be beat,"
Clear, healthful, sparkling, bright!

THE PRECIPICE.

The unseen dangers which beset the path of the sojourner on earth are many and various; in a moment some vital part is injured, and the frame, which to all appearance, gave indications of long healthy endurance, is weighed down. Were we to see some individual walking on the edge of some precipice, we should naturally be apprehensive of danger awaiting every step he took, and our duty instantly would be to warn him of it, and to entreat him to take up a more secure position. Such an one may, perhaps, escape, but if the large majority of persons were by his safety to venture in the same track, and fall down headlong, meeting death in agonising forms, we should not only be justified in using our efforts to debar some from hazarding life, but all, including those who might escape. WESLEY, in one of his beautiful compositions, exclaims—

"Lo! how unconcerned we stand,
Upon the brink of death."

And how true the maxim is—every day's experience testifies.

I am led to treat now of a precipice upon which the drinker of intoxicating liquor walks, unseen by him as well as his neighbours; and on this account in reality more dangerous than standing upon some tall cliff, with the billows playing beneath. Sometime ago I had the pleasure of listening to the lucid arguments of Dr. GRINDROD, and amongst the many striking facts which he presented to public notice, was one of momentous import, namely, that in the stomach, or system, of the moderate drinker, disease of an acute character may be engendered through the use of alcohol—the patient not knowing it—and this ignorance is perpetuated by the continuance of the practice of drinking what is termed "moderately"—and that in a moment the terrible reality may be manifested when too late to apply a remedy.

What a fact is here! one worthy the consideration of all who value health. We have here a truth—that although a person may outwardly have every appearance of enjoying health—disease may be growing unseen and unknown—and is not this an argument—in addition to the many which have before been presented, in favour of entire abstinence from an article which is likely, in a small quantity, to work such terrible, and, perhaps, irremediable evil? Certainly!—and the thanks of the abstainers of the land are due to Dr. GRINDROD for such information.

The evil of indulgence in drink may yet be viewed in a more important light than the foregoing, viz., the influence upon the mind, compared with which the physical powers are of secondary import. Intellectual and moral perceptions may be, and doubtless are, deadened, warped, and deformed; thus imbecility is produced, thinking obstructed, and confusion takes the place of that calmness which is necessary in the pursuit of truth.

What mighty interests lie at the very threshold of this inquiry! Talk of education!—let the young man be told that he has a physical, a mental and a moral constitution, and that his highest wisdom is to weigh well, and without prejudice, those laws which regulate them;—but how little is such a question thought on—fame—fame is the aim of the scholar, but is it not a fact that by his resorting to alcoholic stimulation—instead of natural rest—to recruit his overwrought brain—he is ignorant of the A B C of knowledge; he forgets that the day of reckoning will come; that, to use the language of an acute observer, "The excesses of our youth are drafts upon our old age, payable twenty years after date"—and it may be—SOONER.

The mind becomes a wreck, when stimulation is resorted to for the purpose of infusing that vigour which a natural course alone can bestow. Let men who have much brain-work, learn this truth, and keep it always before them, for it is pre-eminently a personal matter. Avoid precipices, and keep in all things in the highway of truth, for all false systems lead to confusion and darkness, and cannot support the defenders long.

"No law of nature can be obeyed without advantage, nor be violated without avenging its own authority."

So says Dr. HARRIS—one of our best writers—and the truth is evidenced to all who have eyes and use them. We may, according to Dr. GRINDROD, be nursing the viper of disease in our vitals by "little drops," giving the reptile vitality, and maturing its power to fix its venom incurably.

I have considered this subject sufficiently important to call the attention of your numerous readers to it, in order that The Teetotal Times may be the means of reaching those who have had no opportunity of sitting at the feet of the author of BACCHUS to learn.

DRUNK OR MAD?—At a funeral in Dundee, a short time since, the hearse followed by the mourners left the house of the deceased, and had already proceeded a considerable distance, when it was discovered that the coffin containing the corpse had been left behind, and the procession was compelled to return and fetch it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PERIODICAL LITERATURE AND TEMPERANCE.

To the Editor of the "Teetotal Times."

SIR,—A few years ago the Temperance Press had to do battle for the principles of perfect sobriety single-handed and alone. Against the "mockers" and that which is "raging," the various periodicals, sacred and profane, entered no solemn protest. The "enemy" held undisputed sway, so far as they bore witness. Behold a glorious change! Many of the magazines now issuing from the press are doing good service to the cause of true temperance; though there is still room for a more decided espousal of our cause. The sun in the South has not yet risen in meridian splendour; its rays are genial, but not powerful.

Turning Northward (paradoxical though it may seem) a sunnier day is felt! Edinburgh has long been famed for its literature, its magazines, and reviews. It is now sending forth two excellent representatives of our cheap periodical literature, "Chambers' Journal" and "Hogg's Weekly Instructor." Both these popular and widely-circulated journals are doing much for the Temperance Movement. I refer more especially to the parts for the present month. The article in "Chambers' Plain truths for England," is pungent, forcible, striking, and deserving of separate publication as a tract, to be circulated in thousands and tens of thousands, through the length and breadth of our land. Take an extract, and see the folly and madness of thousands of our clever artisans and mechanics mirrored. Would that they did "behold themselves."—"The ordinary tale of the masters of great works, and it must be to some extent true, is that the men of large wages are usually the most dissipated, and bring up their families in the least creditable manner. The usual report of the gentlemen who conduct Savings' banks is, that the poorer artisans and the agricultural labourers, whose wages, also, are on a low scale, are the chief depositors; the well-paid workmen of towns are little seen at those establishments. Gentlemen have set themselves to gather the statistics of dissipation, and we hear of Glasgow, with its three thousand taverns consuming a million worth of liquor annually; Greenock its £120,000; nay, even a small country town of two thousand inhabitants, and no sort of manufactures to bring in wealth, will be found to devote £5000 annually to liquor, though it must be a mystery where all the money comes from. Then the estimate for the whole empire is well known to be sixty-five millions, or considerably more than the annual revenue. Why is there no CRABBE among the living poets, to give rhetorical force to these facts, to paint the English working-men of these latter times of inordinate wealth, and consequently elevated wages, worse off as a class than their own narrow-circumstanced ancestors, to show them actually less miserable in many cases with small than with large returns, with short than with full time, because then possessed of less means of ruining their health, and corrupting that morality in which resides happiness; to paint the swelter and reek of low public-houses, where men fall back to something worse than the savage; to show women, and even children drawn into the magic circle of debauchery, so as to leave nothing puror healthy in the poor man's home? Oh kind Heaven, to think of so many who might be better if they chose, thus left year after year to be their own destroyers!"

Turning to "HOGG," there is an admirable article on "Juvenile depravity." I shall present an extract:—"Lying and begging, which . . . are generally associated with drinking, are often the first steps in a career of crime, which is finally expiated on the gibbet, or in some penal colony. We may give a specimen (and it is only one out of hundreds that might easily be adduced) of the readiness with which young beggars will retail a tissue of the basest falsehoods, in order to impose upon those whom they assail for charity, which specimen came under our own notice. Passing along one of the streets of Edinburgh one evening, we were accosted by a youth, who implored us for a few pence. It was just getting dark, and was a raw, cold, misty evening. The boy was ill-clad, and we could discern by the light of the lamp a wanness in his eye, and a bloodlessness about his cheek which seemed to betoken the first stage of a wasting consumption. We felt arrested by his appearance, more than we do in ordinary cases, and we stood still and put to him a few enquiries. He said he was very hungry and had tasted nothing that day; and truly there was nothing in his appearance to belie his statement. He said his parents were very ill at home, and that they were starving from want of food. He had also one or two (we forget which) little brothers or sisters, who were in the same sad and painful condition. The way in which the whole case was stated was such that we felt more than half inclined to believe it, and could not help putting a trifle into his hands. He had no sooner left us than the thought struck us that the story after all might be a fiction, and we were instantly seized with the curiosity to follow him for a few paces, and see whether he went, or how he disposed of himself. We accordingly kept our eye upon him; but what was our mortification to see him walk into the very first spirit establishment that came in his way!"

Such are the sentiments which now find place in the two brilliant "Northern lights;" and may they shine with still increasing brightness on the path of temperance.

"HOGG" too favours the Muses. Hear how sweetly "J. P." (the Contributor) can sing the praise of "Cold Water":—

COLD WATER.

Shall e'er cold water be forgot
When we sit down to dine?
O, no, my friends, for is it not
Pour'd out by hands divine?
Pour'd out by hands divine, my friends,
Pour'd out by hands divine,
From springs and wells it gushes forth,
Pour'd out by hands divine.

To beauty's cheek, though strange it seems,
'Tis no more strange than true,
Cold water, though itself so pale,
Imparts the rosiest hue;
Imparts the rosiest hue, my friends,
Imparts the rosiest hue:
Yes, beauty, in a water-pail,
Doth find her rosiest hue.

Cold water, too, (though wonderful
'Tis not less true, again),
The weakest of all earthly drinks,
Doth make the strongest men;
Doth make the strongest men, my friends,
Doth make the strongest men;
Then let us take the weakest drink,
And grow the strongest men.

I've seen the bells of tulips turn
To drink the drops that fell
From summer clouds; then why should not
The two lips of a belle?
The two lips of a belle, my friends,
The two lips of a belle.
What sweetness more than water pure
The two lips of a belle?

The sturdy oak full many a cup
Doth hold up to the sky,
To catch the rain; then drinks it up,
And thus the oak gets high,
'Tis thus the oak gets high, my friends,
'Tis thus the oak gets high.
By having water in its cups,—
Then why not you and I!

Then let cold water armies give
Their banners to the air;
So shall the boys like oak be strong,
The girls like tulips fair;
The girls like tulips fair, my friends,
The girls like tulips fair;
The boys shall grow like sturdy oaks,
The girls like tulips fair."

Trusting that the "Teetotal Times" for 1849 will obtain a wide circulation, and thus be of still more essential service to the Temperance cause,

I am, Sir, yours truly,

CRUSHING NEWGATE, WITH A VENGEANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—There is a person of the name of M——, holding, I think, a situation in the India House, who from being a frequent speaker at religious meetings, and occasionally supplying a vacant pulpit, is tolerably well known to the religious public in and around the metropolis. A somewhat fluent knack at speechifying, though without anything very profound, argumentative, or logical, gives him a share of popularity, as great perhaps as any man of mere mediocrity has a right to expect at second rate public meetings.

I was present recently at a Sunday School meeting in this town, when this Mr. M delivered himself of an oration, in which he dwelt with particular emphasis on the fearful extent and aggravation of Juvenile delinquency; and expressed his hope, that a national convention would ere long take place, to deliberate on this question, and devise some effectual means to grapple with it. "I want," says he, in the fervour of his zeal, "I want to pull down Newgate." This was an admirable wish, but it appears that he quite forgets the cement which holds together its blackened walls, and will by its alone power perpetuate the eyes sore. For without any drift of the subject towards that point, he said, in a tone of ridicule, as if his admiring hearers would start with wonder at the thought of such consummate wisdom ever stooping to such egregious folly; "now what do you think? why, "at one time, I was very nearly being a teetotaler; but my dear wife, who has looked so carefully after me for seven and thirty years, said, 'what! my dear, at your time of life, to be trying experiments! why it will kill you, indeed you will never be able to get through your multiplied engagements without something to support you; and then there was my dearly beloved pastor, the Rev. G. C. of Walworth, who became a teetotaler, and who gave it up on account of his health: and so I now take a glass or two of the best wine I can get.'" And it appears to be Mr. M's impression, that this said glass or two of the best wine, has caused a very serious disappointment to a certain personage, whom we are all very fond of outwitting; since he said, that, "the devil would be very glad to see his coffin." Now sir, may I venture to express a contrary opinion, namely, that the devil will be far better pleased, if Mr. M. lives to a good old age, supposing he carefully studies to set every religious meeting which he addresses, chucking with delight, at his bold, uncalled for sneers at Teetotalism.

Two years ago, sir, at a meeting in the same room, your humble servant gave mortal offence, by saying, that drinking professors of religion were pulling down with one hand, and building up with the other; but is it not true? was there ever a grosser absurdity? ever a more pitiable display of inconsistency, than for a man to wail over natural depravity, and talk of a grave Convention to check juvenile delinquency, and exult at the thought of pulling down Newgate; and then, for the miserable object of eliciting a laugh and a cheer from a drink loving section of a Christian audience, (and I write this most deliberately), ridicule the only agency, which, without a miracle, can accomplish it? If I were to call such a proceeding by the only name it deserves, people would say, fie! upon my uncharitableness, and vulgarity; and, as I cannot in more courtly language find a befitting title, I leave it without any.

Now I do not know that this person, who notwithstanding his "five and forty years of Sabbath school experience," would do well to sit down on the lowest form of common sense, and learn the A. B. C. of social and religious improvement, is himself worth the powder and shot of your "Times;" but as he is probably a type of many boisterous philanthropists, and as the mischief they do is by no means so straitened as the degree of decorum which they display, it appears needful that they should be reminded of the glaring outrage upon the interests of humanity, which they commit. Trusting for your insertion of the above.—I am,

Yours truly,

D. G. PAINE.

ENQUIRIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TEETOTAL TIMES."

DEAR SIR:—Will any of your Correspondents be kind enough, thro' the medium of your valuable periodical, to furnish me with the information I am anxious to obtain on the subjects of the following questions, viz.

- 1, When did spirits, such as Brandy, Rum, &c., first come to be produced and used as beverages?
- 2, When did malt liquors come to be used as beverages?
- 3, Were drinks of this nature ever used at all as beverages in the East? And if so,
- 4, About what period did such usages obtain?

A reply to these questions in the "Times," will greatly oblige,

AN "ANXIOUS ENQUIRER."

Goole, Dec. 12th, 1848.

THE LATE R. HICKS, ESQ., SURGEON.

We are informed that the Members of the St. Pancras Total Abstinence Society, are anxious to get up a marble tablet, with suitable inscription, to the memory of their late friend and member, over the platform of their new Hall, in Weir's Passage, Wilstead Street. They have commenced a penny subscription for this purpose; but as their number is not large, and other claims are pressing upon them, they are desirous of receiving assistance from other friends of the deceased. As he was eminently "worthy" to whom this tribute of respect is intended to be paid, it is hoped that the aid required will soon be afforded. We understand that Mr. E. TACKLEY, 9, Charlton-street, Somers's Town, the Treasurer of the Society, will gladly receive any contributions, however trifling.

COMPULSORY DRINKING USAGES.

It will be known to many of our readers that JOHN DUNLOP, Esq., has devoted himself, for some years, to the hunting up, exposing, and denouncing the almost innumerable compulsory drinking customs and usages of this country, as the prolific source, and the main sustenance of that intemperance, which injures so many thousands, in "body, soul, and substance." He has exposed, not merely those tyrannical drinking usages practiced in manufactories and workshops, by which a large portion of the labouring classes are held in ignoble and ruinous vassalage, but, also, those which prevail amongst tradesmen and shopkeepers, as well as amongst the middle and upper classes of Society. He has succeeded to some extent in exposing these usages, we say; and because he believes that if these could be abolished, intemperance would receive its death blow, he has recently applied himself to this important class of teetotal labour, with, if possible, more than usual vigour. He is decidedly of opinion that if the various Teetotal Committees would agree to devote their attention to this peculiar phase of intemperance throughout the ensuing year, directing their operations, not so much to intemperance in general, as to this its prime and grand support, that their labour would be followed by results, such as the most sanguine of them have hardly anticipated. He has recently visited several of the Committees of Teetotal Societies for this purpose, and has succeeded in inducing many of them to try the experiment he recommends. It is proposed, in some Societies, with which we are acquainted, to hold a public meeting for this special purpose, as early in 1849 as possible, and further to see that the subject be brought forward, from time to time, and urged by suitable advocates. We earnestly recommend a similar course to the Societies throughout the kingdom.

PRIZE ESSAY ON JUVENILE DEPRAVITY.

The prize of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS, offered by JOSEPH EATON, Esq., of Bristol, for the best Essay on Juvenile Depravity, has been awarded to the Rev. HENRY WORSLEY, Easton Rectory, Suffolk. Smaller prizes have also been awarded, at the suggestion of the Adjudicators, to the following authors of Essays of great merit:—Miss Eliza Meteyard (Silverpen), Mr. Thomas Beggs, and Mr. Thomas Barfield.

WHAT CONSTITUTES CRIME?

A short time since, in America, a servant girl was formally tried before a legal tribunal, for stealing seven cents worth of brown soap and sugar from the cupboard, with the leave of her mistress. On the same day the complaint was made by many respectable artisans, against 10,000 grog venders, for robbing a hundred thousand starving wives and children, of a sixpenny loaf each and some cold potatoes; instigating five murders; as many incendiaries, and 500 grand larcenies, and notice was given in a number of the public papers. But not a Grog-vender was arrested—most held up a license from the Mayor; and those who had acted without license claimed the protection of common law and immemorial usage, to do the same thing on the morrow to the end of time!—We wonder if any one can tell in these days what constitutes crime.

GEORGE SMITH KENRICK, ESQ.

It is with deep regret we announce the death of the above eminent philanthropist, which took place on the 12th December, at his residence in West Bromwich. His loss will be deeply felt by the friends of Temperance and popular improvement. Few men pursued these objects with greater zeal and devotion. His heart always felt for, and his best energies were always ready to assist the working classes. As an ironmaster, Mr. Kenrick was quite a model to his order. We have had opportunities of watching his career when he was proprietor of the Vortex Iron Works, in Monmouthshire. Order and regularity pervaded the works under his inspection. He was the friend of the widow and fatherless. To the education, domestic comfort and religious instruction of his workmen, he showed himself fully alive. By the collection of statistics and delivery of lectures he endeavoured to enlighten his workmen and the public, on the evils of our drinking usages. In short, all his efforts were directed to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of those who depended upon him. On his removal to West Bromwich, Mr. Kenrick pursued the same benevolent career. His time, his talents, and his money were consecrated to the promotion of sobriety. He was the life and soul of the Central Temperance Association. He projected, and was the proprietor of the Temperance Gazette, and published numerous papers and tracts on the same subject. As might be supposed from his public career, Mr. Kenrick was a gentleman of irreproachable character in private life. To know him was to admire him. Kindness, amiability, and goodness, seemed to be the leading features of his mind. But his benevolent career has been unexpectedly, and prematurely arrested by the hand of death, and the indefatigable workman now rests from his labours. He has, we believe, left a young widow to mourn his loss. Her tears will not fall alone; for many of the good and great of our country will drop the tear of sorrow and heartfelt regret over the grave of GEORGE SMITH KENRICK.—Standard of Freedom.

MR. JOHN DONALDSON.—This well-known and industrious advocate of the Total Abstinence principle, died on Sunday, the 17th inst., after a comparatively short illness. He has left behind him a widow and five or six children, wholly unprovided for, and, at present, in circumstances of deep distress.

A WISE JACKDAW.—Men may learn from the jackdaw, it seems, as well as from the ant. The Gateshead Observer says: "At Gilmerton a jackdaw, having got drunk with whisky, would never afterwards taste the deceitful liquor."

FREEDOM AND STRONG DRINK.—Are very uncomfortable companions.

GOOD ADVICE.—"Tell your father," said John Randolph to a young friend, "that I recommend abstinence from novel reading and from whiskey punch. Depend upon it, sir, they are both equally injurious to the brain."

A DRUNKEN "BEAST."—A drunkard made his way into a menagerie some time since, and the keeper, fearful that he would get hurt, told him to leave the place. An Irishman who was looking on said to the keeper, "Why don't you let him alone? Sure this is the right place for him; don't you see he has been making a baste of himself."

DRUNKENNESS IN THE NAVY.

In a series of papers which have recently appeared in the Morning Herald, on "The present condition of the Navy," we find the following, which we sincerely trust will be read and acted upon by the Lords of the Admiralty.

"SUBJECT OF DRUNKENNESS.

"The English people may be satisfied on one point—namely, that as long as spirits are daily served out in the fleet, so long must the lash be freely administered also. It is the general belief that sailors, like red Indians, are only to be caught and kept in good humour by the bait of spirits. The absurd and mischievous popular cry of "No punishment," is listened to, but the causes that lead to it are not sought out.

"The actual allowance of spirit to each man, one gill a day, might do but little harm; but, unfortunately, it is the current coin of the ship—all small debts are paid in grog. There are, of course, various different trades on board a ship, and the men mutually assist one another in this way, and, as I have said, the payment is made in grog; and such is the craving of the men to become intoxicated, that, instead of drinking their proper allowance, a smaller measure is in use in each mess, leaving a large surplus to one person; and they all religiously observe their turn in this respect, so that in each mess, even at sea, one man is supposed to be more or less drunk, making about forty every night in a large ship.

"But this is by no means the greatest part of the evil. The boy before the mast, and the naval cadet, fresh from school, have the example of spirit-drinking immediately and constantly before their eyes; and until he has learned to drink, and too often to like it, the boy considers himself no sailor. This is the true evil; this it is that early leads our men and officers into intemperate habits, before they are old enough to know the consequences of their folly. It would be well if those in authority considered this. The remedy for this state of things is simple. I believe if circulars were posted at the sea-ports, declaring that in future spirituous liquors would not be allowed on board ships of war; stating in the same circular, that the pay of able seamen is increased to two pounds a month (being six shillings in addition to their present pay), and that the pay of the petty officers and marines serving afloat is raised in the same proportion, there would be an addition rather than a falling off of volunteers for the fleet. The pay of the ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys need not be increased as an equivalent to the loss of grog, as they look forward to the time when they will become able seamen; and the greater distinction there is between the latter and the former classes the better.

"The ships already in commission might retain their grog until paid off, otherwise it would be considered a sort of breach of faith.

"This method of increasing the pay of the able seamen, making it more nearly equal to that of the merchant service, instead of entailing any additional expense upon the country, would be productive of considerable economy; for all the cost of the spirits now issued to officers, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys would be saved.

"Now would be the time to make this change. There are some who think that seamen could not do without spirits. Experience proves the contrary. The American merchant-ships (which are in excellent order) do not carry spirits, yet our men desert into them. What further proof is needed? The blessing of not having spirits in a ship is hardly to be told. Were this change adopted, unless I greatly mistake, the lash would not be so much required. I need not add that spirits should not be allowed on board for the use of any person. And to prevent spirits being smuggled on board, a law should be framed, declaring that any British subject proved guilty of any act of the kind should be sentenced to a heavy fine or imprisonment; and any seaman detected bringing them into the ship, or found drunk, should be liable to be fined in addition to any punishment to which he is now subject. Strict orders should be issued for the prevention of drunkenness, in whatever rank it is found. I would also remark, that whereas men when they do not drink spirits invariably eat more, some vegetable food out to be taken to sea and served out daily. What are now the spirit-rooms, would afford more than ample stowage."

THE ROAD TO RUIN.

THE DRINKING CUSTOMS of our country form the very highway to individual, social, and national ruin. The moderate men, who drink wine as a luxury, little think what intimate connexion exists between the habit they recommend and the ruin of millions. When the social glass is enjoyed in the family circle and in the friendly party, it is not considered that the self-same glass is the ruin of the brightest hopes, and the angel of death to a thousand families. And when our statesmen provide facilities for the people to obtain the liquid poison, in order to increase the revenue, they do not seem to think that the reflex expenses of our drinking system press heavily upon the community at large, in the shape of poor-rates, prison expenditure and police, judicial and penal establishments. It is said that the only way to move the sensibilities of John Bull is through his pocket, and that an appeal to his cash is much better than an appeal to his conscience. If it is so, there are ample grounds for calling his attention to the Temperance Reformation, in order to show how that, by neglecting its claims, he entails upon himself an enormous expenditure—an expense, in comparison with which the alleged extravagance of our Government, is but a trifle. Mr. Cobden talks of forming a People's Budget, by which twelve millions of the National expenditure may be saved without detriment to the public service. It is possible for the people to form a budget which would result in the direct saving of fifty millions sterling of money per annum, and a much larger indirect saving, and that without detriment to the public health, the social happiness, and the morals of the community.—Standard of Freedom.

TEMPERANCE VILLAGE.

An Association was formed some time since, having in view the formation of a Temperance Village, in the vicinity of New York. On the 1st of September last, each member had paid his purchase money, making altogether nearly 40,000 dollars. A tract of nearly 200 acres of land, situated about half a mile above Harlew, has been purchased from Geo. Morris, Esq. This has been regularly surveyed, and divided into lots of one acre each, no person being entitled to hold more than one. Streets, park, &c., have been laid out, and the work goes bravely on. The Village was regularly dedicated by the name of Morrisania, in October last, on which occasion the lot holders and their friends, to the number of about 2000, assembled on the ground. The exercises were opened by prayer, followed by singing, speaking by Captain Knight, Dr. Latham, and Rev. Mr. Hodges. Andrew Finley, Esq., of West Farms, presided. In behalf of the Association, Dr. A. D. Wilson presented silver pitchers to J. L. Mott, C. W. Houghton, and Mr. Mc. Graw, the projectors of the enterprise. The company then sat down to an excellent dinner. A peaceable, yet intense pleasure was experienced by all. There was no liquor, and, in consequence, no oaths, no wrangling, no violence. One of the conditions of the deeds by which these lots are held is, that if the holders of a lot, or his representative, shall "make, buy, or sell, upon the premises" any intoxicating drinks, all claim is forfeited, and the lot becomes the property of the Village of West Farms.—New York Organ.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

A large and most interesting meeting was held in the Great Room, Exeter-hall, on the evening of Monday, September 18.

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., who presided, was received with much cheering. He said that the temperance movement had strong claims upon every genuine patriot and philanthropist. He proposed to call the attention of the audience briefly to the progress made by the principle, and to the results likely to follow from that progress. He believed that the practice of total abstinence from strong drinks was calculated to purify the moral atmosphere of the nation, and to make it, consistently with its privileges, a pattern of morality and excellence to surrounding nations. He had himself joined the society nearly fourteen years ago. At that period the advocates of the principle were regarded as wild enthusiasts, and numerous obstacles were opposed to their progress. It had been said that the origin and progress of teetotalism might be compared to that of the Anti-Corn-law League; it was so, however, only in some respects. That great movement began with a few individuals, but they were men of talent, of wealth, of influence; their principle was identified plainly with the best interests of the people; thousands soon rallied round them; ministers of religion supported and encouraged them; and the cause soon became popular and triumphant. The system of teetotalism was set on foot by a few, but they were not men of wealth or influence; they were chiefly hard working-men; they were accused of attempting to deprive the humbler classes of one of the few comforts they enjoyed; and everywhere they had to encounter opposition. It might have been thought that so excellent a system would have commended itself to every man's conscience; instead of which their system was denounced as contrary to reason, to philosophy, and to experience; chapels were closed against them; sermons were preached against them; their mode of advocacy was objected to; they were accused of an attempt to supplant the Gospel, and their attempt to reclaim drunkards was declared to be absurd. But they persevered, notwithstanding (cheers). They believed it to be possible to reclaim even drunkards. They believed that their principle was promotive of the designs of the Gospel. Between Liverpool and Manchester was a large tract of land known as Chat Moss; it was a great morass, on which nothing useful would grow, and the atmosphere of which was declared to be poisonous. It was abandoned for years as irreclaimable. But the late Edward Baines took it; he did not at first cast seed into it, for that would have been an act of insanity, but he had it thoroughly drained—created an adaptation between the soil and the seed; then he sowed it, and now it brought forth good fruit in abundance. The advocates of teetotalism looked upon drunkards as a great morass; ministers of the gospel, year after year, continued to scatter the good seed among them, but the soil was not adapted to the seed, and all their labour was in vain. Hence, said they, the drunkard cannot be reclaimed. Then came the teetotal advocates; first they dug the deep dyke of total abstinence, drained the alcohol from the brain of the drunkard, thus creating an adaptation between the soil and the seed; then they broadcast the seed, and it sprung up thirty, sixty, a hundred fold, to the benefit of man and the glory of the Redeemer (much cheering). The men of Preston visited Manchester, Blackburn, Bolton, Todmorden, and other surrounding towns. Many listened attentively, and in a short time thousands snapped asunder the chains of custom and appetite by which they had been bound, and became physically and morally free. Then, as the result, they became better husbands, parents, and citizens. Mechanics' institutions, churches, and chapels, were regularly attended, and hundreds of them soon became united to Christian communities. The lovers of moderate drinking took the alarm, though the majority regarded teetotalism as a temporary excitement which would soon die away; it had, however, outlived alike the scorn of one class and the opposition of another, and continued to wend its widening way (cheers). And when he looked at the result of the labours of the early advocates, he could not but say it was well for the poor drunkards who had been reclaimed—it was well for the wives and families of hundreds—it was well for the community at large, that they did not halt—that they were not intimidated (cheers). And he believed that the principle was still taking deep root in the understanding and affections of thousands. And now that such efforts were making to benefit the working classes, he trusted that the teetotalers of the metropolis would trim their lamps, and would prepare to meet the general expectation (hear, hear, hear). There was a loud cry for financial reform. Mr. Cobden had proposed a budget for the people, by which twelve millions of the national expenditure might be saved; but important as that might be, the teetotalers could form a far more profitable budget—a budget by which fifty millions sterling might be annually saved, and the physical, social, and moral condition, of the people, at the same time, be greatly improved (hear, hear). And how great a reduction might be made in poor rates! Men who in the summer months could earn from 30s. to 40s. per week, were reckless and improvident, so that when winter came they had not a farthing to help themselves with. Then they became burdens to the parish and to the public, to say nothing of the bearing of intemperate habits upon police and prison rates, lunatic asylums, &c. Mr. Cassell appealed to those present who might be panting for the political elevation of the people, and asked if there was any practice so degrading to character as that of drunkenness? (hear.) Men who in the tap-room, with their liquor before them, shouted "Liberty or Death!" were the greatest tyrants and oppressors of their families, and were themselves the veriest slaves in existence (cheers). Who could trust men with the elective franchise who could betray their trust for a draught of strong drink, and who, to gratify their unnatural appetite, would starve their families, pawn their clothes, or sell their Bibles? (hear) So as to the religious education of the people: teetotalism was an admirable railway by which to facilitate the progress of the gospel chariot (cheers). Teetotalism went forth to pluck up the briars and the thorns which prevented the good seed from springing up. If then those present desired to see the people of this country elevated politically, socially, morally, and religiously, they would, he trusted, feel it to be their duty at once to adopt the teetotal practice, and to assist in introducing that practice throughout the community (repeated cheers.)

Mr. Jabez INWARDS proposed to set before the audience "The claims of the Temperance Reformation." Society, he observed, was in a strange state. On the one side was teetotalism, which never broke the heart of a single individual—that was despised; on the other side was drunkenness, which had injured and destroyed thousands and tens of thousands—that was cherished and beloved. And was that true of England—of England in its boasted state of intelligence? It was. Why then he would say, "Go to the ant, and it shall teach thee; to the beasts of the field, and they shall instruct thee" (cheers). As there were dark spots on the sun's disc, so, on the greatness and glory of England there were dark spots, and the darkest spot was that of intemperance (hear). The object of the temperance movement was to remove those dark spots, that England might appear in all its real beauty and splendour. A few years ago the drunkard was passed by, and it was deemed useless to attempt his reclamation; but teetotalism has been the means of reclaiming thousands, after science and religion had pronounced their case hopeless. And how was their reclamation brought about? By a plain, common-sense principle, which the simplest could understand.

In the course of the march of teetotalism, no sighs had been heaved, no tears caused, no blood shed: could that be said of the march of strong drink? (hear and cheers.) No; and, in addition to the woes it scattered in its path it bound the bodies and souls of men in chains. It was predicted that the result of teetotalism would be to produce a race of poor, pale, puny, feeble creatures, fit for nothing in the world; that fallacy was as old as the days of Daniel. But the teetotalers could say, as the Hebrew worthies said, "Prove thy servants, and see if we be not fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat and drink the king's wine" (much cheering.) The Temperance Provident Institution proved that teetotalers were healthier and longer-lived than any other class. Mr. Inwards then referred to the sad waste of wholesome and nutritious grain destroyed by the manufacture of strong drink. Eight millions of quarters of good barley could be purchased for sixteen millions sterling, and would supply eight millions of persons with bread for one year. But the same quantity of barley converted into strong drink would cost seventy millions sterling; and, how many persons would that nourish? Actually not one! (hear and cheers.) Surely it was highly criminal thus to destroy people's food (hear). It was a sin against man, against nature, against Jehovah. Then strong drink, its use, its sale, its manufacture, ought to be abandoned; and if so, all ought to become teetotalers (cheers). In reference to the spread of true religion, teetotalism had been greatly blessed as an honoured instrument of usefulness; in one county alone, it had been the means of adding about three thousand persons, once drunkards, to the Christian Church (cheers). Mr. Inwards then referred to London, with its six thousand drunkeries, those licensed abominations, in which thousands were constantly offering libations of the most splendid description to the impious Bacchus; and yet if we listened to the preachers of the Gospel, from one end of the metropolis to the other, we should scarcely suppose that such a vice as intemperance existed (hear). It was surely the duty of teetotalers to "cry aloud and spare not" against so vicious and destructive a system (hear). And who perpetuated the delusion as to the drinking customs of the country? Not the drunkard; no, his conduct and character was perpetual lecture against intemperance. The drunkard said, practically, "touch not the drink, for it bites like a serpent and stings like an adder." No; it was the moderate drinker, the respectable man, the professing Christian, who perpetuated the practice; he said, practically, "Use it kindly, for it is a good creature, of God." Hence the country continued to be cursed with drunkards. Many thought that the teetotalers went too far; but teetotalers were of opinion that the consumers of strong drink went sadly too far. The practice of total abstinence was, however, rapidly gaining ground, and union, and perseverance would be sure to gain great and glorious triumphs (much cheering).

Mr. T. HUDSON furnished some statistics illustrative of moderate drinking. His first proposition was, that the vast revenue derived in this country from intoxicating drinks is not derived chiefly from drunkards, but from moderate drinkers. Estimating the population of England, and Wales at seventeen millions, and subtracting from that number one million for total abstainers, and 6,500,000 children (assuming that they used no strong drinks), it left 9,500,000 persons drinkers of strong drinks. It was computed that there were 500,000 confirmed drunkards; then there were left nine million persons, the respectable moderate drinkers of society. If they spent but 1d. per day, that would be £1 10s. 5d. a year, or for the nine millions of persons, £13,687,500 per annum. But he could not let them off at an average of less than 3d. per day; they never got drunk, and yet they spent £41,062,500 a year. Setting down for the 500,000 drunkards 1s. a head, £9,125,000 a year, that left a surplus of £32,497,500 against the moderate drinker (hear and cheers.) Hundreds and thousands were branded with the name of drunkards who were by no means the most intemperate in the community; many drank more deeply than they who were yet able to discharge all the ordinary duties of life with considerable propriety. A man who was sober all the week would get drunk when he received his wages on Saturday night, and would perhaps repeat his draughts on the Sunday; thus he spent £10 8s. a year on drink. Another passed him while in a state of intoxication and predicted his ruin. But what did he himself drink? Beer at dinner, £6 1s. 8d. a year; two glasses of good port per day, £12 3s. 4d. a year more; a glass of best brandy and water at night, £9 2s. 6d. a year. And this most sober and respectable man, who chided the poor drunkard for his waste of £10 8s., actually spent £27 7s. 6d., just £16 19s. 6d. more than his despised neighbours! (cheers.)—Mr. Hudson's second proposition was, that it is impossible to define what is moderation in the use of intoxicating drinks. "A glass or so," "a drop to keep the cold out," "a little to assist digestion," and so on. One declared that no man ought to exceed three glasses; another prescribed two bottles. Then instances were adduced of men who took large quantities and yet attained to a great age. One boasted that though called a hard drinker, he had attained the age of 84, but he acknowledged that he had buried three sets of his drinking companions. So men might point to the "Iron Duke," the "Captain of a hundred fights," who had escaped unhurt; but they forgot that hundreds and thousands had perished in those same fights (hear and cheers). Mr. Hudson's third proposition was, that it is unsafe for any man to drink intoxicating drinks, and that the only certain and safe system is to abstain altogether. In proportion as drink was used, the brain was excited, and in proportion as the brain was excited moral control was destroyed; and when the balance was lost, who could say how long ruin would be averted (hear). No man had a right to use such dangerous drinks, and of course, no one had a right to make or sell them (cheering). But "a good time was coming" (cheers). Did any ask for a sign of its approach? He would point to the present meeting, congregated in such large numbers, not to listen to the sweet notes of Jenny Lind, but to the plain and steady advocacy of total abstinence from strong drink. Let the teetotalers dedicate themselves—let them buckle on their armour afresh. Truth was stronger than error, and would assuredly prevail. Only let them have full faith in their principle, and act accordingly and then would be brought about the glorious day they had so long desired (cheering).

Mr. THOMAS WHITTAKER announced his subject as "Teetotalism and the Constitution." Man, he said, had two constitutions, one physical, the other mental, and he wished to ascertain which of these it was that teetotalism would not suit. Men acted according to their faith, and systems were valued in proportion to men's belief in their excellence. When he used strong drink formerly, he believed in its excellence, and used it with all his heart. He became a teetotaler because he believed it to be a good system, he found it suited to his constitution, and he had steadily adhered to it (cheers). How did persons become teetotalers? In various ways. One man fell out with a publican and went to a teetotal meeting, and signed the pledge from mere spite. Soon, something in the society displeased him, and on the same principle he went back to strong drink; and when remonstrated with for his apostasy, his excuse was, "teetotalism does not suit my constitution." It did not agree with his mental constitution. Another was invited by his master to a teetotal meeting; he listened with great defence—signed the pledge in the presence of the gentleman who invited him—took care to display his card of membership, and so on. But no sooner did some other respectable gentleman or employer ask him to take a glass of wine, than, anxious to please, he partook of it, and when charged with his breach of faith, excused himself by saying that "teetotalism did not suit his constitution." It did not suit the constitution of his mind (cheering). Another sees a procession of teetotalers; is charmed with the music, flag, and medals; goes to a tea meeting, tickets 9d. each, where there is plenty of good tea and rich plum cake; attends a lively public meeting; all is attractive; he signs the pledge, and goes on well for a time. Some wake or fair, with its music and dancing presents greater attractions, and he apostatizes. His excuse is that "he has tried teetotalism, and it does not suit his constitution." Another, a respectable man, some dark night when he thinks no one will see him, creeps into a temperance meeting; he listens, and hears statements made which somewhat startle him, and to which, in his mind, he seriously objects untrue. Finding, however, the speaker adduces facts in support of his statements, he is gradually brought to believe in the excellence of the principle; one scruple after another is removed, and he advances nearer and nearer to the platform, and at length requests permission to speak a few words, and concludes by signing the pledge. He goes home and tells his wife where he has been and what he has done; she expresses her deep regret, and assures him that teetotalism will not suit him. She was always afraid, she said, that the goodness of his heart would run away with the sense of his head. The poor man begins to be worried to death. Perhaps he is a minister. Then certain old ladies of his congregation remonstrate with him; they get the doctor on their side. He is reminded of the heavy labour he has to perform; is assured that he is looking very ill; till at last he begins to fear that it will not suit his constitution; and while the teetotalers are exulting in the thought of his having joined their ranks, he sends in his resignation (hear and cheers). These were some of the reasons which induced some to imagine that teetotalism did not suit their constitution. So fully convinced, however, was he (Mr. W.) that it would suit every constitution, if fairly tried, that he earnestly exhorted every person at once to sign the pledge. He appealed to Christians, who were bound to make sacrifices for their own good and for the good of others; to mothers, whose bosoms glowed with emotion over their little sparks of immortality; to fathers, who looked on their children bearing blossoms of beauty and of hope; he called upon all to come up to the help of the temperance cause. By signing the pledge they would be secured against a thousand ills; and by faith in the Redeemer they would come to the enjoyment of present and eternal blessedness (loud cheers.)

Mr. T. A. SMITH proposed to expose some of the popular fallacies respecting strong drinks. It had been asserted, he said, that "knowledge was power;" he believed this, hence he was anxious to diffuse knowledge respecting strong drinks. The use of those drinks was founded altogether in ignorance—ignorance of their nature and properties; and even doctors of medicine often betray their ignorance as to certain courses of regimen which they had not practised themselves, or seen practised by others. Teetotalers were anxious to excite a spirit of enquiry, and hence they exposed what they believed to be fallacies. Many persons looked at a strong man, and because he used strong drink they supposed that the drink made him strong. These liquors were called "strong," hence people jumped at the conclusion that they made men who drank them strong (hear). They did not so reason as to other things that were called strong. Strong butter, for instance, was not greatly approved; onions were called strong; but persons seldom took onions to strengthen them. Wrong conclusions were often drawn from right premises, and sometimes both premises and conclusions were false (hear). He had not become an abstainer from passion, but from reason; and if it could be proved that intoxicating liquors would make him a better man in any respect, he would take to the use of them again (hear). But many persons said "What were these things sent for?" He asked, in reply, where were they sent to? He denied that they were "sent" at all. They were not natural productions; they did not drop from the sky, nor from the sides of mountains, nor flow through valleys. They were not sent, but manufactured. God sent barley, but man made it into malt, and in so doing broke the Sabbath, besides destroying large portions of nourishing grain. Then, again, it was asked, "What was barley sent for?" He replied, to make bread, or fatten cattle. If we had too much wholesome and nutritious grain in this country, there might be some show of reason in wasting and destroying a portion of it; but when it was recollected that we had not enough, and had to send to foreign countries to supply the deficiency, there was no excuse (hear). Barley was sent to be used, not abused; to be converted into bread, not to be made into a deadly drink, producing disease, and crime, and misery, and ruin (cheers). A popular lecturer had said that alcohol was present, and from that he inferred that it had a right to be used. Why, in some districts sulphurated hydrogen gas was greatly present, and injured thousands; but should we on that account object to the labours of the Health of Towns Association, to have such districts purified (hear and cheers)? Alcohol had its uses, it was true, in the manufacture of varnishes, tinctures, &c. It was also used to preserve portions of dead bodies; but it followed by no means that it should be put into living bodies to destroy them (hear). It was said that many good and wise men had used those drinks; but it was certain that they were not made wise or good by their use of such drinks; and, it was certain, also, that many wise and good men had been injured by their use of them (hear). History, science, and experience proved that no man was ever made better by his use of strong drinks, and that no man was ever, either as to wisdom or goodness, by entire abstinence from them (cheers). It was said, "Look at draymen and publicans, and see how large and fat they are." Draymen were large before they became draymen, and their size was no proof whatever of their strength. As to publicans, they used very little exercise, they fed on the best, and fat was no sign of health or strength, but the contrary (hear). It had been proved that the average age of publicans was below that of other trades, and that the average age of potboys was below that of footboys. Once more, it was said that teetotalism was not conversion. Who ever said it was? (hear). Bibles, chapels, churches, preaching; were not conversion, though they were all valuable instruments. The objection was idle. But he feared there was a sort of compromise between the Church and Satan. It seemed as if Satan said, "Do not denounce wickedness in high places; do not attack peculiar vices; let men go on in their own courses, and you shall sit under your own vine and fig-tree; none shall make you afraid; your ministers shall be endowed, and you shall have the protection of the State" (much cheering). He (Mr. S.) fully believed in the conversion of the world, but he believed that the church must first be converted; and he believed that teetotalers would leave no means untried to convert the church, in that respect at least (cheers). And he trusted that they would continue to labour on till every obstacle to the progress of the Gospel was removed, and till the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ (considerable cheering).

Mr. G. CAMPBELL proposed a resolution of thanks to the Chairman, which was seconded by Mr. GROSJEAN, and carried with great applause.

THE CHAIRMAN briefly returned thanks. He rejoiced that the present meeting had taken place, and would willingly assist in getting up another in the same place (much cheering).

The meeting, the interest of which was kept up to the last, concluded about ten o'clock.

TEETOTALISM IN THE CHURCH.

The devoted friends of the Christian Association and Sabbath School Total Abstinence Society, held their first Monthly Public Meeting in Ebenezer Independent Chapel, Denmark Street, Soho, on Monday 11th Dec. The interesting business of the evening commenced with reading of Scriptures, and fervent prayer for the Divine blessing. WILLIAM SIMS, Esq., presided, and delivered an effective address, in which he showed the advantages derivable from the connection of Temperance meetings with religious associations.

Rev. R. B. ISAAC, Minister of the Chapel, followed in a speech full of Christian sympathy. He dwelt upon the necessity of forming Congregational Total Abstinence Societies, and the solemn duties of pastors to take up the Cross, letting no interest, fear, any other unworthy principle deter them from consecrating their noblest energies to the cause of suffering humanity. He traced the operations of the temperance cause on society which, though it might not bear the appearance of rapid and violent progress, like the shallow stream, bounding and tossing against every thing that came in its way; yet might be found by those who looked beneath the mere surface of society, pursuing its way, like the deep under current of a stately and majestic river, even though the surface might appear smooth and still. Teetotalism came to us wafted on every breeze, rippling on every wave; and the happy home of every reclaimed drunkard proclaimed the undeniable evidence of the finger of God guiding the work, and stamping our merciful labour with his approving smile.

Mr. FERNANDEZ, Superintendent of the Westminster Ragged School, showed that a vast amount of the poverty, discord, suffering, crime, disease, and premature dissolution amongst the poorer classes, were almost exclusively caused by their drinking propensities. From extensive experience he could boldly affirm that Ragged schools, and similar benevolent institutions would be uncalled for, if intoxicating liquors were extirpated from the country. He rejoiced in the organization of the "Christian Temperance Association, and would affectionately say to every Minister and congregation, "go thou and do likewise."

Mr. J. H. ESTERBROKE, Secretary, gave an impassioned delineation of the withering and deadly nature of the fire-waters upon the intellectual, domestic and spiritual character and circumstances of man. He called upon Ministers of the glorious gospel, and professed followers of the self-denying redeemer, to awake from their sinful apathy, to cry aloud and spare not, to exert a holy fervour and sanctified zeal in behalf of this blessed instrumentality. Let us manfully put shoulder to the wheel, and urge onward this sacred reformation. Bleeding humanity, and heart broken wives, supplicate our assistance. Each little ragged object of compassion that runs our streets unheeded and despised, serves but to remind us that there are drunken fathers and mothers in our midst. The melancholy scenes of shattered and disorganized families urge us in plaintive tones to be "up and doing," and never, never to become weary of well doing, until the last vestige of the demon drink, and all its concomitant evils and foul abominations shall be swept from the bosom of the world.

Mr. CAMPBELL rivetted the attention of the auditory with an appalling statistical account of the Intemperance, desitution, criminality and immorality of an alarming proportion of the British community, and concluded with excellent advice and earnest invitation to atand on the use of the insidious and destructive liquors.

Mr. DRIVER, Sabbath School Teacher, passed a high eulogium upon the importance of a christian temperance Association, and the good it was likely to diffuse amongst congregations generally, as a faithful rebuke and sublime example. Strong drink, he observed, had ever proved an awful barrier to the success of Christian Missions, therefore it was the imperative duty of every sincere wisher to the diffusion of scriptural knowledge, to abstain not only for the benefit and rescue of the perishing at home, but also for the salvation of the degraded and imbruted heathens abroad.

The doxology was beautifully sung by the Sabbath School Children, afterwards a vote of thanks was presented to the Chairman, which he acknowledged, and the respectable meeting separated, evidently anxious for the prosperity of the new Christian Temperance Movement.

Some excellent pledges were obtained.

DARTFORD, KENT.

Dec. 6, a meeting of the Dartford Temperance Society was held in the Independent Chapel, Mr. Collins, of Crayford, engaged in prayer; and a few introductory remarks by Mr. Parks, Mr. Squire, of London, delivered a lecture illustrative of the beneficial effects of entire abstinence from intoxicating liquors, which called forth repeated expressions of applause from a highly respectable audience.

The friends of our cause in Dartford are but few, and have much opposition and prejudice to contend with. Our town, although but small, contains three large Breweries, and many drinking houses, through which these poisoned waters are continually flowing, producing Immorality—Poverty—disease and death.

But what distresses us most is the conduct of Christian professors, who look upon our work with as much suspicion as they would if we were engaged in anything opposed to the glorious gospel. We rejoice however to state that every member of our committee belongs to the household of faith," and that although the church will not afford assistance, its indifference cannot hinder our ultimate success, while we have the great Head of the Church on our side.

W. C. Y.

BEVERLEY.

The Third Anniversary of the opening of the Temperance Hall was held as follows:—On Monday evening Mr. Edwards, the York City Missionary, addressed a large and respectable audience, and at the close several signed the pledge. On Tuesday, above 200 sat down to Tea, which was provided by several Members of the Society. After the tables were removed Mr. Tho. Waddington, the President of the Society, took the chair; Mr. Jas. Parkinson, of Hull, gave a very animating address, shewing the way in which he became a Teetotaler, and the benefit he had derived from the cold water system, and that he was able to compute in weight with any publican in the town of Beverly, as he weighed about 23 stone. The Rev. B. Evans, of Scarborough, was listened to with great attention, the Rev. W. Jackson, Wesleyan Association, addressed the audience in an interesting manner. Several other gentlemen gave short and pointed addresses. The Beverley Brass Band played at intervals, and several Temperance Melodies were sung. The proceeds of the Anniversary amounted to upwards of Twelve pounds, which is to go towards liquidating the debt upon the Hall.

JEREMIAH RUDD, Secretary.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

On Tuesday, Nov. 28th, the Committee and Speakers, with a few friends of the "Newcastle Young Men's Temperance Association," took Tea together in Mr. Dodd's Temperance Hotel. After Tea, a Conversational Meeting was held, over which Mr. E. PARSONS presided—the object of the meeting was to consider "How to increase the efficiency of the Association." Many old, as well as young, advocates made suggestions for the Committee to carry into effect—the principle suggestion was the desirableness of having a class for the improvement of advocates, and discussing subjects bearing on the Temperance movement. Two evils were pointed out as injurious to the cause. The use of Tobacco by Temperance advocates, and their neglect of their respective duties to the Churches of which they are members.

The Association having completed its first year on the 25th Nov., the Secretary stated that the operations during that time, were as follows:—

Meetings held.....	136
Attended by.....	20,685
Addresses delivered.....	353
Tracts distributed.....	4790
Members enrolled.....	719
Branches established, (24 in Sunday Schools, 1 in the Ragged School, and 1 at a village.....)	26
Names enrolled by the School Branches, —Teachers.....	261
Scholars.....	1370

The Secretary stated that many of the Teachers, members of the Branches, were Total Abstainers before the Association was established, and had joined the Society in their Schools, in order to further the Sunday School movement.

The general operations of the Association are of a progressive and interesting character. During the last two months the Committee have carried on successful efforts to provide rational amusement, blended with instruction. A course of four Lectures was delivered in the Temperance Hall, by the Rev. J. G. Rogers, B.A., on the French Revolution of 1798. They were well received by an attentive audience, and from the interest taken in them, Mr. Rogers, at the request of the Committee, has kindly consented to extend the course.

The Committee commenced another series of meetings, a combination of Talent, Vocal and Instrumental music, and addresses. Each evening the large Hall was well filled, although one penny was charged for admission.

The other Societies in the Town are all actively engaged—and a favourable feeling exists in the minds of those interested in the tuition of the young. In the Sabbath Schools were Societies exist, the various deputations were cordially welcomed, and the Scholars, and Teachers listened with marked attention while addresses were being delivered. In some measure these remarks apply to Day schools. In the Ragged school a Branch Society has been established. In the Croft street Girl's school a flourishing Society exists, and in other schools the friends of Temperance are welcomed. Mr. W. H. Buchanan, the laborious Ladies' Missionary, has devoted not a little of his time and energy to this very important part of the Temperance movement, and his efforts have proved successful. THOMAS BOAG, Secretary.

REVIEW.

THE EVILS OF ENGLAND, SOCIAL AND ECONOMICAL: by a London Physician. London, J. W. Parker, 1848.

This is the work of a careful observer, and is levelled at those social ills which are crying out for remedy. Its whole spirit is admirable, as it breaths throughout that practical benevolence, which struggles to prevent rather than to palliate. The following observations on Intemperance are well worthy of notice.

"INTEMPERANCE."

"I believe that the nation might bear up against beggars, vagrants, thieves, debtors, swindlers, and poor-laws, pay heavy taxes, and be guilty of great waste of all sorts, and yet be tolerably prosperous, if it were not for the health destroying, and poverty, crime, and madness producing habit of intemperance. THIRTY MILLIONS of pounds sterling are said to be spent, by the working classes of England alone, in intoxicating liquors, and if we allow half that sum as the expenditure of temperate men, who never drink to excess, the other half may probably be looked upon as engaged in producing every degree and form of every conceivable physical and moral evil which flesh or spirit is heir to. Say that only five millions of this large sum is spent in excess, bordering upon or actually amounting to intoxication, that only five millions are withdrawn from reproductive employment, to be squandered in this brutal and degrading way, which Satan himself would be ashamed of, and what an awful vision of waste, misery, disease, cruelty, crime, and madness does the thought conjure up! This great subject, however, is in such able and energetic hands, that I shall not dwell upon it at greater length. I will content myself with these two questions addressed to the advocates of the right to eat.—1. Is not the proper punishment for the drunkard that starvation to which his habits naturally and inevitable tend? 2. And if you revolt from this punishment, why are you so indifferent to the starvation to which these wretches devote all who depend upon them for support?"

NEW PUBLICATION.

A letter addressed to the Rev. J. STOUGHTON, of Kensington. By E. TISDALL. W. Tuck, Hammersmith.

A pointed exposé of those Ministers who, when treating the subject of "sobriety," define it as "the moderate use of the good things of this world," including, of course, among these good things, intoxicating liquors. Mr. Tisdall tells some home truths—fortifying his positions abundantly by quotations from the best authorities. We cordially recommend a plentiful distribution of this tract, especially among Christian congregations.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

GROG-SHOPS IN NEW YORK.—The New York Organ says "It appears from the records in the Mayor's office, that 3,688 grog-shops infect the city."

FRUITS OF ABSTINENCE.—A young mechanic, without property, formed the resolution some time since, to abstain from the use of tobacco and strong drink; as the result of his savings, he, in a short time, sent in forty shillings to assist in paying a debt by which a benevolent institution was embarrassed. How many hundreds of young men might do likewise!

NOVEL PUNISHMENT FOR DRUNKENNESS.—The magistrates of the Loughborough bench, Leicestershire, have for some time past enforced the provisions of an old act of parliament relative to drunkenness. Persons convicted a second time have been required to enter into their own recognizance, together with two other persons, in the sum of £10, for their sobriety during the remainder of their lives. On the 17th of September, 1846, a stocking maker, named Thomas Wakelin, of Quorndon, was convicted of being drunk, and that being his second offence, he was required to find the sureties. With some difficulty the sureties were obtained, and Wakelin was liberated. Two years have passed; the wake at Quorndon has been celebrated, and Wakelin was drunk in the streets. He was taken before C. M. Philips and J. Parker Esqrs., at Loughborough, and his recognizances were declared estreated; and he was informed that unless the £10 was paid, his goods would be distrained and those of his sureties, to the extent of the deficiency. A young man named William Williamson, convicted a second time for drunkenness by the same bench, was ordered to find the usual sureties for the remainder of his life. He was not able to find such sureties, and was consequently committed to Leicester prison, where he still lies, and, according to law will lie for an indefinite period.

GOOD ADVICE.—Brother, go to the Temperance Meeting. Don't say you can't do any good; this is a mistake; even your presence would do good, by helping to fill the hall, and countenancing the movement.

ALWAYS HAVE SOME WORK IN HAND.—Industry is the parent of wealth, pecuniary, intellectual and spiritual. Always to have some work in hand is the surest method to keep the devil from turning one's head into his workshop; and this he always does with idle people.

"WINE OF FOUR MEN."—This is the name given to a kind of wine made at a place called Witzzenhaisen, in Germany. The reason of this name is, it is gravely stated, that it takes one to pour it out, one to drink it, and two to hold the man while he drinks it.

THE GOOD TIME COMING.

BY B. PARSONS.

These words are almost become a household phrase. Children lisp it, and men of hoary hairs utter it with ecstasy, exulting at the thought that those whom they are soon to leave behind are born to a brighter destiny than fell to their own lot. Yonder mother, as she takes her hungry children to their cheerless dormitory, and ransacks the house for every old garment that may serve as a substitute for bed-clothes, wipes the falling tear from her cheek as she dreams of a better time coming. Those fathers, too, who have borne the burden and heat of many a day and night of labour, who have for years risen early, late taking rest, and eating the bread of carefulness and affliction, though their brow is prematurely wrinkled with care, their countenances worn, and their hands horny with incessant hardship and toil, yet brace themselves with patience and courage as they see in the distance the dawn of a happier day. Yes, and those self-denying philanthropists, those God-like men and women, whose charity sympathizes with universal man, who plod by day and cogitate by night, how they may lessen this world's woes, whose generosity is branded with sentimentalism by the luxurious, and whose benevolence has to encounter many a jest from the prodigal, and many a frown from the niggard,—these heaven-inspired philanthropists, amidst evil report and good report, with much to depress and little to encourage, gird up the loins of their mind, and hope to the end, as they hear the prophetic words that "a good time is coming."

From the seers of the olden time, the martyrs of a dark and cruel age, and the pulpits of a nearer date, we are saluted with the same great truth, that our planet is yet destined to see a more blissful era. And here Christianity differs from most of the other religions that have been promulgated among men. Paganism had its golden age, but it was past, and in the minds of its votaries most probably gone never more to return. Not so the Bible. In its sacred predictions the golden age is yet to come. The patriarchs saw these promises afar off and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims upon earth. Abraham rejoiced to see this day, he saw it and was glad. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it. David and Isaiah tuned their lyres to celebrate its glory; and John, the last of inspired Evangelists, expatiated in the light of its beams.

We, who live in these last days, are especially blest. Our fathers had to walk by faith; they heard from heaven that a good time was coming, and believed, although scarcely a ray of hope from earth pierced the gloom that surrounded them: we, on the contrary, see the good work begun. In our day, the chain of slavery has been burst asunder never to be forged again; monopoly has received the death blow, and peace has begun "to break the bow, to snap the spear in sunder, and burn the chariot in the fire." The nineteenth century has been the most eventful in the world's history, and 1849 has commenced his race with happier omens than ever greeted any of its predecessors. The prospects of trade, commerce, liberty, education and religion, are truly cheering. We have arrived within sight of the promised land, and therefore an immense weight of obligation is thus devolved upon Teetotalers. For we need not say that it is not in the range of possibilities for any felicitous circumstances, however hopeful, to bless a country, or a world addicted to drinking. Here, indeed, "the prosperity of fools will destroy them." Some of us are old enough to remember theseeming flourishing condition of trade during many years of the last war. All were employed, wages were high, and our garner were full. We borrowed money lavishly, and spent it prodigally. Nothing could have been more artificial than the state of our country at that time, and dearly have we and our children to pay for all the benefits which were then enjoyed. But, without philosophising on the wisdom or folly of those days, the fact remains the same that the condition of our tradesmen, operatives and peasants, were then eminently prosperous, and yet there has rarely been a period more marked by dissipation and crime. We have seen many an operative who for years had his £5 a week, doomed to beg his bread, or live on the paltry parish allowance of threepence a day. In fact, many who had these high wages never paid their way, and were glad before Friday came to borrow a few pence to buy a loaf. It was all a feast and a famish. Saturday evening, Sunday, Monday and Tuesday, they rolled in luxury, and lived on the fat of the land, but long before Saturday came again, every farthing was gone, and they wanted a meal. It is said of savages that when they have succeeded in the chase they gorge themselves like the boa constrictor, and then, through sheer gluttony and improvidence, have to endure days of famine. Just such was the state of our country at the time to which we refer. At present, also, we have want and luxury in the land. The rich have too much, the poor too little; but formerly this plethora and starvation were found in the same family. The very individuals who were guilty of gluttony and drunkenness at the commencement of the week, wanted bread at the close. And these were chiefly the doings of drink. We have at this very hour on the list of paupers, or shut up in our unions, some thousands of men and women who ought to be living in respectability on their own means. We have seen the operative, who once had his £250 a year, begging from door to door, and the religious people, who spurned him from their threshold, revile the Teetotalers with the very same breath with which they branded the intemperance of this pitiable outcast.

It may be animating and cheering to sing "There is a good time coming," but without Teetotalism the vision will be a perfect delusion. You cannot realize the glorious hope so long as the people are addicted to strong drinks. Most ample were the means of prosperity possessed by Babylon, Greece, Rome and other nations; but luxury and dissipation was their ruin. The path of history is strewn with the wrecks of thrones and empires, and there are few of them whose dissolution might not be traced, in a great degree, to the use of intoxicating liquors. And whatever prosperity indulgent heaven may grant to our people, if we continue among us the poisonous bowl, we have a bane of ample power to turn our blessings into a curse. The seasons may be genial, the former and latter rain may fall in due time and proportion, the sun may shine with his mildest and most invigorating influence, seed time and harvest, summer and winter, cold and heat, may be all we could wish, the pastures may be clothed with flocks, the valleys also be covered over with corn, and the little hills rejoice on every side, but the moderate, not less than the immoderate use of strong drinks, may convert all these gifts of the Eternal into calamities, by affording us the greater facilities for luxury and intemperance. Our soil might be as fertile as the garden of Eden, and Jehovah might open the windows of heaven and pour out a blessing that there would not be room enough to receive it: we may have every restriction on trade and commerce removed, the resources of every country may be placed at our disposal; the shuttle, the anvil, the potter's wheel and the plough, may vie with each other in industry, and yet, if we retain our drinking usages, we shall be a vile, degraded, pauperized people: so long as the laws of nature and rectitude are, like their divine author, immutable, it is not in the power of God or man to enrich or bless a nation devoted to the use of intoxicating poisons. Without Teetotalism, then, it is all a farce and a fallacy to sing of a good time coming.

Jehovah does not willingly afflict nor grieve the children of men. Judgment is his strange work. He waits to be gracious, but our iniquities compel him to withhold his blessing. He has the reins of universal empire in his hands, and employs his control over the seasons and the nations to check our vices. Would we only serve him, his providence would pour its richest stores into our bosom, and we should be a delightful land; but, if we are determined to be wicked, we may rest assured that he is equally determined to visit us with his rod. Now, to convert his bounties into poisons, and administer them to the peril of our health, the destruction of life, the degradation, desecration, or annihilation of talent, and the demoralization of society, is not only a crime, but the parent of myriads of crimes. And what is worse, the Church, the religious people, the Ministers of the Gospel, are among the most active and efficient patrons of this abomination. We have this cup of devils brought into the sanctuary, the benediction of heaven pronounced upon the accursed bane, and the very men who, from one Sabbath to another, prophesy of a good time coming, are doing what they can, by example and precept, to render their predictions a splendid delusion. Again, we repeat, that it is useless to anticipate the millennium, unless we abandon the drunkard's drink. We may have providential and political blessings and privileges in abundance; we may have teachers of the highest order, and schools adequate to the wants of the nation; we may have Bibles in profusion, and ministers of angelic zeal, eloquence and devotion, and yet there is malignity enough in spirits, wine, beer, cider, and porter, to neutralize by far the greater part of our exertions and advantages.

To the Teetotalers we would say, "Be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord:" and we are not afraid of being charged with desecrating the language of inspiration, when we call Total Abstinence the Lord's work. Already the great seal of heaven has sanctioned it. Drunkards have been made sober, backsliders have been restored, thousands have been saved from the fatal snare, and multitudes are on the road to heaven, who would never have heard the Gospel but for the exertions of Total Abstinents. With such trophies before us, we can bear the ingratitude of unthankful churches, and the frown of wine-bibbing Ministers. While, on the one hand, the good time can never come without Total Abstinence, on the other, we see, in its prevalence, the ultimate triumph of everything that can bless mankind. Trade shall prosper, domestic happiness increase, education spread, liberty advance, social order prevail, and pure religion shed its divinest blessings on our country and the world. Not, we repeat for the thousandth time, that we put Teetotalism in the place of the Gospel, but releasing mankind from one of its greatest banes, and emancipating talent and property to an incalculable extent, we shall afford the means of realizing all that is cheering in the thought that "A good time is coming."

REPEAL OF THE MALT TAX.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE STANDARD OF FREEDOM.

MR. EDITOR,—There is a paragraph in Mr. Cobden's budget, in reference to the Malt Tax, to which I am anxious to call your attention and that of the friends of the Temperance Reformation in general. It runs as follows:—

"To a man, the farmers are in favour of the Repeal of the Malt Tax, and this not merely because it would add to the contentment of the peasantry by cheapening a beverage which they universally consume, and also relieve their employers from a heavy tax upon the beer they give to their labourers at certain seasons, but the best agriculturists loudly protest against the duty, on the plea that it denies them the free application of their capital to the fattening of their cattle upon malt, and thus prevents the profitable growth of barley upon stiff clay lands. Upon this subject Mr. Lattimore, speaking for an influential deputation of landlords and farmers, which had an interview with Lord John Russell, in February last, said—'The Malt Tax disarranged the best modes of cultivation, enhanced the price of artificial food for stock and cattle, whereby the fertility of the soil was deteriorated, the demand for labour lessened, the supply of bread, corn, and animal food, considerably decreased, and the comforts of the people, and the wealth of the country were also greatly impaired.' Your national budget, would therefore, be undeserving the name, if it did not include the total repeal of the "Malt Tax, amounting to £4,260,000."

Mr. Cobden is a clever financier, and as a leader of a popular movement his genius is, probably, unrivalled. Whoever has read his late manifesto need be at no trouble to ascertain his very high qualifications. In matters of finance and aggressive reform he is eminently in his own element. With Free-trade and commercial reform we meet Mr. Cobden always at home, but on educational and ethical questions, the great man is almost invariably abroad. It seems to me that he is particularly so in the present instance. Of course, I do not mean to impugn his wisdom in selecting the Malt Tax with a view to agitation, as its selection will enlist the sympathies of many agriculturists, and, I fear, too many of the working classes both in town and country. But in proposing great and extensive popular changes we must have some regard to their effect on the well-being of the community. This is particularly the case with the Malt Tax. The repeal of this impost will have an important influence on the domestic comforts and morals of our countrymen,—influence far too important to be counterbalanced by the prospect of a more general assistance and co-operation in any scheme of fiscal reform. The effect of beer-drinking upon our population has been most undesirable and disastrous, and I greatly wonder that any person anxious to benefit the people temporally and spiritually, should seek to propagate the delusion that beer-drinking is essential to the personal and domestic comforts of the labouring classes.

Mr. Cobden, it will be seen, has offered no opinion of his own on the moral bearings of the repeal of the Malt Tax. The only points on which his eye seems to have rested are the dissatisfaction with which this tax is regarded by the farmer, and the necessity of enlisting their sympathy on behalf of the new movement. Perhaps it would not be amiss to direct attention to some other aspects of the question.

Without, at present, committing myself to any opinion as to the propriety of repealing that portion of the tax which relates to the malt employed for the fattening of cattle, I think I may safely venture to offer the following observations:—

1. Drunkenness is one of the most fearful evils that affects the social condition of Great Britain at the present time. The number of wretched, abandoned drunkards, is fearfully large. The host that follow in their tracks and are preparing to take their places when they shall rest in the dishonoured grave of the drunkard, is ominously and rapidly increasing. When a man becomes a drunkard, he becomes idle, and from idleness he sinks to poverty or dishonesty. If the former, he and his family become a burden on the poor-rates. The industry and property of society will be heavily taxed for the support of a worthless member and his dependants. If the latter, the commission of crime will follow; police will have to be supported for the protection of property; penal expenses will have to be paid, and the State will be permanently burdened with the family of the offender, who, in nine cases out of ten, will sink beneath their relative's degradation, and remain paupers, or will follow his footsteps, and in time become amenable to the laws. The State is thus robbed of the service of many able and valued members—a certain quantity of labour, intelligence, and industry, is withheld from society; and to crown the misfortune, the public burdens are seriously increased as the result. The pauperism and crime which now afflict our country, are to a great extent, the fruit of drunkenness; lunatic asylums are crowded, and misery in every imaginable form is greatly enhanced. All this and many more evils than I can at present enumerate, are caused by drunkenness. Let us now inquire how drunkenness is produced:—

2. Beyond doubt drunkenness is the result of drinking. The universal beverage of the people of Great Britain is beer. King Gin, it is true, has numerous subjects in our large towns, but the supremacy everywhere and at all times must be yielded to Sir John Barleycorn. In the manufacturing districts, in the iron and coal districts, and in the agricultural districts, the drinking population are the victims of beer. The mechanic and the labourer sacrifice their hard earnings to its insatiable demands. The beer-shop has become our universal pest. It is there that the youth of our country are corrupted, honesty and virtue are bartered within its precincts, and health and character are drowned in its fatal cup. It is there that the poacher is led to a life of idleness and profligacy, there the thief arranges his plans, there the prostitute displays her seductive arts to captivate the unwary. There sedition is talked, the seeds of political disorder and social anarchy are sown, and deeds subversive of all law and happiness meditated. So fearful is the increase of crimes committed in connection with these houses that every police-court, every criminal calendar, and every gaol delivery throughout the realm, loudly and imperatively demand some remedy. I do not take upon myself to say what that remedy should be; but it seems somewhat improbable that the repeal of the Malt Tax would furnish the necessary deliverance.

3. It is highly probable that the repeal of the Malt Tax would be followed by increased drunkenness, and, therefore, by all its attendant evils. That it would be so, so far as beer-shops are concerned is very evident. The cheapening of a popular and favourite beverage would occasion increased demand. Cheapness would not be an auxiliary to virtue. Human passions and depraved appetites will not be checked by abundance. The man that now pays his threepence a night for a pint of beer, is not very likely to save the remaining penny if it were sold for twopence. On the contrary; the larger his means, the more his excesses. The truth of this is attested by every season of commercial prosperity which the working classes have enjoyed. Profligacy, dissipation, and drunkenness, have invariably increased in a corresponding degree to their prosperity. It might, perhaps, be argued that the repeal of this tax would lead many to brew their own beer, and consume it at home with their families, and thus avoid the snares of our drinking usages. How applicable soever this may be to tradesmen and small farmers, I fear it will not at all touch the condition of our artisans and farm labourers. Where are they to get the necessary materials for brewing? And if they were given them (which will never be the case) they could not carry on the process in the third floor of a London lodging-house, or in the mud hovels of Oxfordshire and Dorsetshire. And if they had the conveniences necessary for the process, they scarcely possess the necessary knowledge. Were they to possess the knowledge, their disinclination to take the required trouble would be sufficient to make them prefer the beer-shop,—which, as at present, would be full of enticements and artful snares. Fond as the Englishman is of his drink, he would not prefer a small ill-ventilated room in the presence of an upbraiding wife and crying children, to the cheerful fire and clean hearth of the beer-shop. The complaints of his wife would be exchanged for the merry laugh of the jolly company, and the children's cries for the music of the fiddle, or the bewitching strains of the harp. Men frequent public-houses just as much on account of the company as on account of the beer. Without the company, the bottle would lose many of its charms. There would be time for thought and consideration in solitude, and to a besotted, ignorant person, this would be a severe punishment. The probabilities are therefore in favour of the supposition that the labouring classes would be demoralized and ruined to a fearful extent by the contemplated change. We have every reason to fear that it would lead to lamentable results, among a class of people, who have already become dangerous as fellow-subjects, and worthless as citizens.

4. Should drunkenness increase, as we suppose that it would, then its attendant expenses, direct and indirect, would more than absorb all the profits which may accrue to the farmer from the repeal of the Malt-tax. The same argument is applicable to other portions of our drinking population. When men become idlers through inebriety, their labour, ingenuity, and skill, are extracted from the service of the community, which causes a needless waste of capital. If they become poor, they must be supported; and who will pay the poor-rates? The farmers and other classes who will benefit by the reduction of the price of beer. They will have to support unions, and to clothe and feed the victims of intemperance. If idleness will lead to crime, the increased expense in the protection of property will fall on the former. When felonies, larcenies, and burglaries, shall become common, the farmer must pay for the advertisement in the Huo and Cry, and the expenses of prosecution in its various forms. If the offenders shall be imprisoned, the farmer must support the prison. If transported, he will have to send them, not free of expense to the antipodes. And if, in a drunken affray, blood shall be shed and human life sacrificed, the farmer will have to offer a large reward for the apprehension of the supposed or real murderer. In cases where trial will be followed by conviction, the pocket filled by the savings of the Malt-tax will have to be further emptied to pay for the rope and gibbet and shell, and discharge the demands of Calcraft, the hangman-general of England. Considering then the increase of pauperism and crime that may be naturally expected to follow from an increased consumption of beer, it is evident, to a moral certainty, that the repeal of the Malt-tax would be no pecuniary gain to the farmer.

Finally, as beer is not one of the necessities of life, nor even an innocent luxury, the repeal of a tax on an article so injurious to the public health, social happiness, and morality, is not so imperatively demanded as to require that the large sum of £4,260,000 should be sacrificed for that purpose. The habitual use of intoxicating liquors is condemned by history, experience, science and morality. Such a sweeping obligation to the drinking customs of our country is entirely uncalled for, and dangerous to the best interests of the community. The people's greatest enemies are their own profligate and drunken habits. Unless they will reform themselves in these particulars, no matter what measures of reform may be proposed and carried, they will still remain in misery the most abject and degrading, and effectually prevent the progress of all movements necessary for the social and moral elevation of the masses.

I submit, therefore, that Mr. Cobden's suggestion should be stoutly resisted; or, at all events, not in any way supported by the friends of sobriety, social order, and public morality.

I remain, Mr. Editor,
Your obedient servant,
IEUAN GWYNEDD.

London, January 5, 1849.

Since the above was sent to press, we have been favoured with a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Cobden, by our respected and zealous friend, J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq. The letter is much too long for insertion in our limited space, but we gladly present to our readers that portion of it which bears particularly on the Temperance question. While he admits the excellence of Mr. Cobden's proposition in several respects, he regrets that it does not go far enough; and shews that THE PEOPLE have it in their power to relieve the country from many, or most, of its embarrassments, to an extent far greater than is contemplated by Mr. Cobden, or by any other financial reformer. We give this portion of Mr. Buckingham's letter entire:—

"Thirdly,—Let the people everywhere advocate and practise the greatest of all reforms, whether considered nationally or individually—the abolition of the use of all intoxicating drinks. If any evil is to be judged of by the amount of the expenditure it occasions, its waste of the national wealth, the entire absence of any corresponding benefit, and the creation of an immense mass of disease, poverty, and crime, this national evil of indulging in the use of intoxicating drinks is the greatest that has ever afflicted the country, and therefore calls the loudest for immediate and extensive remedy. And as it is strictly within the limits of 'National Financial Reform,' I make no apology for closing my letter with a brief allusion to it, as it would take a long epistle to dwell upon all its evils in detail.

"The amount of our useless and unnecessary expenditure in this unwholesome and pernicious indulgence, is greater, by six-fold, than all the £10,000,000 which you propose to cut off from the cost of our armaments—for this exceeds £50,000,000 per annum. Here then is an available fund, out of which the whole of the national debt might be paid off in less than sixteen years! and thus the whole of its interest of £28,000,000, which hangs like a mill-stone round the neck of the nation, and furnishes the perpetual stumbling-block to all extensive plans of financial reform, might be swept away at once and for ever!

"This, indeed, would be a reform worthy of a great nation to effect, and do it far more honour than any other that could be named: because, like the national sacrifice made for the abolition of slavery, it would prove, but in a much greater degree than that, the virtue, resolution, and courage of the people to achieve a victory over themselves, by conquering and subduing one of the strongest and most injurious of their propensities. For this reform we should need no consent of Parliament—no concession of any Chancellor of the Exchequer—no reciprocal disarmament of other nations—no costly public agitation—nothing but a firm resolution to make a trifling sacrifice of our own personal appetites for the good of our country, and the relief of the houseless, naked, and starving portion of our fellow-countrymen. This reform is wholly within our own hands, and we have only to pass the following resolution, each in his household, and faithfully to act on it, to make the victory secure—namely, 'That from this day we resolve to abstain from the use of wine, spirits, beer, and every intoxicating drink, and appropriate the weekly or monthly amount heretofore expended by us in these drinks, to a fund for the redemption of the National Debt, till it is completely liquidated and abolished.'

"If the Queen of England would set the example, by having all intoxicating drinks removed from the royal palaces, as the young heroine, Miss Arnold, recently requested that all the ardent spirits on board the Rainbow steamer, on her voyage to Aden, should be cast into the sea; and if the officers of the royal household would comply with their royal mistress's desire, as readily and cheerfully as the gallant and hardy seamen did with that of the young daughter of their deceased commander, the nation at large could hardly fail to be influenced by such a truly noble example of self-denial for the good of others, and it would crown the already illustrious name of Victoria with immortal honour, as the sovereign whose example had led, in a single reign, to the payment of all the debts contracted by all the kings who had preceded her, and thus relieved her subjects from the enormous burthen of £800,000,000 sterling, or an annual tax of £28,000,000 per annum—with which her predecessors had loaded them by their extravagance and disregard of public economy.

"If the abolition of the National Debt be thought too remote a contingency (though less than 16 years would be a short time for such a great achievement) to justify the sacrifice of personal enjoyment required—though in reality the sacrifice is very slight, as all who have tried the experiment find themselves better in health without those stimulating drinks than with them, and are consequently more happy—there is another important purpose to which the saving of the immense sum squandered in useless drinks might be applied—might be immediately and most advantageously applied.

"One of the great evils under which this country, like every other in Europe, is suffering, is the vast number of persons who, having no employment by which they can earn their bread, become paupers, beggars, or thieves, by necessity; while thousands of even those who can obtain work are so scantily paid, that they have not the means of procuring sufficient food, raiment, or fuel, while their children are reared up in rags, filth, and ignorance.

"Think for a moment, what a happy revolution it would be for all this large suffering class, abounding in every town and parish, and increasing every year, if the £50,000,000 per annum, thus wasted and lost, could be saved, or diverted from its present pernicious application, into the giving employment, in productive agricultural labour, draining and cultivating all the bogs and wastes of Ireland, Scotland and England, increasing the supplies of food and clothing for all—building healthy and comfortable cottages for the labourers—establishing schools for gratuitous education of the poor—asylums for the aged and infirm—and employing every individual able and willing to earn his bread by labour throughout the country. Think of such a blessed and bloodless victory as this, and I am sure you will be disposed to hasten it with all your power.

"Or if this should be insufficient to absorb the whole of our unemployed population at home, what a magnificent fund might be formed out of these savings from intoxicating drinks, to defray the expense of emigration for the young and healthy persons of both sexes, who are most anxious to seek a new home in our fertile colonies, but have no means, either to pay the cost of their voyage, or to furnish themselves with the necessary materials for pursuing their avocations when they arrive there; in consequence of which we see the melancholy and contradictory spectacle, of millions of acres of the most fertile land lying idle for want of cultivators in our colonies, and millions of hands lying idle at home for want of occupation, wanting only the money requisite to bring both into contact; the government declaring itself to be too poor to furnish the funds, and the community, who possess more than sufficient for the purpose, squandering £50,000,000 sterling a-year in useless and pernicious drinks—a sum that would amply provide transport, land, and sufficient capital to commence its tillage, for a million of unemployed persons as emigrants every year.

“Here then is a ‘Financial Reform’ in every man’s power, and the benefit of which would be a hundred-fold greater, in its collateral consequences, than any other reform that could be thought of. No new charter of liberty, whether of five points or of ten—no improved constitution of government yet proposed, not even the abolition of war, fearful as is that scourge—nor all the other reforms, of colonial emancipation, improved prison discipline, voluntary education, universal suffrage, vote by ballot, or all the political changes advocated from time to time by every party, would effect anything like the benefit, in so short a time, as would the simultaneous and voluntary relinquishment of a practice more productive of wasteful expenditure, of generated diseases, of poverty, want, crime, and misery, than all other causes put together.

“Does any one pretend to disbelieve this? Let him consult the evidence given before the Parliamentary Committee appointed to inquire into the subject, and its Report laid before the House of Commons in 1834, or let him ask the judges of the land, the guardians of the poor, the keepers of the prisons and lunatic asylums, the magistrates of police, the teachers of religion, or any other class who have extensive experience in the habits of the population, and they will all confirm the fact, that besides the wasteful expenditure of £50,000,000 per annum in drinks which medical science, and the experience of millions, have proved to be wholly unnecessary for either health or strength, more than half the misery of the working people, of the embarrassments and bankruptcies of the middle classes, and of the vicious propensities and crimes of all ranks arise from the use of stimulating and intoxicating drinks. But in addition to the wasteful expenditure of £50,000,000, in their cost, the use of these drinks occasions a loss of time, and of wealth which this time industriously employed would produce, as well as a destruction of life and property beyond all calculation, besides being the most prolific source of the poor rates, the police rates, the costs of our hospitals, lunatic asylums, jails, hulks, and penal colonies; since it is the use of these drinks which engenders the recklessness, indolence, theft, prostitution, and crime, which fill all these establishments, and require such enormous expense for their maintenance, making the whole cost to the nation exceed £100,000,000 at the very least, and leaving all other branches of financial extravagance and waste quite in the shade!

“If it be said, that those who make only a moderate use of these intoxicating drinks, do not contribute to the evils thus described, they deceive themselves; because, besides contributing, in whatever proportion their consumption may be, to the wasteful expenditure, and to the sinful conversion of wholesome fruit, nutritious grain, sugar, and other valuable substances of food, into pernicious drinks, and thus lessening the quantity of sustenance available for the nourishment of the poor; their example, in making even a moderate use of these drinks, encourages and excuses their less intelligent countrymen, as they constantly refer to such examples for the justification of their own practice.

“There may, possibly, be some, let us hope they are but few, who may say, ‘Why should I be called upon to make a sacrifice of my personal comforts and enjoyments, because others are unable to restrain themselves within the bounds of moderation?’ The answer to such persons will be very brief, namely, ‘That the whole theory of the Christian religion is based on the principle of our so loving one another, as to be ready to make any sacrifice of our superfluities that may be required to supply our fellow creature’s necessities. This, too, is the basis of all philanthropy, benevolence, and patriotism. No man can be truly said to be a Christian, whose bowels of compassion do not yearn towards a suffering fellow being. No man can have the least claim to the title of benevolent, who is not willing to deprive himself of some enjoyment, if by so doing he can add to the happiness of others. And as for patriotism, how can any man pretend to that virtue, who does not love his countrymen as well as his country, or who can see his fellow-townsmen perish from hunger and nakedness, or live a life of drunkenness and misery, without stretching forth a hand to save him? Whether as Christians, philanthropists, or patriots, therefore, our duty is clear, if we claim to be either, and would support it by our conduct; if not, it is mere hypocrisy to pretend to these titles, and we should therefore either practise this Christian virtue, of making some sacrifice for the good of others, or relinquish all claim to the honour and credit of the Christian name.

“Since, then, the entire abolition of the use of these drinks would save £50,000,000 a-year in money uselessly spent, and at least £50,000,000 a-year more, in time saved, and property rescued from destruction, as well as in the saving of the expenses of maintaining the paupers and criminals degraded by their use, making in the whole £100,000,000 a-year, or ten times the amount you propose to cut off from the national expenditure, I am sure you cannot fail to see, that the language you have applied to the ‘Liverpool Financial Reform Association,’ on the abolition of the malt tax, would apply with tenfold force to this self-imposed branch of useless and pernicious drinks; namely, that as by this expenditure ‘the supply of bread-corn is considerably decreased,’ (there being upwards of 8,000,000 quarters of grain annually destroyed as food, by distillation and brewing, to say nothing of rice, sugar, and other grains in our colonies,) ‘and the comforts of the people, and the wealth of the country, greatly impaired, your National Budget would be wholly undeserving the name, if it did not include its total repeal.’”

METHODIST MOVEMENT.—At a recent Meeting of the Missouri Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the following resolutions were adopted:—“That we view with pleasure and delight the exertions made by the various Divisions of the Sons of Temperance, for suppressing the use of alcoholic drinks as a beverage, in these United States.”—“That as a body of Ministers, we will, by all reasonable means in our power, discontinue within our respective fields of labour, especially among the people committed to our care, the manufacture, traffic, or drinking as a beverage, of intoxicating liquors of every kind.”

DRINKING PAUPERS.—A spirit dealer in High Street, Glasgow, declares that he draws £10 more at the pay days of the Glasgow poor than on any other day in the week. Another spirit dealer says that the paupers regularly come to him, and spend in drink what they receive. An Inspector stated that he observed a lame pauper, not two hours after he had received 8s. carried to the Police-office drunk on a wheelbarrow. He frequently finds paupers drunk on their beds, after they have received their allowance.

WATER.—The Spaniards have a proverb that “Drinking water neither makes a man sick, nor in debt, nor his wife a widow.”

CHOLERA.

A CAUTION, BY H. MUDGE, SURGEON.

That portion of the community, viz., the dealers in intoxicating drinks, are sparing neither pains nor money to turn the visitation of this awful scourge into a source of pecuniary gain. The medical and the religious periodicals are teeming with advertisements setting forth the excellencies of the Cholera Brandy and other choice liquors in the treatment of this fatal malady. A few remarks on the subject, culled chiefly from the publications of those learned and experienced men Dr. Archibald Billing, and J. Ross, Esq., (the former for twenty-five years physician and lecturer at the London Hospital; the latter at the present time surgeon to the City Western Dispensary); may serve the useful purpose of setting the public on their guard against the machinations of the dealers in alcoholic liquors. Dr. Billing holds that Cholera is a species of fever, and that the alarming symptoms of cold blue skin, feeble pulse, shrunk features, shrill voice, &c., constitute its cold stage; that when these pass away, and are succeeded by heat and perspiration, the danger is by no means over, as the disease is still present but in another of its stages. Until persons are convinced of this, it will be difficult to induce them to use the proper remedies, namely, fever medicines, and to avoid what is hurtful, i.e., stimulants. His remedy is

Water, half a pint;
Tartar emetic, two grains;
Epsom salts, half an ounce. Mixed.

The dose for an adult (from 15 years upwards), a table-spoonful every half hour; for a child (two years), a tea-spoonful; and for the intermediate years a proportionate dose. This mixture, it may be well to say, does not act on the bowels, but on the skin and the kidneys. As soon as urgent symptoms are over, give five grains of Calomel, and continue a grain or so of Quinine every four hours.

Cholera patients should be allowed to drink freely of quite cold water, it is the only beverage agreeable to them, and is useful in relieving the sickness and other symptoms.

The diet should be nutritious, but light, as the tone of the stomach is greatly diminished, (see how this accords with the views expressed by me in my paper on Convalescence), at first milk mixed with water, arrowroot, gruel, &c., given cold, till the patient's feelings desire them warm.

Fomentations do no good; a warm bed, and dry friction are the best externally.

Hot brandy and water (recommended by the Board of Health, forsooth!) is injurious; as must be known by every person, medical or not, hot brandy and water is inconsistent with fever medicines in feverish disease. If the patient does not die in the cold stage, the quantity of brandy in his inside will add to the fever when he arrives at the warm stage. Thus far Dr. Billing. Mr. Ross has been publishing in the "Medical Times" for the last three months a course of lectures on (Asiatic) Cholera, and from these I proceed to extract; I wish I could give his description of the state of Sligo (Ireland) during the prevalence of the disease in 1832, and his remarks on the condition of London as to air and water, but these would be too long for your pages, if not irrelevant; my chief controversy is with stimulants.

Cholera in its different stages is described, and towards its close it becomes a continued fever with local congestions; that is, there is too much blood in some particular organ, most frequently in the brain, or in some portion of the intestinal canal; now alcohol specially contributes to an irregularity in the natural circulation, propelling blood by forcing the heart, and attracting it by local irritation; hence, if alcohol is wrong (as Billing maintains) in fever, it is doubly wrong in fever with such local congestions as are demonstrated by Ross.

Again; one of the most frequent occurrences (as found on examination after death) is a diminution of the water and also the salts contained in the blood. Now, alcohol is totally unable to replace either the one or the other; it is as opposite to water as fire is, and not only has no saline substance among its competent parts, but will rather precipitate salts than hold them in solution; it has, moreover, such a powerful attraction for water that it would prevent the diminished quantity of water which the blood still possesses from acting with its usual and appropriate effect in the system; no wonder then that in combination with calomel and opium it became "literally murderous." From Mr. Ross's synopsis of the different methods of treatment pursued in Vienna, Paris, London, and all England, it appears, that of every 100 treated with salines and cold water fourteen died; of every 100 treated with stimulants fifty-nine died!

"Under the stimulating system," to quote Mr. R.'s own words, "the mortality was highest, with the exception, perhaps, of the routine [pretty routine of it!] combination of calomel with opium and stimulants, WHEN THE MORTALITY WAS LITERALLY MURDEROUS. It is clear that stimulants in every combination were highly prejudicial."

Again, "In conclusion; I have established the injuriousness of the stimulating system of practice in cholera, against what I believe to be the general opinion, and practice of the profession. It is difficult, [let this be specially noted, it is the same with a host of other diseases, much to the discredit of the medical profession] it is difficult to find a practitioner who would not declare his determination to resort [in spite of light and truth] to the stimulants, in case a patient should require his professional services. If I have dethroned this arbitrary and life-destroying opinion, I shall consider that I have promoted the interests of humanity. This conviction will be sufficient for me."

Nobly spoken.—God speed your efforts!

ATTEMPT AT SUICIDE.—A DRUNKEN HUSBAND.

Mary Moss, a respectable-looking woman, was charged with making two attempts to throw herself off Waterloo-bridge into the river.—A gentleman named Bickerton stated that on Wednesday night, as he was walking over Waterloo-bridge, he saw the prisoner from the opposite side enter one of the recesses and get upon the parapet. Suspecting that she was about to throw herself over, he ran to the spot, and seized her clothes, while she struggled to get free and to precipitate herself into the river. He had some difficulty in holding her, and being a strong woman, she did break away from his grasp, and again attempted to ascend the parapet, but he prevented it, and a policeman coming up at the time, he gave her into custody. The witness added that he subsequently heard her state that she was prompted to make the attempt upon her life owing to the brutal treatment she experienced at the hands of her husband. She was perfectly sober at the time.—The policeman said that the prisoner's husband had been keeping up the Christmas holidays, and that he was drunk night and day, and beat and abused her in such a manner that she was compelled to leave the house.—The magistrate inquired if her husband was made aware of what had occurred, and the reply being in the affirmative, the husband's name was then called aloud but no answer was returned, and the magistrate having remarked on the heartless conduct of the man, said that after the unfortunate woman had made such a determined attempt to put an end to her life he should not feel justified in permitting her to go at large, although she promised not to repeat her attempt, without responsible persons becoming surety for her, and he therefore committed her.

EXPOSURE AND DISGRACE.—The names of all persons convicted of drunkenness are read every Sunday from the altars of the Roman Catholic Churches in Limerick.

THE EVILS OF INTOXICATION.

It is curious and sad, that in some of the most fashionable parts of the Town of London, within a stone's throw of the mansions of the opulent and great, are, or at least were, some twenty years ago, an immense mass of the lowest and most squalid houses in the metropolis. Close by Grosvenor and Manchester Squares, and lying between them and Bond-street, are a number of places into which it was really dangerous, as the writer once found to his cost, for a respectably dressed person to set his foot. There, congregated, tier above tier, in small, dark, unwholesome rooms, are whole classes of people, in comparison with whom, the denizens of St. Giles's may be looked upon as aristocracy. If you walk along one of these courts or alleys, the first thing you remark, on the right hand and the left, are the two confederates in demoralization and degradation; the pawnbroker's and the gin-shop—both tolerated and encouraged by the British Government on account of those iniquitous and burdensome taxes, grouped under the name of Excise—taxes which, whatever they may do for the revenue, tend more to hamper industry, to debase the people, to make rogues of honest men, to prevent employment for the poor, to give monopoly to the rich, to obstruct salutary laws, and to disgrace the legislature, than any imposts that ever were invented by the great British demon, Taxation.

The fact is, ministers dare not deal with the gin-shop nuisance, as they would with any other nuisance, for fear of diminishing the revenue; and when they come before Parliament, and boast of an increased revenue from the Excise—which they call the barometer of commercial prosperity—they boast, in fact, of how much they have been able to wring from the vices, or follies, or the hard labours of the industrious classes. They say neither more nor less than this: there must have been more demand for labour, because the labouring classes have been able to drink more gin, to smoke more tobacco, and to will more beer.

Beyond the pawnbroker's and the gin-shop, you enter into the heart of the den—probably meeting, at the first two or three steps, some half-clad women, with foul, matted hair, strange shaped caps, which were once white, and yellowish handkerchiefs loosely spread over the otherwise uncovered bosom. Perhaps there is a short pipe in the mouth; but there is gin in every hue of the face, and the eyes are bleared and flamed with habitual intoxication.

There may be a miserable baby in the arms, or on the back, with the naked feet and legs appearing à beneath the rags that cover it—sallow, sickly, sharp-faced, keen-eyed—the nursling of misery, despair, and vice—the destined victim of every evil passion and every degrading crime. Above, below, around, from every window in cellar, in attic, in the middle floors, come forth the varied murmurs, in different tongues and tones: the slang and cant of English rogues and vagabonds; the brogue of Ireland, or the old Irish language itself; the shouts of wrath or merriment: the groans of anguish: the cries of pain or sorrow: the gay laugh: the dull buzz of tongues, consulting over deeds of evil, or telling tales of despair and woe, or taking counsel how to avoid starvation.

As you go on, innumerable are the different forms you meet, in every shape of degradation; the fierce bludgeoned bully, the dextrous pick-pocket, the wretched woman who acts as their decoy, the boys and girls serving an apprenticeship to vice, the hoary prompters of all evil, who, in the shape of receivers, profit by the crimes of the younger and more active.

Look at that girl there, in the tattered chintz gown. She can be scarcely sixteen; and yet, see how she reels from side to side, in beastly intoxication. And then, that elderly man, in the shabby brown coat, with the venerable white hair, who goes walking along by the side of the gutter, and every now and then stops and gazes in, as if he saw something exceedingly curious there! He is a respectable looking man, with a gentlemanly air and carriage. A thief, and a man suspected of murder, are just passing him; but he is quite safe: they know he has nothing to lose; and his emaciated body would not fetch two pounds at the anatomist's.

What is it that has brought him to this state? Look in his face—see the dull, meaningless eye, the nose and lips bloated with habitual sottish tipping! That man can boast that he never was drunk in his life—but for more than forty years, he has never been quite sober.

Hark to the screams coming forth from that house where one half of the window panes, at least, are covered up with paper. They are produced by a drunken scoundrel beating his unhappy wife. She was once an honest, cheerful, happy, country girl, and now, I must not stay to tell the various stages of degradation she has gone through, till she is here, the wife of a drunken savage, in one of the lowest and vilest dens of London. Hark, how the poor thing screams under the ruffians blow, while one of his brutal companions sits hard by and witnesses it, laughing. Three days hence, by one too fatally directed blow, that man shall murder the wretched woman in the presence of her two children; and then shall go to end his own days on a scaffold, leaving those wretched infants to follow the same course in after years.—From "The Forgery." By G. P. R. James." Just published.

THE ADULTERATIONS OF ARDENT SPIRITS.

The first intention is to increase the quantity, and this is effected by water. This is necessitated, in order to conceal the first fraud, a second and far more terrible kind. With what pain do I record the guilty catalogue!—oil of turpentine, Guineá and Cayenne pepper, cherry laurel water, spirit of almond cakes, sulphuric acid, lime-water, alum, acetate of lead, carbonate of potash, grains of paradise. The merest tyro in chemistry knows that several of these substances are among the most virulent poisons known to science. Home-made wines of the worst kind, by a little ingenuity, are converted into either port or sherry; and this is not, as might be supposed, a mere jeu d'esprit, but a most notorious and painful truth. If a deep-coloured wine is wanted, it is made by adding a deep-coloured dye; and every other vinous attribute is stimulated in the same way, even to communicating what is termed by those who know when "the wine behaves itself aright," the bouquet. To such an extent has scientific ingenuity come to the help of the adulterators, that what would otherwise appear altogether an impossibility is easily effected; in the course of a few hours all the flavour which without art it would take years to produce, is perfectly accomplished by the addition of suitable ingredients. If I were to make a rough estimate, I should be disposed to say that, if the figures 3,000 represented the amount of wine consumed in Great Britain, 1,000 would about represent the quantity actually imported, the remaining 2,000 being manufactured at home. Occasionally ingredients of a highly poisonous kind are found in wine; nor is it to be wondered at, when we find such a lamentable ignorance of the properties of bodies as is exhibited in the directions given in receipt-books for making wines. Thus a popular treatise recommends the introduction of lead into wine, for a particular purpose; and the inevitable result would be that all who partook of it would suffer more or less from the poisonous effects of this substance in a solution, even in small quantities. At the commencement of the last century, so persuaded were the authorities in Germany of the deadly effects of this poison in wine, that, finding that laws of extreme severity were ineffectual in putting an end to the practice, they determined to make an example of one individual as a terror to the rest; and him they beheaded. Other dealers, who had been persuaded by him to make the same deadly experiment, were heavily fined; and the poisonous wine was thrown away. It is not long since that some wine was seized at Paris, at the Halle aux Vins, which was suspected to contain some poisonous substance; and it was ordered to be all thrown into the Seine. Soon afterwards dead fish in great numbers appeared on the surface of the stream—a sufficient evidence of the existence of a strong poison in the fluid. Would that the same vigilant board which watches over the health of the Parisian population, and whose duty it is to scrutinise all articles of food exposed for sale, had its parallel in our own land!—The Church of England Magazine.

NATIONAL INTEMPERANCE.

A LETTER TO THE READERS OF THE BRITISH PRESS.

Friends!—National facts demand national consideration. Let no preconceived opinions therefore preclude a careful study of the following most lamentable and portentous facts. This kingdom groans under the burthen of five-hundred thousand confirmed drunkards, and one-hundred thousand occasional drunkards. It is computed that about seven thousand of this intemperate multitude annually perish through accident while inebriated. The pecuniary cost of this wide spread drunkenness is enormous. It amounts to at least fifty-two millions of pounds; and during forty-six years it consumed one-thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine millions, nine hundred and ninety-four thousands, nine-hundred and forty-six pounds! Wicked and terrible waste this.

Certain communities squander immense sums of money to procure drinks. The people of Lancashire pay at least one-million a year in taxes on intoxicating liquors; other counties expend similar sums. To gratify their taste for strong drink, the population of Ipswich pay fifty thousand pounds yearly; Bury, in Lancashire, fifty-four thousand pounds; Merthyr Tydvil, seventy-thousand pounds; Dundee, (1841) one-hundred and eighty thousand pounds; Bristol, three-hundred thousand pounds; Glasgow, one million pounds; and London about three millions. The greater proportion of these prodigious sums of money is expended by the working classes. Mr. T. Beggs says, "It is ascertained with tolerable correctness, that the sum spent by the working classes alone in spirits, cannot be less than twenty-four millions" yearly. It is grievous to reflect upon the large sums spent in public houses by working men. In Runcorn, for example, the working people are paid eighty-thousand pounds; every year in wages, and of this large amount seventeen thousand pounds are spent in pleasing their tastes for drinks. In my possession is a table of the expenditure of one year by the cotton operatives of Ashton-under-Lyne. From an examination of that table I find that they expended fourteen thousand, four hundred and thirty pounds in intoxicating drinks, and only, two thousand two hundred and twenty pounds in the education of their children. A sad contrast this! Thus much for the direct cost of conformity to our national and demoralizing drinking customs. It is time to glance at the losses which they induce. The annual loss is one million out of every six of the entire manufactures and productions of the kingdom. The loss to individuals is frequently almost incredible. I shall produce a single instance. In a London establishment there are one hundred men employed. They are exceedingly drunken, and waste every Monday in riotous living. Their annual loss is one thousand eight hundred and twenty pounds! Similar facts may be obtained from any large employer. What shall we say to these things? Surely it is no wonder that Poverty, Vice, Ignorance, and Misery abound in this kingdom. Is a remedy wanted? It may be found in the Temperance Reformation.

Norwich.

GEORGE WILSON M'CREE.

A MODEL PARISH.—In the parish of St. Matthias, Canada, with an adult population of about 1,200, all but four persons have signed the pledge. The parish is said to have, up to that time, spent 6,000 dollars annually in strong drinks.

THE GLASS OF PORTER.

It was an evening to be remembered in the city of S—, the Bachelor's ball was the gayest of the season, and many a young heart beat happily, as group after group of the gay and lovely entered the splendidly decorated room. At last a pair approached who fixed all eyes, and a murmur of admiration went round the apartment. The taller of the two was a young man of perfect figure, his full black eyes—his high forehead, his air—his manner—all spoke him to be one, comme il y en a peu. Upon his arm leaned his sister Caroline, who captivated one hardly knew why.—Not truly beautiful, and yet so graceful, so fascinating, so witty, that she was the reigning belle of the season. A proud and happy being was young Henry Willington, as he marked the triumphs of his idolized sister.

"And which of her many suitors does Carry W. honor by accepting," asked a young lady of her companion, "I suppose it will be Corning, now he has received an appointment to the court of—. She will like to figure in a royal saloon."

"You are mistaken, Adalme," was the reply.—"Cousin Carry is engaged to Camlen, he is a business man, without fortune. Papa does not admire the taste of his niece, but as Mr. Camlen is of good family, and has fine manners and good morals, why, if my pretty Coz, prefers love in a cottage to the same sentiment in a palace, she must e'en have her own way."

Eighteen years past away, and the pleasant May had strown the earth with loveliness and beauty. But it was a rainy evening, and as we sat round the tea table, we amused ourselves by conjectures as to the probable cause of detention of our eloquent and accomplished hostess. She came at last, and announced that her sister-in-law, Mrs. Camlen, was taken suddenly ill, and the youngsters of the party were forbidden to enter her room, or make any noise. We rose from the table, and Mrs. Willington taking my arm led me to the sick room. We entered, and never will my memory lose the picture there presented. Upon a chair were carelessly thrown the bonnet and shawl, I remembered to have seen worn by Mrs. Camlen, and on the bed lay the wretched woman literally dead drunk. By the bedside stood a confidential servant, who occasionally dropped into the half opened mouth a little milk. Sickness oppressed me.—I rushed from the chamber and mechanically followed my friend up stairs. There lay the daughter of the poor object we had just left in the strongest hysterics.—We stood a few moments by her side, when suddenly recognizing her aunt Willington she buried her face in Mrs. W's bosom, and relieved her breast by a flood of tears. "For years have I carried about with me this load of sorrow," sobbed the poor girl, "and would have done so patiently, would my mother but have spared herself and me this open disgrace."

I learned afterwards the particulars of which I was then ignorant, and found that Mrs. Camlen, having been sent away by her friends at Jonesburgh (where she had been visiting,) on account of her sad habits, had reached Mrs. W's the preceding afternoon, and that morning had risen and gone out none knew whither. She was found by a relative asleep in a low shop by the wharf-side, and by him was carried to her friends.

From her own lips I learned the sad story of Caroline's downfall. Her husband was not a Christian, but was seriously disposed, and soon after their marriage carried home to her a family Bible. She laughed at it, jeered him, and threw it carelessly upon the table.

A year of her married life passed away, and she was the mother of a daughter. The physician and nurse recommended a glass of porter daily, to increase the supply of nourishment for her babe. Mrs. Calmen assured me that at that time the habit of intemperance was formed. The quantity gradually increased. Her house was neglected, her temper raised, and her husband finding his house thus uncomfortable, betook himself to places of dissipation, and near the time of her fatal exposé recorded above, sank into the grave—who could have recognised in him the noble looking Edward Camlen—his bright parts obscured—his mind degraded—his soul—

But to return to the wife. The physician announced that Mrs. Camlen was subject to a kind of hysteric fits, and the vile habit was known only to her own family, though suspected by many. Poverty, wretchedness, dependence had been their lot, and for years had the daughter sought to conceal from the eyes of others, the shame of her she called mother.

That daughter has shone the star of brilliant assemblies, and is now the happy wife of one who can appreciate her. Yet will she never forget the wretchedness through which her youth passed, and will turn with horror alike from the friendly glass of wine, and the medically recommended tumbler of porter.—American Paper.

TEMPERANCE HYMN.

1. From Scotia's snow clad mountains,
From Albion's chalky strand,
Where Erin's limpid fountains,
Roll down our fertile land:
From many an ancient river,
From many a verdant plain,
They call us to deliver
Our land from every chain.
2. What though the Gospel trumpet
Is sounding far and wide;
The slaves of fell Intemperance,
Abound on every side.
In vain may Heaven in kindness
The path to bliss reveal,
The drunkard, in his blindness,
Pursues the way to hell!
3. Let us, whose chains are broken,
Arise, a mighty band,
And hoist the Temperance banner,
Throughout this mighty land.
Combine it with SALVATION,
And send the flag around,
Till our degraded Nation,
True liberty has found.
4. Waft, waft, ye winds, the story,
And you, ye waters, roll,
Till, like a sea of glory,
It spreads from pole to pole:
Till o'er our ransomed nature,
The LAMB, for sinners slain,
Redeemer, King, Creator,
In bliss returns to reign.

A DISGUSTING AND FATAL WAGER.—On Saturday, December 23rd., Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Black Lion, New Montague-street, Spitalfields, on the body of Cornelius Delany, aged 36, a plasterer, who came by his death under the following circumstances:—George Croft, a plasterer, deposed to having known the deceased, who, up to the present Sunday evening was in perfect health. About seven o'clock on that evening, witness was in company with the deceased in the tap-room of the Black Lion, when a conversation about "hearty" drinking having arisen, the deceased wagered with some of his companions that he would drink twelve pints of porter within an hour, allowing himself five minutes to each pint, or forfeit ten shillings' worth of drink. The bet was accepted, and the deceased having drank ten pints within the specified time, was in the act of drinking the eleventh, when he suddenly fell to the ground, and was immediately conveyed to his lodgings in a state of insensibility, where he was allowed to remain on the floor wholly unattended, till the following morning, when, not having rallied, a surgeon was called in, but the usual remedies were of no avail, and he died the next morning. The Coroner having animadverted in severe terms upon the gross impropriety of such wagers, the jury returned a verdict of, died from excessive drinking.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

A number of interesting Meetings have been held in the Metropolis and suburbs, in unison with the season of the year. These Meetings have all been well attended, and several of them crowded. Many of the Advocates have come forward with an animation and zeal which betokens well. They seem to have furnished their armour, and to have girded themselves for fight, with a resolution worthy their great cause. Several of them have made a regular and systematic onslaught on the Compulsory and other Drinking Usages of the age: in some cases headed by the veteran DUNLOP, accompanied by his aid-de-camp, BALFOUR, and others, of equally resolute spirit.

Several of the Meetings, recently held, have been rendered peculiarly interesting, in consequence of the speakers having been previously furnished with specific topics on which to address the audience. One of these, presided over by BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., (whose ready and untiring zeal has won for him the gratitude and thanks of numerous Societies), was addressed by eight speakers, each of whom occupied a quarter of an hour, the subject being duly introduced, and, in some cases, commented upon by the Chairman. A completeness and variety was thus given to the proceedings of the evening, which was alike pleasing to the speakers and to the audiences, and which kept up the interest of the Meeting throughout the evening.

The necessity of union and co-operation is felt more and more, and to promote both, an interesting meeting or two of the leading members of the Metropolitan and suburban Societies has recently taken place. The conversation was of a most interesting and practical character, and there is reason to believe that the result will be a considerable improvement in the public advocacy, and, as a sure consequence, a very considerable improvement in the attendance at the Meetings. Another Meeting of this class is to take place on Wednesday evening, February 7, at Mrs. WATT's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, at 7 o'clock; and it is the earnest wish of those who were present at the last meeting, that there should be a good attendance on that evening. One or two friends might be deputed from each of the Societies in the Metropolis and suburbs.

Since our last, another zealous and liberal supporter of the Temperance Reformation has been removed by death, JOHN BELL, Esq., late of Wandsworth, and formerly of Oxford-street, London. He died, as we understand, after a short illness, having reached his 75th year.

WESTMINSTER.

On Monday, the 1st of January, an interesting meeting was held in connection with the City of Westminster Independent Teetotal Institution, at the Temperance Hall, Prince's Place, Westminster. About a hundred and twenty persons sat down to tea. The chair was afterwards taken by Mr. Dexter. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Buckle and Adleshaw, and the Rev. Dr. Burns, the President, who gave an interesting account of his visit last year to the United States of America, testifying the great good effected there by means of the Temperance reformation; during a stay of some months, he scarcely met with a drunken person. Mr. D. Walters then detailed his experience of the power of Teetotalism to reform the drunkard and reinstate him in his position in society. At the close of the meeting, twelve pledges were taken.

YORK.

On Christmas-day last, the first Festival of the York Band of Hope, or Sunday-school and Youths' Temperance Union, was held in the Lecture Hall, Goodramgate. The members were admitted free on showing their cards of membership, and non-members at a charge of threepence each. The gallery was occupied by parents, teachers and friends. The Hall was decorated with banners, mottos, evergreens, and, in addition, the platform was hung round with Lion, Tiger, Leopard and Buffalo skins, and many other curiosities and paintings of African scenery, belonging to the Bosjesmen, or Bush People, who had been exhibiting in the city. The proceedings commenced with select prayer and the singing of a Temperance melody, after which the report was read by Mr. John Leak, and addresses delivered by Mr. T. Monkhouse, Chairman, Mr. T. B. Smithies, and Mrs. Stamp, from Hull. Recitations were also delivered by Juveniles, and other melodies were sung, after which the fruit was distributed, &c. At the close, the Temperance National Anthem was sung, and the children, upwards of 500, separated highly delighted and gratified with their evening's entertainment. About 700 have already joined this Society, and the Temperance cause is making progress amongst the teachers and scholars of the Sabbath-schools in the city. We hope that the efforts put forth by this Society will prove a great means of preventing the young from falling into habits of intemperance, and thus save them from many evils. J. L.

LEEDS TEMPERANCE BAND OF HOPE.

The central districts of this Society held a Tea Meeting in the Parent Society's Room, York-street, on Wednesday, January 3, when a large number of Juveniles were assembled; a lively interest was kept up during the whole of the evening, by dialogues, speeches, recitations, and some admirable Temperance songs, adapted to well-known popular airs. In the course of the evening, the following resolution was passed, proposed by Master G. Shaw, seconded by Master W. Howarth:—"Resolved,—That the cordial and grateful thanks of this meeting be given to the Rev. J. Tunnicliff, for his zealous and persevering labours in our cause; may he live long and happily amongst us, and may his labours be blessed with abundant success." The Rev. Gentleman has indeed been indefatigable in his efforts on behalf of the Juvenile part of the population of Leeds, the result of which is that the Band of Hope, of which he was the originator, now numbers above 4,000 members, all accurately registered, divided into districts, each district having its superintendents, the whole being under the management of an active Ladies' Committee, whose zeal and perseverance afford a noble example, well worthy of imitation by the Ladies of other Temperance Societies. From the success which has attended this movement in Leeds, it is to be hoped that many other Societies will be induced to establish Bands of Hope in their localities, seeing that they are calculated so materially to promote the spread of our principles.

KENDAL.

A Grand Festival of the Members of the Kendal Juvenile Temperance Society was held in the British School-room, when 400 members assembled with their pledge cards hanging upon their breasts. The front seats were crowded with females, and many ladies and gentlemen came to witness the pleasing scene. Edward Whitwell, Esq., President of the Society, took the chair, and addressed the meeting. Mr. Earl, Secretary, spoke in behalf of the claims and objects of the association. Speeches and recitations were delivered by Messrs. French, Washington, and Whitwell. The Magic Lantern was exhibited by the Chairman, and at the close of the meeting the children were treated with currant cake, and separated highly pleased with the evening's entertainment.

J. EARL, Secretary.

READING, BERKS.

The Temperance cause has made some progress in this town during the past year. Several months ago a few friends met to consider the best means of advancing the cause, after which a public Meeting was held in a large room, connected with the Black Horse Inn. The novelty of the place caused the room to be crowded, and various impressive addresses were delivered, including some important testimonies by reclaimed men.

A large Meeting was afterwards held in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, and addresses were delivered by several Ministers. Another Meeting was held in the Baptist Chapel, and addressed by the Rev. J. DOXSEY, of Thame. The large Hall has been several times occupied by Lecturers and other Advocates, including Dr. Carr, of Birmingham; Mr. Russom, of Bristol; Rev. T. Spencer, of Bath; Rev. J. Burnis, D.D.; Rev. B. Parsons; S. Bowly, Esq., &c. We have a good working Committee, and a Visiting Society; and a female Committee is about to be organized. We have several Sabbath School teachers and scholars among our members. A large building in Hosier-street, once a brewery, is now used as a soup kitchen. J. W.

MACCLESFIELD.

Teetotalism is alive and stirring in this town. We held a meeting in Lord-street School, on Christmas-day, the proceedings of which were very interesting. T. G. Booth filled the chair, and opened the meeting with an eloquent appeal. Distinct subjects were appropriated to each speaker. James Clayton: The tendency of Teetotalism contrasted with Drunkenness. Ralph Birchenall: An Exposition of the fallacies of moderate drinking. Josiah Hankinson: Temperance in harmony with the Gospel. William Booth: Teetotalism considered in a political and commercial view. John Hankinson: Temperance in relation to Sabbath-schools. William Dean: The claims of the Temperance Reformation. This meeting has done much for the Temperance cause, and gained us many good friends.

We find that the TEETOTAL TIMES does work which the platform cannot; we circulate many, and intend to circulate them regularly amongst our clergymen and the members of our society, and we take this opportunity of recommending it to all youths' societies, for it is the means of impressing true and startling facts upon their memories, which, in time, will shine out as a light to future generations, thus being the means of training up the rising race in the way they should go.

We have above 500 members, many of whom are very active. Our Committee are engaged in making preparation for a Grand Teetotal Festival, on Easter Tuesday.

WILLIAM DEANE.

TOTTENHAM, MIDDLESEX.

From a report of the proceedings of the Tottenham and Edmonton Temperance Union, just published, we learn that the attendance at the meetings during the last year has been invariably good, and, in some instances, very large; that considerable interest respecting the Temperance question has been excited; and that the result is the accession of several names to the list of pledged members, and an increasing spirit of enquiry into the truth of the principles on which Temperance Societies are based. The report urges exertion on all the members, as there are, in the parish of Tottenham, three brewers, forty-one public-houses and beer shops, and eighty-three dealers in tobacco; the total number of butchers and bakers together falling short of thirty!

SOUTH WALES.

CARLEON, MONMOUTHSHIRE.—We held our first Temperance Festival, in this town, on Christmas day last. Though the weather was unfavourable, we had upwards of 200 to Tea. After which a Public Meeting was opened, and soon the room was crowded. Mr. Briant, from Newport, took the chair. The following persons took an active part in the proceedings of the evening: Mr. Evans, Farmer, Mr. Roberts, Schoolmaster, Mrs. Frederick, of Newport, and Mr. Jenkins, Grocer, of the same place. Many have been received as Members since that Meeting, and we hope good will follow.

M. L. M.

HENLEY ON THAMES.

The cause of Temperance is still gaining ground in this place. The Committee are following up, as far as possible, their attack upon the foe Intemperance, and, finding it necessary to extend their borders, they have taken the large Assembly Room for their use, which was opened by a Public Meeting on the 16th ult. Mr. A. A. Parsons was called to the Chair, who, after referring to the progress of Temperance and its present aspect, introduced Mr. Wheeler, a member of the Society of Friends, who was followed by the Rev. J. Doxsey, of Thame. The addresses of both these gentlemen were pertinent and telling. Some of the "sons of toil" came boldly forward at the close of the meeting and signed the pledge. The audience was large and respectable. Some few of "the baser sort" were noticed to pay great attention; and, after all, it is the elevation of these especially we seek. This meeting certainly was a very interesting one, and we hope only the prelude of future success.

JERSEY.

Henry Clapp, Esq., of Lynn, U.S., has delivered a series of five lectures on the "Temperance Reformation," to large and respectable audiences in this Island. On the 12th, he delivered his concluding lecture, in which he gave an interesting account of the Washingtonian Movement. A similar one has been established here, the good fruits of which have already appeared. The Hall was filled on each occasion, and the Lecturer drew forth enthusiastic applause from his hearers. The cause is "going a head," notwithstanding the cheap rate at which intoxicating liquors are to be obtained. The friends are beginning to "move," and a Town Missionary is employed. Nearly two hundred have signed the pledge during the last two months. T. A. S.

BATH.

In the course of November last, Dr. R. B. Grinrod visited this city, and did much by his lectures, &c., to promote the Total Abstinence cause. His arguments were pithy and telling, and his pictorial illustrations (more than one hundred in number) were excellent. His lectures were attended by large, respectable, and attentive audiences; and he addressed about 2,000 juveniles in the Guildhall, with salutary effect. About 400 signatures were obtained during the delivery of the lectures, many of them being those of influential persons. We have now about 3,000 names in our Juvenile Members book.

T. MARTIN, President.

TROWBRIDGE, WILTSHIRE.

The Trowbridge Teetotal Society being anxious to commence the New Year in earnest, made an effort to help on the noble cause of Teetotalism; and we were feelingly seconded by the friends of the system. On Monday Evening, January 1st, we had a meeting in the Lecture room of the Mechanics' Institution, when upwards of 200 persons partook of Tea, &c. Mr. Isaac Phelps, of Bristol, and other friends addressed the company which was a very large one. On the following day, Tuesday, we had another Public Meeting, the Revd. J. Martin presided, and Mr. Phelps again warmly advocated our principles; his arguments were very convincing. Two such meetings it has not been our pleasure to witness this long time past, and we are induced from the glorious fact of receiving 42 signatures to the pledge (at the two meetings) to do all in our power to aid this great moral regenerating cause.

T. WILKINS, Secretary.

EBLEY, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.

EBLEY CHAPEL JUVENILE TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.—On Tuesday, January 2, 1849, the youthful members of this Institution held their second quarterly tea meeting. Everything was arranged by the boys and the girls. They sold ninety tickets to as many young Teetotlers. They decorated the School-room with evergreens, and behind the Chairman, or rather the Chair-boy, was an illuminated sun to intimate that Temperance is to the social circle what the sun is to the natural world. The girls presided at the tables, and a sufficient number of boys officiated as waiters. The order observed could hardly be more perfect. Grace before and after the meal was sung, and when the tables were removed several of the parents and adult friends were admitted. The boys chose one of their number, Charles Roome, to preside, a Temperance song was sung, and one of the lads offered an extempore prayer. After which several speeches were delivered by the boys. These were their own composition, and would have done credit to persons of much riper years. Ebley brass band attended, and animated the meeting with its music, and in the intervals between the speaking and the airs, the boys and girls sung several interesting Temperance melodies. At the close, Mr. Thomas Weate, Mr. Cormick, the Rev. J. Butterworth, of Stanley, and the Rev. B. Parsons, the pastor of the church, addressed the assembly, and the assembly broke up highly delighted with this rational manner of commencing the New Year. This is now the second meeting that these children have held, and the pastor stated that they were the most hopeful he had ever witnessed during the twenty-two years he had been at Ebley. The young people are about to raise a fund among themselves to carry on the cause. They have chosen a secretary and treasurer, and intend to distribute Temperance tracts throughout the village.

BIDEFORD.

On Monday, January 1st, the Tenth Anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society was held in this town. There was a public tea in the Wesleyan School-room, of which upwards of 200 partook. After tea, a public meeting was held in the Mansion-house. Mr. C. Veysey, of Torrington, presided. The meeting was addressed by Edmund Fry, Esq., Sanders, and the Rev. Messrs. Clapp and Way. At the conclusion of the meeting, ten persons signed the pledge. During the past year, seventy persons have enlisted as Total Abstainers; several of them were notorious drunkards. It is astonishing to see the difference now in their deportment; some of them have joined Christian Churches, and are ornaments to society. We trust the present year will be more prosperous and happy.

THOMAS SANGUIN.

HAVERFORD WEST.

An important Institution has arisen in this town, out of the operations of the Total Abstinence Society. It is called, "The Haverford West People's Institute." It is formed for the especial benefit of the working classes, and the object is their moral and intellectual improvement. The means proposed are a Reading-room, Library of Reference, and Lectures on Literature, Science and Art. The terms of admission are, enrolment free, one shilling and one penny per week subscription.—We wish the Institution success, and recommend the formation of similar Associations in connection with every Total Abstinence Society throughout the kingdom. If formed on popular principles and well worked, they would, no doubt, have the effect of preventing those breaches of the abstinence pledge, of which we have now occasion to complain.

GREENOCK.

The Banks of Clyde Juvenile Total Abstinence Association was instituted in Greenock, on the 21st August, 1848, and has already enlisted under its banner 400 juveniles. There are monthly public meetings of this Association held in Port Glasgow, and occasionally in Helensburgh, in addition to a weekly public meeting in Greenock, which are always addressed by two or more juveniles. The cause continues to prosper, and we hope that the 360 public-houses now in Greenock will, in the course of a few years, be reduced to 60, if not totally abolished. J. S.

THE NEW TESTAMENT AND TEETOTALISM.—A few weeks since I left a New Testament with a family, the master of which was in the habit of attending the public-house and much given to drink. His wife tells me he has not entered one since, but reads his book, enjoys much pleasure, and has signed the Total Abstinence pledge.—Leeds Town Mission.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

ALCOHOL: What it does: and what it cannot do: or the influx of alcoholic drinks on the nutrition of the body and in the production of disease.—By WALTER JOHNSON, M. B., with appendix, by EDWARD JOHNSON, M. D. London: Simkin and Marshall.

This forms No. 124 of the "Ipswich Temperance Tracts," and is a valuable addition to that series, and to our stock of Physiological Essays. The importance of the subject, the celebrity of the authors, and the very small price at which it is issued, (44 closely printed pages for 2d.) will no doubt, secure for it an extensive circulation. Mr. W. Johnson considers, 1, alcohol as aliment, and as auxiliary in respiration, and a generator of heat; and the conclusion of his argument is thus expressed:—"Alcohol takes no part in the nutrition of the body—and what part it does take in the generation of heat is supererogatory and mischievous."—2. "Alcohol, as diminishing frequency of respiration, and as encouraging depositions of fat." Then follows, 3, a very curious chapter, entitled, "Alghoulism." Dr. E. Johnson's "Appendix," shews that there are only two modes in which it is possible for death to happen, and that the effect of drinking customs is clearly to generate a tendency to death by both of these modes.

CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE, for January 1849.
Edited by the Rev. JOHN CAMPBELL, D. D.—
London: Snow, Paternoster Row.

In addition to interesting and instructive articles, such as are always found in this Magazine, the present No. contains one, headed "ANTI-CHOLERA," which ought to be circulated by thousands. It occupies nearly ten closely printed columns, and is thus introduced by the Rev. Editor:—"We invite the particular attention of Young Men to a hint which is here given them—a hint, which, if duly attended to, will render them our debtors more than if we had made them a present of a THOUSAND GUINEAS." The document proceeds "to point out the fearful hazard those are running who, in the face of cholera, persist in the use of intoxicating drinks." Then follow testimonies selected with much industry and skill; and the document concludes with these burning words:—

"Doubtless these pages will be read by many who profess the Christian name, and who add to that profession the practice of moderate drinking. We have most respectfully to assure such persons, that their practices are at utter variance with their professions. Better never to have known the facts of the case, than knowing then to despise and reject them: there can be no suffering so little entitled to sympathy, as that which results from a wilful disobedience of the laws of our nature, and especially when that disobedience is aggravated by the cloak of christian profession.

You call your body a temple consecrated to the living and true God, and yet to satisfy your lust for false excitement, or in disobedience to a depraved custom, you pour down your throat an inveterate poison; thus defiling that temple, endangering its safety by admitting within its precincts one of its most malignant enemies. Your example, if imitated, must certainly be followed by the most fatal results. If you should escape the fatal malady which these drinks are so well fitted to engender, it may be not so with others who have followed your drinking example; and a day of reckoning may proclaim your shame, that you have been instrumental in casting upon this cold world disconsolate widows and helpless orphans.

We have no hesitation in asserting, that the drinking system, old as it is, stands before the world without one redeeming feature in its character: and now that it appears before you the prolific parent of disease, you must either renounce it as the work of the devil, or openly embrace his service, for, be assured Christianity will have nothing that does not belong to it.

THE WESLEYAN TIMES.

This is the title of a new Weekly Newspaper, in which, amongst other good causes, the cause of Total Abstinence from strong drink will be advocated with clearness and energy. For particulars, we refer our readers to the advertisement on another page.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

EXTRAORDINARY WILL.—The following is a copy of the will of John Langley, one of the Cromwell Ironsides, who settled in Ireland during the Commonwealth, and died there:—"I, John Langley, born at Wincanton, in Somersetshire, and settled in Ireland, in the year 1651, now in my right mind and wits, do make my will in my own hand-writing. I do leave all my house, goods, and farm of Black Kettle, of 253 acres, to my son, commonly called Stubborn Jack, to him and his heirs for ever, provided he marries a Protestant, but not Alice Kendrick, who called me 'Oliver's whelp.' My new buckskin breeches, and silver tobacco-stopper, with J. L. on the top, I give to Richard Richards, my comrade, who helped me off at the storming of Clonmel, when I was shot through the leg. My said son John shall keep my body above ground six days and six nights after I am dead; and Grace Kendrick shall lay me out, who shall have for so doing five shillings. My body shall be put upon the oak table in the brown room, and fifty Irishmen shall be invited to my wake, and every one shall have two quarts of the best aquavita, and each one skin, dish, and knife before him; and when the liquor is out, nail up the coffin, and commit me to the earth, whence I came. This is my will, witness my hand this 3rd of March, 1674, John Langley." Some of Langley's friends, before his death, asked him why he would be at such expense treating the Irishmen whom he hated? He replied, that if they got drunk at his wake, they would probably get to fighting, and kill one another, which would be something towards lessening the breed!

WEAK COFFEE!—"Why do you set your cup of coffee on the chair, Mr. James?" said a worthy landlady, one morning at breakfast. "It is so very weak, ma'am," replied Mr. James, "I thought I would let it rest."

GIN AND DEATH.—Last week, a gin puncheon burst near the Masboro' station, on the Midland Railway, when the liquor was drunk with ungovernable avidity by a number of men who happened to be near. A person of the name of Anson drank so much that he died shortly afterwards. The medical men stated in evidence on the inquest that he died from the effects of alcohol.

ALARM IN ZION.—A fallen professor was solemnly warned by a Minister who was leaving his neighbourhood the next day, in these terms, "Brother, it is on my heart to say to you, from the Lord, I much fear you will be lost for ever." The warning was slighted, he continued to take the fatal glass, and polluted by the sins of whoredom and drunkenness, in a few days he fell into a river and was drowned. There was the destroyed tabernacle, but where, O! where had the soul fled? When! O, when! will the church be wise, and break off all connection with inebriating liquors.—R. Tabraham.

CAUSES OF CRIME.—Mr. W. LOGAN, the Commissioner of the Scottish Temperance League, has investigated the cases of crime which had been brought fairly before the bar of the High Court of Justiciary, at Glasgow. From a careful analysis of the cases, he has been able to trace intoxicating drinks as the direct cause of their appearing there. Out of eighty cases, he has visited seventy-four separately in their cells, and this was the invariable fact, both from the statements of the prisoners themselves, and from the other sources of evidence at which he had access.

TO POSTMASTERS.

This Journal is privileged to be sent postage free to every part of the United Kingdom, and we have the authority of the Secretary of the General Post Office for stating "that Agents may be employed in Great Britain and Ireland, for the sale of JERSEY Newspapers; and that such Newspapers may be forwarded by Post to any extent, either singly, or in parcels, provided the parcel is open at the ends. They may afterwards be re-posted for any part of the United Kingdom, free of Postage, and for such of the Colonies, to which there are Mail Packets, but in the latter case the re-posting must take place within seven days after the date of publication of the Newspaper.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS FATAL TO EARNESTNESS IN RELIGION.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

In our Nos. for November and December we directed the attention of our readers to the very important subject which heads this article. The man who is not earnest in religion cannot be religious. Could we investigate every object and every subject in the whole Universe, whether past, present, or to come, amidst this infinite variety nothing could be found so deserving of our attention as Christianity.

We are capable of earnestness, and are more than other nations an earnest people. Ardour, zeal, promptitude, daring, self-denial, and patience, are said to be prominent characteristics of the Anglo-Saxon race. To this we owe no small degree of our National greatness. What countries we have visited, what enterprises we have undertaken, what dangers we have faced, and what hosts of obstacles we have overcome! And not unfrequently all this toil has been endured in the pursuit of objects that are not worth a thought. Our whole history shows that we are an eminently fervid and industrious people. We have, therefore, all the natural endowments requisite to render us devoutly and devotedly religious. The apathy of the Chinese, the quietism of the Buddhist, or the indolence of the Turk, are not traits of our character, except on the important subject of religion. On this topic the most phlegmatic tribes are ardent, even though the object of their worship is a senseless idol, and their whole system of devotion and morals a perfect cheat. The matter between us and other nations stands thus:—We are a zealous people, and have among us the purest and sublimest of all religions, and yet on this great theme alone we are apathetic: they are notoriously indolent and indifferent, and have nothing in the shape of religion but the most absurd and mendacious superstitions, and yet they very far surpass us in their devotions.

We shall not here be charged with maligning our country or our age by these remarks, because all our denominations, at the present time, are complaining of the want of earnestness, and various causes are assigned for this increasing lukewarmness. In these papers, therefore, we only take up the lamentation which others have raised, and give it as our opinion, that our great cause of this spiritual declension, or remissness, is the use of intoxicating drinks. We are an ardent people in worldly pursuits, we are therefore capable of being fervid in religion, and christianity presents to us the most thrilling truths, and enjoins on us the most solemn duties; and yet this glorious and awful theme, which is adapted beyond all others to arouse our feelings, and has the greatest claims upon our attention, is almost the only one that we treat with indifference.

It may be said that the carnal heart is enmity against God, and that the fall has greatly injured our moral constitution. We heartily subscribe to everything that the Bible says on these important points, but still we greatly differ from those who attribute to Eve, to the Serpent, to our bodily organization or mental degeneracy, those evils which at present paralyse our churches.

We have already shown I, That the Physical effects of these liquors are most baneful; II, That they have the most baneful influence in preventing the full development of practical Christianity; III, That they produce levity or stupidity; and we now observe,

IV, That a new generation of Drinkers and Drunkards is being raised up by them. It need not be argued here that all drunkards come from the ranks of moderate drinkers. The man who never takes the first glass can never take the second. But moderation is such an undefinable thing, that a person may drink the third and fourth, aye the FIFTIETH glass if he can do so and walk without staggering, and yet few of his compeers will complain of his extravagance. Indeed, numbers of your moderationists are perfect bores with respect to the glass. You can never drink enough to please them. They laugh at you, call you "a poor drinker," "a woman," "an enemy to your own comfort," or as "bad as those lunatics the teetotalers," unless you empty their decanters. You are especially solicited "TO MAKE FREE" with the bottle. They seem almost ready to drunch you, and pledge their honor and conscience that the poison "will do you no harm."

With these doings in almost every family, is it any wonder that we have a new generation of drinkers springing up around us? Our young people are being poisoned, both in body and mind, by these deleterious liquors and corrupting practices. It is a fact that more inebriates come every year from the society of moderate drinkers, than reformed tipplers from the ranks of the drunkard. We have thus two parties at work and in a state of antagonism. There are the Teetotalers doing a little to produce perfect and universal temperance, and there are the moderate people labouring zealously to retain the drinking customs of the day; and we need not say that the latter are far more active and influential than the former, and are especially supported by many of the most popular ministers and leading members of our Churches; and the results are almost as awful and destructive as the Prince of Darkness could desire. We have seen the sons and daughters of Ministers—yes, of the most eminent Ministers and professing Christians,—brought to the Union, to crime, to beggary, or a premature grave by these practices. Mind, there was no drunkenness at home. Perhaps if there had been, this hideous form of vice might have disgusted the young people and have warned them to abstain. No: It was not drunkenness but moderation that did the mischief. The drink was lauded in the highest terms, all persons were pressed to quaff the destructive beverage, no one ever took enough, visitors were tormented to swallow large potations, and sadly laughed at and satirised if they did not drink freely. The young people saw all this, and having a high opinion of the judgement, benevolence, and piety of their parents, they, of course, attached great importance to the drinks which were the subject of so much eulogy and commendation, and, as a consequence, thousands of them became fond of the glass.

Oh, that our moderate drinkers would count their victims! "Heaps upon heaps," not only in the grave, but in perdition, would stand in review. And yet the whole scene of desolation produces as little emotion as the crushing of a moth or the fall of a leaf. The fact is, our religious people have little or no conscience on the subject. By their commendation, practice, and example, they destroy their own children, and ruin others with as great complacency as they swallow the baneful glass. The momentary pain of a little self-denial is weighed in the balance against all the miseries and crimes of drinking, and is allowed to turn the scale.

Now, while matters remain thus, while there is this culpable indifference respecting the destruction of souls, it would be the last degree of absurdity to pretend that we are earnest in religion. When any one is deeply anxious to accomplish an object, he adopts appropriate means. This is the case in every department of life. The most solemn protestations and oaths would be insufficient to convince us of the sincerity of any person in any pursuit, so long as he labours to defeat the end on which he tells us his heart is set. Yea, we do not believe that an individual can be ardent in the prosecution of any purpose, unless he is willing to deny himself; if self-denial should be necessary to success. And here the piety, the spirituality, the orthodoxy, and christianity of our day fail. If wordy prayers, and niggardly contributions would save the world, we might soon hope for the millennium; but if energetic labour and extensive self-denial are demanded, then iniquity must prevail, and mankind must perish! The Apostles and early Christians "travailed in birth" for souls, and proved the sincerity of their throes by the most active exertions and costliest personal sacrifices. The Son of God is, in this respect, a perfect model. WATTS has well sung,

"There's not a gift his hand bestows,
But cost his heart a groan."

Every single comfort we enjoy was purchased by his sufferings. We owe all our hopes, here and hereafter, to his pains and sorrows. Had he refused to deny himself for us, we must have perished. He gave up his life to save us from death. Divine mercy gave all it had to give. When God sent his Son, the treasury of heaven was exhausted. That one benefaction bestowed on us all that Jehovah could impart, or the world require, for its salvation. When he said, "It is finished, and gave up the ghost," the Lord Jesus had nothing left. "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, for our sakes he became poor, that we, through his poverty might become rich." To save us "He made himself of no reputation," the Greek reads, "He emptied himself." No language could be more expressive. He kept nothing back that could in any way benefit us. On the cross he poured forth all, the last drop of his blood, and every vestige of life, amid unutterable agony, he sacrificed for us, his enemies. And now his word tells us that "If any man have not the mind of Christ he is none of his." It is not the orthodoxy of our creed, it is not the depth of our feelings, nor the multiplicity of our prayers that will constitute us Christians. Satan is no heretic, mystics have melted with sentimental sympathy, devotees of all sects have multiplied prayers beyond the power of calculation, and yet have never put a foot in the print of our Saviour's steps. "Faith without works is dead;" unless we copy his example, the Saviour will disown at the great day, and therefore we must imitate his self-denial, or hear him say, "Depart from me, I never knew you."

We might spare all our mysterious speculations respecting the wonder that iniquity abounds, and that our churches enjoy so little prosperity. We are not in earnest. Our want of self-denial impeaches our piety. We are actually immolating our sons and daughters and our dearest friends at the shrine of Bacchus, and thus grieve and quench the Spirit of God. We are guilty of the greatest presumption. "We tempt the Lord our God." We commend, and drink, and dispense a poison which preys on the vitals of the body, which ravages the brain,—that sanctum sanctorum of mind,—and which pollutes the precious soul; and then we bow at the throne of mercy and supplicate that the venom may not be fatal! We profess to fear the Lord and yet serve our idols; we call ourselves by the name of Christ, and pour our daily libations to the God of Wine! We insult heaven by our recklessness and extravagance, we corrupt the earth with our example, we do all this most wantonly, for we sacrifice our own health and prosperity to our love of luxury, and then wonder that our earnestness in folly should paralyse our earnestness in religion!!

HYMN FOR THE YEAR.

With eager voice let each proclaim
The Prince of Salem's holy name—
Thy name, blest Jesus, which can save
The sinner from the second grave.

Who'er the name of Jesus bears,
An amulet of safety wears;
A name at which shall every knee
Bend low in deep humility.

To thee, prophetic, priestly King,
To thee heart-incense would we bring;
Thee would we worship, thee obey,
While lingers yet life's closing day.

When heard the trumpet's rending sound,
And startled sinners cluster round
Thy solemn Bar—by them unsought—
Then joyous stand, ye Jesus-bought.

To saints, the Judge (oh, greeting sweet!)
Cries—"Welcome now to God's retreat,"
Then speaks the unbeliever's doom—
"Far hence seek thou thy prison-tomb."

Oh! let us then, while years decay,
Clasp Israel's Shepherd as our stay,
'Mid sin's delights forsake to roam,
And press for glory's blissful home.

DOINGS OF ALCOHOL, AND THE PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE IN WALES.

BY CHARLES EDEVAIN.

When I first entered the Iron and Coal districts of Wales, I was astonished at the scenes of misery and discomfort, destitution and vice, that came before me. It is said that pestilence and famine have passed away; that may be true to some extent, but pestilence still rages fearfully there, in the form of typhus engendered by want. In my tour through the Principality, I have stood upon the mud floor over the corpse of the father and the child, both the victims of that distressing malady; I have also seen a man in the prime of life, stretched upon a bed of straw, wrapped only in rags, the victim of intemperance; the former might have been visited by poverty and disease without his own seeking, the latter was brought to that state of wretchedness by his own imprudence.

My object, at the present time, is to state how the Temperance cause progresses in some of the towns I have lately visited.

In the Iron and Coal districts, just alluded to, intemperance, with all its concomitant vices, makes great ravages amongst the hardy sons of toil. At Merthyr I learnt that on strong drink alone £75,000 was expended annually, besides £40,000 on tobacco. At Beauford, another mining locality, situated on the hills of South Wales, there are 600 dwelling houses, and 22 public houses, wherein the inhabitants spend yearly above £6000 on maddening drinks, the average of which is £9 per year for each family in the town. At the close of one of my lectures delivered in the British School Room at Cardiff, I was informed that there is lavished away in that town, in intoxicating drinks, no less than £1000 per week, the population amounting to 15,000 persons, and the majority of the working classes in that community cannot or will not pay 2d. per week for the education of their children; such being the case, what a deplorable state of mental destitution for any state of Society to be in. We owe our greatness, as a nation, to knowledge: in other words, to education; then if the fathers and mothers of our country do not give their children that education which is necessary for after years of usefulness, we must expect nothing but ignorance, crime, and intemperance, as the result of their parents neglect.

How important, then, that Education and Temperance should go hand in hand together, and that the instructors of youth should press upon their charges the evils attending the drinking usages of Society.

I hope the day is not far distant when Education will be more widely diffused amongst our Welsh brethren. Although I have thus stated that Intemperance reigns to a great extent in Wales, the under current of Teetotalism is exerting its influence to no inconsiderable extent, and in some parts is making rapid strides. W. BROWN, Esq., of Abervale, is greatly aiding the cause in his locality. In the beautiful little town of Crickhoole they are receiving great assistance from the Medical profession. At Carlton, a small village near Newport, a Temperance Society has been organized about four months, and now numbering 180 members, all of whom are working men; in fact Societies are springing up in many parts of North and South Wales with vigour, and old Societies are reviving. So we have the satisfaction of knowing that our Welsh brethren are not behind in aiding "the good time coming," when our country shall be filled with a sober race, when the besotted drunkard shall no more be seen in our streets; then will the stigma be removed, that we are a drunken nation. Oh! that men would stand forth in every town, village, and hamlet throughout the land, and proclaim, with untiring energy, against this monstrous curse. Let us, who proclaim Temperance from the platform, be more strenuous than ever this year in fighting the foe. All teetotalers can aid and assist, in a variety of ways, the salvation of our fellow beings from the misery, wretchedness, and multiplied sorrows of intemperance. Surely this ought to engage the energies of every one who puts forth the slightest pretensions to the possession of our common humanity. The fact that the drunkard is ready to perish and that it is the aim of these Societies to prevent such accumulation of aggravated distress, and that this can be effected by entire abstinence alone, is surely a motive sufficient to call forth our warmest desires, and bring into action our noblest powers.

Every one that has felt the "luxury of doing good" will at once perceive a host of motives, and be stirred up by them to engage in this "good work and labour of love." One motive I will mention, and that is the social improvement of the people. That intemperance destroys social order, is sufficiently manifest from the contention of families, and the violations of law in communities addicted to this vice. The few pieces of ill assorted furniture, the miserable and scanty meals, the thin and tattered clothing, the heart-broken wife, the neglected children, and the general wretchedness and discomfort of the drunkard's hovel, furnish abundant proof that the practice of drinking is destructive of social comfort. But bring the total abstinence principle before his mind, and induce him to embrace it, and you create the desire, and he soon obtains the means, to effect a renovation on his little dwelling and on all around him. His wife and little ones are clothed, the furniture is improved and increased, the food is better and more plentiful, the heart of the wife is cheered and gladdened, the husband recognises in his long neglected but patiently enduring wife, the elegance of form, loveliness of feature, and the melting tenderness which gave birth to the affection of his earlier and happier days; and, alive to the enjoyments of home, he resolves to spend his leisure, for the future, in the company of his now much loved partner, and the prattling playfulness of his children. All this is effected by the Total Abstinence principle; yet, this is but the beginning of blessings,—they extend to his fellows, and even to his employer, for his example is salutary to the former, and his steadiness is a source of pleasure, and a ground of dependence to the latter. Let the principles of Total Abstinence grow stronger; let those feelings be infused into the social circle; and the physical constitution will improve in health and vigour;—the intellect will be ennobled, science will unvail its attractions, poetry will embody "thoughts that breath and words that burn" in matchless verse; the gentle affections will bud and blossom, a benevolent spirit will pervade the circles of human companionship, and man will learn that he is not to seek the gratification of his animal passions, but to take a far more noble station in society, to be happy in himself and useful to those around him.

FROZEN TO DEATH.

The following lines were written on seeing a man who was frozen to death while under the influence of liquor. At the head of the wharf he entered a shop, drank freely, and, in attempting to reach his vessel, fell; and no one being near, he was not discovered till the next morning when he was stiff and dead.

Yes! ye who for money
The spirit imbrute,
Go, look at your labour—
Tis terrible fruit.
You dealt him the poison
And bade him depart,
While the fire was burning
The blood of his heart.

Gaze! gaze on the victim
Ye poisoned for gain,
And think of his death throes,
Then murder again.
Be active in slaying—
The devils in hell,
Approving, will give you
Three cheers and a yell.

The lone wife is weeping,
The children in tears—
What is it but music
To publican's ears?
He feasts on their sorrows
Grows fat on their sighs,
And lives on in glory
When death shuts their eyes.

Gaze on the fixed eye balls
So glassy and dim,
Then forth to your revels,
And fill to the brim
The bright fatal chalice,
And laugh as you please;
Then send to the gutter
Another to freeze.

Remember, man-killers,
The day of hot doom,
When devils incarnate
Will make for you room;
Your dark deeds of horror
Will feed your despair,
Midst your groans of deep anguish
For a breath of cool air.

CHAPTER ON HEALTH.

BY DALMOGAN.

POETS have sung in praise of health; sages have demonstrated the benefit or loss arising from its possession or its absence; and "Health is a glorious thing!" glides from each tongue. A subject avowedly so momentous in its bearings may well demand attention, seeing moreover that compliance with its call is the common harbinger of recompense. Whether men concern themselves or not about acquiring knowledge of the laws of health, these laws remain in force, unaltered, each marked with the faithful warning—"None shall transgress unpunished."

According to the doctrines of Mahomet, the lake Tophet is spanned over by a bridge sharp as a sabre, along which at death each mortal has to pass; the righteous picks his way to paradise in safety, while the reckless tumbles in. So over the slough Dis-health there stretches a narrow plank from which ever and anon the unwary slides and flounders. Let us instance tooth-ache—that glimmering type of the 'worm that dieth not'—with what certainty does the least exposure procure a lengthened visit to the party familiar with its presence! God can send affliction when He sees occasion, yet man seems, in a great measure, the Heaven-appointed guardian of his own health. How the fulfilment of this trust should be set about, I shall, after another paragraph, attempt to sketch.

All men are not on an equality at birth—some souls being placed, as it were, in stone houses; some, in wooden, and some in tents of canvass, which every breeze blows into disorder, and threatens to overturn. Still, making allowance for these discrepancies—differences which a close conformity to Nature's rules will in time diminish—we may well ask if each employs a rational care about the preserving or improving of his constitution.

Health's first essential is AIR. Of this assuredly there needs be little death; but as Elisha's prescription for the cure of Naaman was at first despised for its simplicity, so often in the present case does the sceptic controvert. That air may continue to impart sustaining influence, it must be renewed; for as the bee sucks from the flower its treasure, and departs in quest of further spoil, men must call repeatedly for fresh supplies of the invigorating element, or pay the penalty of indiscretion. Glance, for example, at the cooped up artisan, the plodding trader, and the studious of every class. How few of these hang out the signal of high health!—nor can you with truth declare "their cheeks like roses," unless the faded white rose be the emblem meant. Man must breathe copiously, and should any obstruction interpose, he cannot be surprised should ailing or consumption seize him.

Polluted air and air untainted, perpetually struggle for the upper hand; the former flourishing the axe of death, and the latter rushing to the rescue. Open, then, your places of abode to the regular admittance of a friend indeed, and remove all obnoxious odours from around them. The quantity of air required for keeping each human apparatus going is immense. Among the various things to which man may be compared in one or more respects, ought the windmill to elude attention? Were this rough hewn illustration pondered over, we might expect a speedy revolution for the better. "Pure air, and plenty of it; the light of heaven also!"—be this our cry. But some may point to the inebriate who, fanned by the gentle zephyr, perambulates our streets, yet, notwithstanding, becomes blotched and bloated, or shrinks into "A bloodless image of despair."

I rejoin that man cannot thrive on air alone, and the tipplers diet frequently consists of little else; for the intoxicating draught drowns appetite, and to him possesses greater claims than does nutritious food. In allusion to the waving grain, says the Bountiful—"To thee shall it be for meat." "Yes, and for drink!" impiously adds the creature. Drink is health's poisoner, yet men, enchanted with its tickle, continue to imbibe.

Man's ingenuity in removing, as well as in placing, hindrances to health, arouses wonder. For a long time artificers in steel were sadly puzzled how to avoid inhaling with the air minute particles of the commodity they set afloat, which rendered the occupation unwholesome, life-curtailing; but, at last, the idea entered of making for the face a barricade, or fence, of wire magnetised, which, attracting the steel dust in its career, overcame the grievance.

Closely allied to air is EXERCISE. All must bestir themselves, if not for a subsistence, at least for health: much in the same manner a piece of mechanism, if long unused, corrodes. But differently from dead machinery, the human fabric has the property of reproducing parts when smitten with decay, to which peculiar process due exercise affords assistance. All nature moves, and men, if wise, would shun stagnation.

That exercise may profit, the engirding air must be of a wholesome character; neither confined, nor quickly fluctuating in temperature. Viewed in this aspect, the dancing of the present day comes in for censure. What can be more outrageous to reason than to suppose that the thinly-clad "tripper on the light fantastic toe" may, with fluttering heart, encounter the chilling blast, without endangering the constitution by receiving the seeds of future malady? Females, it is truly said, might accomplish much towards the interment of the drinking system; but infinitely more power have they for the suppression of ball-mummeries. Young women, I maintain, are in this matter seriously responsible; for when a youth advances, with radiant countenance, to present his fair one with a ticket, she has simply to reply in accents firm—"Thanks, sir, for your intended kindness; you may be a jumping Jack, if you like, though I hope not; but I will never be again a whirling Jenny."

Of the various kinds of exercise enjoined, smart walking is the most approved, and the most easily followed. But even here a medium must be observed, as fatigue enfeebles. When the weather is inviting, outside marching should be practised; and as the Irish horseman, when a tract of superior road cast up, rode backward and forward to enjoy it, so may each pace to and fro upon the spot selected. But when the breath of Winter seems to sever the flesh and bones and marrow, a well ventilated apartment must form the walking-course. Perhaps my reader thinks that he has exercise sufficient and to spare, turn we then to another benefactor.

I refer to CLEANLINESS. Men hold a very inadequate opinion of this pressing duty; it is only when its true relation to health and comfort gains belief that it will receive its share of cultivation. For decency's sake, parts visible enjoy the luxury of soap and water, but it should be borne in mind what an important function the skin performs in perspiration. Evening, as well as morning, should the face and hands be cleansed, the limbs frequently, and the body at brief intervals—not once in seven years. If the pores are clogged, as under neglect will happen, the entire system goes deranged, and Nature often summons Fever to apply the flesh-brush ere the ordinary course of things can be resumed. Did Government, instead of hankering to endow temples of absolutism in the sister island, devote a portion of the money towards the erection of temples of ablution, or necessary baths throughout the kingdom, the health and morals of the people would exhibit a salutary change; filth material and filth spiritual being mutual helpers. As matters stand, each must endeavour to obey this law of health to the best of his ability. If we consider the lower animals, we shall be astonished at the variety of means employed by them at instinct's whisper for the effecting of this end—the spider or the elephant administers rebuke. Shall man continue to look tamely on, and allow the matron of Glenburnie's maxim—"I can be fashed!"—to impede his operations, and embitter life?

In conjunction with all these, heed must be paid to DIET. No sooner does the enquirer approach this subject, than discordant cries assail his judgment—some parties shouting, "Vegetables only!" and others, "Flesh, flesh!" For a time he listens with bewilderment, and then the third verse of the ninth chapter of Genesis lights up his memory, whereupon he quietly passes sentence—"Both are best;" and an inspection of the mouth, backed by general experience, confirms the verdict.

As we go nearer the Equator, where the sun beats strongly, less animal or heat-producing food is requisite, and as we distance it, less vegetable. The brute creation have, apart from the whisperer alluded to, no food-directory, yet they make out amazingly; while man, left free with reason for his guide to gather sustenance from herb and moving thing, presumes to give his monitor the lie, and suffers largely. Whether the alimentary department should be called dietetics or diet-aches, I leave the disputatious to determine. Temperate and regular eating must conduce to the body's welfare, but of all the drudges in the universe the stomach is the most abused and the most patient. Sometimes, however, after the descent of that absurd incumbrance supper, the stomach despairingly 'strikes work,' and delivering its despotic master to the throes of nightmare, it, too, may murmur—"When will another Hood arise, to sing my dirge!"

From the definition just submitted it will be seen, that in things reputed wholesome, personal feeling must decide; that how much soever this or that article may be commended on account of its nutritious or other qualities, if found to disagree, it should be passed to more congenial receptacles. How extensive and diverse is the human 'Bill of Fare!'—from train oil to balsamic milk; from bread of rye to the finest wheaten; from shrimps to turtle; and from a canine sirloin to that acme of civilization, a jigot of frog. And in conclusion, be it noted, that excess in eating commits vastly wider mischief than does deficiency.

I have thus commented on a few of health's requirements, with the hope that each may henceforth strive after the better understanding and discharging of his duty. Other branches of the subject—such as apparel suited to the weather, cheerfulness of disposition, and a thankful, trusting spirit—might be dwelt on, but their mentioning may suffice to render them germs of thought. We should constantly remember to Whom we are indebted for every blessing. Of health possessed, we may not boast; and when in spite of all our diligence, it takes its departure for a season, we may not fret as if some strange thing had befallen us, for the Father of our spirits often makes the chamber of disease the gate of heaven, moving there the wanderer to cry aloud for the soul's Physician.

A VOICE FROM AUSTRALIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

Adelaide, July 16, 1848.

DEAR SIR:—You will, no doubt, be much gratified at hearing that the Total Abstinence cause is prospering in this colony. After a long season of deadness, some spirited exertions are being made. These exertions commenced in March last. When I first came here I was told that there had been no meeting for many months. The Society was re-organized, having for its President, the Rev. D. J. DRAPER, the superintendent of the Wesleyan Missions in South Australia. We have had meetings once a fortnight, up to the present time, in town, and seldom meet without obtaining some signatures. We hold meetings once a month in some of the neighbouring villages. A Branch Society or two has been formed, one called the Corrington Auxiliary, the other the Port Adelaide Auxiliary, under the management of the Rev. Mr. Newnham, a clergyman of the established church.

As it regards the condition of this place, there is much need of the operation of this Society. As wages are good, men have every facility for obtaining their beloved draught, and they do not fail to avail themselves of those facilities. Hence, drinking is practised to a fatal extent, and shocking to relate, the women are not only as bad, but worse than the men; and almost every species of imposition is practised upon them by the Publicans. It is said to be no uncommon case for men to come into town after having worked from three to twelve months in the country, (commonly known as "The Bush") having with them fifteen, twenty, thirty, or forty pounds or upwards; which, in numerous cases, very soon finds its way from the purse of the guest to the till of the landlord, in some cases, in the short space of one night! Nor is this all; for some men have even been kicked out of the house in the morning, into which they were received the night before with the greatest professions of friendship.

You see then, sir, what is our position, and what is the work we have to do. We are anxious to obtain all possible information, and knowing the value of your periodical, we shall take it as a very great favour, if, through the medium of your gratuitous fund, or any other means, you, or a few staunch teetotalers of Old England, could furnish a few publications, or tracts for distribution; this would, we believe, greatly assist us in our necessity. Well knowing how generously you have assisted in similar cases, I feel assured that you will not regard our request with indifference.

Yours, with due respect,

THOMAS CLUTTERBUCK.

P. S. I was formerly in the St. Luke's Tent I. O. R., Stoke, Staffordshire. A Rechabite Tent has been established here, which is likely to prosper. A Juvenile Total Abstinence Society has been formed, under the superintendence of—, Cawthorne, jun., Schoolmaster of Adelaide. Any communications may be addressed to me, at Adelaide, South Australia.

THE DELUSIONS OF YOUTH.

Under the influence of the intoxicating cup, the deluded youth conjures up scenes of happiness which are never to be realized, and in his endeavours to catch these glittering bubbles, which ever float before him, his whole happiness seems to consist. For them, he gives up all, health, reputation, friends, property, and, above all, his soul. For years he continues the pursuit, until it leads him over the crumbling lava of a volcano. Now the meteor leads across a yawning chasm, and he almost hesitates; but he has given up everything, and he must obtain the prize for which he has bartered all. It is but another spring, and he will gain it. Still it eludes him, and he follows on. The danger is more and more imminent, and his desire of possession stronger than ever. Everything is centered on the syren toy, which allures him on, and just as he reaches the verge of a burning gulph, an almost supernatural bound brings it within his grasp, but the next instant he has sunk amidst the boiling lava. He has, however, attained his object; he has caught the bubble for which he had lost everything else, and opening his hand, finds not even a drop of water wherewith to cool his tongue.—Gough.

LISTEN, MOTHERS!—As a question of paramount importance to the moral welfare of her child, a mother should be careful to check the beginnings of evil in reference to intemperance. She should not sanction by her practice any habit likely to be dangerous to her child. Her offspring comes to her, with tastes unvitiated, an appetite undepraved. If strong drink is never presented to it, it will never desire it; nay, its repugnance is so strong, that considerable pains are necessary to induce the child to overcome its natural dislike to stimulants. Nature makes the child a Teetotaler, why not leave it so?—Mrs. Balfour.

IS THE WORK ALL DONE?

Much has been done by the temperance men for the poor infatuated being, who, in order to gratify a depraved appetite, has sacrificed health, fortune and reputation. Thousands who were once wallowing in the depths of degradation and drunkenness, have been saved, and are now enjoying the pleasure and happiness that temperance brings. Families in whose midst famine and wretchedness once sat like household friends, are this day participating in the joys and blessedness of a temperance life. These changes have taken place around us: we have seen them, and know that they are the result of the efforts of temperance men. And yet, compared to all that has been done, they are as nothing; compared to the whole aggregate of good produced by the cause, they appear insignificant—an aggregate too great for human conception, and to be comprehended only by the Almighty. Great and glorious as have been the triumphs of the cause thus far, we must remember, that the work is not yet done. The demon of intemperance is still in our midst, rendering desolate many a once joyous heart, and throwing a chill, like the chill of death, around many once happy homes. There are yet tears, the result of intemperance, to be dried up—drunkards to be saved—moderate drinkers to be reclaimed from the error of their ways, and public houses and taverns whose streams of pollution must be stopped.

Friends of Temperance! if it has ever been necessary for you to work it is now. You have to deal with a cunning, deceitful, and desperate adversary. Each one of you has duty to perform, and let none shrink from it. Action—vigorous and bold action—is required of you. The dead speak to you from their charnel houses, to rid the world of the curse that has laid them there. The wives, mothers, and sisters, of them that have fallen victims to intemperance, intreat you to battle manfully against that which has robbed them of their peace and happiness. The young implore of you, by your love of country, your desire to promote virtue and discourage vice, and by your regard for them, not to be indifferent upon this subject. Sentiments as noble as could inspire the bosom of mankind, motives as pure and holy as could animate any heart, bid you labour on. A foe more dangerous than any ever engaged in conflict, is to be conquered, and a victory more noble and brilliant, than any ever achieved in the field of carnage, is to be gained.

In conclusion, let me intreat of you, as you value the happiness of those around you, as you desire the safety of those connected to you by the ties of blood or affinity; and as you would be comforted in your dying moments, with the happy thought of your having done your whole duty to your fellow man, arouse to more vigorous action, and relax not your efforts as long as there remain those who continue to tempt their fellow men, and to "put an enemy into their mouths to steal away their brains;" or while one erring inebriate remains to be reclaimed, and restored to his family, his country, and his God.
—New York Organ.

WATER DRINKERS.—Are temperate in their actions, prudent, and ingenious. They are safe from those diseases which affect the head, such as apoplexies, puffs, pain, blindness, deafness, gout, convulsions, trembling, fever of the mouth, and of the whole body.
—Sir John Eloyer.

ANTI-BEER SHOP ASSOCIATION.

An Association has recently been formed, based upon the following principles, viz:—

I. That the establishment of Beer-shops has been productive of a vast amount of poverty, crime, and wretchedness.

II. That it is therefore highly desirable that efforts should be made to induce the Legislature to repeal the act which sanctioned them.

III. That in doing so, it may be well to aim at obtaining an act to prohibit future licences only, allowing the present holders to continue for life.

IV. That it is desirable to offer prizes for the best written Essays, "On the evil effects of Beer-shops."

Friends of this movement may obtain forms of petitions and other information, by applying to T. Richardson, Esq., B.A., 93, Mill-street, Liverpool. It is said that the Earl of Harrowby has offered to bring in a Bill on the subject, during this session of Parliament.

TO CHILDREN.

DEAR YOUNG READERS:—Have you ever seen a drunkard? No doubt you have, for drunkards are to be seen in every town, village, and neighbourhood. But have you ever thought of the dreadful sin the drunkard has committed, and of the miser he has brought upon himself by his love of strong drink? The Bible says, that "drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven;" and even in this world, they are of all men the most wretched. Drunkenness causes a man to be despised and shunned by all the wise and virtuous. It causes children to dislike their parents, and parents to be cruel to their children. It frequently clothes a man with rags, and makes him so brutish and wicked, that he often steals and commits murder, then it brings him to prison or the gallows; or it robs him of his senses, and causes him to end his days in a madhouse. What sin, then, is so foul, or so destructive as drunkenness? Surely you must dread the thought of ever being guilty of such a sin—a sin which not only makes men miserable while on earth, but which, when they die, excludes them from heaven.

We hope that many of you are TEETOTALERS, because, if you never taste intoxicating drinks, you never can be intoxicated: as those who never enter the water run no risk of being drowned. Many are now drunkards who were once sober and promising children: but they began with drinking a little beer, or a little wine, and, in time, they came to like it so well, that rather than not indulge their appetite for drink, they would part with their last farthing and incur the risk of being lost for ever!

Many persons may laugh at you for being singular, and refusing to do as they do; but always remember, that the approbation of God and your own consciences is a thousand times better than anything besides. By drinking intoxicating liquors, you will do yourselves no good, and may do yourselves a great deal of harm; while by being teetotalers, you will be sure to escape the sin of intemperance, and all the evils it brings with it.

Besides—if you become Teetotalers, you may be very useful, especially if you try to get all the information you can on the subject. You may now be able to do but little in the cause of Temperance, but you will soon be men and women; and in proportion as you become well instructed, you will become capable of being useful; and ever bear in mind that TO BE USEFUL IS TO BE HAPPY.

THREE POISONS.—Professor Hitchcock says, "I group alcohol, opium, and tobacco, together, as alike to be rejected, because they agree as being poisonous in their natures!" "The impair the organs of digestion, and may bring on fatuity, palsy, delirium, or apoplexy."

A FEW HINTS TO OUR FRIENDS.

From the Bristol Temperance Herald, February, 1849.

Notwithstanding the great exertions which have been made to spread a knowledge of our principles throughout the community, and that most encouraging results have followed from those exertions, it is an undoubted fact that a large number of individuals are to this day almost wholly without information respecting them; and there is every prospect that this will continue to be the case for a long time to come, unless some change in our mode of procedure be adopted. Public meetings, though confessedly the most efficient means of accomplishing our object, do not reach the case of large numbers of those most in want of advice. To meet this deficiency we recommend the circulation of tracts from house to house, as one excellent means. Another plan, and perhaps a still more effectual one, is the employment of home or town missionaries, to call at the dwellings of the poor, and by conversation seek to interest many of those who, through ignorance or aversion to the subject, would not read the tracts. In this city we have just commenced the employment of such a missionary, and have no doubt that the result will be found highly beneficial, as has been the case at several places in the North of England. There is yet another mode of reaching those whom we do not approach by the other agencies now commonly at work, which we are at this time especially desirous to bring under the notice of our friends;—that is, to introduce the subject into the columns of those vehicles of instruction which are open to and read by all classes—the Newspapers. The plan recently adopted by the Bristol Society has been found to answer well. The admirable work "Temperance and Teetotalism," which we again urgently recommend our friends to circulate, was advertised in our five weekly papers; in each paper we were allowed to insert a brief extract from the work, which of course contained some of its most striking passages. These paragraphs not only led to a considerable sale of that work amongst the public generally, but were read by thousands, who seldom if ever meet with anything on the subject of temperance. The newspapers both in town and country are to a large extent read by those whose main place of resort is the public-house. At first sight this appears a costly mode of proceeding, but a more close examination will show, that in addition to the great advantages we have already hinted at, it is perhaps as cheap a mode of bringing our cause fairly before the public as any we can adopt. The cost of the five advertisements was about 30s., the newspapers publish, we believe, not fewer than 13,000 to 14,000 weekly, and as they are read by most persons in this city, and circulate extensively through several adjoining counties, more especially at public-houses, where they are read, advertisements and all, throughout the week, it is not too much to suppose that they are read by at least one hundred thousand persons; at which rate we would give information to 3,000 persons for one shilling; but even making every allowance for our paragraphs not being read by all, it would be found that the plan we suggest is both as effectual and as economical as any we can employ. Another, adopted occasionally by our friends is likewise a very good one. When a publication of peculiar interest and importance makes its appearance, a copy is sent through the post to most individuals of influence in the neighbourhood. We have reason to know that this has been productive of much good, and it is, in fact, almost the only mode of making such individuals acquainted with the subject. We shall be pleased with information of other modes of making known our views more generally amongst the public.

In addition to the work above alluded to, "Temperance and Teetotalism," we would now recommend the forthcoming "Hundred Pounds Prize Essay on Juvenile Depravity," some portions of which, showing the extent to which the efforts to elevate the moral condition of our population by Education and other agencies, are rendered abortive through strong drink—are admirably calculated to draw public attention to the Temperance question, and show its incalculable importance to this country.

A FRIENDLY REQUEST.

The Art and Science of Medicine is the result of experience. For a long period practitioners have been in the habit of prescribing Alcoholic liquors, and the extent to which this has been carried has been the cause of thousands of persons becoming drunkards.

The evil habit will have to be met with experiments made in an opposite direction, and if such prove successful, then encouragement will be given to try further and persevere longer; and ultimately, we may hope, truth will be elicited, and an innocent mode of practice developed and adopted.

I suppose I have had as much experience as most in the treatment of disease without the use of Alcoholic beverages, and I have it in contemplation to publish the results in a small volume of cases. The cases published had better extend over a wide surface of country (I have sufficient as far as number is concerned) and shall, therefore, feel much obliged to any persons who, having been ill, have recovered without the use of such liquors, if they will send me a report of their sickness, treatment, and recovery.

Every correspondent, whose case I publish, shall be presented with a copy of the volume.

I am very desirous to win over my professional brethren to a method of simple treatment, which I think will be beneficial to themselves, their patients, and the community.

H. MUDGE, SURGEON.

MEDICAL TESTIMONIES.

We have just received a short notice from our indefatigable friend, JOHN DUNLOP, Esq., in which he informs us of "an advancing progress of the medical world in our favour." He adds, "I have received several hundred additional signatures to the Medical certificate; so that almost all the towns of note in Great Britain, and some in Ireland, have sent names."

It is most desirable that there should now be a new Edition of the Certificate, with the whole of the names appended. We have the means of knowing that great good resulted from the circulation of the first Editions, and its republication with nearly Two THOUSAND names of eminent Medical practitioners attached to it, would surely go far to remove all doubts as to the injuries inflicted by the use of strong drinks, and the practicability and efficiency of entire abstinence from them.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.—Probably there are not two words which more distinctly point out cause and consequence than these—gin and biters!

GOOD MOTTOES.—Temperance is honorable.—What sobriety conceals, drunkenness reveals.—When the wine is in the wit is out.—Learn to unlearn what you have learned amiss.—Prayer prevails against temptations.—Waste not, want not.—Custom is the greatest tyrant.—Be active, for idleness is the rest of the mind.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENT IN CANADA ON THE LICENSE QUESTION.

At a Special Session of the Magistrates of the Home District, held on the 4th Feb., in the Grand Jury Room of this city, fifty-four Justices of the Peace being present—E. W. Thompson, Esq., in the Chair—the following resolutions were adopted by large majorities, after being fully discussed seriatim:

1st, That in order to lessen the number, and improve the character of the Taverns in this District, it is necessary that the License Law, as it now exists, be amended.

2nd, That in order to the erection of some barrier to the establishment of unnecessary and improper houses of public entertainment, and to the progress of immorality and crime, no license should be granted but at one period of the year, when the Magistrates generally throughout the District might be expected to be present. That in case of a bona fide sale of a licensed Tavern, or the death of any person holding a license, or of the removal after six months occupation of any licensed tavern-keeper, the license granted to any such party may be transferred to another party in the manner now described by law.

3rd, That it be recommended that the rate of Tavern Licenses be fixed at not less than £5, nor more than £20 for each License, at the discretion of the Magistrates in Session.

4th, That it be also recommended that no petition for a Tavern License shall be granted, if signed by any persons or persons interested in the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors.

5th, That the names of all Magistrates signing applications for Tavern Licenses shall be published when the ordinary list of licensed houses shall be published by the Clerk of the Peace.

6th, That in addition to the other requirements, it be recommended that before any house shall be licensed, public notice shall be posted, for one month at least, in a conspicuous place in the locality of the proposed Tavern, of the intention to apply for such license, at the General Sessions for granting licenses, and that a certificate of such intimation having been produced, be signed either by the Town Clerk or one of the Councillors, or one of the Magistrates resident in such Township.

The Resolutions adopted, if carried into effect by the Legislature, cannot fail to produce a very beneficial influence, not only in reducing the number of Houses established for the sole purpose of making money by the sale of intoxicating drinks, but in improving the character of Taverns generally. The Committee to whom was appointed the duty of reporting upon the change required in the present license laws, appended the following important recommendation to be also embodied in the petition to Parliament, which was carried 28 to 15.

7th, "That while your Committee have suggested the foregoing changes, as a means of lessening the enormous evils arising from the retailing of intoxicating drinks in licensed houses of entertainment, they would, nevertheless, earnestly urge upon the consideration of the Bench, and of the Legislature, the necessity and importance of adopting the more salutary principle, that no houses should be licensed as Inns within the Province, wherein intoxicating drinks are sold: so soon as public opinion will justify such a course."

The advance of public opinion in the direction of the temperance reformation, was never more pleasingly manifested than on this occasion. A strong conviction appeared to rest on the minds of the Bench generally, that something decisive must be done to rescue society from the flood of demoralization and crime which has emanated from the present lax and irrational system of granting Tavern licences.

No class in the community is so capable of judging of the dread calamities which rest upon the country by the facilities afforded for the retailing of intoxicating drinks, as the local Magistracy; and we congratulate the friends of sobriety and order that the Bench of this District has taken the initiative in suggesting a thorough remedy by recommending to Parliament the necessity and importance of rescuing our public Inns from this desolating curse.

The friends of temperance everywhere should second this effort by getting up petitions of similar import to the Legislature.—Canada Temperance Advocate.

TOTAL EXTERMINATION OF INTOXICATING DRINKS.

The following extracts, from a letter from the Rev. J. CAUGHEY, of America, were read by Samuel Booth, Esq., surgeon, when presiding at the last anniversary of the Huddersfield Total Abstinence Society, and which contains sentiments that we should rejoice to witness more widely diffused amongst ministers of the gospel.

"We must not merely stand on the defensive, and in this attitude allow our fellowmen to perish. Aggression should be the motto of all temperance men. This will require time, labour and money; but if our savings from teetotalism are what we boast, we can well afford these. Temperance publications must be liberally sustained. Lecturers must be employed and paid. Public meetings held also, and no expense spared to render them attractive. Temperance men must put on a formidable front, open and disclosed to the world. 'Total extermination of all drinks employed by the devil to make drunkards,' should be written on our banners in letters of flame. We cannot cope with this insidious and powerful enemy without this sort of public demonstration. Hostility to the dreadful foe of man must be public, as the influence of alcoholic drinks is extensive and ruinous. The narrow and selfish policy of an income in time of sickness must not be the only ruling principle of temperance effort. We must 'look aloft,' 'Thou God seest me.' We must look around and abroad on our fellow men, and upon the havoc occasioned by this monster of monsters. We must sympathise with the peril of those who are exposed, and yearn over the victims of its power. The living coats of eternal truth must be thrown into the palaces of death—these human butcheries; scattered over the character and conscience of every death-dealer in our land. There should be no rest given to our temperance troops till every dealer in intoxicating liquors is stripped of the last particle of influence and respect in the community. The trade must be dishonoured, and held in universal execration. Over the mouth of him who sips the intoxicating beverages, be he minister, or what he may, public opinion must be made to write what the turnpike man wrote over his gate, 'No trust.' This is the terrible and scorching commission of the temperance cause against all evil doers. The evil must cease. The doom of alcohol has issued from the throne of God, for man must be saved, and this is one of the greatest impediments to his salvation. This is not the time for our temperance troops to go into winter quarters. We should be 'during war men,' or during life men in this noble cause of humanity. The temperance banners must float on the breeze of heaven, in the open field of conflict, till every man, woman, and child of the entire population is brought to rally round the standard of teetotalism. I am sorry, that I did not give more of my energies to this cause while in England; but what is past cannot be recalled."

DRINK AND DIE!—Not one man in a thousand dies a natural death; and most diseases have their rise from intemperance.—Lord Bacon.

FEMALES, BEWARE!—The Temperance Chronicle affirms that "the annals of every Temperance Society can present cases of reformed men, but the instance of female reclamation are exceedingly rare."

PRESENT STATE OF THE TEMPERANCE REFORM.

The following remarks, which appeared recently in an American Temperance periodical, will apply strictly to the state of the Temperance reform in England:—

"In the history of every great reformatory movement, there are distinct stages and critical periods. At its beginning all hearts are warm and united, and the mighty impulse of a fresh first love, carries the cause forward triumphantly over all obstacles.

"Then comes a stage of depression and luke-warmness—the novelty is worn off, and newer, more exciting interests divide attention.

"It is at such a time that the true friends of the cause are made manifest. They can there shew that they are not seeking their own interest or popularity, but the cause itself.

"It is then too, that aid is doubly needed, and doubly valuable. When summer and sunshine friends stand aloof, the time-enduring supporters must close up and stand shoulder to shoulder, compensating for the defection of the many by their own devotedness.

"How stands the Temperance reform at the present time? Has it reached one of its critical stages, and are many who were once active become lukewarm? Let those who love the cause, renew the consecration of themselves to its advancement. Let them signalize the year 1849 by a grand united movement. One highly encouraging fact meets us, and that is the unanimity which begins to be apparent in reference to limiting and suppressing the traffic. That prolific evil must be stayed, and to this end let all hearts and hands be joined in a strenuous and resistless effort."

INTEMPERANCE AND CRIME.

At a temperance meeting recently held at Tremont, U. S., Mr. Deacon Grant stated, that on a recent visit to the State prison, 300 men were present, and were addressed by the Rev. Mr. Allen, of St. Louis. When he spoke to them of home, their early days, and alluded to the fact that many of them were there from intemperance, bitter tears started in the eyes of many of the convicts; and he stated the case of the young men in that institution who were well-known in this community as connected with respectable families, whose crimes could be traced directly to the pernicious influence of intoxicating drinks. On a visit, also, to the jail in Leverett Street, he found many boys in there with old offenders; and in conversation with the prisoners, most of them admitted that strong drink had been their ruin. On enquiry of the jailer why those boys were so situated, he said, that owing to the crowded state of the jail, he could do no better. A large piece of land has been purchased at an expense of 150,000 dollars, and at least the same sum is required for the erection of a new building upon the most approved plan. The enquiry was made why we are taxed so enormously, and the reply was, that a large share of it originates in the liquor traffic.

TREETOTAL BRICKMAKERS.

BRICKMAKING is so generally conducted by drinking workmen, that I thought it would interest the readers of the "Times" to know that Treetotalism has been successfully carried out in a Brickyard near Hitchin, during the last summer.—Ghs. Mayo, with his two sons and son-in-law, commenced digging clay in February, and in April, with the help of another man, began to make and burn bricks, and continued throughout the season; when at the close they had made, by the Excise account, THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND and 65 Bricks. During the whole time, not one of the party drank intoxicating liquor, either in the fields, or out of the fields. The Proprietor is so well satisfied with their work and conduct, that he has engaged them again for the coming season.

THE RUINED FAMILY.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

The depopulating pestilence that walketh at noon-day, the carnage of cruel and devastating war can scarcely exhibit their victims in a more terrible array than exterminating drunkenness. I have seen a promising family spring from the parent trunk, and stretch abroad its populous limbs, like a flowering tree covered with green and healthy foliage. I have seen the unnatural decay beginning upon the yet tender leaf, and gnawing like a worm in an unopened bud, while they dropped off, one by one, and the ruined shaft stood alone, until the winds and rains of many a sorrow laid that too in the dust. On one of those holy days, when the patriarch, rich in virtue as in years, gathered about him the great and little ones of the flock, his sons and his daughters, I, too, sat at the board, I pledged therein hospitable health, and expatiated, with delight, upon the eventful future, while the good old man, warmed in the genial glow of youthful enthusiasm, wiped a tear from his eyes. He was happy. I met them again, when the rolling year brought the festive season round. But all were not there. The kind old man sighed, as his suffused eye dwelt on the then unoccupied seat, but joy yet came to his relief and he was happy. A parent's love knows no diminution—time, distance, poverty, shame, give but intensity and strength to that passion, before which all others dissolve and melt away. The board was spread, but the guests came not. The man cried, "Where are my children?" and echo answered, "Where?" His heart brake, for they were not. Could not heaven have spared his gray hairs this affliction? Alas! the demon of drunkenness had been there. They had fallen victims to his spell. And one short month sufficed to cast the veil of oblivion over the old man's sorrow and the young one's shame. They are all DEAD.

"ONLY SEVENTEEN."

Only seventeen! and disguised in liquor! Not drunk, you say, but "disguised." He only takes "an occasional glass!"—Don't believe it. No young man ever yet took an "occasional glass," who did not create another occasion for another. Only seventeen! and drink at a tavern! Is there a power in the human mind, to enable man to avoid destruction; and will not that power rise into action, when told that a youth of seventeen will pour down his throat the fiery serpents of death, vice, and insanity. Look well to your own habits, but also look with kind anxiety to the habits of those you love. Mothers,—look ye to the habits of your sons! Have no consideration for the excuse of an "occasional glass." Sisters,—look well to your brothers. The midnight robber comes not with a more deadly, silent, and stealthy step, than the vice of Intemperance, disguised in hues of beauty. Beware of the rose-tint on the cheek of him that handles the cup! The fiend's first approach is one not so revolting. He comes dressed in smiles. He remains frowning with terror. He triumphs in the howlings of discord. Music and dancing announces his approach. The pall of death, and the cords rattling through the coffin, celebrate his triumphs.—American.

WHO PRAYS FOR THE DRUNKARD?—Is there another class of men on the face of the earth so entirely neglected, in the prayers of God's people, as the poor degraded drunkard? We usually hear Ministers and Christians pray, with fervency, for impenitent men of every other description;—for the moralist, for the openly profane, for the infidel, for idolaters, for Jews, for Mahomedans, for the African, and for the Indian. But scarcely ever do we hear a prayer for the drunkard. Fellow Christians, what man is there, this side of the world of wo, who more needs your sympathy and your prayers, than the wretched being who is fettered by a habit, stronger and more indomitable, than any with which Satan entangles men for his prey? Will you not ask God to enable the miserable creature to cast off his fetters?

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

In addition to several ordinary and special meetings of much interest, some meetings have been held by Members of two associations of a more strictly religious character. In order to meet, if possible, the objections of some members of Christian churches, several societies have been formed bearing the name of CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES; and, still further to meet the views of one particular section of the Christian church, other societies have been formed, under the name of WESLEYAN TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATIONS.—In the first case, the speakers selected are members of Christian churches, in the second, members of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion.

SOMER'S TOWN.—The first of these Meetings for the present season, was held in the school-room connected with Beulah Chapel, WILSTEAD ST., SOMER'S TOWN. It was presided over by Benjamin Rotch, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Middlesex, who in the course of the proceedings delivered two or three impressive addresses. Mr. J. W. Green pointed out "the connexion between Teetotalism and Christianity." Mr. Carter, a city Missionary, spoke on "the peculiar claims of teetotalism on the labouring classes." Mr. W. Spriggs exposed "the evils of moderate drinking by professors of religion." Mr. Ware, Secretary of the Field-lane Ragged School, shewed "the connexion between juvenile delinquency and the use of strong drink." Mr. Claridge pointed out "the duty of Christian Ministers and Sabbath School Teachers in reference to the Temperance Movement." Dr. Gourlay delivered an intelligent and impressive address to the mothers present, cautioning them against the use of alcoholic drinks, either for themselves or their little ones.

DENMARK STREET, SOHO.—A meeting was held in the chapel situated in Denmark street, Soho Square. Mr. J. W. Green presided, and pointed out the connexion between the success of the temperance movement, and those numerous other movements in the success of which patriots, philanthropists and christians professed to be deeply interested; the Rev. Mr. Isaac, the Minister of the chapel, demonstrated the rational and scriptural character of the movement, and expressed his belief that christian professors who did not forward that movement by their example and influence were left without excuse. Mr. Esterbrooke, exposed the evils connected with moderate drinking, and urged upon all present the paramount importance of strict sobriety, both on account of the good they would personally derive from it, and the influence it would impart to their efforts to do good. A number of children connected with the Sunday school were present, who paid deep attention to the addresses.

WESTMINSTER.—A meeting of the Wesleyan Total Abstinence Association was held in the Hall, Princes Place, near Westminster Abbey. Mr. J. W. Green, the Chairman, pointed out the peculiar claims which the Temperance movement had upon the practice and exertions of Wesleyan Methodists, arising out of their high professions of religious experience, out of the express rules of their society, out of the circumstance of their being followers of the self-denying John Wesley, and because of the instances which were, ever and anon, coming to notice, of lamentable departures from consistency and usefulness, in consequence of tampering with strong drinks. Two or three persons, local preachers and class leaders, furnished some affecting instances of mischiefs resulting to distinguished members and ministers of the Connexion, from the use of strong drinks, and urged the practice of abstinence from them upon all present.

FITZROY AND MARYLEBONE.—The Committee of the Society usually meeting in the Hall, Little Portland Street, Regent Street, are holding a series of very interesting meetings in various places, during the enlargement and repair of the Hall. They have held meetings in Oxendon chapel, (Dr. Archers) Oxenden st., Haymarket; in the large school room connected with Wardour Chapel, Chapel street; Soho Square; at Albany Chapel school-room, Regents Park; in the Wesleyan Chapel school-room, Stanhope Street, Regent's Park; in the school-room, Ship Yard, Wardour Street, Soho; and at some other places. Most of the meetings have been well attended, by respectable and attentive hearers. By these migratory movements, many persons have been attracted to the meetings, who would not otherwise have been brought under the sound of teetotal instructions. The activity of this committee is most exemplary.

ZION CHAPEL, WHITECHAPEL.—The Rev. Benjamin Parsons, of Ebley, Gloucestershire, who is supplying the pulpit at this large place of worship, delivers addresses on teetotalism, in the school-room adjoining, every Monday evening. Mr. Parsons has visited other places during his sojourn in the Metropolis. At Harp Alley, Farringdon-street, he delivered a Lecture "on the power of the body over the mind, and the power of the mind over the body."

UNION OF EFFORT FOR THE METROPOLIS AND SUBURBS.—We announced in our last No. that a meeting was to be held at Watt's Temperance Hotel, Catherine street, Strand, for the purpose of friendly conference as to the best modes of advancing the temperance movement in the Metropolis. The meeting was numerously attended and the proceedings were of an interesting character. A similar meeting is intended to be held, at the same place, on Wednesday evening, March 7th, when a series of resolutions will be proposed, the result of which is likely to be the establishment of a regular MONTHLY CONFERENCE of the principal friends and supporters of the various Metropolitan Societies. The meeting is to commence at 7 o'clock.

An active movement has taken place among the working classes, members of total abstinence Societies, chiefly in the western district of the Metropolis; one result of which has been, the presentation of petitions to the House of Commons, revealing some of the evils of intemperance, and praying for a revision of those laws which encourage the drinking system, both as relates to the manufacture and sale of strong drinks.

DORKING, SURREY.

On Monday the 5th ult., the Dorking Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, celebrated its eighth anniversary by a Tea Meeting in the British School room. Nearly 200 persons sat down to Tea. The Rev. J. S. Bright, the Independent Minister of West Street Chapel, then took the chair, and after a few suitable remarks, introduced Mr. Jabez Inwards to the meeting, who for about two hours, dwelt on the evils of what is generally termed moderate drinking, but which term he clearly proved was mis-applied when used in reference to intoxicating drinks as beverages, he also demonstrated the futility of the arguments so often relied upon by the Christian and Philanthropist for the use of their moderate potations for the purposes of medicine, etc. The lecture was illustrated by facts and arguments. At the close, the chairman made a few remarks in confirmation of the statement made by Mr. Inwards, after which several persons signed the pledge.

LEWES, SUSSEX.

A great part of our Town has recently been brought under the influence of Temperance Tracts on the loan system, which has been undertaken by a number of ladies. We are indebted for this powerful agency to the labours of a benevolent lady, Miss H. Lupton. On Wednesday 17th of January, our highly esteemed president, B. Godlee, Esq., delivered a Lecture on Organic Chemistry, at the Mechanics' Institution, towards the close of which he introduced some most striking remarks in favour of abstinence from Alcohol. But the drinking system has received "the unkindest cut of all" by the visit of the talented author of 'Bacchus' to our town. The large room of the County Hall was kindly granted by the Magistrates, in which Dr. GRINDROD delivered four physiological Lectures. The attendance was numerous and respectable. The following gentlemen kindly presided on the respective evenings: J. W. Woolgar, Esq., F. R. A. S., a Magistrate; Robt. Perfect, Esq., M. P. for Lewes; Edward Monk, Esq., and A. R. Briggs, Esq. Dr. Grindrod introduced a mass of medical evidence, made up of testimonies and experiments, which gave overwhelming proof that Alcohol is a poison, and consequently productive, little or great, of physical injury, in proportion to the quantity in which it is taken. The splendid anatomical paintings (about 100 in number) which covered a great part of the walls of the Hall, and with which the doctor illustrated his Lectures, were justly admired by all who beheld them. At the close of the fourth Lecture, great interest was excited by Alfred Wood, Esq., Brewer, ascending the platform who advanced several objections to the arguments and facts Dr. G. had adduced. He was ably replied to by Dr. Grindrod, after which both gentlemen continued in friendly discussion. The controversy was resumed at the Lecture Room, Mechanics Institution, on Monday evening 5th February, when, although the admission was by payment, there was a very large assembly. Mr. Wood and other gentlemen advanced objections, to which Dr. Grindrod replied with energy and effect. By this visit of Dr. Grindrod an impression has been produced, which, we trust, will not easily be effaced.

FRAMLINGHAM, SUFFOLK.

Mr. T. B. THOMPSON, of Leeds, delivered his first lecture in connection with the recently formed Temperance Association at Framlingham, on the 30th ult. It was characterised alike by argument, pathos, and eloquence; and we trust that he may be the means of accomplishing much good while he is with us. Such talented advocacy cannot but be attractive and useful. His comparison of the Temperance with the Anti-Slavery movement, was thrilling.

TUNSTALL, STAFFORDSHIRE.

Our Society has of late prospered greatly. Within the past three weeks an impetus has been given by a course of seven lectures, delivered by Mrs. Stamp. The facts and arguments brought forward in the lectures, were peculiarly interesting and impressive. One of them was addressed to females exclusively, and effected much good. The result has been the addition of 297 members to the Society, and the establishment and strengthening of many. One chief cause of Mrs. Stamp's success was, the truly Christian spirit manifested in the lectures. GEO. KIRKMAN.

YORK.

On Monday evening the 5th inst., Mr. T. B. Smithies delivered a farewell address on Temperance (previous to removing to London) in the Lecture Hall, Goodramgate. Mr. Smithies was received with applause; he said that he joined the temperance society upwards of eleven years ago, and that he regarded that step as an important era in his life. He proceeded to relate several striking instances which had fallen under his own observation, of the evils of a course of intemperance, and concluded with a powerful appeal to moderate drinkers, Parents, and Sunday School Teachers, to adopt the total abstinence pledge. The York Temperance Society has sustained a great loss in the removal of Mr. Smithies, who was the honorary Secretary; his pious and devoted labours, in connection with this and other philanthropic institutions have secured him a lasting place in the affection of a numerous circle of friends.

KEIGHLEY.

Last month Mrs. Theobald commenced a weeks route, in and near Keighley. She delivered several Temperance Lectures, and so powerful was her reasoning, that in one week, at Keighley, Farnhill, Bingley, and Skipton, she succeeded in getting about 200 signatures, to the pledge of total abstinence. May every advocate be as successful, then will Peace, Piety, and Plenty, soon flow through our Land. B.M.

KENDAL.

The third Annual Meeting of the Kendal Juvenile Temperance Society, was recently held in the Independent School Room, Lowther Street, which was crowded. Edward Whitwell, Esq., President, took the chair, and delivered a suitable address. Mr. Earl, Secretary, read the report, which contained the following particulars:—12 Meetings held, attended by 2,600 persons; addresses delivered, 30; Tracts distributed, 250; Members on the books, January 1, 1848, 750; Ditto, January 1, 1849, 1222: Total increase, 472. During the year Mr. T. J. Earland Mr. John French visited nearly all the members, and did not find one that had violated his or her pledge. T. J. EARL, Secretary.

NORTH CAVE.

On Thursday the 8th ult., the members of the Temperance and Rechabite Societies of the above place, celebrated their 8th Anniversary. Members from Howden, Hull, Pocklington, and elsewhere, united in a procession, with the Hull Teetotal Band, splendid banners, &c., and attracted considerable attention. Tea was provided in the Wesleyan School Room, and a Public Meeting was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, Captain G. Fish, of Selby, in the Chair. Mr. Beattie, of Goole, and the Rev. J. Cummins, of Sneath, deeply interested a large audience. A second meeting was held on the following evening, and, as the result, between 20 and 30 persons signed the pledge. Though the Chapel had been used for six successive anniversaries, the Rev. Gentlemen now stationed in the Circuit, exerted themselves most strenuously to prevent its being so occupied on the present occasion, and one of them actually took away the key of the Chapel to Howden.* Two of the Trustees, however, determined that it should be occupied as usual, and the meeting took place as above. How long will successors of JOHN WESLEY thus oppose the Temperance movement?

* Query—Was it a Goose or a Woodcock?

RUSHDEN, NEAR HIGHAM FERRERS.

The Eighth Anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society of this place, was recently celebrated by a Tea and Public Meeting. The Rev. J. Whittemore presided, and addresses were delivered by several members of the Society, with good effect. Our singing class enlivened the meeting with some choruses. We hold a prayer meeting once a fortnight, for imploring the Divine blessing on our labours. Much good has resulted from our meetings. We have in our Society persons who never attended a place of worship, and were the promoters of infidelity, vice and misery, who are now teachers in the Sabbath School, and constant members of the church of Christ. One who has lately joined the Church, publicly declared that the Total Abstinence principle was the means of bringing him out of the public-house on Sabbath evenings, and of bringing him to the house of God, and to meetings for prayer. "This is the Lord's doing."

UNITED STATES.

A vigorous movement has been commenced in New York and other places, against the Sunday traffic in strong drinks.

At the sixth Annual Meeting of the Connecticut State Temperance Society, held at Middletown, a Committee was appointed to attend the stated meetings of the clergy, of various denominations, in their councils and associations, and present the claims of Temperance on a footing with other benevolent organizations of the churches.

CANADA.

Mr. R. Wadsworth has been engaged in a lecturing tour through the principal towns and villages in Western Canada; and at Montreal a series of lectures, by eminent ministers and physicians, is in course of delivery. Much good is anticipated as the result of these efforts for the advancement of temperance.

NEW BRUNSWICK.

ST. JOHNS.—A great demonstration has recently taken place, under the auspices of the "Sons of Temperance," followed up by a Tea party. Both of these efforts to promote temperance were very effective. The Annual Meeting of the Carleton Total Abstinence Society, was held about the same period. The report stated that monthly meetings had been held during the year, that public feeling was more decided in favour of Abstinence than formerly, though the Committee could not boast of much increase of numerical strength.

NEW PUBLICATION.

THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE REGISTER, and Abstainer's Almanack for 1849. Glasgow: League Office; London: Tweedie, Falcon Street, Aldersgate Street.

This is an elegant and valuable addition to our Teetotal literature. In addition to matter that is local, (namely a complete register of the names, professions, occupations and residences of all the officers and members of the Scottish Temperance League) it contains a large collection of important tables and other statistical matter, not to be found in any one publication. A copy of it ought to be laid on the table of every teetotal residence. Its appearance will not disgrace the drawing-room of a nobleman, and a perusal of its contents will convey valuable information to all classes. The astonishingly low price at which it is published, (sixpence), will, we have no doubt, secure for it a circulation highly encouraging to the industrious compilers.

CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE, FOR JANUARY, 1849.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TREETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST.

DEAR SIR,—In case any misunderstanding should arise from a notice of this Magazine in your last number, I beg to state that the article entitled "Anti-Cholera," to which reference is there made, was, with the exception of the introductory remarks, reprinted from a cheap four page tract, recently issued by the Scottish Temperance League.

Faithfully yours,

ROBERT RAE, Secretary.

League office, 30, St. Enoch Square, Glasgow, 8th February, 1849.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

FOR SHAME!—Over an ale-house at Hastings is suspended a sign board bearing the inscription, "Jenny Lind's Gin."

MOTHERS' BEWARE!—Mr. Corbyn Morris states, as a consequence of the very general use of intoxicating drinks, the loss of 80,000 infants in the course of twenty years.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.—Destroy more lives than the sword. War has its intervals of destruction, but these liquors operate at all times and seasons upon human life.—Dr. Rush.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS.—A writer who signs himself Theta, in the National Temperance Advocate, says, "A history of the Commercial Road, whether of England, Ireland, or Scotland, for the last twenty or thirty years, would present one of the most melancholy pictures of human passion and folly that could be drawn from any phasis of British Society."

EXPENSE OF FUMING AND SMOKING.—The amount of duty paid in 1848 sh. ws an increase over that of 1847 of £12,000. The number of pounds weight upon which duty was paid in 1846 was 26,557,143; in 1847, 26,701,911; and in 1848, 26,777,399.—The extent to which the fine air of heaven was vitiated, the constitutions of the smokers injured, and common decency and cleanliness outraged, is not stated in these returns.

COMPARATIVE PROFITS OF CORN AND ALCOHOL.—

At the Bristol District Court of Bankruptcy, in the case of J. Cadman, Pontypool, wine and spirit merchant, the bankrupt was subjected to a lengthened examination by Mr. Stone, who opposed on behalf of several creditors. The most amusing part of the business was the explanation offered by the bankrupt of the mode in which he made the calculation of the profits on the corn trade at ten per cent., and on the wine and spirit business at twenty six per cent. Mr. Stone: Upon what data have you arrived at these figures as to the relative profits on the corn and wine trade? The Bankrupt: I should be afraid to tell you, for fear you should start in opposition. (Laughter.) The Commissioner: It appears to me that if those figures are correct, every one would forsake the corn trade for the wine and spirit business. Mr. Stone (to the bankrupt): How did you ascertain the profits as to the spirits? The Bankrupt: The profits were ascertained by the mixing of the liquors. (Laughter.) Mr. Stone: You mean the quantity of water you mix with them. The Bankrupt: That's about it. (Laughter.) Mr. Ayre (the bankrupt's solicitor): How did you make out this estimate of your profits? The Bankrupt: The accountant and I went into the price of gin, and then we estimated the quantity of water added to it. (Laughter.) The Commissioner: Oh! I see. You estimated between the difference of gin and gin-and-water. (Loud-laughter.)

THE DROP DID IT!—JOHN THOMAS, earthenware-dealer, was charged by P. C. Alcock with being drunk, and brawling in the street at an early hour this morning: also with striking and kicking him, on being taken into custody. Defendant was quite penitent, saying, "it was the drop that did it, and not him!" The officer said he was quite maddened with drink: he pulled out an excellent silver watch, and smashed it to pieces over the rail at the Police station! The Bench fined him 5s. and costs for the assault on the officer.

A DRUNKARD'S SOLOQUY.—It would be a comfortable thing if I jest know'd where I'm bound for. Up street's got mixed with down street, and there's no such thing as cross street at all. The moon's cross ey'd, and keeps winkin' and blinking as if she had her eyes full of Macabey. Now what can I do? If I stand still, there's a very pleasant chance of going to sleep standin'. If I goes to stir, I dont know which way I'm travellin'.

WATER TRIUMPH.—The opening of a noble work has recently been celebrated at Boston, America. A splendid new aqueduct has supplied the great city of Boston with an unlimited supply of pure water from the lake Cochituate. The day was a grand holiday. The following inscriptions were on the rostrum near the fountain. "The water is ours." (Gen. 26. 20.) "The Lord spake, gather the people together, and I will give them water." (Numbers 21. 16) "He shall bless thy bread and thy water." (Exodus 23. 21.) "We have found water." (Gen. 26. 32.) "Fill the waterpots with water." (John 2.) "Let the fountains be dispersed abroad, and rivers of water in the streets." (Prov. 5. 16.)—There were fine ships on the wheels, little and great, barges and life boats; Quincy market in miniature, with real 'vittles'; a clock factory, with real clocks; an artificial flower factory; printers hard at work with presses; boiler makers practising like smoke; in short, innumerable trades and crafts.

Single copies of the TREETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST will be sent regularly, post free, to every Subscriber of ONE SHILLING, per annum, in advance. Societies and individuals desirous of availing themselves of this very economical and efficient mode of advocating Teetotalism will be supplied with copies at 6s. per hundred, which will be sent to them free, either in parcels, or in single copies, to persons whose names may be furnished. Thus a subscription of three shillings will ensure the sending of important information to fifty individuals, or to one hundred, if six shillings be subscribed. Orders with remittance of the amount in Post-office Orders, or postage stamps, to be sent to JOHN CASSELL, 22, Abchurch-lane, London.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

WE were lately lecturing on Total Abstinence in one of our towns, and at the close the Chairman asked if any opponent had anything to state, by way of objection, to our principles. There was a long pause, and as no one rose the band gave us a tune. But when the music was finished, a Scotsman stood up, and in a very urbane manner, informed us "that he was a moderation man, and took a little snuff;"—that "he considered stimulants might be used without being abused;"—that "it was our duty to supply the wants of nature;"—that "Agriculturalists were often distinguished for longevity, and yet they ate when hungry and drank when thirsty;"—that "teetotalism was not dreamt of in former days;"—that "it might be very good to eradicate the evils arising from drinking, but was not fit for universal adoption."

Our friends will perceive that there was nothing very formidable in these arguments, and yet as they were used by an intelligent thinking man, who had often attended Teetotal meetings, they show us, that what may appear very inconclusive and illogical to us, may be operating very disastrously on the minds of others; and therefore we must be content for some time yet, to use "line upon line, and precept upon precept;" and perhaps the following observations, which embrace the substance of our reply, though containing nothing new, may be of some benefit to our cause.

I.—AS TO THE DEFINITION OF MODERATION.—We informed our opponent that he had imposed on us a task which it was impossible to fulfil. Where moderation begins or where it ends, no human being can tell. One person is very moderate, for he only drinks a glass once in a month, while another declares that he never was the worse for liquor in his life, though he has occasionally taken his gallon of beer, his bottle of wine, and his half dozen glasses of spirits-and-water. A friend of ours, a churchwarden and a very active member of the church, informed us that his clergyman asked him to join the Moderation Society, but he declined because he was already a sober man, and knew how to control his desires; and, as a demonstration of the correctness of his assertions, he said, that he rarely drank before dinner, but after taking the usual quantity of beer, porter, or brandy, at that meal, he filled his decanter, gave the two ladies who dined with him a glass each, and drank the rest himself; that at supper time he took his pint of porter, and then wetted each eye, by drinking two tumblers of brandy-and-water to enable him to sleep. Such was the moderation of the churchwarden.

A pious and zealous dissenter assured us that he often had drunk three bottles of wine after dinner, and yet was never the worse for liquor in his life. We knew a bishop who was renowned as a three bottle man, and a strictly sober prelate. It is therefore impossible to define moderation. Persons may use themselves to laudanum, until a dose which, if taken at first, would have sealed their eyes in death, produces scarcely any effect. We have few capacities but may be extended by practice, and none, perhaps, more susceptible of enlargement than our power to drink freely. At first a single half pint, or glass, would have sent the individual reeling through the street, but by practice, the talent to swallow large quantities may be acquired, without rendering the eyes dizzy, causing the tongue to falter, or the steps to be oblique. In conventional language, Moderation is an indescribable thing. The best description is that furnished by teetotalism, for "Moderation is temperance, and temperance is self-government, and self-government consists in the moderate use of that which will do us good, and entire abstinence from whatever will do us any harm." We can hardly imagine a greater mistake than to employ the words temperance or moderation to designate the habitual use of poisons.

II. To say that we can use strong drink, tobacco, or snuff, WITHOUT ABUSING THEM, is altogether fallacious, because the use is the abuse. These substances are poisons, and to suppose that we are to destroy ourselves, is contrary to every human and divine law. It is said that they operate slowly, and therefore are innocent. But this is absurd. Supposing we could invent machinery by which a person could cut his throat, or hang, or shoot himself by degrees, so that the operation would take forty or fifty years, would any one applaud the discovery as innocuous? Whether a man destroys himself by a stroke, or murders himself by little and little, the result is the same, and at the bar of God he will stand convicted of suicide. Tobacco, snuff, and alcohol, are poisons manufactured by the caprice of man to gratify the unnatural appetite which he has created in himself. Neither the articles nor the desire came from heaven. It would be as correct to say that the ALMIGHTY created gunpowder, and that he called it into existence to destroy his children and send them to the bottomless pit, as to aver that HE made such filthy things as snuff, tobacco, or intoxicating drinks, and intended that we should poison our noses with the one, our throats with the other, or our bodies and minds with the third. A man may abuse wholesome food by taking too much. In such a case the use is not the abuse. But the use of the smallest portion of the venomous articles in question, is a violation of the laws of the Creator. It is an abuse of his gifts to manufacture them, it is an abuse of our body and mind to partake of them, and therefore the "use" is the "abuse."

III. We grant that IT IS A DUTY TO SUPPLY THE "WANTS OF NATURE;" but then the desire for alcohol is not a natural want. The desire for food and drink for the body, and of knowledge for the mind, is natural. A child cries for nourishment, and wastes and dies without it; but children have no natural desire for snuff, tobacco, or strong drink. Either of these articles is disgusting to the palate of an infant, and instead of languishing and expiring without them, will thrive all the better if they are withheld. Indeed they are generally allowed to be injurious to the health and growth of the young. Persons give GIN to dogs to render them dwarfs. And there is no doubt that the nerves, the digestive organs, the health and stature of millions are injured all their days by the folly of their parents in giving them stimulants. Numbers are thus smitten, withered, wrinkled, and grey, before they have arrived at maturity, who but for these noxious drinks would have worn a rosy cheek, and possessed the vigour of a giant at sixty or seventy. We should think the person only fit for St. Luke's asylum who would teach a child to take snuff or to smoke. Our tastes, and in fact our whole nature, have to be violated before we can relish these poisons, and therefore it is the climax of absurdity to talk of supplying the wants of nature with such trash. We may create tastes and appetites, and these acquired desires may be more imperious than those which are natural. A child may be indulged until it has a thousand improper wishes, tastes, and appetites, but who would talk of the propriety of gratifying them, or that in doing so we were yielding to the demand of nature? Our real necessities are few.

"Man wants but little here below, Nor wants that little long."

This is as true of eating and drinking, as of the other exigencies of life. It is only uttering a truism to say that we ought "to supply the wants of nature," but nothing can be more incorrect than to assert that we are under an obligation to gratify the filthy taste for snuff, tobacco, or strong drink. Food and drink are necessary to life, but stimulants cut short our days, and therefore self-preservation, which is said to be a first law of nature, as imperatively calls upon us to abstain from poisons, as it does to eat and drink wholesome food.

IV. It is not a fact that AGRICULTURALISTS have been pre-eminently distinguished for LONGEVITY. Our bills of mortality show that the duration of human life, in our cities and manufacturing districts, is longer than among our peasantry. Man is made to live in all climes and countries. He has not a constitution like the rein-deer, which must be braced by the cold, nor like the giraffe, which must be nursed in the torrid zone. God created him to be the Student of nature, a Missionary and Philanthropist, and gave him a frame which can bear the frosts of Iceland, or the burning heat of India. Let him avoid poisons, eat moderately, drink nothing but water, dress according to the temperature, keep his body clean by frequent ablutions, have his house well ventilated, take plenty of exercise, bridle his passions, and keep his mind cheerful, and he can arrive at a good old age, in any quarter of the globe, and almost under any circumstances.

Agriculture holds out no promise of health which cannot be obtained elsewhere, and certainly can afford no encouragement to the use of strong drink. For, granted that there is better health in the country than in the city or the factory, this is an additional argument in favour of Teetotalism, seeing it requires the very strongest constitutions to resist the ravages of alcohol, and therefore, those who are infirm, or are placed in circumstances which are likely to shorten their days, are under a solemn duty to abstain. As for eating when we are hungry, and drinking when we are thirsty, there, perhaps, cannot be a better rule. Still nature is orderly, and if we do her no violence, these appetites will be very regular. A person who drinks nothing but water, and avoids drinking with his meals, will require few dinner pills, nor will he be scourged with any unnatural craving for food. The best rule for drinking is one hour before, or three hours after a full meal. Were this law attended to, we should rarely eat too much, and thus save ourselves from gluttony, as well as drunkenness. Drunkards have destroyed their appetite for food, and created an unnatural one for drink; were they to eat only when they are hungry, they would rarely eat at all, and were they to drink when they are thirsty, they would be always intoxicated. Moderate drinkers have diseased appetites, both for food and drink, and often destroy their health and life in the vain attempt to satisfy those unnatural cravings which they have created. The only persons who can, with impunity, eat when hungry and drink when thirsty are the TEETOTALERS.

V. TEETOTALISM IS AS OLD AS CREATION, and therefore is not a "dream" of ancient or modern times. Vegetables and animals are teetotalers. The lion is not wanting in courage, the ox in strength, the elephant in vigour, or the stag in swiftness, and yet they all drink water. Refreshed from the brook, or well, the camel travels the desert, the rein-deer flees over the snow, and the eagle cuts the air. The nations of Antiquity most renowned for health, valour, longevity, and mental vigour, were teetotalers. The ruins of empires are, to a great extent, the ruins of luxury and strong drink. It is therefore not a "dream," but a plain historical fact, that Total Abstinence is older than Adam.

VI. The admission that Teetotalism is adapted TO ERADICATE THE EVILS ARISING FROM DRINKING, is a solid argument in favour of its universal adoption. One of the greatest evils of drinking is, what is falsely termed, moderation. More persons die prematurely from moderation than from drunkenness: more families also are ruined by it. And then, it is the school in which all drunkards are trained. It has no limits or boundary. It is anything, from a noggin to a gallon. Drink as much as you can, if you retain your reason and can walk without staggering, you will not be classed with drunkards, nor lose your character. Besides, moderation people dwell with eloquent emphasis on the praises of strong drink, and thus allure millions to take the fatal cup. From their ranks drunkards are multiplied, faster than reformed inebriates are added to the ranks of teetotalism. Moderation men and women send into the world at least two intemperate persons, for every single drunkard that is induced to take the pledge.

We shall, therefore, never eradicate the "evils of drinking," until we have induced the votaries of their much extolled moderate glass, to abandon the use of these poisons. MODERATION is the bulwark of drunkenness, and until we have thrown it down, our triumph must be very limited indeed.

MR WILLIAM MC. DOWELL, OF FALMOUTH.

Since we sent the last number to press, we have received an account of the death of the above named member of the Total Abstinence Society. He was thrown out of his gig, whilst on a journey from Preston home, on the 2nd January last. He died on the Saturday following; and on Friday, Jan. 12, his remains were deposited in the burial ground of the Independent chapel, Falmouth, followed by a large concourse of Teetotalers and friends, by whom the deceased was highly respected. He had been a zealous Teetotaler for upwards of ten years, always ready to assist in the advocacy of the cause, and, in every possible way, to promote its spread and prosperity. Nor was he less distinguished by his enjoyment and exemplification of genuine Christianity.

METHODISM AND TEMPERANCE.

THE MISSION OF METHODISM has been a mission for good. The name of JOHN WESLEY will ever remain associated with the revival of religion, which took place in the country, during the last century. The great society of which he was the Founder, has steadily increased, till within the last few years. The total decrease of members last year, amounted to nearly three thousand. This is deeply to be regretted, inasmuch as Methodism has conferred incalculable benefits on the lower classes of this country. Its mission has been mainly to "the masses." Various causes have been assigned for the lamentable diminution referred to, such as Emigration—Political Agitation—Commercial depression, and so forth; and no doubt these have furnished their share of the decrease. When, however, we hear of Churches bewailing their little success, or actual decrease, the thought never seems to be entertained that, through intemperance, nearly THIRTY THOUSAND persons, either refuse to join, or withdraw, or are excluded every year from the different religious bodies. How far Methodism suffers in this respect, we are not quite prepared to say, but we may safely estimate her loss to be at least one-tenth of the whole, or THREE THOUSAND yearly.

Perhaps in no religious community have the members more license to drink. Why? Because of the softening down of the rules as to the use of strong drink, and because of the indifference with which the great majority of Wesleyan Ministers regard the Temperance Movement. Nay, their indifference, in many instances, amounts to actual and open opposition. Then, again, the resolutions which the Conference passed, forbidding their Chapels to be granted for the use of Temperance meetings, has had a most injurious effect: preventing many from hearing total abstinence advocated. The members of the Methodist connexion, who have embraced teetotalism, have had, in many cases, to contend for their principles against their ministers, instead of being cheered on and encouraged by them. It is true that TABRAHAM, SHREWSBURY, COX, PRIESTLY, PUGH, and a few others, are ever found in the foremost ranks of temperance; but what are these among so many? This apathy, indifference, and opposition on the part of the Ministers, have retarded the progress of temperance in the Wesleyan body. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that cases of intemperance amongst the members are frequently occurring. In one circuit, in a comparatively short time, three or four local preachers have withdrawn, or were excluded, on account of drunkenness; and in another circuit two other local preachers fell through the same sin. Referring to the case of one of them, a Wesleyan minister said to the writer, "It is almost enough to make one become a Teetotaler." Almost enough! It was, we think, more than enough. Let the following resolutions be deeply pondered by Wesleyan ministers, which were passed at a recent meeting of the Missouri Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church: "That we view with pleasure and delight, the exertions made by the various divisions of the friends of temperance, for suppressing the use of alcoholic drinks as a beverage in these United States.

"That, as a body of Ministers, we will, by all reasonable means in our power, discountenance within our respective fields of labour, especially among the people committed to our care, the manufacture, traffic, or drinking, as a beverage, of intoxicating liquors of every kind."

If such resolutions were passed at the ensuing CONFERENCE, to be held in Manchester, we doubt not that a gratifying increase would be reported to the following Conference. But the Methodist Conference do not appear prepared to do this as yet, or the Missionary Committee would not have invited a BREWER to preside at the forthcoming Anniversary Meeting in Exeter-hall. The London Missionary Society, it is ascertained beyond doubt, committed a serious error in inviting SIR E. N. BUXTON, Bart., M.P., to take the chair at their Anniversary Meeting, a year or two since; and now the Wesleyan Missionary Society have committed the same blunder this year. Yes, SIR E. N. BUXTON is expected to take the chair at their meeting in Exeter-hall, on the 30th April! This, we hesitate not to say, will grieve many friends of WESLEYAN MISSIONS.

We speak not here of SIR E. N. BUXTON in the character of a Philanthropist, or a Christian—we simply speak of him in his occupation as a BREWER;—in other words, as a converter of wholesome grain into "liquid fire"—to assist in making six hundred thousand drunkards reel to and fro in our land—to assist in causing thirty thousand members to be expelled from the churches of Britain—and to assist in hurrying sixty thousand drunkards, every year, to an untimely and unblest grave. HE then, certainly, is not the man to preside at a Missionary Meeting.

"If any one," says the Scottish Temperance Review for December last, "would define and draw a distinction between rum and whisky, and the porter and ales manufactured by 'HANBURY, BUXTON & Co.' let him write a book.

"The honourable and benevolent baronet is interested in the circulation of the Scriptures, and in the preaching of the gospel, in those distant parts of the earth which are the abodes of horrid cruelty. It is a crime to teach a slave to read, but it is not less notorious that the agents of our Bible and Missionary Associations, are greatly hindered by the direct and indirect influence of strong drink. British sailors, captains, and merchants, are the most intemperate of their class in the world, and when they visit foreign shores, and deal in foreign markets, the influence of their drunkenness and immorality goes along with them, and from them a prejudice is derived against the white man and the gospel which he seeks to communicate and enforce. The evils which follow British drunkenness, are a more formidable barrier to the missionary and the catechist, than superstition, or caste, or any of the evils which the heathen cling to, as a reason for remaining in their present degraded condition. The baleful effects of strong drink upon the labours of JOHN WILLIAMS, in the South Sea Islands, are depicted by himself in his "Researches," and form a strong and urgent testimony against the drinking system, and present a loud call to the followers of Christ to cease connection with the accursed thing. The death of that distinguished man was the price paid to the natives of Erromanga, for the cruelty of British seamen—cruelty which is almost never dissociated from strong drink. And in various parts of the mission field, the groan and sighs of the servants of Christ are ascending into the ear of the Lord God of Sabaoth, because of the ravages of intemperance among those of whom good hope was entertained, that they had undergone the saving change, and were seeking their way to Zion, with their heart fixed upon the New Jerusalem.

These things are facts, which are fully and painfully furnished in the reports of such societies as the honourable baronet is connected with. Who does not see his anomalous and overwhelmingly painful position, and of those who, like him, are engaged in overthrowing the evils which their own trade and mode of living produce? Would it not be the wiser, the speedier, and the more satisfactory course, to undo the manufacture and sale of strong drink, and to employ the capital in trading and commerce, unstained by crime and misery, and unblighted by the sighs of widows, and wives deserted by their husbands, or by the tears of children, ragged and hungry?"

WE THINK IT WOULD!

MICHAEL YOUNG.

SONG OF THE LABOURERS.

Holy and pure is the labour sure,
 In the rugged path we're treading;
 'Twill lead us on, till the race is won,
 For 'tis ever upward leading!
 Then never shrink, for 'tis bliss to think,
 That our cause is true and holy;
 Let us persevere in our calling here,
 Be our station e'er so lowly.

Labour is love, and our deed shall prove,
 That we're moved by kindlier feeling;
 And labour is light when the heart is right,
 For 'tis only health revealing;
 By toiling hands, the record stands,
 Shall come both wealth and pleasure;
 And time will come when we find our home,
 And may claim a fadeless treasure.

In labour's way there's a sunny day,
 And the light of love thence beaming,
 Shall stretch our way to a brighter day,
 Where a richer light is streaming;
 Shall point to Heaven, where rest is given,
 To the pilgrim faint and weary,
 Shall shield from snares in the form of cares,
 That beset the soul unwary.

We'll sign the Pledge, as our privilege,
 And give the foe no quarter;
 We'll temperate be, and completely free,
 We'll drink but the bright clear water!
 Proud alcohol is doomed to fall,
 At the hand of the sons of Labour.
 We'll cast him down while we place the crown,
 On the brow of each temperate neighbour.

Labour is life! In the midst of strife,
 'Twill banish afar dark sorrow,
 'Twill calm the soul when the tempests roll,
 And 'twill gild the clouded morrow!
 'Tis a blessing fair, as our portion here,
 In gracious kindness given:
 Midst our life of care, we will labour here,
 And seek our rest but in Heaven.

THE CRIMINALITY OF INTEMPERANCE.

"See what offense from drinks arise!
 'Offense will come, the Saviour cries;
 But woe to him, who thus presents
 The stumbling-stone of just offence!"

It is said AUGUSTUS boasted that he found Rome made of bricks, and left it composed of marble. Intemperance, it is true, finds man made of base material, but inverts the Augustan order, and leaves him baser still. Anatomy, physiology, and experience, unitedly testify, that alcoholic drinks destroy the bodily of men, and Sacred history records that the soul is tumbled into ruin through them, "for no drunkard shall inherit heaven."

The fact is incontrovertible, that the victim of intemperance cannot blossom or flourish, either in this world or the next, any more than bloom can endure when cut off or separated from the branch or stem of the tree. We have heard of, and seen its ravages, and we have stood and gazed upon, and wept over, its doings. Like the feline race, it delights in torturing and agonising its prey, but defers the final bite till satiated with the tormenting apprehensions which it produces on the object of its ruinous attack. The vile monster comes not alone, but brings in its retinue other destroyers;—dreadful did they assail alone—but who being in association with it, increase and accumulate the woe which is the lot of the sinful inebriate. As the prince has his train-bearers and his appropriate suite, so intemperance is attended, generally with the following as its attache, namely—swearing, uncleanness, forgetfulness of mercies, and contempt of death. These are aggravations of his criminality, and, as such, should have their meed of reprobation. "Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men;" we remember that we shall only escape the disapprobation of God by discharging our duty, for He has said, "Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul." We would desire from the blood of our neighbours in these respects also.

When we hear the oaths and curses which belch forth from that volcano of impiety, the drunkard's mouth—we recollect that it is written—"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." We well know how that dreadful and sacred name,—a name which should be neither spoken or thought of without the greatest awe and reverence,—is abused by the drunkard. The language of Jehovah is: "I am a great king, and my name is dreadful." And he has threatened to punish severely for this sin, and that the punishment shall be temporal, corporeal, and eternal plagues and pains; "fort by reason of swearing, the land mourneth:—that is, it brings his heavy judgments upon whole nations, under which they shall weep and mourn. The prophet Zechariah has a roll of curse, containing grievous woes against the swearer, "the length thereof being twenty cubits;" it is a long catalogue, and it is described as a flying roll to denote its swiftness: it flies towards the house of the house of the guilty: it is speedy in its course. The judgements that are in it, linger not, but are in travail to be poured down upon the criminal. This full roll of hastens and enters the dwelling house of the profane, "and it shall remain therein saith the Lord;" "it shall cleave to his family, none shall clay off these words from him: and it shall consume the timber thereof, and the stones thereof;" that is, bring utter subversion, ruin, and desolation into his house. When the mouth is full of oaths, the house shall be full of curses. Woe to that wretched family into which this flying roll shall enter! "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked." The short but important sentence, "But above all things swear not," should be to them like the finger which came mysteriously forth from the wall, and wrote upon it the dreadful sentence which blanched the countenance of the impious king in the midst of his revels, and which made his knees fiercely smite each other. Drunken swearer! darest thou longer to commit that sin which thou must be conscious will bring thee under the condemnation and judgment of heaven? Do not try to know what it is for a soul, a wicked soul to be placed at the bar of God! Poor soul! how darest thou rush into the presence of the "Judge of all the earth."

To proceed with our series of criminalities arising out of intemperance the next in order is uncleanness. The Wisest of men—and to him surely deference should be paid—tell us, respecting this sin, "It is a deep ditch, into which such as are abhorred of the Lord shall fall." Evidence of the most painful kind could be adduced, were it necessary, to prove that drunken men are often guilty of falling into this deep ditch." Very many and exceedingly odious names have been put to this sin by the Spirit of God, doubtless for deterring men from its practice. It is often called lust—it is uncleanness in the abstract—filthiness—an abomination. The scriptures compare the committers of this evil to dogs: "Am I a dog's head," said Abner, "that thou chargest me with fault concerning this woman?" Job calls it "a fire that burneth to destruction." He who falls into this "deep ditch," and perishes there, may be indeed fitly called the "devil's martyr." The harlot's guests are lodged in the depths of hell. Think upon this, ye votaries of intemperance, when temptation approaches you in a smiling, smirking face. Though your wickedness may not be discovered here, there is a day when all will out, and that before men and angels! Then that which was done in secret shall "be proclaimed as upon the house top." Reader! art thou guilty? we beseech thee, speedily to repent of thy wickedness!

The third offence which is in our catalogue of the drunkard's calamities, is forgetfulness of mercies. The intemperate seem particularly insensible of the mercies which they have received from the hands of their Creator. Yes! though God has many debtors among the sons of men have dealt unfaithfully towards him—they have not rendered to the Lord according to the great things he has done for them, yet drunkards are especially under obligation to His forbearance and mercy. Despisers of mercy shall be patterns of wrath. God will not forget them hereafter, who forget him now in the midst of the participation of His benefits. Have not the intemperate sometimes had the sentence of death in themselves, through their sensual and vicious courses? Experience affirms it true. In the midst of their peril they cried for help, and the power and goodness of God were again extended to them, and they were restored from disease to health. Who was it, man, when thy body was brought low and weak, and like a crazy, rotten ship in a storm, leaked on all sides, so that not all the physicians in the world could have kept out the waters of death? consider, whose hand was it that quieted and calmed the troubled waves—careened and mended thy shattered frame, and launched thee into the world again to give thee another voyage of trial? Was it not the LORD who did all these things for thee? Did not He keep back thy soul from the pit, and thy life from perishing? Had the lamp of life been blown out at that time, the poor wretch would have gone down to endless darkness—the blackness of darkness for ever. Oh, what ungrateful beings are drunkards!

The last of the criminalities, to which we shall direct attention at present, is contempt of death. Ah! how small a matter do many that are given to strong drink make of this subject. Very little reverence or fear mark their conduct in this important matter. Every time they launch anew into the depths of intemperance they disregard the momentous concern, and subject themselves to fresh perils and death. Their abandoned conduct may in their case, as it has often done in that of others, lead to a sudden and strange alteration of their condition; from revelry, and noise, and fancied delights, to that of darkness and eternal misery. It ought to be considered how terrible death is in regard to its consequences; for it is the door of eternity—the parting point betwixt the present world and that which is to come. Oh, drunkard! think of the misery that thy worse than brutish pursuits plunges thee into, and at once, and for ever ABSTAIN. Flee, flee now from the imbrating and bedevilling power of intemperance! Many have fled and found refuge; and the doors of the city of safety stand at this moment invitingly open! Run, run, drunkard! it is for thy life; tarry not—look not behind thee in all the plain!

J. RUSSON.

A VISIT TO LONDON IN 1848.

Earth's relationships and joys, and even life itself, are uncertain. Not five short months had fled past, since a youthful couple had blended all their earthly interest in matrimony; nearly four of which, wasting affliction preyed upon the "weaker" form; when the post bore the painful intelligence that all their sanguine hopes were blighted. Such was the will of God! Happily, Religion was their mutual solace.

It was a beautiful afternoon in April, when a journey of more than 200 miles was commenced, to soothe the rent heart of the bereaved and shed a tear over the youthful corpse. An old-fashioned vehicle, called a coach, was the first mode of conveyance. It was soon seen that a meanly clad and weather-beaten fellow passenger, had swallowed scores of pounds in the form of strong drink. Free conversation seemed to make little impression. "He would drink as long as he could get it, and leave the future to care for itself. And as to the next world, he should take his chance in the crowd."

In a city in the north, where the night was spent, we listened with intense interest to the thrilling eloquence of two gifted speakers at a Missionary meeting, who urged self-denial in wealth, plate, luxuries, &c., upon the Rich, with a plainness of speech and a heartiness of manner, which proved they, at least, were not afraid to speak the truth to "ears polite." Their speeches would have told well in favour of abstinence from wine, &c.

Next day, as we darted along the rail, the zeal and perseverance of a devoted temperance gentleman, sought to convert to his safe views, fellow passengers of both sexes. Nor will all the seed be lost, though apparently sown in an unprofitable soil. What an example to saints and sinners was this friend! He shall have his reward!

The manner of conducting this funeral was honourable to the abstaining and religious principles of the parties concerned. An angel might have been there uninjured. Yea, the God of angels was spiritually present! When will christians cease to desecrate funeral rites, by the fumes of tobacco and the use of intoxicating liquor? Surely the house of mourning is not a fitting place for clouds of smoke, exciting liquor, and free talk on common topics! When will men become wise!

London presented its usual scenes, and among these, and prominently also, was Intemperance. In numerous localities, and with few and short interruptions, this might be witnessed during the whole of the 24 hours of day and night, and the 365 days of the year. Alas! for London. The scene is sickening to the sober heart.

In a splendid and well-filled Hall, we listened with increasing interest for hours, to statements and arguments in favour of preaching the gospel to every creature, and sighed over the mournful fact, that millions ask for the gospel, and christians allow them to ask in vain! When, O, when will the church deny herself of even intoxicating drink, to send the water of life to a thirsty world.

A circumstance we noticed led us to hope that even this better day was coming. Behind the ample chair occupied by the president of the meeting, as if unfit to meet his eye, much less the gaze of the multitude, and possibly not meant to be used, stood two decanters of wine. They stood unheeded, but those containing the unpoisoned water were in frequent requisition, and not a few paid, possibly, an unthought of homage to our principles. Why they were placed there is not for us to guess. Nor are we certain that they contained wine. They might be imitation decanters. In either case, they were not obtruded upon public notice. They were more than half hidden. They were not touched. We may hope they will soon disappear. Adam's wine, pure water, was preferred to the modern "moeker," called wine.

We wish it were in our power to say that rural life is untainted by the foul breath of intemperance; but alas, it almost vies with the city: and the misery of town and country, through INTEMPERANCE, should move all lovers of their race, to the most determined efforts to dry up this source of nine-tenths of our National evil. Would all become "Abstainers!" the mighty work is accomplished.

THE COMPARATIVE DEGREE.

Some time ago, a party of friends who had just returned from a Missionary meeting, were discussing the propriety of using the comparative degree, in expressing the superiority or inferiority of one of two things, or of two aggregates. A Teetotaler who formed part of the company was asked for his opinion; he decided in favour of the comparative degree. "Why," said a warm-hearted friend to the missionary cause, and a pleader for the moderate use of intoxicating drinks,—“here,” pointing to the decanters, “are two sorts of wine; is it correct to say this is the good sort, and that is the better?” “No,” said the teetotaler, “it is not proper to say so; you should say, this is the bad and that is the worse;—none on the table, I perceive, is deficient in the intoxicating principle, therefore it cannot be good. It is red—it giveth his colour in the cup—it moveth itself aright; drink freely of it, and you will find that it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.” Therefore I contend it can be neither good, better, nor best, but the antipodes of it, i.e., bad, worse, worst.”

FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!

SOME time ago we were greatly interested in witnessing some Fire Engines, as they dashed along through some streets of the metropolis. The handles of the engines were firmly grasped by men who were pulling in right good earnest, now and then giving a hearty shout. A few more were at the end of the engines, pushing with all their strength, and cheering and urging on their brave companions, as they beheld the sky crimsoned by the reflection of the fiery element. At the same time we observed a number of persons running near the sides of the engines, hallowing, "Fire! fire!" and "Go it! go it!" but never putting hand to the engines, nor assisting to clear the way before those who pulled and pushed so bravely. In fact, they appeared to us rather to increase the alarm, and to create impediment and confusion.

No sooner had the engines arrived at the dangerous scene of action, than the noisy, cowardly fellows, to whom we have alluded, drew back. The hoses were fastened to the water plugs; the engines were rapidly filled; the fire-brigade men applied themselves manfully to the pumps; and copious streams of water were brought to bear upon the devouring flame. Thick black clouds issued from the building, and pieces of blazing timber were continually breaking away. Still the brigade-men fearlessly kept to the pumps: finding, however, after long exertion, that their physical powers were almost exhausted, they called to the spectators for assistance, who cowardly dropped their heads, and walked away, fearful of being exposed to a little danger, and of encountering some trifling detriment.

Suddenly there appeared, at the window of the second floor, a frantic young mother, holding out a sweet infant, and crying in piercing strains,— "Save my child! save my only babe!" The flames were rapidly reaching the window, and shower of sparks were descending in every direction. Some respectable persons on the first floor on the opposite side of the way, cried out to the brigade-men,— "Why don't you rescue the mother and child?" The people below vociferated, "Why don't you fetch the escape ladder?" But neither of these classes did any thing more than remonstrate or increase the alarm. They would run no risk, they would make no sacrifice, to save the perishing or to aid the firemen.

The Escapes, however, were quickly obtained, and placed against the crumbling edifice. The heroic brigade-men, in defiance of surrounding danger, ascended the ladder. Volumes of smoke suddenly shut them out from human gaze. An awful suspense, a trembling silence, pervaded the dense crowd. "Poor men!" said some, "what peril they encounter to save life and property." "They are a fine body of men," said others; "how united and daring they are in the prosecution of their arduous duties. They deserve the praises of the whole community." A sudden gust of wind cleared away the smoke. The firemen appeared, descending, and bearing the mother and child, exclaiming, "Thank God! they are saved! they are unhurt!" The people received them with loud cheers and hearty congratulations. The fire was gradually subdued. The populace one by one moved away; and all excitement and interest soon subdued.

These Fire-Brigade-men have saved a vast amount of property, and hundreds of useful, precious lives.

We have regarded this as an appropriate emblem of the Temperance Movement. The TEMPERANCE ENGINE is rushing along to save property,—aye—and the souls and bodies of those who are suffering from the fires of Alcohol. A great number of persons run alongside of the engine: these are styled, "Moderate drinkers." These shout, and attract a considerable degree of attention. But when we examine their conduct more narrowly, we find that though they make a great deal more noise than other people, they never pull at the engine; they shrink away when called upon to assist in extinguishing the consuming fire of intemperance, and exert no influence to promote the sacred work of human regeneration.

There is another class. These sit on the first floor of self security and self righteousness, on the opposite side of the way. They distinctly perceive that the fires of strong drink are appallingly destructive;—bowing down the aged and venerable—enfeebling the hale and strong—cursing the young and beautiful—stirring up discord and strife—planting the seeds of disease and premature death—generating madness, destitution, and crime; in a word, blasting and scattering not only the outer but the inner man, impressing on every attribute and element of man's immortal nature its own hideous likeness, so that no painting, however frightful its colourings or inordinate its proportions, however darkened or tinged with blood, can form its appropriate symbol. All these very respectable persons cannot but see, yet they look coldly on, and proffer no assistance! Nay, they indignantly find fault with the instrumentality which others employ for the rescue of the miserable victims. They censure the zeal of the teetotal brigade; they criticise the construction of the engine; they complain loudly of the quantity of cold water which it throws out.

Now here, we Teetotalers think that we have just ground for complaint. How is it that these respectable men—these Ministers of the Cross—these lights of the world, who should be first and foremost in every intellectual, benevolent and moral movement;—how is it, we say, that these, avowedly Christian Philanthropists, do not introduce a more perfect apparatus for quenching the fires of Intemperance! God knows, the fires of Alcohol are burning fiercely in every part of our country, and every man is loudly called upon to labour. If these possessors of Christianity were possessors of Christ's self-denying spirit, they would surely manifest their sympathy for poor dying drunkards—their desire to restore marred humanity—their prayerful anxiety to bring souls to the feet of Jesus, and to glorify the Triune Jehovah—by dashing aside the poison-cup, and by proclaiming, with the boldness of apostles, from the pulpit and from the platform, the transcendent blessings which Total Abstinence scatters with angel-hand along the whole of its course.

Some persons there are, who when they hear the cry of "Fire! fire!" very coolly ask, "In what direction?" and if it be not near them, they turn away, congratulating themselves, and wholly indifferent as to the misfortune of their neighbours. Like these persons are moderate drinkers, who care little for the raging of the fires of Alcohol, so they themselves are not burned. Their relations and neighbours are suffering, but "no matter; it is not my house, so let it burn on." Others there are, such is the curiosity common to our nature, who will run with all their might to see the fire burning, while they never lend a hand to assist in putting it out. So there are many who run to see a poor drunkard in the streets; and though they perceive the fires of Alcohol coursing through his whole frame, yet they care not. They witness his distress, but stretch out no Samaritan's hand to save him. They look on, but, in the spirit of the Priest and the Levite, they pass on, and leave him to perish in his sins and in his blood! Life may be lost at the fire; mothers, children, husbands, fathers, brothers, sisters, may be consumed; but moderate drinkers care not, it is not their lives that are exposed to hazard or destruction. Souls—immortal souls—may be crushed; but drinking professors care not, so it be not their souls. But their carelessness is ill timed; for, ah! how often are the heartless lookers-on caught by some falling wall, and crushed before they were aware that danger was nigh! and how often are the self-complacent sunders-afar-off from the Temperance movement, caught in the snare by their very listlessness, and lost ere they can flee for safety! Oh, how much better would it have been for them, had they assisted at the engine, and aimed to put out the fire!

We want no noisy moderate drinkers to annoy us by constantly crying out, "Go on! Go on!" running by the side of the Temperance Engine, marking our public movements, but never doing any of the work. We want no idle drones to hang on the engine, and rather keep it back than propel it forward. We want no timid compromising men, who dare not face the raging fire; but resolute, intelligent, faithful, honest, hard-working men, who will pull or pump, or raise the escape, or climb the burning ruins, or do any thing that circumstances call for. We want more BUCKINGHAMS, MATHEWS, TEARES, PARSON'S, GRINDRODS, BURNS, GREENS, and such like; plenty of men who are always ready, forthcoming, and faithful—not on one day, merely, but on every day. By such a noble Brigade, the Temperance Engine will be urged forward, and worked, until, with its blessed element of COLD WATER, it extinguishes every vestige of the fires of Alcohol; and a glad and grateful band of the redeemed shall shout the notes of joy and praise, as they behold the last flickering spark expire, never more to be rekindled.

"FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!" "Where?" In this very neighbourhood! Drunkards are perishing; their wives are perishing; their children are perishing, and who will come to the rescue!

"FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!" The Drunkard is on fire! His mind is on fire; his property is on fire; his body is on fire; his soul will soon be on fire! And who will assist at the Engine? Who will ascend the Escapes? Who will stand against the element, and aim to pluck the brand from the burning? Who? Whosoever will, let him come manfully forward. First sign the Teetotal pledge, and then go out in every direction, and fearlessly enforce the claims of Teetotalism. The blessings of those who were ready to perish shall come upon you, and generations yet unborn will rise and call you blessed!

London, March 20, 1849.

TOBACCO.

BY H. MUDGE.

I regard this subject as a branch of the Temperance question; and though abstinence from the strong weed is by no means so important as abstinence from strong drink, yet I think it deserves occasional notice. My attention is just now directed to it by a note of which the following is a copy:—

"Barnsley, March 1, 1849.

"SIR;—Tobacco seems to be the dear creature. Medical men recommend it for the cure of indigestion. People say that they have not had so much occasion for doctors since they began to use Tobacco. Painters say that when flattening they should fall from the scaffold senseless, but that by using Tobacco they are enabled to maintain their position manfully. Plumbers, too, say that they have the cholice if they do not use Tobacco. Yet I can see that both health and morals are rapidly on the decline from its use. An explanation from you through the medium of the Teetotal Times will greatly oblige,

"AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER."

I reply, the best key to solve these difficulties that I ever found, is the 20th verse of the 44th chapter of Isaiah, "He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?"

Any medical man who prescribes it for indigestion must be too ignorant to comprehend a reason to the contrary; so as far as he is concerned 'tis of no service to offer one; and those who think themselves better in health from its use must leave it off to learn their mistake. I have known smoking to make thousands of heads giddy, but not one steady; and as to cholice from handling lead, the proper preventive is a few drops of diluted sulphuric acid taken in a little clear water daily; a practise as innocent, wholesome, and cleanly, as Tobacco chewing or smoking is wicked, injurious and filthy.

'No longer we join, while sinners invite,
Nor envy the swine, their brutish delight.'

That health and morals should decline and die under the influence of this stupefying drug is not to be wondered at; inasmuch as it paralyses the brain, and hardens the heart; and this mischief is of fearful extent, if we may judge from the number of sellers and the quantity consumed, the former being in the British Isles two hundred and two thousand; the latter being six thousand one hundred and twenty tons annually, at a cost of about three millions of pounds sterling!

What can we hope for to correct the evil? Various attempts by writing, imposts, and even bodily punishments having been made to restrict and put down the use of Tobacco; upwards of a hundred volumes having been written to condemn it, and Popes having gone so far as to issue Bulls against it, and all without avail; what more can be done? I answer, let CHRISTIAN LOVE more sternly frown upon it; and let it be clearly understood that a Stunkard is near relation to a Drunkard;

Drink, drank, drunk, druck-hard, Drunkard.
Stink, stank, stunk, stunk-hard, Stunkard.

If the "Anxious Inquirer" will send me his address, I will forward him a tract or two; meanwhile I submit to his notice an extract from the letter of a young lady, a correspondent of mine, just remarking first that the serious part of her father's ailments was Epileptic Fits, on account of which he consulted several eminent medical practitioners to no purpose: "My father," says this lady, "commenced smoking about forty years since; and continued the practice, indeed I may say the slavery, for thirty years, at which period he was nearly sixty. He was in the habit of using two ounces a week; for consuming which he generally had the pipe, a little black one about two inches long, in his mouth. When about fifty, my father's health began to decline, but he did not then know to what to attribute it: at length he thought of his use of that pernicious weed Tobacco. After some consideration, he was induced to lay aside his idol, and he has had no reason to regret it, for though now near seventy years of age, he never enjoyed better health in his life than he does at present."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

UNION OF EFFORT FOR THE METROPOLIS AND SUBURBS.—The conversations which took place at the meetings referred to in our last, have issued in the unanimous adoption of a series of resolutions, as follows:—

"That it is desirable and important that those who are engaged in promoting the same great object, should know each other, and be acquainted with each other's movements, in order that there may be uniformity and consistency in their operations. Hence, in consequence of the scattered localities of the several Metropolitan and Suburban Societies, it is necessary that the secretaries and most active members of such societies, should meet occasionally for mutual recognition—for friendly intercourse—for reporting the progress of the cause—and for considering the best modes of operation.

"That as movements are frequently taking place which require appeals to the legislature, or special public meetings, it is important that the friends and promoters of the Temperance cause, should combine for the purpose of giving due interest and effect to such appeals, and to such meetings; and that, for these purposes also, it is important that they should meet, for mutual communication, and for mutual counsel.

"That as aggregate meetings, festivals, excursions, and other modes of attracting public attention, are effective and influential in proportion to the exertions they combine, and the numbers collected together; it is necessary that the executives of different societies should occasionally meet, for the purpose of making suitable arrangements.

"That for these, and other reasons, it is necessary that a Monthly Meeting should be held, to be called, "THE TEETOTAL CONFERENCE." Any three members being at liberty to convene (intermediate meetings, should such meetings appear to them to be required by circumstances.

"That no pecuniary liabilities shall be incurred by this conference; any expense arising out of the issuing notices or circulars, to be defrayed by small subscriptions among the members of the meeting at which such notices or circulars may be determined upon."

The next meeting of "THE TEETOTAL CONFERENCE" will take place on Wednesday evening, April 4th, at Mrs. Watts' Temperance Hotel, Catherine Street, Strand; at seven o'clock.

FITZROY AND MARYLEBONE.—We understand that the Temperance Hall, Little Portland Street, Regent Street, which has been closed for extensive repairs and alterations, is to be re-opened on the 6th of April, on the afternoon of the day called GOOD FRIDAY.

RECHABITISM.

The members of the city of Westminster Tent I.O.R., London Unity, held an interesting and respectable tea party in the Temperance Hall, Broadway, Westminster, on Monday 12th March. Bro. J. Bowler presided. Argumentative and eloquent addresses were delivered in behalf of the Order and the principles of Teetotalism, by Bros. A. E. Croate, D. Walford, J. H. Esterbrooke, J. Mc. Curry, and T. A. Smith, Chief Secretary. The several speeches were listened to with great attention and repeatedly cheered; and we believe a healthy impulse has been imparted to the valuable Order, which is in a prosperous and harmonious condition.

In England there is no association of men that possesses so much moral power, diffuses around them so happy and salubrious an influence, and proves such a mighty bulwark to Teetotalism, as the sons and daughters of Rechab. Their Order is purely benevolent. Charity—holy charity, is the bond that binds and unites them. It is to promote the spirit of brotherhood, to relieve the fallen and distressed, to administer to the wants and necessities of afflicted brothers, to cast the mantle of sympathy and care around the widow, the orphan and the fatherless, to lessen the sorrows of the dying with the sweet consolations of religion, and to contribute to the interment of their last remains in the silent tomb. Each brother is pledged to his sacred work; and, what can be more sublime and christian than unceasing endeavours to relieve wretchedness—to pour light upon the understanding—to shed comfort over the home of the toiling, and lead men to terrestrial happiness, and celestial glory.

Rechabism seeks to preserve those whom Temperance gains; it is preeminently suited for this grand purpose; and therefore has claims to the support of true temperance men. Let every son and daughter of Adam become Teetotalers, and let all Teetotalers become Rechabites in earnest, and the prayers of millions that were ready to perish will be upon them, and nations yet unborn, "shall call them blessed."

The flower with brightest tints arrayed,
Before an other hour may fade,
And in the dust its stem be laid;
Crushed by the wrathful storm.

Thus suddenly, may mortals fall,
Death's summons is addressed to all,
And they who hear the solemn call,
Must instantly conform.

Oh! be it our immediate care,
To seek by fervent constant prayer,
The promised grace of God to share,
That so prepared to die;—

Whenever we are called away,
Tho' clay unite with kindred clay,
Our souls may mount to cloudless day,
To never fading joy.

Bro. J. H. Esterbrooke, I.O.R.L.U.

WELWYN, HERTS.

Great Northern Railway District, No. 2.

A railway through the above named place is in operation, and the company have provided a Minister to preach to the labourers. He has a chapel built in one of the Brickfields, where there are about eighteen huts or houses, for the labourers. He preaches there twice a-week; once a-week at two other brickfields, and once a-week at the timber-yard. We determined, also, after serious deliberations, to form a Teetotal Society. February 1st, we had our first meeting in the little chapel above named. The chair was taken by Mr. Jackson, of Tewin, a Hertfordshire farmer, who has been a Teetotaler for nine years. The Rev. Mr. Dunford, the railway minister, opened the meeting, with singing and prayer, after which appropriate addresses were delivered by the Chairman, the Rev. Mr. Dunford, Mr. Wilmot, Mr. Belton, and Mr. G. Smith. About 40 out of the 70 inhabitants attended, and 17 signed the pledge.

We held a second meeting on the 8th of February, when about 30 attended, three of whom signed the pledge. On the 22nd a third meeting was held, when about 40 attended, and four signed the pledge. Another meeting was held March 8, with good effect. We trust these efforts will be productive of much good. It was encouraging to observe the orderly conduct and good attention of the labourers.

G. SMITH.

DARTFORD, KENT.

The Temperance cause is progressing in this locality, which has long been celebrated for the extensive manufacture of two of the most powerful agencies for the destruction of Human Life, namely Gunpowder and Alcohol, but now there is formed a society for the preservation of life, based on true Temperance Principles. On the 14th of February this society held its first anniversary, when a company of friends from Shoreham favoured us with their presence and support. Tea was provided in the Baptist chapel which was well filled. After Tea the company repaired to the Independent Chapel, kindly lent for the Public Meeting. Mr. PARKS the chairman, made some preliminary remarks, after which, the Report was read by the Secretary. Mr. T. A. Smith, from London, who was engaged to deliver 2 Lectures on the Physiological Properties of Intoxicating Liquors, soon rivetted the attention of a large and respectable audience whilst illustrating his subject by diagrams, Anatomical Drawings, and experiments. On the 15th, the 2nd Lecture was delivered in the Baptist chapel, when Mr. T. A. Smith, treated on the effects of alcohol on the Heart's action on the circulation of the Blood, Respiration, &c.; at the close of these Lectures fifteen persons signed the pledge.

The committee have a Rule requesting every member to purchase at least one Monthly Temperance Periodical in order that the mind may be well informed on the subject, this has already led to a demand for a goodly number of the TETOTAL TIMES, which we hope may soon be increased tenfold.

J. J.

WOODSTOCK.

The teachers of the Sunday School in connection with the Baptist chapel, Woodstock, felt it their duty to bring publicly before the elder scholars of the school, the subject of total abstinence, being convinced that it was fully in accordance with the Scriptures; several of the teachers being strong advocates of the cause, especially our superintendent. In order to carry out our plans, we proposed giving a Tea Meeting on Monday evening, the 19th Feb. to all who had attained the age of 10 years and upwards, consequently we had a goodly number; several friends who were favourable to the cause, graced the meeting with their presence. The superintendent having ably laid before the children the objects of the meeting and the principles of Total Abstinence, no fewer than 23 boys and girls from 10 to 16 years of age, came forward voluntarily and pledged themselves to abstain from all intoxicating drinks. We trust that God will give them power to abstain for ever from an evil which brings in its train poverty, disease, ruin and death. The meeting was afterwards gratified by several able speeches, and the company separated highly pleased with the proceedings of the evening. Several tracts were distributed, and monthly meetings are to be continued to advocate the cause of humanity and religion in the town and neighbourhood. The monthly meetings are to be teetotal in every sense of the word.

ROBERT NOBLE.

DEVONPORT.

The good cause of Temperance is making headway here. Our committee have secured the services of the Rev. R. G. MASON, who commenced his lectures by preaching on the Sabbath in the Baptist and Independent chapels to large congregations. On the Monday following he lectured in our spacious Town Hall, to a large assembly. On Tuesday in a very large school room; on Wednesday, our Festival took place in the Market, being the largest place in the Town. Between 700 and 800 sat down to tea, after which a meeting was held at which about 1000 persons were present (all having paid for admission). It was addressed by their Secretary, Revs. Pyer, (Chairman), Rogers, Micklewood, Burgess, Reed, Webster, Peany, R. G. Mason; and broke up at a late hour. On Thursday, Mr. Mason lectured in the Baptist chapel, Stonehouse, to a large company, and Friday, he left to labour in the North of Cornwall. These meetings have created a considerable sensation. The Rev. W. Wight is about to give us an account of the proposed "MODEL PARISH." The Mayor has kindly consented to preside. We have an interesting Society, a Juvenile Society, and village Societies in our neighbourhood, worked by speakers from our town; and we expect shortly to lay the foundation of our "Temperance Hall and Hotel;" we hope also soon to employ a temperance missionary in this town and neighbourhood.

J. RYAN, Secretary.

WOLLASTON.

A Temperance Tea Meeting was recently held in this village, upwards of 40 partook of the cheering cup; a pleasing interchange of humour and intelligence was a leading feature in this harmonious gathering. After tea several favourite tunes were sung with admirable effect, and soon after 7 o'clock, the commodious room (cordially and gratuitously allowed us, by the Clergyman and churchwardens of the parish), was densely crowded. Many of "the sons of toil" were there, and evinced their desire for light by giving unremitting attention. Mr. BEARNS, of Wellingborough, occupied the chair, and opened the meeting in a kind and conciliatory speech, characterized by good sense and moral intrepidity. Mr. BRANTLEY, of Yardley Hastings, narrated his experience, and supplied facts as to the validity of total abstinence principles. The Rev. T. LORD, of Brigstock, addressed the meeting for upwards of an hour, argumentatively, eloquently, and gratuitously. After a few words from the chairman, and a vote of thanks for the use of the room, the Meeting separated in a quiet and orderly manner.

CHAS. SIBLEY.

LEEK, STAFFORDSHIRE.

Four very interesting meetings have recently been held in the Temperance Hall. On two of the evenings, Mrs. THEOBALD gave us two impressive lectures; at the close 12 persons signed the pledge. On another of the evenings Mr. STONLEIGH, delivered an argumentative and practical address, at the close of which two signatures were obtained. On Saturday the Hall was crowded to overflowing, when Mrs. THEOBALD pointed out the sad consequences resulting from drunkenness, and the evil consequences of moderate drinking, and concluded with a powerful appeal to professing christians to render their aid to the temperance reformation. At the close 11 signatures were obtained.

C. TRAFFORD, Secretary.

WANTAGE, BERKS.

A lecture was delivered by Mr. INWARDS, in the Town Hall, last week, which drew a large and respectable assembly. The lecturer's observations were forcible, argumentative, yet charitable, and during the hour and half of its delivery the most respectful attention was manifested by the whole assembly who seemed anxious for information, many of them having never before heard a lecture on the subject. At the close, a vote of thanks was awarded Mr. INWARDS, and also to those gentlemen of the town who had so kindly obliged them with the use of the hall. A liberal collection was made in aid of the society, and upwards of twenty names enrolled in the pledge book.

BOLTON.

The fourteenth anniversary of the establishment of the "Bolton Youth's Temperance Society," was recently celebrated by a tea party and public meeting in the Temperance Hall. R. Knowles, Esq., of Bolton, presided, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Nolan, of Manchester; J. Macmichel, of Farnworth; J. Townend, of Rochdale; and Mr. J. Bormond. The speech of Dr. Nolan, who has but recently declared himself a Teetotaler, excited very considerable interest.

HULL.

A public meeting, convened by the Christian Temperance Society, has been held in the Music Hall, Jarratt Street, for the purpose of proposing measures for the erection of a monument over the grave of the late Dr. Gordon. The memory of the deceased gentleman was commemorated by each of the speakers in very high terms.

HUDDERSFIELD.

Two meetings of the Temperance Society have recently been held in the Philosophical Hall. At the first, the Rev. W. J. Shrewsbury, Wesleyan Minister, presided, and pressed home the truth, that total abstinence being a general good, was good also for individuals, and that every person would do well to adopt it. Mr. Lomax, of Manchester, delivered a very effective address, and many persons signed the pledge. At the second meeting, March 8th, W. Morris, Esq., of Manchester, presided. He shewed in a lucid speech, how Teetotalism was benefiting the working classes. He had witnessed it in his own manufactory, where about a thousand hands were employed, the majority were Teetotalers. Mr. Lomax addressed the meeting at considerable length, at the close several persons signed the total abstinence pledge.—Wesleyan Times.

BEDLINGTON, NORTHUMBERLAND.

The principles of true temperance are rapidly progressing in this populous and thriving village. About fourteen months ago, the society was re-organized; and since then nearly two hundred names have been added to the pledge. On the 5th and 6th of March, the committee procured the services of the Rev. J. IRVINE WHITE, of Glasgow, who delivered two valuable lectures on Physiology, illustrated with beautiful diagrams, to crowded audiences which have given a fresh impulse to the cause.

Ministerial support and opposition—The respected vicar of the parish subscribes to our funds, though he is not a total abstainer. Shortly after the reconstruction of our society, the Presbyterian Minister became a convert to our principles, and has since laboured zealously and successfully to promote our cause. The Pastor of one of the Baptist churches, too, has joined us; but the WESLEYAN Minister deigns to favour us with a scoff or a jeer! notwithstanding many of our active members belong to the Methodist connexion.

Instances of good.—About twelve months since a poor Inebriate signed our pledge. We took him kindly by the hand—he remained steadfast—he sought and found salvation through the merits of a crucified Redeemer—joined the Methodist society, and is now a useful prayer-leader and a devoted sabbath school teacher. Another, who had well nigh broken the heart of his wife, owing to his intemperate habits, joined us about the same time. He is now quite a reformed man. His children are sent to the sabbath school, and he himself regularly attends the ministry of the Established Church. So much for Teetotalism not being opposed to the Gospel.

Means of Preservation and Improvement.—Many who have joined us being members of benefit societies established at Public-houses, it was found that a strong temptation was presented to violate their pledge, when they went to pay their subscription, on account of being pressed by their late boon-companions "just to take a glass."

It was therefore deemed desirable to form a benefit society apart from the public-house, and thus throw a safeguard around many who had been rescued from the path of intemperance. The society thus established is now in a flourishing state. A Reading-room is also in course of formation.

Our prospect for the future.—Many of the intelligent young men, and nearly every sabbath school teacher in the village have joined us. Their example and instruction must tell with effect on the mind of the juvenile population; and we therefore cherish the hope that the generation rising up will be more exemplary and virtuous than the generation passing away. Amid all our success, we have had to encounter no small share of opposition, especially from certain "professors of religion;" but believing our cause to be based on truth, and looking at what our principles have already achieved, we arm ourselves afresh for the conflict, and "thank God, and take courage."

NORTH SHIELDS. 1849

On Thursday, March 8, a grand demonstration of the Lynemouth Temperance Society, was given in the Assembly Rooms. Nearly six hundred were present. Mr. Pyle, surgeon, having been called to the chair, briefly introduced the subject of the meeting. He was followed by Mr. R. Cook, with the temperance song, "We'll win the day." Mr. G. Charlton, delivered an address, touching chiefly on the political bearings of the question, and the influence which the enlightened and thrifty teetotalers would have on the government of the country. Mr. Simpson then gave, "I'm at home," accompanying himself on the piano-forte. "Life of the good and brave," and Russel's song, "The dream of the Reveller." Mr. T. I. White, the agent of the association, combatted the objections generally urged against the system. Mr. T. Wileko referred chiefly to our penal settlements and Lord Grey's proposed bill. He thought that if his Lordship would undertake some scheme for the diminution of public-houses, and the spread of education at home, there would be less need for an extension of the penal districts abroad. Mr. J. Hill played a number of pleasing airs on his musical glasses, and was followed by R. Clasper, keelman, who, in a very amusing speech, referred to his own thirteen years experience of teetotalism, which he designated a "Newcastle clagger" in favour of the principle. Mr. V. Ward followed with a song, "I love it, I love it, my own fireside." Mr. Middlemas referred to the growing influence and brightening prospects of the temperance cause. Mr. Graham gave, in good style, "The Englishman," which was enthusiastically encored. Mr. Buchanan, the ladies' missionary, in a short address, urged the attention of the ladies to the subject of temperance, citing the examples of Mrs. Dalgarnie, Mrs. Jackson and others. Mr. Little followed with "The soldier's tear." He was succeeded by Mr. R. H. Haggie, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Strachan, and Mr. Elliott, of Earsdon, who pleased the company highly with his discharge of truth and wit. In the course of the proceedings, Mr. Lillie, in the name of the society, rose, and, after paying a high compliment to his industry and worth, presented to Mr. Johnson a patent lever watch, with suitable appendages, manufactured by Messrs Wm. Rennison and Son, as a tribute of respect and esteem. It bore the following inscription:—"Presented by the Tynemouth Total Abstinence Society, as a token of respect and esteem to Mr. W. E. Johnson, for his able and unceasing exertions as honorary secretary to the above society." The compliment was acknowledged by Mr. Johnson in suitable terms. Votes of thanks to the ladies for their gratuitous supply of tea, to the musicians for their excellent strains, and to the chairman for his conduct, were given with éclat, and concluded the evening's festivities.

GUERNSEY.

On Monday, Feb 26, the Members of the Guernsey Temperance Society partook of a social cup of Tea in their beautiful Hall, when upwards of 200 sat down.

It was a pleasing and interesting sight to see such an assemblage of persons, of different ages and conditions, who had signed the pledge of Total Abstinence from the use of those beverages, which tend to sink men below the brute beast. The scene was calculated to inspire every heart with joy and gratitude to the giver of all good.

The Tea being over, the tables cleared, and the company seated, the platform was taken possession of by the president, Dr. Collette, Rev. W. Wild, Independent Minister, Rev. S. Spurgeon, Baptist Minister, Revs. W. Hicks, Mr. Hineks, Bible Christian Ministers, and other friends.

The meeting was opened by the president in a short speech, congratulating the company on their number and respectable appearance, and urging them to increased efforts in the cause they had espoused. The Secretary gave a statement of the Society's operations and finances.

The Rev. W. Wild hinted, that although we were met in a splendid Hall, it was not yet paid for, and called upon Teetotalers to liquidate the debt which still remained. Several persons addressed the meeting, both from the platform and the body of the Hall.

The following resolutions were adopted:—

1st, That the Town be divided into districts, and a person appointed to each district, to visit and receive contributions from all who could afford to give, which would also enable the Society to ascertain the state of things generally among the people.

2nd, That the committee solicit the assistance of influential and benevolent gentlemen to aid in the suppression of intemperance.

3rd, That a petition be presented by this society to the Royal Court, expressive of their approbation of their late act in prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks on the sabbath, praying that it may be perpetuated.

About 70 persons present gave in their names as subscribers from 2d. to 3d. per week, who are to be called upon by the visitors weekly, a means it is hoped, which will unite the members more closely together, and identify them more fully with the committee and its operations.

Votes of thanks were given to the officers and committee for the past year, especially to the ladies for the efficient manner they had got up the last bazaar, and for the handsome sum they had handed over to the Treasurer. The officers were nominated and elected for the ensuing year. Expressions of satisfaction and good feeling were universal.

CARLISLE.

A Bazaar, for the benefit of the Temperance cause, has been opened in the Assembly room of the Athæneum, and has been visited by a great number of influential ladies and gentlemen residing in Carlisle and the neighbourhood. Most of the articles were sold, and upwards of £60 have, by these means, been added to the funds of the Society. Some lectures by Mr. Hood were well attended, as was also a Temperance Soirée. About 200 persons sat down to tea, and when the doors were afterwards thrown open, an audience of nearly 500 persons was collected. Mr. Hudson Scott presided, and an address on "Woman the Reformer," was delivered by Mr. Hood.

TRUE HAPPINESS.—There is no man really happy in this life who has not a well-founded hope of happiness in the next.

THE LIVING TESTIMONY.—Celestial truth is a jewel in a pix, but which, unless it be worn by its possessor, might as well have rested in its quarry.—Isaac Taylor.

NEW PUBLICATION.

JUVENILE DEPRAVITY. £100 Prize Essay. By REV. HENRY WORSLEY, M.A., Rector of Easton, Suffolk.
London: C. Gilpin.

Juvenile Depravity has, of late, been manifested in this country, in such frightful phases, and to such an alarming and dangerous extent, that it is high time minute enquiry should be made into its causes, and an effectual remedy applied. With the hope of accomplishing both these objects, a benevolent member of the Society of Friends offered a premium of one hundred pounds for the best Essay on the subject. It appears that there were fifty-two competitors; and the adjudicators (the Rev. C. J. VAUGHAN, D.D., the Rev. JOHN HARRIS, D.D.; and the Rev. JAMES SHERMAN) state that they had "no hesitation in giving the preference to this Essay," though some of the others were found to be elaborate and valuable, and worthy of publication.

The Essay is divided into six chapters: Chapter I.—Statistics of crime—Particularly juvenile—Increase of education considered, &c.—Chapter II.—Condition of labouring classes before the era of manufactures—Altered circumstances at the present day—Rise of manufactures—Effects on rural districts—on country gentlemen—on farming class—Altered relation of labourers—Natural results, bad habits, drunkenness, crime, &c.—Chapter III.—Strong tendencies in the system of manufactures to moral evil—Particularly drunkenness—Aggravated by neglect of proprietors—Situation of a child at a manufacturing town supposed—Extracts from Parliamentary Reports which throw light upon the general moral condition of such towns—Coincidence of view, as regards the general position of the Essay, on the part of Joseph Fletcher, Esq.—Instances of ninety-one juvenile delinquents in Liverpool—Comparison as to state of crime in agricultural and manufacturing districts.—Chapter IV.—Prominent features in the present condition of society—Causes of the increase of drunkenness—In what way drunkenness is the cause of crime—Remote consequences of drunkenness—Connexion between drunkenness and crime—Between a parent's intemperance and his child's crime—Cases of twenty juvenile offenders—Connexion between drunkenness and female crime—Prostitution—Sanitary evils—Improvement in Ireland, &c. Two important questions answered—Chapter V.—Reason for education more particularly at the present time.—Duties of the Legislature—Of proprietors—And of the mass of the people.—Chapter VI.—Past remedies considered—Reason of their failure—Three conditions necessary to the success of any proposed remedy—Gradual approximation to the true reformatory measure—Its discovery and proclamation—A cure and preventive—Objections answered—The abstract question not the real point at issue—Consistency with Christianity—Striking instances of success—Conclusion.—There is, besides, an appendix of twenty pages.—We have judged it proper to give this table of contents, that our readers may form a just idea of the range of subjects discussed.

It is impossible to read many sentences of this Volume without perceiving that you are in the company of a Christian philanthropist; a man who is bent, as far as in him lies, on the removal of a great national evil; and who has sufficient patience and courage to investigate the sources of that evil, to examine with candour the various remedies proposed for its removal, and to point out with honesty that which he believes to be the only appropriate and effectual remedy. We might say much in praise of the style in which the Essay is written,—it is elegant, classical and pointed,—but we choose rather to dwell on the importance of the matter, and the good likely to result from its publication.

As might well be supposed, the writer has ascertained that "crime generally in this country has increased five-fold since the commencement of the present century;" and that with regard to juvenile crime, "1. The relative proportion of juvenile offenders to those of adult age is very great," and that, "2. The number of juvenile offenders has gradually and progressively increased." Frightful proofs are furnished from authentic documents. As to the cause, drink, strong drink, drinking and drunkenness, are uniformly found to be the most prolific. The influence of excessive labour and the consequent bodily exhaustion—the reduction on the duty on spirits—the multiplication of beer-shops—drinking customs, &c., are referred to as encouraging drinking and drunkenness in parents; and then the consequences of drunkenness upon the drunkard's family, and upon his young children, are minutely and graphically delineated, and reasoned upon in a style of powerful eloquence. Here, again, abundant proofs are furnished.

We must pass over much that is interesting and important, to come to the author's views of the appropriate REMEDY.

Having shewn the futility of most of the schemes which have been propounded and put in execution, including schools, mechanics institutions, town and city missions, ragged schools, and religious instruction; having shewn the failure of these, in consequence of those engaging in them not having had recourse to the services of a pioneer;—the author observes, "that to the success of any plan, the object of which would be to extinguish the evils which are the subject of this Essay, three conditions are essentially requisite,—1. Such a plan must reach the case of the parents: it must change the education of home.—2. In order to effect this, it must assail those drinking habits to which it has been shown parental neglect is so largely attributable.—3. It must destroy under this head the dominion of habit." His next object is to show that as "the widely diffused and inveterate habit of intoxication is the chief root of evil; to be busy with lopping the uppermost branches of the tree is useless, when eradication can alone be effectual." Hence, he readily accounts for the failure of the Old Temperance Society, and declares "TOTAL ABSTINENCE from all that can intoxicate to be the only remaining resource." He goes on to say,—"The total abstinence principle has realized completely the three conditions, which must be essential to the success of any scheme of moral amendment, under the particular circumstances of our age and country. No other system has fulfilled them; and hence it is apparent that not only is the total abstinence principle an effective remedial and preventive means; but it is equally evident, both from the nature of the case, and from the evidence of experience, that whatever may be affirmed of individual cases,—nationally, there can be no other remedy."—The Essay concludes with answers to some of the specious objections urged against this remedy—testimonies to its practicability and efficiency—and appeals for its adoption and promulgation.

We have furnished this compendium of the contents of this Essay, in the confident belief that a large portion of our readers will thereby be induced to purchase a volume which will amply repay a most attentive perusal. The style of the Essay, is, as we have intimated, attractive; its facts are momentous; and the remedy which it promulgates for the reduction of a grievous national evil is at once the most rational, appropriate, and efficient. We trust that the generous donor of the prize will have the evening of his life cheered by witnessing a large reduction of the evil he has for so many years lamented;—that the talented writer of the Essay will be encouraged to new labours for the benefit of his country;—and that the result of the publication will be, not merely the diffusion of important information, but a large accession of persons abstaining from the use of intoxicating drinks, and an abundant increase of health, intelligence, comfort, social order, and morality, the sure concomitants of ENTIRE AND HABITUAL SOBRIETY!

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

[Extracts from the PRIZE ESSAY, by the Rev. H. Worsley, A.M.]

PROFLIGATE WORKING-MEN.—At a large manufacturing establishment in London as many as 300 persons are employed. Of these, 100 men receive each as an average £1 15s. for working five days in the week. They decline coming to labour on Monday, which they habitually make a holiday, and I was told, thus regularly lose 7s. each weekly. Besides this loss, I was informed that each expends 7s. weekly for beer. The establishment in fact supports a public house.

RETAILER'S LICENSES.—The number of retailer's licenses in Great Britain amounted in 1845 to 237,345: that is, there was to be found in 1845 a retailer of beer or spirits, in almost every 115 of the population. Of the beer licenses, 68,086 were for dwellings rated under £20 per annum; whence evidence is afforded, how large a portion of beer shops are situate in impoverished districts.

DRUNK AND DISORDERLY.—The return for 1847, issued by the Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police, exhibits the number of 5307 males and 3697 females committed for drunkenness, and of 4161 males and 3709 females committed for drunk and disorderly conduct. Thus the total committed in the year 1847, was 16,847; out of these 3 males and 1 female were under fifteen years of age, and 168 males and 121 females were under the age of twenty. The extent of female intemperance in the metropolis is worthy of notice.

AGAIN.—Between the years 1831 and 1843 there were taken into custody by the Metropolitan Police force, for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, 249,015 males and 183,921 females, total 432,936. This is the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness within a space of thirteen years, out of a population, which if the two extreme years be compared together in this respect, and the mean of the difference be taken, will be found to have averaged 1,791,846.

ALCOHOL A POISON.—Mr. George Corfe, Surgeon to the Middlesex Hospital, in a letter to the Medical Times, respecting a child that had been killed by alcohol, states the following important and interesting facts:—"The immediate effect of alcohol upon the system is to narcotise the brain, and through the medium of the respiratory nerves, but especially of the pneumogastric, to produce death at the heart and lungs. Venous blood is found on both sides of the heart, and the pulmonary capillaries are also gorged with the same."

HOW TO SUBDUCE THE "MAD DRUNK."—When we are plagued with ferocious, dogged, and pugnacious drunkards, who set all physic, machinery, and manual exertions at defiance, we contrive to roll him on the floor, hold his head by the hair to the boards, and keep up an incessant cold douche (a stream of cold water) from an adjacent table or chair, until his bellowing terminates in a copious vomit, and thus the stomach is made to cast off some of its pernicious fluid. The culprit then sues for some respite, and we make him swallow down a solution of tartar emetic, or he is threatened with a repetition of cold water on pain of refusal.—Mr. G. Corfe, Surgeon to the Middlesex Hospital.

HUMILITY.—An humble man is like a good tree; the more full of fruit the branches are, the lower they bend themselves.

Single copies of the TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST will be sent regularly, post free, to every Subscriber of ONE SHILLING per annum, in advance. Societies and individuals desirous of availing themselves of this very economical and efficient mode of advocating Teetotalism will be supplied with copies at 6s. per hundred, which will be sent to them free, either in parcels, or in single copies, to persons whose names may be furnished. Thus a subscription of three shillings will ensure the sending of important information to fifty individuals, or to one hundred, if six shillings be subscribed. Orders with remittance of the amount in Post-office Orders, or postage stamps, to be sent to JOHN CASSELL, 22, Abchurch-lane, London.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS FATAL TO EARNESTNESS IN RELIGION.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

OUR former articles on this subject, if they have had no other effect, have shown that we are not indifferent to the claims of pure religion, and by no means disposed to put total abstinence in the place of the Gospel. In fact, one great argument with us in favour of Teetotalism, is the havoc that strong drink is making in our churches, and the hindrances that it presents to the spread of Christianity. We can discuss Temperance without particularly referring to the Gospel. Its temporal advantages are so numerous, that we might fill volumes with these alone. Health, domestic comfort, social order, intellectual vigour, trade, commerce, &c. &c., would be advanced thereby to an incalculable degree; and we must be excused if we make these subjects prominent in our writings and addresses. Some of our opponents wish to be more spiritual than the Bible. The "Old Testament" writers dwell with peculiar emphasis on the benefit of a worldly character, which would be the result of obedience to the laws of Jehovah; and in the "New Testament," the apostle tells us that "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." The temporal blessings that Christianity confers has been a subject of frequent praise, and yet we never heard any one say that a reference to these was irreligious, or in any way calculated to injure the spirituality of believers.

With these facts before us, we cannot help thinking that the advocates of Temperance have been dealt with rather unfairly, when sentence has been passed upon them for dwelling so largely on the physical benefits of Total Abstinence. Still we are not indifferent to the connection that there is between Total Abstinence and the spiritual improvement of mankind, and it is as an auxiliary and not as a substitute that we introduce it in connection with the Gospel.

We have already spoken of the baneful effects of moderate and immoderate drinking on "The Physical Health of Mankind," in preventing "The Full Development of Religious Principle," in producing "Levity or Stupidity," and in "Raising up a new Generation of Drinkers and Drunkards;"—we shall now conclude this article by referring to the waste of the bounties of Providence, and the Sabbath breaking, which are connected with the use of intoxicating beverages.

V.—THE GUILT INVOLVED IN THE WASTE OF SO MUCH FOOD AND HEALTH.—The month of May has been called the religious month. At this season philanthropists assemble in the metropolis from all parts of the country and the world. Argument, persuasion, and eloquence are summoned to do their utmost to awaken self-denial, liberality, and activity in the myriads that congregate in Exeter-hall and elsewhere. A visitant from another planet, could he come among us and witness the fervour of our public meetings, might suppose we were seraphs in devotion and benevolence. But what would be the disappointment of such a spirit on being informed that we waste,—aye, that the majority of these very pathetic and eloquent sons and daughters of charity, actually, during this very month of May, will waste on POISONS far more than they give to the cause of humanity and religion? Would he not suppose that we are the most arrant hypocrites in the universe? If the beer, and wine, and spirit bills of our moderate drinking philanthropists be examined in connection with their contributions to the cause of humanity and religion, the former will be found very far to surpass the latter! and yet what is spent on these vile beverages is actually, we repeat, wasted on poisons. All may dispense with them, not only without any loss, but with immense advantage to themselves and others. Their physical health would be improved, their mental power would be invigorated, and their moral and religious influence incalculably increased.

Here, then, we have the "superfluity of naughtiness" with a witness. This is a sin which benefits no one, but, without a single exception, is injurious to all. ROBERT HALL tells us that "swearing" is such an unnecessary and silly habit, that it may be looked upon as "a mere peppercorn rent to Satan." But drinking not only does no good, but is productive of infinite mischief. We are paying an enormous sum to be ill, nervous, paralytic and immoral. We beggar ourselves and our families, that we may be physically, mentally, and morally diseased. We tax our property most fearfully to woe, indigestion, liver complaint, palsy, premature old age, and death! The Cholera is bribed to linger amongst us. We convert wholesome food into poison, and use heaven's best gifts to inspire mankind with madness, to disobey, offend, and blaspheme the Giver! We complain of Government arming itself with the tremendous responsibility of licensing men to poison the bodies and souls of their brethren. The great seal of the nation is attached to the legal "permit" to trample upon the laws of God. Acts of Parliament are made which encourage men to go to perdition and decoy others to accompany them, and the State receives, in duties and customs, a premium on every family that is ruined, and every soul that is lost! This is bad enough; yet we must not be too hard on our rulers. The people make the legislators, and, therefore, are partakers of their sins. Nor is this all:—by using these liquors we sustain the iniquities of the drinking habits of our day. Cease to take the poisons, and the Government licence would not be bought, the revenue from Bacchus would be nil, the brewery would be closed, the gin palace would cease to allure, and the Lions, Dragons, and Griffins, the appropriate signs of the alehouse and tavern, would be taken down. All who drink intoxicating liquors are implicated in the abominations involved in this national blight and curse.

Can we, then, be earnest in Religion if we waste the energy and property which are essential to its support and prosperity? At every meeting in Exeter-hall there will be a demand for funds, and a doleful lamentation over the appalling fact, that means and agents are limited for want of money, and yet in some of these philanthropic assemblies, the man would be hissed who should dare whisper a word in favour of Total Abstinence and self-denial, or suggest that the funds wasted in poisoning ourselves and our fellow-creatures, should be devoted to the salvation of the world! Our prayers may be apparently ardent, our eloquence rival that of Demosthenes, and our energies and sympathies be most touching and enthusiastic, but so long as we waste, on venomous drinks, the property which might convert the world, we impeach our zeal and sincerity. Glorious and animating as the hope of converting the world is, yet the professing Church is not prepared to make the sacrifice necessary to accomplish it. We love alcohol better than we love CHRIST or our perishing fellow-immortals; and on the altar of Bacchus we annually immolate more souls than our Missionary Societies save in a quarter of a century. So long as this is the case, can we lay any claim to earnestness in Religion?

But there is not merely the waste of our property: the destruction of the bounties of Providence in the manufacture of these desolating drinks, is a still greater aggravation of our crime. We complain of the burden of the poor-rates, and bewail the potatoe blight as a dire calamity, and yet wantonly destroy a far greater amount of wholesome food than was lost by this visitation, or than would feed all the paupers in the land, though we doubled or trebled the number. We almost charge the Father of Mercies with unkindness, if the locust, the caterpillar, the blight, or the mildew, are permitted to visit us for our sins, and yet we arrogate to ourselves the right, not merely of destroying the bounties of his Providence, but of converting them into poisons to demoralize and destroy his children! To take the grain, the grapes, and the apples, which are manufactured into alcoholic drinks, and hurl them to the depths of the sea, would be considered a crime of sufficient magnitude to provoke the Almighty to smite us with plague, pestilence, and famine; and yet this act would be a deed of piety compared with our presumption and cruelty in making intoxicating liquors.

We might adduce many awful facts to show that we are not in earnest in the course of the Redeemer, but the most startling one of all is this "superfluity" of wickedness in producing, selling, and using these destructive beverages. Millions of wholesome food we waste than annihilate; £100,000,000 a-year we spend, either directly or indirectly, on poisons, and then we sit down and moralise on the impenetrable mysteries of Providence, that the treasury of Jehovah is not more plentifully supplied, and that the human race are still so ignorant and depraved. We give £100,000,000 to Baalchus, or rather to Beelzebub, to destroy mankind, and after a deal of persuading, labouring, and murmuring, we devote about £3,000,000 to the salvation of the world, and with pious wonder complain of the abounding of iniquity. We may talk much of earnestness, we may make moving speeches about earnestness, we may pray for earnestness, and profess to bewail our want of earnestness, but so long as we waste the bounties of Providence and our own wealth on the production or purchase of poisons, we impeach our sincerity, and render ourselves the scoff of infidels, the derision of demons, and the objects of Divine displeasure.

VI.—"SABBATH BREAKING" is most notoriously encouraged by the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. We need not say that until the Sabbath is kept holy we can have little proof of religious revival. The Sabbath is the market-day of the soul. To dwell on the blessings its observance has conferred on mankind would require volumes. It is indeed "The Pearl of Days." No man would be considered a Christian who encourages its desecration. Physical health, mental repose and energy, social order, as well as religion, call upon us to obey the fourth commandment. The Lord's day is one of the choicest gifts of heaven. "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." To rob any human being of his Sunday and means of grace, is, to the last degree, sinful; it is nothing less than soul murder. And yet how many hundreds are, every Lord's day, employed in making malt. There is the blood of souls in every drop of ale, beer, and porter that we taste. The wonder is that any Christian can touch them or look at them without horror. There is not only poison, but the most presumptuous guilt in our bowls.

And this is not all. Look at the sale of these liquors on the Sabbath. Our legislators grant licenses to the vendors to trample upon the commands of God! What heart can pass by our ale-houses and gin palaces on a Sunday evening without being appalled. How often have we wished, when walking by the houses with the large letters on, "HAMBURY, TRUMAN, and BUXTON," that the latter gentleman would spend a few of his Sabbath evenings in these dens of iniquity and shame. And no man ought to let a house for purposes which he himself would shudder to pursue, because of their baneful character. But we must not be hard on hard-hearted brewers and vendors; all who buy and all who drink these liquors are implicated. Give up their use, and neither manufacturers nor sellers will any longer continue their horrid vocation. And until we do this, we encourage the breach of the Sabbath; we sap the foundations of piety; we destroy men's souls by the myriad, and prove that our pretension to "earnestness in religion" is AN AWFUL DECEPTION.

REPEAL OF THE BEER-SHOP ACT.

THE attention of the public is earnestly invited to the following brief statements respecting the Beer-Shop Act, and their co-operation solicited in the attempts now making to remove that prolific source of misery and demoralisation.

G. V. DRURY, Esq., Magistrate, Shotover Park, Oxon, says, "The Beer-Bill has done more to brutalize the English labourer, and take him from his family and fire-side, into the worst associations, than almost any measure that could have been devised. It has furnished victims for the gaol, the hulks, and the gallows, and has frightfully extended the evils of pauperism and moral debasement."

LORD FRANCIS EGERTON "considered the system as promotive of enormous evils. No bill had ever been more productive of drunkenness and immorality than the sale of beer act."

LORD DUNGARNON "considered beer-shops as places where crimes of the deepest die were concocted."

The Rev. JOHN CLAY, A.M., Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, observes in his Twenty-Fourth Report, "I earnestly solicit the perusal of the autobiographies given in the Appendix, that it may be seen distinctly how crime flows—the metaphor is not so inappropriate as it may seem—from through, and into, the Beer-Shop. It is there the poacher receives his first lesson and his chief encouragement; there, the reckless navy squanders his earnings and his strength, often drinking himself into desperation, and so becoming ready for any act of robbery or plunder, in order to purchase means for another debauch; there, labourers and artisans assemble by troops, and drink away wages, clothing, health, and life. There, they take their wives' and children's bread and cast it to dogs.—From three entirely independent sources, and at different times, I received statements fully confirming each other, which leave no doubt of the extent to which this profligate system (of keeping prostitutes) is carried on. Sixteen houses in one town, harbouring or rather maintaining about fifty-four prostitutes, have been named to me. And this is not the full amount of the evil. The neighbourhood of those houses is corrupted. Women, married women, occupied to all appearance, with their own proper avocations at home, hold themselves at the call of the beer-house for the immoral purposes to which I have referred."

The Liverpool Mail newspaper remarks:—"It is not in large towns only (the natural haunts of profligacy, where vice, like vermin, is hatched in the steams of filth), where the evils of the beer-house are most conspicuous. Go where you will, into any village in England, to any spot where a few houses are planted together, and there you will find the nuisances indicated by competing sign-boards. In many places there is a beer-shop for every half-dozen families. The legalising the sale of beer, wherever and whenever a man chooses to sell it, has proved to be a national curse. These beer-shops are resorts where low gambling is carried on to a serious extent; and, as they abound everywhere, they are the retreats of intrigue and seduction, where domestic servants peril their reputation, and are cherished or coerced into still more vicious and deplorable avocations. It is within our own knowledge that in these places robberies of private houses are planned; and where the unhappy woman, who for her information or her connivance is flattered by the hope of marriage, is almost invariably duped, and flung helpless and despised upon the streets. The whole system demands revision and reform. The beer-shops must be swept away altogether. The evil has reached such an extent that it can no longer be borne."

JAMES CHILD, of Leeds, inspector of police, states—"There was a great deal of drunkenness, especially among the young people. I have seen children very little higher than the table at the beer-shops. There are some beer-shops where there are rooms up-stairs, and the boys and girls, old people and married of both sexes go up."

JOHN STUBBS, of the police force, confirmed the above testimony. He said—"We have a number of girls on the town under fifteen, and boys who live by thieving. There are half-a-dozen beer-shops where none but young ones go at all; they support these houses."

MR. R. GREGORY, a large farmer, at West Ham, Essex, says—"The great source of evil is the beer-shop. You are sure to find the robberies concocted at the beer-shops. When I took my farm there was no beer-shop; one was set up, and the difference seen in the working people before and after was such as no one would conceive."

TAPPING, the murderer, who was executed at Newgate, said to the Chaplain, "I deeply regret having frequented the Beer-Shops and Singing-Houses, in the neighbourhood of Bethnal-green; and I am convinced that my own ruin and that of the unhappy girl whom I deprived of life is to be attributed to that."

The Merthyr Guardian newspaper remarks—"So long as beer-houses are suffered to exist, we must expect to have the evils complained of, to the great injury of public morals, and in too many instances as the nightly resort of thieves of every description, from the petty depredator of the hen-roost to the daring and reckless house-breaker. The country cries out loudly for the extirpation of this great pest."

HENRY POWNALL, Esq., one of the Middlesex magistrates, says—"I cannot but think that the increase of juvenile delinquency is owing in a considerable degree to the increase of beer-shops. In the course of a short time about three thousand children, below the age of fourteen, have passed through the prisons of the county. Of these cases, many may be traced to the neglect and dissolute habits of the parents, in consequence of their intemperance, or to the sad lessons and examples which they have met with in those resorts of wickedness."

The Morning Herald observes—"Surely it seems hard that the government should, by means of beer or Tom and Jerry Shops, lay traps in the way of the ignorant multitude, and then hang them up like dogs for doing acts in their state of inebriation, which they would shudder at the thoughts of, if they had not been contributing to the destruction of their own souls and bodies, in the government-protected beer-haunts of crimes and infamy."

The Rev. E. EDWARDS, Perpetual Curate of Marsden,

York, asks—"Where was the vaunted patriotism of our professedly christian governors and legislators, when they concocted and enacted that most demoralizing and infamous act, commonly called the BEER ACT?"

The Rev. E. FAULKNER, Chaplain of Worcester gaol, states—"Instances have occurred of women being driven to procure for themselves and families, by illegal means, the bare necessities of life, whose husbands were, at the same time, earning sufficient for all their wants, if it had not been squandered at the Beer-Shop. Children, too, the offspring of such dissolute and drunken parents, almost without a home—certainly without advice, example, instruction, correction, or parental care—are left, from a very early age, to seek a precarious subsistence how and where they can."

The Rev. JOHN COLLINSON, late of Lamesley, says—"Beer-Shops, which have become so numerous, are the bane of country districts. Formerly a man in the country had some trouble to reach a public-house, but now he can hardly go home to his cottage without passing the doors of several, into which he is tempted to enter. But drinking is not the only evil they produce. Night is the poachers' time for depredation, and from these haunts they steal into the neighbouring preserves, drawing after them ignorant young men, who would never otherwise have been guilty of theft."

EXTRACTS FROM THE CONSTABULARY COMMISSIONERS' REPORT.—An experienced thief deposes—"There are bad of both kinds; for gambling there is nothing to choose, but for 'travellers' there are more jerry-shops started by thieves for the accommodation of their acquaintances. Two at Nottingham in a court. Then at Leicester three, and three at Sheffield. I have been at all these myself. I know many that are brothels in Manchester, Rochdale, Halifax, Huddersfield, Nottingham, and indeed in all towns."

JOHN TAYLOR, Esq., Coroner of Bolton, says—"There are in this town (Bolton) five beer-houses at which gaming was permitted, and eight beer-houses where prostitutes were permitted to assemble, some of them being no better than brothels."

To the above testimony a large addition might easily be made; and it is abundantly evident, after eighteen years' experience of the working of the beer bill, that it is one of the most serious legislative blunders ever committed by the Parliament of this country.

The Earl of HARROWBY is now about to make a motion in the House of Lords, for the repeal of this injurious measure, at the earliest practicable period; and it is most desirable that Petitions should be sent to both Houses of Parliament, as speedily as possible.

The following form of Petition has been used in some places:—

PETITION FOR THE GRADUAL REPEAL OF THE BEER BILL.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled.

The humble Petition of the Inhabitants of the Congregation of SHEWETH,—That the establishment of beer-shops, so far from answering the end proposed of benefiting the poor, has proved decidedly and increasingly injurious to the working classes.

That even the strongest affections our nature is capable of—the love of wife and children, is, in too many instances, completely overpowered by the temptations these houses afford.

That vast numbers are thereby reduced to utter poverty, who, by throwing themselves on parochial relief, inflict a grievous wrong on the industrious portion of the nation.

Your petitioners, therefore, earnestly entreat your Right Hon. House to prohibit the granting any new licenses to beer-shops, and to enact that those already granted shall be in force only during the tenure of the present holders.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

The form of address to the House of Commons is as follows:—

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled.

Observe.—This petition must be copied in writing, and there must be at least three signatures on the same sheet on which the petition is written. Petitions have greater weight when the address and occupation of the petitioners are inserted; and Congregational Petitions are especially desirable, as they are considered to be disinterested and genuine.

COST OF THE DRINKING SYSTEM.

An attempt to estimate the cost of the drinking system to the British population for the year 1847:—

LIQUORS CONSUMED:—

20,639,365 gallons corn spirits, at 1s.....	£15,479,523
3,329,940 " rum, at 1s.....	2,330,958
1,537,762 " brandy, at 36s.....	2,767,971
28,830 " Geneva, at 30s.....	43,245
6,310,536 " wine, at 29s. 6d.....	7,099,353
613,900,976 " beer, } at 1s. 6d.....	46,447,573
5,400,000 " cider, &c. }	£74,168,623

LABOUR LOST:—

3,000,000 paupers, who, if working, might each earn, per annum, additional to their present earnings, £18 .....	£54,000,000
12,000,000 of the population who lose on an average two weeks of each year in drinking, and through disease, caused by drinking, 461,538 years, at 42s .....	10,615,374
	£64,615,374

RESULTS OF DRINKING:—

Cost of Pauperism.....	£13,300,000
Estimated cost of Crime.....	4,000,000
Estimated cost of Disease.....	5,000,000
Loss by accidents at Sea.....	2,800,000
	£24,600,000
Two-thirds attributable to Drinking .....	£16,000,000

To the above must be added—

- Loss of life.
- Loss of health.
- Loss of character.
- Loss of domestic, social, and national happiness.
- Loss by bankruptcy through intemperance.

In the above estimate the liquors are taken at the prices paid for them by the consumers, as nearly as can be ascertained.

The retailer of spirits is in the habit of adding a very large quantity of water after the liquor has come into his possession, by which means the number of gallons sold is much greater than the number on which duty has been paid. An addition has been made to some of the above prices in consideration of this dilution by the seller.

Were it not for the existence of the drinking system, there would be ample employment, at good wages, for our entire pauper population, as well as for those who are actually occupied in the manufacture and distribution of these liquors. This will appear evident from the following considerations:—The entire exports of the United Kingdom for the year 1846 amounted to £57,786,870; and it is estimated that a decrease of £10,000,000 in British exports is sufficient to cause a most severe national depression. All, therefore, that is required at any time to secure the most abundant commercial prosperity and employment to all, is to increase the demand for our manufactures to the value of ten millions sterling. Let our working population abstain from drink, and an amount of money far exceeding ten millions will annually be expended in obtaining the comforts of life by those who are at present comparatively destitute of them. The necessary result of such a state of things must be to give an impetus to every department of our national industry.

The revenue of the United Kingdom for 1848 was £52,082,757. The national debt amounts to £790,348,354; so that the drinking system absorbs as much wealth as would pay the entire taxes of the country, in addition to clearing off the national debt in eight years. This view of the case is well worthy the attention of financial reformers.

The absorption of capital during the past few years in carrying forward railway projects has caused much alarm and inconvenience to the community. The following statement, from Blackwood's Magazine for January, 1848, exhibits the amount of money expended on these schemes from 1841 to 1847—certainly trifling sums when compared with the expenditure of the drinking system:—

1841 expended .....	£1,470,000
1842 " .....	2,980,000
1843 " .....	4,435,000
1844 " .....	6,105,000
1845 " .....	14,135,000
1846 " .....	35,485,000
1847 first six months .....	25,770,000

Total railway expenditure for 6½ years..... £91,380,000

The drinking system during the same period, according to the above estimates, has cost the country about eleven times as much, or £1,007,500,000.—Scottish Abstiners' Almanack.

ANTI-BEER BILL.

The feeling of the town and neighbourhood of Huddersfield against beer-houses will be shown by the following statement. The signatures to the petitions abundantly prove that the clergy, dissenting ministers, merchants, tradesmen, and the public generally, are so fully convinced of the many evils arising from these dens of iniquity, as earnestly to desire the repeal of the iniquitous measure which legalizes their existence.

The friends of temperance in Huddersfield are anxious to impress upon societies generally the importance of energetic action in this movement; and they would respectfully suggest to the temperance public, that by a little exertion they may secure the co-operation of many Christians and benevolent individuals who are not yet convinced of the necessity of entire abstinence. They trust that the discussion of this measure in the imperial parliament, with the immense array of striking facts which may be expected to be then exhibited, showing the close connection between the drinking of intoxicating beverages and the pauperism, crime, juvenile depravity, and irreligion, will induce many to examine the question for themselves.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIGNATURES TO THE PLEDGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—Allow me through the medium of the "Times" to call attention to the system adopted in receiving the names of individuals who join the Total Abstinence Society. At present, in the north of England, the secretaries and committees are in the habit of procuring the names of parties wishing to become members of the society, and afterwards entering them in the Pledge Book.

Such a mode of transacting business is open to the following objections:—First, that parties not having signed their names themselves consider that it is not their own act and deed;—they think that it is not so binding as it would have been had they deliberately affixed their own signature, or (in case they cannot write) their mark. Neither is it so satisfactory to the society to receive the names in this manner, as it would be were they uniformly to require the signature of the party joining.

Other reasons may be given,—but the grand objection to the present system is, that our books cannot be considered as evidence of the good effected in the period in which we live. In 1949 the books of 1849 may be considered and pronounced forgeries,—because page after page is in the handwriting of one individual; and in this age, when statistics form the basis of almost all argument, it behoves the Total Abstinence Societies to take care that their books bear the impress of truth upon the face of them. It is important that we should be able to leave sufficient indisputable evidence of the work effected yearly, and that could be done by simply requiring all signatures to be genuine.

To facilitate this scheme I would suggest that a year book, properly ruled and headed as below, should be divided into, say 50 parts, each part to be secured by a Good strong cover—and if the committee consist of thirty, let each have a copy; and whenever any of them attend any meetings, let them be stationed in convenient parts of the room, and then and there receive signatures during the meeting as well as at its conclusion. They may also procure signatures wherever and whenever they can.

I would distribute the remaining parts—some to public buildings, reading rooms, &c., where favourable to the cause, others to shops, &c., to be placed in the windows, together with a notice, announcing the readiness of the parties to receive signatures.

I think this would be a likely way to interest many in the progress and success of the temperance cause. It would bring the matter more prominently before the masses of the population. It would probably cause some seriously to consider and think over our principles, and no man ever yet thought (however much he might talk to no purpose) about them, that did not ultimately become convinced of their truth.

At the year's end the whole of the parts should be collected, paged, and bound, and kept as a memento of the labours of a past year, and a book of authentic reference.

Yours very truly,

BRICKMAKING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—I read with great pleasure the statements made from time to time in the columns of your periodical, but none has afforded me greater pleasure than the article in reference to "Brickmaking," contained in your number for March. Reading that, and calling to mind at the same time a statement recently made by Mr. Parsons, I could not but thank God that others, as well as myself, had been led to test the Teetotal principle. I am conscious that when I was a drinker of intoxicating drinks I gave satisfaction to no one, and no one satisfied me. I thank God that Teetotalism at last came to my relief, and then I soon found a desire for other comrades. My sobriety did not lead me to the public-house but to the house of God, and there I found the "pearl of great price." Now I am satisfied, and can satisfy others. As to my work, I thought it could not be done without strong drink, therefore I went on using it, till I became destitute of the common necessities of life. I began brick-yard business as soon as I began the world for myself; and as I am the father of fifteen children, the youngest of whom is scarce six years old, a great responsibility rested upon me. Still that did not stop my revellings. I got drunk, caring neither for my wife's entreaties nor my children's cries; and proceeded like a demoniac—swearing, fighting, and practising other evil works, till the Teetotalers persuaded me to take the pledge. This I did four years ago last Christmas.

And now, Sir, when I look back upon the past, I see a large portion of my life-time spent in ignorance and sin—in gross neglect of God and my family. The present, however, presents a very different scene; instead of rags, wretchedness, and misery, being a pest to society, unable to go to church or chapel for want of decent apparel, we have now each of us two suits—one to work or go to week-day school in, and another to go to the Primitive Methodist Chapel in.

Would to God that all who go to chapel were total abstainers from strong drinks! But when I find many professing Christians whose moderate use of strong drink presents a baneful example to others, I have scarce charity enough to believe that they are sincere when they pray—"Lord save the drunkard!"

I feel assured that if brick-makers, and all other hard working men, would become total abstainers, they would give full satisfaction to their employers, whereas as drunkards they will never be able to do so. I speak from experience. My last six years have been spent in Mr. Wigfield's yard, near Northallerton, and no fault has yet been found on either side; proving that signing the Teetotal pledge, with the grace of God, will tame the drunkard's fury, furnish food and clothing, and make home comfortable. I trust that this, my brief history, may cause some to reflect on the past, to become sober men and Christians, and to cast all their care on God for the future. Your well wisher,

JOHN KIRBY,

Northallerton, April 21, 1849.

GOOD LOGIC.—The Bible approves of nothing but what is really good, and disapproves of nothing but what is really evil. Whatever intoxicates is not good, but evil—therefore, whatever intoxicates is against the Bible, and the Bible against it, by whatever name the thing may be distinguished or known.—Rev. J. W. Shrewsbury.

"A LITTLE SHIVERY."—A man was brought before the magistrates at the Blackburn police-court, a short time since, charged with being "exceedingly drunk" on the Sunday preceding. He denied the charge, and said "that he had just put on a clean shirt, which made him a little shivery, and he had only taken half a noggin of rum to keep the cold out."—Discharged on paying costs.

TEETOTALISM, &amp;c., IN FACTORIES.

The following is copied from the report of LEONARD HORNER, Esq., Inspector of Factories, addressed to her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, near the close of the last year:—

"The instance I have now to give is one of especial value, because it shows what may be done in the heart of a large town. It has often been observed to me while talking with mill-owners on this subject, 'these things are all very good, and may be accomplished in country situations; but what can be done in such a town as Manchester?' Messrs. WILLIAM and DAVID MORRIS, of Chorlton New Mills, in Temple-street, have answered that question. This communication has greater weight, inasmuch as both gentlemen have themselves been factory operatives.

"MANCHESTER, Nov. 23, 1848.

"DEAR SIR,—According to your request, I send a sketch of some of the plans in operation for the physical and mental improvement of the workers in our mills. Before doing this, you will perhaps pardon a few reflections on the subject of factory improvement. For a number of years my brother and I have viewed, with sorrowful feelings, the woeful state of ignorance existing in many of the mills in this extensive district; we saw that the workers evinced a very low tone of moral feeling; that their homes, to a very great extent, were ill-furnished, over crowded, badly, or not at all, ventilated, and generally without those little comforts so necessary to render the home of the working man his place of rest and happiness. We found, in tracing the cause of these evils, that they were mainly owing to the ignorance and intemperance of the adults, who, having commenced their labours in the mills at, probably, six or seven years of age, had grown up in habits of ignorance and intemperance, and finding little comfort or attraction at home, had generally preferred the allurements of the public-house, thus perpetuating the evils of their position, instead of removing them. We saw many other evils resulting from this state of matters, and, as lovers of our fellow-men, deploring their sufferings and misery, we began to think how we could do something to remove them. After much serious consideration as to the best means to effect a consummation so devoutly to be wished, and seeing that the use of intoxicating drinks was the first great cause of their ignorance and misery, we determined to commence operations by endeavouring to make our own workers sober, and then, upon their sober habits, to raise the superstructure of their future moral and physical improvement. Having thus decided, we called together a number of the most intelligent workers to consider our plan; the result of this meeting was the formation of a committee of fifteen, for the purpose of carrying into practical operation a TEMPERANCE SOCIETY in the mills. Immediately upon their assuming office the following address was printed, and every worker in the mills supplied with one each:—

"ADDRESS.

"FELLOW WORKMEN,—In order to cure a disease you must ascertain the cause, the removal of which is essential to the recovery of good health. In taking a view of the miseries and moral deformity of this country, we cannot help observing that the chief cause is the use of intoxicating drinks. Although there is no doubt that the working classes suffer much from bad laws, low wages, and other causes, yet we are deeply convinced that they have in their own hands the power of making one change, which of itself would find sufficient work, and consequently good wages, for every industrious man in the kingdom. That change is the expending of their wages upon useful articles, which they now throw away upon intoxicating drinks. The money spent by the working people alone upon these liquors, cannot be less than forty millions annually; and if we include the value of the time lost, and all the consequences of loss of work, loss of health and life, destruction of property, &c., little less than double that amount is sacrificed annually for this soul and body destroying poison. Preserve to all the working men of this land their unclouded reason, the full possession of their faculties and their time, and let them determine to expend this eighty millions upon the various articles of clothing, bedding, furniture, hats, shoes, beef, bread, &c., of which they are now destitute, and it is impossible for a mind not accustomed to reflect upon this subject, to conceive the immense increase which would take place in the demand for the various articles of home manufacture (independent of the good each individual would receive), such goods, for instance, as those manufactured in this mill, they being all for the home trade, or nearly so.

"To bring about this desirable change, and to aid the great work of moral reform now going on in our country, and more particularly to improve the condition of our fellow-workers, fifteen of us have formed ourselves into a committee to do all we can to stem the mighty torrent of intemperance, which is hurrying thousands of the working classes into the lowest depths of despair and utter ruin. We, therefore, call upon you to join us in this work: remember that reform should commence at home; let each begin by reforming himself.

"Know ye not,

"Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow!"

"By the kind permission of our employers we have begun the Temperance Movement in the mills, being fully satisfied that it will be far better for both employers and employed, that all the hands shall be in future perfectly sober, healthy, and happy, than that they should be drunken, miserable, and sad. To enjoy the former and avoid the latter of these two conditions in life, we invite you to sign our pledge, to enrol yourselves among the ranks of sober men, and you will soon begin to reap the advantages of a life of total abstinence from all that will produce intoxication.

"Persons wishing to sign the pledge may do so during any meal time, with any member of the committee."

"Attention having been thus drawn to the importance of the subject, regular monthly meetings were held in one of the large rooms of the warehouse, which were addressed by some of the ablest men in connection with the Temperance Reformation in this city. The result of these meetings, and the distribution of some hundreds of Temperance Tracts, &c., was, that in the course of time, out of 500 workers, upwards of 300 were pledged teetotalers. My brother and myself setting them the example, by abstaining ourselves, and thus everything seemed to succeed as we desired.

"We now sat about improving their physical condition, by ventilation in the various rooms of the works. You may have some idea of this matter, when you learn that we fitted up about 1,500 ventilators of various kinds, suited to the different processes of spinning and weaving; one card-room alone costing upwards of £100; but the health and activity of the workers were so much improved, that we felt ourselves amply repaid for the outlay. One case of improved health may serve as an illustration of the value of this much neglected sanitary portion of a factory. A female, about forty years of age, has suffered from asthma for a number of years, produced, she said, by working in confined card-rooms. Every week end, when she was laying out her wages in provisions for the ensuing week, one shilling was regularly spent on a bottle of phisic, as she said, to enable her to breathe; after the ventilators were set to work she took no more of her bottle, and, I believe, up to this period has had no occasion for it. Dr. Guy, of King's College Hospital, when going through our mills in 1846, saw this woman, and heard her tell the story of her improved health.

"We next turned our attention to open air exercises, and formed an extensive gymnasium and play-ground, running parallel with a large mill, and to connect this land and the mill-yard we constructed a six feet wide promenade on the margin of the river Medlock. On the play-ground we placed a giant stride and swings for the juveniles, skipping-ropes, &c., for the girls, leaping-bars and skittles for the adults, and cleared a space of ground for the boys to play at marbles, &c., and the girls at merry-go-round and other girlish games. The whole of the land we surrounded with strong seats, so that all might enjoy their meals in the open air, or rest awhile from their sports, and it is no unusual thing to see, on a fine summer's morn, from 50 to 100 thus enjoying and invigorating themselves.

"Having thus far succeeded in improving the physical condition of our people, both in the mill and out of it, by means of ventilation, open air exercise, pure drinking water (having put up a large filter for this purpose), and many other little matters, we thought ourselves in a fair position to commence the more important work of improving the moral and mental condition of our workers. With this end in view, you may remember that I consulted you in 1845, as to the best means of carrying our object into practical effect, when you were kind enough to give us much encouragement, and the benefit of your great personal experience. We at once commenced operations, and so far we have not had a single reason to regret the steps we have taken. Fearing to absorb more of your time, I shall conclude with the following paragraph from the Manchester Guardian of the 15th November, 1848, which shows, in a simple and concise manner, most of the things we have done to improve the moral condition of our people (except the existence of a rather remarkable feature in a cotton-mill, viz., a French class, in which the students have made considerable proficiency). I will just add one idea, and that is, that if the old proverb be true, 'What man has done, man may do,' then all that we have accomplished may be done by other employers, and, I am satisfied from experience, to the mutual advantage of employers and employed.

"I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

"DAVID MORRIS.

"The Mutual Improvement Society.—It is located in a small building, formerly two cottages, adjoining the factory yard. It is divided into class-rooms, library and news-rooms, and is well lighted with gas, and ventilated. The liberal employers have supplied all the desks and other fittings, and also a number of maps, pictures, &c., which adorn the walls of the rooms. They also give the coals and pay for the cleaning of the place. There are four classes held in the evening, which, with the exception of the adult male class, are all free to the whole of the hands employed in the mills. There are two paid teachers—one remunerated by the firm, and the other out of the funds of the society, and three unpaid teachers, who are young men employed in the concern. The average attendance at the classes, at the present time, is between 60 and 70. The library contains about 600 volumes, and the subscription to it a half-penny per week. The subscription to the news-room and library is one penny per week. The news and reading rooms are open all the day, so that at meal times, or when any of the hands are waiting for work, they may pass their time in reading the various newspapers and periodicals taken in. Tea-parties are held once a-month. There are also lectures in the course of delivery in a large room in the mill every alternate Monday evening.

"There is also in the mill a kind of a Co-operative Association. Tea and coffee for the whole of the hands is bought wholesale. Two-thirds of the discount they obtain (12½ per cent.) is so much saved by the hands; the other third goes to the support of the society, in addition to the subscriptions and all the fines in the mill, and forfeited wages.

"To encourage prudence among the hands, a Savings' bank was established about 12 weeks ago, and already the directors have in hand upwards of £71."

We say to all Mill-owners and Factory Proprietors, "GO AND DO LIKEWISE."

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

IN consequence of stringent regulations recently issued by the Post-office authorities, the TEETOTAL TIMES can no longer be sent post free. It will in future be printed and published in London; and for the purpose of posting, stamped copies will be issued, twopence each, or two shillings per annum, paid in advance. Those of our friends who have subscribed 1s. for the present year, have already received four numbers, value 4d.; they will receive four numbers more, stamped copies, by post, value 8d. This will secure their supply to the month of August next inclusive; after which we must throw ourselves upon their kindness for a subscription for the remaining four months of 1849. We hope to make our publication well worthy their patronage and recommendation.

A PROBLEM FOR LAW MAKERS.

THE effects of the sale of intoxicating drinks are uniformly the same everywhere, and in all conditions of society. Sell them to savages or civilized men, whites or blacks, Turks, Hindoos, or Christians, and the effect upon all is just the same. It makes them alike noisy, ill-tempered, quarrelsome, abusive to neighbours and relatives; it is followed by poverty, degradation and crime; assaults and batteries, riots, fightings, and murders, follow in the wake of the liquor traffic, just as certainly and uniformly as a report follows the explosion of gunpowder.

The effects of the traffic are also wholly injurious in all cases. It cannot be pretended that the case ever happened in which a community was rendered wiser, better, more industrious, wealthier, or more respectable in consequence of the traffic, licensed or unlicensed. And there is not the least reason to hope that such beneficial effects ever will follow this business.

When, therefore, a legislature licenses this traffic, it does so with a perfect assurance that it will result only in misery, degradation, poverty, and crime. Now, suppose that the man who buys drink of your licensed vender, after making himself drunk, should go into the house of the law-maker, and do there what he is accustomed to do at his own house, that is to say, break the looking-glass, kick over the supper table, beat the children with the tongs, break the chairs over the mother's back, and compel the whole family to fly barefoot and half-dressed into the snow to save their lives! what would our law-maker say to that? Would he say it was more than he had bargained for? But we tell him, nay, it is not more than he bargained for, because all experience shows that men will act in this way when they get drunk, whether on licensed or unlicensed sales. The only difference is, that he beats the family of the man who licensed the sale, instead of his own innocent family, who had nothing to do with it.

Now it seems to us that any magnanimous, high-minded man would prefer that the legitimate consequences of his acts should come upon himself and his family, rather than fall upon the heads of innocent wives and children who protest against his acts, or at any rate are wholly innocent of all participation in them. If the consequences of the traffic in strong drinks were not universally and invariably such as described; if it only happened once in a while, even, that the traffic resulted in doing good and making families happier, wiser, and better, why then the law-maker might say that he had hoped for the best in licensing the business, and, if it turned out otherwise, it was accidental and unfortunate. But nothing of the sort can be pretended. The result of the traffic is BAD only—and continually—and everywhere—and in all times and places. The licensor knows it, and, instead of throwing the consequences on the family of the drunkard, should hold his peace if they fall on his own household.—New York Organ.

INDIVIDUAL EFFORT; OR, WHAT CAN I DO?

BY J. RUSSELL.

Analogous to this inquiry was the feeling supposed to be possessed by the Drop of Rain, as described in an Eastern apologue, when about to fall from the clouds towards this terraqueous globe. It must be understood that it was represented as being endowed with intelligence and the power of speech. Looking down from its lofty eminence, it is said to have discovered with much disappointment and mortification, that it was on the point of dropping into the deep and widely extended Pacific Ocean. It felt considerable dissatisfaction at the humiliating prospect before it, and thought and said within itself, "If I might have fallen in some thirsty land upon a newly formed blade of grass, or upon some aromatic flower or infant bud just expanding, I should have been of some perceptible, though of comparatively little, service to the world; but descending where I am about to do, into the vast Pacific, I shall at once be absorbed, swallowed up, lost, and for ever useless." It is then stated that it continued its descent, but a kind, a favourable providence so ordered it, that this complaining, fearing drop fell into the mouth of a gaping oyster, just ready to receive it, where it became, in the course of time, by the transmuting, transforming power of Him who made it and all things, a pearl of the greatest magnitude and rarest beauty. In a while afterwards the bivalve fish became the prize of a fisherman, who, on further investigation, discovered that it contained an extraordinary jewel, which upon being extracted was sold at a great price; and by-and-by, in consequence of its extended fame, was subsequently employed to form a conspicuous ornament in the splendid diadem of the sovereign of the country.

How insignificant, how common, how much overlooked, and yet how serviceable to man, is a drop of rain! "A timely shower, which consists of numerous drops of rain, renews the face of the earth; and it has still more strength and influence than the dew, which during the night moistens the grass and the leaves. The furrows of the fields drink in greedily the refreshing rains which fall upon them. The prolific principles develop themselves in the seeds, and second the labour of the husbandman." Thus every individual member of human society, however apparently insignificant, possesses power and capabilities which, if rightly appreciated and properly directed, are calculated to effect a powerful and beneficial influence upon his fellow-creatures.

We wish it were in our power to impress upon every individual who asks, WHAT CAN I DO? the fact that he has the ability to do great things. Persons in very humble and retired stations of life are generally too apt to make this inquiry, considering their powers ill suited to promote the general good. Perhaps this diffident feeling owes its origin to their suffering themselves to be dazzled by the galaxy of bright and splendid luminaries which revolve in the hemisphere in which they themselves are located. And thus their nebulae condition induces the feeling, that as they cannot shine as clearly and brightly as a star of the first magnitude, they will put their little light under the gloomy cloud of non-exertion, and will not shine at all. Because they have not five talents, they will wrap their one talent in the napkin of negligence and sloth, and sit at home in idleness. This is an error, a most egregious mistake; for, according to the ordinary constitution of society, the very framework of it, there cannot be many employments which call for very splendid talents, or great and extraordinary powers of mind for their efficient discharge. The general good demands that all, head, hands, feet, and every other member, should well occupy, fill, and discharge their own respective parts. What is the power of a collective body but individual power combined? For instance, the army and navy consist of many members, but were they, as individuals, each to say in times of national peril and danger, WHAT CAN I DO? and were to act upon this principle, where would be our security, our safety? Would they not, for want of unity of effort, be utterly unable to repel and discomfit the invading enemy? We have used this simile as an illustration, and not in approbation, of war; by such illustrations we might range, ad infinitum, through all ranks and orders of busy men, and the conclusion would be always the same.

WHAT CAN I DO? What do you want me to do? is an oft-repeated inquiry, in reply to which we say, we do not want you to extract "sunbeams from cucumbers," we do not want you to do impossibilities, all we want is, that each man and woman come up at once to the help of the Temperance Cause, which cause has come up to the help of the Lord against those who are mighty to drink strong drink. Who, who is on the Lord's side? Many in all ranks of society, from the coroneted peer to the humble laborious artisan and peasant. Many amongst these are diligent and zealous in the noble, benevolent, and philanthropic cause which they have espoused. Many of them are bold and valiant, and are untiring in their efforts to deliver their country, their paternal soil, from the very foot-prints of the fell-destroyer—alcohol. Proceed, then, ye truly patriotic and philanthropic men; proceed, with not only unabated, but increased ardour in your splendid and glorious career. The battles which you have already fought and won, the dazzling victories you have obtained, have spread your names, like lightning, throughout the land. You have astonished your countrymen, and have produced a sensation such as former times never witnessed nor even heard of. Press onwards! The world's gaze is on your purpose; your decision has already stunned multitudes with amazement. Press forwards, then, and it will soon be declared; it must be accomplished.

WHAT CAN I DO? Let us return to our apologue, and learn the sequel from the drop of rain, and by such a simple circumstance be admonished and aroused from that supineness which has characterized too many of us, and at once, and without delay, bestir ourselves to do good, as we have opportunity. Be it remembered that individual effort is as was that drop of rain. Think no more, whoever you are, that it is nothing which you can do. You can plume the temperance angel's wing with at least one feather, which will accelerate its flight of tender pity and compassion to your poor, deluded, fellow-countrymen. Think not, as the insignificant drop of rain did, that your doings will be useless, and worthless, and lost for ever; but think that, under the guiding, framing, transforming, and transmuting providence of Almighty God, your little doings may be found in the form of a reclaimed drunkard, regenerated, sanctified, and immortalized, through the spirit of divine grace, constituting one of the purest, brightest, and most brilliant gems in the diadem of our adorable Redeemer. And how am I to do this, do you enquire? Why, there are many ways in which you might accomplish it, under God's blessing: Speak to your neighbours and friends a word in season, and where that cannot be done readily, furnish yourself with a little missionary, in the form of a Temperance Pamphlet or Tract, and send it, with its silent and unobtrusive step, to deliver its message of mercy. Much good has already been accomplished in this manner. We know of many men who are alive to their obligations to teetotalism, who appropriate some tithes of their scanty earnings to the purchase of tracts, &c., and in various ways they have enjoyed the luxury arising from having done some good to their fellow-creatures.

WHAT CAN I DO? Why you can come and push God's kingdom, which is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," further within the limits of Satan's dark and dismal empire. Yes, all may lend a helping hand in this great and glorious work; all may work in this widely-extended field of usefulness to man.

Hark! a cry is heard. What more can be done? What more? Much in every way. Therefore, go up, ye chivalrous spirits, go up to the very gates of the citadel. Knock, knock, loud and long! Let the stroke be heard throughout the length and breadth of the foe's dominions! Persevere! Persevere! Remember, "Perseverance lifts the globe." Persevere! "Perseverance is the only virtue crowned with success!" Oh, how sweet-scented the garland which encircles the brow of the Temperance warrior! How differently gained are his conquests to those of the Bonapartian and Wellingtonian race of heroes! They revelled in blood—he prevents its effusion.

We aspire not to the character of a prophet, or to that of the son of a prophet; yet we fearlessly predict that the Temperance light which is in the world, and which has already arrested the attention, and guided the erring feet of millions into the paths of sobriety and peace, who once wandered in the dark lanes and sombre roads of drunkenness, wretchedness, and misery, will never be extinguished. Confident are we that He who caused Bethlehem's Star to rise, and guided its course before the wondering Magi, is its author, for he is the author of all good, and to Him we ascribe the bringing forth into our firmament (already bespangled with the glittering orbs of his goodness and mercy) the Star of Temperance. The sun, the natural sun, which still shines upon the world, is the same luminary which shone upon our parents in Eden's paradise, not having lost a single beam; and the Star of our times will reach unto our children's children. What earthly power can extinguish the least star that twinkles above our heads? And what earthly or hellish power can put out the Star of Temperance? No! it is the proclaimer of "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will to men." It has already shone upon the tyrant and the slave; it has stayed the hand of the former, and melted with its burning charity the chains which bound the latter.

Speed, then, thy course, thou harbinger of good, until thou shalt not be able to rise upon the tyrant custom, nor set upon the slave of habit!

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

The NEXT MEETING of this CONFERENCE will be held on Wednesday evening, May 2, at seven o'clock, at MRS. WATTS'S, Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, when the presence of secretaries, or acting members of societies, is requested. Members of country societies visiting London will be welcomed, as one object of this Conference is to receive and to communicate information as to the general progress of the cause, and the modes of promoting its prosperity.

Friends from the country visiting London, and willing to aid the cause by their advocacy, are requested to forward their names and addresses to either of the following gentlemen:—Mr. J. W. Green, 80, Fenchurch-street; Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke, 2, Upper Crown-street, St. James's-park; or Mr. J. P. Draper, 88, Great Titchfield-street, Marylebone.

"STEAMIOUS!"—"Is Mr. — abstemious in his living?" asked a physician of a rather obtuse attendant upon a patient labouring under an inflammatory complaint. "He's abstemious enough in the eatin' part, but he's rather steamious when you come to the drinkin'."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

Several interesting and influential meetings have been held in London, during, and since, the Easter holidays. One of these was held in the large school-room, forming part of that celebrated place of worship, WHITFIELD'S CHAPEL, in Tottenham-court-road. Mr. J. W. Green presided, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Burns, the Rev. J. Doxsey, and Mr. T. A. Smith. Each of the speakers referred to the circumstance of a meeting for the advocacy of total abstinence from strong drinks being held, for the first time, in that celebrated place. Dr. Burns thought that the meeting would have afforded great pleasure to its distinguished founder, George Whitfield. He remarked, also, that the connexion between the place in which they were meeting and the adjoining chapel, was a striking emblem of the connexion between total abstinence from strong drink and religion. The school led to the chapel—total abstinence was introductory to religion.—The attendance was large and encouraging.

On GOOD FRIDAY, the Hall in Little Portland-street, Regent-street, occupied by the members of the Fitzroy and Marylebone Temperance Association, having undergone enlargement and repair, was re-opened. It is now an elegant, commodious, and comfortable place. A large party partook of tea, &c., after which a public meeting was held. In the absence of Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., who had been invited to preside, the Chair was taken by Mr. Miller, the Treasurer. A letter of apology was read from Mr. Heyworth, in which he said, "My earnest and best aspirations are for the spread and adoption of total abstinence principles. Entire abstinence from all use of intoxicating beverages is the easy and safe remedy for the great master evil, physical and moral, of drunkenness, which afflicts our country and overwhelms even the enlightened Saxon race with squalid poverty, and sinks the immortal souls of men into the deepest moral degradation. The morning of that day would indeed be brilliant with the radiance of human happiness, which should rise on a teetotal world. Individuals would be self-reformed, and political injustice would flee away."—Impressive addresses were delivered by the Chairman, and Messrs. J. P. Draper, J. W. Green, Wright, Sheppard, of Derby, T. Smith, from Upper Canada, T. B. Smithies, late of York, J. McCurrie, and Rev. J. Doxsey. Fifteen persons signed the pledge of total abstinence. Other influential meetings were held in the same place during the Easter week.

On EASTER TUESDAY there was a goodly muster of the brethren and sisters of various Rehabilitate Tents, in the School-room, Cross-street, Wilderness-row, Clerkenwell; Br. Charles Taylor in the chair. Addresses, explaining and recommending the principles and advantages of the order, were delivered by the brethren, C. Crump, J. W. Green, J. Blackwell, Chalmers, and others.

April 11.—A special meeting was held in the Temperance Hall, Waterloo-road, for the purpose of announcing extensive alterations in the building, and also in the management and operations of the society. Mr. J. W. Green occupied the chair; and addresses were delivered by Messrs. G. C. Campbell, F. Grosjean, and the Rev. J. Doxsey. The Rev. J. Sherman has consented to be the President of the new society.

The members and friends of the Christian Temperance Union held a special meeting, in the large School-room, Perry-street, St. Pancras, on Monday, April 16. The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. Burns, D.D., who, in the course of an interesting address, gave some account of his visit to America, and of the prevalence of the Temperance practice both in the United States and in Upper Canada. Mr. Roberts explained, briefly, "the natural philosophy of Teetotalism;" the Rev. J. Doxsey pointed out "the duty of Sabbath-school teachers in relation to the Temperance Reformation;"

Mr. G. C. Campbell showed that "the drinking customs of Britain were greatly calculated to retard missionary operations in heathen lands; and Mr. J. W. Green, who occupied the chair during the latter part of the evening, mentioned several "reasons why the friends and promoters of Teetotalism were so anxious to have the Christian community with them."—This plan of speaking to given topics works well.

STOKE-NEWINGTON.

From the annual report of the Teetotal Society in this place, just issued, we learn that there are on the books of the society the names of 230 persons who are regarded as consistent teetotalers. Some of these have been brought to the house of God, where the Gospel has been applied to the saving of their souls. Many others are abstaining who do not join the Society. A youths' society has recently been formed, the members of which hold meetings once a fortnight.

WELWYN, HERTS.

Great Northern Railway, District No. 2.

We continue to hold our little meeting once a fortnight, with some pleasing results. On Easter Monday we had a meeting in Hockey Chapel, when upwards of 50 sat down to an excellent tea provided by the Rev. W. Dunford, Mr. Wilmot and family. After tea Messrs. Jackson (chairman) Arnell, Matthews, Camp, Taylor, Wilmot, Greyham, and the Revs. W. Dunford, and W. Linsey, addressed the meeting. About ninety persons were present, seven of whom signed the pledge, making a total in our little band, of sixty-five teetotalers.

G. SMITH.

READING, BERKS.

On Good Friday the members of the Messenger of Peace Tent, of the Independent Order of Rechabites, L. U., celebrated their seventh anniversary in the Primitive Methodist school-room. After tea a public meeting was held, Br. J. Buckland presided. Addresses were delivered by Mrs. Boone, Fry, West, Rickman, and Hawkins. A fine brotherly feeling exists in this tent, and is evinced on all suitable occasions. It has been, in a great measure, the means of keeping teetotalism alive in this town.

J. WETHERELL.

SAINT IVES, HUNTINGDONSHIRE.

On Good Friday the third annual festival of the Total Abstinence Society was held in the Girls' British School-room; nearly 100 persons sat down to tea. A public meeting was afterwards held; Mr. George Skeels was called to the chair. The secretary read the report which was received with marked applause. Mr. J. Meff addressed the meeting with fervour and earnestness; he pointed to the activity prevailing in the society both in reference to politics, science, literature, and religion. But as intemperance was the source of the major part of the evils afflicting mankind, he urged all present to look at the question of total abstinence seriously, to ascertain whether it was not calculated to benefit all classes of society. Mr. Hett delivered an excellent speech and Mr. Gogg, of Huntingdon, gave a few striking illustrations of the effects of the two conflicting principles—intemperance and abstinence. Mr. Botterill wound up the proceedings with a touching address. The chairman made a few very appropriate remarks, and at the close several persons signed the pledge.

R. LANCE, Secretary.

DORCHESTER.

The Total Abstinence Society of this place met on Good Friday. After tea, addresses were delivered by working men, who testified that any amount of labour can be better performed without strong drinks than with them. A copy of Dr. Grindrod's "Bacchus," was presented to a youth who, though surrounded with temptations, had remained faithful for several years, and was now about to remove to a far distant land. Two of the most influential ministers of the town were present.

T. R.

OAKSEY, NEAR CIRENCESTER.

On Good Friday a meeting of the members and friends of temperance in this place was held, chiefly for the purpose of presenting a token of respect to Robert Gibbons, who, with his wife and three children, has since proceeded to America. Mr. W. Gibbons, who occupied the chair, Mr. A. Gibbons, Mr. Brown, Mr. R. Gibbons, Mr. C. Winstan, and the Rev. J. Jeffries addressed the meeting, which was also enlivened by the singing of some appropriate hymns. This society consists chiefly of young men, who have a reading society, &c.; their conduct and operations are attended with the most beneficial results to the village and neighbourhood.

BARROWFORD.

Interesting lectures have recently been delivered in this town by Mr. James Teare and Mrs. Theobald. The hall was well filled on each occasion by most attentive hearers, and the result has been the addition of upwards of 100 members to our society, and the confirmation and encouragement of many more.

JOHN ENGLAND.

BETLEY, STAFFORDSHIRE.

We have, for ten or twelve years, had a temperance society in Betley. For the first five or six years it was small and feeble, but through the persevering diligence and almost personal exertions of a worthy young man, John Cooper, the cause has been kept up, and within the last six years more have enquired into the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, and many have embraced it as one of the greatest blessings that ever visited our land, and we have had a general ingathering to our numbers. Mr. James Teare, from Preston, has delivered a course of six lectures, in the Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist Chapels, which have brought seventy more into the fold. Another branch also has shot out, and at their first meeting twenty-two men took the pledge, making the number ninety-two, for which we thank God.

WM. SWINNERTON, Sec.

LIVERPOOL.

Mr. C. Edevain, of Plymouth, has delivered a course of three lectures in this town to crowded audiences; his arguments and eloquence were listened to attentively, and on each occasion a number of signatures were obtained. From fifteen to twenty meetings are held in this town every week, besides an open air meeting every Sunday, weather permitting. The cause is rapidly progressing here, we find that the Teetotal Times and the Bristol Temperance Herald have done much to instruct and benefit the people.

T. HAVES.

FUDSEY, NEAR LEEDS.

On Easter Tuesday, a public tea party consisting of about 170 persons, was held in the temperance room in connexion with the Band of Hope. After tea a public meeting was held, when the room was densely crowded. Mr. Strickland, the president, occupied the chair, who after a few appropriate remarks, was followed by Messrs. Wm. Ackroyd, Wm. Proctor, John Lawson, G. Oates, J. Boyes, J. Walker, J. Wade and G. Proctor, who severally addressed the meeting in an interesting and instructive manner. The meeting was also enlivened by singing some temperance melodies, &c. The society at present is in a prosperous condition, the members being active and united in their efforts.

JOHN BOYES, Secretary.

HUDDERSFIELD.

A meeting of the members of the Wesleyan Union of Total Abstiners was held in the large vestry of Queen-street Chapel, on Easter Tuesday. About two hundred and twenty-five sat down to tea. After tea, the Rev. George B. Macdonald, superintendent of the circuit, opened the meeting with singing and prayer. He afterwards moved that Mr. S. Booth, surgeon, should take the chair. The secretary read the report, containing the principles and objects of the society; several of Mr. Wesley's rules and opinions, &c.; and stated that they had enrolled ninety members, consisting of trustees, local preachers, leaders, Sunday-school teachers, and tract distributors. Thirty Wesleyan Methodist ministers were patrons of the union, and about fifty branches were formed in different parts of the kingdom. In Huddersfield sixteen temperance prayer meetings had been held in the vestry of Queen-street Chapel. Interesting addresses were delivered by Mr. J. Harding, from London; Messrs. Bentley, Senior, Watson, Wild, and Wood.

The Committee of the Huddersfield Temperance Society recently engaged Mr. Hood to deliver a series of lectures, which he did to large and attentive audiences, whom he occasionally amused by singing some of his "temperance melodies." The meetings were presided over by Messrs. Booth, Wrigley, Edwards, and the Revs. R. Skinner, and H. Leigh. On the first evening Mr. Booth addressed the meeting at some length on the moral condition of the juvenile community, furnishing extracts from Mr. Worsley's essay, recently published.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

Our Society in this town has recently prospered. Our meetings are crowded in the town, and in the villages we are holding Temperance Festivals. Hundreds of persons, at the course of this and last year, have enrolled their names in the pledge-book. There have recently been delivered in St. Peter's Quay, a "Course of Temperance Lectures," where, every evening, the Reading-room was crowded to excess. The first lecture was delivered by Mr. Wilcke, on "The nature of intoxicating drinks, and the chemical changes which take place in producing them." Mr. Weir gave a second lecture on "The history of Intemperance, its influence on the destinies of Empires." Mr. Burney on "The Moral Elevation of the Working Classes." Mr. Allen on "The position of the Church in relation to the Drinking Customs of the age." Mr. Turner on "The influence of Temperance on the Sons of Toil." Mr. Barkas on "Strong Drink." The whole of the lectures were listened to with the deepest attention, and every night several names were obtained. The friends in the village determined on having a temperance tea party and concert, which was attended by about 400 persons. After tea, about 800 persons were present. Mr. Wilcke presided; and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Weir, Burney, Elliot, Littlefair, and others. Between each address, temperance melodies were sung and recitations were given, and the band enlivened the meeting by playing several pieces of music. Thirteen signatures were taken after this meeting.

JOHN DONALDSON, Jun.

NORTH SHIELDS. 1849-

On Thursday, the 8th ult., the teetotalers of North Shields made a grand demonstration in the Assembly-rooms, when about 600 partook of tea. Mr. Pyle, surgeon, in the chair. The following were amongst the speakers:—Messrs. Buchannan, Charlton, Clasper, Elliott, Guthrie, Haggie, Johnson, Lillie, Middlemas, Strachan, Wilcke, and White. Mr. Lillie, on behalf of the Society, presented Mr. Johnson with a watch and appendages, bearing the following inscription: "Presented by the Tynemouth Total Abstinence Society, as a token of respect and esteem to Mr. W. E. Johnson, for his able and unceasing exertions as honorary secretary to the above society." The proceedings were enlivened by the harmony of Messrs. Cook, Graham, Little, Simpson, and Ward. Mr. Simpson accompanied his singing on the pianoforte, and Mr. Hill delighted the company with his musical glasses. The meeting was interesting and cheering; nearly 500 persons have joined the society since the 1st of January, 1849, and numbers here are enrolling themselves weekly. W. G., jun.

FOREIGN.

CANADA.

The thirteenth annual meeting of the Montreal Temperance Society was held in Zion Church, on the evening of Friday, February 2. About 1,000 persons were present. The report then presented stated that a number of interesting meetings had been held during the year, and some names were added to the pledge almost every evening. One of the greatest temperance meetings ever held in Montreal, or perhaps in any country, was that convened in the Bonsecour Temperance-hall, to hear addresses from the Rev. Messrs. Chinguy and O'Reilly, Roman Catholics, and Rev. Dr. Cramp, and W. Taylor, Protestants; together with the Hon. M. Cameron, and others. The Mayor was in the chair, with the R.C. Bishop of Montreal, and several members of parliament, and other influential gentlemen around him. The immense hall was densely filled by persons of all classes, who listened attentively to addresses of remarkable pathos and power.

BOMBAY.

The annual meeting of the Bombay Teetotal Society was held in the officers' mess-room, Town Barracks, on Monday evening, January 8. The Ven. Archdeacon Jeffreys, patron of the society, took the chair, supported by the Rev. A. G. Frazer, the president. The Revs. J. M. Mitchell, D. O. Allen, R. W. Hume, O. French, &c., were present. The attendance was numerous and highly respectable, and the proceedings were eminently calculated to forward the progress of the temperance cause. It appeared from the report that 86 new signatures had been added to the pledge. But there was reason to believe that the society was exerting an indirect influence over all classes of the community. The drinking usages were by no means what they used to be. Intemperance among the higher classes was seldom heard of. Many respectable families who had not joined the society, totally abstained from the use of intoxicating liquors, and several clergymen, as well as members of the civil and military services, had practically adopted the principles of the society. Good had been effected by the circulation of the organ of the society, the Bombay Temperance Advocate. A library had been formed of about fifty standard works on temperance, and a further supply was on the way from England. The Teetotal Times and other English temperance periodicals, were also furnished to subscribers. In the course of last year a circular was prepared by the committee, and sent to all the medical gentlemen in the presidency, forwarding for their opinion the medical certificate, which had been signed by about 1,400 medical gentlemen in Great Britain. About 30 of the gentlemen sent to had replied, nearly all of whom fully concurred in the sentiments of the certificate.

SOUTH INDIA.

We have just received the report of the South India Temperance Union. The monthly meetings have been held with greater regularity, the attendance being larger and more respectable. A deeper degree of interest in the concerns of temperance appears to have manifested itself at these assemblies, and it has been cheering to witness, on nearly every occasion, persons coming forward to affix their names to the pledge. The following statement exhibits the progress made during the year in respect to numbers:—Reported last annual meeting, 337; broken pledge, 37; died, 5; transferred to juvenile society, 9; reducing the number to 286; add, joined during the year, 106; total members, January, 1849, 392. The new members are, apparently, persons who have taken the step from deliberate and solid conviction. A distinct society has been formed for the benefit of children, with a plain and simple pledge. We find in the numbers of the South India Temperance Journal copious extracts from the Rev. W. R. Baker's work, "Intemperance the Idolatry of Britain."

RECENT PUBLICATION.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE EXTENT AND CAUSES OF JUVENILE DEPRAVITY. Dedicated, by special permission, to the Right Hon. the Earl of Carlisle. By THOMAS BEGGS. London: Charles Gilpin, Bishopsgate Without.

OUR last number contained a notice of the essay by the Rev. H. Worsley, entitled "Juvenile Depravity," to which was awarded a prize of £100. The essay of Mr. Beggs was adjudged worthy of a second prize. "It has since undergone careful revision. Fresh facts and statistics have been added, and, in many instances, more recent substituted for those of an earlier date." Without entering into an invidious comparison of the two essays, we express the cordial pleasure with which we have read the one now before us. The facts and statistics furnished by Mr. Beggs are such as must convince every reader that juvenile depravity has been steadily increasing amongst us, exciting apprehension and alarm; and that it has increased "contemporaneously with unwonted exertions in the cause of education, and in every form of practical benevolence." A searching inquiry is made into the CAUSES of this alarming increase; and while defects in popular education, and in the arrangements of mining, factory, and agricultural operations come in for a share of blame, the evil is traced, chiefly, to the drinking habits of the population, and to those low and demoralizing associations to which those habits usually lead. This we naturally expected in an essay written by a gentleman who has for so many years devoted himself to an examination of the chief causes of the evils prevalent in society, and to an enlightened and zealous advocacy of total abstinence from strong drinks, as the mighty instrument for the removal of those evils. Indeed, in the dedication of the essay to the Earl of Carlisle, Mr. Beggs puts this subject prominently forward; he says, "I have been animated by a desire to attract your lordship's attention to a subject too much overlooked in the inquiries of the day—the intemperate habits of the population. After much painful experience, I feel that unless these are corrected all our benevolent exertions will be but partially successful. If I am urgent on this point, it arises from a deep and settled conviction that the drinking customs must be abolished before we can hope for any material or permanent improvement in the condition of the people."

Forcible reasonings, expressed in terms of considerable eloquence, are founded upon the facts and statistics so industriously collected. It is clearly shown to be the duty of the philanthropist and the Christian "to give a fair and candid examination to the inquiries suggested." We sincerely hope that this will be the case, and that as the result, appropriate and efficient remedies will be applied to an evil which begets, and threatens to perpetuate, pauperism, crime, misery, and all that is evil.

We could easily enrich our pages with extracts: our limits at present will only allow us to name the "contents" of the volume:—Chapter 1. Introductory—the subject stated. 2. 3. 4. The dangerous classes; numbers of the criminal, pauper, and vagrant classes; state of education; domestic and social condition. 5. 6. Juvenile depravity: an inquiry into its causes; the mining population; the factory and agricultural population. 7. General condition of the poorer classes; means spent in drink; prison and police statistics. 8. Prostitution: its extent and causes. 9. Vice and profligacy among the more educated classes; the drinking habits a cause of individual degradation; Sabbath schools. 10. Consideration of remedies. Appendix."

We recommend every public advocate, not only of teetotalism, but of every movement which has for its object the improvement of the physical, social, and moral condition of the people, to make himself familiar with the facts contained in this volume. This, he may depend upon it, will make him a more consistent and efficient advocate than he could otherwise be. We recommend also to those who have it in their power to place this volume in the hands of those gentlemen to whom is committed the administration of public justice,—the punishment of offenders; though there is a fact revealed in the Appendix which shows that gentlemen sustaining that high and responsible office do not always "hear and determine" according to the evidence before them. Reference to this will be made in our next number.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

BAD SIGNS.—It is a bad sign to see a man with his hat off at midnight, explaining the theory and principles of true democracy to a lamp-post. It is also a bad sign to see a fellow lie down in the gutter, supposing it to be his bed, and to commence calling a poor innocent hog all sorts of hard names, mistaking it for his wife.

DRINKING LIKE A BEAST.—Being at a wedding party where there were some wild young men, they proposed that the Rev. Mr. Murray should drink wine with them; to this he assented, remarking at the same time that "he could drink like a beast." At this they stared at each other, winked, plainly intimating that they would make him go the entire animal. After drinking a glass he positively refused to take any more. They then reminded him of his promise, to which he replied, "I have performed my promise: I have had enough, and a beast always leaves off when he has had enough." The reproach was keenly felt, and, it is said, had a very salutary effect.

BREWERS AND VICTUALERS.—The total number of brewers in England amounts to 2,196; the number of victualers is 58,980, of whom 36,062 are licensed to sell beer to be drunk on the premises.

NO SENSE.—An American paper states that a poor drunken cobbler was recently picked up in the streets, with no sense in his head, or cents in his pockets; but having a powerful scent of spirits, he was sent to the watch-house to conclude his celebration of Saint Monday.

A LITTLE MERRY.—A man on being charged with being drunk on the Sunday preceding, it appeared that he had gone to the house of the grandmother of a young woman whose nuptials had on the morning of the same day been solemnized. The old dame, being overjoyed at the happy occurrence, gave the defendant "a thribble charging of rum in the naked state" the real quantity of which could not be ascertained. He thus became "gloriously drunk." Fined 2s. 6d. and costs.

DRINKING PARENTS, BEWARE!—The drunkard injures and enfeebles his own nervous system, and entails mental disease upon his family. At present I have two patients who appear to inherit a tendency to unhealthy action of the brain, from mothers addicted to drinking; and another, an idiot, whose father was a drunkard.—Dr. Brown.

LIVING MARTYRS FOR TEETOTALISM.

[BY D. PARSONS.]

It has been asserted by many, that the age of martyrdom has passed away; but this is a great mistake, and has arisen from an incorrect view of the term "martyr." This term comes from the Greek word, "Martur," which means, a witness. The reason why it is applied to those who have suffered for their faith is, that they were prominent witnesses, or martyrs. There are several ways of testifying our sentiments. We may talk about them and publish them. We may reduce them to practice, and exhibit them in our lives; or, we may suffer and die for them. Of course, the latter requires an amount of attachment and zeal which few persons, comparatively, possess. Many will profess a truth when it is respectable—especially if "the rulers" believe.

It is said that the dog understands his master's eye and the direction of his countenance, and if he runs on a little before, always comes back to see if his lord is coming, and exhibits the utmost consternation if he has by chance taken the wrong road, and scampers about, and almost outstrips the wind, to make an atonement for his error. Eastern slaves, we are told, wait upon their masters' nod, or finger, and are always at their beck and command. These things may look very well in an animal, and may be quite politic in the conduct of the human chattels of a despot, but are intolerable in a land of intelligence and freedom. And yet we fear that we have many among us who are as obsequious as any spaniel. Indeed, we have reason to believe that in this characteristic the canine bipeds outnumber their brethren of the quadruman order. It is amazing what a multitude of well-educated people will embrace a principle when my Lord John Russell, or Sir Robert Peel, become its advocate. What a respectable thing Teetotalism would be if the Queen and Prince Albert were to sign the pledge! and yet the addition of all the crowned heads in Europe, or the world, would not add one jot to the truth, the equity, or benevolence of any dogma or doctrine. If the matter is not right and true in itself, you cannot make it so by any multiplication of adherents, either from the masses, from princes, or philosophers. It does not require the assent or consent of the Archbishop of Canterbury, of my Lord Rosse, of the Emperor of Germany, or even of the angel Gabriel, to add authority or respectability to the proposition, "that all the angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles." No man can give dignity to a principle until that principle has given dignity to him, just as the dew-drop borrows from the sun all the splendour which glows in its little orb.

Would that men would reflect on these facts, and embrace truth for its own sake, instead of halting until it has received some accidental or meretricious adornment! Total Abstinence is the dictate of nature—of philosophy—of humanity—of religion. It does not require the great seal of England, or the patronage of nobles, to render it worthy of universal adoption. Ministers of State, or of religion, may or may not embrace it, but its claims are the same. Philosophers may smile or frown, and the wealthy may contribute or refuse; the multitude may cry it up, or cry it down; and yet it will remain the same benefactor to rescue the drunkard from ruin, and the guardian-angel of the fallen man to protect him from one of his greatest banes.

Who would think that to abstain from a poison would expose any one to contempt or loss? And yet—"Oh, tell it not in Gath!"—the month of May, 1849, has seen not a few teetotal martyrs. There are people among us who require that we should ruin ourselves by drinking this most destructive drug, or else they threaten us with their ire, and prognosticate our ruin. The total abstainer has to take up his cross. Myriads would sign the pledge but for obloquy and persecution. It is a lamentable circumstance, that we have still the Church and the world in league against us. We blush to record the truth, but it is a fact, that the majority of professing Christians are fond of intoxicating liquors, and by their example, however little they consume, sanction a custom which is burying thousands in perdition. They do what they can to talk and live down the friends of real temperance. The wife that signs the pledge has no rest until she breaks it; the husband must return to his cups, or the peace of his home is gone; the child must poison himself at the risk of parental indignation; and thus almost every obstacle is thrown in the way of the benevolent progress of this philanthropic movement.

There is, then, a species of martyrdom which numbers who have joined our ranks are doomed to endure. As we have said before, there are different forms of martyrdom, and almost every age has had its own peculiar mode of persecution. At one time, the witness must renounce the truth, or die at the stake; at another, he may be tortured in the inquisition; another may be mulet of his civil and religious rights and privileges; and another may be pointed at with the finger of scorn, and robbed of his trade or domestic happiness. Some sins also are endowed, or attended with a revenue of worldly emolument. Such a transgressor receives his consolation in this life: there is no hope for the impenitent beyond the grave. At death, the sorrow of the Christian is turned into joy, but the joy of the wicked into sorrow. The loss of friends, of reputation, and of temporal emolument, is the penalty which many have to pay for renouncing a sinful trade, or traffic. Here is martyrdom with a witness, and often quite as painful as the dungeon or the stake. He who sealed the truth with his blood was, in many instances, soon cut off, and the flames proved only a chariot of fire to conduct him to heaven. But the living martyr has sometimes years of want, and pain, and reproach. Were the sum-total of his daily woes and nightly sorrows weighed in an even balance, it would be seen that he has suffered as much for the truth as his brother who was beheaded or thrown to the lions.

We make these remarks for three reasons:—

I. To encourage our brethren and sisters who are persecuted for taking the pledge.—You do well to remember that there is nothing good among us but has been bought with pain. Not only is redemption the price of blood, but there is hardly a blessing we enjoy which has not been obtained by the martyrdom of its early adherents. Men and women, of indomitable spirit and unswerving faith and patience, have been necessary to save the world from barbarism, tyranny, ignorance, and ungodliness. Do not, then, suppose that a vice which has obtained such patronage, which has yielded so large an amount of revenue, and become so popular that even the Church has been corrupted by it, will be abandoned without a struggle. The resources of persecution which the age can command will probably be exercised to prevent your bearing your living testimony against this abomination. Rejoice that your opponents have no more power. Bear up under the ridicule, the reproach, the loss, or the frown which you have to endure. The principle you advocate is worth suffering for. It will bless you, and save others. It is good for your health, for your pocket, for your intellect, and morals. It is good for your country, for the world, and the Church. It can save you from the premature grave of the drunkard and moderate drinker; it will protect your children and relatives from the woes of the intemperate; it will reclaim the poor inebriate who is already on the brink of ruin, and who, in his haste to destroy himself, has beggared his family, and robbed his tender wife and lovely children of every hope. To be a martyr in such a philanthropic cause is an honour which an angel might envy, and which none but a coward would shun. Be steadfast, then, and immoveable in this glorious effort to free the earth from one of its greatest scourges.

II. We desire to encourage and call forth the timid.—Many, from various causes, are afraid to join us. They know we are right; they feel assured that it would be an advantage to abstain; they are convinced that the physical, the domestic, the social, the intellectual and moral benefits that would result from the general adoption of Total Abstinence, would be incalculable, and therefore they are with us in spirit; and yet they stand aloof from our ranks, and continue to use this abominable beverage, and sometimes make an effort to defend their practice. An inspired tongue has said, "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth." Now this very self-condemnation is the portion of those individuals of which we are speaking. They "allow" in themselves a practice which their conscience condemns, and do so to avoid the annoyance or persecution to which their open avowal of the truth would expose them. To save themselves from obloquy or loss, they drink a beverage which wages a deadly war with their mortal and immortal natures. They sanction a crime which is destroying their fellow creatures by the thousand. What a sacrifice to be offered at the shrine of cowardice! Other men present vast hecatombs on the altar of their valour or ambition, but the timid present their oblations to "fear," and therefore afford an awful proof that all greatness of soul has long since been annihilated. The Bible tells us that "the fearful" shall have their portion with liars and debauchees; and no wonder—spirits so mean would be a disgrace to the kingdom of heaven. To such we would say, "BE MEN!" Come out from the reckless multitude, who, by moderate or immoderate draughts, destroy themselves. Join our ranks; be a living martyr for humanity and religion, remembering that he who is unwilling to suffer for a good principle, is unworthy of the benefits which it confers.

III. Cannot our teetotal friends do something for their suffering or persecuted brethren?—Many valuable—aye, invaluable—individuals are now longing to quit stations connected with the manufacture or sale of intoxicating drinks. Some are suffering the most excruciating mental agony, because they have no opening to make their escape. Beggary stares them in the face, and the reproach of reducing their children to starvation awaits them, if they cease to dispense poisons. We saw an interesting letter, the other day, from a gentleman of good character and education, who was determined to give up his present occupation in a brewery, and yet had no prospect of another station, nor any property to fall back upon. What an invaluable traveller, clerk, &c., such a man would be! Surely these cases ought to be known; and our teetotal friends should use their influence to obtain employment for honourable men, who are thus becoming living martyrs for the welfare of the world. A word to the wise is enough.

UDOR, THE PILGRIM BOY.

BY DALMOCAND.

THOSE who abstain from dramming (and from over-cramming) may now and then look forward to a bout of dreaming without a shudder; them the alcoholic demon, with his train of terrors, cannot horrify. In visions of the day or night, what strange occurrences take place! Let me narrate to you an interesting dream about a bright-eyed boy, and the companions he fell in with on his way through Toperland in quest of insight.

There he goes, with a small bundle beneath his arm, glancing ever and anon at the noon-day sun above him, and warbling low the praises of his Maker:—

Praise ye the Lord of Glory;
Praise Him, ye children all:
Praise Him, ye old and hoary;—
Before his footstool fall.
For He our steps hath guided,
Our souls preserved from harm:
Whene'er distress betided,
How nigh Jehovah's arm!

"Well sung, young one!" cried a voice at his elbow; and turning round, the youth beheld a respectable-looking man, with a respectable stomach, panting at his side.

MAN.—As we travel together for a little—your name, my young friend?

BOY.—My name, Sir, is Udor; so called from the love I bear to water, which, believe me, is the life-blood of creation.

MAN.—Philosophy in milk-teeth! Did you never hear that water drowned the world, destroying thousands?

UDOR.—And justly, for their sins. My late companion says that the world at present deserves half-drowning for despising water. But what think you, sir, of the spirit-vent, which, every year, kills like another flood?

MAN.—Why, my name is Lovedrop; a little agrees with me well enough.

UDOR.—But does it not sometimes confuse you, sir? LOVEDROP.—That I own, child; but then, most clergymen and physicians of my acquaintance, who should know best, will not do without it, nor can I.

UDOR.—Is it right, sir, to follow a multitude to do evil, shutting one's own eyes to human wrecks around us? "If the blind lead —"

LOVEDROP.—Why, Udor, you forget yourself. True, I have read a text about babes and sucklings; but do you really think yourself a match in argument for the Rev. Mr. Sipaway, whose head is like a library; or for the skilful Dr. Wink, whose knowledge reaches to the days of Galeu?

UDOR.—Much learning and right acting should, I know, be found together; so should grey hairs and wisdom; but "great men," Elihu tells us, "are not always wise." Do you need a candle to behold yon sun?

LOVEDROP.—Really, you would have "Abstinence made Easy" with a vengeance! Yet I must confess every person should judge for himself, as each at least must answer for himself.

UDOR.—Dear Mr. Lovedrop, I'm sure you'll soon be one of us. Oh! there is Mr. Stavebarrel I told you about, coming up the avenue. How delighted he will be!

LOVEDROP.—At my leisure I'll think of it; but as your friend has a propensity for staving barrels, perhaps he may mistake me for one; so, good-bye.

At this unexpected turn of matters, poor Udor's heart languished, and he sat by the wayside until his former comrade should come up.

STAVEBARREL.—Hallo! Udor; chewing again the cud of disappointment? Well know I the fire-ship now steaming in the distance. Cheer up, my boy!

UDOR.—Thanks, my old friend. But who comes to meet us?

STAVEBARREL.—I declare 'tis Trap, the publican, and sober, for a wonder. Well, Mr. Trap, how go the times?—long while since we parted.

TRAP.—Ah, friend Hugbarrel, glad to see you. Hard times, indeed; what with teetotal humbug, little else remains but to recall the happy nights of yore.

STAVEBARREL.—Humbug? Mr. Trap.

TRAP.—Yes; these idiots affirm that drink is poison, and publicans are poison-mongers!

UDOR.—Dreadful charge that, sir.

TRAP.—Shameful, youngster; but they say, moreover, that we publicans are voracious spiders, and agents for the Evil One—that we make husbands monsters, wives broken-hearted, and children parentless.

STAVEBARREL.—A grand thing an approving conscience, Mr. Trap.

TRAP.—In truth, mine gives me small disturbance one way or t'other; all must live, you know. I don't pour drink down people's throats—only table it.

UDOR.—Please, sir, I've read in my Bible that the man who had a vicious ox, yet, knowing its mischievous disposition, allowed it to go at large, was held responsible for its doings. If publicans would choose another way of livelihood, God would not forget them any more than He does the ravens when they cry to Him.

TRAP.—Hey, friend Hugbarrel, what young cockatrice have we here!—but here's my snuggery; come in, and I'll treat you to a jorum in return for past favours.

STAVEBARREL.—Hark! Mr. Trap: I thank God my name is altered now. When I think how foolish I was to be your dupe, shame overwhelms me. I bear you no malice, but pray that you may be turned into a lover of light and a hater of darkness.

At this unexpected salute Trap's organ of speech "abdicated," and the two friends pursued their journey.

UDOR.—Is it not strange that a man of Mr. Lovedrop's intelligence should prefer the path of danger, and stranger still that the persons he alluded to should continue props of the drinking system?

STAVEBARREL.—Strange, indeed; but close personal thought is labour which most men dislike. Doctors might reflect that though tipping patients are good employers, they make, in general, bad paymasters, and from their ricketty constitutions often slip away, carrying with them the physician's hard-earned reputation; while on the abstinence plan, drudgery would be diminished, and the profession, comparatively speaking, ennobled—blind routine and quackery would be superseded by inquiry.

UDOR.—But what can detain the clergy? In every good endeavour they should be foremost, as "ensamples to the flock."

STAVEBARREL.—I like not to accuse any, yet I fear that with some sheer inconsiderateness is the anchor, and that in other cases the spectacles seen through are furnished by those tricksters—appetite and fancy. When the unlearned or the child can, on this point, sing with the Psalmist, "Wiser than my teachers I've become," the pastor's influence for good melts wofully away.

UDOR.—Solemn chapters those in Ezekiel on the watchman's duties.

STAVEBARREL.—Yes, my boy; but we must pray that the watch-towers of Zion may speedily give forth no uncertain sound, and that the day may soon be ushered in when men shall "wander after" DRINK no more.

Thereafter, Stavebarrel struck up to a martial air the following ditty, Udor assisting in full chorus:—

Claimants of reflecting souls!

Heed ye how time gulward rolls?

Brethren, hark! the gospel tolls—

"Work ye while 'tis called to-day!"

Wot ye him who virtue shakes?

Home's endearing joys upheaks?

Reason's golden sceptre takes?

Men, arise! this spoiler stay.

Mark ye weak believer's stray?

Human energies decay?

Wherefore deadness? why delay?

Down with Drink's fell tyranny!

Nature ne'er a sot designed;

Wanton pleasure aids not MIND;

Should vile custom freemen bind?

Truth demands supremacy.

Reck ye not what bitter woes,

Wine-impelled, the drunkard sows?

Foster not beguiling foes—

Moderation's pleas wax stale.

Ponder, then, this lofty theme,

Cease in listless ease to dream;

What though hosts opposing gleam,

By Heav'n cheered, we will prevail!

FARMER (over a fence).—Ho! my hearties; from your highway music, I thought at first you had been visiting Old Trap down the way.

UDOR (smiling).—No, sir; we are Teetotalers.

FARMER.—Teetotalers! I abhor the name.

STAVEBARREL.—How does abstinence displease you, master?

FARMER.—I can temperate myself, and I detest your bondage.

STAVEBARREL.—So thought many others who have fallen. As to bondage, I rather think it is all on the other side. You surely would consider it no "bondage" to promise abstinence from hemlock tea or arsenic pudding?

FARMER.—Drink, I admit, has ruined many, and brought about much mischief, but what can you object to a glass of wine, or a pot of porter?

STAVEBARREL.—Just the same thief, with his face blackened, for I have seen it proved. I can never clap my eye on a lot of ducks enjoying themselves in some precious puddle, without being painfully reminded of my porter-swilling sittings.

LABOURER.—Ay, but a "morning" of the clear stuff carries a man wonderfully through his work.

STAVEBARREL.—And often past it, friend. Little did I imagine once that the harmless-seeming "morning" would in time call for a "meridian," and at last end in a debauch; thoughtless, moreover, of the dreadful warning in Isaiah—read it, Udor.

UDOR.—"Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning to follow strong drink"—and below—"Therefore hath hell enlarged herself."

STAVEBARREL.—God grant that these "wines of Sodom" may be quickly drummed out of human estimation!

FARMER.—Rate them as you please; yet I don't see how men can do without them.

UDOR.—Is it because the lower animals have no souls that they require no drams?

FARMER.—Well, youngster, that thought never struck me; and as I suspect there are no grog-shops in the next world, at least in the better portion of it, you may, perhaps, after all, make out a true bill for abstinence. At all events I shall never again stand up for the drinking system.

LABOURER.—I'll consider the thing too, but mayhap wife may jeer.

STAVEBARREL.—Laugh with joy, you mean, as every sensible woman should. But be thoroughly persuaded, masters. Just think the subject over in all its bearings, then call on enlightened reason for its verdict, and on Omnipotence for upholding grace. Did men act always thus, there would be fewer downfalls, and our tipsey world, returning to the beverage of Eden, would be oftener found rejoicing over manly pleasures.

With mutual good wishes, the husbandman and travellers part company. Suddenly another halt is called, and the sons of abstinence press around that primitive decanter, a crystal fountain, which looked trembling up from within its grassy border, to regale the passer-by; there, hopefully discussing further progress, let us for the present leave them.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IDLE EXCUSES FOR THE NEGLECT OF POSITIVE DUTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—It is a lamentable fact, that, notwithstanding the incontrovertible proofs constantly brought forward to show the efficiency of the Total Abstinence principle to accomplish what its judicious advocates say it is capable of accomplishing, there still exists a powerful spirit of opposition, arising, as we believe, in most instances, from wilful and determined ignorance.

A proof of this was given, a short time ago, by a person in affluent circumstances, and a leader in one of our churches. When asked whether he had been to hear one of our lecturers, he said—"No, I have not; I never did hear one. I never read any of your publications, neither do I intend. I do not like your principles." Now, this was but a verbal expression of the feeling entertained by many of our opponents, though the manifestations are as varied as the countenances of those who entertain them.

There are, however, those who profess to be our friends, but it is not till they are tested that we discover the true value of their friendship. In words, they wish us "Good speed," and "hope we shall get on;" but when asked to assist, they "cannot"—either their conscientious scruples or their constitutional requirements forbid their doing anything.

We had a striking proof of this while soliciting signatures to our petition for the gradual abolition of beer-shops. Several of those waited upon were members of Christian churches. Some said, "I shall not;" others said, "It is not right to deprive the working man of his comfort;" another, "That it was good for men to meet, and have the opportunity of assembling with their equals to enjoy their pint and pipe after a hard day's toil;" another, "If we were asking for the closing of all public-houses as well as beer-shops, they would sign, but they did not like monopoly; and if beer-shops were closed, it would be going back to the old system." Let us for a moment look at these reasons for not signing the petition.

"It is not right to deprive a working man of his comfort." So we say. But how, in the name of common sense, does the working man derive comfort from attending the beer-shops? In what way does this promote his comfort? If going there to drink and gamble; to learn to curse and swear; to barter away health, reputation, affection, and love of home; to sacrifice virtue, honesty, industry, and self-respect—if this be promoting his comfort, then, in the name of all that is good, let us support rather than abolish them. If a man's comfort consists in destroying the happiness of his wife, the peace of his home, and the joy of his family—if he is more comfortable when his children are ignorant instead of being instructed; ragged instead of being clothed; idle, dissolute, and wicked, instead of becoming good and honourable members of society; then, we say, let the working man attend the beer-shop. But who dare say it is so! Beer-shops promote a man's comfort! Did men ever "gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles?"

Again, "It is good for men to have the opportunity to meet with their equals." If this had been said in reference to mechanic's institutes, schools of design, discussion classes, reading societies, or weekly religious services, we should have been disposed to coincide with the remark; but when applied to beer-shops, we should as soon say, that as hell is inhabited by impenitent souls, let more go thither, because it is good for such to meet with their equals. It is a feature indelibly stamped upon the character of beer-shops, that they never raise but always lower the standard of man's morality.

And for persons to say they will not sign, because we do not ask for public-house; to be closed as well, and that we are aiming at the re-establishment of the public-house monopoly, is a mere shuffle. If we had asked them to sign a petition of that description, we should have been designated wild enthusiasts, crack-brained fanatics, and a thousand other equally honourable names. But we believe we are right in asking for a repeal of the Beer Act, because it has not done what its promoters say they intended it should. The monopoly was not destroyed by it, but rather extended and strengthened; and the poorer classes did not get a better description of beer. Adulteration was practised as much, if not more, than before. And it must be plain to every one who for a moment turns attention to the subject, that the evils resulting from this act are such, that their removal is of vital importance to all classes; and that, in aiming at this, we are aiming at the destruction of one of the greatest evils that ever afflicted society, or blasted the character of our nation.

SONG FOR TEETOTALERS.

Talk not to me of rosy wine!
Nor offer me the bowl;
For though your boasted liquor shine,
'Tis Poison to the soul.
When wines across the senses flow,
Then reason's voice grows mute;
And heaven-born man sinks down below
The level of the brute.
Then give to me the chrysal drink,
Pure water, clear, and bright;
Which helps the mind of man to think,
But ne'er destroys his sight.
But mention not your rosy wine
Nor offer me the bowl;
For tho' the liquid brightly shine,
'Tis Poison to the Soul.

INDIRECT RESULTS OF THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

In calculating the results of the temperance movement, we are not merely to confine our attention to the fact that drunkards have been reclaimed and the sober preserved, but we must take into account the many indirect advantages to the Church and to the community at large, which all admit the temperance movement has produced.

Though the drinking customs are still powerful, and almost universally prevalent, has not the persevering agitation of this question greatly modified them, and, in many cases, abolished them altogether? Is it now no longer a breach of etiquette, in any company, to decline partaking of the fashionable beverage? This would not have been the case a few years ago; but the prominence that has of late been given to temperance principles has brought the nation round to more sober and consistent thoughts.

This movement has also brought out a body of valuable, though appalling, statistics, in reference to the crime, poverty, disease, and death, connected with our national sin; and this has led to legislative interference, with a view of promoting counteractive and sanitary measures. The modifications that have lately taken place on the license law, and the strict police surveillance under which all licensed houses in our towns and cities are now placed, must all be traced to the public interest which the temperance movement has awakened on this subject.

To what other cause, also, but to this, is to be traced the almost universal abandonment of drinking at funerals (in Scotland), and the manifest improvement that has taken place in business transactions. The public mind has been disabused of many false and foolish notions—many fallacies have been exploded; and people are beginning to feel that these drinks are not so necessary as they were once deemed; and that both heat and cold can be endured, and hard labour performed, without their aid. This movement has elicited a great amount of valuable medical testimony in support of this; and the result now is, that men in every trade and profession, even where the two extremes of heat and cold would seem altogether incompatible with abstinence, have successfully adopted it. The fireman smelting at the hot-blast furnace, or the fisherman upon the open sea, all bear testimony to the efficiency of this principle in connexion with any kind of labour where health is enjoyed. There are temperance ships crossing the seas, embracing at this moment the spirit of the Cape, or cutting their way among the ice-mountains of the Pole. But for the facts which this movement has elicited, and the experience it has called forth, all this would have been deemed quite preposterous but a few years ago.

A great point has thus been gained, in disabusing the public mind of many popular fallacies connected with these drinks.

We can thus claim for the temperance movement a great many very beneficial indirect results produced by its operation, in addition to the objects at which it directly aims—the reclaiming of the drunkard and the preserving of the sober. We confidently appeal to friends and foes, in the assurance that all will admit that much good has been accomplished, even in the more indirect benefits which this movement has conferred upon our country and church. Proverbial as our country is for drunkenness, lamentably bad as it is in this respect, would it not have been much worse had this movement never been commenced? And who of those opposed to it would have the hardihood to express the wish that it would, from this moment, entirely cease its operations? We point all such to the achievements of this cause—to wretched families made happy—to thousands of youthful abstainers preserved from the path of the destroyer—to many pernicious drinking customs abolished, and others greatly modified, or fast disappearing—to the more just and philosophical views which the public mind has formed of our national vice; and if opposition is expressed, we say—“Refrain, lest haply ye be found to fight against God.”—From “The Adviser” for May.

DESPOTISM AND CRUELTY.

SOME time ago, an engine-tender was dismissed from his situation, after repeated admonition, for intemperance. Amongst the applicants for the place, one was engaged (in other respects well qualified) because he was especially recommended for sobriety. As soon as he came to his duty, the men gathered around him and demanded the sum of eighteen shillings for drink. He felt this to be particularly grievous from his own respectable habits, and because that, from having been out of place for some time, he was very poor. He remonstrated with them. He told them that “he had been three weeks without work, and was very badly off;” that “he could not find the money;” and that, “as he was averse to liquor himself, he could not comply.” But the tyranny practised on these occasions was soon brought to bear upon him. Systematic and relentless persecution from that moment was his portion. His tools were taken away and hidden; it was contrived to interrupt him continually, and means were effectually taken to obstruct the regular working of the engine. He was soon convinced that he must appear to his employers unequal to his duty, and be discharged. Indignant as he was at this treatment, he must either comply or leave the place to seek another, probably beset with the same objection. The struggle was a hard one: too lately had he been on the verge of want. His resolution could hold out no longer. With a heavy heart he went to the overlooker, and borrowed of him ten shillings to provide for the drunken revel!

HOBART TOWN, POLYNESIA, &c.

THE following will, no doubt, be read with interest; it forms the principal portion of a letter addressed to Mr. W. Spriggs, of Lambeth, by Mr. C. V. Boniface, whose zealous advocacy of Teetotalism will be remembered with respect by many of the Metropolitan Societies, especially in the eastern portion. It is dated, “Annatin, New Hebrides, barque John Williams (a missionary vessel), August 1, 1848”:

“After a good hammering, we got clear of the Channel, and after a passage of nine weeks, anchored in Table Bay. I was ashore one night in Cape Town, was told there were a few Teetotalers, but had not time to seek them. The town abounds in churches and chapels, and plenty of public-houses. After a passage of seven weeks more, we reached Hobart Town, a very nice place, exactly like an English provincial town. They have three teetotal societies, and, as is my custom, I visited them all, not regarding party. The first is called ‘The Hobart Town Society,’ meeting on Sunday and Tuesday evening: they have a fine hall, holding about 600, and it was filled on two occasions when I was there as ‘the lion’ of the night. The next is called ‘The Roman Catholic Society’: here I was well received by the priests, two of whom were on the platform: there was a good company. The third is ‘The Van Diemen’s Land Society’: meeting on Friday evening, and composed of worthy Christian men, with four ministers of the Gospel at their head, and a number of the leading men of the town and neighbourhood. I felt great pleasure in speaking at two meetings, to some seven or eight hundred persons. I received many invitations, and accepted as many as time would admit, and left them with deep impressions of their hospitality and good feeling. I should think there are nearly 2,000 Teetotalers in the town; and a society has been formed at Port Arthur, as an auxiliary to this, which numbers about 500. These are among Britain’s doubly-exiled ones, for they go thence in irons from Hobart Town, for second crimes. At Launceston, on the other side of the island, there is a larger number of Teetotalers than in Hobart Town.

“Weighing anchor, very sorrowfully, after staying sixteen days here, we reached Tahiti in forty-one days. Here is a fine people, many of whom fear God; but I do not much like their so-called French protectors. One thing, however, I was pleased with, namely, that the French Governor has forbidden any spirits to be landed, made, or sold on the island. Mr. Barff, one of our missionaries, called on him while we lay there; he asked him of the people at Huahine; Mr. B. told him of the law in existence on that island—that no spirits were allowed to be landed, sold, made, or drunk; on which the Governor said, it was his intention to make the Tahitian people their counterpart, if possible.

“Sailing thence, and calling at Eimeo to land cargo, we next anchored in Huahine, passing the heights which the French attempted to take some time since, but were driven back by the natives with great loss; and no marvel, for they were nearly all drunk, each having nearly a bottle of brandy. Here there is a fine people, amongst whom the missionary has laboured for thirty years, and not in vain. I had the pleasure of worshipping with nearly six hundred of them; it was in a language that I understood not, but I worshipped with them in spirit, and could not help exclaiming—‘What hath God wrought!’

“We next anchored in Raietoa, connected with which is Taha, and, a few miles distant, Bolabola. Here God has seen fit, since the vessel went to England, to remove by death the missionary. Leaving the Society group of Islands, we steered for the Hervey’s, and made Mangai, on which there are about 2,000 inhabitants, from whom a large church has been gathered. Thence we steered for Rarotonga, where there are two missionaries, and an institution for the instruction of native teachers. We next steered for Actabulua, another of the same group, a little farther north. Here, also, the good seed has been sown; and though they killed the first two teachers that were placed on the island, an abundant harvest of good has been brought forth.

“Leaving this group, we steered for the Samoas, making Manna: on this island there is a fine race of people, and a good church has been gathered from those who were once heathens. At Tootoallah are two stations, but from one God has seen fit, in his inscrutable providence, to remove the missionary by death; the one left is a devoted man, and there are some Christians.

“Upola is a large island—as is also Savaii, adjoining; there are several stations, and many persons who love and fear God; but though the Gospel standard has long been planted here, they ‘have not all obeyed,’ for, at the time we left, war was raging furiously, and, at a former meeting, it was resolved still to prosecute it. ‘Scatter thou the people that delight in war.’

“After a short recruit, we sailed to the New Hebrides, on one of which, Erromanga, John Williams was killed. No good has yet been effected in that place. On another, two missionaries were stationed some time, but they were obliged to flee for their lives in a whaler. There are now native teachers on Annatin, Tanna, and Fati. There were three on Erromang some time since, but they were killed and eaten by the natives! We brought four missionaries with us from Samos, designed for a new mission at Fati; but on our arrival, we found that, not long before, a crew of a vessel had been massacred; it was thought advisable, therefore, to return to Annatin.

“As to Teetotalism, God is evidently working with us, and we shall prevail. We expect to be at home, God willing, about May, 1850. Should you or any friend write, address to me on board, care of Dr. Ross, Sydney, who will forward it to me.”

CASES OF CONSULTATION.

BY H. MUDGE, SURGEON, &amp;c.

THE following cases having been sent me, it may be of service to Teetotalers to reply to them publicly :—

CASE FIRST.—“ I am a Teetotaler of four years' standing, a lover of the cause, and desirous of promoting its interests; but having been at different times brought to a stand, I venture to appeal for a solution of my difficulty. You are aware that, in past times, alcohol was prescribed by old dames for females during gestation, and, according to the estimation of some, not without success. Now I happen to be married to a virtuous, good wife, a Teetotaler, too, and I wish to preserve her so, but she puts faith in alcohol on certain occasions. She used (though seldom) to take a glass of gin as medicine. Since she married she has taken it but once. Nevertheless, being a weak woman, she is often complaining of headache, sickness, heartburn, flatulence, &c., so much so that she often expresses a wish that she could live without eating, to avoid the pain of digestion. To remedy these evils, some are continually recommending gin or rum, and I as strenuously oppose it; for I would as soon see any other devil come in at the door as alcohol. What I urgently request is, that some friend of the cause would show us what will supply the place of alcoholic stimulants in cases such as the foregoing, that the fair sex may be undeceived in thinking that nothing but spirituous liquors will avail them; for, as my wife says, if we deprive them of their usual cordials, we ought to supply them with others in their places. I feel confident that many who now stand aloof will join us when this difficulty is obviated.

“ A TEETOTAL SECRETARY.”

ANSWER.—My acquaintance with medical literature and practice has been pretty extensive for twenty-six years past, and I never before read or heard an opinion that alcohol was desirable in such cases as this kind husband alludes to; hence I infer that the old dames have no large number of good authorities on their side! However, when consulted let us advise. When an extra work (as gestation) is carrying onward by the living system, extra care should be taken to abide by the ordinary general laws for the preservation of health. Let moderate exercise, pure air, frequent washing, and early rising be sedulously attended to, and let the quantity of food be rather diminished than increased, and let it consist of the most digestible kinds, and be taken in the most easily reduced forms. The reasonableness of this advice will appear, when we consider that pregnancy has made a vast difference in the distribution of the nervous energy of the system; much more than ordinary is directed to the womb and its appendages, consequently, less to the stomach and the other organs of digestion. Abjure fats, pastry, jellies, preserves, and highly-seasoned viands of every kind; take plain lean meat, brown bread, groats, sago, light puddings, &c., with fresh cold water for drink, and out of these perfect digestion will supply nature with all she needs. The train of symptoms described in the “ Secretary's ” letter follows from indigestion, the consequence of improper diet. Do as above, and carefully avoid scalding-hot drinks, while the dress of the party is allowed to be very loose, and in all probability every unpleasantness will vanish. If the bowels, however, are confined, let a wine-glass full of the following mixture be taken in the morning, fasting :—Bruise  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. of cloves, and put them, with two ounces of Glauber's salts, into a pint of boiling water; steep for an hour, and strain.

CASE SECOND.—“ I have to request your advice in the following case, which appears to me to be an innovation on the teetotal principle:—A Teetotaler of many years' standing, an active advocate amongst the working classes, and a member of the Rechabite Order, also of the Temperance Life Assurance Society, has been very ill. Not feeling satisfied with his Tent surgeon, he applied to Dr.

Conquest, who at once ordered him to take brandy-and-water, twice or three times a day. He replied, he was afraid he could not comply with his orders, as he belonged to a Life Assurance Society, whose rules prohibited the use of alcoholic drinks. The doctor said that was all nonsense; he was in such a low state that he required stimulants, and must take brandy, and that he could not prescribe any other stimulant that would suit the complaint and have the desired effect. The doctor gave him a letter (I understand), and the Assurance Society granted him leave to take the brandy. Dr. Conquest told him that he himself had been twice a Teetotaler, but the principle would not answer in this variable climate, and that people in this country required stimulants. Now, this person, although far from being well, attends his employment, and goes twice a day to the bar of the gin-shop to get his two pennyworth of brandy and water. He is seen by Non-Teetotalers, and gives rise, of course, to a great deal of ridicule; but when spoken to on the subject, he relies on the medical certificate.

“ Is Dr. Conquest right? I've heard and read that alcoholic stimulants may be avoided, even in the most urgent cases, if other stimulants can be procured. I consider the doctrine of Dr. C. to be a libel on Teetotalism; or if, on the other hand, he is right (when in effect he says that there is no stimulant in the apothecary's shop equal to brandy), then teetotal doctors are good for nothing.

“ Should you be able to advise satisfactorily in this case, I shall feel obliged, for it is high time for such practices to be exposed.

“ A TEN YEARS' TEETOTALER.”

ANSWER.—This correspondent's zeal hinders his discretion, hence his deficiency in his letter of not saying what disease has afflicted the patient. To prescribe is guess-work. The weakness which usually follows severe illness is best overcome by observing just the same general rules as to air, diet, &c., as I noted in the other case. The stomach being weak, must have the food adapted to its necessity. Tonics, however, with patience, do good in these cases. Iron may be fairly tried, thus :—

Take of compound mixture of iron, 4 oz.; compound decoction of aloe, 2 oz.; mix. Take two table-spoonfuls twice a day before food.—Or, tincture of muriate of iron, 1 drachm; infusion of quassia, half a pint; mix. Take the same dose.—Or, take of strychnine, 1 grain; warm water, 12 oz.; dissolve. Take the same dose.

Dr. Conquest's behaviour is simply ridiculous, exceeded only by the patient's going publicly to a gin-shop for his physic! Let these people say what they will, I am not to be persuaded that a lurking appetite, seeking its gratification under the flimsy subterfuge of medical advice, is not at the bottom of such disgraceful conduct. Dr. Conquest is an old practitioner, who, I suppose, does not care to learn a new thing, and treats abstinence from alcoholic stimulants pretty much as the late Dr. Birkbeck treated the Stethoscope on its introduction. When I was a student, in 1828, at the General Dispensary in Aldersgate-street, London, I heard that otherwise most talented man ridicule, in his public lectures, the idea that any sounds could be heard indicative of what was going on in the chest! Well, the instrument has triumphed spite of Dr. B.'s sneers; and non-alcoholic treatment will triumph spite of Dr. C.'s pledge-breaking. The hacknied notion about a variable climate requiring alcohol to be drunk, is so thoroughly exploded that I wonder any M.D. stakes his reputation in repeating it. The “ Ten Years' Teetotaler ” cannot do better than furnish both Dr. Conquest and his patient with a copy of the famed “ Medical Certificate,” and also the tract, “ Temperance and Teetotalism,” by Dr. Carpenter. If these publications do not convince them, “ neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead!” My own tract on “ Convalescence,” sold at Symons's, Vauxhall, might be serviceable.

IMPORTANT!

THE next meeting of the MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE will be held at Mrs. Watts's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on Wednesday, June 6th, at half-past seven o'clock p.m. precisely; when a movement of very considerable importance to the Metropolis will be brought forward. The attendance of all office-bearers and active members of Total Abstinence Societies is particularly requested.

ANTI-BEER-SHOP ASSOCIATION.

THROUGH the instrumentality of THOMAS RICHARDSON, Esq., A.B., of Liverpool, a provisional committee was formed in London, for the purpose of suppressing, as far as possible, those hot-beds of iniquity—the beer-shops. A series of public meetings, nearly thirty in number, in various parts of the metropolis, were resolved upon, and extensively announced. Some of these have been held, and others have yet to be held. The result will be the adoption of numerous petitions to both Houses of Parliament, praying that no new licenses may be granted, and that those already granted may be in force only during the tenure of the present holders. Several petitions have already been presented; and it is hoped that the Earl of HARROWBY will feel encouraged by this movement soon to bring forward his promised measure.

It may be recollected that, some time since, premiums of £20, £10, and £5, were offered by the Association for the three best Essays on the evils attendant on the beer-shop system. A number of essays were sent in; the awards of the adjudicators were as follow:—Mr. JOHN RUSSELL, of Bristol, £20; Mr. ELI WALKER, of Hull, £10; Mr. M. MILBURN, of Sowerby, Thirsk, £5. The mode of publication is not yet decided upon. It is desirable that they should appear in the form best suited for extensive circulation.

ESSAYS ON JUVENILE DEPRAVITY.

WE have heard from various quarters that the essays by the Rev. H. WORSLEY and Mr. THOMAS BEGGS have been read by a considerable number of persons in that class of society best able to exert a beneficial influence upon the community, and that the result has been a deep conviction of the importance of the Total Abstinence principle, both as a personal benefit and as a means of usefulness, and a determination to promote that principle, both by precept and example. It has come to our knowledge also, that of the four writers whose essays were deemed worthy of premiums, one only, Mr. Beggs, was a Teetotaler. So deeply, however, did the other writers become convinced, in the course of their investigations, of the intimate connection between intemperance and crime, between the intemperance of parents and the delinquency of children, and of the Total Abstinence practice as the only efficient remedy, that they have become converts to Teetotalism. On the mind of one of the rev. adjudicators, also, holding a situation of high responsibility in connexion with the education of juvenile members of the aristocracy, similar impressions have been made, leading to the adoption of very stringent regulations as to the conduct and habits of those committed to his care. These are considerations which must amply repay the generous donor of these prizes for all the labour and anxiety to which this his project has subjected him.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The Annual Meeting of this Society took place at Exeter-hall on Thursday, the 24th ult., when Samuel Bowley, Esq., of Gloucester, presided. Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., Joseph Eaton, Esq., J. D. Bassett, Esq., Joseph Sturge, Esq., J. S. Buckingham, Esq., William Janson, Esq., Benjamin Rotch, Esq., Josiah Hunt, Esq., H. Clapp, Esq., John Cassell, Esq., Dr. Oxley, Dr. Lovell, Rev. W. W. Robinson, Rev. Dr. Burns, Rev. John Kennedy, of Stepney, Rev. Ozia French, American missionary from Bombay, Rev. B. Parsons, of Stroud, and many other eminent supporters of the temperance movement, occupied the platform. The hall was densely crowded, and the audience was pleasingly interspersed with a large number of ladies. At six o'clock,

The CHAIRMAN, on rising, was greeted with applause. He held in his hand a list of the various anniversary meetings which had been held in the metropolis during the present month, sixteen of which had been held in that spacious hall, and he would venture to offer it as his deliberate opinion that not one of those meetings had been of greater importance to the welfare of mankind, than the one in which they were then assembled (applause). Although those meetings had been for missionary purposes, for carrying the gospel to the heathen in distant lands—and far be it for him to make any comparison which would be unjust—he could say, on behalf of the Temperance Society, that if those individuals who are interested in those missionary and benevolent societies would get rid of intoxicating drinks, they would get far more money brought into the funds of these various societies than they now have (hear, hear). With regard to the missionary cause, he might venture to say that a soul in our own country was as important as a soul in a foreign land (applause). Education, too, was a subject in which he felt a lively interest. He knew not how it was with the city of London, but he believed there were school-rooms sufficient for all the children in Gloucester, if they were disposed to attend them; but in many cases they could not spare the 1d. or 2d. per week because their parents spent their money for intoxicating drinks. He would venture to say, that of all the total abstinents in the city of Gloucester, there was not one whose children were among those who wander about the streets without shoes and stockings (applause). One branch of the education which had been advocated was the establishment of Ragged Schools—a most excellent institution; but in his opinion it would have been far better to have prevented these rags, by doing away with intoxicating drinks, than endeavouring to snatch a few after they have been reduced to rags by the intemperance of their parents (applause). He much admired the zeal and philanthropy of Lord Ashley (applause); but he believed Lord Ashley would have forwarded his objects far more readily if he had become a total abstainer (applause). He did not like to speak of any one behind his back; and if there was any man on that platform who would volunteer his services to attend with him, he would go and tell Lord Ashley himself (applause).

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq.: I will go with you (loud applause).

The CHAIRMAN continued: He admired his character, and he thought he could show him how the Temperance Society and the Ragged School could assist each other in the great cause of humanity and benevolence (applause). One of the meetings held in this city was presided over by Prince Albert, and attended by a vast number of fashionable people, in order to benefit domestic servants who had become indigent. A very good institution, but he thought it would be far better for those good people to teach those servants to become total abstinents so as to obtain a little sum to "lay by for a rainy day" (applause). He believed that drinking was a great source of improvidence among the poor. Large meetings had also been held for Financial Reform. All thought it a good thing to get rid of the taxes, but it would be far easier to get rid of those which are self-imposed. Cobden only proposed to remove ten millions, whilst temperance advocates proposed to remove fifty millions of the expenses of the country (applause). Some friends had attended meetings for political reform. Although they knew his sentiments, and would give him credit for a pretty fair share of political reform about him (applause), he would venture to say, that if all the wise political reforms of the day were passed to-morrow, the working classes of this country would not be in anything like so independent a position as they would be by the abolition of the drinking customs (applause). Some months ago, when disturbances took place in various parts of the country, he believed the safety of the realm had been preserved chiefly by the influence of temperance lecturers, who had been going through the country preaching self-reform (applause). No change of government can benefit the working classes equal to this. The Temperance Society he considered to be the foundation-stone of all the other benevolent societies; and every man who wished to advance those various societies could not do better than sign the temperance pledge. After replying to several objections urged against the temperance movement, and showing the evil effects of trusting to the practice of moderation, the Chairman concluded, amidst loud cheers, by calling on the secretary to read the report.

The SECRETARY then read a considerable portion of a lengthened report of the proceedings of the National Temperance Society during the past year. It stated that although the triumphs of the temperance principles was not complete, the storms of opposition had subsided, and calmness and sunshine invited them to labour lovingly to spread the truths they had espoused. In calling attention to the various fields cultivated by the different branches of the friends of temperance, the committee very properly placed at the head of their list The British Association, which continued to hold on its way, having been the means of delivering 1,900 lectures on week days, addressing 450 religious and Sabbath school meetings on Sundays, procuring upwards of 7,000 signatures to the pledge, and reclaiming more than 400 drunkards. The Wesleyan Union of total abstinents, which commenced in 1846, included 30 ministers of that body, and about 2,500 of its members. The Central Association had sustained a heavy loss in the death of the late G. S. Kenrick, Esq., but was still labouring to spread the principles of which he was so worthy a patron and so warm a friend. The Sunday School Teachers' Temperance Society, under the presidency of the Rev. J. Sherman, was diligently pursuing their important work of spreading information amongst the young. The Scottish Temperance League was labouring on, manfully, intelligently, and successfully, in the northern part of the kingdom, and deserved well of the temperance body for its general labours and its admirable publications. In referring to its own operations, reports were read of the labours of the agents of the society in various parts of the kingdom. Particular notice was taken of the metropolitan mission, which was regarded as a very important feature in the society's operations. Two missionaries had been employed during the year, and a third had been engaged to labour for a time in the neighbourhood of Tottenham, by the liberality of their long-tryed friend, W. Janson, Esq. By these devoted labours 1,014 persons, of whom 173 had been drunkards, had been induced to sign the pledge; and 67, who had broken their pledges, to sign again. 356 members had been added to the societies in the neighbourhoods; upwards of 400 persons had been prevailed upon to attend temperance meetings, and considerable number of temperance tracts and reports distributed. A number of interesting cases of reformation were cited, showing that the society had not laboured in vain in this important field, although the energies of the committee were crippled by the want of funds. With a view of securing the attention of the working classes, two prizes of £20 and of £10 had been offered, to the competition of the working classes, for the best essays, showing "that the general spread of temperance principles will tend to the physical, mental, social, and religious elevation of the working classes." £20 had also been granted to Father Mathew to assist in meeting the expenses of his visit to the United States (a gentleman on the platform here informed the Secretary that Mr. Mathew had embarked yesterday, which, on being announced, was received with loud applause). After some allusion to the relation of the drinking habits of society to the education of the young, a letter from the Rev. T. Mathew, forming part of the report, was read. It stated that at the great annual national festival, not a single individual was observed under the influence of intoxicating drink, in the City of Cork, on St. Patrick's Day. That the same gratifying announcement had been made for the whole of the county, and he felt confident that, generally speaking, it might be applied to the entire kingdom. From the statistical information supplied to him from influential sources, he could state that the people of Ireland, who have taken the pledge, continued faithful to its observance. During the late seasons of famine and pestilence, there were some who became reckless, and, by the advice of their physicians, gave up their pledge, but the great majority had found consolation and strength in their adherence to this sacred cause. Perfect sobriety was now the settled habit of the people, and the children to whom he had administered the pledge eight and nine years ago, had grown up, and were instructing their children in the practice of temperance. The "Christian Brothers," to whose fostering care the education of the Catholic youth of Ireland was entrusted, had all taken the pledge. In closing the report, a just tribute was paid to the memory of some of the early friends of the cause who had departed this life. The friends who remained were exhorted to take up their fallen mantles. They were pledged to the movement, and would they violate their promises? They had confidence in truth, and would they sacrifice their faith? They had love kindled in their hearts, and would they repress its rising emotions? They had a country to reclaim, to elevate, and to purify, and should that spark of their patriotism be extinguished? They had the fallen to restore; the feeble to strengthen; the timid to encourage; the self-confident to train; and the young to counsel; and they had no slight or equivocal manifestations of the approval of God; and to every one who would divert their attention, or impede their progress, they should give their one calm, deliberate, earnest reply, "We are doing a great work, and we cannot come down" (great applause).

The TREASURER then produced the accounts of the past year, which showed a balance of £73 19s. 4½d.

The Rev. W. W. ROBINSON rose to move the first resolution:—"That this meeting, convinced that intemperance is one of the most costly, degrading, and ruinous evils with which society is afflicted; and persuaded that no sufficient remedy has yet been devised except total abstinence from all that intoxicates, rejoices in the continued and persevering labours of the National Temperance Society, and all other local and general organizations for the advocacy and advancement of temperance principles, and pledges itself to do its utmost to sustain their efforts." After repeating the greater portion of the 54th Psalm, the rev. gentleman said he confessed he was grieved, time after time, to have listened at the meetings of the various religious societies, to the noble advocacy of their principles, without one speaker having dared to lift up his voice to say, "make the people of England teetotalers." He once knew a gentleman, intimately connected with her Majesty the Queen Dowager, who spent for his household £35 a year in intoxicating liquors. He had since left off taking them, and had discovered that they had done much more harm than good. He had, therefore, subscribed £5 a year more to the Church; another £5 to the Irish cause; another £5 to the Tract Society, and the remainder to the poor of his parish. Here was an illustration of the effect of the teetotal system. If every gentleman who now spent £35 a year for intoxicating liquors would do this, they would no longer hear of a paltry three millions being devoted to missionary purposes, when it is a fact statistically proved, that nearly one hundred million pounds sterling have been annually expended, either directly or indirectly, in doing injury to the bodies, and indirectly to the souls, of Christians (applause). Let them strike at the root of the evil (hear, hear).—After replying to the scriptural objections to the teetotal principle, the rev. gentleman said there was one more objection entertained, particularly by the High Churchmen, which was, that they could not join the Temperance Society because of the various denominations of Dissenters on the platform and in the room (laughter). Now, he confessed, to him there was a peculiar joy to meet these Dissenters (applause). Suppose there were to be a house on fire, and he saw a number of Dissenters running, and were to cry out, "Stop! stop! you are not members of the Church of England!" (laughter and cheers.) There was an infinitely worse fire burning (hear, hear). Shall they not say to their Dissenting brethren, "Although you may have one particular captain of your regiment; you one uniform, you another, we are all fighting under the Great Captain of Salvation, and by his grace we will all unite" (loud applause).

JOSEPH HUNT, Esq., in seconding the resolution, gave an interesting account of his successful experiments in employing none but teetotal labourers on his farms; stating that the men were not only able to do as much and more work than formerly, but with greater ease and comfort to themselves. He quite repudiated the notion that growing barley was essential to good farming, and showed that if it were grown it would be far more profitable to eat as food than to take a solution of it in a poisonous state in the shape of alcoholic liquors. He was ready to meet any farmer on that or any other platform, and prove the truth of his assertions (applause).

Dr. LOVELL, on rising to support the resolution, was received with applause. He spoke advisedly, and in the presence of several eminent medical men, when he said, and it was after 30 years' experience, that three-fourths of all the disease and disorder we have to contend with is brought on through using intoxicating drinks; and he said that, upon taking a retrospective view, from extensive practice in which he was engaged, up to about fourteen years ago, he had no hesitation in saying, that all the cases of insanity that came under his notice during very nearly thirty years' extensive practice, with the exception of one case, he could clearly trace as the effects of intoxicating drinks. Another disease which was very prevalent in our part of the country, where intoxicating drinks are used, namely, disease of the heart, which was very frequently mistaken for apoplexy. He had no hesitation in saying, in the presence of several medical gentlemen, until the teetotalers called the attention of the medical profession to this fact, that a number of cases that were called apoplexy were diseases of the heart brought on by the use of intoxicating liquors. After entering into a minute and beautiful description of the effects of intoxicating liquors in producing ossification of the fine membrane of the heart, and stating that the injury sustained by the system was always proportioned to the quantity taken, that the smallest quantity of alcohol could not be taken without great mischief to bodily functions, the doctor concluded by cordially supporting the resolution.

The resolution was put and carried unanimously.

The Rev. JOHN KENNEDY rose to move the second resolution:—"That this meeting, convinced of the paramount importance of securing for the temperance reformation a larger amount of direct religious influence, and more constant appeal to religious convictions, and a more powerful presentation of Christian motives, affectionately and earnestly commends its claims to the prayerful consideration of ministers of the gospel, members of Christian churches, and all who labour for the advancement of religion, and the alleviation of the sufferings and sorrows of mankind, and would advise the formation of Congregational Temperance Societies wherever practicable." It had been his lot to stand between two fires: the teetotalers, on the one side, who went further than him, and the fire of ministers on the other. Very good people thought him very rash. When with brethren of the cloth, he had not spared argument, nor had he spared strength of feeling; on the other hand, while being with teetotalers he used sometimes that favourite beverage of theirs, cold water. He did conceive, after all, some good as a result of that medium course (hear, hear). By that term they need not suspect any deviation from the convictions he had long published in the pulpit, and from the press (applause). The rev. gentleman entered into a defence of his views; and the course he had taken, and his maintenance of the position denied by some teetotalers—that it was not an actual sin to partake of intoxicating beverages. Much as had been done to wrest Scripture on those questions, it was his conviction at the same time that they could never come at a distinction between intoxicating and un-intoxicating wine, to prove what was the lawful use of either (applause, mingled with marks of disapprobation). These were his convictions, and as a teetotaler, and one accustomed to free-thinking (hear, hear), and free-speaking, he spoke out (obeers and disapprobation). He would base the system, not on the expressions of Scripture, but on a wise Christian expediency (applause).

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.P., said: It had been his great pleasure, and he might say his honour, to advocate that good cause for something like fourteen or fifteen years, and he could bear testimony to the fact stated by a previous speaker, that during the whole of that time he had never had occasion, even for sickness, to take one single drop of alcoholic drink (applause). He was sorry the resolution which he rose to second had not introduced the subject of Sunday-schools, for he believed there were no more noble and useful members of society than Sunday-school teachers (applause). The hon. gentleman concluded a speech full of powerful argument and good feeling, by bearing his testimony, of fifteen years' standing, to the great and good cause, and seconding the resolution, sat down amidst loud cheers.

Rev. Dr. BURNS then rose, and after speaking to the resolution, made a powerful appeal to the benevolence of the audience on behalf of the funds of the society. The resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

B. ROTCH, Esq., in a speech of great power, eloquence, and benevolence of purpose, moved the third resolution, and instanced cases of the reformation of many who were once criminal by signing the temperance pledge. He also bore testimony to the good effects produced by the publication of the "Prize Essays on Juvenile Depravity," by the Rev. H. Worsley, and Mr. Thomas Beggs. The following is the resolution:—"That this meeting, affected with the extent and increase of juvenile depravity (as recently developed in the prize essays on that subject), and deeply convinced that all efforts to arrest its progress will be inefficient while the drinking customs prevail, affectionately urges a consideration of temperance principles upon all superintendents, teachers, and committees of Sunday and day schools, ragged schools, and all other institutions that seek to instruct youthful minds, and to surround youthful virtue and simplicity with such safeguards as benevolence must desire and prudence can suggest."

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., in seconding the resolution, said, that he could attribute juvenile depravity almost entirely to drinking habits. He proceeded to describe his plan for building a town on the most approved principles of ventilation, drainage, &c., the conditions of entrance to which should be those of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, tobacco, and snuff; and concluded by stating that his book, descriptive of the whole plan, would shortly be published.

The Rev. Dr. BURNS mentioned the town of Oberlin as being a thoroughly teetotal and anti-slavery town.

JOSEPH STURGE, Esq., merely rose to mention a plan adopted in Birmingham of offering cheap railway trips to juvenile teetotalers, as being very successful in inducing many to join the society, and stated that out of 2,500 children who had taken the pledge from such inducement the year before, only 50 had broken their pledge (applause).

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

W. JANSON, Esq., moved the fourth resolution:—"That the following gentlemen be respectfully requested to wait upon Lord Ashley, and present to him the earnest desire of this large meeting that the careful consideration of that nobleman be given to the temperance question, and its bearings upon the elevation and civilization of the human race, viz.: S. Bowly, Esq., Rev. W. W. Robinson, J. S. Buckingham, Esq., Rev. Dr. Burns, Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., and B. Rotch."

Rev. W. W. ROBINSON seconded the resolution, which was put and carried unanimously.

The Rev. OZIA FRENCH moved the fifth resolution:—"That this meeting rejoices in the general efforts now making to bring under the attention of both houses of parliament the growing evils of the Beer-shop Act, and indulges the hope that an entire repeal of that law may be secured as early as possible."

Mr. THOMAS WHITTAKER seconded the resolution in a speech full of wit, humour, and cutting satire.

The resolution was put and carried with one dissentient.

The CHAIRMAN: Let it be reported at the House of Commons that one hand was held up in favour of beer-shops (loud applause).

Rev. B. PARSONS moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was seconded by HENRY CLAPP, Esq., and being duly acknowledged, the meeting separated at half-past ten.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

Mr. Thomas Hudson, of London, has recently delivered a very interesting lecture in our large rooms; the Rev. J. Rowland presided. The attendance was large and respectable, and the lecturer succeeded in securing the most earnest attention throughout the whole of his lecture. At the close some pledges were obtained. The good cause is still making head-way here, and our numbers are steadily increasing; the excitement at first caused by the setting forth this "strange doctrine" appears to have given way to sober thoughtfulness, and there is a marked disposition on the part of many to hear more of this matter.

A. A. PARSONS, Secretary.

READING, BERKS.

The Rev. William Guest, Independent Minister of this town, has recently delivered a lecture to working men on the Temperance Movement. The chair was taken by Mr. Tyler. In the course of his lecture, the rev. gentleman referred to the Beer-shop Act as productive of much evil, as from that time much competition had arisen between the spirit-dealers and the beer-sellers; hence the splendour of the gin-palace and saloon, or the various amusements of the beer-shop, adopted for the purpose of enticing the young and the unwary. He also quoted from the prize essay on "Juvenile Depravity," by the Rev. H. Worsley, M.A., showing the frightful extent of youthful crime and prostitution produced by the spirit and beer trade; and closed by an earnest and eloquent appeal to his audience, and especially to professing Christians, to come to the rescue, and throw their influence into the Total Abstinence movement. The lecture was listened to with marked attention by the numerous audience, and we hope much good will result.

JOHN KIDGELL, Secretary.

MACCLESFIELD.

Mr. Lomax, of Manchester, has recently delivered a course of lectures on Teetotalism in the large Sunday school-room of this town, a place capable of accommodating nearly 2,000 persons. His lectures were listened to with marked attention. Teetotalism had for some time been in a languishing state here; but the spirit in which these lectures have been received, proves that nothing is wanting but zeal and perseverance on the part of its friends to render its principles popular. Mr. Lomax preached two sermons, one in the school-room, the other in the Methodist New Connexion Chapel, both of which places were crowded. He also delivered a lecture on behalf of the Young Men's Total Abstinence Society, to a very crowded audience, in the large school.

J. W. WHITE.

MACCLESFIELD YOUNG MEN'S TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.—This Society held its half-yearly tea party on Easter Tuesday, in the Lord-street school-room; 500 persons sat down to tea. The room was beautifully decorated with evergreens, mottoes, oil-paintings, &c. After tea Mr. J. G. Booth took the chair, and commented on the past and present success of the society, which has only been established about eighteen months, and now numbers nearly 700 members. Mr. Lea and others recited various pieces. Speeches were made by Messrs. Hankinsons, Morris, and Dean, and a soldier of the 60th Regiment. The meeting was much enlivened by music and singing; it broke up after six hours-and-a-half of rational enjoyment. Mr. J. Teare and Mr. G. Lomax have been lecturing here with great success. At the first of Mr. Lomax's lectures, the mayor, F. Lalley-mand, Esq., presided.

TODMORDEN.

On Good Friday the members of the Todmorden Female Temperance Society held their anniversary in the Wesleyan Association school-room, Bridge-street, celebrated by a tea party. Mrs. Harley, of Dale-street, was, after tea, voted to the chair, who, with her infant in her arms, said it was the first time she had occupied a place like that; but she felt fully assured that it was better than attending upon a drunken husband, which she had done for a series of years, experiencing sorrow and trouble. The report was read, showing that during the year they had been favoured with the services of Messrs. T. B. Thompson, Platt, Winterbottom, Walmsley, J. T. Payne, Moffatt, and the Rev. J. Townend. They have held public meetings—one in three weeks. The other two sections of the Todmorden Temperance Society are denominated the Parent Society, consisting of men above 25 years of age, and youths under 25, all males; their own female members having given 24 addresses and 70 recitations. They number upwards of 300 members, and are about making arrangements for a regular system of visitation. Six resolutions were passed at the business meeting; moved and seconded by females, with only one exception—the treasurer. The public meeting commenced at half-past seven. The president for the ensuing year took the chair, and remarked upon the relative state of the Society as to its success, especially in connection with neighbouring and kindred institutes; after which she introduced Mrs. Mary Jackson, now of Wakefield, but formerly of Whitehaven. She referred to many living witnesses of the glorious effects produced thereby; the dangerous consequences of admitting the enemy, alcohol, into the human system; the fitness and qualifications of civil, moral, social, and religious female influence as an agency for promoting the happiness of the human family. A Temperance love-feast, on the evening of Easter Monday, was conducted by Mr. Matthews, officer of the Inland Revenue in this district, and a very encouraging and enlivening occasion it was.

J. S., Secretary.

REV. THEOBALD MATHEW.

Crowded meetings have recently been held at several of the teetotal stations in Cork, for the purpose of receiving the farewell advices and benedictions of this distinguished temperance reformer, previous to his departure for the States of America. These meetings were the more impressive from the feeling that, in consequence of his impaired health, they might possibly never see him again. This, of course, together with the present distressed condition of thousands in Ireland, gave an air of melancholy to all his addresses. He stated that his object in leaving Ireland and proceeding to America was, partly, to thank the Americans for their well-proved sympathy with his countrymen in a period of deep distress; and, secondly, to assist in promoting the great cause of temperance in that country. He did not conceal from his auditors a further motive which induced him to leave Ireland at this particular period, namely, a desire to escape from the contemplation of sufferings and misery which it was wholly out of his power to relieve. It was, he said, his firm conviction that, unless measures of a resolute and comprehensive character were promptly adopted on behalf of Ireland, thousands and thousands of the population must perish before the next harvest. He solemnly admonished his teetotal friends as to the great importance of a strict adherence to their teetotal pledge. Thousands, he remarked, were enduring the extreme of misery, and with little prospect of release from their sufferings, who, if they had been teetotalers, might have enjoyed comparative prosperity. And it must be a great and serious aggravation to such persons to recollect that they had indulged in the use of drinks which could confer no benefit, but were alone productive of evil, when their fellow-creatures were perishing for want of food. At the conclusion of an address of considerable length, Mr. Mathew administered the temperance pledge to several thousands. There were the most sincere manifestations of regret at his departure.

The scene at Cork, upon Mr. Mathew's departure, was most exciting. On the previous day the vicinity of his house was thronged by thousands. On Saturday morning, at an early hour, crowds of people assembled round his door. The temperance band was brought out, and the throng, at eight o'clock, became multitudinous. There was great lamentation among the lower classes. The leave-taking was too much for Mr. Mathew's feelings; and, instead of waiting for the mail coach which was to convey him to the terminus at Mallow, he stepped into the private carriage of one of his relations, and was some miles on his journey before the multitude knew that he had departed. The scene proved the intense affection felt for this remarkable man in the place where he has chiefly passed his life.

It appears that Mr. Mathew's life was insured, some years since, for several thousand pounds, as security for the expenses of his temperance movement. He received notice from the insurance company that in going to America he would have to pay a fine of £300 for the increased risk. But where was he to get such a sum? A veteran philanthropist, Mr. W. Rathbone, of Liverpool, heard of Mr. Mathew's difficulties, and sent him the sum of £500, saying, that "the friends of temperance should be responsible for the debts which its apostle had contracted." The wealthy Irish Catholics might blush at such an instance of Protestant munificence towards this great living ornament of the Catholic Church.

The common council of the city of New York passed a resolution, in March last, to unite with their fellow-citizens in extending the rights of hospitality to the distinguished stranger, and affording him every opportunity of advancing the interests of the great cause in which he is engaged.

INTEMPERANCE IN CONNECTION WITH REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

RESISTANCE to the Temperance Reformation will put a stop to revivals in a church. The time has come that it can no longer be innocent in a church to stand aloof from this glorious reformation. The time was when this could be done ignorantly. The time has been when ministers and Christians could enjoy revivals notwithstanding strong drink was used among them. But since light has been thrown upon the subject, and it has been found that the use is only injurious, no church member or minister can stand neutral in the cause and be innocent. They must speak out and take sides; and if they do not take ground on one side, their influence is on the other. Show me a minister that has taken ground against the Temperance Reformation who has had a revival. Show me one who now stands aloof from it who has a revival. Show me one who temporizes on this point, who does not come out and take a stand in favour of temperance, who has a revival. It did not used to be so. But now the subject has come up, and has been discussed, and is understood, no man can shut his eyes upon the truth. The man's hands are red with blood who stands aloof from the temperance cause—and can he have a revival?

Who does not know that, on the subject of temperance, every drunkard in the land will skulk behind some rum-selling deacon or wine-drinking minister? It is the most common objection and refuge of the intemperate and of moderate drinkers, that it is practised by professing Christians. It is this that creates the imperious necessity for excluding traffickers and drinkers from the communion. Let the churches of all denominations speak out on the subject of temperance; let them close their doors against all who have anything to do with the death-dealing abomination, and the cause of temperance is triumphant.

It is not needful that a person should rail against the cold-water society, in order to be on the best terms with drunkards and moderate drinkers. Only let him plead for the moderate use of wine—only let him continue to drink it as a luxury—and all the drunkards account him on their side. If he refuse to give his influence to the temperance cause, he is claimed, of course, by the other side, as a friend. On all these subjects, when they come up, the church and ministers must take right ground, and take it openly, and stand to it, and carry it through, if they expect to enjoy the blessing of revivals. They must not receive into their communion those who, in contempt of the light that is now shed upon them, continue to drink, or to traffic in intoxicating drinks.—Finney's "Lectures on Revivals in Religion."

STATISTICS OF INTEMPERANCE.

Mr. Beggs, in his Essay on the Extent and Causes of Juvenile Depravity, recently published, considers that the fact, as it is termed, so frequently used in temperance literature and on temperance platforms, namely, "That 60,000 drunkards die annually in this kingdom," is "mere conjecture, and utterly at variance with probability." He says:—"Making deductions for children under fifteen, and aged persons above eighty, as well as for the smaller proportion of female than male inebriates, it gives us every fourth or fifth person dying a drunkard." In a note placed under the above, Mr. Beggs adds as follows:—

"The number of those whose deaths are caused, directly and indirectly, by the use of alcoholic drinks, must be immense. Vast numbers die of intemperance that are not so accounted in the bills of mortality; but we have no means of ascertaining the actual amount. The above statement is obviously a great exaggeration. A rough estimate of possible deaths by intemperance would be as follows:—

1. The excess of deaths in England and Wales,	30,000
2. Say that two-thirds of these occur in adults,	20,000
3. Say that half these occur in males,	10,000
4. Say that for females, making one quarter the number of males,	2,500
5. Say that half these are due to diseases unconnected with habits of intemperance, and half for intemperance,	6,250

"Six thousand deaths from drunkenness per annum in England and Wales, and about ten thousand in the United Kingdom, would be a very high estimate, for which there is no warrant whatever. Sixty thousand is simply absurd."

Mr. Beggs is no mean authority in matters of this class. It will be well worth while for every advocate to ascertain the correctness of the data on which he founds any statement he may judge it proper to make, either on the platform or through the medium of the press.

LAMENTABLE EFFECTS OF INTOXICATION.

On Thursday, the 3rd ult., at the "Land's End," Woodley, an inquest was held on the body of David Yates, aged 21 years, a farm labourer. He resided with his parents at Borough Marsh Farm, in the above parish, and was considered a steady and good servant; on Sunday, the 1st of April, he left home with a companion, named Payne, for the purpose of going to Wargrave Church, but instead of doing so, they went to the Bull Inn, where they smoked, and had three or four quarts of beer; they left there about four o'clock, and proceeded to Twyford, and called at the "Waggon and Horses," where they had several more quarts of beer, and on leaving, between seven and eight, were both very much intoxicated, more particularly the deceased. On arriving at the Twyford turnpike gate, Payne left the deceased, and returned to Wargrave, and the deceased appeared to go on the road in the direction of his home. Shortly afterwards, he was heard by a person living near the gate, to return back and inquire for Payne, which was the last time he was seen or heard of, and it being presumed that he had met with a watery grave, the Loddon stream was searched, without success, until Wednesday last, when a man employed for the purpose discovered the body in the Loddon, about a mile and a half from the spot where it was supposed the deceased had fallen in. Decomposition had taken place to a great extent, and the father was unable to identify the body, except by the clothes. The coroner having admonished Payne, and cautioned him to refrain from his bad habits in future, the jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned."—Reading Mercury.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE DOMESTIC PRACTICE OF HYDROPATHY. With engraved illustrations. By EDWARD JOHNSON, M.D. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

THE author of this large volume is pretty well known amongst total abstainers, by his work on "Life, Health, and Disease," the twelfth thousand of which is now in circulation. He has for some years past devoted himself to the study and practice of the hydropathic system, and the volume now before us may be regarded as the result, published with the object, as the doctor himself states, "of bringing the benefits of hydropathy, as much as possible, within the reach of the poor," of furnishing a book "containing particular directions and instructions regarding treatment," and of giving medical men, who are willing to give hydropathy a fair trial, a full detail of its practice." For these purposes it contains, first, "a very minutely-detailed description of the various hydropathic processes, and directions as to the proper modes of performing them;" secondly, "general observations on the hydropathic treatment, its mode of action on the living system, &c.;" and thirdly, "a detailed description of the symptoms by which each disease is recognised, with its appropriate treatment, and particular directions as to diet, exercise, clothing, &c." Dr. Johnson treats all these parts of his subject in that rational and perspicuous mode which renders all his publications so peculiarly interesting and instructive. Of the hydropathic system he says, "It claims to be sensible, rational, and in harmony with the known laws which regulate and govern, life, health, and disease. It begins at the beginning. It begins by correcting all the known causes of disease; and by surrounding the patient with all the known causes of health. These it intensifies and concentrates into one focus. In the centre, as it were, of this focus, it places the patient. All the causes of health—all the known healthy influences—are accumulated and brought to bear upon him at once." The "Catechism of Health and Disease" is a most instructive section, which cannot fail to be read with deep interest by every person who may take up this original and attractive volume.

TEMPERANCE AND TEETOTALISM: an Inquiry into the Effects of Alcoholic Drinks on the Human System in Health and Disease. By W. B. CARPENTER, M. D., &c. &c. London: Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster-row.

THIS is a new and enlarged edition of an inquiry published some months since, in the "British and Foreign Medical Review," a periodical edited by Dr. J. Forbes. It was afterwards published in a separate form, and two large editions were speedily sold. A cheap edition, also, of 15,000 copies, was put into circulation through the agency of the "Scottish Temperance League." It has since undergone revision and enlargement by the author, who has now prefixed his name to it, and whose fame as a physiologist will be certain to secure for this edition a very extensive circulation. It abounds with facts and arguments eminently calculated to advance the temperance reformation, and therefore we rejoice that the Scottish Temperance League has issued this very, very cheap edition.

THE VALLEY OF TIME, or Visions of the Coming. An Allegory. London: Whittaker.

This elegantly-printed tract is evidently the production of a Teetotaler. "The Valley of Time" is overshadowed with much that is gloomy: hatred, war, slavery, superstition, idolatry, and persecution. At length the mists which obscured the future clear away, and brighter scenes are unfolded. The fetters of the slave are knocked off; the lion and the wolf are led by little children; truth, purity, and peace have established their reign; the banquet is without sin; "the drunkard's voice does not rise from the hall; and the strife of friends, made enemies by wine, is not seen therein." Those who read this elegant composition will be led to exclaim, "Haste! happy days!"

WAKELIN'S MONTHLY REGISTER. London: Tweedie, Falcon-street, City.

This publication is intended to take the place of the "Cause of the People," one of the periodicals formerly issued from the Isle of Man. Its contents are miscellaneous, a portion being devoted to temperance. The matter is partly original and partly selected. The number before us contains much that is interesting and instructive. We must, however, except from this commendation a very long article entitled "The Widow by Brevet," which has neither wit, point, nor moral to recommend it.

THE CONNEXION BETWEEN INTEMPERANCE AND CRIME. Dublin: Hodges and Smith.

This is a paper read before the Dublin Statistical Society, by JAMES HOUGHTON, Esq., who has long distinguished himself by his praiseworthy exertions to promote the best interests of his fellow-creatures. The paper is founded upon an analysis of various cities and towns in the United Kingdom; and the result is, that out of the entire number of persons taken into custody for the commission of crime, nearly one-third were drunkards. Mr. Houghton remarks, however, that "this fact does not convey any adequate idea of the real amount of crime which intemperance produces." He adds—"We must analyze the cause, or the probable cause, of crimes placed under other heads in the police returns; and I think it will be admitted that they nearly all originate in, or at least are aggravated by, the use of strong drinks; that they are committed when the passions are violently excited, and that this excitement is usually the result of the use of intoxicating drinks."

TEETOTALISM A QUALIFICATION FOR A SABBATH-SCHOOL TEACHER. By A. MORRIS, jun. London: Tweedie, Falcon-street, City.

The object of this excellent tract is to show that Teetotalism is a qualification for a Sabbath-school Teacher, on two grounds—Personal Safety, and Relative Influence. We cordially recommend it, and desire for it an extensive circulation.

THE HORRORS OF DRUNKENNESS; Illustrated in a series of Plates, by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq., and D. MACDONALD, Esq. London: Tweedie, Falcon-street, City.

THESE illustrations are four in number:—The Upas Tree—the Drunkard's Home—and the Raving Maniac and Drivelling Fool, by Mr. G. Cruikshank; and the Drunkard's Life, by Mr. D. Macdonald. The subjects are taken from the poem entitled "The Blessings of Temperance," by JOHN O'NEIL, a poor man, rapidly approaching the seventieth year of his age, and whose sight is so much impaired that he is unable to labour in his profession. These spirited sketches are published for his benefit. They are accompanied with descriptions, in prose and verse. Every purchaser will perform a benevolent act towards an aged man who has rendered good service to the temperance cause, and become possessed of four very characteristic engravings.

TEETOTALER'S BUDGET.

REQUISITES FOR A DRUNKARD.—There are five requisites for a professed drunkard, namely, a face of brass, nerves of steel, lungs of leather, a heart of stone, and an incombustible liver. Unless he have all these, he shall quickly die.

WHO IS A DRUNKARD?—He that drinks for lust, or pride, or good fellowship, or to kill time, or to still conscience, is a drunkard. Water-drinkers escape all temptations from these sources.

FEMALE INFLUENCE—like the main-spring of a watch—though it lies concealed, influences the whole machinery. May it ever be exerted on the side of temperance, and may the tear of wretchedness never blanch the cheek of female virtue!

DESPOTISM OF TRADE CUSTOMS.—No despot, however heartless, no government, however wicked, could inflict more wrongs upon a people than the working classes inflict upon each other through trade associations and trade regulations.—T. Beggs.

GOOD SPIRITS.—The friends of temperance are staunch foes of all alcoholic spirits, but dear lovers of ardent spirits in a good work, of strong spirits in a great work, and of good spirits in all sorts of work; in such fine spirits they hope never to be deficient.

YOUTH RENEWED.—Before I discontinued the use of narcotic and stimulating drinks, I was threatened with consumption; this tendency still remains, but is every year diminishing. My general health is greatly improved. I think my constitution of body and mind more juvenile than six years ago.—W. A. Alcott, M.D.

A MEAN FELLOW.—"Oh! come, treat, don't be mean," said a tippler, coaxingly, to an old friend, near one of our grog-shops, the other day. "Why, when I had money, in '46," he said, with a groan, "I used to let my wife and children go without bread, because I would not be called a mean fellow."—N. Y. Organ.

COMPREHENSIVE FREEDOM.—The cause of temperance is the cause of freedom; freedom from the House of Correction and the Penitentiary—freedom from premature sickness and death—freedom from domestic want and wretchedness—freedom from sheriffs' writs, and from obligations to enrich the manufacturers and vendors of strong drinks, and to support the victims of the traffic and their families.

WATER-DRINKING.—If people would drink water (instead of fermented and distilled beverages), they would be free from many diseases, such as tremblings, palsies, apoplexies, giddiness, pains in the head, gout, stone, dropsy, rheumatism, piles, and such like. Drinking water strengthens the stomach, causes an appetite, preserves the sight, makes the senses lively, and cleanses all the passages of the body, especially those of the kidneys and bladder.—Dr. Pratt.

"STRONG DRINK IS RAGING."—A few years ago, a tippler was put into an almshouse in a populous town in one of the American States. Within a few days he had devised various expedients to obtain rum, but had failed. At length, however, he hit upon one that was successful. He went into the wood yard of the establishment, placed one hand upon a block, and, with an axe in the other, struck it off at a single blow! With the stump raised and streaming, he ran into the house, and cried, "Get some rum, get some rum, my hand is off!" In the confusion and bustle of the occasion, a bowl of rum was brought, into which he plunged the bleeding member of his body, then raised the bowl to his mouth, drank freely, and exultingly exclaimed, "Now I am satisfied!"—Related by Dr. Mussey.

The TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST may be had of B. L. Green, 62, Paternoster-row, London; Ward, 54, do.; Abel Heywood, Manchester; Kershaw, Leeds; Menzies, Edinburgh; and Gallie, Glasgow.

THE BANEFUL EFFECTS OF STRONG DRINKS ON THE NERVES, ESPECIALLY ON THE FIVE SENSES AND VOLUNTARY MOTION.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

SIGHT.

No one can duly reflect on the structure of the human body, or the powers and capacities of the human soul, without feeling the force of the words of the Psalmist—"I am fearfully and wonderfully made; marvellous are all Thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well." It is allowed that we have here the union of two substances of the most opposite character. The body is common dust; the soul is from above. The attributes of matter and mind are as contrary to each other as light and darkness, and yet the union of the two in the person of man is perfect.

Science, whose high vocation is to enter the secret recesses of nature, has examined this matter, and the lancet of the anatomist has shown that the nerves and the brain are the ligaments which connect our mortal and immortal natures. These fine cords—for they are literally small threads—are the bands which unite the spirit and the material frame of man together. Take away the nerves, and the mind could neither obtain knowledge nor make itself known. Destroy the nerves belonging to any sense, and the power of the soul to act by means of that organ is gone. By such a calamity you do not destroy or injure the soul, you only deprive it of the instrument by which it wrought. This is evident from the fact that injured nerves have been cured. The blind, for example, have had their eyes opened. During the disease the soul was the same as ever, but one of its organs of sensation was lost.

The brain may be compared to a musical instrument, and the immortal spirit to the musician. The harp will not move without the harper, and the harper cannot play without his harp. David had as much music in his soul when there was no lyre at hand, as when there was, and yet without his instrument he could never have charmed away the evil spirit from Saul. David was not the harp, and the harp was not David: the form and strings of the one, and the fingers and soul of the other, were required, or we never should have heard of the skill of the son of Jesse. So the soul is not the body and the nerves, and the body and the nerves are not the soul, and yet we must have the two before we can have sensation.

There is nothing that can supply the place of the nerves, or do their work. A man may lose his right hand, and become very skilful with his left. The hearing, smelling, and feeling are said to become more acute when the sight is gone. False hair and false teeth may be adopted, when age or decay have deprived us of those which were natural; but we cannot obtain false or artificial nerves and brain. Let the latter be lost, and the existence of the soul in the body could not be ascertained. These remarks show that everything depends upon the nerves, and, consequently, the importance of these material instruments for the development of our mental and moral powers. Hence the wise man calls the nerves "the silver cord," and the skull, because it contains the brains, "the golden bowl."

The great characteristic of the nerves is susceptibility. The Aeolian harp responds to every breeze; the sensitive plant droops its leaves at every touch. We have reason to believe that animals, and especially insects, feel every change in the atmosphere. That amazing element, electricity, is perhaps one of the subtlest agents in our world, and yet does not escape the notice of our senses. Language cannot describe the exquisite sensibility of our nervous system. An atom, not occupying the thousandth part of a square inch, can be detected by the eye; a particle of musk, infinitesimally small, can be perceived by the nose; a monad of gall, too small for any power of the microscope to reveal its existence, can be tasted by the tongue; the point of the finest needle, and the edge of the sharpest razor, are felt by the touch; while a perfect ear can distinguish the most rapid vibrations of sound. Here, then, is a marvellous production of Divine art—for these nerves and brain are made out of common dust, and, consequently, are the most exquisite of the works of the Creator; they are the celestial drapery or embroidery with which JEHOVAH has invested the soul. Here matter makes its nearest approach to mind—and some have thought that our "spiritual body," at the resurrection, will consist of nothing but nerve, and that the "new heaven," or atmosphere of the "new earth," will be especially adapted to this vehicle in which the soul shall be clad.

The office of the nerves is twofold—SENSATION and MOTION. As without nerves we should be senseless, so we should be motionless. Not only is it a nerve that enables us to see, but it is also a nerve that moves the muscle that lifts the eyelid and opens the eye, or draws down this precious guardian whenever vision is offensive or injurious. Without nerves we could not open or close these windows of the soul. The rapidity with which we raise or fasten these animated blinds is not the least marvel in this marvellous animal mechanism. Hence "the twinkling of an eye" has always been a metaphor to express rapidity and brevity. How sublime are the words of Paul:—"We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump,"—intimating that the transition from mortality to immortality will be too rapid to be perceptible. All this beautiful imagery would be lost upon us if we had no nervous system of sensation and motion.

We shall in this and a few succeeding papers speak of these two operations of the nerves, and show the baneful effects of intoxicating liquors on these fine corporeal filaments of the soul. First, we shall glance at sensation. We need not say that the senses are sight, hearing, tasting, smelling, and touch or feeling, and consequently five in number.

I. We will offer a remark or two on SIGHT. It is superfluous here to dwell on the exquisite structure of this organ, or the almost boundless pleasure that it imparts. "Whoso toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye," is one of the most lovely, delicate, and poetic expressions of Scripture. The susceptibility of the eye is the finest of which we have any idea, and, therefore, in the words just quoted, we have language and illustration exhausted. Ten thousand superlatives, were they lawful, would not add to the perfection, strength, or beauty of this figure and description. And yet we owe our perceptions of this loveliness to our optic nerve. If angels have no material organs of vision, the very sentence, which to us is so exquisite, would convey to them no meaning. All, then, will grant that the eye is one of the most sensitive and important of our senses. What an infinite variety of ideas enter the soul by means of the eye! Our histories, our books of science and philosophy, our poetry, are all full of stores of knowledge collected by the eye. Without this divine member we should never have been enchanted with the productions of the painter, and could never have read and sympathized with the poet. How we pity the blind! What a wilderness this earth would have been if all had been born blind! Here, then, we have not only opened to us one of the most important portals of wisdom and knowledge, but one of the richest sources of pleasure; and, therefore, how we sin against ourselves, against our brother man, and against God, when we do anything to injure our sight.

But as vision depends upon the optic nerve, whatever produces disease in this organ must affect our sight. Now, it is well known that stimulants operate directly and immediately upon the nerves and brain. In fact they are drunk for this very purpose. If we had no nerves not a drop or particle of any kind of stimulant would be taken. Again—it is probable that the instantaneous influence of these liquors on the brain is effected by means of the stomach. The action of the electric telegraph is not more rapid than the communication between the digestive organs and the brain; and when once the brain is affected the whole body partakes of the shock, and of course the optic nerve, which is so very sensitive, must feel the injury. But the evil is not merely instantaneous and transient, like a flash of lightning. Stimulants regularly taken produce chronic diseases of the stomach, and these have a chronic influence on the brain and nerves, and especially upon the eyes of many individuals. There are thousands who have a swimming in the head, and are tormented with giddiness and dizziness, from no other cause than a disease of the optic nerve, occasioned by that organ sympathizing with the brain, and the brain with the digestive organs. Numbers wear coloured glasses; are pained with any glare or increase of light; have all manner of shapes and forms floating before their eyes; are continually wiping their spectacles, and yet can never get them clean; and all arising solely from the use of stimulants, and their consequent baneful effects upon the stomach, the brain, and the nerves. Dr. Beaumont tells us that after using strong drinks but ten days, St. Martin was troubled with dizziness and vertigo. The writer could fill a good-sized volume with the pains and troubles which he suffered in his eyes from these sources, and which have all disappeared on his becoming a water drinker. How many boxes of pills and draughts he took; how many kinds of washes and eye-salves he used; how often he wiped his spectacles when they wanted no wiping; what a torment a white-washed wall, a gas-lamp, or a gay morning was; how many a book was put aside unread for want of sight; and, therefore, what sources of knowledge were sealed, in consequence of drinking but very moderately of these accursed beverages. Blindness was prophesied as the certain accompaniment of premature old age; and would have been the inevitable consequence, had he not abandoned all these baneful liquors, and adopted nature's purest beverage—cold water.

Thousands are suffering from the same cause. Their eye-sight is actually failing; their power to attain useful knowledge decreasing; their ability to do good nearly paralyzed, and will soon be gone, unless they resolve to renounce the slavery and the curse of stimulants. (To be continued.)

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.

AMIDST the many useful Reformations which are carried on in the present day, not the least important and useful is the Temperance Movement. Whilst we hear so much of Sanitary Reform, Financial Reform, Educational Reform, Ecclesiastical Reform, and Parliamentary Reform, we are in danger of forgetting a noble band of men—noble in numbers as well as in moral purpose—who persevere, through evil and good report, to wage war on the drinking system of England. We are fully convinced that of all the questions of Reform now advocated with so much energy throughout the United Kingdom, the most important in its national, social, and moral bearings, is the Temperance Reformation. Without it all the movements in favour of Sanitary Reform would prove a failure. Financial Reform to a drunken and degraded people would but add to their means of dissipation. And, then, what advantage would be gained by placing the Suffrage in the hands of men who are lost to all sense of propriety, and, in the expressive language of Scripture, “whose god is their belly!” But let us have a temperate and moral people, and liberty will delight to make her local habitation among them. Give us sobriety, and sanitary reform, education, and morality will be able to work their way with success. There will be no repellant forces to retard their onward movements; but they will find an industrious and orderly people ready to welcome their progress.

Entertaining these views, we mark with satisfaction the decided progress which the principles of Total Abstinence are making among all classes of society. It is a fact of which many of our readers may not be aware, that there are in England, Wales, and Scotland, nearly, if not quite, two millions of persons who are engaged in the laudable effort to banish drunkenness from our country and from the world. When men feel disposed to say that a little drop does them good, and that they cannot do without it, let them ask themselves the simple question, how do these two millions of their fellow countrymen, moving in the same circles, and subject to the same vicissitudes as themselves, go on without touching these alcoholic beverages? And not only is it the case in England that men, women, and children, live and thrive in health and happiness; but in Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and many other parts of the European continent, in the United States of America, and in the burning east, we meet everywhere with the most ample evidences that intoxicating beverages are not necessities of life. If we except one million of Europeans, the 150 or 160 millions of inhabitants of India never drink anything stronger than water, and a finer set of men can hardly be found. So firm are they in their abhorrence of the drinking system, that they can only, with great difficulty, be persuaded that, in becoming Christians, they do not necessarily become drunkards. They have been accustomed to associate the brandy-bottle with the very existence of a European, which accounts for the conduct of the Sikhs in placing a bottle of brandy on Lieut. Bowie's breakfast-table whilst a prisoner among them. It is very strange that these brave people are able to perform such exploits as they recently have, if alcoholic liquors are so essential as many of our countrymen seem to imagine.

But we need not cross the ocean, or travel into distant climes, to see that the principle is practicable and successful. We can report progress at home. When the friends of Temperance wish to meet in London, they can fill Exeter Hall. When the Birmingham abstainers wish to take a trip to enjoy a little fresh air, they must have a “monster train.” When they turn out at Liverpool or Manchester, the procession is of immense length, and a far more honourable “triumph” than any ever accorded to a Roman conqueror. The Bath Society fills the large room of the Guildhall with a respectable audience, and the city of Bristol has her well-disciplined cold-water armies. Both in North and South Britain there is every reason to be thankful and take courage for the gratifying progress which the cause has made. Millions of tracts are distributed, thousands of lectures are annually delivered, and a healthy public opinion is being formed.

If we simply look at the present condition of the Temperance Societies, we cannot obtain an adequate idea of the triumphs of Temperance. Perhaps we should not be far mistaken were we to assert that the movement has been quite as successful in an indirect way as it has been directly and immediately. Old fallacies have been exploded; the chains of antique customs have been snapped asunder; business transactions are carried on in a more sensible way; funerals are conducted with more propriety; and altogether the standard of morality, so far as drinking is concerned, has been considerably elevated. A license that would have escaped observation a few years ago would be now visited with severe reprehension. Heads of families begin to find it their interest to pay higher wages to servants who are total abstainers. Farmers are becoming gradually convinced—just as gradual as the growth of seeds from their well-tilled fields—that their “harvest home” may be secured without a deluge of strong drink. Candidates for parliamentary representation think it possible that an election may be conducted without “open houses.” Visiting magistrates and chaplains of prisons have some notion that prisoners may manage to live without the fatal cup. Insurance societies have begun to insure Temperance ships at a lower rate of premium than others; and we expect the next move will be a considerable reduction on all Temperance lives. Eloquent writers and eloquent divines can now allude to the movement without a sneer. The “Teetotal Times” for last month states, that of the four writers on Juvenile Depravity, whose Essays were deemed worthy of premiums, only Mr. Beggs was a Teetotaler. In the course of their investigations the other three became converts to Teetotalism. Similar impressions were also made on the mind of one of the adjudicators, who holds a prominent position in connexion with the education of the juvenile aristocracy of this kingdom. In consequence he has adopted very stringent regulations as to the conduct and habits of those committed to his care. There are not many newspapers that will now speak of the movement in a hostile tone, or indeed with indifference. It is seen and felt that the language of “thus far shalt thou go and no further,” must be held out to our drinking usages ere long, and no barrier presents itself half so effectually as the Temperance Reformation.

We commend these significant facts to the careful study of such of our readers as are the supporters of our drinking system. Our medical and general literature, our preaching, our educational efforts, and our recent legislative enactments, go against the continuance of a habit which has entailed on our country so many grave and afflicting evils. There are voices from our lanes, our asylums, our prisons, and our churches, imploring us to consider the best remedy to free our land from the social curse whereby it is afflicted. The Financial Reform movement is expected to save us some ten millions a year, but the Temperance Reformation would immediately save us fifty millions, and, in the course of time, would add fifty more. It would diminish crime, and strengthen the fabric of society. The idle and vicious when reclaimed would add to the number and capability of the productive classes, and the capital of the country would be soon increased. It would give to agriculture and commerce what is now consumed in charity and penal discipline. The necessary independence of the working man would be promoted, and the capital and trade of the middle classes would increase and prosper. The discontinuance of the universal curse would be followed by an universal blessing.—(From the Standard of Freedom.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE WESLEYAN MAGAZINE AND MODERATE DRINKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—In looking over the “Wesleyan Methodist Magazine” for 1834, I find, at page 382, an excellent article on “Temperance Societies,” which, although written on behalf of abstinence from distilled spirits, applies to every kind of intoxicating beverage. With one paragraph I am particularly struck, and shall be obliged if you will bring it under the notice of your Wesleyan readers. It is as follows:—“But the greatest discovery for which we are indebted to the philanthropists of America is, that ‘TEMPERATE DRINKERS ARE THE CHIEF PROMOTERS OF DRUNKENNESS.’ Although the example of the drunkard is contaminating and injurious, yet he serves also as a BEACON to warn away from the vortex where thousands have perished; while those who are unconsciously gliding towards the fatal circle, point with confidence to the practice of the temperate drinker.”

The entire article is well worthy an attentive perusal. It contains some of the best arguments in favour of total abstinence principles that can possibly be brought forward.

I shall be glad if any of your correspondents will aid me in promoting these principles amongst the Wesleyan body.

I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

TEETOTAL STATISTICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—The question of Statistics you have raised at page 71 of your last number, is one of intense interest. Cannot you turn your special attention to it, and furnish some fair data on which we may reason? If the former totals are erroneous, are all Mr. Beggs’—with all deference to his superior acquaintance with this department of investigation—even nearly correct? He says—

“6,000 deaths from drunkenness per annum in England and Wales, and about 10,000 in the United Kingdom, would be a very high estimate.”

1. In 1839, Mr. Wakley, Coroner, said:—“Gin causes me to hold annually 1,000 inquests more than I should otherwise hold. But, besides these, I have reason to believe that from 10,000 to 15,000 persons die in this metropolis annually from the effects of gin-drinking, upon whom no inquests are held.”

2. Mr. Corbyn Morris, in “Observations on Bills of Mortality in London, 1759,” states, “as a consequence of the very general use of ardent spirits, 80,000 infants were lost in twenty years.”

3. In “Stoak’s Statistical Account of Russia,” it is stated, “that of persons between 20 and 60 years of age, 817 die out of every 1,000,” and that this extreme mortality was consequent upon the free use of spirits.

4. In Stockholm, in one year, 1,439 died more than were born, chiefly from the same cause.

5. According to the ratio of deaths, about 13,000 would die annually out of every 600,000 of the population; and all are agreed that drinking among this number would add immensely to the amount of deaths. I, for one, fear that even Mr. Beggs will find his calculation as much below the real amount of mortality caused by drinking, as the other may be above it. However, for the sake of truth, pray do something to get out the facts as fairly as possible, and as soon as possible.

Yours, as ever,
R. TABRAHAM.

TEETOTAL STATISTICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

SIR,—The statistics of intemperance, when given correctly, or with authenticity, are terrible weapons in the hands of the temperance advocate; but, of course, their value depends entirely upon their truth.

For some years past Teetotalers have been accustomed to assert that 60,000 drunkards die annually in Great Britain, and that there are 600,000 drunkards in the kingdom. These statements have passed current, at least among Teetotalers, and have never been publicly disputed, till, as it would appear from the “Teetotal Times,” Mr. Beggs has contradicted them.

From the language there used it would be difficult to say what number Mr. Beggs estimates the deaths from drunkenness at, or on what just grounds he contradicts the old statement He refers to the "Bills of Mortality;" but of what use are they in estimating the number of deaths from drunkenness? Do the doctors faithfully record all the deaths from that cause that come under their notice? Or do coroners' juries in all cases, or in the bulk of cases, return verdicts in accordance with the evidence in such cases? Certainly not. If the Bills of Mortality were to be relied on in this particular, we should have less occasion for temperance advocates than we have at present. Mr. Beggs talks of "excess of deaths," and other things unintelligible to the common reader, and, I must confess, to me also; but I would wish to make a few statements on this important point, on which perfect reliance may be placed.

During the years 1846 and 1847 I had the honour of filling the office of secretary of the Carlisle Total Abstinence Society, and in the latter year I endeavoured to keep something like an account of the number of deaths from drunkenness that occurred in this city. I had no assistants in the different localities of the town to take notice of what occurred in them, and therefore all the cases that came to my notice were well-known, indisputable cases; and, from the want of proper assistance, there can be no doubt that many more escaped my observation. During a period of little more than eleven months I took down twenty-one cases. The population of Carlisle in 1841 was 23,012; therefore it follows that, even at this rate, there would be 24,196 deaths from this cause in the United Kingdom, reckoning the total population at 26½ millions. Drunkenness cannot be said to be more prevalent in Carlisle than in other towns with a similar population; indeed, there can be little doubt that in many of the manufacturing towns in Lancashire and Yorkshire the vice is much more common than it is here; while in the towns where the great naval and military depots are, and also in most seaport towns, it is, beyond comparison, more prevalent.

From these facts, and making a reasonable allowance for those deaths from drunkenness that escaped my notice in Carlisle in 1847, I am bold to say that the deaths from this cause in Great Britain cannot be much, if at all, less than 60,000 annually. The actual number of deaths in Carlisle, I have no hesitation in saying, is not less than forty in the year; so that, after making some allowance for the greater amount of drunkenness in many large and populous towns, the total number may be put down fearlessly at 60,000.

What, then, becomes of Mr. Beggs' statement, that 10,000 is at all near the number of deaths from this cause? I confess that, for a long time, I doubted the statement, that 60,000 die annually from drunkenness; but after making the above calculations I could no longer doubt it.

Yours, sincerely,
R. DUNCAN.

We, the undersigned members of the Committee of the Carlisle Total Abstinence Society, do willingly bear testimony to the above facts and figures in answer to Mr. Beggs' statements in reference to the statistics of intemperance. We have seen the list of names of those Mr. Duncan has put down as persons who died from drunkenness in 1847, the most of whom were personally known to us as drunkards; and we make no doubt that, had the observations been more rigidly made, that double the number there stated might have been put down:—

WATER IS BEST.

"The error of drinking (says Dr. Balbernie) has been to civilized society the most prolific source of its physical as well as its moral evils."

Although drink, unstimulating drink, is as important to the economy as food—it is necessary to repair the waste of the fluids, to liquify the nutritive matters, and to dilute the chymous pulp of the stomach. Nothing can so well accomplish this, as pure cold water.

As a beverage, cold water quenches thirst best; cools, cleanses, and strengthens the stomach and intestines. "It is (says Dr. E. Johnson) the most elegant and efficient tonic. It increases the appetite and promotes digestion. It drives out bad juices, and aids in making new and good ones. It mixes with the alimentary masses with which it meets. It breaks up, softens, and dilutes the too solid parts, and facilitates their passage along the intestinal tube to the absorbent mouths of the lacteals, whence it is at once conveyed into the general circulation.

It is absorbed into the blood, and unites with it, and quickly diffuses itself. It liquifies, dilutes, and purifies its too acrid and coagulated humours, and facilitates their combination with oxygen, and, finally, their expulsion from the body.

It is eminently calculated to assist in the performance of the functions of all important organs, particularly the glottis, trachea, lungs, and skin—water taking the double part of moistening the food and importing oxygen into the system, which is co-important with food.

Now, alcoholic liquors, be they in what form they may, consist chiefly of carbon and hydrogen, and, owing to their volatile nature, their vapours permeate the animal tissues, and spread through every part of the body; and it is a great fact, founded upon observation, that alcohol cannot pass from the body until it has been decomposed. When one atom of alcohol finds its way, by permeation of the tissues, into the arterial blood, its elements are set free as follows:—One atom of oxygen, two of carbon, and three of hydrogen. The one atom of oxygen combines with one of hydrogen, and form water. The other two atoms of hydrogen rob the arterial blood of two atoms of oxygen, and form water also. The two atoms of carbon rob the blood of four more atoms of oxygen, and form carbonic acid. Thus is the arterial blood robbed of its oxygen, its vitality, and converted into black, pernicious, venous blood, which repeated physiological experiments prove to be not only black in its colour, but also innutritious in its nature, and poisonous in its properties. The blood of the arteries owes its vermilion colour and vital properties to the presence of oxygen. While alcohol (says Liebig) quits the system in the form of carbonic acid and water, the oxygen, which accomplishes the change, must be taken from the ARTERIAL BLOOD.

It is obvious, then, that by the use of alcohol the change of matter, so important to life, must be lessened, and hence the system becomes loaded with extraneous matter, and so clogs the wheels of life; for if the power of the elements of alcohol to combine with oxygen was not greater than that of the compounds formed by the change of matter, or that of the substance of the living tissue, alcohol could not continue with oxygen in the body. The oxygen of the arterial blood would, in the absence of alcohol, combine with the matter of the tissues. Muscular strength depends upon the transference of the tissues by oxygen, of which alcohol robs the blood, without the muscles taking any share in the transformation.

Alcohol, then, cannot impart to the system any available strength or nourishment. It may for a time counteract exhaustion, flog up languid vascular action, and produce a glow in the stomach; but this fititious spirit is soon succeeded by increased weakness, which demands a repetition of stimulus, until at length it emerges into a fit of uncontrollable passion. So imperceptibly, yet surely, does this practice steal upon the unhappy individual that at length the habit becomes confirmed. And so assuredly does it produce a certain degree of mischief, proportionate to the quantity taken, which, if it be large, will kill outright, and in small quantities, says Dr. Johnson, it deteriorates the quality of the arterial blood, and deadens the sensibilities of the heart and brain. It diminishes the vital force of the digestive organs, and lessens the actions of all the vital transformation. It impairs the memory and all the intellectual faculties, and unfits the man either to will or to do. It diminishes the strength and energies of the body. It adulterates the source and springs of life, and poisons the root of the tree.—T. T., Malvern.

THE CONTRAST.

WHAT HE WAS.

WHAT HE BECAME.

It is difficult for those who have not systematically visited amongst poor drunkards to form a just conception of the debasing influences of our drinking customs. The hardness of heart, the abandonment of all religious restraint, even by those who once knew the way of righteousness, and the extent to which infidel and blasphemous principles are fostered by the aid of intoxicating liquors, are beyond conception.

The following affecting instance was met with in York:—

On a Sabbath in 1848, on leaving the Wesley-place Sunday-school, and proceeding up Black Horse-passage, I met an emaciated creature, staggering at every footstep. Taking hold of him by the arm, I kindly remonstrated with him on his unhappy condition. Although he had been drinking at the public-house all the night, he was yet able to converse with considerable collectedness, but he had to make use of the wall to prevent him from falling. I soon found that I had encountered a man of considerable natural talent, and who had evidently once moved in better circumstances. He boastfully avowed himself an INFIDEL, ridiculing all reference to the Bible and a future state of being, whilst he loudly protested that religion was all "humbug." Fixing my eyes steadily upon him, and still grasping his hand, I earnestly but affectionately said, "I have met with others who, like you, have ridiculed religion whilst they were in health, but who when death stared them in the face have wished me to pray with them; and in the last half-hour of your life, DEATH will make you think differently to what you now do." The awful look of despair, the gnashing of the teeth, the clenching of the fist, and the fearful oath with which he exclaimed, "That DEATH plagues me," I shall perhaps never forget.

In further conversation I endeavoured to move him by referring to his departed mother. He became affected, and, with a deep sigh, exclaimed, "Ah! I was once a happy man."

From answers to inquiries, I found that he had been a member of a Christian church for seventeen years, but that during the last seven years he had been an unhappy "backslider."

I now assured him that there was still hope for him if he would abandon his ways, and return to Christ for pardoning mercy. "You may again become a happy man," I assured him. "No, never! sir; it is all over now," he replied. After pleading with him to become a total abstainer from drink, as a step towards the right way, he exclaimed, "I never will! Every morning when I awake, I am as miserable as man can be until I get some drink, but when I've got it, then I'm as happy as any man in the world, and care for nothing."

On inviting him to accompany me to a place of worship, he said, "No, sir; I shall never put my foot within either church or chapel again." On handing him a tract he refused it, and replied, "I do not wish to insult you, sir; but I shall not read either it or the Bible, nor will I let any one read to me. It is no use now." My heart yearned over the poor unhappy wanderer, but remonstrance seemed altogether unavailing.

When parting, I expressed a hope that he would, on reflection, adopt a new course of life. He shook my hand, and, with a quivering lip, exclaimed, "I thank you, sir; I know you wish me well, but I shall never alter now."

As I left him I thought I had never met with a more striking instance of the iron grasp with which intoxicating liquors seem, as it were, to "seal the ruin" of many of their victims. He was a man of superior abilities; he commenced life with a bright prospect of success; for many years he adorned a Christian profession; but he was a moderate drinker. The "bottle" and the "decanter" were in his house. Many of his Christian brethren had invited him to take "one glass" with them. Imperceptibly a love for drink was created.

Private prayer was now neglected; the house of God forsaken; relatives and those who had first emboldened him to drink now turned their backs upon him; until, step by step, he sunk so low that he now fondly hoped there was no God to judge him, no heaven to gain, no hell to escape.

Parents! Brothers! Sisters! Sunday-school Teachers! Professing Christians! look at "THE CONTRAST;" see "WHAT HE WAS," and "WHAT HE BECAME;" and may the sight move you, as it moved me, to pledge myself to renewed exertion in promoting the Temperance cause.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENT FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

NOTWITHSTANDING the vast importance of the TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT, there has not hitherto been any special effort for the purpose of presenting its claims to the notice and support of the VARIOUS SECTIONS of the Community. It is to be regretted that the Metropolis of England, so far from taking the lead in this matter, has been considerably behind some of the Provincial Towns. The result has been a great want of interest in the Temperance question on the part of the public, and comparative apathy and inactivity on the part of the great bulk of the Metropolitan Teetotalers. In the confident hope of arousing Teetotalers to a sense of their duty, and of imparting valuable information as to the Temperance Movement to the public generally, it is proposed to hold at least SIX PUBLIC MEETINGS in the LARGE ROOM, EXETER-HALL, to be convened on the evenings of the first Monday in each of the following months:—October, November, December, in the present year; and January, February, and March, in 1850.

To render the Meetings as interesting and effective as possible, it is intended that the addresses to be delivered shall be confined to some specific view of the Temperance question, in some such order as the following:—

First Evening.—The Temperance Reformation in its bearing upon the Moral, Social, and Political Elevation of the Working Classes.

Second Evening.—The Influence of the Temperance Reformation on the Extension of Religion, at Home and Abroad, and the moral obligation of professing Christians to promote it.

Third Evening.—The Claims of the Temperance Movement upon the Teachers and Friends of the Sabbath Schools.

Fourth Evening.—Juvenile Depravity:—The Extent of the Evil—its Immediate and Proximate Causes—and the Importance of the Temperance Reformation as a remedial measure.

Fifth Evening.—Intoxicating Liquors not necessary for working men, either to assist them in their occupations, however laborious, or to promote their health and happiness. To add peculiar interest to this Meeting, it is proposed that addresses shall be delivered by ten or more speakers, selected from various trades and occupations.

Sixth Evening.—Intoxicating Liquors not essential to the Health, and their entire abandonment promotive of the physical, intellectual, and social benefit of the Community. With remarks on the influence of the Drinking Customs of the Country; the importance of Sanitary improvements; and an appeal to Fathers and Mothers to promote habits of Temperance in their families.

To carry out the objects thus specified, it will be necessary to raise a fund of, at least, TWO HUNDRED POUNDS. In addition to the hire of Exeter-hall, there will be the expenses of printing and advertising. Some of the gentlemen whom it may be thought proper to engage in this advocacy will have to be brought from distant parts of the kingdom. An endeavour will also be made to secure good reports of the proceedings in the leading journals; and it is believed that influence sufficient for that purpose can be exerted. The Committee feel confident, that if the requisite sum is raised (as they have every reason to hope it will soon be), large and overflowing audiences will be obtained, and the Temperance Movement be made interesting—and even attractive—to thousands who attend none of the ordinary meetings. The good likely to result from the gatherings thus anticipated will be by no means confined to the Metropolis, though if the Metropolis were its utmost limit, that is an object of magnitude claiming and deserving the most liberal support.

Particulars of each meeting will be duly announced. In the meantime it may be sufficient to say that the most distinguished advocates of the Temperance Reformation will be invited to take part in the addresses.

The Committee have pleasure in stating that the following donations were subscribed on the very first intimation of the plan:—

The following gentlemen have been appointed as the Committee for attending to the details of this Movement:—

TREASURER AND CHAIRMAN—JOHN CASSELL, Esq.

T. B. SMITHIES,	J. P. DRAPER,
E. TISDELL,	J. H. ESTERBROOKE,
G. C. CAMPBELL,	J. BAILEY,
— WILSON,	J. PHILLIPS,
W. SPRIGGS,	W. TWEEDIE.
J. W. GREEN,

Donations will be thankfully received by the Treasurer, 80, Fenchurch-street; Messrs. Wilson and Campbell, Surrey-road, Blackfriars; Mr. E. Tisdell, High-street, Kensington; Mr. W. Spriggs, 14, Brook-street, West-square, Lambeth; or by any Member of the Committee.

T. B. SMITHIES,
J. H. ESTERBROOKE, } Hon. Secs.
G. C. CAMPBELL,

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

THE NEXT MEETING will be held at Mrs. Watts' Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on WEDNESDAY EVENING next, July 4th, at half-past seven o'clock precisely. The attendance of all office-bearers and active members of Total Abstinence Societies is particularly requested, as some important information in connexion with the proposed series of meetings in EXETER-HALL will be communicated.

GROG AND PAUPERISM.—There were 18,633 paupers relieved in Massachusetts in 1848, of which number 9,567 were made such directly by intemperance. The good people of the state were taxed 37,274,975 dollars to support them, to say nothing of the cost of alms-houses, &c. This precious kind of "political economy" is getting to be pretty well understood "down east," and in some parts rum-sellers are hunted like wolves.—New York Organ.

ANTI-BEER SHOP ASSOCIATION.

A SERIES of public meetings, nearly thirty in number, have been held in various parts of the metropolis and suburbs, at which petitions have been adopted, praying the Legislature "to prohibit the granting of any new licenses to Beer Shops, and to enact that those already granted shall be in force only during the tenure of the present holders." The object in sending these petitions to both Houses of Parliament was to strengthen the hands of the Earl of HARROWBY, who has signified his intention, at the earliest suitable opportunity, to introduce a Bill for the abovementioned purpose. We understand that about 150 petitions, from various parts of the kingdom, have been presented to the House of Commons, containing about 20,000 signatures, and about the same number to the House of Lords.

It appears that the Earl of HARROWBY, after serious deliberation and consultation with gentlemen of experience in such matters, judged it most advisable to move, in the first place, for the appointment of a Select Committee of Inquiry. Accordingly, on June 15, his lordship, after presenting a great number of petitions and referring to the numerous evils which had arisen from the multiplication of Beer Shops throughout the country, moved for the appointment of a Select Committee, in order to obtain evidence on the subject which might lay the ground for legislative interference. His lordship referred to the fact, that among the petitions were some from magistrates, clergymen, and gentlemen, and also from congregations of the Wesleyans and other religious denominations, and several from Temperance Societies. Lord MONTEAGLE said, that if the object of the proposed interference was to go back to the old system of licensed public houses, he should oppose it. He could not approve of doing away with the Beer Shops. Under the Beer Shop Act a considerable amount of property had been created, and it would, he conceived, be unjust to pass any act by which that property might be injured. He had reason to suppose, he said, that this movement originated, and was supported, by the Licensed Victuallers. At the same time, he admitted that the present law affecting Beer Shops needed alteration and amendment. Lord HARROWBY assured the House that the movement was in no way connected with the Licensed Victuallers, and that he should not call a single witness from that class of persons. He again referred to the fact that the petitions came, many of them, from Christian congregations, and from Temperance Societies. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE intimated that he should not oppose the motion, though he could not at present, on the part of the Government, give any opinion as to the expediency of altering the existing law. The motion of the Earl of HARROWBY was then agreed to.

The result of this appointment of committee will, no doubt, be a searching inquiry into the mischiefs wrought by the Beer Shop system, and the recommendation of an appropriate remedy. The report will be published, and will thus be the means of diffusing a vast amount of important information over the country; and, it may be hoped, as a further result, that early in the next session of Parliament, a Bill may be brought in, either to remove the nuisance altogether, or greatly to abate it. In the meantime it is obviously the duty of Temperance Reformers to improve the interval by agitating the question, and by exerting their influence in every possible way to obtain the complete repeal of the obnoxious Act. Great praise is due to Mr. RICHARDSON, of Liverpool, for his unwearied exertions to promote this important object.

SERMONS ON TEETOTALISM.

WE are glad to learn that the Committee of the NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY are arranging for SERMONS to be preached MONTHLY, in various parts of the metropolis and suburbs, for the purpose of explaining and enforcing the practice of Total Abstinence from strong drinks. The first of these sermons will be preached by the Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS, in ZION CHAPEL, Whitechapel, on the evening of Sunday, July 1. No doubt the Teetotalers of the metropolis will muster largely: let them, also, invite some of their neighbours to accompany them.

WESLEYAN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.
IMPORTANT!

WE are pleased to be able to announce that Dr. J. BEAUMONT has consented to preside at a Temperance Meeting in London, on the 13th July, to be addressed by Wesleyan Sunday-school Teachers. The place of meeting is not yet decided upon, but will be announced by placard. We sincerely hope that there will be A VERY LARGE MUSTER.

O D E.

BY THE REV. JOHN PIERPOINT.

On the Introduction of the Waters of Lake Cochituate into the City of Boston, Mass.

It comes! it comes! the water comes!
See with what power it gushes out!
Hail it, ye bands, with roll of drums!
And all ye people, with a shout!

The blessing comes, that fainting ones
Have waited for in vain so long;
And now through all our streets it runs.
We hail its advent with a song.

Thanks to the Father of all rain!
Thanks to the opener of the springs,
That the full lake has burst its chains,
And to our homes its bounty brings.

Time of refreshment! round us flow,
To cool our lips, our thirst to slake,
Fountains and treasured rains and snow,
Pure as th' Almighty's hand can make.

Then praise Him, that for us, this day,
His hand this largess poureth out;
And may the blessing be, for aye,
Hailed with a people's joyful shout.

CLERICAL EXAMPLE.—We often hear of the bad effects of Christian ministers using wine, &c.—there are such ministers, and their influence is sadly injurious; but the number is very small in this region of country. So far as our knowledge extends, and it is by no means limited, the highest total abstinence ground is maintained by them, both in theory and practice, with scarcely an exception. There are few parishes in this part of the country in which the use of any intoxicating beverage would not prove fatal to the standing and influence of the minister. People feel that at this time of day very little confidence can be placed in a wine-drinking pastor; and they are right.—New York Temperance Organ.—[Would that the above description of the conduct of Christian ministers in reference to strong drink applied to Great Britain! In America a wine-drinking minister is the exception—in England the abstaining minister is the exception.]

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

WESLEYAN TOTAL ABSTINENCE UNION.

The first annual meeting of the Westminster Branch of this Union was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, Princes-place, on Tuesday, June 12. After tea, Mr. J. W. GREEN was called to the chair. After reading and prayer, T. Richardson, Esq., A.B., of Liverpool, furnished a brief account of the formation and progress of the Wesleyan Total Abstinence Union. Its object was not so much to reclaim drunkards, as to make the Wesleyan Connexion what it ought to be, namely,—a strictly sober people, and the promoters of strict sobriety in others. The standard of the Union had been planted in the midst of storms, and those storms raised chiefly by their own preachers, from whom they had naturally expected the greatest encouragement—(Mr. Richardson here furnished some details, which, out of respect for the general character of the parties, we omit). He said that if the projectors of the Union had devised a plan for making drunkards, they could hardly have encountered greater opposition. They were anxious that all the Wesleyan Methodists who were total abstainers should remain in the Connexion, and be as a leaven secretly and gradually pervading the lump. They were anxious to hold their meetings in Wesleyan buildings, because then they were likely to have Wesleyan speakers, and to conduct their meetings in a Wesleyan manner. It had been objected to teetotal societies, that persons of all characters and of all creeds, and of no creed, met together; but by meeting as Wesleyans, in Wesleyan places, that objection was done away with. They wished also to strengthen the hands of those of their preachers who were friendly to the teetotal practice, but who being surrounded by men who used strong drinks, and who were, some of them, connected with the manufacture and sale of strong drinks, were likely to look coolly upon them. Notwithstanding their difficulties, however, several of the preachers had joined them, and the Union numbered about 2,500 members. They had issued a series of excellent tracts adapted peculiarly to Methodists, and the friends of the cause would do well to circulate them.

The SECRETARY then read a brief but compendious report of the proceedings of the branch. Monthly meetings had been held for the advocacy of the cause, and monthly meetings also for prayer for the success of the institution and the prosperity of the Wesleyan Connexion. About fifty persons had become members of the society, including four local preachers and six Sunday-school teachers.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES, late of York, said that while he did not undervalue the exertions made for the conversion of the heathen in far distant lands, he felt that they were bound to exert themselves for the conversion of the heathen at home. They had done something, but they ought to have done much more, by the circulation of tracts and the other means that were available by them. In York they felt that they should be promoting religion in their own souls, and in the souls of others, and rendering service to the Connexion, by engaging heartily in the promotion of total abstinence, and hence they exerted themselves in every way that they believed to be suitable. In many ways might the cause be promoted. One easy and excellent way was to send tracts to persons who were supposed to be in danger from the use of strong drink. That was a silent and respectful mode of doing good. He had often employed the penny post for that purpose, and instances of good resulting therefrom had come to his knowledge. The more he considered and observed, the more he was convinced that teetotalism was the cause of God, and that in proportion as they promoted it they rendered service to the Church and to the world. In a revival of religion which took place in York, among those brought into the Wesleyan fold were 295 backsliders. He inquired particularly into the causes of their backsliding, as far as the males were concerned, and he ascertained that in four cases out of every five drunkenness was the cause. Strong drink had, indeed, proved a curse to the Church. The worst class of drunkards he had met with were fallen professors, and the worst of all these were fallen Wesleyan Methodists. Circumstances had recently transpired in the Connexion which should warn all of the danger of tampering with strong drinks, and lead all to unwearied exertion. Mr. Smithies concluded a very impressive address by recommending all the members present to advocate the principle in a spirit of kindness, with patience, and with much prayer.

Rev. Mr. DEXTER said that he felt himself quite at home among persons belonging to the same body as himself. It was objected by some that teetotalers admitted persons of all characters and of all creeds into their societies. He did not feel the force of that objection, because he found that the objectors met freely with persons of the same description for other objects. However, by the formation of the Wesleyan Total Abstinence Union, that objection was removed, and he could now take them on their own ground. Would they join the teetotal society now? He was aware that the teetotal question might be argued successfully on physiological, economical and social grounds; but he rested it chiefly on moral and religious grounds.

The SECRETARY referred to the recent meeting of the London District, at which, as he understood, it was reported that the Lambeth circuit was in debt. He had ascertained that there were 1,400 members in society, and he had ventured to make a calculation, the results of which were as follow:—

700 spending 1d. per day in strong drink,	£1,061 13s. 4d.
400   "   2d.                   "           "	1,213 9 8
300   "   4d.                   "           "	820 0 0

Making a total of..... £4,095 3 0

That sum be proposed to expend thus:—

	£	s.	d.
Payment of chapel debts.....	800	0	0
Support of ministers.....	600	0	0
Rents, &c.....	700	0	0
Day-schools.....	500	0	0

Indigent members.....	500	0	0
Rooms for prayer meetings.....	100	0	0

£4,095 0 0

Mr. M'CURRIE said that, though the teetotal Methodists had been opposed by those who ought to have helped them, they could, notwithstanding, rejoice that the blessing of God had rested upon their labours. Hundreds had left the Church through the love of strong drink, and stranger still, the Church had left them. The sheep had strayed from the fold and were lost, and the shepherds, instead of going out after them, had said, "Oh, they are gone too far to be restored, and it will be of no use to follow them!" But that was not the conduct of a "good shepherd." Was it not sad that their own preachers refused to announce meetings of Wesleyan teetotalers? As it regarded himself, teetotalism found him a poor, miserable, fallen, backsliding Wesleyan Methodist, through a fatal love of strong drink; and it had brought him back to peace, to comfort, to respectability, and the Connexion. Hence he felt bound to advocate abstinence in connexion with religion to the best of his ability.—The chairman then concluded the meeting, which was well attended, by giving out the hymn, "Jesus, confirm my heart's desire," &c.

FITZROY AND MARYLEBONE.

On Monday, June 25, an excursion by steam-vessel to Southend took place, under the management of the committee of the Marylebone and Fitzroy Total Abstinence Society. The fineness of the weather, and other attractions, brought together about 800 persons, who left London-bridge Wharf, on board the Emerald, about nine o'clock in the morning, and returned safely thither about ten at night. Every person on board seemed to enjoy the trip, though it would have added greatly to the comfort of the passengers if the vessel had been larger. As it was, a hundred or two were obliged to return home disappointed. Some addresses, recommendatory of Teetotalism, were delivered at Southend, though the majority of the company preferred short rambles through the town and vicinity, or a short sail or row on the sea. On their return, however, a number of interesting addresses were delivered by Messrs. M'Currie, D. Walters, Freemantle, Hodgson, Esterbrooke, Campbell, and J. W. Green. A conversational advocacy also was carried on with much success, and as the result of the public and private addresses, several signatures to the teetotal pledge were obtained.

BLOOMSBURY.

Some time ago, the Rev. G. W. McCree proposed to the Committee that on the first Wednesday in each month the usual Temperance Meeting should be superseded by a lecture on some scientific, moral, or literary subject. This was agreed to, and the lectures commenced. They have been attended by an encouraging amount of success; and will continue to be delivered on the first Wednesday in each month. Mr. J. P. Parker has lectured on Universal Peace and Providence; and Mr. McCree, on Life Assurance and Self-education (two lectures). On July 4, the Rev. J. Robertson, M.A., will lecture on the Human Mind and its Improvement. The lectures commence at half-past eight o'clock.

GREENWICH.

Contrast and comparison are said to be a speedy and effectual means of arriving at truth. This is never more strikingly exemplified than when the practical teetotaler compares his present with his former condition, especially if he have been the victim of excessive indulgence. He is able to contrast a body enfeebled and a body invigorated—a mind distracted and a mind composed—a condemning conscience and a peaceful conscience—neglect of relative, social, and religious duties, and attention thereto—a contrast, in short, which language, however eloquent, fails to describe. Of this class were the feelings experienced by the writer on a recent visit to Greenwich for the purpose of recreation, and for listening to a lecture on Temperance from Mr. Pasmore Edwards. Mr. W. SPRIGGS occupied the chair, and made a few remarks. Mr. Edwards then enforced the practice of teetotalism as one in perfect harmony with the laws of health—a fact, he said, which was fully established by history, science, experience, and observation. This he illustrated by appropriate references. He then pointed out the pernicious properties of intoxicating drinks, and their injurious influence on the physical, social, and moral condition of mankind, especially the industrial classes; this also was fully and pleasantly illustrated by facts. A numerous and respectable audience testified their cordial approbation of the lecture by hearty applause. The writer wishes to subjoin a remark or two on the formation and successful working of this Greenwich Temperance Society, which he trusts may be acceptable to the religious reader interested in the progress of the Temperance Reformation, and encouraging to Wesleyan teetotalers. There is reason to fear that no class of abstainers have more prejudices to encounter, or more opposition to lament, than those who are members of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion. To such it may be satisfactory to state that the committee of this society consists of respectable religious tradesmen, including some consistent, faithful, and influential Methodists of long standing. Concord, activity, and perseverance characterise their proceedings. The secretary sustains an important position in one of the oldest first-rate mercantile establishments in the City, and generously devotes his talents and spare time to the promotion of the temperance cause. The result of these benevolent, harmonious, and persevering efforts, is a united, stable, and efficient band of teetotalers in one of the most dissipated boroughs in the United Kingdom.

WOODSTOCK.

A temperance tea meeting took place in the Town-hall on Whit-Monday through the exertions of the originators and promoters of the Juvenile Total Abstinence Society in connection with the Baptist chapel in this town. We had the pleasure of beholding joy and happiness beaming from upwards of 200 cheerful countenances. The seats were then arranged, and Mr. Cox, Superintendent of the Sunday-school of the above place of worship, was called to fill the chair. The speakers were, the Revs.—Gutteridge, of Southam, Church of Oxford, Hiron, Way, Windows, and Noble. The audience was highly respectable, and appeared to be deeply interested. We have upwards of 100 youths who have recently signed the pledge. Great interest is awakened in this locality: meetings at Bladen, Charlbury, &c., have been held, and have resulted in bringing trophies to the temperance cause. Some respectable moderate drinkers have been led to the conclusion that the only safe and effectual plan to remove the blighting curse of intemperance from our land is Total Abstinence.

ROBERT NOBLE.

WANTAGE, BERKS.

The sixth anniversary of the Temperance Society in this town, was held on Monday, the 18th June. In the morning the members, committee, and friends assembled in the Wesleyan chapel, when the Rev. ZEPHANIAH JOB, the Wesleyan minister residing in the town, preached an impressive discourse from the latter clause of the 23rd verse of the 32nd chapter of Numbers, "Be sure your sin will find you out;" which he applied to the intemperate in strong drink; and also to the intemperate in other sins; and made it apparent that Teetotalism, although it will remove that great stigma on the human race, the love of strong drink, will not save the soul. In the afternoon the total abstainers, after proceeding through different streets, accompanied by the Wantage band, and the members of the Juvenile Rechabite Society, with their flags and banners convened, together with other friends, in Mr. John Jones's barn, Wallingford-street (which was very obligingly lent for the occasion) and sat down to a tea.

The Rev. Mr. JOB was called to the chair at the public meeting, which was large and respectable: he stated his reasons for being a Teetotaler. The prime one was that his usefulness as a minister of the Gospel might thereby be increased. He made many other pertinent remarks and exhortations.

The Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, M.A., late of Bath, was then introduced, amidst the enthusiastic cheerings of the audience. He delivered a very lucid and impressive address, in the course of which the drunkard, the moderate drinker, the manufacturers and venders of strong drinks, all came in for a share of his reproof and advice; and the Teetotalers were exhorted and encouraged to greater zeal and activity. He also made some striking remarks as to the disgusting practices of smoking and snuff taking; and at the close of the meeting a Teetotaler of twelve years standing presented the speaker with his pipe and tobacco, affirming that he would never again resume the practice. The Rev. Chairman also had two packets of tobacco presented to him, with similar declarations.

Mr. ISAAC BROAD was next called upon. His observations were impressive, partaking of the nature of true gratitude, and piety—in relation to himself, looking at his past infatuation, that he is now a Teetotaler, and one who aims to abstain from all appearance of evil; and also, of the greatest desire to promote the good of others.

The meeting closed by singing a Doxology, and the friends were highly pleased with the addition of the names of fifteen persons on the pledge-book, and several more had thoroughly made up their minds, but did not wish to sign the pledge under the excitement of the moment.

EXETER.

The members and friends of the Wesleyan Total Abstinence Society took tea together a short time since in the St. Sidwell's School-room, when sixty persons sat down to partake of the cheering beverage. In the course of the evening several interesting addresses were delivered, and many related their Christian experience combined with the practice of Total Abstinence, some of which were of fourteen years' standing, and by the blessing of God they had enjoyed general good health, and through his grace a good hope for eternal life. K. W. FOX, Esq., honoured the society with his presence, as did also Mr. ALLEN, from Glasgow, who favoured the meeting with an able, soul-stirring address on the subject of Total Abstinence. This society, which has only been organized six months, numbers about a hundred members (all Wesleyans), including two ministers, eleven local preachers, and several leaders. A monthly tract distribution has been commenced in connexion with this society, for the distribution of the tracts sanctioned by the Wesleyan Union of Total Abstainers established at Liverpool. The Wesleyan friends of the temperance cause have reason to believe their efforts will be crowned with the desired blessing, and that their numbers will very soon be doubled and trebled. It should also be stated that the secretary keeps a pledge-book for those who are not members of the Wesleyan society, thereby extending the influences of the society among the members of the congregations or any others that the members may come in contact with.

BRISTOL.

On Whit-Tuesday the Annual Temperance Festival and Rural Fete took place at the Zoological Gardens, Clifton, and passed off with much elate. Soon after the appointed hour, all the approaches to the promised "scene" were almost choked up with a numberless mass of pleasure-seekers, and by two o'clock the gardens presented a most pleasing and animated appearance. The walks and avenues of these delightful gardens were decorated by an admixture of the sexes, both young and old. After perambulating and examining the curiosities of the animal and feathered creation contained in the locale, a great proportion formed themselves into parties, and commenced their afternoon pleasure by various games.

At half-past three o'clock a meeting, for the purpose of hearing addresses, was held on the lawn, the orchestra being occupied as a platform by the orators.

Mr. JOHN RUSSELL briefly addressed the meeting, and then introduced Mr. JOHN CASSELL, proprietor of the Standard of Freedom, who delivered a very interesting and effective address. He said that, he looked upon the Total Abstinence Society as the "working man's elevation society" (hear); as calculated to elevate him morally, socially, physically, and politically. Look at the physical condition of the working classes, and see how great an amount of misery and disease they endure on account of their love for intoxicating drinks (hear, hear). Not only did those drinks impair the stomach, corrode the liver, and enlarge the heart, but their ravages extended to the brain, the temple of the reason, the port-royal of the intellect. Then the drunkard not only injured his own body and mind, but he transmitted to his children an impaired organization, fulfilling, in an awful manner, the divine declaration, "I will visit the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation." Viewing the subject in the moral point of view, what was the effect of the drinking habit? The drunkard not only spent his money in the public-house, but he degraded his own morals, and injured those of his children, whom he deprived of the blessings of education, or contaminated by the influence of bad example. Even if he sent them to the Sabbath or day school, the good which was there imparted to them was neutralised by the evil examples of home, and the children were led and seduced onward until they acquired all the vices of their fathers, and descended unpitied and unloved to a drunkard's grave. In the towns where teetotal societies were established, much had been done to elevate the intellect and morals of the people: instructive institutions were established, and the working classes and the rising generation were led to spend their evenings not in the public-house, but at the mechanics' institute or literary society, while on the Sabbath-day, instead of besotting themselves in the tavern, they were often to be seen with their wives, well clad, going to a place of worship. In Manchester alone hundreds and hundreds had been released from the bondage of drunkenness, while teetotalism had done more for the factory children than all the factory bills put together (hear). Yes, when a man became a teetotaler, he became a richer man, a wiser man, and a man imbued with a strong sense of his responsibility, and he took his children from the factory to send them to the school. He had said that total abstinence would elevate the working man politically, for what tended more to degrade man in every way than the use of intoxicating liquors? There was not an election took place in which men did not barter their franchise for drink (hear). When they found men who would sell their Bible for drink, could they wonder that others would barter their political privileges for the same? and he would ask, ought such to be trusted with so sacred a privilege as the elective franchise? Let them spread abroad the teetotal principle, let them create a sober people, and they would find the comfort and happiness of his wife, the education and moral improvement of his children—objects dear to the heart of every working man (hear, hear). They complained of taxation, but let them only save the money which they now squandered in strong drink, and they would repeal the malt-tax for themselves, and relieve themselves of a self-imposed burden which kept thousands in poverty and wretchedness.

Mr. RICHARD HORN spoke at some length in a humorous, feeling, but scarcely reportable speech.

Mrs. STAMP, widow of the Rev. Mr. Stamp, of London, next spoke, and was listened to with thrilling anxiety.

Mr. BALFOUR addressed a few remarks to the meeting in advocacy of the total abstinence cause, and the proceedings were then adjourned till half-past six o'clock.

At the meeting in the evening,

Mr. CASSELL again spoke in support of two propositions—1st. That strong and intoxicating drinks were not necessary for persons in health; and 2nd. That the disuse of those drinks would be favourable to the world's advancement. He said the first proposition was proved by the experience of hard-working men of all classes, blacksmiths, stone-masons, corn-porters, and others, who had borne their willing testimony to the fact, that they could do better without intoxicating drinks than with them. It was, too, proved by the testimony of the physiologist, the medical man, and the chemist. Intoxicating liquors contained nothing which rendered them useful as means of strengthening the human system. A pint of beer contained scarcely an ounce of nourishing matter, and that of the coarsest and most indigestible kind. A pound of nutritive matter in beer would cost 2s. 8d., while the same quantity in bread would, at the most, cost 2d. (hear). That intoxicating drinks were not necessary to enable persons to stand heat had been proved among other evidences by the experience of that day, while that they were not required as a protection against cold was admitted by the fact of Captain Ross having made all his men teetotalers (hear). No one had ever given the system a fair trial who had not been compelled to declare that he was the better for it—better in health, better in mind, better in social comfort, better in pocket (cheers). In support of his second proposition, Mr. Cassell alleged that drinking obscured the faculties, so that men could not, when under its influence, see the truth, while by its influence on the social condition it impeded the progress of intelligence, morality, and religion.

Mr. BALFOUR, who had been a missionary of the National Temperance Society to the English labourers engaged in making the railroads in France, contrasted the drunken habits of his countrymen with the more sober demeanour of our continental neighbours, and stated, as a fact, that the French had resolved to give up the making of a railway from Havre de Grace to Rouen, if the English labourers could not be made more sober. Mr. Balfour spoke at some length in exposure of the evils of intemperance as experienced in this country—condemned the drinking customs of Englishmen, and called upon the upper and middle classes to abolish them.

Mrs. STAMP also spoke, and the meeting concluded by the singing of a temperance hymn.

The gardens were well attended throughout the day, and towards evening there were at least 19,000 persons within the boundaries of this favourite place of resort.

BURWITH, YORKSHIRE.

On Thursday, the 14th ult., the annual Temperance Festival was held at this interesting village. Mr. Smithies, sen., of York, presided. Mr. ADDLESHAM, the agent of the British Association, and Mrs. HARDWICK (wife of the Rev. W. Hardwick, Baptist minister), with other friends, addressed the meeting. A similar festival was held during the same week at the adjoining village of Cottingham. Our correspondent, in referring to the heartfelt appeal made in the addresses by Mrs. Hardwick, says, "Her coming has been crowned by the Divine blessing eminently."

WAKEFIELD.

During the past fortnight Mr. Teare, the well-known Temperance advocate, has been delivering a series of lectures in the open air in different parts of this town, upon the principles of, and the blessings consequent upon the adoption of, the temperance cause. Large auditories have listened to the forcible arguments by which this popular lecturer sought to produce a conviction of the truth upon the minds of his hearers, and several have become total abstainers from that frightful source of human misery, strong drink. In this town this good cause has for a length of time greatly prospered, and it is pleasing to add that several hundreds of the rising generation are enrolled as a branch of that hopeful association, well-known throughout the West Riding by the appropriate appellation—"The Band of Hope."

RIPPINGALL.

Friday evening, June 1, a lecture was delivered in the open air, at the Cross, by Mr. J. BORMOND, from York, which was listened to attentively. It was delivered in the hearing of many who would have been far better in every respect, but for the use of strong drinks. The lecturer pointed out the benefits that would result from the abandonment of such drink to the farmer and labourer, to the employer and employed, and to all classes. There would be a great saving of money, of precious grain, of human character, and of human life. Many in this place have, through temperance, been reclaimed from vicious courses, and their goings are established in the way of temperance. Several have signed the Total Abstinence pledge since the delivery of the above lecture. S. HND.

BETLEY, STAFFORDSHIRE.

On the 30th ult., the Teetotalers and Rechabites held their first anniversary. A procession, at one o'clock p.m., having been determined upon, great numbers assembled early from the Potteries, Newcastle, Crewe, Nantwich, and other places in the neighbourhood. At one the procession started with banners, the band from the potteries, &c., to Wrinchell and back to Betley, to the Wesleyan chapel, where the Rev. J. PRITCHARD, Primitive Methodist preacher, preached a very appropriate sermon from the words "No man liveth to himself." The Teetotalers were permitted to perambulate the pleasure grounds of the following gentlemen:—G. Tollett, Esq., Betley-hall; F. Twemlew, Esq., Betley-court; and D. Rasbotham, Esq., Dodlespool-hall; and thence to a tent on a piece of land kindly lent by Mr. Redfern, who, with Mrs. Redfern, rendered us every assistance for a comfortable tea-party, consisting of about 460 persons. In consequence of heavy rain the meeting adjourned to the Wesleyan chapel. Mr. FIDLEY, of Haslington, presided, and excellent addresses were delivered to a crowded audience by the Rev. J. Pritchard, Messrs. Brown, Smith, and Pickersgill. We keep up regular meetings, and the work of reformation goes on prosperously. Many have been induced to attend places of religious worship since they became Total Abstinents.

W. SWINNERTON, Secretary.

SUNDERLAND: WESLEYAN TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

This society was established in January, 1848, under the auspices of upwards of 40 local preachers and class leaders, since then it has enrolled about 250 members, together with 90 Sabbath-school teachers, and 500 Sabbath-school children. The first public meeting of the society was held on Friday evening, June 1st, in the Athenæum large hall, which was well filled by a respectable audience. The meeting having been opened with singing and prayer, Mr. William Muschamp was called to the chair, and delivered an address on the fearful evils entailed by intemperance, especially upon the moral and religious interests of the community. He showed that strong drink is the great antagonist to the spread of the Gospel, that by its use in this country alone, not less than 40,000 persons annually lost their religious impressions, and are thus prevented from uniting themselves with some section of the church of Christ. He next showed that this insidious foe had also invaded the sacred enclosure of the church itself, and there exerted the most desolating influence, sapping the foundations of personal piety, and annually expelling from its pale upwards of 20,000 members. After adverting to the comparatively little success of Sabbath-school and missionary labours, owing to the sad and counteracting influences of strong drink, the chairman called upon all Wesleyans to lend their aid and influence to the total abstinence cause, and thus carry out the spirit of their own rules, and the principles of their venerated and self-denying founder; and by the saving effected by this small sacrifice they would be enabled not only amply to replenish every fund in the society, but also swell the present deficient fund of their great missionary enterprise to at least £400,000 a year (applause). The chairman then called upon Mr. Alderman Beaumont, surgeon, of Bradford, who delivered a masterly and eloquent lecture on the physiological bearing of the total abstinence question. He stated that not only was the total abstinence principle supported by all those powerful arguments that could be drawn from its moral and religious bearing, but that physiological and medical science also came forward in its aid and defence. He then entered into the most clear and lucid arguments and proofs that the use of alcoholic drinks are not only unnecessary to the enjoyment of perfect health, but that even in moderate quantities they are positively injurious to the beautiful, delicate, and complicated mechanism of the human frame; and that a large proportion of the many diseases and ills to which flesh is heir to, "originate in the use of intoxicating drinks." During the delivery of this admirable and convincing lecture Mr. Alderman Beaumont was frequently and loudly applauded; and its beneficial results, in giving a fresh impetus to the Wesleyan total abstinence cause in Sunderland, will be long experienced and felt. Mr. Simpson Hodgson moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Ald. Beaumont and the chairman, which was carried unanimously. The meeting then broke up.

DRINK AND DEATH.—Asiatic cholera has appeared among the "navvies" employed in cutting the second tunnel on the Manchester and Sheffield Railway, at Woodhead, near Manchester. The workmen, amongst whom it has made its appearance, are exceedingly intemperate in their mode of living. Many of the "navvies" had saved up their earnings, and indulged in great drunkenness at Whit-suntide, one man alone having spent seven pounds, it is said, in intoxicating drinks during the week. He had eaten and drunk immoderately at dinner time on Saturday, and soon after was seized with symptoms of cholera, which increased very rapidly, and he died within about fourteen hours of the first attack. The disease spread very rapidly amongst the other workmen; sixteen were seized with the dreaded symptoms within a few days, of whom seven died up to the following Monday night; and the others, when the last account came, were not expected to recover. When will men learn to value life, health, and comfort above every sensual indulgence?

TO WINE-DRINKERS.—The Commander of the American Exploring Expedition, in his description of Madeira, after alluding to the fact that "the manner of expressing the juice has never been particularly described," goes into detail regarding this preparatory process in the making of wine:—"On our approach we heard a sort of song, with a continued thumping, and on entering saw six men stamping violently in a vat of six feet square, three on each side of a huge lever beam, their legs bare up to the thighs. On our entrance, they redoubled their exertions, till the perspiration fairly poured from them. After the grapes had been sufficiently stamped, and the men's legs well scraped," &c. An attempt was made, it appears, by some cleanly Europeans, to introduce machinery in lieu of the legs, but the attempt failed in consequence of the resistance of the natives. Query:—Do the wines of Madeira owe their peculiar flavour to the delicate process just described?

TESTIMONY OF A PUBLIC ORATOR.

THE following important testimony to the value of abstinence from wine and other stimulating beverages, is extracted from a letter addressed to L. McNally, Esq., by the celebrated Curran:—

"My health is much better; my breast quite free; the pain gone; my appetite better; sleep not so profound; temper more even. I am a gainer by the abandonment of wine. I have taken only water. . . . I have been talking about your habits, without naming yourself. I am more persuaded that you and Egan are not sufficiently afraid of even weak liquors. I can say, from trial, how little pains it costs to correct a bad habit. On the contrary, poor nature, like an ill-used mistress, is delighted with the return of our kindness, and is anxious to show her gratitude for that return by letting us see how well she becomes it. I am the more solicitous on this point from having myself made this change, which I see will make me waited for in heaven longer than perhaps they looked for."

THE WANDERER.—As I was returning from a Temperance meeting at the West-end of London, a few nights ago, on passing City-road Wesleyan Chapel, I overtook a respectably-dressed young man, who was intoxicated. He was "lost," and could neither find his way home, nor make me understand where he lived. I took him to my lodgings; and, after a little time, his recollection so far returned that he was enabled to describe his lodging. On our way thither I ascertained that he was the son of a Wesleyan Class-Leader, and that prior to his leaving home he had been a member of the Wesleyan Society and a Sunday-school teacher. He had only been a few days in London, having come up in search of a situation in one of the wholesale houses. It was nearly midnight as I passed the Hoxton Church on my way back; and I thought of the many promising youths who have found premature graves in the London church-yards, who might now have been living but for strong drink. Let parents who intend to send their sons to London see to it that they are firmly grounded in total abstinence principles. Without this they will, in all probability, be overcome by the numerous snares of London.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

WESLEYAN TEMPERANCE TRACTS, Nos. 1 to 27. H AND BILLS ditto, Nos. 1 to 12. London: W. Symons, New Bridge-street, Vauxhall.

THESE tracts are published under the sanction of the Committee of the "Wesleyan Union of Total Abstainers," who have selected them especially for circulation among the members of the Wesleyan Methodist Societies and congregations. We have the means of knowing that great good has resulted from the circulation of these tracts in the Wesleyan Connexion; much prejudice has been removed, and many have been induced to adopt the practice of total abstinence, and to join the Wesleyan Union. As there is still, strange to say, much difficulty in obtaining the use of Wesleyan Chapels or School-rooms for the advocacy of a practice enjoined by the founder of Methodism, the circulation of these excellent tracts may go far to supply the deficiency. At the same time, they are suitable for circulation amongst professing Christians generally.

THE WESLEY BANNER AND REVIVAL RECORD. Edited by WESLEYAN MINISTERS. Nos. 1 to 7. London: Partridge and Oakey, Paternoster-row.

THE responsible Editor of this monthly publication is the Rev. SAMUEL DUNN, the Superintendent of the Wesleyan Nottingham Circuit. In addition to a variety of articles interesting and instructive to all classes of professing Christians, and some peculiarly so to Wesleyan Methodists, it regularly advocates total abstinence from strong drinks, and that, not merely by advancing theories, or even reasonings, in favour of the practice, but by furnishing unequivocal testimonies as to its utility and excellence, from eminent medical practitioners, ministers of religion of various denominations, and others every way competent to furnish such testimonies. We wish the Rev. Editor much success, and the more so at this time, because, in consequence of his having assumed the character of a reformer, he and his periodical are violently opposed by some whose opinions and conduct are far behind the times.

DRINKING AND SABBATH DESECRATION. By the Rev. W. REID, Edinburgh. London: Houlston and Stone-man, Paternoster-row.

THIS is a four-page tract, issued by the Committee of the Scottish Temperance League. It is admirably calculated to convince the promoters of Sabbath observance of the intimate connection of Sabbath desecration with the manufacture, sale, and use of strong drink; and of the vast importance of the total abstinence movement in connection with the success of their labours. It ought to be circulated most extensively. It must convince the Sabbath reformer who is not also a Temperance reformer, that he is, to say the least, a very inconsistent man.

The extent to which drinking is carried among European soldiers in India is so fearful that no language can describe it.—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt.

THE POWER OF REFLECTION.—The most extraordinary thing in connection with gin palaces, notwithstanding the profusion of every known and unknown ornament, is the absence of all mirrors. This may be accounted for by the fact, that publicans are well aware that, if a drunkard could only see himself, he would immediately turn away in horror from the glass.—Funch.

TETOTALER'S BUDGET.

THE TRAFFIC.—Is it not a fact that intemperance is the greatest source of crime, poverty, and misery? Then how can any man, aspiring to the honour of being a patriot, a philanthropist, or a Christian, favour the manufacture, sale, or use thereof?

A WORD TO DRAM DRINKERS.—Let a dram drinker dispend with his drams for one year, placing the cost of them in a safe place of deposit, and see if he will not be better off at the end of the year, in health, comfort, and purse. Just try the experiment one year, and if the plan works well, continue it.

COLD WATER.—The fluid which nature has so abundantly provided is that best fitted for man to drink; it is suitable for every variety of constitution, and is more effectual than any other liquid in allaying thirst; thereby showing that it is the beverage designed to supply the loss of fluid to which we are perpetually subject in hot climates.

WORKS OF THE DEVIL.—A clergyman in Tioga county, New York, in opposing the temperance movement, went from house to house, from school to school, and from church to church, in the hope of persuading the friends of temperance were the works of the devil. Poor fellow! he had a hard time of it. Many intelligent persons concluded that if the devil had anything to do with either party, he stood smilingly behind this blind guide, patting him cosily on the shoulder, ever and anon exclaiming, "You're the preacher for me!"

INSANITY.—Dr. Bingham, the able superintendent of the State Lunatic Asylum, believes that intemperance is frequently the indirect cause of insanity in many who are themselves temperate. We have no doubt of it, and when once the disturbing influence is set in motion by a drinking parent, not only his innocent offspring, but his children's children may reap the consequences in the horrors of madness. With the mere possibility of such results before him, the man who persists in drinking must be hardened indeed; and how much more so when those results are highly probable!—New York Organ.

THE CASE WITH THOUSANDS.—"Well, Thomas, this is a beautiful bright Sunday morning; how is it that you are weeping instead of going to your much loved school?" "Oh, sir, I am ashamed to tell you, because I must speak of my father's faults. He got drunk again last week, and pawned my Sunday clothes; and last night he got drunk again, and spent the money which should have fetched them out: so I have no clothes in which I can go to school." Query: are not thousands of children kept from Sabbath and day schools, in consequence of the intemperance of their parents?

A WIFE'S THANKS.—A drunkard in Alabama was lately taken in hand by the temperance men, and reformed. Soon after, one of the brothers visited the humble though comfortable home of his family. He was welcomed by the wife with a joyful countenance. "God bless your society," she feelingly exclaimed, "It has made my husband a sober man, restored to our children the comforts of a home, and opened the road to the house of God." How many hundreds of wives can utter the same language? Let Christian opposers of the temperance movement visit one such home, and then ask if their opposition—if even their apathy—is justifiable.

A REPENTANT RUMSELLER.—The Boston Traveller relates an act of self-denial recently put into practice by a person engaged in the sale of spirituous liquors, whose experience of the nature and tendency of his occupation induced him to abandon the profitable business; and with a promptness and decision that can scarcely be too much praised, he proceeded to one of the officers of the Total Abstinence Society and signed the pledge, declaring that he could no longer be a witness of the poverty and wretchedness of his ruined customers. This is a simple fact that speaks volumes. Frightful must be the reality of those horrors, which rather than continue to have a share in producing, a man would prefer to throw himself upon the world and begin life anew.

The TETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST may be had of J. L. Green, 62, Paternoster-row, London; Ward, 54, do.; Abel Heywood, Manchester; Kershaw, Leeds; Menzies, Edinburgh; Gallie, Glasgow; and all Booksellers.

THE BANEFUL EFFECTS OF STRONG DRINKS ON THE NERVES, ESPECIALLY ON THE FIVE SENSES AND VOLUNTARY MOTION.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

HEARING.

IN the last number of the Treetotal Times we offered a few remarks on the injuries which intoxicating liquors inflict on our nerves and senses, and particularly referred to sight. Thousands are tormented with giddiness; have indescribable myriads of strange objects floating before them; are able to read but little; cannot bear to look at brilliant colours, or endure the least increase of light; are dizzy if they look down a precipice; and fly to all sorts of remedies without finding any of them availing. Sometimes they resort to opening medicines to purge their vision, and take numerous kinds of offensive draughts. They try all our watering-places, from the pure springs of Malvern to the nauseous fountains of Harrogate, and nothing seems to come amiss, whether saline, chalybeate, or sulphuric. If we had a law against cruelty to stomachs, and if that important physical functionary was endowed with an articulate voice, how many would have to be summoned before the magistrate! What countless boxes of pills are sent down the throat to be digested, or plague the organs of digestion. The ancients gave diplomas to their intestines, for they called their "venter" an "Artium Magister," that is, an A.M., or "Master of Arts;" and if the old-fashioned stomachs of the olden time deserved this honour, the schools ought not to pass over unnoticed the more hardly-worked and more deeply-learned gastric performers of our day. If some Homer, or Walter Scott, or Hudibras would but take up the subject, and sing, celebrate, or satirize the intestine wars of dyspeptics and hypochondriacs, occasioned by the freaks of the English in food, drink, and physic, we should soon have all the editions of the Iliad, &c. &c., thrown into the shade. All contentions and combats have originated in folly, and none more so than those which are gastronomic.

Hence we hail TOTAL ABSTINENCE, because by adopting this principle we shall be able to quiet much of the commotion within, and thus extend the blessings of the Peace Society to the physical as well as to the moral man. By delivering the nerves from the tortures of a material demon, we shall not only save the intestines from physic, but we shall prolong life, and purify the senses, so that we shall have clear sight, distinct hearing, and all the blessings which the Creator intended we should enjoy, through the medium of acute and healthy sensation. We propose in this paper to glance—

II. AT THE BANEFUL EFFECTS OF STIMULANTS ON THE SENSE OF HEARING.—How it is that one nerve should convey sound and another sight, has not yet been fathomed even by the acutest physiologists. We have not heard or read that either in the chemical or vital character of these marvellous little threads there is anything that would enable an anatomist to distinguish the one from the other. Were they separated from the brain, the eye, the ear, &c., and laid on a sheet of paper, he could not say, "This is a nerve of vision, and that of hearing." To mark their distinctive office, he must see the one extending from the brain to the eye, and the other from the same source to the ear. Here, then, we have a marvel which probably would nonplus the penetration of an archangel. But if the nerves are thus distinued and yet one, the organs with which they are connected are beautiful examples of adaptation to the purposes intended by the Almighty. We owe the present perfection of the telescope more to the discoveries of the anatomist than to the ingenuity of the optician. Art was anticipated by nature, and here, as in every thing, the best teacher is God.

And if the eye is an optical instrument finished by divine art, so the ear is an equal sample of infinite science and philosophy. Its bones, membranes, and peculiar structure fit it especially to be the audience-chamber of the soul. On its exquisite character volumes might be written without exhausting the subject. In studying this branch of physiology we are in a perpetual strait, for we know not which most to admire, its ingenious formation, or its benevolent use. Only imagine that all mankind had been born deaf, and what a world of knowledge, pleasure, and delight is at once shut out! and hence learn the injury done to ourselves, and the crime committed against God and man, by eating or drinking anything that can hurt this important sense. To become voluntarily deaf by the use of any deleterious article, is to insult the Creator, by trampling in the dust one of his choicest gifts. We grant that the ear has been the medium of pollution, iniquity and pain, but then this is one of the natural, and perhaps necessary conditions of a sensitive and moral constitution. If we could not feel pain we should be incapable of pleasure; if it were impossible for us to be wicked, it would be just as far beyond the reach of any possibility for us to be pious. Creatures endowed with feeling must be alive to all the influences that can affect their sensibility; and as no one can be religious from compulsion, for there can be no morality where there is no freedom or choice, the possibility of evil in a moral world consisting of minds of infinite powers and knowledge is not at all wonderful.

But, "What is," "What may be," and "What ought to be," are questions of very different import. There ought to be no moral evil in the world; and if Jehovah had been obeyed, there would have been none; and had there been no moral evil in the world, there would have been no physical suffering, and consequently nothing to pain or pollute the ear, or any other organ of sensation. In heaven there will be none but sweet, holy, benevolent and harmonious voices, and but for our sin, earth would be the counterpart of the celestial paradise. In this respect our world ought to be an emblem of the seats of bliss. The same mind that can harbour evil thoughts could cherish those which are pure; the same tongue that can utter obscene, polluting, cruel or cutting words, could with the same amount of labour pronounce those which would "minister grace to the hearers."

We make these remarks to show that the ear, as a divine gift, is perfectly and absolutely good, and that whatever pain or evil its profession may occasion originates in man. The language of this world would be all that the heart could wish if the Gospel were obeyed. Of the good wife in Proverbs, it is said—

"She openeth her mouth with wisdom,
And in her tongue is the law of kindness;"

and Moses, in addressing the Israelites, promised—

"My doctrine shall drop as the rain,
My speech shall distill as the dew."

Were all thus to speak, and why should they not? there would be little to pain the ear or contaminate the soul. We rejoice in the prospect revelation holds out, that our world is yet to be the auditor of sweet, holy, benevolent, eloquent and harmonious voices. It is a fable to talk of the golden age as past: the golden age is to come, and because we not merely dream, but as firmly believe in it as we do in our own existence, we earnestly invite all our fellow disciples in the Gospel to throw their influence into the total abstinence cause. How many "throats" are made "an open sepulchre" by the power of liquor! Numbers of persons never swear, talk foolishly, or obscenely, until the bowl has reduced them and destroyed all sense of decency and propriety. The language of the pot-house, the tea-gardens, and the tavern, might make even demons blush. From these pestilential sources there is daily, and especially on Sabbaths, poured through the ear into the soul moral poison of a character so deadly, that compared with it all other miasmata that have swept nations away are harmless and beneficent. And allow us to say to you, brother or sister, or whoever you are that use the drunkard's drink, so long as you take these liquors, you subscribe to pay for the licence which keeps open these sinks of death and perdition.

Our readers will pardon this seeming digression, but it did appear to us not all out of place, when speaking of so divine an organ as the ear, and its capabilities of good or evil, to direct their attention to one of the greatest sources of corruption that has ever polluted mankind, and therefore to entreat them to abstain, lest the blood of souls should at last be found on their garments. As to the sense itself, its capacities of evil and abuse may give us some idea of its susceptibilities of good. But then to be useful depends entirely upon the nerves. The organ may be perfect: the membrane, the bones, the tube, the structure, &c. &c., may be all complete and healthy, but if the brain and nerves are diseased, the hearing will suffer. There may be as perfect an ear in the dead man or the paralytic as in the most acute recipient of sound, but in such the nerves cannot act, and therefore they are deaf to our voices.

Now, it is well known that constant excitement weakens the nerves. We have read for so long a period together, as to be compelled to close our eyes. We have followed labour for six-and-thirty or forty hours in succession, but at the end could see nothing distinctly; and a long continuance of such a course must have ended in blindness. And the ear, be it remembered, is as sensitive as the eye. The sweetest voices, or the most enchanting music, by being continued too long, would become offensive, and generate disease. We must have an immortal and spiritual body before we shall be able to bear the prolonged hallelujahs of heaven. In our present imperfect state, perpetual stimulation must run up our nervous system. But it is at this consummation that our moderate and immoderate drinkers aim. They tell us they cannot labour, think, or preach, without the impulse of poisons. Their nerves never enjoy a moment's repose, for they are either overwrought by stimuli, or tremulous from relapse. In the former case you have the swift courser sweeping over the plains, and in the latter the gasping nostrils and the panting flank. The nerves are never in a healthy state. The brain is elevated too high, or suffering all the ills of over-excitement. We ask every thinking person to reflect whether it is possible to adopt a plan more likely to produce disease? We believe that human ingenuity could not, under any circumstances, invent a system so baneful to body and mind, and especially to sensation, as the constant use of intoxicating drinks.

It may here be asked, "How it is that in one individual the eye may be more susceptible to injury, and in another the ear?" The question is not hard of solution. Wherever there is any disease already, alcoholic drinks especially fly to that part and aggravate the evil. It is just the same as it is with the anatomist. He can handle putrescent bodies without harm, if there is no wound in his hand; but if he has one, woe be to him! for the virus will enter that unsound part, and perhaps poison his whole frame. So here: one individual has, either from malformation or some other cause, a tendency to diseased vision; and another, from cold or something else, a predisposition to deafness; and, in each case, the drink taken seizes the organ already affected, so that the one suffers in his sight and the other in his hearing. Drinking too much of even water will often produce a ringing in the ears, or some other unpleasant sound, which will confuse the senses; but when large quantities of stimulating liquors are taken, the hearing, in numbers of instances, is sure to suffer. For good hearing we must have healthy nerves; and we never can have strong nerves if we use intoxicating poisons. Some persons are of a more iron constitution than others; but we firmly believe that God has not made the brain or nerves which can effectually resist the influence of these beverages. We have seen every sense diseased from their habitual but moderate use. Many from this cause alone are stone-deaf, and, as far as sound is concerned, are dead while they live. They have sacrificed to appetite one of the choicest gifts of their Heavenly Father. Thousands have their hearing greatly affected, and lose more than half of what they ought to hear. They have voluntarily, thoughtlessly, or ignorantly imprisoned their souls; and could not be more shut out from the sweets of music, the enchantments of eloquence, the endearments of social intercourse, or the inspirations of religious vocal tuition, if they were separated from all by the diameter of the whole globe.

Here, then, is a sin of no common magnitude. Our senses are not our own; they are the property of Him that made us. They were given for especial objects; and to harm them in any way is to deface the temple of JEHOVAH. What language could sufficiently execrate, or what punishment avenge, the criminal who should have attempted to close the windows of the Jewish sanctuary? But the human body is the sanctum sanctorum of the soul, and the soul was intended to be the holy place of the Eternal: for the "Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands;" the heart, and the heart alone, is his abode. The light and knowledge which enables us to appreciate his character, and welcome him to our breasts, must be obtained by means of our senses; and, therefore, in numerous instances, to injure our sight or hearing is to imprison the soul in darkness, and to exclude the Redeemer, and thus unfit ourselves for usefulness here and for glory hereafter.

We regret, in conclusion, to say, that moderate drinkers are most guilty of the crime which we have endeavoured to expose. These systematically take these poisons, and thus injure themselves and others by a regular process. How important that Total Abstiners should use redoubled diligence, to sound the alarm with more energy than ever. As yet we have done but little. The Church is still asleep in its sin. The Ministers of the Gospel, who proclaim salvation on the Sabbath, not unfrequently blow the trumpet of Bacchus with more energy and effect than any other agents in the land, and thus spread blindness, deafness, disease, death, and perdition, with the very same lips that warn sinners "to flee from the wrath to come!" If amid such scenes Teetotalers should remain silent, SURELY "THE VERY STONES WOULD CRY OUT."

CORRESPONDENCE.

TEETOTAL STATISTICS.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

DEAR SIR,—Will you allow me to remark that the statement quoted from my work on Juvenile Depravity, and which has been commented upon by two of your correspondents, was not given as establishing any ascertained result, but simply as suggesting an inquiry into the probability of a fact which has become current in temperance literature. The utmost we can hope to arrive at is an approximation to the truth. My conjecture may be wrong, but I hope it is not so extravagant as the one called in question.

Both your correspondents seem to misapprehend the statement, and this arises, no doubt, from their having read the quotation only, as given by you, and not the chapter of the work to which it is appended as a note. In entering upon a discussion we must be careful not to confound two things that differ. If the general statement made was simply that "the use of intoxicating liquors occasions 60,000 deaths annually," then I believe the figures would not exaggerate the actual amount. But the statement is—"that in England and Wales there are 600,000 drunkards, 60,000 of which die annually." How the calculation has been founded originally I am unable to discover, but it is surmised that it was drawn from some facts collected in relation to the lowest parts of New York, one of the most unhealthy and profligate cities in the world. How is that just 10 per cent. of the drunkards die annually? and that the number is not affected by the usual fluctuations of population? In hopes that some of our temperance friends would furnish authenticated facts on the subject, I have ventured to quarrel with the statement, being perfectly satisfied that, as it stands, it is an enormous and absurd blunder.

I do not purpose to enter at length into the subject at present. I may do so when I have time to arrange and collate a mass of facts which I have collected from various quarters. Mr. Tabraham will see at once that I am not investigating now the real amount of mortality caused by drinking, as I have never seen the objectionable statement in that shape. I am inquiring how many drunkards die annually. This will also explain Mr. Wakley's statement. That gentleman does not assert that he holds inquests over 1,000 drunkards, but "that six causes him to hold annually 1,000 inquests more than he otherwise should." He does not say that 10,000 or 15,000 drunkards die annually in the Metropolis, but "that this number of persons die annually from the effects of gin-drinking." It is well known that children at the breast die in convulsions from the gin-drinking of their mothers, and Mr. Wakley had this fact in view; but even then his statement was evidently a random one, from the expression, 10,000 or 15,000. The deaths in the Metropolis in 1841, including part of Surrey and the whole of Greenwich, was 45,132. Mr. Wakley could not seriously mean that nearly 25 per cent. of the metropolitan population owe their deaths to gin-drinking. 24,643 of those dying would be children under 15 years of age, 18,455 would be children under five years of age; besides this, 1,562 deaths were among persons above 80 years of age. Few habitual drinkers reach that age. We are admonished by many startling facts that there are other causes of disease and death besides that of intemperance. In 1847 the mortality in London had reached 60,000, without any increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquors. To what, then, is the excess of nearly 15,000 deaths in 1847 over 1841 to be attributed? I adduce this to urge the necessity of great caution in weighing statistics from which important conclusions have to be drawn, as also to show the carelessness and haste with which experienced persons like Mr. Wakley make statements, which afterwards are quoted as authoritative.

Mr. Duncan confessedly does not understand my statement. If I have not succeeded in conveying my meaning in the terms employed, I despair of doing so in any others; but I will try to explain what is meant by "excess of deaths." Mr. Duncan is probably aware that there are different rates of mortality in different districts. The mortality of the whole of England is one in 45—that is, one person out of 45 dies annually. Some parts of the country are above and some below this. The Metropolis is one in 39; Birmingham one in 37; Sheffield, one in 33; Bristol, one in 32; Manchester Union, one in 30; Liverpool Parish, one in 29. In the Isle of Wight the mortality is one in 58; in Anglesea, one in 62. It will be seen that the number of deaths in Liverpool greatly exceed, in proportion to the population, the number of deaths in the Metropolis, as also that of England and Wales. This is said to be an "excess of deaths." I have, however, taken another standard. The possibility of reducing the mortality of the whole country, by sanitary arrangements and improved habits among the people, to one in 50, has been universally admitted by all who have paid attention to the subject. I have, therefore, taken two per cent. as the healthy standard. There can be no doubt that a much higher standard of health and life might be attained by the universal adoption of Total Abstinence principles and some sanitary measures; but it is safe to take the one adopted. I take two per cent., therefore, as the healthy standard, and have assumed that all the deaths above that are "an excess of deaths,"—that is, they are over and above what has been proved to be necessary if men would observe the laws of health. I find, in taking this calculation, that there are 30,000 unnecessary deaths every year in England and Wales, and I ventured upon the strength of that calculation to assert, that making the deaths of drunkards double that amount was absurd. One fact I may notice here, that with all our intemperance and other defects as a people, England holds the first place among the more powerful European states as regards health and life. The expectation of life is higher than in any part of Europe. I have no sympathy with those who wish to depreciate our own Island in these particulars.

I am obliged to Mr. Duncan for the fact in relation to Carlisle, as it serves to show most conclusively the loose and irregular way in which statistical results are often obtained. In the first place, the period named—eleven months—is not of sufficient duration to base any general conclusion upon. The deaths might be merely accidental. Would there be the same number in the eleven months preceding and the eleven months succeeding these over which his observation extended? Besides, it is obviously unfair to take one fact in relation to a town population, and apply the rule to the population at large. It cannot be just to estimate the number of deaths from any particular cause among the agricultural population by a fact gathered from the population of Carlisle. In estimating disease and death from intemperance, is no allowance to be made for the facilities to drinking possessed by one population over another? I could present, if space would permit, names of villages where the consumption of intoxicating drinks is about six, and even eight, times greater than that of others with an equally large population. Each, then, must be judged from facts gathered among its own population; and in general calculations due allowance must be made for difference of circumstances. Mr. Duncan craves allowance for larger towns than Carlisle. I believe that many of the third and fourth-rate towns have more intemperance in proportion to inhabitants than the first-class towns; but at any rate it is fair to make due allowance for the difference of circumstances in agricultural and manufacturing populations. Mr. Duncan has succeeded in only one thing, in showing that twenty-one deaths took place in one eleven months in Carlisle through drunkenness. This is no more useful in founding general conclusions upon, than the number of cases of drunkenness, after some particular feast or fair, would be in showing the sum total of cases of drunkenness throughout the country on the same day. I do not know the total number of deaths in Carlisle during the year when Mr. Duncan made his calculation—1847; but I find the number of deaths at all ages in 1846 was 1,097, and in 1844 only 836. To what is this excess attributable? To increase of population? to epidemic disease? or to drinking habits? This may suggest to Mr. Duncan the necessity of making his inquiries extend over a greater duration of time and a larger field of observation.

In conclusion, allow me to say, that I believe strong drink to be the cause, indirectly and directly, of above 60,000 deaths; but I am perfectly satisfied that the statement of even 10,000 drunkards dying annually would be an exaggeration. I believe that the reiteration of the hackneyed 'fact' of 60,000 drunkards dying annually tends, by its extravagance, to invalidate, in the minds of the thoughtful and reflecting, many of our facts upon which there can be no dispute. I can assure Mr. Duncan that I have not gone to the bills of mortality to estimate the number of deaths from drunkenness, nor yet to the verdicts of coroners' juries; for nothing has surprised me more than the Registrar-General's reports in relation to the causes of death. For example, the number of deaths ascribed to delirium tremens by the Registrar-General in 1839 was 206; the number of deaths ascribed to intemperance was 218. Common observation at once corrects this statement, and shows it to be underrated. But it is worthy of remark that I have known this statement make a deep impression. It came with the weight of authority. The mind could grapple the numbers. There was nothing in them to startle and confuse the apprehension. And it is very likely that to persons unaccustomed to the use of figures, it would be more impressive than the statement I have called in question. The first they could not dispute; the other would come upon them with a vagueness and uncertainty, and create a feeling that it might or might not be true.

I wish something could be done to form a statistical committee in connection with one of our leading temperance societies for the purpose of collecting and elaborating facts. I have always felt that we are deeply indebted to Mr. Dawson Burns for his tables, prepared with great skill, industry, and care, showing the consumption of grain in the manufacture of drink, and the consumption of various kinds of drink. It is one of the most valuable contributions to our literature. The question of vital statistics is more difficult, but it is of immense consequence that our statistics should be corrected, and placed at least within the regions of probability.

I am, my dear Sir,
Walthamstow, Essex, Yours truly,
July 20, 1849. THOMAS BEGGS.

HEAR, CHRISTIANS!—During the last twelve months not one million of money has been raised in Great Britain to carry the gospel of Christ to the heathen; whilst not less than seventy millions have been expended, during the same period, in alcoholic beverages.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE STANDARD OF FREEDOM.

[BY MARY HOWITT.]

ONE of the most cheering signs of the moral improvement of the age is the good understanding which in so many cases exists between the employer and the employed; between the rich man who is accumulating for himself a princely fortune, and the poor men who help to make it. Every day presents us with instances of these two parties, so often considered antagonistic, being bound together by the strongest of human and social ties, the interchange of good offices, mutual benefits and mutual dependence. This principle, once acknowledged and acted upon, will not only renovate, but cement society together, for in it lies the spirit of Christianity—the spirit of brotherhood.

These few remarks lead us to the celebration of the anniversary of the Standard of Freedom newspaper, which was held by Mr. Cassell, its proprietor, on Tuesday, the 3rd of July, in the large rooms of his Tea and Coffee Warehouses, in Fenchurch-street. On this occasion were assembled between one hundred and fifty and two hundred persons, in the employment of this gentleman; and the entertainment itself was so agreeable, and the general satisfaction and pleasure so great, that we cannot do other than enter into a few particulars of the evening, hoping that they may serve as suggestions for others to profit by.

Mr. Cassell, as is well known, being a teetotaler, nothing in the form of intoxicating liquor would be admitted into his entertainment, and how perfect it was without this we will endeavour to show.

At about half-past five we entered a large upper ware-room, which had been cleared of goods, and which was beautifully decorated with green boughs and flowers for the occasion. Here were assembled, whilst a good band of music was playing some excellent and popular airs, this large company at tea. About fifty boys, employed in the establishment and at the printing-office, were seated at one table; and the men having been invited to bring their wives and sweethearts with them, a sprinkling of well-dressed and happy-looking females gave an air of refinement and animation to the scene. Before tea was generally taken, a verse of a hymn was sung, after which the company at large were welcomed by a few cordial words from the entertainer, and bade to enjoy themselves fully without the least constraint. The band played "We'll not go home till morning," and the company entered heartily upon the enjoyment of the good cheer before them. After all had been satisfied, the large company broke up for a short time, while preparations were being made for a chemical lecture, to be given by Mr. Smith. Again the company assembled here, and after a short introductory lecture, several interesting experiments, primarily on the composition of water and air, exhibiting the power and properties of oxygen and hydrogen gases, were shown, which were made additionally interesting by the humour and wit of the exhibitor. These were terminated by a purposely-designed explosion of oxygen and hydrogen, which startled every one, as was intended, and extinguishing every light in the room, left the whole party in total darkness. Laughing gas was afterwards administered, and several of the party, greatly to the amusement of all, especially of the juveniles, some of whom exhibited its influence by the most comic and violent demonstrations.

A short and very interesting lecture on Scottish song, by Mr. Sherer, next succeeded, which was illustrated by some admirably-sung Scottish melodies; and immediately afterwards, in another room, fitted up for the purpose, a series of dissolving views were given, greatly to the delight of all.

Supper, in the meantime, had been set out in the large room where tea was taken, and the company again assembling here, found abundance of refreshment, among which every one hailed with delight piled-up dishes of strawberries and oranges, and jugs of excellent milk and delicious lemonade. All were again seated, women, working men, and boys—all happy, all well-behaved, all refreshed both in body and mind. The little constraint of the tea-table had now vanished; all were perfectly at their ease, and all sober. It was a triumph of Temperance and Teetotalism. It was the most cheerful and the most perfectly social evening party that we ever witnessed. The juvenile portion of the company having been dismissed, the music again played; and after all had refreshed themselves sufficiently, Mr. Sporre sang the well-known song, "Let us speak of a man as we find him;" when William Howitt rose to propose the health of John Cassell. He said that the words of the song which they had just heard had furnished him with an admirable text to speak from. He was glad of the opportunity which was thus unexpectedly afforded him for speaking of the giver of this entertainment as he had found him. It was now twelve months since the establishment of the Standard of Freedom, for the celebration of which they had now met, and having himself marched under that Standard from the day of its first erection until the present moment, in the closest connection with Mr. Cassell as leader, he had the fullest opportunity of judging of his character; and though he was not himself much famed for making encomiastic speeches, he was bound to say that he had found Mr. Cassell to be a man whom it did not require much time to see through, from the simple fact that he was transparent, and through that transparency you saw not only a solid, penetrating, persevering character, but an honest, and not merely an honest, but a highly honourable man.

Mr. Cassell was a man who was proud of having risen from the people, and of having been the architect of his own fortunes; he was therefore desirous of diffusing among those who had assisted him in it some of the good which he had acquired for himself. It was that which had brought them together that evening—an occasion which formed one of the most beautiful scenes of social life. Nothing was more beautiful than to see the employer and employed come together as friends; the employer not merely as the master—the employed not as mere subservients, but as human beings, all working together for one great and useful purpose. It was an example which he hoped to see more and more imitated in that great metropolis, for where were so many fortunes accumulated as in that wonderful city? There were people who thought the story of Dick Whittington too extraordinary to be true, but he would engage, that if you could seize almost the first well-dressed man that you met in the great rushing, roaring stream of life in the great thoroughfares of London, and could compel him, with the ancient mariner, to give up his history, you would find it quite as strange. Who were they who were now the great capitalists of London? Men who, themselves or their fathers, came up to seek their fortunes with a few pence or with nothing in their pockets,—like Thomas Tegg, the late publisher, who entered London with nothing in his pocket but an apron which he had provided to engage in the first work he could obtain. What were the feelings of this man on entering this great metropolis? Standing on London-bridge, he was not depressed by the immensity and the stir of the objects around him, but exclaimed, "What a place of capabilities!" And a place of capabilities he indeed found it: he achieved a large fortune in it. And every day, and every hour in the day, fresh adventurers are streaming up to try their fortunes in this place of capabilities. Perhaps at this very moment one solitary youth, weary, foot-sore, and penniless, was entering some distant suburb of that enormous Babel, he would, in like manner, become at a future day one of the great capitalists of London. At all events, some immense fortunes will continually be made, and he would hope that the makers of them would more and more imitate the example of their friend Mr. Cassell.

It had always been, Mr. Howitt said, considered one of the greatest difficulties to unite business and literature, but they had met that night to celebrate an instance of their successful union—for this soiree might be considered to have a two-fold purpose—as a house-warming of the fine business premises in which they had met, and for the celebration of the successful establishment of the Standard of Freedom. It was a fine thing for a man who had, within a few years, made his own way, thus to gather around him upwards of a hundred and fifty people to whom he gave employment, and to whom he furnished a rational and intellectual entertainment. But Mr. Cassell had not been contented with diffusing this comfort in his immediate neighbourhood, his desire had been, through the Standard of Freedom to assert and maintain those true British principles, which, when triumphant, would make the enjoyment of such comforts co-extensive with the kingdom. But let no man suppose that in advocating boldly, but judiciously, the fullest principles of reform, he was attempting to pull down one principle of the English Constitution. On the contrary, genuine reform was nothing more than an endeavour to restore to their native purity and vigour those great principles of British freedom, which opened to every man alike the highway to comfort and prosperity. In conclusion, Mr. Howitt called upon the company to drink with him, the health, long life and success of Mr. and Mrs. Cassell.

Mr. CASSELL, in acknowledging the unanimous response to this wish, said that his friend William Howitt, who knew something of his history, had said rightly that he had made his own way in life. He had come to London with threepence in his pocket. That was the money-capital with which he began the world; and there were some present at that moment—for instance his friend Mr. Smith, who had entertained them so agreeably by his chemical experiments—who knew him in that day of small things. It was true that he had been industrious and persevering, but he attributed his success more than all to his having abstained from intoxicating liquors. That was a fact which, on every occasion, he impressed upon his hearers; he wished particularly to impress it on all who heard him that night. On the following evening he should address a much larger audience at the Princess's Theatre on the subject of financial reform, when he should not fail again to introduce this great fact, that to ensure success in life men must abstain from intoxicating drinks. He appealed to them whether it were not more agreeable as well as rational, to be entertaining themselves as they had been doing this evening instead of fuddling and stupefying themselves, as had been formerly and was still too much the case! Was it not much more agreeable to be sitting there with their wives by their sides, than returning home to them half or wholly drunk, and quarrelling with them, and the next day being unfit for employment, instead of being, as he knew they now would be, refreshed and invigorated. Was it not much more delightful to partake of such entertainment as they had done; to listen to good music; to the Scottish lays of Mr. Sherer; and to learn from his friend Mr. Smith things which he was persuaded many of them did not before know—namely, the wonderful composition of the air which they breathed, and of the water which they drank. Mr. Smith had shown them practically, as he himself had so justly asserted, that water, in fact, was the only drink; that there was no other drink in the world—wine, brandy, spirits, and every other form in which liquor was presented, was but water adulterated, and in which alcohol, to which so much importance was attached, was the deadly poison.

In conclusion Mr. Cassell remarked, that in speaking of the success which had attended the undertakings which they were met to celebrate, he wished explicitly to call them undertakings which not himself alone, but they all jointly had brought to a successful result, for without their aid his endeavours would have been in vain. He hoped, therefore, that they might all live to meet again on many such future occasions; and that now, when what might be called the business of the evening was over, such portions of the company as wished further to enjoy themselves could do so, and would find both music and refreshments at their disposal.

Thus about midnight terminated this most agreeable evening.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENT FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

NOTWITHSTANDING the vast importance of the TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT, there has not hitherto been any special effort for the purpose of presenting its claims to the notice and support of the VARIOUS SECTIONS of the Community. It is to be regretted that the Metropolis of England, so far from taking the lead in this matter, has been considerably behind some of the Provincial Towns. The result has been a great want of interest in the Temperance question on the part of the public, and comparative apathy and inactivity on the part of the great bulk of the Metropolitan Teetotalers. In the confident hope of arousing Teetotalers to a sense of their duty, and of imparting valuable information as to the Temperance Movement to the public generally, it has been determined to hold at least SIX PUBLIC MEETINGS in EXETER-HALL, to be convened on the evenings of the first Monday in each of the following months:—October, November, December, in the present year; and January, February, and March, in 1850.

To render the meetings as interesting and effective as possible, it is intended that the addresses to be delivered shall be confined to some specific view of the Temperance question, in some such order as the following:—

First Evening.—The Temperance Reformation in its bearing upon the Moral, Social, and Political Elevation of the Working Classes.

Second Evening.—The Influence of the Temperance Reformation on the Extension of Religion, at Home and Abroad, and the moral obligation of professing Christians to promote it.

Third Evening.—The Claims of the Temperance Movement upon the Teachers and Friends of the Sabbath Schools.

Fourth Evening.—Juvenile Depravity:—The Extent of the Evil—its Immediate and Proximate Causes—and the Importance of the Temperance Reformation as a remedial measure.

Fifth Evening.—Intoxicating Liquors not necessary for working men, either to assist them in their occupations, however laborious, or to promote their health and happiness. To add peculiar interest to this Meeting, it is proposed that addresses shall be delivered by ten or more speakers, selected from various trades and occupations.

Sixth Evening.—Intoxicating Liquors not essential to the Health, and their entire abandonment promotive of the physical, intellectual, and social benefit of the Community. With remarks on the influence of the Drinking Customs of the Country; the importance of Sanitary improvements; and an appeal to Fathers and Mothers to promote habits of Temperance in their families.

To carry out the objects thus specified, it will be necessary to raise a fund of, at least, TWO HUNDRED POUNDS. In addition to the hire of Exeter-hall, there will be the expenses of printing and advertising. Some of the gentlemen whom it may be thought proper to engage in this advocacy will have to be brought from distant parts of the kingdom. An endeavour will also be made to secure good reports of the proceedings in the leading journals; and it is believed that influence sufficient for that purpose can be exerted. The Committee feel confident, that if the requisite sum is raised (as they have every reason to hope it will soon be), large and overflowing audiences will be obtained, and the Temperance Movement be made interesting—and even attractive—to thousands who attend none of the ordinary meetings. The good likely to result from the gatherings thus anticipated will be by no means confined to the Metropolis, though if the Metropolis were its utmost limit, that is an object of magnitude claiming and deserving the most liberal support.

Particulars of each meeting will be duly announced. In the meantime it may be sufficient to say that the most distinguished advocates of the Temperance Reformation will be invited to take part in the addresses.

The Committee have pleasure in stating that the following donations were subscribed on the very first intimation of the plan;—

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

THE NEXT MEETING will be held at Mrs. Watts' Temperance Hotel, Catharine-street, Strand, on WEDNESDAY EVENING, August 1st, at half-past seven o'clock precisely. The attendance of all office-bearers and members of Total Abstinence Societies is particularly requested. In a variety of ways, this monthly conference has already proved advantageous to the Temperance movement in the metropolis and suburbs.

SIMULTANEOUS MEETINGS.

At the Conference of the British Association for the promotion of Temperance, recently held in Lincoln, the following was one of the resolutions adopted:—"That this Conference recommends the various societies in Great Britain to hold a series of simultaneous meetings during the first week in the ensuing October, and to use any other means, during the same week, for bringing the question of total abstinence more prominently before the public."

ANOTHER VOICE FROM THE BENCH.

EXTRACT FROM MR. JUSTICE WIGHTMAN'S CHARGE AT YORK ASSIZES, JULY 10TH, 1849.

After commenting upon there being above 160 prisoners for trial, committed within three months—a number wholly unprecedented—he said:—"From a very slight examination of the depositions, there is quite sufficient evidence to show that in almost every offence in the calendar the prevailing cause of crime has been intemperance. Honest gains have been spent in dissipation—strife has led to bloodshed—and revels indulged in have ended in the commission of crime. So long as the people of this country are incapable of enjoying their holidays by rational amusements, more so than by intoxication—so long as they must in their recreations resort to the public-house or the beer-shop—so long, I fear, it will be in vain to hope for an amelioration or an abatement of crime. Let us hope, however, that the endeavours which are now making by the enlightened and the benevolent for the spread of useful education and moral and religious knowledge will be continued; and although complete success cannot be hoped for, yet the progress of crime may be checked, if it cannot be wholly prevented."

TEMPERANCE STATISTICS.

The testimony of the leading medical authorities of Great Britain to the injurious effects of the use of intoxicating liquors in what is commonly called moderation, has received the most important confirmation from the actual experience of the Temperance Provident Institution containing more than 3,000 members of all ages and in all ranks of life. The deaths in this office during more than eight years have been considerably less than half the number in other offices, and among other bodies of men. And what is extraordinary, although the office contains 600 members more than it did a year ago, the deaths during the last half-year have been actually only half as many as they were in the same period of last year; being only five out of 3,500 policies issued. The actual and expected deaths among a few of the different classes of members, have been as follows:—

Number Assured.	Name.	Expected Deaths.	Actual Deaths.
328.....	Shopkeepers.....	9	6
132.....	Shoemakers.....	3	2
53.....	Painters and Plumbers....	2	1
76.....	Bakers.....	2	1
61.....	Labourers and Farmers....	1	0
136.....	Clerks.....	5	1
148.....	Tailors.....	3	0

SERMONS ON TEETOTALISM.

The next monthly sermon will be delivered in Enon Chapel, Church-street, Paddington, on the afternoon of the Sabbath, August 12. The Rev. J. George, of Waltham, is expected to preach. Service to commence at half-past two o'clock.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

TEMPERANCE MEETING FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

A PUBLIC meeting was held on Friday, July 13, in the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street, London, to consider the importance of the temperance cause in connexion with the training of the young. The Rev. Dr. Beaumont took the chair shortly after half-past seven; and the proceedings were commenced by singing the hymn—

"God only wise, almighty, good,
Send forth thy truth and light," &c.

Mr. Green then read the 67th Psalm; after which

Dr. BEAUMONT rose, and after a few introductory remarks, observed:—"The cause for which we have met is the cause of temperance. Intemperance is unnatural—it is criminal, and therefore it is most injurious. It is unnatural: nobody likes strong drink till he has conquered nature. It is well said by Lord Kames that we never are fond of anything except that which we at first dislike. Nobody likes spirits at first. Nobody ever liked gin, or rum, or brandy, till he had habituated himself to it. Nature says, No; no, thank ye; rather not; beg you to excuse me; don't distress me; don't embarrass me; don't confuse me; don't provoke me; don't endanger me. But if you refuse to listen to the voice of nature—overpower her with somniferous fumes, and give way to drinking, she turns round and says, "You made me go one mile, and now you must go twain." Hence the necessity of abiding by the precepts of nature, and abstaining altogether from intoxicating liquors, from spirituous drinks. Intemperance is the disgrace of our country—it always has been. I am obliged to own it is not the modern but the ancient vice of Great Britain, and it has continued to be the prevailing one to this day. It has been, alas! the prevailing vice even of the Christian part of the inhabitants of this country. It is true that in the upper classes of society a great improvement has taken place, and it is our duty and our happiness to acknowledge it. A little more than half a century ago, the duties of hospitality were never considered to be discharged except the persons who were honoured by a visit were overthrown by strong drink, and until the meeting was crowned with noise and mirth and stupid inebriety. But I am very happy to say that as far as the upper classes are concerned in general, there is a great improvement upon that state of things. On the other hand, I am also under the necessity of saying that the opposite is true of what are called the working classes. It is not for us to interfere with the enjoyments of the labouring classes. Far be it from us to interpose between them and those enjoyments which are proper for them, provided they keep within the bounds of innocence and moderation and propriety; but who can think without distress of their having recourse to intoxicating drinks as their only pleasure? By the uses of those things they injure themselves and their families. They cause man to starve his children, to treat the wife of his bosom with savage harshness and cruel neglect. The walls of his house become naked and ghastly, for drunkenness is a most expensive habit. I never pass by what are called "gin palaces"—those drinking hells, the curse of our country—without feeling the contrast between the richness of the clothing of those who wait in them, and the rags and beggary of those who go and spend their money there. It was very well said by "Punch," a few weeks ago, that although all manner of ornaments and decorations were employed in the gin palaces, you never found a mirror in them. Those who deal in strong drinks are clothed in purple and fine linen, which they get from the backs of the poor who deal with them. If I might advise the poor, the labouring classes, who are the description of persons who visit such places, I should say—Keep the clothes on your own back. You see how well painted these places are, how finely embellished: keep the paint for your own houses. These palaces are lighted with gas: get your own abodes ventilated, and get the gas there if you can afford it. Why pay for gas burning in those places eighteen hours out of twenty-four, while you have none at all in your own houses. It is high time for people to remember that self-preservation is the first law of nature. The language of Scripture is applicable in this case—"Do thyself no harm." Now, intemperance with many is death. Like a sword, it cuts life asunder at once. It is true that the brain of every one is not so delicately balanced, so finely poised, that a single fit of intemperance upsets him; but in all cases it diminishes its power, and if it does not always destroy life at once, it saps and undermines its vigour and its energies—it gnaws at the root of existence, and existence withers away. This vice, too, is injurious in every pursuit of life. It robs us of time, it incapacitates for business. The man who is addicted to it blunders through business, stammers through it, boggles through it, and sticks fast in the mud; whereas you want a clear intellect, a well-balanced brain, a composed mind, to do business properly. This vice of intemperance is a waster of property. What would the drunkard give to have back his wasted time and property! Every one is in danger from it who addicts himself to it. If you carry gunpowder about you, you are always in danger if you go near sparks. If we expose ourselves to temptation, none can say whether he will be found proof against it or not. By this vice injurious effects are produced on communities and on families; and it is a melancholy thing to have to say that, if persisted in, it inevitably ruins the soul; and the soul lost, all is lost; just as the soul saved, all is saved. Then this intemperance is an absurd habit. All sin is absurd. The soul is more valuable than the body, and eternity is longer than time; and to do that which will ruin the soul throughout eternity is most absurd. It is absurd of man as a guilty being. He reduces himself by it below the brutes. Man is a guilty being; and instead of using the faculties of his nature to obtain the salvation of his soul, if he gives himself up to this vice, he wastes his precious time and trifles with salvation while tottering on the brink of hell. He is at once a criminal in revelry. You would not like to see a man going to be executed indulging in some frolic. Now the arguments in favour of the drinking customs are very unsatisfactory if we look at them. I do not know one of them that will bear looking at. It is said that man does not make himself—that he has a capacity for this or that particular gratification. True, man does not make, but he can unmake himself; and a short cut to a man's doing so is intemperance. Then, again, it is said that it is a social habit; and a very odd sort of sociality is the result. Man is a social being, no doubt; and let him exercise his social powers to their full; but a social drunkard is an uncommonly angry man. The sociality of such is confined generally to those who are their own associates—men who desert them in sickness and forget them after death. This is a sort of sociality which is always connected with heartlessness to those who are nearest to the drunkard. It is towards strangers that he shows himself social, while he presents a cold, hard surface towards those who have claims upon him, and are his kinsmen after the flesh. Then, again, it is said that it is fashionable. This is an unfortunate argument, even if it were true. The range of fashion is very limited property—it may shape our dress, but must never regulate our creed and form our lives. To have a fashionable creed may be to be an infidel, in some habits it is to be a drunkard. But after all it is not fashionable. The great bulk of the community is not intemperate. The bulk of the fashionable members of society—the main body and strength of the country—is not intemperate. Though intemperance is so general, it is not therefore fashionable; and even if it were, it is no excuse whatever for the vice. It is then said that intemperance is necessary to introduce a man to a knowledge of the world. Knowledge is a very good thing; but even that may be bought too dear. You may pay too much for knowledge; I mean for some kind of knowledge. Certainly if there is a species of knowledge which can only be acquired by intemperance, you had better be ignorant. Then, again, the excuse is often made that persons would give it up, but do not know how; and this is the most severe condemnation upon the vice. Habit, then, here is overpowering; it draws a man as with a cart rope, and when the coils are around him he knows not how to obtain relief. I suppose the design of our meeting is to encourage each other in our support of temperance. All know the value of union—that it is strong; and by encouraging each other in our habits of abstinence and resisting intemperance of every kind, we do a great public service, because not merely is the welfare of individuals and families involved in it, but the welfare of the nation. It is a great blot upon this nation that drinking customs prevail; it is an ulcer upon the side of the country, eating, more or less, continually into its vitals, and it interferes with good wholesome policy in our land. A great proportion of the public burdens which this country groans under are, in one shape or other, the consequence of intemperance. Pauperism is multiplied by it, and the lunatic asylums, which are kept out of the public purse, are mainly fed by it; besides which, the condition of the population at large is everywhere damaged by it. Instead of seeing robust, healthy, muscular, clever fellows among the working-classes, you see a multitude of half-grown, pitiful, feeble, good-for-nothing set of creatures. The physiology, the anatomy, the chemistry of the corporeal part of man would be very much improved by putting an end to intemperance. It is a stab at man's physical vigour, as well as his mental power and moral integrity. I assure you, my friends, that I am ill-prepared to address you after a long journey; it has been as much as I could possibly do to get here, and I have hardly been able to knock at my brain to ask what's there on the subject. I would merely say to you—Take care to be very tolerant of those who have not come the same length as you have. Be indulgent of their opinions, or what you may call their weaknesses. You were not always so enlightened as you now are. By kindness, by persuasion, by logic, by a sweet and beautiful temper, impress your doctrines; for the way to overcome a man is not to throw a great cart-ropo of what you think stout arguments over him; but, by getting a little soft, delicate, silken thread of persuasion and kindness round him, you will imperceptibly draw him, while the cart-ropo won't do at all. It is very important, my dear friends, that you should understand the question thoroughly, and that, having obtained some glimpses of light, you should not become intoxicated with it, because you know there are various kinds of intemperance besides that arising from strong drink. There's the intoxication of the cares of this life. I sometimes see men reeling in the streets drunken in this way; and some individuals, when they have discovered that men can live without strong drinks, are so excited, it is like the discovery of a sixth continent, or a great law in physics. The people of this country at one time never imagined that they could get on without drink; and some, when they found out that they can, that the heart still beats, the lungs still play, the brain still thinks, the hands still work, and the feet walk, and that indeed the eye sees clearer, and the heart beats stouter—they become half intoxicated with the discovery. You must bear your faculties meekly. It is a grand discovery for a man to make, that he can live without drink other than what nature provides. She secretes water from the clouds, and milk from the animal arrangements, and with these two fluids people can get on capitally. Then there's the little contributions from the growth of cocoa, tea, and such things, though some people find fault with them. However much you may be impressed with the soundness of your own principles, you must be tolerant of others, till they get up the hill as far as you have done. You have got up the hill; you see clearer, breathe more freely, and feel the oxygen gas on the summit; but some of your friends are yet in the fog below. Do not scold them because of that, it will only tend to keep them there; but encourage them to climb up, that they may breathe mountain air.

The Rev. W. MORTON, of the London Missionary Society, in a powerful and lengthened speech, moved—“That while this meeting rejoices in the great good effected by the instrumentality of Sabbath-schools, it laments that their success has been much limited, and, in many instances, fearfully counteracted, by the drinking habits of a large portion of the community.”

The resolution having been seconded by Mr. T. B. SMITHES, and supported by the Rev. J. DOVE, Wesleyan missionary from Gibraltar, was adopted.

Mr. GROSJEAN, of Regent street, moved, and Dr. OXLEY seconded, the following resolution, which was also carried unanimously:—“That in order to render the operations of Sabbath-schools fully efficient, it is, in the opinion of this meeting, important that the teachers should recommend the practice of entire abstinence from strong drinks, both by precept and example, not only in the schools, but, as far as practicable, amongst the parents of the children committed to their care.”

Mr. J. W. GREEN proposed, and Dr. OXLEY seconded, an address to the Wesleyan Conference, respectfully urging upon their consideration the impediments which intemperance presented to the full development of those great principles taught in the Sunday-schools under their control, and requesting an expression of sympathy with the objects of that meeting.

The Rev. ISAAC DOXSEY proposed, and Mr. BOWMAN seconded, a vote of thanks to the chair, with which the proceedings closed. Want of space prevents our giving even an outline of the various addresses delivered. It was announced that other meetings of Sunday-school teachers would shortly be held.

ZION CHAPEL, WHITECHAPEL.

On Sunday, July the 1st, a sermon was preached in this spacious place of worship, by the Rev. Benjamin Parsons, of Ebley, Gloucestershire. This was the first of a series of sermons on temperance, which the Committee of the National Temperance Society hope to have delivered, at least once in each month, in various places of worship in the metropolis and suburbs. The preacher selected for his text, the woes denounced upon drunkards in Isaiah v. 11-16. After some pointed remarks on the inconsistent conduct of those ministers of religion who neglected to address their audiences from passages of this class, and ascribing that neglect, in most cases, to the use of strong drinks, though very moderate perhaps, on the part of such ministers, Mr. Parsons proceeded, first, to offer some remarks upon the "wines" and "strong drinks" of Scripture; secondly, to describe the persons upon whom the "woes" were pronounced; thirdly, to consider the nature of the woes so pronounced; and fourthly, to show that in thus dealing with drunkards God was glorified, his righteousness and justice vindicated and exalted. From the whole subject the preacher maintained that it was the duty of all persons to abstain entirely from the use of intoxicating liquors, and that to hope to escape from the temptations to intemperance by using only moderate portions of such drinks, was a deep and dangerous delusion. They should abstain from a regard to their own personal safety and benefit, and for the sake of their example, which could not fail to exert an influence on those around them. Those who practised abstinence, he exhorted to continue firm, and to pray for God's grace to enable them to do so. And, finally, he reminded all, that abstinence from strong drinks would not save the soul; they must obtain the pardon of their sins, and the renewing influences of the Holy Spirit, or they would perish, however sober they might be. Temperance was but a negative virtue. Christianity was but a living, active, influential principle. The discourse, which was of considerable length, was delivered with great energy, and was listened to with deep attention by a very large audience.

SOMEI'S TOWN.

The first anniversary of the opening of the Temperance Hall, Weir's-place, Wilstead-street, was celebrated on Monday evening, the 18th of June. After a number of friends had taken tea, a public meeting was held.

Dr. OXLEY, who presided, expressed his regret that the principles of teetotalism were so little appreciated, considering their vast importance. It was especially important to the working classes. The Sabbath preceding he had seen hundreds of them unwashed, ragged, and altogether in a most degraded state. When he reflected that these men were possessed of immortal souls, and that by the use of strong drink they were ruining both bodies and souls, and bringing misery into their families; and when, also, from the use of strong drink, lunatic asylums were increasing and enlarging; he could not but express his astonishment at the apathy and indifference which prevailed as to the Temperance movement. He had recently visited Middlesex Hospital, where he found a female receiving relief from that charity, the daughter of persons of high respectability, but who had brought herself to pauperism by habits connected with intemperance. There, too, he found a number of children, sick, weakly, and debilitated, the offspring of parents addicted to intemperate habits. Parents little thought of the misery they were entailing upon their offspring by their dissolute habits. He felt convinced that if teetotalers exerted themselves as they ought, things would be in a far different condition. As to working men, he had scarcely patience while he heard them exclaiming against taxation, and clamouring for universal suffrage, and yet at the same time plunging into the mire of sensuality, and bringing distress and ruin upon themselves thereby. He knew that thousands would have for ever to bless the day when they became teetotalers, and also that thousands would have for ever to curse the day when they adopted drinking habits. Teetotalism was based on science and on the Word of God, and it was, in every way, designed to benefit and bless mankind.

Mr. TACKLEY, the secretary, read a brief report in which it was stated that the hall had cost about £700, and that in the year about £223 had been paid off, in addition to carrying out the objects of the society. About 600 persons had signed the total abstinence pledge during the year, and they had now about 250 paying members. The society was composed entirely of working men.

Mr. J. W. GREEN moved the adoption of the report, in doing which he took a rapid glance at the good resulting from the total abstinence practice in reference to the nation, to families, and to individuals; and founded upon it an exhortation to the abandonment of all participation in the cause of the evils of intemperance, and a steady and zealous adherence to the practice of teetotalism.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES was pleased to find a medical gentleman in the chair. Such gentlemen, he believed, would have little to do if teetotalism prevailed, and, therefore, those who advocated it should, at least, have the credit of honesty. He referred to the influence of strong drink in occasioning declension and backslidings from religion, and stated that when Mr. Caughey was in York, a great revival of religion took place among the Wesleyan Methodists. About 800 persons were added to the church; of this number 285 were restored backsliders. On a minute inquiry as to the cause of their backsliding, three persons out of every four answered, "Drink, sir—drink." At a love-feast, held shortly after, fifteen reclaimed drunkards spoke, fourteen of whom had become members of the Wesleyan Society, and the other declared that he was likely to become one. Mr. Smithies referred to the circumstance of that being the day on which the great Battle of Waterloo was celebrated: the victories gained on that day sent thousands into mourning, but the victories achieved by teetotalism were the cause of joy and gratitude to thousands. He hoped every teetotaler would exert himself to lessen the evils of intemperance, and to spread the blessings of total abstinence.

Mr. W. SPRIGGS observed, that however anxious teetotalers might be to have ministers and medical men on their side, they must not relax their individual exertions, as they might have to wait a very long time before those gentlemen thought proper to join them. He considered the conduct of the majority of professing Christians, including ministers, to be most disgraceful: they could not but know the misery which strong drink wrought on the community, and on Christian Churches too, and why did they not assist to stay the plague? They seemed to be afraid to practice any amount of self-denial; and hence there were a number of frothy, noisy philanthropists, recommending domestic missions, ragged-schools, and other expedients, at the same time sipping their wine with all possible complacency, and neglecting teetotalism, which would render ragged-schools, and similar institutions, altogether unnecessary.

Mr. M'CURRIE said it was a serious fact that many teachers and professors of religion had fallen through the use of strong drink, and that hundreds had been brought into the Church through the instrumentality of total abstinence. He was himself a living witness. He lost his standing in the Church by intemperance: vows, and resolutions, and prayers, were used in vain; but he adopted teetotalism, and now he blessed God that he was comfortable in his circumstances, and again a member of the Wesleyan Society. Strong objections had been made to his advocacy of temperance on the Sabbath; but while thousands were on that day employed in making drunkards, he could not conceive it to be wrong to try to induce them to become sober.

Mr. MANN, a Wesleyan local preacher, interested the audience greatly by his very animated address. He described his labour as a working farrier, and declared himself far better able to perform his fatiguing labours than when he used strong drink. He had to rise at half-past five in the morning, to walk about a mile and a half to his work, to labour between two great fires; in the evening, to go home, clean himself, and go to some teetotal meeting to speak; and when he got back home, late as it might be, he was not content to retire to rest till he had read or written, or done something for the improvement of his mind. That evening he expected to find upon his table when he got home, that very excellent paper, THE WESLEYAN TIMES, and he should not feel satisfied till he had read the principal portion of its contents, though it might probably keep him up till two o'clock in the morning. He concluded by exhorting teetotalers to cultivate their minds, and in every possible way to recommend teetotalism.

Mr. HURST delivered a very eloquent address, which he commenced by remarking on what he conceived to be a phase almost peculiar to the present age, namely, the presensation of eloquent and persuasive addresses by men occupying very humble stations in society, who had raised and improved themselves in consequence of their becoming abstainers from artificial, exciting, and poisonous beverages. He described, in striking terms, the evils wrought by intemperance, and the blessings secured by total abstinence; and encouraged temperance advocates to persevere. Spite of all apathy, and opposition from the press, and the pulpit, and medical practitioners, temperance went on, and would assuredly prosper, till the whole world owned its sway.

Several persons signed the total abstinence pledge at the conclusion of the meeting.

TEETOTALISM AFLOAT.

A public meeting was held last month on board of the collier brig, Lord Althorpe, of South Shields, Captain Martin, then lying in the Regent's-dock, Commercial-road. The meeting was announced by a notice hung up in the rigging during the day; the "Bethel Flag" was hoisted at the mast head, and the awning was spread to shade the audience. As the day was very fine, the decks were crowded. The chair was taken at half-past seven o'clock by Dr. Oxley, supported by Messrs. Nichol, Jones, Morris, and Burt, who addressed the working classes (more particularly the seafaring men) on the evils of intemperance and the benefits arising from total abstinence. The audience seemed to be highly gratified. It is hoped that this will be an inducement to captains, and friends of the cause, to get up "Teetotal meetings Afloat." Great credit is due to Captain Martin, and Messrs. Nichol and Morris, for the manner in which they got up this meeting.

CLITHEROE, LANCASHIRE.

The above-named place is a borough with 6,000 inhabitants, many of whom are employed in the cotton manufactory and block printing and lime burning, as the whole district is limestone. This will be an important article of transit when the railway, now constructing between Blackburn and Skipton, is completed. The situation of the town on the crown and declivity of a hill in a wide valley between Pendle and other lofty hills, and not a mile from the Ribble, the boundary of York and Lancashire, is picturesque and healthy. The castle, on the summit of a lofty rock in the centre, to which adjoins a modern castellated mansion, the occupier of which keeps the grounds in the most perfect order, adds greatly to the interest of the place. An improved trade, perfect sobriety, and universal piety, would make this well-built town a modern Eden.

Thirty-seven places for the sale of intoxicating drink produce their legitimate effects in pauperism, immorality, crime, disease, death, and misery. The magistracy, the ministers, and others, are sensible of and deplore this, and some of them prove their sincerity by contributions to the temperance society which has long been in operation, and in various ways benefited this town. Would they adopt its principles and become its advocates, the results would soon be apparent in the improved habits of many who now reel through our streets without a blush upon their cheek.

Of late the temperance friends have been more than usually active, which is mainly attributable to the visits of the two distinguished advocates, Whittaker and Teare. The latter—the hero of Preston, and the historian of early Teetotalism—has just concluded a second visit, within a short time, of a week each. Monday and Tuesday, July 9th and 10th, large and attentive assemblies listened to his powerful appeals at the Market-cross; Wednesday, in the open air, at Sawley; and Thursday at Low-moor, where favourable impressions were made on many hearts; Friday at the Cross again, when the president of the society, the Rev. R. Tabraham, opened and closed the meeting with prayer, and also delivered an address on the evil drinking dose to religion. The humour and good temper of Mr. Teare told well on the assembly; while the folly of a degraded drunkard roused the indignation of many, and called forth the kind attention of the superintendent of police to restrain the drunkard and promote quietness.

Saturday was the gala day. At five o'clock there was a splendid tea in Moor-lane school-room, with sweet music, and yet sweeter voices. At seven a procession was formed. The brass band took the lead, followed by a suitable banner, the president and vice-president, the Rev. Messrs. Tabraham and Beswick, the females, the juvenile Rechabites, with numerous mottoes, an empty and open barrel, &c.; then the males were headed by Mr. Swindlehurst, of Preston, the "Teetotal King," supported by "Field-Marshal" Teare. The procession was of prodigious length, a most imposing sight, attracting immense attention and commendatation, and though it passed through most of the principal streets of the town, and was interrupted by coaches and other vehicles, preserved an order which would have been honourable to a body of well-disciplined troops. The immense mass formed into a circle at the cross, in the midst of the "market," and sang with great spirit and effect the "National Temperance Anthem," composed by Mr. T. Clitheroe, to be sung at this festival, on the arrival of his Majesty King Thomas; tune—"God save the Queen." Having, by permission, walked up to the castle, they proceeded to the room, which was soon filled in all parts. The "king" was enthusiastically called to preside, and sustained his character throughout. Short speeches from Messrs. Squires, of Glasgow, Tabraham, Beswick, Teare, and others, were interspersed with the "National Temperance Anthem," "The good time coming," "The Orphan," by a youth, "Temperance a shelter," by a reformed one, and the band. At nearly eleven o'clock the orderly mass dispersed to prepare for the duties of the holy Sabbath, when a meeting was held at the "Cross," at nine, and a much larger one on "Salt Hill," at half-past one. Many signatures were given during the week, and the good order of the whole cannot fail to contrast strongly with the disorder of the drinking crowd, about forty of whom were seen not long since on a Sunday night past eleven o'clock, in this town, ten or a dozen in a staggering group, near the "Cross," and the rest quarrelling in a public-house; for which the drunken landlord was fined £3 and expenses, and told by the magistrate that he was "unworthy of a licence," for he was "drunk in the court."

Such contrasts are well calculated to show the vast importance of the temperance movement, the guilt of those who refuse their aid, and the prudence of ministers and Christians, taking a lead in such praiseworthy exhibitions.

R. TABRAHAM.

WAKEFIELD.

One of the most important public demonstrations in favour of teetotal principles, that has ever taken place, was afforded by the unanimous voice of a crowded and enthusiastic meeting which was held in the Music Saloon, on Friday week, June the 22nd. The meeting was convened by the Mayor, in accordance with a numerously signed requisition. Soon after the appointed hour, the Music Saloon was filled to overflowing, numbers being unable to obtain admittance. The Mayor, who presided, made some very excellent remarks as to the importance of the business before the meeting, and expressed a hope that all parties would be fairly and patiently heard, after which the following resolutions were passed with much applause, and without a single dissentient voice. The first resolution, moved by Mr. Joseph Horner, jun., seconded by Mr. W. T. Lamb, and supported by Mr. Teare, of Preston, was as follows:—"That in the opinion of this meeting, the whole manufacture and sale of intoxicating drink is anti-christian and immoral, inasmuch as it destroys the food of the people by converting it into intoxicating poison; and that as the use of these liquors is injurious to the health of both body and mind, this meeting is also of opinion it is morally wrong, and a sin against God and our neighbour to manufacture, sell, or drink them; and that this meeting is also of opinion that the pauperism, crime, ignorance, and immorality of our town will never be removed, until all classes of the people abandon the manufacture, sale, and use of these liquors. The second resolution was moved by the Rev. Mr. Colcroft, and seconded by Mr. Joseph Hampshire:—"That this meeting is thoroughly of opinion that moderate drinking is the principal source of the wide-spread scourge of drunkenness, and that effect does not more certainly follow its cause than drunkenness a population of drinkers; and that in order to remove the effect we must remove the cause: and that this meeting is further of opinion it is the duty and privilege of all magistrates, Christian ministers, and people, to abandon the use of intoxicating liquors, and give their unqualified support to this principle." In conclusion the thanks of the meeting were unanimously voted to his Worshipful the Mayor, for calling the meeting and presiding over it. The Mayor having replied, the meeting broke up about eleven o'clock.—Wesleyan Times.

YORK.

On Wednesday evening, July 10th, the anniversary meeting of the York Total Abstinence Society took place at their hall in Goodramgate. The room having been cleaned, painted, &c., for the occasion, with its natural and artificial decorations, presented a gay appearance. About five o'clock between four and five hundred ladies and gentlemen sat down to tea; the tables were then cleared, and J. W. Harrison, Esq., mayor of Wakefield, was called to the chair, and delivered an excellent address on the custom of drinking, confining his remarks chiefly to the moderate drinker, as he considered this as the great source from whence all the evils of intemperance arose. The meeting was afterwards addressed by B. Wilson, Esq., of Mirfield, on the necessity of total abstinence being seconded by religion; and by Mr. Duesbury, jun., who delivered a very eloquent address on crime created directly through the effects of strong drink. The Rev. W. J. Shrewsbury, of Duesbury, impressed upon the minds of his hearers that the object of their society was to teetotalise the world. His greatest joy would be to know that there was not a single place in any part of the world, or a single individual engaged in the sale and manufacture of intoxicating drink. He contended that no individual party or nation would be at all injured by the total disuse of these liquors. If he thought any nation would be ruined by their destruction, he would be the last to advocate the temperance movement. But he felt assured that when intoxicating drinks should be heard of no more, the people—the world—would be happier, and better in every sense. Mr. Ald. Beaumont, M.D., of Bradford, then followed in an eloquently argumentative address. He chiefly confined himself to the consideration of the use of alcoholic drinks in a medical point of view. It was his opinion, from lengthened practice and his own experience as a Teetotaler, that those beverages were non-essential to the health of man, but that, on the contrary, they were injurious, to an incalculable extent, in a moral, mental, and physical point of view. He gave it as his opinion that the faculty ought to be instructed in the colleges on the evils of alcoholic drinks, because they would not, in general, accept instruction from any other source. He thought that if some individual would endow a chair in the universities either of London or Edinburgh, where for £500 120 lectures annually could be delivered, the result of such lectures would be to shake the practice of one-half the doctors in the kingdom. It was his opinion that seven-tenths of the present disease was caused by the use of intoxicating drinks. He also stated that the reason of the great mortality among infants was occasioned by the mothers indulging in the use of porter and ale whilst giving suck. He appealed in powerful language to the press, to the moralist, religionist, and philanthropist, to aid the work by their influence, and called upon all present to abstain. The worthy alderman's remarks called forth repeated and prolonged applause. Thanks were afterwards given to the chairman, to Ald. Beaumont, and the Rev. Mr. Shrewsbury, for their attendance and addresses, and also to the ladies for their services at the tea-tables.

THORNTON ABBEY, LINCOLNSHIRE.

Perhaps one of the most pleasing features of the temperance cause is the annual assemblages which, in various parts of the country occur once a year, for the purpose of not only making a demonstration of principle, but for enjoying a day's relaxation from the usual toils of life. Last month such a demonstration took place, under the patronage of the Earl of Yarborough, who, from the conviction that the principle of the visitors was a guarantee for the preservation of order, granted the grounds of Thornton Abbey, a favourite resort, for the occasion. Upwards of sixteen thousand persons were present from Hull, Leeds, Lincoln, Grimsby, and all the surrounding parts for many miles. No intoxicating drinks were permitted on the grounds. The weather was warm and delightful; the natural spirits of the people expanded in cheerfulness, and all went off happily; being one more testimony added to the thousand already given of the excellence of the principles of temperance, whether considered as bearing individually or collectively on mankind.

PADIHAM.

Mrs. THEOBALD, of Derby, has recently visited this place and lectured on "Woman's Duties in relation to Teetotalism." Her lecture was eloquent, and was listened to with deep attention by a numerous audience. She has also visited, with much success, Burnley, Marsden, Barrowford, Gisburn, Haslenden, Rawtenstall, &c.

SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

The anniversary of this association was celebrated at Glasgow during the early part of the last week. Sermons were preached on Sunday, to numerous audiences, by the Rev. W. H. Gray, A.M., of Perth, the Rev. James Towers, of Birkenhead, and the Rev. James Taylor, Glasgow. A public meeting was held on Monday evening, in the Trades Hall, Robert Kettle, Esq., President of the League, took the chair, and the meeting was addressed by the Rev. William Reid, the Rev. W. H. Gray, the Rev. James Towers, and by Messrs. Logan and Stirling, agents of the League. A public breakfast was given in the Eagle Hotel on Tuesday morning, which was attended by eighty-four leading friends of temperance from different parts of the kingdom. The Rev. J. C. Wilson, of Dunkeld, presided, and after breakfast an animated conversation took place respecting the present state and future prospects of the temperance cause. All the information communicated was of the most cheering kind.

At eleven o'clock on Tuesday morning the members of the League assembled for business. Robert Kettle, Esq., occupied the chair. Mr. Robert Rae, Secretary, read the report of the Executive Committee for the past year. It commenced by advertising to the advocacy department of the League's operations, and stated that 500 lectures, sermons, and addresses had been delivered during the year, under the immediate auspices of the association. The greater part of Mr. Stirling's time had been spent in the northern and western Highlands, where he had awakened to life and activity many slumbering adherents to temperance, some of whom had re-established societies. Since the beginning of February, Mr. Grubb had been constantly and assiduously engaged in publicly illustrating and defending the ethical and scientific arguments in favour of temperance. Mr. Logan, Commissioner of the League, had lectured frequently in different parts of the country, but the greater portion of his time and attention had been devoted to a statistical investigation connected with Glasgow. His inquiries had extended to nearly all the public institutions in the city, and the facts collected conclusively demonstrated that the drinking system not only contributed largely to the production and aggravation of vice and misery in their varied forms, but was also the greatest barrier to every improvement. Effective public meetings had been held in Edinburgh and Glasgow, to point out the connection between the use of intoxicating liquors and the prevalence of cholera, and to consider the position occupied by the temperance movement towards the missionary enterprise. The applications from country societies for speakers to address public meetings and soirees had been much more numerous than during any year since the formation of the association, and every application had been promptly met. Forty societies had formally connected themselves with the League, and each had contributed twenty shillings or more towards its support. The publication department of the League's operations was next referred to, which was shown to be very extensive, not less than 5,368,950 pages of closely-printed matter having been issued from the office during the year. After mentioning that a slight improvement had taken place in the financial affairs of the League, the report alluded to several particulars, which showed that the present aspect of the temperance movement in this country was exceedingly hopeful.

Dr. RICHMOND, of Paisley, moved the adoption of the report, which was seconded by Mr. ROBERT LOCKHART, of Kirkcaldy, and unanimously agreed to.

An abstract of the treasurer's account was then submitted, which showed that the income had been £1,199 6s. 5½d., and the expenditure, £1,214 7s. 7d.

Some important business was afterwards transacted; and the entire proceedings were conducted with great enthusiasm and unanimity. This was the most successful meeting ever held since the formation of the association.

AMERICA.

The Rev. THEOBALD MATHEW has arrived safely at New York. It appears that he met a most enthusiastic reception, all classes joining in testifying their admiration of the man, and of the cause of which he has been so successful an advocate. The authorities of New York provided proper accommodation for him at the expense of the city, and invitations were pouring in upon him from all parts of America. It is not improbable that his success in America may equal, if not exceed, those he has already experienced, there being a vast Irish population in the leading cities and towns of the Union. A correspondent, writing to the Daily News, says—"I have seen a private letter from Father Mathew, in which the worthy man says—'I take this opportunity of communicating my safe arrival, thank God, after a pleasant, though tedious, passage. I will leave it to the newspapers to give an account of my reception by the noble people of America. With the exception of a few days' suffering from sea sickness, which most of the other passengers equally endured, I have enjoyed good health since I left Liverpool, and on the whole consider myself much improved by the voyage.'"

CONFESSIONS OF A CONVERT FROM TEETOTALISM TO TEMPERANCE. By THOMAS SMEETON, formerly a Teetotal Advocate. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

OWING, as we suppose, to some peculiarity of temperament, Thomas Smeeton has been "a convert" a great many times in the course of his short life. It remains to be seen which of his numerous conversions will prove the most honourable, and which the most lucrative. He received, what is usually called, a religious education. Then, in consequence of the habits of moderate drinking relations and associates, he became "a convert" to drunkenness; then "a convert" to infidelity, and a popular advocate of infidel principles; then a concoctor of very exceptionable pieces for very exceptionable minor theatres; then an occasional performer at such theatres and at flash public-houses; and, finally, as the result of all this, a wretched outcast. Then he became "a convert" to teetotalism, and, as he says, to Christianity. He obtained various situations, as a journeyman baker, a bookseller's porter, a messenger to a teetotal society, an agent of the new British and Foreign Temperance Society, a travelling advocate of teetotalism, an occasional contributor to teetotal publications, a writer of teetotal essays, for some of which he obtained premiums, a Baptist preacher, and now, as appears from the pamphlet before us, a priest and a prophet of Bacchus, at whose shrine he reverently worships, whose praises he celebrates, and whose maxims he zealously enforces! opening wide the gate, and strewing with flowers the broad path that leads to drunkenness and ruin!

Thomas Smeeton says that he was for twelve years "a consistent teacher of teetotalism." He has forgotten to add, that to that circumstance he is indebted for a comfortable subsistence, and for a respectable standing in society. As to his consistency during those twelve years, we certainly have no proof in these his "Confessions." Thomas Smeeton himself "confesses" that he always had suspicions as to the scriptural soundness of the teetotal principle; that apprehensions as to its unsoundness were always rising in his mind—that he confided in the opinions of others without examining for himself—that he closed his eyes and ears against all that could be brought forward on the other side of the question—that, for at least seven of the twelve years, he laboured under the love of approbation and the whirl and tempest of excitement—that he was vehement and impetuous in the cause he was employed to defend, &c. &c.; and when to these, his own "Confessions," we add, what he has not had the honesty to "confess," that he has written and published several tracts, lectures, and essays, some of them very recently, which contain "vehement" defences of the teetotal principle on the very points about the soundness of which he now "confesses" he "always" had suspicions; when all these things, we say, are taken into the account, we leave our readers to form their estimate of THOMAS SMEETON'S CONSISTENCY!

But Thomas Smeeton after moving in a whirlwind for twelve years, has suddenly become "serious and calm;" and finding his popularity as a teetotal advocate somewhat on the wane, so that he was no longer "employed" to write or speak on behalf of teetotalism, he "seriously and calmly" declares that he is a "convert" to "the use of wine and strong drink!" And he declares that in this he is literally following "the example of his Lord and Master," who made and drank wine, "the fermented juice of the grape!" And in the vain boasting spirit of David, Peter, and other foul backsliders, he says—"I will never change again as to this matter!" So rapid is the progress he has made with his new light, that he now sees clearly that the system of teetotalism "flings odium on the conduct of the Christ of God"—that it is, therefore, "from beneath"—that "Satan is never more dangerous than he is when disguised as an angel of light"—and he winds up by expressing his fear that what teetotalers say about strong drinks "will have a most unhappy effect on the rising mind of our nation!"

Further extracts are unnecessary. Near the beginning of this pamphlet, which, though published at sixpence, contains less than most of our halfpenny periodicals, Thomas Smeeton "confesses" that he was "employed to defend the cause." This may be regarded as the secret of his numerous "conversions;" each of them was worth what it would fetch! Teetotalism, he soon found, would pay him better than drunkenness—therefore he became a teetotaler: preaching to Baptist congregations, however small, made him more respectable than advocating infidelity in pot-houses—therefore he became a preacher: more recently he has had fewer invitations to deliver "vehement" defences of teetotalism, and several of his teetotal essays and collections of medical testimonies have been rejected by competent adjudicators—therefore he has determined to try his success as a destroyer of the principles he, till very recently, "vehemently" defended! He now declares himself "a convert" to "the use of wine and strong drink!"

Thomas Smeeton had always a strong penchant for mottoes. He has affixed four, sacred and profane, to these his "Confessions." We could have furnished him with one far more appropriate than any he has selected. It is to be found in 2 Peter, ii. 12-22, the last verse only of which we transcribe at present:—

"It has happened unto — according to the true proverb: THE DOG IS TURNED TO HIS OWN VOMIT AGAIN; AND THE SOW THAT WAS WASHED TO HER WALLOWING IN THE MIRE!"

FRANCE AND SCOTLAND—A COMPARISON.

WE extract the following from an excellent article in the June part of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, entitled "The Mystery of France," written by Mr. William Chambers:—

"Accustomed to the spectacle of refined usages and objects of taste, they (the French) possess a remarkable love of what is neat and tasteful. At no time do you observe sluttish dirtiness, rags, and brawling misery, such as the eye and ear encounter in the meaner quarters of our large Scottish towns; nowhere are seen disorderly females, unwashed and unkempt, such as may be noticed at all hours of the day in Glasgow. Annually, in sober and constitutional Edinburgh, some hundreds of beings are carried to the police-office drunk on a barrow; such sights attracting no special observation, as if a keen sense of decency were wanting amongst us. Can any one say the same thing of a French city? On the 4th of May, I walked the streets of Paris from morning till night. Along the chief thoroughfares, towards the scene of festivity, crowds of people from the eastern faubourgs streamed in a ceaseless flood; and finally, at a late hour, all returned peacefully homewards; it was a grand sight, that stream of well-dressed people; it was civilization of a high order. For all that day there was not heard a high or coarse word, nor was there seen any jostling or act of rudeness. 'The French,' said I, 'know how to behave; they can be happy without being disorderly.' I write this in Edinburgh on the Queen's birthday; it is a day of general rejoicing, that is to say, the bells are ringing, and there is a good deal of hard drinking. Some lads for the last two hours have been amusing themselves next street kicking about an old tin kettle; and at this moment, vomited from a public house, two tipsy men are fighting under my window. Is this civilization, or what?"

What is here said of Scotland may be said of England too. Whisky may make people drunk in Scotland; gin and beer make people drunk in England. If the "stretcher" is in frequent requisition in Scotland, it is needed in England too. If "tipsy men" fight in Scotland, they fight in England too. Englishmen! "IS THIS CIVILIZATION, OR WHAT?"

THE BANEFUL EFFECTS OF STRONG DRINKS ON THE NERVES, ESPECIALLY ON THE FIVE SENSES AND VOLUNTARY MOTION.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

SMELLING.

In the July and August numbers of the Teetotal Times, we made a few observations on the injuries done to the sight and hearing by stimulating liquors. We now,

III. Refer to the sense of SMELLING. In this wonderful contrivance we have opened to us an unspeakable source of knowledge, of pleasure, and self-preservation. What a fund of information has been obtained by means of our olfactory organs! Objects perfectly invisible and inaudible, and that can neither be felt by the touch nor tasted by the palate, are apprehended by this sense. Odours are the most intangible of all bodies. It is said that a grain of musk will exhale for years in sufficient profusion to fill a large room with its scent, and yet will suffer no perceptible diminution in its bulk or weight. Here we have one of the most striking examples of the infinite divisibility of matter, and the near approach it can make to non-existence. The particles here alluded to are among the most attenuated and volatile of material substances. What a significant and expressive emblem they must therefore be of the lightness and agility of those spiritual bodies which we may have at the resurrection!

But if the objects themselves are so minute, what must be the exquisite character of the nerves which perceive them! If the ear detects vibrations of air—etherial wavelets too minute for arithmetic to fractionize, or geometry to measure—the ear is not one iota behind in its infinitesimal espionage, for it takes cognizance of bodies floating in the atmosphere of a bulk too small to be weighed or calculated. If there are insects so diminutive that a thousand might dance on the point of the finest needle without discommoding one another, how much more inconceivably minute must be the particles which exhale from a sprig of sweetbriar or a withered piece of lavender! And thus the littleness of one part of creation is not less a subject of wonder than the vastness of the other. It is said that the sun is five hundred times larger than the earth and all the planets of the solar system put together; and that the star Vega, or Alpha Lyrae, is fifty-five thousand times larger than our sun! But if such bodies outstrip all our ideas of magnitude, we are equally at a loss to find a mental monad sufficiently small to represent the particles of incense which the rose pours forth to the praise of the Creator, and to the pleasure of man.

What a miraculous power then is olfactory sensation! It is inexplicably exquisite in man, but we have reason to believe that it is more so in many animals. Volumes might be written on the scent of dogs. The camel is said to perceive water when at the distance of many leagues. The eagle from its towering eminence inhales the rising effluvia which proceeds from the putrescent carcase, and throwing itself into the current is conducted by an unerring guide to its repast. The youthful bee, which has but just burst from its cell, is wafted by ambrosial streams to palaces of beauty and fountains of nectar. Thus matter in its littleness, and nerves in their minute sensibility, are subjects of overwhelming astonishment; and yet how imperfect an idea should we have had of these wonders but for the organ in question! Here we have a prying philosopher, which enters the most secret recesses of nature, and scrutinizeth the very least of the works of God. What a divine gift is this, and therefore what a crime to pollute or paralyse a power created by infinite love to impart the most exquisite knowledge, to exhilarate with some of the most refined pleasures, and to protect us with the most watchful caution!

It would require myriads of volumes to record the knowledge that has been obtained by the olfactory nerves. Pleasures also of the most delightful character have been derived from this source. Thousands of grateful hearts have sent the incense of their inmost souls to heaven as they have inhaled those odours, which divine love has compounded for our gratification, and which the lily of the valley, the violet, the rose, &c. &c., pour forth so abundantly. Heber speaks of

“The spicy breezes.”

Columbus, in his voyage to the Western world, was cheered by the aromatic odours which invited and encouraged him to pursue his course. Young talks of “Arabia sacrificed,

And all her spicy mountains in a flame.”

In a word, not merely the knowledge, but the pleasures which mankind, in all ages and climes, have participated through this sense, are unspeakable. The fainting have been revived, appetite for food has been restored, the dying have been refreshed, and the healthy regaled, through the medium of this wonderful contrivance of Divine benignity.

And, further, it has not only been a source of pleasure, but also a safe-guard. The presence of unhealthy or poisonous miasmata are chiefly detected by the smell. But for this power it is probable that every dwelling would have been a pest-house. Fevers, plagues, cholera, &c. &c., would long ere this have swept the last man from the earth, had not this watchful faculty uttered its warning voice, and stayed their progress. Compared with what we are to be in the millennium, we are, in the present age, a miserable, filthy, polluted, world; still our condition had been ten thousand times worse if we had been created without olfactory nerves. These may be said to have drained our cities, purified our dwellings, and cleansed our garments; and thus one simple gift of the Almighty has yielded incalculable knowledge, infinite pleasure, and, in multitudes of examples, been a more than adamantine defence.

Surely we need not again repeat the sentiment, that to injure such an invaluable part of our constitution is an offence of no common magnitude: and yet how many are thus occupied daily! What an abomination is snuff-taking! the filthiness of the practice is the least of the evil. If the Almighty had intended that our nostrils should be closed, he would have created us without those orifices, rather than have allowed us to fill them with such a vile and destructive preparation. The snuff-taker is a striking example of the baneful influence of stimulants. When he took the first pinch, how profoundly he sneezed! but now it is next to impossible for the manufacturer to invent or compound a substance sufficiently pungent to produce the smallest sensation. The nerves of the nose are nearly, if not quite, paralysed, and thus a most cruel suicide has been committed on an important member of the body. And then, as the nerves, though many, are one, and all have their rendezvous in the brain, that sanctum sanctorum of sympathy, the other senses are doomed to suffer along with this deeply-injured faculty. You may tell the eyes of a snuff-taker; and he is generally thick of hearing. In fact, all his senses are obtuse. His labour is to close the windows of his mind, and shut up his soul in darkness. Numbers have died of apoplexy, brought on by this iniquitous procedure; and not a few have poisoned their digestive organs and intestines by this deleterious drug. What a harvest of lives death has reaped from the snuff-box! Money, health, life, usefulness, are all sacrificed to gratify an unnatural and filthy appetite.

But the sense of smell may be injured without having recourse to the worse than beastly custom just alluded to. If intoxicating liquors especially affect the nerves, then may they as easily injure the sense of smelling, as of hearing, or sight. Sottish people have generally a very imperfect apprehension of smells, and not a few of our moderate drinkers are in the same predicament. Hence they live in pestilential and deadly air, without being aware of their danger. You will never have a healthy world; you will never shield the nation against the ravages of cholera, fever, influenza, &c. &c., until they have a new set of noses. Our readers may smile, but every physiologist knows that our assertion is correct. What decent person, with a tolerably good scent, can enter the houses of many of the poor—aye, and sometimes, of those of a higher grade—without perceiving that the air is pestilential? And yet, perhaps, the inmates have no idea of the evil. They even inhale these fatal gases with pleasurable gusto. Not Eau de Cologne, nor the Otto of Roses, would yield so much delight. Leibig has given us some fearful views of putrescent substances when they enter the body. But what shield can protect us, when the air is charged with these poisons? The lungs must receive them, and the saliva become contaminated with them, and thus the one pollutes the air-tubes, and the other the stomach and intestines. What a volume of malaria may be poured down the larynx at every inspiration! Instead of wondering that people die so fast, we may be justly astonished that they live so long, when they are perpetually bathing themselves, externally and internally, with the most destructive effluvia. Against these subtle foes heaven intended that our olfactory organs should be a sure defence. Here it was intended that we should have an ever watchful guardian angel: but, alas! we slay our benefactor. The snuff-taker sets about the destruction of this divine protector in right good earnest, and the drunkard and moderate drinker follow in his wake!

One of the great evils of stimulants is eventual paralysis of the nerves, and consequently the destruction of the senses. Strong constitutions may resist the ravages for a considerable time. One sense may be destroyed at a time, and for a while those which remain may seem to be increased in acuteness; but we are firmly convinced that JEHOVAH never has, and never will, construct a human being that can to the last remain invulnerable to the attacks of alcohol. Our senses are divine gifts; they are the most exquisite examples of divine art; they are intended alike to be the avenues of knowledge, the fountains of pleasure, and the protectors of our health. Among them the organ of smell is pre-eminent. Where this is injured a thousand ills may ensue. The dwelling may become worse than an open sepulchre, and may elaborate and send forth torrents of deadly poison. The inmates may be cadaverous in appearance, dispeptic in constitution, and alike inert in body and mind. The religious tract is not read; the house of God is not attended; and the only ardent aspiration is the fatal craving for more stimulants to render life endurable; and never will these ills be remedied until the Principles of Total Abstinence prevail.

A TEMPERANCE SONG.

"Be ye sober."—ST. PETER.

Who shall talk of strength and freedom,
With a loud and fever'd breath,
While they let a full cup lead 'em
To the slavery of death?

Men of labour, wake to thinking,
Shout not with a reeling brain!
Lips that argue o'er deep drinking
Ever yield more chaff than grain.

Bravery that needs inspiring
By the grape and barley corn,
Only gives the random firing,
Cunning foes may laugh to scorn.

Do ye hope to march the faster
To the summit of your claims,
While ye let such tyrant master
Strike your limbs in staggering shame?

Do ye find the hot libation,
Poured so wildly on the heart,
Make it fitter for its station,
Whoso'er may be its part?

Father, husband, wife, or mother!
Can ye do the work ye should,
While the fumes of madness smother
Human love and human good?

Wonder not that children trample
All fair precept in the dust,
When a parent's foul example
Robs a home of peace and trust.

Who shall reckon all the anguish
Who shall dream of all the sin,
Who shall tell the souls that languish
At the spectre-shrine of Gin?

"Be ye sober!" they who struggle
For the better lot below,
Must not let the full cup juggle
Soul and body into woe.

"Be ye sober!" if ye covet
Healthy days and peaceful nights:
Strong drink warpath those who love it
Into sad and fearful sights.

"Be ye sober!" cheeks grow haggard,
Eyes turn dim, and pulse-tide blood
Runs too fast, or crawlth laggard,
When there's poison in the flood.

"Will ye let a demon bind ye
In the chain of Helot thrall?
Will ye let the last hour find ye
In the lowest pit of all?"

Oh! stand back in godly terror,
When Temptation's joys begin;
'Tis such wily maze of Error,
Few get out who once go in.

Shun the "dram" that can but darken,
When its vapour gleam has fled;
Reason says, and ye must hearken,
"Lessened drink brings doubled bread."

Though your rulers may neglect ye,
"Be ye sober!" in your strength;
And they must and shall respect ye,
And the light shall dawn at length.

But let none cry out for freedom,
With a loud and fever'd breath,
While they let a full cup lead 'em
To the slavery of death.

SELF-DENIAL ILLUSTRATED.

BY DALMOCAND.

WITHOUT any preface or preamble, the topic I have pitched on for a few remarks is SELF-DENIAL. In whatever way considered, it stands invested with surpassing interest; and, socially regarded, appears, and is, essential to the ordering of a fallen world. Self-denial may be defined, the foregoing of present pleasure for greater anticipated good. Placed upon the summit of a hill, observes John Newton, a beast sees nothing but the grass on which it treads, but man enjoys the landscape; and the Christian, we might add, as on another Pisgah, beholds, moreover, the land of promise. Thither, reader, did we oftener direct our longing gaze, the path of duty would become less intricate and irksome.

Having now proposed the subject, let each inquire if it is sufficiently important to bespeak his serious thought; and having decided, in the affirmative of course, proceed to scrutinize it. Let us, first, take up the principle as found developed in the earthly man, then as in the spiritual—tracing its chief lineaments in each, and exhibiting its necessity in both.

I. IN THE WORLDLING, whose engrossing wish is to pass his span of life in pleasurable ease, the principle of self-denial will be found existing in a widely-different way from what it does in him whose hopes of recompense are based, not on a present, but a future world. Nor could it well be otherwise. The self-denial of the former flows entirely from a willing thralldom to things of time and sense. Loftier incentives to forego a momentary trifle for the sake of others and his undying soul, he knows not. Self-denial being on all hands acknowledged lovely, and preservative of social comfort, it consequently often happens that where this commodity is felt wanting in its genuine form, an actual possession of it is straightway dissembled. Men, unwilling though they were to inconvenience themselves, having the acuteness to perceive that unless they conferred attention upon others, they could in turn exact none, from time to time bestirred themselves to frame certain conventional articles whereby to shape their intercourse and conduct; thus, like "our glorious constitution," arose in happy symmetry, the art of etiquette or honour! Rigorously watched by its proficient is that abstruse science, and derision remains the lot of him who apes or disregards its laws. Yea, let any individual, be he of what superior worth he may, stumble against their prudish notions, and anon he will be laughed at as a barbarian. Assuredly, such treatment is not pleasing; to be made a butt of ridicule by those soulless "pinks of fashionable propriety," as Dr. Chalmers dubs them, well nigh exceeds endurance. But while we must condemn those who, wofully deficient in true morality, can rest contented with its semblance, we must admit the powerful influence of worldly honour in diminishing excess.

Having thus glanced at self-denial in one phase, we shall, as proposed, enter on its examination in another.

II. With him who meditates on "THINGS UNSEEN," it is that self-denial can in reality be termed a virtue; and issuing as it does with him from charity and faith, it may be likened to a tree on goodly soil, abounding not so much in showy foliage as in fruit of sweetest savour. The Christian, retaining constantly in view the mark to which he should aspire, and regarding this world merely as a college for the soul, wherein to take its unchangeable "degree" of glory or of shame for the eternal world, can alone delight in fulfilling, according to the measure of his power, his several duties. Like his worldly brother, he also has his manual to ponder over—and to instruct him in his daily walk—even an emanation of the Lord of wisdom. To this heaven-dropped hand-book each should with reverence repair, and, as an instruction-loving child, seek to discover what kind of self-denial it inculcates. Then, perceiving from the sacred Directory, that while man looks to outward indications, the great Spirit knows and notes the workings of the heart, and counting as no fiction the ordeal of a judgment day; let him shrive his soul, and see if honest love to God and man, or selfish fraud, be sovereign there.

To illustrate further how self-denial in the secondary form becomes, in the absence of the other, so indispensable to social order, and adduce some reason why the principle should be cherished as an article of high-toned morality and Christian duty, let us walk into the region of hypothesis.

Were there, for example, no restraining power either from within or from without, acting on the human mind; were men to conceive themselves at liberty to riot uncontrolled, braving alike the displeasure of their fellows and the terrors of their God; and were a country filled with a population so abandoned, what a miserable country, what a horrible community it would be! But, again, were these same individuals, startled at the awful insecurity of life and property in which they lived, each dreading from the lawless turbulence around that his visitation might come next, to adopt a code of penal laws, and, from a fear for self alone, attempt obedience thereto, would not some salutary change ensue? Assuredly there would. Lastly, were they, through divine assistance, individually to set up the Bible as their leading light or statute book, then would its bright effulgence shed its sanctifying radiance athwart the sombre precincts of the soul, cause purer feelings to gush, and open to their gaze wide-stretching views of what they owed, not only to themselves, but to their race, and especially to Him from whom goeth forth unnumbered blessings. Now it is self-denial of this description that ought to be supremely sought and practised. Self-denial, in its conventional or spurious form, may, for a season, commend itself to human favour and cheat human eyes, but in an hour not dreamt of the sword of retribution falls.

What an impetus would the cause of truth receive from earnest emulation, how best to lubricate the wheels of progress! Wheel-clogging, however, seems the favourite pursuit, as it entails small burden, and gratifies withal perverted appetite. Whosoever would remove the ancient landmarks, though for self-evident improvement, is accounted sacrilegious. Among those hallowed relics are the DRINKING USAGES; which, instead of being flung aside with loathing, are upheld in all their vileness. Yet some landmarks have been interfered with, notwithstanding. The Druids, for instance, were fond of sacrifice, and immolated their human victims caged in wicker-work; but the worshippers of custom now—unlike their bungling ancestors—employ the more refined and scientific process of slow combustion, by means of a deceitful spirit, which makes the victim "happy"—thus victimising, not occasional dribblers, but yearly thousands, as befits Great Britain. Druidism has long been gathered to its fathers,—may the alcoholic superstition follow quickly! Mere wishing, however, except in fairy legends, will accomplish little towards the overthrow of any grievance; yet hearty and sincere wishing ever seeks an outlet in exertion. One may scatter tears—if he can find them—over the intemperance of his fatherland, and give utterance to a hope of better days; but his evanescent weeping and his occasional hoping are in vain. Worthy of remembrance is the question put by a good man to his sentimental friends, who all declared they felt very much indeed for the philanthropic object submitted to their notice:—"But how much? gentlemen. I feel £5."

"Temperance," interprets a heathen moralist, "is the subjection of our desires to reason;" and the apostle of the Gentiles enforces the same doctrine with a higher meaning, leaving posterity no room for doubt as to his self-denying tactics. In the violation of this rule the former saw his fellow-man degraded: the latter mourned, besides, his God dishonoured. Spirituous abstinence is often represented as a gloomy, joyless thing; yet were its calumniators to condescend to an impartial trial, they would doubtless echo the exclamation of the Persian monarch, who, flying before his enemies, was introduced to simple fare—"Of how much pleasure have I been ignorant!" Were it not that men trammelled by an evil habit (which, cancer-like in growth, should cancer-like receive immediate excision) consider it an intolerable thought to abandon the inebriating draught, it would be altogether unnecessary to class its relinquishment as an act of self-denial. He whose abstinence from alcoholic stimulants springs from a conviction of their uselessness, nay, injury to man in health, and from a tracking of their vestiges on every hand, can perceive little mortification in the matter; for TETOTALISM, like virtue, is its own reward: in the regarding of our neighbour's interest we effectually consult our own.

What, let me ask in closing, was the inscription which, illuminating that by Pilate, saints and angels would have read upon the cross—SELF-DENIAL? Let all of us in future lay this subject more to heart, praying to have this principle in its transcendent form as our close companion through the changeful scenes of life, and "in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

DRUNKENNESS, PAUPERISM, AND CRIME.

THE Rev. Dr. Begg, of Edinburgh, an eminent minister of the Free Church of Scotland, has issued a very remarkable and able pamphlet, entitled "Pauperism and the Poor-laws." Under the head of "Causes tending to make paupers and criminals," he gives the following appalling statements, which ought to be deeply pondered by all:—

"A leading cause of the present rapid increase of pauperism is undoubtedly the prevalence of whisky-shops and of drunkenness. This view of the subject has also been fully explained of late, and I do not intend to dwell upon it. 'The drunkard shall come to poverty,' saith the Scripture; and the following statistics are surely sufficiently alarming as regards Scotland:—

"I. CONSUMPTION OF BRITISH SPIRITS IN 1841, WHEN THE LAST CENSUS WAS TAKEN.

In England, 0.51 gals., or upwards of half a gal. per head.
In Ireland, 0.80.....three-fourths of a gal. per head.
In Scotland, 2.28.....two and a fourth gal. per head.

* * * The cost at 10s. a gallon, being to each family in Scotland, upwards of £5 19s.

"II. THE NUMBER OF SPIRIT-DEALERS AND RETAILERS DURING THE SAME YEAR.

In England, nearly one for every 52 families.
In Ireland, .....84 families.
In Scotland, .....31 families.

"III. THE NUMBER OF HOUSES UNDER £10 OF RENT LICENSED TO RETAIL SPIRITS.

In England, nearly one for every 190 families.
In Ireland, .....120 families.
In Scotland, .....48 families.

"Drunkenness is pre-eminently the curse of Scotland; the amazement of all foreigners; the manifest parent of many of our social evils.

"Baillie Gray tells us, that of 2,700 paupers in Edinburgh, 2,000 were made so by drink; and the same thing will be found true of crime. When one of the managers of the poor at Liverton, I got from the Excise an account of all the whisky sold annually in the parish. I found that it amounted to 9,000 gallons, being nearly two and a half gallons to each individual, or about £4,500 spent in drink; proving that an assessment of that amount would only have supplied the people with drink, without giving them any food or clothes at all, and that as long as such an enormous source of waste exists, the pouring in of money will no more cure the evil, than the pouring in of oil will quench a fire. Apart from other plans of remedy, and especially of a great change in our 'drinking customs,' I am convinced that two things would do great good—the sweeping away of a vast number of whisky-shops altogether, and the annual publication of the statistics of drinking. In regard to the first, its efficacy has been proved on a large scale in America, where public drinking has been nearly banished. One blush for his country in returning from America—temptation and drunkenness at every door. It is vain to say, as long as men want drink they will get it. The great matter is to get quit of a vast amount of active temptation, created by the existence of hundreds of families whose very maintenance depends on the success of their efforts to sell drink. If men are sent abroad with pitfalls in every direction, no wonder if many of them fall in. Let the pits be filled up as fast as possible, and in regard to the statistics of drinking, they could be easily procured, and would be of great importance. Every gallon of whisky that enters a whisky-shop is marked by the Excise, and Parliament could order an annual return to be published, and probably would do so, if our rulers were not wickedly anxious to swell up drunkenness for the sake of revenue. There ought to be a public whisky barometer, if I may so speak like a public rain-gauge, by which men could mark the rise and fall of the tide, and trace the connection in any particular district between drinking, pauperism, and crime. Meantime, I am happy to find the friends of temperance becoming more practical in their measures. The efforts of magistrates to diminish the number of low tipping-houses are worthy of all commendation."

It will be in the recollection of many that Dr. (then Mr.) Begg formed one of a deputation from the Free Church of Scotland who visited America, shortly after the Scottish disruption, and for having made collections in some of the slave-states in behalf of the Free Church, drew down upon themselves the eloquent denunciations of George Thompson, till the cry of "Send back the money" became familiar from the Land's End to John-o'-Groat's House.

We simply refer to this circumstance for the purpose of illustrating a striking sentence in the extract above given:—"Every gallon of whisky," says Dr. Begg, "that enters a whisky-shop is marked by the Excise; and Parliament could order an annual return to be published, and probably would do so, if our rulers were not wickedly anxious to swell up drunkenness for the sake of revenue." Is it right, then, we ask, that such a state of things should continue? Is it right that the flood-gates of sin should be opened, and a mighty torrent of demoralization sent through the land for the purpose of filling the coffers of the Exchequer? No! the lip of eternal truth has returned the verdict—"Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people." While nine-tenths of the crime, and most of the poverty, that afflict and burthen our country are chargeable upon our drinking customs, would it not be the more excellent way to remove the cause that the effects might cease? Does it not behove every patriotic and philanthropic man, as he beholds the public treasury replenished from the "drunkenness" of the nation, to lift up his voice and utter the indignant cry, "SEND BACK THE MONEY." M. YOUNG.

Bedlington, July 12, 1849.

RESULTS OF INTEMPERANCE.—We obtain but an imperfect idea of the annual loss entailed on the country from intemperance, by a mere recital of the expense of the intoxicating drinks consumed. Such is only the first loss. The secondary losses are summed up as follows:—A large portion of pauperism; loss of health and character; premature death; widowhood and orphanage; abandonment to vicious pursuits and crimes; an enormous outlay in supporting judicial tribunals, police establishments, jails, and penal settlements; the abstraction of lands from useful crops for food; and the distraction of capital into wrong channels. Of the evils ensuing under the head of public morals and religion, the picture is too appalling to be dwelt upon.—Chambers's Tracts.

MASSACHUSETTS METHODIST CONFERENCE.

At the Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists, recently held at Massachusetts, reports of committees on slavery, intemperance, and tract distribution, were received and adopted. The report on temperance was short and to the point. It declared that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage was an immorality, and that it ought to be so regarded by the Christian Church; that the making and selling of them, to be used as a beverage, was a crime of the highest order, and should be so considered by the civil and ecclesiastical law; and that to secure the complete triumph of temperance, its friends should unite their efforts in their social and political capacities, and in no case consider themselves at liberty to support in business, or promote to office, men who are opposed to the temperance enterprise. It concluded with the following:—"Whereas true temperance implies a total abstinence from all things injurious to health, and only a moderate use of those things that promote it—Resolved, that while we advocate and practice total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, we will also everywhere by example, and on all proper occasions by precept, discountenance the vulgar use of TOBACCO."

REASONS WHY THE RELIGIOUS PART OF THE COMMUNITY SHOULD GIVE UP THE USE OF INTOXICATING DRINKS.

First—Because they are unnecessary.

Secondly—Because they are injurious.

Thirdly—Because their use has caused an incalculable amount of evils, morally, socially, and religiously.

Fourthly—Because, seeing that intoxicating drink is evil in itself, and has proved so great a curse to the human family, it must be the duty especially of those professing Christianity to abstain from it altogether. When a great evil prevails which might be removed, those professing to serve Jesus Christ, and to desire the present and eternal welfare of their fellow-creatures, should be the first to try to remove it, and so "let their light shine before men, that others, seeing their good works, may glorify their Father who is in Heaven." The united efforts of the religious part of society would soon remove the great curse of intemperance from amongst us.

Fifthly—Because strong drink has caused more backsliding, and more expulsions from religious societies, than all other things put together. It is a stumbling-block, by which many have fallen to rise no more.

Sixthly—Professors of Christianity should give up strong drink, because it is the greatest hindrance to the success of the Gospel and the conversion of the world. Through its use great numbers are kept away from the house of God, and live like heathens in a Christian country, spreading a baneful influence on all around them. For an illustration of this, take those who, instead of bringing their money home on the reckoning-night, and spending it in food and clothing for themselves and families, leave a part of it at the public-house; they not only spend their money for that which is evil and injurious, but go into places where every sinful and unholly passion and propensity is fostered and strengthened. In consequence of this conduct, the Sabbath is disregarded, religion is neglected and despised, the public-house becomes their sanctuary, and strong drink the god they worship; their families are neglected, and their offspring grow up in ignorance and vice—"A seed of evil doers, children that are corruptors;" and thus, in thousands of instances, intoxicating drink becomes the greatest of all curses to the people, and causes a thousand evils which could not exist but for its use.

Seventhly—The religious should give up strong drink, because, by thus uniting in one body against the common foe of the human family, they would, with Divine help, be able to remove from society its greatest curse, and would be greatly furthering the improvement, the elevation, the comfort, and the salvation of the people.

Another reason why the religious should give up alcoholic drink is, because the temperance reformers cannot succeed in banishing strong drink while they continue to use it and countenance its use. The countenance and use of intoxicating drink by the ministers of the Gospel, and professing Christians, is the strongest bulwark of the drinking system: it is its stronghold, in which great numbers shelter themselves from the arguments of temperance reformers. The use of strong drink by the religious is the chief argument with thousands against giving it up: "It surely cannot be so bad as you represent it, or the religious would not use it; and if it be not wrong for them to use it, it cannot be wrong for us to use it." But the case would be quite different were the religious to abstain from it; the use of strong drink would then stand amongst those things which religion forbids and discountenances. Neither malsters, nor brewers, nor venders of strong drink, could be countenanced in the church, and this would stamp the traffic with condemnation.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TEMPERANCE HOTELS.

To the Editor of the Tectotal Times.

SIR,—I am too much interested in the prosperity of the cause of temperance to observe any circumstances which bear upon its fortunes, whether for good or for ill, with indifference. And I cannot but refer to the general character of Temperance Hotels, as tending materially to injure the character and influence of our societies. I regret to say that, for the most part, they are essentially wanting in the elements of comfort and respectability, and, I fear, that they rather tend to degrade than to elevate public estimation of our system. Many are little better than low pot-houses, while those of the grades above are often dirty and ill-furnished, presenting a miserable sample of the social degradation which, although it assumes to repudiate the alcoholic mischief, indulges grossly and freely in the vice of smoking, if not that of gambling in a small way.

I will not deny that there are several striking exceptions in the better kind of Temperance Hotels, several I have seen and others I have heard of. I cannot, however, avoid to notice the Temperance Hotel at Scarborough, recently opened by our old friend Mr. Thomas Whitaker. This is, in every sense, what such an establishment ought to be, having every accommodation for families and individuals sojourning at that celebrated watering-place, besides ample arrangements for commercial men. And I sincerely hope that as Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker have spared no pains or EXPENSE in rendering their establishment worthy of general support, they will be especially patronised by the temperance public, as well as by the public in general.

I am, yours,

Bradford, August 20, 1849. THOMAS BEAUMONT.

WHAT IS NEEDED?—That the temperance principle may greatly prevail, the pulpit must speak out more generally, constantly, and strongly than it has ever yet done; professing Christians must let their light shine more clearly and powerfully; the Sabbath-school must be made more a vehicle of forming aright on this subject the minds of the young; the wide circulation of temperance publications must be encouraged; visible and public organizations on Christian principles must be formed in all churches and congregations; temperance meetings must be so conducted that light shall be shed on the understanding, conviction fastened upon the conscience, and the blessing of Him secured whose favour is life, and whose frown is death.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS.

WE request the particular attention of our readers to the advertisement of the meeting to be held in EXETER-HALL, on Monday, October 1st. Let the Teetotalers of the Metropolis especially make the meeting known as extensively as possible, and do all they can to secure a large gathering. The place, the subject, and the speakers, all present powerful attractions; and we confidently hope that the results will prove worthy of the cause, encouraging to the committee, and beneficial to the general community.

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

THE NEXT MEETING will be held at Mrs. Watts' Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on WEDNESDAY EVENING, September 5th, at half-past seven o'clock precisely. The attendance of all office-bearers and active members of Total Abstinence Societies is particularly requested. Business of importance in connexion with the forthcoming meetings in EXETER-HALL will have to be transacted.

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE AND TEETOTALISM.

A NUMBER of memorials and addresses, from teetotal societies in various parts of the kingdom, were sent to the Wesleyan preachers recently assembled in Conference at Manchester. It was stated, in a report of the proceedings of that body, that several such addresses had been received, and that they were to be "respectfully acknowledged." Reckoning upon the experience of former years, we have reason to believe that this "respectful acknowledgment" is all the notice they will obtain. On more than one occasion the subject of intoxicating liquors was forced on the attention of the preachers as follows:—

1. Missions and strong drink. Mr. Irving, of Bristol, felt himself called upon to enter on another "explanation" as to the strong drinks of various kinds put on board the missionary ship the "John Wesley." Now, though the majority were pleased to think Mr. Irving's statement—which greatly reminds us of a spirit merchant's invoice—"highly satisfactory," we regard it as anything but satisfactory. Mr. Irving fully confirmed our statements, and it came out, moreover, in the course of the explanation, that strong drinks were unnecessary, even in the most trying situations, and that a portion of them was sold when they got abroad.

2. A lachrymose complaint was made by Mr. Heald, M.P. for Stockport (in connexion with whose election so much was said about "beer barrels"), "that he could not just rinse his mouth with a little wine and water, after making a long speech at a missionary meeting, without being made the subject of attack." This complaint was followed, according to the report, with "Hear, hear," and laughter.

3. There was the boasting declaration of one of the preachers, named Osborn, who distinguished himself a few years ago by an attack on teetotalism, which was most triumphantly replied to by the Rev. W. J. Shrewsbury, a reply which it will be impossible for Mr. Osborn ever to forget, or to forgive. Mr. Osborn is reported to have said, at the recent meeting at Manchester: "As a Christian, I am restrained from doing many things which, as a Briton, I have a right to do. They won't let me nor Mr. Heald take a glass of wine at a missionary meeting (laughter)." "I will not succumb to the dictates of a parcel of irresponsible writers, men in masks, who will not show their faces. I mean to do as I please in all matters of this kind when I am not bound by any Methodist law; and if I cannot be trusted to take a glass of wine when I think proper, I am not fit to be in your ministry. I will not be dealt with as a baby or an idiot. I will not have it dictated to me what I shall do or say. I stand upon my Christian liberty, and will not give it up, but will stand upon it if I stand alone" (laughter and prolonged cheers). The men who will thus cheer a vain boasting wine-drinker, are not the men to pass resolutions enjoining temperance; are not the men—Christian ministers though they are called—to reduce the evils of intemperance, or to encourage the exertions of teetotalers! And yet, scarcely a week passes without the suspension or expulsion of some member for intemperance. And we are compelled to notice,

4. A minister's fall. At this very Conference one of their crack preachers and editors, Mr. J. S. Stamp, was expelled for the embezzlement of large connexional funds, and for other inconsistencies, which inconsistencies, however, passed unproved, till the defalcation in the funds was revealed! The President of the Conference, Mr. T. Jackson, in pronouncing the sentence of expulsion, said, "the expelled person was the son of a highly esteemed minister, and possessed more than ordinary gifts. There was reason to conclude that he had fallen by little and little. One cause had been a want of deep and habitual seriousness. He had been too much given to jocularity, especially in the use he made of Scripture language. There was a great difference between Christian cheerfulness and sinful levity. The habit of quoting Scripture in a humorous style is very dangerous. Another cause was, that he made too free with ardent spirits" (and we can add, with other strong drinks too). "An appetite for these," continued the President, "may be easily formed, but cannot be easily broken. The habit of taking spirits is VERY DANGEROUS, especially to a Christian minister. Another cause was his affectation of gentility;" (this astonishes us; the general habits and manners of Mr. Stamp, as well as the state of his domestic arrangements were as far removed from gentility as it is possible to conceive); "and," continued the President, "of hospitality beyond his means."* And yet those who partook of this affected and fraudulent "hospitality," including wine and spirits, were Wesleyan preachers and members, including some of those who voted for his expulsion! Mr. President then concluded with the solemn admonition, which we hope will be remembered and acted upon by Mr. Osborn, and all who claim their right to "do as they like,"—"LET HIM THAT THINKETH HE STANDETH TAKE HEED LEST HE FALL."

Beyond this and "some conversation," we do not find that any action was taken at the recent Conference. Preachers, we suppose, will continue to do "as they like," either "to take a glass of wine at a missionary meeting," after recitals of the mischief done to hopeful plantations by strong drink, or "to rinse their mouths with wine and water." And the result will be that other preachers, and other editors of Wesleyan Methodist magazines, and of Watchman newspapers, will be covered with disgrace, and compelled to expatriate themselves, or to be immured in prison for debts incurred through extravagance. How easy it would be to prevent such disgrace by a strict enforcement of Mr. Wesley's rules! But we know that in the minds of some of the most popular Wesleyan preachers there is a feeling decidedly hostile to the teetotal movement, and a fixed determination to meet the question with something worse than even ridicule whenever it is introduced. This is a strange infatuation—a course as impolitic as it is inconsistent—condemned alike by the rules of the great Founder of Methodism, by the genius of the gospel, and by the requirements, we will not say of the times merely, but of Wesleyan Methodism itself.

We are constantly asked by respected members of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, "How would you have us act in this matter?" Our answer is, "Maintain a consistent profession, both of teetotalism and of Methodism; persevere in the advocacy of your principles, and pray fervently that your preachers may soon be brought to a more wholesome state of mind."

NURSING.

[BY H. MUDGE.]

It may be profitable to reflect for a few moments on the fact, that the Creator has said to the creature, "Be fruitful and multiply." In the higher orders of animals the female brings forth the offspring, and continues for a season to nourish it, being provided with an apparatus for the special purpose of nursing. A fair inference from these premises would be, that nursing is a healthy and agreeable, inasmuch as it is a natural process. Looking at the brute creation, we there find the inference to be correct; when is the appetite so keen, the body so vigorous, the general health so robust, and the instinct so alert, as when the dam is suckling her young? So ought it to be with the human species; for, to use the words of Dr. Looock, "the period of lactation is generally the most healthy of woman's life."

Alas, how different from this in many cases! Civilization, which brings knowledge, and tends on the whole to longevity, sets up fashions which minister very much to decrepitude. In infancy—yes, even so early as this—a foundation is laid for bad nursing, and the evil work is carried through childhood and youth on to womanhood. Veils, furs, and parasols, Venetian blinds by day, and closed curtains by night, shut out the light and air; and so, by preventing the purification of the blood, entail a weakly constitution, which, later in life, vitiates the quality of the milk, made as that is out of the blood. The tight dress, preventing by pressure the expansion of the breasts, and thereby diminishing the size of the producers and reservoirs of the milk, makes that deficient in quantity which is already vicious in quality. The nipples, too, are thrust back and kept flat, instead of being allowed to grow and project, thus converting a source of ecstatic enjoyment into an occasion of exquisite torture! These are what may be termed remote and particular causes of mischief; but there are others more general, as late hours, heated rooms, stimulating viands, alcoholic drinks, &c., which also tell in later life against that healthiness which simpler, less artificial animals attain to.

Do not let it be supposed that I am writing in the spirit of a mere caviller, or with the notion that we shall arrive at perfection in these matters. No; "there shall be no more pain," is descriptive of heaven and not of earth; yet we may diminish, if we cannot cure the ill; and if suffering mothers are made wise, their as yet uninjured daughters may escape.

We will suppose, however, the "confinement" easily got through, the "milk fever" subdued; great fires, loads of blankets, and brandy-caudle having given way to the modern treatment of cool apartments, fresh air, and unstimulating diet. Some months have elapsed, but yet a most unsatisfactory state of things has to be borne with: neither mother nor babe are well. And now comes the tug of war with alcoholic beverages. Here some correspondents come to my aid, and I shall let them describe the fightings without and fears within. The first letter is brief and plain, and written from Lancashire:—

"Sir,—My wife is suckling a fine boy about nine months old; is low in body, and suffers much from wind in the stomach, for which some recommend her to take now and then a small quantity of brandy; others, to smoke a little tobacco. I am opposed to her taking the above-named articles, believing they will do her positive injury. Your advice will oblige, &c."

The next is rather longer, and from London: and here, by the way, I may express my surprise at the number of letters which I receive from London asking teetotal advice. However proverbially doctors disagree, they seem to be of one mind in favour of intoxicating liquors, spite of the medical certificate. But to the letter, which runs thus:—

"Dear Sir,—The case I have to state is as follows:—A young married woman, suckling her first child, is continually troubled with wind, and has no appetite:

she has been a teetotaler about twelve months, her husband having been one for some years. The child, about two months old, is almost continually crying. The doctor ordered her to take stout; they objected, asking if he could not write a prescription for something else. He said wine would do as well; but, on that being objected to also, he ordered some medicine, which was taken, but did no good. They again consulted the doctor, who told her he could do no more for her, if she refused to take the stout as he had recommended. Another doctor was consulted, and he also advised her to take stout. In the same house there is another female who has very recently been confined. She takes beer, and can enjoy a mutton chop. These things combined waver the Teetotalers as to the practicability of abstinence under these circumstances, and incline them to believe that stout is indispensable in such cases, and it is hard to persuade people that it is not; and you may get told sometimes that you know nothing at all about it. Your advice will oblige, &c.

"Yours, A. S. D.

"P.S. I have stated the case as it appears at first sight, and as it would be brought by an opponent to bear against Teetotalism; but I have discovered several other things. The woman has been for a long time subject to the disorder, even worse than she has it now; before she became a Teetotaler she tried brandy and other fiery compounds without relief. The child has had laudanum by the doctor's order to quiet it, and other things, some of them sour. The nurse, too, has come in for her share of blame"

The above are fair samples of the many applications made respecting this subject of nursing; and what a state of things do we see! A weak mother, a cross babe, a meddling nurse, and a stout-loving, laudanum-giving doctor! Is it any wonder for the poor husband to waver, Teetotaler though he be? Few of us but would wish to get out of such a purgatory.

But now for the "methodus medendi"—the cure. Observe first, that such cases as the above are seldom met with in the country (as opposed to the large town), and this at once shows the necessity of attending to the general laws of health. Let a well-drained neighbourhood be selected to live in; let the apartments be thoroughly ventilated—a perforated zinc plate or two put in the window, and a hole made in the chimney near the ceiling of the room; sell, drown, or hang, as the case may be, the canary-bird, the cat, and the dog, or any other consumer of oxygen;* wash the room daily, and sprinkle it with some solution of chloride of zinc. If the patient be far enough advanced to get out of doors, instead of spending sixpence in stout or in physic, pay her fare with it to travel a few miles and back on the top of an omnibus; get her to walk out (if she can) in spite of wind or weather; a pair of Indian rubber shoes and a waterproof cloak will sufficiently protect.

Go early to bed (yea, early enough, even if it be in the afternoon) to admit of rising at five in the morning,† and breathe the morning air, out of doors if possible. As to diet, leave slops, whether broths, coffee, cocoa, or tea; thousands of women injure themselves by going on to drink, drink, drink ten times a day. Fluids, of course, must be taken, but only lukewarm, and in no very extraordinary quantities; weak black tea, or toast-water, or fresh sparkling cold water, will do; or milk-and-water, with a little sugar or salt in it. The cow, we know, is not fitted for the dairy by driving her to the water six times a day, but by putting her into a field of good grass! As to eating, the food must be plain, and not high seasoned. "Wind in the stomach" and "sinking away" are the ever present symptoms, * These directions apply chiefly to crowded places.

† This advice will not be relished by many; but remember health is at stake, and misery from strong drinks to be abolished. Realising faith will bring us up to the mark. If relief be sought through alcohol, complaints will be masked, not cured.

and both are from indigestion, and that from improper food. Thick oatmeal gruel, pearl-barley pudding, stale (not new) brown bread, with the bran and pollard all in it; fresh (not rancid) butter, with a little cheese, and in the early part of the day a slice or two of lean mutton or beef; if used to them, cooked vegetables may be taken—mealy potatoes freely, others, as turnip, cabbage, carrots, &c., sparingly, but not any raw salads. But the ability of stomachs to digest food greatly varies, so let any article followed by distension, flatulence, or pain, be laid aside.

Now as to suckling the babe: let that be at regular periods—say of four hours, beginning at six in the morning and ending at ten at night; aim at having repose by night; for thorough good nursing by delicate women this is indispensable, and family arrangements must be made to secure it, or we shall fail. If the babe must be fed besides the suckling, let cows' milk, to which are added a fourth part of hot water and a very little sugar (just to flavour it) be given when the child expresses hunger. The vulgar notions about two sorts of milk disagreeing, and about the food having "thickening" in it, as well as the practice of loading the diet with sugar, are all absurd.

Sometimes, though not often, medicine may be found to be necessary. If the bowels are confined, take one of the following pills night and morning:—Take of blue pill, five grains; sulphate of iron, 40 grains; Barbadoes aloes, 20 grains; extract of gentian, enough to form a mass to be divided into 20 pills. If debility oppress, take two table-spoonfuls of compound mixture of iron twice a day; and if the bowels are confined, add to each dose one table-spoonful of compound decoction of aloes. If flatulence trouble, take at the time one of the following powders in a little warm water (after carefully seeing that the food is left off which may be causing it):—Bicarbonate of soda, one drachm; compound powder of cinnamon, one-half drachm; mix, and divide into six doses.

For a babe crying, I never found anything equal to the following; but as it contains an opiate, it must not be given oftener than once or twice a day, now and then, or the digestion will be injured, and a bad habit contracted:—Take of syrup of white poppies, half an ounce; liquor of acetate of ammonia, half an ounce; spirit of nitric ether, half a drachm; shake together in a phial; give one large tea-spoonful when apparently in pain, and repeat in one or two hours if not quieted. Sometimes nurses get an irritable state of the stomach, which causes it to reject even proper food when taken into it; these cases invariably yield to the iron mixture in the morning, and the following powder at night:—Take of Dover's powder ten grains; compound cinnamon powder, five grains; mercury with chalk, four grains; mix. Mind this is for a woman, not for a babe; it would injure the latter.

We will suppose, now, that alcohol is needed after all. Surely medical practitioners should not countenance the vulgar error that intoxicating liquors are in themselves nutritious or strengthening. This pestiferous body and soul destroying doctrine must be rooted out; and to assist, let the doctor take the lead, and keep the reins in his own hands. He can send the following mixture, and discontinue it at the earliest possible opportunity:—

R̄ Mucilag. Acac., ℥ iij.
Tre Cardam. Co., ℥ ij.
S. V. R., ℥ vj.
Aque pur., ℥ iv. ft. Mist. cujus.

Capiat agra Cochlearia ampla duo bis terue die paulo ante cilium.

Or, if need be, he can send some alcohol (medicinally coloured, &c.) in a phial, with directions to take a tea-spoonful occasionally in infusion of malt and hops. Anything is better than the old fashion. The doctor, it appears to me, should be the mainstay of the reformation; counselling, cheering, watching, directing, until he has allayed that great enemy to good nursing—mental anxiety, and has put matters in a fair train for domestic happiness and health. In some cases (perhaps that described in the first letter I gave is one) early weaning is desirable for both mother and babe.

Now, I may say, how much I have written! yet I would fain give some extracts from Drs. Combe and Carpenter; but with a few lines only from the Temperance and Teetotalism of the latter I must be content at present. He says:—"The regular administration of alcohol with the professed object of sustaining the strength under the demand occasioned by the copious flow of milk, is one of the grossest pieces of quackery that can be perpetrated by any practitioner, legal or illegal." The importance of this subject must be my apology for prolixity; the discussion of it is certainly a beginning at the fountain head of life.

"Rome was not built in a day."

TEMPERANCE ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

The Scottish Temperance League held a banquet on Tuesday night in the Trades' Hall, Glasgow. The meeting unanimously adopted the following address to her Majesty:—

"May it please your Majesty.

"The Temperance Reformers welcome your Majesty to your ancient and loyal city of Glasgow. They are glad of your Majesty's safe arrival, and rejoice to know that your Majesty is well. They sincerely wish your Majesty both health and happiness, although they do not associate those blessings with beverages which they believe to be destructive to both. They pray that your Majesty, during a long life, may be beloved both as a mother and a Queen, and that you may be sustained in the duties of your exalted station by the cheering prospect of national prosperity.

"The Temperance Reformers beg to assure your Majesty that they are not the less loyal because their attachment to the throne is expressed without the aid of intoxicating liquors. They are hindered from honouring the loyal toasts, not by want of loyalty, but by the desire to free social intercourse, and the expression of opinion, from dangerous auxiliaries, and to prevent your Majesty's name from being associated with what they believe to be the curse of the people.

"They congratulate your Majesty on the high position Providence has assigned the British power, which, rising like a rock in the ocean, affords a secure resting-place to the ark of liberty; and guarantees, amid the storms of Europe, the permanence of freedom in the old world. They also congratulate your Majesty on the blessings bestowed upon the empire, whose chief magistrate you are. While other monarchs are living in terror of their subjects, the bonds of affection between your Majesty and your Majesty's people are growing stronger and stronger; and while other nations are distracted by internal dissensions, and harassed by foreign invaders, the millions who are united under your Majesty's sceptre are engaged in the peaceful pursuits of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce.

"Though your Majesty's subjects are thus exempt from both foreign invasion and civil commotions, they are exposed to enemies more subtle than the sword. Against intemperance, the most formidable of these, they, who now address your Majesty, have leagued themselves together. They are determined, with the blessing of the Almighty, to drive this national enemy forth from your Majesty's dominions, and to lend their aid to expel it from the world. For this purpose, they abstain altogether from strong drink, and exert themselves to induce others to follow their example. Armed with moral suasion and the excellence of their enterprise, they have raised the Temperance Standard in every part of the empire, and tens of thousands of all classes of your Majesty's subjects have already rallied around it.

"The Temperance Reformers beg again to assure your Majesty of their loyal regard; and to pray that your Majesty's reign may be marked, not by the deeds of war, but by peace, progress, and prosperity.

"For the Scottish Temperance League,

(Signed) "ROBERT KETTLE, President."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

Mrs. HARDWICK has delivered several very effective lectures and addresses at some of the principal stations in the metropolis and suburbs. She has secured the attention of large audiences, and many signatures to the pledge have been obtained. Some of the meetings have been of females only, others of both sexes.

FITZROY TEETOTAL ASSOCIATION.

The Eclipse and Vivid, two steam-vessels, each hoisting Teetotal colours, left Hungerford Market on Monday morning, the 6th inst., with a company composed chiefly of Teetotalers, with music playing. On passing Hammer-smith, they received a startling salute from some cannon placed at the water's edge by the Teetotalers of that place. On reaching Richmond the company enjoyed themselves in various ways; some in the park, others to Hampton-court, Ham Common, Twickenham, &c. At three o'clock, a meeting was held on Richmond-green, where hundreds of the inhabitants were gathered. Addresses were delivered by several speakers, and were well received by the audience. At the close of the meeting, and in the passage through the town, &c., nearly 1,500 tracts and publications were distributed. On the return home some addresses were delivered, and some temperance pieces sung. The company disembarked in London soon after eight o'clock p.m. The usual monthly experience meeting of this Society was held on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult. Mr. J. W. GREEN presided. The meeting was well attended, and fourteen persons testified to the excellence of the Teetotal practice, as it regarded health, comfort, morality, and religion, in an animated and satisfactory manner. Would that our religious opponents could be induced to attend such meetings!

WESTMINSTER.

An interesting meeting was held in the School-room, Pear-street, Stretton-ground, on Friday evening, August 3. The Right Hon. Lord Ashley, M.P., had engaged to take the chair, but, in consequence of indisposition, he was unable to attend, and the chair was occupied by Mr. WALKER, the Superintendent of the School. In opening the business of the meeting, he stated that the place in which they were sitting was formerly a public-house, in which scenes of the most revolting description were constantly to be witnessed. That very room, formerly the tap-room, had been converted into an infant school for about one hundred and seventy children; the beer-cellar and skittle-ground had been turned into a reading-room, where several working-men met after the hours of labour for the purpose of improving themselves; and the present was the first of a series of monthly meetings for exposing the evils of intemperance, and recommending the practice of entire abstinence from strong drinks. Much good had already been effected, and there was much to encourage the hope that the appearance of that notoriously-wicked neighbourhood would soon be changed for the better. The meeting, which was large and attentive, was addressed in very appropriate terms by Dr. Gourley, Mr. T. A. Smith, Mr. J. W. Green, and Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke, the honorary secretary, to whose indefatigable exertions, especially in reference to the young attendants at this place, the cause is deeply indebted. Some signatures to the pledge were obtained at the close, and some persons entered their names as subscribers to the funds of the Society.

DERBY.

On Wednesday, August 8th, Mrs. THEOBALD delivered a lecture in the Temperance Meeting-room, on the duty of professing Christians to join the Temperance Movement. This was enforced with great talent, and at the close of the meeting thirty persons signed the pledge. On the 15th, the same lady lectured to a very large meeting in the Lancastrian School-room, on the evils arising from the use of intoxicating drinks, at the close of which twenty-six persons signed the pledge. W. HORSLEY, Sec.

HUNTINGDON.

We are looking forward with bright anticipations as to the future. Last October several Wesleyans joined our society, and it was re-organized under the title of the Huntingdon and Godmanchester Total Abstinence Society. We applied for the use of the Wesleyan School-room in which to hold our meetings; but though nearly all our committee are Wesleyans, two of them local preachers, and one of them the superintendent of the Sunday-school, the room was denied, because, it was said, infidels were sometimes allowed to advocate Teetotalism. It is remarkable that the greatest opposition we have met with has been from Wesleyan Ministers, and a few of the leaders; indeed, we have no opposition from any other quarter. Yet our cause has spread more rapidly among this body than any other. We have nearly forty Wesleyans pledged members among us, including nearly all the officers and teachers of the Sunday-school. The clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Keyworth, has given us permission to occupy his school-room as often as we please; he has generally been on the platform, and has once occupied the chair. We have also had the large Union Chapel opened to us, the Friends' Meeting-house, the County School-rooms, &c.; and at Godmanchester the new Independent Chapel, and the Court Hall, where the Mayor, E. Martin, Esq., has occasionally occupied the chair. We have also held meetings at Buckden, Brampton, Spaldwick, Aconbury, Wistow, Warboys, Woodhurst, &c. Since our reorganization we have taken upwards of 500 signatures to the pledge. We have enlisted a large number of juveniles who are steadfast and zealous. Several ministers of religion in the town and neighbourhood are acting on our principle, and occasionally preside at our meetings. J. SHELLEY, Secretary.

TEMPERANCE AND EDUCATION.

A delightful evening party assembled at Lower Crumpsall, on Monday evening, to celebrate the opening of a new hall, which had been erected for the double purpose of an educational and a temperance place of meeting. After tea JOSEPH BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P., was called to the chair; and amongst the gentlemen present were Alexander Henry, Esq., M.P., Samuel Lucas, Esq., J. Simpson, Esq., of Victoria-park; Rev. F. Howard, Bury; Alderman Harvey, E. Bent, Esq., R. Worthington, Esq., T. H. Neville, Esq., of Moss-house; John Robinson, Esq., David Morris, Esq., and Mr. John Johnson, bookseller, Market-street.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said: Ladies and gentlemen, I congratulate you on having erected in such a cause this elegant hall. I trust, as it is dedicated to purposes which are intended to advance the well-being of the inhabitants of this neighbourhood, that it will long be a blessing to them, and aid you to accomplish the desired objects. I am told that it is erected not only with a view to its being a temperance hall, but a mechanics' Institute (hear, and applause). I can assure you I have much pleasure in seeing such halls and such institutions established in this country. Be assured of this, that education is the foundation-stone of the happiness of all classes; is designed to fit man for his future sphere of life, and persons must be educated for the sphere that they are hereafter to fill. The time is gone by, I trust, when Englishmen are to be governed by physical force: we are desirous they should be governed by the press and enlightened public opinion (hear). Therefore, to learn to read and write is a great advantage to all classes; and be assured, it is a subject interesting to all. But I have been long of opinion that whatever efforts may be made to benefit the young—whether by supporting institutions to teach them to read or anything else—unless something be done to check intemperance and to establish those good customs which will tend to exalt the happiness of man when he is educated, all your efforts will, to a considerable extent, be in vain. More harm is done by drunkenness than can be remedied by the education of thousands. I have considered it as a duty we owe to society, to do all we can to check this vice: that if we would be wise we would abstain from intoxicating liquors ourselves. Now, what is the state of this country at the present time? In the United Kingdom we have 3,500,000 paupers; there are 200,000 criminals, and there are 40,000 lunatics. Now, what is the cause, and what is the cost? If we are to take the testimony of judges, and magistrates, and inspectors of prisons, and of chaplains, and of those most connected with our institutions, they assure us that two-thirds of the poverty, and nine-tenths of the crime, and one-half of the disease we have in the country, are caused by intemperance (hear). Now, there is the cause, and what is the cost? Our poor-rates are not less than £5,000,000 a year. It costs us nearly £2,000,000 a year to punish crime (that is, to prosecute criminals and to maintain them); and nearly £1,000,000 a year to support the lunatics (hear). Now, ladies and gentlemen, we see the effects; they are very appalling; and we have the testimony of those men who have the best opportunity of judging as to the cause, and we know to our sorrow the cost: it is for us to consider what is the remedy. Mr. Brotherton proceeded to express a doubt if legislation could cure the evil. Moderation had been tried in vain, because great drinkers always began with a moderate quantity; and if he expressed an opinion in favour of teetotalism he hoped no one would be offended at the truth. Truth was not always welcome—it enlightened some minds but inflamed others; still he rested his case upon the fact, that intoxicating liquors were not necessary, neither were they beneficial to health, and that people were much better without them (the hon. member was much applauded).

W. HOWARTH, Esq., who had been mainly instrumental in the erection of the hall, entered into some interesting particulars showing how long and industriously the builders had worked, and how cheaply they had constructed the work. He said that last year their friends put their names down for £70, which sum had since been increased to £140, and that the building itself only cost £202. He also stated that, out of 1,200 inhabitants in the village, they had 430 pledged teetotalers, besides 60 young men banded together in a mutual improvement society. They had it in contemplation to establish a female reading and writing class; and the institution was intended to be managed by two separate committees—one for the educational and the other for the teetotal departments. They had had a day school of 80 to 90 children.

Mr. Alderman HARVEY congratulated the meeting, in a humorous speech, on having before them, in his own person, an example not only of a total abstainer from all intoxicating drinks, but a total abstainer from all animal food, of forty years' standing. He proceeded to urge what once was deemed almost an impossibility, both as exemplified in his own person and that of the chairman's, that a man might live and grow stout, healthy, and strong, without either intoxicating liquors or roast beef. He advocated, from experience, the desirableness of temperance, both as regarded health and economy (applause).

JOSEPH SIMPSON, Esq., said he was not a teetotaler, but he stood there to advocate education, and being a manufacturer in the village, he sympathised with the efforts of the working man to educate himself. He hoped that when the excitement attending the opening of the hall had passed away, their zeal would not flag or pass away. He concluded by saying that he hoped there were many men in the village, now sunk in wretchedness and steeped in ignorance, who would bless the day the hall was opened.

ALEXANDER HENRY, Esq., M.P., said that he had always, when in his place in parliament, given his vote in accordance with the opinions which he expressed to the electors upon his return for the county: those principles being a love of peace, diffusion of knowledge, and the passing of wise and equal laws (loud applause). He must congratulate them upon the erection of so neat a building for the hall in which they were to meet, and he felt happy in being one of the contributors (applause). He also rejoiced that their numbers were increasing, and that a considerable part of the money collected had been contributed by working men. He rose to propose a vote of thanks to the chairman, who was truly a veteran reformer and a veteran teetotaler, and whom he was endeavouring humbly to imitate. Before he sat down he would again repeat that he rejoiced to appear amongst them to support the cause of temperance and education (loud applause).

Mr. ROWBOTOM seconded the motion which was carried with immense applause.

Mr. BROTHERTON replied, evidently much affected with the manner of his reception.

SCUTON, NEAR NORTHALLERTON.

The third anniversary of the Teetotal Society was celebrated last month, at this village. After tea a public meeting was held; W. LUNDIE, of Northallerton, in the chair. Some powerful appeals were made to the people, by Messrs. Booth, Coull and Lees, of Northallerton. The second day being beautifully fine, a large tent was called into requisition. JOSEPH WRIGLEY, Esq., Northallerton in the chair. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Brawhill, Lundie, Rogerson, Lees, and several of the local friends. At the conclusion of the meetings nine took the pledge. Teetotalism has proved a great blessing to this village. W. L.

AMERICA.

The thirteenth anniversary meeting of the American Temperance Union was held in the Broadway Tabernacle, which was early filled with an intelligent and deeply-interested audience. Chancellor WALWORTH, the President, occupied the chair. The report which was presented commenced by complaining of the apathy which had prevailed during the past year, amidst a great increase of drinking and drunkenness in the nation. It had, notwithstanding, been a year of substantial gain. The great fundamental principle of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks stood unmoved as the only efficient principle of prevention and reform. The traffic in those drinks was gaining in the human consciousness as the monster evil of the nation; and legislative and executive action was, slowly but surely, becoming the protector of the people. Instances of the latter are given, not the least interesting of which is the following:—In the far west, a new State just rising into being, and desirous of laying all its foundations for the safety and prosperity of future generations, has enacted a law allowing no man to vend or retail spirituous liquors until he shall have given bonds to pay all damages the community or individuals may sustain by such traffic; to support all paupers, widows, and orphans, and pay the expenses of all civil and criminal prosecutions growing out of or justly attributable to such traffic. A married woman may sue for damage done to her husband; and no suit shall be maintained for liquor bills. Glory to Wisconsin! The report stated that the temperance cause had lost none of its interest among the ordinary seamen of America, and that the pledge was constantly signed in the ports by the hardy sons of the ocean.

RECEPTION OF FATHER MATHEW IN BOSTON.

As early as half-past seven o'clock on the 24th of July, the Irish citizens of Boston began to wend their way towards "the Neck," to witness the reception of their noble-hearted countryman, Father Mathew. The gathering gradually increased in numbers, until the different temperance societies arrived, when Washington-street, for some distance above and below the Franklin School-house, became one dense mass of human beings, the greater part being Irishmen, women, and children. At about ten o'clock, Father Mathew, accompanied by a delegation from the Committee of Arrangements, arrived at the dividing line between Roxbury and Boston, where he was received by Dr. J. C. Warren, who made a few brief and appropriate remarks, to which Father Mathew replied in a very few words, returning his thanks for the kind feelings expressed towards him. At the conclusion of this ceremony, the barouche, in which was seated Father Mathew, Dr. Warren, Deacon Grant, and Mr. D. W. O'Brien, started, and was followed by several others, in which were seated many prominent and devoted friends of the temperance cause. The different societies which had formed on Washington-street, with their right resting in front of the Franklin School-house, opened to the right and left, and as the carriages passed between the two lines of temperance men, the cheers which arose from them, as well as from the immense mass of spectators, were loud, long, and oft repeated. These manifestations of welcome were responded to on the part of Father Mathew, by frequent nodding of his head, and waving of his hands. The ladies, too, expressed their pleasure at seeing the devoted friend of temperance by the waving of handkerchiefs, and other marks of friendly greeting. And here we may remark that the appearance of Father Mathew is extremely prepossessing. His countenance is expressive, and his manners win the confidence and respect of all who approach him. Arrived at the head of the procession the carriages halted, and some of the societies, including the Cadets of Temperance, marched forward, the Cadets coming into line directly in front of the carriage containing the distinguished guest. Along the whole route over which the procession passed, the streets, windows, and house tops, were literally filled with ladies, gentlemen, and children, all eager to obtain a glimpse at the benevolent and noble countenance of Father Mathew, who returned their salutations in the customary manner. At brief intervals hearty cheers were given by the crowd of spectators.

At about twelve o'clock a.m., the procession arrived at the Adams-house, and halted, where Father Mathew and others alighted and entered the house. Deacon Grant introduced Father Mathew to his Excellency Gov. Briggs, who welcomed him in a few words.

Father Mathew replied by saying that he doubted not his Excellency felt proud in being the chief magistrate of such a noble State as Massachusetts, and of such a noble and generous people as were her inhabitants.

After these congratulations, his Excellency and Father Mathew, together with Deacon Grant and Dr. Warren, went outside, upon a temporary balcony erected for the occasion, where they remained until the whole procession had passed, during which many of the number uncovered their heads, and bowed to their countrymen, at the same time giving him hearty cheers. After the procession had passed, the great mass of spectators immediately made a grand rush, until the entire street in front, and to the distance of several rods on either side of the hotel, was densely filled.

Nine loud huzzas were then given by the throng, after which all became silent, when Father Mathew briefly returned thanks for the kind manner in which he had been received, and expressed his high gratification at the good order which had been maintained during the proceedings of the forenoon. He closed by saying that he should have the opportunity of meeting them this afternoon on the Common. He then withdrew from the balcony, amid the most deafening applause, and the crowd quietly dispersed, and returned to their homes.

During the progress of the procession down Washington, near the corner of Common-street, as the carriage containing Father Mathew halted, a bright-faced pretty girl, apparently eight or ten years of age, stepped to the side of the vehicle, and presented him with a most splendid wreath of flowers, which he received with evident satisfaction.

During a halt in Blackstone-street, a fine looking lad, not more than ten or twelve years old, was passing the carriage, bearing a short pole, on the top of which was a small keg, with faucet attached. The keg was marked, in several places, "To Let." Deacon Grant accosted the boy with, "My lad, I see that you have a keg to let; how much do you ask for it?" "Oh, not much, sir," was the reply. To this Father Mathew remarked, that he hoped it would be a long time before he found a customer. "So do I too, sir," said the lad; and added, "I know you, Father Mathew; I saw you two years ago in England, and I haven't forgotten you." At this Father Mathew extended his hand, and grasping that of the lad, gave it a hearty shake, and blessed him.

While going up Washington, and just before the procession had arrived at the Adams House, an Irishman, who was evidently somewhat intoxicated, made his way from among the crowd, and, extending his hand to Father Mathew, asked him to administer the pledge, and instantly dropped on his knees in the mud. His wish was complied with in the customary form, when he arose, and, saying "God bless the temperance cause!" mingled again with the throng.

This was the first pledge administered in Boston by Father Mathew, but he will undoubtedly have the pleasure of doing the same in many instances.

We may add, in closing this account of the ceremonies of the day, that on the way from Watertown to the city this morning, Father Mathew was conveyed to the Brookline Reservoir, and from thence to the residence of the venerable Dr. Pierce, in Brookline, who expressed his high gratification at having the privilege and pleasure of taking by the hand so ardent and devoted a friend of the great and glorious cause of temperance.

In the afternoon, a meeting was held on the common, when Father Mathew made the following speech:—

Benevolent citizens of Boston! noble people of Massachusetts! dearly beloved countrymen! I regret that you have not heard the elegant address just delivered by Governor Briggs. It was one of the most eloquent I ever had the fortune to hear, and it most cordially sympathizes with you; every sentiment of it. I have called you noble people, not in the common sense of that term, but in that sense which designates what is natural in you; and generous nature is ever noble. I have noticed everything in this noble city; the beautiful has crowded upon me, until I now find myself like the miser who discovered the seven fountains from which ran pure gold. When he was endeavouring to catch what the one gave forth, he felt grieved because he lost what flowed from the other six. I feel myself placed in the same predicament; and I will have to let go the stream and take up its source. I will come from the attempt at a description of the country, and take up the source of its beauty. I will praise the noble people of Boston in the State of Massachusetts—they must be possessed of every virtue. You will find one State famed for virtues of one kind, and some for others. But in Boston they blend them all in one (loud cheering), and confined in one association the virtues of every people (continued cheering). I have long and most anxiously desired the opportunity of addressing you, and I have now got the happy moment so much coveted—so much expected—for my heart was burning with gratitude and desire to pay you back part of the debt poor Ireland owed to this great State. The people of Massachusetts were the first that sent a vessel of war to my afflicted country on a mission of charity (loud and prolonged cheering)—on a mission of charity to meet their distress. I was the almoner of part of their bounty; and I never distributed one atom of it without invoking the blessing of the Great God on this great people (rapturous cheers). I witness with pleasure the great assemblage before me, not at all as a compliment to myself, but as a mark of homage to the great virtue of temperance (loud applause)—a virtue which I find triumphant in Boston. You, the citizens of Boston, have kept your one festival—celebrated once more your joy at the triumph of your principles; but there was one thing that I regretted amidst it, that is, while I saw my countrymen enjoy every blessing under the wings of the American Eagle, my heart was disturbed—my heart was still in Ireland; and I wished that the tens of thousands of my unhappy countrymen could have shared the triumphs which you, the people of Massachusetts, have won by your indomitable adherence to the virtue of temperance (loud cheers). My happiness would be complete if this wish of mine could be gratified; and I wish also that my mission to America will be productive of one good result, to make many of my poor countrymen leave their own unhappy, I may say doomed, country, and come here to enjoy liberty and plenty (loud demonstrations of applause). I regret, not on my own account, that I cannot speak but in a manner unworthy of my noble friends around me to hear—that I have not the strength, the eloquence I once had. I do not complain; I glory in my infirmities! They were produced in the effort for temperance, and I may say with Paul that I bear the stigma of the Lord Jesus Christ (great applause). Governor Briggs, I thank you for the welcome that I have got this day; and I wish you every blessing that can be enjoyed in this great, generous, and fair country.

In answer to an address of the Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Beneficial Society of New York, the rev. gentleman sent the following:—

"New York, July 4, 1849.

"FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN.—From my heart I thank you for your generous and enthusiastic welcome. I rejoice in recognising in the tone and spirit of your address a development of that manly and patriotic feeling, indigenous to the Irish character, and which the ennobling influences of the glorious land of your adoption tend so much to foster and promote. I thank you—I deeply thank you—for your kind sympathy, and assure you that nothing but the overwhelming necessities of my position could induce me to accept any pecuniary aid from the British government. I need not remind you that I have never converted to my own use a single penny of that annuity, it having been invariably appropriated to pay the premium of insurances effected on my life to satisfy the importunities of creditors, to whom I became indebted in my unceasing exertions to promote the cause of temperance in Ireland. Nor need I assure you that I cannot so far forget the duty I owe to humanity as to identify myself even in thought with the working of that heartless and unchristian policy which consigns thousands of brave and virtuous Irishmen to starvation, disease, and premature death. I would, gentlemen, consider it the happiest epoch of my life if, the claims of my creditors being satisfied, I would be enabled to resign this paltry stipend, and once more move amongst my beloved countrymen (for whom I would willingly sacrifice my life), free, untrammelled, and independent. In this spirit, and for this purpose alone, I receive the kind assistance of the friends of temperance in America. To this object your generous gift shall be solely appropriated. I want nothing for myself but the humble privilege of doing good, and the power of consecrating the remainder of my days in the advancement of that sacred cause which has benefitted millions, and with which religion, virtue, and patriotism are alike identified.

"I am, fellow countrymen, with feelings of deep gratitude, your sincere friend, THEOBALD MATHEW."

TOTAL ABSTINENCE is the forerunner of religion, in destroying habits of intemperance, restoring man to reason, leading him to reflection, habits of industry, intellectual improvement, virtuous feeling, and moral practice; and these placing him in a position in which he will be far more likely to investigate divine truth and to become the subject of spiritual religion, than when besotted and degraded by vicious and intemperate habits.—Eli Walker.

THE EVILS OF BEER-SHOPS. An Essay. By J. RUSSELL.
London: Houlston, Paternoster-row.

THIS Essay obtained the first prize (£20) from the Association for the Suppression of Beer-shops, originated in Liverpool in 1848, for the purpose of procuring an Act of Parliament to prohibit the granting of any new licenses to beer-shops, and to enact that those already granted shall continue in force only during the tenure of the present holders. As the Committee of this Association considered that the object they proposed would be best accomplished by an exposure of the evil, without any advocacy of total abstinence from beer as an appropriate remedy, Mr. Russell has confined himself to that exposure; and a most fearful exposure it is! He has industriously searched the records of crime, and has, in every place, found a close and intimate connexion between the beer-shop and crime, destitution and misery. This Essay furnishes abundant and melancholy evidence that beer-shops are "a terrible evil;" "the chief nurseries of drunkenness;" "the seminaries of the idle and dissolute:" where the young find "the basest passions of their nature excited;" where "they are tutored to enter on the miserable career of the thief, the felon, and the murderer;" and where young women "very often become the victims of the unprincipled and abandoned characters who frequent such houses." We hope that this Essay will be very extensively circulated. Every member of both Houses of Parliament ought to be furnished with a copy; and we feel assured that if he reads it attentively, and unprejudiced by any personal interest he may have in the perpetuation of the evil, he will be fully prepared to vote for the bill which the Earl of Harrowby has promised to introduce early in the next session of Parliament. This Essay will also be valuable as a hand-book to those temperance advocates who will, doubtless, be actively engaged in getting up petitions to the Legislature on this subject at the earliest possible opportunity. Every true patriot, every genuine philanthropist, every man who truly desires the prosperity of the country and the spread of morality and religion, should diffuse the information contained in this Essay, and exert himself in every possible way to accomplish the object at which this Association aims. Let this be done, and we are sure that the respected writer of this Essay will account it a rich reward.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHRONICLE, for August, 1849. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THIS number contains the report read at the last May meeting in Exeter Hall. It is interesting, as furnishing a brief account of what has been done by the instrumentality of temperance societies in various parts of the kingdom and of the world, rather than as a report of the operations of the National Society itself. The receipts of the society appear to have been, during the year ending May last, £1,387 15s. 11d., leaving a balance in hand of £73 19s. 4d.; a state of prosperity, so far as the funds are concerned, of which few societies can boast.

ELIZA COOK'S JOURNAL. Published weekly. London: Clarke, Raquet-court, Fleet-street.

THIS journal bids fair to become the most popular of the cheap serials. Eliza Cook is a host in herself, and she has enlisted in her ranks men and women of acknowledged talent, including "Silverpen," "Peter Parley," &c. There is a large portion of the sentimental, but there is also much of the practical—much that can scarcely fail to improve the social comfort, and the general character and conduct of the attentive reader. The style of most of the articles is popular, entertaining, and instructive. The evils of intemperance are depicted in vivid colours, and gin-drinking is shown to be a horrible and most prolific vice. We wish as much were said of other fiery and destructive liquors, and that, in connexion with the disease, the most appropriate and efficient remedy were pointed out and enforced. The moderate use of strong drink seems to be the highest point at which Eliza and her fair friend and coadjutor Silverpen aim; for instance, Eliza sings—

"Take enough, it is a blessing—
Take too much it proves a curse."

With the exception of two or three stanzas in this strain, her "Temperance song," the principal portion of which we give in another page, is excellent. Let us hope, however, that the light which has thus broken in upon this class of writers may "shine more and more unto the perfect day."

LPSWICH JUVENILE TEMPERANCE BOOKS. No. 33 to 46.
London: Simpkin and Marshall, Paternoster-row.

AN interesting addition to a valuable series of publications for children. They deserve the extensive circulation for which their cheapness provides.

TEETOTALERS' BUDGET.

WATER CURE.—A large glass of water, sipped ten drops at a time, in perfect silence, will cure a person in a passion.—Boston Chronotype.

MARK!—Every fiftieth person in the country is a drunkard; one in 289 is a prisoner; and one in every 700 inhabits a lunatic asylum. Of the two latter classes, the majority become so through strong drink.—Boston Chronicle.

SHOCKING DRINK!—In the window of a public house in the neighbourhood of Islington, may be seen the following extraordinary announcement:—"A glass of ale and a galvanic shock for twopence."

A CONSCIENTIOUS TEETOTALER.—The Rev. R. L. Carpenter, of Bridgewater, late minister of the Unitarian congregation there, has ceased to hold that office, because he could not conscientiously, as an advocate of temperance, receive as a portion of his salary the rents of certain beer shops.

MILITARY RECRUITS.—He goes sober to the tavern—he awakes a sober man at the depot. The interval is passed in drunkenness and vice. The influence of comrades in misfortune, the constant supply of liquor, the ready eloquence of the recruiting sergeant, preclude all hopes of escape.—Times Newspaper.

GIN PALACES.—The investment of capital in gin palaces is one of the greatest commercial disgraces of the day, and how men can quietly pocket the profits of such speculations, and compose themselves to sleep at night, with the wages of such iniquity in possession, is one of those mysteries which confound the thinking mind.—Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.

WINE WITHOUT GRAPES!—The following receipt is copied from a little volume much valued by wine-merchants and spirit dealers:—"To make Wine.—Take twenty-five gallons of good sweet cider; add five gallons of good rectified whiskey; then boil two pounds of ground logwood in cider, let it settle, then strain it; then take four eggs, beat them well, put them into a quart of sweet milk; add one quart of molasses; mix; when settled, if necessary, add more molasses; let the whole lie still for one week, then draw it off and it is fit for use."—This precious mixture constitutes, in most cases, the "fine old Port" which is so conspicuously placarded at low spirit shops at 2s. 6d. per bottle.

THE BANEFUL EFFECTS OF STRONG DRINKS ON THE NERVES, ESPECIALLY ON THE FIVE SENSES AND VOLUNTARY MOTION.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

TASTING.

OUR former articles on the subject have shown how wonderfully the senses we have examined are contrived to minister to our wants, pleasure and security. What a commentary upon the text, "God is love," is supplied by these marvellous organs! Our remarks on "Taste," and the facts we shall adduce, will yet further exhibit the kindness and bounty of our Creator, on the one hand, and the cruelty, impiety, and ingratitude of man, on the other, in injuring or destroying a gift so conducive to our wellbeing and enjoyment.

IV. TASTE.—Most of our readers must be aware that this word is of the same origin as "Test," and is derived from the Latin, "Testare," which signifies, "to bear witness,"—"to attest,"—"to aver,"—"to make manifest." The palate has always been spoken of as a witness and a judge, and has been employed as a metaphor to represent intellectual or moral discernment. Persons are said to have a good taste in dress, in laying out their gardens, decorating their houses, &c., &c. And our moralists speak of conscience as a kind of spiritual sense, or taste, to enable us to distinguish between "good and evil." In some of our dictionaries, not less than ten or fourteen significations are given to this word; and yet all of them include the idea of trying, experimenting, bearing witness, or deciding. These various expressions show us the value of this power both to our physical and mental economy.

We have reason to believe that every animal has its taste; and perhaps there are in the natural world as many palates as there are species of beasts, birds, reptiles, fishes, and insects. Hence the old proverb is literally true: "What is one's meat is another's poison." We wonder at the different forms, colours, habits, and instincts of the animal world, but the variety of taste is not less astonishing. In this sense every creature seems to possess an instinctive and unerring judge, which enables it to decide at once respecting its food. In their wild state the brute creation need neither medicine or medical attendants. 'Tis true we have horse, cow, and even dog, doctors; but then these are demanded because our domestic animals have been placed in an unnatural state by the folly or ignorance of man. Leave them to themselves, and they would require none of our drugs or drugging. We sometimes talk of "throwing our physic to the dogs," forgetting that there is not a dog upon earth but has too much philosophy and prudence to take it, and has managed his diet too scientifically to require any of our nostrums. How rarely any animal takes the wrong food. What a difficult thing it is to poison a rat; and, when one has been duped, the others, in most cases, take warning; and yet these poor irrationals have none of our wisdom and knowledge, and are destitute of our mental powers. Their only guides, in a majority of cases, are their smell and their palate. Animal taste is therefore a kind of universal judge, and consequently it is no wonder that the word has been used in a higher signification than is implied in the mere discrimination of food or drink.

We need not say that taste, as well as sight, hearing, and smelling depends upon the nerves. Remove the latter from the body, and we should have no sensation. There would then be no "golden bowl," nor any "silver cords" by which objects of vision, of sound, of odour, or of savour, could telegraph the brain and the soul. These marvellous little threads have therefore an amazing deal of work to perform in the animal economy. Who can make any approach to truth in endeavouring to calculate the amount of sensations which at any one given moment thrill with bliss or anguish the animated portion of creation? Vegetation is beautiful beyond description; you cannot exaggerate its charms. "Solomon in all his glory" was surpassed by "the lily;" and yet the loveliest flower, not even excepting the sensitive plant, is destitute of nerves. So that here, not only Solomon, but even the black-beetle or the worm, surpass the lily, the rose, or the dahlia. Who can tell to what an extent the world is telegraphed by these sensational wires; or what an infinite variety of work they perform? For, as we said in our last article, anatomy and chemistry do not yet appear to have discovered any physical difference between the nerve that conveys sight, and that which informs us of the presence of sounds, odours, or tastes.

Our readers will pardon us for almost sermonizing on this subject, but we feel it very difficult to look at such a stupendous amount of animated mechanism, without thinking of the Almighty inventor and architect, who first contrived and called into being, and now, by the same divine skill, works all these complicated organizations. Science has more than once threatened to banish the Deity from the earth, to rob us all of our Father, and render the whole universe of sensations and intellect an orphan; and therefore we are irresistibly tempted, when we write on these topics, to say that it is sciolism—which is only another term for ignorance—that it is sciolism and not science, which has dared to utter this menace. Besides, we are about to speak of depredations and depredators. This sacred part of creation has been violated, and is being profaned every moment. Men and women—aye, men and women professing godliness, and almost boasting of a higher degree of piety, orthodoxy, and spirituality than others—are among the most guilty in this presumptuous daring. Nay, some of these religionists even go so far as to persecute those who will not join them in thus despoiling the temples of the Almighty.

We surely have no necessity to remind our friends that if the nerves are not the sacred oracles themselves, they are the medium through which the thoughts of the Eternal reach the human soul in its present incarnate state. Destroy the nerves, and you exclude the Creator from such of his children as are the tenants of these bodies of clay. Even the inspiration of the prophets of old was imparted by means of their senses. They had dreams, saw visions, heard words, or in some way or other had their bodily organs moved. So that to injure the nerves is actually to do what we can to close the doors of the only real sanctuaries that Jehovah has in this world, for "the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands;" the contrite and humble heart is his abode. But to be embraced by the soul, he must be the object of thought and affection; and he enters the thoughts and affections through the medium of the senses; and, therefore, just in proportion as these avenues of knowledge, or divine light, are closed, the immortal spirit has its range of truth limited.

Now, all stimulants injure the nerves, and, consequently, the organs of sense. The seemingly increased excitement and susceptibility is the effect of fever and disease, brought on by taking poisons, and has to be paid for by subsequent languor and lethargy. And this is not the worst part of the business: the nerves, by being constantly excited by an unnatural agent, lose their susceptibility, and partial or perfect paralysis ensues. We once heard of a squire who, to dazzle the neighbourhood by making a proud display at the marriage of his daughter, made himself a bankrupt, and in a few weeks appeared in the Gazette. This is exactly what the drinker of stimulants does. He draws on the future to gratify a vitiated taste for the present, and beggars his whole after life. Manhood is exhausted in youth; and instead of the hale, muscular, matured constitution of forty or fifty, we have the trembling, nervous, decrepid old man; and premature senility, with all its woes and infirmities, arrives forty or fifty years before its appointed time.

The truth of these statements is attested by every sense, and by none more than the TASTE. All drinkers of stimulants have a diseased palate. Hence the fastidiousness of appetite which torment them, and the constant resort to all sorts of condiments. The person who imbibes nothing stronger than water will need no other sauce than that which healthful hunger supplies. A tumbler of cold water half an hour or an hour before taking a meal is the finest stomachic that has ever been discovered. The taste of such individuals will be natural, and every repast will be enjoyed with a zest that kings might envy. Solomon, who was no stranger to luxury, assures us that "to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet." Who can tell the pleasures and joys arising from simplicity in food and drink? To these the intemperate and the moderate drinkers are strangers; and we have reason to believe that the latter are the greater sufferers of the two. In most instances the drunkard has destroyed the desire for food; but the moderate-drinking people have a tormenting sinking or craving which they cannot gratify. You can hardly make anything savoury enough for them. The cooks of such masters ought to have a higher salary than those who wait on Teetotalers. To please the caprices of their appetite requires more than human skill. Their tongues are generally furred. Some of them are obliged to use a tongue-scraper! They have frequently a disagreeable taste in their mouths, especially in the morning. They complain that their food has no taste in it, or else is positively disagreeable. Every meal puts them out of temper; and as dissatisfactions are among the most efficient things in the world to produce indigestion, their stomachs are perpetually on the rack. Everything to which they resort increases the malady. The dinner, pills, &c., add to the irritation of the intestines; the high seasoning makes them bilious; and to silence the upridings of the stomach, more wine, gin, or brandy is taken, and these liquors set their whole frame on fire. The palate becomes worse and worse. The tongue has no natural taste, but is scourged with the most disgusting sensations; the nerves are giving way; biliousness has become chronic; indigestion is habitual; the brain is always out of order; the temper is seriously affected; the spirits are depressed, and life itself is a burden. You constantly hear the exclamation, "I have no appetite!" "I cannot enjoy my food!" "Nothing does good to me!" "Can't you get me a relish?" How anxious they are for a grill! How many of them never eat a breakfast! What quantities of cayenne, mustard, curry, &c. &c. &c. &c., are taken, and what flatulency and other torments are thus created! The bitterest bitters are drunk, or chewed, to neutralise the bitterness of their mouths. Their noses are filled with snuff, no small portion of which, notwithstanding its disgusting taste, is swallowed. Even the filthy and disagreeable flavour of tobacco is welcomed, to displace the more offensive sensations of the palate which strong liquors have created. We knew one of our most popular preachers who had destroyed his taste by rum-and-water, &c., who could not eat a breakfast until he had created a zest by a piece of toasted cheese! This gentleman has long since been dead. He was one of our most useful ministers, and but for strong drink might have been alive now. Beer, wine, and spirits, in his case, were suicidal, and yet he never drank to excess—he was never intoxicated—a perfect moderationist; but, nevertheless, moderation carried him prematurely to the tomb!

Language is wanting to describe the ills and woes which arise from a diseased tongue. The history of what has been suffered from this source by moderate drinkers would fill volumes. Our Creator gave us this sense both for security and pleasure. It was intended to teach us what to eat and what to avoid. In a healthy state it is our great gastronomic judge and instructor, and were its natural dictates attended to, as in the case of animals, we should have mankind as free from disease as the brute creation. Like the smell, it is one of our ever-present guardian angels; nor is the pleasure it was designed to give less deserving of our notice and gratitude. What luxury is food to a natural taste! If the Almighty had seen fit, he might have created us without this organ, and thus have deprived us of all the felicity which it can give. What a misery it is to be hungry, to eat our food, and never taste it. A lady some time ago told us that she could not distinguish one dish from another, however dainty or savoury its contents. It is one of the characteristics of old age to lose this sense. The venerable Barzillai was fourscore when he excused himself from accompanying David to court, by saying, "Can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink?" But what age did for the kind-hearted Gileadite, strong drink does for the moderate and inebriate. The former, in most cases, have a vitiated palate, and the latter, very frequently, have no taste at all. The hottest gin rolls over their tongue as water. Aqua-fortis hardly produces an impression. The tongue, like the conscience, is seared as it were with a hot iron. We were told the other day of a chemist who, on seeing the prescription for a mixture which his apprentice had just administered to a customer, rushed into the street, if possible, to overtake the man, feeling assured that unless medical aid was instantly resorted to, the individual must soon be a corpse. He failed in his research, and a few days after was astounded to find the same person calling again for another dose. On inquiry it was ascertained that the poor wretch was a drunkard, and had so destroyed his palate that the most pungent liquors had no perceptible effect on his tongue or throat. Myriads upon myriads of similar examples might be produced, each one of them showing the destructive character of stimulants, and the cruelty, and iniquity of those who manufacture, sell, give, recommend, or use such baneful drinks.

READER! do you prize your senses, and would you enjoy them to old age? Then come and join our TEETOTAL band. Is sight a blessing as well as a luxury? Is hearing a source of unspeakable enjoyment and instruction? Are our olfactory nerves the gift of divine benevolence? Are a good appetite and a natural taste beyond all the sauces, piquant viands, and dainties which burdened the table of the rich gourmand who "fared sumptuously every day?" Then we beseech you, in the name of that love which you owe to yourself and your species, as well as in the name of that gratitude which is due to your bountiful Creator and Judge, abandon all stimulants. Remember that unless you do so, your nerves must suffer, and may become your bitterest tormentors; or else, by paralysis, may almost sever you from all communication with earth and Heaven. God gave us nerves and a brain to be the source of the most exquisite pleasure, and of constant and unspeakable edification and enjoyment—but ALCOHOL can transform this divine mechanism into an organisation of torture, more cruel than the bastle or inquisition, or else can so effectually destroy its sensibility as to leave us little more than inert breathing automata, literally dead while we live. It may suit the taste of the sensual to deride, of the spiritual moderationist to frown, and of the selfish to utter a malediction on what threatens his craft; but a day is coming when it will be seen that, if healthy nerves are a boon worth all the gold of the Eastern or Western World, then is TOTAL ABSTINENCE a PHILOSOPHIC CREED, a PHILANTHROPIC AGENCY, and a CHRISTIAN OBLIGATION.

WHAT VEGETABLE CONTAINS MOST ALCOHOL?—No vegetable contains alcohol at all, for alcohol is the result of a peculiar kind of fermentation in which sugar and gluten are both present, particularly the former; those vegetables which contain the largest proportion of sugar, as sugarcane, beet-root, parsnip, the juice of certain trees, &c., are therefore used with most economy in the production of spirits, although spirit does not exist, ready made, in any of them.—Magazine of Science.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF CARLISLE, PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF HEALTH.

MY LORD,—My anxiety to see that most useful, and, in the present emergency, indispensable measure, house-to-house visitation, carried out to its fullest extent, must be my apology for trespassing upon your lordship's valuable time and attention.

I fear that the medical visitors have hitherto devoted more time to the recording the number of killed and wounded in the siege, than in fortifying the people against an attack of the enemy.

The medical visitors ought to keep steadily in view, and never for a moment lose sight of the agencies at work in predisposing the system to an attack of this insidious and unseen foe. The agents may be divided into moral and physical.

The moral agents are, at the present moment, the most powerful, but least studied and most neglected of any.

I am fully convinced, from very extensive experience in the treatment and prevention of this disease, that fear is a most powerful predisposing cause, and one over which medicine can have no control. Here, indeed, we may "throw physic to the dogs." Despondency, and all depressing passions of the mind, have a powerful influence in lessening the vigour and resisting energy of the nervous system, and in this way of course predisposing the constitution to an attack.

The physical agents are all such as have a tendency to weaken the system, to lower the standard of health, as bad or insufficient food, or clothing, or rest; excessive labour, whether mental or bodily; excessive indulgence of the passions; being surrounded by and inhaling an atmosphere charged with noxious gases.

The human system was suited by nature to a natural atmosphere—not to a polluted and unnatural one. Whenever it is subjected to such, it manifests its repugnance through the means of those sentinels placed at the portal of respiration, the olfactory nerves. If these, the warnings, are unheeded, other indications of dissatisfaction soon declare themselves. If the air, the only purifier of the blood, be not itself pure, the blood cannot be purified, and the system, which receives all its nourishment and health from the blood, soon falls into decay, and becomes a ready prey to whatever epidemic disease may prevail.

Neither cholera nor any other epidemic disease has any mission to a healthy man, only to those predisposed by some one or more of the causes I have mentioned. The human system in health is endowed with a power to resist disease, and this power is commensurate with the amount of health of body and mind possessed by the individual.

Man is a compound being, and must be viewed as such. To preserve and protect, as far as possible, the healthy operations of mind and body, all sanitary reform should aim at. And how truly lamentable it is to reflect that the average mortality in England under ordinary circumstances, even before the advent of that decimating epidemic, cholera, was 1 in 45 annually.

It was never intended by the great Author of our being that man should thus be cut off at a period of life when he could be of most use to his fellow-man.

The study of the human body, the statistics of health and disease, enforce upon us the humiliating truth that man has been the agent of his own brevity of existence, with all the pains and sufferings which such transgressions of the laws of nature necessarily entail. That human existence might, by proper culture, be extended to more than double the present average, there cannot be the shadow of a doubt.

Of late much pains has been taken in the culture of a pansy or a dahlia, the improvement of the breed of a sheep or an ox, a horse, or perhaps an Hampshire hog, to the neglect of our own species. We have hitherto sown neglect, and we are reaping the cholera. Let us, for the sake of Him who made us, devote a little more time and attention to the improvement of the mind and the body of that superior animal which bears the impression of God's own image, and we shall do honour to Him to whom honour is due and infinite benefit to the human race. The issue is in your Lordship's hands, and the whole world would say with one voice it could not be in better. The mantle of the great philanthropist has descended upon the shoulders of his still greater and more illustrious namesake. Long may he wear it, is the universal echo of mankind!

The important lesson which the visitation of the cholera has given us should not be lost, or, like the persevering pedagogue, it will be repeated and with increased energy.

The medical inspectors have a most important duty to discharge. They ought to be medical philosophers; and inspire with moral courage while they administer medical remedies—confirm the strong and strengthen the weak—inculcate habits of temperance, cleanliness, industry, and frugality, as the best and surest preservatives against disease, the best means of attaining a long, healthy, and happy life.

They should be provided with the means of administering food, as well as medicine, and, in extreme cases, a few articles of clothing. Disease, induced by privation of food or clothing, can only be remedied by a supply of these things. It is said that all evil has its origin in ignorance. A melancholy proof of this assertion is found in the ignorance of the public in sanitary matters. Proper instruction is much required, more especially amongst the working and poorer classes, and as the instruction communicated in the house-to-house visitation must necessarily be very limited, and only to the few met with there on these occasions, permit me to suggest the great importance and advantage of public lectures in the public institutions and school-rooms in the metropolis. Much useful information would in this way be afforded, and much real good effected.

To teach the people to preserve their health is to teach them to practice many virtues, and to avoid many vices.

I have the honour to be, my lord,

Your lordship's very obedient servant,

Euston-square, †

AMICUS HUMANITATIS.

September 22nd, 1849.

JUST THE SAME!

WHEN the celebrated engineer, Brunel, who accomplished the experiment of tunnelling the Thames river, was brought before a Committee of the British Parliament, he was asked if a speed of eighty miles an hour on a certain railroad would be much more dangerous to a traveller upon it than a speed of forty? "It would be just the same," said he. "And a speed of ninety?"—"Just the same." "And a speed of one hundred?"—"Just the same; for," added he, "if the cars should run off the tracks at the rate of forty miles per hour, the passengers would all go to ruin, and at one hundred miles per hour they could not well go any further."

So it is with drunkenness. Whether upon wine, beer, cider, whisky, rum, brandy, or gin, it is just the same. The polished wine-drinker may look with contempt upon the gross cider or beer drunkard, but his drunkenness upon his choice Madeira or sherry is "just the same;" the same in its effects upon his body, his mind, his property, his family, his friends, his soul. Beer drunkenness may be more loathsome, but it can do nothing worse than wine. Raw spirit drinking may kill quicker, but not more surely. Drugged liquor may deprive more men of their reason but if the reason is gone through wine, it is "just the same."

OUR FUTURE KING.

"May it please your Royal Highness to think favourably of our cause, and that the Most High may spare and lead you safely through the dangerous paths of youth: honour you at a future, and we trust distant, period with the crown of the British empire, and at last bestow upon you a diadem of glory, which will never decay, is the affectionate prayer of the Juvenile Abstainers of Glasgow and neighbourhood."—Address to the Prince of Wales.

Amongst the many questions which have recently been agitated for the amelioration of some of the political and social evils that afflict the present generation, none present higher claims to consideration than the Temperance Movement. The Congress of Peace certainly represented a great idea; but by many shrewd men doubts are entertained as to the possibility of its realisation to the extent contemplated. Wonderful as is the construction of the human mind, it cannot with certainty pierce the shades of futurity so far as to inform itself that such a purification of the heart will be brought about by human means as will display the universal mind of nations so unclouded by the vapours of passion that they will seek in a peaceful arbitration what they have hitherto sought for in the arbitrament of the sword. Even allowing it all the assistance that might arise from the chance of probabilities, it is unequal to this; but if ever such a time does arrive, it will assuredly be, of all periods that have yet marked the pages of history, the one most worthy of the title of "GLORIOUS," as it will show Reason presiding over the destinies of the political world, display her determining who is right and who is wrong, enable her calm voice to be heard stilling the gathering tempests of nations, and subduing material power by the spirit of wisdom, justice, and truth.

To compass such a happy time as this the attempt has been begun in the assembling of the Peace Congress; but in following up this attempt something more than mere pound-and-pence arguments, at present so much in vogue, must be summoned to assist. It is readily granted that these are absolutely necessary to be employed to operate upon minds of a material character; but there are to be operated upon minds of a moral character, which require other arguments than such as flow entirely from the pecuniary idea—arguments of a deeper, stronger, and holier kind—such as acquire their strength from the virtuous soil upon which they grow, rather than their weight from the calculations from which they come.

We are told that War created the National Debt, and that Peace must pay it off; but thirty-four years of this blessing have augmented, instead of diminished, that enormity. This is surely a long-enough trial to convince us that Peace alone is unequal to her proposed achievement, and that her weakness should be strengthened by some additional ally. Happily it is by no means difficult to find this, as Teetotalism, at a moment's summons, stands ready for the league, and is the only alliance by which Peace will be enabled to maintain her position and make good her work, whatever that may be. It ought to be remembered that the war of swords and bullets is not the only kind with which Peace has to contend. There is a war of another kind different from that—a secret, insidious, STRONG DRINK war, which is ever going on at the vitals of the community, fighting against our social position, destroying our political independence, desolating our hearths, uprooting our domestic happiness, and stifling the seeds of virtue in the bosoms of our very children.

Within the past eighteen years civilised nations have been aware that a war of this kind has been carrying on its ravages in the midst of them, and they have been awakened to a sense of its extent by the appalling effects it has produced. In America and in England this has particularly been the case. These countries have been foremost in the present crusade against the swords and bullets, as they were against the strong drink; and it may be a question whether the ardour of their pursuit of the new will not cause them to overlook the importance of the old. Should their legislators and their leaders of men, however, be so unfortunate as to do this, we find that there are others, whose voices are strong, not by position, but by numerical multiplication, who will not be guilty of such an act. These have already evinced the determination that, at any rate, their opinions shall be known, not only in the common walks of life, but in those "high places," where the addresses of innocence should always be welcome, and the language of a virtuous sobriety accepted as the best token of a future affection and loyalty. We allude to the four thousand Juvenile Abstainers of the City of Glasgow, whose published Address to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, OUR FUTURE KING, "to think favourably of their cause"—how modest the request!—may be regarded as one of the many minor marks of significance which adorn this humanizing age.

OUR FUTURE KING is, no doubt, at present OUR ABSTINENT PRINCE, and what is now good for the Prince in this respect will continue to be so for the King. The noble steed does not require to change his drink when he ceases to be a colt; nor the young lion when he becomes the monarch of the woods. The wisdom of all experience has taught us that the ABSTINENCE of boyhood, when first departed from, is done so, not unfrequently with disgust, and with the continuance of the practice the quantity of the beverage taken is increased mostly by imperceptible degrees. The Moderation, or take-a-little system, so much lauded by the man, is found not to be, at all, necessary to the boy. He has scarcely any acquaintance with the word. His motto is to eat of common food and to drink of common water as much as he can, and he does the one always when he is hungry, which is pretty often, even during a day, and the other when he is thirsty, which is, in his case, not half so often as it is in that of the man who regularly practises modern temperance. This is the language of the experience of every-day life, and is to be found in the happy cottages; to be read in the laughing faces of thousands of the juvenile abstainers of these kingdoms. And oh! what sensations of delight have we ourselves experienced when we have entered some of these cottages; when we have seen some of these boys flocking round their humble but plentiful repast; when we have seen their cheeks swelling and their eyes closing from their perfect satisfaction; and then have heard their burst of healthful exultation as they threw down their spoons, or pushed their plates aside, and, with the independent feelings of precocious Wallace, broke forth from the doors of their happy dwellings, to bid defiance to summer heats or winter frosts, even amidst the poverty in which some of their lots were cast! Nature has herself, as to STRONG DRINKS, planted in the human taste a power of revulsion against them, which, if obeyed, would of itself be a sufficient guarantee for the security of ABSTINENCE; but this power is not obeyed, and like all Nature's arrangements in reference to the animal economy in which the mouth is concerned, it yields to repeated assault until revulsion ceases to act—until disgust is changed into desire, and abstinence is drowned in temperance, and temperance in drunkenness.

Let us hope, then, that OUR FUTURE KING will continue to cherish the principles of OUR ABSTINENT PRINCE; that he will be always ready to sacrifice an enhancement of revenue at the shrine of an enlargement of virtue, and that, like the present Monarch of Sweden, he will endeavour to disseminate throughout his dominions these righteous principles which, with experience, he will find to be based upon no visionary theory, but on the plain and simple laws of Nature, from which man, and MAN alone, throughout the whole scheme of animal creation, has erringly departed.

A MINISTER'S BOAST AND A MINISTER'S FALL!

"Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."—ST. PAUL.

I. THE BOAST.—The Rev. George Osborn, addressing the Missionary Committee of Review at the Methodist Conference recently held in Manchester, spoke as follows:—"As a Christian, I am restrained from doing many things which as a Briton I have a right to do. They won't let me nor Mr. Heald take a glass of wine at a Missionary meeting (laughter). They won't let me ride in a first-class carriage, as they say Dr. Alder does. They say that Dr. Newton rides in a fourth-class (laughter). To that I reply, that I suppose Dr. Newton pleases himself, and that's just what I mean to do (cheers). I will not succumb to the dictates of a parcel of irresponsible writers, 'men in masks,' who will never show their faces (hear). I mean to do as I please in all matters of the kind, where I am not bound by any Methodist law; and if I cannot be trusted to go in a first-class carriage, or to take a glass of wine when I think proper, I am not fit to be in your ministry. I won't be dealt with as a baby or an idiot (cheers). I will not have it dictated to me what I shall do or say. I stand upon my Christian liberty, and will not give it up, but will stand upon it if I stand alone (prolonged cheers)." It will be remembered that this same Mr. Osborn publicly assailed teetotalism, a few years ago, by writing against it; so that his doing as he likes may be interpreted into a determination to continue a wine-drinker.

II. THE FALL.—The Rev. Thomas Jackson, the President of the Wesleyan Conference, remarking on the case of a minister (John S. Stamp) who had just been unanimously expelled from the body, said: "The expelled person was the son of a highly-esteemed minister, and possessed more than ordinary gifts. There was reason to conclude that he had fallen by little and little. One cause had been a want of deep and habitual seriousness. He had been too much given to jocularity, especially in the use he made of Scripture language. There was a great difference between Christian cheerfulness and sinful levity. The habit of quoting Scripture in a humorous style is very dangerous. Another cause was, that he made too free with ardent spirits. An appetite for these may be easily formed, but cannot be easily broken. The habit of taking spirits is very dangerous, especially to a Christian minister." No doubt Mr. Stamp did as Mr. Osborn said he would do—that is, he did as he pleased.

Ministers of religion! we beseech you to give the subject of teetotalism your serious consideration. Facts are continually turning up which go to prove that none are safe who tamper with strong drink. The pen of inspiration has recorded the verdict, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging." Take heed that you are not "DECEIVED THEREBY!"

FROM "A SOLDIER'S FORTUNE;"

A TALE.

AFTER giving a very vivid description of the ill-usage of two children by a drunken father, the writer says:—

"Let us pause for an instant.

"Such are the effects of a genial glass!—such the effects of that generous liquid, the source, according to some, of light to the intellect and warmth to the heart—of bright conceptions, cordial affections, glowing aspirations, of all that can delight and animate our nature.

"If such be the effects in France, a country of comparative sobriety, what are they in our own island! Can we deny that thousands and tens of thousands of wretched, helpless families are, at the very moment whilst I write or you read, sunk into the lowest extremity of misery by the domestic tyranny, wanton extravagance, or barbarous ferocity of habitual drunkenness?

"And can it be possible that the stupid prejudices of mankind should be such, that the grand experiment now trying by the Temperance Societies should not only be regarded with culpable indifference by so many, but that attempts should actually be made to diminish their influence, and circumscribe the effects of their efforts, by the wanton ridicule thrown upon them? In how many of the magazines, newspapers, and other ephemeral productions, which exercise so great an influence on the masses, has not this been the case? This mischief proceeding too often, even from those who consider themselves the guardians of a purer morality, and stricter religion, than is common to the generality of mankind.

"Whether alcohol be, like laudanum, invaluable as a medicine, but, like laudanum, a most pernicious poison, when used as an article of diet? or whether, like bread and flesh-meat, it be a sustenance as well as an excitement—contributing, by its proper use, to the comfort and activity of the human frame? Whether, dangerous as the use of it confessedly is, its use may, in these cold climates, be considered as in some degree necessary? Whether there be a remedy for the fearful disease of habitual drunkenness; and whether total abstinence be not a perfectly safe, and the sole efficacious remedy, for that disease? Whether men may be snatched from that extreme depth of misery and depravity; or whether we must look upon them as virtually lost? Are not these questions of importance? Are not the experiments made to resolve them of the highest interest? Is there any question in politics more vital to the best interests of mankind? any question in medicine more important to the health; any question in morals more urgent, as regards the virtue and happiness of our race?

"Shall the agitation of such questions, then, be sneered at and despised?

"Ah! if for every idle word that men shall speak, God will call them to account at the day of judgment, what will be for every idle printed word?"

THOUGHTS FOR THE WAY.

Time sweepeth on; then, oh! my soul, review,
With love enkindled, that enshielding grace
Which from meet vengeance saves; fled scenes pursue;
Commingling homage and rebellion trace.

Alas! what vain imaginings, vile deeds,
Have wooed thine ear unchid? what dastard fears?
What lukewarmness? behold thy sullied weeds,
And, in self-loathing, eat thy "bread of tears."

Yet, mourning, cherish hope; lo! yonder streak
Of gloried light reveals a fountain high—
The heaven-appointed laver for the weak—
Desponding, laggest thou? nay, purify.

Inconstant soul! what now thy staid resolve?
Wilt thou again with dross thy robe defile?
Will thy delight round earth-sprung joys revolve,
Attracted, babe-like, by their wild'ring smile?

Ah, no! this world ere long must pass away;
Each gay beguiling phantom shall depart;
Who looks beyond, and pants for boundless day,
God will encompass, and englad his heart.

Then plead that promise amid life's alarm;
Outbreathe—"Good Lord, conform me to thy will;
Thy panoply bestow, my sins disarm,
That I this joy may know, my end fulfil.

"A holy warfare henceforth let me wage;
Thy glory and my brethren's weal, how best
Effectuate; let this each thought engage,
Till won the pilgrim's prize, the soldier's rest."

DALMOGAND.

SELF-REFORM.—One reason why the world is not reformed, is because every man would have others make a start, never thinking of himself.

OBITUARY.

WE have the melancholy task of reporting the sudden removal by death, while in apparent health, and pursuing a career of usefulness, of some distinguished friends and advocates of the temperance movement.

HENRY NEAVE RICKMAN, of London, the "Commercial traveller," well known to the temperance societies in various parts of the kingdom as an intelligent and instructive advocate of temperance, universal peace, and other movements having for their object the improvement of the industrial classes. Having long been in the habit of noting down every circumstance bearing upon these points, and his profession as a commercial traveller bringing him into close contact with various classes in different parts of the kingdom, and blessed, withal, with a retentive memory, his lectures and addresses were replete with important facts, which he was careful to improve to practical purposes. He signed the pledge of total abstinence from strong drinks about twelve years ago, from which period he zealously advocated the principle in the metropolis and in various parts of the kingdom, as well as in numerous private circles. His constitution had been latterly shaken by some attacks of paralysis, but he was gradually recovering his strength, and meditating new plans of usefulness, when he was suddenly removed by death on the 22nd of August, in the 63rd year of his age.

WILLIAM CASH, Esq., of Peckham, Surrey, and Woodstreet, Cheapside, died on September 6th, after a few hours' illness, in the 58th year of his age. Mr. Cash joined the Total Abstinence Society soon after its formation in the metropolis, and continued liberally to support the movement to the period of his death. He was the active and able chairman of the National Temperance Society. He was also one of the promoters and earliest directors of the National Provident Institution, and attended his place as Chairman of the Board on the day preceding his illness. Throughout his brief but severe illness, Mr. Cash retained his faculties unimpaired; was perfectly conscious of his imminent danger, and calmly and peacefully met the sudden and unexpected summons to put off mortality. His loss will be deeply felt by many attached friends.

ARCHDEACON JEFFREYS, late of Bombay, died at Exeter, September 9th, after a few hours' illness. The Archdeacon had exercised the duties of the clerical office in India with much zeal and success for upwards of thirty years. About ten years ago he joined the Total Abstinence Society, from a conviction of the soundness of the principle, and because of the influence which his example might have upon those he aimed to benefit. He soon became a zealous advocate of the principle, issuing tracts and papers from time to time, addressed chiefly to professing Christians, most of which have been reprinted in this country, and circulated by hundreds of thousands. The soundness of the reasonings, and the benevolent and truly Christian tone of his writings, have rarely been equalled, and certainly never surpassed, by any temperance advocate. We were favoured to spend an evening with him on the 4th ult., at a meeting, a report of which will be found in another column. He was then in good health, and stated that he had "enjoyed uninterrupted health for thirty-one years," and that "his health had rather improved than otherwise since he had been a teetotaler." On the Saturday after this meeting he went to Exeter, on a visit to a clerical friend, whom he assisted on the Sabbath following. About midnight he was taken ill, but not wishing to disturb the family, he remained till morning, when his groans brought assistance. It was, however, too late, and about seven in the morning of Monday he expired.

"Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." "Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thy hands to do it. Sny not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give; when thou hast it by thee."

SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN NEW YORK.—By a late report of the Chief Police of the city of New York, it appears that there are in the city 4,567 houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that 3,578 of them are kept open for this purpose on Sunday. This does more to produce pauperism and crime, to debase the moral sense, and especially to injure those who, by labouring during the week, were best entitled to the repose of the Sabbath, than any and all other causes.—American Union Journal.

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

THE NEXT MEETING will be held at Mrs. Watts' Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on WEDNESDAY EVENING, October 3rd, at half-past seven o'clock.

AN APPEAL.

JAMES MORRIS, coal porter, died on Saturday, September 15, after a very short illness. He has left behind him a wife and four children, the eldest, a girl, being but eight years old. Mr. Morris had been a teetotaler about six years; and during that period few men have laboured more zealously to promulgate the principle among the working classes, and especially amongst that portion of them engaged in the coal trade; and much good has resulted from his labours. For six months previous to his death he was in circumstances of distress, not having been able, for some time past, to earn more than ten shillings per week. The wife and children are left entirely destitute. Temporary relief has been afforded them by Mr. David Walters, and the Society meeting in the Hall in Rosemary-lane; and a subscription has been set on foot, in the hope of raising a small fund which may enable the widow to engage in some kind of business by which to obtain a livelihood. Testimony is borne to his excellent character, and his laudable efforts to do good, by the Rev. C. B. Gribble, M.A., Incumbent of St. Paul's, Dock-street, East London; James Hawkins, Esq., Surgeon, 36, Colet-place, Commercial-road; Mr. J. W. Green; and other gentlemen well known to Temperance Societies. Mr. JOHN CASSELL, of 80, Fenchurch-street, has consented to become Treasurer, and to him any donations may be forwarded. The case is one of pressing necessity.

DR. BEECHER'S SERMONS.—Dr. Poor related a pleasing anecdote, respecting himself, at the recent anniversary meeting of the American Temperance Union. Some years ago a box of books came out to him from America. Among them was a small book entitled "Six Sermons on Intemperance." He cast that aside, saying he had nothing to do with that, though he was then a moderate drinker. Some time after he took it up, and admiring the vigour of its style, and the pungency of the reasoning, he read it through, and he exclaimed, "Beecher means me! Beecher means me!" and he and his brethren were made converts to the cause.

"GIVE ME A SHORT LIFE AND MERRY!"—Merry! Is there any merriment in the broken down father who sees one who he fondly hoped would have been the stay of his old age, sunk into the hopeless, helpless, debased condition of a drunkard? Merry! Is there any merriment in the broken-hearted mother, who sees all her tender cares to bring up a man thrown away upon a brute in human form? Merry! Is there any merriment in the wife who sees the once-beloved sinking from the consequences of his own vices into an early and disgraceful grave? Is there any merriment in the child, the drunkard's child, when her meek look of love is returned with a Satanic scowl, and instead of a blessing she receives a curse and a blow? Merry! Is there any merriment in the victim himself, in his alternations of lethargy and madness? Any merriment when, in his waking dreams, he sees the tormentors come before their time, and already feels the horrors of hell? Young men, young man! if you have any longing for the short life and the merry, visit the chamber of the man who is suffering under delirium tremens, see his maniac terror, and hear his agonizing shrieks, as one horror after another presents itself to his diseased vision, and you will see what the merry life is of which he has boasted. His fate may be yours. Beware of the tempter! Touch not, taste not, the infuriated draught. Let the contents of the poisoned cup never pass your lips.—Speaker.

THE "LAW MAGAZINE" AND THE "MEDICAL TIMES."

BY H. MUDGE.

INSTEAD of commenting, this month, on some interesting point of medical practice (for though I have written on several such points, many more remain to be noticed), I wish to direct attention to sayings respecting the use of stimulants contained in the two periodicals named in the heading of this paper.

It will hardly be credited that in the happy change from drunkard-making to sobriety-preserving beverages, and the usages now progressing in the world, the lawyers are more advanced than the doctors! The men who interpret the laws of the realm express more clearly what is the law of health than do those whose professed business it is to protect us from the inroads of disease, and to cure us when we are sick!

In the May number of the "London Law Magazine" we have, after some paragraphs relating to crime, the following stringent remarks:—"It [alcoholic drink] is attended by no single advantage; it has been proved to demonstration, over and over again, that instead of exhilaration, it creates twice as much prostration, after its transient effects are over; that, so far from ministering to strength, the water-drinkers have beaten those who trusted to stimulants in every kind of muscular exertion and labour. That it tends to health or to power, either of mind or body, is an assertion that has no other foundation than its own effrontery. It directly and largely diminishes both; laying the seed of every sort of disease, and bringing pain to the rich, and beggary to the poor."

These are vigorous, truthful words, and form a remarkable contrast to the articles I am about to notice, which may be read at length in the "Medical Times" for August 11th and 25th. The former is entitled "The Total Abstinence Question as viewed in Germany," and appears to be an abstract of a paper expressing the opinions of Dr. Stromberg; and it is interesting to see how the views of opponents abroad coincide with those of opponents at home. The same vague generalities, the same inattention to recent trials of abstinence on a large scale, and the same reluctance even to try where the omission of alcohol would lead to, are manifest in both. A medical certificate (something similar to the English one now in course of signature) being projected in Germany, the following objections are brought forward against it:—"Our peasants," says the Doctor, "who sustain violent labour on unstimulating food, make use of brandy in the absence of any other exhilarating fluid as a customary drink, as a dietetic, and as daily experience shows, without the least prejudice to their health. Still we will not say, that in the majority of them it is indispensably necessary. Just as little does its moderate use injure soldiers engaged in the fatigue of their profession; on the contrary, it is useful." How comes it to pass then that amongst this peasantry drunkenness and its attendant diseases are so prevalent as to call aloud for medical interference and aid to suppress and to cure them? The very necessity that has called the projected certificate into existence proves the fallacy of the assertion, that the peasants use brandy without the least prejudice to their health! For if no evil has ever been seen, how on earth should learned men think of testifying against it? Equally unfortunate, as it appears to me, is the writer's allusion to the soldier. Brandy is the dire curse of the soldier: hence Sir Charles Napier's late speech in India. It is hardly becoming one writer on dietetics to pass silently by the published opinions of another, and after the evidence respecting troops abroad (at home they may be reckoned as on a level with other mechanics), collected and given to the world by Dr. Carpenter, in his well-known article in the "British and Foreign Medical Review," it would have been more satisfactory if the "Medical Times" could have brought forward evidence of an opposite tendency: but where is such to be found? There is the rub, and it is much easier to assert than to prove. Let fact meet fact; and let us have the reference where an inquest or a court-martial has been held over a soldier who died or neglected his duty because he was a teetotaler. Imprisonments, floggings, and deaths, the consequences of strong drink, are numberless; is there one on record as the consequence of water-drinking? The German objector adduces other points of what he considers weakness in the proposed certificate, and proceeds to combat them by contending that in Northern Germany liqueurs are introduced into the drawing-room without either disease or death following them; and, again, that habit compensates for such circumstances as might make stimulants detrimental to the organism; also that brandy forms for the poor a kind of succedaneum for good food, warm clothing, and a warm residence in winter. He quotes Mr. Edmund Morris (whose statements Dr. Grindrod so thoroughly confuted) to the effect that teetotalers are more liable than others to the ague poison, and concludes, as thousands have concluded before him, that it is only what he calls the disproportionate use of brandy that is prejudicial to health, and adds that the proposition as thus corrected is no new statement, and needs no confirmation by the German medical profession!

Now, it is manifest at a glance that these are the ordinary objections in England as well as in Germany; sub judice lis est, the matter is before the judge, and the problem is in process of solution, but the argument of anti-teetotalers proves too much (if it proves anything)—viz., that things are, and have been for time past, in a satisfactory state, which is manifestly untrue.

The second article in the Medical Times is a leader in the number for Aug. 25; I cannot see that, on the whole, it throws any light on the subject; a friend or a foe might equally claim it and use it. To illustrate this I will put a couple of extracts in juxtaposition:—

AGAINST.

"To say that it (alcohol) is not food, is by no means to deny its necessity or usefulness, for the same might be said of air or light."

FOR.

"It is clearly recognised that alcohol is not food; or, in other words, that it undergoes no digestion, but is received at once into the vessels."

The writer asks, "Does alcohol modify life? And if so, how? What influence does it exert on the organisms of its moderate uses, and of its habitual abuses? And what is the effect of its non-use on those who altogether renounce it?" And says, "At present a complete answer can scarcely be returned to all of these questions." Then may we not express a hope that medical practitioners will prosecute the inquiry, and that the editors of medical periodicals will not hinder them by low buffoonery?

The editor's conclusion I quote: "On the whole, considering the condition of the labouring classes, this question ought to be regarded as forming but a small part of a great sanitary movement, upon which it is in a great measure dependent, and without the progress of which the mere discountenancing of a particular stimulant would be doubtfully prudent, and certainly futile."

This is the language of a party not conversant with the dreadful evils of the drinking system; of one who confounds cause and effect, and who would remove the idol temple and its multitudinous enormities with all imaginable gentleness, instead of knocking out the keystone of the arch, and sweeping off the rubbish, thereby abating the nuisance without ceremony or delay.
